Arang Para; a species of rambutan. Sapam; a sort of wild mangoe. Rambia, the fruit of a species of the sago palm. Sirbayaman, a fruit of a middle sized tree; it is about as large as a small mangoe, and the rind is saturated with a vicid juice, like that of the mangosteen and sittool. Topah resembles the Sapam; very acid. Powah, a high tree, the fruit is very acid.

Sittar, an acid fruit. Kaloobi, the very acid fruit of a small palm, used in seasoning dishes. Assam kumbang, Rawa, Roomiah, Pringei Lanjiet, Blingei, are acid fruits of jungle trees, and used by the natives, who have a great taste for sour as well as sweet things.

The Ananas or Pine Apple.—This fruit is extensively cultivated, and if more pains were bestowed on it, the quality might be greatly improved. As it is, the plants are allowed to spread until they become an almost impassable thicket.

They are brought in cart loads to the bazaars and thrown down like so many turnips. A good pine weighing from 3 to 5 lbs. may be bought for from 1 to 2 cents of a dollar. Pulo Kra, which is a small rocky island in the harbour, produces the best flavored pines, and some care is there taken in raising them.

The variegated or green and white striped leaved pine is highly ornamental to the table, but not otherwise approved of. Indeed few settled Europeans indulge in the pine, as it is justly deemed unwholesome, perhaps from the great tendency its juice has to ferment.

In Manilla a very exquisite lace-like fabric or scarf is manufactured from the fibre of the pine apple leaf.

The Grape.—The climate is too moist for the grape, yet a pale sort has been by great pains brought to considerable perfection by one of our oldest settlers in Penang, Mr. Rodyk.

Oranges.—Several varieties are cultivated, but many of the old gardens have died off, and the profit does not seem high enough to induce the Chinese, in whose hands the cultivation has hitherto chiefly rested, to keep it up. The descriptions of the fruit now occasionally procurable are—The Chimbool, with a knob at one end, sweet. The Limau manis, the sweet or China orange. Limau Japoon, the Japan orange. Limau Karbau, the Citron. Limau Gadang, the Shaddock. Limau Kapas panjang.

The Chinese seldom raise from the seed. A branch is surrounded for about two inches in length, with a compost of earth and manure, and when roots appear, it is cut off and planted. The Chinese affirm that the new tree never survives the parent stock provided the latter dies through natural decay.

An orange plantation requires incessant attention to keep it flourishing, and the trees will not yield long without manure.

Oranges are generally high priced. Those of the best kinds are seldom sold under one cent each, and often at 5 and 6 cents.

Although the products of the jungle cannot be classed under the head of cultivation, yet they may not well be overlooked, and indeed some of the most valuable of the products of tropical climes are derived from the forest.

Chirrie Morie—the Indian rubber vine, grows along the borders of Province Wellesley. The juice is collected by suspending a bottle below an incision in the bark. It is at first of the consistency and colour of milk, and in this state may be applied to saturate cloth, which is thus rendered perfectly waterproof. The expense of collecting it is considerable, and it is believed prevents its exportation. But might not the vine be cultivated?

Dammer. The rosin of the dammer tree, well known as a useful substance for paying vessels.

Miniah Dammer, or wood oil, is the sap of another tree, and is of a brown colour. It is used in careening ships and may be used as a cheap and useful substitute for linseed oil in painting the inside of a house, although the paint will not bear exposure to the weather.

Lada Panjang, Chabei Talee, or Long Pepper, grows easily and yields well, but is little sought for to be cultivated.

Buah Ekor. From this fruit a lamp oil is extracted.

Buah Prah. The fruit of the prah tree resembles a nutmeg in shape, an oil is extracted from the kernel, which is in some places used for culinary purposes.

Pumpong, is a shrub which has an oval fruit, from which a lamp oil is extracted.

Chinghawang. An oil is also extracted from the fruit of this tree, or the kernel, and is used for the kitchen by Malays.

Kapayang, is a creeping plant used in dying, and from the fruit of which a lamp oil is extracted.

Kalompang, is a tree, the kernel of whose fruit also yields a lamp oil, as does the fruit of the high tree called Penagu.

Buah Kras, or Embelic Juglans Camiriu, is the hard fruit as its Malayan name implies of a high tree.

Gittah or Bird Lime. This is made from a mixture of the vicid juices of the following trees: the Jaduteng, the Arak, a species of ficus Indicus, and the Jack and the Cherrie Morei, or Indian rubber in small quantity, also of the Pulei and other trees. To render the mixture manageable cocoanut oil is added. The Malays by their own accounts can do wonders with this lime, of which the following hoax, asserted to have been passed off on a tiger, is a specimen. A tiger having killed a man at Siac, the body was left on the spot, and a large quantity of bird lime was disposed on and around it. All around at a few paces distance chaff of paddie was thickly strewed and more lime laid. The animal returned to finish his repast, and his mouth and claws were soon clogged by the bird lime, while quantities stuck to his body. To get rid of this annoyance he rolled himself in his rage on the chaff, which soon swelled his body to a most portentous bulk, and after having exhausted himself in fruitless exertions he was easily killed. This would seem an improvement on American tarring and feathering.

The barks of the Bakkaw, the Sama, the Pagar Apak and Sri Kayu are employed for tanning leather and fishing lines.

The Poko Sinto is a pretty tall tree, the small branches of which are in universal use amongst the people as a substitute for soap. The fruit of the tree is named Buah Piloorooh, or ball fruit. The Malays use it in a prepared state in pulmonary affections.

The Beah is the leaf of a moderately high tree so named, which opium smokers substitute for that drug, when it is not procurable. The leaf is serrated, and is sold occasionally at ¼ rupee a cattie.

The castor plant grows almost wild; but the small seeded species available in medicine has not been introduced.—Prince of Wales' Island Gazettee.

THE HILLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MOFUSSIL AKHBAR.

Sir,—The excellent letter of "Oceanus" which lately appeared in one of the Calcutta Journals has not, as I had hoped, been followed by another from the same able and amusing pen: in it, as doubtless most of your readers remember, were enumerated the many agremens of a winter residence here, coupled with a few scientific and popular notices, to the latter only of which, can I aspire to add; more in the hope of furnishing to future visitors some information which may not be unacceptable, than in that of adducing any thing new. Let me then suppose the traveller, most probably a helpless invalid, who has long panted beneath a hot and copper sky, to have arrived at Barh, (the last stage in the plains) delighted with the earnest of opening beauties which his morning's march has afforded, and already fancying health in every gale; behold him then seated in a comfortable bungalow, and anxious to make an early start on the morrow:—the "bearer" is summoned, and directed to arrange for the conveyance of his traps—an order more easily given than executed. Perhaps, however, the coolies may be in a complaisant mood, and if so, they will strap their loads on, and go their way without further ado; but if, as is the case nine times out of ten, they should be disposed to take their ease, woe and discomfort to the wretched valetudinarian who sends for the man in charge of the bungalow, naturally expecting and requesting his assistance. He replies, "I am your slave, but can do nothing; a fixed rate is not allowed, you must make your own bargain; these are the orders, you must give whatever the coolies ask or let your baggage remain. At last the head of a gang of porters advances, and proffers the services of himself and troop, (he is called mate from rendering no assistance on the lucus a non lucendo principle;) which are gladly accepted at any price, and on any terms, one of which usually is, that the whole hire must be paid in advance, conformably to the bura-shahib's hookm, which must, by the bye, be a taking of his name in vain, as I am informed he is prohibited from any interference. Then commences a wordy war about the weight of the burdens, one varlet insisting that a petarrah containing a few dishes, &c., will break his back, and another great he-fellow groaning over a bundle of clothes not so heavy as a knapsack, vociferates, "do you think I'm a buffock that can carry 2 maunds? why this is a load for three men at the least." The shahib utterly disgusted, and fearful of being compelled to remain another day, in the end yields, and away the victors budge up the hill, chuckling triumphantly. This state of affairs is emphatically called, by the natives of the plains "coolie-ka-raj," and a most expressive and appropriate title it is. I have often heard people say, that they prefered going to Mussorie rather than to Simla, the latter being so much more difficult of access: this difficulty I supposed lay in the badness of the roads, the steepness of the ascents, the passage of mountain torrents, and dangerous proximity to yawning precipices and toppling crags; these I find were all the creatures of my imagination, for no where in India is there a better road than that leading from Barh to Simla, or even as far as Rampoor on the Sutlej, projected by Major (then Captain) Ross, and the credit for the construction of which is due to Captain Welchman; it has also been widened and improved materially by Captain Kennedy. Now I comprehend that the difficulty of access, consists in that created by the conduct of the coolies. By the time Simla bursts upon the view, it will be fully admitted, that "tricks upon travellers" are thoroughly understood, and most adeptly played in these parts, and some persons there are who affirm, that "doubtless the pleasure is as great of being cheated as to cheat." I however, am not one of these, and hope ere long to see the "coolie-ka-raj" overturned by a dynasty* in the shape of a regulation or enactment to fix the hire, &c. of these men, a change of rule, or rather an annihilation of misrule anxiously desired by most; and justly so too, seeing that the Hill porters may be looked upon much in the same light, as palkee bearers in the plains, or chairmen in Great Britain, and consequently in some sort, as public servants. The following extract from an official report on the Hills states, between the rivers Touse and Sutlej, furnished by the present Political Agent to Government

* In the Derrah Dhoon a fixed rate (2½ or 3 annas a day) has been sanctioned by Government, and there no trouble is experienced in the transport of baggage; but the Government has an interest at stake owing to the supplies required for the Depôt of sick Troops at Landour.

in 1824, will raise a smile in many a reader. "It is most gratifying to observe, that quadrupeds begin to supply the place of suffering man in the carriage of merchandize, &c. The benevolent orders of Government, forbidding the impressment of these people are strictly attended to, and in consequence, man begins to assume his dignity and station." This philosophy cometh in a questionable shape, me thinks, and you may be rather surprized to learn, that notwithstanding our worthy Political Agent's sensitive humanity for these "suffering men" in 1824, he does occasionally in 1835, employ them for the carriage of his portly person, with good fat capon lined, ensconced in a well padded tonjon, ergo, this must derogate not a little from their "dignity and station as men," a circumstance much to be deplored by all philanthropists. That the porters are neither underpaid nor overburdened, a further extract from the same source will fully prove. "The attendance of porters was subsequently commuted to the payment of 3 rupees each porter per month." Now, on regular service, they receive 4 and 5 each, monthly, and if they go a journey from 3 to 5 annas daily, or from 5 rupees 10 annas to 9 rupees 6 annas monthly. "The load of a man in Bussohir is from 40 to 50 seers or nearly one cwt." For us they will hardly ever consent to carry more than 20 seers, and very seldom that, although for themselves they carry frequently 50 seers, and this too, over mountain paths, mere sheep tracks. I had almost forgotten to mention that from Barh to Simla, the hire commonly asked is 1 rupee per porter, should the traveller think with me that this is too much, and have health and patience to wait a while, they will lower quarter of their demand. The approach to Simla is beautiful, winding through the "green wood," openings through which occasionally reveal a glimpse of the pure, cold, glistening snows of the towering Himalyah. To the beauties of the place itself, I cannot pretend to do justice, they are varied by a number of extremely tasteful roads, offering different points of view, some made by Captain Kennedy, some suggested by Lords Combermere and William Bentinck, others constructed by private individuals; among the last I may mention one to the waterfall. The lovers of the picturesque cannot fail of being gratified, but the want of a lake or stream is sadly felt, and the Hills themselves lack boldness of outline; they have rather too much of an "analogous physiognomy." When I arrived, the Rhododendron, and its countless crimson clusters of brilliant blossoms, were exquisitely contrasted with the sombre hue of the pines, and the bright clear green of the budding oaks; but "all that's bright must fade" and they are now no more. The houses are commodious, mostly flat-roofed, coated with earth, as those in the city of Cashmere were described to be by Forster, (but no parterres on the terrace) some few are covered in with shingles, and two or three with an excellent sort of mica slate, pitched in the Chinese style; the latter is by far the best plan, but like most good things, expensive. The patting of the flat-roofs requisite to prevent leaks is by no means an agreeable accompaniment to the piano forte, nor is it particularly pleasant to those who suffer from head-aches. The Swiss Cottage might be introduced with pretty effect. Good vegetables are not easily procurable, gardens being scarce and not well stocked, and although the apple, pear, peach, apricot, nectarine, cherry, currant, raspberry, and in fact nearly all our garden fruit trees are indigenous, their produce is but indifferent; towards its improvement, cultivation alone would do much, but the planting of European varieties, together with grafting upon the wild stock, would do more, especially with the apricot and cherry; but I am not aware that a single effort towards so desirable an object has been directed, either by Government or its functionaries, (who have the best opportunity) or any private resident. That success might not attend the first attempts is probable, but we have an example in the gardens of Scotland of the triumph of art over nature; here a helping and skilful hand is all that is needed. Of the general climate I cannot speak; at present the thermometer must stand some 23 or 25 degrees lower than at Agra; and I am led to expect much heavier rains here than in the plains. The meteorology of these Hills, says an indefatigable and accurate observer, and the annual and monthly mean temperature of Simla is as well ascertained as that of London. Water is good and nearer than at Mussorie. The bazaar is well-built, chiefly of wood, the lower rooms of stone; it is clean and well supplied; but although no nirikh very properly exists, a price current should be furnished, some bunyas giving 22 seers of gram and others 10 seers more, for the rupee, and on the detection of this difference, the former readily agree to supply the same quantity. The same remark may be applied to all the necessaries of life. The papers informed me last year that a meeting of some of the residents was convened, for the purpose of endeavoring to destroy a supposed combination among the moodees; its result I did not learn through the same channel, but understand that the steps taken by the committee elected by the meeting, for lowering the prices on grain, ghee, &c., perfectly succeeded, and perhaps the wily bunyas have the recollection of this interrorem, or alterations may have been made in some quarters, for they now sell at fair rates. The fact of this meeting was reported to Government by Captain Kennedy, and rumour adds, it annoyed him most exceedingly. Lord William expressed his opinion that the civil authority should have been applied to for permission to hold the meeting, but that there was nothing objectionable in its proceedings; that they were necessary I am induced to think, from being positively told by a friend who was here, that those bunyas who were deserted, offered to furnish grain, &c., to their former customers at a very considerably cheaper rate than the committee could, a fact, the inferences from which are too obvious, to need recording. Monro and Cox keep a good shop, and two billiard tables. Notwithstanding the abundance and variety of wood, all furniture comes from the plains, and though a very large quantity of wax might be procured, not a single candle, (tallow excepted,) is manufactured; iron is cheap and plentiful, yet not a seer of tolerable nails have I been able to get, except some brought up from Kurnal. In fact, a clever speculator would find ample exercise for his genius and purse, and there is a capital opening for a professional builder and house agent. Mr. Barrett undertakes this business, but he has his shop to attend to, besides many other pursuits. The Political Agent in his capacity of Justice of the Peace decides cases wherein Europeans are concerned, and lex non scripta occasionally obtains. I dislike the system of unpaid Magistrates; I am thoroughly convinced the public do so too. A knowledge of law is not intuitive: a Political Agent, however, skilled in diplomacy, may cut a very ridiculous figure on the bench; will probably be much more deeply versed in Vattel and Puffendorff, than in Blackstone or Burn, and be much better acquainted with the Courts of Princes, than with those of justice: and it is even possible that a smart Commandant of a regiment may be perfectly master of his charge and ignorant of the forms, and misunderstand the spirit of the British Law. Should the visitor not intend to travel much in the interior, a poney or horse will answer as well as a jhoont; but if he should wish to tramp about across country, the latter will be found serviceable. Let the animal by all means have a long tail, for in many places and ascents, where riding is impracticable or unpleasant, a good purchase on this will cheat one into the belief of walking on level ground.

The Girree, 2 marches distant, holds mahseer and shala-bons of fair size, the former take the fly well, and afford many a day's sport to those who are not afraid of the heat: the banks of the river are also good beats for jungel-fowl, pheasants, black partridge, and deer. If the visitor be not a votary of old Isaac's, let him take a rifle and a good double-barrelled piece, of 14 or thereabouts calibre, and start for Kotgurh (commonly called the "Cockney Trip.") About 5 miles after leaving Simla, he will enter a noble forest of pines, oaks, and other trees, of which I know not the name,—here and there shewing the wildest glens in "deep and funeral shade," and occasionally opening out into the green glades of park scenery, through which echo a thousand plaintive wood-notes wild. Though this ground is haunted by most of the native shikarees, who supply Simla, a considerable quantity of game may still be found, and should the sportsman be a quick shot, a good fag, and not mind a roll, will well reward his pursuit; there being in the forest no fewer than four varieties of pheasants,—the khalij, most numerous, then the plass, a handsome bird, the cheer a most superb creature, in shape like the English bird, and last the moonal or peacock pheasant, the splendour of whose plumage this epithet indicates. Of partridges there are the chukore, and another very gay feathered, rather scarce and peculiar to these Hills. Towards the snowy range the jhajje or argus pheasant is found, (described, a friend tells me in Buffon, under the title of horned pheasant). Of deer there are three, the corll, or Himalaya chamois, the kakur or barking deer, and perhaps that curious and valuable animal the musk deer may be startled; there may be others, these are all I have seen. Bears, hyænas and leopards will probably be roused in the deepest and darkest jungles. The road winds through the forest for about 7 miles, and then emerges at Fagoo, where there is a bungalow. The next march is to Mutteana, on a tolerably level line, except in one or two places; some likely looking spots are passed and the traveller cannot but help admiring the industry which has embellished whole faces of rugged steeps with one sheet of cultivation, in little terraces one above another, reaching often to nearly the very crest of the Hill. The zumeendars seem fully sensible of the value of manure; for which purpose they make a compost of fermented fir leaves, fern and cowdung. They have an ingenious mode of stacking their hay on very steep slopes, which preserves it uninjured both by snow and rain, and in some villages they keep it in tall cones by staking it on poles, fixed into the ground. They take great pride in their herds of cattle, and constantly sing, while tending them, their excellencies of shape and produce, and recite even something like pastorals. The peasantry are well formed and robust, are fairer than the same class in the plains, and when young very good looking, but whether it is owing to early marriages or to frequent exposure to sun, wind and rain, or perhaps both, certain it is that their good-looks leave them at a very early age, and in appearance at least, they become prematurely old. The villagers I saw were warmly clad in a dirty drab colored woollen frock, trowsers of the same material, loose about the leg and tightened over the instep: for head dress, the men wear a black cap of frieze rolled up into something like a turban, and often decked with a bunch of roses or a green sprig; some of them had a girdle of hair-rope with knife and steel suspended (a bit of quartz serves for a flint and they find a natural tinder or amaden in a small downy plant, the leaves of which they dry) and when the weather is inclement, they throw over all a blanket, much in the manner of the Highland plaid. The women, who bear a most active part in the labors of the field, wear the same sort of frock, frequently without any undergarments, with a strip of cotton cloth wound round the head; some, however, have paejamus or a sort of trousers: both sexes are filthy in their persons, and like most uncivilized mountaineers, grossly superstitious. They profess Hindooism, ignorance of the rites of their religion renders them perhaps less tenacious of caste than their brethren of the plains, and most of them eat meat,—but they will not touch a morsel of mutton except that of the Hills, observing that the sheep below have long tails "butchroo ke moo-âjiq." Coming up to Simla, I saw a man about sunset, holding in front of his face a slip of wood with something like the human face divine carved on it, and apparently endeavoring to cover some object at a distance. On inquiring what he was about, he said "his dauçe was having a moolakat with one at Subathoo," about ten miles horizontal distance. Wizards and witches play all sorts of devilish tricks with their cattle, and every lofty peak has its appropriate deota, whom they endeavor to propitiate by a variety of offerings. The houses are substantially built of stone, slate and wood, some have 3 stories, the lower appartments being allotted to the kine, the middle one to the family, and the garret for a granary or kitchen. All who saw these Hills after the Nepal war, agree in stating, that the condition of the few inhabitants was most pitiable, now they appear to be better off than any peasantry I have seen in India. Goorkhas were indeed the most merciless, brutal, grasping conquerors that ever disgraced the name of man in any age, and all the execrable atrocities committed in the southern portion of the new world, sink into insignificance compared with the villainies perpetrated by these treacherous tyrants. By the bye, I may here remark, that the men of the Regiment of that nation stationed at Subathoo, are by no means respectful in their demeanour to any Europeans but their officers; having, I suppose, adopted some strange notions of "station and dignity of man." We proceeded next to Nagkunder, which is very much colder than Simlah, and where there is an excellent bungalow—good shooting is to be had in the neighbourhood; and independently of the beauties of this spot, which are many, and of the climate which is very bracing, the discovery this month of a chalybeat spring by Dr. Murray, H. A. in a shooting excursion, promises to add not a little to its attractions; its waters are already in request, and no doubt, an analysis of them will shortly be presented to the public. The next day, I recommend the traveller to devote to a ramble up to the Hill of Huttoo, about three and half miles off, and the road to which lies through a superb and mingled forest of firs, holm-oaks, horse chesnuts, sycamores, hazle, rowan and the sable yew, from between the spreading arms of which, stand out in lovely desolation the "blasted pines, wrecks of a single winter, barkless and branchless." Let the summit of the hill be gained early, and from it, should the sky be unclouded, as it probably will in the morning, is commanded a view awful indeed, but neither sad nor gloomy. To the north rise proudly up the mighty peaks of the vast Himalyah, sheathed in perennial snows, where spirits "nightly tread and leave no trace behind," and among the most conspicuous of those giant heads, shoot up the glittering pinnacles of Bundeh Pooch; turning to the south, we behold the Choor still with his night cap on, and a little to the west of south Jacko and Simla are distinctly visible, and on either hand a scene which might well employ poet and painter. The slopes of the Hill were studded with those ever wild flowers, so endeared to us by association, the violet, polyanthus, buttercup, thyme, &c. &c. In the afternoon I returned to Najkunda delighted with all that I had seen, and next day went on to Kotgurh, the road to which is pretty, distant 7 or 8 miles. Two companies of the Nusseree Battalion were once stationed here, and there are two good houses belonging to private individuals. The Sutlej rolls or rather rushes below, and looks like a mere sluice, though I believe it is 250 feet wide. Two marches hence is Rampoor, (the capital of Bussahir); the fair held there in November I hope to visit, and should you think this worthy of insertion, I will at a future period, descant on the folly of prohibiting Europeans from crossing the Sutlej, or from proceeding to Kunawur without official permission. Here for the present concludes the journey of your admirer and obedient servant,

LAND TENURES OF INDIA.

DOUBTS SUBMITTED RESPECTING THE ALLEGED EFFICACY OF A KNOWLEDGE OF THE VARIOUS LAND TENURES OF INDIA, AS A MEANS OF PROTECTING THE RIGHTS AND INTERESTS OF THE RYUTS.

The advocates of Ryutwar settlements charge the Permanent Zemindaree settlement of Lord Cornwallis, and all others formed upon a like principle, with more serious evils, as I humbly submit, than can fairly be imputed to them, whilst they ascribe, on the other hand, more efficacy than they deserve to those securities against the commission of similar errors, which form the basis of their favorite system of revenue management.

The following observations, which with all submission go to question both of these positions, and which right or wrong are the result of much reflection, after having attentively read, marked, and as I would fain hope, well digested the valuable information, contained in the Printed Revenue Selections, in the large mass of oral and written evidence recently submitted to the Board of Control and the Select Committee of Parliament for the affairs of India, and in late dispatches from the Supreme Government, also laid before them, and the whole of which are also in print—may be less called for as regards India, where something like a reaction in the minds of the ruling powers would seem to have taken place as to the merits of Ryutwar settlements, grounded upon previous minute local inquiries, such as are embraced in Regulation VII. 1822, of the Bengal Code,* that is to say, "their practical application," for "there can be but one opinion as to their soundness in theory."† Not so however with the authorities in England, in whose minds a conviction of their superiority to every other Revenue term, both practically, and theoretically would seem to be as steadfast and rooted as ever, or rather, it may by said to have gained strength since the weight of testimony in the inquiries I have alluded to, which preceded the renewal of the Charter, being all in favour of that mode of Revenue administration, must have added to the strong previous leaning towards it. In proof of which, I need only mention the names of Sir Charles Metcalfe and Mr. Holt Mackenzie, who, although neither of them, I believe, practical disciples of that school, are nevertheless strenuous and warm supporters of its principles, and of Messrs Campbell and Sullivan, of the Madras service, whose evidence display an apostolical zeal in propagating the doctrines of their distinguished masters.

To enlarge on the vast importance of eliciting the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, with respect to a question, which has occupied so large a share of the attention of every Indian Government, from the days of Warren Hastings to the present time, would be to utter State truisms, I feel satisfied, therefore, that any person who can, or fancies he can, throw a single ray of additional light upon it, need offer no apology for proceeding to make the attempt. I am not, however, going to inflict a merciless dissertation upon the merits of either of the celebrated Revenue settlements I have adverted to, or of any other. On the contrary, considering how much has been already said and written upon these and all the other systems of Revenue management which have at any time found favor in India, so much indeed that one would almost think there could be no room for further discussion, and bearing in mind the necessity of dealing considerately with the limited space which your columns, and the probably still more limited patience of your readers, can afford, I shall not only touch as briefly as possible on all such facts or reasoning already on record, as I may have occasion to refer to, but shall compress my own suggestions into the narrowest compass consistent with perspicuity.

It appears to me then, that it was not, as is alleged, our concluding the Zemindaree settlement of Bengal, in ignorance of the land tenures of the country, which led to the extensive destruction, said, and no doubt truly, to have overtaken the rights and interests of the ryuts and other agricultural classes. It was not from "employing the term proprietor (in regard to the Zemindars) without defining the nature of the property and from overlooking the fact, that several distinct proprietors may very well attach to a single subject matter"* nor from "confounding the Zemindars' hereditary property in the land revenue with the separate property in the land itelf,"† which produced the "mischief" in question. I would submit, whether the same evils would not have equally ensued, had the relative rights of every class, connected with the land, within the sphere of its operation, from the Zemindar or superior landholder himself, down to the lowest cultivator, been ascertained, defined, and recorded in the amplest and clearest possible manner, precedent to the formation of that settlement.

What in fact at that period, if not now, were the rights of the generality of the ryuts at the very best? That so long as they duly paid certain pergunnah rates of assessment, said to have been limited by ancient law and usage; that is to say, a rate of assessment, which, though locally vague and ill-defined, is stated to have been equal, on an average, to half the gross produce of their lands at the very least,‡ they were not liable to be dispossessed. But is that a proportion, which they were capable of paying, I will not say continuously, but even for any considerable length of time! I believe it has never been contended that it is, for that it was any thing more indeed than a maximum limit of legal demand, never to be exceeded—and at all events, it is quite certain that so long as there are "bad crops and poor ryuts," it is not a rate, which could have been paid by all ryuts, in all seasons, and under all circumstances without remission or abatement, notorious, as it is, how small a calamity disables most ryuts from liquidating their assessment; and if so, whatever might have been the nature of the property intended to have been conferred on those, who were empowered to exact it, did not this single fact suffice in itself, if not at once, at least before very long, to invest every one of the Zemindars, with whom the Government settlement was made, to all intents and purposes, with a complete proprietary right in all the lands comprized within the limits of his Zemindaree, and virtually render the reduction of the whole of the inferior cultivators to the condition of tenants-at-will a mere question of time? These Zemindars must always, it is obvious, have been the sole judges of when, and to what extent abatements from such standard assessment, if any, were to be granted, on a partial or general failure of crops. They had only therefore to refuse, on any such occasions, to listen to claims for remission, on that or any other plea, and what became of the boasted rights of individuals so circumstanced? Would they not in that case have been as entirely at their mercy, however carefully they might have been sought out, ascertained and registered, as if no such record as at present had ever existed? The assignment, in short, to the Zemindars of a carte blanche power to take from their ryuts whatever they pleased, within these specific limits, could not fail, I would submit, to enable them sooner or later to work their will upon them, and to oust indeed nine-tenths of the whole, if so disposed, in the course of a very few years, without the smallest violation of law or infraction of individual rights. By making that "a real measure of demand," which "in the hands of Government had been in a great manner nominal,"* and strictly enforcing its realization—any record of the nature indicated must, in a very short time, in short, so far as protection to the ryuts, have been little better than a nullity.

The general rate of assessment, for example, in the Bengal Provinces, as sanctioned by long usage or prescription, was probably not below that of the Ceded Districts of Madras, fixed by Sir Thomas Munro's celebrated survey, but according to that eminent revenue authority, even so large a reduction as he advised in that rate, namely, to the extent of 25, and in some instances 33 per cent, would still have involved, for a number of years at least, the necessity of remissions "from bad crops or other accidents," to the annual amount of no less than 10 per cent of the annual jumma," in an aggregate of six or eight collectorates, though it might be more in a single one."† Hence, armed as the Zemindars necessarily were with a discretionary power to reject or admit as they thought fit, all pleas for abatement of such standard rent, one ryut in ten every year, or every ryut on an average, in the course of so short a period as ten years must have been at their mercy, even if the rates demandable from them had been 25 per cent less, than they really were, and whether these rates, as well as all their other rights had been defined or recorded or not. How much more so then with reference to the actual rates, for which they were legally answerable.

Another proof, if further evidence be wanting of the ryut's inability to pay any thing like a fixed or uniform rate of assessment for any length of time is deducible from the fact of the Zemindars themselves being every day defaulters, and their estates forfeited in consequence; no fewer than two hundred and seventy-six having been actually sold so recently as the year 1824.‡ Now as the Zemindars of the present day do not appear to be charged, like their predecessors in the early period of the permanent settlement, with any peculiar improvidence or incapacity in the management of their lands, if they, with their superior resources, and the advantage arising from the possession of a great deal of waste land, &c. &c., are so frequently unable to make good their engagements with Government, what was to be expected from the majority of ryuts in the liquidation of their obligations to them.

A rigorous enforcement of punctuality in the payment of their kists, as they fall due, could of itself perhaps have gone far to ruin many of them; since they, of all people in the world, with their poverty, must have special need of that patient indulgence in money matters, which few persons do not occasionally require.

If there be any justice then in the foregoing observations, I submit that there must also be some truth in the proposition, with which I set out, viz., that no preliminary knowledge, however accurate and complete, of the various land tenures and other individual rights, connected with the land, could have had the effect contended for of effectually bridling the Zemindars, or have proved other than a very temporary shield from the ills, which are said to have befallen the ryuts from the want of it.

I should almost be inclined to go further and to submit, whether in merely urging, as I have hitherto done, that such knowledge would be of very limited utility in protecting the inferior from the oppressive practices of the superior landholders, I have not passed a more favorable judgment upon it than it really deserves. Whether, in short, instead of possessing the negative merit of being harmless, it would not on the whole be positively mischievous in its operation upon these last, or upon those for whose especial benefit it is intended, and for this simple reason, that it is calculated to "put asunder" those ties and sympathies between the higher and lower classes, which, circumstanced as the great body of the ryuts are, must ever be their best security for the undisturbed enjoyment of their rights, and for which this supposed palladium would, as I greatly fear, prove but a very inadequate substitute.

Did the ryuts stand less frequently in need of indulgence in the payment of their dues, could they in short be at once raised into independence in their circumstances, such a registry might indeed be a valuable boon—but wedded as they are to pinching poverty, and with such constantly recurring occasion for abatements in the assessment, which the Zemindars are entitled to demand from them, fixed though it be on the lowest scale, which has ever been contemplated—what other effect can our teaching them to look solely to the Courts for redress, on every occasion of real or fancied infringement of their rights, than to alienate from them the good-will of those upon whom they are so wholly dependant, and who by a stern exaction of their just dues, and a refusal of what can be claimed as a matter of favor only, and not of right, would have innumerable opportunities of placing them in a much worse position, than they at present occupy, since, as matters now are, the Zemindars may have the power; but there seems good reason to believe that they have seldom the inclination to practice any general oppression upon their ryuts, whereas they would then have both the one and the other. The inclination could not fail, were they to be frequently sued in the Courts by the ryuts to become much more hostile towards them, and the power, as has been shewn, would as certainly not be long wanting. Can a slave, it may be asked, venture to complain of his master with impunity?

To be beneficial, therefore, the whole peasantry or the country, that is to say, a proportion of not less perhaps than two-thirds of the community at large must be elevated, and that instanter, to the rank of independent landed proprietors or substantial farmers, and this is what, I believe, is really aimed at. A most benevolent design truly, but which but for the high respect I entertain for many of its advocates, I should be inclined to designate as so very utopian, as to have much more the air of being an emanation from the brain of Mr. Owen of Lanark, than the sober calculation of practical statesmen.

In every part of the world, the time I fear is very far from having yet arrived for the great mass of mankind to be other than hewers of wood, and drawers of water—and in India, with their institutions and load of taxation, the people seem to be more especially doomed to that lot. To expect, under such circumstances, by any law of ours we can make them otherwise, is to believe the laws of men to be more powerful than those of God and nature. The Hindoo laws of inheritance would of themselves render it abortive beyond the period of a single generation.

But the Zemindars, it is said, practised great oppression on the ryuts possessing "a fixed right of occupancy,—which is the most general tenure," by every where disregarding and exceeding the customary local rates of assessment, and ejecting them in case of recurrence from their holdings,* in order to make room for others, the pyacadoree, or migratory ryuts, a body who "are ever on the watch, by the offer of higher terms, to tempt the Government, or its representative, to oust the hereditary cultivator from his fields."† To which it may be answered, that the only legal limit to the rates in question, to which the latter class would appear to have been liable, from time immemorial, being ther "supposed ability"‡ to pay them, as "ordinarily the whole of the produce of the land, beyond what is required for the reward of labour and the replacement of stock, might be deemed a public property,"§ their condition could for the most part scarcely have admitted of being made worse, than it always had been in this respect, and at all events, their rents could not have been raised. I would submit, with any view to their ejectment for the purpose adverted to, as such a doctrine is at variance with the notorious fact every where recorded,* that neerasdars and all ryots possessing a hereditary or fixed right of occupancy, are almost uniformly in the habit of paying, a higher rate of assessment, than the migratory class, or those who bear a resemblance to tenants-at-will, and who "having no permanent interest in the lands they cultivate, have little or more of the local attachment which facilitates exaction" from the others. If such be the case then, their ejectment, the fact of which I do not presume to question, must, generally speaking, have arisen from some other cause than the one assigned, since it must have been attended with positive loss, instead of gain, to the Zemindars.

It may be affirmed, in short, that the Zemindars could not, if they would, have raised the rents, which they were legally entitled to receive from the ryots, and that they would not, if they could, to such an extent at least, as to dispossess them. The one would seem to have been physically, and the other morally, impossible, as being clearly opposed to their own interests.

The under-farming, or thrice repeated sub-renting system, prevalent in the Zemindaree of the Burdwan Rajah has been adduced,† however apparently, in support of the above opinions, that the Zemindars were both able and willing to levy more than had been customary or was legally due from their cultivators, as each of these three grades of sub-renters collected of course a larger sum than that which he himself had engaged to pay. But might not this have been possible enough, without its being "wrung" from the cultivators, as is asserted; that is to say, without any one of them paying, in porportion to the land which he occupied, one rupee more, than at any previous period? Might it not, in short, have been entirely owing to extended cultivation, upon which each of those farmers speculated, since it has been shewn "in respect to a number of estates, taken indiscriminately from those under the Court of Wards,"‡ and some of those belonging to the Rajah of Burdwan among the number, that "the rent obtained from farmers on account of the proprietors, contrasted with the Government revenue, was more than double the latter," and all owing, as is expressly stated, to this very cause, I would with deference submit whether the chief, if not the whole injury the ryuts have sustained under the Zemindaree settlement in question, rather to be attributed to the enactment and rigorous enforcement of that clause of our fiscal Regulations, which makes the Zemindaree tenures saleable in satisfaction of arrears of revenue. Not as is held, because their rights are thus made to merge in those of the auction purchasers of those tenures when brought to the hammer, or in other words, to its having been practically ruled that in all such cases these last became proprietors of the whole land itself, and not merely a share of the public revenue derived from it;* for the ryut's tenures being, as has been so repeatedly stated, nearly, if not wholly, worthless, so far as concerns pecuniary value on account of the "ordinary legal limits of the government demand" being such as to absorb every thing in the shape of rent, it follows that neither the act of Government virtually, or expressly, conferring on the Zemindars all property in the land itself, nor its subsequent transfer to others, when escheated to the state by their default, could have been any infraction of their proprietary rights,† since "to give up what the law and usage authorize us to take, is to create a new property, which no individual can claim on the score of right,"‡ but because it in a manner forced the Zemindars to exercise an equal degree of rigor and severity upon their tenantry, as they themselves were subjected to by the Government. The attachment of all natives to their lands, and to the consequence which is derivative therefrom, is proverbial, the loss of life itself being almost preferable to dispossession. The intense desire, therefore, which the Zemindars must naturally have felt to avert so heavy a calamity from themselves, and which they knew to be the inevitable consequence of any failure on their part in the fulfilment of their revenue engagements with the state, was surely in itself enough not only to drive them, however much against their natural inclination, to practice every species of oppression and extortion, with the view, if possible, of making good the jumma due from them, but almost to justify it.

If the ryut's rights in the land had had any saleable value, the consequences contended for, of the rule under the Bengal system, which in the event of the sale of a Zemindaree or village, constituted the purchasers the sole proprietor of all the land comprised within its bounds, and conveyed to him the proprietory rights without reserve, would certainly have been indisputable, because they would then have had both the power, and a strong inducement to use it, to annihilate them by means of extra exaction. But as it has been most distinctly admitted by its most strenuous advocates, that their hereditary tenures were not generally saleable "in the Provinces under the Bengal or Bombay Governments, and that the existence of private rights, limiting the right of Government, so as to leave the owners of fields a portion of the rent, that is, a share of the surplus, which remains after paying wages and replacing stock, seems rarely to have been established."§ I cannot but think there is strong reason for being sceptical as to the mere system of sales ipso facto, having so extensively a prejudicial effect upon their rights and interests.

With respect to the Tuppa of Muncer, a Zemindaree held by a community of Rajpoots, forfeited and sold in consequence of one or two of the body refusing to pay a portion of the jumma, to which it was assessed, by which the entire rights and fields of the whole of them, "even where they had discharged their respective shares of the public revenue in full," are said to have been "involved in one common destruction,"* and conveyed to the new purchaser, and which had been cited as a pregnant instance of the mischief and injustice, attending such a practice, and of the endless litigation, as well as general disaffection it gave rise to. I would observe, in the first place, that this being an estate held in common, it has always, if I am not mistaken, been the usage of the country, an usage merely adopted and continued in our Regulations, and not their offspring, to hold the whole of such a corporation conjointly answerable for the aggregate demand of Government, and their lands escheatable, if any portion, however small, were not duly discharged; and in the second place, if I am in error in this view, the excitement which the sale of this Zimindaree would appear to have caused among the people, seems to have arisen, less from the sale than from the low caste of the purchaser, which shocked the prejudices and wounded the pride of an association belonging to so high spirited a race as one of the Co-parceners is stated to have observed on the occasion—"If Government are determined to sell our lands, why dishonour the caste, by a sale to a gootun? Our chief is the Rajah of Bulcah, and he is a rich man," &c.

It must be acknowledged, however, that the Regulation in force for several years, after the first introduction of the permanent settlement, which gave the Zemindars no other means of recovering arrears due to them from the ryuts, than by the slow process of a suit in the Courts, whilst the Government could proceed against them in the most summary possible manner, by encouraging the ryuts as it did, to enter "into combinations, which enabled them to embarrass the landholders in a very injurious manner, by withholding their just dues"† was eminently calculated to stir up hostile feelings on their part, and to sever on both sides (as before observed) those ties, which in their relative situations would naturally have bound them to each other, had no such conflicting interests intervened, and hence the Zemindars were sometimes more disposed perhaps, than they otherwise would have been, to turn into an engine of oppression the powers with which they were afterwards armed, for the more prompt enforcement of ther claims against the ryuts.

The above considerations have the more weight, because where Zemindars and other great landholders have not been acted on by such malignant influences, they would seem to be "not at all prone to eject their ryuts."‡ They manifest in truth the very reverse of a disposition to practice grinding exaction, or any other species of oppression on their cultivators. In every part of India, from the southern extremity of the peninsula to the most northern parts of Hindostan, we find testimony borne to this fact. In the jaghires of the southern Mahratta country, on this side of India, not only are the lands represented as being in a more flourishing condition than the British territories in their neighbourhood, but there is said to be "a greater appearance of subsistence and comfort in the people."* The same is said of all the considerable landholders in Travancore; of the renters in Malwa, where a system of very long leases, sometimes handed down from father to son, to the third or fourth generation, formerly obtained. Of the hill Zemindars in the Northern Circars where the ryuts seem to have a peculiarly strong attachment to their chiefs, and of many of the petty independent states in Upper India, such as Rampoor in Rohilcund, the Rajah Diaram Bugwant Sing, and of Bhurtpore, &c. which being small, were managed more like private estates than principalities.

If the end had in view then, namely, a trust-worthy record of the rights and obligations of every one of the agricultural classes be, as I have submitted, of problematical advantage so far as providing an effectual security for their undisturbed enjoyment of those rights, I would now further, though with equal deference, submit, whether the means by which alone we seek to attain it, be not equally problematical?—that is to say, by minute local scrutinies, including a survey and valuation of every begah of land, with the double object of "ascertaining the relation of the people to each other, and to the Government," and of determining "the extent of productiveness of the land, included in the term, all circumstances, natural or artificial, that affect its power of yielding rent," for the purpose of fixing "an easy and equal assessment, which should give to every person, who permanently cultivates lands, and whom it would be unjust to oust, a tenure in the fields occupied by him, or tilled at his expense and risk, possessing a certain money value, and secure against arbitrary or illegal disturbance," &c.†

In support of this proposition, I am less dependent, than in regard to the foregoing, upon argument merely. In proof of the extreme difficulty of developing the information embraced in both of these "great branches of enquiry," and as a striking practical illustration of the great likelihood of all such undertakings ending in disappointment, I can boldly refer to the little progress which has hitherto been made in carrying into effect the provisions of Regulation VII. of 1822, for the settlement upon these principles of the western provinces of Bengal, and to the result of the recent survey, and assessment in the Deccan, which was under the superintendence of a gentleman, who has the character of being every way qualified to do justice to it. The Deccan survey, like many others which have been attempted elsewhere,* appears to have failed in consequence of the "chicanery and corruption" of the numerous native servants, —most of them of course on low pay,—to whom the details were necessarily confided; but had every one of them been of spotless integrity, with the utmost fitness in every other respect, it may well, I think, be doubted whether it would have been much more satisfactory.

"The whole object of that measure† was, as is stated, to ascertain the amount of the gross produce of each acre, and the share which the ryut could afford to pay, after deducting the expense of cultivating it and maintaining himself and his family," with a view to the revision in the existing rates of assessment, and to reducing them to a greater degree of equality. "Large quantities of land being held at reduced rates in some cases, whilst other lands were greatly overrated."—

But to attempt such an equalization with any prospect of success, it is obviously requisite that we should be able to discriminate between natural and artificial fertility of soil, otherwise we must run the greatest risk of aggravating, instead of lessening, existing inequalities of assessment. Two begahs of land for example, are found to yield the same gross produce, and on both the crops are abundant; but in the one case it is the effect of very little labour, while in the other, the expenses of cultivation, that is, of manure and other out-goings, are twice as great. Unless, therefore, we can clearly distinguish the one from the other, and form some estimate of the difference of expense in question, an equitable adjustment of assessment upon each is manifestly chimerical: fixed in ignorance of this essential fact, it might very possibly leave the owner of one of them in possession of a considerable surplus, "after paying wages and replacing stock," while it pressed so heavily on the owner of the other, as not only to leave him no such surplus, but to trench materially on the expenses of cultivating it, and maintaining himself and family.

But is this a matter within the competence of any geologists, or other individuals however expert, to determine by examination or inspection?—I do not of course mean with any precision, but with the smallest approximation even to accuracy, aided though they be by the advice and opinion of other ryuts, by their spirit of party and opposing interests',‡ or by any other imaginable expedient? I apprehend not; I certainly at least have never heard it so contended. Herein then in itself lies an insuperable difficulty. I am within bounds when I affirm, that there are as great varieties in the skill, capital and judgment applied to the cultivarion of land, as there are degrees in its natural fertility. In truth, striking as are the differences in the inherent qualitities of different soils, there is perhaps still more diversity in the relative quantity as well as quality of produce, drawn from them by reason of the labour and skill, bestowed on their cultivation, as is abundantly testified by reference to rude and civilized periods of society in every country. Compare the former with the latter, and we find the land producing little more than enough to maintain the cultivators; while in the latter, one-third of the community perhaps, engaged in agriculture, produce a surplus over and above their own subsistence, capable of supplying the whole of the wants of the other two-thirds. Compare different countries, at any given period, and we perceive the same result. In France two-thirds of the population are said to be agricultural. In England less than one-third, while Ireland the proportion must be considerably more than in France. What therefore is this to be ascribed to? Not certainly to England being the more fertile country of the three, as France has confessedly the far richer soil, but to a more abundant capital and better system of husbandry, and to the land being less subdivided among those classes, who are engaged in agriculture. But what is true of different countries in this respect, is no less true of individuals, and the latter equally with the former, and for the same reasons will make their lands productive in very different degrees.

"There are two or three descriptions of land as was observed by an intelligent Collector in the Bombay service,* but there is not much difference in the quality of land of the same description beyond what has been caused by the labour bestowed on it. Land of the third class in two or three years may be made equal to land of the first class, and this again from neglect may be reduced to the third class. It must be very difficult to obtain a knowledge of the gross produce of every field, as a few cart loads of manure more or less would add to or decrease it one half, I conceive it quite impracticable to cultivate, the labour and expense of cultivation, &c." I repeat then that unless we possess something like a criterion, by which to descriminate between what is the work of nature and what the work of man, we must unavoidably be groping in the dark in all our attempts at a classification of soils, and it must be an equal chance that we create more inequality than what we seek to remove; and if in our ignorance we assess alike land of the first and "land of the third class, made equal to the first," by reason of additional labour, we enact the Agrarian law of ancient Rome over again, in principle at least, by reducing all to one dead level, and keeping them there.

I cannot but think indeed that much of the supposed inequality in the rates of assessment, which we were so desirous of correcting by that survey, is more apparent than real, and originates in fact, in the cause above stated. The low rates paid by what are called under-assessed lands would, not unfrequently in short, be found, if we had the means of tracing them to their true source, to be nothing more than a fair remuneration for the additional expense the owners had been at in their cultivation. It has been well observed, too, that even if a "new assessment* were fair and accurate, it might still be unadvisable, merely because it was new, as every man's rate of payment, and consequently his circumstances, would be altered, and the inconvenience suffered by him whose income is reduced, is out of all proportion to the advantage gained by him whose profit has been augmented."

I have instanced the foregoing, not as being the only, but the greatest obstacle, as it appears to me, next to the want of honesty in the subordinate agency to the success of surveys. A glance at the instructions† for the guidance of the Surveyors and Assessors, will unequivocally show that if this Charybdis were safely passed, how many Scyllas there are, which it was still liable to be wrecked on.

If, then, our best native agency has proved so unworthy of the trust reposed in it, with respect to that great object of a survey, which relates to the determination of an equal and moderate assessment, can we reasonably hope that they will more ably or faithfully execute the other primary end, which has been adverted to, or an accurate ascertainment and definition of various rights and tenures in the land.

Referring, then, to these several considerations, to the probable failure of our utmost endeavours to elicit the required data, and to its questionable or rather limited utility as a means of protecting rights, even if they succeeded to the full, to the heavy expense of such enquiries, which in a single collectorship in the Deccan, and the only one where the surveys were completed, amounted to very little short of four lacks of rupees, to say nothing of the great sacrifice of revenue, which was also contemplated to the extent of from 25 to 33 per cent. of the aggregate annual jumma, and to the indefinitely protracted period any thing like a general measure of that nature would be certain to occupy, the single collectorship I have noticed, having employed an enormous establishment, no less I believe, than from three to four years, and it will perhaps be admitted that there is reason to pause, before we pronounce the preponderance of advantage so decidedly in their favor, as is contended.

I would not have it thought, however, that I am either friendly to the principles of the Zemindaree Settlement of the Lower Provinces of Bengal, or attach no importance to a record of the rights and payments (the latter being fixed on a scale of moderation) of every grade among the agricultural body.

With respect to the first point, I have long thought that the grant of long leases, which seem lately to have come into favor with the public functionaries in this country, or a settlement upon the principle of a man between the Ryutwar Settlement of Sir Thomas Munro and the Zemindaree Settlement of Lord Cornwallis, where it is not of course opposed by the custom of the country, the rights of individuals, or the wishes of the people," that is to say, the renters being the heads of villages, or as many of the villagers as might be willing to become parties to such engagements with Government, would combine the advantages of both these modes of revenue management, and be free from the chief defects of either. "I would give a preference"* says Mr. Elphinstone, "to a settlement with the heads of villages, as tending to keep up the upper classes, which it is generally the effect of our institutions to break down." Similar testimony has been still more recently borne to the value of such intermediate agency by an equally high authority,† as well for being a natural link of connexion between the lowest classes and the Government, for superiority to the revenue Ameen, who must otherwise occupy that place as the best manager of the complicated interests of each village community, and the best promoter of improvement." It has been said also‡ that as long as the engager was himself one of the class (that is, a village proprietor) there was no reason to believe that he assumed the powers of sole proprietor, or that the general puttudaree property was at all infringed upon. And in regard to the second point, or a clear definition of the rights and payments of the people, although, for the reasons assigned, I attach less importance to such a definition than many others, I am far from meaning to deny, that it would be a great desideratum, since it would at least narrow the ground of dispute between the cultivators and Zemindars, or other Government managers, and certainly be of the greatest utility in preventing disputes between private individuals, or settling them satisfactorily when they arose. But are these objects of such value, as to be worth the expense, uncertainty and delay, which there is so much reason for believing the means proposed for their attainment would inevitably be attended with? I have had the less hesitation in answering this question in the negative, because I would humbly submit that there is another expedient, and free from any of those serious objections, by which the same ends may be accomplished, sufficiently well for all practical purposes.

I would submit whether, wherever, as in the Bombay territories, the system of village accounts has been re-established on an efficient footing, and has been for a considerable time in operation, the past collections for a series of years, which are therein recorded would not be an adequate, and at all events a better guide, than any data derived from abstract calculations and estimates, which are the chief reliance of survey field assessments, both for regulating the aggregate jumma, payable to Government by the renters, and the sum of each ryut's payments to them; since what these last had paid in times past, and the effect of which the experience and observation of successive collectors, during a lengthened period, could scarcely have failed in enabling them to equalize in a great degree, or to specify "the amount of increase in the existing jumma which might reasonably be demanded in any case, or the abatement that ought in fairness to be granted," we might be pretty certain of their being able to pay in future.

I would submit farther, whether it might not be made the clear and self-evident interest of the whole body of cultivators and of the renters, as well as the special duty of the European collectors, who, when relieved from the laborious details of annual Ryutwar Settlements, would have ample leisure to give a large portion of their attention to this essential object, at all times one of the most important of their duties, and the most important of all to see that the whole of those particulars relating to the produce and revenue, which are required to be registered in the village accounts,* were duly and regularly entered in all time to come—suppose, for example, the Tullatees or Koolkurnees to be every where made officers of Government, or quite independent, as they ought to be, of the renters or revenue engagers whatever they might be, "the Collectors retainining a full controul over their accounts, and being entitled to enquire and interfere wherever the rights of the ryuts appeared to be encroached on." Suppose, farther, a legislative enactment to be passed, to which of course every possible publicity should be given, declaring those accounts to be the sole criterion, to which the Courts would invariably have recourse to decide all contested demands or other differences connected with land or land revenue, which came before them. Would not a strong incitement thus be given to the parties immediately interested, to the renters on the one hand, and the cultivators on the other, to keep a vigilant watch over these offices of check, to ensure the accounts being always regularly, punctually, and accurately kept, or an authentic record, to which reference might at any time be had, to ascertain both the amount of each man's annual assessment, and the sum of his several payments in liquidation as they were discharged; since according as either party was careless in this respect would be his risk of suffering loss in the event of any dispute, the cultivator in being made to pay more, or the renter to receive less, than was due!

Such a system, coupled with a diligent superintendence and inspection on the part of Collectors and their covenanted assistants, would, as it strikes me, effect all that is practicable in the shape of protection to the ryuts from oppression of the renters, or others placed over them, "by rendering their conduct liable to scrutiny," and afford much valuable, and, indeed, every requisite information to the Government; besides, "as to the real condition, actual revenue, personal rights, and various interests in the country."* "Purgunnah surveys, too, exhibiting the area and general view of the cultivation, and which might be prepared with comparative facility"† would also perhaps be a useful check both at the commencement and end of long leases, as making the extent of cultivation at both periods respectively.

Settlements of the land revenue Ryutwar have not, I believe, been found to answer much better in the Bombay than in the Bengal territories, in which last they have long been pronounced by high authority "as absolutely impracticable;"‡ and it may well perhaps be questioned whether they have been so eminently successful upon the whole, as is generally maintained, under the Madras Presidency. Judging of the tree by its fruits, indeed, the revenue management of Bengal, which has been so much decried for many years past, may with all its faults well challenge comparison perhaps with the Madras system, which has been so much eulogized and held up to the other as a model and an example, since unlike the former, which has upon the whole been stationary, there has been a very large increase of revenue§ in that part of the Bengal territories, where temporary settlements obtain, while it has been shewn by reference to the estates managed by the Court of Wards, that in the Lower Provinces had not our hands been tied by the Permanent Settlement, we might at this moment have been in possesion of a revenue from the land "double what it now is." Nor is it any where stated that the general condition of the people is worse than in the other. On the contrary, looking to the above mentioned facts, to the great extension of cultivation throughout the Bengal Provinces, what, as has been affirmed, "is chiefly to be ascribed to the labour of the cultivators, and without any assistance from the Zemindars,"‖ and to the low comparative rate of taxation, to which the people would seem to be subject, which viewed as a capitation tax,¶ is only 3s. 1d. a head, while the latter is now less than 7s. 7d. or 150 per cent more, and that too, under every advantage in regard to soil and situation, markets and facility of communication; it may reasonably be inferred, not only that the reverse is the fact, but that the Madras territories have been drained of their resources and arrested in their power of advancing in wealth and prosperity.

But the friends of Ryutwar Settlements refer to Coimbatoor for the proof of the superiority of that description of revenue system over every other, which has been tried both as regards the Government and the people. It is, however, a question for consideration, whether the prosperity of that province is not rather to be attributed to the great reduction in the assessment, amounting, it is said, to no less than from 37 to 75 per cent of the aggregate jumma* added to its having enjoyed the rare and inestimable advantage of being under the management of the same and a very able collector, for the long period of fifteen years. A great reduction is stated to have been made of late also in the assessment of all the other districts of Madras under Ryutwar management.†

Impartially considered, indeed, the failures of so many of the Zemindaree Settlements, of the analagous one concluded in the Malabar Province with the Rajahs and Nairs, soon after it came into our possession, and of the Madras Triennial village settlements, all of which have been so often contrasted with the success attending Ryutwar Settlements‡ under that Presidency, as demonstrating their inferiority, prove nothing, as I humbly submit, as to the real merits or demerits of any one of them as systems. The whole of the one having been concluded upon terms confessedly higher than the country could bear, while "moderate rent" appears to have been the principle uniformly kept in the formation of the other, and that to which the improvement of the country, where it obtained, has in fact been mainly ascribed; (Fifth Report) hence the general failure of the former, and hence also, and to the rule so rigorously enforced, which required the Government engagers to produce a stipulated sum, within a "stipulated period" on pain of losing their lands, or of being deprived of their offices, may perhaps be deduced, as I have already urged, and without seeking for any other cause, most of the oppression which has been charged upon those systems as inseparable from their very nature. I cannot but think indeed, that much of the prepossession at home in favor of Ryotwar Settlements arises out of a doctrine sedulously incalculated in the writings of many of its advocates, that each ryut is "thus annually brought into contact with the European officer, who redresses all complaints," and personally fixes every man's assessment. Hence, as the character of the European for integrity stands so much higher than that of a native ministerial agency, to which the conduct of all detail is entirely entrusted under every other mode of Revenue management, this circumstance alone is very naturally held to be decisive of its superiority in many person's minds. A complete exposition, however, of the utter impracticability of any collector being able to descend to such minutiæ, will be found in Sir Thomas Munro's Report of the 30th of Sept., 1802, (vol. 1. Rev. Sel.) wherein he describes his own mode of procedure in making the annual revenue settlements of the Ceded districts, periodical settlements of the land revenue Ryutwar, as prevalent throughout the Madras districts, that is to say, on the detailed principle of individual assessments, regulated by the collectors and their cutcherry-servants, under the all-pervading influence of such a master mind as the late Sir Thomas Munro, may very possibly enlarge a collector's power of doing good, but experience would seem to be decidedly against their having any such effect in the hands of the ordinary agency at our command.*

I shall conclude by briefly recapitulating the substance of the principle of the foregoing observations, and which, as I would humbly submit, are put forth not in a spirit of anything like dogmatism, for I seek not dogmatically to maintain or demolish any set of opinions, but as mere hints for the consideration of those more competent than myself to determine, if they have any value, although even in that shape, I fear I shall hardly escape the charge of presumption.

First. That the most thorough knowledge of the rights and privileges of the ryuts, added to as precise a definition and limitation of their rents to the Zemindars, as of the payments of these last to the state, would in the long run have proved but a feeble security to the great majority of them, notorious as is their incapacity to pay any given rate of assessment, even the most moderate, for any length of time, without remission. Hence, as it was, and must necessarily be always, left to the discretion of the Zemindars to grant such abatements, or not as they thought proper, and the ryuts were liable to be ousted from their holdings, the instant they failed in paying what was legally due from them. Such a power must in itself have bade defiance to every other measure, that could have been resorted to for their protection, and hence the inference also, that if such a definition of rights and land tenures would have failed in proving for their preservation in regard to that part of the British dominions, which are permanently settled, it would equally fail under every other system of intermediate agency, which may hereafter be introduced into that still larger portion, which is now under fluctuating settlements.

Second. That the true solution of the oppression, said to have been suffered by the inferior tenantry, wherever a settlement on the Zemindaree principle has obtained, is the harsh and unbending terms, imposed upon the Zemindars and other Government managers, by our system of peremptory sale of their tenures whenever they fell into arrears, which, and not any spirit of avarice and rapacity drove them to practice "arbitrary and unmerciful" exaction, in the hope of thereby saving themselves and families from such impending ruin.

Third. That it was in direct opposition to their own interests to have acted towards the large body of the cultivators, so as to have driven them from their lands, because they would have lost, instead of gaining any thing, by getting other cultivators in their room.

Fourth. That the example of numberless great landholders elsewhere, likewise warrants the conclusion that, had our Zemindars, &c. not been under any such overruling necessity, their tenantry would not have had to complain of arbitrary and oppressive usage.

Fifth. That the success of the means proposed to be employed for compiling an accurate registry of the nature desired, is no less problematical, than the efficacy of such a document, supposing it to have been obtained, because of the numerous and fundamental errors, to which the minute and complex investigation therein involved, must be liable in the course of it, to say nothing of its enormous expense and the protracted period required to complete it.

Sixth. That, admitting such a record to have all the value, which has been claimed for it, and in many respects it would unquestionably be a very desirable document to possess, a system might be devised free from the same objections, and which for all practical purposes would answer equally well, and could be brought into immediate play, by means of certain modifications in the existing system of village accounts, which would render it the clear interest of the ryuts and proposed renters themselves to be the guardians of their own rights, in co-operation with the collectors, whose chief duty it should then be to exercise a close and unremitting superintendence over those accounts, "with a view of ensuring their accuracy and authenticity."

SUGGESTIONS OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT—QUALIFICATIONS OF A GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

My last number contained a slight sketch of the administration of Lord William Bentinck, in which was shown the little claim possessed by his Lordship to the character of a benefactor to the people of India. He certainly contrived to deceive the public as to his qualifications better perhaps than any Governor who has preceded him: for a long time, his splendid talents, unwearied application to business, and anxious desire to benefit the country under his dominion, were so universal a theme for admiration and applause, that all these valuable qualities seem to have been admitted without enquiry or reflection, while some of his admirers not content with awarding to him that portion of flattery which his situation might in some degree justify, "exalted him to the rank of a Hastings or a Wellesley." "Kahan Sona! Kahan Chandee?" to use a Hindostanee proverb, the two latter were as superior to Lord William as gold is to silver.

That Lord William to a certain extent meant well, and that he had a fair share of talent is not to be doubted. But his mind exhibits a strange mixture of what is symptomatic of greatness and of inferiority. Had his theatre of action been more limited, he might probably have filled it with propriety and effect, but as the planet that illumines its own sphere with sufficient radiance throws but a feeble ray upon the earth, so a man who could have ruled a small Island in the West Indies with credit and ability, might be found wholly inadequate to the Government of an empire like that of British India. For the execution of this great and responsible charge proportional powers are requisite; a mind of large and comprehensive force, capable of taking wide and general views of the range within its eye, with a facility of seizing upon points of importance and concentrating the force of its attention immediately upon them: great penetration and insight into character for the selection of appropriate instruments, together with a confidence in those employed, and a freedom from all jealousy of the power intrusted to their hands, satisfied to allow them a due share of authority, patronage and responsibility, from the conviction that such conduct could alone secure their attachment and cordial co-operation in the general good. To these qualifications must be added the ability to devise rules based upon broad foundations and sound principles, both for our political relations with foreign states, and for the administration of our internal Government —capable of drawing a clear and well defined outline, and leaving the detail to subordinate hands; while in personal intercourse and communication with those under authority, the greatest urbanity of manner and the most courteous demeanor should be exercised, so as to avoid all needless occasions of giving offence, and all indications of dislike or suspicion.

Such are some of the indispensable qualifications required for a Governor-General of India. They were possessed in an eminent degree by Lords Wellesley and Hastings; whereas, in many points, the very opposite are the characteristics of Lord William Bentinck. He wanted the enlargement of mind,—for we may look in vain through his administration for any acts directly and entirely emanating from himself which are indicative of a comprehensive intellect or enlightened views. An insight into character was peculiar both to Hastings and Wellesley: of the numbers of public officers who were selected for situations of responsibility by those noblemen, there is scarcely one who disappointed the expectations that were formed. Undoubtedly many inefficient officers were gradually raised to high appointments in the time of those two Governors, but these were cases with which personally they had nothing to do; it was the mere routine of an exclusive service. The very reverse has too often occurred under Lord William's administration. His suspicious temper and inordinate love of power induced him to reject the usual and obvious modes of ascertaining the character of the servants of Government; his overweening estimate of his own abilities for judging of the characters of others, led him to disregard all other opinions; and when he discovered that he had neither the means for ascertaining who were really worthy or unworthy of his own personal investigation, he was driven to adopt the espoinage system. The result of all this, added to his pertinacity in adhering to an opinion or resolution once formed, whether right or wrong, has been that a greater proportion of inefficient men have been promoted, and men of ability neglected than in the times of Wellesley, Hastings, or even Amherst: a natural consequence of the effect of secret reports and the influence of spies, who of course did not lose the opportunity to serve their friends and injure those whom they disliked. These great defects in Lord William's character clogged and retarded the proceedings of Government in a great degree. Councillors, Secretaries, Boards, Commissioners, and other functionaries were gradually stripped of their authority; none of them were deemed fit to be trusted:—they had all some improper object in view. Every thing must be referred to himself,* he alone being free from taint and capable of forming a judgment, and issuing the necessary orders. The result was that much was left undone. Lord William's harsh measures were also rendered still more grating by the ungracious manner in which they were carried into effect; while the unfeeling remarks† by which they were sometimes accompanied are still too fresh in the minds of my readers; and however highly Lord William may stand in the estimation of his few admirers, I believe the general opinion of mankind will be found correct, that he has himself a low and mean opinion of human nature, is with few exceptions, devoid of elevation or generosity of mind,—and that where individuals are found to entertain such opinions, a real knowledge of mankind would deter from the expression of them from the danger, (seldom imaginery) that thereby men might be rendered dishonest who neither were nor otherwise would have been so. Again, instead of guiding his conduct by general rules and principles of enlarged bearing, Lord William's time was occupied by all sorts of petty details. In fact these were alone within the scope of his genius. With regard to economy for instance, his whole forte consisted in making deductions from salaries; discharging a few poor clerks, or uniting two offices in one, making one person do the work of both (at least issuing orders to that effect) without any regard to the dissimilarity of the employments, or the amount of duty which devolved on the officer, though it might be beyond the physical powers of two or three. To adopt a more enlightened system of taxation; to create a property in land, (which in the western provinces has no real existence) and devise some measure for checking that curse of the country—equal division of landed property between sons or co-heirs—by which every landed family is in the course of two or three generations reduced to pauperism. In short to adopt any measure except such as promised immediate apparent benefit, was quite beyond Lord William Bentinck's reach. We cannot have a stronger instance than the retention of the Inland Customs and transit duties. The facts and documents published by Mr. Trevelyan nearly two years ago, demonstrated to the satisfaction of all unprejudiced minds, that by abolishing the numerous Inland Custom Houses, and levying toll only at a few grand outlets, the ultimate net revenue in that branch would be greater than it now is; while the deterioration, which is, under such a withering system, progressively encreasing of internal commerce, trade, and manufactures, would at once be checked, and that these sources of national and individual prosperity would be revived.

* In several instances when small sums were applied for to repair bridges or works of a public nature, Lord William's reply was to wait till he arrived in his tour when he would inquire into the matter.

† On one occasion one of the Secretaries recommended to Lord William that some token of approbation should be bestowed on a Native who at his own expense had made a road of several miles: fearing Lord William had forgotten it, the Secretary mentioned it a second time; on which Lord William turned on him with a peculiar sneer and said, "you seem particularly interested in the matter."

On another a public officer was recommending the appointment of a person to superintend the making of the road: Lord William said "some friend of yours being just ready for the place." I do not vouch for the exact words; but the anecdotes are known to hundreds.

All this might be very true, but there was one evil annexed to the plan, viz., that although the ultimate benefit both to the people and to Government was certain, yet the probability is that for the first two, or perhaps three years after the introduction of the plan, there may be a falling off the revenue. This was enough. To adopt a measure of which the benefit should not appear till the time of his successor, and to face the Court of Directors with a deficit in his balance sheet, directly caused by an act of his own, was more than Lord William's moral courage was equal to.

It is, however, useless any longer to dilate on the many opportunities overlooked by Lord William to earn for himself the character of a really enlightened statesman. Many have already been pointed out in former numbers of these papers, and others will appear in the suggestions about to be advanced; we have waited till the close of his administration in the hope that some measures for the good of the country and the improvement of the Government should be promulgated, and our hopes are disappointed. From the experience we have had of Lord William's conduct in this country, it can hardly, I think, be considered an unfair conclusion, that though he might have been fully competent to the government of a petty insular territory, of which he could make the tour in a week, visit every office, examine every accompt book and discover some small overcharge in the articles of daily use in the office, he certainly does not possess the talents or qualifications requisite for the government of an Empire like that of British India. We have now had the experiment made of the busy, meddling governor of detail. It is to be hoped for the sake of the people that our next may be of a different stamp more from the mould of a Hastings or a Wellesley, or that if these hopes are too exalted, that at least we may be favored with a quiet, passive individual like Lord Amherst, who will sit in council and leave the conduct of affairs to those whose experience is better able to conduct them.* Our present locum tenens, Sir Charles Metcalfe, not being at all secure in his present situation, and uncertain how long he may hold it, will not perhaps be inclined to commence operations which it is doubtful how far the new Governor may approve. Nevertheless, there is a considerable field for him to leave a good name behind him.

Let us now proceed to offer a few suggestions for the Governor and Councils, both ordinary and legislative: and first I would make a remark on the question that has been so frequently asked of late, viz., "when will the Government learn to rule the country for the benefit of the people?" It is a question much more easily asked than answered. To do this would indeed produce a new era in the history of British India, for it would be diametrically opposite to the fundamental principle which has hitherto been the guide of our rule, viz., to realize the largest possible revenue and to provide for as many as possible of the relations of the Court of Directors. I do not deny, indeed I have repeatedly allowed that our rulers had no objection to the well being and good government of the people, nay even that they were well and kindly disposed towards them, provided it did not interfere with the primary object. Perhaps it may be urged that it is a sound and recognized axiom that the interests of the people of any country and of their rulers are one, or in plain English, that no nation can thrive under a bad government, the ultimate result being the impoverishment of the people and diminution of the government revenue. This is all very true, and is well known to many of our successive Governors, and were it the custom to keep the same Governor-General for twenty years, and the same Collector an equal length of time in the same district, sounder principles would ere this probably have been reduced to practice.

But the misfortune is that no one connected with the government has any permanent interest in benefiting the country or the people. India has hitherto been like a rack-rented estate, in which the farms are let at high rents for short leases. It is to no purpose that you urge on the farmer who is over cropping his land—"If you allow it to lie fallow for a couple of years and spend so much in manuring it the third, this farm which now yields barely a return of five fold, would, for several years after, produce nine fold; whereas under your present system it will shortly cease to be worth cultivating." The farmer replies: "This is very true, but my lease is only for three years; the chance of renewal is doubtful, so I must make what I can." This is precisely the case in India. Say to a Collector, "this assessment is too high, if you make a small reduction in the revenue of this settlement, for the first five years, the land will ultimately pay more than you receive under your present plan." "I am fully aware of this," replies the Collector, "but if I adopted your suggestion, I should be deemed inefficient, and lose all chance of promotion, whereas I hope to have received some other appointment before the mischief will be apparent." Propose the same to Commissioners, Boards of Revenue, &c. the reply will be much the same. Suggest to the Courts and Judges any measures for the improvement of justice. Some have not time to deliberate on them; others do not like to recommend them should they involve any extra expense; and all and each comfort themselves with the idea "it will last my time," and few care what happens afterwards. Go to the head of the Government and the same feeling prevails, of which Lord William Bentinck and the internal Customs and Transit Duties already alluded to, is a memorable example.

The time however is now arrived when this short-sighted and ruinous policy must be abandoned and wiser measures adopted. Direct taxation has been pushed to the utmost; if we continue to shake the tree without allowing the fruit to ripen, instead of obtaining that we seek we shall only break the branches and injure the trunk, and render it less productive the ensuing season. We must be content to leave a little to the influence of the sun and moisture and incur a slight expense in fencing round the garden and manuring the trees; and thus to drop metaphor, instead of grasping at once at every thing which lies within our reach—land, goods, and cattle to swell the amount of present revenue,—we must establish security of property, especially of landed property, which, as has been before asserted, does not at present virtually exist in the Western Provinces: we should allow the people a sufficient profit and interest in the land, so that they may anticipate the prospect of reaping some benefit themselves from the introduction of a better system of husbandry: we should rescue trade and manufactures from the low ebb to which they have been reduced by our grasping and injudicious Transit Duties; and we should place the Civil and Criminal administration on a footing which will not only dispense justice between man and man, but between Government and individuals. This done, affairs may then be left to private skill and enterprize; for the natives, notwithstanding all that is said of their bigotted adherence to old customs, will not be slow to follow the example of improvement which may be set them by European settlers, and there will then be a field for these which at present does not exist: and here, I cannot help remarking on the great difference both of the cause and the result of increase of revenue in England and in India. In the former country, it is a legitimate source of satisfaction to a minister: if it have occurred without any alteration of the taxes, it demonstrates that the people are better off than they were before: if it be in consequence of any alteration in the taxes, or of the diminution of the tax upon any particular articles, it is a proof of the minister's sagacity in making arrangements which raised the revenue at the same time that the burden on the people has been lessened, while smuggling has perhaps been diminished. In short, setting aside an artificial state of things arising from high taxes and high prices during a war, the increase of revenue in England can only, generally speaking, arise from the encreased prosperity of the people. In India it is unhappily the very reverse. Upon the system which has hitherto prevailed, an encrease of revenue has only been produced by taking so much more from the people and leaving them so much the poorer. The main revenue is raised by a direct tax upon the land, and the only limit as yet has been the ability of the people to pay; or in other words, we have gone on progressively raising our demands until the people refuse to retain or to cultivate their lands; and not till it has come to this pitch has the Government even thought of fixing any limit on that direct tax. Other direct taxes are raised to an immense extent by a monopoly on salt, one of the necessaries of life, and by a tax on law proceeding. Both of these have been pushed to an extent which falls with very great hardship on the poorer classes. I allow, however, and am rejoiced to perceive it, that better principles are beginning to be acted upon. In the settlement that is now making for a period of twenty years, the Board are desirous to leave a fair share of profit to the cultivators, and several individuals high in office are anxious to introduce a better system of internal government. I only hope that the Supreme Government will move forward voluntarily, and not wait until the people are roused to remedy their own wrongs.

And now let me be allowed to proceed with suggestions, which although from an anonymous pen, are offered by one who has lived much among the people and observed closely; so that at least they have experience and personal investigation in their favor. It is probable that some of them may be only a repetition of what has been already advanced in former papers, but as these have been by no means generally read, to repeat them may not be superfluous to present readers, nor indeed may it be wholly amiss to refresh the memory of those in power who may have given attention to my former remarks. The suggestions are numbered simply for convenience of reference; some of them I shall discuss in this paper—others will be treated separately.

First.—To provide for the due administration of the existing laws. This, as I have elsewhere remarked, is the more necessary, because among all the complaints, which have been both numerous and just, a sufficient distinction has never yet been drawn between what is chargeable on the defects of the laws, and what should be imputed to their non-execution from the insufficiency of the judicial establishments. Until the latter be remedied, we are quite unable to form a judgment whether our laws be good or bad, or in what points they require revision and consolidation. Till then, codification or any other labours of the Law Commission will be thrown away.

Hitherto revenue having been the chief object, the revenue line was the only one in which, with few exceptions, a public officer had any chance of rising to distinction. The Civil-Judicial department had until the last three years been completely neglected; the Police and Criminal received at first considerable attention, but this has woefully deteriorated, while the Civil Courts have advanced in improvement. The cause is that so often complained of, the inefficiency of the establishments for administering the affairs of the country. In our Indian legislation we usually run from one extreme to the other: we do not make proper provision for executing the laws, and when the evil has arisen to such a height that some remedy is indispensable, one department has generally been relieved at the expense of another. Formerly, in each district one man was Civil Judge and Magistrate, and another styled Collector, was to superintend the assessment and collection of the land rent. When it became absolutely necessary to provide for the administration of civil justice (for in reality there was none under the old system) a very excellent plan both in its theory and practice was devised, which has been described in No. 23, and others of these papers. But instead of creating an efficient Police establishment, the Magistracy was annexed to the Collectorship, and it was said that every Collector should have a Deputy between whom and himself some proper distribution of the duties should be made. This promised to be better than the old system, but as regards the Revenue and Police, the practical application has been a complete failure. The absurd plan of making the Collector-Magistrate responsible in both departments, and the vanity and love of power which induced the Collectors in many instances to centre all authority in themselves, reduced the Deputies to mere assistants who were expected to work hard, and in reality perform a large share of the duty, while the Collectors were to reap all the credit. The natural result of such a state of affairs ensued: the Deputies have taken little or no interest in their duties, and though fine sounding paragraphs have been penned about "sense of duty," "consulting the interests of government" and others of a similar description, I believe few, if any, instances could be produced of a Collector-Magistrate and his Deputy working together with real cordiality for the benefit of the people. The Collector's chief object has been the revenue duties, and the Police has been left to shift for itself, while a considerable portion of the time of the Collector's was occupied in making out forms, and drawing up Police reports, which prevented his giving undivided attention to revenue concerns.

The result has been that these have been too much neglected, while the Police is rapidly falling into a state of complete disorganization. Crimes are on the increase, particularly the gang robberies in Bengal Proper, which unless checked will ere long rival in numbers and atrocity those which were perpetrated between the years 1804 and 1809. Some of my readers will be startled at this assertion, and refer in refutation to the periodical statements of crimes forwarded by the Magistrates, which show a considerable diminution during the last year or two. Were these to be depended on, they would be conclusive; if we could believe the statements and forms, the Police would appear to be in a higher state of efficiency than at any previous period, whereas all those behind the scenes who are really acquainted with the state of things, are perfectly aware that the contrary is the case. The simple fact is that these statements are utterly incorrect, or in plain English false, i. e. they do not show nearly the number of crimes really committed. It is one of the mistakes of the latter years of Lord William's government to substitute forms, returns and statements for an efficient system. Among the people his government has been known by the name of "nuksha-roj" or "Government of forms." The reliance that has been placed upon these returns, and the use that has been made of them is highly absurd, in some places the strength of the Police has been reduced; in others the business has been vested in the Tuhseeldars (subordinate native revenue officers) while in no district has the Collector-Magistrate sufficient leisure to pay proper attention to this part of his duty. A bad season will generally produce an increase of crime;—other local or temporary causes may have the same effect;—no matter what the reason might be, that was rarely investigated; but should one half yearly report exhibit a greater number of crimes than the preceding, the Collector-Magistrate, as a matter of course, received a reprimand, which he sub-divided among his Police officers; while should the amount of crime be less, a letter of approbation was dispatched to the District officers. The native Police officers have been knowing enough to profit by the hint, and for the last year, or year and half, the periodical returns from most districts exhibit a progressive decrease of crime, only a small proportion of those committed being registered.

Nevertheless, with all these concomitant disadvantages, the new system was a decided improvement on the old; and the country has suffered less injury from the deterioration of the Police arrangements than from the non-existence of any civil administration. The annihilation of credit and consequent injury to commerce and agriculture resulting from the latter was an evil which the people had no means of remedying: the absence of a good Police can, in a considerable degree, be provided for by the establishment of watches among themselves, and it is probable that when the Police shall have proceeded a few steps farther in its progressive disorganization, the people will altogether take the matter into their own hands.

In the mean time, wherever the Civil Judges were efficient men and attentive to their duty, the Courts began to resuscitate, and something like justice was attainable; and in the course of two or three years more, provided some requisite alterations were made in the laws, the civil administration promised to be on a footing which would leave little reasonable ground of complaint. But all this is likely to be marred by Lord William's notion of economising, and the anomalous remedies which are in such high esteem with the British Indian Government. The number of Commissioners (who were placed each over two, three, or four districts, according to their size, to supervise the revenue and police establishments) was reduced; consequently they could not perform the duties required. This is to be remedied by transferring any or all of their Police duties to the Civil Judges. The Collector and his assistants are too much occupied with revenue matters to attend to the Magistracy department, and the Sudder Ameens are employed in investigating and deciding the most petty criminal complaints, to the great neglect of their civil duties, which are of infinitely more importance; so that if this plan be persevered in, the Civil Courts will ere long be in as bad a state as they were three years ago.

It is high time, that these patch-work expedients should be thrown aside, and that the administration of the country should be once for all put upon a different system. To do this, the Civil, Criminal, and Police departments should be made almost entirely distinct. The frame work of the Civil administration, as far as regards courts and offices, is very good, and I would not propose any alteration in it at present. Some little improvement is required in the laws and rules of practice, and if this be done, and the courts once cleared of all arrears, there will be but little ground for complaint on this head, and at least we shall be able to see where the defects pointed out lie. It would greatly tend to the improvement of the Civil administration if the Judges were not only allowed but obliged to make the tour of their respective districts once a year, and inspect the conduct of the subordinate judicial officers, who reside at a distance from the head station.

The Police and Magisterial department must be entirely separate from the collection of the revenue. In every district there should be a Magistrate with one head Assistant. By this means the Magistrate could be continually making the tour of his district, leaving the head Assistant to conduct the current duties of the office. Sometimes the management might be reversed, the latter being deputed to make some local enquiry or investigation, while the Magistrate would remain at head-quarters. The junior Assistant should attend sometimes on one, sometimes on the other of those two officers, and should also be entrusted to decide petty cases, or make enquiries in matters of more serious import. The chief utility of such an employment is as a school wherein young men should learn their duties; were such a system as this established, the native Police officers (kotwals and thanadars) might be entrusted with higher powers than they now possess, and might be allowed to decide some petty cases, such as disputes regarding tresspasses of cattle and others on the spot, instead of obliging the people to proceed perhaps fifty miles to the Magistrate. The respectable landholders might be also entrusted with certain Police powers, and by a little tact on the part of the Magistrates would be easily induced to give their assistance,—this would enable Government to reduce the number of constables and other inferior police functionaries, and from the saving effected here, the pay of the higher class (kotwals and thanadars) might be increased, by which those offices would be filled by a more respectable description of people, while the constant visits of the Magistrate would deter them from abusing their authority. But this head will of itself furnish materials for a paper.

With regard to the higher crimes, could we ensure the appointment of Magistrates of sufficient abilities and experience, so as to render them fit to be intrusted with such powers, it would be a great convenience to all connected with a criminal prosecution, if sentences in all cases were at once pronounced by the Magistrates: but it will not probably be deemed expedient to allow them to decide finally in higher crimes than are at present under their cognizance, all heinous offences must therefore be committed for trial, and when the Civil Judge has time for this duty, he is perhaps the best person to hold the Sessions; for being on the spot it is done without delay; and so much improved is this branch of the administration, that on the average the period of detention in jail between commital and trial does not exceed a fortnight. This, therefore, may remain as it is.

Another point to be provided for is some tribunal of appeal from the orders and decisions of Magistrates. Formerly this existed in the Courts of Appeal; latterly in the Commissioners; but the distance which the parties are often obliged to travel, (a hundred or even two hundred miles) is a great hardship; and it is now proposed to constitute the Civil and Sessions Judges Courts of Appeal from the decisions of Magistrates. This will give great facilities to the appellants, and form a very good check on the conduct of the Magistrates; nor do I think that it would entail much increase of business on the Judge, not more than could be provided for by vesting the Principal Sudder Ameens, and Sudder Ameens with more authority than they now possess, so as to relieve the Judge of a corresponding portion of civil duty.

But to vest the whole of the Police duties now exercised by the Commissioners in the Civil Judges will be absurd for two reasons; in the first place, it will overload those officers with work more than they can perform; and in the second, we shall have as many different system of Police as there are Judges. This has been the rock on which Holt Makenzie's plan of Commissioners of Revenue, Circuit and Police has fallen to pieces: to controul and supervise the Police arrangements, the best plan would probably be to revive the abolished appointments of superintendents of Police, who would correspond with, and receive their instructions direct from Government: there should not be less than three, for the Lower, the Central, and Western Provinces; and the most efficient men among the Magistrates should be selected to hold the situations.

There remains for consideration the Revenue branch, and this may be much simplified: at present there are three grades: the Boards, Commissioners, and Collectors of districts. The Boards are useful in the same point of view that superintendents of Police are required in that department: the grade of Commissioners is a perfectly useless and anomalous one. If they are invested with much authority they leave the Boards nothing to do; and if not, they are mere clogs on the business. At first, they did possess authority, almost equal to the Boards, consequently these higher powers found their functions usurped, and the mischief was that every Commissioner had a system of his own; and at every change (which were but too frequent,) every Collector was obliged to learn a new mode of doing business: the Boards have consequently gradually deprived the Commissioners of all real authority. The latter functionaries are become mere channels of communication between the Boards and the Collectors, and business is consequently greatly delayed. Yet they have much to do, being obliged monthly to fill reams of paper with forms, statements, reports and letters, all which are of no practical utility whatever; and while they are not allowed any real power they are made the scape goats of the Boards and of Judicial Secretaries to wear the blame of whatever goes wrong, either in the Revenue or Police affairs. Their Sessions duties, in which alone they were of any real use, have been transferred to the Civil Judges; they are to lose their Police jurisdiction; and, in Revenue they are worse than useless: so that the sooner the office of Commissioner is abolished the better. There are at present eighteen Commissioners. The expense of these would far more than provide for a third Board of Revenue for the Upper Provinces. The superintendents of Police, and the small encrease that would be necessary for the Magistracy; and I am convinced that the business of those departments would be infinitely better conducted than it is at present. The supernumeraries meantime may be appointed to the Sudder and District Courts, as additional Judges (provided they be qualified) to assist in clearing off the existing arrears.

For each district, one Collector and one covenanted assistant will be sufficient, with the addition of a native Deputy Collector, that is, under the present system; hereafter the number of officers may be curtailed when there shall exist any private property in land, and some limit to British Indiaa extortion.

With regard to the routine of the service, i. e. by what steps a man shall ascend to the respective situations, this is a matter of some difficulty, and may hereafter be discussed.

I shall only now observe that Government should beware of allowing the Police administration to sink into annihilation and of degrading the Civil branch, as they have latterly shewn too much inclination to do. Here we have another of the British Indian anomalies. We have at length devised a very good ground plan for raising the superstructure of the Civil administration: but it contains some new principles, particularly that of bringing forward the natives. It might have been supposed that some pains would have been taken to select men for Judges who were well qualified, so as to give the system a fair trial. No such thing. Individuals of every variety of qualifications have been made Civil Judges, and as the revenue is still the main object, most of the men of talent are placed in that line, and whenever a Collector or Commissioner is found inefficient, he is appointed to be Civil and Sessions Judge; so that it is beginning to be considered a mark of disgrace to be placed in that situation which ought to be an object of ambition; and when the people complain that they cannot obtain justice, the cry is "this is the consequence of employing the natives." Shame on such disgraceful proceedings!—by a Government, too, who are pleased to boast of the blessings they confer upon the people! God help the latter if they are never to receive any greater blessings than they have yet obtained at the hands of the English!

Some alteration, too, should be made in the law which authorises the Magistrate to employ the Sudder Ameens in Criminal business. Their Civil duties are of great importance, and the authority entrusted to them considerable; yet this is to be neglected, and their time occupied in hearing the most petty Magisterial business. But this paper has been extended to a sufficient length, and the succeeding remarks must be deferred to a future number.

A FRIEND TO INDIA.

LIEUTENANT TREVELYAN'S MISSION.

The objects of the mission are, we understand, 1st, the adjustment of some border disputes between the Buhawulpore and Jeysulmere authorities; 2nd, the reconciliation of a long standing feud between Jeysulmere and Bikaneer; for which purpose it is proposed that a meeting should take place between the two chiefs, some where on their common frontier; 3rd, the distribution amongst the inhabitants of certain villages in the Jeysulmere territory of the compensation money awarded to them for the injuries they, some time ago, sustained by an incursion from Joudpore; 4th, the determination of the conflicting claims advanced by Joudpore and Jeysulmere to the tract called Mewa, (including Balmere, the new Bombay station,) from the chiefs of which both states demand tribute, allegiance and service; 5th and last, the conveying some wholesome counsel to Maun Sing of Joudpore, connected with the fulfilment of his engagements with our Government.

Lieutenant Boileau, an intelligent officer of Engineers, accompanies Lieutenant Trevelyan, for the purpose of adding to our stock of geographical knowledge; but both of course will have the means of acquiring much useful information besides, in regard to the statistics of the country, the manners and habits of the various tribes with whom they will be brought in contact, and the military resources of the several Governments, &c. &c.—So that very important results may be expected from the mission. We hope to be able, through the kindness of our friends, to keep the public informed of the progress of these travellers:—

"We quitted Patun on the 26th January, and in three days reached Oodipoor, a considerable town, the position of which is particularly important in a military point of view, for though totally unfortified, it commands a narrow and rocky defile called the Baghora Ghat, which is the only pass into Shekhawattee from the eastward by way of Khandela, or Gohala. The Jodpoora-Sonaree pass, or Kakreo Ghat is 15 miles to the north-east, and the Jhalra or Bajor pass is about the same distance to the south-west of Oodipoor, nor is there any praticable road for artillery between these two places, (Kakres and Jhalra,) except the said Baghora Ghat, by which the Jeypoor armies used generally to find their way into Shekhawattee. We halted a couple of days at Oodipoor and reached Nuwulghur in two short marches, the whole of our route from Patun being through a well watered and tolerably fertile country, where the wells are not so deep as to prevent the cultivators of the soil from raising an abundant rubee harvest. At Nuwulgure "a change came over the spirit" of the land, and told us in most intelligible language that we had exchanged the fertile vallies of Tourawattee for the Juagulee, sandy, thirsty soil of the Bagur, which rejoices in desperately steep sand hills, and unpleasantly deep wells; where the very name of wheat or gram is a rarity, and sharp thorns or burs are abundant enough. We made no halt at Nuwulgurh, though it is a flourishing city, neatly fortified, and boasting of four jolly looking Thakoors who rival Sir John Faltsaff both in fat and good humour.

From Nuwulgurh we made two marches to Futtehpoor, an old mussulman capital on the western frontier of Shekhawatee, where we halted two days and examined the fort and city. The latter is surrounded by a low and weak wall of stone, but the citadel is very respectable, defended by lofty ramparts, a fause braye and pucka ditch. About a hundred years have passed away since the Shekhawuts dispossessed the Kaim Kkanees, by whose Nawab these towers were raised, and the descendant of that prince is still in exile, dependent for his subsistence upon the Goojur Rajas of Rewaree. The amil of Futtehpoor was in confinement during the time of our stay there, preparatory to being squeezed, and probably would not be sorry to exchange his present master, the Rao Raja of Seekur, for the old Kaimkanee Nawab.

The mission quitted Futtehpoor on the 6th February, and remained two or three days at Ramgurh, a frontier town of very flourishing appearance, neatly fortified and filled with the mansions of wealthy bankers, whose fleeces have as yet suffered little from the generally unsparing shears of the Shekhawuts. The Seekur authorities seem to have found out that levying heavy fines upon the merchants of Ramgurh would cause them speedily to vacate the country, and thus kill the goose which laid the only golden eggs in their country. Ramgurh is seven kos north of Futtehpoor, and about the same distance south of Chooroo, once a flourishing city in the Beekaner territory, but its trade has been lost for years, and its merchants have made themselves scarce.

We now quitted the Shekhawatee frontier and entered the Beekaner territory, encamping at Rutungurh on the 9th of February, and halting there on the following day. The city is surrounded by a low stone wall, with a diminutive citadel perched upon a sandhill in its S. E. angle; the bazaars are neatly laid out and have a respectable appearance, though the city is small, and can barely number more than seven hundred houses. Being the property of Government, or a khalsa town, it was deemed fitting by the Rutungurh authorities to stuff all our followers with sweetmeats, and rations of various kinds were accordingly served out during the two days of our stay at this place.

We left Rutungurh on the 11th February, and marched in eight days to Beekaner by easy stages of 5, 6, and 7 kos (from 8 to 13 miles) the whole distance being only 45 kos from Rutungurh, with no intermediate place of sufficient interest to detain us, so we marched to the capital by way of Reeree and Badinoo without making a halt at any of our resting places.

The roads were far better than we anticipated, and the face of the country was greatly improved in appearance after we reached Reeree: the sand hills were less numerous, the jungul was thinner, and the ground was covered for miles with the dried stems of bajra, indicating an abundant autumn crop. Notwithstanding the comparatively flourishing appearance of the country there was, however, "an outward and visible sign" of our proximity to the great desert, which there was no mistaking, namely, the exceeding depth of the wells, which increased rapidly from little more than 100 feet (at Futtehpoor) to 240 and 270, and even 290 feet as we moved westward. Occasionally, where the water was brackish, we were supplied with drinking water from koonds or pits in which the rain is caught and preserved, but in such small quantities as only to be used on emergency. Forage and provisions were also procured in abundance by our very intelligent attendant, the Beekaner vakeel, who allowed us to want nothing that could be procured to make us comfortable.

We arrived at Beekaner on the 18th February, and a large deputation of respectable men, headed by the Minister, came out two kos from the capital to meet the Mission, and escorted the representative of British authority with all due honor as far as his camp, which was pitched at a little grove of ber trees by a well of excellent water (called Umritsir) about quarter of a kos south-east of the citadel and three quarters of a mile east of the city. Our arrival was immediately reported to the Maharaja, and then came an inundation of sweetmeats to show his hospitality to the new comers. The groceries of Beekaner are celebrated, and not without reason; for the confections of sugar prepared in various ways for us on this occasion, were the finest I ever saw, though I have visited many Native Courts, and have a tolerable sweet tooth. The sepoys, servants, and camp followers were all feasted after their degree (like the clansmen at Glennaquich where the claret never circulated "below the salt") and so liberal were the distributors of the good things, that I began to anticipate a surfeit among the people which might have brought sickness into the camp; for Mr. Elphinstone lost nearly 40 men before he quitted Beekaner. We are more fortunate, however, and have not a single sick man.

On the 19th February, the day after our arrival, we went to pay a visit of ceremony to the Maharaja, and were well satisfied with the first view of the Durbar, which has been confirmed by subsequent visits. The ceremonial of meeting was arranged in a very satisfactory manner, being conducted almost on the same scale as if the Governor-General's Agent were himself present. His Assistant was received beyond the outworks of the citadel by Raja Luchmun Singh, brother of the Maharaja Rutun Singh, with a large concourse of mace bearers and men at arms; after a courteous greeting he turned back to lead us into the fort, and the entrée was announced by a thundering salute of 13 guns, which was repeated on our quitting that place. Our own followers made a very respectable figure in the procession, there being a couple of Shootur suwars with half a dozen chuprasees, and 30 or 40 sepoys in advance, while a dozen and a half of Blair's horse brought up the rear. Onward we swept amid the thundering of cannon and rattling of drums, all the cavaliers dismounting according to etiquette at the outer gate, except the Raja Luchmun Singh and the two European gentlemen, who rode to the foot of the palace steps. After dismounting we were met at the beginning of the inner court by the heir of Beekaner, Kuwur Sirdar Singh, and finally the Maharaja Rutun Singh himself, though suffering much from bodily ailment, hirpled to the door of his hall of audience by the aid of a crutch-headed stick, and gave the sahib log a most courteous reception. The meeting passed off very pleasantly, and after sitting about half an hour in the presence, we were dismissed without any of the cumbrous display of shawls and other finery formerly paraded in kishtees, or trays to be looked at but not accepted, (a piece of pseudo-hospitality now happily exploded) instead of which we were sent on our way rejoicing in a simple "suffumigation" as Dousterswivel calls it, of attur and paun.

On the 21st February the visit was returned, in Mr. Trevelyan's tent, by the two Princes, Sirdar Singh and Luchmun Singh, the state of the Maharaja's health being a very sufficient excuse for his non-appearance. The ceremonies were conducted pretty much in the same way as on the former occasion, except that the four chief persons were seated on chairs instead of on the ground, and a silver throne, with a brigade of guns were sent from the fort for the special accommodation of the heir-apparent, seeing that such articles were scarce commodities in the feringhee camps. I went out half way to the palace with all the suwars by way of istikbal.—(N. B. The mace bearers bael but the sticks do not!) and accompanied them to within a few paces of the tent where the guard of honor was drawn up to form a street before the door, and here they dismounted from their palkees and were ushered into the tent by the political functionary in person.

This visit passed off very pleasantly, like the preceding one, and gave us some insigh into the manners and characters of these simple Rahtores, whose court seems to be the very model of peace and quietness, in spite of the noise made by their guns and drums. Numerous subsequent visits to the palace have confirmed this first impression, and the case has been the same during our frequent strolls through the city. The crowds wh used to surround the tents to look at the fe ringhee were remarkably quiet in their demeanor and gazed in silent wonder at the necromancer-like operations of taking meridian altitudes of the sun, &c. In a similar manner they crowded round us in the city "opening the eyes of curiosity, and the mouth of astonishment:" but still they were silent and respectful in their demeanour, though clustering like bees near the theodolite that was occasionally set up upon their ramparts.

The city of Beekaner is of considerable extent, and tolerably flourishing in appearance, containing about ten thousand houses, the better sort of which are entirely faced with richly carved red stone, quarried at Khareed, 20 kos N. N. E. of this place, and the poorer kind of houses are carefully painted with a sort of red ochre, which is found on the spot in abundance, and gives the town an appearance of great neatness and uniformity, the walls being all red and the doors and windows white. There are eighteen wells, 240 feet deep, within the shahur punah, which is 3½ miles in circuit, with five gates and three sallyports; the whole is of stone, with a ditch on three sides only, the south-side of the city being intersected by deep ravines, which have broken up the whole esplanade in that quarter. The soil in the immediate neighbourhood is an exceedingly hard kunkur, strewed with flinty pebbles rounded by the action of water, so that there is little or no cultivation under the walls. The citadel which contains the palace is quite detached from the city, lying half a mile to the north east of it, and is well fortified. It has lofty stone ramparts with a pukka veree or fausse braye, and ditch, about three quarter mile in circuit, with two gates, one of which leads to the stable court and the eastern one to the palace yard. Out-side the citadel on its N. E. angle is a tank (now dry) faced with masonry, 200 yards long and 140 broad, called "Soorut Sagur," and on the north side is a deep earthern tank, containing a little water, which has obtained, and fully deserves, the emphatic name "Gundanee" or stinking.

The private apartments in the palace are so exquisitely ornamented, that they really deserve a minute description, particularly the Seesh Muhul of the Raja Gai Singh, the throne room of the late Raja Soorut Singh, and the sleeping apartments of the present Raja Ruttun. The Guj Muhul contains two large chambers with some small closets, forming a compact suit of rooms; the outer chamber being sheeted with mirrors tastefully separated into different compartments by gilt frames of Arabesque devices in bas relief, which look very rich without being at all tawdry. The lower pannels are in imitation of precious mosaic, with a specimen of real work, which was probably discontinued from the immense expense, like the unfinished window in the palace of Aladdin upon which all the jewels of the royal treasury were in vain exhausted. The device for representing mosaic is very ingenious, the whole surface of the wall being encrusted with stucco made of marble lime, worked into beautifully variegated forms in the interstices of which small mirrors and coloured foils are so disposed as to give the exact effect of precious stones inlaid in white marble. The inner chamber is almost entirely covered with this kind of work, which appears very fresh, though executed 60 or 70 years ago. Rich glass lustres, and other handsome embellishments give these apartments a truly regal appearance.

The throne room of Maharaja Soorut Singh was only completed about the time of that prince's death, and consequently has been little used. Its walls are richly ornamented with flowery bas reliefs of gold, traced upon a red ground, the general effect of which is very pleasing, though not so splendid as the apartments already described. In the sleeping chamber of the Maharaja I was particularly struck with the bold figures in alto-relievo, representing the various Avatars, Bhudree Nath, &c., richly painted and gilt: a long panoramic hunting piece surrounded the upper part of another room, representing the shikaree suwaree of elephants, very richly painted; and in another place the white beadings that ran round a small alcove were entirely composed of doves wrought in bas relief, which had a very neat effect: some of the pannels were laboriously painted in imitation of the tomb of Shah Jehan at Agra, and the result was very successful, for the colours stand well as they are not at all exposed to the weather. The Raja's painter, now at Beekaner, is a clever artist, who executes miniatures in the style of those exhibited at Delhi, where the very jewels that adorn the person and embroidered figures that give variety to the brocade have their fac similes taken off by the patient fingers and acute eye of the limner.

Among the memorabilia of Beekaner ought to be mentioned the place called Devee Koond, 2½ kos east of the city where the deceased Rajas of Beekaner are burned, and their monuments built as the Rajas of Bhurtpoor were wont to do at Govurdhun. Some of the chutrees are built entirely of the white marble of Mukrana in Marwar, and the rest are of red sandstone, elegantly chiselled though partaking a little of the ponderous style generally observed in the quadrangular jam temples called Chourasee. Many of the monuments have a slab of white marble standing upright beneath the central dome, with the effigies of the deceased prince, wives and such female slaves as performed sutee with him. Some of these tables are crowded with figures, but it is worthy of notice that the numbers of those devoted women who braved the fire for their departed master's names' sake are becoming fewer and fewer at every succeeding generation. One of the worthies whose ashes repose at the Devee Koond was accompanied to the pile by 84 sutees: another had 18: others less and less, until at last the late Maharaja Soorut Singh was gathered to his fathers without a single sutee sharing his funeral pile. The last that occurred was nine years ago when the late Raja's second son, Xuwur Motee Singh, an exceedingly fine young man, was burned with his widow, a princess of Oode-poore, who was in the prime of eastern womanhood, being but 16 or 17 (!) years old at the time of this cruel sacrifice.

The gradual and spontaneous abandonment of this rite, formerly so strictly enforced, speaks well for the increased civilization of this branch at least of the Rahtores; and Mr. Trevelyan's appeal to the present head of the family regarding the suppression of infanticide was promptly and most satisfactorily answered by an assurance that Maharaja Soorut Singh had already decreed the abolition of this unnatural system, so that the Raja Rutun Singh would himself discountenance the same.

Being on the eve of quiting this place, for we march to-morrow towards Jeysulmer, and having much to do in the interim, including a leave taking audience to His Highness the Maharaja, I must conclude this hasty sketch of the Beekaneer capital. I have omitted to mention the temples in the city, some of which are well worthy of notice: many are of the Jain religion. And among these is a most conspicuous pagoda, called Bhandasir jee ka mundar, on the south side of the town, the lofty conical spire of which is visible for many miles. Close to it are the temples of Nemnath and Luchmee Narain, to the latter of which the Maharaja repairs twice in the month for the performance of his devotions. The munders of Muddun Mohun, Chintamun, Rikub Deb, &c., are worthy of mention, but I have not time to particularize."

Camp, Jeisulmere, 26th March, 1835.—"My last Bulletin gave an account of 'the interesting travellers' nearly up to the time of their departure from Beekaner; so I must run back to that capital and take up my tale from the point at which my last letter dropped it.

We paid our parting visit to the Maharaja on the 1st March, and at the same time he received Purohit Sirdar Mul, Vakeel at Ajmere on the part of Maharawul Guj Singh of Jeysulmere; this public reception of the representative of his neighbour being intended by the Beekaner Raja as a first step towards a reconciliation with the Maharawul with whom he has lately been on bad terms: the second step will be a meeting between these two potentates on their respective frontiers, of which more will be said hereafter. We took a very friendly leave of the Raja Ruttun Singh, his son, and brother, by all of whom we had been very civilly treated during our stay at their capital; and after quitting the palace we visited the stables and menagerie, where numerous animals are kept in very neat order.

Besides the elephants and horses kept in these courts, we saw two tigers, two black monkeys, an elk, some hog, deer, common monkeys, &c. and a few neel gae, two of which had been broken in to draw a carriage: they were males, tolerably matched in size and colour, and appeared to be a very quiet, and I assure you that I felt more than half inclined to turn Jehu, for whatever you may think, a brace of blue cows in a curricle is a turn out not to be sneezed at.

On the 2d March we turned our backs on the hospitable walls of Beekaner, and after fourteen marches without a single halt, there being little or nothing worthy of notice on the road, we arrived in safety at Jeysulmere. The general appearance of the country between these two cities is barren, though free from sandhills; the soil being a poor and hungry gravel intermixed with pebbles, and occasionally diversified with sandy plains covered with a fine nourishing kind of grass upon which cattle thrive well. We saw very little bajra or, indeed, cultivation of any kind during the whole journey of 180 miles and upwards; but I ought not to forget that in this space we actually found four green fields of corn, none of which, however, was irrigated. At Dihatra, our last place of encampment before we crossed the frontier, the wells were 309 feet deep.

It fortunately happens, where the water lies so very far below the surface of the earth, that the inconvenience, which this would otherwise occasion, is partly obviated by the exceeding hardness and tenacity of the soil, which enables the natives to dig kucha tanks of great size that retain water during many months so that they are independent of well water for a great part of the year; were this not the case, the country would be scarcely habitable. As it is, they are often greatly distressed during the summer, and many thousand head of cattle are occasionally lost in the severe droughts. Both the horned cattle and sheep appear to be of an excellent kind, and the wool of the latter is manufactured at Jeysulmere into very fine clothes of various kinds.

There is not much jungul on the way from Beekaner, though in some places which are situated on comparatively low ground, such as Gujner and Sirrud, there is a great deal of wood, chiefly jant or kejra, (a kind of mimosa,) and kureel which here grows to a large size and is called kair. Little game is to be found in so barren a country, but there are a few ducks on the tanks, with the small deer called chukara, wolfe, jackals, hares, grey patridges, quail, and rock pigeon, as well as sundry black curlieus to be seen now and then by the road side; and there are a few pea-fowls in the villages, I think.

Our third halting place, after leaving Beekaner, was Kailath, where there is a very fine tank, the scene of a mela or fair that takes place twice a year: we arrived there on the 4th March, and on alighting at our tents were agreeably surprised with the information that Shah Shooja, the ex-king of Cabool, was within two miles of our camp at a village called Mudh. This unlucky-potentate had met with a severe check at Kundahar in attempting to reconquer his kingdom, and his army being utterly routed by Dost Mahumud Khan, who came down in person with some 17,000 men to raise the seige of Kundahar, the fallen monarch was obliged to fly, abandoning all his guns and baggage, for "sauve qui peut" was the order of the day.

After wandering about as a fugitive for some months, Sooja-ool-Moolk took refuge with the Umeers of Scind and remained 14 days at Hyderabad, where he was very kindly treated; and on quitting that place was dismissed with presents suited rather to his former, than to his present condition. From Hyderabad the ex-king made his way with about 200 followers to Jeysulmere, where he was also civilly treated, and he was on his way from this place via Beekaner to Loodianah when we fell in with him.

On hearing that we were in the neighbourhood, his hazee, a most respectable man who had lived for some days in Mr. Trevelyan's compound at Simla, while deputed from Shah Shooja to make some communication to the Governor-General who was then in the hills, came over to our camp at Kaliath and intimated that the Shah would be much gratified if the British gentlemen would pay him a visit, and that he would be particularly happy to receive Lieutenant Trevelyan for his brother's sake, as well as his own. Little pressing was required to bring about this meeting, and matters were accordingly arranged so as not to hurt the feelings of the quondan monarch, to whom the officers of Mr. Elphinstone's Mission were introduced under such very different circumstances at Peshawur, though even in those days the King of Cabool and his antagonist Mahmood Shah were like "the lion and the unicorn fighting for the crown."

We arrived about dusk at Shah Shooja's bivouac, for I can hardly call it encampment, as there was not a single tent to be seen, unless a small bit of dirty cloth streched upon sticks deserved the name: with much good taste the king's people had rigged out a hall of audience al fresco by the edge of a tank, the high bank of which effectually cut off the gaze of curious and intrusive eyes, and enabled the Shah to receive us more at his ease than if no such place of concealment had been at hand. A charpoy, covered with shawls and pillows, served as a throne: a green tree did duty as a canopy; two carpets were spread in front of the charpoy to mark the limited space assigned exclusively to royalty: and in front, on either hand, stood a few of the personal attendants in large blue turbans, while three or four eunuchs posted themselves in rear of their master. After making these arrangements, with the bank at his back, the tank in front, and "the lofty vault of heaven" above his head, the Shah sat with all due decorum waiting the arrival of his visitors.

On our appearance, we were ushered to within a few feet of the charpoy, alias throne, where Shah Shooja remained sitting while we stood in front of him booted and with the head covered; he expressed himself highly gratified with the trouble we had taken to come and visit him in his misfortunes, and so far from concealing the extent of his reverse, he detailed to us with great fluency, and in easy familiar Persian, a sketch of his adventures during the last two or three years, up to the present time. He told us of his difficulty in raising money from Runjeet Singh by the sale of such jewels and valuables as remained in his possession before he quitted Loodiana; and which after all only realized 90,000 rupees. His departure from the British frontier with a small army and four guns; his unexpected success at Shikarpoor: his beleaguering the city of Kundahar with a considerable force and sixteen pieces of ordnance; his first successful resistance against Dost Mahumud Khan, and his subsequent overthrow by that powerful chief, were all touched upon in succession, as well as the privations which he had suffered and the fatigue he had endured while flying from place to place before the face of his enemy. After all this undisguised narrative of his condition, he concluded by saying that kings were bound to seek advice in all quarters, and he therefore, wished to know what line of action we would recommend under his present circumstances: a question easier asked than answered unless he could be persuaded that it was Quixotic undertaking to subdue a distant kingdom with four guns, a mere handful of men, and an almost empty treasury.

After enough of Persian had been spoken to satisfy the court etiquette, Shah Shooja ordered his attendants to fall back and reopened the conversation in Hindoostanee, which he speaks with fluency from having resided so long at Loodiana. He reiterated the expressions of pleasure derived from our visit and dismissed us courteously, receiving with many thanks, from his visitors a few trays of dried fruits sent to his camp after our return home, a piece of civility which was the more acceptable as it was quite unexpected, and his hungry followers looked as if they would be glad to see a few apricots and pistachio-nuts again.

The Shah's dress was very simple, a huge labada that had once been embroidered with gold concealing the whole of his nether garment: a large blue shawl covered his head as a turban, and he had gloves upon his hands so that there was no occasion for wearing rings, the existence of which was rather apocriphal. His countenance was bronzed by long exposure to the weather, and he was somewhat pulled down by fatigue and sickness, but his features still retained a dignified appearance to which a noble black and flowing beard contributed not a little.

The meeting with his ex-majesty of Cabool has occupied so much space that I must defer the account of our sojourn at Jeysulmere for some future opportunity; at present I must merely say that we arrived here just at the conclusion of the Holee festival, on the 14th or 15th instant, and are likely to remain here some days longer.

Camp Girrajsir, in Jeisulmere, 14th May, 1835. —"My last letter finished with an account of the interview with Shah Shooja th ex-king of Cabool, which took place just before the Jeysulmere Mission had quitted the Beekaneer frontier. We entered the Bhatee country on the 6th March at Nokra, and marched by easy stages to Sirrud, Bap, Shekasir, Sheekur and Chahin, skirting the Joudpoor frontier, both for the convenience of getting good water, and for avoiding the sands as much as possible. At Bap there is an excellent tank of sweet water that remains all the year round, and near this place I first noticed the custom of measuring instead of weighing grain by means of a wooden vessel hooped with iron, something like an English quarter peck measure, and which is called by the natives pailee or palee. We reached Chahia on the 11th March, and in the evening of the same day Lieutenant Trevelyan, with a few followers, including the vakeels of both states, set off upon a long night trip in order to meet Lieutenant Mackison, who had left the court of Buhawul Khan in Sind to assist the officer deputed from Ajmeer in settling the disputes between the Daodpotra chief, and the Rawul of Jeisulmere.

The two British officers met at Mohurghurh, 18 kos N. N. E. of Jeysulmere on the morning of the 12th March, and on the following day they visited the village of Bulana, 4 kos east of Mohurgurh, to determine by personal inspection the quantity of damage that had been done by a late onslaught of the Sind troops. Having satisfied themselves by obtaining all local information that was required, they made another long night march of 20 kos from Bulana to Jeysulmere, and arrived there on the morning of the 13th March, the last day of the great Hindoo festival called Holee, when of course the whole court and city were in an uproar. The main body of the camp came in next-day, when clouds of red powder were still flying about, and it may be imagined that amid such a hubbub the arrival of the Mission partook in a very small degree of the dignified character of its entrée into the Beekaneer capital as already described. Something of etiquette was, however, kept up, guns were fired and complimentary measures exchanged; and numerous visits were paid to the palace where the frost of ce emony soon melted before the radiant smiles and downright good humour of the Maha Rawul.

As we remained nearly three weeks at Jeysulmere before the breaking up of our little party, there was ample time for a leisurely examination of the town, citadel, and environs, but the latter are too sterile to tempt any one to wander far from the city, and may as well be dismissed in a few words previously to entering into a description of the capital. The country all round Jeysulmere for many miles is a desolate, stony desert; it cannot be called a plain because it is rather a succession of vallies or inclined planes several miles long and three or four miles broad, formed by low ridges of yellow limestone, the strata of which are not quite horizontal but dip gently to the westward and cross out on the eastern side, with a tolerably bold profile of 90 or 100 feet in height. The city is built on the south end of one of these ranges, which is so nearly horizontal that its upper surface is quarried in every direction, and supplies abundant building material for the inhabitants: on the south side of the city, but within its walls, is an insulated hill about threequarters of a mile in circuit, and with rather precipitous sides, which has been carefully fortified with more than 80 bastions, and forms a very imposing citadel when seen from the southward; but the unfortunate contiguity of the range of hills already mentioned which are within 600 yards of the north face of the fort, and very nearly of the same altitude, diminishes very much its capability of defence; especially as this hill called Soolee Doongree, is 700 yards wide at the top and allows of guns being brought up to the veryfoot of the town wall.

The ramparts are 2½ miles in circuit, with 38 bastions, generally much higher than the interventing curtains, but many of them are in ruins. Four gates and three sally ports give access to the city, but there are many other parts where horsemen may ride over the walls by ascending the hillocks of drift sand, which have nearly obliterated the whole of the southern as well as a great part of the western face. The town wall was never very strong, being in its most perfect state, barely four and a half feet thick and 14 feet high (including a parapet 6 feet high and 2 feet thick) without either ditch or fausse brave. There is one small gun on the highest bastion in the N. E. angle of the city, which appeared to be the only piece of ordnance on the town walls.

The citadel is an irregular triangle nearly 1,300 yards or ¾ mile in circuit, as already mentioned, and may be nearly 130 feet high to the summit of the ramparts, which vary from 5 to 30 feet, and have a narrow renee 6 feet broad running all round.

There is a single entrance on the north side, defended by four gateways with sloping roads between them so as to give easy access to the palace and other buildings within its area which is quite choked with munders and houses. Four guns are at present mounted on the walls, and two heavy guns, a large howitzer, and three field pieces are drawn up near the lower gate. The foot of the hill, on which the citadel stands, is scarped all round with masonry to the height of 15 or 20 feet, whence the face of the hill recedes at an elevation of about 408 to the foot of the renee, so that these works may be said to have rather a stiff section, which it would be difficult to assault though easy enough to breach.

The crests of the parapets are crowned with huge logs and balls of stone neatly arranged in readiness to be thrown down on the heads of an assailing column; the garrison, too, are well provided with water, having eight wells within the citadel which are 304 feet deep, and contain rather brackish, but not undrinkable water, which would of course be used during the siege, though at present the inhabitants use the water of a large tank called Gurreesir, 300 yards S. E. of the city, close to which are several small pits or filtration wells called Beree only a few cubits deep, which collect a little sweet water without going down to the landsprings. There are only two wells for the city just outside the west gate, and both covered by a stone parapet with loop-holes, they are 151 cubits or 241 feet deep, and the water is slightly brackish. A baolee is now being dug close to the fort gate, and has already attained a depth of 80½ cubits, but has not yet reached the main spring. There are numerous bereers of sweet water at Kishun Ghat, one kos north of the city, but still there is rather a scarcity of this most necessary element.

The city of Jeisulmere contains nearly eight thousand houses, including two or three thousand in the citadel, and has some good streets, but scarcely any thing like a bazar. The citadel, town wall, and all the principal houses being built of the dull yellow limestone, of which the hill itself is composed, have at a distance a sombre appearance from the want of a variety of colour to relieve the eye, and indeed it is hard to say at first which is the native rock, and which are the artificial buildings, for the former is flat topped, and the latter are flat roofed; but on closer examination it will be seen that an immense deal of labour has been expended on the architectural decorations of a large proportion of the better class of houses, the fronts of which are ornamented with balconies and lattices of the same yellow marble richly carved, which gives them a finished, though rather cumbrous appearance.

The limestone of Jeysulmere has been applied to the purposes of lithography, approved of, being considered superior even to the Bavarian stone for all transfer work, as it will give off a very considerable number of copies without "running rotton," but its yellow colour is rather too deep to allow of its being used for chalk-work, as the artist cannot well distinguish the different shades of his pencil upon the stone. It has been employed largely in the royal buildings of the Emperors at Agra, by the name of sun kuthoo, and there is another variety of it produced at Haboor, 20 kos N. N. W. of Jeisulmere, much valued on account of the particles of limestone being distributed in small vermicular and contorted figures in a matrix of indurated red ochre, which when cut and polished has a fanciful resemblance to Persian writing upon red paper. Numerous coarse specimens of the latter stone may be seen in the upper pavement of Ukbur's tomb at Sikundra.

Among the few things worth seeing at Jeisulmere are the Maha Rawal's palace, surmounted by a huge umbrella (the only other Rajpoot chief entitled to this emblem of dignity being the Maharana of Oodepore:) and the mundurs, or pagodas in the citadel of which there are six; half Hindoo and half Jain; the latter being of great antiquity and richly ornamented with carved stone. The huvellee or dwelling house of Salim Singh Mehta, late Minister to the Rawul, is quite a curiosity in its way, towering proudly over the neighbouring houses like King's College Chapel (the Freshman's guide) at Cambridge, though the true cantab would be horrified at such an unworthy comparison.

The revenue of the Bhatee country appears to be very much circumscribed, and I do not remember to have heard the Rawul's income estimated at more than four lacs (most probably it is not half that amount,) of which nearly one half may be raised by transit duties on the articles which pass through his country on their way from the Company's territories or Rajwarra to Sind. The principal of these is Opium, of which large quantities arrived during our stay at Jeisulmere, and the impost levied there appeared to be very moderate, not exceeding 19 rupees per camel load. The income from khalsa lands must be very trifling notwithstanding the great extent of the Rawul's territory, but it is "barren all, barren all," or nearly so, as we scarcely saw a single cornfield in traversing nearly 200 miles of his country, and moreover

> The border men are stern of mood,
> The Bhatee Thakoor wild and rude, who used to snap their fingers at their liege-lord—and set him at defiance, until he borrowed a little energy from his connexion with the British Government. Colonel Lockett's visit to Jeisulmere, the establishment of a cantonment at Balmere, and the arrival of the present Mission have given to the Rawal an influence and degree of control over his ragamuffin nobles which he never before possessed. He is a merry, good-humoured Prince, this same Guj Singh, and it is to be hoped, that by the Honorable Company's help, that is to say, by the terror of their name, he may in future be able to keep his kingdom in good order.

The Maha Rawul is tall and bulky in stature, and from the under prominence of his "cupboard" seems to be no enemy of good cheer. When less unwieldy in bulk he was an expert horseman, a good shot, and handled his spear with dexterity in a hog hunt: he reads and writes his own language fluently, seems to have a good share of common sense, asks very pertinent questions and has scraped acquaintance with one at least of the muses, if I may judge from having stumbled upon his own ivory-bodied guitar, while visiting one of his country palaces at the "Umur Sagur," where there is a large tank, now dry, with some good baolees and an excellent garden. There is another garden, with a small country seat, and tank called "Mool Sagur," half a kos or one mile west of the Umur Sagur and two kos W. N. W. of the city,—these with the large nursery called baree (near the burial or burning place of the Rawul's family) and the flower garden of the great merchant Bahadur Mul, are nearly every thing that we heard of or saw in the shape of a bagh. The onions of Jeysulmere are celebrated by the way, as well as the fine woollen pugrees and loees or flannels.

During our long stay at Jeysulmere numerous meetings took place between the subordinate members of the Mission (the respectable men sent with Lieutenant Mackison on the part of the Khan Bhawul Khan, and the confidential servants of the Maha Rawul) and matters being at length brought to an amicable adjustment through the arbitration of the officers deputed for this purpose from the agencies of Delhi and Ajmere, we broke up our camp on the 2d April, and made two marches northward from the capital, remaining 2 or 3 days at a large tank called Kohareesir close to the frontier, while arrangements were made for the final leave taking of the said Mission.

As it was likely that the presence of Lieutenant Trevelyan would be required at or near Jeysulmere for at least another month, he returned towards that capital from Kohareesir on the 7th of April, and arrived there on the following day, about the same time that his two late companions reached Khanpoor, where Buhawul Khan happened to be holding his court. Leaving them, however, to pursue their way "at the back o' beyont," i. e., on the other side of the great Desert, we must return to Jeysulmere and watch the movements of the main body of the Mission.

"The Maha Rawul, finding the coast clear, as the supernumerary Saheb log had made themselves scarce with a considerable number of followers, now entered with great glee into such business as remained unadjusted. His first care was to return the visit of his guest, to whose tents he came with all his court, sending a gudee or royal cushion for the especial dignity and comfort of his own goodly person, with a brigade of guns to tickle the ears of the lieges with thundering salute. Half of the thunder, however, hung-fire, for one of the guns refused to uplift it's most sweet voice, so the whole brunt of the bellowing fell upon the other "bouche-a-feu." The meeting passed off admirably, and after presenting 's Thakoors to the British Envoy with a little general conversation, the Maha Rawul cleared the court and had some private confab; the result of which was, "mirabile dictu," that he promised even at this inclement season of the year to go out 140 miles to his own frontier to have an interview with the Maharajah Rutun Singh of Beekaneer: and still more wonderful the promise has actually been fulfilled.

This interview, which was to renew a friendship between the lately unfriendly chiefs of Beekaneer and Jeysulmere, was the principal object of the Mission from Ajmere; and well it was for the accomplishment of that object that Lieutenant Trevelyan, during his personal intercourse with the Rawul, had so won his heart and acquired such an influence over that durbar that he succeeded in carrying this very desirable point in spite of the avowed remonstrances of the Ranawut (the Maha Rawal's favorite Princess) and the less apparent, though perhaps equally sincere, opposition of one of the principal Ministers, and some of the discontented Bhatee Thakoors.

But the arrangements for a weighty ceremony of this kind were not to be completed in a hurry, and many a weary day was passed before the forty horse power of persuasion set the cumbrous mass of a Rajpoot court in motion. By way of doing something useful in the interim, Lieutenant Trevelyan proceeded to the villages of Budora Gam, Rasla, and Devee Rot, to make a personal distribution of the money exacted by the British Government from the Maharaja Maun Singh of Joudpoor in compensation of the outrages committed by his subjects, upon the S. E. frontier of Jeysulmere. After delivering to each of the sufferers the sums apportioned acording to their various losses, and for the receipt of which they seemed to be very grateful, Mr. T. returned to the capital, about the 30th April, and was enabled almost immediately afterwards to prevail on the Rawul to commence his march towards the Bekaneer frontier, as will be mentioned hereafter.

Part of the time preceding the above visit of retribution to the plundered villages, had been spent at the Umur Sagur, a pleasant country retreat already mentioned, and the Maha Rawul Cuj Singh came out to spend a couple of days with his English friend, at this place. Great was the glee of the good natured chiefs as they competed with each other in ball practice at the target; which was fairly struck by both; and much did he admire, the evolutions of the handful of sipahees which formed our escort, observing that though few in number they did great things, and he begged so hard to see them fire "just a single volley," that there was no refusing his request; and so a score or two of our honourable master's leaden pills were sent flying on a deputation from which they will hardly return until the Greek Kalends. Our little party of Blair's Horse were also trotted out in presence of the durbar, and went through a few manœuvres to the Rawul's great delight, who bestowed a solid compliment upon all the parties that had been paraded for his particular gratification.

On another occasion the Rawul insisted on the English gentleman's going to the palace and "making a regular day of it." An excellent breakfast was spread for the Saheb, and in his pretty little sheesh mehul, whence he could see without being seen. Another breakfast was laid out (table cloth and all) for the Prince himself. When the boards were cleared the dancing damsels were introduced according to the custom of Eastern courts, and "the day drove on with songs and clatter" to the great delight of the Rawul, however wearisome it might have been to his guest.

The patient endurance of these frivolities, and an apparent cheerful participation in them, did more to bring the Bhuttee chief into training for his weary trip to the frontier than many an hour's serious advice would have done: and truly this conciliatory line of conduct met with its reward, for on the night of the 5th May, all preparations being at length accomplished, Lieutenant Trevelyan was enabled to quit Jeisulmere, and the Rawul left his capital at the same time, so that all difficulties seemed to be at an end. But there is many a slip between the cup and the lip, and so it nearly proved on the present occasion, for before half of the first march was completed an ill-omened howling of jackals, or screaming of partridges at the wrong side, i. e., the right side of the way, caused the superstitious Raja to plump himself down in the middle of the road at Basunpoor, 5 kos from Jeisulmere, where he would have remained until the occurrence of a more fortunate omen, had not a strong and well-timed remonstrance from Mr. T. compelled him to get under weigh again and complete the remaining 7 kos of the march to Chundhun.

The second halting place was Nona Thala, 11 kos from Chundhun, and the next day they marched 7 kos farther to Chahin, after which was accomplished a severe stage of 20 kos or 40 miles to Nok, and the camp followers were much distressed by the want of water between these places, though a partial supply had been sent out for them on camels. The last stage was one of nearly 20 miles from Nork to Girrajsir where the Jeisulmere durbar arrived on the morning of the 10th May, and the Bekaneer court reached Guniala (2 kos N. E. of Girrajsir) on the same day; so both the "interesting travellers" were once more happily united, as Lieutenant Boileau had returned from his tour in Scind a few hours previously to the arrival of Lieutenant Trevelyan with the two great luminaries, and this narrative must double-back a little to give some account of the visit which was paid to the "Father of Rivers."—Delhi Gazette.

SKETCH OF THE AFFAIRS OF PERSIA.

We have been favoured with the perusal of a letter from one of the individuals of the detachment under Colonel Passmore, dated Tehran the 29th March last, from which we have been permitted to make the following extract:—

"We arrived at Tehran in the latter end of July, 1834, but in consequence of the fever and ague making its appearance amongst us, remained inactive, for a period of two months, when orders were received for the detachment to take the field against the Kurds,—a race of people who inhabit the mountains between Tabreez and Turkey: we were two months in the field, and every thing was settled without a shot being fired from either side. We returned with the army to Tabreez, just in time to accompany Mahomed Mirza, (the present King) to the capital. His uncle Ali Mirza having assembled a large force, declared himself King. He sent out his army to oppose the march of the Prince Royal—but terror seized their general—a brother of the usurper, and all fled back towards the capital. He was situated, as it were, between two fires; if he went back to his brother, without fighting for his brother's pretended claim, his head would have been the forfeit for his cowardice; on the other hand, if he allowed himself to be taken prisoner by the enemy, decapitation would immediately ensue; but he acted a wise part to save his head. He gave himself up to Sir John Campbell, who guaranteed that no harm should befal him. The whole of his army laid down their arms, seeing that their chief had surrendered, and were all taken prisoners, but shortly afterwards released, and directed to return to their duty.

Our force then marched into the capital, where Mahomed Mirza was crowned King. Every thing is now quiet in this quarter. The news arrived here a few days ago of the defeat of Houssan Ali, Mirza's brother, who was at the head of the Prince Royal's army. He was slightly wounded, and fled with about two hundred horsemen. All the rest were taken prisoners. Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Henry Lindsay commanded the Royal army, with the assistance of two other officers, and six serjeants of the detachment. Colonel Passmore and the remaining non-commissioned officers are at present in the capital. I was prevented from writing from sickness, and no packet for India, I had been informed, had, or was about to leave this for India, since October last.

The affairs of Persia are interesting to us in many points of view—they are interesting so far as regards the individual exertions of our countrymen in supporting the cause of the legitimate dynasty, and they are of extreme interest so far as regard the footing on which we stand with that power. From the detailed account which we subjoin, and with which we have been favored by a gentleman, who, from personal knowledge, has been able to give an accurate account, it will be seen that it was chiefly owing to the prudent and able management of our Envoy at the Court of Persia, and those under his command, that the rights of the lawful sovereign have been established.

It would serve little purpose for us to enter, at this moment, into the history of our diplomatic relations with Persia, or the policy which has dictated that line of passive conduct in its affairs which has hitherto characterised our relationship with that country; but it may be permitted us to ask why it is that, notwithstanding our acknowledged influence at that Court, so little positive advantage results to us, in a national point of view, from the connection? The chief object of a Mission to that Court is, as we all know, the securing the Persian interest with a view to the protection of our Indian possessions against the aggressions of Russia: yet true it is, and of verity, that Russian influence is so strong at that Court that England is cajoled, deceived, and bamboozled, while Russia, day after day, extends her influence, fortifies her power, and stretches her domains to the utmost limit which her grasping ambition may choose to covet and demand. Such is the result of a most mischievous policy on the part of England, marked alike for its want of spirit in the design, and want of energy in the execution. England will fight the battles of Persia,—her best and bravest sons will risk their lives in her cause, yet while she reaps the empty shadow of glory, Russia secures the more substantial portion of the feast.

At the present time there is scarcely a demand we could make on Persia which would not be yielded. We would not advocate the policy of taxing her generosity at a moment when she must feel herself under a weighty debt of gratitude, yet a regard to the peace and safety of India, as well as the wish to prevent Persia becoming the theatre of war,—and which must sooner or later be the case if the interests of England and Russia remain opposed as they do, ought to induce the British Government to turn the present moment to the best account, and place themselves on such a footing in Persia as to leave the grasping Autocrat little hope of an asylum within the Persian territories should his ambition ever lead him to try the conquest of India. Napoleon ridiculed the mock scruples of England in her diplomatic intercourse with the other nations of Europe. In the field, Englishmen were formidable, he said, but in the Cabinet, they were children. It is too true. The questions which have agitated Europe for the last five years might have been set at rest with a single protocol had England acted on a determined policy. But the undecided character in which she appeared on the stage, left the other powers at a loss what to think, or what to do. It was her indecision that pointed the way to Mehemet Ali in his triumphant progress to the walls of Constantinople,—the same cause brought the Russians within those walls, and led to that treaty between the Russians and Turks which neither would have dared been a party to, had they not calculated on the usual passive policy of England. Holland also bears evidence to England's forbearance, and Belgium has no ground to be grateful. Poland has, with its last voice, denounced England as false to the cause of liberty, and all Europe gives echo to the charge.

With regard to Persia, such policy is dangerous in the highest degree, as it not only does not improve our hopes in that quarter, but is apt to create an idea that we are not so powerful a nation as we would wish to be thought. The experience of the past has taught us the course which ought to be pursued with regard to Persia, and the present time seems the most fitting for our purpose that could have presented itself.

The following is the communication with which we have been favored:—

"Having just arrived, charged with dispatches from our Envoy at the Court of Persia, announcing the accession of Mahomed Shah to the crown of that empire, and fancying that a abridged sketch of our campaigning in that country, subsequent to the demise of the late King Futte-Ale-Shah, may not be unacceptable to your numerous readers, I have been induced to look over the pages of my journal, and glean from them a few observations for your valuable paper.

Having performed a journey of unprecedented quickness from Constantinople to Tabreez in fourteen days and nights and twelve hours,—a distance of nearly 1,500 miles, I arrived at the latter city on the 1st November, 1834, and was greeted with a hearty welcome by Sir John Campbell, Envoy at the Court of Persia, who appeared much astonished at the short time in which I had performed my arduous task. It had never been performed by a European in such a short time, and only by one Tartar. My ride was through Asia Minor, whose mountains, valleys, and rivers clear, would charm the eye of the most fastidious cragonneur. However I must say that Tabreez, with its amphitheatre of red hills, was the most agreeable scene I had witnessed since leaving the shores of the Bosphorus.

A few days after my arrival at Tabreez, there were rumours in the bazaar of the King's death, and which were in a few days after corroborated by the Prince Royal himself, who knowingly told Sir John that he had known it several days.

Sir John Campbell being certain of the King's death, lost no time in preparing for a crisis, the probable consequences of which had attracted the attention of the Courts at Europe. He represented to the Prince the necessity of immediate and active measures—had orders sent off for the troops encamped at Khoe to march on Tabreez with all possible dispatch,—gave directions to Sir Henry Bethune, K. L. S., better known in Persia by the name of Lindsay, to get in readiness a park of artillery for immediate service. On the 9th of November, Mahomed Mirza was publicly proclaimed King, and a grand salute fired on the occasion. On the 10th, the artillery were all in readiness to march, but a want of money for their pay, which had not been issued to them for 3 years, was now sadly felt, and it was not without Sir John's assistance, and the great influence Sir Henry Bethune possessed over them, that they were prevailed upon to move, receiving an enaum of two tumanns, and a promise of their arrears at Tehran. Having got them off a great point was gained, as the regiments coming in from Khoe, all in arrears, would be the more easily settled with.

The reports from the south at this period were varied and uncertain, but all agreed with respect to the unsettled state of the country. A large caravan from the capital was completely plundered a few marches from Tabreez, and other acts of a similar nature were every day committed by the wandering tribes, who invariably take advantage of the unsettled state of the country to commit all kinds of depredations on their more peaceable neighbours.

The astrologers having found a propitious hour on the 11th for the King to commence his march on the capital, he accordingly mounted, and proceeded to a garden about 1 mile from the town. On the 15th the troops arrived from Khoe commanded by the Amier Nizzam, and not in the most orderly state. They immediately made known their determination not to take the field until all their arrears were paid. They encamped in front of the Royal Garden, and were on the following day inspected by his Majesty in person, who was received on the parade with a royal salute from the artillery, and three volleys from the line. The officers being ordered to the front, he addressed them in a very kind and eloquent speech, promising them pay and honours on their reaching Tehran, but that at present it was not in his power to pay their arrears. He afterwards rode down the line, addressing each regiment as he passed, and recognizing several old veterans who had served with him in his campaign with his father Abaz Meerza, in Korasan. There were several hints given by the men, who are not at any time very particular about speaking in the ranks, regarding their pay, but all past off well, and the men returned to their camp.

The King, imagining that he had quieted the complaints of his regular army, took his final departure from the neighbourhood of Tabreez, leaving all his affairs in a most deplorable state, and what is still more extraordinary, and will scarcely be credited, his minister, the Kiam Makam, the next day followed his young master, or spreading a report to that effect, hid himself in the town, thus leaving all the affairs of a troubled country—a diadem at stake in jeopardy.

This conduct on the part of the Persian authorities necessarily increased the difficulties and responsibility which Sir John Campbell had to contend with, and which he surmounted in a firm and masterly manner. After a troublesome search of two days, and in which most valuable time was lost, he failed in procuring an audience of the Kiam Makam, and seeing no probability of assistance from that quarter, and from which much might reasonably have been expected, he commenced, single handed, to turn the tide of affairs which owing to the innocence of the young King, and the mistaken policy of his minister, had nigh left the bark on shore at the mercy of pirates; he assembled the chief officers of the army with whom he had always been on most friendly terms, and satisfied those gentlemen by means which are usually successful in Persia, and succeeded in getting the last regiment out of Tabreez on the 23rd for the general rendezvous, Meana, where the King wanted to assemble his troops.

Sir Henry Bethune fearing the evil consequences that might accrue from our delay at Tabreez, made a bold movement across the Koftin Khoe, a difficult pass over a range of mountains which separates the Provinces of Azabijon and Irake, and proceeding on towards the capital, took possession of Zungoora, a town of some importance, and placed himself in a strong position outside the walls. He just arrived there in time to save the place, and relieve the Governor, Bahman Meerza, the King's brother, of excessive fear, which had induced him to take refuge among the ladies of his harem.

Sir John having arranged matters for the protection of the Tower, moved out to join the King on the 26th. His Majesty was very uneasy about our delay, and which he himself had occasioned, the importance of which he now began to comprehend. Letters had reached him from Tehran written by some of his well wishers in that place, urging him to make all speed with his army, and informing him that his uncle the Zilla Sultan had crowned himself, was acknowledged King in the capital, and calling himself Adul Sha, was preparing an army for the field. We arrived at Meana on the 29th, and were disappointed in not meeting the King who had crossed the Koftin Khoe the day before our arrival. We proceeded on the next morning and joined His Majesty at Arken, and moving on in company, without halt, joined the advance force under Sir Henry Bethune on the 3rd December. Few circumstances of consequence took place during our march, except the arrival of the Ruk-nia-Dowleh (uncle to the King) who had left the capital with orders from his brother to raise an army in the district of Khumsa, but who, on perceiving our near approach, got alarmed and came in with about 200 horsemen. He stated that when he left his brother's court they had not allowed themselves to think for a moment that there was any possibility of the Azahigar troops moving across the Koftin Khan till after the winter,—that they heard in the capital that the King had a very severe attack of gout, and to remove which he had allowed his chief physician, assisted by Dr. Riach, to amputate both his legs. After a most unnecessary delay of 3 days, and during which time nothing of consequence took place, the King consented to sending in advance a force under Sir Henry Bethune, who was directed to keep our march in front of the main body. That officer accordingly commenced his march with 10 pieces of artillery, and two regiments, also a large body of horse, and a letter having been dispatched to the usurper guaranteeing him his eyes, life, and property, should he come to terms, sealed by both Sir John and Count Siminich, we commenced our march with the whole army on the 7th for the capital. A few days after our departure from Zungoon the Maotimet-e-Dowleh and the Opiffe-Dowleh joined the King. They were both the ministers of late His Majesty, and well known characters in Persia. On the 10th we received positive intelligence of a force commanded by Emam Nadér Meerza having left Tehran, and a day or two after the advance horse of both armies had some slight skirmishing near a village called Scea-Dien, when those of the usurper was obliged to retire, and our troops moving on next day took possession of a large town called Casben. This place, owing to the firmness displayed by its Governor, was not taken possession of by the enemy's troops who were refused provisions, and obliged to encamp some distance from the walls. Here Sir John left the King, and proceeded in advance with Sir Henry Bethune, and by exerting the influence he possessed over the chiefs of the Prince's army, as well as by some clever negotiations with that personage himself, succeeded in inducing a great many of the former to come over, and the Prince finding his ranks daily decreasing came in himself to make terms on the 17th, and all his artillery followed the example of their chief in the evening. Thus concluded our affairs with Emam Nadér Mirza, who, having made capital terms for his brother, was returning with a firman to Tehran, in which it was made known that, should he abstain from plundering the royal treasury, and doing any injury to the town, he would be continued in his Government of the Province, and all his past conduct forgotten. The Prince had not proceeded far from our camp, when he met a party of men from the capital. These fellows were on their way to the King to give him the happy intelligence of the apprehension of the Zilla Sultan by the son of the Assiffe Dowlet, who made him prisoner, and placed him in charge of the Ladies of the harem. They, by some means or other, learnt that the unfortunate Prince had the firman above alluded to, and the Prince, while taking tea with the chief, was made a prisoner by his followers and brought back to the King. We all arrived at Tehran and took possession of the treasury, and royal jewels on the 21st December. The last mile of our march the road was strewed with the heads of camels, bullocks, sheep, &c. sacrificed to the young King.

The morning of our entré to Tehran was one of those fine winter morns peculiar to a Persian climate. The mountains had just been capped with the whitest snow, and the Dume-wand (Mount Blanc of the El-bourge-range) with the rays of the morning sun reflected on it, seemed to smile through its hoary mist on the deeds we had done. Our young hero appeared pensive, and no doubt allowed himself to feel the important epoch that day would introduce in his life. The steed he rode was pure Turkeman, and its well turned limbs seemed to labour under the weight of the costly trappings that ornamented them; he led the way followed by both Ambassadors with their attachés, and a cloud of followers from almost every part of Asia, among them the Koords, with their glittering helmets, and well balanced spears, cut a most conspicuous figure. Having neared the town, we passed through the ranks of troops drawn up in line, and entered the Negar-e-Stan Palace. The nightingales (that warble all the year round in Persia) had scarcely finished their matins when our unexpected intrusion obliged the warblers to greet their young King and fly to a more peaceful orchestra. His Majesty left us to robe, and shortly after summoned us to his presence. We found him seated in the State Chair with a crown, on the right side of which was placed the gikha, a very handsome jewelled ornament. The Ambassadors now took their seats, Count Summen on the right of the throne, and Sir John Campbell on the left. The artillery having fired a salute of 101 guns, he received the congratulations of both these personages, returning a most elegant speech in which he thanked them for the trouble they had taken in his interests; he addressed Sir John Campbell in a most flattering manner, calling him his friend, adding that he was indebted to him alone for his crown; and after some forms not worth attention had been gone through, we took our leave and proceeded to partake of a good breakfast, in the splendid Residency of Tehran.

Up to the 28th January, the day on which the King was formally crowned, nothing of consequence took place,—the troops shewed some feelings of discontent, owing to their promissed arrears not having been paid them. The coronation was attended by all the most respectable inhabitants of the capital, and was one of those unique scenes, which are so very difficult to describe. The assembly was in a large Court in the Mirror Palace, the Court dresses worn by some of the Princes—there were no less than a hundred of them present, almost all sons of the late King—were costly and beautiful. On the King ascending the throne a grand salute was fired of one hundred and one guns, and three volleys from a brigade of Zumberooks. The King, a handsome young man, looked extremly well, with his splendid crown on, and armlets of the most valuable jewels in the world. The marble throne, supported by fabulous animals, is very ancient, and considered a superior piece of sculpture. His Majesty having smoked his magnificent calione twice, and the coronation prayer being finished, he was addressed by the Assiff-e-Dowlet, who having described the extent and the antiquity of the empire he was called upon to rule, congratulated him on becoming sovereign of a country, the customs and laws of which had never changed; the King answered this address in Turkish, and in which he expressed his determination to maintain the laws and customs unaltered, both in church and state. He then rose amidst the acclamations of all present. We shortly after had a private audience of His Majesty, when he repeated his entire approbation of the conduct of the English, and said they were the finest fellows in the world.

Uncertain reports daily arrived from the south, giving varied accounts of the Firman Furma's forces, and the Keam Makim with his usual vile policy, refused to draw from the treasury the money to pay the troops, waiting to receive back that which had been taken from its coffers by the unfortunate Zilla Sultan. The still unsettled state of affairs, and the dangerous consequences that might naturally be expected from delay in sending a force southward, where the Firman Furma was taking advantage of our absence to organize and discipline an army, was directly represented to the King, by the European representatives. His Majesty who shewed a little energy on this occasion, gave immediate orders for a force to be got in readiness, to be commanded by Sir Henry Bethune, K. L. S., who received a most flattering firman on being invested with his khelat. It was such as had never been issued to any European before, making him General of Artillery, and every power of life and death over the army, and all tribes he might meet with on his march to Esas. We moved from the capital on the 3d February and concentrated at Kanshan, from which place the whole army, consisting of from four to five thousand fighting men, marched on the 29th February. On the 11th, we arrived at Nuttans, a delightfully situated town, and remarkable for the beauty of its fair daughters; here a letter from the Prince of Ispahan reached us; it was expressive of extreme fear, and stated that the forces of the Firman Furma were within a few marches of the town. He expected us to make all possible speed and save the town from the destruction that appeared to threaten it; the assembly was therefore, immediately ordered, and within one hour every man was on the march for Ispahan, a distance of 84 miles: this fatiguing task was performed by the army without water or provisions, and strange to say, without a grumble, in four and twenty hours, having on the evening of the 12th, pitched our camp close to the walls of Ispahan. We found on our arrival, much to our disgust, that the rapid march was not so necessary as we were led to suppose it was by the Prince's letter, that gentleman had more to fear from the mob of the town than foreign enemies. This rabble had elected two of their party to govern the town, calling them Kings; they succeeded in defeating and killing a great many of the Prince's soldiers, and obliged the weak Prince himself to take refuge in his harem. The day after our arrival, these two plebeian Kings were blown away from the guns, and having arranged the affairs of the city, we resumed our march to meet the forces of Hussen-Ali-Murr, of whose hostile intentions we had positive intelligence. We arrived at Gum Sha on the 23d February, when we apprehended one of the enemy's scouts. On the 24th, his advance guard was seen by our picquets. Early on the 25th, our advance horse kept up a smart fire on about 250 of the enemy's cavalry; they stood very steady till evening, when they retired, carrying away some killed and wounded. Sir Henry now decided on fighting a general action, and thus decide the affairs of Persia. The enemy had encamped his whole force in a ruin about 8 miles from our camp, and appeared to have the advantage of us in horse. Sir Henry having formed his plans, gave orders for the army to march at day-break, to be drawn up in contiguous columns of battalions, at quarter distance, in rear of the guns. The night was passed in death-like silence, with every now and again the hagarbash of a watchful sentinel satisfying us that all was well, and at dawn, the enemy fired a gun, some said with a view to make our hearts cold; and the regiments, having taken their place in the columns, we marched, leaving our followers behind. We had not gone far, when we observed the columns of the enemy diverging from their encampment and marching parallel to our line of march, at a distance of about five miles, we immediately altered the head of the columns, and crossing a river close on our right, traversed a splendid plain—we had some difficulty in getting the heavy guns over the river. Both armies were now closing fast and marching on a small village, situated in the plain called Kiser Chum. We endeavoured to get possession of this point before the enemy, but owing to the delay occasioned in getting the heavy guns over the rivulet, we were thrown out of it, and the enemy placed his guns in the battery in some ruins close to the village. We now formed line on the artillery, and kept up a very destructive fire on the clouds of horse in the village, it was answered from their artillery, and some well directed balls fell quite close in front and rear of our line. A shot from one of our eighteens dislodged one of the enemy's guns, killing three men, and several horses; some of his Artillery men came over at this period of the affair, and the battery was in consequence silenced. Our guns kept up a hot fire on their columns in which numbers appeared to fall, and they were now seen to give way, leaving the village which was rendered too hot for them by our guns. They retired behind it, and now some smart skirmishing took place, in which we lost some men: a major and one or two officers receiving some dangerous wounds. A shell having fallen in the Prince's tent, which wounded him slightly, and astonished his followers, they began to retreat, which example shortly afterwards became generally imitated.—Bombay Gazette.

ARAB PIRATES.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE EXPLOITS OF THE JOASSAMEE PIRATES, IN THE GULF OF PERSIA, FROM THEIR RISE IN THE YEAR 1770, TO THEIR SUPPRESSION IN 1821, BY CAPTAIN MIGNAN, BOMBAY EUROPEAN REGIMENT, LATE IN COMMAND OF THE ESCORT ATTACHED TO THE POLITICAL RESIDENT IN TURKISH ARABIA, M. R A., S. E. S., &c. &c.

All British commerce in the Gulf of Persia was, it may be said, until a recent period, at the mercy of the Joassamee Pirates, who swept every thing before them. Their atrocities fully equalled those of the Algerine corsairs. They are a race of Arabs descended from the inhabitants of Nujjud, a vast province of Arabia, and named Beni-Nesar, as being on the left hand side of the Caaba, and also Beni-Gafrek. They have possessed the principality of Seer, in the Oman country, and been an independant tribe from the earliest ages. Their territory on the line of coast of that province, extends from Mussuldom to Zebairia, or the island of Sharjas to the north. That part of the Oman contains many tribes. The Zohairy, Khoasmy, Beni-kutib and Beni-Nain. The latter was the head tribe for many years, but the confusion and anarchy which followed the death of Nadir-Shah, having compelled Moolah-Ali, the Governor of Ormus, Gambaroom and Minah, to solicit the assistance of some Arabs for the purpose of resisting the unjust demands of tribute, which every competitor for the Persian throne preferred, without any consideration to its having been collected by his predecessor, he fixed on Rashid-ben Cassim, with whom he formed alliances by marriage and was enabled by the vessels under his command, to avail himself of their services, whenever required.

The Cassimees, or as we shall hereafter call them, the Joassamees, retained the vessels occasionally sent for them, and being well paid for their assistance, and having also opportunities of procuring arms, they soon acquired an ascendancy among their own tribes, and were enabled to take possession of the towns of Kishom, Luft, Linga, and Shinas, on the Persian coast, and were extending their conquests throughout Moolah Ally's possessions when their career was checked by Shaikh Abdallah, who re-took Ormas, and Gambaroom from Mollah Hussam, and Kishom and Luft, from the Joassamees. During Abdallah's lifetime, they remained passive, but at his death his sons disagreed, and their Government becoming imbecile, the Joassamees re-appeared, and plundered the weaker tribe.

In the year 1772, Shaikh Rashid of Russul-Khymah, who had succeeded his father Shaikh-Mullah, co-operated with Shaikh Khalfon, of Muscat, and destroyed two Persian vessels off Bunderabbas, and a magazine which the Persian troops had formed at Linga.

In 1775, Shaikh Rashed who had become very powerful, and was at variance with the Imaum of Muscat, captured some small craft belonging to Bushire, under the plea that their cargoes were the property of the Imaum. Shortly after this, Rashid retired from public life, and resigned the Sheikhdom to his son, Sugger, who espoused one of Abdullah's daughters, and settled all their existing differences.

The Joassamees now appeared as traders, and by their activity, carried on a most lucrative commerce; but their treacherous disposition constantly shewed itself and led to quarrels, both among themselves and their neighbours. The Persian ascendancy also being on the decline, the Rus-ul-Khymah fleet roused every petty chief to fit out armed boats, manned by a lawless crew, who depended solely on plunder for their maintenance, which they indiscriminately practised. This state of affairs arose entirely out of the differences between Rasul-Khymah and Muscat.

Saikh Sugger next endeavoured to negociate a peace between the Persians and Uttobees, who had plundered and taken Bahrein; but failing in his efforts, he joined Nazir, of Bushire, in an expedition for the recovery of that island; the Joassamee Shaikh having taken part against the Uttobees, in consequence of their capturing one of his boats, and murdering eighteen of her crew. Their attempt for reducing Bahrein was repeatedly made and not abandoned until 1785.

The Joassamees took no part in the disputes which occurred between the Montifik Arabs and the Turkish Government, and they remained tranquil until 1796. In the following year, they captured a vessel under British colors, and charged with public despatches. She was, however, released after a few days. This occurred in May and in October the Company's cruizer Viper was attacked by them whilst at anchor in the roadstead of Bushire. The Joassamee's dows had arrived a week before the Viper, under the command of Shaikh Sallah. Their object was to intercept the Sooree Arabs, who were at Bussorah. On the very day the Viper arrived, Shaikh Sallah obtained an interview with the Resident, when, after the strongest professions of friendship, he stated his views, and begged the Resident not to protect the Sooree dows, nor to ship any Company's property on board of them. He added, however, that if any was shipped, it should of course be held sacred. On taking leave, the Shaikh modestly requested a small supply of ammunition from the Viper, which was no sooner furnished him, than he treacherously attacked her. The Resident remonstrated against both of these acts. He was met on the part of Shaikh Sugger by the strongest professions of regard for the English—that in respect to the attack on the cruizer, she had fired first. He stated that Sallah had separated himself from the tribe—had proceeded to the Persian Court, and had established himself among the Beni-Chalid Arabs, marrying a characterless woman of that tribe. He added that Sallah had acted independant of Bas-ul-Khymah, and committed depredations without the concurrence of the Joassamees, who considered the English their best friends.

These disputes arose also out of the unsettled state of the Muscat Government, on the death of Syed Ahmed, and the usurpation of Syed Sultan. He had involved himself in disputes with the Arabs in the Gulf, which led to a war with many of them, who had united against them; and the Bombay Government considered that those acts of aggression experienced by British vessels had proceeded from Arabs united in the interests of the deposed prince of Oman.

At the close of the year 1798, the Imaum theatened to blockade Bussorah, on account of some ancient claims he possessed against the Pasha of Bagdad. In order that he might the more affectually execute his hostile intention, Syed Sultan negociated a peace with his formidable enemies the Joassamees, who desisted evincing any hostile intentions through the interposition of the Resident at Bussorah.

The Joassamees must have been kept in check by the Wahabees, who had by the middle of 1802 reduced to nominal submission, the whole coast from Bussorah to Deba, which included their own territory. In 1803, Shaikh Sugger died, and was succeeded by his son Shaikh Sultan. Towards the close of 1804, they appear to have been in alliance with the Uttobees, and it was in an engagement with these two tribes that the Imaum lost his life.

We may now date the period when the Joassamees may be said to have engaged in piratical depredations. Up to the present time, they committed no act of piracy with the exception of the capture of the vessel under British colours, and the attack on the Company's cruizer Viper, and they manifested every respect towards our flag. The influence of the Wahabees having been introduced over the principality of Seer, and the Muscat Government after the death of Syed Sultan, having also fallen under the control of that power, the character of the different tribes in the Gulf underwent a material change, and the attention of the Bombay Government was directed to crush the sprit of piracy which at this period began to display itself.

The contention for the Imaumship between the members of the Muscat family, threw the Gulf into a state of great confusion, the Joassamees attacked and captured two vessels belonging to Mr. Manesty, then the Resident at Bussorah, which were charged with public despatches, and the commanders of them were treated with great cruelty. Their fleet also surrounded, and fired into the Honorable Company's cruizer Mornington, but after a few broadsides they were compelled to sheer off. In their successful co-operations with Moolah Hŏssin, of Kishom, against Gambaroom, or Bunderabbas, they hoped to check the advance of Beder, who had succeeded to the Imaumship, and was projecting a plan with the Uttobees, notwithstanding the support he received from the Wahabees, to annihilate the Joassamees, who were at this time in subjection to Abdab Azees.

Syed Beper, on the adjustment of the disputes with Syed Gheiss, of Sohar, proceeded with a land and sea force for the recovery of Bunderabbas, Minab, and Ormus, which he completely effected. Operations were at this time actively prosecuted by the Bombay Government, in conjunction with that of Muscat, against the Joassamees. The combined forces sailed for Kishom, where they blockaded a Joassamee fleet, who were reduced to such distress as to solicit a peace. A truce was granted them until the pleasure of our Government was known, as it would have been impossible to prosecute hostilities without offending the Persians or the Wahabees. The Bombay Government declared that in becoming a party to the peace, it should not be of a limited nature, but extended throughout the Gulf. It also required full indemnification for the losses we had sustained. These orders, however, could not be enforced without having recourse to coercive measures which would have plunged us in a general warfare with the whole of the Gulf, consequently it was deemed advisable to enter into certain agreements with the Joassamees, who desired to return to their former mercantile pursuits. They continued true to their engagement, as far as we were concerned, though they co-operated with the Imaum in an attack upon Syed Gheiss who had refused to become a party to the peace, which he could not in honor do, until he had revenged the blood of Syed Sultan.

Precluded by the treaty of 1806 from piracies in the Gulf, and urged on by the Wahabees, the Joassamees extended them to India. In the beginning of the year 1808, they made their first appearance as corsairs in the Indian seas along the coast to the northward of Bombay. The Wahabee Shaikh had long contemplated the extension of piratical cruizes to India. The Joassamees had, by a late order of the Wahabees, been rendered independant of their lawful Shaikh, who at this period had nothing left him but Rasul-Khymah, Sharga, and Raumps, consequently they put to sea without his permission. Gadeff, an Arab chieftain of the Joassamee tribe, on the Persian coast, was much averse to piracy, but his subjects who were unable to trade on account of the general disputes of their tribes, sought a livelihood in the vessels of others. In one cruize this year they captured twenty large bughalahs, which so elated them, that they determined on sending a fleet of fifty sail to the coast of Kutch. Towards the end of the year, they committed a breach of the treaty of 1806, by attacking and capturing the cruizer Sylph, in the Gulf of Persia The little Sylph, however, was retaken by His Majesty's ship Neriade, which hove in sight at the moment the Joassamees were boarding her.

In the following year, the Wahabees directed the Joassamees and the Uttobees to proceed against Coorte. The former prepared to obey, provided they were supported by ships, but the latter excused themselves.

The Persians from Lar, attacked the Joassamees at Linga, and compelled them to retire to Bassadore on the island of Kishom. They were, however, successful against a squadron fitted out by Mahommud Nebbi-Khaun, against Khore Hassan, and captured six large vessels. At this period, the Wahabee chief, appointed Hussein-ben Alli, a Joassamee, his vicegerent, in the principality of Seer, vested him with authority over Rasul-Khymah, and nominated Wahabee officers throughout the Joassamee country. Shaikh Sultaun, the Joassamee chief, was taken to Deryah, at which capital he was imprisoned by the Wahabee chief. After a detention of some months he contrived to escape from prison, and finding his way to Yemen, embarked at Mocha for Muscat, whence he sought the Imaum's protection, disclaiming all concurrence in the attack on the Sylph, and professing a desire to conform to the treaty of 1806. The Imaum took him to Shyrgah, and placed him over the Joassamee tribes at that place. In September, 1809, the British Government determined to relieve the Imaum of Muscat from the power of the Wahabees, and to suppress their piracies, sent an expedition to the Gulf of Persia, under Sir Lionel Smith and Commodore Rowley. Their first operations were directed against Rasul-Khymah. The attack commenced on the 12th of November by a bombardment. The following day the Joassamees were vigorously attacked by sea and land, and after a bloody but ineffectual resistance, were driven into the interior of the country. The town, with the vessels in port, amounting to upwards of fifty sail, with the prize ship Minerva, were burnt.

From Rasul-Khyma, the armament proceeded to Linga, where twenty dows were destroyed, the inhabitants deserting the town on our approach. Luft was taken possession of by our troops, but the strength of the fort, and the desperate manner in which it was defended, frustrated every attempt to carry it by storm. All the essential objects of the attack were, however, fully attained; their boats and dows were completely destroyed, and the place eventually surrendered, together with property amounting to two lakhs of rupees belonging to the Imaum, which with the fort, were given in trust to Sheikh Dervish, the head of the Beni-main tribe of Arabs who have always been firmly attached to His Highness.

On the reduction of Luft, the expedition proceeded with His Highness of Muscat to Shiraz, where they arrived on the 31st December. The situation of the fort was found too distant to be reduced by bombardment, therefore, the force was immediately landed. This was defended with the most determined bravery, but capitulated after an obstinate and sanguinary resistance, and was made over to the Imaum's troops. Messages were now sent to various chieftains to refrain from giving any encouragement or protection to future pirates, though it was not deemed necessary to insist on the destruction of small craft, which would have ruined the poorer inhabitants and created an odium against us which has never existed.

It now became the prevalent opinion that the Joassamees had been deprived of the power of committing any further depredations by sea. The able Resident at Bussorah confirmed this opinion, but added, that such was the revengeful and vindictive spirit of the Wahabee tribe, and of the inhabitants on the Arabian shore of the Gulf, that they would attempt to wreak their vengeance on any defenceless British vessels which they might meet, and Mr. Manesty suggested that the exportation of timber from the Malabar coast to the Arabian and Parsian Gulf, should be prohibited, including even the port of Muscat, from which place the pirates might contrive to procure it. He also remarked, that as their countries did not produce any kind of timber for the purposes of boat building, and being deprived of their ordinary supply of teak wood, they could not long possess a naval force of any importance.

These corsairs, however, re-appeared in February, 1812, and during the course of the year, destroyed several large bughalahs and dows belonging to Bussorah and Kongoon. Boats navigating under British colours did not even escape their depredations; whilst others, were detained and prevented from prosecuting their mercantile pursuits.

About this period, an Arab chief, named Rahmahbin Jaubir, who was the most successful, and the most generally tolerated pirate perhaps that ever infested any sea, fell in with a large fleet of boats belonging to Bahrein, Bushirss, Kongoon, and Muscat. He captured the whole, including a ship and innumerable small craft, and with few exceptions, put the crews to death. This butcher-chief was governor of Khore Hussier, and escaped the vengeance of our expedition, since, notwithstanding the ferocity of his character, and the apprehension that he would prosecute piracy, he had ever respected the British flag. An additional motive for not breaking with him, was a knowledge that he had entered into an intimacy with the Wahabee power, which it was the policy of our Government not to offend. The chief pirated for himself, and chiefly against the Persians, in revenge for some injuries sustained at Bushire. The followers of this outlaw, to the number of several thousands, maintained themselves by the plunder of prizes, and as they were most of them his own bought slaves, and the remainder equally subject to his power, he was often as prodigal of their lives as those of his enemies whom he not only killed in battle, but basely murdered in cold blood after submission. I have been assured that he once shut up a number of his own crew in a wooden tank in which they kept their water, and threw them all overboard. I was present at the last interview he ever had with the English. It was at the British Resident's, in the presence of that accomplished man Colonel Stannus, and a more ferocious barbarian I never beheld. His dress was disgustingly simple. It consisted of a shirt which did not appear to have been taken off from the time it was first put on; no trowsers covered his lank legs, a large abba encircled his meagre trunk, and a ragged keffiah was thrown loosely over his head. His body was pierced with innumerable bullet wounds, and his face fearfully distorted by several scars, and by the loss of an eye. His left arm had been severely wounded by grape shot, and the bone between the elbow and the shoulder being completely shivered to pieces, the fragments worked themselves out, exhibiting the singular appearance of the arm and elbow adhering to the shoulder, by flesh and tendons alone. Notwithstanding this, he prided himself in being able to use the yambeah with great effect, and it was one of his favourite remarks that he desired nothing better than the cutting of as many throats, as he could effectually open with his boneless arm.

This brutal corsair put to sea on a cruizing expedition, accompanied by a fleet of Joassamee boats which escaped the notice of the late expedition. A desperate action was fought between Rahnah's fleet and the Uttobees of Bahrein, in which the former were victorious. Among his captures were two bughalahs from Bussorah, with horses belonging to the Company, these he transshipped, and had conveyed to Bombay, where they safely arrived. Subsequently, he cruized off Bahrein for the purpose of intercepting the Joassamee boats which frequented that island for dates and rice. In his action with them he sunk four after taking out their cargoes, four others he blew up, not having crews to man them, and the same number he brought into Bushire roads. He then sailed to the southward and continued to cruize between the piratical ports and the pearl bank off Bahrein, pursuing his course of lawless rapine. No corner of the Gulf was safe from his presence, he swept from shore to shore, and passed from isle to isle, with the gloom of a spirit, and the speed of lightning. But here his career was destined to close: he encountered a large bughalah, and on rashly attempting to board her, was overpowered by a superior force. Hastily demanding of his crew whether they would not rather perish by the destruction of their enemies, he went below, attached a match to a powder barrel, and returning on deck ascended the poop with his only son in his arms, when the match communicated. The vessels still grappling together burst into a thousand atoms, and were hurled into the air in the midst of a volcano of flames, and blazing timbers, and when the terrific explosion had subsided, the bodies of the combatants were washed by the agitated waves on the shores of Bahrein.

Thus terminated the career of a man who had infested the Gulf for five and twenty years, and who had excited no less attention from the Bombay Government than the Persian, whose efforts were unable to destroy his squadron. His character and conduct were stained with the common vices of his order. By exhibiting the ferocity of a robber, and the baseness of a traitor, he obtained all his power; and his insatiable thirst for plunder effected his annihilation.

To return to the exploits of the Joassamees, we find that in consequnece of some depredations committed on the trade, remonstrances were sent to the chiefs of the Wahabees and the Joassamees, on the impropriety of their proceedings. A reply was returned from Hussein-Ben-Rahmah, the chief of Rasul-Khymah, stating that he was not aware of any vessels under British colours having been captured by the Joassamees, but that should it be the case, such would be restored. He added, that in future he would issue instructions to his tribe, not to molest or even approach any vessel bearing the British flag, as he did not wish to interrupt the trade in any way. He admitted, however, that his cruizers had paid no very friendly visits to the northern ports of India.

A vakeel also arrived at Bushire, with letters from the Wahabee chief, wherein the conduct of Hussein-bin-Rahmah was severely censured. The vakeel stated that the Joassamees were most anxious to be on good terms with the British, whose good-will they would study hereafter to merit, and would respect both our flag and subjects; but they hoped we would not insist on their relinquishing their claims against those states who were at enmity with them, for according to the Arab law, blood could only be repaid by blood, and if they could not follow this mode of warfare, they would not only lose their rank amongst the Arab states, but their enemies would enter their very doors to attack them. They were moreover compelled by the Wahabee chief to war against those Mahommedan states that had not embraced the religion of the Wahabee. He concluded by observing, that if we would answer for the Arab states not molesting them, and would also shield them from the vengeance of the Wahabee chief for not obeying his command, they would utterly abandon the course of life they were pursuing; but otherwise their situation in the Gulf was such, that they were compelled to be at enmity with the greater part of it.

The Resident admitted the truth of this statement as regarded their very peculiar situation, and the system among the Arabs, as also in respect to the tenets of their religion, so different from other Mahommedan sects, which rendered them the enemies of all other followers of Islam, that he deemed it advisable to overlook the past on certain conditions, which he then conceived sufficient to make their promises binding.

Notwithstandings this, however, some vessel having on board the British pass, were taken off Porebunder, and a boat was dispatched to Rasul-Khymah with letters to Husscin-bin-Rahmah, and his vakeel, who had entered into an engagement of a friendly tenor. The commander of the Resident's boat soon returned in a most deplorable state. The chief of Sharga, to which place the boat first proceeded, took eighty frazils of dates out of her, and seemed disposed to keep the boat also; and on anchoring off the town of Rasul-Khymah a vessel came alongside, and enquired what she wanted. On being informed, they greeted each other, and it was recommended that the Resident's boat should get under weigh and stand into the bay for her security; they offered to pilot her, and on weighing anchor they took her in tow; shortly afterwards about twenty armed men started up from the bottom of the Joassamee boat, and drew their sabres, theatening to murder all the crew of the Resident's vessel, who instantly cut the tow rope, and pulling off to sea, escaped with the greatest difficulty.

The attack on this boat which had been dispatched on the faith of engagements so very recently made, and which had actually arrived at the very threshold of their dwellings, proved what little reliance could be placed on any treaty with such a lawless banditti. The act was at variance, also, with the conduct which so strongly characterizes the Arabs, who fulfil the obligations of hospitality even towards an enemy seeking their protection, and reposing in their confidence. This flagrant breach of faith sufficiently proved a determination on the part of the Joassamees of attacking all vessels they might fall in with.

This attack was followed by their capturing a bughalah belonging to the Imaum of Muscat, whilst at anchor in Mogoo bay. The people of Mogoo were privy to this depredation, and had in fact given information of the bughalah being there. She was laden with horses for the remount of this Majesty's 17th Dragoons, and also with sulphur on account of Government. Six vessels were, moreover, captured off the coast Curachee and Sind.

The brilliant successes that attended the subsequent cruizes, undertaken by the Joassamees, added so much to their strength, that it induced most of the other ports on the coast from Cape Nabon to the southward to follow the same system. The Sheikh of Charrack in particular, was encouraged to form a connection with Rasul-Khymah, and Abdallah-bin-Ahmed, of Bahrein, openly avowed his determination of prosecuting piracy, as the surest and speediest mode of acquiring wealth.

A ship belonging to the port of Bombay, sailing under British colors, was so late as the year 1816 captured by them off Muscat, the greater part of the crew were put to death, and a ransom exacted for the release of the survivors. They also engaged and beat off the Imaum's fleet, and had very nearly taken the Caroline, a fine 32 gun frigate. The audacity of these pirates increased to such a degree that they attacked the Honorable Company's cruizer Aurora, gave chase to, and fired into the American ship Persian, and so great was the dread entertained of the Joassamees, that the resident in the Gulf could not even obtain a vessel to dispatch to Rasul-Khymah for the conveyance of letters of remonstrance to the chiefs in regard to these depradations.

Three vessels belonging to Surat were taken in the Arabian Gulf sailing under British colors, and many of their crews were murdered. The loss of property by these captures was estimated at a crore of rupees.

Many other captures were made of vessels sailing under our protection, attended by similar acts of atrocity, and when a deputation was sent to Rasul-Khymah to obtain redress for the capture of the vessels in the Arabian Gulf, it totally failed. The Joassamees explicitly and boldly replied that they would respect the sect of chieftains, and their property, but none other. They added that they did not consider any part of westward India belonging to the British, except Bombay and Mangalore, and that if we interfered in favour of the Hindoos, and other unbelievers of India, we might just as well grasp at all Arabia, when nothing would be left for them to plunder.

The crews from a squadron of Joassamee boats, landed in the month of October, of the same year, on the island of Bushead, and burnt all the villages at its eastern point, carrying off cattle and killing hundreds of the inhabitants.

At the close of the year we find them in the harbour of Assaloo, taking five freighted bughalahs, valued at three lakhs of rupees, and murdering all on board. The inhabitants of Bushire were greatly alarmed, from the Joassamees contemplating an attack on the city of Busorah. The Governor of Bushire could scarcely restrain the inhabitants from flying into the interior of the country.

The Joassamee fleet remained twelve days at Assooloo, and then proceeded to Kongoon, but finding that they were likely to meet with a warm reception, they weighed, and standing to the northward, anchored off Zaire, where a landing was effected, and all the date groves destroyed. They were repulsed, however, in an action with the inhabitants, and obliged to take to their boats.

Apprehending an attack by the Turkish troops, the Joassamee chief sent a number of people from Rasul-Khymah to build a fort at Bassadore on the west end of the island of Kishom, which they intended to garrison. About this period, the Bombay Government landed a force on the island, and took such effectual measures for suppressing piracy, that the Joassamees ceased from cruizing over the Gulf, and have ever since confined themselves to petty piracies amongst their own tribes, which chiefly inhabit the Arabian coast. Our own vessels of war are constantly making the tour of the Gulf, and have no difficulty in checking all open ruptures, so that we may confidently assert that as long as the newly built 18 gun sloops are kept afloat in the Gulf of Persia, we shall hear of few piracies, and still fewer captures.—Bambay Courier.

NOTES ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

No. XLVI.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

The second point which claims attention in considering the future operations of the new Government, is the existing necessity for the creation of private property in land, and of imposing some restriction on taxation. Those who have read these papers, and have looked over some of our regulations, and have there found rules without end for ascertaining the rights of the different classes of people, for decisions regarding land, and other points of this nature, will be startled at this. But the truth is, that in the Western Provinces, private property in land has yet no existence. It did exist under the native governments, but among other blessings which the English have bestowed on the Indians is that of decreasing their cares by annihilating the right to the land. I am not aware that any enactment was ever passed to that effect: we have gone a shorter and more simple way to work: we have merely arrogated to ourselves the right to assess the land at our own valuation and to sell it by auction when the rent was not paid; and we have rigidly enforced this assumed prerogative: as long as such a system is in force, it is idle to talk of any private property in land. But again and again let it be urged on our rulers, that direct taxation has attained its extreme limits as far as regards the net revenue to be raised thereby; that a moderate permanent demand on the land will be the foundation of the prosperity of the country; and that the ultimate result of a liberal policy on this head will be encreased revenue to Government, while the condition of the people will be infinitely improved. When the natives of India see any prospect of advantage or profit from the adoption of a better system of agriculture, they will not be slow to follow the example which may be set them. Their superior condition will then produce an increase in the excise and customs, while the expense of collecting the revenue will be considerably lessened.

It is indeed encouraging to perceive that already better principles and feelings are in progress of adoption. The settlement which is about to be formed for twenty years is based on a moderate assessment of rent, so as to leave profit to the cultivators, and several functionaries in high office are anxious that as soon as completed it should be declared permanent. It is most fervently to be hoped that our rulers will have their eyes sufficiently opened to their true interests to induce them to agree to the proposition.

Third.—As connected with this subject I may be allowed to express the hope that Government will be bold enough to make a serious innovation in the Mahomedan-Hindoo law of inheritance and succession to real property. Under the existing law and practise, it is almost impossible that there can ever be a respectable middle class of landed proprietors to form the link so much wanted between the rulers and the common people: and I am convinced that a modified law of primogeniture might be introduced into India, in such a manner as not only to leave no cause of complaint to the people on the score of interference in their peculiar customs, but so as to make them ere long feel and acknowledge that it was beneficial to their interests. This subject will hereafter be alluded to more in detail.

Fourth.—To establish the liberty of the press by law has, to his shame be it spoken, been left by Lord William to his successor. Sir Charles Metcalfe has been bold enough to carry into effect that which Lord William dared not do. But Lord William's moral courage was not of that order which would prompt him to enact any measure which he feared might incur the displeasure of his immediate masters, the Court of Directors. Many of the old school anticipate great danger to our Indian dominions from this proceeding, and in confirmation of their fears, they point to what they consider the alteration which has taken place during the last few years in the feelings of the people towards the English, and the tone in which they express themselves. "This," they exclaim, "is the work of the Press! and it will end in the expulsion of the English from India." They are greatly mistaken. The Press has had no share in the creation of these sentiments on the part of the people. Hatred and dislike to the English have long been deeply engraven on their hearts, and though a lamentable consideration, it is but too true, that from the treatment they have hitherto received at our hands, it would be wonderful were it otherwise. The Press has during the last five years undoubtedly been the means of giving us some insight into the feelings of the natives, and has pointed out our own misconduct. Instead of congratulating ourselves on the innumerable blessings for which they are indebted to us, and in utter ignorance of their real sentiments enjoying ourselves in fancied security and descanting on the respect and esteem in which we suppose ourselves to be held by them, we now see not only the hollowness of the ground on which we stand, but the best mode of consolidating it and preventing it sinking under our feet. For this we are indebted to the free expression of opinion which has informed us of our danger, but which has had no hand in its existence. Notwithstanding the assertions of those who, unable to shut their eyes to the real state of affairs, are willing nevertheless to account for it in any way which should save their own credit, I again and again repeat, that there is nothing in the circumstances of our being conquerors, foreigners, or of a different faith and colour from our Indian fellow subjects, that would of themselves excite in them hostility or aversion. The real cause is our own short-sighted policy and cupidity; and the consequent extortion and misgovernment which we have practised. The people of India, as I have before observed, have so long been accustomed to the dominion of strangers and conquerors of various nations and tribes that they are almost indifferent about the matter. The individual character of their Superior Authority is all they regard; and if we act so as to merit their esteem and confidence so assuredly will it be conceded to us, of which abundant proof may be adduced.

But the freedom of the Press is not yet legally established, and we may still be disappointed. Sir Charles Metcalfe is but officiating, and may be relieved before he has completed the measure, while the new Governor may be of different politics. But after all, no local act can permanently establish the desired object: it will still be at the mercy of any Governor under that accommodating plea "political expediency." Nothing short of an act of Parliament can place it on a secure foundation; and until this be obtained the subject must be unceasingly agitated.

Fifth.—THE CHOICE OF A PROPER LANGUAGE AND CHARACTER FOR THE PROCEEDINGS OF GOVERNMENT AND OFFICIAL BUSINESS.—Here again Lord William has allowed to escape him a noble opportunity of breaking through old prejudices, and doing an act of justice to the people. It is idle to suppose that the mass of any numerically great nation will voluntarily change their own language or written character; and a monstrous piece of injustice to attempt to compel them so to do; with the alternative of throwing great hindrance in the way of distributing justice. So much has been said in the late discussions on this head, that little room is left for any fresh observations. With the exception of a few bigots of the old school, whose sole reply (by them intended for argument) is the ultima ratio of those who have not a single reason to advance—"If it were better why was it not introduced before;" it is universally allowed that the Persian jargon (for it is nothing more) used in the Courts, must be exploded. Some who appear to have lost sight of the dictates of common sense advocate the adoption of English, while a few whose understandings have not been quite blinded by the real state of things, are fully aware that the vernacular must ultimately become the language of business.

This advance ground has been gained, but then comes the battle whether the Persian, English, or Nagree written character shall be adopted. The first of these is foreign to the people which one would imagine a sufficient reason for its rejection. The very advantage which it possesses in expressing the Persian language is lost: the Persian language in its own character is certainly written faster than either Nagree or English. If this however, be an argument for its adoption here, it would apply with equal force to its introduction into the Courts in England, for it is not at all more a foreign language there than here: but the Hindoostanee language in the Persian character, is neither written nor decyphered quicker than when its own letters, the Nagree, are used. In fact the adoption of the Persian character to write the Hindoostanee language is as to select the English would be. As to the Romanizing nonsense which has turned the heads of so many men from whom one expected more sense, it is supported by vanity, indolence, and ignorance of human nature. The grand object of its advocates is to transmit their names to posterity as the founders, or at least propagators of a new alphabet, and these are joined by others who do not like the trouble of learning the oriental letters, while both parties are so ignorant of the world, and so misled by the visions of future fame as to overlook the impracticability of the scheme. It is truly lamentable to see men wasting in such absurdities those talents and that benevolence of feeling which might be so much better employed. That a certain portion of the people will learn to write their own language in the Roman character no one doubts. Those who aspire to official employment will qualify themselves in any way that may be pointed out, whether it be to acquire Greek or the Chinese language: but to imagine that the mass of the people will for the sake of handing down to posterity the names of a few visionary enthusiasts, give up their own character which has been in use for centuries, is about as rational an anticipation as that the English may be induced to write their language in the Nagree. If it were merely a speculation to amuse a few individuals and gratify their vanity at their own expense, it would signify little, and certainly would not deserve the attention which it has received from the public: but the mischief of it is, that influence and official authority have lent their sanction to the scheme* and time and money are thrown away which might be so much better employed, while all real advancement in knowledge and all real improvement are retarded. There is one comfort however, that the mania will not last. It will rise and fall with its originators. When some of these shall have returned to England and others have departed this life, "its memorial will perish with them," save that perhaps a melancholy voice will now and then be heard lamenting the time lost in its acquirement and the uselessness of the labour undergone. Had those who have wasted so much talent, time, and money, devoted these valuable and responsible means of usefulness to the instruction of the people, or to the translation of works of information and improvement into the vernacular language and character, they would so far have conferred a solid benefit, the advantages of which would have been felt for ages to come. When a horticulturist introduces exotic trees into a climate uncongenial to their growth, he may by extraordinary culture contrive to keep them alive, and perhaps enable them to produce some tasteless and degenerate fruit; but no sooner has he quitted the scene of his experiments, than the trees, deprived of their artificial stimulus, languish and die way, and it is perceived that the soil might have been occupied to much greater purpose by trees of indigenous growth, which required only the sun and air to nourish them, and under the shade of which many might have rejoiced.

* In addition to which some of those in office who have been bitten by the mania, are in the habit of franking the Romanizing papers to the different stations in the interior, to the great benefit of the bookseller who supplied them: whose sale is thereby doubtless, considerably encreased. With all their mania the Romanizers have not had the sense to select the best system for expressing Hindoostanee in the Roman character. Sir William Jones's may be more classical, but there are some sounds in the Hindoostanee which he has given no symbol to represent. The fact was he did not understand Hindoostanee sufficiently to know what sounds and symbols were required. Gilchrist, who was well acquainted with the language, has invented a much better system of expressing its sounds in the Roman character. The Romanizers of the present day were not even satisfied with Sir William Jones's plan, but must add a number of modifications of their own invention and stupid enough they are. The distinguishing of letters by dots and dashes is one of the worst that could be devised: simply because in quick writing these dots and dashes would be omitted or placed wrong: and the result would be of writing Oordo in the

I do not deny that the publication of oriental books, particularly such as Dictionaries, Grammars and Vocabularies, in the Roman character, may be useful to Englishmen: with such facilities many would acquire some colloquial knowledge of the language of those with whom they were destined to transact business, who otherwise would have remained ignorant, owing to their dislike to take the trouble of learning a new character. But the general education of a whole nation can only be attempted with any hope of success in the vernacular tongue and letters: and they have a right to demand in common justice that these shall be the medium of communication in the Courts and Government offices. As to the desideratum of an universal character to express all languages, there is as much chance of such a thing being invented and brought into general use as there is that all nations will learn the same language. Have the visionaries who urge this ever really considered the matter with attention, and the immense number of characters or cyphers that they will have to invent? we have twenty-six letters in the English alphabet, some of which have each two sounds, and such in the universal character ought each to have a corresponding letter. The Hindoostanee or Ordoo contains some fourteen or fifteen letters which have sounds unknown to us: the Persian has eight or ten which have no corresponding signs or symbols in either English or Ordoo: there is probably not a language in the world which does not possess some sounds peculiar to itself unknown in any others. To comprise the whole the universal character must contain some five hundred or more letters, and supposing it possible to form such a character, cui bono? who has leisure or ability to learn one twentieth or thirtieth part of the number of the known languages, so as to turn his acquirements to any useful purpose? for a language is only the key, not knowledge in itself. But supposing it to be in the power of any individual to master all the languages in the world, why should he invent new symbols and reject those already in use.

But to the point. The character already in use among the people ought to be that of the Courts and Government offices, i. e. the Bengali for Bengal proper, and the Nagree for Hindoostan. The latter is certainly a stiff character, and not written quite so quickly as either Persian or English, but this is a trifling disadvantage compared with the advantages of having but one character in use all over the country.

At present it is not uncommon to see filed in one suit on trial, papers in Persian, in the Ordoo language and Persian character, in Nagree, and in the Mahajunnee. The old objection, that the Nagree is with difficulty decyphered, has been over and over again answered. Those who are well taught will read it with fluency. The varieties in the letters are not greater than exist in our own English alphabet; and not only would these gradually die away, but the letters would, in all probability, be simplified, and a much quicker mode of writing introduced by practise. Let any one examine English manuscripts of only two or even one century old, and observe the flourishes and turns attached to half the alphabet, to be convinced of the truth of this observation. The grand advantage, however, would be an improvement in the administration of justice, and the stimulus which it would give to the education and improvement of the people. The mass of the people would then be able to read and comprehend legal proceedings, and in minor suits and trials could manage their own business instead of being at the mercy of a set of low attorneys whom they are now obliged to employ. As to education, ask a shop-keeper, a farmer, a village accomptant (putwarree) a servant, or indeed any of the lower or middling classes "why do you not teach your son English or Persian, which would qualify him for Government employment?" His answer will be "my son's labour is too valuable to me to allow him to spend many years in studying a foreign language, nor could I afford the expense requisite to pay the tutor"—urge him to teach his children to write their own language in the Persian or Roman character—he replies "this might enable him to keep his own

Roman character, that all distinction between the soft and harsh d, t, and other letters would be lost; and then the pronunciation would become confused. Our d may answer to the Hindee soft d, but instead of d in italics, or d with a dot, to represent the harsh Hindee d, it would have been far better to have invented a new character.

accompts but would be useless in the transaction of business with his own countrymen." But when the question was merely to learn a slight variety of the alphabet already in general use there can be no doubt, but that the Nagree prescribed for the Government offices would immediately be generally adopted all over the country. To the English functionaries the advantage would be immense in having but one language and character to acquire instead of two or three; and they would of course be much sooner and much better qualified than they now are to administer justice and transact the business of the country.

The grand objection, after all, which influences the majority of the existing race of Government functionaries to oppose this most desirable change, however reluctant they may be to confess it, even to themselves—is the dislike to the trouble of having to acquire a new character after having been accustomed to an old one. But surely such a feeling as this ought not to be allowed to stand in competition with the welfare of a whole people which would be promoted by an improved system of the administration of justice and the spread of education. Nothing short of a positive order from Government will effect the change. But let it be once issued, and the object will be attained without further difficulty. It is like a project for introducing a new and improved system of drill for the army. If the Commander-in-Chief were to consult every officer, and listen to the variety of opinions which would be offered, he would never arrive at any satisfactory conclusion, nor would the change be adopted, the main objection being in reality the dislike which the officers had to go to school again. The military chief would pursue a different plan. He would consult a few officers of intelligence and ability, and being himself satisfied with the superiority of the plan about to be substituted would order it to be introduced into the army. This would speedily be effected, and in a few years the old system would be forgotten, or only remembered as an obsolete practice which was happily exploded.

Let this example be followed in regard to the abolition of Persian and the introduction of Bengallee and Hindoostanee for transacting the business of Government, the beneficial effects would ere long be apparent. Justice would be better administered. Translations would be made into the books composed in them, and in a very few years we should look back upon the exploded system, wondering at the absurdity of our predecessors who had maintained it so long. At the same time to promote still further the improvement of the people, let us as much as possible diffuse instruction in the English language, and in the course of twenty or thirty years, when the present race of native officials shall have passed away, it is probable that from Calcutta to the Sutledge, there will not be found five hundred natives acquainted with the Persian language or character. All that is necessary to prevent a check to business is to prescribe a certain period, within which, all now officially appointed, must either qualify themselves in the new mode or quit their situations: and with the exception here and there of a bigotted individual or some who were tired of work and had accumulated a sufficiency to live in independence, it would not, when the time arrived for the change, be necessary to discharge a single officer, English or Native.

Sixth—Test of Language.—A law, fixed as those of the Medes and Persians, should be enacted, that no one in the employ of Government, civil or military, should be vested with any authority or controul over the people, until he had acquired a tolerable knowledge of the vernacular language and writings. One of the arguments for introducing English into the Courts is, that Judges at least could understand the proceedings, whereas at present neither party do. This is true enough and lamentable also, particularly as it is caused by our own absurdity in making use of a language foreign to both parties. But it is one of the disgraceful instances of the little attention paid by the British Indian Government to the real interests of its native subjects. Almost daily are Englishmen placed in command of troops,—in staff employ,—in situations where they have to superintend mercantile transactions of considerable importance, or large bodies of native workmen;—nay even to preside in court, as Judges and Magistrates (for though they are designated by the titles of assistant to a Political Agent or others, this is in reality their duty) who for any thing that Government know or care, may be quite unable to hold the slightest communication with the people. While such a state of things as this exists, surely such a law as is proposed is absolutely necessary.

Seventh.—Purveyance and forced-labour system.—I must be allowed to request the Members of Government would once more turn to No. 25. of these papers, treating of this head, and describing the infamous extortion and oppressions which are practised. If they think them exaggerated, let them appoint a committee of impartial men to investigate the matter, and then some remedy might be speedily hoped for.

Eighth.—Code of Laws. The Law Commission is, I believe, already employed in consolidating and revising this; and though the work proceeds but slowly the boon will be great when we receive it. One only point I shall here notice. Many very useful modifications, or new enactments, are from time to time proposed by various Judges and other functionaries to the superior Courts and Boards, and even to Government, most of which are deposited in the office, and remain in oblivion. I do not blame the higher authorities for this, as I am well aware their time is fully occupied in the current duties of their respective offices;

but now, under the new Law Commission, we hope a different course will be pursued. It should be the duty of the Secretary to the Commission carefully to note down every suggestion made relative to the modification of the existing laws; to bring the same before the members, who decide upon the rejection or adoption of what was proposed; and in the latter case, whether the amendment should be immediately brought into force, or placed on record to be again brought forward at a general revision.

One point requires speedy attention, i. e., to check the arbitrary, unjust, and illegal measures of the Supreme Court in extending its process all over the country; and to annihilate "constructive residence," and all the rest of the technical jargon and illegality contrived to fleece honest men for the support of the dignity of the court and for the benefit of the lawyers.

Ninth.—CUSTOMS AND TRANSIT DUTIES.—This withering system so destructive of all commerce and manufactures, has been so often alluded to, that little is left to say, and indeed there is but one opinion on the subject. No man doubts that ultimately, if these vexatious restrictions were abolished, the revenue would increase while the people would be relieved from incalculable oppression and inconvenience. All are agreed on this point; all that we want is a Governor with sufficient moral courage to face the storm which the Court of Directors would probably thunder in his ear, on perceiving the immediate deficit. Let us also hope that our rulers both here and in England may unite their strength in endeavouring to procure from Parliament the abolition of the unjust taxation of India in the form of high duties on her staple commodities. On this head, indeed, the prospects for India are cheering. Owing to the popularity-hunting measures of the Whigs, the West Indies will very soon follow the fate of St. Domingo, the field will be open for India, and the superior cheapness with which we can raise colonial produce here will ensure us the monopoly which the West Indies have hitherto enjoyed by means of unjust laws and corrupt influence.

Tenth.—TEST OF ASCERTAINING THE CHARACTER OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.—Let us hope that this subject will meet with speedy attention. So far from complaining of the establishment of a test of this nature, all in the Government employ who possess any good feeling, and a real wish to do their duty so as to promote the welfare of the people, would rejoice in the establishment of some system by which the able and zealous might receive the reward of their exertions, while the indolent and inefficient officers would be kept in subordinate situations. But this neither has nor will be accomplished by a system of secret espionage. Let us hope that our next Governor may, unlike Lord William Bentinck, be one who knows how to raise a man in his own estimation by confidence and encouragement; and that needless distrust, suspicion, and detraction must ultimately destroy all high principle and probity together wih zeal and ardour for the public good.

Official reports are a legitimate source for ascertaining the character of public functionaries. There can be no objection that the head of an office should report on the qualifications of those who are placed under him; only let the reports be public and let them be shown to those whom they concern. But although in theory it sounds well, little practical utility will be derived from these reports, unless some defined principle be laid down on which they are to be made. At present, all is vague, depending entirely on the character of the reporting officer, and as almost every man prefers his own opiuions to those of another, he will be guided by his own practice and conduct in estimating the behaviour of his subordinates: the nearer this approaches to his own standard the more efficient will he consider them. I will put aside cases where personal friendship or personal dislike operate to produce a favorable or unfavorable report of those under the authority reporter—of which, however, India will afford but too many instances—and will view the subject in another light, viz., that owing to our exclusive service of routine, many of the higher functionaries are, as public officers, greatly inferior to their juniors. For instance, Mr. A. the Commissioner is desired to report on the qualifications of the Collectors under him; but Mr. A., as all who suffer from being subject to his authority well know, is a fool, utterly ignorant of business and the customs of the people,—and in reality quite unfit to hold even the situation of a Deputy-Collector or Head Assistant. On the other hand, one or two of the Collectors under him are able and active men who are promoting the public good; but the measures they wish to introduce are very different from those prescribed by the Commissioner; and as fools have generally the highest opinion of themselves, he finds fault with them in his reports to Government: unfortunately he is not obliged to enter into particulars and state the reasons which induce him to disapprove of their conduct: he only reports in general terms that he has cause to be dissatisfied with the proceedings of Mr. C. or Mr. B. so if Government should be ignorant of his real character, the reports of a fool have the power of injuring the prospects of really efficient men. This is no imaginary case; it has taken place and is going on at this very moment. Some Commissioners and Judges stand high in the opinion of the Board who are notorious among the people for their inefficiency, and in one or two cases for corruption.

The real standard of the character of a public officer ought to be, the opinion of the people: but it will be a long time before the free expression of this will readily find access to Government. In the mean time a test may at least be established on certain fixed principles. If public functionaries before being appointed to any new situation, were obliged to pass an examination regarding a knowledge of the laws and customs of the people, the Regulations of Government, the best practical mode of doing business and of regulating an office, on a system defined by Government, and not left to the caprice of each examining officer, it would at least insure that they possessed the ground—work of knowledge, without which no man can be fit for public employment—but this has been already treated of more in detail in No 31, to which I beg to refer those of my readers who are interested in the subject. Let also reports be made; but instead of being confined to general terms, let every reporting officer be obliged to state his reasons for the censure or approbation he bestows; and to send a copy of his report to those whose conduct is animadverted on.

Eleventh.—The Anomaly and indecision which has hitherto characterized the British Indian Government should be abandoned for a system founded on fixed principles. For numerous instances of the absurdities induced by the present mode of conducting affairs by temporary rules arising from particular occasions, but made generally applicable. See No. 27.

Twelfth.—The Impediment to improvement caused by the present mode of conducting the service of Government, that is, the inveterate prejudice in favor of the abilities and capacities of our own countrymen for all and every appointment to the injury and exclusion of the natives: so that, to give a few instances, a man who hardly knows a horse from a cow is placed in charge of a large stud; another, equally ignorant of the duties it involves, is appointed civil engineer and architect;—a third who knows neither how to draw or to take an observation, or the use of a single surveying instrument, is employed in making a map of a district;—and so on—numerous instances of which will be found in detail in No. 29.

Thirteenth.—INTERCOURSE BETWEEN THE ENGLISH AND NATIVES.—To this subject I have already devoted several papers, and shall shortly offer some additional observations in detail which would exceed the limits of the present number.

It will be sufficient at present to suggest the propriety, not to say necessity, of some rules on the subject being laid down by Government for the regulation of all that relates to official intercourse, and that it should no longer be left to individual caprice or inclination.

Some points on which I have not entered sufficiently into detail in this number must be left for future discussion, and others on which I have not touched, will be hereafter brought forward.

A FRIEND TO INDIA.

THE LAW COMMISSION.

No. I.

In this country where there are few and insufficient means of conveying to Government what may be called, even here, public opinion—where the press still labors under the subdued spirit of a long period of thraldom, from which it is now only slowly emerging—where there is no assembly for the public discussion of measures of Government—where information regarding the defects of the existing administration, the wants and feelings, of the great mass of people inhabiting the vast countries under the British crown, is only obtained by private (private as relating to the public,) official reports drawn from individual employés, without that check of public scrutiny and comment, which is requisite either to secure faithfulness or completeness—where even those reports, such as they are, are communicated only to the Government of one portion of these dominions, I presume, the communication of the reflections of individuals on such subjects as may have engaged their attention, will not to be unacceptable to a body assembled for deliberation on one of the most responsible and important duties that can be intrusted to them. Some suggestions may point out subjects worthy of consideration: some information may be given deserving farther inquiry: something may be brought forward that might otherwise be overlooked. With these sentiments and with a hope of being in some degree useful, even if it were only to provoke discussion, it is my intention to address you from time to time, relating to the high and interesting duty you are now entering on.

I shall only give a hasty glance at the different judiciary systems existing in this country:—

1st.—His Majesty's Supreme Courts at the three presidencies, with jurisdiction over all British Europeans, servants of Government, and the native and other population within a limited space of the Courts. The laws, civil and criminal, within such jurisdiction being, with certain exceptions, the English code administered according to English practice, by English lawyers.

2d.—The Courts of the Honourable Company, having jurisdiction over all others within the British territories under Fort William, guided by laws enacted from time to time by the Governor-General in Council, the civil code being that of the Hindoos, in cases where Hindoos are parties; the criminal being that of Mahommed, whether the accused be Hindoo or Musselmaun, with certain modifications. The rules of procedure being provided for by express enactments equally applicable to all. The whole administered by judges selected from the covenanted civil servants: in small causes by native judges; and in criminal causes by Mahommedan Law officers sitting as judges of the law and of the fact, along with the covenanted judge. The language of record is Persian.

3d.—In the presidency of Madras the Mahommedan code is also the law in criminal cases as in Bengal. The rules of procedure are different in many respects from those of the sister presidency.

4th.—The Bombay code differs essentially from the other two. The criminal judicature is administered under express laws made by the Government, and not under the law of the koran. Civil justice is dispensed according to the law of the defendant and the common law of the place. The procedure in all cases is determined by the enactments of Goverment, and equally applicable to all. The language of record, is the language of the province where the judge sits. The laws are administered by covenanted servants and by native judges; the latter alone having original jurisdiction in civil causes, the European judge being only appellate, excepting where an European is a party.

All of these codes are defective in many respects. Much that is good is to be found in them, and although the recognition of the Mahommedan law seems to those who are at all acquainted with its absurdities, an anomaly, it is to be remembered that it has been much qualified in practice, and in these enlightened times when people begin to think for themselves, and are emancipating themselves from the despotism so long exercised by English lawyers, I will venture to say that the Mahommedan or any other code contains not more fallacies, absurdities, unsound maxims and rules than the English code does. I think I may even venture to appeal to the members of the English bar in your Committee for their assent: they are, I hope and believe, too enlightened, liberal and philosophical to be influenced by the prejudices of education and professional partiality; no, I trust that your whole Committee are guided but by one feeling to make use of that high talent, experience and knowledge you are possessed of, for the single-minded object of conferring on the many millions who are subject to our Government, such a code of laws as shall insure to the utmost of your ability, an efficient, simple and impartial administration of justice.

With this great and philanthropic end in view, the first important question that arises is, whether there should be one law for Europeans, and another law for natives, or one code to embrace all classes?

I shall first consider the criminal administration. The same obstacles that present themselves in civil judicature, do not seem to apply to this question. The greater crimes are sufficiently marked in the minds of the least enlightened even of our native subjects, to make them aware that their commission will subject them to punishment. There are, no doubt, some offences which by English feeling are more or less heinous than the native laws consider them, but some of these emanate from priestcraft and religion, such as protection given to Brahmins, sutties, slavery, bigamy, cows and other sacred animals, &c.; but the distinction in favour of classes and peculiarities, have been in numerous instances removed without offence; and so long as an action not already known to be criminal, but which may in our view be a moral offence, is not made punishable, it is not to be expected that any enactments for offences against the person or property would either be not understood or acknowledged. By attaching a punishment to what is in our opinion an offence against morality, might no doubt operate in deterring from its commission, but when the public is not concerned, I would rather that conviction of its criminality were obtained through education, than attention to a precept enforced by the sword of justice.

But in framing a code, offences against the property and person are the great objects of legislation, and if one law for such can be made applicable to all, offences against morality will not form an insurmountable obstacle. I have already alluded to the great innovations that have been wisely introduced in the Bengal and Madras codes on the Mahommedan criminal one, without any evil effect, nor do we learn from history that its introduction by the Musselman conquerors in supercession of the Hindoo system created political or other dangers.

We have lately seen the successful prohibition of suttees by a final enactment. In various parts of Hindostan we have seen the slaughter of cows, &c., without commotion, or other clamour than what may have been made by interested Brahmins. We have the instance of the good Schwartz, when protected by the ruling authority, preaching against Hindooism, without endangering the peace of the country. We now see Missionaries preaching and instructing without offence to the people in places where under native Governments they would have run the risk of their lives: the great body of the people, the ryuts—are passive. They may be ruled with a rod of iron or with the gentlest sway. They will be happier under the one than the other, but they seldom become agitated. The priests are more loud and chieftains may complain or threaten, and with money they may buy the services of the idle or the starving, but where are there any such now remaining capable of seriously disturbing our Government! It is not, therefore, I conceive, any political consideration that need influence you.

The consideration of these subjects, combined with the experience I have of the operation of our laws, and of the native character, lead me to think it very practicable and most desirable, that there should be only one Penal code for the four presidencies.

From this code should not be excepted the native inhabitants of the capitals where H. M.'s Courts are situated. If English law is to be continued, let it be confined to those for whom it was made. I would have said also, for those who understand it: this I believe, however, no one pretends to do. It is cumbrous, vexatious, causing litigation, incomprehensible, expensive both to the state and the litigants, mischievous and inefficient. If any one really think otherwise I would beg to refer him to the records of public opinion in England, to our experience here, to the proceedings in Parliament, and if he has been so unfortunate, to his own experience. The English criminal code is undergoing a change, but when it will be completed is beyond our reach to divine, and if ever finished, the different state of society there from what it is here, and various other circumstances, must always render it a much more complex system than seems to be requisite in this country.

If insurmountable difficulties be not apprehended to framing a code that shall be applicable to such a variety of people, habits, religion and language as exists in British India, I cannot think but that the same laws might govern the comparative handful of Europeans. You are not trammeled with what some still call the beautiful system of the British code. Laws founded on reason, on just principles, and defining how crimes shall be punished, would be partial if exceptions were made. If for Europeans as a class, why not one for rich and another for poor Europeans? introduce the benefit of clergy and punish an uneducated man more severely for a theft than an educated one. It is education that makes a great distinction between the generality of Europeans and natives, and if that be the ground of an argument for having different criminal codes, the same would require a graduated code for the different degrees of civilization among Englishmen. Still there would be no necessity for distinguishing Europeans, they would come into their places on the scale with natives who were their equals. A Ram Mohun Roy, for instance, and Shihajee Dagajee, Esqrs., or some of the other justices of Bombay, could perhaps be put on their trial with some of their educated but fair brethren.

The codes now in force in India embrace all classes of the native inhabitants, however varied their religion, their language, their degrees of civilization; and however different may have been the laws supplanted, Englishmen are already in many cases subject to the same laws. Our Military Courts are widely different in practice from the Court of King's Bench, but we do not hear that they are defective in essentials, and they have no lawyers attached to them. They have jurisdiction over both natives and Europeans, therefore having these examples of the well-working of a system to a limited extent widely differing from Courts of Law in England, where is the cause of doubt that laws may be made to embrace all within its jurisdiction, whether black or white, Hindoo or Christian, Mahommedan or Jew?

Alluding to this subject in connection with colonization, the Governor-General, in discussing a judicial system to meet the supposed influx of Europeans, observes in one of his minutes, that he does not anticipate from their presence any occasion of dispute which a tolerable judiciary establishment would not be competent to settle; that he would rather expect increased facilities; and in this opinion the Chief Judge of the Supreme Court concurred. In the course of this discussion, plans as various as the number of proposers, were suggested. Lord William Bentinck alone, and wisely, suspended his opinion of what the laws should be, but decidely thought there should be only one jurisdiction. Mr. Holt McKenzie recommended one code of laws for all classes. Sir C. Grey would separate each presidency into several divisions, each being governed by "a different but a single and uniform system of Regulations." Sir J. Franks boldly proposed the introduction of English law, English language and of course English lawyers. But there is another suggestion—an after-thought apparently. It is to form a snug jurisdiction of 50 miles diameter round Calcutta (it says not whether the radius of the Bombay and Madras Courts are to be extended) containing a population nearly equal to half that of England, for which one code should be framed for all within it. The variety of people scattered over Hindoostan: the intricacies of land tenures: the peculiar usages to be found among the people, their own incapacity in short, are the reasons for not extending the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court farther. Beyond this circle no alteration is thought necessary on this new plan: the Judges say that Europeans who may from choice pass the barrier, may very properly be subject to whatever Regulations Government may pass; and they have no doubt that Government would find no difficulty in preventing evils. From these diversified, and with all deference I would say, lamentably ill-digested propositions, I apprehend you will gain only two consistent results, viz., that one code may be framed for all classes, native and European, and that the Judges of the Supreme Court should be placed at the head of it. The idea of experimentalizing on the "intricate land tenures—peculiar usages and customs"—at the expense of 5 or 6 millions of people, appears to me as wicked as it is unsound in conception; for if a good and complete code can be made for such a population, it would surely be the duty of Government to extend its protection to the whole country. If such cannot be found, how unjust to subject so many to it. No allusion seems to have been made to the distinction between a penal and civil code, it is to be concluded then that it never presented itself, or that no impediments were noticed to the one more than to the other!

The possibility of adopting one set of laws for civil judicature is the next important question I would refer to. To sweep away the religious or written and the common laws of the Hindoos and Mahommedans, I conceive to be neither practicable nor adviseable. Their rights and usages are so interwoven with their religion, an attempt to efface the one would be an attack on the other; but a great deal might be done to obtain uniformity and distinctness by determining what are their written laws, and it is remarkable how nearly they will be found to correspond throughout the greater part of India. The law of inheritance for instance, and bailment, excepting possibly in the southern parts of the peninsula, hardly vary at all, and so it will be found in many other points. Let them be collected with the assistance of learned men and promulgated as sanctioned by religion and the practice of the day. This might also be done in regard to British Europeans and others not included in either of the great classes of Hindoos and Mahommedans, as half-castes, converted native Christians, Parsees, Armenians, &c. This is a subject leading to many difficulties, much discussion and great research, which I may revert to on another occasion.

I now would refer to the law of procedure in civil cases, and in regard to it, I do not suppose there will be any difference of opinion, that it may and ought to be the same in all cases. No reason occurs to me why the farms should be different in one case than another: why the same gradation of appeal should not be had: why advantages and disadvantages experienced by one should not be felt by another. The common law of one may differ from that of another class as the written law may also do, whilst the procedure is the same; at least, I am not aware that any valid objection exists.

You have now an opportunity of giving us a penal code and laws of procedure that shall be simple and comprehensive, equally applicable to all classes of persons, by which all clashing of jurisdictions shall be avoided, by which all invidious exceptions and distinctions shall be abolished, and by which the native subjects by being esteemed worthy of being put under the same laws as ourselves, may learn to esteem themselves, and to deserve being raised in the scale of civilization.

I am, your obedient servant,

Having in my last letter suggested the practicability of adopting one set of laws for all classes, I would now consider what general features should characterize such laws, viz., whether in the penal code, crimes should be severally defined as in English law with the penalty of each specified and determined, or whether they should be classed, the maximum of punishment only being specified for each class or crime, and a discretionary power placed in the hands of the judge to apportion the penalties according to the circumstances attending the offence.

There are numerous and great objections to the first proposition, and until there shall be a language invented capable of clearly expressing what the legislator would express, and intellect found capable of using such language so as to embrace all matters requiring definition in such a system, it may be wise not to make the attempt. How endless are the inaccuracies, the defects of omission and commission of the English code, which is based on the principle of making no man answerable for his actions, however criminal, unless the act shall have been previously imagined and defined in the precise manner in which it may be committed! This is in practice that every person may know the unvarying penalty of an action committed according to law, that he may weigh well the risk, and consider whether he cannot do it in some slight manner different from the definition, and so be beyond the law. To what absurdities has the attempt not led to! How eminently contrived is the British code to screen the culprit! Let us give an instance or two. Suppose a man steals a young cow that has not had a calf, common sense would convict him if it were proved that he stole the animal; but English law says no, it is in the indictment that he stole a cow, and the animal being a young cow or heifer, he is not guilty. John Elliot is charged with murder. It is proved against him, but the law used to say, or still says, he is not guilty, because his name in the indictment is spelt with one t, whereas it ought to have had two t's. A robber knocks at a door which is opened by the servant when the robber walks in. He is charged with burglary which is defined to be breaking, entering, &c. He pleads no breaking, but the law says yes, walking in is breaking! The law might just as well say 12 o'clock at night is noon-day. It will be recollected that in this country an officer was found guilty of arson and transported for setting fire to a bearer's hut worth about 5 rupees and within his own premises. A robbery the most atrocious in intention, but accidentally amounting in value a penny below a fixed sum, is punished as a trifling crime, had the penny exceeded the sum it would have been death. But enough of examples, they might be given without number. It doubtless is most desirable that as far as possible it should be declared what are crimes and the extent of punishment attached to them, but the attempt at too much nicety and refinement, has, I believe, been practically found in Great Britain to be fraught with evil to the good, and a protection to the wicked. This is inverting the intent of all legislation, and as I am one of those who never could concur in the mistaken feeling of aiding a culprit, which John Bull only pitying the individual before him, thinks is magnanimous generosity, I hope this rock will be avoided. He does not reflect on the injury he does to the public—the impulse of the moment is enough for him. Let the prisoner have the benefit of a flaw—free him if possible: and it is wonderful how few attempts have been made to inculcate a sounder or more beneficial reasoning. The operation of the Poor Laws is another example of mistaken legislation and first-cousin to the other, to which the eyes of the public are now opened, through the understanding I hope rather than by the effect on the purse.

The inhabitants of India are a simple people and little educated. They do not appear yet ready for any complicated scheme. Short and easy as the existing laws comparatively are, how little do they appreciate the principles on which they are founded. With reference, therefore, to the state of society, and the experience of the inadequacy of the English code, I would submit, that it should not be adopted as your model and guide.

The classification of crimes presents itself as the simplest mode, whether it be to classify crimes with reference to certain punishments, or to classify offences of one description, as against the public, against the person, against the Government, against morality, &c., each offence having the extent of punishment attached to it. This last is the system of the Bombay code, issued during Mr. Elphinstone's Government, which I may here remark is the only attempt at systematic codification, that has yet been made in the country, and emanating from a man of extraordinary talent, it evinces more enlightened views and simplicity in its arrangement, than can be found in the laws of the other presidencies. It will well repay its study, and cannot but afford many useful and important suggestions in the great work you are engaged in. It has received from subsequent governments, I perceive, many additions, and undergone considerable alteration, but the new or supplementary laws do not appear to have been framed with the proper carefulness, and it is by no means evident that they are improvements.

With reference to an objection to a latitude being left with the judge which may be urged, I do not think it tenable; it is founded on an impossibility, for if no latitude be placed in his hands, every possible shade of crime, including time, place, circumstances of the individual intention, extenuation and a thousand other particulars must be defined and a punishment attached to each imaginable degree of offence. This I conceive to be impossible, and therefore that some latitude must be exercised by the judge. The question then is the degree, and it is no easy matter to argue in favor of control within the limit laid down as the extreme penalty, without running into the snare we wish to avoid. The question might be affected by the existence or non-existence of jurors to find the fact, but having fixed a boundary which the judge shall not pass, I would be glad to hear the arguments, why the apportioning the punishment should not rest with the judge, whose sentences might be open to review by a higher tribunal. Carefulness in the selection of judges, and the free comment of public opinion on their conduct, appear to be the best safeguards against the abuse of power. We know what evasions daily take place in the courts of English law, because no discretionary power is allowed to the judges, and the evils arising therefrom must be known to all. When the fact is determined by a jury, the power of the judge must be less then when he gives both the verdict and applies the law; but as I may take another occasion to speak of juries,

I now remain, your obedient servant,

No. III.

In the preceding letters I have taken a general view of the feasibility of making penal and civil codes of laws that may suit all classes of British subjects in this country. I shall now take leave to discuss the system of adjudication that may be most desirable for the administration of these codes, involving the gradation of Courts of original jurisdiction and appeal, whether they should be fixed or ambulatory, whether there should be one or more Judges in each.

It has been argued by a very philosophical writer on jurisprudence, that if the very best person be selected to try a cause in appeal, no number of appeals, or number of judges, can improve the decision, and hence the corollary that if the very best source be applied to in the first instance no appeal would be requisite; but practically speaking, it is not probable that the person selected is either perfect or the very best. He may or may not be the best procurable, but there may be others better or equal, and we all know that the most upright and able men are not invariably capable of exerting the qualities required to come to a correct conclusion in a like degree. Errors of judgment will occur; there may be deficiency of information, and oversight may take place. Supposing the judge to be as good as the last, it is probable that the error, oversight or deficiency of information, will be detected, because he has fewer points to consider, and the result will be the best attainable. It seems therefore most desirable that there should be an appeal even if the best instruments were procurable, but there I am inclined to think it should end, excepting for special reasons to be alluded to. Beyond that, in common circumstances, it is not probable that the decision will be better, if the two first Courts be filled by well selected persons. In this country however, the best persons are not always available, and if available, yet in very many cases they would not approach what is desirable; it becomes therefore a question how to remedy, as far as our limited means admitted, defects of the instruments.

If the Judge in appeal come to the same view of a case as the Judge who first tried it, it is to be presumed that the decision is a good one: a third Judge might differ, so might a fourth and so on: a limit must be put somewhere, and I am disposed to think that the evil attending farther litigation in such cases would out-balance any attainable good. Nevertheless when the Judge in appeal differs from the first authority, there is doubt which is right—to remove which doubt an appeal might then be admitted to a third tribunal, where all litigation in ordinary cases should certainly terminate. The extraordinary circumstances which would justify a departure from the above system, are manifest error of judgment, opposition to a known law or custom, the discovery of important evidence not known at the time of trial, or such other special reasons as evidently require re-investigation; and the remedial course that presents itself is by special appeal to a tribunal that should be final in all cases whatever. Thus, then, we have a Court of original jurisdiction —a Court of appeal therefrom—a third Court for the trial only of causes in which the two inferior Courts differ in opinion, and a Supreme Court of control to which appeals on special grounds alone would be admissible.

Having now outlined a system, I shall endeavour to go somewhat more into detail. The whole country being divided into zillas so much of the arrangement is prepared. In each zilla I would institute two descriptions of Courts, one presided in by one native judge, the other by one European civilian. I would propose for the native judge original jurisdiction only, and to a limited amount. My reasons for so doing are, shortly, the general comparative deficiency of education and knowledge on the part of natives, and a want of moral courage which may be taken in two senses, viz., both in withstanding temptation, and the influence of rank or other superiority or interest. It may be urged that if these objections exist, they ought to have no authority at all; but although they may not be the fittest persons for a great or difficult trust, the same prejudicial causes may not affect a small or simple one. From the decision of the Native an appeal should lie to the European judge. To the latter I would give original jurisdiction in all cases not cognizable by the subordinate Court. Farther it would possibly be also very advisable to erect one Court for small causes to be held by an European civilian, having a co-equal jurisdiction with the native judge, it being optional with the plaintiff to carry his suit to either Court, and perhaps this latitude might be advantageously extended so as to allow, in all cases where both parties wished it, the suit, whatever the amount might be, to be referred to any Court. The proposition of a concurrent European and native Court is suggested by a very general impression I believe to exist, of the superior probity and independence of character of the European. He is thought to act with the best intention, he is free from the bias of the native religious prejudices and he is removed from all party feeling or the influence of party interests. The preference given to either description of authority, would likewise afford a practical proof of the feeling and estimation of the people in regard to our judicial administration. There is beyond this another important consideration in favor of this jurisdiction: it would be a school for young civilians from among whom the Bench is to be filled; and I need not do more than allude to the lamentable inefficiency and contempt that must be the consequence of the appointment of a man to so high an office, who without any experience or practical knowledge, is called upon perhaps the first day he takes his seat, to decide on the approbatian of property to the amount of lakhs of rupees, in a case of life or death of a fellow creature, or to sit on appeals from experienced native Judges to whom he must feel himself inferior in the practical application of our laws, at the same time possibly little accustomed to study the principles of jurisprudence or the value of evidence. A familiarity with these is the acquisition of study combined with experience only, and it seems scarcely necessary to urge on your attention the necessity of creating this or some preferable mode of legal education of our jurists, in order to qualify our Judges to correct and control effectually the subordinate Courts, and to prevent our judiciary administration from falling into contempt.

To proceed with the detail of Civil Courts,

I would establish a Suddur Court at each Presidency to exercise jurisdiction over all the other Courts, to consist of at least three Judges, for the hearing of appeals from the decisions of Zilla Judges, to regulate and control the practice, receive and digest all returns and reports, to consider proposed laws, and to bring before higher authority all matters of importance. The sittings of this Court would be well arranged on the plan existing at Bombay, somewhat improved. By it one Judge sists on an appeal, and if he concur in the last decision he passes a decree—if he do not concur, he submits it with his minutes, which contain his opinion and reasons for it, to a Court consisting of not less than three Judges. This system seems to be much preferable to that of the Suddur Dewany Adalut in Calcutta, where one Judge sits at a time, and a case may pass from one to another through four or five Judges, thereby multiplying the appeals most unnecessarily without responsibility being fixed on any one, thus losing both the benefit attached to individual responsibility, and the advantage of consultation and interchange of opinion, which on difficult points of law, evidence or practice (and that must exist where so many opinions arise) is o the greatest advantage. The Bombay plan is not altogether free from the objection of the absence of individual responsibility, but this might be obviated in a great measure by it being required of the single Judge to deliver his opinion publicly to the parties, on submitting it to a full Court. But it is not apparent why in this Court, which would be composed of the very best Judges procurable, the sitting Judge, if he concur with either of the decisions of the lower Courts, (when the case has been before more than one) should not pass a decree accordingly, it being always in his power to refer for the determination of a full Bench any point of law or of great difficulty? To the composition of this Court, I shall refer hereafter. I would now consider the administration of the criminal branch, and in this it seems advantageous to give a limited Magisterial power to the Revenue functionaries. The establishment of the Collector being most available, and being best informed respecting the character of the inhabitants, promises to be the most efficient in the apprehension of criminals: the officers on it are scattered over the zilla: they move from place to place, and with such advantages the revenue officers, native and European, being invested with power to punish crimes of inferior degree, would effect promptness which is important, and save the vexation and loss of time to prosecutors and witnesses very much felt although not much known. Such a jurisdiction would also be useful in inducing a study of the laws and judicial proceedings, and assist in the preparation for higher judicial authority.

In Madras the native Judges have considerable criminal power, and I do not see why it should not be conferred on them generally. The higher jurisdiction would probably be better in the hands of the Zilla Judge, and if he be properly selected, he might be intrusted with life and death, but for greater security very heavy sentences might be referred to the Sudder Court for confirmation. The advantage of so great power being deposited in the hands of the Zilla Judge, would consist in the avoidance of delay; he being always on the spot, the trial ought to take place as soon as the committing authority sends up the case. But for this—it is however a strong objection—a Court of Circuit would be preferable. The Sudder Adawlut should have similar power of general control in this as in the Civil branch, with authority to mitigate and annul sentences, to inquire into systems of prison discipline, to receive complaints against the executive officers, rectify abuses, &c. &c.—There is still something wanting in the shape of a more active and accessible superintendence than this system provides for; and with reference to the magnitude of jurisdictions, to the great powers to be intrusted to individuals, to the character of one class of them and of the community, and to the want of proper publicity, some visiting authority seems to be essential, armed with sufficient power.

Revenue and Judicial Commissioners are employed in the Calcutta and Agra Presidencies with that view. This appears to be a combination of duties, one of which will be indifferently performed. To be efficient there should be a Commissioner for each department, in which case the judicial officer ought to be unceasing in moving from zilla to zilla, to prevent delays and accumulation of business, and being necessarily a servant of considerable standing, due consideration to climate, health and circumstances would not be afforded, were such an officer compelled to perform such continued and harassing duty. His establishment would also necessarily be an expensive one, and unless the experiment is thought to have eminently succeeded, some other plan must be devised; and since the Presidency of Bengal has been divided, may it not be practicable for one of the Puisne Judges of the Sudder Adawlut Court, in rotation, to visit the Courts subordinate to it once a year, not for the trial of civil or criminal cases, unless when deputed, but for the general purposes of inquiry and supervision? Such seems to be done in the Bombay Presidency as provided in Regulation passed in 18—, and if it have been found to be of benefit there, it might be introduced in all the other Presidencies, and it would possibly be upon the whole the best and the most economical mode within the reach of Government. This is the only ambulatory Court that seems to be either requisite or advantageous.

I now come to the last and Supreme Tribunal. It should be situated in Calcutta on account of its wealth, extent of its population both native and European, and its being the usual seat of the Government of India and Law Commission. Appeals from all the Sudder Courts of the Presidencies should be made to it: interpretation of the laws should be vested in it: it should have authority over the Sudder Courts, corresponding with theirs over those of the districts, but it does not appear advisable that it should exercise any jurisdiction in criminal trials. Of whom this Court should be composed is a questio vexata—a bone of contention, and I beg leave to postpone it, and also that relating to the Suddur Court to a future opportunity.

I am, your obedient servant,

No. IV.

The composition of the Supreme Court of India, and of the Sudder Udalut at each presidency, is a proposition of vast importance and of great difficulty. Many interests are involved in it, the welfare of millions will be affected by it, and there are the prejudices and arguments of a powerful body to meet. Were His Majesty's Courts, as now constituted, proposed to be abolished, the whole Bar of India and England would rise en masse: Coke upon Littleton, the Paudects, Blackstone, indeed the whole of the "beautiful system" would be levelled at the unheard of wickedness: but this is to be expected.

I shall take the liberty in the first place to quote from a learned author, the following sentence regarding the qualifications a Judge ought to possess, the justness of which I presume no one will dispute: "In tracing the truth through the mazes of Indian evidence there is required in the Judge, not only much acuteness and sagacity, but great acquaintance with the habits and manners of the people; that he may be able to interpret the innumerable indications, which are given by peculiar modes of expression and deportment. The extraordinary disadvantages under which Englishmen, totally unacquainted with the manners of the Indians, labor, when they begin to seek their way through the labyrinth of Indian testimony, can easily be conceived:" and now let us consider who are the people, and what is the language that people are conversant with, over whom the Judge is to preside? The people consist of two great classes, viz. Hindoos and Mahommedans, together amounting to 60 or 80 millions, and of Europeans amounting to about 40 or 50,000, military included. The vernacular languages of the people are various, but there is one language (Hindoostannee) spoken or understood in nearly every part of these dominions, English is understood only by Englishmen, and a few natives at the presidencies very imperfectly.

Let us now consider the nature of the laws of these people. The Hindoos are governed in civil matters by their own written and common-law, the former of which is in general distinct, comprehensive and similar throughout; and in many respects excellent in principle. The Mahommedans are governed by their written law of the Koran: it differs essentially from the Hindoo law, as both do from the English system. The criminal codes of the three nations are as varying as the civil: the Hindoo and Mahommedan—absurd, cruel and partial: the English criminal code, is scarcely entitled to a different character: the criminal code now to be promulgated will correspond with none of these, it will stand by itself.

Let us now think how these different codes are to be administered. The Hindoo code is expounded by Hindoo lawyers—it is applied by natives and Europeans, the latter having spent the best part of their lives among the people, and in studying their language, their laws and usages. The Mahommedan one is administered in the same manner. The language used in viva voce pleadings, if Hindostannee were universally introduced, would be understood by the judge, the parties and the public generally. The English code is expounded and applied by English bred lawyers: the language used in both the written and viva voce pleadings, would be understood by the judge, the parties of English and any Englishmen who might be present, but not by the public. Extend this law to the natives, and the pleadings, written or oral, would be understood by none but the judge and the counsel: the Provincial Courts then might as well sit with closed doors. Now suppose Sir J. Franks's proposition of introducing this English law and language were adopted, will any person be found to say that, a law, incomprehensible to the people, directly opposed to their religion and usages, subversive of both —the language of its process and of the judge unintelligible, is fit or justifiable? If there is, I for one would not stop to argue with him.

If it be admitted then that the English code cannot be the one for India, and the definition of the necessary qualities of a Judge, being also conceded, it requires not much wisdom to decide that an English Barrister full of the prejudices, technicalities of English practice, fresh from Westminster, is the most disqualified of all for sitting in judgment in a suit between two Hindoos or Mahommedans, speaking to him in unknown tongues. We must I think look elsewhere. The mere transfer to India of an English Barrister, although it may make him much richer and much grander, does not instil the necessary knowledge, nor make him better acquainted with the language and character of the people, their laws and usages, than if he had never left Lincoln's Inn. An English lawyer, I am free to allow, is a most valuable adviser: his education we are assured, has been liberal: he has been accustomed to reflect on general principles, on the effect of their application in practice: he has been accustomed to search into the motives and influencing causes of the actions of men; and if we combine the learning of an English barrister (not the mere practical man) with the requisite knowledge of the native character and languages, I have no hesitation in saying that he would be very far superior and better qualified to sit on the Bench of India than our self-taught Judges; and although Government may still feel it advisable and necessary to look to their Civil Service for the fittest instruments for the Sudder Udaluts, the talents and acquirements of a few such men as I have spoken of, may I think be obtained, and be put in requisition with eminent advantage to the public,—and I am now to endeavour to shew how.

In the first place, assuming that English law is not to be the law of the land, but a new code of penal law to be created for all classes, and a modified form of the civil code of each class determined, his Majesty's Courts being no longer applicable, may be abolished. In their stead I would propose that there be a Judge at the presidencies as in the zillahs, and that his Court should have all original jurisdiction. The Judge might be selected with particular reference to the nature of the population, being partly European, and this Court might be open both to the bar and the Civil Service; and that the one of the Judges of the Sudder Udalut should be an English-bred barrister. It would then be a subject for deliberation, whether in all cases in which Europeans are the parties, the Barrister-Judge alone should not sit in the first instance; and whether in cases brought from the zillahs in appeal (which it would be impossible to translate,) he should only be called in on points of law or practice, referred by any of the other Judges. In cases originating at the presidencies wherein one or both of the parties might be a native, I would submit whether any of the Judges should not be competent to sit. If such a system did not supply all desiderata, it would have the merit of saving a large expenditure of money to the state, by the consequent abolition of His Majesty's Supreme Courts, and all their worse than useless and extravagant appendages.

In regard to the Supreme Court of India, the same arguments that have led me to hint at the formation of the Sudder Udaluts for the presidencies, where the great resort of Europeans may be expected to be, and where some idea of English practice and pleading has been acquired, lead to the opinion that the Supreme Tribunal should be composed of materials drawn from the same sources. If the Sudder Udawluts can be filled up from the Provincial Bench and the English bar, the Supreme Court might consist of the most careful selections from the Suddur Courts of each Presidency. In it as in the others, one English lawyer of eminence would hold a place, he might be also the Member of the Council of India, whose functions being limited by the charter to legislation, his duties in the Supreme Court would make him better qualified to advise the Government in its legislative capacity, and the cognizance of the Supreme Court being confined to subjects of the most prominent importance, the business of both offices would not, in all probability, be overwhelming.

LIEUTENANT TREVELYAN'S MISSION.

The following is a continuation of the Mission of Lieutenant Trevelyan to the westward:—

The progress of Lieut. Trevelyan's Mission to the westward has already been traced up to the time when "all the high contracting parties" were assembled on the Beekaner frontier preparatory to an interview between the Rajpoot chiefs; but before an account is given of this meeting, it will be as well to give you a memorandum of my own movements in Scind from the beginning of April to the first week in May.

It has already been stated that after remaining some days at Jeisulmere our party was broken up on the 2d April, when we all moved northward and remained for three days upon the Rawul's frontier, at a place called Kohareesir, whence Lieut. Trevelyan returned to Jeisulmere, while Lieut. Mackeson and myself started for Nohur or Islamgurh on the evening of the 5th April, and commenced our journey across the desert by making a march of 23 kos, there being no intermediate village between Kohareesir and Islamgurh. The baggage camels accomplished this distance in 16 hours, but our sandnees did it in less than 8 hours.

Nohur or Islamgurh was an ancient possession of the Jeisulmere family, who seem to have been deprived of it by the Doodpotra chieftains in rather a summary manner: it has an old fort enclosing an area about 80 yards square, with very lofty ramparts from 30 to 50 feet high, and a high gate way in the N. E. angle covered by a low outwork; there are numerous bastions on the north and east faces, but scarcely any on the other two sides. It has neither rence nor ditch, and is disadvantageously situated in a deep basin, half a mile or three quarters of a mile in diameter, surrounded by sandhills from 50 to 80 feet high, so that the few guns on its walls would soon be silenced. There are a few buildings in the fort, and two wells outside, with some straggling houses and a bunya.

We quitted Islamgurh on the evening of the 6th April, with the pleasant prospect of 40 koss of desert before us; but a tent was directed to be pitched half way across the wilderness, and a large supply of water was carried forward on camels, which enabled us to divide this long journey into two stages, each averaging 20 kos. The baggage camels accomplished the longer half of the journey (about 23 kueha kos) in 12½ or 13 hours, our own progress being just twice as quick, for we were only 6¼ hours on the road, though there were very heavy sandhills during the first half of the journey.

During the following night we fairly left the desert behind us, and on the morning of the 8th April arrived at Khanpoor, after a march of 17 kos, which occupied us 6½ hours, for we lost our way within a short distance of that city and became practically acquainted with the fertile soil of Scind, by wading for a good hour among swampy rice fields. The baggage cattle kept to the proper road, and accomplished their march in 12½ hours, completing the 63 kos from Kohareesir in 3 days. The distance is nearly 100 miles, of which 60 miles are sandy, and there is a good hard road for the first and last 20 miles on each sides of the desert. Water is found at Danwur, 3 kos north of Kohareesir, and at Moreed-ka-Kot, 12 or 14 kos (23 miles) from Khanpoor, but neither place is inhabited.

As the Khan, or Nuwab, Buhawul Khan happened to be at Khanpoor when we arrived, we paid our respects to him on the evening of the 8th April, but on the following day I had a much better opportunity of seeing this chief in full Durbar, it being the great Mosulman festival called Eed. The Khan and his principal sirdars went out at 2 A. M. to pray on the plain, where a tent was pitched to serve as an Eedgah; and a square was formed round it by perhaps 500 foot soldiers, part of whom were clothed in an uniform of red trowsers and caps with blue jackets. The chief was richly dressed with strings of fine pearls, and very large emeralds on his head and round his neck, an immense emerald, set in gold, acted as a bazoobund or armlet, and a rosary of pearls was in his hand, with emerald beads strung on it at intervals, as in those of the Roman Catholic church, though the latter are seldom of such costly materials. When the out of doors ceremonials were over, the whole cavalcade returned to the Khan's residence, when some doomba or fat-tailed sheep and some goats were slaughtered in commemoration of Abraham's sacrifice, and a salute was fired while this took place. The sirdars paid their respects and offered their congratulations to the Khan upon this great feast, and after sitting with him in court a few minutes I returned to camp, Lieut. Mackeson being too unwell to be present.

Another ceremony took place on the 11th April, but of a very different nature, for a "courpleniere" was assembled to witness the delivery of a khureeta from the Governor-General, announcing his departure from India, and forwarding a supplementary treaty about the navigation of the Indus. A salute was fired on this occasion, and the two battalions of sepoys, who formed an avenue to the durbar, presented arms to Lieut. Mackeson as the bearer of the letter and treaty with the Supreme Government. More than half of the sepoys were dressed in white uniforms with black accoutrements, and were armed with firelocks, having a band of drums and fifes, to the music of which they marched in very good time; the remainder, amounting to about 200 men, wore the coloured uniform already described, were armed with matchlocks, and had native music and colours. A Mr. Macpherson, who has been for some years at this court, is, I believe, employed to superintend the discipline of the regulars.

On the 12th April, the day following this ceremony, again visited the Khan for the purpose of taking our leave, as he had been remarkably civil to us during the four days we remained at Khanpoor. There is very little to be seen at this place, which is rather a mean looking town of 4,000 houses on the south bank of a navigable canal called Ikhtiarwah, with a ruinous old mud fort 200 yards long and 120 yards broad, at its north-west side. There are few pukka houses but a tolerable bazaar, running N. and S., divides the town into two parts, and has a second pretty good street running across its northern extremity. The Khan's residence is a mere shikargah, a temporary place of residence, surrounded by a thin mud wall, where he occasionally spends a few days; but his principal abode is at Dilawur in the desert, or at a place called Dera near Ahmudpoor.

We quitted Khanpoor early in the morning of the 13th April, and made a march of 18 kos, viâ Jujwa and Ghonspoor to Mithun-kot, in Runjeet Singh's territory, on the right bank of the Indus. We crossed that noble river, 3 miles from Mithun-kot, almost immediately below the junction of the Punjnud, where its stream is 2,087 yards or more than a mile and a quarter in breadth. The banks are very low, and the water very muddy, nor is the stream of very great depth except the main channel; but with all these drawbacks it is a magnificent sheet of water, a very prince of rivers, and well worth the trouble that our Government are taking in opening its navigation to all the world. Mithun-kot is a small town and not likely to be of much importance for many years, its situation being rather unfavorable, as it is quite surrounded by water when the river rises, and the only high ground near it is already covered with houses, so that there is little or no room for farther improvement. The Sikh chieftain's kardars or local officers were very attentive to us during our three days stay at this place, and offered me the usual present of 500 rupees as a compliment upon entering Runjeet Singh's country, which was, of course, refused.

We quitted Mithun-kot on the 16th April, and sailed up the river Punjnud, past Dhaka and Seetpore to Mukhun Bela Ghat near Ooch, a little below the infall of the river Gharra, where we arrived on the 18th April. We saw little or no appearance of traffic on the water during our voyage up the whole length of the Punjnud, almost the only boats visible being those at the ferries: we saw, however, one or two ragamuffins swimming about on inflated skins, like the common water bag, by means of which it is said that they frequently cross the river and commit depredations on the opposite bank. After remaining three days in the vicinity of Ooch, (a very old city of about two thousand houses, where there is a covered bazaar and tombs of some celebrated Mosulman saints) I quitted the boats, and marched 13 kos inland from Mukhun Bela Ghat to Ahmudpoor, where the Nuwab Buhwul Khan had also arrived during our absence on the river.

Ahmudpoor is a considerable city, inferior only to Buhawulpoor, and lies on rather low ground on the west bank of a large canal called Koetubawah, which irrigates the country all round it; but there is much kulua zumeen or unproductive salt ground, and much jungle of jahoo or tamarisk. The city contains perhaps 6,000 houses, and has a good bazaar running north and south with a large mosque on its west side, which is the most conspicuous building in the town. On the north side are some good gardens, and on the west side is an old mud fort about 150 yards long and 120 yards wide, the walls of which appear to be very thin and are from 20 to 24 feet high. The exceeding lowness of the houses which look still lower from being flat roofed, and the small shops with little point houses, projecting barely two feet and sometimes smeared with clay, give the city rather a mean appearance. There seem to be no manufactures of any notoriety, and the water and air do not agree with foreigners who are said to complain of loss of appetite and indigestion, which is not surprising when even the towns-people look sickly. The Khan Buhawul Khan occasionally resides at Dera, about 3 miles south-east of Ahmudpoor, just within the limits of the sandy desert which comes within a kos of the city, and may almost be said to be divided from it by the Koetubwah canal. Lieutenant Mackeson, agent for the navigation of the Indus, has also a house at Ahmudpoor, about a mile and a half west of the town, where I remained for ten days previous to re-crossing the Great Desert between Buhawulpoor and the Beekaner frontier.

I quitted Ahmudpoor a little after midnight on the 30th April, and marched 20 kos northeastward to Buhawulpoor, arriving there on the morning of the 1st May, and remaining there three days to fix the geographical position of this city, and to examine whatever might be worth seeing in its neighbourhood. Its curiosities, however, are but few, the gardens and the manufacture of silk stuffs being almost the only things worthy of notice. Though Buhawulpoor is a city of 8,000 houses, with two large bazaars, it has the same shabby appearance that characterizes Khanpoor and Ahmudpoor: there is no fort, and scarcely any town wall, though there is something that may once have been a mud rampart, with four gateways, looking toward Mooltan, Khairpoor, Beekaner, and Ahmudpoor. The gardens are 17 in number, lying chiefly on the north side of the city, and produce mangoes, grapes, peaches, almonds, apples, quinces, figs, pomegranates, &c. There are a few weeping willows, and another kind of willow called bed

moosk, from which is extracted a cooling liquor much used in Scind, and generally imported from Cashmere.

The Gharra river runs about 2 miles N. W. of the city with a full muddy stream half a mile wide, running perhaps one and a half mile per hour. The desert comes up to within 3 miles of the S. E. side of the city, so that Buhawulpoor lies in a kind of gorge between the river and the desert. In coming along the road from Ahmudpoor, we skirted the desert so closely that at one place there was scarcely room for two carts to pass each other in the narrow tract between the sand hills on our right and the canal on our left, which thus became a positive boundary between the Rhoea or wilderness and the Scind or Netherlands, by which terms is understood all the grounds near the banks of a river, were water is found close to the surface, and which is generally known in Hindoostan by the name of khadir.

The water at Buhawulpoor is remarkably sweet, and Persian wheels are seen in every direction raising it either out of shallow wells or out of small cuts and branches drawn from the larger canals. On arriving in Buhawul Khan's country after traversing the sterile regions of Beekaner and Jeisulmere, it was a pleasing relief to see the country sheeted for miles with crops of green corn, with good water at 13 or 15 cubits from the surface, instead of a brackish commodity at 250 or 300 feet. The appearance of the people, too, was as noble as that of the country, the slovenly looking Rangurs and Juts being exchanged for Beloches in loose, flowing and graceful robes, who seemed to be the fighting portion of the community, while the labouring part of the population were readily distinguished by their dark blue dhotees or waistclothes. A number of the people, both male and female, (particularly the elderly women) have a singular fancy for dying their hair red; and another curious custom is that of large parties of females, who call themselves saiudzadees or descendants of the Prophet, going about begging under the cover of large white veils which cover them from head to foot, and from which they derive their names of mastoor or veiled. They are very pertinacious in their demand for alms, and a number of little eyelet holes worked in the veil, enables them to see without being seen. The snuff-taking propensity of the lower orders is another thing likely to attract the notice of a traveller, who has seldom seen native carpenters or bricklayers sitting at work with a little snuff box beside them, and taking a pinch every now and then with the zest, if not the grace of a Brummel.

The piles of apples in the market places, the windlasses at the wells, and other such trifles as these, strongly remind one of home; and I could hardly help laughing when an enthusiastic shikaree described with most appropriate gestures the way in which one of their dogs would skake a pig by the ear, in the exact fashion that a Suffolk farmer might narrate the "sowling" of a hog, which is the technical name for this feat. A very superior breed of dogs of great size and strength is brought from the lower parts of Scind towards Hyderabad, and the Khan Buhawul keeps several of them, being himself a very keen sportsman. Deer, hogs, and neelgaie are his principal game, and in the winter season he flies his hawks at the cranes which then emigrate in large numbers.

During the whole of our tour through this chief's territories every kind of hospitality was exercised on the part of the Khan: respectable men were sent to accompany us from place to place, and to furnish all kinds of supplies that might be required by the camp: orders were given to accommodate us in the Khan's own houses, where there happened to be any at the place where we alighted, and nothing was left undone that was necessary to mark his good will toward his guests, and through them toward the British Government. The present Khan, Buhawul Khan, (grandson to Mr. Elphinstone's acquaintance of the same name) is a good-looking, sensible man; courteous in his manners, rational in his conversation, and an accomplished scholar in his own Persian language; he is also a neat mechanic, and does not scorn to work occasionally with his own hands.

I quitted Buhawulpoor on the morning of the 4th May, and plunged again into the Great Desert, halting at Powarwala, a small village with half a dozen wells of tolerable water, 8 kos E. S. E. of the capital. Our next stage was 16 kos south-east to Moj Gurh, a considerable fort, the killadar of which came out at midnight with a considerable suwaree to escort me in due form into his fort. There was no village on the road between Powarwala and Moj Gurh, but there are a couple of wells at a place called Kala Pubar, nearly half way between these two places, and two kos left of the road by which we came.

The fort of Moj Gurh lies on firm ground, with low sandy eminences round it, but at a considerable distance: it is built of brick, with very lofty walls, apparently 50 feet high, including the parapet which may be 7 by 2½ feet, with a narrow terreplein of about four feet, and numerous bastions. On the west side is a mosque, with high dome, and in the south-east angle is a good mahal or dwelling house for the Khan. The body of the place may be 110 yards square, with an outwork on the east side to cover the gate and a kucha tank opposite the entrance. The access winds through three separate gate-ways, in each of which is a right angled turning, so that there may be said to be six gates, though the inner arches are not furnished with doors. Three or four pieces of cannon are mounted on the angles, and there are wells within the fort containing plenty of good water at a depth of 8 cubits from the surface.

On the night of the 5th May, I left Moj Gurh, and instead of following the route by Pogout as traversed by Mr. Elphinstone, struck down toward the Jeisulmere frontier and marched 12 kos south by west over a tolerably hard path, encamping in the desert at a place called Troohawalee, where there are a few herdsman's huts, and some pools of water that had fortunately been filled by the late rain: so that the people have an abundant supply of sweet water. The baggage was eight hours on the road, but the suwaree camels arrived in 3 hours, 40 minutes. On the following night we completed the remaining 14 kos to Rookhunpoor or Ghous Gurh, which lies 45 miles south by west from Moj Gurh, and is only 6 kos from the Jeisulmere frontier. The road from Troohawalee is rather heavy, there being much sand with intervals of hard ground, but we accomplished the distance in 5 hours, and the baggage camels did it in ten hours and a half. The killadar came out with his followers to meet me at midnight and lodged us all within the fort, as at Moj Gurh.

Rookhunpoor is a poor village of 260 or 270 houses, and the small fort called Ghous Gurh on its N. W. side, was built 70 years ago by Moobaruk Khan of Buhawulpoor. There are three wells, 42 cubits or 12 poors deep, with very salt water, and there are also numerous koonds or reservoirs for rain water close to the northward of the village, with a tank three quarters of a kos N. N. E. from it. The fort is about 80 yards square inside, and most empty; it has eight tolerably strong bastions but of the calcareous stone called dhandla, with 5 or 6 very small guns. The bastions are about 35 or 40 feet high and the wall 25 or 30 feet, including a parapet 12 feet high, and 7½ thick, to the terreplein is 4 or 5 feet broad, and a long renee or outer wall thus round the fort at an interval of 18 or 25 feet on three sides, and triple that breadth on the one side where the gateways are. This renee, as well as the body of the place, is built of the same dhanla bhata, which is fashioned into blocks like large mud bricks, and appears to be very durable. Both the village and fort are built on solid ground, and there are low sand hills within long cannon shot of the latter on the south side.

On the night of the 7th May, we marched 12 kos S. E. over a rather heavy road from Rookhunpoor (Buhawul Khan's) to Birsilpoor, a large village, with a fort belonging to a Bhatee Rao, named Saheb, who is nominally subject to the Rawul of Jeisulmere, but who is pretty independent, owing to his inaccessible situation in the desert. This chief accompanied me to the top of a high sand hill, quarter of a mile S. W. of the fort, which is quite commanded by it, the top of the highest house being depressed 2½. On this sand hill the Emperor Humaioon is said to have remained some days about 375 years ago, for the fort is of great antiquity (the natives say 1,700 years,) though built after those of Poogul and Bikumpoor. It stands on a small rising ground, perhaps 20 feet high, in the midle of a hollow, and the walls are barely 30 feet high, and perhaps 90 yards square, with 4 or 5 bastions in each face. The gate is on the north side, covered with a curtain, and the interior of the fort is full of houses. The town of Birsilpoor contains 400 houses, and has many bunya's shops, with eleven wells, one of which is in the fort, the water being very salt and 41 cubits from the suface, but there are many koonds of fresh water on the N. W. side of the town. The fort has neither ditch nor fausse braye, and is built of blocks of the calcareous stone already mentioned.

Our next march was a heavy stage of 16 kos S. E. by E. from Birsilpoor to Bangursir, where we arrived on the morning of the 9th May, being 5 hours 40 minutes on the road, the chief part of which ran over numerous thuls or sand hills, with intermediate hard flats called duhur. Bangursir is a Bhatee village of 60 or 80 houses (with two bunyas) lying close to the Beckaner frontier: it has a small gurhee that does not deserve the name of a fort, having only a gateway with two bastions and a small house, all connected by a dhool kot, or wall of earth and bushes, situated on a slight eminence surrounded by huts. There are two wells to westward of the village, with exceedingly salt water at 121 cubits depth, with a few koonds or reservoirs, and a tank almost dry. The following memorandum will show that Bangursir is not quite as cool as Landour, or Simla, or any of those pleasant places for "eating cold air"!

At 9 A. M. 101°, at noon 120°, at 1 P. M. 123°, at 2 P. M. 119°, , at 3 P. M. 116° at 4 P. M. 113°, at 5 P. M. 111°, at 6 P. M. 105°.

so that the average heat for nine successive hours was nearly 113°, the minimum 101, the maximum 123°. Truly this was becoming practically acquainted with the pleasures of a Sirocca; a kind of shaking of hands with Phœbus.

As the 9th May was the day appointed for the arrival of the Rajas of Beekaner and Jeisulmere at their respective frontier villages of Guriala and Girrajsir, no time was to be lost on the road, so I quitted Bangursir on the evening of the 9th May, and made the best of my way to Guriala, 7 kos south of that place, but found that the Beekaneer Raja would not arrive until the next day, so I trotted on a couple of kos farther to the south-west, and reached Girrajsir at 10½ P. M., thus completing a march of 218 kos from Jeisulmere to Buhawulpoor, &c., in 15 stages, with a single camel, allowing him, however, numerous intermediate halts, so that the gallant "ship of the desert" ambled into camp as fresh as a daisy, though each of his marches with me had averaged 14½ kos.

On the 10th May all the great folks came tumbling in together, and had sundry meetings during our week's halt at this place.

Having already brought down the movements of all parties concerned in Lieut. Trevelyan's Mission to the period when the rulers of Beekaneer and Jeisulmere, encamped upon their respective frontiers at Guriala and Girrajsir, in readiness for a personal conference, as had been recommended to them by the British Government; I must now summon up spirits from the vasty deep (or borrow a hint from Colonel O'Shaughnessy, which may do just as well) in order to give an adequate account of all that occurred at this grand interview.

All parties had assembled on the 10th May, the day originally named for the meeting, but the Jeisulmere people were so exhausted by the rapidity of their journey that it would have been unfair to have called "time" to a single second; so the 11th of May was allowed to pass quietly away in slumbers, that the weary lords might find rest, and be fresh for the fatigues of the ensuing day.

Early on the morning of the 12th, preparations were made for pitching a doulat khana or durbar tent, exactly on the boundary line between the two kingdoms; and in this instance the line was real and not metaphorical, for when the precise point had been ascertained by measurement with a perambulator, where the boundary crosses the road between Guriala and Girrajsir, pegs were driven into the ground, and a very long rope stretched between them, in such manner as to point out the line of demarcation in a way that was quite satisfactory to all parties.

A suit of tents was pitched on this line, enclosing an area 100 feet long and 21 feet broad, half of the space being on either side of the frontier, and the southern portion of this hall of audience was formed by Lieut. Trevelyan's own tent, in which a large guddy or throne was so arranged that one half of it might lie exactly in each country. All the exterior arrangements were made as nearly as possible on exactly the same principle, namely, that of observing strict impartiality towards both parties, for had the "reciprocity been all on one side," as our Irish friend has it, or had there been the least appearance of turuf-daree or undue leaning toward either side, it might have marred the harmony of the meeting.

As the two chiefs were to approach the tents from opposite quarters, the guard of infantry accompanying the Mission, was divided into two parts, so as to form an avenue at each door; the party of Blair's horse was drawn up in a single line across the boundary and facing the durbar, while the brigade of guns intended to salute the two crowned heads, was drawn up in rear of the cavalry so as to have one gun on each side of the line as near as might be.

Though Alladin and his lamp are long ago gathered to the dust, yet are there kind fairies still wandering on earth who enabled the "interesting travellers" to make all these preparations during the 12th May; and on the evening of that day the tents and guards, horse and foot, guns, throne, carpets, uttur, pawn, opium, sugar, and all the proper paraphernalia of royalty were in readiness to celebrate the meeting of reconciliation between their Highnesses the Maharajah Rutun Singh Beekaner, and the Maharawul Guj Singh of Jeisulmere.

A signal gun was fired a little before sunset, and the Maharaja immediately put his cortegé in motion from Guriala, which was a mile and a half distant from the place of meeting: as the Maharawul had two miles to travel, he reached the ground a little later than his neighbour, which gave time for separate salutes of seventeen guns to be fired for each of them before they alighted from their khasa or covered litters. There were altogether about three thousand men in the field, the numbers being pretty equal on both sides, and the imposing nature of the show was somewhat augmented by the richly caparisoned elephants and led horses, drums, colours, and such other foreign aids of ornaments as seemed essential to give proper eclât to this "field of the cloth of gold."

No peshwaee or istikbal was sent out to meet either Prince, but each was received with presented arms by the guard as he approached the entance of the tent: a host of thakoors or Rajpoot nobles, and some wealthy merchants accompanied them as they came in at opposite doors, and for the first time in their lives stood beneath the same roof. Lieut. Trevelyan had stationed himself in the middle of the tent, and as they approached the centre, extended a hand to each, and brought them gently together: each saluted the other courteously, and as they were performing the bughul geeree or ceremony of mutual embrace, the durbar resounded with congratulatory cries of "moobaruk, moobaruk."

After this fraternal accoilade they seated themselves together on the richly brocaded guddee that had been prepared for them, while their followers crowded into the tent en masse and soon shut out what little daylight remained. Many attempts were made to reduce this mass of courtiers into something like an organized shape, but it seemed as if nothing short of the argumentum baculinum would answer the purpose, so they were made to sit down even where they had thrust themselves forward in their eager zeal to see the novel spectacle of "two kings of Brentford on one throne."

Though some of the spectators were adorned with rich jewels yet both of the principal personages had the good taste to attire themselves simply in the full white robe called jama, with the coloured turband peculiar to their respective courts; a dagger in the kumurbund was their only weapon, and a few pearls and emeralds almost their only ornaments. Lieut. Trevelyan was seated on the right of the Maharaja; Lieut. Boileau on the left of the Maharawul, and their ministers and other sirdars formed a circle round them, the privileged chiefs squatting themselves down on the carpet, while the inferiors stood without, to the no small stoppage of the free air of heaven.

By way of making darkness visible and letting in some little light upon the scene, four table shades were introduced, and when the candles appeared, both the Rajas rose from their seats and saluted each other, while the sirdars made the usual complimentary ejaculations and cried out the name of Luchmee Narain, or their favorite saint, a ceremony seldom or never omitted at the time of lamp lighting.

This meeting between the chiefs of Beekaneer and Jeisulmere was not a mere scene of dumb show, for they sat a long time together introducing the principal people on either side, talking with considerable familiarity, and praising the British authorities by whose friendly interposition this happy meeting had been brought about. A fortunate omen, too, occurred in the presence of a little field mouse which came running about in front of the guddee, and was received with a salam by the Rawul, who said that it was his deota or "good spirit." In short the interview passed off admirably, and some good things were said about this auspicious conjunction of the sun and moon, for it so happens that the Rahto Raja is a sooraj buns or descendant of Apollo, while the Bhatee Rawul is a chundur bunsee deriving his lineage from Diana.

After a sufficient time had elapsed, utur, pawn, &c. were introduced as a signal for parting, and here again great care was taken to dismiss both parties with equal honors: to effect this Lieut. Trevelyan quitted his post on the flank, and placing himself in front of the throne simultaneously applied the atter to both parties, one with each hand, to the greath delight of the Rawul, who was half afraid that his most powerful neighbour, who chanced to occupy the seat of honor on the right hand of the guddee, might perchance also come in for the first share in the ceremony of being anointed. Each prince returned the compliment of unction to both officers as to each other; and after the ceremonies of dismissal were performed, they both rose together from their seats, both stepped at once off the guddee, exchanged a mutual salute, and left the tent by opposite doors, as they had entered. No salute was fired at their departure, but each received a compliment from his own guns as they arrived at their respective camps.

Thus ended the first act of an interview that had been looked forward to with considerable anxiety, and the bringing about of which had cost an infinite deal of trouble, particularly to the officer employed in bringing the hitherto rival chiefs to meet each other at such a sultry season, and at such a distance from their capitals. When the first meeting had taken place, however, the succeeding visits were easily arranged, and it was agreed that the Rajas should call upon each other at their different camps, unattended by the British officers, whose presence might have been an incumbrance both in preventing the strictly private conversation which they wished to hold together; and also in checking the freedom of badinage usually resorted to when two such personages meet on a friendly visit, and eat together out of the same dish.

The conclusion of these ceremonies did not take place until the 16th May, when the Maharawul left his camp at Girajsir, crossed the boundary, and visited the Maharaja's camp, at Guriala, where he was received very kindly; and after a long friendly interview was dismissed with suitable presents, (an elephant, two horses, a few jewels, and clothes) and returned to his own tents about noon. The Maharaja returned his visit at night, coming over from Guriala to Girrajsir, were he experienced a reception similar to that which he had given his new friend, and was dismissed with similar presents.

At both of these meetings the Rajas fed together out of the same dish in the most familiar manner, putting portions of the food into each other's mouths: sly jokes were interchanged, dances were exhibited, and after the different chiefs had been more particularly introduced, the two Princes retired into an inner tent and held some private conversation together, so that it is to be hoped the purposes of bringing about this meeting have been fully answered by thus affording the two principal personages an opportunity of unreserved communication with each other. Lieut. Trevelyan also brought about a meeting between three confidential persons of each party, who entered into a written agreement among themselves, stipulating among other things that each state should not only refrain from committing aggressions on the other, but should deliver up any notorious refugees who might attempt to shelter themselves within the other's frontier; and in the event of sustaining damage from any desperado, who might be too strong for either party to cope with him single handed, the other State should co-operate in reducing him "par la voie de faite."

Though the pricipal events which took place during the week of our halt at Girrajsir occurred on the 12th and 16th May as above stated, yet there were several other incidents of minor importance which deserve to be mentioned, as they will serve to give a more connected detail of our proceedings. On the 10th of May both courts reached the frontier as already mentioned, Lieutenant Trevelyan's camp being at Girrajisir, as well as that of the Jeisulmere chief: on the 11th May we went to pay complimentary visits to both the Princes, first on the Rawul Guj Singh who seemed to be in excellent health considering his great corpulence and the immense fatigue he had just undergone, and after sitting a while with him we rode nearly four miles in the sun of Guriala, and had a very pleasant meeting with our old acquaintance the Raja Rutun Singh. He received us in full durbar under a crimson canopy, embroidered with gold, in an enormous double poled tent, and we were quite pleased to see the improvement in his health since the time of our parting at Beekaner.

When we first met he was leaning on a crutch-headed stick, and could with difficulty walk to the door of his hall of audience, but he now met us with alacrity at the entrance of the outer enclosure of this dowlut khana, and after sitting in durbar some time, walked with us to his private tent, where we again sat with him for some time, talking cheerily, as he was in excellent spirits. His heir and his bother, the Princes Sirdar Singh and Luchmun Singh had come with him half way from Beekaner, as far as the celebrated place of pilgrimage at Koilath, but instead of coming on with him to Guriala, they returned to the capital with several hundred followers, either because they could not stand so much exposure to the sun, or because the Raja wished to diminish the number of his followers, who would have difficulties in finding supplies and water at Guriala : or more likely because the presence of these supernumerary scions of royalty would have been "detrop" during the enterview of the chieftains.

On the 12th May, after the meeting was over, and the Rajas had returned to their several camps, we remained in the tents on the boundary, to be in readiness for the return visit, which was paid on the following morning to Lieutenant Trevelyan by the Maharaja Rutun Sing ; as he had been prevented by illness from paying him that compliment during our stay at Beekaner. He came after breakfast from his camp at Guriala, attended by a very large sowaree, and I rode out a considerable distance to meet him, taking all our troopers who made a very respectable "tail," and on reaching the tents, he was received with presented arms and a salute of artillery, Lieut. Trevelyan going out to the end of the avenue to welcome him. After remaining for nearly an hour he returned to Guriala, and we made the best of our way to camp Girrajsir about noon, at which time the sun was a little too hot to be pleasent for folks on horse back, being 125° out of doors, and 105° in the shade.

On the evening of the same day ( the 13th) we paid a private visit to the Maharawul in his tents at Girajsir, and after a little private conversation, a brace of damsels were introduced, whose singing soon put an end to serious business. The 14th May passed away without any particular occurrence, but on the 15th we went in the evening to pay our farewell visit to the Maharaja, who was shortly to return to Beekaner, so that we should see his face no more, as we were not to be present at the interviews that were to take place on the following day.

The Raja Rutun Singh received us with the same kindness, and even with more intimacy than at our last meeting on the 13th, showing us the arrangement of his khas dera, in which there was separate tents for praying, sleeping, bathing, &c.: nor did he scruple to prostrate himself towards the thakoor dwara, and perform his devotions in our presence. As this was our last visit, he insisted upon our sitting with him until late at night, and after chatting familiarly for a long time, he introduced a goodly company of figurantes, whom he particularly brought to our notice, as being hereditary servants of the throne of Beekaner.

His zeal in pointing out the particular ladies who had danced in the presence of himself and his ancestors, afforded much fun, the introduction being worded something in this way. "They have danced before my family for many generations! Tara! where's Tara?" The star came when she was called, and put herself a little in front of the group. "There! Tara's aunt danced before my father ; and Chunda! where's Chunda? her nanee danced before my grandfather." Shade of Vestris! only conceive the Moon's grandmother capering before Guj Singh, and the Star's aunt enlivening old Soorut Singh with a neat glissade en arriere!" The fiddles struck up, emulating the music of the spheres ; the celestial bodies above named joined in the mazy dance with sundry inferior luminaries and satellites, each in its proper orbit ; and our visit terminated in a very merry manner. It was our blithest and our last!

The occurrences of the 16th May have been already noticed, being the day when mutual visits took place between the two Rajas, at which we were not present, so no more need be said about them ; they halted the next day at Guriala and Girrajisir, and on the 18th May we turned our backs upon the frontier, well pleased at the admirable manner in which every thing had gone off, and thankful too that at such a season not a single man, among the thousands brought together on that barren frontier, had died from fatigue, exposure to the sun, or badness of the water though many had suffered much on the journey.

The Maharaja's camp returned from Guriala towards Beekaner, and the Maharawul was to have accompanied Lieutenant Trevelyan to Bikumpoor, but suddenly changing his mind, started at midnight for Nok, and left us to make the best of our way from Girajsir to Bikumpoor, a cruel march of 26 miles among steep sandhills without a drop of water for many a mile. Two of my servants fell down exhausted on the road, and one of them was reported dead, but a supply of water was fortunately procured, which revived them both. We halted at Bikumpoor on the 19th May, being joined in the morning by the Rawul, who came over with a few followers, leaving his camp standing at Nok, distant 8 kos.

Bikumpoor or Bheekoonpoor is an exceedingly old fort, about a hundred yards square, with rubble walls, 25 feet high, occupying the whole of a little knoll, which gives it rather a stiff exterior section, though it has scarcely any interior profile, nearly the whole area of the fort being on a level with the terreplein of the rampart. There is a high cavalier in the north-east angle, and four guns are mounted in various parts of the fort, which has a garrison of 50 to 100 men, with a hakim or governor from Jeisulmere. There are high sandhills within range of the place which, though somewhat formidable-looking at a distance, has little real strength. A neat little town of 300 or 225 houses lies at the south-east side of the fort: one third of the inhabitants are Brahmins, who drive a traffic between Scind and Beekaner or Jeisulmere, having 250 camels employed in transporting goods, for which they pay no duty. There are two wells of salt water in the village, one of them close to the fort-gate, and 150 koonds or small pukka reservoirs for catching rain water.

Some idea may be formed of the very uninviting nature of the rohee or desert between Bikumpoor and Poogul, by the following little native story. A wild doe had lost her fawn, and fearing that some beast of prey had carried off the missing butcha, taxed a hyæna with having devoured it. The hyæna denied the charge with indignation, and offered to confirm his denial by the most solemn oath that could be administered: he accordingly swore, "if I have eaten your fawn, may I be condemned to dwell in the desert between Bikumpoor and Poogul!" On hearing which tremendous adjuration the doe fully acquitted him.

That this country was not always so desolate may, however, be inferred from the tradition that Bikumpoor once stood on the bank of a river, which was drank dry by a divinity taking up the water in the hollow of his hand: this exploit could not easily have been performed since the days of the royal hero, who gave his name to the fort, the Raja Beer Bikrumjeet, about whose era it is said to have been founded, and there really are within its precincts a couple of mundurs or pagodas that appear almost old enough to have been coeval with the great Bikrum. The fort at Birsilpoor being only seventeen hundred years old, modestly claims a less antiquity than the above, and is said to have been built as a half way house or resting place in the dreary track between Bikumpoor and Poogul.

We quitted Bikumpoor on the 20th May, accompanying the Maharawul to Nok, where there is fine arable ground, and abundance of sweet water near the surface: on the following day we all marched to Bap, our last resting place in the Jeisulmere country, but the account of our parting with the Rawul Guj Singh, and our entry on the Jodhpoor state, alias Marwar, must be reserved for some future opportunity.

Camp, Balotra in Jodhpoor, 5th July, 1835.—The proceedings of Lieut. Trevelyan's Mission to the westward have already been brought up to the time when the Rawul of Jeisulmere arrived at the village or small town of Bap, on the Jodhpoor frontier, after his interview with the Raja of Beekaner: we all reached Bap on the 21st May, and on the 22d our party was increased by the Rao of Birsilpoor's arrival with seventy or eighty followers, who came to pay their respects to the Maharawul. The Rao Saheb Singh of Birsilpoor is the most powerful of all the Jeisulmere feudatories, and required much persuasion before he would venture from his stronghold in the desert to lay his sword at the feet of his Bhatee sovereign; nor were his misgivings altogether without foundation, for, many years have not passed since the fort of his neighbour and relation, the young Rao of Bikumpoor was surreptitiously taken possession of by the Jeisulmere Government, and is to this day held as a royal castle to the exclusion of its more legitimate owner.

Rather than be deprived of his own possession in a similar manner, the Roa of Birsilpoor had determined to secure the parole of the European gentlemen, who accompanied the Rawul from Girajsir, that a safe return home might be guaranteed to him; otherwise he determined to decline the invitation (or in other words to disobey the order) to appear forthwith at the Rawul's camp, in which refusal he would have been backed by another neighbour and relation the Rao of Poogul, who is nominally subject to the Beekaner State, though of Bhatee family, and who promised to stand by Sabeb Singh for good and evil with all the forces he could muster, and to assist him, if necessary, in the defence of his desert fastness. Fortunately there was no occasion for any such display of force by these turbulent borderers; the Rao of Birsilpoor came quietly to Bap upon the pledge of a safe-conduct home, and was very honorably received by the Maharawul, who embraced him in open durbar, and received his nuzur and dismissed him on the 24th May, with a suitable present, at the same time that he broke up his own camp and marched toward Jeisulmere.

Previous to the Maharawul's departure, that is to say, on the evening of the 23d May, we paid a parting visit to our merry friend Gaj Singh, who received us with his usual good humour, and made repeated attempts to evince his satisfaction at the result of Lieutenant Trevelyan's Mission, by loading us with certain presents, but these attacks were very properly parried by that officer, so after much laughing and a little singing and dancing, we took our leave and shook hands for the last time with the Maharawul of Jeisulmere.

On the 25th May, we entered the Jodhpoor territory, making a march of more than 20 miles by a circuitous road from camp Bap to the city of Phulodee, with a marvellously hot sun over our heads, which was leisurely drying our brains while the rival candidates, for a disputed bit of frontier land, tried to persuade the sahib log that the boundary line ran so instead of so. That universal panacea for disputed frontiers, a perambulator, was had recourse to in the present instance, but its effects were rather so so, it being difficult to please both parties in a case of this kind, witness Dandy Dinmont and Jack o'Dawston.

The town of Phulodee is said to contain 3,000 houses, and is built on a rising ground, with a stone fort about seventy yards broad and 100 yards long, built on a rocky base, with walls about forty feet high, but having neither ditch nor rence. A few small guns are mounted on the walls, which appear to have a very weak section. On the south side of the fort are some good substantial houses, inhabited by merchants of the Jain persuasion, who have enormous wealth and with the exception of the Foujdars of Ramgurh in Shekawattee, are the largest capitalists in this part of the country. They are called dhuda, and are continually lending out monies in various quarters to respectable merchants at the moderate interest of eight annas per cent per mensem, or 6 per cent per annum. Some of the highest houses nearly overlook the little citadel above mentioned, which is not very strong, and the town may itself be considered open, though a ruinous bit of stone wall acts as a shuharpunah on its southern face. There are three small Jain pagodas, and also some mundurs of the ordinary Hindoo faith: there are four tanks (now dry) on the west and south sides of the town, and, there is abundance of well water within 15 or 20 cubits of the surface, which, however, is rather brackish, and is drawn up by the self discharging skin bag used in the Dukhun instead of the mot or chursa, commonly employed in Hindoostan.

We made no halt at Phulodee, but made the best of our way by two marches of 17 and 16 miles over tolerable roads to Pohkurn, a small walled city of considerable importance, the Thakoor being one of the most powerful of all the chiefs of Marwar, though the present incumbent is by no means so powerful as his grandfather the celebrated Siwæ Singh Chumpawut, who was treacherously murdered by Umeer Khan of Tonk, after the most solemn pledges of friendship had been exchanged between them.

On our approaching to within a kos or two miles of Pohkurn, the Thakoor came out to meet Lieutenant Trevelyan with about thirty followers, well mounted on fine Marwaree horses, which were much superior to the cattle that had ordinarily come under our notice. Buboot Singh is only the adopted son of the late Thakoor of Pohkurn, and being without issue, though provided with two wives, may in time be obliged to adopt his own successor too. He is a civil and comely looking young man, with a slight cast in his eye, and his reception of us was very satisfactory, for he not only accompanied us to our tents after the march, but came in the evening to pay a second visit of ceremony, though our camp was half a mile from the town, close to a large tank on the north-west side of the citadel.

After the Thakoor had sat with us for some time, we accompanied him back to his own muhal, which is a very neat little palace in the centre of the fort, and immediately to the south side of it, within the ramparts, is a stable yard, with excellent accommodation for about 150 or 200 horses, only half of which number, however, were picketted there at present, the remainder being out on duty of the district; the horses are separated from the mares, and the whole are sorted into squads according to their colours. After paying the chief a short visit in his own hall we rode through the town of Pohkurn, which is well-built, containing 3,000 houses, and is surrounded by a good wall, built of uncemented stone, about 15 feet high (including a thin parapet of 6 feet by 2½ feet) with a terreplein four feet broad; the whole being masked by a renee and small ditch formed out of the hard red soil.

The citadel is on the west side of the town, and forms part of its enceinte; it is admirably built of wrought stone, the walls being about 35 feet high outside, but only eighteen feet inside up to the terreplein. Its figure is an irregular oblong about 120 yards long and 80 yards broad, with a fausse braye and a deep but narrow ditch faced with masonry, the revetments of which have in some place been forced out by the roots of trees, but the body of the place is in excellent repair, having the muhil already mentioned in its centre, and a few guns on the walls, with good store of fuel inside, and a well of sweet water (about twenty feet deep!) in the court yard of the palace. The muhal has a gate of its own, so that it would serve as a retreat in case of the citadel being carried by storm.

Close to westward of the citadel is a large tank or sagur, partly faced with masonry, but containing less water than the other tank called Ramdesir, which was close to our tents. About a kos north of the city is a very conspicuous pagoda on the crest of some high rocky table land, marking the site of the old city, now quite deserted, near which are the chutrees or monuments of the deceased chiefs of Pohkurn. Three kos northward of the city is a celebrated sirna, or sanctuary, called Ramdeo-jee-ka-Dera, where malefactors find an asylum, and where people sometimes resort to offer up the first-shorn hair of their young childern.

The Pohkurn district was formerly said to yield a revenue of three lacs of rupees, but the income of the present Thakoor can hardly exceed a third of that sum, much of his patrimony having been alienated before he came into possession. Being on the high road from Jodhpoor and Pleerta to Jeisulmere, (that is to say from Jeypoor, Kotah, Boondee, Ajmere, &c., to Scind) a good deal of money is realized by the transit duty on opium, large quantities of which find their way by this route to the banks of the Indus.

After remaining three days at Pohkurn, we continued our march southward by way of Bhunceana, Bheekoraee; Oodoo, and Bheemar to Seew or Sheo, a small town, which is the capital of a considerably large but unproductive tract of country, parcelled out into petty districts, the Boomias of which pay but little deference to the Raja of Jodhpoor's hakim or governor, who is stationed at Sheo with four guns and a few soldiers. We were very civilly treated by this functionary, and halted one day beside the fine tank, having marched 78 miles from Pohkurn in five days notwithstanding the great heat of the weather. A dwarf of the malee cast came to our tents to ask advice for the extirpation of a tumour on his neck; he was about thirty years old and exactly thirty-six inches high.—Delhi Gazette.

THE ARCH-DEACONRY.

The selection and appointment of the Rev. Mr. Dealtry to the Arch-deaconry by Bishop Wilson, has been a subject of warm discussion for several days past in the daily journals of this presidency. Those, who have ranged themselves on the side of his Lordship, contend that he has a right—that it is his prerogative—to appoint to that office whom he will, without respect to age, length of service, or seniority. That is, that his Lordship may choose from among the Chaplains on the establishment any one, and, as in the case of Mr. Dealtry, exalt him over some ten or a dozen of his seniors in the service. Others contend that whatever may have been the prerogative of Bishops heretofore, and although in some instances referred to, such as the appointments of the Rev. Mr. Hawtayne to the Arch-deaconry of Bombay, and that of the Rev. Mr. Robinson to Madras, an arbitrary choice was made, yet precedents are no rule for the present time, as under the new arrangements the duties of Arch-deacon are to be performed by a Chaplain with an additional salary of two hundred and fifty rupees per mensem, and that these duties with the increased allowance ought in justice to devolve on him who holds the place of seniority in the establishment. The latter appears to us to be the only position which can be maintained with even the semblance of propriety, and to belong to the "things which are of honest and good report." The appointment to the Arch-deaconry is a case in which there is no room for the exercise of partiality and personal attachment, and one which does not appear to admit of a question as to qualifications; for, supposing that a junior chaplain possesses superior talents and education, the claims of seniority, if united with those of fair moral reputation, must outweigh those of the other, when the question of rank in the service is to be decided. The plea that Mr. Dealtry is a man of superior abilities and education, and that these justify the Bishop in placing him over his seniors, is too absurd to be listened to for a moment; for, indeed, it requires no deep acquaintance with the classics or profound study of the sciences to discharge, with general approbation, the duties of an Arch-deaconry. For the office is one of a spiritual, not of a literary character, and surely any chaplain of experience in this country, and especially one of twenty-two years standing with character unblemished, may be supposed to be fully competent, in every respect to its duties, at least, equally so with others younger in the service.

But if the question of literary merit or that of a collegiate degree, is of any importance in endeavouring to establish priority of claims, we have reason to believe that the senior Chaplain will not suffer in a comparison with Mr. Dealtry. Then, as to what may be said of the right of the Bishop to make an arbitrary choice on the ground that the Arch-deacon is to be regarded as his Lordship's deputy, as a locum tenens, &c. it might have some weight, and the appearance of consistency, if the appointment were to begin and end with his Lordship's authority in the country. But this is not the case. His Lordship may be under the necessity of relinquishing his honours to-morrow, but yet, Mr. Dealtry must be the Arch-deacon. What right has his lordship to bequeath his Arch-deacon to his successor? Would not his successor consider himself as possessing the same privilege to appoint his own Arch-deacon? Undoubtedly the privilege or right would be the same, if, as it is contended, his Lordship may gratify his own personal views and seek to please himself only in making a selection. Let the retirement of Mr. Dealtry be contemporaneous with that of the present Bishop, and then the argument of the locum tenens and personal gratification, in conferring the appointment will at least have the show of consistency. The fact of the Arch-deacon's continuance in office, being unaffected by any contingency which may happen to the Bishop, utterly precludes the right of consulting personal views and feelings in making the appointment. It is not like an appointment to a personal staff, which may be given to this or that individual, and taken away at pleasure. Were it so, no one could presume to question the propriety of his Lordship's selection, but not being so, every one questions the propriety of his Lordship's inflicting on his successor the consequences of his partiality and predilection. But Mr. Dealtry, it is said, is evangelical—zealous—pious, and, therefore, better qualified than any one else for the Arch-deaconry. Do those who, in these qualifications find an apology for his elevation, intend to insinuate that they are not to be found in the senior chaplain? We are not quite sure that we fully understand the purport and application of the term "evangelical" in the present case. Is it meant, that the doctrine which Mr. Dealtry inculcates is more according to the Gospel than that which is heard from the pulpit of the Cathedral? If so, then the question lies between two parties, the evangelical and non-evangelical, and Mr. Dealtry may thank the stars that the Lord Bishop happens to belong to the same party with himself. But we have never heard that the senior chaplain does not preach the doctrines of the church. He may be more modest and tolerant in his announcements than the senior at the old church: a fault (if it be one) which most people can very easily overlook.

But it was not our intention to discuss the merits of Mr. Dealtry, or those over whose heads Bishop Wilson has been pleased to drag him. Our impression is that the episcopal authority has stretched itself, in this instance, beyond its true measure—that his Lordship has no right to cast the claims of seni- ority in the service into the shade. We suppose it is too late for him to revoke the deed, and that the passive Mr. Dealtry has too much modesty to resign. We hope, however, if there are means of redress, they will be found out; but if not, that the senior chaplains will submit to the indignity with a becoming spirit of meek endurance.—Oriental Observer.

SIR,—Among the solid and primary advantages of the press may be justly reckoned the light which is here and there scattered by conflicting parties on subjects under discussion, and the exposures which sophistical scribblers are apt to make in their over-zealous attempts to bolster up a weak or an unjust cause. To war they will go, though it be but to expose their naked fronts to the severities or mercy of the enemy. Of this we have a most striking and apposite instance in the efforts now at work to establish the Bishop's wisdom and discrimination in his choice of an Arch-deacon, and in the denouement which the satellites of his Lordship make of the reasons and motives which have led to this selection.

Another material benefit of the press is the door of access which it throws open into the bureaus of powers and authorities, and the medium it affords of offering such suggestions as dignified ears would not brook to listen to from the lips of a subordinate, without, at least, regarding him as a presumptuous intruder, and dispiser of authorities. And, therefore, when we hear the enemies of the press stigmatize it as an unqualified source, not to say sentina, of evil, and decry it as an unworthy channel, through which to seek for the redress of wrong, we pause, and feel disposed to ask, what legitimate instrument can be employed to "teach our senators wisdom?" Respectful remonstrance? Appeals? Memorials? As well go preach to the sea and bid her restless waves lie still. To wield the weapons of reason and argument in combating the unwise measures of our rulers, or even whisper in the ear of power any hint of its own injudiciousness, or any restraint in its exercise, is to invoke upon a man's own head a thunder-storm of wrath, which shall shiver him to atoms. We hail, therefore, this dawn of better times—this blessing of a wisely conducted press; and rejoice, that a harbinger is gone forth to annunciate the lesson, that not even rulers can overstep the bounds of right and justice and propriety, without awakening, as with a fairy touch, public remonstrance, public displeasure and the dissatisfaction, if not the reprobation, of mankind.

After this exordium we proceed to canvas the late appointment to the Arch-deaconry. The advocates of his Lordship's choice say, and reiterate their loud amen, and applaud the discrimination and justice of the selection; and had they stifled their burning anxiety to compel the rest of the giddy world to think as they do, by their numerous lucubrations for establishing the paramount claims of the individual selected, we should probably never have been tempted to gainsay their opinions. But like vain babblers, they must indite about the matter; and out comes the unsoundness, the hollowness of their cause.

The question, happily for our limits, is duly circumscribed by confining all pretensions to such a dignity, to the two seniors and the Arch-deacon elect; the intermediate portion of the chaplains' list being regarded (poor fellows!) as so much waste paper—mere clerical hoi polloi, (procul este profani!) not admissible on the arena, and unworthy of notice. And we deny not the argument fortiori, as far as the point of seniority goes, that if the two seniors have no just reason to complain of the infringement of that rule, the contemned residue may bow their acquiescence. But are they all disqualified by an "unaccountable spirit of insubordination?" Are all their dispositions so deplorably mild as to be unmeet for "the stern duties" of such a dignitary? Moreover, it may be asked, by what enactment has the rule of seniority been cancelled, and from what date has it ceased to be in operation? In the civil, in the military and the medical services, seniority, when not disqualified by imbecility or other incompetency, puts in forcible and just appeal, and, (let the community of Calcutta testify) is but very rarely, and that too in cases of overwhelming interest or real disqualifications, wantonly set aside and trampled on. Under whose auspices, in what anno mirabili was it ever seen, that a writer was foisted into a Sudder Board, a subaltern made Adjutant-General, or an Assistant-Surgeon a member of the Medical Board? And what in the other branches of the service is so ridiculous as to excite laughter, is that to be upheld and applauded in the service ecclesiastical? We trow not. Either reform, then, or remodel all the services alike, or else let them severally and equally share in an equitable administration of their present regulations.

But perhaps the reformation is herewith (this schedule A) to be begun, and its commencement dated from the new clerical era of sternness; and this supposition is corroborated, by what we read in the same announcement of a "new system of Ecclesiastical Government, established in this diocese by Bishop Wilson, to the stern duties of which the new Arch-deacon is to give effect." With the particulars of this system, we of the laity, we believe, have not yet been favoured; the initiated alone enjoy so precious a privilege. We only hope, that it is not an imaginary creation, put forth for the purpose of showing "of what great consequence it is to his Lordship that he should be able to place the most implicit reliance upon those he may entrust with the direction of affairs during his absence."

Many persons, we understand, question the Bishop's prerogative to appoint whom he will. For ourselves we forego this objection. We only contend that that the Episcopal prerogative, not less than the royal, is fenced and circumscribed; and that his Lordship both can do wrong (which the king cannot) and cannot, without public censure, repudiate the just claims of suitable candidates, and violate the regulations of the service.

It is urged, likewise, that his Lordship is bound by Act of Parliament to nominate the senior to the appointment. We rather apprehend not, though we think, either way, the discussion of the legality of the measure cannot terminate until the law itself be known. And we have reason to conclude, that his Lordship's new letters patent since he became by the late charter, a metropolitan Bishop, have not yet arrived. Therefore, whatever measures his Lordship may be pleased to adopt by anticipation, may hereafter, for aught yet known to the contrary, have to be undone. Acts of Parliament in such matters give but the rough outline; the letters patent specify the details; and it would be an untoward task indeed, for his Lordship to have to learn the limits of his authority after having materially exceeded them. However, our presumtion is guarded on this point. Be the issue what it may, we think, that virtually and in spirit, the appointment is appropriated to the senior; for we cannot forget, that in Mr. Grant's correspondence with the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Court of Directors, he distinctly specifies, as a matter of judicious arrangement, that the office of Archdeacon should devolve on the senior chaplain. Notwithstanding, therefore, the omission of this specific enactment in the Act of Parliament (where we do not look for it) or even in his Lordship's letters patent (if it prove to be so omitted) it may with good reason be urged as the spirit of that arrangement, which was contemplated by the home authorities, and ought not, without solid and sufficient cause, to be needlessly set aside.

Needlessly did we say? Aye, there comes the pith and brunt of the contention; for the advocates of the new system of sternness urge, that there was an unavoidable necessity for his Lordship to fall back upon the rear of his clerical forces, by asserting, that the senior chaplain is disqualified by his unaccountable spirit of insubordination, the junior by his mildness of disposition, and the rest, of course, by one or other, or both.

It were well if so serious, not to say libellous a charge as that of "unaccountable insubordination," had been accompanied and substantiated by proofs. In the total absence of these, we are left to instance one or two occasions, on which this insubordinate spirit has been manifested; and though we neither excuse nor extenuate insubordination in any shape, and are ready to concede that the senior chaplain is not of the most bending temperament, yet a charge of insubordination is another thing; and we must be convinced, before we condemn, that his unwillingness to meet his Lordship's wishes, was not called forth by an illegitimate exercise of authority. His Lordship, to mention one instance, required the Cathedral chaplains to abdicate and throw open their pulpit and services to his own chaplain and son-in-law whenever he might wish it. Against this the senior remonstrated; and we hesitate not to affirm, that in so doing, if done respectfully, (as we are assured it was) he was but properly reminding his Lordship of overstepping his Episcopal authority. Not even His Grace of Canterbury himself, primate though he be, would thus interfere with the humblest curate in the British dominions.

On another occasion, a most respectful remonstrance was made by the two seniors, against the measure which his Lordship lately introduced and carried, for parcelling out and dividing the emoluments, which have been reserved ("meritorum præmia") to the two senior presidency chaplains, ever since the establishment of the English Church in India. Now this too may probably, by a rhetorical twist, be interpreted as insubordination. Then is to obey to be a slave. Do away with all the higher grades of emolument, of the civil, military, and medical services, and try whether the very avenues of Government would not be choked with addresses, and every public servant in the country join with one heart and one voice in pouring out their complaints. But would this be insubordination? We presume not. We would have wished his Lordship had reflected, that if, for the sake of removing (imaginary) inconveniences, it seemed expedient to effect the arrangement in question, it was just and right likewise, previously to provide some compensation for the diminution of established emoluments; provide, we say, if impossible from any other source, than out of his Lordship's own allowances, rather than pare away the only two remnants of any value annexed to the Ecclesiastical Department. There is not a chaplain, we are assured, throughout the country, save and except those at the Mission Church, who does not think himself injured by this uncalled for measure; and considers the only prospect the service held out to him of temporal benefit, cut off and blasted. The Mission Church chaplains, of course, participate not in this grievance; they only share the spoil; and now, a chaplain of the Old Church though he arrived but to-morrow, (as the present ones did but yesterday) will immediately, on the departure of the present incumbents at the Cathedral, be in the receipt of probably larger emoluments than the senior in the service. Do we hear the rest of the chaplains admonished, as ministers of the sanctuary, "not to seek their own?" We retort in their behalf, the self-same admonition, and add thereto, "but every man another's wealth;" and we think it would have become the characters of those, who supported and urged this measure, to have exerted their utmost influence in dissuading, instead of moving his Lordship to effect it. We know, however, in this particular matter, we are stemming a strong current. The measure is popular. It is, moreover, a weakening, however slight, of the Church's secular sinews, and therefore, right and justice must succumb. We only deplore, that the avowed father of his clergy should have been so misguided as to bring it to pass, because by no interpretation can it be construed as an instance of paternal solicitude for their welfare.

Another instance of the senior's insubordination, connected with the late order for the reconstruction of the Select Vestry, we can only barely allude to; but we apprehend, that as laymen are mixed up with this measure, his Lordship will have to undergo the pain of experiencing what actual insubordination is.

These, and it may be one or two others of the like sort, are the instances of alleged insubordination which disqualify the senior chaplain for the Arch-deaconry. Before quitting this topic, we cannot forbear to counsel his Lordship to be as cautious, as reluctant, as determined, not to construe every apparent symptom of discontent among his clergy into the crime of insubordination, as his advocates are zealous to establish, to fasten, if not to aggravate such construction. There was a time at Rome, and that a stern time too, when one of her best historians placed on record "amisimus rerum vocabula," and if the public voice join in denominating respectful remonstrance insubordination, may a similar verdict be recorded on the present Indian generation.

But of the Junior Presidency Chaplain, the very head and front of his offending is mildness and meekness of disposition. Forgive us for re-quoting from the Hurkaru.

> "Away to Heaven, respective lenity,
> And fire-ey'd fury be my conduct now!"

The church is, indeed, become militant, when in the eyes of a christian Bishop, sternness is represented as being the highest recommendation for an Arch-deaconry. We forbear diluting this powerful argument put forth by the (clerical!) inditers of the paragraph in the Englishman, and only mourn that his Lordship does not divest himself of such advocates and denounce such an intolerable attempt (more sophistrio) to make the worse appear the better cause. As for the jesuitical quibble of the second version and the amended edition of the said illustrious paragraph, we despise it too much to do more than notice it. There is a "power most chiefly declared," not in shewing sternness, but "mercy and pity"—a power, too, not mortal but omnipotent. In earnestness we propose it for imitation, and entreat all who have heard, or read thereof with their lips to make it the pattern of their lives.

We have thus discussed the more prominent points of this objectionable proceeding, as they are exhibited to our notice by the advocates of his Lordship's choice. The entire and several bearings of the subject, and all the merits of the appointment exceed the limits of a newspaper. We can only implore his Lordship, if he be determined to abide by his choice, not to suffer any one unjustly to depreciate the characters of all those who have been superseded; but boldly to maintain his own view of his own prerogative, his "sic volo," and "sic jubeo" ("le roi le veut") though it be at the expense of all right and justice in violation of the established rules of the service, and in defiance of all impartiality and judgment.

Alas! there will be halos round the brightest luminaries. And when, after hearing as we have so often done, the splendid outpourings, which the highly gifted Bishop deals, like an Apostle, from his stores of biblical knowledge ("O! si sic omnia!") we follow him into the business of life, we are so perplexed and bewildered as to feel disposed to discredit our senses in identifying the individual. What eye, indued with prophetic vision, could have foreseen in the evangelical Daniel Wilson, the future "Lord over God's heritage," not bearing the crosier, but swaying a stern sceptre over the very pastors he was sent to oversee? Harsh language this, and we grieve to use it. But if the arbitrary exercise of power to the disregard and prejudice and injury of those who bend beneath it; if the rejection of all remonstrance, however respectful, however humble, and the regarding such remonstrance as unaccountable insubordination; if the sacrifice of justice and equity and acknowledged qualifications on the altar of favouritism and partiality, bespeak not and constitute not arbitrary rule, we can only regret, that we can not give understanding as well as arguments to those who can think otherwise. We are indeed desirous of imputing this unhappy appointment to mistaken views, because our sincere inclination is both to admire and venerate his Lordship; though we greatly fear the mitre's load has cramped or crushed his kindlier judgment out. And when we read about the "store of knowledge," which is ascribed to the new Arch-deacon, comprehending in its unfathomable recesses the "omne scibile" (as the schoolmen have it, and the Arch-deacon perchance, will construe) of human science, we fear his Lordship has been taken in—has, by some unlucky perversion been led to admire the "ex fulgore fumem" instead of the "ex fumo dare lucem," and so been cheated of his better judgment. But whatever be the moving cause, we adjure his Lordship to weigh the consequences of this injudicious appointment. The goodly Heber once forgot himself, when he superseded Mr. Corrie, and placed a favourite junior over his hoary head; but the same Heber, like a child of light, retrieved the manifest error as soon as he discerned it, cancelled the appointment, and at once sacrificed his private feelings and partiality to the palpable dictates of rectitude. "Go, and do thou likewise," do we earnestly, though with all deference, exclaim to Bishop Wilson, and entreat him, if he seeks to earn the holy praise of Christendom, to wipe out this blot and annihilate it for ever. We beg his Lordship to catholicise his feelings, to stretch his fostering eye beyond the pale and precincts of the Mission Church, and to expand his regards largely and commensurately with that vast inheritance which is prophetically assigned to our common Lord and Master. And if his Lordship will thus seek to secure to himself the esteem, the veneration, the affections, and the love of his inferior clergy, instead of the bare compliance of slavish fear, he may hope to see the infant Church of India spread, like her rivers, and spiritually fertilize the land. Whereas if a conviction, (nay, living, lasting monuments) of his Lordship's injustice and favouritism spread its withering influence among the working clergy, and so far as these things are permitted to be matters of human operation, paralyze their efforts, will have hereafter to mourn having laid a stumbling stone in Zion, and made the onward wheels of our Redeemer's charriot tarry. And we are sure, that if a many years' acquaintance with India; if a knowledge of its spiritual wants; if extensive local intelligence; if a long intercourse with the European soldiery; if skilfulness in Church discipline; if unambitious, unassuming, undictatorial, and conciliatory manners be positive virtues and qualifications, highly essential and of permanent importance in an Arch-deacon, as their opposites are negative and objectionable, we entreat his Lordship to think on these things—to remove the veil which obscures his unbiassed judgment, and so exercise his Episcopal prerogative, as to let all men see, that the great champion of christianity is more desirous of doing right than ashamed of acknowledging that he has done wrong.—Hurkaru. H.

SIR,—The Bishop's conscience sleeps: and were he not a master in Israel, and thousands looking up to him for light and guidance, we would have hesitated to disturb its untimely slumber. But Christianity is made to weep, when such a standard bearer fainteth. Lethargy at such a crisis is little short of death: it confounds the distinctions of right and wrong, and opens the sluices of clamour and discontent to work away the very foundation of our Protestant temple. We see the untoward non-conforming spirits covertly smiling at this tale of an Arch-deaconry, and congratulating their conforming brethren on the conspicuous blessings of their church government. We dare not, therefore, as far as our small influence goes, consign this matter over to the enemies of Church Establishments, but rather choose to handle it ourselves, still clinging to the hope, that his Lordship's conscience will shake off its drowsiness, resume its tender functions, and restore its proprietor to a judicious and faithful discharge of his duty.

His Lordship's views on the nature and duties of a stewardship are so clear and vivid, and he has sketched them out so graphically —so much to the life, that we do but present to his view the lessons of his own lips, when we remind him of the importance of rightly using the blessings of rank, dignity, character and influence. Assuredly, to move in a superior orbit is not bestowed on any man for naught; and in times like these especially, he should give much light, and impart a benign and useful influence to whatever system he may belong. To this the very letters regarding his Lordship's own appointment bear us testimony; for they congratulated him on the enlarged sphere of usefulness in which he would be placed, and spoke of the high responsibilities annexed to the situation. His Lordship keenly understands, that, as the place and dignity of his own most sacred order in the Church of God is eminently higher, his charge greater, his inspection more extensive, so will his accountability be accordingly; and, therefore, when the moral horizon is darkened by the dimness of one of its chief luminaries, when the unerring line of right is distorted from its rectitude, and righteousness and justice wounded through the sides, and bleeding through the weaknesses of their professed champions, surely it is time to interfere—high time respectfully to point out and calculate the amount of aberration, try at least, to touch the spring of his Lordship's conscience, and ultimately awaken him from this unhappy lethargy to his own unclouded sense of right.

But before proceeding further we must have a word or two with the Englishman, whom now we must heartily congratulate on a share of some impartiality. We hope to see him open his eyes a little wider; and we regret that he will not condescend to scan the pages of his contemporaries; because by neglecting this, he occasionally remains in the dark, while the rest of the community enjoy the sunshine; otherwise he would not have discovered for the first time, from the letter of PRUDENS, so much novel information. Had he noticed our former letter on this subject, he would have found there every spark of information which has not, until now, "thrown so much light on the subject,"—and not only so, but he would have detected also the mistake of PRUDENS, in speaking of the former act of Parliament, when but one Arch-deacon was sanctioned for the whole of the three "Indian Presidencies;" for every body knows that each Presidency has hitherto had its separate Arch-deacon. On another head, too, the Englishman is not well informed. He says he has "always regarded the office of Arch-deacon as one entirely of selection, without the slightest reference to the age or standing of the several candidates, because the first Arch-deacon were sent from England, in supercession of all the Indian clergy, and bearing in mind the fact, that Mr. Corrie was passed over by Mr. Hawtayne, the Madras clergy superseded by Mr. Robinson, and the Bombay clergy by Mr. Hawtayne."

As to the first Arch-deacons, the course adopted was not only the usual, but the only one available. At that time the clergy at each presidency were very few in number, (in Bengal about a dozen instead of, as now allowed, thirty seven,) and they had never been under the tutelage of either Bishop or Arch-deacon; and therefore were, no doubt, considered inapt instruments for laying the foundation of an ecclesiastical polity: much the same as if we wanted to make the New Zealanders good soldiers, we should, in the first instance, send out some efficient officers, and a drill sergeant to make a start, rather than run the risk of finding suitable materials ready at hand on the island. The case of Mr. Corrie makes directly against the Englishman's arguments. Mr. Hawtayne was actually appointed Arch-deacon, and the seniors all superseded; but as soon as Bishop Heber found out his mistake (for the seniors at once tendered their resignation of the service) he cancelled Mr. Hawtayne's appointment, and restored Mr. Corrie. Next, as to Mr. Hawtayne's appointment to Bombay, that, too, admits of satisfactory explanation. Bishop Heber having once actually appointed him Arch-deacon of Calcutta, and then been obliged to displace him, was, to say the least of it, very awkwardly situated; he, therefore, in fulfilment of a pledge, and out of the kindness of the kindest heart perhaps that ever beat, nominated Mr. Hawtayne to Bombay. But then what can be said of Mr. Robinson? Why, that if the present appointment could be justified on the same grounds as his was, we, at least, should have very little, perhaps nothing, to say about it. Arch-deacon Robinson is a gentleman who in addition to his qualifications as a pious and eminent minister, is gifted with more than ordinary talents. He took a high honorary mathematical degree, and was a Chancellor's medallist at the University—distinctions of the first order that an undergraduate can attain to. And when we bear in mind, that he subsequently became Bishop Heber's chaplain, and thus let his light shine within the palace walls, no wonder that such rare attainments, adorned with both piety and zeal, were charms in the eyes of the Bishop, and claims to which even the Madras clergy might bow with cheerfulness. Of Mr. Dealtry, we believe we are speaking correctly in saying, that he took no honorary degree at the University at all; but went out among the oi polloi, and went also by what some persons think, rather a by-path—that is, he took his degree in Civil Law, and therefore wears the badge of B. C. L. or as some have it L. L. B. We wish, therefore, the Englishman would accept this information at our hands, and reflect likewise, that with regard to the Arch-deaconries of Madras and Bombay, the Bishop, not being on the spot, and therefore not having the means of rightly estimating the qualifications of his clergy, may act with somewhat more latitude than is admissible at Calcutta; and in proof of this we may mention, that had the senior of Bombay been appointed instead of Mr. Hawtayne, it would have given greater umbrage in consequence of his real ineligibility, we believe, to the office.

We have already presumed to offer a few observations on this most melancholy topic. We call it melancholy miseranda vee hosti, because we are not enlistened in the rank of his Lordship's enemies—we, the rather would rush forward and be as eager in his defence, had he had righteousness on his side, as we are now zealous to convince him of error. When, therefore, he lays himself open to the merited disapprobation of his friends, we cannot choose but deplore. Indeed, this unfortunate, this ill-advised bestowal of the Arch-deaconry, turn it over on every side, stands so bluntly and rebelliously in the face of all that ought to guide his Lordship in the exercise of his patronage, that the voice of every parishioner in the neighbourhood, batting perhaps a few immoveable partisans of one particular parish, is pitched to our uniform strain of condemnation and regret; and from house to house this note of lamentation speeds!

> " Pudet hæ oprobria—> Et dici potuisse, et non potuisse refelli. "

In our former observations we alluded to some weighty arguments which might make the stoutest champion of arbitrary power and patronage halt, if not retreat; but as we have failed of touching the tender string which makes his Lordship's conscience vibrate, we again proceed, "rudi Minerva," briefly and generally to resume the subject; at the same time assuring his Lordship, that if he thinks by taking no notice of this dark cloud it will soon be passed over, he will find himself grievously mistaken; for it will both overshadow and obscure his path, and at length, probably, burst upon his head. We dare not sooth his Lordship by predicting smooth things, that in a few weeks Lethe will have drowned this matter in her oblivious waters; because we believe it is a task more than Herculean now to hoodwink the world, and bring it by wholesale to renounce its sense and reason. On the side of right one may dare do all that does become a man; we may even shut our ears against public opinion, and withstand public feeling; but when the cause we maintain can only be propped up by power and prerogative; when it levels to the ground all hitherto acknowledged claims and established regulations; when it exalts one to the depression and detraction of another, and gratifies the wishes of a select party while it grieves the party-catholic, we roll a Sisyphean stone, which will roll back and crush us to atoms. If we estimate aright the conformation and calibre of his Lorship's understanding, we believe that he has failed on this occasion, to let his own clear powers of reasoning, his master mind ("architectone phronesis") exercise an unbiassed influence in determining this choice. We feel persuaded that he cannot vindicate this measure on his right to do as he pleases, for where is the man more sensible than his Lordship, that there is no mortal power so lawless as to be exempted from the dominion of right, reason and plain justice? and, therefore, what can we suppose, but that he has let an overweening partiality put his judgment in abeyance, and so magnify the qualifications of the new Arch-deacon, as to pass a verdict of unworthiness on all above him. It is here we are brought under the somewhat painful necessity of adverting to these said paramount qualifications—painful, because we cannot, like his Lordship, view his virtues through such a magnifying medium, and yet cast his imperfections into the shade, especially when these qualifications are urged in justification of his being exalted, per saltum, by a prodigious leap above all his seniors. At the same time we disavow the most distant desire to underrate or depreciate the new Arch-deacon's merits. Let them all be acknowledged. Throw them all into an equitable balance, and give them bouncing weight; but let them not be exaggerated and multiplied, as if the very luminary in the religious firmament were dim and small beside him—("velut inter ignes luna minores.") Granted the new Arch-deacon is both a zealous and a laborious clergyman—he has fair natural parts and some fluency of expression. We deny not even an unction, and a fervour in his manner and a considerable degree of readiness at extempore effusions; but beyond this we go not—"sunt certi denique fines;" and we think if his best friends had been as prudent, as they are over eager to ascribe to their favourite such leviathan talents and energies, they would have at once shown their own impartiality, and not have injured the cause they wish to serve. "His energy of character." Why, what of that? Energy, abstractedly considered, is a very questionable virtue. It may be misdirected, and misdirecting it may be exorbitant in demands, and lavish in expenditure; and we fancy, that if these very admirers of energy were getting well buffeted about by the Euroclydan, or the wind which breaks the ships of Torshish, they would wish they had less of it. They would think, perhaps, that a softer breeze might "blow upon the garden and yet elicit the spices thereof"—"a breath" merely, "that can breathe upon the slain that they may live." We remember, in days gone by, when a lady who now no longer presides over the gentler sex of British India, was wont to contrast the new Arch-deacon with another popular, but now departed rival—the one as leading, the other as driving his master's flock to heaven, and though we quarrel not with the quo modo, so long as the effect be accomplished, yet it is very problematical whether the same driving, compulsory method and manners, will be effectual in correcting the wills and subduing the untowardness of his brother pastors; for though we believe them fully prepared and disposed to submit to a mild and equitable superintendance, yet we very much doubt their submission to a harsh and overbearing authority. "Imperaturus est hominibus, qui nec totam servitutem, pati possunt, nec totam libertatem." And then again the gigantic knowledge,—laying its broad hand upon the entire encyclopædia (in the modern and more noble acceptation of the term, that is, the whole circle) of arts and sciences, how wise—how much better to have let their favorite enjoy the fair fame of a useful and competent minister, apt and fit to teach, and sufficiently mighty in the Scriptures to discharge faithfully the pastoral office. Verily the indiscretion of friends is oftentimes more prejudicial than the rancour of enemies; and we would recommend the new Arch-deacon to be rid "tali auxiles et defensoribus istis." As for one of them, sweet PHILOMEL, we cannot handle roughly so plaintive and melodious a songstress. Go gentle bird! our pen and ink we cannot squander upon thee! We are investigating not the merits of a nightingale, but the qualifications for an Arch-deaconry; and the more we read and hear, and meditate on the motives which can have led to this appointment, the more convinced we are, that it is unjust, injudicious and hurtful. We pronounce it unjust, because in a service of seniority, seniors, who are equally competent for the office, are superseded. It is injudicious, because an incorrect estimate has been made in favour of one to the prejudice of many; and it is hurtful because a slur is cast, and a damp and discouragement thrown on the whole Ecclesiastical service. Of its injustice we have already spoken, but we are not contented with the little we have urged; we think much more may be advanced, although his Lordship, probably owing to his short experience, may hesitate to allow such considerations to have due weight. We hold, that in a service like this, the wear and tear of life, the continuous exhaustion occasioned by long and faithful labors, and the sacrifices which all must make during a long series of years, are of themselves commendatory to a wise government, and not, without sufficient cause, to be arbitrarily rejected and despised. Let any one look around among the present tenants of power and authority, the members of boards and heads of departments, and even their deputies and assistants, and what will he find but a rule, almost without an exception; nay, in many instances, especially in the military and medical services, to which the Ecclesiastical is more closely assimilated, not only is seniority or length of service a recommendation, but tirocinium is a positive disqualification. So sacredly is this regulation observed, that it would be difficult to produce a case where it has been pointedly violated. And what is the Archdeacon, but, in most cases, the Bishop's assistant, or deputy, and oftentimes, especially during his Lordship's absence, a sort of Ecclesiastical Vice-President? Had the appointment been merely that of his Lordship's private chaplain, we would have allowed taste and prejudice to run amuck at pleasure; but in appointing one, not by seniority but choice, out of their own number, to controul and drill a corps composed of his brother chaplains, some little regard should be had to their taste and feelings, and some peculiar fitness should have been secured in so select an individual. Besides, we are of opinion, that in the ordinary discharge of Church Government, a degree of mildness and forbearance is not incompatible with the most efficient discipline; and that it is of far more importance to reign over the hearts than the persons of the clergy. His Lordship, therefore, will do well to consider how far his new Vicegerent is likely to attain so desirable an end. For our own part, we are of opinion, that if his Lordship had cast lots, it could not have fallen out more inappositely, not, we mean, on the score of ministerial qualifications, but fitness for Church Government.

How many persons are there endued with a competent measure of the spirit of scriptural knowledge, who are yet wanting in the spirit of Government, a spirit most indispensable in the administration of Church polity; where a want of skilfulness in the machinery, or of cautious controul over its operations, may throw every wheel into disorder. The injustice also is not temporary but lasting; and what is worse, rather aggravated than diminished by the lapse of time. Just now, while the thing is taking place, and we have sufficient data to canvas the appointment, we can duly appreciate the merits and demerits both of the rejected seniors and successful junior. We can make allowances for the friction which has accelerated the other; for the fancy, favouritism, and all the other ingredients, that have co-operated to the fall of many and the rise of one. But in after-days, when the heat of inquiry shall have cooled and the circumstances of the new Arch-deacon's elevation shall have faded from the memory of the everchanging society of India, then will the damnatory consequences still survive, and the ready inference be promptly, because unavoidably drawn, that the present Arch-deacon's seniors were unworthy or unfit for the office. Surely his Lordship must have failed to make these obvious calculations; and therefore it is that we have cast them up for him; and if he wish to verify the accuracy of our figures, we would recommend him for the nonce, by a bold metamorphosis to picture himself to himself as one of these humble seniors of the Bengal chaplains; and then he will be enabled, with some degree of fellow-feeling, to muse and mediate on that unmerited degradation which he himself has inflicted on the department over which he presides.

The injudiciousness—the want of judgment displayed is most manifest. The very qualifications, which we should have put down as indispensable, are repudiated. The very energies which we should have thought at best, but questionably beneficial, are made to silence all other pretensions. Long experience in church government and local experience of India; a knowledge of its real wants and of the best mode of relieving them; a mild and unassuming way of enforcing duties, and a tolerance of allowing others to think, at least as well as yourself, go for nothing; whereas energy and mere bodily and vocal vigour, and a peremptory and almost overpowering manner of putting down the humble suggestions of others, go for every thing. The clergy only, we are assured, are permitted to appreciate fully these qualifications for a dictatorship; and even the revered Arch-deacon Corrie used softly to complain, (not, we presume, to expostulate) of being deturbed from his own proper sphere and station, and bid to listen to an oracle.

But this is not all—the evil stops not here. His Lordship is concerned to consider not merely the temporary outcry which may be raised against this or that particular measure; but what will be the permanent effect of this proceeding on the working body, of which he is the head. "Natura infirmitatis humanæ tardiora sunt remedia quam mala; et ut corpora lente augeseunt, cito extinguuntur, sic ingenia studique oppresseris facilius, quam revocaveris." Yes, one blighting hour will destroy more than a year's sunshine will build up; and the energies of all may be paralized by the immature exaltation of one. The subjects, it is true, of his Lordship's Government are under the separate dominion of conscience, and are amenable to a still higher power. But it does not become his Lordship the less on that account to take heed, that the Church sustain no hurt nor hindrance through his faults or miscarriages. We believe the clergy will be preserved by higher motives in the faithful discharge of their several abilities; yet the cheerfulness, the alacrity of obedience to his Lordship's particular instructions—the concurrence, the approbation, the affection we should see, even in matters indifferent, surrendered as to a wise, just, and impartial ruler we cannot but apprehend will become chilled by such a nipping frost. A scotched wheel may be dragged along; but the less friction, the more nimble the movement. His Lordship can command obedience; but the obedience of love is what he wants. "Metus et terror infirma vincula caritatis." We can further tell his Lordship, not on our own authority, but one to whom wise governors have paid deference, that "nunquam satis fida potentia, ubi nimia," and that "nihil rerum mortalium tam instabile ac fluxum quam fama potentiæ non sua vi nixæ." We believe likewise, that we could safely appeal to an authority to which his Lordship himself thinks it a privilege to bow; but we are writing in a newspaper—and writing there, because we have no other mode of gaining access, and have not the presumption to storm his Lordship's palace with the freedom of our opinions. We write, too, because the clergy themselves, notwithstanding their insubordinate spirits, are overawed. They know their own obligation to obedience to their own spiritual Governors, and they feel the utter impracticability and uselessness of remonstrance against the measures by which his Lordship's government has of late been distinguished. They remember likewise

"Milo's end,
Wedg'd in that timber which he strove to rend."

We have already grown too large for a newspaper; and therefore pursue this subject as far as it would go, we cannot. But a hint or two we may throw out, which may concern those who are most interested in the business. We should like to ask the Arch-deacon, if it has never occurred to him to reflect, whether he would not have reaped greater honour in declining this dignity than he has done by accepting it. Some persons were silly enough (silly, because ignorant of human nature) to fancy that he had no taste for gew-gaws. They thought that he was regardless of rank and station, and sought only to be a faithful shepherd of his Master's flock. They persuaded themselves that nothing would induce him to burden himself with so invidious an exaltation. For ourselves we never thought so. We have lived too long and witnessed too much of human frailty, not to be cautious in ascribing to any one the rare quality of real indifference to the pride and pageantry of life. Alas! human nature is not to be trusted—"Naturam expellas furcâ, tamen usque recurrit." And how often does it happen that station rather obstructs than aids our usefulness? Connexion with party, and the habit of viewing a subjects in reference to personal aggrandizement, too often obscure the noblest intellects, and convert into patrons of narrow views and temporary interests those, who, in other conditions, would have been the lights of their age and the propagators of everlasting truth. Shall we despair then of seeing the giver and the gifted declare their magnanimity by undoing this unhappy deed! If we must despair of this, we must despair likewise of ever seeing the day when they shall live in the hearts and affections of the Indian clergy. When we saw the dangers to which his Lordship was exposed, when we saw the contemplated purpose of bestowing the Arch-deaconry on his relative, we afterwards congratulated ourselves on the hair-breadth escape from so unseemly a proceeding. But after clearing such a Scylla, we never dreamt of this Charybdis; nor could we bring ourselves to believe the fact, till it was impossible to disbelieve it. Oh! that his Lordship would hear us for a moment, while we entreat him to remember, that the distribution of patronage is not a matter of common gratuity, but the discharge of a sacred function, in which it is necessary to look around with much circumspection and ascertain with much carefulness, the real and undisguised qualifications of all those who may be candidates; to remember the claims of long and faithful services, and not needlessly set them aside; and to shut the ear against all solicitations of friendship or interest, to dissolve for a time every private tie, forgetting party opinion and withstanding party feeling, and asking only what is right.

"A sharp judgment shall be to them that are in high places," and therefore we presume to admonish. We know the difficulty of the ask and the feeble pen we have in our hand. But the cause we sustain is on a rock. If any one shall say that we are enlarging the wounds and aggravating the weakness of the Christian cause, we disavow the allegation, and confidently affirm, that the Church has nothing to fear from the exposure of truth, so long as the truth itself shed a lustre and honor on his proceedings. Truth in every department of human knowledge and human proceedings, and in spite of all artificial objects and hindrances will ultimately prevail. Like tried silver she only comes out of the furnace brighter and brighter. When truth lays open real grievances or abuses, whether intentional or otherwise, then is the time, especially for spiritual governors, to take warning, how by one rash act, they may more easily undermine and demolish their citadel, than by a long course of wise and useful Government they can re-establish her in the affections of mankind.—Ibid. H.

SIR,—I must crave the favour of a corner to detail the great doings at the Archi-deaconal dinner on Wednesday last. Your reporter, I believe, was not there, or I should have been spared the pains of being the chronicler of this event; and the public would have been favoured with a more correct account of it. Pray why was he absent? There was the greatest possible probability of much speechifying: and as the dinner was of a public nature, given by a public functionary, on his elevation to a public office, to all the clergy of the establishment, it was a fit occasion for the pen of a ready writer. However, in the want of a better, I will endeavour to be a faithful narrator; but as the account has to pass through a lengthened course before it comes to me, it may not be quite so clear as when it first rose from the spring; but may have mixed itself a little with the soil of the channel.

The whole ecclesiastical district, I am told, sent in its contributions on this memorable occasion; and forces were levied from Dum-Dum, Chinsurah, Berhampore, Howrah, Barrackpore, and Bishop's College, and every other out-post within a hundred miles of the metropolis; all in short were there, save only one or two solitary "insubordinate" exceptions. The Bishop graced the meeting with his attendance (αυτον και θερα παντα) because the sanction of his presence was indispensable, but like poor Acteon "vellet abesse quidem, sed adest."

After a short confabulation, the party descended to the glorious enterprize, and were no sooner seated, it seems, than a mighty marvel began to pervade the guests at the mighty change which had taken place within the old Church parsonage,—the paraphernalia was altogether excellent; and up and down the gentle whisper ran "quantum mutatus ab illo." Who cares about the patronage, (quoth one of the uncovenanted "nè pour la digestion") so long as we get good fare like this? Who, indeed, rejoined another, if he will treat us well, and let us alone!

But despite of every endeavour to make the best of a sorry business, still there was an immoveable cloud abiding on almost every brow, and il penseroso was the obvious musing of almost every heart present. Even the Bishop, I am assured, could not shake off dull care: "frons læta parum, et dejecto lumina vultu;" and the sadness without bespoke the conflict and turmoil within. Some how or other a general persuasion had previously pervaded the party, that his Lordship would disburden his surcharged mind; some expected a strain of honeyed globules, of language ("mellitos verborum globulos"); others predicted an explosion; but all seem to have thought when the time came, "parturiant montes;" and many apprehended the fatal issue of that ominous verse. But while the travail of mind was going on, the evening was wearing away, till at length, to the unspeakable joy of all present, a gentle move ended in a general rise, and the dinner table was abandoned without a single speech. Not even Therapon muttered a word.

The party now divided, all the seniors present felicitating themselves on their escape and betaking themselves off, and the rest proceeding to the drawing room.

There was still, I presume, a lurking apprehension, that either his Lordship or the Choragus would put a coronis on the gloomy festivity of the evening by exhibiting, at least, a few "meandrings of verbal obliquity"; and the sequel proved the correctness of this anticipation. After the lapse of a short but uneasy silence, the Archdeacon opened upon an harangue, to which the residue of the surrounding brethren listened, "quasi vocem aduti dignam templo."

A mere outline is the utmost in my power to give. He was to all appearance, I learn, labouring most intensely within, so that a first-rate reporter could scarcely have converted the effusion into a connected speech. It was in some such a strain as this. "He had not the least intention of addressing his dear brethren, until the spur of the moment, and, therefore, he had not premeditated what he was going to say. He could not, however, help remarking how much he regretted that his appointment to the Arch-deaconry had created so much unjustifiable dissatisfaction. He was more especially concerned, that any measure of our most excellent Diocesan should be impugned at a season like the present, when the English Church itself was in jeopardy, and required the unanimity and co-operation of all her members to save her from this hour of peril. And more particularly in the infant Church of India was any breach among the brethren to be deplored. It was impossible for him not to have felt, it would be hypocrisy to say he had not, what had appeared in the newspapers on the subject. But he, nevertheless, disregarded all newspaper discussions, and let them pass as the idle wind. He was chiefly grieved on account of our most excellent Diocesan, who must have been affected by what had lately transpired. As to the arguments which had been urged either against himself or his Lordship, they were too absurd to deserve either notice or confutation. He himself should certainly not condescend to take any notice of them. The injustice complained of was without the slightest foundation; the prerogative which had been questioned, was a most undoubted and inviolable right. Whether our most excellent Diocesan had, or had not received his new letters patent, was a matter of not the slightest moment. Our most excellent Diocesan had only acted as any Civil Governor would have done under similar circumstances, and abided by the old letters patent until the new ones come out. He was persuaded that the clergy had not been the authors of any of the articles which had appeared on the subject: he would not lay such a sin to their charge but he feared they might, incautiously have abetted the public voice in feeding the flame.

He then proceeded to speak of "his own unworthiness ("cineta cædit sua") and how much he had been humbled by the late occurrences. ("Oro, miserere animi non digna ferentis.") "Two months ago he had not the most distant notion of what was to befal him, and he had never moved a finger towards obtaining the appointment. Our most excellent Diocesan had made the selection from the best motives, and entirely on his own judgment; and no person had a right to question its propriety. And after being chosen for the office, unworthy as he was, he did not venture to shrink back; but felt himself bound neither to be wanting, nor unwilling, to render his aid and co-operation to our most excellent Diocesan."

"The comparisons which had been drawn in the newspapers were both unjust and invidious. Comparisons had nothing to do with the matter, and he deprecated them altogether. Our most excellent Diocesan ought to enjoy the privilege of being guided by his own discretion in such matters. He was fully humbled under a sense of his own unworthiness, and deplored the impetuosity of his temper; but at the same time he assured his dear brethren, that they should not experience any thing to complain of on that score; but that he should ever be ready to listen to their wishes and applications, and he hoped they would all readily co-operate with him and our most excellent Diocesan in every measure that would tend to promote the common cause of rightcousness.

"Dixerat Anchises:" such, or nearly such was the burden of the song. The exact words I cannot vouch for as I am only a heresay reporter; the spirit may be relied on as here recorded; "figuram animi magis quam corporis." It oozed out, I am told, like viscous varnish out of a narrow necked bottle, sticky and loath to come. There was nothing throughout, of the "animo vidit, ingenio complexus est, eloquentiâ illuminavit:" nothing of the clear head, and clean heart ("mens conscia recti,") which puts life even into a lisping tongue, and animates the lips of the most indifferent orator. And therefore, not a tear was shed—not a touch of sympathy responded to so heartless an appeal. It seemed to die away in the air, I am told, as fast as it was uttered, and was felt to be "magno conatu nugas nugas."

The Bishoph eard,—Therapon heard,—all that were left of the party heard; but not a whisper in reply. Whether or not any heart was revolving over "semper ego auditor tantum? nunquamne reponam, vexatus toties," I cannot aver: but the Arch-deacon, be it remembered was in his own castle, and under the wing of his patron, and mercover all the most vigorous, as well as the most mild of the dear brethren were away: and so the rest, I presume, thought within themselves "suâ se jactet in aulâ æolus."

Of the Archi-deaconal transaction itself I have now neither time nor patience to speak or write. I cannot away with it. And if I could write, I fear it would be after such like a fashion.

"Hæc ego non credam venusina digna lucerna, Hæc ego non agitem?"

Yes "agitem," though I am not even a fiftieth cousin of the great arch-agitator. It is a subject, that requires more than a mere cursory discussion. The evil lies deep, and wants eradicating root and branch. "Longa est injuria, longæ ambages." I confess I am utterly at a loss to comprehend what the Bishop is about; and I find others equally share with me in my want of comprehension. I am daily looking forward to the time, when "remota erroris nebula," he will identify himself with Daniel Wilson. If "Episcopatus non est artificium transigendo vita," much less is it "faciendæ injuriæ"—and therefore I would entreat his Lordship to beware lest it hereafter be recorded of himself and his bishoprick.

"Auream invenit, chartaceam reliquit."

AFFAIRS OF JEYPORE.

We heard on the forenoon of the 15th June, that an express received from Jeypore had announced some insurrection, in which Lieutenant-Colonel Alves had been dangerously wounded, and Mr. Blake, his Assistant, killed.

Private letters from Jeypore communicate further details of the tragic events. On the morning of the 4th June, Major Alves paid a visit to the zenana, accompanied by Cornet McNaghten on the same elephant with him, and by Mr. Blake and Captain Ludlow on another. They set out for the palace at day-break. On their way nothing extraordinary occurred. At the conference the five Moosahibs were present, the Ranees said their say, and "all went merry as a marriage bell." The party took their leave, and on arriving at the place where the elephants were standing, Major Alves was rather ahead, Captain Ludlow a short distance behind him, and Mr. Blake and Cornet McNaghten in conversation with one of the Khankoors, were bringing up the rear. They were all at this time within the walls of the palace, with a crowd of natives around them, and Major Alves was preparing to mount his elephant, when a man suddenly advanced out of the crowd and attacked him, and ere the fellow could be secured he had inflicted three severe wounds on the Major's head, which immediately brought him to the ground. Captain Ludlow, who was nearest to him, fell immediately upon the assassin who was secured, offering no resistance. The wounded officer was then put into a palkee and sent home. They Jeyporeans around, did not afford any aid to secure the villain, nor did they assist him: they looked on at the murderous attack as unconcerned spectators, with calm indifference and seemed to view the affair as a matter of course. Captain Ludlow and Cornet McNaghten set out by the side of the wounded officer's palanquin, the former alone on the elephant—the latter on horseback. Cornet McNaghten after proceeding a short distance, turned back to look at the villain who had wounded Major Alves, and founded Mr. Blake with the wretch's sword in his hand almost bent double, with four sepahees and two chuprassees engaged in binding the man. The Cornet was probably about five minutes looking on at this scene, when he urged Mr. Blake to come on and leave the man to the Rawul's guard as he was now well secured. Mr. Blake declined proceeding until he should see the fellow delivered to the guard, and wished the Cornet to stay, but the latter desirous of going on with the wounded Major, set off at a hard gallop to rejoin his palkee. He was at this time within the walls of the palace, and had not the remotest suspicion that any commotion had occurred outside, but he had scarcely got without the palace yard when he was assailed with the grossest abuse:—astonished, he looked round to see what was the matter, when suddenly about 20 men rushed forward to seize him—innumerable brickbats were hurled at him and he rode the gauntlet down the principal street of Jeypore through a perfect shower of these missiles. His escape was miraculous; had he stayed another minute or had the speed of his horse been checked nothing could have saved him. It was afterwards discovered that the animal had been struck in several places by the missiles aimed at him. The corpse of Mr. Blake, who has been savagely murdered, was recovered after the riot was quelled and brought into camp on the evening of the 4th, and on the morning of the 5th the remains of this gentleman were consigned to the grave.

It appears that this lamented gentleman left the palace on his elephant very soon after Cornet McNaghten quitted him, but when he got outside, he found an infuriated mob collected, who brutally assailed him—a precaution which European officers seem constantly to neglect, as if they really thought the security of their lives of no importance—or as if there could be any thing implying too great a regard for lives of such value to their country as Mr. Blake's was, in conforming in that respect to the custom of this country. A single chuprassee was sitting behind him, and he ran the gauntlet for some time on the elephant, until some suwars galloped up from behind and hamstrung the poor beast, while others were poking at him with spears. He managed to get the elephant near a temple, when he jumped off and sought an asylum from the fury of the mob in the sacred edifice. Vain hope! he was dragged out and murdered in the most barbarous manner in the middle of the street.

The Rances are stated to be all fighting within—the Thakoors and Mootsuddies all intriguing without. It is not believed, however, that either the Rawul or the inmates of the zenana were at all privy to this tragical affair. Expresses had been sent off to Nusseerabad for troops; these expresses would reach that station by the 5th, and the cavalry would probably reach Jeypore by the evening of the 6th or the morning of the 7th. The Minister's authority was respected within the walls, and while that lasted, Major Alves was safe in his camp from further assault.

Such are the particulars of the shocking occurrence at Jeypore which are contained in private communications. The official letters may, possibly, supply further details. The precise cause of the tragedy is, however, in so far as we know, still involved in mystery: but, this much is certain, that its origin was entirely local and confined in its influence to Jeypore—any inference from the shocking affair that it furnishes reason to dread similar occurrences elsewhere, is quite unwarranted.

The service and his friends sustain a heavy loss in Mr. Blake's murder. A friend who knew him well and who has had the best opportunities of forming a judgment of his character and services, observes:—

"He was a noble fellow, universally considered likely to make a distinguished figure in public life. Although he has fallen a sacrifice to some local exasperation at Jeypore, he was deservedly popular among the natives. his warm hearted disposition, frank and cordial manners conciliated their regard; while his high independent spirit commanded their respect. As to his public services, he has been employed in the settlement of several affairs connected with the Native States, requiring the exercise of great judgment, tact, and decision, in every one of which his efforts were attended with the most complete success, and since his deputation to Shekawattee he has received the thanks of Government for the valuable assistance given by him to Major Alves."

It is indeed lamentable that such a life should be lost to the country and society in such a manner: Major Alves, we sincerely hope, will recover from his wounds. The last accounts were favourable. That any of the party escaped—that the palanquin with the wounded officer attended only by Captain Ludlow should have been permitted by the excited and savage crowd to pass unmolested, is indeed most extraordinary.

After the above was in type, we received from a highly intelligent and esteemed correspondent the following further particulars which confirms in every important point the statement we have furnished. We hope a signal example will be made of all concerned in the murderous attack, but we are not quite prepared to advocate "tremendous retribution," nor even the appropriation of the territory, when there is no reason to apprehend that the Jeypore Minister was at all concerned in the crime.

(From a Correspondent.)

Lieutenant-Colonel Alves, the British Agent, had been on a visit to the Ranee, where every thing had gone off most favorably. On returning from the audience and arriving in the outer court of the palace, the party separated to mount their respective elephants, when a dirty-looking fellow sprang forward, and cut down Colonel Alves, inflicting three severe wounds on his head. The Colonel fell, but was rescued by Captain Ludlow and the chuprasees, while the Jeyporeans looked on in stupid silence. Colonel Alves was then put into a dooley, and with Captain L. on one side and Cornet McNaghten on the other, taken out to camp, while Mr. Blake remained behind to see the murderer secured. After proceeding some distance, Cornet McNaghten returned to the palace to see that the murderer was safely secured, and found Mr. Blake in the act of tying him. Seeing him thus safe, he proposed to Blake to come and look after Alves; but, Blake said, he would not stir until he had seen the man safely delivered over to the Rawul's people. McNaghten then mounted his horse and galloped off. The party inside the palace, which is a very extensive building, appeared quite unconscious of there being any tumult in the town. On quitting the outer court, Mr. McNaghten was assailed with hooting and yells, and several men attempted to seize him. He put spurs to his horse and dashed through them, and rode down amid showers of stones, brickbats, and earth hurled at him from all quarters, through the long street, and finally escaped to camp. Some time after Mr. Blake having delivered the man over to the Rawul's authority, proceeded to quit the Court-yard on an elephant with a chuprassee in the howdah and a suwar riding behind. The crowd had now greatly increased. They assailed him with every sort of abuse—some horsemen came up and poked at him with their spears, but he still steadily pushed on. At length they hamstrung his elephant. He then got from the howdah into an adjoining house, but the ruffians forced open the doors, and seizing him, some of the party held him down, whilst the others,—inhuman monsters,—deliberately cut his throat. In the evening when the riot was quelled, his body was recovered and sent to camp. Colonel Alves by the last accounts was doing well, the minister's authority was respected within the walls, and so long as that lasted, he would be safe from further assault. Expressess had gone to Nusseerabad, 80 miles distant, for troops. These would reach that station on the morning of the 5th, and the cavalry would probably reach Jeypore on the night of the 6th or morning of the 7th.

A more atrocious affair has never been recorded—no cause can be assigned for such a proceeding. It was but a few months since that the detested Minister Jotiram was removed from that city by our interference, and Colonel Alves, by whom that act was effected, hailed as the deliverer of the country—Englishmen were in high favour, and all was greeting and smiles—and yet now, without a single assigned or divinable cause, the people have risen on us in execration, and in cold-blooded treachery massacred one of our high functionaries and attempted the murder of the chief Agent of the State. The blood of the murdered cries high to heaven, and it will not be permitted to cry in vain. A tremendous example must be made—and it is gratifying to find that our Ruler, for once letting indignation get the better of his naturally kind disposition, and roused to a proper sense of what is due to justice, has placed the forces of the empire at the disposal of Colonel Alves for employment as he conceives the emergency of the case may demand.

Several hundred persons were engaged in this atrocious proceeding. Fortunately none of the Court are implicated, and it is therefore probable that most of the wretches have been marked and will be eventually secured. A dreadful example must be made. It is but three short months since, that the Commissioner of Delhi was murdered. Mr. Louis, the Magistrate of————has been recently wounded—and now to crown all—to add as it were the climax to such atrocities, a British functionary, on his visit to a native Prince, is cut down in the very court-yard of the palace! Our rule of conduct on such an occasion should be suited to the emergency of the case, the slow machinery of our courts is ill-calculated for such contingencies as these. It should be not as usual deliberation—deliberation! It should be action, action, action—or the hour will yet come, when we shall sorely rue our want of energy and decision. We must confess that we should like to see such an example made in this instance, as should strike terror throughout India, and prove that the majesty of our rule shall not be permitted to be insulted without tremendous retribution. We should like to see the affair treated a la Napoleon—and some such mandate as the following issued.

"The persons of Ambassadors to a foreign state have been by universal accord of nations considered sacred. It is with mingled pain and indignation that the Governor-General in Council has learned that the British Agent to the Court of Jyepore has been severely wounded, within the very precincts of the palace at Jeypore, while his assistant, Mr. Blake, has been killed. In order, therefore, to mark the sense entertained of this atrocious act of treachery, and as an example that shall not be forgotten by other nations in amity with the British power, the Governor-General in Council is pleased to declare—that the Jeypore state has ceased to exist as an independent principality—that the Rawul has ceased to reign—that Jeypore shall be forthwith occupied by a British force—and its administration be in future conducted by a British Commissioner."

A measure such as this would be hailed with satisfaction from one end of India to another. It would tend more to prevent a repetition of such atrocity than a hundred executions.

Nothing, I believe, has yet transpired to prove the connexion between the attempt upon the Resident's life and the murder of our lamented friend, and it is possible that all the persons concerned in the last atrocious deed were victims of the misapprehension which evidently led away some of the rioters. I only learned the particulars of our friend's tragical end on arriving here at the beginning of this month, or you may be sure I would have sooner written them to you.

I believe you have seen Jeypoor. The palace apartments are entered from a square which communicates with the Chandnee Chouk, or main street of the city, by a line of three courts, separated by as many gates, and called therefore the tripolea. Visitors leave their equipages and arms outside the third gate from the street, and walk across the third court into the palace square. Major Alves went on the 4th of June with Blake, McNaghten and Ludlow to hold a state conference with the Thakoors, the Queen-mother and other Ranees, and every thing passed off well at the Durbar. The Residency party were about to mount their several conveyances outside the third gate, to return home, when a man sprang out from the armed crowd assembled near them, and inflicted three sword wounds upon the Resident as he was going to step upon his elephant ladder; Ludlow, who was a little behind, with much promptitude threw himself upon the assassin, and bore him to the ground, by this act, probably, causing the third blow to fall with little effect on the Major's back. Major Alves received the first, and severest wound on the back of his head, but it did not bring him down, and he says he felt as though he had received an electric shock on the left shoulder. It was not until he got the second cut, which was on the front side of his head, and comparatively slight, that an idea of what was occurring flashed upon his mind: he immediately turned, and saw Ludlow on the prostrate assassin, keeping him down with all his strength, when he himself knelt and held the villain's extended arm and sword to the ground until satisfied that he was secured by the Residency chuprassees. His head was presently bound up in a handkerchief, and getting into a palanquin, he passed unmolested out of the tripolea and the city, escorted by eight suwars and attended by Ludlow, who fearing that he might faint from loss of blood, ran some distance alongside of the palanquin, and then mounted an elephant, from which, however, he, after a little while, descended in the street, to run again by the palanquin to near the Ajmere gate, where after providing some water for the bearers to give their master in case of faintness, he got on a horse, and galloped to the Residency to prepare Doctor Mottley for his patient.

Blake remained behind, talking to me of the Rawul's sons who hurried out on the first intimation of a disturbance, and McNaghten, who rode to the end of the tripolea with the Resident's palanquin, on returning to the scene of the outrage, found him standing there, seeing the prisoner more tightly bound, and giving directions for his being brought off to the Residency on a charpoy. McNaghten, who thought that the assassin should be given up to those who were answerable for his deed, advised Blake to make him over to the Minister's people and to mount his elephant and return home; but our friend who apparently deemed it of consequence to have the first examination of the man, said he would see him conveyed to the Residency, so McNaghten, who little knew what a storm was brewing without the palace gates, rode with a single horseman through them into the Chandee Chouk. Hardly had he walked his horse a few lengths down this street, when the crowd which always assembles on the occasion of the Resident's visiting the court began to be abusive; some exclaimed that the Feringees had shed blood in the palace, while others threw dirt and stones at him, so that to avoid being hemmed in and ill treated, he was fain to spur his horse, and dash through the people: he found the tumult subside as he got away from the main street, and slackening his pace as he neared the Chandpaul city gate, he passed quickly out, and cantered on to the Residency, which is built in the "Majee kee Bagh," about a mile and a half from the town. It is impossible to say whether the report of the English having shed blood in the palace was set about by designing persons, or, whether it arose from a confused rumur of the Resident's having passed out after having been wounded in some encounter at the Durbar. The impression on the minds of all four gentlemen after the deed, was that some party's attempt to murder the British Representative had failed, and that there was an end of it: had any thing like a popular tumult been expected, of course the whole Residency party would have gone off together, or have put themselves under the protection of the Rawul.

The mob were evidently not inflamed when Major Alves and Ludlow passed out, and there is little reason to doubt that had our friend been on horseback, he would have ridden through them as easily as McNaghten did. Most unfortunately, when Blake came out, either he or the chuprassee Luchmun, who was in the khuwas of his howdah, exposed the bloody sword with which the Major had been wounded: the mob on seeing this repeated the former exclamation, "the Feringees have shed blood in the palace," and with cries of mar! mar! began to throw dirt and stones. If Blake had apprehended more than insult from this misguided crowd, he doubtless would have here turned back into the palace, but he ordered his mahout to push on homeward, and his elephant was accordingly urged along the Chandnee Chouk for 300 yards at a pace which left the mob behind, and would soon have carried him out of the city, but as he turned into the broad street which leads to the Ajmere or Kishenpaul gate, a guard of the city police attracted by the general cry, ran up and began to wound the elephant to stop its progress. Blake now ordered a suwar who attended him to gallop on to the Residency and report what was occurring: the mahout still pressed on, and had got half way down the street, a distance of 300 yards, when another party of police, "Meenahs," joined in the affray, and hacked at the elephat's hind legs. The cooly attached to this animal here displayed great courage and devotion; not being armed, he seized the ladder which hung under one side of the howdah and with it endeavoured to beat off the assailants, but he was soon cut down, and the mob coming up rained stones at the howdah from all sides, exclaiming, "kill the murderer! he has shed blood in the palace." Blake defended himself from the stones as well as he could by holding up the cushions of his howdah, but probably thinking that the city gate was shut, or doubting whether his disabled beast could reach it under such circumstances, he ordered the mahout to drive the animal up to the wall of a caunder (or temple) facing the street belonging to Nath Jee Perohit, a respectable native with whom he was acquainted. The door of this building was closed, but Blake, the chuprassee and the mahout, got in at a window, and were conducted by two poojarries (priests) to a small room on the ground floor and the extreme end of it, and there locked in; but the mob soon followed them, and discovering their retreat, not only battered down the door of the room, but broke a large hole through the middle of the opposite wall, from an adjoining court, and another on one side just under the roof, from an outside staircase, so as to be able to attack them from three points. Our friend got a sword from one of the poojarries just before he was locked in, and with this he defended himself gallantly for sometime, keeping the door, and warding off sword and spear thrusts, but when the dastardly assassins began to fire matchlocks at him through the breaches they had made in the wall and roof, he felt that resistance was vain, and forgetting himself, desired the men who stood by him to try the only chance of saving their lives by going out to the assailants. There was a possibility of their being thus spared, for some of the crowd had loudly sworn by the Gunga and Jumna that if they would leave the feringee and come out, they should not be hurt. The chuprassee was the first to go out, he was immediately killed. The mahout was saved by a man who seized his arm and drew him aside. Our friend had one or twice called out to his attackers not to shed innocent blood, as he was guiltless: now seeing that he had done all man could hope to do against the overwhelming force of his mad enemies, he threw down his sword at the door of the room and went out calmly to face the mob, that filled a small court in front of it, when ere he had advanced two steps beyond the treshhold he was deprived of life by twenty sword wounds. When the intelligence of Blake's death was brought to the Residency, it was with difficulty believed; so little was any thing serious expected from the effervescence of the people, but a few hours afterwards the sad truth of the statement was proved by the arrival of his body which was brought with all possible respect by the servants of the Rawul. He was buried early the next morning close to the Residency, and a monument is being built over the spot, to perpetuate the memory of one who was as much esteemed by Government as he was beloved by his friends.

In cases of peculiar atrocity—in all instances of great state emergency, the salus populi suprema lex must be recognized as the leading principle of action—and every thing must bend before the law of state necessity! The offence commonly designated by the phrase of popular assassination is one which should always experience the most tremendous retribution. It is one which unless instantly checked is very liable to spread, while its mischiefs are of the most appalling nature. In our time we only remember in India three instances in any way comparable to the recent affair of Jeypore. The one the treacherous out-break at Poonah under the Peishwah in 1817. The second the events preceding the battle of Seetabuldee, and in later times the affair at Kittoor, where Mr. St. John Thackeray, the British Agent and all his escort, including four European officers, were cut to pieces. In the two first of these instances retribution was necessarily much delayed, but in none was it sufficiently severe! It is true Appah Sahib the Nagpore Prince was deposed and confined for some years, but was subsequently released by orders from home—and he was very recently believed to be at Joudpore. The Peishwah is a pensioner at Benares, on a magnificent income of £100,000 sterling per annum, and the traitor minister of Kittoor was spared from death and only subjected, together with his accomplices, to imprisonment because he had rescued Messrs. Elliott and Stephenson, who were his prisoners, from the hands of the mob, and spared their lives which would otherwise have been sacrificed. Mr. St. John Thackeray lost his life from his fool-hardiness—he went to dictate to a well armed fortress with a mere escort with which he actually attacked the place, and thus fell in warm blood. There was not so much treachery in this case, as a presumptuous resistance of the supreme authority not at the time backed by sufficient physical force. It is true we subsequently besieged and captured Kittoor and dispossessed the Ranee. But months had expired, no severe example was made, and the opportunity of vengeance for the insult let slip; for under some pretext of humanity or imaginary state policy, we did not hang, as we ought to have done, the murderers. The butchery of the Russian Envoy at Tabreez in Persia, too, was owing to popular tumult excited by his own most indiscreet and indeed outrageous measures, which though they could not justify, at least somewhat palliated after events; but the recent lamentable affair stands perhaps unrivalled in modern times. Looking at it as an event unconnected with state affairs, it is one of no ordinary atrocity. But when the high rank of the party attacked, as an accredited Envoy to a foreign court, added to the entire absence of any assigned cause for such proceeding, is considered—it must be admitted to be a case almost without a paralled in modern history. It merits—it must receive the most signal retribution, or it will be but the precursor of similar, perhaps even worse atrocities. The advantage of decision in such cases we shall take the liberty of illustrating by a couple of anecdotes perhaps not very generally known—but which deserve consideration at the present moment. We venture to request Sir Charles Metcalfe's attention to the same. The first is of Indian history. At the first outbreak of the Maharattahs, two British officers of the name of Vaughan travelling in the Deccan were seized and inhumanly hanged. A few days subsequently, Cornets Morison (now Resident at Bushire) and Hunter (now commandant of the Mysore Horse), with their escort, were also captured after a most energetic defence in which a great many on both sides were killed, the officers surrendering only when the choultry, where they had taken refuge was unroofed—and the enemy could fire on them from above. These two officers would have shared a similar fate to the Vaughans, but for Mr. Elphinstone, the Resident, who sent word to Bajee Row that, as these officers had been taken prisoner, of course the Peishwah had a right to confine them, but that if he injured a hair of their heads, he, Mr. Elphinstone, would hold Bajee Row personally responsible, and would surely hang him wherever he might happen to take him. That most judicious and spirited threat saved the officers from an ignominious death. They were imprisoned in the hill fortress of Woosota, and were released at the close of the war, unharmed.

The second instance is of European history. When the British troops were in Sicily in 1812, many of the soldiers were assassinated. Hardly a day passed but what one or more were stabbed in the streets; great precautions were adopted, but still the ill continued. It however, fortunately happened, that the British commander was one of singular energy, whom no peril could daunt, and whom no man dared to disobey. He issued a proclamation, that "in every instance of assassination in future, the man found nearest the body should be seized, and summarily executed!" This proclamation put all Syracuse in a ferment.

The atrocity of such a mandate called forth furious denunciation, and all the nobles, &c. of the country waited on Sir John Sherbrooke, to remonstrate against such a proceeding. Sir John received the deputation surrounded by all his staff and the officers commanding regiments. The chief noble opened forth a brilliant speech, setting forth the horrible injustice of this order, but was met by Sir John's assertion, that he saw no equally judicious course of saving the lives of his men! "But, Sir John," continued the chief of the deputation, "only think of the atrocity of the order—why I, Sir John, I may be the person accidentally found nearest a murdered soldier!" "I should be sorry for that, Count," coolly replied the commander; "but, Sir, if such should be the case, by the living God, I will hang you over the chief gateway of the city—you understand me!" The deputation withdrew: now, reader, mark the corollary, not another British soldier was assassinated!!

You may say the mandate was illegal, this we will not dispute; but it produced the effect anticipated—it stopped the offence.

The following is another brief account of the Jeypore affair, which was handed to us by a friend:—

"It will be some satisfaction to hear that the last act of Blake's life was as noble as the conduct which has ever distinguished him through life. Major Alves, McNaghten, Ludlow and poor Blake, went at sunrise this morning, to the mahal to have an interview with the Mahjees, and widows of the late Rajah, that every thing passed off well, and on leaving the Durbar a mean looking scoundrel cut Alves on the back of the head and brought him to the ground, and he received two more wounds one on the head and the other across the shoulder. Blake and Ludlow seized the assassin, and, for a time, disarmed and secured him, they then put Alves into a palanquin and McNaghten and Ludlow* mounted their horses and rode to the Mhajie-ke-Bagh in safety, but poor Blake remained behind till he not only saw Alves safe away but orders were given to carry the assassin safe also to the Mhajie-ke-Bagh; the consequence was he was surrounded and the moment he mounted his elephant spears were thrown at him and other missiles, and he got wounded. When he reached the gate he found it was shut, and as there was no possible exist from the city and his remaining on the elephant certain death, he hit upon the expedient of dismounting with his chuprassie and taking refuge in a mundar, thinking the sacredness of the place would have saved him: but no, they there murdered him and his chuprassie by name Lutchman Sing formerly in your service. The chuprassie behaved with great fidelity, calling out "murder me but spare my master;" but mercy was a stranger to these villains' breasts. Blake received twenty-six wounds about the face, head, and throat."

* Captain Ludlow returned, not on his horse, but on his elephant, as stated by us in a preceding page.

This is a trait of native character, a noble instance of fidelity and a redeeming feature in the tragedy of Jeypore which deserves to be recorded. A friend in whose employment this murdered, brave, and faithful chuprassie once was, assures us that he is convinced from his knowledge of the man's character that the statement is accurate. The ill-fated Mr. Blake leaped into the temple first, the chuprassie in following had his arm cut off and died repeating the vain appeal for mercy to his master. Honored be his memory!

Another particular in the above account not known before, is that the gates were shut upon Mr. Blake, at least the guard who could have opened it did not.

Two months have now elapsed since the occurrence of the Jeypore tragedy, and though the country was prepared to expect prompt and energetic measures against this state, procrastination is still the order of the day in the British Council. Enquiry and investigation continue to engross the attention of our authorities at Jeypore; but notwithstanding the lapse of time, little progress has been made, nor have any important facts relative to the planners and maturers of this treachery been elicited. Our information stands pretty nearly as it did on the 5th June. Enquiry may be prolonged for the next ten months and the result will be equally unsuccessful, so long as the Thakoors guide the state helm. The public papers have fully detailed matters as far as they have transpired. It is the one and general opinion of intelligent natives in this vicinity that the massacre of the European party was originated in, and executed under directions of, the inmates of the palace. Our chief object of solicitude at present appears to be to trace the crime to its source, with a view to the punishment of all concerned; yet the plain and palpable truth has not struck our authorities, that the only sure mode of attaining this result, is the removal of the present Ministry and the substitution of our own authority. This is the first step and ought to have been ordered immediately on the intelligence reaching Calcutta. Had treachery occurred in Europe, the obvious course of procedure would have been the immediate retirement of our Embassy from the Court—war would have been declared and instant reparation of the insult demanded. Instead of this high commanding tone, which would have saved the culprits only at the sacrifice of the state, our temporising, non-interfering policy has converted this national insult into a police investigation. It is an old but true saying, that below the lamp is darkness, and this has been exemplified at Jeypore. No sooner was the act committed than the Minister was down on his marrow bones. If he had succeeded in, or at the very least had connived at the murder of one officer, and the wounding, as was then supposed, to death of the Resident—then came fears for the consequences. This atrocious act had been committed during his Ministry, and as no sword was drawn no hand was raised in defence of the unfortunate-unarmed foreigners, his Ministry was, to all thinking people, at an end. To obviate this unpleasant, this inconvenient result, the cold, calculating, natured act of the Court is interpreted as a popular ebullition. The Rawul and Mahjee are constant in their enquiries as to the Resident's health and the compliment may, perhaps, be reciprocated; but as Lord Wellington said of a county meeting, this is a complete farce. We are not in a humour to bandy compliments—we are engaged on matters affecting existence—the existence of ourselves as Governors; the saving the country from anarchy and the sword. Would to Heaven our Adalut moguddamahs were as free from doubts and difficulties as the Jeypore case—we have only one course to pursue; to take the country, and this effected, to make known to the Mahjee as the head of the temporarily-extinct Raj, as we would to an ordinary prisoner, that only on an ample, full and unreserved disclosure of facts and particulars, will the state be permitted to exist as an independent principality. During the period of our rule in Rajpootana, detachments have constantly trotted out to Jeypore double quick; but on no occasion has a shot been fired: the valour of the Jeyporeans has always subsided into obedience on the arrival of our troops. The revenue of this state is rated at a crore of rupees: one-third kalsah, the same portion istimrar or jagheer lands, and the last khyrat, or for charitable purposes. The country is fertile and water in abundance near the surface; and though the present produce is far short of half this amount, still by proper management and conciliation, and the restoration of confidence and tranquility under a settled and equitable rule, commerce and agriculture would prosper and the revenue progressively increase. It is the deliberate opinion of well informed natives, that it would be an act of magnanimity, of mercy, to take the Government of this state under British guidance. It is now so completely torn by various factions that no confidence can be placed on the administration of the nobles. The substitution of our authority would immediately quash these factions, or like an unfed lamp, they would quickly become extinguished from the absence of proper sustenance. When the Thakoors have been removed from power, it is not improbable the secrets of the massacre will be disclosed. But allowing the crime emanated from the Durbar, and that fear or pride prevented divulgement, still we can impose a heavy pecuniary fine on the state, seeing, at that juncture, the principality and its resources would be under our command. The governing the state for the benefit of the Raj would mark our disinterestedness and shew the world territorial aggrandizement formed no part of our policy. On taking possession of the country, the presence of an efficient force would be necessary; for though some demonstration of resistance might be made, an ample preparation for defence is the next thing to preventing attack. The fouj of the Raj, now a hungry, rebellious rabble, should be armed, disciplined, clothed and regularly paid. In a word, it should be made an efficient soldiery and useful to the state. As it would be necessary to divide the principality into several Purgunnahs by officers under the immediate orders of the Resident or Chief Commissioner, a portion of the troops should be attached to each district: thus rendering, after a short term, the presence of regulars, except in limited numbers, unnecessary. The Thakoors and jagheerdars should be taught to look to the soil as the legitimate source of their incomes, plough-shares should be encouraged as substitutes for tulwars: and in case of disinclination to follow this advice, they should be disarmed, as was done in bringing the Mhairs into subjection and civilization in 1822. The education of the young Rajah must receive undivided attention; since it would be our object to make him a Prince among Princes, a pattern of a ruler suited to the enlightened times. This subject I would strongly recommend to the consideration of friend INDOPHILUS. And last, though by no means least in importance, is the decrease of the muhal, by distributing the Princesses and their legions of attendants, throughout the state. This is urgently necessary to the proper working of the machine of Government: for the palace unless remodelled will continue the nursery of every species of intrigue and cabal. Indeed, all the evils Jeypore has suffered for some years past have been engendered within the muhal. With regard to the ways and means, this state must of course pay the price of its regeneration. By the existing treaty, we receive four annas of the revenue in the rupee; it therefore is manifest the greater the improvement and prosperity of that country the more to our advantage. But setting aside pecuniary considerations, the peace and tranquillity of Rajpootana, indeed of upper Hindostan, hinge on the good government of this state: for anarchy, like a contagious disease, requires prompt and severe treatment to prevent its spread into neighbouring territories.

TO THE HONORABLE SIR C. T. METCALFE,

Governor-General of India.

SIR,—I take advantage of that freedom of the press which you have constantly advocated and have now secured, to express to you the sentiments which I hold in common with almost the whole community upon the late occurrences at Jeypore. The general opinion has indeed been already made known, as opposed to the view of the case which you have received officially from Major Alves, but I have not observed any public print in which the reasons for this general opinion are so detailed, as to confer upon it the importance which it deserves.

It is fortunate that all the accounts which have been given from different quarters of this transaction, coincide, as regards the main facts, with each other, as well as with Major Alves's official statement. These main facts may therefore be considered as established, and they are universally thought to prove that Major Alves has been led to false conclusions, and that the honor and safety of the British name are likely to suffer in his hands.

In the first place, during the durbar which preceded the events in question, was a word of warning given to the English party that a tumult in the city was expected or feared? It is true that Major Alves has expressed an opinion, (changed and re-changed in the same official letter,) that the disturbance in which Blake fell was unpremeditated, and took its rise from the attack which has been made upon himself. But is this supposition credible, considering that the attack upon Major Alves was a momentary event; that it took place within the walls of the palace and not in the midst of the populace; and that the subsequent tumult was so immediate that even Captain Ludlow and Cornet McNaghten, who followed closely upon Major Alves's palanquin, escaped with difficulty. Is it not rather forced upon the conviction of every one by the circumstances of the affair, that the massacre was premeditated, and that the blow at Major Alves was only the lighting of the train, the commencement of the explosion? and, if so, is it to be credited that the numerous members of the Durbar were ignorant of what was in agitation? It is seldom that secresy such as this is observed in the council of a native mob.

In the second place, did Rawal Byree Sal, to whom the troops of the Jeypore state are known to be obedient; did any one of the influential Thakoors, appear in person, or take any steps to save the British authority from further outrage, either when the chief representative of that authority was cut down at their very door, or during the long interval by all accounts more than one hour, that poor Blake was making his hopeless stand in the temple which proved to him no sanctuary? This is the damning evidence, of which let the Jeypore Court and Thakoors clear themselves if they can. I trust that there is but one individual in the empire who would receive without derision the Rawul's story of his staying to quiet ladies tongues in the zenanah, while British blood was flowing without in consequence of his timely absence. Had he appeared at the head of a few regular troops; had he even taken his stand singly between the mob and poor Blake, the latter would have escaped the fate to which he was coldly and mercilessly consigned.

But is it customary for a native populace to rise against our authority with so deep a feeling of animosity and blood-thirstiness, unless they are aware that similar feelings are entertained by their own rulers? It is true that an European functionary has sometimes fallen, as occurred lately in another presidency, in a moment of religious excitement: but, putting aside such instances, where has the population of a city risen against us, from political motives, in the same spirit as at Jeypore, unless when instigated to it by their own native chiefs? More than all, would that city guard have dared to turn against Blake in his extremity; would they have ventured to put themselves foremost among the attacking mob, unless they had been aware that this conduct would meet the views of the rulers by whom they were entertained and paid, and with whom their persons were known, and their names registered?

These are the grounds, Sir, upon which it is universally considered that the view taken of this affair by Major Alves is wholly fallacious, and that the adoption of his sentiments by the Supreme Government must lead to steps which will be unsatisfactory in every way, and quite inadequate to wipe off the insult which our power has sustained. The insult in question has been inflicted by the united and unanimous act of the city of Jeypore. No faction or party can be made the scape goat, for all joined in the pursuit of Blake, and all whoever could reach his body inflicted a wound upon it. It is almost equally certain that those possessing power in the state were the instigators and abettors of the deed. What would Acbar or Aulumgeer have done had their representative been similarly treated? They would have levelled the offending city with the ground. To have given it up to three days pillage would have been a suitable retribution, as the punishment would have been as universal as the crime. Lord Clive or Lord Wellesley would have declared the Jeypore rule to have ended from the moment that the intelligence was received. What shall we do in these less energetic days? Is the execution or perhaps murder of a few low caste and friendless individuals, selected at the choice of the native rulers to satisfy our wounded dignity? The Rawul will feed the British vengeance for years on this condition, and there will be no fear of the daily victims not being forthcoming.

It is generally understood that, independently of his exculpation of Jeypore the ruler, Major Alves affects to consider the whole melancholy occurrence as a "trival affair."

* * * * *

Whatever may be the cause, I trust, and the country trusts, that he will not be able to infuse the same tone into the councils of the state. If so, we shall be sowing the dragon's teeth, and assuredly we shall reap the armed men—already are symptoms of the dangerous crop to be distinguished. But I would ask, what power had Major Alves to enter into communication with the Jeypore authorities; to receive condolences from the Ranee and Rawal, and ridiculous apologies from the infant Raja; nay, to pledge himself that the interests of the latter should not suffer, before he knew how his own changeable and singular views would be received by the Supreme Government of the country.

It is perhaps hopeless to expect, that under the system which has been now adopted for regulating our conduct to the Native States, any thing short of the strongest legal proof of the guilt of the Jeypore authorities will lead to the annexation of their territory to our own. It is true that such a measure would be recognized as just and laudable by the whole native community; that it would relieve in some degree our present financial difficulties and give us a vantage ground, which we greatly need, for curbing the disaffected and restless spirits of the rest of Rajasthan. It is true that the people of the Jeypore country would be benefited by such a step, while the Rajah, whose interests alone would suffer, is of immature age, and I believe of doubtful legitimacy. But should this course not be pursued, let a heavy fine be imposed on the guilty city for the erection of barracks, stables, &c., for three or four of our regular regiments; let this force be permanently settled at a short distance from the city itself; let its entire expense be defrayed from the Jeypore revenues, and let the useless troops at present maintained by that state be disbanded to the extent required. Finally, let an able Resident, such for instance as holds at present the appointment at Gwalior, be invested with the entire management of the country during the minority of the Raja, and let him have full power to controul the turbulent and factious aristocracy, and to reduce them to the condition of subjects. Let the education of the young Raja be committed to his sole superintendence with the assistance of such European instructors as may appear to be necessary, and let him be withdrawn as much as possibe from those who would instil into him native feelings and prejudices. There will then be hopes that one at least of the larger Rajpoot states will become in future days a firm friend instead of a secret enemy; a bulwark upon our frontier instead of a weak and vulnerable point. We have conferred great benefits on these states in releasing them from the Maharatta dominion, but their rulers are nevertheless generally hostile to us; we shall deserve to lean for ever upon broken reeds, if we allow the present opportunity to pass by without at the same time vindicating our honor and improving our position.

I remain, Sir, your most obedient servant,

SUUM CUIQUE.

Upper Provinces, July 20, 1835.

SIR,—Your correspondent SUUM CUIQUE, whose letters appear in your paper of the 6th August, shews himself well qualified to deliver an opinion on the most important question of the day—"what is our wisest policy in regard to Jeypore at the present moment?" With the majority of the correspondents of the public press, he concurs in calling for the infliction of a summary vengeance, and for the sequestration of the country. The views of other writers bear evident marks of being hastily and superficially formed; your correspondent has had better means of information at command; but though he gives some sufficient arguments for some of his conclusions, he has neither done justice to Major Alves in other essential matters, nor displayed much depth of foresight or reflection in his final determination.

2. I am disposed fully to agree with him in thinking that Major Alves acted unwisely in giving the assurances he did, to the Ranee and to the assembled Thakoors in reply to their letters of condolence; he had even then ample grounds for suspecting that guilt would attach to several of those chiefs who signed the letter, and he had not a single proof of the innocence of any one of them beyond their own (of course) most solemn asseverations.

3. Major Alves moreover, has been slow in admitting the connection almost self-evident to every other individual between the attempt on his own life and the murder of Mr. Blake. He is said too to have given admission into his mind to the fancy that Mr. Blake provoked his own fate by an imprudent parade as he drove through the town, of the blood-stained sword, wrested from the hand of the assassin. This certainly appears a strange and forced assumption when Lieutenant McNaghten was at hand to remind him of the abusive and injurious treatment which he also experienced from the mob and others, though he left the palace long before Mr. Blake and carried about with him no such provocative of insult.

4. The armed men at the palace gates joined in the fray; indeed they appear to have been the first instigators of it; the sepoys of the city police-chowkees ran with eagerness to the scene of confusion, and took the lead in pursuing their ill-fated victim and ceased not, till they had cruelly butchered him and his attendants. Are not these facts alone sufficient to prove that the conspiracy was directed by men of influence and present power? Is it possible that these men acted without authority and merely from impulse?

5. Thus far, therefore, I readily concur with your correspondent; but I deny with confidence that there was up to the end of July, any ground or evidenee calculated to throw even a suspicion of guilt on Beree Sal. To the British Government this man lies under the deepest obligations; to it he owed his elevation to the office of Minister; by its intervention he has been repeatedly saved from the ruin with which he has been constantly threatened by Jotharam since his accession to power. He seems to have had no time to appoint men in his confidence to the heads of departments, which consequently still remained in the possession of his rivals, the friends and nominees of Roopa Boorarun and the deposed minister. All the most recent enquiries confirm the suspicions of guilt attaching from the first to these persons.

The reluctance betrayed by the Majee Sahibn to follow up to the full extent of our requirements, that course pointed out by the Supreme Government as the only one which could satisfy its wounded majesty and ensure the integrity of the Jeypore state, is a fact that carries our suspicions to the very head of the state, and if these are well-founded, an embarrassing question may arise.

6. Your correspondent seems to me to have been guilty of a misrepresentation most unjustifiable, considering his better means of information, in asserting that Major Alves affects to consider the affair as "trivial"; on the contrary Major Alves has ever spoken of it in its true light, as a most serious and momentous and most melancholy affair. Your correspondent moreover acts with great unfairness in using that officer's own more recent conclusions founded on subsequent enquiries in order to attach blame to his first impressions or rather bare suspicions professedly crude and formed, as is repeatedly expressed, whilst he still remained in the dark from the want of any satisfactory evidence. I readily appeal to SUUM CUIQUE himself and ask him "Does not Major Alves manifest throughout not only a magnanimous calmness, but an openness to receive such impressions as the evidence and the evidence only may warrant?

7. Major Alves seems to me to have shewn a want of that instinctive intuition, and of that appreciation of internal evidence which is the invariable characteristic of great genius, but may he not have felt himself precluded from using or laying stress on any but legal evidence. He must doubtlessly have also felt the preculiar difficulty of his position. He is the judge of a cause which is not only his Government's, but that of himself personally, and he may have been influenced by this fact in guarding against the possible imputation of seeking vengeance for his own wrong rather than simple justice. I write without authority and at a distance from the scene; but though full of anxiety to see the most ample reparation made to the British Government, I conceive it may be effected without the commission of any injustice either to Major Alves or to the Jeypore Government. Major Alves's position seems to me to justify my surmise that such an apprehension as I have mentioned has probably existed in his mind.

8. The apprehensions which I felt when I first read Major Alves's very superfluous letters of assurance to the Ranee and to the Thakoors, were readily dismissed when I observed that just consideration was given to the subsequent evidence as it transpired; and I still say let us not unnecessarily expose our weakness by refusing to await the issue of the present enquiries. The more patient and deliberate the investigation, the greater weight will be attached to our final award. The more the guilt is exposed, the more readily shall we carry with us the concurrence and approbation of all good men in all parts of India. It is only by observing this course that we can escape the odium of an indiscriminate sacrifice of the innocent with the guilty. As for the condign punishment of every individual concerned in the treachery, who can gainsay its policy. Our very existence in India prevents our listening even to reasonable appeals for mercy in such cases as the present.

9. And still strong reasons for mercy, even in this case do exist, and, though we will not listen to them, history will not fail to record them. We may indeed acquit Mr. Blake of having provoked his own fate by the triumphant display of the assassin's bloody sword, but can we with equal truth acquit the British Government with all its boast of non-interference, of having provoked this cruel infliction upon itself by sending Major Alves with the sword into Jeypore? I have sought, but I have sought in vain to learn, what legitimate grounds we had to dismember Jeypore of Shaikawatee; and granting the justifiableness of that proceeding, I ask what right, or shadow of a right, had we to seize upon the Jeypore's share of Sambur and to eject Jotharam from the management of affairs? My philanthropic friends ask me in return if I am utterly lost to the common feelings of humanity; if I have no commiseration to spare for a whole people groaning under a dreadful oppressor, a monster of iniquity, a miscreant who crowned a countless list of the blackest crimes by the treacherous and cruel murder of his own prince? Were we, I reply, responsible or security in any way for the personal safety of that prince? If Jotharam was the monster of iniquity he has been represented as being; if he was held in universal execration, what prevented the chiefs and the people from rising "en masse" to take vengeance for themselves and for the blood of their murdered prince? Were they apprehensive of the course which the British Government would take? Colonel Lockett or Major Alves might easily have been instructed to assure the people that we would not oppose the sacred cause they were all ready to promote. The bare assurance ought, if Jotharam has been truly represented, to have been instantly followed by his downfall.

But the arguments of my very philanthropic friends in favor of interference were not so readily exhausted; they maintained that the unfeeling monster was no fool; that foreseeing the inevitable result of his own superfluous iniquities he had amassed private hoards of gold to secure him against this otherwise inevitable destruction, and that by this spoil he commanded the services of a small band of unprincipled and desperate men, whom the same diabolical passion for the plunder of the people, and a common sense of the consequent danger, bound in the strictest league. They assured me, however, that Jotharam's faction was small and most inconsiderable.

10. Did the British Government, acknowledging the force of these arguments, and on the express understanding that the faction headed by Jotharam was small and inconsiderable and held in utter abhorrence by the body of the outraged people, determine on undertaking itself the ejectment of the regicide minister and his unprincipled gang—that it might monopolize to itself all the golden opinions, and all the overflowing gratitude of a whole nation made happy? Moralists may forget to rail at the ensnaring dangers of supreme power, when they see it so worthily, so benignantly employed!!

Let my readers now, if I command any, bear in mind that it was on the express understanding that Jotharam's faction was universally execrated and perfectly insignificant, that the British Government undertook to eject it, and mark well the sequel. Major Alves at the head of a large force calls for the surrender of Jotharam; the Majee Sahibn and others manifest much reluctance in compliance; no alacrity, strange to say, in backing our demand was shewn by the people or by any party; the corps that were clamorous to get into cantonments were again and again held back to give effect to the order of the Resident. The nature and strength of the so called petty, odious faction began to be better understood. To eject Roopa Burarun and others was found impossible with all our force, and threats, remonstrances and expostulations were equally vain. The minister finally gives himself up and Bercc Sal is thrust into his place. Some Thakoors quit the scene of their country's fancied degradation. All remain quiet and sullen. There are no joyful addresses to betoken the expected outbursts of gratitude. Even Bercc Sal lived in fear and trembling for his life.

Now every man will readily confess that our conduct to the Majee and to this faction, whatever be its strength, was sufficient to excite their bitterest resentments and their keenest malice. Most assuredly it was, for they were disappointed and insulted men and women, with the same passions as men and women in more civilized countries, but without any of the principle that compels men in civilized countries to put upon themselves some restraints in the mode of indulging those passions. They were represented as being devils incarnate; it ought to have been moreover borne in mind that they were also uncivilized and unscrupulous barbarians, and that they had been insulted by us in the very point in which Rajpoot pride could most ill brook insult, and galling degradations.

11. What then were the consequences? They were exactly such as were to be certainly expected and ought to have been better guarded against by men that knew any thing of human nature. This faction now put forth a decided demonstration of its irritated malice, and incurable hostility. It did more; it exposed to our astonished eyes a strength and a front that were never before allowed or dreamed of. SUUM CUIQUE proclaims to the world that it was the "united and unanimous act" of the whole city of Jeypore; and can we gainsay his conclusion when not a single hand nor a single voice was raised to save the unfortunate Mr. Blake and his devoted attendant from a long threatening death-pursuit and their very corpses from the cold-blooded infliction of every indignity that even a quiet reflection could suggest? SUUM CUIQUE would therefore condemn the whole people and sequestrate the country!

Have we then lost all sense of shame, all sense of consistency, and all sense of justice?

Indulging in a speculative benevolence, and an uncontroulable disposition to meddle in other men's affairs, and blinded by an overweening vanity that will not see things in their real and true light, we insist on denominating the friends of Jotharam a paltry, inconsiderable and ruthless faction which was abhorred and detested by the whole people; on that ground we justify our determination to remove him. We now find that we have been grossly deceived. But with what consistency or justice can we now give this same faction any other designation? Can we not be consistent in our policy for even six short months? To sanction an unlawful interference, you represent the existing administration as a mere faction; to justify the selfish and equally unlawful assumption of the country, you now proclaim the very same persons as the representatives of the whole people! You goad a wild horse to madness; you then thrust an incapable rider on his back; as was to be expected the horse kicks you, and throws his rider at starting. Though your own folly alone is to be blamed, you must crown your utter unreasonableness and your selfishness by demanding the horse as a deodand for this proof of its incurable vice.

I recollect when I was at school there was a big boy, whom we used to call Bill the Bully. It was his delight to beat a little boy till he cried; and when the little boy cried for the beating, the Bully would then again beat him for crying. Boys at school have less law perhaps in their heads than learned chancellors, but they are ever true to nature and to natural justice. We then held Bill the Bully in universal execration. And is this the example that SUUM CUIQUE without looking back and without consulting better judgment, and his host of supporters without consulting their judgment at all, call upon the British Government to follow? He opens to us the page of history that he may incite us to a more close emulation of the cold-blooded and damnable hypocrisy of the relentless persecutions, and foul usurpations of the arch-impostor Alumgeer, who wrought his way to the musnud by the murder of his best friends, of his brothers, of his father, and of his king.

12. Our rule indeed is already much too like to that of Alumgeer; in its impoverishing effects it is much more pernicious. But it is as vain as it is ungracious to labour to open the eyes of our countrymen to the real nature and effects of our Government, and to the character we actually bear in the estimation of the people for whom alone we should rule. Mill has held the glass up to our eyes; but we straightway forget the complexion of our face. The talented FRIEND TO INDIA places the portrait weekly within our view. We look and admire his bold strokes; but our own self-seeking imaginations can devise much more pleasant and much more flattering likenesses. Can I adduce a stronger instance of the inveteracy of this disposition to self-delusion than that occurring in your paper with Mr. Hutchinson's letter in it. If there is one truth which the FRIEND TO INDIA has laboured to prove with more earnestness and force than another, it is that we grossly deceive ourselves in fancying that the Oude or any other of the Native Governments give less happiness to their subjects than the British Government to its subjects. He deprecates our giving admission into our minds to an assumption so false: he beseechingly prays that we will not act on such a mistaken notion. Mr. Hutchinson cannot contain his self-gratulation on witnessing the striking resemblance, the all but exact coincidence (he certainly acquits the FRIEND TO INDIA of plagiary!) existing between his own and the FRIEND'S opinions. And what are Mr. Hutchinson's opinions? that the people of Oude are groaning under an intolerable load of oppression; which he believes to be so great that in his benevolence he anticipates with joy and with certainty the immediate assumption of the reins of Government by Lord William Bentinck. Is not this a melancholy obliquity of vision—crooked perversion of judgment, that can see a striking coincidence in things diametrically opposed! We are all blinded by the same gross partiality. And how, moreover, were Mr. Hutchinson's opinions formed? professedly from the daily prints, which, entirely monopolized by our fellow servants and our countrymen ever looking for money and place, represent only one side of the picture.

13. Your contemporary the Courier, in commenting upon the letter of SUUM CUIQUE, derides the bare idea of consulting the wishes of "the people." Of the people, indeed! he asks with a sneer? In my simplicity I had thought that the wishes and happiness of the people should be the first consideration with every Government. We are all ever animated by the same self-seeking spirit. Our ears are ever listening with the fondest and most absurd credulity to the delusory but pleasing tales of British justice, British moderation, and British anxiety to promote the good of our people, till in spite of all that the FRIEND TO INDIA and others have written, we really believe them. But I still maintain, that the British Government has scarcely a single element of popularity in it, when administered even by the best of its servants; that a bad native government has in spite of its defects many elements of popularity, and that a good one makes its subjects as happy as their state of civilization enables them to be.

Is not the path of honorable ambition almost entirely closed to native talent by our rule? To what power can any native aspire? To what degree of wealth can he ever arrive by the longest services to the British Government? We say that they are a corrupt, unprincipled set of men, incapable of speaking a word of truth; that we must pay them according to their deserts, that is, their want of all principle; we therefore give them a mere subsistence. After thus making every allowance in their low rates of pay for their fully anticipated want of principle, we still are inconsistent enough to exact a degree of virtue and integrity to be ensured even from men of principle only by a high rate of remuneration. Such is the just retort which a talented native friend of mine lately gave me. But how is it in native governments? They all afford the freest field for the indulgence of the passion, for power and for the acquisition of wealth, and the frequent changes we witness in them shew that all, who would climb the slippery heights of ambition, have their day and their turn in the possession of the highest places that subjects can fill. The fact we cannot deny; but here we again shew our partiality and gross want of candour and justice by inveighing against individuals: all their struggles for power are designated by the depreciating names of intrigue and corruption, and a longing for the powers of the oppressor. A regulated routine succession, which as our rulers are begining to observe, has banished from the service all energy and exertion, and the necessity for exertion, happens to have also removed us from all temptations to use the arts of rising in office; and we pride ourselves upon our freedom from those vicious arts!! The female who was shut up in a cell to which human creature could not by any possibility find access might, with as much justice, boast of her immaculate chastity!

14. In the next place, all the native governments give not only a real and true toleration (Wuzeerooddowla of Tonk by-the-bye, is deviating from this course, but he will repent or fail,) to all classes of their subjects of all sects, but they add also a substantial encouragement and liberal support to all their many churches, and to their several pions and learned, or reputedly learned, principals. If this be questioned for a moment all doubts will vanish when we reflect that neither Chundoo Lal at Hyderabad nor Dataram at Tonk, nor Khooshwukt Raee at Bhopal, nor Durshun Sing and other Hindoos at Lucknow, who fill or have filled the highest offices under Mussulman princes, were likely to allow intolerance to, or to neglect the interests of, their sects. In the same manner we have lately seen Salahooddeen, a Prime Minister of the Nagpore Rajah, ready to secure, should it have been dangered, the interests of his brotherhood.

15. Is our government equally liberal or even equally tolerant? On the contrary, is not every Mooluvee and Brahmin kept in a state of anxious suspense by the constantly recurring enquiries as to the validity of sunuds of the oldest standing? In the last few months I have received many applications, pressed with an earnestness that showed their anxious fears, for letters to different collectors in Rohilcund to intercede in regard to their enam lands. This remark applies to grants of land, &c., of old standing. Our limitation of the duration of grants to the lives of the professors is most unpopular. The term "heen hyat" poisons the relish of the lives of many men, I know, who happen to have children. If we ever made any new grants, the lapses or resumption of old ones would not be much dreaded; but a state of utter hopelessness fills the minds of all parties when they reflect that neither Mooluvees nor Brahmins can by any possibility, by any amount of acquirements, by any reputation for sanctity or for learning in their own departments, obtain through any influence whatsoever the grant of a single beega of land or of a single rupee, much less a competency to free them from temporal and personal cares, and thus to enable them to devote their time to the spiritual and eternal interests of their several communities. In Europe we see the spirit of toleration making daily advances; and christian governments now not only removing all disabilities from their Jews and other once despised sects, but also granting support to their several churches. Our India Government on the other hand is actually receding in regard to toleration. The Home Government after long withstanding the persecuting recommendations of Mr. Poynder and his enthusiastic friends has finally issued its orders for the withdrawal of the long established public superintendence and distribution of the revenues of the Jugunath and Gyah, and other Hindoo temples, in the hope, I believe, actually avowed, that the confusion and the scramble which will hence arise amongst the interested priests and their unrestrained exactions may bring these places of pilgrimage into disrepute. However innocent the act may be considered separately from its motive, it betrays, when considered in connection with the motive, a most dangerous and lamentable spirit of persecution. The abolition of the Suttee rite, barbarous though it be, was a breach of the letter of the law, and of our proclamations repeated whenever we entered a new territory, for this right is enjoined on widows in many reputed Hindoo revelations.

Farthermore, are not our Missionaries and other enthusiasts, constantly galling, without consideration and without judgment, the tenderest feelings of human nature, by exposing the absurdities and falsehoods of all the most revered books of all sects?

And have not some of the most zealous and most talented leaders in the cause of education, thrown themselves into the hands of the professional propagators of Christianity, and thus given to the cause of conversion all the weight of their great influence? And has not this band sent their proclamations thoughout the land, proscribing every native classical work, whether Hindoo or Mahumudan, as too full of obscenity or folly, or superstition, to admit of their being patronized by them or used in their schools? The intolerant zeal of this party has indeed so far blinded their better judgments, that with a Russian barbarity they are not only labouring to uproot the national literature of the people as worse than useless, but they are also striving to abolish the very characters in which it is written. It is a project that must assuredly fall to the ground; it is visionary and impracticable, but the attempt to introduce it must disgust all who are not sycophants at heart, and is therefore so far dangerous. And to crown our intolerance, the Governor-General in Council has not hesitated to adopt the views of this band of unreflecting enthusiasts so far as to pass an order, that the whole amount of the funds destined for the education of the people, shall be expended in the promotion of only English literature, to the utter exclusion of all that the people of this country holds most dear and most sacred. The goodness of the motives prompting to these acts can stand as no excuse to men with good reason and sound judgment.

16. My too zealous friends, if any chance to see these observations, will not fail to warm in defence of their conduct. From them I despair of receiving a cool and candid consideration. From the public, prejudiced though we all are, I expect a more candid hearing; and of it I confidently ask—does not our conduct in the particulars above referred to, fall far short of the full measure of a perfect toleration? Can the people—one portion of which has ever been distinguished for its bigotry and the other for its pertinacious adherence to the religion of their ancestors—regard with any sentiment approaching to affection that Government whose acts in their eyes admit of no other construction than that they originate in an anxiety to subvert their literature and their religion by the establishment of those of the west.

17. I should be digressing from my subject and take up too much of your space, were I here to enlarge to point out what appeared to me the safe and proper medium between the danger of actually encouraging superstition, and that of proceeding too hastily in the course of national improvement. Suffice it to say, that we cannot legislate even for the quietest race on earth either with effect or safety—without securing the heartfelt concurrence, if not of a numerical majority of the people, at any rate of a majority of the most enlightened of them. Men moreover may always be led faster than they will be driven.

It is not the Government which is conducted on principles that have been demonstrated to be most wise in the abstract and most sound that gives most happiness to the people—but it is one, the feelings and principles and conduct of which are most national, that is which most nearly harmonize, and accord with the state of ignorance prevailing amongst the majority of the people. In this view how dangerous was the benevolent anxiety of our late Governor-General so frequently professed to establish true principles. He might have taken a lesson from Solon, who boasted that he had given not the wisest possible laws to his countrymen but the wisest which they were prepared to receive. We have however no lack of more instructive and more recent precedents in England and elsewhere where ministries have fallen as frequently for being in advance as they have for being in arrear of the intelligence of the age. Our danger in this country consists in the fact that the people has no mouthpiece to tell us of their wishes—no constitutional organ. Its present ministry is half blind and half deaf and it will resign its place only with its life.

18. The FRIEND TO INDIA and a few other writers have so ably explained and made bare the ill success of our Judicial, Revenue and Excise systems, that I may safely pass over these subjects with the single observation that all are alike unpopular, ruinous and vexatious: disgusting or ruining all suitors in our Courts, reducing the agricultural classes to one uniform level of degraded poverty, and harassing to the mercantile community.

"You are never guilty," said a shrewd Thakoor, a subject of Sindia, to me the other day, "of the superfluous violence of confiscating a man's whole estate for an act of fornication like our Raja; but you never fail in the course of a very few years to bring all his treasures by the silent operation of your system, as appointed by law, into the Company's coffers; a few of my kinsmen and bunyeas are getting rich and insolent; tell me how you effect this silent transfer?"

Notorious thieves, who could never remain at large or escape with secure limbs in any native government, are allowed to prey without molestation on our native subjects. We say we have no legal evidence. If Magistrates did their duty, they would shew some portion of that indefatigable zeal and deep interest for our native subjects which have been displayed when the necessities of the British Government were considered to demand their exertion. A general greater exertion in these minor cases would anticipate the call for them in cases of more vital importance.

Whence, too, I ask, arises the almost universal impression that any man, be he a native or European officer, may with impunity run away with the daughter, or the sister of any native, bringing disgrace on the family or depriving it of the woman's services—if he can only induce the woman to say she is "razee." The Regulations have not so far left the cause of justice and morality without defence, nor fathers and husbands without remedy or satisfaction. Although cases of adultery and fornication are used by the native governments as a favorite means of oppression, their course of proceeding still gives much more general satisfaction than ours to the community, who regard our total indifference and neglect as ruinous to all morality.

19. The above observations apply to our established system of Government; let us now briefly consider the general conduct and circumstances of the European officers of Government as individuals, and let me ask "how do we as such stand in native estimation?" Are we distinguished by a never failing urbanity towards all classes of our native subjects, or even with those having business with us? Alas! how few are so! Do we not rather receive them without shewing either care or interest in their affairs? Do we not look down upon them with contempt, and are we not ever eager to attribute the worst motives to their most innocent sayings and doings—congratulating ourselves on our shrewdness in fathoming their cunning designs?

Do we enter into any of the sports, or amusements of those about us? No; the task would be intolerable. Do we assist them with our money in the celebration of their Mohurrums and of their Holees? "What!" you ask me in return with surprize; "would you have us promote such idolatrous displays or encourage them by our presence?" Elisha told Naaman the Leper that he might go, and go in peace, with his idolatrous master into the very Temples of his God Rimmon. But our high priests have now no such commission of absolution. I hope that we are not screening a spirit of avarice under this pretext? The charge you indignantly reject. "Will you then," cry distressed widows, Hindoo and Mussulman; "will you help us in our calamities, will you assist us in the celebration of the marriages of our fatherless daughters?" "We would with pleasure," we reply, "but in reflecting on the causes of the moral degradation of the people of India, we clearly perceive, that it is your expensive marriages, which most largely contribute to produce this lamentable result by perverting the sums of money that should be spent in the moral improvement of your children to the indulgence of a ruinous taste for display."

"You can then have no objection," cries the bunya, made bankrupt by a sudden fall of prices, or the kirsan ruined by the failure of his crops or the severity of our assessments, "to alleviate our overwhelming distresses attributable to no fault of our own?"

Our hypocritical sophistry is not yet exhausted; we have not attended the lectures of our late revered instructor Mr. Malthus, so utterly without effect as not to have learned the impolicy—nay, the great danger of injuring the spirit of independent exertion by an imprudent liberality to any man yet blessed with the "mens sana in corpæsana." The broken-hearted sufferer quits our presence, cursing our hypocrisy and the wisdom that has taught a man so to profane the name of charity.

Thus it is my friends, that with the words justice and judgment, liberality and charity ever on our lips, our acute powers of perception and our enlightened foresight will not allow us to reduce our benevolent speculations into practice in any single case.

Our constant removals, moreover, from place to place, prevent the growth of those intimacies and of that natural affection which might still, in spite of all our wisdom, betray us into occasional gratifying acts of a sympathising charity to some of our subjects.

Nay it would be well, if we even left our subjects free from acts of personal oppression. If our marching officers, and Commissioners and Collectors, and Agents, &c. on their circuits always paid or caused to be paid the price of the wood, and the grass, and the milk, and the sheep, &c. by the sale of which alone now so many that once had ploughs and bullocks, have, by our system, been reduced to live miserably. The poor man curses his fate. It were more prudent if our speculative philanthropists left him his Fate to curse!

20. But grant that a man has determined to work his way to the affections of all around him; that he is ready to make large private sacrifices of labour, time and money to promote the real comfort and happiness, as far as in him lies, of all entrusted to his care and ceases to waste the hours (that should be given to the people) in writing protests against merit-fostering minutes, and in publishing the faults of his Government and the delusions under which all his neighbouring fellow servants are labouring, modestly fearful lest his own be no less:—suppose, I say, he starts on this noble course, rejoicing to run his race: mark the impediments insperable from our condition as foreigners. They occur to the strongest—to the best man. His more fortunate friend who has retired to England, again and again writes telling him in every letter "that in India he drags out a miserable existence; that England is the only place where he can really enjoy life. Be wise then and come home and not throw away a single rupee on those lying, graceless natives."

If he betrays an honest ambition and a laudable desire for power that he may use it only the better to fulfil his anxious yearning to make our subjects more happy—he is asked "and what honor or credit is there in gaining the good will and affections of these misjudging, ignorant natives! No; take a higher flight; seek a wider field for your ambition; a more dignified audience, where success would be some honor. In England, however, nothing can be effected without money; look well after that in India—that you may render sure the success your experience and talents promise."

If he is made of softer mould, and if his swelling heart is at all alive to the kindlier impulses of our nature, he has no power to resist the fond entreaties of a loving and much loved sister to hasten home, to enjoy in all their purity and with all their refinements the thousand nameless endearments of a domestic life in polished society and a civilized country: he cannot disregard the affectionate injunctions of an aged parent that he will observe such a strict and sober economy as will ensure his speedy return to receive her dying blessing.

The claims of a wife and family again are paramount, they necessarily engross all his affections and all his personal cares to the exclusion of all foreign demands upon his time and purse—what husband can look upon a fond wife—what father can gaze on the budding beauties of his infant children and not resolve to do his utmost to ensure to her possibly widowed feebleness, and to their orphaned infancy every protection that money at least can give. Mr. Elphinstone exclaimed when he heard of the marriage of his assistant, Captain ——, "alas! the country has lost the services of one of its ablest officers."

How frequently too do sudden reverses of fortune impose upon us as a sacred duty, an economy that might with justice be carried to the bounds of penury.

21. I hope I am not misunderstood; that I am not exposing myself by an ambiguity to the charge of attacking the obligations of any of the moral duties. God forbid that I should be guilty of using the little judgment he has given me for such an unhallowed purpose—or for weakening the very least of them. My dear friends and fellow servants—my object is very, very different. It is to recal to your minds (for the strict truth of my sketches will not I think be denied,) the real and the almost insuperable difficulties of our position, to shew you that our circumstances as foreigners prevent even the most generous and noble spirits from gaining the affections of our subjects and from fulfilling the full measure of our duty to them: I am anxious to shew how the happy consciousness of well discharging our duty to ourselves, and to our friends and to our families, superinduces a self satisfaction that enables us the better to set at nought the requirements of an equally serious duty towards our native subjects—our ignorant fellow beings; that, in short, as we have given them the full benefit of our better heads—we will give them also the advantage (yet to be shewn) of our better hearts.

22. But to return—although we will not contribute to promote any of the objects, most important in a native's eyes—do we shew a proper pride by refusing to receive or by refraining from soliciting the aid of their money to promote what we consider important, or gives us amusement? No, we have nothing to give to their Hoolee ceremonies, still we beg them to become subscribers to our Racing Funds; we would shame them or even force them to keep our roads not only in repair but well watered; we cajole them into subscribing to our schools and our colleges and then give them nothing but English; we flatter the wealthy amongst them that they may provide for Fever Hospitals and Leper Hospitals and thus give another situation to another European. We tell them that we hope they will not refuse their quotas to our monuments and to our steam funds, and especially to the latter. Why, my friends, I blush when I think of our gross selfish inconsistency. Why, because they too will experience a due share of the benefits in increased facilities for performing their pious pilgrimages to the sacred tomb of their prophet, upon whom be peace, at Mecca!! When it serves our purpose of hastening conversion we inveigh against the sin for a Christian Government to promote by any means direct or indirect superstitious pilgrimages to Juganath; when it suits our purposes, we speciously set forth the increased facilities for which we are providing for the performance of pilgrimages to Mecca and avail ourselves of that plea to solicit their money.

23. It is unnecessary to explain how different are the circumstances and conduct of individual members of native governments when we see the prince and every local officer giving their presence and their money and zealous co-operation to make every ceremony and festival as splendid and as joyous as possible. All who have claims on any prince or any chief invariably receive the assistance expected from them. Wells and umraees and unnachutrius are built and maintained throughout the country, and extensive charities dispense their daily rations to the poor and destitute of all denominations.

24. I must again repeat that I am not vindicating the abstract wisdom of the native institutions and usages; nor do I assail the wisdom of our course of proceeding: I am simply recording facts. The native institutions and the native course of proceeding fulfil the expectations and wishes of the people, and so far make them happy and at ease; our course of proceeding and conduct regulated though they be by all the wisdom to be gathered from all the many volumes of reports and evidence of Poor Law Commissioners and other law enlightened legislators, are throughout calculated to excite only disgust at our fancied avarice, dissatisfaction at our (fancied) selfish hypocrisy, and hostility at our intolerance.

Our Government therefore being necessarily so unpopular and so uncongenial to the people, why, why I ask, are we so besottedly mad as to seek to extend it even a single beega? if we have so egregiously failed in our management of those parts of India where circumstances were most favorable, how can we for an instant flatter ourselves so far as even to hope that we can ever render that people happy, whose aristocratic institutions, whose gross barbarism and ignorance, and above all, their pride, will place in a constant and diametrical opposition to all the institutions we or our next generation would insist on introducing. Does not the very act which we are now lamenting itself, tell us in a voice of thunder, of this constitutional and inveterate state of social opposition? It must however be repaired. Let the guilty receive exemplary punishment. If the whole town of Jeypore be guilty, let it be blotted out of the map of India; let its ashes and mouldering ruins remain a signal monument of the offended majesty of the British power: but let not a beega be appropriated. Let us make over the country in parcels to the already independent chiefs, or in the lump to Beree Sal or any other individual well affected to our power, who can keep the turbulent aristocracy in check.

25. The British Legislature weighing well the past history of mankind, and more especially the past history of the British in India, foresaw that weak man with the sword of power in his hand would give way to the temptations and provocations of a wounded vanity: it therefore passed a solemn ordinance strictly forbidding the local Government in India from offensive interference and aggressions upon, and the assumptions of, the territories of our weak native allies on any pretext. It foresaw, moreover, that the absolute restriction was imperiously demanded by a due regard to self-preservation. A candid and honest consideration compels us still to applaud the justice and the wisdom of this restriction. If we have no regard to the laws of our country, let us pause at least before we are guilty of hastening in any degree that consummation (the spread of the British rule over the whole of India) which uniting the hitherto divided but numerous and daily increasing enemies of the British Gevernment in one universal league, must be speedily followed by our utter annihilation.

A MAN OF THE PEOPLE.

Central India, August 26, 1835.

TO THE HONORABLE SIR C T. METCALFE.

Governor-General of India.

SIR,—Some time has now elapsed since I did myself the honor of addressing you on the subject of the occurrences of the 4th of June at Jeypore. I am now desirous of offering a few more remarks upon the same melancholy but important topic.

You are aware that very little additional light has been thrown upon the matter, up to the present day, either by the inquiries which Major Alves has himself conducted, or by those which he states to be in progress on the part of the Jeypore Government. Nothing is as yet certain, except the total uncertainty in which the affair is involved. But, from the complexion which the whole case has now assumed, it may be regarded as the most probable solution of the enigma, that the attack upon the British functionaries was the result of a conspiracy among the adherents of the late minister, formed with the connivance of the Majee, or mother of the infant Rajah, and of certain Thakoors connected with her party. In thus supposing the improbability of the Rawul having been actively engaged in the conspiracy, I would not be understood as exonerating him from blame. His conduct on the fatal day must still remain inexplicable, inexcusable, and not to be reconciled with any warm affection for the British name and power.

It is understood that the Government have come to a determination of no doubtful or undecided nature. Major Alves has, it is believed, been informed, that if full and unrestricted atonement is not made by the punishment or proscription of all who are implicated in the guilt, war shall be declared against the Jeypore state, and, as a necessary consequence, its independent existence shall be annihilated. I need not say that the value of these instructions depends mainly upon the judgment which shall be exercised with regard to the sufficiency of the atonement made. And what may we expect in this matter? For myself, I cannot anticipate that the full satisfaction so justly required will be afforded. I do not dwell at present on the question of time, though every hour that passes over in the present posture of affairs deepens the dye of the original offence. But are all who participated in the murder itself to be punished? Then every indivdual of the numerous mob, that with the aid of the Meena guard hunted Blake to his death, is as fully, as heinously guilty, as those who were near enough to strike the fatal blow. There was no divided spirit there; all who were present joined, with heart and voice, if not with hand, in the cowardly atrocity. The execution of three or four out of such a multitude is a farce, a mockery of justice; so much so as almost to confound right and wrong, and to wear the semblance of hardship towards the few so selected. Again, are the instigators, of whatever rank, to be traced and given up for perpetual imprisonment in a British prison? What hope is there of this if, as doubtless is the case, they possess wealth and influence? If for instance, the Majee be implicated, as I have above stated to be commonly thought probable, will the Jeypore investigation end in her conviction? The evidence of the men who have been reserved from execution in the hope of future disclosures, will show how little is to be discovered from them. The emissaries and instruments who are made use of for such purposes by powerful natives are usually well chosen, and, like the assassin of Fraser, will emulate the muteness of the fox even at the place of execution.

But I am spared the necessity of saying more on this point, for even Major Alves himself anticipates that the atonement finally tendered by the Jeypore Government may prove inadequate to the occasion. And, supposing this to be the final result, I am glad to find that he has so far departed from his former exculpatory opinions, as to agree with me in the necessity of adopting one of the two courses suggested in the last paragraph of my former letter. That is to say, either war must be declared, with the attendant consequences, as mentioned in the Government instructions, or we must assume the entire and undivided management of the country during the young Rajah's minority. Of these alternatives he prefers the last, and his objections to the other more decided and energetic procedure are grounded partly on his doubt of its justice, and partly upon that of its expediency. On both of these points I would offer a few observations.

In discussing the justice of setting aside the present ruling family of Jeypore, and of substituting our own direct authority in its place, I am glad to find that Major Alves does not attack the measure in question on the grounds of the Rajah being a minor, although he alludes to this argument as one that might possibly be brought forward. Throughout the world it is an acknowledged principle, that any situation of power or privilege may be forfeited by the individual actually in possession, whether he hold it in his own right, or as guardian for another; and that in neither case does the next heir, or the legitimate owner derive any claim to the remission of the forfeiture on the fact that they were not parties in person to the offence which incurred it. Did we consider the sons of Tippoo entitled to succeed to their father, because they were too young to share in his inveterate hostility? Did the French nation respect the succession of the Duke of Bourdeaux, because he was too young to be concerned in the fatal ordinances? To take a case more in point: supposing the mother or guardian of a Scottish nobleman, at the time a minor, had armed his vassals, and sent them forth to take a prominent part in the rebellion of 1745. Would the immature age of the real heir have been considered a bar to the attainder of the family and the confiscation of the estate? Compassion or policy may in some of these cases recommend a mitigated penalty; but the strict justice of the severer course is never brought into question. Nor could it be questioned without almost annihilating the punishment due to the offence.

But Major Alves is of opinion, that the present anarchy and confusion, which exist in the Jeypore Government to which he attributes the recent occurrences, has been mainly brought about by the conduct of the paramount power itself during the last eleven years. Upon this ground he rests his plea for the remission of all penal consequences to the ruling family of the inferior state. This is a serious and a heavy accusation, and one upon which he should have fully enlarged, instead of merely stating it in a vague and general way, if he is really able to substantiate it. He should have distinctly shown, by reference to the existing treaties, what sins of omission and commission may be laid to the door of the British Government. Until this is done, the argument is null and void, and cannot influence your consultations, for it is clearly one, which, if fully proved to be founded on fact, must excuse not only what has already occurred, but every imaginable insult, and every degree of atrocity. We cannot find fault with any action, however degrading to our authority, which Major Alves may prove to owe its origin, however remotely, to ourselves.

Leaving, then, this question, I arrive at the consequences which are apprehended from the annexation of the Jeypore territory to our own. And here I pass by, as unworthy of serious notice, the remote fear which Major Alves entertains of a general alliance and out-break of all the Rajpoot states, combined with a descent of Runjeet Sing or of the Nepaulese. This phrase, as regards the assisting power, is ambiguous; let him have the benefit of the doubt; but let us face boldly the dangerous dilemma with which he next threatens your councils. He fears that, if we leave the Thakoors and other chiefs in possession of their jageers, the Jeypore revenues will be insufficient to meet the expenses of the Government in our hands, and that, on the other hand, if we resume those jageers, partially or entirely, we shall reduce their former possessors to the condition of discontented subjects in the first case, and of highway robbers in the second. The horns of this dilemma do not meet; there is room enough to escape between them. No one would propose that, in assuming the administration of one of the Rajpoot states, we should violently abolish these feudal institutions to which prince and peasant are equally attached. Whatever may be said against these peculiar systems, they have certainly tended to support the Rajpoot character at a higher standard than that of the other natives of India, by giving them objects of interest and motives of action unconnected with their own private advatage and welfare. It would be an act of mingled folly and injustice to reduce serf and noble to the same dead level, both being equally adverse to the change. If then we allow the Thakoors and others to retain their influence over these tribes or families who owe them hereditary allegiance, we cannot fail to leave them at the same time in possession of considerable pecuniary resources. On the other hand, is it to be apprehended that our Government would fail in obtaining sufficient funds to meet its expenditure; nay, that a considerable surplus would not remain, when we consider that we should be able to realize regularly, from the most powerful, as well as from the weakest of our new subjects, that tribute or revenue, which is now sometimes withheld, sometimes collected with delay and difficulty? And, moreover, that all classes of the community, and more especially the larger feudatories, would be relieved from the necessity of keeping up an irregular force to repel oppression and violence, and that they would then be able to devote to their new rulers, in return for the protection of regular troops, the means which have hitherto been expended in the above useless and dangerous manner. A country constituted like the one in question could not require large civil establishments or a great number of European officers to superintend its internal administration, for we ought to work by means of the feudal machinery which already exists there, and to which the people are not only obedient, but attached. And, lastly, if we can conduct the affairs of Jeypore with profit to ourselves and the country during a long minority, (as Major Alves himself seems to acknowledge) we should be able, a fortiori, to attain the same favorable results, when we had assumed a more commanding position as the actual sovereign authority, and when, whatever maintenance might be assigned for the members of the late Royal family, that part of the expenditure would doubtless have been materially diminished.

I have not alluded to Major Alves's remark about the innocent being punished together with the guilty by a declaration of war, because I do not doubt that the interests of those alone would suffer, who should attempt to resist our occupation of the country, or who might be afterwards proved to have participated in the original crime. The war should be against the Government, not against the people, and if a proclamation were issued to the above effect, it would go far to preclude the likelihood of any resistance at all.

I have now, Sir, concluded what I had to offer upon Major Alves's objections to the most politic and adviseable course which our Government could pursue. I am ignorant of the detailed system which that officer has suggested, in case of your adopting his other alternative and undertaking the management during the young Raja's minority, I know not even if his plan comprises the vital point of disbanding for ever the present Jeypore troops; of commuting the military service due from the chiefs for an equivalent in money, and of replacing the force thus abolished by a sufficient number of our own regular regiments. We must have no more forced marches from Nusseerabad to Jeypore; no more baiting of British officers in the latter city on account of the absence, inactivity, or connivance of the troops and the commander, who ought to have prevented it. These questions cannot be viewed merely in a pecuniary light. When we consider the existing state of European politics, we should surely be forewarned and fore-armed. The death of Runjeet Sing, which is probably near at hand, must soon oblige us to decide whether we shall carry our absolute and uncontrouled authority to the Indus, or remain in a doubtful and insecure position. We cannot stop till we reach that point, for in the situation of the boatman

> "Qui adverso vix flumine lembum
> Remigiis subigit, si brachia forte remisit,
> Atque illum in præceps prono rapit alveus amni."

I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedient servant.

No. XLIX.

ON THE USURY LAWS.

It is not my intention to occupy the attention of my readers with a long discussion on the abstract question how far a man is or is not justified in making the greatest profit he can by his capital as well as his merchandize: the point has already been argued most conclusively to all unprejudiced minds by Bentham; and to his works I refer those who wish for information on the subject. I shall confine myself to demonstrate practically the utter impossiblity of enforcing such absurd laws, and to show the demoralizing effect upon the people and the immense mass of fraud and perjury which is caused among the population of India by the attempt to carry them into effect.

It is well known that the rate of interest was by 37 Henry VIII. c. 9. fixed at ten per cent. James I. reduced it to eight; Charles II. to six; and by Queen Anne in 1714 it was limited to five per cent., at which rate it still remains. But all these laws are dead letters, capitalists will not lend their money unless they receive a return adequate to the risk: they will either devise means of evading the law, or will employ their capital in trading on their own account; or will even lock it up in their strong box rather than lend it on an insufficient remuneration. We cannot have stronger instances than are to be found in the history of the English national debt, not only of how the laws may be evaded, but of the evils of being obliged to resort to such practices; the consequences of which we are feeling at the present day. None of the loans to Government in King William's reign were effected at less than eight per cent. In 1781 and 82, and for several years afterwards, Government were obliged to pay more than six per cent. for the loans they received; and the mischievous way in which money was borrowed has entailed upon us the obligation of paying nearly twice as much principal as there would otherwise have been any necessity to do. In order to keep up the appearance of borrowing at a low rate of interest, Government nominally raised the loan at three per cent.; but for every hundred pound lent, they registered the name of the lender as proprietor of £175 three per cent., £20 four per cent., and an annuity of 6 shillings for 62 years. This gives an annual interest for every £100 advanced to Government of £6 1s. exclusive of the annuity. Now had Government fairly borrowed the money at six or even seven per cent. we should not have paid more interest than we have done: indeed as capital became more plentiful, or the credit of Government greater, they could have borrowed at a lower rate and thus have been enabled to pay off the principal which bore the high interest. There would only have been £100 stock to be discharged instead of very nearly 200 which is now registered in the names either of the heirs of the original lenders, or those to whom they have sold their stock. Repeatedly have the English Government raised money in this disgraceful manner; and it is this which has in a great measure tended to swell our national debt to the enormous amount which it has now reached.

So much for the shifts to which even Government are driven to evade an absurd law. In England, the merchants and bankers are equally quick at discovering methods of receiving what they consider a proper interest for their money. I speak not of Jews and professed money-lenders who live by administering to the necessities and extravagances of heirs under age; but of the respectable merchants and bankers; and I will describe one of the many modes in which they contrive to evade the law. A. and B., two clever men of business but possessed of no capital, wish, each, to enter into a mercantile speculation: they go to a banker, C., and fairly state their views: the banker observes, "the speculation promises well; but I cannot risk my money under seven per cent." This is managed in the following way, A. and B. each draw a bill on the other for twenty thousand pounds, each accepts the other's bill, on which the banker agrees to cash them both, with an understanding that neither shall draw more than fourteen thousand leaving the other six thousand, as a floating balance in the banker's hands. The whole twenty thousand are placed in the banker's books to the respective accounts of each of the two borrowers at the legal interest of five per cent., while he retains nearly one third of the sum, or six thousand from each to employ in any way he can: so that upon the whole, he contrives to realize his seven per cent. Of course much depends on the good faith of the parties in keeping to the underhand argument; consequently it is only among men of known honesty that such transactions occur.

But, pass we to India. Here, the legal rate of interest is twelve per cent. But does it remain at that, or has it not risen above or fallen below it according to the market rate? Let us first view the proceedings of the old houses of agency—and begin with observing their transactions with the indigo-planters in the interior. They lent them money at twelve per cent.; then came a charge of one per cent. on receipts and disbursements; then the money which was monthly advanced to the planter under the name of subsistence money, on which some petty charges were made; and the planter had not the option of disposing of his produce to the best advantage, but was obliged to send it to his money-lending agent, and to pay him commission for receiving and disposing of it. I have heard many indigo-planters say that they are convinced that they paid altogether eighteen or even twenty per cent. for the money originally borrowed. In the loans of the agents to the civil and military officers, the proceedings were something of the same stamp. Twelve per cent. interest was charged—one per cent. for all receipts and disbursements: then they required the borrower to ensure his life, charging him annually in their accounts a sum, as a premium, but which frequently they never paid to any Insurance office, preferring to take the risk upon themselves: so that it was merely a trick to raise the interest a little higher.

The agents are not to be blamed for these proceedings; the interest they contrived to obtain was no more than a fair compensation for the risk they ran. The indigo planters were men without capital; the civil and military officers had only their monthly pay; none possessed any property except to a small amount; and although if all three classes lived, they would probably repay their debt sooner or later, yet if any of them died, the whole of the sum due to the agent was irrecoverably lost. I only allude to these, to show the practices to which respectable English merchants are obliged to have recourse to evade an absurd and unjust law. How much better it would often have been for both parties could the agent have at once lent the indigo planter the money at twenty per cent., and left him unshackled in the management of his concerns. No sooner did the market rate of interest fall, either from the excess of capital or the want of employment for it, than these very agents were ready to lend money at nine, eight, and at one time seven per cent.

But with regard to the natives, they ridicule the idea of enforcing such laws, and have many modes of evading them, one of which is simple enough. The lender actually advances sixty, seventy, or eighty rupees, according as he considers the security of the borrower, good, bad, or indifferent: a bond is drawn out for a hundred, at twelve per cent. interest; a couple of witnesses are then called in to witness the bond, before whom the borrower acknowledges to have received a hundred rupees, and the matter is settled. Should a suit be filed for the debt the witnesses swear to the above effect, and a decree is given as a matter of course.

There are but three reasons why the rate of interest should be higher. First, a scarcity of capital. Secondly, bad security on the part of the borrowers. Thirdly, a bad government, in which justice is ill administered; thus holding out every inducement to debtors to be dishonest and not pay their debts. Many people I know entertain a notion that the natives are such usurers that they would rather keep their money unemployed than not obtain an exorbitant interest: a most complete mistake: the native bankers and merchants charge a rate proportionate to the security or good faith of the borrowers. Should a merchant of established reputation be suddenly pressed for a sum of money, even to the amount sometimes of two or three lacks of rupees, he will find no difficulty in procuring it from his brother merchants at six per cent.—a transaction which is constantly occurring in every large mercantile town. From others, they will demand twelve, eighteen, twenty-four to even thirty per cent., just according to the risk, and they have ways and means of evading the law. One I have mentioned; another is by frequently making up accompts at high interest; and either getting the debtor to give a new bond, or to sign an acknowledgment that the account is right, upon which fresh interest is charged. In dealing with an Englishman, who wished to establish some concern, the practice is often as follows. Twelve per cent. is charged on the money lent. It is agreed that the lender shall be employed to procure the articles required for the concern, on which five per cent. commission is allowed on the money disbursed, besides the common profit in which he makes in procuring so much goods, as he of course charges a higher price than he pays. Eighteen or twenty per cent. may often be made in this way; and in addition, the lender very often stipulates that two or three of his relations shall be taken into service by the borrower to superintend the work. On the other hand, I have known money pressed on an English merchant of established credit and good faith, at twelve, or even less, per cent.

During the last few years, before the introduction of the new judicial system, the difficulty of borrowing money had greatly encreased; until towards the end of 1832, it was almost impossible for any farmer or other person connected with the land to procure money at all, even though he offered thirty or forty per cent. The reason was the utter stagnation of all justice, and the confusion which had been caused in the landed tenures, so that it was almost impossible to pronounce who was the owner of any plot of ground in the Upper Provinces (a subject I shall touch upon separately). Still, no sooner had the new system been in operation for a few months, than the farmers could borrow money at twenty-four or even eighteen per cent.; because the bankers found that justice was now attainable: and I have not the least doubt this cause greatly facilitated the collection of the Revenue during the year 1833.

The demoralizing effect upon the people is the next point. Hundreds of debtors are induced by the low attornies who infest our Courts to resist just demands in the hope of throwing them out altogether, by proving that more than the legal rate of interest has been charged; and to support this, perjured witnesses are brought forward, who swear what is in fact true, that more than the legal rate of interest has been charged (every one knows as a matter of course that it has) but who are not the less perjured, seeing that not one of them were ever present at any transaction between the parties. On the other hand, the plaintiff produces his bond, declares the full sum was lent at the legal interest and brings forward his witnesses, who swear that the defendant acknowledged before them to have received the full amount. They usually go a little farther and declare that they saw the money actually paid. It is probable that not a single suit for money is ever preferred in a British Indian Court in which either downright perjury is not committed, or the plaintiff is morally speaking guilty of subornation of perjury; and after all this swearing that no more than the legal interest has been taken, should the judge happen to be acquainted with the plaintiff, and on leaving the Court call him quietly and where there were no witnesses, ask him as a mere matter of curiosity what rate of interest he had made by his money, the man would without hesitation reply, eighteen, or twenty-four, &c. as might be.

Is it not disgusting to know that such proceedings are daily going on, and that the natives are training to perjury (for after being accustomed to swear falsely about the interest of money, a man's conscience will soon permit him to give false evidence in other matters) solely from the attempted introduction of an absurd and an unjust law which never can be enforced? These considerations alone should induce Government to act with common sense and expunge from our statute-book, this remnant of barbarism, ignorance and injustice, and allow a man the liberty of employing his capital and his merchandize to the best advantage in whatever mode he finds conducive to his first interests. The only provision required, would be a fixed rate of interest, which should be charged on the amount of a decree, if not paid as soon as decided; and other points which occasionally occur, in which no rate of interest has been stipulated. In all other points let men be free to make their own bargains in interest of money as well as in every thing else. It is lamentable to think how much we have done to deteriorate the character of the natives by the introduction of laws and customs not only at variance with their habits, but opposed to the dictates of justice and right reason, of which these usury laws are a memorable example.

A FRIEND TO INDIA.

LIEUTENANT TREVELYAN'S MISSION.

On the 5th June we resumed our march towards the south, passing Kotra, once a considerable place with a small hill fort, and Bishala, which is still a large village, and on the 6th June we arrived at the Bombay outpost of Balmer, 38 miles from Sheo,—a deputation consisting of Pirbhoo Lal, son of Simboojee Joshee of Jodhpoor, and other respectable persons, with a very handsome escort, coming out about four miles from cantonments to do honor to the Ajmere Mission.

On our arrival at Balmer, we found a small force stationed here as a temporary measure, it having been found expedient to employ British troops to suppress the plundering tribes, who formerly infested this frontier; the detachment consists of a squadron of native cavalry, two companies of native infantry, and two hundred Mahratta horse furnished by the Gaikwar of Baroda, the regular troops being relieved half yearly from the large camp at Deesa, 130 miles S. S. E. of Balmer, and 50 miles S. W. of Mount Aboo. The whole detachment is under the command of Captain Richards of the 8th Bombay native infantry, who is also vested with political authority under Colonel Pottinger, the Resident in Kutch. We were received by this officer with the greatest hospitality, as well as by the other officers of the detachment, there being two with the cavalry and two with the infantry, besides a medical man.

As one of the principal objects of Lieut. Trevelyan's Mission was to undertake a joint investigation with Captain Richards as to certain matters concerning the western frontier of Marwar, we found it necessary to remain more than three weeks at Balmer, from the 6th to to the 29th June, during which time great light was thrown upon the subject under investigation, of which the chief points appear to be the following.

There is a sterile tract of country about 200 miles long lying in 71° east longitude, between the head of the Gulf of Kutch and the Jeisulmere territory, the upper part of which line is a sandy desert dividing Scind from Marwar, and the lower part is a large salt-marsh commonly called the Run or Rin. Immediately between these is a small district called Nugur Parkur, much infested with free-booters, who carried their incursions both into Scind and Marwar until routed out by the British detachment under Colonel Litchfield which scoured their country in 1831, and also cleared out the Mussulman plunderers called Koba, who had established themselves to the northward of Parkur, about Chotun, Joona and Balmer, which were generally considered to be under the Raja of Jodhpoor until the late Agent of the Governor-General at Ajmer (Lieutenant-Colonel Lockett) started some doubts upon the subject.

After the clearance of this frontier by Colonel Litchfield's force, detachments of the Bombay troops were left at Kasba in Parkur, which is an undisputed dependency of Scind, at Wow in Thurraudree, which is a part of Goozurat, and at Balmer in Mulanee, which until lately was always held to be a part of Marwar proper or Jodhpoor. Hence the complaints of the Maharaja Maun Singh that the British Government had not only stationed an outpost within his frontier, but had prevented the petty chiefs in the Balmer quarter from paying their usaul tribute to him. These chiefs are all Rathor Rajpoots of the same tribe as the sons of Jodha, but of a different family, for the former are descended from Beerumjee, a younger but more powerful brother of Mulleenath and Jait Mul, who peopled all the country immediately to eastward of the great desert of Umurkot.

The principal towns occupied by the descendants of Mulleenath (from whom the Mullanee district takes its name) are Chotun, Joona, Balmer, Kotra, Shoe, Girap, &c. to the westward of the river Lonee and eastward of the Great Desert; the two large towns of Sindree and Jusol on the left bank of the Lonee though also peopled by descendants of Mulleenath, are usually considered the capitals of a separate tract called Mewa; while the towns of Nugur and Gurra much lower down, and on the right bank of the Lonee, are the head quarters of the little district called Radhra, inhabited by the family of Jait Mul. It appears from the investigation made during our stay at Balmer, (where the principal men of nearly all these places were called in to give their evidence on the subject) that tribute had been paid, and military service performed, when called for on the part of Jodhpoor since the days of the Raja Ujeet Singh; that is to say, that for some generations all the petty Rawuls, Thakoors, and Boomias of Mulanee, Mewa, and Radhra were nominally subjects of Marwar.

The whole extent of country included under these names is in extreme length nearly 150 miles north and south from near Pohkurn to the mouths of the Lonee, and 100 miles east and west from Jusol to the borders of Scind, but the average length and breadth are perhaps only 100 by 70 miles, giving an area of 7,000 square miles, and producing a tribute of just about as many rupees, the country being very poor and comprising within its limits a great part of the Little Desert. The inhabitants are a rude tribe, who seem little inclined to yield obedience to any thing but absolute force, and they are continually at feud with one another, so that it would be difficult for any native power to keep them quiet and united: the presence of a British outpost, however, seems to do the former pretty effectually, if not the latter also.

Balmer seems to be as eligible a place for a cantonment as could well be selected, both from its centrical situation and from other circumstances. It is a town of about six hundred houses, with a small stone fort in a ruinous state, occupying the summit of a conical hill 300 feet high, which is however commanded by a similar hill at the other side of the town, and the latter is again overlooked by a very conspicuous peak called Soojer, which is 720 feet above the plain and ¼ mile from the camp. The town has suffered much from being plundered by our troops, and half the shop-keepers have abandoned their houses, but under a quiet regimé the place might become prosperous again, and there are even now numerous camels and large herds of black cattle. Four wells give an inexhaustible supply of water (some of which is very pure) at a depth of 40 to 50 cubits, but much difficulty is experienced in drawing it owing to the narrowness of some of the well's mouths, and the number of horses and people to be supplied.

During our stay at Balmer the rainy season set in and a striking change took place in the face of the country which was altered from a withered and arid look, to one of a lively green; even during the hot winds, however, abundance of forage (dry looking enough however in all conscience,) was procurable for the horses, and the thorny juagul which comes close up to cantonments furnished pickings for as many camels as could be turned into it. The common articles of native food were sufficiently cheap and plentiful, the wheat being supplied from about Gurra, the ghee from about Balotra or Patoudee; and bajra, moth, &c. from the immediate nighbourhood of Balmer: salt, too, is procured in abundance from Puchbhudra near Balotra, as will be mentioned hereafter.

Having completed the business which occasioned our long halt at Balmer, we left that place on the 29th June and pursued our way eastward across the northern part of the Little Desert viâ Joraee, Baitoo, Chaudeora and Baghondee to Balotra, the first three places being surrounded by very high but tolerably well-wooded sandhills, and a great part of the road from the latter place (Baghondee) to Balotra, being under water. The direct distance from Balmer is only 55 miles, but it is 72 by the road we came.

On the 3d July, while the baggage was marching up the right bank of the Lonee from Baghondee, the two European gentlemen accompanied by the Beekaner Vakeel and Thakoor Oom Singh of Jusol took a circuitous route to Balotra for the purpose of visiting Tilwara and Jusol, both of which places are on the left bank of the river. Immediately opposite to Tilwara is Mulee-nathka Than, the shrine of our above-mentioned patriarch, who has been deified by his descendants, and the temple erected to his memory has all the privileges of a sanctuary. A large cattle fair is held here annually, commencing twelve days after the holee, and lasting for half a month, during which time 80,000 people are said to be collected with large quantities of camels, horses and bullocks, upon the sale of which fees of five ~~Rs~~, three ~~Rs~~, and eight annas per head, respectively, are paid to the Hakim of Sewanna, who attends the fair on the part of the Jodhpoor Government: the descendants of Muleenath are however exempted from this tax. The prices of the best horses and mares are said to be from four to six hundred rupees; riding camels bring 120 rupees, and baggage camels 60.

After visiting the shrine and the fair, or rather looking at the place where it was held, which is now under water, we crossed the Lonee river, which was rushing down with a fierce and turbid stream a quarter of a mile wide, but not very deep. Our frail raft was made of a common charpae, or bedstead, under which five earthen pots were lashed, giving a sufficient buoyancy to float two of us at a time, though in our transit across the river our nether limbs were soused a little in the water, as the four or five stout swimmers who pushed us over assisted the troubled stream in rocking our watery cradle. These men had dried calibashes (toomba) strapped round their middles forming a float called jalee, which was a great help to them.

As the river was high "in spate" (or burra kawura panee as they would call it in Scind, meaning "very angry water") we would not trust our horses in the fierce current which almost swept me off my feet though wading barely more than knee deep, so we sent them up the right bank of the river, and borrowed half a dozen horses at Tilwara to take us four kos up the left bank to Jusol, where we were again to cross the river. Jusol was once a considerable town of 3,000 houses, of which barely more than a tenth part appear to be now inhabited; it lies on the north side of a samll rocky hill about 200 feet high. There was formerly a pukka bazaar of 300 shops, and something like a wall of stone round the town, the ruinous state of which is owing to a feud of more than 40 years standing.

Jusol is but a kos or two miles from Balotra, yet the Lonee nudee was running so strongly between them (with a stream seven hundred yards wide opposite the latter place,) that we were about four hours getting into camp, part of the delay being occasioned by the dilatory way in which our new raft was made and the great distance it had to be carried up the stream in order to prevent our being swept away below the proper landing place. We halted two days at Balotra, a very thriving town of 1,300 houses belonging to Jodhpoor, and the high road to Dwacka, which brings a great number of pilgrims and religious persons to this place. Very neat turners' work, in ivory and wood, and large quantities of embroidered velvet shoes are for sale in the bazar. Balotra is 63 miles from Jodhpoor and seven from Puchbhudra, a brief account of which will be found in my next letter.

Camp, Jodhpore, 18th July, 1835.—My last communication left Lieut. Trevelyan's Mission at Balotra, (on the banks of the Lonee nuddee, 30 kos south-west from Jodhpoor) where we halted on the 4th and 5th July, riding out on the morning of the latter day to visit the town of Puchbudra; which lies three kos or six full miles N. N. E. of Balotra. The road was tolerably good, notwithstanding the late heavy rains, and the surrounding country, though indifferently cultivated, had the appearance of considerable fertility.

Puchbudra is a considerable town of about a thousand houses or more, having a manufacture of coarse cloths, which are sent to the neighbouring town of Balotra to be dyed; but its chief article of produce is fine alimentary salt of which large quantities are procured at the saltworks from three to five miles northward of Puchbudra. The process of forming this salt is said to be very simple, nothing being required but to throw thorny twigs into the brine of the marsh, by which the chrystalization is so much assisted that large masses of pure salt are deposited and dug away for exportation without having recourse to the usaul method of evaporating the brine in large shallow pans called kiharee. There is a Kamdar or Officer of Government at Puchbudra, as both the town and the saltworks belong to the Khalsa, i. e., the Royal estate of Jodhpoor.

On the 6th July, we left Balotra and in four days reached the capital of Marwar, a distance of 63 miles by the rather circuitous route we pursued to Putaoo, Doleh, and Nahrnudee. The face of the country had greatly improved since we quitted the confines of the Little Desert which lies between Balmer and the river Lonee, where little else was to be seen besides steep sandhills running in long ridges, feathered with scraggy bushes and small trees, with here and there a cluster of dark-looking huts, the inhabitants of which are too poor to sink wells, and are obliged to trust during the hot weather to the precarious supply of water afforded by the shallow pits called bowree. The whole country between Balotra and Jodhpoor on the contrary appeared to be a fine plain, highly susceptible of cultivation, and in general furnishing abundance of sweet water, (owing to all the tanks being filled by the late rains,) excepting about Kulianpoor and other villages surrounding Doleh, ten or twelve of which are obliged to resort to the wells of the latter place, all the others being too salt for drinking. Numerous rocky hills appear to the south-eastward of the Lonee, in direction of Sewana and Jalor, but the weather was too thick to allow us a very distant view. There are also a few small conical hills studding the right bank of the river, and rising at intervals as far as the edge of the little desert about Kornra, Thob, and Patodee. A small part of these were under cultivation, and the remainder bore abundance of small acacia trees with the usual jungul shrubs, such as kureel, &c.

Our first fair sight of the citadel of Jodhpoor was from the camp at Nahrnudee, distant only six kos from the capital, but it ought to have been visible, had the weather been clearer, from a much greater distance. On approaching to within a mile and a half of our tents at Jodhpoor, the Mission was met by a deputation of respectable persons headed by Futteh Raj Sunghee, and Thakoor Kesuree Singh Dandhul, with the chieftain of Ladnoo, &c. followed by about two hundred fighting men, of whom nearly half were on foot and the remainder mounted on indifferent horses, far inferior to those which formed the cavalcade of the Pohkurn chief. Several maces and banners, however, marked the dignified rank of the members of deputation, while the tri-coloured standard of Marwar, mounted upon an elephant, appeared to wave cheerfully as if inviting the strangers to enter the city in confidence. Some of the Vakeels of our own party remarked that the partridge's call was heard to our left betokening good fortune to the travellers, so no outward appearance of a hearty welcome was wanting, and we alighted at our camp opposite the Sojut gate, well pleased with the manner of our reception.

We reached Jodhpoor on the morning of the 9th July, and on the 11th were received in state by the Maharaja Maun Singh, who had appointed the afternoon of that day for our introduction. We quitted camp at 5½ P. M., accompanied, as ususal, by our little escort of irregular horse and infantry, which made a handsome show when compared with the still more irregular looking warriors of the Court of Marwar. We commenced the ascent to the palace at 6 P. M. and were met at the second gate, called Imrut Pol (that is the third gate from the bottom,) by the Maharaja himself, who came down thus far from the palace in a litter with a very large concourse of attendants, and after halting there for a few minutes, during which time we were introduced without dismounting, we followed the Royal khasa up the remainder of the paved slope, and under the great gate, to the entrance of the palace. From this point we proceeded on foot through two courtyards to the steps of the hall of audience where etiquette required the shoes to be put off, and with our stockinged soles we slipped noiselessly across the pillared hall, and brought ourselves to an anchor in the native fashion beside the throne of the [illegible]g of Maroo." A crowd of nobles and courtiers seated themselves in the body of the Durbar, but there was not a single chieftain present of sufficient rank to be seated immediately opposite to us on the right side of the Gudee, we being on its left, and we were in consequence the sole occupants of the carpet spread under the throne which ought not to have been the case had Pohkurn, Nagor, Kuchawan, or any other noble of equal rank been present.

Colonel Tod's enthusiastic description of the Court of Marwar, with its "thousand-columned hall" and lines of silver and gold mace-bearers, led us to expect something particularly superb, but in this we were a litle disappointed. The Maharaja wore some very rich jewels and the ample white vest with large plaited skirts usually worn in Rajpoot Courts, but the appearance of those who thronged his hall was not particularly striking, nor nearly so imposing as it might have been were the Raja on good terms with his principal Thakoors who now sit sullen and aloof in there own fastnesses, while the Rathor Court thus shorn of some of its most distinguished ornaments, looks like the shadow of its former self. Maun Singh appears to be little broken by time or suffering, though he has endured much during the many years that have passed over his head; though without a tooth he speaks intelligibly, and his language is remarkably correct Hindoostance, without the patois of his neighbours of Beekanner and Jeisulmere. His person is large and bulky, and his face shews so little of the ravages of time, we must conclude him to have recourse to cosmetics, an art much practised by the natives.

We remained about half an hour in the hall of audience, during which time the behaviour of the Maharaja was courtly and dignified, and his conversation polished. Though his apparent hauteur was much greater than that of the princes abovementioned, yet in receiving the Ajmere Mission he both paid and exacted a greater attention to etiquette than the others had done. He came down in person to receive the deputation at one of the lower gates, and again made his appearance below the steps of the hall of audience on foot, leading Lieut. Trevelyan by the hand; yet he neither fired a salute nor allowed the retention of boots as had been permitted at both of the other capitals. On our rising to take leave he applied the utur and gave the pan with his own hands to the political functionary (a compliment not paid to Mr. Wilder, nor to Colonel Tod either I suspect,) while the subordinate gentry were oiled and pawned by some of the chief functionaries about the throne. He then led Lieut. Trevelyan a few paces toward the door, and we retired sufficiently well pleased with our reception by the King of Marwar, who had a very narrow escape last winter of being no king at all!

On the morning of the 12th July, we rode through the city and passing out at the west gate, called Chand Pol, crossed a ridge of rocky hills and visited the gardens and very fine tank called Ukee Rajka Talao lying about two miles beyond the walls. Lieut. Trevelyan had another interview with the Raja in the evening, for the discussion of private business, and on the following morning we went to to visit Munder, the ancient capital of Marwar, which is five miles northward of the present city of Jodha. The old town occupies a bight among the rocks on the east side of the range of hills that runs down to Jodhpoor, and still claims the semblance of a little city: some of the inhabitants of the capital also come here weekly on Monday (the morning of our visit) to pray at the different shrines, which may give it the appearance of a larger population than it really possesses.

The first objects introduced to our notice at Mundor were the eighteen gigantic figures representing in high relief the tutelar divinities of the Rathor Rajpoots. These figures form one long line facing the north, and are backed by a low rock of red sand stone, the three figures at the west end representing the Elephant-headed God of Wisdom between two effigies of Bhairon, being placed in an open temple, while others are carefully protected by a screen wall. The latter indeed require some such shelter, being finished with coloured cements, while the three figures already mentioned seem to be only daubed with red paint and bedizened with gold leaf. In the first of the inner compartments are the nine figures delineated in Colonel Tod's work as rock sculptures, and representing the eight-armed Davée Matta, who presides over small pox, and the cross-legged Nath-jee, to whom many temples are erected in this country: the remaining six figures of this series are rather Heroes or Demi-gods than real Hindoo divinities, and are all on horseback, the whole of the accoutrements, arms and dress being faithfully wrought out in the fine white line to which different pigments are added, and the whole are in good preservation. Their names are Muleenath, in whose honor is held the great fair at Tilwara formerly noticed, and whose widow Roopa-deo having burned herself on the funeral pile, became beatified and has a shrine at Tilwara on the side of the Lonee river, opposite to Muleenath ka Than: she is represented at Mundor standing in front of the horse of her deceased lord. Paboojee on his celebrated black mare, Ramdeo whose shrine lying six miles north of Pohkurn is a celebrated sanctuary and place of pilgrimage; and Hurba Goa Mewo, complete the list of Deotas, whose figures are engraved in the work above mentioned.

In the second enclosed compartment and eastward of the above range, are six gigantic figures similarly constructed, but without paint, perhaps on account of their being divinities of a far superior order. The first is the four-headed Brahma, the second Apollo or Sooria, who instead of having a car with four steeds as in the Grecian mythology, is contented with a single horse with seven heads. The third image represents Hunooman or Muhaveer, the monkey-hero, who assisted in subduing Ceylon or Lunka when Ram destroyed the arch-fiend Rawuna, who had carried off his wife Seeta. These two divinities, Rama and his bride, are represented in the fourth group; and in the fifth stands Krishna or Kunhaia, playing the flute, while four of the fair milk maids of Brij surround him, "looking delightfully with all their might," while the holy Girraj or King of mountains (the small hill at Govurdhun near Muttra) sends four various wild animals to listen to those Orpheus-like strains. The sixth and last figure, at the east end of the line, is Mubadeo, the great deity from whose hair descends a copious stream representing the infant Ganges, an idea that Colonel Hodgson suggests to have originated from the perpetual trickling of water from the icicles in a snowy cave at Gungootrie. As the whole of the above groups are executed with great care, and are in excellent preservation, it is a pity that they were not copied as well as their neighbours.

So much has been said about these sculptures that I have little leisure to enumerate the other curiosities of Mundor; the palace of Ujeer Singh (or rather Ubhe Singh?) is a neat building of cut stone, and appears to have been almost entirely devoted to the zuna-na; but though in perfect order, its corridors are now empty, and its chambers filled with the suffocating stench of bats. A little rill comes trickling out of the hill side near this palace, and runs through the gardens which bear the appearance of extreme age from the large size of the trees, and the flagged paths are partly choked by the luxuriance of the smaller shrubs. A quaint looking building like a huge pepper box, called the "Ek-Thumbr Muhil," (the palace of a single pillar,) overlooks the garden, but its name seems to be a misnomer, for it is not like the place so called at Futtehpoor Seekree, which really has a single colossal pillar of carved red stone in its centre.

In going to Mundor we had crossed a fine plain about two miles wide between the open pass leading from Jodhpoor to the site of the ancient capital; but in returning to the city we skirted the hills and visited a beautiful little rocky lake called Bal Sumodnour, a mile and half from Mundor. This little sheet of water is nearly half a mile long, though only 150 or 200 yards broad, and at its outlet are some noble gardens that are seen to great advantage from the top of the paved ghat leading to the top of the low rocky hills in which the Sumoondur is embosomed. We followed this road southward along the ridge leading toward Joudhpoor, and at the distance of a mile from the city turned aside to visit the large tank called Soor Sagur which is now dry. Here is a beautiful palace of white marble called Mottee Muhil, with a large bath or cistern of the same material, hewn out of a single block and transported at great expense from the quarries at Mukrana. A large garden lies below the Motee Muhil, and a smaller one separates it from the Soor Sagur.

The tanks within the city are numerous and some of them very large, but they all failed during the late severe seasons, except the Ranee Sagur, a rocky reservoir close under the N. W. side of the citadel. Though much rain has fallen already the large new tank called Baeeka Talao contains scarcely any water; yet conduits of masonry have been built at considerable expense to bring down the out-pourings of distant nullahs into its bed. The Goolab Sagur, however, which is of great extent and built entirely of stone, presents a fine sheet of water as do several of the other reservoirs. Large sums have been expended by the Jodhpoor Government in remedying the deficiency of water under which the inhabitants have so often suffered. Upwards of thirty baolees have already been built within a few years in and around the city, and even in the vicinity of our own camp, near the Sojut Gate, there are four baolees and two wells, all of stone: even the largest baolees are supplied with Persian wheels for raising water, though it is 42 feet from the surface, and the large jhatra or square well with steps near the Oode Mundur outside the Merta Gate is supplied with the like apparatus.

In riding through the principal streets of Jodhpoor, which are very few in proportion to its size, (for the capital is said to contain at least twenty thousand houses,) numerous respectable looking people are seen, but few handsome buildings, except the temples, some of which are very striking, though rather a mean impression of the city may thus be conveyed to those who have been accustomed to traverse the broad and straight streets of Delhi or Jeipoor, yet a bird's eye view of the city from the summit of the upper fort is really magnificent. Perched upon a parapet of the bastion encircling the pointed pagoda at the southern extremity of the citadel, we gazed with delight upon the fair scene at our feet. The whole city lies close to the rock on which the palace stands, surrounding its east, south, and west sides, the northern side being occupied by a hilly neck connecting the citadel with the Mundor range, and which is too much broken to afford building ground: the lively green of the trees, and the quantities of fine white plaister applied to the red stone houses afforded a pleasing variety of colours, and gave the city a gay look; the numerous tanks now filled with water, the white ramparts running along the higher parts of the city, the piles of buildings crowded upon each other and rising tier above tier to the Chand Pol Gate, and the confused mass of outworks on the west side of the citadel, formed a scene that will not soon be forgotten.

The east side of the fort is too steep to need any other cover than its own bold rocks, which are very steep, from twenty to sixty feet below the foot of the ramparts, and then fall away down to the town in a tolerably easy slope. The whole citadel is just five hundred yards long, and about half that breadth, or even less, the Royal Palaces and buildings occupying two-fifths of its area at the north end, while the south end is quite empty with the exception of the Mundur already mentioned, and a few huts: this empty space may perhaps take up one-fifth of the whole area, and the remaining two-fifths in the centre appear to be devoted to magazines, granaries and other useful buildings. The palace overtops all the other houses, and its highest part is 454 feet above the plain: the southern rampart, whence we looked down on the town, is 373 feet, and the N. E. angle 382 feet above the plain; the scarp wall which covers the gate at the latter place showing a sheer face of hewn stone 109 feet high. The walls which overlook the main enterance appear to be still higher, and are built in a very substantial manner of freestone quarried from the rock on which these gigantic works are based.

The main gate of the citadel faces the north, and a paved road leads down from it to the westward passing through a second gateway (above mentioned as the Imrut Pol or "Gate of Nectar,") whence the road forks, the eastern branch turning sharp round through two other gates to the zig-zag which leads down towards the Goolab Sagur, while the western branch leads pretty directly downward through four different gates, after which it again forks, the right hand path leading to the Ranee Sagur, while the left hand one turns to the south and is lost in the town without passing through any other barrier. Both of these roads are paved and practicable on horseback, both ascending and descending, though the eastern declivity is steep and winding: the western road is less steep, wider and more direct, but this entrance is covered by six gateways and the other by only four.

There are said to be five reservoirs in the citadel, of which we only saw two, but the Ranee Sagur in which there is abundance of water, is connected with the citadel by low outworks, and the town's people are prevented from using it, except on occasions of great emergency. The high rocky ridges on the west side of the fort, though enclosed within the shuhur Punah, as far as the walls could conveniently be carried, are nevertheless a sad blot on the impregnability of the castle of Jhoda, which would not easily laugh heavy guns to scorn (as it did the artillery of Jugu Singh,) if perched uponany of these eminences. The town walls too, are in a very bad state in several places, where a few yards of the parapet, and even a part of the rampart, has fallen down; on the south side the sand has drifted in one place to within four inches of the crest of the parapet, and in one or two other places breaches in the wall serve as means of ingress and egress to the inhabitants. Two large and steeply scarped masses of rock of considerable size, break the continuity of the wall on the east side of the city, and have an imposing appearance from being 80 to 100 feet above the plain, and from being encircled with ramparts on their outer face, but with five miles of wall from which to make his choice, of a point for assaulting the town, an enemy would hardly select such rocks as these against which to knock his head! The city might easily be carried at several points, nor would the upper fort long hold out against the iron shower of heavy shells and shot, which an European army would pour into it.—Delhi Gazette.

THE VESTRY QUESTION.

Sir,—From the tenor of your remarks respecting the Select Vestry of St. John's, I am at a loss to understand whether you have overlooked the radical reform of that corporation, which was by a coup d'etat effected on the 19th of August, and published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 29th of the same month—or whether there has been a supplementary ordonnance, curtailing still further the authority of that venerable body. Probably, the first supposition is the correct one, for in the new charter which was octroyèe to the Select Vestry on the said 19th of August, the Bishop's authority is made somewhat "like Aaron's rod which swallowed up the rest;" and it contains some happy instances of indistinct legislation, that were pretty certain to lead to different interpretations on the part of Reverend and Right Reverend Expositors: for example, the ex-officio Members of the Select Vestry are declared to be the Bishop, the Archdeacon, and the Chaplains of the Cathedral; four lay Members are also to be chosen annually on Easter Monday. Again, the Vestry are to assist the Bishop and Clergy in all temporal matters connected with the Cathedral; but the appointment and dismissal of all servants and officers connected with the Cathedral is to be subject to the Bishop's approval; and also the Bishop (by rule 1st,) is to have the sole and exclusive direction in regard to the performance of divine service, ceremonials, or arrangements for general convenience within the Cathedral; so that what with the assistance he is to receive, and his approval being requisite, and his sole and exclusive direction, the Bishop will by hook or by crook, get the whole managed as he pleases.

The sixth rule is one similar to what the inhabitants of Calcutta struggled and petitioned for fifteen years ago; and if the Clerical Members of the old Vestry had been wise they would have sought for long since, and have given their close corporation a solid foundation in popular election. But they kept aloof from this, and when the floods rose and the wind came, their authority has been blown down, because it had no support and was founded upon sand. It appears that in future the Vestry is to have four Members chosen annually by ballot, by those who have had seats in the Cathedral for the six preceding months. Here is the march of intellect; annual elections, vote by ballot, and universal suffrage! instead of the former mode by which the Select Vestry filled up themselves all vacancies among the four laymen in their body. Perhaps the publication of this new law has been considered as virtually placing the present lay Members of this venerable body in schedule A. Certain it is that last Sunday those seats which were heretofore filled by the select men of St. John's were left empty and desolate, while the cidevant Vestrymen might be discovered scattered here and there, with a grave and somewhat mournful aspect; still they had a look of official dignity—"Nor appeared less than Church Wardens ruined."

But if the old Parliament has been dissolved and dispersed, it is to be hoped that directions will be given for a new House of Commons being chosen immediatley. Surely the Bishop and clergy are not to be left without the promised "assistance in temporal matters"—(which all clergymen greatly need) until the month of April next? Besides there are large sums of money, the disposal of which is left by various trusts to the Select Vestry—and if these monies are disposed of by the rum-vestry which is now sitting, it may become a serious question how far they are legally competent to do so.

A PARISHIONER OF ST. JOHN'S.

In order that the subject may be better understood we reprint the ordonnance of the 19th August to which A PARISHIONER OF ST. JOHN'S refers. He is right in his inference that the dismissal of the lay members of the Vestry and the transfer of the whole controul over the affairs and funds of the vestry to the Bishop and the Archdeacon who are of one mind in all things it seems, was accomplished by a supplementary coup d'etat not precisely of a reforming character, in the shape of a most voluminous epistle which we hope to have the pleasure of submitting to our readers. This epistolary ordonance dispenses entirely, if we rightly comprehend the matter, (we have not yet read it) with the sixth clause of that of the 19th August, for there will be no more elections. The Vestry will be henceforth entirely ecclesiastical, and as the clergy are enjoined passive obedience to the Bishop and the Archdeacon, of course the former will have no votes, and if they act judiciously will wave the idle mockery of giving an opinion. Our correspondent very justly remarks that if the clergy had been wise they would not have opposed in 1819 the principle of popular election which would seem to have been provided for by the sixth rule of the ordonnance of the 19th August, although preceding clauses do not very well square with that principle. The Clergy at the time referred to (1819-20) however, dreaded nothing but innovation from the popular side—they have now a pretty practical illustration of the fact, that there may be innovation from the other side still more dangerous to their legitimate influence. In the present day, therefore, although they dare not take the popular side, they will not at least take the other, and in the struggle therefore which may be expected to take place, we shall at least not have them opposed to popular rights. We entertain very grave doubts of the legal power of the "rump vestry now sitting," to dispose of funds left by certain trusts to be applied by the Select Vestry: but we shall have more to say to the subject in our next. The questions at issue are of deep importance not merely to the inhabitants of Calcutta but to the whole community of India involving as they do questions of moral right—and of legal power in the Government.—Hurk.

THE VESTRY CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR,—The late sudden revolution in the affairs of St. John's Church, commonly called the Cathedral, having attracted public remark, there is no other way to preclude all misconstruction, except the publication of the whole correspondence, which, indeed, is the sole return I can make for the tenderness evinced by Government for my personal credit in the matter. I therefore send you my copy, begging you to understand, that the act of so doing, and the responsibility of it, are entirely my own. The reason of this avowal will appear from the close of the correspondence.

It is right also to add, that I believe the charge of obstructing the Bishop in his right to be altogether unfounded.

The only obstruction that I have ever heard of, in which the trustees had any concern, was upon the occasion of a desire expressed by his Lordship, that a curtain should be drawn before Mrs. Atkinson, while performing her part in the choir; which desire neither the Chaplains nor the lay trustees had the resolution to carry into effect.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

C. R. PRINSEP.

No. 19.

To THE SELECT VESTRY.

Gen. Dept. Eccles.

REVD. SIRS AND GENTLEMEN,—The Hon'ble the Governor is informed that the recommendations addressed to the Select Vestry by the orders of the most noble the Governor-General in Council dated the 8th of January 1819, respecting the authority of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta in St. John's Cathedral, have not been carried into full effect, and with a view to prevent the inconveniences which are understood to have been experienced from the incomplete recognition on the part of the Select Vestry, of the Bishop's Right to control all matters relating to the performance of divine service and of the duties in that Church pertaining to the Bishop as ordinary, it is deemed advisable to provide the following rules, which have been devised by the Government in communication with the Lord Bishop for the removal, so far as the Select Vestry is concerned, of all impediment to the due exercise of His Lordship's functions of superintendence and direction in the Cathedral.

First.—The Bishop, as ordinary, to have the sole and exclusive direction as to all that regards performance of divine service, ceremonials or arrangements for general convenience within the Church.

Second.—The appointment and dismissal of all servants and officers connected with the Cathedral and divine worship therein to be subjected to the Bishop's approval, as ordinary.

Third.—The proper rights of the Select Vestry, to be henceforth understood to be confined to those trusts which have been, or may be committed to them by the Supreme Court or other competent parties.

Fourth.—The Vestry to assist and aid the Bishop and Clergy in all temporal matters connected with the Cathedral; especially in whatever regards monies collected at the Sacrament or elsewhere.

Fifth.—Besides the Bishop, the Archdeacon, the Chaplains of the Cathedral, and the Bishop's Commissary, if there be one distinct from the Archdeacon, to be ex-officio Members of the Vestry.

Sixth.—An election of four Members to take place annually on Easter Monday by ballot, by the inhabitants of the district who have had seats in the Cathedral for the six preceding months.

If the Select Vestry see any good reasons for objecting to any of these rules, the Governor desires that they may be communicated to him for consideration.

I have the honor to be, Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) G. A. BUSHBY,
Secretary to Government.

Fort William, the 24th June, 1835.

To GEORGE A. BUSHBY, ESQ.
Secretary to Government in the General Department.

SIR,—We have the honor to acknowledge a communication from the Hon'ble the Governor through your department dated the 24th June last, and as its contents were unexpected as well as of such importance to the interests we represent, as to require a full and deliberate answe[illegible] have found it impossible to collect the sentiment of the Vestry at large so as to give an earlier reply. We have now to request you will lay before his Honor the Governor the following considerations.

We are at a loss to understand upon what information the Hon'ble the Governor has derived the alleged fact which seems to have given rise to this communication to ourselves, i. e. that "the recommendations addressed to the Vestry by the orders of the Most Noble the Governor-General in Council dated the 8th January, 1819, respecting the authority of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta in St. John's Cathedral, have not been carried into full effect." We have referred to the letter containing the recommendations in question (par. 6) and so far as the Select Vestry is concerned, believe that every thing has been done to comply with those recommendations. We beg leave to assure His Honor that if any thing has been done in disregard of them, of which however we disclaim all knowledge, it must have arisen from the anomalous circumstances attaching upon the Church itself, with which we believe the Supreme Government has on former occasions been made acquainted. The Church of St. John is at present in the predicament of partaking at once of the character of a private Chapel, of a parish Church and of a Cathedral. Strictly speaking it can hardly claim any one of these denominations. It stands on ground, partly granted by a rich native for the express purposes of a Church, and partly derived from the Company's Government. The charge of its erection was defrayed chiefly by private subscription: the deficit was supplied by the Supreme Government, which has since executed all repairs, provided the ministers, and defrayed the charge of other officers of the Church. The property was vested originally in nine trustees or managers, and has continued virtually in successors appointed by the survivors from time to time, the officiating ministers being always of the number; but irregularities have occurred in keeping up the full number required by the deed of conveyance from Warren Hastings, Governor-General, and, for want of formal conveyance under seal to the successive trustees and managers, the legal estate is now vested in the heir of the survivor of the original nine. The trusts, however, have been all along performed, and the duties executed, by the successive trustees for the time being; and now are so by the nine persons, whose names are undersigned. Legally speaking they are mere trustees of a Chapel of private foundation, but have all along executed the duties of a Select Vestry (vide extracts of proceedings annexed No. 1, 2, 3) and in that character, and in some instances by that name, have been charged with the administration of several charitable bequests and funds. Under the name of a Select Vestry they have long been recognized by the Government, and were so expressly in the time of the Marquess of Hastings, in the very communication of 8th January, 1819, above referred to.

The Church of St. John, however, though a Chapel of private erection, has always been regarded by the Government as the head or parish Church of Calcutta; the other Churches as Chapels only. On this principle, its officiating ministers have always been the Senior Chaplains of the Establishment, and surplice duties and fees have been attached exclusively to this as the Chief or parish Church. Until the erection of the Bishopric in 1813, the Chaplains were treated as the incumbents of the Church, and their relation to the Trustees or Vestry has always practically been, and continues to be that of a Rector or Vicar. When this Church was selected as the Church of the See, none of the provisons usually made in such cases was attended to. Neither Dean nor Chapter was created. The Church stood in the anomalous position of being at once a parish Church and a Cathedral; and was used in both capacities. Some embarrassment necessarily arose from this double character, which it was the object of the recommendation of 8th January, 1819, to remove. If any still remains, it is certainly very desirable it should be now removed, and that the whole of the rights and duties now attached to the Church should be either vested in the Bishop alone, without Dean or Chapter of any kind, or apportioned with precision amongst the Bishop (or in his absence the Archdeacon,) the Chaplains (or incumbents,) and the Trustees (or Select Vestry.)

As the existing Vestry, we beg distinctly to say, that such is our sense of the merits of the Government towards this Church, and of its utter dependance upon the Government for its continuance as a place of worship, that, if it be the wish of the Government we are fully prepared so far as we legally may, to resign the whole of our charge into the hands of the Supreme Government, and to leave the Church and the property in it to be dealt with at its pleasure. But as there are temporal trusts and duties that must be performed by some body, as we understood the Government to desire they should continue to be performed by a Select Vestry, and as we are fully persuaded, that they never can be performed either well or to the satisfaction of the public, unless that Select Vestry is such as can act with some degree of independence, we avail ourselves of His Honor the Governor's invitation to express our own views and sentiments on the contents of your communication of the 24th June last item by item.

1*st. Item.*—The Trustees or Vestry can have no objection to the exercise by the Lord Bishop over the Church itself of all the authority possessed by the Bishop of an English diocese over the Cathedral Church of his see. His Honor the Governor is of course well aware, that in England that authority, as to all temporalities of the Church, is controlled by the Dean and Chapter; and that his power in respect to "divine service" and ceremonies of the Church "is limited to the enforcement of their due performance, according to the constitutions of the Church of England." With regard to "arrangements for general convenience" the term is somewhat vague, and we are not quite clear as to the sense in which it is used in this instance. In England the Bishop has in all Churches of his diocese a jurisdiction to prevent infringement upon the rights of the public; and he can alone authorize such alterations as may from time to time be applied for. But he has no power to interfere with existing rights or arrangements. And with regard to the care and keeping of the Church Wardens or Vestry, the duty is always performed by one or other of them. In the Church of St. John, the seats are rented as in a private chapel, for the benefit of the Church funds: and this matter, which is purely temporal, has necessarily been conducted by the trustees acting as Select Vestry—we presume it cannot be the intention of His Honor the Governor to saddle the Lord Bishop with such a business.

2*d Item.*—The appointment of the servants and menials of the church is never, that we are aware of, vested in the Bishop. In a Cathedral, it rests with the Dean and Chapter: in a Parish Church, the minister appoints the clerk, the church wardens or Vestry the rest of the servants, if any be required. The only regular servants of St. John's Church are the clerk and organist, the singing-master and one singer, clock-regulator, organ-tuner, and nine menials (hitherto appointed by the Vestry and confirmed by Government by whom they are also paid). The remaining choristers and casual attendants, being paid out of the church funds have been hitherto appointed and discharged by the trustees or Select Vestry. These appointments are in no Church in England subject to the approval of the Bishop or ordinary; indeed, they are much beneath the dignity of his office. It is hardly possible, however, to conceive that any reasonable objection stated by the Bishop to any individual employed in office of the church should be disregarded either by the chaplains or by the Select Vestry; yet we humbly submit, that an express provision on the subject would be unusual, and derogatory to the high functions of the Bishop, and might interfere with the efficiency of the trustess or Select Vestry to enforce that order and decorum, which it is their particular duty to preserve.

3d Item.—This item appears to have been drawn without full information of the duties now discharged by the trustees or Select Vestry. It is they who make and take charge of charitable collections in the Church and of their distribution to the poor—dispense other funds besides such as are receivable through the Supreme Court, audit the accounts and control the expenses of the Church establishment of lighting, watching, &c. &c., execute petty repairs, and report to Government when more extensive repairs are necessary. Superintend the letting of seats, collect and take charge of the rents, and a variety of other matters too numerous to be detailed. All these are not only beneath the dignity of the Bishop but are no where confided to the clergy, except where there is a Dean and Chapter to take charge of the temporalities of a Cathedral Church. We cannot conceive that these duties can be discharged by any body so effectually, or thriftily as by the trustees or Vestry; but, speaking as individuals, we should be most happy to find ourselves relieved of them.

4th Item.—We are not sure that we rightly comprehend this item. The Bishop has in England nothing to do with temporalities: those of a Cathedral, which in England is rarely a parish church also, are under the Dean and Chapter: those of a parish church invariably vest in the church wardens or Vestry. To take temporal matters from the Vestry and consign them to the Bishop is to do away with the duties of a Vestry altogether. With regard to "Bishop and Clergy" it is a term that requires some explanation. Unless the Chaplain be regarded as Rector or Incumbent, the term "Bishop and Clergy" means the Bishop himself. If indeed the Archdeacon and Chaplains were constituted a sort of Dean and Chapter, there would be something resembling a Cathedral church in England. If the temporal duties of St. John's church are to be transferred exclusively to its clerical officers, we would humbly suggest that it would be requiste to define with precision the particular officers meant, and the duties of each.

5th Item.—The proviso as it now stands would make the Select Vestry in effect a clerical body. Of nine members five are to be clerical and one of those five the Lord Bishop himself. We can conceive nothing more derogatory to the dignity of the See, than to charge the Lord Bishop with the petty duties of a Vertry-man. It would not only be altogether unprecedented, but it would deprive the Vestry of even a semblance of independence. It cannot be expected that four laymen to be annually chosen should control the votes of the five clerical members: nor can it be imagined, that the latter would be otherwise than subservient to the Lord Bishop; especially where the entire control of the church affairs, spiritual and temporal, shall be vested in him alone, as it must virtually be by the preceding clauses. We humbly submit, that if a Vestry be thought requiste for any purposes, the universal rule of the English church be adopted; i. e., to admit no clerical members except the ministers of the parish, that is to say, the Chaplains attached to the church. In England the minister is always the chairman of the Select Vestry. The Bishop's commissary mentioned in this item is a new officer, of whose duties we confess ourselves wholly ignorant.

6th Item.—The existing Trustees or Select Vestry can have no wish to continue their own functions, and would feel themselves greatly relieved by the annual election of persons to supply their place. But they humbly conceive, that it will generally be impossible to procure the attendance of a sufficient number of persons to ensure anything like a public nomination, especially if the voters are exclusively to be inhabitants of the particular district now attached to the Cathedral, who shall have rented seats for the preceding six months. Great part of the district is occupied by public buildings and mere offices of business; many of the renters of seats are residents of the other districts. There has always been great difficulty in assembling a meeting for such purpose, and still greater in procuring the consent of the persons elected to accept the office, to say nothing of the frequent renewals of choice, which health or official changes must occasion. It was on a full view of all these inconveniences that the Government in 1819 (Vide Extract annexed from that letter No. 2) when the matter was fully considered, by the very letter of 8th January, 1819, above referred to (par. 10) gave its express sanction to the continuance of the existing mode of election by the remaining Trustees or Vestry-men themselves. Should it appear to His Honor the Governor, that circumstances are sufficiently altered to ensure a better nomination by any mode of public election, we shall most cordially concur in giving effect to its desire in this respect.

On the whole we humbly represent that the arrangement now proposed appears to us to be very little calculated to ensure the object which the Hon'ble the Governor appears to have in view, viz., the definition of the various duties and offices connected with the Church of St. John, so that they may at all times be effectively and harmoniously executed. The natural result of the present propositions seems to be, to vest all temporal as well as clerical functions in the Lord Bishop alone, and to extinguish all that independent and effectual control of its temporal concerns which it is the object of the Vestry to exercise.

In conclusion, we beg to repeat our willingness so far as we legally may, to resign our trusts, entirely into the hands of the Supreme Government, to be re-modelled as may be thought expedient or cheerfully to concur in any proposal for securing the due privileges of the Lord Bishop in respect to the Church of the see and permanently defining the duties and privileges of the several officers connected with it in all matters that may require adjustment.

3 par.—It is premised however that the gentlemen acting as Church Wardens or under that name, do act as such from a necessity that the duties of this office should be executed, and in conformity to the long established custom of this settlement, for as Calcutta is not of itself a parish though in a parish, and there are no legal powers to levy Church rates in it, or to compel the performance of some of the functions properly belonging to the office of Church Wardens in Calcutta, they cannot be considered by the law as properly described under that specification, but they must be considered to act with the consent of the inhabitants for whose advantage and good they perform the duty.

Extract from Government letter in the General Department, dated 8th January, 1819.

8.—From the information and precedents which have been laid before Government, His Lordship in Council collects that the managements of the concerns of St. John's Church, such as are generally transacted by Vestries in England, descended from the original proprietors of the church to the body which is now denominated Select Vestry, and that the appointments of Church Officers, excepting in those instances where the nomination has by courtesy been left to the Chaplains, has generally been made under the immediate authority of that body.

10.—The trusts of the Vestry require that the body should be kept up to a suitable number of persons, but as vacancies cannot be supplied by a Meeting of Parishioners where there is no Parish, the Governor-General in Council cannot under present circumstances suggest a more regular arrangement than that the privilege of election continue as heretofore in the remaining Members of the body itself.

To COMMODORE J. HAYES, and other inhabitants of Calcutta, claiming to have a right to vote in General Vestry, at the election of Church Officers for St. John's, under the first Article of the Regulation commonly called Lord Cornwallis's.

General Department.

GENTLEMEN,—In conformity to the commands of the Government, I have the honor to convey to you the following communication in reply to the address presented by you on the 13th instant, to the Most Noble the Governor-General, which his Lordship has recorded in Council.

2.—The questions which arose during the past year relative to the election of a Select Vestry, and the regulation of the concerns of St. John's Church, received the mature consideration of Government. It appeared, that the existence of a proprietory interest in the building was legally presumable, though the precise extent of such interest was not defined, and the individuals in whom it vested, were not immediately forthcoming; Government consequently could not exert a power of determination on the subject without the risk of trespassing on private right. The function of arbitrator might, indeed, have been well exercised by it, had such an intervention been sought by consent between the opposed parties, but no agreement for that mutual appeal having taken place, Government deliberated on what might be the most desirable procedure relatively to such differences. The result was, as you are aware, notified to the Vestry in my letter of the 8th of January last, and measures were taken for preparing the draft of a bill for submission to the authorities at home; that the bill had for its object the adjustment of all unsettled points, and the reconciliation of all the various interests involved in the discussion.

3.—The sentiments, intentions and expectations of the Government, of which that letter contained an exposition, have undergone no change since the above period. The draft of the bill has for some time engaged the attention of Government, and the whole subject will as speedily as practicable be referred to the Honorable the Court of Directors, with an earnest request that it may be included in their early deliberations.

4.—Under the course which it had been determined to pursue, it is obvious that further discussion here cannot facilitate the adjustment of the points in dispute or answer any useful purpose, I have only therefore to signify the desire of the Governor-General in Council, that no alteration may be made in the mode of electing Vestry-men, which has prevailed of late years, until the decision of the authorities in England shall apply a remedy to the defects of the existing system.

I have, &c.

REVEREND GENTLEMEN AND SIRS,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 29th ultimo, and in reply to state that the propositions of the Lord Bishop of Calcutta regarding the direction of St. John's Cathedral and the constitution of the Select Vestry, have, together with your letter, been submitted to the Governor-General of India in Council and have generally received the sanction of that authority.

I have the honor to be Reverend Gentlemen and Sirs, your most obedient Servant,

To G. A. BUSHBY, ESQ.

SIR,—We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 19th ultimo.

From the tenor of it, and from the subsequent notification from your department in the Government Gazette of Saturday last, we cannot but infer, though without any precise intimation on the subject, that his Honor the Governor-General has been pleased to accept the offer contained in our letter of the 29th July, we therefore beg to be timely informed when and to whom we shall deliver over the charge of those properties and trusts which we have hitherto held and executed, as we cannot legally make the transfer so as to vest either the property or the trusts in the Vestry now to be newly constituted or to be ourselves discharged from liability—without an act of the Legislative Council, we presume that such an act will be prepared forthwith, and we have to present our humble request to his Honor the Governor-General in Council that for our own satisfaction we may be favoured with the communication of the draft before it shall be passed into a law.

We have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedt. Servts.,

Genl. Dept. Ecclesiastical.

Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen,—Your letter dated the 2d instant, having been laid before the Honorable the Governor, I am directed in reply to acquaint you, that it was not the intention of the Government to accept from you the resignation of your trust.

2.—There has been no difficulty heretofore in the execution of the duties of the Vestry, and the Governor is not aware that there will be any difficulty under the new constitution of the Vestry, which requires you to act in conjunction with the Bishop and the Archdeacon.

3.—The Governor is not acquainted with the legal objections to which you refer, but if there should be any, you are requested to point them out.

I have the honor to be, Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen, your most obedient Servant, (Signed) G. A. Bushby, Sec. to Govt.

Fort William, the 16th Sept. 1835.

To G. A. Bushby, Esq., Secretary to Government, &c.

Sir,—In reply to yours of date the 16th September instant (No 49) we beg to observe, that the tender of resignation of our property and trusts made by our letter of the 2d instant was accompanied by the expression of our conscientious conviction, that the proposed changes in the constitution of the body acting as the Select Vestry of St. John's Church were such as altogether to destroy every vestige of independence in future and consequently to neutralize its utility, and render it a passive intrument in the hands of the Bishop for the time being; at the same time that it would remain charged with all the legal and equitable liabilities attaching to trustees of pecuniary interests. We thought it superfluous to add in express terms our common determination no longer to act as members of such a nominal Vestry, and more respectful to have our intentions to be inferred from our protest and tender of resignation.

Since, however, it appears necessary to be more explicit, we beg with all deference and respect, through you to submit to his Honor the Governor of Bengal, within whose cognizance we infer from your correspondence that this matter lies, that it was by no means our intention to admit the right in the Government to deal with the existing trusts and trustees at its pleasure, to re-model their constitution, to add to their number, or to impose upon them and co-trustees what it might think proper. The deed of trust from Governor-General Warren Hastings, under which the trusts have been all along carried on, is express as to the mode of supplying the trust; and, although it may not have been fully or formally complied with, we know of no other authority under which we should be legally justified in acting, either as to the admission of new trustees, or as to the property in the church itself, so as to the trusts that have from time to time been cast upon them by donors or testators, or by orders of decrees of the Supreme Court.

It was with a view to do away at once with all such legal embarrassments, and at the same time to testify our entire confidence in the Supreme Government, and our deep sense of its merits towards that property of which we are the legitimate guardians, that, in making the offer of a full resignation, we suggested the legal difficulties of our position, and pointed to the Legislative power of the Supreme Council of India, as the only effectual recourse. We beg thus more explicitly to repeat our impression, that no other authority can relieve us wholly from responsibility, in the event of our dealing with the property or the trusts any otherwise than as directed by the instrument of our appointment.

We beg you to draw the earliest attention of His Honor to this matter as we feel it an imperative duty to continue the exercise of our duties as heretofore and without change or variation until legally and effectually absolved.

We have the honor to be, with all respects and submission, your very humble Servants,

T. Robertson, S. P, C. — C. R. Prinsep.

Chas. Mackenzie. — C. R. Martin.
Frederick Corbyn. — C. B. Greenlaw.

Vestry Room, St. John's Cathedral, 28th September, 1835.

P. S. Annexed is an Extract from the deed of trust for the information of His Honor in Council:—

"And it is hereby declared, ordered and agreed, by and between the said parties to these presents, that from time to time when any one or more of them, the said John Macpherson, John Stables, William Johnson, Thomas Blanshard, Henry Vansittart, Claud Alexander, T. T. Metcalfe, Cudbert Thornhill and Edward Hay, or the Managers or Trustees for the time being, shall happen to die or quit India, the survivors of him or them, with the remaining Trustee or Trustees resident in India, shall and may elect in the room of every such deceasing member or manager or of such person or persons quitting India, such person or persons as they in their judgment and conscience shall think fit and approve of, who shall be a member or manager of the said trust estate together and equally with them, the surviving and remaining trustees, and to have the same authority, benefit and power respecting the trusts hereby declared; and in case of the death or departure from India of any such elected member to elect in like manner, and that the election of every such manager for the time being shall be entered and registered in some or one of the books to be provided and kept for that purpose, and that after such time as four at the most of the said trustees shall have departed this life or have quitted India, the survivors of them shall and may add to themselves as co-trustees with them all and every the manager or managers so elected as aforesaid to make up the number of trustees completely nine in the whole, and the said surviving and remaining trustees shall thereupon by advice of Counsel learned in the law convey the said trust, estate, and assign and convey all their estate and interest in the said piece or parcel of ground and the said church so to be erected and built thereupon as aforesaid with every the appurtenances to one or more person or persons to be named by them, to the intent that he or they shall immediately thereupon re-assign all the same estate and interest to the same surviving and remaining members of the said committee or managers and to all the said new-elected managers for the time being thereby to complete the said number of nine. In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have interchangeably set their hands and seals the day and year first herein above written."

To the Rev. T. Robertson, the Rev. H. Fisher and Members of the Select Vestry.

Genl. Dept. Eccl.

Rev. Sirs and Gentlemen,—I am directed to acknowledge your letter of the 28th instant, which the Governor has received with deep regret, as indicating a determined spirit of opposition to the orders and wishes of the Government, for which he is unable to discover a sufficient reason.

2.—He is utterly at a loss to imagine how the introduction of the Right Reverend the Bishop and the Venerable the Archdeacon into the Vestry can justify the gentlemen calling themselves the Vestry in refusing to co-operate with those eminent personages.

3.—On the part of the Reverend the Chaplains of the Cathedral, Messieurs Robertson and Fisher, this conduct appears to be most reprehensible, and quite unsuited to the character of their sacred office, in as much as they, without a shadow of reason, wantonly resist and set at defiance both the Government which they are bound to obey, and their ecclesiastical and spiritual superiors.

4.—The other Members of this party, who are servants of the Company, namely Messrs. Charles Mackenzie, Frederick Corbyn, C. R. Martin and C. B. Greenlaw and Captain Ouseley, appear to the Governor to have placed themselves in a very unbecoming position, by their needless and unmeaning resistance to the well-meant and unobjectionable resolutions of the Government.

5.—The remaining Member, Mr. C. R. Prinsep, who is understood to have been recently added to the number, for the purpose of giving his aid in carrying on this contest with the Government, not being a servant of the Company, the Governor refrains from making any remark on his conduct, but leaves it to his own good sense to determine, whether there is any credit in gratuitously taking part in these proceedings, for no purpose whatever of benefit of any description to any one.

6.—The Governor has endeavoured in vain to discover what public principle, what public or even private interest, what duty, what reason exists, to warrant so uncalled for a resistance to the authority of the Government.

7.—He does not recognize in the gentlemen called the Vestry any legal existence independent of the power of the Government over the affairs of the Cathedral. The Reverend Chaplains are Members of that body ex-officio in consequence of their nomination by the Government as Chaplains of the Cathedral. The other gentlemen have been added, the Governor knows not how, but apparently without any legal authority.

8.—Considering the free and easy manner in which the trusts alluded to in your letter have been taken up and put down, and handed from one to another at pleasure without any legal transfer or authority. The Governor would consider the difficulties now held forth with respect to the relinquishment of these trusts, as extremely ludicrous, were he not grieved at the spirit, in which such unfounded pretensions are assumed.

9.—But in supposing that these trusts are the matters principally concerned, you have misunderstood the object of the Government. The primary intention of the Government was to secure to the Bishop his due authority in the Cathedral, from which His Lordship has been excluded by the Reverend Chaplains and the Gentlemen calling themselves the Vestry, and the question of trusts was expressly reserved in the resolutions issued by the Government.

10.—The unexampled tone of your letter considering that, with only one exception, it is addressed by servants of the Company to the Government, precludes the hope of any voluntary co-operation on your part in the furtherance of the views of the Government, and compels the Governor to issue such orders as he believes himself to be competent to issue in this unexpected and unprecedented state of affairs; and to these orders he requires the obedience of all who are in any degree subject to the authority of the Government.

11.—The Reverend the Chaplains of the Cathedral are directed to co-operate with the Right Reverend the Bishop and the Venerable the Archdeacon, in the management of the affairs of the Cathedral, and to obey any orders which they may receive from the Bishop according to the tenor of the resolutions already issued by the Government.

12.—The other gentlemen who have signed your letter having declared their determination not to act any longer as Members of the nominal Vestry, are relieved entirely from the nominal office which they have assumed, and are prohibited from interfering in the management of the affairs of the Cathedral.

13.—With respect to the trusts, the Governor has no intention of disturbing any legal rights which may exist, and any gentlemen who are really vested with such trusts individually will continue to exercise them; but the Governor is satisfied that no such legal rights exist, and that the gentlemen who have taken on themselves these trusts with so much facility and so little authority, may relinquish them with equal ease. He is therefore willing to relieve them from any embarrassments or responsibility on this account, and to arrange on the part of the Government for the due fulfilment of these trusts, assigning them in the first instance to the charge of the Bishop, the Archdeacon, and the Chaplains of the Cathedral, until a Vestry shall be formed in the manner prescribed by the Resolutions issued by the Government.

I have the honor to be, Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen, your most obedient Servant, (Signed) G. A. Bushby, Sec. to the Govt.

Fort William, the 30th September, 1835.

At a Special Meeting held by the Vestry on the 2nd Oct. 1835.

Resolved by the lay members now present that the tone and tenor of the above communication renders it impossible that the Reverend the Chaplains should take any part in this Meeting.

Resolved, that the same motives preclude any expression on our own part.

Resolved, that all acts or proceedings be henceforth discontinued, and the Church abandoned to the Clerical Establishment.

Resolved, that all deeds, vouchers, books, accounts and papers in our charge be left in the Vestry Room under seal in custody of Mr. J. Llewelyn, Vestry Clerk, to the delivered over to the persons authorized by Government to receive the same—proper acknowledgment being entered thereof.

VESTED VESTRY RIGHTS VIOLATED.

Sir,—Truly the public are greatly indebted to Mr. C. R. Prinsep and to you for the publication of the Vestry correspondence. It serves as an excellent moral lesson to the good people of Calcutta who are rather prone to excessive gratulation in testifying to indications of liberality on the part of their rulers. It is therefore salutary that they should occasionally behold their Idols divested of the captivating attire in which they appear to receive homage on jubilees, and dressed in the plain fustian or linsey woolsey fashion, in which the ordinary official work is per- formed. That no man is a hero to his valet de chambre has passed into a proverb, and it may with equal truth be affirmed that no Governor-General is a liberal to his secretary. The Sir Charles Metcalfe who replied to the address of the Inhabitants of Calcutta on his proposed liberation of the Press, is not precisly the same Sir Charles Metcalfe who dictated the letter in the Ecclesiastical Department dated the 30th September, 1835, addressed to the representative of a portion of those same Inhabitants. However, the circumstances were certainly different—any thing like clap-trap or urbanity or reasoning would have been entirely misplaced if vouchsafed to the valets of the Vestry! What! persons eating the Company's salt presume to entertain conscientious or legal scruples as to their power of divesting themselves of a trust undertaken by them, when the Governor-General entertains none! Monstrous! "But," quoth some simpleton, "the Governor-General very lately told us that rulers are not infallible, that they are all the better of being told when they are wrong, and that temperate remonstrances and suggestions, from whatever quarter they may come, must be salutary. How then was it possible to imagine that a calm statement of objections, which were invited, could give offence?" As if the smooth ad captandum flourishes put forth in a public reply to a public address from a public meeting intended for publication, were to be taken as sober earnest to be acted upon by every one who might think himself qualified to advise the Government! No, no, the liberty of discussion in the newspapers is all very well, for the Government does not appear there as a party—it may profit by newspaper hints when it thinks proper, or it may be conveniently blind to the progress of a discussion when it does not choose to attend—in any case it is spared the mortification of being shown up as worsted in argument. But depend upon it that when once a Government has committed itself to an opinion, to differ from that opinion will even by your Liberator be deemed a grave offence, and to show that it is wrong will be held to be unpardonable. I have not subscribed to the "Metcalfe Library" because I have always thought that Sir Charles's merit in regard to the Press has been greatly overrated. Strip his reply to the address of its common place and claptrap (which by the way are ill in accordance with his minute in which the Press was mentioned contemptuously, as an engine so insignificant and harmless as to be undeserving of notice) and it merely amounts to this. "I find the Press at Madras free whilst that of Bengal is restrained. We must have one law for the whole country, and I must either liberate you or coerce the people of Madras. It is a choice of evils and I choose that which appears to me the least. Go, you are Free." This is precisely the extent of Sir Charles Metcalfe's liberality, and I do not think it is such as calls for Idolatry, though on the principle of not looking a gift horse in the mouth, I am willing to join in any moderate expression of gratitude. I will therefore subscribe to the "Metcalfe Library" provided the Committee charged with the erection of the building will consent to have it constructed with four principal entrances—the Arch of Janus Quadrifrous at Rome would furnish a capital model—the famous reply to the inhabitants being inscribed over one—over that opposite Sir Charles's flattering minute regarding the Press—the spaces over the other two entrances to be occupied one with Mr. Secretary Bushby's letter of the 30th September, 1835, to the Vestry, forming an appropriate commentary on the glowing terms in which the Governor-General's love of free discussion is conveyed,—and the other with the Resolutions passed at the Meeting of the Vestry on the 2d of October, 1835, in which they resolve themselves to be tongue-tied by the Liberator of the Press. Other events will no doubt occur which will give occasion to intermediate tablets with suitable inscriptions bearing on the same subject; for, of course, this extraordinary usurpation and the clerical intrigue by which it has been brought about, will not be allowed to pass without some public demonstration. The plan I have suggested appears to me a vast improvement upon H. M. P.'s original, as it would render the Metcalfe Library a faithful record of the memorabilia relating to the Freedom of the Press.

The published correspondence offers some useful hints to the Company's servants, by which they will do well to profit. They are told plainly that they must never in any particular (even regarding the fulfilment of a trust) differ with the Government. Thus if Government should hereafter entertain any plan for altering the management or constitution of the Bank of Bengal, let such of the shareholders as are servants of the Government beware how they act or vote! "Oppose not!"—thus runneth the "special edict" of Loo, and the mandate of Mr. Secretary Bushby in not a whit less imperious. In fact the public (such of them at least as are in the public employ) will find it very dangerous to enter into any partnership with Government whether in Banks, Steem Navigation, Education or Municipal Improvements,—for the Vestry correspondence shows that Governments are not only of a very encroaching and greedy disposition, loving to reap entire crops when they have only supplied a portion of the seed, but they are also apt to get quarrelsome and overbearing with their partners, and being strong withal they find little difficulty in accomplishing their wicked will. A partnership between the wolf and the lamb is never likely to bring good to the latter, and strange as it may appear, the Vestry correspondence shows that the admission of the shepherd into the concern renders the situation of the lamb even worse than before, a fact which would almost induce one to admit that "Shepherds feed upon your flocks" is the true reading of the passage, as suggested by the Examiner.

A PARISHIONER.

In stating in our last the ordonnance dismissing the Select Vestry was a voluminous epistle, we fell into the error of mistaking the manuscript which we received from Mr. Prin-sep for one communication, instead of which it embraced, we find the whole correspondence which we now submit to our readers and to which we earnestly invite their attention.

The Englishman, misled by some very erroneous information we presume, or yielding to the assumptions of authority which appear to us wholly unfounded and unjustifiable, is very facetious upon what he terms agitation—though he is unprepared to say whether that agitation has been singular or dual. We take upon ourselves to say that in so far as the correspondence enables us to judge, there has been no agitation, singular, dual or plural, nor is there a title of evidence to support the charge of obstructing the Bishop in any exercise of his legitimate authority; but the truth is, we trace in these proceedings a desire to grasp at power which we are sorry to witness in our Diocesan. The Trustees or Select Vestry of St. John's Cathedral have sketched the history of that church, and it is only necessary to refer to that sketch in order to comprehend the very equivocal nature of that right which the Governor assumes, to appoint and remove the Trustees of the property by his mere sic volo. The Trustees, we believe, understate their case when they admit that the Government gave part of the ground on which the Cathedral is built, unless they mean to refer to the old burying-ground, and we are not sure, that even that belonged to the Government; for in an account now before us it is stated, that "Maharajah Nobo Kishen presented, in addition to the old burying-ground, six biggahs and ten cottahs of the adjoining land, as the Dhurkhaust specifies, in Mowzah Dhee Calcutta,"—from which we infer that even the said burying ground belonged to the Maharajah, while of the whole cost of erection, 1,84,826-14-11, the local authorities only granted about 15,000, and the Hon'ble Court £1,200—the united sum being less than the value of the ground given by the Maharaja, then estimated at 30,000 Rs.! It is true that the Government have kept the Cathedral in repair out of the revenues of the State, and upon the faith of that we presume they claim a right to force into the Trusteeship whom they please! The Trustees have shewn that the Bishop is claiming powers not vested in the Bishop of a diocese at home, as in items first and second; and by item third, they are to be deprived of controul over charitable collections and other funds which have been hitherto invariably subjected to their disposal! According to item fourth again, it will be seen that the Bishop claims a right to interfere in all temporalities upon which the Trustees of St. John's very justly observe, that "to take temporal matters from the vestry and consign them to the Bishop, is to do away with the duties of a vestry altogether."

To the remarks on the fifth item, on which the whole case hinges in fact, we invite special attention. To the uninformed and unreflecting reader, it might have seemed a very innocent proposition, but for the suspicious nature of some of the provisos that precede it: but to those who look deeper into the matter it will be seen that this item effects by a mere coup d'etat a total change in the character of the original Trusteeship and vests the sole power of the trust in effect in the Bishop!! For it provides that of the nine members, five shall be clerical—one of these five the Bishop, to whom the clergy are enjoined to pay passive, slavish obedience. Of course they dare not in any point, however trivial, vote against the Bishop, especially Bishop Wilson of the fearful soubriquet!!

Oh! but, some of our readers may say, the sixth item provides for election. Does it indeed?—election of four to be outvoted by the five! but as the dismissed trustees justly remark, there can be no such thing as a popular election limited to the residents of the district of St. John's, occupied to a great extent by public buildings; while it is known that many renters of pews who will have no voice, reside out of the district. The proposition for an election is a farce and a mockery; and what is more, we strongly suspect it is intended to be so—a mere tub to the whale, which can deceive no one who is not gullible to an extent far exceeding any average of gullibility in any given number of the gullible. Elect what! four lay members to do the bidding of five clerical members, three out of which five again, must do the bidding of the other two?! and thus forsooth is to be called an election and to mock us with the form of a popular controul, where in reality there is not a spark of popular principle, but on the contrary an unmitigated clerical despotism over temporal trusts!! In fact it would seem that the Bishop has but to ask and have, and we only wonder that his Lordship was not offered a seat at the Council board, for we have heard that a certain diocesan once kindly volunteered his assistance to the Council in governing the country!

The tone of the Governor's last letter to the gentlemen lately composing the Select Vestry is altogether unexampled and indefensible. It is neither dignified in its style nor correct in its reasoning, nor just in the sentiments expressed, and forms a very remarkable contrast in all respects to that of the Noble Marquess of Hastings which is embodied in a former part of the correspondence. The Governor shuts his eyes to the fact that the objection of the Members was not to co-operate with the Bishop in any useful measure; but to place the whole power over the vestry trusts in his hands, making the rest of the Members the mere passive instruments of his will. Such is the real nature of the change which the Governor's new rules will produce—and for venturing to impugn the propriety of which, his honour hesitates not to reprimand the clergy and the members of the service belonging to the vestry, with a severity which could be only justly due to some very serious delinquency His Honour tells us, indeed, in paragraph 6, that he is at loss to conceive any public principle on which these gentlemen could have offered this uncalled for resistance to the authority of Government; but we believe that every unbiassd reader of the correspondence, will at once discover that public principle which to his Honor is so impalpable. The Select Vestry, constituted nearly as the late vestry was, has existed from the very foundation of the Church—the Governor of Bengal annuls it in effect by a sic volo without any sufficient ground, conferring the whole power on the Bishop, and then wonders what public principle can induce a body of gentlemen whose legitimate authority in the vestry is thus annihilated, who are called on to lend themselves to a mockery, a form without a substance, to remonstrate against a proceeding at once so arbitrary and so extraordinary!!

Paragraph 7, is a mere naked assertion of power—and a profession of ignorance of the constitution of the vestry altogether extraordinary in the face of the Noble Marquess of Hasting's letter, which referred to usage long previously prevalent—a usage which that letter confirmed pending a reference home.

As for the "free and easy" manner of taking up these trusts, it was, as we have seen, that which was expressly sanctioned by the high authority referred to.

The 9th paragraph is still more extraordinary, for the power of the select vestry is by the 6th resolution of the ordonnance of the 19th August, expressly confined to the trusts which may be committed to them by the Supreme Court.

The 10th paragraph again reminds the servants of the Company of their servile condition—talks of the unexampled tone of their letter considering their situations!! So that because they are the servants of the Company, they are to surrender, without remonstrance or complaint, a sacred trust to a power from which they did not derive it!!! Of course they must obey, but in doing so, they yield not to right but to power.

The 11th paragraph provides for the passive obedience of the clergy and, as we have said, places the sole power in the hands of the Bishop.

The 12th paragraph, which dismisses the vestry, is of little importance after those which precede it.

In the last paragraph we have a reference to the formation of a vestry. For what purpose? To be, as we have said, passive instruments in the hands of others—having the semblance without the shadow of power or controul of any kind! Will any man of spirit undertake such an office? We trow not.

Such is the actual state of the case, which suggests other remarks for which we have not at present time or space. We will only add, that we see no evidence of the slightest intention in the vestry to obstruct our Diocesan in the exercise of any right whatever. As for the weighty affair of placing a screen before Mrs. Atkinson, surely the Bishop might have taken upon himself the office of making that very flattering proposition to the lady.

The case is now before the inhabitants, it rests with them to decide whether they are willing to submit to an assumption of power which we hold to be unwarranted and unjustifiable, if not illegal.—Hurkaru.

The vestry question is now pretty nearly before the public, and notwithstanding the length of the correspondence connected with it, (which we borrow from the Hurkaru) we think the whole business lies within a very small compass. We have said that the question is pretty nearly before the public—by which we mean that we have one or two of the causes, and the general effect consequent upon them—we mean the dismissal of the ex-Vestrymen—before us; but we have not the the origo mali—the original dispute or discussion of the vestry with the Lord Bishop. It must have been protracted to considerable extent previously to the communication of Mr. Bushby to the vestry bearing date the 24th of June, 1835, in which were the rules devised by Government in communication with the Lord Bishop, for the removal, so far as the Select Vestry was concerned, of all impediment to the due exercise of His Lordship's functions of superintendence and direction of the Cathedral. We learn from Mr. Prinsep's letter, that the only obstruction he knows of, in which the Trustees had any concern, was the affair of the curtain and Mrs. Atkinson. We presume, therefore, that he is not acquainted with what took place between the vestry and the Lord Bishop, previously to his becoming a Vestryman. The six rules for the regulation of the vestry make it pretty clear, that his Lordship must have met with frequent, nay perpetual obstruction to his views from the vestry. We believe that his Lordship and the senior presidency chaplain were not always exactly of the same opinion on matters connected with the internal regulation of the Church, and, perhaps to this feeling we may trace the promulgation of the learning contained in the vestry's answer to the second rule. It is called second and third items,—by which the Government is informed that in a Cathedral the appointment of servants, menials, &c., rests with the Dean and Chapter,—in a Parish Church with the ministers and the vestry. The framing of the rules by the Government in communication with the Lord Bishop and the spirit evinced in the answer to, and comments upon, the rules of the Select Vestry, convince us that a great deal of discussion had previously taken place between these parties; —the subject matters of that discussion are not before us. Mr. Prinsep, it would appear, was dragged into the business about or previously to the affair of the curtain and Mrs. Atkinson; and whether agitation took place or not before, it certainly does appear to have been rife, so soon as this gentleman makes his appearance in the dispute. The letter bearing date the 29th July, is, in our apprehension, vastly symptomatic of previous agitation among the Vestrymen: it is in the style of an answer to a bill in equity and very nearly as long; and from its legal complexion, we hope we may without offence, attribute the framing of the greater portion of it to the last of the exes and newest of Vestrymen. The Harkaru expresses his dislike to the tone and matter of the answer of Government to this letter of the 29th July,—he should, we think, ask to himself the question, whether both may not have been elicited by the tone and matter of the vestry manifesto. Mr. Prinsep we learn from the Government letter, was added to the number for the purpose of giving his aid in carrying on this contest with the Government;—the vestry were anxious for the benefit of legal advice without paying for it we suppose:—they have got it with a vengeance! If Mr. Prinsep acted as their legal adviser on this occasion, he has certainly floored his clients, an operation with which, we are given to understand, he is by no means familiar, and the newness of the sensation must, we should suppose, render it rather painful to him. We cannot ourselves conceive the utility of mooting any one of the questions discussed in the vestry manifesto. The Government evidently assume by the communication of the 24th June, 1831, that it had the right to prescribe the mode in which the select vestry should exercise its functions.

The vestry, in a tone and manner absolutely offensive, full of mock respect, and satirical inuendo, dispute that right;—for what earthly purpose, we venture to ask? Why dispute what they cannot resist? And why instead of a respectful remonstrance, do they put forth such a thing as their long-winded manifesto? Why?—because the spirit of agitation was rife among them. Who stirred up that spirit? The framers or framer of that manifesto, we may surely without offence to reason or to persons infer. The Government evidently considers its right to interfere beyond question. If the Vestry intended to dispute the right, they should have put the matter in issue before a competent tribunal—but no: they prefer shewing their ingenuity and then by way of frightening their opponent, we suppose, hint at a resignation of trusts which did not legally rest in them!—and the relinquishing of functions which, according to their own shewing (if we understand the matter,) they had no right to perform! as they appointed their menials by the sanction of Government who pays them. Now, if Government sanctions, and pays, we should think, they may very fairly resume their delegated power to appoint. But, after all, this Select Vestry, like all its fellows is an usurpation,—only that the Calcutta usurpation has not even prescription whereon to base its pretensions. And what shall we ask is the result of this terribly arbitrary act on the part of Government? Why the notice in the Courier, and the papers of yesterday for a meeting in the vestry room of the inhabitants of the district for the purpose of elections by ballot for lay members of the vestry,—the very course pursued at home in all cases of the election of common vestry men. As our readers know Select Vestrymen elect themselves, it is, therefore, a close borough affair. All that Government has done in the business, in addition to turning out the ex-es is to open a close borough. It is true the clerical vestrymen are still four; but inasmuch as some of the clerical members of the late vestry did not exhibit any unbecoming and unvestryman-like deference to the wishes of the Lord Bishop, we may, we presume, expect to see the same spirit of independence evinced in the new vestry by its clerical members; and, in that case, the autocracy of the Bishop need not be a subject of alarm to our contemporaries.

It will be seen that we incline towards Government in this matter to-day. In our former notice of this subject, we disputed the right of Government: there is no longer any use in mooting that question. But our opinion is unchanged, although, we confess, the manifesto of the ex-vestry has tended vastly to modify the excess of sympathy we were inclined to extend to their unhappy case. With respect to the angry tenor of the Government letter, we can only say, we would it were otherwise. Why Government should feel or display irritation we cannot pretend to understand. As to the paragraph relating to the Company's servants, we lament that it should have seen the light. The independence of Government servants, in matters not immediately official, has long been tacitly recognised. We sincerely hope that this official wig, to the ex-es is not to be considered as a revocation of that tacit, but, we trusted, fully established recognition.

We must now conclude. We have written this notice in great hurry. We hope it is not calculated to give offence; certain we are, that none is intended by us.—Englishman.

An article on the Vestry question from the Englishman of Friday last, will be found in another page, which presents a strange contrast between its commencement and conclusion: the former might really seem to have been written by the Bishop himself or some one deep in his confidence—the latter appears intended to reconcile an inconsistency which is nevertheless too palpable to escape the most superficial observer.

We cannot pretend to have access to any such sources of information as those which are on this occasion too evidently open to our contemporary; but we have the less reason to regret that since it is equally clear that they have served to mislead him into assumptions wholly unfounded and unjustifiable. We will, however, venture to affirm, that let our contemporary have derived his information from whom he may, he has been misled, for it is not true that resistance was made to the Bishop. His Lordship did what he pleased in the Church; nor, in so far as we can learn, has any complaint been made to the Vestry of any attempt to obstruct him in any manner. We believe the first intimation the Vestry received of any change being meditated, or rather the first thing that made them suspect that any change was contemplated, was an application by letter requesting that his Lordship might be allowed to peruse the title deeds.

As we do not profess to be in the secrets of the Vestry we are not sure whether this application was made to the Vestry collectively or to the senior Chaplain; but we have heard that it was addressed to the latter and that he replied very properly, that he had individually no power to comply with this request, but that he would submit the letter to the Vestry. This was done we hear, and copies of the deed and of the correspondence in 1819 were furnished to the Bishop. We should like to know what there was in this proceeding to justify the imputation to the Senior Chaplain in particular or the Vestry in general of obstructing the Bishop? In consequence, however, of some representation made to Government on the subject, by the Bishop we presume, that the instructions of Lord Hastings in 1822 had not been acted on, the letter of Mr. Bushby was addressed to the Vestry; but if that were so, the system was one which had continued from the time of Bishop Middleton. The Vestry were not informed, we believe, that the Bishop coveted a voice in the appointments of the choir, the punkah-pullers, the pew-openers and the mehters. Without stopping to enquire how far it may be consistent with the dignity of the Mitre to grasp at control on such matters, we may at least be permitted to remark that before opposition was complained of, the claim to regulate such important Church affairs should have been duly submitted to those who could never have anticipated that the Diocesan of our Church could really, in his love of power, descend quite so low. Before the Englishman so readily charges the senior Chaplain with opposing the great autocrat of the English Church in the east, he should be prepared with his proofs, and not deal in inuendoes which have no foundation in truth.

We are reminded that before we condemned the tone and style of the Governor's letter, we should have asked whether they were not elicited by that to which that communication was a reply. We answer that we cannot discover in the latter any of that offensiveness or that tone of mock respect which it suits the purpose of the writer in the Englishman to discover in it. On the contrary we see in it only that information and those suggestions and remarks which were called for by the previous letter of Mr. Secretary Bushby. There is nothing whatever in the reply of the Vestry to justify the very offensive, undignified tone and style of the Governor's rejoinder—a communication at which we are equally surprized and grieved. The Englishman may endeavour to excuse the sentiments, the reasoning and the style of that letter, but we happen to know that these are condemned by parties who are the least likely to be biassed against the high authority whence this very unjustifiable and indecorous communication proceeds.

Our readers may recollect that they were assured in defence of the Archdeaconry business, that the Bishop required some one to be his Archdeacon who would work with him; and thus it was that he first intended the office for his nephew and son-in-law and when, owing to the affair with the missionaries and the awe of public opinion, his Lordship was deterred from fulfilling that pious intention, or was shamed out of such nepotism by the press, he put in a kindred evangelical soul from the junior clergy! We now see what sort of "work" it was that the now Archdeacon Dealtry was ready to perform at the price which his seniors would not pay. Of a truth the Bishop "has not brought peace but a sword." He quarrels with the Christians in the south, next with the Vestry and inhabitants about temporal power, and then sets out on a visitation tour to escape the storm he has brewed!

The Englishman, indeed, tells us that all that the Government has done is to open a close borough! a pretty opening, indeed, when the clergy of the Select Vestry are enjoined slavish obedience, accused of obstructing the Bishop's views, and then they and the Company's servants are distinctly reminded of their dependant condition and severely reprimanded for stating, when asked, their conscientious opinions! How after this can any Company's servant ever be allowed to sit on a jury, or consent to do so if allowed, while he is subject to be thus treated if his opinions do not coincide with those of power?

He jests at scars who never felt a wound.

We know something of the effects of this claim to servile obedience in the Company's servants. We have not yet forgotten the case of the Sheriff reprimanded for calling a public Meeting because he happened to be a Company's servant—nor the stamp tax proceedings—or to go further back, Sir George Barlow's persecutions of jurors at Madras. We confess that we cannot think without pain and humiliation of Sir Charles Metcalfe's claiming from the servants of the Company, a blind and slavish obedience and a disgraceful surrender of their duties as the trustees of public property: yet in the face of such a reprimand as the servants of the State, ecclesiastical and lay, have received for daring respectfully to state their views as Vestry-men when called on, the Englishman cooly talks of expecting "to see the same spirit of independence evinced in the new Vestry by its clerical members," and in that case we are told that we need not fear the autocracy of the Bishop!!! No indeed; but unless the clerical members should become idiots, it would be a degree of folly bordering on infatuation to expect that they would re-assert an independence, the claim to which has brought upon them the severest reprimand. "The independence of Government servants in matters not official, which has long been tacitly recognized," is now plainly and practically revoked in that very letter which the Englishman in the first portion of his remarks endeavours to justify; but which in the last, as if another mind had guided his peroration, he does not venture to defend.—Hurkaru.

Our readers will be amused with a long article we copy from the Englishman, about the Vestry question, especially with the two short concluding paragraphs contrasted with the two lengthy paragraphs which precede them. Our brother of the Englishman was already known to have a happy versatility of talent, which was never distressed by a charge of inconsistency. To find every thing right and every thing wrong by turns was an easy task, and we were sure to be one day agreeing and another day disagreeing with our contemporary upon the same subject. It was therefore quite in the order of things to find him saying, "We incline towards Government in this matter to-day," whatever might be his inclinations yesterday: but it has not been so usual to meet with opinions as wide as the poles asunder in the very same article—shall we say, from the same pen? The article is in other respects more open to commentary than any we have read for many a day in the columns of a newspaper; but we do not think it worth while to expose the errors of fact and inference which abound in it. The writer has evidently studied to mix up with the conduct of the Vestry matters they had nothing to do with; and because their letter was eminently respectful throughout, he charitably supposes it "full of mock respect and satirical inuendo" !!—Calcutta Courier.

Our notice of the vestry question has brought down upon us both our morning and evening contemporaries. The Courier, whose consistency has always been a theme of public admiration and astonishment, taxes us with inconsistency in this particular matter and with inconsistency in general. As to the general charge, we can only consider it as "too amusing" on the part of the Courier,—and so we leave it. As to the inconsistency in this particular matter, we shall rebut the charge in answering the observations of the Hurkaru. The Hurkaru begins with congratulating himself in not having the sources of information open to him which are evidently open to us, and which have led us into assumptions and insinuations wholly unfounded and unjustifiable! Our assumptions "so wholly unfounded and unjustifiable" are simply these, that "the senior Presidency Chaplain and his Diocesan were not always exactly of the same opinion on matters connected with the internal regulations of the church;" and we go on to say, that the necessity for framing the six rules contained in Mr. Bushby's letter to the vestry, and the spirit evinced by the vestry in their answer, convince us that considerable discussion had previously taken place in the vestry. This is all that we said, and this is what the Hurkaru calls by the lofty title of "assumptions and insinuations wholly unfounded and unjustifiable." Our contemporary then proceeds to inform us in what the senior presidency chaplain and his diocesan did differ. The first thing which made the vestry suspect that any change was contemplated was an application by letter requesting that his Lordship might be allowed to peruse the title deeds; then comes a little piece of affectation about not being in the secrets of the vestry—quæque ipse misserrima vidi, and one of the quorum to boot, we suspect, notwithstanding the disclaimer.) After which our contemporary tells us he has heard the application was made to the senior chaplain,—that he replied very properly he had no power to comply with the request, and the matter was submitted to the vestry; and this, according to the Hurkaru, is all that took place previously to Mr. Bushby's letter and promulgation of the six rules. Now we, the Englishman, have heard that repeated discussions had taken place between his Lordship and the S. P. Chaplain before this, say for the five or six months preceding, and that the vestry had had cognizance of these discussions; and when we saw the six rules promulgated, we naturally felt satisfied of the truth of our information and concluded that much opposition had been encountered and that the rules were in consequence framed.

The Hurkaru then proceeds to say, (although not in the secret) that the vestry were not informed that the bishop coveted a voice in the appointment of the choir, the punkah pullers, the pew-openers, and mehters, and goes on to comment on his Lordship in a strain which though highly disrespectful is not by any means surprising in a journal which has systematically opposed itself to the established Church—her interests, ministers, and undoubted rights. The Hurkaru talks about our insinuations and assumptions;—we can only say that, looking at the insinuations and assumptions and inuendoes contained in this paragraph of his, we should be extremely sorry to make an exchange with him. We will ask, is it likely that the Bishop would complain of opposition to him in matters of internal regulation of the church, if he had not experienced such opposition? and if such opposition did not take place on the part of the vestry, from whom did it proceed? And now we ask, whether or not we have dealt in insinuation and assumption unfounded and unjustifiable? The Hurkaru cannot find in the reply of the vestry, any of that offensiveness or tone of mock respect which it suits our purpose to discover in it. Whether or no our contemporary have or have not a bias on this question which may obscure that clearness of perception which generally distinguishes his views, we shall not take upon ourselves to say: we have his assertion, and that of the Courier opposed to ours; we have the opinion of Government in communication with the Bishop in corroboration of our view of the matter,—three to two in our favour.

It may be said that the Government and the Lord Bishop are collectively one of the parties involved in the discussion. The Courier, as far as the little he does say, and the Hurkaru in all that he says, are, if not vestrymen, at least, quasi vestrymen; so we still say that, quoad the opinion entertained of the vestry letter, opinion is three to two on our side. The Englishman has not endeavoured to excuse the sentiments, reasonings, &c. of the Government letter: all that the Englishman says about it is:—"with respect to the angry tenor of the Government letter, we can only say, we would it were otherwise. As to the paragraph relating to the Company's servants, we lament that it should have seen the light." That is what we do say; why the Harkaru should mis-represent us we don't know. The next paragraph does not relate to us. It is a beautiful specimen of the feeling of the writer towards heads of the Church,—it is a precious piece of personality and the more reprehensible inasmuch as the writer well knows, that the parties attacked will not answer him through the medium he has had recourse to, to communicate his sentiments. The Government letter after all, is nothing more nor less than "a wig;" of course nothing of the sort was ever issued before by Government to its servants, and nothing of the kind ever can happen again. "How after this," asks the the Harkaru, "can any Company's servant be allowed to sit upon a jury, or consent to do so if allowed, if his opinions do not coincide with those of power?" Here is an assumption on the part of our cotemporary with a vengeance. We deferentially submit that no assumption or insinuation of ours, unjustifiable, ever went this length. The Government writes as follows to five gentlemen who are in its employ, "the other members of this party who are servants of the Company (naming them) apper to the Governor to have placed themselves in a very unbecoming position, by their needless and unmeaning resistance to the well meant and unobjectionable regulations of the Government." This is absolutely all that is said. We should very much like to know from the Secretary's office, whether such observations on the part of Government to its servants have ever been made before? and whether or not in consequence the independence of the parties so addressed has been so entirely prostrated as to render them fearful of acting on juries, etcetera, etcetera, &c. &c; leaving it to our readers to supply as many shocking cases as their experience or imagination suggests of the evil consequences resulting from this measure! We remember, says our lecturer, the case of the sheriff reprimanded, &c., the stamp tax proceedings, Sir G. Barlow's persecutions at Madras! And we, (the Englishman) remember Mr. E. Gordon's speech at the press meeting, and the various subsequent speeches and public conduct of many highly talented and staunch supporters of liberality, in cases when the Government claim to servile obedience might, for aught they knew, have been exacted; and yet, notwithstanding the examples within the Harkaru's recollection, they did not desert their post. We repeat it, we do not justify the Government letter, but think under the circumstances the conduct pursued by Government was the best it could adopt; and we maintain, it is perfectly consistent to uphold their anger without approving of the form in which it displayed itself;—but this we fearlessly say in the teeth of the Harkaru, that it will take a different sort of letter to that which he holds in such apprehension, to stay the mouths and stifle liberal feelings in the bosoms of Englishmen whether in the service of the Company or out of it; and its inference of the assumption of despotic authority by Government over its servants in matters unconnected with the service, because of the appearance of the paragraph above quoted, is making a mountain out of a mole-hill. That the press should watch carefully every undue assumption of authority we readily admit; we hope we have not been in the background on these occasions; and notwithstanding what has taken place, we really think the Government has opened a close borough. In fact, the Harkaru agrees with us in so many words; for he says, that our only chance of escaping the autocracy of the Bishop is in the good sense and public spirit of the inhabitants of St. John's parish, to whom the right of voting is most arbitrarily limited, if they elected four independent members, of course out of the service;—in or out, we say, it does not signify a pin's head, so long as they can think for themselves, and are not to be seduced into signing manifestoes:—the autocracy may then be defeated, but not otherwise. We have no doubt but that the inhabitants of St. John's will do their duty, and we have as little doubt that in so doing they will best fulfil the wishes of Government who have given them the opportunity of doing it, which they would not have had, by-the-bye, under the select vestry system. We are not a little amused at the Harkaru supporting select vestries:—Talk of inconsistency indeed! We deny any such thing on our parts, and, for a day, we suppose, we take leave of our two contemporaries on this matter.—Englishman.

The Englishman of Monday has a long article on the Vestry affair to which we refer our readers. Our contemporary denies having dealt in assumptions and insinuations—has he not assumed that there has been a systematic course of opposition to the Bishop—and insinuated that the Senior Chaplain was at the head of it? has he not asserted that Mr. Charles Prinsep was dragged forward to carry on the contest?—the whole of which assumptions, insinuations and assertions were distinctly denied on Monday at the Meeting by the Senior Chaplain. He says we have pointed out in what the Senior Chaplain did differ from the Bishop—we have done no such thing; we have explained that the Senior Chaplain did not choose to act on his individual authority when called on for Papers—that he stated truly that he had no power to act and would refer his Lordship's letter to the Vestry, which he did without hesitation, and they supplied all the information required! Was that obstruction we ask? As for Mr. Charles Prinsep's being dragged forward to carry on a contest, we refer to the Senior Chaplain's explanation on that point, and shall merely add that he is about the last person in Calcutta who can be justly suspected of being likely to lend himself to any thing of that kind. Mr. Prinsep is in general careful—too careful, w[illegible] regret to say, of mingling in our local politics, —rarely attends public meetings, and is as little of an agitator as any man we know.

We come now to answer an insinuation which more directly concerns ourselves. The Englishman assumes that "one of the quorum" wrote the remarks to which he refers. He is greatly mistaken—they are entirely our own. We admit that it is comparatively of little consequence as a general rule who writes, if the editor adopts what is written; but our practice in this respect is somewhat rigid. Very rarely indeed—one case out of a hundred editorial articles in this paper—we may have the assistance of friends: but we never yet suffered and never will suffer, the parties in a controversy to make use of our editorial columns or put forth their sentiments and language as our own. And assuredly, in this instance, we have neither suffered clerical friends to dictate to us nor legal friends to write a special-pleading article for us, adding a tail piece by way of softening off the effects of their mistaken zeal. In cases of this kind we hold that an editor should not quite so readily adopt what is written for him upon the exparte information furnished to him by one of the high contending powers. Our information is derived from several sources. We are asked whether it is likely that the Bishop would complain of opposition to him if he had not experienced such opposition? Reasoning à priori we should have said no: but arguing from actual evidence of what is past, we must say yes! that however unlikely it may have been deemed, IT IS A FACT that the Bishop has misconstrued into opposition that which was not opposition—we are bound to deny that he had just cause of complaint.

We are told that the opinion of the Government in communication with the Bishop, is opposed to us, as to the alleged offensive tone of the Vestry letter, and that these authorities make three to two in our contemporary's favour. We answer, that we can bring, if necessary, twenty authorities, in integrity and intelligence equal to any member of the Government, to support our view on that point; and as to the character of the Governor's letters—twenty did we say? aye, a hundred. If indeed we are to be met with the rank of the parties, we have nothing more to say.

We are again accused of misrepresenting—we deny the charge: we have put the case fairly.

We are accused next of a beautiful specimen of feeling towards the heads of the Church. What our feeling may be, we shall not now pronounce; but there have been heads of the Church for whom we cherished a high respect: they certainly did not adopt any proceedings like those we now condemn. As for "a precious piece of personality," we might perhaps retort in the words of Juvenal—but we deny that we have dealt in personality. We have discussed the conduct of the Bishop in his public capacity, and in that alone. The Englishman may choose to call that personality if he pleases; but he has a very different definition of personality when it suits his purpose: but our alleged personality in discussing the public conduct of the Bishop is the more heinous it seems, because we know that the parties attacked (who are they?) will not reply through the same channel. We do not know any such thing. Unless we are greatly mistaken they have done so ere now in a certain way—but perhaps they don't recognize the maxim qui facit per alium, facit per se.

The concluding remarks of our contemporary, in which he denies that the Government letter at all interferes with the independence of the Company's servants, have received a practical reply from the result of Monday's election and the sentiments there expressed. No Company's servant offered himself as a candidate and it was admitted without any dissent that none could act.

We are told that we support Select Vestries. We support no such thing; but we do contend that justice, decorum, and consistency should mark the acts of a Governor. What we do advocate in respect to Vestries is open election of an independent constituency. Have the Government manifested any desire in their recent proceeding for such a Vestry? we need not pause for a reply.—Hurkaru.

In another column we insert the rejoinder of the Hurkaru to our article of Monday. Here the Vestry discussion, as far as we are concerned, must stop; and we only regret that further insinuation on the part of our contemporary precludes its cessation without additional remark.

The Hurkaru hints that we have been dictated to by clerical friends, and that we have lent our editorial columns to others for controversial purposes. If to listen once to information unexpectedly volunteered by a minister, in the presense of others, be to suffer dictation, then we are guilty; but if this mode of obtaining renseignemens on an interesting question has in it nothing of that character, then has our contemporary assuredly wronged us.

We now declare most solemnly, once for all, that since this journal has passed by its present denomination, or has been in its present hands, not one single editorial article has ever appeared in it which was either written by a clergyman, or for a clergyman, or in consert with a clergyman, or with the most remote view of serving the views and interests of any minister of the established or any other church! When a question has been mooted in which the interests or government of the church have been involved, it has been our practice to seek information from friends competent to furnish it, and to frame our editorials with reference to the intelligence obtained; but we have never once resorted to a clergyman,—we have never once received the smallest assistance or information, direct or indirect, from any clergyman, save in the solitary instance to which we have referred above. We hope this disclaimer will satisfy our contemporary for the future, and that it will not again be cast in our teeth that this paper lends itself to any party or to any cause, but the cause of TRUTH—the party of our supporters.

But we allow "legal friends forsooth to write special pleading articles for us!"—a grievous charge—while in the Hurkaru not one editorial in a hundred is written by any one but the sole and responsible Editor himself!

There was no occasion for this naive confession on the part of our contemporary. It has been too plain for the past eighteen months that, excepting when the late editor of the India Gazette adorned the pages of the Hurkaru with his powerful articles, and a certain quondam Redacteur en chef occasionally lent his aid in the supply of military and political effusions, nearly the whole editorial matter has been drawn from one o'erlaboured brain. So much industry is indeed praise worthy, but it may be permitted us to doubt whether the force and consequence of a journal are thus most effectually preserved. We confess we employ talent, lay or legal, wherever it is to be found—or wherever it can be enlisted in the service of our readers—but certainly not after the fashion suggested by our contemporary. A particular subject is often pointed out to a friend—the line and course of argument occasionally traced for him,—and we are but too happy to avail ourselves of the form in which our views are embodied and maintained by abler hands than our own. This employment of other individuals may, indeed, produce occasionally a little inconsistency on minor points in the editorial columns, but it is more than counterbalanced by the additional knowledge and talent brought to bear upon any popular subject. We only wish that the newspaper resources in this country permitted of the extension of the system.—Englishman.

The Englishman has taken leave of the Vestry discussion in an article in the conclusion of which there is what is intended we presume for a deadly hit at us in the shape of an invidious comparison or contrast. The writer is mistaken however, if he imagines that we are quite so sensitive or so selfish as to feel hurt at a just tribute to friends whose talents we have ever readily acknowledged, merely because it seems to be offered with a view to disparage our humble labours by comparison. We can appeal to the pages of this journal for proofs of the fact that we, even when opposed to one of the gentlemen to whom the Englishman adverts, as freely admitted his superiority as we have done before and since. We know him too well not to be aware that he will not think the better of any acknowledgment of his abilities, that it is made rather with a view to depreciate us than to do justice to him. Our contemporary in his sketch of the Calcutta press might have found an opportunity for that warm praise in which he now indulges, in which his expression of it would have been less liable to any suspicion of a sinister motive.

With regard to the question of receiving assistance in the editorial department, when we can obtain any like that to which the Englishman adverts we are always most glad to avail ourselves of it, but contribution from such writers come, alas!

Like angels visits, few and far between.

What we were anxious to protest against was the charge of permitting the parties to a controversy to make use of our editorial columns—that we never do, because we hold the practice to be unfair.

As for the Vestry question we have not done with it, although we rest on our oars a while to see the course which things will take.—Hurkaru.

EDICT TO THE METCALFE LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

SIR,—Although you are a member of the Metcalfe Library Committee, you do not seem to be aware that an admonitory letter has been addressed to that body by very high authority. I send you a copy of it which has accidentally fallen into my hands and it may be worth your while to publish it as a stimulus to the subscription which I regret to hear is in rather a languid state— from gout your contemporary the Courier says, but I am greatly apprehensive that the symptoms are those of rapid decline. Your readers will see that the style and temper of this letter bear considerable resemblance to those of a communication which appeared some days ago in your paper, and which related I believe to some parochial matters in which the Vestry were concerned. The rebuke conveyed to the Company's servants for joining in commending the acts of a Government "which they are bound to obey," is severe, but it is dignified and particularly well timed. We have often had rulers who have laid down the dictum that no dependent of the Government must presume to question, far less to blame, any proceeding of that authority, but now for the first time we have the truly magnanimous principle promulgated that those who may not blame must not applaud.

Your obedient servant,

PETER JENKINS, Junior.

10*th October*, 1835.

To H. M. P. and Gentlemen calling themselves the Committee for the Metcalfe Library.

Gen. Dept. Conservative.

GENTLEMEN,—I am directed to call your attention to the Resolutions passed at a public meeting at the Town Hall on the 20th of August last, which the Governor has perused with deep regret as indicating an assumed right of applauding a measure of the Government, for which he is unable to discover a sufficient reason.

2. He is utterly at a loss to imagine how the introduction of a law, which merely gives the same freedom to Bengal which Madras has long enjoyed, can justify the gentlemen calling themselves the Committee in asking the public to co-operate with them in eulogizing the eminent personage who passed the law.

3. On the part of the originator of the Library scheme this conduct appears to be most reprehensible and quite unsuited to the character of his office, in as much as he, with very insufficient reason, gratuitously applauds the act of a Government which he is bound to obey.

4. The other Members of this party, who are servants of the Company, viz. Messrs. —, —, —, —, —, —, —, appear to the Governor to have placed themselves in a very unbecoming position by their needless and unmeaning approbation of the well meant and unobjectionable measure of the Government.

5. The remaining Members Messrs. —, —, —, who are understood to have been added to the number for the purpose of giving an appearance of independence to the Resolutions laudatory of the Government, not being servants of the Company, the Governor refrains from making any remark on their conduct, but leaves it to their own good sense to determine whether there is any credit in gratuitously taking part in these proceedings, for no purpose whatever of benefit of any description to any one.

6. The Governor has endeavoured in vain to discover what public principle, what public or even private interest, what duty, what reason exists, to warrant the uncalled for compliments which have been lavished on him personally on account of the press law.

7. He does not recognize in the gentlemen called the Committee any legal existence as approvers or censurers of the acts of the Government. The originators of the meeting are Members of that body ex-officio in consequence of their having moved and seconded the laudatory Resolutions. The other gentlemen have been added, the Governor knows not how, but apparently without any legal authority.

8. Considering the free and easy manner in which the office of Committee-man has been assumed and subscriptions have been solicited the Governor would consider the laudatory proceedings of the Committee as extremely ludicrous, were he not grieved at the want of judgment they exhibit.

9. But in supposing that a love of Free discussion gave rise to the new Press Law, you have misunderstood the object of Government. The primary intention of the Government was to secure uniformity in the Press Law all over India, and the contingent benefit which might result from Free discussion was quite a secondary consideration.

10. The unexampled tone of your Resolutions, considering that with a few exceptions, they are addressed by servants of the Company to the Government, precludes the hope of your voluntary retirement from the false position you have thought fit to occupy, and compels the Governor to issue such orders as he believes himself competent to issue in this unexpected and unprecedented state of affairs; and to these orders he requires the obedience of all who are in any degree subject to the authority of the Government.

11. The proposers of the two Resolutions for raising a subscription to defray the cost of a building and of a statue or bust to be placed therein, in honor of the Governor, are directed to co-operate with the Right Reverend the Bishop and the Venerable the Archdeacon in the formation of Infant Schools, the foundation of Tract Societies, and the promotion of other Institutions having for their object the advancement of the tenets of the Episcopalean Church, and to obey any orders they may receive from the Bishop.

12. The other gentlemen who have taken part in your proceedings as members of the nominal Committee are relieved entirely from the nominal office which they have assumed, and such of them as are servants of the Company are prohibited from interfering in the affairs of Government by the gratuitous tender of their approbation of measures with which they have nothing to do.

13. With respect to the subscription raised, the Governor has no intention of disturbing any legal rights which may exist, and any gentlemen who are really vested with the trust of such funds individually will continue to act on behalf of those who have empowered them; but the Governor is satisfied that no right of passing laudatory Resolutions and addressing thanks and eulogies to the Government on behalf of the public exists, and that the gentlemen who have taken upon themselves these offices with so much facility and so little authority, may relinquish them with equal ease. He is therefore willing to relieve them from any embarrassments or responsibility on this account, and to arrange on the part of the Government for the annulment of all the proceedings had up to this period, desiring the self-styled Committee and especially those who are servants of the Company to take back the approbation which they have so gratuitously and unbecomingly offered to the Government which they are bound to obey, until an independent expression of opinion shall be authorized by resolutions issued by the Government.

I have the honor to be, Gentlemen, your most obedient servant, (Signed) G. A. WIGBY, Secy. to the Govt.

ON CAPITAL AND ITS DIFFUSION IN INDIA.

LETTER IX.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BOMBAY GAZETTE.

"The greatest misfortune of a country is an indigent tenantry. Whatever be the native advantages of the soil, or even the skill and industry of the occupier, the want of a sufficient capital confines every plan, as well as cripples and weakens every operation of husbandry."—Hume's Essays.

Sir,—I have in a letter which nominally forms no part of the series I am now writing, expressed my opinion on the subject of selling the landed property of Government. I have there given my reasons for desiring to see such a sale made, also a plan for making it; and, with the hope that such a sale will be effected, I proceed with my sub- -ht as well preach political doctrine to ditary slave as plead the elevation of a ... in minor matters, to whom that great, and indeed only foundation for prosperity—independence—is denied.

I will suppose, therefore, that there is no insuperable objection to the adoption of this measure on the part of the rulers of this country; and I will not hesitate to believe that, as soon as the other advantages which I am endeavouring to procure for the landed proprietor shall be conceded to him, there will be no deficiency of purchasers of this description of property. Land will in fact be as much desired as other commodities, when it is made equally profitable, and equally secure; the only object for which I write, is to obtain for it such profit; and such security, accompanied perhaps with a few other benefits, which may serve to turn the scale at once in its favour.

One of these benefits, and that which shall be the subject of my present communication, is, titular honour.

No man who has seen with what avidity the title of Esquire has lately been sought in Bombay, and with what pride it has been cherished, can, for a moment, suppose that the native is that apathetic personage some would wish to prove him. The fact is, that, if we were to search the world over, we should probably find few so covetous of mere formal distinctions.

The civil advantage of forming one of the commission of the Peace is not, even in England, very important, how little therefore but the name can exist of it in this country, where the exercise of the official power is so trammelled? Were even the fullest jurisdiction enjoyed by the native justices, their ignorance of the laws, and even of the customs which they must preserve obedience to, is so great, that they could not probably make any good use of it. The nominal distinction then, is in reality the only prize sought after, and the only boon conferred. But unfortunately in every case this distinction has been confined to the Presidency. Merchants and capitalists, men who have no more interest and no more influence in this country than I have, are the persons who have invariably been chosen as those most especially to be marked by the favour of our Government.

I cannot say that I ever held in much estimation the policy which would transform native merchants into the administrators of English laws; which, in a word, would confer on them the particular title of Justice of the peace; because, I think that it would be hard to show, that a most able and important guardian of our constitutional laws and liberties can, in a moment, be made out of a person most absolutely ignorant of both. The power of those who established the anomaly is undoubtedly very great, but no one will come forward and assert that it extends so far as this.

Such being my sentiments, it is not likely that I should wish to see this grade of honour, so respectable in the well-informed English Squire, so ridiculous in the Parsee or Hindoo trader, introduced into the provinces. It will be time enough to make men administrators of laws when they have become able to understand them: until then, it would perhaps be better to confine so extraordinary a class to the Presidency, where, if they do no good, they perhaps do little harm. But, if I would not recommend the confering this particular honour on the Mofussil landed proprietor, surely, in this age of invention, some other might be discovered, which, while it might give equal distinction to the receiver, would be more suitable to the nature of his position. The grant of any title to the larger landholders would be a boon of the greatest magnitude. It would give to him, which is the thing most wanted, a right to the respect of his neighbours; and it would make him a man of so much importance in his country, that he would be able to secure not only himself, but also his tenantry and friends from any undue influence on the part of the native officers of Government. I might enumerate a thousand good effects which would attend the establishment of such a grade, but they will be obvious to all without my doing so. Indeed that great Indian Politician, Sir John Malcolm, considered the establishment of a somewhat similar class, namely the Sirdar of the Decan, as one of the wisest measures of Indian administration.

If this class be once established, I think that a privilege of the utmost importance may be granted to it. I mean, freedom from arrest for all debts which do not exceed the value of their landed property. In these cases, their property should be considered sufficient security for the payment of the sum, if, upon examination, it should be found to be due. The obligation to register the transfer of estates, in the principal cutchery in the district, would preserve the creditor from any loss; and, to this perhaps it would be as well to add, the necessity of registering mortgages to render them valid, a custom, which I am informed, prevails in Scotland.

It is very far from my desire to make this description of honour a means of eventually ennobling a set of penniless idlers, who may please to live upon their father's reputation, instead of upon the fruits of their own labours. Neither is it my wish to see these distinctions, by conferring influence on persons inimical to our government, turned into weapons to wound, instead of shields to defend us. To prevent, therefore, such consequences, I would not have these honours made hereditary, nor would I wish the privilege of freedom from arrest to be continued to a person, after he had disposed of the estate on account of which it was originally conferred.

The title, the establishment of which I propose, should in fact be of this nature.

1. Landed property within our territories, of a certain value, should be a necessary qualification for the receipt of the distinction.

2. Of such as possess this qualification the Governor-General might, at the recommendation of the local Governor, select such, as from their character and attachment to our interests, appeared deserving, and confer on them the titles.

3. The title should remain with him who has received it, till death.

4. The successor to the estate, whether son or purchaser, should not necessarily succeed to the title, but only be qualified to procure a re-grant of it.

5. In case any titled landholder should either mortgage or become dispossessed of so much of his estate, as to render the remaining portion of less value than that required for the qualification, he should lose the privilege of freedom from arrest for debt.

6. No titled person should in any other case be liable to arrest for a debt of less amount than the value of his qualification.

In this I think are contained all the principles requisite for the establishment of such an order. The person must be qualified in the first instance, both in point of real property, and loyalty; which will make him desirous of distinguishing himself by such property and by loyalty. He will be privileged from arrest as long as he keeps his estate, which will prevent his selling it, unless from necessity: should adversity overtake him, he will, though subject as much as others to the laws, still be respected for what he has been. The co[illegible]he honour for life will prevent his [illegible] to the caprices of those in [illegible]its cessation upon his death will [illegible]ke him be careful to avoid conduct which may prevent its descent to his children. In fine, what I hold to be the most important consideration of all, a certain qualification of landed property being required, the value of land will rise; for many a rich man will be anxious to procure ground, from which he may reap such splendid fruits, but without which he can never possibly obtain them.

In order to prevent that langour in ambitious pursuits, which, while they are improperly directed, is one of the greatest banes, several grades of this species of noblity should be established, the qualifications for which should vary in amount. The largest estates would thus be in request: as in other countries, the wealthy merchant might then aspire to become the privileged noble. Money would be turned in some degree from the channels of trade to those of agriculture, certainly even the farmer would be benefitted by the change, as commerce would be more eagerly engaged in, when it became evident that an early life of activity and enterprise was the surest mode of eventually securing an old age of honour.

LETTER X.

I have constantly said, that my wish is to see more capital expended in agricultural pursuits than either is so employed at present, or ever can be so employed, as long as the present system is upheld with all its defects unaltered. We may talk to our subjects, as much as we please, about the most advantageous way of laying out their money; but, unfortunately for rulers, mankind are apt to prefer their own opinions upon these points; and I doubt whether the eloquence of Demosthenes, joined to the power of an Asiatic despot, could procure a liberal subscription for a scheme which militated against the plain common sense of the monied part of the community.

Considerations, therefore, upon the particular advantages of this, or that particular mode of investing cash are not of any use, as far as influencing private individuals is concerned; these are certainly the best judges of their own pecuniary affairs; and interference on the part of the state in such matters would, at once, overthrow public confidence, in whose wake would speedily follow both public and private credit. Legitimate freedom is essential in most things, but especially so in commerce. The golden stream will neither listen to our invitations, nor to our threats; and any attempt to force it would dry up its current for ever.

The true politician therefore will attempt neither of these methods. He will know that the property of money is to seek those channels where it may find profitable employment, and where the most perfect, the most sacred security is given to it during its ingress, its egress, and its stay. His only efforts, therefore, will be directed to forming such channels, and he will rest assured that, when they are completed, they will not long remain unfilled. Many men who call themselves sagacious statesmen are most deeply imbued with a mania for interfering with mercantile concerns. They take it into their heads, that some pet branch of commerce is undeservedly neglected, and spend their lives in endeavouring to persuade people to engage in a trade which, had it been found a gainful one, would assuredly have needed no man in power to recommend it. The fact is, that men have so peculiar a love for their money, that none can be found patriotic enough to wast it in speculations purely intended for their country's good; and I really cannot see how a nation could be benefitted by the folly of such persons, even did they exist.

But, if it be impossible to woo money to our shores, by either threats or entreaties, there are happily other most infallible methods for accomplishing this important end. These methods are in the power of every government which chooses to employ them: they are a most careful and thorough investigation into every branch of neglected commerce, and the introduction of such alterations and improvements, as may make that a profitable investment for capital, which was formerly not so. If the circulating medium be deficient, let it be artificially increased; if any part of trade stagnates from the excess of capital employed in it, make openings for the superfluity to drain off into some other channels; if it suffers from a deficiency, add such advantages as shall draw to it the quantity necessary to sustain its animation.

There are two grand causes which prevent the rise of commerce to perfection. One of these is some natural obstacle, such as a deficiency of roads and navigable streams, the ignorance of the inhabitants, or their inaptitude for the particular species of trade, an adverse climate, the want of harbours, and many others which will occur to every thinking man. (Perhaps, upon second thoughts, ignorance and inaptitude should not be classed among natural obstacles.) These may, by patience and perseverance, be in a great measure remedied, and there are instances on record of countries seemingly debarred by nature from all chances of commercial success, which have nevertheless raised themselves to great eminence in it.

The other of these grand causes of prevention, and which is certainly by far the most general, is some gross error of the Government, under whose protection the trade is carried on, in the measures adopted relating to it. So generally is this the cause of decay in commerce that were any country in the world pointed out, where there was every natural facility for trade, yet where none was carried on, you might at once, without farther inquiry, set down the mischief to the incapacity of the ruler. Perhaps indolence is as much the promoter of the evil as ignorance; but that is quite foreign to the question, if a man is incapable, it matters little from what cause that incapacity has arisen.

It is a most fortunate feature of the constitution of Britain, that monied men of all classes are to be found in Parliament. The landlord, the fundholder, the merchant and the banker, will there find each a representative of his profession; and therefore, in Britain, few branches of trade have suffered from indolence. Did such an assembly exist in this part of our sovereign's dominions, any remarks upon commerce might be superfluous, as every point of the question would then be publicly mooted. But, to raise such an assembly here, would at present be impracticable and absurd; it consequently becomes the duty of those in power to consider of their own accord questions to which there is no constitutional mode of attracting their attention.

I asserted above that no writing of this description would possibly have any effect upon the conduct of private individuals. Each will pursue what he deems his own interest, without caring much what others may say; and in truth he will do well; for, of each man's concerns, he himself, who is the person most interested in them, is the best judge. I hope, therefore, it will be understood, that in recommending a species of investment for capital, I do not wish to advise individuals to embark their properties. If I had any such notion in my head I should indeed be worthy of ridicule. What I wish to do, is, to point out the manner in which capital may be employed most advantageously for the community in general, hoping that, if its merits be allowed, yet for any reason it be neglected, government will not hesitate to inquire into the cause of that neglect, and make such alterations, as by adding to its attractions, shall ensure due attention being paid to it in future.

In order to shew what species of investment of capital is most beneficial to the state, I shall consecutively consider the several sorts under their proper heads. These I take to be five. First, burying money or hoarding it; second, purchasing into the public funds; third, embarking it in commerce; fourth, engaging in manufactures; fifth, devoting it to agriculture and the purchase of land. I shall not consider shipping under a separate head, because a shipowner is a kind of commercial man: neither shall I place subscriptions to public companies among the methods of investing money, because all companies must be commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural, and so they will be included in what I shall say of these descriptions of investment.

I think these five heads will include all other kinds; but, at any rate, if there be a few which do not come under them, I believe they will be discovered to be such, as are, in a general point of view, hardly worth a thought. It has been said, that if we take care of the pence the pounds will take care of themselves. This may be partly true, and it might certainly not inaptly be applied to political considerations in England. There, commerce is so well represented, there rich and influential individuals receive so much attention, that I have little doubt, they are indeed well able to take care of themselves; while the state of the peasantry, and of the lower orders, agricultural and manufacturing distress, occupy a large share of the attention of the minister. But here, we must recollect, the scene is very different; here the upper classes as well as the lower require our fostering assistance. Kings and princes, the most ancient nobles, and the most wealthy merchants, the owners of thousands of acres, the generals of armies, and the proprietors of fleets are alike at our mercy. If their voices be heard, it is a matter of favour, if their petitions be attended to the measure of our benignity is held to be complete. A single stroke of the pen may consign hundreds of unsuspecting natives to ruin; but can a stroke of the pen again raise to affluence the thousands whom we have destroyed?

A mighty revolution has taken place in this country. Such a century of woe and devastation, of the overturning of thrones, and the annihilation of nobility, as the last proved to India, has seldom, perhaps never, been witnessed in the world. I will not deny that the ruin we occasioned was necessary and that it was at least accomplished with as much humanity as could be allowed to commingle in the task; but still the ruin was not the less complete, and how many bewailed the event!

Now, however, peace has long accompanied our sway; unawed by fears from without, unoccupied by distraction within, we have the leisure and I trust also the desire to re-construct. Materials are in plenty, ready fashioned to our hand, to us it alone remains to put them together. Society must not ever remain disorganized. We must not always keep our patient hovering between life and death. If our efforts to regenerate India have been violent, let us shew at least that regeneration was our object. Let us shew that, if Englishmen have the power to hurl down an unsightly pile, they have also the talent to build another in its stead, which may remain a monument of their wisdom, justice, and integrity to after ages. Let us shew that, in all our proceedings, we had not our own interest, but that of a suffering people, in view: and let it be said by the posterity of that people, that we found their fathers in chains, and gave them freedom;—that we found them in ignorance, and conferred on them knowledge;—that we found them benighted in paganism, and brought them the light of true religion;—that we found them, in short, depraved, poor, cowardly, and contemptible, and that we made them virtuous, wealthy, brave, and illustrious.

LETTER XI.

I told you in my last, that I should consecutively offer to your consideration the five different methods of employing capital, in order that it may be plainly seen which is most useful to the public. All, with the exception of the first, I know must be profitable to the individuals who embrace them: and, with that exception, all are profitable to the state, some in greater degree, some in a less.

I have elsewhere stated, and indeed it is a truism in politics, that whatever is advantageous to the community in general must be advantageous to the sovereign of that community, because their interests are inseparable; but it must not in consequence be supposed, that whatever is beneficial to a few persons in a state is to be equally beneficial to the monarch. Smuggling and treason sometimes bring immense wealth to individuals, while they are diametrically opposed to the welfare of the nation in general, and of the prince in particular.

Having premised so much, I will proceed to investigate the consequences to a people of the first mode of disposing of capital: I mean burying it in the ground, or elsewhere, and subsisting on the principal.

Of all the ways of ruining a state this would be the most effectual, if it could only be carried into execution on a sufficiently large scale. Many kingdoms, aware of the injury which the abstraction of the circulating medium must inflict, have enacted laws to prevent its exportation. I cannot however think this a wise measure, because, in the first place, it may easily be evaded, and consequently a great expense is incurred to no purpose; and in the second, though it might, if perfectly executed, detain in the country the gold at present there, it would certainly greatly lessen the amount of new importations of the precious metal. There is nothing which will so soon rid a country of gold as any violent effort to enforce its stay. All attempts therefore, which have for their object to restrain the metallic tide from ebbing, must be confined to improvements in the state of commerce; for, if you can only raise a commodity which shall find favour in the eyes of other nations, they will soon send their coin in exchange for it.

Burying gold, or hoarding it, has perhaps more effect on internal than on external commerce. External commerce is generally carried on in a great measure by barter, or the exchange of the produce of different parts of the world; but, in internal commerce, barter has, in all civilized nations, been wisely abandoned. Were any method discovered of supplying a circulating medium, which should be universally current, and which should be sufficient for the purpose, both descriptions of trade might possibly be carried on on the same principles; though, the necessity of obtaining a cargo for the return voyage, if possible, would even then be a great obstacle to such an arrangement.

The effect however of burying gold even on external commerce is by no means slight; because, by withdrawing so much capital from the market, what remains necessarily becomes scarce and dear. The merchant is, therefore, from the paucity of cash, unable to purchase from the interior any thing like so large a quantity of produce for exportation as he otherwise would have done, and, owing to its dearness, his purchases must, even if other circumstances were favourable, be much more confined. His profits are nearly absorbed by the interest he pays; and his speculation is attended with extraordinary risk, as even a slight fall in the value of his goods may, all things considered, be ruinous.

This reduction in the export trade will diminish the import in a far greater degree; because, when once foreigners have lost, by bringing to our harbours more goods than we are able to buy, they will not probably, the next time, bring even a sufficient quantity to exchange for all we wish to give them. Thus matters will go on from worse to worse; and it will not be easy to stop them in their downward career. Merchants cannot afford to be always speculating in uncertain markets, and if ours once become such, they will look out for some others where sales are more steady.

But the great blow which hoarding capital gives, is to the internal trade of a kingdom, as also to manufactures and to agriculture. There is not one of these ways of securing a livelihood that does not require capital. Internal commerce cannot advance a step without it. A scarcity of money will begin by lessening its gains, and end by destroying it altogether. As with external trade, with this too, abstraction of coin from circulation will make interest excessive,; and when interest becomes excessive, capital can no longer be employed; for who will engage in business with borrowed cash, when the price he has to pay for it is greater than the profits it procures? Thus, then, we see that hoarding money will destroy that useful and industrious class, who furnish to the indolent capitalist a fair rent for his pecuniary assistance, at the same time that they earn an honest and respectable income for themselves. Persons who trade with their own purses are comparatively few, but these are the only men who can continue to exist under such a state of things.

Manufactures must likewise fall before this method of disposing of gold. The very soul of manufacturing industry is capital, and this, to be productive in this way, must be obtained on easy terms. The outlay, at first, is in this branch of trade so great, and so long a time must necessarily elapse before the returns can be secured, competition likewise is so busy, that whenever the market rate of interest becomes even moderately high, manufactures receive a blow of the severest nature.

If this be the case in countries where manufactures have attained to a great degree of perfection, (as it assuredly is), how much more severe must be the struggle, which, in a country like this, they must maintain against a scarcity of cash. Experience has shewn us what must be the issue of this struggle. Of the wars which long desolated India not the least consequence has been the entire destruction of what few manufactures it possessed. The event could not well have been different. Insecurity naturally caused the precious metals to be hidden, and, when they had disappeared, the main-stay of manufactures had disappeared with them.

If we look at agrioulture, we shall find the case similar, with this slight variation, that, by agriculture, a bare subsistence, at least, may yearly always be obtained. With regard to the payment of rents, sale of produce, &c., I have in former letters shewn what effect the absence of a sufficient capital must have. The working classes also, of every description, must be ruined by such absence, for who can build houses without money, who can make wells, watercourses, or other improvements without money; who can hire a sufficient number of labourers to work his farm properly, unless he has money to pay them?

And now, having stated what the effects of burying gold must be in every country, let us see whether India forms any exception. Is not external commerce struggling on the brink of ruin? Is internal trade in a better state? Do manufactures continue even to form an item in calculations of the wealth of these kingdoms? Is not agriculture reduced so low, that a bare subsistence is all that can be gained by it? Are not the working classes depressed to the lowest point? Are any buildings of consequence raised by private individuals? Are watercourses made? Are wells dug? Are expensive improvements common? Do hired agricultural labourers exist in numbers sufficient to be worthy of much consideration? Or does not rather each seek a separate maintenance on a separate piece of land? You, Sir, and all India know what answer must be given; and is this the country once proverbial for riches? Is this the country which seems peculiarly blest by the prodigal hand of nature?

If you wish to know the reason of all this wretchedness, it is, because men in this part of the world have begun at the wrong end of things; they have left off where they ought to have commenced; in short, they have made money an end whereas it is only a means. Instead of using coin to purchase landed estates, or manufactories, or commercial establishments, they have laboured in all these vocations to procure coin, which they afterwards hoarded, and so, made their wealth a means of injuring those occupations, for the benefit of which wealth is principally advantageous.

What has been the consequence? Every fortune so disposed of has lessened the resources of the country. Every fortune so disposed of gave a blow, instead of assistance to the state. Instead of rejoicing at success so used, the nation should rather have wept at

it. Such prosperity was more destructive than the most extreme adversity: the latter's influence might have been withering for the moment, but the former consumed the very vitals of the realm. It is needless to mention the millions which have probably never been recovered from their secret positions; it is needless talking of the millions those millions would by this time have begotten, had they been employed in a proper manner. The fact of the difficiency of circulating coin is evident to every one; and even if it were not, the miserable state into which trade and manufactures and agriculture are plunged must soon lead men to discover the true, and indeed only adequate cause.

Nevertheless, almost every disease has its remedy, and I am sure this particular one may, with a little trouble, be dispelled. This, however, is not the place in which to treat of the method of cure, as it would occupy too much room. I shall find a better opportunity hereafter. I trust, in saying what I do, I am not to be considered presumptuous. No man can be more worthy of pity than he who pretends to infallibility. For myself I claim no such attribute,—I do not profess to be more knowing than the generality of my fellows; but still, I have perhaps weighed this matter more than many, and in consequence, I believe I have observed some things which may have escaped their attention. Entertaining these opinions I commit my remarks to paper; for, if it be a correct one, they may not be wholly useless. This consideration alone is sufficient for me: I may want the power to serve the cause which is dearest to my heart, but at least, I have the proud satisfaction of possessing the will to do so.

LETTER XII.

Having discussed the first head, namely, burying capital, I will proceed to the second, or that of the Public Funds. This is so ample a subject that to treat it fully would require a work of itself, but, I believe I shall be able to put every thing regarding it, that is necessary to be mentioned here, into a very small space.

In order to comprehend the subject clearly, or rather as clearly as so short a sketch will admit of our doing, it ought to be viewed in three distinct ways In the first, we should consider the nature of the Public Funds in the abstract, in the second we should examine into the effects of the burthens which the necessity of paying interest on loans must impose upon the people; in the third, we must see in what manner those loans must be expended in order to be profitable or prejudicial to the state which contracts them. I will proceed to speak in as few words as possible my sentiments on all these points.

And first, of the nature of the Funds considered in the abstract. As increasing to a great extent the circulating medium, and bringing into active employment the gold which might possibly have been hoarded, had not this method of investment offered itself, these Funds are above all praise. Another great advantage of them is, that both the cash which is paid into the Treasury, and the Government acknowledgment for that cash, equally possess the properties of money. Thus, where a loan is opened to the amount of a million, that sum is virtually added to the pecuniary capital of the really expert financier; to understand this matter thoroughly, and perhaps, the opportune increase and diminution of fictitious money, is one of the nicest operations of banking. If the coin which is received by the appointed officer were thrown into cellars as soon as obtained, the currency would still not be diminished, because, in times of security, the paper note is as valuable as the golden token; but, as it is in fact expended nearly as soon as acquired, the token still remains in circulation with the addition of the note.

It is well known that nothing is more common than for agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial men to procure, at pleasure, money in exchange for Government acknowledgements, or as a loan on a deposit of them. Such acknowledgments, are, therefore, in reality equivalent to sums of actual coin, and are generally preferred to a heap of pieces of their nominal amount, because more portable, and less liable to be lost by robbery or fraud. They are the best species of wealth, for, the possession of them does not at all diminish the circulation of the precious metals, and yet, they have themselves all the good qualities of those metals; they are, in short, not gold, but may in a moment be converted into it; they are the best kind of paper credit, and without paper credit of some description, commerce cannot possibly be carried on on a large scale.

The great use of paper credit is to represent property, which the man who issues the bills is known or believed to possess, but which cannot, without great loss or inconvenience, be turned into cash at the particular moment and at the particular place at which cash is wanted. If no such credit existed, the merchant would be obliged to lodge in every town where he has an establishment, large supplies of gold, the abstraction of which from circulation would be a serious injury to the world, and the keeping of which unemployed would occasion great loss to himself. Paper credit does away with such necessity; and national stock Paper being the safest, the most universally current, and the most convertible of all paper into money, besides bringing in a considerable amount of interest to the holder, is of course invaluable to trading kingdoms. One thing, however, must perpetually be borne in mind: the Funds must always be the handmaid of commerce, not the mistress; if once her charms prove so attractive as to seduce the followers of more productive methods of employing capital, the state will be ruined. To an excessive mania for paper wealth, in perference to the advantages to be gained by honest and honorable industry, may be ascribed the beggary which overtook the French after the bursting of Law's Bubble, and that which pressed upon the English at the time of the South sea scheme in the early part of the last century, and also later in 1825. The evils at those periods were not, that much paper proved to be valueless, but that every branch of productive industry had been either partially or totally deserted to procure this paper. But while the helm is held by wise statesmen, we may confidently hope that the vessel will be steered clear alike of the Scylla which would crush all paper property, and of the Charybdis which would engulph all other possessions in this.

The second point to be examined is the burthen which must be imposed upon the people, in order to pay the interest of loans contracted. There is only one remark to be made upon this part of the subject; whatever else relates to it will be included in what I shall say about the expenditure of the public money. This remark is, that exorbitant interest, or that demanded in consequence of the apparent necessities of the state above the ordinary market rate, must be very injurious. It however unfortunately happens that Governments seldom require large loans except in time of war, and then, the obligation to obtain them is so absolute, that they must be had upon any terms. It would be requisite in order to enquire into the possiblity of discovering any remedy for this, to enter into the consideration of many more details than I have any intention of speaking of. The most obvious plan is to borrow as early as possible, as that of course will prove a cheaper plan than to wait till the last moment.

The third point,—and indeed that by which the whole fabric must stand or fall, is what has generally been attended to the least: namely, the manner in which the Public Treasure is expended. To raise money seems to have been too often considered the main accomplishment required in him who is placed over the finances of a nation, but to spend it properly is by far the most important art in every way. If money fairly raised be properly used, the resources of the country will be increased instead of diminished, but if it be wantonly squandered, they will most certainly in time be destroyed. The great error of the economists of the present day appears to be this; they object to raising any money at all, and wish to reduce taxation and expenditure to the lowest point: but this is a very mistaken mode of enriching a state. It is not of much consequence how much money is raised, but it is of the utmost consequence how that money is expended. The first question which a financier should ask himself, before he proposes a new loan, is similar to that which a banker would ask himself before accepting a new deposit; it is this, can the money intended to be so obtained be employed in such a manner, that the advantages derived from the use of it will more than counterbalance the interest to be paid for it, in other words, can it be beneficially employed? If he can lay his hand upon his heart and answer in the affirmative, he needs not be at all afraid to use his utmost exertions in favour of the measure; should he imagine that a negative must be given, he ought at once to drop all thought of proceeding with it.

I shall now state a rule by which it may at any time be easily seen whether the public money be expended in a beneficial or injurious manner. I hold the public estate to resemble very nearly a private one in the matter of loans. Nothing can be of more service to a private estate than borrowing money upon mortgage of a portion of its revenues, if the interest be moderate, and the cash be laid out wisely, and bonâ fide upon the state itself,—neither can any thing be more advantageous to the public than acting in the same manner. Let us see what are wise methods of using money, borrowed on the security of private property, and we shall find similar modes to be legitimate with regard to public treasure.

There are five reasons for which money may be prudently raised on mortgage, and I believe only five. First, to make such buildings and improvements as may be so profitable, as to repay within a moderate time the capital laid out on them; improvements barely ornamental can never justify a man's encumbering his grounds: second, to make such additions to the property by new purchases, as may cause the whole to be more secure and more valuable, at the same time that the additions are such, as will in time redeem the purchase money: third, to prevent the owner's being necessitated to sell land or produce at a loss, when a temporary pecuniary accommodation will enable him to keep it till he shall obtain better terms: fourth, to make such advances to his tenants in times of extreme distress as may support their credit, and enable them to keep the land in a state of cultivation: the fifth and last is, to preserve ones-self from utter ruin, which an uncontested law suit commenced by a vexatious adversary might entail; or indeed, in any other case of great necessity, where, through hesitation to sacrifice a part, a person may risk the loss of the whole. There are many other reasons which appear to some sufficiently valid, but an estate will soon go to the hammer if they be allowed. I speak of mortgage, not sales; a man may have fifty good reasons for selling an estate, and indeed that is the best mode of raising money by it, unless in the five cases above specified. In short, unless absolute necessity, which obeys no law, requires it no money ought to be raised but such as can be profitably expended, and by increased rents, will more than be replaced eventually.

The Public Property is of a similar nature, and I shall make the application of these rules regarding private estates in my next letter.

LETTER XIII.

The first legitimate reason for raising money on mortgage of private estates is to make such buildings and improvements, as may be so profitable as to repay, within a moderate time, the capital laid out on them; but, the desire of effecting improvement barely ornamental, can never justify a man's encumbering his grounds. Nothing can be more just than the application of this first rule to the public revenues.

I think it may confidently be asserted, that, until within these few years, this method of applying the treasure of the state has been wholly neglected in India; and even now, the roads and bridges which have been made, are mostly in such positions, as to prove that the convenience of Governors has been consulted more than the welfare of the people in their construction. But, if such mode of expenditure has not hitherto been adopted, there is reason to hope that a more enlightened policy will in future be pursued, a policy, which, if it cause a trifling increase in the demands on the state in the first instance, will eventually place ample means at its disposal for the repayment of them.

To any person who reflects upon the subject it must appear most astonishing, that while the rulers of this country have tenaciously clung to their rights as landed proprietors, and have ever held the increase of the land-tax to be of the first importance, and its occasional decrease to be sufficient to call forth their most anxious fears,—who have considered that branch of their Revenue as their most splendid acquisition in times of prosperity, and as their destined anchor whenever adversity shall overtake them,—it is most astonishing I say, that men, who have esteemed this tax to be of so vital importance, should yet have neglected the most ordinary, and most obvious ways, to make it more productive and more secure.

There are three stages to be passed before wealth can be acquired from land. The first is a mere possession of the soil, which will no more bring a man income than will the parchment on which the title-deeds are written; the second is the mere cultivation, which is only good to preserve the actual existence of the persons engaged in it: the third is the sale of the superfluous produce, and this indeed is a mine, which if properly managed, will prove richer than one of the purest gold. It is very evident that whatever money is gained by agriculture can only be gained by the sale of the excess of produce which each man raises over that required for his own consumption. The grand business then of the landed proprietor is to procure a good market for his crop, and also every facility for approaching that market. In these advantages lies the whole difference in the relative value of estates which are equal in point of richness and extent. Thus, if the grounds of A be ten miles nearer the market town than those of B, A's estate will be worth more than B's; but if there be a rail-road or canal connecting B's with the market town, his will then be the more valuable property, as the facility of communication, and cheapness of carriage will more than compensate for the loss sustained by distance. This, then, is the most important truth to be attended to by proprietors, take such measures, as shall make the superfluous produce sell for the largest possible sum; what these measures are I have pointed out. It is all very well for superficial observers to talk of the prosperity of a country, because they see large crops overspreading the fields; but believe me, Sir, the best way to learn the true state of things is to ask what price those crops have obtained: the owner of one quarter of wheat, in a besieged city, will probably be a richer man than the possessor of ten, in the open country.

If we wish to make our dominions valuable, we must certainly expend some capital in improving the means of communication. I do not mean to say that we are to throw away money on roads which are so situated as never to be able to repay us; I do not mean that, for the sake of lessening the time taken by the post in travelling from one end of India to the other, millions are to be squandered. When these kingdoms shall have become so wealthy as to furnish any excess of Revenue, such propositions may be entertained; until then, we may as well remain content to wait for the news a day or two longer than might be desirable. The roads which should be made are principally what in England are termed cross roads, in other words roads from one part of a province to another; these to the agricultural classes are invaluable, whatever may be thought of them by the luxurious inhabitants of cities. Perhaps the most judicious plan for the superintendence of this branch of expenditure, would be to form a committee at the Presidency, to whom reports on the state of the roads, bridges, &c., in each collectorate might be forwarded by the civil officer in charge, assisted if necessary, by an engineer officer from the nearest station.

The general introduction of tolls into India has been much deprecated by some, and no doubt, the measure should be well weighed before it be adopted. But, if the finances will not bear the devotion of sufficiently large sums to the purposes I have mentioned, it must be evident to every one that they should be imposed, rather than that the country should be left altogether without amelioration. The Kandallah Ghaut is an instance, where a toll is not objected to by the public and where the road which occasioned it has proved of the utmost benefit both to the people and to the Government. I am well aware that our native subjects, are ill able to bear additional pecuniary burthens, and therefore, the levying any tax, which has a tendency still more to impoverish them, should be most scrupulously avoided; but, where the payment of a trifling impost would save them in each journey they performed, fifty times its amount in cart-hire, it must be a very false economy that would forbid its introduction.

But it is not so much of tolls that it is my present province to speak, as of the expenditure of the ordinary public money. If ever we wish to see this country rescued from its present miserable condition, a large portion of such money must be devoted to public improvements. If they be only judicious ones it would be better to borrow money to carry them into execution, than to relinquish all idea of so doing. There cannot possibly be a more legitimate object for which to raise a loan, for the revenues which might be mortgaged for the payment of it would soon be almost doubled.

Roads and bridges also, though the more obvious requisites to produce prosperity, are not the only ones. In a region where so much irrigation is necessary, to extract from the earth all that it is capable of yielding, and where capital laid out in establishing the means of such irrigation, always returns usurious interest, wells and water courses deserve much attention. Neither should inclosures be neglected, but these details belong more to the subject of farming, than to that on which I am at present writing. What the particular improvements may be, on which it would be most advantageous to expend a limited sum, the professed agriculturist must determine; but, that capital to a considerable extent should be appropriated to improvements in general, I have no hesitation in declaring.

Improvements purely ornamental, I believe, can never justify the mortgage of Revenue. The only advantage derived from such expenditure is the assistance it gives to the labouring classes; but this must be counterbalanced by the interest which must be paid, even by those very labourers, for the money borrowed. It is however a matter of notoriety that many public works have been carried on professedly with a view only of assisting these classes.

There are many persons who think that all expenditure of capital ought to be made by individuals; they urge that, if any undertaking appeared of paramount importance to the people, they would themselves voluntarily engage in it. But however plausible this argument may appear, little value ought to be attached to it. Even in England, how necessary are corporations to carry into effect any important scheme? But of what use would be a corporation of paupers, in this country? and where are the men of large landed estates, whose names would furnish security to subscribers of a better class, that their money would be honestly applied to the purpose proposed?

The fact is, we must not view India and England in the same light, because they are in almost every respect essentially different. In England, the great mass of landed property is in the hands of subjects; they are therefore able to do what they please with the soil which is their own. The whole rents go into their pockets, and therefore, as to them, the profits of all capital expended on their ground must accrue; to their option it is wisely left to lay out capital in that manner or not. But here, whatever may be alleged to the contrary, the Government, if not rightfully the nominal owner of the land, certainly possess all the substantial advantages of ownership. It is therefore if possible more to its own interest than to that of the tenantry, to devote a portion of its wealth for increasing the rents derived from cultivation. In short, the interests of the Government and of the ryuts here are respectively similar to those of the landed proprietor and his tenant in England.

I would, before concluding this letter, beg that this matter may be well considered by those in power. Every description of reason has been assigned as the cause of the impossibility of consulting in this part of the world at once the good of the finances, and the happiness of the cultivator. The names of many who have written on the subject, are names which carry the greatest weight with them, but I humbly trust, for the sake of humanity, that I am correct in supposing them to have been mistaken. Their error seems to have been a desire to grasp all, and to expend nothing; but there never was, there never will be. a spot of earth, from the largest empire to the smallest paddock, which could possibly thrive under such a method of treatment. A diamond mine will yield nothing, unless capital be first employed upon it, and how can land be expected to do otherwise? Even a great part of the revenue at present derived from the soil, is merely the return produced by the capital which has been devoted to it in former days. We reap the fruits of old wells, watercourses, and roads, but we too much neglect to make new ones; unless however some portion of the public cash be applied to these most legitimate purposes we shall learn eventually, to our cost, what I suspect we have began to dicover already, that a country without capital is like land without manure, which, instead of annually becoming more productive, will daily decrease in worth, and must even continue to do so until it shall return to its original condition of a barren waste, too much exhausted to yield to ordinary, and too sterile to repay the cost of expensive cultivation.

LETTER XIV.

The second justifiable ground for mortgaging either private or public revenue is to make such additions to property or territory as may give the whole more security, at the same time, that the additions are so valuable as eventually to redeem the purchase money.

The mode of acquiring private estates is simple enough, but the usual method of obtaining territorial acquisitions is by war: negotiation can scarcely be considered an exception, as all diplomatic proceedings must be based upon the position previously secured by force of arms. All military charges ought therefore to be considered as the purchase money of conquests, or as deductions from their profits. The expenditure then of public treasure occasioned by aggressive war is the point to which I shall principally attend in this communication.

But first, it would be perhaps proper to observe that I by no means pretend to advocate the systematic sacrifice of human life, whenever profit may be obtained by it. The justice of so awful an appeal must be judged by moral principles; but, with these, when considering war merely as a financial measure, we can have nothing to do. Our present business is less with consciences than with purses. Narrow, however, as this method of viewing the subject may appear, it is not without its uses. Financial knowledge is not less necessary than ethical. It is perhaps to a statesman, if possible, more advantageous; as a proper attention to increase the wealth of a country is more requisite than are efforts to better its morals. National wealth, in fact, whatever may be said to the contrary, is itself the best evidence of national morality; for, however individuals may profit by vice, general wealth can only be acquired and retained by a general observance of good faith and honesty. Riches are considered by many as the seed of the evil; but that seed could never grow up in rank luxuriance, unless a ground of poverty existed on which to sow it. Those who pander to the vicious appetites of the wealthy are ever to be found among those whom want, rather than their will, induces to degrade themselves to base occupations. How many millions are there in the world whom the loss of a thousand pounds would drive into the paths of crime, how many millions are there whom the gift of that sum would enable once more to tread the ways of virtue!

But both the species of science which I have mentioned are of the utmost consequence; because, the certainty of gain will never justify the breach of morality, neither will the purest moral justification be held a sufficient reason, by a prudent man, for engaging in an undertaking, if the destruction of his property must be the inevitable consequence of his so doing.

Aggressive war is a war considered advisable not absolutely necessary; for such absolute necessity would at once stamp it as defensive, whichever party struck the first blow. It is a war, in fact, solely undertaken for the sake of conquest, though a more plausible reason is seldom wanting, with which to amuse the world. A war of this nature should never be engaged in unless it be pretty certain that it will prove profitable in a pecuniary point of view; and to be so possessions must be conquered more than sufficient themselves to repay the expenses, or so valuable as to form an ample guarantee for their payment by the unsuccessful party. It has been alleged by many eminent men that war can never possibly have so fortunate a termination as this; and certainly, with regard to civilized Europe, the opinion is pretty correct. There, the conqueror will have reason to plume himself upon his good fortune if he even secure a bare indemnification; for there, the system universally upheld forbids, in general, any large territorial aggrandizement. In this country, however, the case is different, and there are few instances on record of wars undertaken by the East India Company, in which they did not add considerably more to their pecuniary resources than sufficient to answer all demands occasioned by the cost of conquest. Their conquests then generally have been in accordance with sound financial policy; and I think any one who peruses the history of their proceedings will confess that it is rather to these succesive additions to their lands, than to any other measure, that their continued prosperity must be attributed. It now however appears that all ideas of future conquest are to be abandoned. Such self-restraint is doubtless most honourable to the more powerful party; but the effect of it will be, that much greater attention must be paid to internal improvement than has hitherto appeared requisite. The company will learn that the sequestration of the revenues of foreign princes is a shorter, if less noble road to riches, than the improvement of its own resources. I would not be thought to speak slightingly of their resolution. Whatever other good cause they might have had for engaging in former wars, pecuniary advantages attended most of them, and if they choose to give up the prospect of similar advantages in future, they have doubtless such reasons for their conduct as far outweigh all paltry considerations of pelf, and will establish their reputation as the most humane, as they have long enjoyed that of being one of the most able public bodies in the world.

There have been always three drawbacks in the financial benefits to the state of even the most successful aggressive war in India. The first is, that there is rather a scarcity of population: human life must consequently be much more valuable here than where it is more abundant. The second is, that a great part of the money paid on account of each campaign must be sent to Europe, instead of being laid out among our native subjects; a method of disbursement which would give a great temporary activity to trade, and afford them an opportunity of making those large fortunes, which are not often acquired except in war time. Stores of nearly every description, clothing, and even a portion of the food for the European Regiments, were brought from Europe. The outlay on these accounts must have been immense, and England, not India, profited by it. Whenever the remittances were made in native produce, the loss was perhaps not great, but whenever bullion or specie were shipped, the public here must have suffered severely. This is a matter which requires the deepest attention; but it is most difficult to reconcile the present interests of the two countries on this point: then eventual interests are indeed identical, as any increase of wealth in India must bring a proportionate increase of its demands for British manufactures. But nations will seldom forego small present advantages to secure even the most ample future ones. To do so is like planting an oak, by which our successors only are likely to be enriched; but unless we sacrifice some little for the sake of posterity, our own children as well as those of other men will suffer. We ought to moderate our desires, and, content with what we possess, encourage as much as possible the Indian manufacture of every thing connected with our army. The natives pay its expenses, and it is but fair that their contributions should return into their own pockets. If we really were in earnest in our endeavours to effect this, I cannot believe that we should find the obstacles insuperable. A slight inferiority in the articles at first would be fully compensated for by the good which the sale of them would produce, even a little additional cost ought not to deter us from so benevolent a course. The efflux of the precious metals is daily lamented, but the adoption of such measures as this would greatly check it.

The third drawback is the enormous evil, which must be occasioned by the taking away from more productive occupations, so large a number of men, carts, and cattle as usually follow in the train of an Asiatic army. Even the consumption of produce at an exorbitant price, benefits but slightly the landed interest as the crops have probably been disposed of long previously to the bunya, who is the only gainer. The followers are often well paid, certainly, but as many of them have with their cattle neglected their accustomed cultivation, none of the money they receive will go into the treasury of the state.

Where the land is not, as it is in India, the principal source of existence to the people, and of revenue to the sovereign, the temporary withdrawal from the occupation of it by considerable portion of the tenantry, will not be of much permanent consequence, but where the system is such as prevails here, it will be a serious injury to the community, and one that will be long felt. The demoralization also, and licentious habits engendered by war, can be considered as no trifling impediments to the future realization of the taxes.

In fine, though there will generally be a preponderance of good reasons against war, yet, should they even be ever so much in favour of it, in any particular instance, one state should never voluntarily attack another, if it be evident that it will suffer a pecuniary loss by so doing; and it would be much better that there were no public funds at all, than that they should be wasted in such imprudent aggression. Such ill advised expenditure, instead of enriching a country, will impoverish it, and when the time for repayment arrives, it will find itself more unable to liquidate the loan than it was even at the time when it contracted it. The end it is not difficult to foresee, that end can only be national bankruptcy, and private ruin.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

FOUNDLING.

No. XLVII.

PRESENT STATE AND FUTURE PROSPECTS OF OUDE.

The state of this kingdom has during the last two years excited considerable interest, and produced no small portion of discussion in the public prints. Like most others, it has had its day, and given way to succeeding topics of temporary interest, and possibly might have been altogether forgotten for the time being, had not the attention of the public been again drawn to the subject by the recent instructions of the Court of Directors, empowering the local government boldly to throw off the mask, dethrone the King of Oude, and annex his dominions to those of the East India Company. The motives of the Court in issuing such orders are obvious enough—again, situated as Oude is, locally, the taking possession of it would not require us to augment our military force, whereas it is anticipated, that after defraying the expenses of its civil administration, a considerable surplus would remain for the benefit of the Company: besides which, its acquisition would render our territories more compact. Sometime ago an exchange was effected between the Saugor territories and Scindia of several small tracts of land,* to the great benefit, considering the locality, of both government and the people. The Court of Directors strongly disapproved of this: yet they sanction the seizure of Oude in the face of existing treaties—why? They gained nothing by the former—they hope to gain considerably by the latter.

The above instructions were received in India just before Lord Bentinck resigned the reins of government. Instead, however, of carrying them into effect, his Lordship sent home a remonstrance. It is not so easy to divine, precisely Lord William's motives, for so doing; in all probability, however, they were of a mixed nature. In the first place he had sufficient experience and discernment to perceive, that the misgovernment so generally attributed to the native states had been considerably exaggerated, while on the other hand, that the advantages derived by the people under the dominion of the British government were not quite so great as national vanity and prejudice had led us to imagine. His frequent travels into the interior of the country had, probably, led him to this conclusion, and prevented him from being led away by the popular clamour. Among the deficiencies of Lord William's character, want of observation or intelligence, are by no means included; all that is to be lamented is, that with natural abilities for acquiring information and such ample opportunities for receiving it, so little benefit has resulted either to the country or the people. For any improvement in the state of either which has hitherto appeared, Lord William might just as well have remained in Calcutta for his only really beneficial measure, that of facilitating the administration of justice, and throwing open situations of honour and trust to the natives and East Indians, was resolved upon very shortly after he assumed the government. Indeed, the measure had so long been recommended, and advocated by so many well-informed and influential men, that it would probably have been adopted when it was, whoever might have been the existing Governor: at any rate it could not have been long delayed. A second reason probably may have been, that Lord William's immediate departure was at hand, and that another would have had the glory of displaying the balance sheet, showing the increase of revenue, which the seizure of Oude is expected to produce. Had the order been received a few years before, it is probable the result would have been very different.

Whatever may have been the motives which prompted the above line of conduct, the appropriation of the territories of Oude have been postponed for at least a year; and I propose in the mean time to take a view of the state of that kingdom. We have heard so much of the anarchy and misrule prevalent in Oude, that it appears a sort of heresy to hint the contrary. We are something like the Turk who had all his life so firmly believed that the sun moved round the earth, that to adopt a different idea was like the attempt to acquire a new sense which his mind had not room to entertain. Nevertheless I do not fear contradiction to the statement I am about to make from any unprejudiced and impartial observer who will visit the country and take the trouble to see and judge for himself.

First. The uncultivated state of the country is one of the common assertions. Now in the first place, the rent demanded from the people is much less than in our own provinces: they are consequently not only much better off in the number of their flocks and herds, quality of their food, clothes, and other necessaries of life, but are not, as is the case in our provinces, compelled to cultivate every spot of ground which can possibly be made to yield a return, where, while the people are obliged to work much harder than the Oude peasants, they must be content with a bare subsistence. It may here be remarked that the mere extent of cultivation in a country, unconnected with other circumstances, is by no means a criterion of the prosperity of the agricultural class: it was not unfrequent in the West Indies, that those estates were the best cultivated and yielded the greatest return whose slaves were in the most miserable state. The simple fact is that in Oude the peasants retain so large a share of the profits of their labour, that they are not necessitated to cultivate other than the good soils, while the waste yields them brushwood for fuel and grazing for their cattle. With regard to the following parts of the country, I can speak positively, for I am myself acquainted with some and within the last few months friends upon whose testimony I can rely, have visited them. From Lucknow to Seetapoor is well cultivated; from Lucknow viâ Sandee, and from thence branching off either to Shahjehanpoor or Furrukabad, was a perfect sheet of wheat and barley the whole way, while groves or rather forests of mangoes and other fruit trees are so numerous that in many parts of the road they actually bound the horizon in every direction. The same observation will apply to the roads between Lucknow and Futtehpoor; and Lucknow and Benares. Between Lucknow and Cawnpoor there are large parts of waste land, and certainly to the eye of an unobservant traveller there is little but a barren waste: the truth is the land is not worth cultivating; yet even here industry is busy wherever a return may be expected. In the march from Onnao to Rehmutgunj, on the north of the road, and at no great distance from it, are a number of large shallow tanks of which advantage is taken for irrigation, as far as the water will flow, as the traveller finds to his annoyance, from the great number of large artificial water-courses (upwards of twenty in one stage) which cross the road. Numerous groves of mangoes also were observed: in a distance of about a hundred and thirty miles, not less than sixteen of considerable extent were counted close to the road, which had been planted either this year or the last; besides others from three years growth upwards: most of them were surrounded by a bank or ditch; and one or two had wells lined with masonry. This does not look like insecurity of property or proverty; for the mangoe in that part of the country does not yield any tolerable return until fifteen years. Plantations of betel vine are also to be seen; and one was just completed near Sooltangunj on an artificial mound of earth the raising of which must have cost two or three hundred rupees.

The Police is at least as efficient as our own, and it receives considerable assistance from the landholders. Crimes such as gang robbery and affrays are certainly not more numerous than in our own territories. Burglaries and small thefts are less so. The tranquility of Lucknow itself is remarkable; few people carry arms; and affrays, thefts, and quarrels are far less frequent in proportion to its size than in the average of large towns in the British provinces. In the interior, at least along the high roads, there are Police stations and guard houses at a distance of a few miles from each other who keep up a good patrol. The Police in Oude are allowed to interfere in many petty matters to the great benefit of those concerned. If a traveller refuse to pay a shopkeeper a few pence for the food for his horse; if a cow strays into a field and eats a few pennyworth's of corn, the sufferers are not denied redress unless they submit to the loss and inconvenience of travelling perhaps from ten to a hundred miles, and wasting three or four weeks in attendance on a Court of Justice, to say nothing of legal expenses and exactions. In Oude, these and other trifling matters are settled at once by the local authority; whereas under our system, the Police are prevented from interfering; so that in practice, all these minor abuses are virtually sanctioned or at least tolerated; and as a natural consequence, they are far more numerous in the British provinces than in Oude. Indeed if the fashion which has lately obtained among our Magistrates of taking it for granted that the Police always abuse their authority, and if the restrictions which are now imposed upon them be much further extended, it would be much better to abolish the Police altogether, and leave the people to make their own arrangements, and enact their own rules on this head.

Civil justice is intrusted to the Chuklidars or Aumils (Governors of Provinces) who also are vested with the criminal jurisdiction; and the assessment and collection of Revenue; as in our non-regulation provinces, the same individual is Judge, Magistrate, and Collector. Doubtless instances of partiality in favor of individuals is sometimes shewn, but it is very doubtful whether this is more frequently the case than in the British provinces. The difference is that, there the Aumil, being a native of the country, has greater temptations to oblige his relatives and friends than the English functionary, who is a foreigner: individually, the amount of partiality practised by the latter is infinitely less than by the Oude Aumil; but when we consider the roguery, chicanery, and intrigue which is carried on by the native officers of our offices, it being a part of our system to give such inadequate salaries to the majority of the situations that no honest man would accept them, the difficulty the foreign Judge labours under in acquiring sufficient knowledge to enable him to counteract this, and the pressure of business which devolved on him, I have no hesitation in saying that previous to the reformation of the civil administration corrupt influence had greater effect in our Courts than in those of Oude; that this observation will still hold good regarding many of our Civil Courts; and that if the present system of making Judges of all the inefficient Revenue officers, be carried much further, the state of things will be as bad as ever.

In Lucknow, and some others of the large towns, regular civil judges are appointed on respectable salaries. In some cases as much as a thousand rupees a month: of which one fourth is the perquisite of the prime minister, and the remainder bonâ fide paid to the indidual. With respect to corrupt influence and partiality, the foregoing remarks are pretty applicable here. Probably these evil principles have greater effect in the city of Lucknow itself, as being the residence of a host of profligate courtiers, than in the interior. Delay in the decision of suits, either by the Aumils or the Judges, is less than in our own Courts (taking the average of able and inefficient Judges) even on the improved system.

But in Oude, the people have one great resource of which they have been deprived in a great degree in our territories. Not having been cursed with "first-rate collectors," who would ruin a district to procure a good name and promotion for themselves; or with ryut-war systems by which almost all the midling and upper ranks of society have been reduced to poverty to encrease the Government rent roll, there is still in Oude a pretty numerous middle class of landholders, to whom the people look up with hereditary respect, and who are of the greatest use in settling claims and disputes: so that but a small portion are ever referred to the Aumils. In the towns also, the merchants are very much in the habit of resorting to arbitration.

The observations on the subject of corrupt influence and partiality are equally applicable to the administration of criminal justice. In theory, the British Government and English Magistrates do not tolerate any thing of the kind; but owing to our system in the appointment of the subordinate native officials, who too often enjoy all the subordinate authority, while the Magistrate is a mere cypher, the evil exists fully as much in our provinces as in Oude.

Still, it will be urged that the constant insurrections proclaim an oppressed people; and that the Government officers in Oude cannot collect the revenue without an armed force. They certainly have occasionally a rough mode of managing matters in Oude; nor do they carry on their business in the systematic manner in which ours is conducted. Moreover, every thing there is magnified and commented on as if nothing of the sort ever occurred in the British dominions. It may, however, well be doubted whether disturbances which merit the name of positive insurrections are much more frequent in the king of Oude's dominions than in our own; the difference chiefly lies in the different terms we employ to designate them—what we call "insurrections" there, would on our own side the river be denominated "petty disturbances." Within the last ten years we have seen a very serious insurrection in the Saharunpoor district; more than one of some consequence in the Dehli division; a minor one respectively in Meerut and Moradabad, another of greater importance within twenty miles of Calcutta, all of which were only prevented from becoming very serious by strong bodies of well disciplined troops being close at hand; to say nothing of that of the Coles on the south western frontier, which owing to the scarcity of troops in that direction raged for more than two years, and which was not suppressed until about five thousand square miles of territory were laid waste. With the exception of one, that near Calcutta, the whole of these were the result of misgovernment, and the consequent tyranny and extortion on the part of the officers of the Courts and the Police. Can such a list be compiled from the hist[illegible] of Oude during the same period? It is amusing to see the different causes which we assign for an insurrection in Oude, and in the British provinces. The former is, as a matter of course, attributed to oppression and misgovernment; the papers teem with phillipics, and loud calls are made on our Government to bestow the blessings of their rule on the poor suffering people of Oude. In the latter—villany of some class of natives; instigations of the evil-disposed, and others of a similar nature are given in explanation.

With regard to the necessity of an armed force to collect the revenue; if men were not blinded by vanity and prejudice, they would perceive that this does not prove that people are taxed to the utmost; but that in reality they are much more lightly taxed than our own subjects: for the simple reason that the Oude Government has not at its command the overwhelming military force to support extortion which we possess. The people find their account in resistance, as it enables them to pay less and keep more for themselves. When we first acquired possession of the western provinces, resistance to the payment of the revenue was frequently offered. The people, however, found by experience that a military force was always at hand which it was impossible to resist; that it was immediately called into action, and the severe punishment of forfeiture of the estate of the insubordinate was almost immediately enforced. In Oude, the very reverse is the fact. The very weakness of the King's Government, as regards military force, is one reason why exaction cannot be pushed to the same extent that it is in our own provinces. Besides the real truth is, that in many cases, the resistance is merely nominal "for the honor of the thing" as described in No. 16. of these papers: while so much more lenient is the Lucknow administration than our own, that the punishment inflicted rarely exceeds a moderate fine. Those too, who have heard so much of the story hordes of rebellious zemindars (landholders) will be surprised to hear how few forts really exist in Oude. In Kyrabad, and some of the wild jungly districts, they may perhaps be pretty numerous, but in other parts of the country it is quite the reverse. On the whole length of the fine roads above mentioned, which traverse well peopled districts, there are not ten forts visible to a traveller from the roads. In one line of more than a hundred and thirty miles, only one is to be seen.

Another proof constantly adduced of the misgovernment of Oude is that men of low birth are raised to offices of rank and importance. That such an objection should proceed from Englishmen is extraordinary, when we consider that in our own country this very circumstance is one in which we pride ourselves. It is quite the boast of an Englishman that he is free from that prejudice which imposes such severe trammels on other nations; that real talent, however lowly its origin, is sure to make its way to eminence; and that a butcher's son may be Lord Chancellor. The objection, too, comes with a peculiarly bad grace from the English who are employed in India, nor would it gain much, were it to be placed on the higher grounds that men without talent or qualifications were raised to high situations.

For a considerable time after India came into the possession of the East India Company, the members of its service were composed of men of low birth and little education, to say nothing of broken down gentlemen and men who from some misconduct or other had found it convenient to absent themselves from England. Not many years since, any one could command a writership by paying a certain sum of money, while many a tradesman's bill has been paid by the appointment of his son or nephew to a cadetship. In the present days undoubtedly the service is, generally speaking, composed of men who are by birth and education in the rank of gentlemen; but has merit or talent any thing to do with the selection of those who are annually sent to be "provided for" in India, either by the cholera or good appointments? And even after their arrival here the nature of an exclusive and routine service has, together with interest, so much sway, that merit has with few exceptions nothing to do with their subsequent and progressive promotion. I could mention a quondam member of Council whose talents and qualifications were about on a par with those of an inferior Clerk in a merchants counting house; notwithstanding Lord William's merit-fostering scheme and all his espionage to boot, there are several men now holding the situations of Commissioner, Judge and Collector, whose places would, as far as the administration of the affairs of the country and the interests of the people are concerned, be far better supplied by the respective Surishtedars, (head Native Officer—a sort of Clerk of the Court.)

"But," I shall be answered, "if the English are blockheads, they are at least honest, which the native officers are not." Softly.—The English functionaries in responsible situations, not counting the highest—the members of council receive each from £2,500 to £4,000 and even £6,000 sterling a year. The pay of the native officers is from £100 to £150. Try the same experiment with the natives that has been tried with ourselves—(for as I have already observed, it is notorious that until they were well paid English honesty would not stand scrutiny), and then, and not till then, may we pronounce a judgment as to the difference that exists between us. With respect to Oude, there are unfortunately many profligate and low people about the Court; but it is a calumny that all the Governors of districts are men of that stamp; or that the districts are universally farmed out to the highest bidders. The Court of Lucknow are well aware, that the landholders and peasantry are, in the absence of a superior military force, far too high spirited to be ruled by men of the above description. A great many, perhaps the majority of the Oude Aumils, are not only men of family and respectability, but generally possess considerable hereditary landed property. It is in our own provinces that we must look for the degradation of the old native gentry, and the elevation of upstarts of neither birth nor education: there it is we may behold men who were formerly menial servants in the employ of Englishmen and who have neither the talents or acquirements to entitle them to hold a higher situation, lording it over native Princes and landholders who are possessed of considerable wealth, power and influence.

Still it will be observed, how could the idea of the misgovernment of Oude become so general. Because opinions which flatter our vanity are usually received with eagerness and because ignorance and indolence are glad to acquiesce in them instead of taking the trouble to make enquiries for themselves. A summary of the principal causes, however, which have concurred to establish the above opinions, may not be amiss in this place.

First and foremost stands the fixed creed of the English, that every thing of English origin, or appertaining to ourselves, must be superior to every thing connected with the Natives. Oude is a Native Government—ergo it is very inferior to the British rule. This logical deduction is quite sufficient with a great many; they never advance a step beyond it; and with the greater number, it more or less prepares the mind to receive favorably all accounts to the disparagement of any Native Government. It also forms the foundation, often indeed the whole superstructure of the lucubrations of Calcutta Cockneys whose qualifications for forming an opinion of any thing connected with India, beyond the precincts of Bow Bazaar, and the characters of a few of their own servants, are precisely on a par with those possessed by General Pillet* to describe the manners and customs of England.

Those who travel in Upper India particularly if they visit Oude, must be able to form some opinion. Granted; and it is to the unprejudiced and observing of these that I would appeal; but not to the mass, who are as ignorant as the Calcutta Cockneys. Of the civilians, few ever visit Oude: those employed in the border districts have been too glad to look upon that country as the scapegoat to bear the blame of the inefficiency either of themselves or their Police—"the banditti and the thieves come from Oude" is the burden of their song, and this has by some been so often repeated that at length they believe it; while others from the first knew no better, and were misled by their Police to adopt the notion. I do not know what the Magistrates on its borders would do for an excuse if we take possession of Oude. The poor King and his Governors are obliged to bear the imputation in silence, but were the country under British functionaries, these would contradict the assertion, and retort it on the accusers.

As to the military, the grounds on which the majority form their opinion are as follows:—A great many have seen no more of Oude than the road between Khanpoor and Lucknow, along which are considerable tracts of unculturable and consequently waste land. They seldom or never look around them or ask a question, but as a matter of course, attribute the waste land to the oppression exercised upon the inhabitants. The servants of others are sometimes beaten for attempting to enforce the purveyance and forced labour system which they are accustomed to do with impunity in our own provinces, and when the masters abuse the people they sometimes meet with the retort courteous—because the peasantry there, not having had, like our subjects, their spirits completely broken by a grinding system of extortions, are more independent, and less inclined to submit to these exactions and abuse. This of course produces furious complaints of the misgovernment of the country and the insolence of the people.

A third and very numerous class have never been in Oude; but form their ideas from the flattery of some of their sipahees, whose object is to make the officers, and through them the Resident, tools to enable them to obtain possession of land to which they have not the slightest claim, or to perpetrate some other piece of injustice. I allude generally to this in No. 162 I will here describe the transaction in detail. A sipahee who wishes to advance some unjust claim, procures a letter from his commanding officer to the resident at Lucknow, painting a miserable picture of the injury the poor man has received from some tyrannical Aumil. The Resident hands the case to the Ministers, requesting it may be inquired into; and orders to this effect are dispatched by the Minister to the local governor (Aumil). With the order to support him, away goes the sipahee to the Aumil, and treats him in the most insolent manner in open court. The Aumil having investigated the claim, and finding it without the least foundation, (for full nineteen cases out of twenty are such that, were they preferred in our Courts the complainants would not be let off with a simple dismissal, but would be fined,) dismissed it. The insolence with which he has been treated, he is obliged to digest as he can. Away goes the sipahee again to the Resident with a tremendous complaint of injustice, oppression, &c., &c. The Resident again writes to the minister, expressing his "astonishment that although your Highness sent express orders to the Aumil, the poor sipahee has not yet been able to obtain justice," or, something to this effect. Another order is not unfrequently issued, and the sipahee again presents himself to the Aumil, behaving with increased insolence of tone and manner, and there have occurred instances in which by such means as these, a sipahee has obtained possession

* Many of my readers may not recollect to what this alludes. A few months before the peace of 1814, a French General Pillet was taken prisoner, and confined on board the hulks at Chatham. At the peace he was released and immediately returned to France, where he wrote a book describing England and English manners. Among other things, it was stated, that the English ladies daily got drunk upon French brandy: the rest of it was much in the same style, and was so extremely absurd, as to be quite amusing. It was, however, about as correct, as the notions entertained by the majority of those who have never left Calcutta, relative to the interior of India.

a piece of land, to which he had no more right than the author of this paper had to appropriate the Government House at Calcutta. Is this sort of proceeding likely to raise a native chief, his ministers or local authorities in the eyes of the people? I am aware that much of these proceedings are contrary to the orders of Government, I only describe what occurs in practice. In the paper alluded to, I also mentioned, that the most unfounded suits were often preferred even in our own Courts by sipahees, under shadow of a letter from their commanding officers. A number of specimens were lately forwarded by one of our Judges to the Sudder Dewanee, which, if I can procure a copy, will amply bear out the truth of this statement.

The summary of the whole is, that the people of Oude are not worse governed than our own subjects. It is true that things are not yet carried on with the regularity which is practised in the British provinces: a rougher and more precipitous mode of proceeding is occasionally adopted, with the loss sometimes of a few lives in consequence; and the revenue officer, if he find an estate very productive, will sometimes demand a higher rent than was originally agreed to. Such are, I believe, all the real grievances they have to complain of, and an individual hardship is thereby now and then caused. But the mass of the people —I speak not of those in power, but of the land holders and peasantry—are far more lightly taxed than those of the British dominions. The civil and criminal administration is certainly not worse than our's; i. e., judging by the only true criterion, the difficulty or facility of enforcing a claim; the people are governed by their hereditary rulers, and benefit by the expenditure in the country of the revenue that is raised, instead of being subject to a few foreigners, by whom as much wealth as possible is carried out of the country. In every part are to be found respectable land-holders and heads of villages of various degrees of rank and wealth, forming the chain between the higher and lower classes, instead of as in provinces, the whole being reduced to the equality of a nation of paupers. They are not cursed with confiscation laws, or special commissions; nor with salt, opium, or other monopolies; they have not one system for realizing the demands of Government and another for individuals; nor is the punishment of revenue defaulters to be compared in severity to that of our proceedings: the people are not excluded from every office which a man of integrity could accept and men who in our provinces are slaving on a bare subsistence which they have little prospect of encreasing, cast a wistful eye towards Oude where they see that the door even of the highest offices is not closed against them, merely because they are dark coloured natives instead of white Christians; and without exception there is not a single class which does not possess more wealth and prosperity than the corresponding class in our own provinces. Such, and I fear not any enquiry properly conducted, is a true picture of the state of Oude at this moment; and yet we are told that the people are sighing for the blessings of the British Indian rule! When the voice of the people shall be really heard—not that of courtiers and men in power, but of the landholders and peasantry—they will be found to unite in one cry of, "of all miseries keep us from that." So far from their entertaining any such feeling I can inform my readers, that in one part of the Doab, not many months ago, the people, farmers and peasantry, held quite a rejoicing on hearing a report that that part of the country was to be transferred to the King of Lucknow: there are English merchants residing on the spot who can corroborate the truth of this statement. My readers will here be inclined to start at the mention of the wealth of the people of Oude, in proof of which I beg to make the following observations. In the first instance, look at the bazaars, not only in Lucknow but in any town in the country. They are filled with far more numerous and expensive articles than those of corresponding size in our own territories. This is an excellent criterion, because no merchants or tradesmen will keep a stock of commodities unless sure of a sale; and men cannot buy expensive articles who have not tolerable incomes. Secondly, the large sums which are invested by the merchants of Oude in the Government securities; and thirdly, on the receipt of the orders of the Court of Directors, the members of our Government talked openly with great satisfaction of the Judge which was about to fall to them, stating their conviction, that whereas the gross revenue of Oude is not now above sixty or seventy lacks (six or seven millions of rupees) the country might easily, under our revenue-screw, be made to yield a net revenue of one crore (ten millions) while the crack Collectors, both in esse and posse, were all on the qui vive in the hopes of being able to raise their fame by employment in Oude. It is to be supposed that both Government and the first rate Collectors, who like vultures snuffed their prey from afar, must have laid some grounds for their anticipations; and in this point of view, it must be obvious that a country which can be made to yield about double its present amount of taxes can neither be very poor nor very much misgoverned.

But so prone are we to minister to our own vanity, that continual assertions are made that the natives of Oude place their money in British securities to prevent its being arbitralily seized by their own King. There is not a shadow of ground for the statement. The reason is simply this. First, the whole revenue of Oude is spent within itself. Secondly, immense sums of hoarded treasure, amounting to many millions of rupees, have within the last few years been spent by the King in excess of the regular revenue. From these two causes, there is much specie in Oude which the merchants do not know how to employ; for the internal trade of the country is very small, most parts of it producing the same commodities; and the ruinous system of transit duties enforced in our territories which bound those of Oude on three sides, the fourth abutting on the Himalyah, over which little trade can be carried, prevent the extension of their foreign commerce. There is no channel for the employment of so much capital within the country, and sooner than allow it to lie altogether unproductive, they are content to vest it in Government Securities. Strange as it may appear to my readers, I am strongly inclined to think that our commerce-whithering transit duties are one great cause of the high premium of the Government securites; and that one of the first effects of altering this system, which is killing the goose that lays the golden eggs, will be that the funds will fall, from the large sums which will be sold out to be employed in trade. The twenty year settlement now forming will probably have some effect of the same nature.

But notwithstanding this favorable picture of the present state of Oude, there is, I apprehend, little doubt, that the downfall of its independence is at hand, and that it will, ere long, be merged into the British dominions. The King himself is a profligate and a sot, devoid of sense, who thinks of nothing but his own licentious pleasures, and of the indulgence of every whim. When any thing annoys or vexes him, he has recourse to liquor to drown thought: he squanders his money like a child spending thousands in building a Palace one year and pulling it down the next. He is surrounded by a host of sycophants of all shades, English, Native, East Indians, who prompt him to every species of extravagance, which they may hope to gain any thing for themselves. The minister Roshun ool Dowlah, is said to be a well disposed man who is fully aware of the dangers of the path now followed and who would gladly change its course, and introduce a reform; but he wants nerve to face the storm which would be raised by those who profit by the present extravagance, so he is content to let things go on in their present train. It is lamentable to see money so wasted which might do so much good. Steam boats, windmills, and other works are begun and partly completed, and then the fancy dies away. The canal of which we have heard so much and which has cost so many lacks of rupees, is left completely at a stand: and the Engineer Officer who was lately transferred to the service of the King for the express purpose of finishing the canal, is losing his time because the King will neither give directions nor supply funds. It is a great pity that the canal was ever begun: it will be of little use, since a very small proportion of bulky trade comes in that direction. Had the money it has cost been spent in making roads, infinitely greater benefit would have accrued; and it is probable that even now, the advantages would be greater if the canal were left as it is, and the money necessary to complete it, expended in roads. The King spends nearly double his annual income which amounts to about sixty or seventy lacks, (6 or 7 millions of rupees) but hitherto, this has caused rather good than evil. He is not obliged to borrow money or to encrease his demands on the people, having still some of Sadut Ali's treasure remaining; supposed to be about 3 crores of rupees (thirty millions.)

The English Government are mainly to blame for this state of things. How is it possible that native Princes who are kept in a state of pupilage, and almost treated like shool-boys, should have any self respect or proper independence of feeling! This has been the case with Oude for the last forty years. Had (as I once before observed) the British Government turned their supremacy to good account, by insisting on the education of the native Chiefs, so as to qualify them for the art of Government, this would have been a measure entitled to the highest praise; but so far from it, the interference of the Residents has been almost always exerted for evil; indeed so extremely difficult is it to discover the slightest benefit arising to any class of people from the establishment of Residents at the native Courts, that there is strong ground for the supposition that the measure has been adopted and maintained for the express purpose of promoting misgovernment and confusion in the different principalities, so as to afford plausible excuses and opportunity for our taking possession of them. A species of interference such as that suggested in No. 39, would be a real benefit. Lucknow has not, at most, above three or four years longer to remain as an independent kingdom. By that time, the King, if he live so long, will have spent the remnant of his treasure; and as he will not have the sense to reform his conduct, borrowing and exactions will become the order of the day; disturbances will ensue: and the British will settle the matter by taking possession of the country.

Had Mehendee Ali Khan (commonly called the Hakeem Mehendi) remained at the head of affairs, matters would in all probability have taken a very different turn. He really set about reform, not only in good earnest, but with good sense. He reduced the expenses, especially the salaries and pensions of favorites who had done nothing to deserve them;—he was gradually introducing all over the country, the best parts of our system; (i. e.) written agreements regarding the revenue to be paid; regular Courts for Civil Justice; and an established Police. His shrewdness of observation on the native vanity of the English also is worthy of note, and the mode in which he, like Rammohun Roy, and some others, deceived them by practising on their credulity is amusing. He used to drop hints that he wished to see Oude in the possession of the English. Why the man's whole energies were at work to prevent such a consummation, for which end he persued the best plan he could have devised, by endeavouring to place the administration of affairs there on such a footing as would give us no reason to interfere; and there can be no doubt that had he remained he would have introduced a much better Government there than ever existed in our own territories.

Blinded, however, by prosperity, and imagining himself to be much more firmly seated on the pinnacle of greatness to which his talents had raised him than was really the case, his pride and arrogance rose accordingly. Adopting some of the worst features of the English conduct, he affected a haughty reserve, and disdain towards his countrymen; he disdained to return almost any man's salute, or to treat those with whom he had to transact business with the courtesy and civility which was their due; and when remonstrated with on the extent of his retrenchments, he would make a harsh, unfeeling retort in imitation of a certain Governor-General. This was the real cause of his downfall. But for this, he might have been in office at this very day; and it is a fact worth noting in support of assertions I have so frequently made, of the effects of similar conduct among ourselves in disgusting and alienating the people.

As to his wishing to see the country absorbed into the British dominions; what could he expect to gain by it? at the most some insignificant pension—what would he have lost thereby? The Minister's salary is three lakhs, and he is allowed a perquisite of a deduction of one fourth from all regular salaries and payments. It is supposed, that his income amounts to about twenty-two lacks (more than two million pounds sterling) of rupees per annum: he enjoys power, authority and patronage to a great extent: all this, it is to be supposed, he would willingly sacrifice, and retire an obscure individual upon a small pension for the disinterested pleasure of seeing his country under the enlightened rule of the English!! It is impossible that any one acquainted with the real state of things, could have given credit for a moment to such professions; but the general ignorance which prevails on the subject, aided by the gratifications which our vanity received induced them to be very generally believed.

Mehendee Ali Khan however, has not, I believe, the slightest chance of being restored to his premiership, unless by the positive orders of the British government; and, indeed, although had he remained, he might have been able well enough to carry on a system which was in regular train, he is now an old man, and though by no means superannuated, is too infirm to plunge again into the sea of politics. There appears little hope that his place will be supplied by a man of equal ability, so that, at furthest in about three or four years, we may expect to see the dominions of Oudè usurped by the English. In my next, I shall offer a few suggestions on the best mode of administering the government of those territories, and of avoiding the course, which has rendered the English name so odious to the people of the North Western provinces.

APPENDIX.

Complaints by Sipahees, when they can prefer them under cover of a letter from their Commanding Officers.

I have been fortunate enough to procure a few of these presented to one of our Civil Courts, which I subjoin as a specimen.

The summary of one petition is this. "My father died nine years ago; certain of his relations dispossessed my brother of the lands; I beg an immediate order may be issued to put me in possession of the lands." Here both the sipahee and his brother (who lived not far from the Court) had by their own account quietly submitted to be ousted for nine years, and then a petition of the above nature is forwarded. If the sipahee could not have procured leave, his brother might have complained.

Another coolly requests, that a village shall be given over to him, and that he should be put in possession of a grove of trees: no grounds whatever for the demand being stated.

A third states in general terms. "I have been kept out of my lands and houses for many years by my relations, I beg an order may be issued to put me in possession," i. e., of whatever he chose to call his, since no particulars were given.

A fourth states as follows. "I sent an order for 50 Rs to a man named Lallmun some years ago, to give the money to my family. Two or three years ago I went to question Lallmun about it, he beat me, and turned me out of the village. I beg an order may be issued to make Lallmun instantly pay the money to my family." By the man's own account he submitted to the loss of his money and the beating besides, without complaining, although his village was actually within two miles of the Court. He rejoins his corps, and three years after forwards the above petition.

On all these and numerous others, the order was to sue in the regular way, for which by the Regulations every facility is afforded to the native soldiers; they have advantages over all other suitors: the consequence was that nothing further was ever heard of the suits; of which probably not one had the slightest shadow of foundation.

It is extremely common for sipahees on leave of absence, if they live near a Court of Justice, when their leave is nearly expired, to trump up some complaint and prefer it to the Court so as by good management to enable them to over-stay their leave a month or so; and then they get a certificate from the Judge or Magistrate, that they were in attendance at the Court from such a date to such a date. Notwithstanding all the fine things that are said about the honor of the native soldiery, there is probably no class in India, where you will find more fraud and chicane,—a hundred times more so than among the unsophisticated peasantry from among whom they are taken. Whether this arises from their communication with the English I do not give a decided opinion.—Hurkaru.

NELLORE COPPER MINES.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORES FOUND WITHIN THE LANDS IN GRANT TO THE COMPANY.

Through the kindness of Mr. C. A. Kerr, I have had a further opportunity of examining the produce of the Nellore copper mines, of which cabinet specimens were presented to the Asiatic Society two years ago, before the formation of the "Indian Copper Mining Company" at Madras, for the purpose of turning to profit the mineral stores of this promising district.

From a pamphlet published at Madras, we learn that the copper mines in the Nellore and Cuddapah districts were discovered about 40 years ago, by Mr. Benjamin Hayne, whose report to Government, inserted in his Tracts on India, gives the fullest and most satisfactory account of them. From this pamphlet, we glean the followigg particulars of the locality, and of the quality of the ore.

"The districts on the coast in which copper ores have been discovered are those of the Calastry and Vancatagherry Zemindaries and the Udyherry Jaghire, in the zillahs of Nellore and Duppaud and other places in the ceded districts.

"The principal mining places are at the distance of about 30 miles N. W. from Nellore, 30 miles from the sea, about the latitude of Rámpatam, and about 40 miles N. E. from Cuddapa.

"Several rivers run right through it on their way to the sea from the western hills, of which the Pillapeyroo, Vuppovagoo and Manyroo form a junction not far from Guramanypenta, the principal mining place, and form a pretty large river, which is said to have a great deal of water throughout the year. Its beds are very stony, which seems in the eyes of the natives the greatest objection against its being made navigable for boats: it deserves therefore an accurate survey.

"The general aspect of the country is barren, and uncomfortable in the extreme: large trees are only found in and near the villages; and on the wide extended plains, on both sides of the river, nothing encounters the eye, but here and there a small thorny shrub. The grass, which, in the rainy season, every where else carpets the country with a refreshing green, is here both scanty and of the poorest kind, a species of "aristida," which, as the name implies, is a compound of long beards or bristles. This is the case in most mining countries; the surface of the soil contains in many places so much salt, that the inhabitants could make enough, if allowed to do so, for their own consumption.

"To the eastward, the country is open; only here and there a few low hills are to be seen: but to the westward, there are ranges of hills, the nearest at the distance of about 10 miles. Due west is one called Mala-coudah, from being the highest hill in the range. It is said to abound with wood. The Udygherry mountains are to the south-west, about 16 miles, and the highest in this part of the country: the highest point I take to be about 3,000 feet above the level of the low country: I have seen myself, that plenty and large wood grows there, particularly between the valleys.

"About 20 miles on the way to the sea, in the direction of Rámapatam, are extensive jungles, consisting of—1. Kora, Panicum italicum, L. 2. Aruga, Paspalum tomentacium, L. 3. Woolava, Glycene tomentosa, L.

"This country is, geologically speaking, of a primitive description; the general rock formation is a mica-slate, of different colors and consistence. It shews itself first in the low country, at the distance of about 15 miles east from the hills; it forms sloping mountains, which are often capped with hornstone slate, which passes into sand-stone, and on the other hand, into jasper. The tabular summits and mural precipices of the Udygherry hills consist of the latter stone kind: the layers or strata of the mica-slate occur in different positions, and inclination to the horizon; often in the low country forming a right angle with it; on and about the Udgherry hills, the strata appears in the utmost confusion, as if thurst by force out of their proper position. Traces of copper ore are often found in this rock, and it is generally known to contain various metallic veins, as gold, silver, and copper.

"Subordinate to the former is green-stone slate, in mighty layers, often as to appearance constituting the principal rock of a district for many miles. This is the case about Guramanypenta and the other mining places. The layers or strafication of the latter rock I have as yet always found in a horizontal position.

"The green-stone slate is often approaching to green-stone; it occurs then only obscurely slaty, has a jet black color, strong glossy lustre, foliated fracture, hard in a small degree; in this state it seems here barren of metals of any kind. The real green-stone slate is of a bluish black color, with small white spots of decomposed felspar, half harp; and when exposed to the air, it crumbles soon to pieces, and takes green color. The rock is reckoned one of the richest 'mothers of ores' of any in the world. In it are found silver and copper in rich beds or layers, as in the case here; but never in veins, as in other formations.*

* One of my specimens from Nellore is abundantly curious and interesting. It consists of distinct layers of the carbonate, alternating with black micaceous schist, or rather green-stone, affording exactly the appearance of gradual deposition from a liquid at this earliest period of geological formations. The angle formed by the strata of this striated rock with the horizon is stated by Mr. Kerr to be about 45.—J. P.

"The layers of copper are of different thickness, and distance from each other: the general run of the pieces of ore, constituting the layers, is two inches in thickness; but they have been found also of several feet. The pieces are in general flat, as if compressed, and coated with ochre. The vertical distance between the layers is 4 to 8 feet, and the horizontal is even more uncertain.

"A corroded honey-combed quartz is found in great abundance in the green-stone slate, particularly along with the copper ore. It appears often on the surface, in such places where the water has washed the earth away. It looks then like indurated marl, which in other parts of the country is very common.

"The rock* is covered with a red coarse gravel, which is the superficial soil of this part of the country. In my opinion, this is formed from the decomposition of the green-stone slate, and its quartzoze and ferruginous contents; for copper ore is often found in considerable quantity, and in the same situation, as in the slate rock.

"At Yerrapillay, in a new mine, which I opened, I found two layers of ore in it, at distances of four feet asunder.

"The thickness of this stratum of gravel differs according to its situation, whether it is on a high or low ground. I have found it from 4 to 6 feet, and more.

"The copper ore which Dr. Thomson calls Anhydrous, the most common kind, is in flat pieces, externally of a brown ochry color; internally of a black iron color, which often passes into green; when moistened with water, it becomes almost immediately throughout green; in some places, it is bluish grey throughout. Lustre, in some places, where it is black, semi-metallic; and in the bluish grey, metallic†. The copper, indeed, is in an almost metallic state in it. Fracture approaching to even fine grained streak; of the black, brighter metallic; powder, "greenish;" not very hard, except the iron black and bluish grey part; which is with difficulty scratched by quartz; brittle; not particularly heavy. Specific gravity, 3.09. Some pieces are found of a nut brown color, and some with conchoidal fracture. The foreign admixtures are various, as white and green quartz, mica, iron ore; mountain blue and malachite are in some places found with it. In other places, I suspect the admixture of silver. For the analysis, I must refer to that of Dr. Thomson, in a paper laid before the Royal Society of London, which I was permitted to publish as an appendix to my "Tracts on India." I will only mention here, that on an average, he procured 50 per cent. of pure copper. In the dry way, or by simply smelting the ore, we have received the metal in greater proportion, which may be easily accounted for by the quantity of iron, which the ore contains, that cannot be separated, as when the analysis is carried on by acids and other re-agents."

Mr. Hayne seems to have been wrong in imagining, that the natives had only discovered these mines 50 or 60 years before (about 1750.) Mr. Kerr, who has since visited the whole of the mining district, and examined all the formations, and the old works, with great care, states, that the former excavations are of prodigious magnitude, many of them occupy several hundred feet square, and having a depth of 50 or 60 feet. The matrix rock and rubbish are now accumulated in these immense tanks; but on clearing them away, the mouths of the galleries extending into the rocks were discovered; blocks of the ore, (perhaps some that had been gathered previous to the discontinuance of working the mines from some political convulsion or oppression,) have been used to mend the village tank at Guramanypenta, and Mr. Kerr imagines, that any quantity of the richest ore* may be obtained at a trifling expense, and within 100 feet of the surface. Extensive hills, formed of lumps of ferruginous slag, now covered with vegetation, point out the situation of the ancient smelting houses. A piece of this slag (which was at first mistaken for a volcanic product) was analysed by myself. It yielded but faint traces of copper, shewing that the native processes of extraction, however rude, were effectual in completely separating the metal. But I must now proceed to observe upon the actual specimens of the ore submitted to my examination, purposely avoiding all allusion to the mercantile value of the mines, the estimates of the expense of working them, and the invitations to join in an association for this purpose:—objects which are highly interesting to the community, connected with so laudable a measure for developing the natural riches of the country; but which cannot with propriety be entered upon in a work devoted exclusively to literature and science.

The ores now presented to me are from three different localities. They differ considerably in quality one from the other, and all from the former ore, which Dr. Thomson pronounced to be an anydrous carbonate, new to mineralogy.

No. 1. A parcel, weighing 90lbs. of roughly-picked and cleaned ore, has a quartzose matrix, in some parts colored green, or appearing so from the malachite beneath the transparent crystal. It contains much iron, which, on solution in an acid, appears in the form of a yellow ochre. Ten per cent. of quartz was separated from this specimen on pounding it roughly before setting it apart from analysis.

No. 2. A parcel of the same weight is labelled "Bungerul Mettah," and is the species

* See Dr. Benza's observations on veins of quartz pervading decomposed pegmatite, J. A. S. iv. 421.—Ed.

† This description accords so completely with that of No. 3, in the subjoined analysis, that I have no doubt Dr. Hayne has mistaken the sulphuret for Dr. Thomson's ore.—J. P.

* The "steel-grained, crystallized silvery ore, invariably found in green-stone slate, and partly imbedded in quartz, the richest ore met with," is doubtless No. 3, the sulphuret.—J. P.

stated to be found in clustered nodules in the alluvium, of rounded exterior, as though they had been detached from their original site, and reburied here. The ferruginous matrix of this ore, on solation, assumes the appearance of a dark-red oxide. It is the same probably as that of Dr. Thomson's specimen. The carbonate of copper runs through it in veins, but the mixture of sulphuret of iron, and perhaps of copper with the oxide, gives the whole a dark arenaceous texture.

No. 3. The richest ore of the three is at the same time the most abundant, and promises to yield the safest return, as it runs in unbroken veins. This ore is a combination of carbonate and sulphuret, the former intermixed with the later, but readily distinguishable from it, as the sulphuret is crystallized, and has the grey metallic lustre of galena. The specific gravity of this ore is 3.77, being intermediate between that of the carbonate 3.2, and the sulphuret, 3.5.

The analysis was conducted for the sake of expedition on separate parcels of 100 grains each, in lieu of attempting the separation of the ingredients from a single parcel. Some variation may thus be induced from the irregularity of the ore; but, on the whole, the results ought to be more trust worthy. Thus; the carbonic acid was estimated by the loss of weight and digesting 100 grains, finely pounded, in dilute nitric acid. The water, (for none of these ores was found to be anhydrous,) by heating in a glass tube, removing the aqueous vapor by bibulous paper, and ascertaining the loss. As the ore generally lost its green colour by this operation, it is possible that a portion of carbonic acid was also driven off. Calcination in an open dish, in the muffle of an assay furnace, gave a loss, which was compounded of that of the carbonic acid and the water. Calcination drives off the sulphur also, but the equivalent of oxygen, which replaces it, being of precisely equal weight, this operation affords no test of the quantity of sulphur present. In fact, not expecting from Dr. Thomson's analysis, to find sulphur in the Nellore copper ore, I at first neglected the precautions necessary for its separation. This was accordingly effected on other samples, by boiling in strong nitric acid, which, from its heat, caused part of the sulphur in a pure state to rise in fused globules to the surface: while a portion, being oxygenated, was afterwards separated by precipation with barytes.

The quantity of copper was most conveniently estimated from the black oxide taken up from the calx by dilute nitric acid. It was also obtained directly from other samples by reduction of the oxide with charcoal and borax. The iron and pyrites were deduced from the difference between the residue in the cold solution, and that from the hot dissolution in strong acid of another parcel, before calcination.

Collecting together the results of the above operations, we have the following data, whence to deduce the composition of the three specimens.

|---|---|---|---|---|
| a. | Loss of carbonic acid by digestion in dilute nitric acid.... | 12.0 | 14.6 | 7.0 |
| b. | Loss of water (and some carb. acid!) by heating without air in a glass tube,..... | 5.0 | 7.0 | 3.0 |
| c. | Total loss on calcination with access of air,..... | 17.5 | 17.8 | 21.0 |
| c 2. | Ditto average of two other trials (more carbonate,)..... | 20.0 | 20.3 | 23.5 |
| d. | Oxide of copper taken up from calx c by dilute acid,.... | 37.7 | 49.2 | 73.7 |
| e. | Residue of insoluble earths and ox. iron, after d,..... | 44.8 | 33.0 | 5.3* |
| f. | Residue from digestion of crude ore in boiling nitric acid, ... | 20.0 | 13.9 | 19.0 |
| g. | The same, after burning off the sulpher and redigesting in do. | 20.0? | 8.5 | 0.0 |
| h. | Sulphur, separated on boiling in strong acid,..... | 0.6 | 2.1 | 9.0 |
| i. | Sulphate of barytes precipitated afterwards,..... | 1.4 | 17.8 | 28.5 |
| k. | Weight of metallic copper actually recovered from c 2,... | 28.5 | 52.2 | 59.0 |

In regard to d. No. 3, it was observed on digestion in cold nitric acid, that a very considerable portion of the calx of copper was of a red color, or in the state of protoxide, or perhaps in a metallic state, and was not taken up without disengagement of nitrous gas;—the weight 73.7 must therefore be increased, to give the true weight in terms of the peroxide. This is also proved by the amount of loss in c, 21.0, which is considerably in excess; and it was remarked on removing the calx from the fire that it was agglutinated, so as perhaps to have prevented the access of air to oxidate the interior. The sulphur enables us to approximate the correction of this item; for 12.8 requires 51.5 copper,=64.3 black or peroxide; and this, added to 22.8, the peroxide of the carbonate, would give 87.7; which is 14.0 greater than the actual return from the fire. Again, deducting the deficiency after calcination (c.) 21.0, from the sum of the three volatile ingredients—sulphur, 12.8; carbonic acid, 7.0; and water 3.0=22.8, there remains but 1.8 for the weight of oxygen absorbed in place of the sulphur; whereas 12.8 are required. —Adding the difference 11.0 to d. we shall have 84.7. This number will be found to be a little in defect from the subsequent results; while 87.7 is a little too great; a mean may therefore be adopted.

From the above data, we may now proceed to extract the simple elements of each specimen of ore:

|---|---|---|---|---|
| l. | Metallic copper, calculated from the oxide d,..... | 83.2 | 39.5 | 69.0 |
| m. | Pure sulphur, from h and i | 0.8 | 4.5 | 12.8 |
| n. | Carbonic acid, less $\frac{1}{15}$th for hygrometric moisture ..... | 10.8 | 13.1 | 6.3 |

The carbonic acid being supposed to be wholly combined with copper, while the sulphur may be partly united with iron, we may calculate the proportions of the carbonates sulphurets by means of the scale of chemical equivalents, thus:

* In the second Analysis of No. 2, however, the copper actually recovered, k, so much exceeds this quantity, that it is evident this ore frequently contains sulphuret, or is of very variable quality.

|---|---|---|---|
| a. The carbonic acid will require copper,..... | 31.4 | 38.6 | 18.3 |

Now in the first two of these, the copper required so nearly agrees with the calculated weight of metal, l, that the latter may be looked upon as existing here wholly in the form of carbonate, and the sulphur as united entirely with iron*. In No. 3, however, we find that the majority of the copper remains; and knowing the nearly total absence of iron in this specimen, we may conclude it to be a mixture of nearly two parts sulphuret, with one of carbonate.

The miner would rest content with the determination of the pure metal in the ore, and would have good reason to be satisfied with the 60 per cent. "actual yield" of No. 3, or even with the 30 per cent. of the poorest of the three ores; but the mineralogist will prefer an exhibition of the component salts of the ores, according to the usual synthetical formula. I may here remark, that the water separated (b) is more than is required to convert the carbonate into a hydrate or ordinary malachite: thus,

|---|---|---|---|
| p. The copper combined with carbonic acid being,..... | 30.2 | 39.5 | 18.3 |
| q. will require water to hydrate it,..... | 4.2 | 5.5 | 2.6 |

The excess in b may have been carbonic acid, partially driven off.

The chemical composition of the three minerals may therefore be thus expressed:

| | No. 1. | No. 2. | No. 3. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Hydrated carbonate of copper, | 52.4 | 68.5 | 31.7 |
| Sulphuret of copper,..... | t. | 0? | 63.0 |
| Sulphuret of iron,..... | 2.1 | 12.4 | 0.0 |
| Oxside of iron, silex, &c..... | 43.5 | 25.1 | 5.3 |
| Loss or excess,..... | 2.0 | —6.0 | 0.0 |
| | 100.0 | 100.0 | 100.0 |

The excess in No. 2, is doubtless owing to the irregularity of the rocky admixture in different specimens, whereof one yielded 44, and another only 13.9 of insoluble matter, on digestion in acid.

The richness of the last of the three minerals will more than compensate for the increase of trouble and expense in the reduction of the ore by successive roastings; and practical miners assert, that the glance or grey sulphuret is a much steadier and more plentiful ore than the carbonate.

I should add, before concluding the above imperfect analysis of the Nellore copper ores, that I tested them in vain for silver and other metals. Neither did arsenic appear to be present.

I may here mention, that among the specimens of minerals presented to me by Mr. Kerr, as occurring within the copper mining district, associated with the micaceous schist, are the following; corundum and adamantine spar, garnets, dark green actinolite, red chalk, manganese; besides carbonate of magnesia, and other minerals of which specimens have not yet reached me. An ore of mercury is also suspected to exist in the same range of rocks. The surface of the gneiss or micaceous schist, were exposed to the air, is frequently seen tinged of a green colour, from the trickling of water holding carbonate of copper in solution, through crevices of the rock.

J. PRINSEP.

* This residue may have consisted partly of sulphuret of copper that had escaped decomposition in the fire; for another specimen was wholly soluble, and little iron was present in the solution.

TIN MINES.

The mines are generally excavated on the swampy flats at the base of hills of primitive formation. They average from six to twenty feet in depth, following the streams of ore (Hùlûr bìjì), which will sometimes run in a horrizontal direction to the distance of three miles, according to the nature of the ground. These excavations are termed Lombongan. The streams vary in diameter from six inches to eighteen and twenty, and consist of a quantity of small heavy granulated portions of a dark hue, and shining with a metalic lustre, intermixed with a glittering white sand. The excavations made by the Malays, are more superficial than those dug by the Chinese, as they are too lazy to work the streams, which lie deep.

The strata under which the ore is found are commonly, 1st, a black vegetable mould; 2nd, red clay; 3rd, white clay, with white pebbles, apparently decomposed quartz, and 4th, a bed of shining white sand, called Passìr bìjì. Under the ore lies a stratum of steatite, called, Nàpal, or a hard bed of decomposed rock. The native term for the tin ore is Bìjì tìma, literally seeds of tin; when melted, it has the name of Timah masak. Crystals of quartz and fragments of micaceous schist are sometimes found among the alluvial earth thrown out.

The soil carried out by the miners in baskets, suspended at the extremities of a stout elastic bambu or penàga, which passes across the shoulders. The men are divided into two parties, which work in regular succession, one entering the shaft with emptied baskets, while the other makes its egress, with the filled ones. At Ulu Pondoi, in Naning, and at Jerram Kambing, I am informed, the mines are natural caverns in the rock. The Malays and Jacoons collect the ore by the light of dammer torches.

The ore is taken to a stream, conducted by artificial channels, lined with the bark of trees, to the vicinity of the mines and stirred about with an iron rake, or a choncole. The water carries off the sand, small pebbles, and earth, leaving the ore and large stones at the bottom, which are afterwards separated by a riddle and the hand. The ore, thus cleared of extraneous substances, is deposited in the koppos, to await the process of smelting.

Smelting or Melanchùr.—The smeltings are carried on at stated periods, twice or thrice a year, according to the quantity of ore collected, and always at night, to avoid the great heat.

The ore and charcoal, (of the Kompas, Kamoui, or other hard woods,) are gradually heaped up, in alternate layers, in a rude furnace of clay, called a Bullowe, with an aperture below, to allow the escape of the fused metal. The fire is urged, and the whole mass brought in a glow by a sort of leathern bellows called Hambùsan, and sometimes by rudder ones, constructed like an air-pump, and made from the hollowed trunk of a strait tree, with a piston, headed by thick folds of paper. These are called Kalùbongs.

The Malays for the most part content themselves with the tropong, which is merely a hollow bambu converted into a sort of blow-pipe, and worked by the mouth.

As the heat increases, the melted metal is received into a hole dug in the ground, called the Telàga, or reservoir; and thence, with the assistance of iron ladles, poured into the moulds.

The tin now assumes the shape of the ingots of commerce, of which there are two kinds common in Sungie Ujong, viz. the Tàmpang and Kepping or Banka. The former weighs from half a catty to two catties, and the latter, from fifty to sixty catties; one catty is equal to one pound and three-quarters.

The Tàmpang is generally used by the Malays.

In the furnaces used by the Chinese, 800*lbs.* of metal may be produced during the course of a night. Those of the Malays seldom produce more than one-sixth of this quantity.

From 100 parts of the ore, it is calculated, from 65 to 77 of pure metal are produced. The ore of Banca yields 58. That of Junk Ceylon, according to an assay made by Mr. Blake 64½.

The water is drained from the mines, if shallow, by means of a channel, leading into a neighbouring stream; but if deep, the Putàrum Ayer is had recourse to. This hydrolic machine is, I believe, of Chinese invention. The Rev. Mr. Tomlin, a zealous missionary, gives the following description of it.

"The apparatus is simple, consisting of a common water wheel, a circular wooden chain about 40 feet in circumference, and a long square box, or trough, through which it runs in ascending. The wheel and chain, I think, revolve on a common axis, so that the motion of the former necessarily puts the latter into action. The chain consists of square wooden floats, a foot distant from each other, and strung as it were upon a continuous flexible axis, having a moveable joint between each pair.

"As the float-boards of the chain successively enter the lower part of the box or trough, (immersed in water,) a portion of water is constantly forced up by each, and discharged at the top. At one of the mines we were much struck with the simple but efficient mode of its application. There were three distinct planes or terraces rising above each other. On the middle one was the wheel; the lower was the pit of the mine: from the higher a stream of water fell and turned the wheel, which, putting the whole machine into motion, brought up another stream from the pit; these two streams, from above and below uniting on the middle plane, run off in a sluice, by which the ore was washed."

Regarding the smelting of tin, in a recent number of Dr. Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia, (No. 45, pp. 21 and 22,) are the following remarks on the advantages of pit coal over charcoal: "Authorities are not agreed as to the time when pit coal first began to be substituted in the reverberatory smelting houses (of Cornwall) for wood or charcoal, though this is generally supposed to have been about 1680.

"In the smelting of this (tin,) as of other metals, the application of this fuel has been productive of immense advantages; and such is the perfection to which our metallurgic operations have been carried since the economical introduction of this cheap and plentiful fuel, that the regulations of our custom-house alone prevented the carrying a scheme set on foot some years ago, for the importing of the tin ore from the eastern mines, for the purpose of being smelted in this country, and afterwards re-exported."

It would appear to have escaped the observation of the author of this article, that the enormous forests which thickly cover the whole of the Malayan peninsula, and the Island of Banca, under the very shade of which the miners may be said to work, furnish, on the spot, a cheaper and more economical fuel than the coal pits af Newcastle or Whitehaven do to the miners of Cornwall, at the sole expense of the labor of felling them; setting aside the loss of time, the expense of importation and exportation, and disinclination of the natives to such a scheme. Moreover, according to Mr. Crawfurd, the cost of producing a cwt. of Banca tin is but 22*s.* 8*d.*, whereas that of Cornwall amounts to 64*s.* 7*d.* The cost of producing a cwt. of the metal in Súngie Ujong is estimated by an intelligent native at 23*s.* The immense natural obstacles in Cornwall, only to be surmounted by the most powerful steam engines, and the unremitting application of all the means human ingenuity can devise, together with the high price of labor, are, however, the principal causes in the enhancement of the cost of production in England.

The time perhaps is not far distant when like ingenuity and similar means will be applied to the unlocking of the hitherto partially developed resources of the East.

According to the best native information, the annual produce of the peninsula, before the late disturbances in the tin countries, was as follows.

| Places. | Peculs. |
|---|---|
| Sungie Ujong, | 7,000 |
| Perak, | 7,500 |
| Quedah, | 600 |
| Junk Ceylon, | 1,500 |
| Pungah, | 1,500 |
| Salangore, Calang, and Langkat, | 2,000 |
| Lúkût, | 1,600 |
| States in the interior of Malacca, | 900 |
| Pahang, | 1,000 |
| Kemaman and Tringano, | 7,000 |
| Calantan, | 3,000 |
| Patani, | 1,000 |
| | 34,600 |

The discovery of tin in the peninsula cannot be traced, but it is assuredly of ancient date. Part of Perak is said to be the Temalá, or land of tin, of PTOLEMY, and Cálang, (a name signifying tin in Malay,) to be the Malaiou Colan of the same author, and the Malaya-Culam of the Hindus.

The tin mines of Banca are of modern origin, being accidentally discovered, Mr. Marsden tells us, in 1710, by the burning of a house; the trade of the peninsula suffered considerably in consequence.

According to Mr. Crawfurd, (as before stated,) the tin of Banca, produce of 1817, amounted to 35,000 peculs, or 2083⅓ tons, equal to half the produce of England. But under the management of the Dutch, I am informed, it now scarcely produces half that quantity.

The price of Banca tin is from 16 to 16½ dollars per pecul=133⅓ lbs., and of Straits tin, (chiefly from the peninsula,) from 14½ to 15. British block tin, in 1832, was selling at £3 12*s.* 6*d.* per cwt.—Journal of the Asiatic Society for October.

TOPOGRAPHY OF MIDNAPORE.

The civil station of Midnapore, the principal town of the zillah of that name, is distant from Calcutta about 70 miles in a south-westerly direction and about 45 from the nearest part of the Bay of Bengal. It is placed upon a considerable elevation of table land upwards of a hundred feet above the level of the river and in some spots nearly a hundred and fifty.

This elevation consists of a mass of limestone rock, mixed with a large proportion of iron called by the native conka, and is apparently an off shoot from the large tract of irony lime stone formation which extends for some hundreds of miles in a westerly direction through the hilly tract of Chota Nagpore, Palamow, &c. This rock in the more elevated spots is quite bare, though in other situations it is covered with a rich productive soil. The latter is very shallow however, insomuch, that the large trees with difficulty find root in it and are compelled to seek support by spreading their foundations literally; in many cases the fibres of the largest Pepul cannot penetrate more than a foot into the ground in a perpendicular direction.

On the East this rock rises gradually and imperceptibly from the flat country, but on the south it terminates more abruptly, having a narrow slip of cultivated land varying from a quarter of a mile to a mile in breadth between it and the Cossye river, which chiefly bounds it on that side. On the west and north it is lost in undulating ground, covered with dwarf trees, the commencement of the large tract of jungle which stretches into Nagpore in one direction and almost to the foot of the Rajmahl Hills in another.

The most elevated parts of the station are the Parade Ground, which is a large plain on the north of the sepoy lines about a mile and a half long and a mile wide, and another plain of nearly the same dimensions, situated on the western extremity of the station. The surface of the latter is more barren and more irregular than that of the former, but it commands an uninterrupted view to the southward whereas the other is more confined. There is a small tank of good water about 300 yards to the southward of this plain, which dries in the hot weather, but which might easily be deepened, and doubtless water could be procured in the neighbourhood by boring, as wells are plentiful in every direction throughout the station. These plains are about two miles distant from each other.

The rest of the station consists of undulating ground of nearly the same character with that of the plains, but in the centre of the place there is a jheel, which drains through a narrow tract of rice fields, into a dirty channel, and which after running through the native town terminates in the river. Some years since a plan was prepared by Mr. Dick, the Magistrate, to dry up this spot, and it was approved by the Government, but no further steps have been taken to carry it into execution. It would be a most feasible and not a very expensive operation to drain this marsh and would contribute greatly to improve the purity of the air around it.

The water found in the tanks and wells is generally much impregnated with iron.

The station is a large one, and though at present there is only one native Regiment, there are bells of arms for two corps. Houses are plentiful and all the materials for building and labor very cheap. Grain is rather dear, but other provisions are very reasonable.

The gardens produce every species of vegetable in great profusion, but since the destruction caused by the late storms fruit is scarcely to be obtained.

The communication with Calcutta is of course easy, the distance being so small; but the river is open only in the rains and then not to be relied on, as it is dependent upon the mountain streams for supply, and consequently varies greatly in the quantity of water. Boats are thus frequently delayed for a week together and sometimes take a month to accomplish the journey from Calcutta, which, if no stoppage occurs, is easily performed in eight days.

There are three land routes to the Presidency, one by Keerpoy into the Benares road, making a distance of about 100 miles; a second by Ooloobareah, which is 51 miles from Midnapore on the banks of the Hoogly, and distant by water 25 miles from Fort William, the land journey from the opposite bank by Budge Budge being 13 miles; and a third by Tumlook, which is 36 miles from Midnapore and 50 by water from Fort William. There is no land route from this latter place to Calcutta.

These routes are practicable throughout the year; but the late inundation has destroyed a considerable portion of the Ooloobareah road and has much injured the Tumlook road at one or two points*.

With regard to the comparative advantages of these routes, the Keerpoy road is long, and the halting places bad, but there are no rivers to cross, whereas on the Ooloobareah road there are five, viz.—the Cossye twice, the Roopnarain, the Damoodah, and the Ganges, the three latter being very broad. By the Tumlook road the Cossye is twice crossed, but at the second crossing at Panchkoorah Ghaut the river is not more than a hundred yards wide though very deep, and a bridge might easily be thrown over it. For dâk journeying the Ooloobareah road is the best, but for the passage of troops and supplies the Tumlook route is most desirable: the land journey is short, the halting places good, and a steamer could run between the last stage and Calcutta in six hours. If the latter road were made pucka it would of course much improve it and the cunkur of Midnapore makes the finest roads in the world.

The climate of Midnapore is remarkably salubrious, resembling more that of the upper provinces than Bengal, indeed the whole external appearance of the station reminds one of the up-country cantonements rather than of a place within 50 miles of the mouth of the Hooghly. The peculiar dryness of the air, at all times of the year, is very striking; but its purity and elasticity are most observable in the rainy season when compared with the close moist atmosphere of the surrounding country, and especially of Calcutta and its neighbourhood. The quantity of rain which actually falls, and the period of its continuance, do not differ from the usual proportion in the rest of Bengal; but the nature of the soil which receives the water materially influences its effect upon the air. On the hard rocky ground of Midnapore the rain never lays: and after the most violent and continued storms the plains become perfectly dry in a few hours, so that the roads will not wet the soles of the traveller's shoes.

During the rains the thermometer varies from 80 to 90; sometimes it is as low as 75 degrees. The cold season is not remarkable either for its continuance or severity; it does not last above three months, and the thermometer is seldom, even at day break, below 50, though occasionally it has been known to fall as low as 40; during the day it ranges between 60 and 70. On the high ground the cold weather fogs are almost unknown and even in the lower parts of the station they are rare, and the air, unlike the damp raw cold of Calcutta, is always fresh and bracing.

During the hot season the temperature, as indicated by the thermometer, is not greater than that of the surrounding country, ranging usually from 95° to 100° in the shade, rarely attaining to 100°, but the hot winds blow strongly, and out of doors the rocky ground reflects the sun with great force. The greatest heat does not last above six weeks at the outside, and rarely more than a month if the rains fall early; but during the whole of the S. W. monsoon a strong sea breeze renders the nights delightfully cool and refreshing.

In common with the neighbouring country Midnapore has been lately visited with frequent hurricanes, and from its exposed situation great destruction has been caused by them; but in the ordinary course, storms are not more frequent here than elsewhere; it must be observed, however, that many accidents from lighting have occurred in certain parts of the station, the electric fluid being of course readily attracted by the great quantity of iron in the soil.

We may naturally expect this climate to be more than usually healthy, and as far as Europeans are concerned it is strikingly so. But little malaria can be generated on such a soil, and consequently remittent and intermittent fevers are almost unknown, though of course many cases of the latter are found, which have been brought by the patients from some other district, and several of these have derived great benefit from the dry air of the station. In comparison with most other places in the low country dysentery is a very rare disease at Midnapore.

The diseases to which a European constitution is most liable are, as in all other rocky tropical soils, inflammation of the viscera and plethora; but in referring to the mortality of the last ten years, I find that in a population averaging forty Europeans, only one fatal case of the patitis has occurred; six adults and three infants being the total number of deaths which have happened amongst the

* This was written last year; but I believe the damage has since been repaired.

European inhabitants during the whole of that period, with the exception of the officers of the 38th Regt. Native Infantry who were brought from the Bomaughattea jungles in a dying state, and whose deaths, of course, have nothing to do with the Midnapore climate.

The station does not appear equally salubrious for the natives, as the proportion of sickness and death is almost as great amongst them as in any other part of Bengal, though they themselves think highly of the climate. Indeed, the mortality in the Jail Hospital has at times even exceeded that of most other neighbouring stations: the peculiarity of their mode of living, their general habits, and the fact that the native population inhabit all the confined low damp spots which can be found in the place, appear to me sufficient to account for this difference. The native regiment, which is at present stationed here, has had a large proportion of sick, but it suffered severely during two campaigns in the Cole country, and the sick are chiefly the old invalids who were affected in these campaigns. The most prevalent diseases amongst the natives are, as usual, fever, dysentery, and diarrhœa; and for some years a species of Hospital Gangrene in the shape of severe sloughing ulcers has at times visited the Jail and latterly the Military Hospital.

Midnapore cannot, of course, be looked on as a sanatarium; but the superiority of its climate over that of the surrounding country would make it perhaps a desirable place for invalids to resort to, who require merely a temporary change of air to a better climate than Calcutta and its neighbourhood can afford them, and its vicinity to the Presidency makes it easily available for such a purpose.

Considered as a residence for Europeans it is certainly far preferable to any Bengal climate, with which I am acquainted within a moderate distance from Calcutta. Intemperate habits would doubtless suffer more here than in the rice fields, from liver and determination of blood to the head, but they would be comparatively free from many other equelly fatal disorders and the dry invigorating air would be very beneficial to the constitutions of those who have been exhausted by frequent fevers and dysenteries.

These remarks have been drawn from observations upon Europeans of the better classes, whose habits are careful and temperate, but I have since learnt that about 18 years ago a squadron of European cavalry were quartered at Midnapore for some time, and that cerebral affections, which prove extremely fatal, where prevalent amongst them to a great extent. This may be attributed, perhaps, to their intemperate habits accompanied by exposure to sudden changes of temperate in the careless fashion which European soldiers indulge in; but it is an important fact with reference to Midnapore being ever made a station for English troops, and would require more than ordinary precautions to be adopted in regulating their mode of living, &c.

ON THE DYN MUHR OF THE MOOHUMMUDAN LAW.

To Major Benson,

Military Secretary to the Right Hon'ble Lord William Bentinck, Governor-General of India.

Sir,—In the present communication I proceed to offer a few observations on the subject of the Dyn Muhr or dower of the Moohummudans.

It is a point of purely Civil Law, and I confess I am doubtful of the propriety of addressing the Right Hon'ble the Governor-General on the subject; the remedy, however, which I have to propose, does not amount to an actual alteration of the Law, and I am emboldened accordingly to proceed.

In treating of the subject, I shall endeavour to unfold the original object of the law-giver of Islam in instituting the Dyn Muhr, the modifications which have taken place in the structure of society affecting the fitness of the institution; and lastly I shall detail, how I propose to restore and confine the law to the original object contemplated by its founder.

No Moohummudan woman is perhaps ever married without a Dyn Muhr, and although the Prophet has fixed the minimum for dower at ten dirhems, (between 3 and 4 rupees), no sum has been stated as a maximum, and strange to say a menial servant, who has probably not ten rupees in the world, would think it disgraceful to him to give his wife a smaller dower than 20,000 Rs., and others in proportion, according to their actual wealth, or the former importance of their families; or to view the subject probably in a more correct, and certainly in a more pleasing light, perhaps no father will be found willing to bestow his daughter on less unequal terms.

But it will seem still more strange, that these women, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, never receive one farthing of their dower; on the contrary, the Moohummudans with true parental affection, almost always give a portion of their wealth in the shape of clothes, jewels and cash to their daughters on their marriage. What then, it may be asked, is the object of this institution? The above facts sufficiently point it out. It is intended solely to prevent the husband from turning off his wife at his pleasure, which he cannot do without previously paying her dower. It likewise secures her against want, should she have no family, and her husband by other wives have heirs, who might otherwise neglect her; and happy is it for the Moohummudan women of this country, that such an institution exists, for by long intercourse with the Hińdoos, they have adopted the custom, though repugnant to the doctrines of the Koran, of entering into no second marriage.

Their marriage rites are simple in the extreme. An attorney on the part of the female attending, an offer is made of the bride, for a certain dower, of which offer the future husband accepts. This passes before two Moohummudan witnesses, a few pages of the Koran are read by the Cazee or his Clerk, and probably some refreshments are offered.

In law, one half of the dower is due immediately after this ceremony, and the whole on the consummation of the marriage.

We read in the Koran and elsewhere, how exceedingly jealous the Arabs were of the honor of their daughters; in so much, that they were in the habit of destroying their female offspring from their anxieties and distrust on this subject.

It must be acknowledged that an institution like the present was admirably calculated to protect them from the miseries, perhaps the infamy of divorce, and to restrain the males within some bounds, in the almost unlimited number of wives they might otherwise have espoused, under the prophet's toleration of polygamy, and his equally licentious facilities of divorce.

Nor does it appear, that the institution could have been attended with many disadvantages in a rude state of society, where property consisted almost wholly of lands, flocks and cattle, where the extended operations of commerce were utterly unknown, interest on money strictly prohibited, and borrowing consequently, except between friends and relations, little known: and where the romantic, savage, and warlike spirit of the inhabitants led them to obtain by the sword, instead of by craft and artifice, whatever money was required either for the gratification of their virtues or their vices.

In such a state of society the injurious effect of this institution could have been little felt; we have now however to examine its operation, in a state of society widely different from the former, and were we inclined to look into futurity, where we must suppose the difference to be daily and progressively increasing.

In Hindoostan so long as the country remained under a native Government, the law was probably found to be equally apt. The penalties of divorce to the female were infinitely more severe, and consequently more to be guarded against.

It is true, the riches of the country were more abundant, and the pastoral habits of the people very different from those of Arabia, yet the insecurity of property was equal or perhaps greater. The inhabitants were constantly engaged in foreign or civil wars, and a ready outlet was thus afforded for the vicious, the daring, and the profligate.

In such a state of government, neither the genius nor the vices of a people lead them to acquire by fraud, and there could be little advantage in proceeding by forgery and artifice, where there was scarcely a probability of finding a legal tribunal, on which to impose.

The present state of Oude may probably present to the mind a more lively picture of the state of society I mean to describe, than any words I can employ.

During these periods, it is probable that the helpless females were the sufferers and bore in silence where there was no hope of redress; and indeed there is reason to believe that they not unfrequently do so at the present time when our courts of law are comparatively so easy of access.

But the spirit of the times is now altered, the sword has been suddenly converted into the ploughshare; for though our armies are still on foot, the soldier comparatively frequently sinks into the grave, in the common course of nature, instead of being swept away, in the vast waste of human life, which must have been fearfully progressive in the days of the Mogul Empire. The reckless, the daring, and unquiet spirits are thus left to court fortune through humbler channels.

The country has been conquered, and is now in the hands of the conquerors, and its inhabitants like other enslaved nations have adopted and are daily more and more substituting for force, the feebler weapons of artifice and fraud. In the tranquillity which has succeeded, Courts of law, with comparative facilities of obtaining justice, have sprung up, the forms of civilized life have been established, and the interests of commerce have become more complicated and extended.

Let us now look what effect these changes have had on the aptitude of this civil institute of Islamism.

The Moosulman marries his one, two, three or four wives as he pleases: protection to these females against the miseries of divorce is equally requisite as before, but the claims of the merchant have become doubly urgent.

The husband has property, he has estates: the first disappears the last are deeply involved, and ruin stares him in the face. In this state of affairs a byemuka-sat or deed making over the whole of his property to his wives in satisfaction of their dower, or a portion of it, is made out, and collusively antedated, or perhaps, in the prospect of such a consummation, has been long since privately executed.

The effect is ruinous, the claims of his creditors are worthless, and they have no prospect of obtaining a settlement of their claims, save by working on the affections of the wives by holding out the terrors of incarceration to their husbands.

Nor is this the only evil of the present system: the amount of the Dyn Muhr is almost only known to the parties: in one case it is called for, in twenty it is not. The husband dies: the outstanding debts are brought against his estate: it is already absorbed twenty-fold by the dower of his widows, and the lawful creditors can only share with them, in a paltry proportional dividend.

Farther, a Moosulman of property may have a family by one wife, and none by another; the latter may prosecute for her enormous dower, and obtain a great part of the property, which will not devolve at her death to the heirs of her late husband, but to her own: or should the husband be the survivor, the heirs of the deceased wife may legally prosecute him, and obtain the full amount of her dower. This is hardly consonant to our ideas of justice.

Nor are these the only evils: the family of the deceased probably remain together as before: on the one hand debts are contracted by the widows; but when the just claims are brought against them, they have nothing, they have remitted the whole amount of their dower to the other heirs: on the other hand the son runs into every extravagance, and at length his bills and bonds are produced against him in fearful array: he has nothing: the whole of his father's estate went in satisfaction of his widows' dowers. In short the real heirs of a Moosulman are never known, until the point has been actually settled in a Court of law.

This is a state of affairs, which ought not to be allowed to subsist; and in my opinion, it is not insusceptible of a remedy.

I have already shown, that the great if not the sole object of the Dyn Muhr is to prevent the husband from divorcing the wife at his pleasure, which he otherwise could do; such an arrangement in my opinion is essentially necessary to protect the female against the unfettered facilities of divorce. I would therefore propose no alteration of the law, as it now stands, in so far as it affects these parties conjointly. To them the terms of the contract are mutually well known; but let us consider, how it affects the lawful creditors and heirs of the deceased husband.

On the death of his debtor, or on the transfer of his property, the creditor is quite taken by surprise. He had no means of knowing the amount of the widow's dower, and he trusted she would not claim it, for, in nineteen cases out of twenty, it is not called for; but why repeat, I have already mentioned the various modes in which he may be defrauded.

The other heirs are scarcely in a more pleasant situation, constantly at the mercy and caprice of the widows, who are probably in their turn influenced by less disinterested advisers.

Perhaps it may be argued, that the law, as it now stands, is frequently useful in correcting that unequal and apparently unjust provision of the Moohummudan Code, by which the family of a son who has died during the life of his father, is excluded from inheriting.

Such an object of this institute would not appear to have been contemplated by its founder, and I am afraid that the plan is more specious than real; for the widow, instead of using the power thus acquired, in correcting this defect of the law, more frequently abuses it, by making over the whole of her husband's property to some favorite son or grand-son, to the exclusion of a whole host of other heirs.

To obtain all the advantages, and at the same time obviate or mitigate the inconveniences of this institution I would propose, that the law should remain in full force, in so far as it affects the husband and wife conjointly; but that no woman should be entitled to sue for dower, save on divorce, and that neither she nor her heirs should have claim to such on the death of her husband.

As an heir of the deceased husband, she is entitled, without any special provision, to one-fourth of his property if childless, and to one-eighth if there be children; these of course are likewise heirs, and this would appear to be amply sufficient.

Should a husband however, from motives of affection, or from a wish to give his wives a more complete control over his children, desire to devolve his property or a portion of it on them, in satisfaction of dower, there can be no objection to his doing so, provided the community are fairly and timeously apprized of his intentions.

This can only be effected by having the deeds publicly executed in the office of the Cazee of the purgunnah, and afterwards registered in the Zillah Court; provided likewise that no undue partiality be shown to any one wife or her children, and that such estate be still held answerable for all debts contracted bonâ fide, previously to the execution of the deed.

Should such an alteration be deemed too sweeping, great advantage might be derived from simply enacting that no Dyn Muhr or deed in satisfaction of dower be considered valid or binding, (save on the husband during his life,) unless duly executed on a suitable stamp in the office of the Cazee of the Purgunnah, and afterwards registered in the Zillah Court, and that all such deeds be considered in full force, until the property has been legally alienated or transferred in a similar manner.

Were such a provision enacted, there is little doubt that every Dyn Muhr of any consequence would be thus executed, and a considerable revenue might be made to accrue to the state, were such a mode of raising revenue considered desirable, while its mercantile interests would be protected; and if some should foolishly persist in advancing money, they would do so with a full view of the consequences before them.

Such a system of registry would facilitate the transaction of Dakhil Kharij suits, and might likewise afford considerable assistance to the Collectors of Revenue, in enabling them to determine on the sufficiency of securities offered by the renters of Government lands.

It may be objected to the proposal, that it would be an encroachment on the rights of our Moohummudan subjects; the second plan would not be so; but our alteration of their laws regarding debtors, mortgages, limitation of time in suing, &c. &c. shows, that we have not hesitated to alter and modify, where it appeared to be for the benefit of the country to do so: and I am confident, that we shall meet with no opposition from the natives, so long as they are satisfied that such is ou object.

In conclusion, may I beg, you will do me the favor to lay the foregoing remarks before the Right Hon'ble the Governor-General, who perhaps will do me the honor of perusing them.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedient Servant,

JAS. HUTCHINSON.

NOTES ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

No. XLVIII.

ON THE MODE OF ADMINISTERING THE GOVERNMENT OF OUDE WHEN IT SHALL FALL INTO THE POSSESSION OF THE ENGLISH.

In my last I attempted a sketch of the present state of Oude, and endeavored to show that the satisfaction of the people with their own Government was much greater than that which exists in the neighbouring provinces under the authority of the English; yet that in the course of a few years, perhaps indeed within the next three or four (setting aside the anxiety of the Court of Directors to take it immediately into their possession) affairs were taking that turn which would almost of necessity place the country under the British dominion.

The anxiety of the Court of Directors to realize the tempting revenues which may be expected from Oude, will probably prevent their waiting for the natural course of things; and by the end of the year, the reiterated order to take possession of the country will probably be received in India with [illegible]. This however is immaterial to the subject of the present paper, in which I propose to discuss the best mode of governing Oude, when it shall come into our hands.

In the first place, I hope we shall avoid the mistake we have hitherto made for many years, on our acquisition of different portions of territory. No sooner have we taken possession, than at one blow we have annihilated every existing establishment, whether for the administration of the revenue, or of civil or criminal justice,—we have pronounced the natives in the mass to be corrupt and incapable; and dismissed them all from their situations however respectable, and however well qualified they might be to discharge the duties of them with fidelity and efficiency. In the attempt to supply their places by English agency, we have usually appointed about one-third of the number of officers required. Our next step has been to raise the taxes to a much greater height than was ever done by their own governments, the large landholders who possessed establishments of servants, elephants and horses, being especially marked for plunder;* and this course has been persevered in until we have succeeded in reducing almost all the landed proprietors (those only escaping who had the means to bribe, or who were connected with the native officers of our establishment) to a happy equality of pauperism. They may now rest contentedly. "Qui procumbit humi, non habet unde cad[illegible] the high[illegible]

Such is the pl[illegible] authority [illegible] acted and yet [illegible] on which we have hitherto confer upon [illegible] and we boast of the blessings we with them the people, and flatter ourselves [illegible] idea that our Government is much more popular with them than their own. It is absurd to see the effects of self-delusion and vanity in blinding the eyes of men to the real state of things even before their eyes. In any other case in which prejudice and interest have no concern we should be quick enough in perceiving the truth; and indeed would we give ourselves the trouble to reflect a little even here, we could scarcely remain long in error. Is it possible that any nation would endure an oppressive and galling yoke, and while bending beneath its weight caress the hand which presses it upon them? Would the people of England consider the dominion of a handful of African conquerors so exercised a blessing to them? and are not the passions and feelings of human nature much the same in all countries on points where they are much exercised or wounded? but the day is gone by when this system can be continued with impunity, and rejoiced indeed am I to perceive by the manifesto lately issued by the head of the Government that this is at length perceived and acknowledged. It is indeed a proud day for India when the Governor-General stands forth and boldly asserts the principles expressed in his letter on the press and when the chief authority of the state comes forward to support their cause, we may indeed hope for better things. Let it not be forgotten, let the words be written as "with a pen of iron," and engraved upon our hearts and memories, that "whatever be the will of Almighty Providence respecting the future Government of India, it is clearly our duty, so long as the charge be confided to our hands, to execute the trust to the best of our abilities for the GOOD OF THE PEOPLE," (see Sir Charles Metcalfe's letter on the proposed press law) and again—"It cannot be that we are permitted by divine authority to be here merely to collect the revenue of the country, pay the establishments necessary to keep possession, and get into debt to supply the deficiency—we are doubtless here for higher purposes," &c. (Ibid.) Yes, if we wish to retain India we must indeed learn to govern it for the benefit of the people, and not on the principle that has lately actuated us—the sole benefit of its foreign rulers. All that is required is to act up to these sentiments.

But with respect to Oude. That country has been governed by natives from the earliest record we possess relating to it. It is still standing [illegible] by natives; and notwith again and again assert, [illegible] wauched court, I do contradicted with proof, by't fear of being unprejudiced men, that the p[illegible]partial and are much better satisfied with their[illegible] large ment than the population of our north-western provinces are with ours. We shall, too, find it a much more difficult matter to introduce the system above described into Oude than we did in the neighbouring districts. In these, the leveling system and extra taxation at every settlement has come more gradually upon the people; but those of Oude have witnessed not only the progressive operation, but the result also; and they plainly perceive that our subjects are much poorer than themselves. It would require a considerable military force to introduce the English revenue-screw into Oude, most especially if it be accompanied with the discharge of every respectable native from employment, and the introduction of the lower classes who have almost exclusively been substituted under our rule. Instead of attempting to introduce such a system it would be a noble opportunity to attempt to govern the country in all the details by the natives, with only a few Englishmen at the head to lay down general rules, and see that they were attended to. We cannot say, as we do of our own provinces, that there are no natives of rank or respectability to be found. In the different provinces of Oude are men holding situations of equal or greater power than our Judges, Magistrates and Collectors; and the people are better satisfied than our own subjects. But I will proceed to the detail.

Oude is large enough to be divided into six or perhaps seven districts. To superintend these, five English functionaries will be sufficient, provided they be men of ability, well acquainted with the country and the people. Of these, two should form a Board of Revenue, two a Court of Sudder Dewannee and Nizamut; and the 3d be a Superintendent of Police. Their respective establishments must be on a very moderate scale.

First for the Revenue. The Board should make the tour of the country, and appoint in each district, an Aumil as Collector. It should examine the old records, as to the collections of the district, and from these, and the inspection of various parts of it, a rough estimate might be formed of the sum which the district could afford to pay—this should be explained to the Aumil; and he should be left to make a twenty year settlement in detail, with each village, or with the rich talookdars or landholders. The Board should also explain as clearly as possible to the people, the orders that had been given to the Aumil. Proper agreements would of course be drawn out in duplicate, and deposited, one with the Aumil, and one with the Board. Instead of turning all the large talookdars or landholders out of their estates, our object should be to uphold them, as much as possible. We would ultimately gain more by the assistance which might be derived from these than by the small increase of revenue which their plunder would produce. They might be made to furnish a quota of men according to their means for the assistance of the Police.

If the members of the Board divided the country and made their periodical tours separately [illegible] be able, during the cold season, most closely to [illegible] conduct of the Aumils; and after the settlements were completed—provided each member, instead of general observations, would content himself with a few local ones, and note down what he had observed—annual tours, during its existence, would enable them to form a very fair estimate of what the next settlement ought to yield. It would be very expedient not to have the long settlement made for the whole country in one year; but to introduce it gradually into two or three—for the first year; two the second; and two the third. Making temporary settlements with the latter in the mean time.

This would enable the Board most fully to superintend the proceedings of the Aumils, both at the first and at any subsequent settlement.

The next point is the Police. In each district I would have a Magistrate under the name of Foujdar, and an assistant with a small Police establishment of burkandazes, constables; the chief use of which would be to be stationed on the high roads. The duty of reporting crimes, apprehending criminals, and assisting, when called upon, should, as it is now, be chiefly imposed on the landholders; for the Ryutwar system, having happily been unknown in Oude, there this class of people still retain considerable power and authority over the rest of the villagers, which, with a little tact on our part, might be rendered of such use as to enable us to keep but a very small paid establishment. Some of these landholders might be intrusted with authority to adjust disputes regarding trespasses of cattle and other minor matters; always reporting the same to the Magistrates. It would be a considerable benefit to the people; and the existence of an authority on the spot would very often prevent a slight quarrel from ripening into a serious dispute, in which perhaps swords would be drawn and blood shed. The power of the Magistrate should be equal to that of our Magistrates; and all more serious cases should be committed for trial as in our provinces. Appeals from the decisions of Magistrates should be either to the Superintendent of Police or the Court of Sudder Nizamut, as might be most convenient to those who preferred the appeals. The Superintendent would of course be making frequent tours to watch the conduct of the Magistrates; and introduce one uniform system.

The third point is the civil administration. In each district there should be an officer for whom the native name of Hakim would probably be most appropriate; whose situation should be nearly equivalent to that of our Civil and Session Judges In civil suits I would have his powers quite the same, and under him, for the decision of different classes of civil suits should be a proportion of Principal Sudder Ameens, Sudder Ameens and Monsiffs, whose numbers would be fixed according to the quantum of business which might be expected to be brought before each of them. In criminal trials the Hakim with the assistance of the Principal Sudder Ameen or Sudder Ameen as an assessor, should sentence as far as seven or perhaps ten years imprisonment. All cases requiring a more severe punishment, to be referred to the Sudder Nizamut.

This Court would, in the first instance, make a tour to appoint the judicial officers; and while one remained at head-quarters to conduct current business, (which would maturally be at Lucknow) the other should annually make a tour of the different districts to inspect the conduct of the judicial officers.

The City of Lucknow itself would probably be sufficient to make an eighth district, as far as regards the civil and Police jurisdiction. The former may be precisely on the footing of one of the districts. For the Police, considering the number of men of rank residing in the City who have hitherto enjoyed, practically, almost an immunity from subjection to the ordinary authorities, the great variety of population to be found there, consisting of men of almost every nation of Asia and Europe, it would probably be found expedient to have an English covenanted Magistrate, with an assistant. The whole of the other situations should ordinarily be given to natives, although I should not object to a sprinkling of East Indians; and some years hence, to the introduction of Europeans not regularly in the service of Government.

Nor would I confine the selection of natives entirely to those of Oude. The greater number would however undoubtedly be from that Province, for there alone, in all upper India have natives of rank and respectability been employed in situations of dignity and emolument, so as to have acquired habits of authority; for I again repeat that so far from the Aumils or even the Tehseeldars being people of low origin who have acquired their situations by bribery among the courtiers, the majority of those officers are men of good family and some wealth, and residents of the provinces of Oude. It may be thought that I have fixed the establishments at too low a scale; but we should recollect that in Oude the feelings of the people have not been outraged, nor their customs overturned, as has been the case in our own provinces by a succession of ignorant young Englishmen.* That they have had no Ryutwar systems to split the land ad infinitum and thereby occasion hundreds of complaints and suits regarding possession: that they have not been harrassed by judicial divisions one year, reversed by Special Commissions the next: that their estates have not been sold by auction either for a trifling balance, or for no balance at all, by the contrivance of revenue officers: that they have not been annoyed by [illegible] keels and mob[illegible] authority a host of vakeels (inferior attorneys) who are ready to promote every species of family quarrels and other disputes, in order to enrich themselves: consequently, that in a given population, there will be much fewer suits and complaints than in our own territories.

With regard to the succession of officers, I would have it understood that an able assistant might, on the occurrence of a vacancy, be appointed Aumil or Foujdar; and that in the judical line, a Moonsiff, Sudder Ameen, or Principal Sudder Ameen, might each be promoted to the next superior grade, not even excluding that of Hakim itself. At the same time, it would be injudicious to lay down any invariable rule of this nature, by which men of rank and respectability and good qualifications who would not probably accept the lower situations, would be excluded from the higher appointments.

It would be necessary that for each class of officers, a set of rules should be drawn up. The spirit of course to be taken from our regulations, without their technicalities and wordiness; and certain forms and reports should be prescribed. The English superintendents must be men of a superior stamp, well versed both in the letter and spirit of the Regulations, but not of that prejudiced class with whom all law is gospel. They should be well acquainted with the language and customs of the people; prepared to view things with a liberal and lenient eye, and instead of supposing that all is going wrong because a few inequalities are discovered; where they are unintentional, they should quietly point out the mistake, and be content to allow a little time for affairs to be brought into that regular train in which they ought to be. They must not be too strict on the subject of what is called bribery—of course any thing like a bribe for a specific purpose of which proof could be obtained would be brought forward and punished; but it must not be supposed that every present is a bribe. The custom of making presents to those in authority on certain festivals is so strong among the people, particularly in the native Governments, that it would be almost impossible to eradicate it all at once.

Let us now calculate the expense of ruling Oude on the plan I have suggested.

| | Per Month. | Per Annum. |
| 5 English Functionaries at | Rs 3,500 | Rs 2,10,000 |

Every thing is here put down rather on a high scale. The Tahseeldar establishment of the Aumil might probably be reduced as soon as the twenty years settlement was completed; for instead of having to collect, as in our provinces from a host of poor impoverished wretches who just contrive to exist, the revenue in Oude would be realized from a much smaller number of people, well able to pay the demand against them, the subordinate judicial establishment of Sudder Ameen, &c. is probably larger than will be found necessary. The pay of the Moonsiffs too is entered on a higher scale than those in our provinces, whose emoluments are certainly by far too small. Nevertheless the charge for the whole of Oude, including the superintending English functionaries, and comprizing in fact eight districts if not much more than the establishments of the Judge, Collector, and Magistrate for three districts would cost in the provinces, taking into consideration the proportion of the expense of the Commissioners, Board of Revenue, and Sudder Dewannee Adawlut, which should be charged to those districts. With regard to the pension, which should be allowed to the King, that I leave to Government to settle, as I have not the means of forming a guess as to what the amount may be; but I would here give a caution against too suddenly withdrawing the pension and sinecure salaries, which so many about the Court now enjoy. It is true that few of them really deserve what they receive; but we should recollect, that almost all who receive, keep up large bodies of retainers, and armed followers: were all these men suddenly turned adrift, which must be the consequence of suddenly stopping the income of those by whom they are supported, the dispersion of so many thousand armed men who were deprived of the means of subsistence might lead to serious consequences in a city like Lucknow, containing an immense mass of wealth, and composed almost entirely of narrow streets, which are never lit up.

It would be equally inexpedient to disband suddenly the whole of the King's troops, as it would fill the country with men who would, probably, resort to plunder and robbery to support themselves. It would be a much wiser plan to entertain a portion of them, sufficient to form two Regiments of Infantry and one of horse, placing them on the footing of our Local Corps. They might be made extremely useful for Police purposes, and would probably enable us considerably to diminish the strength of the Police as above estimated. particularly in the city of Lucknow [illegible] Infantry and might also be employed in escorting [illegible] for short distances, and in other modes, thereby relieving the troops of the line from a variety of harrassing duty. Hereafter, as affairs became settled, and those who were discharged began to find other employment, the pensions might be reduced, and these Local troops gradually disbanded. The gross revenue which might at present be realized without difficulty from Oude would probably somewhat exceed a crore of rupees. The expense of collection and management I have already estimated: what the net revenue might be would depend on the pensions granted to the King, his Ministers, and courtiers, and those who now draw money from the public treasury. Undoubtedly were the country delivered over to the Crack-Collectors who from the neighbouring districts are looking with longing eyes on what they consider their prey, a larger sum might be realized; but where would be the benefit of impoverishing the people when the extra sum acquired would be absorbed in the increased expenses of the collection?

The suggestions above advanced will, I have little doubt, excite the scorn and contempt of many; but let the truth be recollected, for truth it is, that Oude has been governed entirely by natives; and that notwithstanding certain abuses, the mass of the people are better contended with their government, with all its imperfections, than our subjects are with ours in the adjoining provinces.

When we do obtain possession of that country, it would be a noble opportunity by proper selection of British functionaries to carry the system into effect, of shewing what may be done by native management, and how much more cheaply we might govern India than we have hitherto contrived to do.

ON CAPITAL AND ITS DIFFUSION IN INDIA.

LETTER XV.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BOMBAY GAZETTE.

"The greatest misfortune of a country is an indigent tenantry. Whatever be the native advantages of the soil, or even the skill and industry of the occupier, the want of a sufficient capital confines every plan, as well as cripples and weakens every operation of husbandary."—Hume's Essays.

The third good reason for borrowing money on mortgage of private estates exists not I believe with regard to the public. The Company have ceased to trade, and therefore can have nothing to do with a principle which has reference only to trade. Of that part of the public property which consists in official buildings, &c. there is seldom a sufficient quantity in the market at any one time to make the manner of their disposal a matter of much national importance, and to prevent any appearance of partiality, as well as to realize their price immediately, public auction is the mode most commonly used. Doubtless a field may be found for the exertion of economy even in such matters as these, but it will be the economy of the petty details, not that of general principles.

No two things can be more different from each other than are these two species of economy, though unfortunately they are too often confounded together. I do not know whether the names I have given them be those usually adopted, or even whether their natures will be quite understood by such description, but to explain my meaning more fully, I will mention a few of their qualities. The economy of details looks to nothing but the quality of money expended; the economy of principles looks chiefly to the result of the expenditure. The former may often err in its application; the latter must always be right. The former is like the miser who loves to hoard his cash, yet through stinginess, will not lay out a penny in insuring or securing it; the latter is like the liberal but cautious banker, who is not ashamed to scrutinize well the security upon which he advances his money, but, having found that trust worthy, cares little to what extent his assistance is given. The former is like a landlord who would not even go to the expense of tilling his own grounds; the latter is like him who would cultivate even the hired land of others, grudging not the disbursement at seed time, for he knows he must be repaid amply at the harvest. The former will do well if it prevent a man's declining in the world; the latter is annually adding to his riches. The former, in short, is like the mean and paltry economy of the save all, which the merest kitchenwench might have planned; the latter is like the economy of the steam engine and all those other economical inventions in mechanics, the search after which has so greatly advanced the noble sciences, and the discovery of which has raised their authors to the highest pinnacle of fame, and left admirring nations in uncertainty whether their improvements have most increased the wealth of the world, or their splendid genius contributed to its adornment.

We will now proceed to the fourth legitimate cause for mortgaging private revenue; a cause, which is particularly resonable, and ought to be allowed as extensively as possible in the disposal of public money. It is, to make such loans to respectable tenants, in times of extreme distress, as may support their credit, and prevent the lands being thrown out of occupation. Even in the most barbarous times, such loans have been granted by Indian soverings, though the terms on which they were bestowed and nearly all their other measures relating to the cultivators, shewed that it was not so much out of compassion or a desire to improve the condition of their subjects they granted the favour, as through fear their rapacity, carried to too great extremes, would destroy all prospect of future revenue, and drive the miserable wretches from whom it was wrung to suicide or starvation. These however are not the loans which are necessary; they must not be such as barely to enable the debtors of the state to keep body and soul together; they must be such as will afford them the means of advancing with rapid strides towards a state of comparative wealth, and as to gradually do away with the necessity of borrowing money at all.

Do not suppose that I am chimerical enough to desire that the interests of Government should be wholly, or even at all, neglected, and that it should advance treasure freely to every one who happens to be in want of such assistance. I am well aware that, even at the present moment, considerable difficulty is found in making the receipts cover the demands on the state; and certainly, under those circumstances, to waste, or even to risk any sum in absurd projects would be most unpardonable. Every thing ought to be suffered rather than that public credit should be injured, and public credit can only be maintained for any length of time by a wise expenditure of the public money. I know that though it would be well that a considerable portion of cash should be occasionally advanced to assist our tenantry, and enable them to work their farms, and dispose of their produce to much better advantage than they can do at present, in a word, that they must before the country can become prosperous, be rescued from the clutch of the bunyas; (whose slaves the greater part of them by borrowing at usurious interest virtually become,) yet still, centuries of misrule before our arrival have reduced the people to so low and indigent a state, that to grant them loans with safety to the finances would at the present moment be impossible. Some small sums indeed might be lent on the security of standing crops; but these, after deducting the rent, would be too insignificant to give any permanent relief, in fact such loans are always injurious eventually to those who contract them.

It is well known that at present few monied men will cultivate the Company's land, except those whose whole property is so fixed to the soil, that they could not realize its benefits without continuing to follow that employment. There is an excellent reason for this, which is, that a man can generally make larger profits by lending his money to landholders, than he could by occupying land himself; and this enormous interest is procurable, because the landholder has often little security to give but that of his person, which it is useless to attach in case of insolvency, or that of his crops, which is an uncertain pledge to the lender, and I have in a former letter shown to be a most ruinous one to the borrower. This is a most unnatural state of things, and nothing but the extreme poverty of the ryuts could produce it: poverty is a hard taskmaster, but even positive slavery would by most men be preferred to starvation.

To destroy this system of usury on the one part, and penury on the other, is the purpose for which, at the proper time, the Government ought to open its coffers; though, as in most similar affairs, it will only be necessary for it to lead the way, for it certainly will not want followers; then it will be able to withdraw from the field, leaving it to the more proper rivalry of private speculations.

At present there is little or no good security to be offered for money advanced for agricultural purposes. The first thing then which must be done is to create it. Unless capital be applied, the land will not yield half the profits it is capable of returning; and unless the interest paid for the use of that capital be moderate, no one can afford to apply it. But to procure large sums at low interest, good security is requisite, and until it is in the power of the landholders in general to offer such, they will never be better than day-labourers.

The best security for a farmer is land or houses, because he may always use them, and need only mortagage a part of their profits whenever he is in want of funds to lay out upon his farm. It should in consequence be an object of our greatest attention, to lead our subjects as much as is in our power to invest their wealth in this species of property. Whether it be bought or merely taken on lease is perhaps less important, though of course the more complete the purchase, and the longer the lease, the better will be the security which they give. In leases, however, we should endeavour to introduce that kind, in which the value is paid at the commencement, rather than the other, in which a large annual rent is reserved; as, in this latter case, the property will be held in little estimation by bankers. The sums which are obtained by persons commencing business, and the smallness of the interest paid by Government and mercantile houses of repute, prove incontestibly, that it is mainly for want of good security that the agriculturists are unable to procure money on such terms as will admit of their being able to profit by its use, and that if this impediment were taken away, capital would be at least as accessible to them as it is to others. But still the Government may have to set an example, and when masses of real property shall have accumulated in the hands of its subjects, there will be neither difficulty nor danger in its doing so.

How far the existing laws relating to successions should be modified, it is not for me to say. To introduce beneficial measures is the duty of every government; but how far it may be justified in altering the fundamental institutions of the state is a question of no ordinary difficulty to solve; one thing, however, is certain, namely, that no ruler, even if he had the power, should entertain the will to interfere with such, except in cases of the most urgent necessity. But whether any alternation be made or not in the law, it is doubtless in the power of the Government to do a great deal towards directing the wealth of its subjects into any desired channel, and I think that, until the landed interest has attained a more flourishing position, the best investment should be landed property. In a word, the most strenuous efforts of those in power ought to be directed towards encouraging the accumulation of masses of real property in the hands of their subjects, and towards assisting those who have good security of this description to give with loans at low interest, until private capitalists shall be reduced to the necessity of either advancing money to agriculturists on equitable terms, or deserting a branch of their business, which, then if not usurously lucrative, will give them a certain and sufficiently ample return. Which alternative they will accept no man can doubt, and when they shall have accepted it, Government will be at liberty again to leave matters to their ordiuary course and return to its proper position, which is that of a powerful and vigilant moderator, destroying alike the vicious machinations of riches and of poverty, but ever ready to give a helping hand to virtuous and suffering industry.

LETTER XVI.

The fifth and last good ground for mortgaging private revenue is unavoidable necessity, when the hesitation to risk a part may cause the loss of the whole. This, of course, must apply also to the public revenue, and, indeed, so obviously, that it is quite needless to say any thing more on the subject. The only question that can ever arise on this point is, whether at any particular moment such unavoidable necessity exists or not; but, of this, those who are placed at the head of the state, are supposed to be generally the best judges, because they are possessed of information which few or none in inferior grades can have access to.

Whenever money raised by loan is expended in one of the five ways which I have enumerated, it is expended beneficially for the country; for other ordinary purposes the ordinary revenues are availabe, and, whatever may be said by these economists who will run all hazards and defy all consequences in their endeavours to save a few farthings, a country will never be ruined by such disbursements. These persons are excessively fond of asserting that the craft of statesmanship is a mere chimera, and that nothing but common sense and common honesty are requisite in conducting public affairs; but is their own conduct guided by either common sense or common honesty? Would common sense even induce a man who wanted a servant, to put up the place to public auction, and give it to him who might agree to take the lowest wages? Would common honesty lead any one to discharge, or reduce the stipend of an old and faithful domestic, who had merely consented to accept a low salary originally in consequence of a promise expressed or implied, that he should not be cast off in his old age? If in the first case such servant should prove unfaithful, would it be astonishing? if, in the second, he were to believe that dishonesty in the master might be fairly met by dishonesty in the man, would any body be surprised?

The fact is that both common sense and common honesty are the best ingredients, perhaps the principal, in the character of either an upright man or an upright minister; but, I hope it is not presumption in me to say that, those who, in political matters, vaunt most the virtues of these qualities, will too often be found to possess them least. I do not mean that they are more than others personally vicious, but that their public views are frequently such, as if entertained by one man against another in private life, would consign him who held them to well meritted infamy.

There is something so noble in preserving public faith at all risk, there is something in such conduct which must endear a government to its dependants, the implicit reliance, which under such circumstances the subject will ever place upon the sovereign, is productive of so ardent a loyalty, and so anxious a desire to discharge with integrity the duties which the latter may require, that I cannot but wonder that, for paltry pecuniary considerations, this, the very keystone of the arch of power, should be endangered. I will not say that salaries should never be curtailed, or that abuses in the public expenditure should never be corrected because individuals may profit by them. Government is omnipotent in all arrangements relating to these matters; but, if it be all powerful, it should at least remember upon what foundation that power stands, and never trifle with the base of a a structure, the rapid rise of which has astonished foreign nations, who are already both predicting and plotting its downfall.

Every writer who has touched upon Indian politics has declared that the main foundation of British power in this country is the high estimation in which British faith, justice, and generosity are held. I will not endeavour to injure so fair a picture, I will not suppose that our arms had much to do with our conquests, I will even forget for a moment, those passages in Indian history, which describe the occasional subservience of all the greatest in the nation to the worst of princes, their emulation of each other in adulation to sovereigns, the flagitiousness of whose lives was hidden by the number of swordsmen at their back. Indeed I am right in not raising this objection; for the intriguing and debauched nobles who preferred the sale of their honour to facing danger in the field, or espousing the cause of virtue in the council chamber, no longer deform our territory; and, as upon the ruins of the feudal power in Europe, the commons rose to affluence and distinction, and became the most important and influential party in the state, so probably will it be with India; the power of its barons having been destroyed, a party is now doubtless forming silently, perhaps unconsciously, which will prove far more virtuous, but which will certainly be also more patriotic, and stubbornly independent than that which preceded it. With these, then, the empire of opinion must be strictly preserved; for with these, public opinion will be the standard, rather than the banner of war and the kettledrum: implicit faith in the integrity of the English Government is a feeling which must in their breasts be fostered to the utmost degree; to effect this two things are essentially requisite; first, the dedication of our whole faculties to benefit this country in every manner possible, and second, to be particularly cautious in extending financial reductions to the salaries of natives, which have already been sanctioned by authority.

The majority of every people is more interested through the pocket than by any other means. A lavish expenditure too often reconciles men to despotism, over-taxation will make even liberty gall. Knowing this we ought to be aware that the very worst economy this country could ever be cursed with, is an injudicious application of the shears to the allowances of public servants or pensioners.

Native public servants are generally the most intelligent persons in the native community. Accustomed to a free intercourse with their European superiors, they learn more thoroughly to appreciate their characters than other men possibly can. In their eyes we are not deities; they have entered the penetralia of the temple, and have probably discovered how little the worship we receive is owing to the majesty of the idol, how much to the superstition of the crowd; they have seen that we too are subject to passions; they have perhaps learnt to take advantage of them. They have doubtless found that great intellect is not universally the attribute of the white man, and that even personal firmness has been denied to some of our nation. They are intimately acquainted with the resources of the provinces in which they have served, and have not been unobservant of the sentiments of the inhabitants. They often return at last to their native villages, there to enlighten their neighbours with anecdotes of their rulers and to take perhaps a prominent part either with the supporters of our power, or with the opposers of it as the treatment they met with in our employ may have been satisfactory or otherwise.

In our plenitude of power, we have not, I dare say, entirely forgotten how absolutely necessary we found it upon our first taking possession of each successive addition to our territories, to conciliate this class of men, in order to obtain their co-operation with us in setting the civil arrangements with the details of which they only were acquainted. In fact, in every country, the class of official men must be gained before any great progress can be made in its administration. They are well versed in business, and often possess more information upon practical points, than many of those who are pleased to look down upon them with contempt. Is this then a body which we can even now venture to slight with impunity? Or, even if it is possible to do so, would any wise man run the risk of exciting their opposition? Do you suppose that a set of discontented men of this description with the advantages for working both good and evil which they possess, could not be provoked to do more mischief, than any petty deduction from their pay or their pension would compensate for? To admit a man to the knowledge of all the arcana of Government, and then deliberately to make an enemy of him for the sake of economy, is certainly the most extraordinary way of adding to the stability of dominion that man ever heard of. We cannot govern any country, especially a conquered one, without paying for assistance; to attempt therefore, to curtail any really necessary branch of expenditure, would be about the same as the conduct of a labourer, who should, to increase his property, save half the expenses of his dinner daily, and then in a week reduce himself to so feeble a state as to be unable to earn the price of a dinner at all. Disaffection is always expensive to the Government, by causing either a decrease in its revenues or an increase in its expenditure; then what economy is there in provoking it? Why for the sake of a trifling present saving, sow the seeds of discontent, the fruits of which, when mature, it may cost you millions to destroy?

No man has ever doubted the right of sovereign power in India, (wherever that power may be) to reduce expenditure to what point it pleases; but sovereigns should have some regard to policy as well as right, and the best policy is that, which dictates a strict fulfilment of existing engagements whether expressed or implied, inclining, in the interpretation of them, rather to the side of generosity than of penuriousness. But public servants do not live for ever; and though old engagements should be acted up to, there is no necessity of entering into new ones; moreover, there is always a great number of persons, who may be said for the moment to have the bounty of Government, rather than to be permanently to its service; and these, if economy demands their dismissal, can have no right to complain.

It is very difficult to lay down any distinct line of demarcation between those whom the Government may be considered pledged to maintain, and those from whom it may, without injustice, withhold farther pecuniary assistance; an examination into individual cases is often requisite before this point can be ascertained correctly; but decisions in these matters, when impartially made, seldom fail to give general satisfaction. The public do not begrudge money really due, and claimants retire pacified, if convinced that justice has been honestly meted out to them.

Of late years, however, this principle appears to have been neglected. Great claims and small seem to have been held in equal estimation. Nothing is spared. Every one is in suspense. Those who escape present reduction are alarmed at seeing neighbours deprived of allowances, which appeared to stand on as good a foundation as their own; and they, not without reason, fear that the respite granted to themselves will prove merely temporary. Even the hardly earned pension is not deemed too sacred for invasion. All feel their situation precarious, and begin to cast their eyes upon other, sometimes forbidden, modes of acquiring independence.

Feelings of this nature are pregnant with danger to our rule, and ought at all cost to be prevented. We should be very foolish if we imagined that interest did not form a considerable ingredient in the attachment borne to us by our conquered subjects; and the interest which has hitherto attached our public servants to us is not so much the magnitude of their salaries, as a confidence of their being continued to them. They will care little about the stability of our sovereignty if a corresponding stability in their own individual fortunes be not insured by it.

Whatever be done with regard to those who enjoy places and pensions under the British, is very immaterial to me, except that, as an Englishman, I feel a pride in beholding the empire which my nation has founded in India, and an anxiety to witness the increase of its splendour. With such pride, however, and such anxiety, I cannot but feel grieved to see a pseudo economy offered to our worship, which is daily alienating our friends, and giving strength to our enemies: which is daily lessening our reputation for those generous virtues which all once allowed us; which instead of adding to the stability, is sapping the foundation of our power; and the progress of which, like that of the idol Juggernauth, will be marked by the destruction of its blind and infatuated votaries.

LETTER XVII.

Having said as much as is necessary upon the second mode of using capital, I proceed to the third; namely, Commerce. There are two descriptions of commerce, which vary so much in their nature, and in their effects upon a country, that they can hardly be considered similar in any thing but in name: it is requisite, therefore, that our attention should be separately bestowed upon internal trade, and external. I will first speak of the former.

Internal trade is one of the most modest and unassuming, but at the same time, one of the most valuable hand-maids the state possesses. She does not indeed pretend to introduce new wealth into a country, she is content with what already exists and finds therein a sufficiently ample field for her exertions. She adds not nominally to the aggregate of the community; but, if causing a proper distribution of those riches,—if extracting from them all the good they are capable of yielding,—if affording to the poor man the means of becoming wealthy, and to the wealthy man the means of deriving pleasure and profit from his gold; if acting as the moderator of nature's inequalities, which often lavishes too prodigally on some provinces the necessaries of life, while to others she will grant only unsubstantial luxuries; if all these qualities can endear her to our affections and entitle her to our respect, then is she indeed worthy of all the homage we can offer to her.

Internal trade is to a state what the circulation of the blood is to the body; its business is rather to avail itself of the virtues of foreign substances than to produce any thing original of its own: but, if alone it will not give support, it will make the support received from external sources beneficial instead of injurious; and adding to health and vigour, prevent those foul corruptions on the natural body, which represent the deformities engendered on the body-politic by the stagnation of trade, the effect of which is that fettered and unnatural distribution of wealth which has, in too many countries, divided the population into two unapproximating classes, the one of which flies to debauchery for want of occupation, and the other is doomed to pine in perpetual and unmitigated servitude.

Trade, on the contrary, keeps every thing in wholesome circulation, the merchant of to-day becomes a noble tomorrow, and the noble, who disdains to attend to his pecuniary interests, leaves obscurity to his children as their inheritance. Money is not allowed to be idle; every penny is employed. Those of unexceptionable character who wish to engage in business can procure capital or credit to commence with; and those who have made fortunes by their exertions still derive an income by entrusting their cash to the superintendency of another. Idleness is rooted up. Cadets of even the best families must enter some profession; there is no congregation round the hearth of hereditary idlers; one may indeed be privileged, but the rest will have to exert themselves, if not to provide for their own support, at least to secure portions for their offspring. Contempt pursues the embecile fattener on another's bounty. Pride and honor point to independence; and to gain it, thousands of well educated men engage in the most arduous employments and seek the most inhospitable climes, there to implant those principles of liberty and industry which distinguish their native land, and thus, while conferring incalculable benefits on foreign countries, add not a little to the splendour and glory of their own.

But there are two principal fruits of internal trade, which are alone sufficient to make us consider this branch of commerce of first-rate importance. The first is the encouragement it gives to manufactures for home consumption, and indeed for foreign also. This not only prevents too many persons from being taken away from more profitable occupations, in order to raise subsistence for their families by agriculture, but also, gives the greatest possible encouragement to the latter by making the number of consumers far exceed that of producers, and thus, raising the price of corn to a point high enough handsomely to remunerate the grower.

Nothing can be more destructive of all chance of prosperity in a state than the conjunction generaly of several different trades in the hands of one person. A proper division of labour is always a proof of civilzation and wealth; and, it is only in barbarous countries, and poor ones, that we find a man at one season of the year supporting his family by field labour, while at another he is occupied in manufacturing its clothing. General and mutual poverty among the working classes is the only cause of this; the corn grower, from his inability to pay the weaver, is obliged himself to make what he requires, and the weaver, from his inability to pay the corn grower, is also obliged to turn agriculturist. To prevent this mischievous union of employments, and to enable each man to work only in the business which may, from his bodily constitution or peculiar skill, prove most profitable to him, it is necessary that labour of every useful description should be able to command a remunerating price. The price of labour varies in every state, and indeed is the principal criterion by which to judge of the wealth of a nation. Where it is low, nothing will be brought to perfection, because few can have the means of purchasing, but where it is high, industry may be carried to the utmost extreme, nothing is thrown away; moments, which would otherwise be spent in idleness, are profitably employed, and even the most fanciful tastes of the rich afford an honest and comfortable livelihood to the poor, who exert their industry and invention to gratify them.

The price procurable in exchange for labour is the mainspring, the moving principle of industry, which is certainly the only parent of wealth. Capital enables us to push industry to the utmost, and commerce ensures a continuance of our exertions, by taking care that our labours shall not be thrown away. To be useful to mankind, they must go hand in hand; capital is useless without trade; and trade cannot be conducted without capital. Both also equally require liberty, and the freedom granted to them can hardly be too great, for they must always be the greatest sufferers by civil disturbances, and consequently are most interested in the preservation of order.

The second great fruit of internal trade is its effect in improving internal communications. Most of the roads, as well as the canals and bridges which adorn Great Britain owe their existence to trade. They have been constructed on true commercial principles; namely, because their profits exceeded the outlay they occasioned; and in most parts, upon these principles have they been maintained. They are indeed most frequently true indices of the state of a country; where trade flourishes, they likewise become ruined, deserted, not forgotten. Roads constructed for pleasure often last no longer than the caprice which dictated their formation; commercial communications are only destroyed with that commerce, to which they are indebted for their origin.

It is evident, then, that money employed in internal trade is employed very profitably, to the estate in general, and to every individual in particular. By it the capitalist derives advantage from his capital, the industrious man procures remuneration for his industry; for every kind of goods there is a market; not only bodily labour, but also the inventions of genius are prized; the agriculturist finds a purchaser in the artisan, and the artisan is paid by the agriculturist. Every one being enabled to follow the avocation most suitable to him, engages in his business with ardour; and every one being certain of receiving a handsome remuneration for his trouble, men no longer perform their daily routine of duties with that langour and indifference, which characterize those who never have a hope of realizing any thing beyond a bare subsistence, and who never aspire to rise above their actual condition because they have melancholy evidence that the aspiration would be vain. When necessaries are plentiful, superfluities are indulged in; new wants follow the gratification of present ones; a taste for luxuries is imbibed; luxuries in time become necessaries, and so eventually springs up that constant struggle for more, which keeps the mind of man in activity, sharpens all his best talent to the utmost, and is productive of that noble and virtuous emulation, which makes each strive to continue advancing in some honourable path, and thus add his own to the long list of those, whom the public voice declares to have deserved well of their country.

LETTER XVIII.

What freedom should be allowed to trade is a question which has long been agitated, has not even yet been brought to any satisfactory settlement; but this only refers to external commerce, for, with internal, the balance may be to the advantage of one province more than to that of another, all however forming one common state, the nation itself cannot possibly be injured. The principal objection to a free trade is that of their own markets; but, when both buyers and sellers are equally the objects of our care, this cannot possibly affect us. In internal trade therefore we may assume it as a fact that the greatest possible freedom should be allowed.

It is not to be supposed that such freedom necessarily implies the absence of all taxation upon saleable commodities; we may fetter the manufacture of a deleterious article, we may derive a revenue from the capricious tastes of the luxurious, but, if we intend to allow the sale of commodities at all, the sale itself should be as free as possible. There are somethings of course that in large and demoralized cities may be subject to the supervision of the police, but they are few in number and of so small aggregate value that the laws which prevent the disposal of them for improper uses, can have no injurious effect on trade.

The severest blow which it is possible to inflict on this species of commerce, in any country, is a code of regulations which authorize the constant interference of the subordinates of the Customs department in the affairs of merchants; how much more must it obstruct traffic in India, where insolence and corruptibility are the constant vices of the lower classes of native public servants. When a tax, even an oppressive one, is equally levied on all, the body may suffer, but individuals will not at least feel partial oppression; where, however, bribery exists, the honest man will never be able to compete with the rogue.

To prevent as much as possible the evils, which the temptations held out to inferiors in the employ of revenue officers too often occasion, it has been usual with wise financiers to consider simplicity in taxation of the utmost importance. From a complicated scheme no good can be expected; the people are harrassed with multifarious exactions, and the Government, from the necessity it lies under of trusting too much to low persons, is defrauded; a system of corruption is established and the public is plundered to gorge the most worthless dependants on its bounty. As long as great and immoderate profits continue, the merchant will not perhaps be driven from his task by the insolence and extortion of officials; but as soon as trade languishes, he will withdraw and suffer it altogether to expire.

In India, you will perhaps say, vexatious taxation is sanctioned by long and indeed immemorial usage, and the traders here are accustomed to it, and consequently cannot be greatly annoyed by it, but, until any one will be so bold as to hold up Indian rule as a model of good government, and the parent of happiness and of wealth, I shall not think the argument very forcible. I am sure we cannot look round us without regretting that this country should have been misgoverned so long. Instead of bolstering up an old system, which has from its own intrinsic rottenness, as much as from other causes, fallen to the ground, we should rather feel an anxiety to see the principles which have been proved in our own country made some use of in the management of this, and instead of constantly recurring to the measures of the ancient legislators of Hindoostan, (well suited probably to the age in which they lived,) we should remember that nearly every other nation is, since their times, entirely altered, and that, if this be intended to be more than a nonentity on earth, a corresponding improvement is necessary here. We need not uproot the flowers which delight on the trees which from old association are respected; but the weeds of ages may be lawfully sacrificed, and with them, the brambles which obstruct the path of the rising generation, without affording either shade or protection to that which is advancing to the tomb.

One of the greatest misfortunes of India is that it has been too much governed by no other punciple, (if indeed principle it may be called,) than that of mere temporary expedience. Acting thus will probably enable a person to overcome the difficulty which at the moment most torments him, but it will certainly beget more; similar conduct will then again be pursued, till at last the actor finds himself inextricably entangled in the web which he himself has woven, when bewildered and fatigued he resigns the post which he is no longer able to fill. The fact is that what is done merely because at the moment it seems expedient, generally proves, in the end, the most inexpedient thing that could have happened. The trust expedience is a firm and temperate course of conduct which is steadily guided by sound and fixed principle, and not led astray by each fancy of the moment, which may perhaps be brilliant, but like the brilliancy of the ignis fatuus leads only to destruction. The expedience which dictates tortuosity and vacillation in politics will prove, in the long run, about as productive as that which dictates the sacrifice of honor in a man, or of virtue in a female.

I have said that the greatest possible freedom should be given to internal trade, that is, that we should permit our provinces freely to interchange their products and to allow the superfluity of one part of our territories to relieve the wants of another. Thus all would be more valuable; abundance would not cause waste, and scarcity would be relieved before it became famine. To establish on a solid basis a freedom so advantageous, I shall offer some observations, the object of which is as much to increase the riches of the Government, as to add to the happiness and wealth of the people. The revenue we all know is necessary to the state, and cannot possibly be dispensed with; but, if an equal sum may be raised by a good system of taxation as is extorted by a bad one, that better system should surely be adopted, because it not only will give relief in the mode of collection, but will also have incalculable eventual effect on all classes of the community. It is seldom that a political measure whether for good or evil stops at the point prescribed; one act of injustice will beget the thirst of thousands for revenge; a few acts of clemency to individuals will often redeem in the public estimation a character blackened by the oppression of a whole nation.

The first thing that must be done, if trade is to be fostered, is to abolish entirely all forms of different branches of revenue, and also every thing in the shape of transit duties in the interior. I have, in a former letter on the subject of farming the revenue, stated the disadvantages to all parties, and indeed the injustice of using that mode of collection; I shall not therefore say more on that point here. With regard to transit duties levied in the interior, I believe they are now generally allowed to be a nuisance to the trader, a promoter of bribery, peculation, and tyranny, and of infinitely more harm to the country at large than their produce can ever compensate for. As far, therefore, as they concern our own internal trade, they should be for ever annihilated. The merchant should have a free passage throughout the whole of our territories with native wares, the products of our own provinces; and if he must pay a tax for the introduction of foreign articles, let him at least be called on only at the frontiers, and let his payment be well defined, simple and single.

The only exceptions which should be made to this short and plain rule are two. The first is a payment of a toll, which might be exacted where bridges have been erected or roads improved. This toll, however, should not be established to raise a surplus revenue, but merely to repay the outlay occasioned by the improvement: it would then be so trifling that, taken together with the occasion of it, it would benefit instead of injuring commerce. The second exception is the payment of a small tax upon the introduction into cities of articles of consumption, in order to defray the expense of markets and other police arrangements. This, like the last, could not be objected to by the trader, as he would benefit most by those arrangements the cost of which he contributed to pay. It is only where imposition is practised that people complain, where a small public good is effected only as an excuse for levying an exorbitantly disproportioned return.

What I have said above relates solely to the assistance which trade must receive from the abolition of all revenue farms, and the removal from the interior of the country, all peons appointed to levy taxes on merchandize. These people are the greatest pests the country can possibly be afflicted with; and one of my principal reasons for wishing to see all Government land disposed of is, that the whole body may be dispensed with. We, who witness their respectful and submissive conduct to us on all occasions, are some times apt to suppose that they are a most inoffensive-body; but in the exact ratio in which a man, especially a native cringes to his superiors, will he tyrannize over his inferiors. I never saw a man particularly obsequious to his European masters, who was not a thorough bully to those placed under him.

Unless we choose wilfully to shut our eyes to the fact, we must be well aware that exaction must form at least as much of the business of these people's lives as protection. Their pay is so small, that it is quite impossible to expect honesty to be very prevalent among them. I do not mean the honesty which prevents a man from robbing his master, I mean the honesty which makes a public servant spurn the half extorted gift, which he is bound by the terms of his engagement to refuse. But is such honesty to be found among the ranks of those of whom I am speaking. Has no one ever heard that in spite of our boasted laws, there is in most cities an established rate, fixed among the police, at which the captor of a midnight wanderer must be bribed for release? Has no one ever heard that natives, unconnected with our countrymen are stopped occasionally in their passage through our dominions, and made to present their homage and their coin to rascals, who only get invested with the badge of authority to abuse it?

The fact is, that natives are generally so ignorant of the limits of each functionary's power, that his appearance excites in their breasts an undefinable dread, and they will do much to avert his displeasure. Europeans are gererally too sensible, and too honourable, to amuse themselves with terrifying those whom they have been taught to look upon with kindness, and whom it is their duty to inspire with confidence; but the native character is very different, and the lower classes of native officials pick up all the worst vices of their superiors, without bringing with them any of the virtues which tend to redeem them. The heads of offices cannot possibly know a hundredth part of the delinquencies committed by those in their employ, and, as they are not blessed with ubiquity, no blame is imputable to them; but still the evil exists, and as it is nearly impossible to cure it, the best way is to extirpate it. Thus, by placing the collectors of customs only on the frontiers and at seaports, would in a great measure be effected, and the utter abandonment of the system of farming any part of the taxes would complete the work, as much as is at the present day practicable. Merchants and travellers would then be free from molestation, and trade, when no longer pestered with vexation, interruptions and imposts, would in all human probability, flourish.

LETTER XIX.

Having stated that internal land duties should be entirely abolished, and with them farms of any description of revenue, it is proper to mention what substitute may be used to raise an equal sum to that at present realized. Taxes are a necessary evil, but that evil may be wonderfully increased or diminished by the nature of the dues imposed and the mode of connection; while therefore it is the duty of those to whose care the state is committed, to shut their ears most firmly to every proposition which has for its object the relinquishment of any portion of the revenue really required, it is also their duty to lighten by the method of fixture the burthen which they cannot remove, and by attentively consulting the capabilities and the convenience of the public, to take care that it shall not gall. It is on this principle that farms and transit duties as at present established should be abolished; and, it is on this principle that the alteration I propose is founded.

There are four principal kinds of taxes on trade, simple, efficient, and generally approved of. These four are amply sufficient for raising a revenue on trade; they are the land tax, which affects all the produce of land; the excise, import and export duties. The first of these has so much more to do with agriculture, that I shall say nothing of it here; the last two principally relate to external commerce. It is not perhaps necessary to mention stamp duties: because it is a very nice question to what extent they may be carried without injury to the public; in the decision however of that question Government seems to have been peculiarly happy, as its success has, I believe, been satisfactory to the ruler, without proving oppressive to the subject. Neither need I speak of the variety of petty taxes and rates which exist in some cities; as these relate more to individuals than to general trade; and are perhaps a necessary consequence of the comforts they enjoy.

If the necessity of freedom of internal trade be admitted, it is evident that the export and import duties, which are levied on it, should not be of a larger amount than may be requisite to pay for the benefit merchants derive from the establishment of proper harbour protection and all other outlay incident to a port. The nature of our territories make our coasting trade considerable, and it should be fostered with a careful hand. It is of the utmost importance to the whole of our possessions, that a free intercouse by water should be permitted; and proof that a vessel had cleared from any port subject to us in India should itself be a release from any payment, beyond that of the trifling dues I have mentioned. The exact percentage can of course only be fixed after a reference to the public documents which relate to these matters; but the principle, I think, should be such as I have stated.

It is a subject of much debate, and a question which can only be decided by the English legislature, whether or not, the freedom, which should certainly exist with regard to our Indian coasting trade, should be extended to its commerce with the mother country. There are so many conflicting interests concerned in this question, interests which are totally beyond the control of those who govern this empire, that it would perhaps be foreign to the purpose to enter into the consideration of a principle, which must involve the person who chooses to touch upon it in endless variety of discussions on as endless a variety of subjects, all which, except in their relation to free trade, are on almost every point totally disconnected with each other. The only thing then which we can do, is to view the matter as if this was England's only colony, and as if she had consequently no other favourite to rival us in her regards.

Few people can doubt that, if we wish to maintain an intimate footing with a colony, we ought at least to allow it a free trade with ourselves. In the most prejudiced periods, we never find this to have been denied. The only difficulty seems to have been to keep other nations from enjoying similar advantages, and, by excluding competitors from the market, to be able to purchase and sell at almost our own prices. This policy, however, narrow as it might have been, was assuredly liberal when compared to that used by Britain towards India at the present moment. We have taken every possible precaution for a number of years to monopolize her trade, as far as we found it convenient to ourselves, yet in the matter of those particular commodities, which principally she is anxious we should purchase, we have sacrificed her welfare to colonies, which, in point of extent, population, and sterling value, are unmeasurably her inferiors. England's usual wisdom seems in this instance to have been forgotten; and her conduct must be attributed, not only to the strong influence which the partisans of the more favoured possessions held in the country, but also, to the apathy with which Indian affairs have nearly always been treated in Parliament; except at the periodical renewals of the charter; when the interests of the country to be governed seem by a kind of tacit agreement among all parties to have been postponed, and the only interests considered have been those of the directors and of the ministers of the crown. The struggle has not so much been to arrange what was best for India, as to secure the power and influence in England, which Indian patronage must give; or if unsuccessful in that attempt, to unite with all parties similarly situated to place it in the hands of the most feeble; or so to sheer of its beams, as to render it, even in the hands of the most powerful, impotent. This apathy is happily decreasing daily; and, as the only questions, in which the passions of ministers might be supposed to be deeply concerned, whether in the East or in the West have been finally decided, it is not perhaps too much to hope that any strenuous efforts on the part of India to obtain attention to the subject of the duties levied on her products will meet with success.

The principal source to which we ought to look for a substitute for the customs abolished is the increase in the value of land, and the increase of import duties in certain cases. However applicable the excise may be to the condition of our countrymen, I cannot think that any one would advise the maintenance of such a system here. After a certain degree of liberty is attained, measures, which would be a death blow to freedom in its infancy, may often be used without any evil consequences; and, in the same manner, the duties which may not have the effect of confining commerce when it has reached maturity, would at once strangle it if applied too early. There is every difference in the world between a trade that has almost to be created, and another which has flourished for centuries. Commerce, in India, has, I think all will allow, only just commenced; for, to give that name to the buying and selling which generally went on, amid the constant disturbances which the country was subject to, before our arrival, is surely a profanation of the term. Where insurers acted at the head of armies, and the extortion of every official, from the prince on his throne down to that prince's lowest menial, formed a regular item in the balance sheet, there could never possibly exist any traffic of that open, equitable, and honorable description, which Europeans designate commerce.

To establish this, a powerful and just rule was necessary; a government sufficiently noble to abstain from extortion itself, and sufficiently potent to chastise others who might dare to attempt it. Accordingly, we find that the mercantile community is generally extremely favourable to us; and if a few monopolists are injured by the facility with which trade is now conducted, the mass is grateful for the protection they receive. But, whatever confidence they have in our own integrity, they cannot help perceiving that native influence must still be great; and that influence they feel themselves unable to cope with; because the very nature of our laws, which scrupulously screen the innocent from injustice, renders it, too often, a more tedious and expensive process to convict the guilty, than most people are willing to engage in.

To take away the opportunity of guilt is therefore the wisest plan, when efforts to root out the inclination are likely to prove abortive; and on this ground, I think the excise should no more be an instrument of revenue in India than should farms. When the present generation shall have passed away, and another unused to the illegal proceedings of native governments, shall have succeeded, when a long course of inability to act dishonestly shall have confirmed the practice, and fixed the principles of virtue, then indeed the authority of subordinates may be extended, then perhaps their interference with trade may not be noxious, for then probably they will not overstep the bounds, which the wisdom of their superiors may prescribe.

With regard to town duties, they may perhaps be levied with less injury to the community than any others; because the collection must be a subject which will claim the active supervision of European officers, and in which these will generally have the power, as they certainly have the will, to prevent more abuse, than must, however cautious we may be, exist in every human institution. Of duties on spirits and intoxicating drugs I need not speak; no sensible man can object to them. The materials of intoxication are very different from those in use in Britain; and if some assert that beer is a necessary of life to the labouring classes, no one will affirm the same of ganja, spirits, opium, and bang. Indeed whatever increase the public treasure may receive from such sources, they must ever be looked upon, more as the repressers of excess, than as ordinary contributions, or in other words, more as an arm of the police, than a branch of revenue.

From the list of articles which come under this head, tabacco, however, should be excluded. The use of this weed may in other countries lead to drunkenness, but it certainly does not here. Many persons who do not object to its use on this score are pleased to call it an idle practice; in this they are mistaken; the wealthy may smoke to pass away time, but if any one will note the fatigue, which the abstemious native will undergo, when stimulated by it, and his exhaustion, without it, he will see that it is not without its virtue. It is, moreover, almost the only luxury which the wretched labourer possesses. Then, in the name of pity, let him gratify his taste as cheaply as possible. Mankind have ever been so averse to the simplicity of nature, that there is no country in the world, which has not invented some means of beguiling care, knowing, therefore that this passion is universal, and cannot possibly be eradicated, we should certainly shew more wisdom by endeavouring to direct it into the least injurious channel, than by preaching an exterminating crusade against it altogether; by the former method, we should have every chance of being tolerably successful, by the latter we should only meet with ridicule and defeat. Viewing the matter in this light, I cannot help believing that the taste of the Chinese for tea, that of the Arabs for coffee, and that of the natives of India for tobacco, are among the most innocent the world exhibits.

But independently of this consideration, tabacco is one of the most important products our territories yield, it is therefore surely our interest, if no other cause existed, to beware of checking even in the slightest degree a harmless indulgence, which furnishes us indirectly, by rental of our land, so large a revenue.

It is needless to say more on the present point. When I come to the subject of agriculture, I hope I shall be able to show that a small loss in the matter of internal duties and farms may, nay must, be amply made up by other means. We cannot have every thing. We have made India essentially an agricultural country, or rather nature has made it so for us. Every commodity which may be accounted valuable as contributing to the national wealth is here the produce of the land. Opium, cotton, tobacco, and sugar bear me out in this assertion, and indigo, saltpetre and silk can hardly be termed exceptions for in all these, the lord of the soil must at least derive a large share of the profits. To the land, then, every thing seems to direct us principally to confine ourselves. When we may have disposed of it, new sources of wealth will be opened to us; but until that period shall arrive, we should make the best of what we possess; we may be anxious to sell our estate, but we should be fools if we neglected every opportunity of making it more valuable. Instead, then, of frittering away our energies in exacting petty dues, let us fix our eyes on one grand object, and steadily pursue it; let us do our best to gratify our subjects in all things reasonable; let the trader enjoy freedom and security in his dealing, and let the peasantry to whom we must look for wealth, sooth life with a few of its luxuries: any small present sacrifice we may make to effect this will no more be money wasted, than is that bestowed in pampering the warhorse, whose master stints him not to-day, because he knows that to-morrow he will, by his assistance, be enabled to win victory, reputation, and wealth.

calfe, on his leaving the Presidency, by some public means, the gratitude they felt for the kindness, hospitality and affection he had at all times evinced towards them. This intention had nothing to do with any thing of a political nature. It was not for the purpose of delivering any opinion on political subjects that the m...eting had assembled, and if it had it would have b...en impossible for him to have taken any part in it, for he had no longer any right to express his opinions on public matters. As a private gentleman, as he w... proud to say a private friend, he conceived nothing was more consistent with his duty, as nothing could be more consistent with his feelings, than to take a part with his friends around him in expressing the high admiration they felt for the private worth of Sir Charles Metcalfe. It was for the meeting to consider in what way that expression should be conveyed, and he should be happy to receive any proposition that might be made on the subject.

Colonel BEATSON said that the subject of the present meeting had been the subject uppermost in the thoughts of most people since they had learnt that Sir Charles Metcalfe was going away so soon, and in proposing what he was going to propose, he was only stating what he had found to be the general feeling with those with whom he had conversed on the subject. His kindness of manner and invariable hospitality was appreciated by every one, and he felt convinced that a better mode of conveying the expression of the sense that was generally entertained of his kindness could not be devised than that of inviting him to meet the gentlemen of the Presidency when most convenient to himself, before his departure, at a dinner, ball and supper, where those who had been so often entertained by him might again have the pleasure of seeing him amongst them.

Mr. PLOWDEN said that he would second the motion with a great deal of pleasure, only he would suggest that instead of a ball it should be a fancy dress ball.

Mr. CHARLES PRINSEP said that the proposal was certainly one that no one could object to, and which he was quite sure would pass nem con. A dinner was one of those marks of attention peculiar to English society, and almost indispensable; and as to a fancy ball it was an occasion for the display, not only of gratitude, but of beauty and of beauty's adornments. But he considered for one that the merits of Sir Charles Metcalfe were so great towards this society that he should not be

Mr. PLOWDEN said that something of the kind was in contemplation, and that it was intended to apply to the Sheriff to convene a public meeting. The present was a private meeting, at which no such subject could be properly entertained.

Mr. CLARKE perfectly agreed with his friend Mr.
Prinsep in his suggestion of an address to Sir Charles Metcalfe; but the requisition to the Sheriff for that purpose could not be made by the meeting: it must be the act of private individuals, and could be done when the chairman left the chair. He would therefore suggest that that course should be adopted, and that the requisition emanate from them as private individuals and not as a meeting.

Sir JOHN GRANT said the resolution that has been proposed and seconded is this, "That Sir Charles Metcalfe be invited before his departure, on any day most convenient to himself, to meet the gentlemen of the Presidency at dinner, and that he be also invited to a fancy dress ball and supper on a subsequent evening." The motion was carried unanimously.

In reply to a question from Mr. Plowden, Mr.
O'Hanlon said that he had heard that Sir Charles Metcalfe would leave town in about a fortnight for the seat of his Government.

Mr. C. PRINSEP proposed "that a deputation wait on Sir Charles Metcalfe to request him to name the days for these entertainments," which was seconded by Mr. O'Hanlon and carried unanimously.

Mr. O'HANLON proposed that the deputation consist of the following gentlemen, namely, the Honorable Mr. Elliott, Colonel Beatson, Brigadier Brown,
Mr. Plowden, General Watson, Mr. Pattle, Mr.
Cockerell, Sir Charles D'Oyley and Mr. C. Prinsep, which was seconded and carried unanimously.

Colonel BEATSON said that he was going to propose what he was sure would meet with the general approbation of the meeting, namely, that Sir John Peter Grant be requested to take the chair at the dinner, and that General Watson be requested to act as Vice-President [applause.]

Sir JOHN GRANT put the motion which was carried unanimously, after which a person proposed that Sir John Grant should take the chair at the supper also, which having met with the approbation of the meeting, Sir John Grant said that he should be happy to

...ints ...ques- ...taking ...ating that ...s expressive ...fty for his vir-

...meeting, Sir Charles ...air, after which ...o the meeting to the follow- ...ot to apologize for presenting my- ...s to the attention of the meeting, but as I am desirous that neither my motives nor my conduct should be misunderstood, I think it better that I should address the chair before any motion for the adoption or presentation of an address is made. I beg that it may be distinctly understood that I am not here for the purpose of opposing any address that the friends of Sir Charles Metcalfe may be desirous of offering, for I know of no person who deserves more at the hands of his friends than he does; but I do object to any thing of the kind being passed by this meeting as a public meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta. The object of such an address proposed at such a meeting I consider to be not a legitimate object. If you meet to address him in his political character, and I know not whether you are or do not, I object to it on that ground. It is on no personal ground, but as a general principle, and I should object to an address to any individual member of the Government on the same ground, and that is, as you had from the very best authority not very long ago in this hall, that the people of India are ignorant of the acts of their governors. The whole government was stated here, not twelve hours ago, to be conducted in secret. It was stated that the acts of public men were known in England, but that they were not here. We know not what acts of government any individual member may oppose or support; and under these circumstances I conceive it would be a species of slavish flattery to meet here to discuss Sir Charles Metcalfe's political character, and praise him upon trust, or upon the certificate of good conduct conferred on him by the Governor-General. Blind as we are stated to be—blind as we are to the political conduct of the members of the Government, it would be worse than futile to express our approbation of conduct we knew nothing about. What is the nature of the Government of which he forms a part? Is there one of the most insignificant of our West Indian Islands that has not a freer constitution than we have? Look at all the rest of our colonies, even our convict colonies: look at our sister colony of Ceylon, and see if there is one of them that cannot boast of a constitution at least preferable to that which we have. Have we got anything by the late Act of Parliament by which we are enabled to become judges of the conduct of our rulers in the Government of this country? What is the happy constitution that has been granted to us! We have for the first time a Legislative Council, to meet in secret, to deliberate in secret, to determine in secret, without any op... ...jecting to proposed ... ...ing what measures are ... ...passed and promulgate. What again, I ask, are ...us! what is the happy con... ...us! We have a Governo... ...of making himself almost ...cil chosen from the Civil ...aristocracy I suppose, wi... ...ber to represent the com... ...power of any kind, an Aristocracy without dignity, and a governing power without control; that is the happy constitution they have given us; and if you intend to be political in your address to Sir Charles Metcalfe you have no ground on earth to bear you out in such an intention. Then, on the other hand, suppose, as some of you will say, you come to address him in his private capacity, I say it should not be done at a meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta. At a meeting so constituted there is not a cooly in Calcutta that has not as much right to vote as any one of you, and yet you would call on those coolies to vote on what? on the hospitality of Sir Charles Metcalfe. I ask you, allowing, as every man who knows him must do, the extent of his liberality and hospitality, I ask you whether this hospitality from the very nature of his station is not confined to the upper classes. Then let those upper classes thank him but call not upon those who have not experienced it to join them. I deny not his hospitality, his munificence, his support of useful institutions, but who are the proper judges of these acts? the members of his own society, who know what he has done, and not the six hundred thousand persons and upwards who compose the inhabitants of Calcutta, and whom, if assembled, it would be necessary ... ...neighbouring plain, and not in this confined space. What sensible man would call this meeting, composed chiefly of the upper classes of society—what sensible man would call an address from such a body an address from the inhabitants of Calcutta. There is another reason why it would not be proper to address him on the present occasion: he has just been appointed Governor of Agra. I know not what he has done since he has been a member of the Government, and I am sure none of you know what he will do in his new capacity; but it may be imagined that you are thanking him by anticipation for the people of Agra. In what situation does he stand at the present moment to make an address a matter of compliment to him? he stands high in office here, and about to fill a station where he is likely to have extensive patronage at his command, and he is to act as Governor-General ad interim should Lord William Bentinck retire before his successor arrives. Then I ask you whether this is not the first instance where those who were to be governed by a person, met before hand to congratulate him? Does it look like independence thus publicly to court the rising sun. I ask you what will the people of England say? what will they say of an address from a meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta, at which there are about twenty or thirty natives present?

They will say that it is from a meeting of the upper classes who are to benefit or be prejudiced by the acts of the future Governor-General, a meeting assembled to give him a laudatory address that can be valuable to no man breathing. It is on these grounds, and on these grounds alone, that I speak. There is no address that could be proposed here that I should think a legitimate object for the inhabitants of Calcutta, and thinking as I do I will not be a party to it. It would be different if it were the address of private individuals, and there might be large masses of people who would not sign it if it were put to them. It is from no feeling of disrespect towards Sir Charles Metcalfe that I make these observations, but I cannot, and will not consent, as one of the public, to have my name used as one of the inhabitants of Calcutta, addressing a person of whose acts I know nothing. I disagree in toto in addressing persons situated as the members of the Government here are, but if this meeting choose to sign an address as the personal friends of Sir Charles Metcalfe, and not as the inhabitants of Calcutta, not one word of opposition shall it meet from me.

Mr. Turton.—No, nor of support neither; and if you wish me to tell you why I will do so. I will never in any situation vote to please others, but follow the dictates of my own feelings. I tell you plainly I will neither support nor oppose it, but I tell you plainly that if this is to be an address of the inhabitants of Calcutta, it shall not go forth as mine. I will oppose it, and I will oppose every resolution from first to last—not the subject of the resolutions of the address, but the circumstances under which you have met, and the fallacy that has taken possession of you. Under these circumstances I shall conclude with a resolution, which if adopted I have done. If not, I am an inhabitant of Calcutta, and have a wright to vote as I think proper. I therefore propose—

"That whilst Sir C. T. Metcalfe has every claim to the attentions and civilities of his personal friends, any address to him from a public meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta is unfounded either with reference to the political position of the Indian public, and their ignorance of the acts of any member of the Government, or from the particular circumstances of Sir C. T. Metcalfe's present departure from Calcutta—and therefore that this meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta be now dissolved."

This resolution was seconded by Mr. Brightman.

Mr. Pattle.—I can hardly hope that this assembly will receive from me any thing like an address approaching to the eloquent one that has been just delivered. Mr. Turton very properly on all occasions wins your approbation by the able manner in which he discusses the matters he takes in hand. On this occasion he has stood forward in a very noble manner, for it is always noble to be independent, and to give expression to your sentiments without fear of favor or reward, and I congratulate the public of Calcutta that it can no longer be said, as it has been said, that there is not an independent man who can oppose an address of thanks. But unable as I am to cope with him on this subject again, I will offer my sentiments in the address to the addidence, and hope to meet with [illegible] myself by Mr. Turton has told you—I [illegible] not compete able to follow the order of his arguments however took no note of what he said, but I will endeavour as far as I can to recollect—Mr. Turton has often told us that he admitted that for his private hospitality Sir Charles Metcalfe was entitled to the utmost admiration of all his friends, but that he would oppose any address intending to compliment him as a public character. He has told you that it was said in the Hall below that the proceedings of Government were secret, and therefore that you can be no judges of Sir Charles Metcalfe's merits as a public character; but I beg to say that he pays a very bad compliment to your discrimination. It is true that we know not the individual opinions of the members of Council, but the acts of the Government and the benefits we receive from it are known to every body. It is not for me an humble servant of the Government, and humble I am, as all servants should be, to attempt, nor do I wish it, to enter into any detail of his merits as a public officer; but I am at liberty to call upon you to judge of the acts of the Government of which he is a distinguished member. Is it nothing that the Suttee was abolished—that widows are no longer allowed to immolate themselves at the shrine of superstition!—is it nothing that this has been done?—I fearlessly assert he was a powerful supporter of that humane measure. Is it nothing that the press has been liberated? How far has it canvassed, not only the acts of Government, but the opinions it entertains of the acts of every member of it. Has the highest authority ever objected to the freest strictures? What is the greatest liberty prized in England? will any one say it is not the liberty of the press? Is this no favor,—is it nothing for which the public ought to be grateful? Sir Charles Metcalfe could not originate such a measure, but he could support it. Our liberal-minded Governor-General did originate it, and Sir Charles Metcalfe did support it. Then to descend to smaller matters, how anxious has been the desire for the establishment of a steam communication with England, and has it not been nearly accomplished? We owe this great measure to our noble-minded Governor-General; but we owe it also, as he would tell you if he were here, to Sir Charles Metcalfe, who warmly participated in the support of it. Let me here leave to your generous feelings the impression I hope I have made by calling your attention to these three liberal measures, carried into effect greatly by his support. You are told that you know nothing of his claims on the public for his bounty and generosity, but I hope the public has some regard to talent, and those who encourage it. Who has supported charity, who has used his large receipts and fortune to the worthiest and best of purposes to the extent that he has done? To support merit, and relieve distress, has always been the chief pleasure of his generous mind. My friend who last addressed you has told you that this Government is inferior to that of any of the colonies—[Mr. Pattle was here corrected by Mr. Turton] well then, that its constitution is inferior. I beg to ask you, if what he has expressed has met your approbation, how comes it that the press which has always been allowed to pour forth all the opinions of the public has never published any such sentiments? We can only judge of a Government by its acts, now I know of none that ought to make us dissatisfied with that under which we live; and I will fearlessly assert that if the whole of the acts of our Government were fairly canvassed, the benefits we have received from it would greatly preponderate over the small causes of dissatisfaction. I am so little accustomed to making a speech that the exertion exhausts me, but before I sit down I beg to assure you, as far as I know of, that the address that will be offered for your approval pledges itself to no expression of public opinion to Sir Charles Metcalfe as a public character.

Mr. Charles Prinsep.—When I came into the room I little expected that the debate would have taken the turn it has; and I am sure that if my friend Mr. Turton had known the sentiments of those who called the meeting he would not have adopted the course he has done. I perfectly agree with my friend that the Government that has been given to us is less liberal than we could wish. I also go with him in saying that this is not the time to address Sir Charles Metcalfe on public matters; but I do conceive that it is competent in this society to estimate private virtues of the high character we are here met to do honor to, and I protest against the doctrine that we are not to express our approbation of such conduct wherever found. It was to express an opinion of his private virtues that this meeting was called, and those who joined in the requisition were well aware of the objection that might be taken, and on that account all allusion to political matters was carefully avoided; but when we are about to lose an individual who has endeared himself to us by his private virtues it is never a wrong time to express the sentiments we feel. I regret that public matters have here been brought into question, when we met for no other purpose than to signalize private virtues, for the private virtues of public men are public property, and as such we have a right to deal with them. Notwithstanding the eloquence of my learned friend the Calcutta public will not be so far bamboozled out of their intention to express their sense of the merits of an individual, even though they be not the whole of the population, for every man had an opportunity of coming if he thought proper, even down to my friend's coolies, and expressing his dissent; and I don't think there are many in Calcutta who would like Sir Charles Metcalfe to leave it without some expression in favour of those qualities they have been able to appreciate. Be the new Government ever so miserably constructed, and so I say it is, shall that prevent us from expressing opinions that may lead to a better result, that may tend perhaps to the improvement of the administration. I don't know that it is necessary to dilate at all on his private virtues, for they are matters that the heart appreciates more than the tongue can express; but I may be permitted to draw your attention to one or two topics—What widow or orphan ever pleaded to him in vain? What public work ever went without his support? What public institution is there that has not experienced his munificence? These are not acts of the Government, but of the individual. Then, with regard to his hospitality, it was not confined to those who partook of it. What man ever had a worse dinner at his own house than some of those to which he has been occasionally invited? When we met here the other evening to entertain Sir Charles Metcalfe we got a worse dinner than any of us would have got at home. It is not the dinners that we appreciate on these occasions, but they furnish us with the means of shewing how we can appreciate good qualities. I say with confidence that such a man as Sir Charles Metcalfe has rarely been seen in our society if we look to his munificence and hospitity for the last seven years. During the greater part of that the Government has been itenerant, and we have met with that hospitality from him which it was not his duty but his pleasure to bestow. The late unfortunate mercantile distresses nearly swept away all society and during that time Sir Charles Metcalfe stood forward as a beacon round which we might rally, and, chiefly through his example, sociality is now beginning to revive, and we are gradually forgetting our losses. Under these circumstances I strongly dissent from Mr. Turton and support with might and main the amendment of Mr. Pattle "that an Address to Sir Charles Metcalfe be presented expressive of our high approbation of his eminent virtues."

Mr. DICKENS, as the seconder of Mr. Turton's resolution, was anxious to explain the reasons why he would persevere in the course he had adopted. He did apprehend when he first heard of this address, and his apprehensions were not removed by what had fallen from Mr. Prinsep, that it was intended to express their feeling on Sir Charles's public character and conduct. As an Englishman, placed in a society where he had nothing to do with the laws but to obey them, for to that the amendment came, no such expression should escape his lips, for he knew nothing better calculated to excite the people of England from that apathy with which they viewed the government of this country, than the expression here of their dissent to the situation in which they were placed. Mr. Dickens then contrasted the speeches of Mr. Pattle and Mr. Prinsep both in favour of the amendment, though apparently on different grounds, the one urging the measures of Government as a reason why the address should be voted, and the other denying that it had any reference whatever to political matters. Judging from the speech of the former gentleman it was a public question, something different from a social one, and leaving the meeting to judge of the motives, for his part he would say that if they were met there to say any thing of Sir Charles's private character, in the first place it was unnecessary, and in the second place it was ill timed. The meeting must be aware, that if Sir Charles did leave, it was but to return (no, no.) Gentlemen, said Mr. Dickens, is it not an admitted fact that Sir Charles will return in a certain time? (Cries of no, no.)—Mr. Plowden here intimated that Sir Charles's return was not certain, and that it was only in the event of the Governor-General's successor not arriving previous to his leaving this country.) Oh, is that it? said Mr. Dickens, then I must say it is a very probable provision for a possible casualty. Their adieus might be a parody on the words of Shenstone's lover

> "You gazed as I slowly withdrew:
> My path I could scarcely discern:
> So sweetly you bade me adieu,
> I thought that you bade me return."

Mr. Dickens concluded by strongly expressing his opinion that the time was ill chosen either for the meeting to agree to an address or for Sir Charles to receive it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said that he had not thought of the legal distinction that had been pointed out by Mr. Turton when he signed the requisition, but he was now inclined to think that the best course would be to adopt his suggestion, and desolve the meeting of inhabitants pro forma. With regard to the expression of admiration for Sir Charles Metcalfe's amiable qualities he was prepared to go as far as any one, but he did think, after what he had heard, that this would be better done as private individuals than as the inhabitants of Calcutta.

Mr. TURTON.—I will, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, say a few words in reply. I concur in the sentiments of Mr. Dickens, but if I had a doubt when I came into the room, I never had a doubt as to what was my duty, though I had a considerable doubt whether I should perform that duty. But if I had any doubt it has been entirely removed by Mr. Pattle, who places the question on public grounds. He throws down the gauntlet. I don't mean to say that Sir Charles Metcalfe might not come out of the ordeal better than he went into it; but he still places the question on public grounds. Mr. Pattle and Mr. Sutherland will, I dare say, both of them recollect that when the meeting was got up for addressing Mr. Adam, shortly after the passing of the odious press regulation, I was persuaded by Mr. Fergusson to put my hand to the requisition. I think it was wrong to call a meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta to bear testimony to the private virtues of any individual, and whatever may be the private virtues of Sir Charles Metcalfe, I think no one will deny that those of Mr. Adam were fully equal to them; but he did one thing which nothing on earth can wash out, and which would have prevented any thing on earth from inducing me to lend my sanction to his public conduct. Well, this meeting was held, and though I did not attend it, I repented of having signed the requisition, for what was the result? The address, an eulogium on his private character, was presented by Mr. Fergusson, and what was the answer? Why the answer was this. "I thank you gentlemen for this testimony of approbation of my public services." After this is it not pardonable in me to be suspicious? I am not saying that this address will be so interpreted by Sir Charles Metcalfe, but it may be by the world at large. As such a meeting was open to Mr. Adam to make such a request, so is it equally open to Sir Charles Metcalfe; and as it is equally open to his friends, and I hope by him by are that Mr. Pattle may not be the first to take an but it will go home as the public resolution of a public meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta. It is because these public meetings have an influence far beyond their immediate sphere that I am anxious that our proceedings should not be misunderstood, for if you were to tell them in London that such an address, so passed, was not expressive of approbation of public character, they would laugh in your face. In 1827 a resolution was passed by Government, prohibiting the Sheriff from calling public meetings without its sanction, and as that resolution has never been rescinded, you are perhaps meeting by permission of the Governor, to praise his first in Council. When a public meeting was requested in the same year, to express the public opinion on the subject of the Stamp Act, it was refused; then for what have we to thank them for being allowed to meet to praise themselves? We are told of the abolition of the Suttee as one of the reasons for concurring in the address, but I think there are a pretty large proportion of the inhabitants of Calcutta who think very differently from us on that measure. But do I know what course Sir Charles Metcalfe has adopted on this question? Mr. Pattle says he believes it,—I dont say whether I do or not; but I am not bound to believe every thing another believes. Then we are told of the suspension of the press regulation as another reason; but if you come to the merits of that question, ought we to address any member of the Government that has allowed that regulation to remain a part of the law of the land. If they intended the press well, what was the course for them to take?—not a mere sufferance, but to do away with that act which may be enforced at the pleasure of any future Governor, who has sufficient contempt of public opinion, to venture on so unpopular a measure. What would be the right course for them to adopt, if they wished the press to be really free and unfettered? why, to repeal it to be sure. The press at present is in the situation of a licensed prisoner. It has the liberty of the rules. The concession hitherto has been that of persons who have been as liberal as men can be under an act that they thought it injustice to enforce; but if it is injustice to enforce it, why is it not repealed? The next point that has been touched upon, is that of steam, but I know not, though I am a member of the Steam Committee, what Sir Charles Metcalfe has done to promote the project, further than by his subscription as an individual. I believe I have answered most of Mr. Pattle's observations, and shall now proceed to answer those of Mr. Prinsep with the same freedom. Much has been said of Sir Charles Metcalfe's liberality in the support of public and charitable institutions, but he did not subscribe to the funds for commemorating the memory of Rammohun Roy, and is it on this ground that he can claim the admiration of the native inhabitants of Calcutta. Then there is the invidious distinction that was made between the carriages of natives and Europeans during the time that he was President, is that another ground on which the native inhabitants can be called on to support the address? I merely mention these things because Mr. Pattle grounds his arguments on his claims to the gratitude of all ranks of society. His hospitality could have nothing to do with the large mass of society, and when Mr. Prinsep adverted to the late mercantile distresses, it was the last thing he should have done, as they had their commencement in private acts of his. I defy any one to shew any ground on which the mercantile community owe anything to the acts of the Government. Has it not chiefly at its own expense erected semaphores which the Government are about to discontinue if they do not carry them on at their own expense. If you go into the address as a meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta I shall have another opportunity of addressing you,—if you accede to the suggestion of Mr. Sutherland I shall not address you again. These are the grounds on which I oppose the address, and however I may regret that I feel myself bound to make these comments, I would not compromise a public principle to flatter any man, however meritorious. The virtues of a private individual are not grounds for calling together a meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta.

Mr. PATTLE.—I am perfectly persuaded that nothing that has been said to you either by Mr. Turton on the one side or Mr. Prinsep on the other will deprive you of your good sense and impartiality. You will hear the proposed address read, and will adopt it or not as you see fit. Mr. Turton said that I asked you to offer the address on public grounds. I deny that I did so. Mr. Turton told you that the acts of Government were secret, and I therefore mentioned those instances to show that they were public, and I mentioned three of the most popular acts to which Sir Charles Metcalfe gave his full support.

Mr. TURTON's resolution and Mr. Pattle's amendment were then read from the chair, after which the supporters of the two different proposals were requested to divide themselves, and tellers were appointed. After a considerable interval it was reported, that there were 121 votes in favor of the amendment, and 97* in favor of the resolution, but the report was not without a qualification on both sides. On the part of the amendment it was stated, that 20 out of the 97 on the other side were Hindu College boys, and on the part of the original motion it was stated, that the counting of its supporters had been interrupted by Mr. Prinsep, who had objected to certain persons who came up stairs during the process of counting. Mr. Dickens, one of the tellers, refused to consider the question as decided, but his voice was drowned by the gentlemen on the other side, who declared the amendment carried.

Mr. C. PRINSEP then read the following address:—

TO HIS HONOR SIR CHARLES THEOPHILUS METCALFE, BT.
Governor of Agra, &c. &c. &c.

It is not without a mixed emotion of pleasure and of regret that we have received the announcement of your immediate departure to asssume the new and high functions to which you have been called. However honorable to yourself and auspicious to the public interest the selection which thus removes you from amongst us, however necessary to the organization and due direction of the new member of our Indian system, we cannot suffer you to leave us without the warm expression of our esteem and affection. A long course of munificent hospitality, persevered in through a period when all around was gloom and despondency, of beneficence that has beamed alike on public and on private objects—and what is now uppermost in our present thoughts, of that individual kindness and courtesy, which are the very life of social intercourse, have so endeared you to us, as to make your absence felt to be the deprivation of an enjoyment of which we shall long and fondly cherish the remembrance. If that intercourse from which we have derived so much satisfaction, has awakened any pleasurable sensations in your breast, it will be gratifying to your feelings to bear with you this assurance of our constant regard,—of our fervent good wishes for your health and happiness, and for your progress in that career of honour, of which you have already traversed so large a space.

It was then moved by Mr. Prinsep, seconded by Dr. Grant, and carried, "that the address just read be adopted by the meeting."

Another address was proposed and read, but not seconded, the meeting considering it of too political a character.

It was then proposed by Mr. O'Hanlon and carried, "that the chairman sign the address, as chairman of the meeting, and present it to Sir Charles Metcalfe in whatever mode he considers most respectful."

The meeting then broke up, after having passed a vote of thanks to the Chairman.—Hurkaru.

Sir Charles Metcalfe having upon application by the Chairman of the late meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta, intimated that he would receive their Address at 11 A.M. on Monday the 8th December, the Resolutions and Address, fairly engrossed on parchment, signed by the Chairman, and countersigned by the Sheriff, were accordingly presented at the hour appointed. Sir Charles D'Oyly was unhappily prevented by an attack of gout from being himself the bearer of them, they were therefore at his request read and delivered by Mr. Prinsep, attended by Messrs. E. Barwell, Cockerell, Barlow, Captains G. Young, Hawkins, Steele, and several other gentlemen, who, notwithstanding the absence of any public notice, had obtained intelligence of the appointment. Many will regret that they were not equally fortunate; and a public announcement would, no doubt, have swelled the train with a long line of grateful friends and warm adherents. Yet perhaps it was better done by a smaller number; for it was evident from the manner of his reception, that the object of their attention was considerably oppressed by the marks of devotion that have poured in upon him from all quarters. He thanked the deputation

* The votes of Mr. Dickens and Mr. Hare, which were not taken, made the minority 99.—ED. HURK.

with some emotion, and stated that he was not prepared to reply on the instant, but would address his answer to the Chairman in a day or two; assuring them for the present, that, while the sentiments they had expressed were of a mixed nature, his own were those of regret alone at parting with friends of whose attachment and kindness he had received too many proofs. Mr. Prinsep then presented a note from the Chairman, expressiveof extreme regret and disappointment at his inability to attend in person, and the deputation took its leave with mutual demonstrations of regard.

The following is Sir Charles Metcalfe's reply to the address presented by the deputation on the 8th December:—

TO SIR CHARLES D'OYLY, BART.

Sir,—I have received, with a deep sense of the honor conferred on me, the Address signed by you, as Chairman of a public meeting of the Inhabitants of Calcutta, and this day presented to me, in the most obliging manner, by the gentlemen assembled for that purpose.

Next to the approbation of one's own conscience, there is nothing earthly so productive of happiness, as the esteem and affection of our fellow creatures, and especially of those with whom we have been associated. The assurance of such feeling towards me, on the part of the society of Calcutta, is a source of satisfaction replete with delightful sensations.

The abundant marks of kindness which I have received, in overflowing measure, on the occasion of my departure from this Presidency, are proofs of the generous goodness of those from whom they have proceeded, of which the impression can never be effaced, and which will connect with this period of my life the most grateful recollections. I trust that the consciousness that these distinctions flow from spontaneous cordiality, without any claim to them on my part, while it inspires me with the warmest gratitude, need not preclude me from the enjoyment of those feelings of pride and gratification, which such conduct from those whom we respect and regard and love cannot fail to excite.

I beg you to present to those gentlemen, who have honored me with this Address, my heart-felt thanks, and my ardent wishes for their welfare and happiness.

I part from them with unmixed regret, which not even the nature of the office that I am about to undertake can suffice to diminish. I enter however on the duties of that office with the highest sense of their importance. I regard the Government of India as a sacred trust, committed by the Almighty to the British Nation, to be exercised for the benefit of the countless millions, who have come under our rule in this distant land. It will be my earnest wish and indefatigable endeavour to uphold the honor of our country, by promoting, to the utmost extent of my ability, the prosperity and felicity of the people placed under my care; and I am sensible, that I shall make the best return in my power, for the overwhelming favor which has been poured upon me, on my separation from the society of Calcutta, if I can shew, by a just and successful administration of the territories entrusted to my charge, that I am in any degree worthy of such unbounded kindness, and that those who have bestowed it will not have reason to be ashamed of the affectionate feelings which they have evinced.

MEETING OF EAST INDIANS TO PRESENT AN ADDRESS TO SIR C. T. METCALFE.

A very large concourse of East Indians assembled at the Parental Academy on the 6th December for the purpose of making a suitable acknowledgment to Sir C. T. Metcalfe for the services rendered by him to that body.

MR. MATHEW JOHNSTONE having been unanimously called to the chair, Mr. Pote addressed the meeting on the various benefits that had been conferred on the public, and more particularly on the East Indian portion of it, by Sir Charles Metcalfe, from which he arrived at the conclusion that he had a right to their gratitude for his public acts rather than for his private virtues, as advanced at a former meeting, with which the public had nothing to do, for observed he, "a man may be distinguished by the most eminent private virtues, as in the case of Governor Adam, and may yet, as that individual did, prove the greatest public scourge that a country was ever cursed with." Mr. Pote concluded a very long speech by proposing "that an Address be presented to Sir Charles Metcalfe, acknowledging the encouraging support which he has extended to all plans designed for the benefit of the East Indian community, and for the liberal policy which he has advocated in reference to their particular interests."

MR. ROGER DIAS, who had frequently interrupted the last speaker during his address, and who appeared to have adopted the same views that had been taken by Mr. Turton at the Town Hall meeting, thought that Sir Charles Metcalfe was entitled to nothing more than their private acknowledgments for the private favors he had conferred on them. He objected to all reference to his public conduct, and concluded by proposing as an amendment the original motion divested of its concluding clause "and for the liberal policy, &c.

To convince all those who were doubtful on the subject of the liberal policy of Sir Charles Metcalfe towards the East Indian community the chairman read the copy of a minute that had been published some time ago in the English newspapers, purporting to be a minute written by Sir Charles Metcalfe in reply to a despatch from the Court of Directors requiring the opinions of Council on the subject of the East Indians' petition. This minute set forth in a forcible manner the injustice to which the East Indians were subjected by the disabilities under which they labored, and advocated the placing of them on the same footing as Europeans in all respects, they being in fact Europeans, partially by descent, and entirely by education, religion and manners. It particularly drew attention to the anomaly of their being subject, when out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, to Mahomedan law, and adduced an instance where one of their body, then holding the rank of a Major in the service, had been tried by the Mahomedan law, the country being under British rule, the judge a British subject, and the party accused an European in religion, habits, education and partly in descent.

MR. LORIMER then spoke at considerable length to show that the East Indians had every reason to address Sir Charles Metcalfe on public grounds for the benefits he had conferred on them and on the community, and that it would be absurd to do so in any other manner; after which the original motion was carried amidst shouting and applause, only six persons having held up their hands in favor of Mr. Dias's amendment.

MR. WALE BYRN then read the following Address, which had been prepared for the occasion:

TO SIR C. T. METCALFE, BART.

Hon'ble Sir,—It is with feelings of the highest gratification, that we approach you with our congratulations on your elevation to the Government of the new Presidency of Agra. In your elevation to one of the first offices in the British Indian Government, we see it exemplified that "the path of rectitude is the path of honor;" and in the bestowal of this honorable distinction upon yourself, we recognise the appreciation of the ability and integrity which have characterised your public career.

On this occasion, we deem it incumbent upon us to express to you our humble but sincere acknowledgments for the services which you have rendered to the East Indian community, although circumstances have unfortunately concurred to make us a separate class, and we only state this to allude to the fact, that, as a person in office and authority, you have had to deal with us as a separate class, and that your proceedings towards us have been marked, by the highest degree of liberality and kindness. The public record of your favorable sentiments, which have been the more prized by us because they were so rare, lays us under the deepest obligations to you! The advocacy on your part of a liberal policy in reference to our interests, is viewed by us as an act for which we can make no adequate return!

To every undertaking that has had in view the well being of the East Indian class, you have not failed to afford your warmest encouragement and support; our schools and societies have been cherished by your munificence; and we have looked to you as a never failing resource in every emergency.

These, Sir, are the claims which you have upon our regard and affection! These are the circumstances which lead us to consider you our friend and benefactor.

We desire to express our most ardent wishes for the success of your new Government, and our fondest hopes for your uninterrupted health and happiness.

Mr. WALE BYRN then proposed "that the Address now read be adopted," which was seconded by Mr. F. D. Kellner, and carried by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. JOAKIM SINAES proposed "that a subscription be raised for the purpose of preparing a portrait of Sir Charles Metcalfe, to be placed in the Town Hall, and that the subscription list be opened to all classes of the community." This was seconded by Mr. Kirkpatrick, and carried unanimously.

Mr. CHARLES BYRN proposed "that the following gentlemen be elected to form a deputation to present the Address to Sir Charles Metcalfe, namely, Messrs Mathew Johnstone, Ochme, C. Francis, Pote, Wale Byrn and Kelner," which was seconded, and carried unanimously.

Mr. POTE then proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman for his able conduct in the chair, which was carried by acclamation, and the meeting then dispersed.

MR. JOHNSTONE'S ADDRESS.

We have the honor to wait upon you, hon'ble Sir, with an address voted to you at a public meeting of the East Indian community of Calcutta, held on the evening of the 6th instant, in acknowledgment of your generous and liberal conduct towards them on all occasions, both in your public and in your private capacity.

We are sensible, Hon'ble Sir, of many defects in the address, since this is the first time that the East Indian community have been placed in a situation in which it has become necessary for them to make a public acknowledgment of their obligations to an eminent public character: and we look therefore to your generosity to receive it with indulgence.

We are conscious that the language employed in the Address, does not adequately describe the nature and extent, either of our obligations or of the gratitude and attachment entertained towards you by our countrymen. A desire to avoid distressing you, Hon'ble Sir, by dwelling on the ties by which we feel ourselves bound to you, has compelled us to refrain from giving full expression to our feelings. We hope however to be pardoned for taking this opportunity to observe, that whoever else British India may claim among her benefactors, the East Indian community will consider it their duty to regard you as the individual by whom, in his public capacity, their civil rights have been most strenuously—most generously—and we may add—most successfully asserted.

In proceeding now, Hon'ble Sir, with your permission to read the address which our countrymen have entrusted to our care, as well as the resolution prefixed to it, we do so with our most fervent hopes and wishes that wheresoever duty or inclination may hereafter lead you, increasing honors and increasing renown may be your unfailing reward.

SIR CHARLES METCALFE'S REPLY.

Gentlemen,—I value highly the honor which you have conferred on me by this Address, not as deeming myself in any degree entitled to such a compliment, but because it is a token of approbation of my public conduct, proceeding from a most respectable and high minded class of my fellow-countrymen, than whom, from the opportunities which they possess, none can be more capable of appreciating the characters of servants of the state in India.

I thank you sincerely for your congratulations on my nomination to the Government of the New Presidency, and for the obliging sentiments which you connect with your notice of that appointment. Most heartily do I join with you in your kind wishes for the success of that Government, the test of which will be the welfare of the people subject to its administration.

You overrate those acts on my part, which you exalt by designating as services rendered to the East Indian community; but this is natural to generous minds, such as you have evinced, which are always anxious to give more than they receive. My obligations to you are the greater on that account.

You do not, however, I am happy to assure you, overrate the extent of my good will towards you. It is perfectly sincere and unbounded. But I cannot boast of services rendered. Your cause was the cause of justice, and could not fail ultimately to triumph. It was impossible that the restrictions under which you suffered, could permanently last. They have been removed by the wisdom of the legislature, and whatever remains to deprive you of any rights enjoyed by your European brethren must likewise ere long be abolished.

That you should be considered, or should consider yourselves, as a separate class, is greatly to be lamented. Not less is it so that there should be any distinctions or separations of any kind in this empire. It must be the anxious wish of every man connected with India, that all classes, Native, East Indian, and European, should be united in one bond of brotherly love. If any feelings, too natural to be wondered at, caused by the dominion of foreigners, or difference of religion, customs, manners, and education, render this union at present difficult or unattainable, with respect to our native brethern; we can only hope that such difficulties may in time be surmounted by good government and the enjoyment of equal rights. But there is no reason, why East Indians and Europeans, if equal justice be dealt to both, should not be joined in the most cordial union, or why any distinction between them should ever exist.

But if your community, Gentlemen, were to be regarded as separate, it is one of which you have much reason to be proud. Judging from what has come under my own observation, I am not aware of any community, in which there is more respectability of character, or less apparently of crime or unworthy conduct. In official ability and efficiency you yield to none; and in all pursuits and professions, in arts and in arms, you have representatives of whom every community might justly boast. You have an extensive share in the public business connected with the administration of the government of this country; and the acknowledgment of the value of your co-operation has long been established, is daily increasing, and cannot fail eventually to produce for you important and beneficial results.

I beg you to accept my warmest thanks for the cordial feelings on your part which has led to this gratifying intercourse, and to be assured of my earnest wishes for your welfare and prosperity.

NATIVE ADDRESS TO SIR CHARLES METCALFE.

We are happy to find, that the native community of Calcutta, are not less alive to the merits of Sir Charles Metcalfe, than the other classes of society have shewn themselves. A deputation waited upon him at Alipore, to present an Address, signed by upwards of five hundred native gentlemen, comprizing the far greater portion of the natives of rank, property, and influence residing in Calcutta or the vicinity.

* * * * * * * *

The Address was read by Maha Rajah Rajnarain Roy. The Rajah was accompanied by Baboo Callypersaud Mitter, Hajee Mirza Mehedy Ispehaany, and several other native gentlemen. Sir Charles received the deputation with his usual courtesy, and promised to send an answer to the Rajah. Among the signatures were those of four of the Mysore Princes, of Nuwaub Jaffur Jung Bahadoor, the Nuwaub of Chitpore, Maha Rajah Rajnarain Roy Bahadoor, Rajah Kaleekissen Bahadoor, Rajah Oppoorbokissen Buhadoor, Baboos Jugguiset Govinchund, Ashotas Day, Promothonauth Day, Rooplall Mullick, Cossinauth Mullick, Looknauth Mullick, Bustomdoss Mullick, Oodychund Dutt, Hajee Mirza Mehedy Ispehanny, &c. &c.

To the Honorable Sir CHARLES THEOPHILUS METCALFE,
Baronet, Governor of Agra, &c. &c. &c.

Honorable Sir,—We the undersigned members of the native community of Calcutta and its neighbourhood, presume upon your well-known affability towards all who approach you, to add our humble tribute of respect to those numerous tokens of attachment which have been poured out on the occasion of your expected departure. Our opportunities of estimating the private qualities that have earned you the love of your countrymen, have necessarily been few. But it would be a reproach to our hearts and understandings, if we did not come forward to proclaim our sense of the inflexible regard for equal justice, and utter contempt for abuse, corruption and chicanery, which have uniformly marked your official career. On this we dwell as the leading feature of your public life, for our great teacher tells us, that, in a Ruler, love of justice is the first of virtues. But it is not this alone that calls for our parting testimony. Your ear has always been accessible to our petitions and representations—your hand has been ever open to the distresses of our countrymen—our institutions both of charity, and of education, have ever found in your bounty a ready resource. Without flattering our vanity or indulging our caprice, you have ever studied, both in your public and your private conduct, to avoid offence to our habits and prejudices.

Though all these considerations make us look upon your departure as the loss, to this part of India, of the firmest friend to the Native interests, yet is it a consolation to know, that you will not be entirely lost to Hindoostan; and that your exertions for the public good are only transferred to another quarter, where they are at least as well known, and as highly valued.

That success may attend your acts, and happiness cheer your heart, whithersoever fortune may bear you, is the sincere wish and earnest prayer of.

Reply of Sir Charles Metcalfe to the Address presented by Members of the native community of Calcutta and its neighbourhood.

Gentlemen,—I receive with the highest gratification the honor conferred on me by this Address. I cannot be insensible to the value of such a pleasing token of esteem and approbation, from so numerous and respectable a body of the native community of Calcutta and its neighbourhood; among whom I recognize many of those most eminent in rank and character.

The sentiments which you express are exceedingly kind and obliging, and will be a source of cheering recollection in the distant scene to which I am proceeding.

I greatly lament that a difference in religion and customs should operate, as it does, in a great degree to prevent the benefits of social intercourse between the native and European communities in India; and consequently to preclude that personal intimacy, and that knowledge of private character, which are the chief cements of mutual attachment. You can neither share in our convivial enjoyments, nor take an interest in our amusements; and it is much to be regretted, that nothing has yet been devised, which, being suited to the habits and tastes of both parties, might lead naturally to that frequency of intercourse, which is so much to be desired, as tending to unite all in the bonds of affection. I trust that time will effect this desirable result, and remove the obstacles which retard it.

Notwithstanding this deficiency of personal intimacy, you have, with marked liberality, presented me with this testimony of your esteem on public grounds, such as cannot fail to make it highly gratifying. I hope that you may never see reason to alter the favourable opinions which you express. The first wish of my heart is that I may be instrumental, in the office to which I have been appointed, towards the welfare of the native community of India. Such is my own anxious desire; such is my positive duty; such is the object of the incessant injunctions of the Supreme Government of India, and of the authorities in England who have charged me with my present important trust—and that the happiness of India may be the fruit of British rule, is the ardent prayer of every British heart.

Accept, Gentlemen, my grateful thanks for your good will and kindness, and my cordial wishes for your prosperity.

15th December, 1834. C. T. METCALFE.

MEETING OF THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

A very full meeting of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Calcutta was held on Monday evening, the 10th November, at the Principal Roman Catholic Church, to adopt measures to convey to the Pope their sentiments of gratitude for his prompt and ready compliance with their prayer for British Pastors.

On the motion of Mr. MICHIE, Mr. JOHN LACKERSTEEN was called to the Chair.

The Chairman said, it was certainly a subject of peculiar gratification to meet on so interesting an occasion as the present. The advertizement had acquainted his hearers with the cause of their assembling, and he should not therefore trespass on their time by any observations, but would at once proceed to read an address that had been prepared, and which, if it met with their approbation would be submitted for adoption.

The Chairman then read an address to the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda, of which the following is an abstract:—

"We respectfully request your Eminence to convey to our Holy Father the Sovereign Pontiff the sincere expression of our gratitude for the ready and entire compliance which he has so benignantly accorded to our prayer for British Pastors. His Holiness has not only complied with our wishes, but has in the fullness of his affectionate solicitude for our spiritual welfare gratified the warmest feelings of our hearts by sending us Pastors belonging to a holy and learned society which we highly esteem, and we hail the arrival among us of Pastors of the same order as St. Xavier, the Apostle of India, with feelings of gratitude and delight, as an event most auspicious to the cause of our religion in Bengal. In the appointment of the most Reverend Dr. St. Ledger as Vicar Apostolic of Bengal we gratefully recognize the affectionate and parental care evinced for us by His Holiness, for a measure more calculated to produce the most beneficial effects could not have been devised. During the short period that our Reverend Vicar Apostolic and his companions have been among us, they have by their talents, zeal and affability, secured our unqualified confidence, veneration and esteem; and so fully convinced are we of their perfect qualification for this Mission, that we have nothing further to wish beyond a continuance and succession of such Pastors. We avail ourselves of the opportunity of acquainting your Eminence with the propriety of the conduct of the Reverend Fre Antonio de Santa Maria, the Vicar of the Church of Nossa Senhora D'Rozario, who received the Vicar Apostolic with the most unequivocal marks of respect, acknowledged him as the supreme Ecclesiastical authority in Bengal, and not only rendered him due honor and submission, but liberally tendered him the free use of the Parochial house, thus affording an edifying example of respect and obedience to the mandates of our Holy Father."

The address concludes with a repetition of gratitude to the Pope and with thanks to the Cardinal Prefect for the interest he has taken in the spiritual welfare of the Catholic community of Calcutta, together with an earnest solicitation that he will continue his fostering care and protection to the Vicar Apostolic and his Clergy to enable them effectually to perform the arduous duties of their Mission.

Mr. JOAQUIM SINAES said the occasion which collected them there was too interesting for him to suffer it to pass without the expression of his feelings and sentiments. He should reproach himself did he longer refrain to give vent to the feelings of gratitude that pervaded his bosom, and any attempt to suppress them would be a task as impracticable as if he were to attempt to impede the current of the ocean in its rapid flow. It was with no small degree of self congratulation that he hailed the opportunity of giving vent to his gratitude for this glorious consumation of their most ardent wishes. It would be presumtuous in him to attempt any panegyric on the Pastors who had been provided for their edification for the concurrent opinions of an enlightened community, and their admiration of the splendid talents already exhibited combined to render any commendation from him unnecessary. Appreciating as they deeply did the inestimable blessings conferred on them by their Holy Father the Pope, their gratitude called loudly for expression to the quarter whence they derived these benefits. The contemplation of the great and glorious change which had been effected in their prospects never failed to fill him with gratitude to that beneficent Father who at their representation lost not a moment in supplying their spiritual wants, and in so efficient and perfect a manner as to leave nothing to be wished for or desired. Under the impression of such feelings he need not say that the address just read met with his hearty concurrence, and he subscribed his name with a gratification which his powers of speech could not convey. Mr. Sinaes concluded by proposing "that the address just read be adopted, and that it be transmitted through the most Reverend the Vicar Apostolic, the chairman being solicited to hand up the same to the most Reverend the Vicar Apostolic with a communication expressive of the desire of the meeting that he should kindly undertake to do so," and the motion having been seconded, was put from the chair and carried unanimously.

It was then proposed by Mr. Michie, seconded by Mr. Joaquim Sinaes, and carried unanimously, "that the address which has just been approved of be signed immediately."

Mr. ANTHONY DE SOUZA then proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was seconded by Mr. Sinaes and carried unanimously.

The address was signed in duplicate by a great number of persons, and is to lie open for signature as long as possible at the house of Mr. Lackerstein; the time will not however be long, as it is to be dispatched by the Exmouth.

This meeting was distinguished by two peculiarities, namely, punctuality in taking the chair and entire unanimity in its proceedings.—Hurkaru.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

A general meeting of this Society was held at the Town Hall on the 12th November, Sir Robert Colquhoun, Bart., in the chair. The Acting Secretary (Dr. Wallich) reported to the meeting, that the committee had been engaged during the months of September and October in distributing seeds of various descriptions throughout Bengal, Assam, and the Upper Provinces; and he likewise announced the recent arrival of a valuable cargo of Cape seeds and vine cuttings, which would be distributed in a similar manner.

We regret the absence of our Reporter prevents us from giving a full detail of the proceedings of this meeting. We understand some interesting communications were made relative to the cultivation of Sea Island cotton, the introduction of seed wheat from Van Diemen's Land, and various other subjects connected with the interests of the Society, and we may add, indeed, the interests of the community of India. Several new members were added to the list, and, though last not least, an order was given to invest Sa. Rs. 5,000 in Company's paper in the name of the office bearers of the Society, which betokens its funds to be in a flourishing condition.—Hurkaru.

MEETING OF SUBSCRIBERS TO THE UNIVERSAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

Pursuant to an advertisement published in the Calcutta Newspapers, a meeting of the shareholders of the Universal Assurance Society was held at the office of Messrs. Bagshaw and Co., the Secretaries to the Society, on the 3d November, for the election of Directors, and the transaction of such other business as might be brought before it.

Mr. JAMES PATTLE having been called to the chair, Mr. Bagshaw addressed the meeting on the subject of the eligibilty of the Company's Civil and Military Servants, according to the terms of their service, to become shareholders. To settle the difference of opinion that existed on this point, a reference had been made to Government, and so far as the local Government was concerned all objection had been removed. The question had in the first instance been submitted to the Advocate-General for his opinion, but that gentleman, in consideration of his official capacity, had suggested the propriety of submitting it to another barrister, conceiving that the question, though by no means a difficult one, bore too closely on a Government one to allow him to answer it unless laid before him by authority. Application was then made to Mr. Charles Prinsep, who was of opinion that the Society, beyond all question, was not one of trade or traffic, and consequently there could be no valid objection to the Government Servants becoming shareholders. If the Society were one of trade or traffic the members of it would be subject to the English Bankrupt Law, which they were not, for under the late consolidated Bankrupt Act, which greatly extended the application of the word trader, no class of insurers had been included but those who insured against perils by sea. On these grounds he conceived that, not only Civil and Military Servants, but even King's Judges and Members of Council, were perfectly competent to become shareholders without infringing either law, regulation or order. This opinion had been submitted to the Vice President in Council, who, after consulting the Advocate General on the subject, had replied that they saw no existing impediments to members of the Services becoming shareholders in the Society. They had however stated in addition that the Court of Directors were free to make any order on the subject that they saw fit.

The following officers were then unanimously chosen, namely, Messrs. J. Pattle, R. Saunders, F. Macnaghten, C. R. Prinsep, and W. H. Smoult, Colonel Dunlop, Captain Steel and Doctor Nicholson, directors; and Messrs. J. D. Smith, J. Lowe and the Reverend H. Fisher, Auditors.

Eight hundred shares are calculated on as taken, so that there are only about two hundred left for disposal. The meeting was numerously attended, and broke up after a vote of thanks to the chairman. The shareholders before dispersing subscribed to an agreement binding themselves to execute the deed when it arrived in Calcutta.—Hurkaru.

MEETING OF SUBSCRIBERS TO THE BENGAL PROVIDENT SOCIETY.

Pursuant to public notice a general meeting of subscribers to the Bengal Provident Society was held at the Exchange Rooms, on the 8th November 1834.—Present, W. Bruce, T. Dickens, J. D. Dow, J. Palmer, G. A. Prinsep, J. D. Smith, and A. F. Smith, Esquires.

Mr. DICKENS in the Chair.

The objects of the meeting having been stated to be the election of four Directors, and the consideration of all matters that might be brought before it, in any way affecting the interests of the several classes, the Secretary submitted a printed copy of the Regulations, and, it appearing from the 11th Article of the same, that the existing vacancies in the Direction could not be filled up, agreeably to rule, until the general meeting in January 1835, it was

Resolved,—That Messrs. T. Dickens, J. D. Dow, J. D. Smith, and A. F. Smith having respectively signified their willingness to undertake the office, be elected provisional Directors in association with Mr. Palmer, the present Director, until the general meeting in January 1835.

The Secretary, in answer to a question from Mr. J. D. Smith, described the circumstances under which he had become the purchaser of the house in Middleton Street, formerly belonging to the late Mr. Barwell, and read the proceedings of the Direction on the subject of the sale, from which it appeared that Mr. Leighton's offer of 33,000. Rs- exceeded the highest bids made on two separate occasions, when the property was brought forward by Messrs. Tulloh and Co. and Messrs. Jenkins, Low and Co. but as an opinion seemed to prevail abroad that more might be obtained for it, Mr. Leighton declared himself ready either to relinquish his bargain, on reimbursement of his expenses, or to complete the contract of sale, should a higher price not be procurable. He assured the meeting that the fullest justice had been done to the property in the way of giving the intended sale ample publicity in the papers of the presidency, and that his chief motive in becoming the purchaser was a desire to bring the affairs of the first class to a final close and distribute the remaining assets amongst the subscribers. After considerable discussion the following resolution was adopted by the Meeting.

Resolved,—That, with reference to Mr. Leighton's offer, the house in Middleton Street, formerly belonging to the late Mr. Barwell, be advertised for sale by public auction on Saturday the 22d instant, and then offered at an upset price of sicca rupees (35,000) thirty five thousand, and that, if sold at that or a higher rate, the proceeds be carried to the credit of the first class, less Mr. Leighton's expenses, but, should no purchaser appear at or above sicca rupees 35,000, that the existing contract of sale be confirmed.

The question of unclaimed dividends was then entered upon, and the Secretary read to the meeting the copy of a correspondence that had passed between himself and Messrs. J. and H. Cowie, regarding certain dividends on a share in the 1st class belonging to Dr. Hazlewood, which had been forfeited owing to their not having been claimed within the limit of time prescribed by the Regulations. The circumstances under which this forfeiture occurred having been duly enquired into and weighed by the meeting, it was

Resolved,—That Dr. Hazlewood's claim be disallowed, as it appears to this meeting that the forfeiture would not have been incurred had he followed the obviously proper course of making a direct application for his dividends to the late Secretaries and Treasurers.

The Secretary read the copy of a correspondence he had had with Messrs. Cockerell and Co. respecting some shares subscribed for by Major B. C. Swindell on the lives of his children, the dividends on which had not been drawn for, though notice of claim had been duly served upon the Society. It was understood that the assignees of Messrs. Palmer and Co.'s estate had either a legal or equitable claim to these shares, and it was determined, as a preliminary step, to call for the production of the original certificates, with the view of ascertaining to whom the Directors were bound to account. The following resolution was accordingly proposed and carried:

Resolved,—That the exhibition of the original certificates for shares Nos. 151 and 396, subscribed for by Major B. C. Swindell on the lives of his children, be made a preliminary condition of the payment of the dividends now due thereon, it being of importance to ascertain who the parties are actually holding a beneficial interest under these documents.

A long discussion ensued on the question, whether the 23d Article of the Regulations, defining the limit of grace for absent claimants, should not be strictly adhered to in future, which was terminated by the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved,—That in cases where dividends become forfeited agreeably to the 23d Article of the Regulations, and are claimed after the expiration of the term of grace therein allowed to subscribers, a representation of the causes of such delay shall be submitted to the Directors for their consideration, and they shall have the discretionary power of admitting claims so made, should circumstances appear to justify the exercise of indulgence, and available funds exist for the settlement of them at or after the date of claim, without prejudice to demands previously declared payable.

The Secretary having intimated to the Meeting that Mr. Cullen had tendered his resignation of the office of a Director and that Mr. Fergusson was also desirous of being relieved from its duties, it was

Resolved,—That the resignation of Messrs. Cullen and Fergusson be accepted, and that they be requested to endorse the Company's paper to Mr. Palmer, he being the only Director, at present in office, elected in conformity with the Regulations of the Society, and it being apprehended that the Treasury officers would object to pay the interest accruing thereon on the receipt of Directors not formally appointed.

The Secretary suggested the desirableness of selling the claims of the several classes against the late and former Secretaries and Treasures to enable him finally to close such accounts as might now or shortly be wound up, and after some conversation, it was

Resolved,—That the claims of the several classes against the late firm of Cruttenden, Mackillop and Co. be disposed of, provided four annas in the rupee can be obtained for them, and that on any offer being made for the purchase of the balance due by Messrs. Palmer and Co.'s estate it be submitted to the Directors for their consideration and decision. A question having arisen as to the mode in which the Secretary had been in the habit of drawing his commission of two per cent., that is—in anticipation of the payment of dividends—Mr. Bruce observed that such was the practice observed by his own firm in the recent case of the distribution of the funds of the New Equitable Tontine, and it seemed to him only fair and equitable that a similar principle should be recognized in the present instance, especially as the remuneration was any thing but exorbitant. The Chairman agreed with Mr. Bruce that two per cent. was hardly an adequate compensation for the services of the Secretary, and, so far as he was concerned, he would be disposed to recommend an augmentation of the allowance at the January meeting, an intimation that was met by an admission on the part of the Secretary that he had volunteered to undertake the duties for the per centage in question, and that, however grateful he might feel for the Chairman's kindly disposition towards him, he would rather that no increase should be proposed. After some further conversation, it was

Resolved,—That the practice, hitherto adopted by the Secretary of deducting his commission of two per cent. preparatory to the payment of a dividend, be held to be a fair and equitable mode of taking compensation for his labor, particularly with reference to the admitted inadequacy of the amount, and that all past transactions be accordingly confirmed.

The meeting then separated after a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

DINNER TO SIR CHARLES METCALFE.

The Dinner given to Sir Charles Metcalfe, at the Town Hall, on Friday evening, the 28th November, was attended by upwards of three hundred gentlemen, among whom, with one exception, were all that have any claim to distinction in the society of Calcutta. Sir John Grant presided, and the distinguished guest sat on his right hand. After the removal of the cloth the chairman gave "the King," which was drank with loud chees.

Air.—GOD SAVE THE KING.

Sir John Peter Grant.—Gentlemen, before giving you the toast, with which you will expect me to conclude, I have to state to you that I have received a communication from a distinguished person who regrets that from the state of his health he is unable to attend. I need not say that I allude to the Governor-General. He has done me the favor to write me a letter which I think it my duty to read to you.

Sir John Grant here read the following letter:—

Barrackpore, November 27, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR JOHN,—I have to request that as chairman you will do me the favor to express to the Subscribers to the entertainment to be given to Sir Charles Metcalfe to-morrow, the expression of my great regret, that the effects of my late illness compels me to forego the pleasure I had contemplated from the acceptance of their invitation.

At the preliminary meeting, you are stated to have expressed your willingness to take part in a proceeding which as being unconnected with political matters, could in no way interfere with your official character. It is true, that the present entertainment has no such object in view; but I should be sorry, at the same time, to think that public services of the individual were entirely excluded from the consideration which has led to this marked exhibition of esteem and respect.

It happens unfortunately for those who honestly administer the affairs of this country, that neither their motives nor their acts come officially before the public eye; but the present case may be deemed, in some degree, an exception to the general rule, because during the long period that Sir Charles Metcalf, has filled in succession the first appointments under the local government, one general conviction prevails as to the purity, honor and success, of his conduct, as well as of his just title to the highest distinctions, which have been lately conferred upon him, by the home authorities.

I had hoped upon the present occasion to have in person expressed my concurrence in this general conviction. My connection with Sir Charles Mrtcalfe in Council during more than six years ought to make me the best of witnesses, unless indeed friendship should have blinded me and conqnered my detestation of flattery, which, I trust, is not the case. I, therefore, unhesitatingly declare that whether in private or public life, I never met with the individual whose integrity, liberality of sentiment and delicacy of mind, excited in a greater degree my respect and admiration. The State never had a more able and upright councillor, nor any Governor-General a more valuable and independent assistant and friend; and if during the same period, any merit can be claimed for the principles by which the Indian government has been guided, to Sir Charles must the full share be assigned.

Neither has the access which my situation has given me to the public records and to past transactions led me to form a less favourable opinion of his preceding career. I need not enter into particulars. Suffice it to express my sincere impressions that among all the statesmen who since my first connection with India have best served their country and have most exalted its reputation and interests in the East, Webb, Close, Sir Arthur Wellesley, Elphinstone, Munro and Malcolm, equal rank and equal honor, ought to be given to Sir Charles Metcalfe.

I have been induced to say so much from an anxiety that the private virtues of this eminent individual, great as they are, should not obscure or cast in the shade his public merits, which are infinitely more of importance to our country. An example like this cannot be too prominently brought forward, not only for general imitation, but to extort, if possible, from the lamentable apathy of our countrymen at home, towards this large and valuable portion of the empire, the same degree of respect and honor for the servants of the state in India, which are so freely and generously granted to those who distinguish themselves in every other part of the globe.

I remain, my dear Sir John,

Sincerely yours,

W. C. BENTINCK.

Gentlemen, I put no other preface to what I have to offer to you in proposing the health of our distinguished guest than by reading this letter, except by saying that after so honourable a testimonial any thing that can fall from me must indeed fall far short of what I should wish to express, or of what that eminent individual so amply deserves. I cannot but feel that I am impressed with sensations of a very opposite nature in now addressing you. If it were my only duty to recall to your recollection the merits of that distinguished individual, to bring to your memory how much he has contributed to the benefit of this part of the British Empire, how much he has contributed to the happiness of our individual and domestic society, I should indeed have undertaken the task for which I am greatly inadequate, but at least to do which could be attended by no feelings but those of unmixed pleasure and delightful recollections; [cheers] but I am compelled also to remember to address him as your organ, and not only to express to him the deep admiration we feel for his past conduct and the gratitude we feel for the benefits we have derived from him, but our deep regret that we are about to lose him as a member of our society; [applause] and so selfish is our nature that I fear this impression has been uppermost in my mind ever since this entertainment was proposed; but I feel bound on your part and on my own to discard it. It is a selfish consideration. We know that he quits us to add to his own reputation, and to add the happiness of those he is destined to govern, and in so doing to do all that his life shews he has ever thought valuable. The Governor-General has alluded to what I said when this meeting was first proposed. I acceded with infinite pleasure to the honor conferred on me in nominating me to fill the chair. I did so not without feeling my own inability, but I felt that it became me to accept what was so kindly offered, and to take the only opportunity in my power of joining the public of Calcutta in stating my admiration of the virtues, public and private, of Sir Charles Metcalfe. The Governor-General has said that I stated on that occasion that my official situation did not in my opinion preclude me from taking the chair, because it was an assembly of the society in which Sir Charles Metcalfe had lived to express their kind feelings towards him, and not connected with any expression of political feeling. If I may be permitted to draw the distinction between an assembly congregated for the expression of political opinions, and one met for the expression of the public mind towards a distinguished member of society, I think that justice cannot be more properly employed than in awarding that tribute which eminent services deserved. If I were to detain you by tracing the life of our distinguished guest from the first period when at an early age he was selected by one of the greatest statesmen that ever governed India to form part of his private family, to be entrusted with the Secretaryship of the private and secret department;—if I were to trace him out from that early age when the Marquis of Wellesley so choose him out, along with Martin, Mountstewart Elphinstone, and a number of other distinguished politicians, who all acted with him in the service of that noble and eminent person;—if I were to trace him from the time when he was chosen by that great judge of character to fill important stations, when Mr. Elphinstone was deputed with one army and my friend on the right with another, at an early age, to exercise his first political functions in that country to the Government of which he is now called;—if I were to trace him through the subsequent periods of his life in the establishment of one of the most important branches of the Empire, near the dominions of that Prince of whom I see a late officer at this table;* [cheers] if I were to trace him through the whole of his important duties on the other side of India;—if I were to attempt all this I should do that which would be quite unnecessary in this assembly, in which I might be betrayed into saying what delicacy should forbid me to express: but I am sure I should not be able to do justice to his eminent services. I have detained you too long. [Applause.] The subject is one which to you requires no expression from me. Give me leave, gentlemen, to conclude with conveying to our distinguished guest our fervent hopes that his happiness, health and prosperity in the country to which he goes may be equal to the wishes of those he leaves behind him [long and deafening applause.] A bumper gentlemen, standing, with all the honors, to the health of Sir Charles Metcalfe. [renewed cheering.]

Air.—CHARLIE IS MY DARLING.

Sir Charles Metcalfe.—Gentlemen, you must be sensible that the honor you have conferred on me is so overwhelming, that I cannot find any language to convey to you even a faint notion of my sense of your exceeding kindness. The difficulty is increased by my not being aware of having any claim to so great an honor [applause.] It is pure generosity on your part, which can only be met by lasting gratitude on mine. I was prepared to part with the society of Calcutta with deep regret, after the long intercourse I have had with you, during which I have experienced numerous proofs of friendship and good will, but I was not prepared for this public, signal, magnificent manifestation of your kindness. It is, gentlemen, an honor of which I shall be proud to the last hour of my existence, coming as it does from such a society, than which there is not in the whole world one that is more independent, intelligent and noble minded [cheers] and coming as it does from such a society, I feel that I have a right to be proud of it. I am fully sensible that I have no title to it; [cheers] and that it proceeds entirely from your kind dispositions; but to be the object of so much generous feeling I consider to be a just cause of pride. I might go on, enlarging on your goodness and my own unworthiness, for of these things my thoughts are full; but I will not longer detain you, and will therefore beg you to accept my fervent and heartfelt thanks for your unbounded kindness. The recollection of it will cheer me throughout life, and furnish me with new motives to pursue the right path in all things, in order that I may not discredit this distinguished mark of your approbation. I cannot refrain from offering my warm thanks to your excellent President, Sir John Grant, for the high and flattering manner in which he has given expression to your generous sentiments. This is far from being the first instance in which he has made me sensible of his kindness, the remembrance of which will ever be grateful to me. In acknowledging my gratitude for the very flattering sentiments that have been just expressed towards me, I cannot refrain from regretting the absence of the Governor-General. His expressed intention to be present had he not been prevented by the state of his health is another of the numerous proofs of kindness I have experienced from him during the years that I have had the honor to be a member of his administration; and I am quite unable to express the sense I feel of the handsome manner in which he has communicated his inability to attend. I quit his council with regret, and regret still more that he is so soon to quit us, and to resign the Government of these dominions into other hands. I can only anxiously wish what we can scarcely hope that his successor may be as able and as competent to discharge the duties of his high office as he is, and as anxious to uphold the honor of our country and to promote the welfare of the millions in this country committed to his care as he has been. Once more permit me to offer you my most grateful thanks [long and continued cheering.]

The Chairman then gave "the Queen and the Royal family."

Air.—GOD SAVE THE KING AND QUEEN.

Sir John Grant.—It is a source of embarrassment to me that the healths of those whom I most esteem are to be combined in my mind with feelings of regret. The toast I am about to give you is that of a distinguished individual whose residence, I am sorry to say, is not to be long among us. I need not say that I allude to the Governor-General of India [loud applause.] It is not for me in the situation I now hold to allude to times which are past, when I had the happiness of acting with that distinguished individual in political matters. We are not here to discuss subjects of this kind, and I will abstain from them; but this I may be permitted to say, there never was an individual who acted in public life in any capacity who more acquired the confidence of those with whom he was associated. You are better judges than I can profess to be of his conduct in the Government of India, [applause] but no man living can doubt that the object of his Government has been to promote the happiness of the people who lived under him. I cannot help alluding, and I think no man in future history will ever look to the reign of Lord William Bentinck without recollecting that glorious achievement of his in this country, the putting down of the sacrifice of those unhappy females who were offered up at the shrine of barbarous superstition [loud applause.] In this as in every other matter which has conduced to the benefit of India my honorable and excellent friend on the right hand has participated [applause.] I will detain you no longer, but propose to you with all the honors the health of the Governor-General of India [loud applause.]

Air.—"UP AND WAUR THEM A'WILLIE."

THE NAVY.—Air.—RULE BRITANNIA.

HIS MAJESTY'S ARMY.—Air—BRITISH GRENADIERS.

Sir John Grant.—I rise to propose another bumper toast to the health of another guest whose presence I am sure you will all be happy to find afforded on this occasion. At all times it would have given me, and those who know him, the greatest pleasure to have his society, but on the present occasion I am particularly glad that he is amongst us, that he may see what sort of people we are, [cheers] and how we can estimate qualities very like his own. His presence restrains me from saying more than this, which I am enabled to say from the testimony of not a very short acquaintance, that the more you know of him the more you will like him, and the more reason you will have to estimate him in every quality, both of the head and of the heart. Of this I think I can assure you that in those qualities nothing will be found wanting to promote the prosperity of those whose interests are committed to his charge. I wish him most heartily success, and I wish him that which he wishes to all mankind, the enjoyment of uninterrupted health and happiness. I beg to give you the health, I was going to say of the Governor of Madras, you will forgive me if I give you the health of Sir Frederick Adam [applause.]

Air.—BLUE BONNETS OVER THE BORDER.

Sir Frederick Adam.—I rise to return thanks for the handsome manner in which my health has been drank with some degree of embarrassment, because the honor which has been conferred on me was unexpected, and because the manner in which it has been conferred on me, totally unknown as I am to this society, I feel to be totally undeserved. The worthy president said that he was glad to have me amongst you that I might have an opportunity of seeing what sort of people you are in Calcutta, and I assure you I am very glad to have had that opportunity. At any time it would be highly gratifying, but on an occasion like this it is a happiness that I deem peculiarly so; for though my personal acquaintance with Sir Charles Metcalfe has been very short, only since I have met him in Calcutta, yet there is no man who attends to the transactions of India who can be ignorant of his high character as a public man; but I have been accustomed to hear of Sir Charles Metcalfe, or to read his name, from one well capable of appreciating him, who well knows him, and who is well known here, and it is what I have heard from him that has given me a higher opinion of Sir Charles Metcalfe than the perusal of any public or other documents. Your president has done me the honor of drinking my health personally rather than as Governor of Madras. I feel the honor the stronger, because I am confident, and I say it with honest pride, that the name I bear is the best recommendation that could be given you [applause.]

Sir John Grant.—The health I am now about to propose to you is that of a new body, and I therefore think it necessary to preface it with a few observations; but as it is composed of very old friends I think the observations need not be more than a few. The toast is one that I believe has never yet been given, "the Council of India," and I am particularly glad that in giving it I give the healths of gentlemen with whom we are all well acquainted, and upon whose merits you will form a just opinion without anything being necessary to be said by me. My honorable friend who sits next me but one* is well known to most of you; to me he has been known but for a short period, but that period has been long enough to enable me to acquiesce in your opinions, and to feel the most sincere regard for him. With the gentleman next to him I have had the happiness of a shorter acquaintance, but his character is well known in this country. Gentlemen, all these persons require nothing from me to recommend you to drink their healths with great sincerity and all the honors but the bare mention of the toast I gave you, the Council of India [applause.]

Air.—LIFE'S A BUMPER.

Sir John Grant.—I purposely omitted the name of one Member of the Council of India, because I thought that as a stranger amongst us, it became us to treat him separately and by himself. (Loud applause.) He has brought with him here a high and a well deserved character, (applause) and unless he shall entirely falsify the expectations which have been entertained of him by persons highly capable of judging, his arrival will be attended, to the inhabitants of India, with the most essential advantage. He has come here charged with the fulfilment of duties of no ordinary sort. I may perhaps be thought to be influenced by the habits of the profession when I say that of all the institutions of a country the first and most essential are its laws. To improve the institutions of a people without violating their prejudices, without counteracting the slow progress of civilization, without hazardous experiments, but on sound principles, is a task of no ordinary nature, and the distinguished and eminent person of whom I am now speaking will permit me to say to him, that that which he has undertaken is that which, if well performed, will reflect the greatest credit on his name, and in the performance of which he will meet with many and serious difficulties. I wish to him and to those associated with him in the task the utmost success. I wish them to be forwarded in their views by the assistance of all those who have influence in the society of India, and I wish the inhabitants of this country those happy results which ought to be derived from a system of wise and careful legislation. I beg to give you the health of Mr. Macaulay, (loud applause) and success to the Legislation of India.

Mr. Macaulay.—I did not expect when I entered this room that I should in this manner be called on to express my gratitude. It is not easy for me, and I hope not necessary, to assure you how much gratitude I feel for the manner in which my health has been proposed, and the manner in which it has been received by this company. I am particularly grateful to my honorable and learned friend for coupling my name with those weighty and important words—the Legislation of India. Gentlemen, I feel myself rather indisposed this evening, and can only return you my sincere thanks for the manner in which you have drank my health, wishing you every degree of prosperity and happiness; and I particularly direct that wish to the distinguished individual, our guest, though any thing that I could say in his praise might be deemed superfluous, surrounded as he is by friends of many years' standing. Seeing as he sees this hall filled by friends whose friendship and admiration have been strengthened by a continued knowledge of his merits, it is impossible that he can place any value upon any tribute of respect that can be offered him by a stranger. I would not, however, willingly sit down without doing honor, not to him but to myself, by joining the voice of one stranger with that of the society of which he is the most conspicuous ornament, and congratulating him on the manner in which he leaves us, and myself on witnessing the proof that in Indian society the path of rectitude is the path to honour (long and loud applause.)

Sir John Grant.—I rise to propose a health which I think cannot be forgotten in an assembly of this kind. I may be betrayed by private friendship into too high an estimation of the person whose health I am about to propose: if so it is the betrayal of a long and intimate acquaintance with him, which leads me into a sincere conviction, that no person now existing can have a more anxious desire for the prosperity of India, or be more sensible of the responsibility which attaches to his situation than the person whose health I am about to give. I say nothing more, lest it should be said that I am betrayed by private friendship where I am only conscious of acting on principles of public duty. I give you, Gentlemen, the President of the Board of Control.

The health of the Governor of Serampore, the representative of His Danish Majesty, was then drunk, and suitably acknowledged.

Sir John Grant.—From Statesmen and affairs of State, I gladly call your attention to that part of Society for whom those Statesmen are most glad to toil, and whose smiles I believe the bravest of them consider as their highest reward. I am quite sure that more amiability, more kindness of disposition, more fascinating and agreeable manners, cannot be displayed than by that distinguised person whose name is placed at the head of the toast I am about to give to you, nor one more fit to head that society whose health I mean to include in that toast. Gentlemen, it would have better become me at an earlier period of life, and in a less grave capacity [laughter and cheers] to have expaciated upon those qualities which are so calculated to bestow upon them the greatest—[here the Chairman's voice was drowned by the reiterated cheers of the company.] I perceive from the reception you have given to what I have said, that I need say no more to your drinking, at least with three times three the health I am about to give. I give you the health of Lady William Bentinck and the Ladies of the Presidency [long and loud applause.]

Air.—HERE'S A HEALTH TO ALL GOOD LASSES.

Sir John Grant then gave a toast, which he said required no preface at all, namely, the Civil Service of India.

Air.—HOME, SWEET HOME.

Mr. Pattle.—I cannot, after a service of nearly half a century, urge that it is strange to me to address you on an occasion like the present, but I had hoped that some one of my brethren younger than myself would have undertaken a duty far better suited in this vast Hall to their more powerful lungs and constitution, and which would have received from their vivid and glowing imaginations an impressive eloquence much beyond the reach of my humble pretensions. It is the custom of the bar, which we would do well to follow, for the youngest member present to express their sentiments whenever occasion like this arises for a public declaration on their part. These are days pregnant with good reforms, and I respectfully hope that which I have ventured to suggest to my brethren will not hereafter be forgotten. Gentlemen, I address you desirous that a gratifying duty should not be wholly omitted, and I trust to your wonted indulgence to excuse the inadequate attempt I shall make to give utterance to feelings in which it is my good fortune that all here participate.

The Civil Service may be justly proud that this civic feast—a high compliment arranged in the best taste of ancient and modern times—entirely worthy of the congregated donors and equally worthy of the acceptance of our honored guest, I say the Civil Service may be justly proud that such a tribute of respect is paid to one of their brethren by this assemblage of worth and talent.

The Civil Service may be no less proud that on this public occasion they can fearlessly assert that time has not diminished their title to the very honorable and distinguishing encomiums passed on their body by a Castlereagh and a Canning in the Senate and by the most preeminent of their successive Governors. If former days produced a Warren Hastings, a John Shore, and a Hilaro Barlow, more modern days have been marked by a John Adam, a Mountstuart Elphinstone, a Holt Mackenzie, a William Blunt, and I may add with great exultation one more name, second to none of these I have mentioned, a Charles Metcalfe.

The service to which I have the honor to belong, may reasonably exult that our honoured guest has been considered by the high authorities at home so indispensable to the councils of this country, that the limited period of five years in his case was extended to seven, and then succeeded by his being created a Governor of Agra with an additional patent appointing him to preside over all India in the event of our Noble Governor preferring to return to England before his successor might arrive.

Gentlemen,—I will not attempt to discuss the official acts of our honoured guest nor to particularize the claims they give him to the gratitude of all classes of this country, but I will briefly and confidently assert that it has been the incessant anxiety of his public life to give his most powerful support to all measures, promising "the utmost good to the greatest number." This golden principle has always swayed his public conduct, and it could not be well otherwise without violating feelings so entirely congenial with his inherent benignity, benevolence, and philanthropy. In fact the influence of this golden principle has ever made him feel an unconquerable repugnance to all measures, which have not that cardinal merit to recommend them.

With our honored guest's private virtues, his unbounded hospitality, his never refusing liberality to talent, and his bountiful charity to all objects of distress needing his assistance, it would be superfluous to occupy your attention. These virtuous have for many years past been familiar to your daily observation. Gentlemen, I feel I cannot conclude this imperfect address without offering to you my warmest thanks for the indulgent encouragement you have given to me, nor can I conclude it better than by giving you the following toast—"The Governor of Agra, the pride of the Civil Service." [This toast and the speech which introduced it, were received with loud and repeated cheers.]

Air.—HOME, SWEET HOME.

The Indian Army. Air.—THE BRITISH GRENADIERS.

Sir John Grant.—I am about to propose a toast which embraces two different subjects, but neither of which could possibly be omitted at an entertainment given to our distinguished guest. I think there is no person here who is not aware of the great benefit conferred by the benevolent exertions and contributions of my honorable friend. I mean to give prosperity to the native education of India, and the charitable institutions of Calcutta. He has ever felt as I humbly feel also, that if you would maintain your dominion in India, you must educate the natives of India,—if you would prepare for that which may sooner or later arrive, the leaving them to their own resources, that they should not be left by Englishmen in a situation in which they cannot maintain their own independence and promote their own happiness. With regard to the charitable institutions in the place we live in, where is the individual who has contributed so largely to their support as our guest? Were claims ever made on his humanity in vain? Wishing well to these institutions, I have thought it inseparable from the duties of a chairman of this meeting assembled in honor of my distinguished friend, to call to your attention these particular subjects, and in conjunction with him to drink to native education and the charitable institutions of India.

After the above toast had been drank, the glee of "Life's a bumper" was sung. Sir John Grant then said, I am about to give you a toast which you may think very different from the burthen of the song you have just heard—you have just heard a song about "mirth and music, love and wine,"—I am going to give you a toast about law and litigation; and yet when I do so, I think I shall mix it up with the names of persons whose amiable qualities will command your affection and esteem. I may be accused of partiality, but I shall have at least the credit of experience when I say, that the gentleman whose name I find at the head of the toast, and those included in it, are entitled from the community of this place to every degree of praise, I may say of gratitude. The administration of the law, we are all aware, is of the utmost importance: that law cannot be well administered without an honest and an able Bar; and when I say to you that I am about to give you the health of the Advotate-General and the Calcutta Bar—[great applause.] You have prevented me from finishing my sentence, but you have shewn me that it is quite unnecessary.

Air.—LEARNED MEN.

Mr. Pearson.—I do assure you, Gentlemen, that I have felt, and feel, most truly gratified by the manner in which you have received my name, nor do I feel less so at the compliment paid to the Bar; and in their name and my own I beg to offer you my grateful thanks. You, Sir, who have upon so many occasions to hear me at what you may sometimes perhaps consider an unjustifiable length will be the happiest of mankind that I shall be brief upon the present occasion. [We did not catch the concluding sentence of the Advocate-General's address.]

Sir John Grant.—I have to call your attention to the presence of another eminent guest who has favored us with his company on the present occasion, and I do so with the greater pleasure because it calls to mind the intimacy of that connexion which happily subsists between his country and ours. The Kingdom of France of late years has been actuated by principles the wisest and most likely to contribute to the happiness of mankind [applause]. Our friends upon the other side of the Channel, as we should say if we were in England, have been humorously stated to join with the appreciation of their own merits some appreciation of the merits of Englishmen, and to have said of England and their own country—"We are the two nations." I have so much of the same vanity, and so much esteem for that nation, that I join also in saying—"We are the two nations" [cheers]. But at present we are the two nations embarked together in the cause of liberty and civilization; and while we continue to direct our united efforts to these objects there is no man in Europe who must not duly estimate the value of our union. There is no philosopher, and as such and not as a politician I am now entitled to address you, that will not acknowledge that that union promises more of happiness to mankind than has ever been on any former occasion afforded by the junction of any nations. I beg to give you the health of General Allard [great cheering.]

General Allard said in his native tongue that he could not better reply to the eloquent and handsome manner in which the worthy president had proposed his health than by drinking to the union and prosperity of La Belle France and Gallant Loyal England [cheers.]

The merchants of Calcutta. Air—MONEY IN BOTH POCKETS.

Sir Charles Metcalfe after a few very brief comments proposed the health of the chairman, which was drank amidst loud acclamations.

Air.—ROTHIEMARCHUS RANT.

Sir John Grant.—I cannot find words to express how greatly I feel the honor of your kindness. I have never been in any situation which has given me more pleasure, or that has reflected more credit on me than the one which the choice of the society of this city has placed me in on this occasion. I think the occasion of our assembly, although as I said in my first address it is not unattended with some painful reflections, is one to be considered not merely as a private indulgence of feeling, but as a public declaration of approbation. If any effort that I could make on such an occasion has at all contributed to the due expression of your sentiments, it gives me very great satisfaction; and I am sure that where I have fallen short I shall meet with your indulgence [cheers.]

Air.—GOD SAVE THE KING.

The chairman, his guest, and a great portion of the company then retired, but the remainder kept up the feast of reason and the flow of soul till a late, or rather an early, hour on Saturday morning.—Hurkaru.

ST. ANDREW'S DAY.

Upwards of two hundred persons sat down to dinner at the Town Hall on the 1st December, to celebrate the anniversary of Scotland's Patron Saint. Mr. Macaulay presided as chairman, supported on his right by Sir Charles Metcalfe and Colonel Morrieson, and on his left by Sir Frederick Adam and Sir John Grant, and Mr. Leith acted as croupier. After the removal of the cloth the following toasts and speeches were given.

THE KING. Air—GOD SAVE THE KING.

THE QUEEN AND ROYAL FAMILY. Air—SHE IS A WINSOME WEE THING.

THE PIOUS MEMORY OF ST. ANDREW. Air—CALEDONIA.

MR. MACAULAY.—Gentlemen! The toast I have now to propose to you is one which I believe in all parts of the world Scotchmen are this night drinking with feelings of sociality and pleasure, and no where, I am sure, will it be drank with feelings of greater pleasure than here, although in this country, exiles as we are, with 15,000 miles of sea between us and the country of our birth, those feelings of pleasure may be mingled in some degree with feelings of regret. At this very moment, making allowances for the difference of our relative positions on the globe we inhabit; our countrymen at home are no doubt drinking with enthusiasm the toast I am now about to propose to you, "THE LAND OF CAKES." It is commonly said by those who seek for topics of reproach against the Scottish nation, that their patriotism has something in it too intolerant, something too exclusive. I am not sure that I can entirely vindicate them from this charge, but yet the acknowledgment sounds to me very like an eulogium; and if there be a nation where such feelings would be excusable, it certainly is the nation which we all glory in being connected with, and our connection with which we are this evening met to commemorate. I had not the honor, gentlemen, of being born in Scotland, neither was I educated there, and I have only visited it as a stranger and a traveller; but it is impossible for any one so to visit it without being struck with its beauties. I have never seen any country equally interesting, even to a person who contemplated it without the prejudices of a native. It is not easy I think to explain from what causes that peculiar interest arises, but I think it is this, that it is the only country in which you find objects close together that produce at once recollections of ancient and of modern times. There you find objects which remind you of events that took place in the sixteenth century, close to others of modern date. There you find all those things that have an extraordinary hold on the hearts of the uncultivated inhabitants, as well as all those that can be found in the most civilized countries on the earth; and I do not know any country which contains so much that moves the imagination, and at the same time fully satisfies and gratifies the reason. In that country has been found, from the middle ages, even down to our own time, the characteristics of a rude state of society, a barbaresque costume, a rude hospitality, and close to all these you have the most extraordinary miracles of industry and art. The common traveller as he wanders through that country follows the course of some meandering brook, which in one place he finds surrounded by scenes of the rudest and wildest nature, and going a little further he finds the water of the same brook the moving principle of a vast manufactory. As I am speaking to Scotchmen, if I were to select one scene which at once displays objects of a past and of a present age, I would select that beautiful capital, which consists of a mass such as is not to be seen in any other part of Europe. Every step you take fills you with recollections of the past, and you are conveyed in imagination to the sixteenth century—you have only to turn round and you see every thing that calls you back to the present times, and beyond it a fleet of steam vessels which our ancestors would have considered magical. This is the single charm. There is no country in Europe excepting Greece and Italy that so forcibly reminds you of times that are gone by, and there is no country in the world, not even America, that displays ruder scenes of primeval nature. The cause of this I believe is that prodigiously rapid increase which our country has made within the last century in wealth and knowledge. There is no country that has made so vast a stride in improvement in the last century as Scotland. We have abundant reasons on many accounts to drink prosperity to this country with pride and pleasure. I shall not dwell on the many titles it possesses to the gratitude of mankind, on what it has done for science or political liberty, nor will I enumerate to you the number of eminent and preeminent men it has produced, whose names must be familiar to your ears. I shall only say this that it appears to me that while we join in this festivity we are sympathizing with those who are taking it in other parts of the globe; and I am sure you will all heartily join with me in drinking, with all the honors, "THE LAND OF CAKES."

Air—AULD LANG SYNE.

Mr. MACAULAY.—The next toast I have to propose is that of the Governor-General of India [applause.] I shall beg to say but little on this subject. The feelings of private affection and respect with which I regard him are such that I do not wish, while he retains the situation he holds here, to give distinct expression to them. The time will come and too soon it will come, when no restraint will prevent me from saying all I feel. At present I content myself with proposing his health, with all the honors.

Air—WANDERING WILLIE.

The Glee of Glorious Apollo was here sung by some of the company.

Mr. MACAULAY.—I wish now to propose to you a health which I am sure you will all drink with pleasure, I mean the health of my venerable and gallant friend here the Governor of Madras. I will not in his presence distress him by saying all or any part of what I would gladly say in his absence; but of this I can confidently assure you, that, though no person present has seen a greater variety of human life, or served his country, both in the field and in the different offices of Government, in a greater variety of climates, there is no person here who retains a more truly British heart, or a warmer attachment to that country we have met to do honor to than Sir Frederick Adam.

Air.—A MARCH.

Sir FREDERICK ADAM.—I beg to return you my best and heartfelt thanks for the flattering manner in which you have drunk my health. My honorable friend on the right, if I had felt myself a stranger on an occasion like this, the celebration of a day which I have for many a year in succession celebrated at the head of a gallant band of my countrymen,—if I say I could have felt any restraint on such an occasion, the way in which my health has been drank would have made me feel quite at home. [Applause.]

Mr. MACAULAY.—We have just been performing the agreeable duty of drinking the health of a new friend. We have now the more melancholy yet pleasing duty to perform of taking a parting glass with an old one. You will expect that I am about to propose to you the health of the Governor of Agra. [loud applause.] I feel as I said on the night of Sir Charles Metcalfe's triumph here, and triumph I may well call it, I feel that it would be perfectly vain for any person lately acquainted with him to add any thing to the effect which must be produced on the mind by the enthusiasm that his very name calls forth from those who have known and valued him. I will therefore merely content myself with requesting you to drink to the health of Sir Charles Metcalfe in bumpers, with all the honors. [Tremendous applause.]

Air.—CHARLIE IS MY DARLING.

Glee.—MERRILY SOUNDS THE DINNER BELL.

Sir CHARLES METCALFE got up amidst loud cheering and said, Gentlemen, I beg you to accept my warmest thanks for the very flattering manner in which you have drank my health. This is not the first of many instances in which I have experienced your hospitality and kindness, but I am sorry it is the last on which I shall have the honor to be with you [cries of no! no!] Go where I may I shall bear a grateful remembrance of your cordiality; and this day will never return to me in any part of the world without bringing with it the pleasing recollection of the happiness I have enjoyed with the sons of St. Andrew in this Hall. In returning my thanks to your chairman for the manner in which he has proposed my health I cannot help congratulating you on having to preside over you one of the brightest ornaments of the House of Commons. You are rich in distinguished characters on this occasion. I see one who has carried the renown of our country into all realms, and obtained the respect of all foreign countries; I see another who is an ornament and an honor to the Bench; I see a third who has been selected from all the services of the three Presidencies to fill an honorable post under the Government. You have many more to be proud of, and among the rest your admirable President of last year. Considering how many eminent men Scotland has produced you will forgive me in saying that you have assumed a most inappropriate designation in calling it the land of cakes. [Laughter and applause.] If I could forget that I were an Englishman I should wish to be a Scotchman. [Applause.] And where is the difference? [applause.] Are they not all the same? [applause.] Scotchmen, Irishmen, or Englishmen, does not the same heart and the same spirit animate us all? [applause] Are we not united in brotherly love and affection, and so united are we not a match for the whole world? [great applause.] In releasing you from my tediousness, [cries of no, no] it occurs that this is the last time that I can have the honor of addressing you, and in returning you my most grateful thanks, I wish you from the bottom of my heart, health, prosperity and happiness. [Great applause.]

THE CROUPIER here rose and said, the toast which I have the honor to propose embraces for its object, the collective wisdom of India. It is not, however, alone on this account, that the Council of India is entitled to this tribute of respect. There are but few men that can judge of and properly estimate the public conduct or public acts of a government, and this is not the place, even if I had the ability, to attempt the task. All men can, however, estimate, and, I am sure, all present do appreciate, the social virtues, the talents and private worth, which distinguish the individual members of Council, and as fellow citizens and members of society they are well entitled to, and possess our highest respect. There is one of that honorable body, a fellow countryman, whom illness, some time since, unfortunately compelled to quit his place at the Council Board, but who would have been among us this evening had the winds proved more propitious to him on his returning voyage. However much we may regret his absence, and no one regrets it more sincerely than I myself, it is gratifying to know that he is returning to Calcutta, with restored health and renewed energies, to discharge his public duties which receive a reflected lustre from the charities and amenities of his private life. There is a distingui-hed member of the Council of India, besides our Right Honorable Chairman who has honored us with his presence this night, and he too is a countryman. Although personally a stranger to many of us, none of us are strangers to the high character which he has earned for himself on the other side of India. In that honorable gentleman meet the rare qualities, consumate military skill and those talents which eminently fit him for taking an important part in the deliberations of that body to whom is confided the government of this vast empire. To Colonel Morrison our congratulations are due on his assumption of this high office, and to him as a Scotchman I would offer in the name of our fellow countrymen present 'a highland welcome.' I have now the honor to propose the health of the Honorable Colonel Morrieson and the Council of India,—with all the honors.

Air.—TULLOCH GORUM.

Colonel MORRIESON returned thanks, but in an inaudible voice.

Mr. MACAULAY.—In mentioning the toast I am now about to propose, I almost dread I may incur some censure from the distinguished individual whose health I wish you to drink, for I am so well acquainted with the judicial austerity with which he regards the duties of his high office that I almost fear lest he should consider any praise towards the judges something like a contempt of Court; yet I hope and trust he will so far relax from that honorable austerity as not to deprive us of the pleasure of drinking to integrity and independance when we drink to Sir John Grant and the Judges of the Supreme Court. [applause.]

Air.—THE JUDGES ARE MET.

Sir JOHN GRANT.—I rise to return you once more the thanks which I believe I have in very much the same terms addressed to you annually since I have had the pleasure of being a member of your society. To your distinguished chairman, for the manner in which he has proposed my health, and for the connexions he has associated with it, I feel deeply indebted: I take his judgment to be one of which every man may be proud, if in his favor, and the manner in which you have received the toast, is a judgment from which there is no appeal. Attached as I am to the country that gave me birth, fond as I am of those annual associations which bring back to our recollection that country and the numerous virtues which adorn it, and the numerous ties that bind us to it, I feel gratified at seeing the attendance at these assemblies increasing yearly, till it has arrived at the number I now have the pleasure to see. I rejoice more particularly that you have now in your chair a person of such distinguished eminence, a person who though he states that he was not born nor educated in Scotland, we will yet not part with a Scotchman. His birth and his education he will give me leave to tell him are accidents,—his descent is that which constitutes him what he is. Gentlemen I will occupy no more of your time than merely to say that if in the situation in which I have been placed, I have been so fortunate as not to disgrace the country from which I came. [Applause.] I have attained all that I could wish, and attained, I am quite sure, that which is necessary to the public service in the situation which I have the honor to fill. (Applause.)

Mr. MACAULAY.—I have had the honor of proposing several toasts which have been received with well merited enthusiasm. I have now to propose one which deserves to be received with more enthusiasm than that of the best of Governors or Judges. It is one which expresses our feelings towards that sex every where the charm of life, and here more particularly our only solace and support. It is unnecessary I am sure in in any society of Scotchmen,—for one of the most distinguished foreign writers of our time has stated that on the whole Scotland is that country in Europe where women are most loved, and deserve it best—it is unnecessary, I say, to dilate on the merits of that distinguished lady who stands at the head of female society here, or of that female society which is the greatest charm of this presidency. I shall therefore content myself with requesting you to drink with all the honors,—It is unnecessary to say with all enthusiasm—"Lady William Bentinck and the ladies of the Presidency."

Air.—GREEN GROW THE RUSHES O

Glee.—TO ALL YOU LADIES.

THE CROUPIER in proposing the Chairman's health, said:—Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, the honor of proposing the next toast has devolved on me. In rising to perform this duty I would have felt some hesitation from a diffidence in my own powers to do justice to the subject of the toast, had I not been convinced, as I am, that the reception which a toast may meet depends more upon the intrinsic merits of the individual named than upon either the manner or address of the proposer. With these views I anticipate the warmest reception for this toast, as the private merits of our Honorable Chairman are known to many of you, his public merits to all. Placed by you in the situation, which I have now the honor to fill, it would ill become me to break in upon that unanimity of sentiment and feeling which ought to pervade every convivial meeting, and which I am happy to see does pervade the present. I shall, therefore, avoid all allusions to politics. If to the navigator of unknown seas, and to him who surveys and measures the architectural remains of ancient grandeur, honors are paid, much more are they due to him who has come among us to navigate the ocean of mind, to survey and examine the civil institutions, and to guide the intellectual and moral capabilities of an ancient people of the East, and—being prepared for the task with a mind disciplined by the study of universal jurisprudence, and other appliances to boot,—to adapt to their peculiar wants and capabilities such parts of the laws and institutions of the now more refined state of society in the West, as may secure to them a more perfect and equal administration of justice, and the enjoyment of a higher and more permanent degree of happiness. Such is our Honourable Chairman's high commission. Of his qualifications for the duties before him it is not for me to speak nor is it necessary; his past almost unprecedented career of honorable and deserved distinction, which is known to all, is the best guarantee of his future success. To particularize other incidents either in the public or private life of our Honorable Chairman although they might well form the subject of eulogistic remark, would be alien to my own feelings of delicacy, and I am sure, distasteful to the sensitive mind of that gentleman himself. This is, however, a topic to which as a Scotchman I feel proud to refer, and as such it would be culpable in me to overlook. If Scotland had the honor of taking the lead in a particular class of literature which is daily becoming more popular and useful; it is equally true that this literature owes much to the genius and talents, and to the powerful and eloquent pen of our Honorable Chairman for the high place which it still holds in public opinion. As our Chairman, our thanks are due to that gentleman; and apologising for having so long delayed your participation in the pleasure which, I am sure, all will receive in drinking to the toast, I have the honor to propose the health of our Honorable Chairman with three times three.

Air.—WHAR HAE YE BEEN A'DAY MY BOY, TAMMY.

Mr. MACAULAY.—It is needless for me I am sure to say that I return you my most hearty thanks for the manner in which my health has been proposed and drank. It has given me the greatest pleasure to attend a society so far from Europe where there is so much of British, so much of Scotch feeling, of all those feelings which form the best connection between ourselves and our native country. I have already told you that I am not a Scotchman by birth or by education, but I am by descent, and my affection is equally divided between the two parts of the Island; and this brings me to my next toast, which I shall give before I sit down. You will be surprized that one who calls himself as much of an Englisman as a Scotchman should give with so much heartiness as I do "the memory of Sir William Wallace and of Robert Bruce," and if those distinguished men had gained their victories in any vulgar war, whether on behalf of England or of Scotland, it would have been by no means justifiable in me to propose a health that could in any way have recalled irritating recollections; but it is as much the English as the Scotch part of the company that will assent to the justice of that toast. In England we can have no other feeling than that of respect for men who stood up in bad times to maintain the independence of their country against unjust aggression. No Englishman can look on them,—a commoner who first broke the force of a haughty Aristocracy and by his own merits placed himself in the dignified station of Regent of his country, and a King who placed himself at the head of his people and fought with them on foot in defence of their liberties,—I conceive that these two eminent men whose health I intend to propose were benefactors not less to the southern than to the northern part of the Island. No greater calamity could have befallen England than if, from the want of such men, she had been able to place on Scotland the yoke she abhorred, and to have her even down to this time perhaps a conquered nation. I am not aware that I touch upon political feelings, from which I am desirous to abstain, when I say that it would have been a most happy thing for the British Empire if Ireland had had her Wallace and her Bruce, if it had not in those dark ages come by conquest under the arbitrary yoke of England but had been like Scotland gradually amalgamated with England by pacific measures. On the other hand it would be the greatest calamity if at that time we had been cursed with another Ireland, if from the want of such men we had acquired a country to be governed through a succession of ages by military force. It is not as an Englishman—not as a Scotchman—but with an undivided British heart that I propose to you the healths of Sir William Wallace and Robert Bruce.

Air.—SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLED.

Song.—SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLED.

Lord Aukland and the British Navy.

Air.—RULE BRITANNIA.

Lord Hill and the British Army.

Air.—BRITISH GRENADIERS.

The Commander-in-Chief and the Indian Army.

Air.—GO WHERE GLORY WAITS THEE.

Mr. MACAULAY.—I have said that it is desirable to abstain from political topics,—it is still more desirable to abstain from theological ones. I am desired however to propose the health of Dr. Bryce and the Scotch Kirk. Whatever may be our opinion on political subjects or on the different forms of Church Government, no one will deny that the Scotch Kirk has invariably been found in times of peril on the side of civil and religious liberty, and to this day it possesses a strong hold on the affections of that great and united people. Without entering into the question of its constitution and formulae, these are questions that no person acquainted with the history of the country will dispute. I propose to you the health of Dr. Bryce and the Scotch Kirk.

Air.—MY AIN KIND DEARIE.

Dr. BRYCE.—In doing me the honor you have done me in drinking my health in conjunction with the Church to which I have the honor to belong, you have imposed on me a task pleasing indeed, but not so easy in the execution as gratifying in itself. I could have wished to keep silent altogether had I not known that it would be expected of me to return thanks. For myself I thank you most cordially. It is twenty years this day since I first entered the service of the Company as a Chaplain on their Establishment, and if in that time I have acquired your approbation, rich is my reward,—a stronger stimulus cannot possibly be afforded. I feel easy when I escape from myself and speak on a subject infinitely more worthy of your notice, the Church of which I am a humble member. Her character and utility are too well known to require any encomiums from any quarter, and much less would it be becoming from one of her own number. It has been stated what that Church was and what it did in days of peril and danger to civil and religious liberty. We have no such perilous days at present, though danger may be apprehended by some from doctrines that are now spreading in the world; but I have no fear for her stability, no regret at any opposition, for it will call forth virtues that have for many years been lying too dormant, energies which many believe her not to possess. Dr. Bryce then passed a flattering eulogium on the Church of England and some of its brightest ornaments, and concluded by proposing the health of Dr. Wilson, the Bishop of Calcutta, and the Church of England.

Mr. MACAULAY.—The toast which I am now about to propose is extremely well chosen for such an occasion. It is "the memory of Robert Burns." It is extremely well chosen from the whole of the literature of Scotland, rich as it is in great names from the earliest times. We can boast of a Buchanan, a Smith, a Sir Walter Scott, and many other names of literary celebrity; yet I confess if I looked out for a representative of the national genius, for a mind which abounded with the flavor of the soil, of all the writers Scotland ever produced I should certainly fix upon Burns. As for those other eminent men they were acquainted with the literature of many ages, to them classical learning was familiar; but Burns had nothing but the literature of the plain Scotch peasant. He wrote plain Scotch. Whenever he attempted to write English in my opinion, he always fell below himself, and I do not feel any great admiration for any of his works excepting those that he wrote in his own native dialect. His seems to have been a mind filled with images of the cottages and fields in which he passed his youth. His language is the plain language of Scotland, and with nothing but these materials and his own original genius, he came forth in the most benighted period of English poetry, and produced a succession of works which if they do not equal those of Shakespeare and Milton, are imbued with the same spark and spirit that are to be found in poets of the first class. I think therefore that your stewards have done most wisely in selecting his memory as an object of our respect, because I conceive it would be impossible to find in the literature of any country any man so much the image of the mind of his country as him. I have therefore much pleasure in proposing the health of Robert Burns.

Some of the company here began to cheer, when the chairman observed that it was usual to drink this toast in solemn silence.

Dr. GRANT. Not in silence. I say it is a toast of triumph, and we'll drink it in cheers.

The company immediately adopted the advice of Dr. Grant, and the toast was drank amidst enthusiastic cheering and applause.

Air.—THE FLOWERS OF THE FOREST.

Dr. MELLISH proposed the health of the old chairman of the St. Andrew's dinners, Mr. Cutlar Fergusson, which was drank amidst applause.

Mr. MACAULAY.—The toast which stands next on the list is the Civil Service of India, and there can be no toast that I would propose with greater satisfaction. I have had but a short opportunity of observing the conduct and characters of the public functionaries in this country, but I have had the opportunity of comparing the functionaries here with similar ones at home, of comparing those who here exercise the higher powers of Government with those who exercise similar powers at home, and judging impartially, and making every allowance for the different state of things, and the early ages at which they leave their native country, I have no hesitation in saying that the Civil and Military Service in this country are, as far as I am able to judge, in no way inferior to those in Europe. The politics of India are necessarily different from the politics of Europe,—the revenue system here is not the same as it is at home —the diplomacy required with Oudh and Joudpore is not the same as that required with Paris or Madrid,—the details of business is different,—the mode in which the two countries are governed is different,—the Government of the one is carried on by means of the tongue, of the other by the pen,—of one by open discussion in Parliament —of the other by minutes and dispatches;—but when you have made allowances for these differences, you will be inclined to say, as I without hesitation do, that I have found in India abilities for the purposes of Government diplomacy equal to any I have ever seen employed, having seen the most eminent that are employed in the Government of England. I am convinced we shall drink this toast with the greater satisfaction when we consider how large a proportion Scotland has furnished to the Military and Civil Services of India. Munro and Elphinstone were both Scotchmen. Munro died in this country, and I leave his eulogium to those who knew him. Elphinstone I have seen. I have seen him in England in a society widely different to that to which he had been accustomed. I have seen him supporting the dignity of his own character in the crowds of London, who seemed at once to be impressed with the idea that they were approaching a great man. It is difficult to describe what I mean, but there are some here who will no doubt understand me when I say that I never saw any man who carried about him more of the character of greatness than he did. It was impossible when you saw him not to think that you spoke to a very great man. He was one of the very few who enjoyed in England a fame commensurate with his merits, for it is a fact that cannot be denied that the public in England pay little attention to the proceedings of this country or to the merits of its public servants. This is a circumstance that I have often when speaking to him regretted, imperfectly as I was then acquainted with the merits of those services; and it is a circumstance which, since I have become better acquainted with them, I regret still more. It is among the thoughts that are the most agreeable to me that I may be able to awaken a more just appreciation of the merits of those services,—to turn the attention of those who only want better information to act differently to the preeminent services which have been here rendered to the British Empire and to the honor of the British name, by the servants of the Company. Gentlemen, I propose with the greatest pleasure, the Civil Service of India.

Air.—TODLIN HAME.

Mr. PLOWDEN returned thanks on behalf of the Civil Service.

Mr. MACAULAY.—The next toast that I find in the list, is "the Calcutta Bar." [Applause.] My own forensic experience, gentlemen, has been extremely small, for my only recollection of an achievement in that way is, that I once convicted a boy before the Quarter Sessions of stealing a parcel of cocks and hens; but, gentlemen, I have sufficient experience to know well how many men of distinguished merits have resorted to the Calcutta Bar, and I earnestly hope that they will have the good fortune to get more briefs than I did.

Air—GROVES OF BLARNEY.

Mr. PRINSEP.—I return you my most hearty thanks on behalf of myself and my brethren, for the warm manner in which you have drank our healths, though I am at a loss to account for the warmth with which the toast has been received. The obligations between the Bar and the public seem to be all on one side. How often have the public been obliged to endure our pertinacity, which has sometimes degenerated into tediousness, and what can be found on the other side, except that warm attachment to the liberty of speech which I am happy to say has distinguished the members of my profession since the first planting of an English Bar on the plains of Bengal. I konw well enough the brethren of my profession can always maintain the same character. There was a time when the Bar was the nucleus of liberty in India. Happily there is now no longer any occasion for leaders, and we are content to be followers in the glorious cause. Mr. Prinsep concluded by proposing with all his heart, "Success to the Law Commission."

Mr. MACAULAY.—I have not proposed any toast with greater pleasure than that which I find next on the list, Old England and our English friends who have favored us with their company. It is unnecessary for me to tell you how close, how prefect is the union between the two countries, so close indeed that we form one body, and it is only certain ancient recollections and feelings of local attachment that separate us from each other. On every occasion in which it is necessary that the British nation should act as a body they go together as one man. Never for a century past has there been any disunion, and the feelings that exist are a sufficient security that the union will remain inviolate. I am sure every Scotchman here will join me in this toast with as much pleasure as I feel in proposing it,—Old England and our English friends.

Air.—ROAST BEEF OF OLD ENGLAND.

Glee.—THE BELLS OF ST. MICHAEL'S TOWER.

Sir CHARLES METCALFE.—It is incumbent on us your English guests to return our best thanks for the honor you have done us. Many here would do it better than I can, but we cannot leave it undone. I consider one of the strongest proofs of the intimacy of the union between Scotland and England to be that you have chosen an Englishman for your chairman; [Great laughter] for at least Mr. Macaulay has denied that he is thoroughly a Scotchman. England claims him by birth and education, and Scotland by parentage. They say a man is not a horse because he happens to be born in a stable, [laughter] therefore I fear England must give way to Scotland. At all events I think you are quite right to claim as your own one of whom either country would be proud, and I am sure he is in a proud position for whom two such countries would contend. I return you our best thanks, but as this would be much better done by Mr. Turton than by me I beg to leave the rest to him. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TURTON.—Thus called upon I certainly will not be wanting so far as to rise at least and offer my humble thanks, but I should like to know what I am to do where Sir Charles Metcalfe leaves me the rest after he has done. I know of nothing that I can add to it, unless I add some thing about the cocks and hens. I know of no other topic untouched. I beg to say as an Englishman that I feel most deeply the compliment that has been paid us. One observation is very commonly made of Scotchmen, that they stick very much together; but when they do they take some cement for the purpose, and that cement is generally of English or Irish composition. They are the only body in Calcutta that show any thing like an hospitable disposition. I believe I am the oldest legal guest that the sons of St. Andrew have in this room. I have attended every one of their dinners since I have been in Calcutta when I was not prevented by sickness, and they are the only annual public dinners that Calcutta can boast of. Returning thanks for my countrymen I beg they will look to themselves,—anticipating the hospitality of the sons of St. Patrick, I beg of them to remember St. Patrick's day; and if they only do one half that the sons of St. Andrew do we shall have something to thank them for. There has not been a St. Patrick's dinner in Calcutta since the year 1822, and the sons of St. George in consequence of his natal day occurring here in such hot weather never celebrate it. My friend Mr. O'Hanlon I see has left the room. I did promise that if the sons of St. Patrick would get up a St. Patrick's dinner, I would do my best for St. George. I thank you for listening to so much nonsense with such good humour, but it is the fault of Sir Charles Metcalfe, who delights to get me up merely as a foil to himself.—I am happy to be so. [Applause.]

Mr. MACAULAY.—After the very severe animadversions that have been passed on our Irish friends for not entertaining us on St. Patrick's day, it is a question whether the toast I have next to propose will be received with much enthusiasm. There are more serious grounds that make me feel something like a reluctance to mention the name of Ireland in scenes of sociality like this; for I cannot hear it mentioned without feelings of peculiar pain, which I have brought with me from other scenes of political contention. There are some circumstances in the state of that unhappy country which make it peculiarly painful and unpleasant for any man accustomed to the transaction of affairs in England to speak of it. I do look on it with an affection and interest not inferior to Scotland or England, and only wish that the union which I find between the three nations here could be carried across the water. I am convinced that I need wish nothing more for the happiness of the Empire than that the union between Great Britain and Ireland were as cordial as between the English and Irish population of Calcutta. Whatever may be the feelings in another part of the world the only feeling here I am convinced will be that of cordiality and good will when I propose to you "the Emerald Isle and our Irish friends."

Air.—ST. PATRICK'S DAY IN THE MORNING.

Mr W. H. MACNAGHTEN in returning thanks for his Irish brethren replied to the accusation of want of hospitality by stating that his countrymen were not so fortunate as their neighbours in getting so many good and lucrative appointments, which he supposed to be the reason why so little attention had of late been paid to the memory of St. Patrick. He hoped however that something might be done, with Mr. Turton's assistance on next St. Patrick's day.

Mr. MACAULAY.—I wish the duty of proposing the next toast, "the mercantile community of Calcutta" had devolved on some person who had lived longer in this city than I have, as he would have found materials for a much better speech than I can give. My sojourn among you has been short, but not so short but I have found men worthy of confidence and esteem, and I am convinced that a longer residence would have enabled me to speak with greater authority. I do believe from what I have learned that the mercantile community of Calcutta are entitled to the highest respect, and that they are most important agents in the civilization of India, in the diffusion of knowledge and in developing the resources of the country. These must be the effects of trade when directed by liberal and enlightened minds, and even from my short experience I know that there are such minds. I wish some person better able than myself had given this toast, but I give it with the confidence that you will join me with great pleasure in drinking to the mercantile community of Calcutta.

Air—MONEY IN BOTH POCKETS.

Mr. COCKERELL returned thanks for the Merchants of Calcutta.

Mr. MACAULAY.—The next toast, and indeed the last one in the list, I am convinced you will drink without the smallest hesitation, for it means ourselves and those we like best—"Honest men and bonnie lasses," and no other recommendation is requisite than the mere words. It is an old Scotch toast, and I think there could not be a better.

Air—OF A'THE AIRTS.

The Chairman and a large proportion of the company then retired, but many others kept it up till an early hour next morning.—Hurkaru.

SUPREME COURT.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 5.

LA MARTINIERE.

Mr. Advocate-General. In the case of La Martiniere, my Lord, I have to move the Court for an extension of time till the first of July next for finishing it, and I make this motion under very peculiar circumstances. I wish it to be understood that I am not moving on behalf of Mr. Parker, who has contracted to build it, so much as on the suggestion of Major Hutchinson, of the Engineers, who has the overlooking and managing in a great degree of the concern. By the decretal order of this Court it was directed that the building should be finished within two years from a particular time: that time was the 1st of January 1833, when the first advance money was to have been made. Subsequently, however, an alteration took place in the original plan, the consequence of which was that instead of receiving the first advance of money then, Mr. Parker did not get it till the 6th of the May following. He thus lost four of the best months in the year for preparing the materials, and your Lordship knows that there is not much more than six weeks between the 6th of May and the setting in of the rains. All the brickwork however, except a very slight portion, is finished, but in consequence of the heavy rains which your lordship is aware have fallen this year the walls are so saturated with wet that though Mr. Parker could finish the building by the time fixed, yet it appears to him and Major Hutchinson that it could not be done (that is, that the plaistering could not be completed) without its acquiring a discoloration. Under these circumstances I make this application, more by the instruction of Major Hutchinson than of Mr. Parker, who can complete his contract, but not in such a manner as to be satisfactory to himself or his employers. Messrs. Cockerell and Co. who are Mr. Parker's securities for the due performance of his contract, are willing to extend their security to the time required.

Affidavits to the effect of the Advocate-General's statement having been put in, together with a letter from Messrs. Cockerell and Co. expressing their willingness to extend the term of their security, the application for extension of time was granted.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

MORELL v. COCKERELL.

This was an action brought for the recovery of Rs. 1,125, a sum alleged to have been improperly charged as commission on the sale of a certain indigo factory in the neighbourhood of Berhampore.

The facts of the case, according to the statement of the Counsel for the prosecution are briefly these. In the month of July 1830 the Messrs. Morell advertised the factory for sale, and continued the advertisements, at their own expense, from time to time, till the month of October following, when having occasion to come to Calcutta and thinking that applications might be made to them in their absence they directed the reference to be made to Messrs. Cockerell and Co. their agents. No purchasers having presented themselves, the advertisements, which had been regularly paid for by the plaintiffs, were discontinued on the 3d of November following, and the plaintiffs continued to conduct their factory as usual. In the month of February or the beginning of March following Mr. Deverill applied to one of the Mr. Morells to purchase the factory, and on the 10th of March the factory was sold to Messrs. Deverill and Hurry. For the sale of this factory Messrs. Cockerell and Co. charged full commission, at the rate of two and half per cent. and having funds in their hands belonging to the plaintiffs, placed the amount against them in their account current. For the recovery of this sum the action was brought. Several witnesses were examined to establish the facts alleged and the customs of merchants in Calcutta respecting the charge of commission in such cases. All the witnesses examined on the subject of commission were decidedly of opinion that commission could not be charged by agents unless they actually effected the sale.

The Court adjourned at five o'clock, and the case was postponed to the following day.

MORELL v. COCKERELL.

Mr. Turton having closed the case for the plaintiff the Advocate-General moved for a nonsuit on a point of law, which was however overruled by the court. He then addressed the court for the defence, and examined witnesses to prove the custom of merchants in Calcutta. Mr. Turton addressed the court at great length in reply, after which Sir John Grant delivered judgment, the substance of which is as follows. The question in this case resolves itself merely into two points. As I understood it there is an account furnished by the defendants in which they admit a number of sums received by them, and state a number of payments made. In this account there are certain items for commission on several transactions, and among the rest on the sale of an Indigo Factory. There is also a small sum of eight rupees which is objected to, but not insisted on, by the plaintiff, as having been twice charged. The plaintiff objects to the deduction of this commission on the sale of the Indigo Factory. Now, with regard to the commission, which appears to be the main question, and indeed the only question of importance in the case, I take it to be a part of the custom of merchants that a factor employed to sell is entitled to charge a commission on the sale, the rate to depend on the custom of the place where the transaction is conducted, or on that particular business to which it relates. There may be one rate of commission in one place and another in in another place, or there may be one rate on one particular description of business, and another on business of another kind. Now to arrive, in the first place, at the rate of commission to which the party, if he had sold, would have been entitled we must go to the customs of Calcutta on that particular matter subject to question. I take it that it may be considered as the custom here, by the evidence, that two and a half per cent. is the rate charged by the custom of Calcutta upon the sale of Indigo Factories; but then there arises several considerations in this transaction taking it out of the general rule. This factory it has been said was not sold by the defendant, and that consequently he is not entitled to charge any commission. It has been stated that commission for the sale of any article is a remuneration for the trouble, labour and responsibility incurred in disposing of it; to a certain extent this is true; but it is not properly a remuneration, for the trouble and responsibility of selling a particular article, but a general charge which is supposed to be upon the whole a sufficient remuneration for his trouble and expense in all the sales he makes one with another; and therefore in determining the rate of commission on any transaction it would be wrong to look at the particular case; we must look to the custom of trade. Now, it cannot be stated to be the custom generally of merchants that, where a factor has power given, and does not effect a sale, he is entitled to charge commission. I take it that that is not the general custom, but that when he effects it he takes it, and takes his chance where he does not, for which he must look for remuneration to the general profits of his trade. If that be a correct view of the general custom of merchants, the charge in the case depends on establishing a particular custom, and it was with that view that I particularly attended to the evidence. His Lordship then recapitulated the evidence from the plaintiff's case, from which he arrived at the conclusion, that with the exception of Mr. Palmer, none of the witnesses had proved any thing like a general custom, for they all spoke merely to the practice of their own individual firms, and his evidence certainly did not prove that it was the custom here to charge commission where a sale was not effected, but rather the contrary. Without doubt it was for the defendant to prove that that was the custom under which he had made the claim. Sir John Grant then went over the evidence for the defence, and observed that the witness who spoke most strongly to the general custom qualified his testimony by saying that there had been perpetual differences and disputes on the subject of commission which it had been repeatedly found necessary to settle by arbitration. That appeared to be anything rather than evidence of general usage, and on that ground he was of opinion that the defendant had not made it out to be the general usage to charge commission where a sale was not effected by the party. He might go into other points of the case, but he did not think it necessary, because he thought it incumbent on the defendant to prove that it was the custom of the place to charge commission where he had not effected a sale. He thought he had failed in doing so, and he therefore thought that the commission ought to be deducted from the account.

Verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the commission charged on the sale of the factory, with interest and costs.

It was further directed, with the consent of all parties, that the small sum overcharged to the plaintiff, with interest, should be deducted on the one side, as well as a sum of fifty rupees which had been put down by mistake in the other.

INSOLVENT COURT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1834.

---

IN THE MATTER OF CHARLES MURRAY, JUNIOR.

This Insolvent, after having sworn to the truth of his schedule, was discharged without opposition.

IN THE MATTER OF ROBERT ADAIR MACNAGHTEN.

Mr. Smith the Attorney applied to be relieved from his Assigneeship in this estate. He stated that he had been appointed Assignee at a time when the Court saw no objection to the appointment of Attorneys, almost immediately after which Captain Macnaghten had gone to Europe on furlough; consequently little or nothing had been done, and the case might now be considered almost a new one. An order had been made for the deduction of one third of the Insolvent's pay and allowances for the benefit of his creditors, but, in consequence of his departure for Europe, he had never received more than fifty pounds sterling from him. As Attornies were now prohibited from acting as Assignees, and as he was desirous of being relieved from a trouble that afforded him no remuneration, he moved that another Assignee might be appointed, and that he might be directed to pay over to him the sum of money now in his hands.

The Court ordered that notice should be published, and served on the detaining creditor, that another Assignee would be appointed, unless cause should be shewn to the contrary. The detaining creditor, Miss Emma Roberts, not being in India, the Court thought that service on her Attorney would be sufficient.

QUESTION OF RELEASE FROM LIABILITY.

In granting an order, we believe in the matter of Cruttedden and Co., for the Examiner to examine and report whether there were sufficient assets to entitle the Insolvents to their final release from all liability according to the 63d section of the Act, Sir John Grant suggested that the enquiry whether the estate were in such a condition that no further proceedings were likely to be had in it should be included, as it would save the necessity of a second reference, and at the same time took the opportunity of intimating that he had not altered his former opinion on this question, though an opportunity might now be afforded for re-arguing and re-considering the matter. Sir John Grant also took the opportunity of mentioning that in the cases of the great agency houses their affairs were hung up in a manner that might give rise to an imputation that the Court was taking upon itself the perpetual management of them; and that in his opinion the Court ought to turn its attention to getting them finally disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. Turton stated that such had been the opinion of the present Chief Justice in the early stage of the proceedings in the matter of Palmer and Co., but that his opinion had subsequently undergone a change, in consequence of the over-loaded state of the market, and he had thought it advisable to wait some time, and not to bring the whole of the property to sale at once, though it had never been contemplated to delay the sales longer than would be to the advantage of the estate.

Sir John Grant said that he had mentioned the subject merely that parties might be made aware of the impression that he had.

IN THE MATTER OF ALEXANDER AND CO.

Our readers will remember that an order was obtained a few weeks ago to restrain the sale of certain factories belonging to this estate, and to bring up Mr. Alexander and others for examination relative to certain allegations then made, for the particulars of which we refer them to our former report on the subject. The case, commenced this day by the reading of an immense heap of documents which it would be impossible to give a satisfactory account of, and which took the Clerk nearly three hours to get through. The following witnesses were then examined.

Nathaniel Alexander sworn. I was a partner in the late firm of Alexander and Co., and as a member of that firm, I am acquainted with the Moisurah indigo concern. The concern is divided into three divisions, namely, Moisurah, Gungadurpore and Neeschunderpore; and Neeschunderpore is again divided into two parts, namely, Neeschunderpore and Autpara. I had an interest in them all, and the entire property belonged to our house. The three different divisions were under three different managements. Neeschunderpore and Autpara were under the same management, and Mr. Saupin was the manager of them. When Mr. Saupin became a leaseholder in this concern he brought money with him into the house. He became a leaseholder in October 1830. At the time of the failure he was on the books as a debtor, and is so entered on the Schedule, but when the account of the sale of his indigo, which had been sent home, arrived he was a creditor to the amount of ~~Rs~~ 2,800. A general application was made by the Bank of Bengal to the Insolvent Court to sell all the indigo concerns. I am the Secretary to the Assignees, and as such act entirely under their direction. The Assignees opposed the sale of the greater number of these concerns. Some of them, for which they considered an adequate price had been offered, they agreed to sell, and they opposed the sale of others on the ground that the prices offered for them were inadequate. There was a general communication at the period that Mr. Udny intimated the intention of the Bank of Bengal to go into Court. There was one communication, in writing, relative to the whole of the Moisurah concern. I never saw Mr. Greig till two months ago. I know Mr. Donaldson by sight. I know nothing about his connection with Mr. Greig. I have heard that Mr. Donaldson is gone to England, but know nothing about it of my own knowledge. I saw him once, about a year ago I think, at the office of the Assignees. I know Mr. William Storm. [Letters A B and C were put into the witness's hand.] These letters were written by me in my character of Secretary to the Assignees on the business of the estate. I remember Neeschunderpore and Autpara being sold. The other two divisions of the Moisurah concern are not sold. The manner of the sale was this—Mr. Saupin came down to Calcutta to impress on the Assignees the necessity of their giving a large advance for the renewal of the izarra, or lease of the cultivation, of the Neeschunderpore factory, which he had previously written about. The 25th of August last must have been the day that he came down. He was in the management of Neeschunderpore and Autpara up to that time. He was so at that time on account of the lessees of the concern, who were Messrs. Alexander and Co., Mr. Terrasean, Mr. Albert and Mr. Saupin. Messrs. Alexander and Co. were the proprietors, and had taken those gentlemen as joint-proprietors in order to manage the concerns. They were joint lessees with ourselves, the proprietorship being in Messrs. Alexander and Co. Mr. Hurry was ill and unable to attend office at the time that Mr. Saupin came down, and the transaction of the sale took place between Messrs. Burkinyoung and Saupin, in the absence of Mr. Hurry. The manner in which the sale took place was this—Mr. Saupin had offered ~~Rs~~ 15,000 for the Neeschunderpore division in September 1833, which the Assignees accepted. [A, a letter to Mr. Storm, stating that Mr. Saupin was empowered to sell the whole of the Neeschunderpore division, put into his hand.] I wrote that by the direction of Mr. Burkinyoung. [B, a letter to the same person, stating that it was Mr. Saupin that had sold the whole division, and that he had done so under the express authority of the Assignees, put into his hand.] I wrote that letter also. There were two transactions on the 25th of August. The first was in consequence of Mr. Burkinyoung and me assuring Mr. Saupin that we were satisfied that the Court would never allow the Assignees to make so large an advance for so small a concern, when he renewed his offer of ~~Rs~~ 15,000, which he had made the year before. Previous to Mr. Saupin's leaving the office he asked Mr. Burkinyoung whether it would make any difference to the Assignees if two parties purchased the division instead of one, that is if he made a division of the division, the two parties giving the ~~Rs~~ 15,000 together, when Mr. Burkinyoung replied that the object of the Assignees was to sell, and that it was of no moment if the price were given whether there were one or two purchasers. Mr. Saupin then said that the purchasers were Mr. Rogers and Mr. Bell, and I considered them so. I considered the sale then as made. Part of B was written by the direction of the Assignees, and part was not. The substance of it was known to the Assignees, because I never wrote about the sale of any of the property without their knowledge. Part of it was an expression of a difference of opinion between me and Mr. Storm. When Mr. Saupin declared that two parties were to purchase, and Mr. Burkinyoung gave him authority to sell it them, I considered it an authority to him to treat for the sale. When Mr. Saupin said that they would divide the ~~Rs~~ 15,000 between them and Mr. Burkinyoung said "very well," I considered it a sale. I considered it an authority from the Assignees to Mr. Saupin to sell the property to those two persons. The whole of C was not written by the direction of the Assignees. The part that has reference to our personal difference of opinion was not; the other was. By direction of Mr. Burkinyoung, not of Mr. Hurry, who was ill, I made the communication referred to in that letter [i. e. "Had not Mr. Saupin received the authority of the Assignees to make the sale, I should not have referred you to him, hoping that you might be in time to bid for the Autpara factory"] on the 25th of August, after Mr. Saupin had received the authority to sell it if he could get Rs 15,000 for it. I considered that if Mr. Saupin had seen Mr. Bell and settled it, it was a compact, but when I found another ready to give Rs 500 more I made reference to Mr. Saupin, hoping that he had not closed with the offer, wishing to get as much as I could for the estate. Mr. Saupin was not the purchaser, but he was authorized to sell if he got that price. That passage [i. e. "The Assignees desire me to state that they were ignorant that either you or Mr. Rogers were in the market for the concern."] was written by the direction of Mr. Barkinyoung. That was at the time that Mr. Barkinyoung authorized Mr. Saupin to get the rupees 15,000. Mr. Storm's application was made on the evening of the same day,—the day on which Mr. Saupin was authorized to sell. That passage had not reference to that day. In the letter to which this is an answer Mr. Storm said that the Assignees must know that he and Mr. Rogers wanted last year to buy one of these factories, and it is of this that they express their ignorance. I was perfectly ignorant that Messrs. Storm and Rogers were still desirous of purchasing these concerns, because many persons had applied for factories the year before, and afterwards dropped their intentions. Messrs. Storm and Rogers were, I believe, anxious to purchase the year before, but we lost sight of them, and heard no more of them till this transaction. I am speaking of these factories. The Bank of Bengal communicated some of the offers of purchasers, and I have reason to suppose some of them they did not. I have no recollection of any communication about Mr. Storm's desire to purchase. The Assignees had constantly advertised, from time to time, for two years, up to the time of the commencement of the season, the beginning of October 1833. Some of the offers were closed with, and others not, because they were too low. Then the Bank of Bengal gave notice that they would apply to the Court for a general sale, and after that all communication about sales ceased on their side. I can't tell why the Moisurah concern was not sold when these offers were made last year. I believe the reason was because it was expected that the Court would have made an order for the general sale, and we left it in the hands of the Court. The offer was made I believe when the Bank said they would apply to the Court for an order for a general sale. I think it was on the 1st of January that the Bank moved the Court, and I believe it was about that time that the offer was made. It appears there had been offers before which we never heard of. In January last Rs 70,000 was offered for the Moisurah concern,—for the whole of the three divisions. The offer was made just at the time that the Bank went into Court to get the general order, and the Assignees thought that it was useless for them to negociate with parties when the Court would have the whole question before them. The Neeschunderpore division was reckoned at Rs 15,000 by the Assignees. I don't know how much it was reckoned at in that offer of Rs 70,000. I have lately heard that the Bank refused Rs 15,000. The Assignees wrote to the Bank telling them that they were willing to receive the Rs 15,000, but never received any answer. The Bank were mortgagees, and their consent was necessary. The Assignees gave their consent, and left it to the Bank to accept or reject the offer. Afterwards the property was redeemed, and came again into the hands of the Assignees. What I mean is that Mr. Saupin applied to the Assignees for an advance of Rs 20,000 to be paid as a fine to the Zemindar in the beginning of January last. A considerable portion of that was required by way of salammee, and the rest was for the payment of rent in advance. The money applied for was to be lent to the Zemindar and to be deducted from the future rents. I think the lands and the lease itself is the security. I don't know whether interest was to be calculated in this instance. It is registered in Court to make it a valid document. When application was first made for this advance Mr. Saupin received an answer, in writing. The assignees were at that time just going before the Court brought there by the Bank of Bengal, and therefore did not take the matter into consideration at all whether they would make the advance or not, The general order of the Court was made, I believe, in March. After that order the question of redemption immediately arose, which was over in the end of July. I then brought the question of the advance to Mr. Barkinyoung's notice. Mr. Barkinyoung and I had several conversations on the subject, in which I pressed the necessity of something being done with reference to the advance to prevent the factory from going to ruin. The conclusion which I think Mr. Barkinyoung came to was that it was better to sell the factory at once than to go to the Court to ask for liberty to make this large advance, which I had no idea the Court would give. There was not more than twenty or twenty-two days from the time that I brought it forward to the time of the sale by Mr. Saupin. Twenty days is enough time for a man to write a letter if he has nothing else to think of. There was a general order for the Assignees to sell the whole of the factories whenever fair prices could be got. The order for general sale was superseded by giving the power to the Assignees to redeem the whole by fixed valuation, but I conceive the order to sell for fair and reasonable prices still in force. I believe it was generally known to all who wanted to purchase the factories and property generally of the estate. It was my opinion, and Mr. Barkinyoung agreed with me, that the necessity for renewing the izarra was a sufficient reason to wish to dispose of the concern, because we believed the Court never would have allowed the Assignees to make the advance. From the time when Mr. Saupin communicated the necessity of renewing the izarra in January last up to the 25th of August the assignees made no effort or attempt to sell the concern. They could not so long as the question before the Court remained unsettled. When the order was known there was no advertisement, nor did they make any private offer or enquiry. The usual season for these kind of transactions is in the cold weather, when planters are generally in Calcutta, and there are, of course, more bidders in the market. If this izarra is made it would be taken into consideration in the price of the factory in selling it. It is over and above the price to be paid for the factory. Thus if this had been given, the purchaser would have had to pay Rs. 15,000 and Rs. 10,000, and I understand that the purchaser Mr. Rogers did take it into consideration. I forget whether the Assignees gave notice of the intention to sell to the other lessees, but when the arrangement of the 25th of August was entered into I was told to write to them and ask their consent. I now know that Mr. Rogers bought the factory for Mr. Saupin, as I have heard so from Mr. Rogers within the last few days. I don't know when this advance was made. Mr. Saupin told me that he had advanced Rs. 9,000, and that he had been obliged to increase his rent in consequence of opposition from another party. He mentioned in that letter of January that there was a party who would get the izarra if he could not, and thus destroy the value of the factory. The impression on my mind is that Mr. Greig was the party mentioned by him. It would have ruined Neeschunderpore. I have no recollection that Mr. Greig made any application to purchase the concern, nor can I find any record of it. I have a faint recollection of Mr. Donaldson coming into the office and of my telling him that the Bank of Bengal were the mortgagees and of referring him to them if he wished to make any offers. I don't recollect that Mr. Saupin told me that the Bank of Bengal had refused his offer of Rs. 15,000 because they had been offered more. The deeds of sale to Mr. Rogers and Mr. Bell have not yet been signed, but half the money has been paid. Mr. Rogers paid Rs 5,000 and Mr. Bell paid Rs 2,500. I have since understood, I think from Mr. Barkinyoung, that Mr. Rogers paid his part for Mr. Saupin. Mr. Storm offered Rs 500 more for Autpara. We sold the two factories for Rs 15,000, and divided them into ten fives but he never offered for the others, and the assignees' object was to get rid of the whole Neeschunderpore concern. The sworn appraiser valued the whole of the Moisurah concern at Rs 60,000 but it was afterwards valued at Rs 70,000. The assignees did not refuse Rs 70,000 to my knowledge. We divided the valuation of Rs 70,000 thus,—we valued Moisurah at Rs 35,000, Gungaderpore at Rs 20,000, and Neeschunderpore at Rs 15,000. We redeemed the whole from the Bank at Rs 70,000, but that was the division of value that the assignees made in their own minds. Gungaderpore is a factory that has given us 270, maunds of indigo, but I don't know the number of beegahs it consists of. I suppose the average of Gungaderpore, on an outlay of from 20 to 25,000, ought to give from 200 to 250 maunds of indigo a year. The average of Neeschunderpore is about 160 maunds, but the cultivation in all factories has been greatly reduced, and if the outlay is reduced there must be a corresponding reduction in the produce. Neeschunderpore has never made so much indigo as Gungaderpore, which is one of the most productive factories in Bengal. Mr. Albert is the manager of Gungaderpore.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. The factories were valued after the failure by two sworn appraisers who were appointed by the Court, and I believe they were perfectly competent. The assignees were assisted by Mr. Ballard in making the estimate that valued the Moisurah concern at Rs 70,000, and myself, Mr. Burkinyoung and Mr. Hurry were all present and assisting. Mr. Ballard was the partner who had the management of the indigo factories of our concern before the failure. He was perfectly acquainted with indigo concerns, and was an old planter to boot. I have had also fourteen years experience in indigo concerns as an agent, but never as a planter. Mr. Hurry has also had experience, but Mr. Burkinyoung's experience is not so great. At the time the sale was made to Mr. Saupin neither myself nor the assignees had the least reason to suppose that we could have obtained better prices. Mr. Hurry had no concern in the purchase of these two factories that I am aware of. Mr. Bell told me that he was not a partner of Mr. Hurry, but I know nothing of the matter. With my knowledge of these factories, I strongly recommended Mr. Burkinyoung to sell them for Rs 15,000 when he got the offer, and I considered it a fair price. It was in consequence of the advance of Rs 10,000 being required that I thought it better to sell them at once. That division has not been a profitable concern. It has just kept itself square, calculating the interest of the money laid out. In the two years it has just paid its outlay, without clearing a profit. I was satisfied that a renewal of the lease would not be obtained without the advance to the Zemindar. I doubt whether Rs 25,000 could have been got for the concern if we had advanced the Rs 10,000. There were two other persons connected with us in the concern. I believe the pottahs were taken in the names of the three lessees. When I say that many people wanted to purchase these factories the year before I speak generally of all the factories, and not of these particular ones. From January 1832 to October 1833 the expenses of advertisements were considerable. The discussion on the subject of the order for the sale of the factories lasted some time. The arrangement for the redemption was a public order. Mr. Bell has tendered his remaining half, and we should have received the whole of the purchase money before this if it had not been for this application. At the time this sale took place Mr. Hurry was confined by a very serious illness. He had nothing to do with the negociation for the sale. He was very dangerously ill, and there was no possibility of communicating with him on matters of business. The Assignees have always been ready to give any information to the creditors of the estate, but if they were to supply written information to all the creditors who applied, we should never be able to carry on the business with the same establishment. They have never refused information to any creditors coming to the office.

Re-examined. When Mr. Burkingyoung stated to Mr. Saupin that he would sell the division for Rs 15,000 I wrote to the other lessees for their consent. When Mr. Storm made his proposal I considered the bargain completed. It was completed before I got the answer from the other lessees so far as it could be completed by the Assignees. It could not have been if they had held out. The lessees asked time to consider of it, and afterwards agreed. I suppose they would have had no objection to any other person who had offered more, why should they? It was a matter of no concern to them whether the concern was sold for five or fifty. The Assignees had been advancing funds to these co-lessees. They advanced the whole. If the Assignees had intimated to these co-lessees that they would stop the funds it would of course have been a pretty ready process to bring them round. When the co-lessees said they would think of it, the Assignees said that they would require them to find their own funds if they did not agree to fair and reasonable terms, and they gave their consent, but whether it was in consequence of that or not I can't say. They relinquished their lease then, and, having relinquished it, it could have been no concern to them to whom it was given. In saying to Mr. Turton that I did not particularly allude to these factories when speaking of the offers that had been made, I did not mean to exclude them neither. Mr. Burkingyoung tried to communicate with Mr. Hurry on the subject of the sale of these factories, but he was so ill that his physicians ordered him not to be spoken to.

In reply to the Court. I think the Neeschunderpore division has produced as much as 200 maunds of indigo, I believe on an outlay of about Rs 20,000, but the average I should say is not more than 160 or 180 maunds. I only know the particulars I have stated about these factories from what I have been told by the persons in charge. When the Assignees agreed with Mr. Saupin to sell the division for Rs 15,000, I wrote to the co-lessees to give up the remainder of their lease of that division, and having agreed to give up their lease, it was immaterial to them to whom it was sold, or for what.

Richard Howe Cockerell, a member of the firm of Cockerell and Co., sworn. I know Messrs. Donaldson and Greig. Our house had transactions with them in January last. We were prepared to make them advances at that time, but the extent would depend on the object. We would have advanced them Rs 20,000 for the purchase of this factory. I was apprised of their intention to purchase. We were prepared to make such an advance in the end of August last. When we were applied to we sanctioned the same arrangement we had offered before. I was a director of the Bank of Bengal last year. I know there was an offer made to the Bank of Bengal for this concern by Messrs. Donaldson and Greig, I believe in December or January last; I don't exactly recollect which. I believe they offered Rs 70,000, but I cannot be positive. I think there was a separate offer for the Neeschunderpore division, but that was before the offer for the whole. I believe the offer was Rs 20,000. The offer was made to the Bank as mortgagees. I think it was considered by the Bank that it would not be advantageous to sell a part, and then an offer was made for the whole. A communication was ordered to be made to the assignees, but I cant say whether it was made or not. I don't know whether they ever received such a communication.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cochrane. I am no further a party to this proceeding than by having signed a letter calling on the assignees to give an explanation on the subject of certain reports that were in circulation. I always met with ready attention from the Assignees. I did not instruct the Solicitor in this action, nor am I answerable to the Court.

George Collier, a Solicitor of the Court, having been sworn, demurred to giving answers to the questions put to him, on the ground that he knew nothing of the circumstances otherwise than in his professional capacity. It having, however, been ascertained that he had gained his knowledge as the Solicitor of Mr. Greig, and Mr. Greig having consented to his answering, the following evidence was given. I had no communication with Mr. Rogers about the purchase of these factories, but I believe my partner had.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. I was employed by Mr. Greig to apply to the Court to cancel the sale of these factories; but I refused to do so, because, by the statements laid before me, I thought he had not good grounds for the application. I recommended him not to make the application, or to take the advice of the Advocate-General. I did see Mr. Burkinyoung on the subject. Having heard Mr. Greig's statement I proposed sending for Mr. Burkinyoung, who came and entered into an explanation, and, as it appeared to me, to Mr. Greig's satisfaction.

Alexander Rogers sworn. I received an application relative to the Neeschunderpore factory. I never received an offer for it. I don't call that [a letter which was shewn the witness] an offer. I did not understand it as an offer, and if I had the parties were not prepared to pay me the money. I certainly did not buy Neeschunderpore for myself. I bought it as an agent for François Saupin, by his desire.

Frederick Handel Burkinyoung, one of the assignees, sworn. I remember a valuation put upon these factories, both upon the whole and upon the three divisions. ~~Rs~~ 15,000 was put on Neeschunderpore, and ~~Rs~~ 70,000 on the whole. I have heard that there was an offer made to the Bank of Bengal in January last. There was an offer through a letter from the Bank of Bengal for the whole, connected with other offers, in one letter, ~~Rs~~ 70,000 was offered for the whole. I did not consider it at the time as a distinct offer. They stated that they had received an offer, and requested our concurrence, but I did not consider it an offer that called to be acted on immediately. The letter contained an intimation of their intention to apply to the Court for an order for the sale of the factories, and therefore we thought our concurrence unnecessary. The Bank did not bring this factory to the notice of the Court among the others. They requested us to assent to the prices mentioned. The offers were for four factories. I think they were the Souapara, the Moisgunge, the Rajapore and the Moisurah concerns. We gave no answer for the reasons mentioned, I think, as near as I can recollect. I think we did refuse the offers for the three other factories, which had been made on a previous occasion, but we did not refuse the offer for this factory. We did not answer the letter. We refused the previous offer for the three factories on a former occasion,—not on the occasion of this letter. The offer was not repeated, nor did we ever refuse the ~~Rs~~ 70,000 to my knowledge. (Question.) Did you ever make any attempt to sell the Moisurah concern between the 1st of January last and the time it was sold to Mr. Saupin? (Answer.) We are not in the habit of making enquiries for purchasers. There was no advertisement in the papers about the sale of this Moisurah concern or any of its divisions between the times mentioned, but it was well known,—people were always talking and enquiring about it. Parties came in occasionally enquiring about its capabilities. I was present when the order was made in Court for the general sale. It was the 1st of February. There were a great many persons present I believe. When the first application was made for us to sell there were many indigo planters in Court. The close of the indigo season was stated to be the proper time for selling. I remember an offer of Mr. Saupin I think in January last. We accepted the offer as far as we could. We informed him we would send his offer to the Bank of Bengal. It was sent, but it was not accepted. I know this by not having received any communication from the Bank. Mr. Saupin and his agent, Mr. Rogers, endeavored to compel us to complete the sale, which it was not in our power to do. Mr. Saupin, not being very well acquainted with the English language, misunderstood me, and thought that I had sold it to him, not that I had referred him to the Bank. Mr. Saupin was frequently at the Bank on the subject. He never communicated to me that any other offer had been made to the Bank. The first official notice that we had of the necessity of renewing the izarra was by a letter from Mr. Saupin the manager and lessee, I think dated in January last. I think it must have been after his offer in January. We were next applied to on the subject of the izarra on the 25th of August last, by Mr. Saupin in person. He came into our office, and I asked him what he had come about. He said he had come about the renewal of the izarra. I told him that it was impossible to think of advancing that sum of money, ~~Rs~~ 10,000, and that I would rather sell the factory. We had made up our minds in the interval that it would be improper to advance money on factories like that. We never made enquiries about the offer of ~~Rs~~ 70,000 after we knew of the necessity of the advance for the izarra. We considered the offer as abandoned by the parties who had made it. Had I been aware of the offer I should have thought it my duty to have applied, and should have been glad to accept it, but I did not think it existing then. We would have accepted it before had it not been for the letter of the Bank of Bengal, saying they would themselves bring it before the Court. I think in one or two instances we have accepted offers made through the Bank, and we have refused others. The substance of Mr. Saupin's communication was that he had come down to endeavour to persuade us to advance him the money. He was informed that we would not, and that we considered it more beneficial to the estate to sell the factories than to advance the money. He said that if the izarra was not renewed it would be taken by Mr. Greig, and that the estate would be injured by its being thereby lessened in value. The old izarra I think expired in March last. I was not aware in January last that the izarra would expire in March. When I told him that we would rather sell the factory than make the advance, I think I proposed to him to renew his former offer of ~~Rs~~ 15,000. I think the offer, or the suggestion at least, came from me, but I cannot be certain. I had not had any specific conversation with Mr. Harry on the subject, but I knew that he would not consent to make such an advance, and I acted on that knowledge of his sentiments. Mr. Saupin told me that he would take the concern for ~~Rs~~ 15,000, stating that Mr. Rogers would give ~~Rs~~ 10,000 for Neeschunderpore, and that Mr. Bell would give ~~Rs~~ 5,000 for Antpara. He was to get that sum for the Assignees. So far I was perfectly aware that he was purchasing Neeschunderpore for himself through Mr. Rogers's agency and assistance. I authorized as much of these letters [A B and C] as relates to the sale, but not those parts that speak of Mr. Storm. I authorized that part which speaks of giving authority to Mr. Saupin to sell. I think it was when Mr. Saupin made his first offer of ~~Rs~~ 15,000 that I was aware that Mr. Rogers was in the market as the agent of Mr. Saupin. I know that Mr. Rogers never wished to purchase it for himself. I did not know that Mr. Storm was in the market till the evening of the 25th of August. He called at the office on that evening, and made an offer for Antpara. He first made an offer of ~~Rs~~ 5,000, and then increased it to ~~Rs~~ 5,500. I requested him to call in the morning, when he would see Mr. Saupin, giving him to understand that it was out of my hands; because I had concluded with Mr. Saupin. I had a communication from Mr. Rogers the same day, before Mr. Storm came, on the subject of Neeschunderpore factory only. I had settled with Messrs. Saupin and Rogers before I saw Mr. Storm—with Mr. Rogers for the Neeschunderpore concern, for ~~Rs~~ 10,000 and with Mr. Saupin that he might sell Antpara to Mr. Bell or any body else, for ~~Rs~~ 5,000. No money was given on that day. Some few days afterwards some money was given. I did not attempt to communicate with Mr. Saupin that we had a better offer for Antpara. I did not know where to find him. I did communicate it to him next morning. He told me he had sold it to Mr. Bell. Mr. Bell was then in Calcutta. I considered Mr. Storm as after the sale. The season had then closed, but what work there was doing was on account of the assignees and the lessees. The lessees made no advance for the cultivation or the izarra. We never made any attempt to renew the rent without the advance of izarra, because we considered it useless. The sale is completed, but the conveyance is not made, nor the purchase money all paid. I don't think that there was ever more than one communication from the Bank of Bengal to the Assignees about the offer for Moisurah. The whole transaction with Mr. Saupin occurred in the course of two or three hours on the morning of the 25th of August. I know nothing of Mr. Bell. He never made any offer before to my knowledge. On the following morning I saw Mr. Rogers at his shop, when he told me, I think, that he had written to Mr. Storm to tell him that the Antpara factory was in the market, not knowing, I suppose, that Mr. Saupin had made a bargain for both.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cochrane. All letters are laid on the Assignees' pedestal, and I don't think that any thing is ever done without their orders. I believe Mr. Storm only intended to purchase that one factory (Antpara). We would not have sold it for Rs 5,500 without the other going with it.

William Storm examined. Antpara adjoins a factory belonging to me. I did apply to the Bank of Bengal. I wrote a letter to Mr. Alexander the Secretary to the assignees, offering Rs 5,500 for it, on the 25th of August last, at about five in the afternoon. I had seen Mr. Alexander previously to making the offer. I expressed my desire to him to purchase it, saying that I had made an offer the year before, and that I was desirous of doing so again. I did not want any other factory, and wanted that because it adjoins mine, and in some degree interferes with it. I told him that if it were not sold I was desirous of making a tender for it. He told me that it was not sold, and that it was still open to any offer from me. I said if he would give me a slip of paper I would write out a tender for it at once, upon which he said that there was no occasion to do so then, and that it would be time enough next morning. Some further conversation took place, in the course of which I asked whether Mr. Saupin was here, to which he replied "yes, he has but just left me." I understood from Mr. Alexander that there had been some conversation between him and Mr. Saupin about the sale of the factories, but that no sum had been fixed. I asked him were Mr. Saupin was to be found, being desirous of seeing him to know what the conversation was, and he called the servants and asked them where Mr. Saupin put up, to which they replied that as he had only arrived that morning he was probably in his boat. I left Mr. Alexander, and then called on Mr. Rogers, to whom I communicated what had passed between me and Mr. Alexander. Mr. Rogers recommended me to send in the tender that night, notwithstanding what I had been told by Mr. Alexander, and I wrote a tender then on his desk. I offered in my tender Rs 5,500, and carried it myself, but not finding Mr. Alexander, after ascertaining where he was to be found, I waited on Mr. Burkinyoung. I sent up my tender accompanied by my card, and Mr. Burkinyoung came down. It was then about half past five o'clock. I explained the cause of my visit, and he asked what was the amount of my tender, which, being directed to Mr. Alexander, I believe he had not opened. I told him Rs 5,500, and he told me I should have a reply in the morning. I asked him, in case any body made a larger offer, to afford me the opportunity of amending mine, which he readily consented to do. He never said a word to me that evening about the factory having been sold, or the bargain completed, or any thing to that effect. I knew it was for sale from Mr. Rogers, who wrote me a note saying that he was on the eve of closing for Neeschunderpore, and that Antpara was in the market also if I wished to purchase it. I got a reply next day stating that the factory had been sold the day before.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. I did not make the application in consequence of hearing that Antpara was sold. I had not heard then that Neeschunderpore was sold. I don't think that I have Mr. Rogers's letter by me, not having thought it necessary to keep it, because it merely conveyed information. I saw Mr. Saupin on the same day that I saw Mr. Alexander, after I had written the tender for the factory, I think, and before I saw Mr. Burkinyoung. Mr. Saupin did tell me that the factories were sold, and he also told me the price, Rs 15,000. He also told me who were the purchasers. I did not mention a word of this to Mr. Birkinyoung. I did not ask him whether it was true. Having been told by Mr. Alexander that the offer was open, I did not consider Mr. Saupin's information correct, as it was his interest, he being an interested party, to prevent other purchasers from coming forward. I did not learn from Mr. Rogers that Antpara was sold, but I learned from him in the evening that he had bought Neeschunderpore for Mr. Saupin. It was not Mr. Alexander that referred me to Mr. Saupin, but I asked where he could be seen. I knew Mr. Saupin a little, and as he had had a conversation with the Assignees I was desirous to know what it was, and it was then that he told me that they had authorized him to sell them, and that he had sold them to Mr. Rogers and Mr. Bell. To Mr. Bell for Rs 5,000. The five hundred was not added after that, but at the writing of the tender. I was not aware then that Mr. Saupin was a bidder for Antpara. My object was solely for Antpara. I would not have given Rs 15,000 for the two. I did not want the other. I don't know the capabilities of the lands and therefore could not give an answer as to the value of the whole. Mr. Burkinyoung did not tell me that if I came in the morning I should have an answer from Mr. Saupin. I don't recollect that he mentioned Mr. Saupin's name at all. I did not ask him whether it was true, as stated by Mr. Saupin, that he had purchased the division. The reason that induced me to make the offer was the inconvenience that would result to me from the factory being in the possession of another. I have heard people say that Antpara is worth more than Rs 5,500. I had bid Rs 5,000 the year before.

Re-examined. Antpara adjoins Mr. Bell's factory as well as mine. They did not, in consequence of this nearness, give me notice to induce competition.

In reply to Mr. Turton through the Court. I knew that all the factories belonging to the insolvent estates were for sale, but there were obstacles in the way of selling some of them, and I did not know that in this instance the obstacles had been removed. I had often spoken to Mr. Hurry on the subject of the sale of this very factory.

Mr. Saupin was then called, and by his desire examined through the interpreter, though he appeared to speak English well enough, for he repeatedly replied, sometimes in English and sometimes in French, before the questions had been put to him, and as frequently corrected the interpreter, when the answers were not rendered according to his pleasure. He objected through Mr. Turton to give evidence till he knew who was to pay his expenses, but the Court would not admit of his being heard through the Counsel for the opposite side to that for which he had been summoned as a witness, and obliged him either to address it direct or to speak through the interpreter. The latter course having been adopted, it appeared that he had been served with the subpœna at his residence in Calcutta, and the court decided in consequence that he could not demand his expenses. He then gave the following evidence. I have the superintendence of Neeschunderpore, and had before August last. I had myself a share in the concern. The factory was then only rented, and I had a share in the lease of it. Messrs. Alexander and Co. furnished the advances. I have made an offer for the factory. The first offer I made was in 1833, but I forget the month. I did not repeat the bid in January last, but I did lately, on the 25th of August last. The offer of last year was refused by the Bank. Mr. Greig has a factory in my neighbourhood, and I believe Mr. Donaldson is interested in it, but he does not reside there. I never had any personal communication with Mr. Greig about being employed by him. [A letter put into his hand.] That is my hand writing. I wrote it because I thought Mr. Greig would give more for the factory than myself, and that it would be better to be employed under him than not to be employed at all. I had reason to suppose he would have been glad to get me out of the factory, because he was always my enemy. When I wanted to be employed by him I was not aware of this. I think he would have given a greater price to get rid of me. I think I wrote to the assignees in the month of January last on the subject of the renewal of the izarra. The old izarra expired in March last. The annual rent was ~~Rs~~ 3,500. The rent since the renewal of the izarra is ~~Rs~~ 3,364 including the village. There is about ~~Rs~~ 150 difference between the old and the new izarra. The former was larger. There is also a piece of ground belonging to the Company that was and is rented distinct from the izarra. I only made one communication to the Assignees on the subject of the renewal of the izarra before the 25th of August. Before March last the rent had been paid annually. I came down on the 25th of August expressly to tell the Assignees that it was absolutely necessary to renew the izarra, because it had expired, and because I had heard that Mr. Greig was about to take it. Advances had been required of me after the expiration of the izarra, and also before. The first time that advances were demanded was in June last, but they had previously demanded an arrangement. No advance was demanded before June. The demand was made by the Zemindar through his people. I received intimation in April or June that if I did not come to an arrangement I should not be allowed to plough my lands. They asked for ~~Rs~~ 8,000 in advance for the renewal of the izarra, besides ~~Rs~~ 800 in presents to the Zemindar's sircars. I believe this was in June or July. It is customary with Zemindars to demand advances in this way, and it was not done before, because the Zemidar was the ward of the Collector, and besides an advance had been made ten years before, when Mr. Gibson built the factory. The ~~Rs~~ 800 was not given to the Sircars to get the rent reduced, but as a salammie, which is customary in such transactions. The difference of the old and new izarra is a clear gain to the factory. I came down to Calcutta alone, as far as Culna, where I fell in with Mr. Shepherd. I went immediately on my arrival to the Assignees, and it was then that the transaction of the purchase took place. I told them of the necessity of renewing the izarra, and that I would rather quit the factory and abandon my interest in the concern than remain if it were not renewed. Mr. Barkinyoung and Mr. Alexander then said that they would rather sell the factory than make such advances, and recommended me to endeavour to obtain the same price that Mr. Rogers had offered the preceding year. I then called on Mr. Rogers and related this conversation to him, and Mr. Rogers sent me back to the Assignees to tell them that if they would make him an offer he would accept it at ~~Rs~~ 10,000. I told the assignees that I should take the Neeschunderpore factory for myself at ~~Rs~~ 10,000 and the Autpara for Mr. Bell at ~~Rs~~ 5,000. I made this offer on behalf of Mr. Bell because five or six months previously we had agreed to take both factories together. I had seen him that morning. I had not seen him that morning. I forget whether I had or no. I saw him after having purchased the concern, when I told him that I had purchased Autpara for him. I will not swear that I did not see him in the morning because I don't remember, but I may have seen him. I am quite certain I I did not breakfast with him. I may have seen him at his own factory ten or fifteen days before. I did not tell the assignees that ~~Rs~~. 10,000 were required for the renewal, but I did tell them (Messrs. Barkinyoung and Alexander) that it had at first been demanded, and that I had subsequently arranged for ~~Rs~~. 8,000 for the renewal and ~~Rs~~. 800 for salammies. I did not tell them the rent was to be reduced. I had not heard before the 25th of August that any body but myself was bidding for the factory. Not this year. I heard that there were last year. Mr. Greig told me that he himself had made an offer for the whole. I think this was about November or December last. I did not know of any other bidders. I think Mr. Storm was a bidder for Autpara last year, but I don't know that he was this. The indigo season begins on the 1st of October. Mr. Greig was at my house at tiffin two days before I left home for Calcutta. I told Mr. Hutchins and Mr. Raison in his presence that I was coming down. The Zemindar gave me a receipt for the money and the pottah, but no security, and allows interest at five per cent.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cochrane. Mr. Greig came to my house uninvited. He came in as we were at tiffin, and I of course asked him to stay. I know Mr. Storm, he came to me at about half past four in the afternoon of the 25th of August, and questioned me about these two factories, telling me that Mr. Alexander had referred him to me to treat about the concern. I told him that I had purchased Neeschunderpore on my own account, and Autpara on account of Mr. Bell.

Re-examined. When I saw Mr. Storm I had not seen Mr. Bell. I did not see him (Mr. Bell) before that.

William Cobb Hurry sworn. I am a merchant and one of the Assignees of Alexander and Co. I am concerned in indigo factories. I am not concerned in the factory of Maisdee. Not now. I am in Taugra and Chowdangra. No others. I have been concerned in them five or six years. I am in partnership with Mr. Piddington. I have no other partner. Mr. Bell is not a partner of mine but he was in Moisdee. I gave up my interest in Moisdee in October 1833. I was concerned in several factories with a house in London, Lucas and Newgy, but in consequence of disputes with them I have given up Moisdee to their agents here. The assignment was made on the 5th of July last. My answer in equity is dated 18th November last, and I then stated that I held one third-share in Moisdee. Mr. Richard Clark Bell and Mr. Charles Bell were my partners in that concern. Mr. Richard Clark Bell is the person to whom the Autpara factory has been sold. He had made several offers for it before. He instructed me before the failure of Alexander and Co. to apply to the house to know if they would sell it and Mr. Ballard refused. Last cold season when he was here he came several times to the office about it. Mr. Barkinyoung knew of it. Mr. Barkinyoung perfectly knew of the connection between me and Mr. Bell, because I gave that as a reason to Mr. Bell for refusing to treat with him. I refused it to Mr. Bell in December or January last. I think he offered ~~Rs~~. 4,000 for it, but I am not certain. I was informed of this sale after it had taken place. I did remonstrate with Mr. Barkinyoung about it. The first I heard of it was from Mr. Terranean one of the lessees, who came to complain to me of it when I was ill in bed. The offer made to the Bank of Bengal was sent to us: it was ~~Rs~~ 70,000, one third down, and two thirds on long credit. That is a common way of making indigo purchases. The bank has made similar sales with our consent.

Cross examined by Mr. Cochrane. On the 25th of August last, I had no connection with Mr. Bell. I was away from office on account of illness six weeks. If it had not been for these proceedings the whole of the money would have been paid before this. When the Bank gave long credits they took the responsibility on themselves, and gave credit to the estate as an entire payment. I have had considerable dealings in indigo. I have no doubt that the offer of ~~Rs~~. 15,000 was a fair offer. This Neeschunderpore division has been a losing concern for the last two years. We heard that there were other parties trying to get possession of the izzara. If that lease had been obtained by other parties the concern would have been greatly injured. We were not willing to advance the sum required for the izzara.

Re-examined.—I have no doubt the Bank would have given the estate credit for the ~~Rs~~ 70,000 offered by Mr. Grieg if it had been accepted in the same manner that they did with other long credits. I never heard of more than ~~Rs~~ 15,000 being offered for the Neeschunderpore concern. I have no right to say that it has been mismanaged, and cannot account for Mr. Saupin's anxiety to purchase a losing concern, unless he expected to make a good season next year.

The Court adjourned at half past eight o'clock to Saturday next, when the case for the Assignees will commence.

IN THE MATTER OF ALEXANDER AND CO.

With the exception of a short interval during which viva voce evidence was heard, the only material part of which is hereunto annexed, the Court was occupied from ten to four in hearing documents read on both sides of the question postponed from last Saturday. As may be supposed from the time taken in reading them they are too voluminous for the limits of a newspaper, even could they be readily procured; but the material parts of them will doubtless be noticed by the learned Commissioner when he gives his decision, which will of course be fully reported. The Court adjourned at four for the convenience of those gentlemen who wished to attend the Governor-General's Levee before the whole of the documentary evidence had been got through.

Alfred Lingham sworn and examined by Mr. Turton. I am the petitioner. Mr. Greig I understand is to pay the costs of application; I have no means of paying them myself. Mr. Shaw did inform me after the application was made that he had applied to the assignees to examine the books and papers. He also told me that he had attended at the Assignees' office and examined the books and documents, but after some opposition on the part of the Assignees. I never applied myself to the Assignees for information, only through Mr. Shaw. I did not sign the circular letter at the request of Mr. Greig. I had never seen him when I signed it. This circular was accompanied by a note from Mr. Shaw requesting me to peruse it, and if I approved of it, to sign it. That (No. 1) is the original circular letter which I signed. Mr. Shaw was employed by me in this matter, but not at that time. He has been employed by me since the application to the Court, but I do not pay the costs. I paid costs before, and took care not to do so again. I have a letter from Mr. Greig undertaking to pay the costs, which I have carefully preserved. I have no other authority but that letter, which I consider sufficient to cover all my costs. I never made any applications to the Assignees except by the circular. There are other cases that I should have brought to the notice of the Court if I had had the means.

Cross-examined by the Advocate-General. The cases that I said I should have brought to the notice of the Court if I had had the means are against the Assignees. I certainly concur in this application.

IN THE MATTER OF CRUTTENDEN AND CO.

Mr. Turton said that in this case he had to bring to the notice of the Court the nature of the order under which it had been adjourned last year. The order was for the hearing to be adjourned to the 22d of November, and for the insolvents to attend on that day to be examined on the truth of their schedule. He apprehended that in this case, and in the cases of the other mercantile insolvencies, the order made in the matter of Palmer and Co. had been taken as a precedent and followed, but the cases were not precisely similar, because in the case of Palmer and Co. no order had been made on the hearing that they were entitled to the benefit of the act. That had been omitted, for what reason he could not say. In this case the order for adjournment had been drawn up in the same terms, but he took that to be incorrect if made after they had been declared entitled to the benefit of the act. The usual order had been to adjourn the hearings from time to time and to direct the attendance of the insolvents at such adjourned hearings for the purpose of being examined; but it appeared an inconsistency to him to make them entitled to the benefit of the act, and yet to adjourn the hearings to a future day, and to order their attendance from time to time to be examined. It could not be otherwise than injurious to the parties, as in estates that were not likely to be wound up soon it might act as a sentence of perpetual imprisonment by preventing them from leaving the country.

Sir John Grant said that it was no doubt proper to prevent insolvents from quitting the country till their affairs were wound up.

Mr. Turton said it was not necessary to argue that point then; he would only say that if it were necessary for insolvents to wait here till their affairs were finally wound up, such a doctrine would, in the cases of the great agency houses which were not likely to be brought to a close for a considerable period, certainly have the effect of imprisoning the parties for their lives in a country which was not their native domicile, and into which they had merely come for the purposes of trade.

Sir John Grant said he only interrupted Mr. Turton to enter his protest against the idea that any of these estates could not be wound up in a reasonable time.

Mr. Turton observed that the question was what was a reasonable time?

Sir John Grant said that he meant a very short time. He would wish it to be understood that it never could in his opinion be the intention of the Court to carry on these estates for an indefinite period.

Mr. Turton said that the question now before the Court was whether these insolvents should be obliged to be in constant attendance from day to day, and the hearing be adjourned from three months to three months, without any necessity for such an order that he could perceive. That it was wholly unnecessary was clear, for they might be called up for examination at any time on the application of parties desirous of questioning them relative to any particular point of transaction. It was not to their being subject to examination when required that he objected, but to the continuance of the order directing them to be brought up every three months whether necessary or unnecessary. In the case of Palmer and Co. it was quite right that whenever the adjudication was made they should be brought before the Court, and the hearing was very properly adjourned where there was no adjudication; but where the adjudication had been made, it seemed to be a hardship to continue the adjournments coupled with an order for them to attend on each occasion, without conferring any benefit thereby on the creditors, and it was therefore that he brought it to the notice of the Court. At present he moved that the hearing be adjourned in the usal manner for three months, but he wished the latter part of the customary order directing the attendance of the Insolvents for examination to be omitted.

Sir John Grant declined making any order for adjournment unless some cause for it was shewn, and asked Mr. Turton who he appeared for.

Mr. Turton said that he had been instructed to make the application both by the Assignees and the Insolvents. The Assignees applied for the adjournment as usual, but he appeared on the part of the Insolvents by consent of the Assignees, to object to that part of the order which directed their attendance from time to time.

Sir John Grant wished to know the grounds of the application to adjourn the hearing.

Mr. Turton said he had none to offer except that it had been the usual course in such cases to adjourn the hearing from time to time pending the proceeding.

Sir John Grant said he knew of no proceedings. All he knew was that there was a case in that Court which ought to be out of it as soon as possible.

Mr. Turton mentioned something about the order for carrying on the factories and other concerns belonging to the estate, which Sir John Grant said he was quite prepared to rescind, and he took the opportunity of stating that, if he sat there at the termination of those orders, it would take some very strong evidence to convince him that they ought to be continued.

Mr. Turton reminded Sir John Grant of the destruction of property and injury to the estates that would most certainly ensue from the sudden stoppage of the indigo factories, and the throwing of such an enormous mass of property into the market at once.

Sir John Grant said he might as well say at once that he was quite satisfied that all these factories belonging to the several estates ought to be sold off immediately, and the proceeds divided among the creditors without delay. It was quite contrary to the spirit of the Insolvent Act and to that of the Bankrupt laws to involve the creditors in carrying on concerns for an indefinite period which could tend to the benefit of none save those who were concerned in carrying them on. He wished the parties to take notice of the impression that he had in his mind with regard to these concerns that they might be prepared in the event of any fresh applications for the extension of the orders.

Mr. Turton said that he had no grounds for the application to adjourn the hearing further than the ordinary practice.

Sir John Grant. Then let this case stand over till next Court day, that the Assignees may be prepared to shew cause why the order should not be made.

IN THE MATTER OF PALMER AND CO.

Mr. Waddington made a similar application with the exception of that against the attendance of the Insolvents for examination.

Sir John Grant made the same order, and told the Attorney to be prepared to shew sufficient grounds why this case should not be finally disposed of.

IN THE MATTER OF COLVIN AND CO.

A similar application was made, and a similar order passed.

Sir John Grant further said that it was quite necessary that these perpetual motions for adjournments should be put a stop to. He did not mean to say in these cases that there were no grounds for them; there might for all that he knew be very good grounds; but the Court should in every case of adjournment be compelled to turn its attention to the grounds for the application.

IN THE MATTER OF ROBERT ADAIR MACNAGHTEN.

Mr. Smith renewed his application to be relieved from the assigneeship, and put in an affidavit of service of notice on the detaining creditor. It had been intimated to him he said by some of the creditors that the former adjudication should be altered, because by that only one-third of the Insolvent's allowances had been ordered to be deducted, whereas, if the adjudication were made now, he being a Captain in the Company's Military Service, the order of the Court might perhaps be different. His own application however was only to be discharged from the Assigneeship.

No cause being shewn against Mr. Smith's application he was ordered to make the assignment to Mr. Holroyd in the event of the security offered by him being approved of by the examiner.

CAPTAIN CRISP'S LIGHT.

Rangoon, November 18, 1834.

Mr. Crisp's compliments to Colonel Burney to inform him that on passing the North End of Andaman, about 10 days past, a light was seen on West Island. Captain Emmott thought it might be that of a Malay Prow. Mr. C. is and was of opinion that it was from some cast away crew. His wish however to ascertain the fact was overruled by Captain Emmott.

Rangoon, November 18, 1834.

To CAPTAIN EMMOTT, Commander Schooner Pyung Bong.

Sir,—I beg to send you a copy of a note addressed to me this morning by Mr. Crisp, in order that you may have an opportunity of affording any explanation on your part respecting the light said to have been seen on West Island.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. BURNEY, Lieut.-Col., Resident in Ava.

To COLONEL BURNEY, British Resident in Ava.

Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date with copy of a note addressed to you by Captain Crisp, who was lately a passenger in the schooner Pyung Bong under my command, and reporting to you that in passing the north end of Andamans about 10 P. M. a light was seen on West Island, which he was of opinion was from some cast away crew, but that his wish to ascertain the fact was overruled by me. In reply I beg leave to state that this supposed light was pointed out to me by Captain Crisp, and I then told him that what he took for a light was in my opinion nothing more than a strong glare occasioned by the breakers on the reefs which bound the north end of that Island. I am still of the same opinion. The night was very dark and the luminous appearance of breakers in such cases is well known to all who have had experience at sea; but even had a light been seen, that should not have caused any surprise or anxiety on my part knowing that these Islands are inhabited and that they are resorted to by Malay Prows, by fishermen, and others, at this season of the year. Moreover we passed close to the north end of the Island before sunset, and saw no fires or smoke or any signal which could lead us to suppose there were any shipwrecked people on the Island.

On another occasion, while in the neighbourhood of the Andamans, Captain C. pointed out a light on the summit of Saddle Mountain. I told him it was a star but he insisted it was a signal light from the inhabitants, who no doubt wished to have friendly intercourse with us, and that if we should be close enough inshore in the morning, and should send a boat it would prove so. Shortly after it was plainly seen to be the bright star in Orion. The object of Captain Crisp's report evidently is to insinuate that I displayed a want of humanity in that I did not attend to his suggestions in these matters. The explanation just given will, I am sure, free me from any such blame, and should you require further information I beg you will be pleased to call on my chief officer. It may be proper for me state that Captain C. and I have been long at variance on account of his conduct on board the schooner where he was strongly inclined to interfere with me in my duty as a Commander, and I have on several occasions been obliged for the safety of the vessel and for the sake of discipline to check him for attempting to give orders where he had no right to do so.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

Rangoon, Nov. 18, 1834. J. EMMOTT.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE "SOPHIA."

Having had a very narrow escape in the Sophia, during a very heavy gale of wind in the Bay of Bengal, the following particulars are published for general information.

Tuesday, 4th November.—At noon passed the Preparis Island, about 7 miles distant, with a strong S. E. wind, dark and cloudy with a heavy sea, ship under-single reefed top-sails—sent down royal yards. Lat. 14 56.

Wednesday 5th.—Continued strong gales and a heavy sea, ship under fore-sail and reefed top-sails. No observation. Lat. account 17. 10. N.

Thursday 6th. 3 A. M.—Strong gale from N. E. and dark cloudy weather; sent down top-gallant yards. 8 A. M. Increasing gales with a heavy sea; reefed top-sails. 10 A. M. Gale still increasing, housed the top-gallant masts, sent all the studding sails out of the tops and made the ship as light as possible aloft. Noon. Very heavy gales and a high sea running; close-reefed the top-sails and furled them; ship under foresail and fore-topmast-stay-sail; bent a new main, stay-sail, secured down all the hatches fore and aft, put preventer lashings on the boats and spars; ship scudding under fore-sail and fore-top-mast-stay-sail; secured all the dead lights, and made every thing ready to meet a heavy gale. 8 P. M. Very heavy gales with a high sea running, and much lightening to the S. W. 9. 30. P. M. Blew away the fore-sail and fore-topmast-stay-sail in a very heavy gust, at which time the ship became completely unmanageable. The wind then changed to the S. W. and a tremendous heavy gust threw the ship in the trough of a sea, which running to the N. W. made a fair breach over the lee-bows, and swept every thing off the decks. Finding ourselves in a dangerous state I cut away the main and mizen masts, and at the same time a tremendous heavy gust struck the ship and blew the foremast over the side, which fell across the larboard anchor, which had a chain bent to it, and carrying away the stoppers tore it from the bows, ran out the whole of the chain and took one quarter of the main hatches with it, from which cause a great quantity of water got below; and had the ship not been as strong as wood and iron could make her, we certainly must have perished, for no frail ship could have stood the shocks which the Sophia received. These tremendous heavy gusts lasted about four hours, at which time all on board had given themselves up to the mercy of Divine Providence, and had it not abated at the time it did, we must have foundered. On examination we found eight feet water in the hold, and the pumps choaked by the cargo washing into the pump-well. We thought it advisable to get the only remaining boat in readiness to leave the ship, after which we lifted the pumps two feet and cleared them, commenced pumping and heaving cargo overboard, found we could gain on the ship, ceased to heave over cargo and turned all hands to the pumps and got the ship free of water in eight hours, after which jury-rigged the ship and proceeded for the Sand-Heads, were we arrived on the 20th of November, all well on board.

This week came here from four of them reports, and he who wrote 600 maunds he have only 525; and other who wrote 400 maunds he have only 370; and who wrote 170 maunds he have only 115 maunds. Hurkaru.] EZEKIEL MUSHLEA.

The exquisite edict of the Directors against public Meetings published by authority as certified by one "Thomas Brown," needs no argument for its condemnation. It never had the shadow of a foundation in law or right.

The appeal against the Charter goes, of course, to Parliament. The petition contains an exposé of the defects of this measure, which we should be glad to see an attempt to answer by something more worthy of the name of argument, than abuse and insinuations against the motives of those who advocated that petition at the meeting. We are willing to allow full credit for all the good that really belongs to it, though that is infinitely over-rated by those who admire it, and does little honor to the intentions of the framers of the new India Bill. The grand charge against them is, that they have either wholly overlooked, or made entirely secondary, the interests of the people of India.

That they have made the interests of this people secondary is clear, as Mr. Dickens noticed, from the very preamble of the Act in which the object of an arrangement with the East India Company is placed first—that of the better government of India, last. The whole measure is, with few exceptions, an apt commentary upon this text. The measure avowedly proceeds on a sacrifice of principle to expediency. Before any compromise was made with the Company, and more especially one with which to saddle this country with a heavy additional burthen, justice required that the question whether the Company really had any claims against this territory or not, should be decided: the accounts should have been submitted to professional accountants having access to all documents essential to their object, and their report should have been taken to be final. Instead of which the Committees, confused by the conflicting evidences of the Melvilles and the Langtons, left the question as they found it, and Mr. Charles Grant cut the gordian knot by admitting claims which we believe, have no foundation in justice: our settled conviction is that territory is not indebted to commerce, but at least before this country, with an actual deficit in the revenue to a very large amount, after half-batta and various other clippings, is saddled with a heavy additional burthen, that never ought to have been for ever set at rest. The speakers at the meeting have ably taken to pieces the Whig Charter, and the petitioners have placed on record against it in the petition, objections which we repeat, we believe, to be irrefutable. We confine ourselves therefore to a point of some importance on which we differ from some of the speakers. Both Mr. Turton and Mr. Dickens expressed an opinion in favour of retaining the East India Company as an instrument of government for India. From that opinion we have always dissented and do still dissent. Our reasons for this view of the case have been so often stated that there is no form of words in which we could put them that would not be a repetition, we will take the liberty therefore of re-stating them in the very words used by us in the Chronicle of August 17, 1833, in the conclusion of the article on Mr. Grant's arrangement and compromise. After speaking of the deficit of near half a million which would still remain, according to our estimate, after the completion of his financial scheme, we then observed:—

"Yet in the teeth of this enormous deficit, Mr. GRANT and the Court of Directors look abroad only: look to INDIA as the inexhaustible milch cow, and none of all the parties concerned appear to dream for an instant of looking at home for any relief, by means of that rigid economy and cutting down of superfluous establishments, which the whole of them are at all times eager enough to preach, if not to practise. It never seemingly occurs to any one to enquire, by what right, save of the strongest—under what colour of decency—through what pretext of justice, or from what semblance of utility, England persists in saddling this country with the continued and most intolerable expense of two distinct Governments at home, in addition to the only really needful Government, that on the spot? Surely in these enlightened times, with a local and vigilant press, with free resort and settlement of Europeans, and with many contemplated legislative reforms, it is high time to relax the vigour of that old passion for ruling India in all the foolish minutiæ of administrative detail from a distance of 15,000 miles, while the Local Government is to be strictly one of doubled delegation, the mere mouthpiece of the prone-to-meddling, inexperienced, and little-interested Legislators and Ministers of the India House—themselves scarcely better than delegates under the superior meddlers of the India Board.

"Many and multiplying as the inconveniences and evils are of this mania for delegated rule peculiar to the East India Company's possession, its inordinate expense is one of the most crying. This original sin—this Æthiopian tache, meets one in a thousand shapes and forms ridiculous, vexatious, and useless, beginning with the absurd extravagance of troops of copyists, and their countless folios of frivolous diaries and endless dispatches, and followed up by the enormous and wasteful regiments of functionaries—minor and major—in the City and in Westminster! Is it of the things impossible—absolutely impossible—that one of the two Establishments might be saved altogether? Is it contrary to the "eternal fitness of things" that the little Board at Whitehall, which costs not a tithe of the other, should, with a moderate addition of workmen from the great City House, do the work of both? Why not let the Chairs be named by the Crown?—in other words, Mr. Grant and Mr. Holt Mackenzie preside over a conclave, sufficiently numerous, of potent, grave and reverend Astells, Campbells, Marjoribankes, Alexanders, Bailies, Edmonstones, &c. &c. As much work at least, we should think, a compressed establishment of the sort might get through, as would be of any real utility to India and England. The saving would apparently go far towards filling the vast deficit in the ways and means of India; and surely such an experiment is at least well worth the trial. It is worth it, indeed, were it only for the honest face with which the Governments abroad might in that case be exhorted by their collaborateurs at Home, to strain every nerve yet unexhausted, of prudent economy, so as to complete the remaining work and fill up the rest of the hideous financial deficit."—Hurkaru.

Calcutta, December, 1834.

On the motion of Mr. Clarke, the Sheriff was called to the Chair.

Mr. Turton, in moving the first resolution, addressed the Meeting to the following effect. Gentlemen, I rise with no small degree of pride and exultation to offer to your acceptance a resolution which will, I trust, have the effect of putting an end to the restrictions which have for some years past been imposed upon the Press in this country,—restrictions which are as unjust in point of law as they are impolitic in their nature. It will be in the recollection of most of those who now hear me, that in the year 1823, certain regulations were passed against the liberty of the Press by the Government—that that liberty had never been enjoyed here in its full extent, I am willing to concede. I allow that there had been a previous censorship; that is well known to all, and that that had been repealed by the Marquis of Hastings is equally well known. But, Gentlemen, it was during the short period of the power of a temporary Governor-General, that those who saw danger in certain publications that had gone forth to the world, (or, as I believe is more nearly the truth, made the imaginary danger a pretence for a line of conduct which they found convenient on other grounds) came forward to propose a regulation, under the sanction of that temporary Governor-General, which should have the effect of bridling the tongues, and checking the pens, of all those whose remarks upon the policy and the acts of the Government they found disagreeable. So far what I have stated must be familiar to you, but it may not be equally in the recollection of all who now hear me, that simultaneously with this regulation, which applied to Calcutta, another regulation was passed for the purpose of imposing fetters upon the Press in the interior. Gentlemen, as far as my humble efforts can be of any avail, it is my purpose this-day to obtain the repeal of both those regulations. (Loud Cheers.) When I shall bring to your notice, or recall to your recollection, the terms of those two regulations, I think you will have no great difficulty in seeing what was the real object of those who passed them, and to what an extent they would have carried their restrictions had their power been commensurate to their wishes—they did carry them as far as they were able in Calcutta, but here there was a check upon them, for in order to give validity to their regulation, it was necessary that it should be registered in the Supreme Court. To what an extent they would have proceeded, had it not been for such a check, you may divine from seeing to what an extent they actually did proceed in the interior, where there was no limit to their power. The first regulation was, generally, to impose upon all persons, being proprietors of periodical publications, the necessity of obtaining a previous licence, which licence might at any time be withdrawn. It is not necessary I should trouble you by reading this Regulation at length, but I will read a kind of comment upon it by the Government itself, the day after it was registered in the Supreme Court, which will assist you in forming a judgment as to the motives of those who were concerned in passing it. On the 7th of April, 1823, the following order was issued in the Government Gazette:—

FORT WILLIAM, APRIL 5, 1823.

"The Governor-General in Council, with reference to the Bye-Law passed on the 14th ultimo, and registered in the Supreme Court on the 4th instant, deems it proper to notify to the Proprietors and Editors of Newspapers and other Periodical Works, as specified in the aforesaid Bye-Law, that the publication in any such Paper or Periodical Works of matter coming under any of the following heads, will subject them to be deprived of the Licence under which such Paper or other Periodical Work may be conducted."

That, Gentlemen, is the first paragraph. You know it is customary at the convivial Meetings in this Hall, whether held in the pious reign of George 3d or in that of George 4th, or in the brighter and more liberal reign of William 4th, the first thing you do after the dinner is over, and grace said, of course, is to drink the health of the king with all the honors; and it seems, that the enactors of this notable Regulation have followed your very excellent example, for when they come to impose restrictions upon the Press, the first bolt they level is aimed at "declamatory or contumelious reflections against the King or any of the members of the royal family." (Much laughter.) I am sure I don't know whether such thing ever was published here, but at all events we see that the first object of the Indian Government of that day was to preserve intact the reputation of his Majesty and the royal family. (Laughter.) Then comes—

"Observations or Statements touching the character, constitution, measures or orders of the Court of Directors, or the public Authorities in England, connected with the Government of India, or the character, constitution, measures or orders of [illegible] Governments, impugning the motives of such Authorities or Governments, [illegible] tending to bring them into hatred or excite resistance to their orders, or to [illegible] authority."

Now I will venture to say, that it ever was a [illegible] in Calcutta calculated to touch the character of the Government authorities, or to bring them into [illegible] or contempt, or to excite resistance to their [illegible] or to weaken their authority, it was this comment which they published upon their own odious [illegible]tion. (Loud cheers.) But, Gentlemen, is it to be tolerated, that we are not to have the liberty of commenting upon the acts, motives and designs of the Government under which we live, provided it be done in a fair and honest manner, without exposing the party who makes such comments to the risk of total ruin! Then comes—"observations or statements of the above description relative to allied or friendly native powers, their ministers or representatives." So at this present time, and my friend Mr. Adam hears me, you have not the power of making any comment upon the conduct of the Nizam, or of the minister of the King of Oude, or of the Regent of Gwalior, or of the Ambassadors of Runjeet Sing! (Loud laughter.) Yes, Gentlemen, you are at this moment in such a state of thraldom, that any man is liable to have his means of livelihood taken from him, because he has dared to comment upon the behaviour of the Ambassador of

Runjeet Sing! Then it goes on—"defamatory or contumelious remarks or offensive insinuations levelled against the Governor-General, the Governors or Commanders-in-Chief."—I have heard of offensive insinuations levelled against Commanders-in-Chief, though not proceeding from that source of all abominations, the Indian Press—"the Members of Council or the Judges of his Majesty's Courts at any of the Presidencies, or the Bishop of Calcutta! (great laughter:) and publications of any description tending to expose them to hatred, obloquy or contempt; also libellous or abusive reflections and insinuations against the public officers of Government." Now I will venture to say, there are many officers of Government who never knew that this shield was held up to protect them from public obloquy, and who would utterly repudiate any such kind of protection. (Loud cheers.) The Judges of His Majesty's Courts and the Bishop of Calcutta must also feel complimented by such an implied tribute to their merits. Then we have—"Discussions having a tendency to create alarm or suspicion among the Native population of any intended official interference with their religious opinions and observances, and irritating and insulting remarks on their peculiar usages and modes of thinking on religious subjects."

Gentlemen, did you ever hear the equal of this first you are told you must not comment upon the constitution of the Court of Directors—Why, since this Regulation was passed, the constitution of the East India Company has been entirely altered! next you are told you must not discuss any question regarding the peculiar usages and modes of thinking on religious subjects, prevalent among the natives—why since that regulation was published, a regulation has been passed to put an end to one of the native rites, considered by one large party among them to be closely connected with their religious principles! That is the situation in which you are placed, and is it one to be tamely endured! Next comes a rather sweeping clause—"The republication from English or other papers of passages coming under the foregoing heads." So you must not hear any thing that has been published in any of the English papers which might by possibility expose to contempt any of the constituted authorities—Sir Richard Birnie for example. (Loud laughter.) I remember George IV., when he was [illegible] was called by Leigh Hunt a corpulent [illegible]ty—why, if this were to be transplanted into the columns of the Englishman, Mr. Stocqueler would have a good chance of being deprived of his [illegible] (Loud laughter.) Then comes "Defamatory libels, tending to disturb the peace, happiness, publications, tending to disturb the peace, happiness, and good order of society. "Anonymous appeals to the public, relative to grievance of a professional or official nature, alleged to have been sustained by public officers in the service of his Majesty or the Honorable Company." So if any man thinks he suffers under a grievance, he is not to be allowed to have recourse to that which is very frequently the only medium through which he can obtain redress—at many up-country stations, to debar a man from making public his grievances, is often tantamount to denying him all redress whatever. I think, Gentlemen, you will consider what you have already heard to be tolerably startling—but now comes what crowns the whole—here is the deliberate opinion of the Government of that day, as to what is the effect of these rules, an opinion gravely published by them in an official document—"The foregoing rules impose no irksome restraints on the publication and discussion of any matters of general interest." (Roars of Laughter.) Really, Gentlemen, I do not wonder at your mirth, for it is utterly impossible to preserve one's gravity in reading this. Impose no irksome restraints on the publication and discussion of any matters of general interest! Why there is hardly any sort of matter of general interest, the publication and discussion of which is not prohibited! No irksome restraint to the community, what could they mean? If they meant that the rules imposed no irksome restraints on the Government, it is all clear enough! And now let us see what was the practical result of this—this which was said to impose no irksome restraint on the discussion of any matter of public interest, Mr. Buckingham was the first to suffer. He carried on at this time a journal in this city. No, I am not in error. It was Mr. Buckingham's case which gave rise to the enactment—and what was this offence? He published a little satirical poem in which some allusion was made to the letters V I C E, the initials of the United East India Company marked on certain penknives, ink, pounce and paper—for this he was pounced upon, and was actually deported for publishing a frivolous, and to say the truth, not an over-and-above good jeu d'esprit upon the Secretary to the Stationary Committee. What has been the result of that? Why, ten years afterwards the East India Company are compelled by the British Parliament, at length aroused to a sense of justice, to make remuneration for the wrong they have inflicted. I believe the bill has not actually passed, but there is the report of a committee, and that a Bill will follow there can be no doubt. In a later stage of these proceedings, I shall have occasion to point out to you, in observing upon the Act of Parliament, which is entitled an Act for the better Government of India, that it is not from the East India Company that this remuneration must come, but from the pockets of the inhabitants of India. So much for the justice and policy of that proceeding. Now let us come to the next case—it was that of Mr. Arnott. He was sent home—I really am unable to explain to you why, although I was concerned in that transaction as his Counsel, but I think you will easily conceive, that a public journalist, under the restrictions of such rules as I have read, could hardly avoid giving an advantage to those who wished to send him home. Well, he was ruined and he afterwards received remuneration: such was the effect of that proceeding. Mr. Fair's case I take to be tantamount to these; for although the Court at Bombay refused to sanction a regulation, similar to that which the Judges of this Court allowed to be registered here, on the ground that it was contrary to the laws of England, yet they applied to the case of Mr. Fair, a clause in the Act of the 53d, George III., which allows of deportation, and they actually ruined him, by making use of another instrument, which, though different in form, was, if possible, still more tyrannical and unjust. I see near me two gentlemen who have also suffered in the cause. Will you believe that the Government could make it a condition with the proprietor of a public newspaper, for their continuing his licence, that a certain individual should not be employed as Editor—that they should have a veto, as it were, upon the Editorship. And yet with the proprietors of the Bengal Chronicle, the Government made a bargain that a particular gentleman should not remain the editor! There is another gentleman near me, to whose labors an entire stop was also put for the time, and upon whom the heaviest injury was inflicted. I believe, the two gentlemen to whom I have alluded, will not object to my mentioning their names, I mean Mr. Sutherland and Mr. Adam. Thus then I bring down the acts of the Government from 1823 to 1828, when the last exercise of this power was had recourse to, at the close of the Deputy Governorship of that day, Lord Combermere being the Vice-President. Can it then be said that this law is so obsolete, so unlikely ever to be exercised again, that it does not matter whether it be repealed or not? Does it not rather behove us, while we have a Governor-General under whom we have enjoyed every practical liberty of the Press, (loud cheers) to solicit him, now he is on the eve of leaving us, that the last act of blessing he will confer upon this country shall be the repeal of a law, which may be a fearful engine of oppression in the hands of those who have less consideration for liberty than himself? (Loud cheering.) This is the object of the resolution I am about to propose.

Something, Gentlemen, has been lately published with regard to a distinction between the English and the Native Press. It is the latter which the other regulation I have mentioned, tends more particularly to controul. Of that regulation I will read you the preamble alone, for it is unnecessary to read more, in order to show the object of the Government of that day. It is regulation III. of 1823, passed by the Governor-General in Council, on the 5th of April, one day after the regulation for Calcutta was registered in the Supreme Court.

"A Regulation for preventing the establishment of Printing Presses without Licence, and for restraining, under certain circumstances, the circulation of printed Books and Papers: Passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 5th April 1823, corresponding with the 24th Chyte 1229, Bengal era; the 10th Chyte 1230, Fussly; the 25th Chyte 1230, Willaity; the 9th Chyte 1880, Sumbut; and the 22d Rujub 1238, Higera.

"Preamble.—WHEREAS it is deemed expedient to prohibit within the territories immediately subordinate to the Presidency of Fort William, the future establishment of printing presses, and the use of any such presses or of types or other materials for printing, except with the previous sanction and licence of Government, and under suitable provisions, to guard against abuse; and whereas it may be judged proper to prohibit the circulation, within the Territories aforesaid, of particular newspapers, printed books, or papers of any description, whether the same may be printed in the town of Calcutta or elsewhere;—the following rules have been enacted, to be in force from the date of their promulgation within the territories immediately subordinate to the presidency of Fort William."

This is a regulation, Gentlemen, for restraining not merely the printing, but the circulation of books or papers whatever, in any language whatever! not merely in the vernacular langua[illegible] the country, but all printed books and papers in every language, wherever printed and published! There is, Gentlemen, at this moment, an absolute power in the Government, to put its veto upon the circulation of any book, upon any one subject whatever, whether it contain offensive passages or not, and this without any responsibility whatever! I am sure that whatever difference of opinion there may be in the minds of different individuals, as to the propriety of any restrictions on the Native Press, there will, and can, be no difference of opinion, that a regulation so offensive to all the principles of freedom and good Government, ought not any longer to disgrace the Indian statute book. Have we the power of fettering Government as to any regulations they may choose to pass, for the purpose of knowing who are the parties responsible for any publication that may issue from the Press? That must be left in the hands of the Government; but I do ask that if there shall be any desire to pass any regulation, imposing further restrictions than those which are imposed by the common law, and by common sense and by common justice, that at all events, that law may not be carried to the extent either of a previous censorship or a licencing system. I do ask that, and I say, that is the least we can ask from any Government that makes the slightest pretension to enlightened principles. (Loud cheers). But lest I may be mistaken here or elsewhere, I say distinctly, that I make common cause with the Native Press. (Loud cheers.) I know of nothing that should prevent me. I know nothing of any superior firmness and courage in the native character, which should make them dangerous, in circumstances in which Englishmen are not dangerous. I know of no principle for the Government of this country, except that which extends to all equal blessings. (Loud cheers.) I am satisfied that, if we give to this country an enlightened and a liberal Government, if we afford its inhabitants opportunities of knowing the laws which may be passed for their direction, and opportunities of representing their grievances, and of being heard fairly and honestly, we shall find none but loyal subjects; and I believe it will be found by Natives, as well as by Europeans, the common interest of all, to support the British supremacy. On this ground I make common cause with the Natives to-day. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, what has been the result of the liberty which the Native Press has lately practically enjoyed? Has anything appeared in the Native papers likely to bring the Government into hatred or contempt? I declare, as I have already said, I know of nothing ever printed or published by any press, so calculated to bring the Government into hatred and contempt as this most odious regulation. Gentlemen, when I rose I did not intend to detain you at the length I have done. I have no intention of going into any general discussion on the advantage of a Free Press. The subject has been before you for the last twelve years, in two different characters, the character of restriction, and the character of enjoyment of liberty. When it was restricted, was there any one who did not feel the effects of that restriction? Since it has been practically free, have those who govern the country sustained any injury from it? I ask if the Government is not now more honored, if its laws are not more observed, and if it does not live more in the hearts of the natives than when Mr. Adam passed that regulation? I think, Gentlemen, I shall have your unanimous concurrence in the resolution I am about to submit to you, which is—

"That whilst this meeting acknowledges with gratitude the practical liberty which the press of Calcutta has enjoyed under the administration of the present Governor-General, yet it is highly expedient that laws so repugnant to those of England as the Regulation passed against the press by the Bengal Government in [illegible] 1823, which may be so readily applied to evil [illegible] in the hands of an arbitrary Governor-General, and under which so many individuals have already suffered, should be repealed.

(Mr. Turton sat down amidst loud cheering.)

The Resolution was seconded by MR. E. M. GORDON, of the Civil Service, in the following address:—

MR. CHAIRMAN,—I rise with unspeakable satisfaction to second the resolution moved by Mr. Turton. All my life long I have been a firm, an unalterable friend to the most perfect freedom of discussion; and I am proud of the opportunity now offered, of making this avowal within the hearing of the Government,—in the presence of this meeting,—in the face of all the world. There are no conceivable circumstances under which I should consider it to be my duty to conceal the fact, that I am the uncompromising advocate of a free press.

Could I at any time be brought to suppress the public acknowledgment of my opinion on this subject—could I be tempted to evade, or back out of the open confession of this my political faith, I should look upon myself as the most contemptible of hypocrites, and deserving of the scorn of all honest men. The resolution has been so ably supported by my learned friend, (if he will permit me so to call him:) the folly of the existing Press Laws has been so powerfully assailed by his ridicule, that little is left for me to say in seconding that resolution. There are, however, some observations of a general nature, connected with the encouragement that ought to be given to the diffusion of knowledge, which, though they seem to be somewhat underrated by the mover, appear to me important, and to which, accordingly, I would call the special attention of all whom I have the honor to address. But before I do so, I beg to offer one or two remarks, touching the position I now personally occupy. I have the honor to be a member of the Civil Service, and it is precisely because I do belong to that body, and not from a foolish desire of display, that I am anxious upon this occasion to claim for myself and those of my brethren who agree with me, an unrestricted right to liberty of thought and speech. I am desirous of asserting boldly and fearlessly, but with perfect respect, and I trust without the risk of contradiction, that men ought not as servants to forfeit their claims to the just confidence of the Government, because they take a part in the proceedings of this day. A short time ago, and within these walls, there was an expression used by a gentleman, high in office, that it is the duty of servants to be humble. It is very far from my wish to misrepresent the civilian in question, and I do not suppose, that in employing the phrase referred to, he intended to preach up the duty of servility. But to prevent misconception, it may not be amiss, if I endeavour very shortly to state, how far the Government may reasonably require obedience from its servants, and where the duty of obedience on the part of servants may be fairly considered to stop. It will readily be allowed, that, in every country, some system of subordination, some scheme of discipline, must be kept up amongst the functionaries of the government. All cannot be masters,—each cannot be a law unto himself. An attempt to govern upon such a principle would lead to inevitable anarchy. What then may be regarded as a just practical rule, to be followed by servants towards the government they serve? It seems to me to be this.—When the government, on any occasion, has finally resolved to carry any plan or law into execution, it is the duty of the servant, to whom such an order may be communicated, to obey, or to resign his post. I speak not of extreme cases. It is impossible that the Indian Government, whose members are Englishmen of the 19th century, could promulgate any orders of a notoriously violent and sanguinary character. This is so exceedingly improbable, that I do not take it into account at all. What I allude to, is the final judgment come to, in matters about which there might be a reasonable difference of opinion amongst men; and I have no hesitation in saying, that in such cases, when the decree of the Government after mature deliberation has once gone forth, the only alternative left for the servants is obedience, or resignation. But before the time of this ultimate alternative arrives, there is an intermediate interval, during which it appears to be the bounden duty of the servants of Government, to bring before its notice, openly and fairly, and without reserve, all those facts and reasons, which in their judgment show the folly, or the injustice, or the inefficacy of any proposed plan or law. In making such a representation, far be it from me to say, that the servants of Government are not to use the language of respect, the style of conciliation, the modest and unassuming manner of subordinates when addressing the constituted authorities of the land. To pursue any other course would imply not only a want of wisdom, but apparently an indifference about the success of the cause they advocated. If it is true, in the language of scripture, that "a soft answer turneth away wrath," it is equally indisputable, that an insolent, overbearing, or forward mode of addressing those whom we would bring over to our own way of thinking, so far from conciliating, has the tendency still farther to estrange them from us and from our opinions. This is so obvious, that that man's sincerity might plausibly be doubted, who when professing to make converts on any subjects, defeated the end he had in view by his offensive mode of expressing himself. If then by humility as the duty of servants, it is simply meant, that they should observe a respectful, conciliatory, and modest tone when making representations to the Government, I subscribe with all my heart to the justness of the doctrine. But if it be assumed in any quarter, however high, that subordinates are necessarily incapable of giving wholesome advice to their rulers: if it be held, that the only province of servants is to yield an unquestioning, an unhesitating, an unconditional, and an instantaneous obedience to those placed in authority over them: if this is what is to be regarded as proper humility, then I beg to protest against such humility, and to declare before God and man, that those who so act, are in my opinion, not only not doing their duty, but are guilty of the greatest of crimes. Nay, I will go farther, and assert, without the fear of contradiction, that if at any time the government of this country, has been betrayed into acts of questionable wisdom, or doubtful justice, it has been owing in a great degree to this mistaken, ignorant, and unprincipled subserviency on the part of its own functionaries. The principles I have been laying down, as to the extent and the limits of a public functionary's obedience in official life, are of easy application, as regards the course he may pursue at a meeting such as is the present. If in his direct intercourse with Government, a fair and liberal latitude of opinion is conceded to a public servant, in all questions of proposed legislation, it surely cannot be contended, that he ought to be debarred from the privilege of uniting with his countrymen and native fellow subjects, in respectfully soliciting the attention of the Government to what he conscientiously believes to be the injurious tendency of any existing laws. That the Government does not desire to deprive its servants of such a privilege, is obvious from the fact, that several members of the service put their names to the requisition for leave to hold this meeting, and yet no intimation has been made to those who did so, that the Government considered them to be transgressing the legitimate bounds of a servant's obedience to the State. I have thought it proper to make these preliminary observations, that I may set myself right with Government, and that my motives in taking the part I now take may not be misinterpreted nor misunderstood. I now proceed to the business of the day.

In supporting a resolution like that which it has fallen to my lot to second, my great difficulty lies in attempting to divine what objections can be urged against it. The propriety of encouraging the growth of knowledge, ranks in my mind amongst self-evident truths. To tell a friend that temperance contributes to good health, or that a life of honesty will gain respect, appears not to be a more superfluous task than his seems to be, who has to enforce the proposition that it is beneficial to man, to increase the sum, and to extend the diffusion of knowledge. Unfortunately all men have not always been of this opinion, else it would not have been necessary for us to assemble here to-day, but I cannot help thinking, that the existing Government will agree with the inhabitants, and will by its acts, far more effectually second the resolution moved by my learned friend than I can by any speech of mine. Those who are unfriendly to an increase either in the amount, or the diffusion of knowledge, may be ranged under two classes. The first are they who extend this unfriendliness to all countries; the second are they who professing to be the friends of a progression of knowledge every where else, would yet have it to stand still here. Of the first, there is, I grieve to say, a very numerous body, who from their own entire ignorance, are not very capable of discoursing on the effects of knowledge, Walter Scott tells us, that "Sir Everard Waverley had never been himself a student, and like his sister Miss Rachel, held the doctrine, that idleness is incompatible with reading of any kind, and that the mere tracing of the alphabetical characters with the eye, is in itself a useful and meritorious task, without scrupulously considering what ideas or doctrines they may happen to convey." The worthy Baronet and his maiden sister take the precedence of the order of persons I allude to, for these do not even reach the dignity of 'tracing the alphabetical characters with the eye." Steeped in profound ignorance, happy in slothful listlessness, they seem to live upon the line,

"Where ignorance is bliss 't were folly to be wise."

To such people, if they could but hit upon it, and carry it in their heads, this verse would be what ale was to the Scotch lawyer's Clerk in the novel,—it would be "meat, drink and sleep, bed, board and washing" to them. Leaving these worthies to sleep and fatten upon the ale of ignorance, I would speak of those, who not themselves absolutely destitute of knowledge, would yet very sparingly communicate this gift to others. How to describe such men is no easy matter; what to say to them is more difficult still. Wise men I cannot call them: men possessed of ——— "a power of mind

Foreseeing and presaging, from the depth Of knowledge past or present," it is impossible to allow them to be; men animated by a strong, ever-stirring, and enlightened spirit of benevolence, they certainly are not: yet I am loath to think that they are actuated by pure selfishness. I would rather infer, that their minds, weak by nature, are filled with dark and vague apprehensions respecting the effects of knowledge universally diffused: that they are encircled by a dim foreboding which makes them tremble: that having nothing of the bold, nothing of the joyous temperament about them, every vision before them and around them is a ——— "dreary plain, forlorn and wild,

The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of the livid flames
Casts pale and dreadful."———

It would be vain to attempt to prove to such men the groundlessness of their fears; it would be useless to tell them, that the real danger lies in the existence of little knowledge, or no knowledge: but if any thing can make an impression on them it must be the truth (which has often been declared, and which cannot too often be declared) that do what we will, we cannot possibly stop the progress of knowledge. In some of the more enlightened countries in the world, in England in particular, the cause of knowledge has advanced so far, has become so strong, that it may fairly bid defiance to its enemies. It is like the house built upon a rock. "The rain may descend, the floods may come, the winds may blow, and beat upon this house; and it shall fall not, for it is built upon a rock."

It is needless to inquire particularly, to what causes it has been owing, that knowledge has thus been advanced and diffused? Some have favored it from considerations of a religious nature; some perhaps from political party spirit; some from vanity and fashion; and many, I trust, from a pure desire to spread as far as possible, that pleasure which themselves feel from a gratification of the love of knowledge, and from a wish to raise their fellow creatures as high as possible in the scale of being. But from whatever cause or combination of causes proceeding, knowledge as "on a rock transfixed," shall stand secure, unless some moral apoplexy, shall strike to the dust, at one fell blow, the whole great mind of civilized man. Nothing short of such a moral miracle can injure knowledge: no human efforts can move her from her position: as well might the men of science with all their instruments and a place whereon to put them, attempt to move the globe from its orbit: as well might the royal hand be uplifted to stay the waves of the coming tide.

The other class of men whom I have alluded to, and to whom I beg to direct the attention of this meeting, consists of those, who are opposed to the diffusion of knowledge in this country. As respects other lands, these persons are ready to admit the all-powerful effects of knowledge. If asked, why they feel a just pride in human capabilities? They point to the countless manifestations of human genius,—to the innumerable proofs, the mind of man has given, of its power to add to the sum of our physical and intellectual enjoyments, and to raise us in the scale of moral being. They own too, that this striking superiority of civilized over savage man is owing to increased knowledge, and to increased knowledge alone. Following up this system of interrogation, were we to inquire of the persons I am speaking of what cause more than any other has made man in modern times an object of wonder? They would answer, the invention of printing? And why? Because by increasing prodigiously the facility of diffusing knowledge, it has indirectly, but beyond calculation in amount, contributed to all subsequent discoveries. And why does the facility of diffusing knowledge lead to useful discoveries in physical and moral science?

For two plain reasons:—1st. By extending the field of mental exertion, it brings a greater force, a larger amount of mind, to bear upon knowledge: and 2dly, this extended sphere of exertion most powerfully stimulates the labours of all, and especially of those whose desires and whose talents qualify them to extend the bounds of useful knowledge.

[Surely no one can doubt the truth of these principles. The intellectual achievements of one individual mind, unaided by past and contemporary light, would be as poor and miserable, when compared with the prodigious effects that have been produced by universal combination; as would be the physical condition of the inhabitants of a barren and isolated soil, when contrasted with that of a rich country, to the comfort of whose people every region of the earth furnished its quota of supplies! Equally unquestionable is it, that a large field of exertion acts as a mighty stimulus to all, not to relax in useful labour. Does it not feed and strengthen that most powerful of all passions the desire of fame? It is in vain to declaim against this passion: it is a part of the nature of man which we could not eradicate if we would, and which we ought not to attempt to eradicate even if we could. By this passion, even the most moderately gifted, are constrained to bring their share of useful knowledge to the general stock; and by this passion the lights of the world are supported under all privations, and the countless ills of life, and prevailed on to continue that unremitted toil, which is to delight, and to instruct, and to elevate their fellow men to the end of time. In the language of Milton,

"Fame is the spur which the clear spirit doth raise,
To scorn delights, and live laborious days."

Akin to the love of fame, and mixed up with it, but still separate from it, is the passion so constantly found in energetic minds, namely, that of desiring that their own opinions and emotions should be strongly felt by others: in the language of Byron "to make their own, the minds of others." It is this passion, as Southey justly observes, in his life of Wesley, that is at the bottom of all the religious reforms that from time to time take place in the world. This passion must deeply animate the minds of philosophers, moralists, and theologians, if they would rouse their fellow creatures from that apathy into which most men are apt to fall. That this passion has been beneficial to man no one I think can for a moment doubt. It has, in fact, at different times, kept the human race from relapsing into total darkness. The misfortune is, that this passion is not always accompanied by great reasoning powers, and in ages of ignorance it propagates error along with truth. Unaided by the controuling influence of an unerring judgment, it communicates together with the good some of the worst passions of our nature—an impatient intolerance of difference of opinion,—a fierce, angry, and fiery zeal. Now by increasing the facility of the diffusion of knowledge, and consequently by increased knowledge, the zealous but weak propagandists (to use a word of Southey's) are disarmed of their sting, because their hearers and readers are better enabled to separate truth from error; and because the ascendancy over the general mass is more likely to be withdrawn from the feeble, and lodged with the powerful-minded in the community.]

NOTE.—The passage enclosed in brackets, in Mr. Gordon's speech, that gentleman, fancying he had tired the patience of his hearers, purposely omitted to deliver; but considering it important to the views he entertained, he afterwards inserted it in the report.

In all respects then, the diffusion of knowledge, as regards other countries, is allowed to be useful, and those who are opposed to such a diffusion here, profess a willingness to stretch forth and open the hand of encouragement to every institution, to every instrument, that shall widen the bounds of knowledge in other lands. And why is this benevolent profession not extended to India? I know not. I am left to conjecture alone. Is it asserted that the natives of India are incapable of receiving knowledge? That they consist of one large mass of leaden dulness, through which the light cannot penetrate? Were we absolutely without experience on this subject, the assertion would still be altogether an unwarrantable one; it would be coming to a conclusion without inquiring into facts; it would be giving a verdict first, and then examining evidence. But it so happens, that the assertion is contradicted by experience. So far as education has been scantily meted out to them, the native youth of India have shewn an aptitude for the acquisition of knowledge, and a love of it, that fairly entitle them to compete with an equal number of the youth of any other country in the world. And if this is so, it surely cannot be denied that the perfect freedom of the press must powerfully contribute to the extension of knowledge amongst the natives of India. I am far from saying that the press ought to be a substitute for a widely diffused and well-organised system of education, but would it not prove a powerful auxiliary to such a system? Is it not by means of the periodical and daily press that men can extend their views beyond the walls of their own house, or the small bounds of the parish in which they live, and know what is going on in other parts of the same country, and throughout the world? Is not the periodical press the great engine of literature in modern times? Above all, is not a free press a powerful support of a system of good government? This point was well urged by Mr. Turton in his opening speech. A spirit of free discussion, through the press, is favourable to good government; 1st, because by just praise, it stimulates the rulers and their executive officers to give an earnest attention to the interests of the community; 2dly, by censuring foolish and unjust legislation in the governing body, and carelessness, abuses of power, or incapacity in the servants of Government, it operates as a salutary warning to all that are invested with authority. This leads me to notice an objection, which I am ashamed to say, I have sometimes heard made to a free press. It is said India is not a free country, but a despotism, and the principles that may be applicable elsewhere are not so here. To this I would reply, that there are two senses in which the word despotism may be used. One is, when we speak of a Government, in the composition of which popular elements are excluded. In this sense the Government of India is certainly a despotism, but this by no means excludes the notion, that the Government may feel the strongest desire to promote the happiness and improvement of its subjects. The second sense is, when we allude to a Government which is theoretically and practically tyrannical, which governs for the sole purpose of enriching the few at the expense of the many. If we would uphold a Government of this kind, the sooner we put an end to every species of free discussion the better. But a desire to govern India upon such principles is disavowed, I am sure, by every Member of the existing Government; it is disavowed by the Court of Directors; and it is disavowed by the British Parliament. It is said there is danger in a free press. I would ask whether we who contend for freedom, desire the absolute licentiousness of the press? Do we say, men may write with impunity whatever they please? No: all we contend for is, that men who are charged with having written or printed that which ought to be punished, shall be tried, before they are visited with punishment. I for one, Sir, cannot allow that there is the slightest danger to be apprehended to British Supremacy from granting a perfect freedom to the Native press. I am satisfied, the Natives of India generally prefer our rule, with all its faults, to that of any Asiatic sovereignty that preceded it. If we look to the history of India as far as authentic records reach, we shall find the property of subjects to have been absolutely insecure: that men were liable to be plundered continually, either by their own princes or by foreign invaders; and the best proof of this is the fact, that in former times the custom universally prevailed of concealing treasure under ground. So desirous are the natives of Bengal to uphold British Supremacy, that in the late Pindarry war it was common, for men in their domestic circles, to offer up prayers for the success of the British arms. This fact is openly stated in the petition, which several respectable natives presented to the Supreme Court, against the press regulations of 1823. It is notorious, too, that a considerable portion of the public debt in India is due to native creditors. But it is said the press is practically free. This absurd position was so well assailed by my learned friend, that it requires no additional attack from me. I admit, the press is now practically free; and I trust it will not be in the power of any future Governor, permanently to disturb that freedom. What then? we ask for more. We say that so important a right should not be held by sufferance. We say that a rash, ill-tempered, wrong-headed Governor-General may commit a great deal of temporary injury. In the first place by withdrawing a licence, all the subscribers to a newspaper are deprived at once of a source of rational amusement and instruction. This may be a trifling matter to a Governor-General, but it is no trifling matter to the subscribers, and I submit, that so much power ought not to be left to the caprice of one man. In the second place, by withdrawing a licence a Governor-General deprives editors of their means of livelihood and proprietors of their property. Did not Messrs. Sutherland and Adam (whom I am proud to call my friends) lose some 10 or 12,000 rupees, as well as a temporary deprivation of livelihood, by the violent act of my Lord Combermere in 1827? To his Lordship 10,000 rupees might be a small matter, wallowing as he was then in ill-gotten wealth, by the plunder of Bhurtpore, one of the most disgraceful transactions in the history of India. We went against Bhurtpore in support of the legitimate heir, with whose father we were on terms of the strictest friendship, and to put down an usurper, the brother of the deceased ruler. We took the place, and gave it up to indiscriminate plunder! Lord Combermere, through corrupt influence with his grace of Wellington, (for I can ascribe it to no other cause), succeeded in getting an immense amount of private property, made over to the army of which he was Commander-in-Chief, and that likewise, in opposition to the strongest remonstrance from the political agent, Sir right to touch a single rupee. To I . Comber.

I say, 10,000 rupees might be insignificant, but my honest friends it might make all the difference between the situation of being able to command the common comforts of life and that of utter destitution.
I sincerely hope the time is not far off, when no man on earth shall have it in his power to commit an act of such gross and abominable injustice.

I have nothing more to say but to thank the meeting for the indulgence with which it has listened to me, and to express an earnest wish that the efforts the inhabitants are this day making may not be in vain. [This speech was frequently interrupted by bursts of applause and the speaker sat down amidst loud cheering from all.]

The Resolution proposed by Mr. TURTON having been carried unanimously, Mr. DICKENS addressed the meeting to the following effect:—

Gentlemen, the Resolution just submitted to you, having been unanimously carried, it becomes my duty to propose, for your adoption, a petition framed in conformity with the sentiments expressed in that resolution. Before, however, I proceed to do so, and to explain to you what that petition is, I may take advantage of the speech you have just heard from Mr. Gordon,—a speech abounding in just sentiments and sound reasons, well delivered, clothed in most eloquent language—to say that I am here in the performance of a duty, which I would most willingly have seen in the hands of some one better able to discharge it than myself. I disclaim for the class to which I belong, and to which it is my pride to belong, any desire to thrust themselves forward upon public notice. I claim for them your belief, that they would willingly cede the performance of these duties to others. I claim for them this construction of their conduct, and I claim it fearlessly, because no purpose of narrow or selfish ambition can be answered by their coming forward in this manner in this community, for in this country the performance of public duties, such as these, leads to nothing. A man can gain for himself no advantage by discharging them. He may injure, nay destroy, private and selfish interests—he may have, and assuredly he will have, the approbation of his own conscience—but no other reward can he have, except, indeed, that to which he has a clear right, the reward of public applause. This I think it right to say, in consequence of what has been stated elsewhere as to the motives of those who have called this meeting. (Loud cheers.) It has been said that the time is ill chosen—I say that the time has been well chosen—there has been no other time, within the period of my own residence here, that could have been so well chosen. For sometime past we have had rumours of great changes, and we have had reason to suppose that the whole power in this country would be entrusted, with little controul, to the hands of the local Government. This has at length been done. We have under this Governor-General in Council enjoyed a most liberal consideration for public rights—(loud cheers) and this Governor-General being on the eve of leaving the country, was it not a fitting and a useful opportunity for us to aid him in that, which perhaps, without such aid, he might not have found the opportunity, or had the power to do? (Loud cheers.) You will recollect that, though he be powerful, yet he wields but a delegated power, that he is responsible though not to the public, though it be but to a few, and those at a distance—that the measure which we think so wise, may not be viewed with much approbation by some of those to whom he may have to give an account of his conduct—that it may be necessary for him to be able to say to them, when stating what he has done, that the people of Calcutta had, in the strongest and most marked manner, and as a parting legacy of good

more than the preamble:—

"A RULE, ORDINANCE, and REGULATION for the Good Order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Fort William, in Bengal, made and passed by the Honourable the Governor-General in Council, of and for the Presidency of Fort William, in Bengal, the Fourteenth Day of March, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Twenty-Three.

Whereas, matters tending to bring the Government of this country, as by Law established, into hatred and contempt, and to disturb the peace, harmony, and good order of society, have of late been frequently printed and circulated in the Newspapers and other Papers published in Calcutta, for the prevention whereof it is deemed expedient to regulate by Law, the Printing and Publication within the Settlement of Fort William, in Bengal, of Newspapers, and of all Magazines, Registers, Pamphlets, and other Printed Books and Papers, in any language or character, published periodically, containing or purporting to contain public news, and intelligence or strictures on the acts, measures, and proceedings of Government, or any political events or transactions, whatsoever."

Then the enactment which follows, is an absolute prohibition to prevent the printing and publication of any such works, without licence, to be withdrawn at the pleasure of the Government, without cause assigned. If those mischiefs mentioned in the preamble had then any existence, I must apply the saying of the Roman Historian, "Ut olim flagitiis, sic, nunc legibus laboramus"—that if it be true such mischief ever existed, still the permanent remedy was worse. The other regulation, which was passed for the Mofussil, I may spare the meeting the trouble of reading. It is to the effect that no publication on any subject, within the whole compass of human thought, can be permitted to issue from the Native Press, or any book in any language be circulated, without the previous permission of Government; and if the attempt be made, the person who makes it, is subject to most heavy penalties. Need I waste argument upon such a subject in order to prove that it is unwise and unjust? I will proceed at once to the petition, and I think you will agree with me that in its objects it is moderate, and in its language sufficiently respectful:—

"TO THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA IN COUNCIL.

The Petition of the Inhabitants of Calcutta.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That on the 14th day of March, 1823, a law, entitled a "Rule, Ordinance and Regulation for the good order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Fort William, in Bengal, was made and passed by the Honorable the Governor-General in ay is, what the offence was, you do ate of things should continue? Or is it fit that a state of what is called law, where such things may again be possible, should continue? I humbly hope not, and I think not one of you but will agree with me it is unfit. The petition proceeds to say—

"That on the 5th April, 1823, the said Governor-General in Council also passed a regulation for the good Government of the interior of the Presidency of Fort William, in Bengal, numbered Regulation III., and entitled a Regulation for preventing the Establishment of Printing Presses without Licence, and for restraining under certain circumstances, the circulation of printed books and papers; which being intended to operate without the limits of Calcutta, was carried so far as to prohibit the printing of any books and papers whatsoever, unless previously licenced; and also the circulation of any printed books or other papers whatsoever, if prohibited by Government.

"That the preamble of the registered rule and regulation for the good order and civil government of Calcutta, recites that matters tending to bring the Government of this country, as by law established, into hatred and contempt and to disturb the peace, harmony and good order of society having of late been frequently printed and circulated in the newspapers, it is expedient to prevent such supposed mischief by regulating by law the publication of all printed books or papers published periodically; which expression "to regulate by law" meant, as plainly appears by the enactments which follow it, the prohibiting all such publications without previous licence, to be granted or withdrawn at the pleasure of Government, and without cause assigned.

"That the unregistered regulation for the rest of the Presidency simply recites that it is expedient to prohibit throughout its extent the future establishment of Printing Presses, and the use of any such Presses or of Types or other materials for Printing, except with the previous sanction and licence of Government, and under suitable provisions to guard against abuse.

"That your Petitioners humbly conceive that these laws, made to restrain the free expression of the thoughts of men, are unnecessary to the support of power in any country which is subject to the Crown of England,—and ruled in any degree by the maxims which ought to guide the conduct of Englishmen, that they are contrary to sound policy and to true wisdom; that they are not calculated to preserve the power of that Government, which has condescended to make use of them, but to impair it; that they are, in brief, not merely useless, but mischievous, and are degrading alike to those who imposed and those who have to obey them.

"That your Petitioners deem it superfluous in addressing the Governor-General of India in Council to enlarge upon the advantages that spring in free countries from the liberty of unlicenced-printing.

"That your Petitioners are fully aware of the arguments by which, in this country, in which a large native population is ruled by foreigners, few in number, but superior in knowledge, these restrictions have been and may again be defended.

"That these restrictions, in respect to publications in the English language, have been defended on the grounds that the number of Englishmen in this country is insignificant; that those who came hither, not in the service of the East India Company, came hither by sufference and under licence, and had therefore no ground of complaint; to which your Petitioners have to answer, that the restraint upon the resort of Englishmen to this country no longer exists; that while it did exist it could in no wise justify an abridgment of the rights possessed by them in England and under its laws, because even in this country, when they did come, those laws were guaranteed to them; that no question of right is insignificant, nor can its importance in principle be measured by its application to numbers; and lastly, that every Englishman who comes to this country, although not in their service, is as strongly interested in the just maintenance and exercise of the national power and supremacy as the body of the Proprietors com-and sentiments relative to matters affecting the interests of the community.

"It will be the duty of the Chief Secretary to the Government, and that officer is hereby enjoined to bring to the notice of Government, without delay, any infringement of the foregoing rules by the conductors of newspapers or other periodical works published in the English language; and the same duty is assigned to the Persian Secretary to the Government with relation to newspapers and other periodical publications in the languages of the country."

It is not my intention, Gentlemen, to make observations at this time of day, and after the practical liberty we have long enjoyed, which might revive old animosities. I will not characterize this document as I once would have characterized it; but you will recollect, it has been said, there is no servitude so miserable as where the law is vague and uncertain. What was the condition of a proprietor of a periodical publication under such a law as this? Why, that no man knew when he committed what was deemed a fault, for what he incurred a penalty. At the time that the question of the stamp act was under discussion, I was eng ed in conducting a publication similar to that which was conducted by my friends who are now sitting opposite to me. Were we not writing day by day and month by month to the same end, in the same strain, and the same style? Can I not declare that if boldness of writing was that which was displeasing to the Government, I ought to have incurred its censure as often as they did? I most conscientiously can. And yet, what was the result? The Calcutta Chronicle, conducted by them, was suppressed, and the Bengal Chronicle, written for, in all the editorial articles, by me, was allowed to exist. I ask any man to go through the files of the two journals, and say which of the two contained the strongest expressions; and yet the result was, that Mr. Samuel Smith retained his journal, while the two gentlemen opposite who, at their own expense, had established a rival paper, were ruined and crushed—their journal was suppressed, and no one knew for what—some said, for a copy of verses on some gentlemen, others for an article on the Burmese war, and others, for a Latin quotation alluding to an act of the Chief Secretary of the day in these terms "Risum teneatis Amici," with a note of admiration at the end of it! Which of these constituted the actual delinquency was and is a secret confined to the breasts of those who suppressed the posing the East India Company, or their servants themselves.

"That it has never, to the knowledge of your Petitioners, been pretended, even that any danger to the existence of the English power and national supremacy could arise from the use of the English language in periodical publications, unless the preamble of the registered Regulation of the 4th April, 1823, be taken to have such meaning. That your petitioners on the contrary allege, that the number of natives of India conversant with the language of England is still deplorably small; that such knowledge has scarcely began to exist beyond the limits of Calcutta; that periodical literature is one of the readiest means of increasing the knowlegde of the English language among those who already possess some; and of inspiring a more extensive taste and desire for its acquisition among the great body of natives: while in the present state of native education and knowledge in this presidency, it is obvious that it never can for a very long period of time become generally enough understood to afford even a pretence for apprehending danger to the supremacy of England from its use in the periodical publications of India, even if danger can with reason be apprehended from such a source.

"That with whatever greater show of reason, danger to the supremacy of England may be considered likely to arise from publications, periodical or otherwise, in the vernacular languages of this presidency, your Petitioners cannot admit that such dangers justify a prohibition of all printing or publishing in such languages without licence.

"That one of the dangers prominently brought forward by some of the ablest advocates of such restrictions, viz., the danger to be apprehended by the disseminating libels and false intelligence among the native soldiery, is likely to be diminished instead of increased by the liberty of unlicenced printing, inasmuch as the nature of the act implies that it must be done clandestinely; that it could be done as effectually, if not more so, by written than by printed libels or falsehoods; that its chief danger lies in the ignorance and consequent credulity of the parties addressed; that such dangers would decrease with the increase of knowledge among the native community, whose better knowledge would tend to correct false impressions, and to diminish credulity; that finally, the danger, if it exist, can never, by any contrivance, be fully guarded against; that the prohibition of printing without previous licence in no degree guards against it, for it is chimerical to suppose that in cases where a strong motive exists unlicenced and secret presses could not be procured, or that seditious and mischievous falsehood, could not be clandestinely printed even at a licenced press, so as to elude detection.

"That arbitrary prohibitions against the open circulation of obnoxious native publications seem most peculiarly uncalled for in a country where the local Government has unlimited power in regard to the application of the existing Revenues, where Stamp duties may be applied to such publications in the interior at will, and where newspapers are still subjected to a heavy rate of postage."

I am afraid you may have found the reading of this petition somewhat tedious, but I think you must agree with me, that after the objections which have been raised, and which could not but be foreseen, to putting the natives on the same footing with ourselves, in regard to the periodical press, it was necessary some arguments should be urged, to meet those which have been advanced by certain persons of considerable influence and talent, and whom I may denominate the advocates of the East India Company. The persons to whom I allude are Sir John Malcolm, Mr. Elphinstone, and Sir Thomas Munro; and the petition has been framed with express reference to the objections they have made, particularly the danger to be apprehended from the dissemination of libels among the native soldiery—the petition alleges, and I apprehend by sound argument proves, that that danger will be diminished by the existence of a free press. If we consider for a moment what that is, which is called "the Press," we shall perceive more clearly that under no tolerable form of Government can it be really dangerous. It is a favorite sophism of its opponents that the Press creates discontent. That I deny where there is full reason for content. It may foment, exaggerate, palliate or soothe—nothing more; for the press creates nothing—it simply gives a voice to the public content or discontent. Without doubt, where that voice is suppressed, there may be more seeming quiet—if causes of discontent exist, they may not be expressed—all may be still and calm, like "the torrent's smoothness ere it dash below," until the explosion takes place, and the revolution but too common in Asiatic annals—the revolution of force ensues. (Loud Cheers.) Is not such a quiet the greatest of all dangers for any government, and for this Government especially? If the press be free, and if causes of discontent do exist, they will be heard and known, and the Government may view them at a distance, and ward off the coming blow,—if there should be discontent from our tampering with native usages, or if there should be irritation among the soldiery, the Government may, through the medium of the press, when there shall be a press that is free, know before hand where the dangers lie. As to the instance given by Sir John Malcolm of written libels having been scattered through his camp at Malwa, it amounts to nothing at all—suppose it were so—how does the freeing the periodical press increase such danger? What relation has the one thing with the other? The circulation of such libels is, from its very nature, a thing clandestine in its origin, and in no way can such a danger be increased by giving the natives the fullest liberty, periodically or otherwise, to print and publish, which are things the reverse of clandestine.

Gentlemen, I shall not detain you long upon the other part of the question,—that portion of the petition which relates to the restraints on public meetings. I have been asked why we have mixed up the two questions. I apprehend the one has a natural relation to the other, though it might perhaps have been in some respects, according to the judgments of others, a matter of convenience to have divided them. My answer to this, however, is that a large public meeting is not very easily collected in this city, and therefore I think the balance of convenience was in favor of comprising both questions in one requisition and one petition. Perhaps, Gentlemen, some of you may not know what are the restraints which exist in this town on public meetings. I will tell them to you, and they may strike some of you with surprise. The restraint on public meetings in this town consists in a paragraph of a general letter of the Court of Directors, written in 1806, published in the Government Gazette, in 1807, and since undeviatingly acted upon, but never with my knowledge re-published, except by myself when writing for the Bengal Chronicle. It is as follows:—

FORT WILLIAM; PUBLIC DEPARTMENT, APRIL 9, 1807.

The following Extract from a General Letter from the Honorable the Court of Directors, dated the 23rd of July, 1806, is published for general information.

"We direct, on the receipt of this dispatch, that public notice be issued, forbidding under pain of our high displeasure, any public Assemblage, either of our own Servants or of private Merchants, Traders, or other inhabitants whatsoever, without first obtaining the sanction of the Government through the medium of the Sheriff for the time being: and we further direct, that with the application for holding such meetings, the subjects intended to be taken into consideration, be also submitted to your previous consideration, in order that you may have it in your power to judge of the propriety of allowing the questions that may be proposed, to be agitated, and on no consideration whatever is the Sheriff, or the officer presiding at such meetings, to allow any subject to be considered that has not been previously submitted for your consideration. We have full confidence, however, that our Governments in India will not preclude our Servants or other European Inhabitants from meeting for the purpose of expressing their sentiments, whenever proper subjects are submitted for their deliberation."

Published by order of the Honorable the Governor in Council,

(Signed) THOS. BROWN,
Chief Secy. to the Govt.

That, Gentlemen, is the whole restraint upon public meetings in this town. That it has the force of a law I cannot say, for, as it is stated in this petition, it is not law; it is against law, and it claims therefore the attention and obedience of no one except as a question of prudence. But how was it enforced or how could it be enforced? It could have been enforced, not indeed under pain of the high displeasure of the Court of Directors, but under fear of transmission and banishment, a power which, if the Governor-General dared to exercise, he was at liberty to exercise. That was the real power which, at the date of its promulgation especially, and long after, enforced obedience to this order of the Court of Directors. They, a body of traders, not having the power to make through their Government a local ordinance to take effect in Calcutta, an English settlement, without its being registered in the Supreme Court, and only then, provided it contain nothing contrary to the laws of England, issued this rescript of theirs to the Governor-General to prevent their fellow subjects from exercising a constitutional right! Is it right we should live under such a restraint, when we have had the experience of orderly public meetings held in this place, an English settlement for more than a century, when not a more orderly community for all that space of time can be found to have existed any where, and no one evil can be shown to have arisen from public meetings? I may be asked, is this restraint, founded in this rescript from the Directorial purple, any thing more than a dead letter. I am prepared at all points. I will show you a recent, gross, and inexcusable abuse by the Government of the power with which it is invested. In 1827, it was proposed by the Government, under powers which it seems they discovered after they had lain for years dormant in two sections of an Act of Parliament, to impose a stamp tax on the inhabitants of Calcutta, for the purpose, it was said, of putting them on a footing with the rest of the community. The inhabitants had this objection, that taxing them would not put them on a footing with the rest of the community, as Englishmen had not the power of residing in the interior without licence, and as they paid heavy municipal taxes not fairly or at all applied to their proper ends, which the rest of the community did not pay. But whether the objections were reasonable or not, they thought at least they had a right to be heard. A requisition was signed and delivered to the Sheriff of that day, Mr. Plowden, the first clause of which was—

"SIR,—We the undersigned request that you will be pleased to convene a Meeting of the British and Native Inhabitants of Calcutta, at the Town Hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of presenting a Petition or Petitions, to Parliament for declaratory Acts, or if necessary for new enactments, relating to the following subjects, all and each of which involve interests of great importance to this community."—

So that, as you will observe, the first clause of this was simply to convene a public meeting to take into consideration the expediency of petitioning Parliament. This it was, and no more. The meeting was called by the Sheriff, but without the previous application to Government. The result was the following notice from Mr. Plowden:—

"NOTICE is hereby given that the Meeting called under a Requisition signed by J. Palmer, Esq., and other Inhabitants of Calcutta and advertized for the 17th instant, at the Town Hall, will not take place.

Calcutta, May 12, 1827. T. PLOWDEN, Sheriff."

Here is the letter to Mr. Palmer.

"TO JOHN PALMER, ESQ., AND OTHER REQUISITIONISTS.

GENTLEMEN,—The notice of the Meeting advertized to take place at the Town Hall on the 17th instant, having from inadvertence been published in the papers without previous reference to the authority of the Government as required by a notification issued in the Calcutta Gazette of the 9th April, 1807, I have been called upon to explain the omission, and the result has been that the Meeting has been disallowed by the Right Honorable the Vice-President in Council. I have accordingly issued a notice stating it cannot take place at the Town Hall on that day.

2. Mr Chief Secretary Lushington, in communicating the orders of Government, informs me that the Government consider themselves precluded, by the positive orders of the Honorable the Court of Directors, from sanctioning any General Meeting of the Inhabitants of Calcutta, having for its object the discussion of topics of the nature of those comprized in the first clause of your Requisition."

What was the nature of those topics? It was to take into consideration the expediency of petitioning Parliament. I ask, was that or was it not a reasonable exercise of an undoubted right? Was its prohibition a reasonable exercise of an unlawful power? If that was the meaning of Mr. Lushington's letter, I say that a more jealous, senseless, and capricious exertion of arbitrary power never occurred. The Government says, it is our pleasure you should not be heard, and should not be allowed to meet to consider the expediency of petitioning Parliament, although you are still governed by Parliament! But I apprehend that that paragraph had another meaning. The Court of Directors say—
* * * * * * * "We have full confidence, however, that our Governments in India will not preclude our servants or other European inhabitants from meeting for the purpose of expressing their sentiments, whenever proper subjects are submitted for their deliberation." Then you find from the letter of Mr. Lushington that the Government considers it is precluded from sanctioning any "general meeting." Now that requisition was signed by a great number of the native community, and the result was, the power of restraint was exercised. My own opinion is, the meeting was forbidden because it was a general meeting of the inhabitants, and not of the Europeans only. If that be so, I again ask, ought such a state of things to continue? I know that there is not a man here who will say they ought, and I know too, that so much has time wrought change in the thoughts of men, and in the sources of power, that no man any where will now be bold enough publicly to defend such proceedings. Having thus performed the duty that has devolved upon me, I have only in conclusion to observe that the prayer of our Petition was not made more specific for an obvious reason. All we pray for is the abolition of the existing regulations, and we pray (not over-anxious for new laws of libel,) that if any new enactment should be considered necessary, it may be printed in time to enable us to offer any objections that we may have to urge before it is passed. This I apprehend is a reasonable and moderate prayer.

(Mr. Dickens sat down amidst loud cheers.)

BABOO DWARKANAUTH TAGORE.—Gentlemen—In rising to second the resolution that this petition be adopted, I am only doing that which I did ten years ago. When this regulation was first promulgated, I with three of my own relations, and my lamented friend, the late Rammohun Roy, were the only persons who petitioned the Supreme Court against it; but most sincerely do I congratulate the community at large, that I now see the whole room of the Town Hall filled, both with Europeans and Natives, for the purpose of protesting against that regulation. At that time I did not ask any European to sign a petition, his signature to which might have subjected him to transportation; the same objection, however, did not exist in the case of the natives, for the Government even of that day could hardly have transported them. (Laughter.) But none of the natives could I prevail upon to join me, and I believe it was thought I should be hanged the next day for my boldness. I think the present is the very time we ought to petition against the regulation; because for the last eight years we have, under the rule of Lord William Bentinck, enjoyed a really free press, in spite of its provisions. (Cheers.) If we could only secure Lord William Bentinck as a Governor-General, there would be no need of a petition, for with him this law is a dead letter, as well as many of the Court of Director's letters; but we do not know who we may get next; and for any thing we can tell to the contrary, Mr. Sutherland and Mr. Stocqueler may be turned out by the next Governor-General. This then is the time we ought to petition; and I have every hope, from the known character of Lord William Bentinck, and from the interest he has always taken in the welfare of the natives, and in that of the community at large, that he will repeal the regulation; and when once it is repealed, I think it will be difficult for any future Governor-General to get it enacted again. (Loud Cheers.)

Some discussion took place, in consequence of a suggestion, by Mr. Mangles, whether it might not be better to put the grounds of the objection to the restrictions upon public meetings, upon the general principles urged by Mr. Dickens, which were unanswerable, instead of resting upon the illegality of the restraint, a point upon which few men who were not lawyers, were competent to decide. The alteration was opposed by Mr. Turton, Mr. Dickens, Mr. Clarke and Mr. Sutherland. There could be no doubt that the restraint was unconstitutional, unwise and unjust; but it was also clearly illegal. It did not require any professional knowledge of law to enable a man to understand this. Nothing could be considered as a law binding upon the inhabitants of Calcutta, until it was embodied in a bye-law, and registered in the Supreme Court. That course was not pursued in this instance; but the Government had other means of enforcing obedience. In the case of Mr. Plowden for instance, who was a civil servant, the Government had over him not only the general power which they possessed over other individuals, but also that particular power which they might exercise over their own servants. Mr. Plowden could not, with safety, have acted otherwise than he did. If Mr. Turton had been the Sheriff at the time, he might perhaps have said, that he would not act upon that illegal order of the Government, that he would, as Sheriff, call the meeting, and then all the Government could have done, would have been to have sent him back to that country which he sincerely regretted he had ever left. It might perhaps have entered into the head of the Military Vice-President of that day, who was probably more conversant with arms than with laws, to have dispersed the meeting at the point of the bayonet; but that would have been a violation of law, at which every Englishman would have revolted, and it would have required a tolerably bold Governor-General to have dared to attempt it. It was impossible to say this letter of the Court of Directors was entitled to any obedience as a legal command—it was a mere assumption of authority by them, without a shadow of foundation, to prevent their fellow subjects from exercising a natural right. It might perhaps be a matter of minor importance, in consequence of the way in which it had been acted upon, but it was not of minor importance in point of principle. Every Englishman must know that his right of petitioning Parliament was part of the law and part of the constitution of England; any attempt to interfere with that right, was not only unauthorized by law, but violated all law.

After some further desultory conversation, the original resolution, propos and carried unanimously.

Mr. Dickens then rose, and addre to the following effect. Gentlemen, it (and allow me to say, I wish it had one of those whom I now see around me, my humble opinion, ought not to have dec duty) to move the following resolution:

"That the New Act for the Government of I essentially defective in its provisions for attaining its professed objects, viz. the better Government His Majesty's Indian Territories, while by the arrangement effected with the East India Company, a burthen of insupportable magnitude is laid upon the people of India for the sole benefit of the proprietors of East India Stock. And that therefore it is expedient to petition the Parliament of the United Kingdom to obtain an amendment and revision of the Act."

I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible in what I have to say, because the gentleman who will propose, for your adoption, a petition founded upon the resolution I have just read, will have to explain it to you at a length that will necessarily bring this day nearly to a close. I therefore waive every introductory observation, and shall proceed at once to a short exposition of some of the main grounds and reasons for supporting this resolution. The Act of Parliament that has been lately passed is entitled, "An Act for effecting an arrangement with the East India Company, and for the better Government of His Majesty's Indian Territories." Now it is my humble opinion, and I trust it will be yours, that the first only of these objects—the "effecting an arrangement with the East India Company"—has in any way been attained; and that at your expense. What are then, as far as regards this arrangement, the main provisions of the Act? The East India Company, since the reign of Queen Anne, had a commercial capital in England, which they were bound to keep up as a security for their commercial speculations—they had also loaded this country with a heavy territorial debt. It is clear that the payment of the territorial debt, contracted as it was for territorial purposes, on the security of the public revenues, should not be postponed to the payment of the commercial capital, if that were not forthcoming, or that fact was doubtful; but the fact is, that the security of the territorial creditor has been postponed, and the commercial capital has been paid in full in preference to all other charges whatever in Great Britain. As the whole power of Government belongs to the East India Company, to say that the commercial capital shall be paid in preference to all other charges in Great Britain, is to say, that it shall be paid in preference to all charges whatever. This I contend is a breach of public faith, done without examination of accounts, and without hearing the Indian creditors, who had a right to object. It may be said that this was done by the British Parliament under the pressure of circumstances. I deny the necessity to commit injustice. I deny the necessity in any possible case of deciding without hearing, and I say that they have, in this, found time to decide, on pretence they had no time to hear, and have, in consequence, postponed the claims of the territorial creditor, and lessened to him that which was his only security, for the purpose of paying an extravagant dividend to the commercial creditor, who had the means of making himself heard, being on the spot, and would have been in England to an embarrassed minister a formidable opponent—an extravagant dividend far above the market value of the stock at the time the Act was passed. It may be said it is useless for us to insist, now that the act is done, on this which may be termed a financial objection, that whatever may be the amount of the evil, there is now no chance that it will be remedied. Gentlemen, I do not admit the validity of this answer;

, the evil being reme-
ity ground of complaint ;
re Parliament with a better grounds of complaint, if we show e subjected us to an injustice which emedied.

to the second head of objection: the hich have been made "for the better Go-of His Majesty's Indian Territories." I ask any person to point them out to me. I not find them. It may be said that the destruction the commercial character of the East India Company, the removal of the monopoly of the China trade, and the permission given to Europeans to reside in certain parts of the interior, without licence, are provisions for the better government of India.
As to the two first, I deny that they are to be considered under that head at all. The destruction of the commercial character of the East India Company, may, or may not, be a benefit to themselves—it would require an accurate examination of all their accounts, to enable one to decide the point; but if it be a benefit, it is a benefit to themselves. Their trade to India had ceased to be an injury to the free Merchant. The destruction of the China monopoly is an undoubted benefit to the people of England; but in what possible way is it a benefit to the people of India, who are not affected by it? Lastly, that the permission to those of the class to which I belong, to reside at a distance of more than ten miles from this place, is a benefit to some extent, I admit, or rather, it would be one, were it not clogged with that uncertainty of law, which seems to have been specially intended to act as a permanent restriction.
You will understand me, when I say that, as to that most unwise and arbitrary power of transmission, whether it do, or whether it do not exist, is still left at this hour in doubt. When the legislature of Great Britain, after a continuing notice of twenty years that the period must arrive, when they would have to form a new constitution for the Government of this country, at length came to the performance of that task, ought such a question as this—a question of such vital moment—to have been passed over in silence?
Ought the rights of the natural born subjects of His Majesty, any sort of security for the very existence of their property, against a summary power of transportation at will, to be referred in a lump to the discretion of the Governor-General in Council, Parliament transferring the whole responsibility to their shoulders, who were thus called on to find reasons as it were for justifying their retention of power? I say, if this Act had been framed in the spirit of wise and cautious legislation, this difficulty would have been considered, and the British Parliament would not have left the question in the same unsettled state it was before, but would have met the difficulties, if such they were, on such a subject, have considered and decided. This, Gentlemen, is my objection to that permission to reside in the interior being in reality a benefit to that class, for whose benefit perhaps it was intended. Then let us look at the state of commercial questions as between us and the rest of the colonies of England. Do you behold any evidence of a fit and proper consideration for the interests of this country upon that subject? One of the great staples of this country is sugar—upon that there is a du-which is almost prohibitory—the effect of that, is felt by every man who works here—was that or was it not a fit subject for the consideration of Parliament?
Was it fit we should be left, under such circumstances, to the rivalry of the West India Colonies, and of a colony on this side of the Cape of Good Hope, more especially after the events of the last session of Parliament? In that session, the West India proprietors received, from the bounty of the people of England, a sum of twenty millions sterling at once in the lump, as a compensation for their slave property—am I saying that was unjust, or the bargain was extravagant?
I do not say so—the principle of compensation I hold to be a just principle; and I am without the means of saying whether the amount was extravagant or not.
But I do say that, in the very same session of Parliament, a burden of a million sterling per annum was imposed upon the people of this country—I say that the sum to be paid as the amount of the dividend, with the other additional expenses imposed by that Act, will amount to that sum—and then I ask, was it reasonable or just to impose upon the people of India a burden equivalent to the bonus given to the West India proprietors, without affording us any means of lightening that heavy pressure, by increased facilities of commerce? This, gentlemen, is not an evil that is remediless; but I will venture to say, it never will be remedied, unless we all record, in the strongest possible manner, our sense that we are not treated with justice. Is this the only disability under which the commerce of India labours? It is not. I will not however occupy your time by naming the others, but will simply say, that as the question of commerce stood before the passing of that Act, so in all respects is it now; though you have large and onerous burdens imposed upon you, yet your condition, in respect to commerce, is left just as it was before. In vain will you expect any remedy unless you bestir yourselves.

Lastly, let us come to what I may call the constitutional part of the question—the state of the law.
What was it before? What is it now? The class to which I belong, in common with the inhabitants of Calcutta of every class, had this security, that we could be subject to no local regulation which was repugnant to the laws of England—that security we have lost. Will any man tell me who has gained by our loss? Not one. If to put us all upon a footing, means to leave us all upon the same dead level of insecurity, then certainly I do admit we are all alike on the same footing! (Loud Cheers.) By this reckless act of the legislature a torrent of arbitrary power has been passed over us, levelling all distinctions, all institutions, and leaving nothing upright but a Colossus of despotism. (Loud Cheers.) It leaves the Governor-General in possession of more power than any Tudor ever swayed, of more perhaps than any man ever held, save a dictator of old Rome! It may be said that these powers are held by him subject to controul—to what controul? To a Parliamentary impeachment, if his motives should be proved to be wrong, of which proof is impossible! With such powers a bold bad man may do any thing; a wise man perhaps might refrain—but there is nothing a weak, a wicked, or an arbitrary man may not do, short of the deprivation of life without trial. The whole power is given to him—he has a Council indeed —but it is in every respect rendered subordinate to his will. Shall I be mocked, by being told that no security has been added by the provision that one of the members of that Council shall be a person not in the service of the East India Company? I repel with scorn the notion of such a security! I say it without flattery to any man or any class of men, but I for one would rather have the council composed, as it was before, of members of the Civil Service; at all events, they possess the first of requisites, except integrity, for the task of regulation and government, local knowledge and experience, which one named by the crown may not have; in integrity, in all other knowledge they are equal—they are like ourselves, like any one who may be appointed, educated Englishmen. It may be said the choice of the fourth member is unrestrained—I admit it is so—I admit the Minister of the Crown is free to choose one who possesses local knowledge—he is free also to choose one who does not. Then what is this pretended security? Recollect the veto and power of controul is taken away from the Court of Directors, and given to the Minister of the Crown—the power has changed hands. Then, instead of this provision being a security, I say that it is the reverse; for it authorizes the appointment of one who is the nominee of the authorities at home—may be their pledged instrument for any ends. It may be said also, there is a Law Commission appointed—without doubt there is, and what has it to do? To frame a system of law for the whole of British India, a system of law and process which shall be uniform—and the instruction it receives for this very light task is, that it shall make it as uniform as possible! (Cheers.) Do you consider that in such provisions you find the results of profound legislative wisdom, or the traces of gigantic labour and care? It seems to me scarcely possible to throw off with more indifference the duties of legislation, and cast them upon those who, if I mistake not, it will soon be found cannot perform them, and ought never to have been called upon to do so. Then the Commissioners are to act under the direction of the perpetual Governor-General! And not a single limit is assigned to their power, not a single security under the sanction of Parliament afforded to us, not a path traced out for their guidance; but they who may be possessed of some qualifications for the task, are to act and inquire under the sole dictation of one man, who it is next to impossible can have any qualifications whatever for such a task. They have a task imposed upon them which no men can perform, and the execution of which is a wild chimera. Uniformity of law, in a country like this, with upwards of a hundred millions of inhabitants, of various races, and divers religions, in which two different systems, the Hindoo and the Mahomedan, irreconcileable with each other, and each bound up with the religion of its followers, are permanently rooted—uniformity of law under such circumstances! But more than this. The Commissioners are to reduce these two discordant systems, themselves divided into many sub-divisions, to an uniformity with a third law, our own, which we inherit as our birth-right. (Loud cheers.) This system is to operate upon Englishmen—upon intelligent Hindoos who have received the benefits of English education—upon such a class as the Military tribes of Upper Hindoostan—upon Bheels—upon Cossyahs—upon a population as diversified as can be exhibited by any country on the face of the globe! Then there is to be a uniform system of process—impossible! Consider the usages of Asiatics—consider our own—how incompatible—how opposed—in their very nature how impossible to be conjoined! A uniform process, when among the Hindoos no female can with the slightest propriety appear in public, and no zenana can be entered! Apply that system to ourselves, among whom no such feelings exist! Is the system to be universal? Is it to be applicable to all persons, and under all circumstances? Are natives of the highest rank to be put on the same footing with others? Why then it would become a political matter, the Government would be obliged to interfere, for service of legal process on a man of rank by Asiatic notions forsooth degrades him, and it would require a local law or a fresh reference to the discretion to restrain the uniform system. I say again, the task imposed upon the future Law Commission is nothing better than a chimerical attempt to compass what is impossible, a signal example of the absurdity of its framers. Then, with regard to the remaining provisions of the Act. The Legislative Council thus formed is to receive no assistance. Is it too much to say that when a power of legislation, guarded by no security, is given not to the Council, but to one individual, there ought to be a previous promulgation of the laws about to be passed? Am I wrong in asking that that reasonable security shall be prescribed by Act of Parliament? That has not been prescribed. What is the mode of promulgation required by the Act? The Court of Directors are to settle it with the approbation of the Board of Controul! I think it is not too much to ask that the laws should at least be made public before they are enacted, in order that those who are to obey them may have an opportunity of objecting to them; and that the constitution of the Legislative Council should be rendered less exclusive and useless. To that extent does the prayer of the petition go, and to that extent I think the feeling of all present will go along with it. (Loud cheers.)

Baboo Russick Krishna Mullick.—Gentlemen—In rising to second the resolution just proposed by Mr. Dickens, I must beg you to excuse any inaccuracy there may be in my mode of expressing my sentiments. I have to address you in a language foreign to me, foreign to the country which gave me birth—and this must plead my apology. Before I proceed to the immediate question, I must call your attention to one point to which I feel it necessary to allude. It may have been expected that the natives would be prepared to come forward and defend themselves against certain attacks which have been made upon the native Press—the natives were prepared to defend themselves, if the persons who made those attacks had had the boldness to come forward at this meeting, and propose any amendment to the resolutions; but as that has not been done, the natives did not consider themselves entitled to occupy your time by coming forward to repel an attack which has not been followed up. (Loud Cheers.) Gentlemen, Mr. Dickens has drawn your attention to some of the most important defects in the new Act of Parliament; and certainly, after a careful perusal of it, however much it may have been intended for the better Government of His Majesty's Indian Territories, I cannot come to the conclusion that the clauses contained in it do in any way tend to their better Government. (Cheers.) The more I have perused it, the more I have perceived that the motive which guided those who passed it was—self. (Cheers). It was passed, not for the benefit of India, but for the benefit of the proprietors of India stock, and the benefit of the people of England, while the welfare of the millions who inhabit these vast regions was not at all cared for. (Cheers.) Mr. Dickens has directed your attention to the commercial debts of the Company being paid out of the territorial revenues. I think that unjust, and it shows the British Parliament were looking to the interests of the proprietors of the East India stock, and not to those of the inhabitants of this country. (Loud Cheers.) We were already burdened with a heavy debt, and yet the British Parliament entailed upon us an additional burden to pay the commercial debts of the Company. It should have been considered whether those commercial debts could with propriety be paid out of the revenues of this country; if they were incurred through the folly and mismanagement of the servants of the Company, the burden should have fallen upon them and not upon us. I shall not detain you longer upon this point, or go over the ground Mr. Dickens has already traversed; but there are one or two points he has omitted, and to which I, as a native, must be allowed to advert. (Loud Cheers.) I will first allude to that clause in the Act by which the Ecclesiastical establishment of this country has been increased. I think a greater injustice could not have been committed. (Loud Cheers.) I know there are many who defend this, and who say that the civil and military servants require ministers to preach to them. It may be so, and it may be hard to deprive them of that blessing; but why should the revenues of this country, taken from the hard earnings of the poor Indian, wretchedly fed and clothed, be devoted to the purpose of extending a religion, which the natives feel to be destructive both of their temporal and eternal happiness? (Loud Cheers.) There might be some excuse, if the object were merely a provision for the eternal interests of the Company's civil and military servants, but there is something more. It is said in the Act—" provided always that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the Governor-General in Council from granting from time to time, with the sanction of the Court of Directors and of the Commissioners for the Affairs of India, to any sect, persuasion, or community of Christians not being of the United Church of England and Ireland or of the Church of Scotland, such sums of money as may be expedient for the purpose of instruction or for the maintenance of places of worship." What does that mean, but that money is to be taken out of the hands of the natives to convert them to a faith which they consider to be wrong, which they consider to be detrimental to their salvation? Is that just? Is it right? Is it in accordance with the precepts of that religion of which they boast so much? I have not found one word in their sacred book which warrants them to wrench money from the hands of an unwilling man to convert him to a faith which he believes to be wrong. (Loud Cheers.) So much with respect to that clause, but there are others which as a native I must notice. It has been asked (not here, but elsewhere) if there is any thing in the Act to which a rational Englishman can object. Not being an Englishman, I cannot judge of the feelings of Englishmen, but I do see a great deal to which I, as a rational native of India, do object. (Cheers and Laughter.) It is asked if natives are to object to that clause by which all persons, of whatever religion or colour, are rendered eligible to office under the Government. Certainly not. But let us enter a little deeply into that question, and we shall find, that though such a clause is inserted, there are other things which render it nugatory. (Cheers.) I allude to the necessity of education at the Haileybury College, an institution which, from what I have heard of it, I should think the sooner it is abolished the better for all parties. (Cheers.) The best school for those who are to hold office in India, is India itself. (Cheers.) All the lessons they receive at Haileybury can lead them but little to a practical acquaintance with the wants and feelings of the people of India. It must be by communicating with the natives, by speaking with them, by entering their wretched hovels, that any man can acquire that knowledge without which his best intentions will be in vain. (Cheers.) This is an objection to the College upon general grounds, but I will show that the clause has the effect of rendering utterly nugatory that other clause which makes the natives eligible to office. However one may regret the prejudice, still the natives entertain a prejudice that it is sinful for them to cross the ocean, much more to remain in England for years for the purpose of tuition. That being so, how can a native qualify himself for office? He must either give up his worldly prospects or his religion. (Loud Cheers.) It is another question whether the Hindoos are sufficiently advanced to be entrusted with high office, but while this prejudice exists, if the legislature intended that clause to mean any thing at all, they ought to have made some other provision to enable the natives to enter the civil service. (Loud Cheers.) Gentlemen, the more I read this Act, the more I am convinced the interests of the people of England were alone thought of. It has been said the tea monopoly has been abolished, and is that a measure to which we can object? No. But why was the tea monopoly abolished? For the welfare of the people of India? No. Only for the welfare of the people of England. If our welfare was thought of, why was not the monopoly of salt and opium abolished? (Loud Cheers.) Mr. Charles Grant has promised to do away with it, but when his promise will be fulfilled, heaven knows; I cannot say. (Cheers and Laughter;) Allusion has been made to the absolute power of the Governor-General, and Mr. Dickens has shown you that he is more absolute than the Kings of England in their worst days. What check is there upon him? If this petition succeeds, we may have one check (cheers,) but the Parliament has taken from us one that already existed. The Supreme Court has always been a check, and that is now taken away. The Supreme Court is put under the power of the Governor-General, and, to borrow words which have been written in one of the Journals of this city, " British Judges, whose independence is our pride and our glory, are reduced to be mere administrators of possibly ill-concerted and ill-considered laws." (Cheers.) Mr. Dickens has also alluded to the commercial interests of this country. In vain do I look for any clause that speaks of the removal of the restrictions upon commerce. I recollect Mr. Grant said that the merchant of Great Britain was so enterprizing, it was impossible not to attend to his calls, and do away with the tea monopoly. I cannot say what may be the enterprize of the merchants of Calcutta, but I ask, if those restrictions under which Indian commerce labours, had been removed, whether this country would not have flourished and increased in wealth and power far more than it has done. (Loud Cheers.) There is another subject to which we hoped, but hoped in vain, the British Parliament would have given some attention. In this Act there is not one word about the subject of education. (Cheers.) Two additional Bishops have been provided for the comfort of the civil and military servants, but there is no provision whatever for the education of the people of India. (Loud Cheers.) Gentlemen, what are the conclusions at which we must arrive from this state of things? Read the Act over and over again, and you will find the truth of my remarks, however badly they have been delivered. (Cheers.) I do humbly submit that we should petition the Legislature to remove some of the most obnoxious clauses in this Act, which disgrace the British name and power in India. (Loud Cheers.)

The Sheriff then put the resolution proposed by Mr. Dickens, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. Turton.—Gentlemen, I am extremely sorry to be obliged to detain you longer, but when I recollect the importance of the occasion, and that the present is a duty which at any rate you are but seldom called upon to perform, I think you will not object to remain and hear the petition which I am about to propose for your adoption, and that you will forgive me for trespassing further on your patience—for, in the discharge of our present duty, which is no light or trifling one, it is absolutely necessary we should show, that we are not acting without having maturely considered the subjects on which we intend to address Parliament. We owe the British Legislature that respect, for you will recollect this Act is the result of some years' discussion and inquiry in both Houses as to the wants and rights of the people of India, and the duties which the British Government owes to His Majesty's Indian subjects; it is necessary, therefore, we should show the Legislature, that we have well weighed the points on which, we think, they have neglected their duties and been utterly unmindful of our interests. However, so much has already been said by Mr. Dickens, that I shall be spared the necessity of going much into detail, but for the reasons I have given I cannot abstain from some observations. I do not hesitate to say that I regret most deeply, that there should be occasion to find any fault in this Act—it was passed by Ministers to whom, in addition to feelings of personal attachment which I bear to some of them, and the great personal and political respect which I entertain for others—I think we, and all the people of England, owe a heavy debt of gratitude for the blessing they conferred upon us in bringing forward, and carrying, in spite of every obstacle, one great and glorious measure—that of Parliamentary Reform. Whatever faults they may have committed in the enactment we are now considering, I shall never forget that we owe them that debt; but, gentlemen, whatever attachment we may bear them, however much we may concur in their general political conduct, we must not allow any such feelings to blind us to their errors, or to render us heedless of our rights and interests, nor must it deter us, when we believe them to be wrong, from boldly telling them such is our conviction. I trace here, indeed, one injustice arising from that which has been already and will be hereafter, to a greater extent, the source of so much good—the Reform Bill. Though we suffer from it at present, I do not regret it, for it indicates a more lively participation of the representatives in the wishes of the people. But I cannot read this act without perceiving it has been past by a Parliament, the members of which have carefully, and I am sorry to say exclusively, studied the immediate interests of their own constituents and have postponed all other interests to them. The whole objects of this Act are British—the whole advantages are British—the whole benefit has been conferred upon those whom I may designate as the constituents of the Reformed Parliament. (Cheers.) To whom has the grant of all that has been granted been owing? To those who have, for the first time, been truly represented in the British legislature. The representatives of the great trading towns have given to their constituents, or rather taken to themselves, all that their own interests required; but I am at a loss to find a single instance in which the interests of this country have been consulted, or indeed, that any attention has been paid to them. Can it be said that the reformed Parliament have given to this great subject, so far as India is concerned, even that care and attention which former Parliaments bestowed upon it? Whether I look to the proceedings in Parliament prior to the 13th George III., or to the 33d George III., or to the 53d George III., I find on the occasion of passing each of those Acts, and in the Acts themselves, the spirit of diligent and laborious inquiry, and an anxious desire to legislate in detail for the benefit of the people of India. The opinions of the framers of those Acts may have been right or wrong, but they did endeavour to give to this country the constitution which they considered best adapted to its condition and its wants. The legislature gradually advanced from one act to another in a spirit of liberality in their legislation for India. (Cheers.) On this occasion they have ceased to advance. By this Act which I now hold in my hand, the Reformed Parliament has handed you over to the tender mercies of an individual; they have established a despotic government, and transferred the whole labour and responsibility of legislation to others. (Cheers.) It is this of which I complain. I say it was idle to appoint Committees, and to take evidence, and to investigate, if investigation was to be followed by no natural result, after it had taken place. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I was not prepared until lately to expect in this place any dissent from this opinion, for I had heard no other expressed any where; but, within these few days, I have read, and read with astonishment, some remarks which appeared in a paper of this presidency. They are preceded by observations on the manner in which the requisition has been circulated. Let me say in the outset, that I am quite willing to take whatever blame or responsibility may be attached to the omission of sending the requisition to any one. I admit that with me originated the requisition, and that I, in conjunction with my friend Mr. Dickens, set it on foot. I showed it to such of my friends, and others whom I saw, who occurred to me as likely to join in the furtherance of those objects which I had in view—and delivered it to some at their request to submit to others: but my other avocations would not allow of my devoting much time to it, or of sending it to all. I perceive from this article that I have incurred the heavy displeasure of one mighty and influential power; that there is one person who complains that it was not sent to him. Not having the honor of constant and familiar intercourse with that individual, I did not happen to see him during the time the requisition was in circulation, and it certainly did not occur to me to present it to him for his signature: whether it was shown to him by others or not I do not know, and never inquired. But if his name had occurred to me, (as it is only amongst friends to the cause that I could have looked for signatures) has he not furnished ample reasons why I should have acted correctly in omitting to apply to him? If I had the power of diving into the heart of man, and ascertaining what was passing in his, could I have judged more accurately or determined more correctly than by omitting to submit it to him for his signature and support? If I had been aware that his sentiments were such as are expressed in the article I hold in my hand, would it be a matter of surprise that I should not have referred on such a subject to a man who tells you you have but one cause of complaint in this act? I have probably offended others also by similar omissions. If so I am sorry for it, for I intended to slight no man; but if I have offended him I have at least the satisfaction of knowing that in so doing I have not offended a friend to the cause. (Cheers.) I shall now proceed to observe on the remainder of this article. It is said, "As for the Indian act, which the sages of the city have permitted to remain undisturbed for so many months, we really can discover but one clause of its provisions against which rational Englishmen have any reason to protest." What gentlemen! Is it not time for an Englishman to protest when he is in danger of having his own laws taken from him, when, with the assent of the Court of Directors, new laws may be passed by which he may be subjected to capital punishment, and that even without trial by jury? The writer proceeds—"there is surely nothing objectionable in the removal of all restrictions on the settlement of Europeans?" No, there is no objection to [illegible]: there is a very great objection, and I say th[illegible] very gross culpability on the part of the Br[illegible]rliament in not having taken care, when the [illegible]oved the restrictions, that nobody should have may [illegible]r of imposing laws by which in effect they then [illegible]enewed. I say it was gross culpability in tern[illegible]t to have taken away, in express and positive in [illegible]he despotic power of the Governor-General liber[illegible]rd to deportation. It is true that by this act any p[illegible]is given to British born subjects to reside at [illegible]es which were under the Government of the Company in 1800; but does this or not repeal indirectly the power of deportation given under the act of 53, Geo. III.? If it does, is the Governor-General restricted from imposing laws to the same effect? There is, indeed, one clause in this act from which it may be contended, and I think with justice, that he is so restricted. The 2nd clause re-enacts all former provisions not repealed by or repugnant to this act, and by the 63rd section the Governor-General cannot pass laws to vary the provisions of this act. From this it may be contended that the Governor-General can pass no law to remove any one from such residence—and I should say that he would be a bold man in these days who dared to exercise such power if he possesses it. But still it rests in inference, and arguments would not be wanting on the other side, where the will existed to make use of them. Is that the way in which a law, which deeply affects the rights and liberties of Englishmen, ought to be left—which has been made the subject of complaint and petition to Parliament for the last ten years? Should we not have had a direct enactment upon thesubject? And yet, for all that depends on positive enactment, to-morrow—no, to-morrow we shall not, for to-morrow Lord

William Bentinck will be here—(cheers,) but as soon as he is gone, we may have a law and regulation passed, by which the Governor-General may be empowered to send any person out of the country. You may have more than that—you may have an Act of the Indian Parliament (consisting of four members, gentlemen,) which shall not be a general act operating upon all, but an act levelled against any particular individual who may be obnoxious to the Government. Nay, the Governor-General, against the advice of all his Council, may pass it if he considers "the peace of India" requires it. Then, if we are left in such a condition, I ask if the spirit of freedom pervaded the breast of the man who wrote the paragraph I have just read? (Loud Cheers.) The paragraph proceeds—"There is surely nothing offensive in the admission of all classes and colours to the paths to office?" I say that it is fallacious—it is a mere deception—the Act pretends by one of its clauses to admit natives to office, and then by another clause which makes Hayleybury College the only road to qualification, renders their admission an impossibility! it is a mere shuffle—but my native friend, who has just addressed you, has rendered it unnecessary for me to say any thing more upon this head. Then comes—"the addition to the members of council in the person of an independent and enlightened man"—I suppose he takes in the Englishman—(laughter,) "who acknowledges no special allegiance to the East India Company—is that objectionable?" To that I answer, that if we have an enlightened and independent man, we owe it to the Government of the day, and not to the Act. Admitting we have such an individual, was he pointed out by the Act of Parliament? But the whole thing is altogether illusory! What power or influence has a single individual, a mere member of the legislative, not of the general, council, when opposed to the other three members, and the Governor-General, who can controul them all four? I agree with Mr. Dickens, that so far from this being a protection, it is in fact the reverse. A person is sent out from England, who is a person of influence at home, p ly of parliamentary influence, and connected with e government. He is the connecting link bet ie Council here and the Board of Controul, as er members are between the Council and Court ec- tors, and he destroys the efficacy of the on eal you have from arbitrary power in this count The objection I have always made to a colonial re nce, is that if you are injured by the puppet of pow n a colony, your appeal to those who sent him th is a farce. (Cheers.) It has always been found . It is upon that ground amongst others that I diff from some of my friends, who desire that the Gove nment of this country should pass into the hands of His Majesty's Ministers. I do not desire it. I deprecate it altogether. I would not add the patronage to their influence, but, I say, divide power, and you lessen the te tation to abuse it. But, gentlemen, how is this fourth member to act? He may assist in discussing a law before it is enacted—in passing it, it cannot be said that he can be called upon to assist. What power has that one individual, as separate from the body of the Council, he coming here without any previous knowledge regarding the country? What weight will his voice have against the three others, long acquainted with this country, with a Governor-General who is in the same predicament with himself? and this is the great benefit and advantage we have gained! Truly we ought to be grateful for it! But is it the fact that this fourth member owes no special allegiance to the Company? Is he not as much a servant of the Company as the others? Does he not receive their pay? Is he not removeable at their pleasure? After a person has come out here, and given up, perhaps finally destroyed, his prospects at home for an appointment from which the Company can remove him, how is he to be called independent of them? His mind may be independent—his fortunes are not. (Cheers.) Next it is said, "is there any thing repugnant to the feelings and judgment of the requisitionists in the establishment of the Agra Presidency?" If the safety of the state had required this measure, that would have been a reason why we should cheerfully submit to the additional expense, but will any man tell me, while the whole controul, the whole responsibility, is vested in the Governor-General, and the Governor of Agra is a mere prefect, in what respect the Government of the Agra Presidency is likely to be better administered by the new arrangement than it would have been by a local Commissioner? This provision has the advantage of placing increased patronage in the gift of the Court of Directors, and the great disadvantage of increasing the expense here. Next comes —"is there any thing irrational or impolitic in the new organization of our ecclesiastical establishment?" I approach this topic with some degree of dread, because it is the fate of every man who doubts the wisdom of increasing the Church Establishments to be set down as an atheist, or at least as an enemy of the Church, by a certain party. To whatever obloquy, however unjust, the performance of a duty may expose me I must submit. I do not fear, however, being exposed to such obloquy in this assembly, although I do indisputably object to the increase of the number of Bishops at the expense of this country, and I ask with my intelligent native friend, whether it is just or reasonable that the people of India should pay for that increased establishment? I do not hesitate to declare my conviction that this provision was introduced, not by the desire of Ministers, but to conciliate a party. (Loud Cheers.) If I am an atheist because I oppose this measure, if I am an enemy to the Church, it is at least a consolation to know that I am one in common with the Court of Directors, who themselves were opposed to it. (Cheers and Laughter). If it is an object of British anxiety, let the British people pay for it, or rather let those pay for it who are now over paid to an enormous amount. Ten per cent. is not enough for the India stock-holders; pounds are not sufficient—"make it guineas," and the bargain is closed. (Laughter.) It seems to have been a kind of auction bargain. If they really are so desirous to have this increase of Bishops, let them give up their odd shillings —their half per cent. to pay for it. (Laughter.) It will be said, perhaps, that very little expense will be incurred, as the new Bishops are only to receive two thousand rupees a month; but we must not be deceived in this way—the salary is not the whole expense, and we shall soon be told that this salary is insufficient, as it is with reference to others of a similar rank, to maintain their station in society, and it must be increased. Next it is said —"Has mercantile ambition much to complain off in the total abolition of the tea monopoly?" London, Glasgow, Liverpool, Hull, and all the ports in England, all the tea drinkers of England, have reason to be thankful for it, but the people of this country have nothing whatever to do with it. The opening the China trade was insisted upon by the constituents of the House of Commons, the English people. In this way their representatives paid for the votes they got, and which in some instances were made to depend upon their being for or against what was called "the Indian monopoly;" but an Indian monopoly it was not; to us nothing has been given, and on this point we have nothing for which to be thankful. Then we are asked, "Does the appointment of the Indian Law Commission threaten to be a useless measure?" That has been answered by my friend Mr. Dickens. But I say the Act does not make such provisions in respect to it as we had a right to expect. All former Law Commissions with which I am acquainted were Parliamentary Commissions; the reports were made or at least submitted to Parliament, and published, and Parliament openly deliberated and legislated upon them. Here there is no provision in the Act to compel any reports, to stipulate for any publicity. The reports may be made in secret to the Governor-General, and adopted or rejected as far as he thinks fit, and laws may be passed upon the reports without an individual having power to remonstrate against them, though they may be ruinous to his interests and opposed to all his feelings. From the nature of their duties, the Commissioners may be many years (and to perform them properly, some will at least be required) before a report may be hoped for, or a code commenced. In my judgment, if their labours had rather been directed to the securing to all, the laws which belong to their religion, caste or country, as they at present enjoy them; simplifying the process and reducing the expenses; facilitating the approach and opening the avenues to justice, and increasing the number of Judges, so that parties had not to travel, as in many districts now, 100 miles to the station where the Judge resides; if, I say, these lesser, but first and more obvious objects had been submitted to them, they would have been likely to have conferred more real benefit upon the country, than by attempting in the first instance to form a code which ten years of previous labour and inquiry will scarcely allow them to commence. That the Law Commission was a most proper provision and its objects meritorious there can be no doubt, but its utility has been left to depend on the discretion and personal character of the parties who are concerned in it, and on that of the Governor-General, instead of being secured by legislative enactments and provisions for publicity in its proceedings. Next—"Is the resolution to abolish all kind of slavery in the British Indian possessions unpalatable or discreditable to the home government?" I know not where that resolution is to be found, except in empty declaration. It appears to me that the effect of the Act is to reduce every man in India to a state of slavery. (Loud Cheers.) I beg ten thousand pardons. I had nearly forgotten the only ground of complaint? Whether the writer of this article unaided, and of himself, has been able to discover even this blemish may be doubted. From his apparent admiration of the Act, I should rather take it for granted that he had some assistance to lead him to the judgment he has formed on this point. I do not know from what source he has derived his sensitiveness—his unbounded respect for the independence of British Judges. Who it is intended to conciliate or to please I can hardly imagine—there is indeed only one English Judge now here, and if it is intended to conciliate his favor, I should hope—nay, I am sure, he has too independent a mind to stoop to accept, or at least to be influenced by such a species of flattery. (Cheers.) But this is not the question for us—we are not met here to consider what may be palatable or unpalatable to any Judge whatever. We are to consider what is the best protection to the people, for whose benefit the Judge is placed in his station. In that point of view, I coincide in all the objections which can be urged to the destruction of the independence of the King's Courts. Situated as I am, I might posaibly have felt some reluctance to touch upon this point, if it had not been opened by the Native gentleman behind me, and my motives may even yet be open to misrepresentation or misconception; but I cannot but say, that I look upon the destruction or impairing of any of those checks upon power or misrule, which were reposed in the Supreme Court, or of its independence, as not among the least of the complaints to be urged by all British subjects and the inhabitants of Calcutta against this Act. That the Supreme Court was originally created as a protection against power and corruption cannot be disputed, and I do say, that whatever objections may be raised to the Supreme Court, this Act is a complete violation of the principles upon which the Court was established in the year 1773; for it places the Court under the Governor-General in Council, and gives him, with the sanction of the Court of Directors, the power of abolishing all the King's Courts. It has been endeavoured by many to raise every prejudice against the Court. It has been said that the natives of Calcutta have been ruined by it, and this assertion is to rest upon the authority of a gentleman greatly esteemed here, and once high in office in this country, and who has since obtained, at least for a time, considerable influence on Indian matters at home. I am compelled, however, to say that, by whomever that may be asserted, it is false and unfavorable. Let me know who has been so ruined—point out to me the man who has spent more in litigation in the Supreme Court than that which was required fairly to try the question of right or wrong, and I will soon satisfy any dispassionate inquirer, that it rose from those vindictive or malignant feelings, which lead men to litigation, rather for the purpose of gratifying their own evil passions, than for any trial of a right, and which no Court in this country can destroy or indeed controul. (Cheers.) That the Natives of Calcutta may complain somewhat of the expense which is attached to that engine of protection I will not attempt to deny; that it is expensive, though not as expensive as it is represented, I will not deny—for it is, and necessarily must be, attended with a considerable degree of expense, as long as it shall be necessary to have English Judges and English Barristers, until the natives themselves shall be enabled equally well to fill those situations. In the nature of things, European labour cannot be obtained here at the same rate as native labour, and still less so in a profession which requires a laborious and expensive education. It is the same in every department of European labour in this country. I have no doubt you would find a native, who would be willing to undertake the duties of Governor-General for less than Sa. Rs. 2,40,000. (Laughter.) I dare say you could find native members of Law Commissions and Legislative Councils for less than £10,000 a year, and yet even now the Government and Court of Directors have thought fit to send you, to fill those important situations at that price, a gentleman highly celebrated for oratorical powers in the House of Commons, and who once, as a member of my profession, according to his own account, held a brief on which he convicted a boy of stealing chickens, rather than have recourse to the cheaper assistance of my native friends. (Laughter.) I can find native Secretaries and Judges of the Sudder at less than £5,000 a year, but to say that the natives have been ruined by the Supreme Court, more than by the sums paid to other European functionaries, is to say what is contrary to the fact. Who is it that Mr. Holt Mackenzie referred to as ruined by the Supreme Court? I have heard that Ramrutton Mullick is one—the man from whom the Government, when Mr. H. Mackenzie was secretary, took nine lacks of rupees as a forfeit for not completing a purchase of salt, which they re-sold for a larger sum than that at which he had purchased, and for the return of which he has still a petition pending before the Court of Directors. (Cheers). But the question is whether those who participated in the protection which under former statutes it extended to them, are willing to pay the price of that protection. I would willingly put it to these victims of the Supreme Court whether they would see it abolished, and I would stand or fall by their decision. If I could poll the whole of the inhabitants I know they would say we should wish the expense reduced, but with all its expense we prefer it to any other tribunal, for there, whether particular decisions be right or wrong, justice is at least independently, honestly, and fearlessly administered. I have a personal interest in this I admit, but it is one that does not belong to me alone, nor is it one which I could support, if the opinion of the inhabitants of Calcutta were against me. This at least I will venture to say, that there is not a man living who can point out a single instance, since the first institution of the Court in 1773, to the present moment, of corruption or supposed corruption either of Bench or Bar; nor do I believe there is one native inhabitant of Calcutta who would wish to see it abolished. (Cheers.) If it is the expense of the Supreme Court which has influenced the legislature, let us see whether the same principle has actuated them towards the other high branches of Government. You will recollect that the last eight years has been a period of unexampled retrenchment and distress; all the officers of Government have been curtailed in the scale of their remuneration—I beg pardon; all except the highest. (Loud Cheers.) The civil service has suffered; the army, who could least afford it, has suffered; they have taken from the officer allowances which in the aggregate afford little to Government, but which involves in many cases the ruin, at least the destruction, of every comfort to the individual; the medical service in like manner has suffered; and during the same time the mercantile community has been overwhelmed with distress—a distress which has altered the whole aspect of affairs in India, at least in the Presidency of Bengal. Knowing all this, knowing how retrenchment had been pursued here among the subordinates, how every man's income and prospects had been curtailed, yet not one particle has been taken from the Governor-General, the Members of Council, or the Judges. (Cheers.) The framers of this Act have, on the contrary, inserted a clause to keep up, and for the present indeed to increase the salaries of the Governor-General and the Members of Council! (Loud Cheers.) When I allude to the reductions which have taken place, do not suppose I am saying that, when the exigency of the state requires it, reductions ought not to be made. When the just purposes of Government demand it, all must submit to it, and ought to do so without a murmur; but I say in that case it ought to be, and in those which have taken place, if they were proper, it ought to have been in fairness a rateable reduction, excluding none from its operation, but pressing equally upon all, (cheers,) and that the subordinates ought not to suffer whilst the high classes are left untouched. And yet it does so happen, that in this very Act a rather curious alteration has been made, whether in anticipation of the difference in the rate of exchange, I cannot say. By the former Act the Governor-General had £25,000, now he has two lacks and 40,000 Sicca Rupees. It would seem to be a reduction, but put that into pounds, shillings and pence, at the exchange of the day, two shillings and two pence, and you will find £1,000 a year has been put into his pocket—this was accident doubtless, for I do not suppose they had the gift of prophecy on the subject of the exchange, but it is a singular coincidence. (Cheers and Laughter.) A few words now, Gentlemen, with regard to the financial arrangement with the East India Company at home. The great objections to that are the extent of the dividend given to the proprietors, the increase to their stock fixing £100 stock at £200 sterling, the throwing the commercial debts on the territorial revenue, and exonerating from all liability the dividends of the proprietors. To me the latter appears to be little less than a fraud upon the public creditor in India. There are those who recollect the Company's Securities bearing 12 per cent. interest, and being at a discount. At that time people came forward and lent money to the Company; they did that not only upon the security of the territorial revenue, but upon the security of every thing which the proprietors of East India Stock possessed. The claims of the lenders were necessarily prior to the interests of, and even to the profits to be received by, the borrower; but by this Act the proprietors of East India Stock are to get their enormous dividend out of the revenue, whoever may go unpaid, and those who lent their money to the proprietors have their chief security taken from them; whilst by the operation of this provision all motive for economy is taken away—however lavish they may be, it cannot diminish their dividend—however parsimonious, it cannot increase it. Whatever they give, they pay nothing. I congratulate Ramrutten Mullick and others who have claims for compensation, upon their increased prospects of success, for the proprietors may well now be liberal when they have to pay away other people's money. Whether this arrangement was considered advantageous to the East India Company, may at once be seen by the result. What was the actual and instantaneous effect of the arrangement? Why, the stock which was under 200 per cent. before the arrangement, rose immediately to about 240; that is, every shareholder gained more than 20 per cent. at once added to his capital. Does not this prove the absurdity and impolicy of the arrangement as far as the English Government are concerned, and the injustice of throwing such an unnecessary burthen upon the territorial revenue of this country? That it has had its effect upon their liberality, already is sufficiently apparent. Their home servants, I contend, have always been paid more liberally in proportion than their servants in this country; if you take into consideration the destruction of health and constitution, the danger to life, the banishment, nay, I may say the imprisonment, which service in this country involves. How were their home servants paid, and what were their retiring pensions—infinitely higher in proportion—both the one and the other than those of the generality of their servants in this country? I am told that the Company gave to their tea taster £2,000 a year—a pretty liberal allowance for tasting tea. (Laughter.) If they would be content with morning and evening tasting, I should like to contract to do the work for one tenth of that sum—(Laughter) and now they have no more tea to taste, you will find they have given him a most liberal compensation—so again with regard to the compensations lately voted to the members of their maritime service—a most meritorious class of servants doubtless, but the compensations seem most extravagant—a Captain enjoys £250 a year for life, I think, with reversion of some portion to his wife and children; and that when he is probably in the prime of life, with the world before him, and his prospects unimpaired, as fit for service as ever, and his profession open to him—and so in proportion with the other grades. Is not this an indication that the proprietors, now they are sure of their dividends, do not care how much they give away? Has the alteration in patronage been made with more consideration to the interests of the public: what alteration has been made by the Act? Only giving an increase of patronage to the Board of Control and Court of Directors. (Cheers.) But what provision has been made to secure, by the distribution of the patronage, better servants for India, or what means of rewarding merit or services? None whatever. Mr. Canning and Mr. Wynn both endeavored, I believe, to direct some portion of the patronage to the reward of merit at the public Seminaries of England. There is no trace of such a desire in the present Act. I have heard that some years ago many officers having fallen in the wars of India, leaving little or no means of support for their wives and children, Lord Hastings sent home, and urged with all his influence, petitions praying that their claims might be taken into consideration, and some small portion of the patronage of the Company extended to those orphans whose fathers had fallen on the field of battle. I have heard that those petitions were indignantly returned, with a statement that the patronage of the Court was the patronage of each individual Director, and could not be interfered with. (Loud Cheers.) And this it remains at the present moment, as the means of paying the Directors, who have only £300 a year salary. I say the British Legistature ought not to allow the continuance of such a system. I will do those who have distributed the patronage of his Majesty's Army the justice to say that is not the case with regard to that army. I will do the same justice to His Majesty's Ministers, be they who they may —the claims of children of meritorious public servants have not often been overlooked—but no such principle is recognized by the East India Company. (Cheers.) Again, has the Act been more attentive to the improvement of the country than the former acts? By the 53d George III. a lack of rupees was directed to be given annually for the purposes of education—what has been done with that I do not know, probably it has been duly laid out, but in the present Act I do not find the appropriation of one single rupee to any Indian purpose whatever; nothing is directed to be spent upon education, roads or canals, or any work of public utility—all the surplus is required to keep up the enormous dividend of the home proprietors. (Cheers.) And this while the Court of Directors are unable to give a number of Courts of justice adequate to the wants of the people. There are in truth only two Courts in the whole presidency of Bengal, the Supreme Court and the Sudder Adawlut, for the rest are simply single individuals. How different from the feeling of Parliament in the year 1773, when the East India Company having applied to borrow a sum of money from the British Parliament, resolutions were proposed by Lord North, and carried, that the Company should not be at liberty to increase their dividend beyond six per cent. till they had paid that debt, or beyond seven per cent. till their bond debt was reduced to £1,500,000—that principle also has been lost sight of, and they are to receive 10 per cent. without paying any of their debts, or providing even for the due administration of justice. One other point alone, but that a most important one, remains on which I shall detain you: I mean the providing some sort of legislative representation. I may be asked from what class shall the representatives be chosen? I do not care. But will it be contended that India cannot furnish them; that out of ninety millions of persons of the governed, and some thousands of intelligent Europeans, of the nation of the governors, there are none to be found capable of advising the government? I do not contend even that they should have absolute legislative powers; give the same power as at present, if you will, to the Governor-General as to adopting or rejecting laws—but will any man tell me that all the inhabitants of all the presidencies are so destitute of knowlage, of information and ability, that you cannot find one, or ten, or a hundred if need be, who could assist the Government in its work of legislation? There is not a petty colony in the West Indies—there is not a convict colony belonging to His Majesty, which has not some semblance of representation—they may have more or less power—but do not tell me that all you can do for India, in the way of a legislative council, is to send out a gentleman of great oratorical powers as fourth member of council, who is also to be the head of a law commission which has been in existence a year and has not sat a day. All my predilections, Gentlemen, are in favour of the men who passed this Act, but I do say that I never saw a worse Bill passed by any Parliament, reformed or unreformed, or one that evinces less consideration for the interests of those who ought to have been first considered, and more consideration for the interests of those who ought in common honesty to have been last considered. (Loud Cheers.) Idleness, carelessness, recklessness of the rights and liberties of those to be governed, are its great characteristics. There is not one provision contained in it for which we could be thankful, to which some clause is not tacked, rendering it a mere illusion. Believing this, and feeling that as an Englishman, I am in danger of being deprived of British Laws which I consider as my birth right, whilst no other inhabitant of India has reason to be grateful, I have given all the assistance in my power to inform the Commons of England what the people of Calcutta think of this measure. The time chosen for the meeting, which has been objected to, is, I say, a good one—even if it be late, I say "better late than never." But if we had come forward sooner, it might have been said we acted with precipitation—the Charter had yet scarcely been acted upon—the Government of Agra had not been opened—the Governor of Agra was still resident in Calcutta—Vice-President in Council—whilst the Governor-General and Council of India (the one member of it) were enjoying themselves in the salubrious air of the Neilgerry Hills, and the law-commission was not even filled up. If, however, we have been late in coming forward, the inhabitants of Calcutta do not seem to evince an indifference to the subject. There is one thing that cannot be said, whether we are right or wrong in the view which we take of the subject, that there has not been as large, as anxious and as patient an assembly this-day of the inhabitants of Calcutta as was ever collected in this place for the purposes of a public meeting. To their kindness, and to their patience, I am myself deeply indebted, but it would not have borne to have been thus pressed upon, except for the interest which the subject, and not what has been said, has excited. If I have warmly expressed myself, I am sure there is not one who knows me who will not believe there is no person more sincerely desirous of promoting the welfare of the country at large, or of the mother country, to which I hope to return, than myself, and they know the predelictions which I entertain; but while I live in any community I will not sit down calmly under a sense of injustice, by whomsoever committed, without expressing my sentiments. (Loud Cheers.) If this meeting had not come forward, I should have presented a petition in my own name, and in the names of those who have acted with me. I rather think I shall do so still, for I like plain speaking, and I should go a little further than this petition. I have, however, no right to pledge others to a similar extent; but we have at least a right to expect, and the petition hardly asks for more than as good a government as that bestowed upon Ceylon, a country somewhat similarly situated, but more happy at present in its constitution, for there is an approach there to a better legislative council, and what is perhaps of as much importance—publicity in its proceedings. Has this part of India a right to expect less? and we may at least say that there never was a period when the inhabitants of Bengal forfeited their right to good, to free, and liberal government by disaffection or disturbance. (Loud Cheers.) I will now, gentlemen, read to you the petition that has been prepared for your adoption.

PETITION TO PARLIAMENT.

[THE PETITION WILL BE SENT IN DUPLICATE, PROPERLY ADDRESSED TO EACH HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT.]

The humble Petition of the Inhabitants of Calcutta.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That by the Act passed in the third and fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, and entitled an act for effecting an arrangement with the East India Company, and for the better government of His Majesty's Indian territories till the 30th day of April, 1854, your petitioners feel aggrieved, inasmuch as they humbly conceive that only the first of these objects has been in any degree attained; and that although an arrangement very beneficial to the East India Company has been effected, such benefit has been bestowed at the expense of the inhabitants of India, of every class, and that no secure or reasonable provision whatever has been made for the better government of His Majesty's Indian Territories.

That the arrangement which has been made, is one which benefits the East India Company at the expense of the inhabitants of India, is plain from the provisions of the 9th Section of the said Act by which the whole bond debt of the East India Company in England, as well as the debt called the territorial debt, and every other kind of debt and liability whatever is charged upon the revenues of India, without examination of the accounts by which the debt (so called) was made to appear territorial; whilst it is further provided by the same Section that neither any stock or effects which the said Company may hereafter have to their own use, nor the dividend of £10 10s. per cent. by the Act secured to them, or the Directors or Proprietors shall be liable to, or chargeable with, any of the then existing debts or liabilities.

That such arrangement benefits the East India Company alone is further plain from the provisions of the 11th Section, by which it is provided that out of the said revenues there shall be paid to the Company for their own use a dividend of £10 10s. per cent. half yearly:—by the provisions of the 12th Section, by which £200 sterling is to be paid for £100 stock as the price of redemption:—by the provisions of the 13th Section, by which the Company is entitled to demand redemption of their stock at the rate aforesaid in case of their ceasing to retain, or being deprived by authority of Parliament of the possession and government of the said territories: and lastly by the provisions of the 17th Section, by which the said dividend of £10 10s. is to be paid in preference to all other charges payable in Great Britain; which in effect, as the East India Company is left in possession of the whole government of India and the control of the revenues thereof, is as much as to say in preference to all charges whatever. By all which enactments your petitioners submit an injustice has been done to the whole body of Indian creditors holding Government Promissory Notes given for money unquestionably borrowed on the security of the territorial revenues, and on that security alone; inasmuch as their security, which was express in terms and prior in date, has been suddenly and without an opportunity of objection made secondary, in order to pay the commercial capital of the East India Company, with which the commercial assets alone were chargeable; while although the dividends on East India Stock are further secured to the Proprietors of the Company by the provisions of the 14th and 15th Section of the said Act, creating a guarantee fund to accumulate to the amount of 12 millions sterling, the territorial creditors are in nowise secured against the injurious effect of a perpetual drain of greatly more than a million and a half sterling annually from India, the revenues of which, while decreasing, are thus encumbered with an immense additional burden.

That not only has injustice been done to the territorial creditors by these enactments, but the condition of every man and every class of men in India is made worse by the exorbitant provisions of these sections, and no class of men benefitted, but the proprietors of the East India Company; for the effect of these enactments must necessarily be to reduce the salaries of the European servants of Government of all descriptions, so as to render the reward of labour scanty and return to their own country, always remote, in most cases impossible; to cripple the efforts of the merchant, and diminish commercial activity and enterprize by the scarcity of money, which an annual drain of capital to such an amount must needs produce; and finally to fill the reflecting landholder in Bengal [the country which has hitherto been looked to, to supply all deficiencies] with a just alarm lest the permanent settlement of the land revenue fixed in 1793, by Lord Cornwallis, should also at some future, yet no distant period be set aside, when it shall become evident to all men that the sums charged upon India by this act, cannot be paid without increased taxation.

That your Petitioners are so seriously impressed with the belief that the difficulties which must arise in making these payments, are so great as to be almost insurmountable, and the discontents that are likely to be produced in the endeavours to meet them may be so great as to be dangerous, that they deem it necessary to mention other sources of useless expense created by this act, that they might not otherwise have thought important enough to call to the notice of Parliament.

That the creation of a new Presidency at Agra is calculated apparently for no other end than to increase expense and patronage inasmuch as by the provisions of this act all political power and responsibility are taken away from the Governor and centred in the Governor-General of India, and your petitioners are not aware of any increase of benefit to be expected in the civil administration of the upper provinces of the Presidency that can compensate for the increase of expense, which is beyond doubt.

That the extension of Episcopal establishments of the Church of England, (even though as your petitioners admit, the extension has not been as yet effected on an expensive scale) is still an entirely useless burden, and moreover a grievance laid upon the great body of the people of India, and your petitioners humbly submit that if such extension of the Episcopal establishments be deemed of importance by the people of England, that the expense thereof should be paid out of the dividends of £10 10s. per cent. on India stock, or otherwise provided for by Parliament, out of the revenues of England.

That your Petitioners submit that the only legitimate object of taxation is civil government, defence, and improvement of the country to be taxed; that the only legitimate object of extension of territory or colonization, is the extension of knowledge, civilization, trade and commerce. That whilst roads, canals, and public institutions are almost unknown throughout India, whilst it wants nearly all that Art can do to promote the prosperity of a country, more of its surplus produce than ever, will be by the provisions of this Act sent to England for the advantage of an English Company of proprietors, or applied to objects alike foreign to its usages, its people, and its interests, and wholly unnecessary for the purposes of good government.

That while the financial consequences of the arrangement with the East India Company, and the other provisions of the act before noticed, are most burdensome and prejudicial to the inhabitants of His Majesty's Indian territories they can find in the other provisions of this act no secure or reasonable provision for their better government.

That this is the case seems plain to your petitioners on a summary of the changes effected by this act, and which your petitioners humbly suppose are intended to be the securities provided by the wisdom of Parliament for their better government. That as far as the changes in that part of the government of India, which is carried on in England are concerned, it appears to your petitioners that the whole material difference consists in this, that by the 20th Section of the Act, two more of the Cabinet ministers of the Crown are made ex officio members of the Board of Commissioners for the affairs of India, and all real and substantial political powers (except that arising from the possession of patronage) are transferred to the Board of Control from the Court of Directors.

That with respect to patronage and the power of nomination to the civil and military service of the East India Company, the Government of India remains as appears to your petitioners in precisely the same state that it was in before the passing of this act, for the whole result that can be expected from the complex and numerous provisions of the 103d, 104th, 105th, 106th, 107th, 108th and 109th Sections (if any material result at all can be expected) is that the government of the institution or college of Hailebury may possibly be improved, while all other matters relative to the granting and distribution of such appointments are left unchanged, and the civil service remains as exclusive and segregated from the national and all other establishments of education as before, so that the provisions of the 87th Section of the Act, whereby it is enacted that no native of the said territories, nor any natural born subject of His Majesty, resident therein, shall by reason only of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour, or any of them be disabled from holding any place, office, or employment under the said Company, seem likely to be confined in their effect, during the period of twenty years to come, to the barren assertion of a principle that indisputably ought to prevail in all governments.

That in consequence of the omissions of this Act the power of appointment to the public service still remains attached as a personal perquisite to the individuals composing the Court of Directors, and while the Court of Directors itself as a body, will not exercise the power, neither the Board of Control, nor the Supreme Local Government have the right or can exercise the power of appointing a single individual to any office in the Civil, Military, or Medical Service of the country, however great may be his claims or however valuable the services performed by his family. That your petitioners submit that this mode of appointment to public employments is obnoxious in principle and injurious in practice, and that it would be more just and convenient to remunerate the services of the Directors of the East India Company by competent and liberal salaries than to continue a system so faulty and invidious, which gives them a power over public appointments, commonly exercised on the same principles as if they were dealing with matters of private property.

That as far as the Act affects the local government of India its effects upon the inhabitants of the country, may be thus not unfairly characterized, viz., that the inhabitants of Calcutta and every Englishman throughout the Presidency have been deprived of the security they before possessed, that no local law repugnant to the law of England should be imposed upon them while the great body of the people have gained no additional security for better government whatever.

That so far as the inhabitants of Calcutta of all classes, and all Englishmen not in the service of the East India Company, are affected by the provisions of this Act, they find the security they have enjoyed for more than a century, by the establishment of Courts of Justice created by Royal Charter and the authority of Parliament, and proceeding on the known maxims of English law, threatened by the extraordinary provisions of the 46th Section which declares, that it shall not be lawful for the Governor-General in Council without the previous sanction of the Court of Directors, to make any law or regulation whereby power shall be given to any Courts of Justice, other than the Courts of Justice established by his Majesty's Charters, to sentence to the punishment of death, any of his Majesty's natural born subjects born in Europe, or the children of such subjects, or which shall abolish any of the Courts of Justice established by his Majesty's Charters.

That your Petitioners of all classes, inhabitants of Calcutta, are most desirous to retain the security they derive from the institution of the Supreme Court of Judicature, and your petitioners, who are natural born subjects of his Majesty's, born in Europe, and now in the East Indies, respectfully but still with firmness maintain that they are entitled to the protection and support of the law of England, in common with all other Englishmen, having committed no fault for which they should be deprived of them. And they further maintain that it would be a breach of the law of England and the maxims which have always governed the conduct of Parliament to suppose, that a body of Englishmen could be deprived of every political right and personal security, and subjected to the punishment of death even, without trial by jury, provided the previous sanction of the Court of Directors were obtained to such proceedings.

That your Petitioners who were born in the United Kingdom can see no pretence of reason for depriving them of the security of their own law in this country, while their Mahomedan and Hindoo fellow-subjects of the crown are still left and must be left to enjoy their own.

That while your Petitioners affirm that they have been deprived of securities and the great body of the people of India have gained no additional security for good government, they are well aware that the termination put to the commercial existence of the East India Company, the opening to the people of England of the trade to China, and the permission to Englishmen to settle in the provinces which composed this presidency on the first January, 1800, are advantages, which cannot in a candid examination of this Act, be overlooked or denied; but your petitioners beg leave to observe that the first named of these changes is a matter which almost exclusively benefits the people of England, and that the permission to reside without licence is rendered insecure and valueless by the uncertain state in which the laws respecting Englishmen seem purposely left; and that, finally, the injustice under which this country labours in having extremely high and almost prohibitory duties imposed on one of its staple productions, sugar, and by many other vexatious commercial restrictions and unjust differences is still unremoved, and the several West Indian colonies are benefited at their expense. An inequality the more striking, since in the course of the same session in which this Act passed, there was bestowed on the West Indian colonies, at the expense of England, a compensation for the loss of slave property to the amount of 20 millions sterling, while by this Act annual burdens to a sum which it would require nearly 20 millions to redeem were laid on this country for the benefit of one English company and no compensation whatever afforded.

That no additional security for better government has been gained by any class of men in India, your petitioners conceive is further plain from the following facts, viz.—

That by the 43d Section of the Act an absolute power of legislating is given to the Governor-General in Council with no proviso that saves the rights of any man or class of men, but only a proviso (deemed necessary as it would seem by Parliament) to save the prerogative of the crown and supremacy of Parliament itself, from destruction or diminution by the legislative power of the Governor-General in Council!

That the provisions for the repeal or disallowance of any obnoxious laws that may be made in pursuance of such prodigious power still rests, as it did in substance before, with the ministers of the crown; that the provisions of the 46th Section afford no protection to the class for which it legislates; and that the provisions of the 47th Section for promulgating future laws do not prescribe even the very scanty security under the authority of Parliament of a publication of laws for a reasonable period previous to their enactment, which has been granted even to Ceylon, a country nearly or similarly situated with India, while the provision of the 40th Section that one legislative member of the Council of India is not to be a member of the Company's service must be looked upon as no security at all, since it will be the Board of Control and the Ministers of the Crown who will henceforward be committed by a previous approval of the future legislation of India to its support and not the Directors of the East India Company.

That moreover, as humbly appears to your petitioners, any consideration of the constitution of the new Council of India in its legislative capacity, is rendered of no importance by the provisions of the 49th Section, by which, in effect, the Governor-General of India for the time being is rendered the sole legislator, responsible only to the ministers of the crown in the first instance, with such possible responsibility to Parliament as even at such a distance, may be supposed by some to exist.

That in the humble judgment of your petitioners the result of all these provisions, which they suppose to be intended to secure their better government must be characterized by the same terms nearly as those they have employed to characterize the provisions for effecting an arrangement with the East India Company, viz., that while the great body of the people of India has received no additional security for good government whatever, the body of Englishmen resident here has been deprived of one most valuable to them, so that no men are the less ter for these provisions of the Act, but the Ministers of the Crown who have acquired additional, and in India by delegation, almost absolute and uncontrolled power.

That in fine, your petitioners humbly conceive that pending the immense labour of future legislation imposed by this Act on the local government, it was unnecessary and unwise to remove any securities possessed by any class of men until it could be seen that something better for all was to replace them; that the constitution of a legislative council might easily have been rendered more popular, and more useful; for your petitioners are persuaded that in all the presidencies many men could be found out of the pale of the East India Company's service, whose knowledge would prove most valuable in the task of legislation; and though your petitioners do not at present assume to point out with whom the power of selection should reside, yet they do solicit that a less exclusive body of men, and some possessing local property and knowledge should be added to assist the legislative council in all matters relating to the making of general laws even though the selection should for the present remain with the Governor-General in Council; and further, that the plain and obvious security of a previous publication for a reasonable period of time of all proposed laws before their enactment, should be given to the people of India and means provided by which they could lawfully, peaceably, without offence, and with the sanction of government, meet to make known their objections to such proposed laws before their enactment, and be heard on such objections before the legislative council; and that whatever may be the constitution of the proposed legislative council, their proceedings may be made public at least, if not publicly conducted.

That your Petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your Honorable House will be pleased to take into its deliberate consideration the foregoing matters and apply such remedies by amendments of this Act and new enactments as shall seem calculated to remove the evils complained of by your petitioners, to retain the securities for their rights and for good government they already had, and really to improve their condition, and your petitioners, who are among the most loyal and attached subjects of the Crown of the United Kingdom, shall ever pray, &c.

"That the Petition just read be adopted as the Petition of the Inhabitants of Calcutta and be presented to both Houses of Parliament."

Mr. Burkinyoung.—Gentlemen, it may seem presumptuous in me to come forward to second this resolution, but concurring in all the sentiments expressed in the petition, and knowing that others around me entertain the same feeling, I do so with great pleasure. I will not detain you at this late hour by adding any thing more.

The Resolution as proposed by Mr. Turton, was then put by the Sheriff, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Hare.—Gentlemen, allow me to say that when I look around me, and see so many natives coming forward in association with Europeans to support their rights, I feel this to be a proud day for India. (Cheers.) I have seen very many meetings in this city, but I never recollect seeing one more numerous or more respectable. (Cheers.) It has also been my lot to have attended a great number of public meetings in England, and if I recollect right, it was the custom for the Sheriff to sign the petition on behalf of all. In accordance with that custom I now move—

"That the Sheriff do sign on behalf of the inhabitants the respective Petitions now adopted by this meeting."

This Resolution was seconded by Mr. Hogg, put by the Sheriff, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Dickens.—I have now to submit to you a proposition which is necessary to give effect to what has been done. I therefore move—

"That a Committee of the following gentlemen be appointed to have the several Petitions now read and adopted, engrossed, and when signed by the Sheriff, on behalf of the Meeting, presented respectively to his Lordship the Governor-General, and the two Houses of Parliament.

W. Adam.
Dwarkanauth Tagore.
Russik Lal Mullick.
E. M. Gordon.
Russumoy Datt.
T. Dickens.
L. L. Clarke.
C. Hogg.
F. H. Burkinyoung.
D. Hare.
T. E. M. Turton.
W. Young.
J. Sutherland."

The above resolution, having been seconded, was put by the Sheriff, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Longueville Clarke.—Gentlemen, before we separate, we have still one duty to discharge, and a pleasing duty it will be to us all. It is to offer our thanks to the Sheriff for the manner in which he has presided in the Chair. But I must not permit this opportunity to pass without congratulating you, that the first meeting at which the proper constitutional officer of the city has presided, should have been so numerously and so respectably attended, and convened for objects so important to us all. One objection which has frequently and not improperly been urged to placing the Sheriff in the Chair at our public meetings will, in a great measure, be removed, should the prayer of your first petition prove successful. It has constantly occurred, that the Sheriff was in the service of the Company, and the very object of the meeting, or what transpired at it, might place him in a painful situation, and he might be exposed to reproof, for permitting sentiments to be uttered, which would be considered as opposed to the interests of those whom he served. But should your Petition succeed, and this most illegal and obnoxious order of the Court of Directors cease to be acted upon, then that direct interference which is now assumed by the Government over our public meetings will be at an end, and their servants will be more independent in the discharge of their duties as citizens. But while I congratulate you, Gentlemen, I must also congratulate our Sheriff, that it should have fallen to his lot to be the first constitutional officer of this city, who filled the Chair, at a meeting so numerous, so respectable, and so unanimous. I say, unanimous, and I say that this is an object of great congratulation, for attempts have not been spared to sow dissention among us. But the attempt has signally failed, and although repeated in the Englishman of this morning, and a cry sent forth, that those who coincided with the writer should rally to support his views, yet these views have met with no countenance, and the writer himself has departed. Gentlemen, this cannot but remind you of what was sung by the Poet, that "He who fights and runs away

Will live to fight another day;
But he who's in the battle slain;
Will never live to fight again." (Laughter.)

So sung the Poet, and it would appear that the prudence which he inculcates has not been thrown away on the prose writer of this paper. (Laughter.) I have hitherto abstained from addressing you, Gentlemen, under the expectation that these articles in the Englishman were but the prelude of an opposition which would be offered; for that opposition I reserved myself, for I prefer speaking in reply, and I knew that the resolutions needed no support from me, when the zeal and abilities of my friends were inlisted in their behalf. Had the attempt been made to divide the meeting, I would have been prompt to oppose it, but as it was not, I have abstained from intruding on your time further than to discharge this pleasing duty of moving that our thanks be given to our Chairman.

The motion was carried unanimously, the Sheriff then returned thanks, and the meeting broke up.

We insert the conclusion of the Report of the proceedings of the important Meeting of Monday last at the Town Hall, and the whole will now be thrown off in the pamphlet form, for the benefit of those who may desire to possess such a connected and complete record of those proceedings.

We had intended to remark at some length on the discussion respecting the Charter on this occasion, but as in the Bengal Herald, we are, to a considerable extent anticipated, we shall be excused, perhaps, for adopting a portion of the leader on the meeting in that paper:—

"The discussion on the new Charter though last in order, was certainly not least in importance. We hope Messrs. Dickens and Turton will not consider us as ungrateful for the powerful aid they gave to the cause of good Government by their speeches on this memorable occasion, if we express our dissent from some of the opinions delivered by them on the subject of the Charter. We will first mention the points on which we cordially agree with them, and then refer to those on which we unfortunately differ. 1st. We think, that a most nefarious preference has been given to the home creditor over the holder of Company's paper in this country. No thorough inquiry was made whether the commercial creditor at home had any just claims at all on the revenue of India. 2dly. No provision (by lightening the duties on Indian sugar) for paying the enormous additional sum to be extracted from India, and to be made over to the quasi creditors at home, was made in the act renewing the Charter. 3dly. It is still left a matter of doubt whether a Governor-General has the power to deport Englishmen without trial. 4thly. The amount of power intrusted to Governors General is immense. We wonder why councellors were given at all. If men were not sufficiently wise and honest to make their votes on every question, to say the least, as valuable as that of a stranger, which the Governor-General always is, then why should they be members of the Government at all? If, as is constantly assumed by English Statesmen, public men in India are inferior to public men at home, surely the Indians are not inferior in the rates of 4 to 1. Are we unreasonable in thinking, then, that on two thirds of the Council differing from the Governor-General, the latter ought not to be permitted to act in such a case on his own responsibility? 5thly. We entirely agree with Mr. Dickens, in thinking that the Act should expressly have enjoined, that no new law affecting the interests of Europeans or Natives should be binding without having been previously published for a given time, for the information of all concerned. 6thly. Publicity should have been given to the proceedings of government by throwing the doors of the Council Chamber open, and by the subsequent publication of the proceedings in the newspapers. 7thly. Something more explicit on the subject of education and something more liberal on the subject of the employment of natives, ought to have been enacted. 8thly. No addition to the ecclesiastical establishment should have been made; and the salary of the previously existing Bishop ought to have been cut down. The points on which we differ with Messrs. Dickens and Turton, are as follows:—1st. We do not think the Government of the East India Company, on the whole, would be as good, in these days, as by responsible Ministers of the Crown; and, at all events, it is perfectly monstrous that there should be two Home Governments. 2dly. We entirely protest against the doctrine, that the Parliament of England can effectually legislate for India. 3dly. We think hard measure has been given to the enactments regarding the Law Commission. What that Commission may or may not do we think it is absolutely impossible to decide on à priori. The production of mere uniformity of laws, even if practicable, will form but a small part of the labours of that Commission, if it does its duty. The great importance of this subject will probably tempt us to return to it. In the mean time, we congratulate our readers and the public on the triumph, the glorious triumph, which the cause of good government has gained, by the late meeting, for we think it will be impossible for the Governor-General here, or the Parliaments at home, to disregard the Petitions of the most numerous, the most respectable, the most orderly, and the most unanimous meeting that ever assembled in Calcutta for political purposes."

A correspondent of the Courier charges the objectors to the Charter with having been extremely tardy in bringing forth their objections to it. To this Journal, at least, that charge does not apply, for before Mr. Grant's Bill became law, as soon as we first saw his proposed arrangement with the East India Company, we entered our protest against it in a very elaborate article, in which we went into an analysis of the whole scheme, and we have again and again returned to the subject and expressed our indignation at the utter indifference to the interests of this people which the whole Act manifests, with few exceptions. We do not underrate the importance of abolishing the China monopoly, nor are we blind to the fact, that indirectly that measure will benefit the people of India—we do not underrate the value of the partial removal of the restrictions on European settlement; but cannot it be said that in either of those measures the interests of the people of India were especially considered, that they were even thought of by those who proposed and carried those changes? We believe on the contrary, with Mr. Turton, with respect to the first, that Ministry yielded to the influence of the new constituencies under the Reform Bill, to the voice of the people of England and not to any consideration of the contingent benefit of the natives of India. As for colonization, impediments are still left in its way, and the despotic power of summary deportation instead of being expressly taken away, is entirely repealed if repealed at all, by implication and negative construction!! Is that the way, we ask, in which such a boon should have been conferred? It is actually left doubtful, whether a Governor-General might not now transmit a European, nor would a professional gentleman of talent find any difficulty in arguing for the existence of that power. Where then, we should be glad to know, are the mighty benefits conferred on India by the New Charter? Her Government remains as costly as ever, and ten times more despotic,—her expenditure is increased to meet the claims of greedy proprietors,—the Christian hierarchy is augmented at the expense of the Hindoos,—Indian commerce is still placed at a disadvantage,—there is not a word about education in the charter, so that even the farthing per cent., the one lakh of the old charter, is not secured by law to that great object. With all these and other defects we are told, that this is a measure for which we—no—not we, but the people of India, are bound to be thankful to His Majesty's Ministers, whose wisdom devised, and whose power made it law! What the intelligent natives do think of it, Mr. Charles Grant will soon learn from the speech of Baboo Russick Lal Kristna Mullick—a speech which may give public men in England some notion of what the Hindoos are capable of. Russick Lal is one of many here, of equal talent, independence and public spirit.

One point on which we have not dwelt, and which has been admitted even by the admirers of the charter, to be a defect in it, is, that of the subjection of the Supreme Courts to the executive authority. Some of our readers no doubt will recollect the part we took in the case of the collision between the Bombay Court and Sir John Malcolm, and the severity with which we condemned the conduct of the Tory Ministry, in re-calling Sir John Peter Grant. We considered, and we maintained on that occasion, although some of our warmest friends and supporters widely differed from us, that the very principle on which King's Courts were instituted in India, that of affording to the inhabitants of the Presidencies, some check against the misrule and oppression of the Company's servants, was violated in the recognition of the right of the executive to interfere with the jurisdiction of those Courts. We are still of that opinion—and even Lord Ellenborough has come round, it seems, to that view of the case, since there was no part of the charter on which he animadverted more severely than that, which was in truth in conformity with his own doctrines and practice when in power! We know that some of the most ardent friends of the liberty of the subject, hold that the check imposed on the enactment of arbitrary laws, by the Local Governments, by the condition of registry in the Supreme Courts, is vicious in principle, and not likely to be attended with benefit in practice. It cannot be denied that such a system does, to a certain extent, transfer the power of legislation from those to whom it properly belongs, to those whose duty, under a good system, would be wholly administrative; but what we hold is this, that that check defective as it was in principle, ought not to have been taken away until an open, comprehensive, responsible Council, fit to be entrusted with full powers of legislation, was established. That done, we would agree at once in taking away from Judges even the negative legislative power of rejecting a law; for we have no wish to see the legislative and judicial functions blended; but what the Charter does, is to take away that check while it renders the government more despotic and less responsible than ever!

There is another point to which we have not yet adverted, and on which we do not exactly agree with one of our legal friends, who addressed the meeting. We mean that of the unqualified objection to Courts presided over by a single Judge. Now, if there is one point which Bentham has more successfully argued than another, it is that, of the advantage of a single Judge, provided always that Judge be duly qualified for his office. We admit, however, that under the existing system of English law, and while interst rather than qualification guides the selection of them, a plurality of Judges is necessary. Judges may be compared to chronometers—if you have an exceeding good one—you are better without any more, but if you have one, on which you cannot fully depend, you require others as checks—and that has been precisely the case as to Indian Judges. The Ministry have felt that their selections have in general been made without much reference to qualification, so much so, that it is a matter of astonishment, that our Bench has exhibited so much talent: but still we believe that no instance can be referred to, in which this community have not felt the want or the advantage of the check of a plurality of Judges, and hence the inference in favour of the necessity of them: but they would not be necessary if proper men were selected under a proper system of laws: and it is important always to bear in mind the distinction between what is sound in principle, and that which is merely defensible on the plea of expediency.—Bengal Hurkaru.

OPINIONS OF MESSRS. TURTON AND DICKENS.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru and Chronicle.

Sir,—As you have somewhat mistaken the opinions entertained by Mr. Turton and myself on the three points specified in your leading article of yesterday, I am induced to write you this explanatory note. I think the matter of sufficient consequence to require it, although not very desirous to make a comment on my own speeches. I think so, because although in fairness the meeting of the inhabitants can be taken to have assented to nothing but what is contained in the Petition, yet all that we uttered as members and advocates of a body of men entertaining generally the same opinions, may be loosely ascribed to them, and a right apprehension of our expressions thus become important to their cause; it is besides of some importance (and I feel it so) to myself.

What was said by us on this occasion must be always taken to refer to the Act under discussion. The speeches made, must be read as commentary on certain provisions of that Act, made by the Inhabitants of Calcutta, not by any means as attempts to point out in the character of statesmen or lawgivers, a general and comprehensive scheme for the better government of India: a much more undivided attention than either of us could bestow, would be necessary to enable either with propriety to attempt to address any public assembly on such a subject. With this introductory observation, I will come to the points you specified as those on which you differed, and you will find that on two of them at least there is perhaps no difference between us. First then, we do think (for I believe I can answer for both) that the Government of the East Indian Directors alone, would be better than the double which is established; and we think that if the constitution of the Court of Directors were improved, and the distribution of patronage in their hands well directed for the common weal, that they would in any case be a better instrument of government than a Government board, or Members of the Crown, more especially since the commercial existence of the E. I. Company has terminated. You see, Sir, that the necessity for two home Governments is not apparent to us. Secondly, we never held the doctrine that Parliament can effectually legislate for India. Thirdly, we never assumed to decide on what the Law Commission could or not do "à priori;" but I did venture an opinion that it could not make a uniform code of law and process. Our sentiments on the last named two points may be generally thus expressed:—we do not by any means object to the appointment of a law commission, or deny that it may be productive of great good, that it was not highly desirable that the attempt to improve the state of the laws was not called for; but we are of opinion that the instruction given to the law commission by the Act (if instruction it may be called,) is not sufficiently guarded or clear; that Parliament ought not to have left the Governor-General alone to point out the direction and limit of their labours; that the reports of the Commissioners when made, should have been referred to Parliament to be considered in committee or that at least when so vast a labour as a new code of law was complete, and before its imposition, that code itself ought only to have been imposed by the authority of Parliament. And we hold that the most intelligent legislative assembly in the world, ought to have been more anxious than it has shown itself, to seek for a subject of debate of such great dignity and importance as the composition of an entire body of law for nearly 100 millions of subjects and its imposition upon them. These matters are now referred in substance to some future Governor-General, and probably some future President of the Board of Control.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

Calcutta, Jan. 12, 1835. Theodore Dickens.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MEETING.

This meeting of the Roman Catholics of Calcutta was convened at the Church in Moorgeehatta Lane, on Wednesday evening the 14th January. On the motion of Mr. P. S. D'Rozario, seconded by Mr. C. R. Lackersteen, Mr. J. Michie took the chair, expressing his hopes that the same kind feelings which called him to the chair would support him in the performance of its duties. Mr. Michie proceeded to explain the object of the meeting, which was that as Roman Catholics they should express their opinion regarding the assumption of power over them by foreign priests on the part of a foreign potentate. As Catholics they were bound to obey the follower of Saint Peter, namely, the Sovereign Pontiff—to which he could not suppose on what ground any objection could be made. They obey him in spirituals—he is responsible for the appointment of pastors over them. But in temporal matters they owed allegiance to his Britanic Majesty, from whom they received protection. They had nothing to do with the king of Portugal either in spirituals or in temporals. The allegiance in spiritual matters that was due to the Sovereign Pontiff, like two parallel lines, can never compromise or interfere with the allegiance due to King William IV. He did not believe that even the Sovereign Pontiff could give a right to a foreign potentate to exact obedience from them. He has a right to send Apostolic Missionaries, but wherever they go, it is on condition of acting as faithful subjects of the power they go to. Here, foreigners not only boldly but (he would be pardoned for saying) impodently claimed obedience from them to the king of Portugal. Such obedience was impossible. As subjects of Britain, they might have to proceed against his most faithful majesty. They had seen a document which some had described as seditious; certainly the tenor of it was nothing less than to induce a belief that their allegiance was due to a foreign power.

Mr. VALADARES, who had ever and anon interrupted the chairman, now proceeded to state his objections, in doing which he begged the indulgence of the meeting for his defects in the English language. He produced the document which had been condemned for sedition, and declared it was all a mistake as not a word was said in it about sedition. The Portuguese, he said, had first introduced Christianity into these parts, and had built the church at Bandel in 1599; it signifies nothing what change of government has since taken place; allegiance was due to the nation that first established the church. The Portuguese clergy required in that document that no submission should be paid till a reference was made to the Bishop of Meliapore, and surely the people might have waited till then. Only three months ago almost all the gentlemen present had left the church, believing that they owed allegiance to the Bishop of Meliapore. Where was their consistency now? The Portuguese nation brought the Christian religion to India; and had converted upwards of 200 souls, and now when other clergy had arrived, the Portuguese clergy were to be turned off unceremoniously without so much as thank'e. Mr. Valadares excited some merriment by his strange phraseology, and much confusion prevailed.

Mr. R. DIAS rose to reply. When the Catholics submitted to the Bishop of Meliapore, it was because there was no superior authority; and the authority to which they now submitted was derived from the Sovereign Pontiff, who is every where admitted to be the supreme head of the church. Mr. Dias proceeded to comment on portions of the document. It attacked, he observed, a man who had come from a great distance, at a considerable expense, with the most benevolent views—who has done more to enlighten them, to heal their breaches, and to conciliate opposing parties than the Portuguese priests ever had. It emanates from men who preach the doctrine of obedience, while they are the first to refuse obedience to the Sovereign Pontiff of Rome and his delegate the Vicar Apostolic. It was supposed that the Bishop of Meliapore was paid by the king of Portugal; but, it was no such thing; that king had as little to do in the matter as himself; nor could the king send out the Bishop, for there has been no Bishop at Meliapore for the last forty years. It was said that we owed much gratitude to the Portuguese priests; true, but for what?—for good dinners—for light when we were in darkness—witness the Bandel illuminations. Nothing was due to the Portuguese priests, who had been more than paid for what they had done. The conversions were owing to the Jesuits not to the Augustines. Since 1804 these Augustines raised 300,000 rupees. Fre Manoel de S. Teresa died worth 40,000 rupees and Fre Mosquito 14,000 rupees. At Bandel they raised funds to the amount of seventy or eighty thousand rupees; at the Boitacannah church to the amount of 100,000. Did these Portuguese priests give the people sermons in English? When English sermons were proposed, Mr. Texeira studied English and thereby did much good—he spoke a language they did not understand, but which he called English. Mr. Dias concluded with a warm eulogy on the Rev. Dr. St. Leger, expressing a hope that all would join hand and heart in upholding him.

The business of the evening was then proceeded with.

Mr. JOHN LACKERSTEEN noticed the arguments of Mr. Valadares, though he could not call them arguments but assertions. Mr. V. had said, that not three months ago, when there was authority from Meliapore to excommunicate the Vicar, all deserted the church, but as soon as the new clergy arrived, they deserted the Portuguese priests. This was a charge of ingratitude which every honest man would wish to rebut. His reply was, that they submitted to superior authority. The Sovereign Pontiff is an authority every where acknowledged. If they find a bull or brief from him appointing Dr. St. Leger, are not they bound by that authority? Are they then to be told of gratitude, and to pay no obedience to the authority of the Roman Pontiff and thereby become no Catholics but schismatics? When he first saw the document in question, he considered it seditious; it might be explained away, and it might not even mean so much, but he took it in the sense that it appeared to bear. The document asserted that the delegate of the Pope was not to be acknowledged, unless he had the sanction of the king of Portugal. He could scarcely suppose such a doctrine would be held by Roman Catholics, but must have been started by an enemy to their tranquility. The Augustines acknowledge the Pope's brief, yet cannot acknowledge the Vicar Apostolic without authority from the king of Portugal. What! cannot British subjects apply for British pastors without the consent of the king of Portugal? The framers of the document, the Portuguese priests, may be subject to that sovereign, but the people here are not. The only part of Mr. Valadares' speech which he (Mr. Lackersteen) understood was about the gratitude due to the Augustines. Now he should be glad to know what they have done; what liberal measures they have promoted; what schools they have established? They had had a hand in erecting churches but it was because churches were a source of revenue to them. Mr. Lackersteen concluded by proposing:

That this meeting view with indignation the sentiments contained in a document recently published by the Portuguese Clergy in Calcutta, and deny the existence of any right on the part of the Crown of Portugal to nominate Pastors for the Catholic Church in Bengal; that they acknowledge the Pope to be the Supreme Head of the Catholic Church, and as such, entitled to their obedience in spiritual matters, but that in all temporal concerns they owe allegiance only to the British Government, and they reject any authority which might interfere with their duty as British subjects.

Mr. A. HEBERLET seconded the motion, which was unanimously carried.

Mr. J. D'M. SINAES said that after the speeches the meeting had heard, he felt great diffidence in addressing them, nevertheless he was not willing to refrain from giving expression to his feelings, and he would consider it a dereliction of duty to submit quietly to usurpation. In the speeches of his friends, the authority of the Portuguese priests had been fully combated, so as to render further explanation unnecessary. As Catholics, the meeting could not recognise any other authority than that of the Holy See, nor yield obedience to any but the head of the church. They would reject with indignation this shadow of a bishop who had presumed to interfere when his authority could not be recognised. The resolution he had to propose would be a call on them to support Dr. St. Leger as the supreme ecclesiastical authority in Bengal. In reviewing the past labours of the Augustines, he confessed he could perceive no monument to testify to their deeds and attach the people to them. To them he might apply the words of Dr. Johnson to Lord Chesterfield: 'I hope it is no cynical asperity not to confess obligations, where benefit has not been received.' Already had the Catholic community derived important benefits from the Vicar Apostolic and his colleagues, and it was their intention to support his authority as supreme in Bengal in ecclesiastical matters. He proposed:

That in conformity with the preceding resolution, the members of this meeting consider themselves conscientiously bound to acknowledge the most Rev. Dr. St. Leger as the Vicar Apostolic and Supreme Catholic Ecclesiastical authority in Bengal, and they further consider it incumbent on them to support him to the utmost of their power, in the exercise of the high authority delegated to him by the Sovereign Pontiff.

This resolution was supported by Mr. M. Crow, who in a long speech which time will not permit us to give, explained the grounds of his conduct and and showed his consistency in supporting the Vicar Apostolic.

Mr. SPEED was of opinion, that the resolution proposed by Mr. Sinaes did not go far enough; he therefore proposed the following addition:

That in addition to the present resolution, we declare our intention not only to support the Vicar Apostolic, but express our willingness to unite with him in any application to the Local Government or other superior authority that he may deem necessary.

This addition was seconded by Mr. M. Lackersteen. The resolution and addition were both carried, nem. con.

It was then proposed by Mr. Leal, seconded by Mr. Vandenberg:

That the feelings displayed against the improper and unwise conduct of the Priest at Meliapore and the Augustine Friars, are not applicable to the Rev. Fre Antonio de Santa Maria but that the chairman should convey general thanks to him for his conduct to Dr. St. Leger and his colleagues, thereby testifying his ready submission to the supreme authority of the Catholic Church.

Mr. DISSENT proposed, seconded by Mr. T. Gregory:—

That this meeting deem it necessary to present a petition to the Government expressive of their duty and allegiance as faithful and loyal subjects, and praying, that the Government will be pleased to support the Vicar Apostolic, who, as a British subject is entitled to that protection, in the exercise of his spiritual jurisdiction in Bengal; and that their feelings of loyalty may not be further outraged by the pretensions and interference of the Portuguese Clergy.

A petition that had been prepared by Mr. Lackersteen, to be presented to Government if approved by the meeting, was read by that gentleman. The petition was unanimously agreed to. The document lies in the parochial house of the Moorgeehatta Church for signature.

The following resolution was moved by Mr. Dias, seconded by Mr. Speed:—

That the gratitude of the Roman Catholic community is due to the Rev. Dr. St Leger for the useful and instructive assistance he has afforded with the co-adjutant of his clergy since his arrival in the country.

It was then resolved that a deputation consisting of the undermentioned gentlemen should present the petition to Lord William Bentinck:—

Messrs. J. Michie, John Lackersteen, P. S. D'Rozario, G. T. F. Speed, James Robertson, M. Crow, and R. Dias.

Thanks were then voted to the Vicar for the use of the church, and to the chairman for his conduct in the chair.—Englishman.

MEETING OF PROPRIETORS OF THE UNION BANK.

At a meeting of Proprietors, held on the 15th January, Captain Vint in the chair, the business commenced by reading the following:—

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

The lapse of another half year requires that the customary periodical report of the past six months' operations and their results be laid before the proprietary body. There is little to detail to you, for the transactions of the Bank have been quietly and steadily prosperous, and no troubles have occurred during this half year such as disturbed previous corresponding periods and figured in our reports.

The following are briefly the results of the past six months.

The nett gain realized amounts to Sa. Rs. 56,207 2 5, equal to a rate rather exceeding 7½ per cent. per annum. Compared with the profits of the corresponding six months in 1833, (or Sa. Rs. 51,826 14 11,) the present half year (1834,) has the advantage. It has still more the advantage of the last half year ending in July, 1834, which only yielded 45,545 Sa. Rs., but that is always a less active season for business than the latter months of the year. Your Directors, on the whole, are satisfied with the state of the Bank, which appears to be gradually gaining ground in public estimation, as a useful establishment for accommodation to all classes engaged in business, and for cheap and secure deposit of floating funds at moderate interest, or their advantageous investment in our Bank Stock.

Although the circulation of our Bank notes does not show symptoms of speedily rising to the height at which it stood (13 lacs) before the great failures in 1832 33,—still it does make some progress; for during the six months now elapsed, the circulation has increased by comparison with the like six months of 1833, nearly one fourth, vibrating from about five lacs to less than three. The period for comparison is chosen because at this time last year the Bank of Bengal had not (then) indicated its hostility against our circulation. That hostility, might have been expected to operate for a time in conjunction with the effects of panics and disasters fresh in the recollection of the Bazaar, in preventing the otherwise natural return of confidence and increase of a circulation based like our's on the solidity of a paid-up capital and an association of a numerous body of known and substantial Stockholders. But it seems sufficiently plain that the active endeavours of the protected establishment have failed in the expectation of forcing Union Bank Notes out of circulation, or even diminishing their amount. On this subject it remains only to report that his Excellency the Governor-General having returned to this Presidency, copies of the correspondence and proceedings relative to the discussions with the Bank of Bengal have been officially forwarded, to be laid before his Lordship, by your Chairman, pursuant to your resolutions passed at to the Special General Meeting of the 17th February last.

It is satisfactory to be enabled to conclude this Report by stating that the general business of the Bank, during the period it embraces, has been quite as large as a prudent application of its means would admit. Depositors have increased, both at the Presidency and from remoter quarters, and in the class of accounts fixed at interest as well as in that of open running accounts. If accommodation to applicants engaged in production and trade has in too many instances been withheld, or supplied more scantily than the interest of commerce and those of the Bank itself rendered desirable, the cause is to be sought not in the unwillingness but the inability of the Directors to take even the most unexceptionable business frequently offered with the comparatively small capital at their disposal, and under the limitations and reserves prescribed by prudence and by their primary obligations to their constituents, the proprietors.

BENGAL MILITARY BANK.

The general annual meeting of depositors in the Military Bank took place on the 15th January, in the Town Hall. The meeting was thinly attended, three depositors only being present. Several Directors, however, were in their places. The accounts, of which we give a brief abstract below, were laid upon the table for inspection; of the conversation which ensued the following is the substance:—

From what fell from the Directors, it appeared that the present state of the funds of the Institution had arisen, first, from advances made, previous to the last five years, on landed property, which, in every instance, where the Bank was a mortgagee, had fallen considerably in value,—much below the amount advanced; and secondly, from the alleged inability of the mortgagers to pay the interest of the sums advanced. Several instances were brought forward, but the conversation chiefly turned upon those of two functionaries of Government, one filling a lucrative office in the Supreme Court, and the other receiving Rs 1,200 per month, in a subordinate department. The amount of principal of the bond of the former was Sa. Rs. 95,000, on which one year's interest only was due; and the amount of principal of the latter Sa. Rs 46,522, on which, with the exception of an amount of Rs 458, no interest whatever had been received since the date of the bond, 10th December 1824. As to the former, it was stated, that a compromise had been offered; viz. Rs 80,000; that is, the Directors had received Rs 20,000 in cash, and an acceptance, considered as good as cash, for Rs. 60,000, on condition, that the depositors agreed to the arrangement; but with regard to the bond for 46,522 no offers of an arrangement had been made. The property mortgaged to the Bank for Rs 95,000, has been recently valued at Rs 70,000; but, in the opinion of one of the Directors, it would not bring near that sum if now exposed for sale, and on the property mortgaged for Rs 46,522, according to the same authority, the Bank would be subject to a still greater loss. The question as to the compromise of Rs 95,000, with one year's interest, being about Rs 1,01,882, for cash in hand, Rs 20,000 and an acceptance as good as cash for Rs 60,000, total Rs 80,000, came first before the meeting.

Captain Rawlins, of the Artillery, strongly protested against any compromise being made with the functionaries of Government, the more so in this case since the mortgager was enjoying a most lucrative situation. He did not object to a compromise so far as to abandon the one year's interest now due, but the principal Rs. 95,000, he considered ought to be paid. If the individual could not induce his friends to come forward with Rs. 15,000 more than was now offered, he thought the person of the mortgager ought to be seized under the bond; and, as in the case of various distressed officers, he might seek the benefit of the Insolvent Act, yielding up, as they had done one half of the pay received from Government for the liquidation of his debts.

Captain Birch, one of the Directors, thought the offer made by the mortgager was at least worthy of consideration. The regular payment of the interest evinced a desire to do that which was fair; and he did not see how the Bank would be benefited by pursuing the individual, who, the Directors had ascertained, was deeply involved elsewhere.

Mr. R. C. Jenkins, another Director, was of the same opinion, and declared, from what he knew of the affairs of the mortgager, that the offer was one which the Bank ought to accept. He was aware the mortgager was deeply embarrassed with the late agency houses, though he thought it right to add, his difficulties originated not in mercantile speculations, or extravagance, but in having assisted his connexions, who were deeply engaged in the Indigo trade, with large advances.

Conductor Gilbert said, he was a pensioner and about to return home, after having been in this country a number of years, and having saved Rs. 5,000 which he invested in this Bank fully expecting, that it would be ready at his call, he thought the mortgager referred to, ought either to pay or to seek the benefit of the Insolvent Act. But subsequently, the Conductor took a different view of the subject, and was willing that the Bank should compromise the debt for Rs. 80,000. Whatever was done, he thought the property ought not to be brought at the present time to the hammer, for the sales made by the assignees of the various houses had completely glutted the market, and, perhaps, in three or four years better prices might be obtained.

Mr. R. C. Jenkins, on the contrary, thought that landed property was looking up just now. With regard to the offer of a compromise, and the situation the mortgager held under government, he knew, that he was in embarrassed circumstances, and it would be well for depositors to remember that the emoluments derived from his situation were solely dependant upon his health, and that should he have to retire, they would entirely cease.

Captain Rawlins had reason to believe that the mortgager was not in the embarrassed circumstances in which he was said to be, on the contrary, he was informed, that he was contemplating a voyage home next year. But be that as it may, he thought that friends would come forward and advance Rs. 15,000 more than now offered rather than suffer the mortgager to be disgraced by having recourse to the Insolvent Act; for in his opinion it was a disgrace for any gentleman to have recourse to that act. The mortgager seemed to consider this Military Institution as a mere House of Agency, but the fact that the depositors included widows and children of privates in the army ought to make him strive to meet his debts as if they were of a more sacred character than due to a mere mercantile establishment.

Mr. R. C. Jenkins believed if the property was now put up for sale, that it would not bring more than Rs. 50,000, and taking into consideration the other claims on the mortgager, he did not hesitate to say, that it was highly desirable that the Bank should accept the compromise now offered. Perhaps when Captain Rawlins was aware, that the Assignees of the Agency Houses were frequently induced to make arrangements with the debtors for payment to be made at the end of three years, and then accept the sum in cash, less the discount, he might be induced to withdraw his objection.

Captain Rawlins said, he never could consider this institution as an Agency House, and desired that his protest against a compromise with a government functionary might be recorded.

Much conversation followed, the Directors being unanimously of opinion that the mortgager having regularly paid the interest of the principal, was entitled to consideration, and that under the circumstances in which he was situated, the compromise was highly desirable. Conductor Gilbert also acquiesed in this arrangement; but Captain Rawlins declared that he would sooner lose the greater part of his deposit (Rs. 39,000) than consent to any such condition, and he was also authorized to say that he represented the opinion of another depositor, a captain in the army. He was willing to waive the interest of the principal, but he would go no further. It was then determined that Captain Rawlins' protest should be made known to the mortgager, leaving the Directors to act as they thought fit under the protest against a compromise.

Considerable discussion followed with regard to some property mortgaged to the Bank in 1826, and which had been sold by auction in 1830 to Aga Korboli Mahomed. It appeared the Aga had endeavoured to get rid of the bargain, and owing to the supineness of the Bank's former attorney, and the difficulty of getting all the parties to join in the conveyance, a Bill in Equity to compel the purchaser to complete his contract had not yet been filed. The Bank had recently employed another attorney, who had assured the Directors, that the Bill was in a forward state, and would be filed at the end of this month.

The property mortgaged for Rs. 45,000 next came under observation, and the same objections as were made in the first instance against making any compromise were applied to this. It appeared that the mortgager had made no efforts to effect an arrangement, and his circumstances were represented to be in such an embarrassed state, that there would be no hope of his ever discharging the bond. It was then determined, that this and other lots of mortgaged property should be put up at auction, on an early day, and sold if the biddings exceeded Mr. Sheriff's valuation.

Previous to the meeting dissolving Captain Rawlins drew attention to the formation of the Institution. He, for one, had clearly understood that it was established with the sanction of government, or rather, that it was a government establishment, and so he thought would any one so consider it who was aware that it was promulgated in Government General Orders and recommended to Captains Commanding Companies by the then Major General Commanding the Forces, and if any thing was wanting to strengthen this opinion, it was the fact that Government appointed three of the Directors. If the other depositors would consent, he would have no objection to join in a suit against government for the amount of the deficiency.

The Secretary said, that the opinion of two leading barristers had been taken on the subject, and both were decidedly against the instituting of any proceedings against government. The Secretary also mentioned that a petition had been presented to Government from the non-commissioned officers and privates of the 38th Regiment, who were depositors to the amount of Rs. 10,000, and they were in daily expectation of a reply.

It appeared, that the assets of the Bank now consist of mortgages amounting with arrears of interest thereon to Rs. 582.275; a claim upon Alexander and Co. for about Rs. 11,000, and Cash and Company's Papers to the amount of Rs. 23,483; while per contra, the amount to the Depositors' claims is about Rs. 6,26,000 without interest. According to Mr. Sherriff's estimate the present value of the property under mortgages only ..... Rs. 2,39,792 to which, adding the purchase-money to be paid by Aga Korboli Mahomed,..... 68,970

Total..... ..... Rs. 3,08,762

which, with the funds in hand, would be sufficient to pay the Depositors in full without interest; namely, twelve annas in the rupee to such of them (representing about two lakhs) as have only received four annas, and eight annas to the rest.—Englishman.

This having been submitted to Mr. Mercer, and that gentleman having acceded to the terms, it was resolved.

8th.—"That the Committee of Management offer their thanks to Mr. Mercer, for having so readily complied with their recommendation in arranging the amount of the Secretary's salary."

At a quarterly general meeting of the subscribers to the fund, held on Monday the 12th of January, 1835, Mr. Surgeon F. Corbyn being called to the chair, the proceedings opened by reading the report of the Committee of Managers for the past quarter, from which was learnt the following particulars.

The Committee had much satisfaction in recording the sanction of the Honorable the Court of Directors to the establishment of the Fund, as conveyed in the paragraphs of a letter to His Excellency the Right Honorable the Governor-General of India, published in General Orders under date the 10th ultimo.

By those paragraphs, though it appeared, that the Court had not been pleased to allow to the Medical service the full extent of the prayer of their Memorial of the 20th of February, 1833, with reference to the number of annual retirements solicited, and to benefits being allowed to the fund, similar to those granted to the Madras Fund, yet the Committee were satisfied that there was reason to congratulate the service upon the decision of the Honorable Court, so far as it had gone, and they accordingly submitted the resolutions passed by them on the occasion, as well as that with reference to the Secretary's salary, for the approval and confirmation of the meeting.

The terms which the Court had declared themselves prepared to sanction to the fund, were three annuities, each of £300, payable through the Treasury of the Company, with interest at six per cent. per annum, on the balance of the funds, and exchange upon remittances at two shillings the sicca rupee.

During the past quarter no returns had been made from the Civil or Military pay departments of the recoveries effected from subscribers on account of the fund, and by those that had come to hand, it appeared, that some subscribers had not as yet paid their contributions, and that others had not paid theirs agreeably to the rule on that head in the regulations of the fund. The entire payments from the establishments from the fund, brought up in the Civil department to the 3d quarter of the official year, 1833-34, and in the Military to the month of April, 1834, exhibited the sum of sicca rupees 43,118 7 5. The disbursements for the last quarter was sicca rupees 120, and the total expenses for office establishment, printing, &c. from the commencement of the Institution, up to the 1st of January, 1835, was sicca rupees 1,246 12-8.

According to the regulations of the Fund two gentlemen, Messrs. Egerton and Pearson, the senior and junior in the management, went out by rotation (but were eligible to be re-elected) whose places, as well as that of Dr. A. R. Jackson, who was temporarily elected a manager, were to be filled up by the subscribers at large. Messrs. Corbyn and Bramley were re-elected last year to the management, and the others, Messrs. Garden, Grant, and Spens, were elected during the course of the year.

The following gentlemen, Messrs. G. Baillie, J. Hall, J. Allan, P. Carruthers, and W. Cameron, Surgeons, and Mr. T. Oxley, Assistant-Surgeon, had been added to the list of subscribers, and Mr. E. T. Harpur, Surgeon, and J. McGaveston, Assistant-Surgeon, had withdrawn from it. At present the subscribers to the Fund were one member of the Medical Board, 8 Superintending-Surgeons, 61 Surgeons and 121 Assistant-Surgeons —total 191.

Upon the report being read it was moved by Mr. Pearson, seconded by Mr. Corbyn, and carried,

1st. "That the Report read be adopted, and confirmed by the meeting."

The following letter received from Colonel W. Casement, C. B., Secretary to the Government of India, Military Department, was then read.

No. 101.

TO SURGEON H. S. MERCER,

Secretary Medical Retiring Fund.

Military Department.

Sir,—1. I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, observing with reference to certain paragraphs of a Military letter No. 19, dated the 11th July last, and published in General Orders of the 10th ultimo, that the Committee of Managers of the Medical Retiring Fund, request information on some points which they consider of essential moment to the interests and prosperity of the Institution.

2. I am instructed to acquaint you in reply, that the Honorable Court of Directors having expressed themselves prepared to sanction the Institution of a separate Medical Retiring Fund, leaves no doubt of their final decision in its favour, provided the rules and regulations framed for the guidance of its members are found to be unobjectionable.

3. The Governor-General of India in Council has no reason to doubt that the Honorable Court will sanction a clause making it obligatory on all Assistant-Surgeons entering the service after the establishment of the Institution to become subscribers to it, and His Lordship in Council does not contemplate that any objections will be made by the Home Authorities to the Committee being allowed to possess an unlimited control over their surplus funds.

4. The Committee of Management is recommended to submit as early as practicable a draft of the regulations of the Institutions for transmission to the Honorable the Court of Directors, under whose consideration the Government will at the same time bring the points adverted to in the 3d paragraph of your letter.—I am, &c. &c.

(Signed) WM. CASEMENT, Col.

Council Chamber, 7th January, 1835.

It was here stated that copies of the regulations of the Fund had been transmitted to the Honorable the Court of Directors along with the Memorial on the subject of the Fund.

After some discussion on the question, as to the propriety of offering at present, for acceptance, annuities from the funds, which some were willing should be declared, it was proposed by Dr. Jackson, and carried unanimously.

2. That the payment of annuities be postponed until the final sanction of the Honorable the Court of Directors be received, authorising the establishment of the fund, with the conditions refered to, in the letter just read.

The disbursements of the society for the quarter were next submitted and passed, and the meeting then broke up with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

H. S. MERCER, Secretary.

Calcutta, 13th January, 1835.

It may be observed here that it is the intention of the Committee to solicit through Government that the Honorable the Court of Directors will be pleased to sanction the annuities to be granted from the fund, to have retrospective effect from the date of its formation, i. e., the 1st of January, 1833, and that with reference to a Member of the Medical Board, the value of his annuity, after two years service, shall progressively increase yearly, till in the last year, he shall be only entitled to it on paying up its full value, according to the Fund Table—conditionally that such a rule is approved of by the department at large.

H. S. MERCER, Secretary.

HORTICULTURAL AND AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

We seldom notice the monthly meetings of the Horticultural and Agricultural Society, except by publishing the Secretary's Reports of proceedings, when we receive them. We were tempted however to attend the meeting, as its object was to choose Office Bearers, and we had heard of Dr. Wallich's intention to resign the Secretaryship which had been pressed upon him some months ago. When about a dozen gentlemen had assembled in the room at the Town Hall decoted to these meetings, Dr. Wallich stated the inconvenience to the Society which resulted from his conducting the business of its Secretary, living as he did so far off, and having his time occupied with the duties of the Company's Garden. Mr. W. N. Low was accordingly proposed and consented to relieve him of the charge, and the rest of the Office Bearers were appointed as follows:

PRESIDENT—Sir Edward Ryan.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—Lieutenant-Colonel Dunlop, Doctor Wallich, C. K. Robison, Esq., His Highness Nuwab Tuhowur Jung, and Baboo Radakant Deb.

COMMITTEE—James Pattle, Esq., Dr. Strong, Joseph Willis, Esq., William Storm, Esq., W. R. Martin, Esq., Major Honeywood, Dr. Bramley, David Hare, Esq., James Kyd, Esq., W. Earle, Esq., John Bell, Esq., Baboo Cossinauth Mullick, and Baboo Radamadub Bonerjee.

At the suggestion of Dr. Wallich, the allowance for establishment was increased to 100 rupees per month, to enable the Secretary to keep a clerk, the correspondence having become very voluminous.

A letter from Captain Sage was read, reporting that out of 378 Cape vine cuttings furnished to the Dinapore Branch Society's Garden, 219 had arrived in a good state for vegetation.

Just then Mr. Pattle entered the room, and on being told of the resignation of Dr. Wallich, he addressed the meeting on the inexpediency of permitting so great a loss to the interests of the Society, and suggested that Dr. Wallich should be entreated to continue to hold the office of Secretary—at least until the return of their President from the Cape.

Dr. Wallich reiterated his objections and further observed that the matter had been disposed of by the election of Mr. Low; but this gentleman promptly removed the objection of form, and offered to give his aid as an assistant to Dr. Wallich, who upon this condition yielded to the unanimous solicitation of the meeting.

A proposition was then made by Dr. Strong, that the Society should petition Parliament for an equalization of the duties on sugar, coffee, tobacco, and other colonial produce in the ports of Great Britain. This produced a good deal of conversation, Mr. Pattle, Major Honeywood and other thinking that such a petition was both foreign to the particular duties of the Society, and unnecessary, as petitions had been sent with the same object by the merchants and by the inhabitants of Calcutta, and besides, the matter had been taken up at home by the Court of Directors and H. M. Ministers had already pledged themselves to grant the object desired. A majority, however, including Dr. Marshman, Mr. Hare, and Mr. W. R. Martin, were of opinion that the subject could not be pressed too often, and that it was their duty to urge it as a measure greatly tending to the benefit of Indian agriculture. It was therefore determined to call a special meeting on Wednesday the 28th January at ten o'clock, for the purpose of a Petition to Parliament, praying for the equalization of duties on the produce of the East and West Indies.

As the meeting was breaking up a letter from Government was received, announcing that, as requested by the Secretary, parcels of seeds, &c. specially declared to be forwarded for the use and objects of the Society, might be sent in the Government Steamers without charge.—Calcutta Courier.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society, held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments, December 6, 1834.

K. M. Scott, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Bengal Service, was elected a Member of the Society.

Thomas C. Hunter, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, Bengal Service, was proposed as a Member, by Messrs. Bramley and Twining.

Read a letter from Henry Ashton, Esq., President of the Athenæum at Liverpool, acknowledging on the part of that Institution, the receipt of the 6th vol. of the Transactions of the Calcutta Medical and Physical Society.

Read a letter from J. G. Malcolmson, Esq., Secretary to the Madras Medical Society, announcing the safe arrival of various duplicate works on the Medical Sciences presented by the Calcutta Society, and offering the best thanks for the same on behalf of the Madras Medical Society.

The following letter was read from Dr. Hunter Lane, of Liverpool:—

"Your letter communicating to me the honour which your Society had been pleased to confer on me, was duly received. In acknowledging its receipt I cannot more sincerely express my gratification at the subject of its contents than by stating that a just appreciation of the influence exercised by the Calcutta

Medical and Physical Society over the professional opinions of the European Faculty, and the respect which its Scientific character must universally constrain would have indicated it as one of the objects of my highest ambition, and in return, I shall endeavour not to allow my connexion with the Society to be a mere nominal association but one that will demand my feeble contributions.

If the volumes of my Journals sent herewith should be thought worthy the acceptance of the Society, I shall be happy to have them entered in its Library. I am just now engaged in the publication of Tiedomann's Comparative Physiology, in an English form, a copy of which I shall take an early opportunity of forwarding to the Society."

WORKS PRESENTED.

Dr. D. Davis's Work on Operative Midwifery, presented by Dr. McGowan.

Liverpool Medical Gazette, vol 1st, and Monthly Archives of the Medical Sciences, vol. 1st, presented by the Editor, Dr. Hunter Lane.

A bottle containing powder of Turpethum, was presented by Dr. Wallich on behalf of Mr. Piddington, and the following letter read:—

"May I request that you will have the goodness to present the accompanying pint bottle full of powdered Turpethum root, to the Medical and Physical Society at their next Meeting, on behalf of Mr. Piddington, who has sent it to me for that purpose. He says 'it is atleast 6 or 7 years old,' alluding, I presume, to the powder, not the root. I have written to Mr. Piddington to inquire if the powder is of the bark, or of the root, only."

Preparation of an aneurism of the aorta which burst into the pericardium: presented by Dr. Duncan Stewart. The following brief notice of the case accompanied the preparation:—

"It is a case of aneurism of the arch of the aorta. A small false aneurismal bag proceeds by a narrow neck from the true aneurismal enlargement of the upper (the convex, superior or cervical) portion of the arching vessels; there is a slit or fissure in it, where it burst into the pericardium which was found full of coagulated blood. And besides this little bag there are two others in progress where ulcerated apertures have taken place through the inner coats. No disease was found in any of the valves or other vessels."

M. J. BRAMLEY, Secretary.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society, held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments, January 3rd, 1835.

Thomas C. Hunter, Esq. Assistant-Surgeon, Bengal Service, was elected a member of the Society. Previous to the ballot being taken for the election of a Vice-President and other Office Bearers for the ensuing year, Mr. Bramley intimated to the Society, his wish not to be re-elected Secretary, in consequence of his being engaged in other duties, which so occupied his time as to render him incapable of devoting that attention to the Society's affairs, which the importance and variety of their details demand.

Mr. John Tytler, in a short address, informed the Society, that as he was about to proceed to sea, for the benefit of his health, he was under the necessity of relinquishing the office of Vice-President.

Votes of thanks were unanimously passed in favour of Messrs. Tytler and Bramley, in acknowledgment of their Services, the former, as Vice-President, and the latter, as Secretary.

The ballot box was then circulated for the election of Office Bearers for the year, when the following gentlemen were found to be duly elected.

Vice-President.—Dr. N. Wallich, M. D. F. R. S. &c.

Secretary and Treasurer.—James Hutchinson, Esq.

Assistant ditto ditto.—H. S. Mercer Esq.

Foreign Secretary.—W. Twining, Esq.

Members of the Committee of Management.—Messrs. Garden, Egerton, Stewart, and Bramley.

Members of the Committee of Papers.—Messrs. Cameron and Spens.

A specimen of an aceto spirituous tincture of cantharides was exhibited to the meeting at the request of D. S. Young, Esq., Senior Staff-Surgeon, Nizam's Army.

This tincture, Mr. Young has been in the habit of using for the two last years as a rubefacient and blister, if with the former intention, the part is once lightly touched, and if with the latter, it is to be rubbed, by means of a piece of leather or cloth dipped in the liquor, for three minutes, by which time, it is said, there will be an efflorescence perceptible on the skin; the part is then to be covered over with a piece of muslin, and in two hours perfect vesication will be found to have taken place. In cases of infantile remittent fever, in which there may be occasion to apply a blister, Mr. Young found the tincture to answer admirably. On the whole he considers it a very elegant substitute for the common blistering ointment, and much more speedy and certain in its operation. Mr. Young requests in the event of the preparation not being generally known in Calcutta, that trials may be made with it; and the specimen was accordingly made over to Mr. Twining and Dr. Stewart for that purpose. The mode of preparing the medicine is not specified.

The following preparations were presented for the Museum.

1st. An urinary calculus extracted by the natural passage, by Dr. Stewart, M. D., accompanied with a memorandum of the size of the calculus.

2nd. An urinary calculus extracted by the lateral operation and models of two instruments used by native Lithotomists, by William Bell, Esq., Kemaon Local Battalion.

The calculus Mr. Bell removed from a middle-aged man by the lateral operation, slight peritonitis followed, which was speedily subdued by antiphlogistic measures, and the patient recovered. The calculus is supposed to be of the common aithic acid species. The two models of instruments are those we use among the native Lithotomists, about Almorah. Mr. Bell states that sometime ago he witnessed the operation performed on a child of eight years of age. By means of two fingers of the left hand the stone was secured against the arch of the pubis, an incision was then made over the part and the stone hooked out. The operation appeared simple, and according to the Lithotomist's statement, had been very successful, only one casualty having occurred, among sixty persons on whom it had been performed. Mr Bell counted 30 calculi, of all sizes and shapes, in the Baid's possession, which he said he had removed in the way described. The operation which Mr. Bell witnessed terminated successfully, but he is inclined to doubt if it always does so, from having lately been consulted in a case in which excoriation from stillicidium urinæ had taken place to a shocking extent.

The instruments are rude to a great degree, the knife not unlike the common Hindoostanee razor, but less clumsy; and the hook little else than a piece of iron bent at right angles, at about an inch and a half from its extremity.

3. Specimen of the fungus of the eyelids extirpated from a native by C. C. Egerton, Esq., and presented by that gentleman.

The following communications were presented.

1. Additional notes and cases on the cure of hydrocele by the injection of a solution of iodine, by J. R. Martin, Esq.

2. Case of hydrophobia in an European child, by William Twining, Esq.

3. Appendix to the case of dracunculus, presented at the last meeting, by William Twining, Esq.

The following papers was then read and discussed at the Meeting.

Notes of six cases of colicer pictonum treated in the Howrah Seaman's Hospital, by D. Stewart, M. D.

These cases occurred among the crew of a ship lately from England, who during the voyage to Madras, a period of about four months, are stated to have lived on salt meat stowed in leaden tanks. From the departure of the vessel from Madras to her arrival here, eight weeks elapsed, during the whole of which time the crew enjoyed fresh meat and vegetables, and a remarkable circumstance is stated to be, that though the crew looked sickly, and suffered from irregularity of bowels, headache, lethargy and loss of appetite, no case of colic occurred for eight weeks after the tainted meat was left off; then indeed eighteen or twenty cases of violent colic supervened almost simultaneously, nine of which proved fatal under different practitioners. The severer cases were characterized by violent spasms of the lower belly, shooting down the insides of the thighs and legs, affecting the loins and chests; there was generally some sense of tightness round the head. The pulse was quite natural. Costiveness was an invariable symptom, and the worst cases were seized with fits, which generally proved fatal. Of the six cases recorded by Dr. Steward, the first occurred in a young man of 21 years of age—with the other symptoms he complained of head-ache; leeches were applied and purgatives and enemata exhibited, but without effect until the tobacco enema was had recourse to, which produced copious evacuations. The relief was temporary, convulsions followed by total insensibility afterwards occurred, and although the temporal artery was opened and a blister applied to the nape of the neck—the man died.

Effusion was found to have taken place on the brain, the colon was greatly distended, and of a dark leaden color. Of the ascending portion, one half was healthy while the other bulged out like an aneurismal bag, was quite thin, of a dark leaden color, and Dr. Stewart doubts not was paralized.

The second case occurred in a boy, who had a fit on board ship, for which he was bled by the Surgeon. He had nightly paroxysms of colic, obstinate costiveness, slight pains of the head and back, his tongue was paralized on one side, and was dry and thickly furred. The tobacco enema was the first medicine to procure evacautions. An Opiate enema was given ½ night, and an infusion of gentian, with a sulpe noques, sulph ferri, and sulph quininæ during the day. This medicine acted freely on the bowels, and he gradually recovered.

The third case was treated with the tobacco enemata, the above tonic laxative, and the warm bath.

The fourth case is supposed to have been complicated with slight hepatic inflamation. His bowels would yield to nothing but the tonic laxative.

The fifth appears to have been milder and derived equal advantage from the laxative draughts.

The sixth case differed in being accompanied by pain in the course of the colon on pressure, although the application of the flattened had rather yielded relief. Slight peritoneal inflamation was supposed to exist, and he was leeched, had the warm bath and small doses of calomel, aloes, ipecacuenha, and camphor. After three days treatment the case yielded to the tonic laxative already mentioned.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1834.

IN THE MATTER OF WILLIAM GLASGOW.

This insolvent, a Captain on the Invalid Establishment, was heard on his petition and declared entitled to the benefit of the act. There was no application for a portion of his pay to be set aside for the liquidation of his debts.

IN THE MATTER OF RAMRUTTEN CHUCKERBUTTY.

This insolvent was declared entitled to the benefi of the act, and discharged.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CULLEN AND ROBERT BROWNE.

Mr. Turton reminded the Court that an application was made some time ago to adjourn the hearing of this case to a future day, and the Court directed that the application should stand over until the grounds were laid before the Court. Without entering into the question how far adjournment was necessary in other cases he would content himself with showing it was necessary in this. In the first place, the year was not expired for which an order had been obtained to carry on the factories; and secondly, supposing that a dividend of the whole funds of the estate could be declared instanter, it would be necessary to wait for the expiration of the twelve months after advertising in the London Gazette. These, he believed, were sufficient reasons to render an adjournment necessary; and he would take this opportunity of assuring the Court that it was the assignee's object to sell the property as soon as a fair price could be obtained for it, but he was convinced that it ought not be sacrificed. There were Bulls and Bears here, as at home, and between the two parties the assignee had some difficulty to choose, for though it was his duty to sell for a fair price, it was not his object to sell for the first price offered, and, therefore, one of the parties was sure to feel dissatisfied. He might also state as a ground for adjournment, the necessity of altering and amending the schedule, but he believed the existing order authorizing the assignee to carry on the Indigo factories for one year from the 1st of January next was sufficient to induce the Court to pursue the usual course.

Sir J. P. Grant was quite aware that the course was the usual one, and he would not have ventured, without some grounds, to deviate from it. These orders for adjournment were applied for so frequently, that he was desirous of seeing the grounds of them, and as in this case it appeared necessary he would make the order. He wished to know what time was required.

Mr. Turton thought that the time need not be specified as the assignees or the creditors could come in on application.

Sir J. P. Grant thought there was a convenience in adjourning the hearing to a certain date, as it compelled the Court at the expiry of the time to turn its attention to the affairs of the estate.

The hearing was then adjourned for six months.

Mr. Turton said he was not employed by the assignee, but with his concurrence, and at the request of the insolvents personally, he directed the attention of the Court to that part of the order which required the attendance of the insolvents from time to time as the hearings were adjourned. The order was similar to one made in the matter of Palmer and Co., but the cases were different, as the members of that firm had not been adjudged entitled to the benefit of the act. In this case the parties had been so adjudged, and he did not see the necessity of their personal attendance from time to time, as there was a subsequent clause in the act, which put them completely in the power of the Court whenever their attendance was required. It, therefore, did appear rather a hardship to make them attend from day to day, and not only subject them to animadversion but to trouble for no purpose, as in nine cases out of ten there was no occasion for their attendance. He was quite sure the Court did not wish to impose any unnecessary hardship or trouble on the insolvents, and would venture to suggest that such part of the order might be omitted, as it appeared entirely unnecessary.

Sir J. P. Grant could not understand why the order had been so made out.

Mr. Turton said, it arose out of the order made in the first commercial case which came before the Court, in which the insolvents were not yet adjudged entitled to the benefit of the act.

Sir J. P. Grant said it was quite clear that if the insolvents had not been adjudged entitled to the benefit of the act, there was a necessity for their attendance, but, after they had been so adjudged, and there was an application to adjourn the hearing, —of the necessity of which at present he would not express an opinion—it did not appear to him that the attendance of the insolvents was necessary.

And so the order was made out, omitting that part which required the attendance of the insolvents from time to time.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN PALMER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Turton said, in this case the order for adjournment stood over to show the grounds as in the last case. A much longer time had elapsed since the insolvency and the greater part of the assets had been realized, but there was still a large amount due from debtors to the estate. He wished it to be understood, that the parties who had the management of the estate were paid by a percentage; it was their interest, therefore, to collect the amounts due as quickly as possible, because they paid the charges of the establishment. Another ground for adjournment was, that the insolvents had not been declared entitled to the benefit of the act, for what reason he know not, but such was the case. He believed an application to this Court had been made by Mr. Prinsep, for such adjudication, and perhaps that gentleman would state the reason of its refusal. The average monthly amount of the debts recovered by the assignee was about Sa. Rs. 15,000 for the last twelve months, but there still remained due to the estate from Civil and Military servants, in the service of His Majesty and the Company, about ~~Rs~~ 44,00,000, besides ~~Rs~~ 16,00,000 from other persons, exclusive of commercial debts. The ~~Rs~~ 15,000 monthly was, with very few exceptions, payable by instalments, and the assignees could not entertain a hope that the whole amount would be paid off for a long time. As to selling the debts at auction, he thought there were few who were not of opinion that such a course would be ruinous.

Sir J. P. Grant thought that it must be done.

Mr. Turton explained that the great majority of the debtors had no estate whatever, and were paying the instalments out of their salaries as they received them.

Sir J. P. Grant said that they might be considered as annuities for life.

Mr. Turton could assure the Court that annuities for life were considered unprofitable property in this country. If the debts were put up at auction, whent the parties purchasing took into consideration li tha they might have to bring actions against mi tary men at stations 1,500 miles distant, and other inconveniences, he was quite sure that nothing like the value would be offered for them. Here was ~~Rs~~ 8,000,000 due from different persons, whose monthly instalment amounted to ~~Rs~~ 15,000, he would venture to say, if the claims were sold at auction, they would not produce one year's purchase. However, that was not the question before the Court, and he would content himself with asking for an order for adjournment on the grounds he had stated.

Sir J. P. Grant thought the interests of the creditors would be best consulted by making a final dividend. It was contrary to the bankrupt laws to prolong the winding up the estate. The English Insolvent Act provided that the property should be brought to immediate sale, and all interests and contingencies were to be sold by auction, if the sale were approved by the creditors. Now it appeared to him that the best course would be to have the opinion of the creditors, as to the course to be adopted with regard to the outstanding debts, for it did seem to be a preposterous thing that the estate should not be wound up for thirty years, hanging over the heads of the insolvents, merely because the assignee were receiving a small sum monthly, for it only merited to [illegible]d a small sum when compared with the large Court they which it was a portion.

Jurry, ind ton said, if the debts were put up at auction, ale, and l purchasers would be the debtors themselves. hat he co P. Grant—Very likely.

nt the rton referred to the clause in the act, which aut he co the Court to defer the sale of the property if it be. ...link proper.

Sir J. P. Grant wished to impress on the assignees the necessity of turning their attention to the immediate disposal of all property belonging to the estate.

Mr. Turton assured the Court that the assignees had no possible interest in keeping the estate open. He might mention that the opinion of the creditors was almost unanimous on the subject.

Sir J. P. Grant.—Where does that appear? There is nothing from which the Court may infer that such is the opinion of the creditors.

Mr. Turton said there could be no possible objection to call a meeting for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the creditors. It would, however, be as well to state whether the meeting should be a periodical one as the opinions of the creditors might change according to circumstances.

Mr. Prinsep, with reference to what had fallen from Mr. Turton, on the subject of his application on a former occasion, that the members of the firm of Palmer and Co. be adjudged entitled to the benefit of the act, was desirous to state that it was his own application made about one year after the failure of that firm. As far as he could recollect, Mr. Justice Grey and Mr. Justice Ryan, before whom the application was made, it being the first case of a commercial character that had come before the Court, seemed to doubt whether declaring the insolvents entitled to the benefit of the act, would not be giving them a full discharge. He endeavoured to persuade them that it would not, but the application was refused, and had not since been renewed.

Sir J. P. Grant directed that an order should be made to adjourn the hearing for three months, and called the attention of the assignees to the necessity of obtaining the opinion of the creditors on the subject of the sale of the debts due to the estate. He believed it would be the best for the creditors as well as for the insolvents that as much as possible should be recovered, and a division of it ought to take place immediately.

The assignees obtained leave to file their accounts, and a day was appointed for declaring a further dividend.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

Leave was given to amend the schedule.

Mr. Thompson applied for an order, on behalf of Mr. John William Sutherland, that Mr. John Storm (the only member of the insolvent firm now in Calcutta,) together with the assignee, Mr. Robert Castle Jenkins, formerly assistant to the firm, and Mr. J. N. Vant Hart, formerly a clerk in their employ, do attend the next insolvent Court for the purpose of being examined touching the claim of Mr. Brown Roberts as a creditor of the said insolvents. Also that Mr. Storm may be then examined touching his and the other insolvents' conduct in respect to remitting certain trust funds appertaining to the marriage settlement of Lieut.-Col. J. Geddes and Magdalena his wife, and of which settlement Mr. John William Sutherland is a trustee. Order granted.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

Our readers will remember an order some time ago, on the petition of Mr. A.
for the examination of the assignees, touc sale of certain Indigo factories, said to be under circumstances calling for the interfe the Court. The assignees were examined day the 9th of November, when further cor of the matter was postponed till the next Ca
But the Term in the Supreme Court intervening, and subsequently the Criminal Sessions, the further hearing was postponed from time to time until at length this day was appointed for the purpose. After several affidavits were put in and read,

Mr. Turton rose and addressed the Court for upwards of four hours on behalf of the assignees. The order, he said, is, that the assignee should show cause why they should not cancel the sale of Neeschunderpore and Hautpara factories, alleged to have been sold to Mr. Sanpin and to Mr. Bell, and why they should not be restrained from executing the conveyances, and why the factories should not be exposed for public sale at the upset prices of ~~Rs~~ 5,000 and ~~Rs~~ 10,000. This was what the assignees had to show cause against, if it could be said it was their duty to do so, and with regard to their duty, he begged to say on behalf of his clients, that whatever order the Court may make the assignees would do their best to comply with it. At the same time he thought it necessary that his clients should meet by counter statements the affidavits of Mr. Greig: as to Mr. Lingham he had no objection to make to him whatever, he was a creditor and perfectly justified in promoting this investigation, if he believed Mr. Greig's statements to be correct, especially as he was not responsible for the costs of this proceeding, should the petition be dismissed. Mr. Lingham had Mr. Greig for his bottle-holder; though perhaps it would be as well if he had dispensed with the office and gone himself to the office of the assignees, and heard from those parties the statements which had satisfied Mr. Cockerell, Mr. Plowden, and others. This is all he would say as to Mr. Lingham. He ought to have gone to the assignees, and if not satisfied he might have come fairly into the ring attended by his attorney and his bottle-holder. But he had preferred coming into the ring at once, without seeking for explanation, and as he had done so, he (the learned counsel) was ready to meet him and his bottle-holder, and to show that personal motives and not a desire to benefit the estate was the cause of these proceedings. But before he did so, he was desirous to draw the attention of the Court to the nature of the order. This Court had not the jurisdiction of the Chancellor in cases of bankruptcy, though to a certain extent it had the power of compelling the assignees to make reparation if they acted improperly, and to remove them from the assigneeship. It must be remembered that his clients had acted with the full knowledge of their responsibility, and supposing that they had not acted for the benefit of the estate, he was sure it was their intention to do so, but to act perfectly bonâ fide in all their transactions. Personal motives had been imputed to the assignees in these proceedings. It was said that Mr. Bell and Mr. Hurry were partners, and that the fact of their being so, ought to make the Court go into this inquiry. Had there been such a partnership, the sale could not have been sanctioned by the Court, for it would not have been valid in law; it would have been sufficient to have vitiated the sale in any Court in the world. But when it was found that Mr. Greig's belief had no foundation, or rested merely on the fact that Messrs. Bell and Hurry had been concerned on a former occasion, why then the objection rested on Mr. Hurry being a party to the sale, but when it turned out that he was ill and compelled to quit Calcutta, and was no more aware of the sale than the Court, all grounds of complaint as to personal motives were removed, and Mr. Greig was compelled to resort to something else. It was insinuated that some secret influence was at work in effecting the purchase of these factories for other parties: he could grapple with no arguments of which he was ignorant, but it was sufficient for him to say, that the insinuation was as ill-founded as the assertion that Mr. Hurry was the purchaser of the factories, when it is distinctly denied that he had anything to do with the purchase,—when it is distinctly proved that he had nothing to do with the sale. As to calling on the assignees to cancel the sale; that part of the order could not be literally complied with. It must be done, if cancelled at all, either by the intervention of the law, or with the consent of Mr. Bell and Mr. Sanpin. The assignees had no power to cancel; and with regard to the power of the Court, if the Court possessed the power he had not the slightest objection to their exercising it. He did not wish to uphold the sale, but he thought the Court would not make any order which might involve the estate in litigation. He felt great difficulty in addressing the Court lest it should be supposed the assignees wished to uphold the sale, but if he thought that any attempt to cancel it would be attended with expense and litigation, it was his duty to his clients to bring it to the notice of the Court. He begged to remind the Court that there were two modes of selling in cases of bankruptcy;—one on the responsibility of the assignee, and with which Lord Eldon refused to interfere, but the other sale before a commissioner was like that which takes place before a Master in Equity. He would not dispute that there were cases in which the Chancellor had set aside sales made before the commissioner. He knew a case in which Lord Manners said he had that authority, but he knew of no case wherein it had been exercised, and he would produce an authority wherein it was stated that the Chancellor had no such power. The learned counsel then cited Sugden's law of Venders and Purchasers, in which it is stated, that where estates are sold before the Master under a decree of a Court of Equity, the Court considers itself to have a greater power over the contract than if it were made between party and party; and as the chief aim of the Court is to obtain as great a price for the estates as can possibly be got, it is in the habit of opening the bidding after the estate is sold. This, however, never has been done, nor is there any reason to apprehend that so mischievous an extension of the rule will ever take place. This, continued the learned counsel, might be said to be the practice of a Court of Equity, or it might be considered a mooted point on which much might be said on both sides. In a sale before the Master if a person came in before the sale was confirmed by the Court, the sale might be set aside; but in a private sale there was no such rule; a party might make his bargain, and there was no occasion to confirm the sale in any Court whatever. There was another point for consideration. What would Mr. Saupin say supposing this order was granted? Had he been served with a copy of the order? Again, was there any thing before the Court to say that this person who wished to open the biddings would deposit in Court the sum he said he was willing to give for the factories? Was there any thing to show that the Rupees 20,000 was inclusive or exclusive of the sum paid for the izarra? The offer was altogether ambignous, and if he meant ~~Rs~~ 20,000 including the izara, it was about ~~Rs~~ 5,000 less than for what the factory was already sold. He confessed when he heard of the offer of thus saving ~~Rs~~ 5,000 he gave Mr. Greig credit for a feeling for his own interest which was not destroyed until he heard that he had become responsible for the costs of these proceedings. If, however, the amount offered was ~~Rs~~ 20,000, exclusive of the sum paid for the izara, he entreated the Court to direct that the money should be brought into Court, and when that was done, if it had the power to cancel the sale, to exercise it.

Mr. Advocate General.—We are willing to do so.

Mr. Turton would not wish to do anything which might involve his client in a law suit, and it would be his duty to show that such might be the consequences. Still he was willing that the sale should be cancelled, provided the Court thought it would not involve his clients in litigation.

Mr. Advocate General said, to cut the matter short, he was willing to offer ~~Rs~~ 20,000 for all the interest the assignees had to sell.

Sir J. P. Grant said that the Court was placed in a very different situation than it would have been if there were no others concerned, besides the parties before the Court. As it was, he doubted, if the Court could authorize a private sale.

Mr. Advocate General was willing that the factories should be put up at auction, and sold to his client, if he were the highest bidder.

Mr. Turton begged to observe that the izara had expired and that not the assignees but other parties were in possession.

Sir J. P. Grant reminded Mr. Turton that he had to show the Court that the sale to Mr. Saupin was a valid one.

Mr. Turton, by desire of the Court, proceeded to argue that there was no general authority to sell given by Mr. Burkinyonng to Mr. Saupin, and that from the evidence of the former, it appeared he was perfectly aware that Mr. Saupin was purchasing for himself, through Mr. Roger's agency and assistance.

Some dispute took place here as to the exact tenor of Mr. Burkinyoung's evidence, when Sir J. P. Grant referred to that of Mr. N. Alexander, in which that gentleman, after detailing the proceedings of Mr. Saupin in the office of the assignees, 'I considered the commission given to Mr. Saupin by Mr. Burkinyoung an authority from the assignees to sell the property to those two persons' (Mr. Rogers and Mr. Bell.)

Sir J. P. Grant here intimated that before the sale could be considered a valid one, it must be shown that Mr. Saupin was not an agent for the sale.

Mr. Advocate General referred also to Mr. Storm's letter to Mr. Alexander, and Mr. Burkinyonng's reply to it, in which it was stated that 'Mr. Saupin had authority to sell and has sold,' and to a letter from Mr. Alexander which contained a sentence to the same effect. Now, said the learned counsel, it must be shown that Mr. Saupin was not constituted an agent, for if that was not done, he would have no difficulty in setting aside the sale.

Mr. Turton argued at length, there was no evidence that Mr. Saupin had a general power of sale,—that the assignee was perfectly aware he was buying the factories for himself, and that he was only a special agent to sell to himself.

Sir J. P. Grant said that might be an argument on behalf of Mr. Saupin, but it was not one for the assignees.

Mr. Turton said that it was also an argument for the assignees, as the expenses of any suit Mr. Saupin might institute, would have to be paid out of the estate.

Sir J. P. Grant.—Perhaps not.

Mr. Turton then proceeded to show the litigation that may ensue if the contract to Mr. Saupin is not completed. Now said the learned counsel, with regard to Mr. Saupin; in the first place, he is in possession of the factory, and in the second place, he is a foreigner over whom this Court has no more jurisdiction than it has over the Emperor of Morocco. Again, there were two other persons, M. Terrenean and M. Albert, whose consent must also be obtained before the assignees have the power to order a new sale. They were both Frenchmen and co-lessees, and had an undoubted right to the property for one year. As this court had no jurisdiction over foreigners.

Sir J. P. Grant said it was not to be supposed because they were not subject to the jurisdiction of this court, that the parties could not have recourse to competent Courts in the Mofussil.

Mr. Turton said, perhaps a Mofussil Court might not take the same view of the matter as this Court, and as for the expedition with which suits are there decided, he instanced a case in which he was concerned, not as counsel but as a party, which had been before the Sudder Dewanny for the last seven years, and which he did not expect would be decided for the next four. With reference to what the Court had said regarding the parties on whom the expenses of a law suit might fall, it was calculated to make the assignees extremely cautious how they consented to the cancelling of a sale, which, if put on their oaths, they must admit they completed to Mr. Saupin. He wished to be understood that his clients did not shrink from any responsibility, for they had done nothing but what he was sure he could satisfy the Court they had done with the best intentions. Mr. Hurry, indeed, had nothing whatever to do with the sale, and he had not the slightest apprehensions but that he could prove Mr. Burkinyoung had been actuated by nothing but the most honest desire not to lay out the sum required for the izarra, and to obtain what he considered the best price for the factory at the time. If the Court directed the assignees not to complete the sale, it must involve them in a suit from which they could not escape without considerable loss; for both Mr. Bell and Mr. Saupin had given notice that they would not pay interest for the remainder of the purchase money. Thus, as they could not make Mr. Saupin subject to the jurisdiction, he would submit that the best way would be to let the sale remain without completing the conveyance and give the purchasers an oppotunity to come into Court for their remedy. All the parties except the assignees were in enviable situations. Mr. Saupin had paid one-half and got the whole, and, being a foreigner, might say 'when you want the rest you may come to the Mofussil for it.' As to Mr. Lingham, be the decision of the Court what it may, he was quite comfortable, and might say

> 'Come weel, come wo,
> We'll gather and go.

He (Mr. Lingham) had Mr. Greig's assistance to involve the assignees in ligitation, which, after what had fallen from the Court, they would do well to avoid. But he presumed if he had failed to convince the Court that Mr. Saupin was not an agent for sale, it would be useless to continue.

It was however intimated, that the learned counsel had better proceed in his argument, which he did at great length, contending that the proceedings were instituted by Mr. Greig through malignant motives; that there was nothing to show that he was ready to pay the money he offered for the factories, or that Mr. Saupin had acted with any other than good faith throughout the whole transaction.

Sir J. P. Grant mentioned that it was in evidence that Mr. Saupin had paid ~~Rs~~ 8000, and a compliment of ~~Rs~~ 800 for the renewal of the izarra, whereas he had stated to the assignees that ~~Rs~~ 10,000 would be required. Also that Mr. Saupin, though he knew Mr. Greig was anxious to become a purchaser, had never mentioned that circumstance to the assignees.

Mr. Turton replied that, as to the first circumstance, Mr. Saupin knew how much wa demanded, but it was not possible to say how little would be required; and as to the second, that the zemindar was urgent for the money and there was no time for further delay.

Sir J. P. Grant wished to know why the assignees had not inqsired if there were others willing to purchase?

Mr. Turton replied that they had the best authority as to the value of the factory, and their instructions were to sell whenever a fair price offered.—Englishman.

Mr. Turton closed at about three o'clock, when Mr. Cochrane followed on the same side with the following address:—

My Lord,—I am also with my learned friend Mr. Turton, who gives to juniors always a difficult task for he leaves few paths untrodden and few arguments untried. Perhaps, however, a different arrangement may set arguments, even though less forcibly urged, in a new point of view. I have somewhere heard that it is the right of the disappointed to indulge in the privilege of railing. Your Lordship after the evidence we have heard may perhaps think that Mr. Greig has liberally availed himself of so important a privilege. The present application is to rescind a sale. It is grounded on the application of a creditor. What therefore is the broad principle which should be kept before our view? It is the interest of the creditors. If it can be shown that setting aside this sale will be for the benefit of the estate, and if your Lordship shall think considering the rights of Mr. Saupin you have authority to make this rule absolute, the assignees will offer no opposition, but let Mr. Greig bring in the money. But if on the contrary I can show that the assignees acted fairly and honestly for the interests of the property entrusted to their charge, I trust that your Lordship will discharge the present application in the terms it is granted with costs. What is the main charge levelled against the assignees? It is that they have sold this property with the knowledge of a better offer being made. This charge rests on two letters—and on two letters alone. The first is a letter from Greig and Donaldson to the Bank of Bengal, dated the 28th December, 1833, offering the sum of Sa. Rs. 20,000 for the property in question. Beyond all doubt, my Lord, if any, if the smallest particle of knowledge or even any intimation of this offer could be brought home to the assignees, it would be decisive against them. Mr. Greig in his letters says to the assignees that he will prove their knowledge by their oath. Will he abide by his own offer? They have sworn they never were aware of it. Does it rest even on that? Mr. Udney, the Secretary to the Bank, tells you that that letter was never communicated to the assignees, and it was withdrawn by Mr. Greig, and the offer for the whole concern made. The next letter from which such an inference is attempted to be drawn is alleged to have been sent by Messrs. Greig and Donaldson of date the 13th of January, 1834. That letter is stated to contain an expostulation with the assignees for not accepting an offer of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 70,000 with reference to the offer of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 20,000 made by them to the Bank. This letter the assignees swear they never received. Your Lordship is informed that Mr. Bell acquainted the assignees of it. Mr. Bell is dead, Mr. Donaldson who is alledged to have written the letter is in England, Mr. Greig is alone here. It is no light sum to write about—Sa. ~~Rs~~. 70,000. Did he ever receive an answer to such alleged letter? He does not even pretend that he received one. Did he when he found no answer sent, write a letter demanding an answer? Did he ever send a single friend or go himself to inquire why an answer was not not given to an application to him of so much importance? He never did. Does he even produce his dawk book to verify the fact of such a letter being sent? Letters do not readily miscarry. He mentions two names but the dead are silent and the absent cannot testify. Men of business, my Lord, do not generally refuse to answer such letters when received, for such conduct, if done for an unworthy motive, admits of obvious and easy exposure. Am I justified in saying such a letter was never sent? Perhaps when I have gone through the evidence in this case the deduction may be more easy.

The main question is whether the assignees at the time of the sale to Mr. Saupin acted for the benefit of the estate or not. The application here being to set aside that sale, I reserve my observations on the propriety of selling till hereafter, because the propriety of selling may be influenced by a variety of considerations, and because it is necessary I should clear my way by disposing of the charges which Mr. Greig, for he is the real applicant, has levelled against the character of the assignees. Let me, my Lord, try them by the evidence in the case. He alleges that before the sale to Messrs. Saupin and Bell there was no valuation of the property made. Your Lordship will find that in the month of February, 1833, the united concern, of which the present is one of the least valuable of the divisions, was valued, under an order of this Court by sworn appraisers, at Sa. ~~Rs~~ 60,000. Your Lordship will also find that after this the assignees with Messrs. Alexander and Ballard valued the whole concern at Sa. ~~Rs~~ 70,000.

|---|---|
| Moisurah at..... | 35,000 |
| Gundapore..... ..... | 20,000 |
| Neechunderpore,..... | 15,000 |
| | 70,000 |

Your Lordship from the evidence may remember that Mr. Ballard was the managing member of the Indigo concerns of the late firm of Alexander and Co. In addition to the above Messrs. Cullen and Ferguson valued this property and made an affidavit of such value which was filed in the Court on the 11th of January. So much for this charge. Let me pass on to another, that the assignees sold the two factories in question under their value. Messrs. Harry, Barkinyoung and Alexander swear that Sa. ~~Rs~~ 15,000 is the full value of the factories. Your Lordship is aware that the assignees were willing to take this sum long before the present dispute arose. Mr. Storm swears that he would not give Sa. ~~Rs~~ 15,000 for the two. Mr. Bell swears that he was authorized by Messrs. Greig and Donaldson to make an offer for the two. Messrs. Greig and Donaldson taking Nechundepore and Mr. Bell Antparah. He states that an offer of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 14,000 was made to the assignees by his brother Captain Bell, which was refused. He also swears that he would not give for Antpara more than Sa. ~~Rs~~ 5,000.

I come now, my Lord, to the evidence of Mr. Rogers, of the House of Hamilton and Co. This gentleman, who is a merchant, of great intelligence, observes, that on Mr. Saupin's coming to him on the 25th of August, 1834, he, Mr. Rogers, remonstrated with him, Mr. Saupin, on the high price he would pay for the factory, taking the advance required for the izarah into consideration with the price to be given to the assignees for the said factory. He says, moreover, that he is well acquainted with the Nechundepore concern, having had the intention of purchasing the same, and having personally inspected the lands thereof, and he verily believes that Sa. ~~Rs~~ 10,000 is its full value, for he says that he refused to join Mr. Saupin and take a share in the purchase thereof—does it however rest even here? The evidence of Messrs. Rayson and Waschel, two adjoining Indigo factors, may be important. They say that Nechundepore is in their opinion not worth more than Sa. ~~Rs~~ 10,000, for it is a low and very uncertain factory, as the lands are subject to early inundations, and they believe that no other person in the neighbourhood or elsewhere would have given Sa. ~~Rs~~ 15,000 save Mr. Greig or Mr. Saupin. Your Lordship will also bear in mind that for two years this factory had not been profitable though the other two parts of the great concern had been productive. Having called your Lordship's attention to these charges which are levelled against both the assignees, permit me now to call your attention to those that apply to Mr. Harry. Let me first, however, disposed of one insinuation of Mr. Greig; I allude to that which states that Mr. Saupin, the purchaser of the property in question, was indebted to the estate of Alexander and Co. It turns out that he was a creditor of the firm. What therefore is the main and startling charge which Mr. Greig brings against Mr. Hurry. It is that for his, Mr. Hurry's, own motives he sold the concern (Autparah) to Mr. Bell, his partner; and that at the time of the sale Mr. Bell was his partner. First, Mr. Hurry swears, that at the time of the sale he had no concern or dealing with Bell, and that all concerns ended at the close of the Indigo year, 1833 (1st October). Mr. Bell swears, that Mr. Hurry was heretofore a partner of his, Mr. Bell's, in the Moisday factory, which must not, my Lord, be confounded with the Moisurah factory, but that his interest in the said co-partnership ceased on the 23th September, 1833, and that Mr. Hurry is not now, nor was he at the time of the sale of the Nichundipore division, a partner of his, Mr. Bell's, in the Moisday concern, nor in any other concern whatsoever. Your Lordship will also allow me to remind you of that part of Mr. Hurry's affidavit, where he states the application of Capt. Bell somewhat more than a year ago in favor of his brother, and Mr. Hurry's refusal on the ground of having been connected in business with Mr. Bell. Again, my Lord, Mr. Hurry swears, and that is supported by Messrs. Bell and Burkinyoung, that Mr. Bell purchased the Autparah concern without ever consulting, and without the knowledge of him, (Mr. Hurry.) What are the real facts. Mr. Hurry was taken, as every one in Calcutta knows, dangerously ill on the 15th August last, and was unable to attend to business till the beginning of October. Is there nothing more Mr. Greig has sworn, that he never heard that the partnership of Messrs. Hurry and Bell was dissolved? Let me call your attention to the evidence of Mr. Bell. The passage is thus—"that in April or May last, he, on several occasions, and particularly on one occasion, when Mr. Greig was at this deponent's (Bell's house,) at Moisday, he, this deponent Bell, informed the said Alexander Greig that he and the said Mr. Hurry had ceased to be co-partners together in the Moisday concern." Your Lordship will remember from the evidence that Mr. Greig was an adjoining Indigo planter to Mr. Bell's concern. Are men so unaccquainted with him who is the partner of their next neighbouring Indigo planter? Do you believe that Mr. Greig could have been possibly ignorant of the fact? But can he make a mistake? Can he mean that Mr. Hurry was concerned in other factories with Mr. Bell? No, his manifesto of slander produced by Mr. Plowden fixes him there. The passage is this—"It turns out that 'Nechindepore was purchased for the lessee, Mr. Saupin, who was in debt to the estate, whilst Autparah factory was for Mr. Bell's own self, Mr. Hurry the assignee a third share-holder in Moisday factory, which adjoins Autparah. Let me now, my Lord, look at the justice of continuing such charges against Mr. Hurry, when inquiry would have shown this bad and malevolent man, their utter falsehood. He, Mr. Greig, was informed by a letter from Mr. Burkinyoung, dated the 12th Sept. 1834, of the illness of Mr. Hurry. Did that call for no inquiry before he allowed such serious and solemn charges to remain? His affidavit was sworn on the 4th of October, 1834. Examination had taken place. His very Attorney, Mr. Collier, tells him, Mr. Greig, after explanations with Burkinyoung, that he had not a shadow of ground to rest upon, and that his application, if made, would be discharged with costs, and refused to proceed. Did not his new Attorney, Mr. Shaw, know of the long continued illness of Mr. Hurry? Are the concerns of the assignees of the late great firm of Alexander and Co., so limited in amount that that illness was not generally known. Or did no creditor, who put his name to a paper slandering the character of the assignees, think it worth while to inquire?

Having dwelt so long on this long line of slander and abuse, Mr. Saupin is of course not forgotten. Let me see what this man ventures to charge against him:—First, that he mismanaged the factory for the purpose of buying it. There is not one particle of evidence on that head, and it is contradicted by the evidence you have heard. Secondly, that by asserting that Sa. ~~Rs~~ 10,000 were required for the renewal of the lease or izarah, he, Mr. Saupin, practised a deception on the assignees, of a very flagrant nature;—this is in his, Mr. Greig's, letter of the 13th Sept. 1834; and again, your Lordship will find, that in his letter to the assignees of the 20th Sept. 1834, he says that Mr. Saupin could have obtained the lease without the payment of a single rupee. So much for assertion. Now let us look at the facts. Mr. Saupin by his letter of the 25th January, 1834, informs the assignees of the necessity of an advance of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 10,000 to secure the lease. Was this deceit? On his arrival on the 25th of August, the day of sale, he not merely informs the assignees, of the advance required but of the danger of the factory. But it is asserted that he might have procured the lease or izarah without an advance. Are native zemindars so little acquainted with their rights? What is the fact? Mr. Saupin actually paid to the zemindar the sum of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 10,097, for the lease or izarah. Is this deceiving them? Let me now call your Lordship' attention to the conduct of Mr. Greig, and see whether he wished to obtain this lease, and also, if such were his object to consider the consequence of his obtaining it. Your Lordship is aware from the evidence of Mr. Saupin that the izarah or lease contained three-fourths of the lands of the factory. Let us now look at the conduct of Mr. Greig. I will say nothing now of his observation before Messrs. Rayson and Waschel that he would risk the loss of his bond of Sa. 10,000 in order to injure Mr. Saupin. Let that pass; our object is here to ascertain whether he desired to obtain the izarah or lease. Permit me, therefore, to call your Lordship's attention of his letter to Mr. Saupin, of the 7th August, 1834. Where he observe "had there been any chance of your getting your pottah renewed, I, of course, would have paid these rents into your hands, but from good authority I know that the zemindar will not give you a new pottah, and the reasons for his not doing so I will explain to you at meeting." The letter I have just alluded to, your Lordship will remember was before the sale, which took place on the 25th of August. The next letter to which I would call your Lordship's attention is one dated the 11th September, 1834, from the zemindar to Greig. In this, he says—"you sent Dhurromdoss here with the object of settling and taking lands for the cultivation of Indigo in the Turriffe of Nechindipore, I therefore write, if you are disposed to make an arrangement and take the same, you will speedily send a person here in whom you have confidence. You will not make much delay—this is the season for the cultivation of Indigo, the settlement will not be put off. You will consider this very emergent." Your Lordship will also find, and these are taken from the grounds put in by Mr. Greig, (for he is the real applicant) that the Naib of Nechindepore, one Muddoosooden Bisaw, as on the 16th September, 1834, writes to Greig, informing him that he had been to the house of the zemindar,—that he was desirous to grant the villages of Nechindepore and Modendungah to him, Mr. Greig, in farm, and that if he, Mr. Greig, had an inclination to take the same, he could settle the matter. Your Lordship will remember that at this time Mr. Saupin had purchased the property in question. The object of Mr. Greig, as your Lordship sees, was to obtain this izarah or lease and consequently ruin the factory; for it is sworn by abundant evidence that if he had obtained it, the factory would have been comparatively of small value. Yet singular as it may appear, the very malevolence of this man, Greig, defeated it itself. Your Lordship will find that in his, Greig's, correspondence with the assignees which commences on the 12th September, 1834, he complains in one of his letters of Saupin having deceived the assignees. The assignees immediately wrote to Mr. Saupin for an explanation. Mr. Saupin on receiving the letter of the assignees, wrote to Mr. Bell on the subject, and on the 18th September, 1834, received a letter from Mr. Bell of which the following is an extract. "All I know is this, that if you do not immediately renew your Nechundepore and Modendungah pottahs on the terms proposed by the Baboo, you will lose upwards of 3,000 beegahs of your best lands, and consequently leave your factory valueless. I may as well add that I am aware that Mr. Greig is and has been doing all he can to oppose you in procuring a new pottah, and in fact his plan is to secure it for himself." This intimation, as your Lordship may well believe, admitted of no deliberation, and the 20th September, 1834, Mr. Saupin concluded his agreement with the zemindar and obtained the izarah. Having thus, my Lord, in some degree cleared my way, permit me to notice another charge which is contained in the affidavit of Mr. Greig: I mean, that no one was informed of the sale, and that previous to the sale, no public notice was given. If by this is meant that no notice was given to Mr. Greig, and that no public advertisement was made at the time of sale, it may be admitted, but this objection would apply to all private sales. If the assignees, at or about the time of sale to Mr. Saupin had advertized the factory for sale, Mr. Greig would have been enabled to obtain it for nothing by closing with the zemindar and then buying it at his own price. But is it true that no notice had been given? The property had been publicly advertised for more than a year—repeated applications had been made to the assignees respecting the factories generally—statements were constantly made out by the assignees—offers were frequently made to the Bank—proceedings were going on in the Insolvent Court—many of the Indigo planters were present—the adjoining Indigo planters Rayson and Waschell were aware of the factories being for sale, and that Assignees were open to offers—and Messrs. Greig, Rogers and Storm, were equally well aware of the fact. I come now, my Lord, to the propriety of selling; and permit me to observe that the conduct of the assignees is not to be measured by the animosity or bad feelings of this man. The question is not what Mr. Greig would give now, but whether the assignees did right under all circumstances in selling when they did.

Your Lordship is aware from the evidence that the lands comprised in the izarah surrounded and interfered with the residue of the land on which the factory was placed. Was that factory therefore in danger of being destroyed or greatly injured? Mr. Greig had obtained the lease or izarah? Was that no motive for selling? Yet here your Lordship is asked to set aside a sale made for the sole purpose of protecting the property of the creditors from the efforts of a bad and malevolent man. Let me only imagine Mr. Greig in possession of the lease—he would forfeit, as you have heard, 10,000 Rs. to injure Mr. Saupin. In what position would Mr. Saupin have been? Circumscribed in cultivation, left with works on which (as he, Greig, observes in his letter to the Bank of the 28th December, 1833,) the tide was running and which in all probability would not last more than two years. The man would have sunk from comfort to privation, and ultimately to penury and distress, and Mr. Greig would have completed his long line of slanderous malevolence by the ruin of this foreigner, his wife and his children, for ever. Yet this would be nothing—exculpation would be needless and condemnation there could be none, because, in the amiable language of this delicate specimen of Bhaugeretty elegance, "Mr. Saupin is a bloody little Frenchman." I know not, my Lord, in what country this man Mr. Greig was born—what education he has received—what habits have been engendered or what principles even he may dare to pretend to possess; but this I know that the feelings and principles he has exhibited, and which have been proved in evidence before you, are alike dishonourable in every country and in every clime—and shall never in my presence, so long as I wear the gown I do, intrude into a Court of Judicature without meeting with the reprobation their enormity deserves. But let me now suppose that the assignees had not accepted the Sa. Rs. 15,000 offered by Mr. Saupin on the 25th of August, and that Mr. Greig had actually obtained the izarah, could it be contended for one single moment that if they had refused such an offer they would not be liable to make good the difference. What possible protection could they have sheltered themselves under? What answer could they have given had any creditor brought it forward and said you were aware that this factory was not valued at more than Sa. Rs. 15,000 by your own valuation—you knew the danger it was in, yet why did you not close with Saupin's offers of Sa. Rs. 15,000? They did accept such offer, and because they have done it they are vituperated and abused.

I come, my Lord, now to the extraordinary letter written by some of the creditors to the assignees, headed by Messrs. Cockerell and Co. Was there ever such a production? What is the substance of it shortly? It is this—"understanding from common report that in this matter you have betrayed your trust, we request that you will send the correspondence which you have had with about 15 persons, directing your reply to our Attorney, Mr. Shaw, No. 2, Fairlie Place." The answer of the assignees informs the parties to such letter that it is impossible for the interests of the estate to be attended to if the time of the establishment is taken up in copying voluminous correspondences; the offer and request the creditors to come themselves to the office where they can receive the necessary explanations and examine the correspondence. Will your Lordship believe that not one of the creditors have ever been to the office to investigate? Unquestionably, my Lord, the assignees are bound to give every explanation to the creditors who appoint them. But what right have men without a particle of examination and on current report to be vilified and abused. I come now, my Lord, to that point which appears to have had weight with your Lordship. I mean the question of the agency of Mr. Saupin. The discovery of this celebrated point, however, is due to the Attorney, Mr. Shaw, and however disposed I might have felt to treat such a point with ridicule and contempt, the moment it finds weight with your Lordship it is my duty to lend to it my utmost attention. It seems that Mr. Saupin was an agent with a power of sale, and could not purchase for himself. Let us examine the transaction. On the 25th of August, Mr. Saupin arrived in Calcutta, he informed Mr. Burkinyoung of the danger the factory was in. Mr. Burkinyoung in his affidavit states, that after some discussion, he, Mr. Burkinyoung, asked Mr. Saupin if he would purchase the same, whereupon Mr. Saupin renewed his previous offer of Sa. Rs. 15,000 which he, Mr. Burkinyoung, offered to accept. Mr. Saupin then asked if it made any difference if two parties, viz. himself and another, divided the purchase. Mr. Burkinyoung said provided the assignees received the Sa. Rs. 15,000 he did not care who paid for it, and Mr. Saupin informed him, Mr. Burkinyoung, that he, Mr. Saupin intended to retain Nechundipore, that Mr. Rogers would assist him with the funds, and that he would sell Autpara to Mr. Bell for Sa. Rs. 5,000—and thereupon Mr. Burkinyoung, at the request of Mr. Saupin, wrote a letter to Mr. Rogers, informing him of the terms on which he was ready to make the sale, and that in the afternoon he received a letter from Mr. Rogers agreeing thereto. Now who were the contracting parties? Messrs. Saupin and Burkinyoung. If the contract was concluded, then nothing subsequent could vary it; yet here, from a subsequent discussion with Messrs. Alexander and Storm, you are actually attempting to vary the contract itself. What sort of answer would it have been to Mr. Saupin had he filed his bill against the assignees for specific performance, to tell him of subsequent letters when the transaction on which he rests his claim is admitted. In the letter from Mr. Alexander to Mr. Storm, it is said, that Mr. Saupin had authority to sell, and that he had procured purchasers; and from this it is attempted in the teeth of common sense and in defiance of the very nature of the transaction itself, which is as clear as the sun at noon day, to bring him within the principle I have mentioned—that an agent cannot purchase. He was an agent with a power of sale—was he? He was an agent for producing Sa. Rs. 15,000 and did he not do his duty when he handed over the cash? It is impossible to see how such a principle can be fairly applied consistent with the whole acts of the parties. Even Mr. Storm was perfectly aware that Mr. Saupin had bought one and

Mr. Bell another, and this he was informed by Mr. Saupin himself shortly after the contract was completed. I have now, my Lord, gone through the facts of this case—forgive the plain and homely language which I have used—and permit me, in conclusion, to observe that the question here is—did the assignees consult the interests of the creditors in selling when they did? Try their conduct by that test my Lord, and that guide will not deceive you. The propriety or impropriety of their conduct is not to be measured by what a man may offer, but by considering whether under all circumstances they were justified then. With these observations I leave this case in your Lordship's hands.—Bengal Hurkaru.

Mr. Advocate General in reply, said, it seemed to him that this case might be considered in three different views, and if any one of them was made out, his client would be entitled to something like what he asked. If it should appear that the assignees might have sold the factories for more, but for their own negligence or improper conduct, they were answerable for the loss;—if Mr. Saupin was the agent for the purposes of the sale, it was as clear as light that he was not entitled to become the purchaser himself;—or if Mr. Saupin had been guilty of any of those practices which the law considers fraudulent, it was quite sufficient to vitiate the sale. He apprehended the case stood thus:—the assignees had received part of the purchase-money, but not made over the property by any conveyance or any other legal process, and the other party, if they had the inclination, might file a bill for the due performance of the contract, when they would have their remedy if they had an honest cause to offer. The question was whether the court had the power of preventing or setting aside a sale made by an agent to himself, and as he had been a little surprized at some of the doctrines brought forward this day on that subject, he would refer to a text from which he had derived his own opinion. The learned counsel then referred to Sugden's Law of Venders and Purchasers, that trustees, unless they are nominally so, as trustee to preserve contingent remainders, agents, commissioners of bankrupts, assignees of bankrupts, solicitors to the commission, auctioneers, creditors who have been consulted as to the mode of sale, or any person who, by their connection with any other person, or by being employed or concerned in his affairs, have acquired a knowledge of his property, are incapable of purchasing such property themselves. For if a person having a confidential character were permitted to avail themselves of any knowledge acquired in that capacity, they might be induced to conceal their information, and not to exercise it for the benefit of persons relying on their integrity. He presumed that it would not be disputed that whether agent to sell for himself or sell to others, Mr. Saupin had been many years manager of the factory said to have been purchased by himself. The learned counsel also referred to ex-parte Hughes, 6. Vessey. 617, wherein a new sale was directed, the assignee under a commission of bankruptcy having sold by auction to one of the creditors previously consulted as to the mode of sale. It appeared that the creditor was not an agent for the sale, but had only been in the room where the parties had agreed to sell. But the Chancellor said it was impossible to permit him to hold his purchase. The Advocate General continued, he would not insult his own understanding to think for a moment, that in whatever point of view he considered Mr. Saupin, as a partner, or as an agent, he stood in a much stronger light than did Hughes, the creditor in the case just cited. In ex-parte James 8 Vessey 337, the purchase of bankrupt's estate by the solicitor to the commission was set aside. The Lord Chancellor would not permit him to bid upon the resale discharging himself from the character of solicitor, without the consent of the persons interested, freely given upon full information. Now he thought he had read enough to satisfy the Court, if it wanted any thing to satisfy itself on this point, that the sale must be set aside, for if Mr. Saupin was neither agent nor partner, he was the manager of the property, and they are better acquainted with its value than any other man. He would now draw the attention of the Court to some parts of the evidence which it would perhaps be necessary to refer to. The learned counsel here proceeded to comment on the correspondence of Mr. Alexander, and Mr. Barkinyoung with Mr. Storm, and on the evidence of the latter gentleman, who deposed that when he went to the assignees' office, after seeing Mr. Rogers, Mr. Alexander had informed him that the factories were not sold. Now, said the learned counsel, Mr. Alexander was present at the time when the authority was given to Mr. Saupin, 'I asked,' Mr. Storm swore, 'Mr. Alexander to give me a slip of paper, and I would write out a tender for it at once, upon which he said there was no occasion to do so, as it would be time enough in the next morning.' From this evidence, and what followed it, this conclusion must be drawn;—that he, (Storm) had learned from Mr. Saupin, that he (Saupin) had authority to sell to Mr. Rogers, and that the sale was not completed, but that he (Saupin) had authority to make it so. He (Storm) again went on the same evening to the office of the assignees and saw Mr. Barkinyoung, who agreed to allow him to advance the price if any other person should bid higher than he had done for the factory, therefore, it was quite clear, if Mr. Storm was not perjured, that Mr. Barkinyoung had some impression on his mind that he had only authorized the sale of the factory. The learned counsel continued to comment at great length on the documents regarding the sale, and contended that from the letters and evidence it was quite clear, that the factories were not sold at the time of Mr. Storm's application,—that Mr. Saupin was authorized to sell if he could get ~~Rs~~ 5,000 for the factory,—that he did get it—and sold it to himself. Mr. Cochrane had said that they were not to take parts of Mr. Barkinyoung's evidence but to take the whole; he (the Advocate General) said they were to do no such thing. But whichever way they took it, the whole or in part, it was as clear as the light of day that Mr. Saupin was authorized to sell to any body, and he might sit down with that impression. Mr. Turton had, however, introduced a different point, and he would go into it, as he thought the assignees were not patterns for assigneeship, and that Mr. Saupin had concealed some facts, and stated others which were untrue. The learned counsel then cited Deacon's Law of Bankruptcy, in which it was stated that the commissioner was to appoint a sale of the property between the hours of ten and twelve, but he was authorized to open the biddings should a purchaser offer, at a later hour. Such appeared to be the law and general practice of the Courts in England, and he saw no reason why those laws and practises should not extend to this country, yet here was Mr. Storm arriving a few hours after the alleged sale and deriving no advantage from it. In the evidence of Mr. Alexander, there appeared instances of gross negligence on the part of the assignees. When Mr. Turton stated that Mr. Hurry had fully exonerated himself from the charges brought against him, he (the Advocate General) made no remark. If he thought Mr. Hurry had exonerated himself, he would have admitted it without delay. He did admit it now as far as the partnership with Mr. Bell was concerned, but not that he had exonerated himself from the general charge of negligence during the time he had been enormously paid for his services. He thought he was equally amenable with Mr. Barkinyoung for bringing the factories into a condition wherein they had been sold so ill. Mr. Alexander had deposed that from January to July no attempts were made to sell the factories. There were no advertisements informing purchasers that the property was on sale. Would any rational man have acted in this manner with reference to this property, or would these gentlemen have done so if the property had been their own? It may be said they obtained the price at which this factory was valued, but if instead of ~~Rs~~ 5,000 they obtained 5,000 more than it was worth, it was still immaterial. They had grossly neglected their duty in not offering it for sale. But he would come to Mr. Barkinyoung's evidence. That gentleman did recollect something about an offer of

Rs. 70,000 from the Bank, but he had not condescended to return an answer, 'I neither refused nor acquiesced'—'I was not in the habit of looking for purchasers' and this was the way men acted who were paid so enormously! He did not hesitate to declare that in these particulars the assignees had betrayed their trust. The learned counsel then referred to the affidavit of Mr. Burkinyoung, which, he said, was interlined in order to make it agree with what Mr. Burkinyoung had said in the witness box. It appeared that the affidavit was written on whole sheets of foolscap paper, each sheet having the mark of Mr. Caw, the judge's clerk, upon it, except the part which contained the interlineal writing, which was upon half a sheet of paper and without the signature of Mr. Caw. He hoped Mr. Burkinyoung would give some explanation of this circumstance, for without making any accusation they were of an extremely suspicious character. Again, why had not the assignees accepted the first offer of Mr. Saupin? The reason was clear, they had doubts of the value of the factory. His learned friend, Mr. Turton, had spoken of the malicious motives of Mr. Greig: he saw no reason why the assignees should not have taken advantage of those motives for the benefit of the estate. If the factories had been their own they would have done so. While there was competition for the factories, they of course ought to have advertised them for sale. The learned counsel concluded by urging that Mr. Saupin had been guilty of legal fraud in not communicating to his principal that there were other parties desirous of purchasing the factories, and in the statement he had made with reference to the price of the renewal of the izarah. As for Mr. Collier's opinion that there were no grounds to bring this matter before the Court, and that the petitioner would have to pay the costs, though he had every respect for that gentleman, he thought the Court having put the assignees on their defence, was a complete answer to his evidence.

Mr. Prinsep followed on the same side.

At 9 o'clock the Court rose, and Sir J. P. Grant intimated that he would give his decision on a future day, of which notice would be given to both parties. —Englishman.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

The Court was unusually crowded this morning, it having been intimated that Sir J. P. Grant would give judgment on the petition of Mr. Alfred Lingham. At ten o'clock, the learned judge took his seat on the bench, and inquired whether there was any person present, authorized by Mr. Greig, who would answer for his (Mr. Greig's) purchasing the factories at the price he had formerly offered for them.

Mr. Prinsep replied that since the offer had been made there had been a considerable alteration in the Indigo market, and he suggested to the Court the propriety of setting up the factories at auction, at the prices at which they were alleged to be sold.

Mr. Turton, with reference to the remarks which fell from Mr. Advocate-General on the last Court day, regarding certain interlineations in the affidavit of Mr. Burkinyoung, requested permission to put in explanatory affidavits.

Mr. Prinsep, in the absence of the Advocate-General said, that he did not think his learned leader laid any weight on that score. All that had been said was, that the matter wanted explanation.

Mr. Turton—I grant that not much was said, but there was a good deal insinuated.

Sir J. P. Grant.—The interlineations required explanation, the affidavit was full of them.

The affidavit was then read. It set forth, that the interlineations were in the affidavit at the time it was sworn:—and that from the moment it was sworn, it had remained in the custody of Mr. A. Wight.

Sir John P. Grant.—This case is one of importance from its being the first arising here, and though I thought it not right to interrupt counsel in their statement, I did not hesitate from any doubt in my mind as to its principle; but I thought it right to have the whole case stated, and in particular on behalf of the assignees with reference to other considerations arising out of these proceedings.

The first objection to making the order absolute is that this court has not power to set aside the sale. The power of this court is under the 49th section of the Act, as follows: "that from time to time as possession is obtained of any of the estate or effects of any insolvent or insolvents, the assignee or assignees shall with all convenient speed make sale of the same. Subject nevertheless to the direction and control of the Court, by authority of which, he or they shall have been appointed, in case any application shall be made to such Court by any insolvent, or any creditor or mortgagee; in all which cases, such Court shall have full power and authority to delay or postpone the sale of any property and to make such other order regulating the same as to the Court shall seem meet. The powers, therefore, which the Court has, are these:—First, to delay or postpone the sale; secondly, to make such order regulating the sale, as to the Court shall seem meet. It is not necessary to consider whether the power to annul and make void a sale completed is here included; for the sale is not completed, the whole price has not been paid; the deeds, which are equal to livery of seisin, have not been executed and delivered. The Court has clearly the power to delay or postpone a sale not completed, or to make other orders, regulating such sale, 'as to the Court shall seem meet,' that for the advantage of the estate and not inconsistent with justice and equity. Secondly; one main question is, whether it is not altogether an invalid transaction, and no sale. The first question alone might lead to opening the biddings; the second, to prohibiting any further proceedings in these transactions and directing a re-sale.

The order nisi is not correctly drawn in seeking to cause the assignees to cancel the sale. It ought to be to prohibit them from proceeding with the sale to these persons.

The resistance to this order on the part of the assignees, is in effect, desiring the Court to sanction the sales and to order their completion. There is nothing to annul, but something to complete.

The matter now being brought before the Court upon the application of a creditor, the Court is bound to give its direction, and to exercise its control in the terms of the Act.

The petition on which this proceeding is founded states certain facts. First, that certain factories were contracted to be sold by the assignees for inadequate prices—smaller sums than could have been obtained if they had been duly advertised for sale by public auction. Secondly, that no public notice was given of the intention to sell, previous to the alleged sale, later than October, 1833. Thirdly, no valuation was made except by Saupin, the principal purchaser. Fourthly, that biddings at public sales had before Commissioners of Bankruptcy which have been closed, have been re-opened by directions of the Lord Chancellor, where it appeared a better price could be obtained. Fifthly, that if assignees had made due inquiries they would have found there were many parties desirous of purchasing the same. Sixthly, that if it should appear that Saupin was the manager and one of the lessees of one of the factories sold, and was so when the sale was made, that the lessees authorized Saupin to sell the two factories sold to the best advantage on their account, and that he had purchased the first-mentioned factory on his own account, and that no advertisements or valuation had been made—that then Saupin was disqualified from becoming a purchaser, unless the factory had been first duly advertised for a sale by public auction, Saupin being, as the Petitioner considers, a trustee for the creditors and that this is so held upon grounds of public policy. Seventhly, that if Bell, the purchaser of the other factory, is, or was a partner of Harry, one of the assignees, although the sale was without the knowledge of the latter, such private sale to Bell ought to be set aside and the factory set up to auction. Eighthly, that of these things should not appear in reference to Saupin and Bell, but that the sale, to whomsoever, was bonâ fide, but that a larger price could have been obtained if the factories had been duly advertised, and sold by public auction, then the assignees ought to be declared liable to pay such further sum as might have been obtained, had the factories been duly advertised and sold by public auction.

The Petitioner then prays the Court to order,—First, that the assignees and their secretary attend the Court to be examined. Secondly, for a rule to show cause why the assignees should not cancel the sales alleged to have been made to Saupin and Bell, and be restrained from executing conveyances of the factories; why Nischandarpur should not be exposed to public sale at Rs 10,000, and Haipara at Rs 5,000, and why the assignees should not pay the cost of this application? Or, in case the sales cannot be cancelled, to refer to the Examiner whether the factories could have been sold to any, and to what advantage, had they been duly advertised and sold by public auction; and to grant such other order as the case requires.

I have said, there being no sale completed, there is no sale to cancel. The first question, therefore is, whether the assignees ought to be restrained from completing the sales to Mr. Saupin and to Mr. Bell. If they ought, then, whether the factories should be put up for sale at the prices mentioned, or at what prices, and in what way? If they cannot or ought not to be restrained from completing the sales, then, whether those are grounds for the reference claimed to the Examiner. And what further order should be made.

The first thing which claims notice, is the letter of the several creditors who addressed the assignees, which is appended to the petition, and marked A. It contains statements grounded upon current report, no doubt, but such report as might well alarm the creditors, and such statements as demanded either an explicit denial in toto, or, if any part were true, a justification of it. Concise it might be, but sufficient it ought to have been with reference merely to the proofs of it, if they thought that convenient, but with a distinct reference to such proofs and resting upon them. The statements in that letter are very distinct. First, that the assignees had refused rupees 70,000 for the whole Indigo concerns mortgaged to the Bank of Bengal, which the Bank was ready to accept as the fair value; and that the assignees knew Greig and Donaldson were ready to buy at that price. Secondly, that the assignees accepted an offer of Saupin, the manager of the concern, for the two factories, now in question which the Bank refused as not the fair valuation, or equal to the offer of Greig and Donaldson. Thirdly, that Rogers, Bell, W. Storm, and Terraneau were desirous of purchasing parts of the concern. Fourthly, that Saupin came and represented that a large advance was necessary to renew the izarra which the assignees refused to make, but gave him power to sell that division;—that he, though aware that Greig and W. Storm were in the market, arranged with Rogers to buy one for him (Saupin) at Rs 10,000, and sold the other to Bell for Rs 5,000. Bell, being stated to be a partner of Mr. Hurry's, one of the assignees;—that no opportunity was offered to proprietors of neighbouring factories to come forward, the sale being effected by Saupin in a few hours. Fifthly, that previously to this sale by Saupin, W. Storm offered Rs 5,500 to Mr. Barkinyoung one of the assignees, and to Mr. Alexander their secretary, for what Saupin sold for Rs 5,000, and said he would give Rs 500 more than any other party, if necessary. Sixthly, that Greig was willing to give Rs 20,000 for what was sold for Rs 15,000, and actually offered Saupin and Bell Rs 22,000 for their purchase.

Each of those statements admitted and demanded a direct denial or admission with a short intimation of the reasons of their conduct, on the instant by the assignees, in writing, which might have been comprised in fewer words than the answer which the assignees addressed to the creditors through their attorney. In this answer they avoid any admission or denial of any one statement in the creditor's letter, on pretext which I must consider frivolous. First they affect to treat the statements as 'picked up from common report.' Common report may be a very bad ground whereon to found an accusation, but it is very good ground for inquiry, and if he whose conduct is implicated refuses to satisfy the inquiries of one interested and entitled to make them, he will make it a good ground of accusation. Secondly, they affect to treat this inquiry as if it were the same as a right of each individual creditor to call for a copy of voluminous correspondence, and an explanation in writing of each particular transaction upon any current report, and upon charges arising from the most frivolous pretences. They say very truly, that if they were to be so called upon, their time and establishment would be occupied to the neglect of the interests of the estate. But neither was this an inquiry by an individual creditor, but on the part of many creditors: the number of creditors represented by those who signed the letter, whose powers are registered with the assignees, being sixty-seven, and in value no less than Rs 12,26,380, or above £122,630 sterling. Nor, if the correspondence was voluminous to copy, was this any reason for refusing to make an admission or denial of plain statements, a short explanation of the reasons of their conduct, and reference to the correspondence and evidence by which it would be found to be justified. Nor was the transaction of an ordinary nature; nor the statement arising out of frivolous pretences. Assignees of insolvent estates ought to be aware that though their time ought not to be broken in upon with frivolous inquiries regarding every ordinary detail, it is a part of their duty to answer the reasonable inquiries of creditors upon transactions of importance and out of the common routine. In general, it were better, more prudent, and in some cases it is necessary, if the assignees would secure themselves from blame and liability, that transactions of moment should not be entered upon without such publicity as may make them known to all the creditors who are giving attention to their affairs. Thirdly, they state that Mr. Collier, acting as the attorney for Mr. Greig, was satisfied that Mr. Greig had no grounds to proceed on in the Insolvent Court. Now Mr. Greig was no creditor; but a disappointed purchaser; and it might be easy to satisfy Mr. Collier that he had no right to complain to the Insolvent Court though the assignees had given the estate away, unless there had been a sale at which Mr. Greig had been a bidder, and which had been unfairly conducted; or unless he could be permitted to advance upon the price and open the biddings, which Mr. Collier might think difficult. What had Mr. Collier's being satisfied to do with the just demand of these creditors to be informed whether their affairs had been so grossly misconducted in the matter in question as was stated? In like manner Mr. Plowden being satisfied though more to the purpose, since he was acting for a creditor, was no reason why they should refuse to satisfy these other creditors, and it would seem rather less troublesome to do so if what they had stated to Mr. Plowden was that they themselves thought sufficient to satisfy a creditor watchful of their conduct. I wish, however, to say, that enough has come out in the course of this investigation to show that Mr. Plowden was of too unsuspicious a temper to be very difficult to satisfy, at least, upon the point of fairness of intention on the part of the assignees, and being satisfied of this, to be inclined to push the investigation further and that a person of a less suspicious temper would probably not have been so easily satisfied. Fourthly, they seem very unwarrantably to insist upon considering the whole matter as Mr. Greig's affair, although the letter they were answering was signed by creditors and representatives of creditors in number and value entitled to a very respectful consideration, and the person they were addressing was the attorney for those creditors. They say, with great coolness, that having satisfied Mr. Greig's attorney Mr. Collier, who is also, they say, attorney for Cockerell and Co. though not, so far as appears in this matter, employed by that firm or any other creditor, and having been apparently unable to satisfy Cockerell and Co. by their former explanation—but what that explanation may have been nowhere appears, they feel it would be loss of time to go over the same grounds again as they are hopeless of saving the estate, the expense of taking the matter into the Insolvent Court, and shutting the door against further inquiry or demand of information by these persons who form a part of the body of whom these assignees are the paid and trusted agents, they conclude by desiring the attorney to give them notice if he is instructed to move for a rule nisi that they may endeavour to protect the estate from any charge of costs in case it is not eventually granted.

Now in the question of costs this letter of the assignees is very material. They ought to have known that by law no costs can be given in this Court against any individual except in the single case of the opposition of a creditor to an Insolvent's discharge being frivolous and vexatious:—that assignees are, therefore, bound to do all in their power to prevent the estate being exposed to costs, and to grudge no pains or trouble if, by any possibility, with due attention to the interests of the estate, it can be avoided. And let them be aware that if such costs are incurred by their neglect, of such pains and trouble and they receive a remuneration for their pains and trouble (in the present case they receive no less than ~~Rs~~ 800 per mensem each for their services) they will be left to pay them out of their own pockets in all cases whatever, at least so far as depends upon any share I may have in administering the law of this Court.

The consequence was, that the assignees seem to have expected, and, I must say, courted—the moving, on the part of one of the creditors who subscribed the letter addressed to them, for an order nisi in this Court to set aside the transaction of the sale referred to.

I put aside the question of cancelling the sale for reasons already stated. Then what is desired by this order is, first, to restrain the assignees from completing the sales by executing conveyances. Secondly, to order Nischandarpur to be set up to public sale at 10,000, and Hatpara, at ~~Rs~~. 5,000. Thirdly, that, if the sales must be completed, to refer to the Examiner to inquire whether the factories could have been sold to any, and to what, greater advantage by public sale, and to make further order. And Fourthly, that the assignees pay the costs of this application.

As to the first question, there are two sales—one of Nischandarpur to Saupin, and one of Hatpara to Bell. Sales in such circumstances may be invalid, either in respect to the relation the purchaser stands in to the seller, without any consideration of fraud, that is, with or without fraud; or independently of any such relationship upon the ground of fraud. I will first consider the sale to Saupin of Nischandarpur with reference to this relation; and, secondly, that to Bell of Hatpara, or to Saupin for Bell. I will examine it upon the affidavits put in on the part of the petitioner: on the affidavits, which are next in order, put in on the part of the assignees, and on the viva voce evidence adduced before me, taken subsequently to these affidavits, and explanatory and corrective of them, where the depositions are by the same deponents who have made the affidavits.

The affidavit of Greig swears to two facts; viz. 1st. that Nischandarpur and Hatpara have been for a considerable length of time under the management of Saupin: and 2dly, that Greig was, and is, ready to give one third as much again as the factories have been sold for. The affidavit first put in by the assignees, that of Hurry and Burkinyoung and others, states that these two factories, the Nischandarpur and Hatpara composing the Nischandarpur division, were under the charge of Saupin. It states that the united Moisura Noesara concern, sometime in or about 1830, was on the 15th October, 1830, sold to John Freeman, Francis Saupin, Francis Albert, and Alexander and Co., who were partners. Freeman had 5 16ths, Saupin 3 16ths, Albert 3 16ths and Alexander and Co. 5-16ths,—at the rent of ~~Rs~~ 12,000 per annum;—that Alexander and Co. were proprietors of these factories, of which those of Nischanderpur and Hatpara were parts; that Freeman afterwards sold his 5-16ths to James Alexander Terranean. That in September, 1833, they (the assignees) accepted from Saupin an offer of ~~Rs~~ 15,000 for the two factories under his management: considering it the full value, without having received any other offer and without exposing or proposing to expose them to public sale. That the Bank of Bengal, who were mortgagees of all the factories, did not give their consent to this sale, and the two factories in question continued, therefore, unsold, and to be carried on under the superintendence of Saupin. That at the close of the indigo season they repeatedly advertised them for sale, and then discontinued it on account of the expense. The affidavit then states that Mr. Hurry was taken ill and was incapable of attending to business from 15th August till the beginning of October; and Mr. Burkinyoung and Mr. Alexander, the secretary, proceed to depose that Saupin waited upon the former, and urged upon him the necessity of obtaining an immediate renewal of an izarra or lease of some lands attached to one of the divisions of the factories, which he had formerly urged, and for which he had proposed making an advance, by way of loan, to the zemindar under whom it was held of ~~Rs~~ 10,000, which advance the assignees had refused to make. The affidavit, as originally drawn, does not state that at this interview any thing was said by Saupin about the advance, or of course that was said: the words and making an advance of 8,000 or 9,000 ~~Rs~~ for the same are interlined, but are not certified by the Commissioner's initials, or those of the deponents, to have been written previous to the oath made. This omission, however, is now supplied by the affidavits just put in without which it would be impossible to tell whether the interlineation was sworn to or not. But this I must say, it is very careless to produce a deposition resting in so material a matter, upon an unauthenticated interlineation, to which, I am persuaded, the Commissioner who took it could not swear. There are several other material interlineations in this affidavit subject to the same observation. Saupin represented that Greig, the proprietor of a neighbouring factory, would inevitably obtain this lease if the assignees did not make the advance, and would thereby ruin their factory. The deponents discussed the matter with Saupin, and expressed to him their conviction that the Court would not authorize this advance, and that it would be better the division should be sold. Then Mr. Burkinyoung does that which it appears was agreeable to Saupin, if not that which he most desired, Burkinyoung to do. He offers the purchase to Saupin himself, and agrees at once without more ado to take the price he had offered the year before, and which the mortgagees had refused to accept, but which he again offered. Here, then, according to the account given, was a sale of a factory by an assignee of an insolvent estate to the agent and manager of that factory, by private contract, without competition, without any recent advertisement of the factory being still for sale, or notice given to any p[illegible] of the assignees being then ready to treat for the sale of the factory itself; the resolutions so to sell it appearing upon this affidavit to have arisen upon the instant, upon the representation urged upon him by that same agent in that same conversation, and founded in his knowledge acquired of the concern as such agent—the sale being concluded at once, before he left the room. If the case rested here I have no notion how it could be supposed that the sale to Saupin could stand.

In Wren v. Kirton, 8, Vesey, 502, the Lord Chancellor declared he would have set aside a sale of a colliery to the agent and manager, in the name of another person, if it had been an original sale by auction; and upon this ground that it was the duty of the agent, if he meant to bid, to furnish all the knowledge he had to those who were to sell; and that very slight circumstances would have induced him to do so, even at some risk of further loss by a re-sale. And then, though it was a purchase at a third sale by auction, for a price greatly larger than the highest offer obtained at either of the former, the Lord Chancellor confirmed it, with great reluctance, after several days hearing, in November, 1802, and taking two months, from the end, of that month to the end of January, 1803, to make up his mind to do so: declaring that he would not hesitate to set aside the sale if the least advance was made upon the sum offered by the manager. But he was pressed by the consideration that there was nothing leading him to suppose the property would ever again reach the sum originally offered; and after all he would only confirm the sale under the reservation that it should be set aside if an application were made before the first following Seal to open the biddings, giving security to make good any loss or deficiency of price.

And the reason of the rule which governs the case of all confidential and managing agents, as well as of agents for sale and trustees is clearly intimated, viz. that it is the duty of the managing agent, who has peculiar means of knowing the advantages and disadvantages attending the property under his charge, to communnicate all he knows that may enhance the price to the proprietor, the vendor, and to the intending purchaser: whereas his interest as an offerer is in such direct, and with ordinary men irresistible, conflict with this duty, that the law will not permit him to stand in both relations: and the rather, that the very fact of his standing in both relations, renders his detection, if he violates his duty, nearly impossible. This is the rule laid down in Equity, above thirty years ago in the case of managing agents buying covertly at a public sale by auction; and the rule did not take its rise then. Yet it is now proposed that this Court should confirm a sale made covertly to a managing agent by private contract, assignee of an insolvent estate, unsanctioned by any creditor or by any of the insolvents; for Mr. N. Alexander does not say that he knew of this sale.

But the case does not stop here. The affidavit of Mr. Burkinyoung goes on to state, that Mr. Saupin, on the 25th August, having come to him and offered ~~Rs~~ 15,000 for the two factories, and he having signified his readiness to accept that sum, Mr. Saupin asked if it made any difference if himself and another divided the purchase; to which Burkinyoung replied, that if they got ~~Rs~~ 15,000 he did not care how Saupin divided the purchase. On this Saupin said, he intended to retain the Nischandarpur division; that Rogers would assist him with the funds; and that he intended to sell the Hatpara factory to one Mr. Bell for ~~Rs~~ 5,000. Mr. Burkinyoung then, by Saupin's desire, addressed a letter to Mr. Rogers, informing him of the terms on which he was ready to sell; and the same day received a letter from Rogers in these terms—'I agree to purchase the Nischandarpur Indigo Concern at the price you offer, ~~Rs~~ 10,000 &c. &c.' Burkinyoung says he then considered the sale of that factory made to Rogers, as the agent, and for the benefit of Saupin. The following morning Saupin came, and Burkinyoung confirmed the sale of the Hatpara factory to Mr. Bell at ~~Rs~~ 5000 and agreed to make the conveyance thereof direct to Bell instead of Saupin.

Upon this statement, it appears,—First, that in truth the whole concern (the two factories) were sold to Saupin with an understanding that he was to sell one—or make over his purchase of that one—to one Bell who does appear not to have been known to the assignees. Secondly, that though this was what was done, what was to appear was a different thing, viz. that Rogers should appear the purchaser of a factory truly to be held for Saupin, and Bell should appear directly the purchaser from the assignees of factory truly bought by Saupin, under an agreement between him and Bell, on Bell's account, and that Saupin should not appear in the transaction.

The affidavit goes on to state that Mr. Burkinyoung and Mr. Alexander, the secretary to the assignees, considering it necessary to have the sanction of Terraneau and Albert, the co-lessees of these factories, to the said sale of them, wrote a letter to them, on the 25th August 1834, which is annexed to the affidavit. This letter, which is addressed to Mr. Terraneau, bears, that "the assignees, adverting to the precarious result of the concern, and the additional outlay of ~~Rs~~ 10,000, which Mr. Saupin personally has asked for to enable him to secure an izarra, but which the assignees will not disburse, have, at his suggestion, offered his division of the concern for sale. I am directed to add that should suitable offers be made, the assignees will dispose of your and Mr. Albert's divisions likewise, &c. &c. I am directed therefore to request your concurrence in the sale, in case an opportunity for disposing of the concern offers." What was done therefore, was this:—the assignees actually concluded a sale with Saupin, for both factories, on the 25th of August, agreeing that Roger's name should appear as the purchaser of the largest, and the other should be truly bought for Bell. They do this under the impression, created in them by Saupin, that an advance was necessary not exceeding ~~Rs~~ 8,000 or 9,000, (if the interlineation in the affidavit is to be credited,) and on the same day, after the bargain is made, they write to the partners of the insolvents, without whose concurrence they knew they could not fulfil their bargain, not what they have done, but, on the contrary, what they ought to have done; viz. that they had offered them for sale to any who should offer to buy, and had determined, should suitable offers to purchase be made after the time they were writing, they would dispose of all the factories, and desired the concurrence of those they addressed in the sale, in case an opportunity offered. They say not a word of Saupin in the transaction, (though he was the other partner of the insolvents, and those they were addressing, and their agent and manager in the part of the concern to be sold,) except that he asked for a large advance, and had suggested the offering that division for sale—not that he had offered to buy, much less that he had bought it;—and in stating the advance he asked for, they misrepresented and exaggerated the amount, if what they now affirm in the interlineation be true, as to what he said,—they stating it in their letter to the other partners to be ~~Rs~~ 10,000 instead of ~~Rs~~ 8,000 or ~~Rs~~ 9,000. Is this consistent with the statement in the affidavit, that a bargain for sale of the whole of the division of the concern was completed with Saupin on the 25th of August? Is it consistent with the averment in the interlined sentence, that all the advance required by Saupin was ~~Rs~~ 8,000 or ~~Rs~~ 9,000?

To this letter the partners in the lease return an answer on the 29th August, agreeing to sanction a sale of the divisions offered for sale by Saupin's suggestion. In this acquiescence there was necessarily an implied reservation:—if they should deem the price, or if the price should truly be, as good a price as could be got for the property; no price having as yet been named. On the 29th of August, therefore, these partners did not know of any final bargain being made for the sale of these two factories, nor could the sale be validly made before that day. There are two other letters between them and the assignees produced, but they relate to the remaining factories, not those the subject of the present petition. It is said in the affidavit that the consent of the co-lessees to the sale of the factories in question was not given until the 7th September, but this is a mistake.

The affidavit then details interviews and correspondence with Mr. Greig, a disappointed purchaser but not creditor, and Mr. Plowden, acting for a creditor, the object of which is to show that Mr. Collier (Greig's attorney) and Mr. Plowden expressed themselves quite satisfied with the explanations given by the assignees, of these matters; with all of which we have nothing to do here.

But one letter from the assignees to Saupin, of 15th September, is remarkable. First, it desires him to furnish them with such explanations as will enable them to prove that the advance for securing the izarra was necessary; not such as might justify the statement he had made and prove he had not deceived them. Had they taken it for granted, upon his statement without proof or examination, and had they nothing to show in verification of his statement, in making which he had so direct an interest? Secondly, they state, on the 15th September, the advance proposed was ~~Rs~~ 10,000; not ~~Rs~~ 8,000 or ~~Rs~~ 9,000. Thirdly, they desire him, in his confidential capacity of acting partner, to give them a true and faithful account of the position of the concern, which account was to decide whether a sale made to himself and his friend, was a fair sale, and at a sufficient price. It is clear these explanations are no evidence, not worth the reading unless they prove something against the writer. But it is also clear the assignees knew Saupin to be in a confidential capacity, and as such to have peculiar means of knowing the position of the concern, and yet considered him a person with whom the assignees of bankrupts could safely and lawfully conclude a secret sale of property, of which he had, at the time, and had long before, the confidential management.

There is another letter, of 30th October, from the attorney of the assignee to the attorney of the complaining creditors, offering, on the part of the former, every personal information and access to every document the latter might require. It is much to be regretted that the same tone was not adopted earlier. If it had not altogether prevented the necessity of an application to this Court, which possibly it might not, it might have lessened its expense.

The affidavit of Saupin states, that before going to Calcutta, he had agreed with Bell to let him have Hatpara factory for Rs. 5,000 if he should purchase the division for Rs. 15,000. He confirms Burkinyoung's affidavit, that the sale was made to him, and completed on the 25th August through Rogers;—that he (Saupin) intended to sell Hatpara to Bell,—and that on the 26th, Burkinyoung confirmed the sale made by Saupin, and agreed to make the conveyance direct to Bell instead of Saupin. There is a good deal follows, denying any misrepresentation or deception offered by him (the deponent) to the assignees, and relating to the importance of obtaining the izarra, and some documentary evidence offered to this latter purport. In my view of the case these are matters into which I cannot go.

The affidavit of Bell states, that Mr. Harry's interest in the partnership with the deponent ceased on the 30th Sept. 1834. [Mr. Prinsep and Mr. Turton here corrected the learned judge, Mr. Harry's interest in the partnership ceased on the 30th September 1833.] I took it that the affidavit referred to 1834. But it is of no importance. He was truly out of the partnership, and I have always so considered it. Mr. Bell confirms the fact of his having agreed with Saupin for the Hatpara factory for Rs. 5,000 before Saupin made his offer to Burkinyoung.

The affidavit of Mr. Rogers confirms the statement that the sale was made to Saupin. But he says that Mr. Burkinyoung's letter to him said, that he had agreed to sell the Nischandarpur factory to Saupin. The letter is not produced, but from Roger's answer it seems certain that Saupin's name was not mentioned in the letter. This affidavit and the letters produced prove that Rs. 22,000 were offered for the two factories on the 20th Sept. 1834, to Rogers on the supposition that he was the purchaser. He states that he thought this above their value;—but he also states that Saupin did not wish to sell; so that, at least, he had not got a bad bargain.

There is also put in an affidavit of two persons, of the names of Rayson and Wachsell, which gives an account, very little to the present purpose, of some great resentment, as is alleged, for a very trivial cause, felt by Greig towards Saupin, and a great desire to injure him in his purchase of the factory. The affidavit also gives the opinion of these gentlemen as to the value of the factory.

These are affidavits put in on the part of the assignees, which, as I have said, must be considered as corrected and explained by the viva voce evidence of such of the deponents as were examined viva voce. The affidavits of the assignees and Mr. Alexander were sworn on the 8th of November, the Court sat on the same day, and the affidavits must have been sworn before the Court sat. Rogers's affidavit was sworn on the 8th November, and Saupin's on the same day.

I come now to the viva voce evidence before me; and this I am bound to take as the correct account of the transaction where it may differ from the accounts given in the affidavits of the same parties. The result of this evidence is as I shall now state.

Saupin is stated by Mr. Alexander to have been the manager of Nischandarpur and Hatpara, being himself one of the co-lessees, and that he was so on the 25th August, 1834. Alexander considers the transaction of the 25th August, an authority to Saupin to sell to Rogers and Bell; Saupin declared they were to be the purchasers. Alexander repeats several times it was an authority to Saupin to sell. He says "The manner in which the sale took place was this:—Saupin had offered 15,000 for Nischandarpur in September, 1833, which the assignees accepted at the time. I wrote letter A. I was so directed by the assignee Mr. Burkinyoung, Mr. Harry being ill. I wrote B. in August, about the 27th. There were two transactions took place on the 25th August. First, on Mr. Burkinyoung and I assuring Saupin that we were certain the Court would not authorize so large an advance. He then renewed his former offer which had been accepted before. Previous to his leaving the office, he asked if it made any difference if two parties became purchasers instead of one, paying Rs. 15,000 together. Mr. Burkinyoung said, it was of no moment. Saupin then declared the purchasers were Mr. Rogers and Mr. Bell. I considered the sale then as made. B. was written partly by directions of the assignees, partly not. I cannot say whether it was read by the assignees, but if not the substance was communicated to them, for I never wrote any thing regarding sales without communicating it to them. I took their orders generally. Letters might be written, but the orders were theirs. When Saupin declared Rogers and Bell were the purchasers, and Mr. Burkinyoung said very well, I considered it a sale. I considered it an authority to Saupin to sell to these parties. Letter C. is dated 1st September. It was not written by direction of the assignees—that is, not the part which has reference to the present communication with Mr. Storm. It was written by authority of Mr. Burkinyoung. The communication referred to was made on the 25th of August, after Saupin had received authority to sell to Bell and Rogers. When I found there was a person who would give Rs. 500 more, I referred him to Saupin hoping he had not closed with Bell. This was written by order of Burkinyoung—'Dear Sir,—The assignees desire me to say they were ignorant you were in the market.' Storm called the evening of the day, after the directions to sell. "I now know Mr. Rogers bought for Saupin. I have heard so from Mr. Rogers." Indeed, Alexander does not seem ever to have supposed Saupin was dealing for himself until he was told so afterwards.

Upon this evidence Saupin was the agent employed to sell. He could not buy for himself. This is an established rule of equity on consideration of public policy, independent of any imputation of fraud. The assignees could not employ him as an agent to sell, and at the same time have an understanding with him that he might buy, through a trustee, for himself; for they, acting as trustees for others, could not dispense with the established rule of Equity. Nor could Saupin, representing himself as communicating the offers of others, and as acting in the character of agent merely to sell to others, buy for himself. Rogers swears he bought as agent for Saupin, while Saupin was representing himself according to Mr. Alexander's evidence, as the agent to sell for the assignees to Rogers, as a principal. Burkinyoung says Saupin said he would get Rs. 15,000 for the assignees—Rogers would pay Rs. 10,000, Bell, Rs. 5,000. He says he was aware Saupin was buying for himself, through Rogers as his agent. Yet he goes on to deal with him as agent to sell for the assignees to Rogers;—to represent him as such to intending purchasers. On the 25th August, at 5 o'clock, P. M. Alexander tells W. Storm that Hatpara was not sold but was open to an offer from him. On the 26th August, Burkinyoung authorizes a letter describing Saupin as agent to sell. He had previously authorized the Secretary's referring purchasers to him as such agent. Burkinyoung actually concludes, according to his own story, with Saupin for the sale of one part to Saupin at Rs. 10,000 provided Saupin can sell the other for Rs. 5,000, and this provisional sale was not communicated to the secretary of the assignees and he instructs Saupin at the same time, as agent, to sell this other part at Rs. 5,000, Saupin's own purchase being dependent on getting Rs. 5,000, and a purchaser (W. Storm) being then in the market at Rs. 5,500, and some time passed and the agreement with Saupin was not considered complete, and yet there was no acceptance of the Rs. 5,500, or any further communication with Storm, or any setting-up of the factories to auction. Storm asked and obtained leave to amend his offer, while Burkinyoung, as is now affirmed, had already sold to Saupin the agent, Storm, the intending purchaser, being permitted to consider Saupin as acting for the assignees in the sale and the assignee knowing Saupin had been in the market for the purchase. Saupin says he thought Greig capable of giving a greater price than himself and believed he was inclined to purchase; he believed Greig would have given a greater price to get him (Saupin) out of it. That is, it was worth Greig's while to give a higher price than any other person in order to get that factory into his own hands. Saupin says, he knew Greig was disposed to purchase a renewal of the izarra. There was no difficulty, therefore, in finding the purchaser who would purchase a renewal of the izarra also. Not a word of all this appears to have been communicated to the assignees, but Saupin presses upon them the necessity of advancing the money to renew the izarra, or else of selling without delay, while he knew of a purchaser who would give more than he would, and to whom settling for the izarra would have been no obstacle. Saupin now states that the commission he received from Burkinyoung, at the first interview, on the 25th of August, was to endeavour to obtain the price that had been offered the preceeding year by Mr. Rogers;—that he then went to Rogers who sent him back to the assignees to tell them if they would make him an offer he would accept it at Rs 10,000: he also states that he had entered into an agreement with Bell, five or six months before, that they should take the factories together, Bell at Rs 5,000 for Hatpara, and Saupin at Rs 10,000 for Nischandarpur. Saupin knew Greig had made an offer the year before. His account of the interview between himself and the assignees differs from those given by Alexander and Burkinyoung. He did not make a fair representation of the terms for the renewal of the izarra. The izarra was to cost Rs 8000, and Rs 800 as a present to the sircar.—This was to be advanced at five per cent. interest on Rs 8,000, with a deduction of Rs 150 per annum of the rent. That is, for an advance of Rs 8,800 they were to get Rs 550 per annum, or 6¼ per cent. and a renewal of the lease. He never mentioned the reduction of rent, so that in fact he represented that they were to get 5 per cent on Rs 8,000 out of Rs 8,800 which they were to advance, whereas they were to get 6¼ per cent on the whole Rs 8,800. This is according to the statement now made by Saupin, and the interlined affidavit of Mr. Burkinyoung, of the advance required having been stated on the 25th of August, at Rs 8,800, yet we have seen that on the same 25th August, the assignee represents the advance demanded to be Rs 10,000 and upon his own viva voce examination Mr. Burkinyoung distinctly swears, that the advance desired by Saupin on the 25th of August, as well as in January, previous, was Rs 10,000. How this is to be reconciled with the interlineation in the affidavit of the 8th November, the same day on which the deposition viva voce was made. I do not know, but the subsequent viva voce deposition is that to which I must give credit, more especially confirmed as it is by the written representations made at the time.

It thus appears. First, that Saupin was the confidential managing agent of the insolvents, and their partners in the conduct of the concern which it was proposed to sell. Secondly, that he was consulted as to the sale. Thirdly, that he was employed to effect a sale, by private contract, at a price, which was fixed by the then sole acting assignee, upon discussion with Saupin the agent himself, and with the secretary of the assignees who was one of the insolvents, no other person being present. Fourthly, that Saupin returned with an offer of the price fixed for the whole concern—for two thirds, in the name of Rogers, who, in truth, bought in trust for Saupin the agent and for the remaining one-third, in the name of Bell, with whom Saupin had before entered into an agreement still subsisting,—that they should purchase the whole between them at these prices. Fifthly, that thereupon, without soliciting, or giving time for competition, Saupin the agent, received authority to conclude these sales, which he did, and which the assignee immediately confirmed. Sixthly, that a sum of one-tenth more might have been obtained for Hatpara, and one-third more for both factories together, if the sale had not been thus rapidly and privately concluded.

It does not seem to me necessary to go further into the case. It does not seem to me, upon a careful consideration, that it is possible these sales should stand. I have not been able to figure to myself a ground in a Court of Equity on which they can be supported. The principle is well and clearly laid down by Lord Eldon in Exparte James, 8, Vesey, 345. (the learned judge here read the Chancellor's decision.) And what was told of the solicitor in that case is not meant to apply to a law agent merely, but to any agent of assignees confidentially employed by them and so it is said 1st p. 352. No doubt permission may be given to a trustee, or an agent, to become a purchaser, by those interested; but it cannot be given by a trustee or assignee of a bankrupt estate to an agent under him. If given, it must be by the creditors themselves and the bankrupt also; for he is not left without interest in the disposal of the estate by becoming bankrupt; nor can it be given by a majority of the creditors only. No majority of creditors can bind the minority in a matter regarding the management of the estate, contrary to general principles of law and equity. (6, Vesey, 622.) And the rule which excludes trustees of every description and persons confidentially employed or consulted, from becoming purchasers of property placed under their management, and regarding the sale of which they have been employed or consulted, extend most emphatically to assignees of bankrupt's estates,—to the agents employed by such assignees and to every person confidentially consulted by them regarding the sale of the bankrupt's property, (10 Vesey 393.) The rule which excludes trustees and agents of every description from becoming purchasers, is as old as any in the law. It was embodied in a maxim in the civil law: and is, as Lord Rosslyn says, in Whichcote v. Lawrence, 3 Vesey 750, 'that which prevails in all cases, in all laws and countries where trusts are admitted.' It is a maxim as to every trustee, Non potest esse auctor in rem suam. No man who has an authority to act for another can interpose his authority in a matter which concerns himself, or, as it is well translated by Lord Rosslyn in that case,—"He who undertakes to act for another in any matter, shall not, in the same matter, act for himself."

I have thought it right to go at some length into this case, because it is the first of the sort that the Court has had before it, and because the principle which it involves is one of the greatest importance, and most general application in the management of insolvent estates, and in the sale of insolvents' property; and because, from what has passed in this case, and I may add from the line that has been adopted in the argument, it seems to me that the principle is less generally understood than is consistent with the safety of those who have the management of them, or are interested in them, I have thought it right to cite at some length the received and ancient doctrines of the Court of Chancery upon disputable authority, that I may not be supposed, by any to whom questions of this kind may be new, to be setting up positions in the law.

There are other matters in the case, which, if they stood alone, would be worthy of remark. But I do not enter into them, because I wish it to rest on the plain and broad principle I have stated: otherwise I should observe upon the long intermission of advertisements for sale, and the sudden conclusion of a private bargain without renewing them; the non-acceptance of the offer for the purchase of the whole of these factories, which the Bank had signified its readiness to accede to—an offer which ought to have been accepted, if on trial by public sale, it was found to be, as it probably was, the most that could be obtained.

There is one thing, however, which I think it right to observe: there is no clause in the act prescribing a sale by auction; but great caution is necessary in the adopting any other mode of sale if assignees who do so would escape liability and question. There is nothing in the statutes in Bankruptcy in England to prevent sales by private contract. But it requires in most cases the consent of the creditors to render it unobjectionable. Neither is there any thing in the Insolvent Act for England which requires any other than the real estate to be sold by public auction. But it is laid down in practice as generally advisable to adopt that mode in all descriptions of property, and it is said not to be generally departed from except with the advice of an auctioneer.

As to the costs of this proceeding, I have no power to order them to be paid by any party, but I have a power to protect the estate, and I think it my duty to order, that they shall not be paid out of the estate of the insolvents.—Englishman.

EXAMINATION OF NATIVE FEMALES.

The Eleventh Annual Examination of the Native Females attached to the Ladies' Society School, took place at the Town Hall on the 31st December, the room being well crowded at the appointed hour and the children being seated in rows with tracts before them, their examination began on the entrance of the Right Honorable Lady William Bentinck, and it was conducted by the Revd. Mr. Reichardt with the assistance of an European school mistress. There were five classes in all, and each having read a chapter of the Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, was asked several questions on Scripture History, which were well and satisfactorily answered. The examination of the girls did not last half an hour as the language (Bengalee) they read and spoke was not understood except by very few of the audience. At the conclusion of the examination all who were present at it hastened to the sale below stairs, of the fancy articles of sorts which were exposed on many tables, the charge of which was taken by many ladies of quality. We never before witnessed such a crowded assembly nor so extensive a sale of articles, worthy of attraction, consisting of toys, pictures, bonnets, boxes, and other things of sorts.

Of the distinguished in the assembly we observed Lady William attended by the Governor of Serampore, Lady Grant, Sir Charles and Lady D'Oyly, Sir Jeremiah and Lady Bryant, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Grant, Reverends Dealtry, Sandys, Reichardt, and many other ladies and gentlemen.—Hurkaru.

THE ARMENIAN PHILANTHROPIC ACADEMY,

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL EXAMINATION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10.

The examination in English commenced according to notification at 10 o'clock, and it was conducted by Dr. Corbyn in conjunction with the Reverend Mr. Sandys.

There are in this school about 70 boys, almost all of them children of Armenian gentlemen, and these are taught both English and Armenian.

From the second to the fourth class the boys were examined in English reading, grammar, geography, and the definition of words, and they acquitted themselves creditably.

The first class was examined last. By the ready answers from the boys of this class to the questions put to them in geography and natural philosophy, they gave general satisfaction; they then read a verse from the Poetical Reader, and analysed the sentences according to the rules of grammar, (but without quoting the notes, rules, and observations contained in Lindley Murray's Philological work) and they conjugated some verbs with facility--some of the boys manifested a pretty good knowledge of Scripture History.

After some recitations, Cato's Soliloquy, &c. which met with general applause, the examination in English was concluded at 2 o'clock, and Dr. Corbyn addressed the boys, in order to stimulate them to perseverance in their studies.

The Doctor, in a neat, plain speech, expressed his gratification at the progress the boys seemed to have made in learning, especially in grammar, though they had laboured under great disadvantages from the change of masters during the past year. He hoped, however, that as they were now under the tuition of a talented and attentive master, Mr. George Lewis, they would at the next year's examination make a better figure as they were taught geometry and mathematics: then exhorted the boys to perseverance, that they would doubtless become distinguished of society, and promised to visit the school then to see how they get on—as he had visitor.

The boys of the senior classes learn English Mr. George Lewis, the head master, and the junior, by Mr. Charles Frederick Macnamara, who is an useful and assiduous usher, having been connected with the Institution for a number of years.

The examination in the Armenian language was then conducted till after 4 o'clock by the reverend gentlemen of that community, who were pleased with the result of the examination. The boys have only one teacher in Armenian, Mr. Avdall, who is both well versed in that language and very active, and who, since the death of Mr. Kaloos, has discharged the duties of his department unassisted.—Bengal Hurkaru.

MEETING TO VOTE AN ADDRESS TO LORD WILLIAM BENTINCK.

The Meeting held at the Exchange Rooms on the 30th January, was very fully attended. Mr. William Bruce, of the firm of Bruce, Shand and Co., was called to the chair, but as he declined taking it, Mr. Cockerell was proposed and presided accordingly.

MR. COCKERELL opened the proceedings by answering some objections which had been urged against the way in which the Meeting had been called. It was intended at first, he observed, to publish a notice bearing several signatures of the mercantile community, stating specifically the purpose for which the Meeting was called, that it was to vote an address to Lord William Bentinck, expressing the high opinion entertained of his Lordship's merits, and of the regard for commercial interests especially, which his Lordship had manifested; but as a similar course had in the case of the proposed statute to his Lordship given offence to so[illegible] as appeared by several letters which had [illegible]lished in the Harkaru on the subject, it was resolved, in order, the better to guard against any thing of [illegible]at kind to send forth an advertisement without signa[illegible]ures, calling a meeting of Merchants, and others, lea[illegible]ing it open to all who felt disposed to concur in the [illegible]ject, to attend. It had been objected that the mee[illegible]should have been called by the Sheriff, but Mr. [illegible]ockerell [illegible] see the necessity of that course. [illegible]e would now, however, leave the matter in the hands of the meeting.

Mr. HARDING in proposing the first resolution observed, that in addressing a M[illegible]ting of those who were disposed to concur in [illegible]e object of that resolution, he did not conceive [illegible] necessary to trespass much on their time—he h[illegible] no talent for public speaking, and merchants we[illegible] not in the habit of making long speeches. Mr. H[illegible]rding then read the 1st Resolution—

"That the public conduct [illegible] His Excellency the Governor General Lord W. C. Be[illegible]nck, as connected with the commercial and productive in[illegible]ests of this country and the public weal generally, deser[illegible]s the grateful acknowledgements of the community."

Baboo DWARKANAU[illegible] TAGORE seconded this olution, when

Mr. LONGUEVILLE [illegible]ARKE rose to propose an endment. Mr. Cla[illegible] observed that had this eting been publicly [illegible]lled in the usual manner l the object of the Meeting specifically stated, should not have int[illegible]ed on their attention. Any of men had a ri[illegible] of course to assemble for [illegible]-l purpose wever; and, but that the noti[illegible]clud[illegible]ther" he should not have been [illegible]t one of those others, he had an undoubt[illegible] to attend and take a part in their proceed[illegible]e, for one, was disposed to concur in an [illegible] to Lord William Bentinck. He agreed [illegible] object for which the meeting was called, but [illegible]inly did not approve of the manner in which was called. He objected because the mode of proceeding differed from all former precedents. We had had Meetings to address Sir Charles Metcalfe, Mr. Adam, the Marquis of Hastings, and Lord Minto, and all of these had been called in a formal and public manner by the Sheriff or by notifications bearing the signatures of those who by character and station commanded the respect of society; but the mode in which this Meeting was called was little calculated to honour Lord William Bentinck. (Here Mr. Clarke read the notification.) Here was not one name to sanction the proceeding, no one name to inspire respect, or do honour to the occasion. He knew of no reason why Lord William Bentinck was not as much entitled to honour as any of his predecessors—for in his (Mr. Clarke's) opinion, his Lordship had done more for the country than all his predecessors, and he was sorry to see him slighted. Undoubtedly the course adopted was a slight—a very great slight—that in this city containing half a million of inhabitants, a Meeting should be invited for such a purpose, by an anonymous advertisement not even stating the object for which it was intended to meet. He should consider such a course insulting to his Lordship, but that of course it would be too well understood that the Meeting could not have any intention to insult his Lordship. Still, it was calculated to convey a slight, and he (Mr. Clarke) therefore begged to propose the following amendment.

"That while this meeting refrains from pledging itself to an unqualified approval of Lord William Bentinck's administration, they are of opinion that some of his acts have conferred such eminent benefit on the country that the inhabitants of Calcutta ought, on the occasion of his retirement, to convey to him their expressions of gratitude and regard.

As this meeting has not been convened by the Sheriff of the City, nor by the avowed authority of any of the inhabitants, it wants that degree of publicity and sanction which the merits of Lord William Bentinck deserve when it is proposed to address him on his retirement."

Mr. BRUCE, of the firm of Bruce, Shand and Co. supported the admendment.

Mr. COCHRANE was unwilling at all times to intrude upon any assembly—he well knew the unworthy motives which might be attributed to him—but no censure should deter him from uttering sentiments which he had long cherished and which he believed were in unision with the opinions of nearly every one in that assembly. If public and private virtue could reflect lustre and honor on the virtuous, the generous, and the high descended, on the page of the History of British India, the name of Lord William Bentinck would be graven in characters indelible. If the[illegible] should be considered the langnage of adulation, let it be remembered that it was adulation paid to a setting, not a rising sun. What imported it where they met—how they were called, or whether they were assembled by the Sheriff or not, they were there to utter sentiments which were their own. Their[illegible]s was the tribute which followed after, not preceded the actions of the man—and envying not the taste or the feeling which had dictated this opposition, he begged leave to move "the previous question."

Mr. CLARKE's amendment was then put and negatived.

Mr. CARR proposed the following resolution, which was seconded by Rustomjee Cowasjee, and carried without opposition.

"That the following address to His Excellency the Right Honorable the Governor-General Lord William Cavendish Bentinck, be engrossed and left at the Exchange Rooms for signature."

The Chairman then read the following Address, which was approved of:—

"As the hour is at hand when you purpose, on account of impaired health, to resign your high office and to quit for ever this country which you have now governed for nearly seven years, we the undersigned Merchants, Agents, Planters, and others of the classes more particularly concerned in production and commerce, desire to offer your Lordship the respectful expression of our profound regret at the loss which we are about to sustain in your departure, and our sincere sorrow for its distressing cause. We feel ourselves impelled by a strong sense of duty to your Lordship, and to that portion at least of the community, whom we may be said in some sense to represent, in thus presenting ourselves to contribute our humble testimony in approval of numerous measures completed or in preparation, having for their object the general improvement of the country, the moral and social advancement of its vast and various population, and the development in particular of its commercial and agricultural resources. For much good that has been accomplished, we return your Lordship our sincere and grateful thanks: for much that remains to be done by your successors, we shall not be the less grateful to them, because we may have to ascribe a share of their merit to your example, and to the tone in the public Councils, which you will leave behind you.

"In many respects your Lordship's administration has neeessarily been of a character widely different from those of your predecessors. Theirs were the more brilliant days of War and Diplomacy, and pro fuse expenditure. To you the task has fallen, mo homely, not less useful, but often more paint consolidating, preserving and organizing, of r ing the deep wounds in the public finances, o tending with an alarming deficit, and of enf the remedy of severe economy and retrench The period of your Lordship's Governm been marked in a most distressing manner by cantile disaster, to a degree and amount passi previous experience in India. That fearful has now passed over; but it is not to be forg that while in the beginnings of panic, the impe calamities appeared to be within the reach o vention by timely assistance, that assistanc liberally afforded by your Lordship; amon measures effected or designed for the advanc of the country and the development of its c lities we gratefully enumerate.

"Your liberal views regarding Colonization the free ingress and unlicensed and unmo settlement of Europeans with the right to hold satisfied as we are, that to your earnest advoca those great measures for the improvement of and to the publicity with which you were not to conduct that discussion, the country owes great and salutary enactments.

"To the perseverance and ardour with which Navigation has been recommended and encou in in all its branches external and internal, w indebted, that at length the subject has been ally taken up by Parliament and the Home Executive Authorities on your Lordship's representations.

"The treaties by which the Navigation of the Indus, and its tributaries has been thrown open for the first time to the adventurous trader, and the jealousies of the foreign powers along its course soothed into co-operation with that great design, we consider to be in a particular manner your Lordship's work, and we confidently expect that these beginnings will ripen with time and prudence into results beneficial to commerce and its concomitant civilization.

"In the enlightened spirit we hope your Lordship has planned the liberation of domestic trade and intercourse throughout the British Indian dominions, from the barbarous and antiquated shackles of transit duties, and other internal taxation. We trust to see the benevolent design speedily carried into execution, and we acknowledge with thank the indications of such intention in the facilities al ady granted to the transit of our great staple—In go— to this metropolis from the interior. We acknowledge further the relaxation practically allowed by your Lordship's Government in regard to the Calcutta Stamp Duties, a tax so distasteful to the habitants from the circumstances under which it is imposed and its impolitic and vexatious pressure on a languishing commerce. We have seen with satisfaction the disposition evinced to encourage municipal improvement among us, and approaches to self-government, and to institutions akin to those of the mother country. In this description we include the Chamber of Commerce, the Trade Association, the contemplated advancement of Native Gentlemen to the Offices of Justices of the Peace, suggested improvements in conservancy details, patronage extended to Central and District Charitable Societies, the institution of Saving's Banks, and the endeavours to improve the Health of the City, and reclaim unproductive wastes, by a system of drainage applied to the Eastern Marshes and Salt Lake, in connection with the new canal which now with its durable suspension bridges has been drawn round Calcutta from the Hoogly connecting it with the navigation by the Sunderbunds.

"The attention which your Lordship has bestowed on the internal communic of the country gene- rally deserve our particul acknowledgements. The formation of the new tr k road through the Dooab, the arduous constructio of a solid and magnificent road from the great estern Mart of Mirzapore along the main line of traffic to the South and West. The preparatory s ys for connecting the Ganges with Bangrutty grand canal which shall main- tain the communicatin in the driest seasons—all these we regard as proofs of that real solicitude for the improvement of the country, which we were led to anticipate from the promise held out by your Lordship's early declaration of your desire to receive suggestions and informa by your constant perso- nal accessibility to all ks, and by your uniform encouragement of tha reedom in discussion through the Press, which your immediate predecessors had so strangely feared and so unwisely proscribed.

"We have gone into an enumeration of some of the benefits conferred by your Lordship on the country we inhabit, because we would not have it seem that we are carrying up a mere complimentary address to your Lordship, and are therefore anxious to put on record the substantial reasons which led us now to offer our unfeigned acknowledgeme for the benefits which have either been conferred contemplated by you, and our most sincere wis for the restoration of your Lo rdship's health and your future happiness and pro sperity."

Mr. JOHN BRIGHTMAN then proposed the follo ing resolution, which was seco nded by Mr. J. Fergusson, and carried nem. con.

"That the following Gentlemen be requested to presen address to His Excellency Lord W. C. ck. Bentinck.

NATIVE MEETI[NG] ... N ADDRESS TO LORD W. BENTINCK.

Pursuant to the requisition sign[ed] ... eral ... native gentlemen of Calcutta, and pu[b]lished in the ... the different newspapers of the city, a ... of numerous native inhabitants of Calcutta ... its neighbourhood was held on the 30th January 1835 ... at the Hindoo College, for the purpose of cons[i]dering in what manner they may best express ... sentiments of regret, at the approaching de[pa]rture of the Right Honorable Lord William C[a]vendish Bentinck from India.

On the motion of Baboo Dwarkanauth ... seconded by Baboo Ramcomul Sen, Rajah ... mohun Bahader was called to the chair; and on the chairman taking his seat he expressed his regret at the loss which the native community was about to sustain by the departure of their esteemed and benevolent Governor-General from India. His Lordship, he said, has done every thing kind for us, but the only act of unkindness is his Lordship's parting with us (cheers.)

Baboo Russomoy Dutt in moving the first resolution spoke as follows:—

Gentlemen,—You are aware of the purpose for which we have met here. Lord Bentinck deserves high tribute of respect and gratitude at our hands for the good he has done to our country and to our race. Although I am not in the state secret to be able to analyze all his Lordship's acts, yet I see and feel, in common with my fellow countrymen, the benefits arising to the native community from some of his Lordship's measures, and to a few of them I shall confine my observations. The first act of his Lordship's administration which comes under our observation is his making the Press in this country, free, by suffering the famous Press regulation of 1823 to remain a dead letter. The utility of a free Press is to make the Government and the Public intimately acquainted not only with the passing events, but with the real situation and sentiments of the population. It cannot fail to produce mutual confidence between the ruler and the people, and it is a mighty check over all abuse of power. The press within these few years has tended much to promote the cause of education and to expose abuses in this country, and if it continues as free as it has been during the administration of Lord Bentinck, it cannot fail to increase the happiness and comfort of the inhabitants of this country. Where there are no representatives of the people to take a share in the Government, a free Press is particularly useful, as it is the only legitimate organ through which the voice and sentiments of the population can be heard and ascertained. I shall next merely advert to the acts, abolishing the degrading corporal punishment, to which I believe the natives only were subjected, and that of establishing the trial by jury throughout the Company's Courts in British India. These acts need no comment. I come now to the regulations 5 of 1831 and 9 of 1833, authorizing the employment of natives on more important trusts connected with the administration of the country and thus raising them from the degraded state to which they have been so long subject under the British rule. Lord Bentinck's gracious intercourse with the natives is as worthy of his Lordship as it is gratifying to their feelings, and these acts of benevolence and kindness have (I hope) overruled the uncharitable opinion of the parties who think that "the natives of this country, taking the best of them, as men, are not only unworthy of trust and devoid of principle, but of too limited intelligence and reach of thought to allow Europeans with large and liberal minds and education to have even rational intercourse with them." Lord Bentinck is therefore justly entitled to the gratitude of the native community. With these observations, Mr. Chairman I beg to move that a suitable address be presented to Lord Bentinck expressive of the regret of the native community for the intended departure of his Lordship from India; and of their veneration, respect, and gratitude for his Lordship's person, character, and administration. The motion was seconded by Baboo Bissonoth Moteyloll and carried by acclamation. Baboo Russomoy Dutt, then obtaining per[mis]sion of the meeting to submit a draft of an ... which he held in his hand, read the follo[wing] ... English language:—

TO THE RIGHT HON'BLE LORD ... G. C. B. & G. C. H., Governor

My Lord,—In anticipation ... departure to Europe, we a[re] ... express our sorrow for ... your presence from amo[ng] ... state of health which r[e]quires our veneration for ... our gratitude for ... benevolence w[e] ... have been treat[ed] ... tration.

Situated as the nati[ve] ... Government under whi[ch] ... the person at its head i[s] ... mingled feeling of hope a[nd] ... the reins of power were entru[sted] ... hands, you did not leave us long ... we had found a ruler who would c[ome] ... of the subject, a friend, a prote[ctor] ... factor.

We now look back on the measu[res] ... rd-ship's administration immediat[ely] affecti[ng] ... sition and prospects of nati[ves], and w[hich] ... uniform, consistent and sus[tained] end[eavour] ... prove their condition and to elevate t[heir] ... r. These purposes have been wisely a[nd] ... tly sought by opening to na[tives], places of g[reat] trust and emolument, and thus setting before them new objects of ambition long before the late act nominally abolished disabilities by reason of religion, place of birth, descent, or colour; by introducing the trial of jury into the administration of justice by the Company's Courts, thus, both creating a duty and establishing a right which held to infuse a sense of public justice and a notion of public spirit into the mass of native society, by abolishing ignominous modes of punishment to which natives were subjected, and which both tended to perpetuate their degradation, and afforded occasion for new and enormous abuses; by establishing a regulated check throughout every branch of the public service to secure a subject and considerate treatment of natives from the officers of Government; by discouraging arbitrary and invidious usages, expressing and exciting mutual disrespect and distrust between Europeans and natives; by encouraging every effort which natives have made for their own amelioration, and for the extension of education among their countrymen; and finally by promoting free and friendly intercourse with natives.

We do not affirm that your Lordship has left nothing for your successor, with better health, with enlarged powers, with an explicit declaration of the Imperial Legislature in our favor, and with the cooperation of the authorities in England, to accomplish. But in the actual measures and in the spirit of your Lordship's Government, we see a sincere, benevolent and persevering regard for the advancement of our country and the happiness of our countrymen. Under your Lordship's paternal administration a new era has dawned upon us, tending to establish a community of feeling and identity of interests between races separated by almost every conceivable circumstance of alienation and united only under the same political Government and in allegiance to the same crown. Your Lordship has first taught us to forget the distinction between conquerors and conquered, and to become in heart and min[d], in hopes and asperations, one with Englishmen. We ardently desire to cherish these feelings. We trust they will descend to our children and to our children's children. And when the high destinies, which as a people we may be permitted to anticipate in union with a great and a wise nation, are in progress of accomplishment and actually fulfilled, the name of Lord William Bentinck will be fondly remembered as that of the friend of the ...es of India.

Baboo Ramcomul Sen moved, and Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore seconded, and carried nem. con.

That the address just submitted be approved of, and a Committee be appointed to have it engrossed, signed by the native community, and presented to Lord Bentinck, and the following gentlemen to form the committee with power to revise the address if they consider it necessary.

Baboo Radakant Deb thought that some expression of their sentiments towards Lady William Bentinck for her great politeness and atttention to the natives was due to her Ladyship, and moved that a subscription be set on foot to accomplish the object in view. The motion was seconded by Rajah Kaleekissen when Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore spoke as follows: —Gentlemen, there can be no doubt that as a more suitable testimony of our sense of Lord Bentinck's administration, we should vote a statue to his Lordship; but having been preceded in our intention by the ...unity, the only course which ... adopt is to hand over to them the ...ay be able to raise for this purpose. ... proper that some mark of our gra... ...ifested towards Lady Bentinck for her ... us, and I think a portrait would be a ...d suitable testimony of our grateful feelings ... her Ladyship. The mover and seconder of ...ove resolution, and a majority of the meeting having assented to the suggestion, a subscription ...er was circulated, and several gentlemen put their names down as subscribers. It was agreed that the amount of subscription be collected by the Union Bank.

Rajah Kaleekissen observed that he was very happy to find the absence of all party feelings in the meeting.

Baboo Gungachurn Sen stated, that he was at a loss to know what general benefit had been conferred by Lady Bentinck to entitle her Ladyship to any expression of their sentiments, and as he could get no information from the gentlemen present, he begged to decline subscribing, upon which Baboo Ramcomul Sen observed, that none but those who felt disposed to subscribe were desired to do so.

Baboo Ramlochun Ghose then spoke as follows:—

Mr. Chairman.—When a country is impoverished by the misrule or inattention of its ruler, it requires time to improve its condition. When Lord William Bentinck came here as the head of the Government, he must naturally have been in a great measure ignorant of the situation, customs and usages of the people he came to govern; but when in course of time he made himself acquainted with all these particulars and put his hand in the act of amelioration, he is compelled to leave the country by the ill state of health, which is to be ascribed to the misfortune of the people of this ill-fated land. You are aware of the measures which his Lordship pursued for raising the character and happiness of the people of India, by appointing them to places of trust and emolument. If it be said, that because the services of the natives in the functions of the government, being obtainable at cheaper terms than those of Europeans, he did so for the mere purpose of lessening the expenses of the state, yet that is sound policy and not less praiseworthy, for it is commendable in a ruler to be able to ameliorate the condition of the people and to keep the state treasury overflowing at the same time, which have been both accomplished by Lord Bentinck.

The usual thanks to the Chairman being then passed the meeting broke up.

The proceedings were carried on in the Bengallee language, and the above report is authenticated by the signature of the Chairman.—Bengal Hurkaru.

MEETING OF UNCOVENANTED SERVANTS OF GOVERNMENT.

A very large assembly of the uncovenanted servants of Government resident at the Presidency was held at the Town Hall on the 7th February, for the purpose of considering the measures that should be taken for the formation of a Retiring Fund, and of a fund for the provision of the widows and children of persons dying in the service. Mr. R. Leslie, of the Court of Requests, was called to the chair. He briefly stated the object with which the meeting had been convened, and touchingly appealed to the feelings of all those who were husbands or fathers of families to co-operate cordially in the measures they were assembled to discuss.

The first resolution, to the following effect, was then moved by Mr. W. Oxborough and seconded by Mr. Staunton:—

"That this meeting considers the Establishment of a Retiring Fund for the Uncovenanted Servants of Government in the Bengal Presidency and also of a separate Pension Fund for their widows and children, to be highly desirable and expedient."

Mr. Crow here rose, and having stated that some persons were unfavourable to the plan of a retiring fund though well affected towards a provision for the families of uncovenanted servants, moved an amendment to the effect that the two plans should form the subject of separate resolutions and be separately discussed. Some desultory conversation, and a little confusion ensued, which terminated by the question being pressed to a division when Mr. Crow's amendment fell to the ground.

Mr. G. Hill then presented himself to the meeting, and stated that Government had, he believed, in some measure, anticipated the wishes of the meeting by establishing a Life Insurance, which would make a pensionary provision for the widows and families of parties who subscribed or otherwise contributed. He added, that having heard much of Mr. Curnin's great talents and experience in matters connected with institutions similar in character to that which they were then assembled to discuss, and being likewise assured of the ready disposition of that gentleman to assist in the promotion of a sound and useful object, he had spoken to him on the subject, and solicited his advice and assistance, and had been favored with a reply, which he would read to the meeting. Mr. Hill then read the following:—

"67, Wellesley Street, Feb. 6, 1835.

"Sir,—In accordance with your wish and with every deference to the views and feelings of the valuable class of public servants of whom you form a part, I submit, that as the Right Honorable the Governor-General in Council is I believe about to establish a Life Assurance Office for the assurance of lives, and as in that institution it is most likely that all the charitable and retiring funds of the different communities in the state will be concentrated, it would be your better alternative merely to request that in any arrangements to be made relative to that institution, that your case should be taken into the favourable consideration of His Lordship: and that it would be pleasing to him to sanction your being permitted to pay monthly to that institution a certain per centage from your salary towards the purchase of a pension to commence after a defined period of time.

"As salary is or ought to be regulated by worth, it is clear that salary is the only available test whereby the value of the services of any public servant can be estimated; and therefore, in your memorial it seems to me to be but reasonable that you should pray that it may be pleasing to His Lordship to permit your being allowed to purchase such pension at so much less than the real value, as shall bring the claims upon the state to the precise amount now paid for superannuation.

"I have seen something in the papers relative to the 'Warden Fund' and that it had proved a failure. This must ever be the consequence where such institutions are not under the controul of persons perfectly competent to conduct them; and I may add, of persons, who can never have any claims of their own upon them. The failure of that institution has, as I conceive, been owing to two causes—to the limited number forming the society; and to their assigning pensions upon retirement without having any thing like an equivalent for the same. You will be protected from one of those evils by having your fund blended with the Government Assurance office; and you will avoid the other by assigning for the particular payments of each year their equivalent retiring pensions, to commence when a certain age shall have been attained.

"As it may be more than likely that the Government Assurance Office will be empowered, as soon as the proper data for that purpose can be obtained, to sell annuities and to convert a portion of the public debt, at the discretion of creditors, into life annuities; you must see that as the enlightened policy of the Governor-General induces him to do this, solely for the benefit of the public, that he will have no difficulty in extending the same previlege to you, and to permit you to purchase at a diminished rate annuities in like manner. The only difference between the two cases is this:—that the public would be more likely to purchase annuities to commence immediately, although, they could be assigned with equal propriety to commence after any given time; whereas you will want to purchase annuities or pensions to commence after a defined age shall have been attained.

"I trust I may be excused for drawing your attention to one circumstance which to me appears to be worthy of your consideration; and that is, that when the home authorities confer appointments in this country, they fix the salary, and the ultimate claims which they are willing to entertain for certain services to be performed: and, as you are about to ask that the state shall make certain remissions in your favor, you will, as I conceive, act with proper caution by not permitting any one holding an appointment directly from the Honorable the Court of Directors to join you—myself for example. If their right to a retiring pension is not recognized by the Court, by permitting them to join you, you will be asking for something which the Honorable Court did not previously choose to confer. If those persons should feel that this restriction presses heavily upon them, they have their remedy in an appeal; and to that alternative, I advise you, in the most respectful manner, to leave them.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN CURNIN.

"To MR. GEORGE HILL, Bengal Treasury Office.

"P. S. Those principles by which deferred annuities can be assigned for payments made by you and on your own behalf, can be rendered equally available for the determination of pensions to your widows, or for the endowment of your children."

At the conclusion of the letter some further conversation took place. Mr. W. G. Smith then proposed, and Mr. J. Blechynden seconded, the following resolution:—

"That the services of Mr. Curnin be solicited, to determine the principles upon which two such Funds may with safety be established; and to supply the necessary tables and rules for their guidance respectively."

The resolution being put in the usual way and carried unanimously, the following was then moved by Mr. George Hill and seconded by Mr. Charles Byrn:—

"That the following gentlemen be selected as a committee to whom it shall be confided to prepare a memorial for submission to Government, stating the objects of the memorialists, and generally to do such other reasonable and necessary acts thereto relating, as may be considered expedient, viz.

|---|---|
| Messrs. Cornelius Smith, | J. B. Plumb, |
| W. Oxborough, | Robt. Smith, |
| D. Ross, | R. Kerr, |
| Wale Byrn, | E. Wilkinson, |
| N. Campbell, | W. G. Smith, |
| C. Francis, | F. D. Kellner, |
| M. Johnstone, | H. Martindell. |
| A. Heberlete, | |

Mr. Kellner having intimated his wish not to be on the committee, his name was withdrawn. The names of the committee being put to the meeting for its sanction, Mr. Gardner objected that there were too many from one office, and thought a substitute might be found for Mr. J. B. Plumb. But this objection was overruled as the parties named were all peculiarly fitted for the duty required of them, and, in the case of Mr. Plumb the opposition was singularly unfortunate, as from that gentleman's having served in an Annuity Office in England it was justly held that he possessed considerable qualifications for the office of committee-man in the instance in question.

At the suggestion of Mr. G. Hill, Mr. David Clark was nominated secretary to the committee, and the committee very properly selected Mr. Cornelius Smith as their chairman.

The fourth resolution was then moved by Mr. Wale Byrn and seconded by Mr. Martindell in the following terms:—

"That as soon as the memorial has been prepared, and the requisite statements furnished, the committee do convene a General Meeting of the Uncovenanted Assistants on an early day, at the Town Hall, or other convenient place to receive its report, and to determine the farther steps that should be then taken."

Carried nem-dis.

About this stage of the meeting a gentleman proposed that it be an instruction to the committee to incorporate in the memorial to Government a solicitation that no head of an office be allowed to discharge an uncovenanted assistant, until the grounds of such dismissal have been fairly laid before the Government and investigated. Instances were mentioned of much injury having been experienced, without sufficient reason, by individuals who had been discharged through the arbitrary exercise of the powers vested in the Civil Servants. On the other hand it was argued that the introduction of matter foreign to the immediate purposes of the memorial might be detrimental to the course of the Funds and that, in all probability, Government would not feel disposed under any circumstances to alter the practice obtaining in respect to the power of heads of offices over the subordinates. The proposition was therefore withdrawn.

Mr. Crow then proposed the fifth resolution :—

"That to provide for incidental expenses attendant on carrying these plans into execution, a subscription be entered into for a period of 3 months, as follows :

|---|---|---|
| Assistants drawing a salary of 400 Rs. or upwards, to pay per mensen | 1 | Rupee. |
| 300 and under 400 | ¾ | " |
| 200 and under 300 | ½ | " |
| And under all | ¼ | " |

Subscription to be voluntary : receipt of Secretary to Committee to be sufficient voucher ; and surplus, if any, to be handed to the District Charitable Society."

This resolution being seconded by Mr. R. W. Smith, was put to the vote and carried unanimously.

Thanks were then voted to the chair and the meeting broke up.

A meeting of the Unconvenanted Servants of Government was held at the Town Hall on the 25th February, for the purpose of receiving the report of the Committee appointed by the Meeting held on the 7th February, and to sign the memorial prepared by that Committee for presentation to the Governor-General.

Mr. Leslie (who presided on the former occasion) was voted to the chair, and called on the Secretary to the Committee to read the report and memorial.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

"Your committee in coming before you, on this occasion, feel it to be their duty to submit a brief report of their proceedings since they had the honor of being appointed to their office, which, they trust, will meet with your approbation.

"Your committee held a meeting on the 10th February, and in conformity with your second resolution of the 7th, addressed Mr. Curnin, soliciting his co-operation in aiding your committee to frame tables and rules for the formation of the proposed funds. The following is a copy of the committee's letter to Mr. Curnin with his reply :

"J. CURNIN, ESQ.

"SIR,—I am requested to annex a copy of Resolutions 1 and 2, passed at the General Meeting of the Uncovenanted Servants of Government, held at the Town Hall on Saturday last, the 7th February, and, with reference to the assurance, conveyed by Mr. George Hill, of your ready disposition to assist in the promotion of the desirable object in view, the Committee congratulate themselves on so valuable an acquisition. Conceiving that some data will be required by you for the preparation of tables, &c. they have the pleasure to submit the following particulars indicative of their wishes on the subject ; viz. 22 years of actual service to entitle an incumbent to retire on an annuity of £300 or Sa. Rs. 3,000 —a gradnated scale being provided, descending to a minimum-annuity of £10 so as to suit the means of all ; and that widows and children have a reversionary interest therein. As it is possible, that circumstances may arise which would make it imperative on an assistant to leave his employ intermediately, it is desired, that a rateable annuity for a service of 11 years, be calculated to meet such a contingency. Perhaps, you would also be good enough to determine for the Committee, with advertance to the prospective saving that must be effected to the State by commutation of the present pension, what proportional donation may be reasonably asked for from Government in support of the contemplated Fund.

"The Committee conceiving, that the reversionary interest of widows and children alluded to above, will not afford a sufficient provision, consider it of importance to organize a distinct Widows' Fund, regulated according to the salaries of subscribers, in the following proportions :—The widow, ¼ of his salary during her widowhood, calculated on the average of the last 3 years of the deceased's income, and lawful children—boys 1-5th of the widow's allowance till they attain the age of 16 years, and girls the same until 21, or married. The children to have an enhanced allowance if left orphans.

"The Committee will be happy to supply you with any further information or data you may require.

"Committee will set again on the 13th February, and, with reference to the approaching departure of the present Governor-General, solicit the favor of an early reply.

"Yours, &c.

"10th February, 1835.

"GENTLEMEN,—I have duly received your letter in which you express your desire, that I should prepare tables for you to enable you to subscribe for retiring pensions after a given time, and such additional subscriptions as should entitle your widows and children to the reversion of the same.

"I can give you a table to regulate your subscriptions for your own pension and for the reversion of such pensions to your widows, if you should be allowed to extend this benefit to them ; but I cannot pretend to divine the number and the sex of your children ; and am, therefore, unable to fix any rules for your subscriptions in their behalf.

"I apprehend, upon the whole, that your application to me is premature : you should, as I conceive, first get the consent of government to be permitted to establish a Retiring Fund.

"Secondly,—You should solicit such pecuniary aid as it may be pleasing to the Government to allow you.

"Thirdly,—That your fund may be ingrafted on the Government Life Assurance Institution ; and that it may have the guarantee of Government extended to it.

"Fourthly,—That the management of your affairs may be confided to the officers of that institution.

"By these concessions in your favor, you will be protected from the consequences which have too frequently occurred,—of the regulations of an institution being warped to suit a particular class ; you will also have the maximum value for your contributions, and without the expenditure of that sum for management, perhaps mismanagement, which you must incur if the institution is confided to your own keeping.

"You call upon me to say what you should ask for as the equivalent of the present liabilities of the Government. To this I must decline to reply, as I conceive it to be the province and the prerogative of Government itself to do this. If you were to ask, that it might be pleasing to the Government to give you credit for the present superannuation fund, and for such increase to it as it may be pleasing to the Government to allow, and to debit your institution with the existing claims of annuitants, the question would, I think, be simplified between the government and you.

"As there is an order of government in force, that no more sicca rupees shall be coined, with the view of facilitating the introduction of a new rupee of 180 grains in weight, all over India perhaps, it would be as well if you framed your regulations with reference to that rupee.

"Before I undertake any further labour relative to the question, I will wait for the instructions of Government ; and I advise you, with the view of avoiding or giving offence, that you pray the Government to call upon me to form your tables, &c.

"I am, Gentlemen, your obedient and humble servant,

"JOHN CURNIN.

"67, Wellesly-street, Feb. 13, 1835.

"To the Committee of the Uncovenanted Servants, &c. &c. &c.

"Your committee conceive, that the object of endeavouring to procure Mr. Curnin's assistance originated in the impression, that he would have proved of service to your committee by his experience in the formation of such tables. Your committee being disappointed by the tenor of Mr. Curnin's letter, and aware of the anxious desire of their constituents to approach the Governor-General previous to his Lordship's departure, and finding it utterly impossible, in so short an interval of time, to obtain a mature data of so various and intricate a description, and altogether indispensable to the correct formation of rules and tables of the nature required, decided in the circumstances in which they found themselves placed, to proceed at once to the preparation of a memorial to the Governor-General, representing your desire that the principles of the Civil Service Annuity Fund, and the rules of the Military Fund, be adopted as the ground work, modified to suit the particular circumstances of our service, not omitting the provision for furloughs. A Sub-Committee was accordingly appointed with instructions to draw up a memorial, which as prepared by them, and approved by your committee, will now be submitted, and laid on the table for your signatures."

MEMORIAL OF THE UNCOVENANTED SERVANTS OF GOVERNMENT.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD WILLIAM CAVENDISH BENTINCK, G. C. B. AND G. C. H., Governor-General of India, &c. &c. &c.

The Humble Memorial of the undersigned uncovenanted servants of Government, including those who, though holding covenants for specific purposes, are not held to be entitled in any Department to the particular benefits prayed for in the present Memorial.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,—That your Memorialists relying on the known disposition of your Lordship to promote the welfare of the class to which they belong, and anxious to obtain from your Lordship a recognition of the justice and expediency of their being provided, like other branches of the East India Company's Service, with institutions for granting retirement and superannuation allowances to themselves, and pensions in reversion to their widows and children, beg to approach your Lordship with their humble solicitation that, previously to your Lordship's departure from this country, your Lordship will be graciously pleased, to cause such measures to be taken, as may lead to the early formation of a plan embracing the objects above-mentioned, which for several years past have engaged the anxious attention of the body at large, in proof of which fact, your Memorialists beg to observe, that petitions to the effect of the present Memorial were presented to Government in August, 1825 and in August, 1829; but to their deep regret, without any apparent success up to the present period.

Your Memorialists have found it impracticable, with reference to the announcement of your Lordship's intended early departure, to come before your Lordship prepared with the requisite tables and statements. Believing, however, that the details of institutions like those under contemplation, might be better left to others who are in no way interested in the benefits to be derived therefrom, and who would consequently exercise an unbiassed judgment in forming an opinion as to the precise amount of contribution or percentage which should be levied, your memorialists humbly solicit that the matter may be entrusted to such confident individuals, as your Lordship may deem proper to appoint; and as your memorialists are not desirous of shrinking from any labour which may be requisite on their part towards the accomplishment of the objects in view, they beg repectfully to tender the services of such a portion of their class, as your Lordship may see fit to require for such purposes.

Your memorialists further respectfully hope, that they may be considered deserving of occasional furloughs, after such specific periods of service as Government may be pleased to determine; and as there are certain branches of the Company's service in the enjoyment of pecuniary and other privileges from which the Uncovenanted Service is entirely excluded, it is hoped that furloughs when granted, will enable the absentees to enjoy, in the same manner as the military servants of Government, a portion of their monthly salaries, the remainder of such salaries being appropriated to the payment of the substitutes who may be appointed to officiate in the interim.

Your memorialists further pray that in the event of a plan to the effect proposed being established, your Lordship will be graciously pleased to sanction retirements, after a stated period of service, computed in every case at 22 years, exclusive of furloughs. Your memorialists adverting to the fact that in other branches of the public service retirements are so regulated, entertain the hope that a similar indulgence will be generously accorded to them. The grant of this boon, besides ameliorating the condition of your memorialists, would have the further effect of securing the efficiency of the public establishments by accelerating promotion and keeping in actual employment only those most able to yield the quantum of labor required by the state.

As your Lordship may be desirous of knowing the general principles upon which your memorialists conceive that the proposed Institutions in their favor may advantageously be established, they beg permission to state, that in their humble opinion the basis of the Civil Service Annuity Fund, with modifications adapted to the circumstances of the uncovenanted service, might be assumed as applicable to a Retiring and Superannuation Fund for themselves, and that the rules regulating the Military Fund, might in the same way serve as a guide in the formation of a fund for the benefit of the widows and children of your memorialists, both these funds being aided by such donations from government as the services of the uncovenanted assistants may, in your Lordship's judgment and liberality, appear to entitle them to.

In conclusion your memorialists beg to confide their interests as explained in this memorial, to the care of your Lordship, in the firm hope, founded on your Lordship's benevolence and philanthropy, that their solicitation will be favorably and graciously considered.

Your memorialists avail themselves of this opportunity to express their unfeigned regret at your Lordship's approaching departure from this country and their respectful and cordial wishes for your Lordship's health and happiness in that land, to which you are about to return, and to which many of your Lordship's memorialists are attached by birth, and all, without exception, by loyalty and allegiance.

R. LESLIE,

Chairman of the General Meeting.

Mr. Ryland, in proposing the first Resolution, took the opportunity of expressing his earnest hope, that that unanimity which ought to characterize a proceeding of so much importance to the Uncovenanted Service as the establishment of a Retiring and Widow's Fond, would not be wanting on the present occasion. Mr. R. further stated, that he was enabled from an experience of 29 years residence in India, to express his firm conviction, that no previous Governor-General ever entertained so kindly a feeling towards their body as Lord W. Bentinck. He made bold to say, that his feelings on this head were the pervading feeling of the meeting. Mr. R. further adverted to the fact, that although the members of his service readily contributed to the establishments of charitable funds, yet that an apathy much to be regretted, existed among his co-adjutors, in regard to making a provision against want for those who had the strongest claims upon their consideration, namely, their wives and children. He thought the memorial was one likely to further their views in this respect and, therefore, proposed

That the memorial drawn up by the committee be received.

Which was seconded by Mr. Rees, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Pote, in proposing the second Resolution said, that it would be consistent with the respect due to his Lordship were the memorial to be presented by deputation, and that, adverting to the likelihood of his Lordship's seeking for information at the hands of the deputation, he thought the members of the committee would be the most eligible to form the deputation. He, therefore, proposed

That the committee be appointed a deputation to wait on the Right Honorable the Governor-General of India, with the memorial of the Uncovenanted Service, and that on the receip of His Lordship's reply, such further measures be adopted as may be considered to be expedient.

Which being seconded by Mr. Meikie, was carried unanimously.

Moved by Mr. A. Heberlet, seconded by Mr. Stacy, and carried unanimously.

That Mr. Leslie be added to the Committee.

Proposed by Mr. Roxborough, and seconded by Mr. N. Campbell, and carried nem. con.

That the thanks of this meeting are due to the Chairman for his conduct in the chair.

There were about 200 present at the meeting, the most of whom signed the memorial.—Bengal Hurkaru.

MEETING OF SUBSCRIBERS TO THE NEW BENGAL STEAM FUND.

The following proceedings of a Public Meeting of the subscribers of the New Bengal Steam Fund, held at the Town Hall, on the 17th February, 1835, are published for general information.

Captain J. H. JOHNSTON in the chair.

The Secretary to the Committee having read the Report of the Committee as follows:—

"The Committee of the New Bengal Steam Fund regret that they have again to meet the subscribers under circumstances connected with the progress of the Forbes far from satisfactory.

"As stated in their Report at the last general meeting held on the 2d August last, they made every possible arrangement for the despatch of the Steamer on the 1st September, but circumstances, beyond their control, delayed her departure until the 5th of that month.

"They have the satisfaction of knowing that when she left Calcutta the whole of the machinery was in the best possible order, and that nothing requisite to ensure success, or that was suggested either by her Commander or the Engineer, was neglected. They therefore, although they were fully aware that in comparison with the first attempt the present was much more difficult of execution, were confident, from the manner in which she performed the voyage to Madras in April last, making 889 miles in six days and ½ an hour, averaging 6 k. 1 f. per hour, against a wind, at times, fresh, and swell, almost directly opposed to her the whole way, that she would, with care and attention, effect the object in view, not certainly in so short a space of time as that in which there was every reason to believe she would have done it on the first occasion, but for the accident to the boiler; but in such a manner as to establish the practicability of the voyage being made at an earlier period of the monsoon in a vessel properly adapted for the purpose. They regret they are obliged to admit that the progress as far as is known does not equal their expectations. It is true on the passage to Madras she unexpectedly, for the time of the year, encountered a rather severe gale of wind, which necessarily retarded her passage, yet at periods of similar states of wind and weather, as compared with the former voyage, she certainly did not proceed so rapidly on this last occasion.

It is, however, satisfactory to know, that from the experience of her qualities as a sea boat, during the gale, Captain Forth expresses himself thus. "I stop here to say that much as I lament the length of the passage, and the disappointment to the Committee it will occasion to be felt, I am happy at having an opportunity of trying her as a sea boat and knowing as we do now what we have to depend in a heavy breeze. She made as good weather as any ship I have ever sailed in—a fine sea boat, with the engines plying and reefed trysails;" and it is further satisfactory to know that on arrival at Madras the boilers exhibited no signs of injury; and subsequently when they were examined internally after 18 days steaming there was only a slight crust of salt equally disposed throughout the bottom, about ⅛ of an inch thick, or rather less, which was easily removed.

Of the passage from Madras to Galle no detail has been received. It occupied five days and one and a half hour, certainly a longer period than had been estimated. As no communication of the state of the winds or currents was made, it is entirely impossible to account for the slow progress; especially between Madras and the Basses, where she arrived in four days and five and a half hours, making 4 k. 2 f. per hour; from hence however to Galle the progress is more satisfactory; it is thus noticed by Captain Forth. "Passing the Basses inside at midnight on the 20th, we continued coasting it about (full power) against a strong breeze within a mile of the shore up to Galle and rounded Dondra Head in 15ms. ¼ mile off"—"Several places were passed within half a mile of the land, and it may be as well to observe that I could not discover the slightest danger likely to deter a commander of the steam vessel from persuing the same route at all times of the season if it be required. I regret that the darkness when passing the Basses precluded the possibility of taking bearings or making observations calculated to persuade others to follow a passage, I would now prefer to the outer, least water 5½fms." Here then the Forbes made 110 miles in 20 hours, or 5½ miles per hour against a strong breeze and in all probability a strong current, including of course all stoppages arising from blowing off, and for the purpose of sounding.

From Galle she took in tow the Regia, a brig with 80 tons of coal on board; this brig, the only vessel which the agent could procure, is described as bluff bowed, and consequently not so well adapted for being towed, although the Forbes's progress with this vessel in tow was not so rapid as might have been wished, it is impossible to consider it unsatisfactory,—opposed as the vessels were generally too strong adverse winds and currents. In a direct line from Galle they made 502 miles in seven days and six hours, or nearly 3 miles per hour, although at times the vessels are noted as proceeding at 5 miles per hour. Captain Forth says that they had "the whole time a fresh westerly to W. N. W. breeze with intervals of squalls from N. W. with rain." The superior qualities of the Forbes as a sea boat were again evinced. While towing this vessel against a heavy head sea, Captain Forth says, "though it affects us not, she (the Regia) is pitching bows in."

It was on the 2d of October that the Forbes cast off the Regia, having received the whole of the coal by mechanical arrangements suggested by Captain Ross, the late Marine Surveyor-General, which was found to answer admirably; causing no delay in the progress beyond that necessarily incurred by having the vessel in tow.

The Committee are unable to gather from the reports of Captain Forth what quantity of coal th

Forbes had on board when she left the Regia, but as she was then 1,070 miles W. N. W. from Socotra, and the wind had been for the last two or three days drawing round to the northward and was when the Regia left at N. N. W., they have every reason to expect that she reached Socotra by the 10th October at the very latest; and that she thence got into the Red Sea in due course. Beyond this every thing must be entirely conjectural; and the Committee can only suggest as the more probable event that, from some accident to the machinery she is detained in that Sea by the strong southerly winds which prevail in the southern part of the Sea, from October or November to May or June, or by the equally strong easterly winds and currents to the westward, which obtain in the Gulf outside the Sea during that period.

Foreseeing that she could not return so as to be fitted out for the proposed voyage in January, the Committee requested of the Right Honorable the Governor-General of India in Council that the Hugh Lindsay might be despatched about the 10th of that month, in order to prevent any disappointment which might have been experienced if packets for January should have been made up for Alexandria and Suez in expectation of the Forbes's arrival.

His Lordship in Council with his wonted readiness complied with the request, and the Hugh Lindsay accordingly left Bombay on the 20th ultimo.

In the mean time it appeared that the Government at home and the Honorable the Court of Directors have concurred in directing a simultaneous effort to be made on both sides the Isthmus; the former authority having given direction for a steamer to be employed in conveying packets, brought by the March Falmouth steamer to Malta, from that Island to Alexandria, and to carry from this latter place packets from India by the Hugh Lindsay, for which purpose the Honorable Court ordered that vessel to be despatched on the 10th February.

Notwithstanding the probable inconvenience which may arise from the departure of the Hugh Lindsay, one month prior to the time fixed by the Honorable Court, it is impossible to be otherwise than gratified at this indication of the authorities at home being at length alive to the value and importance of the communication by Steam by way of the Red Sea; and yielding to a conviction of its practicability, unattended with that enormous expense, the fear of which would appear hitherto to have interposed to prevent its adoption.

The Committee trust, moreover, that this is but the first step to the establishment of the communication on a firm and sure basis, the end and aim of all their endeavours; and they are borne out in this hope by the terms of the Resolutions of the House of Commons, which, after granting the sum of £20,000 for experiments by way of the Euphrates, provide for the immediate establishment of the communication by way of the Red Sea for at least eight months of the year, the expense to be equally borne by England and India; it being left to the determination of His Majesty's Government and the Honorable the Court of Directors whether the communication from Suez shall proceed to Bombay or to Calcutta; or whether the combined plan suggested by your Committee shall be at once adopted. Such is the gratifying state of this most important question. It would be idle to enter into any speculations as to the final result; but your Committee may be permitted to express their confidence that the important interests involved in the extension of the communication to Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta will not be overlooked, and that the public spirit evinced by the subscribers to the New Bengal Steam Fund, in devoting so large a subscription to an attempt to re-open the communication will be duly appreciated.

That that attempt has not succeeded is to be deplored; but it has at least shown the intense anxiety for the establishment of the communication. It has led to the purchase of the Island of Socotra,* and to the establishment of a depôt there; and it has practically shown that coal may be located in the Red Sea at the extreme station, Juddah, at a cost less by one half than that estimated by the Honorable the Court of Directors.

It has further induced an examination of the Maldives, with a view to determine on the practicability of establishing a depôt there—the result of which is understood to be on the whole satisfactory, as far as it has gone. It is said that the islands are found not to be continually linked by reefs; on the contrary that channels exist among them leading into the smooth water between them. One passage has been found leading into the Tilla Don Matis Atoll—the northernmost of the group, and the one best adapted from its locality for a depôt—within which is a good anchorage and fresh water.

The above mentioned passage is described to be so safe that in a moon light night a ship might pass into the Atool free of risk.

Such the Committee understand to be the result of the examination as far as it had gone, some delay having taken place consequent on the necessity for a reference to the Sultan, who resides at king's palace in the middle of the group.

The Committee having been in friendly communication with the Sultan, and received from him assurance of a disposition to meet their wishes if practicable, expressed to him their desire that he should give every assistance and countenance to the officers deputed to examine the islands, and they are not without hopes that their request may tend to insure a friendly disposition on his part towards the officer deputed from Bombay on the survey, and his assent to the establishment of a depôt in case any proper place shall be discovered.

However therefore the attempt of the Forbes may have failed,—in the first instance clearly from no unfitness of the vessel herself, and in the second from causes yet unknown—the attempt has not been without its advantages; and the Committee, depending still on the continued support and patronage of the Governor-General as well while his Lordship remains at the head of this Government, as on his return home, will not relax in their humble endeavours to obtain the ultimate wishes of the Indian community, viz. the establishment of a comprehensive scheme—and they cannot close this part of their report without the expression of their full conviction that the subscribers owe it entirely to the recommendation of the Governor-General that such a comprehensive scheme has been included among those to be considered for final adoption. Their grateful thanks therefore, and those of the subscribers, and indeed of all India, are most justly due to his Lordship; and the Committee will not fail prior to his departure to solicit a continuance on his Lordship's part of his powerful aid for the final establishment of that scheme.

The accounts are laid on the table for the inspection of the subscribers, and annexed is a summary statement showing the receipts and expenditure since the date of the last report. The remaining assets are Sa. Rs. 34,582—4—4, besides this, Captain Forth had advanced to him Sa. Rs. 4,170 to meet the expenses of the voyage, a portion of which will be recovered from Government on account of the establishment; and there is stock to the probable value of Sa. Rs. 1,500, independent of the value of the coals at the several depôts.

By order of the Committee,

C. B. GREENLAW, Secretary.

The Forbes has at length returned. Her arrival from Suez the 29th November was announced on Friday the 27th February. Our readers may remember that our last previous intelligence of her was the 2d October, when she cast of the Regia, to the westward of the Maldives Island. On the 11th having encountered light westerly winds and a strong current to the eastward, Captain Fourth put out the fires, the vessel being then about 500 miles from Socotra (in latitude 11 45 N. 62 32 East) and made sail, as they had only 10 tons of coal left which was reserved to bring them into the anchorage when he should make the land. The vessel reached Socotra on the 27th and left on the 29th—reached Madras on the 3d November—sailed on the 4th—arrived at Juddah on the 8th—sailed on the 10th and reached Suez on the 16th without any accident. From Suez Captain Forth went across to Cairo where he had several interviews with the Pasha. The Forbes left Suez on her return on the 29th November, reached Judda on the 6th December, and sailed again on the 10th—arrived at Mocha on the 16th and sailed the 20th, having taken in 85 tons of coals. They reached Socotra on the 5th January, having encountered strong easterly winds; and remained therein Tamaunda Bay till the morning of the 17th, having been detained by strong winds and the surf which prevented the speedy shipment of coal. From Socotra which they left on the 17th January, the passage to Galle was tedious as they did not arrive there until the 9th instant! They left Socotra however, with a north east gale, and as they had not coal enough, sailed part of the passage. They remained four days at Galle for necessary repairs to the engine; they left Galle on the 13th, and arrived at Madras on the 18th. They left that port on the 21st, a stay of four days, and got the pilot on the 26th, after being two days under sail with fine southerly winds.

Our information is not sufficient as yet to enable us to enter into any detail as to the extraordinary length of the voyage. The detention at each of the ports averaging from two days to ten, far exceeds all the calculations of the Committee. At Madras returning for the example the detention appears extraordinary. The vessel having left Galle on the 13th arrives at Madras on the 18th and sails on the 21st, that is, four days. Now after only four days steaming, that delay appears extraordinary. One thing is clear, that the vessel does not carry coal enough for such a voyage, and that it would therefore be insanity to send her again. As a sea boat, the Forbes has fully confirmed the character she had previously maintained. She has experienced very bad weather and weathered it beautifully. The sponsons, about which so much has been said, proved of infinite service to her in the gales she experienced. In weather she has been in every respect unfortunate.

We believe the following is an accurate account of the steaming of the Forbes:

MEETING OF PALMER AND CO.'S CREDITORS.

A Meeting of the Creditors of Palmer and Co. was held at the Exchange Rooms, pursuant to advertisement "for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of carrying on some of the Indigo Factories belonging to the Estate for the present season, unless they can be sold for adequate prices, and also of disposing of the Outstanding Debts due to the Estate by public sale." About thirty creditors attended, and the chair was filled by Mr. Robert Wilkinson, of the firm of Thomas Dent and Co. of Calcutta.

Mr. R. C. Jenkins, the Secretary to the Assignees, produced a statement which he read to the meeting, showing what factories remained undisposed of, and the out-turn of each by working them last year. They comprehend five indigo concerns, namely, Sarnath, in the districts of Benares and Juanpore—Shaw Gunge and Bobsha, in Juanpore—Bickrampore, in Behar and Shahabad—Manickgunge, in Dacca—yielding altogether 1621 maunds of indigo at an outlay of 1,60,000 rupees, on which a profit of about 60,000 rupees was expected to be realized, and not one of them showed any loss. In answer to a question what had been the out-turn of the preceding year, Mr. Jenkins said it had been a profit of about 6 per cent. on the outlay. Two other concerns, it appeared, had been sold within the last six weeks—the Coolbaria for 70,000 rupees, and Palmer and Co.'s share in the Sultanpore factories for 27,000 rupees. An effort had been made to dispose of the five now remaining by public auction, and they were put up on Thursday last, by Messrs. Tulloh and Co. but not a single bid had been offered for any one of them. And further, it appeared that there had been advanced about 45,000 Rupees for the cultivation of the ensuing season, which would be all lost if the Factories were not carried on until sold. Mr. Jenkins also read the following memorandum and estimate of the Book debts.

| Due 30th April last. | | Ultimately recoverable. | Of which collected to 31st January last. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Civil, ..... | 14,31,747 | 12,54,689 | 85,804. |
| Military,..... | 29,59,065 | 28,07,713 | 1,00,131. |
| Miscellaneous,. | 1,42,41,608 | 6,07,294 | 1,72,139. |

the collections averaging 39,819 per month.

Hence it appeared that the Estate might yet possibly produce 54 lakhs of rupees, if managed as hitherto, in the course of a long period of years. But Mr. Jenkins, on being questioned as to his own opinion on the subject, said that he did not expect to realize so much as this estimate, which had not been formed by estimating each debt individually, but upon a general view of past recoveries.

After some conversation, in which every body seemed to concur in the opinion that it would be folly to throw away the Factories by a forced sale, the following resolution was moved by Mr. J. W. Sutherland, seconded by Mr. Younghusband, and unanimously adopted:

"That it is expedient to carry on the Factories now working for the current year, or until the Assignees have suitable offers made for them."

A good deal of conversation ensued on the subject of the Book Debts, in which Mr. Dick and Colonel Galloway took a prominent part, and some difference of opinion appeared on the wording of a resolution proposed by the former; but the substance of it being unanimously approved, was divided into the two following Resolutions which were adopted:—

"That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the disposal of the Outstanding Debts by auction is neither advantageous, nor practicable without almost total sacrifice to the Estate."

"That the Assignees as soon as possible make out a printed list of all the Outstanding Debts that may be due to the Estate on 30th April next, exhibiting in such statement what was the balance due by every Debtor to the Estate on the date of failure, as well as what may be due by him on 30th April 1835, and that this printed list, when ready, be furnished to every Creditor or his Representative requiring the same."

Colonel Galloway remarked upon the hardship of enforcing the doctrine attempted to be laid down here, that the property of an Insolvent Estate must be sold off at once at any sacrifice. This Estate, he said, had not been worked for five years, yielding at the rate of more than 5 per cent. per annum, and for some years to come was likely to yield an annual dividend of 2½ per cent. or thereabouts; whereas he believed that, if the remaining assets were sold off at public auction in Calcutta, they would not find purchasers, who would give the value of one year's dividend for them. Besides, that mode of winding up an estate was a temptation to the Debtors who had means, to hold back and wait the opportunity of purchasing their own debts for a trifle. In England property of every kind had always a market price and could easily be disposed of; yet even there, observed Colonel Galloway, there is no rule restraining Assignees from carrying on concerns for the benefit of the Creditors. In proof of this, Colonel Galloway read an extract from the preface to one of the volumes of the Mechanics' Magazine, in which the Editor declared the work to be conducted by him on account of his Creditors and as Agent to the Assignees of his estate.

After these remarks, the Meeting broke up, having passed the usual vote of thanks to the Chairman.—Calcutta Courier.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF INDIA.

A special Meeting of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society was held on the 28th January, at the Town Hall, to consider the expediency of petitioning Parliament for the equalization of the duties on sugar, coffee, tobacco, and other East India produce, with those of the Mauritius and the West India colonies. On the motion of Dr. Marshman, Sir Robert Colquhoun was requested to take the chair.

Dr. Wallich read the minute of the meeting of the 14th instant, and it was intimated that a member of the Committee had prepared a draft of a petition on the subject.

After the draft had been read, it was proposed by Mr. Strong and seconded by Baboo Dwarkanath Tagore, "That the draft which has now been read, be referred to a Committee, for the purpose of drawing up a Petition to both Houses of Parliament. The following members to form the Committee, and that they meet on Saturday, at 10 A. M.":—

| Mr. Strong, | Baboo Cossynath Mullick, |
| Mr. Low, | Baboo Radhamadub Bonerjea, |
| Mr. Dobbs, | Dr. Wallich. |

Some discussion took place with reference to the Members of the House of Commons who were to be requested to present the Petition. The names of Mr. Ewart, Mr. Whitemore, and Mr. Crawford were mentioned. Mr. Low was of opinion that as Sir Robert Colquhoun was about to proceed to England, it would be advisable to entrust the Petition to his charge, and leave to his discretion the choice of the members who were to present it. Dr. Marshman, on the contrary, thought that selection ought to rest with the Committee.

The majority appeared to concur with Dr. Marshman, and the folloing resolution moved by Mr. Low and seconded by Dr. Wallich. "That Sir R. Colquhoun, now about to proceed to England, be requested to be the bearer of the Petitions, was carried unanimously."

The following resolution was also carried, proposed by Mr. Hare and seconded by Mr. Smith, "That the Petition to both Houses of Parliament be engrossed in duplicate."

After which Dr. Marshman seconded by Mr. Kyd, proposed, "That the thanks of the Meeting be given to Sir R. Colquhoun for his able conduct in the Chair."

The resolution was carried by acclamation, and the Meeting separated.

[PETITION.]

To the Honorable the Commons of Great Britian and Ireland in Parliament assembled.

HUMBLY SHEWETH,—That your Petitioners are Members of a Society, which has for some years past existed in Calcutta, under the name of "The Agricultural Society of India;" having for its object the promotion of Agriculture and Horticulture.

That the attention of your Petitioners has been directed greatly to improvements in the culture of sugar, cotton, silk, tobacco and other articles of raw produce, calculated for the home market; for which objects a series of experiments has been carried on by the Society, to which your Petitioner belong under the sanction and with the support of the Local Government, who have liberally encouraged the Society from its commencement in 1820.

That the result of such experiments has been to satisfy your Petitioners that if peculiar obstacles applying exclusively to the British possessions in India, were not opposed to the employment to British and native capital in the cultivation of such articles they might be produced in this country, of a superior quality and to a much greater extent than at present, and the home market might be supplied with them at a much cheaper rate. Your Petitioners, however, have found their efforts almost wholly paralyzed by the unequal duties to which several of these staple articles are liable in their importation into the United Kingdom, in comparison with the duties on the same productions from the West Indies and the Island of Mauritius.

The duties to which your Petitioners refer, and to which they respectfully but earnestly solicit the attention of your Honorable House, are the imposition of 8 shillings the cwt. on sugar—the growth, produce or manufacture of any British possession within the limits of the East India Company's Charter and imported from thence, beyond the amount of duty on the same article from the West Indies and the Mauritius, which is charged only at the rate of 24 shillings the cwt., whilst that from the East Indian possessions is charged at the rate of 32 shillings per cwt.

The additional duty of 6 shillings the gallon on British East India rum, that of the West Indies being subject to a duty of 9 shillings the gallon, whilst that of the East Indies is subject to a duty of 15 shillings the gallon, and the additional duty of three pence the pound on tobacco and, coffee from this country, beyond what is charged upon the same articles from the West Indies.

Your Petitioners cannot too strongly impress upon your Honorable House the importance, nay the justice, of removing the obstacles alluded to by your Petitioners. The manufactures of India which formerly enriched her, and afforded employment to unmbers of her population, have in some instances been utterly superseded (as in the case of her cotton manufactures) by the importation of the cheaper fabrics of Great Britian, or depressed by overwhelming duties as in the case of her manufactured silks, which are subjected to duties of 20 or 30 per cent. From hence, India is more essentially than ever an Agricultural country. Full three-fourths of her population are virtually interested in, indeed dependant upon, the prosperity of her agricultures. Her vast resources require only the removal of existing discouragements to be developed, and were the productions of her soil admitted into the United Kingdom upon the equality of duties sought for by your Petitioners, the interchange of commerce between the two countries would be greatly increased to the mutual advantage of both, whilst she would be better able to bear the depression on her own manufactures, and to purchase those of the mother country.

To India, this is the more essential, since she now possesses no other means of supply without exhausting her circulating medium, the annual drain upon her resources which is required under the provisions of the late act of Parliament relative to her Government.

Actuated by the desire to further the objects of their Society and to ameliorate the condition of the Agricultural classes of the community, (more especially the labouring classes) your Petitioners respectfully pray that your Honorable House will take into their earliest consideration the justice and expediency of equalizing the duties upon the articles which they have enumerated, and other products of the British possessions in the East Indies with those of the West Indies and the Mauritius.

And your Petitioners will ever pray, &c.

[CIRCULAR.]

I have been directed by the Members of the Agricultural Society of India to forward to you the accompanying copy of a Petition which has undertaken to present on their behalf to the House of Commons.

They feel assured that the prayer of it will receive your approval and support. The interests of India alone are not concerned in the question, but are identified with those of the agricultural and manufacturing population of Great Britain. To the former, the equalization of the duties mentioned in the Petition, will secure, at a cheaper rate, a supply of some of the necessary articles of life, and, while the same advantages will be afforded to the manufacturing population, an increased demand for their manufactures in return for the production of India, will be created.

The cheaper supply of articles of necessity or ordinary comfort to all classes is an object which they conceive the anxiety at present evinced for the abolition of the Corn Laws in Great Britain recognizes as sufficiently important to ensure to the Petition your support.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society, held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments, February 7, 1835.

Before the commencement of the regular business, one of the sets of Lithotrity instruments, lately sent out by the Honorable the Court of Directors, with the Lithotrity Bed, and percussion apparatus complete, was exhibited to the Meeting by permission of the Medical Board. John Allen, Esq., Surgeon, 10th Regiment N. I., was proposed as a Member of the Society, by Dr. Mercer and Mr. Hutchinson.

Letters were read from Assistant Surgeons A. Keir, M. D., D. McNab, M. D., and Simon E. G. Young, Esq., (the latter of the Madras service,) requesting that their names might be withdrawn from the list of Members of the Society; which was accordingly done.

A letter was read from Dr. Wallich, presenting some seeds sent round from Singapore by Mr. G. J. Gordon. The seeds are said to be in general repute at that place for expelling Lumbrici, or Ascarides.

The name of the plant, which is said to be a native of Java, is Sussung Aroos. Mr. Assistant Surgeon Oxley, who would appear to have brought the medicine to the notice of Mr. Gordon, speaks of it in the following terms.—" Numbers are bad, but those that have kernels, I pound, and give in a little jam or honey, the dose may be as large as you can get a child to take; but I believe four or five good nuts are sufficient. The natives sometimes eat it by handfuls, so it is perfectly harmless, I have known one dose, discharge without any other medicine given after it, 29 Lumbrici. It is worthy of being brought to the notice of the profession."

According to Dr. Wallich, the seeds are those of the Quisqualis Indica described by Rumphius in his Herbarium Amboinense, vol. 5, page 71. The plant is to be found at Penang, Singapore, and in the Burmese country. It is likewise cultivated with success in the Botanical Garden and Dr. Wallich offered to supply in their proper season, any quantity of the seeds, that might be required for medicinal purposes.

Mr. Twining was kind enough to take charge of the seeds sent round by Mr. Gordon, and to promise the Society a report on their medicinal qualities at a future opportunity.

Mr. Twining's and Dr. Stewart's reports, on Mr. Young's Aceto-spirituous Tincture of Cantharides, exhibited at last meeting, were then read.

Mr. Twining's account of this preparation is extremely favourable. He employed it in sixteen cases, a memorandum of which he annexes.—In his hands the medicine immediately produced the effects stated by Mr. Young, it acted as a rubefacient, if quickly brushed once over the skin, and when the skin was more freely wetted with it, and rubbed for the space of three minutes, vesication, more perfect than that produced by the common blistering ointment, followed in two or three hours.

Though the pain, which follows the application of the tincture is smart, it is transient, and is not felt at the moment of application. In only one instance did it affect the urinary organs, and in that case, in a trifling degree. Among many other advantages, which this preparation possesses, enumerated by Mr. Twining, the precision with which a particular spot can be blistered is not the least. Mr. Twining concludes his report in the following words. " The small space necessary for this remedy in military medicine chests, is of some importance. The blisters in the sixteen cases now alluded to, as well as the quantity required to be applied to the edges of two indolent ulcers, was less than one ounce. It appears to me, that the Aceto-spirituous Tincture of Cantharides is a most valuable preparation, in many cases, superior to the Emplast: Lyttæ, and in no respect inferior to that remedy, which it may entirely supercede."

Dr. Stewart's account is not quite so favourable. He employed it, in six cases of rheumatism, in native subjects. The liquid was applied by means of dossil of Lint or Tow dipped in it, and then rubbed backwards and forwards, for six or seven minutes, by which time, a pungent pain began to be felt. The parts were then left uncovered to dry. In six hours vesicles began to form, which in 8 or 10 hours were quite full of the usual fluid, having the enticle smoothly and uniformly distended.—In Dr. Stewart's opinion, the Liqr. Lyttæ is the most convenient, as well as effectual, and cleanly means, which we posses of producing a definite and certain vesication over joints, and other irregular surfaces, and preferable to any other, when from restlessness, or other cause a patient cannot be got to endure the continued application of blistering plaister.—The Secretary intimated to the meeting, that Dr. Young has been requested to communicate the Formula for the preparation of the medicine.

The following works were presented for the Library.

The 3d vol. of the Journal of the Asiatic Society, by the Asiatic Society.

Du cholera morbus, son seige, sanature, and son traitement, par L. Auzoux, D. M. by Dr. Tytler.

Memoire Sur le Cyanus Ceti, par M. Roussel de Vauzeme, D. M. by the author.

FOR THE MUSEUM.

An urinary Calculus extracted from a boy of 9 years of age by Mr. Egerton and presented by that gentleman.

The following communications were presented at the meeting.

1st. A fatal case of Dysentery, drawn up by James McRae, Assistant-Surgeon.

2d. Fatal case of Tetanus with dissection, drawn up by Mr. Roe, Surgeon H. M.'s 38th Regiment.

3d.—Five cases of blindness, one congenial, and four from early infancy successfully treated by operation by F. H. Brett, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

4th. Abstract of forty-nine cases, in which surgical operations were performed during the months of November and December last, by F. H. Brett, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

5th. Abstract of fifty two cases, forwarded at different times to the Society in which the operation of Lithotomy was performed by F. H. Brett, Esq.

The whole of the above were presented by the Medical Board.

6th. An account of three cases of disease of the Femoral Veins, by J. Monat, Esq., M. D., H. M.'s 13th Light Dragoons.

7th. Case of stone in the Bladder, successfully operated on by C. Griffith, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon.

The following papers were then read and discussed, viz.

1st. Additional observations on the cure of Hydrocele, by the Iodine injection, by J. R. Martin, Esq.

2d. Case of congenital cataract, successfully operated on by D. S. Young, Esq., Senior Staff-Surgeon, Nizam's Service.

3d. Case of Hydrophobia from the bite of a mountain Squirrel, by W. Dunbar Esq., M. D.

4th. Case of Hydrophobia in an European child, W. Twining, Esq.

Farther experience has given Mr. Martin no reason to think less favorably of the mode of operating in this disease, which he brought to the notice of the profession on a former occasion; on the contrary, in filtration, the great source of danger in the old operation, probably from the quantity of liquid used, in no case has as yet occurred. In twelve cases of double Hydrocele, Mr. Martin operated on both sides at once, with perfect success, and with no bad consequences. In one case treated by Dr. Graham two ounces of the solution were injected, and allowed to remain for three minutes; it was then withdrawn, with the exception of two drachms. The patient was able to resume his usual avocations in three days, and has continued well ever since. In a patient of Mr. Bramley's reduced to a deplorable degree of nervous debility (Mr. Martin is inclined to think from the use of tobacco) the injection produced a fainting fit; but not the slightest bad consequences followed the operation, and on the eighth day, he was permitted to walk about. In a third case, the Hydrocele extended too near the knees, and contained the enormous quantity of ninety-two ounces of greenish offensive liquid. It was injected with four drachms of the solution, and the patient was quite well in eight days. To Mr. Martin's paper is attached a list of seventy cases, treated principally by Mr. O'Brien, the Apothecary to the native Hospital, from the 9th May, 1834 to the 1st January, 1835.

Mr. Young's patient was a boy about 12 years of age, he knew the difference between day and night; but had no conception whatever of colors; surgically the case offered nothing very new or striking. The first cataract operated on was milky, when the fluid contents of the caupsule, by freely mixing with the aqueous humour became sufficiently diluted to admit the rays of light to the retina, the boy saw the objects around him, and his language and gestures were highly expressive of the delight he experienced from enjoying the first manifestations of a new sense. In seventy-two hours, the whole of the milky fluid had been absorded,—the pupil was clear and black, and contracted powerfully; but the light was so painful and embarassing to the poor boy, that he would not allow the bandage to be taken off for several days. On the tenth day, Dr. Young operated on the other eye, the cataract, which was soft, and cheesy, he cut up, and left to the obsorbing powers of the aqueous humour. In six days, the pupil was black and clear; Dr. Young's experience in this case induces him to concur with Berkely, that the senses of sight and touch, constitute two worlds, which though intimately connected, bear no sort of resemblance to one another; "the tangible world having three dimensions, viz. length, breadth and thickness, and the visible only two, viz. length and breadth. The objects of sight constitute a sort of language, which nature addresses to the eyes, and by which, she communicates information most important to our welfare. As in any language, the words or sounds bear no resemblance to the things they denote; so in this particular language, the visible objects bear no sort of resemblance to the tangible objects they represent." A month after the operation, the boy could tell any color, but if he wishes to be very exact, when asked the name of any object presented to him, he first looked at it, and if he had seen it before, and it had been explained to him, he at once said a book, a stick, or whatever the object might be; but if it were new to him, he would tell the color, and then feel it with his fingers, when should it prove to be any thing he had been accustomed to handle, before he got his sight; he would at once name it. At the date of the despatch of Dr. Young's letter, the boy's vision was continuing to improve.

Dr. Dunbar's case of Hydrophobia occurred in a native, and is chiefly remarkable from having followed the bite of a mountain squirrel, which was destroyed, shortly after inflicting the wound, in consequence of being supposed to be in a rabid state. The poor man was bitten on the right forearm, and the disease did not supervene for 3 or 4 months afterwards, at which time no trace of irritation around the wound could be observed. The first symptoms were restlessness to such an extent, that the patient could not remain in one place or posture, sleeplessness, loss of appetite, and a wish to shun society. This continued for a few days, till it was found, he could not swallow. In this state, Dr. Dunbar was requested to see him. And attempt to swallow any liquid, or the agitation of the air, by means of a punkah produced instant convulsions. The man was bled, and an attempt made to bring the system under the full influence of mercury, which Dr. Dunbar seems to think was accomplished; a temporary mitigation of the disease, which was probably the result of great weakness, or the approach of dissolution, took place. The patient ate some native sweetmeat, and even washed his own feet by dashing water on them from his lotah without much inconvenience; any attempt however to appease his thirst was immediately followed by convulsion. He died exhausted with the struggle, between two or three days after Dr. Dunbar first saw him.

Dr. Twining's case of the same disease occurred in a fine European child of 8 years of age. He had not spoken for 24 hours when brought to the hospital. The countenance was expressive of anxiety and terror, the pupils were dilated, pulse 98 soft—the belly compressible, and the skin cool and moist. The child seemed to be quite sensible, and did as desired; but could not speak. He moaned occasionally, and turned from side to side, as if in pain. The case at this time was considered to be one of intestinal irritation. At noon he shudered when raised, that he might take some castor oil, the whole of which he swallowed with eagerness, and considerable exertion. One of the servants was ordered to punkah him, and then he struggled so violently that Hydrophobia was suspected. At 3 o'clock his mother arrived, and said that the child had been bitten about 2 months before, by a mad dog, and that he had been taken to a Surgeon at the time, and the wound excised. On examination an oblong gray scab was found on the top of the right foot, with a lurid redness round it; there was scarcely any swelling or hardness, and no line of inflamed absorbents towards the groin. Some time before, when asked where he suffered pain, he had pointed to the thigh of that side. The child lay with his face to the pillow, moaned occasionally, and if taken hold of to be moved, or if the air of a punkah reached him, the body and upper extremities were convulsed: the lower, however, throughout remained unaffected. The liquor plumbi acetatis was twice exhibited, but the disease proceeded rapidly to a fatal termination, and at 5 o'cock P. M. the child expired.

SUPREME COURT.

JANUARY 9, 1835.

A Traversed Case of Joseph Dunnovan vs. Rev. Paul De Gradoly.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff for a breach of contract by the defendant.

Mr. Thackeray opened the case.

Mr. Turton addressed the Court to the following effect:—That this was an action brought to recover a certain sum of money due by the defendant to the plaintiff for the building of the Roman Catholic Church at Howrah, which had not been completed by the plaintiff owing to his being prevented by the defendant. That it would be proved to the Court how far the work had been done, what number of beams, quantity of chunam and other materials had been supplied; and that as to the defendant being within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court about the time the plaint was filed, it would be proved by witnesses that the defendant was seen on that day and several days after in Calcutta; that he had a room furnished in the Parsonage at Moorgheehutta, where he might have slept; and that the Roman Catholic Priests resort to their rooms at the Parsonage as persons in a College do whether they sleep there any night or not. Mr. Turton observed that he did not know if he could prove that the defendant slept in his room at the Moorgheehutta Parsonage, on the night the plaint was filed against him, but he (Mr. Turton) would be able to prove that the defendant was about that time an inhabitant of Calcutta, and if it be proved that he had a domicile, and was seen here about the time it was sufficient to prove the jurisdiction, and the cause might then be tried by his Lordship when it would be proved what was the quantity of chunam, &c. supplied by the plaintiff for the building in question.

Three native witnesses sworn, but from them nothing could be elicited to prove that the Reverend Paul DeGradolay was subjected to the jurisdiction, when the plaint was filed against him. The Reverend Antonia de Santa Maria being put into the witness box, deposed to Fre Paul DeGradolay's having removed finally on or about the 23d May last from his residence at the Parsonage of Moorgheehutta in Calcutta to the apartments intended for the Priest on the Howrah Church premises—to his (the witness's) having gone twice to the Howrah Church across the river, once on the laying of its foundation and once at the opening of it, and to the Church's having been consecrated one or two weeks before, Fre Paul de Gradolay had left him also to the rooms intended as the Parsonage on the Howrah Church premises, being in a fit state to be inhabited when the Reverend defendant is said to have occupied them. The jurisdiction not being proved, Mr. Turton would not proceed further, and the Court nonsuited the case.

Judgment was to be given to-day against Ramnarain Mitter and Sumboochunder Dutt, who had been found Guilty of conspiracy, but after a few motions the Advocate-General moved the Court on behalf of Ramnarain Mitter for a new trial, stating his grounds for so doing in a very lengthy address. Some of the principal grounds were, that there had not been sufficient nor even weighty evidence to convict the man of conspiracy; that he (Ramnarain Mitter) together with Sumboochunder Dutt had been found guilty merely on the evidence of Messrs. Auley and Hudson, and the son of Oodychund Dutt, the complainant, in the absence of opposite witnesses; and that if the evidence of the above mentioned had been struck out, the jury would have given a different verdict. The Advocate-General added that he was far from throwing any reflection upon the jury who found the men guilty of conspiracy, or upon their decision, but they ought not to have come and asked the Court what had been proved against the defendants in the absence of witnesses, which he, the Advocate-General, was not then able to call. The learned Judge reminded the Advocate-General that during the trial he did not say it was not in his power to call such witnesses.

Mr. Prinsep next moved the Court for a new trial on behalf of Sumboochunder Dutt, stating that if the Advocate-General had had cause to move for it on behalf of Ramnarain Mitter he, Mr. Prinsep, had more on that of Sumboochunder Dutt, against whom the only charge laid to show he was a conspirator, was his having filed an answer to the bill filed in equity against himself and others. Mr. Prinsep observed, that if ever there was a case of conviction without evidence, this is one. The 2 counts in the indictment being nearly the same, viz. that the defendants had conspired to extort money from the plaintiff by filing a false bill in equity, and this charge has not been sufficiently proved.

Mr. Prinsep then alluded to the evidence against Sumboochunder Dutt, which amounts only to his having filed an answer to the bill in equity and no further.

The Court observed, that the reason for granting a new trial were well known to the gentlemen of the bar—that as to the two grounds for a new trial being granted, as stated by the Advocate-General, viz. 1st, that the verdict given had been against evidence: and 2dly, that the evidence had not been weighty, the Court could not order a new trial: on the 2d ground, as it rested with the Jury to consider the weight of evidence; and as to the 1st ground, the defendants had in the case in question had good legal advice, and they had no doubt come prepared with witnesses for their defence; and that as to Mr. Prinsep's remarks, there were no ground; for such an order being granted. The Court however granted rule nisi to the Advocate-General and Mr. Prinsep, both being in the same cause. Mr. Turton, who was on the opposite side, moved that the defendants pay the costs as is the case when new trials are applied for. Mr. Clarke, on the same side, referred to certain rules, showing that parties moving for a new trial had paid the costs.

The learned Judge left this point to be governed by the practice of the Court.

Messrs. Turton and Grant appeared for Ramkissen Collear, who petitioned the Court to obtain letters of administration to the estate of his father Kissenchunder Collear, who died in the year 1818. The Advocate-General and Mr. Clark, were for the sister-in-law of Ramkissen Collear, who put in a caveat against such a petition.

Mr. Clarke opened the case by reading the petition of Ramkissen Collear against which the caveat had been put in. The petition in substance contained the following items:—That Ramkissen Collear is the only son, heir at law, and personal representative of Kissenchunder Collear, who died on the 23d November 1818, leaving Bunnoh Bebee the mother of the petitioner, the petitioner and another son (illegitimate), both of whom were very young, and large property. That the said property was made over by the deceased's elder brother Roopchund Collear to the Accountant-General of the Supreme Court, Mr. E. Macnaghten being the receiver. That Bunnoh Bebee, the mother, Roopchund Collear, the uncle, and Ramchund Collear, the brother of the petitioner are all dead, and that there is accumulated from the rents of the landed property of Kissenchunder Collear a sum of Sa. ~~Rs~~ 3,390-10-10. Under these circumstances the petitioner who by the Hindoo law is now the sole heir and representative of Kissenchunder his father, prays to be permitted by the Court to take out letters of administration to the estate of his father. Some affidavits were then read.

The Court observed that the prayer of the petition cannot be granted till the grounds upon which his prayer is made, be proved to be good and tenable.

The affidavit of the petitioner was then read.

Mr. Turton addressed the Court at some length in support of the petition.

The Advocate-General in support of the caveat objects to the application for obtaining letters of administration as it has been made 16 years after the death of Kissenchunder Collear, and states that sufficient grounds have not been shown for the long silence on the part of the applicant—the only grounds stated in the application being, that at the time of Kissenchunder Collear's deaths, both the petitioner and his illigitimate brother were very young, wherefore Roopchund Collear, uncle of the petitioner and brother of the deceased, became executor to his estate which he made over to E. Macnaghten Esq., and that this Roopchund Collear as well as Bunnoh Bebee and Ramchund Collear, the illegitimate brother of the petitioner, are dead and no executor to the estate has since been appointed. The Advocate-General touched upon some other points in support of the caveat.

Mr. Clarke addressed the Court on the above and observed that the caveatrix makes no claim herself, but she merely petitions the Court not to grant letters of administration to an illegal claimant. After some other observations Mr. Clarke read a passage out of a Hindu Law Book entitled the "Dy a bangha," to maintain the grounds of his client, the caveatrix, for opposing the petition.

Mr. Turton then re-adressed the Court at great length in support of the petition for obtaining letters of administration.

The Court observed that order for the petitioner's obtaining letters of administration cannot be granted till it be shown that he is next of kin of the deceased.

Mr. Turton urged the necessity of the caveatrix proving her own right in order to oppose that of the petitioner or prevent the Court's granting the prayer of his petition. Mr. Turton therefore prayed that the caveat be overruled.

Mr. Grant next addressed the Court on behalf of the petition in a neat speech. The Advocate-General re-addressed the Court at some length.

The learned Judge, after some remarks, ordered that citation to the next of kin be issued upon which if no one could prove the illegitimacy of the petitioner, or disprove his right to obtain letters of administration to the estate of his father, his petition would be considered, and as to the payment of costs it would then be decided.

JANUARY 27—28—29—30.

Gool Mahomed Khan v. Hadjee Ibrahim Jumaul.

Counsel for the plaintiff, Messrs. Turton and Clarke.

Counsel for the defendant, the Advocate-General and Mr. Leith.

This was an issue to try whether, according to the averment of the plaintiff, the defendant had been connected in the year 1824, in certain mercantile transactions at Bussorah, which the plaintiff had had with Abdoollah Jumaul, brother of the defendant.

From the examination of a horde of witnesses, most of whom were respectable Jew and Mogul merchants, viz. Aga Kurbullie Mahomed, Aga Mahomed Ibrahim, Hadjee Cassem, Aga Abdool Summud, Jasseem, Abdool Hummud, Aga Jaun, Shaik Ibrahim, and others, the Court was occupied three days in coming to a conclusion of the issue, and after the chain of evidence had been gone through, and the Counsel on both sides heard, the Court declared its opinion to-day, that Hadjee Ibrahim Jamaul's partnership as merchant with his brother Abdoola Jumaul in 1824 was not sufficiently established by proof.

FEBRUARY 2.

After some contested motions with which the Court was occupied till 2 o'clock, the following case came on to be heard.

Johannes Stephen versus Edward Kent Hume and James Taylor, Executors to the last Will and Testament of Mrs. Mariam Hume, deceased.

Counsel for the plaintiff Messrs. Prinsep, Cochrane, and Leith.

Counsel for Mr. Hume, Messrs. Turton and Clarke.

This was a demurer on the part of Mr. Hume one of the defendants to answer to the bill filed in equity by the plaintiff against himself and Mr. Taylor (Mr. T. having on his own part answered to the bill as a disclaimer) on certain grounds, one of which is, that he Mr. Hume as an inhabitant of Dacca, (the plaintiff also being an inhabitant of that place) is subject to the Mofussil Law, the prayer in the demurrer therefore is that the bill be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Turton in support of the demurrer addressed the Court at great length which, from the little that could be caught of what fell from his lips, was in substance as follows.—That the plaintiff who is brother of the late Mr Hume has not proved that among Armenians a brother has a right, or is heir at law to his sister's estate.—That the bill filed by the plaintiff, which was to recover possession of certain lands in the Mofussil belonging to the estate of Mrs. Hume, the plaintiff claiming his right to them, should not be held under the following circumstances. That Mr. Hume was not a debtor to the estate. That as the plaintiff and Mr. Hume were both inhabitants of Dacca, the action against the latter as executor to the estate of Mrs. Hume which is in the Mofussil, should have been brought in the Court of that place. Mr. Turton in the course of his address cited many passages from certain law works for maintaining the demurrer. Mr. Clarke, who was on the same side with Mr. Turton, next addressed the Court. Mr. Clarke maintained that as the Armenian Laws are recognised in the Mofussil Courts (in proof of which assertion a report of a certain case was quoted from the Sudder Dawanny Adawlut reports) and as both the plaintiff and Mr. Hume were inhabitants of Dacca they were beyond the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; and Mr. Clarke stated that he did not know of any case where the Court of Equity had extended its jurisdiction to foreign lands, and that the lands sought by the plaintiff to obtain possession of being in the Mofussil, the case was beyond the local jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. (Here Mr. Clarke quotes a case of certain natives to prove his statement.) Hence Mr. C. argued the Court of Equity does not entertain suits of this nature, and quoted certain reports from law works in support of his argument. After Mr. Clarke was heard, it being 5 o'clock, the further hearing was deferred by the Court, till another day.

FEBRUARY 4.

The King on the prosecution of Woodychund Dutt versus Ramnarain Mitter and Sumboochunder Dutt for Conspiracy.

The Defendants being tried at the last Sessions, were found guilty by the Jury of the charge laid against them and judgment being deferred, they were at large on bail till the 1st day of Term, when their Counsel applied to the Court for a new trial on the ground that there had not been sufficient evidence before the Jury against the defendants to warrant the verdict.

The Court having granted the Rule Nisi two of the Counsel for the defendants were heard to day.

Mr. Prinsep, who was with the Advocate-General and who appeared for both Ramnarain Mitter and Sumboochunder Dutt, addressed the Court for nearly three hours, and maintained that the evidence before the Jury was not sufficient to prove the conspiracy.

Mr. Osborne, who appeared for Sumboochunder Dutt alone, also dwelt upon there not having been sufficient proof to convict his client of conspiracy with which he had been charged, and having referred to a certain passage from a Law Work he took his seat.

The learned Judge observed that as there had been a good deal of documentary as well as vivâ você evidence which had come before the Jury, and which must be considered, his Lordship would refer to them for the purpose before granting any order. The defendants were therefore allowed to be still at large on bail.

Johannes Stephen versus E. K. Hume, or the Demurrer by the defendant—in continuation.

Mr. Prinsep, one of the Counsel for the plaintiff, Johannes Stephen, in addressing the Court to the end that the demurrer be overruled alluded first of all to the bill, which states that the plaintiff claims heirship at law to the estate which consists of a freehold of his deceased sister Mrs. Mariam Hume by the English law to which he acknowledges his subjection from being a British subject born in the British territory, though of the Armenian nation. Mr. Prinsep, after some remarks, went on to say, that Armenians never recognized their own law by the treaty entered into by their nation and the Honorable Company, and attested by Lord Bathurst, Sir Josiah Child and others; for by the conditions in the treaty the Armenians should have the same privileges as other British subjects of the Crown, viz they were to live, buy, sell, &c., to hold Civil offices, and to enjoy their religion undisturbed. By such a treaty Armenians came and established themselves here, and have since had the same rights as other Christians. Mr. Prinsep, then with reference to lands in the Mofussil, said that the Crown in assuming the territories in India, did not exempt the lands in the Mofussil, and that as regarded the laws there were only three—one which is the English law by which all were governed, and two which are the Gentoo and Mahomedan laws by which they alone were governed, and he admitted that there were regulations relating to the Mofussil. Mr. Prinsep next referred to a decision of the Court in the late General Martin's case regarding his landed property in Calcutta as well as in the Mofussil, and added that in this case, the Judges had given it as their opinion that the alien law affected the property both in Calcutta and the Mofussil. Mr. P. then commented on the case cited from the Sudder Dewanny reports on Monday last by his friend Mr. Clarke in support of the demurrer, by reading a note at the foot of the case by its Reporter, Mr. Macnaghten, which showed that it had not been decided according to the Armenian law, though the then Armenian Bishop had been referred to. A certain case of a Scotchman in regard to lands in the British territory was then mentioned wherein the decision had been according to the English law, and Mr. P. remarked that it would be dangerous if Christians should have different laws to be governed by—the case with Mahomedans and Gentoos being undoubtedly quite different —and that it was impossible to show such a thing as Armenian domicile. As to Armenian laws, they were out of the question, they (the Armenians) not having a kingdom. Going back to the decision in General Martin's case, Mr. P. observed that though the General had been a native of Lyons, but a resident at Oude, he had had an English domicile by reason of his having been a Major General in the King's service and paid by the Honorable Company, and after arguing that Armenians also ought to have no other law but the English to be governed by—mentioned that the plaintiff on the face of the bill declares himself to be a British subject, and his late sister to have been the same, which the demurrer does not deny, wherefore the plaintiff claims under the English law the same right as if he and his sister were born in England. Mr. Prinsep touching upon other points, remarked that the estate in question was that of the deceased's first husband, Arratoon Michael, which had still debts unpaid, the plaintiff's sister not having paid the debts though the estate was ample to allow of it. The estate now is in the hands of Mr. Hume. Mr. Prinsep's address lasted two hours.

The learned Judge observed to him that the plaintiff Johannes Stephen had not shown sufficiently that he was heir at law to his sister's estate.

Mr. Prinsep replied that the plaintiff had stated he was the sole brother of the deceased and was the heir at law to her estate, she having left no issue.

Mr. Cochrane, on the same side with Mr. Prinsep, next addressed the Court. He quoted a passage from Beame's Pleas in Equity in regard to Heirs at Law and observed that there was not even ground in the demurrer to show that the plaintiff was not the heir at law to his sister. Refering to page 230 of the 2 d volume of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut Reports, which contains the decision in the Armenian's case already commented upon by Mr. Prinsep, and argues that neither the laws of the Portuguese nor those of the Armenians were applicable to their descendants in the British territories. Mr. C. then quotes the case of Paisley vs. Freeman from 3d Admiralty Reports by Robison, page 29, to show that men are governed by the laws of the country where they may be—and cites another case wherein certain landed property at Garden Reach descended to some Portuguese by the British law which is applicable to all Christians. Mr. C. then adverted to the decree in the year 1822 in General Martin's case, which is unvaried and unaltered to this day, and to the opinions of Sir Charles Grey and the present Chief Justice as to the extent of English law to Christians.

Mr. C. touched upon other points before finishing his address.

Mr. Leith, addressed the Court last. He began with an apology owing to the lateness of the time at which he stood, he said he was induced notwithstanding to do so from the known disposition of his Lordship to hear patiently the Council on either side.

The learned Judge remarked that there were some important questions to be considered.

Mr. Leith adverted to the evidence of Sir Edward Hyde East one of the former Chief Justices, before a certain committee in England, in regard to the extent of the British law, Gentoos and Mahomedans alone being exempted from it.

The learned Judge observed that all the lands in India belonged to the Crown, but that they were held in trust by the Honorable Company.

Mr. Leith reading the 13th clause of the Charter, maintained that the Supreme Court had a right over the Mofussil lands if the party claiming them be within its jurisdiction, and then referred to his own report of a case decided in the year 1830 as regards the lands in the Mofussil, and the saying on that occasion of the present Chief Justice, that it is every day's practice for the Court to decree even for lands in the Mofussil. Mr. Leith referred to certain other reports, and his address not being over till nearly six o'clock, the further hearing in this case was postponed.

Shamlal Tagore and Hurrlla Tagore, executors of Ladlymohun Tagore, v. Collycomar Tagore, Hurrocomar Tagore, and Prosonocomar Tagore, who have survived Chundercomar Tagore and Nundocomar Tagore.

Mr. Leith opened the pleadings.

Mr. Advocate General stated the case for the plaintiffs. This was an action brought to recover the sum of ~~Rs~~ 32,000, and interest at eight per cent., under the following circumstances: On the 4th June, at which time the debt became due, Chundercomar Tagore, Nundercomar Tagore, Collycomar Tagore, Hurrocomar Tagore, and Prosonocomar Tagore, the sons of Gopeemohun Tagore, formed a joint and undivided Hindoo family, of which Chundercomar Tagore, being the eldest, was the manager. On that day Chundercomar received for the benefit of Ladlymohun Tagore, of whom the plaintiffs are the representatives, on account of Gorachund Mookerjee and Nimchuro Debee his wife, a sum of ~~Rs~~ 34,532, and of this sum Chundercomar retained ~~Rs~~ 32,000, of course, with the approbation of Ladlymohun, it being understood, that it was a loan to the joint family. The balance of the amount received, viz., ~~Rs~~ 2534, was sent to Ladlymohun, and on the occasion the following paper was addressed to him by Chundercomar:—

'Addressed to your auspicious feet with salutations.

'I send you a check for ~~Rs~~ 2,534, due to you according to our shares, on account of Gorachund Mookerjee, and Nimychurn Debee, and have placed the remaining ~~Rs~~ 32,000 to your credit, on account of which you will receive interest at eight per cent.'

'To the most worshipful Ladlymohun Tagore, my elder uncle's auspicious feet.'

In September 1832, Chundercomar died. Prior to his decease Nundercomar died, leaving one son, now of full age, his heir and representative. Collycomar, Hurrocomar, and Prusonocomar are still living. Ladlymohun is also dead; and the plaintiffs are the executors of his last will which they have proved in this Court. He (Mr. Advocate General) apprehended, all that he would have to prove in this case, was, that the money was not left in the hands of Chundercomar on his own separate, but on the joint account; and as this would be done both by oral testimony, and a reference to the books, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the Court's decision in favor of the plaintiffs.

The jurisdiction was admitted, and Mr. W. H. Smoult proved, that probate of Ladlymohun's will was obtained by Shamlal Tagore, and Hurrlal Tagore on the 8th April 1833.

Hurrochunder Tagore, examined by Mr. Leith. Soorjeecomar, Chundercomar, Nundercomar, Collycomar, Hurrocomar, and Prusonocomar Tagore are the sons of Gopeemohun Tagore. Soorjeecomar died in 1820, Chundercomar died in 1825, and Nundercomar died subsequently. They were a joint Hindoo family, and after the death of Soorjeecomar, Chundercomar was the manager. The witness proved the signature of Chundercomar to the document (A) read by Mr. Advocate General. (Cross examined by Mr. Turton.) Ladlymohun had joint property with Mohoneemohun Tagore; they were brothers by the same mother. They had also separate property. Nimychurn Debee was Ladlymohun's sister; her husband was Gorachurn Mookerjee; Ladlymohun had two other brothers, but not by the same mother. They were all sons of Dupnarain, and inherited his property. Ladlymohun and Mohoneemohun were subsequently joint between them, but they were not joint between the other two. The names of the four sons were Gopeemohun, Hurrymohun, Ladlymohun and Mohoneemohun. Chundercoomar was one of the sons of Gopeemohun. Mohoneemohun left two sons, Connylal and Gopaullal, who are now alive in Calcutta. After the death of Ladlymohun, I was manager jointly with Prosonocomar, and brought an action against Shamlal, on an account procured from the books of Prosonocomar. I do not know that Ladlymohun had a set of books for his joint and for his separate estate. (Re-examined by Mr. Leith.) Mohoneemohun had zemindaries of his own besides the joint property.

Dwarkanauth Tagore examined by Advocate-General. I am well acquainted with Ladlymohun's circumstances. It is twelve or fourteen years since Mohoneemohun died. Some time after the death of Dupnarain, the four brothers separated; Ladlymohun and Mohoneemohun remained joint; that is, they kept their shares of the joint ancestorial property joint, both money and lands, but besides this they had separate books and separate property. I think some money was decreed by this Court which was to have been paid to Gorachand Mookerjee and Nimychurn Debee. The amount was to be paid by Chundercomar. Gorachurn Mookerjee was indebted to Ladlymohun, and the amount decreed to Gorachurn was handed to Ladlymohun, that is to say Rs 2534, by a check on the Commercial Bank, and the sum of Rs 32,000, retained by Chundercomar for which, at my request, he gave Ladlymohun the security (A). The sum was a legacy from her father to Nimychurn Debee, with accumulations, all of which stood to her credit in the joint books of her brothers Gopeemohun, Hurrymohun, Mohoneemohun, and Ladlymohun. Nimychurn's account became indeed to Ladlymohun in consequence of money advanced by the latter to her husband Gorachurn Mokerjee, and it was directed by this Court, that the amount of the decree should be paid to Ladlymohun in satisfaction of what he had advanced. I cannot say whether the money advanced by Ladlymohun was from the joint or his separate account. Chundercomar begged of me to go to Ladlymohun, and asked him to let part of the sum remain with him. Ladlymohun consented, and a part only of the sum (Rs 2,531,) was paid by a check on the Commercial Bank. Chundercomar gave the security for the remainder. Prosonocomar accompanied me to Ladlymohun, and heard what passed. The circumstances were known to the other brothers. It was a mere transfer: no money passed; Gorachurn Mookerjee was credited, and, Chundercomar was debited with the amount in the books of Ladlymohun; but I cannot say whether it was in the joint or separate books. They gave credit to Ladlymohun in the joint books of Chundercomar, but I have never seen the entry. It was by desire of all the brothers that I made this arrangement. I had no conversation with Nimychurn Debee at that time. She and her husband claimed something from Mohoneemohun; but if the money advanced to Gorachurn was from the joint account of Ladlymohun and Mohoneemohun, then the latter would be a creditor. (Cross-examined by Mr. Clarke.) If the money was advanced to Gorachurn Mookerjee from the joint account of Ladlymohun and Mohoneemohun, the amount transferred by Chundercomar would be placed to the credit of Nimychurn Debee in the joint account also. My impression is, that it was a joint transaction, but it will appear from Ladlymohun's books which are in the possession of Shamalal. The money was Nimychurn Debee's. Her husband had a large salt speculation which turned out very bad. A woman cannot come out and deal in salt, but whatever her husband did she was consulted. I know that because I had conversed with her regarding his transactions. (Re-examined by Mr. Advocate-General.) I think this salt speculation was after the death of Mohoneemohun. A paper was found with the will of Mohoneemohun concerning it. This paper is either in the possession of Ladlymohun's or Mohoneemohun's representatives.

Notice to produce the books of Chundercomar was admitted.

Connylal Tagore examined by Mr. Leith. My father, Mohoneemohun, died 1st Bysack 1226 (April 1819.) I have only one brother; he is younger than I am; I am the manager of the family. I do not know any of the particulars of this transaction; I was very young at the time it occurred. (Cross-examined by Mr. Turton.) Ladlymohun was the executor of my father. The joint books are in the possession of Shamlal and Hurrlal; I have seen them, but I cannot say from recollection it the sums advanced to Gorachun Mookerjee are in the joint or separate books.

Dwarkanauth Tagore was recalled for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Advocate General inquired if he had had any conversation with defendants regarding this transaction. Mr. Turton objected to this question, the witness having been examined and cross-examined, and having been in conversation with plaintiff's council since he left the box. Mr. Justice Grant inquired if Mr. Advocate General had put any question to the witness regarding the trial; the latter replied that Dwarkanauth, in conversation, had merely asked if he might go away, to which he had answered that there was a question in his brief which he had forgot to put. The objection was overruled.

Dwarkanauth Tagore re-examined by the Advocate General. I have conversed with Prosoncomar regarding this action: agreed with me that money ought to be paid; but said that he could not get his brothers to consent. (Cross-examined by Mr. Turton.) I have heard since I came into Court that the entry was in the joint books.

Rajkissno Mookerjee examined by Mr. Leith. I am the son of Nimychurn Debee and Gorachurn Mookerjee; the latter is dead. I know something of the money transactions between my father and mother and Ladlymohun Tagore. The money was received both before and after the death of Mohoneemohun. When my father and mother wanted any money they obtained it from Ladlymohun,—on one occasion to speculate in salt. I am not aware how the accounts stand between the representatives of Ladlymohun and us, but I think if a balance were struck between the representatives of Mohoneemohun and us, the account will be in our favor.

Cross-examined by Mr. Clarke. I cannot say how much the balance would be in our favor. The legacy to my mother was received on the joint account of the four brothers. What my mother received was on account of that legacy, and she got it on the joint account. My mother has yet to receive an account of the legacy, and what she has to receive is not due from the joint account of Ladlymohun and Mohoneemohun. What she has to receive is from the descendants of the latter.

This was the case for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Turton submitted for a non-suit on the ground, that it did not appear on the evidence on what account the sum was due, and there was no proof whatever that the advances were made by Ladlymohun on his seperate account, whereas it was necessary to be shewn whether the amount was to be received on the joint or separate account.

Mr. Advocate General replied, and Mr. Justice Grant thought there was not sufficient to shew what that the advances were out of the joint fund to warrant a non-suit.

Mr. Turton then addressed the Court for the defendants, and strongly urged, that the evidence was in favor of the advances having been from the joint estate. The learned Counsel in support of his argument put in several extracts, from the books of Ladlymohun, and in proof that in 1821, Nimychurn Debee was treated as a debtor on the joint accounts.

Mr. Hedger, the plaintiffs' attorney, was examined at great length, but his evidence was chiefly as to the production of books and papers referred to by Mr. Turton.

Mr. Justice Grant in giving Judgment said, it did not appear what the accounts put in by the defendants were. There were no explanations offered in evidence, and they were kept differently from European accounts. If the items were followed up it would be found that Nimychurn, from being a debtor on the estate at last becomes a creditor of it, and this was contrary to the oral evidence. Besides the accounts were in the name of Nimychurn Debee alone, and the name of her husband Gorachurn no where appeared, so that it would seem a distinct and separate account with her and the joint estate. He thought defendants had failed to show, that the sum advanced was out of the joint funds; and that the evidence given is simply as to a sum of money advanced by Ladlymohun, and an admission in writing to that effect by defendant's brother Chundercomar. Verdict for the plaintiffs.—Englishman.

Mr. Clarke opened the pleadings.

Mr. Turton stated the case for the plaintiff. This is an action brought to recover damages for false imprisonment against the defendants who are both Magistrates of Calcutta. The cause arose out of a commitment under the apprentice laws, if it was under any laws at all, which he contended it was not, and the circumstances are as follow:—The plaintiff was an apprentice to Messrs. Jessop and Co., if an instrument which he held in his hand could make him so, but if that was termed an indenture, it was the most irregular one that he had ever seen in his life. But he would not go further into that subject, but proceed on the broad principle that the laws relating to apprentices do not apply to this country, and that the defendants had assumed a power of imprisonment in a case in which they had no jurisdiction. However he might say this much;—one of his objections to the deed of apprenticeship was, that it was not signed by the father of the boy, but by another person, who did not appear to have any authority. It was possible that person might have authority, but whether he had or had not, the deed was not a valid one. Some little time after the boy had been at Messrs. Jessop and Co.'s in consequence of some family disputes, he withdrew himself from the house of his father, and it was arranged that the latter should allow him something for maintenance, for the notable apprentice deed contained no provision whatever for that purpose. The father after continuing this allowance for sometime afterwards refused and abandoned the arrangement, but in consequence of Jessop and Co. threatening to cancel the boy's indentures unless some provision was made for him, it was agreed that the father should pay 50 Rs per month, and Rs 100 at the end of every year for clothing, and accordingly fifty rupees per month was paid regularly for about three months, but in January, 1834 the payments were stopped entirely. Some circumstances, however, which occurred shortly afterwards, induced the father of the boy to agree to a payment of thirty six rupees per month, and Mr. Jessop undertook to allow thirty-two rupees per month, making the whole sum sixty-eight rupees for the boy's maintenance, which was paid for some time to a friend of his mother with whom he was residing. This continued for four months, when the father again discontinued the payments, and intimated that the boy might live in the best way he could. The plaintiff wrote to Jessop and Co. in September last, informing them that four monthly bills against his father remained unpaid, and that if the arrears were not discharged he would not attend his employment after the end of that month, Jessop and Co. refused to pay the arrears, and on the 1st of October the plaintiff absented himself. He (Mr. Turton) understood it would be said that at this time some attempts were made by Captain Johnston to seduce the boy from the employ of Jessop and Co. but if anything were said on that subject, he was fully prepared to disprove it, and to show that there was no attempt on the part of the boy to leave his employment until they refused to continue the allowance. On the 2d of September the boy received a summons to attend the police office, whither he went and saw Mr. McFarlan, Mr. Hoseason, before whom he was to appear, having left the office. In consquence of Mr. Hoseason's absence nothing was done that day, on the following day Mr. Hoseason thought the presence of the father was necessary, and the latter being unable to attend, the proceedings were postponed to the 6th of that month. He would here observe that he wished to lay the case plainly and simply before the Court;—that he only asked for reasonable damages, and that he did not impute improper motives to the defendants, further than this, that it was a hasty proceeding and not much to their credit. On the 6th of October the plaintiff attended at the office of the Magistrates, and Mr. Thompson his solicitor, brought to the notice of the magistrates that the statute 5th Elizabeth did not, and could not, extend to this country, and that consequently the magistrates could not interfere and had no jurisdiction. Mr. McFarlan took some time to consider the objection, but Mr. Hoseason said he did not care a d——n for the law on the case, if his heart only told him he was acting rightly. Now this language might appear to greater advantage coming from a profession to which Mr. Hoseason formerly belonged; it might be good quarter-deck law, and that he might consider suitable for the occasion, but the mode in which the magistrates conducted their proceedings, made it appear that they wished to dispense with law altogether. Mr. Hoseason at the same time indulged in some other reflections, and after asking Mr. Thompson if he was a Reformer, said that the latter's objections as to the jurisdiction savoured of radicalism, and that it, and similar quibbles, originated in the passing of the Reform Bill. So that according to Mr. Hoseason, we must damn the law and praise the Apprentice Bills. This was followed by the plaintiff being sent to jail for thirty days. Mr. Thompson told the magistrates that it was the intention of the plaintiff to apply to a higher tribunal for his release, and at the same time begged them to consider that as the Doorgah Poojah holidays commenced on the next day it would be impossible for the plaintiff to take measures for procuring a writ of habeas corpus, and that, consequently, he would have to remain in jail eight or nine days without a possibility of obtaining any redress during that time. To this Mr. Hoseason replied, that the boy richly deserved to go to jail, and when Mr. Thompson inquired how Mr. Hoseason would like to experience similar treatment, the latter replied, "why, very well, if I had been guilty of similar conduct." Now he (the learned counsel) begged the Court to recollect that if this imprisonment was contrary to law, it was committed at a time when it was felt with tenfold severity.

Mr. Justice Grant said, that there was nothing to prevent the obtaining of a writ of habeas corpus on the next day, and he could not permit an assertion to the contrary to go forth uncontradicted.

Mr. Turton said, at all events the imprisonment was inflicted at a time when difficulties existed in the way of obtaining a writ of habeas corpus, which ought to have deterred the magistrates from exercising a doubtful jurisdiction. He admitted a writ might have been obtained, but the Sealer and the writer would both have had to have gone to the judge's residence, and then three days must expire before the return could be made. However this was a digression, and the fact whether the writ could or could not be obtained, at that time, was quite unnessary for the purposes of this action. The plaintiff was committed, and placed on the misdemeanour side, in a cell, having a small door through which access was had to it, and in this situation he was found by Mr. Thompson the next morning, when the jailor refused to remove him to the debtor side without an order from the sheriff. When this order was obtained he was removed, and through Mr. King the jailor had afforded him every indulgence, still it could not be supposed that the delicate health of the plaintiff was at all improved by a confinement in a dungeon, for one night, in the rainy month of October. He (Mr. Turton) did not think that Mr. Hoseason intended the plaintiff to be confined in a cell of this description, on the contrary he had no doubt the magistrate would have freely given him all the comforts (and those are not a few) which his own house afforded. The writ of habeas corpus was obtained on the 17th of October and the boy was discharged on the 22d of the same month. The warrant by which the prisoner was committed did not contain the conviction, and up to this date there had been no conviction drawn out, nor was the boy furnished with the grounds of the complaint against him, therefore it was quite impossible to rest the defence on the conviction of the party. After the boy was discharged he went to Mr. Webster, one of the partners in the firm of Jessop and Co who took him by the hand, and said that he had no fault to find with him, and afterwards he obtained employ from Captain Johnston, and has since received for his services at the rate of Rs. 125 per month. Was this acting wrong? With a full knowledge that his indentures were invalid he offered his services to his former employers at a salary less than he could obtain elsewhere. He did not ask for vindictive damages because he believed neither of the defendants had acted from hostile or improper motives, but he asked for some compensation for the seventeen days' imprisonment, and for the expense which his client had incurred in consequence of this illegal proceeding. The costs amounted to Rs. 494, and it did appear to him that the least they who had imprisoned the plaintiff illegally could have done, would have been to have tendered that amount, as some small amends for having done that which the law will not justify, however the magistrate's heart might.

Mr. John King, the keepr of the great jail, after proving the warrant, and Mr. McFarlan's and Mr. Hoseason's handwriting, deposed as follows:—The plaintiff was in my custody in October last. On the first night, he was lodged on the misdemeanour side, in a single room on the ground floor, well raised, but without glazed windows. His servant could not have access to him. Mr. Thompson applied to have him removed to the other side, but this I could not permit without an order from the sheriff. On the next day an order was obtained for that purpose and he was removed. I saw him the morning after he was brought to prison, he appeared much distressed, I thought his constitution was delicate. He remained in prison till the 22d of October, when he was liberated. (Cross-examined) I think the apartment he was first placed in is comfortable. It is perfectly dry, and I never heard that it was unhealthy.

Sir Edward Ryan said, that line of examination need not be adopted as counsel had laid no weight in his opening on the one night's imprisonment on the misdemeanour side of the jail.

Mr. William Thompson, plaintiff's solicitor, deposed as follows:—I attended with the plaintiff, at the police office, on the 2nd October last. Mr. Hoseason had left the office, and one of the sergeants refused to permit the plaintiff to depart. I saw Mr. McFarlan and undertook that the boy should appear on the next day, at the same time explaining that we had counsel's opinion that the magistrates could not exercise their jurisdiction in the case. I attended with the boy next day, and repeated the same to Mr. Hoseason, and after waiting about two hours for Mr. Webster, who it appeared had been there, the magistrate said he would require the attendance of Mr. Kenderdine senior. On the next day Mr. Hoseason said he had received a letter saying that Mr. Kenderdine would not be able to attend until the 6th. I advised the magistrate to consult counsel as to the jurisdiction and mentioned the name of Mr. Cochrane. As I knew that gentleman and the magistrate were related, I thought he might perhaps give his opinion gratuitously. Mr. Hoseason treated me very civilly but his opinion seemed to be against my client. On the following Monday I attended again, and directed the attention of the magistrate to the signature at the foot of the indenture, 'Joon Cearns, of the Marine, for D. Kenderdine.' One of my objections was founded on that signature. Mr. McFarlan was called in to assist in the investigation. Several questions were put to Mr. Webster, but they were not reduced to writing. Mr. Kenderdine's deposition was the only one taken in my presence. I stated to the magistrates, that the statute of Elizabeth did not extend to this country, and that Mr. Webster's remedy, if he was aggrieved, lay in civil process. Secondly, that the deed or article of apprenticeship was executed by a party who had no legal authority to execute such an instrument, and that consequently, the deed was invalid and inoperative against the present plaintiff. I had a further objection viz. that the plaintiff was described as William Kenderdine, whereas his name is William James Kenderdine,—but I did not rely much on that. Mr. Hoseason was decidedly of opinion that the articles were binding, and Mr. McFarlan coincided; the latter appeared to have some doubts as to the jurisdiction, but the former had none. Mr. McFarlan retired, and after consulting Burn's Justice returned, and said the boy must go to jail for thirty days. I said it was a very hard case; we had been advised that the indenture was invalid, and the boy would have to remain in jail eight or nine days in consequence of the holidays preventing an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Mr. Hoseason replied, it would serve the boy right.' I asked him if he did not consider it a hard case, and how he would like to be sent to jail under similar circumstances. He replied 'why, very well, if I had acted as he has done.' He added, laying his hand upon his heart, that he did not care a damn for the law, if his heart told him he was acting rightly; that the objection was a quibble originating out of the passing of the Reform Bill, and asked me if I was a reformer. The plaintiff was committed to jail at three o'clock; it was an inclement day and the night was the same. I saw the place where he was confined. I should not like to be placed there for comfort. I saw the boy next day, he appeared much distressed and his eyes were swollen. The expense of the whole proceedings is Rs 494 which includes the taxed bill of costs amounting to 388. (Cross-examined.) There was one regular hearing only at the Police Office. Mr. McFarlan retired for about half an hour to consider the question as to the jurisdiction. I believe there was no legal or regular conviction.

Mr. John Webster, of the firm of Jessop and Co., deposed that the plaintiff received thirty two rupees per month from the firm, and that his work was not worth more than sixteen rupees. Witness had been informed that the boy now received Rs. 150. (Cross-examined.) The boy knew nothing when he first came to us: whatever knowledge he has now he has acquired in our employ.

Mr. John Reedie proved that plaintiff is now in the employ of Government and receives Rs. 125 per month.

The warrant, writ of habeas corpus, and return, were then put in: this closed the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Advocate General for the defence, took the liberty of suggesting that if any doubts should arise as to legal points, the court would allow them to be argued at a future time. When he was cross-examining the first witness, one of their Lordships was of opinion that the case had been made out consistent with the opening, but it had appeared to him that the declamatory style of his learned friend,—used for what purpose he knew not,—certainly not with a view to influence the Court,—and yet his friend was not in the habit of throwing it away for nothing,—was not borne out by the evidence. His friend had spoken of 'the dungeons of a prison,' and when such words were used it did not appear to be improper to show that the apartment in which the boy was confined for a whole day was a lower room, raised two feet from the ground. The time the confinement lasted appeared to have been seventeen days, the two last of which, according to his friend's admission, were entirely in consequence of their not applying earlier for the writ of habeas corpus. He supposed his friend considered two day's imprisonment not of much importance; there was no difference; the two first were the same as the two last, and the boy might have been released on the second day, if they had applied to the judge for a writ of habeas corpus on the second day as they had done subsequently. Now as to the merits of the case: the boy, three or four years ago, entered the service of an iron founder, and an agreement was executed which it is said is not valid, from this it is inferred that the boy ought not to stay with Jessop and Co. but the moment he has acquired a knowledge of his profession at the expense and trouble of his master, he is to leave and obtain employ elsewhere. He had always understood that, in the first instance, as there was no benefit derived by the master when the apprentice was uninstructed, the latter part of the time was to remunerate him for the former. Such was the equity of the case, and it is quite clear, whatever is said, such the understanding on the part of the master, and of the boy also, until better informed on the law. It is quite clear the boy refused to work;—that he was brought before two magistrates, and the latter, according to the custom prevailing and established here, sent the boy to prison using the common form of warrant on the occasion.—That it was the common form of warrant he would show by a book of no common authority.—It had this difference only, that the boy might be set at liberty on finding security to return to his employment. He mentioned this merely to show there was nothing harsh or hostile in the proceeding of the magistrates. It was true the parties were attended at the police office by an attorney, who gave his opinion as to the validity of the agreement, but he did not know that the magistrates were bound to take his opinion of the law; he did not know because of the attendence of an attorney, they were not to use their own discretion; nor did he know if that was the most competent tribunal to consider the validity of the agreement. It was however before the Court in evidence that the magistrates had paid attention to the attorney's suggestions, and that one of them had retired and endeavoured to satisfy himself as to the extent of the jurisdiction. If they erred, if they founded their belief on that which is not founded on law, it was but an error in judgment, and an error in judgment in a magistrate or judge is not a ground for damages or for an action. As to the jurisdiction not extending to apprentices in this country he would endeavour to shew it did. What are apprentices in England? They are not made by Act of Parliament, but owe their existence to common law.

Mr. Justice Ryan.—But the question is here not as to the common law, but as to the power of the magistrates.

Mr. Advocate General cited Attorney General vs. ——2 Meridith, and argued that such English laws were imported into this country as were not unsuitable to the land. There was nothing in the customs of this country to prevent an Englishman taking an apprentice and giving him instruction in his trade; the custom had been recognized here a long time; it was not merely recognized by custom but established by a regulation of Government relating to the Orphan School, and which regulation has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court.

Mr. Justice Ryan—That relates to apprentices in the sea service.

Mr. Advocate-General—But it proves that apprenticeships are suitable to this country. As to the power of the magistrates: he need not tell the Court that magistrates were formerly in England the mere creatures of the common law, conservatores pacis, and that it was not until the reign of Edward III. they derived their power from acts of Parliament or the King's commission. In either case, where they were recognized as Justices of the Peace in England which do not militate against the habits and institutions of this country. Under the statute 5 Eliz. c. 4 s. 35, 37, justices may vacate indentures or punish the apprentice. Was this statute conferred on this country?—That might be for further argument.—He remembered he was at nisi prius. Now was Mr. McFarlan right? He said he was. But whether or not, was this question for damages? In this case the boy had received all his instruction from the master, and then, at the time he knows he can get more money from another person, finds a flaw in the agreement, and refuses to attend his employment. He would not enter into the question whether the indentures is regular or not. He saw it was signed for the father and how any one could say it was irregular he did not know. There was no evidence that Mr. Cearns had not proper authority, and at all events, the police office not being the fittest place for an inquiry as to its validity, the magistrates were not bound to take the signature into consideration. The witnesses had proved beyond all doubt no hardship had been inflicted. It was true, the plaintiff had been in prison eighteen days, sixteen days of which he remained there at his own choice, for, as the Court had observed, a writ of habeas corpus might have been obtained on the second day of his imprisonment. What has the boy to complain of? What have the magistrates done? It is shewn that the boy violated his agreement, and the magistrates acted as they would have done as Justices of the Peace in England. It was evident no harshness existed on their minds; on the contrary they altered the form of the commitment in order to give the boy liberty on finding bail. In order to entitle the plaintiff to damages, it must be shown that he has suffered some grievance, and that there was some improper motive existing on the minds of the magistrates, but that the latter should be liable for damages to one who has had no more than he deserves is a new doctrine altogether. By a Regulation of 1814 it was provided that if any person leaves his contract."——

Mr. Justice Ryan—That is for Journeymen workmen and labourers.

Mr. Advocate-General understood the term "journeymen," to mean a worker by day, and if the boy was not as it was argued, an apprentice, the magistrates were right in considering him a journeyman or labourer.

Mr. Justice Grant—But how is this infant to contract !

Mr. Advocate-General supposed the contract could be made under the Apprentice Laws, and urged the Court, if it considered the case to be one of doubtful jurisdictiction to afford an opportunity for having it further argued. As to the question of damages, the Court would recollect that no injury was inflicted on the boy, and that no improper motives, no personal feelings, were attributed to the magistrates.

The certiorari and the return of the writ of habeas corpus were put in for the defence.

Mr. Henry Holroyd, Clerk of the Crown, proved that no further steps had been taken on the writ of certiorari since it came into his office. (Cross-examised) No conviction was returned.

Mr. Turton said, his learned friend had, in his address to the Court, told them one thing which he was not exactly aware of, viz., that he had used a declamatory style in addressing the Court, but his friend had left the facts of the case just as he had found them. He had, however, done this much besides,—if the Act of the Parliament extended to this country, he had proved there was no conviction under it. No conviction had been put in, and on that ground his client was entitled to a verdict. Further, he would remind his friend that when a magistrate convicts under one Act of Parliament, he may not justify his conduct under another. His friend had said the plaintiff had "got nothing but what he deserved." Now Mr. Hoseason, who he had known for many years, and who was as straightforward a man as any he ever knew, would no doubt remember, the next time he acted from his heart and not from his head, that he had the authority of the Advocate-General of the East India Company for doing so. The magistrates intended to do their duty no doubt; but when they found they had acted illegally they ought to have made some small amends; for he thought neither of them would say, a man according to the laws of England ought to receive an injury without also receiving some amends for it. He was astonished to hear his learned friend say that the plaintiff had suffered two day's imprisonment which he had avoided, and that it was of no importance since the two first days were the same as the two last. They were not the same; the disgrace and annoyance belong to the early part of an imprisonment, for after a time, the mind becomes habituated to both; and as for the "lower apartment" in the great jail, he would venture to say if his friend were to exchange his own comfortable house for that lower apartment, he would be in a more fretful humour than he was at this moment, though, perhaps, his friend's philosophy might enable him to support himself better than the boy who was found by his solicitor with swollen cheeks the next morning.

Chief Justice.—This is an action of trespass and false imprisonment, to which the defendants have pleaded the general issue only. Under that plea they could have put in the conviction, and that alone while it stood would have been a sufficient defence and would have entitled them to a verdict. There is no question of hardship here, and we do not go either into the question whether the apprentice law extends to this country, or into that of the valid execution of these indentures. The real question before the magistrates was, whether the apprentice should receive any and what allowance from Messrs. Jessop and Co. Now it is quite clear they were not bound to allow any thing towards his maintenance, and his father appears to have taken it upon himself. But the magistrates have not put in any conviction, and indeed none was drawn up, for it is impossible to look upon Mr. McFarlan's loose memorandum on the back of an affidavit as such. There must therefore be a verdict for the plaintiff. As to damages, he has proved an expence incurred of between 4 and 500 Rs. That we must give him of course. But we think, we must give something beyond that, and on this ground we think it right to mark our sense of the neglect of the magistrates to draw up a conviction in due form. It is an erroneous practice, and must not be continued. The party has a right to have a formal conviction, which he may remove, and have revised and considered in a Superior Court. On this ground, and to mark our opinion upon the course adopted by the Magistrates, we think it right to give 500 Rs. more. The verdict must be for Sa. Rs. 1000.

Mr. Justice Grant.—Agreed in both counts as to the verdict.—Englishman.

February 16.

Henry McKellar v. Dwarkanauth Tagore and others.

Mr. Prinsep, on Saturday, moved for an injunction against Dwarkanauth Tagore to stay proceedings commenced against complainant in the Court of King's Bench at home. The learned counsel moved on the affidavits of Thomas McKellar, William Greenaway, John Vanthart, and Goberchurn Chuckerbutty, which were in substance as follows:—In September 1832, the complainant, in consequence of an application through Dwarkanauth Tagore, lent the firm of Mackintosh and Co. Rs. 50,000 on a promissory note, due in four months, and on an agreement made with Dwarkanauth, that if complainant required that amount before the expiration of four months, the firm would discount the bill. In December, 1832, complainant being about to return to England, indorsed the bill in blank and sent his sircar, Gobinchurn Chuckerbutty, to Mackintosh and Co.'s to get it discounted. The sircar took the bill to the office and gave it to Mr. Storm, whom he found at his desk in conversation with Dwarkanauth, and who gave the bill to the latter telling him to give the cash for it. Dwarkanauth Tagore retired into the cash department and gave the sircar the cash, and Mr. Kellar returned to England with an impression that the bill had been discounted by Mackintosh and Co. At the time this transaction occurred it is sworn that Dwarkanauth Tagore was the banian to Mackintosh and Co.;—that he was a partner with that firm in the Commercial Bank—that the business of the Commercial Bank was conducted on the premises of Mackintosh and Co. the firm having no other department for their cash transactions, and the whole of their money transactions being managed by the Commercial Bank. In January, 1833, the firm of Mackintosh and Co. stopped payment, at which time it is sworn by Mr. Vanthart there was a sum of Rs. 83,000 due by the Bank to the firm. They have since been adjudged insolvent, and Dwarkanauth Tagore, the solvent partner in the Commercial Bank, alleging that the Bill was discounted by the Bank and not by Mackintosh and Co. has handed the Bill to Baring, Brothers and Co., his agents in London, and has commenced an action in the Court of King's Bench for the amount.

The Court granted an order nisi about 12 o'clock on Saturday, although it was at the same time intimated that they thought the affidavits put in on behalf of complainant contained a good ground of defence at common law. On Saturday, after the Court had granted the order nisi, defendant filed a demurrer which stayed the officer from drawing the order up, and on Monday a notice was served by complainant's attorney on defendant's attorney that he had not had his order nisi drawn up.

Mr. Turton argued, as a demurrer had been filed, and as the order had not been obtained, he was entitled to have it put out of the way; and moved that the Register be ordered not to draw it out, and that complainant pay the costs.

Mr. Prinsep allowed that the order must be discharged, it being the established practice not to draw out the order after the demurrer is filed. But as to the question of costs this was an instance of sharp practice which the Court would not encourage, moreover defendant now came in on the original affidavits and not according to rule on the office copies of them; and that, if defendant was to be considered as coming in upon the application for the rule nisi to oppose it, that these affidavits could not have been then had and ought therefore to be put aside altogether. The learned counsel urged if defendant wanted strict practice he ought to follow strict practice also.

The Court decided that the question of costs should rest on the merits of the application, and that defendant should be put in the same position as if he had come in instanter to oppose the rule on Saturday.

Mr. Turton put in the affidavit of Mr. Storm, a partner in the insolvent firm of Mackintosh and Co. which set forth:—That Dwarkanauth Tagore never was the banian of the insolvent firm, but a partner in the Commercial Bank, in which various other persons at different times had been partners.—That the fund of the Commercial Bank were separate from those of Mackintosh and Co. and the business conducted in a separate apartment.—That to the best of deponent's belief the note in question was given, in renewal of a former note, in September 1832, at which time complainant was desirous to have it renewed for three months, but the firm objecting the note was ultimately given for four months. That when Chuckerbutty brought the note to Mackintosh and Co.'s in December, 1832, deponent, never having heard of an agreement to discount it, refused to do so, and did not direct Dwarkanauth Tagore to discount.—That the note could not have been discounted by the firm without deponent being aware of it, he having the management of the cash department.—That deponent as a partner in the Commercial Bank might have desired Dwarkanauth to discount the bill, but he had no recollection of such circumstance. The learned counsel urged that if the bill had been discounted by Mackintosh and Co. the initials of one of the firm would appear, whereas on the face of the bill it appeared a transaction of the Commercial Bank. Further, it appeared from an extract of a letter from complainant to Mr. Greenaway, and now put in with the affidavits on the part of complainant, that he was about to apply at home for a commission to examine witnesses in this country, and it did not appear that the deponents had any instructions to make this application. There was nothing before the Court to show that the case had not been already decided in England where Mr. McKellar resided, and where it was more convenient that it should be heard.

Mr. Prinsep argued that all the evidence, and all the accounts, being in this country, it was evident complainant could not obtain justice at home; and that the affidavit of Mr. Storm was not sufficient to stay the injunction, there being no affidavit from Dwarkanauth Tagore himself.

The Court were so far with Mr. Turton that they would not have granted an injunction, as complainant might have filed his Bill in England, and upon it might have applied for a commission to take the defendant's answer here, and also, if necessary to examine witnesses in this country; and the case would be more conveniently decided at home. The Court decided, however, that as Dwarkanauth Tagore might in this transaction have represented himself or acted in such a way as to make it appear that he was a partner in, or a Banian of, Mackintosh and Co. without Mr. Storm being aware of it, that Dwarkanauth ought to have made the affidavit himself;—and there being no affidavit from Dwarkanauth Tagore denying the agreement with Chuckerbutty, that each party should pay their own costs.—English-man.

INSOLVENT DEBTOR'S COURT.

JANUARY 17, 1835.

IN THE MATTER OF JUGGERMOHUN AND RAMMOHUN CHATTERJEE.

These insolvents were heard on their petition. They were opposed by Mr. Turton, and on examination they deposed that they had not been in business for the last seven or eight years. The petition on which the application was founded stated them to be merchants in 1833. Petition dismissed.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN PALMER AND CO.

Mr. Turton applied, on behalf of Colonel Galloway, for leave to resign the assigneeship, he being about to proceed to England.

Sir J. P. Grant doubted whether the resignation of one assignee would not put an end to the assigneeship altogether. After some discussion it was determined that the matter should stand over to the next court day, in the meantime public notice was ordered to be given of the application.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

This was an order nisi, obtained on the 20th of December last, on behalf of Mr. John William Sutherland, that Mr. John Storm, the only member of the insolvent firm now in Calcutta, together with the assignee, Mr. Robert Castle Jenkins, formerly assistant to the firm, and Mr. J. N. Vant Hart, formerly a clerk in their employ, do attend the next Insolvent Court for the purpose of being examined touching the claim of Mr. Brown Roberts as a creditor of the said insolvents. Also that Mr. Storm may be then examined touching his and the other insolvent's conduct in respect to remitting certain trust funds appertaining to the marriage settlement of Lieut. Col. J. Geddes and Magdalena his wife, and of which settlement Mr. John William Sutherland is a trustee.

Mr. Robert Castle Jenkins, examined by Mr. Cochrane.—I was formerly a salaried clerk in the house of Mackintosh and Co. I received a larger salary than any other assistant. I commenced being an assistant in February, 1831, and continued until the date of the failure of the firm in January, 1833. When I first joined the concern I had the offer of becoming a partner; it was understood that I was to be a partner if I wished it.

I have examined the books of the late firm of Mackintosh and Co.; the first time I did so was in February or March 1831. I examined them individually, that is to say, when I examined them I looked at some of the largest accounts, at the balance sheet, and at the accounts generally. I never went regularly through the books. There was three or four accounts I pointed out to Mr. Gordon which I thought unsatisfactory; these were the balances due to the firm by Mendieta, Uriarte and Co., Râmratan Mallik, and Mercer and Co. I forget the amount exactly: the agregate amount was between twenty and thirty lakhs of rupees. These were debts due to the house. My own objection to join the partnership would have been the state of these accounts, but there were other reasons, one of which was the panic which prevailed against the large houses. My own objection would have been the state of those accounts had it been made a point that I should join the firm. At the time I investigated the accounts I confined myself to the existing year: I did not investigate them retrospectively; I went no further back then. I satisfied myself with the existing state of the accounts. I recollect looking at the accounts as far back as 1822.

The witness was here questioned as to his opinion of the solvency of the firm at the time last mentioned. Mr. Turton objected to the quetion, and urged that the books ought to be produced. The examination of the witness was not proceeded with.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. I recollect it was stated, that Rámratan Mallik's account was secured by landed property, but I considered that the security was insufficient with reference to the amount of the debt. That debt was increased some years back, prior to 1831. I have heard that landed property was of greater value in 1824 than in 1828; it did depreciate very rapidly from 1828 to 1832.

The house held an assignment of a claim due by the Philipine Company to Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. as a collateral security for their claim. If that claim on the Phillipine Company had been paid in full, it would more than have covered the claim on Mendieta and Co.

For the debt of Mercer and Co. the house held an assignment or a mortgage of Indigo factories, and houses up-country, which were the property of Mercer and Co. I believe they also held considerable quantities of cotton and up-country indigo which had been consigned to Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. for sale. I know there was considerable loss sustained by Mackintosh and Co. by the shipping of that indigo, the produce of Mercer and Co.; I believe the amount was £80,000. I speak from the books.

If the balance of Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. Ramratan Mallick, and Mercer and Co. had been good, and there had been no panic existing, I believe I should have joined the house.

I think the personal habits of the partners in the house were particularly economical.

My opinion was, that the house might go on. In October, 1832, I was not sanguine that they would become solvent, I thought the evil day might have been put off for many years provided confidence could have been restored. A lucky hit or two might have recovered the house in regard to its condition. I could only take my impression regarding it from the probable calls on the house. I was not a partner. I derived my impression from the partners. It did appear to be the feeling that the house would be able to go on.

John Nicholas Vant Hart, examined by Mr. Cochrane. I was employed by the late firm of Mackintosh and Co. as book-keeper. I have been in the house since March 1812.

I know Mr. Brown Roberts; he had an interest in the firm of Mackintosh and Co. from the 1st of May, 1820. He was a partner then and so continued till the 1st of May, 1828. I may say he was in the finance department of the house. I should suppose he was well acquainted with the accounts of the house.

There was a balance sheet made out yearly; it was merely for the information of the partners of the firm. I made it out. I used to hand it to one of the partners, generally Mr. Gordon, at the close of the commercial year. (exhibit A.) This is the baiance book.

I turn to the balance 1826 7. The balance is against the house; the amount is 16 lakhs, on the 30th of April 1827. This account only includes those debts which were considered irrecoverable. The 'Stock' is creditor ~~Rs~~ 16,85,714. When Mr. Fulton left the house he created a 'stock' of ~~Rs~~ 10,00,000 to meet the bad debts, which stock has increased by interest and one fifth annual profits to ~~Rs~~ 16,85,714. Opposite to this item is the debit side. Item 'old debts' considered wholly irrecoverable ~~Rs~~ 32,87,261. On the other side 'Balance per general abstract ~~Rs~~ 14,07,245;' this is to close the account and other books. This sum the deficit, or estimated deficit of the firm, arising from the accounts which have been written off, and were considered bad. If all the debts due to the house were considered good still there would be a deficit of this sum of 14 laks odd. This account does not include the debts of Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. nor of Rámratan Mallick. The debt of Mercer and Co. was about 20 lakhs at this time; the debt of Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. 12 lakhs. I suppose; and that of Rámratan Mallick about 8 lakhs. There was noot her 'stock' belonging to the house beside the ~~Rs~~ 16,85,714. There were other large sums due to the house. No part of Mendieta, Uriarte and Co.'s debt has been recovered. There has been a great deal recovered and a great deal laid out as to the account of Mercer and Co: the present debt is about 20 lakhs. Ramratan Mallick still owes upward of 8 lakhs; I considered it a total loss. There will be very little, recovered, I should suppose, of Mercer and Co.'s.

The firm of Mackintosh and Co. was insolvent in 1826-7. I can trace the insolvency through preceding years.

I now turn to the Balance Book of 1825-26. This shows the same result. The account was made up by me, on the same principle as that before mentioned, and shown to the partners. I now turn to 1824-5; it shows a deficit of ~~Rs~~ 5,50,000. I suppose the heavy losses accrued from the commercial year ending 1825-6.

Mr. John Williamson Fulton was a partner in the house long before I entered it. I believe he left the house in 1819. From my knowledge now I should say the house was insolvent at that time.

I should think that in March, 1828, when Mr. Brown Roberts quitted India, that he could not have been ignorant of the state of the accounts of the house. I am acquainted with the hand writing of Mr. B. Roberts; (exhibit B.) this letter is in his hand writing. I cannot explain the hieroglyphics. (By the Court.) Those things which have been called hieroglyphics are in Mr. Brown Robert's hand writing too. (Mr. Cochrane continued.) This (exhibit C.) and this (exhibit D.) are in the same hand writting.

At the time of the failure, Mr. Calder was indebted to the concern ~~Rs~~ 4,00,000; Mr. Gordon, ~~Rs~~ 2,70,00; Mr. J. C. Stewart ~~Rs~~ 70,000, and Mr. Storm ~~Rs~~ 8,000. I do not know if any part of this sum due from Mr. Sorm has since been paid; the assignees can tell.

In 1826-7 there was at credit of Mr. Calder ~~Rs~~ 1,73,169; at credit of Mr. Roberts ~~Rs~~ 25,944. Mr. Calder had a separate account which is not in this book (exhibit A.) The separate account I allude to is a debit account, and I suppose one would balance the other, that is, if opposed to this credit account there would be little difference. The balance now due by Mr. Calder is about four lakhs, on both accounts I should suppose.

I look at Balance Account in 1827-8. The general balance in ~~Rs~~ 21,50,000 deficit.

Mr. Brown Roberts's interest ceased in the house on the 1st May, 1828. There was a debit balance standing against him at that time. I believe he was advertised out of the house three years afterwards. It was not in 1828. Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. were the London correspondents of Mackintosh and Co. here. I do not know when Mr. B. Roberts joined the London house, but I know he was a partner in it. His present claim against the estate of Mackintosh and Co. arise from a credit, at the rate of ~~Rs~~ 40,000 per share for his three shares in the firm of Mackintosh and Co. I mean his three-sixteenths, or three anna share of the whole concern. It was a credit passed in account only.

There were large debts due to, and by the house on 1st May, 1828. The total deficit written off was as I have stated ~~Rs~~ 21,50,000. I mean that sum must have been made up before the house could be made solvent.

Nobody but the partners and myself had access to this book. (exhibit A.) I am not aware that it is usual to keep such a book in mercantile establishments. I am still book-keeper with the assignees.

At the time of the failure of Mackintosh and Co. I estimated their debt due to the London House at ~~Rs~~ 50,00,000; but it is now, in consequence of returned bills, about ~~Rs~~ 35,00,000.

I think the probable out-turn of the estate will yield about three annas in the rupee. It will be I suppose, about three or four years before a final dividend is paid.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton.—I never was in the employ of any house but that of Mackintosh and Co., therefore I do not know if such books (exhibit A.) are usual, only from heresay. It is not usual for book-keepers to talk of the modes in which business is conducted in the different houses.

Mr. Calder's balance did not consist chiefly of speculations entered into by him which the house did not approve of, and threw upon him. The balance 'per loss in Saugor Island' is not included in this balance; it is in a separate account. The balance of four lakhs against Mr. Calder includes two lakhs lent to his personal friends.

I cannot speak as to Mr. Calder's personal expenses; I am not aware of them. I cannot say if he lived extremely moderate. I do not consider the balances against any of the partners as heavy considering that they divided no profits for the last six or seven years. One-fifth of the profits was carried to 'Stock Account.' By 'Stock Account' I mean a fund formed to meet bad debts. There were no profits for the last six or seven years, and the loss was carried to Stock Account.

I have said the claim of Mr. Brown Roberts arises from his three-sixteenths share in the house. There was a sum of money recovered on a life insurance of Captain Roberts, the brother of Mr. B. Roberts. This sum was about Rs. 20,000. It was recovered by Mr. B. Roberts, and forms a part of the balance of Rs. 70,000. I believe a further part of this balance is a sum of Rs. 15,000, Sheriff's fees, recovered for 1828-9. There were a great many other items, both payments and receipts, which I cannot recollect. Rs. 70,000 is the balance.

I have spoken of Rs. 32,67,000 as bad debts in 1826-7 not one of them has been realized. Dr. Loxmore's was not one of them; his balance was transferred to bad debts after final recoveries, that is, after the life insurances were recovered. The house recovered what they could and transfered the balance to 'Bad Debts.' I should suppose that at the time of failure 10 lakhs of these 32 lakhs and odd were covered by insurances. The premiums are carried to a separate head, 'Insurances on Lives of several persons.' It formed one of the items in the charges of the house. In 1826-7, the amount recovered by insurances was about the same.

Mr. Brown Roberts, at the time of joining the house was a Captain in the Army, of some standing, and I believe Assistant Commissary General.

The 'Stock' was formed by Mr. Fulton, in 1819; it was then 10 lakhs and has increased to 16 lakhs and odd. It was a mere sinking fund. There were many of those 'bad debts' I have said to be irrecoverable, might be recovered if the parties succeeded to property. All debts were carried to account of 'Bad Debts' on which the house ceased to receive interest, that is to say, when they ceased to receive interest and there were no hopes of further recoveries. At the time this account was made up, the house had a mortgage over Ramrattan Mallik's property. I do not know the value of that mortgage; the debt cannot be recovered now. Ramrattan Mallik was one of the eight sons of Mincharn Mallik. I do not know that there are 14 lakhs to be divided amongst these eight sons. I do not know that he claims upward of two lakhs from Sarupchundar Sircar Chaodri, I have heard that he has a claim to a large amount against the East India Company. I am not aware that Mr. Roberts went home to prosecute the claim of the Phillipine Company; that claim is now more than sufficient to cover the debt of Mendieta, Uriarte and Co.

Landed property has fallen considerably in and near Calcutta during the last six or seven years. I think sales of landed property nearly ceased from 1821 to 1828, and land kept up at a nominal value, but from 1828 to 1832 it fell very rapidly.

In 1827-8 there were large loans obtained by mercantile people in Calcutta from Government. Mackintosh and Co., neither applied for nor received part of those loans. From that time down to the failure of the house, and particularly after the failure of Palmer and Co., there was great pressure on commercial credit.

In 1827-8 the 'Stock' had decreased to between eleven and twelve lakhs; this was occasioned by loss of interest about four lakhs. Rs. 1,29,000 credit to Mr. Laruleta on his retiring from the firm, and a lakh and odd increase of 'Bad Debts.'

Mr. Brown Roberts left this country in March, 1828. The balance sheet for 1827-8 was not made out at that time. It was made out in December 1828, therefore the balance sheet that he would have when he went away would be that of 1826 7.

If the 'Bad Debts,' 33 lakhs, were good debts, the amount at credit of 'Stocks' would be the surplus of Rs. 11,74,095. That would be the amount at the general credit of the house. But I consider those 38 lakhs as actually irrecoverable, and therefore if all the other debts were good, still there would be a deficiency.

Mendieta, Uriarte and Co.'s was in 1827-8 about 12 lakhs; it is made up partly of interest and commission. When Mercer and Co. failed their debt was about 30 lakhs; it is now about 20 lakhs, without interest since the failure. No part of this debt consists of a loss of £80,000 sterling in consequence of the house holding indigo over at home. The house has borne that loss and not Mercer and Co. The house had landed property, indigo factories and other property, but they are charged in the books same as any other constituent. There was no stock beyond 16 lakhs. In 1828 the debts due by the house were about Rs. 170,00,000, to meet this there were debts due to the house and landed property. I suppose Coffee Plantations, landed property and Indigo Foctories were worth about Rs. 50,00,000.

In 1826 7 my opinion was, that the house was insolvent: I never mentioned this till after the failure. I first formed that opinion in 1823-4. The 'Bad Debts' in 1823-4 were 33 lakhs, and there was a deficit that year of five lakhs, which was reduced the next year to three and a half lakhs. I considered the house insolvent because all bad debts are not included in the 'Bad Debts.' In 1823-4 I first thought that the house was insolvent in 1819, when Mr. Fulton quitted it. There was a great loss in opium in 1825.

Re examined by Mr. Cochrane.—The hand writing (written across the Balance Book, exhibit A.) is that of Mr. Brown Roberts. He was a partner when the great losses occurred. The Phillipine Company and Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. are all the same. I suppose the person from whom we are to except payment of that claim is the late King of Spain, Ferdinand the Seventh.

Re-examined by Mr. Turton.—This book (exhibit A.) was the partners book. I have said that Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. and the Phillipine Company were the same; I mean that they were not the same persons but I consider them the same thing.

Exhibit A was now put in by Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Turton, with whom was Mr. Clarke, objects to its being read, Mr. Cochrane replies, the Court allows the objection.

Mr. John Storm examined by Mr. Cochrane.—I was advertised into the house of Mackintosh and Co., as a partner, on the 1st of May, 1827. I never had any share in the profits of the house. I merely received an allowance or salary. I recollect Mrs. Geddes as Miss Hessing; I have heard that she married Colonel Geddes. She had a small balance in the house and we had the charge of some Company's paper, I think it was for about Rs. 1,90,000. We received directions for the sale and remitted of that paper. (exhibits E. and F.) These are the powers of Attorney and Letters of Instruction. (Reads.) "To remit in Company's Bills or other respectable security." We received the amount of the paper on the 29th of October, 1832. There were no Company's Bills to be had at that time. Our house failed on the 4th of January, 1833. On the 7th November, 1832, we remitted about £ 2,000, being our own drafts on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.; 8th December £ 2,000 in similar bills; on 27th December £ 5,000 in bills of Dent and Co., of Canton, on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. and on 26th December £ 10,698 in bills of our own on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.

in compliance of the orders of the trustees. Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. failed on the 6th May, 1833. In November, 1832, there were no Company's bills to be had, and we made arrangements to send produce to Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. to draw against. We looked no further than our own bills. We sent produce (indigo) to amount of £50,000 on two ships about the middle of December, to Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. The bills for £10,000 had only our own endorsement. On part of the produce we got a government advance; it was got in December as soon as the shipping documents were completed. The advance preceded the drawing of the bills on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. probably two days. Besides the £50,000 of indigo we had purchased 6,000 maunds from Alexander and Co. amounting to £70,000, or £80,000, but the failure of that firm prevented our receiving more than one half of it, and that one-half we were obliged to sell again on the spot in consequence of our own difficulties. We were aware of the necessity of the resale of the time we drew the bills for £10,000. The amount drawn on all accounts by us in December, on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. was a very heavy sum, I cannot say how much, not 10 lakhs,—nothing like it. I cannot tell what was the whole sum standing on bills drawn on the London house. The Government advance was about two-thirds on the invoice of £50,000; we required it to pay the heavy calls on us. The occasion of the delay in remitting was, that in November there were no Goverment or other bills to be had, and we could not draw till the shipping season for indigo came round. If there were other bills we would sooner have sent our own, having provided the means of drawing against them. The house on the 20th December, 1832 was deeply indebted to Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. It is the custom to sell out the paper before the bills are procured. We had not made arrangements for sending produce so we did not send the bills sooner. The produce sent would not have covered one tenth of our debt to the house at home, but we had authority to draw, they having drawn on us to the amount of 80 lakhs which we accepted in December, and could have easily paid but for the pressure occasioned by Alexander and Co.'s failure. I cannot recollect being aware that there were any Government bills in the market in December, 1832, but if there were we should not have availed ourselves of them having made arrangements to draw, and could not on account of the pressure on us. In December we were not aware that Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. were pressed for money.

I did not bring much money into the house of Mackintosh and Co. At the time of the failure, my debt was a balance of ~~Rs~~ 8,000 which has been, or will be paid out of my private estate by the assignee, I believe if we had drawn on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. when we realized the paper, the bills would have been accepted. They did accept our first two drafts.

There is a part of this letter in ciphers which I cannot read, (exhibit B.) It is dated London, and from Mr. Brown Roberts. I have not the key to the ciphers nor ever had. It was explained to me by either Mr. Gordon or Mr. Calder at the time it was received. Mr. Roberts occasionally corresponded in cypher, but it was not the practice of the house to write in cypher. He occasionally wrote private letters to members of the house in cypher, but they were certainly not on matters of importance. This letter is an answer to one from me wherein I complained of his drawing so largely on the house through China. (Reads part of the letter.) 'But my friend, means were wanting,' and I suppose the cipher to mean, 'and still are wanting.' Exhibit C. is addressed to the house by Mr. Roberts, dated 9th April, 1831, and contains as memoraudum of two drafts, for ~~Rs~~ 5,076. I think those drafts were paid. He was a debtor to the house when he went home, but I forget the state of his account. The drafts were drawn at exchange of 1s. 8d. the rupee, as stated in the letter, which is not a favourable rate, but it was the exchange of the day. Mr. Roberts was in the finance department.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. We expected at the time we drew the bills on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co., that they would be both accepted and paid. We expected we should get over our difficulties till a day or two before the failure, and I did not expect that it would occasion the failure of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. The bills of Dent and Co. have since been paid by that firm. All but the last bills for £10,000 were accepted, and I think Rickards Mackintosh and Co. would have accepted them if they had arrived before their failure. Bills on Government were less plentiful in November, 1832, than previously in consequence of the Company's regulation. Government did not give bills at that time but to persons resident in England. I knew of no bills here at that time that were in my opinion safer than our own on Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.

Mr. Turton here intimated that Mr. Brown Roberts had no interest whatever in the claim on Mackintosh and Co., as the whole of his property had been put up and sold for the benefit of his creditors, subsequent to the failure of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co., in London. Mr. Roberts had however been authorized to come out to India to get in such parts of the debts as might be due to the creditors of the London house, and as the schedule of Mackintosh and Co., did not state that fact, he would now apply to have added to his name on the schedule, 'as trustee for the creditors of Rickards, Macintosh and Co.'

Leave was granted, and the learned counsel also obtained an order that Mr. J. W. Sutherland, the applicant in this case, do attend the Court, on the next court day, to be examined touching the covenant granted to Mr. Brown Roberts in the letter of licence of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.

In the course of these proceedings Sir J. P. Grant frequently remarked that the books of the late firm ought to have been put in, instead of examining witneses as to the solvency of the firm at particular periods. At the conclusion with reference to this subject,

Sir J. P. Grant said, I can only say this, that the expences of this and similar proceedings greatly exceed what is generally contemplated.

Mr. Cochrane.—I can only say, my Lord, that it is your lordship's first duty to lessen them.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN HUGHES.

This insolvent, formerly one of the attornies of this Court, was brought up, heard on his petition, and discharged.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

Mr. Turton said, there were two applications in this matter which stood for to-day: the first was to make an order absolute for compromising the debts of certain persons who are indebted to the estate and interested in the factories which they hold.

Mr. Justice Grant wished to be informed under what clause of the Act the application was made.

Mr. Turton explained, that on a former day he had made a special application to the Court stating, that these persons were largely indebted to the estate, and had no means to pay except the interest they held in the factories. The application was made under the 46th clause. The assignees had already a general power to effect compromises with debtors; but this was a special case; for instance, one of the parties was indebted to the estate upwards of five lakhs of rupees and had no other property than the shares he held in the factory of which the assignees were co-lessees.

Mr. Justice Grant.—It is quite clear the general power to compromise is or is not sufficient for the purpose. If it is sufficient, the assignees may act on it; if it is not sufficient, they may apply to the creditors.

Mr. Turton.—But in this application the Court have already granted an order nisi.

Mr. Justice Grant.—True; but in making an order nisi it does not follow that it shall be made absolute.

Mr. Turton said, it was the ordinary course to make the order absolute if no cause were shown to the contrary. He was not, however, going to say, that the Court was bound to do so.

Mr. Justice Grant alluded to the general power conferred on the assignees to effect compromises.

Mr. Turton replied, it could not be disputed that the assignees had a general power; but this was a special case in which the assignees did not like to act without the authority of the Court. If the assignees ought to apply to the Court under any circumstances, he thought they ought to apply in the present instance.

Mr. Justice Grant inquired what were the grounds of the application.

Mr. Turton replied, the affidavit of the assignees which sets forth the amount of debts due by the parties with whom they were desirous to compromise. It was, perhaps, unnecessary to state to the court each individual case; he would take the Rajapur and Soonakondy, and the Bansbarriah concerns only to show the nature of the application. The parties were indebted to the estate upwards of five lakhs, and refused to join in the sale of the factories unless they received a full discharge from the assignees. They became indebted to the insolvent firm as follows:—They were originally partners with Alexander and Co. in whose name the factories stood, but the firm agreed, that these parties should hold shares and debited them with the amount. This agreement continued for several years, when the parties separated, and it was agreed that Mr. Clarke should hold thirteen-sixteeths, and the firm the other three-sixteenths of the Rajapur and Soonakondy concerns, and that Mr. Abbott should hold thirteen-sixteenths, and Alexander and Co. three sixteenths of the Bansbarriah concern. Thus the original price, interest, and expenditure composed Mr. Clarke's debt of ~~Rs~~ 5,03,361, and Mr. Abbott's debt of ~~Rs~~ 3,41,931 was composed in like manner. The factories are legally vested in the assignees; but these parties have an equitable interest in thirteen-sixteenths of each of them, and refuse to join in the conveyance unless they receive a full discharge from the debt due by them to the estate. The assignees consequently have no other means than to proceed in Equity for an account, expense of which they would have to pay, and whoever purchased the three-sixteenths would purchase a law-suit also. Though it would appear, that the other parties were in hands of the assignees, yet truly it was the contrary; for being entitled to an account, and to have the shares sold under a decree of a Court of Equity, in the meantime, during the suit, the assignees must advance monies for the use of the factories. The other debtors mentioned in the schedule attached to the petition were similarly situated. There were thirteen in all, and the real purport of the motion was to get rid of thirteen suits in equity.

Mr. Justice Grant.—But the difficulty is, how is this to be done by your motion? Where does it appear that advances are necessary, or that the debtors have no other means of satisfying the debts due by them to the estate.

Mr. Turton said, the affidavit of the assignees stated their belief, that the debtors have no other property. The assignees might proceed by process and bring them into this court, but the parties say 'we are entitled in equity to an account,' and as the debts could not be consolidated, no less than thirteen suits must be instituted against persons who had nothing to lose.

Mr. Justice Grant thought there were not grounds before the Court sufficient to authorise it to grant this motion. The assignees had already a general power to effect compromises; if this came within that power let them act upon it; if not, let them apply to the Court to make such order as it may think fit. But to accomplish the latter it is necessary to bring all the facts into Court, whereas this motion leaves it still in the hands of the assignees to ascertain whether the debtors have any other property.

Mr. Turton said, a statement that the assignees believe the parties have no property was then before the Court.

Mr. Justice Grant.—That hardly throws the onus on the assignees. The prayer is, 'that they may be at liberty to compromise certain debts, by taking over the shares held in factories by parties who the said assignees believe have no other means.' Now, in order to effect the object mentioned the application ought not to have stated the assignees belief as to the property of the debtors, but it ought to run thus, 'as shall be proved to the satisfaction of the assignees.'

Mr. Shaw appeared on behalf of Mr. A. Lingham, and suggested that the matter be referred to the Examiner to ascertain whether the debtors had or had not other property.

Mr. Turton said that so far from objecting to the matter being referred to the Examiner he would greatly prefer it. He had already stated the reasons which induced the assignees to apply to the Court, and it would hardly be said, that the general power to effect compromise prevented the assignees from applying to the Court under peculiar circumstances. For instance, the Court would not be controuled by the creditor; but suppose the assignees exercised their authority in a case like this, it was in the power of any creditor to come forward and say that they ought not to make any compromise with the parties, and to bring the matter to the notice of the Court.

Mr. Justice Grant said, the act was not as precise as could be desired; but the 50th clause did confer a power on the Court to make a special order on such applications, and he thought the proper course would be to refer the petition to the Examiner to ascertain whether the parties represented to be debtors to the estate, have any property besides the shares in factories therein mentioned, and whether it will be for the advantage of the state to make such compromises.

Mr. Turton presented a petition from Mr. Burkinyoung praying to be discharged from the assigneeship of this estate. The learned counsel stated, that Mr. Burkinyoung had been anxious not to present this petition until another matter recently before the Court, had been finally determined, but his medical adviser had ordered him to proceed to sea. Dr. Nicholson's certificate was annexed to the petition, and he apprehended that he might be discharged from his duties under the 30th section of the Act.

Mr. Justice Grant alluded to an order made by the Court, on the petition of Colonel Galloway, and said a similar notice must be given by advertisement in this case.

Mr. Turton said the state of Mr. Burkinyoung's health was so precarious that every hour he should be detained here was of importance. Since he first mentioned the subject he had received another certificate from Dr. Nicholson which stated that Mr. Burkinyoung was unable to quit his room.

Mr. Justice Grant said, that was quite sufficient to entitle the Court to order another assignment, but notice must be given to the creditors. Mr. Burkinyoung could proceed to sea, if his health required it, without the sanction of the Court. But somebody must be substituted.

Mr. Advocate General said he had a petition to present recommending a gentleman to the notice of the Court.

Mr. Prinsep was instructed to oppose the immediate resignation of Mr. Burkinyoung. It was of great importance that so large an estate ought not to be left in the hands of one assignee.

Mr. Justice Grant thought the resignation of one assignee affected the assignment to both.

Mr. Prinsep—Then it is more apparent that the creditors ought to have an opportunity to shew cause.

Mr. Justice Grant—But no cause can be shown.

Mr. Prinsep—I apprehend a temporary indisposition does not entitle Mr. Burkinyoung to exonerate himself from his duties.

Mr. Justice Grant—I apprehend the certificate of his physician does; and the Court will not hesitate to release him.

Mr. Prinsep said, if Mr. Burkinyoung had come forward and apprized the creditors of his intention, no doubt the Court would not have hesitated. But under the circumstances, and when the Court thought it affected the assignment altogether, it did seem a most important step. As to Mr. Burkinyoung's going away, that did not affect his responsibility, but still it seemed rather a sudden measure.

Mr. Turton wished to know if Mr. Prinsep was instructed to oppose this application.

Mr. Prinsep said he was retained expressly by Messrs. Bagshaw and Co. who represented Fletcher, Alexander and Co. the largest creditors on the estate. His clients were not anxious to detain Mr. Burkinyoung here, or to prevent his being released, but it was counsel's duty when a party came forward to obtain so important an order,—one indeed which would leave the estate at sixes and sevens,—to represent that it ought not to be granted without notice. The estate could not revert to the common assignee, though the Court could convey it to him or any other gentleman; but the change of assignee to an estate, involving as it did a necessity to revive or file supplementary bills to all suits in equity, was most important, and ought to be done deliberately, and with a full knowledge of all parties. As to Mr. Burkinyoung having the power to proceed to sea, he apprehended he could go without the leave of the Court: but to vacate the assigneeship without affording the creditors an opportunity to recommend, or the Court to appoint a successor, was not only not expedient but not the practice. When this estate firs came under the control of the Court, the wishes of the creditors were consulted; and surely now, when the estate would be placed in complete jeopardy with regard to its equity suits, reference ought again to be made to the creditors.

Mr. Shaw said, he thought in this case that the rule would be the same as that laid down on the application of Colonel Galloway. He also begged to remind the Court of the recent decision on the petition of Mr. Lingham, and suggested, as Mr. Burkinyoung was going beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, that some security should be required for his acts during his assigneeship.

Mr. Turton—To ask for security from a party about to proceed to sea against whom no charge is made, and who asks for no discharge from any responsibility he may have incurred during the assigneeship—to ask this, is the most extraordinary thing I ever hear during the course of my life in any Court of justice! I should like to know what power or authority the Court has to ask for such security, or to continue a responsibility in a party who is unable to control any thing that may be done. Suppose the Court was to determine, what indeed was out of the question, to continue Mr. Burkinyoung as assignee, to use a homely phrase 'one man can lead a horse to the pond, but it was difficult to make him drink of it,' so a man may be continued as assignee, but could not be made to perform duties when incapacitated. All that the Court is asked to do, is to proceed according to the act of parliament, not to relieve Mr. Burkinyoung from any responsibility, but merely to release him from his duties and sanction the appointment of another.

Mr. Justice Grant—One of the creditors desires that Mr. Burkinyoung may find security to account for the acts of his assigneeship. Now the Court has this authority, if it is obliged to remove an assignee it may make him find security.

Mr. Turton—Suppose he cannot find security? Suppose he has nothing? Is the Court to imprison him? My friend, Mr. Prinsep, talks about dangerous precedents; I think imprisonment in such a case as this would be a dangerous precedent indeed! We have a precedent for my application in the course which has been adopted by the Court in the matter of Palmer and Co. in which the assignees have been permitted to resign in consequence of insolvency and other causes. As to all legal proceedings being tied up by the resignation, my friend, Mr. Prinsep, knows as well as I do that the Act provides, that suits shall not abate by the removal of assignees, and that it is only necessary to mention the substitution on the record. The Court in every instance except that of Colonel Galloway, has allowed the assignees to resign, and yet Mr. Burkinyoung incapacitated through illness, is to have the whole responsibility kept hanging over him. There is no creditor, not even Mr. Lingham himself, but who will declare that Mr. Burkinyoung has devoted the whole of his time, and the best of his ability, to the performance of his duty as assignee, and yet he is to be told, invidiously, that he shall not resign. I declare to God I think Mr. Burkinyoung's life depends on the obtaining of this motion.

Mr. Justice Grant—Mr. Turton, there is nothing invidious in requesting the Court to take securities from Mr. Burkinyoung as to his accounting for his acts prior to his resignation. The creditor has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. Shaw reminded the Court of a recent decision, and that the assignees had appealed to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Turton said Mr. Burkinyoung was recommended by a large majority of the creditors, did any one, at that time, say any thing regarding security for his accounting?

Mr. Justice Grant—Things are very much altered since then. Mr. Burkinyoung was known to be in business here; now he is going away, out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and it is but reasonable to say, 'leave something behind you.'

Mr. Turton said, that Mr. Burkinyoung was just as much an 'inhabitant of Calcutta' now, as he was at the moment he was appointed; and he reminded the Court, that there was not a single word or affidavit as to his going beyond the jurisdiction. Mr. Burkinyoung had given his attendance at the office of the assignees, gratuitously from the commencement of the year. Indeed he was in a very happy situation; when his medical attendant having advised him to depart, up comes a creditor and suggests to the Court that he should give security. He was ready to put in an affidavit, that Mr. Harry was in possession of the effects, and that the accounts had been filed, monthly, or quarterly, to which the creditors might have access. He would say that under the circumstances to withold the sanction of the Court would be a grievance, and that if Mr. Burkinyoung, incapacitated as he was, were to depart, he would incur no liability whatever.

Mr. Justice Grant.—It would not excuse him from being visited.

Mr. Turton.—My Lord, he is not, at present, likely to be visited by any one but death or a doctor.

Mr. Justice Grant.—But I do not wish those assertions to go forth uncontradicted.

Mr. Turton, in continuation said, if he was consulted by Mr. Burkinyoung, the latter being incapacitated by the Act of God, he would say that no legal responsibility was incurred by not acting when he could not act; and after having applied to this Court to be permitted to vacate the appointment he would not incur responsibility in any Court in Christendom. He would undertake to say, that to be detained in this country would peril Mr. Burkinyoung's life.

Mr. Justice Grant—I dare say you speak from your own personal knowledge, but there is no evidence of that before the Court.

Mr. Turton—From my own personal knowledge I have no hesitation to say it will be dangerous for Mr. Burkinyoung to remain here, and I dare say the same would be certified by the clerk of the Court who has just been to him to swear an affidavit.

Mr. Smith hoped, that the Court would not leave the assignment in the hands of one assignee only.

Mr. Turton said, Mr. Burkinyoung did not like to give notice during the time Mr. Lingham's petition was under consideration.

Mr. Justice Grant thought it unfortunate that he had put it off till the last minute. However he would have no hesitation to vacate the appointment on the certificates of the medical adviser. But as to the security; it was desirable, particularly in the case mentioned by Mr. Shaw. Perhaps some information could be given as to Mr. Burkinyoung's leaving property in this country?

Mr. Turton—My Lord, Mr. Burkinyoung is a creditor on the estate to a large amount.

Mr. Prinsep—That is not much property I fear.

Mr. Smith—I apprehend, my Lord, that is not available property.

Mr. Turton said Mr. Burkinyoung would continue liable if he went to England.

Mr. Justice Grant said he would continue liable,—if he could be laid hold of.

Mr. Advocate General said, possibly, whatever order the Court might make, it would be as well that it should be acquainted that he was about to present a petition from a number of creditors who did not like that one assignee should have the management of the estate. The names to the petition were very numerous, and the casting up of the claims they represented, though possibly it might be a little more or a little less, showed a sum of forty-two lakhs.

Mr. Turton was desired by Mr. Hurry to say that he did not wish to continue sole assignee.

Mr. Justice Grant directed that it should be added to the petition that Mr. Burkinyoung was leaving his property and business here.

The order was made that, in the terms of the act the assignment shall be vacated, and the assignee to deliver up an account to such person as the Court may appoint.

Mr. Advocate-General—Does your Lordship see any objection to granting an order nisi for the appointment of Mr. Holroyd?

Mr. Justice Grant.—Yes, I do: it may be considered if an order nisi is granted, that it will be made absolute if not opposed. There are no grounds before me at present in favour of such appointment.

Mr. Advocate General—Oh, pardon me, there are the recommendations of the creditors.

Mr. Justice Grant—It is not for me to say that I shall act on them.

Mr. Advocate General said that Mr. Holroyd had the recommendation of being an officer of the court.

Mr. Justice Grant said Mr. Holroyd had another recommendation, that of having given security for the performance of his duty.

The further consideration of the petition put in by Mr. Advocate General was defered until next court day.

IN THE MATTER OF WILLIAM FREDERICK FERGUSSON.

Mr. Turton, on behalf of the insolvent, presented a petition praying for his final discharge under the provisions of the new act. Mr. Turton considered it quite clear that the partners of a firm must apply separately for their discharges.

Mr. Justice Grant thought it might be a question whether all the partners could not concur in one petition for saving of expense.

Notice of the petition was filed.

Notices of similar petitions were also filed in the matters of W. F. Clarke, W. Melville, J. Gilmore, J. Young, G. Ballard, J. C. Sutherland, N. Alexander, J. Gordon, J. Storm, J. Palmer, C. B. Palmer, G. A. Prinsep, and W. Prinsep.

Mr. Justice Grant said, he had not had time to consider the New Act very minutely, and could not say if it did, or did not supersede the 62d clause of the old one.

Mr. Turton said it did not take away, but it added to the power of the Court.

Mr. Justice Grant said it conferred this benefit,—it got rid of the obstacle regarding 'all further proceedings.' He thought also that some of the provisions of the English Bankrupt Laws might have been introduced with advantage. It was left a question for consideration in the event of debtors obtaining the consent of upwards of five-sixths of their creditors whether the Court's sanction to their discharge might not be obtained in less time than fourteen months.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

This was an order obtained on the 17th ultimo, that Mr. J. W. Sutherland do attend this court on the next court day, to be examined touching the covenant granted to Mr. Brown Roberts in the letter of license granted to Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.

Mr. J. W. Sutherland examined by Mr. Turton—I obtained the order for the examination of the parties in this matter, on the last court day. I am a creditor of Mackintosh and Co. and of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. also. A deed of arrangement has been entered into with the creditors of the last mentioned firm. I executed the deed, and have acted under it. This is my signature. (exhibits A.) I have received twenty-five per cent. on my claims: I presume I have received it under the deed. I did not receive remittances from the house of Mackintosh and Co. for Company's Paper, sold by them, belonging to the trust of Colonel Geddes. I received remittances from them on my own account; I would say to the extent of £1,500 or £1,600. Since Colonel Geddes's trust has been transferred to me, I have had the bills remitted by Mackintosh and Co. on that account in my possession. All the bills which arrived in England before the failure of Mackintosh and Co. was known there, were accepted by Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. I have not received the dividend upon them. There are other trustees, and I understand that a dividend has been received by them on the small portion which arrived previous to the failure of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. I have no direct information of this myself. The accepted bills amount to about £4,000; the non-accepted bills amount to £10,600. The trust received besides £5,000 in bills of Thomas Dent and Co. they were remitted with the bills for £,4000 that were accepted. Those bills were received about a week or ten days before the failure of the house here was known at home. I had received my own bills about six weeks or two months previously. I am not aware that any bills drawn by Mackintosh and Co. were refused acceptance by Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. previous to the failure of the former house being known at home. I do not know what further dividend may be expected from Rickards Mackintosh and Co. but I believe something further will be paid. The extent of their dividend will depend very much on the out-turn of the estate of Mackintosh and Co. I do not expect to get twenty shillings in the pound; I shall be glad to get fifteen. I can form no accurate opinion of the probable out-turn of the estate at home. I have been refused information by Mr. Browne Roberts with regard to his proceedings in this country as agent for the creditors of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. I made application to him in writing on the 19th of November last, and have a copy of the correspondence which ensued. This is a copy of part of the correspondence; it consists of his letters and my reply; one only is omitted. I afterwards applied to Baillie and Molloy, the solicitors, for information. I applied individually to Mr. Baillie, and obtained a statement of names of debtors to the estate of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. and the sums due by them, which Mr. Roberts was to have recovered from the parties. Mr. Molloy said something that if I wanted any information on any specific head I was to receive it. My answer was that I wanted to see to what extent the claims mentioned in that paper had been recovered.

Cross-examined by Mr. Cochrane. At the first meeting of the creditors of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. on the 17th May, 1833, a statement of their affairs was drawn out and placed before the creditors, and certain resolutions were passed. I know the signature of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co; this (exhibits No. 1.) is the signature of the house; the hand writing is that of one of the partners, Mr. John Rate. There is an item in this statement of amount of stock, due to Mr. Browne Roberts, by Mackintosh and Co., of £38,000. I was present here on the day the Insolvent Court last sate; I heard the amount then stated to be due to him, by Mackintosh and Co. was ~~Rs~~ 70,000., I have seen Mr. Roberts' departure from Calcutta announced in the papers a few ~~days~~ ago. He was present the last Insolvent day. This is a clause in the deed of Rickards, Mack~~intosh and~~ Co. (reads). "And further, that they the said Robert Rickards, Robert Dent, Brown Roberts, and John Rate shall not, nor shall or will, either of them, at any time or times hereafter, during the continuance of this present arrangement, without the consent in writing of two or more of the Inspectors for the time being, acting under these present, enter into or undertake, or become engaged or concerned in any new contract, undertake, trade or business whatsoever, except such as shall be essentially necessary for getting in and disposing of their estate under direction of the said parties hereto on the second part, or the majority of them, or the Inspectors or Inspectors for the time being, or such as in their judgment shall be for the benefit of the said creditors, nor shall, nor will they do, knowingly suffer to be done, any act, deed, matter, or any thing whatsoever whereby any creditor or creditors, of them, the said parties hereto of the first part, shall or may obtain any security or securities for his, her, or their debts, or any part of or any preferrence or priority of payment thereof, or of any part thereof, before any other or others of them, contrary to the true intent and meaning of these presents." Mr. Browne Roberts came to this country for the purpose of proving Rickards, Mackinsoh and Co.'s claim, as well as his own claim of £38,000 on the estate of Mackintosh and Co. He was to receive £2,000 from the Inspectors of the former estate for the voyage, but in consequence of some remonstrance, the amount was cut down to £1,500. The claim of £38,000 was reduced to ~~Rs~~ 70,000. I judge from circulars which have come into my possession, that he came out to benefit himself rather than to benefit his creditors. I understand there have been some arrangements regarding his claim on Mackintosh and Co. Mr. Roberts was not present at the meeting of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.'s creditors on the 17th May 1833. I had conversations with him both before and after the failure. He told me that he did not take one farthing into the London firm, giving as his reason that Mackintosh and Co. would remit £38,000. I know of Mr. Roberts' marriage settlement, in which he had a life interest. He returned a schedule and an amended schedule in which he did not mention it. I, having satisfied myself that he had a marriage settlement and life interest, called for, and had a perusal of his private schedule; finding it was not mentioned, I wrote to the Inspectors of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.'s estates on the subject. They did not reply to my letter, but they ordered the settlement to be publicly sold, and it produced £600 to the estate. Mr. Browne Roberts was not in London at the time of the failure of the London firm. I understand that he was at Madrid. He never told me, prior to the failure, that he had a large claim on the house here, nor the precise sum which he expected to be remitted to him and which ought to have been placed to his account at Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.'s.

Re-examined by Mr. Turton—Mr. Browne Roberts was not in England at the time of the failure of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co., nor was he present at the meeting of the 17th May. He was not at the meeting of the 28th June. I understood that Mackintosh and Co. would advance a sum of money for the share of Mr. Robert's capital, to be placed to his credit, for the share in the house at home. I understood this from Mr. Roberts himself. It was stated at the meeting the claim on the house here was composed partly of the amount they were to advance. I never heard the sum stated to be three lakhs. I never heard what the amount was.

Mr. Sutherland, in conclusion, declared that he had been actuated by no vindictive feelings in procuring this investigation. He only wished the case to be fairly investigated for his own satisfaction and for the satisfaction of parties at home.

Mr. Cochrane applied for an order nisi, that Mr. Browne Robert's name be erased from the schedule of Mackintosh and Co.

The Court ordered that notice of the application be published in the newspapers.

Mr. Turton applied for a day to be named to declare a dividend on this estate. The amount, he said, would be three per cent. The assignees, however, had sufficient assets to make a dividend of 5 per cent. but in consequence of the twelve months not having expired since publication in the London Gazette last June, they were obliged to divide three per cent. only.

---

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

Mr. Turton moved the rule absolute for carrying on the factories for another year.

Mr. Shaw was instructed not to oppose this motion as it was evident that the effect of throwing so large a quantity of property at once into the market must be most injurious. He hoped, however, that the Court would bear in mind that this firm failed in 1832, and that up to this period no dividend whatever had been made. The Court would also recollect it was given in evidence that ~~Rs~~ 70,000 was considered to be the full value of the Moisgunj and Moisharah concerns. He was aware that several offers had been made for these concerns, but he had no knowledge as to whether any sale had been effected. He therefore, addressed a note to the assignees requesting to know, on behalf of a creditor, what is the best price which has been offered, since the failure of Alexander and Co., for the Moisgunj concern, and what is the price now put upon it. The answer he received was a request, that he would state the pue pose and object: and that he should pledge himself that no harm should accrue to the estate from any information he might receive. To this letter he returned an answer, and received another reply, stating, that the assignees were willing to give, provided their attorney, Mr. White, was present, such information as that gentleman he might consider expedient. To this reply he had returned no answer, because he did not consider that the questions he had to submit to the assignees were of a naturre to require Mr. White's intervention, but he called at the office of the assignees, where he was informed by Mr. Burkinyoung, that the assignees were unwilling to give him the information he required, because it might prejudice the estate. He (Mr. Shaw) replied that he applied on behalf of a creditor, and was surprised that the information was withheld. Some further conversation took place, after which he took his leave, informing Mr. Burkinyoung that he would now only receive a written reply. As this information had been withheld by the assignees, he was obliged to seek it elsewhere, and he found, on application to Gisborne and Co., that that firm had offered in October, 1834, ~~Rs~~ 80,000 for the Moisgunj concern, which, at the date of the failure was valued by assignees appointed by the Court at ~~Rs~~ 70,000 only; and the Court would recollect that it had been stated, that Indigo had fallen thirty per cent. since that period, and that indigo factories, had, consequently, greatly depreciated in value. The offer of Gisborne and Co. was ~~Rs~~ 80,000, that is to say, ~~Rs~~ 40,000 cash and ~~Rs~~ 40,000 in six months; but Mr. N. Alexander, on behalf of the assignees, had declined acceding to the offer, and stated that one lakh of rupees was the lowest price that could be taken. He had heard of many other refusals to sell the factories, but as information had been refused by the assignees he could not bring any of them before the Court. With regard to the recent attempt to sell the factories, he thought, as the advertisement appeared for the first time on Monday, and the auction took place on the following Thursday, that there had not been sufficient notice given of the assignees' intention. He had received a letter from Mr. Gregg, an intending purchaser, who lived at a distance, complaining that sufficient notice had not been given. In the case of Palmer and Co.'s factories a different course had been adopted, and as the creditors of that estate were about to assemble to consider of the propriety of carrying on the factories, he would suggest that as to this estate a similiar course should be pursued.

Mr. Justice Grant inquired if Mr. Shaw opposed the carrying on of the factories.

Mr. Shaw said he did not, but he was auxious that the factories for which offers had been made should be put up at auction. In consequence of having been denied information, he was only in a situation to speak of the Moisgunj and the Sonaparia concerns, but he heard that offers had been made for the Western Dacca concerns also. He would suggest that these factories should be put up at the valuation put upon them by the Bank.

Mr. Turton said, that the grounds put in by Mr. Shaw stated, that he was an attorney of this Court, and that he had made an application to the assignees, but it was not stated that he was a creditor.

Mr. Justice Grant—He was known by the assignees to be an attorney for one of the creditors.

Mr. Shaw said, it did not only appear by the grounds that he was the attorney for a creditor, but that he was the representative of one also.

Mr. Turton, with reference to Mr. Shaw's objection to the presence of Mr. Wight, thought it would not have been unreasonable had Mr. Shaw not been an attorney himself, but as it was, he should like to know whether assignees to bankrupt estates at home were in the habit of giving information under similar circumstances, without consulting their legal adviser? As to the Moisgunj factory not having been sold, the reason would be apparent to any one who read the advertisement in the papers, and who were acquainted with the object of the application which the Court had that day refered to the examiner. The reason of the sale not having been effected was, that this very factory was one of those which the assignees could not sell without compromising with the planters. He thought there was nothing strange in Mr. Shaw requiring information after the reports he had heard regarding the assignees' refusal to sell the factory; neither was it remarkable that the latter should refuse to give it without consulting their attorney, for not only might they think that their answer to him might depreciate the property, but they were thoroughly convinced of the necessity of being careful. If the Court would refer to the petition presented on the former application, it would be found that in the Moisgunj concern Mr. Savi, whose debt was ~~Rs~~ 1,29,564, held four sixteenths, Mr. Stuart, whose debt was was ~~Rs~~ 2,84,869 held six-sixteenths, and the concern held six sixteenths likewise; the value of the whole factory had been estimated at ~~Rs~~ 70,000, and it was stated that the assignees had refused ~~Rs~~ 80,000, but the reason was evident,—they could not sell until some arrangement was effected with the co-lessees. In like manner, of the United Western Dacca concern Mr. Oram held five-sixteenths, the estimated value of the whole was ~~Rs~~ 1,50,000, and Mr. Oram's debt was 2,84,869. Was not this an ample reason why they could not bring it to sale? With regard to the advertisement not having appeared before last Monday, it did not strike him that Mr. Shaw was misinformed; he thought he had seen it for several months before: and as to the allusion made to the factories of Palmer and Co. he reminded the Court that the factories had been carried on without any reference to the creditors. As to Mr. Gregg having written to Mr. Shaw, he was not aware how it appeared that Mr. Gregg was a creditor.

Mr. Justice Grant said he was not at all surprised at Mr. Shaw being surprised at the reference to Mr. Wight for information; it was not however, strange that the assignees should be anxions that their own attorney should be present, when such information was obtained. The main question was, what is to be done with the factories, since it appeared, from the statement of the assignees that they could not be sold owing to the rights of the creditors being involved and mixed up with the right of other persons. As to the propriety of delaying the sale, it was evidently of no use putting them up in auction since it appears they cannot be sold until some arrangement is effected. He thought this order must be made absolute, with a proviso that Mr. Shaw's client may come in and show cause that the factories may be sold. Englishman.

FREE SCHOOL EXAMINATION.

TUESDAY JANUARY 27, 1835.

Before the Examination began, the following Gentlemen were elected Governors of the Institution for the present year.

Reverends T. Dealtry and J. McQueen.
Messrs. R. D. Mangles and W. Byrn.

The Reverend Mr. Robertson then referred to the Bank Book to ascertain what sum of money remained in favor of the Institution, and it appeared that six thousand and odd rupees were to its credit.

BOY'S DEPARTMENT.

The Revd. Mr. McQueen at the proposition of the Revd. Mr. Robertson conducted the Examination in the following order. The 3d Class Boys under the tuition of Mr. Ridge, the second teacher, were questioned on some parts of Scripture History such as the Creation of the World, &c. and they answered satisfactorily, they were then asked to parse the sentence "I will strike the table with my hand" which they did etymologically, and after the correction of some wrong sentences they worked a sum and were dismissed. The 5th Class under the tuition of Mr. Keir. nander the fourth teacher was next examined in spelling, reading, and the definition of words, and the result of the examination was satisfactory. The 1st Class was examined last, and from the manner in which it acquitted itself, Mr. J. Lindsay, the head teacher, deserves great praise, for all the boys of this class who were examined closely by Rev. McQueen manifested a deal of progress which it was astonishing to witness in an Institution which only a year ago was noted for insignificance as regards the education of its boys.

The 1st Class Boys were examined in the History of England down to the reign of King James, which they seemed well acquainted with, they were desired to parse syntaxically the following sentence:—"The spectators testified their horror at the spectacle in sighs and lamentations," which they did with apparent facility; they then gave the parts of speech derived from one another such as nouns from adjectives and so on, and after being questioned on Geography and the definition of words which they answered sans difficultié, they were dismissed.

Rev. Dealtry took the opportunity of testifying his approbation at the result of the examination, and he was joined by Mr. T. C. Plowden and some other gentlemen present. They all said that it was surprising to find the boys getting on so well since the change of teachers, and they hoped the Institution might do better in time.

GIRL'S DEPARTMENT.

Rev. McQueen conducted the Examination in this Department also.

The 1st class read the 7th Chapter of St. Mathew and answered many questions connected with Scripture History, especially those regarding the Patriarchs, al of which they answered aright—the Girls then gave a definition of some words and their parts of speech as well as corrected some simple erroneous sentences and manifested a knowledge of Geography.

The 2d Class read the 1st Chapter of St. Luke and explained the meaning thereof; they gave the parts of speech and spelt correctly.

The 5th Class was examined by Rev. Robertson in reading and Scripture History, and they seemed to know well the five senses, viz. Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, and feeling; also the four elements earth, air, water, and fire.

The last class repeated some lesson with various motions touching the head, the mouth, &c. which was somewhat amusing.

The examination in this department also met with general approbation, and what appeared remarkable was the cleanliness in the dress of the girls and the hearty appearance which they exhibited, none appearing wan or sickly.

At the conclusion of the examination some boxes, &c. were given to the girls by way of encouragement. The boys also looked clean in their dress, healthy and robust, and we were told on inquiry that there were only 4 sick at the Hospital.

The examination in both the Departments was honored by the presence of the Right Honorable Lady William Bentinck, Lady Bryant, Mrs. Trevelyan, and several other ladies of quality, and Revds. Fisher and Dealtry, Messrs Plowden, Pattle and Macfarlane and Captain Birch.—Bengal Hurkaru.

EXAMINATION AND FAIR AT THE EUROPEAN FEMALE ORPHAN ASYLUM.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1835.

At ¼ before 11 o'clock the Revd. Mr. Dealtry in conjuction with Mr. Bunkins commenced the examination of the 3d class. The girls having read the 3d Chapter of St. John's Gospel were questioned on Scripture History, chiefly regarding the Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and others—and the Prophets Samuel and Eli. From the ready answers given they manifested a pretty good knowledge of the sacred writings. After this stage of the examination the Right Honorable Lady William Bentink entered the room and the 1st class was called. The Revd. Mr. Dealtry set to the girls of this class one or two sums in the Rule of Three, which were worked correctly. The Revd. Mr. Harberlin then examined them pretty closely on Bible History from the creation down to the Deluge, and they acquitted themselves creditably. The Revd. Mr. Dealtry thought proper before dismissing this class to question the girls on Grammar and Geography, and they were required to parse the following sentence:—"good men shall be rewarded both in Earth and in Heaven" and "the wicked shall be punished—" these were parsed according to the rules of etymology and the verb "to love" conjugated. A few simple questions on Geography and the History of England were next put to them, and these were answered satisfactorily. The Class was about to be dismissed, when Lady William very complaisantly expressed her satisfaction at the result of the examination by handing to each girl the present designed for her, viz. Some books tied up together and forwarded to her Ladyship by Mrs. Dealtry, the Secretary to the Institution. The 2d Class was examined last by Reverends Harberlin and Garstin on Scripture History, &c., and it afforded as much satisfaction as the other classes.

Whilst this class was undergoing examination, the assembly, amounting to nearly 300 Ladies, Children and Gentlemen, hastened to the Fair in the Upper Department of the School, where Tables covered with Engravings, Toys, and other articles of the most beautiful kind, seemed to invite all to purchase.

Of the distinguished at the assembly and those whom we can name were the Right Honourable Lady William Bentink, Mrs. Trevelyan, Mrs. Dealtry, Mrs. Oakes, Sir Charles D'Oyly, Bart., Reverends Mackay, Morton, Dealtry, Harbelin, and Garstin, Major Powney, Mr. Saunders, and Mr, Bagshaw.—Bengal Hurkaru.

MEETING AT MADRAS TO ERECT A BREAK-WATER.

A large assemblage of the inhabitants of Madras took place in the Town Hall at 11 A. M. on Monday the 23d February, to take into consideration the practicability of erecting a Break-water at the Port of Madras. The Hall was crowded at an early hour, and included nearly all the leading members of our society. Where unavoidable duty caused absence, it was gratifying to find that a sense of the value of the object sought to be attained was still uppermost in their minds, and letters to this effect which were received from the Honorable Sir Ralph Palmer and Sir Robert Comyn, amongst others, added fuel to the general excitement that prevailed. We regretted to observe the paucity of our native friends on the occasion, which was explained by Ragavah Chariar, to arise from their not being subscribers to the Presidency Newspapers, and therefore unaware of the period or nature of our assemblage; but this excuse we fear assists them little, as they had their own organ, the Carnatic Chronicle, which should have trumpeted forth the intended Meeting.

The SHERIFF opened the Meeting in due form, and proposed that Mr. Norton be called to the Chair, which was carried by acclamation, Mr. NORTON then opened the business of the day in his usual masterly manner.

The VENERABLE ARCHDEACON informed the Meeting that he held in hand a letter from the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, who regreted that his early departure prevented his Lordship's attendance at a Meeting held for so desirable and beneficial a purpose. The letter ran as follows:

To Captain DALRYMPLE, &c. &c. &c.

Dear Sir,—I am truly sorry that I am compelled to leave the Presidency before the Meeting takes place for considering the practicability of erecting a Break-water in the Madras Roads. I cannot refrain however from assuring you that I heartily wish success to so useful and important an undertaking. If upon mature consultation any plan should be resolved upon, you may put me down as a subscriber for 1,000 Rupees. I should however venture to recommend great care in framing your calculations and preparing for expected difficulties, from the first. If you look every thing fairly in the face and obtain the concurrent approbation of the leading Nautical and Scientific gentlemen of the Presidency, to some definite project, I should have very little doubt of the ultimate success of the subscriptions. The roads of Madras are famous, I might say with Vergil, infamous, throughout the civilized world. The moment is surely then peculiarly favorable for removing the danger and inconvenience, when the gates of commerce are thrown open, when colonization is inviting Science and the Arts to your shores, and when the diffusion of knowledge is tending to raise the native mind to the efforts of commercial enterprize, nor can Britain appear in a more becoming attitude than when she is thus distributing those advantages of the Western world and accumulating those benefits of civilization in her Eastern Empire, which she has herself derived from her Religion and Laws, and which go to commend those foundations of her own prosperity, to the inquiring minds of the Inhabitants of Hindostan.

I remain, dear Sir,

Your most obedient and faithful,

DANIEL CALCUTTA.

Government House, Madras, Feb. 21, 1835.

It was perused amidst warm applause from all parts of the room.

The Venerable the Archdeacon then rose to propose the first resolution, and spoke in the following terms:

Sir,—Having read the letter of the Bishop of Calcutta, whose representative I have the honor to be, I might have contented myself with assuring the Meeting of my entire concurrence with the sentiments expressed by his Lordship; but I gladly avail myself of the opportunity which has been thus kindly offered me of submitting to this numerous and respectable assembly the first general proposition of the subject before us. And I am the more anxious to offer myself thus early to your notice, because I stand altogether unconnected with the immediate interests of the measure we are met to advocate. My ignorance of the specific plans to be proposed, my inability to enter into the details or to grapple with any of the practical difficulties, and the circumstances of the profession to which I belong might appear at first sight to mark me out as the last person to take any share in the discussion; but it is important for us to shew that in this and in all similar plans of public improvement, all professions and classes of the community join hand and heart as in one great and common cause. It is true that the measure now to be considered is one chiefly of commercial enterprize, and the proximate and immediate benefits we anticipate are those of mercantile speculation, but we know little of the true interests of our country and its colonies, if we imagine that all of us—whether civil, military or ecclesiastical, are not deeply interested in its success. England is a commercial nation. Commerce is the salient living spring from which all its power and pre-eminence among the nations of Europe is derived and by which its moral power is transferred to every quarter of the habitable world. When therefore we aid its commerce we extend its power, and whether at Home or in her distant colonies, every measure of improvement, though immediately bearing only on her mercantile prosperity, is an instrument of raising the civil and moral grandeur of our native country. It is impossible for any of her children, especially when new sources of improvement are opening upon us by the late political arrangements for India, to be indifferent to the success of schemes so important as this,—the more important because it is one of a primary and elementary character. What would England now have been, with all the beauty of her rivers and the majesty of her shores, without her Piers and Breakwaters to secure and defend her trade, and to enable her to receive into her bosom the wealth of the civilized world? Without them it would have still remained the haunt of the half naked savage: and it was by seizing every opportunity within her reach of progressive improvement which the skill, industry and enterprize of her sons individually as well as nationally, furnished, in short by steps of advance similar to that we now advocate, that she has attained the high and commanding station she now holds in the western world. If we would share and perpetuate her triumph we must aid her commerce, nor must we narrow our prospects of success. It is not the present generation only that will receive the benefits resulting from such improvements as this, but future years and the future colonists of India in an infinitely greater degree than we can hope to do; and we are only following up the true principle of the commercial spirit of our country by uniting to effect a measure which if effected must inevitably produce results of immense, though distant benefit On these grounds, Sir, permit me again to express the pleasure I feel in submitting to the meeting the 1st Resolution which is proposed for their adoption.

1. Resolved. That it is the opinion of this Meeting; that for the furtherence of Commercial Prosperity at Madras as well as the public convenience, it is highly desirable that some measure be adopted to overcome the difficulty of communication with shipping in the Roads occasioned by the surf.

The Resolution was seconded by the Honorable Mr. Oliver, and carried unanimously.

Mr. CHAMIER proposed the second resolution and addressed the chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman.—The resolution which I have to propose is to the effect that "the plan of a Break-water appears to offer the most eligible means of attaining the desired object at the least expense;" but before I request you to submit this resolution formally from the chair, it is proper that I should state to you the reasons which appear to justify the opinion that a Break-water is preferable to other modes of effecting the object of facilitating communication between the Shore and Shipping in the Madras Roads and obviating the dangers and difficulties arising from the violent surf which incessantly breaks on this coast. It is also right that those who are interested in the proceedings of this day but are unable, from whatever cause to attend the meeting, should know that before pronouncing this particular plan to be the best adapted to our purpose, we have duly examined and considered those which have been suggested by men who have gone before us and whose opinions are entitled to great weight on account of their professional knowledge and scientific acquirements. I shall therefore bring to the notice of the meeting those plans which I have had means of becoming acquainted with.

In 1798, Captain Lennon, of the Engineers, a highly talented officer, submitted two proposals to this Government, one for building a solid Pier, and the other for an extension of this work so as to form a harbour in these Roads—the object of the former was that, which we have in view, of facilitating communication between the shore and shipping and providing means of expeditiously and safely loading and unloading vessels: and the object of the latter was, of course, to afford a secure shelter for shipping at all seasons of the year. It was proposed that the Pier of solid masonary should be carried out to the distance of 450 yards and to the depth of 14 feet low water—beyond which it was ascertained the surf was never so violent as to prevent ship's boats or lighters from watering, or receiving and discharging cargo. The Pier was to run out nearly at right angles to the shore, so as to bisect the direction of the surf in the different monsoons, which would thus at all times strike slantwise on the Pier and afford, in the opposite direction, as lee side for safe approach of boats. The other proposition to construct a harbour where ships might ride with safety required an extension of the work to a distance of 650 yards, so as to give sufficient depth of water and capacity to contain and shelter them. The harbour was calculated to cost £4,50,000, the single Pier £1,20,000 or 300,000 Pagodas. These propositions were not sanctioned by the Home Authorities from an apprehension of accumulations of sand being likely to form from the action of the surf and currents by which, in the end, the Pier itself would be rendered useless by the gradual encroachment of the shore.

In 1803 the same zealous officer, desirous to obviate the objections which I have just stated, submitted proposals for erecting a Pier upon piles—to be elevated 10 feet above high water mark and carried out to the distance of 450 yards, with a depth of 14 feet low water—which, as has already been stated, is considerably beyond any effect of the surf in the most violent weather. The flooring of this Pier was to be moveable, so as to admit of being taken up at the approach of the monsoon. The work was estimated to cost 300,000 pagodas. It was referred for the consideration of several intelligent Commanders of Indiamen and they stated various objections—not to the practicability of construction, but to the expediency of the scheme. They had doubts whether, notwithstanding the Pier was constructed on open piles, banks might not be eventually formed so as to prevent at times the approach of vessels to the Pier for loading and unloading their cargoes, and they were apprehensive that the currents during the prevalence of the strong southerly winds might raise, on being opposed by the Piles of the Pier, across and chopping Sea on the side on which vessels were to lie in their situation of loading and unloading, so as to prevent their continuing by the Pier—which at the same time they would be unable to quit without a warp, unless favored by a wind directly from the land—and thus they would often be exposed to danger in hauling off. And it was also feared that the same difficulty of lying alongside the Pier-head, would be occasioned by the great swell which is constantly experienced in these Roads. A further objection was made on the ground of the very limited means of loading and unloading ships, which the Pier would afford. Not more than two or three vessels could be worked at one time; and the progress of delivery, as well as of loading, would be tedious and uncertain. The means which the Pier would afford would be inadequate to the use required of it by the shipping, but quite sufficient to throw out of employ a number of that most useful class of people at this port, the boatmen, who would be compelled to disperse and seek other means of livelihood, and thus in the event of any injury to the Pier from storms, or an enemy, or from ourselves to keep off an enemy, their service should not be readily replaced and the business of the port would be seriously impeded, if not entirely stopped, for a time. For these reasons it was not thought advisable to adopt the plan submitted by Capt. Lennon.

In 1808, Mr. Greig proposed to erect a Pier and Wharf at his own expense, by way of experiment, with the condition that if he succeeded and a more permanent and extensive work should be undertaken by Government, he was to have the execution of it and a suitable remuneration. This gentleman, while he noticed the rejection of Captain Lennon's propositions submitted no plans of his own. It was not thought expedient to give him any public pledge and his proposal was declined.

In 1821, Major De Havilland another scientific Engineer, submitted the plan of a Wharf to be projected from the Bulwark, near the Custom House. One of the chief inducements to bring forward the proposition at that time was the opportunity which it afforded of turning to account a vast collection of planks and timber which had been employed as scaffolding during the construction of the Bulwark and another was the expectation that the work would tend to retain the sand more effectually along the Bulwark—this accumulation, or retention, of sand being the very effect which the Home Authorities anticipated when they declined Captain Lennon's first plan. The expense was calculated at 35,000 Rs. in addition to the value of the available wood, which was estimated at 18,000 Rs. It was proposed to carry this work out at first only to the extent of 104 feet beyond the foot of the Bulwark, which was not far enough to reach beyond the break of the surf, and consequently it would not be possible to load boats in such a position, but on the contrary, difficult for any but a very active man to get in or out of a boat. The scale of the work was not considered sufficiently commodious for the general purposes of the port; and it was further deemed advisable to wait to see what effect the regular return of the season might have in restoring the beach, before any expensive work upon it was undertaken. The construction of the Wharf was not therefore at the time sanctioned and the proposition has not, I believe, since been revived.

The plan of a Break-water is free from all the objections which have been urged against Piers or Wharfs. Nothing is to be feared on the score of accumulations of deposites of sand; for, as it is proposed to place it at 400 yards from the shore and parallel with it, a wide passage will be left open for the currents, which in their course north or south, according to the season of the year, will effectually prevent any accumulations which can possibly be detrimental to the landing of boats—or disturb the smoothness of the water. Simple in its design; requiring no complicated machinery in its construction; easy of repair; admitting of extension in length, breadth, or height at pleasure; not interfering in any way with the anchorage of ships; moderate in cost; ensuring smooth water for the landing and shipping of goods and affording security to life and property, with facility of embarkation for troops and stores at all times, it has, in my opinion, irresistible claims upon the attention and support of the public.

Let it be remembered that in 1782 some hundreds of coasting vessels laden with rice were, from the want of the means of expeditionsly landing their cargoes, detained in the roads until the monsoon wrecked the whole of them and caused thousands to perish by famine. When the interior of the country is unable from bad seasons, which are unfortunately of frequent occurrence, to furnish the required supplies of grain, we are dependant upon importations by sea, and the instance which I have mentioned is not the only one in which extensive losses and inconvenience have occurred from the detention in these roads of native craft, upon which so much, even the very subsistence of the people in times of scarcity, depends.

The consideration, if there were no other, ought to induce us to do all in our power to facilitate communication between the shore and the shipping, and to prevent, as far as human means can avail, the recurrence of those calamities which the continuance of the present obstacles may occasion.

In conclusion I am happy to be able to say that Sir F. Adam has intimated, in reference to the object of our meeting, that if any good plan be suggested for so important a benefit to the port of Madras, as we have in contemplation, it shall have his best assistance, as he is sure it will that of Government.

From what I have now stated it will be seen that plans for effecting the great object of faciliating communication with the shipping in these Roads have not been wanting on the part of officers of this Government, and that the Government itself has not been indifferent to such undertakings; and if it has not sanctioned plans which upon examination have been deemed inexpedient, it may be hoped that when a feasible, expedient, and beneficial project is submitted for its consideration, it will afford that cordial support which we all desire and which is so essential to the public interests on this occasion. I now request Mr. Chairman that you will be pleased to submit this Resolution to the meeting. (The Resolution was here handed to the Chairman and read by him to the meeting.

2.—Resolved. That the plan of a Break-water appears to offer the most eligible means of attaining the desired object at the least expence.

Captain DALRYMPLE in rising to second the motion of Mr. Chanier, took occasion to say—Mr. Chairman, it may seem to require some explanation why I should come forward on the present occasion to take a prominent part, having so recently become a member of this society, but placed by my official situation within daily observation of the surf and its effects, the subject has in a manner forced itself on my attention. As soon as the matter came under discussion it was necessary to ascertain the following points.

1st.—How far the surf breaks from the shore in ordinary weather.

2d.—How far it breaks when communication with the shipping is cut off.

3d.—The depth of water from the shore beyond the surf; and

Lastly.—The nature of the ground.

Under the able suggestions of Captain Arthur Cotton, I have endeavoured to possess myself of information upon these several points.

During the last four months, two buoys have been laying on the spot where it is proposed to erect the Break-water, these buoys are in 19 feet water and distant from the shore 306 yards. The surf has never broken outside of this spot since the buoys were laid down, although the communication has been cut off for three days consecutively. The anchors holding the buoys (one of which is a heavy anchor of 8 cwt.) are not buried in the sand, which indicates a hard bottom. On the table I have placed for the inspection of the meeting 16 specimens of the bottom between the buoys and the shore, taken by the divers. There does not appear to be any deposit of silt or mud. In the two principal surfs, the sand is coarse and becomes finer as the distance from the shore is increased. This state of the bottom is in accordance with the well-known action of the current, which sets along the shore to the north in the southerly monsoon and to the south in the northerly. It has not come within my observation that there is any perceptible set of the tide and its rise and fall does not exceed 2 feet and a half.

All these circumstances conspire to prove that a Break-water composed of loose stones dropt in a single line to find their own base appears to be the most eligible and most economical plan. A rough sketch of such a structure is now lying on the table. It was kindly furnished by Captain A. Cotton, who has devoted a considerable share of his attention to this particular subject. I need not expatiate on his fitness for this task, his abilities are too well known to need any eulogium from me. He has lately visited most of the structures of this description not only in Great Britain, but in many parts of Europe; and the plan rough as it is, may be fairly considered as the result of all his observations. As, Mr. Chairman, most justly observes the plan appears to meet the objections of all the suggestions hitherto offered in a most remarkable manner. Great exception has been taken to the trifling amount of the estimate, I need only observe that the calculation is grounded on very sufficient data. It is known that a large quantity of stones of the description required are now lying on the beach, forming the bulwark. They came from the Mount on bandies, they cost so much money. The Mount can still furnish the required quantity, the bandies are to be had at the same price, the road is better than it was, and therefore it is very easy to calculate the cost of bringing so much material to the beach. The additional labour of rolling the stones upon catamarans and hauling them through the surf is also very easily summed up, and as there does not appear to be a necessity for using any machinery or artificers (except to blast the stones,) the economical nature of the plan proposed seems quite clear. It has been suggested to me that the stones could be floated down the Adyar from the little Mount, and I see no difficulty in this. I may also mention that Mr. Roberts, the Principal Collector of North Arcot has stated the feasibility of opening the bar at Pulicat for country craft which would afford another means of procuring material at a small expense of water carriage.

Mr. Chairman, I will now, with your permission, read a few remarks penned by Captain A. Cotton illustrative of the advantages to be derived from adopting the plan proposed and the means of carrying it into execution.

1st.—Drop all the stones on a single line, by which means the work would be brought to the surface of the water, with the least quantity of stones possible, and the effect of the work be seen at the least possible expense.

2d.—Drop the small stones first, because it would be immaterial of what dimensions the stones were, of which the heart of the work was composed.

3d.—It would be desirable that the outer stones should not be less than ½ ton each.

4th.—The stones would get firmly arranged by the action of the waves in rough weather, and where the surface was lowered by this means, fresh stones must be placed.

5th—At first the stones to be rolled upon catamarans at the edge of the surf, and the catamaran hauled out to the proposed scite by a rope made fast to a buoy outside: taking advantage of the landwind mornings to begin the work, and throwing the stones down in a length of 20 yards at first, in order to obtain some shelter as soon as possible.

The main point to be observed respecting the construction of a work to counteract the surf are;—

1st—As the current sweeps along the shore, any work constructed parallel to the beach, will have little or no effect upon the bottom, so as to cause an increase or diminition of depth of water.

2d.—As the surf is caused by the swell rolling in nearly direct from seaward, a work constructed parallel to the beach, will effectually prevent the surf from breaking upon the part of the beach opposite to it.

The advantages of a simple line of loose rough stones are;—

1st—There will be no difficulty in its construction.

2d.—It will be a permanent work; the greatest injury it could receive in a storm, would be the displacing of some of the upper stores, which could be replaced at a trifling expence.

3d.—It seems probable that no cheaper plan could be found.

4th.—The boats when within the Break-water would be sheltered from the swell, as well as from the surf, and would lie in smooth water while loading and unloading or while unemployed, which would not be the case with a pier or jetty carried out to be back of the surf.

The proposed Break-water is similar in the principle of its construction to those two great works at Cherbourg and Plymouth, both of which have succeeded under difficulties ten-fold greater than we have to contend with at Madras. The Plymouth Break-water is open to the whole force of the great Atlantic Ocean, to the unequal lateral pressure of a column of water varying from 35 to 40 feet by the rise and fall of the tide, to the velocity of the tides which greatly accelerates the force of the waves and to frequent gales of wind during every month of every winter. The Madras Break-water would only be exposed to the equal lateral pressure of a column of water of 19 feet, has no velocity of tide to contend with and is not likely from past experience to be visited by a gale of wind oftener than once in seven years. As a sea risk, I consider, it is not exposed to greater danger than any other sea-risk, and it has never been urged against the employment of shipping that they are sometimes destroyed by hurricanes or gales of wind, I need scarcely advert to some objections which have been urged through the medium of the press, but to prevent misconception, I may briefly state that Captain Cotton placed three separate plans for consideration upon one sheet of paper, whereupon it entered into the head of some persons that all three of the plans were to be carried into execution for 40,000 rupees, the outer one for ships, the middle for dhonies, and the inner one for boats. This idea was very like making a large hole in the door for the cat and a small one for the kittens, I need not say that the speculations which were put forth under this erroneous supposition are the dreams of a visionary. It may be satisfactory to the meeting to know, that it does not necessarily follow that the present boats and men are to be discontinued. To throw out of employ so large a body of men would be productive of great inconvenience, and I see no objection to the employment of the present boats and men when the Break-water is completed.

Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to conclude by assuring you and the meeting that if a Break-water is resolved upon, in so far as I am permitted by the Government whose servant I am, I will use my best endeavours to carry on the work to completion. As a member of the community at large, I will exert myself in every way which can promote the interests of this great work.

Colonel MONTEITH rose and said:—

At so early a point of our proceedings we should avoid as much as possible entering into any details of the execution of the work, the plan of which has this day for the first time been brought before the public. The warm interest which it appears to excite among all classes of the community is the best pledge of its being brought to a successful termination. It is far from my wish or intention to start any difficulties which may throw a doubt on its success, but to state those obstacles which every enterprise of this kind must be attended with, that they may be firmly encountered and proved. The only chance of failure is undervaluing the impediments and uncertainty of all works which have to resist the mighty power of the ocean. In my opinion it is therefore expedient to avoid any mention of the sum for which the object may be expected to be accomplished or to adopt any plan without the most mature deliberation and approval of the public in general. I will venture to say from the hasty view of the sketch now before us, which I see for the first time, that at least three times the dimension and solidity will be required to resist the force with which it will be assailed.

In drawing out a plan of this nature we should never lose sight of what has been done and proposed by those before us, avoiding the known causes of failure and adopting those principles which have been attended with success.

The names of the Break-waters of Plymouth and Cherbourg have been this day quoted, the former have been attended with success in every stage from its commencement to its present state; and any persons who will take the trouble of examining the drawing on the table, will perceive that it is on a scale of three times the plan that is now proposed! We may safely conclude from the talent which was exerted that there were good reasons for such an expenditure of money and materials. Strong as it appears, it has once been partially injured and thus proved the wisdom of the precautions taken. These with a depth of water of 30 feet, the base is 210, it certainly therefore never can be supposed sufficient to give only a base of 54 to a height of 20. In the experience we have of the sand about 6 feet only is moveable, after which it is so compact that with the utmost difficulty could a pile be forced into it.

I beg leave further to state that neither the same certainty of success or the same facility of execution exist at Madras as at Plymouth. In the latter we all know that the Break-water is situated in a deep bay, the two ends sheltered by the sand, and to create smooth water it was only necessary to resist the waters entering from the south. At Madras you have a perfectly straight line with the prevailing winds blowing through the covered passage—we all know the strength and direction of the long shore winds and also the N. E. monsoon. A straight line or one only slightly bent at the ends is not I think the proper form to be given, but as I before said this point had much better be left to the Committee. Regarding the accumulation of sand, I think little apprehension need be entertained; in confirmation of this assertion I beg leave to lay before you a survey of the harbour named after Admiral Sir H. Blackwood, and surveyed by the officers of my department. Here you will perceive nature has placed a Break-water on a grand scale and nearly parallel with the shore, the current running through the channel has for ages kept it open, and the banks marked, it will be perceived have accumulated only where the current has been thrown off by propelling points. Had fortunately our first settlement at this point been maintained and not abandoned for Madras, a secure and beautiful harbour could with ease have been constructed, by simply finishing what nature had began, and a few feet of stone on the present reef and bank would have formed a secure harbour at all seasons. I will no longer detain you, and only trust nothing I have now said will shake the confidence of those gentlemen, who have expressed so warm an interest in the improvement of the port, or make it be supposed that I have doubts of the practicability of the undertaking.

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

On the motion of Mr. Arbuthnot seconded by Mr. O. Viveas.

3. Resolved—That a Committee of the thirteen gentlemen hereunder named, be now appointed (with power to add to their number) to investigate plans, and generally to adopt such measures, as may appear calculated to forward the objects of the Meeting.

MEETING OF ALEXANDER AND CO.'S CREDITORS AT THE EXCHANGE.

A Meeting of the Creditors of the late firm of Alexander and Co. was held on the 16th March, at the Exchange, Mr. D. Macfarlan in the chair. After much desultory conversation, it was carried unanimously that it be recommended to the Insolvent Court that the Assignees do cease to receive monthly salaries, and that they be remunerated for their labors by a commission of five per cent. on dividends, including establishment and all other charges, except law charges.

Some of the creditors having complained of the unsatisfactory nature of the statements laid before them, and desired to have some distinct information with respect to the present state of the property and the prospect that existed of dividends from the estate, Mr. Fullarton said, that though he had not yet had time since his return to Calcutta to look minutely into the latter transactions of the Assignees, he believed he was sufficiently conversant with the affairs of the estate to give the meeting a pretty fair idea of the effect of the late compromise with the Bank of Bengal, and of the prospects of the creditors, as far as concerned the indigo works and other mortgaged property. The assignees had agreed to redeem that property from the Bank at a valuation of thirteen lacs and odd thousand rupees, payable in three yearly instalments, of which the first and part of the second had been already paid; and as, in consequence of the fall in the price of indigo, an immediate dividend appeared to be out of the question, it was thought the best course to employ whatever funds were now in hand or in course of realization from the sales of produce, to the further reduction of the debt to the Bank, which there was reasonable ground for hoping might be altogether redeemed before the close of the year, if not at an earlier period. The whole of the real property would then become assets available for dividends as fast as it could be sold, as would also the proceeds of the Indigo of the season, whether the factories might be worked to a profit or not. The real property measured by the low valuation set on it in the arrangement with the Bank might be taken at 12 lacs, though, according to the prices which have been recently given for Indigo Factories in the market, 15 lacs would perhaps be nearer the mark. The value of the produce might be taken at from 01 to12 lacs; so that, on the whole, assets to the extent of between 20 and 25 lacs of rupees might, on a very moderate computation be expected to be forthcoming from this source at no very distant period. In proof of the benefit which the creditors at large had derived from the settlement with the Bank and from carrying on the Indigo factories, Mr. Fullarton mentioned, that the original debt to the two Banks and to Government, for which this property was given as security, might be stated in round numbers at about 35 lacs of rupees, of which 5 lacs had been paid from the proceeds of the Indigo on hand at the time of the failure, 10 lacs out of profits since realized from the produce of the factories, (between 6 and 7 last year, and from 3 to 4, notwithstanding the fall of markets, in this,) and only, he believed, about 6 lacs from the actual sales of the mortgaged property, leaving the Bank of Bengal a creditor for about 7 or 8 lacs on account of the redeemed property, and entitled to rank for dividends against the general estate to the extent of between 5 and 6 lacs more. However therefore, the assets of the estate might now be depreciated, and however disappointing might be the general out-turn, there could be no doubt but that the estate was now in a much better position, than if the whole of the mortgaged property had been peremptorily sold, immediately after the failure, for the benefit of the mortgagees. With respect to the prospects of the creditors from the recovery of book debts, Mr. Fullarton could not take upon himself to give any decided opinion. Those debts, he must say, had been coming in very slowly.

Mr. H. SMITH stated, that he had always been of opinion that the proper mode of paying the Assignees was by a commission and not by a salary, that he had expressed that opinion at a meeting three times more numerous than the present which was held above a year ago, and that it received, he believed, the unanimous concurrence of that meeting, with the exception of one gentleman, Mr, Fullarton, who, upon what ground he would not pretend to say, had also, as he understood, now come round to the same way of thinking. They had now got a new Assignee; and Mr. Smith trusted, that, among the other matters claiming his attention, he would not fail to look into that gentleman's account and into the accounts of the other retired partners, who appeared as claimants against the estate to the amount, he believed, of nearly 40 lacs of rupees. The late case of Mr. Brown Roberts showed the necessity of such investigation.

Mr. FULLARTON in reply observed, that his change of opinion with respect to the proper mode of remunerating the Assignees arose entirely from the very different circumstances in which the estate now stood, as compared with its position last year. It was then loaded with an enormous mortgage debt; there was no prospect of any early dividend; a very large establishment was still required for closing the books, rendering the accounts, and enabling the Assignees to carry on efficiently those concerns which could not be immediately sold; and Mr. Fullarton considered, that by paying the Assignees under such circumstances by a commission, the creditors would have been merely holding out an inducement to them to precipiate sales and sacrifice the property. Now, however, the case was different; the mortgages had to a considerable extent been cleared off: so large an establishment was no longer necessary; and there was a reasonable prospect of a dividend at the end of the current Indigo season. As to what had been said respecting his own claims against the estate and those of his former partners, it might be expected perhaps that he should offer some observations. On this subject, however, he should be very brief. Any attack of the nature intimated, he trusted, when the proper occasion arrived, he should be prepared to meet and to rebut. For the present he would merely remark, that if a charge of insolvency could really be sustained against the late firm having reference to a period twenty years back, (and Mr. Smith's observations embraced that period; the last retirement was Mr. Fullarton's own and he settled with his partners and relinquished his interest in 1819;) if a charge of insolvency throughout all that time could be sustained against them, he could only say that he and his friends had been labouring under some extraordinary delusion. It could scarcely be thought very credible, that four men, neither of them, he believed, suspected of any remarkable indifference to their worldly concerns, nor very deficient in prudence or sagacity, men intimately acquainted with the state of Alexander and Co.'s concerns should have gone on for such a length of time, reposing the most unlimited confidence in the establishment, if they had known it all along to be insolvent; that they not only should have shown no anxiety to withdraw their funds, but should in many instances have rejected remittances, and even added largely to the sums at stake. With respect to Mr. Josias Dupre Alexander in particular, who was the largest creditor of any of the retired partners, Mr. Fullarton was prepared to prove, that he not only rejected remittances to a great amount, during several years after his retirement, but had remitted very considerable sums subsequently from England, which now formed no small portion of his claim against the estate. Indeed up to the period of Messers. Palmer and Co.'s failure in 1830, when rumours began to be buzzed abroad against Alexander and Co.'s credit, they had all been acting on the most thorough conviction, that the establishment was not merely solvent but in the most flourishing circumstances.

Mr. H. SMITH said, that no person could blame the course he had taken on the present occasion, and he was glad that it had produced so satisfactory an explanation as Mr. Fullarton had now given. He certainly had not apprehended that these transactions were of such old standing, and could not suppose that so long ago as sixteen years, the partners could have contemplated the insolvency of the house.

Captain VINT suggested that the Chairman, in communicating to the Insolvent Court, the resolutions passed at this Meeting, should be requested to solicit, that in the event of the Commissioner not approving and adopting the recommendations therein contained, his Honor should be solicited to refer the matter back to another Meeting for reconsideration.

Captain VINT's suggestion being approved of and thanks voted to the Chairman, the Meeting then broke up.—Bengal Hurkaru.

MEETING OF CREDITORS OF JOSEPH BARRETTO AND SONS.

There was a Meeting of the Creditors of Joseph Barretto and Sons on the 10th March, at the office of Messrs. Hedger and Smalley, for the purpose of appointing a new Trustee in substitution for Mr. Melville, whose ill-health obliges him to go to England; and it was unanimously agreed to request Messrs. Brightman and Co. to accept the Trust, with a commission of two and a half per cent. upon the amount of the dividends to cover all expenses except the law charges. Mr. J. D. Brightman, on the part of his firm, assented to the arrangement.

A statement was produced showing that there were assets now available—in cash Rs 2,478 3, Company's 4 per cent. Paper 79,000—besides arrears of rent due by Messrs. Currie and Co. on the Howrah Docks 18,746-10-8, and a dividend of 10 per cent. about to be paid by the Assignees of Fergusson and Co. which firm was indebted to the Trustees of Jos. Barretto and Sons, Rs 2,52,324-4-10; and the sale price of the Howrah Docks sold in November last, to Messrs. Currie and Co. for Rs 2,05,000, the first instalment of which Rs 24,000 is now over-due and under arrangement with the purchasers. The books of Barretto and Sons contain claims against various persons to the extent of some eighty lakhs of Rs, which are all now regarded as desperate, and we understand the only good asset of any consequence in addition to those we have enumerated, is a debt of about 20,000 Rs due by a Persian Merchant here for some transaction with the Trustees. In round numbers, we may estimate the net sum likely to be realized for division at about four lakhs. Per contra, the registered claims amount to about 13 lakhs; but among them there are specialty creditors to the extent of 4 or 5 lakhs otherwise provided for, and the amount also includes a Judgment debt of between 6 and 7 lakhs represented by the Firm of DeSouza and Co. for which they have elected to come upon the separate estate of old Barretto, in the first instance; so that the joint estate of the firm will only have to pay a dividend upon the balance of that claim if not satisfied in full by his separate estate. Hence it follows, that the debts at present entitled to dividend are under four lakhs.

It was resolved that Messrs. Brightman and Co. should make an immediate dividend of the assets now available, if upon inquiry no legal impediment should be found to exist arising out of the suit of Messrs. DeSouza and Co.—Calcutta Courier.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Medical and Physical Society, held at the Asiatic Society's Apartments, March 7th, 1835.

Before commencing the regular business, the Secretary intimated to the meeting, that from the high gratification he had experienced in witnessing the experiments performed by Dr. Tytler in Electro-Dynamics or Magnetic Science before the Medical Board, he felt anxious that the Members of the Society should enjoy a similar pleasure; that he had accordingly proposed to Dr. Tytler to deliver a lecture to the Society on the subject, should the Members desire it, to which that gentleman had kindly consented.

The proposal was cordially agreed to, and an extra meeting for the purpose was called for on Tuesday evening the 10th instant.

John Allan, Esq., M. D., Surgeon, 10th Regiment N. I., was elected a Member of the Society.

The following gentlemen were proposed as Members of the Society. H. Chapman, Esq, Assistant-Surgeon to the Right Honorable the Governor General's Body Guard, by Mr. Bramley and Mr. Hutchinson; William Griffith, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon Madras Establishment, by Dr. Wallich and Mr. Twining.

R. C. MacConnochie, Esq., and J. W. Knight, Esq., Assistant-Surgeons Bengal Establishment, by Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Egerton.

Letters were read from Messrs. Beckwith and Co. and Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. the Society's Agents at Bombay and Madras, forwarding their accounts current for the past year, the former exhibiting a balance in the Society's favor of Sicca Rupees 349-2—(a hoondee for which sum has been received) and the latter a balance of Madras Rupees 740-13-3—which Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. have been requested to remit at their convenience.

A farther communication on the Liquor Lyttæ from D. S. Young, Esq., of His Highness the Nizam's Service to the address of the Medical Board of Madras, was presented by the Medical Board of Bengal, and read to the meeting. Much of Dr. Young's account of this admirable remedy has already been communicated to the Members of the Society. The principal advantages which it possesses over the common Emplastrum Lyttæ are the rapidity and exactness with which vesication can be produced by it, the little irritation which it occasions, the little room it occupies in the medicine chest, its retaining its powers for a comparatively long period, and its being applicable to the most uneven surfaces. It appears, that in 1832, Dr. Young received from Mr. Snowdon of the Haymarket a few ounces of the Liquor Lyttæ with the following memorandum—"The Liquor Lyttæ is an Aceto, spirituous tincture of cantharides, and will be found to be a good substitute for a common blister. There was no formula for its preparation sent, but Dr. Young succeeded in making it. The following is the process adopted by him.

Take of concentrated acetic acid nine ounces.

Rectified spirit three ounces.

Spanish flies four ounces.

The Spanish flies to be coarsely pounded and put into a wide mouthed glass stoppered bottle, when the acetic acid and rectified spirit are to be added. Let the whole digest for five days exposed to the sun, be then strained through flannel and preserved for use. The quantity of the "Liquor" will be about eight ounces. The following Dr. Young conceives is the modus operandi of the Medicine. "The immediate efflorescence of the skin is in all probability produced by the acetic acid, and a highly inflamed surface is thus presented to the action of the Cantharides by which its operation as a vesicatory is expedited."

The Liquor Lyttæ is now prepared at the H. C.'s Dispensary of a quality not inferior to that made by Dr. Young himself.

The following Chemical and Pharmacentical preparations were laid before the Society by the Medical Board, viz.

A quantity of Caoutchoucine, a liquid substance, said to be of a highly inflammable nature, obtained from Caoutchouc or common Indian Rubber. Specimens of the Liquor Lyttæ, prepared by Dr. Young, and at the H. C.'s Dispensary.

FOR THE LIBRARY.

Memoirs of the Life and Medical opinions of John Armstrong, M. D., with an inquiry into facts connected with Marsh Fever, by F. Boot, M. D., presented by the author, through the Vice-President Dr. Wallich.

FOR THE MUSEUM.

Specimens of Phosphate of Lime taken from the Mesentery of a subject that died of Chronic Gastro-Enterites, by Wm. Twining, Esq.

The following original communications were presented at the Meeting, viz.

1. Observations on the climate and diseases of the new Colony of Western Australia, more especially of the Swan-River District, with a brief account of the settlers, natives, soil, productions, &c. by Wm. Milligan, Esq., M. D., Assistant Surgeon H. M.'s 63d Regiment.

2. Additional report of cases of cataract and artificial pupil operated on by F. H. Brett, Esq.

3. Additional catalogue of cases of lithotomy on natives of India, by F. H. Brett, Esq.

4. Farther observations on the prevalence of dracunculus as connected with geological formation, by C. Morehead, Esq., M. D., Bombay establishment.

5. A fatal case of fracture with depression, drawn up by Thos. Oxley, Esq., A. B., Assistant-Surgeon, at Singapore.

6. A fatal case of rupture of the spleen, drawn up by Thos. Leckie, Esq., Assistant-Surgeon, 4th Battalion Artillery, Dum-Dum.

The two last communications were presented by the Medical Board.

The following papers were then read and dicussed. —viz.

Five cases of blindness, one congenital and four from early infancy, successfully treated by operation by F. H. Brett, Esq.

Account of three cases of disease of the femoral veins, by J. Mouat, M. D., Surgeon H. M.'s 13th Light Dragoons.

Case of ulcerated stricture of the asophagus communicating with the trachea, by A. K. Lindesay, Esq., officiating Garrison Surgeon Chunar.

Mr. Brett's first case occurred in a native lad 16 years of age, who had no recollection of ever having seen; although his relations would not appear to have become aware of his blindness, till he was six months of age. The eye balls rolled excessively, as is usual in similar cases. On the 27th of November, the right eye was operated on in the usual manner, and the cataract depressed to the bottom of the vitreous humour. On the 29th not the slightest inflammation had occurred. The cataract had risen so as to appear behind the inferior half of the pupil, dancing behind it, whenever he moved his eye, but without injuring the Iris. Nothing further was done till the 3d of December, when on examination the eye was found in the same state, the cataract remaining unaltered. Mr. Brett then adopted the following expedient, which he hopes will be attended with great success in all cases of old congenital cataracts. He seated the patient before him, as in the operation for extraction of the cataract. The pupil having been previously dilated by belladonna, an incision was made with a sharp pointed lancet through the sclerotica, about a line from the union of it with the cornea, to the extent of full one line and a half, midway between the external canthus and the lower part of the eye, and a delicate sharp pointed hook introduced. The cataract was seized and withdrawn, and only a slight degree of a vascularity near the wound was the consequence. The same independence of each other, or want of concord between the senses of sight and touch was remarked in this case as in Mr. Young's recorded in the proceedings of the last meeting. The second case occurred in a native aged 25, who had been blind from the age of 5 years. The cataracts were operated on in the usual manner for procuring absorption. The operation was successfull on the left, but the right eye became amaurotic after rather a smart attack of inflammation. The case is considered principally remarkable as showing the aptitude of the optic nerve to resume its functions, after having remained for so long a period, as twenty years in a dormant state. In the third case Mr. Brett performed the operation for an artificial pupil. The boy was 12 years old, and had been blind from the age of 3 weeks. He had lost his sight from neglected inflammation and ulceration of the cornea of both eyes, leaving two dense opacities. There was a small transparent semi-lunar portion of the cornea opposite the external canthus of the left eye, behind which the Iris was observed in a healthy state. A small sharp knife was introduced about a line from the cornea, and an opening made in the Iris, after which he saw immediately. The discrepancy before noticed between the impression of the senses of sight and touch was likewise observed in this case. The subject of the fourth case was a boy who had lost his sight from opacity of the cornea from small-pox at the age of five years. The circumference of the cornea was clear to the breadth of half a line all round and to the extent of two lines at the external inferior portion. An incision was made in the cornea close to its junction with the sclerotica, the Iris protruded, it was seized and a small portion cut off by means of the curved scissors, and the boy saw immediately. In the fifth case there is nothing particulary calling for remark. The operation for the extraction of the congential cataract through the sclerotica appears to Mr. Brett very practicable and worthy of attention, of course, it is only applicable where the capsule is thickened and unyielding, as in all advanced cases of the disease.

Dr. Mouat's first case of disease of the femoral veins occurred in a Dragoon 33 years of age and 14 years in India. His general health was indifferent; being dyspetic, subject to attacks of fever and dysentery, and the feet occasionally becoming odematous; he was not however confined to bed till the 15th September, when he experienced acute pain of the right lower extremity extending from the thigh to the ankle, with soreness and hardness along the course of the femoral vessels. The pain was relieved by leeches and fomentations. On the 17th he complained of pain in the opposite extremity, from the iliac region to the knee accompanied with fever, cold perspirations, restlessness and great weakness. On the 19 h the vessels of the right extremity were sore and hard; while those of the left were soft and without pain. From this period he continued tolerably easy, but excessively weak till the night of the 24th, when the pain returned with great violence in the left extremity, accompanied with difficulty of breathing, cold perspirations and feeble irregular pulse. The man died at 1 o'clock A. M. in great agony. On dissection the common iliac vein of the left side was found filled with a firm coagulum extending into the internal iliac, and likewise the external iliac and crural veins, as far as the ham where it terminated gradually. The upper part of the coagulum terminated abruptly at the junction of the two iliac veins, where it was firm, of a cream color and adhering to the internal coat of the vein, which was tinged red. The veins were much distended and the situation of the valves had a puffed and dark appearance. The vessels of the right side were healthy. The lower extremities were both alike odematous. The second case was not very unlike the first, but was proceeded and accompanied by much more severe symptoms of constitutional irritation, affecting more particularly the thoracic an abdominal viscera. On the 25th of November, he first began to complain of the local affection of the left lower extremity, continued to increase, accompanied with hardness and soreness of the femoral vessels, glossy swelling tension of the limb generally, till the 8th of December, when the patient died. On dissection disorganization of the femoral vessels was found similar to that already recorded; but still more extensive. The third case was one of phlegmsia dolens, it occurred in a lady and likewise proved fatal. There was considerable similitude in the symptoms to those in the previous cases, and Dr. Mouat is inclined to think, that their diseases have more or less affinity to each other; if they be not one and the same. It will be in the recollection of the reader, that a case similar to those detailed, is recorded by Mr. Boswell of Penang in the 6th vol. of the Society's Transactions.

Mr. Lindsay's case of structure of the osophagus occurred in a pensioner at Chunar aged 55 years, of moderately temperate habits. During the month of June, 1833, he had fallen while tipsy, and felt as if he had struck on a sharp hard body. From that time he had had slight pain in the upper part of the right side of the thorax, and gradually lost the power of swallowing. The smallest tube of a stomach pomp could be passed into the stomach, but gave a feeling of resistance for an inch or so, opposite to the top of the sternum, and on withdrawal was found smeered with thick puriform mucas, streaked with blood. About the beginning of September, after two unsuccessful attempts, an elastic catheter was made to pass, and through it a weak solution of nitrate of silver was applied, by means of a small piece of sponge fixed to the stilette. No decided advantage followed; for though the tube passed with less difficulty, he could not swallow more easily, and could only use liquids. About the beginning of October, he was much in the same state. Liquids were returned, if sucked too hastily. A piece of gut was at the time passed on a catheter, and afterwards inflated, so as to cause dilatation. In the farther progress of the disease, difficulty was experienced in passing the instrument before reaching the former seat of stricture: towards the end of November, a catheter was introduced into the strictured portion, but not beyond. A little water was injected to relieve thirst, but it was blown back with much coughing and spitting of bloody mucas; so that there was evidently a communication between the traches and osophagus. He was now supported in a great measure by nutritive enemata, the tube was afterwards more easily introduced, and about the beginning of December, the fœter is described as being most offensive. On the 14th he died, having for some days before vomited every thing which was given him. The appearances on dissection were such as might have been expected. An opening about the size of a shilling was found between the trachea and osophagus about midway between the creceid cartilage and the bifurcation; opposite the latter, the osophagus internally was found thickened and ulcerated in its whole circumference, for at least four inches. It was covered by thick pus, and was very irregular in its surface, there being several pale lumpy projections, which felt rough and cartilaginous. The canal above the aperture was much more capacious than below; but even downwards the little finger could easily be made to pass.

In consequence of an application from Dr. J. Clarke, of London, the Society are particularly desirous of obtaining information relative to the effects of the climate of the different districts of India on persons predisposed to tuburculous phthisis, or labouring under the early stages of that disease; in regard to the progress of the disease in the native constitution, and the remedies which the natives of this country have recourse to for its treatment.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The Agricultural and Horticultural Society met on the 13th March, to approve of the draft of an Address prepared by Mr. Minchin and Dr. Strong. The Chair was filled by the President of the Society, Sir Edward Ryan, and there were twenty-six Members present, a larger number than we had ever seen assembled before.

The Chairman, in stating the object of the Meeting, regretted that the Address had necessarily been drawn up in a hasty manner. He observed that on the present occasion they had nothing to do with the merits of Lord William Bentinck as a Governor General: they were only to consider what he had done to promote the objects of this Institution. And every member of it must feel that he had promoted them very liberally, both with the public money and by the measures he had advocated. Sir Edward particularly adverted to the experiments in the garden at Acra for the improvement, more especially, of the cotton staple, and expressed his conviction of their partial success, and that hereafter this would appear in the improved qualities of cotton that would be produced in India. To Lord William Bentinck we were indebted for preliminary steps towards the abolition of the Transit Duties, which he (Sir Edward Ryan) considered a most serious bar to the agricultural prosperity of the country. When these should have been removed, and the sugars of India should be put upon the same footing as those of Mauritius and the West Indies in the home market, which he hoped would soon take place, he doubted not that both cotton and sugar would become very important articles in our export trade. Sir Edward proceeded to notice other ways in which the measures of the Governor General had promoted the interests of agriculture, not forgetting what he had done for inland Steam Navigation and to improve the roads and canals of the country. The Chairman then read the Address, which was adopted with two or three amendments and additions suggested by Mr. Pattle and Mr. C. K. Robison. One of these had for object to make more particularly the liberality of the grant of money for the Acra Garden experiments; another to give due credit to his Lordship for having originated the Tea Commission. The former, if meant to allude to the 20,000 Rupees granted by Government for premiums on cotton and tobacco, was rather unhappily dwelt upon; for the money was all lost by having very unnecessarily been placed in the house of Alexander and Co. in anticipation of prizes not claimable before a distant period. The latter, we understand, was entirely a measure of his Lordship.

It was resolved that the Address, when amended, should be drawn up on parchment, and signed and presented by Sir Edward Ryan as president of the Society.—Calcutta Courier.

FAREWELL ADDRESSES TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD W. BENTINCK.

[FROM THE MERCHANTS AND OTHERS.]

To the Right Honorable Lord W. C. Bentinck, G. C. B. and G. C. H., Governor General of India.

My Lord,—As the hour is at hand when you purpose, on account of impaired health, to resign your high office and to quit for ever this country which you have now governed for nearly seven years, we the undersigned Merchants, Agents, Planters, and others of the classes more particularly concerned in production and commerce, desire to offer your Lordship the respectful expression of our profound regret at the loss which we are about to sustain in your departure, and our sincere sorrow for its distressing cause. We feel ourselves impelled by a strong sense of duty to your Lordship, and to that portion at least of the community, whom we may be said in some sense to represent, in thus presenting ourselves to contribute our humble testimony in approval of numerous measures completed or in preparation, having for their object the general improvement of the country, the moral and social advancement of its vast and various population, and the development in particular of its commercial and agricultural resources. For much good that has been accomplished, we return your Lordship our sincere and grateful thanks: for much that remains to be done by your successors, we shall not be the less grateful to them, because we may have to ascribe a share of their merit to your example, and to the tone in the public councils, which you will leave behind you.

In many respects your Lordship's administration has necessarily been of a character widely different from those of your predecessors Theirs were the more brilliant days of War and Diplomacy, and profuse expenditure. To you the task has fallen, more homely, not less useful, but often more painful of consolidating, preserving and organizing, of repairing the deep wounds in the public finances, of contending with an alarming deficit, and of enforcing the remedy of severe economy and retrenchment. The period of your Lordship's Government has been marked in a most distressing manner by mercantile disaster, to a degree and amount passing all previous experience in India. That fearful crisis has now passed over; but it is not to be forgotten, that while in the beginning of panic, the impending calamities appeared to be within the reach of prevention by timely assistance, that assistance was liberally afforded by your Lordship; among the measures affected or designed for the advancement of the country and the development of its capabilities we gratefully enumerate.

Your liberal views regarding Colonization, and the free ingress and unlicensed and unmolested settlement of Europeans with the right to hold lands; satisfied as we are, that to your earnest advocacy of those great measures for the improvement of India, and to the publicity with which you were not afraid to conduct that discussion, the country owes those great and salutary enactments.

To the perseverance and ardour with which Steam Navigation has been recommended and encouraged in all its branches, external and internal, we are indebted, that at length the subject has been cordially taken up by Parliament and the Home Executive Authorities on your Lordship's representations.

The treaties by which the Navigation of the Indus, and its tributaries has been thrown open for the first time to the adventurous trader, and the jealousies of the foreign powers along its course soothed into co-operation with that great design, we consider to be in a particular manner your Lordship's work, and we confidently expect that these beginnings will ripen with time and prudence into results beneficial to commerce and its concomitant civilization.

In the enlightened spirit we hope your Lordship has planned the liberation of domestic trade and intercourse throughout the British Indian dominions, from the barbarous and antiquated shackles of transit duties, and other internal taxation. We trust to see the benevolent design speedily carried into execution, and we acknowledge with thanks the indications of such intention in the facilities already granted to the transit of our great staple—Indigo—to this metropolis from the interior. We acknowledge further the relaxation practically allowed by your Lordship's Government in regard to the Calcutta Stamp Duties, a tax so distasteful to the Inhabitants from the circumstances under which it was imposed and its impolitic and vexatious pressure on a languishing commerce. We have seen with satisfaction the disposition evinced to encourage municipal improvement among us, and approaches to self-government, and to institutions akin to those of the mother country. In this description we include the Chamber of Commerce, the Trade Association, the contemplated advancement of Native Gentlemen to the office of Justices of the Peace, suggested improvements in conservancy details, patronage extended to Central and District Charitable Societies, the institution of Saving's Banks, and the endeavours to improve the Health of the City, and reclaim unproductive wastes, by a system of drainage applied to the Eastern Marshes and Salt Lake, in connection with the new canal which now with its durable suspension bridges has been drawn round Calcutta from the Hoogly connecting it with the navigation by the Sunderbunds.

The attention which your Lordship has bestowed on the internal communication of the country generally deserve our particular acknowledgments. The formation of the new trunk road through the Doonb, the arduous construction of a solid and magnificent road from the great western Mart of Mirzapore along the main line of traffic to the south and west. The preparatory surveys for connecting the Ganges with Bhugrutty, by a grand canal which shall maintain the communication in the driest seasons—all these we regard as proofs of that real solicitude for the improvement of the country, which we were led to anticipate from the promise held out by your Lordship's early declaration of your desire to receive suggestions and information, by your constant personal accessibility to all ranks, and by your uniform encouragement of that freedom in discussion through the Press, which your immediate predecessors had so strangely feared and so unwisely proscribed.

We have gone into an enumeration of some of the benefits conferred by your Lordship on the country we inhabit, because we would not have it seem that we are carrying up a mere complimentary address to your Lordship, and are therefore anxious to put on record the substantial reasons which have led us now to offer our unfeigned acknowledgements for the benefits which have either been conferred or contemplated by you, and our most sincere wishes for the restoration of your Lordship's health and for your future happiness and prosperity.

Gentlemen,—I am greatly flattered by your Address. To have the stamp of usefulness thus fixed upon the past administration by a body of men so respectable, intelligent and eminently practical, must be as gratifying to those with whom I have had the good fortune to be so long associated in the Government as to myself.

You have adverted to the altered circumstances of my time from that of my predecessor. To their more able hands was fortunately committed the conquest and formation of an empire which I hope and believe is destined to confer an unexampled portion of happiness upon its long oppressed population. It has, on the contrary, been my unfortunate and painful lot, as it must continue to be that of my successors, to have to repair the financial distress occasioned by preceding wars. It has been my task to reduce the expenditure within the income, which I am sorry to say has not been accomplished. It will be theirs to relieve the country from many burthens which press heavily upon industry, and seriously retard the public prosperity.

With respect to the reforms and improvement to which you refer, I trust a beginning has been made which will lead to the realization of the same advantages that exist in other parts of the civilized world. It must be admitted that public opinion has done much to stimulate to these acts of public usefulness; but at the same time, part as we are, though inferior and dependent, of that administration which has conducted the Government of the mother country for the last four years, it would have been the grossest dereliction of public duty, if regardless of their example we had failed to use our utmost endeavours to place all our institutions on the most efficient and satisfactory footing, and to win for the crown the good will and regard of our native subjects.

I willingly turn from topics too personal to myself to other more useful and interesting. Taking this last leave (in India only I hope) of the steam question, I cannot but rejoice in the entire success of the inland navigation. The home authorities met our recommendation with a promptitude and completeness of execution which demands our warmest thanks. The communication with Europe has not been equally successful. Greater difficulties surround it. We all lament the resolution to adopt the line of the Euphrates. If there were no obstacles in the channel of the river, or in the state of the surrounding countries, the difficulties of maintaining steam machinery in a state of efficiency, even with the command of the naval establishment, the foundaries and skill of Calcutta, has been too often brought to our notice, not to create a lively apprehension, for the success of an experiment wholly deprived of these indispensable aids. The provision also of a sufficient number of engineers is a source of great expense and of constant disappointment.

But an efficient marine steam establishment in India is called for by considerations more powerful even than those of commercial advantage, or improved political control. It would multiply, in a ratio little understood, the defensive means of the empire. Let me advert to an event, the particulars of which are within your recollection—the Burmese War. If five powerful steamers had then been at our command to bring up in quick succession all necessary reinforcements and supplies, the war would probably have terminated in a few months, and many millions of treasure, many thousands of lives, and extraordinary misery and sickness would have been spared. Allow me to submit another estimate of advantage, of the correctness of which you all can likewise judge. The proper station for the principal reserve of our European Troops in India is at Bangalore—Madras the place of embarkation. In a few days at any period of the monsoons, the same five steamers would carry this force to the most distant part of the shores of the Empire. In five weeks, with the aid of the River Steamers, this reserve would reach Allahadad, the most centrical point of our territories, and one of our most commanding positions. The same steam power that would enable us to baffle any invader in war would be ample in time of peace to carry into complete execution the whole plan of the Bengal Steam Committee, for which I continue to be a decided advocate.

I cannot refrain from noticing the Chamber of Commerce as a valuable addition to our institutions. The want of a body so constituted has long been felt, in order to place the commercial and shipping Regulations of the Port on the most improved footing. The Pilot service and the Steam Tug establishment demand particular attention. The first is very expensive, inadequate to the increasing intercourse of the Port, and susceptible of being made more satisfactory to the individuals concerned. The latter so necessary to the quick despatch and safety of vessels through their difficult and dangerous navigation to the Sea, is lamentably defective. The service has latterly fallen exclusively upon the Government steamers, but it more properly belongs to private speculation. The Government I am confident would gladly retire from all interference with it, and I think should do so at the earliest period.

And now permit me to bid you farewell, repeating my deep sense of your kindness and offering my ardent wishes for your happiness and success. I do not think I am deceived in my expectations of the immense benefit to commerce that are likely to accrue from the general opening of the trade. The great China Wall must crumble to dust before the peaceful attacks of British commercial enterprize—a free communication and interchange of products between these two vast countries must inevitably follow—and I hail with pleasing anticipation the certain prospect that Calcutta, already great and flourishing, must attain to a degree of eminence and wealth that will place her in a rank with the greatest emporiums of trade in the world. God grant that these advantages may quickly and largely pour in upon her and that you may all share in her increased prosperity.

[FROM THE NATIVE COMMUNITY.]

To the Right Honorable Lord W. C. Bentinck, G. C. B. and G. C. H., Governor-General of India.

My Lord,—In anticipation of your Lordship's early departure to Europe, we approach your Lordship to express our sorrow for the intended withdrawal of your presence from amongst us, and for the impaired state of health which renders that step necessary,—our veneration for your person and character,—and our gratitude for the enlarged spirit of justice and benevolence with which the natives of this country have been treated under your Lordship's administration.

Situated as the natives are and constituted as is the Government under which they live, every change of the person at its head is regarded by them with a mingled feeling of hope and apprehension. When the reins of power were entrusted to your Lordship's hands, you did not leave us long in doubt, that in you we had found a Ruler who would consult the welfare of the subject,—a Friend, a Protector, and a Benefactor.

We now look back on the measures of your Lordship's administration immediately affecting the position and prospects of natives, and we discover a uniform, consistent, and sustained endeavour to improve their condition and to elevate their character. These purposes have been wisely and benevolently sought by opening to natives places of greater trust and emolument, and thus setting before them new objects of ambition long before the late act nominally abolished disabilities by reason of religion, place of birth, descent, or colour; by introducing the trial of jury into the administration of justice by the Company's Courts, thus both creating a duty and establishing a right which tend to infuse a sense of public justice and a portion of public spirit into the mass of native society; by abolishing ignominious modes of punishment to which natives were subjected, and which both tended to perpetuate their degradation, and afforded occasion for new and enormous abuses; by establishing a regulated check throughout every branch of the public service to secure a just and considerate treatment of natives from the officers of Government; by discouraging arbitrary and invidious usages, expressing and exciting mutual disrespect and distrust between Europeans and natives; by encouraging every effort which natives have made for their own amelioration, and for the extension of education among their countrymen; and finally by promoting free and friendly intercourse with natives.

We do not affirm that your Lordship has left nothing for your successor, with better health, with enlarged powers, with an explicit declaration of the Imperial Legislature in our favor, and with the co-operation of the authorities in England, to accomplish. But in the actual measures and in the spirit of your Lordship's Government, we see a sincere, benevolent, and persevering regard for the advancement of our country and the happiness of our countrymen. Under your Lordship's paternal administration a new era has dawned upon us, tending to establish a community of feeling and an identity of interests between races separated by almost every conceivable circumstance of alienation and united only under the same political Government and in allegiance to the same Crown. Your Lordship has first taught us to forget the distinction between conquerors and conquered, and to become in heart and mind, in hopes and aspirations, one with Englishmen. We ardently desire to cherish these feelings. We trust they will descend to our children and to our children's children. And when the high destinies, which as a people we may be permitted to anticipate in union with a great and a wise nation, are in progress of accomplishment and actually fulfilled, the name of Lord William Bentinck will be fondly remembered as that of the Friend of the Natives of India.

My Lord, this language is not the flattering tribute of servility. It is not the offering either of hope or fear to rank and to power. We feel our obligations to your Lordship more deeply than our language can convey, and our feeble thanks are the expression of heartfelt gratitude, not for personal favours to ourselves individually, which most of us have never received, but for the enlightened policy and the just liberality with which the great common interests of our country and our race have been invariably pursuedby your Lordship.

Accept, my Lord, of our ardent good wishes for your Lordship! In your native land, amid the esteem and respect of your friends and countrymen, may the evening of your Lordship's days be crowned with an abundant measure of private happiness and public usefulness.

[LORD WM. BENTINCK'S REPLY.]

The extremes kindnes of your address towards myself— the cordial spirit of brotherhood that it breathes towards my native country, specially entitle me to salute you as affectionate friends and brethren.

You alone can accurately judge of the effects of our administration; you best can decide upon its failure or success; and your gratifying testimony upon this occasion encourages me to hope that we have not lost sight of the great end and purposes of British Government in India, as laid down for our guidance by the Legislature and the Home Authorities, and so eloquently and justly described in your address to be these,—" to establish a community of feeling and of interest between races separate by almost every conceivable circumstances of alienation,—to efface all distinction between conquerors and conquered,—and to make all in heart and mind, in hopes and aspirations, one with Englishmen." It is the consummation of this great truth, that is to be devoutly prayed for. This foundation once solidly laid, the greatness and honor of Britian, the happiness, prosperity and independence of India can never be impaired.

But it would ill become me, in my position, to conceal the unpleasant fact, that during my course I have seen too much of this conqueror spirit, of the pride of domination, of the abuse of power, and of the too general oppression of the strong over the weak, to be able to pronounce that this wished for time is arrived. These evils still require the strong hand of authority to put them down,—the establishment of a more simple code of laws, and what is of great importance, a more efficacious administration of them. But the dawn of that day, under other influences than ours, has long appeared and the day itself is rapidly advancing. The same spirit of enlightened and benevolent improvement which is reforming the European world, has established its powerful sway over India, and even the present generation may, I hope, live to see more than a partial realization of those blessings which the dispensation of a kind Providence seems to have intended for India, when she permitted her almost miraculous union with a nation, the most distant from her, but alone by her insular situation, her mighty power, and liberal institutions to perform effectually towards her the joint offices of guardianship and of regeneration.

I have read with peculiar satisfaction in your address, large expression of approbation passed by those best able to form a judgment upon the measure of the Government abolishing corporal punishment from the native Penal Code. I am glad to see the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Council, confirmed by your own greater knowledge of the character of your countrymen, viz. " That this ignominous punishment tended to perpetuate the degradation of the natives, and afforded occasion for new and enormous abuses." We all believed further in its uselessness, either to check crime or to reform the offender. It may be of advantage to state, that the Council consisted at that time, of Sir C. Metcalfe, Messrs. Blunt and Ross—names to which deference and respect are particularly due, and that their conviction long previously formed, and resulted from their great experince in the judicial and every other branch of the Indian administration.

But the subject of the highest congratulation with all those whose hearts are with India, is that enactment of the Legislature, which, in harmony with the injunctions of the Home Authorities for the more extensive employment of native agency, has abolished all distinction in respect to eligibility for office. This measure is as wise as it is just, for there can be really no good government till the spirit of it is brought into full operation. The two races are indispensable to each other, the labours of each are imperfect without the aid of the other. The European brings to India his higher education, his superior knowledge, his greater energy, and his active valour. The native contributes the collective talents of his vast numbers, his local information and sympathies,—his aptitude for business, his subordination and patient courage. The most complete administrative system ought to be created out of this union of various merits. But to arrive at this end, it is necessary on your part to advance the elevation of the native mind and character to the highest possible standard of perfection, while the ruling authority on theirs must give the utmost encouragement to the attainment of the necessary qualifications by throwing wide open the doors to distinction, and by granting a full participation in all the honors and emoluments of the state.

I will now conclude. I part from you with sincere regret. I should most willingly have devoted a further portion of my life to your service, but it has been otherwise ruled; and it only remains for me to bid you a most affectionate farewell.

To His Excellency the Right Honorable Lord William Cavendish Bentinck, G. C. B. and G. C. H., Governor General of India, &c. &c. &c.

My Lord,—We cannot allow your Lordship to quit the shores of India, and the communications to cease which we have had with you in the important matter of intercourse by Steam between India and England without expressing, in the strongest terms, our sense of the gratitude which is due to your Lordship for your exertions in the cause, not only from all India, but from all at home in any way connected with this highly interesting and valuable portion of the British Empire.

On the part of our constituents, the Subscribers to the New Bengal Steam Fund, we beg to render to your Lordship our thanks for the uniform countenance and support afforded to the objects to which they devoted their subscriptions—and if one of these objects has not been obtained, we hope that the other, which also under your Lordship's patronage has been made a matter for the consideration of the authorities at home, may continue ro receive on your arrival in England your Lordship's strenuous advocacy, and that ere long we may have to report to our constituents, that your Lordship's endeavours for the final accomplishment of their wishes has been crowned with success.

With every earnest wish for your Lordship's restoration to health, and the continued enjoyment of every happiness, we have the honor, my Lord, to be your Lordship's most obedient, humble and obliged Servants, (Signed) BY THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE.

Barrackpore, March 4, 1835.

Gentlemen.—Accept my best thanks for your kind expressions of regard.

I have been a zealous supporter of the cause of Steam Communication with Europe, from the strongest conviction, confirmed by every day's further reflection, of its real importance to innumerable interest both national and commercial.

I cannot command the opportunity of forwarding its future success; but if within my reach, you may depend upon the exertion of my most earnest efforts to promote its progress, and to obtain for India an advantage so great in all its direct and indirect consequences that in my opinion it would be cheaply bought at any price.

In the early part of next week I shall request an interview with a deputation of your Committee for the purpose of receiving some information respecting the execution of the Committee's plans, which it may be useful hereafter that I should possess.

I remain, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

W. C. BENTINCK.

[FROM THE MEMBERS OF THE TRADE ASSOCIATION.]

To the Right Honorable Lord William C. Bentinck, G. C. B. Governor-General of India., &c. &c. &c.

May it please your Lordship,—Impressed, as we are, with the loss which this country must sustain by your Lordship's departure and resignation of your high office, we cannot allow so important an event to take place without expressing our humble, but sincere regret, that the state of your Lordship's health should have rendered it necessary.

When we consider the advantages which the liberal and enlightened policy pursued by your Lordship has bestowed on this country, and the encouragement which has been steadily and openly held out to the industrious mechanic, as well as the man of science, we cannot as Tradesmen but feel great satisfaction in looking back to the past years of your Lordship's administration.

The countenance we have received at your Lordship's hands, in our endeavours as a body, to make ourselves useful in protecting the interests of the Calcutta Trades and promoting the comfort and security of the inhabitants of this metropolis, will operate as a stimulus to still greater exertions; and while we express our gratitude for several encouraging marks of your Lordship's approbation of the past, we trust that no future act of the Trade Association will render us unworthy of your Lordship's good opinion.

We will not dwell on the political acts of your Lordship's government, that being a subject beyond our province, but we cannot allow the present opportunity to pass away without adverting to the encouragement which has been held out for the diffusion of education over the hitherto neglected region of British India—a policy which cannot fail to benefit all classes of subjects, and for the adoption of which the natives of this country especially, must ever regard your Lordship as their greatest benefactor.

We trust, that your Lordship will long live to witness the good effects of a system, which could only have emanated from a benevolent and exalted mind, and hope that you may enjoy, in another country, a complete renovation of health, and be long spared to aid with your influence and talents the advancement of the happiness of the people of this vast dependency of the British crown, by a continuance of that enlightened and liberal policy which has peculiarly distinguished your Lordship's administration.

We have the honor to subscribe ourselves, your Lordship's most obedient humble servants, by unanimous vote of the members.

A. ROGERS, Master of the Association.

[LORD WM. BENTINCK'S REPLY.]

I thank you sincerely for your Address. Your kind interest in my welfare—your favourable opinion of my humble endeavours to promote the good of the community, convey a gratification, that it is easier to feel than to express.

Your association had, from its commencement, my best wishes for its success. The state of credit stood upon the most rotten footing—the fraudulent and unprincipled alone profited by it—the honest buyer and seller were the victims. It was not possible for the single efforts of the most honest tradesman to overcome the practice; but the combined efforts of the whole trade have effected a thorough reform, most creditable to those, who devised and accomplished it, and most useful to the public at large.

The further direction of your attention to objects of a more public nature, and unconnected with your immediate and separate interests, is highly laudable, and deserves particular commendation. The improvements of many of the municipal arrangements of this great city can best be promoted by the inhabitants themselves. But in this rapidly changing society, large associations only can ensure permanency of system, uniformity of execution, and perseverance in carrying it on, and in incorporating with it all useful improvements.

Having been for many years a warm advocate for reform, I have contemplated with pleasure the great benefits, derived from that measure by the larger admission into the councils of the kingdom, of the intelligence and patriotism of those classes, which had previously been in a great degree excluded. A somewhat similar feeling is excited by the present transaction. It is the exaltation of a class—a new infusion of independence and usefulness, working for the benefit of all, which delights me. You represent, and worthily, the respectability, the knowledge, and enlightened principles of the same classes in our own country. Your connection with every branch of business enables you to judge, how all, separately and collectively, are affected by the public institutions, and by the measures of those who preside over them. And yours is an impartial and independent evidence, of which, if favourable, any Government would have reason to be proud—I am so—and beg to repeat through you to the community at large my grateful acknowledgments for the comfort, which the manifestation of so much kindness and good-will must impart to the remaining period of my life, whatever be my lot, health or sickness—prosperity or adversity.

[FROM THE AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF INDIA.]

To the Right Honorable Lord William Cavendish Bentinck, G. C. B. and G. C. H., Governor General of India.

My Lord,—We beg leave respectfully to express to your Lordship our deep regret at your approaching departure from this country, and that the state of your Lordship's health has unfortunately rendered it necessary. In your Lordship the Agricultural Society has always found a patron who has taken an active interest in its proceedings. During the period you have presided over the Councils of India, the support and encouragement of the Government have uniformly been afforded to all our endeavours to improve the agricultural productions of the country. To the aid which the Society has thus received the experimental farm at Ackra owed its existence. Our report of the result of the important experiments which have thus been tried, owing partly to the absence of our president, and to other circumstances over which we had no control, has not yet been forwarded to Government. We feel assured, however, that when made it will shew, that there exist good grounds for our opinion that nothing but the application of skill and capital is necessary to cause the chief agricultural products of India successfully to compete with those of America and the West Indies. We would here advert to the importation of American cotton seed which we were enabled to effect by the assistance our funds received from Government. The distribution of the seed has been general throughout India, and has, amongst the native population, excited much interest. The consequence we trust will be an encreased cultivation of cotton of a superior description. When we reflect, that it was not until after the year 1790 that cotton, now its principal staple, and the source of such vast advantage to America, was introduced into that country, it is not too much to expect, that in future years its cultivation will become a source of equal benefit to India.

The advantages to be obtained from the improvement of the agricultural productions of British India will be greatly extended when, as we confidently hope, the staples of this country shall be relieved from the restrictions which now operate to their prejudice, and which have in a great degree prevented the good effects, which it was the object of this Society to promote. We have lately forwarded to England Petitions to both Houses of Parliament, praying for an equalization of the duties on East Indian produce, with those of the West Indies and the Mauritius, and pointing out the obstacles that exist to their growth and improvement. To your Lordship it is unnecessary for us to state how important it is to the agricultural prosperity of India, that these discouragements should be removed. We would respectfully solicit your Lordship's support to the objects of our petition, confident that in you the interests of India, will always find a protector and a friend. Your Lordship is well aware, that the cultivation of the Sugarcane can be carried on in this country, to an almost unlimited extent; an object of the highest importance to its vast and impoverished population. We would on their behalf call to your Lordship's observation, that whatever claims the West India colonies, or the Mauritius might formerly have had to monopolize the supply of home market, the munificent grant lately bestowed upon them to procure the emancipation of the negro population ought now to be considered as a sufficient answer to any further consideration at the expense of the community at large.

Next to the unequal burden that is laid in the English market upon the Sugar, and some other productions of this country, we conceive that the vexatious system of restrictions upon the Indian market, which which goes by the general name of the Transit duties offers the most serious obstacle to the proper development of the agricultural resources of India, we have observed with sincere satisfaction, the preliminary measures which have been adopted by your Lordship for the removal of this grievance. Should these measures result, as we trust they will, in the abolition of the internal Custom-houses, the people of India will owe to your Lordship the boon of freedom of the home market, and will be relieved from the ruinous extortions and delays to which they are at present daily subjected on almost all the great routes of trade, and which, while they diminish to the producers the demand for his produce, cause to the consumers, that is to the whole of the people of India, a general encrease in the price of commodities.

We view with pleasure the measures adopted by your Lordship's government to improve the internal communications of this country, as another means which will indirectly tend to benefit its agricultural interests. The communication by steam with the upper provinces has been established under your Lordship's direction; and we trust that the same enlarged views which have induced the present government to plan and commence the great roads throughout the country, will be followed up by your successors.

There is another measure most ultimately connected with the objects of this society on which we cannot be silent. It is to your Lordship that we are indebted for the important inquiry that has been made whether the culture of the tea plant can be introduced into Hindostan. A Committee has been formed by Government and most active investigations have taken place with that object. In the progress of this Committee a discovery has been made, which we do not hesitate to pronounce as one of a most interesting and important nature as connected with the commercial and agricultural interests of this empire, we allude to the existence of the real and genuine tea plant of China indigenous within the Honorable Company's dominions in Upper Assam. This shrub is no longer to be looked upon as a plant of doubtful introduction, it exists already planted by the hand of nature through a vast extent of territory in Upper Assam bordering on the Chinese and Burmese provinces of Shore and Yunnan, where it is at present cultivated for its leaf both for consumption and exportation. We cannot therefore but anticipate the best results from these inquiries now, as we understand, on active operation.

We cannot conclude without requesting your Lordship to accept our sincere wishes for your restoration to health, and that your life may long be spared to enable you to pursue that path of honorable usefulness in which your Lordship has been so greatly distinguished.

(Signed) EDWARD RYAN,

On the behalf and by the direction of the Agricultural Society of India.

Eagerly devoted, for many years previous to my return to India, to agricultural pursuits, it has been a deprivation of much amusement and interest to have been debarred by my public duties from taking any part in the transactions of your Society; I have however had ample means of estimating the utility of your labours, and the zeal and ardour with which they have been prosecuted—I congratulate you at the same time upon having a President so well able by his anxious co-operation and high influence to second your endeavours to better the condition of the people in this most important branch of rural economy.

As for all the great measures of justice and policy to which you refer—the equalization of the duties upon those great products of the country that would be mutually beneficial to India and to Britain—I think we may confidently rely upon their being no longer delayed. It will however, be my duty to represent to the Home Authorities the injustice and impolicy of existing discouragements. Those in India, which have been such a dead weight upon her commercial and agricultural prosperity, are in a fair train of being very much diminished, if not totally abolished, as I hope may be the result.

It is impossible not to deplore the same defective state in the agricultural, as in every other science in this country. Look where you will—examine the whole scheme of this Indian system, and you find the same results—poverty, inferiority, degradation in every shape. For all these evils, knowledge, knowledge, knowledge is the universal cure.

It is to be hoped that the progress in European literature, will lead to those improvements in agriculture, which, during the last half century, have so much benefited the mother country. It was my intention, had I remained in India, to have proposed the establishment of small farms in the upper, centre, and lower provinces, as seminaries, or rather examples of improved modes of cultivation and cropping, and of preparing for distribution seeds and plants of the superior products. It is part of the general education in which a very small annual sum, well expended, might have been attended with inestimable advantages. The very limited establishment and means at your disposal have shewn what might be done. We must not forget that the Government is the landlord of the country—possessing both the means and knowledge of improvement, and putting all obligations of public duty aside, is the most interested in the advancement in wealth and comfort of its numerous tenantry.

I cannot refrain from bringing to the notice of the Society, the superior cart and animal in general use in the Madras Presidency. The large, high spoked wheel is every where seen, and the bullock is of a very much larger size. A very few rupees would enable the Society to expose annually for sale a small number of the former. The loss could not be great, and the experiment of a few years would shew the greater weight, which the high wheel by more easily overcoming obstacles, will draw. The inferiority of the cattle in Bengal is owing, in my opinion, to the defect in the system of cropping, which provides no artificial food for the animals during the dry season. There is a high plant at Rio Janeiro, introduced from the Coast of Africa, but the name of which I forget, that I think would be a most valuable acquisition. I brought from thence some plants with me, but the greater part perished at sea, and I have not heard what fate attended those which were transferred to the Botanical Garden in Dr. Wallich's absence.

Accept, I request, in conclusion, my very grateful acknowledgments for this very flattering mark of your consideration and regard.

My Lord,—We, whose names are affixed, the Missionaries resident in Calcutta and its vicinity, from the Societies of the Established Churches of England and Scotland, and of Protestant Dissenters, beg leave to approach your Lordship with this united expression of our high respect, and of our regret at your approaching departure from India.

The sentiments and language of political adulation, my Lord, are as far from our habitual feeling and habit as they would be derogatory to our spiritual office, and injurious to the moral interests which we subserve. To debateable matters of political science and experiment, therefore, it is neither our duty nor our desire to advert, least of all on an occasion like the present. Many things in your Lordship's administration we appreciate only in silence and enjoyment.

It is as Christian Missionaries, my Lord, that we now approach you. If the general tenor of your Lordship's administration, as well as many of its special measures in particular, have been calculated, as we firmly believe, to promote the real welfare of India, and to aid forward, whether directly or indirectly, the one great paramount object in which we individually labour, it would argue in us a culpable indifference to that object itself, or great insensibility to the means of its advancement, were we to omit thus publicly to offer the thankful expression of our respectful homage.

Education, under your Lordship's Government, has reached a standard much higher, and made a progress far greater than in any former period of the British rule in India. Measures have been introduced eminently tending to elevate the Native character, to call forth the Native mind, to excite in it the sentiment of civism, and to interest all in the progress of the common welfare:—such as the institution of Native Juries, and the appointment of Natives of talent and character to offices of greater trust and emolument in the secondary departments of justice, as preparatory to still higher advancement. Your Lordship's readiness to receive, and even forwardness to invite the contributions of individual experience, wisdom, and observation to the general stock of public happiness has been strikingly exhibited: and it is a subject of special gratification that greater security also has been given to the possessions of converts to Christianity, who had in too many instances been disturbed by private persecution or legal spoliation; but who will now, it is to be trusted, repose in tranquillity and safety under the shadow of an equal law. These, my Lord, are some of those acts and results of your Lordship's adminise tration, that, under the blessing of Almighty God, have excited, and must continue to exert the most beneficial influence on the moral and civil prosperity of British India.

The abolition of the impious and murderous rite of Suttee, by which the foul stain of blood, the blood of the innocent, victims to an unnatural, cruel and degrading superstition, has at length been wiped away from the front of a Christian Government—multitudes of hapless widows and mothers annually preserved to their helpless families and to society, and a new impulse and direction given to the domestic affections; while the greatest hitherto existing obstacle to domestic education, in which national virtue has ever its origin and cradle, has been at once and for ever removed. This measure alone, one which your Lordship had the wisdom and humanity to resolve upon, the courage and firmness to carry forward to completion, would be abundantly sufficient of itself to stamp an indelible character of benignity and mercy on your Lordship's administration, and for which millions yet unborn will venerate your Lordship's memory.

We may be permitted also to advert to the generous aid your Lordship has in so many ways given to plans and institutions of general utility. Schools of instruction, benevolent establishments, schemes of new interest and benefit, have by your Lordship's encouragement and munificence been formed, fostered, or matured—thus not only conferring the most substantial advantages on the present, but securing them to succeeding generations.

If the departure of your Lordship would, under any circumstances, be viewed by us as a subject of regret, that feeling is greatly increased by a consideration of the cause which has accelerated it, and has terminated your Government at a period when the most important changes are to be introduced,—changes which your Lordship's experience, firmness and talent would, we had hoped, have so advantageously directed to a final and successful accomplishment.

We beg your Lordship to receive our united assurance of a grateful recognition of that Divine Providence by which Kings rule and Princes decree judgment, in those beneficial results to India, to which we have adverted, and which the God of all the Kingdoms of the Earth has called and enabled you to bring about. To that same gracious power our fervent prayers are and shall be devoutly offered, for your Lordship's future health and welfare.

We will further only presume to add the strong sense we entertain of the advantages which your Lordship's excellent Lady has conferred upon the society of India, and upon those many institutions which have partaken so largely of her Ladyship's patronage. The munificence of Lady William Bentinck's charities, the amiability of her manners, and the example of her virtues, have justly endeared her in no common degree to all. Deeply do we deplore the loss to be sustained in her Ladyship's, as well as in your Lordship's departure; fervently do we unite in supplicating for her health and happiness gratefully shall we cherish the remembrance of her many excellencies.

Thankful for the kindness which we have now been permitted to approach your Lordship, we beg you to accept this expression of our sincere and most respectful sentiments and wishes, and have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's most humble and obedient Servants,

[LORD WM. BENTINCK'S REPLY.]

Gentlemen,—Returning to my country and to my friends I can present to them no testimonial so impressive as your address, that in the discharge of this great trust, I have done nothing to tarnish the national honour, or to forfeit their good opinion and esteem. Your holy profession—the excellence of your lives—the concurrence of so many individuals of different persuasions, give a value to your approbation that is indeed most gratifying. I must at the same time recollect, that it is part of that charity which you so earnestly teach and practise to think no evil, and to regard with indulgence conduct that seems to emanate from good intentions. But even your praise must not mislead me from a deep consciousness and confession of my own unworthiness, or make me forget that only in humble dependence upon the Giver of all mercies, I can hope by earnest prayer to obtain forgiveness for the unprofitable use I have made of the talents committed to my care.

I have the more reason to feel flattered by your kindness upon this occasion, in as much as it proceeds from those with whom, in their public capacity, I have carefully abstained from holding any communication. The professed object of your lives and labours is conversion. The fundamental principle of British rule—the compact to which the Government stands solemnly pledged is, strict neutrality. To this important maxim, policy, as well as good faith, have enjoined upon me the most scrupulous observance. Because besides disarming the disloyal of his most powerful means of mischief—it tends to give contentment of mind to the good, and to form into one firm bulwark of defence, the confidence and attachment of the whole population. The same maxim of strict neutrality is peculiarly applicable to the question, now so much agitated, of general education I venture to give it as my firm opinion, that in all the Schools and Colleges under the support of Government, this principle cannot be too strongly enforced, and that all interference or injudicious tampering with the religious belief of the students, and all mingling, direct or indirect of Christianity with the system of instruction, ought to be positively forbidden.

It is held I know by many, that the improvement of the human mind in India, if unaccompanied by instruction in a purer faith, is calculated to destroy that which exists, without substituting any thing in its place. One of our best and most useful Prelates, the late Bishop Turner, thought otherwise. His was an opinion in which the Moosulman, the Hindoo, and the Christians, all in fact who believe their faith to be true, ought to join—that the more the mind is enlightened, the better it will be to appreciate religions and every other truth.

There is, I understand, in England, a large class of excellent persons, who consider as a compromise, the protection afforded to the religions of the country, and would gladly induce more active interference on the part of the ruling power in the diffusion of Christianity. They may be assured that a more grievous error could not be entertained. The recollection of past ages, when conversion by whatever means, by fire and sword, if persuasion failed was the first care of the conqueror, is not obliterated from the memory or apprehensions of the people: and the greatest obstacle to the cause they espouse would be the distrust any decided intervention of the Supreme Authority would inevitably create. The extension of Episcopacy was not without objection, as involving the great principle of neutrality. Known as this great Dignity is to derive his office from the Crown, and bearing always the rank and character of one of the highest officers of the state, it is difficult for the public to see him in other capacity of Head and Patron of the Church Missionaries, without having the suspicion that the Government must have some connection with, and interesting in, their proceedings. We may rely with confidence in the exercise of the greatest caution in this respect on the part of our excellent Diocesan, but that caution is now, and will always be particularly called for.

Being as anxious as any of these excellent persons for the diffusion of Christianity through all countries, but knowing better than they do the ground we stand upon, my humble advice to them is, rely exclusively upon the humble, pious, and learned Missionary. His labours, divested of all human power, create no distrust. Encourage education with all your means. The offer of religious truth in the school of the Missionary is without objection. It is or is not accepted. If it is not, the other seeds of instruction may take root and yield a rich and abundant harvest of improvement and future benefit. I would give them as an example in support of this advice: the school founded exactly upon these principles, lately superintended by the estimable Mr. Duff, that has been attended with such unparalleled success. I would say to them finally, that they could not send to India too many labourers in the vineyard like those whom I have now the gratification of addressing.

Farewell. May God Almighty give you health and strength to prosecute your endeavours, and may He bless them with success!—Friend of India.

SUPREME COURT.

FRIDAY, MARCH 6, 1835.

JAMES HENRY JOHNSTON v. JOHN WEBSTER.

Mr. Prinsep opened the pleadings.

Mr. Advocate General.—The Court have heard that this is an action to recover damages for words spoken injurious to the plaintiff in his occupation, and it would be a waste of time if I were, before this tribunal, to dwell on the serious injury he has sustained. Indeed, I have only to state the circumstances to the Court, in order not only to be entitled to a verdict but to considerable damages unless my learned friends succeed in proving a justification. The plantiff is the controller of the whole of the Government steamers, and Captain Forbes, being superintendent of Government machinery, it might be very readily supposed that there were frequent causes for communication between these two parties. Defendant is a member of the firm of Jessop and Co., who, it was hardly necessary to say, were iron-founders in Calcutta, doing a very considerable business, and amongst which were the manufacturing and repairs of Government machinery. It happened, as it frequently did, that in August last, the plaintiff considered it his duty to go to the defendant's yard to see how some repairs were executed. In doing this I shall show that he did nothing more than his duty, and he would have been unfit for his appointment had he acted in a different manner. Mr. Webster, however, disapproved of the plaintiff's interference and frequent disputes arose with him on this subject. In August last the steamer Irrawaddy had her engines out of repair, and they were sent by Government to Mr. Jessop's manufactory; that gentleman himself was in China or in the Indian seas at the time, and his partner, Mr. Webster, had the management in his absence. In August the plantiff went to the manufactory, and observed, or thought he observed, no matter which, that the repairs to the Irrawaddy's engines were not being properly executed, and he mentioned this to Captain Forbes, who went and looked at the cylinders himself; subsequently the defendant came up to plaintiff and ordered him to leave the yard, stating that Captain Forbes had informed him that he, Mr. Webster, was mangling the cylinders. Some altercation ensued, which terminated in the plantiff leaving the yard, and shortly after he wrote to Captain Forbes asking him what could be the reason for Mr. Webster's conduct. I cannot do better than read the exact words of Captain Forbes's answer. "My dear Johnston, the communication I had with Mr. Webster, after the receipt of your first note was a verbal one, and to the effect that it certainly was necessary, as I had daily been urging, that the greatest possible care should be taken in the process of boring out the ends of the cylinders, some few of the tool lines of which I had previously observed were rather too deep. These lines I again examined with him when I mentioned the substance of your note, as far as regarded the chance of injuring the cylinders, but, so far as I remember, without mentioning the terms you had used, one of which, on referring to your note this morning, I found was 'mangling' them. Irritated at your having visited the manufactory in his absence, when, as he stated, if you had come to him direct, he could have been happy to have given any explanations wished for, he added, what I to-day told him I should consider it proper to inform you had been stated, that you had proposed to Mr. Jessop or to the firm of Jessop and Co., their allowing you a dusturi on the amount of Government work done by them; as also that previous to the departure of Mr. Jessop, you had made proposals for placing money in their house, their rejection of these proposals being apparently referred to as part of the cause of the unpleasant feeling, assuredly injurious to the progress of the government work, existing between you and them." Now whether what is meant by an offer to place money in the house would be injurious to the plaintiff's character, I do not know, nor do I know what Mr. Webster meant by the explanation either; but it is quite clear that taking dusturi is contrary to the orders of Government, and would have exposed the plaintiff to a removal from his office. It is therefore, that we seek for damages. Captain Forbes goes on to say, "whether or not you may regard these assertions worthy of refutation, or of any notice, of course rests with yourself." Of course it did rest with himself, but of course Captain Johnston could not let it rest there long, and he took the only step he could by applying to the Supreme Court for redress. My learned friends have put in Pleas of Justification without end, which, I venture to say, they will not be idle to prove, and if so, they augment the wrong already received. In any case I need not say that the Court will consider this a very serious charge, and if the justification is not proved I trust the Court will mark their opinion of the pleas by giving some compensation to the injured feelings of the plaintiff, and restore him to the world with a character which, up to this moment, has been free from reproach.

The jurisdiction was admitted, and the following witnesses were called for the plaintiff.

Captain W. N. Forbes examined by Mr. Prinsep. I am in the employ of Government, and am the superintendent of Goverement machinery. I remember having some conversation with Mr. Webster towards the end of August last, between the 25th August and the end of the month. (Exhibit. A.) This is my writing. I can now say that the conversation was on the 28th of August, and it took place in the yard of Jessop and Co. That firm had been employed by Government on the repairs of the Irrawaddy's engines. They had been employed in similar work for about six years. The repairs for the Irrawaddy were done on a prabable estimate of ~~Rs~~ 25,000. I have always considered Mr. Webster as the partner of Mr. Jessop. My office bring me into cantact with that firm, and the work was executed under my orders. (The partnership of Mr. Webster and Mr. Jessop was admitted.) The plaintiff some time ago was nominated controller of Government steam vessels, and on the 28th of August last he held that office. I remember, in a conversation with Mr. Webster, in August last, I mentioned that I had received a note from the plaintiff in which he stated that he considered one of the Irrawaddy's cylinders was in a fair way for being spoiled, and I supposed that what he referred to was some rather deep scratches in the inside of the cylinder, made by the boring tool. Those scratches having repeatedly been the subject of conversation between Mr. Webster and myself, I requested him to pay the utmost attention, and to be present himself, as frequently as possible, during the process of boring. He replied that it was impossible for him to be always present, his health being bad, but that he would put an European Assistant to watch the progress of boring; and he added that Captain Johnston had given him a great deal of annoyance for a long time, in various ways, coming about the workshop, at times when he was away, and interfering with the workmen. He said Captain Johnston had given him bad name, abusing the work of Jessop and Co. to the Marine Board, and as to his coming about the yard, he only objected to that so far as coming to the manufactory during his absence, and interfering with the men. Mr. Webster said, he was surprized that Captain Johnston went to such lengths, aware as he (Johnston) must be that they (Jessop and Co.) were up to his tricks. Then he alluded in some way that he had understood from Mr. Jessop, that Captain Johnston had proposed to put money in the house, and also that he had asked for dustari or buxis with reference to work done on Government account. I did not inform Captain Johnston of this conversation on the day on which it took place, and on the succeeding day I went on the river. On the morning following I received a note from the plaintiff requesting to know what had taken place. I received a second note before I answered the first. I informed him on the following day. (Exhibit A.) This is my reply in which I first communicated the substance of the conversation. I first heard from Mr. Webster on a Saturday morning, that there had been a 'row.'—that was the expression he used—between Captain Johnston and himself, in which they had abused each other very hard. He said he had been much annoyed, and the annoyance would not have taken place, if Captain Johnston had been allowed to put money in the house or to have a dustari;—he would not have experienced the annoyance if the house had accepted those proposals, which he understood had been offered to Mr. Jessop; and he added he was afraid he could not keep his temper with Captain Johnston. I replied that if he could not keep his temper he had better keep out of the way. I believe it was considered Captain Johnston's duty to look after the work. I understood that his duty was the same as Mr. Greenlaw's had been previously. I had received two notes from Captain Johnston before I heard of the 'row' from Mr. Webster; the latter did not tell me of the circumstance that had been the immediate occasion of the 'row,' but he said that they had abused each other, and that Captain Johnston had ordered the workmen not to continue the repairing of the Irrawady's engines. The 'row,' he said, took place near where the cylinders were, and on the Saturday morning, when I went to the yard I found no person at work at the cylinders. Mr. Webster told me that he had no objection to Captain Johnston's coming into the yards, provided he did not interfere. I am not aware that plaintiff has been excluded from the yard. Government work has continued to be done by Jessop and Co. I told Mr. Webster, that the work had been sent there by Government, and was under my superintendence, and until the Marine Board countermanded the order, the work must proceed. I thought plaintiff had been irrated. I met plaintiff who told me that Mr. Webster had abused him, and he asked me to memorialize government to remove the work from Jessop and Co. I consulted Mr. Greenlaw, as a private friend, regarding the allusions made by Mr. Webster, and the result was that I considered it fair to inform Captain Johnston, to whom I addressed a note on the Saturday. I first spoke to Mr. Greenlaw on this subject on board the Forbes; he thought it must have originated in a mistake. Shortly afterwards Mr. Webster came on board, I informed him that I had mentioned to Mr. Greenlaw the imputation regarding buxis and dusturi, and I said I considered it fair that before I mentioned the subject to Captain Johnston, he should have an opportunity of retracting words which, perhaps, he had used in a moment of irritation. Mr. Webster replied, that he had not the least objection to the subject being mentioned to Captain Johnston, for it was impossible that he could have been mistaken;—that he had heard from Mr. Jessop that some communication, in some form or ether, had been made, and that it had been rejected. I asked him if he had mentioned this subject during the 'row;' he replied, he had given him (meaning plaintiff) 'a hint.' When I came home I received a second note from Captain Johnston asking what communication had taken place between Mr. Webster and myself; I replied (exhibit A.) These are the two notes I received from the plaintiff (exhibits B. and C.) The reply is on the back of B., and A. is the reply to C. I never heard that dusturi was allowed to be taken by an officer of Government.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. This (exhibit No. 1) is Captain Johnston's hand writing. I have known Mr. Jessop and Mr. Webster for twelve years; the latter is the best workman in Calcutta. I consider the best work is done at their manufactory, save and except a little at Fort Gloster, and a little at the Mint (a laugh.) There was a slight scratch or ridge in the cylinder which required to be filed out. The cylinder is now a fair job; then it looked far worse than it was. I was frequently, every day, at Jessop and Co.'s yard. There was a good deal of work going on for the Irrawady, Forbes, and Ganges. I did not consider the scratch a serious injury. Steam engine cylinders wear more in the middle than at the ends, and this cylinder required boring at the ends to make it approximate towards the middle. Captain Johnston decidedly is not an engineer of so much experience as Mr. Webster. The reason why the Irrawady's engines were not taken back, for they were demanded, was, that a specified sum had been agreed to for the completion of the repairs. Since that time no other Government work has been given to Jessop and Co. in which Captain Johnston has any control, but the work would have been withdrawn by degrees, though not to the same extent, if this quarrel had not taken place. The work has since been executed at the Mint. I heard something regarding Captain Johnston having seduced some of Jessop and Co.'s men from their employ; but I do not know if such is the fact. Mr. Webster did say that he had the information from Mr. Jessop; he said he had no written paper but that he had no doubt that the conversation had taken place. I received this (exhibit No. 1) on the 27th of August. It appears that the term 'mangling' had remained on my memory: I told Mr. Webster that I did not see any thing like 'mangling' about the cylinder. I was dissatisfied with the scratches. Mr. Jessop was absent, and there was no person of experience to assist Mr. Webster. When I went to the yard I did not find

Mr. Webster at the cylinders, but he accompanied me to them, and he alluded to Captain Johnston's coming into the yard. I was the person with whom rested the orders regarding the machinery, and in consequence Captain Johnston urging me to induce the Board to take the work from Jessop and Co. Previous to this quarrel I had observed some mutual dislike. I do not think they liked each other; but I am not aware of any thing before which could have induced plaintiff to urge the Board to take away the work from Jessop and Co. On a previous occasion plaintiff, two other persons, and myself went into the yard to look at the repairs to some engines: defendant declined to accompany us. On this occasion plaintiff knocked two rivets off a boiler. The rivets were a little hollow, but it was not necessary that he should have knocked them off; he might have objected to them. Such a proceeding was calculated to give the greatest offence to every person about the factory.

Re-examined by Mr. Prinsep. When I first spoke to Mr. Greenlaw on board the Forbes, defendant was not present. I think it was an irritating thing to knock off the rivets, and a person doing so at Boulton and Watts's, or Mandesley's in England, might fairly calculate on being knocked down. Some of the rivets were a little hollow. Captain Johnston is under the Board of which Mr. Greenlaw is the Secretary. I was requested by the Board to make some arrangements for completing the repairs to the Irrawaddy's engines, and I applied to Jessop and Co., but they replied that they had been advised not to give them up until the repairs were completed.

Mr. C. B. Greenlaw examined by the Advocate General. The plaintiff is under the direction of the Marine Board, and I have the letter from government for his appointment as controller of steam vessels. I know of no other document for the appointment, but a notice of it appeared in the Calcutta Gazette. I never heard of officers of Government being permitted to take dusturi. It is the duty of the plaintiff to see to the repairs of steam vessels, but I apprehend not to the exclusion of Captain Forbes. My impression is that Jessop and Co. were informed of Captain Johnston's appointment by a written communication.

Cross-examined by Mr. Clarke. In August last, all communications regarding machinery were made to Captain Forbes, but I consider when Captain Johnston was the superintendant he had orders to be on the alert,—to have his eyes about him. Captain Forbes is the Engineer officer who superintends machinery on the part of Government. At present, under circumstances, plaintiff has charge of some parts of it, but in August last Captain Forbes was the only officer in charge.

William James Kenderdine examinad by Mr. Prinsep. I was in the service of Jessop and Co. in August last, at the time the Irrawaddy's engines were repairing. After the quarrel, and when plaintiff had left the yard, Mr. Webster informed young Jessop, Imley and myself that Captain Johnston wanted dusturi on the Government work, and as the firm were determined not to give it was resolved to take the work from the yard. I was present during the whole of the quarrel. It originated about the cylinders. Defendant said, he understood that plaintiff had written to Captain Forbes saying that the cylinders were spoiled in boring. Both made use of abusive language; defendant called plaintiff a sneaking rascal who came into the yard when he (Webster) was at his meals, and told the durwan not to admit him.

To the Court.—Nothing was said about dusturi till the plaintiff had left the yard.

Cross-examined by Mr. Turton. I was in the service of Jessop and Co., left them, was imprisoned in consequence, brought an action against the magistrates, and I am now employed by plaintiff. I received a subpœna on Monday last. Plaintiff knew that I was in the yard at the time of the quarrel. I mentioned that fact to Mr. Kemp, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Thompson. Mr. George Jessop was present during the conversation in which Mr. Webster spoke of the dusturi, and I think Imley was present also, and Bagster was standing at a little distance. Both plaintiff and defendant were violent, but I did not hear what were the words the former used.

This was the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Turton submitted for a non-suit on the ground that there was no proof of the words having been said of the plaintiff in his office of Comptroller of Steam vessels, and that there was no evidence that taking dusturi was inconsistent with his office.

Mr. Advocate General replied.

The Court.—The averments are that plaintiff holds an office, and that the words, imputing to him a want of integrity, were spoken of him in that office. Though the evidence is slight in some points, yet we think it might be left to a jury, and plaintiff ought not to be non-suited. Defendant, if he thinks fit, may have leave to move either on any point of law or defect of evidence.

Mr. Turton, for the defense, did not intend to make the slightest reference to the decision of the Court, and did not in the slightest degree dispute that words imputing a want of integrity were actionable, but he did complain, that in this case there was not the least scintilla of evidence of what dusturi was, or of the taking of dusturi being contrary to the office held by the plaintiff, and he thought a jury would be taking on themselves a presumption if they decided that to be a want of integrity of which they had no evidence before them. It was possible that even the Governor-General might say, 'well, if Jessop and Co. are foolish enough to give Captain Johnston a dusturi I shall not object to it, for the repairs to the steam engines are done by order of the Marine Board, and Captain Johnston has not the slightest control over that body.' That the evidence went to show that Captain Johnston knew something of engineering there could be no doubt, and he was not going to impugn it, (especially as the evidence of Captain Forbes, than whom there was not a person more competent to speak,) if it showed that he had some knowledge, showed also that it was not much, and that he was infinitely inferior to Mr. Webster although he wrote R. N. after his name. Then he asked what was there to show that dusturi was contrary to the integrity of the plaintiff's office? He admitted that taking what at home was called the 'market penny' was an absurd and improper custom, but it did not carry with it such an imputation on the character of the person who took it as would sustain an action for damages for verbal slander. He would be glad to have been spared the duty of going further into this case, but with reference to the extent of damages it was necessary to trouble the Court with a few words, for here was the plaintiff, reigning supreme over the Government steamers, at this moment, on a certain fixed salary, and showing in his own person that this assertion of the defendant, if true, has not been attended with the slightest injury; nay he has been able to prove nothing further than an injurious exclamation, spoken before two apprentices, in a moment of irritation. It was not shown in what way the Court were to judge of the malicious feelings of the defendant though for the purpose plaintiff had recourse to one who recently had been called by his learned friend, the Advocate-General, 'a runway apprentice.' But it appeared the malice had not been so successful as to induce that apprentice not to enter into plaintiff's employment. There was evidence that the defendant was annoyed;—that for a series of time a person who was not entitled took an opportunity of stealing into the the yard to interfere with the men, during the time he was absent;—that Captain Forbes had communicated to him the following letter from the plaintiff. "My dear Forbes, I find that all the fire doors will be completed by 10 and every thing ready to get the steam up. May it not therefore as well be done to-day as to wait till Friday? Will you give the necessary orders? I wish to draw your attention to the Irrawaddy's cylinder which Jessop appears to have mangled teribly." When this case was opened by his learned friend it was stated that the defendant went up to the plaintiff and asked what was meant by the word 'mangling.' He did say that if the plaintiff had made such charge against a person merely because he would not at that time, harassed as he was, stand over and watch what was described as a tedious job, he was, in point of fact completely exonerated, for what appeared in the eyes of Captain Johnston to be mangled was proved to be a scratch, and only mangled so far, because the plaintiff could not understand it. But in what way did the defendant repeat the words to Captain Forbes? He said the plaintiff was welcome to come into the yard at any time, only he desired that he might come to him; referring to the affair of cutting off the rivets, he thought the plaintiff might feel inclined to take upon himself the part of master as he had done before that of workman, and stating what he had heard from Mr. Jessop, the defendant imputed the whole of the annoyance to the firm's refusal to give a dusturi to the plaintiff. Now it would be shewn that defendant had heard this from Mr. Jessop; and further, that he was entitled to communicate it would be shewn also. There was one part of this communication which the plaintiff had not ventured to put in the record which was that he wished to put money into the house, and to participate in the profits, or in fact to become a sleeping partner of the firm (the learned counsel here read a letter from Captain Johnston relating some offers of pecuniary assistance made to Jessop and Co. The letter was not put in as evidence, but the reporter understood it contained a proposal that Captain Johnston should have a share of the profits accruing from capital advanced by him.) He was perfectly aware how his learned friend would use that part of the evidence of Captain Forbes which related to his communication with Mr. Greenlaw. It would be said that the circumstance had been reported to Mr. Greenlaw, but in fact that gentleman had only been consulated as a private friend; and what was the result of the communication to these two gentlemen? Why both agreed that there must have been some mistake, and the character of the plaintiff stood as well as it did before the words were uttered. He admitted that the words, if true, might tell against Captain Johnston; but the words were not actionable, and no more hurtful to the feelings than the assertion that he wished to put money in the house and for which there was no prosecution. On the other hand, there was an attempt to take the work from Jessop and Co. and the only reason it did not succeed was, because there was an existing contract, and the firm would not give it up. There was also evidence that no Government work had been done since by the firm; and surely the feelings of Captain Johnston, if they had been wounded, had been doubly satisfied by this. He understood that gentleman to say he did not understand the assertion regarding putting money in Jessop and Co.'s house. He would now inform the Court that Captain Johnston, some years ago, after he had arrived in this country in the Enterprize, and whilst he was at home he had frequent communications with Mr. Jessop's family, who have a large concern at Butterly. He should be able to prove that this communication led to a certain degree of intimacy, and that a proposition did come from him, not exactly that he should join the house, but that he should deposit money with an understanding that he should have the emolument derived from his capital. This proposition was communicated to Mr. Webster by Mr. Jessop, and that gentleman declined to accede to the arrangement, and expressed himself angrily; therefore it was not singular that, during a moment of irritation, he might mention the subject to Captain Forbes without any other intention but to state what he felt. Now during the time of this quarrel taking place, the Court would bear in mind that Mr. Jessop was absent, and that the whole of the business had fallen on Mr. Webster, and that from day to day he considered himself harassed and annoyed by the plaintiff. It was also in evidence that they were not particularly found of each other, and possibly the plaintiff might cherish some angry feeling as he did find a reason for the display of them. Well, what followed; Captain Johnston gave orders which he had no right to do, and the defendant said that which had been stated to him by his partner. The action was brought in the absence of Mr. Jessop, pleas of justification were put in, and he would now, as Mr. Jessop had returned to this country, be able to prove that the words were true. He granted that the word made use of was not dusturi but 'commission.' That was probably in consequence of Captain Johnston's English education, but the proposal was that Captain Johnston should be allowed a commission on the work done by Jessop and Co. for Government; and if he should be able to prove that he thought he would be entitled to a verdict.

Mr. George Jessop examined by Mr. Clarke.—I have known the plaintiff for fourteen or fifteen years; we have always been on terms of intimacy. The firm had a great deal of business from Government in the repairs of machinery, Captain Forbes had the superintendence of the whole of the work we did for Government, Captain Johnston had no control over it whatever. In the early part of July last, in consequence of a reference to Captain Forbes, a communication was received from the Marine Board, and it was understood that the plaintiff was to be allowed to inspect but not to interfere with the repairs. Captain Forbes still continued to discharge the duty of inspection. I am aware of the subject of the present action. Captain Johnston on one or two occasions asked me if he was not entitled to some handsome commission for bringing the work the firm were doing; I mentioned this to Mr. Webster merely saying that plaintiff had been asking for dusturi. I cannot say if commission was mentioned on more than one occasion, but it might have been so. He asked me, if I would take him into the concern as a partner, stating that he had £5,000 to put in, but nothing more was said. I also told this to defendant. I replied that I had no objection to sell the whole concern, and plaintiff asked why I did not write a letter to him in order that he might lay it before Government. Mr. Webster would not agree; he said he would have no connection with the plaintiff. I left Calcutta at the end of July.

Cross-examined by the Advocate-General.—The conversation about the partnership took place at the time the Ganges was under repair last year. I do not recollect it was at the time of the establishment of a steam committee. I remember Government offering two lakhs to any body who would take a contract for steam communication with England. I do not know whether this offer to me was made by plaintiff about that time, but I will not swear that it was not. I will not swear that it had no reference to the Government contract. Plaintiff said he had influence with the Governor-General, and a partnership would be for the benefit of us both. I do not recollect a conversation regarding the two lakhs at the Steam Committee. I communicated plaintiff's offer to the defendant, and I said also that the former wanted dusturi. This might be one or two days after the offer was made, but I am sure it was not ten days. He said he ought to have, or that he was entitled to some dusturi. I cannot either recollect the occasion or time, but it was in the passage near my own door. I do not recollect what we were conversing about; we might have been speaking with reference to some work in hand. I have not been trying to recollect when it was said, or anything at all about it. I do not know the amount of plaintiff's salary but I suppose he has one. I believe plaintiff and defendant were always on good terms before this dispute. I do not recollect when the conversation about dusturi took place, or whether it was before or since plaintiff last returned from England, or if it was since he held his office. I do not recollect anything more that was said, but I remember we were laughing and talking at the time. I do not know if plaintiff applied to Government for a loan on my behalf. We were laughing and talking, but I did not believe the proposal was a joke. I never asked plaintiff to lend funds to Jessop and Co.* I do not recollect offering plaintiff a commission if he would sell the concern to Government. It was possible that I may have done so; I might have done so;—I do not recollect if I did at the time Lord Amherst was Governor-General. (By the Court.) Do you believe that you offered the plaintiff a commission to sell your establishment to government? I do not. I do not recollect that plaintiff refused to do so. I never requested a loan of the plaintiff, but I might have done so in a joking way; I might have said "Johnston will you lend me a lakh?" I cannot say it I never said so seriously. I have been employed to do work on the plaintiff's private account; he has paid some bills, and some he has not. Some trifling amounts for repairs to his carriage or buggy were not charged, but the account now produced, for three rupees, has been paid. I did not offer the plaintiff anything if he would procure me the building of river steamers: he has had the power to cause the rejection of my proposal to build them. He never had it in his power in the contracts with Government to shew favor or disfavor. When I communicated to defendant the plaintiff's proposal that we should allow him a dusturi, I stated it merely as what occurred when we were laughing and talking,—as a joke, and as such I mentioned it.

Re-examined by Mr. Clarke.—I did not tell Mr. Webster that it was a joke.

Mr. Advocate-General replied, but at the suggestion of the Court, he confined his argument entirely to the second plea, and after commencing on the reluctance with which Mr. Jessop had given his evidence strongly urged that the probabilities were, that not only had the words never been uttered to Mr. Jessop by the plaintiff, but that the former had never communicated them to defendant.

Chief Justice Ryan said, it was the impression of the Court that in this case there must be a verdict for the plaintiff on the general issue and all other pleas but the second plea, and with reference to that there was a case in 10th Barnwell and Creswell to which the attention of the Court had not been directed by counsel. [The learned judge then cited M'Pherson v. Daniel in 10th B. and C., wherein it is decided that it is not an answer for oral slander, for a defendant to shew that he heard it from another and named the person at the time, without shewing that the defendant believed it to be true, and that he spoke the words on a justifiable occasion.] The learned judge continued, the question then is, whether there is evidence as to what is contained in the second plea; the Court thinks there is satisfactory evidence that Mr. Jessop did say to the defendant what is alleged; and also that there is some evidence that defendant believed what Mr. Jessop said. Mr. Advocate-General, in his address to the Court, thought there was no reason to believe that the communication had been made to defendant, both from Mr. Jessop's conduct and from the probabilities of the case; but the Court cannot arrive at that conclusion, because we find that defendant mentions Mr. Jessop as his authority on each occasion, and from the declaration of that person we think the probabilities are that defendant was so informed by Mr. Jessop. But the Court expresses its opinion by the verdict, as to whether Captain Johnston made the proposal to Mr. Jessop. Then as to the second plea, the question is whether the words were spoken on a justifiable occasion. Now this is the main point, and this is the way Mr. Justice Bailey put it in the case already cited:—"It seems to me that a person cannot be justified in repeating slander unless he believes it to be true. But that alone is not sufficient. I think it can only be repeated on a justifiable occasion. Every publication of slanderous matter is primâ facie a violation of the right which every individual has to his good name and reputation. The law, upon grounds of public policy and convenience, permits, under certain circumstances, the publication of slanderous matter, although it be injurious to another. But such act being primâ facie wrongful, it lies upon the person charged with uttering slander, whether he were the first utterer or not to show that he uttered it upon some lawful occasion. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that a man cannot by law justify the repetition of a slander by merely naming the person who first uttered it; he must also show that he repeated it on a justifiable occasion and believed it to be true. The question is, had defendant at the time a right to repeat the words. We think it a very doubtful point whether it was a lawful occasion, or whether he believed it to be true. We think there is some evidence that it was said at a time when Captain Forbes urged by plaintiff, was about to take away the work from Jessop and Co.; and as it is a little doubtful, we are inclined to give the defendant a verdict on the second plea. Mr. Turton submitted for a non-suit, but though the evidence is slight, he thought there is evidence which might go to a jury, and did not non-suit the plaintiff. But defendant has liberty to move to enter upon a non-suit, if he think fit. We must say that the Court is not satisfied with the evidence of Mr. Jessop; and that Captain Johnston goes out of Court with a character untouched. We suppose the latter came into Court to establish his character and not for damages; if we had damages to give they would have amounted to ~~Rs~~ 1,000. We wish it also to be understood that we think the plaintiff has done right in bringing this matter before the Court: we do not believe that he uttered the words which he is said to have uttered, and he goes out of Court after having given an opportunity to the defendant to establish an imputation on his character, and which the defendant has wholly failed to do.

Mr. Justice Grant.—I entirely concur with the Chief Justice; and as it may be satisfactory to the plaintiff whose conduct has been under inquiry, I must add that there is not the slightest imputation on his character.—Englishman.

* The following has been handed to us as a correction of the above passage in Mr. Jessop's evidence, as taken down in Court —ED. IND. GAZ.

I have offered railing to Government, and have done so for 12 years. I do not recollect having asked plaintiff to get Government to buy it. I might have offered plaintiff money to sell it to Government. I might have said so probably I might; I cant recollect that I did say so. I might have said so. I do not recollect who was Governor-General. (In reply to the Court.) I cannot swear that I said so to plaintiff. (To Advocate-General in cross examination.) I do not believe I said so. I do not recollect the plaintiff refused it. It might have happened that he did.

MONDAY, MARCH 16.

TO THE MATTER OF COLVIN AND OTHERS.

The case in appeal on the Petition of the Insolvents for their discharge on the consent of the major part of the creditors, was this morning called on for the decision of the Court.

Sir John P. Grant, as the Junior Judge, according to the practice of the Court where there is a difference of opinion, delivered his Judgment at considerable length, and to the same effect as his former decision when sitting in the Insolvent Court.

The Chief Justice regretted his difference of opinion from his learned brother, which would have made him suspend his judgment till the Court should have been full, but was pressed by the importance of of time to the Petitioning party. He also felt more confidence, because it was not a new matter, the same point having been considered in the case of C. G. Strettell, when reference was made to the other Judges and the order for his discharge was made with the entire concurrence of the then Chief Justice. He should not go into the question of the policy of the statute, but confine himself to the consideration of it as it stood; and though he was bound to say there was much obscurity in the clause in question, yet he thought it clear that the party was entitled to discharge without any referrence to the future conduct of the matters of the estate. That he gave no opinion upon, and it would be a matter for further consideration; but the Statute gave a right to discharge "whenever" the sufficient number of assents should be obtained. It had been said that an Insolvent Law was framed on a different principle from those on which the Bankrupt Law was introduced; but it appeared to him that the Indian Bankrupt Act had much of the character of a Bankrupt Act also. The learned Chief Justice then went shortly into the grounds of his decision, which was that the Insolvents were entitled to their discharge as asked, and the order of the Insolvent Court must be altered accordingly.—Calcutta Courier.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

FEBRUARY 14.

IN THE MATTER OF WILLIAM FAIRLIE CLARKE AND OTHERS.

This was a question of sett off between the assigness of Fergusson and Co. and Mr. Bishop. The assigness agreed to admit the facts of the case, and to have the point of law argued before the Insolvent Court. The particulars are as follow:

About the end of 1829 the firm of Fergusson and Co. applied to Mr. Bishop to become the manager and superintendent of the Bamoudee indigo concern, situate in the Zillah Kishnagur, of which Fergusson and Co. were then in possession as proprietors. In March 1830, Mr. Bishop entered on charge, it being understood between him and Fergusson and Co. that after the expiration of two years the latter would admit the former as a partner, and that he should have a four anna share of the Bamoudee concern. After the expiration of the two years, in January 1833, Mr. Bishop applied to the firm on the subject of such share, and was informed by them that they could not then fulfil their intention in consequence of a suit pending between themselves and Mr. Ebenezer Thompson, a former proprietor and mortgager. In consequence of this information Mr. Bishop did not again bring the subject to the notice of the firm till the 12th July 1833, when he received from Mr. Melville, a partner in the house of Fergusson and Co. a paper signature, purporting to be an engagement to hold himself responsible to the Government Loan Committee for the Bamoudee concern and the produce of the season. Mr. Bishop, somewhat surprised at the request, replied, that the firm of Fergusson and Co. would probably not object to his withdrawing a balance of ~~Rs~~ 19,000 or thereabouts in their hands, in his favor, under the impression that if they had power to mortgage to the Government Loan Committee, they had equally the power of selling to him a share of the concern had they been inclined to do so. To this Mr. Bishop did not receive a reply previous to the 27th of the same month, when he wrote again expressing his surprize at receiving no answer and stating his determination to withdraw the balance. But before the last mentioned letter could have reached the Calcutta an answer to the letter of the 12th of July was received, in which Mr. Melville, on the part of the firm disclaimed any intention of not fulfilling the agreement, the delay being solely caused by the continuation of the legal proceedings on the part of Mr. Thompson, and proposing to give Mr. Bishop an interest in the profit and loss of the Bamoudee concern from the commencement of the next season, upon an engagement which he trusted would be satisfactory to all parties. Mr. Bishop replied, that from the house having mortgaged the concern to Government, he was led to suppose the suit with Mr. Thompson was not of such a nature as to prevent them giving him a share; however, he hoped that the matter would be arranged at the end of the then season. In October, 1833, Mr. Bishop came to Calcutta, and some written communications passed between himself and the firm in which the latter stated they were willing to allow Mr. Bishop to retain the management of the Bamoudee on the following terms, viz. On a salary of ~~Rs~~ 400 per month, and a fourth interest in the annual profit and loss, the firm charging a yearly rent of ~~Rs~~ 20,000. The arrangement was to continue for one or more years at the option of the firm. To this arrangement Mr. Bishop agreed, but previous to the receipt of the letter containing the proposal he received from Mr. Melville a memorandum of the estimated outlay and rent of the Bamoudee concern for the period of one year, his proportion being estimated at the sum of ~~Rs~~ 18,700. After Mr. Bishop had intimated his consent to the arrangement he withdrew nearly the whole surplus funds to his credit in the firm above his estimated proportion, leaving the remainder to answer the share of the rent and outlay for one year, but there was not any arrangement between himself and the firm respecting the disposal of the balance which was suffered to stand as before to the credit of Mr. Bishop generally, in account.

Fergusson and Co. failed on the 26th November 1833 and were duly adjudged insolvent. Mr. Bishop now petitions the Court, setting forth:—That the partnership between the late firm and himself commenced on the the 1st October 1833, the commencement of the Indigo season; and that at the date of the adjudication in insolvency of the firm Rs. 15,000 only had been supplied by Fergusson and Co. for the purposes of the factories.—That at the date of the insolvency the sum of Rs. 19257 was standing generally to the credit of the petitioner in the books of the firm, and that no debit for outlay or rent had been carried to his account. That the assignees, without any fresh agreement, continued the requisite advances for cultivation during the remainder of the season, and that the total outlay of the season, inclusive of rent, has amounted to Rs. 78,000 or thereabouts. That the produce of the factory having become ready for division, the petitioner applied to the assignees to come to a settlement and division of it, and to account for the sum left by him in the hands of the firm, as a sett off against the proportion of outlay and rent chargeable to the petitioner, under the agreement of partnership, amounting to ~~Rs~~ 19,500; but the assignees have declined to allow the sum to be sett-off except as to the amount advanced by the firm prior to the failure.

The petitioner then prays, that the Court will order that he be at liberty to set off the sum of ~~Rs~~ 19,257, standing to his credit in the books of the firm at the date of the adjudication in insolvency, against ~~Rs~~ 19,500, chargeable to him as his one-fourth share or proportion of ~~Rs~~ 78,000, being the gross outlay, inclusive of rent, during the indigo season ending the 1st October last.

The assignees having admitted the facts, the right of sett off came on for argument last Court day, and Mr. Prinsep was heard on behalf of the petitiner, but in consequence of the lateness of the hour the Court adjourned until the following Monday at 10 o'clock when the learned gentleman resumed his argument, and the further consideration of the matter was postponed till the next Court day. The reporter understood the matter was adjourned to the next Court day in the first instance, he is therefore unable to give the arguments of counsel.

We shall give the decision when it is pronounced by Mr. Justice Grant, who presided.

FEBRUARY 21.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

This was an order nisi, obtained on the 7th instant, on application, by petition, of various creditors, praying that the Court would order that Mr. Thomas Holroyd be appointed assignee to the estate of the insolvents in the room of Mr. F. H. Burkinyoung, resigned. Notice of the application was given by public advertisement to the creditors, and now—

Mr. Prinsep, on behalf of Messrs. Bagshaw, and Co. and others, presented a petition, not against the appointment of Mr. Holroyd, but praying that some alteration should take place in the management of the estate, and that for the future the assignees may be remunerated by a moderate percentage on the net proceeds realized, and not as hertofere by a fixed salary.

Sir J. P. Grant noticed, that the petition did not state what alterations were necessary in the plan of management.

Mr. Advocate-General said, the Court would hardly exercise its discretion as to the remuneration without having some information before it. The petition prayed that the assignees might receive a moderate percentage. Now the expenses of keeping up the necessary establishment might be so great that a moderate percentage would not be sufficient to defray them.

Mr. Turton on behalf of Mr. Harry, thought it quite impossible to fix the amount of the percentage without there was something before the Court to shew what expenses were incurred. The Court had generally referred this question to a meeting of creditors, and acted upon their suggestion. Supposing in this case, which, indeed, was likely enough, that the dividend would be small and the trouble great; the assigness might require something more than a moderate percentage on the dividends, and if the assignees, at this moment, could not tell what would be the amount of those dividends, it was an additional reason why the Court should pause. It might appear, on investigation, that a large percentage and not a small one would be necessary, but his client was quite satisfied that a fair allowance would be ordered by the Court.

Sir J. P. Grant said, the petition stated that a moderate percentage would be for the benefit of the estate; but it was not said how the estate would doe benefitted, nor what difference ought to be adopted in the plan of management It stated, without imputing any blame to the assignees, that they had hitherto so conducted the estate as to produce nothing. But no alteration was suggested; and what was the reason of this, apparently unprofitable management he could not tell. He had no information or knowledge on the subject, and of course the Court would do nothing without giving the creditors an opportunity to come in. He thought the best course would be to refer to the Examiner to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of the estate that the assignees should be remunerated by a percentage, and if so, what that per centage should be. If the assigneess of the estate, contrary to the practice at home and in this country, were to be considered as servants who received a salary, they must be treated so, and have something according to their trouble.

Mr. Clarke suggested, that the subject should be left for the consideration of the creditors, a great number of whom were well acquainted with the affairs of the estate. If a meeting were called and the opinion of the creditors laid before the Court, the latter would have some guide for their decision.

Sir J. P. Grant said, the Court had no power to call a meeting of the creditors, neither could he say that it would be bound by their resolutions. He would, however, be happy to receive any suggestions from the creditors, and he regretted that the petition now before him did not state the grounds on which the election was made for a percentage rather than a fixed salary, and what different plan of management was necessary for the advantage of the creditors of the estate.

Mr. Turton remarked, that it had been said no advantage had been derived from the present plan of management. He could hardly think this assertion consistent with the fact that at the time of failure almost every particle of the property had been mortgaged, and these, to the extent of twenty-one lakhs, had been paid off.

Mr. Prinsep understood that mortgages to that extent had been contracted to be paid off.

Mr. Turton said, that fourteen lakhs of mortgaged property had been actually cleared. Of course it was necessary to clear these incumbrances before a dividend could be paid. It was hardly fair to say nothing had been realized; much had been realized; but the clearing off incumbrances might be considered as payments made to a preferential creditor. He begged to say, that his client was not a party to an application for a reference to the Examiner, and with reference to a percentage he thought it quite impossible, for any person in the world, under present circumstances, to say what would be a fair amount.

Mr. Advocate General thought it would be hardly fair to name an early day for the Examiner to report, Mr. Holroyd being only now appointed, he would require some little time to make himself acquainted with the affairs of the estate.

Sir J. P. Grant said, that the order might afterwards be enlarged, but he would name the next Court day for the Examiner to inquire and report whether it is for the benefit of the creditors that the assignees should be paid for their trouble in the conduct and management of the affairs of the estate by a percentage or a fixed salary.

IN THE MATTER OF WILLIAM FAIRLIE CLARKE AND OTHERS.

This was a question of sett off between Mr. Charles Bishop, of the Bamondee indigo concern, and the assignees of this estate. The particulars are reported in a preceding page. The learned Judge decided, that in the adjustment of the accounts for the season ending September 30th 1834, the petitioner be allowed credit for the sum left in the hands of Fergusson and Co. to the extent of one fourth of the sum advanced to him by the firm, for the purposes of the factory, previous to the failure; and to the like extent for amount advanced by the assignees, and that the same be debited against the estate, with interest at the rate of five per cent; and that the petitioner be allowed to prove for any balance which may remain in his favour. The learned judge observed that if the assignees undertook to fulfil the engagement entered into by the insolvents, they must place themselves exactly in the position of the latter, and do so subject to all contingencies.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CALDER AND OTHERS.

This was an application, by Mr. Cochrane, made on behalf of Mr. J. W. Sutherland, that no dividend be paid on the claim of Mr. Browne Roberts, until the rest of the creditors of the insolvents be fully paid and satisfied.

Mr. Turton appeared for Mr. Browne Roberts, and for the trustees of the firm of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. The learned counsel put in the petition of Mr. B. Roberts, which set forth, that he retired from the house of Mackintosh and Co. on the 30th April 1828, having proceeded to England in the previous March, and that he became a member of the firm of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. in May 1830.—That the latter firm stopped payment in June 1833, and that a deed of arrangement was entered into in which, among other things, it was provided that the partners should realize and get in their personal estates, and after satisfying their separate debts, should pay the surplus to the co-partnership fund.—That the whole of deponent's personal property in the United Kingdom, and also his marriage settlement was sold and disposed of pursuant to such covenant. And the deponent further saith, that he hath an admitted claim on the estate of Mackintosh and Co. of Rs. 55,700, exclusive of further claims to which he considers himself entitled upon the footing of an arrangement entered into between him and his partners upon his quitting the firm of Mackintosh and Co. But whatever claim he hath is not for his own benefit, but in trust, and for the benefit of the estate of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. That Mr. J. W. Sutherland, on whose behalf this application is made, did execute the deed of trust as one of the creditors of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. and that the deponent had lately arrived in this country for the purpose of realizing certain claims on parties at present residing in India, on behalf of the trustees of the estate of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. The learned counsel argued, that before Mr. Roberts's claim could be struck out of the schedule of Mackintosh and Co, or rather, before the payment of it could be postponed until the remainder of the creditors should be paid in full, it must first be ascertained to which of the creditors of Mackintosh and Co. Mr. Roberts was liable and who are to be paid in full before him. For instance, it was quite clear that Mr. Browne Roberts had not been a partner in the firm since 1828, and therefore it was evident was not liable to any parties who had become creditors of the firm since that period.

Sir J. P. Grant, did not see clearly how or when Mr. Roberts had quitted the partnership.

Mr. Cochrane said he had not been advertised out of the firm until three years after the period it was said he had left it.

Mr. Turton said, even in that case Mr. Roberts would only be liable to those who had not had notice. It was distinctly proved, that there was a sum of Rs. 70,000, a balance admitted by the assigneess, in Mr. Roberts' favour, and that this sum was not made up merely of the amount he was to receive for his three annah share in the firm, but of sums received on his private account since he had quitted the partnership. He would admit until it was shown the firm was in a solvent state when Mr. Roberts quitted it, that he could not be entitled to any thing for his three anna share, but any sums paid in on his private account, subsequent to his quitting the concern, were clearly the property of the creditors of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. But before the Court would order the amount alleged to be due for the three anna share, to be struck out of the schedule, it would be necessary to ascertain to which of the creditors Mr. Roberts was liable. As to the transaction itself, he thought he should be able to shew that the transfer of the sum to the account of Mr. Roberts, had been bonâfide, and that it was not at all evident, but rather on the contrary, that the firm was insolvent in 1827 8, or if it was, that Mr. Roberts was aware of it. Mr. Vanthart had dieposed, that according to his belief the house was insolvent in 1819, when Mr. Fulton quitted it, but from the amount carried to 'bad balances' it would appear that gentleman had come to an erroneous conclusion. In 1825 there was a balance of three lakhs and a half against the house, and the year preceding the balance was five lakhs. He admitted that from 1825 downwards the house had been gradually getting worse, but a fair examination into the circumstances would shew that there was nothing which could induce Mr. Roberts to believe that the house was likely to fail. In 1825, the firm incurred a considerable loss in opium, but it by no means followed that the deficiency thus occasioned could not be made up by a more fortunate transaction next year. In 1826 7 the balance against the house was eleven lakhs, and this in 1828 was increased to fourteen lakhs. But when was the balance sheet of 1827 8 made out? From the evidence of Mr. Vanthart it appeared to have been made out in December 1828, within two months of one year after Mr. Browne Roberts had quitted the country, and proceeded to Europe, partly for the purpose of endeavouring to recover what was at that time considered a recoverable debt. He would also remind the Court that Mr. Jenkins, at a subsequent period, would have joined the house if he had considered the three accounts he referred to as good balances. He would direct the attention of the Court to the acts of the partners at the time Mr. Roberts quitted the partnership, and ask if they showed a sense of their own insolvency when they undertook to pay Rs. 40,000, per share for each of his shares. Would they have done so if they had thought their concerns were irremediable? Of course they would not. Did any one come into the house on the retirement of Mr. Roberts? Was he a young and inexperienced person that joined the firm at that time? No; on the contrary, Mr. Storm had been long in business, and thought he was doing perfectly right in joining the house. If the amount of the transactions of the house was looked at, it would be found that the deficiency in 1825, was about five per cent. of the capital, and surely it could not be considered that a large trading concern, such as the house of Mackintosh and Co. might not realize a profit of five per cent. on business. It so happened, however, that a series of circumstances took place here at that time, which no man, of whatever sagacity could have foreseen, otherwise it would have been a poor business indeed, which with the resources of Mackintosh and Co., could not have realized a profit of fifteen per cent., and if the house had realized ten per cent. only they would have been left in a solvent state. Mr. Jenkins had said, that the state of three accounts in 1831 prevented him from joining the house; but that he continued with them to the date of the failure, not having finally determined whether he would join them or not. Then was it to be believed that if Mr. Jenkins thought it might be worth his while to remain with the house, that Mr. Roberts could not quit India in 1827 with a favorable view of its solvency? It had been proved that landed property remained at a nominal value from 1828. It had also been proved that the firm of Mackintosh and Co. held large mortgages and securities, which at the time were considered sufficient to cover Ramrattan Mollick's debt; but in 1831 the state of things was different, and Ramratten's account had been converted into a bad debt, in consequence of the depreciation in the value of landed property; still, at that time, Mr. Jenkins thought a fortunate year or two might have turned the scale in favour of the house. As to the debt of Mercer and Co., at the failure of the house it was indebted to the firm about twenty lakhs of rupees, for which there were securities now remaining to about the value of one fourth of the amount. Mercer and Co. failed in 1827; they possessed cotton, indigo and indigo factories, and Mackintosh and Co. had security over the whole property. Could any one tell him that at that time it might not be considered a valuable estate. It was proved that the firm lost £90,000 by the house at home holding Mercer and Co's indigo over at a time when it fell from five shillings to two shillings and six-pence, making a loss of near one half the debt which could not have been foreseen at the time Mr. Browne went home. Had Rickards, Mackintosh and Co., sold the indigo immediately, the result would have been very different, and as this indigo was not sold till March 1828, it was quite impossible that the loss could have hastened Mr. Robert's departure from this country. The house here likewise held cotton on which a very considerable loss had been sustained. If the Court came to examine the balance against Mercer and Co. in 1827, they would find that the firm were fully covered by what was considered good security, indeed he remembered in 1828, at a meeting of the creditors of Mercer and Co. it was considered that Mackintosh and Co. would not only be fully paid, but that they were authorized to hold over the balance for the other creditors. In like manner the value had depreciated of up-country indigo factories which were now hardly worthy of cultivation, and the export of cotton, which continued to be extensive for some time after the American war, as the large cotton screws in this neighbourhood bore testimony, had now entirely failed. He now came to the debt due by Mendieta, Uriarte and Co., which, to this moment, was not ascertained to be in-remediably bad, though he would admit that claims against kings were generally encompassed with difficulties. Unless he was wrongly informed the assignees had now thought it worth their while to send Mr. Storm, one of the insolvents, to Madrid, to press the claim there. Mr. Browne Roberts had himself spent two years in Spain, having the same object in view; but it was to be hoped that a better state of things now obtained in that country, and that Mr. Storm would be more successful. If the whole should be recovered it would be more than sufficient to cover the debt of Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. The debt itself had originated out of the trade to Manilla which was carried on to a considerable extent, both here and at Madras, until it was put a stop to by the decision of Sir William Scott on the question as to the right of any privileged body to license a trade with the subjects of a power hostile to the Supreme Government. It was afterwards carried on at Calcutta by Mendieta, Uriarte and Co. who, being Spaniards, were not affected by the decision. When that firm became involved they made over their claim on the Philipine Company to Mackintosh and Co. and shortly after Ferdinand VII. swept away the whole of the assets of the Phillipine Company. Spain, however, since that time, had come to a better era,—at least it was to be hoped she would under the quadruple alliance,—and if that government only paid, as it was called in this country, ten annas in the rupee, it would be sufficient to discharge the claim on the Phillipine Company. These were the three debts which had prevented Mr. Jenkins from joining the firm; and he thought no person in 1828 could have considered them irremediably bad. As to the debt of Ramruttan Mullick, his Lordship was aware from what had passed in another place, that person had a claim of one lakh and a half against Surropchunder Sircar, and it was also well known there was claim against the Company for nine lakhs, in support of which there was a petition before the Court at home. The claim against the Company it was true might not now be regarded as it was in 1828, but the claim of one and a half lakh was yet before the Supreme Court. Now what was the state of these three balances when Mr. Browne Roberts quitted the partnership? Ramruttan Mullick's security was a good sett off to the full amount; Mendieta, Uriarte and Co.'s was a security to the full amount with great difficulties in the way of recovering it: and Mercer and Co.'s was considered, in 1827, to be a sufficient security to the full extent; but the fall of indigo, cotton, &c. had since destroyed that to very considerable extent, and in like manner, the fall in landed property had made Ramruttan Mullick's a bad debt. Mr. Jenkins said "if these three debts had been good, and no panic had existed, I think I should have joined the house." The debts were considered good at the time Mr. Roberts left the house. Mr. Jenkins continued "a lucky hit or two might have recovered matters. "I took my impression from the partners of the firm; it did appear to be the feeling that the house might not go on." If such was the impression of the partners he would like to know what there was of fraud in receiving Rs. 40,000 for each share three years previously to the time the impression was communicated to Mr. Jenkins. The account of Mr. Browne Roberts was not before the Court, but this was,—that a part of it consisted of sums received by the firm, on his account, since he left the house. Mr. Vauthart says, 'there was a sum of Rs. 20,000 recovered on the life of Captain Roberts; it was recovered for Mr. Browne Roberts, and forms a part of the claim of Rs. 70,000.' Ought not the house to be responsible for this? Again the sum 'Rs. 15,000 and upwards is composed of Sheriff's fees recovered in 1828-9, and there was a sum of Rs. 7,000 recovered for rent on account of Mrs. Roberts's settlement. The utmost the petitioner could say was, that Mr. Browne Roberts was not entitled to recover for his creditors any part of the sum remaining for the three anna shares. Perhaps it would not be worth the while of the trustees of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. to dispute that, but the Court would take into their consideration that Mr. Roberts had received not a cowrie during the time he was at Madrid, and that had he remained a partner of the firm he would have at least received his maintenance during that period. A great deal had been said regarding a representation made at the first meeting of the creditors of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. of a sum of £38,000 said to be due to Mr. Roberts from the house here; it however turned out that Mr. Roberts was not present when the statement was made, and when the matter came to be sifted it was found to be a sum of £30,000 which the firm here promised to advance him. It was true no lawyer would tell Mr. Roberts that he had any claim on the firm for this sum, but when such promises were made to him, could he be said to be deceiving any body? He would now only draw the attention of the Court to one other circumstance. Mr. Sutherland appeared here in a most extraordinary position, and he was quite at a loss to account for his feelings otherwise than that he was promoted by a desire to play the scavenger,—throwing dirt on Mr. Roberts. Mr. Sutherland was a creditor of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. he had received a dividend under the assignment, and he now came here to move the Court to strike out the claims of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co.

Sir J. P. Grant.—He is also a creditor of Mackintosh and Co.

Mr. Turton admitted that he was, but still there appeared something singular in Mr. Sutherland's proceedings since he was acting against the interest for which Mr. Browne Roberts are merely a trustee, for not one cowrie would ever go to that gentleman, as there would be no surplus from the estate of Rickards, Mackintosh and Co. However, Mr. Sutherland was the best judge of his own actions. The question before the Court was merely a question of law, as to the amount received by the firm on Mr. Roberts' account since he quitted the partnership. There could be no doubt his creditors were entitled to that, and he would submit for a reference to the Examiner to ascertain what those accounts were and to whom they were due. The amount of the balance due on the three anna shares he admitted to be doubtful, but if any reference were made he begged that might be included, as well as to ascertain whether any sums were due for Mr. Browne Roberts' expences while at Madrid. Mr. Roberts had drawn nothing but what was perfectly understood to be his own, and if it was asserted that he had, there was the more occasion for a reference.

Mr. Cochrane, in reply, said, that the usual courtesy of the bar prevented him telling his learned friend, who indeed generally made good addresses, that he never heard him make one so bad, nor one in a worse cause. There seemed to have been a considerable deal of time, certainly not of argument, consumed in an endeavour to prove that the house of Mackintosh and Co. was solvent when Mr. Roberts quitted it, but he could assure his learned friend that all the might-bes and may-bes he had made use of, together with the cotton screw he had made use of also, would fail to screw up the assets to a state of solvency. But he would speak of the claim of Mr. Roberts as it appeared before the Court. It did not appear by the books of Mackintosh and Co. that Mr. Roberts was a trustee; but it appeared that he had represented to his creditors in London, or his partners had done so for him, that there was due to him from the house here £38,000, which had been cut down there to £34,000, and which had been ultimately cut down by the assignees here to Rs. 70,000. Perhaps he might be permitted, on the part of Mr. Sutherland, to disclaim any endeavour or wish to prevent any of the family of Mr. Roberts making a claim for the amounts for which it was now represented he was a trustee. He, however, was ready to shew that Mr. Roberts was not a trustee; and that an order pressed against him would not be injurious to any other party. With reference to the assignment, it could not be supported, for if it was shewn that the house here, had been entirely insolvent, he of course could convey nothing, and his assignees must be bound by the equities of the man whom they claim under. In April, 1831, Mr. Roberts sent a begging letter to the firm here with which he thought it necessary to tronble the Court, as it was asserted that Mr. Roberts was a creditor to a large amount (Reads.) "Having in consequence of my joining the house here, been under the necessity of hiring a house and furnishing it, and not having a penny in the world at my command, rather than add to the weight of my pauper situation here in Bishopsgate street, I have taken the liberty to pass the two following bills on you at the ruinous rate of one shilling and eight pence,—the only terms on which I was able to negociate them, viz.

On the 31st of March £423 or Sa. Rs 5,067

On the 6th of April £500 or Sa. Rs 6,000

Even these sums I should not have thought of drawing for had you continued to send on to Major Oliver, the accruing interest on Mrs. Roberts's trust and property, the deprivation of which, situated as I unfortunately am in this house, puts me and my large family to serious inconvenience. Trusting that you will kindly honor these two drafts, and pass the amount, when paid, to my debit, believe me, your attached friend, B. Roberts." This letter (Mr. Cochrane continued) the whole scope of it showed that it was not only written by a man who knew he had no claim on those he addressed, but who also knew the situation of his late partners. How was it that Mr. Roberts was not present on this occasion! Why was he not here at present 'acting under the deed of arrangement?' It appeared to him (Mr. Cochrane) that Mr. Roberts' conduct from beginning to end had either been a fraud against one set of creditors or a double fraud against both. He would now read the Court a letter which he had produced during the examination of Mr. Storm. It was written in hieroglyphics and Mr. Storm could not read it, though perhaps Mr. Roberts might be able to do so now, as he was gone to gather some information amongst the pyramids of Thebes: (Reads). "In regard to the credit through China, our former letters will have set the subject at rest for ever I hope. You are now fully aware of all the circumstances that led to the case; had direct remittance been made, they would never, I am assured, have been resorted to. But, my friend, means were T. W. P. H. W. P. H. W. P. N. and are still U. M. I. V. J. G. to meet your P. Y. W. R. F. Look, I beg of you, at C. J. S. Y. W. R. H. F., and G. P. J. N. M. F. O. W. V. W. P. S. Q. F. The consignments of the year lately made, you will find with referrence to prices here, and the frightful stock on hand, will not give an average anything like sufficient to cover the drafts passed in favor of the Board of Trade. Allow me once more to repeat the question I before put to Gordon. Where are R. L. P. R. F. to come from? Be assured that in India I never had anything like the W. P. E. U. G. H. E. that these things produce here. I must once more implore you all to take into N. Y. W. D. G. S. J. P. F. U. P. the T. P. G. P. W. S. W. M. H. in which T. G. shall be placed W. R. G. W Y. V. C. and V. W. Y. M. G. Y. G. M. U. H. H. F. be not I. Y. J. M. T. H. M. W. W. P. G. I will not dwell further on the subject but refer you to Mr. Rickard's letter." This letter (Mr. Cochrane continued) was of importance as it shewed that the partners were compelled to have recourse to hieroglyphics to conceal their situation from their head bookkeeper, and even Mr. Storm was not acquainted with the characters. Was this consistent with a belief that the house was solvent or that it might recover itself by 'a lucky hit or two' which Mr. Jenkins had spoken of? The learned counsel then commented at great length on the address of Mr. Turton, urging that even the statements made by Mr. Vanthart did not shew the real amount of the deficiencies and that the house had been insolvent for years to a much greater extent. If, the learned counsel argued, there was only a deficiency of five per cent. how came it that the book-keeper had deposed that the estate would only pay three annas in the rupee, and that not till after the lapse of five or six years after the failure.

Sir J. P. Grant said, he thought this was quite a different case from the question whether a partner can retire from an estate without notice and not be liable for the debts afterwards incurred; or from the question whether a partner may be entitled to retain the sum of money which he goes out for. In this case there was an agreement to pay a sum of money to the outgoing partner, but if the firm had no assets they could not of course fulfil their agreement, and it could not be supported against the claims of creditors. The claim here rested on two different grounds, the first was the balance of the agreement made on the retirement of Mr. Roberts and the second was the amount said to be received by the firm subsequent to that retirement. He thought it ought to be ascertained how much had been received by the firm since Mr. Roberts left it, and he did not see how that could be done without a reference to the Examiner. Mr. Turton agreed to wave the right to any sums but those received by the firm subsequent to Mr. Robert's retirement, and the Examiner was ordered to inquire and report as to their amount.

IN THE MATTER OF GEORGE WEYLAND MOSELEY.

Mr. Turton stated that the insolvent is a Major in the Company's Military Service; and applied for an order that one half of the insolvent's pay and allowances be appropriated to the liquidation of his debts. The learned counsel informed the Chief Justice that during his recent absence, an application had been made to Government, by the Court in order to ascertain what portion of a military insolvent's pay might be appropriated for the benefit of his creditors without injuring his efficiency as a public servant, and that on the receipt of an answer from the Vice-President in Council, it had been determined to set aside one half of the pay of field officers, and one third of the pay of subalterns for that purpose.

Mr. Clarke said, that the time the insolvent applied for his discharge, there was an application made on behalf of the assignee for some portion of his pay to be paid over for the benefit of the creditors, but that no order was made, it appearing to the Court that a considerable portion of the insolvent's pay and allowances was stopped and withheld in consequence of some defalcations in his account with Government as Timber Agent at Nathpore. The total amount of this defalcation was Rs. 1,31,089, and Government resolved to hold Major Moseley responsible to that extent, taking steps with the view of gradually liquidating the amount, by monthly stoppages of Rs. 300 of the Major's pay, at the same time leaving it to the Court of Directors to determine if any remission of the public claim against the insolvent could be allowed. The learned counsel then read the correspondence between the Government here and the Court at home, from which it appeared that the Court's attention was drawn to the following circumstances in favour of the merciful consideration for which Major Moseley had appealed. They are briefly, —that for the more active and enterprising duties of the Agency, a better officer could not probably have been found;—that it would have required the continued active exertions of an able accountant with efficient assistants to preserve the extensive and complicated accounts of the agency in order;—that so far from Major Moseley being an able accountant he appears to have no knowledge of any system of book-keeping, and was wholly dependant upon the native agents under him;—that during the investigation not a single overt act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of Major Moseley in the management of the agency has appeared, whilst it is evident he needlessly defrauded himself of no less a sum than Rs. 5,000 by entering to his debit a draft for Rs. 15,000 instead of for Rs. 10,000 the real amount and which was not discovered till after the compilation of the account by Captain Hawkins.—Finally, that Major Moseley is a married man with a rising family and is believed to have been for some time in embarrassed circumstances. To this communication the Court of Directors replied, that they regretted the loss which the public had sustained by the mismanagement of Major Moseley whilst employed in the Nauthpore Timber Agency, but upon a full consideration of all the circumstances they were induced to authorize the Government here to remit whatever balance might still be due from him to the Government at the date of their dispatch, provided it should appear that Major Mosely had no means of liquidating the amount except by stoppages from his military allowances. The learned counsel put in the affidavit of Mr. Robert Swinhoe, in which it was set forth, that the insolvent has a wife and six children; two of the latter are at school in England, one at school in India, and two under education by a teacher at the insolvent's house;—that to the best of deponent's belief the expense of educating the children is Rs. 260 per month, and that the insolvent has no other means or income whatever besides his pay and allowance as a Major in the army. Under these circumstances Mr. Clarke submitted that the insolvent was entitled to the favourable consideration of the Court.

Sir Edward Ryan said, that he had always found it difficult to determine what part of a military insolvent's pay should be given up to his creditors, but after the communication from Government the Court would not depart from the rule which had been adopted. Every thing had been done which could recommend the insolvent's case to the favourable consideration of the Court, but the Court must act on one general principle, and there might be a great deal in so doing; it might be an inducement to the military officer not only to repress extravagance, but to adopt a system of retrenchment in order to pay off debts already incurred, and to avoid what may be considered the disgrace of coming into this Court.

Mr. Clarke submitted that the order should only go to the ~~Rs~~ 300 per month, the amount remitted by the Court of Directors. That is, to take from the insolvent what the Court had restored to him, which would leave ~~Rs~~ 415 per month to keep up his station in the Army and for the education of his six children.

Sir Edward Ryan.—This Court must consider that the creditor has the first claim on the insolvent. Perhaps the Court might have exercised a discretion in this case had matters stood as they did formerly, but in the face of this communication from Government it cannot do it.

Mr. Clarke submitted that an application may be made to Government in this particular case.

Sir Edward Ryan.—No: the order must go forth.

IN THE MATTER OF FRANCIS JOHN SPILLER.

This insolvent is a Major in the East India Company's Military Service, has been declared entitled to the benefit of the Insolvent Act, and on the 23rd of August last it was ordered that he do pay over to Mr. Thomas Holroyd, his assignee, one half of his monthly pay and allowances for the benefit of his creditors, such monthly payments to commence four months from the date of the order. The assignee directed Messrs. Hogg and Sandes to forward an office copy of the order to the Pay Office at Benares, from which office the pay and allowances of the insolvent are receivable, but on the 23d ultimo, they received a reply from Captain Clayton, deputy pay master at Benares, returning the office copy of the order, and annexing a copy of a letter addressed to him by the insolvent, in which Major Spiller stated that he did not recognize the power which the assignee attempted to assume, and requested Captain Clayton would on no account make any deductions from his pay and allowances without special authority emanating from himself.

The Court, on the application of the assignee, now issued an order that the insolvent do forthwith direct Captain Clayton to pay to the assignee one half of his half pay and allowance.

SATURDAY, MARCH 21.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN EDWARD CHEETHAM.

Lieutenant John Edward Cheetham, of the 11th Regiment of Native Infantry, was brought up on his petition.

Mr. Judge stated that there were decrees against the insolvent in the Mofussil Courts of Request, to an amount of about ~~Rs~~ 1,000, of which, he apprehended, his client would be free in consequence of the parties being inserted in the schedule and served with notice. However, in consequence of the decrees he was under stoppages by Government of sixty rupees monthly, and £70 per annum was paid to his wife at home by the Court of Directors, which sum was also deducted out of the Insolvent's pay in this country. Under these circumstances he submitted that no part of the insolvent's pay should be set aside for the benefit of his creditors.

Sir Edward Ryan said under the circumstances it might be hard to take away one third of the insolvent's pay. There could be no question but that he was discharged from the debts inserted in his schedule, but he might be under some obligation to the Military Court which had decreed against him. As for the circumstance of the Insolvent's family arrangements, he had before stated, on a recent occasion, it would be impossible for any Court of Equity to take it into consideration. The Court must act on one general principle. The only question here was that of time, and he would make no order at present but direct the assignee to make inquiries regarding the insolvent's situation, and then to apply for such order as he may think proper.

Lieutenant Cheetham took the usual oath and was discharged.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG AND OTHERS.

Mr. Turton presented a petition from the assignees stating the resolutions passed at the recent meeting of creditors, one of which, after stating that the assignees had certified to having possession of assets equal in value to one half the insolvents' debts, recommended that the remuneration of the assignees should be a commission of ten per cent. on the dividends, the assignees paying all charges except law charges. If it was likely that the out turn of the estate would enable the assignee to pay eight annas in the rupee, the learned counsel said, there could be no doubt that the remuneration would be too much. But the fact was that the certificate of the assignee extended to assets whether for the payments of mortgages, or the payment of dividends, and not to the payments of dividends alone. From the statement he held in his hand it was quite clear that a remuneration of ten per cent. on the dividends was insufficient although the expenses of the establishment had been greatly reduced.

Mr. McFarlan, the chairman of the meeting, informing the Court, that no statement of the probable out turn of the estate had been laid before the meeting.

Sir Edward Ryan said, he would rather not decide if a full statement of the probable out-turn had not been made to the creditors; and he suggested the propriety of calling another meeting. The Court, of course, was not bound by the resolutions of the creditors, but it was always read to listen to their suggestions.

Mr. Turton explained that the assignees were willing to take a commission of five per cent. on the dividends, and five per cent. on the payments to the Bank of Bengal.

Mr. Fullarton, as we understood, was favourable to this proposition; and during some conversation it was stated that the assignees' estimate of the recoverable debts was less than that gentleman's. It was the opinion of the assignees that there would not be more than twenty lakhs applicable for the purposes of a dividend during the next five years.

Sir Edward Ryan did not think the assignees' proposition unreasonable, but he thought it was advisable to have the opinion of the creditors.

Mr. Turton applied to the Court on a subject connected with the final discharge of the insolvents. The assignees found that there were a number of creditors in Europe who had taken no proceedings whatever in this Court; others had taken proceedings, both here and under the Commission at home, and others had proceeded at home only. A question arose whether it was necessary to have the consents of such creditors to the insolvents' discharge as had taken no proceedings, or proceedings at home only. The creditors who had taken no proceedings whatever, consisted chiefly of those who had withdrawn their deposits many yesrs ago leaving perhaps a trifling amount, which, by interest and compound interest, had accumulated into their present balances. Of these parties the assignees knew nothing, and could know nothing except that the estate was liable, so far as the debts were established by being inserted in the schedule, but the question on which the assignees felt a difficulty was whether the consents of such parties were requisite to the insolvents' discharge under the sixty third section of the Act. The learned counsel referred to the Act, and read a part of the section which authorized the Court to grant a final discharge from all liability whenever it shall appear that the estate of such insolvent debtor, which shall have come to the hand of the assignee or assignees shall have produced sufficient to pay three fourths of the amount of the debts which shall have been established in such Courts, or that creditors to the number of more than one half shall have signified their consents in writing, &c. This was a novel application entirely with reference to this question; but as to the creditors who had proceeded at home, he apprehended, as the order for discharge did not affect them, their consents were not necessary.

Sir Edward Ryan suggested before a distinct application was made to the Court, that the debts should be arraigned, for example, first the Indian creditor; secondly, those who have taken proceedings in this court under the petition; thirdly, those who have taken proceedings in this Court and in England; fourthly, those who have taken proceedings in England only; and lastly, those who have taken no proceedings whatever. It was matter of very considerable importance, and it might be a question, looking at the whole of the act, how far it applied regarding the insolvents discharges, but in the present shape of the the application any opinion would be merely speculation.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES YOUNG.

Mr. Leith moved to make a rule absolute, obtained on the 7th instant, for the payment of a sum of money on behalf of the trustees of the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs. It appeared that the debt was proved by mistake against the private estate of Mr. Sutherland alone, and that in the meantime the whole of the dividends had been paid out of the private estate of Mr. Young which was jointly liable for this debt. However, as there was a surplus in the hands of the assignee of Mr. Young's private estate, the present application was made for payment of the balance out of it.

On the suggestion of Mr. Turton, who appeared on behalf of the assignees of the firm of Alexander and Co., the Court ordered that notice of the application be given to the assignees of the firm who were interested in the surplus, and that the application be renewed next Court day.

THE STEAM COMMUNICATION.

THE SUB-COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

In conformity to the resolution of the General Committee, we proceeded, on the afternoon of Monday the 2d instant, to examine Captain Forth of the Forbes. From him we endeavoured to ascertain the cause of the lengthened passage to Madras, and the causes of delay in the other stages of the voyage to Suez.

On the 3 I we again assembled to examine that officer; on the 4th and 5th, the chief Engineer Mr. Dyus appeared before us, and Mr. Conningham the 2d; on the 5th Mr. Woodley the 1st officer, and the second and third Engineers.

We did not make any detailed record of the examinations and cross-examinations each individual underwent, but proceed to give you the substance of the information we were able to gather from all.

As regards the voyage to Madras, we learn from Captain Forth and his officers, that the delay is to be ascribed to the giving way of some stays that had been fixed to the boilers to strengthen them, and the necessity for repairing them—in this no blame is attributable to the Engineer; that they encountered a tremendous gale described by one of the parties (Mr. Conningham) as equal in violence, for four hours to the one in which the Hon'ble Company's ship Duke of York was lost in May, 1833, when he was on board a vessel in the River—this occurred off Masulipatam, and drove them greatly to the southward and eastward of their regular course.

We regret to say we have received no satisfactory explanation of the diminished speed and number of revolutions of the paddles. Neither Captain Forth or his officers pretend to explain the matter and the Engineers have not satisfactorily accounted for it. This is again more strikingly evinced on the passage from Madras to Galle, when the vessel did not come up to the speed she has evinced under similar circumstances on previous and subsequent occasions. We have endeavoured to obtain explanations on these points in vain.

On the departure of the vessel from Galle it does not appear that the full measure of coals for which provisions was made by the Committee was embarked in the Forbes and the Regia which she towed, and though we are not satisfied with the speed of the Forbes whilst the Regia was in tow, yet strange to say, she did not much exceed it after the Regia was cast off. We endeavoured to ascertain if this was attributable to any defective stowage or trim of the vessel, but regret to say that we cannot elicit from the examination of all on board, any satisfactory explanation of the matter. There was nothing in the weather or the sea to contend against. Had they persevered steaming direct to Socotra with spirit, we cannot doubt but a different result would have been obtained, whereas after casting off the brig, they steamed on for twenty hours at nearly as slow a rate as before, employed three and a half days in packing the engines and clearing the flues, and again steamed on for five days, during which the vessel often proceeded at upwards of seven knots against the wind, and then by a zig-zag route, under sail, with light baffling winds, gained sight of Socotra in sixteen days, and steamed at the rate of eight knots an hour into harbour.

At Socotra the arrangements for embarking the coals and supplying the ship were highly creditable to the parties engaged by Captain Ross and Tauher Ally and to the officers and crew of the steamer. The Forbes proceeded on to Suez equal to the most sanguine expectations of the Committee.

|---|---|
| From Socotra to Mocha..... | 4½ days |
| Mocha to Judda..... | 4 |
| Judda to Suez..... | 6 |

running 5½ and 6½ and 7 knots against a fresh breeze.

The delay at Suez from 17th to 29 h November was immaterial; but her voyage down the Red Sea exhibits the same inefficiency that prevailed in former parts of the voyage.

|---|---|
| Suez to Judda..... ..... ..... | 8 days |
| Judda to Mocha ..... | 9½ |
| Mocha to Socotra..... | 17 |

From 8 A. M. of the 8th till 5 P. M. of that day the steam was up, but the vessel at anchor waiting for passengers; they took a buggalo in tow and went on till 7 A. M. of the 10th. Hove to, steaming head to wind, to keep ship steady till daylight, to send passengers on shore. The loss of time reckoned at six knots an hour might have carried the ship to Mocha in as short a period as she was going that distance on the way up.

At Socotra, on the return seventeen days were expended in what formerly occupied only two, part may be attributed to difference of weather and the unsettled state of the island consequent upon its having been just before taken possession of by a British detachment; but such protracted delay appears incompatible with any great degree of energy or exertion.

Immediately on leaving Socotra the coals were used to stem a gale then blowing, whereas by merely laying to or pushing on the best course they could, the wind being from the north-east, they would have saved their fuel. The consequence was, that their coals were expended long before they approached Galle and it consequently took 23 days to reach that harbour.

From Galle they came to Madras in five days.

The delay at Madras was occasioned by the repair of a crank pin, and the vessel proceeded on here and came up the river Hoogley at a rate, which the Engineers state showed the efficiency and good order of the engines, but in our opinion only proves how little justice had been done to the vessel on other occasions.

To the repeated inquiries put to the Engineers, to account in any way for the inferior rates of steaming, they invariably attributed it to the bad quality of the coals, forming clinkers to a degree that rendered removal frequently necessary. But it appears to us a strong fact that the coals most complained of, obtained at Galle and Madras in going, are the same which propelled the steamer so triumphantly up the Hoogley; and the coals which were so efficient in the Red Sea in going, were the reverse on the return voyage—we were not able to discover from the Log book that there existed any causes, connected with weather or sea, to explain this difference.

We cannot consider the result of our investigation as satisfactory.

The particular causes of delay above enumerated, are not of themselves sufficient to account for the slow progress of the Forbes, nor are we able to pronounce with any degree of certainty, that mismanagement materially operated to produce the unfortunate result which we have been investigating, and although we have been unable distinctly to trace the causes of the failure, we have abundant reason to believe that justice has not been done to the vessel. Comparing her average speed on the recent trip, with the average of her former performances, we have been unable to find any sufficient reason to dissuade us from the belief, that the vessel will do again, what on former occasions she is proved to have done, and consequently that our opinion of her capability to perform the voyage, within a moderate period, was well founded.

We have ascertained that in estimating the concentration by Hydrometer, the Engineer made a mistake in waiting till the water was cool, and that from the excess of blowing off, a somewhat larger quantity of fuel was expended than was necessary.

With regard to the stoppages which were said to have been made for the purpose of performing this operation, the Committee will judge how impracticable it was for us to arrive at the truth, when we mention that the entries of the stoppages for this purpose, which we found in the Log Book, are declared to be erroneous by the head Engineer, who affirms that the Forbes was not stopped on that account so often as is stated, though the opportunity of her stopping for clearing the fire of the clinkers and for other purposes, was taken to blow off.

We observed that the Forbes while towing the Regia generally made greater speed during the night than during the day, the cause of it was discovered to be that the Brig was hauled up close during the day for the purpose of taking out coals, which was not the case during the night, when coals were not taken out of her, and the tow rope was veered out.

From the inquiries we have made of all the individuals employed on this trip, there appears to be nothing in the voyage, either as regards winds or currents, to frustrate the permanent establishment of Steam Communication between Calcutta and Suez. Were the good anchorage at King's Island on the Maldives, as mentioned by Mr. Woodley, or Minicoy, available, no difficulty would exist. In fact there is no part of the passage that might not be satisfactorily accomplished by a sea-going Steamer of moderate power.

We understand that the necessary repairs of the Forbes will occupy at least two months, and it is probable therefore, that she may not be ready for sea for ten weeks, but we would recommend that she should start again if possible on or about the 1st of June.

This though not the most favorable season is as good a one as could be selected for an experimental voyage, and if the Forbes should be successful on the next occasion, the fact of the feasibility of making the voyage at all seasons will be established beyond dispute. We see no reason why she should not succeed. Not only has her recent failure been attempted to be accounted for by causes of partial operation, but it has occurred under circumstances which make it exceedingly doubtful, whether some degree of mismanagement (which it may be hoped will not again occur) has not operated more than any other cause to produce this result seeing that without apparent or assignable reason, the performances of the Forbes during her recent voyage have fallen far short of what experience warranted us in expecting, and we may add that both officers and engineers unite in the highest commendation of the Forbes, describing her as a sea boat, equal with the spunsons which were added, to any weather.

The communication on the other side of the Isthmus will doubtless be in active operation about the time the Forbes starts again, and it might be the source of much disappointment if the communications on this side were to fail. Bearing in mind the importance of keeping alive the interest of this undertaking, and not being aware of any other purpose to which the fund in hand could be legitimately appropriated, we have no hesitation in recommending another trial. If on the one hand zeal may be said to have been damped by the result of the last voyage, yet experience has been gained, and a degree of confidence has been acquired as to the safety of the vessel which cannot fail to be serviceable.

We have only further to suggest that in order to avoid the delay occasioned by tugging a vessel from Galle, it would be desirable if it could be arranged, as we are led to believe it may, that a vessel laden with coal should be stationed at one of the Maldive (King's) Islands or at some spot mid-way between Galle and Socotra.

It might be matter for consideration, whether it would not suffice to send the Forbes to Cassin instead of to Suez on the approaching voyage.

The Committee will naturally expect that we should record some opinion as to the conduct of the officers and engineers who were employed in the Forbes during the last trip.

But we cannot record censure without proof of culpability, and though we cannot but believe that mismanagement existed some where, we have no reason to suspect that there existed wilful misconduct in any quarter. Still it will be for the Committee to determine what arrangement shall be made for the proposed voyage.

In the selection of the Engineer, the Committee had no choice but were obliged by the assignees to take their nomination of a man deemed fully adequate; he has declined going again.

With regard to the other officers, the Committee had to select from those who offered their services in reply to a public advertizement, and we do not know that they could have under the circumstances made a better choice, though it might have been advantageous if men of experience in Steam Navigation as well as competent nautical knowledge could have been obtained.

In conclusion, we would beg to recommend that the Log of the Forbes, or an abstract of it should be published for general information.

I concur in the above report as regards the difficulty we have experienced in ascertaining the precise causes of the tardy progress made by the Forbes, but I think that sea and weather have had more effect in producing it than is estimated, and I cannot therefore agree in recommending that a second voyage should be attempted in the month of June with this vessel.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE TO THE SUBSCRIBERS TO THE NEW BENGAL STEAM FUND.

The Committee of the New Bengal Steam Fund, having duly considered the report of the Sub Committee appointed to inquire into the cause of the length of the voyage of the Forbes to Suez and back, being satisfied that it did not arise from any defect of the vessel, it was determined by the majority of the Committee to despatch her again about the 1st June, it having been ascertained that the necessary repairs to the machinery could not be effected before that time.

This determination was come to chiefly on the following grounds; first, in respect to the vessel herself it has been shown that she is capable of carrying 160 tons of coal—that the consumption of Europe coal was $13\frac{3}{4}$ tons per diem, allowing nearly 12 days' consumption—that with 157 tons of Burdwan coal on board, she left Juddah for Suez, and steamed W. N. W. 4k. 4f. 4k. 6f. and 5k. against moderate breezes N. W., and within 18 hours of leaving the port went 4 knots against fresh breezes, and heavy head sea—that returning from Juddah she left with 163 tons and with a fair wind, went 5k. 6f. and 6 knots; while on the outward voyage she left Socotra with 147 tons on board, and went for 16 consecutive hours 5k. 6f. against light winds and airs. Her qualities as a sea-boat were tried in a heavy gale of wind in the bay, four hour of which are described as being as heavy as that which occurred here in May 1833, and again in another gale on leaving Socotra on her return. On this occasion she left Socotra with 150 tons of coal on board, and after steaming only 21 hours, she was brought head direct against a strong gale and high sea, and steamed against it for seven hours making $\frac{1}{2}$ and 1 knot per hour without straining, or taking any seas on board.

Her failure then in making the last voyage appeared to the majority of the Committee mainly to arise, first; from the full speed of which she was capable not having been generally obtained, and from the unnecessary frequency of blowing off; secondly, in the passage from Galle to Socotra, from the proper quantity of coal directed to be laden on the Regia, not having been put on board, only $62\frac{1}{2}$ instead of 80 tons having been supplied; and thirdly, from the inferior quality of some of the coal at Juddah, and of that at Mocha sent from Bombay, having caused its expenditure prior to reaching Socotra on the return; although, if the vessel had not been detained after leaving Juddah to land certain passengers, and the chimney had been properly repaired prior to leaving Suez, where it was found defective, instead of being left in a bad state, not only causing detention but encreased consumption of coal, the delay of this part of the voyage would not have occurred; the inferior quality of the coal not being of consequence otherwise than by encreasing labor and trouble where the depôts are not far separated.

The majority were further induced to determine to send the Forbes again by the consideration that the expense of the coals had been incurred; and mainly from the desire to keep up the interest already excited at home in favour of the establishment o the navigation, which they considered it their peculiar duty to sustain and keep alive by every means within their power.

However on requiring the assignees of the estate of Messrs. Mackintosh and Co. to repair the machinery on the terms of the agreement, those gentlemen evinced much disinclination to co-operate further, and a desire to have the vessel made over again to them; and after a month had elapsed from the return of the vessel, during which nothing had been done (notwithstanding every effort on the part of the Committee towards the repairs which were required) to the machinery, the assignees tendered to the Committee the sum of Rs. 10,000, the amount agreed upon for the infringement of the contract by either party.

After this time had elapsed, the Committee, under all the circumstances of the case, felt bound to take this offer into consideration, prior to proceeding to the measure, which they had in contemplation, of themselves repairing the machinery and subsequently calling on the assignees to make good the expense.

The result of that consideration was a determination, if Government would take the coal belonging to the fund at several depôts at the cost at which it stands on the books of the fund, to accept the offer, and to retain the remaining funds to be employed hereafter, according to circumstances, in the manner most consonant to the original directions of the Subscribers.

The Committee were induced to adopt this course by the following considerations; first, that they could not hold out with certainty any fixed period for the departure of the steamer under these circumstances, and that the consequent advantage to the public and the subscribers was thereby greatly lessened; secondly, the inconveniences which would have arisen from the continued employment of the vessel in direct opposition to the wishes of the assignees, especially with reference to the difficulty of obtaining the services of a thoroughly competent engineer to the satisfaction of both parties on whose qualifications, it is obvious, the success or failure of the future voyage would chiefly depend; thirdly, that some of the Committee were opposed to the renewed voyage altogether; and lastly, it being understood that confident hopes are entertained that ere long steamers of sufficient capacity for every stage of the voyage will arrive in this country on speculation, by which means the communication may be more certainly made.

Government having consented to take the coal at the cost on the books, subject to a refund for any deficiency which may be found to exist when the delivery takes place, the Committee now give notice to the Subscribers that they have made the Forbes over to the assignees.

The amount of the remaining assets is about Sa. Rs. 76,000, subject to the continued salaries of the agents at Socotra and Juddah, until notice is given to them of their services being no longer required, and to a refund to government deficiency in the delivery of the coal, the particulars of which cannot be as yet at all correctly calculated. The Committee have therefore resolved that these funds shall remain invested in Company's paper at the Union Bank, according to the original instructions of the subscribers, and that no part thereof shall be appropriated to any purpose without the reference to the Subscribers at large directed in the resolutions 7 and 8 of the General Meeting of the 22d June, 1833, viz.

"Seventh—Resolved unanimously, that at the General Meeting referred to in the fifth Resolution, if it shall appear to the majority of the Subscribers and proxies present in number and amount, that there is a fair and reasonable prospect of the plan proposed by the Committee being successful, it shall be competent for such majority to direct the whole or any portion of the fund subscribed to be paid in aid of that plan, and that the decision of such majority shall be binding on each individual Subscriber."

"Eighth.—Resolved unanimously, that a period of not less than six weeks shall elapse between the publication of the Committee's Report in the public papers of this Presidency, and the calling of the General Meeting of Subscribers, to take it into consideration, and that Subscribers resident beyond the precincts of the town of Calcutta, be entitled to vote by proxy or by letter should they so desire it, otherwise the sense of the majority of vivâ voce and written votes to decide the matter."

In the mean time the Committee will not fail to give their attention to the best means of promoting the objects for which they were constituted, and on arriving at any conclusion on the subject they will have the honour of again addressing themselves to the Subscribers.

MINUTE BY CAPTAIN FORBES.

Having been in the minority alluded to in the report, I entirely concur in the opinion it expresses, that under the circumstances it was expedient to accept the proposal of the assignees.

Report of the Deputation of Uncovenanted Assistants appointed to wait on LORD WILLIAM BENTINCK with the Memorial of that Body, according to the Resolution of the General Meeting held at the Town Hall, on Wednesday, the 25th February, 1835.
