In accordance with the request of His Lordship Five Members of the Deputation waited on Lord William Bentinck on Thursday the 5th instant, and were favorably received. The point on which the Governor-General first required information was a precise definition of the classes considered as composing the Uncovenanted service. It was stated to his Lordship that all servants of Government in Civil employ, whether Christians or natives not holding Covenants came within the term. His Lordship then inquired whether all Servants of Government so situated were intended to be provided for by the contemplated Funds. It was answered that they embraced all; but if a limit were considered advisable, the existing Pension rules supplied it, in excluding all Individuals in receipt of Salaries under 10 rupees per mensem. That supposing the proposed Funds to be confined to christian assistants only, a contribution of 5 per cent on their salaries, would yield about 75,000 rupees per annum; but that if natives receiving more than 10 rupees per mensem were included, an annual income of 2,25,000 rupees would be available for the proposed Funds. On the subject of these calculations, His Lordship was informed that they only applied to Bengal and Agra, and did not comprehend Madras and Bombay. The idea entertained by the Governor-General was that a pension Fund, if established, ought to embrace the four presidencies. His Lordship asked for information on the subject of the probable extent of the liabilities which would devolve on the Funds, and whether the above mentioned income would be sufficient to meet them? Want of time had prevented the Committee from forming the necessary tables, and this circumstance was stated to His Lordship; it was however urged that if the general principles of the memorial were recognized; the requisite Tables would be prepared. Lord William remarked the Deputation might consider the general principles of the Memorial admitted, and being asked if any objections existed to furloughs replied that there would be no difficulty on that head, and that it was desirable that such an indulgence should be provided for. His Lordship observed that the Memorial in its present form would be unintelligible to the Court of Directors, but that he would put the matter in train, and after consulting some persons on the subject, he would see the deputation again. The Members composing it, then withdrew.

On Wednesday the 18th instant, His Lordship intimated, that he desired the attendance of Messrs. Leslie and Francis on the subject of the Memorial who accordingly waited on His Lordship at 2 P. M.

His Lordship opened this conference by stating that the Memorial had in the interim come under the consideration of the Council, and that objections had been urged, which his Lordship was apprehensive would be fatal to its success. With respect to furloughs, His Lordship observed, that the class of persons (Europeans) who alone would benefit by such indulgence could not expect to obtain a privilege which would be of little use to the larger proportion of the uncovenanted service. To this it was replied, that, though the term furlough might be considered as too extensive in reference to their actual expectations, still it was to be borne in mind that occasional relaxation from incessant labour, especially when such occasioned no additional expense to the state would be available equally by those born in the country as by Europeans; and that the authorized grant, of such an indulgence would doubtless be acceptable to the Service in general.

Retirements after 22 years actual service His Lordship observed might be viewed by the Court of Directors as too great a concession to persons born in this country, and that the rules of the Civil Fund, from which the clause had been borrowed, being considered inapplicable to the Uncovenanted Assistants, would be discouraged by the home authorities, who had reasons for conceding to their covenanted servants special privileges. His Lordship expressed apprehension that the committee had not carefully calculated the extent of aid which Government would require to contribute, and that 5 per cent would be insufficient. On this point it was observed, that the support of Government would be absolutely for a certain number of years, but that eventually Government would be relieved of all expense on account of Pensions under existing regulations.

His Lordship then expresed a hope that the life Assurance office which Government was about to establish would meet the wishes of uncovenanted servants, especially as it was his intention to propose to the Home authorities, that an annuity office should be engrafted on that institution. The present pension regulation would however still remain available to the uncovenanted assistants as heretofore.

With reference to some odservations made by the Deputation, His Lordship mentioned that he thought benefit would result to the uncovenanted Service, and to the country generally by the Establishment of a Retiring Fund, in the way proposed. His Lordship added that it had been determined to forward the Memorial to the Court of Directors, and that on his arrival in England he would communicate with the India House on this subject in connexion with the Life Assurance Plan. The Deputation in taking leave earnestly solicited His Lordship to use his influence in bringing about the recognition of some fixed principles of retirement for the members of the Uncovenanted Service, and in obtaining the sanction of the Home authorities in regard to the pensions for their Widows and Children.

Calcutta, 31*st March*, 1835.

The Chairman also begs to intimate that the Committee having considered to follow up the memorial with another to the Honorable Court of Directors, a sub-Committee has been appointed to prepare it, and to render it as complete as possible: so soon as this is done, the memorial will be submitted to a general meeting of the Uncovenanted Assistants, with such suggestions as may appear for the general benefit of the service.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society, held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments, April 4, 1835.

Before commencing the business of the evening, the Secretary intimated to the Meeting, that part II. of the seventh vol. of the Society's Transactions, was all but completed, and would be issued to the members of the Society in the course of the month.

The following gentlemen were elected members of the Society, viz.

H. Chapman, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon Governor-General's Body Guard, Wm. Griffith, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Madras Establishment, R. C. McConnochie, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon and J. W. Knight, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, both belonging to the Bengal Establishment.

C. J. Davidson, Esq. Assistant-Surgeon Artillery Dum-Dum, was proposed as a member of the Society by Dr. Stewart and Mr. Hutchinson.

The following miscellaneous communications were then read to the Meeting.

A letter from C. Mackinnon, Esq., Surgeon 32d Regt. N. I., requesting that his name might be withdrawn from the list of members of the Society; which was accordingly done.

A letter from Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co., the Society's Agents at Madras, giving cover to a remittance of sicca rupees 703 9 9 in favor of the Society.

A memorandum from W. Twining, Esq., descriptive of a preparation forwarded by him of a diverticulum of intestine. The process in question consisted of a sort of cul de sac, about four inches in length, projecting from the jlium. It was taken from the body of a subject, that had died of chronic gastro enteritis by which an extreme degree of emaciation had been produced. The disease of which the patient died was not supposed to be connected in any way, with the malformation abovementioned; nor could Mr. Twining learn, that the health of the individual had been at all affected by it.

A letter from J. W. Knight, Esq., descriptive of a beautiful piece of animal mechanism in the first dorsal fin of the balistes, belonging to the family of Sceerodermes and order Phlectognathi of the Subbrachial Malacopterigians of Cuvier. Although this naturalist is silent on the subject, Mr. Knight is inclined to think, that in this fin, or rather in the first spine of it, the fish likewise possesses a weapon of offence and defence. In the delineation given by the Progressors of the Jardin des Plantes, Mr. Knight states, they have omitted the membrane and ligaments without which the fin would be rendered imperfect.

A description by Dr. Stewart of a post mortem examination of a case of tuberculated liver. The subject was an old Hindoo, who had probably never tasted animal food or spirits in his life. He stated himself to have been only ill for a month. During the few days he remained in Hospital previous to his death, nothing of course could be done for him. On dissection the diaphragm adhered firmly to the liver, by which it was forced up, so as greatly to contract the size of the thorax. The liver likewise occupied the whole of that portion of the abdomen above the navel. On removal it weighed 8½ -and measured 14 inches in its long axis, and 9 in the other. It was indurated in substance, throughout of a pale, livid, and mottled color, and thickly studded with white or yellowish tubercles of various sizes, from that of a millet seed, to that of a filbert. The cystic duct was compressed by a round, white hard gland, about the size of a hazelnut; another gland considerably larger, pressed against the ducts near their junction, and several others of a similar nature were found in the capsule of glisson. The gall bladder contained a biliary calculus, and the hepatic artery was unusally small. The pancreas was completely disorganised, stretching down the left side of the spine to the brim of the pelvis. It was firmly bound down by the mesentery, and seemed to consist of numerous smooth, round, hard tubercles. The mesenteric glands were all swelled, hard and white, like those in the capsule of glisson, and were probably in a schirrous state. Dr. Stewart's description was accompanied by a drawing, by a promising young artist, Mr. Woolnorth, which will be acknowledged in its proper place.

The following works were presented for the Library.

The second fasciculus of drawings from preparations in the Army Medical Museum at Fort Pitt, Chatham, presented to the Medical Board, by Sir James MacGregor, and by them to the Medical Society.

A treatise on the Epidemic cholera, by Alexander Turnbul Christie, M. D., by the Medical Board.

An Index to the first eighteen volumes of the Asiatic researches, by the Asiatic Society.

FOR THE MUSEUM.

A preparation of a diverticulum of intestine, by W. Twining, Esq.

A drawing of a turberculated liver, by D. Stewart, Esq., M. D.

A biliary concretion by ditto ditto.

The following original communications were presented at the meeting.

A report on the Medical management of the jails, throughout the territories subject to the Governments of Fort William and Agra, compiled in a great measure from documents in the office of the Medical Board, by James Hutchison, Esq.

A fatal case of extensive pulmonary and visceral disease, presented by the Medical Board.

The following communications were then read and discussed, viz.:—

A case of arrow wound of the head, by A. Storm, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

A case of poisoning by laudanum, in which artificial respiration was had recourse to with advantage, by C. J. Smith, Esq., Madras establishment.

A case of ileus in an infant, by D. Stewart, Esq., M. D.

Farther observations on dracunculus, by C. Morehead, Esq., M. D., Bombay establishment.

The subject of Mr. Storm's case was an European, who while employed on actual service on the 24th of October, received two arrow wounds, one in the head and the other in the back. From that time till the morning of the 27th, when Mr. Storm saw him, he had been a great deal exposed to heavy rain, from the want of tents. The patient said, that he felt stunned when wounded, and that the arrow could not be extracted without force, but it did not appear to have occasioned him great pain. The wound which was in the middle of the occipital bone, was partially closed. The party reached cantonments on the 28th. On the 31st the patient complained more of his head, felt feverish and was reported sick in consequence next day. He had a purgative, in the evening was bled to Syncope, and next day had 50 leeches applied to his head. On the 2d November, he felt greatly better, and the bowels had been acted on. The wound was puffy; it was opened with a lancet and a poultice applied. On the 3d, he complained of headache, with frequent and full pulse; was again bled to 16 ounces, and was purged by calomel and colocynth. The stomach was irritable, and could not retain any medicine in a liquid form. From this time, the cerebral symptoms continued to increase; notwithstanding active measures of depletion and mercurial purgatives. On the 6th, he felt somewhat better, sat up at 8 o'clock P. M. in a chair, and shortly after felt cold, was seized with shivering, and complained once more of great uneasiness in his head. The measures of depletion were continued. From this time to the 14th, when he died, he gradually got worse. The fever came on every 24 day, with a slight exacerbation on the intermediate one. For the last two or three days he was comatose. On examination the pericranium was found detached for a small space round the wound. The arrow had penetrated in a slanting direction, a little towards the left side of the occipital bone; it had wounded the dura matter and brain. On opening the former, and about half an inch from the surface, an abscess was discovered; the left lateral ventricle was likewise full of matter. The substance of the brain in the tract of the abscesses was soft and pulpy.

The subject of Mr. Smith's case was a young woman of 24 years of age, who had taken laudanum with the view of destroying herself. This was at 6 o'clock A. M., she was then perfectly insensible, the countenance livid, and the pulse beating irregularly from 30 to 40. The respiration was carried on by long drawn sighs, and did not exceed 10 or 15 in the minute. The body was cold, and the pupils insensible. The stomach pump was effectually used, and ammonia and brandy afterwards exhibited by means of it. Venesection was attempted; but the blood would not flow. Turpentine enemata were administered and sinapisms applied to the feet. At 10 o'clock, she is described "as being almost gone," the pulse not to be felt in the axilla, only three or four deep inspirations in the course of the minute; the lips, hands and body of a leaden colour and quite cold. In this state artificial respiration was had recourse to, and in the course of a quarter of an hour the action of the heart was stronger, and the hue of the body had improved. By a perseverance in this course till 12 o'clock, the pulse returned to the wrist, the lips nearly regained their usual colors and the respiration had improved. She was left to herself for half an hour, and relapsed. Artificial respiration was again had recourse to till 3 o'clock, when she was conceived to be so much better, and to render a continuance of it unnecessary. At 4 o'clock, she was again relapsing, and the same remedy was had recourse to till 6, she was then quite insensible but the pulse and heat of body had returned, and she breathed naturally. At 11 P. M she moved her hand, and during the night continued to improve, so as to be considered out of danger next morning. Mr. Smith concludes with some observations on the phenomena of sudden death, having relation to the experiments and opinions of Brodie, an account of which may be found in the 2d vol. of Paris and Fonblanque's Medical Jurisprudence.

Dr. Stewart's case of ileus occurred in a very young and puny infant of European parents, who had lost three former children in early infancy.

The symptoms of ileus came on 3 or 4 days after the imprudent checking of a slight diarrhœa by the nurse, probably with opium. When the child was first visited the belly was found distended and flatulent. There was obstinate costiveness, violent retching and screaming, spasms of the limbs and every symptom of internal obstruction. There was however, no fever, but little morbid heat of belly. No insensibility, and the tormina were evidently assuaged by warmth and frictions. Fluids were swallowed with avidity, but instantly ejected.

After trial of all the usual remedies, such as warm bath, calomel, common and turpentine enemas, &c., &c., recourse was had to tobacco. A cataplasm of the wet leaves was bound round the body and retained for 15 minutes, while an injection was administered of the infusion of 10 grains of tobacco leaf in 4 ounces of water. This was thrown up into the colon by means of the long flexible tube of Read's stomach pump. In introducing it, some obstruction was found in the situation of the first flexure of the colon, but after passing that, the tube entered freely its whole length. The injection was repeated after half an hour, and was followed by copious green discharges. The abdomen soon became flat and soft.

An alarming degree of collapse ensued, which lasted for several hours, but happily terminated in a long, found sleep from which the infant awoke greatly revived and took the breast cheerfully.

Stimulant embrocations were directed to the spine and belly, and minute doses of calomel with rhubarb and aloes every six hours were exhibited to maintain the re-established action and promote healthy secretion; next day however all the symptoms returned; and the child did not survive for more than 24 hours.

On examination, there was no evidence of active inflamation having existed in the abdomen; although at the root of the mesentery there was considerable vascular congestion, and the mesenteric glands were enlarged. The small bowels were empty and white, the stomach and colon were pale, thin and enormously distended with air.

Dr. Morehead's Paper on dracunculus is intended as a continuation of a former one on the same subject, which appeared in the 6th vol. of the Society's Transaction, and in which he suggested, that the endemic prevalence of dracunculus might be found connected with geological formation. The Secondary trapseries being in his opinion the one, which would most probably be found favorable to the disease. His farther researches have not gone a great way to establish this theory: notwithstanding he continues to prosecute them. His present communication opens with a geological sketch of the Peninsula of India, so far as that is required to elucidate the subject of inquiry. His information relative to the presence or absence of the guineaworm in the northern and southern Concan has been obtained in a great measure, from the replies to queries circulated at his request, among the native functionaries of government, by his friends the Collectors of the northern and southern Concan, and the sub-Collectors of Bugulcotta and Cuddapa. The following is the result of these inquiries:—

In four talookas guinea-worm does not occur, and in all the upper crust, is of laterite rock. The water used is not specified, but from the physical features of the districts it must be chiefly that of wells.

There are reports from 494 villages, in which guineaworm does not occur, of these 364 are in a district the upper crust of which is of laterite rock. The nature of the water is not mentioned, but from the physical features of the district it must be chiefly of wells. Of the remaining villages, in 109 the water of rivers of considerable size is used, 162 of which are in districts where primitive rocks, chiefly marble and clay slate, constitute the geological features, 7 in Secondary trap districts and 21 villages use the water of nullahs, wells and tanks.

Of 991 villages in which Guinea-worm prevails; 309 are in districts of Secondary trap formation; 451 in districts in which there is a probable alternation of geological structure, but in which the Secondary trap formation prevails to a considerable extent; 215 are in districts in which primitive rocks prevail; in 120 lime stone and clay slate are the principal members of series.

Of the 991 villages, in which Guinea-worm occurs; in 479 the nature of the water is not stated, but from the physical features of the districts it must be chiefly of wells. Of the remaining villages, 276 use the water of wells; 131 the water of nullahs or tanks; and 58 the water of rivers, but in a great proportion of the villages, in which nullah water and river water is used, the decrease is stated to occur every 2d, 3d, or 4th year, and not annually.

In zillah Cuddapa of 9 talookas, in which Guinea-worm occurs in 4, allusion is made to the water being deteriorated by the influence of a soil of calcutta. In some, allusion is made to a particular kind to vegetable, and to a bilious condition of the constitution as predisposing to the disease. To Dr. Morehead's communication are appended some interesting tables, extracted from the records of the Bombay Medical Board, for which he has been indebted to Dr. Kemball the President of that Board.—Bengal Hurkaru.

BENGAL MEDICAL RETIRING FUND.

The Second Quarterly General Meeting of the Subscribers to the Fund, was held on Monday, the 13th Instant, at one P. M. when Mr. Surgeon F. Corbyn having been called to the chair, the Report of the Committee of Managers for the past quarter was read. The Report stated, that since the Quarterly Meeting held in January last, the Committee had submitted to the vote of the subscribers at large, 1st a rule, that the Value of the Annuity of a Member of the Medical Board, after two years' service in that rank, should progressively increase yearly, until in the last year of service, he should be only entitled to the Annuity on paying up its full value according to the Fund Table. 2ndly, a question with reference to the appropriation of the surplus funds, pending the decision of the Honorable the Court of Directors, for the operations of the Fund having a retrospective effect, commencing from the 1st of January, 1833, and to the Fund being permitted to pay off retirements in addition to the three which the Honorable Court had declared themselves prepared to sanction—and; 3rdly, for filling up three elections to the Management for the present year, in the room of the senior and junior Members, who by the regulations of the Fund, went out by rotation; and in that of Dr. A. R. Jackson, who was temporarily elected a Manager.

Upon the rule 74 Members had voted for its being passed, 3 against it, giving a majority of 71 in its favor; for the appropriation of the surplus funds 47 had voted for houses, 30 for annuities, being 17 in favor of the former; and for the appointments to the management the following gentlemen were found to be re-elected, viz., Messrs. C. C. Egerton, and J. T. Pearson, and Dr. A. R. Jackson chosen to succeed to the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Surgeon A. Wood.

Statements had been received from the Accountant-General of donations and subscriptions effected in the Military pay department from May to July, 1834, both months inclusive, amounting to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 5,687 6 8; and in the Civil department for the 4th Quarter of 1833 34 amounting to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 1281 12 10; likewise from the Accountant to the Agra Presidency of subscriptions credited in the Revenue department for the 1st and 2d Quarters of the current official year amounting to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 1,074 5 3; total Sa. ~~Rs~~ 8,043 8 9. The disbursements on account of the Secretary's salary from January, 1833, to 31st January, 1835, was Sa. ~~Rs~~ 2,499 15 8 and for office establishment, stationery, &c., during the quarter Sa. ~~Rs~~ 83 13 11; total Sa. ~~Rs~~ 2,583 13 7.

It was with regret the Committee had to observe, some subscribers have recently withdrawn their names from the Society, on the ground that three retirements only having been sanctioned by the Honorable the Court of Directors, promotion in the Department would be rather retarded than accelerated. Those who had withdrawn were Messrs. J. Ransford, W. Gordon, A. Colquhoun, J, Hervey, S. Winbolt, A. Keir, and T. Stott, Assistant-Surgeons. One gentleman, Mr. D. W. Nash, Assistant-Surgeon, had been added to the list of subscribers, and one who formerly withdrew from the fund had been re-enrolled. The present number borne upon the list was 1 Member of the Medical Board, 8 Superintending Surgeons, 61 Surgeons, and 116 Assistant-Surgeons; total 186.

The Report having been read, it was moved by Mr. Bramley, seconded by Mr. Egerton, and carried unanimously.

"That the Report of the Committee of Management be confirmed."

The Secretary's accounts for the quarter were next submitted and passed, and the meeting then broke up with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

SUPREME COURT.

MONDAY, MARCH 30.

IN EQUITY.

William Melville and others, executors of the last will of James Fraser, deceased, v. Anne Fraser, by original suit, and same parties v. Jacob Lambert Heatley, executor of the last will of Anne Fraser, deceased, by Bill of Revivor.

Mr. Clark opened the Bill, which, in substance, states, that James Fraser, of Chowringhee, in Calcutta, then about the age of seventy, in October, 1823, married Anne Gold, afterwards Anne Fraser, the defendant, who was then about the age of twenty-five, and possessed of no property. Previous to the marriage, Fraser settled ~~Rs~~ 25,000 on his future wife, appointing William Fairlie Clarke, Jacob Lambert Heatley, and the Reverend Joseph Parsons, trustees for the marriage settlement; it being arranged that the ~~Rs~~ 25,000 should be laid out by them in Company's paper, the interest whereof was to be paid to Fraser and his wife during their joint lives;—to Anne Fraser, should she survive; and after her death to the children of the marriage if any;—should there be no such children, the fund to become the absolute property of the survivor: and by a memorandum Fraser barred his wife's right to dower on the real estate. About the 16th April, 1832, Fraser died, being upwards of eighty years of age, leaving his wife surviving, who thereupon became entitled to the ~~Rs~~ 25,000. Previous to his death he made a will devising the whole of his real estate to the complainants in trust to convert it into money. In his will he left the interest of ~~Rs~~ 10,000 to his wife, for life, and such of his household furniture as she might select, not exceeding in value ~~Rs~~ 2,000; and after declaring that the provisions of the marriage settlement were so made in lieu of dower, he directed the residue of his estate to be divided into five equal parts, two of which he bequeathed to his two natural sons Thomas Fraser and John Richard Fraser; the three remaining fifths he directed his executors to lay out in trust for his three natural daughters, Isabella Railey, widow of Julian Alfred Railey, formerly of Jaffeegunge, indigo planter; Eliza Fraser, now Mrs. Henry Smith; and Jane Fraser, now Mrs. Alfred Lingham, who were to receive the interest of such shares for life, free from the control of any future husband, and after their decease the interest devolved on their children. The Bill states that, Mr. Fraser and his wife did not live happily together, she, taking advantage of his age and infirmities, was in the habits from time to time, of obtaining large sums of money from him under the pretence of employing the same in the domestic expenses of the establishment, but whereof she acquired considerable accumulations, and of which she had possession at the time of the filing of the Bill, to amount of ~~Rs~~ 20,000. Besides which she gave and lent large sums to her sister who was married to Mr. Jacob Lambert Heatley, a bankrupt, who had been in gaol, but who then lived in the house adjoining Fraser's, in Chowringhee, and whom she entirely supported by money surreptitiously obtained from her husband. On one occasion, it is stated, that Mrs. Fraser, under pretence of proceeding to Monghyr for the benefit of her health obtained Rs 1,000, from her husband, but instead of going to Monghyr she was absent six days only. Shortly before Fraser made his will he drew out the draft of another will, unknown to his wife, wherein he bequeathed no legacy or provision for her, but she, becoming acquainted with this and finding a fair copy of the former will in writing, became violently enraged, and did not cease to importune and harrass her husband, with entreaties and threats, until he consented to leave her the interest of Rs 10,000 for life. In 1831, in consequence of his wife's violent conduct, Fraser, fearing that she would become possessed of his securities, removed the iron chest in which he kept his papers, to the house of his natural daughter Mrs. Railey, and the chest remained there until the day of his death, previous to which he endeavoured to separate from his wife, proposing to allow her a monthly amount equal to one third of his clear income, but in consequence of the threats and conduct of his wife and Heatley, he was induced to abandon his intention. The Bill further states that Mrs. Fraser, by intimidation and false pretences, procured from her husband an order on Fergusson and Co. for Rs 2,000, which Heatley procured to be cashed, appropriating to his own use Rs 1,000, and handing over Rs 1,000 to Mrs. Fraser.—That the whole of the property of Mr. Fraser amounted to Rs 90,000, exclusive of the Rs 25,000 settled on his wife, and that amongst other property he was possessed of a Company's Paper for Rs 30,000, which he was in the habit of keeping with his title deeds and other valuable property at the house of Mrs. Railey, but which shortly before his death, he took with him to his own house for the purpose, as complainants believe, of having the same presented for payment at the Treasury, the same being advertized to be paid off, but which Mrs. Fraser alleges that her husband gave to her for her absolute use. But the complainants shew that such allegation is wholly unfounded, and that Mrs. Frager, if she was ever in possession thereof before the death of her husband, got possession of it by threats and violence, for not only were the husband and wife on general bad terms, but they continued so without interruption until his death on the 16th April, 1832;—that on one occasion when J. R. Fraser and his wife who had shortly before returned from England, and was living with the elder Fraser, had gone out, a violent quarrel arose between Mrs. Fraser and her husband, which was only put an end to by the interference of the servants. After this Fraser became very nervous and alarmed, and about eleven o'clock next morning he had an apoplectic fit which rendered him speechless but not incapable of motion, and he got up and endeavoured to open the almirah, apparently in search of something, but Mrs. Fraser led him back to his seat, after which, though bled by his medical attendant, he never recovered his speech till he died on the 16th April, 1832.—That when Fraser was taken ill, his wife ordered a tin box which was on the table in the room where he was sitting, to be taken into her bed room. The box contained Fraser's private papers and vouchers, but after his decease it was found to contain a few blank sheets of writing paper only.—That the will was proved by Mr. Melville and Mr. J. R. Fraser, the latter of whom first discovered that the Company's paper for Rs 30,000 was not amongst the effects of the deceased. He thereupon applied to Mrs. Fraser, who replied that the deceased had given it to her, and that she had handed it over to Mr. W. DaCosta, a trustee under her marriage settlement; that person being applied to, answered he had returned it to Mrs. Fraser who intended to submit it and other matters for the opinion of counsel. The Bill prays, amongst other things, Mrs. Fraser may be decreed to account for and pay to the complainants what may appear to have been received by her during the coverture, out of Fraser's funds and estate, not settled by him to her separate use or freely given in his life time to her, for her own absolute use and benefit;—that she may be barred by the settlement memorandum of all right to dower;—and that she may be directed to give up the Company's Paper for Rs 30,000, and all other documents belonging to the estate of the deceased.

Mr. Prinsep opened the answer, which after admitting the jurisdiction, saith,—that defendant was of the age of 32, and Fraser of the age 75 when the marriage took place. That she is the daughter of a British Officer long since deceased, and was, at the time of marriage, a ward of the Bengal Military Orphan Society, residing with her brother-in-law J. L. Heatly and his wife. Admits that she was not possessed of any property other than her personal ornaments, but saith that previous to her marriage she was in the full enjoyment of contentment and happiness in the society of affectionate relatives, and had not only the necessities of life freely provided for her, but was also entitled to Rs 35 per month from the funds of the Orphan Society for her private expenses. The answer then goes on to say that by the rules of the Orphan Society ample and comfortable maintenance is provided for the wards, and that persons in independent circumstances addressing the wards with a view to marriage are required to make a proper settlement, without which the consent of the Governor is withheld even though in other respects the offer may be unexceptionable. The wards marrying with such approbation are entitled to a dowry of Rs 2,000, to be invested in the Bengal Mariner's and General Widows' Fund. Fraser received the Rs 2,000, at the time of marriage, but in consequence of his great age, he was not admissible to the Fund, and therefore he proposed to settle on the defendant Rs 25,000 and did so, after the marriage, on the 4th November, 1823, which settlement defendant endorsed, being ignorant that it contained a memorandum barring her right of dower. As to the will, she is wholly ignorant whether Fraser did or did not execute it; but she believes that at the time of the alleged will he was feeble in memory as well as in body and could not comprehend its meaning. Defendant altogether denies that herself and husband lived unhappily together or that she took any advantage of his infirmities, or obtained any sums from him which were not required for domestic purposes, neither did she by threats and intimidation induce her husband to leave her the interests of Rs 10,000. But she believes it to be true, that her husband at the suggestion and importunity of his natural children, went to Mr. A. Wight, and gave instructions for a will, which was never duly explained to him, nor does she believe it expresses his real testamentary intentions. The answer which is very voluminous, then goes on to narrate, the terms on which the testator lived with his natural children, who, she admits, he always treated with kindness and affection, but attributes to them the cause of much dissension between herself and husband, and that on one occasion, being harrassed and worn out by the annoyances of Thomas Fraser and his wife, she quitted the testator's house, and went to reside with Mrs. Halwood, a widow lady of her acquaintance, but shortly after, being informed by her husband, that Thomas Fraser was about to quit the house, she returned home to the great satisfaction of her husband, and continued to reside with him. Defendant denies that the whole of the testator's property amounted only to Rs 90,000 exclusive of Rs 25,000 settled on her; on the contrary she believes it amounts to Rs 200,000 exclusive of that sum, and of the Rs 25,000 settled on his natural children. In March, 1832, her husband informed her that he had made a will in which he had secured her the monthly sum of Rs 200, and that the house in Harrington street, in which they were then residing was not mentioned in the will, being intended by him as a bequest to her; and having on a subsequent occasion more particularly alluded to this subject, she wished to be favoured with a sight of the will in order to ascertain whether his wishes and intentions had really been expressed therein, the more so as she believed the will had not been prepared according to his instructions. Whereupon her husband proceeded to the house of Mrs. Railey, and shortly after returned bringing with him a parchment deed, which turned out to be Mrs. Railey's marriage settlement, and the testator informed the defendant that his natural daughter would not allow the will to go out of the house, and that she had said it was not proper to allow defendant to see it. Fraser then dispatched a note to Mrs. Railey requesting her to send the will, but that person sent a 'salaam' in return. On the 19th of the same month Fraser informed defendant that he was then going to the house of Mrs. Railey, and on his return he placed in her hands the will, requesting defendant to read and satisfy herself that he had not willed away the house in Harrington Street. On the 22d of the same month Fraser inquired if she was satisfied; she replied how could she be, when the first thing mentioned in the will was a bequest of all his real estate, which, of course included the house in Harrington Street? The defendant expressed himself ignorant of the term 'real estate,' supposing as the house in Harrington Street was not mentioned he could still will it away, and he added 'Nancy, Nancy, do not make yourself uneasy, I shall yet satisfy you.' Some few days afterwards, and about fifteen days before the attack of paralysis of which Fraser died, he was in his dressing room and sent a bearer, named Ramnarain, requesting her to come to him, and when she went into the room Fraser said, 'Nancy, I see the will is against you very much I confess. See, this house cost Rs- 42,000, and which I always intended for you, but let it go, don't think of it, I give you in exchange this Company's Paper for Rs- 30,000. It is yours; be satisfied. Let the will stand: it will only create disturbance, expense and trouble.' He then put into her hands the Company's Paper, in the presence of the bearer and a girl named Susan, endorsed and accompanied with the memorandum as follows:

'FOR IMPROVING NANCY'S FUTURE INCOME.

| To make over my new house and ground suited in Harrington street | 15,000 | for land |

Fraser then turned round to one of the witnesses and said, that her mistress had plenty of money or words to that effect. Defendant admits that in April, 1832 Fraser had a paralytic affection which rendered him almost speechless but not incapable of motion; but she positively denies that he got up to open an almirah, or that she led him back to his seat, she said that he appeared to be looking for something which led Mrs. Thomas Fraser to observe, 'that, perhaps, he wanted that paper,' and on defendant producing it he compressed it within her hands and said, 'no; no,' and a watch being brought to him he appeared satisfied, and died shortly afterwards.

Mrs. Fraser died on the 20th of November 1833, before any further proceeding were had in the cause, having in her life time appointed Jacob Lambert Heatley her executor, who has taken out probate and the suit has been received against him.

Mr. Turton, for complainants, drew the attention of the court, to the alledged gift of Fraser to his wife of the Company's paper for Rs 30,000. The best witness, said the learned counsel, to prove that it was not given, was Mrs. Fraser herself, and the next best witnesses were those who could speak as to the circumstances in which Mrs. and Mr. Fraser lived, one of whom Mr. Davis, of the Mint, after speaking of the uncomfortable, and bad terms in which they were, swore clearly and distinctly that the Government paper alleged in the answer to have been given defendant with a blank endorsement sixteen days before Fraser's death was in his (the witness's) hands unendorsed, six days before the last illness of the deceased, The endorsement on the Paper was sworn not to be in the deceased's hand writing by several witnesses well acquainted with his affairs. It would be shewn that the alleged gift was improbable from Mrs. Fraser having already so large a portion of the property as Rs- 25,000, and the interest of Rs- 10,000 settled on her, and by the evidence of Dr. Halliday and others, who spoke to the bad terms in which the deceased and his wife lived together. Moreover the will, which it was alleged in the answer was brought from the house of Mrs. Raily and commented on by Fraser to his wife, was found after Fraser's death with the unbroken seal of Mr. Wight attached to it. Under these circumstances he submitted that if even this court was of opinion Fraser had given the paper, of which there was no evidence except that of a bearer and a slave girl, whether their lordships would not require evidence that it had been given voluntarily, without threats or importunity.

A mass of evidence, being answers to interrogatories before the Master was then put in and read. It occupied the court two days in hearing, and chiefly went to shew the unhappy terms in which Fraser and his wife resided, and that the endorsement on the back of the Company's paper was not in the handwriting of Fraser. One witness who had the paper in his possession six days before Fraser's death, swore that the endorsement was not on it at that time, whereas it is sworn in the answer that the paper was endorsed and given by Fraser to his wife sixteen days before his death.

Mr. Advocate-General opened for complaint. But the court stopped the case and ordered in issue to be tried at the sittings in which defendant is to be plaintiff, and to prove, that the testator gave the Company's Paper to his wife in his life time to be her sole property after his death.

TUESDAY, MARCH 31.

Supersaud Saia and others, v. James Hills, John White, and Thomas Parker.

The plaintiffs are talookdars in the neighbourhood of Nuddea, where the defendants, Hills and White, have several indigo factories, three of which the defendant Parker is the manager. The action was brought to recover damages for a trespass alleged to have been committed by Parker in going to plaintiffs' two cutcheries with a body of armed men, on two occasions, and committing various outrages, amongst the rest, taking therefrom cash and notes to the amount of Rs- 2,928, and setting fire to and burning down a cutchery. After proving the jurisdiction, the first witness called, proved two distinct acts of felony, and the court nonsuited the plaintiffs on the ground, that an action at common law could not be maintained, without addocing in evidence, a record of conviction for the felony.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1,

The following provisional appointment was announced, and the officer duly sworn: Sir Edward Ryan said, that the appointment was not made with a view of being a permanent one, but solely for the object therein stated. At the same time he intimated, that the court would be happy to receive any suggestions from the bar, which might tend to diminish the expense or facilitate the business in the Master's office:—

'The Judges appoint Theodore Dickens, Esq. to the offices of Master of the Supreme Court, Accountant General, and Record Keeper, to hold the said offices to the first day of the ensuing term.

'The Judges make these provisional appointments in order, that they may duly examine into the fees, enrollment, and business of the said offices, and to enable them after such examination, to reduce the costs of all proceedings therein to the lowest scale that is compatible with securing able and competent persons to fill them permanently.

Judgment.

Chief Justice.—The first question for consideration is, whether the investing of infants' funds in a mercantile establishment by any one of the executors amounts to a breach of trust; and if it does, the next question is, which of these executors are liable to make good the loss. It is a general rule that an executor or administrator lending money on a promissory note or bond is answerable should any loss be sustained, and at home the rule goes even further; for executors and trustees are directed to invest trust monies in a particular government fund. It is not necessary in this case to decide to what extent that rule applies to this country; but thus far it is quite clear, that no executer here is entitled to invest infant's funds in a mercantile establishment, for if executors and trustees are required at home to invest in a particular government fund, because of the risk attending other securities, surely the executors in this case must be considered liable as no security whatsoever has been taken. There is no doubt, therefore, that such investment is a breach of trust on the part of Colonel Pollock, and that he is liable to make good the loss. Now, the next question is, are both his co-executor and co-executrix, or either of them also liable in consequence of this breach of trust. According to the old authorities an executor joining in a receipt, or in any act which put the trust monies into the hands of his co-executor, made himself liable for the loss occasioned by a breach of trust committed by the latter. Modern cases have, however, modified the old rule, and I take the true rule, to be that laid down by Lord Rodesdale in the cases of Joy v. Campbell 1 Sch. and Lef. Rep. and Doyle v. Qlake 2 Sch. and Lef. Rep. The rule in these cases differs in some degree from that which Lord Eldon thought the proper rule, and which was the old rule. Assuming this principle upon which these two cases were decided to be the true principle of the modified rule, how does it apply to the defendent Robertson? The learned Judge then commented on such parts of the evidence as related to the case of Mr. Robertson, and, among other letters, his Lordship read one from him to Colonel Pollock containing the words 'Young (of Alexander and Co.'s) will no doubt act to our mutual satisfaction, and also a letter of October, 1820, from Mrs. Butler, to which, said the learned Judge we find all three defendants affixing their names in their official capacities, as 'Executors, and 'Executrix.' There is, however, one letter in particular, continued his Lordship, upon which alone I think the case might rest as to Mr. Robertson.—It is the letter of 20th November, 1820 from him to Messrs. Alexander and Co. constituting them his agents, and this was followed up by the letter dated from Culpee the 15th January, 1821 on his departure for England in which he expressly authorizes Alexander and Co. to act in all things, as he, as executor could legally do, having before this, and before quitting Calcutta, indorsed the promissory note upon which the trust monies were received by Alexander and Co., Can it be said after reading this evidence that, in placing the funds in the hands of Alexander and Co. Mr. Robertson was not as much an actor as Colonel Pollock? In the year 1826, Mr. Robertson returns from England and receives a letter from Mrs. Butler relative to her children's allowance, and although he may have been ignorant on his arrival as he states, as to how matters stood with reference to the trust fund, it is evident that he had made inquiries and had investigated the accounts of Alexander and Co. before writing in reply to Mrs. Butler. Mr. Robertson has been throughout as much an executor and manager of the affairs and the monies of the testator as Colonel Pollock, and is therefore also liable for the breach of trust. As to the case of the remaining Defendant Mrs. Butler, there can be no doubt that she was well acquainted with these affairs also, and indeed in her letters she shows a knowledge of the business generally, which is not expected and but, seldom met with in a woman. In her letter to Alexander and Co. dated 28th December, 1826, she claims her share of the commission which is allowed to the executors, on the ground of her being an executrix of her husband's will; but the letter which most clearly shews that she assumed a control over the trust fund is her letter of August, 1829, addressed to Alexander and Co. and stating her opposition to placing it in Court, or on other than personal security, and asserting her authority over it as executrix and guardian. Upon the facts, I think that all these three parties have exercised a controul over the trust fund, and have acted as executors, and have thereby rendered themselves responsible for the consequence of the breach of trust. This is a question between two innocent parties: on one side however there is an infant who knows nothing and cannot protect himself; on the other side we have three adult executors who knew what they were doing and were capable of protecting themselves. The latter must, therefore, suffer for their breach of trust. I think the conduct of the executors honorable throughout; and it is no doubt a hard case, but for the reasons given they must all be held liable to make good the loss. The complainants are clearly entitled to the principal money from the date of Alexander and Co.'s failure. If the adult complainant likes to have his share without interest he may, but if he claims interest the master must take an account as to what rate of interest he is entitled to.

After some observations by the counsel engaged in the cause it was decreed upon consent of all parties, and to save expense, that the adult complainant should be allowed to take his share of the trust fund with interest at 4 per cent. from the failure of Alexander and Co. without going before the Master to take the account; and that the bill as to him should be dismissed on payment of his share and interest. The defendants were then ordered to pay the infant's share of the principal sum of Sa. Rs. 32,000, we believe, within two months, the adult complainant consenting to give them the same time to pay over his share with interest. An account, among others, was then directed to be taken by the Master, as to what would be the amount now due as interest on the trust fund if it had been invested in Company's paper on the 1st July, 1821, for the purpose of enabling the court to decide at what rate of interest the defendants should be charged on the share of the infant complainant.

Mr. Justice Grant said he entirely concurred in what had been said by the Chief Justice; and then at considerable length stated the points upon which he rested his concurrence, which we are sorry, want of space will prevent us giving so fully as we would wish. The learned Judge in the course of his able judgment said that the rule here as the investment of trust funds by executors must be, with reference to the rule at home, that the money must be laid out on the best security available; and in this case the credit of Alexander and Co. could not be considered so good a security as Government security,—Company's paper,—which the defendents had within their reach. The conduct of all the defendents has been perfectly honorable, and the gentlemen seem to have given up the executor's commission for the benefit of a posthumous child which was highly creditable to them. I allow, said the learned judge, that this is a case of hardship, but the rule is inflexible; and for the safety of the estates of infants I think it ought to be made known to all, that executors, placing trust money in a trading firm, and making profit of it, even although for the benefit for the infant, shall be answerble for it, if lost.—Englishman.

The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Grant, who presides during the present Sessions, delivered a Charge to the Grant Jury to the following effect. His Lordship first expressed his happiness on the present occasion for the convenience of the Jury, at there not being so many cases as might require too much of their time, and their not being of a difficult nature. The Jury were then told what justice required at their hands in the discharge of the important duty committed to them; viz. that they were to be satisfied by the evidence before them of a man's guilt before finding the Bill against him to be true, though every man's case would undergo a thorough examination before a Petit Jury, it being absolutely necessary for the Grand Jury to deliberate before sending a man for trial. His Lordship did not say so from jealousy, but from finding some gentlemen of this country (Hindoos) associating with the gentlemen of Europe in making up the number of the Jury. These Hindoo gentlemen, added his Lordship, were entitled to the valuable assistance, timid as they are, of the European gentlemen, with whom they have associated in their arduous undertaking; and they, from their knowledge of the character and the language of the people to be brought before the Grand Jury, would be a help to the Europeans. His Lordship then went at length into the nature of murder and manslaughter, shewing what constituted either, and directed the attention of the Jury to the terms in the Statute, Clauses 59 and 60 of Geo. 4 c. 74. This was done on bringing to the notice of the Jury some cases which are to come before them of cutting, &c. with intent to murder, maim, and disfigure. His Lordship next alluded to a case which also is to come during the Sessions, where an attempt at carnally knowing a girl under age had been made. The Jury were told what the Law was in the case, viz. that if the attempt were made upon a girl under 8 years of age, it was a capital crime, and if upon a girl older than 8 and not above 10, then a crime for which the accused and guilty should suffer severe punishment. The charge was eloquent, and lasted an hour.—Calcutta Courier.

MONDAY, APRIL 20.

Ramsohoe was placed at the bar upon an indictment charging him with stealing from the dwelling house of his mistress Gona Bebee two silver cups, one muslin tote and various other articles her property. The whole of the evidence fully established the prisoner's guilt, and the Jury, after a few minute consultation, returned a verdict of guilty of the petty larceny only. Sir J. P. Grant then addressed the prisoner at some length upon the narrow escape he had had, from being transported, and sentenced him to six calendar months imprisonment in the House of Correction and to be kept to hard labour.

Jadub Doss stood charged upon an indictment with having burglariously broken into the dwelling house of one Bridgmohun at Calcutta, on the 14th of March last, with intent to steal his goods and chattels.

Bridgmohun being duly sworn, said I left my home about 5 o'clock on the evening of the day laid in the indictment, and did not return until between three and four o'clock in the morning. When I arrived at the door of the house I found it standing wide open and the cord with which it has been fastened was cut. I heard a noise in the middle room where I, Ghodmohun and two others sleep, as if some one was meddling with the padlock of a box which stands there; I proceeded towards the room and perceived a man coming out, I called who's there, but received no answer.

I then seized the man by the cloth round his waist, but he cut it and disengaged himself; he then lifted up a dawh (bil hook) and attempted to strike me with it but I wrenched it from him, and the three persons who live with me hearing the noise came to my assistance and secured the prisoner.

Several other witnesses were examined and their evidence fully corroborated the testimony of the prosecutor.

The prisoner in his defence said, that he had contracted to make a mat for the prosecutor for which he only paid him half, and had made him call several times for the remainder; that when he last called prosecutor abused him and said he would see to him; that about four o'clock on the morning of the day in question prisoner was going up the lane to his daily labour, when the prosecutor, Ghodmohun and two others fell upon him, and charged him with breaking into their house. The dawh was his; he used it in his work.

Sir J. P. Grant then summed up, and the Jury without hesitation returned a verdict of Guilty. Sentence—to be transported to the Eastern side of Bengal for 14 years.

Yesterday Mohun Singh was placed at the bar upon an indictment, charging him with having violated the person of Mercha. The whole of the evidence was totally unfit for publication, and no one was permitted to enter the Court while it was being taken. Sir J. P. Grant was on the point of addressing the jury when the foreman said, that it was quite unnecessary to trouble his Lordship, as they had already come to a decision; they then delivered a verdict of "not guilty;" and Sir J. P. Grant acquitted the prisoner.—Hurkaru.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1835.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG.

Mr. Leith applied on behalf of the trustees of the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs. This was an order nisi obtained on the 7th ultimo, and the particulars of which were inserted in our publication of the 23d ultimo. Mr. Leith now stated that notice of the application had been given to the assignees of Alexander and Co. and they having counsel's opinion, had declined to offer any opposition to the application.

An order was made directing the surplus of the insolvent's estates said to be about Rs. 13,000, to be paid over to the assignees of Alexander and Co. after deducting Rs. 1,561, the balance due under the marriage settlement.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

Mr. Turton, with reference to the remuneration of the assignees of this estate, stated the result of the last meeting of the creditors, and the order was made directing the remuneration to be five per cent. on the dividends and five per cent. on all future payments to the Bank of Bengal.

Mr. Turton with reference to the application of the 21st ultimo, touching the discharge of the insolvents now moved, that the order for the reference to the Examiner be discharged. The assignees after an examination of the books and the powers of attorney, the insolvents were now enabled to make the following statement. The total number of creditors are 2029, and the amount of claims Rs 3,09,50,380, The creditors who have taken part in proceedings are 1,733, viz., Indian creditors 1,567, the amount of whose claims is Rs 1,30,55,608, and creditors west of the Cape of Good Hope 166, whose claims amount to Rs 1,32,70,714. Total amount of claims of creditors who have taken part in proceedings Rs. 2,63,26,323. Creditors who have taken no part in any proceedings 296, amount of claims Rs 46,24,056. Of the 1733 who have taken part in proceedings, the following had consented to the insolvents' discharge, viz., Indian creditors 790 whose claims amount to Rs 86,75,794, creditors west of the Cape 91, whose claims amount to Rs 1,11,96,617. Total number of consenting creditors 881; total amount of consenting creditors' claims Rs 198,72,411. The learned counsel said that this statement showed a majority of consenting creditors of those who had taken part in proceedings, and a considerable majority in the amount of claims, as the 881 consenting creditors represented two thirds of the claims.

Sir Edward Ryan inquired how this appeared in evidence.

Mr. Turton replied that he was speaking from the affidavit of the assignees.

Sir Edward Ryan was desirous to save the expense of a reference to the Examiner, but he should certainly require the principal facts to be stated on affidavit, and also he should like to examine such a power to release as the assignees consider good and valid. He did not feel much difficulty as to the construction to be put on the Act of Parliament, but if the facts were stated on affidavit, and a power to consent such as the assignees consider good and valid, sent to him on an early day, then if any objection arose, he would cause it to be intimated to counsel, and hear what might be said on the point on the next court day.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN EDWARD CHEETHAM.

Mr. T. Holroyd applied for an order that one third of the insolvent's pay be appropriated to the payments of his debts. He had made the inquiries suggested by the court on the last court day, and now applied that the payments should commence one month after this date in order to enable the insolvent to join his regiment at Gurruckpore.

Mr. Judge said, he believed no difficulty would arise as to the decrees against the insolvent in the Military Court in the Mofussil, and that the creditors must come in like the rest and receive a dividend. On the last court day his lordship had said he could not take the circumstances of the payments made to the insolvent's wife into consideration, but he (Mr. Judge) was anxious to state that the payment of £70 per annum, was made by the Court of Directors to the insolvent's wife, and deducted from his pay in this country.

Sir Edward Ryan.—Is this a voluntary or a compulsory payment!

Mr. Judge repeated, what he had before stated, that it was made by the Court of Directors, and deducted from the insolvent's pay.

Sir Edward Ryan.—How can they do so without the insolvent's consent?

The order was made for one-third of the insolvent's pay, to be assigned to the assignee, commencing one month after this date.—Englishman.

MEETING OF THE UNIVERSAL LIFE INSURANCE SOCIETY.

There was a well attended meeting on Monday the 23d April, at the Office of the Agents to the Universal Life Insurance Society, for the purpose of taking into consideration the position of the Society with reference to the announcement of a Life Insurance Office about to be opened by Government. The chair was occupied by Mr. Pattle. After reading a Report of the Directors of the Calcutta Branch, it was resolved by a majority of 20 representing 437 shares against 3 representing 12 shares, to petition the Government against the intended measure. A long memorial drawn up in strong but respectful terms, in which various inconveniences, and especially the injury which this and other private institution must suffer, were pointed out, was then read and adopted.

We cannot give a more particular account of the proceedings, as it was resolved at the meeting that, pending this representation to Government, it would not be proper to publish either the report or the memorial. The public, however, will be interested to know that the meeting determined that the Directors should continue to grant Policies, whether the Government plan should take effect or not. The number of Policies issued since the 19th November last, was stated to be 76, of which 28 were for the whole period of life, and 58 for short periods; the amount insured being 10,09,260 Rupees, the average amount of each risk is 13,280 Rupees. No lapse has yet occurred. The funds are all invested in Government five per cent. paper.—Calcutta Courier.

MEETING OF THE SHAREHOLDERS IN THE THEATRE.

On Monday the 25th May, a Meeting of the Shareholders of the Theatre took place, at 10 o'clock, at the Town Hall, pursuant to a requisition signed by twenty-five proprietors, 'for taking into consideration the resolutions adopted by the managers regarding the letting of the Theatre to the Italians, and coming to such determination thereon as may seem expedient. Also for adopting measures for the repairs of the theatre, and for general business.'

P. O' Hanlon, Esq. in the chair.

At the request of Dwarkanauth Tagore, the requisition to the managers, signed by twenty-five proprietors, was read to the meeting, after which Mr. Stocqueler remarked that some of the requisitionists had become proprietors subsequent to the date of the requisition, and he believed Mr. Osborne was one of them. On reference to the Transfer Book it was found that the share had been transfered to Mr. Osborne one day after the date of the requisition;—that it had formerly been the property of Mr. Melville, and had been sold with the consent of the attorney of that gentleman, Mr. W. F. Clarke.

Dwarkanauth Tagore apprehended that the transfer was not legal, as the share belonged to the assignee of Mr. Melville's estate, and that gentleman's attorney could have no interest in it.

Mr. Clarke thought the question was one in which the proprietors could not interfere, and which rested between Mr. Melville's attorney and his assignee. He held in his hand a letter from the assignee, stating that he had no intention to interfere with the transfer.

Mr. Turton, on the other hand, thought that it was a question which affected the proprietors, and that it was material for them to know by what means gentlemen had become proprietors.

Mr. H. M. Parker, as one of the committee of management, considered that he stood there, before the proprietors on his trial and he should feel very sorry were that trial to go off on a point of law.

Mr. C. R. Prinsep agreed with Mr. Turton. It was material to know in what manner each proprietor obtained his share in the co-partnership.

Mr. J. W. Alexander was of opinion that Mr. Osborne was not entitled to sign the requisition; he would, therefore, at once move that his name be expunged.

Mr. Clarke opposed the motion, the share having been regularly bought and paid for, there was no person who could object to the sale except Mr. Melville's assignee, Mr. Holroyd, by whose order the share had been sold in February, 1834. It was true the share had not been transferred until a later period, but it had been legally sold and legally paid for, under the authority of the assignee whose right the meeting could not dispute. It was quite true that the transfer had not been made until a recent period, because as the manager who made the transfers, he found the share in Mr. Melville's name, and he avowed he did not transfer it until this requisition was in progress. But there were many other shareholders in a similar situation to Mr. Osborne, and it was quite clear that was a mere technical objection, and that as a manager who made the transfers, he had had the power to do that which technically was undone.

Mr. H. M. Parker would not evade a trial by taking advantage of a point of law. If Mr. Osborne's name were expunged, it would be of little moment for there were twenty-four names remaining to the requisition, whereas the deed of co-partnership only required twenty.

Mr. C. R. Prinsep had no doubt that the transfer of Mr. Melville's share to Mr. Osborne was good for nothing, but the question was not as to who were proprietors but who had a right to vote.

Mr. W. Young could not agree with Mr. Parker, on the contrary he would vote that Mr. Osborne's name be expunged, and he would feel very happy if the number of his accuser were reduced from twenty-five to twenty-four.

The Chairman and Mr. Franks, who had both signed the requisition, disclaimed any intention of preferring an accusation against the managers, or of implying, directly or indirectly, any censure whatsoever.

Mr. J. W. Alexander would adhere to the resolution to expunge Mr. Osborne's name from the requisition, and moved the following which was seconded by Mr. J. P. Grant:—

'Resolved that the share held by Mr. Osborne is unduly transferred.'

Mr. C. R. Prinsep was quite clear that there was not the semblance of a transfer, and was astonished to hear it asserted that the proprietors had nothing to do with with the transfer of sharee. He would like to know where there was a partnership in the world in which the members had not a right to know who were concerned with them?

After a few words from Mr. Turton, and from Mr. Clarke, who suggested that the word 'legally' should be substituted for 'unduly,' the amendment was carried nem con.

Mr. Turton noticed another share which had been obtained irregularly. He alluded to that purchased by Mr. Crouch, and to the transfer of which the consent of the managers had not been obtained as provided in the deed of co-partnership. He had no wish to destroy that vote, but he thought the transfer was irregular and that the managers could not delegate their duty to any one of their body for such purpose.

Mr. Clarke explained that although the 11th clause in the deed of co-partnery provided that no member's share should be sold without the consent of the managers, he would undertake to say that the clause had never been strictly enforced since 1817, and that it had never been acted on at all except in the manner he had acted on it. When he first came into the management his attention was directed to the manner in which some transfers had been made by Mr. W. Prinsep who had sold the shares of several shareholders in arrears. He was aware this was not according to the deed of co-partnery, and on giving his opinion to the managers he was desired to find a remedy. He recommended that the shares should be re-sold, and his advice being adopted, he purchased them in the name of the trustees, and afterwards they were conveyed to the original purchasers. At a subsequent period it was arranged that he should give his consent to transfers for the whole body of the managers, as it had been done before by Mr. W. Prinsep, and by Mr. H. Wilson; therefore, the meeting, though it might be of opinion that he had exceeded his powers, would acquit him of having done wrong intentionally. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Turton did not bring this subject before the meeting in the spirit of discord, but merely to mark his disapproval of the powers of the managers being delegated to any one of their body.

The Chairman thought the meeting had better abandon all discussion foreign to the matters stated in the requisition, and though 'general business' was therein mentioned, he did not think that to hear these explanations was the purpose for which the meeting had assembled. He did not wish to prevent discussion,—far from it,—but it would be as well to proceed at once to the business for which the meeting was convened.

On the motion of Mr. W. Young, Mr. Farmer read the minute of the last meeting of managers, which was in substance, a resolution to let the theatre to the Italians, for one hundred rupees per night, ten days' notice to be given of each intended performance, so that there might be no collision with the performance of the English drama. As to wear and tear; the loss was to be determined by three of the committee of managers and three of the committee of the Italian Opera.—To this an amendment was proposed in effect that the matter should be referred to a general meeting of shareholders. The amendment was negatived.

Mr. Clarke said before he referred to the subject of the resolution he would notice a mistake on the face of it.—There had been no offer whatever on the part of the Italian Company.

Mr. W. Young begged to state that there was an offer, and Mr. T. Fergusson declared, as a member of the Italian Opera committee, that Mr. Young had been authorized to make an offer for the rent of the house Mr. W. P. Grant also spoke to the same effect.

Mr. Clarke said, there was a written proposal before the managers, and the first proposition, that the terms of it should be complied with, was negatived. He begged to say that he considered there had been no offer before the managers; but he would waive all that, and come to the point at once, for he admitted that he was the principal, if not the chief instigator, of this meeting, and for what he had done he would now give his reasons. He was happy to see so large a meeting assembled, because it gave him an opportunity of rebutting the foul aspersions that had gone forth regarding the manner he had acted during the discussion before the managers, and he appealed to the Italian Opera committee, with many of whom he had had the pleasure to converse, whether it was ever his wish to make a profit for the theatre out of the exertions of the artistes, or to exclude them from the use of it. All that he had considered in opposing the resolution which allowed them the use of the theatre, was the simple question of pounds, shillings, and pence. He had no other object but that of doing his duty to the proprietors who had entrusted him with the care of their property. The proposal was originally for twenty performances and six benefits, which, during the summer months, were to be paid for at the rate of fifty rupees per night; subsequently at the rate of seventy-five rupees; and during the cold weather at the rate of one hundred rupees per night; and it was also proposed that the proprietors should have fifty per cent. in consideration of the proprietors' giving up their tickets, and allowing a railing to be erected for the convenience of the subscribers to the operas. When this proposal came before the committee, he voted against it, and in justice to himself he asked permission to read a short minute on the proposal then before the managers.

Mr. W. Young said that the minutes of all the managers should be read if one was brought before the meeting, and he requested that Mr. Clarke would read them.

But Mr. Clarke would do no such thing, and he put it to the meeting whether he ought not to read his own minute in order to shew with what temper he had treated the proposal of the Italians.

Mr. J. W. Alexander said, that was not the question before the meeting, and a number of proprietors appeared to be of the same opinion. Others, however, appeared to think differently, and a fierce discussion arose which the reporter will not attempt to describe. After the noise had abated we heard

Mr. Turton declaring that it was utterly impossible for the meeting to go on unless they heard both sides dispassionately, and he thought that it was hardly fair to deprive Mr. Clarke of an opportunity of making any observations relative to matters now under discussion.

Mr. Trower begged to ask whether the meeting was not called together to take into consideration the proceedings of the meeting of managers; and whether it was not proper that they should hear what had transpired at that meeting?

Mr. Clarke,—Gentlemen, you hear with what temper my observations have been made; I now ask whether it is not fair that you should hear the minute I have referred to? Mr. Clarke then read the minute as follows:—

'The proposal made to us stands thus, for 20 operas and six benefits, the house must be opened from 100 to 156 nights, including rehearsals, and the subscribers, nay all the public, attend rehearsals. For THIS we are to receive Sa. Rs. 1800. We are then to give up our tickets, to purchase which for 26 nights would cost, Sa. Rs. 40,352. For this we are offered 50 per cent. or Sa. Rs. 900. We are also to have 275 front seats appropriated. We shall also have an Italian performance once a fortnight, AIDED by our house, our scenery, our wardrobe for 13 months. During this time we cannot expect to get up any English play with a profit; but we must expect a loss. Our standing expenditure without plays, is Sa. Rs. 5000 per annum, from this take 2700 (to be received from the Italian committee,) it leaves 2300 to be made up. Our plays will not make this up; so far from it, we must either abandon the English drama, or increase the expense by performing to a loss, and that too, at a period when we never were stronger in our amateur corps. Many of the rules contained in our votes, I always thought absurd, but they were framed at a period when our secretary was absent, and Parker was too unwell to aid us in any way. But now that affairs are changed, they ought to be abandoned altogether. I have much more to urge than this note can contain, but my voice is for declining this proposal altogether. If, however, it be entertained, then, according to the vote of the managers when the house was let for the second series of the Italian operas, and, what is stronger and unavoidable, the vote of the general meeting of share holders, on a motion of Mr. Turton's—there must be a meeting of proprietors to consent to giving up the free admissions.'

Mr. Clarke continued: This was his note on the subject;—he asked if there was anything intemperate in it? He asked whether they could say he was 'animated with the holy bigotry of a zealot'? Whether he was 'waging a war of extermination'? Or if there was any thing in the note from which they could infer he was 'ferocious and inconsistent,'—any 'vehement vituperations'—'eloquent exaggerations,' or which showed that he was a 'champion of the conservatives? And yet this note had been fixed on as a ground for making such assertions; and if these were made to his face, what he asked, would those be which were made behind his back? He did not oppose the Italian Opera Committee, nor had he been instrumental in calling this meeting for the sole purpose of obtaining the opinion of the proprietors as to the rate which the house ought to have been let to the Italians; but he had been of opinion when that question came before the managers, that it was one which ought to be decided at a general meeting of proprietors; for it was no slight matter to change entirely the character of the performances,—it was no slight matter to let the house for a number of nights for an object foreign to that for which it was built; and it did appear to him to be a matter of so much importance that the opinion of the proprietors ought to have been consulted before the terms were finally settled. Such had been the course pursued on former occasions; and it would appear from the books on the table, that in 1822, when Sir Francis McNaghten applied for the use of the house for a benefit for the distressed Irish, the managers did not think they ought to consent without the approbation of the proprietors; and the result was that a meeting was called at which only five proprietors attended, and in consequence the managers did not consider themselves authorized to let the house for that purpose. In 1823, when Mr. Alsop died, than whom no man who had been connected with the theatre was more respected, application was made for the use of the theatre for a benefit for his distressed family, but the managers did not consider themselves authorized to give it up for that purpose, and in consequence a meeting of proprietors was held. But when they came to the subject of the letting of the house, it would be remembered that the first application was in 1825, when Mr. Linton submitted his proposals not to the managers but to the proprietors.

These proposals were acceded to, and the period of the arrangement was extended in the July of the same year. Similar recurrences were had to the opinions of the proprietors in 1826, and 1827; and in 1829 a proposal regarding Mr. Perkins had been referred to the decision of a general meeting. Again in 1833, regarding the Italian Company, a meeting was called for the purpose of inducing the proprietors to give up their tickets. Subsequently there was a meeting to consider the Italian Company's request to have one month's rent remitted to them. At the latter meeting there was no resolution passed, but he remembered it was asked whether the English performances were to be suspended, to which it was replied that they could not be got up as Mr. Farmer was in Europe, and Mr. Parker unwell. Now he had brought forward a number of instances to show, that as regards the letting of the house, the managers have sought the sanction of the proprietors;—the only instances which could be given to the contrary were one series of Italian Operas, and two of French performances, and the reason given for this deviation from the general rule was, the impossibility of getting up English performances, (cries of 'By whom?' 'by whom?') This reason was given during the illness of Mr. Parker, and the absence of Mr. Farmer; the managers were then in treaty with the Italians, and could not get up an English play. With these exceptions the rule had been to apply for the proprietors' sanction, and therefore, he said, that the importance of the subject, and the practice of the committee of management, both required a reference to a general meeting to consider the proposal which had been accepted by the managers. It might, perhaps, appear that there never had been a difference of opinion in the committee of management with regard to the Italians, but he was able to shew that there had existed considerable difference. When they first sent in their proposal, Mr. Parker and himself thought it might be complied with for Sa. Rs, 10,000, (laughter), Mr. Turton was of the same opinion; (Mr. Turton 'oh decidedly!) that gentleman also thought that the managers ought not to let the house under Sa. Rs, 10,000 for the cold season, and Rs. 300 a month during the hot weather.

Colonel Beatson.—But what has this to do with the subject before the meeting?

Mr. Clarke.—In short no question with regard to the Italians has been before the committee of management, but on which there had been considerable difference of opinion, and if this was the case, surely it made a strong reason why the recent proposal should be referred to the proprietors. He had not been desirous that the proposal of the Italian Opera Committee should receive the support of the committee of management, but since it had received that support, he would now change sides altogether, and what he was going to say he was sure the friends of the Italians would not object to. He thought the Italians had not been fairly treated; they had made a proposal and had not received an answer. He was no enemy to the Italians, and if that proposal was accepted by the proprietors, he was quite willing that they should have the Theatre. But in that case the Italians had been most unfairly treated by the committee of management, in not laying the proposal before the proprietors.

Here Mr. Clarke was interrupted by loud cries of 'oh! oh!' 'order,' 'order' 'question,' and repeated bursts of laughter. After silence was partially obtained, Mr. Clarke intimated that he had several resolutions to propose, and was about to read them, when Colonel Beatson protested against any attempt to 'spin out' the proceedings, and moved that the first question be at once disposed of. He begged that Mr. Clarke would proceed at once 'to take into consideration the resolutions adopted by the managers regarding the letting of the Theatre to the Italian Society' and come to such determination thereon as may seem expedient.

Mr. Clarke begged to say that he should not take that course, but would first draw the attention of the proprietors to the state of the house, for it was important before they sanctioned the letting of the house, that they should know whether it was in such a state as rendered it impossible for them to let it with security to the public. The proprietors were aware that three years ago the state of the roof was brought to their notice; two years afterwards it was again reported to them, and one year ago—

Mr. J. P. Grant was sorry to interrupt Mr. Clarke, but he begged that the requisition might be read.

The requisition was accordingly read, of which the following is an extract.

'We the undersigned Shareholders of the Chowringhee Theatre request that you will forthwith convene a Meeting of the Proprietors for the purpose of taking into consideration the resolutions adopted by the Managers on this day regarding the letting of the Theatre to the Italian Society, and coming to such determination thereon as may seem expedient; also for adopting measures for the repairs of the Theatre, and for general business.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, if Mr. Clarke had no resolution to propose, he, as we understood, had one to offer for the consideration of the meeting. Mr. Grant proceeded but the confusion, and cries of 'order,' 'order,' 'hear,' hear,' completely prevented our hearing the continuation. At last the chairman succeeded in obtaining a hearing, and urged that Mr. Clarke was in possession of the chair, and if he wandered from the subject he would stop him, but he entreated that a fair hearing might be given to every proprietor.

Mr. Clarke continued: the letting of the house must depend on the state of the building, and he would now read the resolution of the last general meeting appointing a committee to report on the state of the roof. (Mr. Clarke read the resolution.) Now no report had been made; nothing had been done; the proprietors knew nothing of the state of the roof which a year ago was declared to be dangerous.

Mr. James Prinsep interrupted Mr. Clarke, who objected to Mr. Prinsep being heard. Another scene of confusion took place, and considerable time elapsed before the chairman could obtain silence.

Mr. Clarke continued: he had read to the meeting what was thought of the state of the roof eleven months ago, since which time no report had been before the shareholders, but in January last a minute was circulated stating that, from the dilapidated condition of the house it would be dangerous to admit the public during the rains. Did those who drew up the circular report that which was untrue, when they told them that they could not with safety give the public admittance during the rains? He would also mention another circumstance to which their attention ought to be drawn: he was told that the roof was sinking; that on drawing a line across it was found to have sunk one foot in the centre. His friend, Mr. Pattle, would remember an occasion when a whole verandah sunk during the rains, and if the roof was in the state he had described,—if there was an accumulation of twelve inches of water during the rains, adding an additional weight on the already dilapidated walls, he would leave it to the proprietors to say what might be expected. But there was a still stronger fact: he went to the theatre on Saturday last, and was told by the machinist, Mr. Squires, that he was during the recent performance of the Critic unable to shift the scenes and he had been compelled to shorten them by three inches for Mrs. Leach's benefit (loud laughter.) This was caused by the gradual sinking of the roof; and he put it to the proprietors whether the managers were much mistaken, when they told them a year ago that the house was in the dangerous state. This might be a subject of merriment with the management, and bring forth a joke from Mr. Turton, but he considered that the house ought to be examined by a professional person, and he would, therefore, move that a professional builder be employed to ascertain the state of the house, and to report if it be in such a state as to allow the public to be admitted without danger, and, if not, whether it can be made available for performances by any temporary repairs. This was a resolution which could not be objected to, and he intended to follow it up with another motion regarding the performances during the cold season.

Mr. Bolst seconded the resolution.

Mr. James Prinsep begged to make a few observations on what had just been said with regard to the roof. Mr. Clarke had stated that nothing had been done by the committee appointed to examine it, but he begged to say that the roof had been examined, a new plan made out, the estimate made, a vote of money passed, and the amount paid out of the treasury by Mr. Clarke himself, (Hear,) (hear.) The sum had been paid to Cap. Thomson, of the Engineers, who has made some progress towards the commencement of a new roof. This had been stated at several meetings of the committee of management, and it had been determined by them that until the new roof was ready the old roof should not be takenoff, and that the theatre should be available for performances. He had recently seen Captain Thomson, who had obtained the permission of the Board of Works to undertake the work, and who had purchased the timber for the roof. With regard to the state of the roof; it had been gradually sinking, but it was not in immediate danger, nor was there any thing to be apprehended from a lodgment of water on the surface as the same means would be used to prevent it as had been hitherto adopted,—that of placing men on the roof to bail off the water. Mr. Clarke had spoken of the scenes having been shortened, but he could assure the proprietors that the roof over the scenes was not in the slightest danger. It was true one particular part of it had gradually sunk the iron pillar by which it was supported, but that was of no importance, at all events if it threatened danger to any persons it was to the performers, and not to the audience. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Clarke did remember that an estimate had been sent in by Captain Thomson, and also one by Mr. J. Prinsep, but as the former was only Rs. 1,200, and the latter Rs. 6,000, he inferred that nothing had been determined on with regard to them.

Mr. J. Prinsep explained that his estimate was for a copper roof, and Captain Thomson's for one of iron.

Mr. Kyd believed that the roof was in no immediate danger; and Mr. Carr, who with Mr. James Prinsep, and Mr. Kyd had been appointed a committee to draw up the report, was of opinion, as far as his knowledge went, that the roof was perfectly safe. Mr. J. P. Grant hoped Mr. Clarke after this explanation would withdraw his resolution.

Mr. Clarke would certainly, after the opinions given by Mr. Kyd and Mr. J. Prinsep, withdraw his resolution, but in justice to himself he must say that he should never have brought it forward had the report been furnished to the committe of management. However he would now go on to the next question, and disclaiming the feelings of hostility towards the Italians which had been imputed to him, he declared that he was actuated by no other motive than a desire to preserve the interests of the proprietors which had been confided to his charge. He would not touch the resolution of the committee of management as it stood; he did not propose to take from the Italians the use of the house, but it was right they should be fairly treated, and not only be made acquainted with the terms on which they should have the house till the 1st of October, but the terms upon which it would be let to them afterward. Mr. Leyding's letter to the committee remained to this hour unanswered, but if the managers would not answer it, the following resolution would put an end to all doubts on the subject. Mr. Clarke then amidst considerable uproar proposed the following resolution:—

'That the theatre be let according to the terms proposed by the committee of management, up to the 1st of October, and that for the future it be let during the months of October and March for 300 per month, during April, May, June, July, and August at Rs. 200, per month, but that it shall not be let, nor allowed for any benefit, except as part of an engagement, during November, December, January, and February.

We believe Mr. Arratoon seconded the resolution, but we cannot describe the scene that followed. Order being restored,

Mr. W. P. Grant said it was evident that Mr. Clarke's intention in moving that the proceedings of the committee of management be confirmed, was to give the go-bye to that particular question, but however it might suit the tactics of Mr. Clarke to give the question the go-bye till it suited his convenience to discuss it, the meeting would not be prevented recording their opinion of the propriety of calling them together (cheers.)

Mr. C. R. Prinsep begged to submit that when a meeting was called, they who call it ought to bring forward some motion as to what it is called for. Mr. Clarke had distinctly stated that he was the principal mover in calling this meeting, and he took it, that he ought to found some motion on the subject mentioned in the requisition.

Mr. Clarke said he had already made a motion, but if it suited the convenience of his friends he would go further, and at once dispute the power assumed by the management of letting the threatre. He came there to defend the rights of the proprietors to whom he thought the proposal of the Italian Opera Committee ought to have been referred, and though, for the sake of unanimity, he did not now oppose the letting of the theatre to the Italians till the 1st of October, he did not approve of the terms; still if the majority agreed to it he would not object. But he would never agree to an important question of this kind being decided by the management. He disclaimed the assertion that because he had not succeeded with the managers he had appealed to the proprietors. He wished the proprietor also to set the question at rest as to the future letting of the house, as it was known that many who had subscribed towards the repairs refused to pay the money, and others refused to contribute for the sole reason that there were doubts regarding the repairs being commenced. Mr. Clarke, at great length, then urged the necessity of keeping the theatre for English performances during the cold season, contending that society in Calcutta could not maintain both amusements.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, by the fifth clause of the deeds of co-partnership the decision of a majority of the committee of management was decisive; and as there was no special rule for the letting of the theatre, he wished to be informed for what reason had the proprietors been called together. As the managers were empowered by the deed of co-partnership to do all things legally for the proprietors, were the latter could together to break an agreement which the former had lawfully made? After delegating their rights to the managers, were they to attempt to undo what the latter had done? He could imagine no other resons for calling them together, for though he has heard Mr. Clarke speak for a considerable time he was utterly at a loss to account for this proceeding. It was so extraordinary,—he could not characterise it at all.

Mr. Grant commented severely on the conduct of the requisitionists, who, in his opinion, intended to cast censure on the managers, and proposed a resolution, which after Mr. Siddons, Mr. Trower, Mr. Franks, and several other requisitionists had disclaimed all intention of censuring the managers, stood as follows:—

'That the manager who has acknowledged himself at the prime instigator of the present attempt to appeal to a meeting of proprietors on the subject of the determination of the managers on a matter particularly within their charge, has, by so doing, forfeited the confidence of the proprietors.'

Mr. Turton intimated that he dissented from the resolution. He thought that casting censure was not the best way to promote unanimity.

Mr. H. M. Parker thought this was an extremely useless meeting. He had voted in the committee of management for letting the house to the Italians under the impression that the Italian performances would not at all interfere with those of the English amateurs. There was a majority of the public who preferred English to Italian performances, but nevertheless they had no objection to witness the latter; and as to the wear and tear he thought the proprietors would not refuse to contribute a small amount towards it. As a manager, Mr. Parker declared he would not be satisfied with any resolution which did not convey a degree of censure on those who had called the meeting.

After considerable discussion, during which there was so much confusion that the reporter entirely lost all trace of the original motion, the following resolution was proposed by Mr. J. P. Grant, and seconded by Mr. W. R. Young.

'That by the fifth clause of the deed of co-partnership it is provided that the managers have full power to let the theatre to the Italian Opera Committee, and that the terms on which they have let it are binding on the proprietors.'

Mr. Clarke saw no reason for opposing this resolution, but he contended that if the managers had the power to let the theatre the proprietors had a right to set it aside. The proprietors were the superior body, and he instanced a vote of censure, on a motion by Sir J. Bryant, which the proprietors had passed on the managers for having expended Rs. 13,000 more than the estimate.

After a few words from Mr. Turton, and Mr. Pattle, Mr. J. W. Alexander ridiculed the assertions of Mr. Clarke that he was a friend to the Italians. On the contrary, said Mr. Alexander, he has been their most formidable enemy. Has he not accused them of robbery to the extent of Rs. 2000? Has he not declared that they shall not have the theatre? And is he not the author of the letters under the signature of 'Dick the Apprentice?'

Mr. Clarke said he would give an answer to the first question,—it was utterly untrue.

Here followed another scene of confusion, during its continuance it was impossible to take any notice of what passed, but when order was restored we found Mr. Turton speaking to the first resolution proposed by Mr. J. P. Grant, and urging conciliatory measures, as the principal question was now fully disposed of. Mr. Turton proposed a resolution declaratory of the proprietors' confidence in the management and moved an adjournment. This was supported by Mr. Stocqueler, but opposed by Mr. W. P. Grant, and Mr. C. R. Prinsep; the latter gentleman expressing himself strongly with regard to what he described as a useless call on the proprietors to waste their time and lungs most unprofitably, and which he considered as deserving their strongest reprobation. After a long conversation, during which five or six spoke at the same time, Mr. C. R. Prinsep proposed the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. J. P. Grant, who withdrew the resolution previously proposed:—

'That the call upon the proprietors on this occasion, at the instance of a small minority of the managers, to consider of a resolution of the majority was wholly unnecessary and derogatory to our sense of the obligations we owe to the managers at large.'

To this resolution Mr. Trower, Mr. Stocqueler, and several other gentlemen objected, chiefly urging that the services rendered by Mr. Clarke to the theatre, made it particularly desirable that he should not be placed in such a situation as would render his resignation a necessary step. Mr. Siddons also admitted that Mr. Clarke's services as a manager had, in a particular line, been very useful.

But Mr. Clarke was desirous of being judged by what he had then done, not what he had done on any former occasion; declaring that whenever he thought it necessary he would appeal from the managers to the proprietors. With reference to the warmth with which he had expressed himself towards Mr. J. W. Alexander, he explained that he did not cast any imputation on that gentlemen; he merely denied the truth of the report that he had charged the Italians with robbing the house. He was aware such reports had been maliciously promulgated.—Mr. Alexander expressed himself perfectly satisfied with this explanation. Mr. Clarke in conclusion acknowledged that he had stated that the Italians had damaged the wardrobe to an amount perhaps of Rs. 2,000.—This brought up Mr. T. Fergusson, who warmly advocated the cause of the Italians, censuring Mr. Clarke for bringing forward any charges against parties who were not present to defend themselves. Cries of 'order,' 'order,' chair, chair, prevented our taking any notes, but we observed Dwarkanauth Tagore, Mr. Turton, Mr. Higgins, Mr. Clarke, and Mr. W. P. Grant all addressing the chair at the same moment. We understood Mr. Higgins to express his preference for English performance rather than Italian, and his regret that Mr. Clarke should attend to the interests of the theatre when he ought to be watching those of his client;—Dwarkanauth Tagore, his regret that he had lost three hours last week, and five hours to-day 'moonshine;' Mr. Parker his hope that it would not be reported or he might lose his appointment, and Mr. Turton his hope that it would to show their consistency. When silence was restored we found Mr. Turton again pressing his motion for adjournment.

Colonel Beatson opposed it. He thought that the meeting was called upon to express a decided opinion on the conduct of the gentlemen who had been principally concerned in calling it, especially since Mr. Clarke persisted in defending the measure he had adopted, and declared his determination to follow a similar course whenever he should think it necessary to do so. He thought Mr. Clarke's conduct factious, though he wished to be understood that he used the word 'factious' in a parliamentary sense.

Mr. Turton's resolution was again read after undergoing several modifications. It was seconded by Mr. H. M. Parker, and was as follows:—

'That the majority of the managers having settled until the annual meeting of proprietors the question of letting the theatre to the Italian Opera Committee, the meeting thinks it necessary to express its dissatisfaction that the minority of the managers did not acquiesce in such decision, as the course best adapted to promote that harmony, and cordiality amongst the managers which is essential to the true interests of the theatre. And that this meeting do now adjourn.'

Mr. W. P. Grant said there were two distinct questions; first, the approval of what the managers had done; and secondly, the terms on which the house had been let to the Italian Committee. If the motion had been confined to either or both of those subjects, it would have been very proper, but he must decidedly object to any attempt to adjourn the meeting.

Considerable discussion followed, after which the meeting divided on the question of adjournment, when the numbers appeared for the motion 22, against it 26. The result was hailed with loud cheers, and after a long dispute as to the right of several gentlemen to vote, Mr. C. R. Prinsep, and Mr. J. P. Grant again pressed the resolution which they had respectively moved and seconded.

Mr. Clarke opposed the motion on the distinct ground that it impugned the proprietors' right to call a meeting.

Mr. W. P. Grant wished to understand clearly what the meeting were called on to vote upon, for if the resolution did not convey censure to Mr. Clarke, he could oppose his honorable relative's withdrawal of the resolution originally proposed. It was a very ungracious and a very disagreeable task, but there were several gentlemen present who had very strong opinions as to taking the sense of the meeting on this particular question, and he did say that when a gentleman came forward and persisted in defending the calling of this meeting as Mr. Clarke had done, it became their duty to express an opinion that Mr. Clarke had acted inconsistently with his duty as a manager. He had been willing to allow that the meeting had expressed its censure on the minority by its approval of the course adopted by the majority, and, that the censure was as much as the conduct of a gentleman merited who in a pet had declared that he would 'override' the majority. But when he found that gentleman persisting in the course he had adopted, he thought it his duty to press for a more decided mark of the meeting's displeasure.

Mr. W. P. Grant then pressed the chairman to put his brother, (Mr. J. P. Grant's) resolution to the meeting. Mr. O. Haulon refused, on the ground that as one of the requisionists, it applied censure to himself. Much confusion followed, and after a long discussion in which Mr Turton, Colonel Young. Mr. J. W. Alexander, Mr. C. R. Prinsep took part, Mr. Turton's resolution without the proposition for an adjournment was put and carried.

Mr. Clarke thought the resolution just adopted was calculated to give the erroneous impression that this meeting was called only for the consideration of one subject, whereas the object he had in view was to determine with regard to the repairs of the house. In calling the meeting he had done nothing but what he would do again, and he denied that it had been called solely for this purpose of considering the manager's agreement with the Italians.

Colonel Beatson, who had voted for Mr. Turton's resolution, expressed his surprize that it had been so ill received.

Towards the close of the meeting, a motion was made by Mr. J. P. Grant, seconded by W. Grant—That this Meeting of Proprietors request Mr. Clarke to retire from the management of the Theatre.' On which a division took place when by the report of the sellers, the numbers were, with the vote of the chairman, equal. On the right of the chairman to vote a good deal of discussion took place, in which it was admitted the usage of the two Houses of Parliament differed on this point, the chairman of the Commons not voting unless when the numbers were equal, the chairman of the house of Lords voting in every division.

Mr. O'Hanlon inquired if there was any local usage? One gentleman present, said he, as chairman, had voted: another that he might as chairman have voted. The chairman on these considerations, and statements voted against Mr. Grant's motion.

After the votes were thus taken, two proprietors Mr. Hyland and Mr. Hare, who had been left out of the division, presented themselves and declared their determination to vote against the motion for Mr. Clarke's retirement. The chairman said he considered himself bound not now to receive their votes.

Previous to the chairman voting against Mr J. P. Grant's resolution, that gentleman and the majority of those who had voted with him, protested against the chairman giving any vote on the question, and left the room, declaring they considered the opinion expressed by the meeting quite sufficient for their purpose.

After Mr. O'Hanlon quitted the chair, he expressed himself very strongly regarding what he considered the vindictive feeling with which Mr. Clarke had been pursued, and Mr. Clarke declared that a knowledge of the fact that many of the gentlemen who voted against him, had become shareholders for the occasion, and had not paid for their shares, could alone reconcile him to continue in the management.

Thanks were then voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated.—Englishman.

MEETING OF THE LAUDABLE SOCIETIES.

The meeting of the Shareholders in the Laudables, was held on the 6th May, at the office of the Secretary, pursuant to notice. Dr. Bramley in the Chair. The first business transacted, was the election of three Directors to fill vacancies. Messrs. Greenlaw, T. Holroyd, and W. H. Twentyman, were proposed in the usual form, and duly elected. Mr. Turton explained that they were desirous of proposing some Civil Servant, but that no gentleman in the service held policies on his own account.

On the motion of Mr. LOWE, seconded by Mr. COWIE, it was then resolved, that the correspondence of the Secretary with the Secretary of the Government office should be read with exception to that portion of it which had appeared in the newspapers. the substance of which Mr. Cullen was requested to state, which he accordingly did, and then read a letter of Mr. Curnin's addressed to himself which appeared to us to be in substance the same as a letter signed INDICATOR, in the Englishman, and also a letter from the Committee of the Government office to the Governor-General. Mr. Cullen stated that he had denied the assertion of Mr. Curnin, that the Universal had drawn away ten lakhs of the business of the Laudables, and observed, that he was only aware of one transfer, to which Mr. Curnin had replied that he had no means of knowing the amount of transfers, but that the Universal, if there were no Government office, would draw all the good risks, and the Laudables spin themselves out into insolvency. This correspondence will be published we believe.

A question arose whether Mr. Greenlaw's appeal to the Government should be read, but the meeting decided in the negative.

Mr. GREENLAW then addressed the meeting. The meeting were aware that he was at first friendly to the establishment of a government institution. He then knew nothing of the proposed rules and was disposed, as he still felt to give Government credit for the purest motives—in the words of his appeal, he approved of the principle and only wanted to see an introductory fundamental rule to the effect that all bonâ fide subscribers to existing societies should be taken over on paying the same premiums for the same amount of risk without any new certificate, the receipt of the old Society for the premium being held sufficient. He had not then seen the rules, but the moment he saw them, he perceived that they did not afford security to existing interests. Mr. Curnin had said that he, Mr. G., had done all in his power to defeat the government institution. How did Mr. Curnin know that? Had he seen it under his, Mr. Greenlaw's, hand? Yes, and he would tell the Meeting how. He, Mr. G., had addressed a letter to Mr. Cullen, Mr. Curnin had opened that letter because as he said he was told it came from Greenlaw. He had assigned no other reason; but he, Mr. Greenlaw, would impute it, of course, entirely to mistake, as he admitted his hand writing was not very intelligible; but he did contend that having obtained his knowledge in this way from a private note not addressed to him, Mr. Curnin had no right to make any public use of knowledge so obtained. He did not complain of it, however, because he, Mr. G. had neither written or said a word on the subject which he objected to have made public.

Mr. GREENLAW then sat down, but immediately rose again to say that he had been asked whether he had been in previous correspondence with Mr. Cur-

nin. He admitted that he had the previous evening addressed him, respecting the rules of the new institution.

Mr. TURTON then addressed the meeting at some length, but we can profess only to give a brief outline of what fell from him. It is the less necessary, indeed, to go into detail as this gentleman's arguments are embodied in the Petition which was afterwards read and proposed to be submitted for the signature of the Directors. Mr. T. commenced by alluding to a remark in a letter in the Englishman. He felt some delicacy in addressing the meeting because he might be charged with availing himself of this "cheap mode of advertizing his talents." If he wanted to advertize he had ample opportunity without coming there: the fact was that he had been many years connected with that Society and had sustained its interests in times of greater difficulty. He could remember very well that when after the failures it was discovered that six lakhs of the funds of the Societies were inefficiently secured, the cry was that they were ruined, and one Director declared that it would be madness to go on; but he, Mr. T., took a different view of the matter, and thought that the institution might be restored and put on a better footing. He would appeal to the meeting whether in two years his predictions had been verified or not. The Landables had yielded an average of 7,000. The 7th Landable had divided 6,000 and would yield, he believed, altogether 7,000 rupees; while in the 13th Landable, which had been most unfortunate, the out-turn of which was so bad, not one cowrie of the funds had been lost. Mr. Turton explained why he thought this society had not turned out so well, but we did not clearly catch his explanation. We think it was, that the Society had an unlucky year to begin with and had taken too short an average of years, and that was all the 13th Landable Society could blame themselves with. But a great outcry was raised which spread far and wide and reached, among others, the late benevolent Governor-General, whose benevolence would not suffer him to give any aid to the mercantile community in their distress, yet did not prevent him from practically proclaiming that there was not credit or honesty enough in the community to conduct the business of Life Insurance—this was the wound which public credit received from Lord William Bentinck. Mr. Turton had always entertained a high respect for the character of Lord William Bentinck, nor did he charge him in this matter with unworthy motives, but unquestionably his Lordship was misled. His Lordship, without consulting any existing institution, appointed a Committee, that Committee, from the day of its appointment, up to this time, never communicates a word of its proceedings to those whose interests were likely to be affected by the new institution. Up to this moment he knew nothing of the representations of that body to the Government. On the eve of his Lordship's departure, it is intimated in the Official Gazette, that a Government Office will be established; it was acknowledged that extensive injury will be done by this measure, to existing institutions, and we are assured that the Government are prepared to consider and provide for them; but the public had a right to know to what extent, what is the nature of the guarantee or indemnity proposed; but no such information was given and it would appear by the second communication on the subject, that a transfer was all that was really offered. But whatever might be the nature of the guarantee, he, Mr. Turton, did not hesitate to declare, that the Government had no right, no legal power to give a guarantee; and what is more, if they did give such guarantee, there was no fund in existence which they could legally appropriate to it. Their whole revenue was by the new Charter applicable to the purposes of Government and the dividend, and to these only. Before that Act, the Company had a right, as a commercial body, to apply the revenues to any commercial purposes—to guarantee any thing they liked—they might even, if they had pleased, have guaranteed the price of indigo! but they had no such right now. Mr. Turton then proceeded to support his opinion by references to the 4th, 5th, 6th, 9th, 10th and 25th Clauses of the Charter, and contended that if a guarantee were required, and it could be of any avail by the 6th Clause, the Board of Control alone could grant it; that the guarantee or indemnity cannot be lawfully contracted, and that therefore the shareholders in such a Society would be debarred all remedy in law or equity; that the Government had not the power of pledging the Proprietors in any way. The 10 per cent., the dividend was guaranteed, subject to certain priorities of claim, let what would happen, and he would add that any Governor who should attempt to appropriate the revenues contrary to these provisions, would be guilty of a public offence—the Governor who put his hand to any such guarantee as that in question, might be impeached. Not even with the sanction of the Board of Control can the Governor appropriate one farthing to any other purposes than the purposes of government, and they are equally prohibited from pledging the dividends. Say that the law officer should take the same view of the question that he, Mr. T., did, and give his opinion—to Manners Sutton or the new governor whoever he may be—the institution would then be dissolved, the governor would tell those who accepted the guarantee, "I can't keep faith with you, you should have looked to the authority of the government to give that guarantee." We had heard a great deal about the good faith of the Government, the Military Bank was a case in point. He, Mr. T., had had a case before him from the 11th Dragoons as to their right to come on the Government regarding the Bank as a government institution, and as having the guarantee of the state. He considered that there was no such guarantee, but the men were actually assembled on parade and called on to confide in the Bank, so that they naturally concluded that the guarantee was given and there was not one man in ten in the whole Army who was not fully persuaded that the Bank had the security of Government. Against any misapprehensions of this kind we should guard. Suppose to-morrow, that all the risk of existing institutions were taken over, the aggregate amount would be about two crores of rupees, including the Universal. We are told that without the acceptance of this offer we should be ruined, that all would leave us except grey-headed old fellows, yet it seems they would be glad to get this ruin. Did Mr. Curnin then indeed grasp at a ruin? He would say, however, for the sake of argument, that the whole two crores were taken over. Such a six months as we have seen, might more than swallow up the whole fund of the institution to meet claims:—well, the Government pay, the Board of Control refuse to sanction—the Government say we only guarantee mutual assurers—what then, they come back upon the mutual assurers—they would not get much out of him—many would be unable to pay; but those who could not, will be pretty well squeezed for those who can: but he would suppose no loss should occur, and that the Government was merely forbidden to continue the guarantee, and leave us to restore the Landables; but this was not what we wanted—where were our funds? swallowed up in Mr. Curnin's salary perhaps. If Government should give up the office, what then? Would this Society receive it from them." Government took over, we should be told, "the seeds of ruin, and they may have grown up and furnished a fruitful crop of it." Mr. Turton proceeded to argue that before Government interfered with existing institutions, it was bound to see that it had the power to guarantee and to make that guarantee specific. It had been alleged that by the establishment of Universal the Landables must spin themselves into insolvency. It was alleged that the Universal returned more than the Landables. He would shew that that was a fallacy, it was not true. The Landables returned the whole—the Universal four-fifths. Mr. Turton then adverted to some change in the plan of the Landables which had been adopted, and contended that any man under 50 would pay less in that institution than in the Government office; but it had been urged as matter of charge that the Landables returned the whole and divided every five years, and it had been asked in a very exulting tone, who ever heard of an Assurance Office dividing every five years? now he would ask who ever heard of these offices not dividing in five or seven years? The Equitable, one of the first offices in England, divided every seven years, and other offices in England divided in five or seven. It had been urged that the Societies would be ruined by their old lives, that a constant infusion of young lives was essential to the success of the institution; now it would perhaps surprise the Meeting, but it was a fact that if only lives of eighty were insured at the rates stated by INDICATOR (a writer in the Englishman) the societies would gain more than by lives of twenty!! He did not make this assertion without having data to prove it; but so cautious had the societies been that they had acted against the advice of Mr. Curnin and had fixed a greater value on the shares than they might with safety held out. Mr. Turton here read a letter of Mr. Curnin's, in which that gentleman had stated with reference to the rules of the New Landable Societies, that if no other institution were established that might prevent the Societies from having a fair share of business, the Society might safely advance 4,000 more, dividing every five years. "Yet who ever heard of dividing every five years?" Why, Mr. Curnin it seems; but the Society had fixed the value at 7,000 rupees. After some further remarks, Mr. Turton proceeded to read the following passages from a letter signed INDICATOR in the Englishman.

"Let me put the whole case practically to you, and I will do it fairly, and even favourably. Say, that a new Landable on your plan starts into healthy being. Say that it forthwith succeeds in obtaining a thousand subscribers for full shares, and has to run for 5 years. The first year's receipts we may assume at 3 lacs; and, with reference to former experience, and the ascertained law of mortality, to which all lives from 20 years and upwards, in this climate, are exposed, it will probably have to pay, during that year, ,140,000 ~~Rs~~ or the customary advance of 4000 ~~Rs~~ on 35 lapses. It will then carry on 1,60,000 rupees to the next year. The same process will ensue in the second year, and so on, throughout the five years, provided always that 175 new subscribers during these years, or 35 per annum, replace the number of lapsed shares. We need not calculate the interest;—we suppose it gone for establishment and to meet unforeseen contingencies. So far all is well. There will remain 8 lacs at least for final division, yielding if the old rule of deducting 10 per cent. be adhered to a further dividend to each lapsed share of a little more than 4000 rupees each.'

"All thus onward is couleur de rose; and so it may be for at least three or four or more succeeding societies; provided ever that new and healthy subscribers replace the lapses. But lo! after such 20 or 25 years there will still remain two or three hundred of the original thousand shareholders,—men aged as your fellow subscriber C. would pourtray himself to be, and who will increase your average rate of decrements beyond contemplated or safe ratio.* They have large sums at stake; for while they could obtain fresh certificates or health from time to time, they contrived to extend their number of shares as they rose in their professions, or profited in their respective pursuits. Now comes the tug of war! These men have subscribed heavily, for years, on the principle always of sic vos non vobis, and have made up the shares of earlier lapses, leaving their own to the coming mercies and tender approaches of juvenile applicants for the same beneficial system they have gone through. Alas! not a rupee of their own payments is in hand to meet their own impending fate:—the advances made by the Landables for increased mortality soon become more and more appalling and frequent;—the eyes of the public are opened:—they of the many bad lives in the invalid and antiquated Landables;—new subscribers fail to approach and THEN who are to pay the remaining aged assured of that day? As for increasing rates of premium, these are utterly inadequate, if unsupported by new and healthy contributions; and, in a word, shares must fall to half, nay a tithe of their present amount!! The picture is not overdrawn; for it admits of ample proof. It is an axiom in life assurance, that a society based like yours, carries in it the seeds of irretrievable decay; and so must every assurance office that madly pays away,—clears out, as it were, every few years that which ought to accumulate in due proportion, and form a capital equal to the value of every existing liability on its books."

Mr. TURTON shewed satisfactorily, that from INDICATOR's own data a very different result would follow; that the lives of 80 would yield 9,000, those of 10 6,400 taking lapses at 3 per cent., premiums at 2·84. We could not follow the speaker in some remarks which succeeded. He reasoned with great force against the interference of Government, and contended that if it must be submitted to, the guarantee should be secured by Act of Parliament, and declared that independent of the general grounds of objection, speaking for himself, he was largely interested in getting back what he had paid, for the Landables and Oriental, but would rather see them sink and lose it all than get it back from an institution, the establishment of which was a disgraceful insult to the community. After some further remarks Mr. Turton concluded by moving the following Resolution:—

"That this Meeting is of opinion that no negociation can be entered into with the Government for the transfer of the risks of the Landable Societies to the Government Office, even if such a proceeding should be thought ultimately advsiable, until the nature and extent of the guarantee which Government is willing to give, and the degree of the liability which the subscribers to the new Society will incur, can be clearly and distinctly defined, and shall be offered by Government; and that a communication, to that effect be made to Government, pointing out the legal objections which have been raised to the guarantee."

Mr. GREENLAW seconded the resolution, and made some remarks on the plan of the Landables which we did not clearly catch.

Lieutenant-Colonel BEATSON agreed in much that had fallen from Mr. Turton, but thought, we should consider not merely what was just and right, but what was expedient in the particular case. If the Government office were established, people would not trouble themselves much with the law of the case—they would not search Acts of Parliament; but they would prefer the institution which afforded them the guarantee of Government. He thought it was clear, that whether the societies should lose their present subscribers or not, that they would not get new ones, as they would have done, if Government had not interfered. He had not been able to discover the advantages of the Universal, he preferred the simple principle of the Landables, of Mutual Assurance and dividing the profits; but be that as it might, if the effect he had mentioned should follow, those who remained in the societies would be much worse off some years hence, than they actually were. He thought it therefore better that the Landables should merge in the Government Office, although he deemed it most essential to know the extent of the guarantee, and also that Government should be informed of the power of Government to to give such guarantee.

Mr. TURTON.—As a professional man I hesitate not to say I have no doubt whatever. I had doubts at first but now I have none.

Lieutenant-Colonel BEATSON observed, that the fact of such an opinion being given by a gentleman of Mr. Turton's high professional reputation, would be a sufficient ground to induce every one to pause and consider. Lieutenant-Colonel Beatson ended by proposing an amendment, which was subsequently withdrawn, after some remarks from Mr. Turton, who permitted his original resolution to be altered as it now stands.

Mr. COUL then proposed:—

"That the Petition which has just been read, be adopted by the meeting, and that the Directors be requested to sign it on behalf of the Societies."

Mr. STRICKLAND seconded the resolution.

The petition was then read, but as it was to be circulated to the Directors, we have it not in our power to publish it at present.

* To assist any reader who may wish to attempt a calculation on these points, they will find the following to be very near the per centage of decrement in India per annum, among the fair average of lives assured:—after 60, the per centage increases fearfully, and if the lives are bad the matter is beyond any calculation of figures."

|---|---|---|
| At 20 | Years the annual per centage of deaths are | 2 84 |
| 30 | ..... | 3 40 |
| 40 | ..... | 4 16 |
| 50 | ..... | 4 64 |
| 60 | ..... | 6 87 |
| 70 | ..... | 9 51 |
| 80 | ..... | 22 0 |

Some discussion then ensued, in which Colonel Beatson, Mr. E. McNaghten, and Mr. Greenlaw engaged, when the petition was put and carried by a majority.

Lieutenant-Colonel BEATSON then again addressed the meeting, observing that the petition agreed to was against the establishment of the Government office. If it should be established then what he proposed would be of no consequence, but otherwise it would be necessary to adopt some course of the kind. If the office be established people would go to the Government shop. Mr. Turton himself had admitted the new office would carry individuals though the societies might not go over. Then in case the office should be established he proposed that they should be addressed to ascertain at what rate they would take over the risks of the societies.

Mr. GREENLAW objected that this was ill-timed and would imply that we objected merely to the inefficiency and uncertainty of the guarantee, whereas the rules were in many other important points most objectionable. Some of these Mr. G. proposed to explain, but they had been stated before at the Meeting and we must hasten to close this report. After some further discussion and explanation Lieutenant-Colonel Beatson withdrew his amendment. The following is the authenticated Resolutions passed at the meeting :—

"M. J. BRAMLEY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

It was proposed by Mr. Palmer, and seconded by Mr. Turton,—That the following gentlemen be appointed to fill up the vacancies in the direction, viz:—T. Holroyd, C. B. Greenlaw and W. H. Twentyman, Esquires."

Proposed by Mr. Lowe, seconded by Mr. Cowie—That the Secretary be requested to read all that part of the correspondence between the Government Committee and Directors of the Laudable Societies which has not already been published, and shortly to state the purport of that portion of it which has already appeared in the newspapers; which was complied with.

Proposed by Mr. Turton, seconded by Mr. Greenlaw:—That this Meeting is of opinion that no negociation can be entered into with the Government for the transfer of the risks of the Laudable Societies to the Government Office, even if such a proceeding should be thought ultimately advisable, until the nature and extent of the guarantee which Government is willing to give, and the degree of the liability which the subscribers to the new Society will incur, can be clearly and distinctly defined, and shall be offered by Government; and that a communication to that effect be made to Government, pointing out the legal objections which have been raised to the guarantee.

Read Petition of the Governor General in Council, regarding the proposed Government Institution, for the Insurance of Lives.

Proposed by Mr. Coull, seconded by Mr. Smith :—That the Petition which has just been read, be adopted by the Meeting, and that the Directors be requested to sign it on behalf of the Societies.

Moved by Mr. Greenlaw, seconded by Mr. Holroyd,—That the thanks of this Meeting be given to the Directors for the care taken by them in endeavouring to obtain from the Committee all necessary information for the Subscribers in order to their determining the best course to pursue under their circumstances of the case, and that they be requested to continue similiar exertions with reference to the 8d Resolution.

Proposed by Col. Beatson, seconded by Mr. Turton,—That in the event of the Government Office being put in operation, that the directors be requested to call a Meeting of Proprietors as soon as practicable, after such event shall be known.

Moved by Mr. Turton, seconded by Mr. E. Macnaghten—That article 44 of the Rule of the new Laudable Society be cancelled and that the following be substituted in its room.

In case of the Office of Secretary becoming vacant, it shall be filled up by the Directors pro tempore, and the appointment is to be submitted to the body of Shareholders at the next half yearly General Meeting.

Moved by Mr. Turton, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie,—That the thanks of this Meeting be given to the Chairman for his services on the occasion.

(Signed) J. CULLEN,

Secy. to the Laudable Societies."

The thanks of the Meeting were then voted to the chair, and the business of the day concluded.

LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETIES' PETITION.

To the Hon. Sir CHARLES THEOPHILUS METCALFE, Bt., Governor-General in-Council, &c, &c, &c.

The humble petition of the undersigned, merchants and others, inhabitants of Calcutta, interested in life assurance.

HUMBLY SHEWETH,—That your petitioners are largely interested in various ways in the insurance of lives in Calcutta, chiefly as insurers, some of them to a very large amount.

That your Petitioners have learnt with very great regret that it is the intention of Government to institute an office for the insurance of lives under their guarantee, and under the guidance of directors, of whom two thirds are to be appointed by Government.

That unless your petitioners are misinformed, the original institution of the office was suggested at a time when there were but two institutions for the insurance of lives in Calcutta, namely the Laudable Societies, which may be considered as one, and the Oriental Insurance Office; of which the first having been almost entirely in the hands of the principal Houses of Agency and being involved in their failure, was thought by many to have been irretrievably ruined, and the other of which was, after those failures, in the hands of only one proprietor.

Under these circumstances, and the natural alarm created by them in the minds of the timid, it was desirable for the great and important objects of life insurance, to establish some institution which should effectually guard against the evils which had arisen under the former system, and which should offer the greatest possible advantages of security and economy.

There were some who feared that Calcutta did not, under its then circumstances of difficulty and distress, offer the means of establishing this great object without the assistance of Government, and under this impression the Right Honorable the late Governor-General in Council, as your petitioners have been informed, was pleased to appoint a Committee to inquire into and to consider the subject: and, after two years of deliberation, during which no part of their proceedings were made public, it was for the first time announced, on the eve of his departure, that a mutual insurance society would be immediately established under the guarantee of Government. Still, however, the public were wholly uninformed of the distinct object or intentions of Government, and of the rules which were to govern the projected institution. Unable to judge, until the moment it was announced, of what would be the probable determination of Government,—completely in the dark as to the proceedings of the Committee or their reports and representations on the matter referred to them, —and in utter ignorance to this moment of the promoters and instigators of the interference of Government, your petitioners were unable previously to come forward and represent their feelings or wishes on the subject, nor would it, as your petitioners conceive, have been equally respectful to Government to have anticipated their intentions, or to have prejudged the labours of the Committee.

In the meantime, a total change has taken place in the circumstances which induced the Government originally to listen to the proposition, a change which your petitioners venture to suggest is not confined to the public, to the insurers or to the insured; but which extends to the very Government itself.

At the time when the Committee were appointed, the East India Company was a commercial body as well as a Government, and had commercial funds entirely free from controul, which they might employ in any mode, at the discretion of the Directors; and such was their situation at the time when (unless your petitioners have been misled) the suggestion of such an institution was not unfavourably received by the Honorable Court.

At the present moment, the commercial competition of the Honorable Company with private enterprize, has been, by Act of Parliament, interdicted. The whole funds of the Company are territorial, and with the whole of their affairs under the controul of the British Government, which renders necessary the sanction, not only of the Hon'ble the Court of Directors, but also of the Board of Controul, to the permanent establishment of a Government insurance office, or the validity of the guarantee.

On the other hand, private enterprize has supplied, during the period of the Committee's deliberations, the desideratum which gave occasion to their appointment.

The affairs of the Laudable Societies, on closer investigation, were found in a better state than the alarms of the timid, or representations of the self-interested, had painted them. One society, the 13th Supplementary, had suffered no loss of funds,—whilst the sister society, the 7th Laudable, was found to have been more fully secured than even some of its friends had imagined, and it has divided already nearly 6,000 rupees per share, and will ultimately divide, in all probability, Sa. Rs. 7,000 per share, a larger return, it will be found on examination, then even the Government scheme holds out to the public under the proposed rates of premium. Measures were taken to re-organize the constitution of the societies, and they are now in progress of consolidation on a footing which whilst it places them under the controul of all the different classes of which the public consists,—gives the greatest security that the funds cannot be misappropriated or endangered, confers on every insurer the fullest right of investigation, of interference, and self-government, places its management on the most limited scale of expense, and returns to the insurers in it every rupee of profit not requisite to secure the amount insured.

The Oriental Insurance Company has, in like manner, been re-organized, and is in the hands of a large and respectable body of proprietors. Its management is likewise on the most economical footing, its capital laccumulating for the security of the insured, and it offers to all who wish to become mutual insurers, the power of doing so, and participating in its advantages, whilst it receives all who would avoid the risk or trouble of mutual insurance on the ordinary footing of simple insurers.

During the same period, another insurance office has been established, connected with an office with large capital in London and having a numerous proprietory in India.

These offices your petitioners humbly insist, afford every necessary security, whilst your petitioners are satisfied that the new Laudable Society at least is on a much cheaper scale than that put forth by the new Government institution; its establishment being infinitely less expensive, and its whole surplus profits being returnable. The other offices your petitioners believe, on the average, to be on as low a scale of premium, and if not, competition will lower it. The Government office will destroy competition.

The present offices, however, have successfully continued the business of insurance in Calcutta, under the circumstances of the greatest disadvantage. The failure of the great Agency Houses withdrew from them business to a very large extent, leaving upon their hands the worst lives and the heaviest risks. The rumours of a projected Government Office have induced many to hold back, under a fear that it would annihilate the old offices which would be unable to compete with Government. During the first year of this period, owing to the above circumstances, heavy losses occurred, beyond all former example, without corresponding new business to meet them. In the latter part of the period, a natural reaction has taken place, and with greatly improved lists, the offices were beginning to feel a lively return for their interprize and perseverance, when a Government competition is announced, which in the very language of its announcement, anticipates the deepest injury to, or the very annihilation of, the existing offices.

That the establishment of the Government office would materially affect the existing institutions, your petitioners do not doubt, from the influence which the name of Government will ever have. But your petitioners submit that such injury will be inflicted, without adequate cause, for no certain good, which it is not only possible, but in the estimation of your petitioners, it is highly probable that much evil may ensue to your petitioners, and the rest of the public who are insurers, from such establishment.

Your petitioners refrain from any general observations upon the interference of Government with private interprize, or upon the injurious tendency to asperse public credit, which the projected measure is likely to have, from respect to the Government, and a desire to abstain from every observation which may afford matter of discussion of dispute; but they may venture to suggest, that there are some, who, with their families, are entirely, and others who are greatly, dependent for support on the existing institutions, and who by their destruction would be reduced to ruin, or by their injury would be proportionally distressed; and your petitioners presume that the Government would not desire to interfere, unless under the impression that the public seek and would be benefitted by such interference. Your petitioners venture to suggest that the opinions and wants and wishes of the public on this subject, have been misrepresented. They respectfully solicit to know what body, and what individuals have solicited the interposition of Government. Your petitioners feel satisfied that they represent the feelings of a very large portion of the public of Calcutta, they might venture to say of Bengal, in respectfully but earnestly deprecating the proposed measure, whilst they give every credit to the Government with which the idea originated, for the purest and best intentions.

The direst effect which the friends, and many of the opponents of the new office equally anticipate, is the destruction of existing offices. If it would not have that effect, it is not desired nor needed by the public. If it produces that effect, the result is, that it will reduce future insurance in Bengal to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 100,000 on each life, the limit which the office affixis to future risks a limit which your petitioners consider ample for any one office, because it will greatly exceed the average amount of insurances, but an extent wholly inadequate for the objects of many insurers.

Your petitioners, however, do not anticipate that the effect of the Government office will be to annihilate the old offices, thought it will greatly injure them, by diverting from them many individual risks; but connected as insurances are with the Commercial classes in Calcutta, your petitioners feel assured that the great body of Insurance effected by Commercial Houses will rest with the one or other of the present institutions, with which the parties may be chiefly connected; and your petitioners embrace amongst their own numbers some, and are acquainted with others, who, unconnected with Commerce, still deprecate, and feel alarmed at the interference of Government with private enterprize, and others who fear to enter into engagements in which in case of difference of opinion they could not venture in a contest which they would consider as one with the Government of the Country.

Your petitioners do not feel entitled to urge the probability, under such circumstances, of the Government office not affording, in the first instance, sufficient surplus profits to defray the charge of management, (necessarily larger, whilst the arrangements are incomplete,) so far as the Government are concerned: but they would feel little inducement to join an office of mutual insurance, under such circumstances, where, as mutual insurers they would incur a liability to the extent of the whole risks, without any funds in the first instance to satisfy them, beyond the amount of premiums, the whole amount of which in the first year, might be absorbed by two or three heavy losses, and for the payment of which, though the assured would have the guarantee of Government, your petitioners presume the mutual insurers would be respectively liable.

It is perhaps on this point, on which, as far as prudence merely is concerned, your petitioners have the greatest alarm, and would most hesitate to join the projected office.

No fund is subscribed to guarantee the payment of losses. The first instance, as your petitioners conceive, of an insurance office established without such resource. It is true, the guarantee of Government supplies that deficiency, if the Government have the power to give the guarantee.

Your petitioners earnestly hope, that, in casting any doubt upon such power, they may not be considered as intending the slightest disrespect to Government. But the subject is one of the deepest importance, and must be so considered by Government, or it would not have deviated from its ordinary path to hold out the hand of assistance to those who are interested in life assurances. It behoves every one, therefore, minutely to scan the guarantee he receives, not merely in amount, but in Law. If it should be ultimately held, that such a guarantee trenched upon the commercial interprize from which the Company are interdicted by act of Parliament, or that such payments out of the territorial revenue of Government were foreign to the purposes for which the Government was continued in the Company, such guarantee could not be enforced,—such guarantee could not legally be fulfilled, however much the good faith of Government was involved. The result must be the dissolution of the institution, —possibly with loss to the members of it,—possibly with lapses unpaid!

The institution must be equally dissolved, if thought, though not beyond the power, beyond the proper sphere and objects of Government, and on that ground not sanctioned by the Honorable Court of Directors and Board of Control, as to the guarantee of Government. If that were withdrawn, what would be the situation of the insurers in the office without a fund to pay the lapses? If the new institution should have taken over, as the Committee propose, all the risks in Calcutta, they would be insurers to the amount of about two crores of rupees, —an unfortunate number of lapses, (such as heretofore has more than once occurred,) would confound all the calculations furnished, upon a nice average of years, and allowing but small profits, without a fund to meet casualties in the early years of such average. Should the Government have paid such losses in the meantime, your petitioners conceive they would have no trifling difficulty in recovering them back from the members of a dissolved Society, established under the guarantee of Government, and dissolved because the guarantee was withdrawn, and not sanctioned, whether by law or policy.

But even supposing no such pecuniary results what would be the situation of the insurers in the office? It may be said that the members might still continue mutual insurers amongst each other. They might indeed, without a fund, and without means probably as to many of them, to contribute towards the raising it. If they did continue, your petitioners submit, that not only would no advantge have been gained over the existing system, but that the collected funds which now form the security of the assured in the present societies, would have been dissipated, and that after the interference of Government with them, individuals would not be readily induced to form another fund; but your petitioners submit that the most probable event in such a state of things would be the entire dissolution of the institution. No legal obligation would exist to compel the parties to remain,—for the vital principle of their adherence is the guarantee of Government. This would be gone, and with it the liability which was incurred upon the faith of it, whether to the Government or to each other. The better lives would probably form a new society. The old and uninsurable would be helpless; and their families, if dependant upon their insurances, beggared. It is not necessary to make out against the present establishment of the proposed office that such consequences must necessarily ensue. It it enough, as your petitioners conclude will not be disputed, to shew that they are not impossible.

With the guarantee of Government distinctly understood, its nature and extent defined, the rights of the assured and assurers equally guarded, the existing institutions might be saved from future loss. Your petitioners feel that without the offer of such distinct guarantee the Government cannot, and will not, be a party to the injury, and possible destruction of existing institutions. But your petitioners submit that the proprietors of those offices who have subscribed money to form a fund, should not only be guaranteed from future loss, but also receive back the amount of their deposit, principal and interest, and the fair estimated value of their business for the period for which they are united, before they can with justice be called upon to give way entirely to the Government office. Your petitioners have heard with surprise, that it has been proposed that the existing offices should make over "all their assests and risks" to the Government institution! In short that that Institution should receive the accumulated Fund of the Laudable Societies received from the former offices, and the subscribed funds of the Oriental and Universal offices!

Before, however, any purchase of existing rights can take place, your petitioners conceive that not only the extent to which the Government are willing to carry their guarantee should be defined, but that the validity of such guarantee should be placed beyond doubt. This, your petitioners conceive cannot be done until a reference shall have been made to England, and the sanction of the Honorable the Court of Directors, and that of the Board of Control obtained. Even that sanction your petitioners conceive would not protect parties in a Court of Justice, if it were held that the engagement of Government was a contravention of the late Act of Parliament.

Your petitioners would hope that if it shall be considered necessary to establish a Government insurance office that these doubts and alarms may be obviated by its being instituted under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, and Charter, under which all the proprietors and insurers may have rights and privileges, not only strictly defined, but expressly recognized by law.

In the mean time, all who are interested in the in the subject of insurance, are kept in a state of anxiety and incertitude. Commercial men who have embarked a portion of their capital in it, with a view to profit, see their enterprize threatened with failure, at the very moment when they considered all difficulties surmounted whilst if driven to protect themselves from a powerful competition, by selling or transferring to the Government office their present rights and risks, they embrace but a greater evil, and involve themselves in still graver doubts and difficulties.

That your petitioners are insurers collectively to the amount of Sa. Rs- 1.50,00,000 and upwards, and have the strongest possible interest in the establishment of secure and economical insurance. They are equally satisfied that the management of the Government office cannot be on a more economical footing, and they regret to say, that under the circumstances which they have noticed, and giving the fullest credit for good faith and every liberal intention to the Government, they cannot satisfy themselves that they would obtain perfect security in the Government office, because, in this respect, the Government are not altogether unfettered.

Your petitioners, therefore, with every respectful feeling towards the Government, most humbly, but earnestly, pray, that your honor will not sanction, or permit, the establishment of the projected office for the insurance of lives under the guarantee of Government; or that its establishment: may be postponed until such guarantee shall have been sanctioned by an Act of Parliament, and a Charter of Incorporation granted, or at least, until the guarantee of the Government shall have received the fiat of the Honorable the Court of Directors and Board of Controul, or that if it shall be determined, contrary to the earnest wishes and entreaties of your petitioners, to establish such office without such previous sanction obtained, then that your honor in council may be pleased to issue a Government Notification of the precise extent and nature of the guarantee of the Government on behalf of the East India Company, and of the fund on which such guarantee will be chargeable, with the liability of the mutual insurers to make good any advances of Government with such provisions as may be a distinct security to all parties in the event of the Honorable the Court of Directors and Board of Controul withdrawing their sanction from such guarantee.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments, May 2, 1835.

A copy of part II. vol. VII. of the Society's Transactions, now in course of distribution to the Members, was laid before the Meeting.

C. J. Davidson, Esq. Assistant-Surgeon Artillery, Dum-Dum, proposed at last Meeting, was elected a Member of the Society.

A. M. Mack Minto, Esq. Assistant-Surgeon, was proposed as a Member by R. C. McConnochie and W. Twining, Esqs.

A letter was read from W. Bell, Esq. Assistant-Surgeon Almorah, having reference to a former communication of his descriptive of the mode in which the native practitioners in that part of the country perform the operation of Lithotomy. From Mr. Bell's second communication, it more clearly appears, the operation in question differs little from that known and practised in Europe under the designation of "Cutting on the Gripe;" to Mr. Bell's communication is appended the history of a case of preternatural labour successfully treated by 'Turning.'

A morbid preparation of the bones of the Pelvis of a Quadruped accompanied by a Memoir and two drawings was presented by Doctor Cantor. In the preparation in question the hip joint has been luxated, the head of the femur forced through the upper portion of the Foramen Thyroideum, so as to project a little into the Cavity of the Pelvis, and then fractured from the neck and body of the bone. In this situation it is firmly fixed by a copious deposition of Callus. The acetabulum is almost filled with osseous deposit in the form of tears, and those portions of the Ileum, Ischium, and Pubes composing it, are much thickened in structure, and very freely perforated with foramina, for the transmission of blood vessels. The upper or sciatic rim of the acetabulum is flattened, and bears marks of having formed a portion of an artificial articulation. The Ileum and Sacrum on the affected side are firmly united by anchylosis. The history of the case is not known; but from these appearances, it may safely be concluded, that the femur was dislocated by a force drawing or propelling it forwards, and outwards, that the animal survived the accident for months or years, and that its sufferings must have been severe.

The following works were presented for the Library.

The first number of the United States Medical and Surgical Journal, by the Publishers.

General observations respecting Cholera Morbus, by J. N. Casanova, C. M. D. by the author.

A brief account of the Ophthalmic Hospital at Macao, by J. B. Thornhill, Esq.

Harris de Morbis acutis Infantum and Hamilton on the use and abuse of Mercurial medicines, by Mr. Hutchinson.

The following original communication was presented at the Meeting.

A Register of the Lithotomy cases treated by operation from April, 1833, accompanied by fifteen specimens of Urinary Calculi for the Museum, thirteen of which were extracted by operation, by R. N. Bunnard, Esq.

The following papers were then read and discussed:

Four years reports on the climate and diseases of the new colony of Western Australia, more especially of the Swan River District, by Wm. Milligan, Esq. M. D. Assistant-Surgeon His Majesty's 63d Regiment.

A case of Tetanus with Post Mortem examination, by S. Roe, Esq. M. D. Surgeon His Majesty's 38th Regt.

The new colony of Western Australia, according to Mr. Milligan, is situated on the Western Coast of new Holland, and extends from Cape Londonderry in Lat. 13° 44' South, to West Cape Horne in Lat. 33° 8', and from Longitude 112° 52' to 129°, from the meridian of Greenwich. The Swan River district, the one first settled, and still the most important, is situated in between Lat. 32° and 33°, the entire area being about 50 miles long, by thirty in breadth. The country is generally of the open forest description, the surface undulating, and covered with a great profusion of trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants. Three rivers intersect this valley, the Swan, the Canning, and the Murray. They are subject to the influence of the tides, abound with fish, and though generally shallow are subject to occasional inundations, which leave extensive alluvial deposits. The Swan is navigable for boats of 4 or 5 tons as high up as Perth, which is about 12 miles from the Sea Coast. Fresh water Lagoons are numerous; there are also others containing salt water. The water of the wells, though at first indifferent, from not having been procured from a sufficient depth is excellent. It sparkles in the glass, cooks food and washes linen well and speedily, and may be drank freely without relaxing the stomach. The strongest winds are from the north west, and south west. The north wind is the hottest and is very sultry during summer, destroying vegetation, if long continued. During the summer there is a regular land and sea breeze, the former prevailing in the morning, from the east, and the latter setting in about noon from the southwest The mornings and evenings are pleasant and the nights cool. The sky is clear, and of a beautiful azure, without cloud or rain. Moderate dews descend at night. As the autumn approaches the weather becomes less serene. The sky is occasionally overcast with thunder storms, which prove acceptable however, and beneficial; mitigating the excessive heat and rendering the fields fit for the labours of the husbandman. In winter the winds are occasionally boisterous endangering the shipping, if exposed; it rains for the most part, two or three days together, and then clears up for a somewhat longer period. In wet weather fogs are not uncommon in the mornings and evenings, in the low grounds or along the banks of the rivers. Hail of a large size occasionally falls, snow is unknown, and ice is but rarely met with. Fires are not unwelcome in the mornings and evenings; but on the whole are to be looked on, more as a luxury than a necessary. Such is the nature of the climate and locality, in which Sir James Stirling proceeded in June, 1829, accompanied by a detachment of His Majesty's 63d Regt. to establish a new colony. Settlers soon commenced to arrive, and poured in rapidly, till the end of 1830, at which time the population amounted to about two thousand. The vessels, which brought them out, and resembled in some measure Noah's ark, being crowded to excess with animals, birds and plants as well as men, women, and children, with provisions, and household goods. If we can fancy the population of one of the parishes in England, mixed with a sprinkling of half-pay officers, some gentlemen from the east and west Indies and a few cockuies, put down on the shores of a wilderness, we shall have some idea of the founders of this interesting colony. Their first object on landing was to get under shelter. Their domiciles were of course at first of wretched description. Some had single tents, other huts of green wood, previous to every shower, while many had no other covering night or day than the wide canopy of heaven. Afterwards when the settlers got on their own grants of land, their houses improved by successive gradations from the wooden house, they had imported, or had made in the colony, to that of wattle and dab, and finally to the more durable structure of brick or stone. As might be expected losses from the straying of cattle in the bush, and disagreeable adventures from the travellers losing their way, were far from uncommon. Accidents from explosions of gunpowder, and from the use of fire arms by persons unaccustomed to handle them, were likewise far from unfrequent; in no instance however did any tetanic affection follow. Notwithstanding these little mishaps, matters continued to go on pleasantly enough till the beginning of the winter of 1830, whe the supplies brought from England, consisting principally of salt meat, biscuit, and rum, began to fail, the harvest was indifferent, and to crown their misfortunes, after heavy rain, the rivers rose from fifteen to twenty feet above their usual level—and all who had commenced buildings on the lower grounds were obliged to desert them. From these various causes much personal fatigue and exposure were encountered, the hopes of the settlers damped and their energies depressed; scurvy, fever, and dysentery consequently showed themselves. These diseases were principally confined to the lower orders; among the higher classes, who were better provided with the necessaries and comforts of life, and who were more temperate in their habits, there was little sickness, and less mortality. With successive seasons the harvests became more bountiful, the flocks more numerous, and scurvy has disappeared in consequence. The fevers have likewise become less prevalent as the country has been more widely cleared, and better drained. The endemic diseases of the country appear to be principally inflammatory affections of the mucous membranes, opthalmia, dysentery and catarrh. Rheumatism is occasionally met with in damp weather in autumn and winter, of rather an obstinate description, and also a low fever, the gastro enterite.—Mr. Milligan's observations on these diseases have principally reference to the locality of Perth the capital of the colony. This town is situated on the banks of the Swan River on a gentle elevation, 30 feet above the level of the river, and about 40 above that of the sea. It is bounded to the south by the Swan, which is here $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile broad, to the north by a string of fresh water lagoons, which run up to the mountains, to the east by an extensive plain terminated by the Darling range, and to the west by Mount Eliza, which running north and south affords considerable protection from the strong gales coming in that direction. The Swan and the Canning unite immediately below the town in a large estuary, called Melville water, which still farther reduces the temperature of the sea breeze in its progress inland. The soil is light and sandy, with the exception of the banks of the river which are alluvial. The substratum is sand stone.—Having premised this much I proceed to extract a few notes on the several diseases above specified. The opthalmia appears to be a subacute species of the prulent, and is in Mr. Milligan's opinion peculiar to the country. It made its appearance about the middle of March, and soon became epidemic, very few escaping an attack of it; in May it reached its acme, then began to decline and disappeared in the begining of June. Some itching was felt on its approach, the eyelids become sticky and adhesive, and fuller than natural. In 24 or 36 hours, a viscid mucous discharge took place; the vessels of the conjunctiva became distended with red blood, and this state was often accompanied by redness round the eye externally—when the prulent discharge was considerable, the swelling of the eyelids often prevented the patient from opening them for several days. Exposure to light caused pain; but when the light was excluded pain was seldom much complained of. In a few cases the sensation of sand being in the eye was felt, and was attended by a greatly increased secretion of tears. These symptoms generally subsided in 4, 6, or 9 days under the use of purgatives, diaphoretics, lead, and zinc lotions—occasionally the unguentum calammare was used to prevent gluing of the eyelids, and in more obstinate cases the ungt. nitrat. argenti. Bleeding was rarely necessary; but was had recourse to, where there was much fever or pain. Blisters were applied to the nape with advantage. Before the appearance of the disease the heat was high, 120 in the sun at noon, and 90 in the shade, there was no rain, the light dazzling, and probably particles of sand floating in the air—all cases under Mr. Milligan's care terminated favorably; but some under less skilful or active practitioners were not so fortunate.

Cases of dysentery appear to occur throughout the year, but it prevailed in April, 1830. This, it will be recollected, was not long subsequent to the first establishment of the colony. The disease appears to have been of a mild nature. The symptoms were frequent scanty dejectionsof mucous and blood accompanied by tormina and tenesmus. The pulse was not often much excited, nor the temperature of the body increased. The tongue was white and furred, there was no thirst and the appetite was but little impaired. It terminated favorably in a few days in every instance, except one, who was in a hopeless state, passing involuntary stools, when admitted. The disease was induced generally by sudden changes of temperature, deranging the balance of the circulation. The objects in attempting the cure were to correct this, to restore the suppressed secretions, and to remove congestion or inflammation. To fulfil these indications bleeding, the warm bath, aperients, diaphoretics, calomel and opium were had recourse to with advantage. It was necessary to be careful of the lancet, as many of the patients were tainted with scurvy: leeches were the safer remedy. Mercury for the same reason could only be used with great care.

Scurvy first manifested itself in June, 1830. It was characterised by a bloated sallow complexion, sponginess of the gums and palate, sometimes giving rise to hæmorrhages from these parts, great debility, hard tumors on the thighs and calves, of the legs, contraction of the knee joints, petechiœ, vibices, and ulcers. Pulse frequent and weak, skin cool, respiration anxious, tongue white, appetite good, bowels constipated. The mind clear and full of hope to the last. Many cases were admitted into Hospital in the last stage with large fungous excressences sprouting from the gums and roof of the mouth, contracted joints, diarrhœa, dropsical effusions and extreme exhaustion. The labouring classes, as subject to the greatest privations, were of course the greatest sufferers. The disease appeared to increase as the wet weather set in. The remedies employed were lime juice, fresh animal and vegetable food, dry air, ventilation and cleanliness, wine and quinine. When any determination to a particular organ manifested itself suitable remedies were had recourse to. Of sixty three cases treated, fifty-seven recovered, and six died.

In the beginning of May as the winter commenced a few cases of continued fever appeared. It was in general characterised by great debility, by a pale shrunk and dejected countenance, feeble and unequal pulse, general excitement, and great nervous irritability, the surface was cold and pale, as if the blood had retired to the internal and vital organs. A low stupor or delirium appeared early, and continued during the progress of the disease. Such cases as put on these appearances soonest, were the most dangerous. Some cases were attended by more free vascular action, the heart and arteries beating more strongly than natural, the heat of the surface increased, the face flushed and accompanied with headache or giddiness. The nervous excitement was less, there was no delirium; the patient however was troubled with great restlessness, anxiety, and oppression. In a few cases near low and marshy grounds the fever assumed the remittent form; in no instance however has intermittent fever been met with in the colony. The remote causes of the disease appear to have been cold, damp, fatigue, exposure to the weather, indifferent food, the depressing passions, intemperance, and such other causes as are generally supposed to give rise to fever in Europe; perhaps infection, as some vessels appear to have arrived, on which Typhus prevailed during the voyage. The proximate cause, Mr. Milligan is inclined to attribute to Gastro-Enteritic inflammation. The treatment adopted in the early stages of the disease was the antiphlogistic, with tonics and stimulants in the more advanced.

Rheumatism is occasionally met with during winter and autumn. It appears to be a good deal of a subacute or chronic form, and is marked by pains in some set of muscles, increased on motion, some times in the head, the nape, shoulders, arms, chest, loins, and so forth. It is generally accompanied by headache, loss of appetite, thirst, white tongue. The vascular action was seldom much disturbed, and increased heat seldom met with; metastasis to the heart was not uncommon. Mr. Milligan is inclined to attribute the disease in some measure to derangement of the chylopoietic organs. The remedies employed were bleeding, general and local, aperients diaphoretics, warm bath, narcotics, calomel and opium, colchicum, blisters, issues, moxa, acupuncturation; and finally, tonics, such as quinine and arsenic.

A mild form of cholera showed itself in the month October, 1832. The fluid ejected by vomiting, and the dejections were bilious, cramps of the extremities attended in some cases; but the disease bore no resemblance in severity to Indian cholera, and readily subsided under the use of calomel and opium, and mild aperients. Weakly persons and children suffered most.

About the middle of October, 1833, hooping cough first appeared in the colony. It was imported with a detachment of H. M's. 26th Regt. which arrived on the 13th of September, from Sydney and Van Dieman's Land. The disease does not appear to have been marked by any peculiarity, with the exception of the following which deserves to be recorded. A short time previous to the commencement of the disease, the patient was often attacked with a vesicular eruption on the head, face, chest, abdomen or extremities bearing all the characters of varicella. In some instances, in which this eruption did not appear, small boils came out, as the cough declined.

Notwithstanding every exertion, vaccination had not been introduced during Mr. Milligan's residence in the colony.

Gonnorrhœa was met with, for the first time, in the beginning of 1833, and is supposed to have been introduced from Van Dieman's Land.

No case of measles, small pox, scarlatina or syphilis had been met with, and to no diathesis did the climate appear hostile; but to the rheumatic.

It agrees with the European constitution, and every description of live stock, and of vegetable production, though collected from different climates find there a a congenial locality. The annual mean temperature is from 60 to 64°. A great advantage, which the Swan River possesses to the Indian Invalid is its proximity, the voyage from Madras having several times been performed in 25 or 30 days; it is said to be shorter by one half, than either to Sydney or Van Dieman's Land. The society is good and respectable. The best period for leaving India is February, as the intensity of the summer heat in both countries is thus avoided.

Among much other valuable information in Mr. Milligan's elaborate paper, of which I have been unable to avail myself, is an interesting account of the aborigines of the country.

Mr. Roe's case of Tetanus occurred in a private of H. M.'s 38th Regiment of fair complexion, and sanguine temperament, aged about 25. He was admitted into Hospital on the 25th of December, in consequence of a lacerated wound of the thumb and fingers of the left hand, occasioned by the bursting of a fowling piece, which he had bought of a native. The wound became gangrenous and sloughing, and he is reported on the first of January, as having been troubled all night with spams of his fingers and hand, These formidable symptoms continued to increase, in spite of the treatment employed, and he died at noon, on the 3d, after having suffered every torture which Tetanic patients do. On examination five hours after death, the right foot and toes were found so much turned inwards, from the ankle, by the spasmodic action of the muscles, that it appeared dislocated. On being placed in its natural position, it immediately resumed its unnatural distortion, and retained it; although five hours after death.

The calvarium was strongly adherent to the dura mater, which was very vascular. The medullary portion of the cerebrum and cerebellum was soft and doughy. The membranes on the base of the brain were florid red, and very vascular on laying open the whole length of the spine, the sheath was highly vascular, particularly at three points, the 3d cervical, the 2d dorsal and the 4th lambar vertebræ. On laying open the sheath, and turning it back, the inside was pale and shining: the chord beautifully covered with florid red vessels along its whole course downwards, as if painted by art. The vessels anastomosed more thickly, at some points than at others, viz. near the last cervical and the middle of the dorsal vertebræ. The nervous substance appeared firm, and to resist the scalpel. There were some spots of vascularity over the stomach, which seemed continued from the lower portion of the Œsophagus. This tube was particularly contracted, for two inches from the pharynx downwards, so that it scarcely measured the diameter of a large goose quill. As it united to the stomach, it spread out a little wider, and exhibited a slight inflammatory blush. The upper portion was rather pale and shining.

The spleen was very large, brittle, and of a dark purple colour.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

SATURDAY, MAY 23.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

This was an application of Mr. John William Sutherland, under which Mr. Storm, Mr. R. C. Jenkins, and Mr. Vanthart, were examined on the 17th of January last, in order to shew from the circumstance of the co-partnery, that Mr. Brown Roberts who claimed a debt as a creditor, is not entitled to have a dividend paid to him by the assignees until all claims against the estate are discharged. The matter came before the court in January and February last, and has since stood over for his lordship's decision.

Sir J. P. Grant now gave judgment, declaring that the credit given in the books of Mackintosh and Co. in respect to the shares of Mr. Brown Roberts, the partners being utterly insolvent at the time, as well as Mr. Roberts, is not binding on the assignee. Secondly, that on the 1st of May, 1830, when the partnership was dissolved by the retirement of Mr. Browne Roberts, the firm was utterly insolvent, and which fact was well known to all the partners. Thirdly, that at the time of the dissolution of the copartnery there was no balance struck whatsoever, or no sum which could be divided, and that the sum credited to Mr. Browne Roberts was not a bonâ fide credit: and fourthly, that the assignees do therefore, strike out from the accounts of the insolvents all entries of any sums at the credit of Mr. Browne Roberts in respect to such shares. With regard to the costs, his lordship ordered that all reasonable costs as between party and party should be paid out of the estate.—Englishman.

The demand has been moderate, during the whole month, and sales confined to small parcels, unworthy of notice. Shipments had also a very limited scale as is usual at this season. In our last we quoted our prices nominal, they may be considered as the same for the present. Our stock is about 18000 maunds. London Price Current (2d March) as well as the latest news received from France, are favorable to the stuff, which may affect our prices in some degree. Accounts from the interior state the weather as particularly favourable to the young plants, the late fall of rain, instead of doing harm, as it was at first expected seems to have improved the prospects in every direction.

OPIUM.—Shipments for China and the Straits continue in progress; the drug has been in moderate request during the month, and prices experienced some advance, but are again declining. Our stock in the Honorable Company's Godowns is about 5000 chests.

RAW SILK.—There has been some inquiry of the finer descriptions during the month; our stock in the bazar has become more heavy, prices have improved since our last number, but the accounts received by the overland despatch from the home market, showing a decline in prices, have caused the buyers to pause, and the article is reported rather lower as before.

SILK PIECE GOODS.—Transactions in these fabrics during the month had no great extension, owing to the latest unfavourable accounts received from England, which state the stock as very heavy and prices much lower; This we anticipated in our number of February last. The few sales reported are chiefly for shipments to North America. We have to quote our last prices.

SALTPETRE.—The absence of available Tonnage for England has produced a decline in our prices during the first two weeks of the month, as our stock is very heavy; the last fortnight the market has exhibited encreased activity. The purchases reported are chiefly for shipments to England. The demand continues at our quotations. Prices which have already improved, may have a further improvement after the arrival of the vessels expected.

COTTON—Has been in active demand during the whole month. Prices of the assortments are reported with improvement; the market being insufficiently supplied; a further improvement may be expected, by increasing quantity of Tonnage for Europe, China and Bombay. The quantity of Cotton shipped to China during the last seven months amounts to 41863 bales.

SUGAR.—Purchases are restrained by want of Tonnage and supplies in the market. The new crop is arriving, several purchases have been made for England with an advance of about 1 Rupee per maund upon our last quotation. The purchases reported are chiefly for the English markets. Fine 1st quality is in much demand.

HIDES.—Hides continue flat, sales have been extremely limited during the whole month, owing to the scarcity of Tonnage and prices experienced some decline; our stock is rather heavy. Prices may improve after the arrival of the vessels expected. In Horns no transactions are reported and prices continue low.

LAC DYE is not much required for, the prices are yet steady. There has been more inquiry for Shell Lac, chiefly far the American market; the prices quoted exhibit a slight rise. Of Stick Lac prices have experienced some decline, consequent to recent importation; the transactions are very limited.

SPICES AND DRUGS.—Nothing worthy of notice has been been done in Turmeric, Mace, Cubebs and Dry Ginger. The demand for Cloves has been steady during the whole month. Nutmegs have been in moderate demand; we have to notice a recent importation of 38 casks from Bencoolen, which may affect our prices in some degree. Coffee in limited demand, we have no alterations in our prices to report. Black Pepper continues in good demand and prices have improved, first quality is particularly required and meet a ready sale. Long Pepper continues also in demand with improvement in prices. There has been some inquiry of Safflower for shipment to England and America, several purchases are reported at the prices quoted. Very limited transactions have been done in Camphor and Cassia, without alteration in prices. Linseed continues in good request, some extensive orders have been given to the interior for shipments to England. The market for Alum continues firm, and holders are generally looking for higher prices.

RICE.—But little business can be reported, shipments for the Mauritius having been somewhat suspended, prices are rather lower. Very little has been doing in Wheat.

TWIST.—The sales in Mule Twist have been on a limited scale; the market may be considered active as regard to demand, holders are firm as the stock is very limited. The demand for Turkey red Yarn and Orange Twist continues at our quotations; yellow Twist is neglected.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—The transactions in Long Cloths have been extensive; the sales which have come to our notice during the month being upwards of 8000 pieces. The demand continues for almost all descriptions of white Cotton at steady prices. Chintzes have also been in fair demand; Turban sets and neutral stripes have improved in prices. The following are the imports:—Coloured Cotton, 61 bxs. and bls.; Printed ditto, 61 bxs.; Plain Cottons, 631 bxs. and bls.; Long Cloths, 31 bls.; Brown Cottons, 18 bls.

WOOLLENS.—Some extensive business have been done in the early part of the month in Scarlet Woollens; the market continues firm with improvement in prices.

METALS.—The copper market continues dull and sales are confined to small parcels, with reduction in prices owing to the anxiety of holders of small stocks to realize. Our stock begins to be heavy. The following are the receipts per Tamerlane, sheet 323 cwt., cakes 600 cwt. per Ganga 10 tons tile, 5 tons cake, 42 bxs. Sheating. Iron has a favourable aspect, and prices have experienced a slight advance throughout the assortments. Steel continues in demand for Swedish description, the prices of which and blistered are quoted with some improvement. Lead; some sales of Sheet and Pig are reported in our abstract; the demand continues, and prices of the assortments show an advance on previous quotations. Spelter remains firm at our quotation. Tin Plates and Quicksilver are also in moderate demand.

EXCHANGE.—Bills of undoubted character are offering at 2 2 to 2 2¼ the market however is extremely flat. The average remitting rates is about 2 1¼.

FREIGHTS.—Continue high.

PUBLIC MEETING—THE PRESS REGULATION.

The following Report of the Meeting at the Town Hall, on Monday, the 8th June, is chiefly made up from that which appeared in the Englishman, but it has been collated with notes taken at the Meeting, and from these and from memory various omissions have been supplied, so that it is fuller, and it is hoped more accurate:—

The requisition having been read,

Mr. TURTON said, as one of the persons whose name is affixed to the requisition to the Sheriff for calling this meeting, he did not think it out of place that he should take an active part in this proceeding, but he had a peculiar reason for presenting himself thus early to the notice of the meeting. In a former case in that hall, he had found himself in hostility to the proposers of an address to Sir Charles Metcalfe, on the occasion of his departure from Calcutta? He did not repent the course he had then taken, he had acted conscientiously, and if the the same circumstances were to occur again, should act precisely as he had then done: He had then stated his objections to an address which he and his friend near him could only look upon as merely adulatory, offered as it was to one of whose public opinions they could know so little. There were indeed few occasions for such expression of public feeling even to the head of the Government, and Members of Council were in a worse condition in that respect inasmuch as it was impossible for us to know how they voted; but the case was now different, and he fully concurred in the propriety of an address to Sir Charles. It was well known to them now, that he had sanctioned the proposed law, they could appreciate the motives that had led to the measure, knowing as they did that Sir Charles had been employed for many years in situations of high trust which enabled him to estimate the value and the danger of a free Press, and it was therefore incumbent on them when they saw such a law promulgated to come forward and state that the measure had their warmest approbation, that they hailed it with satisfaction as affording the brightest hope for India.

He was anxious to come forward thus early, that it might not be supposed that he did not heartily approve of the proposed law, for during the whole course of his life he never had greater satisfaction in proposing a resolution, than he felt in moving, the one with which he should conclude, and which was, in substance, thanking the Governor-General for the proposed law. He had been in this country for some years, and seen during that time all the changes of opinion on the part of the government regarding the press. He remembered the declaration in its favor by the Marquess of Hastings, and the acts inimical to its liberty, of the succeeding government, of persons who had been here as long, but who were not so wise, and he had had opportunities of hearing the opinions of men whose views were liberal as to the press in Europe, but who could not extend those liberal views towards the press in this country; he could, therefore, very well appreciate the motives of Sir Charles Metcalfe, who had been surrounded by men not of the most liberal opinions, and who, he might almost say, had been fostered into importance by the India House, where laws of the description recently promulgated had not hitherto been the most palatable, and who had got rid of early prejudices regarding the press laws which he might have imbibed from his intercourse with an Adam, and a Uslington,—he said, got rid of them, if he ever possessed them,—and come forward at the end of twelve years to propose their total abrogation. This was indeed a fit subject of congratulation for the meeting and for the natives of this country, intimating, as it did, that brighter times were in store for them and that the prejudices by which India had been kept down in the scale of nations were at last fading away. He confessed it was with these considerations that he felt the greatest satisfaction in proposing the resolution, for he did not merely view the abrogation of the press laws as an important act of itself, but also as the harbinger of measures that would follow it. It had been urged by some gentlemen who were favorable to the emancipation of the press, that circumstances rendered it fitting for the meeting to ask the Governor-General to pass the law immediately. He, for one, was opposed to this course; he wished that the act should appear as the triumph of reason and of principle; that it should appear the deliberate act of the council; and that the servants of Government should have sufficient time to express their fears of the consequences of its being put into operation. Therefore he was opposed to any attempt to expedite it, that at some future period it might not be said that it was the hasty measure of a day; on the contrary, he would rather that it should appear the deliberate act of men, the majority of whom have been long accustomed to the manners, customs, and character of the people, and who have carried it into effect from a conviction that it is for the interest not only of the people of this country, but also for the interest of those by whom they are governed. (Loud applause.) He was aware that it was thought necessary to expedite this measure in consequence of an apprehension that the future Governor-General might not be so favourably disposed towards the press as the present one, but he was not prepared to suppose that Lord Heytesbury would ever venture, even if he had the inclination, to oppose a law proposed by three men who had been twenty five years in this country, and who had had the best means of knowing the manners and habits of the people. He did not believe, whatever might be Lord Heytesbury's inclination, that he would venture to suspend the measure, but he did not think he would have the inclination—he did not believe he would ever hazard a measure which would place him not only in opposition to the council, but to the whole community; but he believed Lord Heytesbury would not be found averse to the liberty of the press; for he was quite satisfied the opinion was every where gaining ground, that it was as essential to the governing as to the governed. As an instance of the growth of the opinion he might advert to the case of Lord Amherst who made use of the law when urged to do so by others; but who although wanting in the moral courage to repeal it, still would not have recourse to it in any case in which he was personally concerned. He had declared that as it was passed by men of great experience, and approved of by the Court, he would never repeal it though he would not exercise it in his own case. His testimony therefore was in favour of the freedom of the press, since he, who of all others, in his high station most required protection of the law, if protection were needed at all, had refused to avail himself of it. With regard to Lord W. Bentinck, he regretted that he had not come forward to repeal these laws, and that he had expressed an opinion as to the necessity of summary power over the press; for he had a great respect for Lord William Bentinck, admired many of his acts, and considered him as liberal and single minded a Governor-General as ever came to the country; he believed also that no man had ever more sincerely at heart the happiness of the people. If they feared Lord Heytesbury's hostility to the press because he had been bred up in the Tory school of diplomacy, they should recollect that Lord William Bentinck was educated in the same school. When the deputation from the former meeting waited on Lord William Bentinck, his impression was that his lordship had not considered the subject,—he did not think that Lord William would have given his sanction to a measure, empowering the Government to come down on the conductors of the press with any summary proceeding, but he was now convinced that he had been mistaken, and that Lord William Bentinck had a firm conviction that such a summary power was necessary for the government of the country. This was a spot on Lord William's character, but it was a spot on a character that could afford to have a spot upon it. (Cheers.) Another subject for congratulation on the proposed law was, that it made no distinction of persons. It was not a law for those only who might be supposed to have a common interest with the government, but for the natives of the soil also. On a former occasion he had said he would make no distinction, and he held it to be the brightest feature in Sir Charles Metcalfe's law that it repudiated the idea of any such distinction and made all alike, native and European, amenable to the law. (Loud Cheers.) He was no advocate for the licentiousness, but for the liberty of the press—but he thought that the licentiousness of the press was amply provided against by the law. So far from believing the existing laws of England insufficient for restraining the press, he believed that they imposed too many restrictions upon that liberty, and he trusted that if any new laws for the press were provided they would extend and not curtail its power. (Cheers.) Mr. Turton would take that opportunity of mentioning that he had received a letter from Mr. Evelyn Gordon of the Civil Service with respect to this Meeting. Mr. Gordon regretted that he could not attend, but declared that his heart and wishes were with the Meeting—that could he have been present no false delicacy should hav[e] p[re]vented him as the friend of Sir Charles Metcalfe who was now in power, from expressing his sense of the enlightened policy of liberating the press, and that he hoped to hear the sentiments of members of the services expressed at the Meeting. Mr. Gordon, said Mr. Turton, forcibly remarks on Sir Charles Metcalfe's friends and connections at home—and certainly there never was an example of greater and of nobler disinterestedness than his liberation of the press, for his only chance of permanently holding the highest station [he] was that of coming to the views of the home authorities. One of two things Mr. Turton observed was clear, either that the light had penetrated the roof of that august building in Leadenhall Street, or that Sir Charles Metcalfe disregarding the opinions there entertained in favor of what he believed to be right, had utterly rejected all considerations of self-interest by proposing this law. Mr. Turton then submitted the following resolution:—

'Resolved—That it is expedient that an Address should be presented by the inhabitants of Calcutta to the Governor-General of India, Sir C. T. Metcalfe, expressive of the satisfaction and gratitude which they feel at the proposed law relating to the Press of India, and for repealing the Regulation of March, 1823, relating to the Press of Bengal.'

Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore expressed the pleasure he felt at the promulgation of the proposed law. He had ever felt a deep interest in the removal of all restrictions on the freedom of the press, and had partaken in every public expression of feeling on that subject. It was natural, therefore, that he should be pleased with the victory, and as he had helped to fight the battle he could not do better than second this resolution.

The resolution was then put and carried by acclamation.

Mr. Dickens said, when last he had the pleasure to meet the inhabitants of Calcutta, it was in the performance of a common object and public duty—part of that object was to obtain the removal of the restriction on public meetings. That restraint had been declared by government to be unnecessary, and he now congratulated the public on meeting them for the first time at a public meeting convened by the Sheriff without the permission of government having been asked by that officer. On that occasion it was also part of their prayer, that the most tyrannical, most unwise, and most mischievous Press Laws should be removed: they are now about to be removed by the man to whom he would read an address which he would propose should be adopted by the meeting, and he trusted they would accord their assent to it with the same cordiality which he felt in proposing it. But first he was desirous to explain that his friend Mr. Turton and himself had not taken an early part in the proceedings from any desire to thrust themselves forward, but because there was a peculiar and personal propriety in their taking that course. Mr. Turton had alluded to those circumstances. He and his friend had opposed the former address because they thought that the inhabitants ought not to be assembled to vote an address to any man for his private virtues, especially at a time when he was leaving them only for a brief period to return to them vested with the supreme power. He had so returned and a noble use he had made of that power. (Cheers.) Now therefore he, Mr. D., was prepared to vote an address and to concur with those to whom he was formerly opposed. When he opposed the former address he disclaimed all personal motives—he disclaimed them now. He would now proceed to his immediate subject. A few observations would be necessary to explain a point in the address which might otherwise appear doubtful. As for the value of the testimony in favour of the Press of Sir Charles Metcalfe after thirty-five years experience in this country, he need not dilate on that point—supported by such a council as the present, that testimony must be decisive and set the question for ever at rest. He had no doubt that Lord Heytesbury would never venture in defiance of such a decision to oppose or prevent the enactment of the law. It was impossible—it would be an act of unparralleled political presumption. On no account, however, would he, Mr. Dickens, consent to pray for the precipitation of the measure—for its enactment before the expiration granted by previous promulgation for its consideration. It was not for them who had before prayed that all laws might be so promulgated before enactment as to allow of full time for their discussion, to call for such precipitation, and thus to establish a precedent against themselves. The more the subject was canvassed the better—the more would the utility of the press appear and the measure instead of being like the enactment which enslaved the press the effect of a rash impulse, would be the result of reason and calm deliberation. There was one topic mentioned in the address, on which it was necessary to say a few words—a formal and deliberate disclaimer of the existence of any party in this country opposed to the government. Much mischief had been done in England, by the employment of nicknames and watchwords of party—but here there was no excuse for the use of them; for he would deny that there was a party opposed to the Government. When they felt a grievance, they appealed to the Government respectfully for its redress; but he would deny that there was any political party here that did otherwise than praise the Government—that was not positively and absolutely contented with it; but it was most important that this fact should be recorded—for such was the ignorance which prevailed at home, that even in official correspondence party epithets were introduced, which had no application here. It was the more important to record the fact, from the ignorance which prevailed at home as to the real condition of the country, and which afforded every ignoramus there an opportunity to pronounce legislation for India, a bore. If that ignorance led men to neglect a sacred duty—to be guilty of a political crime, there was no measure better calculated to dispel it than the freedom of the Press. They would shew that they would not abuse that freedom—that they wanted the liberty and not the licentiousness of the press.

Mr. Dickens then concluded by reading the following

ADDRESS.

To the Honorable Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe, Bart., Governor-General of India. The Address of the Inhabitants of Calcutta in the Town Hall, assembled.

Honorable Sir,—The publication of the Regulation proposed in Council, on the 27th April, entitled Act No.— of 1835 for—and which is our earnest hope will be passed as a law without material change, is the occasion of our addressing you, before you relinquish the high powers which fortunate circumstances (fortunate at least for us) have placed in your hands, and which you have so well used.

The nature of the British Government of India has long made it a subject of debate among Statesmen, whether the free expression in print of the thoughts of its inhabitants could be permitted to exist without destroying that Government or perpetually endangering its stability.

There have not been wanting former Governors of India who have declared that approbation was needless. The Marquess of Hastings expressed that opinion, Lord William Bentinck implied it by permitting the Press to be free, with scarcely an exception, and your testimony has now been added to theirs; [the] experience of a whole life passed among the people of [India] in its most remote and war-like provinces, and its most turbulent times, renders this testimony the most valuable of all. We view this, as one among other recent proofs, that the Government of India is wisely and safely entrusted to those who are intimately acquainted with the course of its administration, and with [the] manners, [opinions], and feelings of its people.

Aware that a more timid and distrustful policy has heretofore been approved in England, we cannot but admire the high minded decision with which you have cast the weight of your testimony into the long balanced scales of opinion. It is our hope as well as our belief, that nothing can occur after this to dissappoint the public wish.

We trust that you will not be called upon to resign your high office until the period shall arrive, when this proposed Regulation ought to receive the final sanction of the Governor-General of India in Council, and be passed into a law. Not from any doubt that this measure which you and the experienced Council which assists you, have deliberately pronounced to be safe and desirable, and will be carried into effect by your successor, but from an anxious desire, that he with whom the measure originated, may have the full credit which will attach to his enlightened policy.

As it is not improbable that some misapprehension on another subject connected with this, may prevail in England, we take the opportunity afforded to us by this Address, to declare our belief that there exists in this country no political party in opposition to the Government. It would be an error, that might produce ill-will, discontent, perhaps injustice, to apply the designations of political party in England, to the differences of opinion on local subjects which exist here, though there are many who think that great and obvious deficiencies exist in the late act of the legislature of Great Britain providing for the renewal of the East India Company's Charter,—deficiencies which they deem ought not to have been left to any other power to supply; yet we express it to be our deliberate conviction, that the great body of the people here are contented—and more than contented, with the Government, that they are attached to it and grateful.

We think it not superfluous to allude briefly to the possibility, that some difficulties may occur in framing the provisions of a law to restrain all excesses and injuries which may be committed by means of the Press. It is obvious that the subject could not be suitably discussed within the limits of an address, nor do we assume to ourselves to instruct the Government. We content ourselves with saying that while we pray for a lawful freedom of the Press, and are thankful for it, we do not wish *to liberate the Press from any just and legal responsibility which may attach to its licentiousness. We feel satisfied that the power of legislation is now in wise and liberal hands: we do not fear that exorbitant penalties will be imposed, or that the spirit of the proposed law will be impaired in its progress. In case future legislation should become necessary, and in particular if temporary or local difficulties arise, which shall render it necessary to restrain the liberty of the Press, we trust that the measure of precaution, will be in proportion to the danger apprehended, and that no restrictions will be made permanent, which are not now, and at all times necessary.

In conclusion, we permit ourselves to hope that you will not receive without pleasure this public testimony of approbation and high esteem; the general character of the Government under your auspices is such that this proposed law ranks only as one among many wise and liberal measures; it can need therefore no panegyric. Hitherto throughout Europe and the civilized world, a too common error has prevailed, and the Government of India has been deemed a grasping despotism, the support of which was military force alone, or if it were maintained by opinion, that opinion was simply the conviction that its force was irresistible. It has been reserved for you by this law which you have proposed, which we trust you will remain to complete, and which we meet here to approve, to dissipate this error, an error most injurious to the natural character of Great Britain. What you have done, must prove to all men, that there is nothing in common between the Government, which now exists in this country, and those which have heretofore existed; that the maxims of all Asiatic domination are the very reverse of the rule of the British Government of India.

Mr. James Sutherl[illegible] that there was so little difference of opinion he[illegible]xplain, but he could not second an ad[illegible]portant subject without expr[illegible]o. He had heard it suggested [illegible]s politic in the meeting to call on [illegible]precipitate the passing of the proposed law, but he most fully agreed with Mr. Turton and Mr. Dickens, that such a measure would not only be impolitic, but also in very bad taste. He quite concurred in the opinion that we ought not to sacrifice a matter of principle to a point of mere etiquette! but he very much doubted whether in this case the principle would be at all advanced by the precipitation recommended. It was true that the nobleman about to come out to this country was a diplomatist of a very bad school, but he had not the slightest doubt that he partook so far of the spirit of the age, that he would concur in the [illegible] a law which had been proposed and approved by [illegible]cil and supported by the public voice. He believed, indeed, that let who would be our future Ruler, be he Whig or be he Tory, he would not venture to oppose this law. Mr. Sutherland also warmly supported that part of the address which disclaimed the existence of any party in India opposed to the Government, and congratulated the meeting on its respectability and number, and on its unanimity so far, from which he said, it was evident that the spirit of the age was progressing in this country [illegible]

Mr. Stocqueler said, that as allusion had been made to the suggestion that the Government should be solicited to pass the draft of the Press Law into an Act at once, and as he had been the person who had offered that suggestion, he would take occasion to object to that passage in the address which left it to be supposed that the meeting had no fears that Lord Heytesbury would hesitate to sanction the law in question. The passage ran thus:—

'We trust that you will not be called upon to resign your high office until the period shall arrive, when this proposed Regulation ought to receive the final sanction of the Governor-General of India in Council, and be passed into a law. Not from any doubt that this measure, which you and the experienced Council which assists you have deliberately pronounced to be safe and desirable, will be carried into effect by your successor, but from an anxious desire, that he with whom the measure originated may have the full credit which will attach to his enlightened policy.'

Now he, (Mr. Stocqueler,) would not press his objection to this passage as the meeting appeared to be unanimous in favor of the address as it stood, and as he could not hope for its adoption by his suggestion. He would merely content himself therefore with recording his own dissent. It had been said that Lord Heytesbury came from a very bad school, which circumstance alone was sufficient in his, (Mr. Stocqueler's) opinion, to place no reliance on the liberality of his intentions. Moreover, there could be no occasion for further time to deliberate upon the question of the propriety of freeing the Indian Press since the public had, for the last eight or ten years, unequivocally expressed its opinion thereupon.

Mr. Turton rose for the purpose of making a slight alteration in the address, which was adopted, and which is printed in italics. He also took the opportunity of saying a few words in reply to Mr. Stocqueler, though on one point he perfectly agreed with that gentleman, viz., that Lord Heytesbury came out of a bad school,—that is, a bad political school,—for he was educated in a very good school as he (Mr. Turton) happened to know. But he (Mr. Turton) had known some very good boys come out of a very bad school, Lord William Bentinck for instance;—but come out of what school he might, he (Mr. T.) believed that his Lordship would not venture by opposing the proposed law to set at defiance the Council and the people: but if he did, there would then certainly be two parties in India—Lord Heytesbury on the one side, and the enlightened public of India on the other. He feared not the power of any Governor-General which was opposed to the enlightened intelligence of men who had passed a great portion of their lives in this country,—who had got rid of their prejudices before Lord Heytesbury ever had any; but should Lord Heytesbury be so inclined, he hoped to see him in his quixotic enterprize couch his lance against the Press. He did not believe Lord Heytesbury could dare attempt to act against the opinion of the whole community; nor would he with no further knowledge of him than that of the school in which he was bred, impute to him the intention of such an act of tyranny. He did not believe that Lord Heytesbury would so act, nor would he meet him with such an imputation. On the contrary he would rather receive him with cordiality, and assume that he had something like sense in his head. He had no doubt indeed that his Lordship would pass the law, that he would cheerfully pass it, and if he had a prejudice against it, that he would get rid of that prejudice. On that ground he supported the Address as it stood with the exception of the slight alteration to which he had referred. He did wish the Press to be without restraint, but not without responsibility, which may attach to its licentiousness.

Baboo Duckenunder Mookerjee said, [illegible] that the meeting is unanimous in its opinion as to the freedom of the press, allow me to explain that the reason for presenting myself to its notice, is, because I consider that the proposed law is one of the greatest importance to the native community, in whose behalf I rise to express my sentiments. Sir Charles Metcalfe, certainly, deserves all the thanks that we are able to bestow on him; and I concur with Mr. Turton that [illegible] liberty we require is not [illegible] Let the offender be amenable to the laws, and if he deserves punishment, a Court of Justice is the tribunal to inflict it. I am sorry that we have some cause of complaint against Lord William Bentinck, for not having passed this proposed law. It was his duty according to his oath, if he thought the present law good, to inforce it—if not, to repeal it,—to do neither was hypocrisy. The proposed law is well calculated to promote the benefit of the country—for no country so much needs a Free Press as that whose Government is despotic. We cannot all, like Rammohun Roy, cross the ocean to make our appeals in England. (Mr. Stocqueler here asked, why not!) why not? because we have not all the same genius, the same courage or the same readiness to make great sacrifices. Lord Heytesbury will not oppose this law, he dare not. Truth next to God is omnipotent, and when he sees European and Native united in favour of the freedom of the Press, I don't think he'll oppose it, and if he does, I don't believe he'll succeed. (The Baboo sat down amidst the loud cheers of the meeting.)

Mr. Osborne observed, that the meeting had heard from his learned friend Mr. Turton that if Lord Heytesbury should refuse to pass the proposed law he woul fly in the face of the Council and the people, for that there never had been a press meeting at which there was a dissenting voice against its freedom. He (Mr. O.) would take care that should be said no longer. He could tell his learned friend that although they could not elevate their voices at a public meeting, there were many of the wisest and most experinced heads in this society opposed to the freedom of the Press. There were many passages in the address with which he could not agree. With respect to the English newspapers, indeed, he did think there was much necessity for the law. Those papers address themselves exclusively to a highly civilized class—and without intending any disparagement to the talent of the conductors of the English journals here, he thought their chief recommendation was the judgment of the Editors in making European selections, and the rapidity with which they gave circulation to Europeans news. He did not think that any benefit would arise from the increased circulation of native papers. He did not conceive that the press was an instrument of civilization: he believed that it was only in a very advanced stage of civilization that the press was at all required. In a country like this, in the lowest grade of civilization, what good was to be expected from the native press—from the Sumachar Durpun he believed they called it, or from such papers the names of which he could not pronounce or recollect! He certainly did not anticipate any great result from them, even if they went forth in all the glory of licentiousness, circulating only among a few wealthy natives. In fact he looked upon the native press as utterly worthless—a mere nullity; but were it otherwise they had the Hindoo College, from which pure fountain they might suck all the knowledge really useful to them. Many of the best informed members of this society did not approve of these public Meetings for the liberty of the Press. He thought the press had been going on very well under the old law and he saw no reason for change.

Mr. Longueville Clarke.—His learned friend Mr. Osborne had told them many of the cleverest heads in society were enemies to the Press: he would not contradict his assertion when he found that in that category, he (Mr. Osborne) included his own head: but he Mr. C. believed that the number of these clever heads opposed to the press was so few that the future Governor-General, if disposed to rely on them, would not derive much support from them. He (Mr. C.) had been many years in this country. When he first arrived he admitted there had been great diversity of opinion relative to the freedom of the Press; but as time had passed away, so had prejudice also, and every year the feeling had continued to increase that the liberty of the Press was essential to the welfare of India. He agreed with his friends Messrs. Turton and Dickens that it would afford a strong argument against us, if we were to call on the Council to precipitate the measures. He (Mr. C.) was not afraid that Lord Heytesbury would array himself against the Council and the people; but if he did, we could appeal to the throne for his removal; and without doing his Lordship the wrong of assuming that he would so act, he (Mr. Clarke) would observe that if he should, he (Mr. C.) would be the first to put his name to a requisition for a meeting to appeal to the Crown against his Lordship. We could now always do that—we could meet without permission of Government. He hoped there would be no necessity for so strong a party measure; but if the time should come for it, he would then evince his sincerity not by words but by deeds, and carry the petition to the foot of the throne for the recal of the man who had invaded their rights. If they were forced to have recourse to such a proceeding, they would find an invaluable ally in a Free Press. Even his learned friend Mr. O. would not deny that; and if it were only in contemplation of such a probability, it was the duty of every man to stand up for a Free Press. He had one observation more to offer. A short time ago he was in opposition to his learned friends Messrs. Turton and Dickens, and they had supposed that personal motives had been attributed to them. On his part and that of all his friends, he utterly disclaimed having imputed motives to them—he knew them both too well to suppose they had acted from personal motives or from a mere spirit of factious opposition. He gave them credit then as now for the best motives, and was happy that a time had arrived when there was no longer any difference of opinion between them on the subject of an address to Sir Charles Metcalfe. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Turton.—His peripatetic* friend Mr. Osborne, (laughter) had accused him of deriving his notions of the value of the press from the unanimity which had prevailed on the subject at public meetings! now he appealed to all present as to whether he had made any such declaration. What he stated was, that if this act passed deliberately, allowing time for the whole of India to be heard on the subject without a single voice being raised up against it, no Governor-General would dare to rescind the measure. His learned friend had also spoken of the feelings of the Indian community, but he thought he knew something more of the feelings of the people of India than his learned friend, and of one thing he was quite satisfied, that whatever feeling Mr. Osborne had heard expressed regarding the measure, he had not come forth this day with one argument against it. His learned friend, it seemed, had been picking the best heads in India, and culling the essence of their brains without extracting any argument from them. He allowed that the press laws were nugatory; and yet he would allow a nugatory law to continue unrepealed, one, too, under which men had been ruined and men may be ruined hereafter!! Surely it was an additional reason if the Press Laws were nugatory, that they should be swept from the statute book. His learned friend would admit, he thought, that he had to thank him, Mr. Turton, for extracting a single argument out of all his declamation though that argument made against him.

[illegible] He had not intended to address t[illegible] generous attack on the native press[illegible] words in its defence. Mr. Osborn[illegible] native press should have been con[illegible] not have been set free because i[illegible] the highly civilized but only amon[illegible] and that its contents were worthless. Yet the learned gentleman confessed that he could not understand the native Papers, could not even read their names, and yet he condemned them! (Cheers.) He (Mr. O.) should have known more of the native press ere he came to a sweeping conclusion against it. He had long known that press; but could Mr. Osborne say that its articles were such as merited the stigma the learned gentleman had cast upon it. The Summachar Durpun circulated in various districts and was full of useful discussion. Certainly the learned gentleman had not drawn his conclusions from the contents of the papers. This was not the first attempt that had been made to separate the natives from the European press: but he was glad to see that our rulers had scouted the proposition. Neither the European nor native press would advocate licentiousness, and the native press could be restrained by the same laws that applied to the English. Why such distrust of the natives—there were good and bad of all races. He would conclude by calling the attention of the opponents of the native press to a passage from Milton—'Who kills a man, kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself; kills the image of God in the very eye.' Many a man lives a burden upon the earth, but a good book is the precious life of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up 'on purpose for a life beyond life.' (Loud cheers.)

Mr. James Sutherland would trouble them with a few remarks on what had fallen from Mr. Osborne. He certainly had not anticipated any opposition when he had previously congratulated them on their unanimity: but he was glad that the gentleman who differed from them had boldly spoken out. The learned gentleman had assured them that many of the most enlightened members of the community were hostile to the liberty of the Press, although he had observed they could not elevate their voices at a public meeting. It was very unfortunate that these enemies of the Press should be absent, for at least if they could not elevate their voices they could have elevated their hands; now at the great meeting in January last not one single hand had been raised against the freedom of the Press. The learned gentleman had assured them that in his opinion the Press had been going on very well under the old law. It was very easy for that gentleman to hold and to express that opinion.

'He jests at scars who never felt a wound.'

But if the speaker had had his property destroyed and his prospects ruined by the law of which he now approved, he would most probably have taken a very different view of the matter. Into the question whether the Press had or had not been an instrument of civilization, he (Mr. S.) would not then enter. It was enough for him to know that the opinion that it had not, could not be supported by any argument derived from history or experience. He knew indeed that it had been a favorite dictum here with a higher authority than the learned gentleman's, that a Free Press should follow, not precede free institutions, by which he supposed we were to understand that we were to await until we had native elections and a parliament sitting in Calcutta ere we claimed or exercised the right of expressing public opinion through the medium of the Press. He always had opposed, and always would oppose that doctrine, as absurd. The learned gentleman had drawn a distinction between the European and the native Press, though he admitted that he was ignorant of the native languages and knew little of the contents of that Press. He, (Mr. S.) would plead guilty also to the soft impeachment of being ignorant of the native languages: but fortunately some of the native papers were translated and he had been for years in the habit of reading them. It was his opinion that if a distinction were to be drawn between the native and the European Press, the balance as to temper and decorum would be in favour of the former. He had heard a great deal indeed of the ignorance of the people; he admitted, and he deeply lamented, that a vast mass of ingorance and superstition did still exist in the country: but he denied that that was any argument against the liberty of the Press. In his view, indeed, if ever there was a country above any other in which the freedom of the press was safe and salutary, India was that country—for though the mass of the people were ignorant there existed a large amount of enlightened public opinion, of which the governing stood in awe, which they were desirous of having in their favour, and thus the natives were benefitted by an instrument of the value and nature of which the mass of them, he admitted, still remained ignorant. He had always disclaimed, and he would still disclaim, any boon which was to be conceded at the expense of the natives, and if there was one feature with which he was more gratified in the proposed law than another, which reflected more honour on Sir Charles Metcalfe, it was, that it rejected all distinctions between Native and European, and recognized the Trojan hero's maxim of impartiality.

"Tros Tyriusve mihi nullo discrimine agetur."

He was glad that the gentleman who was opposed to them had stated his objections, and he regretted that those who agreed with him had not followed his example, he hoped if any of them were present that they would still do so. He entirely agreed with those who urged that the more the subject was discussed the better. Their's was the cause of principle* and reason—and by principle and reason alone let it triumph.

Mr. Torrens.—As the learned gentleman had set himself up as a butt to be spoke at, and imagined that among the service to which he (Mr. T.) belonged, there were many who were unfavourable to the liberty of the Press, he rose to vindicate it from that imputation. There were in that service he believed very few persons who hold such opinions. In fact, the man who did, must be born a Tory, bred a Tory, and be a Tory in grain. He believed that it had been imputed to the service to which he belonged that they dreaded the bosom of reform, but they had been belied—they desired public opinion on their acts—they courted public scrutiny into the conduct of their judges. He believed that he spoke the sentiments of the majority of the service that so far from being opposed to free discussion, they were favorable to it, and rejoiced in the means of making their actions better known to the country.

Dr. Corbyn considered it the duty of every man on an occasion of this kind to state the results of his observation and experience. If the actions of men were subjected only to subsequent restraint by Laws—he was at a loss to conceive why the productions of mind alone should be trammelled by previous restrictions. Suppose a man had an estate and another man were to injure the property of that estate, and the offended were to be made amenable to him whom he had injured—to be judged by him alone, should we not say that such a system was opposed to reason and justice? Why then not adopt this rule in respect to the productions of mind—the laws have power to punish the abuses of the Press, why then restrain its freedom? It had been urged that the liberty of the Press had not promoted civilization. To refute that assertion we had only to look at our own little island. What constituted its greatness—if not freedom? By what was that freedom secured but by the liberty of the Press? If that were so, why, then, he asked, should the press in this vast country be subjected to restraints? He had been induced to address the meeting chiefly because he could not have it supposed that the service to which he belonged participated in hostility to the press.

Mr. Crow would trouble the Meeting with a few words on behalf of the class to which he belonged, the East Indians, who were as well qualified and as much entitled to express their opinions on this subject as any other class. His was no very limited experience among his countrymen, and he was particularly well aware of the sentiments of those who were in the habit of taking part in public meetings, and he would venture to say that there was but one opinion among them, they were all in favour of the freedom of the press, and unanimous in desiring that the proposed law should pass.

Mr. Joakim Senaes, would presume, week and feeble an advocate as he might be, humbly to echo the sentiments expressed by Mr. Crow—they, the East Indians, were all agreed in favour of the liberty of the press, and in proof of his own sentiments, and those of Mr. Crow, he could refer them to articles written by both which would fully bear him out in that statement. He had been at all times an advocate of the liberty of the press. These were not mere words and professions, but sentiments which flowed directly from his heart.

* We beg to observe that this speech is reported entirely from memory, as we could not for a reason, which many of our readers will divine, take a note of it; but although it is in reply, and therefore, of course, was wholly unprepared, we believe it is substantially correct.

Mr. Pattle came there simply for the gratification of hearing what he had heard, he had not intended to speak; but he felt it now incumbent on him to rise, and repudiate the opinion that there were many enlightened persons in this community opposed to the liberty of the Press. He could declare that in the service to which he belonged the minority holding such opinions was so very small, that he believed he might be entitled to say that the whole service was favorable to that liberty. They courted publicity. Honest men never feared it. He who did was not honest, and he hoped that such men might meet the exposure they deserved. He believed that their opinions were equally in favour of the native press, for himself he thought very highly of it—it had been ably and temperately conducted, and he thought it would be a useful instrument for diffusing knowledge among the people. He had heard of danger from it to our Government; but the best tenure of our power was the voice of the people in its favour—so long as the people preferred our Government (and they would prefer it the more it was known) so long would that Government endure—whenever they ceased to prefer it—he hoped it would endure no longer. (Loud cheers.)

The following gentlemen were named a committee to present the Address—Mr. Pattle, Mr. Turton, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Dickens, Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Stocqueler, Mr. H. Torrens, Mr. Crow, Mr. Sinaes, Dr. Corbyn, and Baboos Dwarkanauth Tagore, Duckenunder Mookerjee and Russic Kisto Mullick.

The thanks of the meeting were then voted to the Sheriff, and the meeting separted.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S REPLY TO THE ADDRESS.

To the Inhabitants of Calcutta, in Town Hall, Assembled.

Gentlemen,—On the part of my colleagues in the Government, as well as on my own, I sincerely thank you for this testimony of your approbation of our proceedings, and for the obliging manner in which it is expressed; but highly as I prize your esteem, I will not underrate the character of this Address by regarding it as designed principally to convey a compliment. You have adopted this mode of giving authentic expression to public opinion, on a great question, in which the happiness of all India, it may be said of all the world, is concerned.

I rejoice to meet you on this ground, and to join my humble voice to yours, in favor of that measure, which will, I trust, in due course be consummated.

I need not to you defend a proposed Law which you cordially approve; but there may be some who are not satisfied, that it is either necessary or safe. I will, therefore, avail myself of this opportunity to state as briefly as possible the reasons by which it appears to me to be justified and recommended.

To all who doubt the expediency of the Liberty of the Press, I would say, that they have to shew that it must necessarily cause imminent peril to the public safety, such as would not exist without it, and cannot be averted by salutary Laws; for otherwise there can be no doubt, that freedom of public discussion, which is nothing more than the freedom of speaking aloud, is a right belonging to the people, which no Government has a right to withhold.

It also rests with them to shew, that the communication of knowledge is a curse and not a benefit, and that the essence of good Government is to cover the land with darkness; for otherwise it must be admitted to be one of the most imperative duties of a Government to confer the incalculable blessings of knowledge on the people, and by what means can this be done more effectually than by the unrestrained liberty of publication, and by the stimulus which it gives to the powers of the mind?

If their argument be, that the spread of knowledge may eventually be fatal to our rule in India, I close with them on that point, and maintain, that whatever may be the consequence, it is our duty to communicate the benefits of knowledge. If India could only be preserved as a part of the British Empire by keeping its inhabitants in a state of ignorance, our domination would be a curse to the country, and ought to cease.

But I see more ground for just apprehension in ignorance itself. I look to the increase of knowledge with a hope that it may strengthen our Empire; that it may remove prejudices, soften asperities, and substitute a rational conviction of the benefits of our Government; that it may unite the people and their rulers in sympathy; and that the differences which separate them may be gradually lessened, and ultimately annihilated. Whatever, however, be the will of Almighty Providence respecting the future Government of India, it is clearly our duty, as long as the charge be confided to our hands, to execute the trust, to the best of our ability, for the good of the people. The promotion of knowledge, of which the Liberty of the Press is one of the most efficient instruments, is manifestly an essential part of that duty. It cannot be, that we are permitted by divine authority to be here, merely to collect the revenues of the country, pay the establishments necessary to keep possession, and get into debt to supply the deficiency. We are doubtless here for higher purposes, one of which is to pour the enlightened knowledge and civilization, the arts and sciences of Europe over the land, and thereby improve the condition of the people. Nothing surely is more likely to conduce to these ends than the Liberty of the Press.

Those who object to it are further bound to shew that it is not salutary for the Government and its functionaries to have the check of a Free Press on their conduct, and that the exercise of arbitrary power over a restricted Press is preferable to the control of the Laws over a free one, assumptions which cannot be maintained.

The time was, when the Fredom of the Press was considered as intolerable for any class in India. That has passed away, and many now admit, that there is not much harm, and that there may be some good in granting it to Europeans, but still entertain apprehensions as to its injurious effects, if enjoyed by natives. I do not participate in those apprehensions, but of this I am sure, that to legislate in distrust of our native fellow subjects, or to legislate differently for them and for Europeans, in matters of right and liberty, would be extremely unwise and unjustifiable policy. The Press will always be under the safe-guard of Laws, and Laws can be made where Laws are wanting. The existence of a Local Legislature, which can at any time provide for the safety of the state, should it be endangered, has removed the only formidable bar which before opposed the complete liberty of the Press.

In addition to the motives, which must have existed on general principles for giving the fullest freedom, there were circumstances in the state of the Press in India, which rendered the measure now proposed almost unavoidable. The Press had been practically free for many years, including the whole period of the administration of the late Governor-General, Lord William Bentinck, and although Laws of restriction existed in Bengal, which gave aweful power to the Government, they had ceased to operate for any practical purpose. They were extremely odious. They gave to the Government arbitrary power, which British subjects in any part of the world detest. No Government could now have carried them into effect, without setting universal opinion at defiance. After the liberty given by Lord William Bentinck's forbearance, no Government could have ventured to enforce those Laws, unless it had been gifted with a most hardy insensibility to ridicule and obloquy. Even supposing them to be good, they were utterly useless, and as they brought unnecessary odium on the Government, it would have been absurd longer to retain them.

In speaking of those Laws, I cannot refrain from adverting to the individual, who having been at the head of the Government when they were passed, bears all the blame of being their author. He was one of the best and the purest and most benevolent of men that ever lived. In proposing those Laws, he must have been actuated, as he always was, by the most upright and conscientious motives. Had he been now alive, and at the head of this Government, he would probably have been among the foremost to propose the abolition of those Laws, which he formerly thought necessary, but would now have seen to be useless and odious. To what a degree popular feeling prevails against them cannot be more strikingly shewn, than by the detraction which they have brought on the memory of one, who was eminently deserving of all praise, distinguished by great talents and the most important public services; the soul of honor and virtue, admired, beloved, revered by all who knew him; but condemned by the public, who knew him not, solely on account of these Laws which they abhor.

In the Bengal and Agra presidencies, the question was, whether these Laws should be retained or abolished; Laws be it observed, too unpopular to be executed, which in practice had in every respect become obsolete. In the provinces subordinate to Bombay, there was the same question, but that was not the question in other parts of India. The question there was, shall such laws be introduced where they have not been known? Shall odious restrictions be imposed where there is already perfect freedom? Shall despotic power be substituted in the place of Law, or of liberty unrestrained even by Law? At Madras there was no Local Law, and there were no means of making any person responsible for what was published. At the presidency of Bombay there was a Law, already existing, as free as that now proposed for all India. At Madras and Bombay, to have made any Law, short of perfect freedom, would have been to impose restrictions which did not before exist. Such a course would surely have been wrong, and was certainly unnecessary. A Law was urgently required at Madras, where liberty existed without responsibility. We could not legislate partially on such a subject; and the result of our deliberations was, that what is now proposed was the safest and the best Law that could be devised. It gives perfect liberty, and all its subordinate provisions aim only at proper responsibility. Things could not remain as they were, and any Law of restriction would have been sad retrogression in legislation and totally opposed to the spirit of the age.

You have alluded most justly to the difficulties that beset the framing of a Law to restrain all excesses and injuries which may be committed by means of the Press. On this point, I fear, Legislation is set at defiance. We cannot apparently enjoy the Liberty of the Press without being exposed to its licentiousness. We must submit to the attendant evil for the sake of the predominant good. Although the boundary between liberty and licentiousness is perceptible enough in practice, it can hardly be defined by Law, without the danger of encroaching on useful liberty. The Laws of England have utterly failed to prevent the licentiousness of the Press, and yet perhaps could hardly be made more efficient without endangering its freedom. Much, therefore, necessarily depends on the good sense and good taste of those who wield the power which the Press confers. The worst enemies of the Press are such of its conductors as destroy its influence by prostituting its use for the gratification of base passions. When public measures are fully and freely discussed, and censured or approved, as may be, in a spirit of candor and justice, the influence of the Press must be great and beneficial. But when men find themselves the objects of gross personal scurrility, without any reference to public measures, or real character and conduct, they may at first feel pain, because, sensitive men, with benevolent dispositions towards all their fellow creatures, grieve to perceive that they have rancorous foes, busily employed against them, but lurking in concealment, the cause of whose enmity they know not, and whose wrath they have no power to appease; but they cannot respect the instrument of unjust virulence, they must know that such attacks proceed from personal hatred, or wanton malignity, and they must learn to despise calumny which cannot be guarded against by any goodness of measures or any correctness of conduct. The proper influence of the Press is thus destroyed; and ultimately just censure, which would otherwise be respected and dreaded, is disregarded and discredited, and being confounded with the mass of indiscriminate abuse, loses it due effect.

I entirely concur with you in the desire which you entertain, that if at any time actual danger to the state should render necessary, temporary or local restraints on the liberty of the Press, the precautions applied by the Legislature may be only commensurate to the real exigency, and that no restrictions may be made permanent beyond those which are necessary to ensure responsibility; and I trust that all legislation with a view to protect the community against licentiousness, will be in the true spirit of liberty.

I am sensible of your kindness in the wish which you have expressed, that I may remain in my present office long enough to take a part in passing the proposed measure into a Law. For two reasons I entertain the same wish. I am naturally desirous of having a share in the completion of a Law, which will, I trust, conduce to the welfare of India and mankind. I am also anxious to relieve the Governor-General elect from the responsibility of a measure regarding which long experience in India enables me to proceed without hesitation. On the other hand there is a consideration, which will more than reconcile me to the transfer of this duty to the hands of the distinguished nobleman appointed to this office. Fully believing that all the prepossessions of a British Statesman, and especially of one who has witnessed the inferiority of countries where the Press is enslaved, compared with his own, where it is free, must be in favor of the Liberty of the Press, I shall rejoice at his having an opportunity of commencing his administration with an Act, which will at once establish a good understanding and a cordial feeling between the head of the Government and the community over which he is to preside.

SPECIAL MEETING OF THE GOVERNORS OF THE NATIVE HOSPITAL,

HELD 20TH MAY, 1835.

The non-existence of any Institution, uniting the advantages of medical advice and of attention to the personal comforts of the native population of Calcutta and its suburbs, labouring under Fever, Dysentery, and other disorders incident to this country,—the sufferings and the immense loss of human life consequent upon those diseases, increased to a fearful height from the want of an Asylum of this nature near at hand, having been forcibly brought to the notice of the Governors of the Native Hospital, by the Surgeon of that Institution, the subject was by them deemed of so much importance, that a Special Meeting of their body was convened upon the 20th instant, for its consideration, at which the following Gentlemen were present:—

The Right Revd. the Lord Bishop of Calcutta.
The Hon'ble Sir E. Ryan, Chief Justice,
The Hon'ble Sir J. P. Grant,
C. W. Smith, R. Saunders,
C. R. Barwell, T. C. Robertson, and
B. Harding. S. Nicolson, Esquires, attended by Mr. Martin, Dr. A. R. Jackson, and Baboo Ramcomul Sein.

The Lord Bishop was voted into the Chair, when a printed report and some manuscript notes by Mr. Martin were laid before the meeting, along with corroborating letters from other practioners of this City, and series of practical observations by Baboo Ramcomul Sein. Mr. C. W. Smith then read the following remarks, and proposed the resolutions annexed to them, which, together with Mr. Martin's notes and the other letters and observations alluded to, having received full and deliberate attention at the time, are now appended for the information and consideration of the community at large, and in the fullest assurance that this attempt to add another most beneficial establishment to those which already distinguished this City, will be met with that liberality and benevolent feeling, which is so characteristic of the inhabitants of Calcutta, both European and Native.

MR. SMITH'S ADDRESS.

The purpose for which we have called the present meeting of the Governors, is to consider a proposition submitted and recommended by Mr. J. R. Martin, to add a Fever Hospital to our already existing Establishments.

In the following remarks I shall briefly shew, that the proposition in question is consistent and compatible with the immediate object of this Institution, is in itself an object, the attainment of which will confer great and important benefits on the Native population, but that it is also one which we cannot accomplish in a suitable manner, with reference to our funds, without having recourse, as in 1792, to an appeal, addressed to the community at large, in furtherence of it; and I shall conclude by suggesting some resolutions which, with every deference to this meeting, I would propose for adoption.

It has been suggested, then, by Mr. Martin, in his valuable paper on this subject, that with reference to our present establishments, we could not extend the benefits of this Institution, in a manner better suited to meet the exigencies of the Natives in this populous City, than by establishing a Fever Hospital in a centrical part of the Native Town.

It is the opinion of Mr. Martin, that such a Hospital is most urgently required, for the relief of the population, not only in times of unusual sickness, but even in ordinary seasons, and he gives it to us as the result of his personal inquiries and observation, that there is no other object in the nature of a public benefit which could be more useful or which could be more generally and gratefully acknowledged by the Natives.

In entertaining the present proposition, we are making use of our undoubted privilege as Governors.

We are vested with authority to appropriate the funds of the Institution in such manner as shall best secure the object of the Institution, which we learn from our Rules, is that of extending its benefits to persons requiring medical advice and assistance.

We are therefore called upon to give our mature consideration to the proposition of a Fever Hospital, and to decide whether it is or is not such an object as, with reference to our rules and other contingencies, should be adopted by us.

As the sole object of this Institution is to extend the benefits of medical advice and assistance to the community of this City, it is first necessary to inquire whether the establishment of a Fever Hospital embraces that object; and secondly, whether it is needed in addition to our present establishments, considered with reference to their local position, and extent to which their usefulness is circumscribed.

I believe it will be found that of all the catalogue of diseases in this fruitful clime, common Fever greatly outnumbers the whole put together, and is in itself the immediate cause, when neglected, of many others. I here speak under correction, but if I have approached the truth, little more need be said, tending to shew that the extension of medical aid and advice, to lessen the ravages of this prevalent source of illness and death, comes peculiarly within the province of our Institution.

I must not here omit to introduce Mr. Martin's opinion upon Fever. He says—"Fever is so universal with the Native, that until enlarged spleen, or bowel complaint (the Sequelæ to often repeated Fever) seizes him, he never thinks it necessary to apply for aid; and when he does, it is but to accelerate his fate: the compound of Arsenic and Spices, or the rude preparation of Mercury given by the Native Doctors is efficacious to rekindle the feeble remains of constitutional power, only to sink the more rapidly into death."

I will not stop to urge how desirable it is to have separate Fever Hospitals, and to keep the patients suffering from fever, apart and at a distance from other patients suffering from the effects of wounds and broken limbs, or under surgical operations, because this is a part of the subject which will better become, and be better handled by those of our body who are professionally conversant with such details, but I will hasten on to consider the subject as it is not recommended to us by its exigency, compared with the local position of our present establishments.

Upon referring to a Map of this City, it will be seen that it is a dense mass of native houses and huts, which, from the Native Hospital northward, occupies an area of some three miles in length, by a mile and a half in breadth; that within this space, large, indeed, when considered with reference to its population, we have not a single establishment, save and excepting that of Gurranhutta, which is by no means centrically placed, and even if it was, would be quite inadequate to its wants even in times of ordinary sickness. If such be the case, it must then be conceded that Mr. Martin has pointed out a field, to which the benefits of medical advice and assistance, which is the sole object of this Institution, have not yet been extended, and that practically considered, his proposition to erect a Fever Hospital in a centrical position, within the area above noticed, merits our best attention.

It now only remains that I should say a few words respecting our funds. From the accompanying statements drawn up by our Secretary, in reply to some queries I put to him, it will be observed that, after paying all expenses incurred by our existing establishments, the present available average monthly sum is only rupess, 229-1-9 or if the sum of sicca rupees 616, the average monthly sum hitherto disbursed for the Leper Asylum, which, under a recent vote of the Governors, will in all probability be soon an available additional sum, we shall then have a surplus unappropriated sum of about 850 rupees.

Considered with reference to the average expenses of the other establishments of this Institution, we may, I think, conclude that the above available sum will be sufficient to meet the monthly expenses of a Fever Hospital, provided we can obtain sufficient means to purchase ground and to erect suitable wards and buildings for a Fever Hospital.

In the accomplishment of such an object conducive to the health and comfort of thousands upon thousands of their suffering fellow countrymen, be assured the wealthy natives of this populous city will not be backward; to doubt this would imply an ignorance of the magnificent donations already on the records of this institution, and which grace the names of the Newaub Visier, of Rajah Buddenath Roy, Seebchunder, and Narsing Chunder Roy, and many others.

Nor can we entertain a doubt that the community, European as well as Native, whether of Calcutta, or of the Mofussil Towns and Cities, will all unite in the furtherance of an object, which holds out such abundant anticipations of usefulness, and which addresses itself so directly to the best sympathies of our nature.

In conclusion, I beg to submit the following resolutions, more with a view to place something tangible before the meeting than from any confidence that they will merit adoption.

1st. That, in the opinion of the Governors, the proposal to establish a Fever Hospital in a centrical part of the Native Town of Calcutta, is one of undoubted expediency.

2d. That the object is consistent in every respect with the objects of this Institution, which is to give medical advice and assistance to the utmost possible extent.

3d. That our present funds, with reference to the disbursements on account of existing establishments, do not give us the necessary available means to purchase ground and to build the projected Hospital.

4th. That, under such circumstances, it is highly necessary to solicit the contributions of all classes of the community.

5th. That a statement explanatory of the object now contemplated be drawn up, published in the English and Native Papers, and be circulated among the community, Native and European, in the City of Calcutta, and throughout the Towns and Stations in the interior.

6th. Resolved, that the following Gentlemen be appointed as a Sub-Committee, to give effect to the above resolutions, and to report, after the result of this appeal to the public shall have been ascertained, to the body of Governors for such further consideration as may then appear necessary.

Sir Edward Ryan, Lord Bishop of Calcutta, Sir J. P. Grant, C. W. Smith, Esq., Chairman; Baboo Ramcomul Sein, Baboo Rajchunder Doss, Baboo Radakaunt Deb, Mr. J. R. Martin, Dr. A. R. Jackson.

7th. That the resolutions of this day be communicated to Government.

C. W. Smith.

DR. MARTIN ON FEVER HOSPITALS.

The situation I hold at the Native Hospital, afforded me daily opportunities of witnessing on a large scale, the misery and death produced by the inundation of 1833, among the Native inhabitants of Calcutta and the surrounding country. Natives of respectability have assured me, that in the villages to the south and east of us, half the occupants of each house died of fever during that year:—some even went much beyond this estimate, but admitting both accounts to be exaggerated, the real amount of suffering must be admitted to have been terrible; and I am led to think, that the extent of the calamity is not generally known, and that, were it known, the active sympathies of Government, and of all classes of Europeans would be roused to prevent, or alleviate, if it could not prevent, the effects of similar calamities in future. I am of opinion, moreover, that a great deal could be done to secure the population, both European and Native, against a recurrence of so much suffering; and it was for the purpose of ascertaining the actual state of the town and suburbs, with a view to such preventive measures, that I committed to paper the result of several examinations of the localities in and about Calcutta.

The accompanying Memoranda contain a brief description of such of the defects observed, as more immediately presented themselves, and that demanded more immediate remedy: they have no other pretensions, and were printed only for my own convenience: they go chiefly to establish the general prevalence of fever amongst the natives, and to point out its apparent cause.

On the subject of establishing a Fever Hospital in a central part of the Native Town, I beg to offer a few observations; and without reference to extraordinary occurrences, such as that alluded to, or any unusual epidemic, I declare my belief, that such an Institution has become one of necessity to the Natives, and that I know of no other, the active benefits from which would be so generally felt, and so gratefully acknowledged, as a Fever Hospital.

Fever is so universal with the Native, that until enlarged spleen or bowel complaint (the sequelæ, too often repeated fever,) seizes him, he never thinks it necessary to apply for aid; and when he does, it is but to accelerate his fate. The Compound of Arsenic and Spices, or the rude preparation of Mercury, given by the Native Doctors, is efficacious to rekindle the feeble remains of constitutional power, only to sink the more rapidly in death.

As a commencement, I would propose, that the Fever Hospital be incorporated with the Dispensary at Gurranhutta, the existing establishment of which, with some additions, would be sufficient for the present duties, and until the demand becomes great.

With reference to the convenience of the Native population, I would suggest that a spacious house for the purpose be secured, in a more central position, than that now used for the Dispensary, say about Cotton-street or Machooa-bazaar.

Besides the advantage to the community of the proposed change of place, it would bring the Hospital so much nearer the Students of the Native Medical School, as greatly to facilitate their recourse to it; and that is a point of much consequence, as it is in an Hospital alone they can ever acquire the practical knowledge which can render them generally useful. Under any possible advantages, the Natives cannot be expected, for many years, to become bold or skilful Surgeons; and it is therefore on their practical knowledge of fever especially, its nature and treatment, as exhibited extensively within the walls of an Hospital, that a great deal of their usefulness must depend.

To promote the objects here but hinted at, subscriptions might be solicited from the wealthier Natives throughout the country, for they are in an especial manner bound to support such an establishment; and it is a mistake to suppose, that its charities would, any more than those of the Native Hospital are at present, be confined to the inhabitants of Calcutta; for in it we have persons daily from every portion of the presidency, from Cuttack to Loodianah; and the followers of the Sikh Embassy, who made frequent applications for relief, declared the benefits conferred by the Hospital, to be well known even in their distant country.

On the subject of the Leper's Asylum, I submit that, with reference to the objects and the original establishment of the Native Hospital, and the active nature of its charities ever since, such a plan of pure Medical Police as that of the Leper's Asylum, is not compatible with the purposes of the parent Institution, in which active relief and cure are daily aimed at; whereas, I have said, the other is only an establishment of Medical Police, limited to granting food, clothing and quarters—a cure being out of the question. Such an establishment is well for the Town of Calcutta to maintain, and I think it ought at once to be transferred to the Police Establishment, or such other mode as may appear best to the Governors. By this measure alone, a sum of 500 rupees per mensem, on an average, would at once be placed in the hands of the Governors.

On the contemplated improvements in the Town and suburbs, I have only to say that I shall feel much gratified if their importance has been made in any way apparent to the Governors, and if through any efforts of theirs, a remedy can be obtained for an evil that will otherwise certainly go on increasing.

Finally, I throw these matters on the better consideration of the Governors of the Native Hospital, through whose continued humane exertions with the authorities and the public, so great a benefit has already been secured to the poor as that exhibited by last year's returns of the Native Hospital and Dispensaries under their orders, viz. 2,48,684 persons; an amount of relief that could hardly have been anticipated by the most sanguine, when, in 1792, the Governors of the day first addressed the inhabitants of Calcutta "on the subject of instituting an Hospital for the relief of the Natives."

(Signed.) J. R. Martin.

NOTE ON THE MEDICAL TOPOGRAPHY OF CALCUTTA AND ITS SUBURBS, CHIEFLY WITH REFERENCE TO THE CONDITION OF THE NATIVE HEALTH.

---

"If we except a knowledge of the symptoms of diseases, and the powers of the remedies used to combat them, there is perhaps, no one species of information of greater importance to the medical practitioner than that which teaches the effects of climate, locality, and other external causes upon the health of man."

Dr. Hennen.

A knowledge of the external circumstances which influence the health of the inhabitants of any particular country, commonly designated Medical Topography, when practically considered, has for its object the prevention of disease, which in a large portion of cases, originates in external causes.

Of its great importance, therefore, there can be no question, and it has been found at all times to progress in exact accordance with the state of civilization in any given community: Malte-Brun, when speaking of the most temperate climates, declares' "that it is man himself who has in a great measure created these salubrious climates; France, Germany, and England, not more than twenty ages ago, resembled Canada, and Chinese Tartary, countries situated, as well as our Europe, at a mean distance between the equator and pole." Much as has undoubtedly been effected in the countries alluded to, through the suggestions of professional men, still more has been done by the common sense and observation of the public at large; and fortunately, it does not require a technical or professional education, to enable a person to prosecute Medical Topography, any more than quarantine regulation, with the greatest advantage to the public. So much has it been so on many important occasions, that Dr. Hennen, himself, the best writer on the subject that I am acquainted with, has complained that during the plague at Malta, "the trammels of medical theories" had perverted the better judgments of certain medical officers, and that their opinions had been "torture to the purposes of professional controversy" to the degree that, from all the evidence he could collect, he much preferred the plain common sense of Sir Thomas Maitland, the then Governor.* I think it is useful to point out this fact, as it ought to encourage the non-professional in the prosecution of so beneficial a subject; and to medical men it ought to teach the superior value of practical observation over theory —so often dignified with the name of science. On the other hand, I think that, in this country especially, there are few matters, next to the right treatment of disease, to which patient and observant medical officers can apply their minds with more beneficial effect to the State, or credit to themselves, than Medical Topography; and I am much mistaken if most stations, civil and military, throughout India, do not stand greatly in need of the practical application of a knowledge thus acquired.

If we accord in Sir Gilbert Blane's opinion, that all predominant diseases are referrable to the following general heads, viz. 1st. Vitiated exhalations and secretions of the human body. 2dly. Noxious exhalations of the earth, and 3dly. Depraved habits of life;—we shall at once see how much of public health, in the great matter of prevention of diseases, may be effected through a practical application of the Science of Medical Topography. The injury from human exhalations is removed simply by prevention of crowding, by exposure to sun and wind, cleanliness, &c.; and that from terrestrial exhalation, by draining, clearing, levelling, &c.

Having made these prefatory observations, I shall proceed briefly and free from technical language or theoretical discussion of any kind, to point out what I conceive may be done with ease and without serious cost, to improve the immediate locality of this City and its suburbs, chiefly with a view to ameliorate the condition of the Native health.

A detailed Medical Topography of Calcutta would comprehend a variety of subjects which I conceive foreign to the practical objects, to which I would limit myself in these Memoranda.—I shall therefore pass over the questions of position, boundary, sea, rivers and canals, temperature, climate, soil, levels, police, population, morals, &c. and proceed at once to the subject.

That it is in our power, by removing defects of locality, to remedy those of climate, and thereby conduce largely to the preservation of public health, need not again be insisted on. The history of every country and of a hundred cities speaks to the fact; and perhaps of none more than that of Calcutta, though its improvement has been so gradual as to escape notice.

Extended agricultural and other improvements produce remarkable influence on health in all parts of the world; but those in and about Calcutta have, with exception to the works belonging to Fort William, the Mahratta Ditch, and those effected by the Lottery Committee, been chiefly from the clearing and draining, preparatory to the construction of buildings, roads, &c., the result of private speculation and enterprise. But as all these sources of improvement have, for some time past, ceased to operate, and as they are not likely soon to revive, it is much to be feared that, without the aid of Government, this City will experience the gradual effects of neglect, and become as unhealthy as we know it to have been in former times. "It is only by constant efforts of industry that the salubrity of any spot is maintained: when these are relaxed, or when prosperity and civilization decline, the seeds of disease are immediately deposited in the earth."

It may be useful to look back for a moment to what Calcutta was in the earlier periods of its occupancy by Europeans; and from many accounts that might be cited, I have chosen the following from the travels of Captain Alexander Hamilton, who visited India between the year 1688 and 1733.

"One year I was there, and there were reckoned in August about twelve hundred English, some military, some servants of the Company, some private merchants residing in the town, and some seamen belonging to the shipping lying at the town, and before the beginning of January there were four hundred and sixty burials registered in the clerk's Books of Mortality."

This worse than Batavian condition, and frightful suffering, are ascribed by Captain Hamilton to the annual subsiding of the salt water lake; leaving its marshy banks covered with fish and exposed to a vertical sun. No doubt this had a most injurious effect; but the unimproved state of the grounds in and about the town—the marsh and rank vegetation, producing constant unwholesome exhalations, retained and accumulated in a humid atmosphere—these, too, had their full share. On the object of the choice of Calcutta as the site of the British "emporium," the same authority declares, that Mr. Job Charnock had no better reason for it, than its possessing "a large shady tree," (!!) and it is further added (truly enough) that "he could not have chosen a more unhealthy place on all the river."

In more recent times, it was the custom of the European inhabitants of Calcutta to meet on the 15th of December of each year to congratulate each other on their escape from the period so emphatically marked by Captain Hamilton; but though this is no longer considered necessary on account of the insalubrity of the place, still I think it will not be difficult to shew that we are far indeed from having effected for our "emporium" all that might, or ought to have been done for it. For many years to come, little more can be expected from that commercial and private enterprise to which Calcutta has hitherto owed so much; and it therefore becomes the more urgent on the part of a great and liberal Government, to take a lead in so humane and beneficial an undertaking.

That remittent and intermittent Fevers, with all their fatal consequences, prevail to an extraordinary extent in all parts of this city, and during every month of the year, but especially on the decline of the rains, any man may satisfy himself who will enquire as I have done, on the spot; and here I purposely omit the result of my observations of the Native Hospital, where, though it be more strictly a Surgical institution, the worst forms of fever, existing any where, are brought daily, and that generally in an advanced stage. I omit this, in order to speak to what I have seen on the spot, in the houses of the poorer Natives, where I have often gone to learn the fact of the existence of the Fevers in question, with their sequelæ of spleen, dropsy and bowel complaint. There is another fact connected with the last, which does not rest solely on the opinions of physicians, but is supported by the general observations of mankind, viz. that the Fevers in question arise from marsh and other exhalations.

It having been shewn then, what this locality once was, and what by neglect, it may again become, I proceed, in as brief a manner as possible, to point out the works which I consider as likely to improve and maintain its salubrity; and first, of the streets.

Whoever has visited before sun-rise the Native portion of the town with its narrow lanes, and "rankest compound of villainous smells that ever offended the nostril," will require no arguments in favor of widening the streets, so as to effect the two greatest improvements of all, as respects the salubrity of the city—free exposure to the sun, to rarify and elevate the vapours, and to the winds, to dilute and dissipate them.

* Before the publication of Dr. Hennen's work, the best account of the Medical Topography of the Mediterranean was that of Captain Smyth, of the Engineers.

It were easy to point out where clearing out masses of building, and widening and new-forming streets should be effected; but here I shall only indicate the necessity for these measures, in almost every part of the Native town: the details could easily be arranged afterwards. Where new streets are formed, they should be, as much as possible, in the direction of the prevailing winds. All streets should have raised pavements on each side, for foot passengers.

It is surprising how much the condition of the Native habitations has been neglected in this great city and its suburbs, in which are to be found all the faults of all the cities in India. It may not be very easy efficiently to interfere in this matter, and it may be very true that it is easier to find fault than to remedy the evil complained of; but in an affair of so much importance to the health of the inmates, something may and ought to be tried at least, if only in the way of municipal or police regulation.

While in Ava, I was forcibly struck with the superior mode of building amongst the Natives, which in point of airiness, elevation and mode of construction, constitute the best habitations for the poor I have ever seen in any country; and I have no doubt they contribute much to form the hale constitutions of the Natives as contrasted with other Asiatic races. There, every man is raised above the ground in proportion to his means, and even the poorer classes are three feet above it; while here, nine-tenths of the entire population sleep on the ground. Dr. McCulloch, in his account of the Hebrides, states that, while the inhabitants had no shelter but huts of the most simple construction, which afforded free passages to currents of air, they were not subject to fevers; but when, through the good intentions of the proprietors, such habitations were provided as seemed more comfortable and commodious, but which afforded recesses for stagnating air and impurities, febrile infection was generated.

In the event of a contagious disease (and there is no reason why such should not occur here,) the dense state of the Burra-Bazaar and surrounding parts, the want of facility for removing accumulations of filth, &c. would stand as insuperable bars to the best devised regulations of medical police. All masses of buildings should be opened out, old walls and decayed buildings removed; for these are fertile sources of fever, even under ordinary circumstances.

If it amount to a demonstration, as stated by a distinguished author, that "freedom from some of the most fatal scourges of the human race, and a gradual amelioration of health" can be traced to the "free exposure of the streets of London* to the sun and wind, a hard regular pavement, preserved clean by proper scavengers, the construction of common sewers and privies, and the advantages of a flowing stream," what amelioration of the public health may not be expected from similar measures in such a city as this, situated as it is within the tropic!

There is probably no subject, connected with the public comfort and health of a city of more consequence than the state of the sewers. Those of Calcutta throughout, I believe to be defective in number, construction, and fall, without which last, the most approved plan gives no real usefulness. The great sewers should be of solid masonry and arched over; and they should have lesser communicating sewers proceeding from every house, and their fall should be such as to admit of no arrest of their contents: such of the sewers as terminate in the river, should have their mouths at ordinary low water mark. Open sewers should, when practicable, be made in the direction of the prevailing winds, and wide, so as to admit of exposure to the sun and free ventilation.

As the river water during the greater part of the year is brackish, and unfit for general use, the chief supply for all classes of Natives is derived from tanks which, properly constructed, ought generally to contain wholesome water; but purity being an object of great importance, it is to be regreted that more attention has not been bestowed on the construction of these reservoirs. New tanks, on approved plans, should be dug at convenient distances throughout the Native Town, both for affording an ample supply of good water at all seasons, and as helping to carry off under-ground moisture: all half-dried tanks and pits should be carefully filled up. Bathing might be permitted in such tanks as are unfit for other use; but clothes-washing ought to be prohibited.

If the wealthier Natives must needs have tanks within their premises, the police should oblige their being kept clean; for at present, I am told, they are universally in a neglected and filthy state.

Wells should be encouraged throughout the Native Town. They are useful in draining under-courses, and though the majority be brackish, the water will yet be found available for domestic purposes and conducive to cleanliness. Artesian wells would be eminently useful.

Cesspools ought also to be encouraged in the Native quarters.

No burying-ground should be allowed to be in use near the Town, and the Native one off Lower Circular Road should be closed and brought into cultivation as soon as possible. I have known it complained of by persons residing in the neighbourhood.

No rice cultivation should be permitted close upon the Town, and all belts of bamboo ought to be cut down and rooted out.

All butcher's markets and slaughter houses should be removed to the outskirts of the Town, on the river bank, and be constructed on more approved principles than any now extant.

The Tiretta's bazaar does littlecredit to European state, whether as respects situation or cleanliness. The chief meat bazaars of this city should have a free water-course in every direction, and be paved with Chunar stone.

The duties of Police Surgeon ought to be extended to the strict supervision and periodical report on the state of the habitations, sewers, streets, roads, and tanks, &c.:—he should also report minutely on the state of the suburbs.

The conclusion I would draw from all that has been here said, as well as from my personal observations on the condition of the Natives residing in and about Calcutta is, that a Fever Hospital has become absolutely necessary, and that from the want of such an institution, thousands die annually within the city and its suburbs.

A Fever Hospital ought to be constructed in an open central part of the Native Town, well raised on arches and on the most approved principles of ventilation.

It should contain spacious wards for Hindoos and Mahomedans, with separate entrances to each, and separate offices and tanks.

Independently of the great benefit to the suffering Native community of such an Institution, it would form the best school of practice for the Native youth of the Medical profession.

Such an establishment, however, must, in the words of a former Governor of the Native Hospital, when urging its advancement, be assisted from "the Treasury of Government," and "I do not know that the public revenue can be applied to a better purpose than that of saving the lives of those who pay it."

P. S.—It must not be supposed that in what I have stated as necessary to be done within the Town, I have comprised all that may be requisite or conducive to the public health:—far from it, but as I set out with the intention of only calling attention to what appears most necessary, and may be attended with least expense, I have omitted many details.

The recent shock to mercantile credit will for some time prevent any great improvement being effected, as before, through private capital and enterprize; and from the Natives we cannot expect much until they are shewn the usefulness of public works; when, I am confident, they will do more than build ghats.

All I have said of the Native City applies to the inner suburbs called Kurbalah, Simlea, Mirzapore, Paritollah and Collingah, where defective drainage and half-dried tanks are every where to be found; but as details would occupy more space than such a sketch as this admits of, I proceed to notice the condition of the outer suburbs.

* "Dr. Caius, the most eminent physician in England at that period, states that the mortality of London from ague in 1558 was such that the living could hardly bury the dead."

PUBLIC MEETING TO ESTABLISH A FEVER HOSPITAL.

A meeting was held on the afternoon of the 18th June, (which was very fully attended) of those friendly to the establishment of this Institution. C. W. Smith, Esq., in the Chair. We have only time for a brief report of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN stated the purposes for which the meeting was assembled. He briefly explained the objects and advantages of the proposed Institution, and observed that when the subject was first agitated before the Governors of the Native Hospital, they had turned their attention to the state of the funds of that Institution—they found that the expenditure had greatly increased, and the surplus was so small that they decided that it would not do for them to interfere at all, and that a separate hospital was necessary. The success of the proposition for establishing such an Institution must depend on the natives themselves. They, the Europeans, were all ready to join them, but they were few and could effect very little. Let the natives then come forward to support this useful, he would add noble, Institution.

DWARKANAUTH TAGORE did not come there for the purpose of speaking merely, but he would offer a few words on the subject before the meeting. After the opinions of the highest medical authorities had been pronounced in favour of the necessity of the proposed Institution, it was needless for him to dwell on its value and importance to the natives. He was aware, indeed, that native prejudices opposed an obstacle to the success of the object, but these prejudices were giving way. The most wealthy natives, including his friend Rada Madub Bannerjee, were now in the habit of taking European medicines. Still some objections existed even among some of these as to medicines made up at the Dispensary although they objected not to those made up at the houses of the Doctors. Such prejudices were indeed giving way. True, some argued, oh! the people were well before the Europeans came here, why not do without them now?—but the fact was that some of the native remedies which were procurable in former days were not to be had now, and the people were dependent on the remedy of poison (arsenic and the poison of the snake, we believe the Baboo referred to) and the lower classes were in fact unable to get any remedy whatever. In short, if the natives did not come forward to support such an Institution as this, that would be a disgrace to them. He had heard it argued that government ought not to support such an Institution—why not? He thought the government ought to support such Institutions. A wealthy native, Rajnarrain Roy, had placed 20,000 rupees at the disposal of Government to do what they pleased with, could it be better applied than to the object proposed! He sincerely hoped natives would come forward, in fact he could not doubt it. If the Europeans subscribed, it must be a matter of humanity—but with the natives it was a point of duty. Baboo Dwarkanauth concluded by moving:—

"That a subscription be immediately opened for those gentlemen who may be inclined to contribute towards the proposed Institution."

SIR EDWARD RYAN was not aware until he saw the notification in the papers that there was to be a general meeting at the Town Hall. He was glad, however, to meet so large an assemblage. Referring to the opinions of the Committee and the medical authorities, Sir Edward observed, that the main question now was that of raising contributions for the proposed object. The funds of the Native Hospital were totally inadequate to any such purpose, for it would take a lakh of rupees to establish the Hospital. The views expressed by the Chair had been confirmed by the statements of Dwarkanauth Tagore, and friendly as he was to the object, and ready to support it, he certainly would not subscribe until the natives had set the example by a liberal contribution—until he saw the names of a large body of natives as subscribers to the proposed hospital. For Europeans to attempt to accomplish the object was out of the question. It was for the natives, and they had the means of raising this noble institution. That once done, Europeans, he was sure, would come forward to support it.

MR. R. D. MANGLES here asked whether any estimate had been made of the probable monthly expense.

SIR E. RYAN replied that it was was supposed the monthly cost of the Institution might be about 5 or 600 rupees.

MR. MANGLES suggested that wards should be established bearing the names of liberal donors. The Chairman observed that another suggestion which had been proposed was that there should be separate wards for Moosulmans and Hindoos.

The CHAIRMAN explained that it was intended to have a general meeting of the subscribers to the Native Hospital to report the result of the present meeting.

Sir EDWARD RYAN. That reminded him that he ought to explain, that after the Governors of the Native Hospital had ascertained the wishes of the meeting, and the intentions of the natives, they intended to submit the proposition to a meetting of subscribers, but where not in a condition to do so until they knew what the native gentlemen would do.

The LORD BISHOP addressed the meeting in a very characteristic speech, displaying the usual good feeling of the Reverend Prelate, and those occasional alternations between the conversational and the eloquent which mark at once the ease and power of the speaker and command the attention and interest the hearts of his audience. We fear we can convey but a feeble idea of this speech, certainly we cannot pretend to report the language of it, but merely the substance. The Reverend Prelate rose chiefly to join in the testimony borne to the utility of such an Institution as that proposed. He would just suggest to them that in every age and in every country, whatever had been the Institutions established, they must all yield in importance to those of the nature of that now submitted to their consideration, for without health of what value were other enjoyments. Of all the arts and sciences which aided, embellished and honoured human life, the medical science had made the most progress. His Lordship appealed to the members of the faculty whether of all the sciences any could be compared to medical science in respect to the progress it had made. Fever was the disorder most prevalent here. In England, which was a cold climate and where fevers were not so prevalent, they had separate Institutions for that disorder, with a view to secure the patients the benefit of better treatment, more comforts, freer ventilation, &c. In this country then where this disease was so much more prevalent, it was infinitely more important to meet this giant evil, to grasp and to crush it in so far as that was practicable under the blessings of the Almighty. They wanted to establish a Hospital and why should they not succeed? a good object would ever make its own way. He was greatly mistaken if the natives could withhold their aid when they understood the nature of the object. When it was in all the magnitude of its importance fully set before them, they could not refuse their support to this noble institution. He calculated—he relied on the natives. They would form an epoch in one's life—it would be delightful to recall the event, and to be able to say—"oh! yes I was there in Calcutta when we established that Hospital, we had a meeting at the Town Hall." All the medicines except those prescribed by the European physicians only killed the patients. How many he would ask that gentleman (Dr. Nicholson) died of that native poison which had been mentioned—well, he could not say, but the number must be infinite. The reverend prelate concluded by intimating that he gave his cordial support to the object of the meeting.

SIR EDWARD RYAN here suggested that a separate meeting of the natives should be held to consider the subject, and that they should send their report to the Committee of the Native Hospital; but the Chairman reminded Sir Edward that a proposition of Baboo Dwarkanauth's, seconded by Baboo Ram Comul Sein, for an immediate subscription had been carried.

SIR EDWARD RYAN then proposed that a Committee consisting of the following native gentlemen be organized to collect subscriptions:—

Radhamadub Bannerjee, Ramcomul Sen,
Russomy Dutt,
Rajkchunder Cowasjee,
Rajchunder Doss,
Aga Kurboli Mahomed, Moothooranauth Mullick,
Raja Rajnarain Roy,
Mahomed Mabady Murky, Muttyloll Seal,
Bissanauth Muttyloll, and Dwarkanauth Tagore.

Sir John Peter Grant then addressed the Meeting in a brief but eloquent speech, of which we can merely give a faint outline. He had one resolution to propose in addition to those which had been carried. He need not say any thing more in support of the utility of the proposed Institution. Every man who valued the health and welfare of the people must feel the importance of such an Institution, and the establishment of it could not fail to confer high reputation on all those natives who took a lead in promoting its success, and he hoped that a great number of them would come forward to support such an object. One thing was necessary to make the Institution fully useful, and that was to render the free access of all to it, compatible with the religious feelings of the natives. This was important, for many poor natives were prohibited by—he would not say their prejudices, but their religious feelings—feelings which were derived from their ancestors and imbibed in their infancy, and to which he (Sir J. P. Grant,) was therefore bound to pay the highest respect: he would therefore beg that a Committee of Native Gentlemen be appointed to co-operate with those who may be appointed to superintend the Institution. Sir John P. Grant then moved the following resolution, seconded, we believe, by Captain Birch:—

"That it be recommended to the Governors of the Native Hospital to provide for the appointment of a sufficient number of gentlemen, Hindoo and Mussulman subscribers to the Hospital, to superintend the internal management necessary to accommodate the institution to the religious feelings and habits of the native community."

Mr. Beardsmore addressed the natives in a very emphatic and feeling manner in behalf of the Institution. He spoke of his own experience of the disease and its fatal effects—he maintained that the object was not a matter of trifling but of the highest importance—and that if the preservation of the subject were really a legitimate object of interest the Government was bound to support the Native Hospital. He concluded by earnestly inviting the native friends to come forward with liberal contributions in support of the object of the Meeting.

Mr. Woollaston called attention to the unhealthy state of Scaldah, of which he cited several instances, and expressed his hope as the Hospital would be remote from that part of the suburbs that some provision would be made to give the natives of that quarter the benefit of it.

The Chairman explained that the Hospital was intended to embrace the suburbs and would be centrically situated, but that Mr. W.'s suggestion should not be lost sight of.

Subscription books were then circulated, and soon afterwards on the motion of Sir J. P. Grant, Mr. C. W. Smith left the Chair, which was taken by Sir Edward Ryan, who announced that the native gentlemen present had subscribed 15,000 rupees.

Sir J. P. Grant then proposed the thanks to the Chair, and in doing this begged to say that he did not mean to offer a mere customary or unmeaning compliment, he proposed the thanks of the Meeting to the Chairman for the zeal he had manifested in behalf of the object they were assembled to promote, for he felt they were highly obliged by that zeal. Mr. C. W. Smith expressed his sense of the flattering terms in which the thanks to him had been proposed and the Meeting dissolved.

MEDICAL RETIRING FUND.

A Meeting of the Committee of Management was held on Tuesday the 2d June (Mr. Surgeon A. Garden in the chair) when the following communication received from Mr. Curnin was read:

To H. S. Mercer, Esq.,

Secretary to Medical Retiring Fund.

Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, in which you inform me that you have the "entire approbation of the Governor-General to address me," to know the terms on which the Medical Service could be admitted to join in, and to participate in the advantages of a plan of a Retiring Fund in course of adoption by the Officers of the Indian Army.

I have also been addressed both verbally and officially by other members of the Medical service, whom, I believe, you do not represent; and in compliance with the desire so expressed through you and by them, I beg to submit the following to the consideration of the Officers of the Medical Profession in the service of the Honorable Company.

The plan a Retiring Fund devised for the officers of the Indian Army, derives its chief support from two sources—from the off-reckonings allowed to Colonels of Regiments; and from the donations of Officers on the attainment of superior rank. For the first source of supply the Medical service has, as I conceive, no adequate substitute: or the relinquishment of the superior pensions allowed to Superintending-Surgeons and to members of the Medical Boards will be found quite insufficient for this purpose. For the second, a substitute may be found in periodical donations: and, accordingly, if the Medical service of India should resolve to relinquish their present claims to superior pensions in consequence of being Superintending-Surgeons or Members of the Medical Board, I think the Honorable the Court of Directors might be disposed to sanction their having a retiring pension per annum of (Signed) JOHN CURNIN.

No. 67, Wellesley-Street, May 27, 1835.

Proposed by Mr. Bramley, seconded by Mr. Grant, and carried unanimously.

"The Committee of Management of the Medical Retiring Fund, acting for themselves, and as representatives of a large portion of the Medical service of Bengal, regret that they deem it incumbent to record their expression, of general disappointment at the scheme of the Retiring Fund proposed by Mr. Curnin."

Proposed by Dr. Jackson, seconded by Mr. Egerton, and carried unanimously.

"That considering specific applications from themselves and other Members of the Bengal Medical Service, were before Mr. Curnin, and so far as they are aware, none from Members of the Medical establishments of other Presidencies; the Committee of Management deem it inexpedient that their case should in any way be mixed up with those of other services, seeing that the Madras and Bombay Medical establishments have already independent Retiring Funds of their own in actual operation."

Proposed by Mr. Egerton, seconded by Mr. Corbyn, and carried unanimously.

"That, whatever may be the benefits to be expected from Mr. Curnin's scheme of a Retiring Fund, the Members of the Medical service have not the means of paying the contributions requisite to secure them, according to the rates now submitted to the management; and, even if, by great sacrifice the means could be raised by officers after 17 years' service, the Committee are unanimous in opinion that an annuity of £168, or thereabouts, is not worth the sum of 20,580 Rupees.

Resolved.—"That in consequence, of the reduction of two Superintending-Surgeons, the Committee of Management feel, that the bases of the calculations on which the Bengal Medical Retiring Fund was originally founded no longer exists; and they, therefore, recommend to the general body of subscribers; that for the present all payments on its account be suspended from the 31st ultimo."

MEETING OF THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

There was a Meeting of the Horticultural Society on the 10th June, at which two new Members were balloted for.

A letter was read from Mr. Bell, stating his ready acceptance of the invitation to act for Dr. Wallich as Secretary during the employment of the latter in the scientific expedition to Assam, for which he is preparing to start next month: According to a statement produced, the funds of the Society appeared to be in a very flourishing condition: Mr. Bell had collected arrears to the extent of 1754 Rs since the 18th ultimo, and the assets now amounted to 7500 Rs in Company's Paper and above 1100 Rs in cash.

A letter was read from the Private Secretary to the Governor of Madrass, intimating the desire of Sir Frederick Adam to promote the interests of the Society; that by his directions a set of queries had been circulated among the Collectors, to obtain the various information solicited by the Society; and that any person whom the Society might appoint for the purpose, should be permitted to search the public records at Madras. On the motion of Dr. Wallich, it was resolved, that the President should be requested to write a particular letter of thanks in acknowledgment of the obligation conferred upon the Society by Sir Frederick Adam.

A letter was read from Captain Wade, presenting to the Society a quantity of Seeds from Cashmere, and a work on Native Gardening, in Persian. Thanks were voted to Captain Wade for his valuable contributions.

One of the Committee appointed to report upon the Akra experiments, apologised for the delay which had occurred in preparing the Report. The papers, he said, were now with Mr. Willis, who found it necessary to refer to Mr. Deverinne, the late Superintendent of the Farm, who was now at Bauleah. It was accordingly determined that the papers should be sent to Mr. Deverinne as suggested.

The chief business of the Meeting was the presentation of a Report from the Committee, which had been appointed to examine certain suggestions of Lord William Bentinck, who, our readers will remember, recommended the introduction of a species of Brazil grass, the use of the large cart wheel of Madras, and the large Mysore breed of cattle, and attributed the degeneracy and poor condition of the Bengal cattle to a defective system of cropping. We subjoin a copy of this Report by which it will appear that his Lordship's well intended suggestions were rather the crude opinions of the moment, than the result of attentive observation. The Brazil grass (called capim at Rio de Janeiro) of which his Lordship did not recollect the name, there is some reason to believe is identical with the Guinea grass already known, though not sufficiently disseminated in this country. Mr. Minchin, as one of the Committee, represented that special thanks were due to Dr. Wallich for the trouble he had taken in collecting information from all quarters on the subject of their inquiries. Dr. Wallich expressed himself grateful for the compliment, but felt that he was only entitled to share it with his colleagues.

REPORT.

The Committee appointed by the Agricultural and Horticultural Society to consider and report upon certain suggestions made by Lord William Bentinck in his reply to the Society's Address, beg leave to submit the following result of their inquiries:—

In order to benefit by the best assistance procurable in their investigation, the Committee addressed themselves, in the first instance, to Lieut.-Col. Beatson, Commissary General, Capt. Parsons, Superintendent of the Hurriana Establishment, and Lieut.-Col. Skinner, at Hansi; from all of whom they have met with the most courteous and prompt compliance with their wishes. The correspondence which has taken place on this occasion, and which has in a great measure superseded the present report, was laid before the Society at their last Meeting,—with the exception of the reply from Lieut.-Col. Skinner, subsequently received, and which accompanies this statement.

It will be seen from the above documents that a series of experiments was instituted four years ago at Hissar on a scale of considerable extent, and under the most judicious management, with the view of introducing the large Mysore cattle and crossing it with that of our own provinces. The result was unsatisfactory as far as regards the prospect of an immediate or direct establishment of the Mysore breed in Western Hindustan; although it may perhaps not be unreasonable to expect, that a useful intermixture will be produced, at the 3d or 4th remove, by crossing it with our own cattle. In this manner the objects in view in those costly attempts may perhaps in time be partially accomplished.

With respect to the small breed of Bengal, the Committee think themselves warranted in speaking with an equal degree of confidence, not only in regard to the difficulty, if not impossibility, of introducing a larger species from our own Northern and Western provinces or from Mysore, but also as far as respects the doubtful result which would be produced, even if an attempt of this nature were to prove successful in the first instance. Every one must have witnessed the speedy deterioration which invariably followed the introduction into Lower Bengal of any sort of large sized cattle on occasions of public emergency, or for the sake of trial; and if individual instance have now and then succeeded, it must be borne in mind that private enterprize and exertions will sometimes accomplish that, which cannot be attained if attempted on a public and extensive scale. Hence it happens that we meet, occasionally, with fine specimens of foreign cattle yoked before gentlemen's carts in Calcutta, while whole herds of the same breed are seen to linger and decay in public establishments. But the Committee beg to repeat, that it appears to them very doubtful whether any such attempt, however successfully made, would be followed by any ultimate and permanent benefit. They are of opinion that the small Bengal breed is peculiarly well adapted for the climate, the roads, and the light but continuous and unceasing Agricultural labor, which designate this province. It is indeed a known fact, that this active though diminutive breed has been found of great use even beyond the limits of Bengal to the Westward, on occasions of long continued and harassing Ordnance Service. In expressing this opinion, however, the Committee would not be understood to affirm that the Bengal breed is unsusceptible of improvement; what they mean to say is simply, that the object is not to be accomplished by cross-breeding, but by a more judicious and compassionate treatment of this indefatigable little animal, and above all, the use of some more suitable and nutritious sorts of fodder than the paddy straw affords;—one of the salutary consequences which would follow the introduction of that admirable rotation of crops, which is in full force from the Himalaya to Cape Comorin. The Committee are of opinion that much permanent good would be effected in this respect were the Society to import and distribute gratuitously large quantities of seeds of Grasses (for instance—Guinea Grass) and other articles of fodder.

The Committee beg to observe that the experiments to which the highly interesting and instructive communications now before the Society refer, though the most recent and in one respect the most comprehensive, are by no means the only trials that have been made either on the public account or by private enterprize. In the years 1814-15 an experiment was conducted by the Stud Department; and not less than a half a century ago a great number of experiments were made under the superintendence of a Mr. Mallet, directed generally to the improvement of the Agriculture of this country. The result of all those undertakings was unfavourable owing chiefly, the Committee feel disposed to think, to the fallacy of all theoretical speculations in matters of this nature, and to the striking contrast which exhibits itself between the facility with which improvements may be suggested in the husbandry of any given country, and the extreme difficulty of carrying such improvements into effect, except under circumstances of great skill, judgment and perseverance, aided by sound local experience.

With reference to the other branch of their inquiries, namely, the proposed introduction of the high-wheeled cart of the Madras Presidency, the Committee are of opinion that the present light cart of Bengal is suited to the size of the Cattle, and that unless a larger description of Bullocks is used for draught, the introduction of a higher wheel would not be feasible. The extreme poverty of that class who gain a livelihood by hiring carts, cannot afford the introduction of Iron axles, which appears to be all that is wanted to make the present very light cart in all respects suited to the Cattle and Roads of Lower Bengal. The Committee have nevertheless taken measures to procure patterns of the Madras cart-wheel and axle-tree, which will be submitted to the Society as soon as they are received.

INSOLVENT ESTATES.—MEETING AT THE EXCHANGE.

There was a meeting on the 22d June at the Exchange, at ten o'clock, pursuant to advertisement, of the creditors of Fergusson and Co. and Cruttenden and Co., to consider the expediency of petitioning the Insolvent Court, on the subject of the assignees' management of the indigoes, and other property belonging to the estate.

At the commencement some difficulty was experienced in obtaining a chairman. Mr. Turton proposed Mr. Willis, that gentleman, however, declined, he being a requisitionist, and perhaps he might have some remarks to offer to the meeting. Mr. Turton thought that a gentleman presiding at the meeting would not be prevented from offering any opinion he might wish to express; but Mr. Willis thought otherwise, and proposed Mr. Dick, who also declined, and proposed Mr. Bagshaw.

Mr. Bagshaw had a very great objection to occupy the chair, inasmuch as he was one of the parties who had signed the requisition. Perhaps, however, Mr. Turton, who he was sure had come to the meeting with an intention of being very impartial, would not object to preside on this occasion. (Laughter.)

At last Mr. J. Robison was voted in the chair, and the requisition having been read,

Mr. E. Macnaghten rose and spoke as follows.—I have attended this meeting because I consider it respectful to the creditors and the requisitionists to do so, and also because my non-attendance might have been attributed to reasons which do not obtain; but before I enter on any subject which may come before this meeting, I should wish to be informed by Mr. Bagshaw, who I believe has taken an active part in this proceeding, whether, putting aside the shipment of indigo, there is any other part of my management of the estate of Fergusson and Co. to which he has an objection?

Mr. Bagshaw, in reply said, at the time the question regarding the shipment of indigo was first agitated, he conceived it his duty to call on the assignee, and to state the objections which he felt to the measure, and which he knew existed on the minds of others. He begged most unquallifiedly to state, that as far as he was concerned in the calling of this meeting, he came before it solely for the purpose of obtaining its opinion on the expediency of the indigo shipment, for he thought the estate could not have been placed in better hands than those of Mr. Macnaghten; and further, that a debt of gratitude was due from the creditors to that gentleman for the extraordinary exertions he had made towards bringing the estate to a close. But with regard to the shipment of indigo, he believed he was wrong; nevertheless if a considerable number of the creditors did not bear him out in that opinion he would not go into the Court alone.

Mr. Macnaghten. If this is the opinion of the other requisitionists as well as that of Mr. Bagshaw, then he must say that the requisition was injuriously and improperly worded, as it was distinctly stated that the creditors were not only dissatisfied with the management of the indigoes, but also with the management of other property. However, before he proceeded further, he would say that he considered the calling together this meeting perfectly unnecessay; and though he was at all times ready to receive the suggestions of creditors, he wished it to be understood, that he would not resign his own judgment to theirs, or receive instructions regarding the management of the estate from any other quarter but the Insolvent Court. As to the shipment of indigo; he had acted on his own judgment and the best advice he could obtain. It was true he had not consulted the requisitionists, but the reason which had guided him was, that he thought on this question they were interested parties, and not able to view it in all its bearings. They are a few whose interests were opposed to those of the many, and who are employed by parties in England to purchase indigo in this market, and of course, it was their duty to purchase it at as low a price as they were able. He had heard it said that parties being so situated might not be prevented from doing their best for the estate and for their constituents also; but he considered the remark arrant nonsense, for it was impossible to do their best for two interests which were completely opposed to each other. In conclusion, he candidly informed the meeting that he would receive no instructions from them, and whatever opinion they might think proper to form, it should not influence his conduct.

Mr. Charles Deane, with reference to what had been urged by Mr. Macnaghten that the requisitionists were interested in the sale of indigo, reminded the meeting, that if they were so, it was also their interest to get it out of this market as soon as they can, and rather to advocate than oppose the shipment before the new crop came into the market. He also took the liberty to deny that all of the requisitionists were interested in the sale of indigo.

Mr. B. Harding after a few introductory remarks, proposed the following resolution:—

"That the shipment and consignment for sale in a distant market of property forming the assets of an Insolvent Estate, is an abuse of the discretion vested in the assignees, and calculated to defeat the object of safe and speedy realization and division among the creditors."

Mr. Turton.—He would offer a very few words to the meeting, not in his capacity of advocate, though some one had heard such was his intention. He was sorry to say that he did not appear in that capacity at present, but hoped as the meeting had so often heard him as an advocate, they would now listen to him with as much patience in another character. His friend, Mr. Harding, who knew what was for his own interest as well as any man that flourishes in this world, had brought forward a resolution in which he thought that interest was not altogether lost sight of. He meant no disrespect to Mr. Harding or to the gentlemen who acted with him, but he would ask the meeting whether the requisition was not composed of two parties, one of whom were the growers of indigo who had sent shipments home, and the other buyers of indigo, and tolerably well interested in lowering the price for the sake of their own interests, or those of their constituents? He would, however, put it to the meeting whether the assignees were not adopting a prudent measure with a stock of indigo of 12,000 mds. at a time of the year when generally there were but 2,000 mds. in Calcutta, when foreigners were out of the market, and when there was no competition to be expected but from the requisitionists? At a time too, when it was expected there would be a crop infinitely larger than there had been for some time before, when the stock in the London market was less 6000 mds. than in the preceding year, and when no objections were raised except, suddenly, from those whose interest it was rather to depress the market than seek to keep up the price? Mr. Macnaghten had made a manly straight-forward defence, such as might be expected to come from his lips; and it was not to be expected that in shaping his course he could please two parties, those who are now anxious to purchase indigo cheap, and those who had sent Indigo home, and who in the expectation of a large crop from the approaching season, would wish to keep 12,000 maunds in this market. He would say nothing as to the general conduct of the assignees, but in this instance, though he was confident they had acted with the best intention of serving the estate, he thought they had overstocked the market. But, having done so, are they to sell the indigo at any price that may be offered, or with almost the certainty of a large crop are they to keep it in this market, thus committing a second error because they have committed a first? The meeting would remember that the assignees were paid by a commission, and that if they had studied their own interests rather than those of the creditors, they would have endeavoured to make a dividend six months ago, at any sacrifice, for it is their interest to get rid of a large establishment, and put the commission into their pockets as fast as they can. He acknowledged that the assignees had committed an error, but even if they had, on the contrary, thrown so large a quantity as 12,000 mds. into the market, he would appeal to his friend Ezekiel, who stood opposite, whether the effect would not have been to depress the prices. Of course the speculators would not endeavour to force a large quantity into the market, and under those circumstances he was perfectly satisfied that the best thing that could be done for the creditors was to ship the indigo, though, perhaps, the purposes of the requisitionists might be answered by the adoption of a resolution which he had some intention of proposing and which he would now read:—

'Resolved, that the retaining 12,000 maunds of indigo in the market here, with the expectation of a large coming crop, whilst all foreigners were out of the market, is a course admirably adapted to promote the interests of the requisitionists as speculators in indigo.' (Laughter.)

This resolution, he thought, at all events, would meet with the favor of Mr. Bagshaw; and he had some thoughts of proposing it as an amendment to that proposed by Mr. Harding. However, he would now meet the latter with a direct negative, leaving the requisitionists to apply to the Insolvent Court, for if the assignees have come to a wrong conclusion, it is there only where it can be discussed, with assistance on either side, and without the appearance of favor or self-interest.

Mr. Bagshaw.—Mr. Turton has assumed that it is the interest of the grower to get the indigo out of the market as soon as possible. But he disagreed with the learned gentleman, and thought that if the indigo went home and was forced on the market at an unusual period, or if there was any expectation it would be so forced, the effect would be to depress that market, rather than of affording any relief to this; and the effect that will be anticipated here, would, he thought, tend to reduce prices lower when the ensuing crop comes in, than were the whole to remain in this market to be added to it. Mr. Turton had said that there are no buyers in this market, (Mr. Turton expressed his dissent). There are, however, great numbers of small buyers in this market, namely, the Americans, French and Arabs, who are always on the alert to purchase our principal staple, together with a numerous host of English speculators who are ever ready to buy an article, which, in their judgment will find a market and give them a consignment and a current exchange. Mr. Turton had stated that the assignees' interests were better consulted by making a speedy dividend and not shipping this indigo. But that was an argument which cut both ways (Mr. Turton, I know it does,) for it must be borne in mind that the assignee, if a mercantile man, has the opportunity of employing his shipping patronage in the shape of insurance, and the opportunity of making a valuable connection with the house at home.

Mr. B. Harding thought he was entitled to say a few words with reference to what had fallen from Mr. Turton, and he was sorry that gentleman had so far departed from the matter before the meeting as to enter into a discussion of the motives of those who called it. The resolution he had proposed for the adoption of the meeting, was formed not on the motives of the assignees, but on the irregularity, and perhaps, the illegality of their proceeding, but of that he would not speak further than to say that it appeared to him an improper course for an assignee to take which put the property of the estate out of the jurisdiction of the Court. (Hear.) Mr. Turton had admitted that the assignees had committed a very great mistake in not selling the indigo when prices were higher than they are at present: let them not commit another mistake by preferring a remote contingency to the immediate profit which this market will afford. The learned gentleman had also alluded to the suddenness of this disapproval of the assignees' intentions; but that suddenness altogether arose out of the suddenness with which those intentions had been communicated. It was therefore not the creditor's fault that they had not given a more timely notice; they were not desirous that the indigo should be sacrificed in this market, but they would prefer that it should remain in this country for six or for twelve months rather than it should be placed in hands on whom it was reported advances had been drawn, and whose interest it was to realize as early as possible and at any price. Mr. Turton had also fallen into a mistake, which indeed was excusable in the learned gentleman, regarding the advantages which would accrue from the shipping of the indigo in the face of a large coming crop; and as a commercial man he would say it was an inexpedient measure, for in all probability, two months before the indigo would arrive at home, the market would be depressed with all sorts of vague reports, regarding the extent of the crop. He thought Mr. Turton had been a little too hasty in his remarks regarding motives, and that the requisitionists had quite as much claim to the merit of disinterestedness as the learned gentleman. The whole brunt, if he might use the expression, or pith of his remarks, had been as to the motives of the requisitionists. Possibly, Mr. Turton might be a claimant to a large amount on both estates, but though he, Mr. H., was a mercantile man, he was interested as the representative of claimants, and he considered himself bound to come forward and endeavour to put a stop to an arrangement which he thought injurious and unnecessary.

Mr. Turton, in explanation, declared that he had no intention of imputing any unworthy motive or improper intention to the requisitionists; but he did say that they were interested one way and the assignee another. He was quite ready to submit to Mr. Harding's judgment in mercantile matters, that is, supposing Mr. Harding neither a bull nor a bear, but it was rather too much to expect that he could suppose that gentleman perfectly unbiassed in his views on this question. With regard to the sale here or the shipment of the indigo, Mr. Harding's judgment might be correct; but he, Mr. Turton, was quite satisfied that it was best to separate a large quantity of indigo, sending it to two markets, rather than to overburthen one.

The resolution was now put and the chairman declared it to be negatived, but this not being the general opinion, the resolution was again put to the meeting, when the numbers, twenty-six, appeared equal, and the chairman declined to vote. Considerable discussion followed, and, it was suggested that the names of each party should be taken. This suggestion, however, was not adopted, and after some conversation,

Mr. Turton said, as this resolution had been disposed of, and as Mr. Macnaghten had declared his intention not to be governed by the decision of the majority, it could not be supposed that he would be governed by the opinion of an equality. He therefore moved an adjournment.

Captain Vint seconded the resolution.

Some conversation arose here, and we believe the motion was put and negatived, when

Mr. Macnaghten expressed his intention of adjourning, and quitted the room accordingly.

Mr. Dick was not satisfied with the decision. He thought if the names had been written down there would have been a majority in favor of the resolution. There had been some demur to that mode of proceeding, but if it had so happened that the 'Noes' had it, there would have been no demur whatever.

Mr. Turton freely confessed that if it had been decided in favor of the 'Noes,' he would have raised no objection. (Laughter.) But, however, as it was, the creditors were not prevented from stating their case to the Insolvent Court.

A Creditor thought the best plan was to go to the Court at once.

Mr. Turton was sure that the best plan he could pursue, was to go to the Court at once; and as it was eleven o'clock, he would carry that plan into immediate execution. (Laughter.)

Mr. Bagshaw after a few prefatory remarks, moved the folowing resolution:

"That it is for the interest of the creditor to resist such speculative dealings with the assets of the estate, and that an application be made to the Insolvent Court to restrain the shipment."

Mr. Wills briefly seconded the resolution, and after a few words from Mr. Arbuthnot, who suggested that the words 'until the market be more fairly tried,' the resolution as it originally stood was put and carried nem. con.

Thanks were then voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated.—Englishman.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a meeting of the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta, held at the Asiatic Society's apartments, June 6, 1835.

A. M. Mackenzie Minto, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, proposed at last meeting, was elected a member of the Society.

The following communications on miscellaneous subjects were then read:—

A letter from G. King, Esq., Surgeon, 56th N. I., requesting that his name might be withdrawn from the list of members of the Society, which was accordingly done.

A letter from James Prinsep, Esq., returning thanks on account of the Asiatic Society for part II. Vol. 7., of the Society's Transactions.

A note from J. Ochterlony, Esq., superintendent of the Herald Press, Madras, stating that he would have great pleasure in compliance with the Society's request, in causing their proceedings to be republished in the paper under his control.

An extract of a letter from S. M. Griffiths, Esq., dated June 2, 1834, descriptive of an operation practised in Tehran, and its vicinity, for the cure of opacity of the cornea.

The object of the operation seems to be completely to cut off vascular communication, by the excision of a circular portion of the conjunctiva, at a small distance from the margin of the cornea. This is accomplished by fixing eight small hooks in the conjunctiva, about a line from the union of the cornea, with the sclerotica, quite round the cornea.

The operator then raises that part of the conjunctiva, by pulling the hooks towards him, and afterwards with a pair of scissors cuts off the portion raised, thus completely insulating the conjunctiva covering the cornea. The result is the gradual absorption of the opacity of the part affected, and that the cornea recovers its transparency.

The after treatment is very simple, consisting merely in the introduction of a small quantity of antimony between the eyelids.

The following works were presented for the library:—
Three different pamphlets containing accounts of various late improvements in the Microscope, by William Griffith, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Madras Service.

The following original communications were presented at the meeting.

The three last communications were presented by the Medical Board.

The following papers were then read and discussed, viz.

Cases of Gastro-Enteritis, with observations, by William Twining, Esq.

Cases in which Magnetism and Galvanism were had recourse to, with apparent advantage, by Robert Tytler, Esq., M. D.

Mr. Twining's paper on Gastro-Enteritis claims the attention of the profession, to a most extensive range of disease, whose predominant local affection is seated in the mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines, one or other of which portions of the intestinal, is found to be the part most frequently affected during the course of many acute as well as chronic affections. Andral has asserted, that in every ten cases of acute disease there are about eight in which the structure or functions of the alimentary canal suffer from some derangement, and that in chronic disease of every description, there are very few, in which the structure of the mucous membrane of the digestive apparatus does not undergo some alteration. When we refer to the vast number of symptoms denominated dyspeptic, which depend on the existence of acute inflamation of the stomach, or upper portion of the intestinal canal, more or less acute in its nature, and varying in the extent of the part affected; and when we add to these maladies, those colliquative diarrhæas and other affections, which often attend the ulterior stages of phthisis pulmonalis, and of hepatic suppuration, as well as the alvine profluvia attendant on the conclusion of incurable affections of the spleen and some modifications of diseased mesenteric glands, it will at once be apparent, that he must have to treat gastro-enteritis, or some of its consequences, at some stage of a very great proportion of the diseases, which affected the human frame. When Hunter denominated the region of the stomach, and the adjacent solar plexus, the centre of sympathy of the human system in health, we cannot hesitate in admitting the necessity of paying due attention to the same part, when affected by disease. It will be evident, that a subject so extensive, and so important in all its relations, is beyond the compass of an essay adapted to one evening's discussion, therefore the author has chosen on this occasion, to call the attention of the Society, to some varieties of Gastro-Enteritis, remarkable at once for the obscurity of their symptoms, and the intensity of the febrile affection, which proves fatal. He has also shown, that it it is probable, that an inflamatory affection of the stomach may sometimes be excited by the use of the sulphate of quinine in some febrile affections. Three cases only are introduced in this essay,—the first of which was a tall and thin man, 29 years of age, and 5 years in Bengal. He had an attack of dysenteric purging on the 24th November, attended with slight pyrexia and cerebral affection, which symptoms were reduced by bleeding from the arm, and the repeated application of leeches, and the usual treatment for dysentery. In the beginning of December there was a daily febrile exacerbation, for which sulphate of quinine was administered, but without much effect on the fever, therefore leeches were repeatedly applied to the belly, and calomel was administered till the mouth became sore, and the distinct febrile exacerbations ceased. Still he remained weak and despondent, the tongue became dry and covered with a tan-colored fur, which continued, although the alvine secretions were much improved. There was no morbid heat of skin, or paternural frequency or force of the arterial action, he neither complained of pain nor uneasiness of any sort, and died on the 12th of December, 1833. On dissection, extensive inflammation of the stomach was found extending through all its coats. In the second case, the patient was 26 years of age and the disease commenced as ardent fever on the 27th September, 1834. There was no rigour, and at first cerebral symptoms were predominant. The pyrexia was subdued by active antiphlogistic treatment, and after the cerebral symptoms had abated some tension of the muscles of the belly, and morbid sensibility of the epigrastric region were observed, leeches, mild aperients, and antimoniats, removed these complaints; and when he was free from fever, but weak, some sulphate of quinine was ordered, and on the next day he had a return of dyrexia, with despondency, the tongue became of a morbid red colour, its centre was dry, brown, and hard, and the edges moist, red, and raw, or excoriated. A mild antiphlogistic treatment was again resorted to with benefit. This man ultimately recovered; but when his convalescence was far advanced, he had a distinct attack of hepatic congression, with pain in the right shoulder, as well as palpable enlargement, and morbid sensibility of the right lobe of the liver.

The third case had also commenced as fever, attended with vomiting and followed by constination, the patient was 30 years of age, a sailor of large frame, but extremely emaciated when he came under treatment on the 21st February, 1835. The muscles of the abdomen were then tense, and the belly flat and retracted, there was a tendency to constipation, but very small doses of medicine purged him violently, and obstruction recurred immediately afterwards, the tongue was glutinous, but not much loaded with mucous, and although moist, its substance was hard, and its shape pointed. This man's disease was of six weeks' duration—no remedies were of any avail in this case, and the patient died four days after he came under treatment. On inspection, there was morbid vascularity of the stomach, the small intestines were contracted, and their coats thickened, there was also an extreme dégree of inflammation of the mucous membrane of the great intestines. In two of these cases, the symptoms more distinctly referrible to gastro-enteritis, arose soon after the administration of the sulphate of quinine. In each of the three, we find a different state of the tongue was remarkable, and the consideration of the particular state of the tongue in reference to the ascertained seat of the predominant local affection is interesting.

The first case in which Dr. Tytler had recourse to magnetism was that of a Mussulman between 30 and 40 years of age. He was affected with violent acute pain in the muscless of the back and loins. Three shocks in rapid succession, from the magnetic wheel, were passed from the loins to the upper part of the back; the patient decleared himself relieved, and the pain has not returned. The second case was that of an East Indian woman, about 30 years of age. She had been for several years affected with a paralysis of the thumb and fingers of the right hand. Shocks from the magnetic wheel were adminstered for a month, the stream being directed from the front of the biceps muscle to the wrist. She likewise twice or thrice received galvanic shocks, she can now sew and comb her hair, which she was incapable of doing when the magnetism was first had recourse to. The third case was that of a native writer affected with deafness. He received shocks from the magnetic wheel three timesa week, for about a fortnight. He likewise had one or two galvanic shocks. The hearing of the right ear, which was quite gone, is now in some degree restored, and he declares the ear to have become burrah hulkuh, that is, much lightened or relieved. The above Dr. Tytler believes are the first cases which have been treated by galvanism in India.

To the above cases Dr. Tytler subjoins an account of two experiments in electro-dynamics performed by him. In the first, Dr. Tytler states, that a charge of galvanism from a compound trough, containg fifty plates of zinc and copper, and capable of giving a powerful shock to the human body, only moves the galvonometer a few degrees; whereas a small cylindrical trough, containing only two copper plates, and one of zinc, or a simple trough, moves the galvonometer many degrees, and is yet incapable of communicating a powerful shock to the human body.

In Dr. Tytler's second experiment, a small quantity of sulphuric acid being placed in a glass vessel, two copper wires were immersed in the acid, and connected with the galvonometer, no effect was produced in the needle: but on adding water, so as to raise the temperature of the mixture, the magnetic needle instantly deflected three or four degrees. A piece of chalk was then added to the diluted sulphuric acid; with the commencement of the affervescence, the needle deflected nearly 45 degrees. On removal of the wires, the needle resumed its position, and again deflected, when the communication was restored. By this experiment Dr. Tytler considers the identity of the chemical action produced by an acid and an earth with magnetism to be fully established.

To Dr. Tytler's communication is annexed an attestation from Mr. Assistant-Surgeon T. Russel, that the two experiments related were performed or repeated in his presence, and likewise that he had seen Dr. Tytler apply galvanic shocks to rheumatic patients in the Regimental Hospital apparently with much benefit.

SUPREME COURT.

Tuesday, June 23, 1835.

R. C. Jenkins v. Alexander Fraser and others.

This was a case upon an Insurance Policy on the steam vessel Forbes, on a voyage to Suez and back in the year 1834. Mr. Grant opened the pleadings, Mr. Turton stated the case.

The circumstances of this case were the Steam Committee were bound to insure this vessel on her then projected voyage to Suez to the extent of two lakhs of rupees apportioned in manner following: sixty-five thousand rupees upon the block and one lakh and thirty-five thousand rupees upon the steam engine and locomotive machinery: the voyage ensured was to Socotra and Suez and back, with liberty to touch at all intermediate ports. Before effecting the policy, the Committee sent round circulars to the different Insurance offices relative to terms of Insurance, and five of them agreed to take the risk—defendant subscribed the policy for thirty-three thousand one hundred and fifty. The term of the insurance was for six months certain from noon on the 1st of April till the noon on the 1st of October following, with liberty to touch at the intermediate ports. The question was whether the loss and damage which the vessel had sustained during the voyage were occasioned by such perils of the sea as were legally included in the terms of the policy. It will be substantiated by evidence that such loss and damage could not have happened at anchor, could not have happened except at sea, nor could by any possible means have been occasioned by causes to which the sea was not contributory. The vessel sailed from the port of Calcutta and arrived in Madras roads, when it was discovered that a large quantity of salt had accumulated in the narrow parts of the boiler which had occasioned its bursting. This was caused, as far as it could in the opinion of the competent be ascertained, by a want of effectual blowing off, as it was termed, a process by which the hardening of the salt in the narrow parts of the boiler which were exposed to the fire, was prevented. She was obliged to come back in consequence of this accident. The insurers first find out that there was no loss of freight; that there was an informality in the policy, and they referred the question to an august assembly, a self-constituted tribunal denominated the Chamber of Commerce, who determined that there was no loss of freight although she was laid up four months idle, and sixteen thousand rupees was the loss consequent upon her non-employment.

The first ground upon which the present claim is attempted to be resisted is that the Engineer was guilty of negligence—that his negligence was the cause of the damage, and for that loss his employers, and not the Underwriters, are liable. I contend that it has been finally and satisfactorily determined that the Underwriters are responsible for the Captain and the crew, and for their negligence in respect to the ship; and by a parity of reasoning, if the engines are insured, the Underwriters are responsible for the party who takes care of them. I will shew that from character and the knowledge of competent persons, a better man than Mr. Daius could not have been found to take charge of the machinery—I will prove the same with regard to the other Engineers—but another and chief ground of defence relied upon the recent discovery of the defective and un-seaworthy state of the machinery. If the opinion as to the sea-worthiness is to be decided by what appeared when she was examined on her return, I am ready to admit that her machinery was defective. But if evidence drawn from such subsequent appearance be offered, I will shew that Messrs. Jessop and Co. had reported previous to her departure as to the perfect soundness and competency of her machinery and that her boiler in the thinnest part was one-sixteenth of an inch. Now in a report to the House of Commons on the subject of Mr. Gurney's invention, it was stated that in the machine there described the boiler was one-eighth of an inch, and the pressure was 400 pounds upon every square inch. In the boiler of the Forbes the thickness was 4-sixteenths of an inch and the pressure was 3 pounds on every square inch. Mr. Seppings had surveyed the whole machinery in question and had pronounced it excellent—that it was made by Bolton and Watt after the plan adopted in his Majesty's Navy—that the vessel was built of teak and saul, was copper fastened and exhibited no sign of weakness. In 1833, however, not satisfied with this, she was repaired under the superintendence of Captain Forbes, and every part the least defective was removed. In March, 1834, she was engaged by the Steam Committee, and in April the policy was effected. The best proof that the boiler was in no respect weak was that the fire which was sufficient to tear out new rivets did not rend the part which was found to be thinnest. This assertion in fact arises from the circumstance that when she was examined upon her return it was found that there were two of her plates thinner than the rest. I need not say that copper exposed to the action of fire from without and deprived of the counteracting influence of water from within, will be destroyed more quickly than when the action of water is continued. With respect to the accumulation of salt in the boiler, the extent to which this takes place has been found to vary considerably in different places and in different seas:—in the Mediterranean it was found to take place much more rapidly than in other quarters. Mr. Turton here read a paragraph from a publication describing some particular instances corroborative of his assertion: Now, said he, if I established that the boilers of the Steamer were clear and free previous to her departure, the extraordinary accumulation of salt, which could not have happened in the river, must, like that taking place in the Mediterranean, be considered one of the perils incident to the navigation of the Bay of Bengal, and consequently covered by the policy. With respect to the amount of damages as there are some charges which may admit of discussion, we will willingly consent to a reference for the adjustment of them. The jurisdiction and the execution of the policy by Mr. Brightman as Secretary to the Insurance Office were admitted on the part of the defendants, as was also the interest of the assignees of Messrs. Mackintosh and Co.

John Woodly. I am a mariner and was employed in the Forbes, in March, 1834. I was chief officer in her when she went to Madras, and returned in consequence of an accident: she left this port on the 15th of April. I cannot say exactly, when she arrived; I think it was about the 22d. When she arrived there the boilers were examined by the Engineers Mr. Daius, Mr. Lowder, and Mr. Eddy. Mr. Daius was chief Engineer: nothing was done in consequence of that examination. The boiler was cracked in several places. There were six boilers. I went into the boilers at Madras, and examined them with Captain Forth. I don't know where Captain Forth is at present—it is six months since I saw him. When we went into the boiler there was a great quantity of salt collected in it. The salt was about different parts of the boiler. I cannot say how much there was. We threw overboard three or four tons of salt and dirt together. The crack was about the larboard quarter. There was an accumulatio . of salt about the crack. The salt was about hal an inch thick. [Here a diagram of the machinery was put in to explain to the Court the situation of the boilers.] In consequence of this injury we returned to Madras. We were not able to proceed under steam: we returned under sail. I now know wh the operation of blowing off is—I did not th . The boiler was taken out of the vessel wher we come back and sent to Jessop and Co. It was placed when repaired, about three months after she proceeded to the Red Sea with the same boiler and re rned. We had no accident on the second voyage: e steamed and sailed there and steamed and sailed back.

Cross-examined by Mr. Pears .—How happened it there was no accident in the sece oyage?

She was constantly blown off y two hours: on the first voyage I cannot say wheth he was blown off or not. We had stopped to blow but most frequently gone on. I now know what blowing off is. I do not know whether she was blown off the first voyage; but I have seen the Engineer go down the hatchway to the blow-off cocks. I saw them blow off on the last voyage —never saw them do the same on the former voyage. I don't remember a conversation when about five days from Calcutta on the first voyage, when Mr. Daius proposed to Captain Forth to blow off; but I heard so afterwards from Captain Forth and himself. We did not stop on that occasion. I don't know why the vessel was not stopped. I believe it was that as we were so near Madras it would be a pity to stop the vessel so near port. We reached Madras about the second day after that. I had never gone in the vessel any where before: I have been a voyage to the Red Sea since and up and down the river. In the first voyage we met with no bad weather. According to my judgment if she had been blown off in the first voyage every two or four hours, as we have done in the last voyage, no accident would have occurred. I have heard that the vessel has been to China. We had a ship's log; I have not got it here. I don't know of any protest being made out either at Madras or Calcutta—I beg pardon there was one at Calcutta when we returned but none at Madras. [Paper shewn to witness.] This is my signature and that of Captain Forth. [Back shewn] This is the log book, it is part in my hand-writing, and part in the second officer's—his name is Cunningham. It is entirely in the hand-writing of us two.

Alexander Cunningham. I am a mariner and was employed in the Forbes in April, 1834. I remember an accident happening to her machinery on coming into the roads at Madras. At first it was reported that there was a leak in the boiler which put the fires out in consequence of which the steam could not be kept up; we came to an anchor, and the top of the man-hole was taken off and an examination took place. I did not see the damaged part of the boiler till we arrived at Calcutta. I saw Captain Forth about two months ago; he is not now in Calcutta.

Henry Daius. I was chief Engineer of the Forbes on her first voyage to Madras. I had been in the vessel nearly four years. She had been repaired by me at Cossipore in March, 1833. Captain Forbes used to come and see that the repairs were properly done. I had been regularly brought up as an Engineer—my father was an Engineer—I was in business in London myself, and I have been employed as an Engineer ever since I was fifteen years of age. I never was employed as a journeyman about steam engines. I was employed as a manufacturer. In the four years I was in business, about ten went out of my hands. I had about eighty under my management for distillers, brewers and others; they were generally condensing engines like that of the Forbes. There is not considered any very great art in driving an engine; the driver of an engine is not generally an engineer. I have had the care of this engine nearly four years: the blow-off cock goes out of the boiler through the bottom of the vessel, and when at sea we cannot examine without putting out the fire. It takes about fourteen or fifteen hours to cool the flues to enable a man to enter. I was aware of the necessity of keeping the boilers free when I went to sea. It is not usual, as far as I am aware, to enter the blowing off in the log. This was done on the last voyage by special instruction. We ascertained the state of the cock by the lowering of the water in the boiler. We had no means of ascertaining the degree of condensation of the salt on the first voyage; on the second we had an hydrometer for that purpose. When we examined the boiler at Madras the one was found choked the others were free; the pipes of the others were not choked. There are four cocks and we found them all free at Madras but one. We examined the cock by taking out the plug, which can only be done when the vessel is at anchor. I examined this boiler particularly at Cossipore, because that one was out of repair and the others were not: the part that we found damaged at Madras was the part which was found damaged and which we repaired at Cossipore. We blew off on the first voyage according to our judgment—that was in four and twenty hours. On the second voyage varying from two to four or six hours. On the first voyage we generally blew off very regularly—the day after we left the pilot was the first day—it is not entered in the log. We made no report of it to the Captain. I always on the first voyage blew off myself at midnight. When we blew off we could not tell whether all the pipes blew off or not—all the boilers communicated one with another. The boiler itself was altogether choked up between the flues for the space of fifteen feet, but that space is very narrow, about four or five inches. I was appointed by the Steam Committee; it was a mutual appointment. I received a portion of my salary from the Committee and part from the Assignee. I was examined by the Steam Committee when I came back, that was on our return some time in May. I asked Captain Forth to stop the engines to let me examine on the fourth day after we had been steaming, but we did not stop to blow off; the Captain said we were very near Madras and it would be a pity to loose time. I asked him to stop to prevent the chance of any accident. It is not usual to stop for short trips such as from London to Leith, a voyage of six and thirty hours; it depends upon the judgment of the engineer. It is important to examine the boiler from port to port. I should say it was necessary every three days: whilst in the river I did not deem it necessary. I did not know from experience how often it was necessary to blow off at sea. On the second voyage I only examined the boiler from port to port: at Calcutta, at Madras, at Ceylon, and at Socotra, never during the voyage. We washed them out between Ceylon and Socotra, that is twelve days' voyage. We were short of coals going to Socotra, and where more than 12 days; I think about thirteen days. The boiler in which the accident happened was the the boiler I repaired in 1833. We commenced running as soon as the repairs were done. Mr. Dove had the management of the vessel at that time, that is to say the letting of it. When I was employed in repairing it, I thoroughly examined it and the other Engineers examined the boilers carefully, and I should say they were in a fit state to make the voyage—the boilers and flues were then clear. I was not in Calcutta for a few days and Mr. Lowder superintended the cleaning; I examined them after it was done, and it was done properly and sufficiently. When she started, the machinery was in the best possible order, and the boilers were sound. I consider Mr. Lowder very competent to the situation he held—Mr. Eddy is not competent, but is equal to the duties he had to perform. The accident was discovered in consequence of our not being able to supply the engines with steam. We discovered that the water in the boilers was running out through the flues, the engines were then stopt and examined together with the flues. In the boiler that was damaged, there was a quantity of salt, a deposit I believe called sulphate of lime: there was in the boiler perhaps fifteen hundred weight. The water space between the flues is about 2½ or 3 inches or rather more. We found in this space a deposit of salt, and there was a deposit underneath the flues. I attribute this accident to a stoppage in the after blow-off cock. We got rid of the salt by opening these cocks occasionally, so that the force of the steam drove out the concentrated salt water, the place of which was supplied by fresh water. The cock which was stopped was the one through which the concentrated salt water should have passed off into the sea. The accumulation of salt water is an accident to which sea going steamers are always subject—they are not subject to this in fresh water nor in the river. At Madras I examined the boilers minutely. We returned to Calcutta in consequence of the splitting up of the boilers; the rents were at the angles up and down. There were six or eight—they were in the new copper. Some of the copper put in at Cossipore was rent—there were no rents in the bottom of the flues. The rents were occasioned by the deposit between the flues getting heated and swelling. I consider that the same causes would produce the same effect in other vessels. The thickness of the copper was about 5-16ths of an inch when she sailed. I have never driven an engine before this nor been a steam voyage in charge as an engineer. The cock was choked up. I had not examined it since we left Calcutta—we had no means of getting at it. I did not examine it on the second voyage. It is not to my knowledge usual to furnish a steamer with an hydrometer.

Thomas Lowder. I was second Engineer on board the Forbes. Previous to her reaching Madras her boiler had been cleansed out. I superintended the cleaning out of the boilers and flues, it was quite sufficiently done. They were cleaned for the purpose of the voyage, Mr. Daius saw them after and approved of the manner in which it was done. I went round in the vessel to Madras; I saw the accident. In my opinion it was occasioned by the pipe being choked. This arose from no defect in the pipe nor from any want of repair. It had been repaired at Cossipore—the vessel had run two months since the repairs. Had the same secretion of salt taken place in another pipe the same consequences would have ensued. During the whole voyage, I blew off about 7 times during my watch which was from 8 to 12. I blew off according to my own judgment. I had power to do so without consulting the other Engineers. I blew off four hours, and when it came to Mr. Daius's watch he blew of four hours more. Mr. Eddy did no blow off in his watch to my knowledge. I saw the boiler after the accident at Madras; all the angles of the boiler were burst. We had no means of ascertaining whether the blow off cock was choked, but by taking out the fire. All the boilers communicate, so that if one passage was stopped it could not be ascertained which without examining all. There were six boilers all communicating, and all in operation at the same time and an equal quantity of water and of the same kind of water in each.

Examined by Mr. Pearson. I account for one boiler bursting and the other not by one pipe communicating with it being jammed. I cannot tell how this pipe came to be jammed and the others not. There must have been the same condensation of salt in all of them. It so happened that the one which was repaired at Cossipore was the one that burst, and burst in the same identical place. I received power to blow off from Mr. Daius, but no directions excepting according to my own judgment. I had never been in another Steamer. I blew off in my watch at nine, ten and eleven, and Mr. Daius blew off at midnight. I don't know that any body blew off after Mr. Daius. The angles were all cracked. The angle is not composed of two pieces of metal joined but one solid piece bent, without breaking it. I can bend any metal without weakening it. A series of bendings will break metal, but if properly prepared in the fire, it may be bent without weakening.

John Milligan Seppings, sworn. I am son of Sir Robert Seppings—I am a naval architect—I have been frequently on board the Forbes. This is a report made for Messrs. Mackintosh and Co. respecting that vessel for the Pasha of Egypt in March, 1833.

[Report put in.]

By Mr. Pearson. I am acquainted with shipping. I am accustomed to survey shipping but not machinery of this description.

Captain Forbes. I am Superintendent of Steam Machinery for the East India Company. I superintended the repairs of the Forbes in 1833, as a matter of friendship to Mackintosh and Company. I saw sufficiently of these repairs to say that they were particularly well done. I had heard of Mr. Seppings' report of that vessel, and the boilers were calculated for service for 3 years, and notwithstanding that report, I recommended that the boiler in which the accident happened, should be taken out and repaired. The vessel was laid up and repaired in 1833. She then run till the 1st of March when she was made over to the Steam Committee. The repair then made cost 5,000 rupees, of which 1781 were for new copper introduced into the boiler.

I had known the vessel from first to last, and I gave the order for her machinery very often. She had run three years and ten months when she was made over to the Committee that is, from the time when she first began to run as a tug. I considered her in a competent state to make the voyage when she left this in April, 1834. I have had many opportunities of examining her since, and my opinion is still the same as to her competency in April, 1834. Her damage was occasioned solely by the accident. I examined her very frequently: I went over these very flues perhaps forty or fifty times. The remainder of Captain Forbes's evidence tended to establish the perfect sea-worthiness of the vessel, and the perfect soundness of the machinery and the competency of Mr. Daius as an Engineer.

Mr. Pearson for the defence. I shall at once state to your Lordships that I have no witnesses to call excepting as to certain parts of the demand respecting the policy of the insurance. The merits which affect the whole claim are these. The insurance runs—to take upon us the perils of this voyage, from enemies, fire, the seas and other perils by which either loss or misadventure shall accrue to the detriment or hurt of the machinery. This is not the time to argue the point of law—your Lordships will give leave for that purpose to move to enter a nonsuit. I must, however, take this opportunity to submit—that though other perils are specified generally they ought be perils of the same kind as those specifically mentioned before. You are to take the same construction of this policy as of an act of parliament, and the perils relied upon must be of the same kind and description as those enumerated before; that being so I would submit to the Court there is nothing in anywise like the perils of the seas. In regard to the accumulation of salt, how this can happen by perils of the seas is beyond my conception. My learned friend has read from a newspaper, something relating to the Mediterranean sea; though the facts apply equally to the Bay of Bengal, I still cannot perceive how this can be construed into a peril of the sea. There is a well known case—an action against insurers where a ship's bottom had been damaged by a kind of worms peculiar to the African coast, and in the river Senegal. Many witnesses were brought to shew that the worms infested that river; so the Bay of Bengal, and the Mediterranean sea may be constantly and highly saturated with salt, but that is a local peculiarity and not a peril of the sea. Your Lordships will observe that Mr. Daius was appointed by the assignees and approved by the Committee. Mr. Daius never went out before; he never drove an engine till this particular time, but it is urged that he had made them—made them? why, I might as well say a ship's carpenter was fit and competent to steam navigation. But he had had seventy or eighty under his care; what does this prove? why, that he was competent as a musician to keep an instrument in order, upon which he could not perform. Now the Committee, as I maintain, had not appointed a competent person; they had not taken the means to remedy his defects; they had not provided an hydrometer. Out of the six boilers one was in a damaged state some time before the commencement of the voyage. This was the same identical boiler to which the accident happened. That which had been pronounced to have been weak before was found to be weak again. Does chance work in this consistent manner? The opinion of Captain Forbes was that it was sound, I say that the event is stronger than the opinion. Suppose that out of six horses in the same stable, and with the same food and attendance, a particular one had gone lame of a leg. Suppose they had all gone a journey under the same guidance and care, and the same horse had again fallen lame of the same identical leg. Would a hundred witnesses overturn the inference which would necessarily arise from such coincidence? The learned counsel further urged that there was nothing like barratry in the conduct of the Captain; and again impressed upon the Court that the general words of the policy were confined by the perils enumerated according to the judgment of Lord Tenterden, in 5 Burnewall and Creswell 163.

The Court deliberated a few minutes. Sir E. Ryan stated that the Court were of opinion there should be a verdict for the plaintiffs. The first question is one of law in which we do not now give an opinion, and though we are inclined to entertain little doubt upon it, we shall give leave to enter a nonsuit, upon which the point may be argued.

The next question is whether Mr. Daius was competent, and whether he ought to have had an hydrometer. We think the evidence establishes his competency, and that such an instrument was not necessary to the liability of the Underwriters.

The next question is whether the machinery was the time of sailing in such condition as to entitle it to be considered what may be termed "steam worthy." We find by the evidence that it was, and upon this no question of law can arise; the only question therefore upon which to take the opinion of the Court is whether this risk falls within the provisions of the policy. Our nisi prius opinion on this point is with the plaintiffs.

Sir J. P. Grant. I concur in the verdict and opinion as delivered by the Chief Justice. Some discussion then took place as to the adjustment of the items of the demand, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, with liberty to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit.

THURSDAY, JUNE 25, 1835.

The Court was chiefly occupied to-day in the hearing of arguments upon motions in cases of little interest except to the parties concerned. The sentence, however, passed in a criminal case, is of importance to the public as involving a question materially concerning the verdicts of Juries:

REX v. SUKAWUT HOSSAIN AND OTHERS.

The defendants had been convicted at the last Session of a conspiracy. In the course of a trial certain documentary evidence had been put in, and a witness examined thereto, who had proceeded so far in his evidence as to convey to the Jury its full scope and tendency when, on the interposition of the Advocate-General, he was stopped by the Court which decided that such evidence was inadmissible. In summing up the evidence the learned Judge had directed the Jury, in the consideration of their verdict, to dismiss from their minds every impression which the inadmissible evidence so received might have made upon them. One of the Jurymen thereupon said—"That we cannot do."

The Judge, however, who presided at the trial, directed them to find their verdict consistently with their oath, which bound them to find according to what was evidence, meaning evidence in legal acceptation. The Jury convicted the prisoners and a motion was now made for a new trial on the above circumstances.

MR. JUSTICE RYAN, pronounced the opinion of the Court to be, that under such circumstances and upon such grounds the Court could not grant a new trial without throwing an imputation upon the Jury of having given in their verdict in opposition to the oath they had taken; that such an implication was not to be raised against the integrity of the Jury, who having the whole evidence before them, and being instructed as to what that was which they should exclude and dismiss from their consideration, and having thereupon found their verdict, it must be taken as their consecutive verdict on the evidence, and could not be impeached.

Sir J. P. GRANT concurred in this decision, and in a very impressive manner passed sentence upon the prisoners.

The sentence was a fine of 500 rupees to the defendant Sukawut Hosain, as being the principal in the conspiracy, and the master of the other defendant, which last was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.—Hurkaru.

JENKINS, HOLROYD AND OTHERS, v. A. FRAZER, BRIGHTMAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. Advocate-General, referring to leave given to move to enter a nonsuit in this case, mentioned his intention that he might be within time, but applied for leave to move on Monday, not only for a rule to shew cause why a nonsuit should not be entered, but also on other grounds why the amount of damages should not be considerably reduced.

Mr. Turton had no objection to an extension of time, but the rule was that no new affidavits should be sworn after the fourth day. If the affidavits were sworn to-morrow he did not object to their being put on Monday.

HEATLEY v. MELVILE AND OTHERS.

Our readers will remember a report of some proceedings during last term in which a Bill was filed by Melvile and others, executors of Fraser deceased, against Anne Fraser, and revived cause. The Court ordered an issue in which defendant should be plaintiff, to try amongst other things, if the endorsement on a Government security, was in the hand writing of James Fraser, and if the gift said to have been made to Anne Fraser was donatio causa mortis.

Mr. Turton, complainant's counsel in the equity suit, now moved that the issue be set down for trial. Plaintiff had filed his plaint, to which defendant had filed a plea and ruled him to reply. Plaintiff had not replied, and defendant had added a semiliter, since which plaintiff had taken no further steps in the issue. Under these circumstances he moved for defendant, that the issue should be tried in July, it being important that there should be an early trial as a material witness was about to go to New South Wales.

ALEXANDER MILLET v. RUSSICKCHUNDER SEAL AND OTHERS.

The Bill was filed, January 4th, 1835, and sets forth that, in January, 1830, complainant, an Indigo Planter at Sootraghur, Kishnagur, being in distressed circumstances and in want of money for the purpose of carrying on his factory, applied to Judubchunder Seal, a brother of the defendent, who agreed to obtain for him Rs. 5,000. A few days afterwards the defendant advanced that amount, for which complainant gave him a Bengalee bond. In the month of March following, complainant being pressed by his creditors, applied to defendant for a further sum of Rs 5,000 which was to be advanced on condition that complainant executed a bond for Rs. 20,000. and warrant to enter upon judgment in this court; and it was further agreed that the bond and warrant should be security, as well for the Rs. 5,000 which had been advanced, as for the Rs. 5,000 which was to have been advanced on the execution thereof, and that the Bengalee bond executed in the January preceding should be returned to the complainant. The agreement for Rs. 20,000 was executed at Chandernagore, by complainant, 27th of May, 1830, conditional for the repayment of Rs. 10,000 and interest at 12 per cent. but the second sum of Rs. 5,000 was not advanced, nor the Bengalee bond returned at the time, complainant being informed that both would be ready for him on the following day, at Chinsurah, where defendant resided. Complainant attended at Chinsurah accordingly, but defendant made various frivolous excuses for the non-payment of the money and return of the bond; and a few days afterwards, caused judgment to be entered in the Supreme Court on the warrant for Rs 20,090. On the following day a writ of fieri facias was issued under the judgment, and the Sheriff of Calcutta seized complainant's Indigo factory, which by agreement, was shortly afterwards released, though the writ was not returned or the Bengalee bond given up. At the commencement of 1831, defendant applied to the Civil Judge of Kishnaghur, and, filing the Bengalee bond, was again put in possession of complainant's factory in satisfaction of the debt, complainant having been unable, owing to his embarrassed circumstances, to oppose the application in the Zillah Court. Russickchunder Seal continued in posession of the factory during the whole of the Indigo season of 1831, and caused about sixty maunds to be manufactured and sold, and for which he has not yet accounted. In 1832, in consequence of certain disputes between the defendant and a Mr. Shearman, the former was unable to carry on the factory, and he agreed, together with several other creditors, to allow complainant to carry on the factory by a letter of license, and to cause satisfaction of judgment to be entered on the bond for Rs 20,000. It was also agreed that the letter of license should continue in force till January, 1835;—that Russickchunder Seal should make the necessary advances, and repay himself from the sale of Indigo, and complainant then gave defendant Rs 1,800, in satisfaction of his debt. When Russickchunder signed the letter of license he set forth after his signature, Rs 12,450, and evaded the return of the bond for Rs 20,000, refusing also to give any account of the sums advanced or realized while he was in possession of the factory. Complainant being solely dependant on Russickchunder for advance was compelled to submit. In 1832, complainant appointed his brother to the management of the factory. This brother died in August, 1834, shortly after which Russickchunder went to the factory, accompanied by his servants, and took possession of about eighty maunds of undried indigo, together with all the account books, vouchers, office furniture, &c., carrying the whole away with him to Chinsurah, and has since refused to restore them, threatening to sell the factory for the full amount of the penalty of the bond for Rs 20,000 or to sue out a fresh writ of fieri facias against complainant's property. The bill sets forth that large sums were realized during the time defendant held possession of the factory, and prays for an account, and that defendant may be restrained from further proceeding under the judgment.

To this bill defendant filed a Demurrer in April, 1835.

Mr. Turton and Mr. Leith appeared in support of the demurrer, mainly relying on the non-jurisdiction, defendant being a resident at Chinsurah.

Mr. Advocate-General, with whom was Mr. Dobbs, rose to reply, but was stopped by the Court, the Chief Justice remarking, that there were some cases so bad that even the ingenuity of counsel could not make them better. It was quite clear that defendant had made himself subject to the jurisdiction in this suite, he having caused judgment to be entered upon the warrant of attorney, one of the matters in dispute.

RIGHT OF SHERIFF TO INDEMNITY.

Mr. Prinsep rose to show cause why the late Sheriff should not have further time to make his return to a writ of venditioni exponas. The action was brought against Syed Mendhy Ally Khan, and the property comprised in the writ of venditioni exponas was advertised for sale, but when the day arrived the then Sheriff refused to proceed to sell without an indemnity. Now the general principle that prevails here is that the Sheriff is not entitled to an indemnity, under the circumstances of the present case. The property here consisted of a share in a zemindary in Tirhoot, and although it would be otherwise in the case of goods, here no action could be brought against the Sheriff, no indemnity could be required. The grounds upon which such indemnity was demanded by the Sheriff, were that notice of several claims had been served upon him, affecting the property in question One of these claims was made by Mr. Wilkinson, the Collector, on behalf of Government, for arrears of revenue; another was by a mortgager, and there were several others. On these grounds the Sheriff when the day of sale arrived refused to proceed, although it appears by the affidavits put in that there was a party present who had come all the way from Patna for the express purpose of purchasing, which opportunity was lost. The learned counsel urged that the Court would neither protect the Sheriff nor pronounce him entitled to an indemnity excepting in the case of a well substantiated claim, and not on mere letters and notices like the present.

The Court, however, after some little consultation declined hearing the opposite counsel, and decided in favor of the Sheriff's right to the indemnity he demanded previous to the completion of the sale. This matter is now regulated by Act of Parliament; the 1st and 2nd William 3d, the spirit of which statute is to relieve the Sheriff not to exercise his responsibility.

THE STEAMER FORBES'S INSURANCE.

The Advocate-General in pursuance of the permission of the Court, proceeded to move in this case for leave to enter a nonsuit, and in addition to the grounds on which he made this motion he had, in case such motion should not be granted in its full extent, to apply for a reduction of the damages to a very considerable extent. This latter application he should ground first of all upon the admission of a mistake in the calculation of the amount of the damages by the plaintiffs themselves. This mistake was to the amount of 1,000 rupees and was admitted by the opposite party, and to this amount the verdict was acknowledged to have been irregularly and illegally calculated.

The Chief Justice said, that the Court could not occupy itself in settling mere matters of calculation, and it must not be stated, that a verdict is irregular on such grounds. There is the officer of the Court who will rectify such errors as arise from mere miscalculations.

Sir J. P. Grant observed, that it was a mistaken assertion to say, that the verdict was wrong in a sum of 1,000 rupees. The verdict was given for the plaintiffs for such sum as a correct calculation should shew them to be entitled to.

The Advocate-General then proceeded to urge the further grounds of his motion, alleging, that the principles upon which the verdict was given, were contrary to the principles of law, and the custom of merchants. In London this case would have been decided by a special Jury composed of men conversant in the usage and custom of merchants. I have, said the learned advocate, very numerous affidavits of gentlemen conversant in such usage and custom, and had they formed a special jury for the trial of this case, your Lordships would have referred the question of usage to their decision. As to this point the learned counsel cited a passage from Martin's book of commercial customs. Another ground upon which the present application was made was that the demand should be apportioned on the different offices insuring, and that the defendant in this action should not be compelled to pay the whole. There were several other insurers and the present defendant's liability ought not to be, for the whole, but pro rata.

The Chief Justice cited a case Emery v. Rogers I Espinasse's reports which was an insurance of the ship Dart. The defendant there had underwritten the policy for £200. The property of ship and cargo separately calculated the former at £15,000. The defendant contended, that as no part of the cargo was taken on board, no risk as to that had been incurred. The jury recognizing the pro rata calculation admitted at Lloyds, gave their verdict accordingly.

The Advocate-General quoted a passage from Binecke's Law of Insurance, to the effect that if we suppose a ship to be valued at £3,000 which ought to have been valued at £4,000 and let the repairs amount to 1,200 it is clear that the owner ought to be considered an underwriter for £1,000 and that as such he ought to bear one-fourth of the damages.

It was observed by the Court that there was this difference in the present case: here the parties to the policies stand alone—the policies are in terms totally distinct and different.

The Advocate-General urged that if the present defendants are compelled to pay the whole demand in this instance, one of two flagrant pieces of injustice must take place: either that one who receives no higher premium than the other insurers are to pay the whole loss, or the plaintiffs may bring their separate and several actions against the other parties, and recover against all.

Mr. Turton here remarked that such actions had indeed been commenced, but that plaintiffs had agreed to their being staid on the parties asserting to abide by the decision of the present case.

The Court hereupon granted the rule nisi.

THE DIRECTORS OF THE MILITARY SAVINGS BANK versus SHEIK ABDOOLAH.

This was a bill brought by the Directors of the Military Bank, to enforce the specific performance of an agreement entered into by Sheik Abdoolah for the loan upon mortgage of two lacks and fifty thousand rupees by the Directors to the defendant, and which agreement he now refused to fulfil. A demurrer was put in to the bill, and the grounds relied upon in support of the demurrer, were several. The only point of law, however, raised was, whether the Directors—as Directors, and without the averment of an interest as members of the establishment of the Bank, or depositors therein, could maintain this suit, without making some of the depositors in the Bank parties thereto. The Military Bank was established under the auspices of Government, for the purpose of receiving deposits of the savings, from the pay and allowances of the Company's Military Servants, a body of Directors was nominated for the purpose of conducting the affairs of the institution, under the directions of Government, and among other orders they received directions to lay out the funds on good real security so as to enhance the interest. The agreement for the loan in question, the subject of the present suit, had been entered into by Sheik Abdoolah, with the present complainants in their capacity of Directors, and it was argued at considerable length by Mr. Prinsep, that as the defendant had contracted with the parties, and recognised by his agreement with them their title, and to make such contract, he had stopped himself from making such an objection as the want of parties in the present suit. They brought the suit with whom he had contracted, and as far as he was concerned and as far as he was cognisant with their right, the contract was full and complete, and no objection founded on the absence from the suit of third parties was to be alleged by him.

The Court was however decidedly and clearly of opinion that the Directors were merely in the situation of trustees, and it was settled beyond dispute that a trustee could not institute a suit involving the interests of his cestui que trust without making the latter a party. The demurrer was therefore allowed with leave for the party to amend.

SREEMUTTE SCBOOSUNDRY DOSSEE AND OTHERS versus BUMOLAH DOSSEE AND OTHERS.

This was an application arising out of a decree by which a certain fund had been appropriated to the worship of a family idol, and the repairs of the temple. It appeared that the idol in question appertained to the families of the Setts and Mullicks, and that the right of performing worship and applying the funds passed in succession to the several branches of their families, and that the present applicant had come to her turn to perform the religious duties of the worship, which she had duly fulfilled, without, however, having any participation in the funds. A fund of 33,000 rupees had been appropriated by a former decree of the Court, of which 30,000 were applicable to the worship, and the remaining three thousand to the repairs. The Court expressed a wish to get rid of the suit, which thus promised to give rise to proceedings in the Court for all futurity. The bill could not be dismissed, a decree having been made thereon; but some method must be adopted by the appointment of a trustee or by other arrangement that might prevent these applications which otherwise would proceed in secula seculorum. After much discussion the cause was ordered to stand over for some days.—Bengal Hurkaru.

INSOLVENT DEBTOR'S COURT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 6.

IN THE MATTER OF JUMAH BYANUM.

The debt of this insolvent (a nautch girl) were chiefly due to an attorney of the Court for costs. She had been two years in gaol, and was now brought up on her petition and discharged.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

On the application of the assignee, the 20th instant was named to fix a day for declaring a further dividend on this estate.

IN THE MATTER OF CONNYLOLL, BANYLOLL AND CHEETERAM.

These insolvents, shroffs in Calcutta, were brought up and heard on their petition. The debts on their schedule appeared to be Rs. 2,25,000, to meet which there were debts due at Madras and other distant places, considerably above that amount. The first mentioned insolvent was examined at great length by Mr. Turton touching some property not inserted in the schedule, and also touching the firm's connection with a cotee at Furruckabad.

The Court ordered a reference to the Examiner to inquire into the truth of the schedule.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN PALMER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Advocate General obtained an order for the attendance of two of the above named insolvents, Mr. John Palmer, and Mr. G. A. Prinsep, the only members of the late firm of Palmer and Co. now in Calcutta, also of Mr. R. C. Jenkins, and Mr. G. Pattison, in the next court day, to be examined, touching and concerning the claim of Joynarain Mitter, the legal representative of Ramchunder Mitter, deceased, and for the production at the same time of certain books of the late firm. The learned counsel moved on the petition of Joynarain Mitter which set forth that Ramchunder Mitter his father, died in 1828, leaving a large property, a part of which he directed by his will to be laid out in religious purposes, but the petitioner having filed a bill in the Supreme Court, the bequest was set aside and the petitioner declared entitled to the whole residue.—That at the time of the death of Ramchunder Mitter, he had a large balance in the hands of Palmer and Co. amounting to about Rs. 68,369;—that this sum was shortly after the death of the deceased, and without any notice to the petitioner or the executor, written off in the books of that firm in the profit and loss account, and that no payment was ever made to the petitioner or to the executors of the deceased, or any accounts furnished explanatory or relative thereto. The learned counsel argued that the production of the books in court, might explain that the account had been written off, but he contended that the examination of the partners was necessary to show how the books came to be in that situation.

Order granted. Parties to be examined next court day.

IN THE MATTER OF WILLIAM FAIRLIE CLARKE.

Mr. Turton, on behalf of the assignee of the private estate of this insolvent, applied for an order nisi under the following circumstances:—In 1828, Patrick Clarke, of Edenbank, in the county of Ayr, by his will bequeathed a legacy of £5,000, and the reversionary interest, contingent, on his death without issue, in one sixth part of an amount provided in his marriage contract. In 1830, Mr. P. Clarke died without issue, leaving his widow surviving him and without having revoked the said legacy. The late firm of Fergusson and Co. were the testator's agents, and at the time of his decease they had a sum amounting to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 68,000 standing to his credit. Mr. W. F. Clarke took out probate, and as executor continued the sum in the hands of the firm. In 1833 the firm of Fergusson and Co. failed, and the assignee of Mr. W. F. Clarke's private estate was desirous that the insolvent, as executor of Mr. P. Clarke, should pay to him the legacy of £ 5,000. But as the insolvent alleged that he had not sufficient funds then in his hands, the assignee applies that Mr. W. F. Clarke, may be allowed to prove, as executor of Mr. P. Clarke, for the sum of ~~Rs~~ 68,000, against the joint estate of Fergusson and Co. and pay to him (the assignee of the private estate) such dividends as he may receive thereon to the amount of £ 5,000, the sum bequeathed to the insolvent. Order nisi.

IN THE MATTER OF ALEXANDER COLVIN AND OTHERS.

Mr. TURTON moved that the sum of ~~Rs~~ 2,40,000, which had been reserved from the former dividend, and deposited with the Accountant-General, be released for the purposes of a further dividend, the twelve months having expired since the date of notice of petition filed, in the London Gazette.

The Court granted the order, and the assignee stating that this sum, added to the amount now in his hands, amounted together to ~~Rs~~ 9,18,869 equal to ten per cent. on the amount of debts, ~~Rs~~ 91,88,000, a dividend of ten per cent. was declared payable forthwith.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

Mr. BIRD moved for a like order in this case, to release a sum of ~~Rs~~ 3,90,000 which together with an amount of ~~Rs~~ 3,50,000, now in the assignees' hands, would enable them to pay a dividend of three per cent. on amount of debts, Rs 2,32,53,492.

Order granted. A dividend of three per cent. declared payable on the 15th July next.

IN THE MATTER OF PETER ABERCROMBIE.

Leave was granted to this insolvent, a prisoner in the petty Court jail since 24th of May last, to file a petition for relief.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

Mr. TURTON moved on a petition for the final discharge of these insolvents, and briefly alluded to the Court's order for an examination of the powers granted by creditors for their release. That examination had been entered into, and the result, with the powers to release, in different classes, laid before the Chief Justice in chambers. The assignees certified that a majority of creditors, Indian, and to the west of the Cape, who had taken part in these proceedings, had assented to the Insolvents discharge, and he apprehended that the consents of creditors who had taken no part in these proceedings were unnecessary. So early as the time of Elizabeth, see 2 Coke, it became a question as to what was an equal distribution among all the creditors; since that time it has been considered that the creditors were those who had come in and proved their debts; and at home, in cases of bankruptcy, a party is bound by the certificate of those creditors who have proved their debts, even though he never heard of the bankruptcy. But in the Insolvent Act for this country, it is expressly stated that the consenting creditors must have established their debts to the satisfaction of this court, and the question is by whom have the debts been so established? Not certainly by those who have taken no proceedings whatsoever, or by those who have taken proceedings under the commission of bankruptcy in England; and such was shewn plainly to be the intention of the legislature, by the provision that a final discharge by this Court shall not prevent a creditor who has taken no part in these proceedings, bringing his action against the insolvent.

Sir EDWARD RYAN said, that counsel need not proceed further in the subject. He had considered the question, which arose entirely under the sixty-third section of the Insolvent Act, and certainly, at first view he was disposed to think that the Court could not discharge an insolvent unless with the consent of a majority of creditors whose debts were set forth in the schedule. That was his first opinion, and it was formed on this ground.—That the debts must be considered as established against the insolvent, because the insolvent admitted them. But on looking more minutely into the clause he was of opinion that the sound construction of the word "established," must be taken with reference to both parties, and not against the insolvent alone; and it is impossible to say, when the creditor is not an active party in this Court, but out of the local limits, and who is not bound by the act of the Court, that the debt is established on his part. The case was different with regard to those who resided within the limits of the Court, and with regard to those who resided in Europe, and who had choose to act in these proceedings. Therefore, supposing the insolvents entitled to their discharge, it would not include all the debts on the schedule, but merely from the debts of those who resided within the limits of the jurisdiction, or who had chosen to act in this proceeding. This he was clearly of opinion was the right construction of the clause.

It appeared that the total number of creditors, Indian and European, on the schedule was..... 2,029

Indian and European creditors who have taken part in this proceeding..... 1,733

Of these the number of consents was..... 894

Leaving a majority of 27 in number, and a considerable amount above half the debts, as required by the sixty-third section of the Act.

Mr. TURTON stated he was instructed that the assignees had received consents from fifteen other creditors since this statement had been laid before the learned Judge; and he also explained that the reason the majority was so small was chiefly in consequence of the manner in which the insolvents kept their books, accounts being kept open for persons many of whom were not in existence.

Sir EDWARD RYAN said, it was formerly the practice of the Court to refer to the Examiner to inquire and report when matters of a similar nature were brought before the Court, but this practice had been departed from as he was informed for the purpose of a saving of expense. He had, however, looked through the whole of the papers, and he found that of the assents there were 561, on which there could be no dispute whatever, being given in the words of the Act of Parliament; and the second class contained a general power of release. There were only five powers of which he had any doubt, and these, though one of them, that of Fletcher, Alexander and Co. was for a very large amount, would not turn the scale, either as to number of creditors or value of debts. He was aware that Mr. Fullarton and Messrs. Bagshaw and Co. had a general power to act for Fletcher, Alexander and Co. and that the former gentleman not thinking he had the power to consent, some correspondence had taken place between him and the London house, who had replied, "and if also you have exercised your judgment and given the insolvents a discharge we will ratify that measure." There could be no doubt but that Fletcher, Alexander and Co. were truly consenting parties; but it was not necessary for him to decide on the validity of a power which was not required for these proceedings. On these facts he thought there was enough for an order nisi, with one month's notice to creditors, as in the case of Messrs. Cullen and Browne.—Englishman.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

CALCUTTA.

FRAUD.—A respectable goldsmith of this city was defrauded a few days ago of jewels to a considerable amount under the following circumstances:—Two christian women, attended by a khansama, called on the goldsmith and having selected jewels to the amount of upwards of 1,000 rupees, despatched them under the care of one of the goldsmith's peons and the khansama, to a gentleman residing at Garden Reach who, it was asserted, would pay for them, the females remaining in the shop as hostages for the return of the jewellery or their price. The khansama having reached the house in which he said his master resided, desired the peon to give him the jewels and remain at the gate whilst he showed them to his master, and having obtained them he is supposed to have made off by another gate, as he has not since been heard of. The peon after waiting some time at the gate, proceeded up to the house to enquire for the khansama, when he found that both himself and master had been tricked. The females after waiting two hours for the khansama's return and not seeing any trace of him, went away. Shortly after, the jeweller received a note from the proprietor of the house at Garden Reach, stating that he apprehended that the jeweller had been defrauded of his property: the peon was the bearer of the note, who on not finding the khansama had given the alarm, when every search was inffectually made for the apprehension of the rogue. On an application being made to the police subsequently, the females were apprehended, and it appears from their statements before Mr. Blacquiere, that they also had been deceived by the khansama, who had persuaded them that he was deputed by his master, who resided at Garden Reach and was desirous of being married, to procure some young woman for him, and he promised to introduce the youngest of the females to his master; but he said that he had been authorized previously to take her to a jeweller's shop and request her to select some articles, as his master was desirous of seeing what taste she possessed in such matters, and that 1,400 or 1,500 rupees was no object with his master. The trick, as above stated, was successful, the jeweller lost his property the female her husband.

ICE.—All the ice shipped by the brig Apthorp in Boston, for this place, has melted away; the brig was nearly set on fire by the heating of the straw with which it was enveloped. Three other ships are shortly expected with cargoes of this luxury.

The following resolutions were adopted at a meeting held at the Town Hall for the encouragement of American Ice:—

1. That a subscription be raised for the purpose of constructing an Ice House for the reception of Ice from America, under the superintendence of Mr. Bacon, as Agent for Mr. Tudor. The shares to be 100 Rs., half share 50, quarter share 25. Each full share to be entitled to receive 8 seers, half share 4, quarter share 2, at 2 annas per seer. Non-subscribers not to receive Ice at less than three annas.

5. That the Committee be at liberty to appoint a Secretary, and that Mr. Hedger's offer to act as such for the present be accepted.

6. That the Committee be instructed to solicit from Government the gift (or to purchase if necessary) a proper and suitable piece of ground to build the Ice House.

7. That subscriptions be collected by calls of 15 per cent. as the Committee may require the money.

8. That Shares in the Ice House be transferable.

There are already seventeen subscribers for shares in the Ice House.

STEAM NAVIGATION.—The Ganges is to be sent to Suez in the beginning of July, by the southern passage, for the Malta mails. It is expected that she will make the passage in seven weeks or two months.

It is also said that the steamer Ganges is to be sent round to Bombay to be attached to that port unless the Government of that Presidency should object to the arrangement, on which point a reference has been made to Bombay.

The George Swinton and Bhagurutte Flat arrived off Town on the 9th June, bringing nineteen lakhs of treasure for recoinage at the Mint.

The Lord William Bentinck, steamer, with the Experiment, flat, arrived on Friday, by the Jellinghy route. The passengers it appears were greatly inconvenienced by the leaking of the decks in the trip down. It is said that these vessels have gained for the Company about 80,000 rupees for freight and passage.

SHIP NEWS.—The ship Pascoa, in charge of the pilot, on the night of the 21st June, unfortunately run foul of the brig May, from Bombay, in the Eastern Channel, by which accident the brig lost her fore and main masts. The Pascoa remained by the brig till daylight, and then reported to Mr. Sinclair who sent immediate assistance. The Semaphore has since reported the brig to have passed up from Kedgeree.

A letter from the commander of the Forth mentions, that that vessel reached Singapore on the 9th of May after a passage of 27 days from the pilot, with light winds for the greatest part of the passage, and that she fell in with the new clipper Sir Robert Taylor, and beat her, tack and tack, both in light and strong breezes.

MILITARY RETIRING FUND.—Reports of the proceedings of numerous meetings for considering the Retiring Fund Plan have been published and they are all in favor of it. The Members of the Medical Service have also solicited Mr. Curnin to endeavour to devise a plan by which they might be enabled to participate of the benefits of the Fund. Mr. Curnin has promised to endeavour to comply with their wish and has the subject now under consideration.

MILITARY FUND.—The following propositions have been carried by immense majorities:—

"That out-fit allowance be reduced to Rs. 300.

That officers paying their donations by instalments pay interest at 4 per cent. per annum.

That in all cases when the difference of ages between husband and wife exceeds 15 years, the donation should be increased 10 per cent.; when 20 years, 15 per cent.; when 25 years, 20 per cent.; when 30 years, 25 per cent when 35 years, 30 per cent.; and when 40 years, 35 per cent. ; and thereafter in a similar proportion.

LORD WILLIAM BENTINCK'S FUND.—The amount of this tribute is now upwards Rs 36,000, the largest sum that has ever been subscribed in India for a similar purpose.

INDIGO PLANTERS.—The draft of a petition, now in circulation for signature, from the indigo planters of Jessore &c. to the Governor-General, against the proposed repeal of the law of 1830, which deterred the ryuts from those breaches of their contracts with the planters which endanger their property and tend to bring them to ruin, has been published in the daily papers. The petition most emphatically exclaims against the measure, as one calculated to bring utter ruin on the planters by rendering insecure their contracts for indigo, and affording an inducement to the ryuts to become dishonest.

INDIGO.—The prospects of the planters, it is asserted, are by no means so gloomy as might be inferred from the several statements that have been published. Although considerable damage has been done by the heavy rain in Jessore, &c.; yet on the whole, an increase of twenty thousand maunds, it is confidently asserted, might be expected on the produce of last year.

The assignees of the estates of Cruttenden and Co. and Fergusson and Co. have announced their intention of shipping the stock of indigo on hand for sale in England, should it not realize a fair price at a sale at Moore, Hickey and Co's during the ensuing week.

A meeting of the mercantile community, interested in the cultivation of indigo, took place on Wenesday the 24th June, at the Office of Messrs. R. C. Jenkins and Co. to frame a memorial to Government against the proposed recision of section 2d and 5th of 1830, which provides that persons instigating and inducing ryuts to evade the performance of their engagements may be prosecuted for the specified penalty, and that persons contracting for the cultivation of indigo plants who shall wilfully neglect to sow or cultivate the ground specified in their agreement, shall be considered guilty of a misdemeanour, and liable to punishment. Mr. Speir of the house of Cockerell and Co. addressed the meeting and ably set forth the jeopardy, if not utter ruin, which would ensue from this recision, the planter, in that case, having no other means to compel the ryut to fulfil his engagements than by civil process, a remedy which cannot be obtained before the seasons for sowing is past, and the mischief has ensued. Such an enactment, Mr. Speir urged, would certainly induce the planter to recur to those acts of oppression and bloodshed which have reflected indelible disgrace on the Government under whose rule they were perpetrated, and must lead to an increase of expense in the cultivation of our staple produce, which is now threatened with a low priced competition from Egypt, and the English chemists.—It was agreed that a memorial to the Governor-General in Council should be presented, and a committee, consisting of five gentlemen, were appointed to draw it up.

CIVIL SERVANTS ANNUITIES.—It is said that intelligence has been received from England intimating that the sum to be paid in future by Civilians on receiving their annuities, has been reduced from Rs 50,000 to Rs 25,000 each.

CIVIL SERVICE ANNUITY FUND.—At a Special General Meeting of Subscribers to the Civil Service Annuity Fund, held pursuant to advertisement on the 19th June R. H. Tulloh, Esq., in the Chair.

The requisition from nine subscribers and the proposed Rule—viz.

'That a subscriber, having intimated his desire to accept of the Annuity as prescribed by Articles 6 and 7, may pay the balance of his fine, and resign the Service at any period between the 1st of May and 1st November of the year in which he may have agreed to accept the Annuity; receiving during that year, a part only of it in proportion to the remainder of the year for which it may be due, and continuing his subscriptions to the date of acceptance. The fine to be calculated according to the age of the annuitant on the 1st May preceeding that date'—was read from the Chair.

Moved by Mr. Bushby, and seconded by Mr. Harvey, that the above Rule be approved by this Meeting, and that the Managers be requested to move the Hon'ble Court through the Local Government for its adoption. Carried nem. con.

Thanks were voted to the Chairman.

BENGAL BANK.—At a special meeting of the Proprietors of the Bengal Bank, held at the Bank on the 5th June, for ascertaining the opinions of the proprietory on the question, whether or not in the new Charter it should be declared that persons holding the office of Director of any other Bank should be disqualified for acting as Director of the Bank of Bengal, the question being put to the vote there appeared.

| Against exclusion..... | 20 |
| For exclusion..... | 16 |
| Majority against exclusion..... | 4 |

Letters had been written on the subject by the Secretary to a large number of proprietors resident in India, but only three answers had been received, and they were for exclusion; they were accordingly added to the minority.

Sir E. GAMBIER, the new Recorder of Penang, was a passenger on the General Kyd, which vessel arrived at Madras on the 29th May.

THE SAVING'S BANK.—The half-yearly Abstract of the Saving's Bank, exhibits that Institution in a most properous state. The aggregate receipts in one year and six months to the 30th April last, exceeded six lakhs, and the withdrawals being less than 1½ lakh, there remained Rs 4,65,278, of which 3 lakhs were transferred to the 4 per Cent. Loan, and the rest remained at open credit in the Bank. The daily amount of deposits has averaged Rs 1,580 in the last 6 months, against Rs 1,264 of the previous half year.

LITERATURE.—The second part of Mr. J. C. Marshman's Brief Survey of History has just appeared. Mr. Marshman has apparently paid great attention to contemporaneous events and has likewise felicitously blended together the main incidents in the sacred history of Christians and those which belong more particularly to profane history.

The second edition of Dr. Twining's Medical work has just appeared.

The Enquirer, newspaper, is defunct. The last of that journal appeared on the 18th June.

The Poorna Chundra-oodoy, or the rising of the full moon, a native paper, has made its appearance, on the Conservative principles of the Chundricka. It is said, however, that the style of the editor is much above the comprehension of the generality of his countrymen.

The Orient Pearl for 1835 has just issued from the press, and far surpasses in every respect all previous numbers of that work. The Editor has announced this to be the last number of the work, as he finds the labour and attention which should be devoted to it, incompatible with his present situation and duties.

CHANDERNAGORE—SPECIAL MISSION.—One of the highest public functionaries of Chandernagore is about to proceed to Pondicherry, via Madras, in the ship Resource on a Special Mission to the Supreme Government, which the encreasing embarrassments of the Colony render absolutely necessary.

MESSRS. W. DORIN AND L. A. RICHI.—The principal inhabitants of Chandernagore and Nubbeedeep have addressed letters to the Sumachar Durpun, expressive of their high appreciation of the liberal and upright conduct of the above named gentlemen while exercising sway over them.

MESSRS. GRANT AND PEARSON have retired from the Editorship of the Medical Journal, and Mr. Corbyn succeeds to that office, AGRA.—From private letters received from England it appears that there will be a change in the constitution of the Government of Agra, and that instead of Governor the chief of the new Presidency will be styled Lieutenant-Governor.

THE POLES.—An association has been formed for affording the unfortunate, expatriated Poles, whom the persecuting, bloody Autrocrat of Russia would per force denationalize, that national education of which they have been deprived in their mother-land, and for procuring them such employment as might make them useful members of society in those countries in which they might have found a shelter. To enable the association to put its intentions into effect the generous and liberal-minded are called upon to contribute such pecuniary aid as they can afford; and it is sincerely trusted—nay, it is certain that the appeal will not be in vain.

All donations will be regularly inscribed in a Register, and receipts given only by the members of the Committee of Finance, viz. Prince Adam Czartoryskie, and Generals Kniazwicz, and Pac, who are authorized to receive contributions and give receipts. Subscriptions and donations may be sent to Generals Kniazewicz, Place de la Madaline, No 3, or to General Pac, Rue Godot de Monroy, No. 26, at Paris; and to Prince Czartoryski, through the hands of Messrs. Coutts and Co., or Messrs. Jones, Lloyd and Co. London.

MOFUSSIL SCHOOLS.—The following gentlemen have been selected and appointed to the superintendence of schools about to be established at the stations mentioned opposite their respective names:—

|---|---|
| Mr. Clift,..... | Patna. |
| Mr. Ridge,..... | Dacca. |
| Mr. Arrow,..... | Ghazipore. |
| Mr. Sinclair,..... | Meerut. |
| Mr. P. B. Singer,..... | Gowahatty. |

Schools are also to be established at Gowhattie and Hazareebagh, but the masters have not yet been named.

INFANT SCHOOL.—The second examination of the infant schools took place at the Town Hall, and exhibited a most interesting spectacle. Among the leading gentlemen of the community present on the occasion were the Lord Bishop, Sir Edward Ryan, Sir Charles D'Oyly, &c. Before the children came in His Lordship explained that the principle of instruction was to take advantage of the known propensities of young children, their love of noise, of motion, &c. and to give these an application to their moral and intellectual culture—to make the instruction suited to their infantile capacity, in short, a pleasure instead of a study.

The pupils, about 56 in number, were brought in, the master leading and holding the foremost by the hand, and the next boy having his hands on that one's shoulders, and so on in succession, forming one long line. In this order they entered, beating time with their feet and singing after the master one, two, three, four—one, two, three, four—until they were placed in their seats. The examination then commenced. The children were first directed to clap hands—which they did most joyously and in good time—then they sung the words of one of their lessons to some familiar air, "Highland laddie, bonnie laddie" and so on with several others—they answered various simple questions put to them in a manner suited to their capacity, they named different members of the body, the head, hands, arms, legs, ancles. The master then told them an infantile story, stopping and hesitating every now and then to give them an opportunity to fill up the hiatus; for instance, "my little dog named" ——, what's his name? "Fiddo, Fiddo" exclaimed several of the children—and so on in every case of pause:—then an experiment was exhibited to shew the completeness of their training, in the midst of their singing altogether, a bell rings and they are all in one instant silent.

The spectators, among whom were several little children, seemed highly delighted with this novel scene.

A sermon was preached at the Cathedral on Sunday last, by the Lord Bishop, on the subject of infant education, after which a collection was made in aid of the funds of this interesting institution, amounting to Rs. 1,500.

COL. SIR R. ARMSTRONG, of H. M.'s 26th Foot, it is said is about to retire on half pay.

Mr. HOHLENBERG.—A monument to the memory of Mr. Hohlenberg, late Governor of Serampore, is about to be erected by subscription in the Church of that settlement.

TREASURY PAYMENTS.—Government have abolished the new plan of discharging demands upon the Treasury, and all future payments will be made in the old way in the same buildin.

BILLS ON LONDON.—Government have authorised the Board of Trade to take their bills on London against goods, at the reduced rate of 2*s*. 1*d*. per rupee.

CHOWRINGHEE THEATRE.—The performances for Mrs. Francis's benefit, although there was some flagging on the part of the amateurs, on the whole went off very well. Mrs. Leach, in the character of Norval, was, as she always is, enchanting. The little actress comported herself with all the grace and dignity of a hero, and her quarrel scene with Glenalvon was particularly impressive. Mrs. Francis exerted herself to the utmost to give satisfaction, but was not quite at home in the character of Lady Randolph. Glenalvon was good but rather over-strained, and the dance by the Nouveaux seemed to give great satisfaction. The house was tolerably full, and it is to be hoped that Mrs. Francis has not been much disappointed in her expectations of a plentiful harvest.

ITALIAN OPERA.—A highly respectable meeting was held at the Town Hall for the purpose of taking into consideration the terms on which non-subscribers should be admitted to the performances. After a great deal of animated discussion, in which Mr. T. Fergusson took a prominent part, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

1.—"That no non-subscriber be allowed to enter the boxes at a lower rate than that paid by subscribers."

2.—"That the price to non-subscribers for admission to the Boxes to any performance be 8 rupees per ticket.'

3.—"That the price for Pit tickets be four rupees per ticket."

4.—"That this meeting entertaining entire confidence in the discretion of the Committee of Management, do authorize them to make such arrangements for the admission of temporary residents to the privileges of subscribers, as they may deem expedient."

The new series of the Italian Operas opened on the 25th June, with Rossini's heroic opera Tancredi, which seemed greatly to delight the audience. Mrs. Atkinson made her debût in the character of Ameneide, and was successful beyond expectation. The sweet voice of this accomplished lady is entirely adapted to the music she had to sing, and she was therefore enabled to give to it the full effect intended by the composer —she sang with an energy and precision which left nothing to be desired. Schieroni had the part of Tancredi, her first appearance here in a male character, and both in her singing and heroic bearing she did more than justice to the part. Pizzoni sustained his part very cleverly, notwithstanding the disadvantage of being obliged to sing in music quite unsuited to the character of his voice; but his calls for the prompter were scarcely excusable in one of his experience and rather too loudly uttered. Bettali's part was unimportant but he made the most of it. The orchestra was rather imperfect, but it is hoped that Signor Catania, who has undertaken the task of leader, will soon render it proficient.

The house was tolerably full, and every part of the arrangements seemed to give satisfaction, except the confining of non-subscribers within a small enclosure, which it is hoped will be removed before the next performance. Sir Charles Metcalfe was prevented from attending by indisposition, but with his usual kindness he caused it to be intimated to the Society that he regretted not being able to witness the performance.

The Opera Company have announced their intention to repeat the performance of Tancredi on Friday the 10th July and to get up an Opera every alternate Friday evening until further notice.

THE MAGISTRACY.—On the 17th June Patrick O'Hanlon, Esq., appointed by the Governor-General to succeed Mr. Thomas Hoseason, and Mr. Paten, of Allipore, were sworn in as Magistrates.

Steele, by an encrease of European superintendence, and a better distribution of the native constabulary force.

POST-MASTER GENERAL.—Mr. G. J. Siddons, the Collector of Government Customs, is to be Post-Master-General, in the place of the Hon'ble Mr. Elliot, who is about to return to England.

MR. CHARLES CHICHELY HYDE, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Siddons as Collector of Customs.

CAPTAIN WALLACE AND THE SYLPH.—Captain Wallace, late of the Sylph, has published a statement of the loss of that vessel, which fully clears him from all blame; and also exonerates Captain McKinnon of the Syad Khan from the charge, ungenerously insinuated, of his having passed by the Sylph without rendering her aid, although aware of her situation. The Bintang shoal, it appears, by Captain Wallace's statement, extends further out a great deal, than it is marked on the chart.

It is said that Mr. Dickens will continue to hold the temporary appointments of Master in Equity, Accountant-General and Keeper of the Records, in addition to his own permanent offices in the Supreme Court until the October term, when the Bench being full, other arrangements will take place.

VAPOUR BATHS.—Mr. Wetherell is about to establish a Shampooing and Vapour Bath—a description of luxury for the healthy, and a remedy for the invalid, which has long been a desideratum in this city. The scale of charges, with reference to the expense incurred, and the comfort ensured, appears to be extremely moderate. Opportunity is given to the public of obtaining baths if they please at a cheap rate by subscribing for a series.

SWIMMING BATHS.—It is contemplated to establish Swimming Baths within a large walled enclosure in Entally. The projector proposes to construct several tanks for the purpose, each tank occupying a surface of 16 or 17,000 square feet, with small dressing-rooms adjoining. The subscription is 36 rupees per annum, for which a ticket will be given entitling the subscriber to three admissions per week. Each tank is to be limitted to 30 persons a day, and in proportion as the applicants increase new tanks are to be dug.

REVISED COINAGE AND WEIGHTS.—It has been decided by Government that for the future one coin shall exist throughout India, and the new rupee is to be a thin, flat coin, two thirds as large as a ½ dollar price, the device on which will be the King's head on one side with the words "William IV. King;" and on the reverse the words "East India Company" round the edge and a wreath of laurel with the words "one rupee" and the year of coinage in Devanagree, Persian and English, in the centre. It is also contemplated to establish an uniform standard of weights throughout the country. The annexed is a scale of the coinage and weights:—

2 Tolas=¾ oz. Troy.
8 Tolas=3 oz. or ¼ lb. Troy.
16 Tolas= 6 oz.=½ a lb. Troy.

BENGAL, &c.

DUEL PREVENTED.—A quarrel took place about the 10th May, at the Mess table of the 11th Dragoons, between two officers, and the consequence was a challenge. Lieut. Low of the 39th N. I. who witnessed the affair, waited on Col. Brutton and requested him as Commanding officer to prevent the duel. Col. Brutton wished not to interfere on the plea of the subject not being represented to him in an official manner. Lieut. Low then stated that he called in an official manner and requested Col. Brutton to do the duties imposed on him by the articles of war; and the Col. then caused both parties to be arrested and thus the duel was prevented.

ALLYGHUR.—A murder was lately committed at Murern. The murdered man was supposed to be possessed of considerable wealth, which induced the assassins to enter his dwelling, pillage it of every thing and murder him. The murderers have not been detected.

ALLAHABAD.—The Thug sessions have ended at Saugor with the capital condemnation of 31 and the transportation of nearly 200 Thugs for life. Mr. S. C. Smith started for Calcutta on the 10th May.

The practice of the zemindars of Jelapore with regard to the manner of collecting rent from the ryuts, has created great dissatisfaction in that part of the country. It is asserted that more than the actual jumma is frequently extorted from the ryut, and if he refuses to pay it he is seized and compelled to stand broiling in the sun for several hours, a guard being placed over him to prevent his moving from the spot. This practice has now been brought to the notice of the Magistrates, who have already entered into an investigation of the case.

FURREEDPORE.—On the 24th May a peasant lad was about midnight seized by the Shikdar's people and taken away from his hut. The dead body of the unfortunate boy was found next morning by his mother in some jungle near a mangoe tope, stark and cold. The affair is under investigation.

The remaining five were brought back and replaced in the dungeon.

A man named Chotay Khan, it is supposed in a fit of jealousy, killed his wife and having locked up the corpse fled on a borrowed camel. NUSSEERABAD.—The following is an extract of a letter from Nusseerabad, dated 28th May :—

"The season here is regular this year, i. e. burning hot with a constant high wind from the west, so that we may expect a favorable rainy season, which is much required to mar the speculations of the grain monopolists, who are still reaping a golden harvest from the scarcity of 1833, which it will take some years to recover, particularly in cattle. Trevelyan has I hear brought about a meeting between the Rawul of Jussulmere, Auj Sing, and Ruttun Sing of Bekanere, so it is to be hoped that they will settle their differences, though I don't expect much good will be done till a British Agent resides permanently at one or the other capital."

MEERUT FREE SCHOOL.—Mr. Harris has been selected by the Governors to be master of the Meerut Free School.

PURNEAH.—Five dacoits were executed on the morning of the 15th June. They were the leaders of a gang which had attacked the village of Bysee in October last, and killed six men. On the way to the gibbit the men appeared slightly affected, but after prostrating themselves to the sun, they became quite calm, ascended the ladder, and disdaining to be contaminated by the touch of the low-caste hangman, placed the nooses round their necks themselves, and a moment after were launched into eternity.

A writer from Purneah on Indigo affairs says :—We shall commence this year nearly a month earlier than any former season, the cultivation also being greatly extended and a finer crop on the lands than the concern has ever had; the advances for manufacturing are consequently obliged to be greatly increased.

ELACHPOOR.—The Nuwab has just lost one of his numerous offspring from small pox; when physic and spells failed to arrest the disease, he was advised to seek the shrine of "Seetla" and invoke her divine aid in restoring his child to health. ## NATIVE STATES.

PESHAWAR.—Dost Mahomed the Affgan chief, it is said, retreated with his forces to the mountains the night before the long-expected conflict was appointed. His intention is to draw the Sheikhs after him into the narrow vallies, where he might combat them with greater hopes of success. The Sheikhs were quite elated at the retreat of Dost Mahomed and caused a grand salute to be fired on the occasion.

A jagheer of five lakhs of rupees per annum was offered to Dost Mahomed if he would join the Sheikh interest and promise not to mal-treat those who might be placed under his rule. The Affgan indignantly rejected the offer.

The last accounts state that Runjeet Sing was at Goornaum employed in devising plans for coming to a final arrangement with Dost Mahomed. The Affghan Chief, since his retreat, has changed his mind and is desirous of accepting the offer made him and coming to an amicable arrangement with Runjeet Sing; for which purpose he sent a message to His Highness stating that he would avail himself of the offer if Rajah Golaub Singh and a few other Sirdars were ordered to meet him within 2 miles of his camp. Runjeet Sing declined coming to any understanding on such conditions, and said that if Dost Mahomed wished to prevent the adoption of hostile measures in order to bring him under subjection, he must come in himself without any body being sent to meet him.

It is said that peace has been made between Dost Mahomed and Runjeet Singh, the former has retreated towards Cabul, and the latter remains at Peshawur, to arrange matters for the better government of that city.

Jagheers of three lakhs of rupees had been granted to the three brothers, the former rulers of Peshawur—To sirdar Sooltan Mahomud Khan, he has given the district of Hushtnuggur, yielding 1,50,000 rupees per annum, to Peer Mahomud Khan, the Purgunnah of kobat, yielding 1,20,000 rupees, and to Syud Mahomud Khan the Purgunnah of Illachee Teree assessed at 30,000 rupees per annum. His Highness has sent Monsieur Ventura to make arrangements for the cession of those districts as Jagheers to the sirdars, and is himself on his way back to his capital of Lahore, where it is expected he will shortly arrive. It is heard that sirdar Sooltan Mahomud Khan will visit His Highness on his return to Lahore.

MOOLTAN.—It is said that the Beloches, about 2,000 in number, horse and foot, had committed considerable depredations on the hill provinces of Runjeet Singh, and that the Maharaja's forces stationed in those parts had attacked them, and after a severe conflict in which they put 200 of the enemy hors-de-combat and sustained a loss of a hundred men, succeeded in compelling these plunderers to retire, who, however, carried of booty to a considerable amount besides many men and women. Devan Suwan Mull, the governor of Mooltan, had proceeded with his troops to chastize the robbers, and it is said had succeeded in capturing three of their Chiefs.

MESHID.—The ruler of Turkistan, it is said, has invaded Meshid with a large army, defeated the Governor's forces, and taken possession of the City.

HYDERABAD.—The Resident, numerously attended, and bearing a letter from the late Governor-General, waited on the Nizam and presented his Lordship's letter. The letter was read by a Baboo and contained a few civil expressions on his Lordship's departure. The Court affected to be considerably moved at the intelligence, but quickly resumed their wonted composure.

LUCKNOW.—The death of Meer Mehndy Khan and Wagid Ally is reported. The Shah Begum was about to return to her palace, from whence she had been recently expelled. There has long subsisted a great animosity betwixt the King of Oude and the Begum his mother, and it is now understood that the King is determined the Begum shall retire to Fyzabad.

JOUDPOOR.—Mahum Singh continues his atrocious career in Joudpoor, and Junko Roa is passively suffered to commit treason against his Sovereign and rob his treasury.

JEYPORE.—A most tragic affair occurred in Jeypore on the morning of the 4th June. Major Alves, the British Agent, was cut down by a Jeyporean desperado and his assistant, Mr. Blake, seized and barbarously murdered by a crowd of blood-thirsty ruffians. The following are the particulars of the case :—

Major Alves, accompanied by Captain Ludlow, Cornet McNaghten, Mr. Blake, and a small guard of chuprassies, paid a visit to the Ranees, and having received from them the most flattering expressions of their satisfaction of the state of affairs, left them and was about to remount his elephant when a man stepped out of the crowd which was collected around, and before he could be prevented, inflicted three severe wounds on the head and back of the Major with a sword, which brought him to the ground: Captain Ludlow and Mr. Blake immediately fell upon the assassin who was secured, offering no resistanc. The Jeyporeans around viewed the affair with the greateest apathy, not one moving to render the least assistance. The wounded Major was put into a palanquin and attended to Camp by Captain Ludlow. Cornet McNaghten also attended the Major a short way, when he turned to take a look at the villain who had wounded him, and found Mr. Blake with the wretch's sword in his hand, almost bent double, with four sepahees and two chuprassees engaged in binding the man. After looking on the scene for about five minutes, the Cornet urged Mr. Blake to go on to the camp and leave the man to the Rawul's people: Mr. Blake, however, declined going until the man was made over to the Rawul and requested the Cornet to stay; but the latter wishing to attend the wounded Major set off to join his palanquin. The above occurred within the palace court and the Cornet had no idea of the commotion existing outside: he had no sooner emerged from the gates, however, than he was assailed with a shower of brickbats, &c., and with great difficulty, owing to the speed of his horse, which was struck in several places, he escaped to camp. Mr. Blake left the palace shortly after on his elephant attended by a single chuprassee and was assailed in a similar manner as the Cornet, and after running the gauntlet for some time on the elephant, the poor animal was ham-strung by some suwars who rode up behind, and others goaded it with spears. Mr. Blake, however, got as far as the city gate, and would have succeeded in escaping had the gate been open, but finding it closed he turned the elephant and managed to get the animal near a temple, in which he sought an asylum from the fury of the mob; but the murderous villains rushed in, dragged the unfortunate gentleman to the ground, where some held him while others proceeded deliberately to cut his throat. In the evening when the riot had been quelled, the corpse of this lamented gentleman was sent in by the Rawul, and consigned the next morning to the grave. Tranquility had again been restored in the city on the 5th June and Major Alves was doing as well as could be expected from the nature of his wounds.

The Ranees are stated to be all at variance in the palace, and the Thakoors and Moosuddees are all intriguing outside. It is not believed, however, that either the Ranees or the Rawul were privy to this tragical affair. Expresses had been sent to Nusseerabad for troops and the Cavalry was expected at Jeypore on the 6th or 7th. The Governor-General, it is said, has put the troops under the directions of Major Alves, to be disposed of as he thinks proper in chastizing the Jeyporeans.

On the 13th June all remained quiet in Jeypore; the cavalry from Nusseerabad, as well as some reinforcements of infantry from Dooesa had arrived, and all apprehensions of the camp being attacked, were at an end. The man who had cut Major Alves down and several other persons had been arrested, and it was strongly suspected that the first was an hired assassin, employed by some person wishing to set up the influence of the Mahajee. Jotaram, it is rumoured, has been murdered and his guard destroyed. He is said to have been cut up and his body sent in a bag to the Residency; but the report wants authentication. Major Alves was recovering fast.

MADRAS CLUB. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at a meeting held at the Club House on the 27th May, to take into consideration the subject of a letter from Lieutenant Taylor, late Secretary of the Club, refusing to receive, in consequence of some remarks published in the papers, a piece of plate voted him by the Club for his care of the interests of that institution while Secretary.

1st.—That the Committee, in recording the above letter cannot omit to express their deep regret that circumstances should have occurred to render it necessary for Lieutenant Taylor to decline the testimonial voted to him on the 24th March last; and that so little consideration should have been shown towards the feelings of one who devoted so much of his time and energy to the duties of so thankless an office. The vote of the 24th March was by a General Meeting of Subscribers, and however well meant on their part, and however well meritted on the part of Lieutenant Taylor, he has now renounced the intended honor; and it is hoped that such renunciation will put a stop to the discussions which have proved so hurtful to his feelings, and so little conducive to the well being of the Club.

2nd.—In acknowledging the receipt of the foregoing letter, ordered that a copy of the above resolution be communicated to Lieutenant Taylor.

NEW PUBLICATION.—The late Editor of the Times has taken the Editorial field again in a ter-weekly paper, to be entitled the Standard, the first number of which was issued on the 2nd June.

The Court-martial on Captain Arthur, had acquitted him fully and honorably of all the charges brought against him; and it was supposed that this decision would involve the dismissal of his accusers from the service. Two subalterns, it is reported, are to be tried for improper and ungentlemanly conduct. A Court of Inquiry is sitting at Bangalore, to inquire into the conduct of several native writers in the Commissariat department.

A private of H. M's 54th foot, at Trichinopoly, has been sentenced by a Court-martial to suffer death for shooting one of his comrades, and the sentence has been confirmed and ordered to be carried into effect.

BOMBAY.

THE RAJAH OF SATARA returned to his capital on the 14th May.

COAL.—Captain Ouseley, the Resident at Hosungabad, has been fortunate enough to discover on the banks of the Seta Rew, one of the tributary streams of the Nerbudda, some very valuable beds of coal. The quality of the mineral has been tested and found to be remarkably good, as the coal was speedily ignited and produced an intense heat.

Private letters received by her state, that her crew became so disabled by sickness that she was rendered totally unserviceable on the survey, and in consequence a few men were sent from the Benares to work her up to Bombay. The Survey had been carried on by Lieutenant Powell, during the stay of Captain Moresley, the Chief Surveyer at Cochin, and it is expected that by the end of June one half of it will have been completed. The Benares is to leave the Islands for Bombay about the latter end of June, and the Survey will be resumed in September or October.

THE LIVERPOOL.—The Imaum of Muscat's 74, the Liverpool, arrived on the 21st from Zanzebar. The only intelligence she brings is that Mahomed Ali having obtained entire possession of the province of Yemen, has introduced his trade-monopolizing system, and that coffee as the chief product of the land, has been the first to suffer.

The Liverpool, it appears was dispatched by the Imaum to be fitted out at Bombay and then sent to England as a present to his Majesty; and as she is a splendid ship of her class, built entirely of teak and almost new, a better present could not well be made. The vessel had previously been offered by the Imaum to the Indian Government while Lord William Bentinck was in the Neilgherries. His Lordship immediately perceived that some return which it would be inconvenient to make would be expected by the Imaum and consequently refused her. Sir John Gore, however, who was at Bombay at the time, accepted the vessel, and was only induced to part with her, which he did with great reluctance, by the urgent and repeated remonstrances of Lord William Bentinck. He, however, caused it to be intimated to the Imaum, that if the vessel were sent to England she would be accepted, which course has now been adopted by the Imaum.

DISPATCH TO SUEZ.—The schooner Shannon of the Indian Navy, was to have been dispatched to Suez with packets for England, on the 10th instant.

SENHOR PERES has for some time past been making grea exertions in recruiting troops in order to make a descent on Goa, to chastise the insurgents and reinstate himself in his Government. He has succeeded in his undertaking and has collected a force sufficiently large for the purpose. A body of regular troops consisting of one thousand men, together with three hundred and fifty Bheels, are destined for the land service; and the Portuguese Frigate Infanta Regente, having a crew of two hundred and fifty men, among whom are several British sailors, together with a brig of war, two gun-boats, and two armed bunder-boats with the proper complement of men and officers, are to operate by sea. The greater part of this force has sailed for Goa already and the rest will quickly follow. The inhabitants of Goa are in favor of Senhor Peres, and have already attacked some of the strongholds of the insurgents. The insurgents were aware of the intended attack from Senhor Peres, and had been busied in putting themselves in a state of defence.

THE GOA EXPEDITION.—The armada fitted out for the subjugation of the insurgents at Goa, returned to Bombay on the 5th June after an unavailing attempt to contend against the south-west monsoon. The following account of the armada is given by a correspondent of the Bombay Courier :—

"I beg to send you an account of the fate of the 'Invincible Portuguese Armada' which sailed from this on the 27th of May last, under command of the redoubtable Commodore Holbrow, consisting of one corvet, 2 luggage-boats, 1 ketch and one gun-boat. The corvet and buggalow were the only vessels that proceeded to sea.

"The latter, however, after she had been absent sixdays, returned in a miserable condition. The luggage-boat is wrecked under the Fort; the small gun-boat is lost on the coast; the ketch is at Mazagon half full of water, and the buggalow is hauled ashore at the Custom-house bunder, having returned with only two casks of water, 115 souls on board, and one man smothered in the hold!—She was also in a sinking state.

"I have also to add that one officer has been drowned from the luggage-boat, and that the Pattans on board the corvet drove the second Officer overboard, but being an experts wimmer he was saved."

BARQUE SARAH.—Accounts have been received by the Dutch schooner Amelia, that the Dutch barque Sarah, Kelikins, from Bencoolen to Batavia with spices, had been cut off by her crew and run on shore in Belimbing Bay near Fontana Island on the Sumatra side of the Straits of Sunda.

SINGAPORE.

PIRACY.—A sampan puckat, which left Singapore for Tringanu with eight chests of opium and other goods to the value of ten thousand dollars on board, was captured by a piratical prahu off Romania, about ten hours sail from the harbour. Of her crew of twenty-nine Chinamen, twenty-seven were butchered by the pirates, the other two jumped overboard and after floating on a plank for two days, were drifted on the coast of Bintang, whence they made their way to Rhio and reported the circumstance to the authorities there. Another daring and bloody piracy was perpetrated near the Carrimons on three prahus returning from Tubing Tingie, laden with 2,700 tampins of sago. They were attacked and captured by seven piratical craft, and all their crews, except three men who escaped in a small sampan, were murdered, and the cargo with several brass guns taken away by the pirates. An attempt was also made on a boat near the entrance of the straights of Rhio, but on finding that she only contained gambier, the attack was abandoned. The guard-boat sent to protect the wreck of the Sylph is said to have been attacked by pirates or was in great danger of being so, and the Helen had in consequence been dispatched to render her the necessary assistance.

The brig Helen, Captain Macallister, which was supposed to be lost, has arrived. On the 22d of March she observed four prahus near the N. E. entrance of the straights of Banca and heard some firing, shortly after which three of the prahus made off leaving the fourth at anchor. When the Helen came up with the remaining prahu, she anchored and Captain Macallister went on board and found that she had been plundered of her cargo, which appeared to have consisted of rice, onions, &c. and scuttled: she had 4½ feet water in her, and one dead Mallay was found in her hold. The lid of a box with an inscription in Dutch, four cerises and some Mallay papers where also found on board, which will probably lead to a discovery of the place whence the prahu came.

Several acts of piracy have been perpetrated recently. A junk from China, bound to Singapore with a cargo of earthen-ware, &c. was attacked off Pulo Tingie by five pirate prahus, each containing about forty men. The crew of the junk, thirty-two in number, fought for two days until they neared the Bintang shore, when the pirates boarded her at night and slaughtered thirty of the Chinese; the other two escaped by taking to the water, and after floating about for two days on a spar, were picked up by Mr. Halpiké of Singapore, who was in charge of the wreck of the Sylph. A cargo-boat with a crew of 5 men, while taking a cargo of tin to the American ship Cashmere, at anchor a little way outside the harbour, was attacked by a Malay prahu, four of her crew were killed and she was plundered of the tin. The remaining man, who being severely wounded was left for dead, recovered and managed to reach the vessel in the boat, with a few slabs of tin and two dead bodies. The Reverend Messrs. Deanes and Jones, on their way to the Cashmere, were also attacked by a pirate prahu; the former gentleman and a boatman were severely wounded with fish-spears, and a box of papers was taken away by the pirates. The men who perpetrated this act are known as Tambangan people belonging to the settlement. The brig Mavis from Calcutta was chased by seven pirates while passing the Carimons, but the breeze freshening she got away from them. The H. C.'s schooner Zephyr, shortly after rounding point Romania, observed a prahu attacked by two others, and immediately made sail towards her; but owing to the lightness of the wind she was unable to come up until the prahu had been captured and plundered. On the Zephyr coming within gun-shot the pirates deserted the captured prahu and made off, and the boat being very much riddled by the pirate's shot, went down during the night. The next day five of the prahu's crew, who were severely injured from the explosion of some gun-powder they had on board by the pirates' shot, were picked up by the Zephyr and brought on to Singapore; ten others, who refused a passage on her, remained in the jungle. Rajah Who of Kemaman and the Taumagung of Teluk Blangah, are reported to influence these piracies; especially the latter, who from his power over the families of the Tambangan boys, who mostly reside in his territories, exercises almost absolute authority over them, and obtains, through their means, accounts of every vessel leaving the harbour, the value of their cargoes and their strength. The Dutch authorities at Rhio have succeeded in detecting a wealthy Chinaman who has been for a long time leagued with the pirates, by means of a portion of the cargo of the China junk wich was robbed off Bintang being discovered in his possession; and it is expected that his apprehension will lead to some discoveries of importance. One of the two Chinamen who escaped from the pirates when the junk was captured, has proeeeded to Rhio to identify the property.

NEW PUBLICATION.—A new journal is to be established at Singapore to be entitled the "Singapore Free Press, Mercantile Advertiser and Price Current."

STEAM VESSELS.—A report is prevalent of a steamer being brought out from England, for one of the merchants of Singapore, and being employed to run to Siam, Penang, &c.

THE SYLPH.—The labors of the individuals concerned in floating off the Sylph from the Bintang reef, have been crowned with success; that vessel was towed into Singapore roads on the 14th May, and hauled ashore on Sandy Point to undergo a thorough repair.

PETITIONS.—The Inhabitants of Singapore have petitioned the Governor-General, and His Majesty the King. The former is solicited to grant proper authority, and the means, to the local authorities effectually to suppress piracy, the formidable increase of which threatens greatly to injure the trade of the settlement; the latter is humbly entreated to cuase the abolition of the absurd restriction which prevents American vessels from entering the port to trade, and forces them to carry on their commercial relations with the settlement from Rhio and the circumjacent settlements.

BURMAH.

CARAVANS FROM TALI IN YUNAN.—From the extract of a letter from Rangoon, dated 25th May, 1835, inserted in the Hurkaru of the 22d June, it appears that Dr. Richardson, who had returned to Moulmein from a mission to Zeumay, Laboon and Lageroa, in about Lat. 19½° N. and Long. 99½° E. has arranged with the heads of the Chinese caravans which annually visit those towns, to come on with their merchandize to Moulmein next year; and it is expected that a trade extremely beneficial to the country will shortly be established.

Lieut.-Col. Burney, the Resident, was making arrangements to visit Ava in all May, where he will be able to take charge of Dr. Wallich and his party, should they succeed in penetrating so far from Assam. Some of the older inhabitants of Rangoon, however, are of opinion, that the party will not be allowed to proceed on to Ava as the Burmese are extremely jealous of Europeans obtaining any knowledge of the country to the northward of their capital. In the direction of Seumay, however, the Burmese will not be able to prevent any communication with Chinese Yunan.

ASSAM.

ACCIDENT.—A boat belonging to the Assam Light Infantry, having on board a party of the 12th Company, who were proceeding to Bishnath, was upset by the carelessness of the manjee, near the mouth of the Kulling river in the middle of the stream, and at a great distance from shore. By this fatal accident the whole of their appointments were lost, and the lives of 29 individuals, consisting of 1 havildar, 7 sepoys, 1 clashie, 11 women, and 9 children.

The manjee himself escaped with the major portion of the party, that death which his carelessness has visited on others; but as his conduct is very culpable it is expected he will not altogether escape punishment.

CHINA.

A disturbance was existing between the opium smugglers and the Mandarins on the 23d March, which had caused a temporary stoppage to the delivery of that drug, and the article had consequently fallen to a nominal value of 540 Spanish dollars per chest. Several junks had been placed on the bar to intercept the smugglers, and much fuss and parade was made as if the Government intended entirely to suppress the trade.

PRISONERS RELEASED.—The comprador, cook, cowkeeper and cooly of Mr. Jackson, who were seized with him and some other gentlemen while going from Macao to Canton without a pass, on a fast-boat, were on the 6th April released from confinement in the city. The cooly was the only one punished for being a willing accomplice in this breach of regulations; the others excused themselves by saying that they were ignorant of the boat being hired by Mr. Jackson and were only passengers on her.

DROUGHT.—There has been no rain in Canton since September last, and if the drought continues much longer, a partial famine is expected.

EDICT.—A long Edict for the prevention of foreign men-of-war entering the inner harbour, and for regulating the employment of Chinese servants by foreiguers, &c. has been published by the Governor of Canton.

INSURRECTION.—The rumour of the insurection in the province of Sze-Chuen is increasing. It is said, the adherents of Chang-kih-urh—the Mahomedan prince who caused much anxiety to the Emperor in 1828, and who was hacked to pieces in his presence on surrendering—are rising to revenge his death and that the independent Meaou-tsze are espousing the cause of the murdered Chieftain.

CORONATION.—One of the imperial concubines has been elevated to the rank of Empress, and crowned with the celestial diadem.

CHASTITY.—An old Chinaman, a literary graduate, who had conceived an incestuous passion for his daughter-in-law, after several vain endeavours to win her over to gratify his lust, at length attempted forcibly to effect his purpose. The unfortunate woman, in her endeavours to save herself from his incestuous constupration, seized a pair of scissars which happened to be in the bed, and stabbed him. The old man died of the wound and the young woman, according to the laws of China, was condemned to die. On petitioning the Governor, however, and representing how impossible it was to save herself from violation in any other way than that she had adopted, she was pardoned, and a sum of money given to her as a reward for her chastity.

EXILED LINGUISTS.—The two Linguists who were imprisoned under a charge of treason, for having admitted of Lord Napier's going to Canton, have been sentenced to exile.

CHINESE COWARDICE.—A correspondent of the Canton Register states, that whilst laying at anchor off Chuenpee, he was ordered by the madarins to depart with his vessel, or that a war-junk would be sent to compel him. On an answer being returned that it was not convenient then to depart and that if obliged, the vessel was prepared to repel force with force, these bragadocios changed their tone and begged that the vessel might be taken to Lintin, the proper anchorage for outside vessels without passes, or that they, the mandarins, would get into trouble. He further adds, that an English vessel was laying at anchor in one of the Chinese bays, when she was approached by two war-junks, which anchored close to her. The Captain of the English vessel not liking their approximation ordered the junks to sheer off to a greater distance, but they refused to obey him. A jolly boat with an officer and four lascars armed, was then sent to insist on their doing so, but they being still disinclined to acquiesce, the officer boarded one of the junks and seized all her arms, both great and small; he then boarded the other boat, tumbled all her great guns overboard, seized the small arms, and ultimately made both junks quit the bay.

SOCOTRA.

The sickness at Socotra was rapidly increasing, the fever had reached the ships and had made fearful havock. The camp could afford but one native sentry and he was placed over the treasure-chest, and consequently the provisions and other stores in the tents were plundered every night. The Cootee, Shannon and the buggaloh, had arrived, and the Cootee had landed several thousand rafters for constructing houses, but for want of artizans they had been cast on the beach as useless. Captain Bayley had sent in an application to commander Rose to take the troops to Bombay, but the commander had not complied with the application.

The Tigris was to proceed to Mocha, to relieve the Euphrates, and return in August to settle about the purchase of the Island. One of the Shaicks of Kassen had visited the island and offered to dispose of it for a much less sum than that offered by Mr. Haines—he waited a few days for the arrival of a vessel from Bombay, but in consequence of the death of several of his followers, he went away again. The Shaick and about ten natives had died in the town.

REVIEW OF THE CALCUTTA MARKET.

(From Kuhn's Monthly Price Current, June 30, 1835.)

INDIGO.—Notwithstanding a few letters of complaints from unlucky planters here and there, we have reason to believe, there never was a season so brilliant in prospect for the Indigo crops, as far as quantity of produce is concerned. We hear that the great Jungypoor Concern is expected to yield 4000 maunds, and that a Factory in Kishnagur, which gave 800 maunds last year, is likely to give 2500 this year, that in the Burdwan Districts there will be a surprising crop, and in short, that in general there is an appearance of abundance. We would be cautious of creating alarm in distant markets, by an over estimate of the growing crop, knowing how much the result still depends upon weather, but it is our duty to give out the information that reaches us on matters of this kind, and to protect as much the buyer as the seller from speculations made in ignorance of the true state of things. Before the accident of season, which began in May last year, the crop of 1834 was estimated at 125 to 130,000 maunds. In July, August and September it was generally reckoned only 85 to 90,000 maunds, and it turned out about 106000 maunds. The sowings this year, have been considerably more extensive, and in spite of some damage from heavy rain in Jessore, the general prospects are better now than they were at any period of last season, or of any previous year. The crop will, in all probability not fall short of 130,000, it may reach 150,000 maunds,* but it is still too early to form with sufficient accuracy any correct calculation of the quantity that may be produced. Heavy rains at this particular crisis would materially lessen produce more especialy where plant is ripe, which added to sudden inundation would alter the face of things altogether. Planters, however, have generally had the good fortune of an early crop. Transactions during the month were on a very limited scale. Some parcels have been brought to public auction, on account of Insolvent estates, with the understanding that if they did not fetch the valuation, the whole should be shipped to England under advance from the Company. Of 1400 chests brought to auction on several days, only 278 chests were sold at prices from 105 to 140. The principal lots were 40 chests H & C Colgong at 127 8, and 81 chests Bhaugulpore at 125. The Colgong was actually sold during the season at 152 8. It is to be feared, that if large parcels of Indigo held on account of Insolvent estates be thrown on the London market, simultaneously with the highly favourable accounts of the next crop, prices must give way. Another public sale of 343 chests is advertised by the Assignees of Insolvent Estates. We may consider our prices with a decline of 10 to 15 Rs. per maund under our last quotation which we then quoted nominal. Our stock is still about 17000 maunds.

OPIUM.—Experienced a slight decline on the beginning of the month, as some holders were anxious to realize their purchases. After the arrival of the Agnes the market has become more steady with improvement in prices. The stock in the Hon'ble Company's godowns amounts to 1800 chests Benares, and about 3000 Patna. The probable quantity of this drug which may take the several vessels charging at present for China, is reported to exceed 1000 boxes, of which the Red Rover will receive about 500.

RAW SILK.—We have very few purchases to report; shipments to some extent have been supplied directly from the Aurungs. Price steady.

SILK PIECE GOODS.—In very limited inquiry, and prices of the assortment are reported with some reduction. Stock of Bandanos and Chopahs small, of Corahs heavy. Price steady.

COTTON.—The demand has been steady during the whole month, and shipments for China continue active. The crop has been a very large one this year. Superior qualities are scarce, middling plenty. Prices declining.

SUGAR.—Has been much sought after; large purchases are going on Up country, chiefly for the home market, prices expecting to rise. The new crop is now arriving.

SALTPETRE.—Our stock is about 45000 maunds in middling qualities, first sort is scarce. The demand has been steady during the whole month, chiefly for shipment to England. Prices are expected to improve should freights decline.

LAC.—European Dye is at present very scarce, Native plentiful, holders are firm. Our stock in Shell Lac is reduced to 2000 maunds in middling quality, superior, scarce, purchases are limited to a few advantageous lots for shipments to England and America. We continue our last quotation. Transactions in Stick Lac are increasing.

HIDES.—Transactions are still and limited prices have appearance to some further decline, as our stock is very heavy. Horns have been in demand during the month at quotation: our stock is reduced to about 40,000.

HEMP.—Stock 1000 maunds, price steady. Jute scarce and in great demand, price rising.

GRAINS.—Rice, very limited transactions to report, prices rather declining. Wheat, some sales are reported for shipments.

SPICES & DRUGS.—The several descriptions of Gums are very scarce and procurable only in small lots. Gallingalls dull. Mace and Nutmegs continue in demand. Gambier, buyers for the French and home market. Ginger declining. Cloves in demand at our quotation. Black Pepper, Bhoory has been in demand at our quotation. Coffee market dull, stock about 6000 maunds. Alum experienced a slight reduction. Cubebs in demand at our quotation. Cassia stock middling, prices steady. Borax market steady. Linseed increased inquiry, prices rising. Munjeet stock about 1000 maunds in good quality. Salaunoniac and Senna nothing doing worthy of notice. Turmeric, price firm, stock about 2000 maunds. Safflower stock about 1200 maunds 1st quality, crop expected to be a fair one this year. Red Sanders and Sapan Wood very little doing, stock middling.

TEA.—Government have dispatched Mr. Gordon, to China, to collect information respecting the culture of the Tea plant, and on his return it is to be hoped that the result of his researches, applied to Major Grant's valuable discovery of the Tea plant, growing in numerous places of India, may render a large tract of territory highly profitable and give a new and rich produce of exportation to this country.

ELEPHANTS' TEETH.—Steady, small lots to be had.

CASTOR OIL.—Made as required, market rather dull.

METALS—The Copper market is still in a languid state. Our stock, which is about one year's consumption, has been increased by the late arrivals, there is therefore no chance of prices rising soon. Iron has been in some demand, prices at present rather tending to fall. Our stock has been increased since our last, but is still a small one Quicksilver, Steel, Lead and Tin Plates continue in good demand; stock small. Spelter, in good demand stock middling, price steady.

TWIST.—No extensive transactions to report, market steady, holders firm, stock continue very limited, prices expected to maintain till heavy importation.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—Our stock of the several descriptions continue small, and prices will be fully upheld unless importation be very large. Large exports are reported of Book Muslin to eastern ports, and large parcels of Lappets sent up country, where demand has been great. Consumption of Scarfs continue increasing. Importation of Chintzes although larger than previous year, is still too small for the demand, prices are therefore safe unless supplies should prove excessive. Stock of inferior Handkerchiefs very large, good none and sealable, Plain red twilled cloth in steady demand.

WOOLLENS.—Town in good demand, Long Ells, fine qualities, much inquiring after, stock small; Coarse, prices steady. Pelisse Cloth wanted, stock small, Flannels prices steady, stock middling. Shalloon's Bombazette good and brisk demand, stock small.

ALE.—The importation which has exceeded at 1000 hhds. since our last, has given a new activity to our market. Price steady.

EXCHANGE.—The average remitting rate may be considered about 2s. 1½d. American and Canton Bills without local endorsement procurable at 2s. 3d.

TRIAL BY JURY IN CIVIL CAUSES.

On Wednesday afternoon, the 8th July, a meeting convened by the Sheriff, was held at the Town Hall, at four o'clock, for the purpose of adopting such measures as may be best calculated to secure Trial by Jury in Civil Cases in the Supreme Court, and likewise for considering the expediency of extending and promoting the Jury system throughout the country. On the motion of Mr. Longueville Clarke,

THE SHERIFF IN THE CHAIR.

The requisition having been read,

Mr. Longueville Clarke addressed the meeting and gave a full detail of the proceedings of the committee of 1832. It would have been far more gratifying to him if the proceedings of the meeting were to have been confined to the object stated in the latter part of the requisition to the Sheriff, to consider the expediency of extending and promoting the Jury system throughout this country. It would have been far more gratifying to him if he could have stated that the object for which they met three years ago had been carried into effect, and the beneficial results had induced them to assemble this day to propose to our rulers to extend the Trial by Jury throughout the country. But a number of untoward circumstances had prevented the object of that meeting being completed, but he thought it right to say that those untoward circumstances were not to be attributed to any defect in the committee of that meeting. It would be remembered that it was referred to a very large committee to prepare petition for signature and to transmit them to England, accompanied by such suggestions and remarks as they might deem expedient. That committee had many meetings; petitions were prepared and engrossed, and he was proud to say that upwards of two thousand signatures were obtained to them. The part the committee had to perform was to prepare the draft of an Act, suitable to local circumstances of this country. He did not wish it to be concealed that a considerable difference of opinion prevailed in the committee as to the provisions of that draft; some thought that, whatever the number might be, the Jury ought to be unanimous; others agreed with Bentham that the verdict ought to go by the majority: several were of opinion that the number of the Jury ought to be twelve, while others could discover no cabelistic charm in that number, and thought that a Jury composed of seven or nine better adapted to the local circumstances of the town. However, the petitions were prepared in triplicate before much time elapsed, and Colonel Young undertook to forward two of them to England, while the third remained in his (Mr. Clarke's) hands. Twelve months elapsed, and not hearing any thing of the petitions it was deemed expedient to forward another copy to Mr. Charles Grant, and a duplicate was forwarded to Mr. Crawfurd, who had, on many occasions, proved to be greatly serviceable to the inhabitants of Calcutta. The petition intended for Mr. Grant was placed in his hands by Captain Henning of the Duke of Buccleugh, and presented by that gentleman to the House of Commons, while the one intended for the Lords was presented by Lord Lansdown. Mr. Grant, in a letter addressed to him, (Mr. Clarke) strongly recommended an application to the Supreme Council, in consequence it was presumed, though not intimated by Mr. Grant, of the then projected Law Commission. About the same time a letter from Mr. Crawfurd announced the receipt of the two petitions, the delay having been wholly occasioned by the negligence of the Captain, who had taken charge of them, but had not thought proper to deliver them before his return voyage from Calcutta. He, (Mr. Clarke,) thought it due to Mr. Crawfurd, to make this explanation, because he was aware that some misconcepton had arisen as to the delay in presenting the petition and which was not in the slightest degree to be attributed to that gentleman. When the letter from Mr. C. Grant came to hand, the council were holding their deliberations on the salubrious, but not very populous, tops of the Nhilgherries, and it was shortly announced that a Law Commission was to be formed; and that having now been embodied, this was a fitting season to renew the endeavours to further which the committee had been originally formed. He said it was a fitting season, because the Law Commission had been embodied, but he did not forget that the dawn of freedom was shedding her young light on the press in the country, and that at length the march of liberal principles had reached India, for he knew of no principles professed by any Government more liberal than those professed by the liberal gentleman who was at the head of the Government of this country, (hear, hear.) But there was a stronger and more important reason. The liberty of the press was not secure until the Trial by Jury was established; and he would state it broadly as his opinion that it were better to trust the liberty of the press in the hands of members of the council or officers of Government than in the hands of any Judge on the bench. If a Governor-General thought proper to attack the press, he might do so on the ground of expediency, though he, (Mr. Clarke,) thought it must be a strong ground indeed to warrant such an interference; but how different would be the situation of a Judge, fenced round by the labyrinth of the libel law, he may revel in its defences; answerable to no party for his decision, he may say, 'I am not a legislator, but sit here to administer the law as I find it,'—God help us, from the present libel laws, if they are to be administered by a conservative Judge! and it would be difficult to say any Judge existed who was entirely beyond the favor of the King. As it is, any man who feels himself aggrieved,—perhaps a little nervous,—or apprehensive, may bring his action against the proprietor of a newspaper in the Supreme Court, before a single Judge, who very likely may decide on the merits of the case, and entirely destroy the proprietor by a verdict with enormous damages. He said, if they left the liberty of the press in this state, they did but half discharge their duty; they ought to fence it round by the birth-right of Englishmen, for no editor would be safe until he was protected by a Trial by Jury. This was a stronger ground, and if there were no other, looking at what has been done by the independents of the press for the liberty of man, he contended that they would leave their work unfinished, unless they secured that not less important measure. He did not think it necessary to detain the meeting by entering more fully on the subject, and as to the inconvenience which might be apprehended to jurors, he adhered to the statement he had made three years ago. He did not then believe that it would require six hours additional attendance. Since that time the number on the Jury list had considerably increased, and the list he had in his hand fully bore out that opinion. (Mr. Clarke here read the statement, from which it appeared that there were 894 on the jury list, of whom 706 were liable to serve on the Petit Jury.) Now, continued Mr. Clarke, taking the number to be 706, the question was, how long after would each be called on to serve during the year? he had taken a fair average of the cases tried in the Supreme Court during the last three years, and found the number to be 498, of these 122 were exparte, leaving 376, or something more than an averge of 120 per year. If then there are 60 complete Jury lists, and 120 causes, each Juryman would have to serve twice in each year, and he, Mr. Clarke, would undertake to say, that the time occupied by each trial would not average more than six hours, and who he asked would begrudge the sacrifice of that much time, when the importance of the object secured was taken into consideration. But the jury list might be increased from 700 to 2,000 by extending the jurisdiction to Entally and the suburbs, so that each Juryman would have to serve once only in two years, and when the meeting were told that unless a Trial by Jury were extended to Bengal, the liberty of the press would remain in jeopardy, he asked, was there a man amongst them who would begrudge the time? It would be an insult to the meeting to entertain such a supposition. He would go to another point, he would urge that it was necessary as an act of justice to the Government that they should endeavour to secure this civil claim. He would contend that more popular revolutions had been occasioned by the bad administration of justice than by any other cause; the history of nations would teach us this fact, that where no popular tribunal stands between the Government and the people, the errors of the magistrates are attributed to the rulers who appoint them. Let it be considered what would have been the ferment in England, if Sir Francis Burdett had been convicted by a Judge instead of a Leicester Jury, and if in like manner, Mr. Hunt had been sentenced to two years imprisonment. Why the Judge who convicted them would have been denounced as the creature of the crown in the first place, and the conviction considered as the result of corrupt motives in the next. But on the other hand, no imputation was attached to the Jury, for each individual considered the situation in which he himself might be placed, nor could they bring it home to any one individual, for by the construction of Juries at home those twelve men were not likely to sit again, or if they were, still there was the glorious privilege of challenge. In this point of view it was important to Government, for those who suffer by the justice of a Judge, no matter how low their station in life, how small their talent, or wherein their sphere of talent, they become objects of importance, the multitude immediately surrounds them, and their indignation is expressed not against the functionary but against the Government under which he has suffered. Therefore is it important to every Government to have an institution of this kind, that the blame of unjust convictions may rest with the people, and not with those who rule over them. Mr. Clarke concluded by moving the following preliminary resolution:—

Resolved,—That the late President of the Board of Control having recommended on the subject of introducing Trial by Jury in Civil Cases, a petition be presented to the Governor-General of India in Council for that purpose.

Mr. Rogers had great pleasure in rising to second the resolution, and most unqualifiedly concurred in the sentiments which had been so ably expressed by Mr. Clarke. The only objection to the extension of Juries to this country was the difficulty of procuring persons eligible to serve. He had, with the assistance of his friends, taken that objection into consideration, and the result was that he could vouch for the accuracy of the statement read by Mr. Clarke, and he was also sure that, as sixty Juries could be formed, no man would begrudge the time he would have to bestow upon an object of so much importance.

Mr. Osborne.—This was his second appearance in public, and he hoped that the observations he should offer to the meeting would not experience that frightful opposition which they had met with on a former occasion. He trusted this meeting would not be quite so unanimous, but was sure it was equally respectable. Mr. Clarke appeared to have continually before his eyes the frightful phantom of a single Judge, sitting in solemn divan, over his darling liberty of the press; but he, Mr. Osborne, was at a loss to conceive how greater danger could be apprehended from a single Judge, sitting at the nisi prius than from the deliberations of a council of twelve. He supposed, however, that an extraordinary degree of virtue is to be found in numbers, of which a Judge alone does not possess a portion, and that a greater degree of responsibility attached to a Jury of twelve, than did to a single Judge who decided as to the law as well as to the fact. But the assumption of his learned friend was a mere phantom, or to say the least, an extreme case, and he, Mr. Osborne, would appeal to his friend, whether the case of a single Judge presiding at the Supreme Court is not one of very rare occurrence. [Mr. Clarke, 'it is not a rare occurrence.'] Well, his friend had a longer experience in this court than he had, and admitting that it might occasionally happen that one Judge only presided, he would contend that the probabilities in favor of that being the most correct and competent tribunal was as one to twelve. The Judge was a responsible functionary, whereas a Jury was an irresponsible tribunal, not answerable for their decision except to heaven and their conscience, both of which, he admitted, were very excellent; but experience had shown that something more was required to conduct the sublunary matters, and that law was necessary to keep gentlemen correct (laughter.) A Jury, however, had nothing to apprehend as to the consequence of their decision, and without impugning the general excellence of that mode of trial, he did not see its advantages here, where the consequences of an improper decision by the Judges, was the coercive force of public opinion, and the prospective certainty of being turned out of office. Besides the Judges were invariably men of superior education, chosen from a class remarkable for the general propriety of their conduct (loud laughter,) and unlikely to be biassed by those circumstances by which a Jury might be unintentionally governed. He was not attributing unworthy motives to Jurors, neither would he anticipate an unworthy imputation on the Judges of the Supreme Court, and he could confidently ask, whether, with one single exception, that of Sir E. Impey, the breath of slander had ever been lifted against one single Judge of that Court! Therefore, he took upon himself to say, the meeting were wrong if they supposed that there was a wonderful deal of integrity on one side and none on the other. In fact, he believed, that his friend would find, if he intended to weigh the advantages of the two systems with an equal hand, that the scale would preponderate in favor of the mode of trial now pursued here, indeed, so far from considering the advantage on a par, they would be found to be all on the side of the bench. He would call the attention of the meeting to the effects wrought by what was termed the palladium of English liberty, which he had admitted was one of the most noble institutions at home of which an Englishman could boast, and it would be found that so far from always giving those decisions most consistent with justice, it had not been so far by any means infallible. He would call to their recollection that a Jury convicted Algernon Sydney, and brought Raleigh and Russell to the scaffold. He would not however go into the question of the efficacy of Trial by Jury; it was rath r too late in the day to broach that subject (hear and laughter), all that he would observe was that Juries were liable to errors, and had, as in the case of Titus Oates, given credit to the most absurd evidence, and put in jeopardy the lives of honest men, on testimony, too, on which we would not hang a dog! He could confidently say this would not occur where the Judges have to form an opinion of the facts. It was well known that in Ireland, O'Connell, when counsel, in cases of libel, invariably challenged, well knowing that with an orange jury, a catholic libeller could not have a fair trial. Now he, (Mr. Osborne,) thought that this fact was a strong proof that that distinguished advocate at least thought Juries liable to be influenced by their prejudices and passions,—and that Jury in Ireland was a very dangerous tribunal. But how would it be if the system that prevailed here also prevailed in that country? There were no orange Judges in Ireland, save Baron Smith,—a splendid exception. But he would leave that part of the subject merely stating that if he had not made the circumstances in Ireland plainly applicable to this country, it was the incapacity of the speaker and not the fault of the matter, and proceed to his friend's plan for establishing juries in this country. If he understood his friend aright, he calculated on having 750 Jurymen in Calcutta, but as the qualification at home was higher in civil than in criminal cases, he apprehended the same rule would obtain here, and if so, he wished to know how it would affect his learned friend's argument, for he apprehended if the rule at home were followed, the number of available Jurymen would be considerably diminished. But, he supposed it would be said, that there were a number of wealthy and influential natives, and such undoubtedly was the case; however the meeting must bear in mind that it was the invariable custom to challenge native Jurymen in criminal cases,—he could not assign a reason, but such was the fact,—and it might obtain in civil cases. Also, again, circumscribed as this community is, it follows as a matter of course, that each individual is more or less acquainted with another, and he would ask, when questions arose connected with commercial transactions whether the Jury Trial could then be considered the most elegible system? He thought not. He thought that twelve men trying the interests of two men with whom they had commercial dealings must feel a bias—he did not say an unworthy feeling, but some bias would always exist towards the interest of that party by whom in their dealings they had been most liberally treated. Would it be said that this was a more impartial tribunal than one composed of three Judges, having in consequence of their position little to say to the greater part of the community, their only connection with them being the dispensation of fair and impartial justice. He had trespassed too long on the meeting, and he feared he had trespassed to very little effect, but he could not take leave of them without adverting to a statement which had been put forth by his learned friend, by which it appeared that were the Jury system to extend to this country, the number of civil cases, likely to be tried in the Supreme Court, might average 127 yearly. Now he, (Mr. Osborne,) had an opportunity of hearing some of these cases from which the average had been formed, and he could assure the meeting that in a large majority of them the matter in dispute did not exceed Rs. 1,500—perhaps there were not half a dozen cases in the course of a year in which the amount was so considerable; yet were the native community called upon to express their dissatisfaction with the construction of the tribunal on the plea side, while they did not hesitate to give to the same Judges on the equity side the jurisdiction over suits in many of which lakhs and lakhs of rupees were in dispute. Was it then to be said the equity Judges were not capable of deciding cases on the plea side in which the amount was not one hundredth part of those on the equity side? Really, he had a great respect for the meeting, but he must denominate such a proceeding quite farcical.

Mr. James Sutherland had the honour on a former occasion of being opposed to the learned gentleman, but he had not anticipated, when he came to the meeting, that he should so soon again enjoy that honour. He liked the frankness with which the learned gentleman stated his opinions—he liked a little opposition,—it gave an interest to the discussion while your entire unanimity might be compared > "To verses which flow as smooth as cream,

> In which there's neither depth nor stream."

If he understood the learned gentleman rightly, his objection to Juries might be divided into two branches, the one against the utility, the other against the expediency of the institution: now with respect to the question of utility, in addressing that assembly, he (Mr. S.) thought it unnecessary to dilate much on that point, for he believed that there would be little difference of opinion on the subject. The learned gentleman had indeed carried them back a long way into history, and had referred to the case of Titus Oates in defence of his position. This reminded him of what a French Judge once said to a learned advocate, who had been disposed to indulge in this kind of display, "we will begin," said the Judge, "with the deluge if your please;" now he (Mr. S.) could not indeed say, that the learned gentleman had gone back quite so far as the deluge; but his research had certainly gone far enough. He begged, however, to remind them, that although in the days of Titus Oates, we had Juries, there was also at that time a facility of packing Juries, which he hoped and believed no longer existed, and that it was as easy in those days to obtain an unjust verdict by means of a packed Jury, as it had been too often found so to procure one from corrupt Judges. The learned gentleman had talked of the integrity of Judges—and of the security we had in that integrity and in their being drawn from the class of society far above the community in general, as securities for their impartial admiration of justice, he (Mr. S.) had the highest confidence in the integrity of our Judges, but we had all heard of political Judges, and while the system of selecting Judges remained what it was, and while human nature continued unchanged, the most honorable men in such situations would be liable to bias, imperceptibly perhaps, even to themselves; while he also thought that in the sympathies of those who were in habits of familiar association with us, we should have better security for justice, than in that exalted station which the learned speaker thought was such an advantage in this case, but which he (Mr. S.) thought was a disadvantage. With regard to the expediency of Juries here, the learned gentleman had treated with ridicule what he called the phantom of Mr. Clarke's imagination, a single Judge on the bench; but it was within his (Mr. S.'s) recollection that we had had a single Judge presiding on the bench for one year, and that to that single Judge we owed the enactment of that odious law destructive of the liberty of the Press, which it would be the distinguished honour of Sir Charles Metcalfe's administration to repeal. The learned gentleman had dwelt much on the inconvenience to Jurors, but as there were upwards of 700 on the list, and as he believed that the number might be increased as Mr. Clarke had remarked to 1000 (Mr. Osborne here remarked, yes by extending the jurisdiction to Entally.)—Well, then, he, (Mr. S.) would venture to state his conviction that without extending the jurisdiction to Entally that number of jurors might be found. Mr. Clarke had stated that the average attendances, however, required in the course of a year would not be above two—of six hours each; but if it were twice that number, where was the man who would shrink from the duty imposed on him, when he considered the Jury system as one of the best safeguards of our rights? If, however, the number of Jurors was insufficient, why should we, in extending the system, tie ourselves down to the precise number twelve? There was an obvious remedy for the evil in reducing the number of a Jury, and he knew of no cabalistical virtue in the number twelve to induce us to deprive ourselves of Trial by Jury in order to adhere to it.

Mr. Stocqueler said that he thought with reference to the opposition offered by Mr. Osborne and the remarks regarding the effect of the Jury system on the Press, it was to be lamented that Mr. Longueville Clarke had not addressed himself to those other arguments he had so successfully advanced in 1832, instead of dwelling upon such as more particularly concerned the Press. He considered that the Press was very well protected under present circumstances, and that there was no occasion to have an espicial eye to its conductors, for excepting for the purpose of reporting the interesting matters which passed there, they were less rarely found in the Supreme Court than any other class of men. Mr. Stocqueler could have wished that Mr. Longueville Clarke had dwelt, as on a former occasion, on the importance of Civil Juries in other matters, and particularly on their great utility (as referred to by Sir E. Ryan) in determining the facts brought forward in evidence. That, he thought, was the grand argument in their favor.

Mr. Longueville Clarke.—Allow me, gentlemen, a few words in reply to the last observations of Mr. Stocqueler; he has urged, that I need not have been under any alarm for the safety of the Indian Press, and I admit that my apprehensions would have been groundless could I be certain, that it would at all times remain in hands so extremely discreet as his own.—[a laugh. Mr. Stocqueler bowed.]—Again he has said that my argument to-day has not been so strong, as those which I addressed to the meeting in 1832, but really the fault is his own, for he has done me the honor within these few days of publishing that speech, and as all India reads the Englishman, (another laugh) where was the use of repeating that which every one had read? But now let me have a word with Mr. Osborne. He has said that a single Judge never decides in the Supreme Court. I have been here upwards of twelve years, and for more than four of them the decisions have been or might have been those of a single Judge; during a great portion of the time there was only one on the bench, and when there were two, yet still the senior had the casting vote. My friend has also alluded to the importance of the equity business, but that is the strongest argument in favor of Juries, for equity Judges direct issue to try every doubtful matter of fact, and these will henceforth be determined by Juries. Gentlemen, this is the age of reform. Reformers are plenty, and some of them mad, but the maddest of all reformers I ever met with, is my friend Mr. Osborne.

Mr. Osborne—In am no reformer.

Mr. Clarke.—Indeed you are, and very mad indeed. What has been his argument to-day, but that Trial by Jury, the most ancient and revered of all our institutions, is bad, and that the single Judges of foreign courts are preferable. My friend cannot speak from his experience at the English bar, for he has been but lately called, nor from his experience of this country, for he has not long been here. But then he has been a great traveller, and so charmed is he with the administration of justice which he found at Venice and Vienna, that he would have you substitute it for English Trial by Jury. But I will reply to him in the words of the Poet:

" What though some treacherous tapster Thomas
Hangs up an Angel two doors from us!
As fine as daubers hand can make it,
In hopes some stranger may mistake it;
We hold it both a shame and sin,
To quit the good old Angel inn."—Loud laughter.

Mr. PRINSEP said that it was not often he was induced to suspend professional pursuits for the purpose of taking part in discussions of this Hall; but the share he had in the former proceedings on this important subject, had brought upon him a call for some further exertion in the cause. And certainly if there was any one object rather than another to which he would be content to sacrifice personal considerations, it was that upon which they were now met—the extension of the Jury principle to all cases in which it was applicable. Attachment to that principle was natural to an Englishman: he imbibed it in youth, and a professional life which he could now call a long one had encreased it to veneration. It was only those who were occupied in the temple of Justice itself, that could properly estimate the immense advantage of keeping the jurisdiction of fact distinct from that of law, and confining the one to professional Judges, the other to men of plain sense and knowledge of the world: this was a grand advantage, which Mr. Osborne seemed to have overlooked. The Jury principle was to be venerated, not because it was veiled in the halo of antiquity, which was itself a title to reverence, or because it was English, which was enough to endear it to himself and to many of those about him: those were motives which could not be expected to operate with all his hearers; it had a stronger claim to veneration, as the best safe-guard that human ingenuity had yet devised against the despotism of a monarch or the fury of a mob. It was needless to eulogize the Jury system to Englishmen: but it was necessary to address a few words to the Native portion of his hearers, because he was sorry to observe that as yet they had taken little part; and without their concurrence it never could be effective or general. They had shown no indisposition to take the duties of Grand Jurymen, which were attended with some honor and little fatigue or anxiety; but the more onerous and more important duties of Petty Jurymen they had hitherto stood aloof from. He would have the Natives consider that the Jury system was the first link of the great chain of self-government, which was the end and aim of all sound political speculation. If they would not lay hold of one end of the chain, how could they ever expect to reach the other? What encouragement was there to look for Judges amongst those, who could not or would not perform the duties of Jurymen? or what right had those to participate in the higher duties of administration who would not take upon themselves the burthen of the lower. He would have them consider well, that a people, amongst whom the Jury system was established by law, yet amongst whom men could not be found to undertake the office of Jurors and to execute it with integrity, were not ripe for the enjoyment of liberal institutions, or fitted for the business of self-government, but must be content to peep about under the colossus of foreign energy. A word or two on the object of the meeting. It was well known that the King's Courts on their establishment brought with them the Jury system in criminal matters: when life and liberty were assailed by criminal process, they were placed under the safeguard of a Jury; but property and liberty too, when assailed by civil process, and character, which to every one of proper feeling is more dear than life itself, were delivered over to the cognizance of the Judge. Thus the system had been introduced by halves: and the first object in question was to render its establishment complete in the King's Courts of India. But there was an ulterior object of higher importance.—The extension of the Jury principle over the whole of the territories of the Company. Then as to the chance of success in the object, he could not entertain a doubt. When he considered that the only two Judges now on the bench were both pledged to its support, and had expressed themselves desirous to be relieved from the trial of matters of fact;—when he found that the Indian Minister of the Crown in England had recommended the measure to the authorities here;—when he recollected that the late Supreme Government had itself attempted by Reg. VI. of 1832, to establish the Jury principle throughout India, and had hitherto failed rather through the imperfection of the measure and the want of skill in the execution, than from inaptitude of the principle itself;—but most of all when he looked to the individuals who now composed the Council of India, and especially to him who presided over it, hope was expanded into confidence. Was it possible that the Government which had just established the liberty of the Press in India, should refuse the completion of the system of Juries? He never could believe it—the motive was too strong—present gratitude—future fame! The Jury system was not a story of a day: if it once took root, it would subsist for ages. Generations would pass away, and when the English domination in the East was a matter only of historical research, the Jury system would still remain, and when it was inquired what was its origin, it would be found to date from the year 1835, the same year, in which the liberty of the press was first fixed upon a legal foundation, under the Government of the English Metcalfe. Such an opportunity would not be thrown away, they had only to prefer their request; and all that remained was to determine the form in which to make the application, and this was the point from which the exciting nature of the subject had made him digress too long. The course intended to be taken was that of laying before the Government the former Petition, which had been referred back from England, but his brethren of the Committee had requested him to put together a few words of supplement, and those he would now lay before the meeting.

Mr. PRINSEP concluded by moving the adoption of the following Resolution and Address:—

Resolved—That the petition now read be adopted by the meeting, and being signed by the Sheriff on their behalf, be presented to the Governor-General of India in Council:

To the Hon'ble Sir CHARLES THEOPHILUS METCALFE,
Governor-General of India in Council.

The Petition of the Inhabitants of Calcutta.

HUMBLY SHEWETH,—That it was resolved at a General Meeting of the British and other Inhabitants of Calcutta, convened by the Sheriff, and held at the Town Hall of Calcutta on the 14th of April, 1832, to present a Petition to the King and the two Houses of Parliament, for the introduction of Trial by Jury in Civil as well as Criminal matters in issue before the Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William. That a Petition was accordingly prepared and forwarded to England with numerous signatures; but the various untoward circumstances delayed its delivery until the month of May, 1834, when it was at length presented to His Majesty and to the Houses of Parliament respectively.

That the motives of the said application are so fully and clearly set forth in that document itself, as to make it superfluous to do more than to solicit the attention of your Honor in Council to the copy of it which is hitherto annexed.

That the British Legislature, then recently engaged in the great work of receiving the scheme of Indian Government, having thought proper to erect a Local Legislature with extended powers, and to direct the appointment of Law Commissioners to investigate and report upon the Judicial establishment of India, with a view to their entire reform, it was determined to refer the consideration of the above Petition to the Local Authorities; and such determination was communicated to the Petitioners, by letter from the Right Honorable the Chairman of the Board of Control, dated the 22d May, 1834, a copy of which also is annexed.

That your Petitioners esteem themselves happy that their applicatiation has been thus referred to the consideration of a body from which no act has yet emanated that is inconsistent with the most liberal principles of Government; and they present themselves with equal respect and confidence to lay their former Petition before your Honorable Council.

That, since the date of its transmission to England, the object of your Petitioners has been continually advancing in importance, and receding in difficulty of attainment, by reason of the increasing number of European Inhabitants and the improving intelligence and spirit of the Native population.

That the late Supreme Government has afforded the best evidence of its approbation of the views of your Petitioners, by passing the Regulation VI. of 1832, with the avowed purpose of engrafting the Jury system upon their own Judicial establishment; and, although that measure has hitherto produced no general effect, your Petitioners are disposed to impute its little success rather to imperfection in the details, than to any inaptitude of the principle. They have, however, the satisfaction of hearing that the Jury principle has already taken root in the newly conquered provinces on the Eastern frontier; and that it has been resorted to occasionally in other parts of the territory, and always with the best result. Your Petitioners regard this commencement as the earnest of future endeavors, and hail this dawn of success as the promise of a brighter boon.

Your Petitioners are well aware that serious difficulties may attend the adoption of the Jury system to those Courts where English forms and English law do not prevail: nor are they so bigotted to the institution because it is English. They are fully prepared to admit that many modifications may be requisite to accommodate it to the purposes of a varied and ever-varying society. But they trust that the hearty concurrence of all liberal and intelligent minds, which they venture to engage for, will overcome all obstacles and scruples, and secure, if not to the inhabitants of the country at large, at least to those who are subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the accomplishment of an object that has been present to their hopes and desires since the first establishment of British justice in these regions.

Your Petitioners therefore humbly pray, that your Honorable Council will take into your earliest consideration the prayer of their former Petition, with a view to the introduction of Jury Trial in Civil as well as Criminal matters in all his Matesty's Courts within the British Territories in India.

And your Petitioners will ever pray.

Baboo Russomoy Dutt.—When I had the honor to address the public meeting on a former occasion, I fully stated what were my views, not only with regard to the advantages that would attend the introduction of the Trial by Jury in our Supreme Court, but its extention throughout India. On that occasion I cited our divine lawgiver Menu, and Malcolm, and Munro to prove that Trial by Jury was not unknown amongst our ancestors, and that the punchayut bore a very close resemblance to that excellent institution as it now exists in England. I stated on the former occasion, I was of opinion that an extension of the Jury system would secure the best administration of justice throughout this country, and in seconding the resolution proposed by Mr. Prinsep, it is unnecessary to say that my opinions have undergone a change.

Mr. Leith.—The motion of his friend, Mr. Prinsep, had been already seconded, but he could not give a silent vote on the present occasion, although he did not flatter himself that any thing which he could say could induce the meeting to look favourably on the measure which had called us together this-day, if the able addresses which the meeting had already heard had failed in producing this effect. He could not, however, deny himself the gratification of raising his humble voice with those of his fellow-citizens, who had preceded him in support of this contemplated law which has for its object the improvement of the administration of justice, as well as the political and social condition of the people among whom we live. Before entering this room and before hearing the speech of his friend Mr. Osborne, he (Mr. L.) did not think that any arguments would be required by this meeting in proof of the superiority of that system of jurisprudence which embraces Trial by Jury. His friend having, however, impunged their usefulness and importance, but apparently without gaining many supporters. He (Mr. L.) would content himself by denying his position and refer him to the constitutional History of England for the best of all arguments against him—that which may be drawn from experience. Although the original introduction of Trial by Jury is in some measure hid in the obscurity of our early annals, we can clearly trace it through a period of upwards of six centuries in daily operation and growing in public estimation, until it became, as it now is, deeply rooted and cherished in the affections of the people, and revered as one of the oldest and most popular of their free institutions. The question why England introducing her system of laws into this country, impaired by the exclusion of so important a member of that system as Trial by Jury, may be more satisfactorily answered than the question upon which we are now met to deliberate; viz., why the Local Government should longer withhold from this community the privileges of Trial by Jury in civil cases? With regard to the British born subjects of his Majesty and their descendants in this place, he Mr. L., claimed it, not as a boon, but as a birth-right; and he would urge the propriety of granting these privileges upon the broad constitutional principle, that the province of the Judge and the province of Jury are, and ought to be kept, distinct, and that it is contrary both to the spirit and letter of our laws, that the office of the Judge and the office of the Jury should meet in the same man or in the same body of men. As to the native community of this place the only reason, which he could allow himself to suggest as being of sufficient weight to authorize their exclusion from the benefits of Jury Trial, would be their ignorance of the English language, the medium of communication in our Supreme Court. This ground is, however, no longer tenable, for the document read by his friend Mr. Clark to the meeting and the confirmatory statement of Mr. Rogers who seconded him, prove beyond a question that the supply of natives of unimpeachable character, as well as Europeans, in this respect, exceeds the demand, whether that demand be regulated by a due consideration of the conduct and private avocations of the Jurors, or by the number of the causes, which would require their attendance in Court. He knew it had been urged, and may be again, that the natives of this place have not yet reached that degree of civilization and mental culture, which is assumed to be necessary in order, properly, to discharge the office of Juror. In answer to this he would point to the state of England when jury Trial was there first established by law, in the reign of Henry II. when all learning was monopolized by the Clergy, and when the Barons, the lords of the soil, who were the representatives of the wealth, the power and the pride of England unblushingly, but with truth, designated themselves the illiterate laity, and when the great body of the people who were removed by many degrees lower in the social scale were necessarily precluded from benefits of even the commonest education, he said, that in comparison to the state of that class of the natives of this place from whom the Jurors will be drawn, the state of the people of England in the reign of Henry II was, religion excepted, in a state of semi-barbarism. But it may be replied, that the causes which they were called upon to investigate were few and simple, and that it is widely different here where the native cases in the Supreme Court are complicated and intricate. To this he would answer, perhaps more dogmatically than argumentatively, that he held it to be an incontrovertible proposition, that the dealing and transactions of a community become complex and artificial in an exact ratio to the degree of civilization and of social and commercial advancement to which that community have arrived. If, therefore, it be predicated that the native cases in the Supreme Court are of that complex artificial character, it presupposes the existence of that very state of the native community who originated them, which will supply men capable of investigating and unravelling their intricacies. As a lawyer he anticipated the most beneficial result, in the more perfect administration of justice, from the establishment of Jury Trial in civil cases. The first ground upon which he rested that anticipation is the aid and assistance which the Jury, from their habits of life and local knowledge and experience, will afford the Judges, in shifting truth from falsehood; but more especially in the case of the native Jurors, who will enable the Judges to thread their way more easily through the labyrinths and perplexities of conflicting native testimony. The other ground is that the natives will as Jurors hear with their own ears and see with their own eyes, and so be enabled to judge for themselves; the consequence of which will be to engender in their minds an increase of confidence in the wisdom of our laws and purity and impartiality of their administration to the poor and to the rich so as to check oppression and protect the oppressed. In saying thus much he was far from admitting the want of confidence on the part of the natives in the present constitution of the Supreme Court, much less did he intend to throw the shadow of a reflection on the Judges who preside therein. On the contrary he would venture to say, that at no period of our history, and in no Court were British Law has been administered, were ever found men more upright, pure, and independent than the Judges who now dispense justice in the Supreme Court; and it is gratifying to know, that both these learned Judges, as the meeting had already heard from his friend Mr. Prinsep, are in favor of the measure which he (Mr. L.) had now the honor to advocate; while the learned and eloquent charge of the present Chief Justice, several years back, and the able and eloquent address in which the other learned Judge propounded his views and his experience in this very Hall, on a similar occasion to the present, and in approval of a similar measure, must be fresh in the memories of many who are here present. Justice and policy both forbid the exclusion of the natives from the enjoyment of the privilege. He admitted that in many respects the liberality of Great Britain to the conquered provinces exceeds the liberality of the ancient Romans to their conquered provinces, but in one respect we fall short of their liberty, and in a degree which involves both justice and policy. We are told that the conquering Romans admitted into co-operation with them, in the business of local government and the administration of justice, several of their conquered cities, and by this means that they bound to them an influential body who had an interest in desiring the perpetuity of their rule. We would do well at least to follow, if not to improve upon this example, by admitting the natives of India, who have so long borne the burdens of the state and supplied the means of carrying on the Government, if not to a share in the actual Government of the country, at least to a co-operation with us in the administration of justice. As it is the duty of Government to abstain from doing violence to the religious opinions of the people, and to respect their usages and customs, it is well known that the introduction of Jury Trial is rather in accordance with both than in opposition to either. The meeting had been already told and truly, by his native friend, Baboo Russomoy Dutt, that the punchayut system formed an important part of the original machinery for administering civil justice throughout the country. The punchayut system differed from Jury Trial in this, that the office of the punchayut was rather that of arbitrators than mere judges of fact, and in this respect the latter had more resemblance to the body called Sectatores among our Saxon ancestors, who, although drawn from the ranks of the common people, were judges both of law and of fact: still, he, Mr. L., had no doubt, that it will be found as practicable and easy to engraft on the punchayut system of India, the Jury Trial of England, as it was proved to be practicable and easy to engraft on the Sectatores of our Saxon ancestors, the Jury Trial introduced by our Norman conquerors. In concluding, he said, he had to apologize for having occupied so much of the time of this meeting, but it was a subject upon which he felt strongly, for he was convinced that by admitting the natives of India into co-operation with ourselves in the administratton of justice, we would not only give them an interest in desiring the stability of our Government, but we open a wider field of exertion to them—give new motives of action –a new stimulous to education; and by exercising and disciplining their minds in discharging the duties of Jurors, we prepare them for executing higher political privileges, and by yielding respect to, and reposing trust and confidence in such of them as are worthy of it, we would most effectually teach them to respect themselves—the value of character—and the importance of public principles and moral rectitude of conduct.

Mr. Turton objected to the first sentence in the last paragraph but one of the original draft which stood thus: "Your petitioners are well aware that serious difficulties may attend the adaptation of the Jury system to those courts where English forms and English law do not prevail; nor are they so bigotted to the institution, because it is ancient or because it is English, as to suppose it either perfect or invariable, or incapable of abuse."

After some discussion, in which Mr. Prinsep, Mr. James Sutherland, and Mr. Turton took part, Mr. Clarke said, there was one reason why the alteration ought to be made, viz. that it was of very little consequence. The meeting coincided with Mr. Clarke, and the words marked in italics were struck out.

The address proposed by Mr. Prinsep was then put and carried.

Mr. Willis Earle, after a few brief remarks, proposed the following resolution, which was seconded and carried nem. con.—

Resolved,—That the following gentlemen be appointed a committee for the purpose of preparing the Draft of an Act, or suggestions to be forwarded with the petition to the Governor-General of India in Council, and also to adopt such other measures from time to time as may be necessary to further the proposed object.

Mr. H. Torrens.—After the very eloquent display of the two last speakers, he felt doubly disposed to propose the next important resolution, which had for its object the extension of the Jury system throughout India. Many were in the habit of considering India as comprised in Calcutta only, but he would remind them that the interests of millions besides were depending on this act. He had been anticipated in what he was going to advance as to the existence of the punchayut in India, but he might repeat that at the time when our ancestors, the feudal barbarians were attending to the ordeal, there was a tribunal in this country resembling that which now was the glory of our own, and this though partially destroyed by the Mahomedan irruption, had been restored by Ackbar and other conquerors. The attempt at legalizing the system of punchayut by Regulation VII of 1832 had been most praiseworthy, and is one of those measure which will reflect most honor to Lord William Bentinck; but it is said to have failed, and such certainly might be the case, in many parts of this presidency, for this simple reason, that the regulation itself contains the germ of its own nullification, owing to an admixture of some of the speculatively beneficent leaven observable in all the acts of the recent government. The regulation directed that there should be assessors, but made no provision whatsoever for the wholesome exercise of what is termed in English law the compulsive process, whereby they were obliged to attend and to act, thus the operation of the regulation must depend almost entirely on the individual character of the Judge, in each zillah, on the tact, temper, experience and knowledge of the native character and popularity with the native community. This secured to the regulation only a casual success, and left the effects of the attempted introduction of the punchayut to the test of fortuitous circumstances. Granting that the act of legislation had failed, there was a subsequent one of somewhat the same nature, which, by the manner of its working, not only proved the expediency of legalizing the punchayut, but pointed to the real cause where had arisen the failure of the former law. He, Mr. Torrens, alluded to Regulation IX. of 1833, a sound and excellent law as respects the subject in question, and the practical benefits whereof, in the western provinces, he was enabled by personal experience to speak. He must crave the patience of the meeting while going briefly into the detail of that law. It is therein provided that should any judicial question be pending in a village, about to be settled, the Collector will appoint a term within which an award shall be produced by the parties disputant, failing the production of such award he is empowered to summon a punchayut, whose decision on the case shall be final, or if questioned by superior judicial authority, shall only be considered by another punchayut similarly assembled. Now the main question of civil and criminal actions throughout a great part of this presidency, he might almost say throughout India, arises from disputes on village boundaries, on land partitions, and manorial rights. The meeting could hardly conceive the extent to which affrays and the virulence with which litigations are carried on under the irritations caused by those unhappy disputes. In fact, the greatest boon to the millions of the native population must be the introduction of a legislative system, whereby the speedy settlement of such differences might be secured. The regulation in question answered the end proposed in a great measure in all the provinces not under permanent settlement, because in allowing the assembly of a punchayut, it admitted also of a certain compulsive process. In case of a refusal of plaintiffs or defendants to appoint a punchayut, or of the persons appointed to act, the collector might select a body of assessors by lot and oblige them to decide the case. Within the last eighteen months, he, Mr. Torrens, had an opportunity of seeing the working of the system, and had been present when hereditary village feuds which had existed for nearly two centuries, have been set at rest in less than twenty-four hours by the award of a well composed punchayut; such being the case, why not carry this good one step further and introduce its benefits into the civil courts? Why not let plaintiff and defendant name their own members of the punchayut, as is the custom with mutual agreement of both parties to the persons nominated, and the judge take the place of the fifth assessor, the chief arbiter or surpaunch as he is termed, thus completing the quorum, and composing a body fully competent to give final decisions in any case brought before them? The members of the punchayut, being from the vicinage of the spot in which the action lies are to all intents and purposes jurors according to the old English law, bringing with their local information of the case, a knowledge of all its intricacies, for in this country the considerations of rights of property and possession are the daily occupation of the leading members of a village community, called on at all times to exercise their powers as arbiters. The Judge or surpaunch, acts as counsel in case of legal technicalities, and aids the consultation by the exercise of his unbiassed judgment; the pleaders of the party are heard before this equitable tribunal, and the final decision is given, as by Regulation IX. by the majority of votes. Here then is a remedy to the delay of Anglo-Indian judicial proceedings which obviates the fatal facility of appeal, aids the judicial executive, and must eventualy have a most beneficent effect on the moral character of the native community, who in the formation of the punchayut should be bound by oath, but be allowed to take their own obligation, as in an extra judicial punchayut, an obligation, the nature of which it is hard to discover, but which he, Mr. Torrens, believed had never yet been broken. The decision of this tribunal, if in the opinion of superior judicial authorities it should require revision, should be considered only by a punchayut. Such a system, with the exercise of the compulsive process, empowering the attendance of assessors, would, he, Mr. Torrens, as far as his own experience enabled him to judge, believed combine much of the excellence both of the India and English Jury, and afford the community at large a boon of incalculable advantage. Mr. Torrens then proceeded to comment on the absence of the Orthœpigraphical-Indophili-Evangelical party, who would teach the community to spell, but who never came forward to aid the real improvement of India. He proposed the following resolution:—

Resolved,—That this meeting convinced of the benefits resulting from Trial by Jury, and of the applicability of the system to all parts of India, cannot refrain from expressing their earnest hope that the Government of India may find it practicable to extend it to all parts of the empire.

Mr. H. M. Parker regretted that the seconding of this resolution had not fallen into hands better qualified. However as there was a perfect unanimity, the task was comparatively a light one, he said a perfect unanimity because, though it had been a little disturbed, the gentleman who had thought fit to oppose the first resolution had not thought fit to hold up his hand against it. The advantages of the Trial by Jury were sufficiently manifest in the states of Europe which had adopted it, and though in the Mofussil, it had not had equally desirable effect, he believed the failure arose rather from the unwillingness of natives to serve than from the system itself. In Lower Bengal he was aware it was generally believed the natives were opposed to it, but he could deny the assertion on the authority of several friends, conservatives of 1788, who had informed him that they experienced the greatest assistance from the natives.

Baboo Duckenunder Mookerjee said, before this proposition is put to the vote, I beg to make a few observations, especially as it is one which affects the native rather than the European community; and, indeed, I think I should be doing an injustice to the native population were I to omit expressing my sentiments on the merits of a system, the introduction of which must confer so many lasting advantages. The Baboo then took a view of the state of India previous to the invasion of the Mahomedan conquerors, when the punchayut was in existence, and ridiculed the repugnance to sit on the Grand Jury which had on a recent occasion been manifested by a native gentleman of rank.

Mr. Speed stated his own personal knowledge as a pleader in the Sudder, that the system of constant appeal was attended with the ruin of thousands, and that the extension of Trial by Jury in the Mofussil, by checking the progress of appeal would be attended with the greatest advantages.

Mr. Turton.—Recurring to the remarks of Mr. Torrens, admitted that those whom that gentleman had denominated "Maharatta ditchers" were not so well acquainted with subjects connected with the Mofussil, as those who had the opportunity of residing beyond that boundary; but he had yet to learn that a person residing within the precincts of the Maharatta ditch was precluded from expressing his opinion on Mofussil matters, and on the authority of information obtained from gentlemen who had more favorable opportunities. On what principle, he would ask, did foreign nations introduce English institutions? Is it because they have seen their operation, or that they have become acquainted with their theory? He would venture to reply that it was a knowledge of the theory alone, and however imperfect their knowledge of Mofussil affairs might be, he thought it would still be, a greater reproach to sit quietly down and hear gentlemen in the Mofussil exclaim, 'yes, you are desirous to obtain the best administration of justice for Calcutta, but utterly careless as to what may be the portion of other parts of India.' He did not concur entirely with Mr. Torrens in his strictures on the Indophili et hoc genus omne many of whom were admirable with their pen but who shrunk from public discussion. He admitted that they might have taken a silent part in this proceeding, but he was not disposed to quarrel, especially when he saw them usefully employed, and he was glad to glean and learn, and urge what they had written to the notice of the public in a manner more conformable to his habits. But if they had not attended this meeting, he would venture to say, on no occasion had there been a larger attendance of those by whom the Juries were likely to be formed, those who were told that the duties would be most irksome to them, and it might be supposed too that they considered it a matter of interest which had induced them to congregate in such large numbers. Mr. Turton then briefly alluded to the method formerly pursued in the Mofussil under the impression that the same routine was continued, but being corrected by Mr. Torrens, he proceeded to comment on the arrears of business in the Mofussil Courts, and the ruinous consequences of appeals. Nothing, said Mr. Turton, should be a matter of appeal, but that which is a matter of law; and if there was a recurrence to the old system, and the punchayut formed from the neighbourhood where the cause lies, one Judge would then be able to do the work which at present took three to dispose of. He did not desire that the English system of Trial by Jury should be introduced into the Mofussil; it was the principle he advocated, and would leave the details to those who had greater experience than himself. With regard to the service of natives he thought they must be compelled to do that which is right if Government thought it for the good of the people at large. He thought that much injury had been done, by a too great attention to instructions not to offend against the habits and prejudice of the natives, and that Government being convinced of the right, should take no excuse from the natives tending to evade the performance of their duty.

The resolution being put and carried nem. con.

Mr. Parker moved the thanks to the Sheriff, and the meeting separated.—Bengal Hurkaru.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

At a Meeting of the Society, on Wednesday the 8th July, three new Members were proposed, to be balloted for at the next Meeting, viz.—

Sir J. P. GRANT.
W. P. GRANT, ESQ.
R. WALKER, ESQ.

After the usual routine of reading the former proceedings,

Read copy of a letter from the president to Sir Frederick Adam, Governor of Madras, expressive of the obligations which the Society felt themselves under for the polite attention paid by his Excellency to their printed circular of queries respecting gardening, &c., and for the permission granted to the Society to nominate some person at Madras, competent and willing, to search the records of that presidency for any information that might contribute to the objects which the Society have in view.

The only difficulty seemed to be, who should be deputed to undertake the task, but the question was set at rest by Sir Edward Ryan, who very kindly offered to write to some of his friends, and solicit their assistance.

A Persian work on gardening was presented by Col. Dunlop.

Baboo Radacanth Deb volunteered his services to give an abstract of the contents in English, and the book was lent to him for that purpose.

Some books and papers were laid upon the table, having been delivered by Mr. Willis to the officiating Secretary on the preceding day.

These documents had been in the hands of the Sub-Committee appointed to draw up a report for Government of the experiments carried on at the late farm at Akra.

Mr. Willis, who was present, explained to the meeting the cause of his report having been made.

With reference to the instructions previously conveyed to the officiating Secretary to forward these papers, &c. to Mr. Deverinne, late superintendent at Akra, Dr. Wallich suggested to the chair the danger of sending such documents to a distance at this season without retaining duplicates, and as this would involve considerable delay, he was authorised to offer Mr. Bell's services to draw up the report, at once, from the date before him. This proposition was immediately agreed to.

A letter from Messrs. Willis and Earle to the officiating Secretary was read, containing some interesting particulars of a small consignment of Akra grown cotton, sold in the Liverpool market, which will appear in the forthcoming report.

Some seeds were presented to the Society by Mr. C. K. Robison, lately received from New South Wales, part of them had been sown by Dr. Wallich, but from want of due care in packing, they had lost their vegetative powers.

Some sample bales of cotton grown at Akra, being reported by Mr. Willis, yet in his godowns, it was determined that they should be forwarded by the Society to the Court of Directors, with an official communication, and a copy of the-report upon the experiments generally drawn up.

Mr. Patrick tendered his services to work up a portion of this ample cotton into cloth at Fort Gloster—and it was resolved that one of the bales in Messrs. Willis and Earle's godowns should be given up to Mr. Patrick, who was requested to forward the specimens of cloth to the officiating Secretary, with such remarks as the quality of the staple and texture of cloth as his experience might suggest.

The President pointed out to the meeting the great importance of securing and distributing fresh supplies of cotton seed.

From the trials already made, and results obtained, there could be little doubt as to the success attending the introduction of a superior description of Cotton. The efforts made by Messrs. Willis and Earle to obtain supplies direct from America having been as yet unsuccessful, it was resolved that in addition to the funds of the Society vested in that house to meet the provision of seed indented for, a further sum of one thousand rupees should be set aside for this specific end. The officiating Secretary was accordingly directed to take such steps as seemed to him best calculated to insure an immediate supply.

Mr. Willis stated that he had examined a few specimens of Cotton at the request of Messrs. Gunter and Hooper, grown in some part of the upper provinces—he was unable to say where, as the parties preserved secrecy on this point, but the staple was excellent, and said to be the produce of Upland Georgia seed.

On a motion from Mr. Kyd, it was resolved that the officiating Secretary was directed to write to Bombay, Dinapore and Cawnpore, for a supply of onion, turnip, and other kitchen garden seeds, against the cold season.

The following statement exhibiting the operations of the collecting department was laid upon the table.

The officiating Secretary was requested to give in at the next general meeting a list of non-paying members.

Much time having been taken up in discussing some important questions regarding cotton, many papers designed to have been read were necessarily postponed, and the meeting adjourned.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta, held at the Asiatic Society's apartments, on the 4th of July, 1835.

The Secretary intimated to the Meeting, that copies of part II. vol. VII. of the Society's Transactions had been dispatched for the use of the Members, to the care of the Medical Boards of Madras, and Bombay, and of Superintending-Surgeons of divisions, to whom applications are accordingly to be made.

G. Paton, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, was proposed as a Member of the Society, by Dr. Wallich and William Twining, Esq.

The following communications, on miscellaneous subjects, were then laid before the Meeting.

A letter from Dr. Hunter Lane, of Liverpool, presenting on the part of Dr. Gully and himself, a copy of their Translation of Tiedemann's comparative Physiology.

A letter from Mr. Malcolmson, the Secretary to the Medical Board, Madras, presenting on the part of that Board, a copy of his work on Beri Beri and Rheumatism.

A letter from J. Kinnis, Esq., presenting a copy of his report on small pox, as it appeared in Ceylon in 1833-34, and soliciting, on the part of the managers of the Ceylon Military Medical Library to be furnished, paying for the same, with copies of such works as the Society had published, or might hereafter publish.

On the motion of Mr. Hutchinson, seconded by Mr. Twining, it was unanimously resolved, that a series of the Society's publications be presented to the Military Medical Library of Ceylon, and that Dr. Kinnis, the Secretary of that Institution, be addressed to that effect.

The following gentlemen requested, that their names might be withdrawn from the list of Members of the Society; which was accordingly done, viz. William Graham, Esq., M. D., and J. Corbett, and J. Lawder, Esqs., Assistant-Surgeons, the latter of the Madras Service.

An extract of a letter from S. M. Griffiths, Esq., the Medical Officer attached to Colonel Pasmore's establishment in Persia, dated Shiraz the 15th of April last.

According to Mr. Griffiths, Persia is the land of intermittent fevers par excellence, and a vast number of instances are to be met with in which the bad effects of a stimulant mode of treatment are evinced; these show themselves in dropsies, and in enlargements and indurations of the liver and spleen. Mr. Griffiths states, that he has extensively practised bleeding in the cold stage, and that he continues to do so both in the cases of natives of Persia and of Europeans with very satisfactory results. The usual mode of treating spleen affections pursued here, Mr. Griffiths states to be equally successful in these affections, when they occur in Persia.

A memorandum, descriptive of a cluster of encysted tumors, by Mr. Twining. The preparation was taken from a subject that was sent to the General Hospital in a state of insensibility from fever, and survived but for a few hours. It is said to have shrunk considerably in drying, having been originally larger than a man's head, and nearly of the same shape. Externally it has the appearance of being one tumor consisting of six cells, three of which occupy fully three-fourths of its whole bulk. It was attached, in the subject, to the upper and back part of the fundus uteri, inclining towards the right side dragging the uterus upwards along with it. It adhered only for a space, equal in size to half the palm of the hand. The contents consisted of a transparent serous liquid, which gave an alkaline reaction with the appropriate tests. The abdominal enlargement was said to have existed for several years. Mr. Twining takes the opportunity of this case to suggest, the interest that would arise from collecting a series of observations on the nature of pendulous tumors of the mesentery, and other abdominal viscera; their origin, effects on the general health, and functions of the chylopoietic viscera. These tumours he is inclined to consider to be of two kinds, the first and most numerous class, being globular or ovoid, smooth externally, from the size of a pigeon's egg to that of an orange, easily moveable, accompanied with little pain, and very little affecting the patient's health. The second more uneven or tubercular, less moveable, and apt to become morbidly sensitive on being handled; both are said to occur in persons, who have been subject to intestinal irritation, but may be readily distinguished from chronic induration of the great intestine supervening on dysenteries and various descriptions of Gastro-enteritis.

The following original communications were presented at the Meeting.—viz.

Case of Ranula, in which the left submaxillary gland was extirpated, by J. G. Malcolmson, Esq., Secretary to the Medical Board, Madras.

Memorandum of a dissection of a case of Extra-Uterine pregnancy, which occurred at Ellichpore, by J. S. Login, Esq. Assistant Surgeon H. H. the Nizam's Service.

Case of spontaneous rupture of the spleen occuring in a sepoy, by John Greig, Esq. Assistant Surgeon 39th Regiment Native Infantry.

Observations on some of the bad consequences, which occasionally arise from the use of lead for various purposes, on board ship, by William Twining, Esq.

Notes on irregularities of menstruation, by D. Stewart, Esq., M. D.

A detail of some experiments instituted with a view to determine the effects of Galvanism on the Magnetic needle, the cause of the polarity of the needle, and of the variation of the compass, by R. Tytler, Esq., M. D.

The following papers were then read and discussed.

On the family of Rizophoreæ, by William Griffith, Esq., Madras Service.

An examination of the arguments for and against operating in cataract where only one eye is affected, by F. H. Brett., Esq.

Case of spontaneous rupture of the spleen occurring in an European, by T. Leckie, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

Case of spontaneous rupture of the spleen occurring in a sepoy, by John Greig, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

Dissection of a case of rupture of the spleen from violence, by James Hutchinson, Esq.

Mr. Griffith first proceeds to describe at some length the peculiar structure of the anthers of the genus Rhizophora, which genus the author limits to R. Mangle, Linn, R. Candelarie, D. C. and R. Macrorhiza, a new species of the anthers. This structure appears to have been first adverted to by Jacquin in his "selectarum stirpuim Americanarum Historia" and subsequently by Dr. Robert Brown in his matchless account of Rafflesia Linnæan. Transactions vol. XIII, part 1st, p. 214. It appears to have escaped the notice of other authors.

The Pollen is stated to be lodged in alveoli, formed in the cellular tissue of the body of the anther, around its periphery. Dehiscence takes place, by the separation of the cuticle, which closed in the abveoli, from the body of the anther, into two distinct unequally valves, which are internal and external with regard to the axis, and not right and left, as is perhaps invariably the case in other plants. The inner valve remains attached by its base only, the outer by its base and extreme apex. The difference in degree of the adhesion of the calyx to the ovarium, and the corresponding difference in the structure of the seed is next noticed. In those species, in which the capsule is scarcely half inferior, and in which its upper part is exserted, the cotyledons are consolidated into a mass, the vitellus of Gœrtner, which is solid above, but hollowed into a cylinder below, in which the highly developed plumula is lodged. The base of the cylinder is distinctly articulated with the collect; and the upper part of the solid apex is converted into a spongy mass, the albumen of Gœrtner, in reality the remains of the original integuments of the ovule. Again in those species, which have a nearly inferior capsule, or at least entirely included within the clayx, no deviation of structure takes place either in the integuments or cotyledons. A few remarks are next made on the anotomy of the exerted radicles, and the difference in the quantity of the woody fibre, entering into their formation, is pointed out. In Kandelia Rheedei the woody fibre is shewn to be confined entirely to the apex. The arched form of the roots, which issue in such numbers from the lower surfaces of the branches, is next adverted to, as connected perhaps with the lifting up of the axis from the earth. The paper concludes with a synopsis of the Rhizophoreæ found by the author on the Tenasserim Coast, between the parallels of 16. 30. and 12. North latitude, amounting in number to eight, and belonging to four distinct genera. The characters of the new species above referred to are given at some length.

Mr. Brett, after an able exposition of the usual arguments for and against operating in Cataract where only one eye is affected, and proceeds to offer some others in favor of operating, which however are not of universal application—1st. The patient may have originally laboured under myopia or short sightedness, in which case he may see better with the assistance of glasses than he did before, especially if the myopia had been caused by deficient convexity, (Qy. by too great convexity) of the lens, and not of the Cornea. 2nd. Persons advanced in years, who are affected with Presbyopia, or what may be called long sightedness often see extremely well after the operation, without the use of glasses. 3rd. Beer and other occulists have supposed, that by removing Cataract in one eye, as soon as formed, the tendency to the disease in the other, through sympathy, is diminished; Mr. Brett's experience however is against this conclusion. 4th. The removal of the deformity, which Cataract occasions in the young of both sexes, particularly in young females, is an argument of considerable weight; finally where one eye is affected with Cataract, it frequently, by the confusion of vision it creates, interferes materially with the sight of the other. Of a hundred cases, taken in succession, operated on by Mr. Brett, 88 were double Cataracts, and 12 single; of these 12, confusion of vision occurred in only one case, and then lasted only for three days; in 7 cases, the vision of the eye operated on was as good or better than that of the other; in three it was of average goodness; and in the remaining two the operation was unsuccessful. Of the above hundred cases, 17 had undergone the native operation in one eye: the disease, however, had not in a single instance been prevented, in consequence, from advancing in the other. The native operation, Mr. Brett considers most barbarous. In the seventeen cases above mentioned, the vision of the eye in fourteen was completly destroyed; in two others it was very imperfect; and in one very good. In almost their best cases, the internal Hyaloid Membrane is broken down, and absorption of the vitreous humour takes place. To these causes may be attributed the tremulous Iris, the closed pupil, amauresis and general suppurative inflammation of the eye, which so frequently follow their operations. Some degree of apparent want of success is likewise no doubt to be attributed to their inability to select proper cases for operation.

Mr. Leckie's case of rupture of the spleen occurred in a corporal of Artillery, 34 years of age. The man had been discharged on the 6th of January, cured of an obstinate Intermittent: he was re-admitted on the 21st of the same month after hard drinking, complaining of acute pain diffused over the whole of the abdomen, with which he had been seized during the night. The belly was tender on pressure, full and round, countenance anxious, breathing quick and short, pulse 130 small and weak, T. white and dry, S. cool, B. open. He was bled to 12 ounces, fomentations were applied, and the bowels attended to, which they continued to be, throughout the case. At 1 P. M. he is reported to be in the hot stage of fever which commenced with rigors at 11. Eighteen leeches were applied, and tenderness of the abdomen continuing, they were repeated the following day. On the 23d he experienced slight pain on pressure along the course of the colon, for which eight leeches were applied. Shortly after the morning visit he was seized with severe rigors followed by a hot and a sweating stage. The pain was completely relieved by the leeches, and the gums had become slightly sore. On the 24th, 25th and 26th he is reported to be free from pain and complaint; about midnight of the last, however, he was seized with excruciating pain in the left side, which soon became diffused over the whole abdomen, and he could not bear the slightest pressure over the region first indicated. The head, thorax, and extremities became cold, the pulse scarcely perceptible, and in three quarters of an hour the man died. On dissection 46 fluid ounces of blood were found in the Cavity of the Peritoneum, a large coagulated mass occupied the left hypochondrium, and communicated with a rupture in the under surface of the spleen, where the vessels enter. When this clot was removed, the spleen was found not to be enlarged. The peritoneum over the small intestines was slightly opaque. Mr. Leckie has since heard it reported, that this man received a severe fall on his left side, the day before his admission into Hospital.

The subject of Mr. Greig's case was a sepoy, 45 years of age. He was admitted into Hospital at 9 o'clock P. M. of the 7th of October, with Intermittent fever, which went off in the course of the night, leaving only slight headache; on the morning of the 8th, leeches were applied to the head and a purgative administered, which gave him great relief. In the evening he said, he felt quite well, and had a little calomel and antimonial powder at bed time. Next morning he declared there was nothing the matter with him, walked to the lines, ate some dinner, and returned to the Hospital before 10 o'clock A. M.. At 11, he was seized with the cold fit of an intermittent fever, during which he died. On opening the abdomen a considerable quantity of dark colored blood was discovered, which was found to have proceeded from numerous openings in the substance of the spleen. This viscus was completely disorganized, very much enlarged and so softened throughout, as scarcely to bear the gentlest handling without breaking; its color was that of chocolate. Mr. Greig states, that this man's previous health was good, and that at no period did he complain of pain or uneasiness in the left Hypochondrium.

The subject of Mr. Hutchinson's dissection was a native, about 25 years of age, who appeared to have enjoyed excellent health previous to the accident which proved fatal. The body was brought for examination, within half an hour after the man's death, and was then still warm. The inspection was postponed in consequence for some hours. On opening the abdomen, it was found filled with fluid blood, which was traced to have proceeded from a rent in the under surface of the spleen. This had been occasioned by a blow, the man had received on the left Hypochondrium with a small piece of brick-bat, which had been thrown at him; but with so little force, that it had left neither discolouration nor abrasion of the surface.

His death, as far as could be learned, almost immediately followed the blow. The spleen could scarcely be said to have been enlarged.

QUARTERLY MEETING OF THE BENGAL MEDICAL RETIRING FUND.

A Quarterly General Meeting of the subscribers to the Fund was held on Monday, the 13th July. On the chair being taken by Mr. Surgeon Corbyn, the report of the Managers for the quarter was read, which stated, that the managers had to bring to the notice of Meeting and the subscribers in general, that doubts have arisen with themselves, and several subscribers, whether it would be practicable to carry the Fund into effect, they considered it to be their duty to solicit the Honourable the Governor-General's permission for putting themselves into communication with Mr. Curnin, with reference to the possibility of including the members of their service in the plan of the Military Retiring Fund proposed by that gentleman. The sanction of his Honor having been obtained, a communication was entered into with Mr. Curnin, who furnished a scheme for their consideration, but it was with feelings of no small regret that the committee had to record their disappointment at the terms that had been offered to them. In consequence it was deemed proper to address the Governor-General on the subject, representing, that Mr. Curnin's scheme was quite impracticable, on account of its not being possible for the Members of the service to pay the high rate of subscriptions that were therein laid down, and under these circumstances they were satisfied, that unless some assistance was granted by the Honorable the Court of Directors, the idea of a Medical Retiring Fund must be altogether abandoned. They ventured to solicit, that the Governor-General in Council would be pleased to bring to the notice of the Hon'ble Court their anxious prayer, that arrangements might be made for the Bengal Medical Service being admitted to the Fund, upon a scale of contributions within their means, and to make this possible, they expressed a hope, that the Hon'ble Court would afford them such aid as might be deemed adequate to place them in an equal position with all other classes of their Military servants. That his Honor the Governor-General would likewise be pleased, to represent to the Hon'ble Court the hardship of their being the only class of the Hon'ble Company's Military servants who did not receive off-reckonings, nor any compensation for off-reckonings, whether in the shape of a direct pecuniary donation like that granted to the Engineers, or in that of superior advantages in the formation of a Retiring Fund. That it was true, that a Medical Retiring Fund had lately been established at Bombay, but superior grades, and staff situations of the Medical Service at that Presidency were far more numerous in proportion than they were in Bengal, while at Madras the Medical Retiring Fund was assisted by a liberal donation from the Honourable Court. The Committee respectfully represented to his Honor, that so long as they could entertain a reasonable hope that their Fund could be established they forbore to trouble him, thankfully accepting the terms offered by the Honorable Court, but now they were compelled most reluctantly to pray for the intercession of his Honor, by the apprehension of the Bengal Medical Service being the only body of the Honourable Company's servants, whose promotion and retirement would be beyond any hope, but from the liberality of the state.

Pending this reference, and likewise the Committee's former application to the Honourable Court of Directors, soliciting that the Fund might be permitted to grant, through private agency, the additional three annuities which the Medical service, in their Memorial of the 20th of February, 1833, petitioned, might be sanctioned to them, they had considered it adviseable to recommend to the general body of subscribers that for the present all payments be suspended on account of the Fund. They likewise recommended that all pecuniary contributions already subscribed should remain in the hands of Government, until the sentiments of the Hon'ble Court were known, seeing, that were they now returned to subscribers there would be no nucleus whatever hereafter to form a Retiring Fund upon, should the Court's reply be favorable.

A statement had been received from the Accountant-General of recoveries effected in the Military Pay Department on account of the Fund from August to October 1834, both months inclusive; amounting to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 5461-10-5., and another in the Civil Department of the Bengal Presidency of subscriptions received during the 1st quarter of 1834-35, amounting to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 1,066-1-1—total Sa. ~~Rs~~ 6,527-11-6. The expenses for Office Establishment, &c. during the quarter amounted to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 98-5-9.

One gentleman, Mr. J. Barber, Assistant-Surgeon, has withdrawn his name from the list of subscribers, and those at present belonging to the Fund, were one Member of the Medical Board, 8 Superintending-Surgeons, 59 Surgeons, and 115 Assistant-Surgeons—total 183.

The report having been approved of, and the accounts for the quarter submitted and passed, the Meeting then separated.

MEETING OF THE PROPRIETORS OF THE UNION BANK.

A half-yearly Meeting of the Proprietors took place at the Bank, on Wednesday the 15th July, pursuant to advertisement.

Captain Vint being called to the Chair, the Secretary read the following Report:—

SECRETARY'S REPORT, JUNE 30, 1835.

"In the customary half yearly Report of Union Bank transactions during the past six months, which is now to be laid before you, nothing appears to call for particular notice, except the extraordinary amount of profit upon Banking business during the period in question, from January to June, 1835 inclusive.

The nett gain of the Bank has amounted to no less than Sa. ~~Rs~~ 94,784-2-3 being within a fraction of 6½ per cent, that is to say, yielding a rate of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 12-10-2 per cent per annum, on the Bank capital, which is more than double the profit of the corresponding six months of 1834, and it is needless to add, very satisfactory. This result, though of course mainly arising from the high value of money in the market, has been also much promoted by the general increase of our business. The Bank deposits have swelled to an amount exceeding by one-eighth the deposits of 1834; the increase appearing greatest under the head of balances fixed at interest.

The circulation of notes has increased somewhat within the half year, though by no means in proportion to the increase of general business, and therefore scarcely to be reckoned as having materially aided the profitable result shown above. The highest point of circulation reached during the six months, has been 5,62,000 in February, and the lowest 3,20,000 in June. In the preceding half year, those extreme points were 5 and under 3. The improvement is slight, but distinct, taking 2½ as the point of greatest depression, to which the circulation descended at the panic period of the great failures.

The Directors in now congratulating their Constituent Proprietors, upon the present condition of the Bank, refer not merely to the circumstance of very large immediate profits accruing to the current year, but likewise to the steady advance which the Institution appears to be gaining in the confidence of the public, as well in the provinces as at the presidency. If the capital of the Bank had been larger so as to meet the numerous unexceptionable calls for accommodation, which have been of necessity declined, the Directors would no doubt, have been enabled to offer a more favorable view of the past half year's operations, even than that which has been now presented.

Before concluding this Report, perhaps it may be expedient to advert to the effect which the accumulating reserved fund on the one hand, and the gradual realizations of doubtful balances on the other, are producing on the item in our accounts, headed Dependencies.

That item consisted originally of 2,7,2,201-4-10, bad and doubtful debts due by the firms which failed up to 1831 only, for by none subsequently have losses been sustained.

Of that amount Sa. ~~Rs~~ 93,574-10 have been realized to this date—leaving a balance due to the Bank of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 1,78,626-10-10.

To meet this, there is in the first place the reserved fund amounting in December, 1834 to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 1,31,835-10-8 which reduced the balance of Dependencies to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 46,791. Against this, we have to set off. 1st.—Five Union Bank Shares, let the property of the Insolvent firm just alluded to but remaining now to be sold—the value of which say at par is 12,500 ~~Rs~~. 2d.—The forthcoming dividend from the Estate of Messrs. Palmer and Co. which we are assured by the Assigness will exceed 5 per Cent or say ~~Rs~~ 7,500. 3d.—Our claim on Gopee Mohun Doss, late Banyan to Messrs. Bonnaffeé and Co. the settlement of whose large debt has hitherto been delayed because of the non-age of his Co.-Partner brothers; as they have at length attained their majority, the Estate must now be divided, for which the necessary steps have been commenced. The above items, with other lesser expected realizations, will no doubt more than cover the true remaining balance of "dependencies," as above reduced to ~~Rs~~ 46,791.

It remains for the proprietors now to determine how much of the nett profits, 94,784, set forth in this Report, shall be appropriated for current dividend, and how much shall be set apart for what may be considered as a new reserved fund to meet any contingencies hereafter, or be divided at some future period.

J. Young, Secretary.

The following resolution was then proposed by Mr. J. Hastie, who congratulated the Meeting on its satisfactory tenor, seconded by Mr. Younghusband and carried unanimously :—

I—That the Report just read be approved and published.

The attention of the Meeting was then drawn to the following statement of the accounts of the Bank :—

REMARKS.

The items of the foregoing Statement, which would appear to call for remark, are "Private Bills Discounted," "Purchasers of Pledged and Forfeit Securities," "Doubtful Debts," "Advance for Legal Proceedings," "Suspence Account, B. N.," and "Suspence Account."

"PRIVATE BILLS DISCOUNTED."—In this item is still included Sa. ~~Rs~~ 7,92,123-14-9, being the balance of the principal amount of the Acceptances, (which charges) for which the Estates of Messrs. Cruttenden, Mackillop and Co., Alexander and Co., Fergusson and Co., and Mackintosh and Co., are liable. For this sum the Bank holds collateral security, besides the direct liability of the four Firms, and the Directors have always therefore considered the whole amount to be good.

"PURCHASERS OF PLEDGED AND FORFEIT SECURITIES."—This item shews the balance of the Acceptances for which part of the collateral security of the Estate of Messrs. Alexander and Co. has been sold:—the Title Deeds of the several Properties remaining with the Bank pending payment in full of the purchase monies. The account has been reduced since the last report in the sum of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 7,59,016-11-10.

"DOUBTFUL DEBTS."—The sum of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 2,35,444-5-6 is the balance of ~~Rs~~ 13,83,952-8-11, this difference having been written off as Bad Debt. This balance was valued by the Directors at the close of the half year just ended at Sa. ~~Rs~~ 1,98,775-8-1.

The profit on the Banking business of the past half year amounts to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 3,86,668-13-5, or at the rate of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 15-7-5½ per cent. per annum on the Stock. Of this sum, the Directors have declared a Dividend at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum, or Sa. ~~Rs~~ 3,50,000, and the balance ~~Rs~~ 36,668-13-5, has been carried to Doubtful Debts in liquidation of the estimated Bad Debt of that account, as alluded to in the preceding paragraph.

"ADVANCE FOR LEGAL PROCEEDINGS."—The amount of this item was advanced to meet the costs of the Appeal made by the Assignees of Palmer and Co., against the Judgment obtained by the Bank in the Supreme Court in the matter of the surplus proceeds of Company's Paper of the Estate of Messrs. Palmer and Co., held by the Bank.

"SUSPENCE ACCOUNT, B. N."—The sum at credit of this account is the balance of Old Bank Notes, marked A. out-standing for more than 10 years, of which since the report of the half year ending 30th June, 1834, only Sa. ~~Rs~~ 5,238 have been paid.

"SUSPENCE ACCOUNT."—The sum at Credit of this account consists of the Interest on the Advances for Indigo made to the Assignees of Alexander and Co., of the profit arising on those Advances; and of other items relating to the Bank's transaction with the late Firm or Estate of Alexander and Co."

SUPREME COURT.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 1, 1835.

Amelia Dent and others v. Thos. D'Souza, and others, by Originat Bill, and Amelia Dent and others v. Margaret Pendergrast, Administratrix of J. Breen, by Bill of Revivor.

The original bill was filed by complainants against John Breen and others, Executors of John Blyth deceased, for an account of his estate. It was referred to the Master to take an account, and Mrs. Pendergrast, the administratrix of John Breen now deceased, came before him to prove the account. On a reference before the Master, it appeared that Breen had borrowed from Blyth ~~Rs~~ 20,000, for which he gave him a receipt promising to pay or account for on demand. About one year afterwards Blyth died, having first made a will appointing Breen one of his executors, and giving legacies to two of Breen's children but no legacy to Breen himself. It was argued by counsel before the Master, that Breen having been appointed executor of Blyth, it operated as an extinguishment of the debt; and the Master, George Money, Esq., reported to that effect. To this report exception was taken, and came on this day for argument.

Mr. Advocate-General, in support of the exception. It is an established rule in equity that the debt is assets for the payment of legacies; see 3*Brown's Chancery Reports, Carey* v. Godinge, in which Lord Thurlow said, he thought it had been a settled point in the Court of Chancery that the appointment of the debtor as executor, was no more than parting with the action; and declared it a trust for the next of kin. The learned counsel also cited cases in 11th and 13th Vesey, and that of Feagle v. Fox, in Barnewell and Cresswell merely stating that the case in Brown and that in 11th Vesey had been given up without argument.

Mr. Clarke followed on the same side.

Mr. Turton for the administratrix of the executor, argued that Blyth's appointment of Breen to be executor of his estate, ought to be considered in the light of a specific legacy to the debtor for the purpose of discharging his debt, and that, therefore, though like other legacies, it shall not be paid or retained against creditors, yet the executor has a right exclusive of the other legacies; and it was evidently so understood and intended by the testator. Blyth was Breen's personal friend, and lent him ~~Rs~~ 20,000, on his receipt to pay on demand, besides which, after lending the money, he appointed him executor, and left every member of the family, except Breen himself, legacies.

Mr. Leith followed, drawing a distinction between the case before the court, and those cited by counsel in support of the exception; and contending that there has been no adjudication on similar circumstances to those appearing in the present case, there being no legacy given to the executor or any disposition of the testator's debts.

Chief Justice.—It is quite clear that this expection must be allowed, Selwyn and Brown, Cas. Temp. Talbot's cases, is an express decision in point. As to costs; this question was argued before the Master, and as he held the executor to be discharged, we cannot allow costs. But as the infant who takes the exception benefits the whole estate of the testator, and the residuary legatees, she must have her costs out of the estate, and the other party must pay her own.

MONDAY, JULY 6.

Lolljee Mull. v. Rajchunder Chowdry.

Mr. Turton, on a former day, obtained an order nisi to shew cause why Mr. William Nelson Hedger, one of the attornies of this court, should not pay the sum of ~~Rs~~ 9,000, part of the levy endorsed on the writ of fieri facias, issued in this action, to the plaintiff. The learned counsel put in the affidavit of Lolljee Mull, a gomastah in the service of Honoomaun Doss, shroff, in the Burra-baazar, which set forth that the defendant being indebted to him in the sum of ~~Rs~~ 3,500, and to Honoomaun Doss ~~Rs~~ 7,000, deponent in March last, applied to defendant for payment, when the latter pleaded his inability but promised to discharge the debt, on the recovery of a certain demand due from one Ameenuddeen Khan against whom he had issued execution, but who had filed a bill to set aside the judgment. Rajchunder requested a further loan of ~~Rs~~ 500, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of filing his answer to the bill, and promised, if deponent would lend him this amount, to execute a bond for the whole amount, about ~~Rs~~ 11,000, with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment. Deponent called on Mr. Hedger, defendant's attorney in the equity suit and in the action, and, the three parties being present, it was agreed that deponent should advance ~~Rs~~ 500, for the expenses of the equity suit in consideration of defendant executing a bond of ~~Rs~~ 22,000, conditional with the payment of Rs. 11,000. The bond and a warrant to confess judgment thereon was executed; and an agreement, in Bengalli, at the foot of the bond, to pay out of the funds to be received from Ameenuddeen, was explained to Mr. Hedger. Judgment was entered up, and on the 4th June a writ of fieri facias issued. On the 15th June Mr. Hedger informed deponent that the payment of the Rs. 500 would be the means of recovering the Rs.11,000; and on several occasions subsequent to this period, Rajchunder, in the presence of Mr. Hedger, directed the latter to pay the Rs. 11,000 whenever it should be recovered from Ameenuddeen Khan, it having been agreed, that an arrangement should take place and that Ameenuddeen should pay Rajchunder Rs. 17,000 in full of all demands. On the 23d of March last, deponent was proceeding towards the Supreme Court when he met Mr. Higgins, Ameenuddeen's attorney, who informed him that his client had offered to compromise the suits for ~~Rs~~ 16,000, and afterwards Mr. Hedger attended at the office of Mr. Higgins and told deponent that all disputes were settled and that Rajchunder Chowdry would receive ~~Rs~~ 17,000;—that he, Mr. Hedger, was to receive ~~Rs~~ 8,000, being a demand for costs and sums advanced to Rajchunder, but that deponent would receive ~~Rs~~ 9,000. At the request of Mr. Hedger the deponent proceeded to that gentleman's office, where he found Rajchunder, who altogether denied having made such an arrangement, whereupon deponent returned to Mr. Higgins's and requested Mr. Hedger to be prepared to seize the money under the execution issued in this Court. Mr. Hedger replied "don't be alarmed" and desired deponent to go back to the office, which he did, but after waiting two hours, he returned to the office of Mr. Higgins whither Rajchunder also went. On the 23d of March the suit between Rajchunder and Ameenuddeen was finally settled, ~~Rs~~ 17,000 being handed over to Mr. Hedger, by Mr. Paul, clerk to Hogg and Sandes, attornies for one Sill who had lent a sum of money to Ameenuddeen for the purpose of settling the dispute with Rajchunder. Mr. Hedger counted out eight notes of one thousand each, and said he would retain that sum on account of his claim; whereupon Rajchunder entreated Mr. Hedger to retain only ~~Rs~~ 6,000, who, after some discussion, consented to retain only 7,000, and handed over to Rajchunder the remainder, ~~Rs~~ 10,000 which Rajchunder placed in the clothes round his waist. Rajchunder then left the office of Mr. Higgins for the purpose of proceeding to that of Mr. Hedger where deponent understood he was to receive the ~~Rs~~ 9,000; and on their way deponent did not lose sight of Rajchunder. On their arrival at Mr. Hedger's that gentleman came in, and deponent requested that he would pay him the ~~Rs~~ 9,000, whereupon Mr. Hedger directed Rajchunder to do so, but that person positively refused, alleging that he could not spare so large a sum as there were other creditors pressing him. Deponent desired Mr. Hedger to seize the money under the execution of this Court, and Mr. Board, the sheriff's officer, was sent for. Mr. Hedger desired Mr. Board to remain in the next room, telling deponent, at the same time, not to act in so pressing a manner. Deponent then stated that Mr. Hedger was his attorney, and that he ought either to procure the payment of ~~Rs~~ 9,000, or to seize it under the process of Court, as the bailiff was in the next room. Mr. Hedger then took Rajchunder into a private room, but afterwards came back, and said he could procure no settlement, and desired both parties to quit his office and settle their disputes out of doors. Deponent and Rajchunder then proceeded into the street when the former told the latter that he had given the remainder of the notes to one of Mr. Hedger's writers. The deponent alleges that Mr. Hedger's writer received the money with that gentleman's knowledge and acquiescence; and that he left all matters in dispute to Mr. Hedger as his attorney.

On Friday last, Mr. Advocate-General, with whom was Mr. Clarke, shewed cause, and put in the affidavit of Mr. Hedger which, in the substance, denies that any agreement was made between Rajchunder Chowdry and Lolljee Mull, in his presence, for the payment of ~~Rs~~ 11,00, conditional with the advance of ~~Rs~~ 500, or that Lolljee offered to pay this latter amount to deponent; but admits that Lolljee paid that sum to Rajchunder; denying that he, the deponent has at any time received it. The affidavit states that Lolljee and Rajchunder, on the 17th March last, called at Mr. Hedger's office, whereupon Rajchunder informed Mr. Hedger, that Lolljee had promised to advance ~~Rs~~ 500, and on the 27th of May the money was paid in Mr. Hedger's presence, Rajchunder executing a bond and warrant. Deponent denies that a Bengallee agreement, said to have been at the foot of the warrant, was explained to him; and denies having made any promises of payment to Lolljee on the recovery of the debt from Ameenuddeen Khan, but admits that he has informed Lolljee that he had hopes of recovering a large sum of money from that person on account of Rajchunder. States that Lolljee employed deponent and his partner, and that they by his direction entered up judgment, on the bond and warrant, and caused a writ of fieri facias to be issued to the Sheriff to levy ~~Rs~~ 11,167. This writ was enlarged until 15th June. Deponent states that Rajchunder's common law and equity suit has been carried on without any advance, and that, besides costs, Rajchunder is indebted upwards of Rs. 2,000. Deponent denies that Rajchunder directed him to pay Lolljee when the amount should be received from Ameenuddeen Khan, or that deponent promised to do so. On the 20th of March it was agreed between Rajchunder and Ameenuddeen, to settle all disputes, the latter agreeing to pay to the former Rs. 17,000. This negociation was going on about twenty days before it was completed, and during this time, deponent admits that he promised to use his influence with Rajchunder in order to induce him to pay Lolljee on receipt of the money from Ameenuddeen, Lolljee having told deponent of a promise made by Rajchunder to that effect. But Rajchunder denied the existence of such promise, stating that he had several creditors, who were all pressing him for money, and that it was his intention to divide the money which he would receive from Ameenuddeen amongst them all. During this negociation deponent was called upon by Prussonnocoomar Tagore, one of his clients, who stated that he held a bond and warant to enter up judgment against Rajchunder, and the latter had promised to pay him a considerable sum out of the amount he was to receive from Ameenuddeen. On the 20th March the terms of settlement were finally arranged, and deponent immediately informed Lolljee of the arrangement. On the 21st March Rajchunder called on deponent and informed him that Lolljee insisted on having payment of the whole amount of the sum to be received from Ameenuddeen, and that Prussonnocoomar Tagore, and Radamadub Bannerjee, to whom he was also indebted, had respectively told him that unless he paid a part of their claims they would issue execution on the judgment which they held and put him into jail;—that he, Rajchunder, was desirous to divide fairly what he might receive amongst his creditors, and it was then agreed between deponent and Rajchunder that deponent should receive ~~Rs~~ 8,000, on account for costs and business done in the several suits. Deponent informed Lolljee of this agreement, whereupon Lolljee begged that he would pay to him ~~Rs~~ 9,000, the remainder of the Rs. 17,000, but deponent refused to interfere as there was another person, his client, who had a similar claim. On 21st March deponent and Rajchunder went to Mr. Higgins's office, in order to complete the arrangement with Ameenuddeen, and deponent in the presence of Mr. Higgins told Lolljee to arrange with Rajchunder in the best way he could, and that he should be present when the money was paid over to Rajchunder by Ameenuddeen. Deponent further saith that Lolljee conversed apart with Rajchunder, after which he appeared satisfied, and he was informed by deponent that the matter would be settled on the following Monday, when he was requested to be present. On the 23d of March deponent went to the office of Mr. Higgins, where it had been arranged the money should be paid. Shortly afterwards Lolljee Mull arrived. Deponent denies that he then promised that the balance of ~~Rs~~ 9,000, should be paid over to Lolljee, or that Lolljee requested him to seize the money under the execution issued in the cause. At about half past four o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Paul, clerk to Messrs. Hogg and Sandes, attornies for one Sill, arrived at Mr. Higgins's with the money which it had been agreed was to be paid to Rajchunder, viz. 17,000 in bank notes, the same were handed over to deponent, who counted eight of one thousand rupees each, which he said he would retain for his costs, but was afterward prevailed on to keep only Rs. 7,000, and handed over the Rs 10,000 to Rajchunder. Lolljee Mull then demanded payment from Rajchunder, but the latter refused. Deponent denies that Lolljee in company with Ramchunder afterwards came to his office by his direction, but on his return he found the parties there in loud altercation on the subject of the Bank notes; Lolljee appealed to deponent, and requested him to insist on the payment of the money. Deponent refused to do so, but said he would advise Rajchunder to pay the money: Rajchunder, however, refused, but offered to pay Rs. 3,000, whereupon Lolljee requested deponent to send to the Sheriff's office for an officer. Deponent wrote a note and sent it to the Sheriff's office, but before the arrival of an officer, Lolljee became much enraged, and made use of abusive language to Rajchunder, when the deponent, hoping to arrange the matter in dispute, left his desk and proceeded into the adjoining room, and called Rajchunder to him, and advised him to make a larger offer to Lolljee, but Rajchunder refused, for the same reasons which he had before stated. Deponent then came from the room and endeavoured to persuade Lolljee to accept the offer; Lolljee refused, and shortly afterwards the Sheriff's officer arrived and during the time deponent was informing the officer, that Lolljee was desirous of seizing the Rs 9,000, Lolljee and Rajchunder left the office. Shortly afterwards Lolljee returned and informed deponent that he had searched Rajchunder who had stated that he had given the Rs 9,000 to a writer in deponent's office which Rajchunder in deponent's presence denied. Deponent admits that Lolljee demanded of deponent as his attorney to insist upon Ramchunder delivering him the money, and to direct it to be seized;—denies having received more than Rs 7,000 from Rajchunder, and admits that Lolljee left all matters in this suit to deponent as his attorney.

Mr. Advocate-General and Mr. Clarke opposed the rule absolute, mainly urging that Mr. Hedger could not seize the money in the hands of Rajchunder, as such seizure would clash with the interests of other clients.

Mr. Turton and Mr. Leith replied, and contended that this was a case of negligence on the part of the attorney, who ought not to have undertaken to act where the interests of his clients clashed. Mr. Leith cited a case in 7 Mod. Rep. 47, wherein it is held that an attorney may not act for both sides even with the consent of both parties.

The rule absolute was moved on Friday, and the Court, after hearing counsel, took time to consider.

The Chief Justice now pronounced his decision.—This certainly is a case of very considerable importance to the public on the one hand, and to Mr. Hedger on the other. The rule applies, first, that the attorney shall answer the matter in the affidavit, and secondly, that he shall shew cause why he should not pay over Rs. 9,000 to Lolljee Mull. I think it right to say with reference to the first matter, that is, an answer to the affidavit, that, so far as any misconduct or want of integrity is imputed to Mr. Hedger, he has given a satisfactory answer to the Court. As to the other point, whether Mr. Hedger ought to pay Rs. 9,000; it is a question not involving his integrity, but simply, whether the case, as stated in Mr. Hedger's own affidavit, (to which we look for as it is the last sworn, we discard all that is contained in that of Loljee Mull,) is not one on which the rule ought to be made absolute. After giving the facts much consideration, I am of opinion that the rule ought to be made absolute; that Mr. Hedger must pay the Rs. 9,000 and that he must pay the costs of this application. The ground is shortly this:—Lolljee Mull thought his debt was to be discharged from the fund paid by Ameenuddeen to Rajchunner Chowdry; Mr. Hedger, being attorney both for Lolljee and for Rajchunder, was aware of the whole proceedings in the equity suit, and of the writ of fieri facias, including the compromise and the payment of the money. Now in what situation has he placed himself with reference to all these parties? He was attorney for complainant and defendant; true it is, there was no formal action, but judgment confessed. His client instructed him. Mr. Hedger swears not to proceed on the writ of fieri facias, because the other party was about to come to a compromise. It is not stated at what date Mr. Hedger received these instructions from his client. On the 21st of March, however, he was informed that Rajchunder would not comply with the terms of Lolljee and pay the debt out of the fund to be received. Now what was Mr. Hedger's duty at that time as attorney for Lolljee Mull? It was to seize the money in the hands of Ameenuddeen. It is said, the money was in the hands of one Sill and could not be seized. On the following Monday, however, it came into Mr. Hedger's own hands, and then he took his costs, and handed over the remainder to Rajchunder. Now what was his duty at that time as attorney for Lolljee, independent of his duty as attorney for Rajchunder, which we cannot look at here? It was his duty to have seized the money for Lolljee. It is said that Prussonnocoomar Tagore, a client of Mr. Hedger's, had a bond and warrant, and that Mr. Hedger could not have seized the money without interfering with the interests of Prussonnocoomar: but an attorney must not put himself in an equivocal situation in which the interests of his clients clash. It is quite clear that he was not himself in that situation; he was attorney for Rajchunder, for Lolljee, and for Prussonnocomar; and he secured his own claim for Rs 7,000, a large proportion of the amount received, leaving only Rs 2,000 due to him. It is on this ground that we decide. I think it right to say there is nothing to affect the honesty of Mr. Hedger's character. You may look at it in the light of two innocent parties, and the question is which should suffer? Clearly, he who had the most skill. There can be no doubt that Lolljee expected to receive the money from Rajchunder; that is satisfactorily shewn in the affidavit. We decide that Mr. Hedger must pay the Rs 9,000 and the costs of this application.

Mr. Justice Grant.—I have considered this case with the most careful and the most painful attention, and do not think we ought to attribute to Mr. Hedger any intention which can or ought to affect his character. I cannot look at the case as a mere mistake; but a negligence of duty arising from his having improvidently placed himself in a situation in which he could not act for one client without interfering with the interest of another. I may add, however, that it would have been more satisfactory to me had Mr. Hedger explicitly answered that part of the affidavit that charges him with a knowledge of the Bengallee note at the foot of the agreement. If he was acquainted with that agreement between Rajchunder Chowdry and Lolljee Mull, he was placing himself as a trustee for both parties by receiving the money, and was bound to see that each party fulfilled the agreement. But if not acting as a trustee, he was the attorney for Lolljee Mull, and by the case very properly cited by Mr. Leith, from 7 Mod. Rep. it is clear that he was acting contrary to his duty, in acting as the attorney for another whose interests were conflicting. It is perfectly clear that it was not his duty to consider what might be the wishes and desires of Rajchunder, however praiseworthy they might be; and it was still less his duty to consider what might be the wishes and desire of another creditor, for he was not there to make an equitable adjustment amongst them. I regret that a gentleman of Mr. Hedger's respectability should have placed himself in this situation, but I only regard it as a civil consequence arising out of the situation of the parties, and not as imputing any want of integrity.

The Chief Justice cited Exparte Bayley in re Harper 6 Barn. and Cress. rep. as an authority exactly in point as to the ground on which this case has been decided: and also as an authority that where the money could be recovered in equity, the Court is in the habit of making the order on motion. The following is the marginal note:—

"A party was articled as a clerk to one of two attornies in partnership, and paid a premium and acted as clerk to the two partners for two months, when the attorney to whom he had been articled died: the Court ordered the surviving partner to refund a portion of the premium, although at the time of the payment of such premium his partner was indebted to him, and the premium had been set off in account between them. Lord Tenterden said, I am of opinion that this case is not to be decided by any strict rule of law. The Court exercises a jurisdiction over attornies, and that is to be exercised according to law and conscience and not by any technical rules."

Mr. Advocate-General hoped the Court would take into consideration the fact that, Lolljee at present held a mortgage on the property of Rajchunder to the extent of Rs 5,000, and that another execution had issued.

But the Court made no reply.—Ibid.

Lackersteen and others, v. Rostan and others.

By a decree in the suit, on the 15th January, it was referred to Dr. St. Leger, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to make an award on six several points:

First,—The qualification of persons now entitled, or shall hereafter be entitled and admitted to vote as Roman Catholic inhabitants of Calcutta, at the election of Vicar, or Wardens, of the Church of Noso Senhora De Rozario.

Secondly,—The qualification of persons entitled to be elected as Wardens.

Thirdly,—As to the measures to be adopted for the better security of the funds of the said Church.

Fourthly,—As to the qualification of persons to be elected to the office of Trustee of the said funds.

Fifthly,—As to the payment of all sums due to the Rev. Fre Antonio De Santa Maria, the vicar of the said Church as well for salary, as for expenditure and disbursements to the poor, and for other objects connected with the church and charities, and charitable institutions connected therewith, and also, as to the payment of the costs of the several parties to the original and supplemental suit, and to award and finally determine out of what fund, and to whom, when, and in what manner, the same shall be paid.

Dr. St. Leger having made his award, it was brought into Court for confirmation, and the case was set down for final decree.

Mr. Advocate-General, counsel for complainants, had been engaged in this suit for some years, and he took some credit to himself, for having said from the commencement that it would either go on for ever or come to some amicable arrangement. Fortunately, when Dr. St. Leger came out, the differences between the several parties had been referred to him by the Court, and he having made an award satisfactory to all parties, the decree would be taken on consent in the words of the award.

Mr. Clarke observed, that the decree was to be taken on consent, and he would take this opportunity of doing justice to Dr. St. Leger. The parties to this suit had for years been actuated by violent animosities; every attempt at reconciliation had failed, and their disputes had been carried on within the pale of the church itself; but now, through the influence of Dr. St. Leger, all parties were reconciled, and his award had the rare merit of meeting with the approbation of all the legal litigants and yet securing the objects of the charitable donors.—Ibid.

Gee v. Turner.

This was an action to recover damages for criminal conversation with the plantiff's wife. Defendant was recently a clerk in a mercantile establishment in this town—plaintiff about two years since carried on business at Cawnpore, as a wine and provision dealer.

Mr. Clarke opened the pleadings.

Mr. Advocate General stated the case for the plaintiff. This is an action brought against defendant to recover damages for adultery with the plaintiff's wife. Mr. Gee is a tradesman in an extensive business, and some time ago carried on trade at Cawnpore. There he married his present wife; there she bore him five children, three of whom are now alive to lament the necessity he is under of bringing this action. About two years ago plaintiff left Cawnpore and came to reside in this town which has since been his place of residence. Defendant came to Calcutta in February, 1834, and resided, in the first instance, with a family named Dunbar, whith whom he had lived during his minority; he is now about twenty-seven. Mr. Dunbar had been for a number of years intimate with the family of Mr. Gee, and this circumstance, of course, led to an acquaintance with Mr. Turner, who was invited to the house of the plaintiff. There he went, and afterwards, a greater degree of intimacy having taken place, he became a frequent visitor; and there he has not thought it consistent with his notions of gratitude to commit adultery with the wife of the man in whose hospitality he has so frequently participated. In actions of this nature he (the learned counsel,) was aware that it was a frequent habit to set forth in glowing colours the beauty and accomplishments of the woman whose departure from the paths of virtue the plaintiff had to regret. He never, even in his early days, was very much addicted to flowery imagery, and his predilections did not increase as he advanced in life. He had, therefore, made no enquiries as to the woman's beauty or accomplishments, but he had found that she had been for thirteen years the wife of the plaintiff; that she was the mother of children now at an age to require her care, and that by the act of the defendant she had been prevented performing her duty eitheir to their children or the parent of them. Amongst these children was a young lady aged thirteen, a time of life too early for marriage, even in this country, where, as the Court are aware, marriages take place much earlier than in England. This young lady was receiving her education at a school in Chowringhee, there she passed most of her time, but she came home on Saturdays and Sundays, and at those times the defendant made a point of being present, paying her every possible attention, such as led all to believe that at no distant time those attentions would ripen into an union of more permanent duration. This he, the learned counsel, thought was the strongest part of the case, where, under the mask of friendship, defendant had partaken of the plaintiff's hospitality, and under the pretence of making advances to the daughter, had concealed his intention to commit adultery with her father's wife. The particulars were few but conclusive. In January last Mrs. Gee miscarried, and, in consequence, lived apart from her husband; she continued for some time indisposed, but when she began to recover, she went, as is usual in this country, for a short time on the river, accompanied by the family of a friend. When she came back she refused to return to her husband's bed, declaring that she would sleep separate, and in another room. True it is, that the room she slept in is the one adjoining to that of her husband, but it is also true that there was a lock on the door, and a private staircase by which any person might have access to her without discovery. This room was formerly used for the children, but they were removed in order that Mrs. Gee might experience the convenience of it, and there she continued to sleep until May last. It was not known how long the criminal intimacy existed, how it began, or where it was carried on, but in May last a circumstance occurred which put it beyond all doubt that the plaintiff had been disgraced. In the house of Mr. Gee resided two gentlemen of very great respectability, a fortunate circumstance for this case, for they would be adduced as witnesses this day; and he, the learned counsel, would not be exposed to the charge which might have been otherwise put forth by his learned friend, of bringing no persons forward as witnesses, but hirelings or discarded servants. One of these gentlemen is Mr. Davis, who has resided with Mr. Gee since he came to Calcutta, and the other is a Mr. Carey, a son of the gentleman who was well known as the principal missionary at Serampore, where also Mr. Carey's family resided, and whither he was in the habit of returning on Saturdays and Sundays, but the rest of the week he resided at the house of the plaintiff. On the night of the 28th of May, or the morning of the 29th, for on this point these gentlemen differed, they received a message from Mrs. Gee, desiring them to come up stairs, where they immediately went. But he, the learned counsel, should state that previously to this,

Mr. Gee had gone into his wife's room and requested her to return to her former apartment, upon which she made a considerable noise, and having sent the bearer down for Carey and Davis, told those gentlemen, on their coming up-stairs, that her husband had been behaving very violently, and had threatened to kill her, and declared that she would quit the house. From these gentlemen the Court would hear the manner,—the unaffected surprise—with which the husband heard this accusation. These gentlemen gave no credit to her assertions, and they did what was their duty if they believed the plaintiff innocent, though not their duty if they believed him guilty, they urged her not to leave the house, telling her that circumstances which take place between husband and wife in private ought not to be divulged, and that if she left the house at that hour it would be a reflection for ever on her private character. However, she persisted, and ordered the carriage to be got ready, but this Mr. Gee refused to allow. At length she suffered herself to be pursuaded, and remained at the house during the following day, but on the evening of the 30th May, when Mr. Gee returned from his ride, he discovered she was not at home. Enquiries were instantly made, and on the following day he learned, that she had thought fit to go to the house of the defendant, where she had remained from that time till the present. Now he, Mr. Advocate-General, was aware that his learned friend was instructed, that Mrs. Gee was expelled the house, and fled to the first place she could find, and that defendant, forsooth, could not refuse her an asylum. There was no doubt that she had been well schooled, and that this was the original arrangement; that she might appear unwilling to leave her husband's house, but that a regard for her own life made the step inoperative, and, therefore, she was justified in taking refuge where she could. If these were his learned friend's instructions he must say a case of greater aggravation, a deeper infliction on the feelings of a husband he had never heard, for what would the Court think, when he adduced evidence that for months before the event he had just related, the criminal intimacy had occurred, and had been continued, nay, that defendant had boasted that the child of which Mrs. Gee had miscarried was his own? It would also be proved that the defendant was in the habit of visiting Mrs. Gee, in the most extraordinary way, habiting himself on those occasions in the dress of a common Chinaman, apprehending, perhaps, that it was a disguise, the baseness of which corresponded with the baseness of his design, for that by this means he did carry on an adulterous intercouse with this woman for a very considerable time appears too certain. He, the learned counsel, was quite aware that he could not now urge these facts with a view to vindictive damages. Our fathers were not so nice, but recent decisions established that the amount of damages was given not with a view of punishing the offender, but of pointing out the greater degree of injury sustained by the husband. But looking at the breach of friendship and hospitality,—the attempt to impute to the husband's conduct the necessity of the elopement,—the conduct of defendant towards plaintiff's daughter,—he did not think that there ever was a case of adultery, he would not say involving more important circumstances, regarding the parties' rank in life, but one more injuriously directed at the happiness and character of the husband. One word more with reference to plaintiff's sister Mrs. Poulson. She was in Court, and he took it for granted, would be examined by his learned friend who had subpœnaed her. He took it for granted that defendant had not made his learned friend the unknowing instrument of practising a deception on the Court, and that, as the witness was present, he would seek that testimony which he had appeared desirous to obtain. If so, he, the Advocate-General, supposed, he should have another opportunity of addressing their lordships, but if not, the Court would consider the application for her attendance only as one link in the chain of falsehood and deceit which extends throughout this transaction.

Ramcoomar Ghose and Mr. G. E. Hudson, proved the jurisdiction. The latter deposed, I went to defendant's house on the 31st of May, saw defendant and Mrs. Gee on that occasion. I enquired what had induced her to leave her husband's house, and I informed Mr. Turner, that Mr. Gee was about to bring an action against him. He replied the sooner the better. (Cross-examined.) I did not ask Mrs. Gee to return to her husband; I enquired if he had no wish to return, she replied that she had not. I also enquired if she had no wish to see her children, but these questions were not put by desire of Mr. Gee. (Re-examined.) I had at that time instructions to commence proceedings from Mr. Gee.

Thomas Watkins deposed. I am a member of the firm of Watkins and Cliff; I know defendant; he resided with me, but left my house on the 30th of May. Had conversation with defendant regarding Mrs. Gee, when he told me that she was residing with him in Creek Row, and that she came there on the night of the 30th May. Had some conversation with defendant five days ago: he told me it was known to all the servants that the child with which Mrs. Gee miscarried was his. Gee's house is about thirty yards from mine: defendant used to pass his evenings there, returning home, sometimes, so late as half past nine. Never heard from him that he had been there at a later hour. Defendant, when at home, wears a China jacket, such as Chinese of respectability wear at Canton, but I am not aware that he went to Gee's in that dress. I was thinking of leaving Calcutta about the latter end of May last, defendant was to accompany me up the country. We made purchases for that purpose, but the project was delayed partly on account of this elopement. (Cross-examined) Defendant was in the employ of a mercantile house here, first at 52 ~~Rs~~ then at 64 ~~Rs~~ per mensem, but resigned his employment four days previous to 30th May. (Re-examined.) Believes defendant has some money, but don't know how much. He told me "his girl" would go up the country with him, and I believe he alluded to Mrs. Gee.

Mrs. H. Dessa proved the marriage of plaintiff and his wife at Cawnpore in 1822. Witness accompanied Mrs. Gee to Church on that occasion. (Cross-examined). At that time plaintiff was about forty, Mrs. Gee was more than fourteen but not fifteen; she was quite a child in age, but a fine bulky young woman in appearance. Saw them three years afterwards. Don't know Mr. Turner or Mrs. Poulson. Was acquainted with Mrs. Gee's mother and father: he was an European merchant, and is since deceased. Her mother was born in this country. Major Owen was present at the ceremony, so was Mr. Foley of the Custom House, Cawnpore. (Re-examined by Mr. Clarke.) I saw Mrs. Gee three days previous to the ceremony, she seemed very happy, and I was the person she chose to dress her.

Mr. John Davis.—I am a tradesman; my place of business is at Benares where I have resided for nineteen years. I arrived in Calcutta, on the 18th April last, and have since that time resided at the house of Mr. Gee. I have seen Mrs. Gee on three occasions at Benares, and since I came to Calcutta. Plaintiff has two daughters and one son. Seen defendant since my arrival. Plaintiff's eldest daughter is at Miss Fulton's school in Chowringhee, but she used to come home on Saturdays, remain there during Sunday, and return on Monday, and she remained a week at home during Easter. Defendant was regularly at Gee's to dinner on Saturdays and Sundays, and, as I thought, paid particular attention to Miss Gee. I considered the seat next to Miss Gee as the one which Mr. Turner usually took. He paid much attention to the young lady, so much that on one occasion when he was sitting between the mother and the daughter, I thought it right to rise and proceed to the extremity of the verandah. On the night of the 28th or morning of the 29th May, the sirdar bearer awoke me, saying Mrs. Gee wanted to see me. I was taken by surprize, but I put on my trowsers and gown, and being joined by Mr. Carey, went up-stairs to the upper-hall. We found there Mrs. and Mr. Gee, the former said the latter had threatened to kill her. I said it was impossible, and that it was a family dispute in which strangers ought not to interfere. Plaintiff declared that he had never made use of the expression. I did not hear him use any harsh expressions. Saw Mrs. Gee the next day, Friday, and went out in the evening to ride with the plaintiff: we returned at eight o'clock, when we found Mrs. Gee had gone out, leaving word with the servant that an European lady had called for her in a carriage with two bay horses. She did not return that night, and at my suggestion, no minute enquiry was instituted. The following morning we made further enquiries, and on Sunday Mr. Hudson and myself had an interview with her, in a house in Creek Row in the presence of defendant. They were sitting near each other, at a circular table. She asked me if I was not aware that her husband had threatened to kill her. Plaintiff and his wife lived together as married people usually do: his conduct was that of an affectionate husband. (Cross-examined.) Don't know if plaintiff and his wife frequently quarrelled: there appeared to have been a dispute in the morning. Plaintiff told me that he called his wife to come to his bed, and that she replied "no, you will kill me," and he answered "impossible."

Dr. Jackson deposed that he attended Mrs. Gee on several occasions, one of which was, a threatened miscarriage in January last. Family arrangements induced witness to leave Calcutta about that time, and on his return he was informed that Mrs. Gee had miscarried. Witness saw her afterwards. On all occasions Mr. Gee's conduct was affectionately attentive (Cross-examined.) Witness has seen Mr. Turner about fifteen months since, his appearance is that of about 25 years of age.

Dr. Graham deposed that he attended Mrs. Gee for a few days during the absence of Dr. Jackson, thought plaintiff's conduct particularly kind and attentive.

Mr. Jabez Carrey deposed as follows. I am a son of the late Dr. Carrey, and know both Mr. and Mrs. Gee. I first knew Mr. Gee in 1819, but have been particularly intimate with him for the last five months during which time I have resided at his house. Remembers the 30th May; there was a dispute between plaintiff and his wife, one complaining of the other, and Mr. Davis and I were called up. I do not think Mr. Gee spoke harshly. I have not seen Mrs. Gee since. Plaintiff's conduct to his wife was kind and affectionate. I know Mr. Turner, he was a frequent visitor at Mrs. Gee's during the Easter holidays. There was a freedom between him and Miss Gee, which I, as a parent, would not have permitted. He used to speak to her and sit close to her. (Cross-examined.) I have heard defendant was a clerk, but never that he was in the habit of making presents to Mrs. Gee. I was present on one occasion at a dance, but don't know if the music was paid for by defendant. Plaintiff is boisterous and loud in his manners; don't recollect having advised him to be more moderate. I know Mrs. Poulson: saw her two or three days before Mrs. Gee left her husband; have heard she was present at the time of the miscarriage. There are people in Calcutta who have lived as servants in the family during the last two years. There were two Portuguese women when I first went there. A cook and ayah have been examined at the attorney's office; also a young Malay woman. Never heard that plaintiff had seen Turner in bed with his wife. The Malay woman did not so state it. I acted as interpreter, and was present when she was examined. She stated that her master came into the room and conversed with Mrs. Gee, but the purdah was down. I do not know that plaintiff and his wife have not occupied the same room for the last year. The Malay woman did not state at the attorney's office that plaintiff called out to his wife on one occasion. "What noise is that which the bed is making?" &c. &c. The two bed rooms adjoined. Mr. Gee appeared very happy with his wife; she did not appear so happy. Plaintiff has felt much since his wife went away; I thought he would have lost his reason.

Munno Ayah deposed.—I came from Cawnpore with Mrs. Gee about two years since; she brought three children with her. At first plaintiff and his wife slept in the same room and in the same bed; I slept in another bed with the children in the next room. The door used to remain open. But when Mrs. Gee became unwell she slept in the children's room on a couch. The musquito curtains were dark. After the miscarriage, Mrs. Gee remained ill for twenty days, then she rose, walked about, and came to the table. A short time after she went on the river, Mrs. Favier being with her, and she remained away two or three days. I know defendant. He used to come to the house on Saturdays and Sundays and sometimes during the week. I have seen defendant in Mrs. Gee's room. On one occasion, after nine o'clock, Mrs. Gee retired to her chamber, undressed herself, having first fastened the door, bolted it and locked it. After she had undressed herself she directed me to retire. I did so, and she shut the door after me. After I quitted the room I looked through some venetians that opened into the bathing room, and I saw the defendant in a Chinaman's dress, sitting close to Mrs. Gee, who had her usual night dress on. Defendant used to come up the back stair case. Mrs. Gee did not then sleep in the same bed with her husband. It is about three months since this circumstance took place. She had her night chemise on, nothing else. I did not look on for any length of time, but retired to the children. Defendant remained there the whole night. I saw him go away on another occasion down the back stair case. On another occasion, when the door was ajar, I entered that room, Mr. Turner and Mrs. Gee were close together; they started and I retired. This was after nine o'clock; they were on the couch on which she slept, and she had only her night dress on. She shut the door, and locked and barred it. I know she received chits from defendant which she tore and threw away. (Cross-examined.) I was dismissed by Mrs. Gee; my husband was turned away at the same time; he had seen the durwan take a box to Turner's and he had remonstrated. The durwan communicated this to Mrs. Gee, and she dismissed us. The morning after the elopement I was desired to attend, and Mr. Gee asked me, if I knew where Mrs. Gee was. After this, plaintiff's sister addressed me, saying "Ayah, speak the truth, and say who used to visit Mrs. Gee—did not Turner come? Did not letters come from him?" To which I answered Turner did come, and letters came. Plaintiff and his wife did not go out together, she went in the chaise, and he went in the buggy. They slept together until the miscarriage, after which they never slept together. Plaintiff sometimes came into his wife's room, sometimes when she has been undressing, and after conversing with her for a short time he would retire, when she would shut the door. This was at the time she had recovered her health. They used to have quarrels, but on those occasions she used to speak in a loud voice, while he used to look so,—and hold his tongue.

Dr. Daunt, H. M. 44th Foot, deposed, that he attended Mr. Gee's family when at Cawnpore, and that he never saw any person manifest greater anxiety for his family during their illness than plaintiff.

Francis Favier, deposed, that he had known plaintiff for twenty two years, and Mrs. Gee since 1831. Always thought that they lived affectionate and happy together. (Cross examined) Mrs. F. did not visit the Gees much, but they were on visiting terms. Did not know that there were frequent bickerings and quarrels between plaintiff and his wife. Thought that these quarrels were chiefly owing to her temper. Knew she had one hundred rupees per mensem allowed her for the house expenses and for the horses, and that some land settled on Mrs. Gee, was sold by plaintiff. Mrs. Gee executing the conveyance a little out of temper.

This was the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Turton, with whom was Mr. Grant, addressed the Court at great length on behalf of the defendant. The learned counsel stated that it was impossible to deny the main fact of the case, but in extenuation, strongly urged the disparity of the ages of plaintiff and his wife; their living apart, since January after the complete recovery of health, and that Mrs. Poulson, the most intimate acquaintance of the family had not been called on behalf of the plaintiff. Mr. Turton then commented on the opening of the case by plaintiff's counsel, particularly that part of it which noticed the appearance of defendant in the Chinaman's dress, and on the alleged attentions paid to plaintiff's daughter, a child of twelve years age.

The Court gave a verdict of damages Rs. 400, stating as the grounds that it was proved beyond all doubt that plaintiff was much attached to his wife, but that there did appear a carelessness in his having lived apart from her after the complete recovery of her health, and that some weight was to be attached to the argument of Mr. Turton, regarding the want of Mrs. Poulson's evidence. Besides it was not shewn that defendant was a man of large property, and the Court must bear in mind that he could not be discharged from the damages under the insolvent act without undergoing a certain period of imprisonment. But on the other hand, the children were deprived of their mother, and the Court must not hold out that because a man is poor, he may offend with impunity.—Ibid.

MONDAY, JULY 13.

Heatley v. Melville.

This was an issue directed by the Court.

Mr. Clarke opened.

Mr. Advocate-General.—Their lordships have heard that the only question for trial is whether a Company's paper for Rs. 35,000 was given or not by the late Mr. Frazer to his wife. The consideration of this question, stript of all possible legal investigation, appears very simple, and so it is, but notwithstanding, the court would excuse him, the Advocate-General, stating as shortly as possible, the circumstances connected with it. In April, 1823, Mr. Fraser, a gentleman very, very far advanced in years, married Miss Gold, aged 33, then in the Orphan School establishment, where not only are the children of officers, pupils during their infancy, but continue until they think fit to remove, or are provided for in some other way. The rule of this institution is, that any orphan who marries with the consent of the directors, is entitled to Rs. 2,000, when her husband is expected to place in the Bengal Mariners' and Widows' Fund. At the time this lady was married, she had that sum, as others have had before, but her husband was too far advanced in life to be insured in the Fund, and he thought proper to settle on the lady Rs. 25,000, the interest of which would have produced Rs. 80, per month, about the sum she would have been entitled to receive on the death of her husband had the amount been placed in the Widows' Fund. The marriage took place, the settlement having been previously drawn up, though not previously executed,—but of that he did not complain, for it was executed a few days after the marriage took place, and no doubt it was clearly obligatory, and as clearly vested the property, as it had been executed the day before the marriage took place. But a few days afterward,—and looking at probabilities this fact was of importance,—Fraser added a memorandum to that instrument, by which his wife was held excluded from all dower, to which, nothing can be more clear, than that she would previously have been entitled. However, they went on, and lived together in a tolerably comfortable way, considering the difference of age, and perhaps there would have been no difference whatever but for what he was about to state. Mr. Fraser had five illegitimate children, to each of whom he had given Rs. 25,000, and to one Rs. 30,000, a very large sum when it is considered what was the amount that he settled on his wife. As he, the Advocate-General, said before, it appears that Fraser and his wife led a tolerably comfortable life, but the cause that embittered all was these natural children who were constantly interfering with them. They lived together, till 1832, at which time Fraser was very near eighty four years of age, when, in April, if he, the Advocate-General, recollected right, Fraser was seized with apoplexy on the 13th and died on the 16th. Now long before this he had been considering in what manner he should provide for his wife: he knew, considering his fortune, which amounted to two or three lakhs of rupees, that she was very inadequately provided for, and that Rs. 25,000 was not that to which she was justly entitled; indeed, it is plain that if all the children had been legitimate instead of natural, that she would have been entitled to something more. Accordingly their lordships would find, Fraser had intended to lay out Rs. 42,000 on a house intended for Mrs. Fraser. There was no doubt whatever of that part of the case:—there was one piece of evidence on which there could be no doubt at all, which set forth that sum in his handwriting, "for improving Nancy's fortune." About fifteen or sixteen days before his death or before he was taken ill, Fraser came home bringing with him a box, which box contained, as he said, Company's paper. At this time he had made a will, in which he had left his wife nothing but Rs. 10,000 for life, but though he had done this in his will, at the instigation of his natural children, he had not abandoned all intention of making her a consideration in another way. On this occasion, on his return, he called his wife to him, shewed her the will and asked if she was satisfied with the drawing up of it. She replied, very naturally, that she could not say she was, for that she was his wife, and entitled to his first consideration; and though he was their father they were natural children only. He answered, he did not like to alter the will as it would cause a disagreement in the family, but showing her a Company's paper, he said, "I will give you this Rs. 30,000, which will do as well as if you had been in the will.' Now he, Mr. Advocate-General, could urge that this was clearly a gift in contemplation of death; but this was not the time for such argument. He might, however, mention, that the reading of the will would be a strong fact in favor of such being the case. However, he, the Advocate-General, would not go further on that point; he would go to another part of the case. At the time Mr. Fraser came home on the 16th April, he was taken with a paralytic fit, and Mrs. Thomas Fraser, the wife of one of his natural sons, was present. Fraser was looking about as if he wanted something. Mrs. T. Fraser said, "I think he may be inquiring for the Company's paper,' on this Mrs. Fraser brought it, he took it into his hand, and immediately returned it, squeezing it into Mrs. Fraser's hands, and denoting, by his gesture, as well as he could, that it was her property: a watch being brought, he looked at it, and afterwards seemed satisfied, it being clear that it was the watch he wanted in the first instance. Now it was singular how Mrs. Thomas Fraser became aware that this Company's paper was in her, Mrs. Fraser's possession. In the Bill of Complaint it is set forth that Fraser, went to the almirah, as it is called, clearly showing that he thought the paper was there, and that he wished to see it: and this clearly confirmed his, Mr. Advocate-General's statement, that Mrs. Thomas Fraser was present, because from what other source could they have learned that the Paper was in the keeping of Mrs. Fraser? This paper was afterwards sent to Mr. DaCosta, a gentleman whose evidence their lordship's would hear, and when they heard from that gentleman a confirmation of the account of constant hostility experienced by Mrs. Fraser from the natural children, their lordships would not feel any degree of surprize that she should have conveyed the paper to where she believed was a safe place. Mr. DaCosta would swear the paper was endorsed on the 13th April, and Mrs. Heatley would swear it was so in the beginning of that month. Therefore, as to the endorsement, this evidence was conclusive. But will it be set up that this endorsement is a forgery? If so, he, Mr. Advocate General, would ask whether it was committed before or after the death of the party? That it might have been done after death was not entirely improbable, but it was quite so that it could have been done subsequently, because the party might have recovered and said, "this signature is not my own." It were wasting time to suppose for one moment that it could be a forgery in the life time of Mr. Fraser; and that he had written the endorsement was manifestly clear; but he, Mr. Advocate General, could not very clearly prove the writing of the endorsement, though several would swear to the hand-writing. He said that he could not clearly prove, because the witness Susan was dead, but she had given evidence to that fact before the Examiner in Equity. Under those circumstances it was clear plaintiff was entitled to a decision from the Court. He was not now to argue to the Court that the paper was a donatio causa mortis. He was not going to investigate that point now, but in his humble opinion, looking at all the circumstances, the reading of the will, the returning the paper by Fraser to his wife with gestures denoting that she should keep it, there could be no doubt that it was a gift in contemplation of death. The gift, the name on the paper, it being there during Fraser's life time, all that would be before the Court. So much for positive facts supported, by positive evidence, now let him look to the probabilities. Was there anything impossible in the gift from a gentleman who intended to increase his wife's fortune by Rs. 42,000, but who was diverted from the attempt,—diverted, too, by his illegitimate children, and after his wife had been deprived of dower?—The facts were in his client's favor and the probabilities also.

Shaik Ramjaun deposed. Was in the service of Fraser four years before his death, as his sirdar bearer. I took care of clothes, papers, and money that he brought home. He died three years ago, very old, perhaps 100. I remember the Churruck Pooja of that year. Fraser was deaf and his wife was obliged to speak loud to him. Sixteen or seventeen days before his death he had gone out, when he returned, he put a tin box into my hand, saying "take care, it contains Company's paper to a large amount." He was rather weak. I led him up-stairs, leaving the box on a table on which he wrote. He sat on a chair while I undressed him. He opened a tin box and took a paper out of it which had an impression upon it above, like this, but not like this (B. A. Company's paper) below. I did not examine the paper particularly: it had two impressions, like this, one above and one below. Fraser sat there and desired me to call his wife. He had a pen in his hand, I don't know whether he wrote with that pen. Mrs. Fraser and Susan came: she spoke to her husband in English. He rose from his seat and gave the paper into the ma'am's hand, saying something in English. She took the paper and went into her own room, accompanied by Susan. Fraser said to me, "observe I have given to ma'am a paper of this quantity of money (holding out his hands) valued ~~Rs~~ 30,000. He desired me to call the ayah, she came, and he said, go and compose the ma'am. I have given her a Company's paper for ~~Rs~~ 30,000;" telling us not to mention it to any body, for if Mrs. Ryley knew of it she would quarrel immediately. Mrs. Ryley is Mr. Fraser's eldest daughter. I have forgotten the ayah's name, she died before Mr. Fraser. I saw that paper when Mr. Fraser was taken ill. On that occasion he directed me to get the palanquin ready, which I did. He desired me to bring a bottle of liquor; I did so, and on my return I met Susan on the stairs, who told me to run, for master was taken ill. I ran into the room with Susan, where I found Mrs. Fraser, and the wife of Mr. Fraser's eldest son. I went close to Fraser; he was turning up some books, but was unable to speak. Some conversation passed between Fraser and his daughter-in-law, when his wife went into the room and brought the paper. Fraser looked at it, and made an exertion to speak, closing the paper, when it was open, in her hands. Some conversation passed between his wife and Mrs. T. Fraser, the latter desired that the watch might be brought, Susan brought it, and put it into ma'am's hand who gave it into Fraser's, he pressed the spring, opened it, looked at it, and gave it back to ma'am. Mrs. T. Fraser quitted the room, so did I for the purpose of getting some hot water, the children came in, and a short time after Dr. Halliday arrived. All the children came except James. Fraser died four or five days afterwards. Susán Jane died. The children remained. I attended Fraser during his illness, so did Longham, Jack, and Mrs. Heatly. (Cross-examined). I live in the Bow-Bazar, am no body's servant. Heatley sent a note for me and I came. I went to my home after the death of Mrs. Fraser, I resided with her at the time of her death. Susan was no relation, but Mrs. Fraser had taught her to read; I don't know where she came from. When Fraser took the paper out of the tin box, he had a pen in his hand; he then desired me to call the ma'am. I did not see him write. He was not able to write on the last occasion; his speech was stopped. The ayah died before Mrs. Fraser. I guess it was about two months and a half. I cannot remember the ayah's name; I don't know an ayah named Begum. I don't know Mrs. T. Fraser's ayah. She used to change her ayahs. I could speak to the person of the one she had at Fraser's death. (Ayah produced) this is her; she was living at Collingha with Mrs. T. Fraser, when the paper was first given. On the second occasion Fraser had not been out. Fraser was a little deaf, we spoke a little loud. His wife spoke to him in English; there is a great difference in the sound of language when people are quarrelling. I could not discover whether they quarrelled or not. The ayah that is dead was an older servant than I am; she was, I think alive when we were before the Examiner. I do not know what was Fraser's reason for telling the ayah to go and compose her mistress after he had given the paper. I am quite certain he took out that Company's paper, and took a pen in his hand before he had on that occasion seen Mrs. Fraser. I do not know whether he had been to Fergusson and Co.'s that time. Futti Mahomed was not in his service at this time. Budderadeen was. Futti Mahomed was in the service of Mr. T. Fraser. Kerandee came into service two years after I did; I don't know the fact, but I have heard from Fraser that Kerandee had been in his service before. There had been no quarrel between Fraser and his wife, the day before, and there was no quarrel on the day of the gift. (Re-examined.) Susan spoke a few words in English, I don't know if she could speak Bengalli. I had holiday during the Churruck Poojah, so had the other bearers, the pattee did not go out on the day the bearers had leave of absence.

Sophia Heatley, was the wife of plaintiff, was called and put into the box, but Mr. Turton objected, and the order directing the issue was read, which directed the examination of the witness, if plaintiff or defendant should require it, after her examination in the enquiry suit had been read. The examination was then read.

Willoughby Da Costa knew the late Mrs. Fraser, and was one of the trustees to her marriage settlement, which I signed when Mr. Heatley declined to act. It was signed some time after the marriage, some time after Mrs. and Mr. Fraser signed. I knew Mrs. Fraser many years; had a moderate acquaintance with her husband. I always found them well together when by themselves. Mrs. Fraser said in the presence of her husband, one evening in particular, that the children caused a difference. Have considered with Fraser on the subjects of settlement for Mrs. Fraser. On that occasion Mrs. Fraser had left the house; he said he had not been able to persuade his wife to return home, unless Mrs. Tom Fraser left the house. This brought forth a remark from Mr. Betts, "you are a man of fortune, worth three lacks of rupees, you ought to give her one." He denied being worth so much. Mr. Betts took up a slate to show he was, on which Fraser turned round to me and said he intended to leave her the house in Harrington-street, and ~~Rs~~ 200 per month. Fraser lived in this house; it is comfortable; but has been sold. This was in January, 1830. Mr. Betts is now at Berhampore. Saw this (a Company's paper) in 1832. Mrs. Heatley gave it me with a copy of the marriage settlement, and a letter from Mrs. Fraser, requesting it might be kept in safety. The endorsement "James Fraser" was on it then, the 14th April, 1832. Both endorsements were on it then. I swear to that. I don't know Fraser's hand-writing sufficiently to speak to it. (Cross-examined.) Knew Mrs. Fraser twenty years before I was made trustee. She begged of me to take the trust that Heatly declined, in order to make a quiet house. I am not aware that it was wrong. I knew that if she had not signed that she would have been entitled to dower. I knew that she was defrauded, but I signed it for one simple purpose. I had nothing to do with fraud. I read the draft of the deed before I signed it. Mr. Parsons was the clergyman at Kidderpore. I read the recital. I learned that dower was the bone of contention, and signed the deed at the request of Mrs. Fraser, to make a quiet house. Mr. Heatley declined to sign it. I cannot say if the dower was barred when Mr. Ponson signed. When Mrs. Heatley brought the paper to me, I put it in my box, where it remained until the 25th, when I gave it to Mrs. Heatley, who said Mrs. Fraser wanted it to submit it to Counsel. I did not look at it in the mean time. But I am sure the endorsement was on it. I can swear to the two names, but cannot swear to the hand-writing. It did not strike me that there was a difference in the hand-writing. Heatley owes me money, a running account, the original was 5,000 on an insurance on his life. It was ten years ago. I don't suppose it is ~~Rs~~ 10,000. I have paid premium and not received any interest for the last two years. I don't think this is Mr. Heatley's hand-writing. The first I heard of the Company's paper was when Mrs. Heatley brought it to me, she said her sister had found Mrs. Tom Fraser and some of the members of the family trying to persuade her servant to open the almirah. I did not ask why she had not given it to her husband. I made no enquiry. I was present at the marriage of Fraser and his wife. Mr. Betts was an acquaintance of Fraser's. They had indigo factories near each other. Betts was positive that Fraser was worth three lacks, the old gentleman said he was not. (Re-examined.) I only look at the material endorsement on Company's paper, that which transfers the property, and not that which conveys this interest.

Tuesday, July 14.

Willian Davis.—I am an assistant in the Customs. Knew Fraser for two or three years before his death. Apparently he became weaker as he became older. I believe I know his hand-writing, and that both of these endorsements (Company's paper produced) are his handwriting. In my own mind I have no doubt of it. I thought from what I saw Mr. and Mrs. Fraser were a fond husband and wife. Had coversation with Fraser, regarding purchase of property in Harrington-street, adjoining his own property. He said he should like his wife to live in that house and have the one he was residing in to rent out. The house he pointed to, is not a large house, nor a small house. I recommended my own landlord to sell the house I was living in; he consented, I told Fraser, who came and looked at the two houses. He said he wanted one to rent and one for his wife to reside in. I believe I told him the purchase would be about eighteen or twenty thousand rupees, but in consequence of my departure for Lucknow, the purchase went off. This was in January or February, 1832. He was at that time able to transact business. (Cross-examined.) I went to Lucknow in February, 1832, and returned the latter end of April. I first became acquainted with Fraser, when on a visit to Heatly in 1828, 29, or 30. Complimentary chits passed between us, invitations, at a particular time, when the houses were failing. I recommended him to take ~~Rs~~ 30,000 out of Fergusson's and invest it in Company's paper. He did not express any alarm regarding the fund in Alexander's. (Company's paper B. produced) One of the signatures appears more firm than the other, but the characters are alike. (Examined.) This document (O. Produced) has the signature of Mr. Fraser but the body does not appear to be in this handwriting, I think the figures are. (Re-examined.) On the outside of this (P.) is the name of Heatley; I don't know who he is. The word "contingencies" is something like Mr. Fraser's. It is, apparently, a mere draft letter, of an introduction by Fraser of witness to Mr. Melville, (O.) I don't know when this was written; I saw it first when examined in the equity suit, and I may have have seen P. also. The "important matter" mentioned in the letter to Mr. Melville was an affair of my own. I was indebted to Fraser ~~Rs~~ 1,000, and ~~Rs~~ 500, in all above ~~Rs~~ 2,000. This is not paid, but the executor has been satisfied. I am not to expose my affairs (the Court ruled that the question must be answered.) A native has undertaken to pay; he purchased the notes for ~~Rs~~ 750; I did not know at the time what the amount was that the native paid. It was not with Heatley's knowledge. I was applied to by Mrs. Fraser, who then was residing with Heatley, regarding the paper. I knew Mrs. Fraser, but had no knowledge of Fraser till 1829, when I was introduced by Heatley. To the best of my recollection I first borrowed money of Fraser in 1831. That was not the year in which I was first introduced. I borrowed twice, and have paid nothing. I was very intimate with Heatley. I have heard that the old gentleman came home angry, and that he was in the habit of taking whiskey at Mr. Wight's. Never saw any quarrels between Fraser and his wife. Looking at the signatures on this paper, I believe they are the same character. There does appear a difference in the colour of the ink of the second signature. There is a difference in the head of the "J." in the second signature which is not like the "J." in the first. Some of the letters in the second signature appear to have been gone over. I don't remember having seen his signature in this 'painted form,' as you call it. The dash under the signature is like the "J." and appears to be painted. The up stroke of the tail of the "J." is done with a bad or rough pen, the tail of the "F." appears to have been gone over, and also the final "r." I saw Fraser on the 13th April, he was a weak old man, but did not write a weak hand for his age. I believe this (No. 1) to be his writing. It is clear, and in his ordinary hand. I was not asked to Lingham's wedding. No. 2 appears Fraser's hand-writing; I see no painting or trembling in the hand. (This letter is dated "1st, April," 1832, and the testator adds after his signature "No Fool." An Almanac was also produced with testator's signature on 13*th April.*) (Examined.) A word in No. 2 is not well formed, but the letters are firm. The body of No. 1 is not Fraser's; I mean by "painting" going over the letters again, but breaking off and going over again what is badly written. (Exhibit Q.) The words "rhumatism foot," are Fraser's; they do not appear to be painted, but with fresh ink, and with a new pen, I mean thick ink, but the words "hides" might be painted; "daughter" is not painted; it is old ink on old paper, "Davis" is not painted but twice formed. In another word the first letter appears to have been gone over three times, the two last letters are blotted and not gone over. I am speaking to the second signature of the second endorsement. I have before sworn it is Fraser's. The top of the "J." is different, but sometimes he wrote that way. S. is Mr. Fraser's signature; there is a break in the top of the "J." which seems to have been formed twice, but is not painted. I negociated a bill for Fraser in 1832. (Cross-examined.) "Bruised my leg at 10 o'clock at Mr. Wight's," is Fraser's writing. That may have been the whiskey day, but I never saw Fraser intoxicated at noon. (By the Court). After looking at these different papers, I think that the second endorsment is Fraser's hand-writing, and would act on such signature, or consider a promissory note, genuine with that signature upon it.

R. S. Strickland. Am agent to Military Bank; was a clerk in the firm of Alexander and Co. for many years. Fraser was a constituent of that firm. I have seen him write previously to Feb. 1831, and have received two notes from him. He wrote feebly. I know the general character of his hand, but should have a difficulty in swearing positively. (Exhibit B.) Cannot say if the second endorsement is Fraser's. Mr. Bartlett is the most likely person to speak to the writing, because he was the accountant in Alexander's.

Abel Bartlett, deposed. I was an assistant in Alexander and Co.'s; knew Fraser and his hand-writing, (Exhibit B.) All his drafts and receipts generally passed through my hands. To the best of my belief these two signatures are his. He was a constituent of Alexander's for thirty years. My brother was at the head of the cashier's department. I was employed for thirty years by that firm. Cannot exactly say what was the balance due to Fraser, at the time of his death: not more than ~~Rs~~ 30,000, (Cross-examined.) When the drafts are presented the sircars bring them to the accountant's department, where the signatures are examined, and it is ascertained if there are frauds. I have been in the accountant's department above 10 years. Fraser's hand appears to have trembled when he wrote the second signature, but the character is like the first signature. The "J." and "r." are alike, there is a small difference,—the flourish, it can be taken for the same writing. The "J." is a little stronger and a little longer. One seems written with a bad pen, the other with a better. The two "F.'s" are not exactly alike, yet they may be considered written by the same person. I might not have called the attention of the house to the singularity of this last signature had it been presented. I can't perceive the painting, it is written with a bad pen, and the ink appears a little darker. Heatley has shown me yesterday several of Fraser's letters to refresh my memory as to the hand-writting, but I should have known and been able to speak to the signature without that. My brothers looked at the writing. I have known Heatley a long time. He showed me the letters without asking. My brother Thomas saw the letters. I knew Mrs. Fraser a very short time. Fraser's hand-writting was seldom examined by Mr. Ballard. (Re-examined.) Mr. Ballard is at Porto Novo. My brother John has been subpœnaed. It appears to me that some part of the second signature is pale. I believe it to be his hand-writting.

Thomas Bartlett deposed. I was in the accountant's department of Alexander and Co. for 29 years. I knew Fraser well, and think I know his hand-writing as well as any body in that office. The checks came before me. I saw his hand-writing till his death, there was a change in it now and then. (Exhibit B.) I believe these signatures are in the hand-writing of Mr. Fraser. I saw him shortly before his death, and don't suppose his handwriting was then so strong as formerly. This (S.) is an acknowledgment of his account to April, 1829; his signature is affixed. I cannot doubt that (O.) is Fraser's hand, (P.) the same. (Cross-examined.) This is the first time that I have seen B. I am not very intimate with Heatley; have known him since he was in Alexander and Co's. That paper was not shewn me yesterday by Heatley, but several letters were. I perceive a difference in the second signature, but have passed drafts for thousands of rupees under the same kind of tremulous hand. His writing varied, it was not generally of the character of the second signature, but I have seen it that way several times. One signature was shewn me yesterday by Heatley, which astonished me; there was something particular about the "J." in that signature, but the body of the letter was not in his handwriting. "B." Appears to have been painted. The top of the "A." and the top of the "R." are paler. There is a roughness such as is produced by going over a second time. (Re-examined.) About two millions of rupees per year passed through my hands. The ink of this country is not always good. I think the roughness in the signature arises from the badness of the paper and ink. I have no doubt whatever, I would pass that for Fraser's signature.

Dr. Halliday.—I attended the family of Fraser until 1832. He was not a feeble man for his very advanceed age. I have often seen him write. I should take that (B.) to be his hand-writing. It is not unlikely that an old man's hand after having been out in the sun might shake more than it would at other times. I went to the Cape, and then Dr. Cameron attended the family. (Cross-examined.) I don't think No. 1 and No. 2 are his handwriting. There is a difference in the signature of B. but not sufficient to shake my opinion. If shewn that signature previously to my going to the Cape, I should have concluded he was ill. Fraser and his wife lived in one continued quarrel from first to last; she was a woman of an impetuous temper. He seemed to give way to her. I saw them but occasionally, but they were on decidedly bad terms. But latterly they seemed to be less violent, whether from the strength of parties being exhausted or not I don't know. He frequently complained of her; he spoke of his children with great affection, but not of his wife. I never heard him complain of his children. He never expressed to me an intention of making his wife a present to the extent of ~~Rs~~ 30,000. So long as the epileptic fit lasted he could not have taken the Company's paper in his hands, and returned it to his wife. (Re-examined.) The children were not on good terms with Mrs. Fraser. I believe the signatures on B. to be his hand-writing; cannot say what was the cause of quarrel; the children and wife were on bad terms. When Fraser was ill, on one occasion she was particularly kind and attentive, on others she was less so. He was in a dangerous state when she was kind and attentive, but when she was less so, he was not in a dangerous state. Her own health was not good, when she watched him by night and by day.

Dr. Cameron deposed. I knew Fraser, and succeeded the last witness in attending the family in January, 1832, and till the time of death. The immediate cause of death was a determination of blood to the head; he had epilepsy. I saw him a week before his death; he was about 78 or 79, and a feeble man. He was then able to go about, and appeared, for that age, as if nothing particular was the matter with him. Mrs. Fraser had an affection of the chest. When I was called in, he was in a fit; I bled him, and gave the usual remedies, afterwards he recovered a little and appeared to recognise his family. I had few opportunities of seeing their manner of living. I found him on the last occasion labouring under epilepsy, about four o'clock on the day, but I have a very vague recollection of the circumstances. My recollection is not so clear as it was when I was examined on a former occasion (Cross-examined.) Epilepsy is sometimes caused by the disordered state of the stomach affecting the brain. I should think a person attacked with epilepsy would not be able to take up a paper and give it to another, but in paralysis he might.

William Bolston. I am an assistant in the General Treasury. (B. produced.) This note ought to have been paid off 2d July, 1832. There was an advertisement in the papers to that effect three months previous to that date. (Cross-examined.) I examine the signatures in the Company's paper. I have passed signatures similar to this. Looking at it through a magnifying glass, the second signature seems to vary. The ink seems to be different. The letters "m" and "J" appear to have been passed over. Without a close examination I should pass this signature, but on a close examination I should be doubtful. It appears a traced signature. It might be traced on glass. Otherwise than looking through the magnifying glass, I should think the signature genuine, but looking through the glass I do not. (Re-examined.) I think this paper too thick to trace on. Ink varies; if I wrote my signature, and the ink appeared too light, I should stir the ink and go over the signature again. Ink is frequently pale at the top of the glass, but dark at the bottom.

Eliza Caroline Urquhart. I was acquainted with Fraser and his wife. I knew her at the time of her marriage and him afterwards. I never heard them disputing. My daughter visited them. I remember a negociation regarding the purchase of some land from Alexander and Co. I had some correspondence with Fraser regarding that negociation. I produce that. It was signed by Fraser in my presence. I produce the correspondence I received from Alexander and Co., they asked a great deal, and Mr. Fraser declined to buy. I told him I could not buy it in my own name, or they would come on me for the money; on this he told Mrs. Fraser to write (W.) and that he would sign. He said that he wanted this land for Mrs. Fraser. He lived in one of my houses for one year after the marriage, adjoining to the house in which I resided. I heard that Mrs. Fraser and the children did not agree. (Cross-examined.) I was occasionally at Fraser's house, in the habit of dining and taking tea there; always saw him behave kindly. She was of a mild disposition, I never saw them quarrel; had they done so I must have observed it. I had only this one communication with Fraser, it was on the day the letter was written. I showed him the reply and he gave as a reason for declining, that it was too much money. I have met Jack and Tom at the house; but never saw any quarrels between them; have heard of quarrels from my own daughter, who was more in the habit of visiting there than I was. Fraser never complained to me of his wife. The sum to be given for the ground I don't recollect.

Eliza Cassandra Urquhart, daughter of the last witness. I was acquainted with the Frasers from my infancy. I often visited them. Mrs. Fraser's behaviour was kind and affectionate towards her husband. She often complained to me of the children. I was at the house in 1832, and saw her sitting in he room reading the will. I read some part of it to her, and she wrote it out. She had been writing previously. She told me that Mr. Fraser had got it from Mrs. Ryley. I spent that day there. (Cross-examined.) I recollect who were the witnesses, and know the signature, but cannot say that I remember the substance of what concerned Mrs. Fraser. I don't know what became of the copy of the will. I was acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Heatley a few months before the death of Fraser. I knew the girl Susan Jane. She was a native that Mrs. Fraser had brought up, and had christened. I was with Mrs. Fraser and remained with her after Fraser's death until she went to the house of Heatley. I believe that she took no books of accounts with her. I never prevented Susan Jane communicating with the servants, never conversed with her concerning a Company's paper; she was more of a companion than a servant. I was told by Mrs. Fraser after she had removed to Heatley's, that there was a dispute about the Company's paper, and that Susan had been present when Fraser gave it. Susan died in Heatley's house. I think Mrs. Fraser was a mild amiable woman, incapable of quarrelling, I never saw them quarrel. She was a remarkably good tempered woman. I never heard that they did quarrel. (Re-examined.) Mrs. Fraser was in her own house when I first heard of the gift of Company's paper. I resided in Calcutta previously to being acquainted with the Heatleys. (Will produced.) This is Mr. Fraser's will; the will which I have spoken of before.

Mary Harwood deposed. I knew Mr. Fraser, but not at the time of his marriage. I saw him and his wife seldom; she was at my house in 1831 unaccompanied by her husband. She came in consequence of a quarrel with the children; she remained about seventeen days. Fraser called daily to see her; he was very kind and affectionate, so was she. I received a letter from her before she came to me. This is it, and my reply. She returned in consequence of Fraser's solicitation; I accompanied her; Mr.

Fraser was at the house. They always appeared kind and affectionate. (Cross-examined.) I always found them on the best possible terms, never heard them complain of each other. I never heard of a contemplated separation. I never saw Dr. Halliday in the house.

This was the case for the plaintiff. A variety of documentary evidence was read, after which Mr. Turton opened the defence.

After plaintiff had closed his case, the following witness was examined under the order directing the issue:

Mrs. Thomas Fraser.—I remember the 13th April, 1832, when Mr. Fraser was taken ill. I went to his house about 11 o'clock in the morning; he was then very well. He took me into the hall below stairs. He was taken ill about one o'clock; Mrs. Fraser led him out of her room; she called out to me. He walked into his room; he seemed to be confused, as if he was looking for something. He made no attempt to speak, but sat down. I asked him what he wanted, but he could not answer. He was near the desk; he went to his book-case, which he opened, and again sat down at his desk. Mrs. Fraser, Susan, and myself were present. Susan remarked "perhaps, he wanted the paper." Mrs. Fraser said "what paper can he want?" No paper was produced. I remained in the room about three hours. I did not stay till the doctor arrived. He was not sensible when he left the room. I saw no paper produced whatsoever, nor did I make the observation "perhaps, he wants the Company's paper," or any paper. While I was in the room no paper of any kind was put into his hand. I know what a Company's paper is. I saw a tin box in the room, but I don't know what has become of it. It was in a corner of the room that he was in; but I did not see it when I came back again. It was not there in half an hour when I returned. He kept his Company's paper in that box. I had it with me about five weeks before his illness. I had taken the paper out and given it to him when he wanted it about five weeks before. Fraser and his wife were very unhappy. This is Mr. Fraser's hymn book. I saw it always when I lived in the house; he was in the habit of reading it every morning. (Cross-examined.) From the commencement of his illness he was sensible and able to go about, to open a drawer, to look into it, and so he continued until I went away. The paper he took away first from me and the tin box afterwards. I gave him the tin box three days after I gave him the paper. Before this bill was filed, some enquiries were made of me as to the circumstances of that day, by Mr. John Fraser. Nothing was written down on that occasion, what I said is the same as I have said to-day. I think I did not say anything about Susan Jane speaking of Company's paper. I am sure I did not. I don't think I mentioned it at all until after Susan's death. Recently when I returned from Burdwan, I mentioned it to the gentleman who conducts this cause. I believe I never mentioned it before. I was informed by Mr. J. Fraser what Mrs. Fraser said in the answer. He told me that it was stated I had remarked that, perhaps, Fraser wanted the Company's paper. I knew Ramjaun the bearer. I was confused at the time of Fraser's illness, but I can remember who was present. Ramjaun was not present when Mrs. Fraser led her husband into the room, nor during the three hours I was present. Ramjaun was Fraser's personal bearer to dress and undress him. Ramjaun helped him up-stairs when he came home. I knew that paper to be value Rs. 30,000, yet never mentioned till these proceedings were commenced that Susan had mentioned it at that time. I recollect Fraser's house being painted during that time, the two months he lived with us, but she refused to come. They were on good terms then, though she lived apart. (Re-examined.) I have had a severe illness since Fraser's death. Mrs. Ryley is my sister-in-law. I informed her of Fraser's illness when I left the house, and said what occurred to her on that day. (By the Court.) There might have been papers on the table on the day he was taken ill, but I did not see them. I gave the watch to him when I thought he wanted to look at it. I don't know if he looked at it; I put it on the table. Mrs. Fraser was in the room, Ramjaun was not. I first heard that Mrs. Fraser had the Company's paper, about three or four days after his death. I left Calcutta in April, 1834; I knew Susan Jane had seen this paper, because we all saw it when he first brought it into the house.

Mr. Turton, for the defence. This is one of the most painful cases he ever knew before this Court, because, whatever may be the result, it is quite clear, there must have been the grosset perjury on either one side or the other, although it may not be necessary to decide the case on that evidence. In one point it was particularly painful, for there would be a direct contradiction to the evidence of a young person in whom the Court might not expect to have found so much art. But he would be able to shew what it would require a very charitable mind to come to any other conclusion than that she had at first been well tutored with a got-up story, which she was determined to adhere to till the last. One very extraordinary part of her story, if it were true, is that the will, a part of which she has sworn she read to Mrs. Fraser, was returned to Mr. Wight, by whom it was drawn up, in the same envelope, in which it was originally sent to the testator, and with Mr. Wight's office seal unbroken. The will drawn up by the solicitor was engrossed in duplicate, one copy being sent to the testator, and one to Fergusson and Co. At the time of the testator's death, Mr. Melville and Mr. Wight were both out of town. On the return of Mr. Melville, a day was appointed to examine the will by Mr. Thomas Fraser, when Mr. Melville brought the will deposited with Fergusson and Co. both were found in the envelopes, with the seals unbroken, precisely in the state that they had been sent from Mr. Wight's office. It was also extraordinary, but not so much so as that part of the tale to which he had just alluded, that Mrs. Fraser should have not preserved that copy of the will which this young person swears she saw her engaged in making; and again it was extraordinary that no mention was made of the copy in Mrs. Fraser's answer. Yet it would appear, if this evidence were credited, that she thought it a matter of sufficient importance to copy the will and to have the assistance of this young person upwards of one hour,—for what purpose? he would ask,—for the purpose of production, and yet their lordships had it not. The Court would recollect that Miss Urquhart had stated this day that the will she saw was on parchment; now the will produced was not on parchment, and when he, the learned counsel, cross-examined on that part of the evidence, it was evident that she knew perfectly the distinction between parchment and paper. This perhaps was not a very material contradiction, but it strengthened the opinion that much was to be drawn from the answer that was put in the first instance, and that Mrs. Fraser had bound the whole of her party to that statement,—a statement which if he, the learned counsel did not prove to be false, he should feel very much surprised. Leaving the testimony of this young person to make what weight it could after the evidence the Court would have to contrast it with, he would proceed to another part which his learned friend had thought of sufficient importance to make a point of, namely, the temper and disposition of Mrs. Fraser. Now, he would ask, who had his learned friend brought forward to speak of the sweet disposition of, as she was described, this amiable and affectionate lady? Without exception they were all dependents, or persons connected with Mrs. Fraser from the time of their infancy; and one witness, Susan Jane, whose evidence had been read to the Court, had been taken from the most servile condition, taught to read, educated by Mrs. Fraser, and in fact, been made a companion of by that person. It was unfortunate that this witness could not be produced, unfortunate for many reasons, not the least of which was that it was impossible to lay aside the consideration, that a person capable of committing acts such as would appear before the Court, might possibly be capable of committing acts which would render their perpetration difficult of proof. He, the learned counsel, was as little in the habit as any man of casting forth observations injurious to an individual's reputation, but there were cases, and this one of them, which rendered those observations necessary for his client's interests, as the Court would be aware from circumstances to which he would at a subsequent period advert. He might, however, mention now, that it was remarkable in this case, only one book had been produced by plaintiff, and that contained no entry made at the time of this alleged gift. The last of the testator's entries is made on the 19th March,—the day it is sworn he went for the will and brought it home with him. As to the memorandum which had been produced, there was not a single title of evidence to prove that it was in the testator's hand-writing. In fact, in a case like this, in which the strongest evidence ought to have been adduced, there was not a single circumstance but what was overwhelmed with suspicion. The advanced age of the testator, the nature of the gift itself, the mode of life of the parties, and the form of the signature, were all circumstances which threw the strongest suspicion, to meet which his learned friend had brought forward only the intimate friends and connexions of the plaintiff, with the exception of Dr. Halliday, whose testimony, indeed, did not go far to strengthen his friend's case. That gentleman had not sworn that Mrs. Fraser was of the most mild and amiable disposition that ever blessed an old man in his dotage; on the contrary he swears that Fraser and his wife lived in one continual quarrel from first to last, and that she was a woman of the most impetuous temper. Was it necessary to go further into that subject? His learned friend had shewn, that during the last three years of this old man's life there had been two separations, he, the learned counsel, would shew a third. He had always considered that it was not a very triffling matter for a wife to leave her husband, and that it would require strong grounds to justify such conduct. It would seem that he, the learned counsel, was not singular in that opinion, for Mr. Heatley swears, in his examination in equity, that from the time she quitted the house in 1831, and required twenty-one days to come back, they had lived together in uninterrupted happiness. Notwithstanding this, however, there was an entry on a subsequent date in the only book produced, to this effect, "a squall, in consequence of Tom," and next day "Nancy went to live at Heatley's" so that those who, according to Mr. Heatley, lived in "uninterupted happiness," lived, as had been described by Dr. Halliday, in one continued quarrel from beginning to end. Referring to the same book it would appear, that the testator "went to live with Tom" on the 19th December, where he continued till the 6th of January, three months before his death. Is it now said that they lived on affectionate terms? He, the learned counsel, would shew that the whole story was impossible: he would prove it from her own hand-writing, and that Mr. Heatley, with whom she went to live, was fully aware that they lived on the worst terms, notwithstanding what he had sworn in the equity proceedings. Perhaps, it would be said that the testator was of a forgiving disposition, and he, Mr. Turton, believed he was so; but he would shew that Mr. Heatley was well aware of the terms on which they lived, that though he had sworn he was against the marriage, he had been the testator's agent for that marriage,—the marriage broker,—he it was who wrote the application to the Orphan School managers to which the testator affixed his signature;—that from the time of the marriage to the time of testator's death, he, Heatley, had been one of those friends who had been constantly pulling at his purse;—that,—for convenience—he lived next door—that he admitted on one occasion receiving ~~Rs~~ 2,000 from Mrs. Fraser, ~~Rs~~ 1,000 of which he applied to his own purposes, and that, as it would appear from a note addressed to Heatley by Mrs. Fraser, acquainting that her husband was jealous, &c. that Heatley was well aware there was a continual quarrel between them. Now who are the witnesses? Davis, of the Custom House, has been acquainted with Heatley from his youth; through Heatley he becomes acquainted with Fraser; by Heatley he is assisted to rob the old man; for Fraser lent the intimate friend of Heatley money, not one fraction of which has ever been repaid. But says Mr. Davis, they appeared to live on very good terms, and thus, perhaps, because before Mr. Davis, the testator put up with his wife's continual ill-treatment, therefore is she kind and amiable! Now what did Dr. Halliday swear? and yet this extraordinary Mr. Davis is one of the parties to prove Mrs. Fraser kind and amiable. But they had Mrs. Heatley's evidence in the proceedings in equity opposed to them,—the wife of the man who is to derive benefit from this cause, the man who was guardian of Mrs. Fraser before the marriage,—oh, but he was opposed to the match, very well,—the wife of the man to whose hand-writing the first proposal of the testator had been traced, and he, the learned counsel, would do Mr. Heatley the justice to say, that, so far as composition went, he was really much superior to the testator. (The learned counsel here read the letter to the managers of the Orphan School, soliciting their consent to his marriage with Miss Gold, which was proved to be in the hand-writing of Mr. Heatley, except the signature, which was that of the testator.) Now, then, here was the commencement of this bargain; ~~Rs~~ 2,000 she should have, and he insuring his life, that is, as to the first part, precisely the same as if Heatley was to have the money. He, the learned counsel, did not blame Mrs. Fraser for making the best bargain she could; of course, money was the only object she had in view. Then there was evidence of Heatley having wrote out the proposal. Something more too, Fraser is too old, and ~~Rs~~ 25,000 is settled on his wife, a tolerable specimen of Heatley's powers as a negociator. This sum, said the Advocate-General in his opening, was about an equivalent for what was to produce her ~~Rs~~ 80 per month.—a tolerable specimen of his learned friend's powers as a calculator. But she was to have ~~Rs~~ 25,000, perhaps, because, and looking at the sum she had remaining at the time of her death, it was the more probable, it might be more beneficial to others than herself; or probably she was looking with maternal affection at the large family she might expect from an union with a man of Fraser's years. Next they had in evidence a letter from this ardent lover to his friends in Scotland, stating that he had married a religious woman and not a young woman (not a word about her temper) who, he expected, would supply the place of the mother of his children, but there was not one word as to whether those expectations had been realized. It was not necessary that he should advert further to the terms on which they lived; it was sufficient to say that they were not such as in themselves would account for the gift. But, said his learned friend, she was entitled to more. He, the learned counsel did not know to what that woman was entitled who spent all she could obtain from her husband. But, said his learned friend, he had provided for his children. That, however, carried with it a refutation, for according to his learned friend's own statement, he had increased that provision at the instance of Mrs. Fraser. Now the fact was, that when he originally made that settlement on his children, he had not the slightest idea of marriage, but he intended to go home to Scotland. So much for this important flourish of his learned friend's flowery statements; and when he, the learned counsel, could so expose these flourishes, was he not bound to believe that they were important to the slender case to which they clung. He admitted, however, that his learned friend had received his instuctions from those who had given them with great care. He must be understood that he was making no professional allusions. Notwithstanding the gross inconsistencies of this case, there was not a single point on which, as far as Heatley was concerned, an indictment for perjury could be maintained. As to the gift; Heatley had been told by his wife, she had been told by Mrs. Fraser, it rested entirely on the evidence in equity of that child Susan, who had been raised by Mrs. Fraser from the station of a menial to that of a companion. The gift rested on her testimony alone, given at a time when, if the testator had any reason to dread the remonstrances of his children, and had a dislike to their being present, there was no earthly reason to prevent him calling in Heatley as a witness. Heatley was much less likely to inform the children than Susan. But the object was obvious,—those wretched beings, Susan and the bearer, are the only persons who can be prosecuted for perjury. It was not to be lost sight of, that in the proceedings in equity, his learned friend mainly depended for the gift on what was said to have taken place three weeks before the death of the testator, but now, forsooth, it was altered for the purposes of the issue. They now make out that when the testator was last taken ill, the paper was brought, he squeezed it, and returned it into her hands. He would say little about that, satisfied that no Court in the world would be content with a gift under those circumstances, however he must not forget, that the testator is represented to have said "no, no," at a time when it is sworn he was speechless. The Court would contrast the evidence of Susan Jane with that of the witness Mrs. Thomas Fraser whom they had ordered to be examined, and he would leave that part of the case quite satisfied as to the result. He would now proceed to the case for the defence. This Company's paper was advertised to be paid off on the 2d July. Mr. Davis, of the Mint, was a person of property and respectability, with whom the testator was intimate, and with whom his youngest daughter resided for two years, when she was driven from the house of her father by Mrs. Fraser. On the 11th of April, a Churruck Pooja holiday, Mr. Davis remained at home, and on that day the testator called upon him and asked his advice regarding this identical paper. He shewed it to Mr. Davis, desiring him to examine it attentively, to ascertain whether if he, Fraser, left it with Fergusson and Co. for the purpose of receiving the interest, there was any chance of that firm being able to obtain the principal. Davis examined the paper attentively, and he would give evidence that at this time there was no blank endorsement on it. Now, giving up temper, habits, illness, everything that made for the likelihood of the gift, here was positive evidence, and if they believed Mr. Davis the gift was impossible, and the whole story was false from beginning to end. This evidence there was opposed to that of Susan and the bearer. Now, as to Susan: if Mrs. Fraser was disposed to commit this fraud, here was a girl to assist her who had neither food nor clothes, but what she provided; who had no place or home other than that of the baberchee, to whom she had been bethrothed in her infancy and to whom she must have returned, but for Mrs. Fraser, and who it must be allowed, had strong claims on her gratitude. This brought him to a most suspicious circumstance. At an early stage of the equity proceedings, it had appeared that sooner or later it must come to an issue, and an offer was distinctly made by complainants to defendants' attorney, and distinctly refused by the latter, at the same time stating that he too, was of opinion, that it must come to an issue, but at present he must decline. The offer was refused—for what? and by whom? By the attorney apparently, but truly by Heatly, who had the management of the proceedings, and for this purpose, that he might have time to tutor Susan Jane,—that he might have the advantage of her deposition before the Examiner, and in the event of her death, that he might have all the benefit of that examination, without the danger of cross-examination in this Court. Susan Jane, if the Court believed plaintiff's witnesses had sworn one thing that was untrue, namely, that the paper remained in Mrs. Fraser's possession after the alleged gift. But this was distinctly contradicted by Mr. DaCosta. If it is alleged that the gift was, because the testator had fraudulently barred dower; it was evident that the instrument was engrossed on the day of marriage, and the probability was that it was executed on that day also. The learned counsel then commented on the evidence of Davis, who had deposed that the signature was "painted," and proceeded to point out the various marks which, of course, we are not able to explain to our readers.

W. D. Shaw deposed. I knew Fraser three years before his death, at which time I was assistant in the office of Mr. Wight. I am an attorney at this Court. (Z. the Will, produced.) I am a subscribing witness to this. I remember Fraser giving instructions for this will; he gave me a paper with the heads of his instructions. I prepared the draft, which was afterwards re-copied fairly and given to Fraser. I read over the original draft to him, I put in the words "dearly beloved wife." He saw them and said "Humph! but I suppose that is necessary." A fair copy of the draft was sent by his directions to Mrs. Ryley's under cover to himself. This draft was returned. (No. 8.) This is the instructions. (No. 9.) This is the draft. I am acquainted with Fraser's hand-writing. This is in (No. 10.) When I received the draft again it was marked with Mr. Wight's initials to engross; to the best of my recollection these were subsequent instructions. Subsequent to this the will was executed, being engrossed in duplicate. Fraser was an exceedingly shrewd man. The instructions were received from Fraser alone, and not from his family. I never knew the latter to take any part in giving instructions. From what I have heard Fraser say, I believe that he lived on unhappy terms with his wife. After I was admitted an attorney, in February or March, 1831, Fraser came to my office to have a "crack," as he expressed himself. He said then he was not happy, and spoke of a separation. I recommended him to go to Mr. Wight, who I said, was acquainted with all his family matters and able to advise him. (B produced.) This second endorsement is not Mr. Fraser's usual hand-writing. If I had received a letter written by another person with this signature, I should not have considered it Fraser's writing unless he was in bad health. The letter "m" appears to have been written first with muddy ink, and it is not gone over again at the turn up. He was very particular with the turns of his writing; never saw any of his writing that resembled this. I have seen his writing frequently. I should know the hand-writing of Heatley; this is something similar, but I cannot swear to it. (Cross-examined.) Fraser's hand-writing varied at times, but it always retained one general feature. I have never remarked that ink varies much in writing written at the same time. In the word "solicitor" now shown, the letters are sometimes light and sometimes dark, but the variation is not the same as that in the signature on the endorsement. The expression Fraser made use of regarding his wife, I thought was the true expression of his mind. But the expression "dearly beloved wife" occurs twice in his own instructions. He mentioned that he had some property in Scotland. I think he had no property in Indigo factories at the time the will was made.

William Davis.—I hold a situation in the Mint; have been there 10 years, and in the service of Government 22 years. I knew Fraser; was on intimate terms with him; one of his daughters resided at my house, at the request of her father for two years, previously to her marriage. I remember Mrs. Fraser going on the river. Miss Fraser then went to her father's house and remained two days, when I understood from her that she returned in consequence of Mrs. Fraser's coming back. Fraser very often complained of his wife. I saw Mr. Fraser either two or three days before he was taken ill, and on the evening he was taken ill. Remember the Churuck Pooja. Fraser wrote a note and came to me on the same morning to consult about a Company's paper then about to be paid off. He had consulted me before. He asked what was the best plan of investing money. I advised him to place the money in Fergusson's, as I thought the price of Company's paper might shortly come down, and he might remit it. I saw the paper on that morning—(B. produced) this is the very same. The second endorsement was not on it then. From something that transpired at the time, I looked particularly at the endorsements, and I can most distinctly state that the second endorsement of "James Fraser" was not on it on that occasion. I have seen his hand-writing frequently. The impression on my mind, when in the Examiner's office was, that this was not Fraser's signature, I have no reason now to alter that opinion. I examine it, it appears to me not genuine, but a traced signature. Fraser told me that he had entrusted the receiving of the interest to his agent, and asked me if I thought there was any danger. I requested him to show me the power; examined the paper; told him I thought there was no danger, but requested him to keep the paper in his possession. I asked him to let me have the bills on interest, as I wanted to remit to a family at home. He consented and I offered the market price of the day. Two or three days after I went on his invitation to take tea with him. It was either on the Thursday or Friday; I found him lying on his bed dreadfully ill, and he died three or four days afterwards. I did not expect to hear of his being alive in the morning. (Cross-examined.) I advised him to take short bills on Fergusson and Co. He consulted me whether it was safe to leave the paper with that firm, yet I advised him to invest the whole amount for safety in Fergusson's. Mrs. Davis knew of Fraser's visit; she was not examined in the Examiner's office. I don't think any man likes to have his wife dragged about on these occasions. Mrs. Lingham lived with me for two years; I cannot say whether it was a fortnight, a month, or six weeks, after Fraser's death that I heard of this dispute. My wife and I spoke of it, and I had correspondence with Lingham. It was a long time after the commencement of the equity suit before I was examined. When Fraser came, it was between the 10th and 15th of the mouth in which the Churuck Pooja takes place. It may have been one of the two great days. I have no doubt it was the Churuck, and not any other

Pooja, and on a Tuesday or Wednesday. Lingham told me they could not find the Company's paper at the time. I drew his attention to the fact of there being no blank endorsement on the paper when I saw it. Mr. and Mrs. Lingham are interested in this suit. Never was informed that the paper was in Court till I saw it in the hands of the Examiner. I went once to Mr. Wight's before I was examined. I suppose it was in consequence of my first examination that second interrogatories were filed I had a paper for Rs 30,000 of Fraser's in my possession for two or three days; I believe it was the same. I took it to the Mint to ascertain if it was one advertised to be paid off. The last time I had it was to make those inquiries. It remained with me two or three days, I think in April, 1832. It was advertised to be paid off on the 29th March that year. I must have had it between 29th March and 10th April, 1832. I had it for two or three days; don't know whether Fraser brought or sent it. I don't recollect it. I gave him a receipt for it. I have seen it on previous occasions. It may have been in my possession in 1830. I don't recollect any paper being left with me by Fraser with a blank endorsement. He may have brought the paper to me at the time of Rajkissore's forgery. When Mr. Lingham applied to me, the paper had disappeared, and it was an object to learn if there was an endorsement on it; very likely there might have been some consideration about it. I never was told that the paper was brought into Court. (Re-examined.) I was examined at Mr. Wight's. Fraser had an old peon who generally attended him. To the best of my recollection I told Mr. Wight and Mr. Lingham what I have said here to-day. I took the paper to the Mint with a view of consulting Mr. Ross as to the numbers. An occurrence took place which fixed it on my memory. I placed the paper under the slope before me, and forgot it until on my return home; when half way across the river I remembered it, but it was then too late to return, the Mint had been locked up, and it remained under the slope all night.

Dr. Jackson deposed as to the indisposition of Mrs. Thomas Fraser subsequent to the death of Fraser. In witness's opinion during the time he attended her she was not in a fit state to be examined before the Examiner in equity. Her mind was variously affected and her memory impaired. Witness first attended Mrs. T. Fraser in March, 1833, and left her in June, 1833. (Cross-examined.) Her illness was occasioned through excessive grief for the loss of her child. Previous to her child's death she was capable of answering any questions.

Mr. Andrew Wight.—I was solicitor to the late Mr. Fraser; received instructions to prepare his will in 1828. He was very frequently with me. He was shrewd and intelligent. There was apparently no wavering as to his intentions during the three months I was engaged to draw up the will. I was out of town when he died. The will was engrossed in duplicate. The day after the funeral Mr. John Fraser desired me to appoint Mr. Clarke to meet at my office. I saw Mr. Melville, and he came with the will. On the day the wills executed in duplicate were signed, I delivered one, sealed up with my office seal, in an envelope to Mr. Fraser, the other to Fergusson and Co. for which I obtained a receipt. When Mr. Melville came, he brought one of the duplicates sealed up as I delivered it. Mr. J. Fraser shortly afterwards brought the other copy; it was also sealed up. My attention was drawn to this from a particular circumstance. The endorsement on this latter will was in his own hand-writing. I have a distinct recollection of the state of the seals. I opened them; I believe they had not been opened. I have had this seal since I commenced business. When Mr. Davis was examined at my office, he gave precisely the same account of the endorsement as he has done this day. (B. produced.) I do not believe the second endorsement is Fraser's hand-writing. I believe this to be the envelope of the will. I have no doubt whatever that Fraser's will was brought back, after the funeral, sealed. I was consulted about a separation with his wife by Fraser. On that occasion there was a negociation with Heatley, as Fraser told me, but it went off. In January or February, 1831, there was another consultation about a separation; he assigned the harsh conduct of his wife as the reason. (Cross-examined.) There was an omission in the Bill by way of "a trap," by the advice of counsel. Davis attended at my office about the 20th of May. My recollection is that the will was folded up by myself, and given to Fraser. (The witness was here directed to examine the envelope. On doing so, it was thought that the paper was not large enough to contain the will. The envelope and the will were handed to the bench, but the Chief Justice was of opinion that the issue mainly depended on the evidence of Mr. Davis, of the Mint. If his evidence was true, the plaintiff's case must be false, and it was but wasting time to dwell on these collateral issues. However with regard to the evidence of Miss Urquhart, Mr. Wight was further cross-examined, but we have already given the substance of his evidence.)

William Davis recalled.—This other paper for Rs 30,000 may have been left with me by Mr. Fraser, at the time of Rajkissore's forgery; but I have no recollection.

The Advocate-General replied, reconciling the evidence of Miss Urquhart with that of Mr. Wight with much ingenuity.

The Chief Justice.—In this case it is sufficient to find a verdict on the issue, but with reference to another stage of the equity proceedings, it may be as well to state the grounds on which we decide. In the first place, we find the issue for defendant, and we believe the evidence of Mr. Davis who was examined this day. Now believing this, is there any ground to believe the Company's paper was Mrs. Fraser's property? On the first occasion it was alleged that the gift was made fifteen, seventeen, or twenty days before the testator's death, and in the presence of Susan Jane and Ramjaun, but neither of those persons state that there was then an endorsement made on the Company's paper: they state that the testator had a pen in his hand, and that there was ink near him, but there is no positive testimony in this issue that an endorsement was made on the paper at that time. Then comes Davis's testimony, and as no one positively swears that the endorsement was on at that time, it is a mistake to suppose that his testimony is contradicted. He states that he positively recollects the circumstance from these three things:—the Churruck Pooja, he had just returned from the Sunderbunds, and that it occurred in the week Fraser died. From his evidence it appears that Fraser himself had the Company's paper in his possession two days during that week, the 11th and 12th of April, therefore we may believe his testimony without discrediting that of other witnesses, and as there was no endorsement on the paper when he saw it, there could be no gift in contemplation of death seventeen days before. On the 13th April, Fraser is said to have come out of his room, and on this occasion, he is alleged by Susan Jane, to have pressed the Company's paper in Mrs. Fraser's hand. Ramjaun says Fraser pressed it in his own hand. But allowing that the Company's paper had an endorsement on it at that time, we are of opinion that he was not in that state of mind in which he could make a gift. Looking, therefore, at these two facts, and believing Davis's evidence, the issue must be found for defendant. On the question of forgery it is not necessary to give an opinion.

The Court in the issue having found for Melville, the cause was set down for further directions, and came on now exparte. The following is the substance of the decree:—

That complainants, as executors of James Fraser, do pay amount of legacy due to Anne Fraser, to defendant Heatley her executor, with leave to deduct thereout of costs of suit and of issue. That defendant Heatley do deliver up to complainants on oath all papers belonging to the estate of James Fraser, and join in necessary applications to take the same out of Court. That the Equity Registrar do deliver over to complainants as executors of James Fraser, the Company's paper for Rs 30,000 now deposited with him. That Heatley as executor of Anne Fraser, do pay out of her estate complainants' costs of equity suit and issue, when taxed, as between party and party.—Ibid.

THURSDAY, JULY 23.

Mr. Dobbs opened the pleadings.

Mr. Turton stated the case for the plaintiff. This action is brought by Mr. Calder, who is a British subject residing in the Mofussil, to recover damages from the defendant who, as he styles himself in his plea, is an acting magistrate in this country, but whether from his plea he could justify his acts in that capacity, he, the learned counsel, would not at present presume to say. Of this, however, he felt certain, that defendant could not justify his proceedings under any Act of Parliament. It was barely possible that his learned friend might rely on 21st Geo. 3d; however, that would fail him, as that act had reference only to natives and gave the magistrate no jurisdiction over British subjects. The 53d Geo. 3d. was the first act that gave to Justices of the Peace in the provinces jurisdiction, in cases of assault and trespass committed by British subjects on the natives of India. (Reads) "Be it, therefore, enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any native of India in case of any assault, forcible entry, or other injury with force." &c. &c. If, therefore, his learned friend founded his jurisdiction under this clause, it would be necessary that he should shew that some injury had been complained of by a native. He, the learned counsel, would take the highest authority on that point. The complaint being made, the magistrate then had power to "take cognizance, hear parties, and examine witnesses;" "to take down in writing the substance of the complaint and the defence;" but there was no authority for the magistrate to issue his summons till some complaint or information on oath came before him. The act then goes on to describe the punishment the magistrate may inflict, which is a fine to the extent of Rs. 500, "to be levied in case of non-payment, by warrant, under the hand of the said magistrate, and upon any property of the party so convicted which may be found within the said district; and if no such property shall be found within the said district, then it shall be lawful for the said magistrate, by warrant also under his hand, to commit such offender to some place of confinement within the said zillah or district, which in the judgment of the said magistrate shall be fit for receiving such offender; or if there shall be no fit place of confinement, then to the goal of the Presidency, to remain there for a period not exceeding two months, unless such fine shall be sooner paid." This is the jurisdiction a Justice of the Peace must have under this clause. But, it was said, that defendant had jurisdiction as a magistrate. He, the learned counsel, would be very happy to try that question by the law he would prefer to all other law in the world,—British law, which required a complaint, or information, before a party could be arrested. In this instance he would show there was no ground for suspicion, and no complaint; this he should be able to prove from the defendant's own statement, and that there was not the slightest shadow against the plaintiff from the first to last. The question then is, whether a British subject in this country shall be imprisoned in his own house for a week, no investigation taking place, then taken a distance and imprisoned for another week, still no investigation taking place, sent back in custody to the former prison and detained another week, then brought to a station at a considerable distance and detained a considerable time, and ultimately set at liberty on entering into recognizances of the most extraordinary description,—not that he shall remain at the place during the investigation,—not that he shall attend the Court,—but, forsooth, that he shall not quit that station. He, the learned counsel, admitted there was no complaint against Mr. Magniac, the magistrate of the district, who on investigating the case, was desirous that the plaintiff should be discharged, but this was opposed by Mr. Magniac's second officer, who insisted that a second recognizance should be entered into, to answer any complaint that might be preferred by Government within ten days from the time the first was discharged. He would do Mr. Magniac the justice to say that in this instance he only acted from a friendly leaning to his second officer, and he would also add for the sake of his client, that he was perfectly aware he was not bound to enter into the recognizance which he had done. However, his client had entered into that recognizance, and the result was that on the 6th September he was suffered to depart,—to have his liberty, subject, however, to be called on, after having been dragged about from the end of July down to that period. Now, what had led to these proceedings? The facts were briefly these. The plaintiff resided at Bagadanga, and was an assistant to Messrs. Andrews, who had Indigo Factories in that neighbourhood, several of which were under the superintendence of Mr. Calder. About the end of July, 1834, the head naib of a cutcherry in the neighbourhood belonging to Mr. Andrews, absconded, after having been called on by that gentleman to bring in his accounts. In consequence of this, Mr. David Andrews, who their Lordships would find designated, "David sahib," then at his own factory at some distance, dispatched a letter to the plaintiff, desiring him to send some burkundazes to Dutpoolia, for the protection of the cutcherry from which the naib had absconded. This letter arrived at Bagadanga, about eight or nine o'clock in the morning of the 26th July, and it so happened that on that morning Mr. Calder had left Bagadanga at daylight, for the purpose of inspecting the crop of a factory under his charge, at some distance, after which, as is usual with indigo planters who are at a distance from their own residence, he retired to a neighbouring factory, where he remained during the heat of the day. This latter factory was named Nonagunje, belonging to Messrs. Harris and Co. with whose superintendent, Mr. Wooldridge, he was on terms of intimacy. On the arrival of Mr. David Andrews' letter at Bagadanga, it was taken, in the absence of Mr. Calder, to Mr. Jeffreys, who was then superintending the erection of some works there, and Mr. Jeffreys learning that the letter was "emergent," did not scruple to open it. But before proceeding further it was necessary to inform the Court, that Kishnaghur, and particularly the neighbourhood of Bagadanga, was not the most peaceable part of India; and that in consequence of some very considerable disturbance, Mr. Calder had thought it necessary to apply to the magistrate for two peons, who had been accordingly stationed at the factory for its protection. These peons could not be considered to be in the employ of the planter; they were stationed there by the magistrate, and this he, the learned counsel, considered a fortunate circumstance, as by their testimony he should be able to show, that his client was not at the factory when the letter arrived, and that consequently he had nothing to do with sending the burkundazes to the cutcherry, or the disturbances, which, perhaps, it might be shewn, arose out of that proceeding. He would now return to the proceedings of Mr. Jeffreys, who, as he had informed their lordships, opened the letter forwarded from Mr. David Andrews, and gave the necessary orders. Mr. Jeffreys desired thirteen burkundazes to proceed forthwith to the cutcherry and take possesion of it. Now their lordships would observe that the occasion was urgent, the naib having absconded, it was a matter of importance to take possession of the cutcherry as soon as possible. It happened that some quarrels had existed between the villagers and the servants at that cutcherry, how they originated did not appear, though no doubt his learned friend would make the most of that circumstance, neither did it appear how these thirteen burkundazes, armed, no doubt his learned friend would say, like the knights of old, came to attack three hundred villagers. His learned friend perhaps would say the burkundazes were the aggressors; he, the learned counsel, said they were not. It was not denied that the wounds received by the villagers were more serious than those inflicted on the burkundazes, but the wounds of the latter were more numerous, and moreover they were taken prisoners by the former. However, he, the learned counsel, as his friend's case required some extraordinary aid, was willing to consider that these thirteen burkundazes were the bravest, strongest, most merciless and best armed that ever issued without the ramparts of a Bengal indigo factory. He was willing to concede all this,—his case could well allow him to do so,—but he would ask, what earthly reason was there to suppose his client had been amongst this party? There was not one single charge against Mr. Calder in the proceedings before the magistrate, but certainly, the proceedings signed by the magistrate, and with reference to Mr. Calder, contained some of the most accurate reasoning that ever came from the understanding of a Mofussil law-giver. He would read a part of the purwanna directed to the darogah of Hounsecolley by Mr. Halket, for their lordship's information, offering a few remarks also for his own satisfaction. "Whereas, it appears from the report of the darogah, that burkandauzes belonging to David sahib have been wounded by the ryuts while employed in proceeding with letters," and so on, "no other inference can be drawn than that the affray and conflict was premeditated." That was the sequitur, because the affray had occurred, no other inference could be drawn than that it was premeditated. Here was a specimen of law and reasoning in the Mofussil for their lordships' observation. But this was not all, because the affray had occurred between the villagers and the people of David sahib, and because it was premeditated,—what follows! why, "it is clearly evident that such an affray could not have occurred without the knowledge of the gentleman of the factory,"—their lordships would see the same reasoning pervaded the whole document,—"it is ordered that a purwannah be written directing the darogah to apprehend Mr. Calder." That is, the affray could not have happened without the knowledge of Mr. Andrews, therefore Mr. Calder must be taken into custody. However this accurate reasoning was followed up by proceedings as regular. On the 3d of August, Mr. Calder was arrested, but not as might have been expected, called upon to account for his time; had that mode of proceeding been adopted, he could have satisfactorily shewn that at day light the morning on which the burkundazes were dispatched to take possession of the cutcherry by Mr. Jeffreys, he left Bagadanga, and went to inspect the cultivation of a factory at some distance, and afterwards proceeded to a neighbouring factory belonging to Mr. Harris, called Nonagunge, where he breakfasted with Mr. Wooldridge the superintendent, and where he remained the whole of that day. It was true, Mr. Calder did hear at about two o'clock that day, that there had been an affray between the burkundazes and some villagers at Dutpoolia, but he remained at Nonagunge that night, as the testimony of Mr. Wooldridge would clearly prove. On the next morning, the 3d August, on his return to his own factory, he was arrested, and there he was kept in custody four days, till at length, the "sewarry of the presence" having arrived at Dutpoolia, he was taken in custody to that place. Now whether the "sewarry of the presence" was too dazzling, he, the learned counsel, could not say, but certain it was that his client was not taken before it. On the contrary, Mr. Calder remained in his boat on the opposite side of the river the whole of that day, when at night "the presence" it would seem, willed that he should be taken back to the factory. Accordingly "the presence" sent over a Persian order, and Mr. Calder being ignorant of that language, requested to know what it meant. The person who brought it explained that it was an order to take Mr. Calder back to Bagadanga, and in a week to bring him in custody to Kishnaghur. Accordingly back he was taken in a small boat, and conducted in the same manner to Kishnaghur on the 14th of August. After being kept there a close prisoner in his boat for three or four days, he was at length brought before "the presence," and entered into a recognizance as novel in its form as every thing else that distinguished the proceedings was singular. This he would read to the Court,—"it not appearing necessary to detain Mr. Calder at this place any longer for the present, until the conclusion of the case. Under these circumstances, it is ordered that Mr. Calder be allowed to depart." Now one would have thought that this would have been followed up by a recognizance binding to appear there, and if it had been so, then the Court would only have had to consider if there was any reasonable ground for a suspicion that he was concerned in the affray out of which the proceeding arose. But the conditions are as follow:—"entering into a recognizance of ~~Rs~~ 1000, to appear when required, and that the case stand over." So that, if the case was taken to the Sudder, and whether it was or not, he, the learned counsel, could not say, there Mr. Calder "must appear when required." Such might be the form of entering into recognizance in the Mofussil, but he, the learned counsel, had yet to learn the law on which it was founded. On the 6th of September, Mr. Magniac, the senior magistrate arrived, and after looking into the case, thought that Mr. Calder might be immediately discharged. But "no," says the second officer, "there is some reason for suspicion, and though it is not necessary to detain him, there must be a recognizance taken by the Court." "Why," says the senior magistrate, "should there be a recognizance when there is no charge before the Court?" But finding the junior persist, and willing to let him down as easy as possible, Mr. Magniac turns round to Mr. Calder, and says "there is no just cause to detain you, but you can have no objection to enter into your own recognizance." Mr. Calder certainly had great objections to enter into these recognizances, but under the circumstances, he thought it better to comply, therefore he did so, the condition being that he should appear before that Court "to answer any complaint that may be preferred against him by Government within ten days," and then he was finally discharged. Now the Court would take into consideration that the interruption experienced by Mr. Calder with regard to his business had been extremely great. It might have occasioned the loss of his situation, because it was at a time, the manufacturing season, when his services were most required. However he, the learned counsel, was not going to say such had been the consequence, but of this he was quite sure, that no person in this country could be made a prisoner, and detained in custody for a fortnight in his own dwelling, without being lowered in the ideas of those persons by whom it is necessary he should be shown some respect. He thought it would be admitted that this was a fit case for a Court of Justice to enquire into. But he was not now going to press for vindictive damages for the wounded feelings of his client; the Court would consider the real injury sustained. "Our farthers were not so nice," as his learned friend had observed a day or two ago, but though the real injury would only now be considered, he would go so far as to say that this modern practice was sometimes but the substitution of one word for another, and the amount of damages may go also to satisfy the wounded feelings of the party. He would like to put it to his learned friend, suppose some persons landed at Chandpaul ghat, and kept Mr. Advocate-General a prisoner in his own house, large and pleasantly situated as it is, how would he like it! "Can't go out!" his learned friend would say, "why I have some business in the Supreme Court that must be attended to!" "No matter, sir," say they, "our orders are not to allow you to go out." "Why men," his learned friend would reply, "my client's interest will suffer!" Just so, and had not the interests of Mr. Andrews suffered in consequence of the confinement of Mr. Calder? Well, suppose, after his learned friend had been in custody about a week, he was marched between two peons up to Barrackpore, and after being in full sight of "the presence" for a whole day but not taken before him, suppose his learned friend marched down again to Chandpaul ghât and confined to his house for another week, then sent up to Chandernagore and kept waiting at the ghât three or four days, till they may be pleased to take him before "the presence" at that place. How would his learned friend like that? Difference in station did not make a difference in the feelings of Englishmen, and he, the learned counsel—his client was a Scotchman,—thought Mr. Calder could lay claim to that feeling which was universal amongst British subjects when their liberty was interfered with. Such interference was felt as heavily and deeply here as in the land that Mr. Calder came from. However his client had no vindictive feelings to gratify, if vindictive feelings could have been gratified in a Court of Justice, but he was satisfied that whatever the remedy may be for this illegal imprisonment, he would have it from their lordship's hands. It would be shewn that Mr. Calder is a British subject,—that there is no pretence to say that the injury was done by defendant as a Justice of the Peace, if there was, there was no ground to justify it that could enter into a mind accustomed to reason much more accurately than Mr. Halket seems to have done.

The following is a condensed report of the evidence of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff. The four first were examined as to the jurisdiction:

J. F. M. Reid, Register of the Sudder Dewannee, proved defendant to be in the civil service of the East India Company. (Cross-examined.) Defendant has been magistrate of Nuddea upwards of one year. I knew the late Mr. Richardson, but don't know if he was an American.

Charles Binny Trevor.—I have heard defendant is a Justice of the Peace; don't know that he is; don't know his hand-writing.

L. Magniac.—I am a civil servant, and was collector and magistrate of Kishnaghur. Defendant is in the civil service. I am not quite sure whether he was a Justice of the Peace last August, but he was previous to that period. I never heard him say what countryman he is, or of what country his parents were.

Frederick Osborne.—I know defendant. He told me one evening that he was an Irishman.

Duncan Calder.—I am brother to plaintiff. He was born in Aberdeenshire in Scotland.

Goolamee.—I am a burkundaz of the thannah of Haunseeolly. Goolab Sing was the darogha last year. I received some orders from that thannadar, desiring me and another burkundaz to gird our loins and be ready. I now know Bagadanga, and proceeded there from the Doulagunj factory, by order, in writing, of the thannadar, who desired me to go there, and keep the gentleman in custody till the arrival of the suwaree of the presence. I communicated the order to Mr. Calder. I think I remained at the factory five or six days. Four of us were there; we told Mr. Calder that we could not permit him to go out of the factory or to any other place. He did not attempt to go to any other place. We did nothing but watch him from going out to any other factory. He used to go to various parts of the factory, but never went out. He never said that he wanted to go out for exercise. After five or six days, Mr. Halket's suwaree arrived at Dutpoolia. A peon came with a purwannah from the presence to conduct the gentleman to Dutpoolia. Mr. Calder said he would go next morning, and we accompanied him there in the beauleah. The peon followed in the cook boat. Two peons remained in the factory. We arrived at Dutpoolia, and saw Mr. Halket's pinnace on the other side of the river. We asked Mr. Calder, if we should go over, he said let us remain on this side. Mr. Calder did not go that day. One of the burkundazes went to the other side of the river. Shortly after the close of day a burkundaz came over, who said he was appointed to act in the place of the man just mentioned, and that Mr. Calder should remain for a week at the factory of Bagadanga, and then he was to proceed to Kishnaghur. This man's name was Syfoo. Mr. Calder said he did not understand Bengalli or Persian, and that he would proceed if he received an order in English. Then Syfoo went over to the other side of the river, where Mr. Halket's pinnace was, but he again returned, and spoke to Mr. Calder's vakeel and another servant, upon which Mr. Calder gave orders to proceed to Bagadanga. I returned with him according to orders, with four others who were appointed to accompany the gentleman. We reached the factory, I think, by day-light. Rampaul, the burkundaz who went over to Mr. Halket, did not return with us. We remained, I think, four, five, or six days at the factory. Mr. Calder made no attempt to go out nor did we prevent him. We were told by a burkundaz that we were to remain as heretofore, and Mr. Calder said he would not attempt to go out. He got his beauleah ready and proceeded to Kishnaghur. We told his sircar that it was necessary one of us should proceed with him. Mr. Calder said he had no room in his boat, and that we may go a-head; afterwards it was arranged that I should go in the cook-boat, and the others should go by land. When we arrived at Kishnaghur we came off the collector's ghaut, where we remained about six days, after which two of Mr. Halket's servants came, and said Mr. Calder must proceed to the presence. During these six days he had not gone ashore; he might if he had thought proper, being an European, but I should have gone with him as servants attend their masters. Two days after we first arrived at the factory, a gentleman (Mr. Wooldridge) offered to give bail if we would let Mr. Calder go. We said we had no power, and that we were stationed merely to guard and watch. We went to the cutcherry where Mr. Halket was holding a Court. Mr. Calder and Mr. Halket spoke English together, and I was then told to depart to my own thannah. This was, by guess, five or seven days after our arrival at Kishnaghur. Doulagunj and Haunseeolly are within the jurisdiction of the Kishnaghur magistrate. (Cross-examined.) The orders were the magistrate's; I received them from the darogah; the first was to go to the thanna of Doulagunj. This was a written order, sealed, but after it was executed it was returned. I received from Syfoo another order at Dutpoolia; it was a verbal one. Mr. Calder refused to proceed and Syfoo went to the other side. On the next occasion Syfoo was accompanied by Mr. Calder's vakeel. Syfoo is not in Calcutta. At the factory Mr. Calder assured us he would not go out. The factory is about three or four bigahs from the bungalow. He never left his bungalow, but he might if he had thought proper have gone to any part of the factory, for we would not have prevented him, except he was proceeding from the factory to some other place. I received two written orders only during all the time. We did not go into the bungalow; we remained at the distance of about a biggah. I saw no armed men about the place; there were two burkundazes there before I arrived. (Re-examined.) I can neither read nor write, and should not be able to identify the orders. The darogah told me to watch the gentleman. (Cross-examined.) From Dutpoolia, Mr. Calder went to his factory, where he remained five or six days, and then proceeded to Kishnaghur in conformity with the order he had received. The collector's ghaut is about eight biggahs from the cutcherry of Mr. Halket. (Re-examined.) We told Mr. Calder that he might go about the factory, but that he must not quit it. The plant was not fit for cutting. We would not have permitted him to leave the factory to see the cultivation.

Khoodeeram Parre.—I am a burkundaz of the Doulagunj thannah; was so in July last. I know the Baggadanga factory; it is six coss from the factory. I was stationed at the factory, in consequence of Mr. Calder's request, at the end of May. Before July Mr. Calder was in the habit of visiting daily other factories. When the order came in writing, it was communicated to me, verbally as I could not read. It was explained to me, after which Mr. Calder was not permitted to go out of the factory. We would not have permitted him to do so. I told him he might go about his own factory, but not into the village. We never saw any riot or disturbance. I was at Bagadanga, when the riot took place at Dutpoolia. On that day Mr. Calder went away early in the morning. About three hours after day light the burkundazes went away from Bagadanga. Mr. Calder returned either on that day or the next; three or four days afterwards Rampaul came with a perwanah. (Cross-examined.) I first went to Bagadanga at the request of Mr. Calder, who could not agree with the tenants. I never saw there were stocks in that neighbourhood. I don't know of any stocks for the ryuts. About thirteen persons, west country people, left the factory on the morning of the riot; they were armed; two burkundazes remained, I and another, and two of Mr. Calder's remained. I cannot say why fifteen burkundazes were kept on these premises, but Mr. Calder had lands of his own to look after. These thirteen men were in the riot at Dutpoolia. I don't know whether they went twice during the day. They were taken prisoners. I heard from the officers six villagers were wounded. I never knew them to be out in a body before, five or four used to go out. Mr. Calder has two factories under his charge.

William Jeffreys.—I was at the Bagadanga factory last year. I remember the riot at Dutpoolia. Mr. Calder was not at the factory at seven o'clock, he left it at day light. I opened a letter which came from Mr. Andrews, Mr. Calder being absent. In consequence of that letter I ordered burkundazes to be sent to Dutpoolia. Mr. Calder had nothing to do with those orders. Nonagunje lays in a north or north west direction. Dutpoolia is nearly south from Bagadanga; Mulnath, south of Bagadanga seventeen miles, is Mr. Andrews's residence. It was on the 28th July that the burkundazes were sent to Dutpoolia. Mr. Calder returned on the following morning. On the 3d August the peons came to arrest Mr. Calder; he did not go out of the factory while I remained. I was there when he returned with the peons from Dutpoolia. I was present when an offer of bail and security was made. The orders I gave to the burkundazes were to go to Dutpoolia to protect the cutcherry. I gave these orders in consequence of what I read in the letter. There were three factories under Mr. Calder's care, about four miles distant, in all, from 12,000 to 15,000 biggahs. The cultivation extends three or four miles from the Bagadanga factory. They had commenced manufacture before this occurrence. (Cross-examined.) I was in the factory at the time of Mr. Calder's arrest, and heard that it was in consequence of the riot at Dutpoolia. I did not go to Mr. Halket, and tell him I was the person who ordered the burkundazes. I mentioned it to the plaintiff the next day, but I do not know whether he mentioned it at the cutcherry to Mr. Halket. I have mentioned it to Mr. Molloy; don't recollect mentioning it to any other person at the factory; don't recollect what Mr. Calder replied when I told him; I don't think Mr. Calder ever said that no men had been sent. I never went to Mr. Halket's cutcherry; I was never called upon to go. The letter I opened was from Mr. Andrews, and I opened it because the bearer said it was an express. The letter contained an order to send these men to Dutpoolia. I have been at the Bagadanga factory for eight months, but I do not know that he used these men to punish the ryuts who offended him. I never saw stocks to punish the riots in Dutpoolia, or any of the villages. I know Mulnath, but am not aware that any money was sent there on the morning of the riot. Mr. Andrews's head naib had absconded the day before, and the burkundazes were sent for the protection of the cutcherry. Takoor Doss Chatterjie is the head sircar of Mr. Andrews. I don't know if he is here to-day. Bhyrob Biswas was Mr. Andrews's naib; he is now in prison, having been tried for that riot. (Re-examined.) I reside at Bhuwaneepoor, about twenty miles from Kishnaghur, and four from Mr. Calder's factory. I gave no other orders to the burkundazes than those contained in the letter. There are many gang roberries in Kishnaghur. It is necessary to have armed men at the factories; the business could not be carried on without them.

Richard Wooldridge.—I am an assistant to Harris and Co. at their Nonagunje factory, about eight miles from Mr. Calder's. I remember the day of the riot at Dutpoolia. Mr. Calder arrived at Nonagunje factory on the 28th July, at 9 o'clock in the morning. He remained there all day. He heard of the riot at three o'clock in the afternoon. He remained reading and writing. He generally visited his own factory in the morning. Subsequently, I asked the burkundazes if they would take bail, but they said they had no authority. (Cross-examined.) We heard of this riot about three o'clock. Mr. Calder then thought of going but I advised him not to do so. I heard that bail had been offered to the magistrate, but am not aware that it is true. I had not began cutting. It was not a busy time. At Kishnaghur, Thakoor Doss Chatterjia was both Mr. Andrews's and Mr. Calder's vakeel. I heard there were about eleven wounded men in the hospital. I don't remember if one was dangerously wounded. I went to Kisnaghur to be bail for the plaintiff. The defence made by the burkundazes was that they were attacked by the villagers when proceeding with money and notes to another factory.

Syed Ghureeboollah.—I was the acting darogah of Haunsecolly thannah last year, but was discharged after the riot of Dutpoolia. (Cross-examined.) I reported the riot of Dutpoolia to the magistrate. I saw the village people; six of them were wounded. They had sword cuts. I saw some burkundazes bound, they were wounded, but not by swords. My report was reduced into writing, and delivered to Mr. Halkett immediately, after which I was discharged. One of the men wounded with a sword was Hollodhor Bose. I understood the people were Mr. Andrews's, under the controul of Mr. Calder. (Re-examined.) When I went to Dutpoolia, I found six of the village people wounded with swords. There might be about two hundred male inhabitants in that village.

Goolas Sing.—I am darogah of the Haunscolly thannah. I received a perwannah, and directed two peons to remain at the factory at Bagadanga, and not to suffer Mr. Calder to leave it. I have not had any conversation with Mr. Halket, regarding the arrest of Mr. Calder. (The witness then deposed with regard to the purwannah being returned to the magistrate.) (Cross-examined.) Dufterpullia is within my jurisdiction. Mr. Halket left the district soon after Mr. Magniac succeeded.

The case being closed for the plaintiff,

Mr. Advocate-General took two objections. He rose in the first instance, and trusted that it would be in the last, to convince the Court, now that the case for the plaintiff had been brought to a close, that on his friend's own showing it was not cognizant to this Court. His learned friend might treat as lightly as he thought fit, the act 21st Geo. III, but it might be as well to read the words of it, before he offered any argument to the court, and their lordships would have the goodness to attend and see whether they were applicable to any case more than the present one. "Whereas it is reasonable to render the Provincial Magistrates, as well Natives as British Subjects, more safe in the execution of their office, be it enacted that no action for wrong or injury shall lie in the Supreme Court against any person whatever, exercising a judicial office in the country courts, for any judgment, decree, or order of the said Court, nor against any act done by, or in virtue of, the order of the said Court." This act, Mr. Advocate-General contended, though a law prior to the 53d Geo. III. which first gave Provincial Magistrate jurisdiction over British subjects in the Mofussil, extended to, and was to be construed with it. As to the second point the learned counsel contended, that the plaintiff, as in an action against the Sheriff, must connect the defendant with the darogah, by proving the purwannah, or giving evidence of some act of recognition.

Mr. Turton rose to reply, but the Court reserved both points.

Mr. Advocate-General upon the case. There are three distinct trespasses charged in the complaint, but if the defendant was connected with the arrests at all, it was clear it was only to that one under the purwannah laid in the first count of the declaration, that is to the original arrest and so much of the imprisonment as took place under it. Now, what are the circumstances at the time this arrest was directed? Your lordships will observe we have justified what we have done, and beside the pleas, there is a defence before the Court which proves that we could not have justified ourselves to the country, to the Government, or to our own feelings, had we taken a different path than we have done. Your lordships have heard there were fearful riots, which if not originated by, were at least participated in, by the armed servants of the defendant. On such an occasion what was the duty of the magistrate not acting under the law of England—if he were acting under the law of England sure I am that I could easily justify it—but under the Regulations of the Government of this country, which have been ratified by Act of Parliament? It was his duty to look at what those Regulations directed, which by IX. of 1807, section 4,—I state the substance only as follows:—Magistrates are not restricted from issuing process for apprehension, upon the report of an officer of Police, or upon other credible information. That being the duty of the magistrate, let us look at Regulation XX. for 1817, section 13, for that of a darogah:—Upon receiving information, the darogah shall enquire into the circumstances, and transmit the substance to the magistrate. What then has been done on this occasion? The darogah did make an enquiry and reported to the civil magistrate. But my learned friend takes another course, which, for all I know, may be better suited to his case, and comes here with a declaration of the rights of Englishmen and their love of personal liberty,—a declaration which no man is more willing to allow than myself, but according to the views I have been accustomed to take,—that they are plain and old fashioned I admit,—right and duty go hand in hand, that liberty is to be allowed so far as it is consistent with order, and that Englishmen should show that duty to the law as citizens in whatever part of the world they may be placed. I little thought at the opening of this case to hear a tirade in favor of liberty from a man who admits in the same breath that he keeps a band of robbers, armed with sword and shield, brought from a distance, and ready to be let loose on the unoffending inhabitants of the neighbourhood. I say, I little thought to hear such a tirade from a man brought here to claim his rights,—a man who keeps for such purposes foreigners,—foreigners to this part of the country at least,—ready armed for persecution, a circumstance which alone is a very good ground of suspicion and would warrant his confinement. But let us see a little further. What was the state of the country, and what was the part this man acted, who dares to come into an English Court of Justice and ask for damages for acts against his own person? I will ask your lordships to attend to the proceedings in the Mofussil Court, which will be put in evidence, and then let us see if the state of the country is so tranquil, that this gentleman, my client, was not justified in acting as he has done. Your lordships have heard that the darogah has power to administer oaths, to examine and to report, and on that report the magistrate has power to act by that, which is, in truth and in fact, the law of the land. Now let us see the report of the darogah: "After having transmitted to your presence touching the assault and pillage of the village of Dutpoolia, by Bhyrob Biswas, the gomastah and Sookub Roy and about one hundred and fifty persons, men with sticks and staves, on the part of Mr. David"—that my lords, is on the part of Mr. David Andrews's factory,—and so it goes on;—"this creature," meaning the darogah "found Hollodhur Ghose, and other six persons, tenants of the village, wounded and thirteen other persons wounded on the side of the said gentleman," meaning Mr. David Andrews. "On the following day the tenants delivered over to this creature four swords, three shields, &c. &c. alleged to have been in the hands of the rioters." After this, there being unfortunately no medical man to examine the wounds, the darogah goes on to describe them, one of which he states to be "of the length of seven fingers, of the breadth of two fingers and a half, and in breadth one and a half fingers." There are other wounds which he describes as "wounds filled up" with what he calls "medicine," but your lordships will see the nature of the attacks from the evidence. I may however say, that the darogah describes them as being inflicted with swords. Now Calder keeps these men; and I should like to ask, in the first place, if these outrages are to be committed with impunity; and in the second, if not, then I should like to ask, if Calder can complain;—if by keeping these men he has excited the cause of complaint, whether he can complain himself of being called to account for it? I say, first of all let him do justice and then ask for justice for himself. In a country,—a peaceful, timid and quite race of men,—nay, I do not speak of the timidity of the people where these armed men come from,—but it is notorious that the Bengallis are so,—are they to be wounded and persecuted by one who chooses to boast of the name of Englishman, and after doing so, is he to come into a Court of Justice with a complaint? We have lately heard, my lords, that natives of this country are now admissible to high offices; I do not say that this was not required by the circumstances of this country, but, I do say, that such a law is worse than the worst mockery, if such men as Calder are permitted to remain among them. I will call you lordships' attention to another part of the darogah's report: "On being interrogated, Hollodhur Ghose, and other ryuts who had been wounded, stated upon oath in their respective depositions, that the assamees then present, and others belonging to the gentleman before named, being armed with clubs, and other weapons, had made an attack, and committed a riot and affray, &c. But Hollodhur Ghose being severely wounded and unable to speak, it was with great difficulty and labor that he spoke one or two words and he was unable to give his statement in detail." Now, I put it to your lordships, not as judges, for that I cannot do, but I know you have the feelings of men, and indeed, I need not put it, for I know you would have felt it your duty not to see these unfortunate creatures imprisoned, some of them as we are told, for six years, while the conduct of their master, who was the cause of all, was suffered to pass without inquiry. In another part of the same report it is stated, that they, to the number of twelve persons, had been deputed by Calder sahib, the assistant at the factory of Bagadanga, in charge of a parcel in which there was a note, for the purpose of conveying the same, and were proceeding near the village of Dutpoolia, when the whole of the people of the village assembled, attacked and beat them, and plundered them, and carried them to the village, and charged them as assamees or defendants." This is the report of the darogah, that a riot had taken place of a most serious nature, and caused by persons in the employ of the plaintiff, of whom Biswas was the principal rioter, and he was plaintiff's gomastah;—these men were sent out by the order of his employer, so they say, and believing so far, I must say, that part of their story regarding the carrying of a note seems to me altogether impossible. But be that as it may, suppose an inquiry made, and Calder suffered to go abroad, what would any man say? Why, that the magistrate was unfit for his office; that a leaning towards Calder in his own mind had prevented the administration of impartial justice. Next came the report of the Session Judge, the order of the Fouzdary Court, of which I do not deny, that my client was the only member, and which will prove that he acted in his judicial character. I am not now going to return to my objection to the power of this Court taking cognizance of my client's proceedings in that character, but I may put it to your lordships, whether under the circumstances, and consistent with his duty, Mr. Halket could have acted in a different manner than he has done. The judge immediately above him thought he acted right, the jury before whom the case came found that a number of Calder's servants were engaged in the riot. But while I am arguing that this is sufficient to justify the conduct of Mr. Halket, allow me to enter my protest, that I do not consider myself called on to justify his conduct in this Court. Now, your lordships have it before you, that these servants—civil or military—certainly more like the latter than the former—were tried by a jury and sentenced to heavy periods of imprisonment—amongst the sentences was one for a period of six years, and on this I will trouble you with the comment of the Session Judge,—"because from the proceedings it is clear and evident that these riots and tumults that happened as well in the morning as at the hour of ten o'clock in the day, were founded upon the oppression and machinations of the said Bhyrob, for this reason:—that he, prior to the happening of this matter, had caused a person of the name of Ruttenchunder to be seized and brought before him, and was determined to send him, together with his boat, without giving him his hire to the factory of Bhowannypore." This factory, your lordships will recollect, is the factory near to Mr. Wooldridge's, and of which it was said, Mr. Calder had gone to inspect the cultivation,—"and received a blow" and so on; so that Mr. Calder's factories seem to be the general places whence armed burkandazes are sent out, and peaceable ryuts are brought in. The report of the Sessions Judge goes on to state, that an attempt to extort money was the ground of the riots, and he evidently considers this man, Bhyrob, to be the leader, and this man was not one of the armed party, but the head of Bhowannypore factory itself. Now I hope for your lordships' patience for the time I have trespassed on you; but what follows is too important for me no not to draw your lordships' attention to it. Calder left Bagadanga at four o'clock in the morning, whether the witness means four guntas, I do not pretend to say; but it is material to this part of the case to remember, that Bhowannypore where he went is five miles distant from Wooldridge's factory. At four o'clock he started from Bagadanga, and at nine he arrives at Wooldridge's house. I am not here to argue that Calder was in the affray: it is only necessary for me to shew that there was enough to warrant suspicion. Now what did this arrival at nine o'clock at Wooldridge's prove? Is it the first time an alibi has been set up in this court by a man in the situation of Calder himself? But what does it prove? If Calder was concerned—I am not justified in saying that he was—he might have given his orders over night and then taken himself quietly out of the way. Yet is this brought forward and boasted to convey an idea of his innocence with the certainty of mathematics. Now I turn to the evidence of Mr. Wooldridge. He tells you that it was nine o'clock when Calder came there. Came there—for what purpose? Not for business, for Wooldridge tells you he passed his time in reading the newspaper. Did he come on a horse or on an elephant? Wooldridge could not tell; but I suppose he must have come on one or the other, and if he did, why not now produce the man who accompanied him to shew how he passed his time,—that he did not stay by the way! It is said that Kooderam accompanied him on ordinary occasions, but, perhaps, on this occasion something was to be done which it might not be proper to be seen or overheard; and, therefore, was there no account of his time. Now, your lordships have heard how he got to Wooldridge's, and you have also heard from my learned friend much of the busy season and the interruption of Mr. Calder's business; it seems, however, that his business, urgent and important as it was, permitted him to remain at Wooldridge's for the remainder of the day, reading the newspaper. At three o'clock, intelligence arrives of a riot. My friend talks of the rights of Englishmen, I should have thought that the man who boasts of the rights of an Englishman would have respected the rights of others. I should have thought that he, Calder, would have hastened to the spot where his people were imprisoned, to enquire into the circumstances, and mitigate the evil which possibly his absence had occasioned; and so he might have done had he so desired. But he desired no such things. "Oh, Yes," says Wooldridge, "I persuaded him to stay." Persuaded him to stay! The sense of duty was remarkably strong. We have heard of a "dazzling" from my learned friend, but there was no dazzling to prevent him proceeding to his imprisoned people had he so chosen. A little wooing—a little offer to go might enhance the pleasure of his company on this, as it is said to have done with others on an other occasion,—he plays the maid's part,—he coyly says "no," and yet accepts the offer after all. And there he sits quietly in the house of his friend reading newspapers when he might have gone to the spot; a word from him would have stopped the whole proceeding. I now come to the evidence of Jeffrey's, which is to exonerate Calder by taking the blame upon himself. Your lordships heard how that man gave his evidence; there was hesitation and equivocation such as never yet fell from a man that was going to speak the truth. He says he received a letter written to Calder to tell him to send down those men to protect the cutchery, and the reason assigned for this is, perhaps, the most whimsical that ever entered into the head of man:—the naib had ran away, therefore he expected the cutchery to be attacked. Now, I ask, how was the cutchery in danger, because the naib had ran away? A man must strain hard before he finds such a reason—he must be quite sure that the matter will not bear investigation that twists and turns in this manner. I say, as I proceed, fresh suspicion crowds upon my mind. In a case of this nature, more particularly where such a defence is set up, one would have expected to have seen the letter of Andrews itself. Jeffreys had sent it to Calder, but why is it not produced here? Again I say, at every step I take fresh suspicion crowds upon my mind as to the conduct of this man. Why not call Andrews himself? Oh, that would not answer the purpose; much better to send Jeffreys into Court with an imaginary letter. Now let us consider how far this evidence concurs with that of the bunkundazes themselves state. They say they were proceeding from the Bagadanga factory in charge of a parcel or a note, therefore, it is not possible to believe this evidence of Jeffreys. True it is that the depositions of the burkundazes vary a little from that of the villagers,—they state they "were passing near a village," whereas they were in the village, but it is not possible that a statement of that description should be accurate in all points. Now Jeffreys never mentioned this fact on one single occasion except to Calder, and to the respectable gentleman who is Calder's attorney, and who, I am sure, would not bring a witness forward in this Court on whom he could not place some reliance. If the tale had been true, it appears to me that he could have written to Mr. Halket, but it is quite clear that it is made up for the occasion on which it may be used. He never recollects, (Mr. Turton corrected the learned counsel) oh, no doubt the correction is worthy of the interruption. I say he never recollects,—his imagation, rich as it is in invention, can remember nothing. Now, let us see if it is likely this affair could have taken place. Is it to be believed that Calder would have submitted to this confinement when a single word have relieved him from it! Is it to be believeed, that Calder would not have written, and said. "It was not my doing; I can prove that the order was Jeffrey's and by desire of Andrews!" Here was Calder's servants concerned in a riot—here was the head man of his factory also concerned,—here was Calder himself out of the way without accounting for his time. But if this tale was true, Calder could at once have explained to the magistrate,—he could have said, "I am not concerned in it; I can shew that the order came from a different source." There must be some claim upon your credulity if your lordships are called upon to believe one word of this. But supposing the tale was true, Calder could only have acted from a love of persecution,—he had laid a "trap" for the magistrate,—my friend has done me the honor to recollect a word of mine the other day,—it is fair that I should recollect a word of his—he took a step to secure his own imprisonment,—he might, in the first place, have availed himself of the conversation with Jeffreys—he might have told the magistrate that he was a British subject,—he might have put him on his guard by saying; "I was born in Scotland," and surely that thought would have occurred to any man who did not want to draw the magistrate into a difficulty. Then let us look at Calder's conduct when he was confined, and your lordships will not suppose with the view I take of the case, that I am speaking with a view of lessening the damages. I am speaking here for no such thing. I am quite satisfied that you will think the conduct of my client correct; but I am speaking for Mr. Halkett, and I am desirous of showing to those who have a right to know, that no spot rests on his character, that it is not only just and good, but that in acting as he has done he has acted right, and that had he done otherwise he would have done wrong. During the time Calder was in custody, every person appears to have acted with every degree of kindness compatible with keeping him safe. But it was his object to get something like persecution, and then to have his remedy in Court. He was told he might have the use of his factory; he might visit the vats which are at some distance from the house, but "no," he confines himself with the strictness of a prisoner to his own habitation, and then comes here with a story of his suffering, which reminds me of the character in the Tale of a Tub, who would stand at the corner of the street, and calling to those who passed by, would cry, "Worthy Sir, do me the honor of a good slap in the chaps;" "Honest friend, pray favor me with a handsome kick on some other part." "Madam, shall I entreat a small box on the ear from your ladyship's fair hands?" "Noble Cap ain, lend a reasonable thawck with that cane of yours over these shoulders." And when he had by such earnest solicitations, made a shift to procure a basting sufficient to swell up his fancy and his sides, he would return home extremely comforted, and tell terrible accounts of what he had suffered for the public good, telling the people that had he been tender of his poddle, they would have had the Pope and the French King, long before this time of day, among their wives and their ware-houses. Just so, only not quite so amusingly, did Mr. Calder tell what he had suffered for the rights and liberties of Englishmen. Sufferings indeed! Your lordships cannot have forgotten that when he was taken, as he calls it, from his own factory to Kishnaghur, one of the peons asked permission to accompany him in the beauleah, but no, says Mr. Calder, "go in the cook boat." A pretty prisoner! Well, he arrives at Kishenaghur, and remains two days at the ghât there. Now, I happen to know something of Kishanagur, sufficient at least to say that the ghât is a considerable distance from the collector's house, and that it is quite possible that a person may remain there for several days without that circumstance coming to the knowledge of the magistrate. But with this we have nothing to do. I fancy, it is clear that we have to do with but one single imprisonment, and one single purwannah. The case is simply, not whether Calder is guilty, but to say whether Mr. Halket had or had not a cause for suspicion which warranted the enquiry he has made; and we have to look only at the first arrest which does not clearly appear to have lasted four or five days. If there was no ground of suspicion, I confess I am at a loss to account for Calder's conduct. He might have given orders that morning; he might have planned the whole scheme: he hears of the affray at three o'clock in the day, still he never interfered; he is made acquainted with Jeffreys's wonderful tale, still he never discloses it,—not a word does he state about that anterior to his release. All his sufferings, as he calls them, arise from himself. Now let us look at the other side. Here are the statements of the wounded men, saying they were maintained, armed, and let loose by Calder himself. Then we have the decision of the Court, the report of the Session Judge, and looking at these, I feel assured that your lordships will say that Mr. Halket has not only done quite right, but that if he had acted in any other way, he would have done wrong.

Goureboolah.—I was examined yesterday. I enquired into the affray, I think the day after it happened. I examined the villagers and transmitted a report to Mr. Halket, in the course of my duty, as daroga. I have seen the original in the Sudder Court, and compared the copy with it. This is it. I saw at the same place the order on that report. It contains the examination of the six villagers wounded with a sword, and the thirteen men on the part of of Mr. Calder. The answer of the thirteen men states that they were wounded with sticks but had no dangerous wound. This is the copy of Ranjee Ussa's deposition, the original of which I have seen at the Sudder. There are five other depositions of men who were wounded at Dutpoolia. I received information and enquired in the course of my duty. I found Hulloder Bosh senseless, weak, and feeble. The tenants' wounds were inflicted with a sword. I sent all the wounded men to Kishnaghur, together with my report. I had been at darogah for nine months. There were riots and tumults at Hunseeolloy about indigo plant. I have heard that this is a talook belonging to Mr. D. Andrew. I had a purwannah sent to me in consequence of those riots, and on a previous occasion I went to Dutpoolia in consequence of a quarrel. I saw five or seven wooden stocks in the village, which were not placed there by the proper authorities. At Sunbannia, which is connected with Bagadanga, I saw no stocks. This a copy of a purwannah; the original is at the Sudder. The opinion of the Session Judge has also been compared with the original (the witness proceeded to prove several other documents.)—(Cross-examined) Lately I have had no employ. I was subpœnaed and came to the attorney with whom I went to the Sudder to see the original of these papers. I have been here eight or nine days. After the Court rose yesterday, I went to Mr. Paul; there I saw Mr. Halket, but I had no conversation with him then or this morning. I have not the power to administer an oath to a person who make a complaint, but I am authorized to examine a person on oath who has been dangerously wounded, and whose life is in danger. I took the examination of the other persons also, alleging that Mr. Calder had sent them. I completed all in about five hours. There are gang robberies in all the district of Kishnaghur.

J. F. M. Reid proved several documents purporting to be proceedings in the Zillah Court.

Hollodhur Ghose.—I am an inhabitant of Dutpoolia; remember an affary in July, 1834. I was hurt, as well as several others. Two respectable persons in our village were taken to Mr. D. Andrew's factory, fined, and imprisoned. Hearing a noise, I came out and received a wound with a sword. The mark remains; this is it. An up-country man, in the employ of Mr. D. Andrew, and in company with sixty others wounded me. Subsequently I was sent to the hospital at Kishnaghur, with six others, who were also wounded. There were stocks, four in number, put up in the village by Mr. Calder, but I never saw any person punished in them. I was examined by the darogah the day after I was wounded. (Cross-examined.) I think there were about sixty, but am not certain.

Mr. Turton in reply. When I was first engaged in this cause, I was fully prepared to oppose all the obstacles that might be thrown in my way, for I could not be blind to the fact that persons acting in a judicial situation, and not engaged in the administration of the law of England, and particularly persons in this country, have a sort of prescriptive right not to be bound by those laws which, it is generally thought apply to them. I say, I was fully prepared to encounter these obstacles, but I must confess I was not prepared to meet that sort of defence which has been set up this day,—that a gentleman exercising the jurisdiction of a magistrate in this country should feel ashamed of the land which produced him. However it is pretty clear that this line of defence would not have been adopted,—that the time of the Court would not have been trifled in proving the defendant an Irishman or the plaintiff a Scotchman, if my friend had any reliance on the other line of defence, to the weakness of which he has now added his own testimony. My friend has made one comment regarding our not having informed the magistrate that he was a British subject, but it appears to me, it had been better before he had done so to have asked the gentleman who imprisoned my client, whether he was, or was not, at the time he caused him to be apprehended, in possession of the roll of British subjects residing in that district. I say if he was not aware that he was a British subject, he has spent his time at billiards or in other amusements, for it was his duty to know every British subject who resided in that district, and till very lately it was his duty to give information to Government of every British subject residing there without their permission, and one of your lordships may recollect an action against Mr. Middleton, because he objected to Mr. Morton being in the upper provinces without the sanction of Government. What then becomes of my friend's tub? There was a time when my learned friend would not have treated the wrongs of Englishmen so lightly; and now I should have at least expected that my client would have received compassion for the injuries he had experienced through the ignorance of his client. This young gentleman, Mr. Halket, came out to this country in 1827, a few years afterwards his presence is unfortunately inflicted over the large district of Kishnaghur, where in his judicial situation he claims immunity from all error. That it was quite possible for him to have committed error I think no man can doubt, but my learned friend in his defence says he adopts the line of conduct Mr. Halket has taken; nay, he says more, he says his client has adopted the proper course, and sorry am I that I can compliment my friend as little on his judgment as I can compliment my friend's client on the course he has taken. He has stated his notion of liberty connected with the right of others, but this, though not a peculiar notion, so far as his client is concerned, is a most unfortunate statement, for if true liberty consists in having some consideration for the right of others as well as for our own, what regard has Mr. Halket shown for this opinion? Is the imprisonment of Mr. Calder in his factory,—the dragging him from one end of the district to the other, consistent with that right and duty which goes hand in hand, and the respect for the rights of others as well as of our own, which I am quite as ready to admit to be my notion of English liberty as well as my friend's? But, he has stated, that I opened this case with a tirade in favor of liberty, and if I had I should not be ashamed to acknowledge it, for if ever I am guilty of a tirade it will be in favor of that subject, and I am tolerably certain few men but my learned friend would have selected it as a matter for their sneer. He has complained that my client has not sought an opportunity for explaining to the magistrate that he was entirely unconnected with the order for the departure of the burkundazes, but he has forgotten that in this district, subject as it is unfortunately to continual quarrels, subject as it is to the administration of justice by one or two young men, and where there is a want of justice from the want of persons to administer it, the magistrate is not always to be found at the spot where the seat of justice ought to be; besides it must not be forgotten, that the spot where this affray took place is twenty miles from the residence of the magistrate, and my own experience, which is not like my learned friend's, confined to the ghat, enables me to say, that some parts of the district where the magistrate's persence is required is more than an hundred miles from it. Here, too, I may observe, with reference to those men whom my friend has called a band of robbers, that there is some excuse for my client having employed them, since they afforded his property a protection which the law might have done but did not. But, throughout his address my friend has insisted that Mr. Calder originated this affray,—from his own witnesses it is quite clear that he did not,—and he sneeringly asserts that it was my client's duty when he heard of the affary to proceed instantly to the spot, and prevent what had already occurred. A little wooing, said he, served to keep him from that purpose, forgetting that he was not within twenty miles of the spot, and that outrages were then going on which the police had not the power to check, and in which had he determined to proceed, it is not only possible but probable that he would have been murdered,—outrages of daily occurrence which would prevent any European existing in Kishnaghur were it not for the protection of that armed force of which my learned friend has attempted to make so much. I need not remind the Court, that two years has not elapsed since a faqueer over-run the whole district almost under the very nose of the Governor-General in Council. On the keeping of these armed men the whole supposition of my learned friend is founded. But what becomes of his supposition when the state of the district comes before the Court? and what said Mr. Reid, who had himself been a magistrate of that part of the country? "That if the protection of armed men was not necessary, he did not suppose that the planters would keep them." The planter protected himself; he did that which the law could not do for him, and yet are we told that very circumstance is sufficient to warrant his imprisonment. Now I think it must have been a kind of Mr. Halket who first originated that doctrine, for it shewed as little knowledge of the state of the district in which he resided as it did of the seat of government, for there were many opulent natives here who kept armed men not for their protection it is true, but to gratify their ideas of dignity. What dose my learned friend say to Rooplaul Mullick, who keeps sepoys at his door not only with muskets on their shoulders, but with brass on their caps also? Now, my lords, what are the terms my friend used towards Mr. Calder this day? for if my learned friend has uttered any thing this day worthy of attending to, it is this. In the first place, he says, my client is in the employ of Mr. Andrew, and that as the magistrate had arrested the other party he would have been accused of partial justice had he not arrested him also. Now this being Mr. Halket's duty, it must not be forgotten that according to my friend's doctrine, Mr. Calder must go to Mr. Halket for that purpose, crying as he went by the scene of outrage, like the character in the Tale of the Tub, "Worthy inhabitants of Kishnagur give me a slap in the face." "Charming Sir, bestow one month's imprisonment." But impartial justice is the object. Very well. Mr. Andrew who gave the order for the peons to be dispatched, and who employed them, is suffered to be at large, while Mr. Calder who had neither ordered, dispatched, nor paid the peons, is arrested. So much for my friend's impartial justice; but, perhaps, there might be something in the strength of Mr. Andrew's purse compared with the strength of that of Mr. Calder, and I am ready to confess, that if my client's constitution was not stronger than his purse, his health would have suffered more during his imprisonment than it appears to have done. Oh, but these civil or military servants, as my friend calls them, are under the controul of Mr. Calder, and, therefore, is he answerable for their behaviour. But it seems this new doctrine was of partial application only, for though Mr. Calder was responsible for the acts of the burkundazes. Mr. Halket was not responsible for the conduct of the darogah; nay, more, Mr. Halket claims immunity not only for himself but for all under him. This brings me to another part of the subject,—the report of the darogah,—and the depositions said to have been taken by that person. It is rather singular I think, that all but one of the latter, though precise as to the day of the week, were not so as to the day of the month. The English day Monday was there, but no mention of the day of the month or how many days the affray occured prior to the making of the deposition. Now, says my friend, on this report of the darogah, Mr. Halket was justified in arresting Mr. Calder, and were it necessary, he added, he could by English law easily justify that proceeding. I deny that my friend could have justified his client by English law, or any other law that I know or ever wish to be acquainted with. But, says my friend, he was acting under regulation IX. of 1807, sec. 4. Is my friend so ignorant as not to know that this does not, and cannot apply to British subjects without being registered in this Court; and that my client carried with him into the mofussil, the protection of that law which here is the subject for my learned friend to sneer at, but to which at home he would be bound to pay a great deal more respect? The darogah made a report your lordships are told, and admitting that he might have done so, the whole case rests on the question, whether the magistrate had then the power to issue his warrant to arrest a British subject. That he had by the 53d Geo. III. my learned friend has not ventured to assert, and that he had not by the 21st Geo. III. the act which my learned friend has denominated the living will of the legislature, I shall have no difficulty to prove when not, as now, precluded from going into the law of this case. My friend has thought it worth his while to extend his enquiries to the defence in the mofussil Court, and drawn from thence the conclusion, that because it was conducted by a vakeel employed occasionally by Mr. Andrew, that gentleman and my client must necessarily have an interest in the trial. Now, if so, may I not, too, infer that the defence in this Court, conducted by the Advocate-General, and the brother of a Member in Council, is undertaken by Government? He asks who defended there? I say who defends here? and I think I have a much better reason for the observation, than my friend had to entertain the Court for a quarter of an hour in order to prove who was the vakeel by whom the defence in the mofussil was conducted. Then comes a description of the wounds, and their surgical treatment with turmeric and cow-dung, concluded with a sort of lament that the surgeon was not in attendance in this Court to give something like respectability to the case. However, in lieu of this he has a witness in the box, whose description of the wounds is none the the worse for wear, and he says they were filled up by some surgical application. Then my friend bursts forth, and says they were inflicted by the servants of Mr. Calder, armed men, kept by him to rob and plunder, and be let loose on the peaceful, timid, unoffending inhabitants of Kishnaghur. Peaceful and timid, indeed, but let their object be gain, and it is necessary for the planters to have armed men, foreigners as my friend calls them, to protect their property. But it is said to be impossible that this peaceful and timid race of men can be admitted to high offices if such men as Mr. Calder remain amongst them, and is permitted to employ these "foreigners" who I suppose my friend means are men from the western provinces. I remember in my youth, some part of my time was spent in the neighbourhood of a farm, and it was the custom for the country people to call all persons by that name who resided more than twenty miles from them. I do not know whether my friend received similar early impressions; I should have thought he had, did he not describe them as being kept for the purpose of being let loose on this peaceful, timid race of men. It is by this suspicious circumstance he justifies the magistrate,—whether he justifies the Justice of the Peace by this, or 21st Geo. III, or Regulation of 1793, or any other Regulation I really do not know,—but this I say, a more impudent suspicion was never perverted,—a more inaccurate one never formed. It solely depends on the report of the darogah, who says a number of persons, belonging to Mr. Calder's factory, who say they were going in another direction, and were set on by the villagers. So much for these "foreigners" being let loose on this peaceful, timid race of men; and so far has Mr. Halket grounds for his suspicions, for if he had depositions which made the burkundazes the aggressors, it must be remembered, that he had also depositions that contradicted those; nor is there any attempt to state the men were sent by Mr. Calder for any other purpose than that what is here stated, although it is said another purpose was proved against them. I ask again, is the liberty of a British subject to be interfered with on no other ground than this suspicion? Is he to be arrested, detained, and dragged from one end of the district to the other on such grounds of suspicion on the mind of a magistrate whose reasoning would disgrace a child from school? The tumult took place, hence the suspicion,—Mr. Calder must have known of it!

Here is the suspicion upon which we could not, "had we acted otherwise, have justified ourselves to the people, the government, or to our own feelings!" My lords, I cannot place this case in another light, and the question is, whether on such absurd grounds as these the rights of a British subject are to be interfered with. I need not trouble your lordships with any observation on the pleas, satisfied as I am that if my friend relied on them he would not have compelled me to prove the jurisdiction; but I may be allowed to remark on that part of my friend's opening, in which he endeavoured to prove that Biswas, in the proceedings of the mofussil Courts, had been sentenced to six years imprisonment. If it be so,—and I do not speak under the same prejudices as my learned friend which makes him forget all his ancient opinions, all his old fashioned notions,—I cannot but declare that in my opinion the attack was commenced by the villagers, and that the servants of the plaintiff were bound to make a vigorous resistance. Yet is this man sentenced to six years imprisonment! Is this the regard shewn in the mofussil for liberty? and is it to be put forward as a ground of suspicion against a man who was not of the party? The suspicion would disgrace the man who entertained it. I do not, my lords, suppose that Mr. Halket would commit an act of injustice from inclination, but I do believe him to be one of those young men who come out to this country under the impression that much good may be effected by severity, by acting what is generally termed the bahadhur, and that in consequence he has clearly committed an act of injustice on a person on whom there does not rest the slightest suspicion. I will now turn to the evidence of Mr. Jeffreys. My friend does not believe it, but he commented upon it in two places. He said, your lordships saw the hesitation with which Jeffreys gave his evidence. Your lordships did see it. It is not every man that is put in that box has the coolness and is as collected as my learned friend,—a coolness which many men pass a long professional life and fail in attaining, though I admit he possesses as much esprit de corps, esprit de counsel, or esprit de Advocate-General as most men. My learned friend will also recollect that men who have worn the barrister's gown for some years have cut but an indifferent figure in the witness box. But, says my friend, the order was sent direct to Mr. Calder, and yet Mr. Jeffreys had the impertinence to open it. A strange affair truly, if when a man brings a letter from the employer to one assistant another may not open it, when informed that it requires immediate attention; and what, says my friend, was there in this note to require the despatches of armed men to the cutcherry?—a whimsical reason,—a naib had absconded. But I see nothing whimsical in seizing the papers of a servant who has absconded when called on to bring in his accounts. Now, says my friend, admitting this, Mr. Calder's time is not accounted for from day light in the morning till nine o'clock, and he has commented on the absence of the peon who usually accompanied him. However, your lordships will see that Mr. Wooldridge's factory is in a contrary directions to Dutpoolia, nor do we think it necessary to bring forward the peon who accompanied him, since it is not pretended that he was present at that village. As for the idle story of the stocks, which has fallen completely to the ground, and the comments of my learned friend on the advice given of Mr. Wooldridge—a little wooing as he calls it, the substance of which is, that he did not go, I shall pass them over with but one comment—they are brought forward to lead your lordships from the consideration of the proper subjects, the first of which is, had Mr. Halket a right to interfere with my client, and the second, has he in interfering proceeded in the course pointed out by the act of parliament? There was one statement with regard to Mr. Jeffreys which might require comment. First, says my friend, it is most extraordinary that he never told any person regarding the orders he had given, and secondly that he did not write and explain the subject to Mr. Halket. No—had he done the latter, I think it is not impossible that "the presence" would have returned it because not written in Persian, and on the proper stamp. But where was "the presence" to be found, for we hear that he was marching up and down the country! But, forsooth, it is for the satisfaction of Mr. Halket's character. Had he been anxious to have shown that he had acted right, he would have come into this court and said, "I am a British subject and a Justice of the Peace; I acted on the supposition that I had authority, and if I have not, I regret that I have been misled." I think it will be admitted that a judge may take a wrong view on a point of law, and the least that could be said was that a young man may commit an error, and not leave his conduct open to the imputation that he had acted from some secret and improper motive. It is, however, to be considered, that the injury has been done to a British subject, over whom the mofussil Court has no jurisdiction, and it does follow that your lordships should give such damages as will make young men of this kind consider before they act. The affray took place on the 28th July, Mr. Calder is taken into custody on the 3d August, "the presence" does not arrive until the 8th of that month, and where was the pressure that prevented him proceeding into Mr. Calder's case? "The presence" remains for eight days longer, doing what, God knows, for I cannot imagine, without supposing that he was enjoying the pleasures of the mofussil. Mr. Calder is taken back, thence he is taken to Kishnaghur, and detained at the Collector's ghât four days, with the alternative of being confined to his boat or going about with a guard of honor, while it was the magistrate's bounden duty, if he had the power to arrest him, to see that he did not remain a single hour in custody before his case was investigated. My friend says he might have gone out had he thought proper to do so, but as he chose to remain at the ghât it is no hardship. My friend, doubtless, would consider it no injury, but who else would like to go out accompanied by the officers of justice? Is this no aggravation? It is plain, that during this time the magistrate was neglecting his duty, for he has not shewn what he was doing during this detention. But if your lordships only look at the original arrest, and not to the subsequent detention, I say it is a heavy grievance; and I am sure my client will not be told in the words of my learned friend, "oh, but he was allowed the liberty of the vats, the whole circuit, the ambit of the factory, and that it was your own fault, in fact a trap for the magistrate." It is for your lordships to shew that the rights of a British subject may not be invaded with impunity, and in calling on your lordships to protect them, I hope I have expressed the sentiments I shall entertain to the last moment of my life, surprised as I am to hear the altered sentiments of my learned friend.

Chief Justice.—Early in the cause we stated that it was our intention not to express any opinion at present on the points of law raised by defendant's counsel. The verdict we are about to give must only be considered nominal, and to raise the points to be heard hereafter, and not as expressing our opinion of the legality or illegality of the magistrate's proceedings, or whether this Court has jurisdiction. Mr. Advocate-General has argued first, it is quite clear, if defendant acted as a magistrate he is entitled to a verdict, and secondly, that if defendant acted out of his jurisdiction, we are precluded from interfering by the 21st Geo. III. We must, however, come to a decision on one point, the amount of damages, supposing plaintiff's case to be established, so that, should our decision hereafter be in his favor, he may not be put to the expense of coming again into Court. Now on this point we are quite satisfied, notwithstanding the ingenious observations of the plaintiff's counsel, that no improper motives of any kind are to be imputed to defendant, and that if he has acted wrong it has been a mere mistake of judgment, and without any motive or wish to deal harshly or improperly. It may be our opinion that defendant has acted illegally, and in that case the plaintiff is entitled to compensation, but in considering the amount of damages, one fact has great influence, and that is the conduct of the plaintiff himself. It is quite clear that on his return he was informed by Jeffreys what had been done during his absence, and that he might have taken Jeffreys with him to Dutpoolia to give an explanation to the magistrate; nor are we satisfied with the plaintiff, who on his arrival at Dutpoolia refused to go to the other side of the river where it is said the magistrate was. Now what should an Englishman do under those circumstances? If he thought the magistrate had mistaken the facts, he should have taken the first opportunity to explain and set him right. This has great weight with us in considering the damages, because we cannot but think, that if an explanation had been given at that time the plaintiff would have been released.—Ibid.

THURSDAY, JULY 30.

BIGAMY.

Thomas Edward Colville Sherburne was placed at the bar, charged with having, on the 20th February 1807, at Calcutta, married one Marian Carepiet, and afterwards on the 23d August, 1834, at Chinsurah, having married one Harriet Eliza Smith, his former wife being then alive. The prisoner pleaded not guilty.

Arathoon Petroose deposed that he attended the marriage ceremony performed by the Rev. Mr. Joseph, in 1807, at the Armenian Church. The witness saw Marian Carepiet in Calcutta, about four months ago. (Cross-examined.) Does not recollect how old Marian Carepiet was when she was married. The ceremony was performed according to the rites of the Armenian Church, but I only know the form from what I saw.

Nicholas Aviet, sexton and vestry clerk of the Armenian Church, deposed, that he had been ten or twelve years in that situation. Knew the prisoner and his wife. She was in the habit of attending the Armenian Church. (Cross-examined,) There has been a restriction in the church for the last ten or twelve years, requiring that young girls under the age of twenty-one, should have the consent of their parents.

Several other witnesses were examined and proved the marriage.

Eliza Smith deposed that she knew the prisoner, and that two letters put in evidence were in his hand writing. One was dated 20th July, 1834, and contained a proposal for marriage with the witness's daughter: it set forth that he was told he would get some fine French ladies at Chandernagore, but being aged 48, he did not like a young lady, because it was possible, that she would not like him. Witness and her husband were present at Chinsurah, when prisoner was married to her daughter, on 23d August, by the Rev. W. Morton. (Cross-examined). Never saw the prisoner till he addressed me the letter. My husband is in town; but he is not in the Courthouse,—he was at Saugor at the time when I lodged the complaint. I knew Mr. Westcott when I first knew the prisoner, but then I had no communication with him. I received Rs. 200 from Sherburne on one occasion, in instalments of 100 Rs at a time; I never received a larger sum. My daughter is seventeen. I knew the prisoner three weeks before my daughter was married to him, and all I knew regarding his occupation or means was the account he gave of himself. After the marriage, prisoner spent one or two days with my daughter at Mrs. Stone's. My sole wish to have my daughter married was, that my means were scanty and prisoner said he was in the receipt of Rs. 80 per month. I have heard of a Mr. Bushy, but never knew of an attachment between him and my daughter.

Eliza Harriet Smith deposed, she was married to the prisoner, last year, at Chinsurah, by the Rev. W. Morton. (Cross-examined.) I did not marry the prisoner through persuasion of my father and mother. I thought he was old and would make me comfortable. My father first informed me of the proposal. I don't know Mr. Bushy.

Rev. W. Morton deposed that he performed the marriage ceremony at Chinsurah according the rites of the Church of England.

This was the case for the prosecution.

Mr. Clarke submitted there was no evidence of a legal marriage in the first instance. With respect to the first marriage, it is sufficient to prove a marriage in fact to have been celebrated at home or abroad according to the law of the country. But here, in this case, it was not proved that the prisoner was an Armenian, and the marriage was a mere ceremony performed by a person who had no right to perform it.

The Chief Justice reversed the point.

Mr. J. Moore was called for the defence, and deposed that the prisoner was a man of intemperate habits, and of weak intellect. On his examination by the Court, witness deposed that in his opinion the prisoner was capable of distinguishing right from wrong.

The Chief Justice summed up, and the Jury returned a verdict of Guilty. His Lordship desired that the prisoner should stand down for the present.—Ibid.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

SATURDAY, JULY 4.

IN THE MATTER OF H. N. CAMPBELL.

Our readers will remember a report inserted in our Journal of May last, of an application by the assignee of this estate, that a portion of the insolvent's salary, he being an uncovenanted servant of Government, be set aside for the benefit of his creditors. This application was founded on the decision by Mr. Justice Grant, in the case of Mr. Rebello, pronounced during the absence of the Chief Justice from India, and contrary to previous decisions of the learned judge and Mr. Justice Franks. The application was opposed by Mr. Clarke on behalf of the insolvent and several other uncovenanted assistants whose cases would abide the decision of the Chief Justice. The learned counsel argued that the case of the insolvent did not come within the meaning of the 27th section of the Insolvent Act; and cited several decisions of the Court, amongst which was that of Mr. Sinaes which originally came before the present Chief Justice, but was decided by Mr. Justice Franks, and it was understood, when that learned judge pronounced his decision, that an unconvenanted servant did not come within the meaning of the clause, and that he had consulted Mr. Justice Grey. From the time of Mr. Sinaes's case down to that of Mr. Rebello, several similar cases had come before the Court, some of which had been decided by the present Chief Justice, and the Court had invariably refused the application to assign any portion of an uncovenanted servant's salary for the benefit of his creditors.

The Chief Justice, having taken time to consider, now pronounced his decision, concurring entirely with Mr. Justice Grant. The learned judge, having read the ninth section of the Act, which provides what shall pass by the assignment, and the twenty-seventh, which authorizes the Court to order a portion of the receipts of the Company's servants, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, to be paid by the insolvent to his assignee, was quite clear that by the former section, whatever an insolvent may acquire vests in his assignee until he obtains his final discharge, but that the latter was a clause restraining the power of the assignee, and which enables those persons who come within its meaning, to retain for public purposes such a portion of what they may acquire as the court may think just and right. This being his general view of the clauses of the Act of Parliament, the question is, whether this insolvent falls within the exceptions contained in clause twenty-seven? It is rather curious, said the learned judge, that the petitioner comes into Court to protect himself from the operation of the twenty-seventh clause, that is, he seeks to be exempted from the clause which restrains the assignee from taking all that he may acquire until he obtains a final discharge, and wishes to be placed under the general power of the Act, by which, whatever he may acquire until he is finally discharged is vested in his assignee. But the question is, whether this petitioner is entitled to the protection of clause twenty-seven. At first I was inclined to doubt, but on further consideration I think that he is, and that all he may acquire is not vested in his assignee. The words of the clause are:—

assignment as is herein-before mentioned shall hold any public office, appointment, or benefice, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or under the said United Company, and if his interest in such office or appointment shall be such that he might lawfully sell the same, such interest for the purpose of sale shall, by the assignment, be transferred to, and vested in, the assignee or assignees in trust for the benefit of his creditors; and if his interest therein shall not be such as he might lawfully sell, then it shall be lawful for the said Court to order the said insolvent to pay such proportion of his receipts therefrom to his assignee or assignees as the Court shall think just and right."

I am of opinion, said Sir Edward Ryan, that this insolvent holds an appointment under the United Company. It is true that in his affidavit it is stated he is an assistant to Mr. Fraser in the sea custom house, who can dismiss him when he may think proper, but it is quite clear that his salary is paid by Government, and that he holds an appointment under the Company. His lordship then stated that on a former occasion he entertained a different opinion, but that he now entirely concurred in the decision of Mr. Justice Grant, and that the same views were entertained at Bombay and Madras.

Mr. Clarke admitted the accuracy of the statement as to the amount of the salaries of the several insolvents whose cause would abide by this decision, put in by the assignee, but suggested a reference to Government as to what amount might be set aside for the creditors without rendering the insolvents inefficient for their public duties.

Sir Edward Ryan had no objection to that course, and the decision as to the amount will remain pending the reference.

IN THE MATTER OF ANDREW LIDDEL.

This insolvent was declared entitled to the benefit of the act, and discharged.

IN THE MATTER OF GEORGE TETLEY.

Mr. Advocate-General, on behalf of Messrs. Cockerell and Co. opposed the discharge of this insolvent. The insolvent is an indigo planter, and in 1833 purchased the Chultea concern, which he subsequently mortgaged to Messrs. Cockerell and Co. receiving at various times from them sums to the amount of Rs. 23,000, having in various letters informed them that he had considerably improved the concern and rendered it more valuable by the building of another factory. Messrs. Cockerell and Co. on the faith of this information, inferring from the insolvent's letters that the new factory was erected on the concern mortgaged to them, advanced money from time to time, to enable him to carry on the manufacture. At the time of his insolvency it appeared that the new factory was not only not erected on the property mortgaged, but that the greater part of the advances had also been laid out in its improvement. The insolvent was remanded until the next Court day, to afford him an opportunity of shewing that he had not intentionally deceived Messrs. Cockerell and Co.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CULLEN AND ROBERT BROWNE.

Mr. Prinsep presented the following petition on behalf of the creditors whose names are thereunto affixed :—

"That by an order of this Honorable Court, made in this matter, and bearing date the sixth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, of which an office copy is hereunto annexed, marked A. it was ordered that Donald Macintyre, Esq., special assignee of the estate and effects of the said insolvents, should be at liberty to defer the sale of messuages, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises, several factories and shares of factories and concerns mentioned in the schedules of the said insolvents, as also of the several ships or vessels belonging to the said insolvents until one year, from the first day of January, then next, in case no price should in the mean time be offered for any of them, which in the opinion of the said assignee would be advantageous to the creditors to accept, and that until such messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and indigo factories and shares, and shares of factories, and concerns and ships and vessels might be respectively sold, the said assignee should be at liberty to advance out of funds in his hands as such assignee as aforesaid, such sums of money as should be adequate, and sufficient further for the purpose of carrying on the said indigo factories and shares of factories, and keeping the said messuages, lands, and hereditaments in tenantable repairs, and for employing the said ships or vessels in addition to the several sums of money which the said assignee had already advanced and laid out for the several purposes aforesaid. It was also ordered that the said assignee was authorized and empowered to raise such sums of money by way of mortgage of the said several properties, or any part thereof, or otherwise as might be required for carrying on the said factories and shares therein, and employing the said ships or vessels, and for keeping the said messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments in a tenantable order and condition until the whole could be sold without unnecessary sacrifice as opportunities occur.

"That under and by virtue of the said order, the said Donald Macintyre, assignee as aforesaid, has carried on the said indigo factories respectively for, and during the last indigoseason, which ended on the first day of October now last past, and expended large sums of the assets of the said insolvents' estate in the carrying on thereof, and that large quantities of indigo, that is to say, seven thousand two hundred and thirty-two maunds and upwards, the produce of the said factories for the season aforesaid, was consigned to, and arrived at, Calcutta, and was received by the said Donald Macintyre, assignee as aforesaid.

"That the best season for the sale of indigo at Calcutta is during the months of December, January and February, and that it was the duty of the said Donald Macintyre, as such assignee as aforesaid, to have sold and disposed of the whole of the said indigo during the months of December, January and February, and that the same could then have been readily sold.

"That the price of indigo in the market of Calcutta has since fallen from sicca rupees ten to sicca rupees twenty and upwards, in consequence of unfavorable intelligence respecting the price of indigo in England and elsewhere, in Europe and America, and in consequence of an anticipated large crop.

"That indigo can at all times be readily sold at Calcutta, and that a fair market price might have been, and may still be obtained for the same, if gradually disposed of between the present time and the period when the new crop will come to market, but that the said Donald Macintyre, assignee as aforesaid, has not sold the residue of the said indigo, but is about to ship the same to London for sale, consigned to the mercantile houses or firms of Palmer, Mackillop and Company, and Forbes, Forbes and Company.

"That on the thirtieth day of June, (instant) your petitioners and others addressed to the said Donald Macintyre, assignee as aforesaid, a joint letter, remonstrating against such shipment and consignment, to which letter a reply has since been received, of which letter and reply, copies are hereunto annexed, marked B. and C.

"That the twenty-third day of June last, your petitioners and others, through their Solicitor, Mr. George Henderson, addressed to the said Donald Macintyre, assignee as aforesaid, a further letter in respect to the quantity of indigo produced at the factories of the said estate during last indigo season, and touching the general management of the estate of the said insolvents, to which letter a reply has since been received, and of which letter and reply copies are hereunto annexed, marked D. and E.

"That the said indigo forms a considerable part of the asset of the said insolvents, and that by such intended shipment and consignment thereof the realization of the assets of the said insolvents and the settlement of the accounts of the said insolvents' estate, and the consequent dividends upon their debts will not only be greatly and indifinitely delayed, but a great part of the said assets will be placed wholly beyond the control of the said assignee, and beyond jurisdiction of this Honorable Court.

"That such intended shipment and consignment is moreover a speculative employment of part of the said assets, and that the same will thereby be exposed to all the chances and vicissitudes of commerce, and to the hazards of a distant market, and the chances of insolvency of the consignees.

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the said Donald Macintyre, assignee as aforesaid, be restrained by order of this Honorable Court, from making such intended shipment and consignment of the said indigo, or any part thereof, either to London or elsewhere, beyond the jurisdiction of this Honorable Court, and that he be ordered forthwith, or so soon as convenient may be, to proceed to sale and realization of the same, and duly to lay out and invest the proceeds thereof for the benefit of the estate, and that should the said indigoes or any part thereof have been shipped, that the said Donald Macintyre be required to re-land the same, or that the said Donald Macintyre be directed to make good to the estate any loss that may arise from such shipments.

And your petitioners shall ever pray, &c.

The learned counsel urged, that this mode of dealing with the assets of an insolvent or bankrupt estate, was contrary to all principle and practice. The mode of sale was by the 49th section of the Indian Insolvent Act, entirely under the controul of the Court; and it was competent to any creditor to present his petition. The discretion of sale was usually left to the assignee; but it was an abuse of discretion to send the assets for sale beyond the jurisdiction, while a sale could be effected under the eye of the Court, and without risk to the estate, on very reasonable terms. It had long ago been decided in England, that if the assignee himself left the jurisdiction it was a ground for removing him from the trust, and there was a case in 1 Ves. to that effect. The removal of the assets, however, was a still stronger measure, and nothing but absolute necessity could justify it. What security was there that the consignees might not fail with the proceeds in hand? or what control could this Court exercise over the funds while in England? If realized here the Court could see to the immediate investment for security, which was required here of the assignee, in analogy to the order of Lord Lougborough, and the subsequent direction of the 49th Geo. 3, which had been adopted in the late consolidated bankrupt act 6, Geo. 4. No Court of Bankruptcy or insolvency in England could direct their investment, or exercise any controul over them: the agent there would be the personal agent of the assignee, accountable only like any private agent. The assignee might be perhaps held responsible, but what was his responsibility to answer 8 or 10 lacks of rupees? This disposition of assets was in direct opposition to the very principle of bankrupt and insolvent laws, which was a speedy realization and distribution; for it must necessarily delay the winding up of the estate for 18 months at least. It did, indeed, appear, that the assignee was to obtain the whole estimated value on advance $\frac{2}{3}$ for Government and $\frac{1}{3}$ for the consignees, who would thus purchase by an advance of $\frac{1}{3}$ a commission on the whole. This might be a pretty speculation for him; for they had the double security of the indigo, and of the estate at large; but it was a gain to him at the risk of the creditors, inasmuch as, in case of the proceeds not realizing the advance, the estate would be liable to all the loss of re-drawing, and all the charges and delays, and that on a mere speculation of obtaining a better price. But the assignee was not warranted on a speculation: he was bound by the 49th section of the act to sell immediately unless this Court sanctioned delay. The order of the Court had sanctioned delay in the sale, not of the produce, but of the factories and works. Produce was perishable; and it was the duty of the assignee to have realized it during the past season. A heavy loss had already been suffered, from which possibly he might be made personally answerable: longer delay were inexcusable, and unless he could shew to the Court a case of absolute necessity, it would never authorize the further delay of a remittance for sale to so distant a market. No such necessity could be made out, for indigo was sworn to be always marketable here; indeed, this was the indigo market for all the world. The rule in bankruptcy was, that any single creditor might insist on present sale, as was done in the case of Sir George Colebrooke's bankruptcy, though the great majority of the creditors there assented to the delay, and 15s. 1d. in the pound had been already realized with an expectation of realizing 20s. It was suggested by Mr. Turton, that such a consignment had been expressly sanctioned in the estate of Palmer and Co. but that order was not opposed by any creditor; and besides that order had been made on a suggestion, that dividends had to be made in England, which was an untenable ground, for the Court would never suffer the assets to be distributed any where else, but under its own controul, and at the place of administration of the estate. Creditors were bound to come and take their dividends here,—the assignee was not authorized to remit to them. The order made in that case was altogether anomalous, and ought not to be followed. He relied, however, mainly on the general rule, not to allow the assets to be sent out of the jurisdiction, which he could not find to have been permitted in any other case. The mere fact of such an intention was sufficient ground for the Court to call upon the assignee to justify such an exercise of his discretion.

Chief Justice.—This is an application for an order nisi to restrain the assignee from shipping a quantity of indigo to England; and one of the objections is, that he has no power to remove the assets beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. With reference to the power vested in an assignee; they are totally different and much more extensive here than in England or in any other country: and I think it very fortunate that the drawer up of the Indian Insolvent Act has inserted a clause which prevents a single creditor coming into Court to compel a sale. By the fiftieth section of the Act, the court may defer the sale of property if it shall think proper; and under that clause Mr. Justice Grant made an order authorizing the assignee to carry on certain factories belonging to this estate. Of course this order gives the assignee a great discretion, authorising him to invest large sums in the manufacture; to sell the produce, and to bring the amount to the general account. Now this is an application of a very few creditors, though their claims are to a large amount, for the Court to interefere with the discretion vested in the assignee, and to order him to conduct the sale in a particular manner, and in a particular place. If strong grounds were laid before me, I would interfere, but they must be very strong grounds indeed. If it were shown that the assignee was about to exercise his discretion to the injury of the estate, I would restrain him from proceeding; but from anything that appears in this petition, the course he is pursuing may be the one best adapted for the benefit of the creditors. Had the gentlemen who have signed this petition sworn, or took upon themselves to state, that the course adopted by the assignee was an unprofitable one for the estate, or that the sale of the indigo would produce a less amount in England than it would in this market, either of those grounds would have induced me to grant an order nisi; but these statements do not appear, and the Court is asked to interfere with nothing before it except the vague suppositions of the petitioners. It is said that the proper season for the sale of indigo is December, January, and February; if so, why did not the petitioners make this application in February, and not delay it till July? I cannot undertake to say that the assignee is adopting the course best adapted for the interests of the creditors; but this I do say, that it would be a mischievous course for the Court to interfere with his discretion, on no other ground than a vague statement. Let them show any misconduct in the assignee and the Court will remove him: or let it be shown that he is adopting a course injurious to the creditors, and the Court will call upon him to answer the statement. But it is not shown how the interests of the creditors may be injured; on the contrary, it appears that the assignee has received the money for the indigo. If it can be shewn that the estate has suffered by the sale in England, it might, though it would be a hard case certainly, be a ground to call upon him to make good the loss; but while he has the funds in his hands at this moment, it is not possible for the Court to interfere with his discretion. I do not know whether the petitioners are mercantile men in Calcutta, but if they are, I cannot suppose they are acting from any motive but a desire to benefit the estate. However they have not stated or shown that a loss will be the consequence of the course adopted by the assignee; I take it therefore that they are not able to do so, and I must refuse the order nisi.—Englishman.

We copy from the Englishman, the petition to, and judgment of, the Commissioner upon the question of the shipment of indigo, upon the appeal of certain creditors of the firm against that measure. Our contemporary's report embraces the Petition and some correspondence between the creditors and Mr. Macintyre, relative to the subject, and also to some other matters which do not appear to have been brought before the Court. Mr. Macintyre appears to have answered all the questions put to him, although considering that sending the indigo home would be more advantageous for the estate than forcing it on this market, he chose to act on his own judgment, which no doubt he had a perfect right to do. The Court appears to have refused the rule nisi on the ground that no proof was adduced that the estate would suffer by the proposed course—that the petitioners had not even ventured to state that it was an unprofitable course. Unquestionably if the petitioners felt sure of their ground they should have expressed a very decisive opinion that the measure would be attended with loss.

With respect to the shipping, Mr. Macintyre has stated that all the ships are sold except the Carnatic, for which only 35,000 rupees had been offered, while competent judges value her at 50,000 rupees; now if ever there were a case to which the Hudibrastic principle of valuation applied it is that of shipping.

> And hence the value of a thing,
> Is just exactly what t'will bring.

The shipping of an estate is precisely that species of property which an assignee should get rid of forthwith, for it is constantly deteriorating; and how many vessels of 5 or 600 tons of this port, we should like to know, even under the most careful management, do more than pay their expenses? Those only who have capital or great interest in the mercantile community can possibly make ships profitable; and many would not even accept the ship as a gift on the condition of bearing the risk of sailing her.

With respect to landed property, Mr. Macintyre states that he has refused 64,000 rupees for the house which the Union Bank occupies. If so then we think he has refused an offer he is not likely to get again. An assignee should be left free to exercise his judgment certainly, but it would be a wise policy surely in him not to hold out for the valuations of mere professional men, whose judgments are often guided rather by what they think a property ought to fetch, than what is its value with reference to the state of the market.

In the important case of the question of the power of the Court to make deductions from the salaries of the uncovenanted servants, Sir Edward Ryan has decided that the deduction ought to be made. Sir Edward Ryan has changed his mind on this point, as several of his former decisions were opposed to that which the learned judge has now pronounced. We confess that the judgment appears to us to be contrary to the intent and meaning of the 27th clause. The decision in fact overlooks the distinction between appointments secured for life and those held de bene placito. We need scarcely be at the trouble of illustrating the magnitude of the distinction, or of shewing how unequal is that rule which takes from a man who holds a situation for life, half his income—and the same proportion from him who holds it at the caprice of another, or is liable to any of those changes in the system which may throw him out of bread in a moment.—Bengal Hurkaru.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

CALCUTTA.

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.—A Resolution of the Council of India was published on the 8th instant, to establish rules for the formality of its proceedings, and laying down the principle that the draft of every law shall be printed and published for general information six weeks before it is re-considered to be finally passed by the Legislative Council.

BENGAL CLUB.—There was a very full attendance of the members of the Bengal Club, at the Club House, on the 27th June. The members were chiefly occupied with an entire revision of the rules of the Club; in which several important changes were effected. Some of the members made an attempt to cause the repeal of the clause restricting the admission of young Civil Servants to the time of their leaving College, and that requiring the specification of the quality of the members of the Club. They were, however, strongly opposed and defeated by a very large majority. The Report of the Committee and the annual statement of the Club accounts, were directed to be printed and circulated to the members, and the nomination by the Committee, of Mr. Strickland to be Secretary, was confirmed by the meeting. A detailed account of the proceedings of the meeting, is given in the Englishman, but it is stated to be extremely inaccurate, and therefore we have refrained from making an abstract of it.

RE-UNIONS.—The stewards have adopted a liberal modification of the original terms of subscription by admitting non-residents in Calcutta to become subscribers to half the series, and to purchase tickets for a single night.

INDIGO AFFAIRS.—The indigo sale on the 26th June, by order of the Assignees of Colvin and Fergusson's estates, was attended by a very few bidders, and they entirely for the English Market. About 640 chests were brought forward, but only 100 chests sold at the upset prices; the remainder was withdrawn. Immediately after the sale, however, 100 chests more were sold at a trifling advance.

Accounts received from different parts of the country state, that the rapid rise of the rivers has swept away nearly one half of the indigo, and has forced the planters to cut the young plant in order to save it from the deluge. It is now thought that the crop will not exceed 1,20,000 maunds.

Very favorable accounts of indigo crops have been received from Tirhoot. The plant appeared beautiful and promised good produce, and was so abundant that it was necessary to commence manufacturing it in an immature state, in order to work it off in time. Accounts from the factories on the Ganges, however, are as desponding as before. The river still rising and destroying the plant.

Accounts from all parts of the country complain of the destruction of the plant by the heavy rain and rising of the rivers, and it is expected that there will be a considerable reduction in the anticipated quantity of indigo, as well as a falling off in the quality, as planters are obliged to cut and manufacture the immature plant to save it from being destroyed by the water.

The memorial of the Indigo Planters and others concerned in Indigo affairs to Government, and another from the Trade Association praying against the abolition of the Regulation of 1830, have been published in the daily papers, and it is hoped that they will induce the legislature to arrest the measure now in contemplation, and which, if carried, will produce the most disastrous consequences to the cultivation of, and commerce in, indigo.

DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.—Pursuant to the advertisement of the Central Committee of the District Charitable Society, a very full meeting was held on the 29th June, at which there was some warm discussion at first, but the tact of the Lord Bishop soon re-established a good understanding between all parties. The position of the Leper Hospital was adverted to, and it was unanimously determined to rescue it from the ruin which threatened it in consequence of the Directors of the Native Hospital resolving not to appropriate any part of their funds to its support. Baboos Dwarkanauth Tagore and Russomoy Dutt, were added to the Leper Hospital Committee, with a view to incline natives to suscribe for the support of the institution so very important to them, and it is hoped they will not withhold their contributions.

LAUDABLE SOCIETY.—The first half yearly general meeting of the new Laudable Society took place on the 27th ultimo, and about four or five persons attended. The Secretary's statements exhibited the affairs of the Society to be in a flourishing state. The first half year had lapses only to the extent of 17 shares, leaving 873 shares insured upon 351 lives, and making the apparent value of a lapsed share rupees 13,15,99 on the 30th June. The incorporated Societies showed a list of 1,294 shares on 490 lives, and 23½ lapsed shares up to the date of meeting, with a fund of rupees 437,000.

THE HINDOO COLLEGE.—Some new arrangements have been effected in the Hindoo College, Captain D. L. Richardson, Editor of the Literary Gazette, has been appointed principal professor of literature, on a salary of 500 rupees per mensum; Mr. Middleton is appointed head teacher on a monthly salary of 350 rupees; Mr. Curnin retains his former situation as Mathematician, and Mr. Ross has been discharged. In addition to the regular visitors of the College, several more have been appointed as members of the Education Committee. Sir E. Ryan, Col. Young, Dr. Grant, Captain Birch and Messrs. Shakespear and Trevelyan, will take the duties of visitor in turn.

BANK OF BENGAL.—The Bank of Bengal, on the 2d July, declared a dividend of 14 per cent. per annum for the last half year, being seven hundred rupees per share.

UNION BANK.—A dividend of 10 per cent. per annum, being 125 rupees per share, was voted at a Meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank on the 15th July. The Secretary's report shewed the nett gain of the Bank to amount to 94,784-2-3 a fraction less than 6½ per cent. on the ½ years business.

THE CIVIL FUND.—The following gentlemen have addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Civil Fund, expressive of their disapprobation of the re-admisson of Mr. Sutherland to the Civil Fund on his paying up the difference between his former subscriptions and 5,000 rupees:—J. R. Hutchinson, G. F. Franco, P. French, J. G. Grant, C. B. Bacon, T. P. Plowden, junior, W. E. Money, N. Prowett, M. J. Tierney, R. N. C. Hamilton, T. B. C. Bayley, J. Maberly, R. C. Glyn, H. M. Elliot, E. L. Hodgson, R. Cathcart.

The Secretary in reply, returned the following extracts from the proceedings of the Quarterly Meeting of the Fund, held on the 27th April last:—

"Read a letter from Mr. Sutherland, in reply to the manager's letter of the 21st October last, requesting to be allowed to continue his subscription to the fund. Resolved by a majority of 9 against 1, that Mr. Sutherland be considered a retired Civilian and subject to payment due under rule XXXV.

Mr. Tulloh has no objection to Mr. Sutherland being so considered; but objects to the competency of the meeting, and is of opinion that the question can only be determined by a reference to the subscribers generally."

MR. HALKET.—It is stated that a petition is about to be addressed to the Governor-General, by the native and European inhabitants of Kishnaghur, soliciting the reinstatement of Mr. Halket in the office of Magistrate of that district.

NATIVE FEMALE EDUCATION MEETING.—There was a very numerous attendance of the Friends of Native Female Education, at the Town Hall on the 2d July. Nearly all the beauty and fashion of Calcutta were present at the Fancy Fair. The reading of the report by the Lord Bishop was rather wearisome, and when his Lordship rose to move the adoption of it, very few of the audience were left in the Hall, the rest having adjourned to the rooms in which the fancy articles were displayed. The articles were the most brilliant ever exhibited in Calcutta, and it is said that the sale realized about 2,400 rupees. For the School at Howrah about 200 rupees were raised, and for the Orphans 500 rupees.

NATIVE SURVEYORS.—It is said that government intend to appoint a native surveyor to each Zillah, on a salary of ~~Rs~~ 100 per mensem.

COMPANY'S SILK FACTORIES.—The Company's Silk Factories in Cossimbazaar, Soonamooky and Commercolley, are advertized for public sale at the Export Warehouse on the 15th proximo.

TOKEN OF REGARD.—Twenty-six members of the Calcutta Hunt, have resolved on presenting the Hon'ble Mr. Elliott with a very elegant little clock, made by the famous McCabe, as a token of their regard. There is a modest and characteristic inscription at the back of the clock, and the names of the subscribers are engraved on the little door which encloses the works.

MR. FOOTE.—An European residing in Clive-street, was seized with cholera on Monday night and died on Tuesday. The Police, on proceeding to the place, in consequence of information given to them, endeavored, but without avail, to obtain some particulars regarding the deceased's affairs from persons in the neighbourhood, and as the house had an appearance of poverty, they ordered the body to be interred on Tuesday evening in the manner usually resorted to in the case of paupers. Serjeant Little, the person appointed to attend to the burial, previously to leaving the house, had the curiosity to open an old almirah which he saw in the room, that safe possession might be taken of any little property that might be found in the absence of legitimate claimants. To the serjeant's surprise he discovered, on opening the almirah, property in Company's paper, money and jewellery, to the extent of about 20,000 Rs. It was subsequently ascertained that the deceased was formerly a Harbour Master at Batavia, but no information has been elicited as to what business or occupation Mr. Foote has followed since his settleinent in Calcutta. It would appear that he is totally unknown, and without a single relative or friend in the place. A gentleman has, however, since communicated the intelligence of the deceased's possessing relatives in Devonshire with whom he has kept up a friendly correspondence ever since his arrival in India 30 years ago.

ACCIDENTS.—Mr. Barrett, a tavern keeper in the Loll Bazaar, was accidentally drowned on the 7th instant, at Alliporc, whilst bathing in a tank.

On the evening of the 10 instant, one of the guard boats belonging to the Salt Golahs, was upset near the Golahs. The accident was perceived from a house in the Howrah Dock and Messrs. Evatt and Grindall immediately pushed off in a beauleah and succeeded, with considerable risk to themselve, in saving the crew—seven in number. Several other boats were near the place when the accident happened, but they rendered no assistance.

On the night of the 12th June, a boat, containing about twenty persons, was upset near the Hasting's Bridge, by the strength of the bore, and thirteen of her passengers were drowned. Several dingheewallahs were near the spot, but they would render no assistance. At the instance of Mr. Nott, however, two boats put off, and succeeded in bringing to shore several of the natives, apparently dead, seven of whom were restored to life by the humane exertions of that gentleman.

On the present trip of the George Swinton two fatal accidents occurred. A pilot boat swamped alongside the steamer near Rajmahal, on the 12th instant, and a boy was drowned. On the same evening the passengers from the Bhaguretty went on shore for a walk, when Ensign Davidson, approaching too near the edge of the bank, the earth gave way and he sunk in the stream to rise no more. Boats went in search of the body, but without effect.

COLLECTORS OF BURDWAN, &c.—The Gazette of the 11thinstant contains an order of the Governor of Bengal, assigning to the Collectors of Burdwan, Dacca, and Backergunge respectively the duty of trying cases referred to them by the Superintendents of Salt Chokeys in those districts, and directing them to make monthly reports thereof to the Board of Customs, Salt and Opium.

STOLEN RECORDS.—There is in the Gazette of the 11th instant an advertisement offering a reward of 100 rupees for the recovery of certain Records, forming altogether a large mass of volumes, stolen and missing from the office of the Civil Auditor. It is suspected that the abstraction of these Records must have been going on for some time, and merely for the purpose of selling them for a trifle as waste paper.

PULTAH ROBBERY.—It is reported that 22 persons were arrested on the 2d July in the Sobah Bazaar, on suspicion of being concerned in the robbery of Mr. Breen at Pultah, and that 800 rupees were found in the possession of two of them. Several of the thieves turn out to be bearers: one of them, when caught, was actually wearing a necklace of Mrs. Breen's about his neck, which, with singular effrontery, he at once acknowledged was stolen by himself. The iron chest has been found in the river near the shore in Garden Reach, where it was broken open and left on the night of the robbery. It still contained many valuable papers, and there is now a clue by which it is hoped the rest of the property will be traced.

Another robbery of considerable importance occurred in Shambazaar on Saturday night in the house of Baboo Sibchunder Bhose, whose loss, it is said, in jewellery and plate, amounts to ten or fifteen thousand rupees.

MILITARY FUND.—It is stated in the Englishman of the 13th June, that the Directors of the Military Fund have circulated, among others, the following proposition:—

"That the passage-money to widows be reduced to 1,500 Rs. At present a General Officer would receive for his passage, if entitled to have the same provided at the expense of the Fund, a sum five hundred rupees less than the widow of a Cadet. The effect of granting passage-money to widows is this,—the Fund pays, in each case, 2,000 Rs to remove the party to a country where she will cost 7½ per cent. per annum more than she does here, and where she is CERTAIN TO LIVE LONGER!"

MILITARY ITEMS.—Major Cox, it is said, is again under arrest and about to be tried by a Court-martial for writing a disrespectful letter to the Chief of the Staff. It is supposed however that he will not be tried, as he has addressed a communication to the Adjutant-General, expressing his regret for his letter which was deemed disrespectful.

Major Tennant, it is said, is to succeed Lieut.-Col. Powney, who leaves the station in consequence of his promotion, as Agent for the manufactory of gunpowder.

Captain Johnson has been restored to the mounted branch of the artillery.

Capt. Impy died on board of the Sherburne, on the night of the 13th inst.

MR. BLAKE'S MURDERERS.—Government have issued orders to the authorities at Jeypore, for the immediate execution of every one proved to have been concerned in the murder of Mr. Blake. It is said that the city guard took a prominent share in the bloody tragedy.

CAPTURE OF A ROGUE.—It is reported that the man who lately defrauded a respectable Goldsmith of this place of jewels to a large amount, has been detected, but none of the trinkets have been recovered,—the man declaring his determination to brave all that the authorities can do rather than restore them.

SHIPPING.—The Thalia, it is said, is safe in a very fine dock in Moulmein; she grounded, but sustained no injury.

The Steamer Enterprize, in proceeding down to the Sherburne, ran foul of a small brig and nearly capsized her, and almost immediately afterwards came in contact with another vessel under sail, by which she severely damaged her paddles. But for the promptness of the Engineer in backing the paddles, by which the shock was lessened, it is supposed that the concussion would have proved fatal to the steamer.

The Captain of the French ship Clarisse, which arrived from Bourbon on the 13th June, reports, that she sighted the island of Cargados Garajos at the southern extremity of the Cabalva Shoal, Lat. 17° 15′ S. Long. 60° E., and there observed a three-masted vessel aground, which he computed to be of seven or eight hundred tons.

The Sherburne has put back leaky, in consequence of an injury in her stern, sustained in the river, which caused her to make so much water as to compel her to return.

The bark Resource, Scott, put back from sea on the 23d instant, after being out for nearly a month and a half, the commander finding himself unable to prosecute the voyage in a vessel so indifferently manned and found.

Private letters have been received from the Cape, which announce the arrivals at that place of the Neptune and the Duke of Northumberland: passengers all well. The Duke of Northumberland passed the French Ship Triton, and spoke the Palmyra, off the Cape.

The Bhaguretty has started for the Western Provinces in tow of the George Swinton, with twenty lakhs of treasure and quite full of cargo. The passengers are: Mr. Conelly, M. C. S.; Lieutenant McKenzie; Mr. Oswald; Mr. Rawson; Lieutenant Fraser; Mr. Sinclair; Mr. Beecher; Mr. Shipton; Mr. Davidson; Mr. Johnston; Mr. Bishop; Mr. Abbott; Baboo Sumboochundal Bonnerjee, and a native gentleman his friend.

FEVER HOSPITAL.—The Rajah of Burdwan has given 7,000 Rs. to the Fever Hospital.

TEA PLANTS.—It is asserted that Government intend to dispatch a steamer to bring round a quantity of tea plants, of various choice kinds, which have been collected on the eastern extremity of our Assam frontier.

SIX PER CENT. REMITTABLE LOAN.—In the Globe of March last is an advertisement issued at the India House on the subject of the Six per Cent. Remittable Loan, notifying the terms of the advertisements of the Government for the discharge thereof. Notwithstanding the notice of transfer, they will continue to receive Six per Cent. until the date when the paper falls due here, according to the advertisements put forth by this Government.

IMPROVEMENTS IN STEAM MACHINERY.—The Courier asserts that exertions have been in progress for several months past at the new foundery at Cossipore, for the completion of a new mode of condensing steam entirely different from any plan hitherto effected in Europe, by which the use of salt water in the boilers of steam boats in future will be rendered unnecessary, thereby at once removing the great annoyance arising from the deposit of salt.

MR. MACAULAY.—It is stated in the Madras Courier, that the Court of Directors have determined to recall Mr. Macaulay, and that orders to that effect have actually been sent out. The Bengal Hurkaru disbelieves this report, and states that no intimation of such an order has been received at this presidency.

CALCUTTA LOTTERY.—The ticket No. 3,802 came up a prize of 50,000 rupees. Messrs. Roussac, Brothers, are the possessors of it.

MUTINY.—A mutiny occurred on board the Kusrovie, Marter, which arrived here from Sumatra. On the 19th of April, in a gale of wind, off the east coast of Sumatra, the Captain struck the Tindal with a rope's end for being tardy in performing his duty. This proceeding exasperated the crew and inferior officers, and they all ceased doing duty and commenced arming themselves. The Mate reported this to the Captain, who, after arming himself with a brace of pistols and a cutlass, and supplying the Mate with the same, proceeded, attended by him, to the forecastle, where they were received with execrations and threats. The Captain and Mate expostulated with the men and promised to guarantee them better treatment, but they were suddenly surrounded, thrown down, severely beaten, and disarmed. The Mate, however, succeeded in making his way to the quarter-boat, the falls of which he cut away and got into her. He was shortly after joined by the Captain, and several of the crew who had not joined in the mutiny, and the party pushed off for the shore, about twenty miles distant. During the disturbance the vessel was at anchor, but after the Captain left her the crew got her under weigh and stood for Pedier where they anchored. The Captain and his party arrived at a small village on the Sawang river, where they were arrested at the request of the Sherbunder (Master-Attendant) of Pedier, to whom the native owner of the vessel had complained of being unable to proceed to sea for want of some one who could navigate the vessel. After a detention of sixteen days, the Captain and Mate rejoined the vessel, the crew having sworn to offer them no annoyance. The Captain put to sea and arrived here safely, and the mutinous crew have been discharged without any judicial enquiry into their conduct.

REBELLION.—Four companies of the 4th Native Infantry, from Berhampore, were supplied with 60 rounds of ball cartridge and obliged to make a forced march of 30 miles, at an hour's notice, to quell a serious disturbance among the indigo ryuts in the Bauleah district, the civil power being insufficient for its suppression. The 41st N. I. has been ordered from Barrackpore to Berhampore, to supply the place of the Regt. sent from thence to quell the disturbance.

The Courier has the following extract of a letter from Bouleah dated 22d inst., on the subject:—"There has been a Rebellion in our district—the two Magistrates obliged to take to their heels three days ago—and the military called from Berhampore to quell the mobility. They take the field to-day about 12 miles hence. There will be a slaughter, else I am much mistaken. The ryuts turned out and burnt all the mahajuns' papers, their bonds, &c. and when the police with the Magistrate at their head, went to protect the merchants, they were driven off—near one of the Company's Silk Factories called Burhagutelly."

It appears that the recent disturbances in Bauleah, were occasioned by the mahajuns refusing to make any more advances to the ryuts to keep them from starvation. The ryuts, it seems, had been previously selling their crops to the zemindars instead of to their creditors, and after this they proceeded to break open the houses of their creditors, and to destroy their books, accounts, &c., so that no claim might be proved against them in the numerous suits which had been instituted. The Magistrates interfered, and about one hundred of the rioters armed with sticks, were seized; but the civil power being apprised of a rescue which was about to be attempted by a rising of the whole country simultaneously, retreated and sent for the military, who, on their arrival, were divided into small bands and sent to scour the country; but as the insurgents are unprovided with fire-arms the disturbance is likely to be quelled without bloodshed: one old man, however, has been severely wounded. Later accounts state that the disturbance is at an end and the troops returning from the scene of outrage.

MR. ADAM has completed a Report on the state of education, from such documents as he could command at the Presidency, and in reference chiefly to the Missionary and other philanthropic institutions. The Report has been delivered to the General Committee of Public Instruction.

NATIVE MEDICAL COLLEGE.—An examination of the pupils of the Native Medical College, took place on the 24th inst., and the progress the students had made in the science of Anatomy and Osteology in particular, surprized all who were present. The progress of the students, reflects the greatest credit on their industry and zeal and the able superintendence with which their studies have been directed by Drs. Bramley and Goodeve.

THE JURY QUESTION.—The Courier states that the Committee on the Jury question have agreed amongst themselves upon the following principles as the basis of the Act to be drafted for submission to the Legislative Council. Juries in Civil Cases to be summoned at the desire of either Plaintiff or Defendant, or of the Judge, but not otherwise. Ordinary Civil Juries to consist of four members, whose verdict to be that of a majority (that is, three jurymen,) but given by the foreman as the verdict of the whole Jury. Full Juries to consist of twelve. Their verdict to be that of a majority in the same porportion as above,—namely, nine; but if so large a number cannot agree after two hours deliberation, then the verdict may be given by a simple majority. The Judge, plaintiff, or defendant to have the option of summoning an ordinary or a full Jury. Jurymen to receive four rupees per diem for each cause.

It is further added, that another public meeting is to be called for the approval of the Draft when ready, and for the purpose of laying before the public the answer which shall have been received from Government to the Petition.

CIVIL ANNUITIES.—It is stated in the Hurkaru of the 25th inst., that a letter from a Civilian in England has been received here, which states that there is no chance whatever of the Annuity to retired Civilians being increased, but what it is probable that the present per centage of deductions from allowances would be diminished.

THE HON'BLE JOHN ELLIOT, has returned to his situation as Post Master General, in consequence of the ship he had taken his passage in, having put back—and Mr. Siddons in consequence has resumed his duties at the Custom House.

MR. H. RICKETTS, has been appointed Commissioner of Cuttack, in the room of Mr. John Master.

THE HON'BLE COL. REHLING, K. D., who has been appointed by his Danish Majesty Governor of Serampore, landed at that settlement, from the steamer in which he came up the river, on the 24th ultimo, under the usual salute. Col. Rehling has had the benefit of a long experience in Indian affairs as Governor of Tranquebar, and as a token of the King of Denmark's especial confidence, has been invested with the order of Dannebrog and raised to the rank of Colonel.

FANCY FAIR.—A Fancy Fair is to be held on the 11th instant, for the benefit of the Cape sufferers, at which there will be exposed for sale, a number of beautiful articles, contributed by the ladies of the Presidency.

BENGAL, &c.

MILITARY ITEMS.—Lieutenant-Colonel Hunter it is said has been honorably and fully acquitted of all the charges brought against him by Captain O'Hanlon, which officer is now to be tried for having written certain letters against Captain Scott and Colonel Reid.

Orders have been issued to Captain Scott, Cornet Campbell and Lieutenant Martin, to proceed to Calcutta, to attend the trial of Captain O'Hanlon, who is to be tried on five charges, springing out of the late complicated trials of that Officer and Col. Hunter.

The following relief of Foot Artillery, it is said, will take place this year, viz.—"The 2d and 4th Companies of the 4th Battalion to march at the conclusion of the rainy season from Dum-Dum to Agra. The first Battalion goes to Dum-Dum. The 3d Battalion to Mhow, Saugor, Benares and Dinapore. The 2d Battalion to relieve its own Companies, the Head Quarters remaining at Nusseerabad. The 5th Battalion moves to Cawnpore. The 1st Battalion to detach one of its companies to Moulmein."

Private accounts mentioned that the 35th Native Infantry, now stationed at Delhi, are to relieve the 49th N. I. at Loodeanah this ensuing relief, and that Colonel Faithful, C. B., is to be removed from the latter corps and posted to the 62nd Native Infantry.

Muttra is not to be abolished as a Military station for Cavalry.

Orders have been received from England to disband all local corps, including the irregular horse.

The 42nd N. I. go to Bareilly and 39th to Neemuch.

LOODEANAH.—The Sikh Political Agent, Captain Wade, returned on the 10th ultimo to this station from Rooper, where he had passed the hot winds.

MEERUT.—The rains have set in with incredible violence. On the 21st ultimo, a house was thrown down and two people killed by its fall.

An affray was very near taking place recently in the city, in consequence of the officers of the Customs Department stopping a marriage procession to search for copper pie of native manufactory, on which, according to the orders of the Allahabad Revenue Board, they are directed to levy a duty of ten per cent.

The water in the nullah at Meerut rose to an unusual height about the end of last month, in consequence of the heavy rain which had fallen for two or three days. It was nearly level with the parapet of the Begum's Bridge, and created much devastation in several of the compounds in its vicinity.

DELHI.—A carbine which was taken out of a well in the city, is regarded with great suspicion as the one with which Mr. Frazer was shot. A careful examination, however, has not elicited any thing to criminate it. Juswunt Singh, Raja of Nab, has subscribed 1,000 rupees for a conviction in the case. Several of Shumshoodeen's friends —sahuokars of Delhi—have raised a knotty question about how they are to be repaid by Shumshoodeen, to whom they had advanced considerable sums on the security of his ilaqu, since the attachment of that property. The Resident confessed himself unable to decide the point until the arrival of Mr. Colvin.

A rumour is in circulation that Lieut.-Col. Cobbe has been nominated Governor-General's agent at Delhi.

The committal of Nawab Shumshoodeen was made on the 19th ultimo, and the trial was to take place in Mr. Metcalfe's cutcherry in the course of a few days. The partisans of the Nawab are quite elated at Mr. Colvin being selected to try the case, and give out that his appointment has been obtained through the solicitations of the Nawab's vakeel.

It is rumoured that Isfunder Bey and his associates, are endeavouring to get the Nuwab of Ferozepore bailed and removed to the house in the Derriowgunge Lines, on pretence of enabling him to collect his witnesses and prepare his defence, which they say he is unable to do in his present locality.

Intelligence has been received of the apprehension of one of the men concerned in the assassination of Mr. Fraser. This man had been placed, armed with a sword, near the spot where the bloody deed was perpetrated, ready to complete it should the bullet have failed, and effected his escape after the catastrophe. He was subsequently seized in a neighbouring territory, but rescued by a superior force. A fakeer, a short time since, arrived at Hansi and informed Col. Skinner of the man being concealed in the vicinity of that place, and that if his capture was not immediately accomplished, it would be useless to attempt it. The Colonel instantly dispatched a body of his own Horse, and after a desperate resistance, succeeded in capturing the villain, who has since made a full and unqualified confession, so that the conviction of Nawab Shumsoodeen is now almost certain. Search was made for the fakeer who gave information, in order to reward him, but he could no where be found, having probably made his escape to avoid detection and the vengeance he would be almost certain to experience from some fanatical Mussulman.

The trial of Mr. Fraser's murderers commenced on the 13th inst. The Court was crowded by natives of low degree, and a small enclousure on the left of the bench was occupied by native and European gentlemen, for whom seats were provided. Unnia, Kurreem Khan's accomplice, was the first witness called, and his deposition, which lasted four hours and was corroborated by a host of witnesses, satisfactorily proved the guilt of Kurreem Khan and Shumsoodeen, and there is no doubt that they will soon expiate their crimes on the gallows.

Mr. Simon Fraser, it is reported, is permanently appointed to the Delhi Magistracy.

Mohun Lal was to depart for Khandahar in a few days.

The uxorious King, it is said, in a fit of tenderness, made over, by a regular deed of conveyance, the whole of his property to his favourite wife; the Resident, however, would not ratify the transfer, and thus rendered futile this proof of the monarch's affection.

ALLAHABAD.—The recent arrangements rendering it impossible for the Commissioner of Allahabad to hold the Hummeerpoor Sessions, the prisoners committed by the Hummeerpoor Magistrate, are to be sent to Banda for trial by the Sessions Judge there.

A daring attack was made on the 6th June, on the person of the Treasurer of the Magistrate. This functionary was returning home accompanied by three attendants, and when passing the city, a man with a sword in his hand suddenly attacked and made three desperate cuts at him. The Treasurer, however, evaded the blows and the villain was knocked down by the attendants with their sticks and secured, and is now in prison.

On the 24th June, being the anniversary of St. John the Baptist, the brethren of the Lodge Independence with Philanthropy, No. 550, assembled at their Rooms in the Fort at Allahabad, from whence they proceeded to the place of divine worship in due order. On their arrival at the chapel, the Revd. Mr. Ward performed the morning service of the day, taking for his text the 11th verse of the 3d chapter of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, "for other foundation can no man lay than is laid, which is Jesus Christ." In the evening the brethren re-assembled at the Lodge Rooms and partook of an elegant dinner. The utmost harmony prevailed throughout, several loyal and masonic toasts were drank, and the brethren separated exactly at midnight, highly pleased with the entertainment.

On the 19th ultimo the corpse of a man was found in a house in Ibraham Poorah, with several severe wounds on it, which left not a doubt as to the manner in which the deceased met his death. The murderers have not been detected; strict enquiry has, however, been instituted to find them out.

AGRA.—A native traveller, by name Rekkeishan, eldest son of the court physician at Neypaul, has arrived at Agra for the avowed purpose of observing and studying the effects of the British administration in all its branches.

A Havildar of the 9th N. I. was murdered on the night of the 3rd instant. The quarter guard were drawn to the hut of the man by hearing cries of distress issuing from it, and on entering they beheld the unfortunate Havildar laying on his back weltering in blood. On examination seventy-six wounds were found on the body, apparently inflicted with a sharp sword. Shortly after the discovery of the horrid deed, the Adjutant proceeded to the spot, and within an hour's time had the roll called, when all but three sepoys were found present, and they shortly after appeared and accounted for their absence in a very satisfactory manner. The Havildar had served in the Regiment for a period of 30 years, and was much respected in his corps.

The man suspected of murdering the Havildar of the 9th N. I. and 7 other sipahees of the same regiment and company, have been apprehended and is now in confinement. The men, it is supposed, were instigated to the deed from being overlooked in the promotion they thought they had merited, and so aggrieved it is said, did they conceive themselves, that they meditated the life of the European officer commanding the company; but their intentions were providentially frustrated by their apprehension. The presumptive evidence which has subsequently transpired at the Court of Inquiry held to investigate the affair, is so strong against the Havildar who succeeded to the appointment on the death of his predecessor, that he has been placed in prison in irons.

Another murder was committed on the 26th June in the 51st Regiment, the perpetrator of which has escaped detection.

The Session Judges in this presidency has been vested with the appellative powers hitherto exercised by Commissioners in respect to decisions by Magistrates.

NATIVE STATES.

LAHORE.—On the 2d June, Maharajah Runjeet Singh crossed the river Jullum. 500 rupees and 50 vessels of sweetmeats were, at the request of his Highness, directed to be sent to Rajah Golaub Singh, and the Chiefs of Rawul Pindee were ordered to send to the Fort of Uttuck 500 bags of wheat and 200 of barley. On the 3d two French gentlemen, who had come to Lahore some time previously, came before his Highness with such *nuzzeranná*s as they could afford. They were minutely examined by his Highness regarding the route they had come, their intentions and qualifications. On being informed that they were adventurers who had come viâ Muttra seeking employment, and that they were thoroughly acquainted with the process of making gunpowder and the forms of the French Military discipline, his Highness desired them to remain in his territories and that suitable employment would be given to them.

RUNJEET SINGH AND DOST MAHOMED.—Intelligence having been brought to His Highness Runjeet Singh, that Dost Mahomed had taken flight with his army. His Highness directed a salute to be fired, and next morning rode out to reconnoitre the ground on which the Affghan had encamped.

Hukeem Azeezooddeen, Doctor Harland, and others who had waited on Dost Mahomed to bring over hostages, returned and related to his Highness that the Affghan Chief had ordered Sultan Mahomed Khan to have them massacred, but the latter demurring, Dost Mahomed had become enraged and ordered his troops to retreat by the pass of Khybur, whither they were constrained to follow them; but having succeeded, with Sooltan Mahomed Khan's troops, in separating themselves from the main body at the pass, they had returned to the presence with that Chieftain, Peer Mahomed Khan, and Syed Mahomed Khan.

JALLALABAD.—Dost Mahomed Khan, at the date of the last advices, was still at Jallalabad, busily engaged in regulating the statistical affairs of the country. It is said that he had imprisoned and fined several persons suspected of having influenced the negotiations between Sultan Mahomed Khan and Runjeet Sing, and that he intended as soon as he had subjugated the disaffected chiefs in his own territories, to invade Peshawur with a powerful army.

DOST MAHOMED KHAN.—This chieftain is still encamped on the river Khuebur, where he revolves in his mind some enterprize which may obliterate the disgrace of his retreat from the Sikhs, and immortalize his name. A report which receives some credit, states that anguish and shame have armed his own hand against his life.

DESPERATE AFFRAY.—A bloody conflict recently ensued near Malwa, between the followers of the Belaspore Rajah and the inhabitants of a large village belonging to him. The villagers were worsted in the conflict, two Brahmins were burnt to death, and five women had their bellies ripped open by the Rajah's followers.

JEYPORE.—A force consisting of the 17th N. I., 3rd Cavalry, and a detachment of Artillery, with 4 nine-pounders is now at Jeypore. The distance between Nusseerabad and this place, is 86 miles, which was completed by the troops on the third day from their departure. The bazaar attached to the cavalry was robbed on the march! The force is stationed at the Residency. Major Alves is slowly but progressively recovering.

On the 22d ultimo the five men, who had been identified as the most forward in the murder of Mr. Blake, were executed by the Jeyporean authorities in the street fronting the temple where the atrocious deed was perpetrated. Another man, a Mussalman, the most guilty of all, had been reprieved till the 23d in order to afford him time to substantiate a charge adduced by him against a Srawajee named Sim Lal, of having instigated him to join a tumult, which he, the culprit, was informed would be excited by the servants of another Srawajee, Dewan Remur Chand. The man had been promised his life if he succeeded in proving his assertions, but very little doubt was entertained of their being fabricated to prolong existence. Some two or three others implicated in the murders had been named by witnesses, but had, up to the date of the last intelligence, succeeded in evading the search of the authorities. From the depositions of the man who attacked Major Alves and the driver of Mr. Blake's elephant, there is reason to conclude, that the discontented Ranee and Thakoors were the instigators of the bloody tragedy; and also, that thee Rawul's guard were active participators in the transaction. About sixteen natives, in the service of the Europeans, it appears, were also dispatched by the mob.

MR. BLAKE.—The remains of this unfortunate gentleman are buried at Jeypore, but it is the intention of some of his friends to remove them to Delhi, and to erect a monument to his memory.

PURTABGURH.—The country about Mundessore is in a most lawless and disturbed state. On the 3rd inst. the Thakoor of Gunzutty, with fifty suwars, attacked a party of 16 armed men who were escorting a quantity of opium, the property of an individual named Murbee Ram, to Mundessore, wounded several of the guards, and seized the whole of the opium, which is described as worth 8,500 Rs. It would appear that his Excellency of Gunzutty demanded 50 Rs as the price of his permission to allow the opium to pass, which being refused, the Thakoor, evidently no admirer of the non-interference system, proceeded to collect his revenue in the manner above mentioned. The jungles of Purtabgurh afford such facilities for conceatment, that pursuit would be useless.

TOUNK.—The young Nawab has proffered his assistance to the Company, in the event of a war in Rajpootana, and expressed in unmeasured terms his indignation at the treachery of the Jeypooreans.

AURUNGABAD.—For a period of 3 years little or no rain has fallen in this district, in consequence of which famine has been so sore, that cannibalism has prevailed to some extent This season, however, the rains have set in early and abundantly.

BHURTPORE.—The Rajah is said to be greatly increasing and disciplining his troops.

A large reservoir of water, named the Moteejheel, about two koss from Bhurtpore, being overcharged with water, burst its banks and deluged the whole country to the very walls of the city. The breach, however, was repaired before any very great damage occurred.

HYDERABAD.—A body of Suwars in his Highness the Nizam's employ being discharged, refused to receive the arrears of their wages, and urged that they had served out their youthful days in his Highness's employ, and that it was hard that they should be discorded in their old age. This being reported to his Highness, he said that they were a body of mutinous rogues, and commanded their immediate dismissal; they were accordingly paid up and sent away.

It being also represented to his Highness that a zemindar of one of his villages had attached himself to a body of banditti, whom he caused to pillage and murder every traveller who fell in their way, his Highness ordered a body of experienced men to be sent to capture the marauders and bring them before him.

GUJENDRAGAD.—The Fort of Gujendragud, with a territory yielding annually a revenue of 17,500 rupees, which had been in the possession of Appa Saheb Ghorepuday, was taken by the British forces on the 6th ultimo, when the British flag was hoisted over the castle, a salute of 21 guns fired, and a garrison of sepoys placed to guard the place.

SHEKAWATTEE.—The establishment of troops in Shekawattee is said to be viewed with considerable jealousy by the chiefs, who declare that they will not pay their tribute unless the force is removed. The Rance of Seekur is said to be at the bottom of all the intrigues carried on, her aim being to recover the fortins of Deogurh and Rugonauthgurh, which places have been recently reinforced to prevent their re-capture by the Shekawats. The Ranee is said to have sent 500 suwars to Jeypoor on hearing of the massacre there, and is also accused of having sent emmissaries to Beekaneer and other states to the westward, to urge then to revolt and assert their independence.

MADRAS.

ATTEMPT TO MURDER.—A most daring attack was made on Lieut.-Col. Townsend, of the 30th M. N. I., by a sepoy who had been discharged for misconduct. The man after receiving his dismissal loitered about the lines and succeeded in obtaining a musket, with which he proceeded to the house of the Colonel, and finding him laying on a couch in the verandah took aim and snapped the piece at him, but if fortunately missed fire. The second attempt, which was equally unsuccessful, attracted the attention of the Colonel's dogs whose barking roused the Colonel, who perceiving a man close to him with a gun levelled sprang up and seized him, when the sepoy made a third ineffectual attempt to shoot him. The man is in custody.

BREAK-WATER.—The general result of the Break-water meeting is, that an experimental commencement of a Break-water is to be forthwith undertaken, 350 yards from the shore opposite the Custom House, and that Government are to be applied to for the services of an engineer and such other assistance as may seen desirable. Six or seven hundred convicts have been accorded by the Government to be employed on the Break-water.

COURT-MARTIAL.—The Court-martial on Lieutenant William Lawless Seppings, of the 4th Regiment Native Infantry, placed in arrest for striking his superior officer, Lieutenant P. A. S. Powys of the same Regiment, sentenced him to be repremanded by the Commander-in-Chief, which sentence has been carried into effect, and Lieutenant Seppings has been directed to return to his duty.

ABOLITION OF CORPOREAL PUNISHMENT.—It is rumoured that instructions have been given for the abolition of corporeal punishment in His Majesty's army in India, with the following exceptions, viz. being found drunk on duty and purloining ammunition, accoutrements, &c., in which cases even, corporeal punishment is to be avoided as far as may be found consistent with the due maintenance of order and discipline.

MILITARY FUND.—At a meeting of the Directors of the Military Fund, held on the 15th ultimo, it appearing that on the completion of three months (from the date of reference to the subscribers, according to Regulations) the votes received on the question referred, (admission of widows and legitimate children without reference to extraction) was 682, whilst that of the subscribers in India was 1,100, leaving a very large proportion whose votes have not come in, and that of the former number 359 were pro. and 323 con.—the Directors are of opinion, that on a point so important to the welfare of the Fund, all the subscribers should be afforded an opportunity of giving their judgment,—the present state of the poll, although giving a majority in favor of the proposition, not being enough to carry it; and in submitting the subject to the consideration of the subscribers the Directors express their hope, that in deference to the solicitations of the Court of Directors, as well as to avert the dreadful consequences that must result from the withdrawal of all support from the East India Company, with which the Fund is threatened should the renewed attempt of the Court to carry the question be again defeated.

The Directors further submit, that the following sacrifices will be rendered imperative by the withdrawal of the East India Company's support:—

1st. The discontinuance of all personal benefits to living subscribers.

2d. Of passage-money to widows and children.

3d. A reduction of 12 per cent. upon the incomes of all widows and orphans.

4th. Increase of subscriptions to the undermentioned scale.

| | Married | | | Unmarried | | |

to proportion the receipts to the present rate of disbursements. And even should the East India Company continue their support, considerable sacrifices on the part of living subscribers, with a moderate increase of subscription, will be necessary to preserve the Fund from decay.

No certain calculation can be made of the additional charge to the Fund by admitting widows, without reference to extraction; it is clear, however, that it can bear no comparison to the loss to be sustained by the withdrawal of the support it derives from the Court, so that on the part even of those otherwise opposed to the measure, there ought no longer to be the slightest hesitation in adopting the course that will be attended with the least pecuniary detriment.

EXECUTION.—Vincatochellum, the discharged sepoy of the 30th Native Infantry, who was convicted on the 7th instant of attempting to murder Lieutenant-Colonel Townsend and condemned to death, underwent the sentence of the law on the 13th instant. The unfortunate man seemed to have been made sensible of his situation and the ignominious death he was to meet, and had devoted the period between his condemnation and execution to prayer; he, however, conducted himself firmly, yet respectfully, at the place of execution and met his fate without betraying the least weakness.

ON DITS.—A rumour is current of Sir Frederick Adam being recalled in consequence of some matters in which the Hon'ble Colonel Morrison and Colonel Cullen were concerned, and that he is to be succeeded by the Hon'ble Sir C. Gore, the Admiral's son, in the hope of rescueing the man, plunged into the sea after him. The life-buoy was immediately cut away and two boats, commanded by Lieuts. Hammond and Fitzgerald, were immediately lowered to their assistance. Lieutenant Gore swam lightly and with vigor, and was close to the ship asking where the man was before the boats were well in the water. He was directed to strike out for the life-buoy, to which he accordingly made, but on the boats reaching it, neither the Lieutenant nor the man were to be found. The boats, after pulling about for some time without meeting with the objects of their search, at length made for the ship which the one commanded by Lieutenant Hammond reached in safety but that in which Lieutenant Fitzgerald was, swamped and every soul in her perished in the waves.

STEP HUNTING.—It is said that an Officer belonging to a Regiment stationed at Bangalore, is put under arrest, and is about to be tried upon some complaint of a Junior Officer. It appears that the commander of the schooner, Beattie, died on the 20th day after leaving the port, and the mate was shortly after seized with fever and ague, and when he fell in with H. M's vessel, was so utterly incapable of attending to his duty that he, having no capable person on board, applied to Captan Quin to have an officer and a party of seamen sent on board to take charge of and navigate her into port. His request was complied with and the schooner was safely anchored in Penang harbour. His Majesty's sloop Raleigh claimed a salvage, for the assistance rendered in bringing her into port, of one-sixteenth of the value of vessel, cargo and freight, and the claim being objected to on the part of the surviving commander of the schooner, the salvors seized a portion of her cargo, viz., 9 chests of Malwa opium, which were sold by public auction on the 2d instant, and averaged 560 dollars per chest. The schooner, after being properly officered, manned and armed, proceeded on her voyage to China on the 1st inst.

GOA.

Private letters which have been received from Goa, give accounts of a most atrocious, infamous, treacherous and cold-blooded butchery committed by the insurgents. The following are the particulars:—

On intelligence being received at Goa, of the preparation of an armament by Snr. Peres, the garrison of the Fort of Tyracol declared in his favor. The rebels, headed by the Military Governor, attacked the fort but, after some hard fighting, being unable to effect any thing they retreated from the place. Shortly after this, however, finding that the expedition had not arrived, and being acquainted with the want of provisions and ammunition on the part of the besieged, an overture was sent by the rebel chiefs to the garrison promising them their lives if they would surrender. The besieged accepted the offer and surrendered; but as soon as the insurgents had obtained possession of the fort, they murdered the first four leaders of the garrison on the spot. Three other chiefs were next seized by these sanguinary villains; two of these were spared through the earnest intercession of Col. A. Lopez; but regarding the manner in which the other should be disposed of, considerable discussion took place. M. Atmarama proposed to have him flayed alive, Col. Lopez to set him free according to their pledge, when Fortunato de Mello terminated the dispute by taking a musket from a soldier and shooting the prisoner. All the private soldiers found within the fort were put to death, and the heads of these unfortunate men, after being borne in triumph through the streets of Goa, were sent to their wives and families, and subsequently stuck up on posts before the houses in which they resided.

The wretch who bore the flag of truce to the murdered men, and pledged the honor of the rebel chiefs for their safety, was promoted to the rank of ensign for his dexterity in duping them.

CHINA.

PREVENTION OF THE SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS.—On the 16th April, the Nan-hae-heën issued a proclamation, severely interdicting the slaughter of animals for food; and all officers, high and low, were ordered to repair to the altars of the Dragoon King to supplicate for rain. On the 18th a Cavalry review took place; and on the 21st the Kwang-chow issued a proclamation prohibiting the catching of fish.

An imperial edict has been issued, notifying that in consequence of the Empress-mother having attained her seventieth year, there will be in every province an extra examination of graduates who are candidates for the Ken-jin degree, and also at Peking an examination of the successful Ken-jin men for the degree of Isin-tsze.

DROUGHT.—The long continuation of the drought has become a matter of serious importance, and both the Government and people think and talk of little else.

PERSIA.

The following are extracts of a letter from Bombay, received by the Hurkaru on the 22d June:—

"The Meccaee, Pilgrim-ship, is expected from Judda in about a week; by which, it is hoped, the May packets from England will be received. This, however, from the arrangements, or rather want of arrangements, in Egypt, cannot be relied on.

"The H. C. S. Elphinstone, just arrived from the Gulf, brings us letters stating, that "it is understood Mahomed Ali Pasha will not allow the Steamers to pass through Syria, as he wishes them to ply in the Red Sea." Captain Elwan, the Commodore in the Gulf, died of fever on the 17th June.

"The young Shah of Persia is well spoken of by one of our correspondents who says, 'The King himself, I am sure, is really a good youth, and had he a good and honest minister, I would hope to see much good done for this unfortunate country.'

"A letter from Tehran, of the 27th May, says, that they had not, at that time, any intimation, officially, of Mr. Ellis's appointment or approach."

REVIEW OF THE CALCUTTA MARKET.

INDIGO PROSPECTS.--Accounts from the interior in regard to the present crop are of a great variety; the heavy rain fallen during this month have in many parts caused damage by the sudden rise of the rivers. The produce of Burdwan, Khisnaghur, and Jessore, is reported to be small.—Accounts from some parts of Dacca are more favorable. Jungypore is said to have suffered severely. Letters from Tirhoot continue to promise a very large crop. From all the accounts received from the interior, and considering the heavy rains we have had since our last, there is no doubt that in many districts, where cultivation is on low land, the plant must have suffered, but as it is a fact, that the present crop is a very early one, and that a considerable quantity is already manufactured, the inundation cannot have done that great damage which would have been the case, if the plant had been less advanced in its maturity, it is therefore probable that the crop will be more than an average one.

It must be recollected that although the failure of the great agency houses did at one time threaten a material falling off in the produce, yet the Assignees of the Insolvent Estates, (with the sanction of the Court) having applied the assets to carry on vigorously the factories that could not be advantageously disposed of, an amount in ready cash has been employed in the manufacture of Indigo which the old houses in the most prosperous days could probably not have furnished, so that in fact the cultivation has been considerably increased, and we may state that the present rough estimates of the crop will not fall short of 125,000 maunds. Few transactions have come to our notice during the course of the month; in the early part of it, about 220 chests Ghazeepore were sold at prices ranging from 115 to 120, the last fine mark sold, brought 149 rupees, and a fine parcel of Ghazeepore, say pale soft clear weak purple, 110 rupees. The prices which we quoted in our last number, at about 10 to 15 Rs. under our previous or May quotation, which were then nominal, experienced some improvement, in consequence of the recent unfavorable accounts from the interior. We quote our last prices. Shipments to England have reduced the stock of the last season to 4000 maunds, which may probably follow to the same destination.

OPIUM – Experienced a further decline owing to an unusual anxiety of some holders to realize, as the money in regard to this drug is scarce in the market. Purchases are reported for Bombay. The quantity existing at present in the Hon'ble Company's Godowns is about 2,500 chs. Patna, and 1,500 chests Benares. Since our last number, about 1,700 chests have been cleared for the Straits and China, to these we have to add about 600 chs, which the vessels now loading may export, of which the Carnatic alone, will receive about 400 chs. Prices expected to rise.

RAW SILK.—The present hund which is expected to commence arriving in a few days, is always of inferior quality, owing to the season, but the rainy weather we have had during the whole month, must have influenced still more its quality. The market is generally dull with the exception of a few isolated speculators. Cultivation is greatly decreasing, since the Company have abandoned it. Prices rather declining. Stock very limited. March hund is all shipped.

SILK PIECE GOODS.—After a few months calm in the market, (owing to the heavy stock in England,) a new activity was given to the demand for Corahs, from the late favourable accounts received by the overland despatch. Prices are steady and may improve, as the stock is very moderate. The manufactory of Bandanos and Choppahs is at present not very extensive. Transactions are limited.

COTTON.—There are at present twenty vessels loading for China, the greatest part of their cargoes will probably be in cotton. Some purchases in superior qualities are reported for the home market, although shipments are still on a limited scale, as the superior quality is scarce. The latest accounts from England are favourable.—Prices of middling and inferior qualities, which we have to quote already lower than in our last, may experience a further decline. Cultivation is increasing.

SALTPETRE.—Market steady; transactions are yet trifling, as tonnage is still scarce; our stock in superior qualities is small, middling and inferior abundant. Prices expected to be maintained.

SUGAR.—There has been some demand for middling and better descriptions, the latest accounts from England being favourable, and prices well supported. Our stock is getting heavy, shipments are restrained by want of tonnage. Prices rather looking down.

LAC.—Transactions of Lac Dye and Shell Lac have been on a very limited scale during the whole month. Our stock of Lac Dye is moderate, Shell Lac is rather heavy. No particular transaction in Stick Lac has come to our notice. Prices of the several descriptions are steady; superior qualities scarce.

GRAIN.—There has been a decline in price of Mungby, Bellam, and other inferior descriptions of Rice: prices at present are likely to maintain, large shipments continue for eastern and western ports. The next crop, which is expected to arrive in November, appears to be a very large one. Superior quality has been procured for the English market. In Wheat and Gram, transactions were on a limited scale, prices are yet well supported.

LINSEED.—The crop is coming fast into the market in consequence of the rivers being navigable. The expense of land conveyance on an article of this description being enormous, holders in the interior are obliged to stock it until the kscree allow of its transmission. The total quantity that reached our market last year, 1833-34, including some of 1832-33 was 75,000 maunds. The demand first commenced in December 1834, (the sowing season is October, and the grain is reaped in April,) it was then too late in the year to enable cultivators to take advantage of the sudden call for the article and provide sufficient the following season, to meet probable demand. We cannot form any correct idea of the crop of 1834-35, but from the facts stated, we conclude it cannot exceed in a very great degree to that of former years. The ensuing crop of April, 1836, which will arrive in the market from July to October 1836, will doubtless be very extensive, as cultivators will have sufficient time to make the necessary arrangements to supply the demand; which, however, depending entirely, (or in a great measure,) on the rate of freight, is rather precarious, the chances are, that when once the trade is established on a firm footing, many vessels will come out from England, expressly for a cargo of this seed. Its quality we have heard is finer than the Russian, and only equalled by the Sicilian, which production is on a very limited scale.

HIDES—Continue dull, and prices rather declining, owing to the scarcity of tonnage; our stock, which is already heavy, may shortly be increased by new important arrivals from the interior.

HORNS—Our stock, which is still a large one, has been reduced by late shipments to England. Prices are expected to maintain.

HEMP—Continues steady without much inquiry: stock increasing. The price of Jute which has been raised with great rapidity to 4 Rs. could not be sustained, and is again down to Rs. 2-8, with the probability of a further decline.

SPICES & DRUGS, &c.—Borax and Tincal, transactions very limited. Cassia, no sales to report. Castor Oil, stock heavy, prices are yet steady, as the consumption in England is increasing. In Coffee, (Mocha) there has been some inquiry for the home market, prices are well supported, stock middling. Gallingals very little doing. Gambier or Cutch, has fallen considerably in price, in consequence of recent importation. Ginger is looking down, stock small; very heavy imports are expected from the interior. In the several descriptions of Gums, no sales worthy of notice are to be reported. Munjeet is in steady demand, and prices are expected to rise, good quality is much inquired after for shipment to England. Pepper, we have no particular variation to report since our last number, our stock is small, and prices maintained. In Rattans there is some inquiry for superior quality. Sapan Wood, stock small, prices without change. Red Sanders experienced a slight decline in prices, stock middling. Safflower, first quality, is well supported in price, as accounts from England are favourable to this dye. Our stock in Putter-gultah is middling. Delaspore is declining in price, as there is no inquiry after it. Turmeric, prices are expected to maintain, there is yet no particular demand for it at present. Elephant's Teeth are steady, small lots only to be had. Senna, no transactions to report. Mace and Nutmegs, transactions to some importance have been effected. Cloves continue also in demand. Alum market inactive, and prices declining. Recent importation of Betelnut have caused a fall in our prices. Camphor market steady. Long Pepper experienced some decline in prices.

METALS.—Copper.—11,550 mds. Peruvian Copper, of recent importation, have been offered at the public auction, but only a few lots were sold from 24 10 to 26 Sa. Rs. per factory maund. Our stock of all descriptions continues very heavy, and prices shew no probability of improving. There is no material alteration to be reported since our last, but should importation become very heavy, a further decline will be the consequence.—Iron, the market has at present a more steady aspect than at the end of the last month. Spelter.—The importation of the last three years having been considerably under our annual consumption, our ancient stock has been much reduced, and is at present only about 70,000 maunds. Our present quotation is therefore likely to be maintained, unless importation should become very extensive. Of Lead, Steel, Tin Plates, Quicksilver and Japan Copper, we have nothing particular to report. Some transactions are reported of Block Tin at our quotation.

TWIST.—Transactions have been more extensive during the present than the last month, notwithstanding recent rather heavy importation, aggregating to about 850 bales. Accounts from England state, that shipments in Twist would be less plentiful for some time, owing to the large order under execution for the continent of Europe. There is consequently no probability of a fall in our prices. Our stock is still a very moderate one. At a public sale held some days ago of a considerable parcel of Orange Yarn, more or less damaged, the prices obtained ruled from 12½ as. to 1 R. 3¾ as. according to the extent of damage.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—Since our last number there has been some large transactions, chiefly from the cargoes lately arrived. We have not, however, any material alteration to report in our last quotation.

WOOLLENS.—Town and Long Ells, of fine qualities, continue in demand, but our stock in these descriptions is very small. The few transactions of importance have been in Flannels, which continue in good demand. The stock is also very moderate.

FREIGHTS—Are at present rather high, say £3 10 to 4 0 for England, for Sugar and Saltpetre, £4 to 4 10, for Cotton, Hides, and Linseed. The greater part of the vessels which arrived lately are loading for China, so that the available tonnage for home has been naturally diminished. We are, however, informed that Shipping to the amount of about 12,000 tons is expected from London, and that a considerable addition is also expected from other parts; it is therefore highly probable that the present rates may soon be materially reduced, the more so as the China market offers no inducement for ships to proceed there on speculation, for which reason it is obvious that those who may possess discretionary power in the direction of the ships would prefer the homeward destination so long as freights should not be absolutely ruinous.

MR. BRAMLEY'S INAUGURAL LECTURE,

Mr. Bramley commenced by observing that it was in compliance with custom rather than from any notion of utility, that he gave his first address, the character of what is commonly called in college phrase, an inaugural lecture.

A formal introductory address of the description to which he referred, and on an occasion such as the present, when the students of a new, and he might be allowed to say, a noble national institution were gathered together for the first time, may justly be expected to embrace some notice of the establishment, and the objects contemplated by its founders, an outline of the course of instruction which it was intended to pursue, in teaching the art or science for the cultivation of which the particular lectureship was endowed. Also a general view of the divisions and heads of which it was intended subsequently to treat in detail.

It should, further, naturally include advice and recommendations from the preceptor to his pupils, as to their conduct, and their best course for profiting by his instructions, and so of acquiring the most thorough and speedy knowledge of that which was to be taught. Nor should the teacher in this place, and on this occasion more particularly omit some general exposition of the advantages to be derived in after life from that knowledge.

Such Dr. B. observed were the heads, which an introductory address at the opening of this College should embrace. But there was one topic, to which it would be especially incumbent on him to allude, but that it may appear somewhat premature in the present provisional condition of the establishment, to do more than briefly advert to it; he meant, the munificent arrangements in preparation by this Government for the solid and permanent advancement of science and education, more particularly as behoved his chair, he referred to the memorable instance of public patronage bestowed on medical education in this country, for which he could not but feel that their especial acknowledgments were justly due, to the late illustrious Governor-General, who in having sanctioned, or he should rather say, having instituted and organized the Medical College of Calcutta, had supplied a new and efficient stimulus for native youths, towards the acquisition of European science based on a knowledge of the English language, and had afforded large and liberal means to his pupils, of acquiring a profession, which he had little hesitation in predicting would prove a better security for winning to themselves reputation and independence, than any that the present condition of society among them admitted.

This great and liberal act on which he had here but briefly touched, would, he trusted, be duly felt and more amply, or at least, more formally acknowledged hereafter when the fitting moment should arrive.

Nor was it his intention to occupy their time that day, in dwelling upon all the other topics which as he had already observed, an Introductory Lecture should rightly comprehend.

At present he begged his pupils to understand, that the general and enlarged course of professional instructions, which it was intended to adopt, in this seminary, could not be regularly commenced on till numerous arrangements, with regard to the erection of suitable buildings and the necessary appliances for teaching shall have been completed. These, however, he was happy to inform them, were in progress, and he trusted in the course of a few months, they would find themselves fairly and comfortably established in an institution, which would do no discredit to the age in which they lived or the munificent government which had endowed it, he would then have the pleasure of seeing around him, a much larger number of pupils than was there assembled in this infant stage of the College.

It had been thought, however, that as a preliminary step, their time might be immediately employed with advantage, in commencing a course of instructions in the rudimental branches of anatomical science—and it was with this view solely that a limited class had been formed in the first instance. This plan had serveral advantages—amongst which he would allude to the opportunity it would afford him of gaining some little previous insight into a science which it was assumed to be the intention of his pupils to take up as a profession—of paving the road to future and severer study—and of gradually dispelling those scruples which it was no more than natural they should entertain, from the circumstance of their parentage, and hereditary prejudices in regard to the study of anatomy. The plan further gave to those native gentlemen who had been selected to aid Dr. Goodeve and himself, in their labors, a good opportunity of initiating themselves in the details and methods of teaching—and last, though not least, it afforded, to his colleague and himself, the means of qualifying and perfecting themselves as instructors in the various and difficult branches of Medical Science. For he was not ashamed to acknowledge that he looked to practice and experience in the art of teaching, as his chief aid towards the successful accomplishment of the arduous and important undertaking which he had to conduct.

Having thus briefly alluded to one or two points on which it was not his intention to enlarge for the present, he should now pass on to the more immediate objects of that day's discourse, namely, to give his pupils some idea of the important nature of their studies—to point out the advantages to be derived from close and zealous application—to explain briefly what would be expected from them as students, as well as what would be required from them hereafter, as practitioners in the healing art.

In lecturing on the science of anotomy, in what is generally understood by its regular course, it would, perhaps, behove him to begin, as had been customary amongst its Professors—with the History of Anatomy—taking a progressive view of its rise and progress in successive ages of civilization, beginning with those able anatomists among the ancients who had made themselves remarkable for their discoveries, and had laboured to prosecute or diffuse the kowledge of their art. But he must not forget, however desirable such information may be in ordinary cases, that he was placed there in a very different situation from that of a Professor in Europe. He must not forget that although surrounded by a number of intelligent youths, his class was composed of Asiatics, and that the medium of instruction was a language which was foreign to them—that their education in the elementary branches of general knowledge was as yet incomplete and imperfect, so that their minds could not yet be supposed prepared to receive with profit the information to which he alluded.

He should not then trouble them for the present at least, with a history of anatomical science. Because his immediate duty was to keep their minds constantly alive to those subjects, which they were then most capable of retaining in ready recollection, and to confine his discourses to such divisions and departments of the science, as it was absolutely necessary they should learn and understand, in order to qualify themselves as useful members of an honorable profession. His chief duty, in short, was simple, and could be explained in a few words. It was to fit them for the active and practical duties of medical men. In endeavoring to accomplish which, they might rely on his discretion not to attempt teaching them too much at first—he hoped he would avoid all imputation of professional vanity, if he considered the Science of Anatomy as one which more immediately than most others concerned the welfare of the human race. Even in the most early ages, before luxury had laid the foundation of many diseases now too prevalent in these days, and even in countries compartively remote from the influence of civilization, some knowledge of Anatomy, that is, of the structure of the human frame, must have been considered always of primary importance, in as much as self-preservation predominated over every other feeling and impulse, with exceptions too rare to be taken into account.

That science, therefore, which enabled them to afford bodily relief, to their afflicted fellow creatures, in cases of imminent danger, might well be considered as one of the first of useful acquirements. The subduing warrior, proud with conquest, would soon sink back to humble dust, but for the assistance of the Anatomists, when labouring under a dangerous wound or an oppressed brain—accidents which were incident to all mankind whether in polite or barbarous nations. The magnificent, gorgeous palace, and the bed of down, would oftentimes be found to afford even more short lived joys than the homely cot, without the succour of medical art.

When it was considered that the study of the medical profession, diligently pursued on scientific principles, enabled them by the removal of disease, to alleviate the greatest afflictions to which the human frame was exposed, they could not but feel a deep sense of the importance of that station, which they were destined to hold in the scale of society; nor could they avoid reflecting how all-important it was to establish the principles of the science on the most solid foundation. It was only by an accurate knowledge of the structure and functions of the human body in a state of health, that they could infer and judge of the nature of disease, and that they could qualify themselves to act upon just and rational principles in its treatment.

If those observations were true (and he had little fear of their meeting with denial) he could not avoid again adverting to the liberality of this Government in having bestowed upon medical education in this country so large a portion of public patronage. For it might be well known to all his pupils that among the very heads of their own community, where so much opulence was found and where so much extravagance of expenditure prevailed, that a miserable inattention existed, as to the nature and wants of medical science, though it was a matter in which every individual forming that community was more or less interested.

This inattention, this apathy, would be the less deplorable, if ignorance indeed were merely of a negative quality: if failing to do right, it forebore to do wrong—but in this, more than perhaps in almost any other country, it was, he regretted to say, most mischievously active, and greatly augmented the "ills which flesh is heir to."

To whose fostering care were the lives of thousands, aye, of millions, entrusted in India, under the various states of disease to which all, and every one of them, may one day or other become subject? To the wretched and ignorant empirics who infest every city, town, and village in these vast and populous territories—men eager to earn a profitable subsistence, at the expense of human suffering, yet content to remain grossly and darkly ignorant of the veriest rudiments and first principles of the healing art.

It would be illiberal in him to deny that there were exceptions to this description. But to what, he would ask, do even these rare examples amount! A mere sprinkling at most, of a few intelligent individuals who under the guidance of some natural turn for observation, aided by common sense, may have acquired some superficial knowledge of disease—such a smattering perhaps as to enable them to treat simple cases, on something approaching to rational principles, and so by relieving the sufferings of their fellow-creatures, obtain the confidence of their countrymen. But, after all, what were these among the number requiring medical aid!

It surely could not be wondered at that these empirics—quacks—should be extensively encouraged, so long as there were no competent and respectable practitioners in the art of medicine to fill their places. But, they would see what would be expected, if in course of time, that College should be the means of disseminating over this country a body of well qualified and efficient medical men. Why, independently of the advantages which must accrue both to the community and the practitioner, it may be hoped, indeed it may be expected, that the Government would extend its patronage in proposing some kind of legislative enactment, to prevent uneducated and unqualified persons from practising. This plan, he said, which at least had the recommendation of simplicity, had already been adopted in other countries with great success. In France, for instance, there was but one school, or faculty of medicine as it was called, one education, and one examination. After having undergone the latter, the individual may practise all branches of medical science, in any part of that country. But it was only those so educated, that were qualified to practise. It was the same in the United States of America, and he believed nearly so in the Universities of Germany: he wished he could say as much for England.

Now they might rest assured that those only who had studied the profession as a science were qualified to practise the healing art. It would always be required of such, that they be the respectful and observant followers of Nature. They would never presume to precede her, except to remove some impediment from her path, or to perform what she evidently indicated; but, as he had already said, in this country, the ignorant take the lead, place obstacles in the way of Nature's progress, and presume to direct her course. But they would find, as they advanced, that so admirably was man constituted, that the very actions of disease often tend to the restoration of health: yet these beneficial actions by the ignorant were deemed diseases—and were put a stop to—and far worse maladies established. Trifling diseases were suspended, they might call them cured, by means detructive to health and productive of lingering infirmities.

But before he quitted this subject, he would look to the metropolis of British India. To Calcutta itself. To whom do the majority of natives of rank and wealth, and intelligence in the present day, resort in times of severe sickness? To Europeans. And why, it may be asked, do these entrust their lives to the care of foreigners, whose very touch or even presence is apt to be considered a contamination? Not because the trusted physician is of European birth or extraction. Not because of preference to strangers over their own countrymen. But because the European is known to have received an education that vouches his fitness for his vocation. Because he has been sedulously taught his art on scientific principles. In short, simply because the knowledge he has acquired is well understood and believed to be built on a solid and sure foundation. But was this state of things right and natural? Should the moral condition of the natives subject them to this infringement on their hereditary or religious privileges? Certainly not. You, observed the lecturer, are the persons to whom the eyes of your own countrymen will be directed hereafter, as substitutes for European skill. It is you, who ought to supersede the foreigners, or enter into honorable rivalry with them. And, placing as I do the firmest reliance on your determination to prosecute your studies with zeal and perseverance, it is you who will ultimately supersede them.

Can it be credited that Egypt, which seven years ago possessed no kind of medical institution whatever, now boasts of a well-organized Medical Government, essentially superior in many respects to that of a nation which vaunts of its multitude of chartered corporations, professedly devoted to the cultivation of medical science? The latter remark, he was sorry to say, was in allusion to the public Hospitals and Medical Colleges of England. But he would see to what intent the tree of knowledge had been replanted in a country where it had perished ages since. What has sprung up in uncivilized Egypt! Why, an organized Medical School, embracing four distinct sections, which he proceeded to enumerate.

He hoped his puplis would not be led away with the idea that the science of medicine was to be learned by attending lectures. It was not by their daily attendance in that room, in mere compliance with the customary routine of study, that would avail, unless their attention was exclusively devoted to the subject before them. Lectures, like books, were only auxiliaries to the practical study of disease: but the medical sciences rested chiefly on observation, and were only to be acquired by resorting to Nature.

A course of lectures should contain a general, but not minute exposition of the science, a discussion of the principal doctrines, a methodical arrangement of the subject, and such a collection of knowledge from various quarters as was calculated to exhibit the present state of the art, and so arranged as to suit the capacities and minds of the pupils. But the rest which was necessary they should know, and which was by far the most essential part, must be supplied through the active exercise of their own industry and energy.

It was not then lectures or writings that would qualify them as medical practitioners. Nor indeed was it a knowledge of Anatomy and Physiology alone which could teach them that of disease. The question then is, how were they to be taught this? by studying the book of Nature, lectures and books, though they may be useful, are but secondary importance in comparison with the observation of disease. It was of course necessary, in the first instance, to acquire some knowledge of Anatomy and Physiology, which were the great ground-works of Medical Science, before they could turn their observation of disease to a profitable account. No mechanic would think of repairing a watch or a clock, who was not well versed in all its parts, its movements, and its connections: the same with respect to the human body, no persons was able to cure its different diseases without his being acquainted with the structure of the whole. But having gained this knowledge, his pupils would be able to judge of the distinctions between health and disease—and it was then that much would depend on their observation, for they must see which, and examine the sick patients for themselves. A large Hospital, then, they would soon discover, was the best school of medicine, and clinical instruction, under the guidance of a competent teacher, was the best and surest mode of learning. The facts, thus presented to the senses, make a much stronger impression than any description. The immediate appeal to Nature, which the presence of the sick patient affords, and the close attention of intelligent students, supply at once a salutary excitement to the preceptor and pupil. A few cases attentively observed would teach them more than any lectures or books. For if they attended to Nature with an unprejudiced eye, they could not go astray. To secure these advantages to their full extent, he was happy in being able to inform them, that the arrangements made by Government, for the practical instruction of the pupils of that College, were ample. Besides the valuable sources which would hereafter become available, as the European General Hospital, the Native Hospital and its dependent Dispensaries, the Eye Infirmary, all of which were under the superintendence of the most experienced men in this country, a Hospital, containing a large average number of patients, was to be established on the premises adjoining the Medical College. This would prove a valuable acquisition, as, independent of its affording ample means of practical instruction, the pupils during the early part of their studies would be saved the time and trouble for seeking the same information from a distance, while their attendance would be conducted on all occasions in the presence of their instructors.

With reference to the plan of instruction and the regulations by which this would be guided, so much would depend on circumstances which were likely to arise as they would proceed, and which at that time could not be reckoned on, that he had thought it advisable to defer drawing up a prospectus until sufficient progress had been made in his arrangements, to admit of his plans being regulated by a fixed code. On their doing so, depended, in a great measure, the preservation of that regularity of attendance, and good moral general conduct which he would ever hope strictly to maintain within those walls.

Their attendance would not be required for more than 1½ hour each day for the present; and he would endeavour to keep to this limit probably for the first twelve months, that is, as regards what would be considered public instruction, in order that they might have as much time as possible to devote to a continuation of their general studies. He would exhort all of them, who had the opportunity of improving themselves in general knowledge, whether at school or at their own homes, to make the best use of the intervening time, for the greater store of general information they acquired, the better would they be prepared to meet, and receive with profit, the numberless difficulties they would have to contend with, in seeking to gain an adequate knowledge of Medical Science ere they would be qualified as practitioners. Furthermore this opportunity of improving their general education was perhaps the last they would have, because by and bye the necessity would arise to oblige them to devote their exclusive time to Medical Science, that is, if they were ambitious of becoming efficient practitioners.

He would conclude that day's discourse, then, by assuring them with all possible sincerity that his associate Dr. Goodeve and himself partook out of the common spirit by which every teacher should be actuated, viz. that in urging men on to study with zeal, perseverance, and assiduity, their best efforts would be directed to the improvement of those who commit their education to their charge. For they felt that the success of that institution, which was so fully calculated to aid the course of useful information amongst the natives of this country, would mainly depend on the friendly relation, which he hoped to establish and support, between the teacher and pupil. Thus by mutual aid, and by a common interest, he might hope to contract that friendly intercourse, which might prove a lasting source of gratification and advantage to them both.

It was very probable there would be many points in his lectures, both in regard to language and the details of the science, which he might have failed to describe with sufficient clearness to meet their understanding. If these should occur, or rather he should have said when these occur, he trusted they would not reconcile themselves to continue in uncertainty about them. He advised them on all occasions to reject, without ceremony, any delicacy which would prevent them from applying to Dr. Goodeve or himself for further explanation. So far from his being averse to these inquiries, he would receive them as a gratifying proof of their zealous attachment to their profession, and of their determination to understand it.

Lastly, he would impress on their minds the serious nature of the studies they were about to enter upon, and to exhort them to employ most diligently the short, he would almost say, too short period of time, that they would have to devote to the purpose of rendering them able to take upon themselves the active duties of their profession. They might believe him when he said that the study of medicine was a most arduous undertaking. He did not wish to discourage them when he told them that it would occupy persons of great mind and shining talents many years to master it, and bring up their knowledge to the present state of the Science. It was, however, a salutary and pleasing exercise of the mind, while the practice of the profession called forth all the better feelings of their nature. In some respects they enjoy peculiar advantages: they were employed in the study and contemplation of nature, and the investigation of truth. They were not called upon to defend doctrines or systems, nor to uphold any particular set of opinions. They had no interests at variance with those of the community at large. In professional intercourse with their fellow creatures they were known only as the instruments of good—as the means of restoring or securing health, the greatest of blessings—of alleviating or removing pain and sickness, the greatest of evils, and to soothe the acute anguish which relations and friends feel for each other. Not only the happiness or the misery of life, but the very question of life and death often depended on their judgment and exertions.

Observe, said the lecturer, the responsibility, belonging to those decisions, on which it would depend, whether a beloved husband or wife should be saved; whether children should be restored to their anxious parents, or parents be preserved for the benefit of their offspring. He trusted, that bearing in mind the serious nature of these duties, they would eagerly embrace every opportunity of gaining that knowledge which would qualify them for discharging them effectively.

They would thus become respected members of an honorable profession, and they would prepare for themselves in the decline of life the sweetest of all rewards, the retrospect of labours, devoted to the good of others. —India Journal of Medical Science.

PUBLIC MEETING—THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

A public meeting took place on Thursday, the 20th of August, convened by the Sheriff, to take into consideration the best mode of testifying the public satisfaction at the repeal of the Laws which have hitherto restrained the Freedom of the Press, and the enactment of a law by which that freedom is rendered reasonably secure.

THE SHERIFF IN THE CHAIR.

The requisition having been read,

Mr. H. M. Parker rose, and after briefly alluding to a notice, recently circulated, of a Public Library, said, that a resolution had been assigned to him not certainly to propose the establishment of such an institution, but to submit that this community should mark the Emancipation of the Press, by the erection of a public building, which, if the meeting were so disposed, might be appropriated for the reception of a public library. This, as many of the meeting were aware, had already been proposed by a gentleman who gave his name H. M. P.; but an objection had been started in the pages of a journal famous for fancy, wit, and good taste, that the building was too utilitarian, and would not be sufficiently ornamental for the purpose it was intended to commemorate. He, Mr. Parker, did not expect to find much that was utilitarian in the pages of the journal to which he had alluded, nor could he imagine, if a beautiful building is considered adapted for the purpose, why the one now proposed may not be made as ornamental as circumstances and situation will permit. If either the Parthenon or St. Peters were considered adapted to the purpose, he would be very glad to see them removed; or he would be glad if another building were erected here equal to either of those; despairing, however, of attaining his wish, he would be content with something inferior, though he confessed, when he looked at the Ochterlony Pillar and its incomplete state, he blushed with shame. But to leave this subject, he would read the resolution he had the honor to propose for the meeting's adoption:—

"That a Public Subscription be opened for the erection of a building, which shall be called 'The Metcalfe Library,' and that on the portico or some other conspicuous part of the building, the object of its erection, to wit, In commemoration of the Freedom of the Indian Press having been recognized by Law under the Government of Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe, shall be recorded by a suitable inscription."

"That the building, which shall be ornamental and commodious, be offered free of rent and in trust for the reception of a Public Subscription Library, to be formed on a scale, and conducted in a liberal manner, worthy of this metropolis. The Metcalfe Library to be so offered free of rent and in trust on condition"—

"First, that the Edifice be kept in repair from the funds of such Library."

"Second, that a provision be made for opening the library, and allowing the use of books gratis to poor students, whether Native, East Indian, or European, belonging to any College, or any Public School of Medicine, now established, or which may be hereafter founded in Calcutta. The privilege being granted under such precautions to prevent its being abused, as the committee presiding over the affairs of the library shall desire."

"Third, that in matters connected with the Library all possible accommodation and facility be afforded to respectable strangers visiting this city, either from the interior, the other Indian Presidencies, or from other countries."

Baboo Russomoy Dutt seconded the resolution.

Mr. Longueville Clarke was perfectly unprepared for this proposal, but would be ashamed of himself,—ashamed to be considered an Englishman, if he was not perfectly prepared to support a proposal so worthy of the object it was intended to commemorate, and so deserving of the city of which the inhabitants had shewn the value they place upon the liberty of the press, by the perseverance with which they had contended for it. He knew of no measure which would shew the feelings of the inhabitants of British India,—which would better show the estimation in which they held the liberty of the press, than by the establishment of a public library; but he did not think it sufficient to give the library merely the name of the individual to whom they were indebted for that liberty, and he would suggest that a marble tablet ought to be erected, on which should be inscribed the letter which first communicated to them the determination of the legislature. Those gentlemen who have been in London would remember that Beckford's reply to his sovereign at the time he considered an attempt was made by the minister on the liberties of the people, was recorded on a tablet in one of the public buildings. He need not detain them further with remarks on that subject, or indeed dwell at length on the utility of a public library, but this he might say, that if there was any part of the world in which such an institution would be useful in cultivating European ideas, Science, and notions it would be in this city; and he was sure, that the principle of having it open to all the community, as his friend proposed it should be, was the best principle on which it could be founded. Heartily would he support the project, and he was quite sure, when he thought of its importance,—when he thought of the number of inhabitants of this town who were desirous to show their gratitude to the statesman who had bestowed the freedom of the press, sure he was that they could not do better than accede to his friend's proposal.

The resolution was then put and carried, and after some conversation the suggestion made by Mr. Clarke was left to a committee, and the following resolution, moved by Mr. J. Sutherland and seconded by Mr. L. Clarke, was put and carried nem. con.:—

"That the following gentlemen be appointed a committee to collect the subscriptions, arrange the details, and superintend the construction of the building, and to carry into effect the objects in the foregoing resolutions; adopting such measures as may appear best calculated to promote them according to their spirit."

| T. E. M. Turton, Esq. | Baboo Russumoy Dutt. |
| Captain W. N. Forbes, | |
| J. Prinsep, Esq. | |

And on the motion of Mr. Pattle, seconded by Mr. Clarke, Mr. J. Sutherland was added to the committee.

Dr. Corbyn fully agreed with the proposers and seconders of the two preceding resolutions, convinced as he was, that this method of commemorating the freedom of the press in this country must be highly gratifying to Sir Charles Metcalfe, who, it was evident, considered the freedom of the press as necessary to the spread of knowledge. A better measure could not have been proposed; but he wished to remind the meeting that though a Library would be an advantage to those who were educated, it did not afford an opportunity of acquiring knowledge to those who were not. He did not press his suggestion under any idea or wish to divert the attention of the meeting from the object which had been introduced and had met with the approbation of this community, but he thought it was a fit opportunity to remind the meeting that there did not exist in this community a charitable institution in which those who were at present without knowledge could receive instruction, or an institution to impart instruction in the learned professions. He had for a length of time felt desirous to see a University of India instituted in Calcutta, and as the advancement of learning was in consonance with the freedom of the press, he thought this was a fitting opportunity to agitate the subject, or at least to bring it to the notice of those who were better able to support it than he was.

Mr. Pattle would not detain the meeting, but follow the excellent example of the learned gentleman who had preceded him, for it seemed that long speeches had at length entirely gone out of fashion, and an expeditious method of doing business was to be the practice for the future. Mr. Clarke had reminded the meeting of the reply of Beckford, and as this building in which they were assembled was the Guild Hall, or rather the Town Hall, of this community, he thought it the most appropriate place for a tablet on which Sir Charles Metcalfe's reply ought to be inscribed, and he would propose that such tablet be erected. Of course, he made his proposition under the idea that there would be a large surplus of subscription for the erection of a building for the reception of a library; for he could not anticipate that there would be small subscription to commemorate the bestowal of a benefit so extensive, universal, and gratifying to every class of the people; nay, he anticipated that there would be a surplus not only sufficient to enable them to place a mural tablet, but also a statue as noble as that of Cornwallis which now adorns the Town Hall. Mr. Pattle then proposed a resolution in substance as follows:—

"That after carrying the objects of the preceding resolutions into effect, should the funds be found insufficient for a statue, that an ornamental tablet of marble be affixed in a conspicuous part of the Town Hall, on which shall be engraved Sir Charles Metcalfe's letter, and the Act under which the Press of all India is declared free by law."

Mr. Longueville Clarke begged leave to say a few words before this resolution was put by the Sheriff. If they were to have a building for the reception of a library, that building ought to be as complete as possible; but he knew not how it could be considered complete if it were without a tablet on which the Magna Charta of the fredom of the press was inscribed. [Mr. Pattle. "We can have a tablet in both places."] To that proposition he would not object, provided it was a sine qua non that the building for the library was completed before any part of the funds was appropriated to another purpose. Recurring to what had fallen from Mr. Pattle with regard to this building being the Town Hall, he would admit that it bore the name of the Town Hall of this community, but so far from being their property, it was in the power of Government at any moment to put a padlock on the door and prevent any person entering it. It was a mere name for the place and nothing more. Like the Lottery Committee, the Town Hall appeared that which in reality it was not; for as the funds of the Lottery instead of being appropriated to the improvement of Calcutta were sent home in silk and indigo, so might the community be excluded at any time from the Hall which purported to be their property. He remembered the time when the community were about to meet here on the question of the Stamp Act, and were threatened to be dismissed by the bayonets of His Majesty's 14th Regiment, and he believed that but for the patriotism of one of the magistrates at the police office that threat would have been carried into execution. On that occasion they were obliged to meet in the Exchange; and he would ask, if a place from which they could be excluded by Government, when exercising the constitutional privilege of Englishmen, was one in which it is fitting to erect a tablet, inscribed with the Magna Charta of the freedom of the Press of India? While he was addressing the meeting he would take the liberty to say a few words with regard to what had fallen from another agitator, who had proposed to establish something, he did not know whether it was a school or university. But he would remind that gentleman of the homely adage, that it was necessary "to cut the coat according to the cloth," and he feared that gentleman, if he imagined this community could raise a fund to establish and maintain an university, would find that with the numerous calls upon them, the project would dwindle into an infant school. He had heard of a gentleman who informed a public meeting that some children were so favourable to the advancement of religion as to refrain from eating butter that the money might be laid out in purchasing bibles; this gentleman was afterwards known by the name of the "Bread and Butter Orator," and though he, Mr. Clarke, would not call his friend so, he must say, that the proposition savoured of A. B. C. philosophy. That his friend Dr. Corbyn had deservedly a great deal of influence in Calcutta, he, Mr. Clarke, thought all who knew him must readily admit, as well as that he gave a great deal of his time to the cause of education; but he entreated the meeting not to be diverted from commemorating the freedom of the press in the manner that had been proposed. He was also desirous to say that many years ago, he had contemplated the establishment of a public library, and he would be ready to lay before the committee the plan he had then proposed, which would prove that in ten years a library may be established containing 100,000 volumes. But his proposition did not meet with proper support in those days, indeed, he might say it was opposed. It did not suit the temper of the times ten years ago to countenance a library to be established on the principle of no exclusion—that horrible destructive principle,—and it was not tolerated for an instant. But now, thank God! that feeling had departed never to return. He might also state that ten years ago he had proposed amongst his own professional friends, a library for a particular class of books, which had succeeded so far as to contain at the present moment no less than 2,000 volumes, although the books were of the most expensive class, and were only to be purchased by paying eighty per cent. dearer for them in this country than in England. Now, if ten gentlemen in ten years could purchase 2,000 books of the most expensive class, he did not think that he was under the mark in saying that in two years a library might be formed by the united exertions of this community which would be worthy of this city.

Mr. Pattle explained. His proposition to have a tablet in this Hall was, as indeed he thought he had plainly stated before, to depend entirely on there being a surplus after the building for the library was completed. He could not agree with what had fallen from Mr. Clarke regarding the Lottery Committee, for he thought the exertions of that committee had effected a great deal not only in the formation of large squares and the effecting of other visible improvements, but in the clearing away of marshy lands, and thereby rendering the city much more salubrious. He also believed that Mr. Clarke was mistaken in stating that the committee had sent the profits of the lotteries home in silk and indigo, nor did he hear before of any intention to dismiss the stamp meeting by force; and as to the mistake in calling this building the Town Hall, it did not rest with him, Mr. Pattle, but with their worthy Sheriff, who inserted the misnomer in the advertisement. (Laughter.) But why this earnestness? He had submitted a simple proposition for the meeting to adopt or reject, and that was all. However, as his friend had told them a pleasant story, perhaps he, Mr. Pattle, might be permitted to remind the meeting of a tale told by Lucian:—Jupiter and a Countryman were conversing together with great freedom and familiarity upon the subject of heaven and earth. The Countryman listened with attention and acquiescence whilst Jupiter strove only to convince him, but happening to hint a doubt, Jupiter turned hastily round and threatened him with his thunder. "Ah, ah!" says the countryman, "now Jupiter I know you are wrong; you are always wrong when you appeal to your thunder." It is thus, said Mr. Pattle, with my friend Mr. Clarke, you may always tell when he is wrong, when he quits his subject to commence his thunder by referring to circumstances which have no connection with the question under discussion.—(Much Laughter.)

Dr. Corbyn thought Mr. Clarke must have mistaken the few observations which he had ventured to submit to the meeting, for so far from attempting to divert the attention of the meeting from the establishment of a public library, he gave the proposition his cordial support. He merely wished to bring to the notice of the meeting that there was no institution here for giving instruction to those who had no knowledge at all, and, perhaps, he might have done so more effectually had he been heard without interruption. As it was, he was quite at a loss to know why the learned gentleman thought he was an "agitator," for nothing was more foreign to his intention than to endeavour to repeal the union, happily existing between the friends of freedom and the friends of education.

Mr. Turton was quite sure that his friend Mr. Clarke intended to say that Dr. Corbyn was an agitator only of useful objects. With regard to the Lottery Committee, his friend was mistaken in saying that the funds went home in silk and indigo, as those funds, though they were raised under false pretences, were not sent home, but were paid to Government in liquidation of a very considerable sum lent to the committee, but which loan the Court of Directors had refused to accept.

Mr. Osborne had been listening for some time to these proceedings with great attention, and would now take leave to express his unfeigned astonishment at the result, which, so far as he could understand, after much pondering, appeared to be, that the meeting in order to express their gratitude to Sir Charles Metcalfe had determined to avail themselves of his name to raise money for a public library. (Much Laughter) and the only advantage Sir Charles was to receive, was to be stuck up against one of the walls. He thought a better testimony of their respect might have been proposed than this, which indeed from these proceedings, did not appear likely to be carried into effect in a very warm or grateful manner.

Mr. Parker said the gentleman who was in opposition, now and ever, did not appear exactly to understand the proposal which he had submitted to the meeting. It was not to subscribe for a public library but for a building to receive one.

Some conversation took place at this time in which Mr. Pote, Mr. Turton, and Mr. Judge took part, the latter, as we understood, expressed himself strongly in favor of the proposal contained in the resolution proposed by Mr. Parker at the commencement of the proceedings. Mr. Pattle then remodelled his resolution which was seconded by Dukinamundur Mookerjee and put and carried.

The resolution is as follows:—

"That the Committee be instructed to apply to Sir Charles Metcalfe, for permission to place his Statue or Bust in the contemplated Building, with an appropriate Inscription, and that the Inscription in question shall include Sir Charles Metcalfe's Letter of the 20th June last, and the act under which the Press of all India is declared free by Law."

Mr. Pote suggested that two rooms in the building should be appropriated one for painting and the other for an exhibition room, and proposed a resolution to that effect which was seconded by Mr. Crow, but opposed by Mr. Turton and Mr. Clarke, and lost by a large majority.

Mr. James Sutherland said, there seemed to be some little diversity of opinion regarding the resolution he was about to propose, which was to celebrate the day on which the press was made free in this country, according to the good old English custom, by having a public dinner. He did not see any particular necessity of making this resolution a part of these proceedings, but it was perhaps as well to do so, in order that it might be understood that the aristocratic feeling did not pervade, and that it was the desire of the friends of freedom to see all classes join in the rejoicings. Mr. Sutherland proposed the following resolution:—

"That the following gentlemen be appointed by this meeting a committee, with power to add to their numbers for the purpose of promoting a public illumination and subscription dinner to be given on the 15th September to celebrate the freedom of the press in India.

| T. E. M. Turton, Esq. | H. Torrens, Esq. |
| H. M. Parker, Esq. | Captain J. T. Taylor. |
| T. Dickens, Esq. | J. Kyd, Esq. |

Mr. J. D. M. Sinaes briefly seconded the resolution.

Mr. Turton supported the motion, because it was the mode generally adopted at home, and one too, that did not call for the sacrifice of time which should be devoted to business, and besides a public dinner was one of those occasions when men's hearts were open, and no doubt, they would rise from it with their hands open also, and afterwards make a liberal subscription. It was the mode adopted here on receiving intelligence of the French Revolution, and were the meeting more interested in that event, glorious as it was, than in an event in which they were more immediately concerned, and which came home to their own bosoms? At that time the foreigners in the neighbourhood joined in their rejoicings, and he had no doubt, but that they would, in the present instance, show the same sympathy for us that we felt for them several years ago.

Mr. L. Clarke opposed the resolution, which was supported by Mr. Pattle and Mr. Sutherland. Dwarkanauth Tagore said, that if the natives were to vote on this occasion, the resolution would be lost by a large majority.

Mr. Turton, with reference to what had fallen from Dwarkanauth Tagore, asked if he meant to call upon the natives to prevent the Europeans celebrating the event in their own peculiar manner? Did he mean to say the natives felt no interest with the Europeans, or that because they could not participate in the same mode of expressing the pleasure they felt it was a matter of total indifference to the native community? If the natives could not participate with the Christians, it would be mere becoming in them to retire and not vote at all. But let the natives halt and let Dwarkanauth Tagore halt also, for Englishmen were not backward in expressing their sympathy, or stood upon their prejudices when native feelings or native interest were concerned.

After some further discussion in which Mr. Clarke, Mr. Speed, and Dwarkanauth Tagore took part;

Mr. C. Thackeray, alluding to the national customs of Englishmen, thought they would rather honor the great object by a fast than deride it by a feast. They might rejoice with all their souls but not with all their bodies too; and with reference to the willingness expressed by one gentleman to be present, if the natives offered a sacrifice to Kali of a buffaloe, he, Mr. Thackeray, would not be present lest they should make him a piece offering. (Loud Laughter.)

The resolution was then put and carried by a large majority, and after a vote of thanks to the Sheriff, the meeting separated.—Englishman.

MEETING OF THE PROPRIETORS OF THE CHOWRINGHEE THEATRE.

The annual meeting of the Proprietors of the Theatre on the 3d August was numerously attended, but the protracted discussion, of five hours' duration, will only allow us to give a brief summary of the proceedings. Colonel Beatson was called to the chair, and after a few observations from several gentlemen, with regard to the chairman's right to vote, it was finally determined, that he did possess that right, but that, when the division was equal he had not power to give a casting vote.

The annual report of the Managers was then read.

The Report having been read, Mr. C. R. Prinsep solicited further explanation with reference to an item of the expenditure, from which it appeared there had been an increase of the Secretary's salary to the amount of Rs. 50 per month. Mr. Clarke stated, that the Secretary had formerly received Rs. 200 per mensem, and the use of the Theatre annually for a benefit, but Mr. Farmer had returned from England too late in the season to have what was considered an advantageous benefit, the managers had therefore determined to increase his salary Rs. 50 per mensem, with the understanding that he should not have the use of the house for a benefit previously to January 1836, Mr. C. R. Prinsep expressed himself satisfied with this explanation. In the course of the discussion it appeared that a considerable saving had been effected since the Secretary's return from England in the getting up of several plays. Mr. Thomas Fergusson thought that the management had not been sufficiently liberal to Mr. Farmer, but from a further explanation that followed, it appeared Mr. Fergusson had not exactly understood what had fallen from Mr. Clarke with reference to this subject, and at a subsequent period, the report of the managers was approved and confirmed nem. con.

Mr. W. P. Grant then brought forward the subject of the letting of the Theatre to the Italian Opera Committee, and the resolution of the last meeting authorizing the managers to let the Theatre till the 1st of October at Rs- 100 per night was read by the Secretary. Mr. Grant proceeded to lay before the meeting the present state and prospects of the Opera Committee, distinctly disclaiming any intention to revive the bickering, and bad blood which had been displayed on a preceding occasion. He referred to the following resolution, at a meeting of four of the managers, on Thursday, the 30th October, 1834.

"The Committee of Management of the Chowringhee Dramatic Society are prepared to let the theatre for English performances from the 1st of March to the 31st of October on the terms and conditions following:

For any one night during the months of November, December, January and February 400 Rs.

For any one night in October or March 300 Rs.

For any one night during the remaining months of the year 200 Rs.

If the house be hired for any number of nights more than one and less than five, then 10 per cent. to be deducted from the nightly rent.

If the house be hired for any number of nights more than four and less than nine, then twenty per cent. to be deducted from the nightly rent."

Mr. Grant denied that the Italian Opera Committee were opposed to the legitimate English drama, or had an antipathy to the views entertained by the majority of the play going inhabitants of Calcutta; he contended that it would be breaking faith with the Opera Committee, if the Proprietary did not consider themselves bound by the proceedings of the managers in October, 1834, as above set forth, for with a knowledge of those resolutions, the Opera Committee had commenced operations. He did not think that the Italian performances would interfere with the successful and profitable representations of the English drama, and claimed as a right, on behalf of the Opera Committee, that the house should be let to them in the terms of the above resolutions, which, he said, was perfectly consistent with fairness and good faith. He also entered into an explanation of the state of the Committee's finances which exhibited a balance of Rs- 180 only on the profit side of the ledger, and after setting forth that the Committee were bound to pay the performers their salaries, strongly urged that after the Committee had got themselves up to the neck on the good faith of the resolutions of October, 1834, it would be unfair for the Proprietary to come forward and rescind them. Mr. Grant concluded by proposing a resolution of which the following is the substance:—

"That the application of the Italian Opera Committee for the use of the Theatre be accepted in the terms of the meeting of the Managers in October, 1834."

Mr. Thomas Fergusson seconded this resolution, which he hoped would be carried without any display of acrimonious feeling in a meeting of gentlemen, many of whom had been delighted with the representations of the Opera, though from the smile on the countenance of the worthy chairman, it was possible he might not be amongst the number. Colonel Beatson pleasantly replied that it was the general rule for gentlemen to smile when they were pleased, a remark the truth of which Mr. Fergusson as pleasantly admitted, and concluded with complimenting the Opera Committee on their exertions in overcoming an amazing deal of trouble, calling on the proprietary not to come to any vote which must lead to the total extinction of this delightful amusement.

This brought up Mr. Turton, who entirely disagreed with both of the preceding speakers, as to the right of the Committee to have the Theatre on the terms of the resolutions of 1834, but he was quite willing to lay aside all allusions to former proceedings and begin the fight de novo. However, because the Opera Committee had got into the mud, he never could allow it to be said that they had a right to the Theatre ad infinitum on the terms which it had been agreed to let it a year previously. But the resolutions referred to by Mr. Grant were not really the resolutions of the management. However, setting that aside, no man or set of men were bound ad infinitum to the terms to which they might have previously agreed. Those resolutions arose out of his own determined opposition to the letting of the Theatre at any price during the cold season, but his feelings got the better of his discretion, and he had conceded so far, on the representations of Colonel Young, as to agree that it should be let for French and Italian performances. Besides he thought it was rather strange that 250 gentlemen of Calcutta who had subscribed for a series of operas at an expense of Rs- 2,200 for each opera, should take into consideration the claims of Mrs. Atkinson, the serpents, double bass, &c., and yet have no feeling for the management. If those gentlemen liked the Italian Opera, he was sure they differed from a great number of people,—for his part he would rather have both, English and Italian, performances,—but it was not to be denied that the latter were contrary to the taste of the community generally, and that being the case he did not think it would be fair to let the house for less than Rs- 200 for each representation. Mr. Turton also entered into an examination of the financial statement put forth by Mr. W. P. Grant, and attributed the small apparent profit, to the Committee having entertained Mr. Leyding on a salary of Rs- 100 per month at a time when they might have dispensed with his services.

Mr. W. P. Grant rose to reply, and a great deal of confusion ensued, which the chairman at length put a stop to by peremptorily refusing to enter into the subject of the accounts of the Italian Committee.

After a great deal of interruption, Mr. Turton continued and called on Mr. Grant to shew by what principle of law or equity could it be shewn by any other than Italian maniacs,—Loud cries of "order," "order," prevented our hearing the remainder of the sentence; but we understood the learned gentleman contended that the resolutions of October, 1834, supposing them to be the resolutions of the management, might be rescinded at any moment by the Proprietary without a breach of good faith with the Italian Committee. He concluded by proposing an amendment that the house be let for Rs- 200 per night. After a few words from Mr. C. R. Prinsep, who thought if the Italian Opera Committee had been misled by the proceedings of the managers, they had a claim to the indulgence of the Proprietary, Mr. Osborne declared that he could not concur in Mr. Turton's amendment, which, it appeared to him, would greatly interfere with English performances at the Theatre. He understood that on former occasions the amount paid for one night's rent of the house during the cold season was Rs- 400, and why the Italians were to be placed on a better footing than the meritorious English actresses surpassed his comprehension. Was it because the Opera was more popular than the English drama?—On the last occasion there was one solitary lady in black in the pit; this, together with the admission by Mr. Grant, with regard to the amount on the credit side of the ledger, did not impress him with a very high opinion of the Opera's popularity. Perhaps the public did not possess the high and delicate taste which distinguished the Committee, and he confessed, for his own part, that the Italian Opera, as represented here, was a performance from which he did not derive any very great degree of pleasure, but that might arise from his own limited power of distinguishing the merits of the performers, to which, indeed, as yet he was stone blind or rather stone deaf. Mr. Osborne intimated that he would propose at a subsequent period, that the house should not be let under Rs- 400 per night, but afterwards he was induced to withhold this resolution.

Mr. Clarke now rose, but the cries of "divide" "divide" prevented our hearing what he said. When the uproar had subsided, we found him referring to the accounts of the Theatre, and arguing that the yearly receipts now were much less than on former occasions, and that the Italian and French performances had greatly interfered, with the profitable representations of the English drama. As for the right of the Opera Committee, it was sheer humbug and trash, the Proprietary having clearly a right to rescind any regulation that may have been carried in the management. Only suppose, gentlemen, said Mr. Clarke, that Mr. Grant authorizes his steward to let his house for a certain period, and the steward lets it for a longer period though the other party knows he is not authorised to do so, is Mr. Grant to be bound by the agreement of his servant?

After a few words from Mr. Grant, Mr. Parker, in order to get rid of all difficulty regarding the resolution of October, 1834, proposed the following, which was seconded by Mr. O'Hanlon, and after several alterations stood as follows:—

"Resolved that the resolutions of the managers dated October, 1834, be cancelled."

Mr. W. P. Grant did not oppose this amendment, but stated his determination to take the sense of the meeting on the resolution he had previously proposed. But afterwards an irregular discussion took place, and Mr. W. P. Grant and several others determined to oppose this amendment. It was however ultimately carried by a majority of 35 to 24.

Mr. Turton then proposed that the Italians should have the house for 200 Rs. per night, during November, December, and January, and for 100 per night, during any other season of the year. Mr. James Prinsep proposed, as an amendment, that the house should be let for 100 Rs. per night. A sharp discussion followed, during which Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore intimated his intention of proposing that the Theatre should be sold, and Mr. H. M. Parker, gove notice that he intended to move for a call of Rs. 200 on each share. Mr. Turton's motion was carried, as also was Mr. Parker's and after a long discussion it was determined by a majority of 32 to 24, that the Theatre should be put up at auction sometime previous to the 1st proximo, and sold if any offer exceeded the upset price Rs. 30,000.

Mr. Stocqueler then brought forward a motion founded on an application for the use of the Theatre, for one night, for a benefit in aid of the fund for the relief of the Cape sufferers. This application was referred to the general meeting by the management, and he now proposed that the house be let for one night for that purpose at the rent of Rs. 200.

Mr. Clarke seconded the motion, which was warmly supported by Mr. Tutton, Mr. Parker and several other gentlemen. Mr. J. P. Grant, Mr. Walker, Mr. Osborne and others thought it was a subject on which the management alone ought to determine. But on a division there appeared for the motion 13 against it 9.

A letter from Mrs. Leach was read, requesting that the amount of her remuneration, viz. Rs. 100 for each night of her performance, might be laid before the proprietary, with a request that it might be taken into consideration, and a regular monthly stipend substituted. The matter was referred to the managers.

A resolution to put a stop to all disbursements till the result of the auction be known was agreed to, and the meeting was adjourned till the 14th proximo.—Englishman.

A meeting of the former proprietors of the Chowringhee Theatre was held on the 21st August at the Town Hall, according to advertisement. Mr. Longueville Clarke briefly explained the result of the sale of the property,—and shewed that, after deducting from the price of 30,100 rupees the sale charges and expenses of establishment, and those already incurred towards the repairs of the roof. there remained for each share the net sum of Rs. 289-12, which, at the suggestion of Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore, it was resolved, should be paid on or after Monday next, on application at the office of Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., without charge of any kind, by draft upon the Union Bank.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. Clarke and seconded by Mr. P. A. Cavorke, was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved,—That the surviving trustees Trevor John Chicheley Plowden and Horace Hayman Wilson, do convey the Theatre and Premises of the Chowringhee Threatre, together with all the furniture, scenery, machinery, goods and chattels pertaining thereto, and in the preceding articles of agreement described, to Henry Meredith Parker, Dwarkanauth Tagore and Longueville Clarke, by whom the same had been purchased, which resolution was signed by all the gentlemen present.

The thanks of the old proprietary were then voted to their Managers, and the meeting broke up, those who ceased to have an interest in the house being ceremoniously bowed out of the room by the new shareholders, the latter very graciously giving them permission to use their free tickets for to-night.

The gentlemen who remained, namely, Messrs. T. Plowden, W. P. Palmer, W. Bracken, W. N. Hedger, James Young, H. M. Parker, P. A. Cavorke, M. M. Manuk, T. Holroyd, L. Clarke, Dwarkanauth Tagore, and J. A. Currie, then voted Mr. Plowden into the chair, and adopted the following resolutions, with the name of "The Calcutta Dramatic Society" for their new association:

Proposed by Mr. Cavorke, seconded by Mr. Manuk,

That the following gentlemen be appointed a Committee to prepare the draft of a deed of co-partnership for the Calcutta Dramatic Society:—Mr. Longueville Clarke, Mr. W. Carr, Mr. H. M. Parker.

That on the draft of the Deed being prepared, a Meeting be called to consider and adopt or modify the same.

Resolved,—That such of the late Managers as are Proprietors in the New Calcutta Dramatic Society, continue in charge of the management for the present.

That the establishment of the Theatre continue on its present footing until the next meeting of the Society.

Resolved,—That Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co. be requested to receive the amount price of the shares—and that the Union Bank be the Treasurers of the Calcutta Dramatic Society.

Resolved,—That the proprietors of the Calcutta Dramatic Society do pay the price of their respective shares, viz. one thousand sicca rupees, into the hands of Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co. on or before the 1st September next.

Resolved,—That three hundred rupees per share on account of the repairs of the Theatre be paid by 5th of October 1835. The amount to be collected by the Secretary and paid into the Union Bank,

Resolved,—That a circular letter be addressed to all the subscribers to the fund, for the repairs of the late Chowringhee Theatre, informing them of the formation of the Calcutta Dramatic Society, and requesting that they would not withdraw the amount of their contributions, but permit them to be applied to the purposes for which they were subscribed, it being the intention of the New Society to continue the repairs of the Theatre and to contribute among themselves 300 Rs a share for that purpose.—Calcutta Courier.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a meeting of the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta, held at the Asiatic Society's apartments, on the 1st of August, 1835.

G. Paton, Esq., M. D., proposed at last meeting was elected a Member of the Society.

The following Gentlemen were proposed as Members of the Society, viz.

David Trail, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon Madras Establishment, by Dr. Mouat and Mr. Hutchinson.

James Hamlyn, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon Madras Establishment, by Dr. Mouat and Dr. Wallich.

H. R. Bond, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon Bengal Establishment by Mr. Twining, and Mr. Egerton, and

H. Bousfield, Esq., Assitant-Surgeon by Dr. Corbyn and Mr. Hutchinson.

Authentic information having been received of the death of the late Major-General Hardwicke, one of the Honorary Members of the Society, the Secretary intimated to the meeting, that the committee of management had unanimously determined to recommend to the favourable notice of the Society Doctor Robert Brown, the celebrated Botanist and Naturalist, as a fit successor; Dr. Brown was accordingly balloted for, and unanimously elected an Honorary Member.

The following communications were then read.

A letter from Mr. Bell of Almorah, descriptive of two cases of urinary calculus. The first occurred in a boy 10 years of age. He had suffered from the disease for 4 years and was in consequence sallow and emaciated; a calculus weighing 117 grains was extracted by the lateral operation, the urine passed by the urethra on the following day, and in 18 days he was quite recovered. In the second case the calculus was impacted in the urethra, and in that situation was cut down upon and extracted.

A note from Mr. Beardsmore, written at the request of Mr. Hutchinson, descriptive of the beneficial effects, which he had experienced from smoaking the dried flowers of the mudar in asthma. According to Mr. Beardsmore he did not derive more than transitory relief, either from the mudar or the dhatura; but he prefers the former remedy as more manageable, and less pernicious and disagreeable in its effects. The flowers are dried in the shade, and smoaked by means of a common pipe, in the quantity of half a drachm. By a trial subsequently made, the remedy would appear to reduce the frequency of the pulse, and to occasion a degree of nausea, but so slight as scarcely to be perceptible. No narcotic effects were observed. Mr. Twining was good enough to take charge of a parcel of the dried flowers, and to promise to report on the remedy at a future opportunity. Mr. Beardsmore in his note speaks highly of the benefit which he received in the cure of his asthma from the white mustard seed, used in the same manner as for dyspeptic affections.

The following works were presented for the library.

Two tracts on the Nuth grass and the Mudar or Catropis Procera, presented by the author, Dr. Wight, of the Madras establishment to Mr. Hutchinson, and by the latter to the society.

Seale's elegant work on the Geognosy of St. Helena, by Dr. McRitchie of that Island.

FOR THE MUSEUM.

An Urinary Calculus, believed to be of the Uric Acid species, extracted from a Hindoo boy of 10 years of age, by Mr. Bell of Almorah.

The following original communicatione were presented at the Meeting.

A statistical account of St. Helena drawn up by Dr. McRitchie, Medical Staff of that Island.

An account of two cases of cholera successfully treated by Tartar Emetic, by T. Chapman Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Purneah.

A notice of a case of cholera successfully treated in the same manner, by R. Foley, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Kotah.

The history of a fatal case of extensive disease of the spleen, by J. Eccles, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

A description of the Electro-Magnetic Hemisphere, constructed by R. Tytler, Esq., M. D., with a model of the instrument.

A printed account of the calculo-fractor of L.'Estrane. Of this instrument there are several sets now on the way out, for the use of the Medical Department of this presidency.

The three last communications were presented by the Medical Board.

The following communications were then read and discussed at the Meeting.

Case of Ranula, in which the left submaxillary gland was extirpated, by J. G. Malcolmson, Esq., Secretary to the Medical Board, Madras.

Notes on the Mishme Teeta and Pucha Pat, by N. Wallich, Esq., M. D., &c.

Memorandum on the medicinal qualities of the Mishme Teeta, by W. Twining, Esq.

Mr. Malcolmson's case of Ranula occurred in a sickly-looking Hindoo boy of 9 years of age, who was brought to Chicacole from an unhealthy hill district. The swelling was quite soft and evidently contained a fluid; it extended from ear to ear, over the angles of the jaw, and to the sternum, over the top of which it had a slightly pendulous appearance. The disease was of a year's standing, and appeared to have commenced below the jaw a little to the left of the chin. Some time before its appearance there, had been a discharge of pus, half an inch behind the mouth of the left submaxillary duct, near which situation there was a carious tooth. On the cessation of the above discharge the swelling commenced. A small quantity of saliva still passed by the duct, and there was no tumor in the inside of the mouth; hardness however could be felt below the jaw in the direction of the duct, over which there were several scars from the application of the cautery. From these circumstances Dr. Malcolmson concluded, that the duct had become inflamed from the irritation arising from the carious tooth, that the flow of the saliva had become obstructed in consequence, and finally that it had been effused into the cellular structure of the throat. A tentative puncture was made into the tumor and 20 ounces of a glairy, brownish liquid evacuated, after which a hard moveable substance could be detected within. This was removed and proved to be a portion of the fluid, which had become inspissated. Adhesion of the sides of the sac afterwards partially took place above; but the discharge of matter was not free, and it had in consequence to be pressed out daily. Mr. Malcolmson now lost sight of the patient for a month or two, after which he again made his appearance. The opening had closed; a new puncture was made in consequence, and several ounces of liquid of a lighter color were discharged; after this a tent was introduced, which caused some irritation, but it was soon manifest that little could be expected from this plan: Mr. Malcolmson accordingly determined to remove a portion of the front of the sac, to ascertain if the liquid came from the gland, and afterwards take such farther measures as might appear necessary. This was accordingly done; the throat exhibited an extraordinary appearance; from behind the ears, over the angles of the jaw, and down to the chest it seemed as if carefully dissected, the blue veins and paroted gland shining through the cellular membrane. After much careful examination a round body of the size and color of a lymphatic gland was observed partly imbedded, as it were, in the submaxillary gland, and having a minute aperture in it, through which a little glairy fluid could be pressed out. Mr. Malcolmson immediately proceeded to separate the submaxillary gland from its connexions. This at first was not difficult; but became much more so, as the dissection became deeper. This was in some measure remedied by passing a ligature through the gland, by which it was drawn downward. The lower maxillary artery was divided, the bleeding from which was commanded by pressure on the carotid; but the vessel could not be secured until an assistant introduced his thumb into the mouth and depressed the gland, which step greatly facilitated the remainder of the operation. Afterwards by passing a curved needle several times through the parts and cutting between the gland and the ligature, the whole was removed except a small process, to which the actual cautery was applied. The operation occupied a considerable time, from the flow of blood and the intricacy of the dissection. The wound did well; but was followed by abscess which burst into the mouth, by the old cicatrix. It occasioned but temporary inconvenience and the patient was well in about a month after the operation. Mr. Malcolmson in his observations on Ranula has particular reference to the opinions of the late Baron Dupuytren, from the accuracy of several of which he is inclined to dissent. In the concluding portion of his paper he takes occasion to advert to the anomalous symptoms, occlusion of the salivary ducts, and fistulous openings, which not unfrequently take place from carious teeth, and which of course can only be expected to be cured, by the removal of the source of irritation.

Dr. Wallich in his paper states, that about a year ago, he received from Captain Jenkins the Commissioner in Assam a small supply of a Medical Root which subsequent information derived from Lieutenant Charlton of Suddeya, has enabled him to arrange and classify. The Mishme Teeta is the name by which the drug is known among the the Mishmees and Lamas; by the Chinese, to whom it is likewise well known, it is called Hong Lane, the root is of the thickness of a crow quill or somewhat larger; is dry and brittle; scabrous and grayish outside, and cellular and of a dirty yellow color internally. It is imported into Assam, packed in quantities of about an ounce each, in small rattan baskets composed of open meshes, apparently to protect the medicine, from contact with the hand The taste is intensely and almost purely bitter, having very little aroma. The root is destitute of smell and imparts to water a bright yellow or golden color in infusion. In March last, Dr. Wallich received fresh roots of the plant from Lieutenant Charlton, and these fortunately, notwithstanding the dissimilarity of the climate, promise to grow, if not to thrive, in the Hon'ble Company's Botanical Garden. According to Dr. Wallich the plant is a species of Coptis, a subdivision of the Ranunculaceæ called Helleboreæ. To the generic name abovementioned Dr. Wallich has added the trivial one of Teeta. Of the other two species of Coptis mentioned by Dr. Wallich, the Coptis Trifolia of North America would appear to have a considerable affinity in medicinal qualities to that under consideration, and is more extensively used in some parts of that country, than any other bitter.

The other vegetable production to which Dr. Wallich directed the attention of the Society is the Pucha Pat. This dried leaf is to be found in almost every bazaar throughout Hindoostan, and is used extensively for imparting its fragrance to tobacco for the hookah, likewise to the persons and apparel of the natives. About two years ago, Dr. Wallich ascertained that a large quantity of the leaf had been imported from Penang, and he in consequence addressed his correspondent at that place on the subject. Dr. Wallich not only received the information he required in reply, but several growing plants, which have since been found to thrive luxuriantly in the Botanical Garden. The Pucha Pat grows wild at Penang, and on the opposite shore of the Malayan Peninsula, in Province Wellesley. It is exported in great quantities, principally by the Arabs, and sells at Penang for somewhat upwards of a dollar per pekul, and in Calcutta at from six to 12 Rs- per maund.

The Pucha Pat is of the family of Lobiatœ, and forms a shrub in the Botanical Garden of from 2 to 3 feet in height; according to Baron Hugel a plant very similar to it, if not the same, is found growing wild at Canton. Dr. Wallich is inclined to think that the Pucha Pat, if not the Marrubuim indicum of Burman, is very closely allied to it.

Mr. Twining in his memorandum on the medicinal qualities of the Mishme Teeta states, that the powder of this root is of an intensely bitter taste accompanied with a slight degree of asoma. It would appear not to possess much astringency and is not much affected, either in tincture or infusion, by a solution of the sulphate of iron. Four hundred and eighty grains coarsely powdered lost, by maceration in proof spirit for five days, 180 grains, and the remainder when macerated for 30 hours more in distilled water, only 26 grains.

The medicine in powder and tincture was tried in seventeen persons, and appears to be highly deserving of attention. It was used principally in debilitated persons, who were recovering from acute diseases, and in one person who was greatly reduced by extensive suppuration of a strumous character.

The effects of the medicine as a bitter in restoring appetite, and in improving the digestive powers are very remarkable, and not inferior to those produced by our best bitter tonics. It has seldom appeared to p o luce constipation; but in this, and many other respects, Mr. Twining considers farther trials to be required to enable us to speak with accuracy and precision.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF INDIA.

At a geperal Meeting held in the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 12th August, the Hon'ble Sir J. P. Grant, Knight, W. P. Grant, and R. Walker, Esqrs., were duly elected Members, by ballot, and Charles Grant, Esq., Commissioner of the Soonderbunds, was proposed by Wm. Storm, Esq., and seconded by C. R. Martin, Esq.

After the usual routine of reading over the proceedings of the preceding meeting, the President called attention to a report which lay upon the table, of the certain experiments carried on by the Society at the Akra farm in the staple articles of exports, viz. cotton, tobacco, and sugar.

The report (although the matter was compressed as much as possible, occupied many pages) was read by the President, and heard by the Members present with a degree of interest which can only be felt by those who have the welfare of this country at heart.

On the motion of Sir E. Ryan, it was unanimously agreed that this report be approved, and a copy sent up to Government, so soon as Mr. Patrick, of Fort Gloster, shall have favoured the Society with his observation on the quality of yarn and cloth, which he politely offered at last Meeting to have spun from a sample bale of cotton grown at Akra, which has been sent to him for that purpose.

The following communications were read :—

A letter to the address of the Secretary from C. R. Baynes, Esq., of Madras, intimating the formation at that Presidency of an Horticultural Society, annexing a copy of the Resolutions passed on the occasion of a Meeting convened for the purpose, and requesting a copy of the Calcutta Society's Rules, &c. and such suggestions as might be of use at the commencement of their labours.

The officiating Secretary was directed to place himself in communication with Mr. Baynes, and to meet the wishes of the Madras Society, in whatever way he might consider it most likely to be acceptable.

A series of letters from Captain Sage, Secretary to the Dinapore branch of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society, was laid before the Meeting, but as these documents had reference to a question of property having no connexion with Agricultural pursuits, and Colonel Dunlop having briefly stated to the meeting the circumstances which had led to the appeal now made by Captain Sage, it was moved and resolved, that the various official papers received from Captain Sage, should be returned to that gentleman as the Society could not interfere.

A letter from Baboo Radahkant Deb, with an abstract translation in English of a Persian work, presented at last meeting by Captain Wade through Colonel Dunlop.

Baboo Radahkant Deb entitles it "An Abridgement of the Agricultural and Horticultural work compiled by Mahommed Fazil, under the direction of Captain Claude M. Wade."

The work consists of 13 chapters, treating separately on the signs and seasons of the year; on the soil and proper time of sowing; on the art of reaping and storing grain; on planting, grafting and training fruit trees, on the removal of noxious animals, &c.; and winds up with a short account of the fruits, vegetables, &c. introduced into this country by Europeans.

As there appeared to the Society much that was interesting in these pages, the officiating Secretary was requested to make enquiry as to the probable expense of having them accurately translated.

Two letters from Mr. Piddington, dated 9th June and 3d July, urging Members to contribute whatever they can, in aid of his work on Gardening.

A letter from Mr. Pillet at the Cape to the address of Dr. Wallich, under date 26th May, advising the receipt of an indent for seeds, and his intention to furnish the order by the best favorable opportunity.

A paper on grafting by Colonel Presgrave, presented through Mr. Kyd, with an etching of the process in different stages, and a natural specimen.

A letter from John Watson, Esq., of Moorshedabad, to the officiating Secretary, acknowledging receipt of some Guinea grass seed and suggesting that the publication of a work on the diseases of horned cattle in Bengal would be of service.

Mr. Watson states that two-thirds of the ryuts' cattle die from small pox alone.

Extract of a letter from Captain Jenkins to Dr. Wallich, dated 24th June, 1835, containing some useful observations on the breed of horned cottle best suited to Bengal, and recommending attention to the carriage and wheels in use at Nagpore, of which he gives a section and front view.

Captain Jenkins further asks the Society to procure a drawing of a machine—used in the Southern States of America for separating coffee beans from the pulp,—lithographed for general information. Captain Jenkins is of opinion that coffee will yet succeed in India.

Colonel Dunlop drew a comparison between the soil and roads at Nagpore and those in Bengal, and expressed his opinion that this point had escaped Captain Jenkins, when he recommended the heavy iron wheel in use at Nagpore.

A letter from Captain Bogle, of Assam, to Captain Jenkins, giving a detailed list of articles imported and exported at Gowhatee, with some interesting particulars relating to the people.

The following works were presented to the Society :—

1st vol. of "Proceedings of the Society of Arts," Adelphi, received without any communication through Messrs. Thacker and Co.

The three last numbers of Bell's Annual Comparative View of the External Commerce of Bengal, from the author.

Some discussion arose on the propriety of resuming the publication of the Society's Transactions, which had been discontinued partly owing to the low state of the funds, and partly because some particular papers could not be found to complete the last number, part of which had been printed. As all the members present seemed of one mind as to the interest which would by this means be thrown into the Society's Transactions, which were now but very imperfectly recorded in a precis through a newspaper, the officiating Secretary, who tendered his services to conduct the publication of papers, under the direction of a Committee, if necessary, was requested to make a calculation of the probable expenses of publishing, and communicate the same at his earliest convenience.

The names of thirty-three non-paying members were ordered to be expunged from the books of the Society.—Bengal Hurkaru.

STEAM NOTIFICATION.

Proceedings of a Public Meeting, of the Subscribers of the New Bengal Steam Fund, held at the Town Hall, Calcutta, on the 17th August, 1835.

CAPTAIN J. H. JOHNSTON, IN THE CHAIR.

The Secretary to the Committee having read the Committee's report as follows:—

Report of the Committee of the New Bengal Steam Fund, to the Subscribers at a Meeting held at the Town Hall, Calcutta, on the 17th August, 1835.

Since the date of the yearly meeting of the subscribers to the New Bengal Steam Fund held on the 17th February, the Committee have communicated to the subscribers, through the several newspapers of the Presidency, the* result of the last voyage of the Forbes, and the† reasons which induced them to discontinue the attempt to carry into further effect the first resolution of the general meeting held on the 7th January, 1834, viz. to run the Forbes three voyages between Calcutta and Suez.

2. To these reports the Committee have nothing to add. They can never cease to regret that the attempt to re-open the communication by means of the Forbes was not more successful, and especially that the first voyage, which otherwise bid fair to have answered the most sanguine expectations, was marred by an accident which they could not be expected to foresee, and against which it was entirely impossible that they could provide.

3. The establishment of a permanent communication was however the ulterior and principal object of their appointment; and to that object they have directed their best attention. The subscribers are aware of the scheme which they submitted to the consideration of the Governor-General for a comprehensive quarterly communication, comprising all the practicable points of junction with the means of conveyance for passengers, mails, and parcels, to the utmost extent possible under the circumstances of the case. The subscribers are also aware that this scheme had his Lordship's "decided recommendation," and hope that it might "be carried into immediate operation."

4. That this scheme was submitted to the home Government with his Lordship's strong recommendation there can be no doubt, but the Committee have had no information as to the result. That a recommendation coming from such a quarter must have great weight is certain, and although from a variety of circumstances the whole scheme of the Committee may not be carried into effect, yet they trust the main principle, namely, the extension of the communication to Calcutta, touching at Galle and Madras, will form the ground-work of any communication which may be established. The information however before the Committee as to what it is really intended shall be done, is so vague and indefinite that they can offer little opinion as to the probable result.

* Vide Report of Sub-Committee published on the 25th March 1835.

† Vide Report of Committee dated 28th March last and published in all the papers of the presidency.

5. The subscribers are aware that by a resolution of the House of Commons it was determined to open a communication without delay for eight months in the year by way of the Red Sea, the expense to be borne equally by His Majesty's Government and the Honorable Company, leaving it to be determined by the Government and the Honorable Court of Directors whether the communication should proceed to Bombay or Calcutta or whether it should be established according to the combined plan of the Calcutta Committee."

6. The general understanding at present appears to be, that it was the purpose of the Government under Sir Robert Peel, that the communication should be maintained monthly between England and Alexandria by His Majesty's Government, and on this side either directly by the Honorable Court or through contractors, and it is said that Lord Ellenborough had declared that he was not disposed to attend to any proposition which did not extend the communication to Calcutta. In the absence however of any defined information, the Committee can only anxiously await the final determination of the authorities at home and hold themselves in readiness to take advantage of any occurrences which may arise by which the ulterior object of their appointment may be attained.

7. In the Report of the Sub-Committee published in the Calcutta papers under date 25th March last, the following passage occurs:—" Upon the enquiries we have made of all the individuals employed in this trip there appears to be nothing in the voyage either as regards winds or currents, to frustrate the permanent establishment of steam communication between Calcutta and Suez. Were the good anchorage at King's Island on the Maldives as mentioned by Mr. Woodly available, no difficulty would exist."

8. Since the date of that Report the Committee are happy to state that they have received certain information of a secure depôt for coal having been discovered in a better situation among the Maldives than that just noticed. It appears by the late survey that at the very northern extremity in a direct line between Galle and Socotra, a place has been discovered having easy ingress and egress, eastward and westward, at which coal may be located and vessels ride safely at anchor at all times. It appears further that the navigation generally among the Islands is found to be far less dangerous than has hitherto been supposed to be the case.

9. The Committee have reason to believe that the survey of the Maldives was undertaken by the Bombay Government at the suggestion of the Superintendent of the Indian Navy, Captain Sir C. Malcolm, expressly with a view to the more ready extension of the communication to Calcutta, should it be decided by the authorities at home so to do, and they consider the thanks of the friends of the comprehensive scheme to be due to that officer.

10. The accounts are laid on the table for the inspection of subscribers, and annexed is a summary statement of receipts and expenditure from the 2d February last to the 31st ultimo. The balance is shewn to be Sa. ~~Rs~~ 70,605-4. To this is to be added the sum of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 3,847-1, being the amount estimated to be receivable, making in all Sa. ~~Rs~~ 74,452-5. This however, as stated in the Report under date 28th March last, is subject to the continued salaries of the agents at Socotra and Juddah until the receipt by them of notice that their services are no longer required—and to the final adjustment of the out turn of the coal sold to Government.

By order of the Committee of the New Bengal Steam Fund,

CHAS. C. GREENLAW, Secretary.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 18.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES PATTON.

This insolvent was declared entitled to the benefit of the act and discharged forthwith.

IN THE MATTER OF GEORGE TETLEY.

This insolvent was remanded on the 4th ultimo, that he might have an opportunity to explain the circumstances under which he had obtained advances from Messrs. Cockerell and Co. The insolvent is an indigo planter, and in 1833 purchased the Chulteah concern from Messrs. Cockerell and Co. which he subsequently mortgaged to that firm, receiving from them at various times sums to the amount of Rs 23,000, on the faith of various letters in which he informed them that he had considerably improved the concern, having built a new factory about one mile distant from the old one. Messrs. Cockerell and Co. on the faith of this information, and believing that the new factory was erected on the concern mortgaged to them, advanced money from time to time, to carry on the manufacture. But at the time of the insolvency it not only appeared that the new factory was not included in the mortgage, but that the greater part of the advances had been expended on the erection of the new building, and that it was formed out of the materials of the Chulteah factory.

On the next Court day the insolvent's counsel, Mr. Clarke, being engaged in the Court above, he was again remanded to this day, and copies of the letters sent to Cockerell and Co. were ordered to be furnished to him.

Mr. Clarke now appeared on behalf of the insolvent, and explained, the building was erected subsequent to the mortgage, and that, therefore, the name of the new factory did not appear in the deed. The insolvent, however, had acted with good faith, and did not, up to the time of his insolvency, consider that the mortgage did not cover the new building which was erected on land within the boundary of the old factory. Messrs. Cockerell and Co. had been informed that the insolvent had erected a new factory, and it was their business to ascertain whether it was covered by the mortgage.

Mr. Advocate General replied, contending that there had been a fraudulent misapplication of the sums received, and citing several passages in the insolvent's letters to Messrs. Cockerell and Co. wherein he sets forth that the erection of the new factory had greatly improved the Chulteah concern.

Sir Edward Ryan said, the insolvent had had every opportunity to give an explanation of his conduct. At one time he was inclined to think that the omission had been unintentional, but after the fullest consideration it was his opinion, that the insolvent intended to deceive Messrs. Cockerell and Co. He always felt reluctant to increase the term of an insolvent's imprisonment, but under the circumstances, it was his duty to order the prisoner to be remanded for a period of six months from this day. Costs of opposition to be paid out of the estate.

IN THE MATTER OF HON. W. HAMILTON.

This matter was postponed on the last court day to ascertain the exact amount of the insolvent's pension. It was now stated that the amount was rupees 198 per mensem, and it was also mentioned that the insolvent had married a lady of some property subsequent to his insolvency.

Sir Edward Ryan directed that enquiries should be made as to the latter fact, as it would influence his decision as to what portion of the insolvent's pension should be appropriated to the liquidation of his debts.

Mr. Clarke, on behalf of two native creditors, applied that an adjudication of insolvency be issued against Rogerram Ghossain, formerly the banian to the late firm of Palmer and Co. and carrying on business with them in the Calcutta Bank. The petitioners applied under the 10th section of the Insolvent Act, which enacts, that departing the jurisdiction with intent to defeat or delay any creditor, shall be deemed an Act of Insolvency on which creditors may petition. The Petitioners set forth that Rogerram Ghossain had left Calcutta, and gone to reside at the foreign settlement of Serampore. Order nisi.

IN THE MATTERS OF CAMPBELL, MERCADO, POOL AND OTHERS.

Mr. Clarke applied on behalf of several insolvent uncovenanted assistants that certain debts contracted by them in consequence of, and subsequent to, their insolvency, may be discharged out of a portion of their salary before any part be set aside for the liquidation of the debts on their schedule.

Sir Edward Ryan refused the application, and ordered that one third of the insolvents' salary be paid over to their assignee until the whole of their debts be liquidated, or until they should receive a final discharge.—Englishman.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 29.

---

IN THE MATTER OF GABRIEL FRANCIS VRIGNON.

Mr. Hudson, the attorney, applied for leave to amend the schedule, the names of several creditors having been omitted. These creditors, however, had all had notice of the insolvent's application for relief in the Insolvent Court, and as there was no opposition, perhaps the learned judge would allow the schedule to be amended forthwith.

Sir Edward Ryan would not allow the schedule to be amended unless stronger grounds were put in than those contained in the affidavit, and at all events he would not allow the amendment to be made forthwith. There was not one or two names omitted but a great number, tradesmen in Calcutta, and to say that the insolvent had not remembered them at the time the schedule was filed was not sufficient.

George Galloway and Peter Abercrombie, two uncovenanted assistants, were declared entitled to the benefit of the act and discharged. The former was ordered to pay one-third of his salary to his assignee; the latter put in a petition which his lordship said he would consider.

---

IN THE MATTER OF ROBERT BROWNE.

Mr. A. Wight applied to make an order nisi absolute for the final discharge of this insolvent. Ordered on the Examiner putting in his certificate, that the creditors had consented in the terms of the 62d section of the act.

IN THE MATTER OF ROGGONAUTH GOSSAIN.

An order nisi having been granted on a former day for an adjudication of insolvency against this person, Mr. Advocate General moved to make the rule absolute, and

Mr. Turton shewed cause. In the first place, he objected to the title of the petition; there was no such a man as "Ruggonauth" Gossain, and as there was no adjudication there was no "matter" before the Court. These objections may appear trivial, but they were not so, in as much as no indictment could be sustained for perjury which might appear in this proceeding.

Sir Edward Ryan, after looking at the petition, said he would not stop the proceeding for those inaccuracies.

Mr. Turton then drew the attention of the Court to the party who petitioned. The affidavit was made by Muddenmohun Dutt, of Burra Bazar, a gomastah in the service of the Banking House carried on under the style and firm of Juggomohun Sill and Annundamohun Sill, but the application had been made by Mr. Clarke on behalf of Juggomohun Sill, Kistnomohun Sill and Bissomohun Sill, surviving members of the firm of Juggomohun Sill and Annundmohun Sill. The affidavit did not set forth who are the partners in the firm; they were so described in the petition but not in the affidavit, nor was there any affidavit of debt due from Ruggoram Gossain, but it was merely set forth, that John Palmer, George Alexander Prinsep, William Prinsep, and Charles Barber Palmer, who, together with Roggoram Gossain, were the partners and proprietors of a certain establishment denominated by the name of the Calcutta Bank, are justly indebted, &c. &c. Now from this it would appear not that Roggoram Gossain is indebted but that Palmer and Co. are indebted. If it was an affidavit that Palmer and Co. were indebted he believed it to be true; but if it was an affidavit that Roggoram Gossain was indebted, he believed it to be false, and after the affidavit was read that he intended to put in, he believed the Court would be of the same opinion, but at present he submitted that there was no affidavit of debt to found this application.

Sir Edward Ryan.—It is here distinctly sworn Palmer and Co. who, together with Roggoram Gossain, were partners in the Calcutta Bank, are indebted.

Mr. Turton.—Yes, my lord, are indebted. Palmer and Co.—the nominative case,—are indebted.

Sir Edward Ryan.—Oh! Mr. Turton, that will do;—I think it sufficient, however, at present.

Mr. Turton thought he would be able to satisfy the Court that there was some intention in this indirect manner of swearing, because his affidavits gave a direct negative to that on which the application was founded. But first, according to the X section of the Insolvent Act, before an adjudication could issue it was necessary that the person should be a trader liable to become bankrupt, such person must depart without the limits of the Court's jurisdiction with intent to defeat or delay any creditor. Now he thought he should be able to prove that Roggoram Gossain was not such trader, and did not depart without the limits with such intent; and, consequently, that he did not come within the meaning of the X clause of the Insolvent Act. In order to do this it would be necessary to go through the affidavits on both sides.

Sir Edward Ryan here intimated that if the affidavits were contradictory, he would not make an adjudication at present, but appoint a day for witnesses to be examined before the Court. In this proceeding he issued an order nisi instead of the course hitherto adopted of making the adjudication, and allowing the party to come in to set aside, because he could not entirely divest himself of some proceedings that had taken place in the Court above.

Mr. Turton said, it was set forth that Roggoram Gossain was a trader at the time of the loan, which was distinctly denied. The fact was, that he had not carried on any trade for twenty-five years, though as he had been the banian for Palmer and Co. it would be impossible to deny that he was such a trader as came under the Bankrupt act at home. It was also true that Roggoram had a share in the Calcutta Bank, but his name had been inserted without his authority. In 1828, in consequence of a pressure which existed in the money market, there was a meeting of the principal agents in Calcutta, at which it was determined that the Calcutta Banks then in operation should draw in their issues, and from that period it had become merely a bank of deposit. Juggomohun Sill and Annundmohun Sill were well aware of this fact, as they were the cashiers to the house through Ramchunder Sill, the son of Juggomohun, and they must also have been aware from the same source that in April, 1829, Roggoram's interest in the bank entirely ceased. Palmer and Co. were the secretaries of the Eighth Canton Insurance Company, and some persons in whose favor policies were granted, and the loss adjusted, being desirous to obtain the money before it became due, applied to Juggomohun Sill to have the same discounted, and Juggomohun wishing to have Palmer and Co.'s endorsement applied to Mr. G. A. Prinsep for that purpose, who indorsed the policies not for the Calcutta Bank but for Palmer and Co. the affair being in fact only a plan to put two per cent into the coffers of that firm, and the transaction did not appear in the books of the bank. At the time the policies were discounted, Palmer and Co. had a large sum of money in their hands belonging to the Canton Insurance Company. The policies had not been paid as the Insurance Company contended that they were a set-off against the Assignees of Palmer and Co.'s estate.

Why did not Juggomohun go against the Canton Insurance Company? Instead of doing so, he had brought an action against Roggoram, first in the Zillah court of Hooghly where he had then appealed to the Sudder, which confirmed the decision of the Zillah court, and after suffering six years to expire, he came against him in the Insolvent Court, with an application to make him insolvent on a mere pen and ink transaction of Palmer and Co.'s. Now as to the residence of Roggoram, the affidavits stated that he was born at Serampore, where his family property and family dwelling house were situated. When sixteen he commenced proceedings against his uncle for a moiety of the property, which he recovered, and then commenced business as a banian to a number of persons, but so far from carrying on trade, he had not even entered into any of the Insurance Co-partneries. He certainly had a lodging house in Calcutta, but it was merely for his convenience and for the purpose of lodgings only, as he spent the holidays at Serampore, performed his poojahs there, and always went there on the Saturday nights, whence he did not return until Monday morning. He went to Serampore on the Saturday previous to the Monday on which Palmer and Co. stopt payment, and on the morning of the latter day he set out to return to his business as banyan, when he was met by a person who informed him that the house had stopt, he then returned to his house at Serampore, and had not again returned to Calcutta. Now as he had no idea of the house going to fail when he quitted Calcutta, he could not be said to have gone away with an intention to defeat or delay his creditors. The learned counsel then drew the Court's attention to the distinction between the Bankrupt act at home, and the Insolvent act for this country, the former making it an act of bankruptcy to remain out of the jurisdiction but the latter did not make it an act of insolvency unless the person went out of the jurisdiction with an intent to defeat or delay his creditors.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

CALCUTTA.

PETITION OF THE TRADE ASSOCIATION.—The petition of the members of the Trade Association to Government against the repeal of sections II. and III. of Regulation V. of 1830, has been published. The petitioners have put their case very ably and adduced some powerful argument against the proposed repeal. They urge that the existing law has for five years been productive of important benefits, and that previous to its enactment the most serious disorders prevailed in the Mofussil which have since considerably less frequently occurred. That with regard to the principle of legislation involved, the rescinding the existing ordinance is founded on a doctrine at variance with the statute law of England, which has ever protected the employers against the employed, and that the real object of Section II. Regulation V. is to defeat conspiracy, and extend the punishment from the ryut who violates his contract to the guilty parties who instigated the offence. That as manufacturers and traders they entertain serious apprehensions when they perceive a principle of legislation adopted in the Mofussil which is equally applicable to Calcutta and which, if extended to this city, will be attended with the most ruinous consequences to their business. That the whole Trade Association will be severely affected by the proposed repeal, as on the existence and prosperty of the great body of indigo planters, a considerable portion of their business depends. They suggest that instead of repealing Sections II. and III. a new Regulation should be passed affording summary redress and remedy to both planter and ryut; and they conclude by soliciting the Governor-General to appoint a Committee to obtain evidence on the subject.

INDIGO PROSPECTS.—Accounts of the indigo crop remain unchanged: the same tale of rising of rivers and destruction of plants, pours in from all quarters. A letter from Jessore mentions that the probable out-turn of that district and Furreedpore conjointly, will be about 8,000 maunds and prospects in all the other districts are daily assuming a more gloomy aspect: the last accounts received state, that the total out-turn will not much exceed two-thirds of the anticipated crop.

THE INDIGO MEMORIALS.—The answer returned to the Indigo Memorials of the Merchants and the Trade Association is, that Government are still determined to rescind Sections II. and III. of Regulation V. of 1830; but in consideration of the interests involved in this branch of commerce, it has been determined to relieve the apprehensions of planters and agents, by substituting clauses to the following effect:—

1. "Suits for the breach of any contract for cultivating or dilivering indigo plant, or on account of money advanced for the cultivation or delivery of indigo plant, to be instituted before a magistrate or joint-magistrate.

2. "Such suits to be tried summarily without any fees or written pleading.

3. "The magistrate or joint-magistrate, to be authorized to examine both the plaintiff and the defendant, and to make his award upon such summary trial.

4. "If the award be in favor of the plaintiff, the magistrate or joint-magistrate to assign to the plaintiff such damages as he may think fit, and if in favour of the defendant, to assign to the defendant a sum which may be a compensation to him for the expense and loss of time occasioned by the proceeding.

5. "A copy of the award, signed by the magistrate, or joint-magistrate, to be delivered to the successful party, and the successful party to be entitled to take property in satisfaction of the said award, and under the same rules by which property may now be taken in satisfaction of arrears of rent."

INDIGO—BILLS UPON LONDON.—The following is extracted from a Commercial letter from Boston, dated in April:—"We shall send you the usual number of ships this season, and they will chiefly rely on bills upon London to pay for their investments. We have but little confidence in the existing prices of indigo, unless cultivation can be kept down to 90,000 or 100,000 maunds for two or three seasons more.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.—The iron steamer with the Bhagaretty in tow, arrived off Ghazeepore on the 31st ultimo, twenty-seven days after her departure from Calcutta.

A letter received in town, states that the Directors had ordered two powerful steamers to be built for the purpose of keeping up the communication between India and Suez via Bombay.

The Bhaguretty arrived from Allahabad on the 21s instant, having performed the trip in less than ten days. She delivered treasure at Moorshedabad and has brought 800 boxes of copper pice to Calcutta.

The Emily Jane brought from China the proceeds of the Sylph's cargo, which have been remitted to the Bank of Bengal. The 945 chests of opium forwarded to Lintin were sold as follows:—400 chests 1st and 2d May for drs. 1,45,800; and 545 chests 15th and 26th May for drs2,27,275; averaging drs. 394-87 per chest. Two consignments of sycee silver on account amounting to drs. 1,42,774-68; and by the Forth a further remittance has been received in Bills on Government, amounting to Rs 1,39,000, all addressed to the Bank of Bengal. The Government here have accepted of the underwriter's proposal to pay ⅛ of the price of the opium saved by the Clive, on account of the services of Captain Hawkins and crew, but it is said that the agents of Captain Hawkins, Messrs. Mackintire and Co., have refused to accept the tender on his account. The claims of the Mavis and other vessels, which saved 340 chests of opium, have been settled at Singapore.

Letters have been received from a passenger of the Katherine Stewart Forbes, stating that that vessel had sprung a leak early in June, and bore up for the Mauritius, which she reached on the 7th of that month. The vessel was examined and the leak found not to be serious, and she had again proceeded on her voyage.

The Asia, which left town on the 18th August, has been totally lost on Saugor beach. The vessel was in the old channel, when at 4 A. M., on swinging to the flood, she struck very hard several times, having driven during the night, and knocked her rudder off. At daylight another anchor was let go, and a signal of distress hoisted, which was answered by the Beacon light vessel, which rendered every possible assistance. The anchors were next slipped, and at 6-30 finding the vessel would not wear, another anchor was let go, but the chain, not being clinched round the mast, ran out end for end, and in consequence Mr. McDormand, the pilot in charge, was obliged to run her ashore on Saugor beach. During the flood the decks of the ship were burst up and the cargo began to float out of the hold. The whole crew, however, were safely landed; but the Captain, not being able to hold on in consequence of ill health, was washed off the forecastle and drowned. The crew were taken on board the Beacon off Middleton Point, where they had walked from the wreck. The cargo of the Asia consisted of indigo, silks, saltpetre, &c. and it is said, has been insured at upwards of four lakhs of rupees. A hope, however, is entertained of a considerable salvage, as the vessel had not gone to pieces when the last accounts were dispatched; and the Enterprize, Asseerghur, P. V., and several row-boats have been sent down to her. Two officers of the Asia, who came up in the Forbes have also returned to the vessel with 30 or 40 lascars.

ICE.—The Mary and Susan from Boston took on board about 150 tons of ice for this place, and as she has had a quick passage out it is expected that she has lost but little of it. The ice is now being retailed by Mr. Bacon, at the godowns hitherto used as a depository for ice, at 3 annas per seer. A large quantity of apples, apparently as fresh as the day they were packed, are also stored in the godowns and are for sale.

SILK FACTORIES.—An attempt has been made to sell some of the Company's silk and other factories by public auction at upset prices. Only one was bid for, the silk concern at Rungamutty, which was knocked down to Dr. McPherson for 21,000 rupees. This factory has 1,500 biggahs of land attached to it, at a low rent, which makes it a desirable acquisition. The rest are said to have been greatly overvalued.

CIVIL SERVICE.—It is said the Court of Directors are very favorably disposed towards the plan of applying a part of the Civil Annuity Fund, to reduce the bonus now to be paid down by persons retiring from the service —so long as there shall be a surplus; and that the Court has also consented to pensions on a lower scale being allowed to gentlemen in the service, who are compelled to retire on account of bad health before the full term of twenty-two years—for five years' service £250 per annum and for fifteen year's £700. It is further reported, that the Directors intend to abolish the present gradations of rank in the service, and to substitute a scale of rank according to length of service.

Fifteen members of the Civil Service have addressed the Secretary of the Civil Fund, requesting to be furnished with copies of all correspondence that may have passed, or minutes and other papers recorded, on the subject of the admission of the Rev. C. B. Elliot to the benefits of the Fund on his paying up 5,000 rupees under article 35 of the rules of the Fund; and also desiring to be furnished with the promised copies of the communications regarding the admission of Mr. Sutherland on the same terms.

HONORARY MAGISTRATES.—Baboos Dwarkanauth Tagore and Radakaunt Debb and Mr. James Kyd, were sworn in as Honorary Magistrates for the town of Calcutta on the 3d instant.

MILITARY ITEMS.—The services of the regiment of Native Infantry which was sent to Rajeshye, being no longer required in that district, it has been ordered back to its cantonments at Barrackpore.

Private letters mention the resignation in England of Lieut. T. G. Dundas, of the 72d N. I., on the 10th September last.

THE PRESS LAW.—The Press Law, which reflects the greatest honor on its enactors, is passed and was published in the Government Gazette on the 5th August. It does not, however, come into operation until the 15th September when it will be celebrated by illuminations and a Public Dinner.

RAPES.—Two young men, named Brooks and Marnell, were brought up on the 4th instant, by constable Goodsall, on a warrant, charged with having committed a rape on an interesting girl named Lutchman Baur, aged 13 years.

Tamas de Aquino, a Portuguese, has been tried before the Magistrates for committing a rape upon the body of an infant of about six years of age named Mary Race. The accused, it is stated, from the evidence of the child's mother and that of the surgeon who attended her, is to be committed to take his trial at the next session.

THE HON'BLE C. R. LINDSAY, died at Singapore on the 4th of July.

DEATH BY A SNAKE'S BITE.—A Brahmin girl of about ten years of age, was bitten on the finger by a cobra-capella, on the morning of the 19th August, and died within three hours after the infliction of the wound.

DR. W. TWINING.—This distinguished and worthy member of society, whose loss is severely felt by the members of the profession to which he belonged, died on the evening of the 25th instant. The useful career of the lamented Doctor was terminated by an accident. On the evening of the 19th instant, while making his usual round of visits, his carriage came in contact with a gentleman's buggy, and the concussion threw the gentleman out and his thigh-bone was broken by the fall. The Doctor, who had immediately alighted, on discovering this called a palkee, and not chusing to trust the sufferer to native hands lifted him from the ground himself and placed him in it. In doing this he strained himself, and being conscious of a severe injury, went into Mr. Thompson's dispensary, near which the accident happened, and after a little rest went home, where he expired on the 25th instant. A very good cast of the features of the deceased has been taken by Doctor Goodeve and Mr. Thompson, and is in the possession of the latter.

MURDERS.—A man of the name of Babooram, an artificial flower-maker, was shot on the night of the 20th instant, while working in his shop with some other men. He was hit in the back with two balls, and died in about two hours after the infliction of the wounds. A C oroner's inquest was held on the body on the 22d instant, and the following verdict was returned—" Died from two wounds inflicted by two pieces of lead, but no evidence to shew how they were propelled into the body."

The murderer has not yet been detected, and no clue whatever afforded to lead to a discovery, as the friends of the deceased state that they are not aware of his being at variance with any body.

A Portuguese man was killed by a sailor, in Cyroo Mater's lane, on the 28th instant. The deceased had a dispute with the sailor and made use of some abusive language, when the latter struck him a blow on the temple with his fist and killed him on the spot.

Pearee Dausee, a respectable Hindoo widow, was found strangled to death in her own house in Ruttoo Sircar's lane, on the 3d instant. The perpetrators of this atrocious deed appear to be the woman's two servants, who resided on the premises with her, and have absconded, to Tamlook, it is supposed, with all the property they could remove. A search has been instituted for the purpose of apprehending and bringing them to trial.

ACCIDENT.—It is stated, that a letter received from Ghazeepore, mentions that a couple of dandies have reported the sinking of a boat off that place, in which was a paltanka saib, of whose name they were ignorant; and that they saved themselves by swimming to the shore, but the officer and mangee and every other person in the boat they report to be drowned.

MR. CURNIN.—It is said that Mr. Curnin, at the request of the officers at Barrackpore, has solicited and obtained permission to proceed to England, to settle the business of the Army Retiring Fund, it being conceived that his presence will very much accelerate the matter at the India House. Mr. Curnin has taken his passage in the Roxburgh Castle, which vessel will sail about the middle of next month.

DR. CAREY.—It is said that the Revd. Eustace Carey, nephew of the late excellent Revd. Dr. Carey, of Serampore, is now preparing for publication a Memoir of the Reverend Doctor.

THE LORD BISHOP, it is stated in the Englishman, refused to preach a sermon for the benefit of the Cape sufferers because the profits of a play are to be appropriated to the same benevolent purpose!! His Lordship however, has since subscribeed 200 rupees for the relief of the sufferers.

PALMYRAS LIGHT-HOUSE.—The Committee of Survey which proceeded down lately to examine the condition of the Light-house on point Palmyras, has reported that the building will very well stand out another year, although it is gradually being washed away.

FEVER HOSPITAL.—There was a meeting of the subscribers of the Fever Hospital at the Town Hall on the 12th instant, at which the Lord Bishop, Sir E. Ryan, Sir J. P. Grant and several other friends of the institution attended. Mr. C. Smith, the Chairman, read a report of the state of the subscription which exhibited an increase since the last Meeting of about 6,000 rupees subscribed in Calcutta, 7,000 rupees from the Rajah of Burdwan, and 500 rupees from the Nawab of Moorshedabad, making the whole amount subscribed rupees 27,362. A brief statement of the state of the Hospital was ordered to be circulated amongst the wealthy natives, in order to remove an impression entertained of the inutility of the institution in consequence of the interference with caste. The statement exhibits provisions by which all interference with the prejudice of any caste will be removed.

CALCUTTA RACES.—The Jockey Club has been successful in its endeavours to restore the race course and revive the Calcutta Races: upwards of 200 gold mohurs have already been subscribed for that purpose.

THE AGRA ACCOUNTANT'S OFFICE.—The fleet of the Agra accountant's office reached Patna on the 20th instant, but appears to have met with some accidents. Mr. G. F. Harvey, the Civil Auditor, was taken severely ill previous to reaching Monghyr, and was left at that place under charge of a medical man; one large puttalee belonging to the fleet, with horses on board, was seen filled with water and deserted, drifting down the stream; and another boat was nearly lost on a sand bank—she had three feet water in her hold and would have been lost if one of the gentlemen on board had not cut away the sheets of the sails with a sword, as the manjee had become completely bewildered and had deserted his post at the helm.

The family of the young man found out his intention and quarrelled with him on the subject; he therefore repaired to Mr. Heberlin on the 31st of July last, requested that he might be immediately baptized, and asked for an assylum in his house for the night, which was of course granted. The next morning the relations and friends of Ram Ruttun, about fifty in number, called at the house and endeavoured, by the promise of some thousands of rupees and persuasion, to induce the young man to go home with them and renounce his intention of being baptized; but finding him strenuously refuse, they seized and forcibly dragged him away with them, jostling and abusing Mr. Heberlin, who endeavoured to rescue his pupil. Mr. H. has since entirely lost sight of the youth, but he heard one of the men who were forcing him away say, that there was a boat waiting for him at Chandpaul Ghât.

SUPREME COURT.—The Supreme Court opened on the 24th instant, but the Chief Justice immediately after taking his seat on the bench, intimated to the bar, that he had received some information from Sir Benjamin Malkin which rendered it extremely possible that the learned Judge would arrive in Calcutta in a few days. Under those circumstances, the Chief Justice thought it better not to take the re-hearings, as proposed at the close of the last sittings, because if in any cases Mr. Justice Grant and himself should disagree, it would be difficult to deny the parties another hearing before a full bench. The Court was therefore adjourned for a fortnight, and Sir Edward Ryan intimated that they would take contested motions on the first day of the adjourned sittings, after which the re-hearings would come on in the following order, viz. Rajah Burrodocaunt Roy v. another; Richards v. Bank of Bengal; Stephens v. Hume; Premchand Bysack v. Sreemuttey Dossee, and the appeal from the decision in the Insolvent Court in the matter of James Young and others.

SERIOUS IRRUPTION.—A serious irruption of the disaffected Kamptees and Singphos is said to have taken place recently on our eastern frontier, a little above Suddyah. The Duffah Gaum, a chief who has never been favorably disposed towards the British Government, came down with about 400 followers to Beesa, about 30 miles from Suddyah, the capital of the chief of that name, against whom he entertained a deadly hatred, and being joined by the other chiefs or gaums and their followers, to about the number of 2,000, they plundered Beesa, massacred its inhabitants indiscrimately, and having set fire to the place, the Daffa Gaum and his followers located themselves in the vicinity of the ruins of the town, the rest returned to their homes. Several British subjects have suffered by the irruption, their property being carried off and their agents murdered. This attack was made with such caution that the Beesa Gaum, who has been on the qui vive, had scarcely time to make his escape, and, indeed, part of his family were massacred. A party of sepahees from Suddyah, and the gun-boats under Mr. Bruce had been sent to dislodge the marauders from their stockade, but the success of the expedition is not yet known.

The European merchants who dispatch goods from Agra and other Military Stations to Neemuch and Nusseerabad, complain of detention and demand of transit duties by the custom officers of the Bhurtpore state, and on the other hand the Bhurtpore Rajah complains of loss, by articles being smuggled through the country along with goods consigned to British officers. The Rajah of Bhurtpore has therefore, applied to Major Alves on the subject, and suggests that some local functionary at Agra should grant rowanahs to accompany articles of consumption dispatched for European officers or Messes, to obviate the necessity of opening packages, &c., to ascertain that goods on which duties are leviable do not accompany the dispatches.

JEYPORE.—Major Alves has recovered from the effects of the wounds he received, but is still weak. Four of the principal officers of the state have been apprehended on suspicion, being known as staunch supporters of Jotaram. Their apprehension has created some dissatisfaction, and the bunneahs have refused in consequence to accommodate the Government with the usual loans. It is asserted that Europeans cannot now ride out in Jeypore without receiving abuse and curses from the natives. The authority of Rewal Beree Lal seems so completely established by the Company that several of the principal chieftans have waited on him with assurances of their most cordial support.

BARAITCH.—Nawab Fyz Mahomed Khan, the Baraitch Chief, has been levying dund (black mail) on his oppressed ryuts to the amount of a lakh of rupees it is said. A number of these unfortunate men had been obliged to fly from the country to escape the dund, which is extorted by the most cruel imprisonments, beatings and tortures.

SHAPOOR.—A Bramin recently murdered a peon belonging to the cutcherry at Shapoor, whilst he was asleep. The villian has been confined, but it is expected that he will escape capital punishment, as the native authorities are extremely averse to Bramh-hatha or Bramin killing.

E., and won the match and coin in 55 minutes and 52 seconds. The mare stands 13 hands 2 inches. Nothing is known of her caste, as she was bought out of the Nellore bazaar, some time back.

HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The Committee of the Horticultural Society, are following out the objects whose contemplation governed their appointment. A desirable spot of ground has been selected as an experimental garden, and an application for its transfer to the Society has been made to Government. The question has been agitated of the propriety of making over to the institution the surplus funds arising from the subscription to the late Sir Thomas Munro's statue, which it is calculated at about thirty thousand rupees, a sum, which if procured, would at once set the Society on stable footing.

BOMBAY.

MELANCHOLY EVENT.—A most melancholy event occurred at Poona on the morning of the 18th July. A Meeting took place between Dr. Malcolmson and Capt, Urquhart, which proved fatal to the latter, who expired a few moments after receiving his antagonist's fire. Dr. Malcolmson was also slightly wounded at the same time.

On the day of the grand ceremony the convert was clad in the dress of a Mahomedan ; a red turban was placed on his head and a garland of flowers round his neck ; and having been seated on a horse he was tom-tomed to the door of the mosque, where he went through the ceremony of repeating Kulma, after which he was cheerfully greeted by all the Mahomedans present.

MR. MARRIOT.—On the 15th July, the inhabitants of Poona presented an address to Mr. Marriot on his appointment to the office of Senior Judge of the Sudder Adawlut.

RAJAH BALLA PRUSAD, son of Chundoo Lall, the Nizam's Minister, lately visited Poona on his way to Nassick, whither he is going on a pilgrimage, hoping by bathing in the holy Gunga, to remove the epileptic fits to which he is subject. He was attended by about 1,000 men and a number of elephants, and is said to have distributed some hundreds of rupées near the Boodhwar palace, and about a lakh near Pundhurpoor.

LUXOOMUN BAPPOO KHOTAY, who, after a hard struggle between the officers of the Sudder Adawlut and the Supreme Court, was at last sent for trial to the former, by the authorities at Candish, on charges preferred against him by the Collector of Candish of peculation and fraud, has been entirely acquitted of all the charges, and has returned to Bombay.

PUBLIC DISPENSARY.—In consideration of the causes, arising from the prejudices of natives, which prevent them from applying for admission into the Native Hospital, and the heavy expense to which the poorer classes of natives are put to procure medicine, the establishment of a Public Dispensary is contemplated where the poor natives can receive medicine and medical advice gratis, without being subjected to the restrictions which attend their admission into the Native General Hospital. The following are the rules of the projected institution :—

Funds for the purchase of medicines and the maintenance of the establishment appertaining to the Dispensary, to be raised by annual subscriptions and donations from all who may be favourably disposed to the institution.

" The funds so collected to be deposited in some respectable House of business, the management of the institution to be vested in a President and 13 Directors, who shall be elected by the Members at large.

" None to be eligible for a Director, who subscribes less than——rupees per annum, or who gives a donation of less than——rupees at once.

" Every Subscriber of——rupees as a donation, and rupees —— annually, to be entitled to send one patient monthly to the Dispensary, and the right to send a greater number, to increase in like proportion."

A sum of upwards of 8,000 rupees has already been subscribed for the establishment of this institution, and Government being petitioned on the subject, have sanctioned an allowance of 300 rupees per mensem to maintain it. The private donations amount to upwards of 7,000 rupees and the annual subscriptions are more than 2,000 rupees.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—An European sailor belonging to one of the Company's ships in the harbour, was a short time since, whilst bathing, attacked by a shark which seized him by the hip and tore off all the flesh, leaving the bone bare and indented with its teeth half way down his thigh. The poor man was taken to the Hospital and the limb amputated from the hip-joint, but he was so exhausted from pain and loss of blood, that he died shortly after the performance of the operation.

THE CROPS.—Various accounts have been received from different parts of the country regarding the state of the crops. In some places the rain had been plentiful and a rich harvest promised to crown the labors of the cultivator ; in others, the rain had barely been sufficient to keep the crops from perishing and in some the cultivation was nearly parched up and destroyed for want of a few refreshing showers, and considerable apprehensions were entertained of its total destruction if plentiful showers of rain did not soon fall to revive it. The drought had excited considerable sensation among the native inhabitants, who had in consequence been very zealous in performing the rites of their respective religions in order to propitiate the offended gods. The Government also, with laudable anxiety for the welfare of the extensive population intrusted to their care, have caused wells to be opened on the strand for their benefit.

The charge was fully substantiated and the prisoners were convicted and sentenced to receive 150 lashes each and to be imprisoned for three years at hard labor in chains. Two Malays were tried for the supposed robbery of the unfortunate seaman, Roberts, whose body was some months ago found floating in the harbour of Trincomalee; but they were acquitted on account of the disreputable characters of the two principal witnesses for the prosecution.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.—The Brig Wilmot, which recently arrived at Galle, has brought the intelligence that an European brig had been wrecked on an uninhabited island of the Maldives, and that the Sultan had dispatched a vessel to the assistance of the crew on the 11th ultimo.

PENANG.

SIR H. B. MALKIN, remained at Penang on the 1st August, but was to proceed to Calcutta on the bark Thetis.

PIRACY.—A trading prow was attacked and captured by a pirate on the 24th ultimo, off Pulo Riman, and her Nacoda, who effected his escape by swimming ashore, was severely wounded with a spear.

SINGAPORE.

DEATH OF DESERTERS.—On the 3d July the bodies of three men were found on the beach and conveyed to the Police Office. They are supposed to be part of the crew of the brig Tarter of Batavia, who deserted from that vessel very early on that morning, and from the nature of the wounds about them, appear to have met their deaths during their passage ashore by swimming.

COMMERCIAL SQUARE.—The long contemplated improvements to Commercial Square are at length being put in execution, and the vacant space hitherto occupied by rubbish is being cleared and enclosed by a small, neat brick parapet.

MILITARY.—The Sir Archibald Campbell, Robertson, arrived at Singapore on the 7th August, having on board Lieutenant and Mrs. Taylor and a detachment of the Madras Native Infantry in relief of the corps on the island, which embarked on the 11th on the Swallow and Sir Archibald Campbell, on their return to Madras.

ACTION OF TROVER.—Mr. Norris, late in command of the Schooner Bombay, has instituted an action of Trover, damages 6,000 dollars, against Captain Quin of His Majesty's schooner Raleigh, for the nine chests of opium seized and sold by that officer for his claim of salvage in having been the means of relieving the Bombay from her perilous condition, in consequence of the death of her commander, Beattie, while on her passage from Bombay to Penang.

BOAT RACE.—The Mallaca Yacht Club had a boat race on the 26th June for a silver cup and the Commodore's flag. The race, which lasted 5 hours, was won by the Sri Naning.

BURMAH.

A correspondent of the Harkaru writes, that the Greek Pilot at Rangoon had been detected by the authorities in smuggling silver out of the country, and that they had proceeded against him and his servants with great rigor. The Pilot was only suspected at first of being concerned in smuggling money on board of a vessel bound to Calcutta, but during his absence his servants were seized and menaced and the fact extorted from them of their having helped their master in clandestinely sending money out of the country,—and when the Pilot returned he was imprisoned and told that his servants would be put to death unless he confessed the whole; after thus being forced to confess, he was further imprisoned until he gave security to recall from Calcutta and deliver to the Burmese Government within three months, all the money he had sent away.

FREE SCHOOL.—The examination of the children at the Free School on the 17th July, was attended by the Revd. A. Hamilton, the Brigadier commanding, and several officers from the cantonments, all of whom expressed their gratification at the progress in the English language made by the boys, and also at the system established by the master, the Revd. C. Bennett. The pupils, Chinese, Burmese, East Indians and Armenians, displayed considerable proficiency in geography, composition, arithmetic, &c., and seemed by their quickness and intelligence fully to meet the kindness and attention of their master.

THE MALDIVES.

Private letters, dated 20th June, have been received from Lieutenant Young, one of the officers of the Benares, whom Captain Moresby, by the permission of Government, left with a party at Male or King's Island. The officers and men continued well, and were much pleased with their quarters, where, through the influence of the Sultan's uncle, they received every attention from the natives. Through the judicious arrangements of Captain Moresby, vessels passing through or near the Islands are likely to be visited by pilots who can guide them through the passages in safety. If the health of the party continues good they are likely to obtain one desideratum, a knowledge of the language of the Islanders.

CHINA.

NEW PAPER.—It is stated that a new paper, supported by a body of mercantile gentleman, is shortly to be established in Canton, and that the Editor, types and other concomitants had arrived in the Ruby, Warden, from Calcutta.

On the 2nd of June the Military Commander-in-Chief went to the naval cantonments and reviewed the marines. At night the funeral rights of the late Mowqua were performed, one of which was to burn his residence in effigy. On the 4th, the three tribute-bearers from Siam, who arrived last year, reached Canton and embarked from Tow-lan-poo-low, the landing place of the British Counsulate. They had been treated in a very liberal manner by the Emperor, who conferred buttons, two blue and one crystal, upon them. They were accompanied by their own interpreter, holding an imperial proclamation in his hand, who had also had a golden button conferred on him. The 5th was the anniversary of the birth of the Nan-hae-heen's mother, and the usual visits, presents, &c., were made, and blessings invoked on her age.

The opium market had experienced some decline. Patna was selling at 640 dollars per chest, with very little demand; Benares at 580 dollars per chest, with great demand; and Malwa at 610 per chest, nominal valuation.

REVIEW OF THE CALCUTTA MARKET.

(From A. E. Kuhn's Monthly Price Current, August 31, 1835.)

INDIGO.—The prospect of the present crop is not quite so brilliant as it was a month ago; advices of a distressing nature have since been received from some parts of the districts, and particularly from the Upper Provinces, complaining of damage received by the late heavy rains. Jessore and Tirhoot are said to have suffered particularly. Accounts from Kishnagur, Dacca, Rungpore and other eastern parts are of a more favourable nature. The crop is still expected to be an average one, which would be about 1,20,000 maunds, as the average of the last ten years is about 1,19,000 maunds, viz.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1825—26 | maunds | 1,14,000 |
| 1826—27 | do. | 90,000 |
| 1827—28 | do. | 1,48,000 |
| 1828—29 | do. | 98,000 |
| 1829—30 | do. | 1,41,000 |
| 1830—31 | do. | 1,20,600 |
| 1831—32 | do. | 1,25,000 |
| 1832—33 | do. | 1,22,300 |
| 1833—34 | do. | 93,800 |
| 1834—35 | do. | 1,05,800 |
| | | 11,88,500 |

that of the ten years previous 1825-26 was on the contrary only 87,620 maunds.

The average Imports into Great Britain of the last ten years were 25,800 chests, and of the ten years previous only 16,340 chests. The mean consumption and Exports of the last ten years of Great Britain were 25,430 chests and of the ten years previous 17,940 chests. Hence it will be observed that the Imports of Indigo into Great Britain were counterbalanced during the last 20 years by its consumption and Exports.

The average stock on the 31st December of the last ten years in England, appears to be 29,496 chests, and of the ten years previous 20,110 chests.

The stock on the 31st December, 1834, was a very moderate one, comparing it with the average of the five years previously, being 29,350 against 34,602 chests.

Considering the above statements, which establishes a progressive increase, not only in the cultivation here, but also in the consumption and exports from Great Britain—the moderate prices of the late sales in London, may yet further improve the demand for continental Europe, and thus have a favourable influence in the prices of our next season.

We have no sales to report since our last number, the remaining stock of about 2000 maunds will be employed for our own consumption.

OPIUM.—Considerable activity prevailed during the month, owing to the favourable news received from China; our prices which have already improved, may go still higher should the scarcity of rain in the Malwa districts produce the customary result. Shipments to China are in full progress. The quantity in the Hon'ble Company's Godowns is about 3000 chests.

RAW SILK.—The account given in our last number of the injury done to the June bund by excessive rain, we are now enabled fully to confirm. It is ascertained that the mulberry trees have suffered much from the violent showers, and the consequent difficulty experienced by the natives in drying the wet leaves, has naturally occasioned a great destruction of the worms. The remaining bunds will be therefore not only of unusually inferior quality, but also extremely unproductive. This falling of in our anticipated supply arising from the unusual state of the weather, will become much more important, owing to the retirement of the Hon'ble Company from the trade. The discharge of the natives employed heretofore in the Government filatures, and the number of persons otherwise engaged in the cultivation, thrown out of work, have given rise to some disturbances in the neighbourhood, which however have been promptly repressed. It appears improbable that the great deficiency thus established will be made up by the enterprize of individuals in less than 2 or 3 years, if ever then.

The progress made by private cultivators during the last year may be estimated from the official returns of the imports into Calcutta (vide Mr. Bell's report.)

In 1833 34 they amounted to mds 7244.

Shewing an increase of 1192 mds. But this is a poor set off against the diminished supply from the Hon'ble Company's aurungs, being 10710 mds. in 1833-34 against 6124 in 1834-35, thus leaving a deficiency of 4586 mds., and deducting from this amount, the increase by the private trade, there results a net deficiency of 3394 mds. being nearly equal to 20÷ discount on the total exports of 1833 34.

The good silk, having been (with the exception of the Honorable Company's produce) nearly all shipped, and the June bund not having arrived, our transactions are too insignificant to require further detail.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Thus in 1833-34 | private trade pcs. | 641,446. | |
| | Hon. Com. „ | 102,272. | |
| | | | pcs. 743718 |
| And in 1834-35. | Private trade pcs. | 717,236 | |
| | Hon. Com „ | 19,846 | |
| | | | „ 737082 |
| Leaving a deficiency of .... .... .... .... | | | pcs. 6636. |

The large exports to Great Britain during the past commercial year, have, from being viewed on one side only, much tended to depress our prices. We allude to due allowance not having been made for the reduced exports by American ships, and the necessity of which to form a correct estimate, is proved by recent advices from London, where a considerable portion of the very active demand for exports was stated to be for American account. If the comparison on the last two years be made, to include the United States, the excess will appear but trifling in face of the well ascertained fact of increasing consumption in these two countries.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| In 1834 35. | Exports to Great Britain | pcs | 356984 |
| | do. to America | | 62062 |
| | | | 419046 |
| In 1833-34 | do. to Great Britain | pcs. | 217865 |
| | do. to America .... „ | | 147146 |
| | Excess .... .... | pcs | 74015 |

If we suppose that the London Market, at the time of the latest advice, was feeling the full effect of our exports up to December 1834 inclusive, and which taken from 1st May to 31st December averaged 30484 pcs. per month, (including 34089 pcs. shipped in May by the Hon'ble Company) there can be little doubt of the home prices being at least fully maintained, as the following months, January to July last inclusive, are barely to the extent of 30000 pcs. Thus the stock at home diminished by the increased demand for exports and local consumption will not be enlarged in an equal ratio by the supplies from hence. We may therefore, under all the circumstances, regard our market to be at the lowest, with every tendency to improve.

COTTON.—Bandah is very scarce, and consequently shipments to Great Britain are much restricted. Jalone remains neglected. On the other hand heavy shipments of Cutchra are in progress to China; the price has slightly improved, upon the late favourable advices from Canton, but as the season is drawing to a close a further rise is very improbable. Although our shipments to China have been heavy during the last quarter, they are still much under the average consumption, hence prices in China are expected to maintain, and more particularly as the supplies from Bombay are but trifling, consequent upon the failure of the crop.

SALTPETRE.—The market is bare of the best qualities; Godna is particularly wanted, but of Cawnpore and Chuprah the stock is large; should freights decline the article will doubtless improve. The sales during this month have exceeded those of the former one, principally for the English and American markets.

SUGAR.—There are no fine Benares for sale in the market, and none to arrive. Good qualities are to be had in moderate quantities, inferior is scarce. The present high rates of freight impede shipments to Europe.

LAC.—Good marks of Lac Dye are rather scarce, prices are expected to improve, the inquiry in general is not brisk. Shell Lac, stock very heavy, prices which have already declined since our last number, may experience a further depression—We are not aware of any transaction in Stick Lac.

RICE.—The appearances for the next crop continue to be favourable. There has been during the month rather more inquiry for the Canton and Mauritius markets, and shipments for these ports are in active preparation. The prices of Munghy and Bellam are expected to improve.

WHEAT.—Advices from the Upper Provinces exhibit enhanced rates, and our prices may consequently be considered susceptible of improvement. Rice and Wheat have experienced a considerable rise at Bombay, owing to the scarcity of rain. Should the drought unfortunately continue, it will no doubt tend to keep up our prices.

HIDES AND HORNS.—The low prices appear to have attracted the attention of buyers, and lately the American have appeared again in the market. The existing rates will probably advance, should freights become more abundant. Our stock is still a very heavy one. In Horns and Horntips business were limited.

HEMP AND JUTE.—No sales are come to our notice; prices may have a further decline.

LINSEED.—The prices have experienced some depression, owing to the high rates of freight to Great Britain. Our stock begins to be heavy, speculators being obliged to store.

SPICES, DRUGS, &c.—Cloves purchases to some extent are reported with improvement in prices. Coffee very little of good remaining in the bazar. Gambier prices expected to improve, stock moderate. Ginger now arriving from the interior, has experienced a decline in prices, but should freights for England become more abundant, prices may improve. Munjeet good quality, scarce; inferior, neglected. Pepper has been in some demand; prices steady. Safflower, good quality, very scarce, and much wanted, inferior abundant, and prices declining. There has been some inquiry for Fincal, with a slight improvement in prices, the sales reported are for shipments to England.

METALS.—Copper.—The Peruvian Copper lately arrived by the United States, (mds. 11,000,) has been nearly all sold. British Tile has experienced but trifling fluctuation since our last, the stock is gradually diminishing. The prices generally may be considered as safe for some time to come. Spelter no variation, the stock is steadily reduced by the customary demand for the interior. Iron, assorted flat, round and square has experienced a decline. Sheet and hoop fully maintain their previous rates, with a disposition to improve. Stock is in general heavy. Steel, Sweedish, prices expected to improve, there being but little remaining in first hands. Leads our prices have receded, owing to the large stock, they are now considered to be tolerably safe. Tin plates, looking up, supply having been of late reduced. Quicksilver, much wanted.

TWIST.—The continued small imports have influenced our market and our assortments are generally on the advance. The stock in first hands is greatly reduced. The report of sales shew the rates which were obtained during the month. Turkey red Twist is in good demand, but orange neglected. In pink and other fancy colours nothing worthy of notice has taken place.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—Shirtings and Long cloths, the market has been well supplied, and the prices of the current qualities, although supported, do not appear likely to improve. Some few lots of fine qualities have been sold for local consumption at an advance—Cambrics in fair request. Jaconet, the fine and low qualities are now much in demand; middling remain dull of sales. Medium and Mull, improved demand on the approach of the great holydays. Book Muslin, the Burmese have appeared to some extent in the market, our buyers for other ports have been very shy. Check'd Muslin, dull of sales. Lappets, fine, much enquired after, other qualities neglected. Honey Combs in steady demand. Japan spots, finel and good are much wanted. Dimity will not improve untill the cold season. Striped Doriahs in moderate demand.

Chintz, fine, neutrals are wanted for the interior; single coloured plates steady; Bengal stripes on fine cloth enquired after. Ghinghams of steady sale. Turkey red Handkerchiefs of good colors and patterns very saleable at present, inferior neglected.

WOOLLENS.—Town Cloth scarce, and wanted—Long Ells demand expected to revive, stock also very small—Coarse Woollens have been occasionally sold during the preceding month, but were in general very dull. Flannels scarce of sales at low rates. Bombazettes, a temporary demand prevails.

FREIGHTS.—The continued absence of the London traders, and the great afflux of shipping to China, have for the present much reduced the available tonnage for Europe, and our rates continue to be high.

This state of things must, however, in the natural course of events, be speedilly altered.

PUBLIC LIBRARY MEETING.

A public meeting took place on Monday the 31st August, at ten o'clock, to elect a committee, and arrange all such matters as may be necessary to give existence and effect to the proposed Public Library. On the motion of Mr. Turton, seconded by Mr. Plowden, Sir J. P. Grant in the Chair.

Sir J. P. Grant, in taking the chair, briefly addressed the meeting. Considering the importance of the object in view at the present meeting, and with which we are already acquainted, I have thought it so much in connection with the advancement of literature in this country as to induce me to depart from a rule I have adopted and accept the honor of taking the chair on this occasion. I think it right also to make an explanation, which under circumstances other than those that have occurred would have been unnecessary, namely, that this meeting has no connection with political questions, but is for the furtherance of a purpose purely literary. I think it the more necessary to make this explanation, as with reference to the situation which I hold, it would be for me extremely unbecoming to take the chair at a meeting where questions as to laws proposed, or as to laws passed, formed a subject for discussion. My duties are of a very different nature, but when I say so, I by no means desire to be understood as taking no interest in the advancement of liberty of thought, liberty of speech, or liberty of action. I think to do so were as inconsistent with the character of a British Judge, who, indeed, may be considered a priest of liberty, as it would be inconsistent with my life and foreign to my habits, disposition, and the course which I have hitherto pursued. (Applause). I make these remarks because I have learned from the newspapers, that on another occasion something was thrown out with regard to the object of this meeting, and I also happen to know, that it has, unfortunately, deprived us of some useful assistance which we might otherwise have had on this day. Therefore I am now extremely desirous it should be perfectly understood that this meeting has no other object in view besides obtaining the means to purchase a collection of books for the use of the inhabitants of Calcutta, and that it has no more connection with the recent act of Government emancipating the press, than it has with questions relating to the arts of type-founding, book-binding, or printing. Without these arts, certainly we cannot have books; but as certainly there is as little occasion at this meeting for a gentleman to rise and speak with referene to the liberty of the press, as there is for another to dwell on the law of libel, for a third to dilate on the art of type-founding, and a fourth on that of book-binding, or to shew how books may be protected from the insects that infest them in this country. I would particularly urge that gentlemen who may address the meeting would keep in mind the subject before it, and which I have endeavoured briefly to explain. (Applause.) I believe this is the only society of the same extent which has not a library of some description: at the Cape, at Bombay, they are better provided, and Madras has its Literary Society; but here, in Calcutta, we are without the means of reading, except by purchasing books, from Humphrey Clinker up to Hume's History of England. This, I think, is a very great inconvenience, and we even have no means, except the expensive one I have just mentioned, of procuring books of light literature which form the main reading of the greater part of the community; or of those books which no man would purchase, or refer to except for the purpose of seeking out some particular information or referring to some particular point. But the particular object we have in view will be better developed by the resolutions, which I hope will meet with general approbation. They have been drawn up to meet the convenience of all classes of the community, by no means excepting those young men, natives of this country, who are most meritoriously pursuing their studies and whose means do not afford them opportunities of purchasing books. Sir John Grant then apologized for the time he had occupied the attention of the meeting, and concluded by strongly recommending the gentlemen to abstain from making remarks that did not bear on the subject they were met to consider. (Loud applause.)

Mr. C. W. Smyth.—After all that has been said, written, and especially after what has fallen from the chairman on this subject, I will not detain you by speaking generally, as to the advantages held forth by this proposition; and indeed it is the more unnecessasy, since, whatever difference there may be as to details, all are agreed that it will be highly advantageous to the inhabitants of Calcutta. However it is as well to call your attention to the liberality of the principle which opens the library to all ranks of society, and renders intelligence available to all. This is an extensive, liberal principle, worthy of the era that has produced the Emancipation of the Press, the greatest blessing ever bestowed on British India. The resolution I have the honor to propose is as follows:

Resolved,—"That it is expedient and necessary to establish in Calcutta a Public Library of Reference and Circulation, that shall be open to all ranks and classes without distinction, and sufficiently extensive to supply the wants of the entire community in every department of literature."

It has been suggested that the library should not be one for the circulation of books; but this would deprive it of its usefulness, and render it quite inadequate to the purpose; it has therefore been proposed to make it a circulating library, to meet the wants of all, and indeed were it otherwise, I for one would withold my support. In conclusion I would earnestly press on the attention of the committee the necessity of having a good managing committee, for the error of committees, is the rock on which former libraries in Calcutta have been wrecked and destroyed, and I trust the meeting will not separate without paying some tribute to the gentleman (and here Mr. Stocqueler) to whom we are indebted for the excellent proposition we are here to consider. (Applause.)

Mr. H. M. Parker.—I take the opportunity, in seconding this resolution, to say a few words with reference to a subject, which has been very properly taken notice of by our worthy and distinguished chairman, though indeed I cannot see by what strange confusion in men's minds the building to commemorate the emancipation of the press has been mixed up with a public library. Perhaps, however, the public being a body with many eyes, has on this occasion seen obliquely, or possibly I was unable on a recent occasion to make the public comprehend my meaning. However, this I must say, that the proposals for a building and for a library are entirely distinct, and though in ten or fifteen years, the proposers of the former may have a very handsome and commodious building to offer for the reception of the latter, it is still quite possible that its acceptance may be refused. Refused? Yes for I hope the library may be in a condition not to require it, and before that time there may be several libraries in Calcutta, and that the spread of knowledge may be as rapid as the spread of intelligence.

The resolution was then put from the chair and carried nem. con.

Mr. Pattle.—It devolves on me to propose for your adoption the second resolution, and to which I shall make but a short preface, for on these occasions I hold it best to say as little as possible; and luckily for me who cannot boast of being able to say much, and much to the purpose, the necessity of doing so has been completely superseded, by what has fallen from our distinguished chairman, and my worthy colleague. Indeed they have so well explained the object we have in view, and so completely cleared up any confusion which may have been occasioned by the recent meeting for carrying into effect another object, that I have nothing to say on those subjects; but I may however mention, that this proposal presents some peculiar features that I cannot reconcile myself to look over. The advantages it presents to our native fellow subjects cannot be too strongly dwelt upon for it is a peculiar feature, a principal recommendation, that it will aid their enlightenment, and teach them to place a proper estimate on the blessings of British rule. When they do once properly appreciate the advantages resulting from that Government, they will be convinced that there is none other under which they could derive the same degree of happiness and prosperity. I for one would rather the British rule should cease in this country if it can only continue by means other than the affection of the people; but I am convinced that rule only requires to be known to be appreciated. Let but knowledge find its way to the minds of the natives of this country, and they will require no other proof of the superiority of the present Government to the Mahomedan one that preceded it. This is one of my motives for supporting this proposal, and fortunately, the proposers intend that it shall be a library of circulation, hereby extending its benefits, and making it more deserving of our support. Mr. Pattle concluded by moving the following resolution:—

Resolved,—That a Provisional Committee be appointed to consider of the best means of accomplishing the objects stated in the first Resolution—to frame a set of Rules and Regulations for the management and use of the Library, and the conduct generally of its affairs, and to report the same, together with their opinion, to a subsequent meeting, to be called by public advertisement in the newspapers by the Committee as soon as they shall be prepared with the report.

Rev. Mr. Dealtry said, the resolution had his most hearty concurrence, and in seconding it he was convinced he was humbly but earnestly contributing towards the means of circulating knowledge not only through this city but through this great empire.

Sir J. P. Grant then moved the first resolution from the chair and it was carried unanimously.

Mr. Prowden briefly proposed the third resolution, which was seconded by Mr. James Kyd, and adopted by the meeting. It is as follows:—

Resolved,—That the Committee be empowered to apply for the temporary use of apartments in the Town Hall; and in case these cannot be obtained, then to hire apartments for the reception of the books in an airy and central situation, upon as reasonable terms as dry and elevated apartments can be procured for; and to purchase suitable book shelves and furniture of a plain and not costly description. Further, that the Committee be empowered to engage such persons as may be necessary to take charge of the books, rooms and furniture; and to make catalogues, keep accounts and copy correspondence, and generally to assist them in the duties they undertake, a strict regard being paid to economy, to the state of the funds and amount of the subscription.

Before the resolution was put from the chair, Mr. Kyd took the opportunity to mention, that he had just received a letter from Dr. Strong, of which the following is an extract:—

"The Rev. Dr. Marshman is now at my house and will attend the meeting. He says he is willing should it be thought desirable, to be one of a Committee for the object of arranging the matter,—you are aware how valuable a man he would be. He does not like to propose the thing himself but has sanctioned me to write as much to you. I had intended being myself at the meeting but my complaint does not allow me. Will you kindly put his name down for any sum that you may subscribe yourself, and if I had been there and an opportunity had offered I meant to have offered the lower part of my house for any books that might accumulate until a proper place was ready for them: you may, if you please, make the offer for me. There is a separate entrance and the rooms are, high, airy and large."

Dr. Marshman stated to the meeting that the apartments offered by Dr. Strong were in his opinion admirably adapted for the purpose. But, as will be seen, the matter was left to the committee, and a suitable acknowledgment given to Dr. Strong for his kindness. The resolution was then put from the chair and carried.

Mr. W. P. Grant.—The resolution which I have to propose, is merely one of detail, and does not occasion a necessity for detaining the meeting with any lengthy remarks. I shall, therefore, briefly express my hearty concurrence with a plan which goes to establish a library on an extensive plan; not of books for reference only, but of books for circulation also. In Calcutta, where almost every man is engaged in business, to make the library one for reference only, would be circumscribing its utility; indeed it would render it almost useless, for under those circumstances the books are the more required for perusal at home. The following is the resolution, which I hope may meet with as much approbation as those that have preceded it:—

Resolved.—That it be recommended to the Provisional Committee to enquire in to the means of procuring books in Calcutta, which may serve as a foundation to commence upon; and to make application to the Government for such assistance in this respect as the Committee shall judge proper in the name of the subscribers. And that the Committee be empowered to receive subscriptions, and such donations of books, as the patrons of the institution may be disposed to make to it, the result of such enquiry and application and the amount of such subscriptions and donations to be in their report.

Mr. Grant, in conclusion, drew the attention of the meeting to the libraries in Edinburgh, where, he said, there are no less than three accessible to strangers, viz. that for the Faculty of Advocates, for the Writers of the Signet, and the College Library. These, said Mr. Grant, are perfectly at the disposal of persons be they residing in Edinburgh, or be they only sojourners there for a week or a fortnight, and many persons, in the latter case, who, perhaps, had entered the city with a single volume in their portmanteau, could declare the degree of pleasure experienced by them in cosequence of this facility.

Mr. A. Rogers briefly seconded the resolution.

Mr. G. T. Speed here suggested that there ought to be a call on the friends of the library to send in the names of such books of reference as might be obtainable in Calcutta. Mr. Rogers thought details ought to be left to the committee, and the meeting coincided with the latter gentleman. The resolution was then put and carried.

Mr. Minchin, after a few prefatory remarks, moved the following reolution.

Resolved.—That the Provisional Committee, or such of their number as they shall appoint, in writing, for this purpose, be at liberty to draw from the Treasurer, from time to time, such sums as may be necessary for current expenses, not exceeding the amount in his hands, and to call upon the Treasurer, from time to time, for an account of receipts and disbursements.

I hail, said Mr. Minchin, the institution of this library, not only so far as the community of Calcutta concerned are but as a society likely to benefit the natives of this country generally. For by extending to them the literature of England, we induce then to cultivate the knowledge of our language, and afford them the means both of improving their literature and their morals.

Colonel Dunlop second the resolution, which was put from the chair and carried without opposition.

Mr. H. Torrens proposed the sixth resolution, being merely for the formation of a Provisional Committee and which with subsequent alterations stood as follows—the names in italics being added to the original motion:—

Resolved.—That the following gentlemen be requested to form the Provisional Committee:—

The number of names on the list, Mr. Torrens observed, might appear unwarranted, but they were to be divided into sub-committees of four or five, each sub-committee taking different sections. As to the gentlemen themselves he need not enter into any panegyric because the simple utterance of each name conveyed its own panegyric.

Mr. Leith seconded the resolution, and did so with greater pleasure, because it contained the names of gentlemen whose experience and attachment to literature and science would secure for their constituents the most important services, and enable each particular section to have its own representative, in this, as it might be considered, congress of the republic of letters—gentlemen who are acquainted, and familiar with each section, and from whom we may hope that the institution will derive the most beneficial results. The term "provisional" had been adopted to distinguish it from the other committee whose duty it would be to propose rules, fill up details; and though last not least, to purchase books, collect subscriptions, and organize the construction of the library. The united efforts of these gentlemen he, Mr. Leith, felt confident would raise a structure which would merit the support of the whole community.

Mr. Pattle said, the gentleman who has just sat down has spoken of a committee intended to represent the different classes of society, but he, Mr. Pattle, observed that in the formation of the committee, the mercantile class appear to be wholly unnoticed. Perhaps this had arisen from a conjecture that mercantile gentlemen had not time to attend to the details, but still, as there was to be a sub-committee, he thought the meeting ought not to omit a compliment to gentlemen of so much importance. He would, therefore, propose, that the names of Mr. Carr and Mr. Harding be added to the number. As to their distinguished chairman, he was sure the meeting were aware of the deep interest Sir John Grant took in the proposed institution; there was no one more anxious, no one more able to further their views, and he trusted that the meeting would not allow him to depart from this hall, without requesting permission to place him on the committee.

Sir John Grant was fully sensible of the very flattering proposal, but would rather decline the honor; not from any disinclination to the office, but from a dislike to take upon himself duties to which he had not sufficient time to attend. If the meeting were of opinion that the duties were not so arduous but that he had leisure to attend to them, he would bow to their decision, premising, however, that it must not be considered as a compliment. No one was more able to bestow a compliment than his friend Mr. Pattle, but the making choice of a committee was a matter of business of which compliment should form no part; and rich as they were in names on the committee, they could not afford to have one inactive member.

Mr. Turton entirely concurred with Sir John Grant, and would put matters of compliment out of the question. But notwithstanding the number of the committee, he would propose that it should be increased by the addition of Mr. R. S. Thomson, a gentleman with whom he, Mr. Turton, had the pleasure of acting on one committee, and to whose usefulness and ability he could give ample testimony.

Mr. Sinaes admitted the correctness of the remarks made by Mr. Turton, but regretted that amongst the gentelemen whose names were contained in the resolution proposed by Mr. Torrens, there was only one who could be said to represent the class to which he, Mr. Sinaes, belonged. He thought the committee ought to be more general and under this impression he begged to suggest that the names of Mr. Woollaston, and Mr. Wale Byrn be added to the number.

Mr. P. S. D'Rozario and Mr. Crow rose at the same time and seconded this proposition. The latter said, he could scarcely hope that the resolution would meet with success, for he perceived that the feeling of the meeting was decidedly against it, (cries of no, no.) He would however do his duty, and offer a few remarks in support of the two gentlemen named by Mr. Sinaes, with both of whom he, Mr. Crow, was personally acquainted. He believed there was an impression on the mind of several gentlemen who had taken an active part in these proceedings, that the number on the list of the committee was already too great, but he thought otherwise, and begged of the meeting to consider whether the large number was not a circumstance in favor of Mr. Sinaes's proposition. The proportion which the East Indian bore to the European community, would point out that one East Indian was not a fair number to represent that class; and therefore he would submit for the favourable consideration of the meeting the proposition of Mr. Sinaes.

Mr. R. S. Thomson was sensible of the honor it was proposed to confer on him, and deeply indebted for the flattering compliment from Mr. Turton, but he would rather decline the honor, and for this reason—he believed the list of the committee, as it stood originally, was calculated to impart confidence to every friend of the proposed institution, and its enlargement might destroy that feeling. However if the meeting were of opinion that he could be of any service to the committee, he would cheerfully accede to their request.

Mr. A. Rogers supported the original resolution, and reminded the meeting that it was a classification of books, and not a classification of persons to which they had to attend.

Mr. L. Fraser spoke in favor of the original resolution, and urged that if it were departed from, the native community which stands in proportion of three hundred to one to the East Indian, had also a claim to be represented in the committee; so had the Jews, the Parsees, and indeed every other section of this diversified community.

Mr. Pattle suggested that the question should be referred to the committee, who no doubt would receive it with becoming attention; and he trusted that the proposer had that confidence in the committee which would induce him to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Crow would again beg to be heard before the amendment was put from the chair. He was ready to grant that the proportion of Natives to East Indians, was more than three hundred to one; but it was not the mass of the people that ought to be taken into consideration. Those who were likely to appreciate the proposed institution and to benefit by it in either class should alone be taken into consideration, and then he was sure that the proportion would not be so great as it otherwise appeared to be. The question of qualification, he thought, was one of a very delicate description, particularly when a comparison had to be instituted. He would, therefore, not enter upon it in detail. However he might observe that the names proposed by Mr. Sineas were of gentlemen who stood high in the opinion of the East Indian community and in the opinion of those who knew them for the performance of duties that were likely to devolve on them as members of the committee. He said it was not only those who would devote their time, but also those who had influence in the class to which they belonged who ought to be selected; and for that purpose those who were connected with public institutions, and known as the promoters of public and liberal measures, were most likely to benefit such an institution as was now proposed. On the contrary, those who led a secluded life, it was not likely would be so successful in that respect. With these considerations, he begged to press the proposal of Mr. Sinaes on the attention of the meeting.

Mr. Turton was anxious to state the grounds on which he supported the amendment. He thought there was a great deal in what had been advanced by Mr. Crow, not only with regard to the literary qualifications of the gentlemen alluded to, but for other reasons. Was it nothing, that there should be on a committee who were to draw up rules and regulations, persons who are acquainted with the habits and taste of a large portion of that community for whose benefit the institution was intended? It had been said that the committee were to be the literary representatives of this community, but how can this community be represented by persons who have no knowledge of their wants? As to the number of the committee it mattered little, since there was to be a sub-division, which would enable them to divide their labours, whether there were twenty-one or twenty-four, or any other reasonable number; and as there was but one native on the committee, he thought if he had a coadjutor it would greatly increase his efficiency. Therefore, he would prefer the committee to be unlimitted and he would propose that Baboo Russomoy Dutt be added to the number.

Mr. J. R. Colvin begged to add his testimony of the utility of Mr. Woollaston. No man, said Mr. Colvin, is capable of giving more solid information to the committee, or will be a more useful member of it.

Mr. Sinaes's amendment was then put, and carried by a large majority. The amendment is embodied in the resolution above.

Mr. TURTON.—When his friends prepared the resolution, he believed that they must have had Mr. Pattle's opinion before them as to the propriety of short speeches, for they had assigned to him the driest resolution in the whole lot. It was one merely relating to finance. However, though he, Mr. Turton, did not excel as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would endeavour to explain the principle on which it was proposed the institution should be founded. Mr. Turton then explained the substance of the resolution, which, with an alteration suggested by Mr. Greenlaw, stands as follows :—

Resolved.—That the property of the Library be vested in trustees for the benefit and use of shareholders, and that the following payments do constitute persons proprietors and subscribers.

PROPRIETORS.—Every person subscribing 300 rupees in one payment, or in three payments of 100 rupees each —100 rupees being paid down, and the remaining instalments at intervals of six and twelve months, to be considered proprietors.

The shares of original proprietors subscribing within the period of one twelve-month, to be transferrable on such fine or conditions as the Privisional Committee shall determine. The question of transfer of future shares to be left open to the Committee.

SUBSCRIBERS.—The subscription to the Library to be as follows :

1st Class.—Entrance 20 rupees, and 6 rupees per mensem, for every month subsequent to the first. Such subscribers of 2 years standing, or upwards, to be entitled to become shareholders, by an additional payment of 200 rupees.

2d Class.—Entrance 16 rupees, and 4 rupees per mensem, for every month subsequent to the first. Subscribers of this class of 4 years standing to be entitled to become shareholders by an additional payment of 200 rupees.

3rd Class.—No entrance. A subscription of 2 rupees per mensem payable from the commencement of the first month.

Donors of books and others, on the recommendation of the committee, may be nominated honorary members by a general meeting of proprietors.

No books to be taken out of the Library, without a deposit being made ; the amount to be regulated by a committee to be appointed annually by the proprietors out of their own body in such manner as shall be hereafter decided.

No books or periodicals to be taken out of the Library, until they shall have lain ten days upon the table ; after which period proprietors or suscribers of the 1st and 2d classes, will have the privilege of taking them out and reading them in circulation, preference being given to the proprietors and subscribers of the 1st class who may apply within a month after the arrival or purchase of such books.

All books to be delivered out in the order of application, subject to the above preference.

No other class to be permitted to take any books out of the Library without the permission in writing of the Annual Committee.

Mr. TURTON continued. He thought he had in his eye some trifling opposition to this resolution, for ruin had been predicted to the institution, if they were to adopt the first part of it. But he could not foresee the ruin that others apprehended ; on the contrary, he thought that the plan was admirably adapted to give permanence to the library. The part of the resolution which it was said would have a ruinous effect, was that which proposed persons subscribing Rs. 300 should become proprietors. He thought no injurious consequences would ensue from this, and he would inform the meeting why he thought so. In four years, subscribers of the first class, at six rupees per month, would pay Rs 303, and he put it to the meeting whether it was not a very good compromise to obtain 300 Rs immediately available for the purposes of the library, by making those who pay three years in advance free of all subscriptions afterwards. Taking into consideration who were likely to become subscribers, he did not think that the average time each individual would remain in Calcutta, would be more than four years, and possibly, of these the majority would become proprietors not so much with a desire to benefit themselves as to benefit the library. Taking the number of proprietors to be 100, this would raise a fund of Rs 30,000 to commence with. Without funds there could not be a library ; and though this might not be the best plan, he was quite satisfied that it was the best plan that had been as yet proposed.

Mr. PATTLE here suggested that donors of books that may be thought by the committee Rs 300 in value ought to be considered subscribers.

Mr. TURTON said, that point had not escaped the attention of the framers of the resolutions, but it must be borne in mind that a great number may wish to become proprietors on those terms. It was a consideration, he thought, that ought to be left entirely to the committee, for it could not be supposed that they would be so indifferent to the interests of the institution, that if they thought the proposal adapted to advance it, they would not propose its adoption.

Mr. W. P. GRANT said, it was a great object with the committee to raise a sufficient fund to purchase books in England.

Mr. H. M. PARKER thought that books to the value of Rs 300 was too small an amount to entitle persons to become proprietors, he would rather it should be fixed at Rs 1,000.

Mr. PATTLE reminded the meeting that there were many scrace and valuable books in this country which were out of print, and could not be obtained in England. But after some further conversation, the suggestion was left to the committee.

Mr. L. CLARKE said his friend Mr. Turton was correct when he anticipated opposition to the resolution just proposed. He, Mr. Clarke, had been one of the party who had met on a previous day to consider the resolution preparatory to this meeting, and he had declined to propose that resolution which his friend Mr. Turton had just moved, because he thought it was not founded on calculation, and that it defined rules which it were better at present to leave for more mature consideration in committee. He thought it would be necessary for the committee, before they come to the result contained in the resolution, to have a calculation as to the expenses of establishment, binding of books, stationery, and then the amount of surplus which might be applied to the purchase of periodicals, for without these there could be no library. This, in his opinion, ought to be the duty of the committee, before any such propositions as those contained in the resolution was brought forward, and he, Mr. Clarke, was quite certain, that if the minimum of that surplus was not the base for the committee to go on, it would lead the society into great difficulties. He knew the resolution had been formed without any calculation whatever. In fact, it originated with himself, for it was him from whom the idea fell at the preparatory meeting regarding shareholders, and he was quite sure it was a crude proposition without the slightest calculation for a base. For this reason he opposed the resolution. He contended that it would be fatal to the interests of the institution, and ought not to be adopted unless after mature consideration. But the rules were decidedly bad, for his friend proposed that on the payment of Rs 300, a proprietor should be free from all subscription for ever, whereas, the subscription of a subscriber of the second class in four years, would amount to more than that sum. Here then by the payment of Rs 300 a proprietor not only escapes all future payment but his heirs and assigns also. (Mr. Turton expressed his dissent from the statement.) Well, said Mr. Clarke, we shall see about that presently. A proprietor may transfer his share to whom he chooses by the payment of a fine of Rs 100 ; thus he has all the privileges of a proprietor for four years by the payment not of Rs 300, but of Rs 200, and he would appeal to many persons now near him, if a similar scheme for a proprietary had not ruined the Chowringhee Theatre, where an enormous debt was entirely occasioned by giving the benefit of the theatre without requiring the proprietors to pay any thing, and thus while the public paid eight rupees for an admission by purchasing a share, admittance was obtained at the rate of one rupee one anna for each performance. It was this very same principle his friend was now advising the meeting to adopt,—allowing the proprietors to have the benefit of the institution at too cheap a rate. There were other parts of the resolution which he, Mr. Clarke, objected to, but this he thought would be sufficient to induce the meeting to refer details to the committee, whose object ought not to be to make a great beginning to come to a poor end. But he, Mr. Clarke, had doubts as to the prudence in making it a share Library at all. He thought it ought to be a Public Library to remain here for ever, or if it were necessary to provide in the trust deed for its distribution, it might be so arranged that in the event of a distribution being necessary, the books should be given to Bishop's College, the Asiatic Society's Library, or the Martiniere. He called on the publilc not to make a share Library but a public Library. Let the friends of such an institution actively solicit support, and he had no doubt but that Rs 15,000 might be immediately raised for the purpose. He would not, however, come forward with a proposition to that effect at present, but merely propose an amendment as follows :—

"That it be referred to a section of the Provisional Committee, consisting of Messrs. Bell, W. P. Grant and James Prinsep, to prepare a draft of a Trust Deed for the constitution of the society and to prepare the rates of subscription and admission."

Mr. PLOWDEN seconded the amendment. He declared that previous to entering the room he had entertained a very different opinion, but Mr. Clarke's eloquence had convinced him that the Library ought to be strictly a public one.

Mr. TURTON begged leave to say a few words on this part of the subject, for Mr. Clarke's eloquence had not satisfied him that he was wrong, and if he was not greatly mistaken Mr. Clarke had but recently entertained these opinions. But possibly Mr. Clarke's mental eloquence may have had the same effect on Mr. Clarke himself as his oral eloquence had had on Mr. Plowden. He, Mr. Turton, happened to have a different opinion and was not quite so sanguine of raising Rs 15,000 as Mr. Clarke, for he thought that the public,—and he was sure he might place himself amongst the number,—did not like to advance their money in entire ignorance of the benefit to accrue from the gift. He for one would not countenance an object by giving his money to a crude undertaking, in which a committee who had been agitating the subject for two months were to come before a general meeting without a plan. In fact, he was not so willing, like his friend Mr. Plowden, as it was vulgarly said, to buy a pig in a poke. He was perfectly satisfied that the plan must precede the subscription, and that if the subject were referred to a committee of twenty-four, there would not be less than a dozen plans brought forward by as many members of the committee at the next general meeting.

Considerable discussion followed, in which Mr. Clarke, Mr. W. P. Grant, Mr. Plowden, Mr. Greenlaw, and Mr. James Sutherland took part. At the suggestion of Mr. Dobbs, the amendment was remodelled, and stood as we have given it above. Mr. Torrens spoke in favor of the amendment, and Mr. Leith opposed it.

Mr. TURTON would use his right of having the last word by asking Mr. Greenlaw what he meant by saying that the Library would not be a public one, for was it not as public when vested in proprietors as when vested in the public? But was the latter the most desirable plan to be adopted? Let the meeting look to the Bombay theatre and to the Ochterlony Monument. As to the former, the public in 1783 determined to build a place of amusement at Bombay, and Government gave a piece of ground for the purpose. There were no proprietors, no one to look after the interests of the building. Time passed on, a large debt accumulated, and at last, when it was discovered that the building could neither be sold nor mortgaged, Government took it under their charge, and appropriated it for a public office. As to the Ochterlony monument the evil of a want of proprietory was too apparent to require comment, and in God's name, gentlemen, said Mr. Turton, if you desire to avoid a similar neglect, vest your Library in those who will not be inattentive to their own interests. The amendment was then put and negatived.

Mr. GREENLAW then proposed another amendment, taking away the right of transfer from proprietors, but this after some further discussion was withdrawn, Mr. Turton limitting that right to proprietors who should become so during the first twelve months. The original motion, thus amended, was then put from the chair and adopted by the meeting.

The following resolutions were then put and carried without discussion :—

Moved by Mr. Sutherland, seconded by Russicklall Mullick.

Resolved,—That the Annual Committee be at liberty to issue tickets to poor students and others for temporary admission to the Library under such regulations as they may think fit.

Moved by Mr. Stocqueler, in the absence of Sir C. D'Oyly, seconded by Dwarkanauth Tagore.

Resolved,—That the foregoing resolutions relating to entrance subscriptions and privileges be considered only as a general outline, subject to such modifications as may be recommended by the Committee now appointed and adopted by a General Meeting to be called by the Committee.

Moved by Mr. Holroyd, seconded by Baboo Russomoy Dutt.

Resolved,—That the Union Bank be the Treasurers to the Institution.

Moved by Mr. H. Torrens, seconded by Captain D. L. Richardson.

Resolved,—That Mr. J. H. Stocqueler be requested to officiate as Honorary Secretary to the Institution.

Moved by Mr. Sutherland, seconded by ———.

Resolved,—That the thanks of the Meeting be conveyed to Dr. Strong for his liberal offer of rooms in his house for the temporary use of the Library.

Mr. STOCQUELER then rose to move what he believed would really be the last resolution. Previous to doing so, however, he begged to say a few words for himself. He begged to return his best thanks to Mr. Torrens for proposing that he should fill the office of Secretary to the Provisional Commiteee, and to the meeting for the manner in which the proposal had been received. He only hoped that such assistance as he might be able to afford the Committee in the prosecution of their labors would not be found altogether unavailing. Much had been kindly said about his claims to the merits of having originated the proposition for the formation of a Public Library. He believed that he had no just claim to any such merit. Indeed it was a reproach to the city to say that such a scheme was original. The project, it appears, had been brought forward before and failed, and it was merely his, Mr Stocqueler's, good fortune to have revived it at a time when society better understood its true interests, and when the rights of men were more readily recognized and better appreciated. He would now move that Sir J. P. Grant do leave the chair.

Sir J. P. GRANT in rising said, he could not vacate the chair without expressing how much the public were indebted to Mr. Stocqueler for his exertions. He was quite sure that without his energy and perseverance there would have been no meeting to-day.

Thanks were then unanimously voted to the chair, and the meeting separated.

FREE PRESS DINNER.

CALCUTTA, TOWN HALL, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1835.

The dinner to celebrate the act whereby the Press in this country is rendered free, took place at the Town Hall, on the 15th September.

T. E. M. TURTON, ESQ., in the Chair.

H. M. PARKER, ESQ., Deputy Chairman.

After the first toast, "THE KING," had been drank, the company standing, and the band playing the national air.

Mr. TURTON.—In rising to propose "the Liberty of the Press," I cannot but commence by expressing my regret for your sakes, and the sake of the cause—not for my own, that the chair should not have been taken by some of those talented and influential persons who were invited to it. (Hear, hear, hear!) I would rather that this duty had devolved upon some one more capable of doing it justice than myself—upon some one whose station should have added weight to the cause, and whose eloquence should have impressed more deeply on your minds the importance of the subject. But, gentlemen, this much I may say, that whatever I may yield in weight and influence—however inferior I may be to those to whom I have alluded in the powers of eloquence, I yield to none in the warmest feelings of the heart, in the deepest sincerity of attachment towards the cause we are met here to celebrate. From the time I could first lisp in politics, my great and guiding stars, the chief objects of my political aspirations have been three great questions. First, that measure of justice to a large portion of our oppressed fellow subjects, which at last has been conceded to them—Catholic Emancipation. Secondly, that essentially great object, which, I scarce dared to hope for, but have at last happily seen triumph—a Reform in Parliament—and last, not least, I have ever felt the paramount importance of the Liberty of the Press. (Applause.) Gentlemen, it was ably said by Sheridan, "I fear no corruption, either in the State, or in the Government, while the Press exists. Against venal Lords, Commons, or Juries; against despotism of any kind, or in any shape let me but array a Free Press and the liberties of England will stand unshaken." (Applause.) Gentlemen, I believe it. This was the observation of a firm assertor of the people's rights, not in the best of times, or governments, when his attention was naturally and chiefly directed to the protection of the people. But he might have gone a step further. He might, I think, have successfully maintained that a good government is equally interested in the maintenance of the Press—that while a Free Press protects the people from despotism, it also protects the government from sedition. If ever there was a country in the world in which a Free Press is essential, it is in this country, where it is said we have no public; and where we certainly have no representation. It is the misfortune of those in power, whether Kings or Governors, that they are usually surrounded by persons who imbibe their sentiments and their prejudices, who move in the same sphere, who breathe only the same atmosphere, frequently by those whose interest it is to conceal the sentiments of the public. To meet this, to allow the voice of truth access to them, there are only two modes. A free representation, or a Free Press. (Applause.) Without these we must live dependent on the personal habits, the soundness of understanding, and the sense of justice of the person who may happen to govern India. If he possesses all these qualities, he may indeed make despotism the best of governments; but where is the security for it? There is no security for ordinary and common justice but in free institutions; and one of the first, if not the first, of these is a Free Press. I give it therefore to your acceptance as a toast, which comes home to the hearts and understandings of all. I give it not only as the best protection of the people, but the best instrument of good government.

"THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS!" See the conquering Hero comes.

Mr. TURTON.—Gentlemen, I will thank you to fill another and an overflowing bumper. It is the misfortune, gentlemen, of most persons called to temporary command in this country that they are so soon removed from it as to be unable to leave any distinguishing mark by which the character of their administration shall be handed down to posterity. To this however, gentlemen, there have been two remarkable exceptions in the persons of two individuals, who in a few short months created for themselves an imperishable fame, though of a very different nature. Each of them was equally distinguished in private life by every amiable and generous quality, by all those qualities, both of the head and heart which endear men to their friends, and make friends of all within the circle in which they move. One of these within three short months from the time when he was invested with power, distinguished himself by shewing that early education, early associations, and liberal connections were insufficient to guard him against the prejudices which he imbibed from those by whom he was surrounded in this country. In three months from his accession to the Government his political character was fixed for ever, and he stood marked as the oppressor of the people he was called upon to govern. The other in the same short time stood forward as the friend of their liberty; their liberator from the thraldom which the other had imposed. Gentlemen, one split upon the rock on which was laid the foundation stone of the temple to the other's fame. (Applause.) Need I say that I allude to two men as like in personal character, and as dissimilar in political conduct as any two men can be, Mr. Adam and Sir Charles Metcalfe. (Applause.) Gentlemen, it is not from any wish to say any thing offensive of Mr. Adam that I have introduced his name. Personally, as an individual, I had the greatest esteem for him—indeed, I may say that many of his friends are mine: and if I blame, I cannot at the same time withhold the expression of my regret at the course he took. I will not speak more of him—but before I dismiss him altogether, I may be permitted to say of him in the words of Falstaff "He misused the King's press most damnably." (Laughter.) Of Sir Charles Metcalfe, what is his private character? But I will venture to say, that his private virtues, his princely generosity, his open-handed charity and benevolence, his boundless hospitality will all be forgotten and unheard of, when this one act in favour of the liberties of mankind shall have united him to the history of the country which he governed—the history of British India, and handed him down to posterity as one of its noblest benefactors—as he

> "Who gave the Charter, by which life indeed > Becomes of price—a 'glory to be man." (Applause.)

Long may he who restored to us a Free Press receive the greatest praise that a Free Press can bestow. I say "restored," gentlemen, because, though it may not be known to all of you, a Free Press existed in India during the time of some of the ablest, and during the time of perhaps the best Governor which India ever knew. I am not going to enter into a history of the Press in India; but I may be permitted to observe that at least from the moment you had a Supreme Court established in this country, probably before, you had a Free Press. And you will find on reference to Hickey's Gazette, formerly published in Calcutta, some early numbers of which I have seen, that in the time of Warren Hastings, and during some of the most critical part of it, during the rebellion of Cheyt Sing, for instance, in which the conduct of the Governor-General was most freely canvassed, that the spirit of discussion was, to say the least of it, as rife as it is at this moment. And so it remained for a long time. In Lord Cornwallis's first administration, India remained without press laws. But when Lord Wellesley came out to this country, shortly after he had distinguished himself by a memorable speech against Lord Grey's motion for Reform, imbued with all the terrors of the French Revolution, and dread of the struggles of the people for liberty, shackles were imposed upon the press by the establishment in the year 1800 of the censorship, which were never removed until another Hastings came to free it. And though he had not the boldness to free it as completely as Metcalfe has done, let it be remembered that he was not backed by the overpowering sentiment of freedom in Europe, which we now see, or by a home administration as feelingly alive to it as that which will now second the efforts of Sir Charles. But let not this detract from his merit; rather let it be remembered, that he came to India about the time, I believe in the very year, in which Lord Wellesley imposed the censorship, that he has seen its workings throughout, that he has seen every part of British India, its remotest provinces, its native courts, that being intimately acquainted with the habits and character of its people, the result of his experience has been to discover, that the best mode of Government is to remove the shackles which his predecessors imposed, and to give to India a Free Press. (Applause). Gentlemen, I consider this the more glorious for Sir Charles, because it has been asserted that he is, in all things, wedded to the Court of Directors, and subservient to their wishes. He has belied the assertion by his acts, and shewn that he is unawed by their wishes when satisfied that they are opposed to the well being of the country. Gentlemen, it is perfectly well known that there are many in the Court of Directors, I know not whether a majority or not, who are not yet satisfied that free institutions, and above all, a Free Press are fitted for India—who may make it a reproach to him, in the words of Jack Cade, "That whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books, but the score, and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used:" (Laughter.) Nay, I dare say, some of these venerable worthies would denounce my friend Rustomjee, who sits opposite to me, as a traitor, "for that he, against the King, his crown and dignity, has built a paper mill! (Laughter). Gentlemen, it is possible that this act of Sir Charles Metcalfe, like that of the Roman Consul, who won the hearts of a whole people by giving freedom to the states of Greece, may not be confirmed by the senate. But I for one, do not believe it. Gentlemen, the Court of Directors dare not annul this act. They dare not so stultify themselves in the eyes of all England—of all Europe. But if so, whatever may be the case with us, Sir Charles will have a noble consolation. Like Flaminius, he will live for ever in the gratitude of the people whom he would have freed, and like him, he will have proved himself a better, a bolder, a more just and noble-minded legislator than his employers. Gentlemen, I make you no apology for the time I have been detaining you, for the subject is sufficient. You require none. (Applause.) Let us now toast.

"Sir Charles Metcalfe, the liberator of the Indian Press."—Charlie is my darling.

The toast was drank with tumultuous applause and "one cheer more."

Captain Higginson.—I rise to thank you for the toast which you have just so enthusiastically drank. However proud I may be of my connection with Sir Charles Metcalfe, I lament the task has not fallen into other hands, especially after hearing the eloquence of the gentleman who has just sat down. But it is fortunate that Mr. Turton has just preceded me, for you have now less occasion for the eloquence of another, and still less that I should inflict on you the heavy task of a maiden speech. Allow me, therefore, as briefly as possible, to return you thanks for the kind manner with which you have drank Sir Charles's health.

Mr. H. M. Parker.—I rise to propose a toast which for your sakes I am sorry it has devolved upon me to give, for you must exchange the eloquence of our excellent chairman for such poor words as are at my command, the regret on my own part is only lessened because I spare my friend opposite a portion of the fatigue which he would otherwise have to undergo. Gentlemen, the toast I rise to propose is "The Legislative Council of India who supported the Act for the liberation of the "Press." Gentlemen, according to every man's own reading there may be more discovered in this simple sentence than meets the ear, for much depends upon the placing of a comma or the introduction of an emphasis. I leave every one to modulate his voice on the occasion, to place his stops as he sees most fit—for my own part I will drink the toast in sincerity and good faith without either comma, emphasis, or note of interrogation. We know, and I hope we can allow for this, namely, that with other relics of the wisdom of our ancestors there lingers about in high places a notion of danger connected with the emancipation of the Indian Press. Gentlemen, there are a class of men to whom a little alarm, a little apprehension of evil is pleasant, let us conciliate them if possible by an admission that there is danger in the freedom of the Indian Press. Yes, there is danger; but where is the act of greatness, of glory, hardly of goodness on an extensive scale, which is not attended by danger? Yet in the council room of British India, I hope this word, where a great public benefit is in view, or where there is a great public duty to perform, is the very last we shall hear. Gentlemen, if we are afraid of danger we have no business here at all. But to produce unanimity as much as possible on this great question, to conciliate the gentle alarmists of the land, let us admit that there is danger. Yes, gentlemen, and there is danger in the employment of steam, there is danger in using a printing press (it is only a few days ago that we heard of a poor fellow losing his arm while engaged in throwing off a proof.) There is danger in going on ship board. But, gentlemen, because steam will explode shall we relinquish the mighty, the civilizing benefits of the steam engine? because the printing press will maim shall we abandon its use? because men are certain to be drowned at sea shall Britannia cease henceforth to have "Her march upon the mountain waves, "her home upon the deep?" I need not pause for a reply. But to revert to the Free Press in India. There is danger in it, but, gentlemen, "Out of this nettle "danger we pluck the flower safety"—safety to our internal Government, safety against foreign aggression. Of the people of this country can we not say as of others; they are not stocks, they are not stones but men. Yes! and being men think you that they can be so blind, so besotted, as not to appreciate a rule which voluntarily subjects its acts, and the acts of its functionaries, from the highest to the lowest, to a scrutiny, to a power of check so enormous, that say what we may, the most potent despot upon earth dares not run wholly counter to it. It is a remark and a true one that there is at this day more freedom of discussion in the court of Russia than there was in the court of Louis the Fourteenth. Yet the two despotisms are not comparable for a moment. Again the Ottoman, the descendant of Amurath and Bajazet, appeals to the people in vindication of his measures and for their support to his authority through the press. Gentlemen, I repeat, this people "are not stocks, they are not stones "but men;" but they would be worse than the brutes which perish did they fail to appreciate the power of controul, of controul over their rulers, which the British Indian government has now placed in their hands, nobly, freely, placed in their hands, to an extent which the brightest dreams of the wisest philosophers of modern Asia never ventured to contemplate—so much for the internal safety conferred by this great measure. As for the external, which mainly depends upon our internal strength, let the barbarian hordes who slaked the burning ruins of Praga with the blood of those heroic martyrs whose glorious lives, whose glorious deaths I cannot think upon without emotion, let those bloody cohorts come to our frontier; we will meet them there with a hundred thousand British bayonets; we will find for them on the banks of the Indus or the Sutledge another Austerlitz, another Ostralenka. But behind the broad shield of British valor we have another and a mighty power of national defence. It is the Free Press.—Through the Press we will ask the people of India to choose. To choose between falling down and worshipping the colossus of clay and of iron, with one foot trampling on the ruins of glorious, noble, heroic Warsaw, with the other planted amidst sighs, and groans, and tears in the gloomy deserts of Siberia.—We will ask this people I say, whether they will adore this monstrous image, whether they will become the slaves of an autocrat of slaves, within whose vast rule no man's words, hardly his thoughts, are free, or whether they will rally round the free flag of England, and secure rights already conceded to them, but which the Russian serf will not even dream of for centuries. Again, I say, gentlemen, these people "are not stocks, they are not stones but men." Ah, but, replies the wily Muscovite, who, like another gentleman nameless in this polite assembly, has been "a liar from the beginning." Ah, but I come not to assume the empire of India, but to relieve you from the dominion of the English, to restore the ancient princes of the land. This, supposing it really intended, would be kind, most kind. The Russian would make over the people of India to the tender mercies of the Chout and the Durrah—to the bloody Patan mercenary and to the Mahratta horseman. To the sabre of the Mahommedan and the Lion of the Punjab. Yet how could a Government, a government merely, answer such a declaration. All it could say of Russian perfidy would be considered but as a stratagem of state, a declaration rendered imperative by common policy, and one usually made on such occasions; but what further weight would it have than that which the declaration of one strange Government opposing its enemy, another strange Government, is entitled to? But the powerful voice of a Free Press could not be mistaken or misconstrued—it would challenge contradiction, and challenge without fear of refutation, when it exposed not only to the people, but to the princes of India, the undeviating perfidy of Muscovite policy—when it shewed to the people what would be the consequences to them, the Pindarry spear and the Moosulmaun sabre, ages of anarchy and misrule, if Russia spoke the truth—when it called upon the princes to demand form Russia what she had done with glorious, miserable Poland? what she had done with the Khans of the Crimea? what she had done with the Georgian Chiefs? what she had done with the Greek Patriots of Lambro and Riga?—all flattered, all cajoled, all soothed, till the ends of Russia were obtained, then betrayed, trampled on, destroyed. Gentlemen, I pretend to no more than the common sense which ordinarily falls to the lot of ordinary men. Yet I see these great things, as yet far off, and as in a glass darkly; they will not come to pass in our days, nor could the Press in its present state render such aid; but not the less am I assured, that when the hour of trial does come, such things must be born of a Free Press and of the good government of British India, which that free Press is so powerfully calculated to promote—shall I not then give credit for equal prescience, which is after all but a common calculation of common sense, to statesmen as much my superiors in judgment and experience as in station? I will, and therefore in perfect good faith without any marking emphasis, without comma, without note of interrogation, I give my pledge and call upon you heartily to honor it. Gentlemen, I give you "The Members of Legislative Council of India who supported the act for the liberation of the Press.

"THE MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA WHO SUPPORTED THE ACT FOR THE LIBERATION OF THE PRESS.

Mr. PATTLE—It is has been said by the gentlemen who as just sat down, that he felt less regret at proposing the toast you have just drank, because it has lessened the fatigue your chairman would otherwise have had to undergo. But I think, gentlemen, I have much more need of your indulgence to give effect to this toast, than your chairman who has appointed me to propose it. (Applause.) It may be said, gentlemen, that at the present time this country is not ripe for a representative system; that we are not to expect the greatest and most beneficial changes in these days. But if our hopes are now considered visionary, let us appeal to the original of this noble statue, and imagine if he were to start into life, what would be his feelings at seeing us assembled here in the Town Hall for this purpose? Yes, even though five centuries had passed, Cornwallis would be astonished at the movement, and would cry "Dispurse, dispurse, gentlemen immediately." (Laughter.) Our talented chairman has already commented on the advantages of a representative system, and it would be in vain for me to attempt to say anything with reference to a subject on which he has spoken; but a representative system is not all that comes within the scope of the toast, and though legislation with open doors will happen, God knows when in India, let us rejoice that we are excited by the principle which is now producing so much good effect in our own country, and remember that the progress of liberal opinions at home has been quickened by the opposition they have prostrated. Nor do I despair of seeing the same principle brought to bear in this country, and the less so, should we continue to be governed by a man whose wisdom has moved with the wisdom of the age he lives in, and who has seen with his eyes what the world must be, let any man oppose it as he may. (Applause.) And now, gentlemen, as there are several more toasts, and as I intend to remain till they are all disposed of, I shall not detain you any longer.

"A REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM AND LEGISLATION WITH OPEN DOORS."

Mr. TURTON.—The toast I am about to propose requires no preface; it comes home to the heart of every Englishman like an electric shock. It is the Navy that we always regard as our legitimate defenders: we know its value. Gentlemen, I should be unnecessarily detaining you if I prefaced further the Wooden Walls of old England. (Cheers.)

"THE NAVY."—Rule Britannia.

Mr. Turton.—I am about to propose the Indian Army, and I make no distinction between those who are generally called the King's and those who are called the Company's. I know nothing which could justify my doing so, and I would after having proposed the health of one have scorned to give the other as a second toast. (Cheers.) Brethren in arms—brethren in renown in the same field. (Cheers.) When I recollect that it was on the plains of India that the first Captain of his age first drew his unfleshed sword; that it was there he gathered his earliest laurels and laid the foundation of that after-renown, which I wish to heaven had been solely confined to arms, I know not how to separate those who are united by these deeds. But, gentlemen, be the character, or influence of that great commander what it may, he knows the Army of India well, and he has never ventured to send to command it any one but a brave and distinguished soldier,—one of his own companions in arms whom he knew that they could not but respect and esteem. (Applause.)

"The Indian Army."—British Grenadiers. (Loud cheers and one cheer more.)

Colonel Beatson.—It is with strong feelings of inferiority to those who have so eloquently addressed you that I rise; but it being necessary that I should return thanks, I am willing and proud to do the best I can; indeed, the task is more easy, but not less necessary, in consequence of our worthy chairman having disclaimed the absurd distinction between men who are only rivals in renown in the field, and who are brothers in arms. I am proud to say that in the opportunities which thirty years have afforded me, I have always found the most friendly feeling prevail between the two armies, increased, not diminished, in proportion to the merit of the officers who have joined H. M. troops from England. (Much applause.)

Mr. Henry Torrens.—It is with proud satisfaction, yet not, I trust, without a due and proper sense of my own inadequacy, that I find myself deputed to address you on a subject the most intimately and immediately connected with the cause of our meeting this evening. You have already hailed with heartfelt and enthusiastic applause the comments so ably made by our learned chairman on that essence of the spirit of independence,—Press-freedom in the abstract; whence is conceded to the governed the rightful power of comment on the acts of the governing body; whence the citizen possesses the means of exerting some degree of moral influence on the destinies of the community whereof he forms a part: whereby the injured man obtains the privilege of submitting his grievances to public opinion should they fail to meet with just arbitration from a supreme authority which may forget its duty to serve the individual while it controuls the state. Let me now speak to you of the agent to us in the distribution of these advantages—the Press of India. But a few, a very few short years ago, and who would have dared here to assert that such an agent of public opinion existed in the country? who above all could have dared do so being as myself the paid hireling of a nominally despotic government? who in those days could have imagined that the Indian Press would so soon become the acknowledged mouthpiece of the feelings of the people and be declared free? I look not, gentlemen, to the secondary agencies of the exertions of individual writers or the beneficence of individual rulers as having caused this great political revolution. No—a higher and more commanding influence has effected it,—the progress of liberal opinions,—the influx of popular feelings throughout so large a portion of civilised Europe has insensibly affected even our remote and semi-barbarous community;—those feelings, gentlemen, actuated by which men unarmed, friendless, poor, and powerless, have by combination and by union, overthrown the thrones of kings, destroyed the impiously arrogated divine right to hereditary tyranny, and demonstrated the post of chief magistrate of a people to be in truth a merely elective one, held on the tenure of the people. Well, not even despotic power in this country availed as a barrier to the moral progress of these opinions; and why?—because, thank God! the autocrat delegated to maintain that despotic power has been an Englishman himself, subject to the superior controul of elective assemblies, and compelled to admit in his policy something of the principle which regulates the acts of his nation's rulers. Other and more local causes have, of course, done much towards accelerating the operation of press freedom in India. I will not, gentlemen, again detail to you the history of the press already sketched by our chairman, nor touch on times Adamite, or pre-adamite. Such antidiluvian reminiscences have become matters of comment for the historian. I need not even make much mention of days intervening between them and our own time during the insignificant viceroyalty of the Earl of Arracan. His successor, gentlemen, is the ruler on whom of all past we may to-night look with most interest, as having been the first to acknowledge the press of India as in any way connected with the acts of the Supreme Government. Few here can, I doubt not, forget the sensation produced by Lord William Bentinck's extraordinary advertisement wherein he invited dissatisfied persons in general, and intelligent Indigo planters in particular, to supply him with what he termed information. This advertising opening for hints for legislation was a plain, straight-forward, commonsense sort of proceeding, sufficiently surprising in any head of a government, but doubly so as emanating from the Governor-General of India. Some laughed, some sneered, some condemned, and some few applauded, but the measure thus variously discussed, though certainly fraught with evil as the first sign of the secret intelligence system so much favoured by our late viceroy, had yet the beneficial effect of compromising him with regard to the press; for how could he, after appealing for aid to the agency of the public journals, deprecate with justice his subjects making the same appeal to the same power for the same purpose? Lord William's object in encouraging discussion in the public papers was two-fold;—firstly, he thereby elicited truth—that truth which he scorned, and distrusted taking openly and honestly at the fountain head. He obtained true information by the conflict of opposite opinions, and through the same means arrived at an accurate estimate of the moral character of those under his rule,—an advantage inestimable to one who like him ruled men by working on their passions and their prejudices. Secondly, Lord William favoured press discussion as a counterpoise to his own unpopular measures. He well knew the value of a safety valve for disaffection; and if in the escape of the noxious political gases something personally offensive to himself was elicited, what cared he? When contumelious paragraphs appeared, his Lordship became conveniently afflicted with Falstaff's malady of not marking, and politely placing information gained to the credit account, was content to spunge out the debtor column of disagreeable personal truths, quoad se, as per contra, not worth reckoning. In thus encouraging, however, such discussion, Lord William effected a singular revolution by bringing the officers of the Bengal Army in communication with the press in a manner up to his time unexampled in this country; and here, gentlemen, I approach a part of my subject which I would fain avoid were it possible. It involves a discussion of the most delicate nature, but which I feel it my duty, having been in some way compelled in proposing to you the Indian Press, to enter upon. I consider it my duty to do so in justice to many of those brave men whom you have but now enthusiastically cheered; for they have been unjustly stigmatised; and I as the son of a soldier, and one whose pride and pleasure it has always been to be the companion and the friends of soldiers, take satisfaction in rebutting the improper imputation. The officers of the Bengal Army have been termed captious cavillers at authority, insubordinate subordinates,—men who preferred writing their grievances to having them redressed—why? because they wrote in the public papers. Putting aside all question as to the rectitude of such proceeding, let me ask, were they the only body who did this or had they no precedent for such conduct? Did they not see the correspondence portion of the English United Service Journal teeming with statements of the unredressed grievances of Officers of H. M.'s Army, and H. M.'s Navy! or if they sought a nearer, a more immediate, colonial precedent—had they not before them similar expositions of injuries in the columns of the Colombo paper? They had all this, gentlemen, and they had more,—they were encouraged not only by precedent, but almost by precept. They had the example before them of the highest authority in the country,—a military man, ultimately their Commander-in-Chief. They saw that he favoured the press—that he attempted not to repress their publicly commenting on them. It is a moral absurdity to suppose for an instant that a man would rather write publicly of his grievances than apply to have it redressed through the proper channels; but when having done so he found it unredressed, was he to blame if under such encouragement he did at last betake himself to the public prints? Nay, more, when the Mofussil papers first appeared who was the earliest, the staunchest supporter of the one peculiarly devoted to the interests of the army,—who but Lord William Bentinck? It is remarkable that military discussions he never interfered with, and that it was only on certain abstract political reasonings, and on the injury officially sustained by civilians, that he interposed and threatened punishments for their publications. Could a military man—could any man then tempted be supposed able to resist the temptation? "I have a grievance to detail at Head-Quarters. I know that the principal military authority sanctions public discussion of military questions. I know that he reads regularly and with interest such and such a publication; is it surprising that while forwarding my official complaint I should endeavour to attract his attention to it by detailing the subject in the print he favours and peruses, and thus submit it to my chief and to the public at once."—No, gentlemen, blame not the Bengal officers. If they ever acted indiscreetly, theirs was not the indiscretion but his who sanctioned the action. If any one among them can have been supposed in this matter to have done wrong, it was not his fault but that of the chief whose duty it was to set him (if he did wrong) right. The acrimony, however, with which many of those discussions were conducted begot a style the reverse of creditable to the press. The uncompromising tone, and fearless statements of the up-country papers added fire to this fuel, and induced personally hostile recrimination, which I as a friend to the press now regret should have been entertained. I do so the more, because this abuse of free speech has induced certain of the later writers to fall into the mistake of compounding strong language with strong writing. The two are not incompatible; but it should be remembered that the satire of a gentleman is like his sword sharpest and most keen when most polished. The faults of the Mofussil Press were, however, those common to all juvenile political publications: they are the more venial as having been incurred in supporting the cause of independence. Its merits were its own. The quasi freedom of the press existing under our late viceroy was however of such a nature as to throw all writers into an anomalous position. Men were independent only on sufferance. Thus one priding himself on his boldness aimed at a dangerous distinction by trenching on the verge of undue and unnecessary acrimony; another exasperated by personal irritation disguised the working of individual feeling under the bastard semblance of independence, deceiving even himself in what he did. The honest act of our present ruler has abolished the anomaly I trust for ever, and will, I trust, remodel the character of the whole Indian Press. The acts of government are now open to free discussion; let then the subjects of comment be measures and not men. Do you who conduct the press learn to respect the engine you govern as it has been respected by those who govern you. I scout utterly the bare imagination of its being possible to see disaffection sown by means of the Anglo-Indian Press. If indeed the Press in India could ever be employed against the stability of our Government, the native press might be the means of operation. This, however, can at present be hardly anticipated. Those of the native community capable of reading the history of passing events, of commenting rationally on the proceedings of Government, must be sensible, that the advantage of the power now conceded to them must consist in its use, not in its abuse. They will appreciate the boon accorded to them whereby they enjoy a mean of self redress by bringing the story of their wrongs before the tribunal of the governing power, and of the public at once, and at the same time. He who desires just judgment will not commence by insulting the arbitrative power; and least of all could he do so through an organ now acknowledged as an integral part of the system of social government in India. The native press may oppose hereafter the ruling power, but it will only be when the political misdeeds of that power shall have themselves armed and given energy to the agents of opposition. Gentlemen, I have now acquitted myself to the best of my ability of a task most invidious and most difficult, in some measure forced upon me. Let me have the satisfaction of the conclusion of this loose address of hearing you cheer my toast with the enthusiasm it deserves and hail with warmth and sincerity the birth of the Free Press of India.

"The Press of India." (The toast was drank with great enthusiasm.)

Mr. James Sutherland.—As I have been long connected with the Indian press, it seems expected that I should acknowledge this toast. I feel that under any circumstances I should have been unequal to the task, and in the present case I labour under many disadvantages. I am suffering from indisposition, and I am brought into marked and striking contrast with a degree of eloquence which has seldom been surpassed in these halls. If, however, my language could correspond with my sentiments, I should not have to ask your indulgence; for in feeling upon this occasion I yield to no man. I congratulate you, gentlemen, that these walls for the first time have echoed the toast the liberty of the press—I congratulate you that the Indian press has received "a local habitation and a name" among the objects and institutions which are deemed worthy of being commemorated at a political festival of British subjects. I regret to see so few assembled on such an occasion, but some of the friends of the press it seems consider this an undignified mode of celebrating its freedom. I differ from them very widely, for I see no reason why, when in our own country, men the most distinguished for talent, rank and station, countenance this mode of commemorating political measures and events, we should consider that mode undignified. I say if this meeting has called forth one congenial association—if the eloquence you have heard has elicited one spark of enthusiasm in your bosoms, then is this entertainment neither useless nor undignified. The gentleman opposite, my friend, if he will permit me to call him so, (Mr. Torrens) has touched on various topics which would tempt me to trespass longer on your time than I should be justified in doing. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the press of India, it is from you it must take its tone, it can seldom do more than echo the sentiments of the community and must rely for its advancement on their support. The gentleman who spoke last has deprecated the violence of the Mofussil press, I concur with him in deprecating that violence, and if ever in the heat of discussion I have been betrayed into it, I sincerely repent it. I can, however, conscientiously declare, that if my strictures on public men have been severe, they have not been dictated by personal feeling. I trust, however, this acrimony will cease not only in the Mofussil but the Calcutta press, and that the conductors of public journals will bear in mind that a gentlemanly tone is compatible with the most perfect independence. I hope they will cordially unite in the promotion of one common object, the advancement of the people for whose benefit the press is liberated, and not for that of a handful of Europeans. If I thought the liberation of the press were for the benefit of my countrymen alone, I should be very indifferent to it. I can never advert to the Indian press without recalling a gentleman who gave it the first impulse of improvement, and on whose merits I, as his friend, should have felt bound to dwell, but that his health will be proposed to you in the course of the evening, by one so much better able to do justice to the subject—I will merely remark, that the press of India is deeply indebted to him. My friend opposite has adverted to Lord William Bentinck's policy towards the press, and in doing so has fallen into one slight error which it may be as well to correct. He has stated that Lord William Bentinck had not interfered with military discussions; but that is a mistake, for his Lordship when the final answer of the Court was received to the memorials of the army against that unjust measure, the half-batta order, prohibited all further discussion of the subject. That was a great error of his policy—an error which no man more deeply lamented than I did; but although he did in that instance interfere with the press, let it never be forgotten that it otherwise enjoyed practical freedom under his administration. I feel bound to acknowledge this on such an occasion, although in doing so I am far from seeking to depreciate the merits of the high minded and distinguished individual who has liberated it by law, and to whom we are met to do honour. So much has been already said, and eloquently said on the subject of the press that I feel somewhat at a loss in acknowledging this toast. The Press of India, gentlemen, labours still under many disadvantages. It is often disparaged by a comparison with that of England; but while that press addresses itself to so few, you cannot expect to find it conducted by men of great talent—but you may look for integrity and firm uncompromising tone, and these I hope you will find. I will not longer trespass on your time except again to remind you that without your aid the press can do nothing; you are the breath of its nostrils, and it cannot be effective unless you respond to the sentiments it promulgates.

Mr. H. M. Parker.—Gentlemen, I have the honor to propose to you the next toast, and I do so from my heart. It is, indeed, a labor of love that has devolved upon me and proud am I to undertake it in giving the great—the gallant French nation. My friend opposite adds free, gentlemen, the addition is a matter almost superfluous, for we, for all Europe, for the whole world feels that France is and will be as free as she is great. She is and will be a beacon, a day-star to the nations of the continent, and from her fires they shall kindle those lights of liberty which are yet destined to illuminate the civilized world. I have ever loved the French people, and I am proud to make this avowal in the presence of a distinguished Frenchman. I have a touch of the old Anglo-Saxon in my composition as is fitting to one of a line of peasants, and I did ever love that gracious custom of the olden times when the bold Yeomen in merry Sherwood fought "from morn to dewy eve a summer's day," and were then, after the frank interchange of a multitude of thwacks and broad sword cuts, the best friends imaginable for the rest of their lives. Who does not venerate the gallant Anglo-Saxon spirit which lives in the fights and the friendships of Robin Hood and Little John, of Friar Tuck, Will Scarlett, Hob Miller, and the Jolly Tinker? Grant they are fables,—they are fables which reflect the mind and the feelings of the brave people who delighted in them, and "who never reckon'd him a man, who struck below the knee." Nor this alone, for the magnificent, the unconquerable chivalry of Normandy, no less did honor a custom so grateful to our own bold and stubborn Yeomen. It is a gracious thing to see how often the love for life of valiant knights had its origin in spear against spear, the din of sword-blows, and the shivering of armour. But there is after all good philosophy in this. One strong foundation for the edifice of friendship is mutual respect, and where can mutual respect exist more largely than between gallant, generous foes, such as do naught "in hate, but all in honor!" Gentlemen, if this be a good foundation for friendship, strong and enduring should be that union which happily subsists, and long may it endure between France and England. I need turn no further back than to the last great struggle and to the pages of Napier, that historian who is an honor to his age and country, that soldier worthy to record the deeds and the glory of soldiers. I need, I say, turn only to the pages of Napier for instances of those chivalric feelings in foes, which contribute to make lasting friends. I cannot deny myself the pleasure of recalling one to your recollection. It occurred during Crawfurd's retreat upon the Coa. This indomitable warrior, of whom it is hardly too strong a thing to say that battle was the breath of his nostrils, had somewhat compromised his division, for he loved to linger in the front of danger. He was falling back pressed by the whole French Army. The fiery cavalry of Montbrun, the veteran infantry who had scattered the Austrians, the Russians and the Prussians from Marengo to Jena, and from Jena to Friedland as dust is scattered by a whirlwind. It was no light task to retreat before such men, but Crawfurd retreated like a lion. His division one blaze of fire. At length he gained and passed the bridge across the Coa, and in an instant the heights on the side just gained, were lined by the undaunted troops who had no more idea than their warlike leader of retreating one inch beyond what was necessary even had Napoleon himself and the whole army of the empire been upon their track; but their martial antagonists were close upon their footsteps. Hardly had the British line formed to cover one end than the French were at the other extremity of the bridge. It was long, it was narrow, it was defended by British soldiers; but it was not a bridge, however "kept," that could daunt the conquerers of Lodi and of Arcola. Almost instantly a French officer, splendidly dressed and covered with orders, dashed out from the smoke which still hung over the end of the bridge on the French side. He waved his plumed hat, the French drums beat, and the next moment a column of grenadiers rushed with their gallant leader on the bridge. At first the British did not get their range correctly, but they soon found it, and from that moment no man passed alive beyond that "fatal fire" of the British infantry, which poured like a hail storm upon the centre of the bridge. The valiant Frenchmen fell in heaps, they still pressed on, but section after section reached the impassable line only to add to the carnage. Gentlemen, honor to these brave men! they could not conquer, but they did all men could do, they died for their honor and their country. There was a very brief lull in the fire,—at that instant a French officer plainly attired was seen climbing amidst the whistling bullets, over the ghastly pile of dead and dying on the bridge. He waved a white handkerchief and hardly pausing to see whether his signal was noticed, he was observed the next moment kneeling amongst the wounded, his instruments out, his bandages prepared, and, lost to all external circumstances, unmindful of his imminent danger while sublimely devoting himself to the Godlike task of alleviating human suffering. This noble creature was a surgeon of the French army—and now let me feel proud of my countrymen—of those rude, illiterate peasants, who formed the iron phalanxes of the British army. Nobly had the gallant Frenchman confided in their generosity, nobly did they respond to his confidence. In the heat and fury of the strife, while shot and shells were crossing and bursting beneath a canopy of sulpherous smoke which extended like a mighty arch high above the river and the bridge, while the British kept the bridge end on the French side under a shower of bullets which no man could enter and live. In the midst of this terrible scene, says the historian, every musquet in the English line was turned away, every ball was aimed wide from the spot, where the heroic Frenchman was administering to his wounded and dying countrymen; and this, too, though the French with a desperate courage, almost without parallell, were preparing for a third attempt upon the fatal bridge. Gentlemen, I have sketched feebly what the historian places before us in words of fire, yet I think I have said enough to unite you with me in the sentiment that such foes are, indeed, worthy to be friends. But it is not alone on the martial glories, the chivalric respect attending reminiscences of the past, that I would desire to see the mutual friendship of these two great nations continue. No, let that respect, that chivalrisque feeling be a foundation, but let the cement to the temple be a common love of liberty, of civilization, of the arts, of literature, of the welfare of mankind, a sense that we are united by circumstances to defend in the cause of human improvement the greatest of human blessings, against all comers—and let them come—let them come, with their fangs and their talons—the bears of the far north—the eagles "white, black and grey, with all their trumpery." I should desire no better than to put the cause of freedom to such an issue, to see the glorious British jack—the meteor flag of England, and the gallant old tri-color of Valmy and Gemappe, flying in martial union, side by side, on the battle field or the battle wave. Then "come one, come all—God, and our cause to boot, the venture we'll abide." Venture! 'tis no venture! The hearts of the free, the brave and the good all over the world will be with us,—the soldiers who ne'er, except in each other, "met foemen worthy of their steel" will stand shoulder to shoulder in the battle fields of freedom, and ten thousand to one, gentlemen—Lombard Street to a China orange but the day is ours. Gentlemen, I have already alluded to the presence of a distinguished French guest. On my right sits one who edited a liberal journal of celebrity in times when to be liberal was no passport but to loss and to danger. Assist me, gentlemen, in enabling him to convey

o his countrymen on the banks of the Seine and the Garonne, how enthusiastically Englishmen on the banks of the far Ganges responded to my call to drink with every honor and with honest hearts

"THE FRENCH NATION."—The Marseilloise Hymn.

Mr. RICHY.—As a Frenchman, and formerly a conductor of a French journal during the revolution of 1830, I beg to express my thanks for the manner in which the toast has been accepted, and I can assure my friends, that France is not insensible to the blessings of a free press, and will re-echo the sound of liberty which is now prograding in India, and answer to the cause of Liberty and Freedom.—France and England! England and France! (Much cheering.)

Mr. TURTON.—I will not allow you to wait. I have a younger brother who lives across the atlantic, an offset from the family of Englishmen, who I am always ready to acknowledge and consider as my brother. It would ill become us in celebrating the acquisition of the freedom of the Press to forget, that one of the freest nations in the world is that which was separated from England and driven to freedom by bad Government; (applause) and let the example of that nation be a lesson to those who seek to keep India without liberty, and would drive India as America was driven to freedom. I regret it not. I rejoice at it. I never had and never can have any feeling of jealousy towards America. Her sons are English in blood and English in feeling. Nor do I view with jealousy, or dissatisfaction the annual crowds of emigrants who leave our shores to seek in the rich and inexhaustible soil of America, that maintenance and comfort which they are unable to procure in their own over-peopled country. I would rather, I own, see the ties of parent and child remain whole—I wish never to sever them. I would rather see emigration point to our own yet unpeopled colonies; but if these ties are to be broken, and any of our brothers are to change their country, I would rather see the tide of emigration set towards those whose blood is the same as that which flows in our own veins, than to any foreign soil. It will tend to bind more closely together those who are sprung from the same stock. Again I say, I have no jealousy of America; I have no regret to express at her conduct in her separation from England. I think she was taxed unjustly; she was goaded and driven to resistance by unjust taxation in the first instance, and haughty and overbearing defiance subsequently. I venerate those who resisted the oppression led on by that great and good man, than whose a brighter name does not exist in history. (Applause.) I hope that a like success may ever attend those who resist injustice and oppression. I will not, as I intended, propose the American nation alone, after the example which has been set me. Let it be united to France and England which have just been given. I would ever wish to see them united, as the joint friends of freedom. With the regenerated sons of Spain and Portugal in their ranks, they may set at defiance the whole world led on by the Holy Alliance. They may defy, not only Nicholas of Russia, but his old namesake. (Laughter.)

"THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA."—Yankee Doodle.

Mr. BACON rose to return thanks for the honor done to his countrymen. He was not prepared when he came to India to find Englishmen so much enamoured of liberty. He expected to find them stiff and aristocratic, but he was most agreeably disappointed. He wished that some one more competent than himself to return thanks for the American nation had been present, but this he would say that he hoped that all national animosities and differences were buried for ever, and England and America would henceforward live in harmony.

Mr. H. M. PARKER.—Gentlemen, let me remind you of what has recently fallen from our eloquent President on the subject of that true Holy Alliance which must unite Spain and Portugal with the free nations of the earth. From our President the wish fell cursorily. I will repeat it more formally, because it is intimately connected with the toast which I now have the honor to propose. Gentlemen, let us recollect that when the light of freedom was either lost amidst the thick darkness of the middle ages, or glimmered but feebly and with scattered rays in some remote portions of the European commonwealth, there was then, even at that gloomy time, a formula observed in the coronation of the Kings of Arragon, which breathes the very essence of the compact between the governors and the governed—which speaks of a degree of constitutional freedom scarcely yet regained, and which can hardly be found in an improved state in any coronation ceremony, past, present, or to come.

"Senhor Don Alonzo—we take you for our King and to reign over us, and you shall be our good Lord, IF you do preserve to us our rights, privileges and immunities, if not—NOT." Gentlemen, while our ancestors were trodden down by able and warlike but despotic Kings, or were made the tools of a ruthless Baronage in its contests with the crown—the people of Arragon felt, in all its force, the sentiment expressed in the rude, but noble lines of the old poet, which always stir my heart like the sound of a trumpet.

> "Oh! Freedom is a blessed thing, > Freedom maketh man to have liking."

But again, gentlemen, let us never forget what modern Europe owes to Spain. When the terrible wave of Napoleon's power had swept away thrones and overwhelmed empires, it broke, it scattered in Spain against the enduring rock of popular resistance. There despotism and the people stood face to face. Despotism, clothed in the pomp and the glory of the earth. The people with their brave hearts and their good cause alone—there the death grapple began in earnest—it was no longer the battle of kings but of mankind, and the cry of defiance which Spain then sent forth, ended not until it changed into a shout of triumph over the fall of the most fearful, because the most morally, as well as physically potent despotism, that had ever threatened the civilized world. Gentlemen, the popular resistance in Spain has been proclaimed, since then, of little value. The Guerillas have been reckoned as nought—away with such unworthy thoughts. Wherever freemen congregate there be honor and the blessing of all free hearts upon the bold peasants who sprang to arms for their country, for their hearths and altars, in the very teeth of an army so terrible that the sound of its drums struck kings mute upon their thrones; of a leader so potent that from Constantinople to Stockholm scarce a sovereign held his seat, but by this man's sufferance. Surely if ever men dared to "beard the lion in his den," it was the brave people of Spain, acting on the noble impulse and feeling as with one heart, what every patriot must feel > "That Freedom's battle once began,

> Bequeath'd from bleeding sire to son,
> Though baffled oft, is ever won."

Gentlemen, with your hearts and your voices join with me in drinking

"THE CAUSE OF CONSTITUTIONAL FREEDOM IN SPAIN AND PORTUGAL."—Riego's Hymn (or March.)

Colonel DE HEZETA.—It is with timidity that I rise after the eloquent manner in which the last toast has been introduced, because I feel my command of language is unequal to the intensity of my feelings, and I shall fail in conveying to you an adequate impression of the warm gratitude which at this moment glows in my heart. But I must thank you, gentlemen, for the interest and sympathy you have showed for the fate of my beloved country. Yet I must say, that I could not expect different sentiments from a re-union of men distinguished by the generosity of their feelings and the liberality of their opinions. We are right, gentlemen, in indulging and cherishing feelings of an expanded benevolence and widely extended philanthropy. The more we advance in knowledge, the more we feel convinced, that the great moral economy of the universe is not an unconnected system from which any part can be isolated without injury and mischief to the whole. (Cheers.) No, the evil entailed upon a part is more or less felt in the whole scheme. The abundance and cheapness which follow so closely in the footsteps of freedom are not more readily shared by the neighbouring and even distant nations, as we are taught by the laws of political economy, than the concomitant moral blessings are equally diffused. Let me exemplify one of the ways in which it acts. Let us consider the community of interests, the sympathies, the tender regard which all the oppressors of humanity have for each other, whether they be single despots with their train of pampered minions and mercenary tools, or whether they be collective bodies of privileged nobles and parasite classes of all descriptions who share among themselves the good things of the land; they are always alive to their mutual interests. Until the use and the freedom of the press came into existence to give utterance to public feelings, and public opinions, all the advantages of close communication and well arranged combination, was on the side of the oppressors. But in proportion as the Freedom of the Press gained ground, their allegiance became closer, and their plans better arranged, until in our days it produced their unholy alliance by the sense of their common danger. It is for this reason that we find the parasite classes of England affect to show great respect for the rights of Don Miguel and Don Carlos, although in the case of the latter they can show no precedent in which in Spain the rights of a female to the throne have been set aside by those of a collateral male (cheers). In this case they show no respect for "the wisdom of our ancestors;"—why! because Carlos is a bigot, full of superstition, the champion of the divine rights of kings. (Cheers.) If we take a rapid glance over the pages of the last two centuries, we shall find the influence that the progress of freedom in one country has had on the neighbouring states. To the glorious revolution of 1688 which set British liberty upon a solid and indestructible basis, must be traced the freedom of thought and speech, and even print, which prevailed in France during the long reign of Louis the Fourteenth and the regency which followed. The American Revolution has done a great deal to impel forward liberty in its course; and was in a great measure the cause of the French Revolution, which in spite of its excesses produced the exterpation of all feudal oppressions, odious exclusions, and invidious distinctions. The glaring injustice which the leaders of the Revolution were guilty of in the prosecution of wild and sweeping theories, and in the abuse of their power, was visited upon Europe at large by the evils and misery consequent upon a bloody war of twenty years. But in vain did the despots rejoice at the advantages thus given by their opponents, and tried to recover at least a part of their lost ground. The three glorious days of July of 1830 in Paris came to nip their hopes in the bud. And who can say, that this event has had no effect, at least, in hastening the progress of reform in England? And without these two events what chance of success would have had the rights of my beloved Queen Isabella I.? It is thus, gentlemen, that all the great families of the human species partakes reciprocally of their moral improvement. Let us imitate our enemies and keep more and more close together in the bonds of sympathy, friendship, and love. In return for your interest in the welfare of the Peninsula, let me express my sincere and fervent wishes for the happy results of the great measure which has gathered us together. Let me hope that it may be one of the means of securing to this great empire a paternal government, a cheap and efficient administration. I am sure our American friend who spoke last, will agree with me that cheapness is one of the most essential requisites of a good government. Let the press be also one of the means to stimulate and encourage the natives to rise in the scale of civilization by drinking—eagerly drinking—deeply at the springs of our knowledge; let them try to equal their tutors in the more difficult scale of morality. While there is no national representation let the press try to supply its absence by checking lavish expenditure on the part of government, point out the errors of the administration, the abuses of power, the oversights or omission in legislation. If the press rises to the height it is called to occupy under our present circumstances, it will uphold the honor of Great Britain; it will cause that its vast power and extensive sway may be reckoned a blessing to humanity, and that wherever its glorious flag shall waive, it will be hailed as the harbinger of peace, the emblem of justice, and the beacon,—the foremost beacon,—of civilisation, and a true Briton will boast, that if he is the freest of the free; he is equally as just as he is free? (much cheering.)

Mr. Turton.—A bumper, Gentlemen, to a man to whom England owes much, and you also; for if it had not been for him, I am perfectly satisfied we should not have been assembled here for this purpose this day,—I mean Lord Grey, (loud applause.) I put it to you all here, whether the noble-minded individual at the head of this Government would have ventured on this step, could have ventured on it, if it had not been for the victory achieved by the people of England and the progress of freedom there. I know of no public man who stands on a prouder eminence than Lord Grey, who has been through the whole of his life the consistent supporter of all the rights of the people, and at all times and in all seasons the advocate of Reform. In 1792* when he had only been about five years in Parliament, he first brought forward his measure of Reform as it is generally called, but which, in point of fact, was no more than a motion to refer a petition for reform from the Friends of the people to a Committee. Unfortunately, at that period, it was not agreed to. He was opposed by even those who previously professed themselves friends to the cause. That period, he was told, was not the time for the proposed change. Gentlemen, it was the very period of all others. It was the period for just concession to put an end to just complaints, (applause,) and if at that time it had been granted; if the rights of the people had been considered at that time, we should not have seen the ruinous war which ensued. From that time to this, he has stood in the same position, and has ever been the unflinching advocate of the people. It has been thrown in his teeth that he has declared he was prepared to stand by his order; I know not that that can very fairly be objected to him, but I ask you, gentlemen, what man is there here who would not also stand by that order, if the whole of his order were like Lord Grey? I know no man of any order who more deserves the gratitude of the People. Gentlemen, it has been said that we ask here for too much, and there are those who would meet us with derision. I am old enough to remember when I was laughed at in England for being a reformer; when the prospect of it was thought so chimerical that he who like myself ventured to express an expectation that a reform in Parliament would ever take place, was treated as a mere visionary, fit only to wear the helmet of Mambrino. And who is there hardly who has ever started any project for the benefit of mankind who has not been laughed at, and considered as a visionary in the first instance? But you must be capable of standing against irony as you must stand against oppression; if you would gain any thing; and is it not, I ask you, cheering to all, however distant they may now fancy themselves from the attainment of what they seek, to find Lord Grey, after fighting unsuccessfully for reform for forty years, desparingly as it would have seemed at one time to all ordinary minds, at the end of that period surmount all difficulties and unfold the banner of victory? (Applause.) Is not this a ground for triumph? Is not this a ground for hope for those even who are bold enough to hope for a legislature with open doors in this country? and why not? why should this hope be considered extravagant? I have heard it suggested that it will only come with the Millenium; if so, then, gentlemen, is the Millenium near at hand; for the time is approaching when it will not be deemed unreasonable that thinking men should know what the Government propose to do for the benefit of the people. Take Lord Grey for your guide: the once hopeless cause of reform for your motto. He fought the good fight and won it, and let hope be your pioneer to liberty and justice. (Applause.)

"Lord Grey and the Reform Bill."

Mr. Turton.—Though I fear I may fatigue you with myself, I am sure I shall not with the subject; but I did expect that a gentleman would have been present who would have been able to do the toast more justice than I shall. Gentlemen, I speak of Mr. Dickens, and cannot otherwise account for his absence than that he has been prevented from attending by fatigue and ill health. I saw him at a late period this afternoon, and though he was then labouring under severe indisposition, induced by fatigue, he assured me that he would attend; I am sure necessity alone keeps him away. I lament his absence for his sake, for your sakes, and for the sake of the toast which I am about to propose; but need I use any argument to ask for your sympathy with the bravest of the brave, the most unfortunate of the oppressed. The nation whose rights Castlereagh undertook to guarantee, for he plighted the faith of Britain to the Poles at the Congress of Vienna for the maintenance of their constitution and independence, (cheers) and yet, (I burn with indignation to think of it) England deserted them in the hour of need. It is a disgrace under which Englishmen yet remain. It has been said there are political reasons for our not redeeming our promise: that it was impossible for us to interfere. Are there any political reasons sufficient to excuse a breach of national faith? I fear not. I think it was the duty of Englishmen to have risked all for it. I am a plain, blunt man, who likes to speak the words of an Englishman, and I should like to discover anything sufficient to excuse England's hanging back during the Polish struggle. There was indeed a vital struggle at home for an object of vast importance which any diversion might have endangered, and it is that, if any thing can, which must form our excuse. (Cheers.) A war might have risked our obtaining that Reform by which alone we could hope to obtain any thing else. It has certainly been the policy at all times of the enemies of liberty; it was so in ancient Greece, and in modern England, to divert the people from the cause of liberty at home by engaging them in wars abroad. (Applause.) It was then perhaps wise that we did not interfere, but now, when the corner stone of our liberty is laid, when we have won the struggle, shall we be content to remain under the imputation of having broken our faith to Poland. We say no, and though our feeble voice may not reach England, it is our duty to act and speak like Englishmen in whatever part of the world we may be. (Cheers.)

* This is a mistake as to the date. The motion was in May, 1793.

Mr. H. M. Parker.—I am aware that it is not usual to address a meeting after a toast has been given from the chair. But on this one occasion I pray for your indulgence. I would fain inspire you ere you drank this pledge with my own deep abhorrence, my hatred, my detestation of the conduct pursued by Russia towards glorious unhappy Poland; of the bitter inhumanities inflicted upon her miserable children. Gentlemen, you, who are husbands, and fathers, and brothers, what think you of delicate females, of innocent children, publicly flogged till the blood followed the lash, in the streets of Warsaw, because their relatives had dared to aspire after the freedom, the limitted freedom, promised by the treaty of Vienna to their native land! Englishmen, what think you of a distinguished nobleman, a high spirited soldier carried from fortress to fortress—his strength supported by nourishing food, and his constitution guarded by all the skill of medicine, for what?—why, that he might be flogged weekly before the troops in garrison! What think you of another—a venerable statesman confined more than six years in a noisome dungeon, where the light of day came not, where human voice was never heard, thrice brought up to the Russian authorities and thrice remanded to his living grave, because he would not, he could not, admit that Russia had fulfilled either the letter or the spirit of a treaty guaranteed by all Europe and broken in the face of man and of heaven! Gentlemen, I wish no worse fate to Russia. Foe of Freedom as she is, treacherous and bloody and grasping as she ever has been, than the fate which she has meeted out to unhappy Poland, and with this wish I drink with all my heart the toast of our Chairman.

"The Regeneration of Poland."

Mr. Stocqueler.—It may seem extraordinary that an Englishman should rise after the toast you have so feelingly received, but this you will readily excuse when I tell you that it was my fortune to be in Poland soon after the termination of the last noble struggle for liberty. It was then I saw the most degrading punishments inflicted on some of the first persons in the land, while their children were cast into the streets bleeding and disfigured. "God bless you," the people would say, "you are an Englishman; and every single Englishman lifts up his voice and would lift up his arm in our favour." I was so far unfortunate that I did not reach Poland until the war was at an end, but wherever I went, as an Englishman I was hailed with cordiality, and people were perfectly aware that John Bull's struggle for reform at home alone prevented him from succouring them. (Cheers.)

Mr. Turton.—From a very exciting subject, we come to one on which we may feel a little cooler; and yet, Gentlemen, without independent Judges our hopes of Freedom and of Justice would be illusory. Sorry I am to find we have not a judge nor a judge's son present, but one of the latter must have been prevented in consequence of an accident, as Mr. Grant assured me at a very recent period that he would be here. It seems to be considered that here in Calcutta a judge is precluded by his situation from having any political opinion, but to this consideration, I, for one, cannot fully subscribe. It is impossible in a society like this that their sentiments should be unknown. Of the only two here at present I may say with truth that they entertain none which needed to have interfered with their presence here. I have known the Chief Justice for many years, and though always unostentatious in the display of them, I can truly say that a man who entertains more liberal sentiments or a more ardent love of free institutions does not exist in Calcutta; and as for Sir John Grant, he has been not only before you, but before the public at large since 1812; they can neither, wear a mask. But it would seem they think it inconsistent with their situation to give a public opinion on political matters; I admit a judge should not be a political partizan; but in England, the Lord Chancellor always—the Lord Chief Justice of the Kings bench generally—frequently the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and Chief Baron of the Exchequer sit in the House of Peers; and the Master of the Rolls, the Vice-Chancellor, Masters in Chancery, may sit in the Commons. Then is it to be said the first judicial authorities here are not to be permitted an opinion on a political measure which has been past, while these, the highest law officers take part in the discussions at home! It may be said that it ought not to be so at home; on that I give no opinion, but while it is so I cannot see the strength of the reasoning which would establish a different state of things in this country. To Lord Chief Justice Hale, and to Lord Ellenborough, we owe the introduction of many most useful acts. I should like to know what is there to prevent a British Judge in this country saying, "If it be the pleasure of the legislature to pass such a law, it will give me pleasure to administer it." One reason for this non-attendance certainly cannot be assigned—that they think differently from us. No such thing: I assure you, gentlemen, that they are as warm friends as any man to liberty. But I shall now propose their healths without further preface to the toast, and as they are not present, we may do so with the greater sincerity, as we shall not shock their modesty, neither will they have the delicate task in their situation of returning appropriate thanks. (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. Turton.—Gentlemen, time wears on, and the march of freedom is along with it. I will propose to you those gentlemen, who, taken as a body, are as free and independent as any men, the "Civil Service of India." I regret that there are not more of them present. Whether this arises from many of them being in Judicial situations, and consequently that it would be indecorous also in them to attend, I cant pretend to say, but certain it is we have not one Judge of the Sudder present, though we may have one Judge of the Sudder Board of Revenue, and glad am I to find he does nor partake of the judicial feeling—not judicious feeling, eh! gentlemen. (Laughter.) But let us acquit them all on the same terms, for I am quite sure, though there may be some in the service, who do not view the liberty of the press in the same light we do, there are none who do so from a desire to avoid publicity. I cannot, however, forbear to say that there are those who have not subscribed as liberally to the purposes of the public as they have to the flattery of individuals. If it is not so, I ask how comes it that three hundred sat around the festive board on a recent occasion. (Cheers.) And now there are but one hundred present. But I have heard it said that the dinner is not upon a proper footing; that we should have invited Sir Charles Metcalfe and the Members of Council to a splendid entertainment, that we should have had in that case a full attendance. I doubt it not, gentlemen. In that case we should not only have had the present friends of freedom, but the dinner would have been swelled by those large classes to which Colonel Hezeta has alluded—the parasite classes. (Cheers.) They would all have been present. I think, gentlemen, we have paid Sir Charles a greater compliment than would have been conveyed by the invitation.

We have celebrated his act, not invited him to oppress him with flummery to his face. (Cheers.) Thank God, though this band is small, yet they consist of those who are in earnest; and a small band of patriots is worth any number of hired men. But, Gentlemen, let us not forget that there are many who would have been present, were they not stationed at a distance, and those will be included in "The Civil Service."

Mr. Pattle, after a pause. There are few of my service here it is true, but those few might have saved the old horse the trouble of going so often to the mill. (Laughter.) However, I will endeavour in my imperfect manner to make some answer to what Mr. Turton has just urged. And first, gentlemen, I think, you will allow that there are many in the service who object to public dinners from very honorable motives, but were I to state them, I fear a laugh only would ensue. (Cheers and laughter.) The Civil Service is like a stream running behind a rock, from which at first a few drops only ooze out, but at length it becomes a fruitful fertilizing river; thus though there are but a few of my service present on this occasion, I hope that next year we shall see the table crowded with them. (Applause.) A more talented body does not exist or a more honorable one. True it is they require a little indulgence on this occasion, and the more so, as they cannot but be aware of the advantages of a Free Press, which, as a body, they have supported and admired. (Cheers.) They know that it is as a tribunal of shame, one of the best, the most extensive, and the most general correctives of abuse of power, whether from corruption or ignorance which human wisdom can devise, therefore, gentlemen, as being men of acknowledged honor and talent, they are not, and I trust they never can be less than the warmest advocates of a Free Press. (Cheers.)

Mr Pattle again rose. Gentlemen, a bumper. The toast I have now to give to you confers honor on the proposer, for a more talented, more public spirited, or more deserving body of men does not exist. Their profession has always distinguished itself as the staunch advocate and most powerful friend of the liberty of the press. Gentlemen, I propose to you, "the Calcutta Bar."

This toast was drank with loud acclamation. Several gentlemen adding,

"Mr. Turton and the Bar of Calcutta."

Mr. J. A Lorimer.—There may be some informality in my rising to address the company before the toasts selected for the evening are disposed of, but I claim the peculiar indulgence of making a few observations intimately connected with the subject just proposed for your reception by Mr. Pattle. We have been foremost in doing ample justice to the merits of distinguished individuals who have secured to us the rights and immunities of freemen; eulogy has already exhausted itself, in commenting on the vigorous administration of a Metcalfe, and in acknowledging the invaluable boon conferred on India by the operation of a Free Press; the greater part of the evening has already been consumed in an attempt to express the extent of our gratitude and obligation to the eminent statesman who presides over the destinies of British India. But let us remember that there are other individuals whose merits are equally conspicuous, and whose exertions have been of signal service in the consummation of that glorious act which we are assembled this evening to commemorate. It would argue a culpable degree of indifference to benefits received, if we did not, in the most emphatic manner, publicly testify our gratitude to the Indian Bar. (Cheers.) Those who have watched the proceedings of our society must acknowledge, that all public spirited undertakings of the highest import, have, in the first instance, originated from the members of that learned body. They have given their adhesion to the good cause through good report and through evil report, regardless alike of the scowl of authority or the defection of false friends who dishonoured the cause for which Hampden bled in the field and Sydney perished on the scaffold.

With an inflexibility that disdained the slightest compromise, they kept the noiseless tenor of their way midst the obloquy and scorn of those who are wedded to a corrupt system of administration. They have endeavoured to rouse the apathy of a community proverbially dead to its own vital interest. They have at length, by dint of their eloquence and talents, kindled an enthusiasm in favour of a glorious cause, without which it would have expired at its birth. From the onset of the brunt to its close, like faithful sentinels, they vigilantly guarded the shrine of freedom and manfully resisted the encroachments of power. (Cheers.) During the brief dictatorship of Mr. Adam, when the thunders of despotism convulsed the political world in India,—and when the odious censorship palsied the energy of the local press, the voice of the Indian Bar was heard, pleading eloquently in behalf of the trampled rights of Britons. Within this narrow circle, stood the only sanctuary, the hallowed temple, where the vestal flame of liberty was kept alive;—till under better auspices, it has now kindled into a conflagration. (Cheers.) The Bar has been in all ages considered as a glorious profession to encourage the aspirations and to advance the prospects of young men of talent; and the study of the law is eminently calculated to expand the mind and to invigorate its faculties by an early investigation of abstract truths closely connected with the progress and constitution of civil society. It recognizes no distinction but that which talent alone creates. In this intellectual circus, the peasant offspring may by the exertion of his genius not only wrest from titled pedigree the highest civic honors, but rise to an equality with the hereditary counsellors of the crown. No spectacle can be more animating than to behold the conflict between minds of the greatest dimensions, each panting for the mastery over the other by the unaided resources of intellect. The unbefriended youth who looks "with the thirsty eye of enterprize," on the prospect before him is ready to embark on this profession as he beholds the avenues of all others closed for want of patronage. The warmest votaries of the arts and sciences have been contented to trace their origin from some gifted minds; but law has ever been regarded as an emanation from heaven. Truly has the eloquent Hooker observed "that her seat is the bosom of God,—her voice is the harmony of the world;—all things in heaven and earth do her homage,—the very least as feeling her care and the greatest as not exempt from her power." In order to appreciate more fully the eminent services rendered by the illustrious body to the cause of freedom, we must consult the historic page for conspicuous instances. When Cataline and his confederate band of profligates, conspired against the liberties of Rome, whose voice was heard in the Forum? Whose puissant arm wielded the thunders of outraged justice, and finally defeated their machinations by a summary expulsion of the rebels? Who protected Gavins with the ample shield of justice and denounced his relentless persecutor Verres as a tyrant who dared to trample on the right of a Roman citizen! Was it not Tully, the ornament and safeguard of the Roman bar? Let us return from the misty records of the past, and extract a moral from the events which have taken place within the memory of the last generation. Gentlemen! The advocacy of liberal principles is now, comparatively speaking, an easy task. The path has been cleared and the dangers that beset it once, are now removed by the unremitting industry of the pioneers of freedom. We have launched out on "the surface of a summer sea" and our sails are impelled by propitious gales midst sunshine and smiles. But this was not the case with those illustrious men who have preceded us, and whose names, like stars in the firmament, shine forth on the historic page. We live in brighter times, when ancient governments and powerful dynasties, are made to bow in deference to the spirit of the age, and to acknowledge the supremacy of the people. When the sagacious statesman has only to prepare for the new and bright order of things, dimly shadowed forth on the broad mirror of futurity, he must repudiate altogether those baneful notions of antiquity which represent a state of constant warfare and hostility with neighbouring countries, as the surest way of enriching the revenues of his own. He must be impressed with the conviction that nothing is left to the determination of chance; but that all the movements in the political and moral world depend on the operation of certain invariable principles from which social happiness springs. It is reserved for us to witness the realization of the fondest and brightest dreams of our boyhood, when first we knelt like neophites at the august shrine of Freedom, and lisped with pliant tongues the vow of our allegiance. Opinions which were at first entertained by a few philosophic minds in the dim recess of cloisters, have now met with a general reception. They have become the popular creed;—it were worse than heresy to call them now into question after they have received the stamp and impress of the age. The ramparts of despotism are stormed,—the banner of freedom is unfurled, and the exultant cry of victory reverberates throughout the universe. The day of danger is over, and we can assemble in our festive halls to talk of our rights and privileges. Even at this moment when the heart is flushed with joy "a change comes over the spirit of our dream," when we reflect on the wayward lot of those who strained every nerve to bring about the regeneration of their country by constitutional means. We, it is true, have reached the gaol of our ambition without much toil, but alas! how many obscure village Hampdens and mute, inglorious Miltons have dropped by the way side. Yes, gentlemen! Reform has triumphed; but let us never forget that it was sealed with the precious blood and sanctified by the sufferings of many faithful adherents. (Cheers.) Standing on this vantage ground, we cannot duly estimate the dangers and sufferings which were encountered by the adherents of reform. They had to grapple with the strong arm of power; and whilst engaged in the conflict, they were not cheered with the smiles nor buoyed up with the sympathy of those who had professed to espouse the same cause. The stake, the dungeon, and the horrors of martyrdom awaited the proud uncompromising spirit, who clung with an unyielding tenacity to his opinions. Whereas the recreant apostate rose triumphant, and enjoyed all the distinctions which a corrupt government had at its disposal. In those days party spirit ran high. The ties of friendship and kindred were sacrificed, without scruple at this impious shrine. Turn your attention for a moment to Ireland, particularly in those days when the most awful vicissitudes and convulsions disorganized society by rendering life and property insecure, and we must then acknowledge the bar to be the most glorious appendage of freedom. (Cheers.) It is, to borrow the eloquent expression of Erskine, "another fold in the shield of the freedom of the public." In those days—the very recollection of which freezes the blood and scares the imagination, the Courts of Justice became converted into filthy shambles where whole hecatombs of human beings were immolated; for rebellion was synonymous with reform. The lives of the most upright and talented men were left at the mercy of spies and informers. Even English Judges whose minds were embued with English sentiments and principles, pawned the bright jewel of their reputation for paltry lucre and preferment which a venal government had the effrontery to offer. In this critical time,—in the hour of tribulation, when a moral apoplexy smote the heart of ill-fated Ireland, gentlemen, the immortal Curran was sent as a redeeming angel to snatch many a victim from the grave, and to burst asunder the manacles that fettered his ill-fated countrymen. (Cheers.) It was truly a spectacle of moral sublimity to see this gigantic mind, leaning on its own resources, and like Marius surveying the extent of the dismal solitude and ruin after the heat of the conflict. The time would fail me if I were to make more than a passing allusion to the unbending integrity of a Grattan, the honest patriotism of an Egan, and the uncompromising manliness of a Flood. This galaxy shone in Ireland's brightest days, ere clouds had darkened her prospect and enshrouded the last lingering beams of expiring liberty. In England, gentlemen, the bar has been fortunately exempted from performing so distinguished a part as the Irish bar; but still it has not been wanting in energy to resist the encroachment of power and to defend those noble principles which were unfolded by the Magna Charter and the Bill of Rights. After the presses of Europe had been enslaved and all the asylums of free discussion closed, the mighty despot, before whose scowl empires and principalities vanished, audaciously dared to stifle the voice of the only surviving Free Press in Europe by the prosecution of Peltier. He saw with horror one spot alone, midst the wide spreading solitude, where man was allowed to exercise his reason freely on the most important concerns of society and to censure the conduct of the proudest tyrants. He wished to lead his locust hosts and to drive the plough share of ruin over that happy island, but he was baffled in his ambitious project by the gigantic mind of Mackintosh, whose splendid exertion on that memorable occasion will be remembered by succeeding ages. The press, gentlemen, which has tended greatly to widen the circle of knowledge and civilization, and to enlarge the basis of good government by admitting many to participate in the arduous duties of legislation, even this boasted engine of civilization, this powerful lever for the effectuation of moral good, may be reduced to servitude, if there be not an independent bar and an upright jury to watch over its rights with a jealous eye. The Indian Bar, gentlemen, can claim something more substantial than the negative merit of belonging to an association which enrols the name of a Romilly, an Erskine, a Mackintosh, and a Brougham. With us, they have earned a deathless name by their uniform advocacy of liberal principles. To particularize inviduals would be a task of supererogation,—it would be to gild refined gold—to paint the lily. (Cheers).

Mr. Turton.—In rising to return thanks for the honor which you have done the Bar, I feel quite satisfied that I ought in the first instance to express my thanks to the gentleman who has just sat down, not only for his kind expressions towards the Calcutta Bar, but for his eloquent appeal in favor of the profession in general. I am proud of the profession to which I have the honor to belong, and I am bold enough to assert that whatever may be said of it occasionally, the Bar has ever been amongst the foremost of the defenders of the people's rights, whether in modern or former times. To few men are we more indebted for the liberties we enjoy in England than to Coke, who, great as he was as a lawyer, stands infinitely more transcendant as a politician. His reply to James, when he was applied to in common with the other Judges for his opinion unconstitutionally required by the king, that when the case came before him judicially, he would dispose of it as an English Judge ought to do, raised him above the men of those mean times, and whatever minor defects there may have been in his character, his parliamentary conduct in the after years of his life exhibits him as a true patriot. I contend that the study of the law is calculated to enlarge and liberalize the mind. It has been the case in all ages and in all countries. The British Bar is not singular in the advocacy of the rights of the people. Sir James Mackintosh, in his work on the French Revolution, if I recollect right, in replying to Burke, shows that the warmest advocates in the National Assembly, indeed the majority of that Assembly, were of the Bar of France. Burke had contemptuously described its supporters amongst others as "country Attornies." Sir James Mackintosh shews that they were advocates of the great provincial towns, amongst others, of Marseilles, Bourdeaux, and Lyons,—towns superior in population and trade, certainly in intelligence, to the capitals of Vienna, Petersburgh and Berlin. True it is that there are renegades at times; that there have been and are renegades from the cause of liberty among the Bar in England—one great example exists in the present times, one who is so enamoured of a bad cause that he would even give up the greater emoluments of a judicial situation, where his splendid talents made him universally respected, to remain for a short period in a political high station, again to retire on a political pension. He who has condescended to become the mere tool of a party espoused in latter life, which his talents more fit him to lead. But on the other hand, let us look to Romilly, to Macintosh, to Horner, to Brougham and others of our own time; and can it be said that with such a list of names which occur to me on the moment, that with such talent as these men have brought and applied in aid of the cause, it is not a profession which has produced its full share of support to the cause of liberty? For myself, I thank you sincerely for your kindness. I can with pride avow, that I have ever been, as now, on the side of liberal politics; my present opinions have not been recently formed to suit the times we live in. On this subject I might appeal to those who knew me when a boy of fifteen at Eton; I fear, indeed, that I am not a bit better now, but that my opinions are now what they were then, just thirty years ago, and I hope I ever shall be found the bold assertor of the people's rights. (Cheers.) Mr. Turton concluded by proposing

"The Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants of Calcutta."—Money in both pockets.

Dwarkanauth Tagore believed he was the youngest merchant in the Hall, and therefore rose to return thanks. The Baboo congratulated his countrymen that no distinction had been made in the recent act between the native and the European. Indeed, he said, his countrymen ought to be deeply impressed with gratitude for the force with which the claims of the native press had been advocated, and though the English press had not been unanimous on the subject, he would, good humouredly, rather infer that the minority were actuated by a little selfishness than from any fear of political danger (laughter.)

Mr. H. M. Parker.—Gentlemen, our motto must be "en avant!"—Forward! not for this night or for this time of night alone, but I hope while an abuse remains unreformed or a political evil unremedied. I have to propose to you "success to the cause of freedom and reform," success to it I say all over the world. As for freedom can I do better than continue my quotation from the old poet, who declares that freedom is a blessed thing.

"Freedom the zest to pleasure gives,
He lives at ease who freely lives,
Grief, sickness, poor-tith, want and all,
Are summed within the name of thrall."

As for reform, when any of those ingenious persons who argue in favor of negro slavery, without at all intimating that they should like to change places with the slave, when, I say, any of these ingenious casuists, "eminent hands" in the Quarterly Review, shall prove to me that a Russian serf holds a higher and happier place in the scale of humanity than a citizen of the United States. That it is wrong, be it ever so practicable, to drain and cultivate a marsh whose vapors poison the surrounding country. That it is unadvisable to remove or repair an old edifice which hangs over some great thoroughfare and threatens every passer by. That it is a decided mistake to root out the poisonous weeds, to destroy the noxious virmin which impoverish the soil and injure the flowers and the fruits of your garden. When all these things are demonstrated to me, and not till then, I shall cease to wish with all my heart and with all my soul "success to the cause of freedom and reform," with what Rob Roy calls "my malison and the curse of Cromwell upon those, who, for base or selfish motives oppose it"—Gentlemen—

"Success to the cause of Freedom and Reform." The Parisian.

Mr. Turton.—During the time in which the subject of the freedom of the press has been discussed in Calcutta, I have never found any body of men more ready to come forward on all occasions than I have found the tradesmen of Calcutta. I will venture to say that a more respectable body does not any where exist, not only relatively in proportion to their number as compared with other similar bodies in London and elsewhere, but absolutely, and that they are surpassed by none in talent and integrity. I have always found them true friends to freedom, and I am sure we shall continue to find them so.

"The Trades Association."

Mr. Rogers.—As Master of the Trades Association, I return you my thanks for the honor you have done that body. I am aware that our exertions have been overrated by Mr. Turton, but I am also aware that if the exertions of all classes of the community had not been united, we should not have been assembled here for this purpose this day. I cannot omit to notice that this is the first time the Trades Association has been publicly recognized and honoured with the approbation of the Calcutta community, and I heartily rejoice that this honor has been obtained by our co-operation in a cause, the completion of which must make the bosom of every honest man swell with pride. I cannot say aught that would increase that feeling. But with reference to the great man who has conferred the blessings of a Free Press on India, I may be permitted publicly to express our hope that we may soon hail him the permanent Governor of India. (Cheering.)

Captain T. J. Taylor (Madras Establishment.)—In rising to propose the toast assigned to me, I must crave the indulgence of my hearers from two causes, that of labouring under indisposition, and that of being totally unaccustomed to address such an assembly as I now have the satisfaction to see around me. Amongst those who will most materially benefit from the event we are this day assembled to commemorate, are our native fellow subjects of all classes: for theory has induced a belief, which I doubt not experience will confirm, that no means exist for disseminating knowledge and the true principles of good government through a land just emerging from the barbaric shackles of a slavery of ages, so simple and so ready as a free and unfettered press. The natives of this country possess within themselves many great and good qualities; they are not wanting in energy when backed by self-interest, and have both intelligence and perseverance to master the difficulties of language, of literature, of science, and the arts. But however great has been the advance that has been effected at the presidencies and the principal capitals of the country, it cannot be disputed that the great mass of the people have yet much to learn; that they have a task to shake off the trammels of ages, to imbibe true principles of independence, and to learn that actions are valuable in proportion to their intrinsic goodness, and not because they are merely palatable to the powers that be! They must act from an innate spirit of honesty, and feel that there is a moral force in freedom that knows no equal. (Cheers). I have watched with some interest the advancement of the native mind, and it has been my good fortune to visit all the presidencies, and to have been at Bombay at the institution of the Elphinstone Professorships, erected at an expense of several lakhs by natives, and by natives only, for the encouragement of European knowledge amongst themselves, in honour of that distinguished individual, the statesman of Poonah and soldier of Assaye, who had just descended from the government of that presidency. Subsequently I assisted at the formation of the Hindoo Literary Society at Madras, and the establishment of their school, unfetered by any peculiar dogmas of religion, at which are now educated in English literatue the sons of the principal inhabitants of Madras. A few days prior to my departure from that presidency, I had the gratification of noticing the creditable progress effected by the pupils. Since I have been here, I have visited several of the institutions for education, and all of them with encreased satisfaction, for I have found the native mind here far in advance of what I have seen elsewhere, except amongst the Parsees at Bombay, to whom I must yield the palm. Still it must be admitted that the natives have much to learn; but I must candidly confess that I am not of the school of conversion, and that I care little about the natives becoming christians for this simple reason, that I think they may be very good men and very valuable subjects, without necessarily deserting their father's creed. I shall be well satisfied, if I can see the rising generation shake off the prejudices of caste, break up the system of ignorance and seclusion in which they retain their females, abandon their dark superstitions, eschew chicanery and cunning, "that low mimic of wisdom," and substitute a love of truth and a characteristic independence, engrafted on the many good qualities they now possess. These blessings will follow the dissemination of knowledge which will raise the natives of Hindoostan to a high place in the scale of mankind, but these can not be the work of a day; they must result from the silent yet steady progress of years, but will be materially forwarded by a fearless and unshackled press. This day has seen such a press established, under that power which alone is necessary for its surveilance,—the surveilance of the law; and this day is to me, what it must be to all, a day of pride and joy—a day memorable in the annals of Hindoostan, (much cheering). I have learned with some surprise that there are some gentlemen present who are not so sure of the advantages of a Free Press and have come to this table to have their minds fortified on this point, to hear what advantages are expected from a Free Press, and to hear why we advocate it. For my part I should as soon have expected to have been asked why two and two make four, or that two parallel lines could never meet, or any other self-evident proposition. But if the eloquence of my surrounding friends has failed to convince the individuals, I will briefly endeavour to explain why Britons cherish free institutions, and why they wish to see rights established by law and not by sufferance. It is simply this, that although a despotism might be the best of governments with an angel for a despot, we know that angels are rather scarce individuals, and, we fear, lest the Titus of to-day may be followed by the Caligula of to-morrow (cheers.) Within the last few years a new era has commenced in India; the sun of enlightenment has dawned on the land, the fogs of superstitions and the mists of prejudice are fast passing away, setting like the shadow of a lost world. That sun, however, is yet far from its meridian, but let us look for its progressive ascent and trust that it will shine forth in daily increasing splendour. But whether that proud expectation be fulfilled or not, whether its beams as cheerful as hope, should lighten up the land and draw forth the latent energies of the Indian race,—or again, shrouded by the clouds of error, should decline in darkness, or should set in storms, the glory of its Orient will yet have been, and be associated with Bentinck's and Metcalfe's names (much cheering.) Up, therefore, all classes and drink to the toast I am about to propose. Drink it with one mind—cheer it with one voice. I give you, gentlemen,

"The enlightenment of the Indian People."

Dwarkanauth Tagore returned thanks, and with reference to what had fallen from Captain Taylor, noticed the institution of the Hindoo College which had been founded chiefly through the exertions of his friend Mr. David Hare, by natives, and had not, with one exception, received the support of a single civil servant.

Mr. H. M. Parker.—Gentlemen, when the breach is stormed, when the fortress is won, the first and noblest duty of the victors is to give the honor due to those who fell to secure the conquest. Let us then not forget in this hour of grateful triumph, him who led the forlorn hope—James Silk Buckingham. It is scarcely possible that any man could sacrifice what he sacrificed in struggling for that great right, the recognition of which, we are now met to celebrate. His income from the Calcutta Journal was immense, his prospects in every respect as brilliant as his life at the time was happy. He had but recently been joined by his family, he had recently been at a large expense in furnishing his residence in a style warranted by his apparent resources, and excusable in a man of elegant tastes. Then fell the blow which reduced him almost to beggary. It has been said Mr. Buckingham could have taken no other course under the circumstances of the case than the one he adopted, without greater sacrifices even in a pecuniary point of view. I deny it. I believe that large as his receipts were, he might have made them larger, much larger, if in addition to the general excellence of his paper he had offered concessions to the Tory spirit then paramount in India as in England. He might have been reproached by the little band which "few and faint, but fearless still," then fought the battle of the Indian Press; but for every grain of reproach on one side, the least powerful, he would have obtained not only "golden opinions," but ounces of gold from the other and most powerful, and all this without any Judas-like tergiversation, like that of the traitor Times, but simply if he would have consented to swerve a little from the straight forward path and occasionally to shut his eyes to public matters: moreover, I believe, that the Government of the period thought it could not, thank heaven, advance directly a sum for such a purpose as buying the good-will of a newspaper, would yet have rendered Mr. Buckingham aid and encouragement in many ways if he would have softened the tone of the Calcutta Journal with respect to the acts of the supreme authority; though in truth, on reading it over now it appears, as compared with a really free Press, gentle enough for the most sensitive Government on earth. I firmly believe that fortune lying on one side and poverty on the other, Mr. Buckingham manfully and frankly accepted the last rather than abandon views and opinions which he thought just and right. As for anticipating the tardy compensation which has since been decreed, but has not yet been received, it could not have entered at that time into any sane man's imagination. I was happy in the possession of Mr. Buckingham's intimate acquaintance. I did my little possible to assist him in the pursuit of that boon which has now been conceded. I was, to be sure, but the smallest of all "Tritons of the minnows" a very wren with a little voice in the boughs of the oak, a mouse gnawing at the net of the lion; but the lion is free at last, and even a mouse may rejoice in his liberation. But as for Mr. Buckingham, my own knowledge of him at the time when all his hopes were crushed, is a sufficient guarantee to me that no ignoble motives entered into the calculation which led him to embrace honorable poverty rather than wealth purchased by subserviency or the abandonment of principle. I saw him cheerful, I may say magnanimously cheerful in the midst of ruin. I was at his house on the day which always, under the happiest circumstances, is one of gloom and discomfort, it was the last day he could call it his home, and his effects were being disposed of at a miserable loss. His wife was almost sinking under the shock, but his own equanimity, his perfect good humour in which he was matched by few, never forsook him. He was, gentlemen, a martyr of the Free Press, as such I challenge for him your best sympathies in this hour of its release from thraldom. He was a man whom I knew well, whom I greatly esteemed, to me therefore it is a real pleasure that I am delegated to propose to you on such an occasion the health of

"James Silk Buckingham."

Mr. Turton.—My friend, Mr. Parker, has told you who led the forlorn hope, but he has not said who led the next in advance,—who was the first after Mr. Buckingham's hopes had been ruined. There was at that time but one paper in Calcutta, the Hurkaru, which fearlessly advocated liberal opinions. There was indeed another daily paper published, but it risked nothing, it was a blind and slavish supporter of the Government of the day, a most uncompromising advocate of the powers that be, supported by men of talent indeed, from whom better things might have been expected. It is not too much to say that at the time the forlorn hope was driven back, Mr. Smith alone stood forward in support of the Freedom of the Press, and risked all he had in the world as perseveringly as did his predecessor, and from that day to this, the Hurkaru has been the consistent advocate of the rights of the people. Gentlemen, I propose

"Mr. Samuel Smith, and the independent conductors of the Calcutta Press, whilst the Press Regulation was in operation."

Mr. S. Smith.—I feel as I ought to do, the compliment conveyed in the toast you have done me the honor to propose, and which has been so warmly received by the friends of the press who have assembled here to celebrate its emancipation, an event which dissipates the fears, and puts the seal of legal approbation to the hopes of many an anxious year.

I feel proud of the manner in which my name is associated with the Liberty of the Press and with those who have labored to support its independence and who have suffered in its defence. I allude to Mr. Buckingham and the Calcutta Journal; Mr. Sutherland and Mr. Wm. Adam of the Calcutta Chronicle. Mr. Buckingham, we have heard, is about to receive compensation for his losses, but Mr. Sutherland and Mr. Adam, although nearly ruined by the suppression of their paper, have never received any compensation. No men labored more indefatigably than they did to support the independence of the press, and no men have better deserved the thanks of this meeting and of the Indian public.

I cannot complain that I have suffered much in a pecuniary point of view—but I have, as Mr. Turton has kindly assured you, cheerfully staked my all when the support of the principles of the Hurkaru or the advocacy of public rights required me to do so. It would be an idle boast now that the days of peril are past to say that I shall always be ready to do so, so long as I am connected with the Calcutta Press. The future may, however, be safely judged of by the past, and in the trial, should it ever come again, I hope I shall not be found wanting. (Applause.) But I am too happy in having weathered the tempests that have wrecked all the free press fleet except the Hurkaru to dwell longer on the gloomy picture of the past. I am fortunate in having escaped both Scylla and Charibdis, and after many years of difficulty and danger and delighted to stand here on this happy and glorious occasion—surrounded by friends of the Press—to acknowledge in the best manner I am able the gratitude I—and I presume all my brethren of the Press feel towards our present Governor-General for repealing that odious regulation under which we have groaned for many a weary year.

It is not, however, the Editors and Proprietors of Printing Presses alone that ought to feel grateful to Sir Charles Metcalfe—the whole people of India will partake as largely of its advantages as those immediately connected with the press, and will reap the full advantages of its perfect freedom.

By this liberal measure Sir Charles Metcalfe has freed Editors from harrassing and ineffectual restraint and liberated Proprietors from a law which unjustly depressed the value of their property, and might again, as heretofore, be used as an engine utterly to destroy it and reduce them from comparative affluence and honorable employment to banishment and penury after perhaps many years of incessant and anxious labor in an enervating climate, and all because they allowed their journals to publish honest opinions on public events, which happened to be unpalatable to the ruler of the day.

Although not a very ancient man, I am, I believe, the father of the Calcutta Press—the oldest press proprietor and proprietor of the oldest press in India—at all events I have for nearly fifteen years devoted all my days and half my nights to the personal management of the affairs of the Hurkaru press. I am able, therefore, to speak from experience of the hampering difficulties and imminent dangers both to person and property which have hitherto beset unfortunate Editors and Proprietors. I can feel in due proportion the various advantages which will attend their emancipation from the shackles imposed upon them by other men in other times—but the hour is too far advanced to enter upon such a detail so fully as I should have wished to have done. I shall therefore be brief in my retrospect.

When we escaped from the iron sway of Governor Adam, the comparative toleration of Lord Amherst, and the liberality of Lord William Bentinck had almost made us forget that we were, by law, still shackled—for some years no act of the Government reminded us of the fact—we were practically free though legally enslaved, and it was not until the rumoured approach of a new Governor, in the person of a Tory Lord, a diplomatist of the Castlereagh school, that we were reminded we were free only by sufferance and that our new master's sic volo was sufficient to annihilate us. (Cheers.) It was at this critical juncture that Sir C. Metcalfe, with a magnanimity which will reflect immortal honor on his name, divested himself of this odious and unnecessary power, and struck off the fetters that had been imposed on us by Governor Adam. (Applause.)

For all this we are deeply grateful, and we trust this wisely liberal measure of Sir Charles Metcalfe's will be followed by others of equal value; we are sure it will endear his respected name to our grateful memories, and remind us that if one accident bestowed upon us a Governor-General who fettered the press, another and more fortunate one blessed us with a ruler who emancipated it—both were Civil Servants of the East India Company, and in these good and in succeeding and we hope better times, we have little fear that any future Governor will attempt again to chain the freedom of opinion or venture to banish those who dare to give it honest expression. (Cheers.)

I should be sorry to lose this opportunity of drawing the attention of our friends here assembled, to the fact that the independence of the Calcutta press had, besides those professionally connected with it, more than one liberally disposed amateur coadjutor, as indefatigably laborious in its cause as their other avocations permitted. A cloud has passed over them (applause), but the conductors of the Free Press of Calcutta can never forget their labors in the good cause (name, name). They are not present, I believe, or if they are they need not blush at the mention I have taken the liberty, to make of the valuable support they accorded when most needed, and therefore most valued.

The foremost I shall name, and I do it with pride and satisfaction, is Colonel James Young (cheers) a staunch supporter of the Calcutta Journal and the Bengal Hurkaru—my early patron and friend,—to whom in times of difficulty and danger, when I was alone in the Hurkaru without an Editor, and with but few friends, I always applied for the aid of counsel and pen—and always successfully—the free press of India had and has no warmer friend—no more willing laborer than Colonel Young. (Cheers.)

Another gentleman—an old and staunch supporter also of the Calcutta Free Press and a warm advocate of liberal principles in all things—a man universally known and respected I need only name him to satisfy you of the justness of my assertions. I speak of Mr. John Palmer. (Cheers.) But for the powerful support of these gentlemen—a support not confined to secret and safe encouragement, but openly afforded with their pens and by their personal influence. But for them, the laborers in the vineyard of the Free Press might have failed in the struggle, and even the Hurkaru itself, which has this night been so much lauded, as the last remnant of the Press as it stood in the days of Governor Adam, might have ceased to exist—might have been as the Calcutta Journal and the Calcutta Chronicle now are. To these gentlemen, therefore, the thanks of this meeting are due for their liberal and disinterested support in times of peril to the Calcutta Free Press.

There is yet a third individual who has for several years been a press proprietor, and who has always battled on the liberal side, and that with the greatest disinterestedness and liberality. I mean Dwarkanath Tagore, who has spent many thousand rupees in support of liberal principles, and who has never sought profit in his connection with the Press, but who doubtless, being a merchant, would not object to receive it, were it forthcoming.

Mr. Smith concluded by apologizing for the time he had occupied the attention of the meeting, and hoped if he had failed to mention the name of any active friend of the liberal press, the Chairman would not allow the omission to pass unnoticed.

These were the toasts arranged for the evening; but several others, amongst which were Mr. Turton, Mr. Parker, Mr. Palmer, and Colonel Young, were proposed and drank at a late hour, and Mr. Pattle, at the close of the festival, called on the company to make an annual feast, by meeting next year, and every future year, to celebrate the Freedom of the Press, and to perpetuate this act of honor and justice to the noble individual the liberator of it All present greeted this proposition with enthusiastic applause. The company separated at two o'clock in the morning.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1835.

This-day, the new press law comes into operation. THIS DAY THE PRESS OF INDIA IS FREE, and the power to annihilate every journal of Bengal by a stroke of a Secretary's pen NO LONGER EXISTS. Let every friend of a Free Press rejoice then—let him mark the event in some way suited to his own feelings and his own taste, if any conscientious scruple or imperious necessity prevents his making one of those who are THIS NIGHT to celebrate the law in the good old English fashion of a public dinner, at the Town Hall. The number of those assembled will be few—not a fifth part of those whom we have seen eagerly crowd to partake in Sir Charles Metcalfe's princely hospitality, but who shrink back from contributing to a dinner to celebrate a measure which reflects more honor upon him than any with which his name has yet been associated.—Hurkaru.

The day has at length arrived from whence the Indian Press is to consider itself as free by law as the Press of our native country;—as free as the uncertain law of libel will permit it to be—as free and, as bold as may sort with those considerations for the peace and good order of society, which every rational journalist feels it imperative upon him to cherish. We are grateful—thrice grateful, for the long-sought boon. We are grateful to Lord William Bentinck for the fair trial he gave the Press, whereby he paved the way for the more decided measure of his successor, and we are grateful to his successor that he did not think it necessary longer to hold over our heads a power which any new comer of less liberal dispositions might have exerted to our detriment. Nor let us, while offering acknowledgments to the authors of our liberty, forget the tribute due to that bold brave man who first periled his fortune in an endeavour to break through the shackles which policy and timidity had imposed upon the freedem of public writing. Let us not, we say, in this the day of our prosperity, forget that it is to James Silk Buckingham we owe not only the first blow aimed at the odious and selfish system under which the country groaned, but likewise part of the glory of victory, for it has been as much through his exertions in England, up to the period when the House of Commons recognized his claim to compensation as through the extertions of the journalists abroad, that a right view has at length been taken of the importance of completely freeing the Indian Press. We hope that Mr. Buckingham's name will not be omitted among the toasts to-night.

With regard to the new law by which the licentiousness of the press is for the future to be restrained, we have nothing to add to what we have already written. It is perhaps too indulgent to the proprietors and editors of papers, and manifests too little consideration for the public. But of this we will not take any mean advantage. We have determined that from this day forward the name of the Proprietor and Editor of this paper shall be as prominent as that of the publisher, so that if by any unhappy, chance, or in the execution of our duty, an injured or offended reader should be anxious for reparation at our hands, he will be at no loss of a fit direction to the proper and responsible quarter.—Englishman.

The Free Press dinner was, if not as to the number of those present, in every other respect worthy of the occasion. About 100 friends of the press sat down to a splendid entertainment—and the greatest cordiality and enthusiasm prevailded throughout. The Governor-General's band, kindly lent for the occason, was in attendance.

What a change has come over us! We could not contemplate the festive scene and think of the purpose for which we are assembled without the feelings of enthusiam almost oppressive from their excess, at this evidence of the glorious triumph of light over darkness as it was happily designated by one of the guests—to think that we were assembled in that Town Hall, which until of late had never echoed a liberal political sentiment, where some twelve years since a banished Editor was not permitted to give a farewell breakfast to a few friends in one of the Committee rooms—to think that we were there assembled at a grand entertainment to celebrate the liberty of the press, in which civilians and military men of high talent and long standing in the service participated and fearlessly responded to the enthusiasm of those around them—to hear a relation of the Governor-General present assure us, that althohgh our noble minded Ruler could not of course join in celebrating his own measure, he would otherwise have rejoiced to have been present, and that he went along with us in the liberal sentiments which had been expressed, and in that ardent devotion to the cause of liberty which seemed to animate every one present—to hear these things might well excite in our minds retrospections of the past, and joyous hopes of the future, which those only can appreciate who have been enabled to mark the contrast—the vast change from darkness to light of which the festival of Tuesday night was one of the signal evidences. Bold, indeed, would that man have been who twelve years ago had dared to prophecy that at the end of that time we should see the freedom of the press celebrated by a grand entertainment in the Town Hall, with the band of the Governor-General in attendance! To some this last circumstance may seem a matter of slight importance: but to us it appears far otherwise, for the circumstance of a Ruler's lending his band for such an occasion, is in our minds by no means one of the least striking evidences of the progress of liberal opinions.

The reports of several of the most eloquent speeches, those of Mr. Turton, Mr. Parker and though last not least that of Mr. Lorimer, convey a very faint idea even of the language of the speakers, and of course their spirit must evaporate in the mere reading. Still enough is left to justify the praise which has been bestowed on this festive commemoration as one of the most brilliant which has yet taken place in India. There are many passages in the speeches which suggest important reflections. Mr. Turton sketched the history of the press from the period of Hickey's Gazette which was printed here in 1780. The press was then free, and no one in power seems to have dreamt that any interference with its freedom was justifiable! At the distance of FIFTX FIVE years however, we are celebrating its emancipation from shackles long subsequently imposed. Such has been the career of our Indian Government: but our "freedom, though slow to come, has came at last," and we rejoice that the event has been celebrated in a manner so worthy of British subjects and the occasions. Mr. Parker justly ridiculed the idea of danger from a free press—but there is danger—to what?—misgovernment. It is quite true that a despotism and a free press cannot be long co-existent—but that is an argument in favour of a Free Press not against it; for India wants not and will not have a despotism. We speak not now of mere forms of Government, but of principles. That Government which submits its actions to the scrutiny of the public, by the very act proclaims itself no longer a despotism—acknowledges that it exists for the paople. We maintain that the British Government should blush to acknowledge that any disclosures of the press can lower it in the estimation of the people. Our opinion is that the more they know of the motives and intentions of our Rulers the better—the more secure will be our dominion—the greater will be their happiness. It is the greatest misfortune under which our Indian administrations labour, that the press cannot yet address itself to the mass of the people, echo their sentiments, and make known their wants and wishes; but the press is the only medium by which these can in any country be effectually made known. A government then desirous of the happiness of the people will encourage the press. One great argument against the press has been that it ought to follow in the train of free institutions. In modern times the press has been the greatest instrument of political reforms which have given birth to free institutions. The able speech of Colonel de Hezeta, which is, we are glad to observe, well reported, has faithfully described the operation of the press and the progress of general freedom of which that has been the great promoter. When Sheridan paid that eloquent tribute to the power of the press which Mr. Turton quoted, we doubt whether he had very distinct views of the subject, for he did not apparently perceive that a free press was compatible with the existence of much corruption. What was the state of things in his day? yet the press was free; but no doubt that freedom was even then undermining the fortress of corruption which it has since overturned, or at least shaken to its foundation.—Hurkaru.

The dinner to celebrate the Freedom of the Indian Press was, without a single exception, the most cheerful, animated, and splendid festival at which we ever had the good fortune to assist. About one hundred persons sat down to the repast, which was certainly served up by Gunter and Hooper in a highly creditable manner, and seemed to give general satistaction. Mr. Turton was in the chair, and Mr. Parker performed the duties of Vice, and when we say that we never heard those eloquent speakers to half so much advantage as on Tuesday night, some idea may be formed of the power of their several addresses. In fact, the cause seemed to lend an inspiration to every speaker. Mr. Henry Torrens, Captain Taylor, Mr. Sutherland, Colonel de Hezeta, Mr. Pattle, —in a word all who spoke, evinced that their hearts were filled with their subject, and loudly and warmly did the assembly respond to their noble enthusiasm. And why should it not be so? Eloquence was not on this occasion debased to the purposes of idle eulogy. There were no great guests,—no bahadurs at the table listening to the praises of their own mighty deeds, merely to rise and sputter fulsome encomiums in return. MANKIND was the theme of the speakers. The mighty struggles for liberty which have linked Frenchmen, Englishmen, Americans, Spaniards and Poles in one common bond of brotherhood formed the pleasing topics of the chairman and his accomplished coadjutor; and when the party broke up at two in the morning, one irrepressible joy pervaded the assembly that the freedom of the press had been so happily and appropriately celebrated. We heard one say—a person who does not generally hold Calcutta public meetings in high esteem—that this was the most brilliant assembly, intellectually considered, he had ever witnessed—he had no idea that the metropolitans had it in them.—Englishman.

We find that we greatly underrated the number of East Indians present at the Press Dinner. Sixteen of their names have been mentioned to us from memory, and therefore we concluded that nearly a quarter of the company must have consisted of East Indians. Considering that the Chair was kept till nearly two o'clock, it is a most creditable index of the progres of reform in the habits of society, that in so large a party there was no instance of the least indecorum from the effects of the bottle. But a few years ago it would have been out of the question to expect less than a dozen sots in so large a company, however composed, dining together upon any festive occasion. Is this moderation owing to sumptuary laws, to Temperance Society Inquisitions, or to any other restrictions? No; drunkenness has always been a crime in the eye of the law, but the law was contemned both by rich and poor: the march of good sense has alone effected that reform which legal penalties were powerless to produce. Have we not here something like an illustration of the Press question? Like that generous liquor which was given us for our good, to enliven our tables, to promote social intercourse, to warm the imagination and stimulate the sallies of wit, to make us for a time forgetful of our cares, and emancipate us from the sordid sentiments which naturally beset the man who is born to labor, to cement friendships;—but which, used in excess, produces the hot dispute, the irritating epithet, the unprovoked affront, the separation of friends, self-exposure, personal violence, and perhaps bloodshed—like that generous liquor, which, used in moderation is a blessing, and abused is a curse; so the Press may be both the one and the other at the discretion of those who conduct it. It is the generous wine of a more extended society, endued with more potent influences than its material prototype, more necessary to our welfare, more intensely contributing to our enjoyment. Like its prototype, its excess may produce evil, evil of a most serious nature; but the offenders must be few and well marked, and were there no other penalties for their offences, the good sense of society would visit them with its reprobation and contempt. A liberal Government has taken away restriction from the Press of India. Let it be the study of those who conduct it, to prove their own discretion a better safeguard than the shackles of a mistrusting Government. The advice given by Mr. Torrens at the Press Dinner, to avoid bitter expressions and coarse invective in all newspaper discussions affecting other journals,—a sentiment concurred in by Mr. Sutherland,—will, if attended to, contribute more to heighten the respectability of the Indian Press than any other reform which superior talent could introduce.—Calcutta Courier.

The usual miscellaneous business of the evening being concluded, the Secretary, having obtained permission of the President, proceeded to address the meeting to the following effect.

Mr. President,—In begging your premission to postpone proceeding farther with the regular business of the evening, I know that I am acting in accordance with the wishes of a great part, if not of the whole, of the gentlemen composing this assembly. There is no one among us, I believe, who is ignorant of the great loss which this Society has sustained since its last meeting, by the death of one of its brightest ornaments and most indefatigable supporters; I need not say, that I allude to the late Mr. Twining. In rising to propose that this melancholy event should not be permitted to pass unnoticed, I know that no apology is necessary; unless indeed it be, for the imperfect and unsatisfactory manner, in which I may execute the duty, which I have undertaken, I will not say reluctantly: for, although I deeply lament my own inability to do justice to the subject, I confess I cannot feel otherwise than grateful to those, who have afforded me this opportunity of endeavoring to do honor to the memory of one, for whom I entertained the most sincere esteem and regard.

I need not attempt, gentlemen, to trace an outline of the professional career of the late Mr. Twining; that duty will no doubt be performed by abler hands than mine, I shall therefore content myself with stating, that after serving his country honorably, both on the Peninsula, and on the continent of Europe, during the greatest part of one of the most gigantic and protracted struggles with a foreign enemy, in which England ever was engaged, the subject of this notice came among us, to share our fortunes, now a little more than eleven years ago.

The Indian portion of the career of the late Mr. Twining, as it embraced the period of the full maturity of his powers, was still more distinguished than that which had preceded it. His thorough knowledge of his profession, his great sagacity and his unremitting attention rapidly secured for him an extensive and valuable medical practice; this success, however, highly deserved and flattering as it was, did not constitute with us his greatest merit: that it had its share cannot be denied; for while it led us to respect and look up to him, the urbanity of his manners, and the affability of his address, insensibly secured our permanent attachment. That the community of Calcutta have had able medical practitioners among them, that they have them now, and that they will have them hereafter, cannot be denied; in this respect his loss may possibly be replaced; but gentlemen, my heart misgives me, when I endeavour to indulge the hope, that this society can ever find anotner Twining. To be what he was, how many high mental endowments, and how many of the more amiable qualities of the heart are necessary. To natural talents of a high order Mr. Twining united an ardent love of his profession, and a spirit, that led him to look to far higher objects than mere lucre, in the practice of it. In that assuredly he did well; for now that gold can no longer be of service to him, the monument to his genius, which he has left behind him in his writings, besides its eminent utility to his fellow creatures, will go far to secure for his name an immortality among the more distinguished medical writers of his country. In addition to these mental endowments Mr. Twining possessed a powerful, cool and dispassionate judgment, which enabled him to cast from him as weeds the most alluring speculations, if unsupported by sufficient premises, and consequently eminently qualified him for conducting investigations into the mysteries of disease: nor was his attention confined to these pursuits; but was extended to those branches of knowledge, which are collaterally connected with medicine, and which may be termed her sister sciences or hand-maids.

When I mention, gentlemen, that these talents and acquirements were combined with habits of industry, nay even of the most laborious application to whatever promised to increase his professional knowledge, or to extend his reputation, it will be allowed at once, that the individual so gifted could scarcely fail of commanding success, and so the result eminently showed.

Such, gentlemen, are a few of the qualities which the late Mr. Twining possessed; but there were others, which in a more especial manner endeared him to this society. To an unremitting love of professional research in himself, he united the power still more useful, if possible, of inspiring others with a portion of his zeal; to him accordingly we are indebted, not only for a series of the most masterly contributions that ever have been made to Indian Medical Science, which he himself laid before us, but for many other communications, which he was the means of encouraging other members of the profession to submit to our judgment; to him we are indebted for an interest in this Society, which I believe led him to be present at every one of its meetings, at which he could possibly have attended, during the whole of his Indian career: to him we are indebted for an interest in its welfare, that led him for many years of his life to devote to its affairs, the greater portion of the little leisure which he had, and which was to him so valuable; and to him we are indebted for a liberality of sentiment that led him freely to communicate to every member of it from his ample stock of knowledge. But, gentlemen, the catalogue of our obligations to him might be extended almost to an indefinite extent; I shall in consequence refrain form dwelling farther on the subject, where however let me ask shall we now find the cautious and experienced Physician to conduct our trials of new remedies; and where, oh where shall our young professional brethren find so kind, and so able an instructor to initiate them into the peculiarities of Indian Medical practice? Fortunately his successors in office are men of high talent who will no doubt eagerly endeavour to emulate his virtues.

I have been long enough in India, gentlemen, to remember the first institution of this Society, and likewise to remember what our service was, before that event, and I do not hesitate to say, that in my opinion this Society has done more to promote medical research in India, and consequently to elevate the professional character of our department, than could have been believed or even imagined by the most sanguine of its institutors. For a great portion of that improvement we are indebted to my predecesor, the late Dr. Adam, to whose learning, and to whose virtues no tongue could do more than adequate justice; for an equal, if not a larger share we are indebted to the late Mr. Twining. Though it was neither in his character to be vain, nor boastful, he had a just sense of the value of this society, and knowing that, he could not do otherwise than wish that it should receive the most extensive support.

I was in hopes, gentlemen, when we last met, that I shoud have been able to read to you this evening, a contribution, I need not say a valuable one, by Mr. Twining. Alas! I little thought at that time that it would prove to be a posthumous one; it will now come to us as a valued and esteemed legacy from our departed friend. Though there is every probability that it will be recovered, I have not yet recovered it, but the delay can be of little consequence; for I believe there is no one among us, at this moment, who could listen to it, or to any production of the late Mr. Twining's but with feelings of the most painful emotion. For my own part, so recent is our melancholy loss, and so accustomed was I to meet him in this place, that I can scarcely help casting my eyes around this table, in hopes of once more recognizing his well known features.

But enough of this, let us cease to deplore our own losses; for he requires not our commiseration. Let us console ourselves with the reflection that he died in the full possession of his faculties; that those who were dearest to him have been left in affluence by his own meritorious exertions; that he met his fate in a mode, which of all others may be considered honorable for a member of our profession—in the performance of an act of humanity to a person who required his assistance; and lastly that all ranks of society have been actuated but by one desire on the occasion, and that is, to do honor to his memory; and shall we then, gentlemen, who principally benefitted by his society, and some of us by his friendship, shall we be behind others in testifying our respect, our regard, our little less than veneration for his memory? I will not do myself, far less you, the injustice to harbour this suspicion, I shall therefore conclude by proposing "that besides other tributes, which will be submitted for your consideration, a biographical memoir of the late Mr. Twining be drawn up under the superintendence of the Committee of Papers, and prefixed to the volume of the Society's transactions, now passing through the press.

This resolution having been seconded by Dr. Mellis, was carried unanimously. It was then proposed by Mr. Hutchinson and seconded by Mr. Bramley, that the Medical and Physical Society do now adjourn till the first Saturday in October next, at the usual place and hour.

This resolution was unanimously agreed to, and the meeting of the Medical and Physical Society was accordingly declared to be dissolved.

During the course of the evening, many gentlemen, among whom were the President Dr. Langstaff, Dr. Mellis, Dr. Corbyn, Dr. Garden, Mr. Egerton, Mr. Bramley, Mr Goodeve and others, expressed in feeling and appropriate terms the high esteem in which they held the late Mr. Twining.

MEETING OF THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

Resolutions moved and adopted, at a Meeting of the Members of the Medical Profession in India, held at the Asiatic Society's Appartments, September 5, 1835.

J. Langstaff, Esq., in the Chair.

First Resolutiotion moved by Dr. Langstaff, and seconded by Mr. Egerton.

Resolved—That such gentlemen now present, as may be desirous of testifying their sense of the public and private worth of the late Mr. Twining, be requested to rem ain and form themselves into a meeting of the Medical Profession, for the purpose of considering and deciding on the most suitable mark of respect to pay to the memory of that highly esteemed individual.

Second Resolution moved by Mr. Egerton and seconded by Dr. Mellis.

Resolved—That while this meeting is of opinion that the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta has done much to elevate the character of the medical service throughout India, by encouraging and promoting a love of medical research, it is impressed with the conviction that to no individual is that Society more indebted than to the late Mr. Twining, not only for the valuable contributions which from time to time he made to its Transactions, but for the active and unremitting interest which from first to last he continued to take in its proceedings and welfare; and that it is accordingly fitting, and no doubt the desire of by far the greater number of the Members of the Society, and of the medical profession in India generally, to mark individually the sense they entertain of his services, of his high professional attainments, and of the unassuming private worth, which rendered him ever ready to communicate with cheerfulness to others the result of his great experience.

Third Resolution moved by Mr. Bramley and seconded by Dr. Ranken.

Resolved—That with the view of carrying the two foregoing resolutions into effect, a subscription list be submitted to every member of the profession in India for the purpose of collecting funds; wherewith to defray the expense of such tribute to the memory of the deceased, as may be determined on.

Fourth Resolution moved by Dr. Garden, and seconded by Mr. Goodeve.

Resolved—That with the funds so collected a monument, bearing a suitable inscription, be erected over the grave of the late Mr. Twining, and that with any surplus which may remain a portrait, if possible, be procured, and placed in the apartments of the Medical and Physical Society.

Fifth Resolution moved by Mr. Chapman, and seconded by Dr. Spence.

Resolved—That the following gentlemen be requested to form a Committee for the purpose of carrying into effect the foregoing resolutions, viz. Messrs. Langstaff, Garden, Strong, Hutchinson, Thacker, Egerton, Bramley, and Goodeve.

Sixth Resolution moved by Mr. Bramley, and seconded by Mr. Goodeve.

Resolved—That Mr. Hutchinson be appointed Secretary to the above Committee.

Hurkaru.] J. LANGSTAFF, Chairman.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

A general meeting of this Society took place at the Town Hall, on Wednesday morning, the 6th September, (fifteen members present), when Charles Grant, Esq., Commissioner of the Soonderbuns, proposed at the last meeting, was elected a member by ballot.

The following gentlemen were proposed, viz.

G. J. Siddons, Esq., { Proposed by Mr. Bell. Seconded by Sir Edward Ryan.

W. H. S. Rainey, Esq., of Jessore,..... { Proposed by Wm. Storm, Esq., seconded by D. Hare, Esq.

Duplicate copies of the report upon experiments at Akra, (read and approved at last meeting), where laid on the table, and the Society now only waited the report which Mr. Patrick had promised to make on a bale of Akra-grown cotton. In the absence of any communication from Mr. Patrick, Mr. C. Prinsep informed the meeting, that he had been at Fort Gloster lately, and was happy to add, had heard a very favourable opinion expressed of the quality; and further, that both the samples of yarn and cloth made from the raw material, would be forthcoming shortly.

Resolved—That a letter be addressed to Mr. Patrick, urging him to use his best endeavours to get the matter speedily out of hand, and thus enable the Society to annex a copy of his report to their own for the information of the Government, and the Honorable the Court of Directors.

Read the following communications:—

1.—A letter from Mr. W. H. S. Rainey, of Khoolna Factory, Jossore, expressing a desire to become a member, and soliciting a small supply of Guinea-grass and tobacco seed.

From the trial made by Mr. Rainey in feeding horses, he is sanguine of success, and that the Guinea-grass may be cultivated to such an extent as to supersede the use of corn in fattening the horned cattle.

In proof of the excellence of this grass, Mr. Rainey very politely offers to send in due time a bullock and sheep fattened exclusively upon it.

Mr. Rainey is of opinion, that the diseases (to which Mr. Watson particularly drew attention in a former paper) common to cattle in Bengal, were much aggravated, if not wholly induced, by scantiness of fodder and constant exposure.

The officiating Secretary had anticipated the Society's desire to dispense whatever was within their power, as likely to contribute to improvement, and had forwarded to Mr. Rainey a small supply of Guinea-grass seed, (no tobacco seed in store) from his own garden, not omitting to accept in the name of the Society, the promised sheep and bullock.

2.—A letter from Baboo Hullodhur Law, offering his services to translate a Persian manuscript on gardening, accompanied with a specimen which did the Baboo credit.

After some discussion as to the necessity of disbursing a large sum for this purpose, it was resolved that some Member of the Society, conversant in Persian, be solicited to give a full abstract, and Baboo Ramcomul Sen was mentioned as most likely to meet the wishes of the Society.

The officiating Secretary laid before the Meeting, estimates from the various presses in pursuance of a Resolution passed in August, to elicit information as to the terms on which the printing of the Society's transactions might be vigorously and permanently resumed. The lowest rates where those of the Baptist Mission, and Serampore establishment, between which the difference was only one anna per page in favor of the former; but with reference to the circumstance of Mr. Marshman being a member of the Society, the decision was in favor of the work being made over to his Press, for the present.

Resolved—That the Hon'ble W H. L. Melville, Mr. Jas. Kyd, and the officiating Secretary, do form a Committee, for the examination and selection of papers for the Press, and commence immediately.

A letter to the officiating Secretary from Messrs. Ritchie, Stewart and Co. of Bombay, advising the shipment of some seeds per Futil Currim, agreeably to an indent forwarded by him in July last.

The following Resolution was submitted to the President, by Mr. Bell, and when read, seconded by Mr. Kyd:—

"That the present appears a fit opportunity for the Society to express their cordial thanks to Dr. Wallich for the valuable services which he has rendered as their Secretary since the resignation of Mr. Robison.

"It cannot be overlooked, that Dr. Wallich's acceptance of office just as an unpleasant correspondence had been agitated, bearing upon the terms on which the Society held a lease of the Alipore Garden (then under abandonment,) was productive of the most beneficial consequences, and that but for his exertions and address, during the absence of the President, at the Cape, the Society would in all probability have ceased to exist.

"The best proof of what has been effected, is the regular train in which every thing was left by Dr. Wallich, to his successor for the time being—while it reflects the highest credit on his ability and disinterested zeal.

"Although the Society have reason to regret the temporary absence of so valuable a member as Dr. Wallich, during his mission to Assam, yet the important results likely to accrue, to the Agricultural and Commercial interests of India from his scientific observations, will, in some measure, make amends for the loss of his services; and it is hardly necessary to add that in proportion to the regrets now felt at his departure, will the Society hail, with pleasure, his return."

Twining, Esq.—a loss which will ever be felt and deplored by those who had the advantage of his professional service, whose confidence, affection, and esteem he never failed to secure."

Proposed by Mr. T. Holroyd, seconded by Mr. R. S. Thomson, and unanimously resolved:—

"That the subscription already opened be extended for the purpose of collecting a sufficient sum to be laid out in some manner, which shall best perpetuate his memory, and record the grateful estimation in which his eminent professional talents, his unwearied and zealous attention, his uniform amenity and kindness, were held by his numerous patients and friends."

Proposed by Mr. H. Holroyd, seconded by Mr. C. R. Prinsep, and resolved:—

"That the following gentlemen shall be appointed a committee to receive subscriptions and to consider the best mode of applying the funds which shall be received towards the object of the preceding resolution, and to report the same to the subscribers for their confirmation at some future meeting to be called by the committee for that purpose, and that the determination of the majority of such future meeting shall be binding on the subscribers."

Proposed by Mr. T. Holroyd, and resolved:—

"That the following gentlemen be the committee: Mr. R. H. Rattray, Mr. Charles Prinsep, Lieutenant-Colonel Beatson, Mr. James Prinsep, Mr. T. E. M. Turton, Mr. R. S. Thomson, Mr. W. Thacker, Mr. T. Holroyd."

Proposed by Colonel Beatson, seconded by Mr. T. Holroyd, and resolved:—

"That Mr. R. S. Thomson be requested to act as Secretary and Treasurer to the committee, and to receive and realize the subscriptions to be paid into the Union Bank."

Resolved—"That this meeting do adjourn to this day three weeks. (Friday the 25th September.)"

Resolved—"That the thanks of this meeting be given to the chairman."

The subscription list already amounts to upwards of 3,000 rupees.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.—The Water Witch, from China the 29th July, arrived here on the 8th September. She had a remarkably quick passage of 19days, against the monsoon, to Singapore. The vessel is to be dispatched immediately again, and she will, doubtless, make three complete voyages to China within the year. The Water Witch has brought 2,20,000 taels of Sycee silver, worth about eight lakhs of rupees, including the balance of the proceeds of the Sylph's opium. The bullion will find a good market, as the new coinage has created a brisk demand in the bazaar. Mr. Gordon, the head of the Tea Commission, arrived in the Witch.

The Water Witch has again proceeded on her voyage to China with eleven hundred chests of opium on board. Mr. G. J. Gordon has gone back in her to prosecute the objects of the Tea Commission.

The accounts of the salvage of the Sylph have been made up, and the loss turns out to be about 40 per cent. According to the statements, the policies at risk at the time of the wreck comprehended 980 chests of opium insured for 10,65,891 rupees, and the net proceeds have realized 7,35,604. rupees; from which is to be deducted 86,022 rupees, the salvage settled with Government: the net amount saved to the insurers is therefore 6,49,582 rupees, being rupees 662-13-2 per chest, or 60-95 per cent. upon the total amount insured.

The Committee of the Insurance Offices have deputed Mr. Wm. Carr and Rustomjee Cowasjee to receive and distribute the funds, and they paid the amount of salvage on the 25th September without waiting for the bills of lading, &c.,—which were remitted from China to the Agent of Captain Hawkins,—being delivered into their possession.

CIVIL SERVICE.—A letter on the Civil Fund, signed a CIVILAIN, appeared in the Courier of the 9th September. The writer declares on the authority, it would appear, of Mr. Curnin, that the Civil Fund is in a state of bankruptcy! there being a deficit of five laks of rupees, and he suggests that the following propositions should be immediately adopted to rescue the Fund from utter ruin:—

1st. That no one family, now on the fund, or who may hereafter come on the Fund, receive more in the aggregate annually from the Fund than £500.

2nd. That Mr. Curnin be requested to state what additional subscription will be necessary from each subscriber to maintain the Fund at its present rates of pension to widows and children.

3d. That as it is likely several subscribers, bachelors, or married monied men, (not likely to benefit by the Fund) may decline any additional subscription, yet continue to pay the present rate,—that Mr. Curnin be requested to frame a scale of additional subscriptions, on payment of which in future, subscribers wishing it may continue to secure the present benefits of the Fund to their families.

4th. That the Court of Directors be earnestly solicited to save a noble Fund from ruin, by a transfer to the Civil Fund of a small portion of the enormous unappropriated Annuity Fund.

5th. That the Civil Fund being a charitable one, it should be conducted upon the most economical scale, and that consequently the salary of the Secretary be reduced immediately from Sa. Rs. 500 per mensem to 250.

A letter from London, dated the 13th of April, gives the following as the scheme for modifying the Civil Service Annuities, submitted by the Court of Directors to the Board of Controul:—

"1.—Pensions to be granted to Civil Servants at half their value, if compelled by sickness to quit the service as follows:—

|---|---|---|
| After 15 years service..... | £500 | per annm. |
| „ 10 and less than 15 years,..... | 250 | „ „ |
| Less than 10 years, a donation of..... | 500 | „ „ |

2.—The number of accepted annuities at the close of the year to be declared. Two-thirds of them to be appropriable to subscribers duly qualified in order of seniority, as respects applicants within three months after surplus declared, on payment of one quarter instead of half value. If the subscriptions of applicants exceeds one quarter, the excess to be returned. The remaining third, and such of the two-thirds as may not be claimed, to lapse to the Fund.

3.—Pensions may be paid in India to those wishing to reside there after resigning the service.

4.—Annuities to be paid quarterly, and up to the period of decease, on condition that the sums paid by annuitants be increased in proportion. The additional sum to be equal to the whole, not half, of the increased advantage.

5.—The Local Government to place out of employ such inefficients as have served twenty-two years, and won't take their pension.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY.—The public library gets on famously; a great many individuals have presented books to the institution and the subscriptions already amount to upwards of 31,000 rupees.

THE METCALFE LIBRARY.—Subscriptions to the Metcalfe Library continue to be sent in, but far less zeal is evinced in its establishment than might have been expected from the attendance at the press meeting in January last.

MR. CURNIN.—The sum presented by Sir Charles Metcalfe to Mr. Curnin, to go home in order to secure the establishment of the Military Retiring Fund, is said to be 6,000 rupees, and in addition to that he has afforded him a handsome allowance for his support while in England. It is said that the individuals who suggested the voyage to Mr. Curnin, as soon as they came to the knowledge of Sir Charles's munificent bequest, proposed to consider it as a loan, and to raise a subscription in the army to discharge it.

RIVER PIRACY.—About 1 o'clock on the morning of the 10th September, a boat was plundered near Sulkeah Salt Golahs by a party of fifteen men, who pretending to be revenue officers, stopped the boat and then robbed her of merchandise to the value of 400 Rs. A hue and cry was raised, and the guard-boats gave chase to the pirates, who, after pulling about the river for some time, were at length captured in the act of leaping ashore at Hautkolla.

ASIATIC SOCIETY'S MEMORIAL.—The Memorial of the Asiatic Society of their monthly proceedings, extracted from the Journal for August, has been delivered in duplicate to the Secretary of Government in the General Department, signed by Sir E. Ryan as President of the Society, in order that it might be forwarded through the official channel to the Court of Directors.

FREE PRESS ILLUMINATION.—Many of those who intended to illuminate their dwellings on the 15th September, were prevented from so doing from the state of the weather. The Hurkaru office shared this fate; for although grand preparations were made, the wind from the north-east blew full upon the front of the house and baffled every attempt to light up. Some of the printing offices and private residences, which had a southern aspect, were successful in illuminating, and Mr. Turton's house in particular exhibited a blaze of light. A more successful attempt, however, was made at the Hurkaru office on the nights of the 19th and 21st September, when the whole face of the building sparkled brilliantly with lights beautifully arranged.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE SOCIETY.—The Court of Directors have ordered the Government Life Insurance office here to be broken up immediately and the premiums returned to the policy-holders, and have expressed their displeasure at its establishment having been contemplated.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SCHOOL.—The examination of the General Assembly's school took place on the 18th September and reflected great credit on both the conductors and the pupils. An essay on wealth and another on atheism, were extremely well written.

MEDICAL COLLEGE.—Several of the students of the Medical College were examined on the 21st Sept., by Drs. Bramley and Goodeve in the presence of the Bishop, Mr. Dealtry, Capt. D. L. Richardson and two gentlemen from the Madras establishment. The boys seemed to understand what they were taught in, and displayed a considerable degree of cleverness in their answers to the questions put to them.

THE ICE.—All the ice has failed in consequence of the saltpetre,—with which the godown in which it was stored was impregnated,—having reached it. The wasteage by melting was several tons per day, and the small quantity that remained, was sold to Messrs. Gunter and Hooper, who have stored it in their experimental ice-house.

The subscriptions for building an ice-house already amount to 6,000 Rs, and the Committee of the subscribers intend to erect a new building on scientific principles. A meeting of the subscribers took place on the 26th Sept., and it was resolved : —

1.—That the Committee be empowered to carry into immediate effect the sixth Resolution of the last Meeting, and to circulate books for the collection of subscriptions.

2.—That the resolutions passed at the last Meeting be so far altered as to leave it open to the Committee to make the best arrangements in their power to secure to the subscribers a regular supply of ice at the smallest charges.

3.—That Messrs. Longueville Clarke, W. P. Grant, and W. M. Woollaston be added to the Committee.

NAWAB SHUMSHOODEEN.—It is stated that orders have been forwarded to Delhi for the execution of Nawab Shumsoodeen.

RELIGIOUS PROCESSIONS.—The Sungkritan of Huree, or religious singing processions, which had been put down for the last twelve months, have been revived through the interposition of Baboo Radha Kanta Deb, who, with Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore, succeeeded in removing the objections of the chief magistrate to the processions, and orders have been issued to permit them to parade the streets.

MURDER.—A woman named Peary was found murdered, in her house in Cotton street, on the 22d Sept. There were two wounds on her neck inflicted with a razor which was found in the bed. An inquest was held on the body, and from the evidence adduced it appears, that the horrid deed was perpetrated by her paramour, who has absconded. A verdict of "wilful murder" against some person or persons unknown, was returned.

RIVER STEAMERS.—The Lord William Bentinck, with the Jellinghee in tow, reached Bhagulpore on the 20th September, after encountering a very severe gale on the 16th and 17th. The vessels labored very much in the gale, and it was only by playing round the engine's full power that they were kept from going ashore about three miles above Sukreegully where the channel is very narrow. The current was running five knots an hour, and the vessels could hardly stem it. The river is said to be falling fast.

NATIVE STATES.

DELHI.—Messrs. Metcalfe, Colvin and Fraser, on paying their first ceremonial visit to the King, were invested with dresses of honor.

A lady of Hindoo Rao's has been robbed of jewels to the amount of 14,000 Rs.

Two men were cut down and killed in the district while burrowing under a house with intent to rob it.

A native woman is travelling about in the vicinity of Delhi calling herself Nawab Bagum Jokoor Ul Nissa, and widow of the late Hyder Ally Khan of Delhi. She is however known to be an impostor and to have been a nautch girl.

His Majesty Ackbar Shah, being offended with Meerza Alley Ahaud Bahadur, signified to the Government at Allahabad his desire to revoke the nomination of the above named prince to the post of Heir-apparent to the throne of Delhi, and his wish to confirm the same on Meerza Selim Bahadur, but the authorities have refused to approve of this proposition. Shah Kubeer Ool-Mulk, another son of the King, has assumed the vestments of a durvesh and retired from the world.

THE BAZA BAIE.—A hurkara, sent from Gwalior to gain intelligence from the Baza Baie's camp, has been seized and imprisoned by her orders.

JEYPORE.—It is stated that Major Alves has totally acquitted the Jeypore Government of influencing the murder of Mr. Blake and the attack upon himself ;—that the Rajpoots are growing more insolent daily ;—that some of the petty Thakoors are already fortifying their strongholds, and have sent out parties into our districts to plunder and burn them ;—that Major Alves has for some time been amusing himself with shooting and nautches, in company of Byree Saul, near Ghaut and Chatewarras, and that seven persons suspected of being concerned in the murder of Mr. Blake have been apprehended.

Government have intimated to the Jeypore authorities, that unless their explanation prove satisfactory, they must make over the Government to the British power ; and troops under the command of General Watson, are to move towards the state immediately. It is said that Byree Saul had a long and secret conference with the Vakeel of Joudpore, and that he has detained all the Jeypore Jagheerdars at the Court.

Major Alves has made known the ultimatum of the British Government to the Jeypore authorities, and it therefore now remains to be seen how they will act. A civil servant, it is said, has been appointed to investigate the affair of Mr. Blake's murder.

A report is circulated, that Jotaram has just been discovered to be the instigator of the late tragedy ; and another that a plot has been concerted to criminate the Suraogees, the friends of Jotaram, and that two or three of the leaders of that sect are to be executed by Beree Saul's orders. It is further said that Beree Saul having assembled the Thakoors and Zemindars of the state, told them that a British force was coming to Jeypore, and asked them whether they were willing to give over their country to the English or determined to fight in defence of it. They replied that they would act just as they were directed by him. The reports circulated of Europeans being unable to ride out without being abused by the people, appears to be totally unfounded and false, and has created much surprise in the camp, for Europeans have not been molested or insulted in any manner.

The Jeypore mail was stopped on the 9th September, by an artilleryman named Rigby, who knocked down the hurkaru conveying it and possessed himself of a packet addressed to Captain Anderson. He was, however, soon seized by some zemindars and delivered to the kotwal of Agra and is confined in cantonments to be tried by a court-martial.

LAHORE.—At the date of the dispatch of the latest intelligence, Runjeet Singh was at Umritsur, from whence he intended to proceed after the rains, via Multan, to Peshawur. His Highness has decided on relieving his forces biennially for the future, and has called upon Shah-Soojah-Ool-Moolk for replies to some propositions he had made to him respecting his restoration to the throne of Cabul. General Ventura is to be sent in the cold season at the head of the forces to Shikarpore. The General, it is said, had put 150 men, who killed their commander, to the sword.

Maharajah Runjeet Sing recently experienced a paralytic attack which rendered him speechless for two whole days. He applied for a British medical officer, and one has been sent from Kurnaul. Considerable excitement has prevailed among the principal Sikhs ever since the attack, who contemplate the early demise of their chief, and from his age and constitution, impaired by every sensual excess, the event cannot be far distant.

OUDH.—The amorous king, it is said, has set his heart on marrying the sister of his late favourite concubine, whom in a fit of anger he had put to death ; and in spite of the lady's refusing the honor intended her, is determined to force her to comply with his wishes, for which purpose he has already separated her from her husband.

BHURTPORE.—The agricultural accounts promise a very unproductive khureef crop. The crops in the low lands had been destroyed by the heavy rains, and the seasons has been very uncongenial to those which had escaped the water. Numbers of people have therefore deserted their cultivation and taken to robbing for their subsistence.

PESHAWUR.—It is stated that as soon as the Affaghans were apprised of the Maha Rajah's return to Lahore, the leader of a faction named Russool Khan, Patan, attacked Ram Sing, the Killadar of the village called Nepra Kalla, who being overpowered, was slain with all his adherents. Maud Khan, Jageerdar, who had long been jealous of the power of Russool Khan, Patan, surprised the latter with all his troops in the said fortress; upon which an encounter ensued between the parties, in which Maud Khan succeeded in wresting the killa from the first usurper who was compelled to have recourse to flight. A party of sepoys, about 150 men, belonging to a regiment of the Seikh Chieftain, while proceeding from a village to Peshawur for the purpose of receiving their pay, were attacked by a body of Patans who cut them all to pieces. The Nazir of the Province, on receiving intelligence of this catastrophe, dispatched his troops in all directions to trace out the murderers, if possible, but they have been unable to find them out.

NEPAUL.—The Rajah and his ministers are extending their protection to the encouragement of arts and manufactures. A body of Cashmerians, who were driven from their country by the tyranny of Bysuklal Sing and Cóur Shere Sing, have arrived at Katmandoo, found protection from the Rajah, and are going on successfully with the manufacture of shawls, the wool for which is brought from Tibet.

THE EX-RAJAH OF COORG.—It is stated in the Carnatic Chronicle, that the ex-Rajah of Coorg, after accomplishing the assassination of the greater part of his escort, had effected his escape and taken refuge in some unknown retreat.

BENGAL, &c.

HANSI.—The troops at Hansi are said to be suffering severely from fever. The station continues so very unhealthy, that it has been found necessary to encamp the troops in tents at some distance from the station. Colonel Skinner has been very dangerously ill.

MR. VIGNE, the traveller, reached the vale of Cashmere on the 2d August. He speaks in raptures of the scenery, and the great beauty of the women, whose teeth he compares to rows of mother-of-pearl. He intends to proceed on to Ludak.

MEERUT.—A heavy fall of rain on the night of the 12th August, completely flooded the cantonments and surrounding country, destroying verandahs and out-offices, and giving an appearance of desolation to the whole scene.

COTTON AND SALT.—One-third of the cotton crop in Agra is said to be destroyed by the incessant rain, but the Tonk and Jeypore cotton remains uninjured yet. The produce of the Balamba salt this season has fallen of nearly one-half in consequence of the early and heavy rains, and prices have risen from 1-8 to 3 Rs.

ALLAHABAD.—A leper establishment is about to be established in Allahabad.

Three prisoners effected their escape from the jail, and proceeded as far as Mow Serayha, when they were captured by the zemindar and sent back to the magistrate.

An interesting case of crim. con. is pending in the court at this station. The parties are a Mr. Beatson, an apothecary, and a Mr. Grant, a clerk.

A change of editorship has taken place in the Central Free Press, and that paper, at the suggestion of the new editor, is to be increased in size, the typographical errors are to be carefully avoided, and, should the subscription be so far increased as to warrant it, a bi-weekly edition of the journal will be issued.

MR. FRASER'S MURDERERS.—Kurreem Khan was hanged on the 26th August, on the spot where he shot Mr. Fraser. Three companies of infantry, a hundred sowars belonging to Nawab Fyz Mahomed Khan, and a vast concourse of the native and European population were present on the occasion. Kurreem Khan behaved with great intrepidity and firmness to the last, and died without a groan. The Mahometans have canonized the miscreant, and thousands daily resort to his tomb to offer up their prayers. The proceedings of the Nawab's trial have been translated and forwarded to the Supreme Government, and there can be no doubt he will be doomed to a similar fate as Kurreem Khan.

CAPTAIN N. CAMPBELL, it is said, has appealed to the Court of Directors against the order of his removal from the mounted branch of the artillery.

THE REV. FATHER ANTHONY.—The death of the Reverend Father Anthony, one of the missionaries of the "De Propaganda Fide" Society, is announced in the Agra Ukhbar of the 29th August.

MR. ROBISON.—The Deputy Post Master of Benares, the veteran Gervaise Robison, has gone the way of all flesh, after a residence in India of about 50 years. Mr. J. Palmer and he were middies and chums together on board of a man-of-war, and it will be with deep regret that the former will hear of his friend's demise. The duties of the department have been confided to Captain W. Murray of the 22nd Regt. N. I., which cancels his former appointment of assistant to the Commissioner in the Saugor and Nerbudda Territories.

AGRA.—A subscription list is in circulation in the station, for the relief of the Cape sufferers.

The crops, in consequence of the excessive rains in the begining of the seasons, are somewhat backward, but a good joar and bajera crop is still expected; the cotton, however, is not expected to yield more than two-thirds of the quantity produced last year.

Among the on dits circulated in the station are those of Brigadier Cartwright's removal to Kurnaul, and the station being elevated into a separate division of which Brigadier-General Duncan is to assume the command.

A meeting of the friends of a Free Press, was held on the 8th September, by permission of Brigadier Cartwright, at the house of Dr. Woodburn; at which it was resolved that the legal emancipation of the Indian Press should be celebarated by a dinner at the station. It was also proposed to open a subscription list in aid of the Metcalfe Public Library in Calcutta, a sufficient sum being reserved for a tablet with an inscription of Sir Charles Metcalfe's celebrated reply, to be placed in the Agra station rooms; but it was negatived by a majority of voices, on the ground that should any attempt be hereafter made to associate the name of Metcalfe with the emancipation of the India Press, by the erection of a monument in the Upper-Provinces, the supporters of the present meeting would be unable to join such a measure.

MOORSHEDABAD.—On the 9th August, eleven convicts sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the Allepore Jail, and a twelfth on his way from Patna to Midnapore, rose on their guard, consisting of a duffadar, and fifteen hired burkundauzes, mastered them, and made off with the boat.

SHUMSOODEEN.—It is said that Shumsoodeen on being made acquainted with the execution of Kurreem Khan, was greatly affected and knocked his forehead so very violently against the wall of his prison, so as to inflict a considerable wound; and that orders have been issued to adopt measures to prevent his committing suicide. It is also stated that the daily allowance of the Nawab from the Government Treasury, has been decreased from five hundred to five rupees.

FUTTEHGURH.—A skirmish took place on the 12th September, between the regiment of this station and the disaffected troops of the Baie from Gwalior who were located outside the cantonments. Twelve or fourteen lives were lost in the conflict on the side of the Baie's people and a few sepoys were slightly hurt. The malcontents amounted to about four hundred, the greater number of whom fled on being charged by the sepoys; they have dispersed themselves over the country, and it is expected will be committing many outrages amongst the surrounding villages. Mr. Swetenham, the Co[illegible] sioner, with the Assistant-Magistrate, Mr. Robinson, accompanied the sepoys and remonstrated, but ineffectually, with the Baie's followers. Mr. Robinson had a narrow escape of his life by falling into a well, and he received besides a slight wound from a sword or spear.

NEEMUTCH.—The rain has lately been incessant in this station, and sickness has prevailed among the sepoys to a considerable extent. The 28th regiment had, when the last accounts were written, upwards of 60 men in the hospital.

MHOW.—Ensign Beck and Lieut. Harwood of the 68th, while on a visit to the waterfalls, fell into one of them; Lieut. Harwood, with considerable difficulty and after being every much bruised, succeeded in extricating himself, but Ensign Beck was never seen again.

ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—Two young Ensigns proceeding up the country, had a narrow escape of their lives. Near Ghazepore, their budgerow upset when going on with a steady breeze on the quarter. One of the officers being outside, swam and was saved by the manjee, who laid hold of him by the arm just as he was sinking. The other officer was inside the boat, and has no knowledge how he was saved, having been for a long time under water. Both officers reached Benares in safety on the 8th Sept., but they have lost all their property.

A boat laden with chests from the Insurance office of Messrs. Holmes and Co of Calcutta, on its way to Meerut, was wrecked between Kharahabad and Shojahpore, and the whole of the property lost. The crew and passengers were all saved. Some chests were subsequently picked up and have been conveyed to the Moorutgunge thanah.

MADRAS.

THE BREAKWATER.—By the Frederica, which reached Madras on the 18th August, a detachment of Sappers and Miners, under the command of Lieut. Armstrong, destined to work at the Breakwater, arrived, and another detachment was hourly expected on the Catherine. The Committee have since been successful in realizing many additional subscriptions.

MILITARY ITEMS.—An affair of honor recently took place at Bangalore between a Lieut. of the 27th N. I., and an Ensign doing duty with the 4th N. I. The Ensign received his adversary's fire in his head, and died a few days afterwards. The surviving principal, and the seconds in the affary, have been arrested, and at the date of the dispatch of the intelligence, a Court of Enquiry was sitting on the melancholy event, which appears to have sprung out of violent and contumelious expressions used by the deceased officer.

Lieut. Wakeman, it is also asserted, has been dismissed the service.

It is reported that Lieutenant F. O'Callaghan, Military Secretary to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, is seriously ill at Ootacamund, and apprehensions are entertained for his safety.

LORD WILLIAM BENTINCK.—Mr. Norton, the chairman of the meeting which voted a testimonial to Lord William Bentinck, has received an answer from his Lordship, returning his warmest acknowledgments for the testimonial. His Lordship in his reply touches on the new charter and the press in this country, and developes his views of the true policy of the future government of India,—which reflect alike honor on his understanding and feelings.

THE MADRAS LITERARY GAZETTE has ceased to exist for want of sufficient support.

THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY are carrying on their proceedings vigorously. There are already eighty-one subscribers. A sum of 400 Rs has been set aside to procure useful seeds from England, and a piece of ground has been selected promising every essential for a garden; and on that spot the Government have sanctioned the experiments in boring for water to be made, the result of which will finally decide the Society on taking the ground.

MURDER.—A boy about thirteen years of age, the son of the Subadar-Major of the 31st L. I, was murdered at Gooty on the 21st August, while tending some bullocks. It is supposed the assassin was tempted to the commission of the horrid deed by a few silver bangles the boy had on his person. The body of the unfortunate victim was brought in the next day, the hands and head severed from the trunk.

THE SURF.—The surf for some time past has been very violent, so much so as to retard in a great measure the intercourse with the shipping. On the 28th August it rolled with such fury that a mussullah boat, in which was the steward of H. M.'s ship Wolf, was crushed to pieces in its waves. The steward and the boat's crew, except the tindal who was drowned, reached the shore by swimming.

NELLORE COPPER ORE.—The celebrated Chemist Thomson, has reported from 48 to 51 per cent. of pure copper in the specimens of ore sent to him from the Nellore mines, which agrees with Mr. Kerr's statement of the result of an actual smelting of ores by the Company, and is more than the proportion contained in pure carbonate of copper. The percentage out-turn at the Calcutta Mint of an assay of pure ore from the mines is as follows:—

|---|---|
| 16.7 | Carbonic acid. |
| 60.7 | Oxide of copper, yielding 48.2 of copper. |
| 22.6 | Impurity. |
| 100. | |

ROBBERY.—The Mint has been robbed of a bar of gold weighing about sixty or seventy ounces, belonging to a native. The thief has not been detected, but the case is being investigated by the Police, and it is expected that he will not long be able to elude the vigilance of its officers.

SHIPWRECK.—On the night of the 5th Sept., the brig Stree Ingadeswera Swamy was wrecked about eight miles to the northward of Bimlipatam. All on board perished except one lascar, who after being two days in the water on a plank got on shore near Bimlipatam. There were forty-two persons on board the brig, including Ensign C. J. Hoseason, of the 50th M. N. I.

CUTTACK.—Accounts from Cuttack state that all the country had been flooded, and that if the water had risen two feet more a most calamitous inundation would have followed. The waters, however, were fast subsiding.

OUTRAGE ON THE BRITISH FLAG.—The ship Boulton, Captain William Compton, on leaving Madeira on the 3d June, duly authorized by the Portuguese authorities, had two-shotted guns fired at her from the Leo battery, without the least provocation being given. The ship was immediately hove too, and the chief officer dispatched in a boat to ascertain the reason of the outrage, but he was not allowed to land and therefore came back to the ship. Several other shots were then fired, one of which, a nine-pounder, went through the jib and passed over the poop. The land breeze preventing the possibility of the vessel returning to the anchorage, and it not being strong enough to enable her to get out of the reach of the guns, a second boat was dispatched with the third officer, who understanding French asked the people on shore in that language the cause of the firing, when they told him it was all a mistake and they hoped nobody on board was hurt.

BOMBAY.

SOCOTRA.—The Island of Socotra is to be abandoned. Tenders for a vessel to bring away the troops and stores now there, have been advertized for.

The William Ritchie arrived at Bombay from Socotra, on the 21st August, with the remainder of the first detachment sent to the island. Since the last accounts, the mortality amongst this small body appears to have been much less than at first, though another officer—Dr. Jardine—has fallen a sacrifice to the epedimic from which they have throughout more or less suffered. The opinion now seems to be that the neighbourhood of Tamarida Bay, where the detachment at first encamped, will always be extremely unhealthy, as it is throughout the monsoon a complete swam. The high lands in the interior, however, are regarded more favorably than at first; and to them Captain Corsellis has marched his men, so that there is reason to hope they will remain tolerably healthy during the short time they are likely to be on the island.

THE HUGH LINDSAY is to start from Bombay for Suez, for the overland mails, on the 10th of November and the 1st of February.

THE WEATHER.—The anxiety under which the inhabitants labored on account of their crops, in consequence of the unusually severe drought, has been greatly alleviated by the fall of plentiful showers of rain, which promise to continue, and the drooping and nearly parched up cultivation is again looking up.

THE CROPS.—All fears entertained on account of the crops have been dispelled by the fall of plentiful showers of rain, which have filled the wells and principal reservoirs and enabled the cultivators to proceed with the transplanting of their crops.

ASSAM.

DISTURBANCES IN SUDDYAH.—Intelligence of a melancholy nature has just been received from the disturbed districts near Suddyah in Assam. Lieut. Charlton, accompanied by Mr. Bruce, and his detachment of lascars, having succeeded in getting one of the guns belonging to the boats attached to that post, with great difficulty, dragged up to a stockade in advance of Beesa, where the rebel Gaums had taken up a position, opened a fire of grape upon the adverse force, and gallantly drove them out of the stockade; but trusting too much to the fear which the defeat had caused, Lieutenant C. boldly pursued the enemy at a pace with which the gun could not keep up, forced them into another stockade which he immediately stormed and carried, but received in the attack a severe blow on the leg, by which the large bone was fractured, and he was necessitated to proceed for medical advice to Bishnauth, where he now remains. The sepoys behaved with the utmost gallantry though opposed to a force six times their own in numerical strength. Five or six men were severely wounded.

The province has been more than unusually unhealthy this year, scarcely any one having escaped fever who has been at all exposed, and by no means holds out much encouragement to others to enter it.

SUMATRA.

Advices from Bencoolen to the end of June give a very gloomy account of the state of that settlement, even as to its security. It had been found expedient to send out a detachment of 100 men to Maossee to erect a mud fort under the direction of the Resident and Commandant, a small detachment having just previously been cut off and destroyed,—cash to the amount of 1,000 rupees, and all their effects, falling into the hands of the assailants, who were represented as a very numerous body.

The affairs of the Dutch in Sumatra, indeed, begin generally to assume a very desponding aspect, and factions, it is said, are forming even in some parts of Java, with a view to throw off their yoke. The troops sent against the Bonjál people were replused when within pistol shot of the town and forced to make a precipitate retreat after having eight officers killed, ten wounded and a great number of men slain. In Bencoolen things appear to be in worse state than at Bonjál: the Resident and the Commander of the forces, with one hundred men, had been decoyed into the interior, and were completely beleaguered in a mud fort which they had been obliged to erect to protect themselves, and their assailants had sworn to decapitate them all. A reinforcement of fifty men (!!) had been sent by the Dutch authorities to coerce the Bencoolenites, who have vowed never to submit to their cruel rule. The whole west coast of Sumatra, indeed, is said to be in a state of insurrection, and an attack was meditated on the settlement of Bencoolen itself,—and if the Resident failed in maintaining the mud fort, considerable loss of life and property is inevitable.

JAVA.

SEIZURE OF COPPER COIN.—Intelligence has been received that the Dutch Government at Batavia have made an extensive seizure of copper coin, which it would appear was intended for Singapore,—and that the books and papers belonging to some gentlemen of the English establishments at Batavia, had been sealed and carried off, by order of the authorities, for examination. The coin was brought out in the Hero, and the information of its being on board, was given to the Custom House at Batavia by the Netherlands Council at Liverpool. The importation of copper coin to Batavia, not of Netherlands coinage, is not only strictly prohibited but punishable by death.

BURMAH.

SHIPWRECK.—A letter from Arracan, dated 18th Aug., mentions that there is strong reason to suppose that a vessel had been wrecked on the coast, as masts, bulwarks, &c. have been washed ashore on the beach, and report has been made to the Assistant-Commissioner by the head man of a village a day's journey from Sandoway, that a vessel had been seen a week previously off the coast in a storm. No further intelligence, however, has yet been received here.

PERSIA.

A letter from Tehran, dated 1st July, 1835, contains the following:—

"The old King's death was a glorious thing for us, and has made our fortunes. I am delighted with the service, and the young King's kindness to us all has been very great. For the taking of Teheran he gave us all our pay, which was many months in arrears, shawls, and the second class order of the Lion and Sun, and has written a very gratifying letter to the King of England, requesting His Majesty, for our services to the state, &c. &c., to grant us his permission to wear it. All the officers are employed. I am drilling some Lancers for the King; they are all dressed and properly equipped and look for Persians very well. I am well lodged and taken care of, and have every reason to be well pleased.

"The march from Tabreez to Teheran was cold work, and we suffered much from rain and afterwards from snow; however, we had the honor and satisfaction of keeping out the Russians. The plague had broken out in Tabreez and the Russian ambassador has discharged all his servants and put himself in quarantine—it is travelling downwards. We expect, I regret to say, soon to lose Sir John Campbell who retires, being relieved by a King's embassy; his loss will be severely felt by us all. Sir Henry Ellis, the new Ambassador, has the following staff:—McNeil, first secretary; Mr. Sheridan, private secretary; Captain Stoddard, military secretary; Dr. Bell, surgeon:—it is to be a very flash affair—a King's Mission—John Company have nothing to do with it. Sir John is at present at Teheran, and will not leave until he hears of the new Ambassador's approach.

"The old Quaim-Makam and his son the Vizier have been seized by the King and will be put to death.

"Captain McDonald has gone home with dispatches, the rest of us are all well and much the same as when you left us."

CHINA.

OPIUM AND COTTON.—The prices of opium on the 24th July, were 650 drs. per chest for Patna, and 605 for Benares. Some parcels of good Bengal cotton had been sold at 13½ to 14 tales, a brisk demand being created by the report of a scanty supply from Bombay. The stock of opium at Lintin on the 1st July was reduced to 174 chests Patna, 93 Benares and 477 Malwa; the deliveries in June having been 133 Patna, 64 Benares and 540 Malwa, besides 43 chests damaged from the Hercules. The subsequent deliveries to the 15th July were Patna 234, Benares 76, Malwa 680, and damaged 52.

PROVINCIAL CITY.—A document from the Keun-ke, or Privy Council, has arrived from Pecking, stating that the petition of the foreign merchants at Fuh-keen, to have the harbours and rivers of that province opened to trade, had been unsuccessful.

Lee the acting treasurer, has been appointed Judge in Shense province.

On the 9th July a proclamation was issued by the Nan-hae-heen to the people to keep the streets and water courses clean, and threatening them with the utmost rigor of the law if they neglected to obey.

The plundering of the Troughton and the attack on her crew, which took place 100 miles from the Ladrone, have created a great emotion among the British residents in China. The thieves are fishermen, who must be partially known, and if the Chinese authorities are strongly urged on the subject they cannot escape being taken. The amount of the cargo plundered is said to be £13,000.

REVIEW OF THE CALCUTTA MARKET.

(From A. E. Kuhn's Monthly Price Current, September 25, 1835.)

THE APPROACH of the great Hindoo Holidays (Doorgah Poojah) has not led to that active business in British Manufactures which might have been expected. The holders of Twist and Cotton Piece Goods, encouraged by the favourable advices from home, have been firm, while the native purchasers, although eager to buy, have only offered very moderate prices. There have been also many days of stormy weather, by which the transactions among the natives have been much impeded. On the other hand the scarcity of tonnage and consequent high rates of freights have opposed obstacles to the shipments of produce, and the notification of the Honorable Company of an enhanced rate of exchange on advances made on produce for England, (formerly 2*s.* 1*d.* per rupee, now 2*s.* 2*d.*) have contributed to diminish the number of transactions under this head, so that our Review of the Market will be necessarily much curtailed, and present but little matter of general interest.

INDIGO.—The continued violence of the rains has naturally prevented any improvement in our prospects, although from the advanced state of the manufacture, no serious diminution of quantity need be anticipated. In Jessore, and particularly in Tirhoot, the early estimates have been much reduced, but from Kishnaghur, Dacca, and other eastern parts, the supplies will be most abundant. The general opinion seems to fix upon 115,000 maunds as the nearest approximation to the present crop. We hear of a parcel of 96 chests Dacca Indigo (of last year's produce) sold at rupees 135, and it is said that rupees 150 per maund has been refused for the entire produce (700 maunds) of one of the Kishnaghur factories. Our present quotations apply to the transactions of June last, nothing of any extent having transpired since then, they may be therefore considered as nominal. The first sale of the new season will be hereafter described by us in due course.

OPIUM.—There has been considerable demand for the drug during nearly the whole of the month, arising from the encouraging advices from China, and Patna advanced steady from ~~Rs~~ 1165 to ~~Rs~~ 1225, and Benares from ~~Rs~~ 1050 to ~~Rs~~ 1100, but latterly the market has again declined upon the general belief in a large crop, and which is variously estimated up to chests 14,500. The accounts from Bombay describing an abundant fall of rain have also contributed to dissipate the fears previously entertained of a diminished produce.

SILK.—In addition to the explanation given in our last number, respecting the effects of unfavourable weather and the diminution of cultivation generally; we may now add, that the accounts from the silk districts lately received are so bad, as to amount almost to an announcement of total failure.

SILK PIECE GOODS.—The demand is active, but the total absence of stock confines the business doing almost entirely to orders given to the manufacturers.

COTTON.—The regular season for shipment to China having arrived at its term, our sales have been limited during the month, but within these few days a speculative demand has sprung up among the natives for Cutchora, (intended for shipment to China,) and prices have risen to ~~Rs~~ 13-12, and 14 per maund. The Cotton crop on the Bombay side is now fully ascertained to have failed considerably.

SALTPETRE.—The scarcity of available tonnage naturally renders this article very dull. Prices are nevertheless welly supported.

SUGAR.—We have nothing to offer beyond the daily transactions.

LAC DYE.—We have already observed in one of our late numbers that the genuine DT mark, has been contracted for by one house in Calcutta, at Sa. ~~Rs~~ 80. The better sorts of native marks continue scarce and the prices may be considered fully supported.

SHELL LAC.—Is very little enquired after, and our market offers at present a wide choice.

RICE has again fallen. The discouraging accounts from Europe, the scarcity of freights and the anticipated large crop have all induced this result. Ballam Rice has been sold in the bazar even under rupee a maund.

WHEAT.—A few sales have occurred during the month.

HIDES AND HORNS.—The transactions limited, and prices have experienced no change.

HEMP AND JUTE.—No sales have come to our notice.

LINSEED.—There is but very little good in the bazar, and prices are steady.

SPICES, DRUGS, &c.—Mace, Nutmegs and Cloves continue in demand; Alum is enquired after at quotation; Ginger steady at present prices but sales restrained by the high rates of freight; Coffee nothing doing.

METALS.—Tile Copper has advanced to Rs. 33, consequent upon short importation and the firmness of holders. Sheathing has likewise improved although not in the same proportion, 16 32 oz rupee 34-12 a 35. Peruvian Copper has gone up to Sa. ~~Rs~~ 29 8 (Sicca Rupees) for best quality. Spelter has risen to Current Rupees 7-15 a 8. The stock is much reduced. In Iron we have not the least alteration to notice. Lead, market steady.

TWIST.—The Stock of white is so much reduced from the almost cessation of Imports, that the business has been confined to sales to a very limited extent. In dyed yarn the demand is languid, except for Turkey red. Orange having been immoderately supplied, the market is particularly overstocked and prices are likely not to be maintained. In the other colours as pink, green &c. but little doing.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—Although many sales have been made, the total amount sold is very insignificant, for this season of the year. There has been a remarkable reduction of Imports, it is therefore probable that in a few days after the holidays, prices may shew a further improvement.

WOOLLENS.—Remarkably dull, with the exception of a few bales of Town and Pelisse Cloths selling occasionally in very small parcels, our market is quite inactive. In three or four weeks after the holidays, the customary seasonal demand for low woollens will doubtless arise. Purpets are in demand, but the prices offering shew but little advantage to the importers. Low Flannels difficult of sale and fine only to be disposed off in small quantities and at moderate prices.

BULLION.—Our sales of Syce Silver have been considerable to provide the means of investment in Opium.

MEETING AT THE EXCHANGE.

The Meeting held on Thursday morning the 8th October at the Exchange Rooms was not very fully attended, but there was as usual a good deal of animated discussion and a great deal of time wasted in that sort of bye play and desultory conversation which is so characteristic of all meetings here. Mr. Cockerell was unanimously called to the Chair, and after he had read the requisition opened the business of the Meeting.

Mr. ARBUTHNOT moved the first Resolution, introducing the subject by observing that the date fixed for the departure of the Hugh Lindsay, on her two voyages from Bombay, would not afford a sufficient interval for reply with reference to the general convenience. He then read the following resolution :—

Resolved,—That the proposed dates for the departure of the H. C.'s Steamer Hugh Lindsay from Bombay, for the purpose of conveying the Mails to and from Suez, precludes all possibility of the Merchants of Calcutta and others interested in the interchange of Letters with England replying on the second to Letters brought by her first voyage, and if carried into effect will destory much of the benefits otherwise derivable from the projected voyage of the Hugh Lindsay to this side of India, the Commercial Interests of which, amounting to about four crores of rupees annually, we are led to believe, are of some importance to the Government of British India.

Mr. EARLE seconded this resolution which was carried nem. con.

The 2d resolution proposed by Mr. John Allan, seconded by Mr. A. Rogers and carried nem. con. was as follows :—

Resolved,—That it appears to this Meeting, that the dates can be changed so as to afford every probability of time being allowed for such answers being sent from Calcutta and places adjacent, without the sacrifice of any important consideration connected with the dates as proposed from Bombay.

The third resolution moved by Mr. Bruce and seconded by Mr. John Lowe, was then put as follows :—

Resolved,—That a Memorial be presented to the Honourable the Governor-General of India in Council, expressive of the above sentiments, and praying, as there may be serious objections on the part of the Supreme Government to alter the date of the first departure, to the 2d November, and as such alteration would now be too late to admit of parties in Calcutta preparing their correspondence in time, that the first voyage may be postponed till December, and the second till March, viz, to the 3d December, and 11th of March.

Mr. TURTON opposed this resolution. If he had not been aware that a great many commercial persons did not agree in the view expressed in that resolution he would not have interfered. He thought that it was not right to seek to interfere with the period fixed for the first departure of the Steamer. We ought not to ask to have that date altered without considering how other interests than our own might be affected by the change. Others may have made arrangements with reference to the date fixed to whom there might not be time to communicate the alteration. Mr. Turton instanced the community of Ceylon. Would it be right to call for such an alteration when we could not to such parties give intimation in due time ? He thought not. He did not perceive any serious objection to the period fixed for the first departure, the 10th November. He had not heard any reason why that was an unfavourable time, but that neither for us nor others was there time to reply in the interval between that date and the 1st February. Mr. Turton then adverted to some calculations which had been shewn to him by Mr. Adams, derived from the Malta Gazettes, which shewed that if the second departure were fixed for the 15th Feb., there would be ample time for our mails to reach the Malta packet, which did not leave Malta before the 5th April, allowing the minimum of 14 days between the date of her arrival at that island and her departure from it again for England. This arrangement would suit the general interests, and he thought we ought not to represent our own particular little grievance. He was sorry therefore to disagree for once with his friend, (Mr. Greenlaw) who was so anxious a listener; but if he did not exactly assent to his views, he at least studied the general interests. He should not then propose any amendment, though he would do that if it should be necessary, but in the mean time he rather threw out what he had said for the general consideration of the Meeting.

Mr. Adam being called up, read his notes to the Meeting to the following effect :—"That the average steam passage from Falmouth to Malta, from Januray to May last inclusive, was 16 days, and from Malta to Falmouth 18 days—that the mails are generally made up in London on the first Tuesday of every month, and the Steamer leaves Falmouth within three days afterwards,—that in the above months none of the packets were detained beyond the 8th of the month, and the dates of departure from Malta for England were the 2d and 31st of January, 12th of March, 10th of April (date in May unknown), and 9th of June ; the shortest interval between the arrival of the packets from and their departure for England being 14 days and the maximum 20 days—that the Blazer arrived on the 4th of June, in 5 days from Alexandria—the Confiance on the 7th, from Corfu the 4th and Zante the 5th of June—and the Firefly left for England on the 9th. So that, the Hugh Lindsay's mails, dispatched from Bombay on the 10th of November, and reaching Suez about the 10th December, and Alexanderia on the 16th, might be at Malta by the 21st, and leave for England on the 4th of January, (allowing 14 days as the minimum interval as above) being 55 days after starting from Bombay ; and taking the above maximum of 20 days interval, they would start for England on the 10th of January, still giving sufficient time for us to get answers by the Falmouth steamer of February. Whereas, if the Bombay steamer started on the 2d of December, her mails would not go forward from Malta till about the 8th of February (mean date) after an interval of 68 days, and might possibly be detained till the 14th. Again, starting on the 15th of February, which would allow her a month at Bombay after her return under the arrangement now published, the mails would reach Malta about the 28th of March, seven days before the earliest date for the dispatch of the Malta packet for England.

Mr. GREENLAW observed that if these statements were taken to be correct, then of course there could be no doubt that the 15th of February would be the best date for the second starting of the Steamer ; but that depended on whether these statements derived from the Malta Gazettes could be relied on. It was for the Meeting to decide whether thoy would rely on data derived from that source or on the official correspondence of the Board of Controul and the Court of Directors. Mr. Grant's letter stated that the Alexandria Steamer would leave Malta on the 20th of the month and remain at Alexandria until the 15th of the succeeding month under any circumstances, even if the India mail arrived at Alexandria the day after the Steamer reached that place, but if not, then she remained until the 20th when she must start in order to reach the Malta mail. By any arrangement there must be delay one way or the other in connection with the Malta mail, and he proposed an arrangement for dividing that delay. Mr. Turton said that he had heard no good reason (Mr. Turton here observed no ! I said no reason—no reason whatever.") Mr. Greenlaw then explained that the reason for altering the first date of departure was to secure full time for a reply, a certainty of an interval of ninety days between the two periods of sailing, and that was his reason. Mr. Greenlaw went into some further explanation, which we did not clearly hear.

MR. TURTON. As there was some difference of opinion as to the first date of departure, he would confine his amendment to this :—

"That the arrangement for the Steamer's departure on the 10th November, having been now made and generally communicated to all parts of India, it is inexpedient to request any alteration as to the period of that departure.

He begged to observe that Mr. Greenlaw had admitted that if the actual dates of departure of the vessels are to be preferred to those fixed in the official correspondence, then the 15th February was a better date for the second departure. If there was any doubt on that point, he did not think it would be too much to ask that a request should be forwarded home by the Hugh Lindsay on her first voyage, to solicit that in order to give India time to receive replies from England to the packets forwarded by that occasion the departure thence of the steamer for Malta should be delayed five days. Thus we should meet the general convenience and shew that we did not study the mere interest of Bengal—let us but shew that we were desirous of giving up something and others would be ready to concede to us—they would follow our example—let us shew that we did not forget that if there were four crores of rupees in trade here, there were some few crores elsewhere (Mr. Greenlaw here observed "only one crore and a half," referring we believe to Bombay.) He would urge them not to seem determined, on having it all their own way—that they would concede nothing. He would have them recollect that every hour's delay might be of importance to those at Bombay who had made their arrangements. They might be assured that if at Bombay they had deemed the 2d of December suited to their interest, they would have fixed on that day.

Mr. Greenlaw would oppose that amendment. Mr. Turton admitted that the 15th February may be too late unless a communication be made to the home Government to delay the departure of the Malta packet from England a few days: but he, Mr. T., had forgotten that the arrangement of the Alexandria packet was not made with reference to our convenience but to that of the Malta mail, and did he, Mr. T. fancy that the Government at home would disturb existing arrangements affecting the whole Mediterranean to suit our convenience. So far from it they look on the Indian branch of the communication as quite a paltry affair—and he was quite certain they would not alter the date of sailing of the Malta packets for us. The Government would act on the communication of their co-ordinate authorities. He did not speak with reference to the mere convenience of the community; but considered the question one of great importance.

Mr. Arbuthnot objected to the separation of the questions of the two periods of departure which Mr. Turton had contrived with his usual tact, to make in his amendment.

Mr. Turton explained.

The 4th Resolution was then moved by Mr. Willis and seconded by Mr. Cowie.

Resolved,—Moreover, that independent of the above consideration, the last named dates are greatly preferable for the Commercial interests *of every part of India and especially those of Bengal, without being of any inconvenience that we are aware of to the other Presidencies, in as much as the despatches sent at an early date in December, will convey commercial information of infinitely greater importance from the progress then made in the most busy season, than could possibly be the case at an early date in November, at which period the busy season is but in its commencement; and also in as much as an early date in March, will serve best to convey the accounts in conclusion of all the operations and engagements of the greatest importance, which by that period will have been completed or accomplished.

Mr. Turton called on the Meeting before they carried this resolution to explain how the 10th of March was peculiarly suited to the interests of Bombay. They had there, with a full knowledge of what their interests required, fixed the dates of departure, and he persumed that they knew as well what comported with their interests although these might involve only a crore and a half of rupees, as those did who had four crores at stake. He implored the Meeting if they did not concede at least not to insult them (the Bombay community) by telling them that we knew their business better than they did themselves—he would propose therefore to omit from the Resolution the words "of every part of India and especially those," &c.

Mr. Greenlaw would oppose that amendment. He thought that the merchants here understood much better the mercantile interests of Madras and Bombay than Mr. Turton. He objected particularly to the amendment because it would justly subject us to that very imputaion of selfishness Mr. Turton had condemned by making it appear that we looked only at our own interests not merely in utter disregard, but in opposition to those of others.

Mr. Willis explained—Mr. Turton might possibly better understand the affairs of Madras and Bombay than they (the merchants of Calcutta) did, but they were in daily communication with both Presidencies—were continually receiving or making remittances to Bombay in particular, that they went so completely hand in hand that it was almost impossible in fixing on the 15th March as conducive to their interests that they should not embrace those of Madras and Bombay. These presidencies were so intimately connected indeed that the interests of the one was the interest of the other.

Mr. Cockerell, the Chairman, had an amendment to propose which would probably meet Mr. Turton's wishes—(it was Mr. Arbuthnot's) it was that instead of the words objected to by Mr. Turton, there should be inserted the following, "which is of some consideration to this, without any inconvenience to the other Presidencies."

Mr. G. A. Princep explained that if he were at Bombay, and there were to be only two communications he should be most desirous that the last should be fixed at the close of the fine season.

Captain Taylor (Madras service) asked what Mr. Prinsep called the close of the fine season.

Mr. G A. Prinsep. The change of the monsoon.

Captain Taylor and Mr. Prinsep explained.

Mr. Turton remarked on the observation of Mr. Willis. That gentleman's firm they were informed were in daily communication with Madras and Bombay, would they say then, which of their correspondents ever suggested that the time fixed for the departure of the Steamer was inconvenient? No, they admit that they did not—they did not refer to that; but their silence it seemed was assumed to imply that they thought the arrangement inconvenient. Mr. Greenlaw had objected to the amendment because it imputed to the Meeting, that they selfishly sought their own interests—but he, Mr. T., would maintain that they were seeking their own interests alone. It was proposed by Mr. Arbuthnot to modify the amendment by substituting the words "not inconvenient to the other Presidencies." He could not assent to that alteration. Those who did not agree to the amendment were pledging themselves to much more than their own interests—for a man's interest was his best guide. Reference had been made to Mr. G. A. Prinsep as an old merchant of Bombay. Did they suppose he, Mr. T., would trust an old soldier in military matters? No, he should suspect him of having too much of the esprit du corps.* He never recollected him, Mr. G. A. P., so very anxious about the interests of Bombay. Something had been thrown out about the interests of passengers. There was not a single member of the Steam Committee who did not deem it important to have a conveyance for passengers, except indeed Mr. Greenlaw, who was for poking them among the coals—while the period now fixed on, was not convenient except to the most adventurous. They would assuredly be accused for such an arrangement of studying their own interests.

Mr. Greenlaw regretted most deeply that Mr. Turton who saw that Resolution before he came to the Meeting, should be opposed to him, because he felt the full force of having him for a co-adjutor. He considered that the Requisitionists were bound to know what they came to support—to come prepared to support some resolution. He could say that he had made a point of seeing every Requisitionist before he came there. Mr. Turton said that he had no interest in the matter, but that he had expressed the opinions of the merchants, yet he would not take the advice of Mr. G. A. Prinsep, who was a merchant, because he would not take the advice of an old soldier in military matters (Mr. Turton—I did not say a merchant, I said an old merchant). Well, but he would not listen to his opinion.

After some further conversation, the Chairman read Mr. Turton's amendment which was put, and carried by a small majority.

Amendment.—That the words "of every part of India and especially those," be omitted.

Another amendment was then moved by the proposers of the original resolution which substituted for the omitted words those of Mr. Arbuthnot. This amendment was carried and the resolution then stood thus—the words substituted for those omitted, being marked in italics:—

* We mark these words in italics, as they were afterwards omitted.—Reporter.

Resolved,—Moreover, that independent of the above consideration, the last named dates are greatly preferable for the Commercial Interests of Bengal, without being of any inconvenience that we are aware of to the other Presidencies, inasmuch as the despatches, sent at an early date in December, will convey commercial information of infinitely greater importance from the progress then made in the most busy season, than could possibly be the case at an early date in November, at which period the busy season is but in its commencement; and also inasmuch as an early date in March will serve best to convey the accounts in conclusion of all the operations and engagments of the greatest importance, which by that period will have been completed or accomplished.

Mr. Greenlaw then read the memorial founded on the resolutions.

MEMORIAL.

---

The Memorial of the undersigned Merchants, Traders, and other Inhabitants of Calcutta interested in the speedy interchange of Letters with England by means of the proposed Voyages of the Honorable Company's steamer Hugh Lindsay to Suez from Bombay.

To the Hon'ble Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe, Bart., Governor-General of India in Council.

Humbly Sheweth,—That your Memorialists perceive that the advertised days of departure of the Honorable Company's Steamer Hugh Lindsay will utterly preclude all possibility of their answering Letters received by her on her first voyage by her return on her second.

Your Memorialists need not point out to your Hon'ble Board the very great hardship to which such of them as are engaged in carrying on the important commercial transactions between Calcutta and Great Britain will be subject by being thus deprived of the opportunity of replying to their correspondents through the rapid medium which a due selection of dates of departure would readily afford. It is sufficient to say that independent of the private and domestic value of such an opportunity, commercial interests to the extent of above four crores of rupees annually are involved.

Your Memorialists would not thus intrude on your Hon'ble Board for the purpose of soliciting an alteration in the proposed dates of departure were they not satisfied that an alteration can be made without sacrificing any important consideration involved in the advertised dates; while among other advantages it will have the effect of allowing very nearly the whole of India time to reply to letters received on the first voyage.

Your Memorialists, refering to the dates of arrival at, and departure from, Malta, of the English steamer as communicated in the letter from the President of the Board of Control to the Hon'ble Court of Directors under date 26th August, 1834, concur in the principles on which the extreme dates of the month for the departures would appear to have been calculated at Bombay. On the one hand they consider that the 10th of a month of 30 days is well adapted for the speedy transmission to England of the mails by bringing them to Malta just prior to the date named as the departure of the Steamer for Falmouth, viz., the 24th of each month; and the 1st of a month of 28 days equally well fitted for preventing delay on the mail coming to India by bringing the Steamer to Suez at the period when the mails from England will just have arrived; but your Memorialists submit that these days of the month ought to have been substituted each for the other, viz. instead of the 10th November the 2d of that month should have been the date of the first departure and the 9th of February instead of the 1st of that month should have been the date of the second departure, which would have afforded an interval of 99 days between the dates of departure instead of 83.

Aware as your Memorialists are that there may be serious objections to your Hon'ble Board altering the date of the first departure to the 2nd November, which indeed would now be excessively inconvenient inasmuch as there would not be sufficient time to prepare letters for that date, your Memorialists therefore referring to the Letters of the President of the Board of Control above noticed, would suggest, that the dates of departure may be fixed for the 3rd December of March, each of which days has a relative respectively on the 1st February and 10th Nov. in regard to the principles on which those days we selected at Bombay.

Your Memorialists would further observe that the dates now sought to be fixed for the departure of the Hugh Lindsay are greatly to be preferred by the commercial correspondents of Bengal, without being of any inconvenience that your Memorialists are aware of to the other Presidencies, inasmuch as the despatches sent at an early date in December will convey commercial information of infinitely greater importance from the progress then made in the most busy season than could possibly be the case at an early date in November, at which period the busy season is but in its commencement; and also inasmuch as an early date in March will serve best to convey the accounts in conclusion of all the operations and engagements of the greatest importance which by that period will have been completed or accomplished. Your Memorialists therefore trust that under all the above circumstances their prayer will receive the concurrence of your Hon'ble Board, and that public intimation may be given thereof at the earliest possible period.

Your Memorialists deem it proper more particularly to state that the calculations on which they have concurred in the aptitude of the days of a month for departure, viz., about the 1st and 10th, as proposed from Bombay, have been made solely with reference to the dates of arrival, at, and departure from, Malta, of the Falmouth Packet as communicated in the letter of the Chairman of the Board of Control to the Hon'ble Court of Directors under date 26th August, 1834, above referred to, —which dates are said to be for the arrival from Falmouth about the 20th of a month, and for the departure to Falmouth on the 24th of each month. It appears however on reference to the Malta Gazettes that the Steamer has not up to June last left the Island for Falmouth on the above date, but from the 1st to the 10th of the month; and that the 24th is not the date of departure is further confirmed by a letter which has been received in Calcutta from the Commander of one of the Falmouth Packets to his brother dated 20th April last in which it is stated that "the Packets leave Falmouth on the 3d of each month, 17 days are allowed to Malta, the Packet for Alexandria to sail 24 hours after the arrival of the English Packet at Malta, the latter to remain at Malta for 17 days for the return mail from Alexandria." This would make the day of departure from Malta about the 7th of each month.

Should therefore your Hon'ble Board on this account, or any other, not deem it expedient to alter the dates of the departure as we have suggested above, we would earnestly solicit that the period of the 2d departure of the Hugh Lindsay may be delayed till the 15th day of February which would allow fifty one days for the packets to get to Malta from Bombay, and an interval of 97 days between the two departures affording time for a return of correspondence received on the first voyage.

Mr. Church moved, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie and carried nem. con.

Resolved,—That the Memorial now read be adopted, and that it be left for signature at the Exchange Rooms from 11 a. m. to 3 p. m., every day, Sunday excepted, until Tuesday morning next, and that on that day it be forwarded by the Chairman to the Secretary to Government in the General Department, with a letter, expressive of the desire of the Memorialists, that the Memorial may have the earnest and readiest attention of the Honorable the Governor-General of India in Council.

Mr. Church here produced and read the following extract of a letter received by Mr. James, from the Commander of the Tartarus :—

Tartarus, Malta, 20th April, 1835.

"The Packets leave Falmouth on the 3d of each month; 17 days are allowed to Malta. The Packet for Alexandria to sail 24 hours after the arrival of the English Packet at Malta, the letter to remain at Malta 17 days for the return Mail from Alexandria."

Mr. Turton then moved that—

Resolved,—That in the event of the Government not acquiescing in the request contained in the 3d Resolution, they will be pleased to direct the second departure from Bombay to be postponed until the 15th of February, and that this amendment be embodied in the Memorial.

which was seconded by Captain Taylor, (Madras Service) and carried.

After some further desultory conversation, thanks were voted to the chair, and the Meeting broke up.

THE VESTRY ELECTION MEETING.

A Meeting of the Parishioners of St. John's took place on the 12th October according to notice.

The Venerable Archdeacon took the chair ex officio and explained the business of the Meeting—they were assembled to elect four vestrymen and by a liberal interpretation of the order of Government he thought that all renters of pews should be entitled to vote. With regard to the gentlemen eligible to the office of vestrymen, it was not imperative that they should be members of the congregation—though perhaps the right ought to be limited to that body.

Mr. Longueville Clarke enquired what the duties of the vestrymen were.

The Venerable Archdeacon did not conceive that question to be relevant.

The Reverend Mr. Robertson observed that the duties were described in the orders of the Governor, and then proceeded to read them as they stand in the order of the 19th August.

Mr. Longueville Clarke wished to know by what authority the power of thus regulating the vestry was conferred on the Governor.

The Venerable Archdeacon did not think he was bound to answer that question.

Some further discussion arose and the venerable Archdeacon then distinctly declined answering any question of the kind.

Mr. Longueville Clarke observed that the Governor had no power whatever to make such a regulation—that an act of the Legislative Council indeed, would have the force of an Act of Parliament; but not that of the Governor of Bengal, and he would warn those present that any gentleman undertaking the duties prescribed on such authority would be liable to a Bill in Equity; and that after such warning they could not recover the costs of suit out of the Trust Funds.

The Reverend Mr. Fisher explained that all the old Vestry had asked of the Government was a Legislative enactment to liberate them from their responsibility, and that that request had been held to be disrespectful.

Mr. Longueville Clarke had been one of those who had certainly disapproved of the constitution of the old Vestry; he wished to have seen the principle of election carried further—to have had fewer clerical and more lay members: but that was not now the question. He objected to the whole proceeding as irregular—the act of the Governor—not the Governor-General in Council.

Mr. Turton enquired to whom the whole ground, as well that on which the Church stood as that annexed, belonged. He considered it to belong to the inhabitants of Calcutta and would not admit that even if they had given part of the ground they could re-assume it at pleasure. He considered that the right of voting was not confined to the parishioners but to the whole inhabitants of Calcutta, and although he had resided long enough here to render it he hoped unnecessary to say that he would not be likely to recommend legal proceedings because he belonged to the profession, yet in so far as those rights could be established by law he would readily aid in endeavouring to secure them.

The Reverend Mr. Robertson explained the deed of trust, and observed that its provisions had been complied with all except the legal transfer of the property. In respect to Mr. Longueville Clarke's proposition for an elective body he had made that proposition two years ago, but the Bishop then objected to it. He had since come to the conclusion himself that it was not desirable; not from any objection to the principle but from his experience in the Free School of the difficulty of getting electors together to vote. At the annual meetings only a few persons had attended, five or six, perhaps ten, and he believed the number annually declined. It was thus the Vestry became select—there was no attendance on Easter Monday to elect the four lay members and so they came to re-elect themselves.

The Venerable Archdeacon objected to all this as irrelevant; if any body had any resolution to submit he would be glad to receive it.

After some further discussion Mr. Turton was about to propose the first resolution, eventually carried, when the Archdeacon stated that he certainly should object to put such a resolution. Mr. Plowden observed that in that case they must have another chairman.

Mr. Turton having proposed a resolution which the Venerable the Archdeacon refused to put, and it having been stated that he had taken the chair only by the authority of the Bishop, Mr. Turton asked him whether he had any other sanction—to which the Venerable the Archdeacon having replied that that was the sanction by which he had taken the chair, Mr. Turton stated then that he should move a preliminary resolution that the Bishop had no authority to appoint a chairman of the Vestry, and that without any objection personally to the Archdeacon he should be requested to quit the chair. Whereupon the Archdeacon said to avoid the necessity for that resolution being put, he should quit the chair, considering the Meeting had the right to choose their own chairman.

The Rev. T. Robertson and the Rev. H. Fisher, then stated that they must decline taking any part in the proceeding. Mr. Turton requested them not to leave the room that they might supply any information which might be necessary, when they consented to remain but did not interfere.

Mr. Plowden proposed the Revd. Mr. Fisher as chairman, and Mr. Robertson seconded the motion; but after some discussion Mr. Fisher was permitted to decline acceding to the proposition, as it might have placed him in an embarrassing position, and it was eventually decided that Mr. Longueville Clarke should take the chair which he did accordingly.

Mr. Llewelyn explained that the original deed provided for re-election.

The Revd. Mr. Robertson.—Mr. Llewelyn had explained that the deed provides for re-election; but he thought it would be better to refer to the deed.

Mr. Turton observed that the Government had as much right to take this property as the Dey of Algiers. It was the most gratuitous assumption of power he ever heard of.

The Venerable Archdeacon explained that there were not many connected with the trust he believed.

The Revd. Mr. Robertson observed that the rupees were vested in the funds in the Vestry.

The Revd. Mr. Fisher thought it right to observe that the Bishop did not desire to interfere with the trusts, but he, Mr. Fisher, had told his Lordship that he could not separate the duties of the Vestry.

Mr. Turton.—Oh no! I perfectly understand, he only desires the patronage. *Si violandum jus est, regnandi gratia violandum est—aliis rebus pietatem colas. Mr. Turton then proposed the first resolution.

The Revd. Mr. Fisher asked if the Government which conferred the power of electing the Vestry might not take it away.

Mr. Turton explained that Government did not confer the power.

The Venerable Archdeacon, here observed that as the business was taking quite a different turn from that he contemplated, the Meeting must excuse him, he could not remain. He begged to be understood as not intending any disrespect to the Meeting.

Mr. Turton hoped Mr. Dealtry would understand also that he had not intended any disrespect or any thing personal to him or to any one at the Meeting and acted entirely on public grounds.

The Venerable Archdeacon assured Mr. Turton that he entirely so understood him.

The first resolution was then read by the Chairman.

Mr. Turton thought that the Meeting should take care not to involve those who might be liable to authority, for their acts. If Messrs. Robertson and Fisher wished not to take a part in these proceedings of course it was competent to them not to vote, and they would be considered accordingly as not taking any part on this occasion. Of course he did not mean to suggest to them that they should not vote or to question their right.

The Revd. Messrs. Robertson and Fisher explained that they would remain out of curiosity merely to witness the proceedings, but would rather not take any part in them, situated as they were.

Mr. Turton then put the 1st Resolution as follows:—

That the inhabitants of this Parish now assembled cannot recognize as legal the present interference of the Governor of Bengal with the Vestry, or the mode in which this meeting is convened. But desirous of shewing every deference to the wishes of the Governor of Bengal, this meeting will proceed to the consideration of such matters as the present state of the church requires.

Seconded by Mr. Andrew Wight and carried nem. con.

Mr. Turton then enquired in what state the property was as to Trustees.

The Reverend Mr. Robertson read over the list of the nine members of the late Vestry. The reverend gentleman observed that it had been stated that Mr. Charles Prinsep had been dragged in to oppose the Government. The statement was wholly untrue. Mr. Prinsep had been called in because he had long been professionally connected with the Vestry: and when the deeds and papers were called for by the Bishop it was thought that an objection might be raised to the number of the Vestry being incomplete, and Mr. Prinsep and Captain Ouseley were called in to complete it.

Mr. Turton enquired as to the funds and whether the late Vestry had done any thing in the way of resigning their trust.

The Reverend Mr. Fisher observed that they had offered to resign if the Government would release them from their responsibility by a Legislative enactment.

Mr. Turton could not have acquiesced in the submission to such an enactment, as the Government had no more power to take such a course than they had to take his property. It might become necessary to have recourse to legal proceedings. It is true persons had been elected to the trust by a certain course, but none of the original Trustees survived, and if there should be a defect of parties that could only be supplied by a decree

* Cicero de officiis.

Court, or meeting of inhabitants. A ...ctment was necessary to change the con... the Vestry. Mr. Turton would propose that ...ole trust should be transferred by the old Vestry ...hose now elected. If these last should refuse to transfer them they should have recourse to the Court. Mr. Turton made some further remarks in the course of which he alluded to the election of a vestry by a Meeting of inhabitants.

Mr. Daniel Ross asked a question as to the duty of Churchwardens.

Mr. Turton explained.

Mr. Andrew Wight then begged to propose a resolution; as it appeared that there was now no trustee in existence except the heir of the last survivor of the original Trustees, he would move the following resolution:—

That the following gentlemen, viz. Mr. J. Palmer, Mr. T. E. M. Turton, Mr. L. Clarke, and Mr J. S. Judge be requested to act as new trustees, and undertake the trusts vested in the old and former trustees; and that the old and former trustees and their representatives be requested to convey and assign over their interests in the Church property, land, and funds to the new trustees, the Vestry joining in all such acts as may be necessary to vest the property in the new trustees; and that in case of any difficulty the new trustees be requested on behalf of the inhabitants to have recourse to the Supreme Court in such way as they may be advised.

Seconded by Mr. Fitzgerald.

The Reverend Mr. Robertson, feared that this Resolution would be as irregular as the act of authority of which they complained, as no new trustees could be appointed until vacancies occur.

Mr. Turton.—Have vacancies then not occurred?

The Revd. Messrs. Robertson and Fisher observed that there had been a resignation conditional on indemnification by an act of the Legislative Council.

Mr. Turton observed that the late Vestry might transfer their power as requested.

The Reverend Mr. Robertson observed, that perhaps those in the service of Government might be afraid to adopt that course.

Mr. Turton said that he had provided for that by the clause in the resolution proposing that in that event the newly elected trustees should apply to the Court for a decree.

Mr. Daniel Ross asked whether that transfer of their powers would make the act legal.

Mr. Turton.—Yes.

Mr. Andrew Wight's Resolution was then put and carried nem. con. with exception to Mr. Plowden, who held up his hand against it.

The Gentlemen named in the Resolution were then balloted for in the usual form and unanimously elected. After which thanks were voted to the Chair and the Meeting broke up.—Hurkaru.

THE CIVIL FUND MEETING.

The Civil Fund Meeting on the 26th October attracted the very unusual attendance of thirty Subscribers. Mr. Tulloh occupied the Chair. In the midst of a great deal of desultory conversation, the following matters were disposed of:

Proposed by Mr. Rattray, and seconded by Mr. Morley—That Mrs. Clarke and family be admitted to the benefits of the Fund.

Amendment proposed by Mr. J. P. Grant, and seconded by Mr. J. R. Colvin—That the question of the admission of Mrs. Clarke and family be referred to the Service at large.

The amendment was lost and the original motion carried by a large majority.

Mrs. Shakespear's admission to the Fund was unanimously approved of—also, Mrs. Sargent, G. M. Bird, and Mrs. W. T. Robertson.

Proposed by Mr. Colvin, and seconded by Mr. Rattray—That for the present the Sub-Treasurer receive subscriptions in Company's rupees equivalent to the value of the number of Sicca rupees fixed in Article VII. of the Rules, at the rate of conversion specified in Act XVII. of 1835, the question of the permanent rate of subscription and conversion being referred for the final decision of the Service at large.

Amendment proposed by Mr. Tulloh, and seconded by Mr. William Young—The Company's rupees be substituted throughout the Rules for Sicca rupees, and the contributions to the Fund be levied at the existing rate for the present.

The amendment had only three votes:—for the original proposition fourteen hands being held up, it was declared to be carried.

The following Gentlemen were elected Managers for the current year: Mr. Dorin, Mr. D. C. Smith, Mr. J. P. Grant, Mr. Walker and Mr. J. R. Colvin—the sixth vacancy for the Chief Secretary being made a subject of reference to Government, as that office has been abolished.

Mr. J. P. Grant gave notice that, at the next Quarterly Meeting, he should move the reversal of the present decision on the first Resolution above quoted. Mr. Rattray questioned the right to do so, believing the present meeting to be competent to determine the matter finally, which seemed to be the general opinion. The numbers for Mr. Grant's amendment were 8 and against it 13.

The question regarding the rate of exchange arose out of a letter addressed to the Managers by the Sub-Treasurer, who desired instructions for his guidance. The effect of Mr. Tulloh's amendment would have been to increase the immediate subscriptions of persons receiving salary in even thousands of siccas; but as, on every change of appointment, the excess in sonats now given to the incumbents is to be cut off, the subscriptions of future incumbents, as well as of all those now receiving sums of less than one or more thousand siccas per month, would be reduced about 6⅔ per cent. It is understood that, at the meeting to take place on the 14th proximo, the whole question of the rates of subscription and allowances to widows, &c. prospectively will be considered.

Mr. Rattary read a letter from Mr. Charles Barwell, in which the writer endeavoured to shew that Mr. Curnin, when he asserted the Fund to be 5 lacks deficient in the value of its assets compared with its liabilities, had overlooked the value of its current income from subscriptions amounting to about 13,000 rupees per month, which was equal to a capital of 30 lakhs, and this added to its actual capital of 13 lakhs, made the assets amount to 43 lakhs. Nevertheless Mr. Barwell suggested, that they should increase their subscriptions 5,000 rupees per month, in consequence of the additional claims that had occurred.

Few of our readers will fail to observe, that Mr. Curnin set the current income against the current prospective claims: whether it will suffice to cover them, or leave an excess thereon he probably did not think a question within the power of calculation, except so far as past experience seemed to deny the hope of a surplus.

At the conclusion of the proceedings, Mr. J. P. Grant read a string of propositions, which he intended to bring forward at the next meeting, and moved that they should be published in the meantime for the general information of the service. This was objected to by some gentlemen on the ground of expense, and it was observed that the printing and circulating the correspondence relative to Mr. Sutherland and Mr. Elliott had cost some hundred rupees. As however the matter must be interesting to our readers in the Civil Service, we subjoin a copy of Mr. Grant's propositions. On the motion of Mr. Millet, seconded by Mr. Colvin, it was resolved that the consideration of them be postponed till the next quarterly meeting, which resolution was carried unanimously.

MR. J. P. GRANT'S PROPOSITIONS.

1st.—That Gentleman who have been admitted, or who may hereafter be admitted into the Bengal Civil Service, with permission to take rank in that Service above any person that has been a Subscriber to this Fund, for a longer period than one year, are not entitled to become Subscribers to this Fund of right.

2d.—That no unmarried man so circumstanced shall hereafter be admitted to become a Member of this Fund, except upon a condition of his paying to the Treasurer, on his entrance, a sum of money equal to the average amount of the aggregate subscriptions of the Members, in what year the individual wishing to subscribe may rank, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum; and a further sum equal to his proportion of the profit which the Fund may have derived, up to the date of his entrance, from the subscriptions of all the former Members of the same year as that in which he may rank, whose interests may have lapsed without loss to the Fund, the same to be calculated at compound interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum. The object of this Rule being to require such applicant to pay as much as the generality of his living contemporaries may have paid, and to make good to the Fund the value of the risk which he has escaped by not having joined it at the same time with them.

3d.—That no married man so circumstanced shall hereafter be admitted to become a Member of this Fund, except upon condition of his paying to the Treasurer on his entrance, in addition to the sums th.. quired from him, if unmarried a bonus of — be under twenty-one years of age, to which . added ——— for every year which his age may e.. twenty.

4.—That an applicant giving to the Secretary to the Fund a written authority for the deduction of twenty per cent. from his future monthly allowances, until the sums due from him under the above rules, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, be paid up, be considered as having fulfilled the conditions required of him, provided always that his family shall not benefit from the Fund, if he go to England before paying up the whole amount due from him.

5th.—That, under the above Rules, the Managers be authorised to admit applicants, under the circumstances mentioned in the first Resolution, whenever they may consider it not manifestly to the disadvantage of the Fund to do so.

6th.—That the admissions of those Gentlemen of the Honorable Company's late Canton Establishment, which have already been made under the approval of the Managers or of one general meeting, be confirmed by this meeting in regard to such of them as may, within six months, fulfil the conditions required of an unmarried applicant, otherwise, that the addmissions of those Gentlemen be cancelled by this meeting, under Article XXX.—Calcutta Courier.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF INDIA.

A general Meeting of this Society was held in the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 14th October, 1835.

THE HON'BLE SIR E. RYAN, in the Chair.

Present—Twenty Members.

George John Siddons, Esq., and W. H. S. Rainey, Esq., were elected by ballot.

NEW MEMBERS PROPOSED.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. FANE, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, G. C. B.—Proposed by Sir E. Ryan, seconded by Col. Dunlop.

CHARLES. HAY CAMERON, ESQ.—Proposed by Sir E. Ryan, seconded by the Hon'ble W. L. Melville.

CAPTAIN W. BELL, SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC WORKS.—Proposed by Mr. John Bell, seconded by Col. Dunlop.

ARCHD. D. COUL, ESQ., OF MYMINSING.—Proposed by Mr. John Bell, seconded by Captain Leach.

WM. STEVENSON, JUN., M. D., OF LUCKNOW.—Proposed by H. M. Low, Esq., seconded by Captain Leach.

—— MCPHERSON, ESQ., SOONDERBUNS.—Proposed by H. M. Low, Esq., seconded by W. Storm, Esq.

—— TEIMROTH, ESQ., ACCOUNTANT OF THE DANISH FORT OF SERAMPORE.—Proposed by H. M. Low, Esq., seconded by Dr. Marshman.

ARCHIBALD GRANT, ESQ.—Proposed by H. M. Low, Esq., seconded by Dr. Strong.

JAMES COOK, ESQ.—Proposed by W. F. Gibbon, Esq., seconded by Captain Leach.

After reading over the proceedings of the last Meeting, the Officiating Secretary informed the Society, that he had received, and distributed to members, and to mallies, about two-thirds of the Cape seed sent to order by Mr. Villet,—which had been found on trial most excellent. It was accordingly resolved that the surplus be advertised for sale in original parcels, and that the price be fixed at 10 Sa. Rs.

Mr. Bell announced the receipt (per Futil Curreem from Bombay) of two boxes containing onion, carrot and brinjal seed, landed on the previous day, and now in course of distribution amongst members and native mallies.

Also the receipt of some seed potatoes ordered from Madras, and obligingly sent round by A. P. Onslow, Esq., Secretary to the Horticultural Society recently established at that Presidency.

Also the expectation of immediate supplies of bean, pea and turnip seed, commissioned from Patna, which ought to have reached Calcutta long ago; but Captain Sage, who had promised to procure this seed, having failed to comply with the Society's request, without any explanation, the Officiating Secretary had applied to Mr. Duhan, of Dinapore, who has undertaken to execute the order forthwith.

The vegetable and cotton seed ordered by Dr. Wallich, from Grant Thorburn and Co., of New York, not having arrived, the Society on the suggestion of the Officiating Secretary resolved, that a correspondence be opened at once with respectable agents at the Cape, N. America, Van Diemen's Land, and whenever seeds of a superior quality can be procured, and Mr. Bell was requested to make such arrangements as will in future prevent disappointment.

It was remarked by a member present, that the gardens of private gentlemen were frequently robbed, the night previous to the exhibition of vegetables at the Town Hall, and Dr. Marshman observed that a great many of the finest esculents were cultivated in the neighbourhood of Chandernagore and very probably brought to Calcutta to compete for the prizes, as the produce of gardens in the vicinity of Calcutta. To obviate this sort of imposition, the President suggested, that a Committee be formed to visit occasionally the grounds cultivated by mallies for the market, and three gentlemen volunteered their services for this office, viz. Messrs. Strong, Kyd and J. W. Masters: it was further proposed that J. Masters, Esq., should be solicited to add his name; and aid, to the Committee.

Sir John Peter Grant proposed, and it was resolved, that the head mallies of gentlemen's private gardens be permitted to compete for prizes (in their own names) at the next Exhibition.

Read the following Communications:—

No. 1.—From Mr. Patrick of Fort Gloster to the Officiating Secretary dated 21st September, reporting most favourably on a sample bale of Akra cotton, which

..actured into twist and cloth, for the pur-
..g forwarded to the Hon'ble the Court of .. Mr. Patrick's letter has been embodied in
..neral Report upon Akra, which is now in the
..ess.

No. 2.—From Mr. Blundell of Moalmeyne to Mr. Patrick, dated 6th August, acknowledging the receipt from the latter of a bale of Pernambuco Cotton Seed, which owing to some unfortunate circumstance had failed to vegetate.

Mr. Blundell urges Mr. Patrick to send him some Sea Island cotton seed, under a strong impression that it will succeed in that part of the country, and asks if the Pernambuco cotton is ever grown from slips, as it is found to take root from cuttings, but he had not as yet ascertained if it yielded blossom.

Mr. Blundell is sanguine that cotton will become an article of vast importance on that Coast.

No. 3.—Extract of a letter from Capt. Dixon, Political Agent to the Governor-General at Mhairwarrah, to C. E. Trevelyan, Esq., (no date) giving a very favourable account of the result of some Indian corn seed sent to him about two years ago*.

Capt. Dixon reckons the produce from this acclimated foreign seed at 20 per cent. more than the indigenous sorts grown in that part of Ajmeer.

Capt. Dixon speaks in high terms of the superiority of the Otaheite sugar cane, of which he had procured some plants—one of these being equal to 5 or 6 of the desee cane.

Capt. Dixon expresses a great desire to introduce the foreign cotton, and in the absence of any in the Society's store, the Officiating Secretary has forwarded a package of Pernambuco seed.

With reference to the favorable report made by Captain Dixon on Indian corn, Mr. Bell intimated to the Society that he had solicited Mr. J. J. Dixwell, Supercargo of the American Ship Fortitude, to bring with him next voyage two barrels of American Indian Corn, of sorts, in the husk, which that gentleman had politely promised to do, and further offered his services on behalf of the Society in any way they might be available.

No. 4.—A letter from Capt. Low, of Penang, to the address of the Secretary dated the 12th Sept. 1835, forwarding the prospectus of a work which he contemplated publishing on the soil, climate and cultivation of Prince of Wales Island, and soliciting patronage.

Resolved—That the Society do encourge Capt. Low, by subscribing to ten copies of the pamphlet forthcoming.

BENGAL MEDICAL RETIRING FUND.

The fourth Quarterly General Meeting of the Subscribers to the Fund was held on Monday the 12th October, Mr. Surgeon F. Corbyn in the chair. The report of the committee of managers for the past quarter was read, in which it was stated, that the Committee, in conformity to the resolution noticed in the last quarterly report, had submitted to the vote of the subscribers at large, the question respecting the disposal of the pecuniary contributions of members. The resolution was to the effect, that pending the application which had been made to the Hon'ble the Court of Directors for permission to pay off six annual retirements, the committee deemed that it would be injurious to the interests of the Fund to return, at present, to subscribers the amount of their contributions, and they therefore proposed that the money should remain, at interest, in the hands of Government, until the pleasure of the Hon'ble Court on the subject was known. Of those who had voted on the question, forty-six concurred, and six opposed it, giving a majority of forty in its favor.

A letter received from Colonel Casement, C. B. Secretary to the Government of India in the military department, under date the 6th of July, stated, that the desire of the officers of the medical service to be admitted to the benefits of the military retiring fund propounded by Mr. Curnin would be brought to the notice of the Honorable the Court of Directors.

The Accountant General had furnished a statement, shewing the recoveries that had been effected in the military pay department on account of the fund, from November 1834 to January 1835, both inclusive, amounting to Sa. Rs. 6,660 11 3, and another of subscriptions received in the civil department of the Bengal presidency, during the second quarter of the past official year, amounting to Sa. Rs. 1,378 13 10, total Sa. Rs. 8039 9 1.

The entire payments to the fund from its commencement in January 1833 up to January 1835, inclusive, in the military department, and to the second quarter of 1834-1835 in the civil, exhibited the sum of sicca rupees 65,729 4 9 and the total expense of office establishment up to 1st October 1835, was sicca rupees 3,921 1 4.

The number of subscribers at present borne upon the fund, was 1 member of the Medical Board, 8 superintending-surgeons, 59 surgeons, and 115 assistant-surgeons, total 183, of whom, so far as was ascertained from the accounts furnished, 135 had paid the whole, or a part of their subscriptions, and 48 none.

Upon the report being read, it was moved by Mr. Corbyn, seconded by Dr. Spens, and carried,

"That the report of the managers be confirmed."

The disbursements of the Society for the quarter were next submitted and passed, and the meeting then broke up with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta, held at the Asiatic Society's apartments on the 3d of October, 1835.

One of L'Estrange's Calculo-Fractors was exhibited to the Meeting by permission of the Medical Board and the Secretary took the opportunity to mention, that sets of the instrument had been placed at the disposal of Superintending-Surgeons of Divisions for the use of the Medical officers serving within their several circles.

John Sawers, Esq., Officiating 3d Member of the Medical Board of Bengal, and John Scott, Esq., Secretary to the Medical Board of Bombay, proposed at last meeting, were elected Members of the Society.

H. Hough, Esq., Superintending-Surgeon of the Saugor circle, and Allan Webb, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon on this establishment, were proposed as members of the Society, the former by Mr. Hutchinson and Dr. Cameron, and the latter by Dr. Stewart and Mr. Hutchinson.

R. J. Brassey, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, requested that his name might be withdrawn from the list of members of the Society, which was accordingly done.

Mr. Corbyn called the attention to the Society to his proposal to be allowed to introduce a reporter at the meetings of the Society; the motion having been seconded by Dr. Stewart was, after some discussion, put to the vote and negatived.

The following communications were then read, viz., two cases of disease, successfully treated with magnetism, by R. Tytler, Esq., M. D.

The first occurred in a Mahummudan of 40 years of age. He was severely affected with violent pain in the shoulder, hip-joint and lower extremity of the right side, for which he received two applications from the magnetic wheel. He declared himself to be perfectly relieved, and has since continued free from pain.

The second case was one of ulcer and occurred in a sepoy of the 34th Regiment N. I. He was admitted into Hospital on the 1st of June, on account of an ulcer, on the front part of the leg above the ankle, of the size of a rupee. Four days after, Galvanism was applied by causing him to hold the copper wire in his hand, while the extremity of the zinc wire, in the manner of an escharotic, was applied to the edges and surface of the ulcer. The application of the Galvanism occasioned considerable pain; at the end of four applications however the ulcer had completely cicatrized, and the man was discharged cured, after having been from the first, only 13 days in hospital. Throughout, simple dressing was employed, with the view of covering or protecting the sore, and nothing farther. Dr. Tytler is of opinion that, by the usual means, he would not have succeeded in healing this ulcer in less than two months.

An account of a case of Osthexia, by R. Tytler, Esq., M. D. The subject of this case was a Hindoo about 25 years of age. The bones of the cranium and the cervical vertebræ are described as emitting—when struck, an extraordinary hollow or ringing sound, as if the upper part of an empty puncheon were struck with a stick; sometimes the sound was sharper, as if a brass vessel or glass shade were filliped with the finger nail. The trachea, when struck, emits a remarkable sound, as if a loose body were shaken within a tube of wood or metal. The cartilaginous rings appear to be very rigid, and towards the upper part crepitate, on being rubbed against each other. The bones of the other parts of the body appear natural. The man states the scalp to be insensible, and allows his hair to be plucked out, without evincing pain; he complains of a burning sensation on the surface of the body, and likewise in the stomach after taking food; he likewise asserts that he cannot sleep, and has not slept for two years. There is some degree of wildness in his looks, but he is perfectly intelligent and answers questions readily. His symptoms he ascribes to witchcraft.

The following work was presented for the Library, viz.,

Hutchinson's Report on the Medical Management of Indian Jails, by the author.

The following original communications were presented at the Meeting, viz.:—

Observations on some diseases of European seamen in Bengal, by D. Stewart, Esq., M. D.

A case of extensive contused wound of the integuments of the head, by R. H. Irvine, Esq.

A case of dislocation of the lower jaw, of forty days standing, successfully treated, by R. H. Irvine, Esq.

The following papers were then read and discussed, viz.:—

A case of snake bite successfully treated by blood letting and large doses of ammonia, by T. J. Smith, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Horse Artillery, Bangalore.

Memorandum of a post mortem examination of a case of extra-uterine pregnancy, by J. S. Login, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

Case of abscess of the liver, by W. Gordon, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

At half past one o'clock, P. M., on the 30th of June last, Mr. Smith was called to see the subject of his case, a robust cooly, who had been bitten, about a quarter of an hour before, in the hand, by a cobra-de-capella. The man was quite insensible, and frothing at the mouth, the breathing quick and hurried, the pulse small and irregular, beating 30, the skin cold and the pupils contracted; a ligature was tightly applied above the elbow, the wound cauterized, and two drachms of liquor ammoniæ exhibited in an ounce of water. At twenty minutes to 2 o'clock, there was no improvement, the hand and arm were swelling, and the liquor ammoniæ was repeated. At 15 minutes to 2 o'clock, the man was totally insensible, torpid and heavy; a vein was opened. At 5 minutes to 2 o'clock, about fourty ounces of blood had been abstracted, on which the circulation seemed to be relieved—pulse 60, softer and fuller, skin warm, had vomited twice, there was no decided improvement however; the liquor ammoniæ was repeated with half an ounce of brandy. At 2 o'clock appeared sinking, the liquor ammoniæ and brandy repeated. At 2-5 improving, great irritability of stomach, the draught repeated with the addition of a few drops of laudanum—nitric acid applied to the wounds. At 2-15 the pulse intermitted but was of tolerable strength; slight appearance of stertor; as several gurrahs of water were dashed over the head, which seemed to rouse the patient. At 2-20 sinking, skin cold, pulse small hurried and intermitting. A stimulating liniment to the head and the following draught given; liquor ammoniæ four drachms in four ounces of brandy very slightly diluted. At 2-30 appeared inclined to rally, draught repeated as above, and sinapisms applied to the extremities. At 2-35 vomitted the draught, to have half a drachm of ammonia in an ounce of water. At 2-45 hand greatly swollen, draught repeated. At 2-55 slightly convulsed—pulse again compressed, intermitting and small, draught repeated. At 3 o'clock vein again opened, blood at first dark and venous, but after the abstraction of ten ounces it became of natural appearance; is slightly sensible. At 3-15 is quite insensible, but there is no stertor. At 3-25 pulse again hurried and compressed—draught repeated, and nitric acid blister applied to the nape. At 3-30 appeared sensible of the pain of the blister and the rawness of the fauces. At 3-40 pulse again becoming small and compressed. Vein re-opened and eight ounces of dark venous blood withdrawn, which seemed to relieve him. Is now able to speak. At 4 P. M. pupils becoming sensible, complains of giddiness and pain in his arm. From this time he continued to improve; he suffered somewhat from headache, giddiness, and inclination to sleep, but the symptoms soon gave way to mercurial purgatives. The wounds in the hand were followed by extensive swelling and sloughing of the integuments, but ultimately did well, and the man was in a fit state to proceed to

..e 3d of August. The accident in this ..ace under circumstances, which would seem . the particular nature of the reptile beyond the ..bility of doubt.

The subject of Mr. Login's memorandum was a woman who was found dead in the lines of a native Regiment, under circumstances that seemed to call for a medico-legal examination of the body. As far as could be ascertained, the poor woman had been exposed to considerable mental distress and anxiety for some time before death, and in addition to this she had been subject to occasional attacks of severe abdominal pain, generally referred to the right hypogastric and inguinial regions. During the last three or four days these paroxysms of pain had been accompanied by attacks of syncope, on the subsidence of which, she was able to resume her usual occupations; on the day on which she died, these symptoms were said to have recurred with unusual violence. Externally there were no marks of violence, and with the exception of slight serous effusion within the cranium and some old pleuritic adhesions, no morbid appearances were observed, either in the head or in the thoraic cavity. On laying open the abdomen the seat of the disease was at once apparent. A large coagulum of blood covered the whole of the anterior surface of the intestines. On removing this, the source of the hemorrhage was discovered, in what appeared at first to be the uterus, but which on closer examination proved to be a collapsed sac, having no communication with the cavity of that viscus, but with the right fallopian tube, the uterine extremity of which was obstructed. The tunics of the sac adhered anteriorly to the abdominal parietes, over a small extent; while on the posterior aspect, a fissure of about two inches in length, exposed to view the ruptured membranes, which had contained a fœtus, of about ten weeks old, subsequently found among the coagula in the cavity of the pelvis. The uterus was enlarged to the usual dismensions, in the second month of pregnancy, having its cavity lined with a membrana decidua.

Mr. Gordon's case of abscess of the liver occurred in a gunner of artillery, 30 years of age. The man was admitted into hospital on the 2d of February complaining of severe pain of the right side increased on pressure, coughing, or turning in bed. He had no fever, the pulse was moderate and tongue clean. He had been discharged on the 25th of the previous month, cured of an attack of acute hepatitis. He was ordered mercurial purgatives internally, and leeches and fomentations to the side; on the 25th the pain was not better, and he was bled to sixteen ounces. This diminished the pain; but a degree of fulness, redness, and tenderness of the side became manifest. Mercurial alteratives with an occasional dose of house medicine were continued. On the 3d of March the pain was still severe on moving, the redness had extended, and fluctuation was perceptible; there was no fever or thirst. A caustic issue was inserted. On the 5th the slough had separated, and there was a copious discharge of red serum mixed with pieces of thick pus. On the 10th the sore had an unhealthy appearance, the inflammation was extending around it, the discharge was more copious, thin, and reddish, and contained pieces of coagulated blood, and a little pus. A charcoal poultice and nitric acid lotion were applied locally. On the 16th the sloughing continued to spread, two of the leech bites had ulcerated, and the discharge was much as before, but attended with great fetor. On the 24th sloughing continued, the discharge was as before, and the patient began to be wasted by hectic fever These symptoms continued to increase, and the patient died on the 4th of April. On dissection the body appeared a good deal emaciated; the opening opposite the 7th and 8th ribs, at their cartilages, was about 2 inches in diameter, with the liver appearing at the bottom of it. The gangrene was about four inches and a half in diameter, extending upwards on the ribs. The cellular substance underneath was infiltrated with pus, and a pouch or bag which would have contained the hand, was formed by the adhesion of the liver to the draphragm. The upper surface of the right lobe was ulcerated superficially, for a space of about two inches, and there was an infiltration of pus into a small portion of its edge. The liver was otherwise healthy; perhaps rather pale and hard. The pericardium was distended with serum, and the whole of it whitish, thickened, and exhibiting traces of coagulable lymph on its surface.

The above would appear to have a considerable affinity to those cases recorded by Mr. Hawkins in vol. 18, part 1 of the transactions of the Medico-Chirurgical Society of London.

SUPREME COURT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1835.

This being the first day of the Term, the Supreme Court met at eleven o'clock.

The Forbes's Case.

JENKINS versus FRASER.

The Chief Justice proceeded to deliver the judgment of the Court upon this case.

His Lordship briefly recapitulated the facts and circumstances of this case; (which have already appeared at length before our readers,) and then stated the points arising thereout. There were questions upon which the decision of this case must depend; by the one of which the judgment must be wholly, by the other partially governed.

The first question was whether the loss sustained under so peculiar an accident as the destruction of steam machinery, occasioned directly by the effect of fire, but remotely by the action of sea water, could be considered such a risk as fell within the policy. He was of opinion that clearly it could, and ought so to be considered. It is evident that the accident could not have happened but at sea; and as no defect of machinery, or incompetency of the engineer who superintended it, was proved to have existed when the vessel sailed, in his opinion the risk was clearly covered by the policy, and was such as the parties contemplated. His Lordship fortified his opinion with references to several cases, none of which however were perfectly analogous, the accident and the action being altogether of a novel destruction.

The second question to be considered was the amount of the damages.

Sir J. P. GRANT expressed his entire concurrence with the Chief Justice. There were many other sources of danger and loss, which must be classed under the term "perils of the sea" than those which are occasioned by the winds and the waves, the rock and the shoal. The loss in question, clearly originated in one of those numerous sources, too numerous indeed, to be recapitulated in a policy of Insurance. The extraordinary nature of the accident has been dwelt upon; but that circumstance, instead of tending to exonerate the insurers, has quite a contrary tendency; inasmuch as the more uncommon were the accident, and therefore the less likely to occur; so much less was the risk which the insurers undertook, and therefore so much the more strong and binding was their responsibility to make it good, when it did occur.

Judgment for the Plaintiff for Sa. Rs 1,400.

IN THE MATTER OF TRICKETT.

Mr. TURTON applied for a commission to Colonel Lowe, the Company's Resident at Lucknow, to swear an executor residing within the territories of the King of Oude.

Had this been an application for letters of administration, said the learned counsel, some difficulty might arise; as securities would in that case be required by the Court, and such security could not be taken out of their jurisdiction. But an executor derives his authority under the will, and not from the Court; and if a testator has sufficient confidence in a party not resident within the jurisdiction, the Court will sustain that confidence by granting the commission to swear him to his trust wheresoever residing. Such has been the practice of this Court. The learned counsel cited a case 1 Haggard's Reports 116 where a similar application was made to swear in a party residing at Bordeaux, when the only condition was that the securities on the bond should be parties within the jurisdiction.

There was another case, Camberoso and Rigordi, Adams, 433, where administration was granted with the will where the only question was whether the committee should not give security of a resident within the jurisdiction of the British Court.

The situation of the parties might be compared to the circumstance of bankruptcy as affecting the office of executor A Court of Equity will not refuse probate nor require security for that cause, inasmuch as the confidence reposed by the testator was paramount to the caution of the Court.

Sir J. P. GRANT referred to the Stat. 38 G. 3. C. 37, and mentioned a case in Adam's Reports when an executor having gone to Scotland administration was granted durante absentiâ. Supposing such to be the practice, the commission at present sued for, would be of rather anomalous character.

Mr. TURTON explained the act referred to, to mean, that if the executor did not in such case himself apply, administration durante absentiâ might be granted for the purpose of supplying a necessary party to a suit in equity. After some consultation upon the bench, the Court signified its intention to postpone its decision.—Hurkaru.

RONALD M'DONALD versus WILLIAM SMOULT.

The Advocate-General moved for a rule nisi calling on Mr. William Smoult, to shew cause why he ought not to be restrained from selling two-ninths of the Doorgapore factory in the district of Nuddea, which, it is alleged, he has agreed to sell at a price considerably under the value. The learned counsel stated, that in the month of April last, an application was made to this Court by the complainant for a probate to what appeared to be the will of his brother, and for which the complainant was appointed executor. The Court did not grant probate, but directed the will to the proved in solemn form, and a caveat being put in, the will appeared too defective to allow it to be proved. On the 22nd of September a notice was filed of appeal from the decision of the Court to the Privy Council, but previous to this Mr. Smoult had the administration of the estate committed to him. The family of the deceased consisted of his mother, who resides in the Isle of Skye; his brother Charles, now in New South Wales; Ronald McDonald in this country, and complainant in this suit; and his sister Martha Macleod. These were the parties interested in the will; and the question is whether the indigo factory goes to the executor for the benefit of the next of kin, or for the heir-at-law. The Doorgapore factory was a partnership concern, in which Alexander Donald MacDonald held two-ninths, James William Macleod two-ninths; Ronald McDonald, the complainant, two-ninths; the deceased two-ninths; and Thomas Mackenzie Cripps one-ninth. The business was chiefly conducted by the deceased during his life time, but it was afterwards taken up and conducted by the complainant. In July last Mr. Smoult entered into communication with a gentleman named Hills, the proprietor of some factories in the Nuddea district, and agreed to sell to him the deceased's two-ninths of the Doorgapore concern for Rs. 85,000. That Mr. Hills was well acquainted with the value of the factory might be surmissed from the facts that he was not only an indigo planter in the neighbourhood, but he had also recently purchased from Mr. Macleod what was called two-ninths of the same factory for a sum more than double, apparently, but what he (the learned counsel) was prepared to show, was more than four times the amount he now proposed to give for each share, for the shares were purchased from Mr. Macleod at a season when there was nothing on the factory but the bare walls and machinery, but in the month of July, when Mr. Hills offered to purchase deceased's two shares from Mr. Smoult, the coming crop was ascertained, and it was enough of indigo to manufacture 1,[illegible] product of which would be for the two sh[illegible] 40,000; so that Mr. Hills, in July would realize more than Rs. 45,000 for the two-ninths of the fac[illegible] though a few months before he had paid Rs. 1,67,200 for two similar shares belonging to Mr. Macleod. It could not be urged that there was any necessity for an immediate sale, for the debts of the deceased, if any, were trifling. Again the sale was private; there was no advertisement; every thing was silent. That Mr. Smoult was ignorant of the value of the shares might readily be admitted, but to use an expression in one of the communications, that he had been "done" was quite evident; and under these circumstances there was sufficient to induce the court to grant an injunction restraining him from completing the sale. Rule Nisi.—Englishman.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23.

RICHARDS versus BANK OF BENGAL.

This was a re-hearing upon a decree passed by Sir John Franks in favour of the Bank of Bengal in a suit instituted against them by Major Richards, under the following circumstances.

In the year 1821, Messrs. Palmer and Company purchased two bank shares with the funds, and for the benefit of Major Richards, but which were registered in the names of the gentlemen constituting the then firm of Palmer and Co. Major Richards also then and before that time held a share or shares in the Bank duly registered in the Bank books in his own name.

Upon the failure of the firm of Palmer and Co., the certificate of the two shares in the Bengal Bank registered in the names of Palmer and Co., were endorsed by the Insolvent members of that firm to the actual proprietor Major Richards, and an assignment of the same shares was made in his favour by the Assignees of the Insolvent firm, which Assignees at the same time made a declaration renunciatory of all claim, right or title to or in the said shares, in their said capacity of Assignees of Palmer and Co.

Notice of this endorsement and assignment was given to the Bank, and they were also called upon to transfer the two above-mentioned shares into the name of the actual proprietor Major Richards. The Bank of Bengal however, refused to do this and moreover claimed a right to the accruing dividends upon those shares inasmuch as the firm of Palmer and Co., was considerably in their debt, and they were authorized and empowered by the 21st section of their Charter to retain all dividends due and accruing upon shares entered in their books in the name of their debtors.

The clause of the Charter under which the Bank advanced this right and upon the construction of which mainly depends the defence to the suit of Major Richards, is as follows:—"If any proprietor registered as such in his own name, in the books of the said Bank, and not as executor or administrator, or otherwise in trust for any other person or persons shall have become indebted to the said Bank, and shall in any manner have made default in the payment of the said debt, it shall be lawful for the said directors, if they shall think fit, to appropriate to the payment of the said debt, any dividends which at the time of such default may be due, or which may thereafter and before such debt is paid become due to such proprietor instead of paying them to him."

Under this clause of their Charter the Bank claimed to set off the dividends accruing on the two above-mentioned shares against the debt owing to them by the firm of Palmer and Co., at the time of their insolvency, and consequently resisted the requisition of Major Richards to transfer the two shares into his own name and to pay him the dividends due and arising thereupon.

In consequence of such refusal a suit was instituted by Major Richards, and a decree was pronounced in favour of the Bank which was now sought to be set aside.

Mr. TURTON for Major Richards contended that the Bank Charter conveyed no such power to that body as a refusal to transfer these shares into e client or to withhold the dividends aris-on from him the bonâ fide proprietor. He mit that if any false credit had been raised out of, pon these shares, and that if any money or value had been advanced to Messrs. Palmer and Co. upon them as security for the repayment of such advances, the claim of Major Richards must yield to the prior claim of the Bank; but no such false credit had been raised, and what was conclusive on this point, no such false credit could be raised upon these shares, as by the 15th section of the Charter, the Bank are expressly prohibited from making advances or granting loans upon the security of shares. The credit therefore given to Palmer and Co. must have been altogether independent of these shares, and their debt must have accrued upon other sources of credit than the security of the shares in question. It would be strange therefore if the Bank could claim a lien upon that which for the purposes of such lien, could never by the terms of their Charter come into their possession.

But the Bank claim the dividends upon these shares due to the bonâ fide proprietor as a set off against a debt owing to them by the trustee of these shares. Now the law of lien recognises trusts as well as direct property.

The 21st clause must not be taken by itself, but in connection with the other clauses of the Charter, and with this construction it will bear, taken in connection with the whole Charter. Now the 21st section is clearly modified and qualified by the 15th, which declares that no credit shall be raised upon shares. The Bank must either recognise the trust or they must not. If they do, then from the time they receive notice of such trust, they hold the dividends in trust themselves, for the bonâ fide proprietor; if they do not then, they hold them for the whole of the creditors of Palmer and Co. But we have not only the endorsement of Messrs. Palmer and Co. upon the certificate—the evidence of these shares, but we have the assignment of the Assignees of Messrs. Palmer and Co. But the Bank contend that they have a right to set off all the accruing dividends, both as against the bonâ fide proprietor of these shares, and as against the creditors of Palmer and Co., the trustees of such shares.

Palmer and Co. were trustees of their shares for Richards. It is contended on the other side that they ought to have been registered as such. I deny this grammatical construction of the 21st section; let us put the case of an executor:—he need not so describe himself, he may purchase a stock in his own name, he knows that the Bank cannot trust him on the credit of such stock, he becomes insolvent and indebted to the Bank; are the dividends due to the estate of which he is executor to be stopped by persons who never gain credit upon them? This question is to be taken on the broad and acknowledged principle of equity and justice, in a case where no fraud could have been contemplated, and where no fraud can be imputed.

There is another point material to state. Subsequent to the purchase of these shares in the year 1821, in the names of the then members of the firm of Palmer and Co., that firm had changed many of its partners,—Mr. George Prinsep had come in and others had gone out. Now it is clear that Mr. George Prinsep could have no manner of interest in their shares, either directly or as a trustee; how then could it be contended the Bank had a right to set off the dividends due upon their shares, against the debt due to the Bank by Mr. George Prinsep?

Mr. Justice Ryan.—The better way will be, divesting the question of the circumstances of trust and insolvency, to consider the simple point whether supposing a bonâ fide proprietor of Bank stock, becomes indebted to the Bank, can he assign over to another his right and title to such shares and compel the Bank to transfer them into the name of his Assignee and pay him the dividends.

Mr. Pearson, for the Bank.—The solution of that question my Lord must depend upon the proper construction of the charter, its real intent and meaning, and the scope and tendency of the whole of its clauses.

Now in the first place by certain of those clauses provision is made, that a certain limited number of shares only—that is to say ten, shall be held by any one individual. This in contemplation of the possibility of fraud, is a consideration of some moment; for if the construction now attempted to be given to the Charter were valid a party might hold twenty or fifty shares.

With respect to the 21st clause and the grammatical construction it will bear, to me it conveys a meaning as clear as words can express. But I am told to look to clause 15th by which that meaning is defined and limited, the Bank being thereby prohibited from advancing loans upon the security of shares. What other meaning can be put upon this restriction, but that it is a provision against the security of the Bank being weakened by covering the shares into pledges for additional sums? Is it not reasonable and perfectly consistent that the corporation should say "we will not allow a party to pledge his share for advances, but we will nevertheless come down upon such share and stop the dividends thereupon growing provided such party become our debtor, and our other securities fail?" There is a very material distinction between making advances by way of loan on the security of a share, and having a claim on such share for other debts provided other securities fail. The sense and meaning of the clause is as clear as words can make it.

Mr. Prinsep argued on the same side and contended that the view taken of this question by the opposite side was unsound and untenable. Major Richards besides the shares in question had a share in his own name, and must have been conversant of the Charter, and as under such circumstances he permitted the said two shares to remain in Palmer and Co. and to stand in their names in the books of the Bank from 1821 to 1829, is this not to be regarded, as far as the relation of Palmer and Co. with the Bank are concerned, as vesting the property in Palmer and Co.?

Chief Justice.—I am satisfied that as Mr. Turton stated, if any false credit had been raised out of these shares, the dividends thereupon would have been liable; but I am equally satisfied that no such false credit was raised.

The simple question is whether a shareholder indebted to the Bank can make a valid assignment of his share, and whether the Bank are bound to recognise such assignment and make a transfer in their books of such share, to such Assignee. I am of opinion that he can, and that they will be bound thereby. The 15th section prohibiting advances upon shares, applies equally to dividends upon such shares. This construction of the Charter must affect the whole of the decree given in this suit.

Mr. Justice Grant.—I do not think it necessary to go into the points of this case at length, having fully expresed my opinion on a former occasion.

Mr. Justice Malkin concurred in the opinion of the Chief Justice.

Mr. Justice Grant.—The decree of the Court therefore was, that the Bank should make the transfer of the shares demanded by the bill and account for the dividends accruing since the time of their receiving notice of such transfer.

A long argument or rather conversation ensued involving a point of law of some importance, viz., whether Mr. G. Prinsep standing in the two-fold capacity of member of the firm of Palmer and Co. and a governor of the Bank of Bengal, a notice to him in the one capacity could be deemed notice to him in the other, and thus constructively a notice to the Bank corporation. The decision of this point was however at length waived.

Two other questions were also discussed at great length, one of which was as to the period from which the dividends should be calculated; the other as to the costs—this last embracing the question of who was to pay the costs of Mr. Udny, the Secretary to the Bank. The former point was left open to be settled upon further consideration, as to the latter it was determined that the costs of the complaint should be paid by the Bank; and that Mr. Udny should pay his own costs.

IN THE MATTER OF MELVILLE, LATE SHERIFF OF CALCUT.

Mr. Turton made an application to the Court, rather for its directions as to the mode of proceeding to be adopted under peculiar circumstances, than for any specific rule or order. The circumstances he alluded to were these. By the 3d G. 1. it is provided that in case of the demise of the Sheriff the under Sheriff shall notwithstanding continue in his office and execute the same in the name of the deceased.

Whether that act extend to this country or no, he would not now consider, as if it did, it would not be applicable in the present case.

The practice here has been that when a Sheriff going out of office has writs in his hands partially executed, any further process arising out of such writs was directed to him, and was by him put in execution, subsequently to the expiration of his Shrievalty.

Mr. Bird, the under Sheriff of Mr. Melville's year, continued to execute the remaining writs of that Shrievalty till Mr. Melville was taken ill and proceeded to the Cape, and died at sea on or about the 19th of May last. Although no directly authentic statement of his death has been obtained, there is that which is tantamount to reasonable proof, though no probate has been taken out in consequence of the insolvency of the party. Under these circumstances it cannot be deemed safe either to purchasers, or to the under Sheriff in question, to make sales, under writs directed to the late Sheriff Mr. Melville, and his under Sheriff therefore makes his present application for the direction of the Court, under circumstances of singular peculiarity; it so happening that no Sheriff of Calcutta has hitherto died whilst in office or during the interval that unexecuted writs remained in his hands.

There is however, a provision in the charter of justice, for the contingencies of death or absence, during the continuance of the office, but not for the present peculiarity.

When a Sheriff goes out of office, the establishment remains in every respect the same, with the exception that his under Sheriff continues to have the management of such writs as have only been partially executed.

After a discussion of some length, the Chief Justice intimated that as this was a matter of importance, the Court were desirous that it should stand over till a further investigation of the practice, and precedent, if any there were bearing on the subject, should be made.

The Court was occupied during the remainder of the day in hearing motions involving no questions of public interest.

PUNCHANUND BYSACK versus SREEBOOSOONDRY DOSSEE.

This was a cause that came on upon re-hearing. The whole case turned upon the circumstance of the will of one Kissenchunder being so drawn up as to contain various bequests and legacies written in the margin, and which the one party alleged to be interpolations inserted subsequent to the execution of the will by the testator. An issue had been prayed to determine the validity of these alleged interpolations, but after considerable discussion, a decree was taken by consent, and the will with its marginal additions was admitted to be valid.

The Petition of W. Cobb Hurry, in the matter of James Young, and others.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Insolvent Court. The cause came on upon demurer and the argument had occupied the Court during the whole of the three previous days. To-day the hearing was concluded, and we give our report of the whole together.

cast upon his character than the refusal of his costs to trustee out of the estate—and such an imputation Mr. Burkinyoung felt to be cast upon his conduct by the order of the Insolvent Court in this case by the order made respecting the costs.

Mr. Justice Grant.—I think it right to state the impression under which I have made that order. I did think it a violation of the duty of trustees and such a one as must be marked by the signal disapprobation of the Court, but I did not attribute the misconduct in question to any dishonest motive or wrong feeling but to a gross neglect and want of consideration of the proper duty of a trustee.

Mr. Pearson.—I imputed nothing but great negligence and departure from their duty as trustees.

Mr. Turton.—I will show that they were not guilty of negligence but that on the contrary they did what they thought best for the estate—if they acted according to the best of their judgment and opinion, it would be altogether new to visit them with the reprehension of the Court. What has fallen from your Lordship will be most gratifying to Mr. Burkinyoung. He was above any temptation to act wrongfully. He was selected to fill a burthensome duty to which he gave his whole care and utmost attention, he therefore felt it particularly mortifying to have a mark thus set upon him by being deprived of his costs.

I do not mean to object to the order as a matter of form, but to make an order effectual all necessary parties must be before the Court; now there are three French gentlemen, Messrs. Saupin, Terraneau and Albert who ought to be made parties. But to come to the merits, Alexander and Co.'s interest consisted in an izarah which it was necessary to renew at an expense of 10,000 rupees; for this Mr. Saupin had made arrangements with the zemindar. To set aside the sale on principles of equity, all parties must be before the Court which was not the case here. Again it was agreed that the Assigness had received half the purchase money, and they could not compel the payment of the remainder without confirming the sale. Saupin was a Frenchman residing in the Mofussil and consequently not subject to British law. What is a deed of sale of an indigo factory but a transfer of personal property for a mere term of years. It was admitted that without the izarah that factory was not worth 3,000 rupees. The contract was as good in equity the moment the agreements were completed as if the deeds had been executed. In equity a contract to sell is equally binding whether deeds be executed or not—deeds are the evidences only of a contract. But the point of law determined against us is, that he, Saupin, was the agent of the party and as such could not contract in his own name. I deny that position.

Mr. Justice Grant.—If I recollect right the order nisi was improperly drawn—it was drawn to cancel the al object of these proceedings is to obtain the in favor of Greig and Co. versus Saupin. There reports abroad which attracted the attention of any persons—of Messrs. Cockerell, Mr. Plowden and others, and they upon investigation of the matter were fully satisfied. Grieg thus binds Mr. Lingham who makes an express stipulation that Grieg should bind him harmless, and pay the whole of the costs. This was sufficient evidence of some extraordinary motion – that motion could not be to benefit the estate of Alexander and Co. Lingham lent his name and no more. Greig stated by swearing that all this was done by Hurry for the purpose of selling to a party with whom he was in partnership. This is a grave and serious charge against an Assignee. But it appears that neither Saupin nor Bell were in partnership with Hurry. He indeed had no manner of interest in the sale and did not even know of it. They then charge collusion with Rogers. I will put it on the evidence in point of law: suppose that the law did not allow a purchase on the part of Saupin from Burkinyoung, but that Burkinyoung swears that he considered he was doing the best that could be done for the estate, is he thereupon to be visited with the costs of the whole proceedings! But I contend the sale is not illegal. I contend that if Mr. Saupin made his claim this Court must decree a specific performance

But it is said there is an offer by Greig of twenty thousand rupees. Well suppose there was an offer to the Bank, it was never communicated to the Assignees. If Saupin's offer had been refused would they not have turned round and said "is not this the value fixed on the factory by Ballard?" It is said that this factory should have been put up to auction. In this case such a mode of proceeding would have been most injudicious. They have an opportunity of selling this little factory at the price set upon it. Suppose they had said no we will put it up to auction. In the mean time Greig goes and renews the izarah in his own name—the factory would have been at Mr. Greig's feet. His money was as good to the zemindar as another's, and it was worth Greig's while to give three thousand rupees more. Saupin stated that this factory was his only means of livelihood—he had no other means of living—he might have retained it for two years in his own hands without purchase. I say that it was incumbent on Burkinyoung to sell if he could.
The object of this proceeding was solely and purely the gratification of the spite of Greig against Burkinyoung and to ruin Saupin. One of the things that appeared was that he said Saupin was a damned little Frenchman and he would ruin him. Is this evidence to strengthen the accusation of corruption against the Assignees?

The correspondence relating to the sale in question, the several affidavits made by the different parties, and other documents, were read at great length, the substance of which has already appeared in the Journal in our report of the proceedings in this matter in the Insolvent Court.—See pp. 22 to 27.

Mr. COCHRANE addressed the Court on behalf of the appellants and after briefly alluding to the numerous

s connected with the proceeding now before ırt, he assured their Lordships that his clients had clination to throw difficulties in the way of investition; but in this Court, as in the Court below, they gladly gave their aid and assistance in promoting any enquiry conducive to the interests of the estate. They appealed however against this order, and he (the learned Counsel) would be able to shew that they had good grounds whereon to rest their opposition. Independent of any legal question or doctrine of law, what the Court had to decide was simply whether the Assignees at the time of the sale were acting for the real interests of the estate, and whether they did that which any other prudent persons would have done acting in the same character. If he could prove, and he apprehended it would be an easy task, that what his clients had done was to the best of their judgment and for the benefit of the estate, then he could anticipate their lordships' decision in their favour. But what was the main charge? It is this, that with the knowledge of an offer of 20,000 Rs for that part of the factory called the Neeschunderpore and Hautparah factories, and of a previous offer of Rs 70,000 for the large concern—that when a larger offer could have been obtained they agreed to dispose of the Neeschunderpore concern to Mr. Saupin for a smaller sum. This however is not all, there are other accusations of neglect in the management of the estate and secrecy in the disposal of a portion of it. He would answer the principal charge first, and what, he asked, was there in support of it? The only practicles of evidence were two letters, the first said to have been written in December, 1833, by Greig, but there is not the slightest evidence to shew that his clients were acquainted with its existence, on the contrary there is every thing to contradict that supposition. But first what is the question for consideration? No matter if it is alleged the Assignees have committed a breach of trust to any extent?
the question is whether they were legally right—whether the sale can be supported, and not whether they did wrong in refusing a larger sum six months previously offered; for the rule is to shew cause why the sale should not be rescinded; and he was not there to defend the conduct of the Assignees though indeed he should find no difficulty in doing so. Taking that into consideration there was no evidence impugning the conduct of his clients. All that was put forth consisted of two letters dated December, 1833, and January, 1834, the last of which he acknowledged, if it had been traced to the Assignees, would leave them no ground on which to rest a defence in this Court. Then came the question what evidence is there that the letter was received by the Assignees? Simply this: Greig says it was sent to them by the post, but there is not a particle of evidence to shew that it ever came to hand; and with a knowledge that letters touching purchases to the extent of 20,000 Rs do not often miscarry, there is no attempt to prove that it was ever received at the post office or sent out from thence. Indeed their lordships, when he came to touch upon other acts of the party alluded to, would have no difficulty in judging how far the assertion was likely to be true. But it did not even rest there; both Mr. Burkinyoung and his co-Assignee denied having received the letter dated the 13th January, nor had they any knowledge whatever of the offer it was alleged to contain. Here then so far is no evidence in the case which fixed the Assignee with a knowledge of a better offer for the factory; if however he was mistaken he must leave it to his friends to prove the contrary. Before he came to argue in support of the legality of the sale and the propriety of the Assignees disposing of the factory, it would perhaps be the better course to draw their lordships attention to the nature of the charges which in the letter of the 4th October are distinctly levelled against his clients; and here he thought it would not be unimportant to show the anxiety manifested by Mr. Greig not only to impugn the character of the Assignees but to destroy the factory itself. If he could satisfy their lordships on these two points, he thought it would not be unimportant, and that he could do so was beyond the possibility of doubt. First what appears in the petition? Greig at the commencement alleged that there has been no valuation of the factory whatever. Now what turns out to be the fact? On the 11th January, 1833, the Insolvent Court issues an order for the valuation of the factories, a month a they are valued at Rs. 60,000 which is afterwa.

creased to 70,000. So much for the allegation th.
valuation whatever is made. Had the valuation remain without alteration at Rs. 60,000 for the whole concern, then he apprehended that Rs. 16,000 would be a larger sum than the valuation which would be fixed upon the Neeschundpore portion of it; and as it is with an increase of Rs. 11,000 to the amount at first considered equivalent to the whole. It must be remembered that the other portions were profitable, and that Neeschun-derpore was alone the loosing concern, and that Saupin, the lease being on the point of expiry, bought the interest liable to a contingency; for had Saupin not closed with the zemindar, Greig might, as he certainly would, have obtained a renewal of the izarah and left the Assignees with the bare walls of their factory surrounded by lands cultivated for the profit of another individual. But Greig's malevolence had been Saupin's protection. The Court would find that intelligence of Greig's endeavours to procure a renewal of the izarah had been conveyed to Saupin, and if the latter had not pursued the course which he had done, the Assignees instead of receiving Rs. 15,000 for the factory would have been left without an izarah with the bare walls of a factory not worth 4,000 Rs. He would now call their lordships' attention to another part of Greig's conduct. That person in his correspondence with the Assignees alleged that Saupin had deceived them with a false statement regarding the sum of Rs. 10,000 demanded for the renewal of the lease. The Assignees without placing reliance on Greig's assertion wrote to Saupin calling on him to prove what he has alleged. Saupin is advised of Greig's offers to the zemindar and closes at once with the latter for that sum. So much for the charge that Saupin had deceived the Assignees. Again their lordships had been saved from hearing a repetition of Greig's expressions alluding to Saupin, but he (the learned Council) would put it to any man to say whether they did not show hatred of the man, animosity of the party, and an object to attain. As to the question of a partnership between Mr. Hurry and Mr. Bell, which Mr. Justice Grant in his decision in the Insolvent Court pronounced to have terminated beyond all doubt before the sale of the factory to Saupin, and with reference to costs and to the opinion expressed by that learned Judge that the Assignees had expected or courted the moving of the creditors' parties to the letter of Cockerell and Co. in the Insolvent Court." Exparte Aberdeen Graham, and Toogood in the matter of Howard and Gibbs v. Deacon and Chelty, wherein it was decided that Assignees are bound to furnish a creditor, who has proved, with a copy of their account, it he offers to pay the expense of making such copy, and the Lord Chancellor ordered the petitioners to pay the costs of the petition and the Assignees to be paid their costs out of the Estate. Exparte Montgomerie and others in the matter of Russell and others v. Glyn and Jameson was also in point, which was an application by creditors to restrain the Assignee from a sale of the Bank-rupt's stock in trade and lease. The Chancellor on consideration stayed the order as regarded the sale and was clearly of opinion that the Court ought not to interfere to stay the sale because the Assignees act at their own risk and upon their own responsibility; and they and not the Court are to be Judges of the propriety and expediency of sale. As to the property not having been put up at auction it was decided in exparte Herley in the mat- ter of Ramsay v. Deacon and Chelty that the Court will make an order on a petition of the Assignees to sell any part of the Bankrupt's property by private contract, it being a matter in which they must use their own discretion.

Now let us come to the broad question of whether it was a sale at all. Let us see what is the actual evidence of sale. That must be derived either from parties present at the transaction, or immediately connected therewith. Now, who were they?—Burkinyoung, Alexander, and Saupin. It is admitted on all hands that Sau-pin should buy with the understanding that he was to sell a part to a third party. What motive or inducement was there then for the imputed secrecy? If secrecy were really the object, where would be the object in taking every means to inform the whole world? Bur-kinyoung's account of the transaction is perfectly clear, words of Burkinyoung coincide with the na.

of business and the strong probabilities of fa.
so the evidence of Storm, which independently recrimination contained in his correspondence with A ander, is at variance alike with consistency and p. bability. Storm cannot recollect the particulars of his conversation with Alexander; he goes running about the town all day, making his enquiries, and at length gets the plain truth from Burkinyoung; he knew that Rogers was to have the one factory, and knowing all this he notwithstanding has the effrontery to say that he does not believe Mr. Saupin.

As to another point, a party who is desirous of opening the biddings must bring the money to Court. According to Mr. Sugden, in his work upon venders, it is the aim of the Court to enhance the value of the estate, and parties seeking to open the sale must bring in the money.
Again notice of such application must be given to the party purchasing; we say we have no such notice, and however ready we may be to abide by the decision of this Court, still no decree made behind our backs can or ought to affect us.

To revert to the questions of agency. Is it asserted that that relation arises out of the circumstance of being manager of the Neeschunderpore factory; I ask if there is any principle of law or equity which goes to prevent one partner selling to another his share of the mutual property? Had Alexander and Co. continued solvent what was to prevent their selling to Saupin? If his situation as manager vitiated the contract, probably half the transactions by which indigo factories are and have been transferred in this country would be void and nugatory. But it is said because he was managing partner he was an agent and therefore incapable of buying for him self. In support of this position Lord Harris's case, as it is called, has been cited. But in that case the objection was that the party was attorney for the commission of Bankruptcy as well as agent for Lord Harris. If the objection of agency would apply to Saupin, it would equally apply to a Captain of a ship, a sleeping partner in a firm, who would be precluded from buying out the co-partners. A ship's Captain must be more intimately and minutely acquainted with the real value and worth of the vessel he commands than the owners, and yet would it be said that he was therefore incapable of purchasing? The grand distinction which separates one case from the whole class of cases of purchase by agent, is the perfect bonâ fide, the absence of all fraud in the transaction.

In reference to the power of this Court to rescind the sale under the 49th section of the Insolvent Act, I would urge that by that section the Court is empowered to control, to delay or postpone an intended sale, but that no power is thereby given to rescind a sale already concluded; at least so far concluded that a specific performance of the contract could be compelled.

Now as to that part of the order which directs the costs are not to come out of the estate, this is equivalent to granting costs against us, which conveys a direct imputation upon the character of the trustees, which neither these secondly, because the sale is complete and

…gh the Act gives authority to control or prevent a
, it does not convey a power of rescinding a sale al-
…ady completed. As to the first objection no doubt there were other co-lessees—Saupin, Terraneau and Albert, but what was put up to sale? why the interest of Alexander and Co. alone.

As to the objection that the sale is complete, and therefore cannot be interfered with whether it be complete or no, must depend upon the construction of the Act of Parliament. By the 49th section of the Insolvent Act, the Assignees are empowered to sell under the control of the Court. Whether this control is to be confined to antecedent measures I cannot say; all I can say is that there is no limitation expressed, and in the common sense and meaning of language, the Court may interpose its control any period of time whilst the sale is going on, and forbid the conveyance. I say this contract in question is not complete nor such as a Court of Equity would compel a specific performance of, and therefore that the power of controlling and rescinding it is fully and clearly given by the Act of Parliament. Suppose a collusive sale be hurried through and the deeds hastily executed before such control can be exerted; shall it be said that there shall be no redress or compensation for the loss sustained by the estate?

I now come to the material grounds of my objection to the validity of the sale of these factories to Saupin, and the points I chiefly rely upon are these.

1st. The great negligence and betrayal of their duty by the Assignees.

2dly. That Saupin was an agent and sold to himself.

3dly. That there were frauds in the transaction which of themselves are sufficient to vitiate the contract.

Now I will not dispute the right of the Assignees to select such mode of sale—public or private—as they might deem most advantageous to the estate; I will not with or without a case in point, or a Chancellor's dictum to support the position, deny that Assigness are left free to exercise their own judgment, and use their own discretion; but then let it be understood that they do so upon their own responsibility also. There can be no man less inclined than myself to advance or maintain that trustees who act for the best, and do all that they think most beneficial to the estate, should be liable for the consequences of a mere error in judgment. If it can be shewn that these or any other trustees have exerted themselves as well as they were able, and have done their utmost to fulfil their duty according to their honest notion of that duty, a mistake in law, or an erroneous exercise of the discretion entrusted to them, might and indeed ought to be overlooked.

But where, to use the softest terms, I perceive gross indifference and carelessness in the fulfilment of a trust—why I necessarily say indifference and carelessness are no errors of judgment, arise not out of want of discretion—they are direct direlictions of duty, and such as the …st be made responsible for. Moreover, it is to …e in mind that the trustee in question derived a …derable income from this office; it is therefore a …n corollary of law, that at least they were bound to …ake as much care of the estate they had to manage as of their own. Had they however paid as much regard to the interests of their employers, as they would to their own or as any man of ordinary prudence would exercise in his own affairs, they surely would have taken some pains to effect a sale in the most beneficial manner. Which of us who should happily terminate his pilgrimage to the east, and be enabled to return to Europe if we had estates to sell before we left, would not take at least the common and ordinary means of making known that such a sale was to take place, of inviting public attention and of stimulating the competition of purchasers? I will venture to say not one, the most careless of us all. Surely any man of less than ordinary prudence would at least advertise what he wished to dispose of; but what were the exertions made to inform the public that their factories were to be sold? What says Mr. Alexander? Your lordships will recollect the sale took place on the 25th August, 1834. Mr. Alexander says the sale was advertised up to October, 1833. During all that interval there was no advertisements. Is that the line of conduct a man would adopt when seeking a purchaser for property of his own?

Another material consideration to be attended to is that Saupin in the month of January, 1834, comes down and gives intimation that the izarah which they pretend was the cause of the hasty private sale without advertising, must be renewed; and after all that has been said of the pressing emergency of the case, the izarah was not then renewed, nor in fact till subsequent to the sale in the month of August.

In 1833, an application was made to the Insolvent Court for a sale on the part of the Bank of Bengal, who were mortgagees of the property. At that time Greig had offered 20,000 rupees for the factories in question; but the Bank applied for a sale of the whole. In reference to that order Alexander says "when the order was known we made no effort to sell." Let us now look to Burkinyoung's conduct, as respects negligence. He says "we are not in the habit of enquiring for purchasers"—the next sentence is in exculpation, "we are ourselves daily enquired of"; on being asked however by whom, he mentions only Captain Vint, and can recollect no one else—would he have acted thus in respect to his own property? He says there were no advertisements of Hautparah from January to the time of sale. I can shew that as it was, the property might have been sold at a better price. Towards the end of the year 1833, Greig offered 20,000 Rs.; but my friend says this does not bear on the negligence alleged in the present sale of 1834. Now I protest against the doctrine that in the investigation by a Court of Equity into the conduct of their officers they must not take the whole of that conduct as affecting the trust into their consideration. In such a case this Court sitting as a Court of Equity is not bound or confined by technical niceties. In reference to Greig's offer however, my friends allege that it was made to ruin Saupin, and that it matters little what an angry man may say. My friends have certainly not been sparing of the character of Mr. Greig; but whatever they say of his conduct, he was ready at that time to pay down 20,000 rupees for the factory; it is quite clear therefore that it was worth more than it was sold for.

Burkinyoung says, "I have heard that an offer was made to the Bank of 70,000 rupees for all their factories. The Bank requested our concurrence, but we did not consider this an offer that we were bound to accede to, it being coupled with other observations." In giving evidence on the letter he says "I cannot speak precisely—the general contents were to this effect, that there were three factories for the sale of all which application would be made to the Court, we did not therefore think proper to sell one separately. Why? it is not difficult to infer; their functions had then ceased, Othello's occupation then were gone and his salary would cease. Again he says we gave the Bank no answer for the reason abovementioned,—that must be the reason I have just specified and the meaning of their language is this, "the Bank have offended us, they won't give us our own time, they talk of applying to the Court so we won't sell till we get the order." Now I ask when such an offer is made to the Bank and communicated to the Assignees they take no notice of it nor make any reply, is not this full evidence of gross negligence without going any further! Now Alexander says he had no direction to refer parties to the Bank, so here we have a set of Assignees who give their Secretary no direction to refer parties to the Bank in a matter of such importance—was not this great negligence!

Another point to be attended to is this: Saupin had applied the year previous to the Bank for these two factories for which he offered 10,000 rupees—the Bank refused on the score of inadequacy of price: this was communicated to the Assignees and yet in the following July they ask him, Saupin, to renew his former offer. It is said that they knew nothing of Donaldson and Greig having offered 20,000 rupees. We certainly cannot bring home to them direct knowledge, but if I will concede to my friend Mr. Cochrane that when a letter is put into the post the general inference may be drawn that its communications have reached their destination, I think I may demand a similar concession in respect of the inference to be drawn from the circumstances affecting this knowledge. Alexander says "I have an indistinct recollection of Donaldson calling, and I referred him to the Bank." Now can any man doubt that he did go to the Assignees—that he made his proposal and then went to the Bank. If he did not so refer him the Assignees are answerable for the conduct of their servant; now what are the grounds that they set up! First, that the Bank got a general order and by some strange obliquity of construction they infer they could not make a partial sale—now I ask if Burkinyoung's statement be not a mere excuse!

We now come to the izarah. The izarah is nothing more than a lease for years paying rent to the zemindars—in some cases the zemindar requires an advance—this has been made much of, but let us see how the matter stands when stated accurately. My friend has read a letter from the zemindar or his manager dated in September, 1834, stating that he the zemindar had a disposition to grant the izarah, the ground rent being 3,500 rupees, without any advance—now this is a fortnight after the sale and yet they say the sale was precipitated lest the izarah should be denied. Now what is the izarah! It is a lease or rent:—sometimes an advance is made upon its renewal, not by way of fine as is sometimes the case in England on the renewal of a lease, but a sum to be deducted from the future rent.

The next material point is, that Saupin was an agent, and not only an agent but a manager of the concern as appears by Alexander's evidence—Saupin says so himself in his own deposition. Now it needs no elaboration of legal argument to shew that the Steward of an estate is not exactly the party to purchase nor to establish a something more, that is to say that a Court of Chancery would not recognize him as a purchaser. Now we find that Greig had a factory contiguous to those in question—and it may be said, and indeed has been said, that Greig would offer more than these last were worth in order to injure Saupin. If it were so what had Alexander and Co.'s Assignees to do with Greig's motives! It was their business to encourage competition; whether Greig's offer proceeded from malignity or no it was their duty to do the best for the estate. If Saupin did not inform them that Greig, Storm and Bell were likely to become purchasers he did not do his duty as agent; if he did inform them they neglected theirs as Assignees. We will revert once more to the Agency question. We have a communication from Alexander, seen and authorized by Burkinyoung, constituting Saupin their agent—they now say he was not their agent, but before they saw the bearing and effect of his agency they insited that he was so. Mr. Cochrane says that Storm was running about the town from place to place and came late in the evening to Burkinyoung's; why, what does this evidence prove but his zeal to make the purchase. But let us look to the terms of Alexander's communication. "I am directed by the Assignees to inform you that yesterday they gave Mr. Saupin the power to sell Neeschunderpore and Hatpaurah, and that he has secured a purchaser at 15,000 rupees. Mr. Storm did think himself ill used and well he might. My friend Mr. Cochrane says that there was a difference between these parties and so truly there was. The learned Advocate-General here read several passages from the correspondence of a recriminatory nature and proceeded—Storm says "I wanted to purchase this factory because it adjoins my own and in some degree interferes therewith. Alexander told me it was not sold, it was still open to me. I ask'd for a slip of paper upon which to write my tender, he said to-morrow will be time enough." Storm could not wait, he went to Rogers and wrote an offer of 5,500 rupees; and not finding Alexander at the office, he sent him his offer with his card. At half past 5 o'clock he goes to Burkinyoung and asks if more were offered could he amend his tender; he is told that he will receive an answer to his tender the next morning but not a word is said of its having been sold or bargained for.

Saupin is shewn to have been the agent by Alexander, by Burkinyoung and by his own statement,—and I maintain that his conduct and that of the Assignees, however morally right or wrong, amounted to a legal fraud. Burkinyoung says, that Saupin said Bell would take one part and Rogers the other; but what says Rogers! why, that he bought it for François Saupin. If no fraud or deceit was contemplated where was the necessity for all this manœuvering and circuity of proceeding! Do men ever use a fictitious name but for some sinister purpose, or when two parties combine to deceive a third! No. According to every principle of human nature a man acts openly unless he has an underhand design.

In this case the ordinary rule of law respecting agents is not applicable. What is our charge! It is that the Assignee allowed Saupin to buy, at an under price, an estate of which he must have known the full value. Saupin states that 5 or 6 months before he and Bell agreed to take the factory, and that he (Saupin) was to be Bell's manager. If then he became agent to the Assignees he became agent for two parties of opposite interests. Mr. Greig states in his affidavit that the day before Saupin came down to Calcutta he saw Saupin at his own house. His account of that interview is no doubt contradicted by Saupin; but his statement is that Saupin represented Neeschunderpore as of little value, and always a losing concern. Now Saupin denies that he deteriorated the property but admits that he saw Greig. He never tells the latter he is going to buy. We have Greig's offer to Saupin to take him to manage under Greig if he bought; yet Saupin conceals his intention from Greig. Again does he communicate to the Assignees Greig's wish to purchase! If he did not he betrayed his duty as agent; if he did what shall we say of the Assignees.

Your Lordships have heard a great deal about the renewal of the izarah. Alexander, in his letter and evidence, states that Saupin said there must be ten thousand rupees in advance; the same is asserted by Burkinyoung. I attach, I must say, no very great weight to affidavits got up under such circumstances. But they state that ten thousand was the sum required to be advanced by the zemindar as first stated by Saupin. But what says Saupin now? He says from 8 to 10 thousand.

I would avoid as much as possible any lengthened argumentation on the point at law, but as the question of agency and the power of an agent to purchase for himself has been so much dwelt upon, your lordships will permit me to say a few words on that head. In the case of Brooke and Rothschild, J. Symond's report, a broker was employed to effect a sale of foreign stock by Rothschild; the broker took the shares for himself and partners. Here the question was whether such sale would stand good. The Court expressed itself that the least that could be said was that as Rothschild constituted the party agent to sell he was bound to sell to a third party. Had Rothschild been satisfied, the contract would have been concluded. A ratification might have been, in that case, in ours it could not.

In Mr. Sugden's book on venders, under the head of purchases by agents, trustees, &c., it is said that it may be laid down as a rule that agents, commissioners of bankrupts, assignees under commission, and other persons similarly situated and having better means than others of accurately knowing the value of estates, are incapable of becoming purchasers; for if persons confidentially employed, were allowed to purchase they would have a strong inducement to conceal whatever would tend to enchance the value. A person cannot be both agent and principal. He cannot serve two masters. From the common frailty of human nature one who has the power, will be induced to use it at the expense of his employers.

I think, my lords, I have therefore shwewn in this transaction at least that which is denominated legal fraud; I think that I have at least shewn that negligence exists far beyond that which any man of ordinary prudence manifests in the conduct of his own affairs; and I think I have clearly shewn that that property has been disposed of for fifteen thousand rupees which at the least was worth twenty thousand.

Mr. Prinsep.—The first point to be considered is whether your Lordships have the power to rescind, as it is called, the sale in question. By the 49th section of the Insolvent Act, the Assignees are directed to make sales subject to the control of the Court, in case application be made by the Insolvent's creditors, in which case the Court has power to control the sale or make such order as they shall see fit. This in fact is a greater authority than is given under the Baukrupt Act. I apprehend under this authority the duty of the Court to be, if the sale contemplated be shewn to be injurious to the estate, to interfere in whatever stage the contract may be, and set it aside. All parties must be considered to have notice of the power of the Court, to control and put a stop to an improper contract for the purchase of property belonging to the estate.

In reference to the question of agency, in Lord Harris's case not only that an agent for the seller cannot buy for himself, but cannot buy for a friend or another employer. General Harris was a stranger to the transaction, and no manner of fraud was imputable to him. Yet the property was ordered to be put up again at the accumulated price, so that if it did not fetch more it should stand good for what had been offered—so it is always in such circumstances; the contract stands good as against the purchaser; not in his favor.

The next question is whether this sale was not effected under circumstances of great negligence on the part of the Assignees, and of concealment on the part of Saupin.

This was the situation in which the concern stood.

The Assignees were advancing the whole, or $\frac{16}{16}$ with an interest of only $\frac{5}{16}$; it was therefore advantageous for the estate to sell as soon as possible. But what do the Assignees? They neglect to advertize; they neglect to take the usual and ordinary methods for making known to purchasers that the factories were for sale? they neglect the offer of 70,000 rupees for the whole, to the proposal of which they did not condescend to make a reply.

Saupin says that the first demand from the zemindar was in April, and that he would not let him cultivate without an advance. No enquiries are made as to the desire of purchasing in the proprietors of the surrounding factories: such is the urgency of the case, the Assignees say at once—"If you can get 15,000 rupees we will take it." When he said 10,000 must be advanced on account of the renewal of the izarah they said they would rather sell than make advances, and recommended him to purchase or rather to renew his former offer. Almost before Saupin leaves the office comes Storm with an offer of 5,500 for Hautparah. Saupin says that he only intended to buy part for himself and part for another party; he therefore acknowledges that he was agent to sell, with a knowledge of a higher price being offered. This is precisely the case of Lord Harris's agent in exparte Bennett so often referred to. He sees Mr. Storm, who offers 5,500, he never informs the parties but goes and buys for a less sum. I say that all this exhibits nothing but a long series of gross negligence.

The parties seem to have been aware that there were plenty of competitors ready to come into the market, if they had notice of the intended sale; but no attempt whatever was made to communicate such notice.

There is a great disparity between written depositions and viva voce examinations; the latter carry with them, for very many reasons, infinitely more weight, and tend far more strongly to produce a well founded conviction. Now what do all say in their evidence? That on the 25th of August Saupin came to Burkinyoung—Alexander was there. Saupin urges the necessity of renewing the izarah; that 10,000 rupees advance was necessary to get it: that Greig would get it if they did not. What was the fact! The lease expired in March, it was not till June following that the zemindar said you shall not cultivate without renewal. Again the month of August is just the very worst time for effecting a sale of this kind of property; but even then there might have been competition if it had been looked after. There were Rogers, Storm, and Cockerell close at hand; but none of them are applied to, nor is it ever enquired of Mr. Udny, the Secretary of the Bank, where were the parties to be found who made the former offer. I give them their choice of these two suppositions: either Saupin was an agent or he was not. If they knew he was not an agent why did they deceive the creditors and state that he had found a purchaser? But if they knew him to be a principal, can there be a doubt who under such circumstances is to blame and who ought to pay the costs?

Much stress has been laid upon the advance demanded by the zemindar. This is nothing more than a payment of rent before hand, and is in some instances demanded; but we have other evidence than the assertion of Saupin that in this case no such demand could have been insisted on, as six months subsequently are found the zemindar or his agent pressing for a renewal without any mention of an advance; what blame can attach either to Mr. Greig or to the zemindar that upon the approach of the season for cultivation the one should seek for a lessee, and the other for the izarah?

Mr. Turton rose to reply. My learned friend has stated that at the commencement of this argument I promised to expatiate largely upon the question under discussion. I do not remember having made that promise, but if such were the case I shall do my utmost to avoid keeping my word.

There is one preliminary observation respecting the order as is stands which ought to be brought under notice, that is to say that it has been altered from the original terms in which it was drawn without our being called upon to show cause against such alteration. I may observe that upon the face of this order the contract is treated as subsisting and conclusive upon the parties entering into it, but an objection at once presents itself that this order had been altered subsequently to its being drawn up and deliverd upon a petition presented by the solicitor to the original petition. The order as it orginally stood was that the Assignees should be restrained from concluding the sale in question and from effecting a sale—a subsequent petition was presented to alter the terms of this order.

Mr. Justice Grant.—One party petitioned thinking it not the order intended by the Court; I persued it and altered it as it now stands.

Mr. Turton.—As this objection would only lead to a question of another hearing I shall wave it for the purpose of forwarding the objects of all parties. The order is that the Assignees be restrained from selling or proceeding further in the sale of the factories of Neeschunderpore and Hautparah to Saupin until they had been put up to public auction. It is not my intention to draw nice distinctions regarding the jurisdiction of the Court, but I must deduce from the very words of this order an admission that the contract was a subsisting and conclusive one, as otherwise it would be impossible to say that the parties should not execute the deeds until the properties had been put up to auction. It must have been considered a valid contract. I dispute the right of this Court to make an order affecting Saupin who is not before it, but the interests of three persons were to be affected by this order—Saupin, Terraneau and Bell. So that the Court direct that the Assignees of parties holding only five-sixteenths of the state, as my learned friend Mr. Prinsep has repeatedly impressed upon us—and without the assent of other partners or the person to whom the property has been sold, to put up the whole to public auction. If I put up my friend's property to sale I must convey though I have no actual right; the Assignees therefore, though they have but five sixteenths and that encumbered with the rights of others are directed to convey the whole. Supposing Saupin to have acted in any manner they choose to allege, it could not convert his joint property into the sole property of the assignees. The order further says that if Saupin is not recognized as the purchaser after such resale and should reconvey the property than that Hurry and Burkinyoung should refund what he had advanced in part payment, he accounting for the mean profits. Now there is another case very possible; suppose that there was a loss or expenditure on the part of Saupin, the Court would have provided for that; but no, not a word upon such contingency. But let us suppose they had put up to sale and desired Saupin to reconvey, supposing that he should say "no"—he actually does say so—in what a situation are we then? we cannot convey. If he has incurred loss or undergone expense there is no provision in the order for such contingency, and if we barely refund the money he has paid in, he will not of course reconvey upon such terms: no the order says that if no person overbids the 10,000 rupees he should be the purchaser. There is no such compulsion in similar cases in the Court of Chancery except as affecting agents to the commission—there is no pretence in Lord Harris's case to bind him by such terms. I contend that neither an insolvent Court nor a Court of Star Chamber could make this order upon persons not even summoned before them; yet this order tells two persons not brought before them to do acts involving their own interests without bringing them before it. If this decision were attempted to be used before the Supreme Court they would there say we could not listen to such an order—by the English Law no party can be affected by it who are not before the Court.

Mr. Justice Grant.—The Insolvent Court did not consider itself as deciding upon the rights of Saupin and Bell, it acted merely as superintending the conduct of its own officers.

Mr. Turton.—I submit that the order is inconsistent with the ordinary proceedings in such cases. Saupin is restricted from purchasing whilst he is obliged to give up the purchase already made.

Mr. Justice Grant.—It was the opinion of the Court that the Assignees could not sell to Saupin at all.

Mr. Turton.—Saupin might surely purchase at public auction. If it were not for this order he not only could have bought at public auction but might have commenced by bidding 5,000 Rs- instead of 10,000, but I contend that the Assigness might compel him to a specific performance of his contract. But when one party pays half the purchase money and gets possession he will naturally rest on his oars and leave the other party to take the first step. The parties here had the consent of creditors to sell by private or public sale, but I ask if it is not the very worst way that could be adopted to consult those interested either in holding off or hastening on the sale. Every purchaser here has a great interest one way or the other. An Assignee had better rely on his own judgment than rely on the advice of one party or the other. In nine cases out of ten his judgment would be warped, he could not call together a meeting of the creditors without many of them having a direct interest in the properties being bought or sold. In such cases the Assignee should consult neither side, having the general consent of all. The question here is, it is true, whether the Assignees should pay out of his own pocket 5,000 Rs-, but it involves a question of a far more serious nature, that of character. They would far rather have paid the five thousand rupees themselves and have done with the matter. But it is my duty here to shew that this order ought never to have been made. In respect of the case exparte Bennett I cannot see the equity that governs that case or that a person is bound to puff a sale. It is elsewhere said by the same authority that such puffing is a fraud upon the purchaser. He, the agent, says the Lord Chancellor, was bound to do the most. He knew that more could have been got. Now supposing that Lord Harris had come in and said "he had altered his mind and would not give more than 10,000," what was to be done then?

Mr. Justice Grant.—I do not suppose that Lord Eldon meant that he was to get more by puffing, but that having an interest he put himself in such a situation that he could not become a purchaser.

Mr. Turton.—Now as to the question of agency my learned friend has scarcely touched upon that. He has read two or three detached passages from letters without the context. Here questions of agency, fraud, negligence, partnership all came under discussion upon the motion. I ask if it is a fit and proper course to bring these on a motion exparte? Montgomery 3rd Glyn and Comyn 338—that was an application on the ground that the interest of creditors required a sale not to take place suddenly and that it was the intention of the Assignees to suffer a covered purchase in favour of friends—the Chancellor thought that he could not interfere unless upon a guarantee of indemnification to the Assignees: this brought to his recollection that in the present case the party opening the biddings will advance on the price. In this case no security was given to indemnify the Assignees; as I understand your lordship the Insolvent Court can exercise a more extensive jurisdiction than the Bankruptcy Court.

Mr. Justice Ryan.—The question as to power and jurisdiction is confined to the 49th section of the Insolvent Act.

Mr. Turton.—I admit as respects Assignees but not as affecting third parties; the Court here have not the power of doing more than delay or control the contract previous to actual sale.

Mr. Justice Grant.—I may say that my opinion was that the Insolvent Court had this power—a power distinguished from the Bankruptcy provisions.

Mr. Turton.—I admit a distinction but maintain that all acts of Parliament must be looked at as only having relation to parties within the jurisdiction. I maintain, moreover, that this clause does not extend to sales actually completed, and concluded. The clause conveys a power to delay or to postpone and make such orders regulating such sales as the Court shall think fit. There is no power to control parties out of the Court's jurisdiction. The Court may order to sell by private contract or to sell by public auction—these and such as these are within the competency of the Court's authority; but the Court have not power to say such and such a party shall not bid. The legislative would not pretend to give a power to the Court which it was not possible for it to enforce. But how could the Court proceed against Saupin, Terraneau and Albert! Again it is directed that the lease granted by the zemindar should be transferred to a third party, but the Court does not know if it is capable of such assignment. Suppose the zemindar would not accept of the party—hated him—would not be troubled with him—and says "would turn him out instanter" —can this Court or any other Court force the zemindar to take him as his tenant? Besides on every transfer on this nature there is a salamee fee and other disbursements not provided for by the order.

My learned friends have dwelt much upon the superiority of oral testimony to written affidavits, what then becomes of the affidavit of Greig which is flatly contradicted by such testimony! In defiance of his own maxim, my learned friend maintains that the affidavit of Greig is to be taken rather than the oath of two witnesses. It is clear that Greig is the client in this cause and not the parties nominally appearing; for if there had been negligence such as is imputed and the object were to serve the creditors not to harrass and ruin Saupin, the obvious method to be adopted would have been to have had the matter referred to the Examiner to ascertain for how much more the estate might have been sold, and then to have compelled the Assignees to make good the difference, and if they thought proper to have them turned out. The proceedings that have been adopted clearly show that Greig is my learned friend's client, not the creditors; that they are advocating his malignity, not their benefit. And now with respect to the outcry for not selling at an earlier period. Without the Bank's concurrence they could not sell at all. In the September previous they accepted 15,000 rupees from Saupin, they communicated this offer to the Bank, who say no, that the price is not adequate—indigo had risen;—did that rise continue? Was such a precarious estimate a ground to refuse an offer for a concern which, according to Alexander's statement, was not only unprofitable but losing? Moreover than this, they were constantly pressed to sell. They never refused to sell at an adequate price; but when an adequate, or what approached to an adequate, price was offered they would not have been justified in refusing it. This, as I have said before, is a question of character. It has been asserted that the Assignees, when they closed with Saupin, knew that there was a better offer in the market. If they knew that, let their characters be stigmatized as it ought ; but this cannot be shewn, and who shall say that there is a particle of credible evidence to shew this. Then let not the conduct of the Assignees any longer labour under imputations—imputations deriving force and influence as proceeding from the bench, of doing one thing and contriving another ; of acting ostensibly to the world in a manner directly at variance with their secret and clandestine transactions. Such imputations, falling from a counsel in the heat of argument are nothing ; but proceeding from the deliberation of the judgment seat, they are fatal and blasting. Had such imputations influenced the full bench, the Assignees must have been removed. But that could not be without fraud or gross misconduct, and surely no man or men are ever guilty of fraund or gross misconduct without a motive. No man is ever wicked for wickedness' sake ; or evil from shere love of evil. Greig indeed insinuates that Hurry was his partner and so sells to himself. What was the truth ? Hurry at the time was not even in Calcutta. We at first thought that he had been here though confined to his bed with a fever ; but the real fact was that he had gone down the river for his recovery : during his absence that transaction takes place, and he finds himself saddled with costs, or rather muleted in a fine, for matter of which he had not the remotest knowledge or suspicion.

With respect to my learned friend's doctrine of probabilities, he would establish that an inference deduced from what a man might do in the ordinary or usual course of business, is stronger evidence to substantiate a fact, than the positive and direct oath of two disinterested witnesses ; or in other words that it is more likely that two respectable witnesses should swear falsely than that a man should do that which he probably might do. I speak in reference to the knowlede of the Assignees of the higher offer to the Bank.

Saupin swears that at the time he purchased he did not know of Donaldson's offer—Cockerell swears he does not believe it was communicated—Mr. Udny swears the same ; and yet against this testimony a man's character is to be taken away by a probability.

As to the manner of sale I contend that not only had the Assignees a right to sell by private sale, but that if they had put it up to auction they would have done injury to the estate. In the case of Glass and Wine the order was not to put up to auction, but to have the value ascertained by estimate." My learned friends lay great stress on Mr. Burkinyoung's expression, " we don't look out for purchasers." Why, what could or need they do ? It was a matter perfectly well known to every body interested in purchases of this kind or engaged in indigo.

Once more as to the question of agency. I deny that Saupin was an agent to sell. A man who has been an agent when that character ceases, may become a principal. In Lowther v. Lowther, 13 Vesy's Reports, the agent was employed for the express purpose of selling a picture for his principal ; the painting, the value of which was not previously known, was subsequently to its coming to the agent's hands discovered to be a Titian of great value. The objection to the agent's capacity to purchase for himself in that instance arose from his concealment of the recently discovered and unsuspected value of the article. But in Saupin's case where was the recently discovered or unsuspected value, and where the concealment ?

The same doctrine is held in the case of Coles versus Trecothick, 9 Ves. 234.

I conclude by confiding my case to your lordships' hands trusting that you will not see fit, upon consideration, to confirm this order—that your will not, where parties acting in the character of Assignees have persued the advice given them from the Bench, to sell the estate to the best advantage, visit them with costs ; more especially when such costs do in fact constitute not merely a pecuniary mulct, but convey an imputation against the character of parties, who, in the severest view of the matter, can only be charged with an error in judgment ; and who, in the fair and reasonable construction of their conduct, must be regarded as having done their best, to enhance the value of the estate with the management of which they were entrusted.

The Court took time to consider its determination.—Hurkaru.

INSOLVENT COURT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1835.

The discharge of James Johnson was opposed by Mr. Longueville Clarke, by whom he was cross-examined. The Insolvent denied that he had ever stated to Mr. Gray, the builder, that a house in Cossitollah was his own property, but he admitted, that either he, or persons acting for him, had always received the rents. He said, that he had promised to pay the rents to Messrs. Tulloh and Co., in liquidation of a debt of 1,544 Rs, which money had been borrowed for him from Tulloh and Co. through Mr. Nathaniel Alexander ;—that the promise was only a verbal one, and that he had not paid any of the rent, as the house had been empty ever since. The house had been left to the Insolvent's wife, by her father Mr. Evans ; he could not tell whether the will had been proved, or where it was, or who were the Executors or Trustees ; he had no property of his own whatsoever. Mr. Prinsep, who appeared for the Insolvent, here interposed, and stated, that the will had been proved and was filed in Court ; and after some further questions by Mr. Clarke, the Insolvent was eventually discharged.

The case of Rugooram Gossain, the Banian of the late Firm of Palmer and Co., came next before the Court. On the 8th of August last, an order nisi had been obtained by Mr. Clarke for an adjudication of insolvency against this individual. The proceedings had commenced by an action in the Supreme Court brought by Juggomohun Seal and others, Bankers in the Burra Bazaar, against Ruggooram to recover a sum of 50,651 Rs on five Policies of the Canton Insurance Office, which had been discounted by the plaintiffs for the Calcutta Bank, of which firm Ruggooram was a member. A similar action having been brought by other parties, but the plaintiffs having failed to prove that Rugooram was subjected to the jurisdiction were nonsuited ; upon this the Seals did not proceed in their action, but applied to the Insolvent Court to adjudge that Ruggooram was an Insolvent, under the 10th Section of the Act, on the ground of his being engaged in business as a partner of the Bank, and having absconded to avoid the jurisdiction. On the 29th of August, the Advocate-General and Mr. Clarke applied to make the rule absolute, which was opposed by Mr. Turton on behalf of Ruggooram, when the Court directed that it should stand over till this day, and that witnesses should be examined, the Seals to maintain the affirmative of the issue, that Ruggooram is a person liable to be adjudged to have committed an act of insolvency, and the policies of insurance were ordered to be deposited in Court. The Advocate-General and Mr. Clarke appeared to-day on behalf of the Seals and Mr. Turton and Mr. Sandes on behalf of Ruggooram. A great number of witnesses were in attendance ; the matter however ended in a compromise between the parties, the particulars of which we could not learn ; and rule was discharged, and an order made to deliver up the policies. As great interest was excited respecting this case, we have given this full account, although there has been no public result.

Mr. Smith, the Attorney, made a rule absolute to discharge Alfred Madge, an Insolvent, from all future liability of his debts, on the consent of more than one-half of his creditors in number and amount. He then applied to rescind an order directing the Insolvent to pay to his Assignee one-third of the salary which he received as Uncovenanted Assistant. Mr. Justice Malkin stated, that as this was a novel application, he should take the papers home for consideration. Mr. Clarke having requested to be heard on the point, as he had to make a similar application for other parties, called the attention of the Judge to these words of the 63d Section : " the Court is authorized to order that the insolvent shall be for ever discharged from all liability whatsoever, for, or in respect of such debts so established as aforesaid." Now this order had been made, and the question was, what was to be the extent of its effect? It in all respects resembled a certificate of bankruptcy, and the Insolvent was to be exempt from making payments which he might hereafter acquire. If a sum of money was left to him by will, or given to him by a friend, or he acquired it in trade, it was clearly exempt, and the assignee could not touch it; how then could it be said, that there was a distinction between his future salary, and money obtained in this manner? A salary was the reward of his exertion, and devoting his time to a particular object, so was profit obtained in trade; and if the profits of trade could not be touched, because he was entitled to the full benefits, from employing his time and exertions in business, no more could his salary, or any portion of it, be claimed, which he earned in a similar manner. Mr. Clarke stated, that he could deduce many other arguments, but he did not now wish to go into the question, but merely to put the Court in possession of the view which he entertained on the subject.

James Johnson, Benjamin Richards, Joseph Savigny, Pierre Douchez, Nittoye Cormodar were declared entitled to the benefit of the act and discharged. Alfred E. G. Madge and John Mercado were finally discharged from all liability. ## MISCELLANEOUS NEWS.

CALCUTTA.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.—A periodical, called the Hindu Pioneer, closely resembling in exterior the Literary Gazette and entirely the production of the students of the Hindoo College, has been published. The first number of the work was issued on the 27th August and on the whole reflects great credit on the contributors and editors.

A weekly paper, published in English and Bengalee, and entitled the Satya Badee or Speaker of Truth, is about to be established. The publication will be printed on two sheets of Serampore paper, and will be issued every Monday. The rate of subscription is fixed at one rupee per month.

Mr. Scott, the proprietor and publisher of the Compendium, has put forth a prospectus intimating his intention to issue a daily newspaper on Conservative principles, from the first January next, under the title of "Scott's Gazette and Daily Messenger of British India"—provided a sufficient number of subscribers offer, which we think very doubtful.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.—Information has been received that the ship Coromandel, which left this port for Bordeaux in the middle of August last, put into Pondicherry on the 19th September in a leaky state, after having been obliged to throw a portion of her cargo over board.

A private letter from Singapore mentions that the highest bid made for the Sylph is 6,400 dollars, but that the agents are limited to 9,000.

The timbers of the Sherborne, on her being opened, were found to be in such a very unsound state, that the insurance offices have been induced to cancel their policies, and declare that they will not recognize any claims under them. The following resolution was agreed to at a meeting held on the 13th October, at the invitation and in the office of Rustomjee Cowasjee:—

"That in consequence of the ascertained unseaworthiness of the Sherborne at the period of her departure from this Port in July, 1835, the Insurers in Calcutta do not recognize any claim against the policies granted by them; and that the premiums paid be returned to the policy holders if required."

On the night of the 18th October it blew a perfect hurricane from the South-East. An Arab ship, the Fattle Main, was totally wrecked of Coverdale's Bluff, and 50 lives, including Mr. Birch, the pilot, were lost. Several other vessels received considerable injury and many boats have been stranded.

Captain Land, of the American Ship Edward, on the 5th September, met in the Straits of Gasper the Steamer Jardine, from Aberdeen bound to China. She was rigged as an hermaphrodite brig and had performed her voyage as such, having all her machinery below. She belonged to Mr. Jardine of Canton and was to remain at and ply about that place.

THE COORG RAJAH.—The report published in the Carnatic Chronicle of the Coorg Rajah having effected the massacre of the greatest part of his escort and escaped to some unknown retreat, is totally unfounded. The Rajah is still at Ganjam where he passed the rains, and will proceed to Benares in December or January.

ECCLESIASTICAL.—Accounts have been received from our late venerable Archdeacon, dated in May, stating that although no day had been fixed for his consecration, the patents were nearly ready, and that he had engaged his passage to return to India by the Exmouth.

The Lord Bishop took his departure for Bombay, in the Hattrass pilot vessel, on the 13th October.

The Select Vestry have been summarily dismissed by Government, for resisting the assumption of power by the Lord Bishop over their properties and trusts, and their functions have been vested in the Bishop and the Archdeacon.

The re-building of the Fort Church having been completed on the 10th October, an ordination was held there by the Lord Bishop on the 11th. The service commenced at ten o'clock and was attended by the Governor-General, and the Commander-in-Chief, with their respective staffs, the whole Garrison staff, and a great number of persons from Calcutta. The Bishop preached a sermon, and after the service the ordination took place, for which there were two candidates.

It is stated that the Vicar Apostolic of Madras, Bishop O'Connor, has requested to know what portion of the Indian revenues the Supreme Government is disposed to assign to the Catholic Church, under the clause which Mr. O'Connell procured to be inserted in the Charter, giving a discretionary power to provide for other Christian pastors besides those of the Established Church.

The Court of Rome has annulled the authority hitherto exercised by the Diocesan of Goa over the Roman Catholics in Ceylon, and has appointed Don Françisco Xavier, one of the most distinguished brethren of the Priests of St. Philip of Neri, or Fathers of the Oratory,—who have hitherto administered to the spiritual wants of the Roman Catholics in Ceylon,—Bishop of Thamnacensis and Vicar Apostolic of the Island of Ceylon. The bull of appointment and other credentials, are in the possession of the Vicar Apostolic of Calcutta, the Revd. Dr. St. Leger.

INDIAN TIMBER.—A property has been accidentally discovered in the jarrool timber which will tend greatly to enhance its value. The ship Thalia, Captain Byden, some months ago performed a voyage to Penang without her copper. On the vessel arriving at that port, Captain Byden found that the worms had lodged themselves in her bottom and had attacked and greatly destroyed every species of wood except the jarrool, which was in a perfect state, and untouched by the insects.

MURDER.—An inquest was held on the 1st October on the body of a manjee named Ameer, a native of Chittagong, which was found dreadfully mangled on the plain near Elliott's Tank, on the 30th September. The inquest has been adjourned until Monday next; but it is said that the mooktear of a person with whom the deceased was engaged in a lawsuit, has been arrested, and that circumstances lead to a belief that the perpetrator of the murder will not escape detection.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—The Coroner's inquest which sat on the body of the manjee who was found murdered near Elliott's tank on the 29th September, has returned a verdict of "wilful murder against some person or persons unknown." The mooktear of the man with whom the deceased was engaged in a law suit, has been the leased on security, and a warrant has been taken out for the apprehension of his employer, who has absconded since the perpetration of the murder.

ALLEGED MURDER.—It is stated that another murder has been perpetrated at the Collieries at Omptah; that the police were beaten off twice in attempting to capture the supposed murderer; that the Thanna Jemadar was nearly drowned in effecting his escape from the hands of the friends of the accused party; and that he has, with several others implicated, it is supposed, managed to escape to, and is now secreted in Calcutta.

Mr. C. Betts, proprietor of the collieries at Omptah, has most positively contradicted the above report of the murders at Omptah, and states that it was invented with a view to injure and annoy him, by causing the cessation of his business for a time by the apprehension of his assistants and servants.

THE NEW COINAGE.—The services are about to be clipped about two per cent. more under the pretext of the necessity of uniformity. The new rupee, it appears, is to be considered as representing at par of the sonat rupee all claims upon Government in sonat rupees—i. e. 104-8 for a 100 siccas; but those who have to pay the Government, will have to give 106-10-8 for every hundred siccas.

PUBLIC LIBRARY.—The subdivisions of the Committee are actively proceeding with their labours. Two have sent in their reports to the General Committee, embracing every arrangement connected with the question of shares, the rates of subscription, &c. &c. The other Sub-committee await a reply from Government with reference to the College Library, and must, moreover, shape its proceedings in respect to the purchase of books by the result of the other Sub-committee's enquiries, and by the adoption of their suggestions.

It is stated that Government has liberally consented to transfer to the Public Library the works in the European languages belonging to the library of the College of Fort William.

THE LIBRARIES.—It is said that the Library Building Committee, have addressed or will shortly address the Committee of the Books on the subject of co-operation.

DHURMA SUBHA.—A Dhurma Subha has been established at Nudeea, the directors of which have styled themselves the Ten Thakoors—the Decemviri of Nudeea—and have assumed to themselves judicial functions of a very serious nature. They are reported to hold sittings nearly every morning; at which all offenders of the town and neighbourhood are brought up for trial, for all offences of religious non-conformity, and violation of good morals. Numbers, it is said, have already been subjected to the jurisdiction of this new court. The offenders against morality have been forwarded by the Ten to the Magistrate of Kishnaghur, who has punished them for their several offences, and issued a purwannah to the Thakoors to apprehend all similar transgressors and send them to the thana, to be punished by himself. The offenders against religion the Ten punish themselves, by expelling them from society, separating them from their relatives, and prohibiting the barbers and washermen from rendering them their services: in cases in which the families of the denounced cleave to them, they are deprived of the attendance of the midwives.

PICTURE OF SIR C. METCALFE.—The portrait of Sir C. Metcalfe, a full length one, is nearly finished. Mr. Swain, the East Indian artist who is painting it, has been very successful in catching the expression of placid benignity of the countenance of Sir Charles, and has altogether sketched a very admirable likeness.

INFANT SCHOOL.—A meeting of the Infant School Committee was held on the 6th October at the Bishop's palace, and was attended by Sir Benjamin Malkin and several other influential gentlemen. It appeared by the report which was read that the funds of the institution were very insufficient for meeting the necessary expenditure, and therefore precluded the possibility of affording assistance in the formation of branch schools. Five masters and four mistresses, it was stated, are being instructed to become teachers in other parts of the country and one of the former is reported qualified. A letter from Vizagapatam was read. The residents there, having raised a sum of 600 rupees and a monthly subscription of 70 rupees, for the purpose of forming an Infant School, applied for a suitable master. The Committee nominated Mr. Chick (the master repoited by Mr. Perkins as qualified) to the situation, made a grant of the necessary apparatus for carrying on the school, and offered to bear a portion of the expenses of the passage of Mr. Chick to Vizagapatam. The native school has been completed for the sum of 490 rupees, was opened in July last, and had 40 native infant scholars. The original school consists of 50 children, and another shool is about to be established. Some discussion took place respecting the establishment of a school at Garden Reach, Calcutta, for the children of the higher classes, which it is expected will be attended with very beneficial consequences. Mr. Bateman resigned the Secretaryship, in consequence of his contemplated absence from the presidency, and the Revd. H. Fisher and Captain Marshall were elected joint secretaries and accepted office.

Bacon, Engineers, were ballotted for and elected members. Mr. Stephenson was elected an associate member. Several works in the Malay and Chinese languages and a part of a translation of the Shah Nafmah, were presented, and the secretary read a paper giving a description of a new fossil discovered in the Himalayan mountains. From the drawings which accompanied the sketch, it appeared to be an animal which united many of the properties, as it does the craniological developments, of the elephant, the deer, and the rhinoceros. Some interesting experiments were tried with a new machine recently received from England, for the purpose of illustrating the electric power of the magnet. Sir Benjamin Malkin and Mr. Cameron were proposed as members.

MILITARY RETIRING FUND.—The following is an extract of a letter from an officer of the Madras Army, dated in London the 1st June, regarding the Military Retiring Fund:—

"An order has passed the Court of Directors, and been unanimously agreed to by them, for a plan respecting the Retiring Pensions of Officers of the three Presidencies. I have not been let into the secret of the measure, but have been led to believe it will be most beneficial to the Army at large. The proposed plan of the Directors, and agreed to, is now before the Board of Control, and is expected to meet with the approval of that Board. I understand there is to be a schedule of incomes for retired Officers of 22, 26, 30, and 35 years, and that the incomes will be such as to induce Officers who have served those different periods, to retire from the Service. This will be settled shortly, so you will soon hear of it."

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—A Portuguese while bathing in the river, was seized either by a shark or alligator, and dragged beneath the waves. Some boatmen attempted to rescue the man, and even seized his hands for that purpose, but the ferocious animal tugged with such force that it tore him from them and bore him away.

"FOUR O'CLOCK.—We have just seen a letter from Delhi, announcing the execution of Shumsoodeen, at half-past seven in the morning of the 8th October. The gates of the City having been shut, few persons were present except a large military force, and there was no appearance of popular excitement any where."

On the night of the 18th October, during a gale of wind, an attempt was made by some thieves to rob the Treasury. They were, however, overheard by the sentry concerting their plan, which was to surprize and murder him and then to break into the building. The sentry hearing this, loaded his musket with ball, and perceiving one of the gang getting over the gate, fired at the fellow but missed him, upon which the whole party fled, carrying off their ladder. The sentry loaded and fired a second time, without effect. The thieves effected their escape by the narrow lane which goes round the Town Hall.

They have resolved, we understand, to commence boring in an enclosed compound near the Chowringhee Gate, and close to the wells in which Colonel Garstin bored in 1804 and in which he left the rods. On the occasion of a fire happening in the Fort, the Colonel reported that the wells had been pumped dry, but that this particular well had continued to afford water, which he supposed arose from deep seated springs which his broken borer had pricked. He considered this as a very favourable omen.

THE SEMAPHORE.—The semaphore communication is again complete to Middleton Point.

THE RAJAH OF BURDWAN.—It is bruited among the natives, that Maharaj Purtab Chunder, son of the late Rajah of Burdwan, has made his appearance to claim the titles and estates of his father. He was universally believed to have died long ago and the present Rajah was in consequence adopted.

COURT-MARTIAL.—A court-martial assembled in Fort William on the 17th September, for the trial of Capt. P. O'Hanlon, of the 1st Light Cavalry, on a charge preferred by Col. S. Reid, of scandalous and infamous conduct, unbecoming a gentleman and officer, and subversive of military subordination, in having published in the Meerut Observer of the 23rd April last, a letter containing false and unwarrantable imputations, deeply injurious to his character and that of Capt. J. A. Scott, of the 1st Light Cavalry.

Col. Reid closed the prosecution on the 17th October, and the court adjourned until the 19th, at the request of Capt. O'Hanlon, when the defence commenced and closed. The court-martial acquitted Captain O'Hanlon of the charges preferred by Colonel Reid; but he is, however, to be tried again at the instance of the Commander-in-Chief, for not having disavowed the authorship of the letter against Colonel Reid and Captain Scott, which was signed with his name, when officially made aware of it.

The deputation was most kindly received by Sir Charles Metcalfe, who discussed the different points in the memorial with them and promised they should have due consideration from the Legislative Council.

CIVIL SERVICE ANNUITIES.—It is stated that the order for carrying into effect the modification in the Civil Service Annuity Fund, has come out, and that two-thirds of the amount of all unclaimed pensions, shall be applicable to the new system of allowances. The losses of the insurance-brokers this year, owing to the sudden and heavy falls of rain in June, have extended to a ruinous degree. One Agra native house alone, it is said, has lost risks to near the amount of 1,50,000 Rs out of 10,000 or 12,000 boats insured.

On the 10th September, Kullian Singh, the sepahee of the 9th N. I., who was convicted of the murder of Deenah Missur Havildar of the same corps, was hung in the presence of the native troops assembled on the parade for the occasion. The rope by which the prisoner was suspended, although new and of the same kind and thickness as what has heretofore been used by the executioner, gave way twice on the drop falling. The third time it was doubled and the man launched successfully. The prisoner was very calm and resigned to his fate, and confessed that Gunosh, the King's evidence, and Chundree Deen, Leyak Singh, and Heera Singh, the three parties sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the Allypore jail, were privy to the murder; but he denied to to the last that any attempt on the lives of the officers of the regiment was contemplated.

On the 16th September, the Magistrate of Agra, attended by a posee commitatus, proceeded to the Hou e of Hookmun Chaund, brother of Jotarum, ex-Dewan of Jeypore, and having surrounded it with his party, proceeded to search for papers, and after five hours carried off a bundle of papers and books weighing several maunds to the Magistracy, where they were sealed up before two followers of Hookmun Chund. On the same day a similar search was instituted in the house of Jotaram, in Jeypore, by Captains Ludlow and Conolley, who seized all the papers they could find. These measures have been adopted in consequence of some suspicions entertained of Jotaram having influenced the assassination of Mr. Blake, and is a preliminary step to the investigation which Government have peremptorily ordered to take place.

Lieutenant Conolly, Assistant to the Governor-General's Agent in Rajpootana, arrived at Agra on the 2nd October, having been deputed by Major Alves to inspect the papers lately seized in the house of Sunghee Hookmunchund, the brother of Jotaram, in the city.

The dâk said to contain the missing letter does not appear to have been opened before the Deputy Post Master, but the deficiency of a letter was reported to him.

NEEMUTCH.—This station still continues very unhealthy. Some of the regiments stationed in it, have upwards of a hundred men in hospital. The cold weather has not at all diminished the sickness, which prevails to as deplorable a degree as ever, both at this station and Nusseerabad.

A great sensation has been created in this station by an affair of honor between a Major and a Lieutenant. The Major, it appears, addressed a letter to the Lieutenant which the latter conceived to be of an offensive nature and demanded an explanation. An explanation was sent by the Major with an intimation that if it was not deemed satisfactory by the Lieutenant, he had better apply to a friend; the latter course was adopted and the matter placed in the hands of another Lieut., who put himself in communication with the Major, who appointed a Captain to act as his friend; and the last individual, to the surprize of the whole station, laid the proceedings in an official shape before the Brigadier.

A native was recently, for a slight offence, paraded, by order of the Brigadier, on an ass,—from which degradation his sensitive mind so recoiled, that he flung himself into a well and was drowned. refractory and offering resistance to him in assuming charge of the lapsed Jheend territory. No troops could be spared from Hansi—save some of the Begum's Horsemen—in concequence of the great sickness prevailing among the military, the N. I. corps not having more than seventy men under arms.

The cause of the arrest of Lieuts. Goad and Irving, is for refusing on insufficient grounds to make an adequate apology to Lieut. Martin of the 52d when he had acknowledged himself the author of a letter signed Vindex, published in the Meerut Observer of the 2d July, Cornet Irving having in his answer to that letter designated Lieut. Martin as "a coward, who sheltering himself under the imagined bulwark of a false signature, hesitates not to launch forth his venomed falsehood." Lieut. Martin is to be tried for conduct subversive of good order and military discipline, in having signed a paper, wherein Cornet Irving of the 1st Cavalry was desired to conceive himself horsewhipped.

The court-martial on Captain Macnaghten is not likely to assemble before the 15th November next, Lieut. Low being prevented from leaving the Hills by his medical attendant.

MURDER.—A boy of about five years of age was, on the 17th August, murdered at Karailly. The child had been suddenly missed and a search was institued for it but to no effect. After a short time however, a girl informed the parents that her father had murdered the child for the sake of its ornaments, and had thrown the body into a well and buried the trinkets. She pointed out the well into which the body had been thrown and the place where the ornaments had been secreted, and both were recovered. The assassin has been secured and made over for trial, but he persists in denying that he perpetrated the crime.

ROBBERY.—On the night of the 2d October, some boats belonging to the fleet of the Accountant's Office, in which were some of the native writers, were plundered near Ghazeepore. They had put to for the night at the mouth of the creek between Buxar and Ghazeepore, in the district of the Bhojepore Rajah, when some cow-herds came and cautioned them to go over on the opposite side saying that the people of the district were notorious villains, and they would certainly be robbed if they remained where they were. The wind, however, prevented the Baboos from availing themselves of this warning. Near midnight about 50 armed men came down to the boats, boarded them, severely beat and wounded all who came in their way and took away all the property they could lay hands on. Several boats containing the office jemadar and some burkendauzes were in company of the writers, but they made off to some distance in the stream at the commencement of the attack and would render no assistance.

BARON HUGEL.—Baron Hugel was at Simlah on the 19th September, and, if he obtained Runjeet Sing's permission to travel over the Punjab, was to proceed to Cashmere. He speaks in raptures of the fossil remains recently discovered in the Himalya, and says they are the most interesting objects he has seen in his travels. The Baron made a very excellent collection of birds and insects at Mussourie.

NEW CUSTOMS' LINE.—It is generally supposed that Mr. Blunt will be appointed to form a New Customs' Line in Bundlecund in the early part of this month.

BRIDGE OVER THE HINDUN.—It is stated that the bridge building over the river Hindun near Gazodeennuggur, has, by that river changing its course, been rendered useless, as the stream now sets longitudinally on the foundations of the piers of the bridge instead of at right angles with them.

INDIGO PLANTERS' MEETING.—A meeting of Indigo planters was held on the 8th October, at Doudpore Factory, Tirhoot, to memorialize Government and to state their objections or suggestions to the draft of the proposed law in lieu of regulation V. 1831.

NATIVE STATES, &c.

LAHORE.—Runjeet Sing, it is reported, has so much recovered from the effects of the paralitic attack as to be able to ride out on horseback. Shortly before his Highness was attacked he went to bathe at the holy tank at Umritsir, and on his return he was struck by an unknown hand with a stone, on the side, which seemed to give him great pain. Search was immediately made and the delinquent apprehended and taken to Rambaug, where he remained under restraint to be dealt with according to the opinion of the sirdars.

It was reported to his Highness that Pandah Khan, Patan, ruler of Durbund, had recommenced his predatory career, and that Meah Sing had engaged and routed him, killing about a hundred of his followers; but that nothing short of seizing the person of the Khan could restrain him from his plundering excursions. His Highness said that measures would be taken for the apprehension of the vagrant after the termination of the rains.

CABUL.—Dost Mahomed Khan has lately contracted great intimacy with Morad Beg, the ruler of Candahar, by getting his son married to the daughter of the latter; and these sirdars have entered into a mutual agreement to assist each other with troops and to consider the enemy of the one as a common one.

Shazadah Cumran, the ruler of Herat, hearing that Dost Mahomed Khan had been defeated by the Sikhs, ordered out two detachments of horse to seize him on his return to his capital, and also to subjugate Cabul. On learning his mistake however, and that Dost Mahomed Khan was returning for the purpose of reconnoitring his troops, he recalled the horsemen; but he has not relinquished his intention of taking Cabul and punishing Dost Mahomed Khan for his haughty behaviour towards him.

Mr. Campbell recently informed Dost Mahomed Khan, that seven regiments of infantry and four of horse were in fine order, and ready for battle. Dost Mahomed Khan thereupon assembled all his troops—thirty thousand horsemen and twelve thousand foot—and reviewed them. He expresesd himself well satisfied, and promised to lead them against Peshawur in the cold season.

INDORE.—A private letter from Mhow, dated the 16th September, says there was a serious disturbance at Indore two days before, some two or three hundred Arabs having attempted to "spifficate" Hurry Holkar, but he contrived to escape, and having collected two or three thousand of his troops, a fierce contest took place in which the Arabs were defeated with great slaughter.

It is stated that two jageerdars, who had been turned out of their jagheers by Holkar, collected a large body of soldiers of fortune, in Oojein, and took possession of several villages; they were soon attacked, and all but one or two slain, by a body of troops dispatched by Hurry Holkar. The bodies of the leaders, after being dragged round the capital, were hung on gibbets.

JEYPORE.—It is said that the papers recently seized at Jeypore, contain incontestable proof that Jotaram instigated the attack on the Political Agent, and the murder of Mr. Blake. It is also stated that when the Jeypore Palace was undergoing a search for Jotaram's papers, our authorities discovered several bodies, male and female, preserved in dubbers of oil.

GWALIOR.—A letter from Gwalior states, that the young Rajah is constantly engaged in every kind of debauchery and dissipation, and that the Royal power is virtually vested in the Mamajee, who has pensioned Jean Baptist, the Commander-in-chief of the Gwalior forces, and appointed 2,000 infantry and 500 horse as his own body-guard.

The Maha Rajah and his uncle, however, appear to conduct the affairs of the realm very steadily, and from the absence of all intrigue against the Government, they appear to be popular with all parties.

A military expedition against a band of robbers which infests the Chunderic district, is in preparation by the Government.

GOOMSOOR.—The Goomsoor Rajah has revolted, and a body of troops were sent against him from Vizianagram on the 8th October.

FEROZEPORE.—The Seicknee of Ferozepore has departed this life, leaving a territory to be divided between the Company and Runjeet Singh.

BHURTPORE.—The zemindars and their followers have already commenced their "settlements" throughout this district. Two people have been killed and four wounded in one of the first cases.

BAIRAITCH.—Fyz Mahomed Khan, the Bairaitch Nawab, died at Jhujjur on the 15th, and his remains were interred at the Kootub on the 16th October. He has been succeeded by his son Fyz Allie Khan.

MADRAS.

COORG PRIZE MONEY.—The Coorg Prize Money is ordered to be paid to the Troops. Col. Lindsay gets one-sixteenth of the whole and the other Brigadiers only share according to their army rank. Majors get 12,000, Captains six, and the Jolly Subs 3,500.

THE CROPS.—The fears entertained of a dearth consequent on a want of rain, are entirely dispelled. Accounts from the interior represent monsoons as being most plentiful, and promising a very abundant harvest.

SUPREME COURT.—On the 19th Sept. the editor of the Carnatic Chronicle brought an action against the proprietors of the paper for arrears of salary from the 15th April 1834 to the 30th April 1835. Some objections were urged on the part of the proprietors, which were overruled by the Court, and a verdict given for the plaintiff—damages 660 rupees.

THE BREAKWATER.—It is stated that the quarrying of the stones to be used in the Breakwater, is found to be, from the hardness of the rock, a more difficult task than it was at first supposed, and that the expense for powder alone for blasting, is calculated at double the entire estimate: with boats, rafts, land carriage and coolies, the total sum required is by a subsequent calculation fixed at three lacks and a half of rupees.

The first stones of the breakwater were dropped on the 3rd October. The size of the stones is represented as being such as two men could move without much difficulty.

EXCHANGE ROOMS.—It is intended to establish Exchange Rooms for the use of the Mercantile Society in the present Sessions House, on the removal of the Supreme Court, and to furnish them with maps, charts, public papers, and items of commercial utility, the expenses being defrayed by subscription.

OBSCENE CORRESPONDENCE.—The writer of a most obscene letter, which through some remissness was inserted in the Standard, has been discovered to be a Capt. in the Cavalry, and he is in consequence to be tried by a court-martial for this offence against decency.

MR. CURNIN'S RETIRING FUND PLAN.—A meeting took place on the 2nd October, at the College Hall, sanctioned by the Governor and the Commander-in-Chief, of the officers who take an interest in Mr. Curnin's Retiring Fund Plan. With one exception the meeting were unanimous in favor of the Plan.

BEACH-MASTER'S ARBITRARY PROCEEDINGS.—A very arbitrary punishment was recently levied on Captain Yates, of the Ship Sesostris, by the Beach-Master. It appears that the Police regulations of the port impose a fine of 100 rupees on such commanders of vessels as do not, on arrival, furnish the names of all persons then on board of their vessel: and of this law Captain Yates has been made the victim in a somewhat novel fashion.

On the voyage of the Sesostris in 1834, Captain Yates delivered his lists to the Master-Attendant's office, on arrival, in the usual form; at the foot of that for passengers there being added "a native ayah" On the departure of the vessel to return to England, the official port clearance was furnished to the Captain, and a certificate that he had fulfilled all the regulations of the Port. The vessel returns to Madras in August, 1835, and after remaining in the roads above a month, and being on the eve of departure, her Captain is hauled up for infringing the regulations on that preceding voyage, and punished "according to law."

MILITARY ITEMS.—Sir R. W. O'Callaghan was to leave Madras on the 5th October, on a tour of inspection to Trichinopoly, Palamcottah, and other places in the Southern division.

Lieut. F. O'Callaghan, Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, still continues in a hopeless state at Bangalore.

MILITARY ITEMS.—The Court-martial at Bangalore, on the parties concerned in the fatal duel which took place there, has terminated and the following is the result:—Lieutenant Joys is sentenced to twelve months imprisonment in the Common Jail of Madras; Lieutenant Morland second to Lieutenant Joys, was sentenced to the same imprisonment, but is pardoned; and Lieutenant Powis, second to Ensign Davis, is sentenced to imprisonment in the same place, for the term of six months.

MILITARY FUND.—The clause in the Regulations of the Military Fund which excluded East Indian widows and orphans, has at length been expunged. The following resolution has been adopted by the subscribers:—

"That the Fund be hereafter open to widows or orphans under the rule that governs admission of Cadets to the Army, and that all existing marriages (hitherto excluded under the old) be recognized and admitted under the new rule by paying up all arrears of subscription, &c. according to the existing rates from the date of marriage, with interest at eight per cent. accumulated half yearly."

SIR RALPH PALMER, the Chief Justice of the Madras Supreme Court, took leave of the Grand Jury on the 8th October. He is succeeded by Sir Robert Comyn, at present the puisne judge of the court.

DEPUTY SHERIFF.—James Thoy Baillie, Esq., has succeeded the late W. Paulin, Esq., as Deputy-Sheriff.

SIR F. ADAM, it is said, intends shortly to proceed to the Hills.

BOMBAY.

THE LATE DUEL AT POONAH.—Dr. Malcolmson of the 19th B. N. I., was tried on the 30th September, as principal, for the murder of Captain Urquhart, and Major Stalker and Lieutenant McDermot as accessaries. Mr. Roper, Clerk of the Crown, acted as Counsel for the accused. The verdict of the inquest held by Colonel Wiltshire on the body of Captain Urquhart, returned a verdict of "killed by a pistol-ball fired by some person unknown;" and considerable anxiety prevailed among the friends of the parties as to the result of the trial. The parties were acquitted.

SIR J. AWDRY.—Sir J. Awdry had a narrow escape last July. The punkah over his head fell on him, and knocked his head on the desk with such force that his forehead became quite black with the concussion. He retired for an hour and afterwards returned to finish the trial pending at the time.

SHIPWRICK.—The Anne of the Mauritius, bound from Bushier to that port, to touch at Muscat in the passage down the Gulph, was wrecked on the Persian coast in latitude 26°-13' N. and longitude 57°3' E. about 6 leagues to the northward of Mubarrack rock. She was discovered by the H. C.'s cutter Nerbudah on the 29th of August, and Lieut. Powell, the Commander, went on board and found the vessel deserted. There was a bungalow anchored alongside, the naquedah of which told Capt. Powell that he had been sent by the Commander of the Anne, who was, with the officers and crew, living at Mennow, under the protection of the Shaik—to save what he could of her cargo, consisting of wheat, horses, &c.; and that some horses and asses had been landed, but many others had died and the whole of the wheat had been spoiled.

RAMMOHUN ROY.—A letter has been received from Hangel in Middlesex, dated the 21st April, by a friend of the late Rajah Rammohun Roy, stating that the Rajah's adopted son was at school there and appeared particularly clever and interesting, and that he was shortly to come out to India to teach the languages to young civilians.

THE HUGH LINDSAY is announced to sail on her first trip to the Red Sea on the 10th of November, and on the second on the 15th February. Several of her cabins are already engaged, and among the passengers are three ladies.

THE STEAMER INDUS, which has been purchased by a native, it is said, was to be dispatched in charge of an officer of the Indian Navy to the Indus, where coals have already been provided for her passage up the river.

IRON STEAM BOATS.—It is understood that the Iron Steam Boats built for the Euphrates, have been sold to the East India Company for their Bombay Establishment for £5,000. A want of funds for completing Col. Chesney's enterprise, it is supposed, has induced this transaction.

SUTTEE.—Another suttee is said to have taken place at Sattara on the 16th September. The woman who ascended the pile, was about 80 years of age, and the wife of the priest of Appa Sahib's Dewan.

THE INDIAN NAVY.—Dispatches have been received from the Court of Directers, rejecting the proposition for doing away with the Indian Navy, and it is therefore to be maintained on its present footing.

MUTILATION FOR WITCHCRAFT.—A Parsee woman recently brought a complaint against one of her countrymen, for having conspired with others, and through false charges, caused her to be severely whipped, and her nose to be cut off, by the Guicowar authorities. The man stated in his defence, that his brother having lost three wives successively by witchcraft, he and his friends consulted some conjurors regarding the matter, who declared that the woman had destroyed them by magic, and that she was a witch; that some of his neighbours mentioned this to the police officers, who took them before the officers of justice and they caused the punishment to be inflicted.

As both parties are subjects of the Guicowar and the mutilation occurred in his territories, the Magistrate could not take cognizance of the outrage on the unfortunate woman; but he promised to consult the Senior Magistrate on the subject.

TRIAL FOR LIBEL.—The prosecution against Nowrojee Dorabjee, proprietor of the late Hulkaru and Free Press and Editor of the Chabook, has been abandoned, on the condition of the defendant's publishing an apology for the offensive observations on which the action was brought.

SUPREME COURT.—On the 30th of September the Murwaries, who had been found guilty of a conspiracy to charge the native establishment of the Sheriff's office with bribery, were sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and fined 500 rupees.

NATIVE JUSTICES.—It is said that one of the Native Justices of the Peace has received a very grave admonition from the bench, with respect to some magisterial act which he had performed without any communication with a European magistrate.

NAVIGATION.—It is stated in the Bombay Durpun of the 3rd October, that a Parsee named Cowasjee, who was several years in Rangoon under a British Captain, has learned so much of practical navigation as to be able to command his own brig the Robert Spankie, in charge of which vessel he has sailed from Bombay.

PENANG.

PIRACY.—Piracy has increased to such a degree in the vicinity of Province Wellesley, that the fishermen are afraid to venture out to the fishing stakes,—several of their comrades who slept at them having suddenly disappeared. Captain Low, the Superintendent of Province Wellesley, while proceeding in an open boat to the southward, accompanied by the gun-boat Hawk, fell in with a piratical prahu, manned by about twenty men, on her way to join a fleet of pirates laying at Tanjong Penang, and engaged her. After resisting some time the prahu filled and her crew deserted her and took shelter in the mangrove jungle close at hand, leaving behind their small arms and other implements, besides a bundle of papers which proved the prahu to belong to a large gang of pirates living on the banks of the Kream River. Late accounts from the Pedier Coast also, state that three prahus laden with betelnut were attacked off Pulo Riman by a fleet of small pirate boats. One of them was captured and its crew massacred, one sunk in the engagement, and the third made off and returned to the coast.

EARTHQUAKE.—Three smart shocks of Earthquake were felt on the 27th of August in George Town. The concussions were from north to south.

SUMATRA.

AFFAIRS OF ACHEEN.—Acheen is in a very disturbed state in consequence of the frequent ruptures between the Heir-Apparent and the reigning sovereign. On the 29th July, while the Isabella, Lee Goan, Cecilia and Helen, were at Giggian and Pukan Baru, the Heir-Apparent, in his armed barque Baggiana, anchored at the latter place and sent to demand duties from the inhabitants, who refusing to pay it, he proceeded to seize all cargo-boats venturing out of the river. Only two, however, were captured, belonging to the Lee Goan, the supercargo of which paying the duties they were released. On the following day some of the Heir-Apparent's people, having an altercation with a fisherman about some fish murdered the man. A few hours after this occurrence, as Capt. Macalister of the Helen, was proceeding on shore, several armed Acheenese met him half way down the river and charged him with having murdered their countrymen, and on landing took away his hat and money, divested the lascars of their knives, searched the boat, and then marched the whole party about two miles inland under a guard of spearmen; but on arriving at the Rajah's house they were released, and informed that they had been captured upon wrong information. Trade was at a complete stand, and not a single prow would venture out, the Heir-Apparent having declared his determination to remain at the ports above mentioned, until the duties demanded were paid. The Cecilia had made large advances but had only received three or four hundred piculs of betelnut on board.

BURMAH.

The Resident arrived at Ava on the 27th July and was most kindly received by the Burmese authorities, notwithstanding a mischievous report had preceded him, that he was going up to Ava to demand from the Court a passage for a British army to march into China through the Burmese dominions. The Chinese in Yenan had sent down intelligence of a war between their nation and the English, and of their having captured or destroyed thirty of our large ships at Canton. The king of Ava still continues shut up in his palace, and Menusager, his brother-in-law, governs the kingdom. The Resident is promised an audience of his Majesty as soon as he can be persuaded to exert himself sufficiently for such a ceremony.

Trade is said to be flourishing and population and cultivation increasing on every side,—the British dominions in Burmah influencing the conduct of the Burmese officers and tending to save the inhabitants of the country from oppression and extortion.

A letter from Rangoon, dated the 3d September, states that the Woongyee of Rangoon, a liberal and intelligent man, who had filled that office ever since the late war, had died; and that the Court of Ava had selected as his successor, the Ngarane Woongyee, Moung Wa, a remarkably large Burmese, who has the character of being mild and not rapacious; but having lived quitely at Ava all his life, he is a true Burmese in pride, ignorance and obstinacy.

PERSIA.

Accounts to the 27th of July have been received from Theran. Sir Henry Ellis had not reached his destination, though his arrival was anxiously looked for. The Prime Minister had been executed and no one had been appointed to succeed him. The Russian Ambassador had retired from the Court, in consequence of the execution of the Minister, and had sent an angry message to the Shah on the subject: a serious misunderstanding between the two states is apprehended. The country was still in a very disturbed state, and the plague and cholera had been raging though not to a very alarming degree. Sir H. Bethune had left Persia with many tomauns—the plunder of Busheer.

CHINA.

PLUNDER OF THE TROUGHTON.—The following are the particulars of the piracy committed on the bark Troughton, Thompson. It appears she was dismasted in a gale of wind on the 6th of July, about 100 miles S. W. of Macao, and on the gale abating anchored near Mandarin's rock to repair damages, &c. The Chinese fishermen, who frequent the place, visited the vessel several times and behaved unusually civil; but in the evening while all on board, except the Captain and mate, were asleep, the ship was surrounded by twenty five or thirty large fishing boats, from which about three hundred men boarded the vessel, seized the officers and crew and lashed them to the deck. The Captain and mate, however, kept the Chinese at bay for sometime, until they were wounded with long bamboos with spiked heads, when they retreated to the cabin, and the Chinese then commenced plundering the vessel, and took from her 50,000 dollars in specie and the same amount in goods. The mate and the Captain attempted to blow the vessel up,—crew, Chinese and all together,—but the cask of powder prepared for the occasion, though it blew up part of the deck, injured some of the crew and drove the Chinese out of the ship, fell short of the desired effect. The mate and Captain jumped from the cabin window into the sea, whence they were picked up by the Chinese and replaced on the deck of the vessel. A few pistol shots were ineffectually fired by the Captain at the commencement of the attack.

The vessel got underweigh after this and reached Macao roads two days after; when the particulars of the affair were dispatched to the Governor of Canton, who has sworn to secure the miscreants and restore the property: and through his instrumentality, several of the boats concerned in the piracy have been seized, with a quantity of specie found on board belonging to the Troughton. The discovery has been made by some of the fishermen impeaching their accomplices.

BANDITTI.—A Peking Gazette mentions, that the Government troops had penetrated into and engaged the barbarous banditti at Ya-cha, and entirely dispersed them.

REVIEW OF THE CALCUTTA MARKET.

(From A. E. Kuhn's Monthly Price Current, October 31, 1835.)

The transactions in business, which re commenced on the 16th instant, and which were again interrupted by native holydays, have been in general upon a very limited scale during the whole month. Freights have however become more abundant, and as the supplies from the Coast, the Gulphs and from the interior are increasing rapidly, as usual at this season, we expect our next number will be of more general interest than the present.

INDIGO.—The last accounts from England are rather unfavorable. The prices at the first two days of July sale experienced a still further decline of 4d. on the finer qualities, and 6d. to 8d. on inferior, as compared with those of the April sale. There has been, however, a full attendance of buyers, particularly from the Continent, and holders of the finer qualities were pretty firm; many lots having been bought in.

Several estimates of the present crop continue to be made up, they still repeat the quantity will be about what we stated in our last number, namely, 115,000 maunds. It is impossible to give any positive statement in that respect, as the cultivation has been considerably increased by many small native manufactories very little known. Nothing is remaining in the market of the last crop. About 500 maunds of the new crop are come in the market. We have not heard of any sale.

OPIUM.—Transaction in this drug have been very limited since our last, arising from the regular season for shipments to China having past until next quarter. The accounts from Bombay state the expectation of a very abundant crop, of about 24,000 chests, to which are to be added about 11,000 chests, which our districts are likely to furnish. The prices are at present well supported, as the drug, and particularly Patna, is getting scarce, but should the expected large supplies be realized, the present rather high prices must be affected by it. The stock in the Hon'ble Company's Godowns is reduced at 250 chests Benares.

RAW SILK.—We have only one transaction worthy of notice to report. Our stock in private hand is very limited, as the Jaun band has been almost a total failure. The importation by the Hon'ble Company from the Interior, since 1st May last, is about 2,300 maunds

SILK PIECE GOODS.—The few transactions transpired are described under this head. The demand continues active chiefly for Corahs for the English market, but sales are restrained consequent of short supplies. The home consumption is greatly on the increase, 36,000 pieces having been delivered monthly from 1st March to 1st July in 1835, whilst the deliveries of the same months in '834 were only 24,000 pieces per month. Comparing this increase with the diminution of our produce here, the exposition given under this head in our August number is fully confirmed, and prices of course will be fully supported.

COTTON.—Shipments to China have been almost totally interrupted, owing to the season of the year. The quantity shipped in that direction since 1st May last, amounts to 321,698 maunds. Sales are now confined to a few parcels for shipment to England. Bandah is very scarce, and for a parcel of superior 17 Rs have been paid. The latest accounts from London state the market to be dull, but orders to some extent have been received for the supply of Liverpool.

SALTPETRE has been enquired after during the whole month for English and American markets, and prices of the assortments are well supported. Tonnage having become more available, the present quotation is likely to be maintained. Our Stock is still a large one; importation from the interior, exceeding the exportation by sea, by about 40,000 maunds since 1st May last.

SUGAR.—Our hopes for equalization of the duties of Sugar in England have received a new support by the latest advices from home. Transactions have been more extensive during month than the last, they are, however, on a limited scale, and our stock is still heavy. Importation from the interior having exceeded the exportation by sea since 1st May by about 170,000 maunds. Fine white Benares is scarce, and superior, none to be had; prices of all descriptions are likely to improve.

Accounts from London (July 14th,) state this article to be in general demand, and prices well supported. At Liverpool (July 10th,) Sugar continued also in good request, and an advance has been obtained in the prices.

LAC DYE.—The finer sorts of European make continue scarce, and are enquired after, native make is more abundant. The demand is steady for English and American markets, and prices are likely to maintain.

SHELL LAC.—There has been some enquiry particularly for the English markets. Our stock is still a large one.

STICK LAC.—A supply of 999 chests has animated somewhat our market.

RICE has been in limited demand. The late favourable accounts received from the Mauritius, may however affect our prices. Purchases to some extent are setting in.

WHEAT.—A few transactions have come to our notice.

HIDES AND HORNS.—Hides continue in demand for England and America. Our stock is rapidly decreasing, 452,294 pieces having been shipped during the last five months against an importation of only 350,670. The prices have experienced some improvement since our last number, and are likely to go higher should tonnage become more available. On Horns very limited transactions.

LINSEED.—Our market begins to be well supplied, the sales are however restrained as holders are shipping it on their own account for the home markets, where this seed continues in good request.

SPICES, DRUGS, &c.—We have received new supplies of these articles by the ten Arab vessels, which arrived since our last.

METALS.—The copper market has not been very animated during this month, and prices have experienced some decline. Our stock is not very heavy, the exports to the Interior having been rather large since 1st May. Hoop and sheet iron being scarce, prices have improved, for other descriptions there is no variation worthy of notice. Spelter has declined in consequence of unfavourable advices from the interior. The stock, however, is still very small. Lead is well supported.

TWIST.—Our stock of white Mule is very much reduced, and sales confined to small parcels. Orange has been enquired after at steady prices, but the stock still continues to be heavy.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—The Imports of white Cotton Piece Goods have been considerably diminished since 1st May, 1835, only 373,927 pieces having been imported, whilst the importation for the same period in 1834 was 604,064 pieces, leaving thus a deficiency in the Imports on the last five months of 230,137 pieces. The re exportation has on the contrary increased, being 262,389 pieces against 218,957 pieces last year.—A similar fact exists in regard to coloured Cotton Piece Goods, 95,505 pieces having only been imported during the last five months, whilst the importation was 143,378 pieces for the same months last year, and the re-exports of this year have also increased to 95,290 against 56,547 last year. The market is in general well supported, Longcloths, Madapolams and Cambrics are particularly enquired after, Chintz and Ginghams are also in steady demand as usual at this season.

WOOLLENS.—Demand is increasing in consequence of the ensuing cold season, the stock in first hands, with the exception of flannels is rather small. A large parcel of coarse Woollens is still existing in the hands of natives. The re-exports during the last five months were heavy, viz., 5,805 pieces Woollens and Flannels against 2,384 pieces for the same months last year. The Imports on the contrary fell considerably short, being 4,006 against 7228.

CALCUTTA PUBLIC LIBRARY MEETING.

Resolutions adopted at a general meeting held at the Town Hall on the 31st August, 1835.

"That it is expedient and necessary to establish in Calcutta a Public Library of Reference and Circulation, that shall be open to all ranks and classes without distinction, and sufficiently extensive to supply the wants of the entire community in every department of literature."

"That a Provisional Committee be appointed to consider of the best means of accomplishing the objects stated in the first Resolution—to frame a set of Rules and Regulations for the management and use of the Library, and the conduct generally of its affairs, and to report the same, together with their opinion, to a subsequent meeting to be called by public advertisement in the newspapers by the Committee as soon as they shall be prepared with the report."

The Provisional Committee appointed by the second of the foregoing resolutions, having considered the various matters referred to them, have in pursuance of the directions given to them, called together a public meeting at the Town Hall, for Saturday the 31st October, at which meeting they will present the following

REPORT.

In answer to an application for the temporary use of apartments in the Town Hall, the Town Hall committee obligingly assigned a room to the library, but the situation of Dr. Strong's house and the extent of the apartments which he has kindly consented to appropriate to the use of the library, induce the Committee to recommend that his offer be accepted.

The Committee have obtained estimates of the probable cost of book-shelves and such other furniture as appear to them immediately necessary to be procured for the use of the library, and they recommend, as the result of their enquiries, that the sum of Sicca Rs 1,000 be applied to these purposes. In the meanwhile the Secretary has kindly offered the use of his own book-shelves, of which the Committee have gladly availed themselves.

The subject of the Establishment necessary for doing the duties and taking charge of the books and other things enumerated in the 3d resolution of the public meeting, has engaged the particular attention of the Committee, and they recommend that a Librarian be appointed on such a salary as will secure the continual and exclusive services of a competent person: and they have ascertained by inquiry that such a person would cheerfully undertake these duties for a salary of Rs 200 by the month.

The Committee recommend also that, for the purpose of insuring attendance at the Library from an early hour in the morning until a late hour at night, two Under-Librarians be appointed: and they think it would be satifactory to those who will resort to the Library if one were an East Indian and the other a Hindoo. The Committee are satisfied that highly respectable and well qualified young men of these classes will readily give their services for Rs 50 each by the month.

The Committee recommend that the rest of the establishment should consist of making a total for the establishment of servants, including Librarians, Rs 343 monthly.

The Committee, in the month of September, applied to Government to allow under such rules as it might approve of, the Subscribers to the Public Library to enjoy the use of the books belonging to Fort William College: understanding that a large part of these consists of Oriental works which the Asiatic Society are desirous of procuring, and are likely to apply for, the Committee restricted their application to those books which do not relate to the particular objects of that Society's care; and they have received a communication from the Secretary to Government, announcing generally, that Government is disposed to comply with their application and to place, under the care of a Committee, the works in European lauguages belonging to the College Library.

Regarding any reservation which Government may think it right to make of works required for the public service, and regarding the rule under which the use of the books will be allowed, the Committee are informed that a further communication will be made.

The printed catalogue of these books gives a list of 1,912 works: of these 190, at most, may be deemed to come under the description of those which the Asiatic Society may lay claim to, leaving 1,722 works of which the subscribers to the Calcutta Public Library are likely to enjoy the use. The Public Library had also at the time the list was sent to the Committee, received donations of 397 works comprising 1,356 volumes and about 150 volumes have been received since. Taking the proportion of volumes to works given by the books presented to the Library, and applying it to the 1,772 works lent it by Government, the collection of books at starting would consist of about 5,000 volumes from Government, 1,500 volumes of donations; together 6,500 volumes, which the Committee have reason to believe is a larger number than is to be found in the Cape Library.

However, a very large proportion, perhaps five-sixths, of the Cape Library consists of works published in the present century. In all works of this modern date, the Library of which the subscribers may now have the use is very deficient, as it is also in older works in the particular departments of

|---|---|
| Poetry and the Drama. | Biography. |
| Prose Works of Imagination. | Politics. |
| Miscellaneous Works. | Jurisprudence. |
| History. | Science and the Arts. |

There is a very good foundation of a Library in the departments of Works of Philosophers, and Philology, that is Grammars and Dictionaries, a fair foundation of Classic and Italian works, hardly any French, and no German.

The Committee in giving the result of their investigation of the books available as a nucleus of a Public Library, have no wish to depreciate the value of these books; on the contrary they wish to state it as their opinion that few collections of the same extent would be found to contain so many useful books, and so few which any makers of a Library would be disposed to reject, as that belonging to Fort William College. But they think it right to point out the deficiencies which occur to them; not in any hope that sufficient funds can be obtained at once to supply them all, but to shew that, in addition to the important assistance already afforded by public and private liberality, a large sum of money, and great attention in laying it out are necessary in order "to provide a library sufficiently extensive to supply the wants of the entire community of Calcutta in every department of literature."

The Committee are of opinion that a sum of not less than Rs 20,000 should be placed at the disposal of a Committee, for the purpose of purchasing such standard works as they may think advisable, in addition to those now available to the Subscribers, in order to supply the deficiencies, herein before mentioned, in those departments of literature which are most likely to be appreciated by the Subscribers generally.

In addition to this sum Rs 1,000 are recommended to be laid out in book-cases and furniture.

And your Committee recommend that Rs 9,000 more be placed at the disposal of a Committee for the purpose of procuring in the first place one set of the most approved periodical publications which shall not be allowed to circulate among the Subscribers, and of laying out, at their discretion, the balance in purchases of periodical and other popular literature for circulation.

The Committee are of opinion that the above sums, amounting together to Rs 30,000, are necessary to be provided in the first instance, to cover the expense attendant on forming such a Library as the public Meeting of the 31st August appear to have contemplated: and, with this sum judiciously laid out, they think a Library might be formed so generally useful as to ensure a large number of monthly Subscribers, and enable the Committee on whom the management might devolve, to lay out a large portion of the periodical receipt in the purchase of new and popular works.

With regard to the means of procuring books in Calcutta, there appear to be occasional opportunities here of purchasing valuable and useful standard works, and the Committee think it would be useful to keep a part of the Library funds so as to be available for such opportunities when they occur. But the Committee are of opinion that in a Public Library the procuring quickly, at the fair market rate, works which are found wanting, should be more attended to than the wanting for casual opportunities of supplying desiderata at a lower rate. And they are also of opinion that the best library will be formed at the least cost, when scrupulous attention is paid to the choice of books purchased and ordinary prudence employed in buying them.

The number of subscribers of Rs 330 each who have already come forward is 55, and about Rs 500 more has been subscribed in donations, making in all a capital of Rs 17,000.

The Committee have thought it right, in this state of the funds, which prevents the plan they have suggested from being immediately acted upon to call a public Meeting and lay before them their views upon the subject, before proceeding to consider that part of the matters referred to them which regard the formations of rules for the use of the library. If the meeting should be of opinion that the projected institution should be set on foot, the committee recommend that the management of the library be committed to a small committee of gentlemen, who should be desired to frame such rules for the use of the books in the first instance as they think advisable, and that a stated annual meeting of suscribers be appointed at some convenient time of year, the first of which might take place at no distant period, when the rules might be appoved of or altered as may seem best to the subscribers generally. The Committee beg also to suggest that the rules of the Cape Library afford an easy means of framing these rules, such attention being paid to such modifications as the different circumstances of this place require.

The Committee recommend that the payment of 300 Rs in one payment or in three payments of 100 Rs each, 100 being paid down and the remaining 200 Rs in two equal instalments, at 6 and 12 months, shall constitute parties proprietors of the Library, entitle them to all the privileges of 1st class subscribers.

That 1st class subscribers pay an entrance fee of 20 Rs and a subscription of 6 Rs for every month subsequent to the first.

That 2d class subscribers pay an entrance fee of 16 Rs and a subscription of 4 Rs for every month subsequent to the first.

That 3d class subscribers pay an entrance fee of 10 Rs and a subscription of 2 Rs for every month subsequent to the first.

That any subscriber be at liberty at any time to become a proprietor upon making up his contributions to the sum of 300 Rs, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the time of his commencing his subscription.

That subscription be collected in advance from the 1st and 2d class of subscribers monthly, and from the 3d class quarterly.

That subscribers who choose to pay a year's subscription in advance, be allowed a deduction of 10 per cent. on such advance.

That no subscriber failing for one month to pay his subscription shall be allowed to make use of the Library, until he receive permission to do so from the Committee of Management.

That subscriptions be not received for broken parts of a month, and that they be held to run as from the 1st of the month in which they are enrolled.

That proprietors shall not have more than ten shares each.

That all shares be transferable on payment by the purchaser of a fine of 100 Rs per each share transferred, and this share whether he be already a proprietor or not.

That persons who have not paid up the full amount which entitles them to a share be not allowed to transfer such anticipated share.

That subscribers quitting Calcutta without communicating in writing to the managing Committee their intention, be required to pay their subscriptions until such intention is so communicated by them; and, failing so to pay, shall cease to be subscribers, and shall not be re-admitted without special reference to the Committee.

That proprietors who leave India without due notice to the managing Committee and who do not return within eighteen months, from the time of their departure, shall at the expiry of such eighteen months, forfeit all claim to any share or shares they may hold, and such share or shares shall revert to the library: and that proprietors who leave India with such notice to the managing Committee, and who do not return within five years from the time of their departure, shall at the expiry of such five years, in like manner, forfeit all claim to any share or shares, and such share or shares shall revert to the library.

That proprietors and subscribers be convened annually for the examination of accounts and for general business.

That accounts be made up yearly, and be audited and approved by the managing Committee, and submitted to the yearly meeting of proprietors and subscribers.

That upon all pecuniary questions each share shall have one vote, on all other matters each proprietor to have only one vote. And upon all such other matters, each subscriber shall have a vote.

That the Committee of Management have power to issue to poor students and others tickets of admission to the Library, for such periods as may be thought advisable, such tickets not to be transferable.

CIVIL FUND MEETING.

A meeting of the members of the Civil Fund took place on Saturday morning, the 14th November, pursuant to advertisement, to take into consideration the state of the Fund, and the recent admissions of Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland and Mr. C. B. Elliott to the benefits thereof. There were thirty-two members present.

H. T. PRINSEP, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Tulloh called attention to a string of rules he had framed with a view to avert, if possible, the bankruptcy of the fund. Mr. Tulloh's propositions, amongst other suggestions, contained the following:

"That each married subscriber or widower having children, immediately contribute to the fund double his present subscription.

"That each bachelor on his marriage contribute to the fund in the above proportion.

"That married subscribers and widowers on having realized a sufficient fortune to render them independent of the fund, be allowed the option of reverting to the original scale of contributions. Those subscribers who are independent of the fund at present to continue their subscription as heretofore."

Mr. Rattray, as we understood, concurred with Mr. Tulloh, but thought it were better to appoint a committee out of the members present, to take the proposition. This suggestion did not meet with approval, and the the following amendment, moved by Mr. Morley and seconded by Mr. Rattray, was carried nem. con.

"Resolved.— 1. That Mr. Tulloh's proposition, and all other propositions which have been already received, or which may be now or hereafter brought forward for any alteration in the rules of the Civil Fund, be referred to a Committee, to be appointed as below prescribed, who shall be empowered and requested to report thereon to a Special General Meeting, to be called by them for that purpose, revising all the existing rules, and generally submitting their suggestions for such measures as they may think it most expedient to adopt in the present state of the assets and liabilities of the Fund.

2. That the Committee consist of sixteen members, being Subscribers to the Fund, resident in Calcutta, one to be elected by the Subscribers resident in each division of Revenue and Circuit, viz. Jessore, Cuttack, Moorshedabad, Bauleah, Dacca, Chittagong, Bhaugulpore, Patna, Banares, Delhi, Sagur, Allahbad, Bareilly, Meerut, and Agra, including all Political Officers, and two to be elected by those in Calcutta, and members not included in any of the above divisions.

3. That each Commissioner be requested to collect the votes of the Subscribers entitled to vote in the division, reporting to the Secretary the gentleman elected, on or before the 15th of January next, and that the Secretary to the Fund be requested to collect the votes of the members in Calcutta, on or before the same date.

4. That a Committee man elected, by more than one division, shall choose which division he may wish to represent, and that the other division or divisions that elected him may elect each a substitute for him."

That the Managers take the necessary steps to carry the above Resolutions in to effect.

The meeting then proceeded to the second purpose for which it was convened, viz. to re-consider a resolution "said to have been passed" at a general quarterly meeting, under which Mr. J. C. C. Suthereland was considered a retired civilian, and subject to payments due under Rule XXXV.

The Hon. Mr. Melville briefly proposed the following Resolutions, which were seconded by Mr. J. P. Grant:

"Resolved, 1st.—That the case of Mr. Sutherland involves an essential addition to the rules and principles of the institution, and that all Subscribers in India ought to have been allowed to deliver their sentiments and votes by a written communication.

Resolved, 2d.—That under Article XXX. it being competent for a second general meeting to reconsider any resolutions passed at a former general meeting, it is now expedient to hold in suspence the resolution of the meeting of the 27th April, 1835, relative to Mr. Sutherland.

Resolved, 3*d*.—And that the papers connected with the case of that gentleman be submitted to any Subscriber, to whom they have not already been transmitted, with an invitation to them to transmit through the Secretary to the Chairman of a meeting to be held on the ..... their votes for or against the resolution, "that Mr. Sutherland be considered a retired civilian, and subject to payments under Rule XXXV."

Mr. Rattray considered the proposed resolution unwarranted, illegal, and in direct contravention to Rule XXX., there having been a general meeting held subsequent to that of the 27th of April, which, as it did not disturb the resolution of the preceding meeting, must be considered as confirming it. The rule is as follows :

"It is further hereby declared, that the resolution of a second general meeting of the subscribers to the fund, regularly held under the rules now established, or which may be hereafter established for it, and confirming the resolution of a former general meeting, shall be final and conclusive."

Mr. Rattray contend that the meeting could not rescind the resolution of the 27th of April, which must now be considered "final and conclusive" as the subsequent meeting on the 26th of July had not ejected Mr. Sutherland. This was alone sufficient for the purpose ; but the subject had not been brought forward in the shape of a proposition during the subsequent October meeting. If it had, he would then, as now, have protested against a discussion on a question which resolves into this :—are the proceedings of a meeting, competent to carry any proposition which may be brought before it, subject to reversal by a subsequent meeting !

The Hon. Mr. Melville observed that he did not understand the meaning of section XXX. if what had just fallen from Mr. Rattray was the correct construction of it. If the proceedings of a second meeting were "final and conclusive," surely the proceeding of a first meeting could not be considered so.

Much conversation followed, during which Mr. Millet remarked that the matter must ultimately be referred to the service at large. At the suggestion of Mr. J. P. Grant, Mr. Rattray reduced his amendment into writing, premising he was desirous that the opinion of the Advocate-General should be taken as to the legality of rescinding the Resolution. The amendment, seconded by Mr. Morley, with several subsequent alterations, stood as follows :—

"Resolved,—That this meeting is not competent to take into consideration the question of Mr. Sutherland's admission as a subscriber to the Fund, the same having been determined at a General Meeting duly convened and fully comptent to decide finally upon the case."

The Hon. Mr. Melville, Mr. R. D. Mangles, and several other gentlemen disputed the assertion that any meeting competent to discuss the subject had taken place, after that which voted Mr. Sutherland's admission. The quarterly meeting of the 27th of July was "counted out," a quorum of members not being present, and at the meeting of the 26th October it was specifically agreed to let the matter lie over until to-day, in consequence of the call of a special meeting on this day for the purpose of its consideration. Mr. Rattray however, maintained that the meeting could not discuss the question, and observed with reference to Mr. Sutherland, that "this poor man had been very ill-used." Several gentlemen here remarked that Mr. Rattray was neither appealing to equity nor justice but to the misericordia argument. At length (we believe) Mr. Rattray gave up his amendment to make way for one proposed by Mr. D. C. Smyth, but, as we understood, he offered the following protest which was refused on the ground of irregularity :

"I protest against the agitation of the question as altogether unwarrantable and illegal. Mr. Sutherland was admitted as a subscriber to the Fund by a competent General Meeting, after having been rejected by a majority of the Managers. It is true the election was carried by a majority of nine only against one dissentient ; but nine are declared by the rules competent to all that was done, and consequently, on the score of numbers, no exception can be taken. Rule XXX. allows of the Resolution of any meeting being confirmed at a second meeting : but surely it will not be argued that every thing done at the present meeting, for instance, where thirty Subscribers to the Fund are present, may be set aside and nullified to-morrow by any nine that may choose to assemble for the purpose of then carrying, what they had failed to-day. An intervening General Meeting has taken place too, since Mr. Sutherland was admitted, and if the question regarding him be open as now assumed, I maintain that there is not a widow or orphan on the Fund's list that may not be arbitrarily declared no longer entitled to its benefits."

Mr. D. C. Smyth now drew attention to the following letter from the Court of Directors, to the Governor of Bengal, dated 8th July, 1835 :—

"Para. 1.—With reference to our despatches dated 4th April, 1834, (No. 26) and 3d June, 1835, (No. 40) we think it right to acquaint you that Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland has not, by the loss of our covenanted service, forfeited any of his rights as a subscriber to the Bengal Civil Fund, in respect of which he is to be considered as if at the date when he ceased to subscribe to the fund he had voluntarily relinquished the service.

Para. 2.—We desire that you will communicate this opinion to the managers of the fund.

We are, &c.

(Signed by thirteen Directors.)

Mr. D. C. Smyth concluded by proposing the following amendment, which was seconed by Mr. Braddon :—

"Resolved.—That this Meeting, having duly considered the papers connected with Mr. Sutherland's case, are of opinion, that it would have been more satisfactory to the subscribers, had the question of the admission of that gentleman to the benefits of the fund been submitted by the late managers for the decision of the service at large. Adverting however to the opinion expressed in the letter lately received from the Honorable Court of Directors, under date the 8th July, 1835, and considering moreover the proceedings of the Quarterly General Meeting of the Subscribers held at the Town Hall on the 27th April last, form which it appears that Mr. Sutherland was considered by that meeting as a retired Civilian, and made subject to the payments due under Rule XXXV—it is resolved, that the proceedings of the Quarterly General Meeting held on the 27th April, 1835, be upheld."

The Hon. Mr. Melville now withdrew his resolution, substituting the following :—

"Resolved.—That the resolution of the subscribers of the 27th April, 1835, admitting Mr. Sutherland to the benefits of the institution, be reversed."

Mr. J. P. Grant, in seconding the resolution, commented on what had fallen from Mr. Rattray, which, he said, was in effect, that the proceedings of a Quarterly Meeting were irrevocable, even if nine gentlemen,—nine conspirators he would call them,—for he was aware no members of the fund would attempt to do what he was putting on supposition,—were to assemble and vote that thirteen lakhs should be divided amongst them. This was a strong case he would allow, yet according to Mr. Rattray's construction of Rule XXX. the protests of the remainder of the service would be of no avail, and the resolution of the nine must be carried into effect.

Mr. D. C. Smyth reminded Mr. Grant that by Rule X. all monies belonging to the fund in India, are kept in the Public Treasury, and subject only to the direction and controul of the trustess and managers of the fund. Mr. Grant complained of the interruption, and thought the meeting would have better understood his argument had they heard it. He contended that the view taken by Mr. Rattray, if acted upon, would tie up the hands of the whole service.

Mr. J. W. Alexander did not think the whole service was a fair tribunal for the consideration of this question, irritated as they now were, and influenced as he feared they would be, by the manner in which the subject had been discussed in the Mofussil papers. In his opinion, as the admission of Mr. Sutherland had not been brought under the cognizance of the subsequent meetings, the service had virtually confirmed the resolution.

Mr. H. Torrens said Mr. Alexander's argument was of the most extraordinary description that it had been his lot to hear. What! Because a man is angry, has he no claim to vote on questions concerning his own money ?

A good deal of conversation ensued, of which the reporter cannot give an outline. At length the discussion turned on the right of proxies to vote on the resolution and the amendment. The Secretary then reported that the letters received from the Mofussil stood as follows :—

|---|---|
| Against Mr. Sutherland's admission ..... | 75 |
| For his admission ..... | 4 |
| Majority..... | 71 |

Considerable discussion followed, in which Mr. J. P. Grant, Mr. Colvin, and Mr. Melville took part, chiefly regarding the construction to be put upon the Court's two letters which, it was urged, merely contained the court's opinion, and were not imperative. Mr. Grant declared that he had the highest respect for Mr. Sutherland, with whom he was on terms of personal intimacy, but the service must not consider individual interests but that which is proper and right. He was decidedly of opinion that Mr. Sutherland had ceased to have any claim to the benefit of the fund, and, though he had the highest respect for the Court of Directors, were they to send a special order cancelling their own former decision, the course he would suggest was to respectfully ask them to consider their order. The Hon. Mr. Melville observed that it was highly improbable that the Court's former order should have been unknown to Mr. Sutherland, which defined the date of his retirement to be in April, 1828, when he ceased to subscribe to the fund. So, having discontinued his subscription before paying up the complement stipulated in the rules, he had necessarily forfeited all claim. The Chairman observed that the fact of Mr. Sutherland's retirement had been a matter of reference to the Court form this Government, and it could not be expected that he would pay up his subscription pending the reference. It was not fair to "trip him up" upon a hard construction of the rules. Mr. Grant could not allow the discussion to close without "one little word about tripping up." God forbid that he should be justly accused of tripping any man up, especially where his family was concerned. But in this case he thought Mr. Sutherland was "tripping up" the service, in asmuch as he offered £500 as an equivalent for £10,000. He could not believe that the founders of the fund ever contemplated that a member having quitted the service to engage in a mercantile establishment where he had the chance of making an enormous fortune, should, in the event of failure, fall back upon the resources of his humble brethren. Mr. Millet warmly supported Mr. Grant. Mr. R. D. Mangles called attention to the vast majority of votes (proxies included) against Mr. Sutherland, if Mr. Melville's resolution was pressed to a division, and recommended that Mr. Sutherland's friends should concede that the matter be referred de novo to the whole service. To this Mr. Rattray would not accede, on the ground, as we understood, that the question had been formally decided by a competent meeting, and that the whole service had not heard the arguments during the present discussion. He thought the votes of proxies ought not to be taken on the question. Mr. R. D. Mangles expressed his astonishment that it should be advanced in Calcutta that a meeting held here ought not to receive the votes of the whole service. Mr. Colvin said such a course would be most extraordinary indeed; to shut out the whole service by one of the most unreasonable quibbles ever devised.

The discussion ended in the adoption of the following Resolution by a majority of 28 to 5.—Messrs. Rattray, Braddon, J. W. Alexander, Wm. Young, and Wm. Bracken being the only dissentients:

"Resolved,—That the motion submitted to the Meeting by Mr. Melville, and the amendment proposed by Mr. Smyth, be forwarded with a letter to each subscriber to the Fund, requesting him to forward his vote for the original motion, or for the amendment, direct to the Secretary, and that the result of the votes be reported by the managers to the next General Quarterly Meeting"

Mr. Elliott's case was next brought forward and soon disposed of by the adoption of a similar course, upon the motion of Mr. Morley, seconded by Mr. Millet.—

"Resolved,—That the question of the admission of Mr. Elliot, be referred to the service at large."

Which resolution was carried nem. con., and the meeting then broke up, after the usual vote of thanks to the chair.—Englishman.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY.

The dinner on St. Andrew's Day was not so numerously attended as on the last occasion. About one hundred and fifty persons sat down, amongst whom, as guests, were the Governor-General, the Chief Justice, and the Commander-in-Chief and party, Col. Morrieson and Mr. Robertson were prevented by indisposition from attending, J. F. Leith, Esq. presided, and Dr. Mellis acted as Croupier. After the cloth was drawn, the following toasts were proposed from the chair, and drank with the usual honors.

The King.—"God save the King."

The Queen and Royal Family.—"She is a winsome wee thing."

Mr. Leith.—The next toast is a national one, and according to usage is to be drank in solemn silence.

Pious Memory of St. Andrew.—"Caledonia."

Mr. Leith.—On a night like the present, the anniversary of our tutelar saint, we may be excused, if we separate ourselves for a moment from our English and Irish brethren by indulging in nationality of feeling. To them I would say, they may rest assured that the Scotchman who most loves his country will be the most solicitous to uphold the union of the three kingdoms. Gentlemen, the present toast is the Land of Cakes, and so far we carry with us the sympathies of our guests that they, like ourselves, are exiles from their native land and looking towards home—where

> 'None are so desolate but something dear,
> Dearer than self, possess or possessed
> A thought.

This toast conjures up before us those scenes and places which are connected in our minds with some of the dearest ties and warmest associations of kindred and of country. Time and place are as nothing; we are carried back in imagination to the haunts of our boyhood, to the sunny spot where the noisy game, or the feats of daring, drew us when released from school; or to the more secluded spot—to us almost classic ground—where doggedly we sat to con our daily task. Pride of country is a characteristic of our countrymen; and this has at times been described as a weakness, while at others it has been named as a virtue. It is certainly not a mere instinct—a reason may be well assigned. Is it not the romance and poetry of our early history—the chivalrous struggles of our ancestors against fearful odds to achieve our national independence and civil liberty, and their heroism and noble daring which draw forth our sympathy towards them and towards our country, and which form the subject of an honest pride? Scotland, for nearly a thousand years, was torn and distracted by sanguinary conflicts and cruel wars—and it is but as yesterday that she has beaten her claymores into ploughshares, and her spears into pruning hooks. Each mountain top has its cairn,—a monument to fallen heroes; each glen is hollowed by its own traditional story; not a spot of earth but has its legend—"where at each step imagination burns." A new day has dawned on Scotland. She has now taken her place among the nations of civilized Europe—her once deadliest foes are now her most cherished friends—the fiery cross of war has given place to the green olive tree of peace, while the arts and sciences which adorn and advance man in the social scale, are cultivated by her sons, so as to encrease her wealth and promote her happiness. No other nation has made such rapid strides from barbarism to civilization: may we not, therefore, as Scotchmen well be proud? We are accused, and with truth, of a love of wandering; but, if I may judge of your feeling by my own, there is not a man among you who does not wish to revisit the scenes, and to embrace the friends, of his earliest years, and who does not sometimes breathe a hope that, at last, he may sleep with his fathers in his native land.

The Land of Cakes.—"Auld lang-syne."

Mr. Leith.—In proposing the next toast I fulfil one of the most pleasing duties of the evening, as I can calculate on your feelings, towards the subject of it, being in unison with my own. It is not the first time, and I sincerely hope it may not be the last, that this toast will be proposed from this chair, and received by you with warmth and acclamation. The distinguished guest who is the subject of it, has now for several years past honored us with his company at the returning anniversaries of this our national festival. The esteem and respect, which you entertained for him as member of council, or governor of a now subordinate presidency, cannot I am sure be encreased by his coming among us this evening—although we all estimate the condescension—as Governor-General of India (cheers.) It would be unbecoming in me as your chairman to throw the apple of discord into this assembly by any allusion to past or passing political events; these, at a convivial meeting like the present, ought to be carefully eschewed, as harmony of sentiment and feeling cannot exist where speculative opinions on politics are propounded or canvassed. The political acts of the Governor-General of India I shall not therefore dwell upon, some of them will form prominent features in the history of Brisish India. But thus much I must say, that the historian, whoever he may be, "if he writes his annals true," will ascribe to the originat r of those acts a single eye to the happiness and prosperity of the people over whom he has been called to rule. I know not a more gratifying spectacle than the exhibition in a great man of the kindlier emotions, and more ennobling feelings of our common nature in all their freshness, unblunted and unobscured by the state and circumstance of his rank; and it has appeared to me one of the most beautiful and touching traits in the character of Cæsar, as pourtrayed by Shakespear, where he makes Anthony say, of him, "When that the poor have cried Cæsar hath wept." Gentlemen our civil ruler has not been chary of like sympathies to like objects while at the same time he has proved the sincerity of his feelings by a ready hand and an open purse (cheers).

The Governor-General of India.—"Charlie is my darling."

Sir Charles Metcalfe begged the party to accept his warmest thanks in return for their kindness. The last time he had the honor to meet the party, he had had stated that he was afraid it would be some time before he had that pleasure again, and now he anticipated that this would be the last time he should meet them. But he would never forget their kindness, and the frequent opportunities they had sought to manifest it. (Cheers.)

The Croupier, in a neat address, adverted to the talent and integrity which had distinguished the Judges of the Supreme Court since its institution. He concluded by proposing,

The Chief Justice, and the Judges of the Supreme Court.—"The Judges are met."

Sir Edward Ryan.—For the honor you have conferred I return you my sincere thanks, but I do not do so for my colleague who can speak much better for himself than I can for him. I can only express my own gratitude. My colleague, can express his, I dare say—in his own tongue, if he likes to do so.

Sir John Grant was extremely happy to employ his "own tongue" in addressing the party, and in thanking them for the honor they had done his colleagues and himself. This had in part been already done by his learned friend, who, he supposed, had also thrown out a hint as to the duty of his junior (laughter.)

Mr. Leith.—The next toast is connected with the name of a distinguished guest who has honored us with his presence this evening. Gentlemen, he is a tried and veteran soldier, who reaped laurels on those glorious fields of British valour, by which a check was put to the unbounded ambition of that man, "whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones" and who menaced the very existence of our native isle as an independant state. By those victories, dearly purchased by British blood, and British lives, the rights of Europe have been secured, and Britain enjoys a lasting peace.

The Commander-in-Chief.—"See the Conquering Hero comes."

Sir Henry Fane.—I thank you, gentlemen, most heartily for the honor you have conferred. After hearing the talented civilians near me, you may be led to expect too much from a poor soldier; (cheers) but I can only say, gentlemen, that in the early part of my military career I spent a good deal of my time in the "Land o'Cakes," and that to what little fame I may have acquired the 79th Highlanders mainly contributed.

Colonel Beatson.—It has fallen to my lot to propose the next toast, and I might have lamented my inability to do it justice were Colonel Morrieson and the Members of the Supreme Council less known or less respected. But, fortunately, all who know them, revere them not less in the character of private gentlemen than in their official capacity colleagued with the Governor-General, and assisting him in ruling the destinies of this country. Pardon me, gentlemen, if I first allude to Colonel Morrieson, and as a soldier, express my happiness of seeing a brother officer admitted to that board from which, until lately, my profession, the red coats, were unfortunately excluded. Permit me also to allude to the distinguished and eloquent individual who when in England was one of the brightest ornaments of the House of Commons, and who though not a Scotchman by birth, is one, however, by descent. It has been said, that in India merit finds its way to high places,—a remark, the truth of which I am disposed to admit, at least, so far as regards the members of Council appointed by the Court of Directors. I confess, gentlemen, that I look at the Supreme Council of India with feelings of national pride, for,—bearing in mind that one gentleman claims to be a Scotchman by descent,—a majority of the members are countrymen. Gentlemen, fill a bumper to

Colonel Morrieson, and the Supreme Council of India.—"The Gatherin."

Sir Henry Fane.—I must necessarily, very much regret, that the absence on account of indisposition of the other Members of Council obliges me to rise and offer thanks for the toast. I do so, however, briefly but sincerely, and in a manner very inferior to what they would have done had they been present.

Colonel Dunlop rose and proposed the health of the Ladies of the Presidency.—Tune, "Green Grow the rushes O."

Sir John P. Grant.—Gentlemen, I request you will fill a bumper. I rise with particular pleasure to propose to you a toast which I am sure you will drink with kindness. I rise as a member of this meeting to express my sense of the services of the gentleman whose health I am about to propose, and as a private friend to bear my humble testimony to his worth and talent. I think, I need not tell you the toast is that of the chairman (cheers.) To you who have known him from his exertions in the capacity of a member of this community, I need say nothing; and of the many qualities which distinguish him in private life, I will say nothing, for he is present; but, I will say the remark may be applied to him, to which, in our country, is attached some credit,—that he comes from a good stock. I have been connected with some of his friends in political and in private life, and I am quite sure he will never show himself unworthy of his connexions, while I can assure him that his best exertions will not be more than adequate to equal their merit (cheers). And now, gentlemen, as our chairman cannot very consistently inform the huzzurs that we are about to drink his own health I will thank you to give them a hint or perhaps you will take one from me (cheers).

The Chairman.—"Within a mile of Edinburgh Town."

Mr. Leith.—I rise to return thanks for the honor which has been just conferred upon me,—to Sir John Grant for the very kind expressions he has used towards me, and beyond my deserts, and to you for the very gratifying manner in which you have responded to his toast. Much as I estimate the honor of being called to preside at a meeting of my countrymen such as this, I cannot but regret for your sakes that one more conversant with the duties of the chair and better able to fulfil them had not been your chairman.—I could have wished that Sir John Grant himself had been your chairman; at the same time, that I am most sensible of my own deficiency in this respect I yield to none in the amor patria,—that love of country which warms the heart of every true Scot. Before sitting down allow me to propose another toast, which, although not one of the regular toasts of the evening, is one truly Scottish in sense and sound, and will fall on your ears like music and warm your hearts. It is the name of a highland laird—and I will venture to say, that it is the proudest title in the estimation of the distinguished guest to whom it belongs. Gentlemen, it is a name associated with my earliest recollections, and connected in my mind with all that is independent and honest, and with public and private worth, accompanied at the same time with a warmth of feeling towards his and our native land which is not one of the least of his virtues in our eyes. I could have wished, that when translated to a higher office, the duties of which he considers incompatible with the humbler duties of this chair to which I am his unworthy successor, that he had dropped the mantle of his inspiration upon me so that I might have spoken with his eloquence and been embued with his enthusiasm. Gentlemen, I have the honor to propose the health of

Sir JOHN GRANT rose to return his best thanks to the company and to the chairman for the kindness the former had shewn in doing what the latter had proposed. There were no words in which his health could have been proposed so well calculated to call forth his feelings, for he willingly acknowledged that the title was the dearest to his mind of all others. It was that which connected him to a country to which they all belonged, and which bound him to every man, who, like himself, gloried in the name of Scotsman. It was not to be supposed that his feelings were at all distinct from those which ought and separate Scotland from the rest of the world. He did not profess to be citizen of the world; he was a Scotchman, and had Scottish feelings. Those feelings he could readily extend to others, but believe him, the meeting would never be worse men for recollecting they were Scotchmen, and that to Scotland they owed their first feelings (cheers.)

Mr. COCHRANE.—We now approach, Mr. Chairman, the ancient and time honored names of William Wallace and Robert Bruce. Many and noble monuments have been erected in our land to the defenders of their country. No sumptuous marble shafts, no columned trophies, no splendid memorial of well earned greatness mark the spots where the mortal remains of these gallant men lie buried. Hundreds of years have rolled over their sepulchres, but the memory of the great and glorious actions they performed in defence of the liberties of Scotland, is still as firmly fixed in the grateful remembrance of their countrymen, as that very liberty which their great deeds established. Let it not be considered that meetings such as these are unimportant. Such meetings, and the commemoration of such acts keep alive the spirit of freedom in the word. Dying, as Wallace did, for all that is ennobling or dignifying in human nature,—that one great cause,—his memory can never die, and his laurels will ever bloom. Such names require no illustrative elegance of beautiful language to heighten—not the purest or most classical expressions to embellish or adorn. It is not only because your ancestors entertained such sentiments and venerated such men in times long before our days, but because such sentiments are not merely true but are properly your own, that I now call on you to fill your glasses to

"The memory of Sir William Wallace and Robert Bruce."—"Scot's wha hae," and song by Mr. R. S. Thomson.

Mr. W. P. GRANT.—I must interrupt for a short time longer the conviviality of this meeting, whilst I ask of them to devote a glass to the memory of an illustrious Scotsman, and I know no fitter opportunity than immediately after you have paid homage to the names which were so eloquently brought to your notice by my friend who has just sat down, to introduce the name of one who has done more than any one I am acquainted with to make those great names known to the world at large. We Scotsman must feel that to him we owe that others have become acquainted with the beauties of our country, and the manners, feelings, and worth of our countrymen. We feel that to him we owe that even here amid the palaces and swamps of Bengal, we can, in our imagination, smell our native heath and see our native hills and woods around us; while there is no one, be he English, or French, European, or American, who will not willingly join us in devoting one glass to the memory of the man, to whom they owe more true enjoyment than to any one I know.

The memory of Sir Walter Scott.—"Lochaber no more."

Mr. LEITH.—The wooden walls of old England have formed the theme of many a song and many a story, and the honor and interests of Britain are so identified with the honor and prosperity of her Navy, that I at once and without further preface propose the next toast.

Lord Auckland and the British Navy.—"Rule Britannia."

Mr. LEITH.—As the son of a soldier, and connected by other and near ties with the army, I have peculiar pleasure in proposing the next toast, and I am sure you will drink to it with equal pleasure when I inform you that it is to do honor to the men who peril their lives in defence of our altars and our hearths.

Lord Hill and the British Army.—"British Grenadiers. Song "British Bayonets," by Mr. R. J. R. Campbell.

Sir Henry Fane returned thanks.

Mr. LEITH.—Gentlemen I have already given the British Army, and I have now the pleasure of giving the Indian Army, which has signalized itself in so many brilliant engagements from Plasseye down to Bhurtpore, and which can number among its heroes such names as Clive, Ochterlony, Gillespie, Lake and Combermere. This is said truly to be a government of opinion, but I for one feel more personal security from the conviction that we have it in our power, in case of need, to supply and enforce that opinion by the strongest of all arguments, the last argument of kings, the sword.

The Commander-in-Chief, and the Indian Army.—"Go where glory waits thee."

Sir HENRY FANE.—Gentlemen, I have been in this country much too short a time to deserve the honor you have just conferred on me, and I would rather that it were given to my friend on my right, to whom indeed it is due, who has contributed to the honor of the Indian Army in every possible way, and whose experience and long services point him out as the proper person to return thanks on their behalf.

Brigadier BROWN.—It is very true, gentlemen, and very happy I am to be here to tell it to you (laughter,) I have had some experience, about fifty-two years in the Indian Army, during which period I have seen a little service; nevertheless I am not yet satisfied, and would be happy to see as much more under our present Commander-in-Chief (much applause.)

The Croupier then proposed the health of the Secretary to the party, but our seat unfortunately was at the head of the table, and we were unable to hear Dr. Mellis distinctly. The toast was drank with loud applause.

Mr. J. C. Wilson returned thanks.

Mr. LEITH.—To Scotchmen the next toast calls up hallowed and endearing recollections, as her persecutions are a part of the history of our country, and to her we are indebted much, in the early struggles of our ancestors, to secure their infant liberties. The Church of Scotland read a lesson to the whole world, how a few devoted men, by moral force, with determined perseverance, and a righteous cause, could withstand and overcome tyranny and oppression. Gentlemen, that persecuted Church, which was contained in the hollows of the rocks, and was driven to nestle with the eagle in the fastnesses of their native mountains, is now spreading her communion to the furthest portions of the earth. In India we find her taking a prominent part in the emancipating mind from the trammels of ignorance and superstition, and assisting to carry the electric chain of knowledge to the remotest corners of the globe, and on to remotest ages.

The Kirk of Scotland.—"My ain kind dearie."

Mr. ANDEW WIGHT proposed a toast—he did so with some hesitation, for he confessed he was not able to do justice to the subject; however he yielded to none in drinking it with enthuiasm.

The Lassies of Scotland.—"Lassie wie the lint white locks."

Mr. Cochrane briefly proposed the health of the Croupier. Certainly we have not heard from our worthy Croupier the eloquence which mingled "the roar of the cataract with the clang of machinery," but we have what is better, a worthy, straight-forward, and warm-hearted Scotchman who is not ashamed of his country.

The Croupier.—"There's cald kail inAberdeen."

The Croupier returned thanks in his peculiar and forcible manner, warmly congratulating his countrymen and the guests on the return of the annual festival. In conclusion the Croupier proposed.

The Memory of Burns.—"The flower of the Forset."

Mr. Leith.—This next toast was early associated in my mind, with the wonders and enchantments in the tales of "The Arabian Nights." The Civil Servant of India was the Alladin of my fancy who was surrounded, by the aid of his good Genii, with groves of golden and silver fruit, a source of inexhaustible wealth. These early dreams have not turned out quite so extravagant or imaginative, as some other of my youthful fancies. Personal intercourse with many members of the Civil Service has, however, convinced me, that they are well worthy of their good fortune, and that a more upright, high principled, and honorable body does not exist than the Civil Service of India.

The Civil Service in India.—"Todlin hame."

Sir Charles Metcalfe, returned thanks as the oldest member of the civil service present.

The Croupier proposed,

The Bar of India.—"Groves of Blarney."

Mr. Osborne.—I return thanks in the absence of other members of the bar more eminent and better known to you. They have usually attended this meeting on former occasions; their absence from the present I am unable to account for. Of course, they have received invitations, and I can only attribute their absence to indisposition (laughter.) What is the nature of their malady I do not know,—perhaps it is connected with the inclemency of the season,—they have been paying too little attention to the res vestryaria.—I mean the res vestiaria, (much laughter.) However, be their indisposition physical or mental, I can but regret their absence. If physical, they should have attended, for I have always heard, and it has become a proverb, "you ought to stuff a cold," and they would have had plenty of opportunities of performing that operation this evening. If mental, why then, I regret their absence, as they would, in the hilarity, good fellowship, and spirit of conviviality which has been evinced to night, have found where withal to dissipate those crude and misty vapours of the brain which exist at present, and you, gentlemen, would have had the thanks for this toast returned in a more appropriate manner that I can pretend to (cheers.) Mr. Osborne in conclusion proposed,

The Stewards.—"The glasses sparkle on the board."

Colonel Beatson returned thanks.

Mr. Leith.—Johnson has said that the most pleasing prospect to a Scotchman's eye is the road to London! Be that as it may, I travelled that road, and spent in the metropolis of England a considerable portion of not a long life. The hospitality I there met with, and the friendship I there formed, I shall ever recur to, in whatever portion of the globe my lot may be cast, with gratitude and delight. England is our elder sister, graced with the ornaments of learning, decked with the wealth of industry, lovely in the rich profusion of the gifts of nature, and well entitled to boast that the bravest and the fairest are among her children. If any proof were required, independently of natural boundaries, that nature intended that England and Scotland should be united in one common interest, and form one people, it is to be found in the fact of the perfect amalgamation that now exists between the two nations. Gentlemen, may our only rivalry be, who shall best serve our common king, and best promote our common weal. I have now the honor to propose

Old England, and our English guests who have favored us with their Company.—"Roast beef of Old England."

Sir Charles Metcalfe, on behalf of the English guests expressed their thanks, and after alluding to the union subsisting between England and Scotland, and the beneficial results therefrom, gave,

The Emerald Isle and our Irish guests.—"Patrick's day in the morning."

Mr. Leith.—Gentlemen, I am not given to antiquarian research, and I confess that I have never yet satisfied myself of the legitimate right of Ireland to claim the honor of colonizing Scotland (laughter.) I have much pleasure, however, in claiming her as a sister, and I most sincerely wish her prosperity and happiness. Gentlemen, our brethern of the Emerald Isle are warm and leal hearted, and to them I am sure you will right willingly hold out the hand of fellowship. At the same time, let me express a hope, that the Rose, the Shamrock and the Thistle, may never be seperated, as united they will always be a match for all the world. (cheers.)

Mr. Leith.—If it be true that what is most useful is most honorable, there is nobody more respectable or entitled to more respect than the mercantile community. Commerce is the fly wheel which regulates and keeps in motion the whole machinery of society: any injury which commerce may sustain will be felt by the whole body of the people, while her prosperity will make all else prosperous. The mercantile community, contains much of the wealth and enterprise of India—and to them we look for the means—when restrictive duties are removed by the British Legislature and the local governments—of developing and working the vast resources of this great country, so as to improve the moral and physical condition of her people and increase the wealth of Great Britain. The mercantile community of Calcutta are not exceeded in intelligence, liberality and independence by any body of men—and I hope that India may still and long continue to boast that her merchants are princes.

The Mercantile Community of Calcutta.—"Money in both pockets."

The last toast having been disposed of, Sir Charles Metcalfe, Sir Edward Ryan, Sir J. P. Grant, and the Commander-in-Chief rose, the latter, on behalf of the guests, returning thanks for the hospitality and kindness they had received. Three cheers were then given by the company, and, at the suggestion of Brigadier Brown, half a dozen more. The company then congregated round the chairman and, as we are informed, the mirth and conviviality continued till an early hour in the morning. —Englishman.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF INDIA.

A general Meeting of this Society was held in the Town Hall, on Wednesday, the 11th November, 1835.

In the absence of Sir E. Ryan, the Chair was occupied by Colonel Dunlop, Vice-President.

The following Gentlemen proposed last month, were duly elected by ballot, viz.:

His Excellency Sir H. Fane; Captain W. Bell; Messrs. C. H. Cameron, A. D. Coull, W. Stevenson, Jun., M. D., D. McPherson, C. Teimroth, A. Grant, and J. Cock.

NEW MEMBERS PROPOSED.

Mr. J. C. Wilson, proposed by Mr. Kyd, seconded by Colonel Dunlop.

Captain W. Speirs of Rangoon, proposed by Mr. Kyd, seconded by Mr. John Bell.

Mr. John Allan, proposed by Mr. Storm, seconded by Mr. Gibbon.

Mr. D. B. Syers, proposed by Captain Leach, seconded by Mr. Gibbon.

Baboo Mutty Loll Seal, proposed by Captain Leach, seconded by Mr. Gibbon.

After the usual routine of reading the proceedings of the last meeting --the officiating Secretary laid upon the table a few copies of the report upon experiments at Akra—printed at the Serampore Press in a style of neatness which reflects credit on that establishment.

The following communications were then read :—

1.—From J. W. Grant, Esq., Deputy Secretary to the Governor of Bengal, dated 6th October, acknowledging the receipt of two manuscript copies of the Society's report on Akra, and intimating that the duplicate would be forwarded to the Honorable Court of Directors by the True Briton.

2.—From Messrs. Willis and Earle, under date the 17th October, advising the shipment per Bussorah Merchant of some sample bales of Akra grown cotton, and samples of twist and cloth spun from a portion of the same, in accordance with the wishes of the Society.

3.—Copy of a letter from the Officiating Secretary to Peter Auber, Esq., dated the 19th ultimo, forwading bill of lading and invoice of the samples alluded to in Messrs. Willis and Earle's advice, for the information of the Honorable Court of Directors.*

4.—From Raja Kalikrishuna Bahadur, dated 15th October, presenting a fruit which he assumes to be a lemon, measuring 28 inches in circumference, and with "a strange double division in the kernel."

As the fruit was cut at one end, and could not be preserved, the Officiating Secretary examined the inside, but could discover nothing beyond a double pulp, which is not at all uncommon in the Orange tribe. It was both externally and internally to all appearance a pumplenose, without the flavor peculiar to the West India shaddock—which the Raja terms it in a separate paper. On receipt of this communication, the Raja was solicited to send an entire specimen from the same tree, that it might be laid before the November Meeting, and to inform the Society where the fruit was reared, that any member might gratify his curiosity by ocular demonstration ; but a note from the Raja under date the 9th instant, intimates that the tree has ceased to bear.

5.—A note from Mr. Villet of the Cape, dated 12th September, presenting to the Society some "Bucca" plants, which have arrived in the Bland, in a very weak state. The Officiating Secretary was directed to make them over to Mr. Masters, at the Botanical Garden.

6.—From Mr. J. J. Dixwell, presenting a box of American maize seed, which Mr. Bell will be happy to distribute to any persons desirous of cultivating this superior corn.

7.—From Mr. Halhed, (C. S.,) presenting plants of the horse-raddish, hottentot-fig and moss-rose, brought by him from the Cape of Good Hope, which were likewise ordered to be given to Mr. Masters for propagation in the Botanical Garden.

8.—From Mr. Rainey, presenting a bottle of Sandoway tobacco seed.

9.—From Mr. P. A. Shaw, Rungpore, with a parcel of turnip seed, produced at Buxadawar.

10.—From Mr. G. F. Hodgkinson, with a cannister of madder seed, received from Smyrna viâ England, and directions for its cultivation.

10.—From Mr. Piddington, with a small packet of Bourbon cotton seed.

11.—From Mr. C. K. Robison, with a plan and description of a a continuous still invented by him.

Owing to the advanced hour, and the study requisite to understand the principle upon which Mr. Robison had constructed this still, his letter and description of it were not read ; but Mr. Kyd had heard from an Engineer in Calcutta of great experience, that it reflected the greatest credit on Mr. Robison's perseverance and ingenuity, and gave it as his opinion, that it would supercede the use of all other stills in India—when perfectly understood.

Mr. Robison appears to have had two objects in view, when he gave his attention to this subject ; first, "to construct a still better adapted to this country, than any of those hitherto introduced ;" and next, whether he "could not, in an improved apparatus, manufacture from the arrowroot plant, a spirit perfectly free from smell, taste and flavor, for the purpose of transmission to London and Paris, where such a spirit is in great demand by the perfume distillers, and is always certain of commanding a high price."

Mr. Robison although he has not perfectly succeeded in his last object, yet persuades himself, that by a selection of parts from the apparatus of the most celebrated distillers in England and France, and by a combination and new arrangement of these, with additions suggested by his own experience, he has completed a still for the temperature and climate of India on the principle of continuous distillation (the only one which Mr. Robison thinks will pay), which excels the English still of Winter and Gorty, as well as those of Boglioni and D'Rosne, the most celebrated in France not only in the quality and quantity of spirit produced, from given materials, but in the economy of fuel and superintendance, and without being so liable as any of those mentioned to get out of order.

13.—Specimens of very fine West India ginger and turmeric were presented to the Society by Mr. Kyd.

Mr. Kyd drew the attention of the Meeting to the vast importance of securing by every possible means abundant supplies of cotton seed contrasting the small extent of cultivation necessary for the production of sugar, with the unbounded demand for the meterial which is now required by the inhabitants of every part of the globe. Mr. Palmer had very kindly offered his services and influence to procure supplies of cotton for the Society ; and in addition to the orders already sent, Mr. Kyd proposed, and it was resolved, that a further sum he set aside for this purpose, and that the Officiating Secretary be requested to accept Mr. Palmer's very obliging offer.

Mr. Kyd further brought to the notice of the Meeting the heavy charge of duty made at Madras on Cape seed, transhipped at that port on their way to Calcutta, and after pointing out the consideration and liberality that had been at all times conceded to the Society by Government, it was resolved that the Officiating Secretary should address himself to Government, soliciting a remission of duties on all seeds imported either here or at the sister presidencies on account of the Agricultural Society.

Mr. Bell offered a similar suggestion in regard to the transmission of the Society's transactions, now publishing in rapid succession, which must tend more than any thing else to keep alive that degree of active interest which has lately been felt. The last resolution embraced the concurrence of the Meeting on this point

The thanks of the Society were voted for all the valuable contributions detailed above.

Physical.

The following extract of a private letter from Captain Cautley to the Secretary was read, noticing the discovery of further fossils in vast quantity in the Sewalik range.

"A trip to the Sewaliks near the Pinjore valley, lately, has introduced us to the *Anoplotherium ? in a perfect line of six molars on one side, and four ditto in the other side of upper jaw. I say Anoplotherium, for the rear molars have the distinguishing mark in the insulated mamilla pointed out by Cuvier †, as that which distinguishes the Anoplotherium from the Palæotherium, although the position of the molar bone, part of which is distinguishable, appears to differ from that of the former animal, and gives it a greater resemblance to the Palæotherium ; this is a beautiful fossil, and dug out : but I must give you a history of the last week.

"I had to visit Dádupur on canal matters, and found both Baker and Durand as eager as myself for a short excursion into the Sewaliks ; and as all our parties were out, we determined on visiting those most westerly, who were working at a village called Moginund (a common name apparently) in the Ramgurh district, about 50 miles W. of Dádupur ; our route took us through Sidara, Naraingurh, Mir ká Gurhi, Ramgurh, to the village of Móginund, which lies in a nook of these little hills, open only on the west : here we remained three days, returning to Dádupur by regular marches, and visiting Khet Purali, another little village close under the hills on our way, as near this village is a stratum of a clay conglomerate, or marl full of testaceous remains chiefly Bivalves (varieties or Unio,) reptiles, and fish ; of the former, you have already specimens, and with the latter, you shall be provided in due course. The country on this route was open and well cultivated, rice in great abundance, and cultivation of all sorts up to the foot of the hills. These hills differ much in appearance from those between the Jumna and Ganges ; the abruptly scarped precipices, and mural cliffs, with the huge strata of shingle. are here replaced by a comparatively low series of undulating hills, consisting of an eternal succession of sands and clays, with here and there beds of a coarse sandstone, or fine shingle conglomerate, accessible at all points excepting those where slips have taken place, and free from jungle and high vegetation, excepting in hollows, and the lines of ravines skirting the tributaries to the main outlets of drainage.

"The hills were covered with fossils like all the others (how they could have escaped observation before, must remain a source of wonder.) Mastodons and hippopotamus's remains looking one in the face at every step ! Amongst the remains collected were those of the rat and porcupine, too perfect to admit of any doubt. The specimens of each consisting of the palate, with the two lines of molars ! ! ? Although three days at this place, and superintending my digging parties, I must confess my inability to decide strictly whether we were working in a stratum or in debris : this may appear strange to a person who has been unaccustomed to examine and decide on the position of strata, but will be understood and appreciated I imagine, by any one who has had his attention strictly brought to bear upon the point. Shrubs, inequalities of surface, ravines, et hoc genus omne, all and each of them battling every inch ! I am, however, inclined to consider that we had both, and that we were working in both a soft sandstone stratum, and also in a superficial coating of debris. A great number of perfect bones, the whole series of a leg for instance, jaw bones, and other remains were fairly found and dug out from the rock ; and other places, huge masses of hard rock were found imbedded in the softer rock or soil, the said masses consisting in most cases of agglutinated bones : the shape of these masses give an appearance of their having fallen formerly from some parent rock, and being now found as debris ; but the circumstance of finding the connected joints of animals is altogether in favour of the excavation being in the stratum in which they were originally deposited. The question does not appear to me of much consequence, as the bones are not rounded by attrition, and are as sharp and perfect in their form and outline, as when belonging to the living animal, although frequently broken, and jammed together, as would be the case in a skeleton or a mass of bones being forced together in an upheavement of the country upon which or in which they were collected.

"I may remark that our excavation was not on the outcrop of the strata, but in the slope, and the working parties were successful in their operations at many points on the whole surface of that side of the mountain. This deposit appears to be altogether wanting in the mastodons, reptiles, and hippotami : the remains at present dug out consist of portions of anoplotherium or palæotherium, rhinoceros, hog, horse, ruminants of the most gigantic dimensions, with those of the smaller classes, carnivora, hyæna, canis, tiger (or lion), and a small species of a feline animal, a very perfect cranium of which is in the possession of Lieuts. Durand and Baker. Many of the bones of these animals are coming out perfect, and some have been found, as I before mentioned, in connected joints !

"With reverence to the Sivatherium, I regretted much my inability to obtain the dimensions of one of the mos superb fossils I suppose that ever was found ; it was unfortunately discovered and excavated by a party of work

* This fossil is either the Anoplotherium, or a new variety of the Palæotherium, and if it was not for the insulated mamilla, referred to, its classification amongst the latter genera would, I suspect, be undoubtedly correct. The discovery of more perfect remains of the head, will settle this point at once.

people employed by a gentleman with whom I was unacquainted, and although I saw the fossil when in the rock, I was prevented from getting the measurements afterwards. This specimen consisted of the femur and tibia, with the tarsal, metatarsal, and phalanges of one of these gigantic ruminants that time and patience will and must introduce us to! In the bones of all the animals discovered, there are differences from those of their existing congeners that will be pointed out hereafter; it may be sufficient here to advert to the fact. The teeth that are found at this spot are beautifully perfect, and from the softness of the matrix or rock in which they are imbedded, easily cleared and exhibited. There is an evident grouping of animals throughout! The hippopotami, mastodons, &c. which in some localities are in such abundance, are in others wanting; their place being occupied by carnivora, ruminants, &c. The testaceous remains as yet found have been accompanied by reptiles and fish. We have in fact an extended tract of country upheaved and the different groups as might be expected in their natural habitats!! It is hardly a month since I attempted, in a note on the Garial of these hills, to enumerate the probable proportions of animals that existed on this tract! During this short period, we have added another family, Rodentia, to our catalogue, and another genus of the Pachydermata, besides the splendid additions to our former list in the further elucidation of those already found, in the discovery of more perfect specimens of bone, especially of the horse, rhinoceros, and the larger ruminants!! You will join with me in an exclamation, which has been upon my lips, day after day, since the discovery of the first fragment of bone—'What shall we have next?'"

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society of Calcutta, held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments on the 7th November, 1835.

H. Hough, Esq., Superintending Surgeon of the Saugor Circle, and Allen Webb, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, proposed at last meeting, were elected Members of the Society.

The following Gentlemen were proposed as Members of the Society, viz.

Donald Stewart, Esq., M. D., Assistant-Surgeon on the Bombay Establishment, by Mr. Hutchinson and Dr. Goodeve.

Wm. Brydon, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, on this Establishment, by Dr. Stewart and Dr. J. Jackson.

Dr. Cantor, by Mr. Egerton and Mr. Hutchinson; and Dr. Hughes, Surgeon on the Madras Establishment, by Mr. Mercer and Mr. Egerton.

The name of R. J. Brassey, Esq., having been removed from the list of Members of the Society, at the previous meeting through a misunderstanding, was replaced at the request of that Gentleman.

J. MacGavestone, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, requested that his name might be withdrawn from the list of Members of the Society, which was accordingly done.

A communication was then read from R. H. Irvine, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, descriptive of two cases which had come under his notice.

The subject of Mr. Irvine's first case was a Hindoo female, 40 years of age, whose husband had beaten her on the head with a bludgeon till the cranium was laid bare and had then rubbed the end of the weapon forcibly against the bone. The integuments were lacerated in a star-like form, the different portions, covered with short stiff hair, were curled up with the hair inwards resting on the pericranium, mixed with coagulated blood and dirt. The whole superior portion of the parietal part of the frontal and occipital bones was laid bare and in the centre of the wound, about 4 square inches of the pericranium was separated from the bone, the external table of which in that situation appeared dead; there was no fracture. The wound was cleansed, the lacerated parts of the scalp brought in contact as nearly as possible, and kept there by adhesive straps; no inflammation or cerebral irritation ensued, the injured portion of the parietal bone exfoliated, notwithstanding the woman recovered entirely in about three months.

The subject of the second case was a Brahmin who was crossing the Nerbuddah in a boat; he sat with his head leaning over the gunwale, resting backwards on his neck; in this position he yawned, and the condyles of the lower jaw slipped under the zygomatic arches; his jaw had once before been dislocated. Forty days after the accident he came to Mr. Irvine. The lower jaw was at that time immoveably depressed about 2½ fingers depth, and the man could only swallow a little liquid nourishment by throwing his head backwards. Mr. Irvine endeavoured to reduce the dislocation with his hands and thumb, but ineffectually; another attempt was made with the help of powerful levers of bamboo. After much labor, and one of the levers breaking in the effort, the right condyle was forced into its place; but the left one continued immovable; the following day a stupifying does of Belladonna was given to the patient, and whilst under its influence, by using a stronger lever than before, with much violence the jaw was wrenched into its place.

Observations on some diseases of European seamen in Bengal, by D. Stuart, Esq., M. D.

Cases of cholera treated by tartar emetic and other remedies, by T. Chapman, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

The history of a fatal case of extensive disease of the spleen, by J. Eccles, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

Dr. Stuart states that having had his attention directed during the past ten months to the effect of tropical diseases upon European sailors, he was so forcibly struck with many of the peculiarities attendant upon them, that he was anxious to derive the advantage of the opinion of his medical brethren upon the subject. The number of cases treated by Dr. Stewart from 1st of Nov. 1834 to the 1st of Sept. 1835 were 244, of which all except 3, were white men recently arrived, and the majority of them suffering under acute diseases. The numbers of deaths was 14.

The diseases which Dr. Stewart made the subject of his remarks were chiefly fever and dysentery. In the first place he stated that he had observed a striking difference in the susceptibility of disease and the capability of bearing depletion existing between their officers and common seamen. This he attributes to difference of diet, and to the mode of life, which these two classes of seamen follow during a long voyage. The advantage being of course much in favor of the officers; they are consequently much less liable to severe tropical diseases; but when attacked by them they both require, and will bear bloodletting to a much greater extent than the common sailor. With the former, Dr. Stewart inculcates the employment of a very bold and unsparing antiplogistic treatment, whilst in the latter, he states that it must be used with singular caution; for the effect upon them is frequently most injurious, although at first sight they would appear imperatively to require venesection to a large extent. Their powers of life are week, and the shock is soften too great for them to bear; in these cases an opiate with the usual calomel pills should be given on the first night, before any purgative is administered, the latter being detered till the following morning, when a good night's rest will have enabled the patient to bear it with safety. In the cases of common sailors, venesection cannot with propriety be performed after the 3d day of fever, nor with safety even on that day, if it has been already once used; a very few ounces of blood taken late on that day or on the decline of the paroxysm, will be highly dangerous and not unfrequently prove fatal. In addition to the other bad consequences of these untimely bleedings, it sometimes happens that purgative medicines which have been given during the day, and which have hitherto produced little or no effect, now begin to act with violence, and destroy the patient. In such unfavourable circumstances the strength must be supported by spiced sago or some other light nourishment. When depletion is absolutely necessary at this stage of the fever, leeches are much safer than general blood letting. Dr. Stewart thinks blisters occasionally do mischief by being employed too early, before active congestion has been relieved, and the primæ viæ thoroughly cleared.

He conceives blistering to be useful in promoting the action of the capillaries, stimulating the absorbents round the great cæliac centre, to carry off serous effusion, which he considers always to take place in every paroxysm of fever. The crackling feel and crepitus, which may be perceived by placing the hand flat on the abdomen during the decline of a long paroxysm, Dr. Stewart considers to depend upon this serous effusion; this sensation is said to disappear entirely under the stimulus of a large mustard plaster, minute doses of calomel and colocynth. Blisters and calomel are decidedly injurious, if used before the action which they are intended to replace has subsided. Dr. Stewart has seen them highly deleterious in dysentery, when sufficiently vigorous antiphlogistic measures have not been premised, and the practitioner has trusted entirely to salivation and blistering. The periodicity which is remarkable in the cases of the older inhabitants of Bengal does not characterise the diseases of seamen as far as Dr. Stewart's observation goes. Seamen newly arrived in Bengal are free from fevers which may be called essential, and suffer always from those which are symtomatic of, or which are accompanied by distinct local inflammation. The cases of intermittent fever in the Howrah Hospital were old standing agues, and not fevers of recent date.

The seat of congestion in fever is, of course, liable to variation. The worst cases of fever are those which arise from exposure to the sun, continual fatigue, wet and cold combined, as was the case with some of the ships which left this port in the wet, sultry and stormy months of July and August last, and returned leaky. In the cases admitted from these vessels, the head was the organ principally affected, but though the cerebral symptoms were severe, the skin was cool and moist; and the pulse not quick or hard; and weakness and headache were all that the sufferers complained of. The lancet was, of course, inadmissible in such cases, and the treatment consisted in instantly shaving the head, giving a scrupel dose of calomel, and after a tepid bath, leaving the patient undisturbed for for six or eight hours; he could then bear twelve or sixteen leeches to the temples, and a purgative of pulv. jalap comp.; after which one grain of calomel and $\frac{1}{8}$ of a grain of antimon. and tart. and 5 or 6 grs. cathartic ext. was usually given every 3 hours, until it was time to purge again. In such cases continued and copicus catharsis is to be avoided at first, the exhausted powers of life will not stand it. The second day is the critical one, either a marked re-action takes place, and if so the case may be considered comparatively safe, while leeches, calomel and colocynth are at hand, or the collapse continues, a low delirium comes on, and the case makes a very close approach to typhus fever in its worst stages.

The question to be decided is, whether the cerebral disturbance arises from arterial action, venous congestion or serous effusion on the surface of the brain, a point, which it is often extremely difficult to determine. Dr. Stewart points out the distinguishing marks of these separate states, and proceeds to speak of the appropriate treatment. When the serous effusion is clearly established, blisters large and general, are necessary. Calomel and colocynth in repeated doses, mercurial frictions to promote absorption, and quinine to support the strength. By proper treatment he has seen more than one case to recover, in which effusion had actually taken place. Opiates are rarely of use. The only admissible sedatives are hyosciamus and camphor.

Dr. Stewart next points out the distinction between the constitution of different classes of seamen. He states that there is a certain class of men, chiefly Swedes and Danes; men with flaxen hair, light eyes and pale skin, of an encolic temperament who are very bad subjects for tropical diseases. In the fever the congestion is short and violent, the determination greatest to the head, there is also congestion of the glandular system and inflammation of the mucous follicles. In dysentery these people have an early proclivity to humorrhages and the ulcers on the colon are found on post mortem examination to be large and flat, not small, round, and deep, like those in firmer habits. In inflammation of the liver the tendency is to deep abscess, and in that of the spleen to soft enlargement and dropsical effusion. The nervous system is always disturbed from the commencement, whatever the ailment may be. They don't bear V. S. well; mercury has a very powerful, and sometimes unmanageable effect on them.

Mr. Chapman's cases of Cholera were reported at two periods, some of them in May last, and the rest in October. The first case was that of a prisoner in the Purneah jail, 21 years of age, of delicate habit, suffering from a pleuritic affection. At 10 P. M. he was seized with purging and vomiting of watery fluid, pulse weak, skin cold, eyes sunk, slight spasms of the lower extremities and great prostration of strength: half an ounce of the following mixture was administ red every two hours; tartarized antimony 10 grs. spirit of wine half an oz. water 8 oz. The first doze produced a good deal of nausea, increased prostration of strength and excessive thirst. At 12 P. M. the pulse was scarcely perceptible He was then allowed toast and water ad libitum and from this time the purging abated much; he improved fast, and by 8 o'clock the following morning he was free from all unpleasant symptoms, except a little debility; even the original pleuritic affection was entirely removed. He took in six doses of the solution and after the first 2 hours the patient drank as much toast and water as he desired, but no urine was passed, notwithstanding the quantity of fluid which he swallowed. Mr. Chapman considers that this case affords strong proofs in favor of the tartar emetic plan, and he is astonished that this simple remedy has fallen into disuse in this country. He then proceeds to offer a theory of the action of the tartar emetic in this disease. He states that the principal object in the treatment of cholera is to restore fluidity to the inspissated blood, and he conceives that the tartar emetic tends to effect this desideratum by producing a state of the body highly favourable to absorption, viz. a degree of nausea in which the lost constitutents of the blood are rapidly taken up, by which it is thereby restored to its original fluidity. To aid this effect it is necessary to present some liquid to the absorbents, upon which they can act; this liquid may either be water alone or combined with some saline ingredient. He is the more inclined to entertain this opinion from observing that in the foregoing case the tartar emetic was inefficacious, until the patient was allowed to drink as much fluid as he wished. He admits however that a priori this theory of the action of tartarized antimony is not borne out by the effects usually observed in the employment of that medicine.

Mr. Chapman was confirmed in these views by the occurrence of another case somewhat similar to the one detailed above: in the case alluded to vomiting took place only once after the antimony had been administered. Toast and water ad libitum was again given; no urine passed, and the patient recovered without the aid of any other remedies.

In Mr. Chapman's second communication he states that the total number of cases which were treated on the tartar emetic plan were 30, of whom 12 recovered. They appear to have been, upon the whole, rather of a slight character, and none of them were marked by any great severity of symptoms. He says that the nausea produced by the tartar emetic had the effect of checking both purging and vomiting, and of allaying the irritability of the stomach to such a degree, that the patients were enabled to drink water to any extent with exciting vomiting or retching. Urine was not passed till at least 8 hours, and frequently not untill 24 had elapsed after the urgent symptoms of the disease had subsided.

The weak and emaciated require a weaker does. To the feeble ℥ ss of Mr. Longford's mixture should be given every two hours, and to the stronger patients the same quantity may be safely administered every hour, and repeated in each to the 3d or 4th time From the total number of fatal cases which occurred, Mr. Chapman is disposed to feel less confidence in the tartar emetic plan than he did, when making his former report; yet he considers it may be still worthy of a trial in certain modifications of the complaint; what those modifications are, he cannot pretend to say. At any rate, the only state in which it can be given with safety is the first stage, if delayed beyond the first 2 hours, it is useless.

Mr. Chapman then relates, that he found temporary benefit to ensue from the use of common salt in solution in a case which had resisted the tartar emetic and although the man eventually died, he was induced to make trial of it in several other instances, apparently with considerable advantage. In administering the saline solution, he found it advisable to limit the quantity of fluid taken by the patient to a very small portion, as it appeared to interfere with the action of the salt; this being the reverse of what took place in the administration of tartar emetic

The subject of Mr. Eccles's case was a Gunner of Artillery, aged 23 years, admitted on the 3d December 1834; he had been subjeet to intermittent fever, and the spleen was much enlarged, but could not be distinctly felt; there was great tension of the right hypochondriac region, and of the lower part of the abdomen; oppressed breathing, dull pain in the region of the spleen, pulse natural, tongue brown. He was purged, twenty leeches were applied to the left side, and pills of pil-hydrag. Ferri Selph. Aloes, and Ext. of Colocynth were given night and morning. On the 2d the leeches were repeated and again on the 3d; 10 drops of tincture of iodine and of hyosciamus were ordered to be taken 3 times a day. On the 5th the swelling and tension were diminished. On the 7th he had a slight paroxysm of intermittent fever, and the pain in his side increased; twenty leeches were again applied, but these not affording relief, and his pulse being hard and frequent, and his respiration oppressed 58 oz. of blood were drawn from his arm with considerable relief, and afterwards 30 more leeches were applied, and 2 grains of calomel with half a grain of ante. tart. given every hour.

On the 8th he was much relieved, and able to take a full respiration, was well purged and had a soft pulse, the abdomen was much swollen. The calomel and ante. tart. were continued, and a blister was applied in the evening.

On the 9th he was worse, the respiration oppressed, and the countenance pale and anxious, he complained of great exhaustion; mouth slightly affected by the calomel; he grew worse during the next day, and expired on the 11th On opening the abdomen a reddish fluid, mixed with pus, escaped, adhesions of long standing were found between the spleen and the viscera. The spleen weighed 5lbs. 8oz. Its organization was much altered; when cut it presented innumerable small tubercles The liver had no lobes aparent; was of a light color, and was of the consistence of cartilage.

CHOWRINGHEE THEATRE.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The AGNESE was repeated on the 6th November in substitution for the EDOARDO E CRISTINA which it was found impossible to get up with finished effect by that day, although under preparation for some weeks, we believe. A contemporary assigns as the cause of this disappointment, the lamented indisposition of Mrs. Goodall Atkinson, but whatever the cause may have been, if its effect was to mar perfection in rehearsals, we consider the Committee of Directors of these performances to have done no more than their duty towards the public that came forward so largely and liberally to support the establishment of a regular Opera, in withdrawing an imperfectly prepared piece, even at the eleventh hour. Indeed, if we have a complaint to prefer against that illustrious senate of Dillettanti, it is that they should have thought it necessary to announce the repetition of AGNESE apologetically, instead of giving us this beautiful Opera twice in succession as a matter of course, if not three or four times in like manner with the previous performances of the series. We did suppose that a better taste had been of late established under the influence of the new administration, and that even our pensive public at length arrived at the satisfactory conviction, that Operas are not things intended to be seen only, but also to be heard? now heard they cannot possibly be—in any degree approaching to correct exposition of the composer's meaning—until repeated and successive representations in public have drilled some forty or fifty actors, choristers, and unruly instrumentalists into the wonder—for such it almost seems—of separately and accurately contributing each their single notes to that combination of sound which comes forth a perfect and pleasing whole. Even in Europe, where Operas are performed every day or alternate day during the season or the entire year, and where the orchestra and singers are in constant practice, a new Opera, or one revived after a long interval, is repeated several times successively before it is considered to be justly obnoxious to severity of criticism. Here with a scant Company and a raw Band, an Opera is played twice and then left to be forgotten perhaps a year!

It is but just to bear this in mind before yielding to the inclination generally felt—and by none more than ourselves—to vent critical anathemas on the Chowringhee Orchestra. In the present case, an additional reason for indulgent consideration is to be found in the circumstance that this second performance of AGNESE was got up unavoidably in a very great hurry, and with only a single rehearsal as we understand, the very night before it was produced. The instrumentalists were accordingly as usual noisy—a besetting sin even in London—and more than usually careless and inattentive to the singers and to the business of the Stage. We would fain say they will do better the next time, but that we fear there is no chance of their having the opportunity to improve in their accompaniment of AGNESE at least, which piece we presume is to be consigned to the customary oblivion after these two representations.

The performance on Friday was in all other respects save that of the offending Band, superior to that of the former night. We certainly never heard Schieroni to greater advantage than in her beautiful Duo with Bettali, in the harp romanza, and above all in the concluding Rondo. She was in excellent voice which enabled her to give full scope to her charming talent for dramatic musical expression. Pizzoni's personation of UBERTO we have always considered a performance of a very high order, though to some ultra fastidious and artificial tastes its very truth to nature may make it occasionally painful rather than pleasant Bettali was as usual the best possible Gentleman Buffo, and his part in the serious Duo with AGNESE was given with great skill and his customary precision of intonation. Our worthy friend the Doctor delivered his pleasant philosophizings about the evils of the tender passion and the unavailing endeavours of Socrates and Galen with the same effect and the same results as before—a hearty encore. The subordinate female parts were not perhaps quite so effective as on the last occasion, owing to the hurry with which the piece had been got up and the comparative inexperience of the performers who cheerfully came forward at such short notice. A similar slight deficiency was observable, and from similar causes in the chorus, from which censure, however, if censure it be, we must except the beautiful and simple movement which opens the second act. In what we have said disapprovingly of the accompaniments to AGNESE it is hardly necessary to observe that we do not by any possibility include the talented amateurs who so kindly lent their accustommed aid. Nothing could possibly be more effective and beautiful than the harp and flute of Friday evening, as the audience sufficiently testified by profound attention followed by rapturous applause, nor must we omit to add that the celebrated Horn Solo in the second act was exceedingly well played, though abounding in difficulties of no common kind. We cannot conclude without expressing our obligations to Mr. Linton, who did not scruple to contribute his utmost to the evening's performances though still labouring under severe and distressing cold, owing to which he was again compelled to deprive us of the aria and duetto which would otherwise have made the second representation of AGNESE complete and effective.

EDOARDO E CRISTINA is, we learn, already in full rehearsal for Friday se'nnight; and we anticipate a performance of no ordinary degree, as the music with the judicious interpolations and curtailments that have been effected, is of the highest order of merit.

EDUARDO E CRISTINA.—This Opera was one of the most successful of the last series, and we anticipated extraordinary gratification from its repitition on the 20th November. It must however be confessed that our anticipations were but moderately realized. The piece certainly went off upon the whole tamely, and it was received by the audience, excepting in some parts which met with warm and well merited applause, quiescently. We know not exactly to what to attribute this negative success which attended the performance. The cast of the piece was on this occasion at least as strong as it was when the Opera was last played, and we have reason to believe that there was no lack of labor and no parsimony or negligence in the preparatory doings. There were indeed some departures from the former score which were unavoidably, partly owing to the roles of Eduardo and Cristina being restored, and partly owing to the want of some of the music which belonged to Monsieur Planel, and which we suppose followed the fortunes of that gentleman. These changes, however, were not of sufficient importance to influence public favor to any extent. Without speculating further upon a point which after all is referable to taste about which the proverb says we must not dispute, but about which nevertheless at least half of the time of man is consumed in contending—we will proceed to a brief notice of the Opera.

Eduardo e Christina has never taken rank as one of Rossini's chef d'œuvres, and it is not much known out of Italy. It has nevertheless many pieces of great beauty, and some of an high order of excellence. It is needless to say that fashion is not a whit less tyrannical in the matter of music than in other things, and the run and renown of an Opera will often depend upon its association with the name and fame of some singer of celebrity, far more than on its merit as a composition. The mere circumstance of the principal part in an Opera having been written for a Mariani, a David, a Pisaroni or a Galli, and having afforded a favorite star the opportunity of gathering fresh laurels, would ensure an eclatante reception throughout musical Europe to Melodramas like "Semiramide," "Ricciardo e Zoraide," "La Donna del Lago" and "La Gazza Ladra," even if they had not one tythe of the merit which distinguishes these works, and even if they were not shielded from all danger of neglect by the notoriety of their emanation from the genius of the greatest composer of the age. "Eduardo e Cristina" had not the advantage of coming out under the auspices of any singer of gigantic reputation and to this may probably be attributed its being less generally known than many Operas of far less claim to celebrity. It is right however to observe that Rossin's merit as the author of "Eduardo e Cristina" must not be measured by the music of Friday evening. It would have been quite impossible, with the voices which constitute the capital of our company, to produce the Opera in integrity,—transpositions are invariably injurious and seldom fail to obliterate or obscure some of the more delicate shades of composition—unless indeed it be assumed that a transposer can have a more accurate perception of what is appropriate to the sentiment to be conveyed than he who originally "endowed his purposes" with music, possessed. But bad as transpositions are, excisions and intrusions are infinitely worse, for the process here is not one of simple addition and substraction, and unless much skill is possessed by the operator the spirit of the composition is apt to evaporate and what is left may wear the appearance of a creation "undique collatis membris." We do not by any means say that this was the result of the alterations in "Eduardo e Cristina," although we do not think that some of the selections were particularly happy. The first air of Eduardo for instance appears to us ill-chosen both in reference to the quality of the composition, and to its adaptation to Signora Schieroni's voice and manner. The duett in the second act between Cristina and Carlo we are still more disposed to take exception to, as we think it deficient in character and coloring, and meagre in melody. These two pieces as well as the Trio in the first act are productions of Mercadante, a composer of acknowledged eminence, but in professing to give an Opera of Rossini's, it appears to us hardly proper to introdue so great a portion of music of another author, especially when the selection is of such a sort as to impart a character of heaviness to the whole performance. We except the Trio which is a truly beautiful piece and would enrich any Opera,—but unfortunately it was somewhat marred in the execution.

The Overture is not remarkable—the opening movement is good—but the rest is a quodlibet, lively and spirited enough but not possessing any striking excellence. Throughout the whole Opera we meet with passages which may be recognized as the elements of some of the most highly wrought pieces in "Ricciardo e Zoraide" and "Semiramide." The transcendant piece in the Opera, as it seems to us, is the prison scena in the second act—the Chorus preparatory to Eduardo's recitative has great originality and character,—the subsequent Preghiera is of surpassing beauty, and the concluding Allegretto movement which is introduced by a spirit stirring chorus is a gem. Of the concerted pieces the Finale to the First Act is we think the most remarkable—it has many pleasing melodies and some passages of fine instrumental effect—the Quintetto movement is impressive, and as a whole, this Finale will bear comparison with any we know.

Mrs. Atkinson's performance of Cristina seemed to us eminently successful, and we are inclined to consider it as her best. Both in her first Cavatina and in her rondeau in the second Act she sang with great effect and in a manner which shows that she must have studied her author with assiduity. The music of "Eduardo" does not appear to us suited to Signora Schieroni's style. She performed and sang in it, as she always does, with grace, taste and expression, but with the exception of the prison scence which we have already noticed, and which brought out in full force all her excellences—the Opera affords no scope for those talents which found such ample field for display in "Tancredi" and "Arsace:" Carlo is not an interesting part, but Bettali did his best for it, and he sang his air with great delicacy and sweetness. There was no show-piece for Pizzoni, and in the concerted pieces there was some appearance of carelessness on his part which is scarcely excusable and which after his late success in Uberto he ought to be very jealous of exhibiting - no one will believe that he cannot learn his part if he tries to do so. It is not often that we have to remark on imperfections in the dialogue part of Italian Operas, but on this occasion the Recitative limped sadly at times, and there were several awkward pauses and repetitions. This should be carefully looked to for the credit of the Opera.

As we have not failed to offer occasionally a friendly admonition to the Orchestra when we thought them in fault, it is no less an act of justice than a satisfaction to ourselves to give them praise for the very creditable way in which the Instrumental Department was conducted on this occasion. We do not of course mean that there were not at times lapses, but as a whole we are not sure that this Opera has not been better accompanied than any of the series. In the Finale there was far more of precision and ensemble than we have been accustomed to observe, and the stretta—the coups de fouet as the French term these perorations, was really good.

The spectacle was well got up, some of the grouping at the end of the first Act, and the battering, and blue lightning at the conclusion were well designed and executed. Of the dresses, it is not our intention to say any thing in the controversial way—it may be admitted that the Princes and Warriors of Sweden did not wear Grecian dresses. So far good—but what did they wear? We will endeavour to answer this question when we have concluded a laborious investigation into which we mean some day to enter with the view of discovering whether Rossini's Carlo, is Charles the first or Charles the twelfth, or whether he is a "soft intermediate degree." In the meantime we have only to say that the dresses proper or improper are very magnificent and seemly. Mrs. Atkinson's is probably the nearest approach to the costume of the Northerns, but it did not assort over well with the others.

The house was tolerably filled,—Sir Henry Fane honoring the performance with his presence.

The Merchant of Venice.—A mutilation of Shakespear's beautiful play of the Merchant of Venice was presented to rather a numerous audience on the 13th November: by some extraordinary mistake every one appeared more than usually out of his place and the failure was consequently complete with some trifling exceptions of certain passages, of which Mrs. Leach's "It droppeth like the gentle dew from Heaven," ranks first.

Shylock was enacted by the favorite Amateur known under the soubriquet we believe of "our Kean;" but we could trace no just cause for the title deed in the performance of the arduous character of the Jew, the "chef d'œuvre" of that wonderful little man. The Shylock of Shakespeare is, we conceive, a man of strong passions and sensitive feelings, stung and goaded by the prejudice of the time, his loss upon loss, the taunts of the unworthy and the ingratitude of his own flesh and blood,—at one period of the play, into a passionate outpouring of anguish, one of these magnificent bursts of feelings that have been smouldering like the heaving fires of a volcano, gushing forth at last in one terrific sweep of destruction. After years of patient endurance,—"for sufferance is the badge of all his tribe,—" after daily kicks and spittings they steal his child, his money, the staff and prop of his house, and leave him "no satisfaction" but revenge. The spirit of his religion pompts him to it, the whole current of his blood sets to it like to "the Pontic Sea that knows no ebb," and another of the tribe comes to allay the tumult of his sorrows with the news of Antonio's losses and bankruptcy.

"I thank God! I thank God!"

He has a Christian upon the hip. From that moment he lives upon his bond,—the lesser passion of avarice is absorved in a thirst of revenge,—thousands of ducats are as the mud of the Lagunes to him; he fees him his officer,—he consults the men learned in the laws of Venice, they can find no flaw, "no loop or hinge to hang a doubt upon,"—they must give him his pound of flesh; he buys his knife, and goes to the Synagogue to return thanks.

He comes into Court assured, conscientiously urged to his great revenge; the sufferings of years are to be washed away in the Christian's death—"a pound of flesh, nearest his heart, so says the bond;—his reasoning is just, his bond is good, he stands triumphant. Bassanio entreats him to be merciful, presents him the former idol of his soul, he quietly rejects it. Gratiano abuses him, he is silenced by a sarcasm; there is no charm to bring down the elevation of his nature--but revenge.

Portia addresses him in a strain of divine eloquence—he smiles at it, grimly, terribly;—he does not understand the doctrine, and requests him to proceed to judgment: he poses the court till the fatal quibble annihilates him, the bond is not worth a straw. His ordinary passion for money-bags returns—he glances at the tray and wishes to walk out of court with it, but this is not allowed him; he feels unwell and requests permission to retire, but is obliged to remain a little longer to hear the jugdment he has urged. "The gad-fly Gratiano twits him about his Daniel" and has him fairly on the hip. The Jew gives him one look, one glare, and totters out of court. Edmund Kean threw so much of the basilisk, of the Evil-eye, into this parting coup d'œuil, that it is said the actor who played Gratiano never dared to encounter it.

His identification with Shylock, was the result of intense study during years of probation, before appearing at Drury Lane, and still further brightened by the judicious hints of Hazlitt and a few other men whose judgment he valued. It would be ungenerous to weigh the efforts of our highly talented Amateur by so incomparable a standard. We do not think his conception of the part so accurate as some others we have had the pleasure of witnessing; at the same time calling over the muster roll of professionals at home, we do not recollect many who would play it better.

Bassanio was gentlemanly and distinct in his declamation, but we have seen him to much greater advantage. Antonio was a failure; the dress assisted to drive away the notion that he was the Merchant of Venice. There is a picture of the late Captain Alsopp and Colonel Doyle, we think, as Bassanio and Antonio, that would have served for an excellent model of the costume: it was for a long time in the dressing room of the Theatre, and is now, we believe, in the possession of Dr. Atkinson. Launcelot Gobbo was very amusing in the scene with his father and Bassanio; but the amateur who sustained this part evidently laboured under indisposition; his opening logic did not tell so successfully as usual. Gratiano should study his author; he was wide away from the text frequently but made his points tell.

Mrs. Leach was successful as Portia and the debutante promises right well. There was a wearisome pause between the third and fourth acts. In other respects the stage business was better than usual.

The new scene of the Rialto is an amateur "chef d'œuvre," and highly creditable to the talents of the artist—the arrangement in the Court of Justice supremely good. We could not stay for the after-piece it was so late. The German fashion of playing one half of a long entertainment one evening, and the other part the next, might be introduced successfully we think here, leaving it optional for those who have taken tickets to come or not. The Orchestra played God save the King most disloyally, and their symphonies between the acts were painfully doleful—why not some lively national airs of the country in which the scene of the play is laid?

[From another Correspondent.]

On Friday the 13th November was performed at the Chowringhee Theatre "The Merchant of Venice" and "He Lies Like Truth" to a very crowded house. The comedy went off somewhat heavily. Most persons are aware that "The Merchant of Venice" acted, is very different from "The Merchant of Venice" as originally written, and in the present instance it was still further cut down, in order to gain time for the farce. We have seen the "Merchant of Venice" performed several times, but never with any great satisfaction, for although one of Shakespeare's very best productions when viewed as a chamber comedy, it can hardly be considered a good acting play. At least we have never viewed it in that light, and we have seen Kean in his best days as Shylock. Master Walter, on the present occasion, played the Jew with effect certainly. It was in many respects a striking performance—but it was not the Shylock of Shakespeare, it was not the voice of a Jew, it was not the the quiet, demoniac cunning of the Jew, the knavery of the low villian. It was too boisterous, too heroic. Mrs. Leach played Portia exceedinly well—and as the gentle advocate, delivered the memorable address to Shylock, on "the attributes of mercy," with great feeling and judgment. Master Modus well personated Gratiano, Antonio's friend, and his "O be thou damned inexorable dog." "Now, Infidel, I have thee on the hip"

"A Daniel still I say: a second Daniel.
I thank thee Jew for teaching me that word."

—And the rejoinder to Portia's, "What mercy can you render him, Antonio?"

"A halter gratis? nothing else for God's sake!"

were delivered with striking effect, as was well testified by the audience's cheer. Acres, the merry Acres, played Launcelot Gobbo with great humour, but we thought the scene with his father and Bassanio was somewhat over-acted.

The part of Antonio was played in a very gentlemanly style, but we did not much like the costume, which is that rather of a legal advocate than one beseeming the character of "a Royal Merchant." In figure, too, he is not sufficiently portly. The mind does not readily associate wealth with thinness! We wondered where the pound of flesh was to come from. Bassanio found no indifferent representative in Capt. Absolute—His delivery were generally good, but occasionally marred by a wrong emphasis:—our friend should attend to this, and if ever he plays that part again, let him select a more appropriate and becoming attire than he wore during his earlier portion of the performance, more especially as respects the head dress. Mrs. Francis played Nerissa as usual. The pretty Jelica fell to the lot of a debutante. We trust this young lady will persevere. Her voice is good, her appearance prepossessing, and when she has shaken off the very natural timidity of appearing before so crowded an audience, we have no doubt she will do very well. Until she feels herself quite "at home" on the stage, it is of course impossible to expect any great display of action or of grace. We must observe that on this occasion the performers were not quite so perfect in their parts, as we could have wished—and Actors should remember how often the sense—the whole spirit of the finest sentence is marred, by the substitution of some unlucky word. We trust this will not occur again.

The lively farce "He lies like Truth" went off with great spirit, and was well acted throughout. We trust it will be repeated at no distant date, for we literally laughed till we cried again. Our favorite Amateur played the Hero of the Piece, Rattler, the Liar, in excellent spirit, while nothing could have exceeded the humour with which Master Modus, in the character of Clincker the valet of Sir C. Manley personated the several characters conjured up by Rattler's prolific brain. His personation of M. Cannasier, the Frenchman, was indeed most remarkable—in dress, in look, in language, and his pronunciation of English so exactly resembling in tone the English of a foreigner: then again as the blustering Irish Hussar coming to demand satisfaction: and lastly as Sir Robert Manley where he is brought face to face with the real Sir Charles Manley were all most rich. Nor was the amazement of Rattler, at these successive personations of the several creations of his imaginative mind less amusing! "I see how it is—I can't lie to day—for all my lies seem truth?" Acres played old True-penny the father of Rattler's intended Harriet with much humour, and the little Leach played the bride-elect Harriet as prettily as we could have wished. The piece was received with peals of laughter throughout, and the curtain fell amid loud cheers.—Hurkaru.

SUPREME COURT.

Monday, Novemver 2, 1835.

CALDER versus HALKETT.

This was an action, as our readers will recollect, against a Mofussil Magistrate in his official capacity for arrest and false imprisonment, upon the trial of which, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff for 500 rupees, with leave to move for a new trial or to enter a nonsuit.

The Avocate-General now moved accordingly. He stated that the plaintiff was an Indigo Planter, the defendant a Magistrate in the Honorable Company's Civil Service. There was a disturbance and riot in consequence of which, the Darogah of the station took the depositions of praties and witnesses and made his report to the defendant. In consequence of this, the defendant issued his purwannah for the arrest of the plaintiff. It was unnecessary on the present application, to comment upon the conduct of etheir plaintiff or defendent on occasion of the arrest, but one point was raised at the trial founded on the non-production of the purwannah itself. The plaintiff to establish the purwannah called on Mr. Reid the Registrar of the Sudder Dewanny, to which Court all the papers and documentary proceedings were removed. Reid says in his evidence, the judgment and proceedings are brought down to the Sudder Dewanny where the case is appealed; that he believes there was a purwannah for the arrest of the plaintiff; that he had a conversation with the defendant, and he thinks, he, the defendent, said that there was a purwannah on cross examination he was quite confident of it. This objection was taken directly after the case was closed.

Mr. Justice Ryan.—The point was reserved and you will have a right to argue it now.

Mr. Turton.—The purwannah was put in.

The Advocate-General stated, the other point upon which he moved was upon the law of the case. He contended under the 21 Geo. 3, C. 70 that this case is not cognisable by the Supreme Court—that although that act cannot be considered as contemplating all subsequent provisions, yet that it must be taken as embracing an act done under authority of the Company's regulations. The defendant in this case acted consistently with those regulations, and from and under them he derived his authority. The regulations to which he adverted were Reg. 9 of 1793, clause 4th Reg. 9 of 1807, clauses 4 and 6, Reg. 20 of 1817, clauses 13, 24, 25 and Reg. 2 of 1796.

By the Court.—Take an order nisi.

Tuesday, November 3.

JOHANNES STEPHANOS versus EDWARD KENT HUME.

This cause, which came on upon a rehearing, and had been reserved for argument before a full bench, was partially heard on the 30th and 31st ultimo, and to-day Mr. Turton was heard for the defendant. We give a summary of the case, and an abstract of the arrangements raised on either side.

This is a case, the decision of which involves a question of very considerable importance, and very necessary to be set at rest. That question is, whether an Armenian woman, a Christian, who is possessed of lands in the Mofussil in her own sole right, and who marries a subject of Great Britain, can make an effectual devise by her will, of such real property so situate. The argument which on the two previous days had been gone into at great length, and in a manner somewhat desultory, we shall endeavour to condense, concisely stating the grounds and reasoning upon which the opposite parties endeavoured to sustain their several cases.

Mr. Prinsep and Mr. Cochrane appeared for the complainant.

Mr. Turton and Mr. Clarke for the defendant.

The grounds upon which the plaintiff's counsel chiefly relied, were

That the Armenian people had setttled within the British territories in India upon the faith of a treaty or compact entered into above a century and a half ago between that nation and the then representatives of the British Government in the East. That a negociation was opened and a treaty contract, or compact, was effected between the above named parties, Sir J. Childs acting in that transaction as the representative of the East India Company. That by that treaty it was stipulated that there should be mutual amity and concord between the contracting parties, for the mutual advantage of trade and commerce, and that the Armenians should be admitted to all and every the rights, privileges and protection enjoyed by British subjects. That they should have liberty to live in any garrison, to buy and to sell, and merchandize in the same manner as an Englishman born.

That under the faith of this treaty Armenians have for very many years been settled at Dacca, where they have long been holders of large zemindaries. That no Armenian law of inheritance has been produced shewing that this estate should or could be devised by the wife.

That the case of Emin versus Emin determined in this Court was decisive of the case; that then an Armenian widow was decreed her dower out of Mofussil Lands which decision clearly recognised the application of British Law. That unless English Law were to prevail, there was no law existing that could be applicable. That the only laws recognised in the Mofusil are the Mahomedan and Hindu, neither of which could be applicable here; that it was true there was a solitary case reported in Mr. Macnaughten's Sudder Dewanee Reports, where in the case of an Armenian, a reference was made to the Armenian Bishop, for the information of the Sudder, as to Armenian Law, but that it distinctly appears from the learned Editor's note that the case in question was not determined upon any application of Armenian Law, but on an admission of one of the parties. That this case therefore afforded no precedent—that a decision opposed to that sought by the complainants, would lead to great uncertainty of title, and would shake the tenures of a large porportion of property in the East.

That the case of Gardiner versus Pell reported in the 1st Jacob and Walker was conclusive.

Here are the principal grounds upon which the claim of the complainant was sought to be established; on the other hand it was argued that if the complainant's claim was as brother and heir at law of the deceased possessor of this land in his own sole right, it must be shewn clearly that not only that his right was recognized by English Law, but that English Law was applicable to the Lands in question. That the Law of England recognises the right of a married woman to act as a féme sole, whatever and in all cases when the necessity of the thing requires it. This is clearly established and the principal cases laid down in Coke, Littleton 132, 133, in the case of the Countess of Portland versus Podger, there the capacity of a married woman whose husband was out of the kingdom was recognized in the execution of deeds,—so in the case of the wife of Sir R. Belkrapt who was in exile and still alive. Many other cases were cited to establish this point of Law, which in its application, on the ground of necessity, had effect in the case in question; for it was clear that during the life of Mrs. Hume her husband was as regarded these lands and all conveyance that could be made of them, as utterly without authority or power as a husband civititer mortuus by the law of England. She had the power to transfer, to convey by deed, in short the whole and entire control over these lands whilst alive, in which mode of transfer he could not even join; now by every legal analogy were the power of conveying by deed is possessed, the power of divining by will is recognised as equally inherent in the proprietor of real property. That if every right as a feme sole be recognised and admitted to have been in Mrs. Hume as is admitted, why should the making of a will be a method of disposing of her sole and separate estate which alone is not recognised! That great stress had been laid upon Mr. McNaughten's note in the case reported from the Sudder; but the truth was that in either way that case and the dictum of the annotation was strongly in favor of the defendant, inasmuch as it recognizes the Armenian law affecting contracts made by an Armenian woman whilst under coverture. That the English laws regulating the transfer of real estate, founded upon the doctrine of feudal tenures has never been introduced into the Mofussil; that when we conquered or acquired the country we found not the Hindus, but the Mahomedans administering the law of the land, and in such manner that their own laws should be administered to every different class of inhabitants. That the counsel for the complainant had represented the words "British subjects" as used in Mr. Fergusson's act (the act making real estates of British subjects, assets for debts, in the hands of Executors) as bearing a general construction, and comprehending the subjects of the Crown of the England, without limitation or restriction, put upon the words by this Court hitherto. That the case of Gardener versus Fell was the case of or belonging to a British subject, and which it appears clear the master of the Rolls considered to be within the limits and jurisdiction of Calcutta. That supposing the deviser had been a Mahomedan woman, instead of an Armenian, it would not be contended for a moment that this Court would interfere with her right to alienate or dispose of Moofussil Lands according to the Mahomedan Law; and that unless some regulation of the Company's Government can be produced affecting the Lands in question, the Sudder Dewanee would recognise the right of Armenians possessing property in the Mofussil to dispose of their property according to the laws, usages and customs of the Armenians. These were the principal arguments advanced upon the point of law. There was also a discussion at some length involving a technical question, as to whether the complaint had applied to the proper side of the Court, and whether if instead of seeking relieve by Bill in equity, he should not have had recourse to the common Law jurisdiction of the Court and sought his remedy by ejectment; this discussion however, not going to the merits of the case, and being of little interest to our readers in general, we omit.

The Court took time to consider its decision.

IN THE MATTER OF TRICKETT.

Mr. Turton on the first day of Term had moved for a Commission to swear in an executor resident at Lucknow in the territories of the King of Oude, and consequently without the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The Chief Justice to-day delivered the decision of the Court. The Court must reject this application, entertaining very strong doubts upon two important questions bearing upon it, the one applicable to the present occasion; the other of a more general and extensive character.

The former was, whether it lie within the authority of this Court, to swear in an executor, residing out of its jurisdiction; the other, whether this Court have authority to empower a Commission to administer an oath without the limits of that jurisdiction. Whilst an executor is beyond those limits administration durante abstentid may be granted; not so, if, having taken out probate, he quit the jurisdiction.—Motion refused.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBR 5.

FOLLINS versus WATKINS AND CLIFFE.

A rule nisi had been obtained calling upon the defendants to produce the counter-part of a charter party of affreightment. The Advocate-General now shewed cause against the rule. The affidavits upon which the application was founded stated that in the month of July last the plaintiff was Commander of the Ship Eliza, and that a charter party was entered into between him and the defendant, of four parts, two of which were retained in custody of the plaintiff, the other two remained with the defendants. That after making a voyage to China the vessel was wrecked, the Captain and crew escaping in the boat; they found a trunk containing the two charter parties; they were subsequently boarded by pirates and deprived of them, and the plaintiff now applied for the assistance of the Court to obtain a copy or inspection of one or other of the two parts remaining with the defendants. In answer to this the plaintiff states that application had been made to Watkins, one of the defendants, who said that he could not then enter into an arrangement for the settlement of this demand, as his partner Cliffe was absent in China, where he had made considerable disbursements on account of the ship; that when he came back they were willing either to refer the matter to arbitration or to the decision of the Chamber of Commerce. This application ought to have been made to the defendant's Attorney, but none was made; and when the Attorney asked what was the nature of the application they refused to tell. The fact is they have no right whatever for the production they demand. Where only one instrument is executed between two contracting parties, and which is left in the hands of one, he becomes as regards such instrument a Trustee for the other. This was not the case here; on the contrary the charter party was executed in quadrupartite, two of which parts remained in the possession of the plaintiff. That the case of Street versus Brown, 6 Taunton 302 was decisive; that that was a case where two parts of an indenture of charter party were stated to have been interchangeably executed and the part which was in the custody of the Master of the chartered vessel was lost at Sea with the ship. The Court of Common Pleas would not compel the charters to grant inspection and a copy of the other part for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to declare with certainty.

Mr. TURTON on the other side argued that the execution of the charter party was admitted, and that they had possession of the two counter-parts. That they have been keeping the plaintiffs at arms length by stating the absence of one of the partners and the necessity of his presence, in order to the arrangement of the mutual accounts, whilst at the very same time the partner who is here says, he is willing to refer the matter to arbitration or the Chamber of Commerce. It is not apparent what can be meant by saying that no application was made to the Attorney—we moved affidavit of service on him in August last to give us a copy. Here is a Captain of a ship to whom freight is due, is it an answer to his demand to say "my partner is abroad, wait till he returns?" He trusted the Court would not force the Captain of a ship into a Court of Equity for freight. There is indeed one case in the Common Pleas where there is a dictum that where there are two parts, the Court will not order the one to be delivered up. But the principle upon which inspection is allowed in a case where only one deed has been executed, must be equally strong and operative in a case where there has been two, but where by inevitable misfortune there come to be but one.

Mr. Justice RYAN.—The authorities are too strong the other way; they are decisive, and we must abide by them. Rule refused.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6.

HASTIE versus STEWART.

An order nisi had been obtained by Mr. Clarke, on the previous day, to show cause why the defendant in this suit, who was in custody, should not be discharged on putting in common bail, on the ground that defendant was a prisoner, and that no proceedings had been taken by the plaintiff for three terms last past. This application was grounded upon the 64th Rule of this Court on the common law side, by which it is provided, that where any defendant shall be in custody at the suit of any plaintiff, and the defendant shall have pleaded therein, and such plaintiff shall neglect to proceed in his cause against the said defendant, for one whole term, the defendant shall, having given four days notice to the plaintiff, or his attorney, of his intended motion, be, on motion made in Court on the last day of the term in which the plaintiff shall have been so neglectful, discharged from the custody of the Sheriff as to that suit upon filing common bail, or in vacation after the said term, on application to the Chief Justice or any Justice of the Court, the like notice having been given to the plaintiff or this Attorney.

Mr. TURTON to-day shewed cause against this order, and the grounds he took were founded upon the practice of this Court, and the practice of the Courts at home. With respect to this practice here, it was to be remarked, that there was this difference between the course of proceeding at home, and in this Court; that in England a party was arrested previous to filing a declaration against him; here the filing the plaint was the first step; the next was to enter an appearance, which in case of the defendant failing to do so, the plaintiff was at liberty to do himself. Here he had so done, and had obtained an exparte rule for the trail of the cause; but as it was absolutely necessary at the trial to obtain the evidence of a Mr. Berry, the only attesting witness, who was at Allahabad, the plaintiff had been induced from time to time, to refrain from incurring the expense of bringing him down to Calcutta, upon the representation of the defendant, that it was his intention to have recourse to the insolvent act; beside this, there had been a negotiation for a compromise, set on foot by the defendant, who offered to the plaintiff what he had offered to his other creditors.

These circumstances it was contended were more than sufficient to take the case out of the 64th rule of this Court, and out of the practice under which a supercidius for a prisoner's discharge upon similiar grounds, prevails at home.

Mr. CLARK endeavoured to shew, that the plaintiff did not abstain from proceeding in consequence of the intimation of the defendant's intention to take the benefit of the insolvent act, inasmuch as he received such intimation on the 5th of January last, and obtained his exparte order on the 13th of the same month. Mr. Clarke proceeded to draw a further distinction between the circumstances of this case, and such cases as were supersidable for want of proceeding at home, but was stopt by the Court.

The CHIEF JUTICE said, that it was distinctly laid down, that a regular treaty of accommodation or agreement for a compromise, is sufficient to prevent a supercidius in any stage of the proceedings; and that it is a rule in the King's Bench and Common Pleas, for preventing unnecessary expense to plaintiffs, in case of notice given by prisoners of their intention to apply for their discharge under any act made for the relief of insolvent debtors, that after such notice given to any plaintiffs, no prisoner shall be superseded or discharged out of custody at the suit of such plaintiff, by reason of such plaintiff's forbearing to proceed against him, according to the rules and practice of the Court from the time of such notice given, until some rule or order shall be made in the cause in that behalf by the Court or one of the Judges thereof.

Looking to the express object of this rule, which is to prevent unnecessary expense, the Court cannot but regard the suspension of proceedings in this case, as such a forbearance as was contemplated by the rule prevailing in the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas. Such being the rule at home, in the absence of direct precedent in this Court, the rule above adverted to must govern the present case. Order discharged with costs.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

DOE ON THE DEMISE OF E. MACNAGHTEN versus ADICHURN ADDEY.

Mr. TURTON moved in this case for a substitution of service of process under rather peculiar circumstances.

A rule nisi had been served upon the durwan of the defendant, which was afterwards made absolute. When this latter rule was attempted to be served, it was found that the defendant had absconded, carrying away with him the whole of his servants, so that there was no durwan upon whom to serve the process. The present application therefore was that service might be substituted by affixing the process upon the premises.

By the Court. The better plan will be to take the order in the alternative, either to serve the process upon the durwan, or in case there be no durwan, by affixing it on the premises.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 10.

Common Law Side.

SHEDDEN versus MAXWELL.

This was a motion to set aside proceedings for irregularity in entering up judgment upon a warrant of Attorney.

Mr. TURTON had obtained a rule nisi on a previous day, and Mr. Clark now shewed cause against such rule being made absolute.

By the affidavit of the late Mr. Ronald, an Attorney of the Court, it appeared that the warrant of Attorney in question was prepared by that gentleman in the year 1829; that it was duly forwarded by dawk to the defendant who was then at Cawnpore; and that in due course of post it was received back again at Calcutta; that in the deponent's belief the signature he found attached to it on its return was in the hand writing of the defendant.

These were affidavits of Mr. Shedden of the house of Shedden and Company and of Mr. Maclean of the same house, the former deposing to the transmission of the warrant by dawk to Cawnpore, its return executed, and the belief of the deponent of the authenticity of the hand writing; the latter deposing to the fact of the warrant in question having been sent from Mr. Ronald to Shedden and Company.

These were the grounds to establish the due execution of the warrant of Attorney by the defendant, and it was contended by Mr. Clarke that this was sufficient at the least to throw the onus of disproof upon the opposite side.

Upon this warrant, judgment was almost immediately entered up, and upon that judgment it was now sought to issue execution.

The only question therefore is whether the execution of the warrant is sufficiently established by the affidavits above stated according to the rules of practice obtaining in this Court or in the Courts at home. It is true that there are attesting witnesses to the instrument, who have not been called upon to establish its execution; but according to the practice at home, as laid down in Mr. Archbold's work, it was not generally necessary to produce the evidence of an attesting witness unless under peculiar circumstances. That an attesting witness is not necessary to the validity of the instrument; and that within a year and a day next after the date of the warrant, judgment may be entered up of course, without applying to the Court or a Judge. Mr. Turton, with whom was Mr. Grant, contended on the broad principles of practice and evidence, that there was no sufficient proof of the execution of the warrant of attorney upon which the Court would feel itself warranted in directing execution to issue thereupon. Here was the affidavit of Mr. Ronald, that the warrant was forwarded to the defendant at Cawnpore. Now without throwing the least shadow of an imputation upon Mr Ronald, it was clear there must have been some mistake or oversight, as the affidavit of Maclean proves that it was sent to Shedden and Compony, and the affidavit of Mr. Shedden proves that it was forwarded by the latter gentleman. With respect to the hand writing of the signature, the utmost attempt at proof amounts to the belief of the deponents, such belief not being strengthened or corroborated by any statement, that the parties were acquainted with the defendant's hand writing, had ever corresponded with him, or had ever seen him write. Here were two attesting witnesses to the instrument. It is true that such attestation may not be necessary to its validity, but they are the best evidence of its execution, and either their testimony ought to be produced to prove it, or the want of their testimony satisfactorily accounted for; and the Court must be satisfied by affidavit of the endeavours which have been made to find such attesting witness, before they will admit secondary evidence.

By the Court.—The question is of considerable importance and the Court will rather take time to consider its decision.

IN THE GOODS OF KRISTINE BANG, DECEASED.

Mr. Minchin moved the Court for letters of administration under the following peculiar circumstances:—

The deseased was formerly resident in Calcutta, but died at Copenhagen, in the kingdom of Denamrk, leaving assets both at the place of her death, and within the jurisdiction of this Court. She made a will by which she constituted her sister Caroline Bang, residing at Copenhagen, her residuary legatee, but appointed no Executors.

Caroline Bang duly took out administration to her deceased sister according to the forms and proceedings of the Court of Administration of Copenhagen; the present application was made on behalf of Mr. John Maclean of the firm of Shedden and Company, as her constituted attorney, upon the following grounds: By the petition and affidavit of John Shedden abovementioned, facts were established, and that the Royal Court of Administration of Copenhagen had granted to him their duly authenticated Power of Attorney to act under their authority, and do all and every thing necessary to the execution of the said will, and that the said Caroline Bang had also constituted him her true and lawful Attorney, giving him full power and authority to act in her behalf on all matters touching the said administration.

The affidavit of Frederick Ecnil Elberling, Secretary, &c. to the Danish Government at Serampore, stated that he is a native of Denmark and well acquainted with the laws of that country, having studied six years at Copenhagen, and having been some time a Notary public; that by the laws of Denmark it is necessary to the validity of last wills and testaments that they be ratified and confirmed by the testator in the presence of a Notary public of Copenhagen, and two witnesses, and certified and approved by the King of Denmark. Whenever such will contains a claim out of the ordinary Court of instruction of Denmark, such will so certified is filed in the Court of Administration, and when required a true copy, is taken by a duly appointed Notary public. That deponent being in his capacity of Notary public and Secretary to Government, &c. at Serampore conversant in such matters, is competent to determine the validity of the instrument purporting to be a copy of the will of the deceased, and to have been duly established in the Court of Administration of Denmark; and that being well acquainted with the Danish Notary public attesting the copy, he can speak to his hand writing which he deposed to be that of the said Notary; and that the seal attached to the same instrument was the seal of the Court of Administration of Copenhagen. That the last mentioned Court was the proper, and duly empowered authority to grant administration to the effects of deceased persons; that it is the practice of that Court to grant powers of Attorney as in the present instance; that the power produced is duly authenticatad by the signature of the proper officers; and that the seal attached to the power of Attorney is the seal of the Court.

Upon these grounds Mr Minchin moved upon the petition of Mr. Maclean for an order that letter of administration to all and singular the goods and chattles, rights and credits, of the said deceased within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, with the notarial copy of the said last will and testament of the deceased annexed, be granted to the said Maclean as the constituted Attorney of and for the Royal Court of Administration at Copenhagen in Denmark; or that such letters of Administrations with the said notarial copy of the last will and testament of the deceased, as the duly constituted Attorney of Caroline Bang, or as the duly constituted Attorney both of the Court of Administration of Copenhagen and of Caroline Bang. Security was proffered according to the charter and the practice of the Court.

By the Court. As this is an application unusual in its character, and important in its consequences, the Court will take time to consider of its decision.

CASE OF THE "LADY MUNRO."

SCOTT EXECUTOR OF AIKEN versus ALLAN.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of Rs 35,000 being the amount of an Insurance effected at the Ganges Insurance Office, upon the ship Lady Munro, which was totally lost on the island of Amsterdam; being Rs 30,000 upon the block, and 5,000 upon the cargo. The policy had been effected by Captain Aiken the owner and commander of the vessel insured, who, having perished with the ship, the present action was brought by his executor.

Mr. CLARKE opened the pleadings.

Mr. TORTON stated the plaintiff's case. The vessel, and the cargo on which the policy upon which this action was brought was effected, sailed from Calcutta in the year 1833, on a voyage to Madras and New South Wales. She was wrecked on the island of Amsterdam, on the morning of the 12th October, in the same year, under circumstances which it would appear by the evidence to be adduced before the Court. The only ground upon which it could be possible to anticipate the defence that would be attempted to this action would be that of the negligence of the Commander of the ship, previously to and at the time of the accident. As far as presumption could be raised from human motives as operating upon human actions, the Captain of the ship in question, was one of the last persons to whom a suspicion of negligence or indifference could attach; for not only was his own life and fortune at stake, but his wife and family were in the ship with him, his brother being one of his officers, and who together with himself perished in the wreck. But independently of conjecture from motive, ample evidence would be produced to the Court that the ship was well manned, well officered, and navigated with the greatest vigilance and caution. It was a fact well established, that in many parts of the Ocean prevailed strong and variable currents, whose force and effect could be reduced to no rule, and however capable of being partially ascertained during a calm, admitted of no measurement during a strong, or what is called a fresh breeze. With one of these currents in all human probability the Lady Munro fell in, when about 140 miles from the island of Amsterdam. The testimony of seamen would be adduced to prove that the course she then held would have kept her clear and wide of the island, but for such current. The watch was kept on the night upon which the accident happened, by the Eurobean officer till twelve; the Serang's watch then commenced and the ship struck about one o'clock in the morning. This Serang, as to whose competency a question would probably be raised in support of the charge of negligence, is at this moment employed in the command of a vessel which has hitherto only been commanded by a European. That there was no negligence, will be most satisfactorily established; but even if there were, that it is held by modern decisions will not exonerate the Insurers, whose engagement includes the care and diligence of the Captain and crew. The loss in the present instance, were the Insurers held not to be liable, would in fact fall, not upon the Insurer or his representative, but upon those who had advanced money on the ship, and for whose benefit the policy was effected.

The jurisdiction of the Court; the execution of the policy; the liability of the defendants as members of the Ganges Insurance Company, were admitted—as were also the ownership of the Lady Munro, in Aiken, and due notice of the loss to the Insurers, and that the plaintiff is executor of the late Captain Aiken.

To establish the case the plaintiff's Council called

ROBERT WILLIAM EVATT.—I was chief officer of the Lady Munro when she last left Calcutta. She went to Madras, from thence to the Isle of France, from whence she sailed for new South Wales and Van Dieman's Land. The Isle of France is not in the road to New South Wales—we called to take in water and provisions. After we left the Isle of France, the ship was run ashore on the Island of Amsterdam on the 12th October, 1833. On the day previous at 12 o'clock, our latitude was 37° 29'. —the longitude 74° 50'. This was on the eleventh, by nautical time twelve at noon. There was a mistake about the longitude. Doctor MacCosh published it 75° 40'. The accident occurred abont a quarter to one on the morning of the 12th. I was below; I went down at eight. I left the 2d Officer in charge of the vessel. His name was Mr. Aiken, the Captain's brother. His watch was from 8 till 12. There was a fresh breeze. It was heavy weather and a very dark night. There was no moon. We were going about nine knots, steering east-by-south-a-quarter-south. The observations were taken by Captain Aiken, his brother and myself; we calculated to go at least 30 miles north of the island We calculated the longitude 74° 50'. Doctor MacCosh was a passenger on board. He took no observation: I should think he did not understand taking one. I account for the accident by a very strong current to the southward. The Serang took charge of the vessel when Mr. Aiken's watch ended. The Serang bad served in the vessel five years. He had served in her before Captain Aiken had the command. I had sailed off and on with the Captain six years. In the Lady Munro 18 months. I had sailed in her as second mate before the 18 months, in all about 3 years. During all that time the Serang was on board acting as Serang. The Serang had had charge of the vessel all along from the time the Captain purchased the ship. In my opinion he was a person competent to take charge of the watch—very much so. I have been 15 years at sea altogether. The tonnage of the Lady Munro was 254 tons. I have sailed in a vessel much smaller where the Serang was always allowed to take charge of the watch—a different Serang from the Lady Munro's. I mean a vessel of 100 or 110 tons. It is customary in small class vessels for the Serang to keep the watch—that is in vessels of from 250 to 100 tons. The ship went all to pieces on Amsterdam; a great many lives were lost. The Captain, his wife and children were drowned. There were two and twenty saved. The number on board was 97. Some of the cargo was saved. A great deal of silver plate and jewellery was saved. I don't know what became of it ultimately. Some of it belonged to a Mrs. Lardner. All I brought off was a sextant and a night spy glass.

Cross-examined by the Advocate-General.—Our crew were lascars and a few Portuguese people of this country. We had two officers besides myself. I have known the Captain's brother three years at sea. I think he was an experienced man, and yet the Captain, though his brother, did not appoint him chief officer. I was with the Captain before his brother came. The night of the accident was dark. The Captain was down below. I have known a Serang at midnight to keep watch in the neighbourhood of Amsterdam. When English Captains are near that Island they will be upon deck all night if they cannot trust their officers. I believe the Serang had been in those parts before. He told me so himself. He did not tell me he had seen the Island. It was a night that required more than ordinary care and attention. Amsterdam is a very high Island I don't think it is dangerous except approaching at night. It is usual when you are approaching rocks to guard against danger. I don't know that the Captain was on deck but he might have been. We two officers could have kept watch the whole voyage. It was the particular order of the Captain that the Serang should keep watch. We expected to be 30 miles North of the Island It is not unusual to be out in your calculation in respect to longitude. Chronometers are very often out. If we were right in our longitude we must have steered clear of the Island. We take the longtitude as it is of consequence to our knowledge of where we are. We thus calculated whether we were nearer or further from Amsterdam. Chronometers are often out, and then of course the longitude is wrongly taken. I have sailed in other vessels in the coasting trade. I have sailed in the Bay of Bengal on board the brig Frederick where a Serang kept charge of the watch. In country vessels it is not customary to have an English Boatswain with a native crew. My deposition was taken at Madras. I spoke as to the longitude there. I said 75° 40', but I think it ought to have been 74° 50'. I forget whether I told Mr. Paulin about the longitude If I told him 75° 40' I told him wrong The ship struck upon a sunken rock, 30 or 40 yards from the island. It was very dark when I came on deck, misty with a fresh breeze. I speak from memory. I believe I told Mr. Paulin that the longitude was 75° 40'; I now say it was 74° 50' by a later calculation I have made; 75° 40' would bring us just 30 miles westward of the island The island is laid down 30 or 32 miles too far east. I found that I was wrong in my recollection not in my former calculation. If the longitude had been 75° 40' on the course we were, we should have gone further to the northward. It was hazy, drizling weather The country traders go to the Isle of France, New South Wales and Van-Deiman's Land. I have known a Serang in charge in the Bay of Bengal. That requires as much attention as the open sea, perhaps more—so do the Sandheads—the coast of Madras as well as to the eastward In steering east-by south-a-quarter-south we allowed for variation—east-by-south-a-quarter-south was by compass. The latitude of the island is 37° 29'. The longitude corrected is 77° 24'. We were going 8½ knots the first two hours; 9 when she struck. She struck about one o'clock. [To Mr. Justice Malkin.] She would have run about 115 miles in 13 hours. Fifty or fifty-two miles go to a degree of longitude in that latitude. We struck on the north-west. [To the Court.] The island is about ten miles in circumference. The wind was due north at the time she struck. From two in the afternoon due north by compass. In Horsburgh's last edition there is a difference of about 30 miles from the position of the island of St. Paul in the old charts, and Amsterdam is the same meridian. We did not then know the difference between the correct longitude and the charts.

Dadoo sworn.—I was Serang on board the Lady Munro. I had been Serang on board from the time she was built about 7 or 8 years ago. I kept watch all along from the time I first went on board. I went on her first voyage to Moulmein, Singapoor and Malacca. I have been a seaman 30 or 40 years. I have been to England four voyages. I sailed from Bombay with Captain John Gower. I am from Bombay. My watch commenced at twelve on the night of the accident. It was a very dark night. It had been raining for three days. I got on my watch at twelve o'clock. After I got on my watch and was calling the people to come to me, the Doctor came to me and wanted to know the hour. I told him the ship was going east-by-south-a-quarter-south. The Doctor said it was raining he would go down. I desired one of the clashies to clue in the sail—the fore-top gallant sail. I went to the Captain's cabin and told him it was so very dark that I could not see. The ship soon after struck and made a noise, khut-khut. The Captain came and looked out. The Captain was going down the ladder when the ship struck violently. I said what are we to do the ship is aground? He desired the main sail to be clued. There was a violent impelling of water, and when she struck every body awoke. The Doctor and mate came to me. I went to the Captain and asked "what am I to do?" he was unable to utter a word. The ship was driven forward and went to pieces. I was standing on the quarter-deck and that was driven ashore. I hold a situation now in a Company's schooner at Madras. I am Captain, Serang, every thing. An Englishman was Captain of her before. I have kept watch in other ships besides the Lady Munro. I was on board the Lady Malcolm—there I kept watch. She was 200 tons, commanded by Captain Conwell, afterwards by Captain Roberts—under both I kept watch.

Cross-examined by the Advocate-General.—I had never been before to New South Wales. I had been several voyages to the Isle of France. It had been raining slightly for three days before the accident. I don't know about taking an observation on that day. The sun did appear but not brightly. I cannot tell whether they could take an observation or not. I took in the foretop-gallant sail because the rain increased and it was very dark. The wind had not increased. I took in sail and went and informed the Captain of the state of the weather. I did not remark a storm coming on. It was so very cloudy I could not see a person standing close by. It was not blowing. We could have put the ship about or worked her. She struck about 10 or 15 minutes after I came on watch. I cannot tell with greater exactness—did not look at my watch although I had one with me. There was an elderly person who would not suffer the ladies to come up saying there was no danger. There were no Europeans on deck when she struck.

Mr. Pearson for the defence.—I cannot avoid feeling surprised that my learned friend should in order to establish his case rely upon the evidence, and upon the evidence alone, of parties who are so very deeply interested in the character that the disaster which is the subject of this action may wear when coloured by their account of it. Both my learned friend's witnesses must be powerfully influenced by a desire to make the best of the matter. As officers of the ship both are concerned, and more espesially the Serang, he being in charge of the watch at the time of the accident. But divested of the partial representations of those interested witnesses, let us look to what are the actual circumstances of the case. I care not that this Serang has made voyages to England, he never kept watch on those voyages. I care not for his having kept watch in the Lady Malcolm or any other country vessel: I will prove that no one conversant in the business of insurance would underwrite a policy upon a vessel which was known to be navigated on such a system as permitted the middle watch to be kept by a Serang. It is said that the underwriter insures against the misconduct or neglect of the Captain. For my own part I never could nor ever did understand upon what principle such a decison could be made, nor can it be intelligible without we trace it back to its origin, and through its progress, which has been very gradual during the last 25 or 30 years. If we trace its history we shall find that it has been only by slow degrees that it has reached its present height. But however the general principle may have gained ground, that principle can have no application here. I never before heard of a Captain coming and saying I will insure against my own misconduct. It is stated that these policies are entered into for the benefit of other parties, of whom the Captain borrowed money. If so they, as well as his executors, can only claim though him, and the claim must stand upon the same grounds with his own. If he was guilty of misconduct, they no more than himself, can take advantage of his own wrongful act.

Now with respect to the question of negligence. It is said that when they were 100 miles from the island they took an observation. Let us see under what circumstances. The Serang at fist says it rained for three days previous; but when he preceived the tendency of the question and catches the inference to which it leads, he says the sun did appear at intervals. Now let us look at the conduct of the Captain on the evening previous to the accident; how do we find him employed? We find him sitting talking with his passengers, laughing and drinking, going to bed at his usual hour, never appearing upon deck nor visiting the watch to see that the Serang was vigilant in his duty. Is that sufficient watchfulness in a Captain? If your Lordships have ever sailed near Amsterdam, which perhaps you may, you will not fail to recollect that the Captain of an English crew is always up and upon deck whilst in that dangerous neighbourhood. In this case a native of this country with a lascar crew is left to keep the middle watch. I do not blame the incorrectness of an observation nor impute the errors of a chronometer as a fault of the Captain; but I do blame him that when aware of the frequent occurrence of mistakes in respect of the longitude, and that the island of Amsterdam must at the utmost be near at hand, that he did not employ more than usual vigilance and watchfulness. A common seaman on ordinary nights may be equal to take the watch, but such a night as that described and in such a situation, the Captain should have committed the charge to none but his best officers acting under his own inspection. The Captain, however, does not appear to have come once upon deck. It is immaterial whether his cabin was above or below; he himself was not upon deck, but the Serang was. Now this Serang appears from the whole of his evidence to have been utterly incompetent to the duty he was put upon. He loses his presence of mind, runs to the Captain and cries what are we to do? he is totally bewildered, he had kept no look out, he does not see the land till he is upon it, and he then runs to call the Captain. Now this negligence is the negligence of the Captain who so incautiously trusted such a duty to him. The ship was lost in consequence of that negligence and the Captain who occasioned the disaster and all who claim under him must upon every principle of reason and of law sustain the consequences.

Let us suppose that Captain Aiken had survived the wreck of his vessel, with what face could he have come into this Court, and asked at your Lordships' hands reparation for a loss the consequences of his own negligence? But they who claim under and through him, must incur at the same time his responsibilities.

I will now call the witnesses whom in my view of the case, my learned friend ought to have called, and who will, I think, put the question beyond doubt.

John MacCosh sworn.—I belong to the Campany's medical establishment. I was a passenger on board the Lady Munro when she was wrecked. I remember the day before the accident—an observation was taken that day. The weather on the day preceding was rather fair. There was a strong breeze, and about noon it was fair. I do not understand navigation and do not recollect what was our longitude. I remember a conversation with the Captain about the situation of the ship. The Captain said we were then so near the Islands of St. Paul and Amsterdam as to render it probable we should pass about two in the morning. This conversation passed in the evening. The Captain was moving about between 8 and 9. I was on deck a little after midnight. There was a poop and the Captain's cabin was in the poop. I retired to my cabin about nine or ten. It was a dark night with drizzling rain and a strong breeze. After retiring to rest, after midnight I came on deck. I saw the Serang then in charge of the watch. I saw no European on deck. I exchanged a few words with the Serang and went below. That night we had some toddy—all the passengers were present. The Captain must have gone on deck to go to his cabin. I asked the Serang whether he had seen the Island. One of the passengers sent me word that land was in sight, that was why I went up. I did not see any land. I expected to see land from the Captain having told me we should probably pass it about two in the morning. Seeing land was the general subject of conversation; the Captain observed that we should pass land before the morning. The Captain as near as I can recollect said he expected to pass about 13 miles from the Island. It was from 20 minutes to half an hour from my going on deck that the ship struck—it was about one o'clock. I state that time from conjecture. When the ship struck I ran on deck and found there the Serang. The only European that I saw was the Chiefmate. The first was a very violent shock. I heard the Captain's voice a few minutes after I came up. The weather was very dark with drizzling rain. I was a good deal alarmed and in some confusion. I saw the land about forty or fifty yards off. She struck more than twenty yards from the shore. The land we struck upon was upon the north-west coast. The land was on the larboard side but the ship was on her beam ends. I could not be mistaken in taking the land for a cloud—the shore shelved down.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton.—I should say, you could see the land from one to four hundred years. I was sent up once upon a hoax to look for the land. I did not see the land when I first came out from the light of the cuddy. It was a cloudy, dark night with drizzling rain. I cannot say who usually keeps watch nor whom they send to the mast-head. I have been frequently on deck and have seen the Serang keeping watch. I did not remonstrate. The glow of the phosphoric light of the water might have dazzled me had it shone in front of the ship. As near as I can recollect, it was thirteen miles the Captain mentioned as the distance at which we were likely to pass. The distance was a subject of general conversation. The Captain's wife and family and brother were on board—they must have had some regard for their own lives. Not keeping on deck was perhaps one of Captain's failings—another might have continued on deck. Cannot individualize any one instance of the Serang's negligence, but there was a general dissatisfaction at his keeping the watch. I am not aware of any other person having been played a trick about the land.

Richard Howe Cockerel sworn.—I am in his Majesty's Navy, and have been four years on the Indian Station. I have never found a Serang in charge of a vessel—never to my knowledge. I have sailed to the Mauritius in a country trading vessel, the Duke of Roxburgh of 800-tons: no Serang was ever left in charge of that ship. I should say from what I have heard in Court that proper care was not manifested in this instance. The Captain ought to have been on deck.

To Mr. Turton.—I have no interest in the Ganges Insurance Company.

In continuation.—I have no presonal knowledge of the Island of Amsterdam; if the Captain had seen the land he might have luffed. I think he ought to have seen the land if he had kept a proper look out. You cannot try currents except in a calm. Currents are not well laid down in charts The strength of currents depends much on the wind. I have had some experience of Insurance Companies. I don't know whether they would insure a vessel with the knowledge that a Serang was entrusted with the watch.

Cross-examined.—I never commanded a merchant vessel. I have been on board of other merchant vessels but in no other with a native crew. I have had a Serang in my own schooner; I never trust him with charge of the vessel when afloat. She has never been to the Sand heads except with myself. You might luff a ship in her own length. I should think a sailor after thirty years should be competent. It must depend upon the weather how far you can see the land. I cannot judge from a description of the state of the weather at night.

R. Wallace sworn.—I have sailed in several ships in the country service. I have been 20 years at sea, and have commanded a ship ten years. I have been for the greatest part in the country service. I have never left a Serang in charge at midnight. I never left a Serang in command. I have not known it done in any vessel I have sailed in, but I believe it is customary in the country service. In the country service they generally take the same kind of crew—lascars and Europeans. When they go to New South Wales they usually take two European officers. I have attended to the present trial. At the distance of 13 miles fsom Amsterdam a Serang ought not to be left in charge. An European has more presence of mind in danger. A native is more likely than a European to take a cloud for a island. A European would most decidedly be more likely to extricate himself from danger if he got into it. I should think a Captain would not take a proper degree of care if he was not out, and on the alert, at the distance of 13 miles from Amsterdam. He should have been on deck From the circumstance of the Serang being in charge I think proper precaution was not taken.

Cross-examined.—There are many things that will alter the course of a ship. When near the shore the Captain should be on deck and on his guard. Currents will however sometimes deceive him. It was my own case—I lost the Sylph from that cause. I had been at the spot where she was lost not less than 20 times before. I was on deck at the time. With two European officers in a place where I had been twenty times before I lost the Sylph. I commanded a clipper of 250 tons at one time. Those ships are not particularly well manned. We find the native seacunnies answer as well as Europeans betweeen this and China. I went up the north-east coast. We had much cold weather. I took a native crew and had Europeans. I got on shore then in my own watch. I have twice been on shore whilst I commanded the Sylph. That vessel was lost at 8 o'clock at night. In the channel, vessels I believe use bells in foggy weather; they are notwithstanding sometimes run down. You may be within 20 yards of a ship and not see it. I recollect the circumstance of the three times going ashore off Beechy head. I don't know whether Amsterdam is as high as Beechy head. High land would not be so easily seen in the night as low when near, as it is generally enveloped in clouds.

To the Court —When I went to the north-east coast I took more Europeans than usual. Lascars do very well there if supplied with warm clothing. If the Captain was convinced of his reckoning and could depend on his officers he need not be on deck. I was brought up as a ship builder, but have been 17 years in the country service

Captains Edwards, Oakes, Eales, and Thompson were examined as to their opinion, who severally expressed their opinion to be, having heard the evidence, that the Captain ought to have been on deck, and that an European officer was more efficient than a Serang.

Mr. Lemond.—It was formerly a stipulation that Arab vessels should be officered by Europeans, nor would he effect an insurance with the knowledge that the vessel would be left in charge of a Serang during the mid-watch. He would however have adjusted this policy for reasons which did not bear upon the point at issue.

Mr. S. R. Crawford confirmed the statement that it would be an objection to underwrite a policy if the ship was known to be entrusted to the charge of a Serang.

Mr. Turton rising to reply was stopt by the Court. The Chief Justice declared that in this case there must be a verdict for the plaintiff. There might have been, and indeed it was in proof that there was, some degree of negligence on the part of the Captain, in being absent from the deck; but it is not shewn either that the accident occurred in consequence of such absence, or that if he had been present on deck he could have averted the disaster. The Court would not assume as a fact that the Serang was incompetent, in opposition to evidence of his competency.

Verdict for the Plaintiff, ~~Rs~~ 35,000.

IN THE GOODS OF STEPHANOS DECEASED.

MR. TURTON to-day recalled to the notice of the Court the application which he had made on a former day in the term, in this matter. There were difficulties as to the mode of proceeding in that case. He had obtained a rule nisi which was not strictly in accordance with the practice of the Ecclesiastical Court; independently of which there were other obstacles arising out of the will itself, and the manner in which executors were thereby appointed. It was desirable to avoid the expense of a commission to swear in the executor, and it would be difficult to ascertain who were the actual parties to whom the oath should be administered. The will nominates as executors the churchwardens for the time being of the Armenian church of St. Aratoon at Dacca. Now there were at present no such persons, as the late churchwardens had very recently resigned, and thus renounced their office and executorship at the same time. The will now sought to be established gave certain bequests to the church abovementioned and named as executors the churchwardens and overseers during the continuance of their office.

After some further discussion relative to the course of practice on the Ecclesiastical side of the Court, it appearing that it was not clearly before the Court whether the bequests in the will now sought to be established, corresponded with those given by a certain other will, a revocation of the probate of which to the Registrar of the Court was now sought, the Court thought the better course would be before proceeding further, to ascertain by comparing the two wills, who were the parties actually entitled and intended to be constituted executors.

IN THE GOODS OF STEPHANOS DECEASED.

MR. TURTON again brought this matter before the notice of the Court. By an abstract of the two wills, it would appear that by the former will the preference was given to the Church in the latter to the son. By the former the testator directed a Church to be built on a magnificent scale; by the latter provision was only made for a steeple. By the first 20,000 rupees were appropriated to Church buildings; by the latter 300 rupees. There were some other comparatively trifling differences between the two wills. The main difficulty, however, was as to how were the parties to whom execution should be granted, and how the necessary oath should be administered to them.

The Court intimated that as it had been brought to the notice of the Court that there was another will than that sought to be established, it would be fit that all parties interested under either should be served with notice, for which as such parties were resident at Dacca a period of ten days would be allowed.—Hurkaru.

IN THE MATTER OF WILLIAM HOLLOWAY.

Mr. Turton applied for a writ of habeas corpus. The party on whose behalf he was instructed had been discharged from H. M. 38th Regiment, and his certificate of discharge had been signed by the Commander-in-Chief, and sent to him, enclosed in a letter to his address by the Adjutant of the regiment. The affidavit on which the learned counsel moved, set forth, that the deponent, before he enlisted, was by trade a founder, and was induced to proceed from Berhampore, where his regiment was stationed, to the arsenal in Fort William, and there place himself under the orders of Major Hutchinson, on trial as a founder:—that he was from that time employed in the foundry in Fort William, until April or May last, when he was ordered by Major Hutchinson to proceed to Cossipore and work at the foundry there, whither he went, and was subsequently appointed head founder on a salary of sixty rupees per mensem. Subsequently, the affidavit sets forth, Major Hutchinson recommended deponent to purchase his discharge from H. M service, and to enter into that of the East India Company Deponent replied that it was his wish to purchase his discharge from H. M. Service, but that he would not again enlist as a soldier. About the begining of June last, deponent deposited with Major Hutchinson rupees 137, the amount required, and applied to Colonel Piper, the officer in command of H M. 38th Regiment, for his discharge. Deponent believes that in consequence thereof, an application was made by Colonel Piper to Major-General Watson, then commander of the forces, who forwarded it to Sir Robert O'Callaghan, and received from that officer the usual reply which was forwarded to Colonel Piper, and an official copy sent through a sergeant to the deponent. Major Hutchinson then, on behalf of the deponent, made the draft of a letter which he gave to a writer to engross, and afterwards forwarded the engrossed copy to the Adjutant of the regiment, the deponent not being aware of the contents until the following day, when he obtained the original draft from the writer, and, to his surprize, discovered that the Major had written in deponent's name, and pledged deponent to remain in the Company's foundry at Cossipore for three years. Deponent kept the draft of the letter, but from fear that Major Hutchinson would subject him to persecution, and being uncertain what course to pursue, remained silent on the subject of the letter. On the 28th September last deponent attended a regimental board of H. M. 38th, at Chinsurah, of which Major Hopper was president, and Captain Blennerhasset and Lieutenant Green were members, and was duly discharged. The deponent then returned to Cossipore, but on the 8th of October, not having received the certificate of his discharge, he wrote to Lieutenant and Adjutant Green, and again on the 21st ultimo. Concluding from the replies that the certificate of discharge had been intercepted deponent wrote to Major Hutchinson, who, thereupon, sent for him and read over a bond or agreement, which he required deponent to sign, binding himself to serve the East India Company, in their foundry at Cossipore, at a salary of Rs 60 per mensem. Deponent declined to sign the agreement, and was ordered by the Major to go to his quarters and consider himself a prisoner, and subsequently he was ordered to Chinsurah, where he reported his arrival to Colonel Piper. The Colonel stated to deponent that he had received a letter from Major Hutchinson concerning deponent, but that he had no power to detain deponent who was discharged from H. M. service. Deponent then returned to Cossipore, where he saw Major Hutchinson, who ordered him to be put out of the compound, and subsequently, while residing in Calcutta, he received a letter from Adjutant Green, from the tenor of which he was apprehensive of being treated as a deserter, and induced to join H. M. 38th at Chinsurah, at the same time informing Adjutant Green that he was determined to apply to the civil power for protection and redress.

The Chief Justice, being alone on the bench, said that Mr. Turton had better apply on Monday when the bench would be full; and in case the court should grant an order nisi only, it should be to show cause on the first day of term.—Englishman.

SHEDDEN versus MAXWELL.

This, it will be recollected, came on on a former day, during this term, involving the question of the validity of a judgment and execution thereon sued out upon a warrant of Attorney, of the due execution of which by the defendant who resided at Cawnpore, at the time it was made, there was no other evidence that the affidavit of the late Mr Ronald, of Mr Maclean and of Mr. Shedden, of belief as to the hand writing of the defendant's signature, their being attesting witnesses to the instrument the affidavit of neither of whom was put, nor evidence as to the hand writing.

The Chief Justice now delivered the decision of the Court, which was, that the judgment in this case and the execution were entirely null and void to all intents and purposes; but as there was a difference of opinion on the Bench, he thought it necessary to state expressly the grounds of his decision. The question here must depend upon the construction of the 69th section of the Insolvent Act. By that section, it is required that every warrant of Attorney with an affidavit of its due execution, shall be filed within six weeks after its being executed. In this case there is no direct affidavit at all as to the party's signature. If proved to be executed at all, it must be proved to have been executed within the time specified by the act. There is a case in 2 Moore and Payne which however depends rather upon the construction of 3d G. 4. The statutes according to the marginal note specifies twenty-one days as the time within which the affidavit should be filed. The affidavit in that case stated, that he saw the party sign the instrument without specifying the date. This was held not to be sufficient. There is no direct affidavit that this was executed at all.

Mr. Justice Grant concurred with the opinion expressed by the Chief Justice. It appeared to him, that the affidavit which establishes the execution of a warrant of Attorney, ought to shew that it was executed within the time required. Here it is not distinctly proved that it was executed at all. Ronald swears, that he believes the signature to be that of the defendant; why not that he knows it to be so? The object of the act was to give protection to the rights of creditors, and the affidavit to prove the execution of the warrant ought to be direct and positive

Mr. Justice Malkin differed from the other learned judges. The difficulty in this case arises out of what shall be deemed a sufficient proof, according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament.—Whether the Prothonotary ought to have admitted such affidavits as those put in was another question; he might have refused to receive them, and had he done so, the Court might have been applied to, and the question raised, probably more expediently in that manner Having, however, received their affidavits, the question to be determined is, whether the judgment shall now be pronounced null and void. The object of the statute in question was two-fold—first, the publicity of the transaction—secondly, the date of its execution, to prevent the danger of judgment being entered upon false warrants; now there might be cases, especially in this country, where it would not be possible to get down the necessary documents and go through the strict formalities within the time limitted; it would therefore appear a reasonable compliance with the statute if all that was possible were done, and reasonable evidence afforded of the fact of the one execution of their instrument upon which the judgment was founded.

Judgment set aside with costs.

There was another case precisely similar in all points with the above, and which it was admitted must abide the same decision.

RAM BEBEE v. ONE OF THE ATTORNIES OF THE COURT.

Mr Marnell moved upon the affidavit of one Ram Bebee, that the Attorney of the Supreme Court therein complained of, should be ordered to answer the matters of the same.

The affidavit stated, that the deponent was possessed of houses, one in Hautparah and another elsewere; the former purchased in her own name; the latter in the name of herself and her son. The latter fell into dissipation, got into debt and applied to one Muckur Doss, who agreed to advance him money provided he would assign over his interest in the house above mentioned. During her absence from home, he obtained the title deeds by means of false keys and gave them to Muckur Doss. By collusion and fraud Muckur Doss obtained judgment, and took out execution under which her house was seized by the Sheriff.

Ram Bebee hereupon applied to the Attorney in question, who told her that execution might be stayed by filing a Bill in Equity, and obtaining an injunction on the ground of fraud. That by mortgaging her property she contrived to raise the money amounting to Sa Rs 2,125, which she paid into the hands of the Attorney, on receipt of which, he gave an engagement for 400 rupees to file the requisite Bill with other stipulations in case of further expenses being necessary. The Bill was filed, and answer put in thereto, and the Bill subsequently dismissed for want of prevention; in consequence of which the said Ram Bebee had to pay the costs of the Equity suit, and remains liable to the fraudulent judgment obtained by Muckur Doss, and is entirely ruined.

The Court gave the order applied for.

IN THE MATTER OF MELVILLE, LATE SHERIFF OF CALCUTTA.

The Court asked Mr Turton if he had any thing further to sate to the Court on the subject of his application (see, Monthly Journal page 319) and desired to know what was the distinct nature of his application.

Mr Turton stated, that he applied under the peculiar circumstances, for the direction of the Court, as to how the under Sheriff was to act; he would, however, suggest, that some person might be appointed to carry into full execution the unexecuted writs of the Shrievalty of Mr. Melville now in the hands of the under Sheriff of that year. The Court were however of opinion, that they possessed not the power to make such an appointment—until some specific line of proceeding were brought to their notice, they could pass no order in the matter.

GOOL MAHOMED KHAN v. HADGE IBRAHIM JAMAL.

The Court was occupied during the day by this case which was an issue directed by the Court of Equity to try whether Hadge Ibrahim Jamal had carried on trade at Bussorah with Hadge Abdoolah Jamal in partnership on trade generally. There was a crowd of witnesses to examine, the onus of proving the partnership lying with the plaintiff, and the proof depending upon the establishment of a variety of acts of partnership as between the two alleged partners, and third persons.

IN THE GOODS OF TAPLEY, BELIEVED TO BE DECEASED.

Mr. Turton moved to swear in an Executor and to obtain probate of this Testator's last will and testament upon an affidavit stating that the testator sailed from this port in the Edina, on the 2d of November, 1833, on a voyage to Singapore and China, that the vessel had never been since heard of, and that it was supposed she had perished with all on board. Under these circumstances the affidavit of a survivor was of course not procurable; but the underwriters had already settled for losses on the ship.

The Chief Justice intimated that a question would arise, whether the Court would require a bond on security, to be entered into by the executor under these circumstances; and Mr. Justice Grant stated his impression to be, according to the recollection he had of the practice at home, to which his attention had been lately called, that it was generally laid down, that under similar circumstances, it was the practice to take a bond from the party applying for probate. The practice was directed to be ascertained, the party applying, avowing his readiness to give security if required.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

FULL REPORT OF THE JUDGMENT IN THE MATTER OF ALEXANDER AND CO.

SIR B. MALKIN.—This is an appeal from an order made on the 3d of January last, by Mr. Justice Grant in the Insolvent Court. It is necessarily with some hesitation that I come to a conclusion, especially on a question principally of fact, at variance with that formed by the Judge who heard the evidence in the case; but after having had the advantage of a full communication of the reasons given by the learned judge for the opinion he entertained, and of hearing the case argued with the utmost force and ability in support of that opinion, I cannot feel that the order ought to be supported. In its present shape it does not appear to me to have been one which the Insolvent Court had power to make; and I cannot collect from the evidence any state of facts which calls for the substitution of any other.

The first question in the case is whether the order made was one which the Insolvent Court had jurisdiction to make. And this must turn entirely on the construction of the 49th section of the Statute, Geo. 4. c. 73; for except under the special provisions of that act, the Court could have no such power. The order originally applied for, or rather that part of the application which was in substance granted, was to set aside a sale, treated as actually made, on the ground of negligence or fraud: the order made departed in form from that applied for, and corresponds with that made in ex-parte Bennett, 10 Ves. J. 381. But that case is an express authority to shew that such an order could not be made, unless by consent, by the Lord Chancellor sitting in Bankruptcy: and of course it could not be made by the Insolvent Court here, except under the express provisions of the Insolvent Act. The same principle is further recognized by the other cases cited in argument on the subject. The principal authority* which seems at all opposed to it is ex-parte Partington, 1 Ball and Beatt. 209, where Lord Manners appears to have thought, that he might, in a proper case, open the biddings, sitting in bankruptcy. This however is a mere dictum, and not a decision: and does not appear to have been generally approved or acted on. But whatever may be its weight, it clearly does not apply to a case like the present, or like ex-parte Bennett because it is necessary on an application to open the biddings that an advance should be offered: and here, though it is alleged that at the time a better price might have been obtained, it is not pretended that the parties then willing to purchase are willing now to bind themselves to advance on the price actually given, nor could they be so bound by any order made on these proceedings to which they are no parties. The application therefore as far as this portion of it is concerned, resolves itself completely into an application to set aside the sale, or render it inoperative, on the ground of legal or actual misconduct, and such an application, on the authority of ex-parte Bennett ought independently of the special provisions of the Insolvent Act here, to be made to a Court of Equity.

It appears to me that the Insolvent Act does not give the Court the power which it has exercised. The only sections which materially bear on the question are the 49th, the 50th, and the 56th; the last is only so far important on this point, that by giving other relief in cases of improper or improvident sales, when any actual damage has accrued, it makes it unnecessary for the purpose of justice to attempt to extend the operation of the other sections by any strained construction. And on the most obvious and natural construction both of the 49th and 50th Sections, I think that they contemplate future sales only: that they are merely prospective in their operation. This distinctly appears in the recital of the 50th section as far as the provisions of that section are concerned, and I think it may be collected with equal certainty from the wording and the general tenor of the 49th section, in which the object of the provisions relied on is to prevent mischief from the necessity originally imposed on the Assignee to sell from time to time with all convenient speed as he obtains possession, and the authority given to "delay or postpone the sale," and to make such other order regulating it as the Court shall think fit; a power which, on the ordinary principles of the interpretation of more general words annexed to particular ones, must, I apprehend, also refer, as the preceding provisions clearly do, to the regulation of sales yet to come. In the present case it is clear, whatever doubt may exist as to the exact time when it took place and the person to whom it was made, that a sale had in point of fact been effected; subject indeed to certain objections as to its validity, but binding according to the express terms of the order made, on the purchaser, unless he were entitled to disobey the order of the Court as not being a party to the proceedings, or as not being subject to the jurisdiction.

The power however of this Court is not merely to confirm or dismiss the order of the Insolvent Court, but to enquire into the matter of the petition and of the proceedings petitioned against, and "to make such order thereon as to the same Court shall seem meet and just." Now the original petition was not merely to set aside the sale, or to restrain a conveyance, but it prayed that, if the Court could not cancel the sale, it should be referred to the Examiner of the Court to enquire and report whether the factories could have been sold to any and what greater advantage had they been duly advertised for sale, and exposed to sale by public auction, or that the Court should grant such other order as the circumstances of the case might require. The Insolvent Court therefore was at liberty under that petition to proceed under the 56th section of the Statute: and if the circumstances of the case would warrant such a proceeding, it would be the duty of this Court to adopt it.

It is therefore necessary, to inquire into the circumstances of the case and it would indeed be material to do so, even if it were not required for the actual decision of the cause, because the character of the Assignees has been attacked, and they are officers whom it would be our duty, as we have the power, immediately to remove if some of the imputations cast on them were supported. With respect to Mr. Hurry, indeed, as far as personal conduct and character are concerned, he is out of the question: having had nothing to do with the sale, he cannot have incurred any censure with respect to it. He may indeed be implicated with Mr. Burkinyoung in the charge of negligence in not advertising and looking out for purchasers in the early part of the year 1834; but any such negligence in a single instance can furnish no imputation on his character, though it might render him liable to make good any loss sustained by reason of it. With respect to such negligence, however, I think that no charge can be supported: that the disputes existing between the Bank of Bengal and the Assignees, and the proceedings pending in the Court, with respect to the general principle on which the mortgaged property was to be disposed of, were abundantly sufficient to justify the Assignees in not incurring any expense by advertisements, and in waiting to see the result of the controversy. And if so there can be no remedy on that account under the 56th section, which only makes them liable in cases where there is both injury and fault. It has been suggested, indeed, that the Assignees ought to have accepted the offer of 70,000 rupees made in January for the three factories constituting the Moisurah concern, notwithstanding the pending disputes, which had reference to the general management of the estates, but would not have affected a single transaction of this kind. I am far from being convinced that even on this single point, the conduct of the Assignees was censurable; but on this, at all events, no claim of remedy can be supposed, for there is nothing to shew injury, nothing to raise any presumption that the Assignees who still retain the Moisurah and Gungadhurpore factories in their own hands, and who have sold Neischundurpore for the full value at which they estimated it in making the aggregate value of 70,000 rupees for the whole, have subjected the estate to any loss by not complying with that offer.

* Something of the kind seems, indeed, to have been done without opposition ex-parte Gould 1 Glyn and J. 231, but in ex-parte Ashly 3. Deac. and Chitt. 510 it was taken for granted that there must be special circumstances as in that case there were, to bring the purchaser within the Jurisdiction of the Court.

The question, therefore, resolves itself entirely into that which has always been treated as the main question in the case, the character of the transaction of the 25th of August; and it becomes necessary for me, as there is some variation in the evidence on that subject, to state distinctly the view which I entertain of the facts of the case. I need not for this purpose enter fully into the details of the evidence; but may state shortly the conclusions of fact which I collect from it: the inferences of law resulting from them are plain and simple when the facts are once ascertained.

It appears then that long before the date of this transaction, the factories had been valued by persons very competent to the office, who raised a former valuation of the three factories at 60,000 rupees to the sum of 70,000, and who in that enhanced value rated Neischunderpore at 15,000 rupees, and no more. On this valuation, Saupin was then willing to purchase Neischunderpore, and the Assignees to sell; but the Bank refused their consent. An argument was raised from this refusal, that the price was inadequate. I do not see, however, why the opinion of the Bank is to be taken as conclusive, and that of the valuers rejected: and the opinion of the Bank may have rested, as it is alledged that it did, chiefly on a temporary fluctuation in the value of indigo, and it seems at all events to have been so far renounced shortly afterwards that in January they were willing to accept for the three factories that sum of 70,000 rupees, of which, according to the estimate of the Assignees, the fair proportion of Neischunderpore was only 15,000. I see nothing therefore in this transacton to hinder the Assignees from fairly considering this a reasonable price for Neischunderpore even at that time.

At the period of the actual sale, however, the circumstances, where considerably altered. The lease or izara had expired, and a considerable advance was demanded for the renewal. The circumstances connected with this izara require careful consideration, because a great deal of erroneous argument has, in my opinion, been founded on them on each side. On the one side it has been treated as if the advance required was equivalent to an addition to the price, so that the sale for 15,000 Rs. and the transferring the necessity of making the advance from the Assignees to Saupin, was a transaction as beneficial to the estate as a sale for 15,000 would have been, if the Assignees still had to secure the izara themselves. On the other hand it is contended that the advance for the izara being a mere loan, to be deducted out of the rent, and bearing interest, was no prejudice at all to the estate, and deserves no consideration whatever, except as to the minor exactions of the salammie fees, and the small additional sums finally advanced on less favorable terms than the principal sum of 8,000 Rs. The truth, as in most cases, lies between the two extreme statements. The advance required undoubtedly cannot be treated as any material enhancement of the price, or diminution of the value of the lands. On the other hand, the Assignees appear to me to have formed a just opinion that it would be very undesirable for them, situated as they were, to make such an advance, and that probably the Court would not sanction it. Their duty is to sell with all reasonable expedition, to sell unless there is good cause for delay; and I cannot think it would have been desirable for them to encumber themselves with a transaction of advance, from which the estate, whether it continued in their own hands or was transferred by them to others, could not be completely extricated in less than three years. It is also material to observe that the bargain for the izara was not completed: in fact, it was not finally concluded exactly on the terms then expected. And it is admitted that the value of the factory almost entirely depended on the obtaining the izara. Under these circumstances, if the Assignees could sell the factory, they cast the risk of failure in obtaining the izara of the purchaser, and they delivered themselves from the necessity of making advances, undesirable in their situation, though perhaps immaterial to more independent speculators. The value of the factory might not be seriously affected by these considerations; but they would furnish good reason why the Assignees should be peculiarly ready to accept any thing which they considered as a fair offer. They would furnish some reason also for private sale; for on the announcement of a public one, any speculator in the neighbourhood might have been induced to secure the izara on unreasonable terms, in the confidence that he would have the means of finally reimbursing himself the sum lent to the zemindar by stopping it out of the rents, so that the magnitude of the advance would produce temporary inconvenience only, and not final loss: and in the expectation that the Neischunderpore factory would fall into his hands at a very low price, when he had secured the only means of rendering it valuable to a purchaser.

In this state of things, Mr. Burkinyoung proposed to Mr. Saupin that he should renew his former offer, and become the purchaser at the valuation price of 15,000 rupees. This offer Mr. Saupin accepted, on condition that he should be allowed to divide his purchase, and with a stipulation for liberty to consult Mr. Rogers, by whom he expected to be supplied with the means of completing it. Mr. Rogers agreed to the proposal, and the bargain was made. The bargain however is sought to be impeached on three grounds:—that Saupin was an agent for sale, and not a buyer, and that a purchase by Rogers for him, he being such agent, was fraudulent and void in law: that the purchase was actually fraudulent on Saupin's part, from suppression of knowledge which he possessed as to the likelihood that other parties would purchase: and that there was great negligence on the part of the Assignees in concluding a sale without making farther inquiries. It is further said that loss has accrued in consequence of that negligence, for that Messrs. Gregg and Donaldson were willing to give 20,000 rupees for the factories at that time: that they even offered 22,000 to Saupin shortly afterwards: and that at all events there was great neglect at the very time of the sale, for that the Assignees knew that Mr. Storm would have purchased Autpara at an advance on the price for which Mr. Bell was to have it.

With respect to the question of agency I have already intimated my opinion that the transaction was one between Burkinyoung and Saupin, and a purchase by the latter. If so the objection as to the agency falls to the ground. There is undoubtedly some confusion in the evidence, arising both out of varying statements as to what passed at the time, and out of some expressions contained in the subsequent letters. If those only are to be dwelt on, the transaction looks like an agency for sale: but the evidence of Mr. Burkinyoung and of Mr. Saupin is distinct that it was a bargain made with Saupin for a sale either directly to him, or directly from the Assignees to Rogers for Saupin's benefit. In either case it is substantially a dealing with Saupin as the purchaser, and if so is immaterial whether the conveyance was to be made directly to him, or for any reason unexplained to us, but understood among the parties, to Rogers for his benefit. One fact seems to me conclusively to shew that this was the real understanding of the transaction: I mean the circumstance that the sale was a mere renewal of a former negotiation in which it is not even suggested that Saupin was not dealing completely and directly for himself; though at that time also Rogers was expected to furnish him with the means of fulfilling his contract. If it were so,—if the sale were notoriously for Saupin's benefit, I cannot see that it is void on any ground of agency: if it were, all sales would be void in which the bargain was made by a person who preferred having his conveyances made to a trustee for him, and himself arranged with the trustee that he should become so.

It is true that there are expressions in Mr. Alexander's letters (hardly in his evidence, for while he speaks of considering Rogers as the purchaser, he speaks also of considering the bargain as concluded with Saupin, and clearly under circumstances which, if they made Saupin an agent at all, made him the agent for Rogers as the purchaser, not for the Assignees as the sellers, a relation of which the legal consequences would be widely different) which seem rather to represent Saupin as the agent for sale of the Assignees. Thus he talks of the "power of selling being given to Saupin, and that he has secured purchasers;" (Alexander's letter to Storm, August 26) and generally in his correspondence uses similar phrases. And it would seem that Mr. Burkinyoung himself thought it necessary to be satisfied by Mr. Rogers that he was willing to take the factory at the price stipulated, and that he thought it likely (though there is some confusion on this subject) that Mr. Storm would be in time with his amended offer. It is always perplexing and unfortunate when facts are at all loosely dealt with, or carelessly stated; I cannot however see in these circumstances, especially when viewed with reference to the rather complicated and confused nature of the transaction, any thing to make me discredit the positive assertion of Burkinyoung and Saupin that they considered their dealing as a bargain made: and the question of fact is, what was their understanding? Mr. Alexander's is only material as evidence, even if it differed more substantially from their statement than I think it does. Even the intimation to Storm, assuming it too to be correctly represented, might almost as well correspond to a belief that he would be in time to get his offer accepted by Saupin, as that the Assignees still had the power of interfering. On the whole, therefore, it seems to me that the transaction is not void on any ground connected with Saupin's agency for sale: that the fact is not made out in proof. It is not necessary therefore to discuss any questions of law arising on it.

The next objection is that fraud was actually practised by Saupin, and that a sale to him, obtained by his fraud, cannot be allowed to stand. I have already said that the Insolvent Court has not in my opinion the power of interfering with a sale actually made to a stranger. It is therefore unnecessary to inquire into Mr. Saupin's conduct for the purpose of fixing him, unconnectedly with the Assignees, with any imputation of fraud; and it would be improper, if unnecessary, as he has not had the opportunity of proving his own case in answer to any such charge. Without pretending to say whether there are not circumstances which it would be desirable in another proceeding that Mr. Saupin should account for, it is quite clear that there are none which might not very well admit of explanation. But at all events, if Mr. Saupin was not the agent of the Assigness in this matter, it is impossible that they should be responsible for any frauds committed by him, unless it were by reason of their own negligence that such frauds were successful.

Now with reference to the last question of negligence, I have already expressed my opinion, that the Assignees were fully justified under the circumstances in making a private and sudden sale, if they could obtain a fair price for the property; and I am not aware of any thing in the evidence to shew that they had any reason to be dissatisfied with the price of 15,000 rupees. It was the price at which their valuers had appraised it: it was the price, as far as they could understand at the time, at which Gregg and Donaldson estimated it. It is true, that those gentlemen had made an offer of 20,000 rupees for the factory to the Bank; but that is distinctly shewn never to have been communicated to the Assignees, nor was it likely that it should, as the Bank at that time would not consent to a sale, except of the whole Moisurah concern. The offer of 70,000 rupees was communicated, but that aggregate corresponded with their own valuation, and in considering it, the Assigneess would, of course, suppose that the portions would be estimated as they had estimated them; for no explanation was given of the manner in which Donaldson and Gregg computed their value. Even if the letter of the 13th January from Gregg and Donaldson ever reached the Assignees, of which there is no proof at all, but a denial, it would have conveyed no farther information; for it communicated the offer of the 70,000 only, and although it refers to Saupin's offer of 15,000, and the refusal of it by the Bank, on the ground that the price was too small and ought to be raised to 20,000, it does not give any intimation that the parties had ever proposed to give 20,000, or even that they thought it a fair value; unless, indeed, this is to be concluded by a speculative inference from the words, that in making the price 70,000, "the Bank had added in the same ratio" to the other two divisions. But it is not merely that the Assignees had no reason to think the price of 15,000 rupees inadequate; there is, in fact, no evidence that it really was so. There are offers, undoubtedly, of higher prices; but with the single exception of the temporary opinion of the Bank, there is nothing to shew a higher estiamate of value. Gregg distinctly declares, and so does Storm, that they offered above the value; that there were local and personal circumstances which made them willing to give more than it was worth. If the Assignees knew this, they ought to have used the knowledge for the benefit of the estate; but as they did not, it seems impossible to hold them culpable (and if not culpable they are not responsible) for selling the estate bonâ fide for as much as it was really and generally worth.

This brings me to the only remaining part of the case —the question whether Burkinyoung was not guilty of negligence in not communicating to Saupin the offer of Storm, to advance on the price to be given by Bell. I have felt more doubt on this part of the case than on any other; and perhaps in this particular there was some little want of that diligence which is due from the assignee of an insolvent estate, to do every thing in his power for the benefit of the creditors. Still I am of opinion, that no order can be made on this ground. If I am right in thinking that there was a sale to Saupin, he, and not the Assignees, would have had the benefit of Storm's advance, for it is clear, that the sale to him was of the whole property. Or even if this were otherwise, he had at all events so far the disposition of Autpara, that the Assignees could not refuse to carry into effect the sale to Bell unless he could do so himself. And he was bound to Bell even before the sale to himself; having fully contracted with him to allow him to have Autpara at 5,000 rupees, if he himself obtained the whole Neischunderpore concern at 15,000. On both grounds, therefore, if Storm's offer had been communicated to him, the estate would not have been benefited; and thus, even if there were some slight neglect, in this one particular, there has been no loss in consequence of it; and no remedy therefore is required.

It follows that the order obtained must, in my opinion, be discharged: and with whatever regret I may come to such a conclusion in a case of sufficient difficulty to have produced conflicting decisions, and still to divide the opinion of the Court, it seems to me that it ought to be discharged with costs. If it is sought to be supported on the ground that the original order was correct, the majority of the Court being of opinion that such an application was made to an incompetent jurisdiction, the order would be discharged with costs of course: and the same result seems to me to follow on the other part of the case also. The application proceeds entirely on the imputation of grave charges of fraud and misconduct; and a party who prefers such, not merely without being able completely to prove their truth, but when they are in point of fact unfounded, as they appear to me to be in the present case, must in my opinion abide by the consequences of his rashness. It would obviously be impossible with the view which I entertain of the case, to allow the Assignees to bear personally the expense of defending themselves against unfounded charges; and it certainly would not be a proper result of a proceeding, brought ostensibly for the benefit of the estate, that the estate should be prejudiced by having to bear the costs opposing an application which ought not, if my view of the facts is correct, ever to have been made.

Mr. Justice Grant.—I should have been glad to have been saved the necessity of deciding on this appeal, it being from my own judgment. But the appeal being by the Statute to this Court generally, I am compelled again to consider, and to deliver my opinion upon the case. But I have thought it right to consider it alone, and have therefore not had the advantage of knowing the grounds upon which the learned Judges, my brethern, differ from me, expect from what I have now heard, and that it has been intimated to me that their opinions are that Saupin was not an agent of the Assignees.

The case is an important one, not from the sum in question, which is inconsiderable compared to the vast mass of debt in this insolvency, nor merely from the degree of censure which the judgment infers that these Assignees, persons I understand of very respectable character, are in my opinion liable to, although this imposes the duty of a very careful consideration: but from the great principles which in my view of it, it involves—principles on which depends the safety of every Insolvent estate in India, and the interests of every creditor, and of every unfortunate man the pressure of whose affairs compels him to take the benefit of the Act, which interest of the creditors and the insolvents, the Insolvent Court is established for the sole purpose of protecting—principles which I had understood to be firmly established in Bankruptcy and in Equity in the Court of the Lord Chancellor and the Baukrupt Court in England, the law of which Courts is binding upon us, which principle I much fear the reversal of this decision will shake in the practice of the Insolvent Court here.

The reasons of repeal are not very acurately set forth, but as I make them out, are 10 in number.

1. That Saupin, Albert, Terraneau, and Bell are interested in the three factories, the three former as proprietors, the latter as a purchaser of one of the factories, and were not before the Court or subject to its order.

2. That the applicants acted bonâ fide, and with the best intentions, and the price coupled with the necessity of purchasing the izara, was as good as could be expected and more than was ever offered.

3. That no order ought to have been made disturbing the sale without undertaking on the part of the person making the application to advance the price already obtained and to pay the costs and so forth.

4. That the order when once passed ought not to have been altered on any Petition without notice to the appellants.

5. That the Court exceeded its jurisdiction—gave orders which the appellants have no means of acting upon—directed references as to matters and accounts, which cannot be enforced and respecting persons not before the Court and so not subject to its jurisdiction.

6. That the order proceeded on the ground that Saupin was an agent of the appellants for the sale, &c. whereas he was a mere purchaser on his own account, with liberty to transfer part, which he had a right to do without such permission.

7. That the order does not provide for the reimbursement of the expense of cultivation incurred by the purchasers since their purchase.

8. That it does not notice that the appellants without the assent of Terraneau, Albert and Saupin, who are joint lessees for another season, cannot put a purchaser in possession till after another season; and that the consent of the two former to the sale was coupled with the condition that Saupin should relinquish his interest in the other factories, and that Saupin's assent to a sale with such condition would deprive him of the means of livelihood. I may here observe that I see no evidence of such a condition as is here mentioned in the consent of Albert and Terraneau to the sale of these factories.

9. That the directions in the said order are contrary to the principles which govern the Courts of Law and Equity as to assignees of bankrupt and insolvent estates.

10. That the order interferes with the management of the assignees of Insolvent Estates in a manner unusual, if not unprecedented, in the English Courts.

Of these reasons, and of the arguments in support of them, some go to the jurisdiction of the Court, which it is alledged the Court exceeded in the order made. It is necessary to dispose of these in the first place. The 1st reason of Appeal and the 5th are of this description, and with these the 10th may be included as an allegation of the Court's having exceeded its powers rightly considered. One main ground in the argument in the Insolvent Court and on appeal was that the sale was complete and could not be cancelled by the Court under the words of the Act,—and it was argued that assignees under the Act, make sales, and act in the affairs of the estate, on their own responsibility, and the case exparte Montgomery, Glyn and Jamieson 338., was cited by Mr. Cochrane.

In that case Lord Eldon states that assignees of bankrupt estates in England, act on their own responsibility, and that they and not the Court are to be judges of the propriety and expediency of a sale, and he refused to interefre to stop a sale. There was another reason in that case, that the petitioners had no title to make the application, not being creditors of the estate in question. I have no doubt but the first ground would have been sufficient and that that is the law under the Bankrupt Law of England.

But this is not so under the Indian Insolvent Act, which is framed upon very different principles.

By 9 G. 4. c. 73. § 46., power is given to compound and submit to arbitration only with the approbation of the Court.

By § 47, there is the like enactment with regard to the power to prosecute and defend actions.

I will advert to this clause more particularly presently.

By § 50. the power of ordering and directing the postponement of sales, the management of property, the sale or disposition of it, the raising money upon it by way of mortgage, and generally all the detail, is given to the Court.

These clauses were introduced for the very purpose of conferring on Insolvent Courts in India powers not possessed by the Court in Bankruptcy in England, for the express purpose, as it appears to me, of meeting the case which arose in exparte Montgomery, and similar cases to confer the power which could not there be exercised, and to limit the authority of assignees there recognised.

By the bankrupt Act for England [6. G. 4. c. 16, 11. § 863-64.] the whole real and personal estate of the bankrupt is vested in the assignees with the exception of copy or customary hold lands, and the assignees have the complete and entire disposition of all such estates upon their own responsibility. But the power to sell estates, conferred by the act, is given not to assignees, but to the commissioners, so likewise to sell copy hold estates, real or personal, extended in aid, and goods of others in his possession and under his controul. Every thing else that is to be done with the estate is left to the assignees, in some cases subject to the controul of the commissioners or Lord Chancellor but in most subject only to their own responsibility.

There is nothing in the English Bankrupt Act similar to § 846, 47,48 and 50 of the Indian Insolvent Act, and in many respects the powers of assignees under this Act are more limited than by the English Insolvent Act. By the English Insolvent act, power to sell estates by public auction is vested in the assignees in the manner and at the place approved by the majority in value of a meeting of creditors: but the power of sueing, except in Equity, is left to the assignees. By § 43 of the Indian Act of the power of selling goods in the bankrupt's possession and under his controul the property of another is reserved to the Court.

By § 30 of the English Insolvent Act the property and disposal of such goods are vested in the assignees.

The power conferred and duly imposed on Insolvent Courts in India of directing and controuling the management of the insolvent estate, are greater than those conferred and imposed on the English Insolvent Court, and much greater than those conferred and imposed on commissioners or on the Court of Bankruptcy by the laws in force in England; and the independent powers of the assignees, acting on their own responsibility merely, are greatly less in India than in England. Whether it was desirable to make this difference, and especially in the case of those subject to the Bankruptcy law in England,—whether a deviation from the law which prevails there has insured better results in mercantile cases than would have followed the introduction of the Bankrupt law of England, it is not for me to decide. I am certainly not for extending the principle of relieving the Assignees from responsibility, and have always resisted the so doing where the Act did not clearly impose on the Court that necessity when I have sat as Judge in the Insolvent Court. But I was, and am very clearly of opinion, that in the case of the sale in question this necessity was imposed upon the Court; that from the moment this petition complaining of the sale was presented by a creditor it was no longer a question of the just exercise of discretion on the part of the assigness, and of their responsibility, but of the discretion of the Court, upon its own responsibility, unshared with any one. The questions for the Court to consider were—

1st. Was the sale completed?

2nd. If it was not, was it set about with such careful consideration for the interests of the creditors, and the estate,—with such publicity, and offered at such a price, as that the Court ought to order it to be so made?

I was, and am, clearly of opinion in the negative in answer to both questions. The words of the 49th sec. of the Act. are these:—

"And be it further enacted, that from time to time as possession is obtained of any of the estate or effects of any insolvent or insolvents, the assignee or assigness shall, with all convenient speed, make sale of the same, subject nevertheless to the direction and controul of the Court, by authority of which he or they shall have been appointed; in case any application shall be made to such Court by any insolvent, or any creditor or mortgagee, in all which cases such Court shall have full power and authority to delay or postpone the sale of any property, and to make such other order regulating the same as to such Court shall seem meet."

With these words of the Act, every person dealing with the assignees of insolvent estates, for the purchase of any part thereof, was bound to be acquainted.

The power of the assignees, to make sale of the estate and effects is rendered subject to the direction and control of the Court, in case any application shall be made to the Court by the insolvent or any creditor, or mortgagee, and the Court is authorized to do two things, to delay the sale, and to make such other order regulating the sale as to it shall seem meet. These latter words are very large.

There is no time mentioned within which such application may be made.

But the Act must receive a reasonable construction; either such notice must be given, or there must be such publicity, and in either case due time being permitted to elapse between the offer to sell at a price and upon conditions made known, and the completion of the sale, so that those interested may have an opportunity of applying to the Court if they think fit; otherwise this provision of the Act, and in my opinion a most wholesome and wise provision, may be readily and wholly defeated. A sale without public advertisement recently preceding, or meeting of creditors, or notice to creditors of the mode of sale to be adopted, and the price proposed to be taken, concluded in a private room with no one present, but the purchaser and the assignee, and closed in a few hours with equal privacy, is a fraud upon the Act of Parliament, of which no person concerned can take advantage. All those circumstances attended the sale in question.

Mr. Alexander, the Secretary to the Assignees, swore that the factories were advertized for sale, from time to time, till October 1833, the sale being made in August, 1834, 10 months afterwards; that after the Bank of Bengal gave notice they would apply for an order for a general sale, all communications for sale ceased on all sides; that this was before an offer which was made in Jan. 1834; that Jan. 1834, up to 25th August the day of the transaction which is now rested on as a private sale, the Assignees made no effort to sell this property, either by public or private; that they thought while the order of the Court for a general sale was pending, they could do nothing, and when the order was made known there was no advertisement, nor did they make any private offer or inquiry, i. e. during 7 months immediately preceding the private sale; that when the Assignee had agreed with the purchaser, a letter was directed to be written to the other persons who had appeared, acquainting them, i. e. when it was all over and the communication was no longer of any importance.

There was no notice to the creditors, nor were any of them consulted when the resolution was taken immediately to sell this property.

The transaction, whether sale as is now insisted on, or authority given to sell at a certain price, was concluded at once in Mr. Burkinyoung's private chamber, no person being present but Mr. Burkinyoung, Mr. Saupin, the alleged purchaser and Mr. Alexander the Secretary to the Assignees—no person but they and those connected with Mr. Saupin, knowing any thing of the immediate intention of the Assignees to sell at all, and the sale being made at ⅔ths of what had been offered for it to the Bank of Bengal, the mortgage on 28th December, 1833 (see Gregg and Donaldson's letter to Udny,) and might have been obtained at the time of the sale if it had been made known, or less than ⅔ths—it being proved, that a purchaser was ready to give 20,000 ~~Rs~~ for what was sold for 15,000, that he offered that sum on the 1st of September 1834, 7 days after the private sale, and had asked Mr. Rogers the nominal purchaser in trust for Saupin, whether he would take 22,000 ~~Rs~~ for his bargain after the purchase was made, and that another intending purchaser has on the very day the sale was privately made to Saupin offered the Assignees for a part sold at 5,000 ~~Rs~~—5,000 ~~Rs~~ only stipulating for leave to increase his offer if that was not sufficient. [Gregg's Affidavit, Cockerell's deposition, Storm's deposition, Alexander's deposition.]

I held, and I still hold, that this transaction, if a sale, was a fraud upon the Statute, and that, if such transactions are sustained, it is a repeal of the provision carefully made by the legislature for the protection of the interests of creditors. Secondly, I held, and I still hold, that the sale was not legally completed, or legal property transferred, for that he had not been put in possession, nor had the deeds been executed or delivered. What he had obtained, if he had acquired any right at all, was a right to sue in Equity to compel a completion of the sale, and I thought, and still think that he had acquired no such equitable right, and had no such equity.

Then as to the jurisdiction of the Court, it exercised no jurisdiction except over its own officers, whom it restrained from doing an act in the doing which they were placed under its control, and it decided and directed nothing regarding the rights of any person, except that it refused to do that which it considered they had not a right to enforce, and in so refusing necessarily expressed and acted upon its opinion regarding their rights in this respect. As to Saupin, he would not pretend that he was not an agent acting under the Assignees, and consequently under the Court in the affairs of the insolvency, if this made any difference.

But further, I held that this was a void sale upon two grounds personal to Saupin, the alleged purchaser, my reasons for which will, I think, cover all that is material in the other reasons of appeal. The sale was made to Mr. Rogers of part in trust for Saupin, and to Mr. Bell with whom Saupin had previously come to a private agreement that they should buy the shares between them of another part.

In the first place Saupin was the confidential managing agent of the Assignees in the conduct and concerns of the factory to be sold, bound to instruct them faithfully in regard to its utmost value, and the means of obtaining for it the highest price, and restrained by the law from accquiring any interest which might countervail these his paramount duties; and from this restraint such agent cannot be freed, so long as he continues in truth and in fact in any manner invested with this character, except by the express and advised assent of his employer and principal in person.

This assent the assignees of an insolvent have no power to give, being not the principals, but the creditors and the insolvent only, all and each individually agreeing to it.

I have reconsidered the case and I cannot see how the doctrine clearly, and as I think most justly, laid down by Lord Eldon in Wren v. Kirtor [8 Ves. 502] can be shaken, nor how this sale can be maintained consistently with that doctrine.

The interest of the insolvents and then that of the creditors, in these factories, was two-fold.

1. As proprietors, in which they were sold.

2. As joint lessees under themselves with Saupin and two others in a lease of which a year was to run when the sale was made.

Saupin was the sole managing agent of the other parties.

The two other co-lessees were managers of other factories, that had belonged to the insolvent firm, leased in like manner.

Saupin was in debt to the firm at the time of the insolvency, which debt was afterwards paid by his share of profits then in dependency. He had brought some money into the concern but had drawn it out and more.

The whole funds necessary for the outlay on the growth and manufacture of the plant and management of the concern were furnished by the insolvent estate, the other partners not being expected, and not having the means of making any advance. [Alexander's deposition. Saupin's deposition.]

Saupin therefore was an agent of the creditors, the proprietors in the management of this property and manufactory, or trade, paid for his services by being admitted a partner, sharing a certain proportion of the profits, $\frac{3}{10}$th for a certain number of years of which one remained.

I cannot see how his services being thus remunerated, and his being a partner to this extent, could vary his position from that of any other agent and manager of a factory, mine, or other property of the like nature.

The peculiar knowledge of its advantages and its value which his management gave him was equally the property of the proprietors and other partners, his employers. It was equally contrary to good faith and to the trusts of his situation he should employ that knowledge to obtain an advantageous bargain in dealing with those proprietors for the purchase of their estate, and equally contrary to the wise and necessary policy of the Law to permit him to place himself in a situation to obtain from his employers an advantage, which could only be obtained at the expense of that good faith and those trusts.

Alexander swears Saupin was manager of these factories; that he had been in the management of them, had charge of them, and that he was manager and had charge of them, on the 25th August the day of the alleged sale to him, so also Burkinyoung and Saupin himself.

The whole knowledge the Assignees had of the circumstances of the factories and the supposed necessity of a large advance to purchase an izara, and the essentiality of this izara to the concern, was derived from Saupin, on whose information they entirely relied and acted. [Burkinyoung's deposition. Alexander's deposition. Saupin's deposition exh. L. letter 13th September 1834 Assigneess to Gregg.]

Nay, that he actually did take advantage of the knowledge he had so acquired is certain, for he himself swears that he thought Mr. Gregg capable of giving a greater price for the factory than he could; that he had reason to believe he was to give a price for the factory, and would give a greater price to get him turned out of it; that he knew that Gregg was an offerer in November or December last year [at which time it is to be observed Gregg offered 20,000] and in pressing upon the Assigness the necessity of a large advance by way of loan to the zemindar to obtain a renewal of the izara or lease of the lands wanted, he did not acquaint them that the rent was to be reduced, so that he led the Assignees to believe the estate was to get only 4½ and a fraction per cent. on the loan to be advanced, whearas it was truly 6¼ per cent.

But I rested my judgment in the Insolvent Court, so far as regarded Saupin's being the manager and agent of this factory, upon the plain and broad principle of equity, and of justice founded in good faith, received in Courts of Equity and Bankruptcy in England, and binding as I think in Equity and Insolvency under the statute here, viz.:—

That where the agent and manager of a concern, be it manufactory, colliery, mine, indigo factory, or the like, purchases that concern, the sale must be set aside, unless it clearly appear that the price was the utmost that could or can be obtained.

In the second place Saupin was not only the confidential managing agent of the concerns of these factories, but he was the person commissioned and authorized to sell them, and being so commissioned and authorized was under an absolute and legal disability to buy them, had the transaction been the fairest, and honestest, and most public in the world.

That Saupin was employed by Burkinyoung the Assignee as agent to sell these factories, is manifest upon the evidence.

Alexander swears "There were two transactions took place on the 25th August, first in consequence of Mr. Burkinyoung and I assuring Saupin we were certain the Court would not authorize so large an advance. He then made his former offer which had been accepted before (i. e. Rs. 15,000 which he had offered in Sept. 1833). Previous to his leaving the office he asked whether it made any difference if two parties became purchasers instead of one, paying Rs. 15,000. Mr. Burkinyoung said it was of no moment. Saupin then declared the purchasers were Mr. Rogers and Mr. Bell. I considered the sale then as made." The witness adds that "when Saupin declared Rogers and Bell were the purchasers and Mr. Burkinyoung said very well, I considered it a sale on authority to Saupin to sell to these parties."

The two transactions which Mr. Alexander refers to as having taken place on this occasion where therefore 1st, Suapin's repeating his own former offers, and 2dly, his explaining that it was the offer of two other persons, Rogers and Bell, and his receiving authority to sell to them at that price. If this did not constitute him an agent of the Assignee to sell for them this property, I do not know what would. Mr. Alexander proceeds to say after being shewn exhibit C., letter of the 1st September (to which I shall again advert presently) "that letter, expect a part of it relating to Mr. Storm, was written by authority of the Assignees. The communication refered to in the letter was on the 24th August after Saupin had received authority to sell to Bell and Rogers, when I found there was a person who would give ~~Rs~~ 500 more; I refered him to Saupin hoping he had not closed with Bell. This was written by order of Burkinyoung. Storm came on the evening of the day after the direction to sell." Mr. Alexander was Secretary to the Assignees. He was present at all that passed between Burkinyoung and Saupin, and he considered it as constituting the latter the agent of the Assignees to sell these factories to two persons named, at a price named.

Saupin was very naturally so employed. He was already the agent of the Assignees in the management of these factories.

That which passed in Alexander's presence between Burkinyoung and Saupin amounted to no more than the giving Saupin a commission to dispose of these factories is further manifest from the representation of Alexander to Storm, who called upon him that evening soon after Saupin had left the office. He expressed to Alexander his desire to purchase the smaller factory and renewed his offer of the year before. He says "I asked him (I told him) if it was not sold I would make him an offer. He said it was not sold but was open to an offer from me. I then said if he would give me a slip of paper I would write my offer. He said it would be time enough to-morrow morning. In course of conversation I asked him if Mr. Saupin was here. He has but just left me, I understood from him there had been some conversation with Mr. Saupin about the factories but no price fixed." (Storm's evidence.)

Of any private understanding that Saupin was himself to purchase in the name of Rogers existing between him and Mr. Burkinyoung, Alexander was entirely ignorant, for he swears that he came to the knowledge of Saupin's having sold to himself in the name of Rogers afterwards.

In a subsequent part of his deposition he swears "I now know Mr. Rogers bought for Saupin, I have so heard from Mr. Rogers; and again afterwards, I have understood Rogers paid on behalf of Saupin. I think Mr. Burkinyoung has told me so."

Than what is Burkinyoung's own account of what passed with Saupin in Alexander's presence? He swears "Saupin told me he would purchase. He then corrects himself. He would get for the Assignees ~~Rs~~ 15,000. Rogers, would pay 10,000 and Bell 5,000."

He adds "I was aware Saupin was buying Neischinderpore for himself through Rogers as his agent," but of this presently. He proceeds being shown exhibits A, B, C. "I authorized what these relates to the sale. I authorised the part that speaks of giving authority to Saupin to sell." A. is a letter from Alexander to Mr. Storm an intending purchaser of the part sold to Mr. Bell, [Exhibited A. letter 26th Aug. 1834, Alexander to Storm.] It contains these words "the Assignees have authorized Saupin to sell. He has obtained Rs. 15,000." He is here distinctly affirmed by the Secretary by the Assignee's directions and authority, to have been employed as their agent to sell, not a part, but the whole, and to have fulfilled his commission by selling the whole. But Burkinyoung himself saw Storm in the evening of the 25th August, after Saupin was gone and upon Storm's offering an advance of 500 ~~Rs~~ upon Autpara, Bell's purchase, he swears "I desired him to call in the morning when he would see Saupin. I gave him to understand it was out of my hands." Was not this declaring it to be in Saupin's hands as agent to sell? He says further, "I had a conversation that day with Rogers on the subject of Neischinderpore Factory. I agreed with Rogers and Saupin for 10,000 ~~Rs~~ for Neischinderpore and with Saupin for 5,000 ~~Rs~~ for Autpara to Mr. Bell or any body else. I did not consider the agreement complete unless I got the money for both." Even on the 26th August, therefore, according to the account given by Mr. Burkinyoung's deposition, there was no sale to any body but a commission given to Saupin to sell both factories together for ~~Rs~~ 15,000, with an understanding on the part of the Assignee that the person so commissioned was to keep one to himself and sell the other so as to obtain 15,000 ~~Rs~~ for both, being at liberty to sell to whomsoever he chose, a strange enough commission when he had been in communication with Storm the evening before, knew he would advance ~~Rs~~ 500 upon the bargain, "had told him he should hear him in the morning and had agreed with him to allow him to amend his offer (of course in the morning) if any body made higher offer." These are the words of Storm's deposition.

The next thing to be noticed is, the letter written by the Secretary by Mr. Burkinyoung's directions to Mr. Terraneau for the information of himself and Mr. Allan and the co-lessees of the factories without whose consent there could be no sale till the year was out, or at least no possession given.

This letter bears date the 25th August 1834, the day of the transaction with Saupin. It appears from Alexander's deposition that the communication be made to the other lessees was after the transaction with Saupin.

It states that the Assignees "had offered his, Saupin's, division of the concern for sale not that they had sold it." It proceeds "I am directed to add, that should suitable offers be made the Assignees will dispose, &c., &c. I am directed therefore to request your concurrence in the sale in case an opportunity for disposing of the concern offers."

I would desire to know how the Assignee who directed the writing of that letter, who made the representation to Mr. Storm which I mentioned, who directed the letter to be written to Storm which I had mentioned, the terms of whose communication with Saupin in the presence of the Secretary amounted distinctly in that Secretary's apprehension, as he has sworn, to the giving Saupin a commission to sell, and to no more, to be heard now to say, when he wishes to support a sale to Saupin, that he did not constitute him an agent to sell, but treated with him as a purchaser from the first?

Saupin himself says that what passed between him, Mr. Alexander and Mr. Burkinyoung, amounted to the giving him a commission to sell for the Assignees.

He says they recommended me to endeavor to obtain the price that had been offered the preceding year by Mr. Rogers. I then called on Mr. Rogers and related this part of the conversation to him. Mr. Rogers sent me back to the Assignees (i. e. to Burkinyoung) to tell them that if they would make him (Rogers) an offer he would accept it at the price of 10,000 ~~Rs~~. Then I told he Assignees that I would take the Neischunderpore facory on my own account, &c.

This was a communication to Burkinyoung alone, for it is clear Alexander knew nothing of this, and the letter containing the offer was addressed to Rogers, and the answer accepting received from him, all in Roger's name as if he were the real purchaser through the medium of Saupin the messenger and proposer, and negociator of the sale on the part of the Assignees.

To qualify all this we have the present declaration upon oath of the Assignee who desires to support the sale, "that he was aware Saupin was buying one factory for himself through Rogers as his agent."

Why this is the case of exparte James, [8 Ves. 337] except that there the sale was by auction for what was considered by all parties a good price, and as much as could be got and the whole transaction public. Whereas here it was entirely private, and the sale at ⅓ths of what might have been got. There a solicitor in Bankruptcy bid for the estate with the knowledge and approbation of the sole surviving Assignee, and of several of the creditors and their agents, who were pleased with the sale. It was resisted by one creditor, the petitioner, and the sale was set aside upon the general principles. The Lord Chancellor "The doctrine as to purchases by trustees, assignees, and persons having a confidential character stands much more upon general principle than upon the circumstances of any individual case. It rests upon this, that the purchase is not permitted in any case, however honest the circumstances, the general interests of juctice requiring it to be destroyed in every instance; as no Court is equal to the examination and ascertainment of the truth in much the greater number of cases." As to assignees under a Bankruptcy there have been many fair cases, but it is obvious that in many instances where the commission is to be taken out, schemes are laid for all the benefits to be made by assignees, solicitors, &c. making the thing beneficial for themselves; and considering, that in the Assignees is vested the whole property, that the conduct of bringing it to sale, the time, and manner of the sale, are very much in their power, the creditors seldom having so large an interest as to make it an object to dispute the difference of a sale to A. or B., the bankrupt, with perhaps no interest in the surplus, but for the present at the mercy of the assignees, his whole property in their hand, his person not free, considering the opportunity of the assignees to deal for their own benefit, more amply afforded and more out of the reach of investigation, those trustees are more especially within the general principles. My opinion is, that, if there is any species of trustee or agent, against whom the principle ought to be strictly held, it is the assignee in Bankruptcy, and the agents for him.

"The order declared, that Jones, as the Acting Solicitor under the Commission, is not entitled to hold the purchase of the estate against the consent of any of the creditors or the person entitled to the surplus of the bankrupt's estate, if any."

The rule is universal and absolute, and well stated by Lord Rosslyn in Whichcote v. Laurence [3 Ves. 750] "It is," says he, "a proposition very plain in point of equity and a principle of clear reasoning, that he who undertakes to act for another shall not in the same matter act for himself;" and this is a principle established from the earliest times in the Court of Chancery borrowed like many other of its principles from the Roman Law in ages before the Court of Chancery existed. Nemo polestesse auctor in rem suam. No one invested with any authority to do an act can exercise it in any matter in which he has an interest.

If Saupin instead of selling to Rogers, or bargaining with him as trustee for himself, had sold to Rogers out-and-out on Rogers's own account, could it be doubted upon this evidence, that the sale would have been good as made by one having authority to sale for the creditors? If Saupin, when he first quitted Burkinyoung and Alexander had met one who offered him 20,500 Rs for the two factories would he not have been bound in conscience by the commission he had undertaken to have closed with the offer, or at least to have reported the offer instantly to the Assignees?

Then he stood in a situation, and had accepted an employment, which placed conscientious discharge of his duty in opposition to his interest, and shall he be permitted to take advantage of that situation by selling in effect to himself?—or shall the Assignee, himself a trustee, be permitted to throw over the transaction as a protection that which was only the partaking in the blame—namely, his own private knowledge of what was intended?

Nor is it merely the being formally appointed a solicitor to the trust or bankruptcy, or an agent directly to make the sale that is necessary to vest a person with such a character of trust and confidence as renders him incapable of becoming the purchaser of trust or bankrupt property.

In exparte Hughes [6 Ves. 617,] a creditor being consulted as to the sum at which an estate should be put up to sale, and making himself acquainted with the circumstances affecting its value, and assisting in deciding upon the upset price, and purchasing at that sale, the sale was set aside by Lord Rosslyn, and a petition being presented against that order to Lord Eldon, it was confirmed.

This was in Bankruptcy and the Lord Chancellor held clearly that on the other hand he might, if he thought fit, hold him to his purchase.

Certain mills were to be exposed for sale. "The solicitor and those concerned for the joint creditors, and also for several of the separate creditors of Dumbell, were satisfied, that they were not worth much, if any thing more, than £2,000; and proposed, that they should be put up at that sum. Pending this discussion in a private room, a little previous to the hour of sale, Mr. Hughes, the principal joint-creditor of the Stockport bank, viz. to the amount of above £19,000, went into the room, and being informed of the difference, and being asked his opinion, said he would abide by what Mr. Dyke thought right; who having heard both sides was of opinion, that the premises ought to be put up at £2,000; and Hughes assented." The cotton mills were accordingly put up at £2,000, with a declaration that if any one advanced upon that sum, they would be knocked down to him. Several persons were in the room, and Lyon and Mayor among them. After a considerable time, no one bidding, Hughes advanced £10, and was declared the purchaser. No objection was then taken by Lyon and Mayor; but they afterwards signified that they would not acquiesce in the sale. Though they both live at Worrington, they permitted Hughes to take possession of the mills without interruption; and to lay out large sums in repairs and lasting improvements. In September following Mangles was appointed receiver of Dumbell's separate property; and he approved the sale to Hughes, and was satisfied that £2,000 was as much as the property was worth. The assignees refusing to deliver an abstract to Hughes, to enable him to complete his purchase, he in December 180: applied in the cause for an abstract. The Lord Chancellor directed that motion to stand over, in order that the assignees might present a petition in the Bankruptcy Court. A petition was accordingly presented by Lyon, the acting assignee, the object of which was to set aside the sale and to have the cotton mill re-sold before a Master; suggesting collusion between Hughes and the solicitor for the joint creditors, who were concerned in the sale. (It appears from the judgment of the Lord Chancellor Eldon that no fraudulent collusion was established.) The Lord Chancellor Rosslyn ordered that the sale should be set aside, and that a re-sale should take place before the Master, and made no order upon an application of the counsel for Hughes for an allowance for repairs and improvement. A petition was presented by Hughes to Lord Chancellor Eldon to set aside that order, or otherwise to be allowed for repairs and lasting improvements. The Lord Chancellor Eldon said upon part of the case, I do not impute fraud to Hughes even in the view of this Court; but it is impossible to permit him under the circumstances to hold his purchase. On the other hand the Court is at liberty to hold him to the purchase as against himself. The sale took place under the circumstances now stated. Hughes making himself a party in the conversation that was to determine the upset price. He had a considerable interest, and I agree his advice would have been very aptly and properly given if he had not become a bidder. The result of the account was that Hughes had expended upwards of £6,000 in repairs and improvements. The premises were accordingly put up before the Master at the aggregate sum above, £2000—no one advanced upon it, and Hughes was therefore held to his purchase, and upon the 21st of December 180:, the Master's report was confirmed upon petition.

There are two things established by this case, first, that in Bankruptcy, as in Equity, the merely being consulted upon the price at which the property shall be set up, vests the person with such a confidential character, and lets him so much into the knowledge of the circumstances as that if he purchases even at a public sale by auction his purchase shall be set aside, and the estate sold over again; secondly, that if no greater price can be got he shall be held to his bargain.

These things are what the Insolvent Court did in this case, humbly following the rule in Bankruptcy in England, which in my opinion it is bound to do, where those rules will apply.

In exparte Bennett [10 Ves. 381.) the principle was extended to the incapacitating every person connected, with the sale, as commissioner, assignee, solicitor, or agent under the assignee who cannot buy, or even employ any one to buy for another.

"Then if the principle be that the solicitor," (and it is the same of every agent employed by an assignee and of every person in a situation of trust and confidence empowering him to acquire a greater knowledge of the estate and the circumstances under which it is sold than other people, or consulted regarding the sale, so as to acquire such knowledge and to influence the resolution taken as to the price to be accepted) "if the principle be," says Lord Eldon, 10 Ves. 399, "that the solicitor cannot buy for his own benefit I agree, where he buys for another, the temptation to act wrong is less; yet, if he could not use the information he has for his own benefit, it is too delicate to hold, that the temptation to misuse that information for another person is so much weaker, that he should be at liberty to bid for another, and so he might bid for his son, his relation, or his employer. That distinction is too thin to form a safe rule of justice.

I might quote cases without end in Equity and Bankruptcy to show the strictness with which this principle is enforced, and the amplitude with which it is extended to embrace every situation of trust and of confidential means of obtaining information. But I have said enough to show the grounds upon which I pronounced the judgment in question, and I now adhere to my opinion. As that judgment I understand is about to be reversed upon its principle, it is unnecessary that I should enter into any question regarding the directions contained in the order for the purpose of carrying the judgment into effect.

There are three things, however, which I am desirous of adverting to, mentioned in the petition of appeal.

1.—That the Assignees, or rather Mr. Burkinyoung the only Assignee at time capable of acting, acted bonâ fide, and with the best intentions.

It will be recollected that in my former judgment I stated that sales in such circumstances might be invalid either in respect of the relation the purchaser stood in to the seller, or upon the ground of fraud, and that the whole of my argument proceeded upon the first consideration only. I did not, nor do I now impute to this gentleman whom I believe from what I have heard of him to be a very respectable person, any fraudulent or unfair intention. I did and I do impute to him a negligence and want of due consideration in making the sale of these factories, which has brought loss upon the estate. Nor can I see that I was wrong in saying that that, which it is now alledged was done, was a different thing from that which from the terms in which the transaction was concluded, was to appear to have been done. That this was meant and fraudulently by the Assignees I did not say, nor do I believe.

2. That the order after being passed was altered upon the petition of one of the parties which ought not to have been. This was not so, a verbal intimation of the judgment was given from the Bench. From notes of this the clerk drew up a draft of an order, and furnished a copy to the parties, on which they might have submitted observations on points within the general scope of the judgment if they chose, through the clerk. I believe one of the parties did so. I am informed by way of petition. But there was no order, and no terms of any order settled or authorised by me, but they were appealed from.

3. It was said in support of the allegation that the judgment contains orders which the appellants had no means to enforce; that the parties concerned are subject to another jurisdiction, before whom the appellants may be unable to succeed in recovering possession of the estate. But I for one cannot listen to a suggestion that the jurisdiction will not enforce justice and right, and will not take the same view of justice and right with this Court. I entertain no suspicion of the kind, and if I did it would not relieve me from the necessity of deciding in the case before me according to what I believe to be the law of the Court in which I sit, whether of Common law, or Equity, or of Insolvency.

I have given great attention to this case and I have taken up a considerable time in delivering my judgments upon it, but I have not given it more attention or taken up more time than its importance has deserved. Upon the best consideration I can give it, and with every deference and respect for the opinions of those who differ from me, I cannot conscientiously depart from the conclusion which I originally came to regarding it.

Sir E. Ryan.—It is now necessary that I should express my opinion on this appeal from the decision of the learned Judge in the Insolvent Court; and I shall do so as briefly as I am able. I regret that there should be a difference of opinion on the bench, but after the best consideration I can give to this case, and after listening to the able argument of the Advocate-General, and reading the judgment of the learned Judge, I cannot concur in the order which he has made.

The first question in this case is whether the Insolvent Court under the 49th section of the 9th G. 4 c. 74 has the power to delay and prostpone a sale on the application of a creditor where the Assignees have entered into a contract to sell, and have received a moiety of the purchase money, on the ground of the contract being void for fraud or that the price agreed on was inadequate to the value of the property. The purchaser, it should also be observed, not being any party to the proceedings in the Insolvent Court or shewn to be subject to its jurisdiction.

If the Court has not this power then in no view of the facts of the present case can this order be supported.

I am clearly of opinion that the 49th section does not confer this power on the Insolvent Court, and that where an actual sale has taken place with whatever circumstances its validity may be effected, such circumstances cannot be a ground for that Court making any order under this clause of the Act of Parliament, and that if the creditors desire to question the validity of the sale they must do so in some Court that has the power to try that question. It has been contended at the bar that this Court has a power analogous to that exercised by the Chancellor when sitting in bankruptcy, and that the Chancellor would, in a case of fraud or negligence in a sale by an Assignee, on petition declare such sale to be void. Exparte Benett 10 Ves. Junior, has been cited as an authority to support this position; but when that case is examined it will be found to have expressly decided that in bankruptcy the Chancellor has no jurisdiction, and that the order which he did make in that case for a re-sale was only because the purchaser appeared and consented to abide by the decision of the Chancellor who even then doubted whether he should accept the offer of the parties. Lord Manners, certainly stated in exparte Partington, 1 Ball and Beaty's reports, that he was not "aware of any decided case where a bidding had been opened in Bankruptcy, but that he could see no reason why the Court should not do so;" and in a more recent case, exparte Gould, 1 Glyn and Jameson's reports p. 281, The Vice Chancellor on petition in Bankrupicy ordered a purchaser (who was not before the Court) of a bankrupt's mortgaged estate sold before the Commissioners under the general order, to complete his purchase. But this was a decision in affirmance of a contract, though certainly made on an absent party, but made without argument or counsel appearing for any one but the petitioner. But in the last case I have been able to find bearing on this question, exparte Ashley, 3 Deacon and Chitty's reports, p. 510.—which was an application by Assignees to rescind the sale of certain mortgaged property of a bankrupt which had been bought by the mortgagee without leave of the Court,—the Court dismissed the petition, and it seems to have been conceded that their jurisdiction to entertain the question rested on the mortgagee having come in under the commission, by substantiating his claim before the Commissioners, and procuring an order for the sale of the mortgaged premises: the fact however as stated by Mr. Sugden in his book of Vendors and Purchasers, that the Chancellor has never exercised this jurisdiction with the expres decision of Lord Eldon, are in my mind ample authority to shew that the Chancellor in Bankruptcy has no such jurisdiction. It should be observed that in Bankrutcy the Chancellor rarely interferes even to postpone or delay a sale, and in exparte Montgomery, 1 Glyn and Jameson's reports, the Chancellor said the Court ought not to interfere to stay the sale because the Assignees act at their own risk and upon their own responsibility, and they and not the Court are to be judges of the propriety and expediency of the sale. The question therefore reverts to the construction that is to be put on this 49th clause, and that I am satisfied applies only to delaying and postponing of sales about to take place. The first part of the section provides that with all convenient speed the assignees shall dispose of the insolvent's estate. This is his first duty and similar to that of the assignees of a bankrupt at home, where any creditor can cancel an immediate sale on application to the Court: but this Court under this section has a discretionary power of postponing and delaying a sale if application shall be made for that purpose by the insolvent or creditor or mortgagee, or under the 50th section the Court may without such application defer the sale of property and make any special order according to the provisions of that section. I am the more confirmed in this view of these sections by the ample provisions contained in the 56 section against the misconduct, mismanagement or negligence of the assignees. Under that section it is quite clear that if the insolvent or his creditor have suffered any "injury" by the "fault" of the assignees, the Court may order the assignees to make such compensation as to the Court may seem just and in default of their not obeying the order of the Court they may be committed to gaol until they conform to the order, or their goods may be sold to compensate for any loss sustained.

What I have already stated is sufficient to dispose of the present order, but the validity of that order is not the only matter before the Court; the 4th section of the Insolvent Act which allows an appeal, directs that this Court shall enquire into all the matters of the petition and of the proceedings and evidence, and make such order as to them may seem meet and just. It is necessary therefore to consider whether the proceedings and evidence before us would justify our making an order under the 56th section of the Act; and independent of this duty which the Act imposes upon us, I think as the character of persons who may be considered in the light of officers of the Insolvent Court has been attacked, and to whom conduct has been imputed that would in my opinion if substantiated, make it incumbent upon us to remove them from their office, it is necessary that the whole of the case should be looked into, to see if these charges rest upon any foundation. I am prepared to go into the facts, but I think it unnecessary as they have been entered into so fully by Mr. Justice Malkin; and I so entirely agree with him in the view he has taken of them and in the conclusions he has drawn, that it would be but a needless repition if I were to go over the same ground. One or two matters however I think it necessary to notice.—The imputation of fraud, or as it has been termed legal fraud, has been applied to that part of the transaction in which it is alleged that Saupin was held out to the world as the agent of the Assignees and as employed in that capacity to act for them, and consequently if a purchaser himself the sale would be vitiated on the common principle which is so well established that it requires no authority to be cited in support of it, that an agent employed by a vender to sell cannot become a purchaser himself. I need hardly observe that in this sale Mr. Hurry is in no way implicated, he was absent and ill at the time. It appears from Mr. Alexander's evidence that he supposed Rogers and Bell to be purchasers and was not aware for some time after the sale that Rogers purchased for Saupin; and the letters which were subsequently written by him, and as he states approved of by Mr. Burkinyoung, might induce those who were ignorant of the facts to draw the same conclusion. This inaccuracy and looseness of expressions in the letters, was probably sanctioned by Burkinyoung from the understanding that existed as to Rogers advancing the money for Saupin. But where is the fraud? and what could be the motive or inducement to Mr. Burkinyoung for any concealment or contrivance? It is indisputable on the evidence and not disputed on either side, that Saupin bought and Burkinyoung sold with a full knowledge that Rogers as the agent of Saupin was to advance the money for Neischunderpore, and that Bell was to purchase Autparra. It was in fact only the renewal of an offer that had been made by Saupin in September 1833. How then can Saupin be considered as an agent, and how can the principle upon which all the cases of purchase by agent are founded apply here?

But besides the ground of fraud upon which I have observed, the conduct of the Assignees is complained of as culpably negligent in allowing of a private sale without having duly advertised the property, and in selling one of the divisions of the Neischunderpore factory for a less sum than they could with proper deligence and enquiry have obtained for it. These questions have been so fully considered by Mr. Justice Malkin that I shall not enter upon them at length; but as to advertising, it is clear that from the October preceding, when they were repeatedly advertised, all persons possessing factories in the neighbourhood and in any way likely to become purchasers, must have been aware that they were for sale, and the disputes between the Bank and Assignees fully account for their not incurring an useless expense when there was little probability that they could effect a satisfactory sale. This would account for their not advertising before the order of 26th of July was obtained. But it is alledged that they refused in January an offer of 70,000 rupees for the whole of the Neischunderpore concern, and that neglecting to advertise after the order of 26th of July was obtained, they consented to a private sale of a portion of this concern at a less price than could have been obtained. The rejection of the offer of the 70,000 rupees is accounted for by the pending disputes between the Bank. Mr. Udny did not communicate to the Assignees the offer of Donaldson and Gregg until the 18th of January, the order of the Insolvent Court was obtained on the 1st February, and at the time of Mr. Udny's communication the Assignees were aware of the intention of the Bank to apply to the Court. As to the offer of 20,000 rupees by Donaldson and Gregg for the Neischunderpore concern on the 28th of December 1834, and which the Bank rejected, it is clear that the Assignees had no notice of it. In the private sale without further advertisement on the 24th of August to Saupin, the culpable negligence of the Assignees it is contended is apparent. Mr. Alexander states that after the order of the 26th of July he had frequent conversations with Mr. Burkinyoung on the necessity of something being done with reference to the advance for renewing the izara to prevent the factory from going to ruin, and the conclusion that Burkinyoung and Alexander came to prior to Saupin's arrival at Calcutta, was that it was better to sell the factory at once than to go to the Court to ask for liberty to make so large an advance, which they thought the Court would not sanction: with this impression on the mind of Burkinyoung, Saupin renews his offer to purchase at the value fixed upon Neischunderpore by those most competent to form an opinion on the subject and up to which time no offer had been made to the Assignees of an advance upon this estimated value; for the offer of 70,000 rupees by Donaldson and Gregg in January for the whole concern was only the sum which the Assignees had fixed, estimating the Neischunderpore division at the sum at which Saupin purchased it for 15 000: a sale then is effected and Mr. Alexander swears that at that time neither the Assignees or he had any reason to expect they could have obtained a better price, and when it was doubtful as to the terms on which the izara could be renewed, when publicity might have thrown difficulties in the way of the renewal, and when this risk was thrown upon the purchaser, it being clear that without renewal of the izara, the property would have been worthless. I cannot therefore say that a private sale at the estimated value under such circumstances proves negligence. The only remaining matter that I think it necessary to notice after the full discussion this case has received, is the question of costs. I entirely agree with Mr. Justice Malkin in thinking that this order must be discharged with costs, I regret, that there should be a difference of opinion on the Bench, and that owing to the different views which have been taken on this subject the costs will be enhanced. But with every deference and respect for the learned Judge who originally made this order, I am bound in the view I have taken of this case to think that the creditor who originally made the application to the Insolvent Court should have well considered whether in the result the insolvents' estate was likely to reap any advantage by the application which he made. As the estate is not benefited by the proceedings which have been had I think it would not be just to the creditors generally to oblige them to pay the costs of a particular creditor who has been mistaken in his views—certain I am that it would not be right to charge the Assignees personally with these costs when they are acquitted by the Court of all misconduct and negligence; upon the party therefore who has unadvisedly caused all these proceedings the expense must fall, and under the powers which this Court possesses under the 4th section of the act and which the Insolvent Court at present has not—we direct that Mr. Lingham shall pay the costs of all the proceedings both in the Insolvent and the Supreme Court.

Ordered—That the order of the 3d of January, 1835, be discharged, and that Alfred Lingham do pay to Frederick Handel Burginyoung and William Cobb Hurry, the Assignees, &c., the costs of all the proceedings in the Insolvent and of the proceedings in the Supreme Court on the petition of the Assignees.

When the Chief Justice had delivered the Judgment of the Court, Sir John Grant said—

Being not of opinion that this judgment ought to be reversed, I need not say that I do not concur as to the costs. But I desire to say that even if I were of opinion that the judgment ought to be reversed, I should not concur in giving costs.

CALDER versus HALKETT.

The Court to-day delivered its judgment in this case.

Mr. JUSTICE RYAN.—The general points of this case the Court will now determine; one question, and that the main question upon which the case depends, we will reserve for further consideration: the other points are: First, as regards the motion for nonsuit, on the ground that of the connection between the defendant and the perwannah, there was no evidence to go to a jury. Mr. Justice Grant and myself, at the trial, were of opinion that there was evidence, and I remain of the same opinion. Looking at all the circumstances of the case we must conclude, that the arrest was caused by the defendant, and that the perwannah which was produced in the course of the trial was issued by him, and that it was under that instrument that the arrest took place. In respect to the pleas of justification, if the arrest was effected under the seal of the Fouzdary Court, and not by the defendant in his capacity of Magistrate or Justice of the Peace, such pleas of justification could not be maintained, as the plaintiff was a British subject and not liable to the jurisdiction of the zillah Court. Now, notice was given to the defendant to produce the perwannah at the trial. Mr. Reid, the Registrar of the Sudder Dewanny, was served with a subpœna duces tecum and then out comes Reid's declaration that the defendant had acknowledged, that there was such a perwannah, and that he issued it. I see, therefore, no grounds for a nonsuit on account of absence of sufficient evidence to go to a jury, nor do I think the pleas of justification an answer to the action. The only and main question that remains is, whether this Court is, or is not, precluded from jurisdiction in such cases as the present, by the 24th section of the statute 21st of George the third, Chapter 70, which is as follows:—"And whereas it is reasonable to render the Provincial Magistrates, as well natives as British subjects, more safe in the execution of their office, be it enacted that no action for wrong in injury shall lie in the Supreme Court against any person whatsoever exercising a judicial office in the country Courts for any judgment, decree, or order of the said Court, nor against any person for any act done by, or in virtue of the order of the said Court." On this point the Court will take time to consider.

Mr. Justice GRANT and Mr. Justice MALKIN concurred generally in the opinion delivered by the Chief Justice.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

Common Law side.

CALDER versus HALKETT.

The Court this-day gave judgment in this case.

There being a difference of opinion on the Bench, the Judges severally delivered their judgments.

Mr. JUSTICE MALKIN.—This question mainly depends upon the construction of the statute 21, Geo. 3. c. 70 section 24,—and whether under the provisions of that enactment this Court is, or is not, precluded from exercising jurisdiction in this and similar cases. I am of opinion that if a perwanah be an order of the Court out of which it issues, this Court is so precluded. The words of the Act are:—

XXIV. AND WHEREAS it is reasonable to render the Provincial Magistrates, as well Natives as British subjects, more safe in the execution of their office, be it enacted, that no action for wrong or injury shall lie in the Supreme Court against any person whatsoever, exercising a judicial office in the country Courts for any judgment, decree, or order of the said Court, nor against any person for any act done by, or in virtue of, the order of the said Court.

In regarding this provision we are to look to the history of the period at which it was enacted. The object which the legislature contemplated at that period was to restrain and set limits to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. This act was passed with that view, and must receive an interpretation consistent therewith. It appears to me therefore that we are excluded by the terms of this Section of the 21 Geo. 3. c. 70. from entertaining an action grounded upon an order issuing out of the Court wherein the defendant sat in a judicial capacity, and consequently that the verdict in this case ought to be set aside and a verdict entered up for the defendant.

Mr JUSTICE GRANT expressed great regret that a difference of opinion should subsist upon the Bench, the more especially on a question of such magnitude, affecting the due and right construction of a most important act of Parliament; and of the greatest consequence to the happiness and well being of a considerable body of inhabitants in the Mofussil.

Previously to the act of 21 Geo. 3. c. 70, this Court constantly entertained actions for damages, brought against persons acting in a judicial character in the country Courts. It was to remedy this mischief that that was passed, and the object of it was to afford these Magistrates in respect to such actions, the same protection as is afforded to Magistrates at home. That law was very necessary to those judicial officers, but it cannot be construed to extend beyond the mischief calling for correction, far less to convey immunities not possessed by the judges of the highest Courts of record. An Act to fall under the protection or exclusion of this clause of the Statute must be done judiciously; must be done in the exercise of a judicial office in the country Court; or the order in question must be an order of the said Court. But because an illegal act is done by one who is a Magistrate, it is not therefore an act done officially. An act to become an order of the Court must be done officially; but in order to this there must be a judge, and in order to give his actions a judicial character, he must be acting in a matter judicially before him, which cannot be unless there be accuser, accused, and a cause before him to be determined. Where there are no parties there can be no judge, and there it is a manifest contradiction to say that this purwannah is an order of the country Court. It is a mere illegal act, emanating from a party who happens be a judge of a country court. I therefore am of opinion that this verdict ought to stand.

Mr. JUSTICE RYAN.—This is an action of trespass and false imprisonment. The only question remaining now to be determined is whether under the 21 Geo. 3, c. 70, the Court is precluded from jurisdiction in this case. We have already expressed our opinion as to the defendant being at liberty to take advantage under the general issue, of giving matter of justification in evidence. I am of opinion that this Court is entirely and completely precluded from taking cognizance of the subject matter of this suit. The words of the Statute are expressly to that effect; and the only jurisdiction intended to be left to this Court in such cases, was a criminal jurisdiction upon occasions of corruption or malicious abuse of the process of the country Court.

The order of the Court therefore is that a verdict be entered for the defendant with costs.—Hurkaru.

Accounts have reached town of the loss of H. M. S. Challenger on the coast of South America, in latitude 37° 39' a little to the southward of Conception. The accident is supposed to have occurred in consequence of a sufficient allowance not having been made for the currents. An opinion generally prevails that the great earthquake in March last, has affected the depth of water in some places on the coast to a considerable extent.

OPPRESSION.—It is stated that a gross case of oppression has been exercised in the Mofussil by an indigo planter who employs an armed band of latheals amounting in number upwards of 200. Some people said to be in his service and employed in making collections resorted to the extraordinary mode of extorting money from one individual by suspending him in a well, occasionally dipping him until he consented to pay a certain sum. It is said, that while thus cruelly suspended, the rope broke and the unfortunate sufferer was drowned.

ORIENTAL LIFE INSURANCE SOCIETY.—The Half-yearly Meeting of the Oriental Life Insurance Society was held on the 11th November. The statements laid upon the table presented a state of things very different from the ill luck of the first few months of this regenerated institution. Instead of lapses amounting to many lakhs of rupees, the accounts exhibit claims to the extent of only 65,900 rupees upon 10 lives lapsed during the last six months, being only about one-third of the amount of the premiums in the same period. The report states that, notwithstanding the recent competition of a third office, (the Universal, which has already issued 210 policies) the Oriental has issued 53 new policies in the last half year, covering 4,83,300 rupees and there is no diminution of the total number of policies on the register.

ROBBERY AND VIOLATION.—On the night of the 6th November a gang of about fifteen men in disguise, entered the dwelling of a confectioner in the 24-purgunnahs during his absence, and having plundered the house, seized two females who were in it, and after scorching them dreadfully with hot tobacco-bowls and torches, violated their persons in a most brutal manner. They then conveyed and left one of the females, more dead than alive, at the door of a neighbour. Six or seven of the offenders have been apprehended by the Darogah, and a strict search is being made for the apprehension of the rest of the villians.

SALT SALE.—There was a strike on the 16th Nov. at the salt sale. The trade attempted to bully the Board by refusing to make any bid whatever, and in consequence the sale was postponed until the 17th, when it opened with the usual clamour, and after a few lots, exhibited as much eager competition as ever. The first eight or ten lots were knocked down at a little more than the upset price of 300 rupees per 100 maunds, but before long the price rose to 350 rupees.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—An inquest was held on the 18th Nov., on the body of a native woman named Surtee Raur. From the evidence adduced it appeared that the woman was killed by her husband in consequence of her incontinency in leaving him and living with another man. The jury returned a verdict of "wilfull murder" against the husband.

MEMORIAL OF THE OWNER'S OF THE BURDWAN COLLIERIES.—It is said that Messrs. Jessop and Co. and the Assignees of Alexander and Co., have sent up a memorial to Government, with a view to prevent a private tender for a term of years for the supply of coals at the three extreme stations for the river steamers—Allahabad, Mirzapore and Ghazeepore.

THE VESTRY.—The Governor of Bengal has, in a letter directed to the Archdeacon, dated the 4th Nov., in violation of the orders of the 19th of August by the Governor-General in Council, directed that the monthly payments made from the Treasury, on account of the Cathedral to the Presidency Chaplains and Vestry, shall for the future be paid to the receipt of the Bishop, or in his absence to the Archdeacon, to be by him distributed according to usage. The allowances oppropriated to the Free School is made payable to the directors of that institution. The Presidency Chaplains attached to the Cathedral are to perform its duties as ministerial officers subject to the orders of the Lord Bishop and Archdeacon who are to determine as to the making of collections in the church. The Advocate-General is directed to apply to the Supreme Court with respect to the trust charities of St. John's, to provide for such of these trusts as are paid under the authority and orders of the Court, that due provision may be made for their distribution. The question of the trusts the Govenor leaves to the Supreme Court to decide, but should the Court be unable to dispose of it, it is to be referred to the Legislative Council; and the Clergy have been prohibited from meeting the lay members of the Vestry either at the Cathedral or elsewhere.

The lay members have, in a letter addressed to Mr. Llewelyn, dated the 24th Nov., expressed their surprise at the letter of the Governor, and desired him, as Vestry Clerk, not to call any meeting of the Vestry without including them in the notice.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY.—The number of Proprietors of the Library is rapidly increasing. Mr. Hough has been appointed temporary Librarian, and a permanent one will be appointed as soon as circumstances justify such an application of the funds.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.—Lord Auckland has been appointed Governor-General of India.

PALMYRAS LIGHT HOUSE.—A party of scientific and professional gentlemen, left town on the 26th Nov. in the Asseerghur, for the purpose of surveying the Light House on Point Palmyras, which is in a tottering condition. ## BENGAL, &c.

RIOT AT FUTTEGHUR.—Mr. F. H. Robinson, Magistrate at Futteghur, has addressed a letter to the Editor of the Agra Ukhbar, contradicting the statement of a correspondent of that paper, regarding the affray with the Baie's followers, and fully justifying the line of conduct pursued by himself on that occasion.

JANSI.—A disturbance of a somewhat serious nature is said to have broken out at this place. The rioters are 2,000 Boondelás.

BUGWUNGOLAH.—A letter from Bugwungolah mentions that the mortality at that place prevailed to an awful extent. The disease the people are attacked with is an epidemic fever preceded by indigestion; and the native quacks help to accelerate the dissolution of those attacked with it, by administering doses of arsenic to the sufferers.

NEEMUTCH.—Sickness still prevails in this station to an unprecedented degree. The mortality produced by it has extended to the officers, several of whom are dangerously ill.

BUITTESUR.—The fair is said to have been unusually brisk this year. About 8,000 horses and as many camels were exhibited for sale, and among the former was a large number of Sheik horses, but in consequence of their owners steadily adhering to their prices, very few sales were effected.

DINAPORE.—Shortly before the march of the European Regiment from Dinapore, a chest containing the mess plate of the regiment, including several cups presented to the corps on different occasions, was stolen from the room in which the Mess Sergeant slept. One or two natives have been apprehended on suspicion, but notwithstanding every search, the empty chest alone has been recovered.

ALLAHABAD. THE LAHORE MISSION.—Runjeet Sing's Mission, which passed down to the Bengal Presidency a year ago, reached this station on its return to Lahore, on Saturday last, the 14th Nov. The suit under charge of Lieutenant Benson, is composed of 1,000 men and 100 horses. It is stated that it remains here for a couple of months, to benefit by frequent lavations in the holy junction of the two rivers, while it awaits some political message from the Supreme Government.

The Honorable Alexander Ross, Esq., Governor of Agra, landed at Allahabad on the morning of the 10th November and took charge of the Government.

A subscription ball was given by the Civil and Military of the station to Mr. Blunt on the 9th November which closed his administration.

The great Frontier Line is to extend to a short distance beyond Mirzapore, where it will terminate in the Banda Hills. It has already been completed as far as the junction of the Jumna and Jumbul. When it is completed a chain of posts will be established, extending from the Sutledge to the Mirzapore Hills.

SHUMSHODEEN.—There are rumours abroad that the relations of the late Shumshodeen intend to prosecute Government, and the officers concerned in bringing to trial and convicting him, and that some Christians are instigating the family on to adopt this course.

BEGUM SUMROO.—Her Highness Begum Sumroo is said to be very unwell. Her Highness has invested the following sums in trust for religious purposes; 100,000 rupees for the support of the Cathedral at Sirdhanah (her own Church;) 50,000 rupees for the poor of Sirdhapah; 100,000 rupees for the endowment of a Roman Catholic College, and 12,000 rupees for the support of Her Highness's Chapel, at Meerut.

MR. BLAKE'S FAMILY.—Mr. Trevelyan and other friends of Mr. Blake, have written to his family in Ireland, with the view to secure some permanent provision for his orphans—a boy and a girl. If unsuccessful, they propose to raise a subscription to place them beyond want.

DELHI.—Mr. Cowley, the artist, is again at work on a picture representing the execution of Shumshodeen Khan at that moment when, after having asked the executioner if he was a hullal-khore, he quietly turned round and submitted to have his arms pinioned.

AGRA.—Hindu Rao has come to the determination of parting with all his servants, whom he can no longer support, if he gets himself enrolled on the Gwalior pension list. Pending his application for a pension, he goes to Hansi, where he will reside with Colonel Skinner.

At the requesition of Lieut.-Col. Alves, Sunge Hookman Chund, brother, and Futty Lall, son, of Jotaram, were arrested at Agra on the 9th November, on the charge of being accomplices in the acts of treason and violence committed at Jeypoor on the 4th June last. Three domestics of Hookman Chund have also been apprehended and warrants are out against several other followers of the ex-minister.

MEERUT.—A great deal of robbery in dwelling houses has lately taken place. The house of a Dragoon Office was recently entered while he was on guard and the whole of the property abstracted. An immediate search, however, led to the detection of a gun in the possession of a private of one of the regiments, who has confessed a systematic arrangement for similar depredations, and pointed out several wells and tanks, used as depositories for stolen goods, from whence several articles have been recovered.

The Horticulture Society is commencing proceedings, the Secretary having obtained several loads of trees from Shëarunpore.

A most successful fraud has been practised on a shroff of the Artillery Bazaar. A native who occasionally came to the shop to exchange a few charyaree or four cornered rupees, and had given out that he possessed an ample store of them, took advantage of the absence of the head of the house and persuaded a lad left in charge to exchange 600, which the elder partner on his return discovered to be base and manufactured for the occasion.

NATIVE STATES.

INDORE.—An attempt was recently made at Indore to assassinate Hurry Holkar Row. The man who made this attempt by suddenly getting upon the Royal elephant, declared himself, when examined afterwards, to be a sawar in the paga. He was knocked down by the Row's attendants when on the point of firing his matchlock and received many severe wounds which he only survived a short time.

JEYPORE.—It is stated in the native papers, that the Jeypore Ranee has sent to all the Thakoors of Jeypore, Oodeypore and Kotah, bracelets and turbands, and written saying that if they be men they will put on the turbands and assist her against the English—but that if women they will wear the bracelets and stay in their zennanahs. The several Thakoors are said to have accepted both the bracelets and turbands.

It has now been sufficiently proved, by the examination of Hukman Chund's papers, and those seized at Deosa, that Jotaram instigated the murder of Mr. Blake.

The Jeyporeans have placed the effigy of a tiger, as large as life, under the gallows where Mr. Blake's murderers were hung, and they exhibit busts of Jotaram in their houses and sell them in the bazaars.

An attempt at a suttee took place outside the walls of the town. The woman placed herself on the pile and it was ignited, but no sooner had the fire reached her than she sprang from the pyre, but was thrown back: she escaped a second time and the people again threw her in: she got out a third time, and the Jeypore police then interposed, and referred the matter to the Rawal, who ordered them not to use further violence. The widow was accordingly released and took refuge in the British Hospital.

The Jeypore Ranee, it is stated among the natives, has sent a dagger, a sabre, a turban and a petticoat to Runjeet Singh, and written him, saying that the English are about to take possession of the Jeypore state, and that under one pretence or another they will possess themselves of all the native states on this side the Sutledge and Indus, and then pay a visit to Lahore—that understanding this he will either put on the dress of a man and aid her, or that of a woman and remain at home.

The latest accounts from Jeypore affirm confidently that "the affair" there will be finished by the end of the cold season at farthest, and perhaps by the end of the year. A report was current at Deosa, that the assassin Futteh Sing, had effected his escape, but the remour appears to be groundless.

LAHORE.—Runjeet Singh is said to have recovered wonderfully, and held on the grand day of the Dusserah, a court at which 50,000 chiefs and soldiers were present. After receiving the gifts they presented to him, he honored several of them with dresses of distinction.

A military party of the Ukalees, have recently successfully mutinied and obtained, in defiance of the Maharajah's guns, the payment of the arrears of wages due them.

JOLOUNE.—The Kamdar or Minister of the Rajah of Joloune, was murdered in the cutchery by four sepoys who had lately been dismissed from the Joloune service, and who coming to demand the arrears of their pay, took the opportunity of murdering the Minister. The assassins were immediately attacked by the guards in attendance and three of their number killed on the spot—the fourth made his escape. Several of the guards were wounded in the affray.

PESHAWUR.—Runjeet Singh has deputed Colonel Ventura to settle the affairs of this district, which the Colonel finds himself unable to do, as the Patans display the most inveterate hostility towards the Seikhs, laying wait for and cutting them off whenever they venture abroad in small parties, and destroying or carrying off their supplies. One night recently the Patans attacked the camp of Sirdar Lahunna Singh, plundered it completely, slaughtered a great number of the Sheiks, and escaped without losing a single man. This spirit has inspired Dost Mahomed with fresh hopes of recovering the country, and he has therefore sent his forces towards it.

Colonel Ventura wrote and apprised Runjeet Singh of the arrival of Dost Mahomed's son in command of 15,000 horse at Jullalabad, and the Maharajah thereupon ordered Sirdar Taiz Singh, with ten regiments of infantry, two regiments of Cavalry, and thiry guns, to march upon Peshawur.

GOOMSUR.—The Goomsur Rajah, after having manifested a desire to come to amicable terms, giving up a rebel whom the British authorities had long been in quest of, and making an assignment to meet the Collector, indicated hostile intentions by sending off his women and treasure to a hill fort and refusing to keep his appointment. Preparations were accordingly made for to coerce him, and he has been driven by the troops sent against him to the western extremity of his estate. Slight skirmishing has taken place between the Goomsureans and our troops, but the former have invariably been put to flight by a few discharges of grape from the howitzers. Five sepoys and three gun-coolies have been wounded and one cooly killed on the part of the British.

LUCKNOW.—The favourite of the King, Durshun Singh, has been disgraced, in consequence of some valuable trinkets of the Royal jewels, which were entrusted to his care, having disappeared.

LUDAKH.—The Rája Goolab Singh has met with a defeat. In his attempt to pick a quarrel with the Ludakh Rajah, he invaded the country with ten or twelve thousand men. The natural obstacles of the place were, however, converted into strong barricades by the Ludakh people, sufficient to arrest the progress of the invaders until a reinforcement arrived from the Yarkund ruler, when they gave battle to Goolab Singh and entirely defeated him. The policy of the Chinese is opposed to the approach of the Sikhs, which explains the cause of the assistance afforded by the Yarkund ruler, who pays a nominal or real allegiance to the Chinese Emperor.

HYDERABAD.—The ukhbars from Hyderabad up to the 16th October, state that Rajah Chundoo Lall commanded every thing there, the Nawab Asif Jan being a mere tool in his hands. Serajah Doulah had been greatly reduced in circumstances and his followers were bullying him for their arrears of pay. A strike had also taken place in the zenana of the Nawab, the "moonfaced" inmates threatening to leave their apartments and go before the Huzzoor Blund Eckball to represent their grievances if the arrears of their allowances were not paid up. To prevent the disgrace attendant on such a proceeding, the arrears were forthwith discharged by the Nawab.

The police of this place is still as inefficient as ever, and scarcely a day passes without the occurrence of some robberies and murders.

ULWAR.—The Rajah of this principality having given himself up entirely to the pleasures of his zenanna, the zemindars had taken advantage of the circumstance and had withheld their revenues, which had reduced the Rajah to great distress. A wealthy banker seeing this state of affairs, volunteered to defray all the expenses of the state and moreover let the Rajah have eighty thousand rupees per annum, if he would let him have the farm of his territories. The proposal was gladly acceeded to by the Rajah, and the country consigned to the charge of the banker.

HERAT.—It is said that the brother of the King of Persia took with him 40,000 men and proceeded to Herat, as he intended to invest that province and Candahar. A considerable body of Usbucks, who had attacked and plundered Mushed, hearing that the Prince was encamped in the town of Coom-Coom proceeded thither and invested the place. The Persians who were in the city, without orders from their Prince, (who was some four coss distant) sallied out and attacked the invaders with great impetuosity and the Prince coming up and assailing them in the rear simultaneously, the Usbucks were put to flight with great slaughter, and about a thousand were made captives.

Yar Mahummud having succeeded in extorting about 40,000 rupees from the merchants by threats, &c., has distributed the sum amongst the soldiers intended for the expedition to Kandahar.

Camran Shah has, to please one of his ladies, raised her brother to high rank and given him the government of the fort of Furrah, and degraded his own eldest son, which has created a factious spirit among the people.

The Persian Prince Kev Khsru Meerza, has removed his camp to the vicinty of Herat, and Camran Shah has waited on him in his camp and been received with every external demonstration of friendship. After parting with the Prince, Camran Shah proceeded by forced marches to Seistan, and having treacherously captured the governor of that place, took possession of it. The same system, it is said, he intends to adopt in order to obtain possession of the neighbouring forts, &c. of the minor chiefs.

CABUL.—Dost Mahomed Khan assembled the Affgan chiefs in September last, and informed them that seven battalions of Affgan troops and four squadrons of horse, had been well trained and disciplined according to European tractics by Mr. Campbell," and that the total amount of his troops aggregated 30,000 horse and 12,000 foot. That with this force he could make a very great impression on the Sheik at Pesahwur, but he was unable to equip the army to attack that place for want of money. Attah Khan, an Affgan chief, represented that he had taken measures to raise the required supplies to defray the expenses of the expedition from Moosah Khan Buddukshanee, a rich banker; who accordingly was brought forward and introduced to Dost Mahomed, and entered into an arrangement for supplying the necessary loans for the expedition. By way of indemnifying the banker against loss, Dost Mahomed formally mortgaged to him the revenues of his territories, which were entirely left to the banker's management until the loan was repaid.

It is stated in the Luhore Ukhbar, that the Vakeel of the Russians and the brother of the King of Persia are marching with a large force on Cabul.

It is also stated in the ukhbars from this quarter, of 2d September, that great numbers of Patans are daily coming into Cabul, with the design of aiding Dost Mahomed in his projected expedition against Peshawar; and that Dost Mahomed has sent his son, Azzal Beg Khan, with 15,000 horse and a much larger body of infantry, against Peshawur. Azzal Beg is to encamp with his troops at Jallalabad, where Dost Mahomed will join him with all practical expedition.

BHOWALPORE.—A skirmish recently took place between the Scindians and the troops of Bhowal Khan, ruler of Bhawalpore, on account of a fugitive who had taken shelter with the Scindians from the oppression of Bhowal Khan. The Scindians refused to yield up the man on the ground of its being contrary to the existing treaty, which stipulated that neither party should think it imperative to give up the fugitives who take refuge in their territories. The Bhowalporeans were worsted in the conflict, lost several of their men, and were forced to retreat.

KUTCH.—Intelligence was received at the Camp of Maha Raja Runjeet Singh, that the Meelkeeah Patans, having assembled in considerable numbers, were committing their usual outrages, and had already surprised and taken the fort of Shukoorabad, at a distance of fifteen coss from Peshawur, massacred the whole garrison and thrown their bodies into the surrounding ditches. Runjeet Singh became greatly exasperated at this intelligence and declared his determination to extirpate the whole tribe of the Meelkeeah Patans by any means in his power.

Misser Rooplall, in obedience to Runjeet's orders, had attacked the Patans in the fort Sumundra, but was repulsed by the garrison, and forced to retreat. The Misser applied to the Maharajah for a reinforcement without which he said he could not face the enemy again, but his request was denied and he was re-called to court.

SCINDE.—Runjeet Singh having repeatedly requested Noor Mahomed Khan, the ruler of Scinde, in communications directed to him, to have the goodness to let him have Shekarpore as it was contiguous to his territories, and intimated that unless he complied with his request, he would possess himself of the place vi et armis, the Khan became alarmed and held a consultation with his ministers, who unanimously advised him to offer the principality of Shekarpore to Shah Soojah-ool Moolk as the legitimate sovereign of the province. A communication was accordingly addressed to Shah Soojah to the above effect, inviting him to come over to Shekarpore for the purpose of governing it; but the Shah declined the government, stating that he had once endeavoured to regain the kingdom of his ancestors, but the troubles and difficulties he experienced in the experiment, had taken away from him all further desire to attempt the obtainment of them.

MULTAN.—No Nehal Singh, it is said, is endeavouring to extend the Sheik conquests beyond the Indus, and has fixed on Shikarpore as his first conquest. The Scindians are, however, active in opposing him, and have seized all the craft on the river within their neighbourhood to prevent the Sheiks using them as passage boats; and fifteen thousand horsemen have been placed on the right bank to oppose their passage.

MADRAS.

CAPT. RICHARDSON, Paymaster at Vizagapatam, having acknowledged himself to be the writer of a letter which appeared in the Male Asylum Herald, and which was characterised by the Governor as a misrepresentation of a disgraceful nature, under the unmanly safe-guard of an anonymous signature, has been removed from his appointment and placed at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief for regimental duty.

THE STEAMER INDUS.—The Steamer Indus left on the 20th October for Hyderabad with Dr. Heddle as a passenger. This gentleman, it appears, has been ordered by Government to proceed there in consequence of an application from one of the Ameers for a medical attendant.

The monthly expenditure of the establishment will amount to about five hundred rupees.

CEYLON.

On the 31st of October, the tiles of the roof of the King's house fell in with a loud noise. The accident was caused by some tiles being removed for the purpose of repair at the lower part, when all those above gave way and a considerable quantity of tiles went through the rafters to the first ceiling, the strong beams of which checked further destruction.

His Excellency the Governor and Lady Horton, and the rest who were in the house at the time of the accident, fled in great alarm from it, but soon returned on discovering the extent of the accident.

PERSIA.

A letter from Sheraz, dated 20th August, states, that the affairs of that country have not at all improved, and that the presence of Capt. Shee, who was military Governor of the city, alone maintained the public peace. The notorious robber Wallie Khan has been chased from hill to hill, but baffled all his pursuers; owing, however, to having suffered considerable loss and many of his followers deserting him, he has sent in his youngest son and daughter to the Governor as a peace offering, and has released the men of rank whom he took prisoner after giving up the White Fort. There has been much sickness to the northward and upwards of 7,000 people died of cholera at Theran. The King and his friends took advantage of the season and poisoned the Firman Firma and others, and gave out that they died of cholera.

SINGAPORE.

THE SHIP HERO.—The Hero, which had been seized by the Dutch Government in consequence of having brought out some copper doits manufactured in England bearing the Dutch impress, has been liberated, the Dutch Government having declined to carry the matter to extremities; and not only have they liberated the vessel but have, it is stated, sanctioned the re-delivery of the seized coin to the Commander of the Hero.

PIRACY.—Piracy appears to be greatly increasing in the straights. Several vessels have been attacked and numerous boats captured by the pirates, who have been selling their cargoes in the surrounding markets at prices ruinous to the merchants. A piratical fleet from Boorong Island, have taken up a station between Pulo Aor and Pulo Tingie, and by the depredations they have committed have filled the native traders to Singapore with such consternation as greatly to retard the trade.

CHINESE ROBBERS.—A gang of armed Chinese, about fifty or sixty in number, entered the house of Mr. McMicking, of the firm of Messrs. Syme and Co. of this settlement, and having wounded him severely on the back of the head and neck, plundered the house of all the property. Elated with their success the gang, on the 11th October, made an attack on the residence of a Bengallee cow-keeper in Buffalo Village; but they experienced an obstinate resistance from the inhabitants and were put to flight after losing two of their gang. An inquest was held on the bodies on the following day, and a verdict of "justifiable homicide" was returned.

OUTRAGEOUS ATTACK.—A very outrageous attack was made by Count Van Ranzow, his son and servants, on the person of Mr. De Wind of Malacca, who was dangerously wounded with bludgeons and left on the public road near that town. Strong provocation seems to have caused the assault. The assailants are in confinement and likely to be committed to take their trial at the next sessions.

CHINA.

On the 5th and 6th of August a typhoon swept over the city of Canton. Several ships and Chinese boats have been totally dismasted or otherwise sustained severe damages by the hurricane, and hundreds of boats and the Danish bark Maria, have been totally wrecked, the latter losing nine of her crew.

AUGUST 10.—An official proclamation was issued directing all vessels to anchor near Whampoa, where they may easily be overlooked and examined; and threatening to stop immediately the delivery of the cargo of any ships not complying with the proclamation.

AUGUST 14.—A string of preventive regulations were issued, approved and confirmed by the Emperor, confining the foreigners to the narrow and confined spot called San Hang, the Thirteen Factories, in the western suburb of the provincial city of the province of Kwang-taing.

AUGUST 17.—Five men who were concerned in the robbery, attended with violence, of the family of a comprador, were executed. An order was also issued for strangling an offending wife, of middle age, and for slowly cutting to pieces another of more tender years. The last had murdered her husband and is said to have been of great beauty.

AUGUST 19.—Eleven persons, who had been concerned in the plunder of the Troughton, and six others, who had robbed a Cochin-China vessel, were apprehended and delivered over for examination by the Governor.

AUGUST 24.—This morning the chamber over the East gate of the city was destroyed by lightning.

H. M. S. RALEIGH arrived on the 11th of August at Macao under jury-masts, having experienced a very heavy typhoon on the 4th and 6th, by which she was compelled to throw 13 of her guns overboard and cut away her quarter-boats to relieve the ship.

DARING OFFENDERS.—On the 30th August a fictitious Yang-keang-hean, with his secretaries and retainers, numbering upwards of ninety persons, were seized in the district of Yang-keang and brought under guard to the provincial city on the 5th Sept. and delivered to the authorities for trial. These villains had, under the disguise of officials, got themselves invited to drink with the true Hean when on his way to commence the duties of his office, and having poisoned him and his attendants, assumed their names and duties, and had actually managed the affairs for some months without discovery. They were, however, accidentally detected and ultimately brought to justice, by the brother of the wife of the murdered Hean.

NEW PAPER.—A new journal, called the Canton Press and Commercial Price Current, was published on the 12th Sept. The paper, printed on two quarto sheets, is to be issued weekly, and the price will be Sp. Dls. 12 per annum, or Sp. Dls. 7 half yearly, and Sp. Dls. 5 per quarter; and the Price Current Sp. Dls. 4 per annum; all payable in advance.

TRAIL OF SAILING.—An account has been received of a trial of sailing which took place in August last between the Water Witch and the Fairy: the Fairy beat the Witch on a wind, but was beaten when going free. Another account states that the Witch was never beaten but gained upwards of half a mile on the Fairy in the race of 40 miles besides getting to windward of her.

LOCUSTS.—The Non-hae-heen had issued an edict, directing the people to assist the military and police in exterpating a large swarm of locusts which had settled outside the south gate and had spread to the northward and eastward. It is said that two peculs of locusts had been caught and presented to the Kwang-chow-foo, for which rewards were to be granted.

SHIP TROUGHTON.—It is said that the plunderers of the ship Troughton, have been examined, and that they stated in their defence that the ship had been dismasted in a gale of wind and was in the most eminent danger. That they went to her assistance, and the Captain had promised them a gratuity of Sp. Dlrs. 20,000 for helping him; but that when the vessel was taken to a place of safety the Captain had broken his word and dismissed them unrewarded; and that they therefore had become enraged and forcibly taken from him the 20,000 Sp. Drls. promised, but had not touched any thing more.

EDICTS.—An edict has been issued by the Emperor against the printing of books from Chinese blocks and directing Loo, the Governor of Canton, to seize and punish with "grinding tortures" all those concerned in printing books from them.

An exhortatory edict has been issued by Loo and his colleagues, to the people of the coast against attacking mariners in distress.

A robbery has been committed by three pirate boats containing about one hundred men, who landed off the east gate of the city and attacking a money-changer's shop, took from it several thousand dollars.

Since the arrival of the Criminal Judge, he has been exercising his vocation most vigorously and has punished a great many defaulters and greatly alarmed the rest. The police runners have been so intimidated by his severe justice that they have discontinued the practice of accusing persons for the purpose of extortion.

On the 11th September a man who had been in the habits of smoking opium and gambling, having lost seven mace came home to his wife and demanded the money from her, and on her refusing to give it, stabbed her with a knife in the stomach and killed her on the spot. The murderer was apprehended and confined.

In the middle of the spring ten thousand piculs of rice were distributed by order of a royal edict, to the inhabitants of five districts which had been afflicted with famine in consequence of the severe drought.

Loo, the Governor, died on the 24th September, at 1 o'clock in the morning. The immediate cause of his death was constipation. He has left three sons, a widow and three concubines.

REVIEW OF THE CALCUTTA MARKET.

(From A. E. Kuhn's Monthly Price Current, November 30, 1835.)

In our last number we expressed the belief in a future encreased activity in the market, but contrary to the general state of things at this season of the year, the transactions have been during the whole of the month on an extremely limited scale.—Freights which had in the early part of the month declined somewhat have again advanced and become extremely scarce, the holders of linseed having engaged a great portion of the available tonage, and the rice crop being unusually large with every prospect of low prices, the necessity of disposing of these grains will, added to the usual sugar and saltpetre shipments, no doubt, occasion a further rise. £ 4-10, per 20 cwt., has been refused for rice to London.

INDIGO.—The importation up to the present date is about 10,000 maunds. The estimate of the total crop continues to be what we stated in August last. The market is not likely to be fairly open till the middle of next month, as further news from England is expected, and several French vessels have still to arrive. The first public sale of the season is advertised by Messrs. Hickey, Thomas and Co. for the 2d proximo, which will consist of about 200 chests of different marks, namely 92 chests F S Tirhoot Indigo, and 44 E W J Purneah, and a few lots of Jessore.

OPIUM.—The prices of this drug have considerably advanced since our last, in consequence of the favourable news from China, where great activity continued to prevail. Our sales are, however, confined to few parcels, as the remaining stock is small. The prospects of the next crop continue to be very favourable.

RAW SILK.—Sales are restrained by the absence of good qualities; the few transactions we have to notice, are chiefly for Bombay and the Gulphs. The importation by the Honorable Company, since 1st May last, is about 2,400 maunds, which are not yet shipped.

SILK PIECE GOODS.—The few transactions reported are upon a very limited scale; corahs continue in good demand; handanas and choppahs less enquiry after.

COTTON.—The shipments of this article have been confined to the English markets. Baudah continues scarce, and enquired after, Cutchurah neglected.

SALTPETRE.—Although the supplies from the interior during the last six months have been much less than those of the previous year, during the same period, the present rates of freight and the probability of their augmentation operate much to discourage purchases in this article. Our Stock is not very heavy and may be computed at about 50,000 maunds of all sorts. At present our prices are well supported.

SUGAR.—Exportation to England is greatly on the increase, some transactions are also reported for Bombay. Prices are in general well supported, our stock is still very large. Advices from home are favourable.

LAC DYE AND SHELL LAC.—Transactions are limited to a few parcels for England and America; prices firm.—A public sale of 183 chests of shell lac is advertised for the 2d proximo.—Stick lac in moderate demand.

RICE.—The appearances for the ensuing crop continue to be very favourable, and the prices of all sorts are expected to experience a further decline.

WHEAT.—A few purchases have come to our notice intended for shipments to the Mauritius. Prices firm.

HIDES are in moderate enquiry. The exportation of cow hides has been considerably diminished since our last, and prices are declining, our stock being still very heavy and on the increase.

LINSEED.—Shipments for England (on account of holders of large quantities) are in active progress. The sales in the bazaar are confined to small parcels.

GINGER.—The Americans are buying very freely, and prices have advanced.

METALS.—Transactions of the several articles under this head were in general on a limited scale.—The prices of copper experienced a further decline since our last, and are to be considered nominal at present: sales to some extent have on the contrary been reported of assorted iron bars and prices are now firm. Spelter continues declining, in consequence of some supply from home, and very limited demand for the interior, the stock, however, continues to be very small.—Prices of lead are well supported.—Quicksilver in demand at steady prices.

TWIST.—The sales of white mule twist, are limited by the absence of fresh supplies, and by our reduced stock. The demand firm, and prices steady.

COTTON PIECE GOODS.—Shirtings, longcloths, cambrics and chintz continue in good demand; book muslin, lappets and jaconets are less enquired after. Some extensive sales at round sums for various articles are however reported.

WOOLLENS.—Shipments to some extents have been made to the Coast. Sales are regular as usual at this season, without any particular alteration in our prices.
