PREFACE.

THE work which is now presented to the world assumes, by its comprehensively national title, that the various and diversified information it contains is so illustrative of the Scottish nation, and of the origin and constitution of modern Scottish society, as to justify the adoption for it of a designation so conspicuous. Of any other country, it is true, an account of its surnames, families, and honours, would cast little or no light over the constitution of the society existing therein. Such an account would probably tell next to nothing of the earlier races out of which society was formed, because, in the case of any other nation, whatever might elsewhere be found to illustrate that part of its history, few indications in the names now borne by individuals or families, or in its titles of honour, will be found to mark the tribes or institutions whence they sprung, or to be otherwise identified with the commencement of its national unity. This is a result to be found in Scotland alone; not uniformly, indeed, nor always without admixture of doubt, but certainly in a greater degree than in any other kingdom or state.

Modern Scottish society, and Scottish nationality in its proper sense, may be said to have come into existence together. Hereditary monarchy, hereditary surnames, families, and honours, hitherto unknown among its peoples, were their common instruments for consolidation, for conservation, and for progress. To the Cumbrian, the Pict, the Scot, Norwegian, Dane, or Saxon, who, at various times and in various degrees, were spread over its soil, these distinctions were exceptional and comparatively unknown.

In the early part of the twelfth century, the greater part of the country now constituting Scotland was in a state little better than that of chaos, and worse than that of anarchy. A contemporary document of a solemn character describes the southern portion (and it may be held as equally true of the northern) as having till then been occupied rather than inhabited "by diverse tribes of diverse nations coming from diverse parts; of dissimilar language, features, and modes of living, not easily able to hold converse among themselves, practically Pagans rather than Christians, living more like irrational animals than as worthy of the name of a people,"* and even deducting from this picture for the exaggerations of a Churchman, enough remains to confirm the foregoing remark. The arrival of a new people of polished manners, military discipline, and Christian zeal, by giving new institutions and, for a time, a new language to this incongruous mass, created a nation and a nationality, yet without a so-called revolution or even a change of dynasty. The new race, whose presence was so beneficially felt in Scotland, came through England, yet were not of it. They were the Normans,—a people of the same original stock as many of the tribes above referred to, but refined and instructed by familiarity with the institutions of the South.

This new order of things, however, might have attained to no permanence, or even if permanent, to no historic significance—at least in the sense which our title assumes—had not the silent but ceaseless immigration of the new race continued without interruption for nearly two centuries, in the course of which they identified their fortunes with those of a dynasty which, although sprung from an elder settlement of the population, was led by sympathy, education, and the necessities of their position, to cherish, enrich, and lean upon this new people for the preservation of their crown and prerogatives, and to cement their union by numerous family alliances. A revolution, which placed first one and then another family of the new race upon the throne of Scotland, completed the solidarity of the social union of races in Scotland, while it prevented fresh admixtures of foreign blood; and lastly and chiefly the practice of bestowing hereditary surnames and honours, and of holding all lands from the Crown, which obtained generally throughout this period, and found a permanent and faithful record in charters and other public deeds, many of which are still in existence, insured to Scotland the integrity and continuity of its social annals.

* Diversæ tribus, diversarum nacionum, ex diversis partibus affluentes, regionem prefatum habitaverunt Sed dispari gente et dissimuli linguâ, et varia more viventes, haut facile (inter) sese consencientes, gentilitatem potius quam fidei cultum tenuerunt Quos infelices et damnate habitacionis, habitatores, more pecudum irrationabiliter degentes, dignatus est Dominus, . . . visitare — Inquisition by David Prince of Cumbria (circa 1116)

The surnames traceable to immigrant Norman chiefs, or to the lands bestowed upon their retainers, constitute by far the greater portion of those peculiar and pertaining to vast numbers of individuals forming modern Scottish society. Under those derived from lands, not a few Danish and Norwegian names are to be found, which, in like manner as those of Celtic and Norman origin referring to personal or local distinctives, are to be recognised by their composition; yet, while of this latter class, even in the remote North we find in the names Fraser, Grant, Cameron, and others, undeniable proofs, notwithstanding their present use of the Celtic tongue, of a Norman or French immigration, the composition of the southern population is singularly manifested when the distinctive of an individual of the more ancient lineage is there, as in the case of a Fleming or an Inglis, expressed by the simple name of Scott. An account of the origin or of the original holders of these surnames of the forefathers of the present Scottish people, cannot fail to be highly interesting to all classes at the present day.

But, a mere explanation of the origin of surnames alone would lack completeness unless accompanied with some account of the families by which they were borne,—of the distribution of those families over the country,—of their subdivision into new families,—and of the distinguished individuals who sustained their reputation and promoted their influence: and such an account it is one of the objects of this Work to supply. 'THE SCOTTISH NATION' professes to present the succession, the affiliations and alliances, and the leading incidents in the history of the families whose surnames have obtained distinction and influence throughout Scotland since the reign of Malcolm Canmore.

The ancient baronies of Scotland, associated as they were with hereditary jurisdictions only short of regal, had all a significancy in that country unequalled in any others where the feudal regime obtained. The holders of these honours were regarded as heads of its name as well as of their vassals; and to promote the honour of the one as well as the welfare of the other was their business and their strength. An account of these honours is an account of the territorial supremacy of a name and of a family, among the members of which the lands under the jurisdiction of their heads were in course of time parcelled out.

A history of Scottish titles is a necessary supplement to that of families, and a key to many of the social and political incidents in that kingdom as well as in the history and fortunes of its families. Such a history forms, therefore, another and it is hoped a valuable topic of the present Work.

Immeasurably beyond all these social facts in importance, although greatly illustrated by the lights they furnish, the biographies of its distinguished natives become, when properly treated, the topic which illustrates and shows forth in its strength and peculiarities 'THE SCOTTISH NATION.' The poorest country in Europe, occupied by a hardy race trained to military exercises, struggling for centuries to maintain their national independence, and ever contending for mastery amongst themselves, Scotland has beheld her sons loving and honouring the country that gave them birth with a high and pure patriotism; and clinging to each other with a proverbial partiality, yet not alone on account of their common relationship, but also for those qualities of endurance, energy, and intelligence which their common struggles and even social feuds drew forth and incorporated as it were with the national character. At a comparatively early period she sent forth many of her sons to obtain distinction and honours in other lands; and when more peaceful times had arrived and milder institutions obtained, she saw them launch into the arts of civil life, for which their hereditary qualities, animated by the lessons of a simple but sincere piety, had well prepared them, and assert for themselves a front rank among the leaders of mind and intellect in Europe, in numbers altogether unexampled in the social development of other nations. Of such men is Scotland's pride and glory, and their lives and deeds constitute the truest account of the Scottish nation.

In its general biography the present work embraces a wider range than is contemplated in any of those specially devoted to that subject, comprising many names not to be met with in history, yet of men whose skill, genius, or labours have added to the comfort, the knowledge, or the happiness of mankind. Not a few names, moreover, that have long been borne down by undeserved obloquy have been restored to their proper position; while others, upheld by misstatement or exaggeration at an undue elevation, have been placed on a lower pedestal. In all cases the truth has been stated, without reference to party feelings or sectarian misrepresentations.

In the department of literature great attention has been bestowed upon the articles relating to men distinguished by their writings. By appending the titles and dates of their works, and sometimes when these were numerous, classifying the subjects treated of, easy reference is combined with great economy of space. In a word, as respects the productions of its literary characters, 'THE SCOTTISH NATION' becomes as it were a Bibliotheca Scottica corrected and brought down to the present day.

For a work of this character it is evident that an Alphabetical arrangement, or what is generally although incorrectly known as the Dictionary form, is the only one compatible with clearness, order, and facility of reference, and accordingly such a form has been adopted, with some peculiarities which it is hoped will be found to improve it in these respects. In all other works of this kind, when several articles or parties of the same name came to be described, the sub-alphabetical order, or that of the initial letters has obtained. In the case of biographies, however, on this principle, the ancestor is placed often at a distance from and not unfrequently long after his descendants. Throughout long lists of similar surnames the strictly alphabetical arrangement mixes up epochs, and mars all attempts to present the connection which distinguished individuals bearing them had to one another. This inconvenience, except in a few unimportant cases, has been obviated by a double arrangement. In narrating isolated biographies of individuals of the same surname the order in time is followed; they succeed each other according to the epochs in which the parties lived. Where, however, a lineal descent is traceable, the biographies are introduced and continued in a direct succession. The order of the series is here chronological, but in the order of families, and not by individuals.

To the student of Scottish history the value of the assistance furnished by a work of the character of 'THE SCOTTISH NATION' need not be dwelt upon In the accounts given of every family or title of antiquity and note, numerous indirect and incidental lights are thrown upon its pages. The direct additional matter it supplies, is, however, perhaps of still more importance. In this, as well as in many other points, it will be found a more accurate and complete exhibition of the Earlier History of Scotland than any that has yet been presented to the public.

In the course of his labours the author was necessarily obliged to enter into an extensive correspondence with noblemen and gentlemen in all parts of the kingdom, and with some families out of it, and he now returns his acknowledgments to all for the kindness and promptitude with which they answered his applications, furnished valuable information, and, in many cases, placed their family records, for the time, at his perusal. It may give some idea of the care and research bestowed upon this work when it is stated that the author was altogether nearly twelve years occupied in its composition and correction.

The Autographs, Seals, Genealogical and Titular tables, and other illustrative objects, as well as the Portraits on wood and steel with which the work is so profusely embellished, have all been taken from original or other authentic sources.

A National Gallery of Scottish Portraits has long been pointed out as a desideratum, and learned societies have recently brought the matter strongly before the public In the care taken to make the Portrait illustrations authentic and numerous in a degree far beyond those in any collection heretofore presented to the world, the Publishers anticipate that the first exhibition of a NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY worthy of the name will be found in the pages of 'THE SCOTTISH NATION.'

The Biographies that were required to be added during the publication of the work by demise of distinguished individuals, are given in the form of a Supplement.

THE

ABERCORN

ABERCORN, Marquis of, is a peerage held by the Hamilton family in its eldest surviving male heir, as directly descended from Lord Claud Hamilton (see vol ii p 418), fourth son of James, second earl of Arran, regent of Scotland in the minority of Queen Mary He was created duke of Chatelherault in the kingdom of France Lord Claud was distinguished for his zealous and steady attachment to Mary Queen of Scots, and at an early age was appointed commendator of the abbacy of Paisley The extensive lands of this abbacy were after the Reformation erected into a temporal lordship, and he was elevated to the peerage under the title of Lord Paisley He died in 1622, aged 78 He married Margaret, only daughter of George, sixth Lord Seton, and had by her four sons, of whom James the eldest, was created baron of Abercorn, 1603, and, in 1606, advanced to the dignity of earl of Abercorn, baron of Paisley, Hamilton, Mountcastle, and Kilpatrick The estate of Abercorn, from which this title is derived, is in Linlithgowshire The name is derived from Aber, beyond, and Corn, a corruption of Curn, which has generally been held as equivalent to Carron The earl of Abercorn was appointed in 1604 one of the commissioners on the part of Scotland to treat of a union with England As one of the promoters of the plantation of Ulster, he had a very great estate granted out of the escheated lands in that country, and was called as a peer to the parliament of Ireland in 1613 He died in 1618, and was succeeded by his son James, who during his father's lifetime had been created a peer of Ireland in 1616, by the title of baron of Strabane James, the second earl, was a loyal supporter of Charles I On the death of the second duke of Hamilton in 1651, without male issue, he became the male representative of the house of Hamilton He was succeeded by his son George, third earl, at whose death, without issue, the title devolved upon Claud, grandson of Claud second Lord Strabane Claud, fourth earl of Abercorn, adhered to James VII at the Revolution, and after the battle of the Boyne embarked for France, but was killed on the voyage in 1690 His brother Charles, fifth earl, gave in his adhesion to King William's government, and died in 1701 without surviving issue The title then devolved on James, descended from Sir George Hamilton, fourth son of the first earl, and great-grandson of the first duke of Chatelherault On the occasion of the clause in the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, stipulating for justice to the Hamilton family in regard to the duchy of Chatelherault, James sixth earl of Abercorn, preferred his claim as nearest heir male of the first duke, against that of Anne, duchess of Hamilton, the heir female The court of France, however, came to no decision James, eighth earl, was created a peer of Great Britain in 1786, by the title of Viscount Hamilton John James Hamilton, 9th earl, was advanced to the dignity of marquis of Abercorn in 1790, and dying in 1818, was succeeded by his grandson, James, 2d marquis The latter, on Jan 16, 1862, was served heir male of the 1st duke of Chatelherault The marquis of Abercorn is the chief and heir male of the house of Hamilton

ABERCROMBY

ABERCROMBIE, or ABERCROMBY, a surname derived from a barony of that name in Fifeshire, erected in a district originally named Abercrombie, aber meaning beyond, and crombie, the crook, in allusion to the bend or crook of Fifeness The parish, until recently called St Monance and now Abercromby, was known by the name of Abercrombie so far back as 1174 The Abercrombies of that ilk were esteemed the chiefs of the name until the seventeenth century, when that line became extinct, and Abercromby of Birkenbog, in Banffshire, became the head of the clan of Abercromby In 1637 Alexander Abercromby of Birkenbog was created a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia, and distinguished himself as a royalist during the civil wars The baronetcy is still in the family

ABERCROMBIE, Baron, an extinct peerage, bestowed by Charles I, in 1647, on Sir James Sandilands of St Monance, or Abercrombie, in Fife, descended from James Sandilands belonging to the noble house of Torphichen Lord Abercrombie married a daughter of the first earl of Southesk and by her he had a son, James, second Lord Abercrombie, who dying without issue in 1681, the title became extinct

ABERCROMBY of Abouki and Tullibody, Baron, a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom, conferred in 1801 on Mary Anne, widow of the celebrated Sir Ralph Abercromby, immediately after her husband's death at the battle of Alexandria, with remainder to the heirs male of the deceased general Baroness Abercromby died in 1821, and was succeeded by her eldest son, George, a barrister at law, first baron On his death in 1843, Colonel George Ralph Abercromby, his son born in 1800, became second baron The latter died in 1852 when his son, George Ralph Campbell

Abercromby, born in 1838, became third baron See ABERCROMBY, SIR RALPH

ABERCROMBIE, JOHN, M D, an eminent physician, and moral and religious writer, was born in Aberdeen, 12th October, 1780 His father was minister of the East church of that city After having completed his literary education in his native city, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, to prosecute his studies for the medical profession The celebrated Dr Alexander Monro was at that time professor of anatomy and surgery there, and the subject of this memoir attended his lectures

In 1803, being then twenty-three years of age, Dr Abercrombie began to practise as a physician in Edinburgh He soon acquired a high reputation, and became extensively known to his professional brethren through the medium of his contributions to the 'Medical and Surgical Journal' On the death of the celebrated Dr Gregory in 1821, Dr Abercrombie at once took his place as a consulting physician He was also named physician to the king for Scotland, an appointment which, though merely honorary and nominal, is usually conferred on the physician of greatest eminence at the time of a vacancy He subsequently held, till his death, the office of physician to George Heriot's Hospital In 1828, he published a treatise on the 'Diseases of the Brain and Nervous System,' and soon after an essay on those of the 'Abdominal Organs,' both of which rank high among professional publications In 1830 he appeared as an author in a branch of literature entirely different, and one involving the treatment of subjects in the highest department of philosophy and metaphysical speculation, having published in that year his able work, in 8vo, on the 'Intellectual Powers' In 1833 he produced a work of a similar kind, on 'The Philosophy of the Moral Feelings,' also in 8vo In 1832, during the prevalence of the cholera, he had published a medical tract entitled 'Suggestions on the Character and Treatment of Malignant Cholera' In 1834 he published a pamphlet entitled 'Observations on the Moral Condition of the Lower Orders in Edinburgh' The same year appeared an address delivered by him at the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Destitute Sick Society, Edinburgh He was also the author of Essays on the 'Elements of Sacred Truth,' and on the 'Harmony of Christian Faith and Character,' besides other writings which have been comprised in a small volume entitled 'Essays and Tracts' Of writings so well known, and so very highly esteemed, as proved by a circulation extending, as it did in some, even to an eighteenth edition, it were useless to speak in praise either of their literary or far higher merits But, distinguished as he was, both professionally and as a writer in the highest departments of philosophy, it was not exclusively to his great fame in either respect, or in both, that he owed his wide influence throughout the community in which he lived His name ever stood associated with the guidance of every important enterprise, whether religious or benevolent,—somehow he provided leisure to bestow the patronage of his attendance and his deliberative wisdom on many of the institutions of Edinburgh, and, with a munificence which has been rarely equalled, ministered of his substance to the upholding of them all He valued money so little, that he often declined to receive it, even when the offerer urged it, as most justly his own His diligence and application were so great that whoever entered his study found him intent at work Did they see him travelling in his carriage they could perceive he was busy there [Obituary notice in Witness newspaper]

In 1834 the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of M D, which he had long previously obtained from the university of Edinburgh In 1835 he was chosen by the students lord rector of Marischal college, Aberdeen Dr Abercrombie died suddenly at Edinburgh, from rupture of an artery in the region of the heart, on the 14th of November, 1844 Distinguished alike as a physician, an author, a benefactor of the poor, and a sincere Christian, his loss was universally lamented He was buried in the West churchyard, Edinburgh, where a monument with a medallion has been erected to his memory, the former bearing the following inscription —"In memory of John Abercrombie, M D, Edin and Oxon, Fellow of the Royal colleges of Physicians and Surgeons, Edinburgh, Vice-president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and first Physician to the Queen in Scotland, born XII Oct MDCCLXXX From a life very early devoted to the service of God, occupied in the most assiduous labours, and distinguished not more by professional eminence than by personal worth and by successful authorship on the principles of Christian morals and philosophy, it pleased God to translate him suddenly to the life everlasting XIV. Nov MDCCCXLIV" Annexed is a copy of the medallion, which embodies as true a likeness of Dr Abercrombie as stone or wood can convey

The procession at his funeral was one of the largest ever seen in Edinburgh It was joined by the members both of the Royal College of Physicians, and the Royal College of Surgeons, as well as by the Free Church presbytery of Edinburgh and the commission of the General Assembly of the Free Church, and by many professional brethren from a distance Dr Abercrombie married in 1808 Agnes, only child of David Wardlaw, Esq, of Netherbeath in Fifeshire, and had eight daughters, one of whom died at the age of four Seven daughters survived him, the eldest of whom became the second wife of the Rev John Bruce, minister of Free St Andrew's church, Edinburgh, in whose congregation Dr Abercrombie was an elder, and who preached his funeral sermon, which was afterwards published The estate of Netherbeath descended to Mrs Bruce

ABERCROMBIE, JOHN, conjectured by Dempster, in his Hist Eccl Scot, to have been a Benedictine monk, was the author of two energetic treatises in defence of the Church of Rome against the principles of the Reformers, entitled 'Veritatis Defensio,' and 'Hæresis Confusio' He flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century

ABERCROMBIE, PATRICK, physician and historian, third son of Alexander Abercrombie of Fetterneir, Aberdeenshire, a branch of the Birkenbog family of that name, was born at Forfar in 1656, and took his medical degrees at St Andrews in 1685 His elder brother, Francis Abercrombie of Fetternein, on his marriage with Anna, Baroness Sempill, was, in July 1685, created by James VII Lord Glassford, under the singular restriction of being limited for his own life After leaving the university, Patrick travelled on the continent, and on his return to England, embracing the Roman Catholic religion, he was appointed physician to James VII, but at the Revolution was deprived of his office, and for some years lived abroad Returning to his native country, he afterwards devoted himself to the study of national antiquities In 1707 he gave to the world a translation of M Beauge's rare French work, 'L'Histoire de la Guerre d'Ecosse,' 1556, under the title of 'The Campaigns in Scotland in 1548 and 1549,' which was reprinted in the original by Mr Smythe of Methven for the Bannatyne Club, in 1829, with a preface containing an account of Abercrombie's translation. His great work, however, is 'The Martial Achievements of the Scots nation, and of such Scotsmen as have signalized themselves by the Sword,' in two volumes folio, the first published in 1711, and the second in 1715 He also wrote the 'Memoirs of the family of Abercrombie' Dr Abercrombie died in poor circumstances in 1716, some authorities say 1720, and others 1726 The following is a list of his works

The Advantages of the Act of Security, compared with those of the intended Union, founded on the Revolution Principles, published by Mr Daniel De Foe Edin 1707, 4to

A Vindication of the same, against Mr. De Foe Edin 1707, 4to

The Martial Achievements of the Scots nation, being an Account of the Lives, Characters, and Memorable Actions of such Scotsmen as have signalized themselves by the Sword, at home and abroad Edin. 1711–1715 2 vols fol.

ABERCROMBIE, JOHN, an eminent horticulturist, and author of several horticultural works, was the son of a respectable gardener near Edinburgh, where he was born about the year 1726 In his eighteenth year he went to London, and obtained employment in the royal gardens His first work, 'The Gardener's Calendar,' was published as the production of Mr Mawe, gardener to the duke of Leeds, who received twenty guineas for the use of his name, which was then well-known. The success of that work was so complete, that Abercrombie put his own name to all his future publications, among which may be mentioned, 'The Universal Dictionary of Gardening and Botany,' 4to, 'The Gardener's Vade Mecum,' and other popular productions He died at Somerstown, London, in 1806, aged 80 A list of his works is subjoined

It has been already stated, in giving the origin of the name (see page 1,) that in the 17th century, Abercromby of Birkenbog in Banffshire, became the chief of the name of Abercromby Alexander Abercromby of Birkenbog was grand falconer in Scotland to King Charles I In 1686 his eldest son, Alexander, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, and took an active part against King Charles in the civil wars of that period From the pedigree of the family it appears that Sir Alexander Abercromby of Birkenbog, the first baronet, had two sons The eldest, James, succeeded his father Alexander, the second son, succeeded his cousin George Abercromby of Skeith, in the estate of Tullibody, in Clackmannanshire, formerly a possession of the earls of Stirling This Alexander was the grandfather of the celebrated military commander, Sir Ralph Abercromby, and the second of the name of Abercromby who possessed Tullibody The most eminent of this family were General Sir Ralph Abercromby, and his two brothers, Alexander, Lord Abercromby, a judge of the court of session, and General Sir Robert Abercromby, K C B.; of all three notices are here given

ABERCROMBY, SIR RALPH, K B, a distinguished general, was the eldest son of George Abercromby, of Tullibody, in Clackmannanshire, by Mary, daughter of Ralph Dundas, Esq of Manor His father was born in 1705, passed advocate in 1728, and died June 8, 1800, at the advanced age of ninety-five, being the oldest member of the college of justice His son Ralph was born on the 7th of October, 1734, in the old mansion of Menstrie, then the ordinary residence of his parents, near the village of that name which lies at the southern base of the Ochil hills, on the boundary between the parish of Alloa in Clackmannanshire, and the Perthshire part of the parish of Logie The day of his birth has not been inserted in the session book of the parish of Logie, but the following is an extract from the register of his baptism "A D 1734, October 26th, Bap Ralph, lawful son to George Abercromby, younger of Tullibody, and Mary Dundas his lady" Menstrie house, in which he was born, was, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, the property and residence of Sir William Alexander, the poet, afterwards created earl of Stirling Although not now inhabited by any of the Abercromby family, it is still entire A woodcut representation of it is here given

After the usual course of study, young Abercromby entered the army in 1756, as a cornet in the 3d regiment of dragoon guards His commission is dated 22d March of that year In February 1760 he obtained a lieutenancy in the same regiment, in April 1762 he was promoted to a company in the 3d regiment of horse In 1770 he became major, and in 1773, lieutenant-colonel In 1780 he was included in the list of brevet colonels, and in 1781 he was appointed colonel of the 103d, or King's Irish infantry This newly raised regiment was reduced at the peace in 1783, when Colonel Abercromby was placed on half-pay In September 1787 he became major-general In 1788, in which year he resided in George's Square, Edinburgh, he obtained the command of the 69th regiment of foot He was afterwards removed to the 6th regiment, from that to the 5th, and in November 1797 to the 7th regiment of dragoons

He first served in the seven years' war, and acquired great knowledge and military experience in that service, before he had an opportunity of distinguishing himself, which afterwards, when the opportunity came, enabled him to be the first British general to give a check to the French in the first revolutionary war He has often been confounded with the General Abercrombie who commanded the troops against the French at Crown Point and Ticonderoga in America in 1758, but Sir Ralph at that period was only a cornet of dragoons, and notwithstanding the mistake into which some of his biographers have fallen, it is certain that he never was in America

In the year 1774, when lieutenant colonel, he had been elected member of parliament for Clackmannanshire, which county he continued to represent till the next election in 1780, but never made any figure in parliament

On the commencement of the war with France in 1792, he was employed in Flanders and Holland with the local rank of lieutenant-general, and in the campaigns of 1793 and 1794 he served under the duke of York, when he gave many proofs of his skill, vigilance, and intrepidity He commanded the advanced guard during the action on the heights of Cateau, April 16, 1794 On this occasion he captured 35 pieces of cannon, and took prisoner Chapuy the French general In the despatches of the duke of York his ability and courage were twice mentioned with special commendation In the succeeding October he received a wound at Nimeguen, and upon him and General Dundas devolved the arduous duty of conducting the retreat through Holland in the severe winter which followed It has been remarked that the talents, as well as the temper, of a commander are put to as severe a test in conducting a retreat as in achieving a victory This was well illustrated in the case of General Abercromby The guards and the sick were committed to his care, and in the disastrous march from Deventer to Oldensaal the hardships sustained by those under his charge were such as the most consummate skill and judgment were almost inadequate to alleviate, while the feelings experienced by the commander himself were painful in the extreme Harassed in the rear by a victorious enemy, upwards of fifty thousand strong, obliged to conduct his troops with a rapidity beyond their strength, through bad roads, in the most inclement part of a winter more than usually severe,—the sick being placed in open waggons, as no others could be procured,—and finding it impossible to procure shelter for his soldiers in the midst of the drifting snow and heavy falls of sleet and rain, the anguish he felt at seeing their numbers daily diminishing from the effects of cold, fatigue, and hunger, can scarcely be described About the end of March 1795, the British army, which during the retreat had sometimes to halt, face and fight the enemy, arrived at Bremen in a very reduced state, and thence embarked for England The judgment, patience, humanity, and perseverance shown by General Abercromby in this calamitous retreat were equal to the occasion, and received due acknowledgment

In the autumn of 1795 General Abercromby was appointed to succeed Sir Charles Grey, as commander-in-chief of the troops employed against the French in the West Indies Previous to his arrival, the French revolutionary army had made considerable exertions to recover their losses in that quarter They retook the islands of Guadaloupe and St Lucia, made good their landing on Martinique, and hoisted the tricolour on several forts in the islands of St Vincent, Grenada, and Marie Galante, besides seizing the property of the rich emigrants who had fled thither from France, to the amount of 1,800 millions of livres The expedition under General Abercromby was unfortunately prevented from sailing until after the equinox, and several transports were lost in endeavouring to clear the Channel The remainder of the fleet reached the West Indies in safety, and by the month of March 1796 the troops were in a condition for active duty A detachment of the army under Sir John Moore, was sent against the island of St Lucia, which was speedily captured, though the attack on this island was attended with peculiar difficulties from the intricate nature of the country A new road was made for the heavy cannon, and on the 26th of May 1796, the garrison surrendered St Vincent was next subdued, and thence the commander-in-chief proceeded to Grenada, where the fierce and enterprising Fedon was at the head of a body of insurgents prepared to oppose the British After the arrival of General Abercromby, however, hostilities were speedily brought to a termination, and on the 19th of June, full possession was obtained of every post in the island, and the haughty chief Fedon, with his troops, was reduced to unconditional submission The British also became masters of the Dutch colonies on the coast of Guiana, namely Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice

Early in the following year (1797) the general sailed, with a considerable fleet of ships of war and transports, against the Spanish island of Trinidad, and on the 16th of February approached the fortifications of Gaspar Grande, under cover of which a Spanish squadron, consisting of four sail of the line and a frigate, were found lying at anchor On perceiving the approach of the British, the Spanish fleet retired farther into the bay General Abercromby made arrangements for attacking the town and ships of war early in the following morning Dreading the impending conflict, the Spaniards set fire to their own ships, and retired to a different part of the island On the following day the British troops landed, and soon after the whole colony submitted to General Abercromby

After an unsuccessful attack on the Spanish island of Puerto Rico, the general returned to England the same year (1797) and was received with every demonstration of public respect and honour In his absence he had been made a knight of the Bath and presented to the colonelcy of the Scots Greys On his return he was appointed governor of the Isle of Wight, and was afterwards invested with the lucrative governments of Forts George and Augustus The same year he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, which he had hitherto held only locally

In 1798 Sir Ralph was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland, where the insurrectionary spirit, inflamed by promises of assistance from France, was every day assuming a more serious form and threatening to break out into open rebellion Soon after his arrival, finding that the disorderly conduct of some of the British troops had but too much tended to increase the spirit of insubordination and discontent that prevailed, he issued a proclamation, in which he lamented and reproved the excesses and irregularities into which they had fallen, and which, to use his own words, "had rendered them more formidable to their friends than to their enemies," and declared his firm determination to punish, with exemplary severity, any similar outrage of which they might be guilty in future He did not long retain his command in Ireland The inconveniences arising from the delegation of the highest civil and military authority to different persons, had been felt to occasion much perplexity and confusion in the management of public affairs, at that season of agitation and alarm, and finding the service, under such circumstances, disagreeable, Sir Ralph resigned the command, and the Marquis Cornwallis, on becoming lord-lieutenant of Ireland, was appointed his successor

Sir Ralph was next nominated commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, and for a short interval, the cares of his military duties were agreeably blended with the endearments of his kindred and the society of his early friends During his residence in Edinburgh at this time, the military spirit that generally prevailed rendered the occurrence of reviews extremely popular among the inhabitants The accompanying woodcut represents Sir Ralph in the act of giving the word of command to the troops

It was at this period that the Lochiel Highlanders were inspected at Falkirk by General Vyse, one of the major-generals of the staff in Scotland, under Sir Ralph Abercromby, who was present at the inspection Cameron, the chief of Lochiel, married Sir Ralph's eldest daughter Anne The regiment was ostensibly composed of Camerons, but there were enrolled in its ranks, not only lowlanders, but even Englishmen and Irishmen Some laughable attempts at fraud in endeavouring to pass inspection are related, but unless actually disabled, few objections were made, although Scotsmen in general found a preference "Where are you from?" said General Vyse to a strange-looking fellow, who was evidently an Irishman, although he endeavoured to make believe that he was Scotch "From Falkirk yr honour, this morning," was the ready answer His language betraying him, the general demanded to know how he came over "Sure I didn't come in a wheelbarrow!" The rising choler of the inspecting officer was speedily soothed by the milder tact of Sir Ralph, who, seeing the man a fit recruit, laughed heartily, and he was passed On this occasion Sir Ralph, during his stay in Falkirk, took up his residence with the son of his late father's gardener at Tullibody, Mr James Walker, a merchant in the town, and long known for his agricultural skill, as "the Stirlingshire Farmer" Sir Ralph delighted, after dinner, to recall the incidents of their boyhood, when he and Mr Walker, with their brothers, were at school together He had previously shown the attachment of former days to a younger brother of Mr Walker, during the struggle for liberty between America and the mother country These kindly and benevolent traits, it has been well remarked, easily explain why Sir Ralph Abercromby was personally so dear to all who knew him —[Kay's Edinburgh Portraits]

In the autumn of 1799 he was selected to take the chief command of the expedition sent out to Holland, for the purpose of restoring the prince of Orange to the stadtholdership, from which he had been driven by the French In this expedition the British were at the outset successful On the 27th of August the British troops disembarked near the Helder point, but were almost immediately attacked by General Daendells, after a contest, which lasted from day-dawn till about five in the afternoon, the Dutch were defeated, and retired, leaving the British in possession of a ridge of sand hills which stretched along the coast from south to north Sir Ralph Abercromby resolved to attack the Helder next morning, but the enemy withdrew during the night, in consequence of which thirteen ships of war and three Indiamen, together with the arsenal and naval magazine, fell into the possession of the British Admiral Mitchell, who commanded the British fleet, immediately offered battle to the fleet of the Batavian republic lying in the Texel, but the Dutch sailors refusing to fight against those who were combating for the rights of the prince of Orange, the whole fleet, consisting of twelve sail of the line, surrendered to the British admiral This encouraging event, however, did not put an end to the struggle The mass of the Dutch people held sentiments very different from those of the sailors, and they refused to receive the British as their deliverers from the yoke of France On the morning of the 10th of September the Dutch and French forces attacked the position of the British, which extended from Petten on the German ocean to Oude-Sluys on the Zuyder-Zee The onset was made with the utmost bravery, but the enemy were repulsed with the loss of a thousand men From the want of numbers, however, Sir Ralph Abercromby was unable to follow up this advantage, until the duke of York arrived as commander-in-chief, with a reinforcement of Russians, Batavians, and Dutch volunteers, which augmented the allied army to nearly thirty-six thousand men Sir Ralph now served as second in command

On the morning of the 19th September the army under the duke of York commenced an attack on the enemy's positions on the heights of Camperdown, which was successful The Russian troops, under General Hermann, made themselves masters of Bergen, but beginning to pillage too soon, the enemy rallied, and attacked them with so much impetuosity that they were driven from the town in all directions The British were in consequence compelled to abandon the positions they had stormed, and to fall back upon their former station Another attack was made on the 2d of October The conflict lasted the whole day, and the enemy abandoned their positions during the night On this occasion Sir Ralph Abercromby had two horses shot under him Sir John Moore was twice wounded severely, and reluctantly carried off the field, while the marquis of Huntly (the last duke of Gordon) who, at the head of the 92d regiment, eminently distinguished himself, received a wound from a ball in the shoulder The Dutch and French troops had taken up another strong position between Benerwych and the Zuyder-Zee, from which it was resolved to dislodge them before they could obtain reinforcements A day of sanguinary fighting ensued, which continued without intermission till ten o'clock at night amid deluges of rain The French republican general, Brune, having been reinforced with six thousand additional men, and the ground which he occupied being found to be impregnable, the duke of York resolved upon a retreat A convention was accordingly concluded with General Brune by which the British troops were allowed to embark for England

island of Minorca, which had been sent out upon a secret expedition to the Mediterranean On the 22d of that month he arrived at Minorca, and on the 23d the troops were embarked, and sailed for Leghorn They arrived there on the 9th of July, but in consequence of an armistice having been concluded between the French and the Austrians, they did not land there, but while part of the troops proceeded to Malta, the remainder returned to Minorca On the 26th of July Sir Ralph arrived again at that island, where he remained till the 30th of August, when the troops were again embarked, and on the 14th September the fleet, which consisted of upwards of two hundred sail, under the command of Admiral Lord Keith, came to anchor off Europa point in the bay of Gibraltar After taking in water at Teutan, the fleet, on the 3d of October, arrived off Cadiz, where it was intended to disembark the troops, and orders were accordingly issued for the purpose, but a flag of truce was sent from the shore, and some negotiations took place between the commanders, in consequence of which the orders for landing were countermanded After thus threatening Cadiz, and sailing about apparently without any distinct destination, orders were at last received from England, for part of the troops to proceed to Portugal, and the remainder to Malta, where they arrived about the middle of November The latter portion afterwards formed part of the forces employed in the expedition to Egypt, with the view of driving the French out of that country The sailing backwards and forwards of the fleet for so many months, seemingly without any definite aim, so far from being indicative of want of design or weakness in the councils of the government at home, as was believed and said at the time, was no doubt intended to deceive the French as to the real object and destination of the expedition

From Malta the fleet, with Sir Ralph Abercromby and the troops on board, sailed on the 20th December, taking with them 500 Maltese recruits, designed to act as pioneers On the 1st of January 1801, it rendezvoused in the bay of Marmorice, on the coast of Caramania, where it remained till the 23d of February, on which day, to the number of 175 sail it weighed anchor again, and on the 1st of March, it came in sight of the coast of Egypt On the following morning the fleet anchored in Aboukir bay, in the very place where, a few years before, Admiral Nelson had added so signally to the naval triumphs of Great Britain

This was undoubtedly the most glorious period of Sir Ralph Abercromby's career "All minds," says a contemporary historian, "were now anxiously directed towards Egypt It was a novel and interesting spectacle to contemplate the two most powerful nations of Europe contending in Africa for the possession of Asia Not only to England and France, but the whole civilized world, the issue of this contest was of the utmost importance With respect to England, the difficulties to be surmounted were proportioned to the magnitude of the object The vizier, with his usual irresolution, yet debated on the propriety of co-operation, while the captain bashaw, who was at Constantinople, with part of his fleet, inclined to treat with the enemy The English taking the unpopular side, that of the government, still less was to be hoped from the countenance and support of the people, whom the French had long flattered with the idea of freedom and independence It remained, also, to justify the breach of faith so speciously attributed to this nation in the treaty of El Arish These were serious obstacles to the progress of the expedition in Egypt, but they were not the only obstacles The expedition had to contend with an army habituated to the country, respected at least, if not beloved, by the inhabitants, and flushed with reputation and success, an army inured to danger, aware of the importance of Egypt to their government, determined to defend the possession of it, and encouraged in this determination, no less by the assurance of speedily receiving effectual succours, than by the promise of reward, and the love of glory"

The violence of the wind, from the 1st to the 7th of March, rendered a landing impracticable, but the weather becoming calmer on the 7th, that day was spent in reconnoitring the shore, a service in which Sir Sidney Smith displayed great skill and activity

delay in the disembarkation of the British troops caused by the state of the weather, enabled the French to make all necessary preparations to receive them Two thousand five hundred of the latter were strongly intrenched on the sand hills near the shore, and formed, in a concave figure, opposite the British ships The main body of the French army was stationed at and near Alexandria, within a few miles At two o'clock on the morning of the 8th, the British troops began to assemble in the boats, their fire-locks between their knees A rocket from the admiral's ship gave the signal, and when all was ready, the boats, containing five thousand men, pulled in towards the shore, a distance of about five miles The silence was broken only by the sullen dip of the oars As soon as the boats came within reach, a most tremendous fire was opened upon them from fifteen pieces of artillery placed on the ridge of sand hills in front, besides the guns of Aboukir castle and the musketry of 2,500 men These completely swept the sea, and the falling of the balls and shot is compared, by a contemporary writer, to the falling of a violent hail-storm on the water Two boats were sunk with all on board of them Each man had belts loaded with three days' provisions, and a cartouch-box with sixty rounds of ball cartridge It was nine o'clock when the rest reached land, and the French, who had poured down in thousands to the beach, and even attacked the British in the boats, were ready to receive them at the bayonet's point It was now that their commander reaped the advantage of his precautionary discipline While anchored in the bay of Marmorice, he had caused the troops to practise all the manœuvres of landing, so that, disembarkation having become familiar to them, on reaching the shore, they leaped from the boats, formed into line, mounted the heights, in the face of the enemy's fire, without returning a shot, charged with the bayonet the enemy stationed on the summit, put them to flight, and seized their cannon In this service the 23d and 40th regiments, which first reached the shore, particularly distinguished themselves, while the seamen, harnessing themselves to the field artillery with ropes, drew them on shore, and replied to the incessant roar of the hostile cannon with repeated and triumphant cheers In vain did the enemy endeavour to rally his troops, in vain did a body of cavalry charge suddenly on the guards at the moment of their debarkation The French gave way at all points, maintaining, as they retreated, a scattered and inefficient fire The boats returned to the ships for the remaining part of the army, and before noon the landing was effected It not being deemed expedient, however, to bring on shore the camp stores, the commander-in-chief and the troops, after having advanced three miles into the country, alike slept in huts made of the date-tree branches

The next day the troops were employed in searching for water, in which they happily succeeded, and the castle of Aboukir refusing to surrender, two regiments were ordered to blockade it On the 13th, Sir Ralph, desirous of forcing the heights near Alexandria, on which a body of French, amounting to 6,000 men, was posted, marched his army to the attack

After a severe contest, the French were compelled to retire to the heights of Necopolis, which formed the principal defence of Alexandria Anxious to follow up the victory, by driving the enemy from his new position, Sir Ralph ordered forward the reserve under Sir John Moore, and the second line under General Hutchinson, to attack the heights, which were found to be commanded by the guns of the fort As they advanced into the open plain, they were exposed to a most destructive fire, from which they had no shelter, and having ascertained that the heights, if taken, could not be retained, the attempt was abandoned, and the British army retired, with considerable loss, to the position which was soon to be the theatre of Sir Ralph's last victory,—that, namely, from which the enemy had been driven, comprising a front of more than half-a-mile in extent, with their right to the sea, and their left to the canal of Alexandria and Lake Maadie, thus cutting off all communication with the city, except by way of the desert The loss of the British, on that unfortunate day, in killed and wounded, was upwards of 1,000, and General Abercromby himself, on this occasion, had a very narrow escape His horse being shot under him, he became surrounded by the enemy's cavalry and was rescued only by the devoted intrepidity of the 19th regiment After the 19th, Aboukir castle, which had hitherto been only blockaded, was besieged, and on the 18th the garrison surrendered The annexed woodcut represents the general viewing the army encamped on the plains of Egypt, a short time before his lamented death It is very characteristic of him, and though the glass at his eye may indicate that age had begun to affect his sight, the erectness of his figure shows that, notwithstanding his long and active career, advancing years and the hard services in which he had been engaged, had left then traces but lightly on his frame

The French commander-in-chief, General Menou, having arrived from Cairo, with a reinforcement of 9,000 men, early on the morning of the 21st of March, was fought the decisive battle of Alexandria, in which, after a sanguinary and protracted struggle, the British were victorious, General Menou being obliged to retreat with a loss of between three and four thousand men, including many officers, and three generals killed The loss of the British was also heavy, and this was the last field of the victor, for here Sir Ralph Abercromby received his death-wound

Meaning to surprise the British, the French commander attacked then position between three and four o'clock in the morning, with his whole force, amounting to about twelve thousand men The action was commenced by a feigned attack on the left, while the main strength of the enemy was directed against the right wing of the British army They advanced in columns, shouting "Vive

la France!" "Vive la Republique!" but they were received with steady coolness by the British troops, who, warned the previous evening, by an Arab chief, of the intentions of the French general, were in battle array by three o'clock, and prepared to receive the onset of the enemy The contest continued with various success until eight o'clock, when General Menou, finding that all his efforts were fruitless, ordered a retreat, and from the want of cavalry on the part of the British, the French effected their escape to Alexandria, in good order

On the first alarm, Sir Ralph Abercromby, blending the coolness and experience of age with the ardour and activity of youth, repaired on horseback to the right, and exposed himself to all the dangers of the field During the battle he rode about in all parts, cheering and animating his men, and while it was still dark he got among the enemy, who had already broken the front line and fallen into the rear Unable to distinguish the French soldiers from his own, he was only extricated from his dangerous situation by the valour of his troops To the first British soldier who came up to him he said, "Soldier! if you know me, don't name me" Soon after, two French dragoons rode furiously at him, and attempted to lead him away prisoner Sir Ralph, however, would not yield, one of his assailants made a thrust at his breast, and passed his sword with great force under the general's arm Although severely bruised by a blow from the sword-guard, Sir Ralph, with the vigour and strength of arm for which he was distinguished, seized the Frenchman's weapon, and after a short struggle, wrested it from his hand, and turned to oppose his remaining adversary, who, at that instant, was shot dead by a corporal of the 42d, who had witnessed the danger of his commander, and ran up to his assistance, on which the other dragoon retired

Although Sir Ralph, early in the action, had been wounded in the thigh by a musket ball, he treated the wound as a trifle, and continued to move about, and give his orders with his characteristic promptitude and clearness On the retreat of the enemy he fainted from pain and the loss of blood His magnanimous conduct, both during the battle and after it, is thus detailed by the late General David Stewart, of Garth, who was an eye-witness to it After describing Sir Ralph's rencontre with the French dragoons, he continues "Some time after the general attempted to alight from his horse, a soldier of the Highlanders, seeing that he had some difficulty in dismounting, assisted him, and asked if he should follow him with the horse He answered, that he would not require him any more that day While all this was passing, no officer was near him The first officer he met was Sir Sidney Smith, and observing that his sword was broken, the general presented him with the trophy he had gained He betrayed no symptom of personal pain, nor relaxed a moment the intense interest he took in the state of the field, nor was it perceived that he was wounded, till he was joined by some of the staff, who observed the blood trickling down his thigh Even during the interval from the time of his being wounded, and the last charge of cavalry, he walked with a firm and steady step along the line of the Highlanders and General Stuart's brigade, to the position of the guards in the centre of the line, where, from its elevated situation, he had a full view of the whole field of battle Here he remained, regardless of the wound, giving his orders so much in his usual manner, that the officers who came to receive them perceived nothing that indicated either pain or anxiety These officers afterwards could not sufficiently express their astonishment, when they came to learn the state in which he was, and the pain which he must have suffered from the nature of his wound A musket ball had entered his groin, and lodged deep in the hip joint, the ball was even so firmly fixed in the hip joint that it required considerable force to extract it after his death My respectable friend, Dr Alexander Robertson, the surgeon who attended him, assured me that nothing could exceed his surprise and admiration at the calmness of his heroic patient With a wound in such a part, connected with and bearing on every part of his body, it is a matter of surprise how he could move at all, and nothing but the most intense interest in the fate of his army, the issue of the battle, and the honour of the British name, could have inspired and sustained such resolution As soon as the impulse ceased in the assurance of victory, he yielded to exhausted nature, acknowledged that he required some rest, and lay down on a little sand hill close to the battery"

From the field of victory he was removed on a litter, feeble and faint, on board the admiral's flag ship, 'the Foudroyant,' where every effort was made by the medical gentlemen of the fleet and the army to extract the ball, but without effect During a week that he lingered in great bodily suffering, he continued to exercise the same vigilance over the condition and prospects of his army as he had manifested while at its head His son, Lieutenant-colonel Abercromby, attended him from day to day, and regularly received his instructions, as if no serious accident had befallen him Throughout the evening of the 27th, he became more than usually restless, and complained of excessive languor, and an increased degree of thirst, next day mortification supervened, and in the evening he expired, thus closing his glorious career, on the 28th March 1801, in the 68th year of his age

In the despatches sent home with an account of his death by General (afterwards Lord) Hutchinson, who succeeded him in the command, the latter says "We have sustained an irreparable loss in the person of our never-sufficiently to-be-lamented commander-in-chief, Sir Ralph Abercromby, who was mortally wounded in the action, and died on the 28th of March I believe he was wounded early, but he concealed his situation from those about him, and continued in the field giving his orders with that coolness and perspicuity which had ever marked his character, till long after the action was over, when he fainted through weakness and loss of blood Were it permitted for a soldier to regret any one who has fallen in the service of his country, I might be excused for lamenting him more than any other person, but it is some consolation to those who tenderly loved him, that, as his life was honourable, so was his death glorious His memory will be recorded in the annals of his country, will be sacred to every British soldier, and embalmed in the recollection of a grateful posterity" His remains were conveyed, (in compliance with his own request,) to Malta, and interred in the Commandery of the Grand Master, beneath the castle of St. Elmo A monument was erected to his memory in St Paul's Cathedral, parliament having voted a sum of money for the purpose His widow was created Baroness Abercromby of Aboukir and Tullibody, with remainder to the heirs-male of the deceased general, and, in support of the dignity, a pension of £2,000 a-year was granted to her, and to the two next succeeding heirs-male

Sir Ralph Abercromby possessed, in a high degree, some of the best qualities of a general, and his coolness, decision, and intrepidity, were the theme of general praise As a country gentleman, also, his character stood very high, being described as "the friend of the destitute poor, the patron of useful knowledge, and the promoter of education among the meanest of his cottagers" His studies were of so general a nature that it is stated in Stirling's edition of Nimmo's History of Stirlingshire, that when called to the continent in 1793, he had been daily attending the lectures of the late Dr Hardy, regius professor of church history in the university of Edinburgh

To Sir Ralph's patronage many who would otherwise have passed their lives in obscurity, owed their being placed in situations where they had opportunities of advancement and distinction, among the rest was the late Major-general Sir William Morison, K C B, one of the many able officers whom the East India Company's service has produced His father, Mr Morison of Greenfield, Clackmannanshire, was a land surveyor in Alloa in the county of Stirling, who was well known to most of the gentlemen in that neighbourhood, and was in particular employed by Sir Ralph Abercromby When Sir Ralph was going abroad on foreign service, he had occasion to consult Mr Morison, the father, about one of his farms, and was particularly pleased with the accuracy and clearness of the plan and its references, which he submitted to him On being asked who drew them up, Mr Morison told Sir Ralph that it was done by his son, and the general immediately said that he should like to have the whole of his estate mapped in the same manner, so that, when away from home, he might be able, by reference, to correspond about any point that occurred The maps were made by young Morison, who waited on

Sir Ralph to explain them, and the veteran general, who was a great judge of character, instantly perceived the value of the self-taught youth He made inquiries as to his views and prospects, and finding that he was anxious to go to India, he procured for him a cadetship, in the year 1800 From the outset the young man justified Sir Ralph's estimate of his abilities, and he so applied his faculties to military science, that his attainments raised him to a high rank in the Indian army, and he died 15th May 1851, a major-general in the East India Company's service, a knight commander of the Bath, and member of parliament for Clackmannanshire and Kinross-shire

Sir Ralph married Mary Anne, daughter of John Menzies, Esq of Fernitower, Perthshire, and left four sons, viz George, passed advocate in 1794, who succeeded his mother on her death in 1821, as Lord Abercromby, and died in 1843, Sir John, a major-general, and G C B, who died unmarried in 1817, James, a barrister at law, returned, with Francis Jeffrey, Esq, (subsequently a lord of session,) as one of the members of parliament for the city of Edinburgh at the first election under the Reform act, afterwards Speaker of the House of Commons, created Lord Dunfermline in 1839, and Alexander, a colonel in the army, with three daughters, Anne, married to Donald Cameron, Esq of Lochiel, Mary, died unmarried in 1825, and Catherine, wife of Thomas Buchanan, Esq, in the East India Company's service Lord Dunfermline, the third son, died in 1858, leaving a son, Ralph, second Lord Dunfermline (See DUNFERMLINE, Lord, vol ii p 105)

ABERCROMBY, ALEXANDER, an eminent lawyer and occasional essayist, was born October 15, 1745 He was the second son of George Abercromby of Tullibody, and the brother of Sir Ralph He received his education at the university of Edinburgh, and was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates in 1766 He distinguished himself at the bar, and in 1780, after being sheriff of Stirlingshire, he became one of the depute-advocates He was raised to the bench in May 1792, when he assumed the title of Lord Abercromby In December of the same year, he was made a lord of justiciary He was one of the originators of the 'Mirror,' a periodical published at Edinburgh in 1779 and following year, to which he contributed eleven papers He also furnished nine papers to the 'Lounger,' a work of a similar kind, published in 1785 and 1786 He caught a cold, while attending his duty on the northern circuit in the spring of 1795, from which he never recovered, and died on the 17th of November of that year, at Exmouth, in Devonshire, where he had gone on account of his health A short tribute to his memory was written by his friend, Henry Mackenzie, for the Royal Society of Edinburgh —Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice

ABERCROMBY, SIR ROBERT, the youngest brother of Sir Ralph Abercromby, was a general in the army, a knight of the Bath, and at one period the governor of Bombay and commander-in-chief of the forces in India He was afterwards for thirty years governor of the castle of Edinburgh When the late Mr Robert Haldane, the brother of Mr James Alexander Haldane, determined upon selling his estates, and devoting himself to the diffusion of the gospel in India, Sir Robert Abercromby, whose niece Mr J A Haldane had married, purchased from him his beautiful and romantic estate of Airthrey, in Stirlingshire, and was succeeded by his nephew, Lord Abercromby, the son of his elder brother, Sir Ralph Sir Robert died in 1827

ABERDEEN, earldom of, a peerage possessed by a branch of the ancient family of Gordon In 1644, Sir John Gordon of Haddo was beheaded at Edinburgh, for his adherence to the cause of Charles I After the Restoration, Sir John Gordon, his eldest son, was restored to the baronetage which had been bestowed on his father in 1642, and to the estates of the family He was succeeded by his brother George, who was lord high chancellor of Scotland in 1682, and the same year was created Earl of Aberdeen Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves, and Kellie In 1814 the fourth earl of Aberdeen was created Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, in the peerage of the United Kingdom See GORDON, p 323

ABERNETHY—(beyond the Nethy)—a surname derived from a barony of that name in Lower Strathearn, Perthshire, which was possessed in the reign of William I by Orme, the son of Hugh, who was styled Abbot of Abernethy, and whose descendants assumed the name of Abernethy In 1288 Sir William de Abernethy, the first of the family styled of Saltoun, and Sir Patrick de Abernethy, lay in wait for Duncan earl of Fife, one of the regents of the kingdom during the minority of Margaret of Norway, at Potpollock, and murdered him William was seized by Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and Patrick fled into France and died there [Fordun] His nephew, Alexander de Abernethy, in 1308, along with Robert de Keith

Adam de Gordon, and other leading barons, were sureties to Edward for the good behaviour of William de Lambyrton, bishop of St Andrews [Rymer's Fœdera, tome iii p 82] The same individual was appointed by Edward warden of the country between the Forth and the mountains of Scotland, 15th June, 1310 [Ibid tome iii p 211] His eldest daughter Margaret was married to John Stewart, earl of Angus, who got with her the barony of Abernethy, the superiority of which is still possessed by the family of Douglas, (now Hamilton,) as representatives of the earl of Angus To the famous letter to the Pope, drawn up by the barons of Scotland at the parliament of Aberbrothic 6th April, 1320, appears the name of William de Abernethy, lord of Saltoun He was the son of the first Sir William de Abernethy of Saltoun His son, also named Sir William, appears in the list of noble persons who fought at the battle of Halidon hill, 19th July, 1333, [Hailes' Annals, vol i p 307,] from which disastrous field he appears to have escaped He had from David II a grant of the lands of Rothiemay in Aberdeenshire George Abernethy of Saltoun, his son, was taken prisoner at the fatal fight of Durham, 17th Oct, 1346 At the battle of Harlaw 24th July 1411, William Abernethy, son and heir to the Lord Saltoun, was one of the principal leaders, and was slain But although he is called "the worthy Lord Saltone" and of his death it is said in the popular ballad,

> 'And on the other side war lost
> Into the field that dismal day,
> Chief men of worth of mickle cost
> To be lamented sair for aye
> The lord Saltone of Rothiemay
> A man of micht and mickle main
> Great dolour was for his decay
> That sae unhappily was slain

yet the peerage was not conferred upon the family till 28th June, 1445,—34 years later,—in the person of Laurence Abernethy of Saltoun and Rothiemay, created Baron Saltoun of Abernethy, and as the said William Abernethy predeceased his father, he was called "the Lord Saltone" only by courtesy This Laurence Abernethy of Saltoun and Rothiemay, first Lord Saltoun, was the twelfth in descent from Orm the founder of the family Margaret, the eldest daughter of the seventh Lord Saltoun, married Sir Alexander Fraser of Philorth in Aberdeenshire, and their son, Sir Alexander Fraser, became the tenth Lord Saltoun, and his descendants succeeded to the title The brother of his mother, John, eighth Lord Saltoun, sold the estate of Rothiemay The family of Abernethy is now represented by the Frasers of Philorth, lords Saltoun —See SALTOUN — The parish and village of Abernethy are of great antiquity The latter was at one period the capital of the Pictish kings It is named by various English writers and by Fordoun as the place where Malcolm Canmore concluded a peace with William the Conqueror in 1072, delivered to him hostages, and did homage to him for the lands which he held in England But although now a mean village, "it would appear," says Dr Jamieson, "that it was a royal residence in the reign of one of the Pictish princes who bore the name of Nethan or Nectan The Pictish chronicle has ascribed the foundation of Abernethy to Nethan I, in the third year of his reign, corresponding with A D 458 The Register of St Andrews, with greater probability, gives it to Nethan II about the year 600" We find that while the church of Abernethy was granted by William I in 1178, to his foundation of the abbey of Aberbrothock, Orme, abbot of Abernethy, granted the half of the tithes of the property of himself and his heirs to the same institution The other half belonged to the Culdees, as in ancient times Abernethy was a principal seat of the Culdees, who had a university at Abernethy, which in 1273 was turned into a priory of canons regular of St Augustine It is a burgh of barony, and has a charter from Archibald, earl of Angus, lord of Abernethy, dated November 29, 1628 The title of Lord Abernethy was conferred on the earl of Angus when created marquis of Douglas in 1633, and is now one of the inferior titles of the duke of Hamilton as representative and chief of the illustrious house of Douglas.—See HAMILTON

ABERNETHY, JOHN, an eminent physician of London, was born in 1763 or 1764, at Abernethy in Perthshire, it is believed, although Londonderry in Ireland is also mentioned as his birth-place When very young, his parents removed to London, where he was apprenticed to the late Mr (afterwards Sir) Charles Blick, surgeon of St Bartholomew's Hospital He was the pupil and friend of the celebrated John Hunter In 1780, on being elected assistant-surgeon to St Bartholomew's, he began to give lectures in the hospital on anatomy and surgery On the death of Sir Charles Blick he succeeded him as surgeon to the Hospital In 1793 he published 'Surgical and Physiological Essays' In 1804 appeared 'Surgical Observations,' volume first, relating to tumours, and two years afterwards, volume second, treating principally of the digestive organs Having been elected anatomical lecturer to the Royal College of Surgeons, he published in 1814 the subject of his first two lectures, under the title of 'An Enquiry into Mr Hunter's Theory of Life,' elucidatory of his old master's opinions of the vital processes In 1809 appeared his 'Surgical Observations on the Constitutional Origin and Treatment of Local Diseases, and on Aneurisms,' in which are detailed his memorable cases of tying the iliac artery for aneurism, a bold and successful operation, which at once established his reputation He was the author of several other popular medical works In chemistry, we owe to him in conjunction with Mr Howard, brother of the duke of Norfolk, the discovery of the "fulminating mercury," the force of which, as an explosive power, is greater than that of gunpowder He died on the 20th of April, 1831, at his house at Enfield Many amusing anecdotes are related of his eccentricities He attributed most complaints to the disordered state of the stomach, and his chief remedies were exercise and regulation of the diet Once he prescribed a skipping rope to a female hypochondriac patient of the upper ranks, and at another time, as a cure for gout, he advised an indolent and luxurious citizen to "live upon sixpence a-day, and earn it" In spite of the bluntness of his manner, however, he was very benevolent, and often not only gratuitously visited persons whose poverty prevented them from coming to him, but even sometimes supplied their wants from his own purse The following is the account given of the abrupt and unceremonious but truly characteristic manner in which he obtained his wife The name of the lady is not given "While attending a lady for several weeks, he observed those admirable qualifications in her daughter, which he truly esteemed to be calculated to make the marriage state happy Accordingly, on a Saturday, when taking leave of his patient, he addressed her to the following purport —'You are now so well that I need not see you after Monday next, when I shall come and pay you my farewell visit But, in the meantime, I wish you and your daughter seriously to consider the proposal I am now about to make It is abrupt and unceremonious, I am aware, but the excessive occupation of my time by my professional duties affords me no leisure to accomplish what I desire by the more ordinary course of attention and solicitation My annual receipts amount to £——, and I can settle £—— on my wife (mentioning the sums) my character is generally known to the public, so that you may readily ascertain what it is I have seen in your daughter a tender and affectionate child, an assiduous and careful nurse, and a gentle and ladylike member of a family, such a person must be all that a husband could covet, and I offer my hand and fortune for her acceptance On Monday, when I call, I shall expect your determination, for I really have not time for the routine of courtship' In this humour, the lady was wooed and won, and the union proved fortunate in every respect"—Annual Obituary, 1832

ABOYNE, Earl of, a title possessed by the Gordon family, derived from the parish of Aboyne in Aberdeenshire On the death of the last duke of Gordon in 1836, when that dukedom became extinct, the title of earl of Aboyne merged in that of marquis of Huntly (See HUNTLY, marquis of)

ABTHANE, a title which occurs in Scottish history, and which appears peculiar to Scotland, as no trace of it has been found in any other country It is a Thanedom or proprietorship of land held of the crown, and in the possession of an abbot Like a Thanedom also, it is the title of a Saxon proprietor, that is, a proprietor under the Saxon laws, holding direct of the crown, and is therefore exactly equivalent to that of a Norman baron Three Abthainries only have been as yet traced in Scotland, viz those of Dull, Kilmichael, and Madderty, the two former in Athol, the latter in Strathearn Mr Skene, whose investigations supply the foregoing information, seems to have established that all these three were created between the years 1098 and 1124,—that is, between the accession of Edgar to the throne and that of David I, that they were all held in connection with the Culdee monks of Dunkeld, that they must have been in possession of an abbot of that monastery, and that the party who then held that dignity, and in whose favour they were created, was Ethelred, youngest son of Malcolm III, who consequently had obtained them from one of his brothers, Edgar or Alexander, the then reigning monarchs of Scotland The fact of the possession of these and other lands in Athol by the then reigning family of Scotland, is one of the many circumstances adduced by this gentleman to demonstrate the descent of Malcolm III, and after him a long line of Scottish kings, from the ancient Maormors of Athol, one of the many facts illustrative of early Scottish history for which we are indebted to his careful investigations and ingenious inductions See ATHOL, EARLS OF On the death of Ethelred, these lands again reverted to the crown In various charters so recent as the reign of David II they are described as the "abthanes of Dull" of "Kilmichael," &c The second family whose chief obtained the earldom of Lennox appears by an entry in an early history of the Drummonds to have been previously the hereditary bailies of the abthainries of Dull, and on the promotion of its head to that dignity, that bailierie passed to a younger branch or cadet of it according to Celtic usage — Skene on the Origin of the Highlanders vol ii pp 129—137 152 153

ACHAIUS, or ACHAYUS, or EOCHY, the son of King Ethwin, or Ewen, succeeded to the crown of Scotland in 788, upon the death of Solvatius, or Selvach Before his accession to the throne, he lived familiarly with the nobles, and was well acquainted with the causes of their mutual feuds It was, therefore, the first act of his reign to reconcile the chiefs with one another, and check the turbulent spirit which then animosities had engendered No sooner had he succeeded in thus reconciling his subjects, than he was called upon to take measures to repel an aggression of the predatory Irish A number of banditti from Ireland, who infested the district of Kintyre, in the west of Scotland, having been completely routed by the inhabitants, the Irish nation was highly exasperated, and resolved to revenge the injury done to them Achaius despatched an ambassador to soften their rage, but before he had time to return from his fruitless mission, an immense number of Irish plundered and laid waste the island of Isla These depredators were all drowned when returning home with their spoil, and such was the terror which this calamity inspired into the Irish, that they immediately sued for peace, which was generously granted them by the king of Scotland A short time after the conclusion of this treaty, the emperor Charlemagne sent an ambassador to Achaius, requesting the Scots king to enter into a strict alliance with him against the English, who, in the language of the envoy, "shamefully filled both sea and land with their piracies, and bloody invasions" After much hesitation and debate among the king's counsellors, the alliance was unanimously agreed to, and Achaius sent his brother William, along with Clement, John Scotus, Raban, and Alcuin, a native of the north of England, four of the most learned men then in Scotland, together with an army of four thousand men, to accompany the French ambassador to Paris, where the alliance was concluded, on terms very favourable to the Scots In order to perpetuate the remembrance of this event, Achaius added to the arms of Scotland a double field sowed with lilies After assisting Hungus, king of the Picts, to repel an aggression of Athelstane, king of the West Saxons, Achaius spent the rest of his reign in complete tranquillity, and died in 819, distinguished for his piety and wisdom —Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopedia

ADAIR, JAMES MAKITTRICK, physician and medical writer, was born at Inverness in 1728, and for several years practised at Bath He was noted for extreme irritability of temper, and among other persons with whom he had a dispute was the eccentric Philip Thicknesse, in the dedication to whose memoirs is given an account of one of his last quarrels He afterwards went to Antigua, and became physician to the commander-in-chief and the colonial troops, and one of the judges of the court of king's bench and common pleas in that island He was the author of several medical tracts on regimen, the materia medica, &c, as also of a pamphlet against the abolition of the slave trade He died 24th April 1801, at Ayr

ADAM, a surname belonging to a family of some antiquity in Scotland Duncan Adam, son of Alexander Adam, lived in the reign of Robert the Bruce, and had four sons, Robert, John, Reginald, and Duncan, from whom all the Adams, Adamsons, and Adies in Scotland, are descended [Burke's Landed Gentry] From the youngest son, Duncan Adam, who accompanied James, Lord Douglas in his expedition to Spain on his way to the Holy Land, with the heart of King Robert, is stated to have descended, JOHN ADAM, who was slain at Flodden in 1513 His son CHARLES ADAM was seated at Fanno in Forfarshire, and his descendant in the fourth degree, ARCHIBALD ADAM, of Fanno, sold his patrimonial lands in the time of Charles I, and acquired those of Queensmanour in the same county His great-grandson, JOHN ADAM, married Helen Cranstoun, of the family of Lord Cranstoun, by whom he left one son, WILLIAM ADAM, an eminent architect, who purchased several estates, particularly that of Blair, in the county of Kinross, where he built a house and village, which he named Maryburgh He married Mary, daughter of William Robertson, Esq of Gladney, and, with other issue, had JOHN ADAM, his heir (the father of the Right Hon WILLIAM ADAM Lord Chief Commissioner of the Jury Court in Scotland, the subject of a subsequent biography), and ROBERT and JAMES ADAM, the celebrated architects, of both of whom notices are here given —

ADAM, ROBERT, a celebrated architect, was born at Kirkaldy in 1728 He was the second son of Mr William Adam of Maryburgh, who, like his father, was also an architect, and who designed Hopetoun house, the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, and other buildings After studying at the university of Edinburgh, Robert, in 1754 proceeded to the continent, and resided three years in Italy, studying his art From the splendid monuments of antiquity which that country presents to the traveller, he imbibed that scientific style of design by which all his works are distinguished But it was only from fragments that he was enabled to form his taste, the ravages of time and the hands of barbarians having united for the destruction of those noble specimens of ancient architecture, the ruins of which only remain to attest their former grandeur and magnificence With the intention of viewing a more complete monument of ancient splendour than any he had seen, accompanied by M Clerisseau, a French artist, and two expert draughtsmen, in July 1757 he sailed from Venice to Spalatro in Dalmatia, to inspect the remains of the palace to which the emperor Diocletian retired from the cares of government They found the palace much defaced, but as its remains still exhibited the nature of the structure, they proceeded to a minute examination of its various parts Their labours, however, were immediately interrupted by the interference of the government of Venice, from a suspicion that they were making plans of the fortifications Fortunately, General Græme, commander-in-chief of the Venetian forces, interposed, and, being seconded by Count Antonio Marcovich, they were soon allowed to prosecute their designs In 1762, on his return to England, he was appointed architect to the king, an office which he resigned six years afterwards, on being elected M P for the county of Kinross In 1764 he published, in one volume folio, a splendid work, containing seventy-one engravings and descriptions of the ruins of the palace of Diocletian at Spalatro, and of some other buildings In 1773 he and his brother James, also an eminent architect, brought out 'The Works of R and J Adam,' in numbers, consisting of plans and elevations of buildings in England and Scotland, erected or designed, among which are the Register House and the University of Edinburgh, and the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, in Scotland, and Sion House, Caen-Wood, Luton Park House, and some edifices at Whitehall, in England

Mr Adam died 3d March, 1792, by the bursting of a blood-vessel, and was buried in Westminster Abbey The year before his death he designed no less than eight public buildings and twenty-five private ones His genius extended itself beyond the decorations of buildings, to various branches of manufacture, and besides the improvements which he introduced into the architecture of the country, he displayed great skill and taste in his numerous drawings in landscape —Annual Register, vol xxxiv —Scots Mag 1803

Of the Register House at Edinburgh it is remarked by Telford, in his contribution on Civil

Architecture to the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, that "only a part of this masterly plan has been executed, but even this composes an apparently complete building The original design as given in the works of R and J Adam, has in the centre a magnificent circular saloon, covered and lighted by a dome This saloon is surrounded by small apartments, and the whole of these are enclosed by buildings in the shape of a parallelogram, by which ingenious contrivance access to all the apartments and an effective lighting of the whole is perfectly accomplished Even as it is, this building, both internally and externally, reflects great credit on the architect, and from the chasteness of the details, it is evident that the external features have been the result of much attention A greater degree of magnificence," he adds, "might have been obtained by keeping the basement of the principal front lower, by adding to the magnitude of the order," and by a few modifications of other details

Among the private edifices pertaining to Scotland connected with the name of Robert Adam, are, Hopetoun House, on the south bank of the estuary of the Forth, to which magnificent edifice he added the graceful wings, Melville Castle, on the banks of the Esk near Lasswade, which was by his ingenuity rendered a magnificent and appropriate feature in that part of the kingdom, Culzean Castle, on a bold promontory on the coast of Ayrshire, where, with his usual fertility of invention, the same architect has rendered this seat of the marquis of Ailsa a just resemblance of a Roman villa as described by Pliny, and last, but not least, Gosford House in East Lothian, perhaps the most extensive and superb of modern Scottish structures, built by the earl of Wemyss from one of his designs Of Sion House, the mansion of the duke of Northumberland, in the county of Middlesex, the chief features of novelty are in the style of Spalatra and the Pantheon at Rome, but the interior arrangements are in every respect as good as can well be imagined Luton park in Bedfordshire, the seat of the marquis of Bute, is the most original of all his works, and although not in all respects the happiest, may be considered—the façade especially—as designed in his best manner

ADAM, James, the brother of the preceding, held, at one period, the office of architect to his majesty George III He was the designer of Portland Place, one of the noblest streets in London, and died on the 17th October, 1794 From the two brothers the Adelphi Buildings in the Strand derive their name, being their joint work

ADAM, William, Right Hon, nephew of the two foregoing gentlemen, lord chief commissioner of the jury court in Scotland, on its first introduction there for the trial of civil causes, the son of John Adam of Blair Adam, and his wife Jean, the daughter of John Ramsay, Esq, was born 21st July 1751, O S He was educated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford, and in 1773 was admitted a member of the faculty of Advocates, but never practised at the Scottish bar In 1774 he was chosen M P for Gatton, in 1780 for Stranraer, &c, in 1784 for the Elgin burghs, and in 1790 for Ross-shire At the close of Lord North's administration in 1782, in consequence of some family losses he became a barrister-at-law In 1794 he retired from parliament to devote himself to his profession In 1802 he was appointed counsel for the East India Company, and in 1806 chancellor of the duchy of Cornwall In the same year he was returned M P for Kincardineshire, and in 1807, being elected both for that county and for Kinross-shire, he preferred to sit for the former In 1811 he again vacated his seat for his professional duties Being now generally esteemed a sound lawyer his practice increased, and he was consulted by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, and many of the nobility In the course of his parliamentary career, in consequence of something that occurred in a discussion during the first American war, he fought a duel with the late Mr Fox, which happily ended without bloodshed, when the latter jocularly remarked, that had his antagonist not loaded his pistol with government powder, he would have been shot Mr Adam generally opposed the politics of Mr Pitt In 1814 he submitted to government the plan for trying civil causes by jury in Scotland In 1815 he was made a privy councillor, and was appointed one of the barons of the Scottish exchequer, chiefly with the view of enabling him to introduce and establish the new system of trial by jury in civil cases

In 1816 an act of parliament was obtained, instituting a separate jury court in Scotland, in which he was appointed lord chief commissioner, with two of the judges of the court of session as his colleagues He accordingly relinquished his situation in the exchequer, and continued to apply his energies to the duties of the jury court, overcoming, by his patience, zeal, and urbanity, the many obstacles opposed to the success of such an institution In 1830, when sufficiently organized, the jury court was, by another act, transferred to the court of session, and on taking his seat on the bench of the latter for the first time, addresses were presented to him from the Faculty of Advocates, the Society of Writers to the Signet, and the Solicitors before the Supreme Courts, thanking him for the important benefits which the introduction of trial by jury in civil cases had conferred on the country In 1833 he retired from the bench, and died at his house in Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, on the 17th February 1839, in the 89th year of his age

After his appointment to the presidency of the jury court, he spent a great part of his time at his paternal seat in Kinross-shire "Here," says Lockhart, in his Life of Scott, "about Midsummer 1816, he received a visit from his near relation William Clerk, Adam Fergusson, his hereditary friend and especial favourite, and then lifelong intimate, Scott They remained with him for two or three days, in the course of which they were all so much delighted with their host, and he with them, that it was resolved to re-assemble the party with a few additions, at the same season of every following year This was the origin of the Blair-Adam club, the regular members of which were in number nine, viz , the four already named, —the chief commissioner's son, Admiral Sir Charles Adam, his son-in-law, the late Mr Anstruther Thomson of Charleton, in Fifeshire, Mr Thomas Thomson, the deputy register of Scotland, his brother, the Rev John Thomson, minister of Duddingstone, one of the first landscape painters of his time, and the Right Hon Sir Samuel Shepherd, who became chief baron of the court of exchequer in Scotland, shortly after the third anniversary of this brotherhood They usually continued to meet on a Friday, spent the Saturday in a ride to some scene of historical interest within an easy distance, enjoyed a quiet Sunday at home,—'duly attending divine worship at the Kirk of Cleish (not Cleishbotham)'—gave Monday morning to another antiquarian excursion, and returned to Edinburgh in time for the courts of Tuesday From 1816 to 1831 inclusive, Sir Walter was a constant attendant at these meetings" It was during one of these visits to Blair-Adam that the idea of 'The Abbot' had first arisen in Scott's mind, and it was at his suggestion that the chief commissioner commenced a little book on the improvements which had taken place on his estate, which, under the title of 'Blair-Adam, from 1733 to 1834,' was privately printed for his own family and intimate friends "It was," says the Judge, "on a fine Sunday, lying on the grassy summit of Bennarty, above its craggy brow, that Sir Walter said, looking first at the flat expanse of Kinross-shire (on the south side of the Ochils), and then at the space which Blair-Adam fills between the hill of Drumglow (the highest of the Cleish hills) and the valley of Lochore—'What an extraordinary thing it is, that here to the north so little appears to have been done, when there are so many proprietors to work upon it, and to the south, here is a district of country entirely made by the efforts of one family, in three generations, and one of them amongst us in the full enjoyment of what has been done by his two predecessors and himself! Blair-Adam, as I have always heard, had a wild, uncomely, and unhospitable appearance, before its improvements were begun It would be most curious to record in writing its original state, and trace its gradual progress to its present condition'" Lockhart adds, "upon this suggestion, enforced by the approbation of the other members present, the president of the Blair-Adam club commenced arranging the materials for what constitutes a most instructive as well as entertaining history of the agricultural and arboricultural progress of his domains in the course of a hundred years, under his grandfather, his father (the celebrated architect), and himself And Sir Walter had only suggested to his friend of Kinross-shire what he was resolved to put into practice with regard to his own improvements on Tweedside, for he began at precisely the same period to keep a regular journal of all his rural transactions, under the title of 'Sylva Abbotsfordiensis'" (See Lockhart's Life of Scott, chapter 50)

Mr Adam was a personal friend of George IV, and at one period held a confidential office in the royal household at Carlton House, when the latter was prince regent He married in 1777 a daughter of the tenth Lord Elphinstone, and had a family of several sons viz John, long at the head of the council in India, who died in 1825, Admiral Sir Charles, M P one of the lords of admiralty, and governor of Greenwich Hospital, died in 1854, William George, an eminent king's counsel, afterwards accountant-general in the court of Chancery, who died 16th May 1839, three months after his father, and the Right Hon General Sir Frederick, who distinguished himself in the Peninsular war, held a command at Waterloo, where he was wounded, was afterwards high commissioner of the Ionian islands, and subsequently governor of Madras, died 17th August 1853 A younger son died abroad

ADAM, ALEXANDER, an eminent scholar, and author of a standard work on 'Roman Antiquities,' was born at Coats of Burgie, in the parish of Rafford, county of Elgin, on the 24th June, 1741 (Coates or Cots, meaning a house or enclosure for sheep) His parents, who rented a small farm, were in humble circumstances, and, like many of his countrymen who have afterwards raised themselves to distinction, he received the first part of his education at the parish school His constant application to his book induced his father to have him taught Latin Before he was sixteen, he had borrowed, from a clergyman in the neighbourhood, a copy of Livy in the small Elzevir edition, and we are told used to read it before daybreak, during the mornings of winter, by the light of splinters of bogwood dug out of an adjoining moss, not having an opportunity of doing so at any other period of the day In 1757 he endeavoured, but without success, to obtain a bursary or exhibition at King's college, Aberdeen In 1758, a relative of his mother, the Rev Mr Watson, one of the ministers of the Canongate, Edinburgh, advised him to remove to that city, "provided he was prepared to endure every hardship for a season," and hardships of a severe nature he did endure, but nothing could deter him from the pursuit of knowledge Through Mr Watson's influence he obtained free admission to the lectures of the different professors, with, of course, access to the college library, and while attending the classes, it appears that all his income was only the sum of one guinea per quarter, which he received from Mr Alan Maconochie, afterwards Lord Meadowbank, for being his tutor At this time he lodged in a small room at Restalrig, for which he paid fourpence a-week His breakfast consisted of oatmeal porridge with small beer, and his dinner was often no more than a penny loaf and a drink of water After about eighteen months of close study, at the early age of nineteen he was fortunate in being elected, on a comparative trial of candidates, head master of Watson's Hospital, where he continued to improve himself in classical knowledge, by a careful perusal of the best authors Three years afterwards he resigned this office, on becoming private tutor to the son of Mr Kincaid, subsequently lord provost of Edinburgh In April 1765 he was, by that gentleman's influence, appointed assistant to Mr Matheson, rector of the high school, whose increasing infirmities compelled him to retire, on a small annuity, paid principally from the class-fees, and on the 8th June 1768 he succeeded him as rector He now devoted himself assiduously to the duties of his school, and to those literary and classical researches for which he was so peculiarly qualified To him the high school of Edinburgh owes much of its reputation, and is entirely indebted for the introduction of Greek, which he effected in 1772, in spite of the opposition of the Senatus Academicus of the university, who, considering it an encroachment on the Greek chair, presented a petition and remonstrance against it to the town council, but without success Having introduced into his class a new Latin grammar of his own compiling, and recommended its adoption in the other classes, instead of Ruddiman's which had been heretofore in use, a dispute arose between him and the under masters, and the matter was referred by the magistrates of Edinburgh, the patrons of the school, to Dr Robertson, the historian, principal of the university, who decided in favour of Ruddiman's The magistrates, in consequence, issued an order in 1786 prohibiting the use of any other grammar of the Latin language, but this, and a subsequent order to the same effect, Dr Adam disregarded, and continued to use his own rules, without being further interfered with In 1772 he had published the work in question, under the title of 'The Principles of Latin and English Grammar,' the chief object of which was to combine the study of English and Latin grammar, so that they might illustrate each other, in order to avoid the inconvenience to pupils of learning Latin from a Latin grammar, before they understood the language One of the most active opponents of the new grammar was Dr Gilbert Stuart, who was related to Ruddiman, and who inserted several squibs in the papers of the day against Adam and his work, to the author's great annoyance

In 1780 the degree of LL D was conferred upon Mr Adam by the college of Edinburgh, chiefly at the suggestion of Principal Robertson, and before his death, he had the satisfaction of seeing his grammar adopted in his own seminary Among the more celebrated of his pupils was Sir Walter Scott, who joined the rector's class at the high school in 1782 It was from Dr Adam, he says, that he first learned the value of the knowledge he had till then considered only as a burdensome task As he gained some distinction by his poetical versions from Horace and Virgil, the rector took much notice of Scott, and when he began afterwards to be celebrated in the literary world, Dr Adam never failed to remind him of his obligations to him "The good old Doctor," says Sir Walter, "plumed himself upon the success of his scholars in life, all of which he never failed (and often justly) to claim as the creation, or at least the fruits, of his early instructions He remembered the fate of every boy at his school, during the fifty years he had superintended it, and always traced their success or misfortunes, entirely to their attention or negligence when under his care" One of the under-masters at the high school, a person of the name of William Nicol, the hero of Burns' famous drinking song of "O Willie brew'd a peck o' maut," is said to have been encouraged by the magistrates of Edinburgh to insult the person and authority of Dr Adam, at the time of the famous dispute with him about his grammar "This man," says Sir Walter Scott, "was an excellent classical scholar, and an admirable convivial humourist (which latter quality recommended him to the friendship of Burns), but worthless, drunken, and inhumanly cruel to the boys under his charge He carried his feud against the rector within an inch of assassination, for he waylaid, and knocked him down in the dark," one night in the High School Wynd The rector's scholars, at the instigation of the future author of Waverley, took a schoolboy's revenge Exasperated at the outrage, the next time that Nicol went to teach the rector's class, they resolved on humbling him "The task," says Mr James Mitchell, Sir Walter's tutor at this time, "which the class had prescribed to them was that passage in the Æneid of Virgil, where the queen of Carthage interrogates the court as to the stranger that had come to her habitation—

'Quis novus hic hospes successit sedibus nostris?'

Master Walter having taken a piece of paper, inscribed upon it these words, substituting vanus for novus, and pinned it to the tail of the master's coat, and turned him into ridicule by raising the laugh of the whole school against him" [Lockhart's Life of Scott]

Dr Adam's principal work was the 'Roman Antiquities,' or, an account of the manners and customs of the Romans, published in 1791, which was translated into various foreign languages, and which is now used as a class-book in many of the English schools For this work he got £600 In 1794 appeared his 'Summary of Geography and History,' in one thick volume of 900 pages, having increased to this size from a small treatise on the same subject, printed, for the use of his pupils, in 1784 The least popular of his works is the 'Classical Biography,' published in 1800, and the last of his laborious and useful compilations was an abridged Latin Dictionary, entitled 'Lexicon Linguæ Latinæ Compendiarum,' 8vo, which was published in 1805, and intended for the use of schools Dr Adam's books are valuable auxiliaries to the student, from the mass of useful and classical information which they contain He had commenced a larger dictionary than the one published, but did not live to complete it.

Having been seized in the high school with an apoplectic attack, he was conducted home, and put to bed, where he languished for five days, and, as death was approaching, fancying himself, during the wanderings of his mind, with his pupils, he said, "But it grows dark, boys, you may go!" and almost immediately expired, on the 18th of December, 1809, at the age of 68 Possessed of an ardent and independent mind, and liberal in the extreme in politics, he took a great interest in the progress of the French Revolution, believing it to be the cause of liberty, and even went so far as to introduce political matters into his school, for which he was much censured at the time, and that by many of his friends, but after the first excitement had passed away, he soon regained the respect even of those who had been most embittered against him He was universally regretted, and the magistrates of Edinburgh honoured his memory by a public funeral His portrait by Raeburn, taken shortly before his death at the desire of some of his old pupils, was placed in the library of the high school Annexed is a woodcut of it

"His features," says his biographer, "were regular and manly, and he was above the middle size" He was twice married, and left a widow, two daughters, and a son One of his daughters married a Dr Prout, and at one time resided in Sackville Street, London His son, Dr Adam, for many years resided in Edinburgh —Henderson's Life of Dr Adam, Edin Monthly Mag 1810

ADAM, Robert, the Rev, B A author of 'The Religious World Displayed,' was born in the parish of Udny, Aberdeenshire, of poor but respectable parents, about the year 1770 He was educated and took his degree of M A at Aberdeen He was afterwards sent, by some persons interested in his welfare, to St Edmund Hall, Oxford where he took the degree of bachelor of arts Subsequently he was ordained deacon and priest by Dr Beilby Porteus, bishop of London About the year 1801 he was appointed assistant to Dr Abernethy Drummond of Hawthornden, titular bishop of Glasgow, whom he succeeded as minister of Blackfriars' Wynd episcopal chapel, Edinburgh He was also chaplain to the earl of Kellie In 1809 he published an elaborate and comprehensive work in three volumes, entitled 'The Religious World Displayed, or a View of the Four Grand Systems of Religion, Judaism, Paganism, Christianity, and Mahomedanism, and of the Various Denominations, Sects, and Parties in the Christian World to which is subjoined, a View of Deism and Atheism,' which he inscribed to the memory of Bishop Drummond, formerly senior minister of his congregation He was subsequently appointed to a church in the Danish island of St Croix, where he was much annoyed by the Danish authorities, and ultimately ordered to leave the island His conduct met with the full approbation of our own government, and he proceeded to Denmark to procure redress, which it appears he never obtained After his return from Copenhagen to London, he accompanied the newly appointed bishop of Barbadoes to the West Indies in 1825, and was appointed interim pastor of the island of Tobago, where he died on the 2d July 1826

ADAM, Scotus, one of the doctors of the Sorbonne, and a canon regular of the order of Premonstratenses, flourished in the twelfth century He was born in Scotland, and educated in the monastery of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in the county of Durham He afterwards went to Paris and taught school divinity in the Sorbonne In his latter years he became one of "the monks of Melrose" He afterwards retired to the Abbey of Durham, where he wrote the Lives of St Columbanus, and of some other monks of the sixth century, and also of David I king of Scotland He died in 1195 His works were printed at Antwerp in folio, in 1659 —Biog Dic

ADAMSON, Henry, a poet of the seventeenth century, was the son of James Adamson, dean of guild in Perth in 1600, the year of the Gowrie conspiracy, and provost of that city in 1610 and 1611 He was educated for the church, and is stated to have been a good classical scholar He wrote some Latin poems which are described as being far above mediocrity In 1638 he published a poem, in 4to, entitled 'Muses Threnodie, or Mirthful Mournings on the Death of Mr Gall, with a description of Perth, and an account of the Gowry conspiracy,' &c He was honoured with the approbation of Drummond of Hawthornden, and appears, from the complimentary verses prefixed to his poems, to have been much respected for his talents and worth It was at the request of Drummond that Adamson published his 'Muses Threnodie,' after having resisted the solicitations of his friends to print it The letter which the poet of Hawthornden wrote to him on the occasion, is dated Edinburgh, 12th July 1637 It was inserted in the introductory address to the reader, prefixed to the first edition, and contains the following passage "Happie hath Perth been in such a citizen, not so other townes of this kingdome, by want of so diligent a searcher and preserver of their fame from oblivion Some Muses, neither to themselves nor to others, do good, nor delighting nor instructing Yours inform both, and longer to conceal them, will be, to wrong your Perth of her due honours, who deserveth no less of you than that she should be thus blazoned and registrate to posterity, and to defraud yourself of a monument which, after you have left this transitory world, shall keep your name and memory to after times This shall be preserved by the towne of Perth, for her own sake first, and after for yours, for to her it hath been no little glory that she hath brought forth such a citizen, so eminent in love to her, so dear to the Muses" Adamson died unmarried in 1639 A new edition of his poem was published in 1774, with illustrative notes, by James Cant, in 2 vols 12mo The book is now scarce —Campbell's Introduction to the History of Poetry in Scotland

ADAMSON, Patrick, an eminent prelate and Latin poet, was born at Perth, March 15, 1537 His parents are said to have been poor, but he received a sufficiently liberal education, first at the grammar school of his native town, and afterwards at the university of St Andrews, where he studied philosophy, and took his degree of master of arts His name first appears in the diaries and church records of the period, not as Adamson, but under the varieties of Constaine, Cousting, Constan, Constant, and Constantine [See Bannatyne's Journal, p 323, James Melville's Diary, pp 25 and 42 Calderwood, vol ii p 46, and The Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland, pp 2 and 23] His biographers state that on quitting the university he became a schoolmaster at a village in Fife but on the meeting of the first General Assembly, in December 1560, he was, under the name of Patrick Constan, among those who were appointed in St Andrews, "for ministering and teaching" [Calderwood, vol ii p 46] Under the same name he was, in 1563, minister of Ceres, in Fife and was appointed a commissioner "to plant kirks from Dee to Ethan" [Ibid p 245] In the seventh General Assembly, held at Edinburgh in June 1564, he preferred a request to be allowed to pass to France and other countries, "for augmenting of his knowledge for a time," but the Assembly unanimously refused his application, and ordained that he should not leave his congregation, "without speciall licence of the haill kirk" [Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland, p 23] Early in 1566, on the invitation of Sir James Makgill of Rankeillor, clerk-register, he accompanied his eldest son, as tutor, to France, where the latter was going to study the civil law, on which occasion he appears to have demitted himself of the office of the ministry On the 19th of June of that year, Mary queen of Scots was delivered of a prince, afterwards James the Sixth, on which occasion Constant or Adamson, then at Paris, wrote a Latin poem, styling the royal infant "Prince of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland," which so offended the French government that he was imprisoned for six months Queen Mary herself, and several of the nobility, interceded for his liberation On regaining his freedom he proceeded with his pupil to the universities of Poitiers and Padua, where he applied himself to the study of the civil and canon laws On their return from Italy, they visited Geneva, and here, from his intercourse with Beza, he imbibed the Calvinistic doctrines of theology Some time before their return to Scotland they revisited Paris As well-known Protestants, however, they found it dangerous to remain in the capital, and retired to Bourges, where Constant concealed himself for seven months in an inn, the master of which, an old man 70 years of age, was, for harbouring heretics, thrown from the roof of his own house and killed on the spot In this sepulchre, as he called it, he employed his time in composing a Latin poetical version of the Book of Job, and in writing in the same language a piece called the Tragedy of Herod—the latter of which has never been published Before leaving France he was bold enough to publish a Latin translation of the Confession of Faith, for which he obtained great credit

At what period Constant returned to Scotland does not appear, but it must have been previous to 5th March 1571, for the Assembly which met at Edinburgh at that time earnestly desired him, in consideration of the lack of ministers, to re-enter the ministry He craved time till next Assembly, which met on 6th August thereafter, to which he sent a written answer, complying with their request He had previously married the daughter of a lawyer

On the election of Mr John Douglas, rector of the university of St. Andrews, to the archbishopric of that diocese, on the 8th of February 1572, Constant is mentioned as having preached a sermon, and John Knox the discourse before the installation [Bannatyne] On this occasion he was not, as afterwards alleged by his enemies, a candidate for that see Most of his biographers represent him to have been in France at the period of the massacre of St Bartholomew, which occurred on the 24th August of this year (1572), but he had certainly returned to Scotland more than a year before that event, and no mention is made of a second visit to that country Constant appears at this time to have enjoyed the friendship of Andrew Melville and of many of the ministers of Edinburgh He had been appointed minister of Paisley, and through his influence with the regent Morton the valuable living of Govan, near Glasgow, was in the year 1575 annexed to the university of that city, "the only good thing," says the spiteful James Melville, "he or Morton were ever known to have done" [Diary, p 42] In the same year he was named one of the commissioners of the General Assembly, for settling the polity and jurisdiction of the church, which, at that period of ecclesiastical transition, was episcopalian in its spirit and form, although the supreme authority in spiritual matters was placed in the General Assembly About this time he appears to have dropped the name of Constant, as he is ever afterwards called Adamson by contemporary writers

In the course of 1576 Adamson was nominated, with John Row and David Lindsay, to report the proceedings of the commissioners to the regent Morton, who appointed him one of his chaplains In the same year, on the death of Douglas, archbishop of St Andrews, Adamson, on the presentation and recommendation of Morton, was advanced to the vacant archbishopric His elevation to the archiepiscopal see became the origin of all his misfortunes The General Assembly, having generally acceded to the new views which Melville introduced from Geneva as to the Presbyterian form of government for the church, sought to impose limitations on his powers, which were contrary to the previous usage of the church and to the laws of the kingdom, to which restrictions, however, Adamson from the outset and even before his installation declared, when questioned by that court, that he would not submit From the period of his instalment, therefore, he was engaged, for several years, in almost perpetual altercation with the General Assembly "Adamson," says Bishop Keith, "did not receive, for what we know, any ecclesiastical consecration" This, however, is incorrect From the acts of the General Assembly threatening proceedings against his inaugurators, the chapter of St Andrews, we infer that he was installed by a form of consecration similar to that of his predecessor, which, as formally settled by the General Assembly with reference to that ceremony, was the same as that of the superintendents, and of which Bannatyne details the formula, (p 321)

In the General Assembly, which met at Edinburgh in April, 1577, Adamson was cited to answer before some commissioners who had been appointed to examine him, and, in the interim, it was ordered that he should be discharged from exercising his episcopal functions "till he should be admitted by the Assembly" [Calderwood's History, vol iii p 879] The same year he published a translation of the Catechism of Calvin in Latin verse, for the use of the young prince (James VI), which was much commended in England, France, and the Netherlands, where he was already well known by his translation of the Confession of Faith In 1578 he was induced to submit himself to the General Assembly, but this did not long secure his tranquillity, for in the year following he was exposed to fresh troubles In the record of the 38th General Assembly, which met at Stirling, 11 June 1578, as printed in 'The Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland,' there are five pages blank, supposed, as marked in an old hand on the copy transcribed, "to be part of that which was torn out by Adamson B of St Andrews" Some after blanks are also pointed out [B of Universall Kirk, pp 180, 183, 203, 207, 338, footnotes] This, however, is as likely to have been done by another. The General Assembly which met at Edinburgh 7th July 1579, summoned him to answer to five several charges, three of which were for voting in parliament without a commission from the Assembly, for giving collation of the vicarage of Bolton, and for opposing the policy of the church in his place in parliament Finding it expedient to retire for a time to the castle of St Andrews, where he lived, as James Melville expresses it, "like a tod in his hole," he was, in the year 1582, attacked with a grievous chronic distemper, from which, as he could get no relief from his physicians, he had recourse to a simple remedy, administered by an old woman named Alison Pearson, which completely cured him His enemies now accused him of dealing with a witch, and applying to an emissary of the devil for means whereby to save his life The old woman herself was committed to the castle of St Andrews for execution, but by the connivance of the archbishop she contrived to make her escape Four years thereafter, however, she was again apprehended, and burnt for witchcraft

In the year 1583, King James visited St Andrews, when Archbishop Adamson preached before him with great approbation In his sermon, he inveighed, as Calderwood expresses it, against the Presbyterian clergy, the lords reformers, and all their proceedings [Calderwood's History, vol iii p 716] The doctrines which the archbishop avowed on this occasion recommended him to the favour of the king, who sent him as his ambassador to the court of Queen Elizabeth, where his object was twofold, namely, to recommend the king his master to the nobility and gentry of England, and to obtain support to the tottering cause of episcopacy in Scotland His eloquent sermons and address attracted such numerous auditories, and excited such a high idea of the young king, that Queen Elizabeth's jealousy was kindled, and she prohibited him from preaching while he remained in England In 1584 he was recalled, and on his return to Edinburgh, he exerted himself strenuously in support of King James' views in favour of episcopacy He sat in the parliament held at Edinburgh in the month of August of that year, and concurred in several laws which were enacted for establishing the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters In the following year he was appointed to vindicate these acts of parliament, and his apology is inserted in Holinshed's English Chronicle Mr James Melville gives a full copy of what he styles "a Bull which the archbishop of St Andrews got of the king as supreme governor of the kirk, whereby he has power and authority to use his archiepiscopal office within the kirk and his diocese" [Diary, p 182]

In April 1586, the provincial synod of Fife met at St Andrews, when Mr James Melville, as moderator of the previous meeting, preached the opening sermon, in the course of which he denounced the archbishop to his face, and demanded that he should be cut off, for having devised and procured the passing of the late acts of parliament in 1584, which were subversive of the Presbyterian discipline In his defence Adamson said that the acts were none of his devising, although they had his support as good and lawful statutes He then declined the jurisdiction of the court, and appealed from it to the king and parliament, but nevertheless was formally excommunicated by the synod In return, he next day ordered Mr Samuel Cunningham, one of his servants, to pronounce the archiepiscopal excommunication against Andrew Melville, James Melville, and others, with Andrew Hunter, minister of Carnbee, who had denounced the anathema of the synod against the archbishop The proceedings of the synod being manifestly informal, the General Assembly, which met at Edinburgh in the following month, annulled the sentence of excommunication against him, and reponed him to the same position which he had held before the meeting of the provincial synod of Fife The Melvilles being summoned before the king for their conduct in this harsh and vindictive transaction, were ordered to confine themselves, Andrew to his native place during the king's will, and James to his college [Melville's Diary, p 165] The archbishop, besides his usual clerical duties, was required to teach public lessons in Latin within the Old college, and the whole university commanded to attend the same [Ibid p 166] As archbishop of St Andrews he was ex officio chancellor of the university

About the end of June 1587, M Du Bartas, the famous French poet, being in Scotland as ambassador from the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV of France, accompanied King James to St Andrews His majesty, desirous of hearing a lecture from Mr Andrew Melville, principal of St Mary's college, gave him an hour's notice of his wish Melville endeavoured to excuse himself, but his majesty insisting, he delivered an extempore discourse, upon the government of the church of Christ, when he refuted the whole acts of parliament which had been passed against the presbyterian discipline On the following day an entertainment was given by the archbishop to the king and the French envoy, when Adamson took occasion to pronounce a lecture, to counteract that of Melville, his principal topics being the preeminence of bishops and the supremacy of kings Melville was present and took notes, and had no sooner returned to his college than he caused the bell to be rung, and an intimation to be conveyed to the king that he intended to deliver another lecture after an interval of two hours On this occasion, besides the king, Du Bartas and Adamson were present Avoiding all formal reference to the previous speech of the archbishop, Melville dexterously quoted from popish books, which he had brought with him, all his leading positions and arguments in favour of episcopacy When he had shown them to be plain popery, he proceeded to refute them with such force of reason that Adamson remained silent, although he had previously requested permission from the king to defend his own doctrines The king, however, spoke for him, and after making some learned and scholastic distinctions, he concluded with commanding them all to respect and obey the archbishop The whole of this narrative, however, rests upon the authority of James Melville, which, besides being that of a prejudiced opponent, is unfortunately in other matters relative to Adamson found to be opposed to facts recorded in the proceedings of the Church

By the act of annexation passed in 1587 the see of St Andrews, with all the other church benefices in the kingdom, was annexed to the crown The revenues of the archbishopric were thereafter bestowed on the duke of Lennox, by James VI, excepting only a small pittance, reserved for the subsistence of Archbishop Adamson In the following year he was exposed to a fresh prosecution by the church, having been summoned for having, contrary to an inhibition of the presbytery of Edinburgh, married the Catholic earl of Huntly to the king's cousin, the sister of the duke of Lennox, without requiring the earl to subscribe the Confession of Faith although he had already subscribed certain articles which were required of him previous to the proclamation of the bans Adamson on this occasion appeared by his procurator, Mr Thomas Wilson, (very likely his son-in-law,) who produced a testimonial of his sickness, subscribed by the doctor who attended him and two bailies, but the memorial was not admitted as sufficient The presbytery of St Andrews proceeded against him in absence, deprived him of all office in the church, and threatened him with excommunication The Assembly ratified the sentence of the presbytery, and for this and other alleged crimes he was deposed and again excommunicated

In the beginning of 1589 he published the Lamentations of Jeremiah, in Latin verse, which he dedicated to the king in an address, complaining of the harsh treatment he had received The same year he also published a Latin poetical translation of the Apocalypse, and addressed a copy of Latin verses to his majesty, deploring his distress The unfortunate prelate had at one period stood so high in the royal favour that James had condescended to compose a sonnet in commendation of his paraphrase of the Book of Job, but times were altered, and the king paid no attention to his appeals In his need Adamson is said to have addressed a letter to his former opponent, Mr Andrew Melville, with whom he at one period lived on terms of good neighbourhood, but opposite views in church government had long not only driven them asunder, but rendered them bitter antagonists On receipt of his letter containing the sad disclosure of his destitute situation, Melville hastened to pay the archbishop a visit, and besides procuring contributions on his behalf from his brethren of the presbytery of St Andrews, continued for several months to support him from his own private purse Reduced by poverty and disease, the unfortunate prelate, in the year 1591, sent to the Presbytery of St Andrews a paper expressive of his regret at the course he had pursued, and desiring to be restored into the church This is not the same paper which afterwards appeared under the title of 'The Recantation of Maister Patrick Adamsone,' and which was published as a pamphlet in 1598 Some of the Episcopal writers are disposed to deny the genuineness of the latter, and it is to be regretted that the proofs of its genuineness are not more complete Adamson died on the 19th February 1592, and his death was speedily followed by the restoration of the presbyterian form of church government in Scotland A collection of his Latin poetical translations from the Scriptures was published in a quarto volume in London in 1619, with his Life by his son-in-law, Thomas Wilson, an advocate, under the title of Poemata Sacra Several of his other poems are to be found in the Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, tome i, and in the Poetarum Scotorum Musæ Sacræ, tome ii

Adamson's character has been much traduced by contemporary writers, but by none more so than by Robert Semple, a minor poet of that day, who wrote a gross and scurrilous work professing to be his life, which he styled 'A Legend of the Bischop of St Androis' Life' It is thought that this 'legend' had an effect on the king's mind unfavourable to Adamson, but he fell more into disgrace with his majesty after having been "put to the horn," in 1587, and "denounced rebel," for withholding their stipends from several ministers in his diocese, and "for not furnishing of two gallons of wine to the communion"

The following address to his departing soul, written by Adamson in Latin poetry, in which he so much excelled, is, says Dr Irving, "as much superior to that of Adrian as Christianity is superior to Paganism"

O anima! fessidum vitæ jactata procellis,
Exibi, pertæsa gravis, nunc lubrica, tempus
Regna tibi, et mundi invisis contemnere sordes
Quippe parens rerum cæco te corpore clemens
Evocat, et verbi crucifixi gratia, cœli
Pandit iter, patriique beatam limine sistet.
Progenies Jovis, quo te cælestis origo
Invitat felix pergi, æternumque quiesce
Exuviæ carnis, cognato in pulvere vocem
Angelicam expectent, somnu quo putre cadaver Exiliet redivivum, et totum me tibi reddet.

Ecce beata dies! nos agni dextera ligno
Fulgentes crucis, et radiantes sanguine vivo
Excipiet quam firma illic, quam certa capesses Gaudia, felices inter novus incola cives!
Alme Deus! Deus alme! et non effabile numen!
Ad te unum et trinum, moribundo pectore anhelo

Besides the poems and translations already mentioned, Archbishop Adamson wrote many things which were never published, among which may be mentioned Six books on the Hebrew Republic, various translations of the Prophets into Latin verse, Prelections on St Paul's Epistles to Timothy, various apologetical and funeral orations, and a very candid history of his own times

AGNEW, the name of an ancient family in Wigtonshire, the head of which was constable of the castle of Lochnaw, and hereditary sheriff of that county See LOCHNAW

AIDAN, the greatest of all the kings of the Scots of Dalriad, a kingdom which formed what is now Argyleshire, was the son of Gabran, or Gavran, and succeeded to the throne in 575, on the death of his cousin, Conal I He reigned twenty-four years, according to the celebrated Duan, a Gaelic poem supposed to have been written by the court-bard of Malcolm the third, or thirty-four by the old lists Duncan the son of Conal seems to have contested the kingdom with him, but he was defeated and slain in battle at a place called Loro in Kintyre Pinkerton thinks that the Duan dates the commencement of his reign from his unction as king, which Columba long deferred, having a preference for Aidan's brother Eogenan or Eugain The Duan calls him "Aidan of the extended territories," and he certainly carried the Dalriadic power to a height from which it ever after declined, till Kenneth II ascended the Pictish throne in 836, and united the Picts and the Scots In 579 the battle of Ouc against Aidan is mentioned in the annals of Ulster, and in 581 the battle of Manan, (O'Flaherty says, the Isle of Mann,) in which he was victor He also conquered in the battle of Miathorum, or Lethrigh, in 589 In the following year he was at the famous council of Drumkeat in the diocese of Derry in Ulster, consisting of kings, peers, and clergy, summoned by Aid, king of Ireland, in which council Aidan procured the remission of all homage due by the kings of Dalriad to those of Ireland In 594 Aidan's brother Eugain died In 603, Aidan, who is styled by Bede, "the king of the Scots who inhabited Britain," marched against Ethelfrid, king of Northumbria, "with an immense and strong army," but was conquered, and fled with a few "Forasmuch as," says Bede, "in the most famous place which is called Degsastone, almost all his army was cut to pieces In which fight also Theobold, brother of Ethelfrid, with all that army which he himself commanded, was killed" The place where this disastrous battle was fought is now unknown, but it is conjectured by Bishop Gibson to have been Dalston near Carlisle, or as Bishop Nicolson supposes, Dawston near Jedburgh Aidan died in 605, in Kintyre, at an advanced age, and was buried at Kilcheran, where no king was ever buried before If the date of his death be correct, he reigned just thirty years He was succeeded by his son Achy, or Achaius, or Eochoid-buidhe (Eochy the yellow) who reigned for seventeen years Another son, Conan, was drowned in 622 He had several younger sons His brother Brandubius was king of Leinster —See Pinkerton's Enquiry, vol 2 page 113, and Ritson's Annals of the Caledonians, Picts, and Scots, vol 2, page 39

AIDAN, bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in the seventh century, was originally a monk in the monastery of Iona, and is said by some to have been a native of Ireland By his zeal, a large portion of the northern part of England was converted to Christianity In 634, when Oswald became king of the Angli of Northumberland, he sent to Scotland for a missionary, to instruct his subjects in the doctrines and duties of Christianity Aidan was accordingly consecrated a bishop, and sent to the court of Oswald, and by his advice, the episcopal see was removed from York, where it had been fixed by Gregory the Great, to Lindisfarne, a peninsula adjoining the Northumbrian coast, by a narrow isthmus, called also Holy Island, because it was chiefly inhabited by monks Here Aidan exercised an extensive jurisdiction and preached the gospel with great success, deriving encouragement and assistance in his labour from the condescending services of the king himself On Oswald being killed in battle, Aidan continued to govern the church of Northumberland under his successors, Oswin and Oswy, who reigned jointly The following extraordinary instance of the bishop's liberality to the poor is related Having received a present from King Oswin of a fine horse and rich housings, he met with a beggar, and dismounting, gave him the horse thus caparisoned When the king expressed some displeasure at this singular act of humanity, and the slight put upon his favour, Aidan quaintly but forcibly asked, "Which do you value most, the son of a mare, or the son of God?"—the king fell upon his knees and entreated the bishop's forgiveness The death of Oswin so much affected him, that he survived him only twelve days, and died in August 1651 He was buried in the church of Lindisfarne

AIKMAN, a surname, being the same as Oakman An oak tree was carried in the arms of persons of this surname and the family of Aikman of Cairney had for crest an oak tree proper

AIKMAN, WILLIAM, an eminent painter, the son of William Aikman of Cairney, advocate, by Margaret, third sister of Sir John Clerk, of Pennycuik, Baronet, was born 24th October 1682 He was intended by his father for the law, but the bent of his own mind early led him to painting as a profession In 1707, after selling off his paternal estate, he went to Rome, where he spent three years in studying the great masters, and returned to his native country in 1712, having also visited Constantinople and Smyrna At first his manner was cold, but it afterwards became soft and easy He was particularly happy in giving graceful airs and genteel likenesses to the ladies whose portraits he painted In 1723, being patronized by John, duke of Argyle, he was induced to settle as a portrait-painter in London, where he further improved his colouring by the study of Sir Godfrey Kneller's works His taste and genius introduced him to the acquaintance and friendship of the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Burlington, Sir Robert Walpole, Sir Godfrey Kneller, and others For the earl of Burlington, he painted a large picture of the royal family, which his death prevented him from finishing It is now in possession of the duke of Devonshire Aikman married Marion, daughter of Mr Lawson of Cairnmuir, county of Peebles, by whom he had an only son, John He died 4th June, O S 1731, in his 49th year His remains, with those of his son, who predeceased him about six months, were removed to Edinburgh, and interred together in the Greyfriars' churchyard An epitaph, by his friend Mallet the poet was inscribed on his tomb Several of his portraits are in the possession of the dukes of Hamilton, Argyle, Devonshire, and others He numbered among his friends Allan Ramsay, who wrote a pastoral farewell to him on his departure for London, Somerville, the author of the Chase, and Thomson, the author of the Seasons, who, as well as his friend Mallet, wrote elegiac verses on his death Mallet's epitaph has been long effaced Thomson's poem on his death closes with the following lines

"A friend, when dead, is but remov'd from sight, Sunk in the lustre of eternal night,
And when the parting storms of life are o'er,
May yet rejoin us on a happier shore
As those we love decay, we die in part,
String after string is severed from the heart,
Till loosen'd life, at last but breathing clay,
Without one pang is glad to fall away
Unhappy he who latest feels the blow
Whose eyes have wept o'er every friend laid low, Dragg'd ling'ring on from partial death to death, Till dying, all he can resign is breath"

Aikman was also intimate with Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, Gay, and most of the wits of Queen Anne's days His style bears a close resemblance to that of Kneller In the duke of Tuscany's collection of the portraits of painters done by their own hands, will be found that of Aikman, in the ducal gallery at Florence —Cunningham's Lives of Painters

AILSA, marquis of, a title borne by the ancient family of Kennedy, earls of Cassillis, conferred in 1831, and taken from

AINSLIE, ROBERT, writer to the signet, the friend and correspondent of Robert Burns, was born 13th January 1766 He was the eldest son of Mr Ainslie of Darnchester, residing at Berrywell, near Dunse, the land agent for Lord Douglas in Berwickshire He served his apprenticeship with Mr Samuel Mitchelson, in Carrubber's close, Edinburgh, who was a great musical amateur, and in whose house occurred the famous "Haggis scene" described by Smollett in Humphrey Clinker In the spring of 1787, when he had just completed his twentieth year, Burns being at that time in Edinburgh, he was fortunate enough to make his acquaintance, and in May of that year, he and the poet went upon an excursion together into Berwickshire and Teviotdale, when he introduced Burns at his father's house, and the reception he received from the family is pleasantly referred to, in his gifted companion's memoranda on this tour In 1789 Ainslie passed writer to the signet He afterwards visited Burns at Ellisland, when the poet gave him a manuscript copy of Tam O'Shanter, which he presented to Sir Walter Scott He married a lady named Cunningham, the daughter of a colonel in the Scots Brigade in the Dutch service, by whom he had a numerous family, of whom only two daughters survived him He had two brothers, and one sister, the latter of whom, whose beauty was highly spoken of by Burns, died before him One of his brothers, Douglas, succeeded his father as land agent, and the other, Sir Whitelaw Ainslie, is known as the author of an elaborate book on the Materia Medica of India, where he for many years held the situation of medical superintendent of the southern division of India, for which work he was knighted by William IV Mr Ainslie died on the 11th April 1838 He was the author of two religious little works, 'A Father's Gift to his Children,' and 'Reasons for the Hope that is in Us,' the latter comprising many of the evidences for the truth of Christianity He was also a contributor to the Edinburgh Magazine, and others of the periodicals, for forty years previous to his death His disposition was kind and benevolent, his manners affable and frank and his conversation cheerful and abounding in anecdote Many of Burns' letters to him will be found in the poet's printed correspondence —Obituary at the time —Personal recollections

AIRLIE, earl of, a title possessed by a family of the name of Ogilvy, lineally descended from Gilbert, third son of the first thane of Angus, who fought at the battle of the Standard in 1138, and obtained from William the Lion the lands of Powrie, Ogilvy, and Kyneathin, when, as was customary in those days, he assumed the name of Ogilvy from his barony

In 1392 Sir Walter Ogilvy of Wester Powrie and Auchterhouse, sheriff of Angus, was slain with sixty of his followers, at Gasklune near Blairgowrie, in endeavouring to repel an incursion of the clan Donnochy, or sons of Duncan (the clan now called Robertson) who had burst down upon the low country from the Grampian mountains

Among the slain at the battle of Harlaw in 1411, was his eldest son, "the brave lord Ogilvy, of Angus sheriff-principal" See OGILVY, surname of

Sir Walter Ogilvy, knight, the second son, was in 1425 constituted lord high treasurer of Scotland In 1430, he became master of the royal household In the following year he was appointed a commissioner for renewing the truce with England In 1434 he attended the princess Margaret into France, on her marriage with the dauphin By an order from the king he erected the tower or fortalice of Eroly or Airly in Forfarshire, into a royal castle He married Isabel de Durward, heiress of Lintrathen, by whom he acquired that barony He died in 1440, leaving two sons From Sir Walter the younger, sprang the earls of Findlater and Seafield, and the lords of Banff, see BANFF, FINDLATER, and SEAFIELD

The elder son, Sir John Ogilvy, knight, of Lintrathen, was succeeded by his eldest son Sir James Ogilvy of Airlie, ambassador from Scotland to Denmark in 1491 By James IV he was created, 28th April of that year, a peer of parliament by the title of lord Ogilvy of Airlie James, the seventh lord Ogilvy, for his loyalty and faithful services to Charles I, was on the 2d April, 1639, created earl of AIRLIE, ALYTH, and LINTRATHEN He distinguished himself in the campaigns of the marquis of Montrose, in particular at the battle of Kilsyth in 1645 Nimmo, in his history of Stirlingshire, states, that at the commencement of that engagement, a thousand Highlanders in Montrose's army, without waiting for orders, marched up the hill to attack the enemy Though displeased with their rashness, Montrose despatched a strong detachment to their assistance, under the command of the earl of Airlie, whose arrival not only preserved this resolute corps from being overpowered by a superior force, but obliged the Covenanters to retreat This was the most complete victory Montrose ever gained. The loss on his side was small, only seven or eight persons having been slain, three of whom were Ogilvies, relations of the family of Airlie

James, the second earl, was taken prisoner at Philiphaugh, and sentenced to death, but escaped from the castle of St Andrews, the night before the day of his intended execution, in the clothes of his sister

David the third earl had two sons, the eldest, James, lord Ogilvy, having engaged in the rebellion of 1715, was attainted of high treason He was afterwards pardoned, but, dying without issue, he was succeeded by his brother, John, fourth earl His son David, lord Ogilvy, joined Prince Charles Edward Stuart, at Edinburgh, in 1745, with six hundred men, chiefly of his own name and family He also was attainted of high treason, but escaped to France where he had the command of a Scotch regiment in the service of the French king, called Ogilvy's regiment Having obtained a free pardon, he returned to Scotland in 1783, and died in 1803

The title was for some time in abeyance Walter Ogilvy, Esq of Airlie, Lord Ogilvy's son, styled the seventh earl, assumed the title in 1812, but it was not restored till May 1826, when his son David was confirmed in it by act of parliament

Airlie castle, "the bonnie house of Airlie" of Scottish song, once the chief residence of the family, was destroyed, with Forthur, another of their seats, by the marquis of Argyle, in consequence of an order of the committee of estates, in 1640 The place had been regarded as almost impregnable by nature, and had already, under Lord Ogilvy, eldest son of the proprietor, successfully resisted an attack made by the earls of Montrose and Kinghorn, but on the approach of Argyle in 1641, with 5,000 men, the garrison fled, leaving the fortress an easy prey to the Covenanters, who set it on fire, and reduced it to ashes, Argyle himself, according to tradition, having taken a hammer and assisted in the demolition of the doorways and hewing of the stone work, till he was completely fatigued The modern house of Airlie, erected upon the ruins of the old castle, is a beautiful mansion, most picturesquely situated upon a peninsulated rock, at the point where the river Melgam forms a junction with the Isla A fragment of the old castle remains, consisting of an old strong gateway and part of a tower

AIRTH, a dormant earldom in the peerage of Scotland, formerly possessed by a branch of the noble family of Graham conferred in 1633 on William, seventh earl of Menteith, descended from Sir Patrick Graham of Kincardine, the brother of Sir John the Graham, the faithful companion and "right hand" of Wallace, who was slain at the battle of Falkirk Sir Patrick had previously fallen at Dunbar The grandson of the latter, Sir David Graham, styled in a royal charter, witnessed by him in 1360, of Old Montrose, was the ancestor of the dukes of Montrose of the name of Graham See MONTROSE, dukes of and GRAHAM, surname of His only son, Sir Patrick Graham, styled Dominus de Dundaff et Kincardine, acted a distinguished part in the reigns of David Bruce and Robert II The eldest son of the latter, by a second marriage, Sir Patrick Graham of Eleston and Kilpont, married Eupheme, the sole heiress of Prince David Stewart, earl of Strathearn, and acquired that title He was killed near Crieff in 1418, by the steward of Strathearn, Sir John Drummond, of Concraig His son Malise was by James I in Sept 1427 created earl of Menteith or Monteith in lieu of Strathearn His descendant and representative William, seventh earl of this line, having attempted to resume the earldom of Strathearn, was by Charles I deprived both of it and the earldom of Menteith, but to compensate him for the loss, he created him earl of Airth, as already mentioned, with precedence equal to what he had enjoyed as earl of Menteith, in which earldom he was afterwards reinstated Kilpont was the baronial title of the family It seems to have been selected as marking their descent from the stem of Kincardine, subsequently Montrose The tower of Airth, in Stirlingshire, is famous for an assault made upon it by Sir William Wallace, when held by an English garrison, whom he put to the sword The square tower which makes a part of the present house of Airth, upon the west, is said to be the same in which that bloody exploit was performed [Nimmo's History of Stirlingshire—Stirling's edition, 1817, page 170] The title of earl of Airth has been dormant since the death of William, second ear of Airth and Menteith in 1694 It was claimed by Robert Barclay Allardyce, Esq of Urie and Allardyce, who died in 1855 See MENTEITH

AITKEN, JOHN, for some time editor of Constable's Miscellany, was born on 25th March 1793, in the village of Camelon, Stirlingshire His first situation was in the East Lothian bank, and soon after he was sent to the banking office of Mr Park, Selkirk, brother of Mungo Park the traveller, where he remained for several years He was afterwards appointed teller in the East Lothian bank, where he had formerly been He subsequently removed to Edinburgh, and became a bookseller Having early displayed a predilection for literature, he now resolved to follow the bent of his mind, and commenced editing 'The Cabinet,' an elegant selection of pieces in prose and verse, three volumes of which were published The taste and judgment evinced in this publication recommended him to Mr Archibald Constable, as the fittest person to undertake the editorship of his Miscellany, and though for a time the failure of Messrs Constable and Company postponed the publication, when the work at last appeared, it was under Mr Aitken's management On the death of Mr Constable, he, in conjunction with Mr Henry Constable and Messrs Hurst, Chance, and Company, London, purchased the work, and continued editor till 1831 when some new arrangements rendered his retirement necessary He afterwards became a printer on his own account, with some prospect of success, but having caught cold, which produced erysipelas in the head, he died on the 15th of February 1833, in the 39th year of his age, leaving a widow and four children Mr Aitken wrote a few pieces of poetry of uncommon beauty and sensibility, of these, perhaps the most touching is the address to his children, prefixed to the third series of the Cabinet —Obituary at the time

AITON,—for the origin of the name of Aiton, see AYTON

AITON, WILLIAM, styled the Scottish Linnæus, was born in 1731, at a village near Hamilton Going to England in 1754, he was employed as an assistant in the Physic gardens at Chelsea, under Philip Miller, the superintendent, on whose recommendation he was in 1759 appointed head gardener to the Royal botanical garden at Kew, and became a great favourite with George III In

1783 he obtained also the appointment of superintendent of the pleasure-grounds at Kew He introduced a number of improvements into the Royal gardens, and formed there one of the best collections of rare exotic plants then known, a catalogue of which, with the title, Hortus Kewensis, was published in 1789 in 3 vols 8vo, containing an enumeration of between five and six thousand species, with thirteen plates He died in 1793, of a schirrus in the liver, and his son, William Townsend Aiton, was nominated by the king himself his successor

ALBANY, duke of, a title formerly given to a prince of the blood-royal of Scotland,—Albany, Albion, or Albinn, being the ancient Gaelic name of North Britain, and until the time of Cæsar the original appellation of the whole island The Scottish Highlanders denominate themselves 'Gael Albinn,' or Albinnich, or Albanach The name Albany is evidently derived from the Pictish word Alban, "the superior height," and is now applied to the extensive mountainous district comprising Appin and Glenorchy in Argyleshire, Athol and Breadalbane in Perthshire, and a part of Lochaber in Inverness-shire The title of duke of Albany was first conferred on the regent Robert, earl of Fife, son of Robert II Since the Union, it has always been borne by the king's second son, by creation, and was last held, as a secondary title, by the late duke of York, son of George III The history of Scotland mentions four dukes of Albany who made a figure in their time, whom, in consequence of their relation to the royal family of Scotland, we insert here, rather than under the family name of Stuart

ALBANY, ROBERT, first duke of, the third son of Robert II the first of the Stuarts, by his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Adam Mure of Rowallan in Ayrshire He was born in 1339 He obtained the earldom of Menteith by his marriage with Margaret, countess of Menteith, and afterwards in 1371 that of Fife, on the resignation of that earldom into the king's hands in his favour by Isobel, countess of Fife, the widow of his eldest brother Walter, who had died young, without issue He was accordingly thereafter styled earl of Fife and Menteith In the years 1371 and 1372, he presided at the courts of redress for settling differences on the marches In 1383 he was appointed great chamberlain of Scotland, which office he resigned in 1408, in favour of his son John, earl of Buchan In 1385, accompanied by the earl of Douglas, and John de Vienne, admiral of France, who was then in Scotland, and a body of French auxiliaries, he marched with an army of 30,000 men towards Roxburgh, at that time in the hands of the English Proceeding into England they took the castle of Wark in Northumberland, and ravaged the country from Berwick to Newcastle, but on the approach of the duke of Lancaster, they resolved to return to Scotland On their way back, they sat down before Roxburgh, but were obliged soon to raise the siege On the invasion of Scotland by the English, the earls of Fife and Douglas, and Archibald lord of Galloway, made an incursion on the west borders, as far as Cockermouth, spoiling the rich country between the Fells of Cumberland and the sea, and returned with several prisoners and abundance of plunder The talents of the earl of Fife, it is stated, were so highly prized, that the principal youth of Scotland flocked eagerly to his standard In the summer of 1388, when Douglas invaded England on the east, and fell at Otterbourne, the earl of Fife, with his brother the earl of Strathearn, entered that kingdom on the west, and after passing towards Carlisle, returned by Solway, without sustaining any loss

In 1389, in consequence of the advanced age of the king his father, and the bodily infirmity of his elder brother, the earl of Carrick, afterwards Robert III, who had been rendered lame in early youth by the kick of a horse, the earl of Fife was, by the three estates of the realm, appointed governor of the kingdom Desirous of signalizing the commencement of his administration, he raised an army, and advanced against the earl of Nottingham, marshal of England, warden of the east marches, who, after the battle of Otterbourne, had boasted that he hoped to conquer the Scots, even though opposed by a force double his own numbers On the approach of the regent and the new earl of Douglas, however, instead of giving battle, he posted his men in a secure and inaccessible place, and refused to stand the hazard of a fight, and the Scots army, after waiting half-a-day, with banners displayed in sight of the foe, returned home, wasting and destroying the country A truce was agreed to the same year, 1389 In April of the following year his father died, and his elder brother John succeeded to the throne, when he took the name of Robert III., that of John being considered inauspicious. The new king, besides being lame, was of a quiet disposition and had no strength of mind, and the management of public affairs was continued in the hands of the earl of Fife. His nephew, however, Prince David, earl of Carrick, conceiving that, as heir-apparent to the crown, he was entitled, in preference to his uncle, to be at the head of the administration, had the address to compel his retirement from the office of governor, and to get himself named regent in his place, under the condition that he should act by the advice of a council, of whom his uncle was the principal. In March 1398 Albany and his nephew Prince David had a meeting at a place called Hardenstank, with John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and other English commissioners, for settling mutual differences, and it is supposed that, on this occasion, Lancaster, from his superior title of duke, claimed some precedence not relished by the prince and his uncle, for this year the first introduction of the ducal title into Scotland took place, the earl of Carrick, the king's son, being created duke of Rothesay, and the earl of Fife, the king's brother, duke of Albany. According to Fordun, these titles were conferred in a solemn council held at Scone, April 28, 1398. In 1400, when Henry IV. of England invaded Scotland, Albany assembled an army to oppose that monarch. Henry took Haddington and Leith, and laid siege to the castle of Edinburgh, at which time William Napier of Wrightshouses was constable of the castle. With the aid of Archibald, earl of Douglas, and the duke of Rothesay, at this time governor of the kingdom, he maintained that important fortress against the whole English army, which was numerous and well appointed. In accordance with the chivalrous custom of the times, Rothesay, who was not wanting in courage, though frequently charged with imprudence, sent king Henry a knightly challenge to meet him where he pleased, with a hundred nobles on each side, and so to determine the quarrel, but the English king was not disposed to give him this advantage, and sent back an equivocating verbal reply. He then sat down with his numerous host before the castle, till cold and rain, and the want of provisions, as the inhabitants had, as usual in those days, taken care to remove every thing that the invaders could lay their hands on from their reach, compelled him to raise the siege and hastily recross the Border, without his visit being productive of much injury either in his progress or retreat. On his part the duke of Albany, whose ambition was equal to his ability, desirous of having the government to himself, permitted the enemy to withdraw without molestation, and obtained much praise from them for his clemency to all who surrendered.

Two years afterwards occurred the tragic death of the duke of Rothesay, which left a dark cloud of suspicion on his uncle's name, and the mystery attending it on which has never been satisfactorily cleared up. The circumstances of his death are related by Boece, who attaches the guilt of murder distinctly to Albany, but the love of the marvellous which is so prominent in this writer as to make even Tytler call him the most apocryphal of Scottish historians, may be supposed to have led him to give a high colouring to his narrative, which the subsequent unpopularity of Albany and the disfavour into which his memory fell with the Scottish court, would not diminish. After mentioning the death of the young duke's mother, Queen Annabella Drummond, his narrative thus proceeds: "Be quhais deith, succedit gret displesen to his son, David, duk of Rothesay, for, during his life, he wes haldin in vritews and honest occupatioun, eftir his deith, he began to rage in all maner of insolence, and fulyeit virginis matrionis, and nunnis, be his unbridillit lust. At last, King Robert, informit of his young and insolent maneris, send letteris to his brothir, the duk of Albany, to intertene his said son, the duk of Rothesay, and to len [learn] him honest and civill maneris. The duk of Albany, glaid of this writtingis, tuk the duk of Rothesay betwixt Dunde and Sanct Androis, and brocht him to Falkland, and inclusit [enclosed] him in the tour thairof, but [without] ony meit or drink. It is said, ane woman, havand commiseratioun on this duk, leit meill fall down throw the loftis of the toure, be quilkis, his life wes certane dayis savit. This woman, fra it wes knawin wes put to deith. On the same maner, ane othir woman gaif him milk of hir paup, throw ane lang

reid, and wes slane with gret cruelte, fra it wes knawin Than wes the duk destitute of all mortall supplie, and brocht, finalie, to sa miserable and hungry-appetite, that he eit, nocht allanerlie [not only] the filth of the toure quhare he wes, bot his awin fingaris, to his great martyrdome His body wes beryit in Lundoris, and kithit mirakis mony yeris eftir, quhil [till], at last King James the First began to punis his slayeris, and fra that time furth, the mirachs ceissit" The melancholy death of the duke of Rothesay forms one of the most effective incidents in Sir Walter Scott's popular novel of 'The Fair Maid of Perth,' in which the characters of the young prince, of his weak-minded father Robert the Third, and of his uncle the regent duke of Albany, are drawn with great faithfulness and power

It would appear that the duke of Rothesay, who was of a wild and thoughtless disposition, and little qualified for a charge so important as that of regent of the kingdom, had alienated the affections of all whom he ought to have courted and conciliated He had in early life been affianced to his own cousin, the beautiful Euphemia de Lindsay, sister of Sir William de Lindsay of Rossie and of David earl of Crawford,—he slighted her for Elizabeth Dunbar, sister of the earl of March and Dunbar, to whom he was solemnly contracted,—and her again for Marjory Douglas daughter of the brave but unfortunate Archibald earl of Douglas surnamed the Tineman,—whom he ultimately married The consequence was the deadly enmity of the earl of March and Sir William Rossie, the latter—in absence of the earl of Crawford in Spain—the representative of the house of Lindsay More recently he had offended his father-in-law, the earl of Douglas, by personal affronts and neglect of his daughter, and by his shameful debaucheries and vicious courses with other women He had disgusted and insulted one of his own immediate followers, Sir William Ramorgny, a man of highly polished manners, but of a revengeful heart He conceived a strong desire to effect the overthrow of Albany, which he was at no pains to conceal, and was guilty of repeated excesses which rendered his being placed under some restraint a matter of necessity

On his suspension from the office of governor, it was suggested by Sir William Lindsay and Ramorgny to the prince, in order to facilitate his capture, that he should ride to St Andrews—the bishop of which had just died,—and keep the castle for the king's interest He set off with a small train, but was intercepted by them, and conveyed a prisoner to the castle Albany, and his father-in-law Douglas, then at Culross, presently arrived, and after holding a council of the regency, it was decided to transport the unfortunate prince to Falkland, where he was placed under the custody of two individuals called Wright and Selkirk The rest of the story we have given in the words of Boece The tale contains matter that is fabulous and untrue as well as revolting and improbable All the parties named by the tradition as the murderers in chief we know to have died a natural death, except the gallant Douglas, who fell at the battle of Verneuil If the remains of the prince could have wrought miracles at all, there was no truth therefore in the reason assigned why the faculty had ceased After a life so dissipated, it is not improbable that the account given by Bower, the continuator of Fordun, may have had foundation, namely, that the young prince really died of dysentery, and to this view of the case the filthy details of Boece would rather seem to give some countenance It is singular that Wyntoun, the earliest narrator of the event, says nothing whatever of the alleged murder At the time of his death, he was in his 29th year, having been born in 1378 —See Rothesay, duke of

The mysterious death of the heir to the crown having excited great attention, a parliament met at Edinburgh on the 16th May after, to investigate the matter, when Albany and the earl of Douglas acknowledged having imprisoned the duke of Rothesay, but denied being guilty of his death, attributing it to divine providence These statements appear to have induced the parliament to declare him innocent of the murder, while at the same time he sought to make himself legally secure by taking out a remission under the great seal for the imprisonment, both for himself and for Douglas This remission, which is in Latin, was first printed by Lord Hailes, but it does not follow from the concluding remark of his comment, as

Pinkerton says, that he considered the prince as having been murdered, namely, "The duke of Albany and the earl of Douglas obtained a remission in terms as ample as if they had actually murdered the heir apparent" On the capital of the pillar of the old chapel of St Giles' cathedral at Edinburgh are still to be seen sculptured the arms of Robert duke of Albany, and those of Archibald, fourth earl of Douglas, the father in-law of Rothesay, the former on the south and the latter on the north side, and the author of 'Memorials of Edinburgh in the Olden Time' infers from this fact that this chapel had been founded and endowed by them, as an expiatory offering for the murder of the duke of Rothesay, and its chaplain probably appointed to say masses for their victim's soul [Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh, vol ii page 168] The friendship which subsisted between Albany and Douglas seems a more likely reason why their arms should have been thus placed together, than any thing in connection with the death of the young and wilful prince, that could be imputed to either of them

Soon after the death of Rothesay, Albany, in order to turn the attention of the nation into another channel, gave his consent for the renewal of hostile operations against England Two Scottish armies were successively marched across the Borders, but both were defeated and dispersed, the first at the battle of Nesbit Moor, fought on the 22d June 1402, and the other at Homeldon hill, on the 14th September of that year, when the celebrated Hotspur gained the victory In the latter the leaders of the Scots, Murdoch earl of Fife, eldest son of the regent Albany, with the earl of Douglas, his friend and supposed accomplice in the death of Rothesay, and eighty knights, and a crowd of esquires and pages, were taken prisoners, while not only among those slain but in the list of the captives, were many of that party which supported the king and his young son Prince James, against the encroaching power of Albany, whom they believed to be the murderer of his nephew the duke of Rothesay Soon after the battle of Homeldon, the Percies, who by this time had become dissatisfied with the monarch whom they had placed upon the English throne, began to organize that famous rebellion which terminated with the defeat and death of Hotspur in the battle of Shrewsbury, in which they were aided by their prisoner the earl of Douglas As a pretext for assembling an army they pretended an invasion of Scotland, and the duke of Albany, influenced probably by the example and advice of Douglas, and hoping that the kingdom would benefit by their services, readily gave in to their designs At the head of a large army Percy advanced across the Border, but had only marched a few miles into Scotland, when he commanded his forces to halt before the insignificant border-tower of Cocklaws, but the officer commanding the tower having entered into an agreement to capitulate in six weeks if not relieved, the whole English army retired On receiving information of this, Albany assembled the principal of the nobility, and having explained to them the circumstances, advised an immediate expedition into England The Scottish barons, who had been amazed at Albany's former lukewarmness and inactivity, when the capital had been invaded by Henry IV in person and the principal castle of the kingdom was in danger of falling into his hands, were now overwhelmed with astonishment at the sudden blaze of bravery which seemed to animate his breast when a paltry Border fortress was threatened by the English "All were of opinion," says Bower, "without a single dissentient voice, that upon so trivial an occasion it would be absurd to peril the welfare of the kingdom, but Albany starting up, and pointing to his page, who held his horse at a little distance, 'You, my lords,' said he, 'may sit still at home, but I vow to God and St Fillan that I shall be at Cocklaws on the appointed day, though no one but Pate Kinbuck, the boy yonder, should accompany me'" The warlike resolution of the governor was hailed with great joy "Never," says the historian, "did men more joyfully proceed to a feast, than they to collect their vassals" At the head of an immense army, Albany advanced to the Borders, but on his march, a messenger from England brought the intelligence of the result of the battle of Shrewsbury and the termination of the rebellion in England This however, did not deter him from pushing on to Cocklaws, and surrounding the fortalice with his troops, and after causing it to be proclaimed by a herald that the Percies had been utterly defeated, and so relieved the fortress, he returned, without entering England, with his army, which he immediately disbanded

In the meantime, the afflicted monarch, Robert III, resolved to send his second son James, then in his eleventh year, to France for greater security, but the vessel in which he sailed having been driven by a storm on the coast of England, was taken by an English cruiser, and the youthful prince, although there was a truce at the time between the two kingdoms, was ungenerously detained a prisoner by Henry IV for nineteen years

Robert III died of a broken heart, 4th April, 1406, and the duke of Albany, in the absence of James, was, by a parliament which met at Perth, confirmed in the regency He was then approaching his seventieth year, but vigorous, politic, and ambitious as ever During his regency occurred the famous battle of Harlaw, which was fought in 1411, between his nephew Alexander, earl of Mar, and Donald lord of the Isles, the cause of which was ostensibly the earldom of Ross, to which the lord of the Isles laid claim in right of his wife, but there can be no doubt that this claim and his subsequent invasion of the district of Ross, formed merely a pretext, which was intended to conceal his ulterior views on the throne itself It appears that the male line of the possessors of this earldom had become extinct, and the succession had devolved upon a female, Euphemia Ross, the wife of Sir Walter Lesley, by whom she had a son, Alexander, who succeeded as earl of Ross, and a daughter, Margaret, married to Donald of the Isles The countess of Ross, on the death of her husband, married Alexander earl of Buchan, fourth son of King Robert II Her son by her first marriage, Alexander earl of Ross, married Lady Isabel Stewart, eldest daughter of the regent Albany, and the only issue of this marriage was a daughter, also named Euphemia, countess of Ross, at her father's death This lady became a nun, and committed the government of her earldom to Albany, with the intention, as it is conjectured, of resigning it in favour of her uncle, John Stewart, earl of Buchan, the second son of the regent As the countess Euphemia, by becoming a nun, was regarded as dead in law, her next heir was her aunt Margaret, the only sister of the deceased Alexander, earl of Ross, and the wife of Donald lord of the Isles That chieftain accordingly asserted her right to the earldom, and demanded to be put in possession of it The claim and the demand were both rejected by the regent, "whose principal object," says Skene, "appears to have been to prevent the accession of so extensive a district to the territories of the lord of the Isles, already too powerful for the security of the government, and whose conduct was more actuated by principles of expediency than of justice" [History of the Highlanders, vol ii p 72] Resolved to maintain his claims by force of arms, and show his scorn of the authority of the regent, Donald formed an alliance with Henry IV of England, and at the head of ten thousand men, which he had raised in the Hebrides and in the earldom of Ross itself, suddenly invaded the district in dispute, by the inhabitants of which he was not opposed, and speedily obtained possession of the earldom On his arrival at Dingwall, however, he was encountered by Angus Dow Mackay of Farr, or Black Angus, as he was called, at the head of a large body of men from Sutherland After a fierce attack the Mackays were completely routed, and their leader taken prisoner, while Angus' brother Roderick was killed Donald took possession of the castle of Dingwall, and seized the island of Skye, contiguous to his own extensive territories Flushed with success, he now resolved, in accordance with his secret design of overturning the government, to carry into execution a threat he had often made to burn the town of Aberdeen He ordered the army to assemble at Inverness, and gathering as he proceeded all the men capable of bearing arms to his standard, he swept through Moray without opposition, and penetrated into Aberdeenshire In Strathbogie, and in the district of Garioch, which belonged to the earl of Mar, he committed great excesses To arrest his progress, the earl of Mar, the nephew of the regent, and Sir Alexander Ogilvy, the sheriff of Angus, hastily raised as many forces as they could collect in the counties north of the Tay, consisting of most of the retainers of the ancient families of these counties, the Ogilvies, the

Lyons, the Maules, the Carnegies, the Lindsays, the Leslies, the Murrays, the Straitons, the Irvings, the Arbuthnots, the Leiths, the Burnets, and others, led by their respective chiefs The two armies met at the village of Harlaw, in the parish of Chapel of Garioch, upwards of fifteen miles from Aberdeen Although the earl of Mar's army was inferior in point of numbers to that of the lord of the Isles, it was composed of Lowland gentlemen, better armed and disciplined than the wild and disorderly hordes that followed Donald, who was assisted by Mackintosh and Maclean, and other Highland chiefs, all bearing the most deadly hatred to their Saxon foes This memorable battle was fought on the 24th July, 1411, "upon the issue of which," says Skene, "seemed to depend the question of whether the Gaelic or Teutonic part of the population of Scotland were in future to have the supremacy" [History of the Highlanders, vol ii page 73] The disastrous result of this battle was one of the greatest misfortunes which had ever happened to the numerous respectable families in Angus and the Mearns The earl of Mar lost five hundred men, among whom were several gentlemen of distinction Besides Sir James Scrymgeour, constable of Dundee, Sir Alexander Ogilvy, the sheriff of Angus, with his eldest son, George Ogilvy, Sir Thomas Murray, Sir Robert Maule of Panmure, Sir Alexander Irving of Drum, Sir William Abernethy of Saltoun, Sir Alexander Straiton of Lauriston, Sir Robert Davidson, provost of Aberdeen, and a number of the inhabitants of that city, were among the slain A gentleman, named Leslie of Balquhain, whose residence was in the neighbourhood of the field of battle, with six of his sons, was killed On the side of the lord of the Isles nine hundred men were slain, including the chiefs of Maclean and Mackintosh Neither party gained the victory, and each, on reckoning its loss, considered itself vanquished, but the lord of the Isles felt himself so much weakened that he was compelled to abandon the contest The earl of Mar and those of his companions who survived were so much exhausted with fatigue that they passed the night on the field of battle, expecting a renewal of the attack next morning, but at daydawn they discovered that Donald and the remains of his force had retired during the darkness, without molestation, retreating first to Ross, and then to the Isles Immediately after the battle, the regent, anxious to follow up the check which the Highland force had received, collected an army, and marched to the castle of Dingwall, which he took and garrisoned towards the end of autumn In the following summer he sent three separate forces to invade the territories of Donald The haughty lord of the Isles was obliged to relinquish his claims to the earldom of Ross, to make personal submission, and to give hostages for indemnification and for the future observance of peace The instrument by which the earldom of Ross was resigned by Euphemia the nun in favour of her grandfather is dated in 1415, just four years after the battle of Harlaw The battle itself, as has been well remarked, "from the ferocity with which it was contested and the dismal spectacle of civil war and bloodshed exhibited to the country, appears to have made a deep impression on the national mind It fixed itself in the music and the poetry of Scotland, a march, called 'The Battle of Harlaw,' continued to be a popular air down to the time of Drummond of Hawthornden, and a spirited ballad on the same event is still repeated in our age, describing the meeting of the armies, and the deaths of the chiefs, in no ignoble strain" [Laing's Early Metrical Tales, page 229] For a long time after, it was customary for schoolboys to arrange themselves into opposite parties, and fight the battle of Harlaw over again, for recreation The ballad of the Battle thus concludes

There was not, sin' King Kenneth's days,
  Sic strange intestine cruel strife
In Scotlande seen, as ilk man says,
  Where monie likelie lost their life,
  Whilk made divorce tween man and wife
And monie children fatherless, Whilk in this realm has been full rife,
Lord help these lands! our wrangs redress!

In July, on Saint James his even,
  That four-and-twenty dismal day,
Twelve hundred, ten score, and eleven
  Of years sin' Christ, the soothe to say,
  Men will remember as they may,
When thus the veritie they knaw,
  And monie a ane will mourne for aye
The brim battle of the Harlaw

In the year last mentioned, namely 1415, the regent obtained from Henry V the liberation of his son Murdoch, in exchange for Henry Percy, the son of Hotspur In 1416 he sent his second son, John earl of Buchan, ambassador to England, to endeavour to procure the release of James I from the captivity in which he was held by the English monarch With a strange perversity, the writers of Scottish history have almost unanimously charged the regent Albany with "being in no hurry to obtain the release of his nephew," as Sir Walter Scott gently phrases it—nay, they even go farther, and accuse him of treasonably intriguing with the English king to retain his sovereign in prison, that his own power might not be interrupted, but here is one instance where Albany intrusted his son, the earl of Buchan, one of the bravest and most accomplished knights of his age, with a mission to England to endeavour to procure the liberation of James In 1417, when King Henry V was in France, prosecuting his wars there, the regent, with a large army invaded England, and after beginning the siege of Roxburgh, immediately retreated in all haste on learning that an English force, under the dukes of Bedford and Exeter, was on the way to meet him This was long popularly remembered as the "Foul Raid" In 1419 he despatched his son, the earl of Buchan, with a chosen army of 7,000 men, into France, to assist the dauphin against the English king Neither this invasion of England, nor this assistance sent to France, would have taken place had Albany desired to keep on those good terms with Henry which implied a mutual understanding as to the retention of James from his kingdom This son, the earl of Buchan, was the offspring of Albany's second marriage with Muriella, the daughter of Sir William Keith, marshal of Scotland He was born about 1380 When his father became regent in 1406, after the death of his brother Robert III, he resigned, in favour of his son, the office of great chamberlain In 1408 Albany, as regent, created him earl of Buchan Five years afterwards Buchan married Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Archibald earl of Douglas While engaged on the dauphin's side against the English in France, the earl of Buchan, on the 22d March 1421, defeated the duke of Clarence, the brother of Henry V, at Baugé in Anjou, and slew him with a battle axe, after he had been pierced with a spear by Sir William Swinton To recompense this signal victory the dauphin conferred upon him the high office of constable of France In 1422 he revisited Scotland, with the view of inducing his father-in-law, the earl of Douglas, to join his arms Douglas consented, and was created duke of Touraine in France by the dauphin Both Douglas and the earl of Buchan, constable of France, were slain at the battle of Verneuil in Normandy, 17th August 1424 A portrait of this illustrious warrior is given on page 43, at the end of the memoir

The duke of Albany continued to administer the affairs of the kingdom till his death, which took place at Stirling castle, on the 3d of September 1420, at the age of 81. His body was interred in the Abbey church of Dunfermline Our historians generally have given a very unfair view of Albany's character Pinkerton thus depicts it "His person was tall and majestic, his countenance amiable Temperance, affability, eloquence, real generosity, apparent benignity, a degree of cool prudence, bordering upon wisdom, may be reckoned among his virtues But the shades of his vices are deeper, an insatiate ambition, unrelenting cruelty, and its attendant cowardice, or, at least, an absolute defect of military fame, a contempt of the best human affections, a long practice in all the dark paths of art and dissimulation His administration he studied to recommend, not by promoting the public good, but by sharing the spoils of the monarchy with the nobles, by a patient connivance at their enormities, by a dazzling pomp of expenditure, in the pleasures of the feast, and in the conciliation of magnificence As fortune preserved his government from any signal unsuccess, so it would be an abuse of terms to bestow upon a wary management which only regarded his own interest the praise of political wisdom" In this same strain all our historians follow one another in their estimate of Albany's character, but I am not disposed to agree with them entirely Nothing could be wiser or more calculated for the public good, than his resistance to Donald of the Isles, whose object was by the aid of England to destroy the Scottish kingdom to his own aggrandisement, and whatever may be the motives imputed to Albany, or the objects assigned as the moving springs of his administration, surely it cannot be denied that the public good was indeed promoted by his policy, and by his judicious and vigorous measures on all occasions During his regency justice was regularly administered He took great care not to lay any taxes on the people, and especially he steadily and successfully opposed the levying of a tax of two pennies on every hearth in the kingdom, which had been proposed in parliament for the purpose of defraying the expense of demolishing Jedburgh castle "Even in his time," says Sir Walter Scott, "it would seem that the extent of writings used for the transference of property, had become a subject of complaint When upon this subject, Albany used often to praise the simplicity and beauty of an ancient charter by King Athelstan, a Saxon monarch It had been granted to the ancient Northumbrian family called Roddam of Roddam, and had fallen into the hands of the Scots on some of their plundering excursions" The duke of Albany, it is quite certain, was one of the most popular and most able governors that the kingdom ever possessed He enjoyed to a high degree the confidence of both king and nobles, while the people placed the utmost reliance on the justice and firmness of his government The following is an impression of his seal, taken from the Diplomata Scotiæ

Robert duke of Albany was twice married first to Margaret, countess of Menteith, and secondly to Muriella, eldest daughter of Sir William Keith, great marischal of Scotland, and had issue by both marriages —Douglas' Peerage, vol i —Pinkerton's History of Scotland, vol i p 85

ALBANY, MURDOCH, second duke of, son of the preceding, succeeded him both as duke and regent At first he bore the title of earl of Fife He had a grant from Robert III in the third year of his reign, of a hundred merks sterling annually from the customs of Aberdeen He was Justiciary of Scotland benorth the Forth, and designed of Kinclevyne when taken prisoner at the battle of Homeldon in 1402 Henry IV presented him in full parliament on 20th October, and he was allowed to be at large on his parole of honour By a letter from his father to Henry the Fourth, dated Falkland, June 2, 1405, he seems to have received much kindness from that monarch during his stay in England, as he thanks him for his good treatment of his son Murdoch, and the favourable audience given to Rothesay herald In 1415 he was exchanged for Henry Percy of Northumberland, the son of Hotspur, who, since the battle of Shrewsbury, had remained in Scotland He does not appear to have possessed the same degree of energy as his father, but the accounts of him given by our historians are manifestly partial and exaggerated It is stated that on his father's death in 1419, he assumed the office of governor of Scotland, just as if he had naturally and legitimately succeeded to it as a matter of hereditary right, and that he did not think it necessary even to obtain the sanction of parliament, but supported by the feudal nobility at once usurped the government This is not likely to have been the conduct of a person of the indolent, incapable, and unambitious character which Duke Murdoch's is universally represented to have been In the commission preserved in the chapter of Westminster, and of which a copy is given in Anderson's Diplomata, No 64, it is expressly stated that the parties therein named, being the bishop of Glasgow, chancellor of Scotland, James Douglas of Balvany, brother-in-law of Duke Murdoch, the earl of March, the abbot of Balmerinoch and others, empowered to negotiate for the deliverance of James from his captivity in England, were so appointed with the knowledge and by the deliberate council of the three estates of the realm (ex certa scientia et deliberato concilio trium statuum regni), which must have been assembled at the time, and probably for the purpose This document bears date 19th August 1423, and is stated to have been passed in the third year of Murdoch's government As, however, his father died in 1419, it is impossible that it could have been so expressed had he then assumed the government, for it would, in that case, have been stated to have been done in the fourth and not the third year of his regency, and it is but reasonable to infer that the post of governor remained vacant after the death of his father, till it could be legitimately conferred on Murdoch by an act of some parliament, of the proceedings of which, as well as of the one referred to in the commission, no trace is now to be found in history It is said that Murdoch's conduct as regent created so much dissatisfaction in the nation that some persons refused to accept of the most profitable offices, and others resigned theirs, while the loss of place was accounted a proof of men's honour and integrity But in the commission referred to, men of the highest rank and character are mentioned as being in possession of some of the chief offices in the kingdom It is certain, however, that during Murdoch's government, the affections of the people became more intensely fixed upon their absent sovereign, and the greatest desire was manifested for his return, to which Murdoch was induced to accede A traditionary story, in which we place no faith, is related that he was driven to this by his son Walter having savagely wrung the neck of a favourite falcon which he coveted, on its being refused to him, as Murdoch set out one day to enjoy the recreation of hawking Provoked by his conduct, the regent said to the youth, "Since thou canst not find in thy heart to obey me, I will bring in another whom both of us shall be forced to obey" Ambassadors being despatched to negociate with the English court, after some delay the duke of Bedford, then protector of England, agreed to deliver up the king of Scotland, on payment of £40,000, within six years by half-yearly payments, hostages being given for payment of the same. The ambassadors who went to England, to concert measures about the payment of this sum, were the bishops of Aberdeen and Dunblane and Mr Thomas Myreton The arrangement for the release of the king was finally adjusted by the Scottish commissioners, who proceeded to London for that purpose, on the 9th of March, 1424 In the following April James returned to Scotland, after having married the Lady Jane Beaufort, a daughter of the earl of Somerset, of the blood royal of England At his coronation, Murdoch, duke of Albany, as earl of Fife, performed the ceremony of installing the sovereign on the throne, and amidst the rejoicings on the occasion, the king conferred the honour of knighthood on Alexander Stewart, the second son of the duke of Albany, and twenty-four others of his principal nobility and barons An act had been passed in the first parliament after James' return, ordering the sheriffs to enquire what lands had belonged to the crown during the three preceding reigns, and empowering the king to summon the holders to show their charters There had, probably, been some demur, which roused James to adopt vigorous measures, and to have recourse to the cruel expedient of cutting off his own cousin and his family as the authors of it He first ordered the arrest of Walter, eldest son of Murdoch, duke of Albany, the late regent, with that of Malcolm Fleming of Cumbernauld, and Thomas Boyd of Kilmarnock, and in a parliament held at Perth, 25th March 1425, he ordered the arrest of Murdoch himself, his second son, Sir Alexander Stewart, the earls of Douglas, Angus, and March, and twenty other gentlemen of note His view, it is probable, in arresting so many was to prevent an insurrection Murdoch was committed a close prisoner to Caerlaverock castle, while his duchess, Isabella, was sent to Tantallan, and the king immediately took possession of Albany's castles of Falkland in Fife, and Doune in Menteith Immediately after the arrest of the duke of Albany and the other nobles, the king adjourned the parliament for two months It reassembled in the palace of Stirling, on the 24th of May, when the king presided in person, at the trial of Duke Murdoch, his two sons, and his father-in-law, the aged earl of Lennox No known record specifies their crime, and our historians have conjectured that the charge was one of high treason, for the alleged usurpation of the government on the part of Albany Walter Stewart, the eldest son, was first tried, on the 24th of May, and being found guilty was instantly beheaded in front of the castle On the following day, the duke of Albany, Alexander his second son, and the earl of Lennox, were tried by the same jury, and being convicted were immediately executed None of the noblemen and others arrested with them were brought to punishment Seven of them even sat on the jury of twenty-six persons who found the duke and his companions guilty on their trial Alexander, lord of the Isles, who succeeded Donald, whom Duke Murdoch's father had humbled (see p 37), was also one of the jury, whose verdict sent him and his sons and his father-in-law to the block Upon this Alexander of the Isles, the earldom of Ross, with extensive possessions in the Western Islands, was bestowed by James an impolitic act, which afterwards brought much evil upon the kingdom The scene of the execution was a rising ground in front of the castle of Stirling, which is still known by the name of the Heading Hill

"Amongst the people," says Tytler, "the shedding of so much noble blood excited a sympathy and commiseration for which James was not prepared Albany and his two sons, Walter and Alexander Stewart, were men whose appearance and manners, in a feudal age, were peculiarly fitted to command popularity Their stature was almost gigantic, their countenances cast in the mould of manly beauty, and their air so dignified and warlike that when the father and the two sons ascended the scaffold, it was impossible to behold the scene without a feeling of involuntary pity and admiration Behind them came the earl of Lennox, a venerable nobleman in his eightieth year, and, when he laid his head upon the block, and his grey hairs were stained with blood, a thrill of horror ran through the crowd, which, in spite of the respect or terror for the royal name, broke out into expressions of indignation at the unsparing severity of the vengeance" From the place of his execution Duke Murdoch might see in the distance the fertile territory of Menteith, which formed part of his family estates, and even distinguish the stately castle of Doune, which had been his own vice-regal residence Of this magnificent edifice the following is a wood-cut

The title and possessions of the duke of Albany were forfeited, and the latter annexed to the crown To obtain these was, no doubt, the cause of his death A contemporary narrative of the murder of King James, preserved in the General Register House, and printed by Pinkerton, represents the general impression to have been that "the kyng did rather that rigorous execucion upon the lordes of his kyne for the covetise of thaire possessions and goodes, thane for any rightful cause, althoe he fonde colourabill wayes to serve his intent yn the contrarye" [Pinkerton's Hist vol i p 463] The estates of the earl of Lennox, his father-in-law, were allowed to remain unforfeited Duke Murdoch's marriage to Isabella, the eldest daughter of Duncan, earl of Lennox, who had been left a widower without male issue, took place in 1391 By the marriage contract, it was agreed that should the earl of Lennox marry again, and have an heir male, the latter should marry Duke Murdoch's sister

male of his body who might fulfil the condition of a marriage with the regent's daughter Of the marriage of Murdoch and Isabella, four sons were born, Robert, who died early, Walter, Alexander, and James The latter, who was the fourth son, when his father, grandfather, and two brothers were seized and executed, was the only male member of the family who escaped Resolving to succour his kindred or avenge their fate, with a body of armed followers, as desperate as himself, he carried fire and sword into the town of Dumbarton, and put to death the king's uncle, John Stewart, called the Red Stewart of Dundonald, with thirty-two others of inferior note The king pursued him with such determined animosity that he was compelled to fly with his abettor, the bishop of Argyle, to Ireland —See AVANDALE, lord, p 169 [Napier's History of the Partition of the Lennox, p. 10] Duke Murdoch's widow was allowed to retain her estates and titles, and to reside till her death upon her earldom of Lennox She lived in the castle of Inchmurrin on Loch Lomond, the chief messuage of the earldom, and there granted charters to vassals as countess of Lennox She survived to hear of the assassination of him whose inflexible sentence had cut off her father, her husband, and her two sons On one of the pillars of St Giles' church, Edinburgh, are the arms of Isabella, duchess of Albany and countess of Lennox, who, in 1450, founded the collegiate church of Dumbarton and largely endowed other religious foundations She died about 1460 See LENNOX, family of [Douglas' Peerage —Tytler's Lives of Scottish Worthies, Life of James I]

The physical strength and imposing appearance of the descendants of Robert the first duke of Albany have been frequently mentioned by historians Murdoch's half-brother, the earl of Buchan, constable of France, slain at Verneuil in Normandy, in 1424 (see ante, page 39,) of whom a portrait is extant, seems to have possessed all the qualities of his race in this respect Of this portrait, which was discovered about the middle of the last century by Sir George Seton of Garleton, of the noble family of Winton, in the gallery of M Fiebet, at his seat near Chambord in France, an engraving is given in Pinkerton's Portrait Gallery A woodcut of it is annexed

ALBANY, ALEXANDER, third duke of, was the second son of King James II His first titles were earl of March and lord of Annandale, but he was about 1456 created duke of Albany, a title which had been forfeited to the crown when Duke Murdoch was beheaded Having been sent to France to complete his education, he was in 1464, on his voyage homeward from his uncle, the duke of Gueldres, towards Scotland, captured by the English, but soon released, a herald having been sent to England to declare war in case of his being detained In February 1478 his brother James III , a prince of a weak and irresolute temper, and fond of mean favourites, on the sinister information of some of these ordered his arrest, and imprisoned him in Edinburgh castle Soon after, his younger brother, the earl of Mar, was also arrested by the king's orders Both of these princes were popular with the nobility and people, and had incurred the king's suspicion and the hatred of his favourites As lord warden of the east frontiers, Albany had besides restrained and disobliged the Homes and Hepburns and others of the Border clans, and in revenge they bribed Cochrane, the king's principal adviser, to set the king against him Marr was taken out of his bed and sent prisoner to Craigmillar castle, and shortly thereafter, being accused by the king's favourites of consulting with sorcerers and witches to take the king's life, he was sentenced to have a vein in his leg opened, and in a bath to bleed to death, which was executed in the Canongate in 1479 [Balfour's Annals, vol i p 203] Albany was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, but effected his escape, and proceeded to his castle of Dunbar, from whence, after victualling and providing it with all manner of munitions of war, he sailed for France [Ibid vol i p 202] He was forfeited 4th October 1479, and troops were sent to besiege his castle of Dunbar, which soon yielded, the garrison escaping in boats to England On arriving at Paris, the duke met with an honourable reception from Louis XI He remained in France till 1482, when he proceeded to England, and entered into an agreement with Edward IV, by which the English king obliged himself to aid him in invading Scotland, and to place him on the throne, in return for which he consented to surrender Berwick, to acknowledge himself the vassal of England, to renounce all alliance with Louis of France, and to marry one of Edward's daughters In consequence of this Albany assumed the title of king, declaring his brother to be a bastard An English army amounting to 40,000 men, under the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III, accompanied by Albany, marched to Berwick, and invested that town The town speedily surrendered, but the castle held out In the meantime King James having assembled his nobility, marched towards the Borders to meet the enemy As he lay encamped near Lauder, his nobles, highly exasperated at their sovereign's conduct, headed by Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, commonly called, after this event, "Bell-the-Cat," after securing the chief favourite Robert Cochrane, burst into the royal tent during the night, and seized the rest of the king's minions, all of whom, with Cochrane, they hanged over the bridge of Lauder They then carried the king to Edinburgh, and shut him up in the castle, under the care of his uncles the earls of Athol and Buchan The road to the capital was now open, and the dukes of Gloucester and Albany, with their forces, advanced, in the month of July, towards Edinburgh The archbishop of St Andrews, the bishop of Dunkeld, with Lord Avandale, the chancellor, and the earl of Argyle hastily collected a small army, and posted themselves at Haddington, to impede the advance of the enemy At the same time they entered into negociations with Albany, and on the 2d of August a treaty of peace was concluded Albany engaged to be a true and faithful subject to King James, on his titles and estates, with Dunbar castle, and the possessions of the late earl of Mar, his brother, being restored to him, and the office of king's lieutenant of the realm being conferred on him Two heralds were commanded to pass to the castle to charge the captain to open the gates and set the king at liberty In Balfour's Annals of Scotland, (vol i p 207,) it is stated that the duke of Albany and the lord chancellor then governed all the realm, and that with several of the nobility Albany went to Stirling to visit the queen and prince, and after his return he laid siege to Edinburgh castle, which he took, when the king and such servants as were with him were set at liberty According to Lindsay of Pitscottie, (vol i p 200), the king, on recovering his freedom, "lap on a hackney to ride down to the abbay, but he would not ride forward, till the duik of Albanie his brother lap on behind him, and so they went down the geat to the abbey of Hallyrud hous, quhair they remained ane lang time in great mirrines," and, as Abercromby adds, he "would needs make him a partner in his bed, and a comrade at his table," that being considered in those days the best proof of a perfect reconciliation Albany immediately concluded a truce with the duke of Gloucester, and on the 28d of August 1482 surrendered to him the fortress of Berwick, after it had been in possession of the Scots for twenty-one years Notwithstanding the favour which was now shown to him by the king, Albany, in the following year, engaged in another secret treaty with Edward IV, for depriving his brother of the throne, and securing it to himself His designs being detected by the nobles, he was obliged to fly to England, having previously placed his castle of Dunbar in the hands of the English In consequence of this traitorous proceeding, he was formally accused of treason, and summoned to stand his trial, but failing to appear, he was condemned to death as a traitor and to have his estates confiscated Having assembled a small force, he joined the earl of Douglas, who was likewise an exile in England, and made an inroad into his native country, but was routed near Lochmaben, 22d July 1484, when Douglas was taken prisoner, but Albany escaped by the fleetness of his horse A truce for three years was then agreed upon between the two countries, and Albany, finding that he could obtain no farther protection in England, retired to France, where he was well received by Charles VIII He was accidentally killed at Paris in November 1485, by the splinter of a lance, while an onlooker at a tournament between the duke of Orleans and another knight, and, by act of parliament 1st October 1487, all his lands and possessions in Scotland were annexed to the crown According to the description given of him by an ancient Scottish author, the duke of Albany was well-proportioned, and tall in stature, and comely in his countenance, that is to say, broad-faced, red-nosed, large-eared, and having a very awful countenance when displeased Like his younger brother, the unfortunate earl of Mar, who was of a milder temper and manners, he excelled in the military exercises of tilting, hunting, hawking, and other personal accomplishments, for which his brother James III had no taste He had married first Lady Catherine Sinclair, eldest daughter of William earl of Orkney and Caithness, but a divorce took place, 2d March 1478, on account of propinquity of blood By her he had one son, Alexander, who was declared illegitimate by act of parliament, 13 November 1516, and who was made bishop of Moray and abbot of Scone, in 1527 He married, secondly, in February 1480, Anne de la Tour, third daughter of Bertrand, Count d'Auvergne and de Boullon, and by her he had one son, Duke John, the subject of the following notice — Douglas' Peerage —Histories of the Period

ALBANY, JOHN, fourth duke of, son of the preceding, was born about 1481 In 1505, he married his cousin, Anne, or Agnes, de la Tour, countess d'Auvergne and de Lauragais, by whom he got large possessions On the death of James IV, in 1513, his son James V being then only in his second year, the queen mother was appointed regent of the kingdom, but at a convention of the estates held soon after at Perth, it was agreed, at the urgent suggestion of the venerable Elphinston, bishop of Aberdeen, seconded by the Lord Home, that the duke of Albany, then in France, and who after the infant king was next heir to the throne, should be invited to Scotland to be governor of the kingdom, during James' minority This election was ratified by a public meeting of the estates held at Edinburgh soon after, and Lyon king at arms, with Sir Patrick Hamilton, was sent to France to notify the appointment to the duke In the meantime, the sentence of forfeiture which had excluded him from the enjoyment of his rank and estates in Scotland was annulled, and his arrival impatiently looked for by the people, as the queen mother had married the earl of Angus, and, being opposed by the nobility, nothing but anarchy and disorder prevailed in the kingdom On the 18th May, 1515, the duke arrived at Dumbarton, Balfour says at Ayr, with a squadron of eight ships, and soon after he was installed into the office of regent "He wes ressauerit," says a chronicler of the period, "with grett honour, and convoyit to Edinburgh with ane grett cumpany, with grett blythnes, and glore, and than wes constitute and maid governour of this realme, and sone thairefter held ane parliament, and ressaurt the homage of the lordis and thre estaittis, quhair thair wes mony things done for the weill of this countrey" His inauguration into the regency was attended with great splendour A sword was delivered to him, and a crown placed upon his head, while the peers made solemn obeisance He was declared governor of the kingdom till the king attained the age of eighteen years The duke took up his residence at Holyrood, and seems to have immediately proceeded with the enlargement of the palace, in continuation of the works which James IV, the late king, had carried on till near the close of his life

Albany, unfortunately, was ignorant not only of the constitution, the laws and the manners, but even of the language of Scotland He was in fact more French than Scotch His mother was a Frenchwoman, and so was his wife His chief estates were in France, where the greater part of his life had been spent, and his loyalty to the French king was so undisguised that he constantly styled him master When it is added to this that his temper was passionate, that every corner of the kingdom was filled with spies and agents in the pay of England, and that the powerful houses of Home and Douglas swayed the faction that were opposed to him, it was hardly to be expected that he would be successful in restoring peace to the country The infant king and his brother were still under the care of the queen-mother, and a parliament which assembled at Edinburgh, nominated eight lords, four of whom were to be chosen by lot, and from these four the queen-mother was to select three who were to have the charge of the two infant princes The queen, however, was not disposed to part with her children, and when the peers proceeded to the castle of Edinburgh, to notify to her the commands of parliament, her majesty, who was then no more than twenty-four years of age, and in the full bloom of her beauty, was seen standing under the archway at the entrance, with the little king at her side, holding her hand, while a nurse stood behind with his infant brother, the duke of Ross, in her arms In a loud voice, and with a dignified air, she desired them to stand and declare what they wanted They answered that they came in the name of the parliament to receive their sovereign and his brother, on which the queen commanded the warder to drop the portcullis, and this being instantly done, she thus addressed the astonished lords "I hold this castle by the gift of my late husband, your sovereign, nor shall I yield it to any person whatsoever, but I respect the parliament, and require six days to consider their mandate, for most important is my charge, and my councillors, alas! are now few" Apprehensive, however, that she would not be able to hold the castle of Edinburgh against the forces of the parliament, she soon removed, with the young king and his brother, to Stirling castle Albany immediately collected an armed force, and proceeded in person to Stirling, where the queen finding her adherents deserting her, was soon obliged to surrender The young princes were then committed to the care of the earl Marshal and the lords Fleming and Borthwick, while the queen was conducted with every mark of respect to Edinburgh, where she took up her residence in the castle On the success of the regent, Lord Home, one of the queen's principal adherents, at once commenced to intrigue with England, and concerted measures with Lord Dacre, the English warden, of resistance and revenge Albany summoned the whole force of the kingdom to the aid of the government, and transmitted proposals to the queen-mother, offering her a complete restoration of all the rights and revenues which she had not forfeited by her marriage, if she would accede to the wishes of the parliament, and renounce all secret correspondence with England These proposals she indignantly rejected, whereupon Albany proceeded against the insurgents, and took the castle of Home The queen sent Albany's proposals privately to Lord Dacre, while Home requested the assistance of an English army, and retook the castle of Home He also secured the strong tower of Blackater, situated within the Scottish border, about five miles from Berwick, to which place the queen immediately fled The regent followed her with a considerable army, and surprising Home in the house to which he had hastened for refuge, made him prisoner, and committed him to the custody of the earl of Arran, governor of the castle of Edinburgh Arran disliked Albany and his measures, and was easily persuaded by Home to retire with him to the Borders, where they actively commenced hostilities Home and his brother were again proclaimed rebels, and Arran was required to surrender himself within fifteen days At the same time the regent, at the head of a select body of troops, and a small train of artillery, proceeded to invest the castle of Cadzow, near Hamilton, Arran's principal fortress Arran's mother, who was the daughter of James the Second, at that time resided there, and ordering the gates to be opened, she came out to meet the regent, and as she was his aunt by the father's side, and greatly respected by him, he was easily prevailed upon to listen to her solicitations in favour of her son Terms of accommodation were soon agreed to, and Arran was allowed to return and resume possession of his estates

tween the two countries were set on foot, and Angus, to whom the queen had recently, at Harbottle castle in England, borne a daughter, the Lady Margaret Douglas, the mother of Darnley, husband of Mary Queen of Scots, withdrew from his wife, who lay dangerously ill at Morpeth, and with Home returned into Scotland They both made their peace with the regent, who restored them to their hereditary possessions, and for a time they abstained from disturbing the government Queen Margaret on her recovery proceeded to the court of her brother Henry VIII, where she inveighed bitterly against both Angus and Albany, but especially the latter, whom she accused of having poisoned her second son, the duke of Ross, who had died, at Stirling, of one of the many diseases incident to childhood Henry, anxious to have Arran regent, directed a letter to be written to the three estates of Scotland, commanding them to expel the regent Albany from the kingdom, as, from his being the nearest heir of the throne, he was the most dangerous person to have the charge of the young king, his nephew The Scottish parliament, which assembled at Edinburgh on the first of July 1516, replied with becoming spirit They reminded the English king that they themselves had elected Albany to the office of regent, to which he had a right as nearest relative to their infant king, that he had fulfilled its duties with much talent and integrity, and that the person of their infant sovereign was intrusted to the keeping of the same lords to whose care he had been committed by the queen-mother They concluded by assuring Henry of their determination to resist to the death any attempt to disturb the peace of their country, or to overthrow the existing government Notwithstanding this spirited reply, the intrigues of Henry's minister, Lord Dacre, soon succeeded in creating distrust and disturbance, and once more reinstating in its strength the English faction in Scotland On the 23d August Dacre wrote from Kirkoswald to Cardinal Wolsey, informing him that he had in his pay four hundred Scots, whose chief employment was to distract the government of Albany, by exciting popular tumults, encouraging private quarrels, and rekindling the jealousy of the feudal nobility In Scotland at this time Albany's administration was rather popular than otherwise He was "supported," says Tytler, "by the affection and confidence of the middle classes, and the great body of the nation, but their influence was counteracted, and his efforts completely paralysed by the selfish rapacity of the clergy, and the insolent ambition of the aristocracy" A new insurrection soon broke out, headed by the earl of Arran, who associated himself with the earls of Glencairn, Lennox, Mure of Caldwell, and the majority of the noblemen and gentlemen of the west They met at Glasgow to the number of 12,000 men, and seized on the royal magazines there Understanding that some French ships, with supplies of arms and ammunition for Albany, had appeared in the Clyde, they sent a body of troops to take possession of them The vessels, however, had sailed before their arrival, but they seized a quantity of gunpowder and other ammunition which had been landed, and which they conveyed to Glasgow Lest it might fall into the hands of their enemies the powder was thrown into a draw-well By a stratagem Arran made himself master of the castle of Dumbarton, and expelled Lord Erskine the governor In the meantime the regent having collected an army, advanced upon Glasgow, when an accommodation was once more brought about, chiefly through the means of Beaton, archbishop of Glasgow, who was high in favour with the regent Lord Home, (see vol ii p 473,) on his part, soon violated the conditions on which the regent had consented to pardon him He renewed his treasonable correspondence with Dacre, and employed bands of marauders to break across the border and ravage the country Determined to put an end to the anarchy created by the rebellious proceedings of this fierce opposer of his government, the regent allured the earl, who held the office of lord chamberlain, and his brother Alexander, to the court at Holyrood, where they were instantly arrested They were immediately tried, on a charge of treason, for having excited the late commotions against the regent, of having been accessory to the defeat at Flodden, and being concerned in the assassination of James IV after the battle Being found guilty, they were both beheaded, on the 8th of October 1516, and their heads placed above the tolbooth of Edinburgh Soon after the duke of Albany, in a convention of the estates of the realm held at Edinburgh, was declared heir apparent to the crown

Anxious to procure assistance from the French king and to revisit his estates in France, the regent, in the parliament which assembled in November 1516, requested leave of absence for a short period The parliament accorded an unwilling consent for four months, and in June 1517 he embarked at Dumbarton, leaving the government in the hands of a council, consisting of the archbishops of St Andrews and Glasgow, the earls of Huntly, Argyle, Angus, and Arran, and carrying with him the eldest sons of many of the great barons as hostages for the peace of the country To each of the six persons mentioned was assigned the charge of that part of the country contiguous to his own estates, while to a brave and accomplished French knight, whose real name was Anthony D'Arcie, but whose handsome person procured for him the distinguishing title of Seigneur de la Beauté (absurdly called de la Bastie in all our histories) was intrusted the government of the eastern and middle marches, with the command of the important castles of Home and Dunbar The young king was brought from Stirling to Edinburgh castle, and placed under the charge of Lord Erskine, the earl Marshal, and the lords Borthwick and Ruthven Fresh tumults broke out on the borders, and the vassals of the late Lord Home, out of revenge at his fate, surprised and murdered the Sieur de la Beaute, who had distinguished himself by the activity and diligence with which he punished and repressed disorder Sir David Home of Wedderburn, whose wife was the sister of Angus, the husband of the queen-mother, galloped into the town of Dunse, with the head of the unfortunate Frenchman knit to his saddlebow, by the fine long hair which he wore in accordance with the fashion of the age, and after fixing it on the market-cross, took shelter in his strong castle of Edington, on the banks of the Whiteadder For this outrage the estates of the land of Wedderburn and his associates were forfeited

After this the kingdom became a scene of disorder, anarchy, and confusion, the rival factions of Douglas and Hamilton everywhere contending for the mastery The earl of Arran had been elected by the council of regency their president, and at this time had the chief direction of affairs, but he was, upon all occasions, opposed by the earl of Angus, who still had great influence, and the private animosity which subsisted between these two powerful noblemen kept the country in a continual state of excitement and disturbance As soon as the queen-mother heard of Albany's departure, she returned to Scotland Her arrival was at a time of such universal confusion and strife that even Albany himself, unwilling to leave France, wrote to her, advising her that, if she could unite the factions, she should resume the regency Margaret, however, wished to have the office of regent conferred on her husband, the earl of Angus, to whom she had been lately reconciled, but this neither the council nor the majority of the nobles would agree to Her jealousy, however, soon caused a fresh quarrel with her husband, and as her brother Henry VIII took the part of Angus, she forsook the English interests, and entered into a correspondence with the duke of Albany, urging him to return and take the regency once more into his own hands During Albany's absence the famous street battle at Edinburgh, between the rival factions of the Douglasses and the Hamiltons, commemorated under the name of "Cleanse-the-Causeway," was fought 30th April 1520, the result of which was that the Hamiltons were defeated, and the earl of Angus got possession of the capital

The next year Albany returned to Scotland after an absence of five years He arrived in the Gareloch on the third of December 1521, and was met at Stirling by the queen-mother, accompanied by several lords and gentlemen It is stated that Margaret, who was very changeable in her affections, and by no means careful of her conduct, received him with transports of joy, and with such familiarity as excited scandalous rumours Lord Dacre, in a letter to his sovereign, King Henry, says that, not satisfied with being with him during the day, she was closeted the greater part of the night with Albany, taking no heed of appearances The earl of Arran and others of the nobility hastened to Stirling to welcome his arrival, and on the 9th he entered the capital, accompanied by the queen and the chan-

tellor and a numerous attendance of peers and gentlemen Proceeding to the castle, he was admitted to an interview with the young king, on which occasion the captain delivered the keys of the fortress into his hands These the regent laid at the feet of the queen-mother, and she again presented them to Albany, saying that she considered him the person to whose tried fidelity the care of the monarch ought to be intrusted On the regent's approach the earl of Angus and his party precipitately left the city, and fled to the Border In a parliament held at Edinburgh, on the 26th day of December, Angus and his adherents were cited to appear before it, to answer for various crimes and misdemeanours, but they paid no attention to the summons, and had already renewed their negotiations with the English king The regent now endeavoured to reconcile the factions, and to procure a peace with England But it did not suit the ambitious projects of the English court that Albany should continue at the head of affairs, or that peace and order should be restored to Scotland Lord Dacre, Henry's unscrupulous agent, in the letters which he wrote to Henry, represented that the life of the young king was in danger, and that his mother was anxious to obtain a divorce from Angus, that she might marry Albany, who, on his nephew's death, would become king He distributed money among the factious nobles, and did every thing that he could to stir up war between the two countries Henry, on his part, as he had done once before, addressed a letter to the Scottish estates, demanding the dismissal of Albany, and received a similar answer to the former, being sharply told by the Scottish parliament that they had themselves freely chosen Albany to the regency, and would not dismiss him at the request of his grace, the king of England, or of any other sovereign prince whatever Upon this Henry, in the spring of 1522, sent the earl of Shrewsbury with a large force to invade Scotland He advanced as far as Kelso, giving up the country everywhere to havoc and spoliation, until he was encountered and driven back into England with considerable loss, by the bold borderers of Teviotdale and the Merse Albany having, with consent of parliament, declared war, and mustered the whole force of the kingdom for an invasion of England, at the head of eighty thousand men, and with a formidable train of artillery, advanced towards the English borders, and encamped at Annan The queen-mother at this time, with her characteristic fickleness, had cooled in her attachment to the regent, and not only intrigued with a party of the Scottish nobles to support her views, but betrayed all Albany's secrets and plans to the English warden, Lord Dacre The regent, ignorant of this, with his large army crossed the borders and advanced to Carlisle When within five miles of that city Dacre opened negotiations with him, and succeeded in prevailing upon him to agree to a cessation of hostilities for a month, in order that ambassadors might treat for peace As the English king, then engaged in a war with France, had wisely departed from his demand for Albany's dismissal from the regency, the nobles who had joined in the expedition saw no further cause for continuing in arms, and Albany himself, desirous of peace with England, disbanded his army, and returned to Edinburgh, without striking a blow

Finding the difficulties of his situation increase, with the view of soliciting assistance from the French king, Albany, in October 1522, retired for the second time to France, after appointing a council of regency, consisting of the earls of Huntly, Arran, and Argyle, to whom he added Gonzolles, a French knight, in whom he had much confidence He promised to return in ten months on pain of forfeiting his office During his absence, in the spring of 1523, the English renewed the war by a vast inroad into Scotland The earl of Surrey, the victor of Flodden, at the head of 10,000 men, broke into the Merse, reduced its places of strength, and advancing to Jedburgh, burnt that town, and left its beautiful abbey a heap of ruins Lord Dacre, after reducing the castle of Ker of Fernihurst, and taking that celebrated border chief prisoner, sacked and depopulated Kelso and the adjoining villages, while the marquis of Dorset, the warden of the east marches, made an incursion into Teviotdale, giving its villages to the flames, and carrying off its grain and beeves Albany returned from France in September 1523, with a fleet of eighty-seven small vessels, and a force of four thousand foot, five hundred men at arms, a thousand hagbutteers, six hundred horse, and a fine train of artillery, which had been furnished to him by the French He landed in the island of Arran, Balfour says "at Kerkubright," having eluded the enemy's fleet, which was sent out to intercept him, and immediately proceeded to Edinburgh The embarrassment of his position at this crisis was greater than ever He found that the queen-mother was no longer on his side, but deeply engaged in intriguing against him That fickle, passionate, and unprincipled woman, whose character somewhat resembled that of her imperious brother, Henry VIII, was now as anxious to promote the English interests as she had formerly been the French, and had entered into negotiations with Surrey and Dacre, with the view of recovering the regency to herself The nobles, though willing to assemble an army for the defence of the Borders, were totally averse to an invasion of England, while they were jealous of the foreign auxiliaries which the regent had brought with him

The parliament assembled without delay, and a proclamation was issued for a muster of the whole force of the kingdom on the 20th of October Albany summoned together the principal nobility, and urged them to carry the war into England, to avenge the disastrous defeat at Flodden and the late excesses on the Borders He had brought with him a large supply of gold from France, and as he liberally dispensed it, he won over some of the more venal of the nobles, and even the queen herself was so charmed by his presents, that she wrote to the earl of Surrey, that unless her brother Henry remitted her more money, she might be induced to abandon the English interest, and co operate with Albany On the day appointed a force of about 40,000 men assembled on the Borough-muir near Edinburgh, at the head of which the regent set forward towards the Borders But never had general commenced an aggressive march under such discouraging circumstances Most of the leaders who had answered the summons to arm had taken the gold of England, and bound themselves not to cross the Borders, while others, such as Argyle, Huntly, and the master of Forbes, did not appear at all at the muster The expedition was nationally unpopular, and as the Scots soldiers did not conceal their dislike of the foreign auxiliaries, indications of disorganization soon became but too evident Added to this, the season was now far advanced, and much time was lost in dragging the cumbersome artillery over the rude and difficult roads of those days, which had been rendered still more wretched by recent falls of snow and rain Albany arrived at Melrose on the 28th of October When he reached the wooden bridge at that place, a large portion of his army refused to cross the Tweed, and those divisions of the troops which had already passed over, turned back, and in spite of all his entreaties and reproaches, recrossed the bridge to the Scottish side The regent remained in the neighbourhood of Melrose two days, after which he marched down the Tweed, and arrived at Eccles, on the side of the river opposite to Wark The Scottish army encamped near Coldstream, while Albany lodged in Home castle He ordered part of the artillery to be conveyed to Berwick, but afterwards he laid siege to Wark castle, chiefly with his foreign troops and artillery The historian, George Buchanan, who was a volunteer in his army, gives a highly valuable account of his operations in this his last campaign in Scotland An attempt to storm the castle was bravely met by the garrison, who poured a destructive fire from the ramparts upon the besiegers, and on the approach of night, the latter were compelled to retire It was proposed, however, to renew the assault next day, but during the night there was a heavy fall of rain and snow, which so flooded the river that all retreat was threatened to be cut off It was known that the Earl of Surrey was advancing from Alnwick with a formidable force Under these circumstances Albany, on the 4th of November, withdrew his artillery, and the assaulting party recrossed the Tweed, leaving three hundred killed, mostly Frenchmen, and once more joined the main army Balfour says that with the latter portion of his troops he had spoiled all Glendale and Northumberland to the walls of Alnwick, and returned with a great booty [Annals, vol i, page 252] The regent retired to Eccles, and thence marched rapidly towards Edinburgh, apprehensive all the way of being seized by some of the lords with him, and delivered up to the English

His retreat had all the appearance of a flight, the disorder of which was increased by a severe snow-storm On reaching Edinburgh, he assembled a parliament, and ascribed the failure of the expedition to the nobles refusing to march into England, while they, on their part, accused him of being the cause of the disgrace Notwithstanding the presence of the English army, under Surrey, on the Borders, and the inclemency of the season, some of the peers insisted on his instantly dismissing the foreign auxiliaries Thus compelled to embark, the French were by a storm driven out of their course, and a considerable number of them were shipwrecked and drowned among the western Isles Soon after, having obtained three months' leave of absence, Albany, in the end of 1523, retired in disgust and despair to France, after taking an affectionate leave of the young king, then at Stirling, and returned no more to Scotland

He afterwards, in 1524, attended Francis I in his unfortunate expedition into Italy, but before the fatal battle of Pavia, fought 24th February 1525, he was detached with part of the French army against Naples It was the absence of this large portion of his troops, amounting to 16,000 men, which caused Francis to lose the battle, when attacked by the emperor Charles In 1533 Albany conducted his wife's niece, Catherine de Medici, into France, on her marriage with Henry II of that kingdom He was governor of the Bourbonnois, d'Auvergne, de Forest, and de Beaujolais He died at his castle of Meudon, 2d June 1536 By his duchess he had no issue By Jean Abernethy, a Scotswoman, he had a natural daughter, Eleonora, who, after being legitimated, was in 1547 married at Fontainebleau, in presence of the French king, to the count de Chouy

This duke of Albany was a man of elegant and graceful manners and high accomplishments, and very gay and sprightly in conversation,—qualities which made him a personal favourite with Francis I of France, but were little appreciated in Scotland, where his vanity, of which he had a large share, and evident partiality for French officers and confidents, soon disgusted the haughty and rapacious nobility In Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, there is a fine portrait, supposed to be that of Albany, of which a woodcut is annexed It is on the same engraving with one of Queen Margaret

The sign manual autograph "Jehan" underneath, is from the Cotton MSS B vi fol 170, in the British Museum

The title of duke of Albany was bestowed in 1540 on Arthur, second son of James V and his spouse Mary of Guise a prince who died in 1541 It was afterwards given to Henry Stewart, lord Darnley, or Derndy, by Queen Mary, shortly before their marriage in 1565 Charles I was created duke of Albany, on his baptism at Dunfermline in 1600, his elder brother Henry who died in 1612, being duke of Rothesay, the title of the king's eldest son The following is a fac simile of the autograph and motto of this ill-fated prince, written in an album in the Sloane MSS No 3115, as duke of Albany, in 1609, before he had completed the ninth year of his age

Albany king at arms was one of the secondary heralds in Scotland, when Scotland was an independent kingdom Prince Charles Edward Stuart, in the latter years of his life, styled himself count of Albany

ALES, or ALESSE, ALEXANDER, see HALES, Alexander

ALEXANDER I, king of Scotland, surnamed the Fierce, from his vigour and impetuous character, has hitherto been represented as the fifth son of Malcolm III, surnamed Canmore, or great head, by

Margaret, daughter of Edward, nephew of Edward the Confessor, king of England, but it is now admitted that Ethelred, who had been believed to be the third, was the youngest son of that marriage, and consequently Alexander was not the fifth but the fourth son of Malcolm and Margaret It is also placed beyond a doubt that by a previous marriage with Ingibiorge, the widow of Thorfin, a powerful Norwegian earl,—who for thirty years, during the reigns of Alexander's father Malcolm and his predecessor Macbeth, ruled over all Scotland north of the Grampians, and part of the present county of Forfar,—Malcolm had two sons, Duncan, afterwards king of Scotland, and Malcolm, both of whom were alive at the time of his death, so that Alexander was in reality the sixth of the sons of Malcolm Canmore [See life of Duncan, king of Scotland, post] There is no earlier instance in Scottish history of the name of Alexander having been borne by king or noble, although it afterwards became one of the most common and familiar Christian names in Scotland Lord Hailes has supposed that it was bestowed in honour of Pope Alexander II If so, it was given to him after the death of that pontiff, which occurred in the year 1073, as no calculation from family or other events can place the birth of Alexander, of which the precise date is unknown, earlier than about the year 1078

Alexander was educated with great care, not only in letters but in religious principles, and the solemn injunctions of his excellent mother, on her death-bed, to Turgot, prior of Durham, her confessor and biographer, which have descended to us in his interesting memoir of that good queen, prove how great was her solicitude in the latter respect in regard to all her children Alexander partook of those vicissitudes of the family, after the death of his father, which are detailed in the lives of his uncle Donald Bane and of his brothers Duncan and Edgar, and which serve to exhibit, in a strong light, the peculiarities of the law of succession to the throne among the Celtic or Pictish races of that age, and they no doubt contributed to form and give a direction to his character and future government, when he became king

On the death of his brother Edgar, 8th January 1107, Alexander succeeded to the throne, but not to the enjoyment of the same extent of possessions as his predecessor For the conquest of the western portion of the ancient principality of Cumbria —a region extending between the Roman walls of Agricola and Antoninus—having sometime previous been effected, by David his younger brother, with an army of Norman chivalry from England, the government of the province was also bestowed upon him, and Edgar, on his death-bed, bequeathed him all those extensive lands in those regions held by him and Malcolm his father which formed the subject of that homage rendered to the Norman conqueror and his son William Rufus so frequently referred to in English history [Lord Hailes' Quotations from English contemporary writers, compared with the narrative of the inquisition into the lands of the see of Glasgow, and existing charters of that epoch] All Scottish historians, from the fourteenth until within the present century, have concurred in stating that the province of Cumbria corresponded exactly in territory with the present English county of Cumberland, but charters, and Saxon as well as earlier Scottish writers, when correctly understood, leave it beyond doubt that the portion of country so called comprehended the district extending from the Clyde to the Solway, and included all the present Scottish counties of Ayr, Galloway, Wigton, Kirkcudbright, and Dumfries, with perhaps part of Cumberland, the district of Lothian, comprising the three counties which still bear that name, and the shires of Renfrew and Lanark, with part of Lennox now Dumbartonshire Such distributions of the royal possessions amongst the members of their family were not uncommon with the monarchs of that age

Whatever were the motives that led to this disjunction from the Scottish crown, it proved a fortunate arrangement for the nation By the subsequent death of Alexander without issue, and the consequent succession of David to the northern throne, the danger of contention between rival families for these possessions, and of their permanent separation from the ancient kingdom, was averted, and a united kingdom was afterwards formed, able, with more or less success, to withstand the powerful neighbouring southern state, which, if it had continued disjoined, would most probably have fallen to it by piecemeal a comparatively easy prey While, on the one hand, the happy genius of David for government, and for attracting towards himself the love and affection of all classes of people committed to his care, enabled him to introduce amongst them order and civilization, and to combine Saxon law with Norman refinement, as well as the still higher blessing of religious instruction, and while his amiable qualities and the accident of his birth endeared through him the family of Malcolm to the Saxon race, so that nearly four hundred years afterwards an English writer resident in Scotland thus commemorates one of them

> "Our soverane of Scotland
> Quhilk sall be lord and ledar
> Oer broad Brettane all quhair
> As saint Mergarettes air,"
> [Buke of the Howlat, st xxix, printed for the Bannatyne Club]

the sterner rule of Alexander was made available to keep under the dissatisfied feelings of the warlike tribes of the north, not less averse to that deviation from the ancient rule of succession by which the descendants of Margaret were placed on the throne, than jealous of the innovations of Saxon law and Saxon settlements It was not, however, to be expected that to this disposition of lands Alexander would at once quietly accede On the contrary, he at first disputed its validity, and would willingly have annulled it, had he not found that the powerful barons of the province in question, and of the northern English counties, as Gospatrick, Baliol, Bruce, Lindesay, Areskine, and others, whose descendants afterwards occupied the first rank among the Scottish nobility, and by the aid of whose arms his brother Edgar had been placed and sustained on the throne, were entirely favourable to this arrangement He therefore prudently desisted from the attempt, and confined himself during the remainder of his reign to the northern portion of the kingdom [Speech of Walter l'Espec at the battle of the Standard, in Ældred] It has been inferred by modern writers who have recognised the foregoing as the territorial limits of Cumbria, that David held this government as a fief in subordination to Alexander, but this does not appear to have been the case David seems to have regulated the affairs of his government as an independent prince The motto of his seal during his brother's lifetime bears that he styled himself 'David, Comites Anglorum Regene Fratris, (contracted into Frīs), that is, David the count, brother of the Queen of the English Annexed is a representation of David's seal

Several of his public instruments, too, after he ascended the throne, when relating to matters affecting the southern districts, are addressed to the "Francis et Anglicis," Normans and English, [Anderson's Diplomata et Numismata, No 17, 1 and 2], and at a later period, or when referring to matters of more importance, to the "Francis et Anglicis, et Scottis et Galwensibus," that is, the Normans, English, Scotch, and Galwegians, which latter style was uniformly adopted by his successor and grandson Malcolm IV, [Idem, plates 19, 23, 25,] whilst the public instruments of Alexander are simply addressed to the Scots and English, "Scottis et Anglis" [Idem, page 9], showing that he only ruled over the northern portion of the kingdom in which these nations lived in the proportion of the order in which they are placed

It was fortunate both for Alexander and David, and for the tranquillity of the government of the former, that during the entire period of his reign an unbroken peace was maintained with England The marriage of their sister Matildis in 1100, during the life of their brother Edgar, with Henry king of England the brother of William Rufus, greatly facilitated this harmony, and it was further cemented by the union of Alexander with Sybilla, natural daughter of that monarch Such an alliance, says Lord Hailes, was not held dishonourable in those days

The people of the north were not reconciled to the sovereignty of the sons of Malcolm According to their notions of the law of succession to the throne, both the family of Donald Bane, and that of Duncan the eldest son of Malcolm, had a prior right to it Edgar had bestowed upon his cousin Madach, son of Donald Bane, the maormordom of Athol, erected by him into an earldom, and on his death, towards the end of the reign of David the First, it was obtained by Malcolm, the son of Duncan, the eldest son of Malcolm Canmore, "either," says Skene, "because the exclusion of that family from the throne could not deprive them of the original patrimony of the family, or as a compensation for the loss of the crown," [Skene's Highlanders, vol ii p 139,] and thus this branch of the rival family were induced to remain in quiet, although various attempts were afterwards made to recover their rights, not only in the reign of Malcolm IV, but for nearly a hundred years after they were excluded from it

The descendants of Donald Bane appear to have enjoyed another portion of the hereditary possessions of the family in the person of Ladman his son, and along with them some title which does not appear Even the descendants of Macbeth seem, in the person of Angus the son of the daughter of Lulach, Macbeth's stepson, to have got the possessions and ancient maormordom of Moray erected into an earldom of that name [Skene's Highlanders, vol ii p 162] According to the Annals of Ulster about 1116, a descendant of Malpedir, maormor of Moern or Garmoran, a district in northern Inverness-shire, one of the supporters of Donald Bane, and who had murdered Duncan, eldest son of Malcolm, in 1095, was in possession of his father's title and lands, and at the instigation of Ladman, in order probably to revenge his death, he combined with Angus earl of Moray, already referred to as of the family of Macbeth, to make an attempt to seize upon the person of Alexander At his baptism Alexander had a donation made to him of the lands of Blairgowrie and Liff by his godfather, Donald Bane, then probably maormor of Athol, and in the first year of his reign he began to build a palace or residence in the vicinity, but while engaged on this work the Highlanders of Moern (not Mearns, as commonly supposed) and Moray penetrated stealthily from their northern abodes to Invergowrie, where Alexander was, and surprised him by night Alexander escaped to the shore, and crossing over the Tay to Fife, collected vassals, and followed them with surprising activity, through the 'Monthe' or Grampians, across the Spey and over the "Stockfurd into Ros" Of this passage Wintoun says,

> "He tuk and slew thame or he past
> Out of that land, that fewe he left
> To take on hand swylk purpose eft."

And again he adds,

> 'Fra that day hys legys all > Ovsid hym Alysandyr the Fers to call"

So effectually, indeed, did he succeed in crushing the inhabitants of Moray that they were compelled to put to death Ladman, the son of Donald Bane, who had instigated them to the attempt on his life [Skene's Highlanders, vol i p 130] The story that on this occasion the traitors obtained admission to the king's bed-chamber, and that he slew six of them with his own hand, is an invention of Boece, and like many other of his fables has obtained currency in Scottish history Sir James Balfour, in his Annals [vol i pp 6, 7], has the following passage on this attempt against the king "The rebells quho besett him in the night had doubtesley killed him, had not Alexander Carrone pruly carried the king save away, and by a small boate saived themselves to Fyfie, and the south pairts of the kingdome, quher he raissed ane armey, and marched against the forsaid rebells, quhome he totally ouerthrew and subdued, for wich grate mercey and preservatione, in a thankfull retributione to God, he foundit the monastarey of Scone, and too it gaue hes first lands of Liffe and Innergourey, in A° 1114 About this tyme K Alexander the I reuardit for hes faithfull seruice Alexander Carrone, with the office of standart beaiin of Scotland, to him and hes heirs for euer He was called Scrimshour, becausse with a drawen

During the remainder of the reign of Alexander, the Highlanders acquiesced in his occupation of the throne, he being now, even according to the Celtic laws, the legitimate heir of Malcolm Canmore

The principal feature in Alexander's reign was his successful resistance to the efforts made by the English prelates to assert a supremacy over the church in Scotland In 1109 when he first had occasion to nominate a bishop to the see of St Andrews, to which place the primacy had been removed from Dunkeld, Alexander, with the approbation of his clergy and people, named Turgot, the monk of Durham already mentioned as the confessor and biographer of his mother the pious Queen Margaret The consecration of Turgot was, however, long delayed The archbishop of York pretended a right of consecrating the bishops of St Andrews, but at this time Thomas, elected archbishop of York, had not himself received consecration In consequence of a report that the bishop of Durham, concurring with the Scottish bishops and the bishop of the Orkneys, proposed to consecrate Turgot, in presence of the archbishop elect of York, Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, in alarm, despatched a letter to the latter, informing him that consecration could not be performed by an archbishop elect or by any one acting under his authority, and requiring him to proceed to Canterbury to receive consecration himself The Scottish clergy on their part contended that the archbishop of York had no right to interfere in the consecration of a bishop to the see of St Andrews While the two archbishops were engaged in mutual altercations concerning canonical order and the privileges of their respective sees, Alexander entered into a negotiation with the English king, and an immediate decision of the controversy was evaded by an ambiguous acknowledgment by all parties, which, confessing the independency of the Scottish church to be at least doubtful, seemed to prepare the way for its complete vindication at a future time At the request of Alexander, Henry, the English king, enjoined the archbishop of York to consecrate Turgot, bishop of St Andrews, "saving the authority of either church" In that form Turgot received consecration accordingly

In the discharge of his episcopal functions Turgot met with obstacles, which induced him to form a resolution to repair to Rome to obtain the opinion of the pope for regulating his future conduct, a journey which his death soon after prevented him from carrying into effect What the nature of these obstacles were, we are not informed, but as he perceived that he had lost that influence which he formerly enjoyed in the time of Queen Margaret, his spirit sunk, and in a desponding mood he asked and obtained permission to retire to his ancient cell at Durham, where he died, 31st August 1115

A new bishop of St Andrews was to be appointed, and to avoid any interference on the part of the archbishop of York, Alexander, soon after the death of Turgot, addressed a confidential letter to Ralph archbishop of Canterbury who had succeeded Anselm, asking his advice and assistance for enabling him to provide a fit successor to Turgot In this letter he observed, "That the bishops of St Andrews were wont to be consecrated only by the Pope or by the archbishop of Canterbury" "The expression," says Lord Hailes "is flattering and artful Alexander meant to relieve his kingdom from the pretensions of the one archbishop without acknowledging the authority of the other He therefore left the right of consecrating doubtful between the Pope and the archbishop of Canterbury, while, at the same time, he seemed to place them both on a level" Eadmer, a monk of Canterbury, had been fixed upon by Alexander to fill the vacant see, but not receiving any answer to his proposal from the archbishop of Canterbury, the king allowed the see of St Andrews, the chief bishopric in his kingdom, to remain vacant for many years At length, in 1120, he despatched a special messenger to the archbishop of Canterbury, with a letter requesting the archbishop 'to set at liberty' Eadmer the monk, that he might be placed on the episcopal throne of St Andrews The archbishop consented that Eadmer should have liberty to accept the bishopric, and with that view he asked and obtained the approbation of the English king In a letter to Alexander he said, "I send you the person whom you require altogether free," and concluded thus, "To prevent the inconveniencies which I foresee and dread, I would counsel you immediately to send him back to be consecrated by me" On his arrival in Scotland, Eadmer received the bishopric of St Andrews on the 29th of June 1120 The election was made by the clergy and people, with the permission of the king, but on this occasion Eadmer neither received the pastoral staff nor the ring from the hands of Alexander, nor did he perform homage Next day Alexander held a secret conference with him respecting the mode of his consecration, when the king expressed his aversion at his being consecrated by the archbishop of York Eadmer, on his part, declared that the church of Canterbury had, by ancient right, a pre-eminence over all Britain, and he humbly proposed to receive consecration from that metropolitan see He found, however, that Alexander was as much opposed to the pretensions of Canterbury as he was to those of York, and that he had determined to free the Scottish church from dependence on any foreign see but that of Rome At Eadmer's proposal Alexander is described as having started from his seat with much emotion, and broken off the conference He commanded the person, one William a monk of St Edmundsbury, who had presided in the bishopric since the death of Turgot, to resume his functions At the expiry of a month, the king, at the request of his nobility, sent for Eadmer, and with difficulty obtained his consent to a compromise, by which Eadmer was to receive the ring from Alexander, to take the pastoral staff from off the altar, as if receiving it of the Lord, and then to assume the charge of his diocese While the king was absent with his army quelling some insurrection in the north, as the Highlanders of the district of Moray, particularly at this time, gave considerable opposition to his government, Eadmer was received into the see of St Andrews by the queen, clergy, and people

Finding, however, that his own sovereign Henry, who was then in Normandy, had, at the solicitation of the archbishop of York, written to the archbishop of Canterbury prohibiting him from consecrating Eadmer, and that Alexander had also received three letters from him requiring him not to permit the consecration, the new bishop of St Andrews resolved to repair to Canterbury for advice On hearing of his resolution Alexander sent for him, and said, "I received you altogether free from Canterbury, while I live, I will not permit the bishop of St Andrews to be subjected to that see" "For your whole kingdom," answered Eadmer, "I would not renounce the dignity of a monk of Canterbury" "Then," replied the king passionately, "I have done nothing in seeking a bishop out of Canterbury" It seems to have been Alexander's design by soliciting a bishop from the province of Canterbury, to obtain one who would have no partiality for the see of York, and whom he hoped to win over to support the independency of the Scottish Church, but the zeal of Eadmer for Canterbury disappointed his views Eadmer himself has given an ample account of the contest between him and Alexander, and Lord Hailes, in his Annals of Scotland, has generally followed his statements The bishop complains that after the last interview with the king, the latter became rigorous and unjust, and would never afford him a patient hearing He refused to allow Eadmer permission to visit Canterbury "for the counsel and blessing (meaning no doubt consecration) of the archbishop," contending that the church of Scotland owed no subjection to Canterbury, and that Eadmer himself had been freed from all subjection to it

In the anomalous and uncomfortable position in which he found himself, Eadmer was induced to ask the advice of a friend in England, one Nicholas, whom Lord Hailes conjectures to have been an ecclesiastical agent, whose business it was to solicit causes at the court of Rome This man advised him to obtain consecration from the Pope, under favour of the Scottish monarch, and in the meantime to be generous and hospitable to the Scots, as the best means of rendering them tractable and courteous He concluded his letter thus "I entreat you to let me have as many of the fairest pearls as you can procure In particular, I desire four of the largest sort If you cannot procure them otherwise, ask them in a present from the king, who, I know, has a most abundant store"—a remarkable evidence of the wealth and magnificence of the Scottish monarchs at this time

Eadmer, in his perplexity, also asked the advice of John bishop of Glasgow, and of two monks of Canterbury, and the answer which they sent to him seems to have determined him upon resigning the see It was in these terms "If, as a son of peace, you desire peace, you must seek it elsewhere than in Scotland As long as Alexander reigns, it will be vain for you to expect any friendly intercourse with him, or quiet under his government We are thoroughly acquainted with his dispositions it is his will to be everything himself in his own kingdom He is incensed against you, although he knows no reason for his resentment, and he will never be perfectly reconciled to you, although he should see reason for a reconciliation You must, therefore, either abandon this country, or, by accommodating yourself to its usages, dishonour your character and hazard your salvation Should you choose to depart from among us, you will be constrained to restore the ring, which you received from the hands of the king, and the pastoral staff which you took from off the altar Without complying with these conditions you will not be permitted to depart, unless you could make to yourself wings and fly away" Eadmer consented to restore the ring to Alexander, but with regard to the pastoral staff, he declared that he would replace it on the altar, whence he had taken it, 'and leave it to be bestowed by Christ,' and that since force had been used against him, he would relinquish the bishopric, and not reclaim it during the reign of Alexander, 'unless by the advice of the Pope, the convent of Canterbury, and the king of England' Having thus, in effect, resigned his see, Eadmer was suffered quietly to leave the kingdom He afterwards addressed a long epistle to Alexander, in which, after setting forth his pretensions to the bishopric, he added, in a tone of submission which would have better become him at an earlier period "I mean not, in any particular, to derogate from the freedom and independency of the kingdom of Scotland Should you continue in your former sentiments, I will desist from my opposition, for, with respect to the king of England, the archbishop of Canterbury, and the sacerdotal benediction, I had notions, which, as I have since learned, were erroneous They will not separate me from the service of God and your favour In those things I will act according to your inclinations, if you only permit me to enjoy the other rights belonging to the see of St Andrews" The archbishop of Canterbury, too, wrote Alexander, requiring him to recall Eadmer to Scotland, but Alexander would not listen either to the solicitations, though humbly enough expressed, of the one, or the requisition, however peremptory, of the other He was resolved to uphold the independence of the Scottish church, and the undaunted spirit with which he maintained it throughout the whole contest, would have been equally displayed, as Lord Hailes justly remarks, in defence of the independence of his kingdom, had England ever attempted to call it in question during his reign

In January 1123, about a year before Alexander's death, the pretensions of the archbishop of York were renewed, on the king procuring an English monk named Robert, who was prior of Scone, to be elected bishop of St Andrews The latter, however, was not consecrated till the fourth year of the reign of David I about five years afterwards, when Thurstin, archbishop of York, performed the ceremony, under reservation of the rights of the Scots church

While thus successful in his resistance to the claims of supremacy on the part of the metropolitan sees of York and Canterbury, Alexander, as was usual in those days, evinced his devotion to the church by the ample donations which he made to it He bestowed upon the see of St Andrews the famous tract of land called the Cursus Apri, or Boar's Chase, of which it is not possible now to assign the exact limits, but "so called," says Boece, "from a boar of uncommon size, which, after having made prodigious havoc of men and cattle, and having been frequently attacked by the huntsmen unsuccessfully, and to the imminent peril of their lives, was at last set upon by the whole country up in arms against him, and killed while endeavouring to make his escape across this tract of ground" The historian adds, that there were extant in his time manifest proofs of the existence of this huge beast, its two tusks, each sixteen inches long and four thick, being fixed with iron chains to the great altar of St Andrews, having been placed there by the above named Bishop Robert, who obtained the grant of the boar chase from Alexander, although not consecrated bishop at the time it was bestowed The legend that this extensive tract of land was conferred in 870 by Hungus or Hergustus, a Pictish king, who is unknown to history, is a monkish fiction utterly unworthy of attention

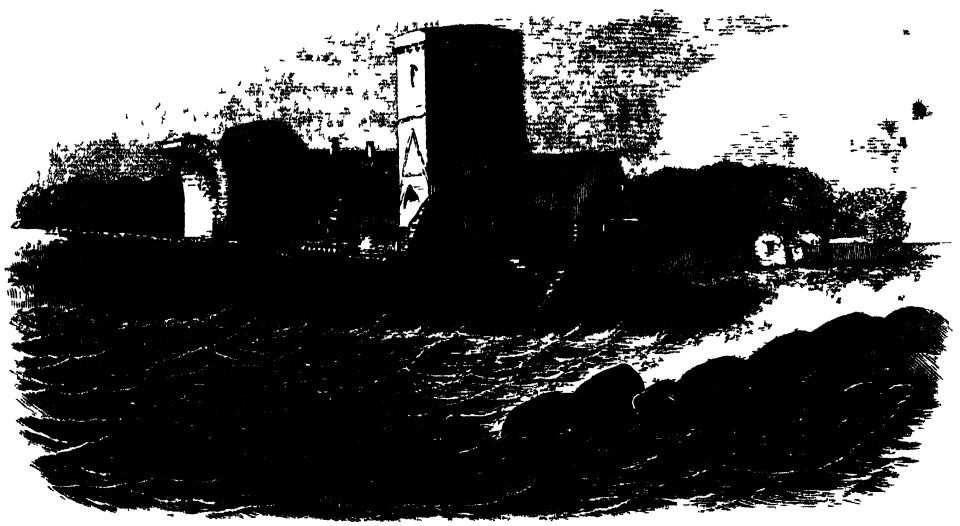
In 1123, having narrowly escaped shipwreck near the island of Æmona, now called Inchcolm, in the Frith of Forth, Alexander built a monastery on that island, of the ruins of which a woodcut is given underneath



The circumstances are thus related by Fordun "About the year 1123, Alexander I having some business of state which obliged him to cross over at the Queen's ferry, was overtaken by a terrible tempest blowing from the south-west, which obliged the sailors to make for this island, (Æmona,) which they reached with the greatest difficulty Here they found a poor hermit, who lived a religious life according to the rules of St Columba, and performed service in a small chapel, supporting himself by the milk of one cow, and the shellfish he could pick up on the shore, nevertheless, on these small means he entertained the king and his retinue for three days—the time which they were confined here by the wind During the storm, and whilst at sea and in the greatest danger, the king made a vow that if St Columba would bring him safe to that island, he would there found a monastery to his honour, which should be an asylum and relief to navigators He was, moreover, farther moved to this foundation, by having, from his childhood, entertained a particular veneration and honour for that saint, derived from his parents, who were long married without issue, until imploring the aid of St Columba, their request was most graciously granted" The monastery thus founded by Alexander for canons regular of St Augustine, and was richly endowed by the grateful and pious king its founder and patron Being dedicated to St Colm or Columba, the island obtained the name thereafter of Inchcolm, which it still retains The king had previously brought a colony of canons regular of St Augustine from the monastery of St Oswald at Nastley, near Pontefract, in Yorkshire, and established them at Scone, the abbey of which he had founded in 1114, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity and St Michael This famous abbey, it is well known, enclosed the celebrated coronation stone which was removed to England by Edward I, and is still used at the coronation of the sovereigns of Great Britain at Westminster The abbey of Scone, also, thus founded by Alexander, witnessed the crowning of the later Scoto-Saxon kings By a royal charter he conferred upon the monks of this abbey the right of holding their own court, and of giving judgment either by combat, by iron, or by water, together with all privileges pertaining to their court, including the right in all persons resident within their territory, of refusing to answer except in their own proper court [Cartulary of Scone, p 16] This right of exclusive jurisdiction was confirmed by four successive monarchs In 1122, on the death of his queen, Sybilla who died suddenly at the castle of Loch Tay, in Perthshire, on the 12th of June of that year, Alexander erected a priory on a small island on Loch Tay, for the repose of his soul and that of his consort According to Spottiswood, this priory was a cell from the monastery of Scone, and was founded by Queen Sybilla herself, but this is evidently a mistake Some very inconsiderable ruins of it still remain Alexander also granted various lands to the monastery of Dunfermline which his father had founded, and is said to have finished the church His queen Sybilla also conferred lands on it

Notwithstanding the rude condition of the inhabitants of Scotland at that remote period, the personal state kept up by Alexander the First is described as having been scarcely, if at all, inferior to that of his brother-monarch of the richer country of England It is well-known that in the reign of his father, Malcolm Canmore, an unusual splendour was introduced into the Scottish court by his Saxon consort, the good queen Margaret, who not only encouraged the importation and use of rich vestments from foreign countries, setting the example by being magnificent in her own attire, but increased the number of attendants on the person of the king, and caused him to be served at table on plate of gold and silver [Turgot's Memoir of Queen Margaret] Alexander I seems to have given to his public appearances, as sovereign, a degree of splendour till then unknown in the northern end of the island In his reign there appears to have been a considerable intercourse between Scotland and the East, as various oriental commodities and articles of Asiatic luxury were imported into this country It is related of this monarch, that, not content with endowing the church of St Andrews—which had been founded in his reign by Turgot, its archbishop—with numerous lands, and conferring upon it various immunities, as an additional evidence of his devotion to the blessed apostle St Andrew, after whom the see was called, he commanded his favourite Arabian horse to be led up to the high altar, his saddle and bridle being splendidly ornamented, while his housings were of a rich cloth of velvet The king's body armour, of superb Turkish manufacture, and studded with jewels, with his spear and his shield of silver, were at the same time brought by a squire, and these, along with the horse and his furniture, the king, in the presence of his prelates and barons, solemnly devoted and presented to the church The housings and arms were shown in the days of the historian who has recorded the event [Extract from the Register of the Priory of St Andrews, in Pinkerton's Dissertation, Appendix, vol i p 464 Winton, vol i p 286 See also Tytler's History of Scotland, vol ii p 198]

The rising commerce of the country in those early times was much aided and advanced by the settlement, in the districts contiguous to the Borders, of numbers of Flemish merchants, who, during the reign of Alexander, gradually spread into Scotland, and at a later period, namely, in the reign of David the First, were found in all the towns along the east coast, and even in the western parts of the kingdom, wherever traffic could be safely and profitably carried on The money in circulation in Scotland at that period appears to have been of silver only Indeed, down to the reign of Robert the Second, the gold coinage of England, then current in Scotland, seems to have been the only gold money in use Of the early silver money of Scotland, the most ancient specimens yet found are the pennies of Alexander the First, which are now extremely rare They are described as being of the same firmness, weight, and form as the contemporary English coins of the same denomination, and down to the time of Robert the First, the money of Scotland was precisely of the same value and standard as that of England [See Ruddiman's Introduction to Anderson's Diplomata, pp 54, 55 —Tytler's History of Scotland, vol ii p 264] The annexed engraving of the silver pennies of Alexander I is from Anderson's Numismata

Annexed is a seal of Alexander I , in which he is represented fully cased in the armour of that period

Here we find the scaled mail-coat composed of rhombs, or lozenged pieces of steel, sewed upon a tunic of leather, and reaching only to the mid thigh The hood is of one piece with the tunic, and covers the head, which is protected with a conical steel cap, and a nasal, the sleeves are loose, so as to show the linen tunic worn next the skin, and again appearing in graceful folds above the knee, the lower leg and foot are protected by a short boot, armed with a spur The king holds in his right hand a spear, to which a pennoncelle, or small flag, is attached, exactly similar to that worn by Henry the First, the saddle is peaked before and behind, and the horse on which he rides is ornamented by a rich fringe round the chest, but altogether unarmed [Seal in the Diplomata Scotiæ, plate 7 Tytler's History of Scotland vol ii p 360]

Alexander the First died at Stirling on the 27th of April 1124, in the seventeenth year of his reign and leaving no issue was succeeded by his youngest brother, David He was interred before the high altar at Dunfermline, near to his father During his reign, as during that of his brother and predecessor Edgar, the laws, institutions, and forms of government, except in the Gaelic portion of the kingdom, were purely Saxon , and to this particular epoch in our nation's history, may be traced the earliest existence in Scotland of some of the great officers of state, who after that period discharged some of the more important functions of the government, as the chancellor, the constable, &c The former was the most intimate counsellor of the king, and generally the witness to his charters, letters, and proclamations, and the latter, an office of undoubted Norman origin, was the leader of the whole military power of the kingdom The first appearance in Scotland of the now ancient office of sheriff is also referred to this reign, although the division of the country into regular sheriffdoms did not take place till a much later period "During the reigns of Edgar and Alexander I ," says Skene, "the whole of Scotland, with the exception of what had formed the kingdom of Thorfinn (during the Norwegian conquest consisting of the Orkneys, the Hebrides, and a large portion of the Highlands), exhibited the exact counterpart of Saxon England, with its earls, thanes, and sheriffs, while the rest of the country remained in the possession of the Gaelic Maormors, who yielded so far to Saxon influence as to assume the Saxon title of earl " [History of the Highlanders, vol i p 128] The personal character of Alexander was bold and energetic, and his disposition fiery and impetuous Strenuous in maintaining his authority, he had, early in his reign, applied himself to repressing the disorders and insurrections which were continually breaking out in the Celtic portion of his dominions, and his ardent temper and daring spirit contributed not a little to his success in overawing the turbulent inhabitants of the north, and reducing them to submission The boldest chieftains are said to have trembled in his presence, and the epithet of 'Fierce' attached to his name seems to have arisen from the energy which he at all times displayed, and which was necessary for reclaiming the Scots from that savage barbarism into which they had relapsed under Donald Bane Although terrible to the rest of his people, Alexander is described by Aldred, as being humble and courteous to the clergy, "not ignorant of letters," liberal even to profusion, and kind and benevolent to the poor —Hailes' Annals of Scotland, vol i, and the authorities quoted in the preceding article

ALEXANDER II, king of Scotland, the fourth in succession from the subject of the foregoing memoir, to whom he stands in the relation of great grand-nephew, was born at Haddington 24 Aug, 1198 He was the only legitimate son of William surnamed the Lion, his predecessor on the throne His mother, Ermangarde, was daughter of Richard Viscount de Beaumont, a descendant from Henry I of England, through his mother, a natural daughter of that monarch He succeeded his father December 4, 1214, being then only sixteen years of age, and was crowned at Scone on the 20th of the same month

Some years before the death of William his father, that monarch had been engaged in warlike demonstrations against England, followed, (in 1209,) by a treaty of a singular character, of which the provisions have not yet been clearly ascertained It appears that during the troubles in which John —the monarch who then sat upon the English throne—was involved, (in consequence of disputes with the head of the church and the dissatisfaction of his barons, which finally resulted in the concession by him of Magna Charta,) William—conceiving the opportunity to be favourable—took occasion to demand that the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, (which until about the middle of the reign of Henry II had constituted the county or province of Northumbria, and under that designation had been held during the latter part of the reign of his grandfather David I, by the eldest son of that monarch, the father of William, as a fief of the English crown, but on the death of that monarch had been resumed by Henry II,) should be restored to the Scottish nation How far that claim—one of the vexed questions of Scottish history—was founded in right, does not properly fall to be considered in this biography, but will be treated of in that of Malcolm IV, the brother of William, on whose accession these counties were restored to Henry, and to which therefore we refer We may, however, remark,—unwilling as we are to yield to any one in the assertion of the just rights of Scotland,—that there does not appear in the circumstances any warrant for assuming—as William then did, and as Scottish writers have hitherto done—that the intrusting of the government of these counties by Stephen in February 1139 to Prince Henry, son of David—as an individual lordship for which he rendered homage—can be construed into permanent cession of their possession from the English to the Scottish crown It may more probably be inferred as done in guarantee of the fulfilment of the solemn engagement then entered into with David by Stephen, that the crown of England—usurped by him—should at his death descend to Henry, grand-nephew of David,—son of the empress Matilda his sister's daughter the rightful heiress,—on whose behalf alone it was that that wise and righteous prince had professed to take up arms The retention in his own hands by the English king, during the entire period of their government by the heir to the Scottish throne, of the commanding strengths of Bamborough, Norham, and Newcastle on Tyne, (the two former situated near the Scottish border,) and the omission of all reference to the circumstance of the supposed cession on the part of English historians, gives additional probability to this aspect of the transaction Its resumption, therefore, on the fulfilment of that stipulation towards the close of the reign of David, may in this view of the matter have involved no injustice on the part of the English monarch, and appears to have been peacefully acquiesced in by Malcolm, the then reigning king In the history of the two kingdoms of that period, however, it will frequently be found that the occasion of distraction or civil contest on the part of the one was frequently embraced, to press to an issue assumed or disputed claims on the part of the other, and the fearful state of matters which then obtained in England—placed as it was under a papal interdict, the public services of religion suspended, the rites of interment withheld, the prelates banished, and the nobles insulted—presented an opportunity too tempting to be withstood by William, for making a demand which, if yielded to, would at once aggrandize his kingdom, and avenge his long captivity Nor is there wanting, in the earlier history of that monarch himself, more than one incident to illustrate the truth of the foregoing remark

In order to understand the position of the parties, however, on the occasion of the conclusion of this treaty, it is proper to observe that, according to the English historians, John,—notwithstanding the dangerous situation in which he stood, and the loss of reputation he had sustained by acquiescing in the conquest of the English provinces in France,—appears, on becoming aware of the military preparations of William, to have manifested a degree of energy unusual to him, and to have resolved to do some act that would give a lustre to his government He is represented by them as having been successful in his military enterprises in Scotland as also in others which he undertook against the Irish and Welsh It was in these circumstances, therefore, that by the treaty in question, the king of Scotland bound himself to pay to John fifteen thousand merks (supposed to be equivalent to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling of our present money) in two years, by four equal payments, "for procuring his good will (benevolentia), and for fulfilling certain conventions between them," contained in a charter which has not been preserved For the performance of this treaty William gave John hostages He likewise delivered his two daughters, Margaret and Isabella, to the king of England to be educated at his court, and "that they might be provided by him in suitable matches," but not to be considered as hostages About thirty years thereafter it was stated in the English parliament that the conditions of the charter referred to were that the two Scottish princesses should be married to king John's two sons, and that the money, together with a renunciation of his claim to the northern counties, was given by William as their marriage portion Hubert de Burgh, the justiciary of England, who married the princess Margaret, positively denied, however, all knowledge of any such condition as the former, while some Scottish writers subsequently founded on its nonfulfilment a supposed claim for the restitution of the latter [See Life of William the Lion, post]

Shortly after Alexander came to the throne affairs in England became involved in a still greater degree of confusion than before John, perfidious and perjured as tyrannical, had violated the provisions of Magna Charta, set his barons at defiance, and threatened alike to crush the liberties of the country and their power In this emergency, they decided to renounce their allegiance to him, and sent a deputation to offer the crown of England to Louis, son of the king of France At the same time such of them as held possessions in the northern counties applied to Alexander, and offered to put him in possession of these districts as the consideration for his aiding them against their oppressor Although so young, Alexander was not unwilling to avail himself of the proposal, and an agreement was accordingly entered into to that effect In accordance with this agreement, Alexander with an army marched into Northumberland, and on the 18th of October 1215, he received the homage of the barons of that county at Felton castle The castle of Norham was besieged by him for forty days, during which time Eustace de Vesci,—one of the principal barons of the northern counties, who had made himself conspicuous by his opposition to John,—gave him investiture of the county of Northumberland by livery and sasine The intelligence of these negotiations, however, again stirred up John to unwonted activity, and he resolved to crush the northern invasion before Louis should arrive in England Accordingly, immediately after Christmas, whilst a deep fall of snow lay on the ground, at the head of a large force, consisting principally of foreign mercenaries, he advanced into Yorkshire and Northumberland, devastating the estates of the confederated barons, and burning and slaying wherever he came All the castles and towns they could take were given to the flames, King John himself setting the example, as he fired with his own hands in the morning the house in which he had rested the preceding night

On the approach northward of John, Alexander raised the siege of Norham, and retired within his own dominions The English barons accompanied him, and those of the northern counties did homage to Alexander at the abbey of Melrose on the 15th January 1216 [Chronicle of Melrose, p 190] John with his mixed and savage host of foreign soldiery followed, burning, in their march, the towns of Werk, Morpeth, Alnwick, Mitford, and Roxburgh After storming Berwick they entered Scotland, torturing, plundering, and massacring the inhabitants in their way The towns of Dunbar and Haddington were likewise burnt to the ground John was determined to have vengeance on Alexander for the assistance which he had given to the patriotic barons who had taken up arms against him "We will smoke," he said, "the little red fox out of his covert" From this laconic description of him we may infer that Alexander the Second was both diminutive in stature and ruddy in complexion John pursued his devastating course as far as Edinburgh, but was soon obliged to withdraw from a country which his troops had ravaged so completely that it no longer afforded them subsistence In his retreat, his forces burnt the priory of Coldingham, which had been founded in the year 1098 by Edgar king of Scotland, and the town of Berwick, John himself, as was his usual practice, giving the example to his brutal soldiery by setting fire to the house in which he had lodged

For the priory of Coldingham thus ruthlessly consumed by John's savage followers, Alexander, like all the rest of the Scottish kings since the time of Edgar its founder, had a great veneration He had not only confirmed the charters which his predecessors had granted to it, but exempted the prior and his monks from a sum of twenty merks that they had been in the custom of paying yearly to his exchequer, under the name of wattinga,—a tax which appears to have been levied from the landholders in Scotland for the purpose of erecting and maintaining in repair the government fortresses He also issued a writ to Robert de Bernham, the mayor, and to the bailiffs of Berwick, enjoining them to allow free passage to foreign merchants, when on their way to the priory to purchase the wool and other commodities belonging to the monks, and prohibiting every one from seizing any property, moveable or unmoveable, belonging to the convent, within the barony or lordship of Coldingham, for debt or forfeiture Besides these immunities, he released "the twelfth village of Coldinghamshire, or that in which the church is founded," from the aids and military service which had formerly been exacted It was not likely therefore that he would allow John's destructive march to pass without taking dreadful reprisals

Accordingly, in the month of February following this inroad, Alexander in his turn wasted the western marches with fire and sword and penetrated into Cumberland Some of the undisciplined Scots, by which name the monkish historians distinguish the Highlanders in his army, plundered and burnt the abbey of Holmcultram, in revenge for the destruction of the priory of Coldingham by the English These reverend chroniclers relate with apparent delight that two thousand of the Scots, on their way home with their booty, were drowned in the flooded current of the river Eden, as a judgment for their sacrilegious violation of a holy house After a temporary retreat into his own territories, Alexander invaded Cumberland a second time, in the month of July, with all his army, except the Highlanders, whom he had chastised and dismissed [Chron Mel, p 191], and on the 8th of August, he took possession of the city of Carlisle The castle, however, held out against him He then marched southwards quite through England to Dover, to join Louis, the son of the king of France, who by this time had arrived in England In his progress Alexander assaulted Bernard castle, the seat of the Baliol family, then held by a garrison for John Eustace de Vesci, who had given him investiture of Northumberland at Norham castle, was slain there On arriving at Dover he found Louis besieging the castle, and as the English barons had done, he did homage to that prince for all his lands in England, and particularly for the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, which were then granted to him by charter [Rymer's Fœdera, tom ii p 217] This he might very well do, for the French prince Louis had not only been offered and had accepted the crown of England, but actually had a claim to it in right of his wife On this occasion Louis, on his part, swore that he would not conclude a separate peace, an oath which he was soon compelled to violate On his return homeward Alexander met with some obstruction in passing the Trent, the bridge at Newark having been broken down by the army of King John, who expired at the castle of Newark, 19th Oct 1216

Some time before this (May 15, 1213) John had been reduced to the unworthy expedient of surrendering his dominions into the hands of the Pope, and of consenting to hold them henceforward only as his vassal, as a means of escaping from the consequences of the papal interdict, and threatened excommunication When compelled by his barons and clergy (June 19, 1215) to sign the Great Charter, inwardly resolving to violate its provisions, he, as one means of effecting this, laid a statement of the matter, with a complaint of the violence imposed upon him, before his feudal lord, the supreme pontiff, who issued a bull, absolving him from his oath, annulling the charter, and prohibiting the barons from exacting the observance of it, on pain of excommunication Strange to say, the English primate refused to obey the pope in publishing the sentence, and though suspended on account of this proceeding, and a new and particular sentence of excommunication was issued by name against the principal barons,—including not only the French prince Louis, but Alexander and his whole army, and the entire realm of Scotland,—the nobility and people, and even the clergy, of both kingdoms adhered to the combination against him, and so little zeal in the matter was manifested by the clergy of Scotland, that nearly a twelvemonth elapsed before it was published there [Chron Melrose, 192 Fordun, ix 31]

Although Alexander, as already stated, had taken the town of Carlisle, the castle held out, and was besieged by him unsuccessfully While engaged in this siege, a portion of the army of Prince Louis was entirely defeated in the streets of Lincoln, 19th May 1217, the count de Perche, its commander-in-chief, being killed, and many of the chief commanders taken prisoners On the news of this defeat, Prince Louis, who was still occupied with the siege of Dover, proceeded to London, where he learned the further defeat of a fleet bringing him reinforcements from France, and the general defection of the barons, as they had by this time become suspicious of his intention In the general turn which men's dispositions had taken, the excommunication denounced by the legate failed not now to produce a mighty effect on them, and they were easily persuaded to consider a cause as impious, which had hitherto been unfortunate, and for which they had already entertained an unsurmountable aversion Seeing his cause to be desperate, Louis now began to be anxious for the safety of his person, and entered into a negotiation with the earl of Pembroke, protector of the realm of England,—Henry the Third, the son and successor of King John, being then a minor,—and a peace was concluded, Louis stipulating for a full indemnity to the English of his party—with a restitution of their honours and fortunes, together with the free and equal enjoyment of those liberties which that wise noble had guaranteed in the name of the prince to the rest of the nation—and formally renouncing his pretensions to the crown of England That Louis might be reconciled to the holy see, he did penance by walking barefooted to the legate's tent, in presence of both armies He then departed with all his foreign forces to France

On receiving intelligence of these events, Alexander, who was then on his march into England, made overtures of peace to the young king Henry III, and after some time spent in negotiation, a treaty was concluded between them He then yielded up the town of Carlisle to the English, and in an interview which he had with King Henry at Northampton, he did homage to him, —but for his English possessions only, as Scottish writers allege,—and returned into Scotland [Chron Mel 192, 194, 195 Fordun ix 31]

Alexander now sought to be reconciled to the Pope, and having procured a safe conduct from England, he proceeded to Tweedmouth, on the English side of the Border, and there met the archbishop of York and the bishop of Durham who had been delegated by the Pope's legate for the purpose, and received absolution from their hands, 1st December 1217, without being called upon to perform the ignominious penance which generally preceded absolution Some days thereafter the delegates also removed the ban of excommunication from Alexander's mother, queen Ermengarde The sentence was also removed from the whole body of the Scottish nation, except the prelates and the clergy, who had become obnoxious by reason of their reluctance to publish the bull

In the spring of 1218, William, prior of Durham, and Walter de Wisbech, archdeacon of York, traversed Scotland, "from Berwick to Aberdeen," for the purpose of absolving the Scottish clergy from the sentence of excommunication While upon this tour, on arriving at a town they summoned the clergy to attend them, and having required them to swear allegiance to the papal legate, and to make a candid confession of all matters concerning which they were asked, they absolved them, standing barefoot before the doors of their churches and abbeys The commissioners were very sumptuously entertained, and their favour was courted by large bribes of money, and many presents [Ridpath's Border History, p 127] On their return south they halted at the abbey of Lindores, where the prior of Durham was nearly suffocated with smoke, a fire having broken out in the chamber where he slept, through the carelessness and rioting of those who had the charge of the wine, "his chamberman," as Balfour pithily says, "being verey drunke" He died at Coldingham priory, which appears to have been partially restored after its burning by King John in 1216 The following is a woodcut of the ruins of this celebrated priory

Against these proceedings the king appealed to Rome, while the clergy themselves sent a deputation of three bishops to the Pope A judgment was obtained in their favour, which declared that the legate had exceeded his powers, and not only was absolution granted by Pope Honorius, but the liberties and privileges of the Scottish church were confirmed [Fordun a Goodal, vol ii pp 40, 42] For this favour one of the causes mentioned is the respect and obedience which Alexander had manifested to the papal see This concession on his part in a few years thereafter (in 1225) led to one of still greater importance The Scottish clergy having represented to the Pope, that from the want of a metropolitan they could not hold a provincial council, he authorized them to hold a general council of their own authority Of this permission they were not slow to take advantage, and having assembled under its sanction, they drew up a distinct form of proceeding, by which the Scottish provincial councils were in future to be held, instituted the office of Conservator Statutorum, and continued to assemble frequent provincial councils, unfettered by the intervention of any foreign superior

By one article of the treaty of peace concluded in 1217 between Alexander and Henry, it was stipulated that the king of Scotland should marry the princess Joan, the eldest sister of the king of England, and their nuptials, after some delays, occasioned by the detention of the princess in France, were celebrated on the 25th of June 1221 The princess Joan, on her marriage, was secured in a jointure of one thousand pounds of land rent [Fœdera, tom i p 252] Lord Hailes says, "The jointure lands were Jedworth, Lessudden, Kinghorn, and Crail Any deficiencies were to be made good out of the castles and castellanys of Ayr, Rutherglen, Lanark, and the rents of Clydesdale Kinghorn and Crail were, at that time, part of the jointure lands of the queen-dowager"

The peace with England and the marriage of Alexander to the English king's sister put a stop to all hostilities between the two nations for several years, and introduced a friendly intercourse between the two royal families, now so nearly related, which for a long time continued uninterrupted The king and queen of Scotland made frequent visits to the court of England, where they were nobly entertained, and received many valuable proofs of friendship from King Henry The alliance with England was still farther strengthened by the marriage of Alexander's two sisters the princesses Margaret and Isabella, who had been sent to England in the preceding reign, to English barons of great power and influence, namely, Margaret, soon after her brother's marriage in 1221, to the celebrated Hubert de Burgh, justiciary of England, and Isabella, in 1225, to Roger Bigot, eldest son of Hugh, Earl Bigot [Fordun, ix 32, 33 Fœdera, i 227, 228, 374 Matth Paris, 216] For providing portions for his sisters, Alexander, in 1224, levied an aid of ten thousand pounds upon the nation This grant is stated by some of our Scottish writers, in the loose manner in which they are accustomed to write of events which took place at that remote period, to have been authorized by Alexander's parliament, while, on the contrary, it was imposed by the simple order of the king himself, without the slightest appearance of a meeting of the three estates, or even of the council of the king Such a thing as a parliament was then unknown in Scotland The first meeting, indeed, of what may be termed one did not take place till 1289, fully sixty-five years later, when, after the death of Alexander III, the estates of the kingdom, that is, the five guardians or regents, ten bishops, twelve earls, twenty-three abbots, eleven priors, and forty-eight barons, calling themselves the community of Scotland, although no representatives of the burghs or of the people were among them, met at Brigham, now Birgham, an obscure village in Berwickshire, to take into consideration the proposal for a marriage between the prince of Wales, the son of Edward the First of England, and the young queen Margaret of Scotland, called "the Maiden of Norway" When Fordun (vol ii p 34) asserts that Alexander the Second, immediately after his coronation, held his parliament in Edinburgh, in which he confirmed to the chancellor, constable, and chamberlain the same high offices which they had filled at his father's death, the word parliament so used may be held only to mean an assembly of the court, or the council of his nobles and great officers of the crown, and not a parliament, or even convention of estates, in the modern meaning of the word [See Tytler's History of Scotland, vol ii sect 3]

Anciently the barons of the realm, with the crown vassals and higher clergy, constituted the communitas regni, which formed the parliament, as Mr Skene terms it, of all Teutonic nations To this body, composed of Celtic, Norman, and Saxon dignitaries and landholders, belonged the duty of counselling the monarch, and expressing the wants and wishes of the nation, without the great mass of the people having either a voice or a will in the matter, the principle of elective representation being altogether unknown to them But there was another and even a higher body in the state, independent of the communitas, whose peculiar privileges were only exercised on great and rare occasions, namely, when there was a vacancy in the throne This was the Septem Comites Regni Scotiæ, "the seven earls of Scotland" Until very recently, the existence of such a corporate body in the state seems to have been entirely unknown To Sir Francis Palgrave belongs the merit of having made the discovery of a fact of so much importance to the right understanding of the history of Scotland It is proved, he says in his 'Treasury Documents illustrative of Scottish History,' published in 1837, that "there existed in the ancient kingdom of Scotland, a known and established constitutional body denominated 'the seven earls of Scotland,' possessing privileges of singular importance as a distinct estate in the realm, severed equally from the other earls, and from the body of the baronage" These seven earls as a body derived their functions from the old Celtic constitution of the country, ancient Albania, or Scotland, north of the firths of Forth and Clyde, being divided into seven great provinces or governments The Pictish names of these provinces were Fiv, Cait, Fotla, Fortiern, Circui, Ce, and Fidach, corresponding with, according to Geraldus Cambrensis, Fife, Caithness, Atholl and Garmorim, Strathearne and Menteth, Angus and Mearns, Moray and Ross, and Mar and Buchan Three of these were provinces of the Southern Picts, namely, Fife, Strathearne and Menteth, and Angus and Mearns, the other four belonged to the northern Picts These seven provinces formed the kingdom of the Picts or Scotland proper, previous to the ninth century The Scottish conquest, in 843, having added to it Dalriada, which afterwards became Argyle, and Caithness having towards the end of the same century fallen into the hands of the Norwegians, the former was after that period substituted for the latter, and the earl of Argyle instead of the earl of Caithness was numbered among "the seven earls" The Pictish nation consisted of a confederacy of fourteen tribes spread over the seven provinces named, in each of which one of the seven superior chiefs ruled under the Celtic name of maormor In the reign of Edgar they assumed the Saxon title of earl, and their territories were exactly the same with the earldoms into which the north of Scotland was afterwards divided

In the appendix to the first volume of Mr Skene's valuable 'History of the Highlanders,' will be found a clear account of the 'seven ancient provinces of Scotland,' over which the seven earls presided It was the privilege of these seven superior chiefs, by immemorial custom, as a peculiar estate in the realm, to appoint a king, whenever there was a vacancy, and to invest him with the royal authority, a right which they appear to have exercised after the Pictish kingdom had ceased to exist Among the other documents preserved in the Treasury, illustrative of Scottish history, which the researches of Sir Francis Palgrave have brought to light, is a roll containing the appeal of the seven earls in 1290 to the authority and protection of Edward I and the English crown, against William Fraser, Bishop of St Andrews, and John Comyn, Lord of Badenoch, the Scottish regents, during the interregnum that succeeded the death of the Maid of Norway, on the ground that the regents were infringing or intending to infringe this their constitutional franchise, which appeal, it is now understood, led to the famous summons of the English monarch that the Scottish nobility and clergy should meet him at Norham in the English territories, on the 10th of May 1291, to decide upon the claims of the various competitors to the Scottish crown Having given this explanation, which will form a key to much of what would be otherwise unintelligible or obscure in the early history of Scotland, we resume the regular narrative

The external tranquillity which Scotland enjoyed after the peace with England and the marriage of Alexander to the sister of the English king, allowed Alexander leisure to suppress some dangerous insurrections that had broken out at home In 1221, Somerled, a grandson of the celebrated lord of the Isles of that name, possessed the whole district of Argyle, which was then much more extensive than the modern Argyleshire, and having that year risen in rebellion, the king collected an army in Lothian and Galloway, and sailed for Argyle, intending to disembark his force, and penetrate into the interior of the country, but his ships were driven back by a tempest, and forced to take refuge in the Clyde Alexander, however, was not discouraged, but resolved to proceed into Argyle by land With a large army, which he had summoned from every quarter of his dominions, he made himself master of the whole of the insurgent district, and compelled Somerled to flee to the Isles, where, about eight years afterwards, he met a violent death Winton says,

> "De king that yhere Argyle wan
> Dat rebell wes till hym befor than
> For wythe hys Ost thare in wes he > And Athe' tuk of thare Lewte, > Wythe thare serwys and their Homage > Dat of hym wald hald thare Herytage,
> But of the Ethchetys of the lave
> To the Lordes of that land he gave"

The estates of those who fled were bestowed on the principal men of the king's army as a reward for their having joined the expedition, but wherever the former vassals of Somerled submitted and were received into favour, they became crown vassals, and held their lands in chief of the crown The district in which the forfeited estates were, was farther brought under the direct jurisdiction of the government, by being, according to the invariable policy of Alexander II, erected into a sheriffdom by the name of Argyle, the first sheriffdom bearing that name, while the ancestor of the Campbells was made hereditary sheriff of the new sheriffdom [Skene's History of the Highlanders, vol i. p 46] The whole of the then northern Argyle, now part of Inverness-shire, was bestowed on the earl of Ross, as a reward for the assistance which he had rendered to the king on this and a former occasion

Besides suppressing this insurrection in Argyle, Alexander was about the same time called upon to punish some disturbances of an alarming kind which had broken out in Caithness In 1222, Adam bishop of Caithness was cruelly burnt to death in his own palace He had proved himself extremely rigorous in enforcing the demand for tithes, leading the poor people's corn, as Balfour says, "too avariciously," and when the people of his diocese had assembled to consider what was to be done under the circumstances, one of them exclaimed, "short rede, good rede, slay we the bishop," meaning, "Few words are best, let us kill the bishop" The persons assembled unfortunately were too excited to pause or reflect—they followed the cruel advice, thus rashly given, but too literally Rushing with eagerness to the bishop's house, they furiously assaulted it, set it on fire, and burnt the unhappy prelate in the flames of his own palace, with a monk who attended him, named Serlo Some of the bishop's servants applied to the earl of Orkney and Caithness to protect their master from the fury of the mob, he answered that if the bishop came to him he would be sure of protection, but did not offer to go to his assistance. Alexander received intelligence of this cruel action when he was upon a journey towards England He immediately turned back, marched into Caithness with an army, and put to death four hundred of those who had been concerned in the murder of the bishop The earl of Orkney who might have prevented the catastrophe but did not, was believed to have favoured the conspiracy, but him the king pardoned, as he had no actual hand in the crime He had to pay, however, a large sum of money, and give up the third part of his estate Balfour says that in the following year, while Alexander was keeping his birth-day at Forfar, the earl of Orkney with a good sum of ready money redeemed the third part of his estate from the king, but on his return home he was murdered in his own castle, which was afterwards burnt, in imitation and revenge of the bishop's fate This event, however, according to the chronicle of Melrose (p 201) quoted by Lord Hailes, did not take place till 1231

In the life of Alexander I allusion has been made to the peculiar law of succession which prevailed amongst the Pictish or Gaelic tribes [See p 54, ante] This law of Tanistry, as it was called, provided that on the death of a chief, the brother, or "he of the blood who was nearest," succeeded to the chiefship, to the exclusion of females and even sons, the brother being considered one degree nearer the original founder or patriarch of the race than the son, and if the person who ought to succeed was under fourteen years of age,—the ancient Highland period of majority,—his nearest male relation became chief, and continued so during his life, the proper heir inheriting the chiefship only at his death [Skene's History of the Highlanders, vol i pp 160, 161] The establishment of such a law originated primarily, there cannot be a doubt, in the natural anxiety to avoid minorities in a tribe or clan, so that it might always have a competent leader in war, a principle which, however much opposed to the feudal notions of later times, flowed naturally from the patriarchal constitution of society in the Highlands, being peculiarly adapted to the circumstances of a people whose warlike habits and love of military enterprise, as well as addiction to armed predatory expeditions, demanded at all times a chief of full age and every way qualified to act as their leader and commander

As, however, the Highlanders adhered strictly to succession in the male line and according to the lineal descent from the common ancestor, or founder of the tribe, any infraction of this rule was often productive of the most serious outbreaks and insurrections This was remarkably the case in the old maormordom or province of Moray, which, at the period when Alexander the Second ascended the throne, included not only what now forms the counties of Elgin and Nairn, but a considerable part of Banffshire and nearly the half of Inverness-shire This was always one of the most rebellious portions of the kingdom, and although the tribes of Moray, in common with the rest of the Highlanders, recognised in Alexander I and his successor David I the legitimate heirs of Malcolm Canmore, they were never without a pretext for disturbing the country After the suppression of their attempt at insurrection early in the reign of the former, when Angus referred to (p 54) as of the family of Macbeth,—whom Skene with reason supposes to be the same with Head or Heth, whose name with Comes attached to it appears as witness in numerous charters of David I, Head or Heth being the surname of the family,—was in in possession of the earldom, they remained quiet till 1130, Alexander's successor David I being then on the throne In that year, an Angus earl of Moray,—either the individual referred to above, who escaped confiscation by causing his accomplice Ladman, younger son of Donald Bane, to be put to death, or a descendant of the same name,—taking advantage of David's absence at the English court, broke out into rebellion, and after having obtained possession of the northern districts of Scotland, advanced at the head of a numerous army, into Forfarshire, but Edward, son of Siward, earl of Northumberland, led an army into Scotland, with which he defeated and slew the earl at Strickathrow Twelve years thereafter one Wimund, an English monk, who had risen to be bishop of Man, claiming to be the son of Angus, asserted his right to the earldom, and assumed the name of Malcolm Macbeth He was assisted by Somerled, thane of Argyle, whose daughter he married, and many of the northern chiefs After having for several years sustained a struggle with David, he was at length betrayed by his own adherents, who put out his eyes and delivered him up to the Scottish king He was sent a prisoner to the castle of Roxburgh, but after a tedious captivity, was pardoned, when he retired to the abbey of Biland in Yorkshire, where he died [See Life of David I post]

On the death of David I in 1153, the Tanistic law of succession would have conferred the right to the throne on Malcolm son of Duncan, the eldest son of Malcolm Canmore, but being then in possession of the earldom of Athol (p 54), he does not appear to have brought it forward, preferring probably the certainty of possession under the feudal law to the risk of a hopeless conflict On his death however, some years afterwards, it would appear that the law of Tanistry again came into conflict with the established system, not only as respects the succession to the crown, but in reference also to the family possessions of the earldom of Athol, and we find the celebrated Boy of Egremont, in the person of William, son of William Fitz-Duncan, a younger son of Duncan, appearing as a claimant of both, in opposition to Malcolm IV, the reigning monarch, and to his cousin Henry, son of Malcolm his father's brother, then earl of Athol The people of the Highlands, ever prepared to avail themselves of an occasion to thrust out the race that governed them according to the Saxon laws, were the more encouraged to support the claim of this individual in the absence of Malcolm IV., then rendering military service to Henry II in France, by the general dissatisfaction professed to be entertained on account of that servitude. Six of the seven great earls of Scotland, who governed the districts into which the ancient Pictish provinces of Scotland were divided —and in whose hands the nomination of the crown was vested [see p 67]—sent a message to Malcolm, then at Toulouse, expressing their disapprobation of his proceedings, and indicating a withdrawal of their allegiance. On his return from France, he met the chiefs at Perth, and whilst by the intervention of his clergy he endeavoured to pacify them and regain their confidence, he was in 1160 attacked by a portion of the confederacy, but they were repulsed, and many of their followers slain. [See life of Malcolm IV post.] Donald Bane, another son of William Fitz-Duncan, and grandson of Duncan, afterwards took up the claim, and supported by the northern chiefs, he for seven years held out the provinces of Moray and Ross against William the Lion, but in 1187, while his army lay at Inverness, a marauding party commanded by Roland of Galloway accidentally encountering him, when attended by few of his followers, attacked and slew him. In 1211 his son Guthred landed from Ireland and wasted the province of Ross. Notwithstanding that the king (William the Lion) went against him in person at the head of an army, he kept possession of the north of Scotland for some time, but was at last betrayed into the hands of William Comyn, by whom he was beheaded.

On the accession of Alexander II to the throne, Donald Bane, or MacWilliam, the brother of Guthred, and the son of that Donald who was slain in 1187, prepared to assert his own pretensions to the crown, and in conjunction with Kenneth Macheth, who after an unsuccessful attempt to obtain the earldom of Moray in the reign of Malcolm IV had taken refuge in Ireland, invaded Scotland at the head of a numerous body of Irish followers. They made an inroad into Moray, but were met by Ferchard, earl of Ross, an ally of the government, who defeated and slew them. Balfour in his annals says: "In the zeire 1215, Donald Bane, the sone of Mack-William, and Keneth Mack-Acht, with the son of a pittey king of Irland, and a good armey, invadit the heighe lands. Against quhom Machentagar leweys ane armey, and with them feights a werey bloodiey and cieuell batell, quhom he totally ouerthrowes, the 17 day of Julay, and solemly presents the rebells heads to the king, for wich so gude seruice the king solemley knights Machentagar, and gives him a zeirly pensione during his lyffe." [Vol i p 38.] Lord Hailes transcribed the same names, with a slight difference in the spelling, from the Chronicle of Melrose. "The author," he says, "being a Saxon, has corrupted the Gaelic names, Kenaukmacaht and M'Kentagar are unintelligible words." From the above retrospect, which was necessary to render the narrative clear, the reader will not be at a loss to understand that by Donald Bane is meant Donald M'William the grandson of William, and great-grandson of Duncan king of Scotland, and by Machentagar, Ferchard Macantagart, earl of Ross, who conquered and slew him and Kenneth Mack-Act, or Macheth, as already narrated.

The rebellion of Somerled in 1221, of which an account has been given in pages 66, 67, is the last of those persevering efforts made to replace the family of Duncan on the throne of his father Malcolm. By an intermarriage of their families at an earlier period Somerled had become closely related to the race of Duncan. The language of the old chronicler Winton, already quoted, would imply that he with the forces of Argyle had aided in the previous one of 1215. The death, therefore, of the last of the heirs of the direct line seems to have opened the way to a claim to the throne in his own right. In reading of these continuous struggles, and of the aid so frequently rendered by the Irish and Scottish branches of the Celtic family to the assertion of the old Pictish law, we see another proof of the tenacity with which under all discouragements they held to it. In the frequent interference also of the Irish in these internal struggles,—made too, it is worthy of being noted, generally on occasions when the occupant of the throne was embarrassed by other questions,—we seem to read over again the series of contests—brought to light by Skene and others—whereby the Irish Dalriadic tribe, not having then the Norman arms to encounter, at an earlier period of the national history more successfully submerged the existing government, and gave the name of Scotland, and race of monarchs—the true heirs according to their theory—to that country

Although the family of Angus had become extinct by the death of Kenneth, yet by the Celtic law of succession, the claims of the family were transmitted to the next branch of the clan, and in 1228 the tranquillity of the same district was again disturbed by one Gillespic, claiming to be the chief of the province This warrior, after burning some wooden castles, surprising and slaying a baron who had been sent against him, called Thomas of Thirlstane, to whom Malcolm IV had given the district of Abertarff, set fire to the town of Inverness, and spoiled and wasted the crown lands in that neighbourhood The king went against him in person, but for a while he eluded his pursuit He was at last encountered and slain, by William Comyn earl of Buchan, the justiciary of the kingdom As a reward for suppressing this insurrection Comyn got a grant from the king of the districts of Badenoch and Lochaber In accordance with his usual policy, Alexander erected that portion of the extensive earldom of Moray, which was not then under the rule of the Bissets, the Comyns, and other Norman barons, into the separate sheriffdoms of Elgin and Nairn "The authority of government," says Skene, "was thus so effectually established that the Moravians did not again attempt any resistance, and thus ended with the death of Gillespic, the last of that series of persevering efforts which the earls of Moray had made for upwards of one hundred years to preserve their native inheritance" [Highlanders of Scotland, vol ii p 170]

In 1233 the most serious insurrection which Alexander had yet to contend with occurred in Galloway, arising out of a similar principle to that which produced the disturbances in Moray, the adherence, namely, of the inhabitants to the ancient law of tanistry, as evidenced in their unwillingness to submit to female succession The people of that extensive district, which forms the south-western angle of Scotland, were chiefly of a Celtic race Besides offshoots from the Scots of Kintyre, large bodies of colonists from Ireland formed, at various times, settlements there, during the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, and from the frequent incursions of these and other settlers, the district obtained its name, either, as is most likely, from the word Gall, which originally signified stranger or wanderer, and in this sense was applied to the pirates who, in those days, infested the western coasts of Scotland,—hence the term used by the Irish annalists, in reference to them, namely the Gallgael, meaning Gaelic pirates or rovers,—or, as is generally supposed, from the Gaelic origin of the inhabitants Although the name is now confined to the shire of Wigton and the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, it anciently had a more extensive application, as it comprehended the entire peninsula between the Solway and the Clyde, including Annandale in the south-east, and most of Ayrshire in the north-west, and was governed by its native chieftains, styled the lords of Galloway, who acknowledged a feudatory dependence on the Scottish crown In the twelfth century, Fergus, one of the most potent of these, who was the son-in-law of Henry I of England, endeavoured to throw off his allegiance to Malcolm IV, and raised a formidable insurrection in Galloway Enraged at his daring, Malcolm marched into his territory, and though twice repulsed, he succeeded in a third effort, in the year 1160, in overcoming him Fergus, after suing for peace, resigned his lordship and possessions to his two sons, Gilbert and Uchtred, and retired to the abbey of Holyrood, where he died in the following year His two sons attended, as feudatories, William the Lion, in 1174, on his unfortunate expedition into England, but they no sooner saw him taken captive than, at the head of their savage followers, they returned to their native wilds, attacked and demolished the royal castles, and murdered many subjects of William who were settled in Galloway To protect them against the vengeance of their own sovereign, they besought Henry, the English king, to receive their homage In the meantime, before receiving an answer to their request, Uchtred was cruelly murdered by his brother Gilbert for his share of the inheritance Gilbert renewed the negotiation with

Henry in his own name, and offered to pay him a yearly tribute of two thousand marks of silver, five hundred cows, and five hundred swine To mark his detestation of the treacherous murder of Uchtred, Henry refused both the homage and the tribute On regaining his liberty, King William invaded Galloway with an army, but instead of punishing Gilbert as he deserved, he accepted from him a pecuniary satisfaction In the following year (1176) Gilbert accompanied William to York, where he was received into the favour of Henry, and did homage to him, the crown vassals as well as the kingdom of Scotland being then, in terms of the treaty which restored William to freedom, placed under feudal subordination to England [See life of William the Lion, post] From this Gilbert, who died in 1185, sprang, afterwards, in the third generation, Marjory countess of Carrick in her own right, the mother of Robert the Bruce Meantime Roland, the son of the murdered Uchtred, seized the favourable moment of the death of his uncle Gilbert, to attack and disperse his faction, and to claim possession of all Galloway as his own inheritance, in which he was favoured by his own sovereign William Henry II, however, the English king, opposed his claims, and assembling a large army at Carlisle, prepared to invade Galloway Roland resolved upon a desperate resistance, but the dispute was ultimately adjusted by Roland, after swearing fealty to Henry, being confirmed in the lordship of Galloway, on condition of surrendering the territory of Carrick to his cousin Duncan, the son of Gilbert He is the Roland of Galloway who, in 1187, encountered and killed the pretender, Donald Bane, at Inverness, p 69 On the restoration of the national independence, Roland obtained the office of constable of Scotland He died in December 1200

Alan, the eldest son of Roland, and the last male-heir of the line of the ancient 'lords of Galloway,' died in 1233 He succeeded as constable of Scotland, and was a personage of considerable importance in Scottish history He had been twice married By his first wife he had a daughter Helen, or Elena, married to Roger de Quincy, earl of Winchester By his second wife, Margaret, the eldest of the three daughters, and eventual heiresses of David, earl of Huntingdon, the brother of William the Lion, he had two daughters, his eldest daughter by his second marriage, Devorguil, becoming the wife of John de Balliol, lord of Bernard castle, transmitted to their son John Balliol, the competitor, afterwards king, the lineal right of succession to the throne Devorguil's younger sister Christian, was the wife of William des Forts, son of the earl of Albemarle Unwilling to have their country partitioned among the husbands of Alan's three daughters, the people of Galloway offered the lordship to Alexander, whose sense of justice prevented him from depriving the legitimate heirs of their right They then requested that an illegitimate son of Alan, named Thomas, should be appointed their lord To this application Alexander also refused to accede, on which the Galwegians broke out into open rebellion, having at their head the bastard Thomas, aided by an Irish chieftain named Gilrodh, who joined him with a large force from Ireland To suppress this formidable outbreak, Alexander led an expedition against the rebellious Galwegians, who did not wait to be attacked by him, but rushed forth from their mountains and fastnesses with Celtic fury, and proceeded to ravage the adjacent country They even contrived to surround Alexander, when he had got entangled among morasses, and he was in imminent danger till Ferchard, earl of Ross, came to his assistance, and assaulting the rebels in the rear, routed them with great slaughter Galloway was restored to Alan's heiresses, and the inhabitants compelled to receive as their superior Roger de Quincy the husband of Elena Thomas and his Irish ally escaped to Ireland, but in the following year they returned with a fresh force, and attempted to renew the rebellion Gilrodh, on landing, burnt his vessels, as if resolved to conquer or die The insurgents were, however, again defeated, and Gilrodh surrendered himself to the earl of March without resistance He was sent bound to Edinburgh castle, but both he and Thomas were pardoned Their Irish followers, crowding towards the Clyde, in the hope of being able to find a passage to their own country, fell into the hands of a band of the citizens of Glasgow, who are said to have beheaded them all except two, whom Balfour calls two of their chief commanders, and these they sent to Edinburgh, to be hanged and quartered there. The king's enforcing the rights of Alan's daughters, and at the head of an army breaking down the spirit of insurrection, was the introduction to the epoch of granting charters for the holding of lands, and of landholders giving leases to tenants, as well as of the security of property and the cultivation of the arts of husbandry in Galloway

Notwithstanding the terms of amity in which Henry and Alexander lived, there were still several subjects of dispute between them, which now and then occasioned some disquiet, and afforded matter for discussion and negotiation, although their own pacific dispositions prevented an open rupture Henry showed at times an inclination to extend the incidents of the homage of the king of Scotland to an unreasonable limit, and in 1234 he went so far as to solicit the Pope to exhort Alexander to acknowledge the superiority of England over Scotland, an exhortation which Alexander, when he received it, paid no attention to Alexander, on his part, always insisted either on restitution being made to him of the three northern counties of England, or on the repayment of the fifteen thousand merks paid by his father to King John The vacillating character of Henry III exposed the peace between the two countries to the risk of constant interruption, but sometimes he would conciliate his brother-in-law's favour by gifts, concessions, and the warmest professions of friendship An instance of this occurred in 1230, when Henry invited Alexander to York, where he celebrated Christmas, and entertained him with great state, and after loading him with presents, sent him home In 1236, after an interview between the two monarchs at Newcastle, where they royally feasted each other, Henry bestowed the manor of Driffield on his sister, the queen of Scots, for life, and at a subsequent period he conferred on the same princess the manor of Staunton [Chron Melr 203 Fœdera, i 370, 379] At length in September 1237, the matters in dispute between Henry and Alexander were heard at York, before Otho, or Eudes le Blanc l'Aleran, a cardinal deacon and the papal legate to England The conference lasted for fifteen days, and twenty-four councillors of the two kings were present The negociations terminated by a compromise Henry, in full of all claims, consented to grant to Alexander lands in Northumberland and Cumberland, of the yearly value of two hundred pounds Alexander agreed to accept of these as an equivalent, and did homage to Henry in general terms Malcolm Macduff, earl of Fife, Walter Comyn, earl of Menteith, and others of the principal Scottish barons, bound themselves by oath to maintain this agreement on their monarch's part [Fœdera, i p 374, 400 Fordun, i 370 Hailes' Annals of Scotland, vol i p 153]

On this occasion the papal legate took an opportunity of intimating to Alexander his intention of soon visiting Scotland, in order, as he pretended, to inquire into the ecclesiastical affairs of his kingdom Alexander, however, was fully aware of the true motive of this visit, namely, the exaction of money, and he had no desire to gratify the legate in the matter The avarice of the court of Rome had, about this period, risen to such an exorbitant height as to be the subject of general complaint in all the nations of Christendom The enormous amount of power which the Pope and his ministers universally possessed was used for purposes of extortion in every kingdom subject to their control The venality of the popedom was so great that it guided all its dealings with princes and people everywhere abroad, and pervaded its tribunals at home Simony was openly practised, neither favours, nor even justice could be obtained without a bribe, and he who paid the highest price was sure to obtain his suit In 1226 Pope Honorius, under pretence that the poverty of the see of Rome was the source of all the grievances that existed, that they might be remedied, demanded from every cathedral in the Christian world two of the best prebends, and from every convent two monks' portions, to be set apart as a perpetual and fixed revenue of the papal see This demand was felt to be so unreasonable that it was unanimously rejected, but about three years later he claimed and obtained the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues, which he levied in the most oppressive manner, rapacious and insolent collectors of the tithes being sent into the different parishes, in many cases before the clergy had even drawn their own rents Of all this Alexander was not ignorant, and he had not forgotten the conduct of the two deputies of the papal legate when, in 1218, they visited Scotland and grievously harassed the Scottish clergy For a long period previous to his reign, Scotland had submitted, although reluctantly and impatiently, to the repeated visits of a papal legate who, under the pretext of watching over the interests, and reforming the abuses of the church, assembled councils, and levied large sums of money in the country, but now that the Scottish church had obtained from the Pope the right, however ambiguously and loosely worded the bull granting it might be, to hold provincial councils of herself, the presence of a papal legate in Scotland for any such purpose as that pretended by Otho was altogether unnecessary Alexander, therefore, peremptorily declared that he would not allow any such visit "I have never," he said, "seen a legate in my dominions, and as long as I live, I will not permit such an innovation We require no such visitation now, nor have we ever required it in times past" He added a hint that should Otho venture to disregard his prohibition and enter Scotland, he could not answer for his life, owing to the ferocious habits of his subjects The legate prudently abandoned all idea of the expedition then, but, as shall presently be seen, he carried his intention into effect a few years thereafter [Matth Paris, p 377]

Alexander's queen, Joan, had for some time been in declining health, and according to the superstition of the times, she sought relief at the shrine of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, but in vain She died on the 4th of March, 1238, in the presence of her two brothers, King Henry and Richard duke of Cornwall She had no children

About this time it would appear that despairing of heirs of his own body, Alexander publicly acknowledged, in presence and with consent of his barons, Robert Bruce, known in Scottish history as Bruce the Competitor, the grandfather of the hero of Bannockburn, as the nearest heir in blood to the crown The birth of a son by Alexander's second wife, in 1241, put an end to his expectations of the throne at the time, and on the competition for the crown which took place after the death of the Maid of Norway, more than fifty years afterwards, he urged this as one of his strongest pleas [See life of Robert the Bruce, post]

In the year 1239 Alexander had married at Roxburgh, Lady Mary de Couci, daughter of Ingelram or Enguerrand de Couci, a lord of Picardy, Count de Dreux, in France His family affected a rank and state scarcely inferior to that of a sovereign The motto of the new queen's father is said to have been

Je ne suis Roy, ni Prince aussi
Je suis le Seigneur de Couci

The provision of Mary de Couci, on her marriage, was a third of the royal revenues, amounting to upwards of 4,000 merks [Matth Paris, p 555] Soon after this marriage, Alexander, being in England, met the papal legate Otho on his way to Scotland, and strenuously remonstrated with him on his intended visit Through his earnest entreaty, however, but with extreme reluctance, and only at the joint request of the nobility of both kingdoms, the king at length consented to admit him within his dominions, and even permitted him to hold a provincial council at Edinburgh, but he insisted upon and obtained a written declaration from the legate, given under his seal, that this permission to enter the kingdom should not be drawn into a precedent Not choosing, however, to countenance by his presence what he affirmed to be an unnecessary innovation, Alexander retired into the interior of his kingdom, nor would he suffer the legate to extend his pecuniary exactions beyond the Forth [Matth Paris, p 422] Under such circumstances the papal emissary tarried no longer than to collect those spoils which both clergy and laity, eager to get rid of him, poured into his rapacious hands Secretly, and without leave asked, he then departed from Scotland He had previously in this same year (1240), plundered the prelates and convents of England of large sums of money, partly by intrigues, and partly by menaces, and on his departure is said to have carried more money out of the kingdom than he left in it

In 1241, the queen gave birth to a son at Roxburgh, whom the king called Alexander after himself He succeeded him on the throne under the name of Alexander III

Although the ties of relationship which had bound together Henry and Alexander, were now severed, yet so good a mutual understanding still subsisted between the two kings, that in 1242, when Henry prepared to visit his dominions on the continent, after he had declared war against Louis IX of France, he committed to Alexander the care of the northern frontiers of his kingdom He probably distrusted his own barons, who, discontented with his patronage of foreigners, were then preparing that confederacy against him which under Simon de Montfort, a few years later, virtually wrested all his regal authority from him The king of Scotland, in the absence of the English sovereign, was the most likely person to have seized the opportunity of disturbing the borders, but the trust thus so honourably confided to him was as faithfully and honourably discharged Alexander II was not a prince to violate his faith, and he amply proved himself worthy of the confidence which the English monarch had reposed in him [Ch Meh 203, 204 Matth Paris, 395]

In that age the great pastime of the nobles and knights was the tournament At one of these feats of arms held in 1242, at Haddington, an incident occurred which led to important consequences Between the noble house of Athole and the Bissets, an English family who held large possessions in the north of Scotland, a feud had long existed At the tournament referred to, Walter de Bisset was foiled and overthrown by Patrick, earl of Athole, a young nobleman of great promise It has been already stated (life of Alexander I p 54, ante), that the earldom of Athole was, towards the end of the reign of David I obtained by Malcolm, the son of Duncan, the eldest son of Malcolm Canmore Malcolm was succeeded as earl by his son of the same name He left a son, Henry, who also enjoyed the earldom The latter died in the beginning of the thirteenth century By a son who predeceased him he had two granddaughters, Isabel and Fernelith Isabel, the elder, married Thomas of Galloway, a younger son of Roland, and brother of Alan, lord of Galloway Fernelith, the younger, married David de Hastings, an Anglo-Norman knight This Patrick, earl of Athole, was the only child of the former, and the representative by the female line of the eldest branch of the family of Duncan In a short time after, the earl of Athole was murdered at Haddington, and the house in which he lodged set on fire by the assassins Suspicion at once pointed to the defeated Bisset as the instigator, if not the actual perpetrator of the crime The nobility, headed by the earl of March, immediately raised an armed force, and, excited to vengeance by David de Hastings, who had married Fernelith, the aunt and heiress of Patrick, and now earl of Athole, they demanded the life of both Walter and his uncle William Bisset, the chief of the family The latter offered to maintain his innocence by single combat, and urged that, at the time of the murder, he was at Forfar, seventy miles distant By the exertions of the king he was saved from death, but he was banished and his estates were forfeited All his kindred were involved in his ruin As his enemies secretly sought his life, the king took him under his protection and concealed him from their fury for three months Escaping after that period first to Ireland and afterwards to England, Bisset found his way to the court of King Henry, to whom, as an English subject, he seems to have appealed against the judgment that had stripped him of all his possessions and exiled him from Scotland, on the plea "that Alexander, being the vassal of Henry, had no right to inflict such punishments on his nobles without the permission of his liege lord" So deep was his desire of vengeance for the injuries which he had sustained, that, forgetful of all feelings of gratitude to Alexander, to whose generous interposition on his behalf, he owed his life, he endeavoured, by the most insidious representations, to incite Henry to take up arms against him He declared that the king of Scots was in league with France, and that he gave shelter and protection to traitors from England who had taken refuge in his dominions

Henry, believing on good grounds that a strong anti-English feeling had begun to prevail in Scotland, and suspicious of the friendly correspondence which Alexander had, since his marriage to Mary de Couci, cultivated with France, gave but too ready an ear to these artful statements and insinuations The personal intimacy of the two kings had now for some time ceased and as national jealousies began to revive, the weak-minded English monarch was the more easily influenced against his former friend and brother-in-law He complained to Alexander that he had violated the duty which he was bound to yield to him as his lord paramount, and Alexander is said to have replied that he owed no homage to England for any part of his dominions, and would perform none Henry on this being reported to him, determined on an immediate invasion of Scotland As one of his pretexts for preparing for hostilities, he alleged that "Walter Comyn, earl of Menteth, had given umbrage to England, by erecting two castles, the one in Galloway, the other in Lothian" [Hailes, vol i p 159] The Comyns were remarkable at this period for their championship of Scottish independence, and as the Walter Comyn mentioned was one of the principal noblemen in Scotland, Henry naturally enough looked upon him as representing the feeling against England prevalent amongst the Scottish nobility at the time There was another pretext, "that Alexander had leagued himself with France, and had afforded an asylum to Geoffrey de Marais, and other English offenders" In 1242, as has been already stated, Henry declared war against Louis IX of France, and made an expedition into Guienne, his stepfather, the count de la Marche, having promised to join him with all his forces He was unsuccessful, however, in all his attempts against the French king He was worsted at Taillebourg, was deserted by his allies, lost what remained to him of Poitou, and was obliged to return with loss of honour to England This disgrace rankled in his breast, and Bisset's charge that Alexander was in league with France, touching him on the point where he was most sensitive, incensed him against Alexander He secretly applied to the earl of Flanders for succours, and instigated no fewer than twenty-two Irish chiefs to make a descent on the Scottish coast Having arranged all his plans, he proclaimed war against Alexander in 1244, and assembled a numerous and well-appointed army at Newcastle, prepared to cross the borders into Scotland Some troops which had been sent to the assistance of Alexander by his brother-in-law, John de Couci, were intercepted by Henry The English monarch at this period was not on good terms with his nobles, most of whom were personally intimate with Alexander, and remembered their old association in arms with him against the tyrant, King John From some one or other of them he doubtless obtained information of Henry's intentions, in time to send notice to his brother-in-law in Picardy for what aid he could furnish him with He then determined upon a vigorous resistance, and was warmly seconded by his nobility Measures were taken to strengthen the frontier fortresses of the kingdom, and at the head of a gallant army Alexander marched southward, resolved to be beforehand with Henry, and encounter his foes on English ground From the description which the contemporary English historian, Matthew Paris, has given of the force under Alexander on this occasion it appears to have been a formidable one "His army," he says, "was numerous and brave, he had a thousand horsemen tolerably mounted, though not indeed on Spanish or Italian horses His infantry approached to a hundred thousand, all unanimous, all animated by the exhortations of their clergy, and by confession, courageously to fight and resolutely to die in the just defence of their native land" The horsemen were clothed in armour of iron network Henry had a larger body of cavalry than the Scottish king, and his army included a force of five thousand men at arms, splendidly accoutred [Matth Paris, p 645 Chr Melr p 156] The rival armies came in sight of each other at a place called Ponteland in Northumberland No battle ensued, however The English nobles held in high respect the character of the Scottish king, who, according to Matthew Paris, was justly beloved by all the English nation, no less than by his own subjects, and they did not fully approve of the rash enterprise of their own sovereign While the Scottish army, undismayed by the superior array of their opponents, were prepared and eager for battle, the leaders of the English, on the other hand, were only anxious to avert hostilities Henry soon saw that it would be dangerous to push matters to extremities Through the mediation of Richard earl of Cornwall, the brother of the king of England, and the archbishop of York, a treaty of peace was concluded at Newcastle on the 13th of August, the terms of which were honourable to both sovereigns, and that without a sword being drawn, a bow bent, or a lance put in rest Henry did not insist on an express act of homage from Alexander for the kingdom of Scotland, while Alexander, on his side, agreed always to bear good faith and affection to Henry as his liege lord, and not to enter into any alliance with the enemies of England, unless the English did him some wrong [Fœdera, tom i p 429] The terms of the treaty have by Scottish writers been represented as favourable to Scotland, as in their opinion Henry by it undoubtedly conceded the point in dispute between them Dr Lingard, however, an acute and impartial investigator, describes it as "an arrangement by which, though Alexander eluded the express recognition of feudal dependence, he seems to have conceded to Henry the substance of his demand" This much is certain, that although the matter was not pressed to extremities, the claim of Henry was both revived and in part exercised early in the following reign [Life of Alexander III] It was also one of the stipulations of the treaty, that a proposal made in 1242, the year after a son was born to Alexander, of a marriage between Margaret the daughter of the king of England and the young prince of Scotland, should be carried into effect, as it subsequently was in 1251, when Alexander III was only ten years old Alan Durward, at that time considered the most accomplished knight and the best military leader in Scotland, Henry de Baliol, and David de Lindesay, with other knights and prelates, swore on the soul of their lord the king, that the treaty should be kept inviolate by him and his heirs

In 1247 Alexander was again called to suppress an insurrection which had broken out in Galloway Exasperated by the oppressions of their liege lord Roger de Quincy, earl of Winchester, the husband of Elena the eldest daughter of the deceased Alan, lord of Galloway the people of that district suddenly rose against him, and besieged him in his own castle In a sally which he made he was successful in cutting a passage through his rebellious vassals, and instantly sought redress from the king Alexander chastised and subdued the insurgents, and reinstated de Quincy in his superiority

The last expedition in which Alexander was engaged was undertaken in order to compel various of the chiefs in the western islands and in the north of Scotland who were at that time the vassals of Norway, to renounce their allegiance to that power, and to reduce the entire country under his own dominion On setting out he declared "that he would not desist till he had set his standard upon the cliffs of Thurso, and subdued all that the king of Norway possessed to the westward of the German Ocean" [Matth Paris, p 550] The principal of these chiefs was Ewen, great-grandson of the first Somerled, lord of the Isles, and grandson of his eldest son Dugall, who held certain of the western islands under the king of Norway Ewen being the vassal of both sovereigns for different parts of his possessions, was placed in an awkward position between them, for if he consented to the demand of Alexander, he would only expose himself to the hostility of the Norwegian king, while if he refused it, he was sure to incur the vengeance of the king of Scots Ewen seems to have considered it the better policy to remain true to the king of Norway Alexander collected a great fleet and sailed for the western Islands, determined upon making every effort to obtain possession of them It appears that so great was the attention which was paid to the building of ships in those days, that not only was Alexander possessed of a considerable naval force, but even the Hebridean chiefs, whose principal business was piracy, then esteemed an honourable profession, had formidable fleets It is stated also that in 1231 Alan, lord of Galloway, who has been already mentioned, was able to fit out a fleet of a hundred and fifty ships, from his own territories, with which he drove Olave the Black, king of Man, from his dominions This may help to furnish some idea of the extent of the naval strength of Alexander the Second, when he set forth to the western Isles to bring them under his sway

Deeming it of the greatest consequence to gain over Ewen to his interest, he besought him to give up Kerneburgh, and other three castles, together with the lands which he held of Haco king of Norway, promising him that if he would come under his allegiance, he would reward him with many greater estates in Scotland, and take him into his confidence and favour All Ewen's relations and friends advised him to yield to the king of Scotland and relinquish his fealty to the Norwegian monarch, but the Island chief remained steadfast to his allegiance, and declared that he would not break his oath to King Haco [Skene's History of the Highlanders, vol ii p 51] Although, however, he is said to have refused all offers of compromise, he appears to have agreed to pay to Alexander an annual tribute of three hundred and twenty marks, [Ayloff's Calendars of Ancient Charters, p 336], doubtless for such portion of his possessions as was under the actual government of the king of Scots All our historians style this Ewen, Angus of Argyle, but this is evidently erroneous

Alexander was not destined to see the end of his expedition The subjection of the western Isles to the Scottish crown was reserved for his son and successor, Alexander III When preparing to invade these islands, and so far on his progress as the Sound of Mull, this brave and prudent monarch was attacked with a fever, of which he died July 8, 1249, at Kerrara, a small island lying off the bay of Oban, being at the time of his death in the 51st year of his age, and 31st of his reign A legend full of the superstitious feeling of the times, yet not without a certain degree of poetical interest, states that as Alexander lay in his bed there appeared to him three men, one of them dressed in royal garments, with a red face, squinting eyes, and a terrible aspect, the second was very young and beautiful with a costly dress, and the third was of larger stature than either, and of a still fiercer countenance than the first The last personage demanded of him whether he meant to subdue the islands, and on his answering in the affirmative he advised him to return home, a warning to which he paid no attention The three persons, says the tale, were supposed to be St Olave, St Magnus, and St Columba The latter certainly showed a most forgiving disposition in taking part with the two Norwegian saints, as the piratical invaders from Norway had always been bitter enemies of his monastery of Iona

All historians agree in giving Alexander the Second the character of a wise, prudent, and magnanimous prince Brave, and not unsuccessful in war, he was yet disposed to cultivate the blessings of peace His rule was firm and strict, and under his sway Scotland advanced in prosperity and civilization, so that at his death he left it a more powerful nation than it had ever been in any previous period of its history Though prompt and severe in the administration of justice, he was impartial and just, and his personal qualities were of that generous and popular nature which rendered him beloved equally by his nobility and people Twenty-five statutes of Alexander II were added to the code of Scottish laws, several of which, says Lord Hailes, require a commentary His body was buried before the altar of the abbey of Melrose

The burghs of Dumbarton and Dingwall are the only two which received charters from this monarch The former town had been resigned by Maldwin, earl of Lennox, into his hands, and in 1222 he erected it into a free royal burgh, with extensive privileges The latter was made a royal burgh by Alexander in 1227 To the church he was a generous benefactor, as he founded no fewer than eight monasteries for the mendicant friars of the order of St Dominic, called the Black Friars, namely, at Aberdeen, Ayr, Berwick, Edinburgh, Elgin, Inverness, Stirling, and Perth Boece, with his usual ingenuity, supposes that Alexander saw Dominic in France about the year 1217, but that was the year when he was deserted by the French prince Louis, and when Alexander was anxious to be reconciled to the Pope and to make peace with England There is no evidence that Alexander ever was in France Lord Hailes thus remarks on this conjecture of the inventive Boece "The sight of a living saint may have made an impression on his young mind but perhaps he considered the mendicant friars as the cheapest ecclesiastics His revenues could not supply the costly institution of Cistercians and canons regular in which his great-grandfather, David I, took delight" Some idea may be formed of the value of land in Scotland in Alexander the Second's reign, from the circumstance that the monks of Melrose purchased from Richard Barnard, a meadow at Farningdun, consisting of eight acres, at thirty-five marks taken from Anderson's Diplomata et Numismata, plate 31 Alexander is here represented clothed in a complete coat of mascled mail, protected by plates at the elbows The surcoat also first worn in England by King John, is thrown over his armour, another proof, as Tytler remarks of the progress of military fashions from England into Scotland at that period His shield is hollowed, so as to fit the body, and completely defend it The shield then in use in Scotland was the kite-shaped shield of the Normans, and previous to Alexander's time, it was plain and unornamented The emblazonment of the lion rampant, which had been chosen as his armorial bearing by his father William, surnamed the Lion, and which ever after formed the arms of Scotland, appeared on Alexander's shield for the first time In this he followed the example of Richard Cœur de Lion, who was the first to introduce into England heraldic emblazonments on the shield In the above seal, Alexander's horse has no defensive armour, but is ornamented with a fringed and tasselled border across the chest, and an embroidered saddlecloth, on which the lion rampant again appears The unicorns as supporters of the royal shield were added by the Stewarts to the arms of Scotland

ALEXANDER III, king of Scotland, the only son of the preceding and of his queen Mary de Couci, was born at Roxburgh castle, on the 4th of September 1241 He succeeded to the throne on the death of his father, 8th July 1249, being then in the ninth year of his age, and was crowned at Scone on the 13th of the same month This precipitancy was owing to the apprehension entertained by that portion of the Scottish nobles who were opposed to the English claim of supremacy over Scotland, that the English king Henry III, who esteemed himself the feudal superior of the Scottish sovereigns, would interfere in the arrangements preliminary to the young monarch's inauguration In this proceeding they not only flattered the popular sentiment but were actuated by a regard to the interest of their order, as the privileges of the Scottish barons and clergy, and especially that of independent heritable jurisdiction within their lands, was not only not enjoyed in England, but proved a serious check upon the royal authority and power, and any assimilation of the two countries in this respect was calculated to place their continued enjoyment of them in danger Of this party Walter Comyn, earl of Menteith, was the head Indeed, all the power of the kingdom was, at this time, chiefly in the hands of the Comyns, a family descended from Robert Comyn, a Norman knight from Northumberland, who came into Scotland in the time of David the First During the first years of Alexander's reign, (when, to use the words of Buchanan, "this family governed rather than obeyed him,") their influence in the administration of the country was characterized by a spirit of nationality and opposition to English interference in every shape that was or might be exhibited

On the day of the coronation, the bishops of St Andrews and Dunkeld, with the abbot of Scone, attended to officiate, when some of the counsellors, and among the rest, Alan Durward, the high justiciary, or lord chief justice, of Scotland, called also Ostiarius, and in the French l'Huissier, from his office as keeper of the palace gate or of the door of the king's chamber, objected to the young king being crowned so soon after his accession, on the grounds that "the day appointed for the ceremony was unlucky, and that the king, previous to his coronation, ought to receive the order of knighthood" Durward doubtless expected that, from his being at the head of the Scottish chivalry, as well as from having married a natural sister of the young king, the honour of knighting Alexander would devolve upon himself, but in this he was disappointed, as the earl of Menteith proposed that the bishop of St Andrews should both knight the king and place the crown on his head, citing the instance of William Rufus as having been knighted by Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury [Fordun, b x c 1] He also urged the danger of delay, as the English king, in a letter to the Pope, had solicited a mandate from his holiness to the young monarch of Scotland, that "being Henry's liegeman, he should not be anointed or crowned without his permission" He, therefore, strongly advised that the ceremony should be over before the Pope's answer could arrive Henry, it would appear, had also requested a grant of the tenth of the ecclesiastical revenues of Scotland Both requests were, however, rejected by the Pope, Innocent IV, the first as derogatory to the honour of a sovereign prince, and the second as without example [Fœdera, vol 1 p 163] It is extremely likely that, chagrined and disappointed at not getting the full extent of his claim as feudal superior recognised by the treaty of Newcastle in 1244, Henry had made this application to Rome before the death of Alexander the Second, to be prepared to assert it effectually when his successor came to the throne, as there could be no time to have done so in the short period, only five days, that elapsed between the accession and the coronation of Alexander the Third

The advice of the earl of Menteith was followed Without waiting for the result of Henry's application to the Pope, the Scottish nobles and prelates seated the young Alexander in the regal chair or sacred stone at Scone, which stood before the cross at the eastern end of the church, and invested him with the crown and sceptre and the other insignia of royalty The barons, in token of their homage, cast their mantles at the feet of their young sovereign, who previous to the ceremony had been by David Bernham, bishop of St Andrews, begirt with the belt of knighthood The coronation oath was read in Latin, and then explained in French, that being then the language of the court, clergy, nobility, and barons of Scotland as well as of England, and the various countries more immediately connected with France During the ceremonial an impressive incident occurred While the king sat upon the inaugural stone, the crown on his head and the sceptre in his hand, a white-haired Highland sennachy or bard, of great age, and clothed in a scarlet mantle, advanced from the crowd, and bending before the king, repeated in the Gaelic tongue, the genealogy of the youthful monarch, deducing his descent from the fabulous Gathelus, who, according to legendary lore, married Scota, the daughter of Pharaoh, and was the contemporary of Moses! Alexander, though he did not comprehend a word of this singular recitation, is said to have liberally rewarded the venerable genealogist, who thus unexpectedly introduced this Celtic usage at the coronation of a Scoto-Saxon monarch

The first act of the new reign, after the coronation of Alexander, was of a religious character, yet held at that period as of no less importance than the coronation itself The virtues of the pious queen Margaret, the wife of Malcolm Canmore, having become the subject of universal belief as well as of monastic biography, according to the superstition of that age her remains were believed to have the faculty of working miracles, and an application was made to the Pope in 1246, by Alexander II, to admit her into the calendar of the saints As the general reader is well aware, the evidence required to establish such a claim required to be full and distinct, and in the present instance, after a commission, consisting of the bishops of St Andrews, Dunkeld, and Dunblane had made a favourable report, it was found invalid, because it had not incorporated the evidence of the witnesses, and a new commission was issued If we can only get over the difficulty as to whether the class of miracles on which such claims are founded are to be admitted as provable by any human testimony whatever, the most sceptical must admit that the evidence generally, such as it might be, was both abundant and strict In consequence of these delays, it was not till 1249 that Queen Margaret became, as a canonized saint, the object of ecclesiastical dedication, and the abbey of Dunfermline, called after her name, had her bones "transferred" from the place were they were originally deposited "in the rude altar of the kirk of Dunfermline" to the choir of the abbey church The young king Alexander III with his mother, and a large assembly of nobles and clergy, were present at the ceremony Robert de Keldelicht, the abbot, raised to the dignity of the mitre in 1244 in a bull, the terms of which are preserved in the registry, granted at the special request of Alexander II, saw the reward of his ambition and donations to the legate The remains were placed in a silver sarcophagus, which the chroniclers state was adorned with precious stones So interesting a scene could not take place without a miracle The body of the wife refused to be translated until that of her husband had been first lifted to the intended spot, then

The next proceeding of the new government was to change the stamp of the Scottish coin, the cross, which previously was confined to the inner circle being now extended to the circumference This took place in 1250 The coins of this reign were pennies and half-pennies of silver, but though these only were issued, other denominations of money were named in accounting, as the shilling, the merk, and the pound, while foreign coins, which were from time to time imported by the merchants, were allowed to be current in the kingdom To give some idea of the value of the Scottish silver penny, it may be stated that ten of them were equal to half a crown of our present money Five pence was the yearly rent paid to the king by the burgesses of every royal burgh, for each rood of land possessed under burgh privileges The vassal of a thane, or of any other subject, was fined in fifteen ewes, or six shillings, for disobeying the king's summons to join the royal army Money was common only in the burghs, at markets and fairs, and through the more populous and cultivated parts of the kingdom In secluded districts, cattle were more frequently referred to, as a common measure of value [Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ, with Ruddiman's Introduction]

In 1251 some measures appear to have been employed by those at the head of affairs in Scotland for circumscribing, or at least for defining the limits of the power of the clergy, as the Pope directed a bull to the bishops of Lincoln, Worcester, and Litchfield in England, requiring them to examine into the abuses said to prevail in Scotland, and on these delegates he conferred ample powers of excommunication [Chartulary of Moray, 130] Lord Hailes, who has printed this bull in full in the appendix to the first volume of his Annals of Scotland, thinks it probable that it was never transmitted to the English bishops, no historian having made any mention of it

The state of the kingdom at this time was unfavourable to the continuance of that peace and prosperity in which the firm and prudent administration of Alexander the Second had left it at his death The king was a minor, and exposed to the continual demands of the sovereign of England for a recognition of his claim of feudal superiority, while the nobles, instead of joining together and acting in unison for the common welfare, were engaged against each other in a factious struggle for power They were divided into two great parties The one, composed of the potent family of the Comyns and their adherents, among whom was John de Balliol, lord of Galloway, were masters of the government The chiefs of the other party were Patrick Cospatrick, earl of March and Dunbar, Malise, earl of Strathearne, Niel or Nigel, earl of Carrick, Alexander, the steward of Scotland, Robert Bruce, lord of Annandale, and Alan Durward, the high justiciary The latter party acted all along in alliance with Henry III of England, who, by the marriage of his daughter to Alexander, soon obtained a fair pretext for interfering in the affairs of Scotland

As stated in the life of Alexander the Second, (ante, p 77,) the young prince his son had been betrothed when only a year old to Henry's eldest daughter, Margaret, who was about the same age, and their nuptials, although neither of them had reached their eleventh year, were solemnized at York, 26th December 1251, amidst circumstances of extraordinary splendour Besides the bride's father and mother, King Henry and his queen, the mother of the young bridegroom, Mary de Couci, the queen-dowager of Scotland, with a train worthy of her high station, was present at the nuptials, [Rymer, vol i edition 1816, p 278,] having come for the purpose from France, whither she appears to have returned soon after the death of Alexander the Second There were also present the nobility and the dignified clergy of both countries, and in their suite a numerous assemblage of vassals According to Matthew Paris, a thousand knights, in robes of silk, waited upon the princess at her bridal, and the primate of York contributed six hundred oxen, as part of the marriage feast, which, says the matter-of-fact chronicler, "were all spent upon the first course" With the hand of his daughter Henry gave the promise of a dowry of 5,000 merks, [Fœdera i 467,] which, however, was not paid till several years afterwards

In the midst of the marriage festivities, Alexander, according to custom, did homage to Henry for the lands which he held in England, but on his father-in-law requiring him to render fealty for his kingdom of Scotland, "according to the usage recorded in many chronicles," Alexander, by the advice of his council, returned this prudent answer "I have been invited to York to marry the princess of England, not to treat of affairs of state, and I cannot take a step of so much importance without the knowledge and approbation of my parliament" [Matth Paris, p 829] This famous reply, there cannot be a question, was dictated by the Comyns, whose policy at that period was strictly national, and against the claims of England The word parliament as here used must be taken with the limitation of meaning pointed out in the life of Alexander the Second (ante, p 66) It signifies no more than the states of the kingdom, that is a meeting of the regents and counsellors of the king, with the nobles, crown vassals, and superior clergy Under the feudal system all vassals of the crown, holding their possessions and privileges by the tenure of fixed and certain services, were entitled to receive the royal summons to sit in parliament, as it would now be called, whenever the necessities of the kingdom compelled the king to demand their advice and assistance for his direction and support in providing for the common welfare of the realm

While the young king remained at York, Alan Durward, the high justiciary of Scotland, who had accompanied him, and who by virtue of his office was one of his chief counsellors, was accused by Henry himself [Hailes' Annals, vol i p 164] of a design against the Scottish crown, "for that he and his associates had sent messengers, accompanied with presents, to the Pope, soliciting the legitimation of his daughters by the king's sister whereby, in the event of the king's death, they might succeed as lawful heirs of the kingdom of Scotland" Balfour in his Annals, [vol i p 59,] says that "as conscious to this plot were accused likewise Walter Comyn, earl of Menteith, William Comyn, earl of Mar, and Robert, abbot of Dunfermline, chancellor of Scotland, who was accused that he had passed a legitimation under the great seal to the king's base sister, the wife of Alan, earl of Athole, great justiciary of Scotland" The story is taken from the Chronicle of Melrose Whether there was any foundation for the accusation or not, it is certain that the chancellor hastily left the English court, where he had been with the young king, and returning to Scotland, resigned the seals, quitted his abbey, and assumed the habit of a monk at Newbottle, in Mid Lothian, [Chr Melr 219,] and that Henry, on the return of Alexander and his queen into Scotland, sent with them Geoffrey de Langley, keeper of the royal forests, to act in concert with the Scottish nobles, as guardian of the young king, but he proved so insolent and rapacious that he was soon dismissed [Matth Paris, 571] Tytler says, but without giving any authority, that the accusers of Durward were the earls of Menteith and Mar, and that Henry placed these noblemen at the head of the new appointment of guardians to the young king, which he made at this time [Hist of Scotland, vol i p 9] It is not improbable that Henry's object in bringing this accusation against the popular and potent Alan Durward was as much to remove so dangerous a rival from about the person of the queen, as to obtain the services of so accomplished a soldier and so expert a leader, in his wars in Guienne, which he was conscious he had no means of securing otherwise than by driving him into a sort of banishment from his country, under a charge of meditated treason, not easily repelled Two years after these transactions, the Pope, having induced Henry to embark in a project for the conquest of Naples, or as it was called, Sicily on this side the Faro, levied a tenth on all ecclesiastical benefices in England for three years, and in 1254 granted to Henry a twentieth of the ecclesiastical revenues of Scotland for the same term, which grant was renewed in 1255 for one year more, to be employed by the English king, as asserted by the chroniclers of the period, in the expenses of an expedition to the Holy Land [Chr Mel i 30 Fœdera, vol i 467] We rather think, however, that while this was the pretext, the money thus received from Scotland for four years was by Henry intended to be applied, and was in fact expended, in a fruitless endeavour to secure the crown of Sicily for his second son Edmond, which had been promised him by the Pope [Fœdera, vol i p 502, 512, 530]

At this time the Comyn party appear to have been in full possession of the government Robert de Ros and John de Baliol, two of their friends, had the name of regents In 1254 Simon de Montfort, the great earl of Leicester, the same powerful nobleman who, four years afterwards, attempted to wrest the sceptre from Henry's hand, was sent into Scotland, charged with a secret mission from Henry [Fœdera, vol i p 523], the precise nature or object of which can only be conjectured from subsequent events In the following year complaints were sent from the young queen to the English court, that she was confined in the solitary castle of Edinburgh, "a place without verdure, and owing to its vicinity to the sea unwholesome," that she was not permitted to make excursions through the kingdom or to choose her female attendants, and that, although both she and Alexander had completed their fourteenth year, she was still secluded from the society of her husband Henry had all along been in communication with the discontented nobles who were opposed to the Comyn party having possession of the government, and there can be no doubt that while he professed to interfere only for the good of his daughter, he fanned their mutual jealousies and animosities, and gave his countenance and support to their proceedings He declared that he would protect them against the enemies of the king and the gainsayers of Queen Margaret, and promised to make no attempt to seize the person or impair the dignity of the king, and that he would never consent to the dissolution of his marriage with the queen [Fœdera, vol i p 559] The particular causes of such a declaration are said by our historians to be unknown [Hailes' Annals, v i p 165], and to be involved in much obscurity [Tytler's History of Scotland, vol i p 11], but there can be no doubt that when Henry engaged to support the interests of the party favourable to his claim as feudal superior over Scotland, and was preparing to interfere actively in the overthrow of those ministers who were opposed to it, he had found it necessary to make some declaration of the kind to satisfy them that his interference in Scottish affairs was meant to go no farther than a mere change in the party administering the government

Alan Durward, who was serving with the English army in Guienne, had gained, by his military talents and address, the favour of the fickle monarch of England, and by his advice Henry sent Richard de Clare earl of Gloucester, and John Maunsell, his chief secretary, to Scotland, ostensibly to relieve the young queen from the real or pretended durance of which she complained, but in reality to assist the discontented nobles in their efforts to overturn the Comyns, and place the government in their own hands While the re gents and their protectors the earls of Menteith and Mar were engaged in preparations for holding a meeting of the estates at Stirling, Gloucester, in concert with the earls of Carrick, March, and Strathearne, surprised the castle of Edinburgh, restored the king and queen to liberty, and allowed them free conjugal intercourse [Chr Melr p 220 Matth Paris, p 908] To aid this enterprise, Henry assembled a numerous army, and as he led it towards the borders, he issued from Newcastle, August 25, 1255, a proclamation declaring that in this progress to visit his dear son Alexander, he did not design anything prejudicial to the rights of the king, or the liberties of Scotland [Fœdera, vol i pp 560, 561] The young king and queen were immediately conveyed to the north of England, and had an interview with Henry at Werk castle in Northumberland Their safe conduct bore, "that they and their retinue should not tarry in England, unless with the general approbation of the Scottish nobility" [Fœdera, vol i p 562] Henry, soon after, visited Alexander at Roxburgh, within his own territories

At the abbey of Kelso, whither the two kings had repaired with great pomp, a new regency was appointed, 20th September 1255 This proceeding was said to be by the advice of the English king, but there can be no doubt that these entire transactions were under his express direction or rather control and management throughout The party of the Comyns were removed from the king's council and all their employments in the state Those among them who were particularly named were Gamelin, chancellor of Scotland and bishop-elect of St Andrews, William de Bondington, bishop of Glasgow, Clement, bishop of Dunblane, Walter Comyn, earl of Menteith, Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan, William de Mar, earl of Mar, John de Balliol, Robert de Ros, John Comyn, and William Wishart, archdeacon of St Andrews, of which see he was afterwards bishop [Fœdera, vol i pp 565, 567 Chr Melr p 221] The English faction, as the earl of March and his friends were accounted, to the number of fifteen, were appointed regents of the kingdom and guardians of the king and queen [Fœdera, vol i p 566] The following are their names Richard Inverkeithen, bishop of Dunkeld, Peter de Ramsay, bishop of Aberdeen, Malcolm Macduff, earl of Fife, Patrick Cospatrick, earl of March and Dunbar, Malise, earl of Stratherne, Nigel, earl of Carrick, Alexander, the steward of Scotland, Robert de Brus, Alan Durward, Walter de Moray, David de Lindsay, William de Brechin, Robert de Meyners Gilbert de Hay, Hugh Gifford de Yester The government thus new modelled was to subsist for seven years, that is, till Alexander should have attained the age of twenty-one, and vacancies in the regency were to be supplied by the surviving regents Alexander declared that he would not restore the Comyn party to favour until they had atoned for their offences against the king of England as well as against himself, except in the event of Scotland's being invaded by a foreign enemy, when they might be again taken into favour To Henry he promised that he would treat his daughter with conjugal affection and all due honour, and to the regents that he would ratify all their public acts and reasonable grants Patrick, earl of March and Dunbar, swore upon the king's soul, a customary form of oath in those days, that these engagements should be fulfilled, and Alexander subjected himself to the papal censures should he fail in performance The instrument drawn up on the occasion was deposited in the hands of the English king [Fœdera, vol i p 567] It was considered by the Scottish party in general as derogatory to the dignity of the kingdom, and Bondington, bishop of Glasgow, Gamelin, bishop elect of St Andrews, and the earl of Menteith, indignantly refused to affix their seals to a deed which, as they asserted, compromised the liberties of the country, and was prejudicial to the honour of the king [Chr Melr p 221] Winton (book vii chap x) says of it

> "There wes made swylk ordynans,
> That wes gret grefe and displesans
> Till of Scotland ye thre states, > Burgens, Barownys, and Prelatis"

Before returning to England, Henry, with the view of raising money, proceeded to take cognizance of the offences of the late regents John de Balliol and Robert de Ros As they both possessed estates in England, he held them to be amenable to his courts, even on a vague charge of disrespect and disloyalty to Alexander and his queen John de Baliol obtained his pardon by the payment of a large fine, but Robert de Ros, to whom the castle of Werk belonged, not appearing to his summons, was deprived of his lands in England, which were confiscated by Henry [Matth Paris, p 611]

The tranquillity of the kingdom being thus, in the meantime, in some degree restored, the young king and queen, attended by a retinue of three hundred horse, visited the court of England in August 1256, and were royally entertained at London, Woodstock, and Oxford On the second of September of that year Alexander was invested by his father-in-law in the earldom of Huntingdon as a fief held by his ancestors [Matth Paris, p 626] As a farther mark of his affection Henry issued orders to all his military tenants in the five northern counties to assist the king of Scotland with all their forces [Fœdera, vol i p 605] He farther declared that the grant which he himself had obtained from the Pope of a twentieth of the ecclesiastical revenues of Scotland should never be urged as a precedent to the hurt of the nation

The late settlement of the government having been brought about by English influence, was generally unpopular in Scotland, and did not last longer than about two years "The greater part," says Buchanan, [vol vii p 60,] "of the nobility and the ecclesiastical order, their power being curtailed by the new ordinances, stigmatized them as an English thraldom and a commencement of slavery" The Comyns, taking advantage of this feeling, and working upon the sensitive national jealousy of England, now endeavoured to regain their former position in the government That party was still powerful, there being at this time in the kingdom three earls and thirty-three barons of the name, [see COMYN, surname of], and the number of their retainers, assisted by the forces of the other patriotic nobles, backed by the influence of Gamelin, late chancellor and bishop elect of St Andrews, enabled the Comyns to present a formidable opposition to the regency Gamelin had, towards the close of 1255, procured himself to be consecrated by William de Bondington, bishop of Glasgow, in direct opposition to an injunction of the regents For this act of disobedience he was outlawed, and the revenues of his see were seized [Chron Melr p 221] Gamelin immediately hastened to Rome and appealed to the Pope, who espoused his cause, declared him worthy of his bishopric, and excommunicated his accusers, ordering the sentence to be solemnly published in Scotland by Clement bishop of Dunblane and the abbots of Melrose and Jedburgh [Ibid] Enraged at the bold opposition of Gamelin, Henry, to whom the Pope had addressed an imperious letter, on his behalf, prohibited his return, and issued orders for his arrest, if he attempted to land in England [Fœdera, vol i p 652]

In the meantime the Comyns received a powerful accession to their cause in the support given to them by Mary de Couci, the mother of the young king, who in 1257 returned to Scotland That princess had, during her residence in France, taken for her second husband John de Brienne, the son of Guy of Lusignan, the titular king of Jerusalem After the male line of Godfrey of Boullon had become extinct the sceptre of Jerusalem was held by Sybilla the daughter of Baldwin and granddaughter of Fulk, count of Anjou, grandfather of Henry the Second of England Having such an adversary as Saladin the Great to contend with, Queen Sybilla, to strengthen her hands, found it necessary to marry one of the bravest of the knights then engaged in her service, and the husband she made choice of was Guy de Lusignan, the father of John de Brienne, a prince of a handsome person but of no very honourable renown Although he lost his kingdom by the invasion of Saladin in 1187, he was still acknowledged by all the Christians as king of Jerusalem

The queen-dowager was accompanied to Scotland by her second husband, and supported by their influence the Comyns and their party acquired strength enough to effect a counter-revolution in the government It was now considered a favourable time to publish the sentence of excommunication which had been procured from the pope against the enemies of bishop Gamelin The awful ceremony was performed by the bishop of Dunblane and the abbots of Jedburgh and Melrose, the delegates of the Pope, in the abbey church of Cambuskenneth, and repeated 'by bell and candle' in every chapel in the kingdom [Chr Melr p 182] The Comyns hereupon declared that the king was now in the hands of persons accursed, and that the kingdom was in immediate danger of papal interdiction, and under the pretext of rescuing the king from such a state of things, and relieving him from the control of foreigners who, they said, filled all the highest offices of the state, they assembled in great strength, and headed by the earl of Menteith, they during the night attacked the court at Kinross, seized the person of the king while in bed, and carried him and the queen before morning to Stirling They obtained at the same time possession of the great seal of the kingdom The king and queen were kept separate till the party of the regents were dispersed [Matth Paris, p 644] The charge they brought against the young queen was that "she had incited her father, the king of England, to come against them with an army in a hostile manner, and make a miserable havoc" in the country [Ibid p 821] To strengthen their interest, the Comyns concluded an alliance with Lewellyn prince of Wales, who was then (1257) at war with England, whither Alan Durward had precipitately fled Taking the young king with them, the forces of the Comyns marched southward to the borders, where it would appear the adherents of the late government had rallied and collected their strength A negotiation was set on foot which led to a compromise between the rival factions at Roxburgh, the leaders of the defeated party agreeing to refer all disputes to a conference to be held at Forfar This, however, was only an expedient to gain time, as the latter retired into England, and the earls of Albemarle and Hereford, with John de Baliol, were soon after sent by Henry to Melrose, where Alexander held his court for the time Although their avowed object was to mediate between the two factions, their real intention was to seize, if possible, the person of the king, and carry him to England Past experience, however, had led the Comyns to distrust their professions, and the person of Alexander was removed from the abbey of Melrose to the forest of Jedburgh, where the greater part of the Scottish forces had already assembled

The king of England, obliged to suppress for the present his bitter opposition to bishop Gamelin, and to be silent regarding the obnoxious treaty of Roxburgh, was thus constrained to accede to the appointment of a new regency, consisting of ten persons, six of them being of the Comyn faction, with four of the former regents This took place in 1258 At the head of the new regency, which may be said to have governed the country till the king came of age, were placed the queen-dowager and her husband The regents were, Mary the queen-dowager, John of Brienne, her husband, Gamelin, bishop of St Andrews, Walter Comyn, earl of Menteith, Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan, and William, earl of Mar Their colleagues were, Alexander, the steward of Scotland, Robert de Meyners, Gilbert de Hay, and Alan Durward [Matth Paris, p 644 Fœdera, vol i p 670] Soon after, Walter earl of Menteith, one of the regents and the soul of the national party, died suddenly In England it was reported that his death was occasioned by a fall from his horse In Scotland it was believed that he had been poisoned by his wife, countess in her own right, that she might be free to indulge a guilty passion for one John Russel, an English knight, called by Boece an obscure Englishman, whom, disregarding the addresses of the Scottish nobles, she somewhat precipitately married The suspicion of her guilt, perhaps groundlessly excited by the slighted suitors, was employed as a pretext for depriving her and her second husband of the earldom, driving them in disgrace from the kingdom, and at last dividing the inheritance between her heirs and those of her younger sister The latter had married Walter Stewart, called Bailloch or "the freckled," a younger brother of the steward of Scotland, who laid claim to the earldom of Menteith in right of his wife, and by the favour of those in power obtained and kept it [Fordun, x 11 Fœdera, ii p 1082]

It was the policy of the court of Rome in that age, when it asserted a right over all kingdoms and grasped at power wherever it could be claimed, to secure all ecclesiastical patronages to itself, and scarcely was the dispute relative to the regency settled when Alexander found himself likely to be involved in a difference with the Roman pontiff The bishopric of Glasgow becoming vacant by the death of William de Bondington, Alexander in 1259 bestowed it upon Nicholas Moffat, archdeacon of Teviotdale, one of his own subjects Disregarding the king's appointment, the Pope, Alexander IV, gave the vacant see to his chaplain, John de Cheyam, an Englishman, and archdeacon of Bath Sensible, however, that this step would prove disagreeable to the young Scottish monarch, he requested the king of England to use his good offices with his son-in-law, to receive Cheyam, and put him in possession of his temporalities "Although he is my subject," said Henry to the king of Scots, "I would not solicit you in his behalf, could any benefit arise to you from your opposition to a man on whom the Pope has already bestowed ecclesiastical jurisdiction" Alexander thought fit prudently to acquiesce in the Pope's nomination, but though Cheyam was kindly enough received at the Scottish court, the bishop himself knew that he was obnoxious to the government, and he took the first opportunity of leaving the kingdom, and enjoying the revenues of his see abroad [Fœdera, vol i p 683 Chr Melr p 222] Satisfied with Alexander's apparent submission to his wishes, the Pope recalled certain angry mandates which he had issued against him and his kingdom

In 1260, Alexander, who had then attained his twentieth year, was invited by his father-in-law to visit him with his queen at London Whatever may have been the motive of this invitation, the manner in which it was conveyed filled the regents and nobility of Scotland with suspicion as to the ulterior intentions of Henry It appears that he sent to Alexander for the purpose a monk of St Albans, who arrived at a time when the king and his nobles were assembled in council, to whom he declined to impart the special objects for which the meeting was desired by the English monarch, further than that it was to treat of matters of great importance Two of the regents, Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan, and Alan Durward the justiciary, with William Wishart, chancellor of the kingdom, were despatched on a secret mission into England, to exact pledges from Henry as to his behaviour towards the young king while at his court The conditions on which Alexander and his queen consented to visit England on this occasion were, that during his residence at the English court neither the king nor his attendants should be required to treat of state affairs, and that if the queen of Scotland became pregnant, or if she gave birth to a child during her stay with her father, neither she nor her infant were to be detained in England To the latter stipulation particularly Henry gave his solemn oath [Fœdera, vol i pp 713, 714]

Thus secured, Alexander, attended by a large concourse of the nobility, proceeded, in October 1260, to the court of England The young queen followed him by slow stages, and on her approach to St Albans, she was met by her younger brother Edmond, then a mere youth, who with a splendid retinue conducted her to London Their reception was unusually magnificent, but Alexander, young as he was, did not allow the festivities which marked the occasion to divert his mind from two objects which had been strong inducements with him to comply with King Henry's invitation He wished to exercise his rights over the earldom of Huntingdon, which he held of the English crown, as well as to obtain payment of his wife's marriage portion, which had been too long delayed In this last matter, however, he was disappointed The authority of the English monarch had been now for nearly two years usurped by the twenty-four barons, at the head of whom was Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, and Henry's exchequer was in too impoverished a state to allow him to discharge the debt at this time

It was agreed that the queen should remain in England until she gave birth to the child of which she was then pregnant, and Henry entered into a solemn engagement that, in the event of the death of Alexander, he would deliver up the child to the following Scottish bishops and nobles to be conveyed to Scotland, namely, the bishops of St Andrews, Aberdeen, Dunblane, and Galloway, and to Malcolm, earl of Fife, Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan, Malise, earl of Strathearne, Patrick, earl of March and Dunbar, William, earl of Mar, John Comyn, Alexander, the steward of Scotland, Alan Durward, and Hugh de Abernethy, or to any three of them This list would seem to indicate that the two rival factions into which the nation had been so long divided had at last united to resist English interference in the domestic affairs of Scotland Alexander now returned to his own kingdom, and in the succeeding February (1261) the young queen was delivered at Windsor of a daughter named Margaret, afterwards married to Eric king of Norway [Fœdera, vol i p 713 Chr Mel p 223] With regard to the dowry promised with the queen it may be stated that in 1262 Alexander sent the steward of Scotland to England to demand payment of it from Henry He paid an instalment of five hundred marks, which drained his treasury, and promised to make payment of the remainder at Michaelmas 1263 and Easter 1264 "I appoint such distant terms," he said, "because I mean to be punctual, and not to disappoint you any more" The marriage portion of the princess of England was in fact not all paid till some time after this, and only in small partial payments [Ibid]

Alexander having now (1262) arrived at full age, took the reins of government into his own hands, and in the administration of affairs he showed both prudence and courage Combining the zeal, but tempered with discretion, for national independence which had characterized the Comyns, with something of the friendly disposition towards England which had been the most marked feature in the policy of their opponents, this strong-willed monarch was able at once to shake himself loose from the tutelage of either party, and to conduct the government in his own person, according to his own views and judgment His first important undertaking after he came of age, was to accomplish the subjection to his sway of the chiefs of the western islands, an object which death had prevented his father, Alexander the Second, from effecting, although as related (ante, p 78), he had prepared an expedition for the purpose The king of Norway, at this time, held unquestioned possession of the Orkneys and the Shetland Isles, and claimed also to rule over the Hebrides In 1255 the possessions of Angus Macdonald, lord of Islay, the descendant of Reginald, a son of Somerled, lord of the Isles, were ravaged by Alexander, because he would not consent to renounce his fealty to the king of Norway, and he was thus compelled to become a vassal of Scotland In 1262, Henry, the English king, interposed his good offices to prevent a rupture between Haco, king of Norway and Alexander, as to the possession of the Islands [Fœdera, vol i p 753], which were remarkable at that period for their prosperous condition, their crowded population, and their advanced state of civilization Haco returned an evasive answer, and after an unsuccessful embassy to the Norwegian court, Alexander determined upon at once endeavouring to bring the Islands under his sovereignty For this purpose he instigated William, earl of Ross, at that time, says Skene, the most powerful nobleman in Scotland, and whose great possessions extended over the mainland opposite to the northern isles, to commence hostilities against them This William was the son of Ferchard who acted such a prominent part in the reign of Alexander the Second (see pp 70 and 72) Ferchard was surnamed Gilleamias, "the priest's son,"—whence Ammas or Ross, the family name,—descended from a noble who figured amongst the earls that besieged Malcolm IV in Perth in the year 1160 [See Ross Earldom of] Being joined by the Mathiesons, and other powerful dependents, the earl suddenly crossed over to the Isle of Skye, where he ravaged the country, burned villages and churches, and put great numbers, both of men and women, to the sword [Skene's Highlanders of Scotland, vol ii p 52] The Norse Chronicles relate, that in their wanton fury his soldiers raised little children on the points of their spears, and shook them till they fell down to their hands The complaints of the island chiefs of the atrocities committed by their savage invaders determined Haco to fit out an expedition to revenge the injuries offered to his vassals

He accordingly repaired to Bergen to superintend in person the preparations of this armament These were so vast and so threatening as to spread alarm, as to its destination and objects, even upon the coasts of England When all was complete, he sailed from Herlover, on July 7, 1263 His own ship, described as having been entirely of oak, was of larger size than the rest, having twenty-seven banks of oars, that is, twenty-seven seats for the rowers. It is also said to have been ornamented with richly carved dragons, overlaid with gold [Norse Account of the Expedition, with Johnstone's Notes, p 25] The Norwegian fleet reached the Shetland Isles within two days, whence steering for the Orkneys, Haco proposed to despatch a squadron of light vessels to ravage the south-eastern coasts of Scotland, but the principal nobles and knights on board his fleet declined to proceed unless he himself went with them, and he was constrained to bear up for Ronaldsvoe, now Ronaldshay, the most southern of the Orcadian group, situated about six miles from Duncansby head, on the coast of Caithness, and near to the mouth of the Pentland frith Here he remained at anchor for some weeks, during which he levied contributions upon, and exacted tribute from, the inhabitants both of the neighbouring islands and of the opposite mainland of Caithness, a district which appears to have been reduced under the Scottish sway in the interval between the death of Alexander the Second and the arrival of Haco It is recorded in the Norse Chronicle of the expedition that, while the fleet lay at Ronaldsvoe, "a great darkness drew over the sun, so that only a little ring was bright round his orb," which precisely fixes the date of this great invasion, as the remarkable phenomenon of an annular eclipse has been ascertained to have been seen at Ronaldsvoe on the 5th of August 1263

Haco now sailed to the south Crossing the Pentland frith, his galleys proceeded by the Lewes to Skye, where he was joined by the squadron of Magnus king of Man Holding on his course to the Sound of Mull, Dugal of Lorn, the son of Ronald, the son of Reginald MacSomerled, and other Hebridean chiefs, united their forces to his, so that he soon found himself at the head of a fleet of above a hundred sail, most of them vessels of considerable size Though far from being of the dimensions of the vessels of war of our day, these craft of Norway and the island chiefs were very formidable in piratical excursions Dividing his force, he sent one powerful squadron, under Magnus and Dugal, to ravage the Mull of Kintyre, and lay waste the estates of those chiefs who had submitted to Alexander, while another was despatched to reduce the isles of Arran and Bute, in the frith of Clyde The comprehensive name of the Hebrides comprised in those days not only the numerous islands and islets extending along nearly all the west coast of Scotland, but also the peninsula of Kintyre, the islands of the Clyde, and even for some time the Isle of Man With the remainder of his fleet Haco cast anchor at Gigha, a little island between the coast of Kintyre and Islay While he lay here he was met by the island chief Ewen, mentioned in the life of Alexander the Second (page 77), as having refused to withdraw his allegiance from Norway, when that monarch in 1249 set out on his expedition against the western islands Since then he seems to have reflected on the hazard of holding out against the king of Scotland, as he subsequently, although at what period does not appear, swore fealty to his successor, and on Haco's desiring him to follow his banner, he excused himself, on the ground that he had sworn an oath to the Scottish king, and that he had more lands of him than of the Norwegian monarch He therefore entreated King Haco to dispose of all those estates which he had conferred upon him Haco was satisfied with his reasoning, and after bestowing presents on him dismissed him honourably The regulo or petty chiefs of the Hebrides were in those remote times called kings, and accordingly Ewen is called King John by Tytler, who evidently assumed that Ewen is the Celtic name of John, [History of Scotland, vol i p 25], and King Ewen by Skene [History of the Highlanders, vol ii p 52]

The politic example of Ewen was not followed by the other island chiefs who had owned allegiance to Alexander, for Haco was soon after joined by Angus lord of Islay and South Kintyre, who had submitted to Alexander only eight years before (p 88), giving his infant son as a hostage, and agreeing, by a formal instrument, that his whole territories should be forfeited, if he ever deserted, and even by Murchard, a vassal of the earl of Menteith in North Kintyre, who had obtained this district from the baron to whom it had been granted by Alexander the Second [Skene's Highlanders, vol ii p 53] Roderic, the Norwegian leader, who had been despatched to reduce Bute, took the strong castle of Rothesay, its garrison having capitulated, part of whom he savage-

ly murdered He then laid waste the island, and carried fire and sword throughout the adjoining districts of Scotland After sending a force under Sigurd, a Hebridean chief, to the assistance of the Ostmen, or descendants of the Danes settled on the eastern coasts of Ireland, who were anxious to throw off the English yoke, Haco, with his fleet, the greater part of which had now rejoined him, sailed round the point of Kintyre, and entering the frith of Clyde, anchored in the Sound of Kilbrannan, which lies between the island of Arran and the mainland

By this time the Norwegian fleet had increased to a hundred and sixty sail, and the danger of a descent on the Scottish coasts became imminent In this emergency Alexander despatched a deputation of Barefooted friars with overtures of peace to Haco, in consequence of which five Norwegian commissioners were sent to the Scottish court to arrange the preliminaries, when a truce was agreed upon The defenceless state of the western and south-western portions of Scotland made the gaining of time a matter of the first importance to Alexander until an army could be collected sufficiently strong to repel the invaders Alexander offered to resign to Haco the sovereignty of all the western or Hebridean isles, claiming as belonging to Scotland only those of Arran, Bute, and the two Cumbrays, in the frith of Clyde [Norse Account of the Expedition, p 71] These moderate terms of the king of Scotland were refused by Haco, who carried his fleet across the frith to Millport Bay Although the coast of Ayrshire was now open to a descent from his fleet, Haco, in consideration of the existing truce, restrained his followers from plunder, but provisions becoming scarce, the officers of the expedition earnestly entreated him for permission to land, that they might obtain by seizure supplies for the ships Thus pressed, Haco despatched a last envoy to Alexander, of the name of Kolbein Rich, with the following chivalric proposal "That the sovereigns should meet amicably at the head of their armies, and treat regarding a peace, which if, by the grace of God, it took place, it was well, but if the attempt at negotiation failed, the ambassador was to throw down the gauntlet from Norway, to challenge the Scottish monarch to debate the matter with his army in the field, and let God, in his pleasure, determine the victory" Alexander was too wary to accept the challenge, although, says the Norse Chronicle, he "seemed in no respect unwilling to fight," and the truce was declared at an end [Norse Account of the Expedition, p 75]

A fleet of sixty vessels, under the command of Magnus king of Man, and with him four Hebridean chiefs and two principal Norwegian officers, was now despatched by Haco, across the Clyde to Loch Long, where they took to their boats, and dragging them across the neck of land between Arrochar on the west and Tarbet on the east, which separates the salt and the fresh water lochs, they carried havoc and destruction through the numerous islands on Loch Lomond Sturlas, a Norwegian poet, thus celebrates this exploit "The persevering shielded warriors of the thrower of the whizzing spear drew their boats across the broad isthmus Our fearless troops, the exactors of contribution, with flaming brands, wasted the populous islands in the lake and the mansions around its winding bays" A devastating expedition into Stirlingshire followed under another leader, who returned to the ships loaded with booty Haco had now to contend with the storms and tempests of the end of autumn, which had been counted upon by the Scots as likely to bring wreck and disaster to the invaders Ten of their best ships were lost by a storm in Loch Long, and on the first of October, while the main fleet of Haco lay at anchor in the capacious and usually well-sheltered bay between the island of Cumbray and the mainland of Ayrshire, it was overtaken by a tempest of so severe and protracted a character, the wind blowing right up the frith and sound upon his fleet, that the superstitious Norwegians ascribed its extreme violence to the powers of enchantment [Norse Account of the Expedition, pp 81, 87] The galley of the king was in imminent peril, and several vessels were stranded The storm increasing, Haco rowed to one of the Cumbray islands, and caused mass to be chaunted amid the roaring of the elements, in the hope that the dreaded powers of magic might be neutralized by the services of religion Still the tempest continued and his own ship, with five other galleys, was cast ashore, while those of the fleet that still rode out the gale, though mostly dismasted or otherwise disabled, were driven violently up the channel towards Largs [Ibid p 85]

The Scots collected on the surrounding heights watched with intense interest the dispersion of the invading armament, and crowding to the beach, immediately attacked with fury the crews of the Norwegian ships as they were successively driven ashore The Norwegians defended themselves with great intrepidity, and Haco, taking advantage of a lull in the storm, succeeded in sending in boats with reinforcements to their relief, when the Scots deemed it expedient to retire, but only to return again at night to plunder the stranded vessels, among which were two transports At daydawn next morning Haco landed with a large force, and ordered the transports to be lightened and towed to sea, with those vessels which had not been totally wrecked The rays of the rising sun now shone upon the Scots army mustered on the heights above the village of Largs, and as it descended from the high grounds towards the beach it had truly a formidable appearance It was led by the king in person, along with Alexander the steward of Scotland, the grandfather of the first sovereign of the name of Stuart who occupied the Scottish throne, and consisted of a numerous body of foot-soldiers, well accoutred and armed for the most part with bows and spears, with a force of fifteen hundred horsemen, chiefly knights and barons, many of them with their Spanish steeds sheathed in complete armour All the horses had breastplates The Norwegians on shore numbered little more than nine hundred men, commanded by three principal leaders Two hundred of them, under Ogmund Krakidauts, occupied a rising ground in advance of the main body, which were posted on the beach With the former was Haco, who, on the approach of the Scottish army, was anxiously entreated by his chiefs to row out to the fleet and send them reinforcements The king insisted on remaining on shore, but they would not consent to his exposing his life unnecessarily, and he returned in his barge to his fleet at the Cumbrays The Norwegians on the hill, being attacked with great fury by the Scots, who greatly outnumbered them, and pressed them on both flanks, became apprehensive of being surrounded, and began to retire in scattered parties towards the sea. Their retreat soon changed into a flight, and the divisions drawn up on the beach supposing they had been routed, broke their ranks, and while many of the Norsemen threw themselves into their boats and attempted to regain their ships, the rest were driven along the shore amid showers of arrows, stones, and other missiles, to a place a little below Kelburne In the meantime another violent storm had come on, which not only prevented Haco from sending ashore in time the expected reinforcements, but completed the ruin of the Norwegian fleet, already much shattered by the previous gales The Norwegians on land, thus left to themselves, gallantly maintained the unequal contest, and repeatedly rallying, made an obstinate stand wherever the nature of the ground favoured their movements Gathering round their stranded galleys they defended themselves with all their accustomed bravery, and kept their pursuers for some time in check [Ibid p 97] A young Scottish knight named Sir Piers de Curry was here slain According to the Norse Chronicle, his helmet and coat of mail were plated with gold, and the former was set with precious stones In the true spirit of chivalry he galloped frequently along the Norwegian line, endeavouring to provoke some one to single combat Andrew Nicolson, one of Haco's chiefs who conducted the retreat, answered his defiance, and after a brief encounter, killed him with a blow which severed his thigh from his body, the sword cutting through his armour, and penetrating to the saddle The Norwegians stripped him of his rich armour, but while doing so they were attacked furiously by the Scots, and many fell on both sides [Ibid p 99] The Norwegians would have been cut to pieces to a man, had not a reinforcement reached them towards evening from the fleet, the boats being pushed through a tremendous surf to the shore These fresh troops instantly attacked the Scots upon two points, and their arrival gave new courage to the Norwegians, who began to form themselves anew The contest was protracted till night, when, according to the Norse account, the Norwegians, uniting in a last grand effort, made a desperate charge against their assailants, who were posted on the heights overhanging the shore, and succeeded in beating them back, after a short and furious resistance The survivors then re-embarked in their boats, and though the storm continued to rage, got on board their shattered vessels in safety [Ibid p 103] Among the Norwegians of note who fell were Haco of Steine and Thorgisi Eloppa, both of King Haco's household, with many more of the principal Norwegian leaders Sir Piers de Curry is the only name of mark mentioned as having fallen on the Scottish side

Next morning the strand was seen covered with dead bodies and strewed with the wreck of the best appointed fleet which Norway had ever sent out Alexander granted a truce to Haco, to enable him to bury his dead, and to raise above their bodies those rude memorials which to this day mark the site of the field of battle The chief scene of the contest is supposed to have been a large plain southward of the village of Largs, still presenting a recumbent stone ten feet long, which once stood upright, and is believed to have been placed over the grave of a chieftain, and vestiges are found of cairns and tumuli formed, as is said, over pits into which the bodies of the slain were thrown

Such was the battle of the Largs, famed in story, song, and tradition, and the most memorable event in the reign of Alexander the Third The loss sustained by the Norwegians is thus feelingly alluded to in Lady Wardlaw's celebrated ballad of Hardyknute —

> 'In thraws of death, with wallert cheik,
> All panting on the plain,
> The fainting corps of warriours lay,
> Nor to aryse again
> Nor to return to native land,
> Nae mair, wi' blythsome sounds,
> To boast the glories of the day,
> And shaw their shynand wounds
> On Norway's coast, the widow'd dame
> May wash the rock with teirs,
> May long luik ower the shiples seis,
> Before hir mate appeirs.
> Cease, Emma, cease to hope in vain
> Thy lord lyes in the clay,
> The valiant Scots nae ryvers thole
> To carry lyfe away'

After the stranded vessels had been burnt by his order, King Haco weighed anchor with the small remnant of his fleet that remained to him under the Cumbrays, and, being joined by the squadron which had been sent up Loch Long, he steered to the bay of Lamlash in the Island of Arran, and across the frith of Clyde, a few miles from the scene of his disasters and defeat In Lamlash bay he met Sigurd, whom he had sent to inquire into the situation of the Ostmen of Ireland, and was assured by him that they would willingly receive his aid against the rule of England The aged but heroic monarch, anxious to wipe out the disgrace of his repulse at Largs, was eager for the enterprise, but a council of his officers opposed the expedition, and it was accordingly abandoned [Norse Account, p 109] He afterwards sailed past Sand, Gigha, the Calf of Mull, Rum, and Cape Wrath, to the Orkneys, where he arrived on the 29th October, abandoned by the island chiefs who had joined him, and ever by many of his own followers and with the loss of another vessel in the Pentland Frith At Kirkwall a mortal illness, brought on by anxiety and disappointment as much as by overfatigue, seized upon Haco, under which he lingered for some weeks, and at last expired on the 15th December (1263) Thus ended the last great attempt of the Scandinavian monarchs to secure to themselves the possession of the Western Isles

The tidings of the death of Haco and of the birth of an heir to the throne were received by Alexander on the same day, the queen having, on the 21st of January, been delivered at Jedburgh, of a son, who was named Alexander [Chr Melr p 225]

To follow up the advantages which he had already gained, and complete the reduction of the isles, were now the chief objects of Alexander With the intention of invading the Isle of Man, he raised an army, and compelled the island chiefs to furnish a fleet for the transport of his troops Dreading his vengeance, and despairing of assistance from Norway, Magnus, king of Man, son of Olave the Black, who had been subdued by Alan lord of Galloway in 1231, sent envoys with offers of submission, and hastened himself to meet the Scottish king, which he did at Dumfries on his way to subdue the Isle of Man, where he swore fealty to the crown of Scotland, and became bound to furnish to his lord paramount, when required, ten war-galleys, five with twenty-four oars and five with twelve [Fordun, b 10 c 18] This Magnus, king of Man, died in 1265 A military force, under the earl of Mar, was next sent against those chiefs of the Western Isles who had joined or had favoured the invasion of Haco Some of them were executed, and the rest reduced After negotiations which lasted for nearly three years, a treaty of peace was at last, in 1266, concluded with Magnus, king of Norway, the successor of Haco, whereby the Hebrides and the Isle of Man, and all other islands in the western and southern seas, of which the Norwegians might have hitherto held, or claimed the dominion, were made over in full sovereignty to Scotland The Shetland and Orkney islands remained in the possession of Norway One of the articles of this important treaty provided that four thousand merks sterling of the Roman standard, in four yearly payments, and a perpetual quitrent of one hundred merks annually should be paid by Scotland to Norway, in consideration of the latter yielding up all claim to the isles Another declared that such of the subjects of Norway as were inclined to quit the Hebrides should have full liberty to do so, with all their effects, whilst those who preferred remaining, were to become subjects of Scotland To this latter class, the king of Norway, in fulfilment of his part of the treaty, addressed a mandate, enjoining them henceforth to serve and obey the king of Scotland as their liege lord, and it was further arranged that none of the islanders were to be punished for their former adherence to the Norwegians [Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p 22] To the treaty, which is dated the 20th of July, 1266, was added the penalty of a fine of ten thousand merks, to be exacted by the Pope from the party breaking it The patronage of the bishopric of Sodor and Man was expressly ceded to Alexander, while the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was reserved in favour of the archbishop of Drontheim in Norway [Tytler's Hist of Scotland vol i p 41, note]

After the treaty of cession, Alexander appears to have acted in a liberal spirit towards the island chiefs Ewen of Lorn, (already referred to as a grandson of Dugall, eldest son of the first Somerled by his second wife, daughter of Olave the red, Norwegian king of the Isles,) was of course restored to the lands in that portion of the Hebrides termed by the Norwegians the Sudreys, which he had resigned into the hands of Haco (ante, p 89), and which he had formerly held of Norway, and was further rewarded for his services and fidelity By his death, however, without male issue, this branch of the descendants of Somerled, chief of the Macdonalds, became extinct Angus Mor, of South Kintyre and Islay, grandson of Reginald the second son of the elder Somerled by the same marriage, the ancestor of the second race of the lords of the Isles, who had on its arrival joined the Norwegian expedition (ante, p 89), having determined to remain in the isles, became, according to the treaty, a vassal of the king of Scotland, for his lands there, and was allowed to retain, under one king, all that he had formerly held under both His son Alexander having subsequently married one of the daughters and co-heiresses of Ewen of Lorn, became the lineal representative of the elder branch of the race of Somerled The isles of Skye and Lewis were conferred upon the earl of Ross, no part of these islands, or of Man, Arran, and Bute, being granted on this occasion by Alexander the Third to any of the descendants of Somerled, to whom they had formerly belonged The former, however, viz the isles of Skye and Lewis, afterwards reverted to that family, when on the utter ruin of the Albany family, accomplished by the revenge of James I, the Macdonalds, lords of the Isles, quietly succeeded to the earldom of Ross, through their descent from the last heiress of that line

While thus fortunate in securing peace at home Alexander had been able, in 1264, to allow a large body of Scottish auxiliaries under John Baliol, lord of Galloway, Robert de Brus, lord of Annandale, and John Comyn, to be sent to the assistance of his father-in-law, Henry III, who with his son Edward prince of England, afterwards Edward I, was in arms against his revolted barons, led by Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester Northampton was stormed by the royalists, but at the battle of Lewes, 14th May, Henry was defeated and made prisoner, as were also two of the Scottish leaders, John Comyn and Robert de Brus In this battle great slaughter was made of the Scottish auxiliaries, who behaved with all their accustomed bravery [Matth Paris, p 669 Hemingford, p 581 Knyghton, p 2447.] The battle of Evesham, 4th August, 1265, where Simon de Montfort was discomfited and slain, retrieved the fortunes of Henry, and the Scottish barons soon obtained their liberty [Chr Melr p 226]

The long minority of Alexander, from the constant feuds and contentions among the nobles, and the anarchy which generally prevailed, had struck deep at the roots of the prosperity of his kingdom, but his wise, firm, and judicious rule after he came of age, was well calculated to heal the wounds that had been inflicted, and to restore confidence and tranquillity to his people, by whom he was universally beloved After the Norse invasion and the reduction of the isles, the kingdom was not again, during Alexander's life, assailed by a foreign enemy, while its internal peace seems to have been no longer disturbed by the turbulence of its domestic factions For three years after, Alexander was engaged in maintaining the independence of the national church against the exactions of the court of Rome, at the same time, with equal spirit and prudence keeping in check the domineering spirit of his clergy In the year 1266, Cardinal Ottobon de Fieschi, the legate of the Pope in England, demanded six merks from every cathedral in Scotland, and four merks from each parish church, for the expenses of his visitation This demand the king firmly resisted, and appealed to the pontiff To defray the expenses of the appeal, the clergy supplied him with two thousand merks [Fordun, b 10 ch 21] Soon after (in 1267) a dispute between the king and the bishop of St Andrews arose from the excommunication of a certain knight named Sir John de Dunmore, for offences committed against the prior and convent of St Andrews The king required Gamelin, the bishop, to absolve him, without satisfaction The latter refused, and not only ratified the sentence, but excommunicated all the adherents of Dunmore, the royal family only excepted Irritated at his zeal, Alexander allowed the legate to levy part of the disputed contributions, and the contention between the king and the bishop threatened to rise very high, when, to put an end to it, Dunmore, of his own accord, with creditable good sense, asked forgiveness of the church, made reparation, and was absolved, on which the king and the bishop were reconciled. The papal legate now demanded admittance into Scotland, but the king, having examined his commission, and consulted with his clergy, sent him a peremptory refusal [Ibid c 23] Foiled in this scheme, the legate, in 1268, summoned the Scottish prelates to attend him in England, at whatever place he should think fit to hold a council He also required the Scottish clergy to send two representatives, who should be heads of monasteries The Scottish bishops deputed two of their number, and the other clergy two, but though they acceded thus far, it was not to assist the council, but to watch its proceedings, as the cardinal-legate soon found, for when he had procured several canons to be enacted relative to Scotland, the Scottish clergy at once disclaimed obedience to them Seeing them so resolute, the Pope, Clement IV, took up different ground, and in the course of the same year claimed from the clergy of Scotland a tenth of their revenues to be paid to Henry of England, as an aid for an intended crusade, an object which he thought they could have no excuse in declining to subscribe to Here again, however, he was baffled, as both king and clergy united in a decided refusal to the requisition, Alexander declaring that Scotland was ready to equip a competent body of knights to proceed to the Holy Land Accordingly David earl of Athole, Adam earl of Carrick, William Lord Douglas, John Steward, Alexander Comyn, Robert Keith, George Durward, John de Quincy, and William Gordon, all connected with the first families in Scotland, assumed the cross, and sailed for Palestine, whence few of them ever returned The earl of Carrick here mentioned was Adam de Kilconath, the husband of the lady Marjory, only daughter of Nigel earl of Carrick, whose recent death in the Holy wars had left her heiress in her own right of the whole lands and earldom of Carrick Her husband, Adam de Kilconath, who became earl of Carrick in her right, having also been slain in Palestine in 1270, she afterwards became the wife

In the meantime, founding upon the papal grant, the king of England, in 1269, attempted to levy the tenth of the ecclesiastical revenues in Scotland, for the crusades The attempt was spiritedly met by the Scottish clergy, who, not content with appealing to Rome, to show their independence both of the papal legate and the English king, assembled in a provincial council at Perth, under the authority of the bull of Pope Honorius IV, granted in the year 1225, during the reign of Alexander the Second [See ante, p 66] At this council, over which one of their own bishops presided, they passed various canons for the regulation of the Scottish church, which remained in force till the Reformation, and with those of the council of 1242, are preserved in the Chartulary of Aberdeen The first of them appointed a council of the national clergy of Scotland to be held annually, and the second decreed that each of the bishops should, in rotation, be "conservator statutorum," or protector of the statutes, and during the interval between each council he should enforce obedience to the canons, under pain of ecclesiastical censures [Fordun, b 10 c 23, 24, 26 Chr Mels pp 241, 242]

In 1270, Alexander's queen gave birth to a second son, who was named David, but who died in his eleventh year The country at this period enjoyed both peace and plenty, and few events of a domestic nature seem to have occurred of sufficient importance to deserve a place in history The friendly relations which had been for some time maintained with England were not impaired by the death of Henry III, which took place November 16, 1272 At the coronation of Henry's son and successor, Edward I, at Westminster, 19 August, 1274, Alexander and his queen, Margaret, Edward's sister, were present, with a splendid train of his nobility Before proceeding to London, Alexander took care to obtain from his royal brother-in-law a letter declaring that his friendly visit to him, on this occasion, should not be construed into anything prejudicial to the independence of Scotland In those feudal times such a precaution was customary, and we find Edward himself, when twenty years afterwards he sent some ships to the assistance of the king of France, his feudal superior for the duchy of Normandy, requiring from that monarch a similar declaration About six months after she had attended her brother's coronation, Alexander lost his queen, who died 26th February 1275, in the prime of her age

In 1275, a tenth of the church revenues of Scotland was again required by the Pope, for the relief of the Holy Land Benemund de Vicci, corrupted into Bagimont, was sent to collect this contribution, which was paid by all the clergy, except the regulars of the Cistertian order, that order having compounded with the Pope, by granting a general aid of fifty thousand merks, and thus the amount of their annual revenues throughout Europe remained unknown Bagimont was prevailed upon by the Scottish clergy to apply to Rome on their behalf for an abatement of the tax, but the Pope, remembering no doubt their former resistance to his demands, refused to grant any commutation, and it was rigidly exacted The rent-roll by which this tax was levied is known in history by the name of "Bagimont's roll," the estimate being made not according to "the ancient extent, but the true value" [Fordun, b 10 c 35] Two years thereafter, Alexander was involved in a dispute with the bishop of Durham, who accused him of encroachments on the English marches The king of Scots sent five ambassadors to the court of Edward, with the declaration that he had only maintained the marches according to ancient usage, that is, "to the floodmark towards the south," [Fœdera, vol ii p 84,] and bearing a proposal that commissioners should be appointed by both crowns to adjust the matter This dispute, which Lord Hailes thinks, and with good reason, related only to a salmon fishing at the mouth of the Tweed, was, soon after, amicably settled

In 1278 Alexander attended the English parliament at Westminster on Michaelmas day, when he took the general and traditional oath of fealty to Edward in the following terms "I, Alexander, king of Scotland, do acknowledge myself the liegeman of my lord Edward king of England, against all deadly" This Edward accepted, "saving the claim of homage for the kingdom of Scotland, whenever he or his heirs should think proper to make it" [Fœdera, vol ii p 126] On this occasion Robert de Brus, eldest son of the lord of Annandale, and who was, by marriage, earl of Carrick,—having seven years before espoused Martha or Marjory, countess of Carrick in her own right, the widow of his old companion in arms, and fellow-crusader, Adam de Kilconath,—by the command of Alexander and with the approbation of Edward, performed the accompanying ceremony of homage, in these words "I, Robert earl of Carrick, according to the authority given to me by my lord the king of Scotland, in presence of the king of England, and other prelates and barons, by which the power of swearing upon the soul of the king of Scotland was conferred upon me, have, in presence of the king of Scotland, and commissioned thereto by his special precept, sworn fealty to Lord Edward king of England in these words 'I, Alexander king of Scotland, shall bear faith to my lord Edward king of England and his heirs, with my life and members, and worldly substance, and I shall faithfully perform the services, used and wont, for the lands and tenements which I hold of the said king'" This having been sworn by the earl of Carrick, was confirmed and ratified by the king of Scotland [Ibid] Both kings were then and always amicably disposed towards each other, and the time had not yet come for Edward to advance those claims of supremacy over the kingdom of Scotland which, whether well or ill founded, had so often created disquiet between the two kingdoms, and were only finally got rid of on the field of Bannockburn It is remarkable that the ceremony of homage, under the reservation on Edward's part of the claim of fealty for the kingdom of Scotland, should have been on this occasion performed by the father of that Bruce who, after the long struggle for independence, should have at last succeeded in rescuing the kingdom from the claim for ever The following portrait of Alexander III is from a print of the parliament of Edward I in which the above ceremony was performed, published in Pinkerton's portraits of illustrious persons of Scotland, taken from a copy, in the collection of the earl of Buchan, from an ancient limning formerly in the College of Arms, London

In 1281 the treaty which, in 1266, had been concluded with Norway, was farther cemented by the marriage of Margaret, the only daughter of Alexander, who was then twenty-one years old, to Eric king of Norway, then in his fourteenth year A dowry of fourteen thousand merks was given with the princess, who was accompanied to the Norwegian court by Walter Bailloch earl of Menteith and his countess, the abbot of Balmerino, Sir Bernard Montalto, and other knights and barons The alliance thus happily formed between the two countries was calculated to put an end to those troubles which the restless chieftains of the western islands so frequently occasioned by their turbulence and ambition, and the wavering fealty of whom even the late treaty of peace had failed to secure for any length of time to Scotland It appears that notwithstanding the submission of King Magnus, Alexander had been compelled in 1275 to lead an armed force against the Isle of Man, and in 1282, the very year following the marriage of the princess Margaret, Alexander Comyn earl of Buchan and constable of Scotland, proceeded with an army to suppress some disturbances in the lately ceded islands [Fœdera, vol ii p 205]

Soon after the marriage of his sister, Alexander the prince of Scotland, then in his nineteenth year, was united, in 1282, to Margaret, the daughter of Guy earl of Flanders The ceremony took place at Roxburgh, and the rejoicings lasted for fifteen days. The king himself was, at this time, only in his forty-first year, and might reasonably have expected a lengthened reign, while the marriages of his son and daughter, thus so auspiciously formed, gave an almost certain hope that his sceptre would be transmitted to descendants of his own line. But a singular train of calamities following each other in rapid succession, soon destroyed all such hopes and expectations The queen of Norway died about the end of 1288, leaving an only child, known in Scottish history as "the Maiden of Norway," and very soon after, on the 28th of January 1284, the prince of Scotland, who had always been of a weak constitution, also died, at the abbey of Lindores in Fife, leaving no issue Prince David, the youngest son of Alexander, had, as already stated (p 95), died in 1281, the year of his sister's marriage Both princes were interred at Dunfermline

Being thus bereaved of his children, the first care of Alexander was to take the necessary measures for the settlement of the succession On the 5th of February, 1284, the estates of the kingdom assembled at Scone, when the prelates and barons became bound to acknowledge Margaret, princess of Norway, as their sovereign, "failing any children whom Alexander might have, and failing the issue of the prince of Scotland, deceased," it not being then known whether his widow was pregnant [Fœdera, vol ii p 266]

In the following year, being earnestly entreated by the lords of his council and the estates of the realm, Alexander deemed it prudent to contract a second marriage, and accordingly sent Thomas Tartar, the lord chancellor, with Sir Patrick Grahame, Sir William St Clair, and Sir John de Soulis, knights, as ambassadors to France, to choose for his bride Joletta, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of the count de Dreux This lady accompanied them to Scotland, and their nuptials took place at Jedburgh, April 15, 1285 In the midst of the marriage rejoicings, an incident occurred which, in that superstitious age, dismayed and distressed the guests who had thronged to the royal festivities. Amidst the masques and pastimes usually produced on such occasions, and when the enjoyment of the scene was at its height, a spectral image of death glided with fearful gestures among the revellers, and after striking terror into all present, vanished suddenly. The thing was nothing more than a well-acted piece of mummery, or clever pantomimic representation by a person expert in such performances, which were not unusual in the "Moralities" and "Mysteries" as enacted in those days by the monks, but it was held as if foreshadowing those misfortunes which so soon after befell Scotland, beginning with the sudden and violent death of the king himself [Fordun, b 10 c 11] To the north of the burgh of Kinghorn, on the sea-coast of Fife, and northern shore of the Firth of Forth, there stood in Alexander's time a castle, bearing the name of the burgh, which was often the residence of the Scottish kings, but of which no vestige now remains This castle and the domains attached to it, were frequently pledged, along with others, in security for the jointure of their queens The young queen Joletta appears to have been residing here on the 16th March 1286, when Alexander the Third, who had been enjoying the chase towards Burntisland and Inverkeithing, turned his horse's head, in the dusk of the evening, towards Kinghorn The road then wound along the top of the rocks which overhang the sea, and as it was dangerous to proceed in the dark, his attendants strongly urged him to remain at Inverkeithing till the morning Disregarding their remonstrances the king galloped forward, and when little more than a mile west from Kinghorn, his horse stumbled, and he was thrown over a lofty and rugged precipice, and killed on the spot The place is still familiarly known in the traditions of the district as the King's Wood-End The accompanying cut represents the scene of this unhappy catastrophe This event, the greatest national calamity that Scotland ever sustained, took place when Alexander was in the 45th year of his age, and 37th of his reign His corpse, after being embalmed, was solemnly interred at Dunfermline, among the kings of Scotland

The loss of a sovereign so deservedly beloved

—although at the time they could not have foreseen the premature death of his granddaughter the princess of Norway, much less the contest for the succession to the crown, the overweening claims of the king of England, or the subsequent intestine war and the struggle for independence which embittered it, in which the best blood of Scotland was shed and many noble families ruined and cast into exile—yet the many amiable qualities of the deceased monarch, the series of domestic disappointments by which his government had been preceded, and those presentiments of coming calamities which so often cast their shadows before them, tended to overwhelm the people of Scotland with grief and dismay, and the misfortunes and miseries which followed, caused it to be long and deeply deplored "Never," says honest Balfour, "was ther more lamentatione and sorrow for a king in Scotland than for him, for the nobility, clergie, and above all, the gentrey and comons, bedowed hes coffin for 17 dayes space with rinoletts of teares" [Annals of Scotland, vol i p 77] The oldest specimen of the Scottish language known to be in existence is a sort of monody, written on the death of Alexander, which has been preserved by Winton

Scene of the death of Alexander III

"Quhen Alysandyr, oure kyng, wes dede,
That Scotland led in luwe and le,
Away wes sons of ale and brede,
Of wyne and wax, of gamyn and gle
Oure gold wes changyd into lede —
Christ, born in-to virgynyte, Succour Scotland, and remede,
That stad is in perplexyte"

Winton, vol i p 401

The death of Alexander, so disastrous to Scotland, is said to have been foretold, the day previous, to the earl of March, who was one of the chiefs of the English faction during Alexander's minority, at his castle of Dunbar, by Thomas of Ercildon, commonly called Thomas the Rhymer On the night preceding the king's death, Thomas having arrived at the castle, was jocularly asked by the earl if the next day would produce any remarkable event, to which the bard replied, "Alas! for to-morrow, a day of calamity and misery! Before the twelfth hour shall be heard a blast so vehement that it shall exceed those of every former period, a blast which shall strike the nations with amazement, shall humble what is proud, and what is fierce shall level with the ground! The sorest wind and tempest that ever was heard of in Scotland!" Next morning, discovering no unusual appearance in the weather which indicated a storm, the day on the contrary being remarkably clear and mild, the earl and those who were with him began to doubt the powers of the prophet, as Thomas was esteemed, and having ordered him into their presence, they upbraided him as an impostor, and hastened to enjoy their wonted repast But his lordship had scarcely seated himself at table, and the shadow of the dial fallen on the hour of noon, when an express, his horse covered with foam, appeared at the castle-gate, and demanded an audience On being asked what news he brought, he exclaimed "I do indeed bring news, but of a lamentable kind, to be deplored by the whole realm of Scotland! Alas, our renowned king has ended his fair life at Kinghorn!" "This," cried Thomas, gathering himself up in the consciousness that his prediction had been fulfilled, "This is the scathful wind and dreadful tempest which shall blow such a calamity and trouble to the whole realm of Scotland!" Whether "the sunset of life had given mystical lore" to this singular personage, or he had uttered his prediction in the usual mystical language of soothsayers, leaving its fulfilment to accident or the weather, as chance might determine, it is certain that the story has been generally credited from that time till the present, and it would be very difficult now to shake the universal belief in it As indicating at least the impression which seems to have prevailed, that the death of Alexander foreboded greater disaster and woe to Scotland, than any former event in our annals, it is not without a certain degree of historical interest, and could not well be omitted in any narrative of Alexander's life

The appearance and manners of Alexander the Third were in the highest degree noble and dignified, and such as befitted a king Though tall and large-boned, his limbs were well-formed and strongly knit His figure was majestic, and his countenance handsome and expressive His sincerity of character and excellent understanding were such as to command the respect while they won the attachment of his people He is described as having been affable in demeanour, easy of access, firm of purpose, and of a just yet generous disposition His kingdom he governed with wisdom and energy With England he maintained constant peace and amity, yet, as Lord Hailes justly remarks, never submitted to any concessions which might injure the independence or impair the liberties of the realm or the church of Scotland In the administration of the laws he was diligent and impartial, and his inflexible love of justice, and patience in hearing disputes, were amongst the qualities which endeared him to his subjects For the punishment of offenders and the redress of wrongs, he divided Scotland into four great districts, and made an annual progress through each, attended by his justiciary and his principal nobles In passing from one county to another he required the attendance of the sheriff with the whole force of the shire, and the train of retainers of the nobles who accompanied him being, while travelling, limited by law, the people were thus relieved of the charge of supporting the royal retinue He greatly contributed to diminish the burdens of the feudal system, and to restrain the license and oppressions of the nobility, keeping them in quiet subjection to his authority, and obliging each to act peaceably in his own allotted sphere. In his private life, Alexander was upright, temperate and pious, and in all his domestic relations kind and affectionate During his reign, according to Fordun, "the church flourished, its ministers were treated with reverence, vice was openly discouraged, cunning and treachery were repressed, injury ceased, and the reign of truth and justice maintained throughout the land" [Fordun, b. 10, ch xli]

In Alexander's reign the little trade that was in the country became so flourishing that foreign merchants were attracted to Scotland in numbers, from the maritime and commercial cities of Italy, France, Germany, and the Low countries, who were allowed to traffic with the burgesses, and had free and safe access to markets in every burgh town The imports were chiefly wine, cloth and rich stuffs, armour and other commodities, while the staple exports of the kingdom consisted almost solely of fish, wool, and hides The exportation of Scottish merchandise was however, prohibited by Alexander under severe laws, owing to the frequent losses of valuable cargoes, by pirates, wrecks, and unforeseen arrestments Notwithstanding this restriction, which showed very narrow ideas on the subject of trade, Scotland, we are told, speedily became rich in every kind of wealth, and in the production of the arts and manufactures. Agriculture, too, had made great progress in Alexander's peaceful reign, and, besides the produce of the ground, flocks and herds abounded everywhere According to Winton

"Yowmen, pewere karl, or knawe
That wes of mycht an ox til hawe,
He gert that man hawe part in pluche,
Swa wes corn in his land enwche,
Swa than begouth, and efter lang
Of land wes mesure, ane ox-gang
Mychty men that had ma
Oxyn, he gert in pluchys ga
Be that vertu all his land
Of corn he gert be abowndand"

Indeed, Scotland at that period presented such a field for commercial enterprise that a number of

Lombard merchants, who were in that age the most active traders in Europe, and then filled every mart in England, arrived in the kingdom, and offered to establish manufacturing and mercantile settlements in various parts, specifying particularly an island near Cramond, and the mount above Queensferry All they asked in return was to be allowed certain spiritual immunities Their proposal was, however, opposed by some of the most powerful of the nobility, though Alexander himself is said to have been desirous of encouraging them, and their negotiations on the subject were defeated only by his sudden and premature death [Fordun, b 10 ch xli xlii]

In the period of two hundred and thirty years, which elapsed from the accession of Malcolm Canmore to the death of Alexander the Third, that is, from the middle of the eleventh to near the close of the thirteenth century, a great change had taken place on Scotland as a nation The vast moral revolution which the Saxon connexion and influence of Malcolm's queen, Margaret, at first remotely worked upon the country had, during that time, extended its effects more and more throughout all its relations, to the great improvement of the people, and their steady advance in civilization But a sad reverse was now to take place in their destinies The line of Scotland's ancient kings terminated with Alexander the Third, and the continuous train of miseries and wasting calamities in which the kingdom was involved for more than a generation after his unhappy death, from the long and fierce struggle that ensued for the succession to the throne, in which the national liberty and independence were frequently at stake, marks a peculiar era in the history of Scotland, and caused the memory of so good a king to be long held in affectionate remembrance by the Scottish people

During the interval from what is usually called in Scottish annals "the Saxon Conquest,"—when by the aid of a Northumbrian Saxon army, Malcolm Canmore was enabled, first to drive Macbeth beyond the Forth, and four years afterwards to defeat and slay him at the battle of Lumphanan in Aberdeenshire,—to the death of Alexander the Third, the last of Malcolm's dynasty, the advance made in civilization, in the useful arts, and in the habits of social life among the people of Scotland was most remarkable This was chiefly owing in the first instance, to the settlement of the Anglo-Saxon nobles and leaders in the Lothians and lowlands, and, in the second place, to the introduction of the feudal system by the Norman adventurers who followed them The revolution that in the course of these changes took place in the laws and customs and forms of government was strikingly favourable to the progressive improvement of the country The Saxon and Norman colonization of the southern and midland districts exercised a far more direct and beneficial influence on the national character than ever was, or could be, derived from the Celtic race, much of what is peculiar and distinctive in its formation being mainly ascribable to this important accession to the population, and from this period the Saxon domination may be said to have been firmly and securely established in Scotland In the reign of Edgar one of its principal effects was to confine the Celtic portion of the community to the mountainous districts, while the more enlarged and comprehensive policy of Alexander led him to extend the Saxon institutions to those portions of the country which he may be said to have conquered, and, as we have seen, by the erection of separate sheriffdoms, to bring them more immediately under the operation and subjection of the laws and government

The changes which took place on the Scottish church and clergy were among the most important of the effects produced by the Saxon conquest, and in this respect it may be truly said, as Mr Daniel Wilson has remarked, to have been "even more an ecclesiastical than a civil revolution" [Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland, p 604] By the marriage of Malcolm Canmore with the Saxon princess Margaret, the sister of Edgar Atheling, much of elegance and refinement were introduced into the Scottish court By her influence, joined to that of the Saxon refugees, not only were several of the more gross and barbarous customs of the Scots abolished, and various wise and beneficial laws adopted from the system of the Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, but the whole form and fabric of religion was reformed, and the Scottish church assimilated as much as possible to the English, and to that of Rome, so that, as Mr Wilson says, "in the period which intervened between the landing of the fugitive Saxon princess at St Margaret's Hope and the death of her younger son David, nearly all the Scottish sees were founded or restored, many of the principal monasteries were instituted, their chapels and other dependencies erected, and the elder order of Culdee fraternities with their missionary bishops for the first time superseded by a complete parochial system" [Ibid] The change to the better on the ecclesiastical architecture of Scotland that followed was proportionately great The Scottish clergy, although not so wealthy as their English brethren, appear to have been equally anxious to improve the splendour of their churches, and the commodiousness of their dwellings Even before the reign of Malcolm Canmore there were at Dunkeld, Brechin, Abernethy, and St Andrews, religious edifices, as grand and suitable in their way as the state of the arts and manners of those times would admit, but the attention paid to religious matters by his pious queen Margaret, and the encouragement given by her to foreign clergymen to resort to this kingdom, to whom new establishments required to be assigned, fixed a new era in the style and character of the ecclesiastical buildings in Scotland The Anglo-Saxon and Norman nobles who were driven into this country by the oppressions of William of Normandy, historically styled the Conqueror, also gave an impetus, by their advice and benefactions, to the changes and improvements which took place in the ecclesiastical architecture of the people amongst whom they had found a home Previous to this period, the churches had been in form, square or oblong, generally built of timber or baked clay, and covered with lead, thatching, or tiles In imitation of the only parts of the military architecture of the period that could be, in any degree, accommodated to religious purposes, beside some of these square churches, round towers had been erected, either as ornamental, or as secure repositories for valuable things in times of danger In many instances these round towers may have served as belfries, and in others as places for conveying signals, while in some, it is not unlikely, they were used as prisons ' In the ecclesiastical architecture introduced at this period, the nave and the aisles, the chancel and the choir, were distinct parts of the same structure The relative positions of the nave and the aisles were arranged by the practice of building these sacred edifices in the form of a cross The native style of ecclesiastical architecture which had been in use was, in the progress of the reformation in the church, entirely superseded by the mode prevalent in England, as its ecclesiastical system had also been What immediately succeeded appears to have been what is called the early or older Norman, to which Mr Wilson gives the name of the Romanesque style Of this the oldest and one of the most interesting specimens now remaining in Scotland is the nave of the church founded and endowed by Queen Margaret at Dunfermline, where her nuptials with Malcolm took place in 1070, which she dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and which was the origin of, and partly incorporated into, the Benedictine abbey of Dunfermline The erection of the little chapel of St Margaret in the castle of Edinburgh is assigned to the same period This has been supposed, on good grounds, to have been erected over the place used for her devotions by Queen Margaret during her residence in the castle till her death in 1093 "It is in the same style," says Mr Wilson, "though of a plainer character, as the earliest portions of Holyrood abbey, begun in the year 1128, and it is worthy of remark, that the era of Norman architecture is one in which many of the most interesting ecclesiastical edifices in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh were founded, including Holyrood abbey, St Giles' church, and the parish churches of Duddingston, Ratho, Kirkliston, and Dalmeny" [Memorials of Edinburgh, vol i p 129] As specimens of the early Norman the following may also be mentioned, namely, the parish churches of Leuchars, in Fifeshire, Borthwick, in Mid Lothian, Gulane, in East Lothian, Uphall, and Abercorn, in West Lothian, St. Helen's, Cockburnspath, in Berwickshire, Mortlack and Monymusk, in Aberdeenshire, St Columba's, Southend, Kilchonchan, Campbeltown, and "the beautiful little ruined church of St Blane, on the island of Bute, with its Norman chancel arch and graceful First-pointed chancel, besides various others more or less perfect still remaining in Argyleshire—all presenting interesting features illustrative of the development of the Romanesque style in Scotland, and furnishing evidence of the great impetus given to church building at the period" [Wilson's Archæology, p 614] We learn from the work just quoted that the portions which remain of the original Norman structure of Alexander the First's foundation on Inchcolm, (of which the cut given in p 58 will illustrate our remarks,) erected about 1123, are characterized by the same unornate simplicity that marks the little chapel of St Margaret in the castle of Edinburgh, which has already been referred to, and that it was not till the reign of David the First that any certain examples were furnished of the highly decorated late Norman work The architecture of Kelso abbey, founded in 1128 by David the First, (in the same year with Holyrood abbey,) and the singularly rich details of which have made it one of the most celebrated remains of the middle ages in Scotland, is Saxon or early Norman, with the exception of four magnificent central arches, which are decidedly Gothic, and is a beautiful specimen of this particular style, being regular and uniform in its structure Though built under the same auspices, and nearly about the same period as the abbeys of Melrose and Jedburgh, it totally differs from them in form and character, being in the shape of a Greek cross Melrose abbey, founded in 1136, was partially consumed by fire in 1322, and what now remains of the re-edified structure exhibits a style of architecture of the richest Gothic, which has been ascertained to belong to a later age than that of David The well-known masterly description of it by Sir Walter Scott in the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' may, however, not unfitly be applied to the richer portions of the early Scottish Gothic style, which were constructed at the close of this period

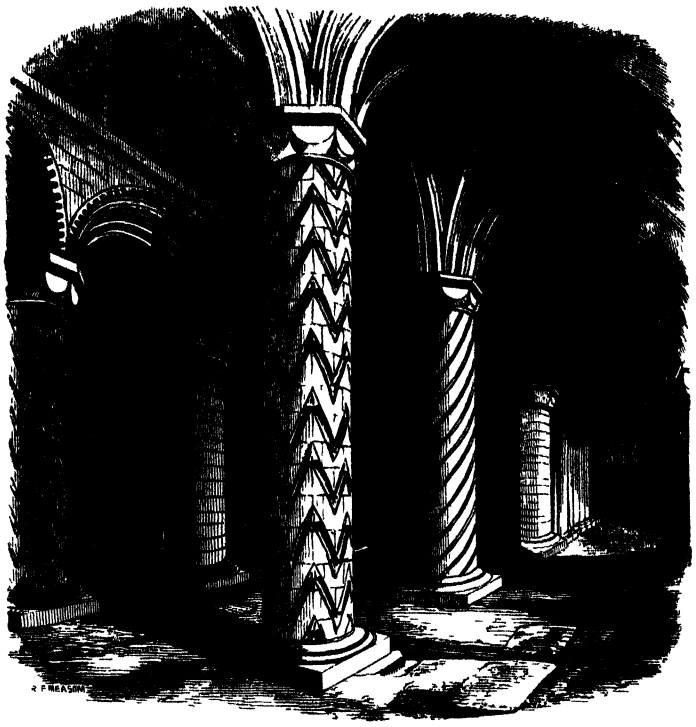
"The darkened roof rose high aloof
On pillars lofty and light and small,
The keystone that locked each ribbed isle
Was a fleur-de-lys or a quatre-feuille
The corbells were carved grotesque and grim,
And the pillars, with cluster'd shafts so trim,
With base and with capital flourish'd around,
Seem'd bundles of lances which garlands had bound."

The chief object of architectural interest in Jedburgh abbey is the Norman door, which, for the elegance of its workmanship, and the symmetry of its proportions is unrivalled in Scotland

Although not strictly pertaining till a later period to Scotland, perhaps the most interesting specimen of later Norman work is the cathedral of St Magnus at Kirkwall in Orkney, the most perfectly preserved cathedral of that epoch, the foundation of which was laid in the year 1138, by Rognwald or Ronald, Norwegian earl or count of Orkney, the nephew of the sainted Magnus Like St Mungo's in Glasgow, it boasts of being a complete cross church, with all its essential parts entire, and these are the only two cathedral edifices now existing in Scotland, to which this description applies A remarkably curious and indeed unique example of the architecture of the period is the little church and tower of St Rule, at St Andrews The Norman prevailed about a hundred years, during which period the ecclesiastical architecture of England and Scotland was much the same in character as well as details The next style that was introduced was the First-pointed or early English, which was adopted about 1170, and was used till about 1242—a period of seventy years Of this, which is considered an improvement on the later Norman, the crypt and choir of Glasgow cathedral, built between 1188 and 1197, the nave of Dunblane cathedral, Kilwinning abbey, the ruined abbey of Dryburgh, and the chancel of St Blane's, Bute, already mentioned, are fine examples Subsequently the ecclesiastical architecture of Scotland assumed a somewhat different style from that of England, and became more distinctive and peculiar in its character The magnificent abbey of Aberbrothwick, which was founded by William the Lion in 1178, and which furnishes a most interesting specimen of the early Scottish Gothic, is thought to mark the historic epoch in which the native styles had their rise [Wilson's Archæology, p 618] As an illustration of the progressive character of Scottish architecture, and the slow rate at which ecclesiastical structures in that age were erected, the reader is presented with the following view of "The North Aisle of the Nave of Dunfermline Abbey, looking west"



The architectural distinctions which are here observable indicate a difference of ages in the styles adopted as well as in the periods of erection The nave is the only portion of the original abbey church which remains At the time of the removal of the relics of the sainted queen Margaret, in the beginning of the reign of Alexander the Third, as already related (see p 81) the choir was remodelled according to the prevailing first pointed style of the thirteenth century, and on this occasion the nave also must have undergone some modifications The interior of the nave is thus referred to in 'Billings' Baronial and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Scotland,' article Dunfermline "Towards the western extremity the clustered pillars supports the deeply moulded pointed arch,"—this later style probably indicating the period when the new church was rebuilt,—"while further on," viz towards the front of the engraving, "the supporting pillars are circular with the stunted hard Norman capital, and the arches are semicircular The cylindrical shafts of the easternmost arch on either side are adorned by large zigzags," indicating the varieties of the early Norman In the middle ages the most skilful architects were generally monks or secular clergymen, who were at once the patrons and chief practitioners of the highest branches of the art, hence the peculiarly rich and splendid style of their architectural work, and as a guild of lay masons was generally organized wherever any great ecclesiastical erection was going on, hence, too, that singular progressive unity of purpose traceable throughout the various styles of the ecclesiastical architecture of that period

During the reigns of Alexander the Second and Alexander the Third, Scotland began for the first time to assume that position among the nations of Europe which it continued to sustain while it remained an independent kingdom Its geographical and political isolation, and smallness of extent and power in proportion to the neighbouring realm of England, as well as its intestine wars, and as has been remarked, "very partial share in the great movements of mediæval Europe, including the crusades," had hitherto prevented its importance

from being acknowledged; but its growing influence and gradual development of strength under the monarchs of the period included within what is called "the Saxon Conquest," could not fail to be, in course of time, duly recognised by the other powers, and the marriages of the second Alexander, first to Joan, the sister of John king of England, the daughter of a French lady and educated in France, and afterwards to Mary de Couci, of Alexander, prince of Scotland, the son of Alexander the Third, and latterly of Alexander himself, to other illustrious ladies connected with that kingdom, could not fail to mark the consideration in which Scotland was at this period beginning to be held It may here be stated that Enguerrand de Couci, the father of Mary de Couci, the mother of Alexander the Third, was one of the most accomplished knights of the age in which he lived, and conspicuous above his contemporaries for his virtues and abilities He stood so high in the estimation of his brother knights and nobles that they at one period seem to have entertained a project of placing him on the throne of France Winton (vol ii p 482), says that on account of his brave actions, his possessions, and three marriages with ladies of royal and illustrious families, he was surnamed Le Grand He was also one of those famous romantic poets of chivalry, who in the middle ages were known by the name of Troubadours, as were also many of his family His grandfather Raoul I, lord of Couci, accompanied Philip Augustus in the earlier crusades, to Palestine His nephew Renaud, Castellan de Couci, with whom Raoul is sometimes confounded, is the hero of the old French ballad of 'The Knight of Curtesy and the Lady of Faguel' Having gone to the Holy Land with Richard Cœur de Lion, he was mortally wounded in defending a castle in 1191, and desired his squire, after his death to carry his heart to his mistress Gabrielle de Vergy, wife of the lord of Fayel The squire was intercepted by the husband, and the heart of the unfortunate Castellan was by his orders dressed for supper and eaten by his wife, who, on being informed of the horrible fact, refused all sustenance, and died of voluntary starvation The fame of the father of his future consort as a votary "of the gay science," and one of the most esteemed Provençal poets, as well as one of the most gallant knights of the age, must have been well known to the Scottish king, and no doubt had its effect, with the attractions of the daughter, in directing the affections of Alexander II towards her, on the death of Queen Joan

The de Coucis were long an illustrious family in France, and in the reign of Charles the Sixth, the then lord de Couci, one of the greatest warriors of his age, married the daughter of the duke de Lorraine Our historians have universally contented themselves with mentioning the name of the mother of Alexander the Third, without giving any account of her lineage or her father's illustrious qualities both as a poet and a knight The propensity to verse, song, and the dance, was one of the characteristics of the Norman chivalry, and through the means of the Norman settlers in Scotland, a similar taste must have been gradually encouraged at the Scottish court Of this fondness for mirth and the gay poetry of the troubadours, which appears to have prevailed to some extent at the Scottish court during the reigns of Alexander the Second and Third, a valuable proof seems to be furnished by the celebrated chesspiece, of which a woodcut is given This chesspiece is preserved in the collection formed by Sir John Clerk at Penicuick house and was found by John

Adair, geographer for Scotland, in 1682, somewhere in the north, while engaged in making a survey of the kingdom The piece consists in all of seven figures, and is supposed, although not we think on very sufficient grounds, to be of Scottish manufacture

In this curious and ingenious piece of art, a representation and description of which is given in 'Wilson's Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland,' page 579, (where it is supposed to belong to the fourteenth century), the queen, probably intended for Queen Mary de Couci, is represented crowned and seated on her throne, with a lapdog on her knee, and what is apparently a book, perhaps of troubadour poetry, in her right hand On her left stands a knight in full armour, with drawn sword and shield, who appears to be reciting verses, while a trouvere or minstrel on her left seems to be accompanying him on the crowde, a musical instrument then in use which somewhat resembled the violin The four female figures behind have hold of each other by the hand, while the one next the minstrel bears a palm-branch The whole seems intended to embody some display before the queen of the joyous science, in which the troubadours took so much delight

ALEXANDER, a surname in Scotland, probably derived originally from the first king of that name, but chiefly borne by the earls of Stirling and their descendants The family of Alexander, earls of Stirling, is traced from a remote period by genealogists, who derive it from a branch of the Macdonalds Somerled, king of the Isles, who lived in the reign of Malcolm the Fourth, and was slain in battle about 1164, had by his second wife Effrica, daughter of Olave the Red, king of Man, three sons, Dugall, Reginald, and Angus After Somerled's death, the Isles, with the exception of Arran and Bute, which had come to him with his wife, descended to Dugall, his eldest son by his second marriage Dugall also possessed the district of Lorn On his death the Isles did not immediately pass into the possession of his children, but appear, according to the Highland law of succession, to have been acquired by his brother Reginald, who, in consequence, assumed the title of king of the Isles [Skene's History of the Highlanders, vol ii p 49] The portion of property which fell to Reginald's share on his father's death consisted of Islay among the Isles, with Kintyre and part of Lorn The genealogists of the noble family of Stirling have confounded this Reginald with his cousin Reginald the Norwegian, king of Man and the Isles, who was contemporary with him, and who was the son of Godred the Black, king of Man, the brother of Effrica, Somerled's second wife Reginald, lord of Islay and South Kintyre and king of the Isles, was the father of Donald, the progenitor of the clan Donald, who had three sons, Roderick, Angus, and Alexander Roderick's male descendants became extinct in the third generation The second son, Angus, lord of Islay, the Angus Mohr of the Sennachies, and the first of his race who acknowledged himself a subject of the King of Scotland, was ancestor of the earls of Ross, lords of the Isles, of the lords Macdonald, and of the earls of Antrim in Ireland His grandson, John, lord of the Isles, took for his second wife, the princess Margaret, daughter of Robert II , and his third son by her, Alexander, Lord of Lochaber forfeited in 1431, had two sons, Angus, ancestor of the Macalisters of Loup, Argyleshire, and Alexander Macalister, who obtained the lands of Menstrie, Clackmannanshire, in feu from the family of Argyle, and was ancestor of the earls of Stirling His posterity took the surname of Alexander from his Christian name He had a son, Thomas, 2d baron of Menstrie, who is mentioned as an arbiter in a dispute between the abbot of Cambuskenneth and Sir David Bruce of Clackmannan, 6th March 1505 Thomas' son, Andrew, 3d baron, was father of Alexander, Alexander, 4th baron, who had a son Andrew, 5th baron This gentleman was father of another Alexander Alexander, 6th baron of Menstrie, who died in 1594, leaving an only son, Sir William Alexander, 7th baron of Menstrie and first earl of Stirling, a Memoir of whom is subjoined in larger type

Sir William Alexander, the first earl of Stirling, married Janet, daughter and heiress of Sir William Erskine, titular archbishop of Glasgow, parson of Campsie, chancellor of the cathedral of Glasgow, and commendator of Paisley, a younger son of Erskine of Balgony, and cousin of the regent earl of Mar By her he had seven sons and three daughters

The earl's eldest son, William, Viscount Canada and Lord Alexander, was appointed an extraordinary lord of session in Scotland, in room of his father, 27th January 1635 He spent a winter in Nova Scotia as deputy-lieutenant, but the hardships he endured while there injured his constitution He died at London in 1638, during the lifetime of his father By his wife, Lady Mary Douglas, daughter of William, first marquis of Douglas, he had a son William, the second earl of Stirling, who died within six months after succeeding to the title, under eight years of age

Earl William was succeeded by his uncle Henry, who was the third son of the first earl,—the second son, Anthony, who had been knighted, and was master of works in Scotland, having, like his eldest brother Alexander, died before his father

The third earl died in 1644, leaving an only son, also named Henry, who became the fourth earl He died in 1691, leaving issue four sons, whereof Henry the eldest succeeded as fifth earl, but died without issue 4th December 1739 His three younger brothers having also died without issue in his lifetime, the title became dormant

The first earl of Stirling's fourth son, John, married the daughter and heiress of John Graham of Gartmore, of which estate the earl obtained a charter 23d January 1636 By this lady the Hon John Alexander had a daughter but no sons, and in 1644, he sold Gartmore to Graham of Donnans, progenitor of the baronets of Gartmore, and the Grahams of Gallangad

Charles, the first earl's fifth son, had an only son Charles, who died without issue Ludovick the sixth son died in infancy, and James the youngest died without issue male

In 1830, a gentleman of the name of Mr Alexander Humphrys, or Alexander, came forward, and claimed the titles and honours as descended from a younger branch of the family by the female side, his mother Hannah, the wife of William Humphrys, Esq of the Larches, Warwickshire, assuming to be countess of Stirling in her own right She died in September 1814, and in April 1825 he began to style himself earl of Stirling and Dovan, but was in 1839, tried before the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, on a charge of forging certain documents on which he founded his claim The jury declared the documents forgeries, but found the charge against Humphrys of having forged them not proven. The result of the trial was to put an end to his pretensions to the earldom. Another supposed descendant, Major-general Alexander, of the United States service generally styled Lord Stirling, distinguished himself during the revolutionary war in North America, and died in 1783 See STIRLING, earl of

The noble family of Alexander earls of Caledon in Ireland, is descended from a junior branch of the house of Stirling

ALEXANDER, SIR WILLIAM, first earl of Stirling, an eminent poet and statesman, styled by Drummond of Hawthornden, "that most excellent spirit and earliest gem of our north," was the son of Alexander Alexander of Menstrie, in Stirlingshire, and was born, about 1580, in Menstrie House, which is celebrated also as the birthplace of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and of which a wood-cut is given at page 5 All his patrimony was the small estate of Menstrie, of which he was the seventh proprietor, but he acquired both fortune and rank for himself After completing his education, he accompanied the seventh earl of Argyle to the continent as his travelling tutor and companion On his return to Scotland, he lived for some time in retirement, employing himself in composing amatory verses His first poetical effusions were inspired by a passion which he entertained for a lady, whom he fancifully calls "Aurora" His suit was unsuccessful The lady of his love married a much older person, and like another Petrarch he continued to address her in lachrymatory sonnets These, a hundred in number, were published in London in 1604, under the title of 'Aurora, containing the First Fancies of the Author's Youth' He subsequently married Janet, daughter and heiress of Sir William Erskine, cousin of the regent earl of Mar, as stated above He next turned his attention to grave and moral subjects, with a view to the direction of princes and rulers, in a series of tragedies, formed upon the Greek and Roman models, at least in their choirusses between the acts One of these, founded upon the story of Darius, was published in Edinburgh in 1603 He had been early introduced to the royal notice, as his residence was near the castle of Stirling, where James the Sixth often held his court, and shortly after that monarch, with whom he had ingratiated himself by his poetry, had removed to England, in the year stated (1603), Alexander followed him to London At court he distinguished himself by his genius and accomplishments, and soon obtained the place of gentleman of the privy chamber to Prince Henry, the eldest son of King James To this youthful and amiable prince he addressed his 'Paræneasis, or Exhortation to Government,' a poem containing important and useful lessons to an heir of royalty After Prince Henry's death he published it, re-addressed to the new heir-apparent, Prince Charles From this poem we may quote one short specimen

"O heavenly knowledge! which the best sort loves, Life of the soul! reformer of the will!
Clear light! which from the mind each cloud removes,
Pure spring of vertue, physick for each ill!
Which, in prosperity, a bridle proves,
And, in adversity, a pillar still
Of thee the more men get, the more they crave,
And think, the more they get, the lesse they have"

In 1607 the tragedy of Darius, above referred to, was republished with three others, namely, Crœsus, The Alexandræan, and Julius Cæsar, under the title of 'Monarchic Tragedies' They had another title, 'Elegiac Dialogues for the Instruction of the Great,' and were dedicated to the king None of them were adapted to the stage The point of these moral 'Monarchic Tragedies' was to illustrate the superiority of merit to dignity Thus, in Crœsus, we have the following lines

'More than a crown true worth should be esteemed
One Fortune gives, the other is our own,
By which the mind from anguish is redeemed,
When Fortune's goods are by herself o'erthrown"

And in Darius there is the following sentiment

"Who would the title of true worth were his,
Must vanquish vice, and no base thoughts conceive
The bravest trophy ever man obtained
Is that which o'er himself himself hath gained"

We are afraid, however, that the tragedies were monarchic in more senses than one Instead of such moral truisms, had he checked the intemperate spirit of kingcraft and selfish policy of James, or pointed out, as soon as they began to display themselves in his son Charles, the folly and danger of that love of the prerogative and fatal duplicity which afterwards led him to the block, he would have rendered a benefit to these monarchs, and done good service to humanity One of these plays, called 'The Alexandræan,' gave rise to the following Latin epigram by Arthur Johnston, editor of his 'Whole Works'

"Confer Alexandros, Macedo victricibus armis Magnus erat, Scotus carmine Major uter?"

Prince Henry died in 1612, and in 1613 Alexander was appointed one of the gentlemen ushers of the presence to Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I In the same year he published a 'Supplement,' to complete the third part of Sir Philip Sydney's romance of 'Arcadia,' which had been written some years before In 1614 he received the honour of knighthood from king James, who used to call him his "philosophic poet," and was made Master of Requests The same year he published at Edinburgh his largest work, a sacred poem entitled 'Doomsday, or the Great Day of Judgement,' of which there have been several editions It is supposed that Milton has copied from this in some parts of his Paradise Lost, or at least derived some of his suggestions from it At this period he commenced his political career The object which first attracted his attention was the settlement of a colony in North America, in a part of the Council of New England's patent from King James, which they were desirous of surrendering Of this great tract of country he had a royal grant, dated at Windsor the 10th September 1621, by which the said extensive territory was then given to him to hold hereditarily, with the office of hereditary lieutenant, and was thenceforth to be called Nova Scotia The following sketch of this proposed settlement is abridged from Bancroft's History of the Colonization of America Sir Frederick Gorges, governor of Plymouth in New England, a man of energy of character, and zeal for discovery, having a few months previous, November 3, 1620, obtained from James a patent for the famous association, which has but one parallel in the history of the world, whereby forty English subjects, incorporated as "The Council established at Plymouth for the planting, ruling, and governing New England in America," obtained an exclusive right to possess and rule over territory extending from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that company, under a grant from whom the Pilgrim fathers about the same time obtained the privilege of a settlement, being unwilling to witness the Roman Catholic religion and the French monarch in possession of the eastern coast of North America, sought to secure the safety of the northern frontier of the region assigned to them (now the present state of Maine), by inviting the Scottish nation to become the guardians of its frontier, and Sir William Alexander, as a man of influence with King James, and already animated with the ambition, so common to the courtiers of that age, of engaging in colonial adventure, was persuaded to second a design which promised to establish his personal dignity and advance his interest Accordingly, without difficulty a patent was obtained by him, as already stated, on the 10th September 1621, for all the territory lying east of the St Croix, and south of the St Lawrence Immediate attempts were made to effect a Scottish settlement A ship was sent out in 1622, but it only came in sight of the shore, and those on board, declining the perils of colonization, returned to the permanent fishing station at Newfoundland In the following spring a second ship arrived, but the two vessels in company hardly possessed courage to do more than survey the coast After making a partial survey of the harbours, and the adjacent lands, they postponed the formation of a colony, and returned with a brilliant account of the soil, climate, and productions of Nova Scotia, which is still to be read in Purchas and other authors

The territory thus ceded, however, and designated Nova Scotia, had already been included in the French province of Acadia and New France, which, with a better title on the ground of discovery, had been granted by Henry the Fourth of France, in 1603, and had been immediately occupied by his subjects, and it was not to be supposed that the reigning French monarch would esteem his rights to his rising colonies invalidated by a parchment under the Scottish seal, or prove himself so forgetful of his kingly duty and honour as to withdraw his protection from the emigrants who had settled in America on the faith of the crown [Bancroft's History of the United States, edition 1843, p. 134.] The accession of Charles the First in 1625, and his marriage with Henrietta Maria, the daughter of the French king, might have been expected to lead to some adjustment between the rival claimants of the wilds of Acadia, but England would not recognise the rights of France, and King Charles, by a charter dated at Oatlands, July 12, 1625, confirmed Sir William Alexander, and his heirs, in the office of lieutenant of Nova Scotia, with all the prerogatives with which he had been so lavishly invested by King James, and the right of creating an order of baronets of Nova Scotia All who paid a hundred and fifty pounds for six thousand acres were to receive the honour of a knight baronetcy, and his majesty, by letter to his privy council of Scotland, dated 19th July 1625, fixed the quantity of land that Sir William might grant to the baronets created by him as the qualification and to sustain the title, to be "thrie myles in breadth, and six in lenth, of landis within New Scotland, for their severall proportions" The difficulty of infefting the new-made baronets in their remote possessions was overcome by a royal mandate, converting the soil of the Castle Hill of Edinburgh, for the time being, into that of Nova Scotia, and they were accordingly invested with their honours on this spot Sir William Alexander was to have the precedence of all the baronets He had the same year (1625) published a pamphlet entitled 'An Encouragement to Colonies,' the object of which was to show the advantages which were likely to accrue to the nation from the prosecution of the scheme The grants of such title of baronet, though bestowed, in the first instance, in consequence of the voluntary surrender of Sir William, before or after he became earl of Stirling, were afterwards held of the crown, by charter of Novodamus to the respective parties No baronet, however, obtained such grant from the king, without having previously obtained the portion of lands for its qualification, from Sir William Alexander, the lord proprietor of the country Sir William was also invested with the privilege of coining small copper money The sale of lands proved to the poet's lucrative traffic, and he forthwith planted and began to settle a colony at Port Royal, where he built a fort

The version of the Psalms of David into Scottish verse, prepared by King James, had been committed to Sir William Alexander by his majesty for revisal; but from the following extract of a letter to his friend Drummond of Hawthornden, of date 28th April 1620, it would appear that the pedantic monarch, with characteristic vanity, thought his own translation of one of the psalms better than those of the two first poets of his time "Brother," says Alexander, "I received your last letter, with the Psalm you sent, which I think very well done I had done the same long before it came, but he (meaning King James) prefers his own to all else, though, perchance, when you see it, you will think it the worst of the three No man must meddle with that subject, and therefore I advise you to take no more pains therein" On the 28th of December 1627 he received a license from Charles I to print the late king's version of the Psalms, with the exclusive copyright for thirty-one years The first edition was accordingly published at Oxford in 1631, but the earl derived little benefit from the privilege thus conferred upon him, as King James' translations of the Psalms, although the use of them was attempted to be enforced by King Charles throughout his dominions, were rejected by the Scottish church and people, and not encouraged by the English, and in the civil war that followed they were lost sight of altogether

In 1626 Sir William Alexander was appointed principal secretary of state for Scotland On the 2d of February, 1628, he had another charter, under the great seal of Scotland, in which he was described as the king's hereditary lieutenant of Nova Scotia, and had a grant of certain islands and territories, the bounds of which were most extensive, and the whole were erected into an entire and free lordship, then, and at all times thereafter, to be called and designated the "Lordship of Canada," from the great river then bearing that name, on both sides of which lay the territories granted This colony, as well as that of Nova Scotia, was founded and established at the sole private expense of Sir William Alexander, the grantee, and both grants were confirmed to him by the parliament of Scotland in 1633

On the 4th of September 1630, he was created

Lord Alexander of Tullibody, and Viscount Stirling in the Scottish peerage Charles the First had, in 1627, entered into a war with France, in support of the Huguenots of that kingdom, which continued until April 1629, when it was terminated by articles of peace, concluded at Susa in Piedmont During this war, Sir David Kertk of Dieppe, a Calvinist, called Kirk by the English and American historians, and his two brothers, Louis and Thomas, having received the command of three English ships, sailed in 1628 on an expedition against Quebec, then in the hands of the French, which they summoned to surrender The garrison, though destitute alike of provisions and military stores, returned a proud defiance, but after the Kertks had defeated a squadron sent to its relief, and reduced the garrison to extreme suffering and the verge of famine, Quebec capitulated 19th July, 1629 "Thus," says Bancroft, "did England, one hundred and thirty years before the enterprise of Wolfe, make the conquest of the capital of New France" Before, however, this conquest had been achieved, peace had been proclaimed betwixt England and France, and an article in the treaty already mentioned promised the restitution of all acquisitions made in America subsequent to its date, April 14, 1629

In consequence of a letter from his majesty, Charles the First, to the lords of the privy council in Scotland, on the subject of the dispute betwixt the English and French concerning the title of lands in America and particularly New Scotland, their lordships, with the other estates of the realm, being assembled in convention, 31st July 1630, unanimously agreed that his majesty should "be petitioned to maintain his right of New Scotland, and to protect his subjects, undertakers of the said plantation, in the peaceable possession of the same, as being a purpose highlie concerning his majestie's honour, and the good and credit of this his ancient kingdom" The removal of the colony planted at Port Royal was nevertheless commanded by his majesty, together with the destruction of the fort built for its protection, and the evacuation of Port Royal itself, by a letter to Sir William Alexander, then Viscount Stirling, dated Greenwich, 10th July 1631 This fort it seems was one which had been erected by Lord Stirling's son, Sir William Alexander, "on the site of the French cornfields, previous to the treaty of St Germains (afterwards referred to) The remains of this fort may be traced with great ease, the old parade, the embankment and ditch have not been disturbed, and preserve their original form" [Haliburton's History of Nova Scotia Halifax, 1829, vol ii page 156] The removal of the colony from Port Royal, although it was declared to have been only for a time, occasioned a great private loss to Lord Stirling, and operated as a discouragement to the planting and settling of Nova Scotia At the same time King Charles wrote to the lords of the council, 12th July, 1631, "We will be verie careful to maintain all our good subjects who do plant themselves there," and granted letters patent, 28th of the same month, wherein he declared, that he agreed to give up the fort and place of Port Royal, without prejudice nevertheless to his right or title, or that of his subjects, for ever, and even held out the prospect of its garrison, colonies, and inhabitants being allowed to return in consequence of approbation to that effect being obtained from the French king To their lordships he also wrote, under date 19th February, 1632, with a warrant in Lord Stirling's favour for £10,000 sterling, "in no ways for quitting the title, right, or possession of New Scotland, or of any part thereof, but only for satisfaction of the losses that the said viscount hath, by giving order for removing of his colonie at our express command, for performing of an article of the treatie betwixt the French and us" This is doubtless what Sir Thomas Urquhart, in his 'Discovery of a most Exquisite Jewel,' &c, (8vo, 1652,) refers to, when he charges Lord Stirling with having sold the colony to the French "for a matter of five or six thousand pounds English money," but it so happens that this sum of ten thousand pounds was never paid either to Lord Stirling or any of his heirs

That fanciful knight speaks very slightingly of Lord Stirling's plans of colonization, and especially of his project of raising money by the creation and sale of baronetcies in what he calls "that kingdom of Nova Scotia," and says that "the ancient gentry of Scotland esteemed such a whimsical dignity to be a disparagement, rather than any addition to their former honour" Their descendants, however, are of a different opinion The order of baronets of Scotland and Nova Scotia is considered highly honourable From the beginning of the reign of Charles the First, when it was first instituted, to the end of the reign of Queen Anne, when the last member was created, upwards of two hundred and eighty baronets of this order were made in all, and of these creations about one hundred and seventy exist at present The badge of the order is a medal bearing the arms of Nova Scotia, encircled by the motto, "Fax mentis honestæ gloria," suspended from the neck by an orange tawny riband

Owing to the capture of Quebec by Sir David Kertk, the king of France detained four hundred thousand crowns, part of his sister the queen of England's portion This brought about a treaty with King Charles, who empowered his ambassador, Sir Isaac Wake, to conclude the dispute 29th June 1631, but it was not till 29th March 1632 that the treaty was signed, by which King Charles agreed to make his subjects withdraw from all the places occupied by them, and for that effect gave orders to those who commanded in Port Royal, the fort of Quebec, and Cape Breton, to render up these places and fort into the hands of such persons as the French king should please to appoint, which put an end to all differences, and the remaining half of the queen's portion was paid by the French king [Prince's Annals of New England] This treaty is known in history as the treaty of St Germains Although by this treaty Nova Scotia was not ceded at all, but only Port Royal commanded to be given up, the French from Quebec and the surrounding district thereafter suddenly broke into the country of Nova Scotia, on the unsupported pretence of a right to the possession of it, by the treaty just referred to The troubles in England, in which King Charles was involved, prevented his breaking with the French court, and the French availed themselves of the opportunity of the convulsed state of Britain to take possession of Nova Scotia, and keep it for a long time, without being molested, or any effectual remonstrances being made against their aggression

In June 1633 the patents or grants to Sir William Alexander, viscount of Stirling, were solemnly ratified by the Scottish parliament, and at the coronation of King Charles at Holyrood on the 14th of the same month, with a view to perpetuate the name of the lordship of Canada in his family, the king, by other letters patent, created him viscount of Canada, and earl of Stirling His salary as secretary of state for Scotland was only one hundred pounds sterling, but the privilege which, as already stated, he had received from the king, of issuing small coins, as well as his sale of baronetcies, added much to his fortune As, however, the intrinsic value of these coins was inferior to their nominal, this monopoly was unpopular They were called "turners," from the French town Tournois, where this money was first coined, and which, being a mixture of copper and brass termed billon, was known by the name of "turners" from this circumstance, as also "billons" from the mixture of which they were composed Thus the poet Beattie, in the only known composition of his in the Scottish language, referring to the disposition which prevailed on the part of the Scots to look to English to the neglect of native literature, after the death of Allan Ramsay, thus uses the word

> "Since Allan's death, nae body car'd
> For anes to speer how Scotia far'd, > Nor plack nor thristled turner wan'd
> To quench her drouth,
> For, frae the cottar to the laird
> We a' run south"

It was called the thristled, that is, thistled turner, to distinguish it from the French coin, which, owing to the friendship subsisting between the Scots and the French, circulated in Scotland even so late as the reign of Louis the Fourteenth The Scottish turner, or tournois, bore the national emblem of the thistle It was sometimes called a bodle, or black farthing, value two pennies Scotch, being half a plack, value fourpence Scotch, or one-third of a penny English The motto of the earl of Stirling was "Per Mare, per Terras," which, with his armorial bearings, he caused to be placed in front of a spacious mansion he had erected at Stirling His motto, in allusion to his poetry and his coinage, was thus parodied by the sarcastic Scott of Scotstarvet, "per metres, per turners," which became current among the people The house remains, but has been long known by the name of Argyle's lodging, the arms of the Alexanders having after his death in 1640, when it passed into that family, been removed to make way for those of Argyle "This baronial edifice is a very excellent specimen," says Billings, in his 'Baronial Architecture of Scotland,' "of that French style which predominated in the north in the early part of the seventeenth century Its characteristic features are, round towers or turrets, whether at the exterior or interior angles, with conical summits, rows of richly ornamented dormer windows, and a profuse distribution of semi-classic mouldings and other decorations" The accompanying cut represents it as originally constructed, and before the cone-topped tower was substituted by the polygonal one erected in 1674 It is taken from the highly interesting work above referred to The original portion bears the date of 1632 After the additions made to it in 1674, James VII, when duke of York, became its inmate as guest of Argyle, "an incident," says Billings, "noticed in connection with the circumstance, that the guest was subsequently instrumental in putting his host to death" It was here the great Duke John held his council of war, when suppressing the rebellion of 1715 The building subsequently came into possession of the Crown, and is now used as a military hospital for the garrison [Nimmo's Stirlingshire, p 342] Besides being secretary of state, an office which he is said to have held with no small degree of reputation till his death, his lordship was by Charles the First appointed a member of the privy council, keeper of the signet in Scotland, commissioner of exchequer, and an extraordinary lord of session, a plurality of offices doubtless sufficient for one man

In 1637, by a privy seal precept dated 30th July, the earl was created earl of Dovan in Scotland, with precedency from June 1633 He continued to procure the creation of baronets of those persons respectively who concurred with him in the great enterprise of fully planting Nova Scotia, and he made up their territorial qualifications for receiving the dignity, by surrender of portions of the lands in their favour This, we are told, he did down to 31st July 1637, at which time he ceased to make them, intelligence having reached him that the French had overrun the country and held it in possession Thus, twelve years after the commencement of this great undertaking,—when one hundred and eleven baronets having fulfilled the stipulated conditions of the institution, had each received grants of sixteen thousand acres, which were erected into free baronies of regality, and two parliaments of Scotland, in 1630 and 1633, had ratified and confirmed all the privileges of the order,—it fell to the ground

In 1638 Lord Stirling's eldest son and heir, William, lord Alexander, died, when his lordship made a surrender of all his honours and estates into the hands of King Charles, who, by a charter of Novodamus, under the great seal of Scotland, dated the 7th of December 1639, regranted them to the earl, to hold to himself and the heirs male of his body, whom failing to the eldest heirs female Shortly after this, Lord Stirling died at London, on the 12th of September 1640, and was interred at Stirling on the 12th of April thereafter His corpse was deposited in a leaden coffin in the family aisle in the church of Stirling, aboveground, and remained entire for a hundred years He never relinquished any of the rights vested in him under his patents, and an assignment of them in trust was executed by him only two weeks before his death. The accompanying portrait of his lordship is taken from one given in Walpole's Royal and Noble authors

The province of Nova Scotia finally came under the undisputed possession of Great Britain in 1763 By the fourth article of the treaty of Paris, of 10th February of that year, the French king renounced all pretensions to Nova Scotia in all its parts, and thus, with Canada, its sovereignty was re-acquired by Great Britain, in whose possession it now remains The baronets of Scotland and Nova Scotia in the year 1836, held a meeting at Edinburgh for the purpose of reviving the objects for which their order was created, and a "Case, showing their rights and privileges, dignitorial and territorial," was shortly thereafter published by Richard Broun, Esq, the secretary of the order, afterwards Sir Richard Broun, baronet, of Colstoun, Dumfries-shire, but there is very little likelihood now of them ever regaining the lands in Nova Scotia which were originally granted with their titles Since Queen Anne's time no new Nova Scotia baronets have been made Those created are styled baronets of Great Britain, and no payment of money can now purchase the title, although of course expenses attend the passage of a patent, on the title being conferred —By his countess, as already stated in the preliminary notice, the earl of Stirling had seven sons and three daughters, but only three sons and two daughters survived him

A complete edition of Lord Stirling's works, revised by himself, was published in 1637, in one volume folio, under the title of 'Recreations with the Muses' This work contained his four 'Monarchick Tragedies,' his 'Doomsday,' the 'Paræneses to Prince Henry,' and the first book of an intended heroic poem, entitled 'Jonathan' His poems are generally of a grave and moralizing character, and possess considerable merit Mr George Chalmers has remarked, that he must be allowed to have sentiments that sparkle, though not "words that burn," [Apology for the Believers, &c, p 420], and Mr Alexander Chalmers adds to this remark that "his versification is, in general, much superior to that of his contemporaries, and approaches nearer to the elegance of modern times than could have been expected from one who wrote so much" His works were highly praised by writers of his own day The opinion of Drummond of Hawthornden has been already quoted Michael Drayton, who commended Lord Stirling's poems highly, expresses a wish to be known as the friend of a writer "whose muse was like his mind," and John Davies of Hereford, in a book of epigrams, published about the year 1611, praises the tragedies of his lordship, and says that "Alexander the Great had not gained more glory with his sword than this Alexander had gained by his pen" Higher approbation even than this, as coming from a higher authority in matters of literature, is afforded in the verdict of Addison, who said of Lord Stirling's "whole works," that "he had read them over with the greatest satisfaction' Dr Currie, in his Life of Burns, says, "Lord Stirling and Drummond of Hawthornden studied the language of England, and composed in it with precision and elegance They were, however, the last of their countrymen who deserved to be considered as poets in that century" Dean Swift, in one of his poems, has brought their names together as

"Scottish bards of highest fame,

His plays appear to be mere dramatic poems, more fitted for perusal in the closet than representation on the stage, and accordingly none of them seem ever to have been acted Three poems by his lordship and a few of his letters, with 'Anacrisis, or a Censure of Poets,' occur in the folio edition of Drummond's works The latter of these productions is considered very creditable to his lordship's talents as a critic As a proof of the unpopularity of Lord Stirling in his native country on account of his small copper money, it is stated by Burnet, in his Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, that he durst not come to Scotland to attend to the king's affairs as secretary of state His productions are as follows

ALLAN, a name meaning, in the British, Alan swift like a greyhound, in the Saxon, Alwin, winning all, and in the Celtic Alunn, when applied to mental qualities or conduct illustrious The primary meaning of the word, however is sparkling or beautiful and it is on that account the name of several rivers particularly one in Perthshire, which waters the fertile district of Strathallan It is the opinion of Chalmers that the Alauna of Ptolemy and of Richard of Westminster, (in his Itinera Romana, a work referable to the second century,) was situated on the Allan, about a mile above its confluence with the Forth, so that the name has an ancient as well as a classical origin The popular song of 'On the banks of Allan Water' is supposed to refer to a smaller stream of the same name, a tributary of the Teviot Allan is also not unfrequently a Christian name in Scotland as Allan Ramsay

ALLAN, DAVID an eminent historical painter, the son of David Allan, shoremaster at Alloa, was born there on 13th February 1744 His mother, Janet Gullan, a native of Dunfermline, died a few days after his birth, and it is related of him that, when a baby, his mouth was so small that no nurse in his native place could give him suck, and a countrywoman being found, after some inquiry, a few miles from the town, whose breast he could take, he was, one very cold day, after being wrapped up in a basket, amidst cotton, to keep him warm, sent off to her under the charge of a man on horseback On the road the horse stumbled, the man fell off, and the little Allan being thrown out of the basket among the snow which then covered the ground, received a severe cut on his head While yet a mere child of little more than eighteen months old, he experienced another narrow escape from a premature death The servant girl who had the care of him, while out with him in her arms one day in the autumn of 1745, thoughtlessly ran in front of some loaded cannons, at the very moment that they were fired by way of experiment, but she and the child were providentially not touched

Like that of many other great painters, his genius for designing was discovered by accident. Being when a boy kept at home from school, on account of a burnt foot, his father seeing him one day doing nothing, reproved him for his idleness, and giving him a bit of chalk, told him to draw something with it on the floor He accordingly attempted to delineate figures of houses, animals, &c, and was so well pleased with his own success, and so fond of the amusement, that the chalk was seldom afterwards out of his hand His sense of the ludicrous was great, and he could not always resist the propensity to satire Having when about ten years of age drawn a caricature on his slate of his schoolmaster, a conceited old dominie, who used to strut about the school attired in a tartan nightcap and long tartan gown, and circulated it among the boys, it fell into the hands of the object of it, who straightway complained to Allan's father, and he was in consequence withdrawn from his school On being questioned by his father as to how he had the impudence to insult his master in such a way, he answered, "I only made it like him, and it was all for fun" In one account of his life it is stated that the first rude efforts of his genius were formed merely by a knife, and displayed a degree of taste and skill far above his years, and these having attracted the notice of Mr Stewart, then collector of the customs at Alloa, that gentleman, when at Glasgow, mentioned the merits of young Allan to Mr Foulis, the celebrated printer, and he was sent, on the 25th of February 1755, when eleven years of age, to the Messrs Foulis' academy of painting and engraving at Glasgow, where he remained seven years In the year 1764 some of his performances attracted the notice of Lord Cathcart of Shaw Park, near Alloa At the expense of his lordship, Mr Abercromby of Tullibody, and other persons of fortune in Clackmannanshire, to whom his talents had recommended him, among whom were Lady Frances Erskine of Mar, and Lady Charlotte Erskine, he afterwards proceeded to Italy, and studied for sixteen years at Rome In 1775, he received the gold medal given by the academy of St Luke, in that city, for the best specimen of historical composition, the subject being 'The Origin of Painting, or the Corinthian Maid drawing the Shadow of her Lover,' an admirable engraving of which was executed at Rome by Dom Cunego in 1776, and of which copies were published by him in February 1777, after his return to London Mr Allan presented the medal received by him for this painting to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, on the 7th January 1783, and an account of it was published in their transactions, vol ii pp 75, 76 The only other Scotsman who had ever received the gold medal of St Luke's academy was Mr Gavin Hamilton After a residence of two years in London, he returned to Edinburgh, in 1779, and, on the death of Alexander Runciman in 1786, was appointed director and master of the academy established by the board of trustees for manufactures and improvements in Scotland In 1788 he published an edition of the Gentle Shepherd, with characteristic etchings In 'Observations on the Plot and Scenery of the Gentle Shepherd,' from Abernethy and Walker's edition (Edinburgh 1808), reprinted in edition of A Fullarton & Co, 1848 (vol ii p 25), the following passage occurs "In 1786, an unexpected visit was paid at New Hall house, (the romantic seat of Mr John Forbes, advocate, situated in the parish of Penicuik, Edinburghshire, the scenery round which is supposed to have been that of the Gentle Shepherd,) by Mr David Allan, painter in Edinburgh, accompanied by a friend, both of whom were unknown to the family His object was to collect scenes and figures, where Ramsay had copied his, for a new edition of the pastoral Mr Allan was an intelligent Scottish antiquarian, and well acquainted with everything connected with the poetry and literature of his country His excellent quarto edition was published in 1788, with aquatinta plates, in the true spirit and humour of Ramsay Four of the scenes at New Hall are made use of with some figures collected there, and in his dedication to Hamilton of Murdiston in Lanarkshire, the celebrated historical painter, he writes, 'I have studied the same characters' (as those of Ramsay), 'from the same spot, and I find that he has drawn faithfully, and with taste, from nature This likewise has been my model of imitation, and while I attempted, in these sketches, to express the ideas of the poet, I have endeavoured to preserve the costume as nearly as possible, by an exact delineation of such scenes and persons as he actually had in his eye'" Mr Allan published also, some time after, a collection of the most humorous old Scottish songs, with similar drawings, these publications, with his illustrations of the Cottar's Saturday Night, the Stool of Repentance, the Scottish Wedding, the Highland Dance, and other sketches of rustic character, all etched by himself in aquatinta, procured for him the title of the Scottish Hogarth One of his subjects, representing a poor man receiving charity from the hand of a young woman, is here copied

As an instance of simple character and feeling without caricature, it gives a tolerably good idea of his natural manner, and illustrates the particular locality of Edinburgh of that epoch, where its scene is laid It, as well as the view of the General Assembly, which appears in another part of this volume, was also etched by himself He likewise etched and published various subjects drawn when in Italy, exhibiting the peculiarities of the people, and especially the devotional extravagances of the church of Rome of that time, which appear to have excited his sense of the ludicrous Besides these he published four engravings, done in aquatinta by Paul Sandby, from drawings made by himself when at Rome, where, in a vein of quiet drollery, he holds up to ridicule the festivities of that city in connection with the sports of the carnival Several of the figures were portraits of persons well known to the English who visited Rome during his stay there, and their truthfulness gave much satisfaction at the time

His personal appearance was not in his favour "His figure," says the author of his life in Brown's Scenery edition of the Gentle Shepherd, 1808, "was a bad resemblance of his humorous precursor of the English metropolis He was under the middle size, of a slender, feeble make, with a long, sharp, lean, white, coarse face, much pitted by the small pox, and fair hair His large prominent eyes, of a light colour, looked weak, near sighted, and not very animated His nose was long and high, his mouth wide, and both ill-shaped His whole exterior to strangers appeared unengaging, trifling and mean His deportment was timid and obsequious The prejudices naturally excited by these external disadvantages at introduction, were soon, however, dispelled on acquaintance, and, as he became easy and pleased, gradually yielded to agreeable sensations, till they insensibly vanished, and were not only overlooked, but, from the effect of contrast, even heightened the attractions by which they were so unexpectedly followed When in company he esteemed, and which suited his taste, as restraint wore off, his eye imperceptibly became active, bright and penetrating, his manner and address quick, lively, and interesting — always kind, polite, and respectful, his conversation open and gay, humorous without satire and playfully replete with benevolence, observation, and anecdote" He resided in Dickson's close, High street, Edinburgh, where he received private pupils in his art One of the most celebrated of his pupils was the late Mr H W Williams, commonly called Grecian Williams "The satiric humour and drollery," says Mr Wilson, in his Memorials of Edinburgh (vol ii page 40), "of his well-known 'rebuke scene' in a country church, and the lively expression and spirit of the 'General Assembly,' and others of his own etchings, amply justify the character he enjoyed among his contemporaries as a truthful and humorous delineator of nature" "As a painter," says the author of his life already quoted, "at least in his own country, he neither excelled in drawing, composition, colouring, nor effect Like Hogarth, too, beauty, grace, and grandeur, either of individual outline and form, or of style, constitute no part of his merit He was no Correggio, Raphael, or Michael Angelo He painted portraits, as well as Hogarth, below the size of life, but they are recommended by nothing save a strong homely resemblance As an artist and a man of genius, his characteristic talent lay in expression, in the imitation of nature with truth and humour, especially in the representation of ludicrous scenes in low life His vigilant eye was ever on the watch for every eccentric figure, every motley group, or ridiculous incident, out of which his pencil or his needle could draw innocent entertainment and mirth" He died at Edinburgh on the 6th of August 1796, in the 53d year of his age, and was interred in the High Calton burying-ground He had married in 1788 Shirley Welsh, the youngest daughter of Thomas Welsh, a carver and gilder in Edinburgh He had five children, three of whom died in infancy His surviving son, David, went out as a cadet to India in 1806 He also left a daughter named Barbara —Brown's Scenery edition of the Gentle Shepherd, appendix

ALLAN, Robert, a minor poet, some of whose lyrics and songs have long been popular in Scotland, was born at Kilbarchan, in Renfrewshire, 4th November, 1774 He was a handloom weaver, and all his life in humble circumstances To relieve the tedium of his occupation he occasionally had recourse to poetry In 1836, a volume of his poems was published by subscription, but made no great impression The principal poem in the volume, entitled 'An Address to the Robin,' is written in the Scottish dialect His most popular pieces are 'The bonny built wherry,' 'The Covenanter's Lament,' 'Woman's wark will ne'er be done,' 'Haud awa' frae me, Donald,' and the ballad 'O speed, Lord Nithsdale' He had a numerous family, all of whom were married except his youngest son, a portrait painter of great promise, who emigrated to the United States Desirous of joining his son, Allan sailed for New York, where he arrived 1st June 1841, but died there on the 7th, six days after his arrival, from the effects of a cold caught on the banks of Newfoundland He is represented as having been a most single-hearted and unaffected being, and much of the simplicity of his character is reflected in his poems

ALLAN, Sir William, an eminent historical painter, was born at Edinburgh, in 1782, of humble parentage, his father being one of the doorkeepers of the Court of Exchequer He was educated partly at the High School of his native city, under William Nicol, the friend of Burns, and served his apprenticeship to a coach-painter, George Sanders the celebrated miniature-painter being in the same employment All his spare hours were devoted to drawing He studied for several years at the Trustees' Academy, having Wilkie as a fellow-student These two great painters began drawing from the same example, and thus continued for months, using the same copy, and sitting on the same form The friendship thus commenced in their youth increased with their years, and ceased but with the life of Wilkie, who died nine years before him One of his first pieces engraved was 'Flora parting with Ascanius,' in Home's 'Adventures of the young Ascanius,' 1804 After the close of his studies in Edinburgh, Allan removed to London, and was admitted to the school of the Royal Academy, where he remained some time Not ultimately finding professional employment in London, he determined upon proceeding to Russia, to try whether encouragement could not be obtained in that country, and that he might study the rude and picturesque aspects there presented, and find suitable and striking materials for his pencil Hastily communicating his intention to his friends in Scotland, with one or two letters of introduction to some of his countrymen at St Petersburg, he embarked in 1805 in a vessel bound for Riga Owing to adverse winds the ship, almost a wreck, was driven into Memel in Prussia, where, though ignorant of the German language, he took up his abode at an inn, and at once commenced portrait-painting He began with the portrait of the Danish consul, to whom he had been introduced by the captain of the vessel Having, in this way, recruited his nearly empty purse, he proceeded overland to St Petersburg, encountering on the road various romantic incidents, and passing through a great portion of the Russian army on their way to the battle of Austerlitz On his arrival at the Russian capital, he was introduced to many valuable friends, through the kindness of Sir Alexander Crichton, then physician to the Imperial family, and was soon enabled to pursue his art diligently and successfully Having attained a knowledge of the Russian language, he travelled into the interior, and remained for several years in the Ukraine, making excursions at various times to Turkey, Tartary, the shores of the Black Sea, the Sea of Azoph, and the banks of the Kuban, amongst Cossacks, Circassians, Turks, and Tartars, visiting their huts and tents, studying their history, character, and costume and forming a collection of their arms and armour, for his future labours in art, as he had resolved to devote his great powers to historical painting

In 1812, Mr Allan began to think of returning to Scotland, but was prevented by the French invasion of Russia of that year The whole country was thrown into confusion and alarm by the Emperor Napoleon's advance to Moscow, and thus was Allan forced to remain, when he witnessed not a few heart-rending miseries incident to that eventful period In 1814, however, he was enabled to set out on his return home, and, after a lapse of ten years, he once more trod the streets of Edinburgh His improvement had been so rapid and so remarkable, that the most eminent of his countrymen in literature and art visited, and were in daily intercourse with, the young and enterprising artist, and he numbered among his friends Scott, Wilson, Lockhart, and other distinguished literati of the day in Edinburgh, which city he resolved to make his future residence His first efforts, after his return, were directed to embodying on the canvass, some of those romantic and striking scenes which had been suggested by his travels and adventures in the strange countries he had visited His 'Circassian Captives,' a work full of novel and original matter, character, and expression, and remarkable for the completeness of its design, and the masterly arrangement of its parts, was exhibited at Somerset House, London, in 1815, and immediately made his name generally known To this great picture succeeded 'Tartar Banditti,' 'Haslan Gheray crossing the Kuban,' 'A Jewish Wedding in Poland,' and 'Prisoners Conveyed to Siberia by Cossacks,' which, with many others, he brought together, and exhibited in Edinburgh, along with the armour and costumes he had collected in his travels The exhibition proved highly attractive, and the artist rose higher in the estimation of his countrymen His picture of 'The Circassians' was purchased by Sir Walter Scott, John Wilson, the poet, his brother, James, the naturalist, Lockhart, and a number of the artist's other friends, and it was resolved to raffle it in Edinburgh In a letter to the Duke of Buccleuch, dated 15th April, 1819, Sir Walter Scott, who took a great interest in Allan, thus gives an account of the circumstance, and of the artist himself,—"A hundred persons subscribed ten guineas apiece to raffle for his fine picture of the Circassian chief selling slaves to the Turkish pacha—a beautiful and highly poetical picture There was another small picture added by way of second prize and, what is curious enough, the only two peers on the list, Lord Wemyss and Lord Fife, both got prizes Allan has made a sketch, which I shall take to town with me when I can go, in hopes Lord Stafford, or some other picture-buyer, may fancy it, and order a picture The subject is the murder of Archbishop Sharpe on Magus Moor, prodigiously well treated The savage ferocity of the assassins, crowding on one another to strike at the old prelate on his knees, contrasted with the old man's figure, and that of his daughter endeavouring to interpose for his protection, and withheld by a ruffian of milder mood than his fellows—the dogged, fanatical severity of Rathillet's countenance, who remained on horseback, witnessing, with stern fanaticism, the murder he did not choose to be active in, lest it should be said that he struck out of private revenge—are all amazingly well combined" The picture which Allan executed from the sketch here described by Sir Walter Scott, was worthy of his genius It was afterwards engraved, and is well known The painting itself is in the possession of Mr Lockhart, of Milton-Lockhart Sir Walter added —"Constable (the eminent publisher) has offered Allan three hundred pounds to make sketches for an edition of the 'Tales of my Landlord,' and other novels of that cycle, and says he will give him the same sum next year, so, from being pinched enough, this very deserving artist suddenly finds himself at his ease He was long at Odessa with the Duke of Richelieu, and is a very entertaining person"

During the visit of the Grand Duke Nicholas, afterwards Czar of Russia, to Edinburgh, about this time, he purchased several of Allan's pictures, one, the 'Siberian Exiles,' and another, 'Haslan Cheray,' both already mentioned Allan's works were now readily bought His most affecting picture, 'The Press-Gang,' was purchased by Mr Horrocks of Tillyheeran, his 'Knox admonishing Mary, Queen of Scots' a work full of character, by Mr Trotter of Ballendean, and his 'Death of the Regent Moray,' by the then duke of Bedford A serious malady in his eyes which was a source of suffering for several years caused a cessation from all professional labours A change of climate being advised by his physician, he went to Italy, and after spending a winter at Rome, he proceeded to Naples, and thence made a journey to Constantinople He afterwards, with restored health, visited Morocco, Greece, Spain, and the wild range of country from Gibraltar to Persia, and from Persia to the Baltic, for the purpose of studying the scenery and manners of the various nations through which he passed These he faithfully embodied on his canvass, and among his greatest pictures in this style may be noticed 'The Discovery of the Cup in the Sack of Benjamin,' 'The Polish Captives,' 'The Slave Market at Constantinople,' which was purchased by Alexander Hill, Esq, print-publisher 'Tartar Banditti Dividing their Spoil,' 'The Moorish Love-Letter,' 'Byron in the Fisherman's Hut, after Swimming the Hellespont,' which was bought by his friend Robert Nasmyth Esq, who was also the purchaser of his whole-length cabinet portraits of 'Scott and Burns' The eastern pieces named were executed after his return to Edinburgh, with numerous others, descriptive of oriental scenery, persons, and manners The history of his own land also furnished him with subjects for his powerful and graphic pencil Besides 'The Murder of Archbishop Sharpe, and 'The Death of the Regent Moray,' he devoted his genius to many other scenes illustrative of our Scottish annals, so fruitful in remarkable and striking events. His painting of Mary and Rizzio is one of the best of these historic pictures

In his famous picture of 'The Ettrick Shepherd's House-heating,' executed in 1819, he introduced a portrait of his friend Sir Walter Scott, who had always a great regard for him His figure of 'The Author of Waverley in his Study,' done shortly before Sir Walter's death, is considered one of his most successful efforts in this department of art He also finished an admirable painting of Sir Walter's eldest son, when cornet of dragoons, holding his horse, which hangs over the mantelpiece of the great library at Abbotsford He was there during the last melancholy scenes of Scott's life Mr Lockhart says, "Perceiving, towards the close of August 1832, that the end was near, and thinking it very likely that Abbotsford might soon undergo many changes, and myself, at all events, never see it again, I felt a desire to have some image preserved of the interior apartments as occupied by their founder, and invited from Edinburgh, for that purpose, Sir Walter's dear friend, William Allan, whose presence, I well knew, would, even under the circumstances of that time, be nowise troublesome to any of the family, but the contrary in all respects Mr Allan willingly complied, and executed a series of beautiful drawings He also shared our watchings, and witnessed all but the last moments"

In 1834 he visited Spain, with the object of collecting fresh materials for the subjects of his art He sailed for Cadiz and Gibraltar, proceeded into West Barbary, and crossing again into Spain, travelled over the greater part of Andalusia, intending to go on to Madrid, but was recalled to Scotland, by news from home

In 1835 Mr Allan was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and in 1838 he was chosen president of the Royal Scottish Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture, on the death and in the room of Mr Watson, the original president In 1841, on the death of Sir David Wilkie, he was appointed her Majesty's limner for Scotland, and in the following year he was knighted He was an honorary member of the Academies of New York and Philadelphia

Having long intended to paint a picture of the Battle of Waterloo, he several times visited France and Belgium to make sketches of the memorable field, and to collect the requisite materials for his purpose The view he chose was from the French side, Napoleon and his staff being the foreground figures This picture was, in 1843, exhibited at the Royal Academy, London, and purchased by the Duke of Wellington, who expressed his high satisfaction at the truthfulness of the arrangement and detail in his work He was subsequently induced, by the success of the first, to paint another great picture of Waterloo, from the British side, with the view of entering the lists of the Westminster Hall competition of 1846 This piece also gained the approbation of the Duke of Wellington, and was much praised by the public, but though voted for by W Etty, R A , one of the best judges in the committee, as worthy of public reward, it was not judged deserving of a prize

In 1844 Allan revisited Russia, and had an opportunity of again seeing his early patron, the Emperor Nicholas While there he painted a picture of 'Peter the Great teaching his subjects the art of shipbuilding,' which is now in the winter palace of St Petersburgh

After his return to his native city, he continued his professional labours, with the enthusiasm that ever marked his character His last energies were expended on a national piece, and one commemorative of the most remarkable event in the history of Scotland's independence, namely, 'The Battle of Bannockburn,' on the same extensive scale as his latter picture of Waterloo On this picture he worked with as much diligence as his weakened condition would admit, for already his last illness was upon him So eager was he to complete the work in time for the ensuing exhibition of the Royal Academy, that, it is stated, he had his bed carried into his painting room that he might sleep near his work When the pencil at length fell from his hand he was too far gone in illness to be removed, and he died in his painting room, in front of his latest picture He was never married, his niece having kept house for him

many years been afflicted with chronic disease of the windwipe, and had latterly become much enfeebled His genius as an artist was of the highest order, and he possessed singularly unassuming manners and an amiable disposition As an instance of his kindly feeling, it may be stated that on a few of the scholars of Mr John Robertson, the first teacher in Gillespie's hospital, Edinburgh, who had been educated in that institution under his charge, wishing to have the portrait taken of their old master, two of them waited on Sir William Allan to ascertain if his engagements would permit him to do it, and on what terms, when, appreciating their motives, he at once generously agreed to paint Mr Robertson's portrait without remuneration, and it is now in the hall of the hospital Sir William was much esteemed, not only by his brother artists, but by an extensive circle of friends A picture of his commemorative of the Ettrick Shepherd's birthday, at Hogg's house at Altrive, after a day's sport in trouting and rambling on the mountains, contains nineteen portraits of the Shepherd's intimate friends and his own, in rural costumes, among whom, besides Hogg and himself, are Sir Walter Scott, his son-in-law John Gibson Lockhart, the two Ballantynes, James and John, Professor Wilson and his brother James, Captain Thomas Hamilton, author of 'Cyril Thornton,' Alexander Nasmyth, the celebrated landscape painter, David Brydges Constable the publisher, James Russell, the comedian, and James Bruce, piper to Sir Walter Scott, a list of names calculated to make the painting interesting, although not among the most finished of the artist's performances It is now the property of Mrs Gott of Armsly House

Sir William Allan was for a long period the only resident historical painter of his country, and for seventeen years master of the Trustees' academy, at Edinburgh, where he and Wilkie first began their career His excellence as a painter consisted in his dramatic power of portraying a story, and his general skill in composition, rather than in character or in colour He will be remembered in the history of Scottish art by the impulse which he gave to historical composition, while his name will always be endeared to the admirers of Sir Walter Scott by the strong partiality which the latter evinced on all occasions for his friend "Willie Allan" With the office of limner to the queen for Scotland, which Allan received in 1842, the honour of knighthood is always conveyed to its holder A small salary also accompanies it The office was revived by George the Fourth, and given to Sir Henry Raeburn, and at Raeburn's death it was conferred on Sir David Wilkie, who was succeeded by Sir William Allan At the death of the latter, Sir James Watson Gordon, R A, president and trustee of the Royal Scottish Academy, was appointed in his place A portrait of Sir William Allan is given separately Besides Wilkie, John Burnet the engraver, Alexander Fraser the painter, and others eminent in art, were his fellow students at the Trustees' Academy, Edinburgh When he first went to London, Opie, the Cornish painter, was then at the height of his reputation, and in the first picture which Allan sent to the Royal Academy, he imitated Opie's style, so far as colour went, with something like servility This picture, called 'A Gipsy and Ass,' was exhibited in 1805 His 'Russian Peasants Keeping Holiday' was exhibited in 1809 Besides the pictures above mentioned, he also painted the following —'Circassian Prince on Horseback selling two boys of his own nation to a Cossack chief of the Black Sea,' 'Circassian Chief selling to a Turkish Pasha Captives of a neighbouring tribe taken in war,' 'The parting between Prince Charles Stuart and Flora Macdonald at Portree,' and 'Jeanie Deans' first interview with her father after her return from London'

ALLARDICE, surname of, see BARCLAY-ALLARDICE.

ALPIN, king of the Dalriadic Scots, reigned contemporary with his cousin, Drust IX, king of the Picts He is usually said to have been the son of Achaius, or Loganan, that is, in the Celtic, Lochy-annuine (the poisonous), but Pinkerton thinks that the name of his father is lost beyond all recovery, and, indeed, the history of the country at a period so remote is so enveloped in darkness as to be considered in many respects fabulous He succeeded his brother, Dungal the Brown, in 834 His kingdom comprehended the mountainous country of Argyleshire, as far as the mouth of the Clyde, but, anxious to extend his territories, he sailed from Kintyre, and landed in the bay of Ayr, with a powerful force After laying waste the district between the rivers Ayr and Doon, following the course of these rivers, he penetrated to the ridge which separates Kyle from Galloway, destruction for a time marking his progress He soon, however, received a check The chiefs, recovered from their first alarm, and thirsting for revenge, collected their followers, and coming up with the invading army, in the parish of Dalmellington, in Ayrshire, a furious conflict ensued, when Alpin was numbered among the slain This event happened about 837 The battle was fought near the site of Laicht castle, which derived its name from the stone of Alpin, a gravestone known and recognised nearly four centuries after this last of the Dalriad kings had been slain on the spot The word laicht signifies a grave or stone, and there are still the remains of an old castle in the parish of Dalmellington, at a place called Laicht, which was demolished by the proprietor in 1771, to enclose some ground Two farms in the parish are still called Over and Nether Laicht, and several cairns are found which indicate the scene of the battle It is also remarkable that the foundation charter of the town of Ayr, granted by William the Lion in 1197, when describing the limits of its exclusive trade, names Laicht Alpin, the stone or grave of Alpin, as one of its distinguishing boundaries Alpin left two sons, Kenneth MacAlpin, under whom the Scots and Southern Picts were united, and Donald II, who succeeded Kenneth Alpin's attempt to extend his territories appears, says Skene, from the register of St Andrews, to have been confined to Galloway, the province of which in those days comprehended Ayrshire, and belonged to the Southern Picts, and it is said by that chronicle, that it was his conquest of that territory which transferred the kingdom of the Picts to the Scots The latter event is called the Scottish Conquest Kenneth his son apparently fought but one battle, and that, according to the same chronicle, at Forteviot, in the very heart of the territory of the Southern Picts [Skene's History of the Highlanders, vol i p 65] This Alpin is not to be confounded with another Alpin or Elpin, who was king of the Picts, and who reigned from 775 to 779 —Chalmers' Caledonia —Ritson's Annals, vol ii

ALSTON, Charles, an eminent physician and lecturer on botany, was born in Lanarkshire in 1683, and first studied at the university of Glasgow While a student there, he had the good fortune to be taken under the patronage of the duchess of Hamilton, and spent his early years at Hamilton palace By the assistance of her grace he was enabled to accomplish the design of devoting himself to the medical profession, and in the year 1716 he went, with the celebrated Dr Alexander Monro, to Leyden, where, after studying for three years under the celebrated Boerhaave, he took his degree of M D On his return he commenced practice in Edinburgh, and, by the interest of the duke of Hamilton, heritable keeper of Holyrood house, he obtained the sinecure office of king's botanist He began his lectures on botany in 1720, in the king's garden at Holyrood house, which he enriched by large collections he had made in Holland In 1738 he was chosen to succeed Professor Preston, in the chair of Botany and Materia Medica united, in the university of Edinburgh, and in conjunction with Dr Monro, Dr Rutherford, Dr Sinclair, and Dr Plummer, laid the foundation of the high character since enjoyed by Edinburgh as a school of medical science In 1740, for the assistance of his pupils, he published an Index of the plants demonstrated to them in the Edinburgh medical garden He continued to lecture till his death on the 22d of November 1760 In the fifth volume of the Edinburgh Medical Essays he published a short paper on the efficacy of the powder of tin in destroying or expelling worms from the bowels He was the author of several botanical works, the principal of which is entitled 'Theorinum Botanicum Edinburgense,' 1753 In the same year one of his papers, in which he endeavoured to overturn the Linnæan doctrine of the sexual system of plants, was published in the first volume of the 'Edinburgh Physical and Literary Essays' He also engaged in a controversy with Dr Whytt about quicklime, but the most valuable of all his works are his 'Lectures on the Materia Medica,' which appeared in two volumes 4to in 1770, edited by his friend and successor in the professor's chair, Dr John Hope

ALTRIE, in the peerage of Scotland an extinct barony originally conferred on Robert Keith, the second son of William fourth earl Marischal, who was commendator of the Cistertian Abbey of Deer in Aberdeenshire, and had the whole lands belonging to that monastery erected into a temporal lordship, with the title of Lord Altrie, 29th July 1587 His lordship was selected by King James VI, to go to Denmark to negotiate his marriage with the princess Anne in 1589, but excused himself on account of his age and infirmities, when his nephew George, fifth earl Marischal, was appointed in his stead The first Lord Altrie is supposed to have been dead before 1606 He was succeeded by his said nephew, the fifth earl Marischal, the founder of Marischal College, Aberdeen, when the title of Lord Altrie merged in the superior title, and became extinct on the death of George the tenth earl Marischal See MARISCHAL, earl, and KEITH, surname of

ALVES a surname derived from a parish in Elginshire of that name

ALVES, ROBERT, a minor poet, was born at Elgin in 1745, and studied at Aberdeen, where he took his degrees of philosophy in 1766 His poetical talents gained him the friendship of Dr Beattie and other gentlemen of literary tastes He afterwards became parish schoolmaster at Deskford, and in 1773 removed to Banff In 1779 he went to Edinburgh, where he maintained himself by teaching the classics He is said to have left Banff on account of a disappointment in love In 1782 he published a volume of poems, which attracted little notice In 1789 appeared another of his works, entitled 'Edinburgh, a poem, in two parts, and the Weeping Bard, in sixteen cantos,' which were not without merit He died on the 1st of January 1794, leaving a laborious work in the press, entitled 'Sketches of a History of Literature,' which was afterwards published [Campbell's History of Scottish Poetry] The works of Alves are

ANCRUM, earl of one of the titles of the marquis of Lothian, conferred in 1633, on Sir Robert Kerr, of Ancrum, an accomplished poet and courtier, the descendant of Sir Andrew Kerr of Fernihurst, a border chief who acted a prominent part in the reigns of James IV and James V, particularly in resisting the inroads of the English The title devolved on Robert fourth earl and first marquis of Lothian, on the death of Charles, second earl of Ancrum, and is now by courtesy borne by the eldest son of the marquis of Lothian [See LOTHIAN, marquis of, and KERR, surname of] The name of Ancrum is derived from Alncromb or Alncrumb, signifying the crook of the Ale or Aln, and is exactly descriptive of the situation of the village of Ancrum, which stands on a rising ground on the south side of the Ale, where that stream fetches a curve before falling into the Teviot A ridge in the sequestered parish of Ancrum in Roxburghshire is called Lilliard's edge, from a battle fought there in 1544, on an invasion of the English under Sir Ralph Evers and Sir Brian Latoun, in which a young Scottish woman named Lilliard who had followed her lover, on seeing him fall, rushed forward, and fighting bravely, by her gallantry aided to turn the fight in favour of her countrymen The heroine was slain in the engagement, and an old broken and defaced stone is still pointed out to mark the spot where she fell It is said to have once borne the following inscription, recast from the well-known lines on Sir Thomas Widdrington in the ballad of Chevy Chase

> "Fair maiden Lylliard lies under this stane, > Little was her stature, but great was her fame,
> Upon the English loons she laid many thumps
> And when her legs were cutted off she fought upon her stumps."

The leaders of the Scotch were the regent earl of Arran and the earl of Angus (See vol II p 46)

ANDERSON, a surname meaning literally the son of Andrew, but as held by families of Lowland origin, denoting more properly a son of St. Andrew, that is, a native Scotsman, as indicated by the Cross of St Andrew, the patron saint of Scotland, in their shield The Mid Lothian Andersons, to one branch of which belongs the family of the author of this work, have for crest a crosslet above the crescent, motto, "Gradatim" The crest evidently has reference to the crusades

The Gaelic sept of Anderson are said to be an offshoot of the old potent stem of Clan Anrias, from which spring the Mac Andrews, the Mac Gilanders, and the Gillanderses (Skene, vol ii p 228) The chief of the sept is Anderson of Candacraig, Aberdeenshire

ANDERSON, ADAM, author of the largest British compilation upon commercial history, was born about the year 1692 He left Scotland early in life, and obtained the situation of clerk in the South Sea House, London, in which he remained for forty years, and rose to be chief clerk of the Stock and New Annuities in that establishment He retained that post till his death, which happened on the 10th January 1765 He was one of the trustees for the Settlement of Georgia, and also a member of the court of assistants of the Scots Corporation in London In 1764, a year before his death, was published his elaborate work, entitled 'An Historical and Chronological Deduction of the Origin of Commerce, from the Earliest Accounts to the Present Time, containing a History of the large Commercial Interests of the British Empire,' &c London, two volumes folio An improved edition of this work was subsequently published by David M'Pherson, in four volumes Mr Anderson was twice married By his first wife he had a daughter His second wife survived him till 1781 He was her third husband —Chalmers' Biog Dict

ANDERSON, ALEXANDER, an eminent mathematician, was born at Aberdeen, near the close of the sixteenth century Having at an early period of his life proceeded to Paris, he settled there as a private teacher or professor of mathematics Between the years 1612 and 1619 he published various treatises on geometrical and algebraic science His pure taste and skill in mathematical investigation pointed him out to the executors of the celebrated geometrician Vieta, Master of Requests at Paris, who died in 1603, as the fittest person to revise and publish his valuable MSS, which he did with learned comments, and neat demonstrations of propositions left imperfect He subsequently produced a specimen of the application of geometrical analysis, distinguished for its clearness and classic elegance His works are now scarce They consist of six thin quarto volumes, including the edition of the works of Vieta The date of his death, as of his birth, has not been ascertained [Hutton's Mathematical Dictionary] The following is a list of his works

Supplementum Apollonii Redivivi, sive Analysis Problematis ad Apollonii Doctrinam desiderati, a Marino Ghetaldo relicti Huic subnexa est, variorum problematum practice Paris, 1612, 4to

ANDERSON, DAVID, of Finshaugh, a citizen and merchant of Aberdeen, the brother, or, as another account says, the cousin of the preceding, and uncle of George Jamesone the Scottish Vandyke, had likewise a strong turn for mathematics and mechanics, and from his being able to apply his knowledge to so many practical and useful purposes, he was popularly known at Aberdeen by the familiar name of Davie Do-a'-things He removed a large rock which obstructed the entrance to Aberdeen harbour He left three daughters, yet "his widow," we are informed by Mr David Laing, in the information supplied to Allan Cunningham for his Memoir of Jamesone the painter, "was rich enough and generous enough to found and endow an hospital in Aberdeen for the maintenance and education of ten poor orphans." One of his daughters was married to the Rev John Gregory, minister of Drumoak, and their son was the celebrated James Gregory, inventor of the reflecting telescope From her is supposed to have been derived that taste for mathematical science which afterwards distinguished the Gregorys A portrait of him by his nephew, the celebrated painter above referred to, is still extant in Aberdeen years, thus monopolizing the whole trade to himself—a thing that would not be tolerated in our more enlightened days He was the son of George Anderson, who, in 1638, introduced the art of letter-press printing into Glasgow, having been invited from Edinburgh by the magistrates for that purpose, and it appears from the council records of the former city that he was to be allowed £100 for the liquidation of his expenses, "in transporting of his gear to that burgh," and in full of his bygone salaries from Whitsunday 1638 till Martinmas 1639 His son Andrew succeeded him in Glasgow, but afterwards removed to Edinburgh, and was made king's printer for Scotland, in 1671 For many years after this period the art of printing remained in the very lowest state in Scotland, owing mainly to the exclusive nature of the royal grant to Anderson This privilege was afterwards restricted to Bibles and Acts of parliament, which continued exclusively in the hands of the king's printers for Scotland, till 1839, when the license was thrown open, under certain conditions and restrictions, to the printing trade generally

ANDERSON, Andrew, lieutenant-general in the East India Company's service, founder of an institution at Elgin for the support of old age and the education of youth, was the son of a private soldier and a poor half-witted woman of the name of Marjory Gilzean, belonging to the town of Elgin, to whom he was privately married Andrew, who was born about the year 1746, was brought up by his mother in a state of great misery, in what had been the sacristy of Elgin cathedral, where she led a wretched and lonely life, supported by charity, her infant's bed being a hollow sculptured stone, which had formerly been used as a font He was educated at the grammar school of that town as a pauper, doing all the drudgery of the school in return for his education Afterwards he was bound apprentice to his father's brother, a staymaker in the adjoining parish of St Andrews Lhanbryd, whose harsh treatment induced him, while yet very young, to run away from home Having contrived to reach London, he was taken in by a tailor, who afterwards employed him as his clerk Being sent with a suit of clothes to an officer in the East India Company's service, a countryman of his own, then about to proceed to India, that gentleman, pleased with his appearance, and satisfying himself that he had obtained a good education, advised him to enlist in his regiment, and offered to take him as his servant Anderson accordingly went out as a drummer, and from his steadiness and good conduct, and singular facility in the acquirement of languages, soon obtained promotion He had early made himself master of the Hindostanee, and was frequently employed as interpreter His conduct at the taking of Seringapatam, in 1799 was honourably noticed at the time in the public papers Having amassed a large fortune, he ultimately retired with the rank of lieutenant-general in the Bombay army In 1811 he returned to Elgin, and resided for several summers there, or in the neighbourhood, passing the winter in London, where, on the 23d November 1815, he executed a trust-disposition and deed of settlement, assigning his whole property, after the payment of a few minor legacies, for the purposes of founding and endowing an Hospital, a School of Industry, and a Free School at Elgin, to be called the Elgin Institution for the support of old age and education of youth He died in London on the 16th of December 1824

The funds left by General Anderson amounted to £70,000, and the Elgin Institution, which stands at the east end of Elgin, was founded in 1832, for the maintenance of aged men and women, and the maintenance and education of poor or orphan boys and girls The philanthropic and splendid monument which he may be said to have thus raised to his own memory is a beautiful and appropriate piece of architecture Built of native sandstone, it is a quadrangular structure of two stories, surmounted by a circular tower and dome The institution for the children contains a school of industry The children are apprenticed also to some trade or useful occupation The house governor and teacher of the school of industry has a salary of £55 per annum, with board and lodging in the institution A public school, on the Lancasterian system, is attached to the institution as a free school, for the education of male and female children whose parents, though in narrow circumstances, are still able to maintain and clothe them

ANDERSON, JAMES, the author of the 'Diplomata Scotiæ,' was the son of the Rev Patrick Anderson, one of the persecuted presbyterian ministers, who at the Restoration was ejected from his living and afterwards suffered imprisonment in the Bass, and was born at Edinburgh, August 5, 1662, and graduated at the university there It appears from the registers of the university of Edinburgh that he was a student under Mr William Paterson, the professor of philosophy in 1667, and took his degree in the class of Mr James Wishart, on the 27th of May 1680 Having chosen the law for his profession, he served an apprenticeship with Sir Hugh Paterson of Bannockburn, writer to the signet, and on the 6th of June 1691 he was admitted a member of that society In 1704, an English lawyer, of the name of Atwood, having published a pamphlet claiming for England a direct superiority over Scotland, Mr Anderson was led to publish an 'Historical Essay, showing that the Crown and Kingdom of Scotland is imperial and independent,' which appeared in 1705 This work procured for him not only a reward, but the thanks of the Scottish parliament, which ordered Atwood's pamphlet as well as the Historia Anglo-Scotica of Drake, to be burnt by the common hangman Having projected a series of engravings of fac-similes of the charters and seals, medals and coins, of the Scottish monarchs from the earliest times, in November 1706, he obtained from the Scottish parliament a vote of three hundred pounds sterling towards this object By this aid he was enabled to make great progress in his arduous work, but before March 1707 he had not only expended this sum, but five hundred and ninety pounds sterling of his own on the undertaking, and was forced again to apply to parliament, now about to expire A committee reported the facts, and the parliament, while they approved of his conduct, voted him an additional grant of one thousand and fifty pounds sterling, and recommended him to the queen 'as a person meriting her gracious favour' One of the last acts of the union parliament was 'a recommendation in favour of Mr James Anderson' This induced him to remove to London, to superintend the progress of the work, though the money is said never to have been paid In June 1715 he was appointed postmaster-general for Scotland, a situation which he held only for two years, having been superseded on the 29th of November 1717, for some cause which does not appear, by Sir John Inglis of Cramond When he lost this appointment he issued proposals for publishing his 'Diplomata' The following advertisement appeared in Watson's Scots Courant of the 25th of February 1718 "Proposals being printed for publishing a book, which will consist of above one hundred copperplates, containing the ancient charters and seals of the kings of Scotland, and the alphabets and abbreviations made use of in ancient writings, collected pursuant to an order of the parliament of Scotland, by Mr Anderson, writer to the signet any who encourage that book may have copies of the proposals at Mr Anderson's house above the general post office, Edinburgh, and may also see specimens of the work at any time between the hours of two and five in the afternoon" In 1727 appeared the first and second volumes of his 'Collections relating to the History of Mary Queen of Scotland,' to which he soon after added two more volumes, 4to This work was intended as a counter publication to Jebb's Vita et Rebus Gestis Mariæ Scotorum Reginæ, published at London, in 1725, in two folio volumes, which represented Mary and her cause in a favourable light In preparing his work on Queen Mary, Mr Anderson, through the influence of the Duke of Devonshire, obtained admission to the state paper office, "whence," says Chalmers, "he drew some documents that lost their efficacy from suspicions of his candour" Mr Chalmers, in his life of Ruddiman, makes the following very just remark "That such an antiquary as Anderson is represented to have been should entitle Mary, queen of Scotland, is astonishing, when the charters and seals of his own Diplomata would have shown him that she was Scotorum Regina, as her predecessors had been Scotorum Reges" Ruddiman, with his usual acuteness, remarks, 'That it is a sure indication of forgery when an old charter speaks of the king as Scotiæ Rex'" [Chalmers' Ruddiman, p 156, note, ed 1794] Anderson was one of a society of the critics of Edinburgh, which was formed for publishing a correct edition of Buchanan's works, with the declared aim of vindicating "that incomparably learned and pious author from the calumnies of Mr Thomas Ruddiman." It does not appear that they ever carried their design into execution, farther than preparing a series of "Notts" upon the annotations of Ruddiman, which are still in manuscript He died at London of an apoplectic stroke, on the 2d of April 1728, at the age of sixty-six, leaving unfinished his great work, on which he had been engaged for so many years He had married in his youth a daughter of John Ellis of Ellistoun, an advocate in Edinburgh, by whom he had several sons, who survived him, and a daughter Margaret who married George Crawford, the author of the Peerage One of his sons, Patrick Anderson, was comptroller of the stamps at Edinburgh In his latter years, Anderson found himself in embarrassed circumstances, from the poverty which had gradually fallen upon him from his ill-directed projects, arising from his want of prudence and over sanguine temperament In his distress he pledged his ancient charters and his copperplates to Thomas Paterson of Conduit Street, London, a friend who had patronized his labours and relieved his necessities In 1729 the plates were sold by auction, and brought £530 It was at the request of Mr Paterson that Ruddiman was induced to finish what Anderson with less erudition and diligence had begun At last in 1739, eleven years after his death, the work was published in one volume folio, under the title of 'Selectus Diplomatum et Numismatum Scotiæ Thesaurus,' with an elaborate preface by Thomas Ruddiman It was printed, in one large folio volume, by Thomas and Walter Ruddiman, for Thomas Paterson in Conduit Street, Andrew Millar in the Strand, London, and Gawin Hamilton at Edinburgh

The original price was 4 guineas common paper, and 6 fine Mr Ruddiman's Introduction was afterwards translated, and published by itself Edin 1773, 12mo It is a work of extreme rarity, and great value In the fifth division it exhibits the characters and abbreviations used in ancient MSS

ANDERSON, JAMES, D D, the brother of Adam Anderson, author of the Commercial History, whose life is given at page 123, was born at Aberdeen, and having gone to London in 1710, was for many years minister of the Scotch church, in Swallow street, Piccadilly In 1734 he removed to another chapel in Leicester Fields, and died May 23, 1739 He wrote a treatise on 'The Constitutions of the Free Masons,' and an elaborate folio volume, entitled 'Royal Genealogies, or the Genealogical Tables of Emperors, Kings, and Princes, from Adam to these Times,' London 1732

ANDERSON, JAMES, LL D, an eminent writer, the son of a farmer, was born at Hermiston near Edinburgh, in 1739 His ancestors were farmers, and for many generations had occupied the same land His parents died when he was very young, and at the age of fifteen he entered upon the management of the farm which they had possessed Early perceiving the great advantage of a scientific acquaintance with agriculture, he attended the chemistry class of Dr Cullen, in the university of Edinburgh, studying at the same time several collateral branches of science He adopted a number of improvements on his farm, and was among the first to use the small two horse plough on its introduction into Scotland In the midst of his agricultural labours, so great was his desire for knowledge and so unwearied his application, that he contrived to acquire a considerable stock of general information In 1771, under the signature of Agricola, he contributed to Ruddiman's Edinburgh Weekly Magazine a series of 'Essays on Planting,' which in 1777 were collected into a volume In 1773 he furnished the article Monsoon to the first edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, in which he predicted the failure of Captain Cook's first expedition in search of a southern polar continent In 1776 appeared his Essay on Chimneys

Previous to the year 1777, Mr Anderson had removed to a large uncultivated farm of 1,300 acres, named Monkhill, which he rented in Aberdeenshire, and which, by his skill and care, he brought into excellent condition In that year appeared 'Observations on the Means of Exciting a Spirit of National Industry,' with regard to agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and fisheries, and, besides his Essays on Planting, various pamphlets on agricultural subjects, which raised his reputation very high as a practical agriculturist In 1780, the university of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of LL D He had married in 1768, Miss Seton of Mounie, by whom he had thirteen children, and with the twofold object of educating his family, and enjoying literary society, in 1783 he went to reside in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh His place of residence was situated within the parish of Leith, and when the magistrates and heritors attempted to levy an assessment upon householders for the maintenance of the poor, he brought the measure before the court of session, and succeeded in persuading the judges that the laws of Scotland did not authorise the establishment of a poor's rate He considered himself as having rendered an essential service to his country, by his resistance in this case, and several editions of his papers during the process, though never published, were printed for the use of his friends Having, in a tract privately circulated, projected the establishment of the North British Fisheries, he was requested by the Lords of the Treasury in 1784 to survey the western coast of Scotland, and in 1785 he published the result of his inquiries, under the title of 'An Account of the present state of the Hebrides and Western Coast of Scotland, being the Substance of a Report to the Lords of the Treasury' In the Report of a committee appointed May 11, 1785, to inquire into the state of the British fisheries, very honourable mention is made of his labours On the 22d December 1790 he commenced a weekly publication of a literary and scientific nature, called 'The Bee,' which continued till the 1st January 1794 He wrote a great part of the work himself, and besides many of the principal papers without signature, all those which were signed Senex, Alcibiades, and Timothy Hairbrain, were from his pen

When the Board of agriculture applied to parliament for a reward to Mr Elkington, on account of his mode of draining by boring, Dr Anderson addressed several letters to the president of that Board These letters were published, and though the language he used in them was considered as rather intemperate, yet it afterwards appeared that his assertions were well founded, and that Elkington's plan contained nothing but what had been fully explained by Dr Anderson more than twenty years before in his Agricultural Essays About this time, also, he read an Essay on Moss before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, which was soon after published In it he first advanced the very singular idea that moss, contrary to the mode of all other plants, vegetates below, while its upper stratum is undergoing putrefaction by exposure to the air

About the year 1797 he removed with his family to London, and for several years wrote the agricultural articles in the Monthly Review From 1799 to 1802 he conducted another journal called 'Recreations in Agriculture, Natural History, Arts, and Miscellaneous Literature,' which ended with the sixth volume Although the work contains a number of communications from others, the greater part of it was written by himself It met with the greatest encouragement from the public, but the irregularity of his printers and booksellers caused him to discontinue it The thirty-seventh number of his 'Recreations' was his last publication in March 1802 After this period he published nothing more, except his correspondence with General Washington and a pamphlet on scarcity, but devoted himself almost entirely to the relaxation of a quiet life, and particularly to the cultivation of his garden at Isleworth, in which he had constructed a model of his patent hothouse, to act by the rays of the sun, without the application of artificial heat With this he amused himself by making experiments, in order to ascertain what degree of heat and moisture was most salutary to different plants As an instance of his unwearied attention to every department of rural economy, may be mentioned a discovery which he made about this time, respecting the most effectual mode of exterminating wasps Having observed that in the district where he resided these insects were very destructive to every species of fruit, he resolved to study their natural history He soon ascertained, by his inquiries and observations, that the whole hive, like that of bees, was propagated from one female or queen, and that the whole race, except a few queens, perished during winter, and he naturally concluded that to destroy the queens, in the months of May and June, before they began to drop their eggs, was the surest way of diminishing their number With this view he even procured an association to be formed, which circulated handbills with directions, and offered a reward for every queen wasp that should be brought in, within a specified period

Dr Anderson died at Westham, near London, on 15th October 1808, of a gradual decline Having been some time a widower, in 1801 he had married a second wife, a lady belonging to Isleworth, who survived him, as did also five sons and a daughter In his younger days, and while engaged in the active pursuits of agriculture, Dr Anderson was remarkably handsome in his person, of middle stature, and of robust constitution Extremely moderate in his living, the country exercise animated his countenance with the glow of health, but the overstrained exertion of his mental powers afterwards impaired his strength, ultimately wasted his faculties, and brought on premature old age He possessed a very independent mind, and his manners were agreeable and unconstrained In the relative duties of a husband and a father, he displayed the greatest prudence and affection, and in the social circle he was distinguished by his humorous pleasantry, and abounded in anecdote In conversation he entered with zeal and spirit into any favourite subject, and his remarks were generally full of interest He was among the first of that long list of practical writers of which the present century has produced so many who directed the public attention to the improvement of agriculture, and there was no agricultural subject of which he treated without throwing upon it new light Besides the works mentioned, he wrote also many papers in the periodicals, and an Account of Ancient Fortifications in the Highlands, which was read to the Society of Scottish Antiquaries —Scots Mag 1809 —Edin Ency.

ANDERSON, JOHN, M A, author of the celebrated Defence of Presbyterianism, was born in the reign of Charles the Second, but the precise year has not been ascertained All that is known of his early life is, that, after receiving a university education, he was for some time the preceptor of the celebrated John duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and that he subsequently resided for twenty-five years in Edinburgh, where he kept a school Having been educated for the church, he was, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, minister of the parish of Dumbarton, and afterwards was transported to Glasgow The general use of the English liturgy in the Episcopalian congregations, as we learn from Wodrow's correspondence, was exciting, about this period, the utmost alarm in the minds of the Presbyterian clergy and people, and a violent controversy on the subject was carried on for some time between the ministers of the rival churches Into this controversy Mr Anderson entered with much zeal The first of his publications known is styled 'A Dialogue between a Curat and a Countreyman concerning the English Service, or Common Prayer Book of England,' 4to, printed at Glasgow about 1710 In this work, in opposition to the statements in Sage's 'Fundamental Charter of Presbytery Examined,' he proved that the liturgy which had been used by the first Scottish reformers for at least seven years after the overthrow of popery, was not the English liturgy, but that used by the English church at Geneva, since known by the name of John Knox's liturgy, or the old Scottish liturgy In 1711 appeared a 'Second Dialogue,' in which he set himself to oppose the sentiments of South, Hammond, Beveridge, and Burnet These works were followed by 'A Letter from a Countreyman to a Curat,' which called forth several answers, particularly one by Robert Calder, an Episcopalian clergyman, the friend of Dr Archibald Pitcairn, to which he speedily replied in a pamphlet entitled 'Curat Calder Whipt' Soon after he published 'A Sermon preached at Ayr, at the opening of the Synod, on April 1, 1712' In 1714 appeared his famous work, under the title of 'A Defence of the Church Government, Faith, Worship, and Spirit of the Presbyterians, in Answer to a Book entitled "An Apology for Mr Thomas Rhind,"' &c, 4to In 1717 he received a call from the congregation of the North-West church, Glasgow, but was not settled there till 1720, after his case had been before both the synod and the Assembly, some of the members of his presbytery having objected to his removal His colleagues, it seems, had taken offence at a letter addressed by him to Walter Stewart of Pardonan, published by him in 1717, in which he says, "I confess I was under a great temptation of being eager for a settlement in Glasgow, for what minister would not be fond of a larger stipend and a double charge?" In the latter year (1720) he published, in 12mo, six 'Letters upon the Overtures concerning Kirk Sessions and Presbyteries,' which, like all his controversial writings, abound in curious historical information, interspersed with severe satirical remark He wrote several other political and theological tracts besides those mentioned, now gone into oblivion The precise year of his death is not known, but as his successor was appointed in 1723, his decease must have taken place before that year His grandson, Professor Anderson, the founder of the Andersonian Institution, Glasgow, caused the following memorial to his memory to be inscribed upon the family tombstone erected over his grave, on the front of the North-West church, Glasgow "Near this place lie the remains of the Rev John Anderson, who was preceptor to the famous John

Duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and minister of the gospel in Dumbarton in the beginning of the eighteenth century, and in this church in 1720 He was the author of 'The Defence of the Church Government, Faith, Worship, and Spirit of the Presbyterians,' and of several other ecclesiastical and political tracts As a pious minister and an eloquent preacher, a defender of civil and religious liberty, and a man of wit and learning, he was much esteemed, he lived in the reign of Charles II, James II, William III, Anne, and George I Such times, and such a man, forget not, reader, while thy country, liberty, and religion are dear to thee"—Wodrow's History

ANDERSON, JOHN, F R S, founder of the Andersonian Institution, Glasgow, and grandson of the subject of the preceding article, was the eldest son of the Rev James Anderson, minister of Rosneath, Dumbartonshire, in the manse of which parish he was born in the year 1726 His father died when he was yet young, and he went to live at Stirling with his aunt, Mrs Turner, widow of one of the ministers of the High church of that town, where he received the first part of his education At the age of twenty he was one of the officers of the Burgher corps of Stirling, raised for the defence of the town against the forces of the Pretender, and the carabine he carried on that occasion is preserved in the Museum of the university founded by him He afterwards studied at the college of Glasgow In 1756 he was appointed professor of oriental languages in that university In 1760 he was removed to the chair of natural philosophy Embued with an ardent zeal for the diffusion of useful knowledge, he instituted a class, in addition to his usual one, for the instruction of the working classes and others, who were unable to attend the regular course of academical study, which he continued to teach twice a-week, during session, till his death In 1786 he published 'Institutes of Physics,' which in ten years went through five editions Having, like many other good men, hailed the first burst of the French Revolution in 1789, as calculated to promote the cause of liberty, he went to Paris in 1791 with the model of a gun he had invented, the peculiar advantage of which consisted in the recoil being stopped by the condensation of common air within the body of the carriage To this ingenious invention he had unsuccessfully endeavoured to obtain the attention of our own government This model he presented to the national convention, who hung it up in their hall, with the superscription, "The Gift of Science to Liberty!" A six-pounder being made from his model, he tried numerous experiments with it, in presence, among others, of the celebrated Paul Jones, then in Paris, who expressed his approbation of the new species of gun While Professor Anderson remained in the capital of France, he witnessed many of those stirring and momentous scenes, which at that period attracted the notice of all Europe, and he was one of those who, on the 14th July, from the top of the altar of liberty, sung Te Deum with the bishop of Paris, when the ill-fated Louis XVI took the oath to the Constitution! An expedient of his for furnishing the people of Germany with French newspapers and manifestoes, after the emperor Leopold had drawn a cordon of troops round the frontiers, to prevent their introduction, was tried, and found very useful It consisted of small balloons of paper, varnished with boiled oil, and filled with inflammable air, and the newspapers being tied to them, they were sent off when the wind was favourable, and picked up by the people A small flag which these paper balloons carried, bore an inscription in German to the following purport

"O'er hills and dales and lines of hostile troops, I float majestic, Bearing the laws of God and Nature to oppressed men,
And bidding them with arms their rights maintain"

On his return to Glasgow, Professor Anderson resumed his college duties with his usual fervour He died on the 13th January 1796, in the 70th year of his age, and 41st of his professorship By his will, dated 7th May 1795, he bequeathed all his money and effects for the establishment at Glasgow of an institution, to be called Anderson's University, for the education of the unacademical classes

The institution was endowed by the founder with a valuable philosophical apparatus, museum, and library, valued at three thousand pounds sterling, and it was incorporated by charter from the magistrates and council of Glasgow, on the 9th June following the testator's death The plan of Professor Anderson contemplated four colleges, for arts, medicine, law, and theology, each college to consist of nine professors, the senior professor being president or dean, but the funds not allowing of this at the outset, the managers wisely began on a small scale, and the institution has gradually grown in influence and importance, and is now in a state more corresponding with the original design of the founder The first teacher was Dr Thomas Garnet, professor of natural philosophy, and author of a 'Tour through the Highlands,' as well as various scientific works, who commenced on 21st September 1796, by reading in the Trades' Hall, Glasgow, popular and scientific lectures on natural philosophy and chemistry, addressed to persons of both sexes, and illustrated by experiments With the view that the institution should be permanently established the trustees purchased, in 1798, extensive buildings in John Street, and in the same year a professor of mathematics and geography was appointed After a successful period of tuition of four years, Dr Garnet, on the foundation of the Royal Institution of Great Britain in 1800, was chosen its first professor of chemistry, and accordingly removed to London in October of that year, but was obliged to resign the situation on account of ill health, and died in 1802, aged 36 He was succeeded in Anderson's Institution, Glasgow, by the celebrated Dr George Birkbeck, the founder of Mechanic's Institutes, who, at the age of twenty-one, was appointed professor of natural history, and in addition to what had formerly been taught, introduced a familiar system of instruction, which he conducted gratis, chiefly for the benefit of operatives One of the great benefits of this institution from the commencement, indeed, has been that instruction is communicated to students of all classes, divested of those technicalities by which it is frequently overlaid and obscured by educational institutions of greater name Dr Birkbeck resigned in August 1804, and was succeeded in the following month by Dr Andrew Ure, the well-known chemist Dr Ure continued to discharge the duties of his office with great success for the long period of twenty-five years, when he removed to London In the meantime the institution had grown in public estimation, and several professors had been appointed The original buildings too had become insufficient, and the trustees finally purchased from the city the Grammar school buildings, situated in George Street, which, with extensive additions and alterations, were rendered fit for a complete college establishment, containing halls for the professors, the museum, library, &c The new buildings were opened in November 1828, and continue to be used with marked success There are now thirteen professors, and the subjects taught are natural philosophy, chemistry, natural history, logic and ethics, mathematics and geography, oriental languages, drawing and painting, anatomy, theory and practice of medicine, surgery, materia medica, medical jurisprudence, veterinary medicine, and German and modern literature The Institution, or as it is called, the Andersonian University, is placed under the inspection of the Lord Provost and other officials as ordinary visitors, but it is more immediately superintended by eighty-one trustees, who are elected by ballot, and remain in office for life, unless disqualified by non-attendance They are chosen from nine classes of citizens, namely, tradesmen, agriculturists, artists, manufacturers, physicians and surgeons, lawyers, divines, philosophers, and kinsmen or namesakes Nine of their number are annually elected by the trustees as managers of the establishment for the year, and they in turn elect from their number, by ballot, the president, secretary, and treasurer

A posthumous work of Professor Anderson, entitled 'Observations on Roman Antiquities discovered between the Forth and the Clyde,' was published at Edinburgh in 1800 — Glasgow Mechanic's Magazine, 1825 — Cleland's Annals of Glasgow

ANDERSON, JOHN, historian of the Hamiltons, was born June 6, 1789, at Gilmerton House, in the county of Mid-Lothian He was the eldest son of James Anderson, supervisor of excise, Oban, whose father, William Anderson, was a farmer at Upper Liberton, and a burgess and guild-brother of the city of Edinburgh His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of John Williams, the well-known author of the 'Mineral Kingdom,' who then resided at Gilmerton After receiving the proper education, and attending the university of Edinburgh, he was in 1813 admitted a licentiate of the Edinburgh Royal College of Surgeons, and had scarcely passed his college examinations, when he was appointed, by the Marquis of Douglas, afterwards, on the death of his father in 1819, Duke of Hamilton, first Surgeon of the Royal Lanarkshire Militia, and he retained that situation, and the patronage and confidence of his grace, until his death He settled at Hamilton, and obtained an extensive practice In 1825, he published, in quarto, a large and elaborate work, entitled 'Historical and Genealogical Memoirs of the House of Hamilton,' to which, in 1827, he added a supplement For more than two years previous to his death, he had been engaged collecting materials for a Statistical Account of Lanarkshire, and he also contemplated writing a Genealogical History of the Robertsons of Struan In the peculiar line of literature which he selected for himself, he was distinguished by sound and pertinent information, deep research, untiring perseverance, and a ready and perspicuous style He died 24th December 1832, his last illness being caused by extraordinary fatigue in attending patients under the cholera morbus He was (says a writer in the New Monthly Magazine) universally known in the neighbourhood of his residence, and from his unassuming manners, his social disposition, and extensive benevolence, was as generally respected His maternal grandfather, John Williams, F S A, Scotland, was, though a native of Wales, long connected with Scotland, and in his lifetime eminent both as an antiquarian and a geologist He was a mineral surveyor by profession, and on his first coming to Scotland he took the coal-mines of Brora, in the parish of Golspie, from the Earl of Sutherland, and a farm near them named Waterford His daughter, Elizabeth, the mother of Dr Anderson, (and of the author of the 'Scottish Nation,') was born at Brora, 13th April 1765, just a fortnight before the late Duchess-Countess of Sutherland The farm proved a bad speculation, as Mr Williams lost a large sum of money in improving it to no purpose After he had put up an engine at the coal-mine, the latter took fire, by which he lost a considerable sum, indeed nearly all that he possessed At that time the earl and countess were at Bath, on account of the health of the earl, who died there The young countess, their daughter, on succeeding to the Sutherland title and estates, was an infant scarcely a year old The factor, a Mr Campbell Combie, was a very harsh and arbitrary person, and would not do anything for Mr Williams He refused even to entertain his claim either for the loss he had sustained by the coal-mines, or for the money he had expended in improvements on the farm Fortunately, at this juncture Mr Williams was appointed by government one of the persons to survey the forfeited estates in Scotland, and in this employment he was engaged for eighteen months He afterwards took a coal-mine at West Calder, and subsequently went to Gilmerton about 1775 In 1777 he published 'An Account of some remarkable ancient Ruins lately discovered in the Highlands and Northern parts of Scotland,' being the vitrified forts found in various parts of the country He was one of the first to direct attention to these remains, and his theory regarding them has generally been adopted by subsequent writers on the subject In 1789 appeared, in 2 vols 8vo his most celebrated work, 'The Natural History of the Mineral Kingdom' Of this last work he sent a copy to George the Third, one to the unfortunate Louis the Sixteenth of France, and one to the Empress Catherine of Russia The two former never acknowledged receipt The Empress was the only one of these potentates who took any notice of the gift Whatever was her character otherwise, it is worthy of note that she patronized literary and scientific men, and invited them to her court Mr Williams received a communication from St Petersburg, requesting him to proceed to Russia, to survey for minerals in that empire, and he accordingly left Scotland for that purpose about the end of 1792, or early in 1793 On his way home, after fulfilling his mission, he was seized with a fever and died at Verona in Italy, May 29, 1795 He was one of the twelve original members of the Scotch Antiquarian Society, and his portrait is in that Institution in Edinburgh In the Transactions of that society there appeared from his pen, a paper entitled 'A Plan for a Royal Forest of Oak in the Highlands of Scotland' An edition of 'the Mineral Kingdom,' edited by a Dr Millar of Edinburgh was published in 1810, containing a Life of Mr Williams, which was incorrect in many respects, and not sanctioned by his family

ANDERSON, JOHN, an enterprising character, founder of the town of Fermoy, in Ireland, son of David Anderson of Portland, was born in lowly circumstances in the West of Scotland While very young he learned to read and write, and having made a few pounds in some humble employment, he settled in Glasgow about 1784 By a speculation in herrings he acquired five hundred pounds, and with this sum he went to Cork, and became an export merchant, dealing in provisions, the staple trade of the place In a few years he realized twenty-five thousand pounds This sum he laid out in the purchase of four-sixths of the Fermoy estate, in the province of Munster With characteristic energy he resolved to make a town at Fermoy, which at that period was no more than a dirty hamlet, consisting of a few hovels, and a carman's public house, at the end of a narrow old bridge He began by building a good hotel, and next erected a few houses, and a square At his own expense he rebuilt the ruinous bridge over the Blackwater, on which the town is situated Having learned that government intended to erect large barracks in Munster, he offered, in 1797, a most eligible site for them, rent free The offer was accepted, and two very large and handsome barracks were built He next erected a theatre, and a handsome residence for himself He invited various families, having more or less capital, to settle at Fermoy, and placed himself at the head of the little community As his manners were pleasing, his society was courted by the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood He was never ashamed of his origin, and often spoke of his success in the world with laudable pride On one occasion, in the very height of his prosperity, he was entertaining a large company at his residence in Fermoy Amongst the party were the late Earls of Kingston and Shannon, and Lord Riversdale The conversation turned on their host's great success in life, and Lord Kingston asked him to what he chiefly attributed it "To education, my lord," he replied, "every child in Scotland can easily get the means of learning to read and write When I was a little boy my parents sent me to school every day, and I had to walk three miles to the village school Many a cold walk I had in the bitter winter mornings, and I assure you, my lords," he added, smiling, "that shoes and stockings were extremely scarce in those days" Still continuing his attention to business, he established a bank, an agricultural society, and a mail coach company The first coach which ran between Cork and Dublin was set a-going by him He also built a large schoolhouse and a military college, the latter afterwards became a public school For the erection of a Protestant church he gave three thousand pounds, and five hundred pounds and a site rent free for a Catholic chapel The government offered him a baronetcy, which he declined It was, however, conferred, in 1813, by George IV, when Prince Regent, upon his son, Sir James Caleb Anderson, the well-known experimentalist in steam-coaching, as a mark of his Royal Highness's gracious approbation of the services rendered to Ireland by his father Having embarked in some dangerous speculations, Mr Anderson, in his latter years, sustained great reverses In Welsh mining alone he lost £30,000 On the sale of the Barrymore estates, he was a heavy purchaser, by which, owing to the fall in the price of land in Ireland, after the close of the war, he became a considerable loser, while his banking operations were affected by the changes in the currency He left behind him, however, a noble monument in the handsome town of Fermoy, which has now 7,000 inhabitants Mr Madden, in his 'Revelations of Ireland,' has devoted a chapter to the enterprise of this "Scotchman in Munster," to which we are mainly indebted for the materials of this sketch Mr Anderson married a Miss Semple, by whom he had two sons and two daughters

ANDERSON, ROBERT, M D, editor and biographer of the British Poets, born at Carnwath in Lanarkshire on 7th January 1750, was the fourth son of William Anderson, feuar there, and Margaret Melrose, his wife After receiving the rudiments of his education at his native village, he was sent to the grammar school at Lanark, the master of which was Robert Thomson, who had married a sister of the poet Thomson Two of his schoolfellows at this school were Pinkerton the historian, and James Græme, who died young, and whose poems were afterwards included in his edition of the British poets When only ten years old his father died in his fortieth year, leaving his widow with four sons very slenderly provided for Robert, the youngest, showed very early a taste for reading and study, and being destined for the church, he was sent, in the year 1767, to the university of Edinburgh, where he became a student of divinity Subsequently changing his views, he entered upon the study of medicine, and after finishing his medical studies he went to England, and was for a short time employed as surgeon to the Dispensary at Bamborough castle, Northumberland On the 25th September 1777 he married Anne, daughter of John Grey, Esq of Alnwick, a relative of the noble family of that name He took his degree of doctor of medicine at Edinburgh, in May 1778 He afterwards practised as a physician at Alnwick, but his wife's health failing, and having by his marriage secured a moderate independence, he finally returned to Edinburgh in 1784, where, in December 1785, his wife died of consumption, leaving him with three daughters, the youngest of whom soon followed her mother to the grave In 1793 he married Margaret, daughter of Mr David Dale, master of Yester school, Haddingtonshire He now devoted himself to literary pursuits, and produced various works, chiefly in the department of criticism and biography The principal of these is 'The Works of the British Poets, with prefaces Biographical and Critical,' in fourteen large octavo volumes, the earliest of which was published in 1792-3, the thirteenth in 1795, and the fourteenth in 1807 His correspondence with literary men of eminence was extensive He was the friend and patron of all who evinced any literary talent In particular he was the friend of Thomas Campbell the poet, who through his influence procured literary employment on his first coming to Edinburgh, and to Dr Anderson Mr Campbell dedicated his 'Pleasures of Hope,' as it was chiefly owing to him that that most beautiful poem was first brought before the world It was in the year 1797, when Campbell was only nineteen years of age, that his acquaintance with Dr Anderson commenced, which forms such an important epoch in the history of both The following account of it by Dr. Irving is extracted from Beattie's Life of Campbell "Campbell's introduction to Dr Anderson, which had no small influence on his brilliant career, was in a great measure accidental He had come to Edinburgh in search of employment, when he met Mr Hugh Park, then a teacher in Glasgow, and afterwards second master of Stirling school Park, who was a frank and warmhearted man, was deeply interested in the fortunes of the youthful poet, which were then at their lowest ebb His own character was held in much esteem by the doctor, and he was one day coming to pay him a visit, when the young ladies (Dr Anderson's daughters) observed from the window that he was accompanied by a handsome lad, with whom he was engaged in earnest conversation, and who seemed reluctant to take leave Their curiosity was naturally excited, and Campbell's story was soon told—being merely the short and simple annals of a poor scholar, not unconscious of his own powers, but placed in the most unfavourable circumstances for the development of poetical genius Park knew that he had obtained distinction in the university of Glasgow, and he fortunately had in his pocket a poem [an Elegy written in Mull the previous year] which his young friend had written in one of the Hebrides Dr Anderson was struck with the turn and spirit of the verses, nor did he hesitate to declare his opinion that they exhibited a fair promise of poetical excellence The talents, the character, and the prospects of so interesting a youth formed the chief subject of conversation during the afternoon He expressed a cordial wish to see the author without delay, and Park's kindness was too active to neglect a commission so agreeable to himself Campbell was accordingly introduced, and his first appearance produced a most favourable impression" [Beattie's Life of Campbell, vol i p 194] As Campbell was anxious to obtain some literary employment, Dr Anderson, with his characteristic zeal and sympathy in the cause of friendless merit, did not rest until the object had been attained He warmly recommended the young poet to Mr. Mundell, the publisher, who made Campbell an offer of twenty pounds for an abridged edition of

Bryan Edwards's 'West Indies,' which Campbell accepted, and which was his first undertaking for the public press He afterwards consulted Dr Anderson as to the publication of his 'Pleasures of Hope,' as his experience as an author gave peculiar weight to his opinions on this point The manuscript, we are told, was then shown to Mr Mundell, and after some discussion between Dr Anderson and the publisher, the copyright was sold to him on the terms mentioned in the life of Campbell "In the literary society," says Dr Beattie, "which Dr Anderson drew around him, the poem was a familiar topic in conversation, and he had soon the pleasure of finding that the opinion of other judicious critics, respecting its merits, was in harmony with his own" At that period, says Dr Irving, "the editor of the British Poets had a very extensive acquaintance, and it was through him that Campbell formed his earliest connexions with men of letters His house at Heriot's Green was frequented by individuals who had then risen, or who afterwards rose to great eminence As he had relinquished all professional pursuits, his time was very much at the disposal of his friends, whatever might be their denomination He was visited by men of learning and men of genius, and perhaps in the course of the same day by some rustic rhymer, who was anxious to consult him about publishing his works by superscription I remember finding him in consultation with a little deformed student of physic, from the north of Ireland, who, in detailing his literary history, took occasion to mention that at some particular crisis he had no intention of persecuting the study of poetry" [Ibid vol i p 241] Before committing it to press, the manuscript of the 'Pleasures of Hope,' by the advice of Dr Anderson, underwent a careful revisal, and at his suggestion the opening of the poem was entirely rewritten

In 1796 Dr Anderson published 'The miscellaneous works of Tobias Smollett, M D, with memoirs of his life and writings,' six volumes octavo, which passed through six editions His life of Smollett was also published separately, the eighth edition of which appeared in 1818, under the title of 'The Life of Tobias Smollett, M D, with critical observations on his Works' He also published an elaborate 'Life of Samuel Johnson, LL D, with critical observations on his Works,' the third edition of which appeared in 1815 In 1820 he published an edition of Dr Moore's Works, with memoirs of his life and writings Among his other publications may be mentioned 'The Poetical Works of Robert Blair,' with a Life, 1794 His latest production was a new edition of Blair's Grave and other poems, with his life and critical observations, Edinburgh, 1826 He was for several years editor of the Edinburgh Magazine, afterwards incorporated with the Scots Magazine, and a contributor to various periodicals Dr Anderson died of dropsy in the chest on the 20th February 1830, in the 81st year of his age, and was buried, by his own desire, in Carnwath churchyard In the year 1810 his eldest daughter was married to David Irving, LL D, author of the Life of George Buchanan, the Lives of Scottish Writers, and other works Mrs Irving died suddenly in 1812, leaving a son Dr Anderson's habits were so regular, and his disposition so cheerful and animated, that old age stole on him imperceptibly As an instance of the strong interest which he ever took in the cause of civil and religious liberty, it may be mentioned, that, on the evening before his death, he asked for a map of Greece, that he might, to use his own words, form some notion of the general elements of this new state, which had then worked out its independence As a literary critic he was distinguished by a warm sensibility to the beauties of poetry and by extreme candour His personal character was marked by the most urbane manners, the most honourable probity, and by unshaken constancy in friendship —New Monthly Magazine for July 1830 —Annual Obituary —Encyclopedia Britannica, 7th edition

ANDERSON, Walter, D D, a respectable clergyman of mediocre talents, who was afflicted with an incurable furor scribendi, which exposed him to the ridicule of his acquaintances, was upwards of fifty years minister of Chirnside The date and place of his birth are unknown His first work was a 'Life of Crœsus, King of Lydia,' in four parts, 12mo, 1755, which owed its origin, it is said, to a joke of David Hume One day, being at the house of Ninewells, which stood within his parish, and was the property of Hume's brother, and conversing with the great historian on his success as an author, he is said to have thus addressed him "Mr David, I daresay other people might write books too, but you clever folks have taken up all the good subjects When I look about me, I cannot find one unoccupied" Hume waggishly replied, "What would you think, Mr Anderson, of a history of Cræsus, king of Lydia? That has never yet been written" He caught at the idea, and hence the life of the Lydian king This singular work was honoured with a semi-burlesque notice in the second number of the first Edinburgh Review, started by Hume, Smith, Carlyle, and others, and received rather a severe critique in the second number of the Critical Review, then first established in London by Smollett In 1769, undeterred by the ill success of his first attempt, he published a History of the Reigns of Francis IV and Charles IX of France, two volumes quarto In 1775 appeared a continuation, being 'The History of France, from the beginning of the reign of Henry III down to the period of the edict of Nantes,' one volume quarto In 1783 he published two additional volumes, bringing the history down to the peace of Munster Not one of these works ever sold, and as he published at his own risk, it is related that the cost of print and paper was defrayed by the sale, one by one, as each successive heavy quarto appeared, of some houses which he possessed in the town of Dunse, until they had all ceased to be his property He also produced an essay, in quarto, on the philosophy of ancient Greece, which displayed considerable erudition, though sadly deficient in style, and may be said to have been the only production of his which merited or received any praise He subsequently published a pamphlet against the principles of the first French Revolution, which fell still-born from the press With the view of drawing attention to the work, and thereby promoting its sale, he wrote an additional appendix to the pamphlet, of much greater extent than the pamphlet itself, with which he went to Edinburgh to get it printed Having called upon Principal Robertson he informed him of his plan, which caused him to exclaim in surprise "Really, this is the maddest of all your schemes —what! a small pamphlet is found heavy, and you propose to lighten it by making it ten times heavier! Never was such madness heard of!" "Why, why," answered Dr Anderson, "did you never see a kite raised by boys?" "I have," answered the principal "Then you must have remarked that, when you try to raise the kite by itself, there is no getting it up but only add a long string of papers to its tail, and up it goes like a laverock!" The venerable historian was highly amused by this ingenious argument, but succeeded in dissuading the infatuated author from his design Dr Anderson died at an advanced age in July 1800, at the manse of Chirnside

His works may be enumerated as follows

The History of Cræsus, king of Lydia, in four parts, containing Observations on the Ancient Notion of Destiny or Dreams, on the Origin and Credit of the Oracles, and the principles upon which their Oracles were defended against any attack Edin 1705, 4to

ANGUS, a very ancient name in Scotland, the first on record who bore it being the brother of Loarn and Fergus, the earliest kings of the Dalriadic Scots Pinkerton says "The Irish accounts bear that Loarn, Angus, and Fergus, three sons of Erc, led the Scots back to Britain in 503, [after having been compelled to retreat to Ireland about fifty years before—that is, about the middle of the fifth century, or about two hundred years after their first arrival in Argyleshire,] and that Loarn was the first king and was succeeded by Fergus What became of Angus we are not told It would seem that, either from incapacity or preference of private life, he aspired not to any share of the power of his brothers But though Loarn be left out of the regal list in the Scottish accounts, yet neither he nor Angus is unknown to them Fordun, lib iii cap 1, says that Fergus, son of Erc, came to Scotland cum duobus fratribus Loarn et Tenegus, 'with his brothers Loarn and Tenegus,' which last word is a not uncommon corruption of Angus with Fordun The register of the priory of St. Andrews, written about 1250, also says of Kenneth, son of Alpin, sepultus est Yona insula, ubi tres filii Erc, scilicet Fergus, Loarn, et Enegus, sepulti fuerant, 'he was buried in Iona, where the three sons of Erc, namely Fergus, Loarn, and Enegus were buried.'" [Enquiry into the History of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 92.] It would appear that Cantyre, (from the Gaelic word Ceantir, Headland), was the portion of Fergus, Loarn possessed the district called after him Lorn, and Angus is supposed to have colonized Islay, as it was enjoyed by Muredach his son, after his decease. See LORN, marquis of, and ARGYLE, duke of, also DALRIADA.

ANGUS, styled by the annalists Angus MacFergus, was also the name of the most powerful king the Picts ever had. He reigned between 731 and 761, in which latter year he died. Belonging originally to the southern Picts, he had, in 729, raised himself to the command of that portion of the Pictish tribes, and in the year 731, by the conquest of Talorgan MacCongusa, his last opponent, he obtained the throne of the whole Pictish nation. In consequence of his success a league was entered into between the principal tribes of the northern Picts and the Dalriads or Scots of Argyle, who were ever ready for war with their Pictish enemies. Angus, however, crushed this formidable union, and almost annihilated the Scots of Dalriada, "and yet," says Skene, "it was his power and his victories which laid the germ of that revolution that resulted in the overthrow of the Pictish influence in Scotland." [History of Highlanders, vol. i. p. 55.]

ANGUS, was also the name of a king of the Dalriads, who began to reign in 804 and died in 811. At a very early period the district of country lying between the North Esk on the north, and the Tay and Isla on the south, was called Angus, which it still retains, though also called Forfarshire from the county town. Its more ancient name is commonly supposed to have been so named from Angus, a brother of Kenneth the Second, to whom this territory was granted by Kenneth, after the union of the Picts and Scots. Gaelic scholars, however, think that the name denotes a hill of a particular description, or which was applied to a special use, and it is supposed to have been derived from the Hill of Angus, a little to the eastward of the church of Aberlemno, in ancient times the usual place of rendezvous for the inhabitants of the surrounding country, during the predatory incursions of the Danes and Norwegians. It seems more probable that the hill itself took its name from the district.

ANGUS, earldom of, one of the most ancient titles in Scotland. According to Chalmers, Dubican, the son of Indechtraig, and maormor or earl of Angus died in 939. Maolbride his son died during the reign of Culen, who was murdered by Rohard, thane of Fife, in 970. His successor Cunechat, Cruchne, or Conquhare, maormor of Angus, had a daughter Finella, styled the lady of Fettercairn, to whose name an historical interest is attached as being the murderess of Kenneth the Third, king of Scots, in consequence of having caused her son Crathilinthus to be put to death as related in the life of that monarch. See KENNETH III. This event happened in the year 994, and the Lady Finella was afterwards put to death for her crime, in the romantic ravine called Den Finella. Her memory is still preserved in the names of various other places in the county of Kincardine.

In the reign of Malcolm Canmore flourished Gilchrist, earl of Angus, who was living after the year 1120. He married Finella or Fynbella, the sister of the thane of Mearns, by whom he had a son Gilbrede, the second earl of Angus, properly so called instead of maormor, who succeeded him, and was engaged in the battle of the Standard, under King David the First, in 1138. Earl Gilbrede was one of the twenty barons who were given up to Henry as hostages for the performance of the disgraceful conditions entered into by King William the Lion, in 1174, when imprisoned at Falaise in Normandy, in order to obtain his release. He died about 1180. He married a daughter of Cospatrick, the third earl of March, by whom he had six sons, namely, Gilchrist, third earl of Angus, Magnus, earl of Caithness, [see CAITHNESS, earldom of], Gilbert, ancestor of the Ogilvys, earls of Airlie, [see OGILVY, surname of, and AIRLIE, earl of], Adam, William, and Anegus.

Gilchrist, third earl of Angus, married a sister of William the Lion. He was the father of Duncan the fourth earl, whose son, Malcolm the fifth earl, married Mary, daughter and heiress of Sir Humphrey Berkeley, knight, by whom he had a daughter, Matildis, countess of Angus in her own right. She married first John Cumin who, in her right, became earl. He died in France in 1242. She married, secondly, in 1243, Gilbert de Umfraville, lord of Redesdale, Prudhow, and Herbottle in Northumberland, who in consequence also became earl of Angus. He died in 1245. He was one of the most famous barons of that age and guardian of the northern parts of England. [Dugdale's Baronage, vol. i. p. 504.]

His only son by the countess, also bore the name of Gilbert de Umfraville. He succeeded as the eighth earl. He was governor of the castles of Dundee and Forfar, and of the whole territory of Angus, in 1291, when the regents of Scotland, during the competition for the crown, agreed to deliver up the kingdom and its fortresses to Edward I. of England. On this occasion the earl declared that he had received his castles in charge from the Scottish nation, and that he would not surrender them to England, unless Edward and all the competitors joined in an obligation to indemnify him. The English monarch and the competitors submitted to these conditions of Angus, who was the only person in Scotland who acted with integrity and spirit at this national crisis. [Fœdera, vol. ii. p. 531.] He married the third daughter of Alexander Cumin, earl of Buchan, and died in 1307. He had three sons. The eldest, Gilbert, having died before his father, he was succeeded by Robert his second son, who was the ninth earl of Angus. By Edward the Second, Earl Robert was appointed joint-guardian of Scotland, 21st July 1308, and had a commission to be sole guardian 20th August 1309, but did not act upon it, as Robert de Clifford was constituted to that office. Robert de Umfraville, earl of Angus, was forfeited by King Robert the First, for his adherence to the English interest. In 1319, he was one of the commissioners of England to treat with those of Scotland for peace between the two nations. He appears to have died about 1326. By his first wife Lucia, daughter of Philip de Kyme, he had a son Gilbert, who succeeded him, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to Gilbert de Burdon. His second wife, Alianore, who was afterwards the wife of Roger Mauduit, brought him two sons, Sir Robert, and Thomas.

Gilbert de Umfraville, the tenth earl of Angus, was among the disinherited barons who invaded Scotland in 1332. He claimed the earldom of Angus, of which his father had been deprived by forfeiture in the reign of Robert the First. He had a like right to the superiority of the barony of Dunipace in Stirlingshire, which Bruce had granted to William de Lindesay. He had a share in the decisive victory obtained by Edward Baliol over the forces of King David I. at Dupplin Moor, 12th August 1332. He was much engaged in the wars of Scotland, and in the fourteenth year of Edward the Third he was joined in commission with Lord Percy and Lord Neville, to conclude a truce with the Scots. At the battle of Durham, 20th August 1346, when David the Second was defeated and made prisoner, he was one of the chief commanders of the English army, and ten years afterwards he was one of the commissioners for treating of the liberation of that monarch He was also frequently a commissioner for guarding the marches He died 7th January 1381, possessed of great estates in the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, York, Lincoln, and Suffolk, leaving his niece his next hear, his son, Sir Robert de Umfraville, having predeceased him This lady was Alianore, the daughter of his sister, Elizabeth, and Gilbert de Burdon, and the wife of Henry Talboys

The title of earl of Angus after the forfeiture, came into the possession of the Stewart family, having been bestowed before 1329 upon Sir John Stewart of Bonkil, great-grandson of Sir John Stewart of Bonkil, second son of Alexander, high steward of Scotland He died in December 1331 He had married Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander de Abernethy, and had an only son Thomas, the second earl of Angus of the Stewart family The latter took to wife Margaret, daughter of Sir William St Clair of Roslin, by whom he had one son Thomas, the third earl, and two daughters, Lady Margaret, married first to Thomas the thirteenth earl of Marr, who died without issue in 1377, and secondly to William, first earl of Douglas, by whom she was the mother of George de Douglas, the first earl of Angus of the Douglas family The second daughter, Lady Elizabeth, married Sir Alexander Hamilton of Innerwick, and had issue

Thomas, the third earl of Angus, of the Stewart family, succeeded his father in 1361, being then an infant He died without issue in 1377, when the title devolved on his sister Lady Margaret On her resignation of it in parliament in 1389, King Robert the Second granted the earldom of Angus, with the lordships of Abernethy in Perthshire, and of Bonkil in the county of Berwick, in favour of George de Douglas her son and the heirs of his body, whom failing to Sir Alexander de Hamilton and his wife Elizabeth, the sister of the said countess, and their heirs The earldom being afterwards restricted to heirs male, is now vested in the Duke of Hamilton, the representative in the male line of the above named George earl of Angus See DOUGLAS, earl of, (page 45, vol ii), and HAMILTON, duke of, (page 422, vol iii)

ANGUS, styled Angus Mohr, the great, lord of Islay, was son and successor of Donald, (from whom the Macdonalds take their name) second son of Reginald, son of Somerled, king of the Isles, whose youngest son was also named Angus During the life of Angus Mohr the expedition of Haco, king of Norway, to the Isles took place, as related in the life of Alexander the Third, [see ante, page 88] Angus joined Haco with his fleet, but in consequence of the treaty which was afterwards entered into between the kings of Norway and Scotland he was allowed to retain his possessions undisturbed, [see page 93] His son, Angus Oig, or the younger, was faithful to Robert the Bruce, and when the latter, with the few followers who adhered to him, after taking refuge in the Lennox, proceeded to Kintyre, he was hospitably received by Angus, and entertained for three days in his castle of Dunaverty, the ruins of which still remain, and this at a time when he had been denied an asylum everywhere else At the head of two thousand men, whom he had raised, Angus Oig engaged on Bruce's side at the battle of Bannockburn, where he displayed great valour On the forfeiture of Alexander lord of Lorn, and his son and heir, John, who were opposed to the claims of Bruce, a portion of their territories was bestowed on Angus Oig, and in this way the Isles of Mull, (the possession of which had, for some time, been disputed betwixt the lords of Islay and Lorn,) Jura, Coll, and Tiree, with the districts of Duror and Glencoe, fell to the share of Angus Oig He also received a portion of Lochaber, and the lands of Morvern and Ardnamurchan As a measure of precaution, however, Bruce procured from Angus Oig the resignation of his lands in Kintyre, and bestowed them upon Robert, the son and heir of Walter, the high steward and the princess Marjory Bruce, to whom he also gave the keeping of Tarbert castle, then the most important position on the Argyle coast Before King Robert's death, Angus Oig was the most powerful chieftain in Argyle or the Isles He and the Bruce died about the same time, that is about 1329 Under David the Second the lands of Kintyre reverted to the descendants of Angus Oig [Gregory's Western Highlands and Isles, pages 22—27]

ANNAND, WILLIAM, dean of Edinburgh, was born at Ayr in 1633 His father, who bore the same name, was rector of that town under the episcopacy, and rendered himself very unpopular by his strong attachment to the episcopal form of worship Having in August 1637 been appointed to preach at the opening of the synod of Glasgow, he chose for his text 1 Tim iv 1, 2, and, says Baillie, "in the last half of his sermon, from the making of prayers, ran out upon the liturgy, and spake for defence of it in whole, and sundry most plausible parts of it, as well, in my poor judgment, as any in the isle of Britain could have done, considering all circumstances, howsoever, he did maintain to the dislike of all in an unfit time, that which was hanging in suspense betwixt the king and the country Of his sermon among us in the synod, not a word, but in the town, among the women, a great din" On the following day Mr Lindsay, minister of Lanark, preached, and as he was entering the pulpit, "some of the women in his ear assured him that if he should twitch (touch) the service-book in his sermon, he should be rent out of his pulpit he took the advice, and let the matter alone" During the day the women contented themselves with railing and invectives, and "about thirty or forty of our honestest women, in one voice, before the bishop and magistrates, did fall, in railing, cursing, scolding, with clamours on Mr Annand some two of the meanest were taken to the tolbooth" Late in the evening Mr Annand went out with three or four of the clergy, when he was immediately assaulted by some hundreds of enraged women, "of all qualities," who with fists and staves "beat him sore, his cloake, ruff, hatt were rent However, upon his cries, and candles set out from many windows (it was a dark night), he escaped all bloody wounds, yet he was in great danger even of killing" The following day the magistrates accompanied him to the outskirts of the town, to prevent farther molestation [Baillie's Letters and Journals, ed 1841, vol i pp 20, 21] In 1638, five years after his son's birth, he was obliged to remove to England, on account of his adherence to the king and his zeal in the cause of episcopacy In 1651 the younger Annand was admitted a student of University college, Oxford In 1656, being then Bachelor of Arts, he received holy orders from Dr Thomas Fulwar, bishop of Ardfert, or Kerry, in Ireland, and was appointed preacher at Weston on the Green, near Bicester, in Oxfordshire He was afterwards presented to the vicarage of Leighton-Buzzard, in Bedfordshire In 1662 he returned to Scotland, in the capacity of chaplain to John, earl of Middleton, high commissioner from the king to the Estates In the end of 1663 he was inducted to the Tolbooth church at Edinburgh, and some years after transferred to the Tron church In April 1676 he was appointed by the king dean of Edinburgh In 1685 he acted as professor of divinity in the university of St Andrews, and on the 30th of June of that year he attended, by order of government, the earl of Argyle at his execution He was the author of seven theological treatises, principally in favour of the episcopal worship and government, all published in London but the last, which came out at Edinburgh in 1674 He died on 13th June 1689, and was interred in the Greyfriars' churchyard, Edinburgh —Biographia Britannica

ANNANDALE, lord of, a title possessed by the de Bruses, the ancestors of ROBERT the BRUCE, the lordship of Annandale in Dumfries-shire, having been bestowed by David the First, soon after his accession to the throne, in 1124, on Robert de Brus, the son of a Norman knight who came into England with William the Conqueror Besides his large estates in Yorkshire, he thus became possessed of an extensive property in Scotland, which he held by the tenure of military service [See BRUCE, surname of] After the battle of Bannockburn, the lordship of Annandale was bestowed by Robert the Bruce on his nephew, Sir Thomas Randolph, earl of Moray With the hand of his daughter Agnes, who married Patrick, ninth earl of Dunbar and March, it went, after the death of her brother John, third earl of Moray, to the Dunbars, earls of March On their attainder, it came into possession, in 1409, of Archibald, fourth earl of Douglas, and on the forfeiture, in 1455, of James, ninth and last earl of Douglas, it was lost to that family Annandale now belongs chiefly to the earl of Hopetoun

ANNANDALE, earldom of, an extinct title, formerly in the possession of a family of the name of Murray Sir William Murray, the first of this noble family, is said to have been descended from the house of Duffus [see DUFFUS] He married Isabel, the sister of Thomas Randolph, earl of Moray, and daughter of Sir Thomas Randolph, great chamberlain of Scotland, by Isabel, sister of King Robert Bruce, and by her had two sons, William and Patrick His great grandson, Sir Adam Murray of Cockpool, made a considerable figure in Scotland in the reigns of King Robert the Second and Robert the Third A descendant of his, Mungo Murray of Broughton, the second son of Cuthbert Murray of Cockpool, was the ancestor of the Murrays of Broughton in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright Sir James Murray of Cockpool, the twelfth designed of Cockpool, who died in 1620, married Janet, second daughter of Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, ancestor of the dukes of Queensberry, by whom he had three daughters, the eldest of whom, Margaret, was married to Sir Robert Grierson, younger of Lag, by whom she had an only son, Sir John Grierson of Lag, who had no sons His eldest daughter, Nicholas, married David Scot of Scotstarvet, and had one daughter, Marjory, by whose marriage with David fifth viscount Stormont, the Murrays of Cockpool, earls of Annandale, are lineally represented by the present earl of Mansfield [see STORMONT, viscount of]

Sir James Murray's brother, John, who succeeded to the estates of the family on the death, in 1636, of an intermediate brother, Richard, was raised to the peerage by James the Sixth, with whom he was a great favourite, and whom, on his majesty's accession to the throne of England, he accompanied to London, as one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber, by the titles of Viscount of Annand, and Lord Murray of Lochmaben The date of his creation does not appear, but he had a charter "to John Viscount of Annand," of the palace in Dumfries, and the lands of Haikheuch and Caerlaverock, 20th February 1623 He was created earl of Annandale by patent dated at Whitehall, 13th March 1624 His lordship married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Shaw, knight, and died at London in September 1640 He was succeeded by his son James, second earl of Annandale, who in March 1642 succeeded as third viscount of Stormont He died at London 28th December 1658, leaving no issue The titles of earl of Annandale, viscount of Annand, and Lord Murray of Lochmaben, in consequence became extinct, and those of Viscount Stormont and Lord Scoon devolved on David, second Lord Balvaird [see MURRAY, surname of]

The title of Marquis of ANNANDALE (now dormant) was formerly possessed by a brave and powerful Border family of the name of Johnstone, which, as far back as can be traced, were in possession of most extensive estates in the upper district of Annandale, and of the numerous families bearing that name the Johnstones of Lochwood were acknowledged the chiefs This distinguished family maintained their ground, not only against the English borderers, but also against the lords of Sanquhar, whose descendants became earls of Dumfries, and against the powerful and ancient family of the Maxwells, lords of Nithsdale

In the reign of King Robert the Second, Sir John de Johnstone, the ancestor of the Annandale family of that name, made a conspicuous figure In 1371, he was one of the guardians of the west marches, and frequently had an opportunity of exerting himself against the English borderers, particularly in 1378,

He died about 1383, leaving a son Sir John Johnstone of Johnstone A lineal descendant of his in the eleventh degree, James Johnstone of that ilk, was by Charles the First created Lord Johnstone of Lochwood, by patent dated at Holyroodhouse, 20th June 1633 In March 1643 he was created earl of Hartfell In 1644 he was imprisoned by order of the committee of estates, as a favourer of the marquis of Montrose After the battle of Kilsyth, August 1645, he joined Montrose, and being taken at Philiphaugh, 13th September of the same year, he was carried to St Andrews, where, with several others, he was sentenced to death, 26th November 1645, and ordered to be executed first of all, with Lord Ogilvy But the night before the time fixed for the execution, Lord Ogilvy escaped out of the castle of St Andrews, and the marquis of Argyle, suspecting it to have been done by means of the Hamiltons obtained a pardon for the earl of Hartfell, who was as obnoxious to the Hamiltons as Lord Ogilvy was to Argyle He died in March 1653

His only son, James the second earl of Hartfell, was, on the restoration of Charles the Second, sworn a privy councillor The title of earl of Annandale having become extinct by the death of James Murray, the second earl, in 1658, the earl of Hartfell made a resignation of his peerage into the hands of his majesty, who, 13th February 1661, granted a new patent to him as earl of Annandale and Hartfell, viscount of Annand, Lord Johnstone of Lochwood, Lochmaben, Moffatdale, and Evandale He died 17th July 1672 His son William, who succeeded as second earl of Annandale and third of Hartfell, was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, 23d November 1693 He was also constituted one of the lords of the Treasury, and president of the parliament of Scotland, which assembled at Edinburgh 9th May 1695, and sat till 17th July following On the 24th of June 1701 he was created marquis of Annandale, and on the accession of Queen Anne was appointed lord privy seal In 1703 he was appointed president of the privy council. In 1704 he was invested with the order of the Thistle. In 1705 he represented her majesty as high commissioner to the General Assembly of the church of Scotland, as he had already done King William in 1701 He was also constituted in 1705 one of the principal secretaries of state, but not approving of the Union, he was dismissed from that office in the following year, and strenuously opposed the Union treaty in parliament He was afterwards on several occasions elected a representative peer In 1711 he was again lord high commissioner to the General Assembly On the accession of George the First he was, 24th September 1714, appointed keeper of the privy seal, and a few days after sworn a privy councillor He died at Bath on the 14th January 1721 His lordship married, first, Sophia, only daughter and heiress of John Fairholm of Craigiehall, in the county of Linlithgow, by whom he had James, second marquis of Annandale, two other sons, who both died unmarried, and two daughters, of whom the eldest, Lady Henrietta, married in 1699, Charles Hope of Hopetoun, created earl of Hopetoun in 1703, and had issue His first wife having died in 1716, the marquis married secondly, in 1718, Charlotte Van Lore, only child of John Vanden Bempde of Pall Mall, London, by whom he had George, third marquis of Annandale, and another son named John, who died young

James, the second marquis of Annandale, resided much abroad, and dying unmarried at Naples, 21st February 1730 was buried in Westminster Abbey The estate of Craigiehall went to his nephew, the Hon Charles Hope, and his titles and the other estates to his half brother George, third marquis of Annandale, who was born 29th May 1720 The loss of his brother, Lord John, in 1742, occasioned a depression of spirits, which finally deranged his mind In 1745 David Hume, the historian, went to live with him, the friends and family of the marquis being desirous of putting his lordship under his care and direction He resided with him a year On 5th March 1748 an inquest from the court of Chancery found the marquis a lunatic since 12th December 1744 He died 24th April 1792, when the title of Marquis of Annandale became dormant, claimed by Sir Frederic John William Johnstone of Westerhall, baronet and by Mr Goodinge Johnstone It is understood that the titles of earl of Annandale and Hartfell devolved upon James third earl of Hopetoun, who, however, did not assume them, but took the name of Johnstone in addition to that of Hope

In the parish of Johnstone, Dumfries-shire, are the ruins of the castle or tower of Lochwood, said to have been built during the fourteenth century, and which, from the thickness of its walls and its insulated situation amidst bogs and marshes, must have been a place of great strength It was in allusion to this circumstance that James the Sixth is said to have remarked, "that the man who built Lochwood, though he might have the outward appearance of an honest man, must have been a knave at heart" In 1593, it was burnt by Robert, the natural brother of Lord Maxwell, who, with savage glee, exclaimed while it was in flames, "I'll give Dame Johnstone light enough to show her to set her silken hood" In revenge for the destruction of Lochwood's "lofty towers, where dwelt the lords of Annandale," the Johnstones, aided by the bold Buccleuch, the Elliots, the Armstrongs, and the Grahams, attacked and cut to pieces a party of the Maxwells near Lochmaben, and among the slain fell Robert the incendiary The surviving few then took refuge in the church of Lochmaben, but the church with all that was in it was burnt to ashes by the Johnstones, and it was this sacrilegious act which in its turn occasioned the memorable battle of Dryfe

Sands, 7th December 1593, in which the Johnstones finally prevailed Lord Maxwell, while engaged in single combat with the laird of Johnstone, was slain behind his back by the cowardly hands of Will of Kirkhill The Maxwells lost, on the field and in the retreat, about 700 men Many of those who perished or were wounded in the retreat, were cut down in the streets of Lockerby, and hence the phrase currently used in Annandale to denote a severe wound,—"A Lockerby lick" Sir James Johnstone of Johnstone, warden of the west marches, was murdered, 6th April 1608, by John, seventh Lord Maxwell, the son of the Lord Maxwell slain on Dryfe Sands, at a meeting betwixt them, in presence of Sir Robert Maxwell of Orchardton, brother-in-law of Sir James, to which meeting each of them came with one attendant Their attendants quarrelling, Sir James Johnstone turned about to separate them, when he was treacherously shot in the back with two bullets by Lord Maxwell, who, being taken at Caithness some years afterwards, was beheaded for the same, at the cross of Edinburgh, 21st May 1613

ANSTRUTHER, a surname derived from the lands of Anstruther, in the county of Fife, on a portion of which the burgh of Anstruther-easter, of which the laird of Anstruther is superior, is built The family of Anstruther of Anstruther is very ancient, having been settled in Fife in the very early periods of Scottish history During the reign of David the First, William de Candela, obviously of Norman origin, possessed the lands of Anstruther, as appears from a charter granted in favour of the monks of Balmerinoch, by his son William, wherein he is designated "Filius Wilhelmi de Candela, domini de Anstruther" Henry his son first assumed the name of his lands, and in a charter of confirmation of his father's grant, dated in 1221, he is styled "Henricus de Aynstrother, dominus ejusdem, Filius Wilhelmi," &c From these early proprietors the family of Anstruther are lineally descended

About the year 1515 Robert Anstruther and David his brother, younger sons of Robert de Anstruther, the sixth in descent from the original William de Candela, having gone to France, were promoted to be officers of the Scots guards in the service of the French king David married a lady of distinction in France, and his descendant, Francis Cæsar Anstruther, contracted into Anstrude, was by Louis the Fifteenth, in 1787, raised to the dignity of a French baron, by the title of Baron de Anstrude of the seigniory of Barry

Sir James Anstruther, the twelfth in direct descent from William de Candela, was, in 1585, appointed heritable carver to James the Sixth In 1592, he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, and was appointed one of the masters of the household to his majesty He died in 1606

His son, Sir William, succeeded to his father's offices, and was, besides, appointed one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber On James' accession to the English throne, he accompanied his majesty to London, and at his coronation was created a knight of the Bath He was also in great favour with Charles the First, by whom he was appointed gentleman usher of his majesty's privy chamber He died in 1649, and was succeeded by his younger brother, Sir Robert, who was, by Charles the First, appointed one of the members of the privy council, and one of the gentlemen of his majesty's bed-chamber He was an able diplomatist, and frequently employed in negociations of state, both by James the Sixth and Charles the First In 1620, he was sent ambassador extraordinary to the court of Denmark, to borrow money from King Christian, with power to grant security for it in the king's name At this time he got from the Danish king, in a compliment, a ship's load of timber for building his house in Scotland. In April 1627, he was commissioned as minister plenipotentiary, to treat with the emperor and the states of Germany, at Nuremberg, about the concerns of the elector palatine, and other affairs of Europe He was also appointed by Charles the First, and Frederick, king of Bohemia, elector palatine, their plenipotentiary to the diet at Ratisbon, for settling all differences between the Roman emperor Ferdinand and the elector palatine His commission for this purpose is dated at Westminster 2d June 1630, and is signed by King Charles and Frederick, and has both their seals appended He went also as ambassador to the meeting of the princes of Germany at Hailburn

His second son, Sir Philip, succeeded to the Anstruther estates He was a zealous and gallant cavalier, and had a command in the royal army at the battle of Worcester, where he was taken prisoner He was fined in a thousand merks by Cromwell, and his estates were sequestrated till the Restoration in 1660 He married Christian, daughter of Major-general Lumsden of Innergelly, and had five sons, two of whom were created baronets, and the other three knights He died in 1702

Sir William Anstruther, the eldest son, represented the county of Fife in the Scottish parliament, in 1681, when James duke of York was his majesty's high commissioner in Scotland, and strongly opposed the measures of the court He sat in parliament for the county of Fife till 1709, and took an active part in the proceedings, those more particularly for securing and establishing the Protestant religion, and the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom In 1689 he was appointed by William the Third one of the ordinary lords of Session, and soon after was made one of his majesty's privy council and of Exchequer In 1694 he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia From Queen Anne, he received a charter dated at Kensington, 20th April 1704, of the baronies of Anstruther and Ardross, and many other lands, and of the heritable bailiary of the lordship and regality of Pittenweem, and of the office of searcher, and giver of coquets for the ports of Anstruther and Elie The same charter constitutes him heritably, one of the cibi cidæ, or carvers, and one of the masters of the household to her majesty and her successors within the kingdom of Scotland, offices which belonged to his predecessors, and which his descendant, the present baronet continues to hold On the 9th November of the same year he was nominated one of the lords of Justiciary, in the room of Lord Aberuchil He married Lady Helen Hamilton, daughter of John, fourth earl of Haddington, and died at Edinburgh in January 1711 He was the author of a volume, entitled 'Essays, Moral and Divine,' interspersed with poetry, published at Edinburgh in 1701, in 4to Its contents are, 1st, Against Atheism 2d, Of Providence 3d, Of Learning and Religion 4th, Of trifling studies, stage plays, and romances, and 5th, Upon the incarnation of Jesus Christ, and redemption of mankind The work does not seem to have done much credit to his literary powers, as his friends did all they could to dissuade him from publishing it, and after his death, his son bought up every copy that could be found, for the purpose of suppressing it [Campbell's History of Scottish Poetry, page 141] He was succeeded by his son Sir John, after mentioned.

Sir James Anstruther of Airdrie, the second son of Sir Philip, was an advocate, and principal clerk of the Bills His son, Philip, adopted a military life, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general in the army, but dying unmarried, his estates went to his cousin, Sir John Anstruther of Anstruther

Sir Robert Anstruther of Balcaskie, the third son of Sir Philip, acquired the estate of Balcaskie, and was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1694, the same year as his elder brother, Sir William

Sir Philip Anstruther, the fourth brother, was made a knight. He was designed of Anstruther-field, from lands he so named near Inverkeithing

Sir Alexander Anstruther, knight, the fifth brother, married in 1694, Jean Leslie, Baroness Newark, daughter and heiress of David second lord Newark, and was father of William, third lord Newark, and Alexander fourth lord The title of Lord Newark, which became dormant on the death of the latter in 1791, was claimed in 1793, by his eldest son, but unsuccessfully [See NEWARK, Lord]

Sir John Anstruther of Anstruther, the son of Sir William, married in 1717, the lady Margaret Carmichael, eldest daughter of James second earl of Hyndford, and on the failure in the male line of that noble house, and the title becoming extinct in 1817, their descendant, Sir John Anstruther of Anstruther, succeeded to the entailed estates of the earldom, and assumed the name of Carmichael [See HYNDFORD, Earl of, and CARMICHAEL, surname of] Sir John died in 1746, and was succeeded by his son, also named John

Sir John the third baronet of this branch of the family was the author of a work on drill husbandry, published in 1796, which is understood to have been useful at the time of its publication, but is chiefly remembered from a bon mot connected with it On its appearance one of Sir John's friends jocularly remarked that no one could be better qualified to write on the subject, as there was not a better drilled husband in the county of Fife Sir John married, in 1750, Janet, daughter of James Lall, Esq of Dunbar She was a very superior woman, and seems to have had a considerable influence with her lord Sir John died in July 1799

His eldest son, Sir Philip, succeeded He married in 1778, Anne, only child of Sir John Paterson, of Eccles, baronet, and assumed in consequence the additional surname of Paterson He died without issue in 1808

He was succeeded by his brother, the Right Hon Sir John Anstruther, of Cassis in Staffordshire, a distinguished lawyer, who had been created a baronet of Great Britain, 18th May 1798, when appointed chief justice of the supreme court of Judicature in Bengal He married Maria, daughter of Edward Bice, Esq of Berners Street, London, and had issue two sons and a daughter He retired from the Bench in 1806, and died in 1811

Sir John, his eldest son, died in 1817 His only son, a posthumous child, born 6th February 1818, and named John after his father, inherited the titles and estates at his birth He was accidentally killed while on a shooting excursion in November 1831, and the baronetcies and possessions of the family reverted to his uncle, Sir Windham Carmichael Anstruther of Elie and Anstruther, the eighth baronet of Nova Scotia, and fourth of Great Britain

Sir Robert Anstruther, above mentioned, the founder of the Balcaskie branch, was thrice married His first wife, whose name was Kinnear, an heiress, died without issue His second wife, Jean Monteith Wiea, also an heiress, brought him six sons and two daughters, and by his third wife, Marion, daughter of Sir William Preston of Valleyfield, he had one son and two daughters He was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir Philip, whose eldest son, Sir Robert, born 21st April 1783, married Lady Janet Erskine, youngest daughter of Alexander, fifth earl of Kellie, and had three sons and three daughters. Robert, the eldest, was the celebrated General Anstruther He was born 3d March 1768, and entered at a very early period of life into the army In 1793 he accompanied his regiment to Holland In 1796 he joined the Austrian army in the Brisgau, under the Archduke Charles then at war with France, and received a wound in the left side in one of the conflicts In 1797 he purchased a company in the 3d Guards, and was appointed deputy quarter-master-general In 1798 he was on a diplomatic mission to Germany, and in the autumn of 1799 with the expedition to the Helder In 1800 Captain A went to Egypt as quarter-master-general to the army under the command of Sir Ralph Abercromby, at which time the order of the Crescent was conferred upon him In 1802 he was adjutant-general in Ireland In 1808 he went to Portugal as brigadier-general, and distinguished himself at the battle of Vimiera In the subsequent campaign in Spain, under Sir John Moore, General A commanded the rear-guard of the army, which he brought safely into Corunna on the night of the 12th January 1809, but survived only one day the exertions he had made, and the fatigue he had endured during the retreat He died 14th January 1809 and lies interred in the north-east bastion of the citadel of Corunna Sir John Moore by his own desire was buried by the side of General Anstruther He married 16th March, 1799, Charlotte Lucy, only daughter of Col James Hamilton, grandson of James, fourth duke of Hamilton, and had issue Sir Ralph Abercromby Anstruther, Bart, who succeeded his grandfather in August 1818, one other son and three daughters Sir Ralph married, 7th Sept 1831, Mary Jane eldest daughter of Sir Henry Torrens, K C B, and has issue 3 sons and 2 daughters His second son Henry fell at the battle of the Alma, September 20, 1854, in his 18th year

ARBUCKLE, JAMES, A M, a minor poet, was born in Glasgow, in 1700 He studied at the university of that city, where he took his degrees He afterwards kept an academy in the north of Ireland, hence he is called an Irishman by Campbell, in his Introduction to the History of Poetry in Scotland He was the friend of Allan Ramsay He published a volume of poems, and had begun a translation of Horace, but died before it was finished, in 1734 Some of his translations and imitations of Horace are among his best pieces He wrote 'Snuff, a Poem,' which, according to the advertisement, was "printed at Edinburgh by Mr James M'Ewen and Company for the author, and sold by Mr James M'Ewen, bookseller in Edinburgh, and by the booksellers in Glasgow," 1719 This poem was dedicated to "His Grace, John, Duke of Roxburgh," and contained some pleasing enough conceits, very prettily turned As an instance the following may be quoted

"Though in some solitary pathless wild
Where mortal never trod, nor nature smiled,
My cruel fate should doom my endless stay,
To saunter all my ling'ring life away,

Yet still I'll have society enough,
While blest with virtue, and a Pinch of Snuff, Enough for me the conscious joys to find,
And silent raptures of an honest mind.'

ARBUTHNOTT, viscount of, a title possessed by a family of ancient descent, bearing that surname, in Kincardineshire, the first of whom, Hugo de Aberbothenoth, flourished in the reign of King William the Lion, and derived his name, in 1105, from lands which came to him by marriage with a daughter of Osbertus Oliphard, sheriff of Mearns Those lands now form the greater part of the parish of Arbuthnott, and have passed to the present viscount through no less than twenty-two generations Previous to the twelfth century the name was Aberbothenothe, about 1335, it had become Aberbuthnot, and about 1443, Arbuthnott

The name of Aberbothenothe is understood to mean "the confluence of the water below the baron's house," being derived from Aber, the influx of a river into the sea, or of a smaller stream into a larger Both, or Bothena, a dwelling, a baronial residence, and Neth or Neoth-ea, the stream that descends or is lower than something else in the neighbourhood, a derivation which is perfectly applicable to the site of the ancient castle, and to the present residence of the noble family of Arbuthnott [See Statistical Account, vol xi]

In the reign of Alexander the Second, Duncan de Aberbothenothe was witness to a donation of that sovereign in 1242 His son, Hugh, is witness, along with his father, designed Duncanus Dominus de Aberbothenoth, to a charter of Robert, the son of Warnebald, to the monastery of Aberbrothwick His son and successor, Hugh, called from the flaxen colour of his hair, Hugo Blundus or le Blond, to distinguish him from two predecessors of the same name, was laird of Arbuthnott in 1282, in which year he bestowed the patronage of the church of Garvock, in pure alms, on the monastery of Arbroath, "for the safety of his soul," which patronage, with many others, at the Reformation, fell into the hands of the king Along with the patronage he gave one ox-gang of land, lying adjacent to the church of Garvock, with pasturage for 100 sheep, 4 horses, 10 oxen, and 20 cows Hugo le Blond died about the end of the thirteenth century, and was buried at Arbuthnott, where there is an ancient full-length stone statue of him, in a reclining posture, with the face looking upwards, and the feet resting on the figure of a dog His own and his wife's arms, the latter being the same with those of the once powerful family of the Morevilles, constables of Scotland, are cut on the stone on which the statue lies

In 1355 Philip de Arbuthnott, fourth direct descendant from Hugh le Blond, was a benefactor to the church of the Carmelite friars, Aberdeen His son and heir, Hugh Arbuthnott, was accessary with several other gentlemen of the Mearns, upon great provocation, to the slaughter of John Melville, of Glenbervie, sheriff of that county, about 1420 According to tradition, Melville had, by a strict exercise of his authority as sheriff, rendered himself obnoxious to the surrounding barons, who teased the regent, Murdoch, duke of Albany, by repeated complaints against him At last, in a fit of impatience, the regent incautiously exclaimed to Barclay, laird of Mathers (ancestor of Captain Barclay Allardice of Ury), who had come to him with another complaint against Melville, "Sorrow gin that sheriff were sodden, and supped in broo" Most of those who have related this story state, that it was the king, James the First, who made this exclamation, but his majesty was then a prisoner in England Barclay, immediately returning home, assembled his neighbours, the lairds of Lauriston, Arbuthnott, Pitarrow and Halkerton, who appointed a great hunting party in the forest of Garvock, to which they invited the devoted Melville, and having prepared a large fire and cauldron of boiling water in a retired place, they decoyed the unsuspecting Melville to the fatal spot, knocked him down, stripped him, and then threw him into the cauldron After he was boiled or sodden for some time, they each took a spoonful of the soup To screen himself from justice, Barclay built a fortress in the parish of St Cyrus, called the Kaim of Mathers, on a perpendicular and peninsular rock, sixty feet above the sea, where, in those days, he lived quite secure The laird of Arbuthnott claimed and obtained the benefit of the law of clan Macduff, which, in case of homicide, allowed a pardon to any one within the ninth degree of kindred to Macduff, Thane of Fife, who should flee to his cross, which then stood near Lindores, on the march between Fife and Strathern, and pay a fine The pardon is still extant in Arbuthnott House The rest were outlawed He died in 1446

His descendant, Sir Robert Arbuthnott of Arbuthnott, was knighted by King Charles the First, and for his enduring loyalty ennobled in 1641, by being created Viscount Arbuthnott and Lord Inverbervie Robert the second viscount of Arbuthnott succeeded his father in 1655, and died in June 1682 By his first wife, Lady Elizabeth Keith, second daughter of William seventh earl Marischal, he had a son Robert, third viscount, and a daughter, and by his second wife, Catherine, daughter of Robert Gordon of Pitlurg and Straloch, he had three sons and three daughters The Hon Alexander Arbuthnott, the second son by the second marriage, who was appointed one of the barons of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland at the union of 1707, married Jean, eldest daughter of Sir Charles Maitland of Pitrichie in Aberdeenshire, heir to her brother Sir Charles, who died in 1704, and he in consequence assumed the name and arms of Maitland

John the seventh viscount of Arbuthnott, married in December 1775, Isabella, 2d daughter of William Graham, Esq of Morphie Kincardineshire, and by her, who died in 1818, he had John, 8th viscount, General Hugh Arbuthnott, long M P for Kincardineshire 5 other sons and 2 daughters

The 8th viscount succeeded on his father's death, Feb 27, 1800, and in June 1805 he married Margaret, daughter of the Hon Walter Ogilvy of Clova, sister of the ninth earl of Airlie, with issue, 6 sons and 7 daughters He died Jan 10, 1860 when his eldest son, John, became 9th viscount His lordship married, in 1837, the eldest daughter of the 8th earl of Airlie, issue, 3 sons and a daughter

ARBUTHNOT, ALEXANDER, an eminent divine, and zealous promoter of the Reformation in Scotland, was the second son of Andrew Arbuthnot of Pitcairles, the fourth son of Sir Robert Arbuthnott of Arbuthnott, and the brother of the baron or proprietor of Arbuthnott, in Kincardineshire, and not the baron himself, as generally stated by his biographers His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of James Strachan of Monboddo, and sister of Alexander Strachan of Thornton He was born in 1538 According to Archbishop Spottiswood, he studied at the university of St Andrews, but Dr Mackenzie says that he received his education at King's college, Aberdeen [Mac

kenzie's Lives of Scots Writers, vol iii p 186] The former is likely to be correct, as in the year 1560 his name appears the ninth in a list of young men at St Andrews best qualified for the ministry and teaching, given in to the first General Assembly [Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, vol ii p 45] In 1561 he went to France, and for the space of five years prosecuted the study of the civil law at Bourges, under the famous Cujacius This has led his biographers to state that it was with the view of following the profession of an advocate in his native country, but it was then usual for students of divinity to make civil law a branch of their studies He returned to Scotland in 1566, and was soon after licensed as a minister of the Reformed church On the 15th July 1568 he received a presentation to the church of Logie Buchan, one of the common kirks of the cathedral of Aberdeen He was a member of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh on the first of July of that year, and was intrusted with the charge of revising a book entitled 'The Fall of the Roman Church,' published by one Thomas Bassenden, a printer of that city, which had given great offence and incurred the censure of the Assembly, chiefly on account of an assertion contained in it, that the king was the supreme head of the church For this, and for having printed at the end of the Psalm-Book, an indecent song called 'Welcome Fortune,' the Assembly ordained Bassenden to call in all the copies of these books which he had sold, and to sell no more of them, and to abstain for the future from printing anything without the license of the magistrates, and the revisal by a committee of the church of such books as pertain to religion [Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland, p 100]

In the year 1569, Mr Alexander Anderson, the principal of King's college, Aberdeen, with the sub-principal and three of the regents of that university, having been ejected from their offices, on account of their adherence to popery, and refusal to sign the Confession of Faith, Mr Arbuthnot was promoted to the vacant principalship on the 3d July of that year, and three weeks afterwards he was presented to the church of Arbuthnott in Kincardineshire, "provyding he administrat the sacraments of Jesus Christ, or ellis travell [that is, labour] in some others als necessar vocation to the utility of the kirk, and approvit by the samen" The emoluments of his two parochial charges were probably his only support as principal, the funds of the college having been greatly dilapidated by his predecessor, Principal Anderson, when he found that he was likely to be deprived for his adherence to popery To the university Principal Arbuthnot rendered the most important services, both in the augmentation of its funds, and by his assiduity and success in teaching "By his diligent teaching and dexterous government," says Archbishop Spottiswood, "he not only revived the study of good letters, but gained many from the superstitions whereunto they were given" In 1572 he was a member of the General Assembly held at St Andrews, which strenuously opposed a scheme of church government called 'The Book of policy,' proposed by the regent Morton and his party, for the purpose of restoring the old titles in the church, and retaining among themselves all the temporalities annexed to them The same year he established his character as a man of learning, by the publication at Edinburgh, in quarto, of his 'Orationes de Origine et Dignitate Juris,' a production which was honoured with an encomiastic poem by Thomas Maitland, who represents Arbuthnot as one of the brightest ornaments of his native country [Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, tom ii p 153] "To enhance the value of this eulogium," says Dr Irving, "it must be recollected that Maitland was a zealous Catholic"

From this time Arbuthnot began to take a lead in the General Assembly, and during the minority of James the Sixth, he appears to have been much employed on the part of the church, in its tedious contest with the regency, concerning the plan of ecclesiastical government to be adopted Of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh 6th August, 1573, he was chosen moderator In that of Edinburgh March 6th, 1574, he was appointed, with three others, to summon before them the chapter of Murray, accused of giving their letters testimonial in favour of George Douglas, bishop of that see, "without just trial and due examination of his life, and qualification in literature." [Calderwood's Hist of the Church of Scotland.

vol iii p. 804] This assembly also authorized him, with Mr John Row and others, to draw up a plan of ecclesiastical polity for the approval of the members He was at the Assembly which met at Edinburgh in August, 1575 "Efter the Assemblie," (says James Melville,) "we passed to Anguss in companie with Mr Alexander Arbuthnot, a man of singular gifts of lerning, wesdome, godliness, and sweitness of nature, then principall of the collage of Aberdein, whom withe Mr Andro [Melville] communicat anent the haill ordour of his collage in doctrine and discipline, and aggreit as thereftei was sett down in the new reformation of the said collages of Glasgow and Aberdein" [Melville's Diary, p 41] He was again chosen moderator of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh 1st April 1577 In the Assembly which met in that city in October of the same year he was appointed, with Andrew Melville and George Hay, to attend a council which was expected to meet at Magdeburg for the purpose of establishing the Augsburg Confession [Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland, page 169] The council, however, was not convened A copy of the heads of the policy and jurisdiction of the church having been, by order of that General Assembly, presented to the earl of Morton as regent of the kingdom, for the solution of doubts and the removal of difficulties, he was referred to Principal Arbuthnot, Patrick Adamson, and Andrew Melville, and nine other commissioners of inferior eminence [Ibid p 171] In the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh 24th April 1578, it was resolved that a copy of the same should be presented to the king, and another to his council, and that if a conference should be demanded, they, on their part, would nominate Arbuthnot, Andrew Melville, and ten others, to attend at any appointed time [Ibid p 175] In the Assembly which convened at Stirling, 11th June of the same year, Arbuthnot, with some others, was empowered to confer with several of the nobility, prelates, and gentry, relative to the polity of the church In the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh on the 24th April 1583, Arbuthnot, with David Ferguson and John Durie, was directed to wait upon the king and council, to request, in name of the Assembly, the dismissal of M. Manningville, the French ambassador, whose popish practices had excited much alarm, as well as to complain of sundry other grievances He was also named in a commission, with Mr Robert Pont and five others, or any four of them, to visit the university of St Andrews, for the purpose of inquiring how the rents thereof were bestowed, what order and diligence were used by the regents or professors in teaching, and how order was kept among the students With Messrs Andrew and George Hay he was also empowered to present to the king and council such heads, articles, and complaints as the Assembly might determine, and to confer, treat, and reason thereupon, and to receive his majesty's answer to the same [Calderwood, vol iii pp 707, 708] The leading part which he took in ecclesiastical matters seems to have rendered him an object of suspicion and displeasure to James the Sixth, for when, in the same year (1583), he was appointed by the Assembly minister of St Andrews, the king commanded him to remain in his college, under pain of horning The Assembly saw in this arbitrary exertion of the royal prerogative, an infringement of their rights They therefore remonstrated against it, but his majesty answered generally that he and his council had good grounds and reasons for what had been done Arbuthnot is said to have had some bias towards the episcopal form of ecclesiastical polity, but whatever might be his private sentiments, he adhered with steadiness to the presbyterian party It is thought, and indeed Dr Mackenzie confidently asserts, that he had given offence to the king by printing Buchanan's History of Scotland, in the year 1582, [Lives of Scots Writers, vol iii p 192,] and other authors have also supposed that he was the identical Alexander Arbuthnot who at that period held the office of king's printer On this point Dr Irving particularly quotes James Man, who, in his 'Censure of Ruddiman's Philological Notes on Buchanan,' (p 99 Aberdeen, 1753, 12mo,) maintained, "with ridiculous pertinacity," as Chalmers in his Life of Ruddiman says, that Principal Arbuthnot was indeed the printer of Buchanan's History The mistake has been corrected by Chalmers, who, on referring to the writ of privy seal, found that the Alexander Arbuth-

not therein mentioned as king's printer was denominated a burgess of Edinburgh, and therefore was a different person from the principal of King's college, Aberdeen [Life of Ruddiman, p 72]

The restriction placed on him by King James is supposed to have seriously affected his health and spirits He fell into a decline, and died unmarried, at Aberdeen, on the 10th of October 1583, before he had completed the age of forty-five On the 20th of the same month his remains were interred in the chapel of King's college

Principal Arbuthnot appears to have possessed a degree of good sense and moderation which eminently qualified him for the conduct of public business, and his death was regarded as a severe calamity to the national church and to the national literature Andrew Melville honoured his memory by an elegant epitaph in Latin, which will be found in Irving's Life of Arbuthnot (Lives of Scots Poets, vol ii p 177), quoted from the Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, (tom ii p 120) James Melville, in his Diary, has pronounced Arbuthnot one of the most learned men of whom Europe could at that time boast His character has been thus delineated by Archbishop Spottiswood "He was greatly loved of all men, hated of none, and in such account for his moderation with the chief men of these parts, that without his advice they could almost do nothing, which put him in a great fashion, whereof he did oft complain, pleasant and jocund in conversation, and in all sciences expert, a good poet, mathematician, philosopher, theologue, lawyer, and in medicine skilful, so as in every subject he could promptly discourse, and to good purpose" Notwithstanding the violence of the times in which he lived the name of Principal Arbuthnot has never been found subjected to censure Even the papists themselves appear to have revered his virtues Nicol Burne, in his 'Admonition to the Antichristian Ministers of the Deformit Kirk of Scotland,' written in 1581, while he has treated the rest of the Protestant clergy with the utmost contempt, thus respectfully speaks of Arbuthnot

'Bot wit gude Lord, quha aihis thy name hes kend,
May or thay de, find for thair saulis remeid
With thy elect Arbuthnot I commend, Althocht the I ive to Geneve haist with speed"

Three Scottish poems, published in Pinkerton's 'Ancient Scottish Poems,' have been attributed to Principal Arbuthnot Dr Irving in his Life of Arbuthnot gives extracts from two of these, 'The Miseries of a Puir [poor] Scholar,' and 'The Praises of Wemen,' which show the author to have been an ingenious and pleasing poet The Maitland MSS preserve several of his pieces not hitherto published [See Irving's Lives of Scottish Poets, vol ii p 169] Principal Arbuthnot left in manuscript an account of the Arbuthnott family, entitled 'Originis et incrementi Arbuthnoticæ familiæ descriptio historica,' which is still preserved It was afterwards translated by George Morrison, minister of Benholme, and continued to the period of the Restoration by Alexander Arbuthnott, episcopalian minister of Arbuthnott, the father of the celebrated wit, the subject of the succeeding notice

ARBUTHNOT, John, M D , one of the most conspicuous, and certainly the most learned, of the wits of Queen Anne's reign, was the son of Alexander Arbuthnott, episcopalian clergyman at Arbuthnott in Kincardineshire, and a near relative of the noble family of that name, and his wife, Margaret Lamy, from the parish of Maryton, near Montrose He was born in the parish of Arbuthnott in April 1667, and received the elementary part of his education at the parish school About the year 1680 he and his elder brother Robert, afterwards a banker in Paris, went to Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he applied himself diligently to all the academical branches of instruction, and after finishing his medical studies, he took his doctor's degree At the revolution his father, not complying with the new order of things, was deprived of his living, and in consequence retired to the castle of Hallgreen near Bervie, in the neighbourhood of which he possessed, by inheritance, a small property called Kingoriey , and his two sons were compelled to trust to their own exertions for getting forward in the world The subject of this memoir accordingly resolved to push his fortune in London, and on his arrival there, he was hospitably received into the house of a Mr William Pate, a woollen-draper For some time he supported himself by teaching the mathematics, and soon distinguished himself by his writings His first work appeared in 1697, entitled an 'Examination of Dr Woodward's Account of the Deluge,' being an answer to a work of that gentleman bearing the title of an 'Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth,' which had appeared two years before This laid the foundation of Arbuthnot's fame, which was much extended by an able treatise published by him in 1700, 'On the usefulness of the Mathematics to young students in the universities' In 1704, in consequence of a curious and instructive dissertation 'On the Regularity of the Births of both sexes,' communicated to the Royal Society, and published in the Philosophical Transactions of that year, No 328, he was elected a member of that learned body It would appear from the signature to his letters, that on first going to London he himself continued to spell his name with the two t's at the end of it, as is the correct way, but in process of time one of the t's was dropped as unnecessary

In 1705 Prince George of Denmark, the consort of Queen Anne, was suddenly taken ill at Epsom Dr Arbuthnot, happening to be on the spot, was called to his assistance, and, under his care, his royal highness soon recovered Arbuthnot was, in consequence, appointed physician extraordinary to the queen, and in the month of November, 1709, he was promoted to be fourth physician in ordinary to her majesty, that is, one of her domestic physicians His skill having been the means of recovering her majesty from a dangerous illness, drew from his friend Gay the following elegant pastoral compliment

" While thus we stood, as in a stound,
And wet with tears, like dew, the ground,
Full soon, by bonfire and by bell,
We learnt our liege was passing well
A skilful leech, so God him speed,
They say had wrought this blessed deed
This leech ARBUTHNOTT was yclept,
Who many a night not once had slept,
But watch'd our gracious sovereign still,
For who could rest when she was ill?
Oh! may'st thou henceforth sweetly sleep!
Sheer, swains! oh, sheer your softest sheep,
To swell his couch, for well I ween
He saved the realm who saved the queen "

In the month of April, 1710, he was admitted a Fellow of the Royal college of physicians The confidence reposed in him by his royal mistress appears by the terms in which he is spoken of by Dean Swift, who calls him " the queen's favourite physician," and again, " the queen's favourite " Being thus distinguished by his professional abilities, his influence at court, and his literary attainments, Arbuthnot acquired the friendship not only of the leading men of the Tory party, to which he belonged, such as Harley and Bolingbroke, but that of all the wits and scholars of his time On Swift's visit to London in 1710, a strict intimacy was formed between them, and soon after Pope was added to the number of his friends, as were also Prior and Gay

In the year 1712, appeared the first part of 'The History of John Bull,' of which it has been justly said, that " never was a political allegory managed with more exquisite humour, or a more skilful adaptation of characters and circumstances " The doubt entertained respecting the author of this satire has been dispelled by Swift and Pope, who both distinctly attribute it to Dr Arbuthnot Pope declared that Arbuthnot was the " sole author " The object of this highly humorous production was to throw ridicule upon the splendid achievements of Marlborough, and to render the country discontented with the war then raging with France Arbuthnot, who was one of the literary phalanx attached to the fortunes of Harley and the Tories, was aware how entirely that minister's power depended on a peace with France, and, therefore, he applied all the vigour of his wit to the accomplishment of that end The ingenuity of the story contained in the 'History of John Bull,' united to its intelligible, straightforward, comic humour, procured for it a favourable reception everywhere, but to politicians, the exquisite skill of its satire gave it a peculiar relish After the accession of the house of Hanover, a supplement to the 'History' appeared, but it has been doubted whether this is a genuine production of Arbuthnot's pen Some are of opinion that the first two parts as printed in Swift's works, are all that proceeded from Arbuthnot

of Cervantes The name by which the intended hero was to be called was assigned to that assemblage of wits and learned men of which these three formed the nucleus, and it was called the 'Scribleius' Club' Harley, Atterbury, Congreve, and Gay, were members, and of them all no one was better qualified than Arbuthnot, both in point of wit and erudition, to promote the object of the society, which was to ridicule the absurdities of false taste in learning, under the character of a man of capacity enough, but no judgment, who had industriously dipped into every art and science But the prosecution of this noble design was prevented by the queen's death, which deeply affected Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot, who were all warmly attached to Lord Oxford's ministry, and a final period was afterwards put to the project, by the separation and growing infirmities of Dean Swift, by the bad health of Dr Arbuthnot, and other concurring causes The work in consequence was never completed, the first book of 'the Memoirs of Martinus Scribleius' being only a part of it "Polite letters," says Warburton, the editor of Pope's works, "never lost more than in the defeat of this scheme, in the execution of which work each of this illustrious triumvirate would have found exercise for his own peculiar talents, besides constant employment for those they had all in common Dr Arbuthnot was skilled in every thing which related to science, Mr Pope was a master in the fine arts, and Dr Swift excelled in the knowledge of the world Wit they had all in equal measure, and this so large that no age perhaps ever produced three men to whom nature had more bountifully bestowed it, or in whom art had brought it to higher perfection" The first book of 'Martinus Scribleius' was published after the death of Dr Arbuthnot in 1741, in the quarto edition of Pope's prose works, and there seems to be every reason to believe that Arbuthnot was the sole author It has, it is true, been printed in the collected editions of the works both of Swift and Pope, yet the internal evidence is sufficient to prove it the entire production of Arbuthnot, to whom Warton has attributed the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, tenth, and twelfth chapters, whatever may be determined of the other parts of the memoirs The medical and antiquarian knowledge displayed in the other chapters, and the ridicule on Dr Woodward in the third, afford strong presumption of their having had the same authorship as the rest The humorous essay concerning the origin of the sciences, usually appended to the 'Memoirs of Martinus Scribleius,' appears from Spence to have been a joint production of Arbuthnot, Pope, and Parnell

The death of Queen Anne in July 1714 put an end to Arbuthnot's connexion with the court, and completely destroyed the hopes of the Tory party He felt severely the change in his circumstances, but his satirical humour and spirit of wit enabled him to derive some relief even from his altered prospects In a letter to Swift, dated 12th August, he thus writes "I have an opportunity calmly and philosophically to consider that treasure of vileness and baseness that I always believed to be in the heart of man, and to behold them exert their insolence and baseness, every new instance, instead of surprising and grieving me, as it does some of my friends, really diverts me,—and in a manner proves my theory" In a subsequent letter alluding to the dispersion of the queen's courtiers on her death, he says, "The queen's poor servants are like so many poor orphans exposed in the very streets" To divert his chagrin he paid a visit to his brother Robert at Paris, under whose care he left two of his daughters On his return, in the beginning of September, having been deprived of his apartments in St James' palace, he took a house in Dover Street, where he assiduously devoted himself to the practice of his profession and to literary occupation His spirits appear to have suffered considerably at this time, for in a letter to Pope, dated September 7th, 1714, he says, "I am extremely obliged to you for taking notice of a poor, old, distressed courtier, commonly the most despisable thing in the world This blow has so roused Scribleius that he has recovered his senses, and thinks and talks like other men From being frolicsome and gay, he is turned grave and morose" This depression of spirits, however, had not given him a distaste for the society of his friends "Martin's office," he adds, in allusion to his 'Martinus Scribleius,' "is now the second door on the left hand in Dover Street, where he will be glad to see Dr Parnell, Mr Pope, and his old friends, to whom he can still afford a half pint of claret." He is said, with Pope, to have assisted Gay in the farce of 'Three Hours after Marriage,' which was brought out in 1716, but met with no success

In the autumn of 1722, Arbuthnot visited Bath, for the benefit of his health He was accompanied by his brother, who had shortly before arrived in England Mr Robert Arbuthnot was a person of a singularly benevolent character, and is thus commemorated in a letter from Pope to the Hon Robert Digby, "Dr Arbuthnot is going to Bath,—his brother, who is lately come to England, goes also to the Bath, and is a more extraordinary man than he, and worth your going thither on purpose to know him The spirit of philanthropy, so long dead to our world, is revived in him He is a philosopher all of fire, so warmly, nay so wildly in the right, that he forces all others about him to be so too, and draws them into his own vortex He is a star that looks as if it were all fire, but is all benignity, all gentle and beneficial influence If there be other men in the world that would serve a friend, yet he is the only one, I believe, that could make even an enemy serve a friend"

On the 30th September 1723, Arbuthnot was chosen second censor of the College of Physicians In the autumn of 1725 he had a dangerous illness On this occasion he was visited by Pope, who thus communicated the intelligence of his illness to Dean Swift "Dr Arbuthnot is, at this time, ill of a very dangerous distemper, an imposthume in the bowels, which is broke, but the event is very uncertain Whatever that be (he bids me tell you, and I write this by him) he lives and dies your faithful friend, and one reason he has to desire a little longer life is, the wish to see you once more" In 1727 he was chosen an elect of the Royal college of Physicians, when he pronounced the Harveian oration for that year In the same year he published his great work, entitled 'Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, explained and exemplified in several dissertations,' 4to This volume, which does great honour to the antiquarian knowledge and industry of the writer, though not wholly free from inaccuracies, has ever since been considered a standard work. In 1732 he published a professional treatise 'On the nature and choice of Aliments, and in the following year an essay 'On the effect of Air on Human Bodies,' both founded on the doctrine of Boerhaave, the prevailing system of the time He is supposed to have been led to write these works from the consideration of his own malady, an asthmatic affection, which gradually increasing with his years, became at last incurable A little before the appearance of the latter publication he sustained a severe loss in the death of his son Charles, a clergyman of the Church of England, "whose life," he says, "if it had so pleased God, he would willingly have redeemed with his own" Another son had died previously in the year 1730

In his latter years Dr Arbuthnot was grievously afflicted with asthma, and in 1732 he retired to Hampstead, a village situated on the declivity of a high hill in the neighbourhood of London, for the benefit of the pure air of that elevated spot "I came out to this place," he says, in an affecting letter to his friend Swift, dated October 4, "so reduced by dropsy and an asthma, that I could neither sleep, breathe, eat, nor move I most earnestly desired and begged of God that he would take me" His attachment to Swift is strongly and tenderly manifested at the conclusion of this letter "I am afraid, my dear friend, we shall never see one another more in this world I shall to the last moment preserve my love and esteem for you, being well assured you will never leave the paths of virtue and honour, for all that is in this world is not worth the least deviation from that way" In the same strain of earnest friendship he had a little while previously addressed a letter to Pope "As for you, my good friend, I think, since our first acquaintance, there have not been any of those little suspicions or jealousies that often affect the sincerest friendships, I am sure not on my side I must be so sincere as to own, that though I could not help valuing you for those talents which the world prizes, yet they were not the foundation of my friendship, they were quite of another sort, nor shall I at present offend you by enumerating them, and I make it my last request that you will continue that noble disdain and abhorrence of vice which you seem naturally endued with; but still with a regard to your own safety, and study more to reform than chastise, though the one cannot be effected without the other A recovery in my case, and at my age, is impossible, the kindest wish of my friends is euthanasia [meaning a happy and easy death] Living or dying I shall always be yours"

Finding no relief from the change of air, Arbuthnot left Hampstead, and returned to his house in London, situated in Cork Street, Burlington-gardens, where he died, on the 27th February, 1735 His only surviving son, George, filled the lucrative post of secondary in the Exchequer-office, under Lord Masham, and was one of the executors of Pope He died 8th September 1779, aged 76 He also left two daughters, one named Anne, who both died unmarried The subjoined portrait of Dr Arbuthnot is taken from an engraving from a scarce print formerly in the collection of Sir William Musgrave, Bart

Among Arbuthnot's more humorous pieces, besides the 'History of John Bull' already mentioned, 'A Treatise concerning the Altercations or Scoldings of the Ancients,' and 'The Art of Political Lying,' are the most celebrated He did not excel in poetry, and seldom attempted it In Dodsley's Collection there is a didactic poem written by him, remarkable for its philosophical sentiment, with the title of 'Know Thyself!' His well known epitaph on Colonel Chartres, a noted usurer of the time, beginning "Here continues to rot," &c is a masterly specimen of his powers of satire He was also skilled in music, and Sir John Hawkins mentions an anthem and a burlesque song of his composition [Hist of Music, vol v p 126] In 1751 two 12mo volumes were published, entitled 'The Miscellaneous Works of the late Dr Arbuthnot,' containing some of his genuine productions, but the greater portion of the contents were declared by his son to be spurious

By his brother wits Dr Arbuthnot was held in high estimation Pope dedicated to him his 'Prologue to the Satires,' and Swift has more than once mentioned him with praise in his poems, for instance when he feelingly laments that he was

> "Far from his kind Arbuthnot's aid,
> Who knows his art, but not his trade'

"His good morals," Pope used to say, "were equal to any man's, but his wit and humour superior to all mankind" "He has more wit than we all have," said Swift to a lady, who desired his opinion of him, "and his humanity is equal to his wit" His character is thus given by Dr Johnson "Arbuthnot was a man of great comprehension, skilful in his profession, versed in the sciences, acquainted with ancient literature, and able to animate his mass of knowledge by a bright and active imagination, a scholar, with great brilliance of wit, a wit, who, in the crowd of life, retained and discovered a noble ardour of religious zeal, a man estimable for his learning, amiable for his life, and venerable for his piety" He was distinguished in an eminent degree for genuine benevolence and goodness, while his warmth of heart and cheerfulness of temper rendered him much beloved by his family and friends, towards whom he displayed the most constant affection and attachment Notwithstanding his powers of satire, all his contemporaries seem to have united in his praise "His very sarcasms," says Lord Orrery, "are the satirical sarcasms of good nature, they are like slaps on the face given in jest, the effects of which will raise a blush, but no blackness will appear after the blows He laughs as jovially as an attendant upon Bacchus, but continues as sober and considerate as a disciple of Socrates He is seldom serious, except in his attacks upon vice, and there his spirit rises with a manly strength, and a noble indignation No man exceeded him in the moral duties of life, a merit still more to his honour, as the united powers of wit and genius are seldom submissive enough to confine themselves within the limitations of morality" In the Biographia Britannica Arbuthnot is said, but at what particular period we are not informed, to have been for some time steward to the corporation of the Sons of the Clergy He was in the habit of writing essays on the current events of the day in a great folio paper book, which used to lie in his parlour, and such was his good nature and indulgence to his children, that he suffered them to tear out his manuscript at one end for their kites, while he was writing them at the other

No correct list of his productions has ever been given The following is as near as can be ascertained

ARGYLE, duke of, a title belonging to the ancient family of Campbell of Lochawe [See CAMPBELL, surname of] The name of Argyle is derived from two Gaelic words, Earra Ghaidheal, "the country of the western Gael," or, according to Skene, from Oirirgael, as the ancient district of Argyle (which comprehended also Lochaber and Wester Ross) was called by the Highlanders. By the historians the whole of this extensive district is included under the term of Ergadia [History of the Highlanders vol ii p 33] In the middle ages the Macdougalls of Lorn held sway over Argyle and Mull, while the Macdonalds, lords of the Isles, were supreme in Islay, Kintyre, and the Southern Islands The power of the Macdonalds was broken by Robert the Bruce, and their estates bestowed on the Campbells, who originally belonged to the ancient earldom of Garmoran, which comprehended Moydert Arasaig, Morar, and Knoydert Argyle was erected into an earldom in 1457, and into a dukedom in 1701

ARGYLE, earl, marquis, and duke of, see CAMPBELL, Archibald, and John

ARMSTRONG, the name of a famous border family, which with its various branches, chiefly inhabited Liddesdale According to tradition, the original surname was Fairbairn and belonged to the armour-bearer of an ancient king of Scotland, who, having his horse killed under him in battle, was straightway remounted by Fairbairn on his own horse For this timely assistance, the king amply rewarded him with lands on the borders, and in allusion to the manner in which so important a service was performed, Fairbairn having taken the king by the thigh, and set him at once on the saddle, his royal master gave him the name of ARMSTRONG, and assigned him for crest, "an armed hand and arm, in the hand a leg and foot in armour, couped at the thigh, all proper" Amongst the clans on the Scottish side of the border, the Armstrongs were formerly one of the most numerous They possessed the greater part of Liddesdale, which forms the southern district of Roxburghshire and of the debateable land All along the banks of the Liddel, the ruins of their ancient fortresses may still be traced The habitual depredations of this border-race had rendered them so active and daring, and at the same time so cautious and circumspect, that they seldom failed either in their attacks or in securing their prey Even when assailed by superior numbers, they baffled every assault by abandoning their dwellings, and retiring with their families into thick woods and deep morasses, accessible by paths only known to themselves One of their most noted places of refuge was the Tarras-moss, a frightful and desolate marsh, so deep that two spears tied together could not reach the bottom Although several of the Scottish monarchs had attempted to break the chain which united these powerful and turbulent chieftains, none ever had greater occasion to lower their power, and lessen their influence, than James the Fifth The hostile and turbulent spirit of the Armstrongs, however, was never entirely broken or suppressed, until the reign of James the Sixth, when their leaders were brought to the scaffold, their strongholds razed to the ground, and their estates forfeited and transferred to strangers, so that throughout the extensive districts formerly possessed by this once powerful and ancient clan, there is scarcely left, at this day

a single landholder of the name Their descendants have been long scattered, some of them having settled in England, and others in Ireland The most celebrated of these border chiefs was 'Johnie Armstrang' of Gilnockie, who lived in the early part of the sixteenth century, and is the hero of one of our best historical ballads A notice of him follows. 'Jock o' the Syde,' the hero of another ballad, was also an Armstrong, and a noted moss-trooper in the reign of Mary, queen of Scots The site of his residence, the Syde, is pointed out on a heathy upland, about two miles to the west of New Castletown, in Liddesdale, while the ruins of Mangerton Tower, the seat of his maternal uncle, are still visible, on the haugh below Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, in a poetical complaint which he wrote "against the Thevis of Liddisdaill," thus speaks of this famous border reaver

> "He is weel kenned Johne of the Syde,
> A greater thief did never ryde,
> He never tyres,
> For to break byres,
> Ower muirs and myres
> Ower gude and guvde

A lineal descendant of Johnie Armstrong, in the reign of Charles the First, kidnapped the person of Lord Durie, the president of the Court of Session, and kept him upwards of three months in secret confinement in an old castle in Annandale, called Graham's tower The motive for this extraordinary and daring stratagem was to promote the interests of Lord Traquair, who had a lawsuit of importance before the court, in which there was reason to believe that the judgment would be unfavourable and decided by the casting vote of the president [See Gibson, Sir Alexander, Lord Durie] Near Penton Linns, a romantic spot on the Liddel, was another border stronghold, called Harelaw tower, once the residence of Hector Armstrong, who betrayed his guest, the earl of Northumberland, to the regent Murray

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, a celebrated border chief of the early part of the sixteenth century, was a native of the parish of Canonbie, in the county of Dumfries, and the brother of Christopher Armstrong, laird of Mangerton, chief of the clan or sept of the Armstrongs His stronghold was Gilnockie Tower, now a roofless ruin, situated a few miles from Langholm, at a place called the Hollows, on the banks of the river Esk The terror of his name was spread far and wide, and at the head of a band of brave and faithful followers, he levied black mail, or protection money, for many miles within the English border All who refused were sure of being plundered and harassed to the utmost The marauding system on the borders had, during the long minority of King James V, been carried to a formidable extent, especially under the connivance of the earl of Angus, the warden of the marches, who had bound the border chiefs to his interests by those feudal confederacies, named 'bands of manrent,' which compelled the parties to defend each other against the authority of the law Having resolved to suppress the foraying chieftains, the king raised a powerful army chiefly composed of horsemen, "to danton the thieves" of Teviotdale, Annandale, Liddesdale, and other parts of the country, and about the beginning of June 1529, he set out, at the head of eight thousand men, on an expedition through the border districts To prevent the mosstroopers and their chiefs from taking alarm, he ordered all the gentlemen of the borders to bring with them their best dogs, as if his only purpose was to hunt the deer The leaders thus thrown off their guard, were not apprehensive of any danger, and to insure their destruction the more readily, the principal border nobles who were known to be their protectors and secret encouragers, namely the earl of Bothwell, lord of Teviotdale, Lords Home and Maxwell, Scott of Buccleuch, Ker of Fairnihurst, with the lairds of Johnstone, Polwarth, Dolphington, and other powerful chiefs, were seized and imprisoned in separate fortresses in different parts of the kingdom This being done, the king, accompanied by some of the borderers who had secured their pardon, marched rapidly through Ettrick Forest and Ewesdale, and seized Piers Cockburn of Henderland and Adam Scott of Tushielaw, commonly called the king of the border, and ordered both to be hanged before the gates of their own castles So little did they expect the fate that awaited them that, it is recorded, when James approached the castle of Cockburn of Henderland, the latter was in the act of providing a great entertainment to welcome him Armstrong, on his part, came to meet the king at a place about ten miles from Hawick called Carlinrigg chapel, at the head of thirty-six attendants, his usual retinue, he and his followers arrayed in all the pomp of border chivalry As the ballad says,

> The Elliots and Armstrongs did convene,
> They were a gallant companie —
> "We'll ride and meet our lawful king,
> And bring him safe to Gilnockie
> Make kinnen and capon ready then,
> And venison in great plentie,
> We'll welcome here our noble king;
> I hope he'll dine at Gilnockie!"

They ran their horse on the Langholm holm,
And brak their spears wi' mickle main,
The ladies lookit frae their loft windows —
"God bring our men weel hame again!"

We are told by Pitscottie that Armstrong was the most redoubted chieftain that had been for a long time on the borders of Scotland or England He always rode with twenty-four able gentlemen, well horsed, and from the borders to Newcastle every Englishman, of whatever state, paid him tribute Armstrong is said to have incautiously made this display, by the crafty advice of some of the courtiers, who knew that it would only the more exasperate the king against him, and the effect was precisely so, for James, seeing this bold border chief so gallantly equipped, on his approach, fiercely ordered the tyrant, as he styled Armstrong, to be removed out of his sight and instantly executed, exclaiming, "What wants that knave that a king should have?"

There hang nine targats at Johnie's hat,
And ilk ane worth three hundred pound, —
"What wants that knave that a king should have,
But the sword of honour and the croun?"

Armstrong saw at once the snare into which he had fallen, and made every effort to preserve his life He offered, if James would pardon him, to maintain at his own expense, forty men, ready at a moment's notice, to serve the king, and engaged never to injure any Scottish subject

"Grant me my life my liege, my king,
And a bonnie gift I'll gie to thee, —
Full four-and-twenty milk white steeds,
Were a' foaled in ae year to me

I'll gie thee a' thae milk white steeds,
That prance and nicher at a speir,
And as muckle gude English gold
As four o' their braid backs can bear"

He further undertook to produce to his majesty, within a certain day, any man in England, of whatever degree, duke, earl, or baron, either alive or dead But James was inexorable

"Away, away, thou traitor strang!
Out o' my sight sune may'st thou be!
I grantit never a traitor's life,
And now I'll not begin wi' thee!"

Seeing his death resolved upon Armstrong haughtily exclaimed, "It is folly to ask grace at a graceless face, but had I guessed you would have used me thus, I would have kept the Border-side, in despite of the king of England and you both; for I well know that King Henry would give the weight of my best horse in gold to know that I am sentenced to die this day"

'To seik het water aneath cauld ice
Surely it is a great follie!—
I have asked grace at a graceless face,
But there is nane for my men and me

But had I kenn'd ere I-cam frae hame
How thou unkind wadst been to me
I wad hae keepid the border syde
In spite of all thy force and thee

Wist England's king that I was ta'en O then a blythe man he wad be!
For anes I slew his sister's son,
And on his breast bane brak a tree"

He and all his followers, some accounts make them forty-eight, were hanged on the trees of a little grove at Carlinrigg chapel, two miles north of Moss Paul, on the road between Hawick and Langholm, and tradition still points out their graves in the solitary churchyard of the place He left a son Christopher who succeeded as laird of Gilnockie On the borders Armstrong was long missed and mourned as a brave warrior, and a stout defender of his country against England It is said by Buchanan that James executed Armstrong and his retinue, in direct violation of his solemn promise of safety We are told that this bold chief never molested any of his own countrymen, and it appears from his own statement that his plunderings were chiefly committed on the English, yet the Armstrongs are accused of having, in the course of a few years, destroyed not less than fifty-two parish churches in Scotland, and they openly boasted that their chieftain, Johnny Armstrong, would be subject neither to James nor to Henry, but would continue his excesses in defiance of both The fate of this renowned border leader has been commemorated in many of the rude ballads of the border districts The celebrated ballad of 'Johnie Armstrang,' some of the verses of which have been quoted, was first published by Allan Ramsay, in his 'Evergreen,' in

1724, having been copied, as he tells us, by himself from the mouth of a gentleman of the name of Armstrong, who was the sixth generation from the renowned borderer The tower of the Hollows, or Holehouse, once the residence of this famous border chieftain, was a place of considerable strength in its day, its ruins are now used as a cowhouse to a neighbouring farmer The younger son of Christopher Armstrong of Mangerton, the brother of this Armstrong of Gilnockie, went to Ireland some years after the death of Queen Elizabeth, and settling in county Fermanagh, became the founder of a numerous family, whose descendants now possess extensive estates in Fermanagh, King's county and Wicklow, and one of whom was created a baronet of Great Britain in 1841

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, M D , poet and miscellaneous writer, was born about 1709 at Castleton, a parish forming the southern extremity of Roxburghshire, of which his father and afterwards his brother were ministers In history and poetry, and very frequently still in conversation, its name is Liddesdale, from the river Liddel which runs through it from east to west Dr Armstrong has sung the beauties of his native vale, in his highly-finished poem on 'The Art of Preserving Health,' Book III

> ——————"Such the stream,
> On whose Arcadian banks I first drew in > Liddal, till now – except in Doric lays,
> Tuned to her murmurs by her love-sick swains—
> Unknown in song, though not a purer stream > Through meads more flowery,—more romantic groves, > Rolls toward the westward main Hail, sacred flood!
> May still thy hospitable swains be blest
> In rural innocence, thy mountains still > Teem with the fleecy race, thy tuneful woods
> For ever flourish, and thy vales look gay,
> With painted meadows, and the golden grain!"

After receiving the rudiments of his education at home, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, where he distinguished himself before his twentieth year, by gaining a prize medal for a prose composition, prescribed by a literary society in that city, and by other promising marks of genius during his studies Having chosen the medical profession, he took his degree as physician February 4, 1732 His inaugural dissertation, De Tabe Purulenta, gained him some reputation, as being superior to the general run of such essays Soon after he went to London, where he commenced practice as a physician In 1735 he published anonymously 'An Essay for abridging the study of Physic,' being a humorous attack on quacks and quackery, in the style of Lucian This work gained him credit as a wit, but did not advance his practice as a physician In 1737 he published a work on the venereal disease This was followed by 'The Economy of Love,' for which poem he received fifty pounds from Andrew Millar, the bookseller, but which greatly injured his reputation In a subsequent edition, published in 1768, he carefully expunged many of the youthful luxuriances with which the first abounded In 1744 appeared his principal work, entitled 'The Art of Preserving Health,' in blank verse, one of the best didactic poems in the language This valuable work established at once his reputation both as a physician and a poet In 1746 he was appointed one of the physicians to the hospital for sick and lame soldiers In 1751 he published his poem on Benevolence, and in 1753 his Epistle on Taste, addressed to a Young Critic In 1758 he produced his prose 'Sketches or Essays on various subjects, by Lancelot Temple, Esq ,' in two parts, which evinced considerable humour and knowledge of the world, and in which he is said to have been assisted by Mr Wilkes, whose acquaintance he had made soon after his first arrival in London In 1760 he received the appointment of physician to the army, then in Germany, where, in 1761, he wrote 'Day, a Poem, an Epistle to John Wilkes, Esq ,' his friendship with whom was not of long continuance, the subject of politics having divided them, Wilkes's continued attacks upon Scotland being the cause of their quarrel Having in that epistle hazarded a reflection on Churchill, the satirist retorted severely in his poem of 'The Journey'

At the peace of Paris in 1763 Armstrong returned to London, and resigning his connection with the army, resumed his practice, but not with his former success In 1770 he published a Collection of his Miscellanies, containing amongst others, the Universal Almanack, a new prose piece, and the Forced Marriage, a tragedy, which had been refused by Garrick In 1771 he made the tour of France and Italy, in company with the celebrated artist Fuseli, who survived him for half a century In his journey he met his friend Dr Smollett, to whom he was much attached On his return he published an account of it under the name of 'A short Ramble, by Lancelot Temple'

Wilkes, his former friend, joined Churchill in assailing Dr Armstrong, having published a scurrilous attack upon him in the Public Advertiser, contained in a series of three letters, commencing with one signed Dies, in which, to cloak his purpose, Wilkes reflected on himself That letter appeared March 23, 1773, and was followed by one signed Truth, March 24, and by another signed Nox, April 1 In the Gentleman's Magazine for January 1792, the following substance of a conversation which took place between Armstrong and Wilkes on the appearance of these letters, is inserted It was taken down at the time by Mr Wilkes, and is quite characteristic of both parties

On Wednesday, April 7, 1773, Dr Armstrong called on Mr Wilkes in Prince's Court, about two in the afternoon, and without the least ceremony or compliment, began—

Dr Armstrong Did you, Sir, write the letters in the Public Advertiser?

Mr Wilkes What letters do you mean, Doctor? There are many letters almost every day in the Public Advertiser

Dr A Sir, I mean the three letters about me, and Day, Day, Sir

Mr W You may ask the printer, Mr Woodfall He has my orders to name me, whenever he thinks it proper, as the author of every thing I write in his paper

Dr A I believe you wrote all those letters

Mr W What all three, Doctor? I am very roughly treated in one of them, in the first signed Dies

Dr A I believe you wrote that on purpose to begin the controversy I am almost sure of it

Mr W I hope you are more truly informed in other things I know better than to abuse myself in that manner, and I pity the author of such wretched stuff

Dr A Did you write the other letters, Sir?

Mr W The proper person to inquire of, is Mr Woodfall I will not answer interrogatories My time would pass in a strange manner if I was to answer every question which any gentleman chose to put to me about anonymous letters

Dr A Whoever has abused me, Sir, is a villain, and your endeavours, Sir, to set Scotland and England together are very bad

Mr W The Scots have done that thoroughly, Doctor, by their conduct here, particularly by their own nationality, and the outrages of Lord Bute to so many English families Whenever you think proper to call upon me in particular as a gentleman, you will find me most ready to answer the call

Dr A D——n Lord Bute! It had been better for Scotland he had never been born He has done us infinite mischief

Mr W And us, too, but I suppose we are not met for a dish of politics?

Dr A No, but I wish there had been no Union I am sure England is the gainer by it

Mr W I will not make an essay on the advantages and disadvantages of the Union

Dr A I hate politics, but I have been ill used by you, Mr Wilkes, on the occasion

Mr W On the contrary, Doctor, I was the injured friend

Dr A I thought you for many years the most amiable friend in the world, and loved your company the most, but you distinguished yourself by grossly abusing my countrymen in the North Briton—although I never read much of that paper

Mr W You passed your time, I am satisfied, much better Who told you, Doctor, what particular numbers I wrote? It is droll, but the bitterest of those papers, which was attributed to me, was a description of Scotland, first printed in the last century, on Charles I's return from thence in 1633 Were you ever, Doctor, personally attacked by me? Were you not, although a Scotsman, at the very time of the North Britons, complimented by me, in conjunction with Churchill, in the best thing I wrote, the mock 'Dedication to Mortimer'

Dr A To be praised along with such a writer, I think an abuse

Mr W The world thinks far otherwise of that wonderful genius, Churchill, but you, Doctor, have sacrificed private friendship at the altar of politics After many years' mutual intercourse of good offices, you broke every tie of friendship with me on no pretence but a suspicion, for you did not ask for proof, of my having abused your country, that country I have for years together heard you inveigh against, in the bitterest terms, for nastiness and nationality

Dr A I only did it in joke, Sir, you did it with bitterness, but it was my country

Mr W No man has abused England so much as Shakspeare, or France so much as Voltaire, yet they remain the favourites of two great nations, conscious of their own superiority Were you, Doctor, attacked by me in any one instance? Was not the most friendly correspondence carried on with you the whole time, till you broke it off by a letter, in 1763, in which you declared to me, that you could not with honour associate with one who had distinguished himself by abusing your country, and that you remained with all due sincerity? I remember that was the strange phrase.

Dr A You never answered that letter, Sir

Mr W What answer could I give, Doctor? You had put a period to the intercourse between us I still continued to our common friends to speak of you in terms of respect, while you were grossly abusing me You said to Boswell, Millar, and others, "I hope there is a hell, that Wilkes may lie in it"

Dr A In a passion I might say so People do not often speak their minds in a passion

Mr W I thought they generally did, Doctor

Dr A I was thoroughly provoked, although I still acknowledge my great pecuniary obligations to you—although, I dare say, I could have got the money elsewhere

Mr W I was always happy to render you every service in my power, and I little imagined a liberal mind, like yours, could have been worked up by designing men to write me such a letter in answer to an affectionate one I sent you, on the prospect of your return

Dr A I was happier with you than any man in the world for a great many years, and complimented you not a little in the Day, and you did not write to me for a year and a half after that

Mr W Your memory does not serve you faithfully, Doctor In three or four months at farthest, you had two or three letters from me together, on your return to the head-quarters of the army I am abused in Dies for that publication, and the manner, both of which you approved

Dr A I did so

Mr W I was abused at first, I am told, in the manuscript of Dies for having sold the copy, and put the money in my pocket, but that charge was suppressed in the printed letter

Dr A I know nothing of that, and will do you justice

Mr W Will you call upon Mr D——, our common friend, your countryman, and ask him what he thinks of your conduct to me, if it has not been wholly unjustifiable?

Dr A Have I your leave to ask Mr Woodfall in your name about the letters?

Mr W I have already told you, Doctor, what directions he has from me Take four-and-twenty hours to consider what you have to do, and let me know the result

Dr A I am sorry to have taken up so much of your time, Sir

Mr W It stands in no need of an apology, Doctor I am glad to see you Good morrow

N B —These minutes were taken down the same afternoon, and sent to a friend

Dr Armstrong's last publication was his 'Medical Essays,' which appeared in 1773 In this he complains of the little attention that had been paid to him, while so many other physicians of inferior abilities had risen to fame and fortune, forgetting that his own indolence and levity, and not the fickleness or want of discernment of the public, occasioned the neglect A large portion of his time was spent at Slaughter's coffee-house, in St Martin's lane, where he took his meals, and where messages for him were ordinarily directed to be addressed He died on 7th September, 1779, and left, it is said, three thousand pounds, which his prudence and good management had enabled him to collect He left his fortune by his will to his three nieces, the daughters of his brother Dr George Armstrong, who, after having been an apothecary for several years at Hampstead, at length obtained a diploma constituting him doctor in medicine Settling in London, he was appointed physician to a dispensary for the benefit of poor infants, opened at a house taken for him by the subscribers in Soho square To aid the design, he published a small treatise on the diseases of children, in which he was supposed to have been assisted by his brother John The dispensary, however, did not succeed, and the doctor died some years after in obscurity Armstrong possessed a glowing imagination and a lively fancy, chastened, at times, by the guidance of a sound judgment, and a well regulated taste Of his 'Art of Preserving Health,' Dr Aikin, in his Critical Essay prefixed to Cadell and Davis' edition of his works published in 1796, says, "The manner of Armstrong is distinguished by its simplicity, by a free use of words which owe their strength to their plainness, by the rejection of ambitious ornaments, and a near approach to common phraseology His sentences are generally short and easy his sense clear and obvious The full extent of his conceptions is taken in at the first glance, and there are no lofty mysteries to be unravelled by repeated perusal What keeps his language from being altogether prosaic, is the vigour of his sentiments He thinks boldly, feels strongly, and therefore expresses himself poetically Where the subject sinks, his style sinks with it, but he has for the most part excluded topics incapable either of vivid description or of the oratory of sentiment He had from nature a musical ear, whence his lines are never harsh, and are usually melodious, though apparently without much study to render them smooth Perhaps he has not been careful enough to avoid the monotony of making several successive lines close with a rest or pause in the sense On the whole, it may not be too much to assert, that no writer in blank verse can be found more free from stiffness and affectation, more energetic without harshness, and more dignified without formality" In Thomson's 'Castle of Indolence,' to which he contributed four stanzas, at the conclusion of the first part, describing the diseases incidental to sloth, he is depicted as the shy and splenetic personage who "quite detested talk" The following is the stanza

"With him was sometimes joined in silent walk, (Profoundly silent, for they never spoke)
One shyer still, who quite detested talk,
Oft stung by spleen, at once away he broke,
To groves of pine and broad o'ershadowing oak,
There, inly thrilled, he wandered all alone,
And on himself his pensive fury wroke
Nor never uttered word, save, when first shone
The glittering star of eve—'Thank heaven! the day is done!'"

A portrait of Dr Armstrong is here given, taken from an engraving by Fisher from a painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Leith in 1771, and educated at the college of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M A During his attendance at the university he published a volume of 'Juvenile Poems,' some of which possessed considerable merit The same volume contained an 'Essay on the Means of Punishing and Preventing Crimes' For this essay he had, in January 1789, a few months before, received the gold prize medal, given by the Edinburgh Pantheon Society for the best specimen of prose composition Some time previous to this he had entered himself at the divinity hall, and had gone through the greater part of the exercises necessary to qualify him to become a preacher in the Church of Scotland In 1790 he repaired to London, and supported himself by writing for the daily papers In 1791 he published a collection of 'Sonnets from Shakspeare' He also preached occasionally, and was rising in reputation, when he was cut off, in 1797, in the 26th year of his age

ARNOT, a surname derived from the lands of Arnot in the county of Fife In Sibbald's List of the heritors of Fifeshire, published in 1710, we find the names, as landholders of that county, of Arnot of that ilk, Arnot of Woodmiln, Arnot of Balkaithlie, Arnot of Balcormo, Arnot of Chapel-Kettle, Arnot of Freeland, Arnot of Lumwhat, and Arnot of Berryhole Sir John Arnot of Berwick, of the family of Arnot, was provost of Edinburgh, and treasurer depute to King James the Sixth The lands of Chapel, in the parish of Kettle, have long belonged to a family of the name of Arnot Upon the last day of December 1558, James, commendator of the priory of St Andrews, disponed the church lands called Chapel-Kettle to John Arnot and his heirs, declaring that he and his progenitors had been possessors of these lands past the memory of man [Sibbald's History of Fife, p 385]

Sir Michael Arnot of Arnot, in the county of Perth, the descendant of a very ancient Fifeshire family, designated of that ilk so early as the 12th century, was created a baronet by Charles the First, 27th July 1629 His son and heir, Sir David Arnot, second baronet, was member of the Scots parliament for Kinross, in 1689 He was the father of Sir John Arnot, the third baronet, who, having devoted himself early to a military life, was appointed, in 1727, adjutant-general of Scotland In 1735 he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and in 1739 to that of major-general He died June 4, 1750 a lieut.-general His eldest son, Sir John Arnot, 4th bart, was succeeded by his son, Sir William Arnot, 5th bart, lieut.-colonel of the Queen's regiment of dragoon guards, who died in 1782, leaving a son, Sir William Arnot 6th and last baronet —[Burke's Extinct and Dormant Baronetages] Title dormant See SUPPLEMENT

In Perthshire there was a family of the name of Arnot of Berchill, who for a long time were provosts of Perth

ARNOT, HUGO, an antiquarian writer and local historian, was the son of a merchant and shipowner in Leith, where he was born on the 8th December 1749 His own name was Pollock, but on the death of his mother, December 5, 1773, at her house in Fifeshire, he changed it to Arnot, on obtaining, through her right, the estate of Balcormo in Fife He was educated for the law, and in December 1772 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, under the name of 'Hugo Arnot, Esq of Balcormo' Having in his fifteenth year caught a severe cold, he was ever after afflicted with painful asthma, which reduced him almost to a skeleton, and which any exertion always aggravated In 1776 he published at London in 12mo, 'An Essay on Nothing,' a discourse delivered in the Edinburgh Speculative Society, which was favourably received Of that society Mr Arnot was admitted a member January 3, 1770, and, besides the Essay on Nothing, he delivered others on the following subjects The Comparative Happiness of the Polished and Barbarous State, Whether a man would be most happy in retiring from or continuing in business after making a competent fortune, Foundation of the Inequality among Mankind, Literary Property, Nature and end of Punishments, and the Necessity of Mankind living in Society, and the advantages of it, which was his valedictory essay [Hist of Speculative Society, p 99] In 1779 appeared his 'History of Edinburgh,' one vol 4to, a work of much research He was prevented, however, from deriving much pecuniary benefit from it, by a piratical edition having been printed at Dublin, and sent over to Edinburgh and sold at a cheap rate Taking a strong interest in local matters, he afterwards published various pamphlets and essays of a temporary nature, and his exertions in promoting the improvements then in progress in Edinburgh, were rewarded by the freedom of the city being conferred upon him by the magistrates From his great local influence he is said to have been able to protract the erection of the South Bridge of Edinburgh for ten years, by his opposition to the proposed tax upon carts to defray the expense He was also instrumental in preventing the formation of the spacious road called Leith Walk for some years, on account of the putting on a toll, which, however, was done, and not removed till about 1837 In 1785 came out his 'Collection of celebrated Criminal Trials in Scotland, from 1536 to 1784, with Historical and Critical Remarks,' one vol 4to, published by subscription In December 1784 he issued an advertisement of the work, with the following notice appended to it, from which it would appear that he and the Edinburgh booksellers were not on the best of terms "Mr Arnot printed, a few days ago, a prospectus of the work that the public might form some idea of its nature, and he sent it to be hung up in the principal booksellers in town, but they have thought proper to refuse, in a body, to allow the prospectus and subscription papers to hang in their shops The prospectus will, therefore, be seen at the Royal Exchange Coffee house, Exchange Coffee house, Princes street Coffee house, and Messrs Corri and Sutherland's Music shop, Edinburgh, and Gibb's Coffee house, Leith" The work is curious of its kind, but is not so full nor so valuable as Pitcairn's collection of Criminal Trials, a more recent publication Mr Arnot died on 20th November 1786, aged 37, and was interred in South Leith churchyard, in a piece of ground presented to him before his death by the magistrates of his native town For several weeks previous to his death he regularly visited his appointed burial-place, to observe the progress of some masons whom he had employed to wall it in, and frequently expressed a fear that he would die before they should have completed his work Mr Arnot was of great height, and extraordinary thinness The following is a full-length portrait of him as he appeared in the dress of his time taken by Kay He is represented giving alms to a beggar, a sly piece of satire on the part of the artist

His person altogether was so remarkable that it was the source of many jests and witticisms It is related that the Honourable Henry Erskine meeting him once while engaged eating a dried haddock or spelding, complimented him "on looking so like his meat!" Discussing with the same wit on the disposition of the Deity to pardon the sins of the flesh, and on Hugo expressing his hope of forgiveness, Erskine impromptued,—

"I've searched the whole Scriptures, and texts I find none Extending God's mercy to skin and to bone"

He himself was reputed to be a humorist in his way One day, when suffering severely from his complaint, he was annoyed by the bawling of a man selling sand on the street "The rascal," said the unhappy asthmatic, "he spends as much breath in a minute as would serve me for a month!" In his professional character he was no less singular He would not undertake a case, unless thoroughly convinced of its justice Once when a cause was offered him, of the merits of which he had a very bad opinion, he asked the person employing him, "Pray, Sir, what do you suppose me to be?" "Why," answered the client, "I understand you to be a lawyer!" "I thought," said Arnot, sternly, "you took me for a scoundrel!" and dismissed the litigant with indignation Various stories are told of his intrepidity of mind in early life One of these was his riding to the end of the pier of Leith on a spirited horse, on a stormy day, when the waves were dashing over the pier so furiously as to impress every onlooker with the belief that he could not fail to be swept into the sea Leith pier, it must be remarked, was then neither so extended nor so well bulwarked as it is now, and consequently this feat was one of great danger Another was his accepting the challenge of an anonymous enemy who took offence at one of his political pamphlets, and wrote to him to meet him in the King's Park at a particular time and place, to answer for his statements Mr Arnot repaired to the spot at the appointed hour, and waited for some time, but no antagonist came forward His purpose in going might not have been to expose his person in a duel, but to ascertain who was his unknown challenger Though recorded as a proof of his intrepidity, we do not see in this occurrence any striking mark of moral courage A sensible man would have paid no attention to such a letter, which appears to have been intended merely as a hoax Of a nervous and irritable disposition, he was guilty of many eccentricities which rendered him one of the most remarkable local characters of his time Among other anecdotes the following is related of him, which does not say much for his urbanity or neighbourly feeling He was in the habit of ringing his bell with a violence which much annoyed an old maiden lady, in a weak state of health, who resided on the floor above him Of this annov-

ance she frequently complained, but without effect At length, wearied with her constant messages, he gave her to understand that he should cease to use it in future, but in the belief that her importunities proceeded from mere querulousness, instead of ringing the bell as usual, he fired off a loaded pistol, whenever he desired the attendance of his servant, to the great alarm of the invalid upstairs, who now as earnestly besought the restitution of the bell, as she had before requested its discontinuance He left eight children His grandson, Dr David Boswell Reid, the author of 'Elements of Chemistry,' acquired a high character as teacher of practical chemistry in the university of Edinburgh Hugo Arnot figures as a principal personage in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, in which some amusing anecdotes of his peculiarities may be found

ARRAN, earl of, one of the secondary titles of the duke of Hamilton, [see HAMILTON, duke of,] derived from the island of that name in the frith of Clyde In Gaelic it is pronounced Arrunn, that is, 'the island of sharp pinnacles,' from, according to Dr Macleod, ir, 'a land' or 'country,' and ruinn, 'sharp points' an etymology far more satisfactory than that of Ar-fhin, 'the land, or 'the field of Fion,' (Imgall), or from Aran, 'bread,' as denoting extraordinary fertility, which is by no means a characteristic of this island The title of earl of Arran was first conferred on Sir Thomas Boyd, eldest son of Robert lord Boyd, [see KILMARNOCK earl of,] in April 1467 on his marriage with the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of James the Second He was attainted and forfeited in 1469, and died soon after The princess married, a second time, in 1474, James first lord Hamilton, to whom she had been betrothed in 1454, and their son James was, in August 1503, created earl of Arran The title was afterwards bestowed on Captain James Stewart of Bothwellmuir, the second son of Andrew, lord Ochiltree, [see OCHILTREE, lord,] whose mother Lady Margaret Hamilton, was the only child of James first earl of Arran, by his first wife Beatrice Drummond He entered the army of the states of Holland, and served some years against the Spaniards On his return to Scotland in 1579 he obtained the favour of James the Sixth, who, a few days after his appearance at court, appointed him a gentleman of his bedchamber, a privy councillor, captain of his guard, and tutor to the third earl of Arran of the Hamilton family, who by a shameful abuse of law had been imprisoned by order of the regent Morton, and was afterwards cognosced as an idiot It was on the accusation of the king's new favourite, Capt Stewart, that the earl of Morton was tried, convicted, and beheaded, for being accessary to the death of Lord Darnley For five years he possessed the whole power of the government and in 1584 was appointed lord high chancellor and lieutenant of the kingdom In 1581 he obtained from the king a grant of the baronies of Hamilton and Kinneil and the other estates of the Hamilton family In October of the same year, under the pretence that he was the lawful heir of the family, and that the children of the third marriage of the first earl of Arran were illegitimate, he was created earl of Arran, which dignity he held along with the estates, until his disgrace in 1585, when they were restored to the true owner About the end of 1596, as he was riding homeward through Symington, near Douglas in Lanarkshire, he was unexpectedly attacked by Sir James Douglas of Parkhead, nephew of the regent Morton, who, in revenge for the death of his uncle, killed him on the spot His body was exposed to dogs and swine, and his head being cut off was carried on the point of a lance, in triumph through the country He married, 6th July 1581, Lady Elizabeth Stewart, eldest daughter of John, fourth earl of Athol, who had been twice previously married, and by her had Sir James Stewart of Killeith, Lord Ochiltree, [see OCHILTREE, Lord,] and another son

ARRAN, earl of, is also an Irish title, created in 1762, and possessed by a family of the name of Gore properly earl of the ARRAN Islands in Galway

ARTHUR, a surname derived from Art-ur, signifying the chief or great man, hence the renowned Welsh prince, King Arthur, whose achievements have formed the subject of so much romantic fiction, and whose name has been traditionally given to various places in Scotland, as well as in England and Wales "It cannot easily be discovered," says Stoddart, "why several mountains in Scotland take their name from the Welsh prince, Arthur, of whom no other traces remain in this country, but it appears that they have been traditionally considered as places of sovereignty Thus it is said that Ben Arthur (a lofty mountain-crag in the wilds of Glencroe, Argyleshire), being, at one period, the most elevated and conspicuous of the mountains in the domain of the Campbells, the heir to that chieftainship was obliged to seat himself on its loftiest peak, a task of some difficulty and danger, which, if he neglected, his lands went to the next relation sufficiently adventurous" Arthur's Seat in the immediate neighbourhood of Edinburgh is said to have taken its name from King Arthur having surveyed the country from its summit, previous to the eleventh battle which he fought against the Saxons, in the sixth century and which, according to Whittaker was decided on the castle-hill of Edinburgh Pinkerton says that the name arose from the tournaments held near it, as did Arthur's round-table at Stirling, Arthur being quite popular in the centuries of chivalry and romance, [Enquiry into the History of Scotland, vol i p 77 note], but there cannot be a question that the name of Arthur's Seat, as applied to the height immediately beside the palace of Holyrood the residence of Scotland's later kings, meant no more than the hill of the chief or sovereign of the whole country, without any reference at all to King Arthur of Welsh history The same may be said of all the other places in Scotland to which his name has been given, and of which Chalmers in his Caledonia [vol i p 244] has collected many notices Arthur's fountain in the parish of Crawford, Clydesdale, is referred to in a grant made in 1239 by David de Lindsey to the monks of Newbottle, of the lands of Brother-alwyn in that district, as being bounded on the west, "a fonte Arthuri usque ad summitatem montis" [Cart Newbottle, No 148] This, however, may only mean the fountain of the chief or great man of the district The Welsh poets assign a palace to Arthur among the northern Britons at Penryn Gyoncth, corresponding to Dumbarton castle, which, as appears from a parliamentary record of the reign of David the Second in 1367, was, long before, named Castrum Arthuri But this might mean only the castle or fort of the chief or sovereign The romantic castle of Stirling was certainly, during the middle ages, supposed to have been the festive scene of Arthur's

In Neilston parish, Renfrewshire, there are three places of the name of Arthur-lee The ancient monument of Arthur's Oven or 'Oon,' on the Carron, which was demolished many years ago, was known by that name as early as the reign of Alexander the Third, if not earlier Arthur's Seat near Edinburgh is not the only hill which bears the name Not far from the top of Loch Long, that separates Argyle and Dumbarton, there is a conical hill also called Arthur's Seat, which is likewise the name given to a rock, on the north side of the hill of Dunbarrow in the parish of Dunnichen, Forfarshire In the parish of Cupar-Angus, Perthshire, there is a standing stone called the Stone of Arthur, near it is a gentleman's seat called Arthur-stone, and not far from it is a farm named Arthur's fold At Meigle, in the same vicinity, some antique and curious monuments in the churchyard are associated by tradition with the name of the fabulous king Arthur's faithless queen Vanora, Guenevra, or Gincvra Arthur is, besides, the apparent founder of a numerous clan, whose antiquity is proverbial among the Highlanders

ARTHUR, ARCHIBALD, professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow, eldest son of Andrew Arthur, a farmer, was born at Abbot's-Inch, Renfrewshire September 6, 1744 He was taught Latin at the grammar school of Paisley, and studied for the ministry at Glasgow college, where, when yet a student, he lectured on church history for a whole session, during the absence of the professor, to the great satisfaction and improvement of the class In October 1767 he was licensed as a preacher of the Church of Scotland, and soon after became chaplain to the university of Glasgow, and assistant to the Rev Dr Craig, one of the clergymen of that city Becoming also librarian to the university, he compiled the catalogue of that library In 1780 he was appointed assistant and successor to the venerable Dr Reid, professor of moral philosophy, who died in 1796 Mr Arthur taught the class fifteen years as assistant, and only held the chair as professor for one session, as he died on 14th June 1797 In 1803, Professor Richardson, of the same university, published a part of Arthur's lectures, under the title of 'Discourses on Theological and Literary Subjects,' 8vo, with a sketch of his life and character

ASTON, lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, now extinct, possessed by a noble family of the same name, which originally belonged to the county of Stafford in England, the progenitor of which was Randal or Ranulph de Astona, who lived in the reign of Edward the First His descendant, Sir Edward Aston of Tixall, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, possessed estates of the value of ten thousand a-year, in the counties of Stafford, Derby, Leicester, and Warwick He married Anne, only daughter of Sir Thomas Lucy of Charlecot, and died in 1598 His eldest son, Sir Walter Aston, at the coronation of James the First of England, was honoured with the order of the Bath, and in 1611 he was created a baronet In 1622 he was employed to negociate a marriage between Charles, prince of Wales, afterwards Charles the First, and the Infanta of Spain, and, in requital for his services upon that occasion, he was elevated to the peerage 28th November 1627 as Lord Aston of Forfar He married Gertrude, only daughter of Sir Thomas Sadler of Standon, son of the celebrated Sir Ralph Sadler, and died in 1689 He supported Michael Drayton the poet for many years, and his seat of Tixall is noticed in his 'Polyolbion At his investiture as knight of the Bath in 1603, Drayton, who has dedicated several of his poems to this Lord Aston, acted as one of his esquires The title became extinct on 21st January 1845, on the death without issue of the Rev Walter Hutchinson-Aston, ninth baron Aston, a clergyman of the church of England, vicar of Pardshigg, Worcestershire, and of Tamworth, Warwickshire The motto of the family was "Numen et Patria Asto" The title does not appear on the Union Roll, but the eighth baron Aston, the father of the last lord, was recognised as a peer by George the Third

ATHOL, ATHOLL, or ATHOLE, earls of, an ancient title formerly possessed by the royal family of Scotland, subsequently in right of marriage by Thomas de Galloway and his son, and after him by David de Hastings, afterwards by the Strathbogie family, then after being held by a Campbell and a Douglas, it was conferred on a scion of the royal house of Stewart, and through a second creation in the house of Stewart it came latterly to be possessed by a branch of the noble family of Murray It is the name of a mountainous and romantic district in the north of Perthshire, which, from a remote period, has preserved its boundaries unaltered It was the original patrimony of the family which gave kings to Scotland from Duncan to Alexander the Third, and it is the earliest district in Scotland mentioned in history The name signifies 'pleasant land' and Blair of Athol, its principal valley, 'the field or vale of Athol "Its chief interest," says Skene, "arises from the strong presumption which exists that the family which gave a long line of kings to Scotland, from the eleventh to the fourteenth century took their origin from this district, to which they can be traced before the marriage of their ancestor with the daughter of Malcolm the Second raised them to the throne" [History of the Highlanders, vol ii p 127] When Thorfinn, the Norwegian earl of Orkney conquered the north of Scotland, in the early part of the eleventh century, the only portion of the territory of the Northern Picts which remained unsubdued was the district of Athol and part of Argyle The lord of the Isles had been slain in an unsuccessful attempt to preserve his insular dominions, and the king of the Scots, with the whole of his nobility, had also fallen in the short but bloody campaign which preceded the Norwegian conquest In their disastrous condition the Scots had recourse to Duncan, the son of Crinan, abbot of Dunkeld, by Beatrice, the daughter of Malcolm the Second, the last Scottish king Duncan came to the vacant throne in 1034, but after a reign of six years, he was slain in an attempt to recover the northern districts from the Norwegians, and his sons were driven out by Macbeth, who for a time ruled over the south whilst the Norwegians possessed the north of Scotland After the overthrow of Macbeth, 5th December, 1056, and the establishment of Malcolm Canmore on the throne, the Lowlands of Scotland were, according to the Saxon polity, divided into earldoms, all of which were granted to the different members of the royal family These earldoms consisted of the country inhabited by the Scots, with the addition of the district of Athol, and from this circumstance it has, not unreasonably, been presumed that Athol was the original possession of this royal race This is further confirmed by the designation which early Scottish historians apply to Crinan, the father of Duncan Besides being abbot of Dunkeld, he is styled by Fordun, "Abthanus de Dull ac Senescallus Insulanum" (Abthane of Dull and steward of the Isles) Pinkerton has denied that such a title as Abthane was ever known or heard of, but Mr Skene has most conclusively shown, not only that there was such a title as Abthane in Scotland, but that the very title of Abthane of Dull, which is the name of a district in Athol, existed until comparatively a late period [Skene's History of the Highlanders, vol ii part 2, chap 5] See ABTHANE, ante, p 16

By King Edgar, the whole of Athol, except Breadalbane, was erected into an earldom, and conferred upon his cousin Madach, the son of King Donald Bane Madach married a daughter of Haco, earl of Orkney He was a witness to the foundation charter of Alexander the First, of the monastery of Scone, in 1114, and he was himself afterwards a benefactor to the abbey On the death of Madach towards the end of the reign of David the First, the earldom of Athol was obtained by Malcolm the son of Duncan the eldest son of Malcolm Canmore, by Ingiborge, the widow of Thorfinn earl of Orkney, whose descendants were excluded from the throne by that king's younger sons The earldom was thus bestowed on Malcolm "either" Skene says, "because the exclusion of that family from the throne could not deprive them of the original property of the family, to which they were entitled to succeed, or as a compensation for the loss of the crown" [Hist of Highlanders, vol ii p 139] His son Malcolm, the third earl of Athol gave in pure alms to the monks of Scone the church of Logen Mabed, with four chapels thereunto belonging and to the abbey of Dunfermline the tithes of the church of Moulin He also made a donation to the priory of St Andrews of the patronage of the church of Dull His son Henry succeeded to the earldom and on his death, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, his granddaughters, by his eldest son who predeceased him, carried it into the families of Galloway and Hastings

The eldest of these granddaughters (erroneously stated by Douglas in his Peerage to have been the daughters of Earl Henry) married Alan de Lundin, Ostiarius Regis, who in her right became fifth earl of Athol, and who died without issue Her next sister, Isabel married Thomas de Galloway the brother of Alan lord of Galloway, and in her right became sixth earl of Athol He died in 1231 His son Patrick, seventh earl of Athol, was the youth who overthrew W Bisset at a tournament on the English borders and was murdered at Haddington in 1212 (see ante, life of Alexander II, p 75) Fernelith, the youngest of Earl Henry's granddaughters, succeeded her nephew, Earl Patrick, as countess of Athol She married David de Hastings, an Anglo-Norman, descended from the steward of William the Conqueror, and he, in her right, became the eighth earl He was one of the guarantees of the treaty of peace between Alexander the Second and Henry the Third in 1244 [See ante, p 77] In 1268 he accompanied other Scottish barons in an expedition to the Holy Land, and died at Tunis the following year His daughter Adda married John de Strathbogie, who in her right became ninth earl of Athol The grandfather of this John of Strathbogie, Duncan earl of Fife, had obtained the lands of Strathbogie, in Aberdeenshire, from King William the Lion He settled them on his third son, David, who assumed his name from these lands, and was the father of the eighth earl of Athol The son of the latter, David de Strathbogie, became the tenth earl of Athol, and was the father of John, eleventh earl, who was one of the chief associates of Robert the Bruce, and assisted at his coronation at Scone, 27th March, 1306 He fought on Bruce's side at Methven, and on his discomfiture accompanied him during his disastrous flight After the surrender of the castle of Kildrummy the same year, he was seized by the forces of Edward in attempting to escape by sea, and conducted to London Being condemned to death in Westminster Hall, 7th November 1306, he was executed the same day, on a gallows thirty feet higher than ordinary, in consequence of his royal descent

The earldom of Athol was then forfeited and bestowed on Ralph de Monthermer, styled earl of Gloucester, who, however, relinquished his title to it for 5,000 merks, in favour of David de Strathbogie son of the deceased earl This David, the twelfth earl, had from King Robert the Bruce, the office of high constable of Scotland, as appears from a charter of that monarch 26th February 1312, where he is so designated Two years after, however, he revolted against Bruce, whereupon his office of high constable was given to Gilbert de la Haye, and Athol's estates in Scotland were forfeited He married Joan, daughter of John Cumyn of Badenoch, killed by Bruce at Dumfries in 1306, with whom he got great estates in England He died in 1327 leaving a son, David who was styled thirteenth earl of Athol

Along with other forfeited Scottish barons this David accompanied Edward Baliol into Scotland in 1332 and had a considerable share in achieving the victory over the Scots at Dupplin, 12th August of that year He was now restored to his paternal inheritance and title In 1334 Edward Baliol bestowed on him the whole estates of the steward of Scotland, but the same year the earl of Moray, regent of Scotland, compelled him to surrender, when he swore allegiance to David the Second the lawful king Being in consequence denounced as a rebel by Edward the Third, he was fain, on the invasion of Scotland by that monarch in July 1335, to agree to a treaty of peace, and make his submission to Edward, on which he was again received into favour with the English king, and had the office of governor of Scotland conferred upon him under Baliol, when he acted very insolently and tyrannically towards all the adherents of the family of Bruce Having been appointed commander of the English forces in the north, with three thousand men he proceeded to lay siege to the castle of Kildrummy, the asylum of the royalists, but was surprised in the forest of Kilblane by the earl of March, Sir William Douglas of Liddesdale, and Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, at the head of eleven hundred men Athol's troops panic-struck, fled and dispersed, the earl, finding himself abandoned disdained quarter, and was slain 30th November, 1335, in the 28th year of his age He left a son, David, styled fourteenth earl of Athol, who was only three years of age at the time of his father's death He accompanied Edward the Black Prince into France in 1356, and was in the subsequent expeditions into Gascony He died 10th October 1375, leaving two daughters

When the Celtic earls of Athol became extinct, says Skene, and, in consequence, the subordinate clans in the district of Athol assumed independence, the principal part of that district was in the possession of the clan Donnachie or the Robertsons. [History of the Highlanders, vol ii pp 139, 140] Skene states in a note that the peerage writers have been more than usually inaccurate in their account of the earldom of Athol From its origin down to the fourteenth century, "there is," he says, 'scarcely a single step in the genealogy correctly given"

On the forfeiture of David, the twelfth earl, his estates were granted to Sir Neil Campbell of Lochow, and Mary his spouse, sister to king Robert the Bruce, and Sir John Campbell of Moulin their second son, and the latter was created earl of Athol This appears from a charter of king David the Second to Robert Lord Erskine, of the customs of Dundee and third part of Pettarache in Forfarshire, which some time pertained to John Campbell earl of Athol, as well as from a charter granted by the latter to Roger de Mortimer of the lands of Billandre He was killed in the battle of Halidon-hill, 19th July 1333, without issue, whereby the title reverted to the crown

The next possessor of the title of earl of Athol was William Douglas, eldest son of Sir James Douglas of Laudon, ancestor of the earls of Morton Not long after the death of the above-mentioned John Campbell he had the earldom conferred upon him, but the precise date is unknown On the 16th February 1341 he resigned his title by charter in favour of Robert, great steward of Scotland, and on the latter's accession to the throne in February 1371 under the name of Robert the Second, it became vested in the royal family Walter Stewart, the second son of that monarch by his second wife, Euphemia Ross was the next earl He was at first earl of Caithness but afterwards had the earldom of Athol being so designed, 5th June, 1403, in letters of safe-conduct by king Henry the Fourth allowing him to pass into his dominions as far as St Thomas of Canterbury, with a retinue of a hundred persons He had a charter from his brother Robert duke of Albany, governor of Scotland, of the barony of Cortachy in Forfarshire 22d September 1409 On the 10th April 1421 he obtained a safe-conduct to England, to arrange as to the restoration to liberty of his nephew James the First, which he was very instrumental in accomplishing He sat as one of the jury on the trial of his nephew Murdoch, duke of Albany, and his sons, in 1424 [See ante p 41] The king conferred upon him the office of great justiciary of Scotland, and also gave him the county palatine of Strathern for his life, 22d July 1427 Nearly ten years after this he engaged in the conspiracy of his kinsman Sir Robert Graham against James the First, one of the objects of which was the placing of the crown on the head of Sir Robert Stewart of Athol, the earl's grandson The king was cruelly assassinated in the Blackfriars monastery at Perth by the three conspirators, 20th February 1437 The murderers were apprehended, and put to death at Edinburgh with horrible tortures, in the following April Before being beheaded, Athol was set upon the pillory, and his head encircled with a red-hot iron crown, on which was inscribed "The king of traitors" His titles and extensive estates were forfeited

The title of earl of Athol was conferred, about 1457, on Sir John Stewart of Balveny, the eldest son of Sir James Stewart, the Black Knight of Lorn, and the queen Joanna dowager of James the First, who had chosen him for her second husband. The earl of Athol's father, the Black Knight of Lorn, was the third son of Sir John Stewart of Lorn and Innermeath, descended from Sir James Stewart, fourth son of Sir John Stewart of Bonkill, who was second son of Alexander, high steward of Scotland This earl of Athol was, with the earl of Crawford, appointed in 1475 to the command of the armament employed in suppressing the rebellion of the earl of Ross, on which occasion he assumed the motto, still borne by the Athol family, of "Furth fortune and fill the fetters," and had a grant of many lands that had belonged to that nobleman, on his resignation of the earldom of Ross and the lands of Kintyre and Knapdale He also acted a prominent part in the attempt made in 1480 to reduce to obedience Angus of the Isles, the illegitimate son of the Lord of the Isles the new title of the earl of Ross Some time after the battle of the Bloody Bay, fought in that year in the Isle of Mull between the Island factions, in which Angus was victorious, occurred the event known in history as the 'Raid of Athol' The earl crossing privately to Islay had carried off the infant son of Angus, called Donald Dubh, or the Black, whom he placed in the hands of his maternal grandfather the earl of Argyle Angus immediately summoned his adherents and sailed to the neighbourhood of Inverlochy, where he left his galleys and with a chosen body of Island warriors made a rapid and secret march into the district of Athol, which he ravaged with fire and sword The earl and his countess took refuge in the chapel of St Bride to which sanctuary many of the country people likewise fled with their most valuable effects The chapel, however, was violated by Angus and his followers, who, loaded with plunder, returned to Lochaber, carrying with them the earl and countess of Athol as prisoners In the voyage from Lochaber many of his galleys sunk, and much of his plunder was lost in a dreadful storm which he encountered Believing this to be a judgment from heaven for the violation of the chapel of St Bride, he was touched with fear and remorse, and voluntarily liberated his prisoners, without procuring what seems to have been the principal object of his raid into Athol, the recovery of his son He even performed an ignominious penance in the chapel which he had so lately desecrated

In 1488 the earl of Athol had a principal command in the army of James III against his son and the rebel lords for which, on the death of that monarch, he was imprisoned in the castle of Dunbar He died 19th September 1512 By his first wife, Lady Margaret Douglas only daughter of Archibald, fifth earl of Douglas, duke of Touraine, the widow of the eighth earl of Douglas and the wife of the ninth earl, her marriage with whom after his rebellion in 1450 was annulled he had two daughters By his second wife Lady Eleonora Sinclair daughter of William earl of Orkney and Caithness, he had two sons and nine daughters John the elder son, second earl of Athol, of this new creation, did not enjoy the title one year, being killed at Flodden 9th September 1513 His son John, the third earl was famous for his great hospitality and princely style of living Pitscottie minutely describes a grand hunting match and sumptuous entertainment given by him to king James the Fifth and his mother and the French ambassador, in 1529 He died in 1542 and was succeeded by his son John, fourth earl of Athol In the parliament of 1560, with the Lords Borthwick and Somerville he strongly opposed the Reformation, saying they would believe as their fathers had done before them Being afterwards constituted lord high chancellor of Scotland, he was sworn into office at Stirling, 29th March 1577 He opposed the measures of the regent Morton and took up arms to rescue the king from his power but by the mediation of Bowes the English ambassador an accommodation took place, in August 1578 At a grand entertainment given by Morton, at Stirling to the leaders of the opposite party, in token of reconcilement, 20th April 1579, Athol, the chancellor, was taken ill, and died four days afterwards, not without strong suspicions of his having been poisoned He was twice married, the second time to Margaret, third daughter of Malcolm third lord Fleming, great chamberlain of Scotland widow of Robert master of Montrose, killed at Pinkie, 1547, and of Thomas master of Erskine, son of John earl of Mar During her lifetime it was the general belief that this countess of Athol possessed the powers of sorcery, and it is said that when Queen Mary was confined with James the Sixth, the countess cast all the pains of childbirth upon Lady Rires If so, it must have been by some unknown species of mesmerism Their son John, fifth earl of Athol, was sworn a privy councillor in 1590, and died at Perth, 28th August 1595, without issue male when the title reverted to the crown He married Lady Mary Ruthven, second daughter of William first earl of Gowrie, by whom he had four daughters His countess afterwards became the second wife of John lord Innermeath, created earl of Athol by James the Sixth, in 1596 Lady Dorothea Stewart the eldest daughter of John the fifth earl and this lady, married William, second earl of Tullibardine, and was the mother of John, created earl of Athol, the first of the Murray family who possessed that title as afterwards mentioned Lady Mary, the second daughter, married James, earl of Athol, the son of her stepfather, Lord Innermeath, and he dying without male issue, the earldom again reverted to the crown [See INNERMEATH, Lord]

ATHOL, duke of, a title possessed by a branch of the ancient family of Murray The progenitor of the Murray family in Scotland was a Flemish settler in the reign of David the First, of the name of Freskin who obtained the lands of Strathbrock in Linlithgowshire, now called Brocks or Broxburn A rebellion having broken out in Moray in the year 1130 he is supposed to have assisted in quelling it, and was rewarded with a large tract of land in the lowlands of Moray, where his descendants settled, and in consequence assumed the name of de Moravia From Walter de Moravia descended the Moravs lords of Bothwell, the Morays of Abercairney (see MURRAY, surname of), and Sir William de Moravia, who acquired the lands of Tullibardine in estate in the lower part of Perthshire, with his wife Adda daughter of Malise seneschal of Strathern, as appears by charters dated in 1282 and 1284

His son Sir Andrew Murray of Tullibardine who succeeded him, was an adherent of Edward Baliol, and contributed greatly to the decisive victory gained by the latter at Dupplin in August 1332, by fixing a stake in a ford in the river Earn, through which his army marched and attacked the Scots He was taken prisoner at Perth about two months afterwards, and immediately put to death for his adherence to Baliol His descendant, Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, succeeded to the estates of his family in 1446 He was sheriff of Perthshire, and in 1458 one of the lords named for the administration of justice who were of the king's duly council He married Margaret daughter of Sir John Colquhoun of Luss, great chamberlain of Scotland, by whom he had a numerous issue According to tradition they had seventeen sons, from whom a great many families of the name of Murray are descended In a curious document entitled "The Declaration of George Halley, in Ochterarder, concerning the Laird of Tullibardine's seventeen sons—1710," it is stated that they "lived all to be men, and that they waited all one day upon their father at Stirling, to attend the king, with each of them one servant, and their father two This happening shortly after an act was made by King James the Fifth, discharging any persons to travel with great numbers of attendants besides their own family, and having challenged the laird of Tullibardine for breaking the said act, he answered he brought only his own sons, with their necessary attendants, with which the king was so well pleased that he gave them small lands in heritage" The ancient Scottish song, "Cromlet's Hilt," was written on the supposed inconstancy of Miss Helen Murray, commonly called "Fair Helen of Ardoch," granddaughter of Murray of Strewan, one of the seventeen sons of Tullibardine She was courted by young Chisholm of Cromleck who, during his absence in France, imposed upon by the false representations of a treacherous friend, believed that she was faithless to him, and wrote the affecting ballad called Cromlet's or Cromleck's hilt The lady's father, Stirling of Ardoch, had by his wife, Margaret Murray a family of no less than thirty-one children, of whom fair Helen was one It is said that James the Sixth, when passing from Perth to Stirling in 1617, paid a visit to Helen's mother, the Lady Ardoch, who was then a widow Her children were all dressed and drawn up on the lawn to receive his majesty On seeing them the king said, 'Madam, how many are there of them?' 'Sire,' she joocosly answered, 'I only want your help to make out the twa chalders!' a chalder contains sixteen bolls The king laughed heartily at the joke, and afterwards ate a collop sitting on a stone in the close The youngest son of this extraordinary family, commonly called the Tutor of Ardoch, died, in 1715, at the advanced age of one hundred and eleven

The eldest of Tullibardine's seventeen sons, Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, had, with other issue, William, his successor, and Sir Andrew Murray, ancestor of the viscounts Stormont (See STORMONT) His great-grandson, Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, was a zealous promoter of the Reformation in Scotland, and in 1567 at Carberry-hill, he accepted the gauntlet of defiance to single combat thrown down by the earl of Bothwell, but the latter objected to him as being of inferior rank, as he did also to Tullibardine's brother, James Murray of Pardovis, for the same reason His sister Annabella married the earl of Mar, afterwards regent, and was the governess of the infant king, James the Sixth He himself married in 1547 Lady Agnes Graham, third daughter of William second earl of Montrose On the death of his brother-in-law, the earl of Mar, in 1572, he and Sir Alexander Erskine of Gogar were appointed governors of the young king and joint keepers of the castle of Stirling, where his majesty resided and he discharged the office with the applause of the whole kingdom till 1578 George Halley, in the curious document already quoted, says that "Sir William Murray of Tullibardine having broke Argyle's face with the hilt of his sword in king James the Sixth's presence, was obliged to leave the kingdom Afterwards, the king's mails and slaughter cows were not paid, neither could any subject in the realm be able to compel those who were bound to pay them, upon which the king cried out—'O, if I had Will Murray again, he would soon get my mails and slaughter cows,' to which one standing by replied—'That if his majesty would not take Sir William Murray's life, he might return shortly' The king answered, 'He would be loath to take his life, for he had not another subject like him!' Upon which promise Sir William Murray returned, and got a commission from the king to go to the north, and lift up the mails and the cows, which he speedily did, to the great satisfaction of the king so that immediately after he was made lord comptroller" This office he obtained in 1565

His eldest son, Sir John Murray, the twelfth feudal baron of Tullibardine, was brought up with King James, who in 1592, constituted him his master of the household He was afterwards sworn a member of his privy council, and knighted and on 25th April 1604 King James raised him to the peerage by the title of Lord Murray of Tullibardine On 10th July 1606 he was created earl of Tullibardine His lordship married Catherine, fourth daughter of David second lord Drummond, and died in 1609

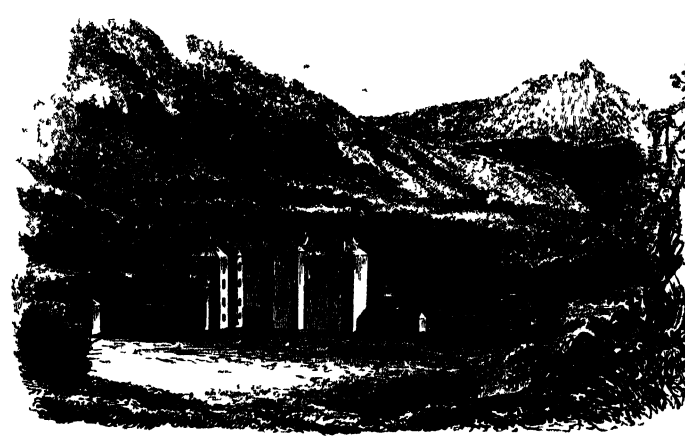
His eldest son, William, second earl of Tullibardine, was the means of rescuing James the Sixth from the earl of Gowrie and his brother at Perth on the 5th August 1600, for which service the hereditary sheriffship of Perth, which had belonged to the earl of Gowrie, was bestowed on him He married, as has been stated, the lady Dorothea Stewart, daughter of the 5th earl of Athol of the Stewart family, who died in 1595, and on the death in 1625 of James, second earl of Athol, son of John sixth lord Innermeath, created earl of Athol by James the Sixth, he petitioned King Charles the First for the earldom of Athol, as his countess was the eldest daughter and heir of line of Earl John, of the family of Innermeath, which had become extinct in the male line The king received the petition graciously, and gave his royal word that it should be done,—thereby a recognition on the part of the Crown of the right of the heir female to an ancient peerage, of which the constitution was unknown The earl accordingly surrendered the title of earl of Tullibardine into the king's hands, 1st April 1626, to be conferred on his brother Sir Patrick Murray, as a separate dignity, but before the patents could be expeded, his lordship died the same year His son John, however, obtained in February 1629 the title of earl of Athol, and thus became the first earl of the Murray branch, and the earldom of Tullibardine was at the same time granted to Sir Patrick This earl of Athol was a zealous royalist and joined the association formed by the earl of Montrose for the king, at Cumbernauld, in January 1641 He died in June 1642 His eldest son John, second earl of Athol of the Murray family, also faithfully adhered to Charles the First, and was excepted by Cromwell out of his act of grace and indemnity, 12th April 1654, when he was only about nineteen years of age At the restoration, he was sworn a privy councillor, obtained a charter of the hereditary office of sheriff of Fife and in 1663 was appointed justice-general of Scotland In 1670 he was constituted captain of the king's guards, in 1672 keeper of the privy seal, and 14th January 1673, an extraordinary lord of session In 1670 he succeeded to the earldom of Tullibardine on the death of James fourth earl of the new creation, and was created marquis of Athol in 1676 He increased the power of his family by his marriage with Lady Amelia Sophia Stanley, third daughter of the seventh earl of Derby beheaded for his loyalty 15th October 1651 Through her mother, Charlotte de la Tremouille, daughter of Claude de la Tremouille, duke of Thouars and prince of Talmont, she was related in blood to the emperor of Germany the kings of France and Spain, the prince of Orange, the duke of Savoy, and most of the principal families of Europe, and by her the family of Athol acquired the seignory of the Isle of Man, and also large property in that island

In 1678, on the irruption into the western shires of the Highland host, the marquis of Athol joined the duke of Hamilton in opposition to the duke of Lauderdale, in consequence of which he was deprived of his office of justice-general, but retained his other places He was instrumental in suppressing Argyle's invasion in 1685 Notwithstanding his conspicuous loyalty in the reigns of Charles the Second and his brother James, he promoted the Revolution, and went to London in 1689, to wait on the prince of Orange, but was disappointed in his expectations of preferment under the new government William, though related to the marchioness, did not receive him cordially, and in consequence he joined the Jacobite party At the convention of the Scottish estates, 14th March 1689, he was put in nomination as president by the adherents of king James The Whigs on the other hand proposed the duke of Hamilton, and the latter was elected by a majority of fifteen votes When the viscount of Dundee proceeded into the Highlands for the purpose of trying the chance of a battle the defence of the castle of Blair Athol, belonging to the marquis, was the means of occasioning the battle of Killiecrankie, in the same year This strong fortress, which commands the most important pass in the Northern Highlands, had already been the scene of remarkable events in the previous civil wars In 1644 the marquis of Montrose had possessed himself of it, and was here joined by a large body of the Athol Highlanders, to whose bravery he was indebted for the victory at Tippermuir In the troubles of 1653 it was taken by storm by Colonel Daniel, one of Cromwell's officers, who, unable to remove a magazine of provisions lodged there, destroyed it by powder In 1689 it had been taken possession of by Stewart of Ballechan, the marquis of Athol's chamberlain, who refused to deliver it up to Lord Murray, the marquis's son, as he was supposed to favour the Revolution party, Stewart declaring that he held it for King James, by order of his lieutenant general Lord Murray had summoned his father's vassals to join him, and about twelve hundred assembled, but no entreaties could prevail on them to declare in favour of the government of King William They intimated that if he would join Dundee they would follow him to a man, but if he refused they all would leave him His lordship remonstrated with them, and even threatened them with his vengeance if they abandoned him, when, setting his threats at defiance, they ran to the river Banovy in the neighbourhood of Blair castle and filling their bonnets with water, drank King James's health, and left his standard Dundee knew the importance of preserving Blair castle and with his usual expedition he joined the garrison A few days afterwards, however, the battle of Killiecrankie took place when he was slain in the moment of victory The following is a view of Blair castle



The last siege which Blair castle sustained was in March 1746, when it was gallantly defended by Sir Andrew Agnew against a party of the Pretender's forces, who retired from before it a few weeks preceding the battle of Culloden As soon as peace was restored, a considerable part of the castle was reduced in height, and the inside most magnificently furnished The marquis continued in the opposition for the remainder of his life He died 6th May 1703 His second son, Lord Charles, was created first earl of Dunmore, and his fourth son, Lord William, was created first Lord Nairn

His eldest son John, the second marquis, and first duke, of Athol, designated Lord John Murray, was one of the commissioners for inquiring into the massacre of Glencoe in 1693 By King William he was appointed in 1695 one of the principal secretaries of state for Scotland He was created a peer in his father's lifetime, by the title of earl of Tullibardine, viscount of Glenalmond and Lord Murray, for life, by patent dated 27th July 1696, and in April 1703 he was appointed lord privy seal On the 30th July of that year, immediately after his father's death, he was created duke of Athol, by Queen Anne, and invested with the order of the Thistle Having, the same year, introduced the act of security into the Scottish parliament, the duke of Queensberry and the other ministers, greatly displeased, formed a plan to ruin him by means of Simon Fraser of Beaufort Fraser had fled to France some years before, to elude a sentence of death pronounced against him in absence, by the court of justiciary, for an alleged rape on the person of Lady Amelia Murray dowager Lady Lovat, and sister of the duke of Athol, but returning to Scotland in 1703, as the agent of the exiled family, he, after intriguing with the duke of Queensberry, then at the head of the government party in Scotland, revealed the existence of a Jacobite conspiracy, in which the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, as well as others were deeply involved Fraser was Athol's bitter enemy [see Fraser, Simon, twelfth Lord Lovat] and the whole pretended plot having been brought to light by Ferguson, celebrated as the plotter [see Ferguson, Robert] with whom Fraser had had some communication in London, he immediately acquainted the duke with the discovery he had made Athol at once laid the matter before the queen, who had been previously apprised of the alleged conspiracy by the duke of Queensberry The latter being called upon for an explanation excused himself by saying that when Fraser came to Scotland he had received a written communication from him, to the effect that he could make important discoveries, relative to designs against the queen's government in proof of which he delivered him a letter from the queen dowager, the widow of James the Seventh, at St Germains, addressed to L—— M ——, which initials Fraser stated were meant for Lord Murray, the former title of the duke of Athol, and that, after seeing him, he (Queensberry) had given him a protection in Scotland, and procured a pass for him in England, to enable him to follow out further discoveries The English house of peers took the subject up warmly and passed strong resolutions regarding the supposed conspiracy, for the purpose of clearing Queensberry, but nothing further was done in the matter The effect, however, was to incense Athol against the government, and so zealous was he against the Union that he is said to have had six thousand Highland followers ready to oppose it This did not prevent him, however, from pocketing one thousand pounds of the equivalent money sent down, nominally to satisfy such claims of damage as might arise out of the Union, but in reality given in many instances as a bribe At the beginning of the session of the Scots parliament in which the Union was carried the duke was appointed commissioner, as Lockart informs us, in place of the duke of Queensberry, the latter wishing to ascertain the state of public feeling before he ventured himself to face the difficulties of the time, "and therefore he sent the duke of Athol down as commissioner, using him as the monkey did the cat, in pulling out the hot roasted chestnuts" [Lockart's Memoirs, p 189] His grace died 14th November, 1724 He was twice married, first to Catherine, daughter of the duke of Hamilton by whom he had six sons and a daughter, and secondly to Mary, daughter of William lord Ross, by whom he had three sons and a daughter His eldest son, John marquis of Tullibardine, died in 1709 His second son William, who succeeded his brother, was the marquis of Tullibardine who acted the prominent part in both the Scottish rebellions of last century, which is recorded in history He was one of the first that joined the earl of Mar in 1715, for which he was attainted for high treason, and the family honours were settled by parliament on his next brother James Another brother, Lord Charles Murray, a cornet of horse, also engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and had the command of a regiment Upon the march into England he kept at the head of his men on foot in the Highland dress After the surrender of Preston, his lordship being amongst the prisoners, was tried by a court martial as a deserter, and sentenced to be shot, but received a pardon through the interest of his friends and died in 1720 The marquis of Tullibardine had escaped to the continent, but returned to Scotland with the Spanish forces, in 1719, and with a younger brother, Lord George Murray, afterwards commander-in-chief of the Pretender's army, was in the battle of the pass of Glenshiel, in the district of Kintail, Ross-shire, in June of that year, where Lord George was wounded After the defeat at Glenshiel, the marquis escaped a second time to the continent, and lived twenty-six years in exile In 1745 he accompanied Prince Charles Edward to Scotland, and landed with him at Boroudale 2d July He was styled duke of Athol by the Jacobites On the 19th August he unfurled the prince's standard at Glenfinnan and supported by a man on each side, held the staff while he proclaimed the Chevalier de St George as king, and read the commission appointing his son Charles prince regent After the battle of Culloden he fled to the westward intending to embark for the isle of Mull, but being unable, from the bad state of his health, to bear the fatigue of travelling under concealment, he surrendered, on the 27th April, 1746, to Mr Buchanan of Drummakill, a Stirlingshire gentleman Being conveyed to London he was committed to the Tower, where he died on the 9th July following

James the second duke of Athol was the third son of the first duke He succeeded to the dukedom on the death of his father, in November 1724, in the lifetime of his elder brother William, attainted by parliament Being maternal great-grandson of James seventh earl of Derby, upon the death of the tenth earl of that line, he claimed and was allowed the English barony of Strange, which had been conferred on Lord Derby, by writ of summons, in 1628 His grace was married, first to Jean, sister of Sir John Frederick, bart by whom he had a son and two daughters, secondly to Jane, daughter of John Drummond of Megginch, who had no issue The latter was the heroine of Dr Austen's song of "I or lack of gold she's left me, O" She was betrothed to that gentleman, a physician in Edinburgh, when the Duke of Athol saw her, and falling in love with her made proposals of marriage, which were accepted, and, as Burns says, she jilted the doctor Having survived her first husband, she married a second time, Lord Adam Gordon Dr Austen, on his part, although in his song he says

"No cruel fair shall ever move
My injured heart again to love,' married, in 1754, the Hon Anne Sempill, by whom he had a numerous family

The son and the oldest daughter of the second duke of Athol died young Charlotte, his youngest daughter, succeeded on his death, which took place in 1764, to the barony of Strange and the sovereignty of the Isle of Man She married her co sin, John Murray, Esq, eldest son of Lord George Murray, fifth son of the first duke, and the celebrated generalissimo of the forces of the Pretender in 1745, [see MURRAY, Lord George] Though Lord George was attainted by parliament for his share in the rebellion, his son was allowed to succeed his uncle and father-in-law as third duke, and in 1765 he and his duchess disposed of their sovereignty of the Isle of Man to the British government, for seventy thousand pounds, reserving, however, their landed interest in the island, with the patronage of the bishopric and other ecclesiastical benefices, on payment of the annual sum of one hundred and one pounds fifteen shillings and eleven pence, and rendering two falcons to the kings and queens of England upon the days of their coronation His grace, who had five sons and two daughters, died 5th November, 1774, and was succeeded by his eldest son John, fourth duke who in 1786 was created Earl Strange and Baron Murray of Stanley in the peerage of the United kingdom He died in 1830 His second son, Lord George Murray was bishop of St Davids whose eldest son became bishop of Rochester His fifth son Lord Charles Murray, dean of Bocking in Essex, having married Alice, daughter of George Mitford, Esq, and heiress of her great uncle, Gawen Aynsley, assumed the surname of Aynsley The fourth duke was succeeded by his eldest son John who was for many years a recluse, and died single 11th September, 1846 His next brother James a major-general in the army, was created a peer of the United kingdom, as baron Glenlyon of Glenlyon, in the county of Perth 9th July, 1821 He married, in May 1810 Emily Frances second daughter of the duke of Northumberland, and by her he had two sons and two daughters He died in 1847 His eldest son, George Augustus Frederick John, Lord Glenlyon, became, on the death of his uncle in 1846, sixth duke of Athol In 1853, knight of the Thistle, married, with issue

ATKINS, ETKINS, AITKINS, or AIKIN, JAMES, bishop of Galloway, was born at Kirkwall, about the year 1613 He was the son of Henry Atkins or Aiken, sheriff and commissary of Orkney He commenced his studies at the university of Edinburgh, and completed them at Oxford in 1638 On his return to Scotland, that year, he was appointed chaplain to James, marquis of Hamilton, his majesty's high commissioner to the General Assembly, in which situation he behaved so well that on the marquis' return to England he obtained for him from the king a presentation to the church of Birsa in Orkney In the beginning of 1650, on the landing of the marquis of Montrose in that stewartry, Dr Atkins was appointed by the presbytery to draw up a declaration of loyalty and allegiance to Charles the Second, which, with their consent and approbation, was published For this step the whole presbytery was deposed by the General Assembly, while Atkins was excommunicated for holding correspondence with the marquis An act of council was also passed for his apprehension, but receiving private notice thereof from his relative, Sir Archibald Primrose, clerk of council, afterwards lord register, he fled into Holland In 1653 he returned to Scotland, and quietly resided with his family in Edinburgh, till the king's restoration in 1660, when he accompanied Dr Sydserf, bishop of Galloway, the only surviving prelate in Scotland, to London to congratulate his majesty, at which time, he was presented by the bishop of Winchester to the rectory of Winfrith in Dorsetshire In 1677 he was consecrated bishop of Moray, and in 1680 he was translated to the see of Galloway, when, on account of his age, he received a dispensation to reside in Edinburgh, where he died of an apoplectic stroke, 28th October 1687, aged 74 years, and was buried in the church of the Greyfriars in that city He showed himself very zealous in opposing the taking off the penal laws —Keith's Scottish Bishops

ATKINSON, THOMAS, a pleasing poet and miscellaneous writer, was born at Glasgow about the year 1801 He is said to have been the illegitimate son of a butcher of that city After receiving his education, he was apprenticed to Mr Turnbull, bookseller, Trongate, on whose death he entered into business, in partnership with Mr David Robertson From boyhood he was a writer of poetry, prose sketches, and essays, and among other things brought out by him were, 'The Sextuple Alliance,' and 'The Chameleon' Three successive volumes of the latter were published annually, containing his own pieces exclusively He was also sole editor and author of 'The Ant,' a weekly periodical, and an extensive contributor to 'The Western Luminary,' 'The Emmet,' and other local publications His writings are distinguished by taste and fancy, and he was indefatigable in producing them His talents for speaking were also of a superior order, and he took every opportunity of displaying his powers of oratory At the general election, after the passing of the Reform Bill, Mr Atkinson, who was a keen reformer, started as a candidate for the Stirling burghs, in opposition to Lord Dalmeny, who was returned. Being naturally of a delicate constitution, his exertions on this occasion brought on a decline, and when seized with advanced symptoms of consumption, he disposed of his business, his books, and his furniture, and sailed for Barbadoes, but died on the passage on the 10th October 1833, in the 32d year of his age. He was buried at sea in an oaken coffin, which he had taken with him! He left an annuity to his mother, and a sum, after accumulation, to be applied in building in Atkinsonian Hall in Glasgow for scientific purposes. His relatives erected a monument to his memory in the necropolis of his native city.

AUCHINLECK, a surname derived from lands of that name. Auch, sometimes ach, its diminutive auchin and augmentative avoch, occurs frequently alone, as also in composition, in names of lands. It implies an elevation, but in a relative sense only. In valley lands near the mouths of rivers, where the plane is intersected by channels of deep watercourses, the auchin or haughs are the separated and higher portions of that plane, as the Haughs of Cromdale in the valley of the Spey, and being heavy clays, are generally very fertile. On hill-slopes auchin or haughs are more level portions or banks, as Auchinross or Roschaugh in Avoch, Ross-shire. The augmentative avoch refers to continuity as well as elevation, as in the parish of that name where a deep alluvial soil is furrowed into a high parallel flat ridge of some miles long by dividing streams. The plural is Auchen frequently corrupted into Auchens. These and their genitives Auchn—augh-s and Auchne occur as surnames, from lands so called. They both enter into topographical combinations, as Auchendenny, Auchen-den-s, haughs of the den—abbreviated into Denny, also a surname,—whose undulating lands are cut through by deep dens or stream beds, Craig-al-achie, the rock of the haugh or ach, through which the Spey has cleft a passage for itself, and others of similar formation. Aughter, augh-ter is applied to the upper and higher portions of river basins where the affluents are numerous and their bed valleys wide and deep worn. It means high lands but in a sense not identical with mountainous. The aughter in Aughterarder is derived from the dividing ridge, or plane of the original bed of the basin, lying between the valleys of the Ruthven and the Earn. Aughter, sometimes Ochter, having in composition given names to baronies, has, again, become a part of various surnames. Augh, or och, is the Gothic root of the German Hoch and under this form is found in Continental topography wherever the Gothic races held rule. It becomes Hock in English topography. It has been claimed as Gaelic, and is certainly used by a Gaelic-speaking population as a descriptive name in regions now inhabited by them. But their explanations of its meaning are unsatisfactory, and having been introduced into the parochial statistical accounts, are followed in works on topography, so that auch is rendered a field, a height, or a ridge, as appears to suit the locality. Leck or Lake is the Gothic word for dead, as in Lakewake, the watch of the dead, Cromlech the circle of the dead, and in this word is applied in the sense of barren, sterile, as in the dead sea. The barony of that name in Ayrshire is an upland flat lying between the valleys of the waters of Ayr and Lugar, which flow in parallel directions so closely approximating to each other that in sixteen miles of length it has never more than two of breadth, with a moss in a great part of its centre. Lech, Lach, or Lake, is sometimes duplicated with the Latin mort, as Mortlech in Aboyne, the sterile land, Mortlach, in Moray, the place of battle, and its genitive Leckie is also a surname.

The Gaelic definition, "field of the flagstones," is simply absurd. There is not a flagstone in the parish or barony, and the name was bestowed before the subdivision of land into fields was known. The name is often pronounced and sometimes written Affleck.

The lands of Auchinleck in the parish of Monkie, Forfarshire, appear to have given origin to the surname at an early period. Two rivulets running parallel in deep dens through a valley at a level of 300 feet, yet near the sea, leave between them a flat auchin or elevated stripe on which stands the old tower or castle of Affleck somewhat more than a mile from the parish church, a beautiful specimen of its class, entire although long uninhabited, and since 1746 has been used for purposes connected with agriculture. It still serves as a mark for mariners. These lands were bestowed by charter from David I. The office of armour-bearer to the Lindsays, earls of Crawford, was hereditary in the family of Auchinleck of that ilk [Lives of the Lindsays vol. i. p. 114, note.] They became the property of a family of the name of Reid, which was attainted for being engaged in the rebellion of 1745. The castle and a large part of the estates were then purchased by Mr James Yeaman, one of the bailies of Dundee, from the representatives of whose descendant, they were acquired by Mr Graham of Kincaldrum, in whose possession they still remain. In the year 1733 Thomas Reid of Auchinleck presented a silver communion cup to the kirk session of Dundee as recorded in letters of gold on the session house wall of that time.

The lands of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire, are known to have given a surname to their proprietors so early as the 13th century. In 1300, the Laird of Auchinleck accompanied Sir William Wallace to Glasgow from Ayr, when he attacked and slew Earl Percy. [See WALLACE, Sir William.] The Chartulary of Paisley records a donation from Sir John de Auchinleck, in 1385 of twenty shillings yearly to the abbot and convent of that house, as a compensation for having mutilated the person of one of the monks. Thomas Boswell a younger son of Boswell of Balmuto in Fife, having married one of the daughters and co-heiress of Sir John Auchinleck of that ilk, received in 1504 a grant of these lands from James the Fourth. This Thomas Boswell, who fell at Flodden, was the ancestor of the present possessor. The family of Boswell of Auchinleck has acquired celebrity in several of its members. [See BOSWELL, surname of.] There was another family of Auchinleck in Perthshire, designed of Balmanno, an Auchinleck having married the heiress of Balmanno of that ilk.

AUCHMUTY, or auch moot-s augh or haugh of moot or judgment, a surname derived from lands in the parish of Newburn, anciently called Drumeldry (Drum, hill, eldry elders or elders, of the wise men or elders) Fifeshire, once belonging to an old family styled Auchmoutie of that ilk. The estate of Drumeldry, now the property of Thomas Calderwood Durham, Esq. of Largo, and Lawhill, now called Hallhill, the residence of Charles Halket Craigie, Esq., at one time formed part of the barony of Auchmoutie. In 1600 Capt. Auchmuty, a descendant of the ancient Fifeshire house of Auchmuty, settled at Brianstown, county of Longford, Ireland, and his posterity, now named Achmuty, still possess that estate A branch of the Brianstown family, who continue to spell their name Auchmuty, are the proprietors of Kilmore House in the county of Roscommon The name is not a very common one, but uncouth as it may sound in the ears of our English neighbours, it has been rendered familiar by the deeds of Major-general Sir Samuel B Auchmuty, C B, who in 1807 distinguished himself in the reduction of Monte Video, on the river Plate

AUCHTERLONY, the surname of an ancient Forfarshire family, who formerly possessed the barony of Kelly in the parish of Arbirlot Rather more than two miles west of Arbroath, on the edge of a precipice, at the side of the river Elliot, are the ruins of the castle of Kelly, otherwise Auchterlony The first proprietor of Kelly noticed in history was Roger de Moubray, an adherent of Edward the First of England, who, in the distribution of the estates of the Scottish barons opposed to his pretensions as lord paramount of Scotland, bestowed these lands upon him In 1321, Moubray was declared a traitor, and his barony forfeited Kelly was then conferred on the steward of Scotland, the son-in-law of Bruce In the reign of Robert the Second we find Alexander Auchterlony designed of Kelly This Alexander Auchterlony married Janet, daughter of Sir William Maule of Panmure, knight, and got with her the lands of Greenford, in the same parish It would seem that the barony of Kelly had passed from him or his successor, for it is recorded that William Auchterlony acquired Kelly in the year 1444, and from that date till 1680 it remained in possession of the family of Auchterlony At the Reformation the chief of the Auchterlonies, according to tradition, was very active in the destruction of the abbey of Arbroath Being indebted to the abbey steward, at the head of three hundred men he attacked the abbey, and setting fire to it, burnt all evidence of a claim against him Among the witnesses to a charter of a donation to the hospital at Dundee, dated 2d May 1387, appears the name of David Auchterlony dom ae Kelly, who is supposed to have been either the incendiary or his son Kelly now belongs to Lord Panmure, and the ancient family of Auchterlony is represented by John Auchterlony of Guynd, Esq —See GUYNDFERLONY

AVANDALE, Lord, a title conferred by James the Second on Andrew Stewart, the eldest of the seven illegitimate sons of Sir James Stewart, called James the Gross, fourth son of Murdoch, duke of Albany, and the only one who escaped the vengeance of James the First, when his father and three brothers were ruthlessly cut off by that monarch On their imprisonment he had flown to arms, assaulted and burnt the town of Dumbarton, and killed Sir John Stewart, the king's uncle, who held the castle with thirty-two men He afterwards took refuge in Ireland, where he formed a connection with a lady of the family of Macdonald, by whom he had seven sons, and a daughter, Matilda, married to Sir William Edmonstone of Duntreath These children are supposed on their father's death to have been adopted by Murdoch's widow, the duchess Isabella, countess of Lennox, to bear her company in her castle on the small island of Inchmurrin on Lochlomond, where her latter years were spent in retirement, as his name and that of three of his brothers, Murdoch, Arthur, and Robert Stewarts of Albany, appear as witnesses to charters granted by the duchess Isabella as countess of Lennox, betwixt 1440 and 1451 [Napier's History of the Partition of the Lennox, pp 18—20] King James the Second, touched perhaps with regret for the ruin which his father had caused Duke Murdoch's family, honoured the eldest of his illegitimate grandsons with peculiar marks of regard and affection He placed him at one of the English universities, and on his return to Scotland, after his education had been completed, appointed him a gentleman of his bedchamber, and knighted him In 1456 he bestowed on him the barony of Avandale or Evandale in Lanarkshire, which had been forfeited by the last earl of Douglas in 1455, and in 1457 created him Lord Avandale [Ibid, p 45] Before the 1st of March, 1459, the new peer had superseded George fourth earl of Angus, as warden of the marches, and in 1460, on the accession of James the Third, he was chosen lord-chancellor of Scotland, an office which he held for twenty-two years, with the high distinction of precedence next to the princes of royal blood He was one of the lords of the regency, and in a charter of King James the Third, in 1465, he is styled guardian of the king In 1468 he was sent ambassador to Denmark to treat of a marriage between James the Third and the princess Margaret of Denmark, which was happily accomplished On the 4th May 1471, he had a hereditary grant, under the great seal, of the whole earldom of Lennox, which had been in non-entry from the year 1425, when Earl Duncan, the father of the duchess Isabella, was beheaded, though it had never been forfeited, as erroneously stated by Douglas in his Peerage, and other writers To fortify himself in this grant, he obtained letters of legitimation under the great seal, of date 28th August 1472, to himself and two of his brothers, Arthur and Walter, by which a right of general succession was thrown open to them These letters were repeated on the 17th April 1479, and on the 18th of the same month he had a charter of the lordship of Avandale In 1482, when the king's brother, the duke of Albany, with the assistance of Edward the Fourth of England invaded Scotland, Lord Avandale and many other noblemen who had been till then the most loyal supporters of the crown, abandoned the sovereign who had heaped upon him wealth and honours, and after the king had been conveyed prisoner to Edinburgh castle, he as chancellor, with the archbishop of St Andrews, the bishop of Dunkeld, and the earl of Argyle, entered into a bond dated 2d August of that year, for the protection and indemnity of Albany The noblemen who sign this deed declare that they and the other nobles of the realm "sall cause our soverane lord fulyr to gif and grant" to the duke of Albany "all his landis, heritagis, strenthis, houses, and offices quhilk he possessit the day of his last partyng furth of the realm of Scotland" [Fœdera, b xii p 160] To punish his ingratitude, the king, before the 25th of the same month of August, deprived him of the chancellorship, which he had held so long, and bestowed it on John Laing, bishop of Glasgow This took place before the siege of Edinburgh castle, which occurred 29th September 1482, and not after that event, as Mr Tytler, in his history, records it, and could not therefore have been in consequence of Albany's partial success, as Tytler says it was [See Napier's History of the Partition of the Lennox, p 68, note] Albany was soon received into favour, and in the following December appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, but in 1484 the Albany party was completely crushed Although not restored to the chancellorship, Lord Avandale appears to have regained the confidence of the king, and in 1484 he was one of the commissioners sent to France to renew the ancient league with that crown He was also one of the plenipotentiaries who concluded the pacification with King Richard the Third at Nottingham, 21st September of that year His name appears as one of the witnesses to a charter of James the Third dated 11th March 1487 He continued to possess the lands of the earldom of Lennox till his death in 1488 He left no issue, whereby the title for the time became extinct

The title of Lord Avandale was next bestowed on his nephew, Andrew Stewart, second son of his younger brother, Walter Stewart of Morphie, in the county of Kincardine, sixth son of Sir James the Gross The mother of the second Lord Avandale was Elizabeth, daughter of Arnot of Arnot, in the county of Fife Crawford (Officers of State, p 39) says that Alexander Stewart, the eldest son of Walter Stewart of Morphie, was, in 1503, created Lord Avandale by solemn investiture in parliament, but this is a mistake, as it would appear that the said Alexander Stewart died before 1500, and that he was succeeded in the estate of Avandale and other lands by his immediate younger brother Andrew above mentioned, second Lord Avandale [Douglas] By his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir John Kennedy of Blairquhan in Ayrshire, had three sons and three daughters Andrew, the eldest son, succeeded as third Lord Avandale Henry, the second son, on marrying the queen dowager, was created Lord Methven [See METHVEN, Lord] The third son, Sir James Stewart of Beath, was the ancestor of the earl of Moray [See MORAY, Earl of]

The third Lord Avandale was governor of the castle of Dumbarton, and held the office of groom of the stole to King James the Fourth In 1534, he transferred the barony of Avandale and the Lands of Coldstream to Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart, in exchange for the barony of Ochiltree in Ayrshire, and in consequence of this exchange, on the 15th March 1543, the earl of Arran, governor of the kingdom, with consent of parliament, ordained that Andrew lord Avandale should in future be styled Lord Stewart of Ochiltree By his wife, Lady Margaret Hamilton only child of James, first earl of Arran, he had a son, Andrew Stewart, who became second lord Ochiltree [See OCHILTREE, Lord]

AVENEL, a surname now scarcely known, except in the pages of romance Like Umfraville, de Morville, and others it was once borne by high and powerful barons whose descendants, if any now exist, have long ceased to be called by the name of their progenitors Among the Anglo-Norman knights introduced into Scotland by David the First, was Robert Avenel, who in reward of military services, received Upper and Lower Eskdale, and flourished during the reigns of Malcolm the Fourth and William the Lion, whose charters he witnessed He officiated as Justiciary of Lothian for a short time after the accession of William, in 1165 His latter years were spent in the monastery of Melrose, to which he granted a large portion of his estates, and where he died in 1185 His son and heir, Gervase, confirmed the grant Roger Avenel, the successor of Gervase, had a serious dispute with the monks regarding the game on the lands The king, Alexander the Second, at his request interfered, and "found that the monks were entitled to the soil, but not to the game, which belonged to the Avenels, as lords of the manor" For several generations the Avenels continued among the most powerful families on the Borders, and in the Tales of the 'Monastery,' and the 'Abbot,' they have been introduced with singular success by Sir Walter Scott The family of Avenel merged, like many others, in an heiress, who married Henry, the son of Henry de Graham of Abercorn and Dalkeith and the property of the Avenels thus passed into other families

AYMOUTH baron of, in the Scottish peerage, a title bestowed on the great duke of Marlborough in 1682, as Baron Churchill of Aymouth, or Eyemouth, in Berwickshire, although he had no connexion with that place. The title became extinct on his death in 1722

AYTON, or AITON, a surname derived from the village of Eytown, now called Ayton in Berwickshire, which seems to have taken its name, anciently written Eytun and Eitun, from the water of Eye, that rising among the Lammermuir hills, flows into the sea at Eyemouth The etymology of the word is 'the town on the river'

The family of Ayton were descended from Gilbert de Vesci, an Anglo-Norman knight, who, settling in Scotland shortly after the Conquest, obtained the lands of Ayton in Berwickshire, and adopted the name of the lands as his family name About the year 1166 Helias and Dolfinus de Eitun attested a charter of Waldeve, earl of Dunbar Stephanus de Eyton appears as witness to a charter "de queta clamatione de terra de Swintona," granted by his son, Earl Patrick, who died in 1232 In the reign of William the Lion, Helias, Mauricius, and Adam de Eitun are among the witnesses to a donation of David de Quixwood to the lazaret or hospital of lepers at Auldcambus In 1250 Adam de Eiton granted to Henry de Lamberton three tofts of land with houses in Eyemouth In 1331, Adam, the prior of Coldingham, acknowledged a grant made to him of land for the site of a mill near the bridge of Ayton, by Adam, the son of William de Ayton Robert de Ayton was among the number of the Scots slain at the battle of Nesbit-moor, 22d June 1402

The principal family ended in an heiress, who in the reign of James the Third, married George Home a son of the house of Home, who thus acquired the original lands of Ayton By charter of date 29th November 1472, the greater part of the lands of Ayton with those of Whitfield, were granted to George Home son of Sir Alexander Home of Dunglass, who thus became ancestor of the Homes of Ayton

History mentions the baronial castle of Ayton, on the banks of the Eye, founded by the Norman baron de Vesci which was taken by the earl of Surrey in 1498, but no vestiges of it now remain The modern mansion-house of Ayton, built upon its site, was destroyed by fire in 1834

A branch of the Berwickshire Aytons settled in the county of Fife, and Skene imputes a Gaelic origin to the name "The Pictish Chronicle," he says, "in mentioning the foundation of the church of Abernethy, describes the boundaries of the territory ceded to the Culdees by the Pictish king as having been 'a lapide in Apurfeit usque ad lapidem juxta Cavful, id est Iethfoss, et inde in altum usque ad Athan' It is a remarkable fact that the same places are still known by these names, although slightly corrupted into those of Apurfarg, Carpow, and Ayton, and that the words are unquestionably Gaelic" [Skene's Highlanders of Scotland, vol i p 76]

In 1507, James the Fourth disponed the west half of the lands of Denmuir, or Nether Denmuir, in the parish of Abdie, Fifeshire, to Andrew Ayton, captain of the castle of Stirling, a son of the family of Ayton of Ayton, in Berwickshire, "pro bono et fideli servitio" He was the uncle of the heiress of Ayton above mentioned, and in consequence of the original lands of Ayton having passed, by her marriage, to the house of Home, he obtained a new charter of the lands of Nether Denmuir, in which they were named Ayton, and the Fifeshire branch of the family were afterwards styled Ayton of Ayton

Sir John Ayton of that ilk left two sons Robert and Andrew Robert, the eldest, succeeded to the estates of his uncle Robert, Lord Colville of Ochiltree, and in consequence, assumed the name of Colville, being styled Robert Colville of Craigflower The second son, Andrew, was a merchant in Glasgow, of which city he became lord provost He built a large house, surrounded by a garden, near the High Street of Glasgow, the site of which, now occupied by public works, is still called Ayton court

About the commencement of the eighteenth century the lands of Ayton in Fife were acquired by Patrick Murray, Esq, second son of Sir Patrick Murray, the second baronet of Ochtertyre, and they still continue in the possession of his descendant

The Aytons of Inchdairnie, in the parish of Kinglassie are understood to be the lineal descendants of the Anglo-Norman de Vescis, who settled in Berwickshire Inchdairnie has, for a long period, been the property of the Aytons Of this family was Major-general Roger Ayton of Inchdairnie, who died about 1810 His eldest son, John Ayton, was served Ayton of Ayton in 1829 Another son, James Ayton, Esq advocate, stood candidate for the representation of the city of Edinburgh, some years ago

Towards the end of the seventeenth century the lands of Kippoo, in the parish of Kingsbarns were sold by the representative of the family of John Philp, burgess in Cupar to whom they belonged, to Sir John Ayton, younger son of Ayton of Ayton, who was gentleman of the bed-chamber and usher of the black rod to Charles the Second He was succeeded in them, in 1700, by his grandson, John Ayton of Kinaldie To the latter family Sir Robert Ayton, the subject of the following notice, belonged

AYTON, Sir Robert, an accomplished poet, a younger son of Andrew Ayton of Kinaldie, Fifeshire, was born there in 1570, and studied at St Leonard's college, St Andrews, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1588 He afterwards went to France, where he resided for some time In 1603 he addressed from Paris an elegant panegyric, in Latin verse, to King James the Sixth, on his accession to the crown of England, which was printed at Paris the same year On his appearance at court he was knighted, and appointed one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, and private secretary to the queen He was also, subsequently, secretary to Henrietta Maria, queen of Charles I About 1609 he was sent by James as ambassador to the emperor of Germany, with the king's 'Apology for the Oath of Allegiance,' which he had dedicated to all the crowned heads of Europe He was highly esteemed by all the men of genius and poets of his time, and Ben Jonson took pride in informing Drummond of Hawthornden, that "Sir Robert Ayton loved him dearly" He died at London in March 1638, and was buried in the south aisle of the choir of Westminster Abbey, where a handsome monument was erected by his nephew, David Ayton of Kinaldie, to his memory

A representation of it is given in Smith's Iconographia Scotica, with his bust in the centre, of which the following is a woodcut

His English poems are few in number They are remarkable for their purity of style and delicacy of fancy The following lyric is accounted one of his best pieces

ON WOMAN'S INCONSTANCY

I lov'd thee once, I'll love no more,
Think be the grief as is the blame,
Thou art not what thou wast before,
What reason I should be the same?
He that can love unlov'd again,
Hath better store of love than brain
God send me love my debts to pay,
While unthrifts fool thou love away

Nothing could have my love o'erthrown,
If thou hadst still continued mine,
Yea, if thou hadst remain'd thy own,
I might perchance have yet been thine
But thou thy freedom did recall,
That it thou might elsewhere enthrall,
And then how could I but disdain
A captives captive to remain?

When new desires had conquer'd thee,
And changed the object of thy will,
It had been lethargy in me,
Not constancy to love thee still Yea, it had been a sin to go
And prostitute affection so,
Since we are taught no prayers to say
To such as must to others pray

Yet do thou glory in thy choice,
Thy choice of his good fortune boast,
I'll neither grieve nor yet rejoice,
To see him gain what I have lost
The height of my disdain shall be,
To laugh at him, to blush for thee
To love thee still, but go no more,
A begging to a beggars door

In a different style are the following stanzas prefixed to his Basia sive Strena Calanian Lond 1605, 4to They are addressed "To the most worshipful and worthy Sir James Hay, Gentleman of his Majesty's bedchamber"

When Janus' keys unlocks the gates above,
And throws more age on our sublunar lands,
I sacrifice with flames of fervent love
These hecatombs of kisses to thy hands
Their worth is small but thy deserts are such They'll pass in worth, if once thy shrine they touch

Laugh out on them, and then they will compare
With all the harvest of th' Arabian fields,
With all the pride of that perfumed air
Which winged troops of masked Zephyrs yields,
When with their breath they embalm the Elysian plain
And make the flow'rs reflect those scents again

Yea, they will be more sweet in their conceit
Than Venus kisses spent on Adon's wounds,
Than those wherewith pale Cynthia did entreat
The lovely shepherd of the Latmian bounds,
And more than those which Jove's ambrosial mouth Prodigalized upon the Trojan youth

I know they cannot such acceptance find,
If rigour censure their uncourtly frame,
But thou art courteous, and wilt call to mind
Th' excuse which shields both me and them from blame
My Muse was but a novice into this,
And, being virgin, scarce well taught to kiss

A panegyrical sonnet by Ayton occurs among 'The Poetical Essays of Alexander Craige, Scoto-britane,' sig F 3 London 1604, 4to [Irving's Scottish Poets, vol II p 300, note] A beautiful song, commencing, "I do confess thou'rt smooth and fair," printed anonymously in Lawes's 'Ayres and Dialogues,' 1659, and rendered into Scotch by Burns without improving it, has been attributed to Sir Robert Ayton, but without any other ground than that "in purity of language, elegance, and tenderness, it resembles his undoubted lyrics" In 'Watson's Collection of Scottish poems,' 1706-11, several of Ayton's pieces are inserted together with his name, but the poem mentioned appears without it, separate from those that are stated to be his John Aubrey styles Ayton "one of the best poets of his time" According to Dempster, he also wrote Greek and French verses Several of his Latin poems are preserved in the 'Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, printed in 1637 at Amsterdam —Bannatyne Miscellany—The following is a list of his works

BADENOCH, a surname derived from the district of that name, in the south-east of Inverness-shire, anciently belonging to the powerful family of the Cumyns In 1280, Walter Cumyn, earl of Menteith in right of his wife, the second son of William Cumyn, earl of Buchan, acquired the lordship of Badenoch, by a grant of Alexander the Second [Chalmers' Caledonia, vol ii p 568] In 1291, John Cumyn, lord of Badenoch, acknowledged Edward the First as superior of Scotland His son John, called the Red Cumyn, was the personage who was slain at Dumfries, by Robert the Bruce, 10th February 1306 On the forfeiture of the Cumyns, Bruce annexed the lordship of Badenoch to the earldom of Murray, and the clan Chattan, whose original possessions were in Lochaber, appear about this period to have settled in Badenoch [Gregory's Highlands, p 77] Robert the Second granted Badenoch to his son Alexander, earl of Buchan, commonly called, from his ferocity, "the Wolf of Badenoch" [See BUCHAN, earls of] In 1452 the crown bestowed Badenoch on the earl of Huntly, who, at the head of the clan Chattan, maintained a fierce warfare with the western clans, and his neighbours of Lochaber [See HUNTLY, earl of] As early as 1440 we find one Patrick Badenoch serving the office of bailie of Aberdeen [Extracts from ABERDEEN Burgh Records, pp 6, 8 &c] The name is not uncommon in the north of Scotland

BAILLIE, a surname supposed to have been originally the same as Baliol In the account of the Bailies of Lamington inserted in the appendix to Nisbet's Heraldry, it is stated that Mr Alexander Baillie of Castlecarry, a learned antiquarian, was of opinion that the family of Lamington were a branch of the illustrious house of the Baliols, who were lords of Galloway, and kings of Scotland [See BALIOL, surname of] An uncle of King John Baliol, named Sir Alexander Baliol of Cavers, was great chamberlain of Scotland in the reign of his nephew, in 1292 By Isabel, his wife, the daughter and heiress of Richard de Chillam, the widow of David de Strathbogie, earl of Athol, he had two sons, Alexander and William Baliol Alexander the eldest, after the abdication of his cousin, King John, joined the Scottish party, for which he was, by order of King Edward, imprisoned in the tower of London, but upon security given by his father and two gentlemen of the house of Lindsay, he was enlarged [Rymer] His other son, William, had the lands of Penston and Carnbroe, in the barony of Bothwell, Lanarkshire, the oldest of the possessions of the Bailies of Lamington After the abdication of his cousin, he also joined the Scottish party, which rendered him so obnoxious to King Edward, that by act of the parliament of England, he was, in 1297, fined in four years' rent of his estate From Robert the Bruce he got a charter of the lands of Penston He gave in pure alms to the monks of Newbattle licentiam formandi stagnum in terra de Carnbrue The lands of Carnbroe continued in the same family till they were given over to a younger son, the ancestor of the Baliols or Bailies of the house of Carphin

In the list of captives taken with David the Second at the battle of Durham in 1346, occurs William Baillie [Rymer], the first time that the name is found thus written, or Englished, as it is expressed After his release this William Baillie was, in 1357, knighted by David the Second, who granted him a charter, dated 27th January 1368, of the barony of Lamington, which has remained in the possession of his descendants till the present time Lamington had previously belonged to a family of the name of Braidfoot It is traditionally stated that the celebrated Sir William Wallace acquired the estate of Lamington by marrying Marion Braidfoot, the heiress of that family, and that it passed to Sir William Baillie on his marriage with the eldest daughter and heiress of Wallace The statement, however, is incorrect Sir William Wallace left no legitimate offspring, but his natural daughter is said to have married Sir William Baillie of Hoprig, the progenitor of the Baillies of Lamington

This Sir William Baillie of Hoprig and Lamington had two sons, William his heir, and Alexander, who, according to Baillie of Castlecarry, was the first of the family of Carphin From him descended also, besides the Baillies of Parbroth, the Baillies of Park, Torviston, Dunrogal, Carnbroe, Castlecarry, and Provand The first of the latter family was Sir William Baillie of Provand, the cousin of the then laird of Lamington In 1557, he was appointed to the then benefice of Lamington, being the first incumbent of it after the Reformation At that period a certain proportion of the Lords of Council and Session were chosen from among the clergy, and in 1566 he was called to the bench, when he took the title of Lord Provand He was lord president of the court of session from 1565 till his death in 1595 He left a daughter, Elizabeth, his sole heiress, who married Sir Robert Hamilton of Goslingtoun and Silvertonhill

Of the house of Carphin was Mr Cuthbert Baillie, who was rector of Cumnock, commendator of Glenluce, and lord high treasurer of Scotland in 1512, in the reign of James the Fourth [Lives of the Lord High Treasurers]

The eldest son of the above mentioned Sir William Baillie of Hoprig and Lamington, is designed Willielmus Baillie of Hoprig, in a charter from his cousin, "Joannes de Hamilton, Dominus de Cadzow," ancestor of the dukes of Hamilton, of the lands of Hyndshaw and Watston, dated 4th February 1395 He married Isabella, daughter of Sir William Seton of that ilk, ancestor of the earls of Wintoun, by whom he had Sir William, his son and heir, who was one of the hostages sent to England for James the First, in exchange for David Leslie of Leslie, in 1432 [Rymer]

The latter Sir William Baillie of Hoprig and Lamington, married Catharine, daughter of the above mentioned Sir John Hamilton of Cadzow

His son and successor, also named Sir William Baillie, was in 1484, one of the conservators of the peace with England, on the part of Scotland, then concluded at Notingham, and in the year following he was witness to a charter of the lands of Cambusnethan granted by John Lord Somerville to John Somerville, his son, by Mary Baillie his wife, daughter of this Sir William Baillie of Lamington His son and brother were also witnesses to the same charter He had two other daughters, Margaret married to John earl of Suther land, and had issue, and Marion to John Lord Lindsay of the Byres, ancestor to the earls of Crawford

Sir William Baillie of Hoprig and Lamington, his son, in 1492, had a charter under the great seal to him and Marion Home his wife, in conjunct fee and infeftment This lady was the daughter of Sir Patrick Home of Polwarth, comptroller of Scotland in the reign of James the Fourth, and ancestor of the earls of Marchmont, by whom he had Sir William Baillie, his son and heir, and John Baillie, of whom descended the Baillies of St John's Kirk, Lanarkshire, of whom are come the Baillies of Jerviswood and Walston

Sir William Baillie, the eldest son, married his cousin Elizabeth, daughter and one of the heirs of line of John Lord Lindsay of the Byres, by whom he had Sir William his son and heir and a daughter, Janet, married to Sir David Hamilton of Preston

Sir William Baillie of Lamington, his son and successor, was made principal master of the wardrobe to Queen Mary, by a gift under the privy seal, 24th January 1542 He married Janet Hamilton, daughter of James first earl of Arran, and duke of Chatelherault, by whom he had Sir William Baillie, his successor, and a younger son, of whom descended the Baillies of Baghie and Hardington, and their cadets His son, Sir William Baillie, was a steady adherent of Mary, queen of Scots, and fought for her at the battle of Langside, for which he was afterwards forfeited He married Margaret daughter of John Lord Maxwell widow of Archibald earl of Angus, by whom he had one daughter, Margaret, married to her cousin, Edward Maxwell commendator of Dundrennan, third son of Lord Herries of Terregles on whom and his children by his daughter, he settled the estate the heir of entail to assume the name of Baillie, a special act of parliament being procured for the purpose Subsequently he had a son by a Mrs Home, whom, on his wife's death, he married hoping thereby to legitimatize his son He also endeavoured to reduce the settlement which he had made of his estates, so that this son named William, might succeed, but it being proved that he was born while his father's first wife was alive he was not able to break the settlement The young man went over to Germany, and entered into the service of the renowned Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, in which he attained to the rank of major general When the troubles began in Scotland, in 1638, he was with other Scotch general officers in the Swedish service, called home by the Covenanters, to command their army From the minutes of the parliament 1641, it appears that he made some fruitless efforts to reduce the settlement of the estate of Lamington, but in vain [Nesbit's Heraldry Appendix, vol ii p 158] He served as lieutenant-general against the marquis of Montrose, by whom he was defeated at Alford and Kilsyth in 1645 General Baillie married Janet daughter of Sir William Bruce of Glenhouse, by Janet his wife, daughter and heiress of John Baillie of Letham, with whom he got the estate of Letham, in Stirlingshire His eldest son James married Joanna, the daughter and heiress of entail of the first Lord Forrester of Corstorphine and in her right became in 1679 second Lord Forrester General Baillie's second son William, married Lilias, another of the daughters of the first Lord Forrester, by whom he had William who subsequently succeeded as Lord Forrester [See Forrester, lord]

Mr Maxwell who assumed the name of Baillie, grandson and heir of entail of the Lord of Lamington, succeeded to the estate on the death of Sir William Baillie, and was knighted by James the Sixth

Female heirs have often held this estate, but in accordance with the entail the name of Baillie descends with it

Vice-admiral Sir Thomas John Cochrane, K C B, son of admiral the Hon Sir Alexander Forrester Cochrane, G C B, 9th son of the 8th earl of Dundonald, by his first wife, Matilda Wishart Ross, daughter of Lieut-Gen Sir Charles Ross of Balnagown castle baronet, had, with other issue, Alexander Baillie Cochrane, Esq of Lamington, born in November 1816, married Annabella Mary Elizabeth daughter of A R Drummond, Esq of Cadlands, Hants, issue, two daughters

BAILLIE of Jerviswoode the name of an ancient family, now possessors of the eldom of Haddington Charles, Lord Binning eldest son of the sixth earl of Haddington, having married Rachel, youngest daughter and at length sole heiress of George Baillie of Jerviswoode and Mellerstain, then second son, the Hon George Hamilton, on inheriting the estates of his maternal grandfather, assumed the surname and arms of Baillie, and died at Mellerstain, 16th April, 1797, aged 74 His eldest son, George Baillie, Esq of Mellerstain and Jerviswoode, was father with other issue, of George Baillie Hamilton, who succeeded in 1858, as tenth earl of Haddington (see that title, and pages 177 and 179 of this volume)

The BAILLIES of Dochfour Dunain, and others of the name in Inverness-shire are descended from a son of the Lord of Lamington, whose gallantry at the battle of Brechin, fought on the 18th of May 1452, between the earls of Crawford and Huntly was rewarded by the latter on whose side he was, with part of the Castle-land of Inverness

In Ross shire are the Baillies of Lamadale and Redcastle (See page 179 of this volume)

BAILLIE of Polkemmet, originally Paukenmot, the name of an ancient family in Linlithgowshire One of its modern possessors William Baillie advocate, the eldest son of Thomas Baillie, writer to the signet, was raised to the bench in 1792 when he took the title of Lord Polkemmet His son, Sir William Baillie, was in 1823 created a baronet

The surname of Baillie in some instances, may have been derived from the word Bailiff or the term bailie, which latter is in Scotland applied to a magistrate of a burgh

BAILLIE, Robert, a learned Presbyterian minister, was born at Glasgow in 1599 His father, described as a citizen, was a son of Baillie of Jerviston, of the family of Carphin, descended from the Baillies of Lamington, while his mother was related to the Gibsons of Durie He was educated at the university of his native city, where he took the degree of A M Having studied divinity, in due time he was ordained by Archbishop Law of Glasgow Becoming tutor to the son of the earl of Eglinton, that nobleman presented him to the living of Kilwinning in Ayrshire In 1626 he was admitted a regent at Glasgow college About the same time he appears to have prosecuted the study of the oriental languages and was anxious to promote similar studies in the university In 1629 he delivered an oration In

Laudem Linguæ Hebrææ In 1633 he declined the offer of a living in Edinburgh The attempt of Archbishop Laud to introduce the Common Prayer into Scotland met with his firm opposition, and, though episcopally ordained, he joined the presbyterians, and was in 1638 elected, by the presbytery of Irvine, their representative at the Assembly held at Glasgow that year In 1639, as chaplain to Lord Eglinton's regiment, he was with the army of the Covenanters, encamped on Dunse Law, under Alexander Leslie, on which occasion he appears to have caught some portion of the military ardour which then prevailed in the cause of liberty and religion "It would have done you good," he remarks in one of his letters, "to have cast your eyes athort our brave and rich hills as oft as I did, with great contentment and joy, for I was there among the rest, being chosen preacher by the gentlemen of our shire, who came late with Lord Eglinton I furnished to half a dozen of good fellows, muskets and pikes, and to my boy a broadsword I carried myself, as the fashion was, a sword, and a couple of Dutch pistols at my saddle, but, I promise, for the offence of no man, except a robber in the way, for it was our part alone to pray and preach for the encouragement of our countrymen, which I did to my power, most cheerfully" [Baillie's Letters, vol i p 174] He afterwards states, "Our sojours grew in experience of arms, in courage, in favour, daily Every one encouraged another The sight of the nobles, and their beloved pastors, daily raised their hearts The good sermons and prayers, morning and even, under the roof of heaven, to which their drums did call them for bells, the remonstrances very frequent of the goodness of their cause, of their conduct hitherto, by a hand clearly divine, also Lesly's skill and prudence and fortune, made them all as resolute for battle as could be wished We were feared that emulation among our nobles might have done harm, when they should be met in the field, but such was the wisdom and authority of that old, little, crooked soldier, that all, with an incredible submission, from the beginning to the end, gave over themselves to be guided by him, as if he had been great Solyman Had you lent your ear in the morning, or especially at even, and heard in the tents the sound of some singing psalms, some praying, and some reading Scripture, ye would have been refreshed True, there was swearing, and cursing, and brawling, in some quarters, whereat we were grieved, but we hoped, if our camp had been a little settled, to have gotten some way for these disorders, for all of any fashion did regret, and all promised to do their best endeavours for helping all abuses For myself, I never found my mind in better temper than it was all that time since I came from home, till my head was again homeward, for I was as a man who had taken my leave from the world, and was resolved to die in that service without return" [Ibid p 211] The treaty of Berwick, negotiated with Charles in person, produced a temporary cessation of hostilities

In 1640, when the Covenanters again appeared in arms, Mr Baillie joined them, and towards the end of that year, he was sent to London, with other commissioners, to prefer charges against Laud, for the innovations which that prelate had obtruded on the Church of Scotland He had previously published 'The Canterburian's Self-Conviction,' and he also wrote various other controversial pamphlets In 1642 he was, along with Mr David Dickson, appointed joint professor of divinity at Glasgow, where he took the degree of D D and was employed chiefly in teaching the oriental languages, in which he was much skilled In January 1651, on the removal of his colleague to the university of Edinburgh, he obtained the sole professorship So great was the estimation in which he was held, that he had at one time the choice of the divinity chair in the four Scottish universities In 1643 he was elected a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, an interesting account of the proceedings at which he has given in his Correspondence He was a leading member of all the General Assemblies from 1638 to 1653, excepting only those held while he was with the divines at Westminster In 1649 he was sent to Holland as a commissioner from the Church, for the purpose of inviting over Charles the Second, under the limitations of the Covenant After the Restoration, on the 23d January 1661, he was admitted principal of the university of Glasgow He was afterwards offered a bishopric, which he refused When the new archbishop of Glasgow, Andrew Fairfoul, arrived at his metropolitan seat, he did not fail to pay his respects to the learned principal Baillie admits that "he preached on the Sunday, soberly and well" "The chancellor, my noble kind scholar," he afterwards states, "brought all in to see me in my chamber, where I gave them sack and ale, the best of the town The bishop was very courteous to me I excused my not using of his styles, and professed my utter difference from his way, yet behoved to intreat his favour for our affairs of the college, wherein he promised liberally What he will perform time will try" [Letters, vol ii p 461] According to another account, the archbishop visited him during his illness, and was accosted in the following terms "Mr Andrew, I will not call you my lord, King Charles would have made me one of those lords, but I do not find in the New Testament that Christ has any lords in his house" In other respects he is said to have treated the prelate very courteously Mr Baillie died in July 1662, at the age of sixty-three He was the author of several publications, in Latin and English, one of which, entitled 'Opus Historicum et Chronologicum,' published at Amsterdam in 1663, and reprinted in 1668, is mentioned in terms of praise by Spottiswood Excerpts from his 'Letters and Journals, in 2 volumes octavo, were published at Edinburgh in 1755 These contain some valuable and curious details of the history of those times The Letters and Journals themselves are preserved entire in the archives of the Church of Scotland, and in the university of Glasgow Many of these letters are addressed to the author's cousin-german, William Spang, minister of the Scottish staple at Campveer, and afterwards of the English congregation at Middelburg in Zeeland Mr Baillie understood no fewer than thirteen languages, among which were Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Samaritan, Arabic, and Ethiopic

Mr Baillie was twice married His first wife was Lilias Fleming, of the family of Cardarroch, in the parish of Cadder, near Glasgow Of this marriage there were several children, but only five survived him His eldest son, Henry, studied for the church, but never got a living His posterity inherited the estate of Carnbroe, which some years ago was sold by General Baillie The first wife died in June 1653, and in October 1656, he married Mrs Wilkie, a widow, the daughter of Dr Strang, the former principal of Glasgow university By this lady he had a daughter, Margaret, who became the wife of Walkinshaw of Barrowfield, and grandmother of the celebrated Henry Home, Lord Kames Miss Clementina Walkinshaw, the mistress of Prince Charles Stuart, was also a descendant of Mr Baillie's daughter

Mr Wodrow extols Baillie as a prodigy of erudition, and commends his Latin style as suitable to the Augustan age In foreign countries, says Irving, he appears to have enjoyed some degree of celebrity, and is mentioned by Saldenus as a chronologer of established reputation Although amiable and modest in private life, in his controversial writings he displayed much of the characteristic violence of the times

Letters and Journals, containing an Impartial Account of Public Transactions, Civil, Ecclesiastical, and Military, in England and Scotland, from the beginning of the Civil Wars, in 1637, to the year 1662 With an Account of the Author's Life prefixed, and a Glossary annexed, by Robert Aitken Edin 1775, 2 vols 8vo The same edited from the author's MS by David Laing, Esq Edin 1841–2 3 vols 8vo

BAILLIE, ROBERT, of Jerviswood, a distinguished patriot of the reign of Charles the Second, sometimes called the Scottish Sydney, was the son of George Baillie of St John's Kirk, Lanarkshire, a cadet of the Lamington family, who had become proprietor of the estate of Jerviswood in the same county From his known attachment to the cause of civil and religious liberty, he had long been an object of suspicion and dislike to the tyrannical government which then ruled in Scotland The following circumstances first brought upon him the persecution of the council In June 1676, the Reverend Mr Kirkton, a non-conformist minister, who had married the sister of Mr Baillie, was illegally arrested on the High Street of Edinburgh by one Carstairs, an informer employed by Archbishop Sharp, and, not having a warrant, he endeavoured to extort money from his prisoner before he would let him go Baillie being sent for by his brother-in-law, hastened to his relief, and succeeded in rescuing him Kirkton had been inveigled by Carstairs into a mean-looking house near the common prison, and on Mr Baillie with several other persons coming to the house, they found the door locked in the inside Baillie called to Carstairs to open, when Kirkton, encouraged by the voices of friends, desired Carstairs, who after his capture had in vain attempted to procure a warrant, either to set him free, or to produce a warrant for his detention Instead of complying with either request, Carstairs drew a pocket pistol and a struggle ensued between Kirkton and him for its possession Those without hearing the noise and cries of murder, burst open the door, and found Kirkton on the floor and Carstairs sitting on him Mr Baillie drew his sword, and commanded him to rise, asking at the same time if he had any warrant to apprehend Mr Kirkton Carstairs said he had a warrant for conducting him to prison, but he refused to produce it, saying he was not bound to show it Mr Baillie declared that if he saw any warrant against his friend, he would assist in carrying it into execution He offered no violence whatever to Carstairs, but only threatened to sue him for the illegal arrest of his brother-in-law He then, with Mr Kirkton and his friends, left the house Upon the complaint of Carstairs, who had procured an antedated warrant, signed by nine of the privy council, Mr Baillie was called before the council and by the influence of Sharp fined in six thousand merks, (£318, Wodrow says the fine was £500 sterling,) to be imprisoned till paid After being four months in prison he was liberated, on payment of half the fine to Carstairs The above mentioned Mr Kirkton wrote a memoir of the church during his own times, from which Wodrow the historian derived much valuable assistance

In the year 1683, seeing no prospect of relief from the tyranny of the government at home, Mr Baillie and some other gentlemen commenced a negotiation with the patentees of South Carolina, with the view of emigrating with their families to that colony, in this following the example of Cromwell, Hampden, and others previous to the commencement of the Civil wars, but in both instances the attempt was frustrated, and in Mr Baillie's case fatally for himself About the same time that this negotiation was begun, he and several of his co-patriots had entered into a correspondence with the heads of the Protestant party in England, and, on the invitation of the latter, he and five others repaired to London, to consult with the duke of Monmouth, Sydney, Russell, and their friends, as to the plans to be adopted to obtain a change of measures in the government On the discovery of the Rye-House Plot, with which he had no connection, Mr Baillie and several of his friends were arrested, and sent down to be tried in Scotland The hope of a pardon being held out to him, on condition of his giving the government some information, he replied, "They who can make such a proposal to me, neither know me nor my country" Lord John Russell observes 'It is to the honour of Scotland, that no witnesses came forward voluntarily to accuse their associates, as had been done in England" He had married, early in life, a sister of Sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston, who was executed in June 1633, and during his confinement previous to trial, Mr Baillie was not permitted to have the society of his lady, although she offered to go into irons, as an assurance against any attempt of facilitating his escape He was accused of having entered into a conspiracy to raise rebellion, and of being concerned in the Rye-House Plot As his prosecutors could find no evidence against him, he was ordered to free himself by oath, which he refused, and was in consequence fined six thousand pounds sterling His persecutors were not satisfied even with this, for he was still kept shut up in prison, and denied all attendance and assistance, which had such an effect upon his health, as to reduce him almost to the last extremity Bishop Burnet, in his 'History of his own Times,' tells us that the ministers of state were most earnestly set on Baillie's destruction, though he was now in so languishing a condition, that if his death would have satisfied the malice of the court, it seemed to be very near He adds, that "all the while he was in prison, he seemed so composed and cheerful, that his behaviour looked like the reviving of the spirit of the noblest of the old Greeks or Romans, or rather of the primitive Christians, and first martyrs in those best days of the church"

On the 23d December 1684 Mr Baillie was arraigned before the high court of justiciary on the capital charge, when he appeared in a dying condition He was carried to the bar in his nightgown, attended by his sister, the wife of Mr Ker of Graden, who sustained him with cordials, and not being able to stand he was obliged to sit He solemnly denied having been accessary to any conspiracy against the king's or his brother's life or of being an enemy to the monarchy Every expedient being resorted to, to insure his conviction, he was found guilty on the morning of December 24th, and condemned to be hanged that afternoon at the market-cross of Edinburgh, his head to be fixed on the Netherbow Port, and his body to be quartered, the quarters to be exhibited on the gaols of Jedburgh, Lanark, Ayr, and Glasgow On hearing his sentence he said, "My lords, the time is short, the sentence is sharp, but I thank my God who hath made me as fit to die as you are to live" He was attended to the scaffold by his faithful and affectionate sister He was so weak that he required to be assisted in mounting the ladder As soon as he was up he said, "My faint zeal for the Protestant religion hath brought me to this," but the drums interrupted him He had prepared a speech to be delivered on the scaffold, but was prevented "Thus," says Bishop Burnet, "a learned and worthy gentleman, after twenty months' hard usage, was brought to such a death, in a way so full, in all the steps of it, of the spirit and practice of the courts of the Inquisition, that one is tempted to think that the methods taken in it were suggested by one well studied, if not practised in them" Dr Owen, who was acquainted with Baillie, writing to a friend in Scotland before his death, said of him, "You have truly men of great spirit among you, there is, for a gentleman, Mr Baillie of Jerviswood, a person of the greatest abilities I ever almost met with" Mr Baillie's family was for the time completely ruined by his forfeiture His son George, after his execution, was obliged to take refuge in Holland He afterwards returned with the prince of Orange, in 1688, when he was restored to his estates He married Grizel, the daughter of Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth

George Baillie, Esq of Jerviswoode and Mellerstain, (born in 1763, died in 1841,) nephew of the seventh earl of Haddington, had issue, 1 George Baillie Hamilton, who succeeded his cousin as tenth earl of Haddington, (see page 174 of this volume,) 2 Eliza, born in 1803, married the second marquis of Breadalbane, 3 Charles Baillie, born in 1804, lord-advocate 1858, a lord of session 1859 under the title of Lord Jerviswoode, married, with issue, 4 Robert major in the army, 5 Rev John, a canon of York, 6 Captain Thomas, R N, 7 Mary, married George John James Lord Haddo, eldest son of George, fourth earl of Aberdeen, with issue, 8 Georgina, married in 1835, Lord Polwarth with issue, died in 1859, 9 Catherine Charlotte, married in 1840 fourth earl of Ashburnham, with issue, 10 Grisel, born in 1822

Evan Baillie, an eminent merchant of Bristol, born in Inverness-shire in 1742, died at Dochfour in that county, in June 1835, left two sons, Colonel Hugh Baillie of Redcastle and Tarradale, Ross-shire, and James Evan Baillie, Esq of Culduthel and Glenelg

BAILLIE, JOHN, of Leys, a distinguished East Indian officer, born in Inverness-shire in 1778, appointed a cadet on the Bengal establishment in 1790 He received the commission of ensign in March 1793, and of lieutenant in November 1794 In 1797 he was employed by Lord Teignmouth to translate from the Arabic language an important work on the Mohammedan law, compiled by Sir William Jones On the first formation of the college of Fort-William, about 1800, he was appointed professor of the Arabic and Persian languages, and of the Mohammedan law in that institution Soon after the commencement of the war with the confederated Mahratta chieftains in 1803, he offered his services as a volunteer in the field, and proceeded to join the army then employed in the siege of Agra His captain's commission is dated 30th September 1803 The precarious situation of affairs in the province of Bundlecund requiring the superintendence of an officer, qualified to conduct various important and difficult negotiations, on which depended the establishment of the British authority in that province, he was appointed by the commander-in-chief to the arduous and responsible office of political agent It was necessary to occupy a considerable tract of hostile country, in the name of the Peishwa, to suppress a combination of refractory chiefs, and to conciliate others, to superintend the operations, both of the British troops and of their native auxiliaries, and to establish the British civil power and the collection of revenue, in this province, which was not only menaced with foreign invasion, but disturbed with internal commotion All these objects were, by the zeal and activity of Captain Baillie, accomplished within three months In a letter to the court of directors, it was stated as the opinion of the governor-general in council, that on occasion of the invasion of the province by the troops of Ameer Khan, in May and June 1804, "the British authority in Bundlecund was alone preserved by his fortitude, ability, and influence" His services were continued in the capacity of a member of the commission appointed in July 1804, for the administration of the affairs of Bundlecund, and excepting the short interval of the last five months of 1805, which he spent at the presidency, he continued engaged in this important service until the summer of 1807 He thus effected the peaceable transfer to the British dominions of a territory yielding an annual revenue of eighteen lacs of rupees, (£225,000 sterling,) with the sacrifice only of a jaghire, of little more than one lac of rupees per annum In July 1807, on the death of Colonel Collins, he was appointed resident at Lucknow, where he remained till the end of 1815, and in June 1818, he was placed on the retired list. He was promoted to the rank of major in the Bengal army in January 1811, and to that of lieutenant-colonel in July 1815 After his return to England, he was, in 1820, elected M P for Hedon, for which he sat during two parliaments, until the dissolution of 1830 In that year he was returned for the Inverness burghs, and re-elected in 1831 and 1832 He had been chosen a director of the East India Company on the 28th of May 1823 He died in London, on the 20th April 1833, aged sixty —Annual Obituary

BAILLIE, MATTHEW, M D, a distinguished anatomist and the first physician of his time, was born October 27, 1761, in the manse of Shotts, Lanarkshire He was the son of the Rev James Baillie, D D, then minister of that parish, subsequently of Bothwell, on the Clyde, in the same county, and afterwards professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, a descendant, it is supposed, of the family of Baillie of Jerviswood On his mother's side he was also related to eminent individuals, Dr William Hunter and Mr John Hunter, the anatomists, being her brothers, while his own sister was the highly gifted and celebrated Joanna Baillie In 1773 he was sent to Glasgow college, where he studied for five years, and so greatly distinguished himself, that in 1778 he was removed, on Snell's foundation, to Baliol college, Oxford In 1688, Mr John Snell, with a view to support episcopacy in Scotland, devised to trustees the estate of Ufflton, near Leamington, in Warwickshire, for educating in that college, Scots students from the university of Glasgow This fund now affords one hundred and thirty-two pounds per annum to each of ten exhibitions, and one of these it was young Baillie's good fortune, in consequence of his great attainments, to secure At the university of Oxford he took his degrees in arts and medicine In 1780, while still keeping his terms at Oxford, he became the pupil of his uncles, and when in London he resided with Dr William Hunter, who, childless himself, seems to have adopted him as a son, and to have fixed upon him as his successor in the lecture-room, in which, at this period, he sometimes assisted Easy in his manners, and open in his communications, he soon became a favourite with the students, and greatly relieved Dr Hunter of the arduous task of teaching in his latter years The sudden death of the latter, in March 1783, soon left him, in conjunction with Mr Cruickshank, his late uncle's assistant, to support the reputation of the anatomical theatre, in Great Windmill Street, which had been founded by his uncle [Memoirs of Eminent Physicians and Surgeons London, 1818, p 37]

Dr Baillie began his duties as an anatomical teacher in 1784, and he continued to lecture, with the highest reputation, till 1799 In 1787 he was elected physician to St George's Hospital In 1790, having previously taken his degree of M D at Oxford, he was admitted a fellow of the Royal college of Physicians He was also elected a fellow of the Royal Society, to whose Transactions he had contributed two anatomical papers He was also chosen president of the new medical society The subject of morbid anatomy seems to have early attracted his attention, and the valuable museum of his uncle, to which he had so full access, opened to him an ample field for its investigation Before his time, no regular system or method of arrangement had been pursued by anatomical writers, which could render this study useful By a nice and accurate observation of the morbid appearances of every part of the body, and the peculiar circumstances which in life distinguish them, he was enabled to place in a comprehensive and clear compass, an extensive and valuable mass of information, before his time in a confused and undigested state In 1795 he published his valuable work, which acquired for him a European fame, entitled 'The Morbid Anatomy of some of the most important parts of the Human Body' which he subsequently enlarged, and which was translated into French and German, and has gone through innumerable editions In 1799 he commenced the publication of 'A Series of Engravings to illustrate some parts of Morbid Anatomy,' from drawings by Mr Clift, the conservator of the Hunterian Museum in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, which splendid and useful work was completed in 1802

he was so successful that he was known in one year to have received ten thousand pounds in fees His work on the Morbid Anatomy of the Human Body had placed his character high as a pathognomic physician, and every difficult case in high life came under his review So fixed was his reputation in public opinion, that even his leaving London for a period of some months at a time made no alteration in the request for him at his return—not usually the case with the general run of his professional brethren Besides publishing 'An Anatomical Description of the Gravid Uterus,' he contributed many important papers to the Philosophical Transactions and medical collections of the day Having been called in to attend the duke of Gloucester, whose malady however proved past cure, his mode of treatment gave so much satisfaction to the family of his royal highness, that it is thought to have paved the way for his being commanded to join in consultation the court physicians, in the case of George the Third, during his mental aberration, and he continued a principal director of the royal treatment during the protracted illness of the king Amid the mingled hopes and fears which agitated the nation for so long a time, Dr Baillie, from the known candour of his nature, was looked up to with confidence as one whose opinion could be relied upon The air of a court, so apt to change the sentiments, and cause the individual to turn with every political gale, was considered incapable of bending the stubbornness of his tried integrity, and it is even said that his opinion differed often from that of his more politic colleagues [Memoirs of Eminent Physicians and Surgeons, p 40] His conduct seems to have given such high satisfaction that on the first vacancy in 1810, he was appointed one of the physicians to the king, with the offer of a baronetcy, which he declined

Dr Baillie died on 23d September 1823, leaving to the London College of Physicians the whole of his extensive and valuable collection of preparations with six hundred pounds to keep it in order He had married early in life Sophia, sister of Lord Denman, late lord chief justice of the court of Queen's Bench, by whom he had one son and one daughter His estate of Duntisbourne in Gloucestershire went to his son He left large sums to medical institutions and public charities While yet a young man, his uncle William having had an unfortunate misunderstanding with his brother John Hunter, left at his death the small family estate of Longcalderwood in Lanarkshire, to his nephew, in prejudice of his own brother, to whom Dr Baillie restored it, as being of right his surviving uncle's

The leading features of Dr Baillie's character were openness and candour He never flattered the prejudices of his patients, or pretended to a knowledge which he did not possess He knew well the ravages and consequences of disease, and how difficult it is to rectify derangements of structure when once permanently formed In money matters his liberality was remarkable He has often been known to return fees where he conceived the patient could not afford them, and also to refuse a larger sum than what he considered was his due

Shortly after his death an elegant tribute to his memory was delivered to the students of anatomy and surgery in Great Windmill Street, London, by his eminent successor in that lecture-school, Sir Charles Bell "You, who are just entering on your studies," he said, "cannot be aware of the importance of one man to the character of a profession, the members of which extend over the civilized world You cannot yet estimate the thousand chances there are against a man rising to the degree of eminence which Dr Baillie attained, nor know how slender the hope of seeing his place supplied in our day It was under this roof that Dr Baillie formed himself, and here the profession learned to appreciate him He had no desire to get rid of the national peculiarities of language, or, if he had, he did not perfectly succeed Not only did the language of his native land linger on his tongue, but its recollections clung to his heart, and to the last, amidst the splendour of his professional life, and the seductions of a court, he took a hearty interest in the happiness and the eminence of his original country But there was a native sense and strength of mind which more than compensated for the want of the polish and purity of English pronunciation He possessed the valuable talent of making an abstruse and difficult subject plain, his prelections were remarkable for that lucid order and clearness of expression which proceed from a perfect conception of the subject, and he never permitted any vanity of display to turn him from his great object of conveying information in the simplest and most intelligible way, and so as to be most useful to his pupils It is to be regretted that his associate in the lectureship made his duties here unpleasant to him, and I have his own authority for saying that, but for this, he would have continued to lecture for some years longer Dr Baillie presented his collection of morbid specimens to the College of Physicians, with a sum of money to be expended in keeping them in order, and it is rather remarkable that Dr Hunter, his brother, and his nephew, should have left to their country such noble memorials as these In the college of Glasgow may be seen the princely collection of Dr Hunter, the college of surgeons have assumed new dignity, surrounded by the collection of Mr Hunter—more like the successive works of many men enjoying royal patronage or national support, than the work of a private surgeon, and lastly, Dr Baillie has given to the College of Physicians, at least, that foundation for a museum of morbid anatomy, which we hope to see completed by the activity of the members of that body Dr Baillie's success was creditable to the time It may be said of him, as it was said of his uncle John, 'every time I hear of his increasing eminence it appears to me like the fulfilling of poetical justice, so well has he deserved success by his labours for the advantage of humanity' Yet I cannot say that there was not in his manner sufficient reason for his popularity Those who have introduced him to families from the country must have observed in them a degree of surprise on first meeting the physician of the court There was no assumption of character or warmth of interest exhibited He appeared what he really was—one come to be a dispassionate observer, and to do that duty for which he was called But then, when he had to deliver his opinion, and more especially when he had to communicate with the family, there was a clearness in his statement, a reasonableness in all he said, and a convincing simplicity in his manner that had the most soothing and happy influence on minds, excited and almost irritated by suffering and the apprehension of impending misfortune After so many years spent in the cultivation of the most severe science—for surely anatomy and pathology may be so considered—and in the performance of professional duties on the largest scale, —for he was consulted not only by those who personally knew him, but by individuals of all nations,—he had, of late years, betaken himself to other studies, as a pastime and recreation He attended more to the general progress of science He took particular pleasure in mineralogy, and even from the natural history of the articles of the Pharmacopœia he appears to have derived a new source of gratification By a certain difficulty which he put in the way of those who wished to consult him, and by seeing them only in company with other medical attendants, he procured for himself, in the latter part of his life, that leisure which his health required, and which suited the maturity of his reputation, while he intentionally left the field of practice open to new aspirants When you add to what I have said of the celebrity of the uncles William and John Hunter, the example of Dr Baillie, and farther consider the eminence of his sister Joanna Baillie, excelled by none of her sex in any age, you must conclude with me that the family has exhibited a singular extent and variety of talent Dr Baillie's age was not great, if measured by length of years, he had not completed his sixty-third year, but his life was long in usefulness He lived long enough to complete the model of a professional life In the studies of youth, in the serious and manly occupations of the middle period of life, in the upright, humane, and honourable character of a physician, and above all in that dignified conduct which became a man mature in years and honours, he has left a finished example to his profession" [Annual Register for 1823]

Dr Baillie would never allow my likeness of himself to be published He sat to Hoppner for his portrait, in order to make a present of it to his sisters, but finding that this picture had been put into the hands of an engraver, he interfered to prevent its being used by him, as he exceedingly disliked the idea of seeing his face in the printshop windows The engraving, however, was already completed, and his sense of justice would not allow him to deprive the engraver of the fruits of his labour He therefore purchased the copperplate, and permitted only a few copies to be taken from it, which were presented to friends His collected medical works were published in 1825, with a memoir of his life by James Wardrop, surgeon

BAILLIE, JOANNA, an eminent poetess and acknowledged improver of English poetic diction, sister of Dr Matthew Baillie, the subject of the preceding memoir, was born in 1762 Her birthplace was the manse of Bothwell, a parish on the banks of the Clyde, in the Lower ward of Lanarkshire, of which her father, the Rev James Baillie, D D, afterwards professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, was at that time minister She was the younger of his two daughters Within earshot of the rippling of the broad waters of the Clyde, she spent her early days That river, confined within lofty banks, makes a fine sweep round the magnificent ruins of Bothwell Castle, and forms the semicircular declivity called Bothwell Bank, that "blooms so fair," celebrated in ancient song, "meet nurse for a poetic child" In the immediate vicinity is "Bothwell Brig," where the Covenanters were defeated in June 1679

"Where Bothwell Bridge connects the margin steep,
And Clyde below runs silent, strong, and deep,
The hardy peasant, by oppression driven
To battle, deem'd his cause the cause of Heaven, Unskill'd in arms, with useless courage stood,
While gentle Monmouth grieved to shed his blood"

After her father's death, her mother, who was a daughter of Mr Hunter of Longcalderwood, a small estate in the parish of East Kilbride, in the same county, went there to reside, with her two daughters, Agnes and Joanna, but when the latter was about twenty years of age, Mrs

Baillie removed with them to London, to be near her son, Dr Mathew Baillie, and her two brothers, Dr William Hunter and Mr John Hunter, the eminent anatomists In London or the neighbourhood Miss Baillie resided for the remainder of her life, she and her sister having for many years kept house together at Hampstead The incidents of her life are few, being confined almost exclusively to the publication of her works Her earliest pieces appeared anonymously Her name first became known by her dramas on the Passions The first volume was published in 1798, under the title of 'A Series of Plays, in which it is attempted to delineate the stronger passions of the mind, each passion being the subject of a tragedy and a comedy' In a long introductory discourse on the subject of the drama, she explains her principal purpose to be to make each play subservient to the development of some one particular passion "Let," she says, "one simple trait of the human heart, one expression of passion, genuine and true to nature, be introduced, and it will stand forth alone in the boldness of reality, whilst the false and unnatural around it fades away upon every side, like the rising exhalations of the morning" In thus, however, restricting her dramas to the illustration of only one passion in each, she excluded herself from the varied range of character which is necessary to the acting drama, and circumscribed the proper business of the piece, hence, her dramas are more adapted for perusal than for representation Nevertheless, their merits were instantly acknowledged, and a second edition of this her first volume was called for in a few months In 1802, she published a second volume of her plays In 1804 she produced a volume of miscellaneous dramas, and the third volume of her plays on the Passions appeared in 1812 All these raised her name to a proud pre-eminence in the world of literature, and she was considered one of the most highly gifted of British poetesses

Like Byron, however, Miss Baillie early came under the censure of the Edinburgh Review, but she turned a deaf ear to its upbraidings, and halted not in the path which she had traced out for herself, at its bidding Byron's spirit was aroused, and he retaliated in the most bitter satire in the English language, Miss Baillie placed the unjust judgment quietly aside, and silently went on her way rejoicing On the appearance of her second volume of Plays, a very unfavourable opinion was expressed of them in the fourth number of the Edinburgh Review, namely that for July 1803, and her theory of the unity of passion unequivocally condemned In the thirty-eighth number, that for February 1812, when the third volume had appeared, the reviewer was still more severe Her views were styled "narrow and peculiar," and her scheme "singularly perverse and fantastic" Miss Baillie's plan of producing twin dramas, a tragedy and a comedy, on each of the passions, was thoroughly disapproved of by Mr Jeffrey, who appeared to think that her genius was rather lyrical than dramatic In his estimation her dramas combined the faults of the French and English schools, the poverty of incident and uniformity of the one with the irregularity and homeliness of the other, her plots were improbable, and her language a bad imitation of that of the elder dramatists In this verdict the literary public have not agreed, and the bitter feeling in which the review was written, as in the still more memorable case of Byron, tended to defeat its own purpose It was well remarked by one of the impartial critics of Miss Baillie's writings, that in her honourable pursuit of fame, she did not "bow the knee to the idolatries of the day," but strong in the confidence of native genius, she held her undeviating course, with nature for her instructress and virtue for her guide

Amongst those who, from their first appearance, had expressed an enthusiastic admiration of her plays on the Passions, was Mr (afterwards Sir) Walter Scott, who, when in London in 1806, was introduced to Miss Baillie by Mr Sotheby, the translator of Oberon The acquaintance thus begun soon ripened into affectionate intimacy, and for many years they maintained a close epistolary correspondence with each other Between these two eminent individuals, there were in fact many striking points of resemblance They had the same lyrical fire and enthusiasm, the same love of legendary lore, and the same attachment to the manners and customs, to the hills and woods of their native Scotland Many of Scott's letters to her are inserted in Lockhart's Life of the great novelist.

During a visit which Miss Baillie paid to Scotland in the year 1808, she resided for a week or two with Mr Scott at Edinburgh While in Glasgow, previous to her proceeding to that city, she had sought out Mr John Struthers, the author of the Poor Man's Sabbath, then a working shoemaker, a native of the parish of East Kilbride, whom she had known in his early years Mr Struthers, in the memoirs of his own life (published with his poems in 2 vols in 1850), thus commemorates this event "In the year 1808 the author had the high honour and the singular pleasure of being visited at his own house in the Gorbals of Glasgow by Joanna Baillie, then on a visit to her native Scotland, who had known him so intimately in his childhood He has not forgotten, and never can forget, how the sharp and clear tones of her sweet voice thrilled through his heart, when at the outer door she, inquiring for him, pronounced his name—far less could he forget the divine glow of benevolent pleasure that lighted up her thin and pale, but finely expressive face, when, still holding him by the hand she had been cordially shaking, she looked around his small, but clean apartment, gazed upon his fair wife and his then lovely children, and exclaimed that he was surely the most happy of poets" Through Miss Baillie's recommendation, Mr Scott brought Mr Struthers' 'Poor Man's Sabbath' under the notice of Mr Constable, the eminent publisher, who was induced to bring out a third edition of that excellent poem, consisting of a thousand copies, for which he paid the worthy author thirty pounds, with two dozen copies of the work for himself

In 1810, 'The Family Legend,' a tragedy by Miss Baillie, founded on a Highland tradition, was brought out at the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh That theatre was then under the management of Mr Henry Siddons, the son of the great Mrs Siddons, who had married Miss Murray, the sister of Mr William Henry Murray, his successor as manager and lessee, and the granddaughter of Murray of Broughton, the secretary of the Pretender during the rebellion of 1745 The Family Legend of Joanna Baillie was the first new play produced by Mr Siddons, and Scott took a great interest in its representation We learn from Lockhart's Life of Scott that he was consulted in all the minutiæ of the costume, attended every rehearsal, and supplied the prologue The epilogue was written by Henry Mackenzie In a letter to the authoress, dated January 30th, 1810, Scott thus communicates the result

"My Dear Miss Baillie,—You have only to imagine all that you could wish to give success to a play, and your conceptions will still fall short of the complete and decided triumph of the Family Legend The house was crowded to a most extraordinary degree, many people had come from your native capital of the west, everything that pretended to distinction, whether from rank or literature, was in the boxes, and in the pit such an aggregate mass of humanity, as I have seldom if ever witnessed in the same space It was quite obvious from the beginning, that the cause was to be very fairly tried before the public, and that if anything went wrong, no effort, even of your numerous and zealous friends, could have had much influence in guiding or restraining the general feeling Some good-natured persons had been kind enough to propagate reports of a strong opposition, which, though I considered them as totally groundless, did not by any means lessen the extreme anxiety with which I waited the rise of the curtain But in a short time I saw there was no ground whatever for apprehension, and yet I sat the whole time shaking for fear a scene-shifter, or a carpenter, or some of the subaltern actors, should make some blunder, and interrupt the feeling of deep and general interest which soon seized on the whole pit, box, and gallery, as Mr Bayes has it The scene on the rock struck the utmost possible effect into the audience, and you heard nothing but sobs on all sides The banquet-scene was equally impressive, and so was the combat Of the greater scenes, that between Lorn and Helen in the castle of Maclean, that between Helen and her lover, and the examination of Maclean himself in Argyle's castle, were applauded to the very echo Siddons announced the play 'for the rest of the week,' which was received not only with a thunder of applause, but with cheering and throwing up of hats and handkerchiefs Mrs Siddons supported her part incomparably, although just recovered from the indisposition mentioned in my last Siddons himself played Lorn very well indeed, and moved and looked with great spirit A Mr Terry, who promises to be a fine performer, went through the part of the Old Earl with great taste and effect For the rest I cannot say much, excepting that from highest to lowest they were most accurately perfect in their parts, and did their very best Malcolm de Gray was tolerable but stickish—Maclean came off decently—but the conspirators were sad hounds You are, my dear Miss Baillie, too much of a democrat in your writings, you allow life, soul, and spirit to these inferior creatures of the drama, and expect they will be the better of it Now it was obvious to me, that the poor monsters, whose mouths are only of use to spout the vapid blank verse which your modern playwright puts into the part of the confident and subaltern villain of his piece, did not know what to make of the energetic and poetical diction which even these subordinate departments abound with in the Legend As the play greatly exceeded the usual length (lasting till half-past ten), we intend, when it is repeated to-night, to omit some of the passages where the weight necessarily fell on the weakest of our host, although we may hereby injure the detail of the plot The scenery was very good, and the rock, without appearance of pantomime, was so contrived as to place Mrs Siddons in a very precarious situation to all appearance The dresses were more tawdry than I should have judged proper, but expensive and showy I have got my brother John's Highland reciuiting party to reinforce the garrison of Inverary, and as they mustered beneath the porch of the castle, and seemed to fill the court-yard behind, the combat scene had really the appearance of reality Siddons has been most attentive, anxious, assiduous, and docile, and had drilled his troops so well that the prompter's aid was unnecessary, and I do not believe he gave a single hint the whole night, nor were there any false or ridiculous accents or gestures even among the underlings, though God knows they fell often far short of the true spirit Mrs Siddons spoke the epilogue extremely well the prologue, which I will send you in its revised state, was also very well received Mrs Scott sends her kindest compliments of congratulation, she had a party of thirty friends in one small box, which she was obliged to watch like a clucking hen till she had gathered her whole flock, for the crowd was insufferable I am going to see the Legend to night, when I shall enjoy it quietly, for last night I was so much interested in its reception that I cannot say I was at leisure to attend to the feelings arising from the representation itself People are dying to read it If you think of suffering a single edition to be printed to gratify their curiosity, I will take care of it But I do not advise this, because until printed no other theatres can have it before you give leave My kind respects attend Miss Agnes Baillie, and believe me ever your obliged and faithful servant,

WALTER SCOTT"

The Family Legend had a run of fourteen nights, and was soon after printed and published by James and John Ballantyne [Lockhart's Life of Scott, pp 186, 187] It was afterwards brought out on the London stage, and the authoress upon one occasion when, in the year 1815, it was performed at one of the London theatres, was accompanied to the theatre by Lord Byron and Mr and Mrs Scott, who were then in London, to witness the representation

In 1823 she published a 'Collection of Poetical Miscellanies,' which was well received It contained, with some pieces of her own, Scott's dramatic sketch of Macduff's Cross, besides several poems by Mrs Hemans, some jeux d'esprits by the late Catherine Fanshawe, and a ballad entitled Polydore, originally published in the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1810, and written by Mr William Howison, author of an 'Essay on the Sentiments of Attraction, Adaptation, and Variety'

In 1836, Miss Baillie published three more volumes of plays, all illustrative of her favourite theory "Even in advanced age," says a writer in the North American Review for October 1835, "we see Miss Baillie still tracing the fiery streams of passion to their sources,—searching into the hidden things of that dark mystery, the heart,—and arranging her startling revelations in the imposing garb of rich and classical poetry" Among the best of her dramatic writings are the tragedies of Count Basil, and de Montfort Sir Walter Scott has eulogised "Basil's love and Montfort's hate," as something like a revival of the inspired strain of Shakspeare

De Montfort was brought out on the London stage by John Philip Kemble, in 1801, soon after its publication The great Mrs Siddons performed the part of Lady Jane, and both her acting in the piece as well as that of her brother, Mr Kemble, was so powerful that it ought to have sustained the play had there been any stage vitality in it At that period it was acted for eleven nights It was then laid aside till 1821, when it was again produced, to exhibit Kean in the principal character, but that great actor declared that though a fine poem, it would never be an acting play Mr Campbell, in his life of Mrs Siddons, records this remark, and makes the following very just observations Miss Baillie "brought to the drama a wonderful union of many precious requisites for a perfect tragic writer, deep feeling, a picturesque imagination, and, except where theory and system misled her, a correct taste, that made her diction equally remote from the stiffness of the French, and the flaccid flatness of the German school, a better stage style than any that we have heard since the time of Shakspeare, or, at least, since that of his immediate disciples But to compose a tragedy that shall at once delight the lovers of poetry and the populace is a prize in the lottery of fame, which has literally been only once drawn during the whole of the last century, and that was by the author of Douglas If Joanna Baillie had known the stage practically, she would never have attached the importance which she does to the development of single passions in single tragedies, and she would have invented more stirring incidents to justify the passion of her characters, and to give them that air of fatality which, though peculiarly predominant in the Greek drama, will also be found to a certain extent, in all successful tragedies Instead of this, she contrives to make all the passions of her main characters proceed from the wilful natures of the beings themselves Their feelings are not precipitated by circumstances, like the stream down a declivity, that leaps from rock to rock, but for want of incident, they seem often like water on a level, without a propelling impulse" [Life of Mrs Siddons, vol ii p 254] The style of her dramas, however, is regular and vigorous, her plots, though simple, exhibit both originality and carefulness of construction, and altogether her plays display a deep and thorough knowledge of the workings of the human heart The following is a portrait of Joanna Baillie from a painting by Sir W Newton

As an authoress, the leading feature of her genius was simple greatness She had no arts, artifice, or pretension Profound subtlety, a deep penetration into character, and a wonderful fertility of invention, mark all her dramas Her touches of natural description, the wild legendary grandeur which at times floats around her, the candour, charity, and womanliness of her nature, and the strong yet delicate imagery in which she enshrines her thoughts, with her sound morality and the simplicity and force of her language, impart a pleasing charm to her writings, and distinguish them from those of all her contemporaries

Besides her dramas, Miss Baillie was the authoress of various poems and songs, on miscellaneous subjects, which were collected and published in one volume in 1841 These are, in general, remarkable for their truth and feeling and harmony of diction, qualities in which she was surpassed by few modern poets Among the best of her poems are, one entitled "The Kitten," which first appeared in an early volume of the Edinburgh Annual Register, and the Birthday address to her sister, Miss Agnes Baillie, both of which have been often quoted The latter is equal, if not in some respects superior, to the fine lines of Cowper, written "On receiving his Mother's Picture" The most popular of her songs are, "The Gowan Glitters on the Sward," "Welcome Bat and Owlet Gray," "Good Night, Good Night," "It fell on a Morning," which originally appeared in the collection of Scotch songs called 'The Harp of Caledonia,' edited by John Struthers, and published in Glasgow in 1821, "Woo'd and Married and a'," and "Hooly and Fairly" The two latter were written for Mr George Thomson's celebrated collection of Scotch melodies, as was also "When white was my o'erlay as foam o' the linn," a new version of "Todlin Hame" Her Scotch songs, distinguished by their simplicity, their quiet pawky humour, and pastoral tenderness, are known by heart by all Scotsmen

Miss Baillie passed the greater portion of her life in retirement, and in her latter years in strict seclusion, at her villa at Hampstead, where she died February 23, 1851, in her 89th year, retaining all her faculties to the last Her sister, who was also a poetess, and who died April 27, 1861, in her 101st year, always resided with her The following lines are from the beginning of an 'Address to her Sister Agnes, on her Birthday'

"Dear Agnes, gleamed with joy and dashed with tears, O'er us have glided almost sixty years,
Since we on Bothwell's bonny braes were seen,
By those whose eyes long closed in death have been,
Two tiny imps, who scarcely stooped to gather
The slender harebell on the purple heather,
No taller than the foxglove's spiky stem,
That dew of morning studs with silver gem
Then every butterfly that crossed our view
With joyful shout was greeted as it flew,
And moth, and ladybird, and beetle bright,
In sheeny gold, were each a wondrous sight
Then as we paddled barefoot, side by side,
Among the sunny shallows of the Clyde,
Minnows or spotted parr, with twinkling fin Swimming in mazy rings the pool within A thrill of gladness through our bosoms sent,
Seen in the power of early wonderment
Active and ardent, to my fancy's eye, Thou still art young, in spite of time gone by Though oft of patience brief and temper keen,
Well may it please me, in life's latter scene,
To think what now thou art, and long to me hast been'

The high literary fame which she acquired by her works never succeeded in drawing her generally into society Her life was pure and virtuous in the highest degree, and characterised by the most consummate integrity, kindness, and active benevolence Gentle and unassuming to all, she possessed an unchangeable simplicity of manner and character, and while she counted amongst her friends most of her contemporaries celebrated for their genius or their virtues, many foreigners, from various parts of Europe, on their coming to England, sought introductions to her

The series of plays on the passions consists of Count Basil, a tragedy, portraying love, The Trial, a comedy, De Montfort, a tragedy, depicting hatred, with The Election, a comedy, Ethelwald, a tragedy, Part I, the same, Part II —both on ambition, Orra, a tragedy founded on fear, The Dream, a tragedy in prose, in three acts, The Siege, a comedy in five acts, The Beacon, a serious musical drama in two acts, the subject hope, interspersed with some pleasing songs, Romiero, a tragedy, The Alienated Manor, a comedy, and Henriquez, a tragedy

Her miscellaneous plays are Rayner, a tragedy, The Country Marriage, a comedy, Constantia Paleologus, or the last of the Cæsars, a tragedy; The Family Legend, a tragedy, The Martyr, a drama, The Separation, a tragedy, The Stripling, a tragedy, in prose, The Phantom, a musical drama, Enthusiasm, a comedy, Witchcraft, a tragedy in prose, The Homicide, a tragedy in prose, with occasional passages in verse, The Bride, a drama, and The Match, a comedy None of these are acting pieces The Separation, and Henriquez, one of her series on the passions, were attempted on the London stage, but without success

Her Miscellaneous works consist of Metrical Legends, Songs and Poems on general subjects A volume of her fugitive verses was published in 1840 Many of the early specimens of her genius were collected in this volume Under the head of Miscellaneous were classed various pieces divided into Songs, Romantic and other ballads, and poems of a tender domestic character Among them were Lord John of the East, Malcolm's Heir, Sir Maurice, the Moody Seer, and the tragic and appalling ballad of the Elder Tree, also, Lines on the Death of Sir Walter Scott The third portion of the volume contained subjects of a devotional character, some of these it appears, as she states in her preface, were written for "the kirk, at the request of an eminent member of the Scotch church, at a time when it was in contemplation to compile, by authority, a new collection of hymns and sacred poetry for the general use of parochial congregations" The plan meeting with opposition was, however, relinquished

A complete edition of Miss Baillie's works was published by Messrs A Longman and Co, in 1851, soon after her death In this volume is inserted a poem entitled Ahalva Baee, which had been previously printed for private circulation, and amongst the fugitive verses are some short poems never before published The following is a list of her productions —

BAILLIE, Lady Grizel, see Home, Lady Grizel

BAILZIE, or Baillie, William, a physician of the fifteenth century, studied medicine in Italy with so much reputation that he was first made rector, and afterwards professor of medicine in the university of Bologna, about 1484 He adopted the Galenic system in preference to the Empiric, and wrote 'Apologia pro Galeni Doctrina contra Empiricos,' Lyons, 1550 According to Dempster, he returned to Scotland and died there, but the date of his death is not recorded In his Scots writers, Mackenzie supposes him to be the author also of an octavo book, called 'De Quantitate Syllabarum Græcarum et de Dialectis,' published in 1600

Bain, a surname derived from the Gaelic word bane, signifying white, or of a fair complexion, as Donald Bane, who usurped the Scottish throne after the death of his brother Malcolm Canmore The name is sometimes spelled Baine, as in the following instance, and sometimes Bayne, as in that of Bayne, Alexander, the first professor of Scots Law in the university of Edinburgh, the subject of a subsequent notice

BAINE, James, A M, an eminent minister of the Relief communion, and one of the fathers of that church, was the son of the minister of Bonhill, Dumbartonshire, where he was born in the year 1710 He received the first part of his education at the parish school, and afterwards studied for the church at the university of Glasgow Having been licensed to preach, he was presented by the duke of Montrose to the church of Killearn, the adjoining parish to Bonhill In 1756 he became one of the ministers of the High church of Paisley, and in the following year he had the celebrated Dr Witherspoon for his colleague He was intimate with many of the most distinguished clergymen in the Church of Scotland, and so early as 1745 his name is mentioned as having been warmly engaged among his parishioners in Killearn, in promoting a remarkable revival of religion in the west of Scotland at that period While he remained a minister of the Established church, he was a zealous defender of her liberty, independence, and legal rights, and a determined opponent of what he considered ecclesiastical tyranny The conduct of the General Assembly in 1752 in deposing the Rev Thomas Gillespie of Carnock, from the office of the ministry, as well as some more recent proceedings, in his estimation infringed on the cause of religious liberty, and had a powerful influence in inducing him to resign his pastoral charge at Paisley To this he was also led by the following circumstance The office of session clerk of the parish having become vacant, a dispute occurred as to whether the kirk session or the town council had the right of appointment The case came to be litigated in the court of session, and was finally decided in favour of the town council Mr Baine took the part of the kirk session, his colleague of the members of the town council, which caused a painful misunderstanding between them He therefore came to the resolution of resigning his charge, which he did in a letter to the presbytery of date 10th February 1766, and in consequence was cited to appear before the General Assembly 29th May of that year Having appeared at the bar of the Assembly, and been heard at considerable length in an elaborate and able defence, he was declared by the venerable court to be no longer a minister of the Church of Scotland Immediately after his deposition Mr Baine published a pamphlet entitled 'Memoirs of modern Church Reformation, or the History of the General Assembly, 1766, with a brief account and vindication of the Presbytery of Relief' The publication consisted of letters to a reverend friend, in which he gave an amusing account of the procedure of the supreme ecclesiastical court in his case, and indulged in some acrimonious remarks on the conduct of the leading moderates The pamphlet is now scarce He had in the meantime accepted of a charge under the Relief body, then recently formed, and on the 13th February 1766, he was inducted by the Rev Mr Gillespie, late of Carnock, as the minister of College Street chapel, which was the first church opened in Edinburgh in connection with the Relief presbytery Previous to his deposition by the Established church he is said, after his admission to South College Street chapel, to have conducted his new congregation to the neighbouring church of Old Greyfriars, at that time under the pastoral care of Dr Erskine, in order to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's supper

Mr Baine had always distinguished himself by testifying against whatever he considered to be a violation of public morality Before he left Paisley he published a sermon preached before the Society for the Reformation of Manners in that town, instituted under his auspices, in which he declared, in strong terms, against the prevailing vices of the age In 1770 he published a sermon, entitled 'The Theatre Licentious and Perverted,' which he had preached against Foote's play of 'The Minor,' then acted at Edinburgh, in which the characters of Whitefield and other zealous ministers, and even religion itself, was most unjustly and profanely ridiculed To this attack Foote replied in 1771 in 'An Apology for the Minor, in a Letter to the Rev Mr Baine' In 1777 Mr Baine published a volume of sermons, among which is one on the subject of the Pastoral Care, delivered in the Low church of Paisley at the admission of his colleague in June 1757 Mr Baine died January 17, 1790, in the 80th year of his age He had married the only daughter of Dr Michael Potter, of Easter Livelands, Stirlingshire, professor of divinity in Glasgow university, and son of Michael Potter, one of the martyrs of the Bass His eldest son, Captain Michael Bain, died a detenu in France His second son, the Rev James Bain, a probationer of the Established church of Scotland, receiving episcopal ordination, was appointed a chaplain in one of the colonies The third son, Lieutenant-colonel William Bain of Easter Livelands, served abroad during the American and Continental wars He was succeeded by his eldest son, Edwin Sandys Bain of Easter Livelands, sergeant at law A volume of Mr Baine's sermons was published nearly fifty years after his death His talents and attainments were of a high order, and his voice was so musical that, while minister at Killearn, he was popularly known by the name of "the Swan of the West"

BAIRD, a surname of ancient standing in Scotland According to Nisbet, (Heraldry, vol i p 314,) the families of this surname have for arms, Gules, a Boar passant, Or as relative to the name Tradition states that while William the Lion was hunting in one of the south-west counties, he happened to straggle from his attendants, and was alarmed by the approach of a wild boar, which was slain by one of his retinue of the name of Baird, who had hastened to his assistance. For this signal service the king conferred upon him large grants of land, and assigned him the above coat of arms, with the motto "Dominus fecit"

In the reign of Alexander the Third, Robert, son of Waldeve de Biggar, granted a charter to Richard Baird, of Meikle and Little Kyp in Lanarkshire [Dalrymple's Collections, p 397] Among the names in the Ragman Roll of those who swore submission and fealty to King Edward the First of England, in 1292, 1296, 1297, &c, are Fergus de Bard, John Bard, and Robert Bard, supposed to be of the Bairds of Kyp and Evandale, then a considerable family in Lanarkshire There is a charter of King Robert the Bruce of the barony of Cambusnethan to Robert Baird [Haddington's Collections]

Baird of Carnwath, with three or four other barons of that name, being convicted of a conspiracy against King Robert the Bruce, in a parliament held at Perth, were forfeited and put to death in consequence

The estate of Cambusnethan went by marriage, in the reign of David the Second, to Sir Alexander Stewart, afterward of Darnley and Crookston, who, in 1390, bestowed the lands of Cambusnethan on Janet his daughter and her husband, Sir Thomas Somerville of Carnwath, created in 1127 Lord Somerville

From the Bairds of Ordinhivas in Banffshire, descendants of the family of Cambusnethan, came the Bairds of Auchmedden in Aberdeenshire, who were long the principal family of the name, and for several generations sheriffs of that county

George Baird of Auchmedden, who was alive in 1568, married Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Keith of Troup, brother of the earl marischal His son and successor, also named George, married in 1570, Lilias, daughter and heir of Walter Baird of Ordinhivas and had a numerous progeny The eldest son, George Baird of Auchmedden, was ancestor of the Bairds of that place, now represented by Fraser of Findrach [Burke's Landed Gentry]

The fourth son, James Baird, advocate, and one of the commissaries of Edinburgh in the time of Charles the First, was the founder of the houses of Newbyth and Saughtonhall He married Bathia, a daughter of Dempster of Pitliver, by whom he had two sons, John and Robert John the eldest was admitted advocate in June 1647 At the Restoration he was created a knight baronet, and made a lord of session, under the title of Lord Newbyth He died at Edinburgh, 27th April 1698, in the 78th year of his age He collected the decisions of the court from November 1664 to February 1667, and practiques from the former year to 1681, with an Appendix to 1690, the manuscripts of which are preserved in the Advocates' Library [Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice] He married Margaret, daughter of William Hay of Linplum, the second son of James lord Yester, and brother of John, first earl of Tweeddale By her he had Sir William Baird of Newbyth, created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1695 The latter was twice married, first to Helen, daughter of Sir John Gilmour of Craigmillar, president of the court of session, and secondly to Margaret, daughter of Lord Sinclair His son, by his first wife, Sir John Baird the second baronet, married Janet, daughter of the Hon Sir David Dalrymple, advocate, grandfather of the celebrated Lord Hailes Sir John died in 1746, without issue, when the baronetcy became extinct, but the estate was entailed on his second cousin, William Baird, the father of the celebrated Sir David Baird

The younger son of James Baird, advocate, viz Sir Robert Baird, Knight, of Sauchtonhall in Mid Lothian, had, with other issue, James, his successor, created in February 1696, a baronet of Nova Scotia, and William Baird, a merchant and a bailie in Edinburgh The latter was the father of William Baird, who succeeded his second cousin Sir John Baird in the estate of Newbyth He married Alicia, fourth daughter of Johnston of Hiltown, in Berwickshire, by whom he had six sons and eight daughters The gallant Sir David Baird was the fifth son

The estate of Auchmedden was purchased by the third earl of Aberdeen from the Bairds, on which, according to a local tradition, a pair of eagles which had regularly nestled and brought forth their young in the neighbouring rocks of Pennan, disappeared, in fulfilment of an ancient prophecy by Thomas the Rhymer, that there should be an eagle in the crags while there was a Baird in Auchmedden It is stated that when Lord Haddo, eldest son of the earl, married Christian, youngest daughter of William Baird, Esq of Newbyth, and sister of General Sir David Baird, the eagles returned to the rocks, and remained until the estate passed into the hands of the Hon William Gordon, when they again fled

The baronetcy conferred, in 1809, on General Sir David Baird (see p 195) was inherited in 1829 by his nephew, Sir David, the remainder being, in default of issue of his own, to the issue male of his eldest brother Robert The second baronet died in 1852, when his son, Sir David, became third baronet

BAIRD, Sir David, Bart, K C B, a distinguished British commander, descended, as above explained, from a junior branch of the Bairds of Auchmedden, in Aberdeenshire, was the fifth but second surviving son of William Baird, Esq, heir by settlement of his second cousin, Sir John Baird of Newbyth, Bart, and was born at Edinburgh on 6th December, 1757 His biographer Hook says he was born at Newbyth, but this is a mistake The house in which he first saw the light, and where he was brought up, is situated in a court at the foot of Blair's close, Castlehill, Edinburgh, at one time possessed by the ducal family of Gordon, and latterly by the Newbyth family, by whom it was held for several generations [Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh, vol i p 139] His father died when he was only eight years old, and he early evinced an inclination for a military life He entered the army December 16, 1772, as an ensign in the second foot He was then placed at Locie's academy at Chelsea, where he remained some months, actively improving himself in the knowledge of military tactics At Mr Locie's academy, as now at the military college, Sandhurst, the pupils were subjected to all the routine of military service One evening when young Baird was on duty as sentry, one of his companions, considerably his senior, wished to get out, in order to fulfil some engagement he had made in London, and tried to persuade Baird to permit him to pass "No," said the gallant boy, "that I cannot do, but if you please you may knock me down, and walk out over my body" He joined his regiment at Gibraltar in April 1773 One evening when he was on guard, having dined with some of his brother officers, they resolved to detain him with them, and locked the door of the room to prevent his visiting his sentries at the usual time Baird found remonstrances in vain, but determined to let nothing interfere with duty, he sprang to the window, which overhung the rampart, and with an agility and dexterity for which he was always remarkable, threw himself out, escaped unhurt, and was at his post at the very minute appointed [Hook's Life of General Sir David Baird, vol i p 2, Note] He returned with his regiment to Britain in 1776

Lord Macleod, eldest son of the earl of Cromarty, having been, with his father, engaged in the rebellion of 1745, spent several years in exile on the continent, and obtained the rank of lieutenant-general in the Swedish army Ultimately, on account of his youth at the time of joining the Pretender, he received an unconditional pardon for his share in the rebellion, and returning to England in the year 1777, he was presented to George the Third, who received him very graciously At the suggestion of Colonel Duff of Muirtown, who had served in Keith's Highlanders, and encouraged by the favourable reception he had met with in the north, he offered his services to raise a regiment The offer was accepted, and although without property or political influence, so great was the magic of his name among his clansmen that eight hundred and forty Highlanders were in a very short time raised and marched to Elgin In addition to these, two hundred and thirty-six lowlanders were raised by the Hon John Lindsay, son of the earl of Balcarres, David Baird, the subject of this memoir, James Fowlis, and other officers, besides thirty-four English and Irish, enlisted in Glasgow, making in all eleven hundred men The corps was embodied at Elgin, and inspected there by General Skene in April seventeen hundred and seventy-eight, in which year Baird obtained a lieutenancy, and in

September of the same year he became captain of the grenadiers in the 73d regiment, then raised by Lord Macleod With this corps, which he joined at Elgin, he embarked for Madras, where he arrived in January 1780, and immediately entered upon active service This young and untried regiment had scarcely arrived in India, when Hyder Ali, forcing his way through the Gauts, at the head of 100,000 men, burst like a mountain torrent into the Carnatic He had interposed his vast army between that of the British, commanded by Sir Hector Monro, and a smaller force under the command of Colonel Baillie, which were endeavouring to form a junction The latter having, though victorious, sustained a serious loss in an engagement with Hyder Ali's troops, sent to the commander an account of his difficult position, stating that, from the loss he had sustained, and his total want of provisions, he was equally unable to advance or remain in his then situation With the advice of a council of war, Sir Hector judged the only course was to endeavour to aid Colonel Baillie, with such a reinforcement as would enable him to push forward in defiance of the enemy The detachment selected for this enterprise consisted of about 1,000 men under Colonel Fletcher, and its main force was composed of the grenadier and infantry companies of Lord Macleod's regiment, commanded by Captain Baird Hyder Ali having gained intelligence of this movement, sent a strong body to cut them off on their way, but, by adopting a long circuitous route, and marching by night, they at length safely effected a junction with Colonel Baillie With the most consummate skill, however, Hyder, determining that they should never return, prepared an ambuscade into which, early on the morning of the 10th of September, they unwarily advanced The enemy, with admirable coolness and self-command, reserved their fire till the unhappy British were in the very midst of them The army under the command of Colonels Baillie and Fletcher, and Captain Baird, marched in column On a sudden, whilst in a narrow defile, a battery of twelve guns opened upon them, and, loaded with grape-shot, poured in upon their right flank The British faced about, another battery opened immediately upon their rear They had no choice therefore but to advance, other batteries met them here likewise, and in less than half an hour fifty-seven pieces of cannon, brought to bear on them at all points, penetrated into every part of the British line By seven o'clock in the morning, the enemy poured down upon them in thousands Captain Baird and his grenadiers fought with the greatest heroism Surrounded and attacked on all sides, by 25,000 cavalry, by thirty regiments of Sepoy infantry, besides Hyder's European corps, and a numerous artillery playing upon them from all quarters, within grape-shot distance, yet did this gallant column stand firm and undaunted, alternately facing their enemies on every side of attack The French officers in Hyder's camp beheld with astonishment the British grenadiers, under Captain Baird's command, performing their evolutions in the midst of all the tumult and extreme peril, with as much precision coolness, and steadiness, as if upon a parade ground The little army, so unexpectedly assailed, had only ten pieces of cannon, but these made such havoc amongst the enemy, that after a doubtful contest of three hours, from six in the morning till nine, victory began to declare for the British The flower of the Mysore cavalry, after many bloody repulses, were at length entirely defeated, with great slaughter, and the right wing, composed of Hyder's best forces, was thrown into disorder Hyder himself was about to give orders for retreat, and the French officer who directed the artillery began to draw it off, when an unforeseen and unavoidable misfortune occurred, which totally changed the fortune of the day By some unhappy accident the tumbrils which contained the ammunition suddenly blew up in the centre of the British lines One whole face of their column was thus entirely laid open, and their artillery overturned and destroyed The destruction of men was great, but the total loss of their ammunition was still more fatal to the survivors Tippoo Saib, the son of Hyder, instantly seized the moment of advantage, and without waiting for orders, fell with the utmost rapidity, at the head of the Mogul and Carnatic horse, into the broken square, which had not had time to recover its form and order This attack by the enemy's cavalry being immediately seconded by the French corps, and by the first line of infantry, determined at once

the fate of our unfortunate army After successive prodigies of valour, the brave Sepoys were almost to a man cut to pieces Colonels Baillie and Fletcher, assisted by Captain Baird, made one more desperate effort They rallied the Europeans, and, under the fire of the whole immense artillery of the enemy, gained a little eminence, and formed themselves into a new square In this form did this intrepid band, though totally without ammunition, the officers fighting only with their swords and the soldiers with their bayonets, resist and repulse the myriads of the enemy in thirteen different attacks, until at length, incapable of withstanding the successive torrents of fresh troops which were continually pouring upon them, they were fairly borne down and trampled upon, many of them still continuing to fight under the very legs of the horses and elephants To save the lives of the few brave men who survived, Colonel Baillie had displayed his handkerchief on his sword, as a flag of truce, quarter was promised, but no sooner had the troops laid down their arms than they were attacked with savage fury by the enemy By the humane interference, however, of the French officers in Hyder's service, many lives were saved

The loss of the British in this engagement, called the battle of Perambacum, amounted to about four thousand Sepoys, and about six hundred Europeans Colonel Fletcher was slain on the field Colonel Baillie, severely wounded, and several other officers, with two hundred Europeans, were made prisoners When brought into the presence of Hyder, he, with true Asiatic barbarism, received them with the most insolent triumph The British officers, with a spirit worthy of their country, retorted with an indignant coolness and contempt "Your son will inform you," said Colonel Baillie, "that you owe the victory to our disaster, rather than to our defeat" Hyder angrily ordered them from his presence, and commanded them instantly to prison Captain Baird had received two sabre-wounds on his head, a ball in his thigh, and a pike-wound in his arm He lay a long time on the field of battle, narrowly escaping death from some of the more ferocious of the Mysore cavalry, who traversed the field spearing the wounded, and at last being unable to reach the force under Munro, he was obliged to surrender to the enemy

The result of this battle was the immediate retreat of the main army under Sir Hector Munro to Madras Colonel Baillie, Captain Baird, and five other British officers, were marched to one of Hyder's nearest forts, and afterwards removed to Seringapatam, where they were joined by others of their captive countrymen, and subjected to a most horrible and protracted imprisonment It was commonly believed in Scotland that Captain Baird was chained by the leg to another man, and Sir Walter Scott, writing in May 1821 to his son, then a cornet of dragoons, with his regiment in Ireland, when Sir David was commander of the forces there, says, "I remember a story that when report came to Europe that Tippoo's prisoners (of whom Baird was one) were chained together two and two, his mother said, 'God pity the poor lad that's chained to our Davie!'" She knew him to be active, spirited and daring, and probably thought that he would make some desperate effort to escape But it was not the case that he was chained to another On the 10th of May all the prisoners had been put in irons except Captain Baird, this indignity he was not subjected to till the 10th of November following "When they were about," says his biographer, "to put the irons on Captain Baird, who was completely disabled in his right leg, in which the wound was still open, and whence the ball had just then been extracted, his friend Captain Lucas, who spoke the language perfectly, sprang forward, and represented in very strong terms to the Myar the barbarity of fettering him while in such a dreadful state, and assured him that death would be the inevitable termination of Captain Baird's sufferings if the intention were persisted in The Myar replied that the Circar had sent as many pairs of irons as there were prisoners, and they must be put on Captain Lucas then offered to wear two sets himself, in order to save his friend This noble act of generosity moved the compassion even of the Myar, who said he would send to the Killidar, (commander of the fort,) to open the book of fate He did so, and when the messenger returned, he said the book had been opened, and Captain Baird's fate was good, and the irons were in consequence not put on at that time Could they really have looked into the volume of futurity, Baird would undoubtedly have been the last man to be spared" [Life of Sir David Baird, vol i p 44] Each pair of irons was nine pounds weight Captain Lucas died in prison Captain Baird was preserved by Providence to revenge the sufferings which he and his fellow-prisoners endured by the glorious conquest of Seringapatam on the 4th of May, 1799

He remained a prisoner for three years and a half He and his companions were only allowed a gold fanam, value about sixpence, a-day each, to support themselves in prison, a pittance which could only purchase them the poorest necessaries, and Captain Baird, on recovering from a severe attack of dysentery, suffered so much from hunger that he was often tempted to snatch his neighbour's share, and ate with greediness whatever happened to be left On the cessation of hostilities, in March 1784 he and the surviving prisoners were released, and in July he joined his regiment at Madras In 1785 the number of the regiment was changed to the 71st It was also called the Glasgow Highland light infantry, from the success with which the recruiting had been carried on in that city So destructive had been the carnage in this regiment in the short time it had been in India, that it was said Captain Baird and one sergeant were the only two individuals belonging to the original 73d In 1787 he removed with his regiment to Bombay On the 5th of June of that year he became major of the 71st, and in October he returned home on leave of absence In December 1790 he obtained the lieutenant colonelcy of his regiment, the 71st, and in 1791, on his return to India, he joined the army under Marquis Cornwallis

As commander of a brigade of Sepoys, Colonel Baird was present at the attack of a number of Droogs, or hill forts, and at the siege of Seringapatam in February 1792, and likewise at the storming of Tippoo Sultaun's lines and camps on the island of Seringapatam In 1793 he commanded a brigade of Europeans, and was present at the reduction of Pondicherry He was afterwards appointed to the command at Tanjore On the drafting of the 71st into other regiments, in October 1797 he embarked at Madras for Europe In December, when he arrived at the Cape of Good Hope, he was appointed brigadier-general, and placed on that staff, in command of a brigade On June 18, 1798, he was appointed major-general, and returned to the staff in India In January 1799 he arrived at Madras, in command of two regiments of foot, together with the drafts of the 28th dragoons, and on the 1st of February joined the army at Velore, where he was appointed to the command of the first European brigade

On the 4th of May of that memorable year General Baird commanded the storming party at the assault of Seringapatam One o'clock was fixed upon for the assault, it being known that the natives usually sought shelter and repose from the heat of the sun at that hour When the precise moment arrived, Baird ascended the parapet of the trenches in full view of both armies, "a military figure," observes Colonel Wilks, "suited to such an occasion," and, drawing his sword, and gallantly waving it, shouted out, "Now, my brave fellows, follow me, and prove yourselves worthy of the name of British soldiers!" His personal appearance added greatly to the chivalrous bearing of his manner His figure was tall and symmetrical, his countenance cheerful and animated On his open manly brow were legibly displayed the indications of that lofty courage, that firmness of purpose, and that vigour of intellect which so conspicuously marked his whole career Within seven minutes the British flag floated from the outer bastion of the fortress, and before night Seringapatam was in possession of the besiegers General Baird, who was undoubtedly entitled to the governorship of the town which he had thus taken, fixed his head-quarters at the palace of Tippoo, who was among the slain He was next day abruptly commanded to deliver up the keys of the town to Colonel Wellesley, who as it happened, had no active share in the capture, but who was appointed to the command by his brother, the governor-general "And thus," said Baird, "before the sweat was dry on my brow, I was superseded by an inferior officer," that "inferior officer" being afterwards the duke of Wellington!

In consequence of his signal success on this occasion, he was presented by the army, through

General Harris, the commander-in-chief, with the state sword of Tippoo Sultaun The field officers under his immediate command at the assault presented him at the same time with a dress sword In 1800 he was removed to the Bengal staff

In 1801 General Baird was appointed to the command of an expedition intended to act against Batavia, but which was afterwards sent to Egypt In 1802 he returned in command of the Egyptian Indian army overland to India In September of that year he was removed to the Madras staff, and commanded a large division of the army forming against the Mahrattas He was afterwards employed in the Mysore country In consequence of the great reduction of his division of the army, by the drafts made from it by General Sir Arthur Wellesley, who was employed in the same service, General Baird resigned his command and sailed for Britain with his staff, March 1803 In December he obtained the royal permission to wear the Turkish order of the crescent In June 1804 he was knighted by patent, and, on the 18th of August following, became a military companion of the Bath

On 30th October 1805 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded an expedition against the Cape of Good Hope Arriving there January 5, 1806, he attacked and beat the Dutch army on the 8th, and on the 18th received the surrender of the colony He remained in the government of the Cape till January 1807, when he was recalled, and arrived in Britain in March of that year On the 19th July he was transferred from the colonelcy of the 54th to that of the 24th, and placed on the foreign staff under General Lord Cathcart At the siege of Copenhagen, where he commanded a division, he was slightly wounded He was afterwards employed for a short time in Ireland, with the command of the "drill camp" there, and was sworn in a member of the Irish privy council

Having been ordered to the Peninsula, in the beginning of November 1808 he arrived at Corunna, in command of about 10,000 men, and formed a junction with the army under General Sir John Moore In the battle of Corunna, January 16, 1809, he commanded the first division of the army, and lost his left arm On the death of Sir John Moore, he succeeded to the chief command, and on communicating the intelligence of the victory to government, he received for the fourth time the thanks of parliament, the previous occasions being, for the operations of the army in India in 1799, for those of Egypt in 1801, and for the Danish expedition On this occasion also he received the red ribband, on being appointed a knight grand cross of the Bath On the 18th of April he was created a baronet by patent, and received a grant of the most honourable armorial bearings, having relation to his military transactions The following is a portrait of Sir David from a painting by Sir Henry Raeburn

On Sir David's return to Edinburgh after the Spanish campaign, he called upon the then possessor of the mansion on the Castlehill where he was born, and requested to be allowed to see the house in which he had passed his infancy, and the garden behind, where he said he had spent many happy days in boyish amusements This was readily conceded, and after viewing the house, he was conducted to the garden, where he saw the children of the tenant of the house engaged in the very same species of mischievous sport which he declared had often been his own, namely, throwing stones and kail castocks down the chimneys of the houses in the Grassmarket below [Chambers' Traditions of Edinburgh, vol i p 155]

Sir David married, 4th August 1810, Miss Campbell Preston of Ferntower and Lochlane, Perthshire, niece of Sir Robert Preston, of Valleyfield, Baronet In 1814 he was promoted to the rank of general In 1820 he was appointed commander of the forces in Ireland, and sworn of his majesty's privy council there, and in 1828 he became governor of Fort-George in Scotland He died at an advanced age, August 18, 1829, at his seat of Ferntower in Perthshire, where he passed the latter years of his life, and leaving no issue, was succeeded in the baronetcy by his nephew, Captain Baird His widow survived till 28th May 1847 A monument erected by her on Tom-a-Chastel, a most romantic hill on her estate, to the memory of her gallant husband, is in the form of an obelisk, of Aberdeen granite, eighty-two feet four inches in height, and an exact fac simile of Cleopatra's needle, most fitting model for the monument of the gallant soldier who was the first with a European army to ascend the Red Sea, cross the desert, descend the Nile, and display the united standards of Britain and Brama on the shores of Alexandria [New Stat Acc vol x p 741]

Sir David Baird was deservedly popular with the army Although a strict disciplinarian, he had the power to an extreme degree of winning the attachment and respect of the men under his command "There was," says General Middlemore, who served with him in Egypt, "something about him which gave at once complete confidence in him his countenance bespoke a mind spotless from guile or subterfuge You felt that truth beamed in all his features—it was impossible to doubt him—you might implicitly place your life, and honour, and happiness, on his bare word He could not deceive, and as he was firm and inflexible upon every point of discipline and duty, so was he incapable of injuring a human being With the courage of a hero, his heart was as kind and gentle as a woman's" His power over his soldiers, even under the most trying circumstances, was strikingly exemplified at Wallajahbad in 1797, when the order came for breaking up the 71st regiment, which he had so long commanded, and drafting the men fit for service into other regiments The order was read to the men by the adjutant, Sir David being too much affected to read it himself "The effect produced by it," says his biographer, "was beyond description It seems as if a sudden dismay had seized the whole regiment It was a moment of trial in which there was something awful, but Baird, who knew his duty, and who always did it, addressed the men thus 'My poor fellows—not a word—the order must be obeyed' And then, to conceal emotions of which even he need not have been ashamed, he turned round, and ordered the band to strike up the popular Scottish air, the chorus of which is in these words—

> The king commands, and we'll obey,
> Over the hills and far away"

He is said himself to have been passionately fond of the native airs of his country He frequently spoke, with the most affectionate delight, of the way in which his mother used to sing them, and he had them similarly arranged for the band of his regiment The Life of Sir David Baird by Theodore Hook was published at London in 1832 in two volumes

BAIRD, George Husband, the very rev, D D, principal of the university of Edinburgh, the author and unwearied promoter of the scheme for the education of the Highlanders, was born in 1761, in the parish of Borrowstounness, where his father, a considerable proprietor in the county of Stirling, rented a farm from the duke of Hamilton He received the rudiments of his education, first at the parish school of Borrowstounness, and subsequently, upon his father acquiring and removing to the property of Manuel, in West-Lothian, at the grammar school of Linlithgow In 1773 he entered as a student at the university of Edinburgh, and while there, acquired the special notice of Principal Robertson, Professor Dalzel, and others of the professors, for his diligence and proficiency At college he and the late Professor Finlayson, and Josiah Walker, who were fellow-students with him, associated for the prosecution of studies beyond what was required by the college courses, by which he was enabled to make himself master of most of the European languages These three young men, it is stated in the sketch of Baird's life in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, are said to have entered into an agreement to promote the advancement of one another in life to the utmost of their power, and though, it is added, there was a degree of singularity in the compact, and perhaps no real increase from it in the disposition to serve each other, it is certain that individually all the three parties mentioned could ascribe important advantages to the good offices of one or other in that association, one much to be commended and imitated The reverse of such conduct, from unworthy feelings of envy and jealousy, is too often exhibited in after-life by those who had once been schoolfellows and close companions in their youth In 1784 he was recommended by Professor Dalzel as tutor to the family of Colonel Blair of Blair In 1786 he was licensed by the presbytery of Linlithgow, and in the following year he was ordained to the parish of Dunkeld, to which charge he had been presented by the duke of Athol through the influence of his friend, Mr Finlayson At Dunkeld he remained for several years, living as an inmate of the duke's family, and superintending the education of his grace's three sons, the last survivor of whom was the late Lord Glenlyon In 1789 or 1790 he was presented to Lady Yester's church, Edinburgh, but at the request of the duke and duchess of Athol, he declined it In 1792 he was transferred to the New Greyfriars church, Edinburgh, and at the same time was elected professor of oriental languages in the university there In 1793, on the death of Dr Robertson, he was, when not more than thirty-three years of age, appointed the principal of the university

As principal he was once called upon to exercise college discipline in the case of three of the students who afterwards attained to great distinction, which has rendered this instance of the maintenance of academic authority memorable in the annals of the university A challenge having been sent to one of the professors, the parties implicated in this misdemeanor, namely, Lord Henry Petty (afterwards the marquis of Lansdowne), the late Francis Horner, Esq, M P, and Mr (now Lord) Brougham, were summoned before the Senatus Academicus The only one who appeared was Brougham, and the rebuke of the principal was at once so administered and so received, that a friendship ensued between them, which was continued long after the former had entered upon public life In 1799 Principal Baird was translated to the New North church, and in 1801, on the death of Dr Blair, he was removed to the High church, where he continued to officiate till his death He married the eldest daughter of Thomas Elder, Esq of Formeth Lord Provost of Edinburgh His later years, until prevented by the infirmities of age, were principally occupied in promoting his truly benevolent and philanthropic plan, for extending a religious education among the poorer classes of his fellow countrymen in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland At the meeting of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in May 1824 he brought forward his motion for increasing the means of education throughout Scotland, but particularly in the Highlands and Islands, and in large towns The Assembly of 1825 gave its sanction to the scheme proposed, which mainly owed its success to the talents, labour, industry, personal influence, and pious enthusiasm of the originator of the plan, who lived to see a provision secured, by his exertions, for the Christian education of many thousand children of the poor Such was his zeal to forward the educational interests, and to improve the moral condition of his Gaelic countrymen, that, in the autumn of 1827, in the 67th year of his age, he visited the Highlands of Argyleshire, the western parts of Inverness and Ross, and the Western Islands traversing the whole country from Lewis to Kintyre The following year he visited for the same purposes, the North Highlands, and the

Islands of Orkney and Shetland Through his means also, the late Dr Andrew Bell of Madras bequeathed £5,000 to the scheme for education in the Highlands In 1832 the thanks of the General Assembly were conveyed to him by Dr Chalmers, the moderator, in the following terms — "The benefits you have conferred on the cause of education in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland will ever associate your name with the whole of that immense region, and hand down your memory to distant ages as the moral benefactor of many thousand families I feel confident that I do not outrun the sympathy of a single individual in our church, when, in its name, I offer you, as the head of a noble and national enterprise, the meed of our united thanks, for the vigour, and activity, and the enthusiasm wherewith, at an advanced period of life, you have addressed yourself to this great undertaking, and may now be said to have fully and firmly established it" By his benevolent exertions the worthy principal is said to have contributed much to the freeing the minds of the Highlanders from the superstitions which they were so fond of cherishing, and particularly to the expulsion of the fairies from the Highland hills A portrait of Principal Baird is subjoined

Dr Baird died on the 14th January 1840, at his residence of Manuel near Linlithgow, in the 79th year of his age He was, when a young man, a correspondent of the poet Burns, and his name appears among the list of subscribers to the first or Kilmarnock edition of his poems —Obituaries of the time

BALCANQUAIL, a surname derived originally from the lands of that name in the parish of Strathmiglo, Fife In Sibbald's List of the Heritors of that county (1710) occurs the name of Balcanquhall of that Ilk [Hist of Fife, Appendix, No 2] The estate of Balcanquall afterwards belonged to the Hopes of Pinkie

One of the first presbyterian ministers of Edinburgh was the Rev Walter Balcanquall, the son of Balcanquhall of that ilk Mr James Melville, in his Diary, mentions him under date 1574 as "ane honest, vpright harted young man, lathe of tent to that ministerie of Edinbruche" [Melville's Diary, p 41] With his colleague Mr James Lawson Mr Robert Pont, Mr Andrew Melville, and others, he took an active part against the scheme of King James for re-establishing the bishops On the assembly of the estates for that purpose in 1584, the king sent a message to the magistrates of Edinburgh to seize and imprison any of the ministers who should venture to speak against the proceedings of the parliament Mr Walter Balcanquhall, however, as well as Mr Lawson, not only preached against those proceedings from the pulpit, but the former, with Mr Robert Pont and others, appeared at the Cross, on the heralds proceeding to proclaim the acts passed in parliament affecting the church, and publicly protested and took instruments in the name of the Kirk of Scotland against them For this, he and Mr Lawson were compelled to retire to England, [Ibid p 119,] where the latter died the same year His will contained some curious bequests among others the following to his colleague 'Item, I will that my loving brother Mr James Carmichaell, sall bow a rose noble instanthe, and deliver it to my deere brother and loving friend, Mr Walter Balcanquall, who hath beene so carefull of me at all times, and cheefelie in time of this my present sicknesse, to remaine with him as a perpetuall tokin and remembrance of my speciall love and thankfull heart towards him' [Calderwood's Hist vol iv p 206] In the following year Mr Balcanquhall returned to his charge, and on Sunday, the 2d of January 1586 he preached before the king "in the great kirk of Edinburgh," when his majesty, "after sermoun, rebooked Mr Walter publicklie from his seate in the loaft and said he would prove there sould be bishops and spirituall magistrats endued with authoritie over the ministrie, and that he (Balcanquhall) did not his dutie to condemn that which he had done in parliament" [Ibid 191] In December 1596 he was again obliged to flee to England, but subsequently returned After being one of the ministers of Edinburgh for forty-three years, he died in 1616 Of his son well known as one of the executors of his relative George Heriot, a notice follows

The surname of Balcanquhall seems to have been in course of time changed into Ballingall, as more euphonious

his father was a Presbyterian, he himself, probably convinced by the arguments of King James in favour of bishops, preferred taking orders in the Church of England He commenced his studies at the university of Edinburgh, where, in 1609, he took his degree of M A He afterwards entered at Pembroke Hall, Oxford, as a bachelor of divinity, and was admitted a fellow, September 8, 1611 He was one of the chaplains of James VI In 1617 he was appointed master of the Savoy, in the Strand, London, and in 1618 he was sent by his majesty to the synod of Dort His letters concerning that assembly, addressed to Sir Dudley Carlton, may be found in Mr John Hales' 'Golden Remains' Before proceeding to the synod of Dort, he received the degree of D D from the university of Oxford In March 1621, he obtained the deanery of Rochester, and afterwards in May 1639, he was made dean of Durham On the death of George Heriot, jeweller to the king, February 12, 1624, being appointed one of the three executors of his last will, with the principal charge of the establishment of Heriot's hospital at Edinburgh, Dr Balcanqual drew up the statutes, which are dated 1627, and discharged the onerous trust imposed upon him, with much ability, judgment, and good sense In 1638 he accompanied the marquis of Hamilton, the king's commissioner to Scotland, in the capacity of chaplain, and his double dealing, on this and subsequent occasions, rendered him obnoxious to the party in both kingdoms who were struggling for their religious rights He is said to have written the apologetical narrative of the court proceedings, which, under the title of 'His Majestie's Large Declaration concerning the late Tumults in Scotland,' appeared in folio in 1639 On July 29, 1641, he and five other gentlemen were denounced as incendiaries by the Scottish parliament He was afterwards exposed to much persecution from the English Puritans, and after being plundered, sequestrated, and forced to fly from London, he went to Oxford, and for some years shared the waning fortunes of his sovereign He died at Chirk castle, Denbighshire, on Christmas day, 1645, just after the battle of Naseby, and a splendid monument was subsequently erected to his memory in the parish church of Chirk, by Sir Thomas Middleton —Steven's History of Heriot's Hospital

BALCARRES, earl of, a title formerly possessed by a principal branch of the ancient and noble family of Lindsay, and now held by the chief of the name [See LINDSAY, surname of] The first of the family of Balcarres was John Lindsay, the second son of Sir David Lindsay of Edzell and Glenesk in Forfarshire, ninth earl of Crawford, who died in 1558 [See CRAWFORD earl of] John Lindsay was born in 1552, and, with his elder brother David was at the proper age, sent to pursue his studies in France, under the care of Mr James Lawson, afterwards the well-known colleague of John Knox in the ministry of Edinburgh On the troubles breaking out between the Huguenots and the Catholics, they were obliged to fly from Paris at a moment's warning, leaving their books behind them, and saving nothing but the clothes on their backs They took refuge at first at Dieppe, but on the capture of that town, they passed over to England, and ultimately went to the university of Cambridge [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i pp 331, 332] In conformity with the practice of the age, whereby the nobility and barons took possession of the temporalities which, before the Reformation, belonged to the Romish clergy, the revenues of the rectories of Menmuir, Lethnot, and Lochlee in Forfarshire, livings in the gift of the family of Edzell, had been settled upon John Lindsay, while yet a child and in consequence he took the title, familiar to every Scottish antiquary, of Parson of Menmuir He had also the teinds or tithes, of certain parishes, and a pension of two hundred pounds annually out of the bishopric of St Andrews by writ under the privy seal, 11th July 1576 and the small estate of Drumcurn, in Forfarshire was settled upon him [Ibid p 334] Having applied himself to the study of the law he was appointed a lord of session, 5th July 1581, before he was thirty years of age, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Menmuir Sibbald styles him "a wise and learned person" [History of Fife, p 358] In 1587 he purchased the lands of Balcarres, in the parish of Kilconquhar, Fifeshire with Balncill, Pitcorthie, and other lands in that county, and, 10th June 1592 he obtained a royal charter uniting them in a free barony in his favour an estate, which, says Lord Lindsay, with the lands of Balmakin and Innerdovat in Forfarshire, formed the original patrimony of the Balcarres family [Lives of the Lindsays vol i p 337] In 1587, Lord Menmuir's name appears prominently as member of different public commissions He was the framer of the acts passed in that year, "anent the form and order of parliament" "anent the vote of the barons," and other acts which modified the constitution of the Scottish parliament and abridged the power of the higher nobility, in admitting the lesser barons to a voice in parliament by their commissioners [See BARON, title and privileges of] In October 1591, he was appointed one of the queen's four master stabulars, or managers of her revenues, the three others being Seyton, afterwards Lord Chancellor and first earl of Dunfermline, Elphinstone, first lord Balmerinoch, and Hamilton, first earl of Haddington In June 1592 Lord Menmuir was appointed for life "Master of the Metals" and minerals within the kingdom, "an appointment' says Lord Lindsay "sanctioned by extensive powers, and the object of which was the increase of revenue to the crown, by the exploration of the mineral wealth of Scotland, more especially the gold mines of Crawfordmoor on the lands granted by the Lindsays, above three hundred and fifty years before to the monks of Newbattle But this resource was found unproductive, or at least the necessary preliminary outlay was too expensive" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 351] In January 1595 his lordship was appointed one of the eight commissioners of the exchequer called the Octavians in whom the control and management of the treasury and the administration of public affairs were vested with unlimited powers after the death of Chancellor Maitland In March of the same year [1595] Lord Menmuir was appointed lord keeper of the privy seal, and on the 28th May 1596 secretary of state for life "In this capacity" says Lord Lindsay quoting the Balcarres papers in the Advocates' Library, "the correspondence and complicated negotiations with foreign powers for the object of securing their support of James in the event of his succession to the throne of England, fell to the conduct and guidance of Lord Menmuir" [Lives of the Lindsays vol i p 356] He was the chief confidant and adviser of the king in his attempts to restore episcopacy, and in 1596 drew up a "plat," or scheme, for "planting" the whole kirks throughout Scotland with perpetual local stipends,—a scheme which, according to James Melville who has inserted it at full length in his Diary [p 223] "was thought the best and maist exact that ever was devisit or sett down, and wald, sum little things amendit haifl been gladlie receivit be the breithring of best judgment, zit in the monethe of August ther hand nocht bein ane Act of Esteattis devysit anent the renewing of the takes of tends to the present takismen for thair granting to the perpetuall plat quhilk in effect maid the tends in all tyme cumming heritable to them, thir locall stipends and a portioun to the king sett asyde in ilka parochi To the quhilk nather the kirk nor gentilmen whase tends was in vther mens possessioun could nor wald condiscend to And sa as I mentioned befor, the chieff of this wark gaiff it ower as a thing nocht lyk to be done in his dayes' [Melville's Diary p 229] According to Calderwood the celebrated fifty-five "questions' as they were called, which, embracing the principal points in dispute between James and the clergy were sent by the king to the different synods and presbyteries and led to the convention of a General Assembly at Perth 28th February 1597 and ultimately to the yielding by the clergy of most of James' demands and the re-establishment of episcopacy, were drawn up by Lord Menmuir [Lives of the Lindsays vol i p 366] As he had for years suffered severely from the stone, his lordship designed to go to Paris, as was then the custom, to be cut for the disease, and King James accordingly appointed him ambassador to France, assigning him one hundred crowns monthly during his absence Towards the end of 1597 he resigned his office of secretary of state, and his place as a lord of session, the latter of which was bestowed on his elder brother Sir David, thenceforward designed Lord Edzell [See EDZELL, Lindsays of] His own title and rank as Lord Menmuir were continued to him for life Increasing infirmity prevented his departure for France and he died September 3, 1598, at his house of Balcarres in Fifeshire in his forty-seventh year A total eclipse of the sun had appalled the people of Scotland early in that year, and among other events which it was thought to have portended was the death of Lord Menmuir "for naturall judgment and learning," says James Melville, "the guittest light of the policie and counsell of Scotland" [Diary p 290] Besides the other offices held by him, he was also chancellor of the university of St. Andrews

Lord Menmuir is commemorated as an able lawyer and statesman, a scholar, a man of letters, and a poet He seems to have been acquainted with the French, Italian, Spanish, and other continental languages, and wrote both the Latin and Scottish fluently and vigorously He is mentioned with praise as a writer of "Epigrams,' both by Scott of Scotstarvet and Sir William Alexander earl of Stirling, but none of them have been preserved A treatise of his, 'De Jure Angliæano,' has also been lost He was a book-collector, and accumulated numerous state-papers and letters by personages distinguished during the earlier parts of the sixteenth century, particularly those belonging to the court of France, such as Catherine de Medicis Henry the Second, the celebrated Anne Constable de Montmorency, Diana of Poitiers, Mary, Queen of Scots, Margaret of France, duchess of Savoy, James the Fifth of Scotland, Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre and others All these, with others of later date, were presented in 1712 to the Advocate's library, Edinburgh, by Lord Menmuir's great grandson Colin, third earl of Balcarres, and have been arranged and bound up, by Dr Irving, the late librarian, in nine folio volumes Mr Maidment, advocate, has printed several of them in the Miscellany of the Maitland Club, vol i page 207 et seq, and in the Analecta Scotica, 2 vols 8vo, 1836–7 Much of Lord Menmuir's own correspondence, both in Latin and Scottish, is also preserved in the public repositories of Scotland Several of his Latin letters are printed in M Maidment's Letters and State Papers during the reign of King James VI, Abbotsford Club, page 18 et seq [See Lives of the Lindsays vol i pp 375, 376 and notes] The family mansion of Balcarres was erected by his lordship in 1595

He was twice married first, in 1581 to Marion, daughter of Alexander Guthrie, burgess of Edinburgh, and widow of David Borthwick of Lochhill, Lord Advocate from 1573 to 1580 by whom he had two sons, John and David and three daughters secondly to Dame Jean Lauder, the dowager lady of Corstorphin who, described as "a termigant," made his life very uncomfortable and was even imprisoned for her violence By this lady he had no children Catherine, his eldest daughter, was married first to her cousin Sir John Lindsay of Woodhead and Ballinscho fourth son of David, tenth earl of Crawford, and had a son Colonel Henry Lindsay, secondly to John Brown of Fordell Perthshire, to whom also she had issue, Margaret the second daughter, married Sir John Strachan of Thornton, and Janet the youngest, became the wife of Sir David Auchmutie of Auchmutie

John Lindsay, Lord Menmuir's eldest son, died shortly after himself, under age and unmarried, in January 1601

The second son, David, succeeded his brother when only fourteen years old In 1607 before he was twenty years of age, he went to the continent and spent some years in France and elsewhere In 1612 he returned to Scotland, when he received the honour of knighthood He married Lady Sophia Sexton, third daughter of Alexander, first earl of Dunfermline, lord high chancellor of Scotland, and retiring to Balcarres, devoted himself to literary and scientific pursuits He is said to have had the best library of his time in Scotland He was a laborious alchemist, and "natural philosophy, particularly chemistry and the then fashionable quest of the elixir vitæ, and the philosopher's stone, occupied much of his attention" [Lives of the Lindsays vol ii p 3] Ten volumes of transcripts and translations from the works of the Rosicrucians and others were, at one period in the library at Balcarres, written in his own hand of which only four now remain

He was the correspondent and friend of Drummond of Hawthornden, and the celebrated Sir John Scott of Scotstarvet

On Charles the First's visit to Scotland in 1633, Sir David was created Lord Lindsay of Balcarres, 27th June that year, to him and his heirs male bearing the name of Lindsay In 1639, when the Scots mustered their forces on Dunse Law, to resist Charles' attempt to overthrow the civil and religious liberties of Scotland, Lord Balcarres appeared at the head of his followers on the side of the Covenanters The treaty of Berwick brought a temporary peace, and Lord Balcarres disbanded his followers He died at Balcarres in March 1641

His eldest son, Alexander second Lord Balcarres, raised a troop of horse, constantly alluded to in the histories of the period, with which he joined the Covenanters, and was engaged at the battle of Alford against the marquis of Montrose 2d July 1645 After the defeat of the Covenanters, with General Baillie and the earl of Argyle, he repaired to the parliament of Stirling, and was favourably received At the sitting of 10th July, "the house by their acte, ordained the Lord Balcarras good service to his countrey to be recordit in the bookes of parliament to posterity, and a letter of thankes to be wrettin from the house to him for his worthey carriage and good service" [Balfour's Annals, vol iii p 295] At the battle of Kilsyth which followed, Balcarres acted as general of the horse, and on the defeat of the Covenanters, he fled to West Lothian, and reached Colinton the same night, with ten or twelve horsemen only On the surrender of the king to the Scottish army Lord Balcarres was one of the commissioners sent by the Scottish parliament 19th December 1646, to negotiate with Charles on the part of the church and parliament of Scotland, but as his majesty declined the terms, the Scotch army retired from England, after surrendering him to the English parliament In 1648 Lord Balcarres entered into the engagement or league, which was formed for the rescue of the king, and was appointed colonel of horse for the shire of Fife He was also one of the Committee appointed to manage affairs during the recess of parliament On the arrival of Charles the Second in Scotland in 1650, he waited upon his majesty by whom he was graciously received After the rout at Dunbar, he formed a party in favour of the king, and they soon became the majority in parliament On the 22d February 1651 "My Lord Balcarras," says Sir James Balfour, "gave his Majestie a banquett at his housse (in Fife), quher he stayed some two houres, and visited his ladey that then lay in" [Annals vol iv p 217] He was created earl of Balcarres by patent dated at Perth 9th January 1651 appointed hereditary governor of the castle of Edinburgh, (this office was given up to the crown after his death, by his widow,) and high commissioner to the General Assembly of the kirk, which met at Dundee, 16th July 1651

On Charles's march to Worcester, he left Balcarres with the earl of Crawford and Lords Marischal and Glencairn, as a committee of estates, in charge of his affairs in Scotland, but his lordship was soon obliged to take refuge in the Highlands, where he assumed the command of the royalist troops, under the king's commission He had sold his plate the previous year for two thousand pounds to defray the expenses of the General Assembly To assist his majesty's interests in the north, he now mortgaged his estates for six thousand pounds more [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 92] After the defeat of the king at Worcester, Lord Balcarres capitulated, in December 1651, to Cromwell's officers at Forres, and disbanding his followers, settled, on the 8th November 1652, with his family at St Andrews, whence he kept up a correspondence with his exiled sovereign

When General Monk was recalled from Scotland, Lord Balcarres again took arms in the Highlands, and in concert with Athol, Lorn (afterwards the unfortunate earl of Argyle beheaded in 1685), and the principal Highland chiefs, under the earl of Glencairn as commander-in-chief, made a last unavailing attempt to uphold the royal cause against Cromwell In 1654 his estate was sequestrated He was afterwards sent for by the king, to consult as to the position of affairs, and accordingly, with his countess he proceeded to France He continued some years with the king, holding the office of secretary of state for Scotland, and was employed in various political negotiations for the interest of King Charles Lord Clarendon, head of the high church party, once had influence enough with the king to procure his dismissal from the court at Cologne, but he was soon recalled In a letter to Lord Arlington, Charles thus expresses himself,—"Our little court are all at variance, but Lord Balcarres will soon return and heal us with his wisdom" [Memoirs of James, earl of Balcarres, quoted in the Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii page 106] His lordship died in exile at Breda, 30th August 1659, and his body having been brought to Scotland, was interred at Balcarres Cowley, styled by Lord Lindsay the minstrel of the Cavaliers, wrote an elegiac poem upon his death, which thus concludes

'His own and country's ruin had not weight Enough to crush his mighty mind
He saw around the hurricanes of state
Fixed as an island 'gainst the waves and wind
Thus far the greedy sea may reach
All outward things are but the beach
A great man's soul it doth assault in vain'
Their God himself the ocean doth restrain
With an impreceptible chain
And bids it to go back again
His wisdom justice and his piety
His courage both to suffer and to die
His virtues and his lady too
Were things celestial And we see
In spite of quarrelling philosophy
How in this case 'tis certain found
That heaven stands still and only earth goes round!'

The first earl of Balcarres had married, in 1640 the lady Anna Mackenzie, daughter and co-heiress of Colin, first earl of Seaforth, and had issue Charles and Colin, who both succeeded him in the earldom, and three daughters Anne, who died a nun, Sophia, a lady remarkable for her liveliness and spirit, who accomplished the escape of her stepfather, the earl of Argyle, from the castle of Edinburgh in 1680, in the disguise of a page holding up her train, and who married the Hon Colonel Charles Campbell, Argyle's third son by his first wife, and Harriet who became the wife of Sir Duncan Campbell, Baronet, of Auchinbreck The countess of Balcarres married a second time, in 1671, Archibald, the unfortunate earl of Argyle, beheaded in 1685

The eldest son, Charles, second earl of Balcarres, did not long survive his father, dying unmarried on the 15th October 1662, when only twelve years old, of a disease of the heart

The second son, Colin, succeeded his brother He was an episcopalian, and distinguished himself by his staunch adherence to James the Seventh Lord Lindsay relates that at the age of sixteen he went to London, and was presented to King Charles by his cousin the duke of Lauderdale Being extremely handsome, the king was pleased with his countenance He said he had loved his father, and would be a father to him himself and though so young he gave him the command of a select troop of horse composed of one hundred loyal gentlemen who had been reduced to poverty during the recent troubles, and had half-a-crown a-day [Lives of the Lindsays, vol. iii. p. 120.] His majesty had previously settled on Lady Balcarres and the longest liver of her two sons a pension of one thousand pounds a-year, on her giving up, during their minority the patent of the hereditary government of Edinburgh castle, which had been conferred on their father. Earl Colin married early, and there is a romance attending his marriage of a peculiarly affecting nature. The young Mademoiselle Maurtia de Nassau, sister of Lady Arlington and the countess of Ossory, and daughter of Louis de Nassau, count of Beverwaert and Auverquerque in Holland, a natural son of Maurice prince of Orange, had fallen deeply in love with him, and ere long the day was fixed for their marriage. On this occasion, says Lord Lindsay, the prince of Orange, afterwards William the Third, presented his fair kinswoman with a pair of magnificent emerald ear-rings, as his wedding gift. On the marriage day, when the wedding party were assembled in the church, and the bride was at the altar, to their dismay no bridegroom appeared. The earl, it seems, had forgotten the day fixed for his marriage, and was found, in his night-gown and slippers, quietly eating his breakfast. He hurried instantly to the church, but in his haste left the wedding ring in his writing case. A friend in the company gave him one. The ceremony proceeded, and without looking at the ring he had received, he placed it on the finger of his fair young bride. It was a mourning ring with the mort-head and crossed bones.' On perceiving it, at the close of the ceremony, the countess fainted, and the evil omen made such an impression on her mind that she declared she should die within the year, a presentiment which was too truly fulfilled. [Ibid. p. 121.]

After the death of his wife, Lord Balcarres went to sea with the duke of York, and was with his royal highness in the well-fought battle of Solebay 28th May 1672. He was admitted a privy councillor 3d June 1680, and in 1682 became sheriff of Fifeshire. After the accession of James the Seventh he was appointed 3d September 1686, one of the Council of Six or commissioners of the treasury in whom the Scottish administration was lodged. When the prince of Orange prepared to invade Britain the earl of Balcarres and his friend the earl of Cromarty proposed to the earl of Perth the chancellor, with the money then in the Scottish exchequer, about ninety thousand pounds to levy ten battalions of foot to form a body of four or five thousand men from the Highlands to raise the under vassals and to select about twelve thousand horse out of them, and with this force and three or four thousand regular troops, amounting in all to an army of about fifteen thousand men, commanded by General Douglas and Lord Dundee, to march to York, and keep all the northern counties in order. This plan was disapproved of by Lord Melfort, sole secretary of state, who sent orders for the small army on foot instantly to march into England to reinforce the English army. On rumours of the landing of the prince reaching Scotland, Lord Balcarres was sent by the council to London to ascertain the state of matters. With Lord Dundee he waited upon the king a day or two after his return from his flight to Feversham, and was affectionately received. At the request of James they took a walk with his majesty in the Mall. The king asked them how they came to be with him, when all the world had forsaken him for the prince of Orange. Lord Balcarres said their fidelity to so good a master would ever be the same, and that they had nothing to do with the prince of Orange. Lord Dundee also made the strongest professions of duty. The poor king then demanded, "Will you two, as gentlemen, say you have still attachment to me?" They both replied, "Sir, we do." "Will you," said James, "give me your hands upon it, as men of honour?" They did so. "Well," continued the king, "I see you are the men I always took you to be. You shall know all my intentions. I can no longer remain here but as a cipher, or be a prisoner to the prince of Orange, and you know there is but a small distance between the prisons and the graves of kings, therefore I go for France immediately. When there, you shall have my instructions,—you, Lord Balcarres, shall have a commission to manage my civil affairs and you, Lord Dundee, to command my troops in Scotland." [Lives of the Lindsays vol. iii. p. 162.]

After James was gone, Lord Balcarres waited on the prince of Orange, to whom he was well known. The prince said he doubted not of his lordship's attachment to him at the convention. The earl replied, that although he had the utmost respect for his highness, he could have no hand in turning out his king, who had been a kind master to him, however imprudent in many things. The prince twice thereafter spoke to him on the same subject, but at last told him to beware how he behaved himself for if he transgressed the law, he should be left to it. Lords Balcarres and Dundee then returned to Scotland, where, with the archbishop of St Andrews, they received a commission from King James to call a new convention at Stirling. After Dundee had gone north to raise forces in King James' behalf, the duke of Hamilton who was president of the parliament, had been invested with full powers to imprison suspected persons, sent a detachment of infantry to Fife, to take Lord Balcarres prisoner. He was carried to Edinburgh and confined in the common gaol, where at first he had liberty to see his friends. At the first meeting of the convention, however, some intercepted letters, directed to him by the earl of Melfort, were read, wherein, after assurances of speedy relief he expressed a wish that some had been cut off that he and Lord Balcarres had often spoken of, and then these things had never happened, 'but when we get the power," it was added, "we will make these men hewers of wood and drawers of water." In his memorial to King James Lord Balcarres solemnly denied that he had ever heard Lord Melfort use any such expressions, and in the convention he was defended by the duke of Queensberry, who expressed his conviction that Melfort had written the letters on purpose to injure Lord Balcarres, with whom he was on very ill terms. Influenced by the duke of Hamilton, however, the convention voted his lordship close prisoner in the tolbooth, where he remained for four months. On the surrender of the castle of Edinburgh by the duke of Gordon, he was removed to that fortress and not released till after the death of Dundee at Killiecrankie, and consequent dispersion of his army. When confined to the castle he is said to have seen the ghost of his friend Dundee one morning at daybreak. The story is thus related. "The spectre, drawing aside the curtain of the bed, looked very steadfastly upon the earl, after which it moved towards the mantelpiece, remained there for some time in a leaning posture, and then walked out of the chamber without uttering one word. Lord Balcarres, in great surprise, though not suspecting that which he saw to be an apparition, called out repeatedly to his friend to stop, but received no answer, and subsequently learned that at the very moment this shadow stood before him Dundee had breathed his last near the field of Killiecrankie." [Law's Memorials, Prefatory Notice by C. Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Esq. p. xci. quoted by Lord Lindsay.] Lord Balcarres had no doubt been dreaming of Dundee, and the vision which he thus saw had been but the vivid impression of his dream.

He had no sooner regained his freedom than he engaged deeply in the plot set on foot by Sir James Montgomery of Skelmorly, for the restoration of King James, and on its discovery, in 1690, he thought it advisable to retire to the continent He first went to Holland to visit his first wife's relations, and then proceeded through Flanders in a coach with some friends on his way to France At one part of the journey he was proceeding on foot with a guide through a wood to the next stage, when he met with a party of banditti, who seized and robbed him, and were going to kill him, but on promising them a good ransom they spared his life He remembered that the Jesuits had a college at Douay, from which they were distant thirty miles—they, he said would pay his ransom The thieves agreed for one hundred pistoles, and took his oath never to discover them The money was paid, and he got his liberty, and went to the college where he found the famous Father Petre The priests treated him with great kindness, got him clothes, and lent him money on his bills [Lives of the Lindsays, vol iii p 176]

On his arrival at St Germains, he waited on the exiled monarch, by whom, as well as by the queen, he was received with great affection He delivered to King James the curious memoir, drawn up by himself, which with the title of 'An Account of the Affairs of Scotland relating to the Revolution of 1688,' was published in 1714 at London, and afterwards in 1754 at Edinburgh a work which has entitled Lord Balcarres to a place in Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors The manuscripts from which these editions were printed having been in several instances, corrupted and interpolated, Lord Lindsay has printed the Memoir for the Bannatyne Club, for the first time in its original state

Lord Balcarres remained for six months at St Germains, in great familiarity with King James, but his old opponent, Lord Melfort, and the priests, becoming jealous of the favour shown to him artfully forged a calumny against him and he was forbid the court He retired to the south of France whence he addressed an expostulatory letter to the king as his father on a similar occasion, had done to King Charles the Second in his exile James soon wrote to him, inviting him back again, owning that he had been imposed upon, but the earl refused to return After passing a year in France he went to Brussels then to Utrecht and sending for his wife and family from Scotland, resided there some years in tranquillity, in society with Bayle, Leclerc and other learned men He had married a second time Lady Jean Carnegie, eldest daughter of David earl of Northesk By this lady he had a daughter, Anne who became the wife of Alexander fifth earl of Kellie, and after his death of James third Viscount Kingston, attainted after the rebellion of 1715 and whom also she survived His second countess died in King Charles's reign, and he married a third time, Lady Jean Ker, paternally Drummond, only daughter of William earl of Roxburgh, youngest son of John earl of Perth, the cousin of that earl of Perth who was chancellor of Scotland under King James By this lady he was father of John, Lord Cummerland master of Balcarres, who died unmarried in November 1708, and Lady Margaret Lindsay who married John earl of Wigton and had one daughter, married to Sir Archibald Primrose

Owing to his long exile, and his carelessness in money matters, Lord Balcarres' affairs in Scotland fell into disorder, and he found himself five thousand pounds in debt Many applications were made to King William to permit him to return to Scotland In Carstares' State Papers, (page 630,) will be found a letter from the Duke of Queensberry to Carstares (secretary of state for Scotland), dated Holyroodhouse 31st August 1700, recommending his being allowed to return Carstares had already spoken to King William in Lord Balcarres' behalf His lordship had walked on foot, as usual, to the Hague, to solicit his favour Carstares told the king, a man he had once favoured was in so low a condition that he had footed it from Utrecht that morning to desire him to speak for him "If that be the case," said he, "let him go home, he has suffered enough already" Lord Balcarres accordingly returned to Scotland towards the end of 1700, after an exile of ten years [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p. 190]

On the accession of Queen Anne Lord Balcarres went to court, to wait on her Majesty, and as Lord Lindsay adds, to negotiate for the interests of the Episcopal church of Scotland The duke of Marlborough, with whom he had an early friendship, and who often said he was the pleasantest companion he ever knew, got him a rent-charge of five hundred pounds a year, for ten years, upon the crown lands of Orkney, as he had lost his pension of a thousand pounds per annum at the Revolution The grant, dated May 29, 1704, proceeds on the consideration of Anne, countess of Balcarres, having surrendered the heritable right to the government of the castle of Edinburgh Thus rent-charge his necessities compelled him afterwards to sell Although admitted a privy councillor by Queen Anne and talked of as likely to be appointed lord-justice-general, he held no public office subsequently to the Revolution [Ibid page 193]

Lord Balcarres supported the treaty of union, but on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, his old predilections for the Stuarts returned, and he joined the standard of the Pretender After the suppression of the rebellion, his friend the duke of Marlborough interposed his good offices on his behalf, and the duke of Argyle, by whose exertions principally the rebellion had been suppressed, being also favourable to him, on surrendering he was subjected to no other punishment than being confined to his own house, with a single dragoon to attend him, till the passing of the bill of indemnity His latter years were spent in retirement at Balcarres He was fond of books and added to his library He had also a taste for art and during his residence in Holland collected several pictures of the Dutch school, now in the possession of the present Lord Balcarres He caused a handsome village to be built below his house, which is named after himself, Colinsburgh, now a burgh of barony under the Balcarres family, and a thriving place He died in 1722, in his seventy-third year He had married a fourth time Lady Margaret Campbell, eldest daughter of James, second earl of Loudon, and by her, besides several children who died young, he had four who survived him, namely two sons, Alexander, fourth earl of Balcarres, and James, fifth earl, and two daughters Lady Eleanor Lindsay, married to the Hon James Fraser of Lonmay, third son of William, eleventh Lord Salton, and Lady Elizabeth, familiarly called Lady Betty Lindsay, who died at Edinburgh, 12th March, 1744, unmarried

Alexander, fourth earl of Balcarres, entered the army at an early age, and was first in ensign and then a lieutenant in the horse grenadier guards He next became a captain in Lord Orkney's regiment, then stationed in Flanders, in which he served from 1707 to the end of the war, was in all the battles and most of the sieges during that time, was wounded at St Venant and was looked upon by all as an active, intrepid and skilful officer Lord Lindsay quotes a spirited reply of his which is still remembered and cited in illustration of his character A portion of the British army, in which he had a command besieging a town in Flanders, was in its turn threatened by a superior force As he voted for perseverance in the siege, he was asked, "What then have we to retreat upon?" "Upon Heaven!" was his reply—and they ultimately took the town [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 202] He was in Ireland with his regiment at the time his father and brother engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and their participation in that outbreak made him lose all expectation of promotion in the army He returned home, and, in 1718, married Elizabeth, daughter of David Scott of Scotstarvet, in Fife In 1732 he was promoted to a company in the foot guards, the highest military rank he ever attained At the general election 1734, he was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland He died 21st July, 1756 By his countess, who survived him till 4th September 1768, he had no issue, and was consequently succeeded by his brother

James, fifth earl of Balcarres, was born 14th November, 1691 Preferring the naval to the military service, at the age of thirteen he went to sea on board the Ipswich, commanded by Captain Robert Kirkton, an excellent officer, with whom he remained five years, and through whose means he became lieutenant of the Portland In that ship he suffered much hardship for nearly three years, and lost his health, which obliged him to observe the strictest temperance in his habits, and he became so much accustomed to it that he persevered in it as long as he lived The following characteristic anecdote is related by Lord Lindsay "Like most other gay and handsome young men, he was fond of showing off his natural graces to the best advantage, and, on the day appointed for his examination as lieutenant, he waited upon his judges in a rich suit of clothes, with red silk stockings and pink heels to his shoes, his examiners were a set of rough seamen in sailors' jackets, who abhorred dandyism They determined not to let him pass, and sent him back to sea for six months At the expiration of that time, he re-appeared before the nautical tribunal, a wiser man—in a sailor's dress, with a quid of tobacco in his cheek,—passed a most rigid examination with great credit, and was dismissed with the assurance that he had acquitted himself equally to their satisfaction six months before—'but we were determined,' said they, 'not to pass you till you were cured of your puppyism, which will not do for a sailor'" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 197] His ship being paid off at the peace, he returned at the age of twenty-five to Scotland He opposed his father's inclinations to join the Pretender but finding him bent upon it he resolved to accompany him He and his friend, the Master of Sinclair, with the help of others, levied three troops of gentlemen, who acted as common soldiers Of this body he was one of the three captains At the battle of Sheriffmuir five squadrons of dragoons ran away before three squadrons of them They kept together and in order, acting with the greatest gallantry, and when the Highlanders returned from the pursuit, upon the left wing being beat, they had three squadrons to rally to This saved the army, and Lord Marischal, by order of the earl of Mar, came to their front, and thanked the whole body for their behaviour [Lady Anne Barnard, quoted in Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 198]

After the suppression of the rebellion he was concealed for some time in the castle of Newark, now ruinous, about three miles from Balcarres, and then belonging to the Anstruthers One of the young ladies, we are informed, concealed him in a secret room communicating with her apartment, and situated near the leads of the house To furnish him with food woman's wit came to her aid She feigned a ravenous appetite, the cravings of which increased to such a degree that she declared she could not bear to be seen eating In consequence, all her meals were brought to her room that she might eat by herself, and the supply her pretended voracity required served to satisfy both His aunt, the countess of Stair, represented him to General Cadogan as drawn into the rebellion by his father against his will, and solicited a remission for him, which was granted, at the joint request of Cadogan and Lord Stanhope, by George the First, who soon after gave young Lindsay a lieutenant's commission in the Royal North British dragoons, or Scots Greys, commanded by his uncle, Sir James Campbell He was in that station when he succeeded as Lord Balcarres, on the death of his brother, in 1736 He then went to London, gained the good-will of the earl of Ilay, the brother of the duke of Argyle, and Sir Robert Walpole, and got the command of a troop, with which he proceeded to the continent At the battle of Dettingen, fought 16th June 1743, he commanded one of the squadrons of his regiment, and was by some of the generals recommended to George the Second as deserving a higher rank The king "fell into a passion, and told the minister that he had occasion to know before that no person who had ever drawn his sword in the Stuart cause should ever rise to command, and that it was best to tell Lord Balcarres so at once" The earl, in consequence, resolved to quit the army, which he did after the battle of Fontenoy, where his gallant uncle, Sir James Campbell, received a mortal wound His lordship now retired to his seat at Balcarres, and devoted himself to the improvement of his estates In the old Statistical account of the parish of Kilconquhar, Fifeshire, he is described as a nobleman distinguished by the benevolence of his heart, the liberality of his sentiments, and the uncommon extent of his knowledge, particularly in history and agriculture, and as among the first who brought farming to any degree of perfection in this country [Stat Acc vol ix p 296] When almost sixty years of age, Lord Balcarres married He had met at the waters of Moffat, Miss Anne Dalrymple, youngest daughter of Robert Dalrymple, of Castleton, knight, and granddaughter of the Hon Sir Hew Dalrymple, of North Berwick, knight, lord president of the court of session She was born 20th December 1727, and married Lord Balcarres at Edinburgh 24th October 1749, when only twenty-two They had eight sons and three daughters Of this large family the celebrated Lady Anne Lindsay or Barnard [see BARNARD, Lady Anne] was the eldest Lord Balcarres died at Balcarres, 20th February 1768 in his seventy-seventh year

In his old age he was extremely deaf The death of his brother, in 1736, to whom he was much attached, had so nervously affected him that it suddenly deprived him of his sense of hearing, which was never restored He wrote a System of Agriculture, and Memoirs of his family, from which latter manuscript Douglas, in his peerage, derived much assistance in drawing up his account of the Balcarres family The manuscript was for a time lost, but was ultimately recovered Lady Anne Lindsay says it was lent to the brother of her governess, a herald in the office of the Lord Lion of Scotland, and on his death was sold among his books Many years afterwards it was discovered on a stall by a person who bought it for a shilling, and returned it to a member of the Balcarres family Lady Anne arranged it as well as its state permitted, but altered nothing, and wrote a preface to it A continuation was written by her brother, Alexander, the sixth earl From this valuable family history copious extracts are given by Lord Lindsay in his interesting biographical work Earl James was also the author of a poetical epistle, addressed to his wife, written after reading Thomson's Seasons, "my first," he says "and probably last essay in poetry" Of Thomson he says, "I lived a winter with the man at Bath, he had nothing amiable in his conversation, and I expected little from his writings, and never had before read them, yet his Seasons are truly poetic,—his descriptions beautiful, reflections wise" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 275, and note]

His eldest son but second child Alexander, the sixth earl of Balcarres, was born 18th January 1752, and when fifteen years of age he entered the army as an ensign in the 53d foot, and joined his regiment at Gibraltar He next went to Germany, where he remained two years, studying at the university of Gottingen On his return he became, in 1771, a captain in the 42d or Royal Highlanders In 1775 he was appointed, by purchase, all his commissions had been bought, major of his old regiment, the 53d, with which he embarked for Canada, on the breaking out of the American war In 1777 he commanded the light infantry in the unfortunate army under General Burgoyne, and at the battle near Ticonderago, 7th July of that year, he was wounded in the left thigh Thirteen balls passed through his jacket, waistcoat, and breeches, yet the wound was slight At the head of his regiment of light infantry he stormed and carried the lines of Huberton On the 7th of October following, on the fall of the gallant brigadier-general Frazer, the command devolved on Lord Balcarres, who having previously fortified his battalion in a very strong manner, at the head of his light infantry was enabled to repulse the American army commanded by General Arnold, although victorious on every other point A few days thereafter, however, he was forced to surrender with the army, in consequence of Burgovne's convention with General Gates at Saratoga on the thirteenth October He obtained his liberty two years afterwards, in 1779, and on his return home he married, at London, 1st June 1780, his cousin-german, Elizabeth, daughter and heiress, by a second marriage, of Charles Dalrymple, Esq of North Berwick While he remained a prisoner he had been appointed a lieutenant-colonel in the 24th regiment, and in February 1782 he was advanced to the rank of colonel, and constituted lieutenant-colonel commandant of the second battalion of 71st foot, then formed into a separate regiment, and called the second 71st regiment of foot

At the general election of 1784 Lord Balcarres was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland To the bill introduced into the house of lords that year, for restoring the forfeited estates, he gave his warmest support In answer to an inquiry of Lord Thurlow, then lord chancellor, as to where the persons to whom the estates originally belonged had resided, and what services they had been engaged in, since the two rebellions for which their ancestors and themselves had suffered, Lord Balcarres made a very eloquent and striking speech, in the course of which occurred the following passage "Banished their country, their properties confiscated, and impoverished in every thing but their national spirit, they offered their services to foreign princes, in whose armies they were promoted to important commands and trusts, which they discharged with fidelity, but the moment they saw a prospect of return to their friends and restoration to the bosom of their country, there was not a man of them that hesitated, they resigned those high stations, and from being general officers and colonels, accepted companies, and some even subaltern commissions in our service They were, indeed, returned to their friends, and received with open arms, nor, in the course of those twelve years, was there a man who had abandoned his chief because he was poor, or had deserted him because the heavy hand of adversity hung over his head A few more years promoted them to commands in the British service, and, at the beginning of the late war, we again see armies rushing from the Highlands, but not with the same ideas that formerly animated them They had already fully established their attachment to their sovereign, and a due regard to the laws of their country They had repeatedly received the thanks of their king, and of the two houses of parliament, but they now found themselves impelled by a further motive,—they saw themselves commanded by their former chieftains,—they hoped that, by the effusion of their blood, by the extraordinary ardour and zeal they would show in the service, they should one day see their leaders legally re-established in their paternal estates, and be enabled to receive from them those kindnesses and attentions which they had so generously bestowed upon them in their adversity It was this hope, and these ideas only, that put a stop to those emigrations which had almost depopulated the northern parts of the kingdom" In reply, the lord-chancellor, after disclaiming any intention of reflecting on the characters or impeaching the merits of the gallant gentlemen in whose favour this act of grace had been brought forward, proceeded to say, "It was fortunate for those brave men that, from what he had said, he had afforded an opportunity for their merits to be brought forward in a manner so truly honourable to them, and the best calculated to do them the justice they deserved He rejoiced that their merits had now received the highest remuneration, the praise of a soldier who had distinguished himself so eminently in the service of his country, that his competency to distribute either censure or approbation on military merit became unquestionable, and thence his applause was an honour superior to all reward So well satisfied was he with what had fallen from the noble lord on that part of the subject, that he declared he would desire no better proof of the merits of the persons concerned" This benevolent and important bill passed on the 18th of August, 1784 He was rechosen a representative Scottish peer at the elections of 1790, 1802, 1806, and 1807 He had been colonel of the 63d foot since the 27th August, 1789 and in 1793 he had the rank of major-general

On the breaking out of the war that year, he was appointed to the civil government and command of his majesty's forces in the island of Jersey, in the absence of Marshal Conway the governor While in that command he undertook and carried on the correspondence with the army of La Vendee, and the establishment of the lines of communications with its chiefs and those of the Chouans, a business on which he prided himself, and from which he had great expectations, but which, being mismanaged at home, came to nothing

In 1794 Lord Balcarres was named to the government of Jamaica where he arrived in April 1795 Almost immediately after his arrival the Maroons broke out in rebellion, for the suppression of which he at once adopted the most spirited and judicious measures, and was successful in putting an end to the revolt His exertions were acknowledged by the House of Assembly, 22d April 1796 voting the sum of seven hundred guineas for the purchase of a sword to be presented to him as a testimony of the gratitude of the colony In answer, his lordship congratulated the assembly that "during their contest with an enemy the most ferocious that ever disgraced the annals of history—an army of savages, who had indiscriminately massacred every prisoner whom the fate of war had placed in their power—no barbarity, nor a single act of retaliation, had sullied the brightness of their arms" In 1798 he became lieutenant-general, and in 1801 he resigned his government of Jamaica, and returned to England, and on the 25th September 1803, he attained to the full rank of general Having met with an accident which lamed him for life, he resided in his latter years at Haigh Hall, near Wigan, in Lancashire, the Haigh property being the inheritance of his countess, on failure of male issue in her maternal family that of Sir Robert Bradshaigh of Haigh, baronet, her ladyship's great-grandfather Besides the continuation of his father's Memoirs, already mentioned, Lord Balcarres commenced 'Anecdotes of a Soldier's Life,' which he did not finish In the third volume of the Lives of the Lindsays is inserted an interesting selection from his public despatches and private correspondence during the Maroon war He died March 27th, 1825 He had issue, James Lord Lindsay, the seventh earl of Balcarres, three other sons and two daughters

The following anecdote, related by the late Mr James Stuart younger of Dunearn, is eminently characteristic of Lord Balcarres Speaking of General Arnold the celebrated American renegade, he says that he "resided in England after the war, but was treated at various times in a way not likely to lead others to emulate his treasonable conduct He was with the king (George the Third) one day when Lord Balcarres, who had fought under General Burgoyne in the Saratoga campaign, (and had been specially opposed to him in the action of October 7, 1777, when his little redoubt saved the British army,) was presented The king introduced them 'What, Sire" said the earl, drawing up his form, and retreating, 'the traitor Arnold?' The consequence was a challenge from Arnold They met, and it was arranged that the parties should fire by signal Arnold fired and Lord Balcarres, turning on his heel, was walking away, when Arnold exclaimed, 'Why don't you fire, my lord?' 'Sir,' said Lord Balcarres, looking over his shoulder, 'I leave you to the executioner'" [Stuart's Three Years in North America, vol ii p 462]

The Hon Robert Lindsay, second son of the fifth earl of Balcarres born in 1754, was many years in the civil service of the East India Company Having served his time he was appointed to the superintendency of Sylhet, in the extreme north of Bengal, where he made a large fortune While still a resident in India, he purchased the estate of Leuchars in Fife, and on his return to Scotland in 1789 he bought from his elder brother the lands of Balcarres He married his cousin Elizabeth, third daughter of Sir Alexander Dick of Prestonfield, baronet, and had issue five sons and four daughters He wrote some interesting 'Anecdotes of an Indian Life' printed in the third volume of the Lives of the Lindsays He died in 1836 and was succeeded by his eldest son, Colonel James Lindsay of Balcarres and Leuchars, grenadier guards, colonel of the Fifeshire militia, and formerly member of parliament for Fifeshire By his second wife, Anne, daughter of Sir Coutts Trotter, baronet of Westville, he had Sir Coutts Lindsay, baronet, born in 1824 younger of Balcarres, author of 'Alfred a Drama,' and 'Edward the Black Prince, a Tragedy,' another son, named Robert, and three daughters Margaret the eldest, married in 1816 her cousin Lord Lindsay, the author of the Lives of the Lindsays

Three of the fifth earl's sons, Colin, James, and John were officers in the army The Hon Colin Lindsay, born 5th April 1755, purchased an ensigncy in November 1771, in the 4th regiment of foot He embarked for America as lieutenant in the 55th, and was afterwards promoted by purchase to a company in the 73d, or Mackenzie Highlanders He served as captain of grenadiers during the greater part of the American war, and was in all the actions in the West Indies In 1780 he was appointed major to the second battalion of the 73d and in that capacity served at Gibraltar during the famous siege of that fortress At the peace of 1783 he returned to England with his regiment, and was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 46th In December 1793 he was appointed aide-de-camp to the king, with the rank of colonel in the army An expedition being ordered to the West Indies, Colonel Lindsay was early in 1795 advanced to the rank of brigadier-general, and appointed quarter-master-general of the forces there He sailed with his brother, the earl of Balcarres, then proceeding to Jamaica, and landing at Barbadoes on 12th March was directed to take the command of the troops in Grenada, at that time in a dangerous state, on account of the revolt of the Mulattoes and Negroes excited by French emissaries He marched from St George's at four in the morning of the 15th, attacked and defeated the insurgents on the 17th, but fell a victim to excessive fatigue and a noxious climate, deeply lamented by his brother officers and the soldiers under his command His death took place 22d March 1795, in the fortieth year of his age He published A Military Miscellany, Extracts from Colonel Templehoffe's History of the Seven Years' War, his Remarks on General Lloyd, on the Substance of Armies, and on the March of Convoys also a Treatise on Winter Posts To which is added A Narrative of Events at St Lucie and Gibraltar, and of John Duke of Marlborough's March to the Danube, with the Causes and Consequences of that Manœuvre Lond 1793, 2 vols 8vo

The next son, the Hon James Stair Lindsay, entered the army in 1774, as an ensign in the 14th foot, then in America He commanded the grenadiers of the 73d in the engagement with the French and Mahrattas at Cuddalore 13th June 1783, when he was mortally wounded storming the redoubts of that place He received his wound about three o'clock but the attack and defence being most vigorous, he refused to be taken out of the enemies' lines, and lay there till near six, when a French officer got him a surgeon He was carried prisoner into the fort and taken to the French hospital, and humanely treated In a few days he died, 22d June 1783, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, unmarried General Stewart, in his Sketches of the Highlanders, (vol ii p 163,) speaks of him with great praise Part of an unfinished Journal of the War in the Carnatic, in which he fell, is inserted in the third volume of the Lives of the Lindsays

William, the next son, was drowned at St Helena, getting into a boat from the Pitt East Indiaman, in 1785, aged twenty-six, having been born in 1759

His next brother, the Hon Charles Dalrymple Lindsay entered into holy orders and became bishop of Kildare in Ireland He was born 14th December 1760, studied at Baliol College, Oxford had the rectory of Great Sutterton in Lincolnshire conferred on him in 1793, was consecrated bishop of Killaloe and Kilfenora, 20th October 1803, and was translated to the see of Kildare in 1804 He was also dean of Christ Church, Dublin He married first at Boston, 1st January 1790, Elizabeth only daughter of Thomas Fydell Esq, member of parliament for Boston, and by her, who died 7th February 1797, he had three sons and a daughter He married, secondly, Catherine, daughter of George Coussmaker, Esq, who brought him two sons He died 8th August, 1846

The Hon John Lindsay the ninth of the family, born 15th May 1762 had a lieutenant's commission in the 73d foot, in December 1777, and was promoted in 1780 to a captaincy in the 2d battalion of the 73d regiment serving in India, in which station he continued fifteen years He accompanied Colonel Fletcher and the troops detached to the support of Colonel Baillie, on Hyder Ali's memorable invasion of the Carnatic, and was taken prisoner by the Mahrattas, 10th September, 1780, after being wounded in four places, and endured a captivity of three years and ten months at Seringapatam, suffering the greatest privations and even denied medical aid His Journal of that terrible captivity, printed in the third volume of the Lives of the Lindsays, has been truly described as one of the most affecting and interesting narratives extant At the conclusion of the peace in March 1784 Captain Lindsay and his fellow-prisoners obtained their freedom, and rejoined their regiments He served under the Marquis Cornwallis in 1791–2, and with his friend Sir David Baird, was at the taking of Seringapatam, where he had so long been a prisoner He next served in the war with France in 1793 and returned to England on his regiment s being ordered home in 1797 He became major and lieutenant-colonel of the 71st, and quitted the army on the peace in 1801 Lord Lindsay states that in 1822, when General Stewart of Garth published his 'Sketches of the Highlanders,' Colonel Lindsay and Sir David Baird [see life of the latter ante p 191] were the only survivors of the two hundred men of the flank companies of the 73d who had fought under Baillie's command at Conjeveram [Lives of the Lindsays vol II p 349] He married, 2d December 1800, Lady Charlotte North, youngest daughter of Frederick second earl of Guilford, and died in 1826

The Hon Hugh Lindsay, the youngest son, born 30th October 1765, entered the navy, and after serving till the cessation of all promotion at the close of the American war, became commander of an East Indiaman, in the service of the East India Company, and afterwards was a director and chairman of the Company He married at Bengeny 14th January 1799, Jane, second daughter of the Hon Alexander Gordon a judge of the court of session, under the title of Lord Rockville, fourth son of William second earl of Aberdeen, by Anne, dowager countess of Dumfries and Stair, and had issue He died 23d April 1844 An interesting adventure in China, in which he figures as the principal actor, will be found in the third volume of the Lives of the Lindsays

Besides Lady Anne Barnard, already mentioned, the fifth earl had two other daughters, Lady Margaret and Lady Elizabeth Lady Margaret was born 14th February 1753, and married, first, at Balcarres, 20th June 1770, Alexander Fordyce, Esq of Roehampton in Surrey, banker in London, who died without surviving issue, and secondly, in 1812, Sir James Burgess, and died in Dublin in December 1814 The great beauty of this lady was commemorated by Sheridan while she was yet young in the well-known lines

> 'Marked you her eye of heavenly blue
> Marked you her cheek of rosy hue
> That eye in liquid circles roving,
> That cheek abashed at man's approving,
> The one Love's arrows darting round,
> The other blushing at the wound'

The youngest daughter Lady Elizabeth, born 11th October 1763, married 24th July 1782, Philip third earl of Hardwicke lord-lieutenant of Ireland from 1801 to 1806, and had issue Like the rest of the family she was highly gifted, and was the authoress of a beautiful translation of the 'Gerusalemme Liberata,' in manuscript Lord Lindsay quotes an 'Address to Entick,' written in a playful vein, when a mere girl, on the fly-leaf of Entick's grammar, on the occasion of an absurd task having been imposed on her by her school-mistress, also, lines addressed to her eldest son, Lord Viscount Royston on his birthday, and sent to him at Harrow in May 1796, inserted in the Lives of the Lindsays, (vol II pages 338 and 339) Lord Royston was lost in a storm off Lubeck 1st April 1808, in his twenty-fourth year His 'Remains' were published in one volume, edited by the Rev Henry Pepys, now bishop of Worcester

The venerable Countess Dowager of Balcarres, the mother of this large family, survived her husband the fifth earl, fifty-two years, and died at Balcarres 29th November 1820, in the ninety-fourth year of her age

James the seventh earl was born 24th April, 1783 He had entered the army, and was major in the 20th regiment of light dragoons, when he quitted the service in 1804 He succeeded his father in March 1825, and was created baron of Wigan, in the peerage of Great Britain, by patent, dated in June 1826 He married, 21st November 1811, the Hon Maria Margaret Frances Pennington, only surviving child of the first Lord Muncaster, and has issue four sons His eldest son, Alexander William Crawford, Lord Lindsay, born in 1812, is the author of a 'Letter on the Evidences of Christianity,' 'Letters on Egypt and the Holy Land,' 'The History of Christian Art,' and 'The Lives of the Lindsays,' from which latter work considerable assistance has been derived in the drawing up of this account of the Balcarres family He married, as already stated, his cousin Margaret, eldest daughter of Col Lindsay of Balcarres, and has issue

On the death of George, the twenty-second earl of Crawford, in 1808 Alexander, sixth earl of Balcarres, succeeded as twenty-third earl of Crawford, but did not assume that title His son, the seventh earl of Balcarres, had the dignities of earl of Crawford and baron Lindsay adjudged to him by the decision of the House of Lords, 11th August 1848, [see CRAWFORD, earldom of and LINDSAY, Lord,] whereby he succeeded as twenty-fourth earl of Crawford, and takes rank as the premier earl of Scotland in the Union roll His lordship, who is the acknowledged chief of the clan Lindsay, also claims the title of duke of Montrose (see that title), conferred on David, fourth earl of Crawford, by charters dated 18th May 1488 and 19th Sept 1489, an older creation than that held by the head of the ancient house of Graham

The Balcarres arms are the same as those of the earl of Crawford, which see

BALFOUR, a very ancient name in Fife, derived from the lands of Balfour, in the parish of Markinch, formerly belonging to a family which were long heritable sheriffs of Fife Balfour castle was built upon their ancient possessions, in the vale or strath of the Orr, a tributary of the Leven, near their confluence Bal-orr is the original name The family of Balfour, according to Sibbald, possessed these lands as early as the reign of Duncan the First, [Hist of Fife, p 366], and assumed from them their name The first of the family in Scotland was Siward, supposed to have come from Northumberland, in the reign of that monarch His son, Osulf, who lived in the time of Malcolm Canmore, was the father of Siward, to whom King Edgar gave the valley of Orr, that is, Strathor and Macy, "pro capite Ottar Dani" Siward's son Oetred, witnessed a charter of David the First about 1141 He was the father of Sir Michael Balfour, who had two sons William, the eldest, was the ancestor of the Balfours of Balfour About the year 1196 Sir Michael de Balfour obtained a charter from William the Lion, dated at Forfar In 1229, in the fifteenth year of the reign of Alexander the Second, his son, Sir Ingelramus de Balfour, sheriff of Fife, was witness to a charter of confirmation by that monarch to the monastery of Aberbrothock, of a mortification to them by Philip de Moubray, 'De uno plenario tofto in Innerkeithing' His son Henry was witness to another confirmation by the same monarch to that monastery of a donation by Malcolm earl of Angus, 'De terris in territorio de Kerimur' He was the father of John de Balfour, who, with many of the barons of Fifeshire, fell at the sack of Berwick by Edward the First, 30th March, 1296 His son, Sir Duncan de Balfour, adhered to the fortunes of Sir William Wallace, and was slain 12th June 1298 at the battle of Blackironside, where the English, under Sir Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, were defeated with great slaughter Amongst others present at the parliament held at Cambuskenneth, 6th November 1314, were David de Balfour and Malcolm de Balfour, as their seals are appended to the general sentence by that parliament of forfeiture of all the rebels In the parliament held at Ayr in 1315 were Sir Michael de Balfour, sheriff of Fife, and David de Balfour, their seals are appended to the act of that parliament for settling the crown [Ibid pp 366, 367] Sir Michael died in 1344, and in 1375, the fifth year of the reign of Robert the Second his eldest son and successor, Sir John Balfour of Balfour died, leaving an only daughter, Margaret, who married Sir Robert de Bethune, 'familiaris regis Roberti,' as he is styled From them the present proprietor of Balfour, J E Drinkwater Bethune, Esq, is descended Several of the other Fife heritors of the name of Bethune, as the Bethunes of Bandon, of Tarvet, of Blebo, of Clatto, of Craigfudie, and of Kingask, were also descended from them Of the most remarkable personages belonging to the Bethunes of Balfour were James Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow and chancellor of Scotland, his nephew, Cardinal Bethune, and the nephew of the cardinal, James Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow [See BETHUNE, surname of] In the house of Balfour are original portraits of Cardinal Bethune, and of Mary Bethune, celebrated for her beauty, one of the queen's four Maries

Besides many illustrious descendants in the female line the surname of Balfour has been ennobled by three peerages, namely, the baronies of Burleigh and Kilwinning in Scotland, and of Balfour of Clonawley in Ireland In Sir Robert Sibbald's time at the beginning of the eighteenth century, there were a greater number of heritors in Fife named Balfour than of any other surname His list contains no less than thirteen landed proprietors in that county of the name, viz., the Balfours of Burleigh, of Fernie, of Dunbog, of Denmylne, of Grange, of Forret, of Randerston, of Raderne, of Northbank, of Balbirnie, of Halbeath, of Lawlethan, and of Banktown [Hist. of Fife, App No II] In his Memoria Balfouriana, he says the family of Balfour is divided into several branches, of which those of Balgarvie, Mountwhanney, Denmylne, Ballovy, Carriston, and Kirkton are the principal.

Sir John Balfour of Balfour, already mentioned as the father of Margaret the wife of Sir Robert de Bethune, had an only brother, Adam, who married the granddaughter of Macduff, brother of Colbane, earl of Fife, and obtained with her the lands of Pittencrieff He died of wounds received at the battle of Durham, in 1346 and was buried in Melrose abbey His son, Sir Michael Balfour, was brought up by his kinsman Duncan, twelfth earl of Fife, who in 1353 gave in exchange for Pittencrieff the much more valuable lands of Mountwhanney The countess Isabella, daughter of earl Duncan, also bestowed many grants of land upon her "cousin" Sir Michael, who, at her death without issue, should have succeeded as her nearest heir, but the regent Albany, the brother of her second husband, obtained the earldom in virtue of a disposition in his favour by the countess Sir Michael died about 1385 His eldest son, Michael Balfour of Mountwhanney, had a son, Sir Lawrence, of Strathor and Mountwhanney, who, by his wife Marjory, had three sons George, his heir, John of Balgarvie, progenitor, by his son James, of the Balfours of Denmylne, Forret, Randerston, Torry and Boghall, Kinloch, &c, and David Balfour of Carraldstone or Carriston The latter family terminated in an heiress, Isabel Balfour, who married a younger son of the fourth Lord Seton, ancestor of the Setons of Carriston

James Balfour, son of Sir John Balfour of Balgarvy, in 1451 obtained from King James the Second the lands of Denmylne, in the parish of Abdie, and county of Fife, originally belonging to the earls of Fife, and which fell to the crown at the forfeiture of Murdoch duke of Albany This James Balfour was slain at the siege of Roxburgh, soon after the death of James the Second, in 1460, as appears from a charter, granted by James the Third, in favour of John Balfour his son, who married Christian Sibbald, daughter of Peter Sibbald of Rankeillor, and fell with his sovereign, James the Fourth, at the battle of Flodden, in 1513 Patrick his son was the father of Alexander Balfour, whose son, Sir Michael Balfour, was knighted at Holyroodhouse, 26th March 1630, by George Viscount Dupplin, chancellor of Scotland, under a special warrant from Charles the First, and the same year in which his son Sir James received a similar honour Sir Michael was comptroller of the household to Charles the First, and was equally distinguished for his military courage and civil prudence By his wife, Jane, daughter of James Durham of Pitkerrow he had five sons and nine daughters, seven of whom were honourably married

Of the eldest son, Sir James Balfour of Kinnaird, the celebrated annalist and antiquary, a life is given below

The second son, Alexander, styled of Lumbarnie, was a minister of the gospel, a man, says Sibbald, not more respected for the dignity of his appearance than for the wisdom and piety of his life

Michael Balfour of Randerston, the third son, was eminently distinguished for his experience and skill in agricultural matters

Sir David Balfour of Forret, the fourth son, was admitted advocate 29 January 1650 In 1674 he was knighted, and nominated a judge in the court of session He took his seat on the bench with the title of Lord Forret The following year he was appointed a judge of the court of justiciary In 1685 he was elected a commissioner for the county of Fife to the parliament which met that year, chosen one of the lords of the articles, and appointed a commissioner for the plantation of kirks He died shortly after the Revolution [Haig and Brunton's History of the Senators of the College of Justice, p 402] His second son, James Balfour, succeeded to the lands of Randerston

A subsequent proprietor of the estate of Forret, probably a descendant of this learned judge, seems to have entertained a design of erecting a convenient place of refreshment for the members of the college of justice at Edinburgh, for in a note to Kay's Portraits [vol i p 22] we find the following passage, which is curious as marking the habits of the members of the bar about the middle of the eighteenth century "In the minutes of the Faculty of Advocates, 13th February 1741, there is an entry relative to a petition presented to the Dean and Faculty by James Balfour of Forret, stating that he intended to build a coffeehouse adjoining to the west side of the Parliament House, 'for the conveniency and accommodation of the members of the college of justice, and of the senators of the court,' and that he was anxious for the patronage of the society He also mentioned that he had petitioned the judges, who had unanimously approved of the project A remit was made to the curators of the library, and to Messrs Cross and Barclay, to consider the petition, and report whether it should be granted, but nothing appears to have been done by the committee" The estate of Forret, which is in the parish of Logie, anciently belonged to the Forrets of that ilk, a son of which house, who had been vicar of Dollar, suffered martyrdom on the Castlehill of Edinburgh in 1538 [See FORRET, surname of] It is now the property of a family of the name of Mackenzie

Of Sir Michael's youngest son, Sir Andrew Balfour, doctor of medicine, the distinguished naturalist and scholar, a memoir is given below

The descendants of Sir James Balfour, lyon king at arms, continued long to possess the lands of Denmylne The family is now entirely extinct in the male line, and is represented by Lord Balhaven as heir of line [See BELHAVEN, lord] The complete extinction of this family is the more remarkable, as it is stated by Sir Robert Sibbald that Sir Michael Balfour lived to see three hundred of his own issue, while Sir Andrew, his youngest son, saw six hundred descendants from his father The ruins of the old church of Abdie, on the western shore of the loch of Lindores, still contain several monuments of this family

About the close of the seventeenth century a fatal duel occurred between Sir Robert Balfour of Denmylne, and Sir James Macgill of Lindores, who were near neighbours and intimate friends Sir Robert was a young man in his prime, Sir James was much more advanced in years Attended by their servants, they had both gone to Perth on a market day when Sir Robert unfortunately quarrelled and fought with a Highland gentleman on the street Sir James came up at the time and parted the combatants In doing this, it is said, he made some observations as to the superiority of the Highlander, which offended Sir Robert, who, chafed and angry, offered next to fight his friend They returned home together on the evening of a long summer day When at Cupow they dismounted, gave their servants their horses, and, ascending by the road a considerable way up the hills, they stopped at a spot on the slope of the Ochils where a small cairn of stones, locally known by the name of Sir Robert's Prap, was afterwards raised to commemorate the event They there drew their swords A shepherd, who was sitting on a higher part of the hills, is said not only to have seen what took place, but even to have overheard what passed between them It is said that Sir James Macgill, who is alleged to have been by far the more expert swordsman of the two, made various attempts to be reconciled to his angry friend, and even after they were engaged, conducted himself for a time merely on the defensive But from the fury with which Sir Robert fought, he was forced to change his plan, and to attack in turn The consequence was that Sir Robert was run through the body, and died on the spot, when Sir James mounted and rode off, leaving his corpse to the care of the servants It is added that Sir James immediately afterwards proceeded to London, where he obtained a pardon from King Charles the Second Mr Small, in his Roman Antiquities, tells a foolish and very improbable story of Sir James being obliged by the king to fight an Italian swordsman then in London, who had previously acted the bully, but who also fell beneath the skilful arm of the Scottish knight [Leighton's Hist of Fife, vol ii p 178] The fate of the last baronet of Denmylne is equally remarkable He set out on horseback from his own house to pay a visit and neither man nor horse was ever again heard of It is supposed that he perished in some of the lochs or marshes with which Fife then abounded Shortly after his disappearance Denmylne was purchased by General Scott of Balcomie, the father of the duchess of Portland and the viscountess Canning These lands were subsequently bought from her grace, when marchioness of Litchfield, by the brother of the present proprietor Thomas Watt, Esq of Denmylne

Another branch of the house of Balfour possesses the lands of Balbirnie in the parish of Markinch, Fifeshire During the reign of Malcolm the Fourth, the lands of Balbirnie belonged to Orm the son of Hugh, abbot of Abernethy, the ancestor of the family of Abernethy [See ABERNETHY surname of, ante, p 14] He exchanged them with Duncan earl of Fife, the charter being conferred by William the Lion Sibbald says that anciently these lands belonged to a family who took their name from them, and were designed Balbirnie of that ilk About the end of the sixteenth or beginning of the seventeenth century, the lands of Balbirnie were purchased from the Balbirnies, who held them under the earls of Fife, by George Balfour, son of Martin Balfour of Dovan and Inchtan, the ancestor of the present proprietor This Martin Balfour was, in 1596, served heir to his grandfather David Balfour, in the lands of Dovan and Inchtan He was descended from Peter Balfour, a younger son of Balfour of Balfour who, having married a daughter of Thomas Sibbald of Balgonie, obtained from his father-in-law a charter of the lands of Dovan in the reign of Robert the Third The present proprietor of Balbirnie seems therefore, to divide with Balfour of Balfour, the representation of the ancient family of Balfour of Balfour

BALFOUR of BURLEIGH, Lord, an attainted barony in the peerage of Scotland, formerly held by a branch of the Fife family of Balfour In 1445–6 Sir John Balfour of Balgarvie, [from the Celtic Bal-garbh, the rough town or dwelling,] had a grant of the lands of Burleigh in Kinross-shire, which were erected into a free barony in his favour, by King James the Second, in the ninth year of his reign He had two sons, Michael and James The latter is said to have been the ancestor of the Balfours of Denmylne, Forret, and other families of the name The eldest son, Michael, was the father of Sir Michael Balfour designed of Burleigh, who, besides other charters, had one of the lands of easter and wester Balgarvie, on the 16th February 1505–6, and another to himself and Margaret Mushet his wife, of the lands of Schanwell 28th May 1512

His grandson, Michael Balfour of Burleigh, was served heir to his father in 1542 He had a charter of half of the lands of Kinloch and office of coroner of Fife, 18th June 1566 He married Christian, daughter of John Bethune of Creich, and had an only child, his sole heiress, Margaret Balfour, who married Sir James Balfour of Pittendreich and Mountwhanney, lord president of the court of session, whose life is given below Sir James' eldest brother Michael Balfour of Mountwhanney, commendator of Melrose, was the progenitor of the Balfours of Trenaby, in Orkney

Sir James had six daughters and three sons The eldest son, Sir Michael Balfour of Burleigh, had a charter of the lands of Nethertown of Auchinhuffis in Banffshire, 28th October 1577, and another of the barony of Burleigh, 29th October 1606 By James the Sixth, he was honoured with the title of Lord Balfour of Burleigh, by letters patent, bearing date at Royston, in England, 7th August 1606, Sir Michael being then James' ambassador to the duke of Tuscany and the duke of Lorraine [Sibbald's Hist of Fife, page 279] He was created a lord of parliament under the same title at Whitehall 10th July 1607, without any mention of heirs in the creation [Carmichael's Tracts] His lordship was subsequently sworn of the privy council On 7th Sept 1614, a charter was granted to Michael, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, of the barony of Kilwinning, with the title of Lord Kilwinning to him and his heirs and assigns whatever [Douglas' Peerage, vol i page 180] His lordship married first, Margaret Adamson, and secondly, Margaret, daughter of Lundie of Lundie, by whom he had a daughter Margaret, who succeeded him as baroness Balfour of Burleigh She married Robert Arnot, the son of Sir Robert Arnot of Fernie, chamberlain of Fife This Robert Arnot assumed on his marriage the name of Balfour, and had the title of Lord Burleigh, in virtue of a letter from the king At the meeting of the Scottish parliament in 1640, the estates, in consequence of the absence of a commissioner from his majesty, appointed Lord Burleigh their president, and he was continued in that office in 1641 He was also one of the commissioners for negotiating the treaty of peace with England in 1640 and 1641, and in the latter year was one of the privy councillors constituted by parliament During Montrose's wars, he was actively engaged on the side of the parliament, and seems to have acted in the north as a general of the forces In September 1644 the marquis of Montrose, with an army of about two thousand men approached Aberdeen, and summoned it to surrender, but the magistrates, after advising with Lord Burleigh, who then commanded in the town a force nearly equal in number to the assailants, refused to obey the summons, upon which a battle ensued within half-a-mile of the town, on the 12th of that month, in which Burleigh was defeated He was also one of the committee of parliament attached to the army under General Baillie, which through the dissensions of its leaders, was totally routed by the troops of Montrose on the bloody field of Kilsyth 15th August 1645 He opposed the "engagement" to march into England for the rescue of King Charles, and was one of those who effectually dissuaded Cromwell from the invasion of Scotland In 1649, under the act for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence, Lord Burleigh was one of the colonels for the county of Fife, and the same year he was nominated one of the commissioners of the treasury and exchequer He died at Burleigh 10th August 1663 By his wife, who predeceased him in June 1639 he had four daughters and one son Jean, the eldest daughter, married, in 1628, David, second earl of Wemyss, and died 10th November 1649, leaving one daughter, Jean, countess of Angus and Sutherland Margaret, the second daughter, became the wife of Sir James Crawford of Kilbirnie, without issue Isabel, the third daughter, married Thomas, first Lord Ruthven, and had issue The youngest daughter, whose name is not mentioned, married her cousin Arnot of Fernie.

John Balfour, third Lord Balfour of Burleigh, spent his younger years in France, where he was wounded. On his return home, on passing through London, he married, early in 1649, without his father's consent, Isabel, daughter of Sir William Balfour of Pitcullo, lieutenant of the tower of London His father, with the view of having the marriage annulled, got it proposed, in a general way, to the General Assembly the same year, but no answer was given to the application Lord Burleigh died in 1688, leaving, besides Robert, his heir, two other sons and six daughters. His second son, John Balfour of Fernie, was a lieutenant-colonel in the reign of James the Seventh He had two sons, Arthur, father of John Balfour of Fernie, and John, who succeeded by entail to the estate of Captain William Crawford, whose name and arms he assumed, and left issue Henry, the third son of Lord Burleigh, was styled of Dunbog He was a major of dragoons and one of the representatives for the county of Fife in the last parliament of Scotland, in which he warmly opposed the union He was the father of Henry Balfour of Dunbog

Robert, fourth lord Balfour of Burleigh, was, in 1689, appointed one of the commissioners for executing the office of clerk register He died in 1713 His lordship married Lady Margaret Melville, only daughter of George, first earl of Melville, by whom he had a son and two daughters Margaret, the eldest, died unmarried at Edinburgh 12th March 1760 Mary the younger married in 1714 Brigadier-general Alexander Bruce of Kennet, and died at Skene in Stirlingshire 7th November 1758, leaving a son and daughter, the former became a lord of session under the title of Lord Kennet

Robert Balfour, fifth Lord Balfour of Burleigh, was a man of a most daring and desperate character In his early youth, while still master of Burleigh, he fell in love with a girl of inferior rank, whose name has not been given, and in consequence his father sent him to the continent, in the hope that travel would remove the feeling of attachment for her from his mind Before setting out he exacted a promise from the girl, that she would not marry any one in his absence, declaring that if she did he would put her husband to death, when he came back Notwithstanding this threat she married Henry Stenhouse a schoolmaster at Inverkeithing, although not without informing him of the risk he incurred in taking her On the return of the master of Burleigh his first inquiry was after the girl, and on being informed of her marriage, with two attendants, he proceeded on horseback directly to the school of Stenhouse, and calling the unfortunate schoolmaster to the door, he shot him in the shoulder 9th April 1707 Stenhouse died of the wound twelve days after Young Balfour was tried for the murder in the High Court of Justiciary 4th August 1709, when his counsel pleaded in defence that there was no malice prepense, that the wound had not been in a mortal place but in the arm, plainly showing that the intention had been to frighten or correct, not to kill, and lastly, that the libel had not been that the wound was deadly on the contrary it admitted that the deceased had lived several days after it and the prisoner would prove malum regimen and a fretful temper as the immediate causes of death Notwithstanding this ingenious defence the Jury found him guilty, and he was sentenced, 29th November, to be beheaded 6th January 1710, but a few days before that date he escaped from prison by exchanging clothes with his sister, who was extremely like him [Maclaurin's Criminal

Trials] He skulked for some time in the neighbourhood of Burleigh Castle, Kinross-shire, and an ash tree, hollow in the trunk, was long pointed out as his place of shelter and concealment From having been often the place of his retreat, it bore the name of Burleigh's Hole After sustaining the ravages of the weather for more than a century, it was completely blown down in 1822 On the death of his father in 1713, the title devolved on him, and the next thing heard of him is his appearance at the meeting of Jacobites at Lochmaben, 29th May 1714, when the Pretender's health was publicly drunk by them at the Cross on their knees, Lord Burleigh denouncing damnation against all who would not drink it [Rae's History of the Rebellion, p 49] He engaged in the rebellion of 1715, for which he was attainted by act of parliament, and his title and estate, which then yielded six hundred and ninety-seven pounds a-year, forfeited to the crown He died without issue in 1737 The representation of the family of Balfour of Burleigh is claimed by Bruce of Kennet, also, by Balfour of Fernie

Sir James Balfour, knight, the second son of Sir James Balfour of Pittendreich, by Margaret his wife, only child and heir of Michael Balfour of Burleigh, Esq, was created by James the Sixth in 1619 a peer of Ireland, under the title of Lord Balfour, baron of Clonawley, in the county of Fermanagh His lordship died October 1634, when the title appears to have become extinct He was buried at St Anne's, Blackfriars, London From his brother, William Balfour, who settled in Ireland, are descended the family of Townley-Balfour of Townleyhall, in the county of Louth

The John Balfour of Burley of Sir Walter Scott's novel of Old Mortality, was usually designed of Kinloch He was the principal actor in the murder of Archbishop Sharp His estate was forfeited, and a reward of ten thousand marks offered for himself He fought both at Drumclog and at Bothwell Bridge, and is said to have afterwards taken refuge in Holland, where he offered his services to the prince of Orange He is generally supposed to have died at sea on his voyage back to Scotland, immediately previous to the Revolution There are strong presumptions, however for believing that he never left Scotland, but found an asylum in the parish of Roseneath, Dumbartonshire, under the protection of the Argyle family, and that having assumed the name of Salter, his descendants continued there for many generations The last of the race died in 1815 [New Stat Acc of Scotland, article Roseneath]

We learn from Schiller's History of the Siege of Antwerp from 1570 to 1580, that a Sir Andrew Balfour and his company of Scots defended that city against the Prince of Parma The name seems still to exist in Holland, for in the Brussels papers of 28th July 1808, Lieutenant-colonel Balfour de Burleigh is named Commandant of the troops of the king of the Netherlands in the West Indies —[Note 2, B to Scott's Old Mortality]

BALFOUR, Sir James, of Pittendreich, an eminent lawyer of the sixteenth century, was a son of Sir Michael Balfour of Mountquhanny in the parish of Kilmany, Fife Being designed for the church, he studied both divinity and law, as was usual in those days His brother David was one of the murderers of Cardinal Bethune, and he himself, after the murder, joined the conspirators in the castle of St Andrews On the surrender of the castle in June 1547, he was put into the same galley with Knox, and carried prisoner to France After his return to Scotland in 1549, he abandoned his former friends, and denied that he had been in the castle of St Andrews or the French galleys at all, for which Knox has severely denounced him in his History He was appointed official of the archbishop of St. Andrews within the archdeaconry of Lothian, and in 1559, he gave his active support to the queen regent against the lords of the congregation, which led Knox to declare that "of an old professor he had become a new denier of Christ Jesus and manifest blasphemer of his eternal verity" [Knox's History, page 173] From this it has been supposed that Balfour had become a Roman Catholic He seems to have been, with good reason, suspected of tampering with some of the protestant lords, as a boy of his was taken with a writ which "did open the most secret thing that was devised in the council, yea, those very things which were thought to have been known but to very few" [Ibid p 200] He escaped the search of the reformers of Fife in February 1560, when the lords of Wemyss, Seafield and others were taken prisoners, and about the same time he was appointed parson of Flisk in Fifeshire Shortly after the return of Queen Mary from France, 12th Nov 1561, he was nominated an extraordinary lord of session under the title of Lord Pittendreich, and two years after, in 1563, he was made an ordinary lord In 1564, on the institution of the Commissary Court at Edinburgh, he became chief commissary with a salary of four hundred marks In July 1565 he was sworn of the privy council On the night of Rizzio's murder, he was with the queen at Holyroodhouse, and his enemies intended to have hanged him at the same time, but he made his escape [Keith's Hist p 382] He was subsequently knighted by the queen, and promoted to the office of clerk register, in place of Mr James Macgill In 1566 he was one of the commissioners for revising and publishing the old laws called Regiam Majestatem, &c, and the acts of parliament [Douglas' Peerage, vol 1 p 177] He is said to have been the original deviser of the murder of Darnley, to have framed the bond for mutual support entered into by the conspirators, and to have prepared the house of the Kirk of Field, at Edinburgh, which was possessed by his brother, for the reception of Darnley [Chalmers' Life of Mary, vol ii p 25 — Laing's Dissert vol ii p 87] It is certain that on his removal to Edinburgh the unhappy Darnley was "lodged in the mansion of the provost, or chief prebendary of the collegiate church of St Mary in the Fields, as a place of good air This house stood nearly on the site of the present north-west corner of Drummond Street, as is ascertained from Gordon's map of the city of Edinburgh in 1647, where the ruins are indicated as they existed at that period It is said to have been selected by Sir James Balfour, brother of the provost, and 'the most corrupt man of his age,' (Robertson's Hist vol ii p 354,) as well fitted from its lonely situation for the intended murder" [Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh, vol i p 78]

Immediately after that dreadful event, which took place 9th February 1567, Balfour was openly accused of having been accessory to it, and a paper of the following tenor was affixed to the door of the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, on the night of the 16th of February "I, according to the proclamation, have made inquisition for the slaughter of the king, and do find the earl of Bothwell, Mr James Balfour, parson of Flisk, Mr David Chambers and black Mr John Spence, the principal devisers thereof, and if this be not true spier at Gilbert Balfour" [Keith's Hist p 368] In the beginning of 1567 he had been appointed deputy governor of Edinburgh castle, under the earl of Bothwell, who committed to his care the famous bond, signed by eight bishops, nine earls, and seven barons, declaring that ambitious and unscrupulous nobleman guiltless of Darnley's murder and a suitable match for the queen, which he afterwards used with fatal effect against the regent Morton According to the enemies of Mary it was to Sir James Balfour that Bothwell, after Mary's surrender at Carberry, sent for the casket said to contain the letters that formed the alleged evidence of her guilt, which casket he delivered, but on secret information furnished by him, the messenger was seized by the confederated lords, with whom he was at the time tampering [Buchanan, b xviii p 51]

After the imprisonment of Mary, Balfour surrendered the castle of Edinburgh to the regent Murray, on the following conditions first, a pardon for his share in the king's murder, secondly, a gift of the priory of Pittenweem, then held by the regent in commendam, thirdly, an heritable annuity to his son out of the rents of the priory of St Andrews, and, fourthly, a gift of five hundred pounds to himself These terms being fulfilled, the castle was delivered into the hands of Sir William Kirkaldy of Grange, who was appointed governor He was continued in the privy council by the regent Murray, to please whom he resigned his office of clerk register, when Sir James Macgill was re-appointed For this service, in December of the same year (1567) Balfour received a pension of five hundred pounds, and was appointed president of the court of session He was present at the battle of Langside on the side of the regent, and was instrumental in obtaining the overthrow of his former benefactress [Melville's Memoirs, p 202] Seldom long constant to any party, and equally ungrateful to Murray for the honours conferred upon him as he had been to his hapless sister, Sir James Balfour, during the years 1568 and 1569, busily engaged in intrigues in behalf of Mary, and was, in consequence in August of the latter year, apprehended by the earl of Lennox, for participation in his son's murder He was, however, set at liberty on caution, but was never brought to trial, having made his peace with the regent by means of large bribes to his servants [Ibid p 221] After the assassination of the regent in January 1570, he openly joined the party of the queen In Bannatyne's Journal, under date April 1570, there occurs the following passage 'The quenis factione, to wit the Hamiltones, Argyle, Huntlie, Boyd, Crawford, Ogilbie, and Sir James Balfoure, remained at Lynlythgow, and there, after divers consultationes, vnderstanding that the Englis armie was retired furth of Scottis boundis, take baldness vpon them be oppin proclamatione to set vp the authoritie of that murtherer and knawin adultres called the quene, and so all farther conference betwixt the two parties ceased, for the lordis that sustened the kingis querrall answerit in few wordis, that they culd have no farther commoning with opin and periured traytoris, as they were everie one" [Bannatyne's Journal, p 14] At the time Maitland of Lethington and Kirkaldy of Grange maintained the castle of Edinburgh for the queen, Balfour joined them, and his name, with that of Gilbert and Robert Balfour, occurs in a list of persons forfeited on the 30th day of August 1571 [Ibid p 258] By the end of the following year he made his peace with the regent Morton, and was a chief instrument in bringing about the pacification, at Perth, between the king's and queen's party in January 1573, which, by the submission of all the queen's lords, left Kirkaldy and Maitland entirely at the mercy of their ruthless enemy, Morton Bannatyne says he "remained not in the castle with the rest of the traytours, albeit he is als grit a traytor as ony of thame all He gave in a long scrole to the lordis of the articles of the parliament, that he might be restored to all thingis, &c, whairwith mony stumbleth, and in speciall the bischop of Orknay, now abbot of Halirudhous, wha protestit for the copie of it, but I haid no word that it was obteaned Sindrie scroles were gewin in vpon the said Sir James declaring his treassonable dealingis in tymes bypast, nottheles his dres is made with the regent, and he hes tane him in his protectione" [Bannatyne's Journal p 440] He seems to have been at this time governor of Blackness castle, on the frith of Forth, and to fill up the measure of his treachery to his former friends, when Sir William Kirkaldy's brother, Sir James, arrived there from France with a supply of money and stores for the queen's service, he received him with due honour and pretended welcome, but the very night of his guest's arrival, he placed him in a dungeon heavily chained, and with the money which Sir James Kirkaldy had brought from France, departed for Edinburgh to hand it over to Morton He had compounded with the regent for his pardon, and was to have paid him a large sum of money for his composition, but, says Bannatyne, "the getting agane the Blacknes, and also Mr James Kirkaldie payis that, as is reported, for it was affirmed that he said to the regent, gif I can get you as gude (or better) as my compositione, sall not I be freed thereof, which the regent grantit For as I have said, it was alledgit that the said Sir James had written to Mr James Kirkaldie, befor his cumming out of France, to cum to the Blacknes, and not to cum to the north, becaus that gif the lord Huntlie had gottin the gold, he wald hald it to himself, or elis the maist part thereof, and so give to thame of the castle what he lyked But howsoever the matter was, the said Mr James come and landit at the Blacknes, a little efter the parliament, with his coffers, thinking it had bene sure for him as befor, and least that ony thing suld be knawin, but that it ware tane perforce, Sir James, or the Captane Alexander Stewart, had gewin advertisment of the said James cumming" [Ibid p 441]

The regent Morton, however, was not disposed to put his trust in a man who had betrayed and deserted both sides as Balfour had done, and in the following month of February, a complaint against him and his brother for the murder of Darnley and other grievous crimes, which are recited in full by Bannatyne in his Journal, [pp 444—455], was read before the lords of the articles in parliament, in consequence of which he was obliged to make his escape into France, where he remained for some years On the resignation of the regency by Morton in 1578, he returned to Scotland, and joined the party who watched for that nobleman's destruction In 1579 Morton recovered his authority, and Balfour again fled, when the forfeiture of 1571 was re-enacted

In 1580, after James the Sixth had assumed the reins of government, Balfour returned to Scotland to organise a plan for the destruction of Morton On the trial of that nobleman he produced the celebrated bond already mentioned, signed by him and others for the support of Bothwell, as well as other written evidence of his guilt, which he had so long preserved for such an occasion After Morton's death he was restored against the forfeiture of 1579, by act of parliament

Sir James Balfour is supposed to have died in January 1583 or 1584 He married Margaret, the daughter of Michael Balfour of Burleigh and Balgarvie, by whom he acquired these lands, and from him the Lords Balfour of Burleigh were descended, as shown in our account of that family inserted above He is the reputed author of the well-known collection of decisions entitled 'Bal-four's Practicks, or a System of the more ancient Law of Scotland,' a voluminous work which remained in manuscript until 1754, when it was published by the Ruddimans, in a folio volume of 684 pages, with a life of Balfour prefixed by Walter Goodall This work continued to be used by practitioners till superseded by Stair's Institutes Lord Hailes observes that Balfour's work is interpolated, for it mentions certain acts of parliament and the names of certain peers that did not exist till after the death of Balfour It is very likely to have been added to after his time

BALFOUR, Sir James, of Kinnaird, Bart, an eminent herald, annalist, and antiquary, eldest son of Sir Michael Balfour of Denmylne, by his wife, Jane, daughter of James Durham of Pitkerrow, was born about 1600 He soon displayed a capacity for study, and a taste for poetry The accompanying portrait of him is from an original picture in the possession of Lord Belhaven

His youthful efforts in verse were noticed with commendation by the poet Leach or Leochæus, in his Strenæ, published in 1626 He had successfully translated Leach's Latin poem, Panthea, into the Scottish vernacular, and Sir Robert Sibbald, who, in his Memoria Balfouriana, gives an account of his life and writings, tells us that he had seen a volume of Latin and Scottish poems, written by Balfour, not now extant After some time spent abroad, Sir James, on his return, devoted himself to the study of the antiquities of his native country "It was, indeed, fortunate for his progress," says Sibbald, "that several learned men had begun to illustrate the history of Scotland Of these, Robert Maule, commissary of St Andrews, had engaged in a work concerning the origin of our nation, while David Buchanan had applied an accurate criticism to the older monuments of Scottish story Mr David Hume of Godscroft had undertaken to refute the objections against the high antiquity of the nation, the labours of Sir Robert Gordon of Straloch shed no inconsiderable light on the earlier history of Scotland, while Robert Johnstone detailed the transactions of British policy, in conjunction with those of France, the Netherlands, and Germany, from the year 1572 to the year 1628 Mr William Drummond of Hawthornden recorded the history of the five Jameses, Mr Guthry, the events which characterized the progress of our civil war, and Mr Wishart, afterwards bishop of Edinburgh, commemorated the actions of the celebrated marquis of Montrose The geographical delineation of the kingdom had been greatly advanced by the labours of Timothy Pont, son of that eminent promoter of letters, Mr Robert Pont Sir Robert Gordon of Straloch, his son James, minister of Rothiemay, and Sir John Scot of Scotstarvet, director of the chancery, had likewise contributed many topographical descriptions, and sundry maps of the counties The right reverend primate, John Spottiswood, archbishop of St Andrews, had carried down both the ecclesiastical and civil history of Scotland, from the introduction of Christianity, until the death of James VI, while the history of the Scottish Church had been detailed by David Calderwood, from the epoch of the Reformation to the year 1625" In order to prosecute the study of heraldry, Balfour repaired to London, where he became acquainted with Sir Robert Cotton, also with Sir William Segar, garter king-at-arms, who obtained from the College of Heralds a highly honourable testimonial in his favour, signed and sealed by all the members of that body He likewise became known to Roger Dodsworth, and Sir William Dugdale, to whom he communicated several charters, and other pieces of information regarding Scottish ecclesiastical antiquities, which they inserted in their Monasticon Anglicanum, under the title Cœnobia Scotica, and which Balfour afterwards expanded into a volume, called Monasticon Scoticum Amongst other distinguished persons of his own country whose friendship he enjoyed, were Drummond of Hawthornden, Sir Robert Aytoun, and the earl of Stirling By the influence of the Viscount Dupplin, chancellor of Scotland, he was in June 1630 created lord lyon king-at-arms, having some days previously been knighted by the king In December 1633 he was created a baronet On the occasion of the coronation of Charles I at Edinburgh that year, Viscount Dupplin was created earl of Kinnoul, and of this nobleman Sir James in his Annals tells the following curious anecdote The king in 1626 had commanded, by a letter to his privy council, that the archbishop of St Andrews should have precedence of the chancellor, to which the latter would not submit "I remember," says Balfour, "that K Charles sent me to the lord chancellor on the day of his coronation, in the morning, to show him that it was his will and pleasure, bot onlie for that day, that he wold cede and give way to the archbishop, but he returned by me to his Majestie a very bruske answer, which was, that he was ready in all humility to lay his office doune at his Majestie's feet, bot since it was his royal will he should enjoy it with the knowen privileges of the same, never a stoled priest in Scotland should sett a foot before him, so long as his bloode was hote Quhen I had related his answer to the kinge, he said, 'Weel, Lyone, lett's goe to business, I will not medle farther with that old cankered gootish man, at quhose hand ther is nothing to be gained but soure words'" Though a staunch Presbyterian, when the civil wars broke out, Sir James inclined to the cause of the king, but took no part in the contest He was, nevertheless, deprived by Cromwell of his office of lyon king-at-arms Living in retirement at Falkland palace, or at his own seat of Kinnaird, he collected many manuscripts on the art of heraldry, and wrote several treatises on that subject, some of which are now in the Advocates' Library, while others were dispersed, or destroyed by the English in the capture of Perth, in 1651, to which city he had caused them to be conveyed Sibbald gives a catalogue both of his original treatises and of the manuscripts which he was at such pains to collect [Memoria Balfouriana, pp 19—33] For illustrating Scottish history, he investigated all the charters, public registers, and monastic chartularies and chronicles he could procure, and he was able to form a large collection of these documents He formed, at considerable expense, a library of most valuable books, and particularly rich in Scottish history, antiquities, and heraldry He likewise collected and arranged ancient coins, seals, and other reliques of the olden time, and wrote a book of epitaphs and inscriptions on the monuments of monasteries and parish churches He left several abridgments of the books of Scone, Cambuskenneth, and others, and extracts from the histories of John Major, Hector Boethius, Lesly, and Buchanan His literary correspondence was extensive with those of his contemporaries who were eminent either as historians or historical antiquarians, particularly Robert Maule, Henry Maule of Melgum, David Buchanan, Sir Robert Gordon of Straloch, Mr Roger Dodsworth, Sir William Dugdale, and Drummond of Hawthornden At the request of Sir John Scott of Scotstarvet he contributed not a little to the geographical illustration of the kingdom He drew up an accurate description of the shire of Fife, including observations on its antiquities, and the genealogies of its principal families, and he had begun to compile a geographical description of the whole of Scotland, the manuscript of which was of so much use to the Dutch geographer, Blean, that he dedicated to Sir James Balfour the map of Lorn in his Theatrum Scotiæ, appending to it an engraving of his arms Besides his various treatises on heraldry, he wrote annals of the life and reign of James I and II, and memorials of the reigns of James III, James IV, and James V, and Mary The reign of James VI he treated at greater length He also wrote an account of the kings of Scotland from Fergus I to Charles I and the annals of Scotland in two volumes, the first extending from the accession of Malcolm III to the death of

James VI, and the second from the accession of Charles I to the sixteenth year of his reign When it became necessary to form a separate establishment for the Prince of Wales, who was also steward or seneschal of Scotland, Sir James deemed it proper to inquire into the amount of the revenue to which the hereditary princes of Scotland were entitled, as well as the extent of their privileges, and among his manuscripts is one with the following title —'The True present State of the Principality of Scotland, with the Means, how the same may be most conveniently Increased, and Augmented, with which is joyned, Ane Survey, and brief Note from the Publick Registers of the Kingdom of certain Infeftments and Confirmations given to Princes of Scotland, and by them to their Vassals, of diverse Baronies and Lands of the Principalitie, since the 15 year of the Reign of King Robert III' To natural history he likewise gave his attention, and composed in Scots an alphabetical treatise on gems He also wrote in Latin, an account, collected from various authors, of the frauds practised in the imitation of precious stones He died in February 1657 He is usually styled of Kinnaird, having, in 1631, obtained, in favour of himself and his spouse, a grant of the lands and barony of that name in Fife He was four times married, first, on 21st October 1630, to Anna, daughter of Sir John Aiton of that ilk, by whom he had three sons and six daughters, and who died August 26th, 1644, 2dly, to his cousin, Jean Durham, daughter of the laird of Pitkerrow, who died without issue, 19th July, 1645, 3dly, to Margaret, only daughter of Sir James Arnot of Fernie, by whom he had three sons and three daughters, 4thly, to Janet, daughter of Sir William Auchinleck of Balmanno, by whom he had two daughters The family, as stated above, is now extinct in the male line From his collection of MS, preserved in the Advocates' Library, his 'Annals and Short Passages of State,' were published by Mr James Haig in 1824, in four volumes octavo

BALFOUR, Sir Andrew, Bart, an eminent physician and botanist, and founder of the botanic garden of Edinburgh, the brother of the preceding, and fifth and youngest son of Sir Michael Balfour of Denmylne, was born there January 18, 1630 His education was superintended by his brother, Sir James, the famous antiquary, who was thirty years old at the time of his birth He took his degree of A M at the university of St Andrews, and about 1650 removed to London, where he prosecuted his medical studies under the celebrated Harvey, and other eminent practitioners He afterwards went to Blois, in France, to see the botanical garden of the duke of Orleans, then kept by his countryman, Dr Morison After remaining some time at Paris, he completed his education at the university of Caen, where, September 20, 1661, he received his degrees of bachelor and doctor of medicine On his return to London, Charles the Second appointed him travelling tutor to the young earl of Rochester, whom he in vain endeavoured to reclaim In his last illness his lordship expressed his obligations to Dr Balfour, for the good instructions he had received from him After spending four years on the continent, they returned in 1667 Dr Balfour afterwards commenced practice as a physician at St Andrews In 1670 he removed to Edinburgh, where, among other improvements, he introduced the manufacture of paper into Scotland Having a small botanical garden attached to his house, chiefly furnished by seeds sent by his foreign correspondents, he raised there many plants, till then unknown in this country His friend and botanical pupil, Mr Patrick Murray of Livingstone, had formed at his seat a botanic garden, containing one thousand species of plants, and, after his death, Dr Balfour transferred his collection to Edinburgh, and, joining it to his own, laid the foundation of the first public botanic garden in Scotland, for which the magistrates of the city allotted a piece of ground near the foot of Leith Wynd, and adjacent to Trinity Hospital, taken down in 1845 for the convenience of the North British railway Here the Botanic garden continued till 1767, when, by the exertions of Dr Hope, a subsequent professor of botany, it was removed to a piece of ground between Leith and Edinburgh, on the west side of Leith Walk [See Hope, John] This place was abandoned in 1822 for a more suitable situation at Inverleith Row, where the Edinburgh Botanical Garden is now in a flourishing condition

Dr. Balfour was created a baronet by Charles the Second He has the merit of being the first who introduced the dissection of the human body into Scotland, and, with Sir Robert Sibbald, he planned the Royal College of physicians, of which society he was elected the first president On the publication of the Pharmacopœia by the college in 1685, the whole arrangement of the materia medica was committed to his care Shortly before his death he projected the foundation of an hospital in Edinburgh, which is now the Royal Infirmary He died in 1694, bequeathing his museum to the University He never appeared as an author, but in 1700 his son published a series of the familiar letters which he had addressed to Mr Murray of Livingstone The great merits of Sir Andrew Balfour as a naturalist, physician, and scholar, are commemorated, not only by Sir Robert Sibbald, in the Memoria Balfouriana, and elsewhere, but also more recently by Professor John Walker, in his Essays on Natural History

BALFOUR, Robert, a distinguished scholar, and philologist, principal of Guienne college, Bordeaux, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, is supposed to have been born about the year 1550 As he left his native country young, very little is known regarding him He is supposed to have derived his lineage from the Balgarvie branch of the Fifeshire family of Balfour, but in his Commentary on Cleomedes [p 196] he has himself stated that he was a native of Forfarshire He studied first at the university of St Andrews, and afterwards repairing to France, he became a student in that of Paris, where he distinguished himself by the ability with which he publicly maintained certain philosophical theses against all oppugners He was subsequently invited to Bourdeaux, by the archbishop of that see, and became a member of the college of Guienne The precise date of his appointment to a professor's chair is unknown, but it appears from a letter from Vinetus to George Buchanan, of date 9th June 1581, that he must have been previous to that year professor of the Greek language and mathematics He was subsequently appointed principal of the college of Guienne, an office which he filled with much prudence and reputation He is thought to have succeeded to the principalship on the death of Vinetus, 14th May 1586 His earliest publication was an edition, the first that appeared, of the ancient history of the famous council held at Nice, in the year 325, the author of which was Gelasius, a native of Cyzicus, a city of Mysia, who became bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine This work appeared in 1599, in 8vo His next undertaking was an edition of the Meteora of Cleomedes, with a copious and elaborate commentary, published at Bourdeaux in 1605, 4to "His work," says Dr Irving, "was commended by men eminent for their learning, and his commentary continues to be held in such estimation that it has been reprinted within a very recent period in an edition of Cleomedes published by Professor Bake of Leyden" [Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i p 243] Balfour's last and greatest work was his Commentary on Aristotle The first volume, containing an exposition of the Organon, or treatises relating to the science of logic, was published in 1616 The second volume, comprising a similar exposition of the ethics, appeared in 1620, when the author must have been upwards of seventy years of age The date of his death has not been ascertained He was living in 1625 "Balfour," says Dr Irving, from whose life of him these particulars have been gleaned, "left behind him the character of a learned and worthy man His manners are represented as very pleasing, and he is particularly commended for his kindness to his countrymen, many of whom at that period wandered on the continent in quest of learning, or learned employment The only fault imputed to him by one biographer, [D Buchananus de Scriptoribus Scotis, p 129,] is his zealous adherence to the Romish faith This species of zeal he has testified by introducing into his commentary on the Categories of Aristotle, a defence of the astounding doctrine of transubstantiation As a proof of the estimation in which he was held, it may be stated that François de Foix de Candale, bishop of Aire, who died in the year 1594, bequeathed to him the mathematical part of his library" [Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i p 244] Morhof mentions Balfour as a celebrated commentator on the philosophy of Aristotle, and Dempster says he was "the Phœnix of his age, a philosopher profoundly skilled in the Greek and Latin languages, a mathematician worthy of being compared with the ancients, and to those qualifications he joined a wonderful suavity of manners, and the utmost warmth of affection towards his countrymen" His writings display an extent of erudition which reflects honour on the literary history of his country His edition of Cleomedes, in particular, is spoken of in high terms of praise by the erudite Barthius

BALFOUR, JAMES, of Pilrig, near Edinburgh, an ingenious writer, was admitted an advocate, November 14, 1730, but never had much practice at the bar In 1737, on the death of Mr Bayne, professor of Scots law in the university of Edinburgh, he and Mr John Erskine of Carnock, advocate, were presented by the faculty of advocates to the patrons of the vacant chair, who elected Mr Erskine, afterwards author of the 'Institute of the Law of Scotland' Balfour was subsequently appointed sheriff-substitute of the county of Edinburgh Having a taste for philosophical science, he early opposed the speculations of David Hume, particularly in two treatises, which he published anonymously, the one entitled 'A Delineation of Morality,' and the other 'Philosophical Dissertations' With these Hume, though they combated his own views, was so much pleased, that, on the 15th March 1753, he wrote the author a letter requesting his friendship as he was obliged by his civilities On the 28th August 1754 Balfour was elected professor of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh In 1764, on the death of Mr William Kirkpatrick, professor of public law in that university, he received a royal commission to succeed him In 1768 he published at Edinburgh his former lectures under the title of 'Philosophical Essays,' in which he subjected to a rigorous examination Lord Kames' Essays on Morality and Natural Religion In the spring of 1779 he resigned the chair of public law He died at Pilrig, 6th March 1795, aged 92 —(Bower's Hist of the University of Edinburgh, vol ii page 374)

BALFOUR, ALEXANDER, a miscellaneous writer, a native of the parish of Monikie, Forfarshire, was born March 1, 1767 His parents belonged to the humbler rural class, and being a twin, he was taken under the protection of a friend of the family, to whom he was indebted for support in his early years He received but a scanty education, and when very young was apprenticed to a weaver notwithstanding which, he taught a school in his native parish for several years At the age of twenty six, he became clerk to a merchant and manufacturer in Arbroath The following year he married He made his first essays in composition when only twelve years of age, and at a more mature age he contributed occasional verses to the British Chronicle newspaper, and to Dr Anderson's 'Bee' In 1793 he contributed several pieces to the Dundee Repository, and not a few to the Aberdeen Magazine in 1796 Four years after his removal to Arbroath he changed his situation, and two years after, on the death of his first employer, he carried on the business in partnership with his widow On her retirement, in 1800, he assumed another partner, and having obtained a government contract to supply the navy with canvas, he was in a few years enabled to purchase considerable property During the war with France he exhibited his patriotism by inserting in the Dundee Advertiser a succession of loyal poems and songs, most of which were republished in London, and some of the latter set to music and sung at places of public entertainment To the Northern Minstrel, published at Newcastle, he contributed about twenty songs, and furnished several pieces to the Literary Mirror, published at Montrose The account of Arbroath in Dr Brewster's Encyclopedia was written by him, and he also contributed several papers to Tilloch's Philosophical Journal

ment of a branch of a London house, which was, in the succeeding year, suddenly involved in bankruptcy, and he was obliged to accept of the situation of manager of a manufacturing establishment at Balgonie in Fife, where, upon a limited salary, he continued for three years In October 1818, principally on account of his children, he removed to Edinburgh, and was employed as a clerk by Mr Blackwood the publisher In the course of a few months he was seized with paralysis, and in June 1819 was obliged to relinquish his employment For ten years thereafter he spent his days in a wheel-chair, and devoted himself entirely to literature In 1819 he published a novel, called 'Campbell, or the Scottish Probationer,' which was well received At the close of the same year he brought out an edition of the poems of his deceased friend, Richard Gall, with a memoir In 1820 he published a volume, entitled 'Contemplation, and other Poems' About the same time he began to contribute to Constable's Edinburgh Magazine, tales, sketches, and poems, descriptive of Scottish rural life, which he continued to do till the close of that work in 1826 One poetical series, entitled 'Characters omitted in Crabbe's Parish Register,' was so favourably received, that he was induced to republish it in one volume in 1825 In 1822 he began to write novels for the Minerva Press of London, the first of which, in three volumes, was called 'The Farmer's Three Daughters' His second, which was by far the best, appeared in 1823, also in three volumes, and was entitled, 'The Foundling of Glenthorn, or the Smuggler's Cave' In 1827, Mr Joseph Hume, M P, presented a number of his works to the premier, Mr Canning, and a donation of one hundred pounds was obtained for him from the Treasury, in consideration of his talents and misfortunes His latest work was a novel, entitled 'Highland Mary,' in four volumes, which, like his other novels, was distinguished for the most touching pathos He contributed till his death to the periodicals of the day, and wrote largely in particular for the 'Edinburgh Literary Gazette,' a publication long since discontinued He died on Sept 12, 1829 A posthumous volume of his remains was published under the title of 'Weeds and Wild Flowers,' with a Memoir by Mr D M Moir

Balgonie Baron, a title of the earl of Leven and Melville, conferred in 1641, on his ancestor, General Alexander Leslie, commander of the Scots army at Dunse Law in May 1639 [See Leven and Melville, earl of] The lands of Balgonie, in the parish of Markinch, Fife, originally belonged to the family of Sibbald [See Sibbald, surname of] Sir Andrew Sibbald of Balgonie, sheriff of Fife, in 1457, and again in 1466, had an only daughter, Helen, who married Robert Lundin second son of Sir John Lundin of Lundin Their son, Sir Robert Lundin of Balgonie, was lord high treasurer of Scotland His descendant, Robert Lundin, sold the lands of Balgonie in the sixteenth century to General Alexander Leslie, the first earl of Leven, whose first title was Lord Balgonie, as already stated They continued in possession of the Leven family till 1823, when they were purchased for the sum of one hundred and four thousand pounds, by James Balfour, Esq of Whittinghame, brother of the late General Balfour of Balbirnie Balgonie castle, on the south bank of the river Leven, is of great antiquity The following woodcut representation of it is from Nattes's Scotia Depicta

BALIOL, or BALLIOL, the name of a Norman baron, whose descendant was declared king of Scotland in 1292 He was possessor of Balleul, Harcourt, and other manors in Normandy, from the former of which he derived his name His son Guy de Baliol, came over to England with the Conqueror's son, William Rufus, who appointed him lord of the forest of Teesdale and Marwood, and bestowed on him the lands of Middleton and Biwell in Northumberland He had also lands in Yorkshire His son, Bernard de Baliol, built the strong castle on the Tees, in the county of Durham, called Bernard Castle, and was forced by David the First of Scotland, in 1135, to swear fidelity to Matilda Previous to the battle of the Standard, in 1138, the English sent Robert de Bruce and Bernard de Baliol to the Scottish army under David the First, to endeavour to procure peace, but the proposal was rejected with disdain, when Bruce renounced the homage which he had performed to David for a barony in Galloway, and Baliol also gave up the fealty, sworn to Matilda three years before Adhering to the fortunes of King Stephen, Baliol was taken prisoner at the battle of Lincoln, with that monarch, 2d February 1141 On the incursion into Northumberland of the Scots in 1174, he was among the Yorkshire barons who, with Robert de Stuteville, hastened to the relief of Alnwick castle, then besieged by the Scottish king During their hurried march a dense fog arose, and the more cautious advised a retreat, when Baliol exclaimed, "You may retreat, but I will go forward alone, and preserve my honour" In consequence they all advanced, and the returning light enabled them to descry the battlements of Alnwick castle William, the Scottish king, was then in the fields with a slender train of sixty horsemen At the head of these, however, he instantly charged the new comers, whose force was much larger Being overpowered, and unhorsed, he was made prisoner by Baliol, and sent first to the castle of Richmond and afterwards to Falaise in Normandy [Hailes' Annals, vol i p 115] This feudal chief married Agnes de Pinkeny His son, Eustace de Baliol, was the father of Hugh de Baliol, who, in 1216, was joined with Philip de Hulcotes in defence of the northern borders, and when Alexander the Second of Scotland had subdued the whole of Northumberland, these two barons held out stoutly all the fortresses upon the line of the Tees, particularly that of Bernard castle, the seat of the Baliol family, which was assaulted by Alexander, and before which Eustace de Vesci, the husband of his illegitimate sister, Margaret, was slain Hugh de Baliol's eldest son, John de Baliol, was one of the magnates of Henry the Third of England, whose cause he strenuously supported in his struggles with his barons He was possessed of great wealth, having thirty knights' fees, equal to twelve thousand pounds of modern money He married Devorgilla, one of the three daughters and co-heiresses of Allan, lord of Galloway, by Margaret, eldest daughter of David, earl of Huntingdon, and in right of his wife he had large possessions in Scotland, and was one of the Regents during the minority of Alexander III In 1263 he laid the foundation of one of the colleges at Oxford, which was completed by his widow, and still bears his name He died in 1268 His son, John de Baliol, became temporary king of Scotland, by the award of Edward the First Of this John de Baliol a notice is given below

Alexander de Baliol, the brother of John, king of Scots, being in the retinue of Antony Beck, the celebrated bishop of Durham, in the expedition of Edward the First to Flanders, was restored to all his brother's lands in Scotland in 1297, and on 26th September 1300, he was summoned by writ to parliament till the 3d November 1306, under the title of Baron Baliol He married Isabell, daughter and heiress of Richard de Chilham, and widow of David de Strathbogie earl of Athol, by whom he obtained for life the castle and manor of Chilham in the county of Kent Dying without issue, the barony of Baliol in consequence became extinct.

There were several collateral branches of the name of Baliol in Scotland, whose names appear as donors and witnesses in the cloister registers In the Ragman Roll, also, four or five of them are mentioned One of these, Alexander de Balliolo, Camerarius Scotiæ, was baron of Cavers in Teviotdale As chamberlain of Scotland he has a place in the Lives of the Officers of State, (page 266) The name of Baliol is supposed, (Nesbit's Heraldry, vol i p 178,) to have been changed to Baillie, [see BAILLIE, surname of, ante, p 173,] having become odious in Scotland

BALIOL, JOHN, some time king of Scotland, was the son of John de Baliol of Bernard castle, county of Durham, the founder of Baliol college, Oxford, as already stated, by his wife, the Lady Devorgilla, granddaughter of David, earl of Huntingdon, and is supposed to have been born about 1260 On the death, in 1290, of Margaret the "Maiden of Norway," granddaughter of Alexander the Third, no less than thirteen competitors came forward for the vacant throne of Scotland Of these, John de Baliol and Robert de Bruce, lord of Annandale, were the principal Baliol claimed as being great-grandson to the earl of Huntingdon, younger brother of William the Lion, by his eldest daughter, Margaret, and Bruce as grandson by his second daughter, Isabella, that is, the former as direct heir, and as nearest of right, and the latter as nearest in blood and degree According to the rules of succession which are now established, the right of Baliol was preferable, but the protest and appeal of the seven earls of Scotland to Edward, brought to light by Sir Francis Palgrave, shows that in that age the order of succession was not ascertained with precision, and that the prejudices of the people and even the ancient laws of the kingdom favoured the claims of Bruce, and to this circumstance the unhappy results which followed may in a great measure be attributed The competitors agreed to refer their claims to the arbitration of Edward the First of England, who straightway asserted and extended his claim of feudal superiority to an extent never attempted by any of his predecessors He met the Scottish nobility and clergy at Norham on the 10th May, 1291, and required them to recognise his title as lord paramount At their request he granted them a term of three weeks in order that they might consult together, at which period he required them to return a definitive answer In the meantime he had commanded his barons to assemble at Norham with all their forces, on the 3d June On the 2d he gave audience to the Scots in an open field, near Upsettlington, on the north bank of the Tweed, opposite to the castle of Norham, and within the territory of Scotland At this assembly eight of the competitors for the crown were present, who all acknowledged Edward as lord paramount of Scotland, and agreed to abide by his decision Bruce was among them, but Baliol was absent The next day Baliol appeared, and on being asked by the chancellor of England whether he was willing to make answer as the others had done, after an affected pause, he pronounced his assent

Edward, going beyond his mere claim as overlord or superior of Scotland, now brought forward a right of property in the kingdom, and demanded to be put in possession of it, on the specious pretext that he might deliver it to him to whom the crown was found justly to belong Even this strange demand was acceded to, all the competitors agreeing that sasine of the kingdom and its fortresses should be given to Edward On the 11th, therefore, the regents of Scotland made a solemn surrender of the kingdom into Edward's hands, and the keepers of castles surrendered their castles The only demur was on the part of Gilbert de Umfraville, earl of Angus, who would not give up the castles of Dundee and Forfar, without a bond of indemnification [See ante, page 127] Edward immediately restored the custody of the kingdom to the regents, Fraser, bishop of St Andrews, Wishart, bishop of Glasgow, John Comyn of Badenoch, and James, the steward of Scotland The final hearing of the competition took place, on the 17th November 1292, in the hall of the castle of Berwick-upon-Tweed, when Edward confirmed the judgments of his commission and parliament by giving judgment in his favour On the 19th the crown was formally declared to belong to him, and the next day he swore fealty for it to Edward at Norham On the 30th of the same month, Baliol was crowned at Scone, and being immediately recalled to England, was compelled to renew his homage to Edward at Newcastle In the course of a year, Baliol was four times summoned to appear before Edward in the parliament of England Roused by the indignities heaped upon him while there, he ventured to remonstrate, and would consent to nothing which might be construed into an acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the English parliament Having, on the 23d October, 1295, concluded a treaty with Philip, king of France, Baliol, who at times was not without spirit, which, however, he wanted firmness to sustain, solemnly renounced his allegiance to Edward, and obtained the Pope's absolution from the oaths which he had taken Edward received the intelligence of his renunciation with contempt rather than with anger "The foolish traitor" said he to Baliol's messenger, "since he will not come to us, we will go to him" With a large army he immediately marched towards Scotland In the meantime, a small party of Scots crossed the borders, and plundered Northumberland and Cumberland They took the castle of Wark, and slew a thousand of the English King Edward, on the other hand having taken Berwick, put all the garrison and inhabitants to the sword The Scots army were defeated at Dunbar, 28th April, 1296, and the castles of Dunbar, Edinburgh, and Stirling falling into Edward's hands, Baliol was obliged to retire beyond the river Tay On July 10, 1296, in the churchyard of Stracathro, near Montrose, in presence of Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham and the English nobles, he surrendered his crown and sovereignty into the hands of the English monarch, and was divested of everything belonging to the state and dignity of a king He was thereafter, with his son, sent to London, and imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained till July 20, 1299, when, on the intercession of the Pope, he and his son were delivered up to his legate "Thus ended," says Lord Hailes, "the short and disastrous reign of John Baliol, an ill-fated prince censured for doing homage to Edward, never applauded for asserting the national independency Yet, in his original offence he had the example of Bruce, at his revolt he saw the rival family combating under the banners of England His attempt to shake off a foreign yoke speaks him of a high spirit, impatient of injuries He erred in enterprising beyond his strength, in the cause of liberty it was a meritorious error He confided in the valour and unanimity of his subjects, and in the assistance of France The efforts of his subjects were languid and discordant, and France beheld his ruin with the indifference of an unconcerned spectator" Baliol retired to his estates in France, where he died in 1314 The following is a cast of the seal of John Baliol, while king of Scotland, from Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ

During the subsequent contest in Scotland under Wallace, the assertors of the national independence maintained the rights of Baliol, and Wallace, so long as he held authority, acted as governor of the kingdom under him and in his name To the unpopularity of the family and of Baliol's brother, who had taken part with Edward, may in part be attributed the partial support which the great patriot received in his struggle For the rest of his life, John Baliol resided as a private man in France, without interfering in the affairs of Scotland Some writers say that he lived till he was blind, which must have been the effect of some disease and not of old age, as he could not have been, at the time of his death, above fifty-five years old at the utmost He married Isabel, daughter of John de Warren, earl of Surrey The Scots affixed the contemptuous epithet of Toom Tabard (empty jacket) to Baliol, their temporary king —Dalrymple's Annals of Scotland, vol. i.

BALIOL, EDWARD, eldest son of the preceding, succeeded, on the death of his father, to his estates in France, where he resided in a private manner for several years In 1324 he was invited over by Edward the Second of England, to be brought forward as a rival to Robert the Bruce, and in 1327, at the request of Edward the Third, he again visited England with the same object His first active appearance on the scene was on the following occasion Some of the Anglo-Norman barons possessed estates in Scotland, which were forfeited during the war with England By the treaty of Northampton in 1328, whereby the independence of Scotland was secured, their estates in that country were restored to the English barons Two of these, Thomas Lord Wake, and Henry de Beaumont, having in vain endeavoured to procure possession, joined Baliol, when, after the death of Bruce, he resolved to attempt the recovery of what he considered his birthright In Caxton's Chronicle it is stated, that in 1331, having taken the part of an English servant of mr who had killed a Frenchman, Baliol was himself imprisoned in France, and only released on the intercession of the Lord de Beaumont, who advised him to come over to England, and set up his claim to the Scottish crown King Edward did not openly countenance the enterprise With three hundred men at arms, and a few foot soldiers, Baliol and his adherents sailed from Ravenspur on the Humber, then a port of some importance, but overwhelmed by the sea some centuries since and landing at Kinghorn, August 6, 1332, defeated the earl of Fife, who endeavoured to oppose them The army of Baliol, increased to three thousand men, marched to Forteviot, near Perth, where they encamped with the river Earn in front On the opposite bank lay the regent of the kingdom, the earl of Mar, with upwards of thirty thousand men, on Dupplin Moor At midnight, the English force forded the Earn, and attacking the sleeping Scots, slew thirteen thousand of them, including the earls of Mar and Moray Baliol then hastened to Perth, where he was unsuccessfully besieged by the earl of March, whose force he dispersed On the 24th of September, 1332,

Edward Baliol was crowned king at Scone On the 10th of February 1333, he held a parliament at Edinburgh, consisting of what are known as the disinherited barons, with seven bishops, including both William of Dunkeld, and it is said Maurice of Dunblane, the abbot of Inchaffray, who there agreed to the humiliating conditions proposed by Edward the Third His good fortune now forsook him On the 16th December, within three months after, he was surprised in his encampment at Annan by the young earl of Moray, the second son of Randolph, the late regent, Archibald Douglas, brother of the good lord James, Simon Fraser, and others of the heroes of the old war of Scotland's independence, and his army being overpowered, and his brother Henry, with many of his chief adherents, slain, he escaped nearly naked and almost alone to England Having on the 23d of November preceding sworn feudal service to the English monarch, the latter marched an army across the borders to his assistance, and the defeat of the Scots at Halidon Hill, July 19, 1333, again enabled Baliol to usurp for a brief space the nominal sovereignty of Scotland The following is a cast of the seal of Edward Baliol from Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ

He now renewed his homage to Edward III, and ceded to him the town and county of Berwick, with the counties of Roxburgh, Selkirk, Peebles Dumfries, and the Lothians, in return for the aid he had rendered him In 1334 he was again compelled to fly to England In July 1335 he was restored by the arms of the English monarch In 1338, being by the regent, Robert Stewart, closely pressed at Perth, where this restless intruder, supported by the English interest, held his nominal court, he again became a fugitive After this he made several attempts to be re-established on the throne, but the nation never acknowledged him, their allegiance being rendered to David the Second, infant son of Robert the Bruce At last, worn out by constant fighting and disappointment, in 1356 he sold his claim to the sovereignty, and his family estates, to Edward the Third, for five thousand merks, and a yearly pension of two thousand pounds sterling, with which he retired into obscurity, and died childless at Doncaster in 1363 With him ended the line of Baliol —Tytler's History of Scotlan

BALLANTYNE, a name variously written Ballenden, Bellenden, and Ballentyn, and the same as Bannatyne, [see BANNATYNE, surname of] originally derived from the lands of Bellenden in Selkirkshire Of this surname the family of Ballenden or Bellenden of Auchinoul, in the county of Edinburgh, was at one period the most distinguished, a descendant of which became in 1661 Lord Ballenden of Broughton, a title afterwards merged in that of the Duke of Roxburgh [See BELLENDEN, Lord]

BALLANTYNE, JAMES, an eminent printer, was the son of a respectable shopkeeper in Kelso, where he was born in the year 1772 He was educated at the grammar school of his native town, and in 1783 he first became acquainted with Sir Walter Scott, who then attended the public school of Kelso, for a few weeks, while on a visit to his aunt, during the vacation of the Edinburgh High school He was early bound apprentice to a solicitor at Kelso, and in 1795 commenced practice there, but not meeting with clients, in the following summer, though not brought up to the printing business, he commenced as printer in his native town, and started the Kelso Mail newspaper with success He had the merit of being the first to introduce an improved style of printing into Scotland, and the works which issued from his press in a provincial town, for elegance and accuracy, were unequalled at the time in this country Among the earliest of these was the first great work of his friend Sir Walter Scott, 'The Min-

strelsy of the Scottish Border,' which was printed at the Ballantyne press, Kelso About the end of 1802, chiefly by the advice of Scott, he was induced to remove to Edinburgh, where the distinction he had already acquired in the trade procured for him ample employment In 1805, shortly after the publication of the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' needing a supply of money to enable him to carry on his increasing business, he applied to Sir Walter Scott, from whom he had previously received a loan, for another advance, when, on consideration of being admitted a partner, to the extent of a third sharer in the business, Scott embarked a considerable sum of money in the concern His increasing business as a printer did not preclude his editing the Edinburgh Weekly Journal, of which he and his brother became the proprietors in 1817, and which was conducted by him with spirit, intelligence, and good taste In this paper first appeared the celebrated letters of Sir Malachi Malagrowther on the currency In dramatic literature, especially, Mr Ballantyne's taste was excellent, and his graceful and discriminating criticisms in the Weekly Journal were much esteemed at the time His friendship with Sir Walter Scott, which began when they were boys at school, lasted undiminished during their lives He was the printer of all the productions of the author of Waverley, and often judiciously suggested corrections on the manuscripts, or the proofs of his works, which that great writer did not disdain to adopt In 1816, he married a Miss Hogarth, the daughter of a wealthy farmer in Berwickshire, the sister of George Hogarth, Esq, author of a 'History of Music' He then lived in St John Street, Canongate, at no great distance from his printing establishment, at St Paul's Work Mrs Ballantyne died in 1829 leaving him a large family of children In January 1826, the company of which he was the head were unfortunately involved in the bankruptcy of Messrs Constable & Co, publishers, when their liabilities amounted to one hundred and two thousand pounds Mr Ballantyne died January 17, 1833, having survived his illustrious friend the author of Waverley only about four months Shortly before his death he published an affecting statement, in which he expressed his wish to be restored to that degree of health which would enable him to do some justice to the character of the great man who had gone before him In private life Mr Ballantyne was distinguished for the urbanity of his manners, the kindness of his disposition, and for his social qualities He possessed in a high degree an acute observation of men and manners, with great literary knowledge, and ample stores of anecdote, which rendered him a pleasing and instructive companion He is described, however, as having been a man of indolent habits, and not a little addicted to the pleasures of the table —Lockhart's Life of Scott

BALLANTYNE, John, bookseller and publisher, a younger brother of the preceding, was born at Kelso, in the year 1774, and like his brother, was also a schoolfellow of Sir Walter Scott When the Kelso Mail was started by his brother, he assisted in writing for it He was originally intended for his father's business, namely, that of a small merchant, or shopkeeper, in Kelso, and was sent, while very young, to London, where he spent some time in the banking house of Messrs Currie On his return to Kelso, the department in his father's business which more immediately devolved upon him was the tailoring one In 1805, the business having fallen off, he disposed of his goods to pay his debts, and followed his brother, Mr James Ballantyne, to Edinburgh He was taken into his counting-house as clerk, at a salary of two hundred pounds per annum, while his father, who had accompanied him, was also employed about the printing-office In 1808, on some temporary disagreement between Sir Walter Scott and his publishers, Constable and Co, John Ballantyne became a partner with Scott in the firm of Ballantyne and Co, booksellers and publishers, Hanover Street Among the first of the works published by the new firm was 'The Lady of the Lake' In 1813 he engaged also in the profession of an auctioneer of works of art, libraries, &c, having taken premises in Princes Street for the purpose He held till his death the office of bookseller to the king for Scotland When the earlier Waverley novels were in course of printing Mr John Ballantyne was intrusted with the management of their publication Some of these celebrated works he published himself He also brought out two periodical publications, 'The Visionary,' and 'The Saleroom,' written chiefly by Sir Walter Scott, who edited for him the works of Beaumont and Fletcher, which were published at John Ballantyne's risk He was himself the author of two thin volumes, entitled 'The Widow's Lodgings,' which, though described as "wretched trash," reached a second edition Possessing good natural talents, with great powers of wit and humour, he was in company one of the most amusing of story-tellers, and could relate an anecdote with a gusto and effect peculiar to himself He is described as having been of a quick, active, and intrepid disposition, very fond of field sports, and a capital mimic From his volatility and lightheartedness Sir Walter Scott bestowed on him the soubriquet of Rigdumfunnidos The following instance of his benevolence of disposition is related in Lockhart's Life of Scott He remarked one day to a poor student of divinity who was attending his auction, that he looked as if he were in bad health The young man assented, with a sigh "Come," said Ballantyne, "I think I ken the secret of a sort of draft that would relieve you—particularly," he added, handing him a check for £5 or £10, "particularly, my dear, if taken on an empty stomach" His health having been seriously affected, with the view of amendment he travelled for some time on the continent On his return he retired to a seat in the neighbourhood of Kelso, and when there he commenced the publication of a beautiful edition of the British novelists, entitled 'Ballantyne's Novelist's Library,' edited by Sir Walter Scott, who furnished biographical prefaces to the different authors This work was printed and published for Mr Ballantyne's sole benefit A severe attack of asthma confined him to the house for some weeks He died in his brother's house, St John Street, Edinburgh, on the 16th of June, 1821, aged 47, and was buried in the Canongate churchyard He had been married at an early age to Miss Parker, a relative of Dr Rutherford, but had no family

BALLANTYNE JOHN, the Rev, author of 'An Examination of the Human Mind,' was born at South Piteddie, in the parish of Kinghorn, Fife, on the 8th May 1778 He received his early education at a school in the village of Lochgelly, and in 1795 became a student in the university of Edinburgh Although his parents belonged to the Established church, he himself became a member of the Secession and attended the divinity hall under the superintendence of Professor Lawson of Selkirk During the prosecution of his studies, he was engaged in teaching a school, first at Lochgelly, and afterwards in Edinburgh After being licensed, he received a call from Stonehaven in Kincardineshire, and from another congregation, but accepted that of the former He was ordained in 1805 His congregation being small, he had ample leisure to attend to his literary pursuits He had early made choice of metaphysical science as a subject of study, and in 1828 he published his metaphysical speculations in a thick octavo volume entitled 'An Examination of the Human Mind,' a work of great labour and of considerable merit He had previously contributed a paper on the subject of church extension to the Christian Recorder, Glasgow, a religious periodical, and in 1824 he published anonymously a pamphlet entitled 'A Comparison of Established and Dissenting Churches, by a Dissenter,' remarkable as being the first of that long series of publications on the voluntary question with which the press afterwards teemed from the pens of the Scotch dissenting clergy After the controversy had fairly been entered upon, he was induced to remould and greatly to enlarge this work, which, in its new and improved form, was published, in 1830, with his name Mr Ballantyne died 5th November 1830, in the 52d year of his age and the 25th of his ministry He left sufficient materials to make another volume of his great metaphysical work but the sale of the first volume was so much injured by the connexion of his name with the voluntary church controversy, that no encouragement was given to proceed with the further publication of the work The first volume, however, is complete in itself —M'Kerrow's Hist of the Secession Church

BALLENDEN, or BELLENDEN, JOHN, see BELLENDIN, JOHN

BALMER, ROBERT, D D, an eminent divine of the United Secession church, was born November 22, 1787, at Ormiston Mains, in the parish of Eckford, Roxburghshire His father, Thomas

Balmer, was a land-steward, first at Ormiston, and afterwards at Crailinghall His mother, Margaret Biggar, was a grand-daughter of the James Biggar mentioned in the Autobiography of the venerable Boston of Ettrick, as an elder Both parents were distinguished for their piety They belonged however to different denominations, his father being a member of the Antiburgher congregation at Morebattle, while his mother adhered to the congregation at Jedburgh connected with the Burgher Synod Robert was the eldest of their family In infancy he was a feeble and sickly child, but as soon as he began to speak, he was quick to learn, and eager to inquire It is related of him that even in childhood he was punctual in his morning and evening devotions, unequalled in getting hymns and passages of scripture by heart, and restless till he had learnt the lessons required of him In his eighth year he had the measles, and from that time he began to enjoy generally good health When he was about three years of age, his parents removed to Upper Crailing, where he was first sent to a school, taught by a female He left this school in November 1796, to attend one at Crailing Mill, where he continued for half a year, but in that time he made considerable progress in his education His father died when he was about ten years of age He had been in easy circumstances for his station in life, and had saved a little money With the interest received from this, and the profits of a small shop which she opened at Eckford Moss, his mother was enabled to maintain herself and her children respectably When Robert was about the age of fourteen, he was sent to the grammar school of Kelso, then under the charge of Mr Dymock, afterwards Dr Dymock of Glasgow high school, one of the authors of the Bibliotheca Classica Among others of his class-fellows at the school at Kelso, with whom he continued on terms of intimacy in after life, was the late Thomas Pringle, author of African Sketches and other poems He entered the university of Edinburgh in the session of 1802-3, and studied there during four sessions before going to the divinity hall In the autumn of 1806, after undergoing an examination by the Associate Synod of Selkirk, he was admitted to the study of divinity under the Rev Dr George Lawson, then the professor of this branch of learning appointed by the Associate Synod The attendance on the hall at Selkirk continued only during two months in the end of summer and beginning of autumn, and during the winters of his residence in Edinburgh, he also attended the divinity hall in the university of that city, then presided over by William Ritchie, D D, and completed there the course of study required for receiving licence in the Established Church of Scotland In the course of his attendance on Dr Ritchie's class, he obtained a prize for the best essay "on the character of Moses as a legislator" During his academical course, Mr Balmer supported himself by teaching He was first employed in the family of a farmer in the neighbourhood of Jedburgh He afterwards taught a school at Barnyards in the parish of Kilconquhar, Fifeshire, from which place he removed to take charge of the tuition of the family of the Rev Dr Douglas of Galashiels, and a select number of pupils who were educated along with them He was subsequently tutor in the family of Mr Scott of Sinton It was not till nearly two years after he had finished his theological studies that he could make up his mind to assent to the formula of the Secession Church, and become one of its preachers But being allowed to make certain explanations as to his views, he was on the 4th August, 1812, licensed to preach the gospel by the Secession Presbytery of Edinburgh In the course of a few months after, he received calls from the congregations of Lochwinnoch, Leslie, Ecclefechan, and Berwick-upon-Tweed He gave his preference to the latter town, and was ordained to the charge of the Associate congregation there, on the 23d March 1814 He took a deep interest in the movement towards union between the two sections of the Secession Church, and was moderator of the Associate Synod at its last meeting as a separate body from the General Associate Synod, in September 1820 He was called to London, to supply the late Dr Waugh's pulpit on two occasions, the first in 1819, and the second in 1823, and both times, on his return home, he spent a few days with the late Robert Hall of Leicester, whom he admired as the greatest of contemporary writers On Mr Hall's death he committed to writing his recollections of his conversations with him, which have been published in 1826 Mr Balmer married Miss Jane Scott, daughter of Mr Alexander Scott, of Aberdeen, and sister of the late John Scott, author of 'Visits to Paris,' and the original editor of the London Magazine, who died of a wound which he had received in a duel On the agitation of the voluntary question, which began in April 1829, Mr Balmer agreed with those who hold that all interference on the part of the civil power in the establishment and support of religious institutions, is unscriptural and unwarrantable He spoke at a voluntary meeting at Jedburgh, but took no other active part in the controversy On the death of Dr Dick, Mr Balmer was, at the meeting of the United Associate Synod, in April 1834, elected by a large majority, professor of pastoral theology in the Secession church, while the Rev Alexander Duncan of Mid-Calder, was chosen professor of systematic theology, but by a subsequent arrangement sanctioned by the Synod, Mr Duncan and Mr Balmer exchanged professorships, the latter being transferred to the chair of systematic theology A small sum of fifty pounds annually was assigned to each of these appointments, not in name of remuneration, but merely to defray necessary expenses The change of residence, at first to Glasgow, and afterwards to Edinburgh, during the eight weeks that the session continued, was conducive to his general health, and his eyesight, which from application had become greatly weakened, was so much improved that he was induced to continue permanently in the professorship, having at one time entertained thoughts of resigning it In the spring of 1840, the university of St Andrews conferred on him the honorary degree of D D In 1843, Dr Balmer took part in the proceedings of the large meeting held in Edinburgh, in commemoration of the bicentenary of the Westminster Assembly The speech delivered by him on that occasion on the principles of Christian union, not only received the marked approval and eulogy of the chairman, Dr Chalmers, but suggested to John Henderson, Esq , of Park, the idea of doing something whereby such union might be promoted, and ultimately led to the publication of the Essays on Christian Union, by ministers of different denominations, of which Dr Balmer's formed the second Hence originated the Evangelical Alliance, now a strong and influential religious confederacy In the controversy which for some years agitated the Secession church in relation to the extent of the atonement, Dr Balmer was towards the close of his life an object of suspicion to his brethren, as to the orthodoxy of his sentiments To use his own words, "he believed the atonement to be, in one view, universal, to have removed all legal obstacles to the salvation of all, and to have laid a foundation for the universal calls and invitations of the gospel He held at the same time the doctrine of election" "Whatever was peculiar," says his biographer, "in the sentiments of Dr Balmer on this subject, he did not bring it forward so as to unsettle the minds either of the students under his care, or of the members of his congregation, in regard to the received doctrine of the Secession Church" In the beginning of 1842, a bookseller belonging to his congregation, having formed the design of reprinting that portion of Polhill's Treatise on the Divine Will which relates to the extent of the atonement, applied to him to introduce the essay with a few prefatory remarks That preface did not give satisfaction to those who held, in the strictest sense, the articles in the Confession of Faith which speak of redemption as purchased only for the elect, and at the meeting of Synod in May 1843, the brethren who were dissatisfied with his views, sought a conference with him, that they might hear any explanations which he chose to give At a meeting of Synod in the following October, the question became again the subject of discussion, on two overtures being brought up from the Presbytery of Paisley and Greenock, and, after Dr Balmer, in a speech of two hours' duration, had unfolded his views, with perfect candour and explicitness, the Synod agreed to a finding to the effect that, on explanation, supposed diversities of sentiment, in a great measure, disappeared, and that scriptural harmony prevailed among the brethren At the same time, it was recommended that the use of the expressions, universal atonement on the one hand, and limited atonement on the other, should be avoided, on account of their liableness to be misapprehended The matter came again before the Synod in May 1844, but they adhered to their former decision Dr Balmer did not long survive the settlement of this painful business, as he died on the morning of Monday, July 1, 1844 The following is a portrait of this eminent professor of the Secession Church

At the commencement of his last illness, which was influenza caused by a cold caught while absent from home, he was able, with an effort, to correct the final proof sheet of his essay 'On the Scriptural Basis of Union among Christians' He published little during his lifetime A volume of his sermons was issued by ministers of the Associate Synod in 1819, for the benefit of the students' library, to which any profits arising from its sale were to be applied He was the author of 'Observations on the Character of the Rev Dr Henry Belfrage as an Author,' furnished at the request of the editors of the Memoir of that eminent minister and pleasing writer, an Address to Elders, and some funeral Sermons He contributed at one time some reviews to the Theological Magazine, and other religious publications His Academical Lectures and Pulpit Discourses were published, posthumously, in 2 vols in 1845, with a memoir prefixed, from which have been chiefly derived the materials for this sketch of his life

BALMERINO, Baron, a title formerly possessed by a branch of the Elphinstone family, first bestowed in 1603, on the Hon Sir James Elphinstone, knight, third son of Robert, third Lord Elphinstone, by his spouse Margaret, daughter of Sir John Drummond of Inverpeffrey, [see ELPHINSTONE, surname of].

The Balmerino branch of the Elphinstones were singularly unfortunate The history of no family in the Scottish peerage was marked by so many vicissitudes Out of the six lords Balmerino, to which number the line extended, three were condemned to death, and the last lord was publicly beheaded as a traitor

The first Lord Balmerino, previous to his elevation to the peerage, was designed of Innernochtie, and under that designation, was appointed a lord of session, 4th March, 1586 In 1595 he was constituted one of the eight commissioners of the treasury, called from their number Octavians, who were intrusted with the management of the public revenue, and who became, from their office, exceedingly unpopular, and he was one of the intended victims to the fury of the people, in the remarkable riot in Edinburgh, in December 1595, which afterwards cost the city so much In 1598 he was appointed secretary of state, and on the 20th February 1604, he was created a peer of parliament by the title of baron Balmerinoch, in Fifeshire On the 1st of March 1605 he was constituted president of the court of session In his latter years he fell into disgrace with the king, owing to the following circumstance In 1599, while secretary of state, he had drawn up a letter in the name of James VI., addressed to the Pope, Clement VIII, requesting a cardinal's hat for his kinsman, Chisholme, bishop of Vaison, in order that he might manage the correspondence between the courts of Rome and Holyroodhouse, and shuffling it in among other papers lying for the king's signature, it was subscribed by his majesty without his noting the contents, or observing to whom it was addressed The letter was transmitted to Rome, and the deceit was not finally discovered till 1608, five years after James' accession to the throne of England, when Lord Balmerino was sent for to London to explain the transaction Having confessed his guilt he was removed to Scotland by land, under a guard, and imprisoned at Falkland He was tried at St Andrews, and being found guilty of treason, was sentenced to be beheaded The execution of the sentence, however, was delayed, and in October 1609 a warrant passed granting him liberty of free ward in Falkland, and one mile round that place Afterwards he obtained permission to retire to his own house of Balmerinoch, where he died in 1612 It was thought, however, that in this he was but made the scapegoat of James VI, who was believed to have been privy to the writing of the letter, with the view of rendering the English Catholics favourable to his accession to the English throne James' double dealing was a strong feature in his character By his first wife, Sarah, daughter of Sir John Menteith of Carse, his lordship had a son, John, second Lord Balmerino His second wife, Marjory, daughter of Hugh Maxwell of Tealing, brought him a son, James, created in December 1607 Lord Coupar, and two daughters, Anne, married to Andrew, first Lord Fraser, and Mary, who became the wife of John Hamilton of Blair

John, second Lord Balmerino, was restored to blood and to the peerage by letter under the great seal, 4th August, 1613, his father having died under attainder He distinguished himself by the opposition which he displayed in parliament in 1633, to the act establishing the royal prerogative of imposing apparel on churchmen A petition to the king, on the part of the opposition, having been drawn up by William Haig, a lawyer, who had been solicitor to James VI, a copy of it was shown to Charles, who signified his displeasure at the measure so strongly that the intention of presenting it was abandoned Lord Balmerino had unfortunately retained a duplicate of it, and having interlined it in some places with his own hand, he showed it to one John Dunmore, a notary in Dundee, his confidential agent, who was allowed to take it home with him under the strictest injunctions of secrecy The latter, however, gave a copy of it to Peter Hay of Naughton, in Fife, who bore no goodwill to Lord Balmerino, and he immediately carried it to the archbishop of St Andrews That prelate, thinking the petition was sent about for subscription, hurried with it to London, and laid the matter before the king Lord Balmerino was, in consequence, on the 10th June 1634, examined before the privy council concerning this paper, and afterwards committed to close confinement in Edinburgh castle He was subsequently brought to trial, for having divulged and dispersed a dangerous and seditious libel, as the petition was styled, and concealing and not revealing the author thereof, and being found guilty by a majority of one, sentence of death was pronounced upon him The earl of Traquair, who was then chancellor, apprehensive of the vengeance of the populace, if the sentence was carried into execution, hastened to London, and procured a pardon, though it was not till November 1635 that Lord Balmerino was set at liberty His lordship entered warmly into the views of the covenanters, and assisted them not only with his advice and personal exertions, but also with large sums of money, to the injury of his paternal inheritance On the 18th August 1641 he was nominated president of parliament, on the 17th September a privy councillor, and on the 13th November following an extraordinary lord of session He died of apoplexy on the 28th February 1649, and was buried in the vaulted cemetery of the Logan family, adjoining to the old church of Restalrig, but according to Scott of Scotstarvet, his body was disinterred in 1650 by Cromwell's soldiers, while searching for leader coffins, for the purpose of making bullets, and thrown into the street He married Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Ker of Fernyhurst, and sister of the notorious Car, earl of Somerset His name has found a place in Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, Lord Balmerino's Speech on the Army, describing them Conspiracies,' having been published in 1642, 4to

John, third Lord Balmerino, the son of the second lord, born 18th February 1623, on succeeding to the title, found his affairs in great disorder He was also engaged in several lawsuits, and was obliged to dispose of almost the whole of his landed property For his compliance with the ruling powers during the usurpation, and for non conformity, he was fined in the sum of £6,000 Scots by the earl of Middleton's parliament in 1662 He died 10th June 1704, aged 82 By his wife, Lady Margaret Campbell, only daughter of John, earl of Loudon, lord high chancellor of Scotland, he had John, fourth Lord Balmerino, and three other children, who died in infancy

John, fourth Lord Balmerino, born 26th December 1652, was styled by Lockhart in his Memoirs, as "perhaps one of the best lawyers in the kingdom, and very expert in the knowledge of the Scottish constitution" He was admitted a privy councillor 16th August 1687, succeeded his father in 1704, and strenuously opposed the Union At the general election in 1710, he was elected one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage, the same year he was appointed general of the mint, and sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, and in 1711 he was named one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord chamberlain He was also one of the lords of police In 1713 he was rechosen a representative peer On the accession of George I he was removed from all his offices, and no longer elected one of the sixteen peers Notwithstanding this harsh treatment he continued faithful to the house of Hanover during the rebellion of 1715 He afterwards lived retired, and died at his house at Leith, 13th May 1736, aged 84 By his first wife, Lady Christian Montgomery, third daughter of Hugh, seventh earl of Eglintoun, he had two sons and two daughters. His eldest son, Hugh, master of Balmerino, an officer in the army, was killed at the siege of Lisle in 1708 His second son, John, succeeded him as fifth Lord Balmerino By his second wife, Anne, daughter of Arthur Ross, the last archbishop of St Andrews, he had the unfortunate Arthur, sixth and last Lord Balmerino and another son and a daughter, who both died unmarried

John, fifth Lord Balmerino, born 24th November 1675, applied to the study of the law, and was admitted advocate in 1703 In June 1714, a few weeks before the death of Queen Anne, he was appointed a lord of session, and took his seat on the bench as Lord Coupar [See COUPAR Barons] He died at Leith, 5th January 1746, aged 71, and having no issue by his wife, Lady Elizabeth Carnegie, daughter of David, fourth earl of Northesk, he was succeeded in both his titles of Balmerino and Coupar by his half-brother, Arthur, sixth and last Lord Balmerino, for a notice of whose life see PERPHINSTONE, ARTHUR

The Lords Balmerino were superiors of the district of Calton in Edinburgh The town council purchased the superiority from the last representative of that noble family, who presented the old Calton burying-ground to his vassals, and it is said offered them the whole hill for £40 —[Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh, vol ii p 133] The house of the Lords Balmerino in Leith was at the corner of Coatfield Lane in the Kirkgate, and here the third Lord Balmerino received Charles II on his landing in Leith, 29th July 1650

BALNAVES, a surname which, according to one tradition was derived from the high mountain Bennevis, (the Hill of Heaven,) in the south-west extremity of Inverness shire, near which those who bore the name are said to have lived According to another tradition the name arose from one Nevoy or Nevay playing well at the football before one of our kings, when the latter called out, "weel ballid, Nevoy," hence the surname Balnaves, in accordance with which some persons of the name have a football for crest, with the motto, Fortitudine et velocitate An old family, Balnaves of Carnbody, had for crest a hand holding a football, with the motto, Hinc origo [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol i p 20]

BALNAVES, HENRY, of Halhill, one of the promoters of the Reformation in Scotland, was born at Kirkcaldy, in the reign of James the Fifth After a course of study at the university of St Andrews, it is stated that, while yet a boy, he travelled to the continent, and hearing of a free school at Cologne, procured admission into it, and received a liberal education While on the continent he imbibed the principles of the Reformation On his return to Scotland he studied the law, and was for some time a procurator at St Andrews On 31st July, 1538, James the Fifth appointed him a lord of session, and on 10th August 1539 he obtained a charter of the lands of Halhill, in the parish of Collessie, Fife, to himself and Christaue Scheves his wife [Diplomata Regia, vol vii p 176] He was afterwards employed by the earl of Arran when governor of the kingdom, on whose appointment to the regency he became secretary of state, and is said by Sir James Melville to have been very instrumental in getting passed the celebrated act of parliament introduced by Lord Maxwell, by which the reading of the Bible in the "vulgu toung" was permitted In 1542 he was depute keeper of the privy seal, and in 1543 he was chosen by parliament one of the ambassadors to Henry the Eighth, sent with their instructions with regard to the proposed marriage of the infant queen Mary to Edward the young prince of Wales In this embassy he was joined with Sir James Learmonth the treasurer, and Sir William Hamilton of Sanquhar They set off from Edinburgh 23d March, 1543 [Sadler's State Papers, vol i p 90], and the treaties of peace and marriage were finally arranged on the 1st of July But, shortly after, on the return of the governor Arran to the popish faith and his reconciliation with Cardinal Bethune, Balnaves was dismissed from all his offices, in consequence of his protestant principles and his favouring the English alliance In November of this same year (1543), with the earl of Rothes and Lord Gray, he was apprehended at Dundee by the regent and cardinal, and confined in the castle of Blackness until May following, when they were restored to liberty, in consequence of the arrival of Henry's fleet in the Firth of Forth In 1546, after the murder of Cardinal Bethune, he joined Norman Leslie, and the others, in the castle of St Andrews, for which he was declared a traitor and forfeited, although he was not actually concerned in the deed While his friends were besieged in the castle, he was sent as their agent to England, for assistance, and in February 1547, a month after the death of Henry the Eighth, he received from the guardians of Edward the Sixth considerable sums of money and provisions for them [Fœdera, vol xv p 133] He himself obtained a pension of one hundred and twenty-five pounds, from lady day (25th March) that year, at the same time, he became bound that Leslie and his associates should do what they could to deliver the young queen Mary and the castle of St Andrews into the hands of the English When that fortress at last surrendered, he was conducted with the others to France, and confined in the French galleys at Rouen On this occasion it was that the popish party in Scotland shouted for joy in the streets,

> For Normand and his companie
> Hae fill'd the galleys fou'"

During his confinement at Rouen, he wrote what Knox terms "a comfortable treatise of justification," which, after being revised by Knox, who prefixed a recommendatory dedication, was published in 1584, under the title of 'The Confession of Faith, &c, compiled by M Henry Balnaves, of Halhill,' &c, as given in full after this article Dr M'Crie speaks of a London edition of the same date, but this is evidently a mistake

In 1556, the forfeiture which Balnaves had incurred was removed, when he returned to Scotland, and in 1559, "the year," according to Pitscottie, "of the uproir about religion," he took a leading part for the congregation In August of that year he was secretly despatched to solicit the assistance of Queen Elizabeth's envoy, Sir Ralph Sadler, at Berwick, and obtained from him a promise of an aid of two thousand pounds sterling On the 11th February 1563 he was reappointed a lord of session, and in December of that year named one of the commissioners for revising the Book of Discipline On the trial of Bothwell for the murder of Darnley in 1567, he was appointed one of the four assessors to the earl of Argyle, the lord justice general, and in the following year, he and Buchanan accompanied the regent Murray when he went to York, to attend the inquiry, by English and Scottish commissioners, into the alleged guilt of the unfortunate Queen Mary In requital for his various services, he received the lands of Letham from the regent He retired from the bench previous to October 1575, and died at Edinburgh, according to Dr Mackenzie, in 1579 We learn from Calderwood's History and Sadler's State Papers that he raised himself, by his talents and probity, from an obscure station to the first honours of the state, and was justly regarded as one of the principal supporters of the reformed cause in Scotland He is described by John Knox as a very learned and pious man, and Sir James Melville characterizes him as "a godly, learned, wise and long-experimented counsellor" [Melville's Memoirs, p 27] A short ballad, signed Balnaves, in Ramsay's Evergreen, entitled 'Advice to a headstrong Youth,' and beginning,

"O gallands all, I cry and call,"

has been attributed to him, but in our estimation without sufficient grounds On the faith of it, however, he has obtained a place in Irving's 'Lives of Scottish Poets' [Vol ii p 136] His estate of Halhill he disponed to Sir James Melville, third son of Sir John Melville of Raith, and brother of Sir Robert Melville of Murdocairnie, first Lord Melville It remained the property of his descendants till the reign of Charles the Second, when it was purchased by the earl of Melville The house of Halhill has long been taken down, and its site, with a portion of the estate, is included within the parks round Melville House

The Confession of Faith, conteining how the troubled man should seeke refuge at his God, therto led by faith, &c Compiled by M Henry Balnaues, of Halhill, and one of the Lords of Session and Counsell of Scotland, being as prisoner within the old pallace of Roane, in the yeare of our Lord 1548 Direct to his faithfull brethren, being in like trouble or more, and to all true professours and fauourers of the syncere worde of God Edinb 1584, 8vo

BANFF, BARON, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by Charles the First by patent, dated at Nottingham, 31st August 1642, on Sir George Ogilvy of Dunlugus, a descendant of a younger branch of the noble family of Airlie

Sir Walter Ogilvy of Auchleven, second son of Sir Walter Ogilvy of Lintrathen, high treasurer of Scotland, (who died in 1440—see article AIRLIE, ante, page 31,) married in 1437 Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir John Sinclair of Deskford and Findlater, and had two sons, Sir James Ogilvy, ancestor of the earls of Findlater [see FINDLATER, earl of], and Sir Walter Ogilvy of Boyne, ancestor of the Lords Banff The latter, by his marriage with Margaret, second daughter and co-heiress of Sir James Edmonstone of Edmonstone, obtained half of the lands of Tullallan in Perthshire, and of the thanedom of Boyne in Banffshire, and by excambion with Elizabeth Blackader, the elder sister of his wife, and her husband, Patrick Blackader, the other half of that thanedom was obtained by him, in right of his wife, in exchange for her half of Tullallan, 25th February 1486 The name of Banff, by which the family was afterwards ennobled, seems to be derived from the ancient thanedom of Boyne In some old charters the town of Banff is spelled Boineffe and Bameffe The district of Boyne has probably received its name from a conspicuous mountain in the neighbourhood of Cullen called the Binn

Sir Walter had three sons, viz George, ancestor of the Ogilvies of Boyne, Rothiemay and Inchmartyne, Walter Ogilvy of Dunlugus, progenitor of the Banff family, and Sir William Ogilvie of Strathearn, appointed high treasurer of Scotland by John duke of Albany, governor of the kingdom, who granted him a charter of the lordship of the forest of Boyne, 6th February 1516 [Crawford's Officers of State, p 370] By his wife, Alison Rule, Sir William Ogilvy had a son, John Ogilvy of Strathearn, afterwards designed of Carnousie

The second son above mentioned, Sir Walter Ogilvy of Dunlugus, held the office of provost of Banff He had a charter from his nephew, John Ogilvy of Strathearn, of certain lands in Inverness-shire, Carnousie in Banffshire, and Monycabock in Aberdeenshire, 31st March 1531 He died 29th November 1558, and was buried in the church of Banff, where a monument was erected to his memory By his wife, Alison Hume, daughter and co-heir of Sir Patrick Hume of Fastcastle, he got a considerable estate He had two sons

George and Walter, and a daughter, married to Sir Alexander Fraser of Philorth

The eldest son, Sir George Ogilvy of Dunlugus, married Beatrix Seton, fourth daughter of George fifth Lord Seton, and had three sons and a daughter the latter married to William Forbes of Tolquhoun He acquired the thanedom of Boyne from the elder branch of his family, and had a charter of all the lands of that thanedom, 20th March 1575 George, his second son, was the father of Sir George Ogilvy, first baronet of Carnousie, so created 24th April 1626

The eldest son, Sir Walter Ogilvy of Banff and Dunlugus, married Helen, daughter of Walter Urquhart of Cromarty, and had two sons and a daughter, Beatrix, married to Alexander Seton of Pitmedden

Sir George Ogilvy, the eldest son, was the first Lord Banff He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 30th July 1627 During the civil wars he adhered to the royal cause, and after the army of the Covenanters had been expelled from Aberdeen by the Gordons, 15th May 1639, when it was proposed by Gordon of Straloch, the historian, and Burnet of Craigmylle, a brother of the laird of Leys, who were both peaceably inclined, to enter into a negotiation with the earl marischal at Dunnottar, Sir George Ogilvy would not listen to the proposal, but addressing Straloch he said, "Go, if you will go, but pr'ythee, let it be as quarter-master, to inform the earl that we are coming" He distinguished himself in the action against the Covenanters under the earl of Montrose at the Bridge of Dee on the 19th of June [Spalding's History, vol i p 248] After the defeat of the Royalists there he retired to England, and in 1640 his houses and lands were plundered by the Covenanters In 1642, as already stated, for his faithful services King Charles created him a peer of Scotland, under the title of Lord Banff, to him and his heirs male for ever, bearing the name and arms of Ogilvy His lordship died 11th August 1663 He was twice married first to Margaret, daughter of Alexander Irvine of Drum, by whom he had a daughter Helen, married to the second earl of Airlie, and secondly to Mary Sutherland, a daughter of Duffus, by whom he had a son, George, second Lord Banff, and two daughters, who were both married

George, second Lord Banff, married Agnes Falconer, only daughter of the first Lord Halkerston, and had two sons, George, third lord Banff, and Sir Alexander Ogilvy, of Forglen and four daughters According to Douglas [Peerage, vol i p 193], Sir Alexander Ogilvy, the second son became an advocate, but there is no evidence of this on record [Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice, p 483] He was created a baronet 29th June 1701, and in 1702 he was elected member of the Scots parliament, for the burgh of Banff, and continued to sit in it till the Union In June 1703 he and Lord Belhaven were ordered into custody for some improper expressions in parliament, and on the 30th of the same month, on presenting a petition acknowledging their offence, they were brought to the bar of the house, by the officer of the guard, and after making a proper apology to the commissioner and the estates, were restored to their places On the 25th March 1706 Sir Alexander was appointed a lord of session, and took his seat on the 23d July following, under the judicial title of Lord Forglen The same year he was constituted one of the commissioners for the treaty of union, which he steadily supported in parliament He died 8d March 1727 He was twice married, and by his first wife, Mary, eldest daughter of Sir John Allardice of Allardice, in the county of Kincardine, he had three sons and four daughters His eldest son, George, died before him, as did also his second son Alexander, but the eldest son of the latter, Sir Alexander Ogilvy, baronet, became seventh lord Banff

In Fountainhall's Decisions, under date March 28, 1685, there is reported a curious case in which Sir Alexander Forbes of Tolquhoun pursued Alexander Ogilvy of Forglen, for taking away a gilded Mazer cup out of his house, rei vindicatione for restitution, or for the value After the examination of witnesses, who proved nothing, it was discovered that Tolquhoun himself had some years ago given in this cup to a goldsmith in Aberdeen to be mended, and he having forgot, it was lying there unreheved, for Tolquhoun's not paying half-a-crown for it The lords getting notice of this, proceeded to advise the case Tolquhoun by a bill had craved delay, till witnesses were examined as to who had given the cup to the goldsmith, seeing that Forglen might have shuffled it in there, but the lords rejected the bill, and assoilzied Forglen, ordaining Tolquhoun to pay a thousand merks of expenses, and allowing Forglen to pursue him for defamation In the following April Ogilvy brought an action against Forbes for defamation of character before the privy council, who fined him in twenty thousand merks, the half to go to the king, and the other half to the pursuer, and ordained the defender to crave pardon of the lords of session Forbes obtained a letter from the king to the privy council, remitting the one half of the fine, but the lords of session, on reconsidering the case, ordered the other half to be paid to Forglen

The second Lord Banff died in 1668, and was succeeded by his eldest son George, third lord, a Roman Catholic In 1705 he renounced popery, and a curious letter on the subject from his lordship and Mr William Hunter, minister of Banff who married his daughter, to Mr Carstares, will be found in the Carstares' State Papers, 736 Having signed the formula subjoined to the act of parliament for preventing the growth of popery, his lordship took his seat in the last parliament of Scotland on the first day of its last session, 3d October 1706 He voted with ministers on every question in support of the treaty of union, and his share of the twenty thousand pounds distributed on the occasion amounted only to eleven pounds two shillings [Carnwath's Memoirs, p 415] Had he been a little more hard to win he would doubtless have got more His lordship was burnt to death in the castle of Inchdrewer, about four miles from the town of Banff, under very suspicious circumstances, in November 1713 "It is said that he had gone for some time to Ireland, engaged probably in some of the intrigues then carrying on in behalf of the Pretender, and it was suspected that the persons in whose charge he had left the castle, having pillaged some of his valuable property, murdered him immediately after his return, and set his apartment on fire for the sake of concealment By some, it seems, the event was viewed as a judgment on his apostacy and particularly with regard to some threats used by him of burning the Protestants" [New Stat Acc Banffshire, vol xiii p 31] He married Lady Jean Keith, third daughter of William seventh earl Marischal, and had a son, George, fourth Lord Banff, and a daughter, who was twice married, the second time to the above-mentioned Rev William Hunter

George, the fourth lord, died in 1718 He married, 11th January 1712, Helen daughter of Sir John Lauder of Fountainhall, baronet, a lord of session, by whom he had two sons, John George, fifth lord born 18th February 1717, and Alexander, sixth lord, a posthumous son, being born in 1718 Her ladyship married a second time James Hay, second son of Hay of Rannes, by whom she had three sons, and died 22d October 1743

John George, the fifth Lord Banff, was unfortunately drowned 29th July 1738, when bathing with Lord Deskford, afterwards sixth earl of Findlater, after dinner at the Black Rocks near Cullen He had a short time previously married Mary daughter of Captain James Ogilvy, but had no issue

His brother Alexander succeeded him as sixth Lord Banff He had the rank of captain in the royal navy 13th February 1741, and was commander of the Hastings man-of-war in 1749 and 1743, when he captured a valuable outward bound Spanish register ship, a Spanish privateer of twenty guns, and a French polacre with a rich cargo, and other vessels In 1745 he was appointed to the command of the Tilbury, and died, unmarried, at Lisbon in November 1746, in the 29th year of his age His personal property was bequeathed to his brothers-uterine the Hays, while his title and estate were inherited by his cousin, Sir Alexander Ogilvy of Forglen, grandson of Sir Alexander Ogilvy, Lord Forglen

Sir Alexander Ogilvy, seventh Lord Banff succeeded his grandfather in his estate and baronetcy in 1727, and in 1746 he succeeded his cousin as already stated in the Banff peerage He married, 2d April 1749, Jean daughter of William Nisbet of Dirleton, and by her had four sons and five daughters, the eldest of whom Jane, was married to Sir George Abercromby of Birkenbog, baronet

The eldest son, Alexander, having died young in 1763, William, the second son, became, on the death of his father, 1st December 1771, eighth and last Lord Banff He was an officer in the Inniskillen dragoons, and served on the continent under the duke of York He died, unmarried, at Forglen, 4th June 1803, when, all his brothers being dead without issue, his estates went to his sister, the Hon Lady Abercromby, and the title became dormant The Hon Lady Abercromby died in 1838, and was succeeded by her son Sir Robert Abercromby of Birkenbog and Forglen, baronet The title of Lord Banff is claimed by Sir William Ogilvie of Carnousie, baronet

BANNATYNE, in old writings spelled Bonachtyne and Bunachtyne, a surname supposed originally to have been the same as Ballantyne

The most ancient families of the name were the Bannatynes of Corhouse, of Newtyle, descended from the former, James Bannatyne of Newhall, son of the Laird of Newtyle, Forfarshire, appointed a lord of session 14th February, 1626, died 1636, of Camys, now Kames, in the island of Bute, and of Kelly, founded by a second son of that family By charters and bonds of warrent the Bannatynes may be traced as in possession of Kames early in the fourteenth century, when it is supposed that Kames castle, a single tower, which was long the residence of the family, was built A tumulus on the side of a small stream near the Point House, Rothesay, is shown where a bloody battle took place between the Bannatynes of Kames and the Spences of North Kames The castle was formerly surrounded by a ditch, which was filled up, and a modern house added to the tower by the late Lord Bannatyne, of whom a notice is given below, and who sold the estate to Mr James Hamilton, writer to the signet Although the Bannatynes are no longer in possession of Kames, their name is perpetuated as having once been connected with Bute in the village of Port Bannatyne, about 3 miles from Rothesay Connected with the ancient family of Bannatyne of Kames was George Bannatyne, the collector of our Scottish poetry, the subject of the following notice, whose father, Mr James Bannatyne, a writer in Edinburgh, possessed the estate of Kirkton of Newtyle, in Forfarshire, the manor house of which was called Bannatyne House He was a man of some eminence in his profession, and held the office of Tabular, or Keeper of the Rolls, to the Court of Session, in which his second but then eldest living son, Thomas Bannatyne, who became a lord of session, under the designation of Lord Newtyle, was conjoined with him as his successor by royal precept May 2, 1583 The father, James Bannatyne, died in 1583 The son, Thomas Bannatyne, was born on the last day of August, 1540, and appears for the first time as justice-depute, 17th February, 1572 On the 20th April, 1577, he was appointed an ordinary lord of session in place of Sir John Bellenden of Auchinoul He was one of the commissioners for opening parliament, 18th November, 1583, and also in August 1584 On the 18th November, 1583 he was appointed by his colleagues on the bench their collector for the following year "of the fourte shillings quhilk sall be givin them be the parties pleyand before them, quha tynes the ply the time of the giving of the saids lords decret of dempnation or absolvitor," [Books of Sederunt,] a tax which the Court had been authorised to levy by an act of parliament passed a short time before Lord Newtyle died 13th August 1591 [Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice, p 164] In 1596 his son, Mr James Bannatyne, was retoured his heir in the lands of Kirkton of Newtyle, with the brewhouse and corntemd, and half of the barony of Balmaw, which before the Reformation belonged to the abbey of Lindores, having been granted to that monastery by Alexander the Third, along with some other territorial grants These properties belong now to Lord Wharncliffe

BANNATYNE, GEORGE, the collector of the national poetry of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and whose name has been adopted by a distinguished Scottish literary club, founded by Sir Walter Scott, in 1823, was born February 22, 1545 His father, the above-mentioned James Bannatyne of the Kirktown of Newtyle, Forfarshire, by his wife, Katherine Taillefer, had twenty-three children, and George was the seventh child He was brought up to trade, but it does not appear at what particular time he began to be engaged in business, nor what branch of business he pursued His famous collection was written in the months of October, November, and December, in his retirement in Bannatyne House, Forfarshire, during a pestilence which raged in Edinburgh in the latter part of 1568 "Bannatyne's Manuscript," says Sir Walter Scott, in a memoir of him, which he wrote for the Bannatyne Club, "is in a folio form, containing upwards of eight hundred pages, very neatly and closely written, and designed, as has been supposed, to be sent to the press The labour of compiling so rich a collection was undertaken by the author during the time of pestilence in the year 1568, when the dread of infection compelled men to forsake their usual employments, which could not be conducted without admitting the ordinary promiscuous intercourse between man and his kindred men In this dreadful period, when hundreds, finding themselves surrounded by danger and death, renounced all care, save that of selfish precaution for their own safety, and all thoughts save apprehensions of infection, George Bannatyne had the courageous energy to form and execute the plan of saving the literature of a whole nation, and undisturbed by the universal mourning for the dead, and general fears of the living, to devote himself to the task of collecting and recording the triumphs of human genius, thus, amid the wreck of all that was mortal, employing himself in preserving the lays by which immortality is at once given to others, and obtained for the writer himself" Many of the productions of the "Makkaris" of ancient days would have perished had not George Bannatyne thus rescued them from oblivion On the north side of Bannatyne house, there is a capacious circular turret, which is believed to have been Mr Bannatyne's study, while engaged in this laborious but interesting task

In October 1587 Bannatyne was admitted a merchant and guild brother of the city of Edinburgh Sir Walter Scott conjectures that, as usual in a Scottish burgh, his commerce was general and miscellaneous In a few years, we are further told, he had amassed a considerable capital, "which he employed to advantage in various money-lending transactions" Bannatyne died some time previous to 1608 He had married Isobel Mawchan or Maughan, relict of Baillie William Nisbet, who brought him a son and a daughter The son died young His daughter was married, in her 16th year, to George Foulis of Woodhall and Ravelstone, whose grandson, William Foulis of Woodhall, bestowed the valuable collection of Scottish poetry left by George Bannatyne on the Hon William Carmichael of Skirling, advocate, brother of the earl of Hyndford Allan Ramsay afterwards selected from it materials for his 'Evergreen' In 1770 Lord Hailes published a more accurate selection from it In 1772 the Bannatyne Manuscript was presented by the third earl of Hyndford to the Advocates' Library, in which it is now preserved Bannatyne himself wrote one or two pieces of original poetry, but these are of no great merit The club that bears his name was instituted in 1823 for the publication of works illustrative of the history and antiquities of Scotland Of this club Sir Walter Scott was president, and he regularly took the chair on their anniversary dinners from 1823 to 1831 For their first dinner on March 9, 1823, he composed an excellent song, (now inserted among his poems,) which was sung by Mr James Ballantyne, bookseller, and heartily chorused by the company —

'Assist me, ye friends of old books and old wine,
To sing in the praises of Sage Bannatyne,
Who left such a treasure of old Scottish lore,
As enables each age to print one volume more,
One volume more, my friends, one volume more,
We'll ransack old Banny for one volume more

BANNATYNE, RICHARD, secretary to John Knox, and compiler of 'Memorials of Transactions in Scotland from 1569 to 1573,' was, it is satisfactorily ascertained, a person of respectability and learning, and much esteemed by the great reformer, whose friendship and confidence he enjoyed till his death Very little is known concerning him It appears probable that he was a descendant of the family of which George Bannatyne was a cadet It is uncertain whether he belonged to the profession of the law, or was a licentiate of the church In the prefatory notice to Mr Pitcairn's edition of the 'Memorials,' printed in 1836 for the Bannatyne Club, which contains all the particulars of Richard Bannatyne's life that can now be obtained, and to which we have been indebted for these details, there occurs the following passage "There is no reason for supposing that Bannatyne had ever been employed as an authorized reader or catechist under John Knox Although the first minister of Edinburgh would most likely require the services of such an individual, to aid him in overtaking the laborious but important duties of parochial visitation and catechising, &c, yet it is not known that Knox availed himself of the continued personal assistance and services of any other person than Richard Bannatyne But at the same time it ought to be remarked, that in the course of the 'Memorials,' notice is repeatedly taken of Richard Bannatyne having made appearances in the General Assembly, and before the Kirk Session of Edinburgh, during the illness or absence of John Knox, and that he was permitted to address these courts as a 'prolocutor' or speaker," which he could only have done in the capacity of a member, or law-agent appearing on behalf of another At the first General Assembly held after the death of Knox, which took place in November 1572, Richard Bannatyne presented a petition, or "supplication," praying that he should be appointed by the church to put in order, for their better preservation, the papers and scrolls left to him by the reformer The Assembly agreed to his request, and granted him "the summ of fourty pounds, to be payed off the 1572 years crope," for so doing About 1575, after he had completed the task assigned to him, Richard Bannatyne became clerk to Mr Samuel Cockburn, of Tempill, or Tempill-hall, advocate, in whose service he remained for thirty years, and whom he appointed joint executor of his last will and testament with his only brother, James Bannatyne, merchant in Ayr To his master's daughter, Alice, he left a legacy of two hundred merks, besides smaller gifts to his domestics Richard Bannatyne died September 4, 1605 Of the 'Memorialles' there are two MSS extant, understood to be transcripts of the original, one in the library of the university of Edinburgh, and the other in the Advocates' Library From the latter Sir John Graham Dalzell, published, in 1806, an octavo volume, entitled 'Journal of the Transactions in Scotland,' which excited great interest from the historical value of the contents The university transcript having been afterwards discovered, Mr Pitcairn had the advantage of collating the two with each other, whereby he was enabled to produce the first complete edition of Bannatyne's work which has yet appeared The following graphic and interesting notice of Richard Bannatyne, which records also one of the latest appearances in the pulpit of John Knox, is taken from the Diary of Mr James Melville, 1556—1601, printed at Edinburgh in 1829 "The town of Edinbruche recouered againe, and the guid and honest men therof retourned to thair housses Mr Knox, with his familie, past hame to Edinbruche, being in Sanct Andros, he was verie weak I saw him every day of his doctrine go hulie and feir, with a furring of maitriks about his neck, a staff in the an hand, and guid godlie Richard Ballanden, his servand haldin vpe the vther oxtar, from the Abbay to the paroche kirke, and be the said Richart and another servant, lifted vpe to the pulpit, whar he behouit to lean at his first entrie, bot or he haid done with his sermont, he was sa active and vigorous, that he was lyke to ding that pulpit in blads, and flie out of it! Sa, soone efter his coming to Edinbruche, he becam unable to preatch, and sa instituting in his roum, be the ordinar calling of the kirk and the congregation, Mr James Lawsone, he tuk him to his chamber, and most happelie and comfortablie departed this lyff" [Melville's Diary, p 26]

The scene that took place just before Knox breathed his last, in which Bannatyne acted a prominent part, is thus described by Calderwood, (vol iii p 237) "About five houres he sayeth to his wife, 'Goe, read where I cast my first anker,' and so, she read the 17th chapter of the Gospel according to Johne, and, after that, some sermons of Mr Calvin's upon the Ephesians About halfe houre to tenne they went to the ordinar prayer, which being ended, Doctor Preston said unto him, 'Sir, heard yee the prayers?' He answered, 'I would to God that yee and all men heard them as I heard I praise God for that heavenlie sound' Then Robert Campbell of Kinzeancleuche sitteth doun before him on a stoole, and incontinent he sayeth, 'Now, it is come!' for he had given a long sigh and sob Then said Richard Bannatyne to him, 'Now, Sir, the time yee have long called to God for, to witt, an end of your battell, is come, and seeing all naturall powers faile, give us some signe that yee remember upon the comfortable promises which yee have oft shewed unto us' He lifted up his one hand, and incontinent therafter rendered his spirit, about eleven houres at night"

Bannatyne's attachment to the reformer, and high appreciation of his character, are well illustrated in the following anecdote When Knox was accused by Robert Hamilton of St Andrews, of being "as great a murtherer as any Hamilton in Scotland, and, therefore, suld not cry out so fast against murtherers, he being privy to an attempt to assassinate Darnley at Perth," he challenged the accuser to make good his charge, and

Hamilton at once retracted it Upon which Bannatyne said to him, "Gif I knew my maister to be sic a man, I wold not serve him for all the gein Sanct Andrews"

BANNATYNE, Sir William Macleod, Knt, one of the senators of the College of Justice, was born January 26, 1743 He was the son of Mr Roderick Macleod, writer to the signet, and through his mother he succeeded to the estate of Kames in the island of Bute, when he assumed the name of Bannatyne His aunt, Lady Clanranald, was imprisoned in the Tower of London, for having afforded protection to Prince Charles during his wanderings, after the battle of Culloden Being of a gay and easy disposition, he had not been many years in possession of Kames, when he was obliged to part with it, and, as already stated, it was purchased by Mr James Hamilton, writer to the signet He received a liberal education, and was admitted advocate, January 22, 1765 While at the bar he deservedly acquired the character of a sound and able lawyer Among his intimate friends were Blair, Mackenzie, Cullen, Erskine, Abercromby, and Craig He was a contributor to the Mirror and Lounger, and was the last survivor of that illustrious band of men of genius who shed so bright a lustre on the periodical literature of Scotland, about the end of the eighteenth century In private life, his benevolent and amiable qualities of heart and mind, and his rich store of literary and historical anecdote, endeared him to a numerous and highly distinguished circle of friends On the death of Lord Swinton, in 1799, he was promoted to the bench, and took his seat as Lord Bannatyne, on the 16th May of that year He retired in 1823, when he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him He died at Edinburgh, November 30, 1833, in his 91st year Although as a speaker Lord Bannatyne was perspicuous and distinct, his judicial remarks when written by himself, from his parenthetical style, were exceedingly involved and confused Nevertheless, his decisions were sound, and his legal opinions had always due weight with his brethren on the bench The Highland Society was originated by him and some other patriotic gentlemen in 1784, and he was an original member of the Bannatyne Club He had collected a valuable library, rich in historical, genealogical, and antiquarian works, and at its sale, which took place 25th April, 1834, six months after his decease, a set of the Bannatyne publications was purchased for Sir John Hay, baronet, of Smithfield and Haystown, for one hundred and sixty-eight pounds sterling It wanted, however, one or two of the "Garlands" The following is a likeness of Lord Bannatyne taken by Kay in 1799

His mansion, Whiteford House, near the bottom of the Canongate of Edinburgh, became a typefoundry after his death

Bannerman, a surname derived from the office of banner-bearer to the king Those of this name held that office during the tenth and eleventh centuries, and carried for arms a banner displayed Boece states that once when King Malcolm the Third had advanced against the rebels in Moray, he who bore the royal banner showing a want of courage the king took the banner from him and gave it to Sir Alexander Carron, the ancestor of the noble family of Scrimzeour, viscounts and earls of Dundee, afterwards hereditary standard bearers In this story, the first part of which at least is somewhat doubtful Buchanan follows Boece, but an interpolated passage of Fordun [Book i p 285] places this event, so far as relates to the origin of the Scrimzeours, in the reign of Alexander the First [See ante, p 54] The former banner-bearer and his successors, according to Sir George Mackenzie, in his genealogical account of the families of Scotland, were ordained to bear in their crest of arms a banner with its strift broken, but, instead, they assumed those of Forbes, with some difference, because of their frequent alliances with persons of that surname The statement is entirely unsupported, and there is no foundation for his assertion that the Bannermans ever used the Forbes arms [See APPENDIX]

The lands of Elsick were confirmed to Alexander Bannerman, the ancestor of the family, by a charter from Robert II, in 1387

In 1589 Alexander Bannerman of Waterton was sheriff-depute of Aberdeen [Scotstarvet's Collections, p 184]

Margaret, a daughter of Bannerman of Elsick, married, 23d November 1608, George Gordon of Haddo, ancestor of the earls of Aberdeen

On 28th December 1682, the ancestor of the family of Bannerman of Elsick, whose seat is Crimonmogate, Aberdeenshire, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia for his attachment to the cause of Charles the Second His second son, George Bannerman of Dunbog, was admitted advocate 14th February 1671, and on 16th January 1684 he was appointed solicitor to King Charles the Second He married Elizabeth Oliphant, daughter of the laird of Bachilton, and died at Edinburgh 20th November 1691 He did not take the oaths to William of Orange, having adhered to the exiled family All the family were Jacobites A younger brother, Mr Robert Bannerman, was episcopalian minister at Newton, but lost his living in 1689, for not agreeing with the Revolution Another brother, Captain Bannerman, was an officer in King James' forces

The name frequently occurs in the Burgh records of the town of Aberdeen In 1715 Sir Peter Bannerman was provost of that city

Sir Alexander, the 9th Bart born in Aberdeen, the 6th April 1822, educated at Trin Coll Cambridge, succeeded his father, 18th June 1851, and married Sept 25 1860, Lady Arabella Diana West, youngest daughter of the 5th Earl Delawarr

BARBOUR, a surname which there can be no doubt originated from the profession of a barber, and seems to have been at one period common in Scotland In 1309 King Robert the Bruce granted to Robert Barbour a charter of the lands of Craigie in Forfarshire To this Robert Barbour Dr Jamieson suggests the probability that the poet Barbour was related In the borough rolls of exchequer in the year 1328 occurs an order issued by King Robert the Bruce to Sir Alexander Seaton, governor of Berwick, for the payment of a certain sum of money to a John Barbour or Barber A person of the name of Andrew Barbour possessed a tenement in the Castle street of Aberdeen, from which, in 1350, a burgess of that city called Mathew Pinchach had granted an endowment to the Carmelite Friars, as appears from a charter given by David the Second to that body, of the date of 1560 In this charter the name Barbour is curiously translated Barbitonsor [Jamieson's Barbour, page 3]

BARBOUR, BARBER, or BARBAR, JOHN, an eminent historical poet, was born, according to a supposition of Lord Hailes, about 1316, other authorities say, 1330 Aberdeen is stated by Hume of Godscroft, Dr M'Kenzie and others, to have been his birthplace, but the statement, though extremely probable, is not fully authenticated From the sameness of the name, he is conjectured by Dr Irving to have been the son of the above-named John Barbour, [Irving's Lives of the Scotish Poets, vol i p 254,] while Dr Jamieson suggests that the Andrew Barbour, also above mentioned, was his father [Jamieson's Barbour, v i p 3] The latter is certainly the more probable supposition Where all is conjecture, however, without any evidence to support it, Mr Pinkerton, on the other hand, prudently abstains from hazarding a guess as to either the birthplace or the parentage of the poet [Pinkerton's Barbour, vol i p 18] Tytler says, "there is a presumption that he was educated at Arbroath," [Lives of Scottish Worthies, vol ii p 159,] but he states no grounds and gives no authority for it That Barbour received a learned education is certain, being intended for the church In 1356 he was promoted by David the Second to the archdeaconry of Aberdeen In August 1357, Edward the Third, on the application of his own sovereign, granted him permission to visit Oxford with three scholars in his company The letter of safe-conduct is preserved in Rymer's Fœdera [vol vi, p 31] Although Warton supposes, [History of English Poetry, vol i p 318,] and Tytler "pronounces with certainty" that he "studied in middle life at Oxford," [Lives of Scottish Worthies, p 159,] there is no evidence that he ever pursued any regular studies there In September 1357 he was appointed by the bishop of his diocese one of the commissioners to deliberate at Edinburgh, concerning the ransom of David the Second, then a captive in England [Fœdera, vol vi p 39] In November 1364, he received another permission to pass through England, accompanied by four horsemen, for the purpose of studying at Oxford, or elsewhere It has been conjectured that his repeated visits to that university were for the purpose of consulting books, and conferring with learned men, or perhaps he had the charge of young students whom he conducted to Oxford, to place them under academical discipline From the terms of the first recited passport, in which three scholars in his company are distinctly mentioned, this is most likely to have been the case In October 1365 he appears to have visited St Denis, near Paris, in company with six knights his attendants The object of their expedition has been conjectured by Dr Irving to have been of a religious kind, for the king of England granted them permission to pass through his dominions on their way to St Denis and other sacred places [Fœdera, vol vi p 478] Another safe-conduct, dated November 1368, granted by Edward to Barbour, permitted him to pass through England, with two servants and their horses, on his way to France, for the purpose of studying there In February 1373-4 his name appears in the list of auditors of the Scottish exchequer Such are all the scanty materials that are known of the life of Barbour

His great poem of 'The Bruce, or the History of Robert the First, King of Scotland,' was written at the desire, it is said, of King David the Second It was not commenced till after the middle period of his life, and as he himself informs us, was finished in 1375 Hume of Godscroft asserts that as a reward for the compilation of 'The Bruce,' he had a yearly pension out of the exchequer during his life, which he gave to the hospital at Aberdeen, and that it continued to be paid in the seventeenth century [History of the House of Douglas, p 30], but for this there does not seem to be any authority On this subject there appears to be considerable confusion in the statements of different writers Dr Nicolson, without producing any voucher, affirms that he received this pension from King David [Scottish Historical Library, p 145], but King David died in 1370, five years before the poem was finished Dr Mackenzie first states that it was David the Second, and afterwards that it was Robert the Second who conferred this pension on Barbour [Lives of Scots Writers, vol i pp 264, 297] Dr Irving says the original source of information on the point is evidently the passage in Godscroft [Lives of the Scottish Poets, vol i p 256] It is known that he had two pensions, one of ten pounds Scots from the customs of Aberdeen, limited to his life, and another of twenty shillings from the rents of that city, the latter of which, at his death, he bequeathed to the chapter of the cathedral church of his native city, for a mass to be sung for his soul's repose

Annexed is a woodcut of the cathedral of Aberdeen

Barbour died at the end of 1395, at an advanced age His celebrated poem has long been considered valuable as an historical record It contains copious details of the glorious exploits of Robert the Bruce, and his heroic companions in arms The first known edition of 'The Bruce' was published at Edinburgh in 1616, in 12mo, but an earlier edition is believed to have existed There have been about twenty editions in all, the work having been several times reprinted both at Edinburgh and Glasgow The best editions are Pinkerton's, with notes and a glossary, printed from a MS in the Advocates' Library, dated 1489, three volumes 8vo, London, 1790, and Dr Jamieson's 4to, Edinburgh, 1820 Taking the total merits of this work together, Pinkerton says that "he prefers it to the early exertions of even the Italian muse, to the melancholy sublimity of Dante, and the amorous quaintness of Petrarca" Barbour, who was contemporary with Gower and Chaucer, wrote better English than either of these poets, his language being more intelligible to a modern reader than is that of any one poet of the fourteenth century The following affords a very favourable specimen of his style, and of his talent at rural description —

> This was in midst of month of May
> When buds sing on ilka spray,
> Melland then notes, with seemly soun
> For softness of the sweet season

And leavis of the branchis spreeds,
And blossomis bright, beside them breeds
And fieldis strawed are with flow'rs
Well savouring of seir colours,
And all things worthis, blyth, and gay

Barbour was celebrated in his own times for his learning and genius, but the humanity of his sentiments, and the liberality of his views, were much in advance of his age His description of Freedom is highly dignified and poetical —

A' fredome is a nobil thing!
Fredome mayss a man to haiff lyking,
Fredome all solace to men giffis
He levys at ess that freely levys
A noble hart may haiff nane ess,
No ellys nocht that may him pless,
Gyff fredome failythe, for fre liking
Is yearnyt our all othir thing
Na he that ay hass levyt fre,
May nocht knaw weill the propyrte,
The angyr, na the wrechyt dome
That is cowplyt to foul thyrldome
Bot gyff he had assayit it
Than all perquer he suld it wyt,
And suld think fredome mar to pryss Than all the gold in waild that is

From some passages in Wyntoun's Chronicle, it has been conjectured that Barbour also composed a Genealogical History of the kings of Scotland, but no part of this is known to be extant According to Tytler this formed two works, one on the Original of the Stewarts, and the other on the Genealogy of King Bruce

BARCLAY, the same name as the English Berkeley, the Scottish Barclays being originally descended from Roger de Berkeley, who is said to have come into England with William the Conqueror, and according to the custom of the time, assumed his surname from Berkeley castle in Gloucestershire, the place of his residence and possessions

During the twelfth century a branch of the Berkeley family settled in Scotland, and in 1165 we find Walter de Berkeley chamberlain of the kingdom [Crawford's Officers of State, page 253] The name is of long standing in Kincardineshire In the foundation charter of the Abbey of Arbroath from William the Lion in 1178, in conveying to that institution the lands of Mondynes, in the parish of Fordoun, it is said, "Dedi etiam eis unam carucatam terre in Monethyne, super aquam de Bervyne, quam Willus de Munfort et Umfridus de Berkeley, et Walterus Scotus et Alanus, filius Symonis, et alii probi homines, mei per preceptum meum eis mensuraverunt"

The writer of the account of the Barclays of Mathers, afterwards Urie, in Nisbet's System of Heraldry, doubtless one of that family, desirous of making it even more ancient than the Conquest, expresses his opinion that their early settlement in Scotland was before that event, and that they were not of Norman race at all He says, [Nisbet, vol ii page 245,] whether the ancient surname of Berkeley or Barclay be originally of Caledonian, British, or Saxon extraction, is what cannot now be concluded, but this much is vouched that in the reign of William the Lion there were four great and eminent families of that name settled in Scotland, namely, Walter de Berkeley, William de Berkeley, Humphrey de Berkeley, and Robert de Berkeley—the two first having been great chamberlains of the kingdom Walter de Berkeley, the first named, was one of the pledges for King William the Lion to Henry the Second of England He left two daughters, one of whom, Margaret, married Sir Alexander Seton of Seton, ancestor of the earls of Winton This Walter de Berkeley is supposed to have been the nephew of Theobald de Berkeley the progenitor of the Barclays of Mathers in Kincardineshire who lived in the reign of David the First, and had two sons Humphry and John

Humphry the elder, designed of Gairntully, was a liberal benefactor to the abbey of Arbroath, and is undoubtedly the same who is mentioned in the above cited charter of William the Lion On part of his large possessions in the Mearns, namely Balfeith, Monboddo, Glenfarquhar, &c, in the parish of Fordoun, he granted a donation to the abbot and monks thereof, which was confirmed by William the Lion, and was renewed and augmented by his only child Richenda, and her husband, Robert, ancestor of the earls of Glencairn This second donation was confirmed by Alexander the Second After the death of her husband, the monks prevailed on Richenda to dispone these lands to them for the third time, which third donation was confirmed by Alexander the Second at Aberbrothwick, 7th March, 1213 Humphry's brother, John de Berkeley, who succeeded him turned the abbot and monks out of all the lands so granted to them, but was obliged to enter into an agreement with them, confirmed by Alexander the Second, whereby, in lieu of what he had thus dispossessed them of, he gave them the mill of Conveth, with the appurtenances thereof, taking them bound, at the same time, to pay to him and his heirs, in all time coming, the sum of thirteen merks of silver yearly

John was succeeded by his son Robert de Berkeley, and he by his son Hugh de Berkeley, who obtained a charter from King Robert the Bruce upon Westerton, being lands lying near the above mentioned mill of Conveth His son, Alexander de Berkeley, born in 1326, was the first designed of Mathers He obtained these lands, situated in the southern district of Kincardineshire, on his marriage with Katherine, sister of William de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, whose charter conveying them, dated in 1351, is confirmed by King David the Second, at Perth, 18th March the same year He was succeeded by his son, David de Berkeley, whose grandson, also named David de Berkeley, was that laird of Mathers, who with the lairds of Lauriston, Arbuthnott, Pittarrow and Halkerton, was accessary to the slaughter of John Melville of Glenbervie, sheriff of the Mearns in the reign of James the First, as formerly narrated, and who built the castle called the Kaim of Mathers [See ante, page 143, article ARBUTHNOTT] He married Elizabeth, a daughter of Strachan of Thornton in the same county

His son Alexander was the first to spell the family name Barclay He was living in 1483, as appears by a charter dated in that year, granted to him "by his kinsman, William, earl Marischal" He married Katherine, daughter of Wishart of Pittarrow His son, David Barclay of Mathers, married Janet, a daughter of Irvine of Drum Their eldest son,

Alexander Barclay of Mathers, was living in 1497 He married Marjory, second daughter of James Auchinleck, laird of Glenbervie, the son of John Auchinleck of that ilk in Forfarshire, and who, by marrying the only daughter of the sheriff, John Melville, killed by the barons of the Mearns, obtained his estate of Glenbervie

David Barclay of Mathers, born in 1580, the fifth in descent from this Alexander Barclay, and the twelfth laird of Mathers of the name of Barclay, by his extravagance and living much at court, was obliged to sell the estate first of Mathers, after it had been in possession of the family nearly three hundred years, and then the old patrimonial lands, after being in the family upwards of five hundred years He married Elizabeth Livingston, daughter of Livingston of Dunnipace, and had a daughter, Anne, first married to Douglas of Tilwhilly, and secondly to Strachan, afterwards bishop of Brechin, and several sons, of whom John and Alexander died young, David became his heir and representative, Robert was rector of the Scots college at Paris, and James, the youngest, a cornet in a troop of horse, was killed at the battle of Philiphaugh

Had the last laird of Mathers of this family, remembered the advice of that laird, his ancestor, who first changed the name from Berkeley to Barclay, as contained in "the Laird of Mathers' Testament," the estate might still have been in possession of his descendants The verses which pass under this name are as follows —

"Gif thou desire thy house lang stand,
And thy successors bruik thy land,
Above all things live God in fear,
Intromit nocht with wrangous gear,
Nor conquess nothing wrangously
With thy neighbour keep charity
See that thou pass not thy estate,
Obey duly thy magistrate
Oppress not, but support the puire
To help the commonweill take cure
Use no deceit, mell not with treason,
And to all men do richt and reason
Both unto word and deed be true,
All kinds of wickedness eschew
Slay no man, nor thereto consent
Be nocht cruel, but patient
Ally ay in some guid place,
With noble, honest godly, race
Hate hurdom, and all vices flee,
Be humble, haunt guid compainye
Help thy friend, and do nae wrang,
And God shall cause thy house stand lang

David, afterwards Colonel David Barclay of Urie, was born in 1610 He entered the army, and served as a volunteer under Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden Having attained the rank of major, he remained abroad till the civil wars broke out in his own country, when he returned home and became colonel of a regiment of horse on the side of the king On the accession of Cromwell's party to power, he retired from active military service, and in 1647 purchased the estate of Urie in Kincardineshire, from William earl Marischal After the Restoration he was committed prisoner to Edinburgh Castle upon some groundless charge of hostility to the government, but was soon liberated through the interest of the earl of Middleton, with whom he had served in the civil war During his imprisonment he was converted to Quakerism by the celebrated laird of Swinton, who was confined in the same prison [See SWINTON, surname of] He married Catherine, daughter of Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonstown, the premier baronet of Nova Scotia, and well known historian of the house of Sutherland, second son of the earl of Sutherland, and second cousin of King James the Sixth By her he had two daughters, Lucy and Jean, and three sons, Robert, John, and David. Lucy and David died unmarried Jean married Sir Ewen Cameron of Lochiel, to whom she bore eight children Robert, the eldest son, who became celebrated as the apologist for the Quakers, is afterwards noticed John, the second son, settled in East Jersey in America, where he married and left issue

In the Ragman Roll, among those who swore fealty to Edward the First, in 1296, occurs the name of Patricius de Berkeley This surname was then so numerous in Scotland, that the different families are not easily distinguishable Besides the Barclays of Mathers, there were the Barclays of Towie, and those of Gartly or Garthie, in Aberdeenshire, of Collairnie, in Fife, of Touch, descended from the latter, of Johnston, descended from the family of Mathers, of Balmakewan, the first of which family was the second son of David Barclay of Johnston, and other families of the same name

In the charters of King William the Lion to the abbey of Dunfermline, amongst the witnesses are Walter de Berkeley and Robert de Berkeley In the reign of Alexander the Second, Malcolm, earl of Angus, married the daughter of Sir Humphry Berkeley In the register of Arbroath is a charter granted by Malcolm, earl of Fife [who lived in the reign of Alexander the Third], to Andrew de Swinton, to which Roger de Berkeley is a witness In 1284 Hugo de Berkeley was Justiciarius Laodoniæ His name appears as a witness to a charter of Alexander the Third, to the monks of Melrose, dated at Jedburgh the 12th December, in the sixteenth year of his reign He is supposed to be the same Hugo de Berkeley who had half of the barony of Crawfordjohn in Lanarkshire, and was sometimes designed of Crawfordjohn and sometimes of Kilburnie, which, in 1471, went to the Craufurds by marriage In the register of Melrose (p 62) Sir Walter Berkeley, knight, sheriff of Aberdeen, is so designed in a charter of King Robert the Bruce to that town His seal of arms was the same with those of the lords Berkeley in England

In 1314, Sir David Berkeley or Barclay of Cairny-Barclay in Fife, married Margaret de Brechin, daughter of Sir David de Brechin, lord of Brechin He was one of the chief associates of Robert the Bruce, and was present at most of his battles, particularly Methven, where he was taken prisoner [Barbour, page 32] After the successful issue of the struggle he was appointed sheriff of the county of Fife [Sibbald's Hist of Fif, page 288] On the forfeiture of his brother-in-law, Sir David de Brechin in 1321 [see BRECHIN, lord of], King Robert bestowed upon him the lordship of Brechin, the barony of Rothiemay, the lands of Kinloch and part of Glenesk, which had belonged to his brother-in-law He had for his paternal estate the barony of old Lindores and the lands of Cairny of Fife His strong castle stood near the loch of Lindores He gave to the monks of Balmerino, in pure alms, a right of fishing in the river Tay This Sir David Barclay lord of Brechin, is also frequently mentioned in the wars of King David Bruce, to whom he faithfully adhered even when his cause was the most depressed, and in 1341, by that monarch's command, he seized Sir William Bullock, chamberlain of Scotland, suspected of treason, and committed him to prison Having slain John Douglas, brother of the knight of Liddesdale, at Forgywood, he was assassinated at Aberdeen on Shrove Tuesday, 1350, by John of St Michael and his accomplices, at the instigation of William

Douglas, knight of Liddesdale, then a prisoner in England [Fordun, b u p 848] By Margaret de Brechin, his wife, he had David his heir, and a daughter, Jean, married to Sir David Fleming of Biggar, by whom he had a daughter, Marion, the wife of Sir William Maule of Panmure

The son, David, second lord of Brechin of the name of Barclay, granted a charter of the lands of Kyndestleth to Hugh Barclay, his cousin from whom the Barclays of Collairnie in Fife were descended [Douglas's Peerage, vol i p 245] In 1363 he granted a charter of confirmation of the lands of Dunmure, lying in his barony of Lindores, to Roger Mortimer On 10th January 1362–3 he is witness to a charter of Sir Thomas Bisset and Isabel de Fife In 1364 he went to the wars of Prussia, having obtained a safe conduct from King Edward the Third to pass through his dominions, attended by twelve esquires, with their horses and servants The date of his death is unknown He left one daughter, Margaret, married to Walter Stewart earl of Athole and Caithness and earl palatine of Strathern, second son of King Robert the Second, by his second wife, Euphemia Ross, executed in April 1437, for being accessary to the murder of King James the First Just before going to execution he emitted a judicial declaration that the lordship of Brechin had been held by him in courtesy of his wife, and that the right to that lordship after himself belonged to Sir Thomas Maule of Panmure, nearest heir of his countess, in right of his grandmother, daughter of Sir David Barclay of Brechin [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol ii p 81] See ATHOLE, earls of, ante p 163, and PANMURE, earls of

The family of Barclay must have possessed Collairnie, which is in the parish of Dunbog, for nearly five hundred years In 1457, David Barclay of Collairnie was one of the assessors in a perambulation between Easter and Wester Kinghorn [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol i p 126] They also possessed other large estates in Fifeshire In 1656 we find Robert Barclay of Collairnie served heir male to his father, Sir David Barclay, knight, among others, in the lands of Kilmaron, Pitblado, Hilton, and Boghall The Barclays of Collairnie were heritable bailies of the regality of Lindores, an office implying great personal influence or high rank, while it conferred civil authority of the most varied and extensive description On the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in 1747, Antonia Barclay of Collairnie and Mr Harry Barclay, her husband, received the sum of two hundred and fifteen pounds sterling, as a compensation for this office The family is now extinct, the estate having been sold about the beginning of the present century to the late Dr Francis Balfour of Fernie In the appendix to Sibbald's History of Fife there is a list of natives of that county who have risen to eminence in literature or science, among others mention is made of "the famous William Barclay (father of John), professor of law at Angiers, who derived his pedigree from Barclay of Collairnie" Of this William Barclay a notice is given below Sir Henry Steuart Barclay, baronet, of Coltness, eldest son of Henry Steuart Barclay, Esq of Collairnie, who was youngest brother of the said baronet, succeeded his cousin as third baronet in 1839 Died in 1851 Baronetcy extinct

The Barclays of Pierston are an ancient family in Ayrshire, of distinction so early as the twelfth century Sir Robert Barclay of Pierston, knight, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 22d October 1668 Sir Robert Barclay, the eighth baronet, died in 1839 His grandson, Sir Robert Barclay, born in 1819, succeeded as ninth baronet

The Barclays of Ardrossan were also an old family of Ayrshire In 1471 the line of this branch of the Barclays terminated in an heiress, who married Malcolm Craufurd of Greenock the founder of the family of Craufurd of Kilburnie

The Barclays of Towie or Tolly in Aberdeenshire are said to have been descended from John Berkeley, son of Lord Berkeley of Gloucestershire He obtained a grant of the estate of Tolly for his son Alexander Berkeley, about 1100 On the front of the old castle of Towie Barclay, in the parish of Turriff, this inscription is cut in stone "Sir Walter Barclay foundit the Tollie Mills, 1210" This corroborates the common opinion, that corn mills turned by water were introduced into Scotland by the Saxon followers of Malcolm towards the end of the eleventh century, for had corn mills previously existed in the country the founding of a mill would not have been worth recording [New Stat Account, vol xii p 287] Immediately above the door of the old castle of Towie Barclay is the following inscription, "Sir Alexander Barclay, foundator, decessit, 1496" It is believed, however, that the castle was not built before 1593 The Barclays seem to have mingled in the frays of their time, and are frequently mentioned in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials The estate remained in the same family till it was sold by the Hon Charles Maitland Barclay of Tillycoultry, brother of the earl of Lauderdale, who married Isabel Barclay, the last heiress, in 1752, and assumed the name of Barclay Persons of the name still exist in the district From this ancient family the celebrated Russian general Field Marshal Prince Barclay de Tolly, who died in 1818, was lineally descended

BARCLAY-ALLARDICE, the name of a former proprietor of Urie The surname of Allardice is derived from the barony of Allardes, in Kincardineshire, which, during the reign of William the Lion, belonged to a family who assumed its name, in the course of time softened into Allardice On the 8th October, 1662, Sir John Allardice of Allardice, the then chief of that ancient family, married Lady Mary Graham, eldest sister and co-heir of William Graham, eighth earl of Menteith, and second earl of Airth He died before November 1690, leaving four daughters and two sons The elder son, John Allardice of Allardice, married, 26th October, 1690, Elizabeth daughter of William Barclay of Balmakewan Leaving no issue, he was succeeded by his brother, Sir George Allardice of Allardice, whose grandson's only daughter, Sarah-Anne Allardice, born 13th July 1757, was served heiress of line of the earls of Airth and Menteith, and of David, earl palatine of Strathern, son of Robert the Second, king of Scotland She married in 1777 Robert Barclay of Urie, great-grandson of the famous apologist for the Quakers (being his second wife), and in consequence he assumed the name of Allardice in addition to his own Their eldest son, Captain Robert Barclay-Allardice, the celebrated pedestrian, designed of Urie and Allardice, became, in right of his mother, heir general and heir of line of the first earl of Airth He was also sole heir of the body of Prince David, son of Robert the Second, king of Scotland He was born 25th August, 1779, and succeeded his father in 1797, and his mother, (who had married a second time,) in 1833 In 1842 he published at Edinburgh, in one volume, 'An Agricultural Tour through the United States and Canada' He died 1st May 1854 His only daughter, Margaret, married in 1840 Samuel Ritchie, at one period a private soldier

BARCLAY, ALEXANDER, an elegant poet of the 16th century, is mentioned by Bishop Bale,

Dr Bulleyn, Hollinshed, and Ritson, as a native of Scotland, although Pitts, Wood, and some other English writers, claim him for England From his writings it appears that he spent some of his earlier days at Croydon in Surrey About 1495 he went to Oriel College, Oxford, where, or at Cambridge, he received his education, and took the degree of D D Going afterwards to the continent, he acquired a knowledge of the Dutch, German, Italian, and French languages On his return to England he entered the church, and became chaplain to Bishop Cornish, who, in 1508, appointed him one of the priests or prebendaries of St Mary, Ottery, Devonshire Subsequently he became first a Benedictine monk of Ely, and afterwards a Franciscan monk at Canterbury On the dissolution of the monasteries in 1539, he became a Protestant, and was presented to the living of Great Baddow, in Essex In 1546 he was vicar of Wokey, in Somersetshire, and in 1552 he became rector of All Hallows London, but did not possess this living above six weeks He died at a very advanced age at Croydon, Surrey, in June, 1552 Of his personal character different accounts have been given Bale, a Protestant, treats his memory with indignity, and charges him with living a scandalous and licentious life, while Pitts, a Roman Catholic, assures us that he directed his studies to the service of religion, and employed his time in reading and writing the lives of the saints As an improver of English literature he is entitled to grateful commemoration, and his industry in enriching the language with translations, written in a purer style than belonged to that period, is much commended His chief production is a satire, entitled 'The Ship of Fools,' partly a translation and partly an imitation of a German poem by Sebastian Brandt, called Navis Stultifera, printed in 1497 He also translated Sallust's History of the Jugurthine War, published in 1557 Among his other publications is an English translation of the 'Mirrour of Good Manners,' a treatise compiled in Latin by Dominyque Mancyn, for the use of the "juvent of England" His Eclogues are the earliest specimens of pastoral poetry in the English language [Mackenzie's Scots Writers] The following are some of his principal works

BARCLAY, Robert, of Ury, the Apologist for the Quakers, was born December 23, 1648, at Gordonstown, shire of Moray, or, according to one authority, at Edinburgh, but this is incorrect His father, as already stated, was Colonel David Barclay, the son of the last laird of Mathers, and his mother, Catherine Gordon, was the daughter of Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonstown, baronet He was the eldest of three sons After receiving the rudiments of education in his native country, his father sent him to Paris, to study under the direction of his uncle, the principal of the Scots college there His deportment and character so endeared him to his uncle that he offered to make him his heir, and to settle a large estate immediately upon him if he would remain in France, an offer which he at once rejected Having by his uncle's influence become a Roman Catholic, he was immediately recalled home In 1666 his father embraced the peculiar principles of the Quakers, and two years afterwards young

Barclay adopted the same doctrines, and soon distinguished himself by his talents and zeal in their vindication This change had not been produced without a degree of thought and investigation almost beyond his years, for he was not then nineteen It also gave a decided bias to his future studies He learned the Greek and Hebrew languages, being already proficient in Latin and French, and to his other acquirements he added an acquaintance with the writings of the Fathers, and a knowledge of ecclesiastical history Andrew Jaffray, one of the Friends, thus writes of him —"A little after his coming out of the age of minority, as it is called, he was made willing, in the day of God's power, to give up his body as a sign and wonder to this generation, and to deny himself and all in him as a man so far as to become a fool, for His sake whom he loved, in going in sackcloth and ashes through the chief streets of the city of Aberdeen, besides some services at several steeple houses, and some sufferings in prison for the truth's sake"

His first treatise, written with great vigour, was published at Aberdeen in 1670 It was entitled 'Truth cleared of Calumnies,' in answer to a book against the Quakers, by the Rev William Mitchell The same year he wrote an appendix entitled 'Some things of weighty concernment proposed in meekness and love, by way of queries, to the serious consideration of the inhabitants of Aberdeen, which also may be of use to such as are of the same mind with them elsewhere in the world' A reply to the 'Truth cleared of Calumnies' was written by Mitchell, to which Barclay rejoined with a treatise under the title of 'William Mitchell unmasked, or the staggering instability of the pretended stable Christian discovered, his omissions observed, and weakness unvailed," &c In 1673 he published 'A Catechism and Confession of Faith,' explanatory of the doctrines of the Quakers The design of this work was to prove that Quakerism was the perfection of the reformed religion, and that protestants as they receded from it were so far inconsistent with themselves, and approached to popery His next treatise, published in 1674, entitled 'The Anarchy of the Ranters and other Libertines, the Hierarchy of the Romanists, and other pretended Churches, equally refused and refuted,' &c, was intended to mark the distinction between the rationalists of his sect, and the enthusiasts, but some sentiments concerning church discipline which it contained, involved him in disputes with some of his own brethren, and he afterwards published a vindication of this work His publications, which were numerous, involved him in various controversies with the students of Aberdeen and others

His great work, considered the standard of Quakerism, entitled 'An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the people called in scorn Quakers,' appeared in 1675 It was written and published in Latin, "for the information of strangers," but the author himself translated it into English, "for the benefit of his countrymen" The 'Apology' was preceded by his 'Theses Theologicæ,' printed in Latin, French, German, Dutch, and English and addressed to the clergy generally throughout Europe, requesting their examination and judgment In his principal work he attempts to prove that there is an internal light in man, which is better fitted to guide him aright in religious matters than even the Scriptures themselves, the genuine doctrines of which may be rendered uncertain by various readings in different manuscripts, and the fallibility of translators and interpreters 'Whence," he says, "we may very safely conclude that Jesus Christ, who promised to be always with his children, to lead them into all truth, to guard them against the devices of the enemy, and to establish their faith upon an unmoveable rock, left them not to be principally ruled by that which was subject, in itself, to many uncertainties, and therefore he gave them his Spirit as their principal guide, which neither moths nor time can wear out, nor transcribers nor translators corrupt, which none are so young, none so illiterate, none in so remote a place, but they may come to be reached, and rightly informed by it" In a dedicatory address to Charles the Second, he pleads for toleration to the new sect in the following emphatic terms —"Thou hast tasted of prosperity and adversity, thou knowest what it is to be banished thy native country, to be overruled as well as to rule, and sit upon the throne, and being oppressed, thou hast reason to know how hateful the oppressor is to God and man If, after all these warnings and advertisements, thou dost not turn unto the Lord with all thy heart, but forget him who remembered thee in thy distress, and give up thyself to lust and vanity, surely great will be thy condemnation" The Apology was reprinted at Amsterdam, and translated into the German, Dutch, French, and Spanish languages It received many answers, as it was not conceived difficult to overturn its strange and unusual theories Barclay's name as the apostle of the Quakers was now extensively known, and accompanied by the celebrated William Penn and George Fox he travelled into England, Holland, and Germany, disseminating the principles of the Society of Friends, and was everywhere received with great respect About the end of 1677 he addressed an Epistle and 'Friendly advice' on public affairs to the ministers of the different states of Europe then assembled at Nimeguen At this period a severe persecution raged against the Quakers, and in that year Barclay, his father, and many others of the Society of Friends, were imprisoned at Aberdeen, at the instigation of Archbishop Sharp, with whom he remonstrated by an excellent letter on the occasion By the interposition of Elizabeth, the princess palatine of the Rhine, who respected the Quakers, and corresponded with both Penn and Barclay, he was soon liberated, and he even acquired the favour of the court

In 1679, Charles the Second, who, it is probable, considered him a harmless enthusiast, granted him a charter under the great seal erecting his lands of Ury into a free barony, and in 1682, the proprietors of East Jersey, in North America, appointed him governor of that province, bestowing upon him 5,000 acres of land above his proprietary share, but he never went out, having the power to nominate a deputy The last of his productions was a long letter in Latin, addressed to a person of quality in Holland, 'On the Possibility and Necessity of an Inward and Immediate Revelation,' written in 1676, but not published till 1686 From that year till his death, excepting on one or two occasions, he may be said to have lived in retirement at Ury, where he died, August 3, 1690, in the forty-second year of his age His death was occasioned by a violent fever which attacked him immediately after his return from a religious visit to some parts of Scotland

Barclay possessed great natural abilities, which were much improved by the superior classical education he had received, these, joined to a strong understanding, with a high degree of enthusiasm, and much activity and energy, admirably fitted him for the extraordinary career which he pursued He had been several times in prison, but this did not damp his ardour, or hinder him from vindicating his opinions, and making proselytes on all occasions that offered In his moral character he was free from every reproach, and his temper was so well regulated that he was never seen in anger Besides the works above-named, he wrote, while imprisoned in Aberdeen, a treatise 'On Universal Love' He had married, in February 1670, Christian Mollison, the daughter of a merchant in Aberdeen, by whom he had three sons and four daughters, all of whom survived him for fifty years His second son, Mr David Barclay, a mercer in Cheapside, successively entertained the three first Georges, kings of England, when they visited the city on Lord Mayor's day From this gentleman are descended the Barclays of Bury Hill in Surrey

Barclay himself had a high opinion of James the Second of England, who, on his accession, had granted toleration to the Quakers In 1688, shortly before that infatuated monarch's dethronement, being at court one day, he was standing with his Majesty at a window, when the king observed, that "the wind was then fair for the prince of Orange to come over" Barclay replied, "It was hard that no expedient could be found to satisfy the people" On which the king said, "He would do any thing becoming a gentleman, except parting with liberty of conscience, which he never would do whilst he lived" That liberty of conscience which he claimed for himself, he unrighteously, as well as unwisely, denied to others An account of the life and writings of Barclay, the Apologist, was published in 1802, in 12mo, by Joseph Gurney Bevan, one of the society of Friends

Truth cleared of Calumnies, wherein a book, entitled, A Dialogue between a Quaker and a Stable Christian, (printed at Aberdeen, and, upon good ground, judged to be writ by William Mitchel, a preacher near by it, or at least that he had a chief hand in it,) is examined, and the disingenuity of the Author, in his representing the Quakers, is discovered, here is also their case truly stated, cleared, demonstrated, and the Objections of their opposers answered according to truth, scripture, and right reason, to which are subjoined, Queries to the Inhabitants of Aberdeen, which might also be of use to such as are of the same mind with them elsewhere in the world Aberd 1670

BARCLAY, WILLIAM, a learned civilian, descended from the family of Barclay of Collairney, in Fife, was born in Aberdeenshire in 1546 He was related to the earl of Huntly, Ogilvy of Findlater, Lesley of Balquhain, and other persons of distinction He was educated in the university of Aberdeen, and in his youth he frequented the court at Holyrood His prospects of preferment in Scotland being blighted with the dethronement of Mary queen of Scots, and his adherence to the Romish faith, following the example of many other Scottish youth at that period, he went, in 1573, to France, and resolved to devote himself to the study of jurisprudence Repairing to the university of Bourges, he attended the lectures of Cujacius, Donellus, and Contius, three celebrated professors of law He took the degree of doctor of laws in that university The duke of Lorraine had recently founded the university of Pont-a-Mousson, and Barclay, on the recommendation of his uncle Edmund Hay, the Jesuit, its first rector, was appointed in 1578 the first professor of civil law in that institution The duke also made him dean of the law faculty, counsellor of state, and master of requests In 1581 Barclay married Anne de Malleville, a lady of Lorraine, by whom he had one son, John (the subject of the next article), whom the Jesuits endeavoured to seduce into their society, but this being opposed by his father, they influenced the duke against him, and in 1603, he resigned his chair and quitted Lorraine Barclay's first and largest work, written in Latin, as all his works were, was a treatise on regal power, in which he zealously contends for the divine right of kings It was printed in the year 1600, with a dedication to the French king, Henry the Fourth The first two books are directed against the famous dialogue of his countryman Buchanan, the third and fourth against the 'Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos,' written by Hubert Lan guet under the assumed name of Stephanus Junius Brutus, and the last two against a treatise of Jean Boucher, a doctor of the Sorbonne, who rendered himself notorious for his seditious audacity during the unhappy ascendant of the League This volume, says Dr Irving, ought to contain a curious portrait of the author, which, however, is very seldom to be found On each side of it were displayed the blazonings of eight different families, with which Barclay is supposed to have been connected Proceeding to London, he was graciously received by James the Sixth, who is said to have offered him a place in the council with a pension, on condition of his renouncing the Romish religion, which he declined to do, and in 1604 he returned to France The professorship of civil law at the university of Angers being vacant, he was offered that chair, and having accepted it on an engagement for five years, by a decree of the university, of date 7th February 1605, he was confirmed in the rank of dean or first professor In this university he taught with high reputation Anxious to support the dignity of his office he carried his taste for external pomp to an unusual extent When he went to the university-hall to lecture, he was dressed in "a rich robe, lined with ermine," with a massy chain of gold about his neck, having his son on his right hand, preceded by one servant, and followed by two others bearing his train! His elaborate commentary on the titles of the Pandects, 'De Rebus creditis,' and 'De Jurejurando,' appeared in 1605, dedicated to King James Towards the close of the same year he died at Angers, before he had completed the age of sixty A treatise on the power of the pope, which he left in manuscript, was published by his son, four years after his decease In this work, which excited a strong sensation at the time of its appearance, he proves that the pope has no authority over sovereigns in temporal matters [Irving's Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i]

BARCLAY, John, author of Argenis, son of the preceding, by Anne de Malleville, his wife, was born at Pont-a-Mousson, January 28, 1582, and although not a native of Scotland, is usually included in Scottish Biographies He was educated in the College of the Jesuits in his native town, and made so rapid a progress in his studies that at the age of nineteen he published Annotations on the Thebais of Statius The early indications of genius which he displayed induced the Jesuits to solicit him to enter into their order His rejection of their offers, in which he was countenanced by his father, was the cause of their quitting Lorraine in 1603 He accompanied his father to London, and dedicated to James the Sixth the first part of his 'Euphormionis Lusini Satyricon,' a Latin romance of a half-political, half-satirical nature, printed at London the same year, which is particularly severe upon the Jesuits He went with his father to Angers, and in the beginning of 1604 he sent his 'Kalendæ Januariæ,' as a poetical offering to King James He returned to London in 1605, in the hope of obtaining some preferment at court, but after a further residence of twelve months, being disappointed, he removed to Paris, where he married Louise, daughter of Michael Debonnaire, "Trésorier des vieilles bandes" During his residence at Paris he published there the second part of his 'Satyricon,' dedicated to the earl of Salisbury, and at Amsterdam a brief narrative of the Gunpowder plot, in Latin In 1606 he fixed his abode in London In 1609 he published his father's able work, 'De Potestate Papæ,' to which he prefixed a preface of nine pages, which concluded with an intimation of his purpose to defend his father's memory against any attack Cardinal Bellarmin having published a treatise against it, he issued in 1612 a large quarto volume in answer, entitled 'Pietas,' being in defence of his father's work In 1610 he published at London an apology for his 'Satyricon,' which had excited so many censures that he found it necessary to attempt some explanations In 1614 appeared his 'Icon Animarum,' forming the fourth part of his 'Satyricon' The object of this work is to give a delineation of the genius and manners of the different nations of Europe, with remarks on the various tempers of men, and he has not forgotten to extol the genius and character of the people of Scotland, the land of his fathers

About the end of 1615, Barclay quitted London, with his family, and proceeded to Paris, but having been invited to Rome by Pope Paul the Fifth, he there fixed his residence in the beginning of 1616 With the view of recommending himself to the heads of the church, he published in 1617, his next work, 'Parænesis,' or an exhortation to Sectarians He received much civility at Rome, and in particular was kindly treated by Cardinal Bellarmin

It was at Rome that he wrote his celebrated Latin romance, entitled 'Argenis,' and while the printing of the first edition was going on at Paris, the author died at Rome, of the stone, August 21, 1621, aged 39 His Argenis was published at Paris soon after his death It is a political allegory, containing allusions to the state of Europe at the time, and especially France during the civil wars of the seventeenth century The style has received the commendations of the greatest scholars, and the work has been translated into the English, French, German, Italian, Spanish, and even into the Polish, Swedish, Icelandic, and other languages The first English version was published by Sir Robert Le Grys and Thomas May, Esq, London, 1628, 4to Another by Kingsmill Long, Esq, appeared at London in 1636 A third, under the title of 'The Phœnix, or the History of Polyarchus and Argenis,' by Clara Reeves, authoress of the 'Old English Baron,' appeared in 1772, in 4 volumes 12mo, being that lady's first work Argenis was a special favourite with Cardinal de Richelieu and with Liebnitz Cowper styles it "the best romance that ever was written" In the notes to Marmion Sir Walter Scott has quoted a singular story of romantic chivalry from the Satyricon of Barclay

The disposition of Barclay was of a melancholy cast, his mornings were uninterruptedly devoted to study, and his afternoons were occupied in cultivating a small garden He was afflicted with that passion for tulips which at that time overspread Europe, and which is known under the name of the Tulipo-mania He "had it to that excess," says Lord Hailes, who wrote a sketch of his life, "that he placed two mastiffs as sentinels in his garden, and rather than abandon his favourite flowers, chose to continue his residence in an ill-aired and unwholesome habitation" Besides the works above mentioned, Barclay left an unpublished History of the Conquest of Jerusalem by the Franks, and some fragments of a General History of Europe He had four children in all, a son and two daughters born in London, and a son born in Rome His elder son is said to have obtained a rich benefice from Pope Urban the Eighth One of his sons, like his father, was a writer of Latin verses, and in 1652 he printed an elegy at Paris Barclay's wife, from excess of affection, sometimes annoyed him with her jealousy There was something romantic in her feelings regarding him After his death she erected a monument.

with his bust in marble, at the church of St Lorenzo, on the road to Tivoli, but on learning that Cardinal Barberini had there put up a similar monument in honour of his preceptor, she said, "My husband was a man of family, and famous in the literary world, I will not suffer him to remain on a level with a base and obscure pedagogue!" and indignantly caused her husband's bust to be removed [Irving's Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i]

BARCLAY, WILLIAM, M D, often confounded with the eminent civilian of the same name, to whom he was related, was the brother of Sir Patrick Barclay of Tolly, and was born about 1570 He studied at the university of Louvain, under the celebrated scholar, Justus Lipsius, to whom he addressed several letters, which have been printed Lipsius had such a high opinion of him that he is recorded to have said, that if "he were dying, he knew no person on earth he would leave his pen to but the doctor" [Callirhoe, or the Nymph of Aberdene, edition Aberdeen, 1670] Barclay describes himself as A M and M D, but where he took those degrees we are not informed Having been appointed a professor in the university of Paris, he taught humanity there for several years, and acquired considerable reputation by his talents and learning He afterwards returned to Scotland, where he appears for a time to have followed the medical profession, but soon went back to France, and resumed his former occupation at Nantes in Bretagne Dr Irving says that it may be inferred from Dempster's brief notice that Barclay's reason for again leaving his native country was that his situation was rendered uncomfortable in consequence of his adherence to popery [Irving's Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i p 231] According to Dempster, at the time of his writing, Barclay was residing in Scotland, and pursuing the practice of physic He is conjectured to have died about 1630 His principal tract, called 'Nepenthes, or the Vertves of Tabacco,' was published at Edinburgh, in 1614, in 8vo It is now exceedingly rare, and has been reprinted in the first volume of the Miscellany of the Spalding Club from the copy in the Advocates' Library Added to this treatise are six little poems addressed to some of his friends and kinsmen, all in praise of tobacco He also wrote 'Callirhoe, commonly called the well of Spa, or the Nymph of Aberdene resuscitated,' Apobaterium, or last farewell to Aberdeen, of which no copy is now known to exist, some Latin poems in the 'Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum,' besides a Commentary on the Life of Agricola by Tacitus, and other Latin works

BARCLAY, JOHN, founder of a religious sect named Bereans, born in 1734, was the son of Mr Ludovic Barclay, farmer, parish of Muthill, Perthshire Being designed for the church he was sent to St Andrews, where he took the degree of A M He attended the divinity class in St Mary's College, and while there espoused and advocated some of the peculiar doctrines then broached by Dr Archibald Campbell, professor of church history in that university, the chief of which was, that the knowledge of the existence of God is derived from revelation, and not from nature On the 27th September 1759 he was, by the presbytery of Auchterarder, licensed to preach the gospel, and was for some time assistant to the Rev Mr Jobson, Errol Having imbibed some of the sentiments of Mr John Glas, minister of Tealing, the founder of the Glasites, he was obliged to quit Errol In June 1763 he became assistant to Mr Anthony Dow, minister of Fetteircairn, where he remained for nine years, and where he was very popular as a preacher In 1766 he published part of a Paraphrase of the whole Book of Psalms, which he had composed, accompanied with 'A Dissertation on the best means of interpreting that portion of the Canon of Scripture' From his peculiar views, the presbytery of Fordoun, in consequence of this publication, cited him to appear at their bar, where he defended himself with ability and success He afterwards published a small work, entitled 'Rejoice Evermore, or Christ All in All,' in which he repeated those doctrines which were deemed heretical In consequence of this, the presbytery appointed one of their own body to read publicly, in the church of Fetteircairn, a warning against the dangerous doctrines that he preached, but without injuring his popularity or usefulness In 1769 he published one of the largest of his treatises, under the title of 'Without Faith, Without God, or an appeal to God concerning his own Existence' In summer 1769, he addressed a letter on the 'Eternal Generation of the Son of God,' to Messrs Smith and Ferrier, two clergymen of the Church of Scotland who had separated from it and become Glassites In 1771 he published a Letter 'On the Assurance of Faith,' and also a 'Letter on Prayer,' the latter addressed to an Independent congregation in Scotland On the death of Mr Dow in 1772, the presbytery of Fetteircairn prohibited Mr Barclay from preaching in the kirk of Fetteircairn, and they refused him the usual certificate of character on quitting their bounds Having in consequence left the Church of Scotland, he went to Newcastle, and was ordained there Oct 12, 1773 He afterwards proceeded to Edinburgh, where a congregation holding his peculiar sentiments had been formed, and he was their pastor for about three years Subsequently, in order to disseminate his principles, he repaired to London, where he preached for nearly two years He also preached at Bristol, and other places in England The name of Bereans was voluntarily assumed by his followers, to distinguish them from other Christian sects, and took its origin from the Jews of Berea, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, chap xvii verse 11, as being "more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so" At Edinburgh Mr Barclay published an edition of his works in three vols In 1783 he brought out a small work for the use of the Berean churches, entitled 'The Epistle to the Hebrews Paraphrased,' with a collection of Psalms and Songs from his other works He died of apoplexy, on the 29th of July, 1798 —Scots Magazine was born in 1760 He was a native of Cairn in Perthshire, where his father was a farmer He first studied divinity at St Andrews, and was by the presbytery of Dunkeld licensed as a preacher In 1789 he repaired to Edinburgh in the capacity of tutor to the family of Sir James Campbell of Aberuchill, baronet, and abandoning the clerical profession began to study medicine at the university of Edinburgh, particularly turning his attention to anatomy, both human and comparative He became assistant to Mr John Bell, and in 1796 took the degree of M D He afterwards studied for some time under the late Dr Marshall of London, an eminent teacher of anatomy in Thavies Inn In November 1797 he began his career as an anatomical lecturer in Edinburgh In 1803 he published a Nomenclature, with the view of rendering the language of anatomy more accurate and precise, but although this work displayed much talent and learning, it was not generally adopted In the following year, the Royal College of Surgeons passed a resolution declaring that attendance on his lectures should qualify for passing at Surgeon's Hall, and in 1815 he was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, and a resident fellow the following year In 1808 he published a 'Treatise on the Muscular Motions of the Human Body' In 1812 appeared his 'Description of the Arteries of the Human Body' His last publication was an 'Enquiry into the Opinions, Ancient and Modern, concerning Life and Organization' In consequence of the declining state of his health, in 1825 he entered into partnership with Dr Robert Knox, at the time Conservator of the Royal College of Surgeons He died at Edinburgh, August 21, 1826 He had married in 1811 Eleonora, daughter of his former patron, Sir James Campbell of Aberuchill, baronet, by whom he had no issue This lady afterwards married Mr Charles Oliphant, writer to the signet Dr Barclay's introductory lectures, revised by himself before his death, containing a valuable abridgment of the history of anatomy, were published by Sir George Ballingall, M D, after his decease The article Physiology, in the third edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, was written by Dr Barclay It was principally on his recommendation that the Highland Society of Scotland established a veterinary school in Edinburgh His anatomical collection, now known as the Barclayan Museum, was bequeathed to the Royal College of Surgeons of that city, in which a bust of him, by Joseph, has been placed

BARGENY, Baron, a title (now dormant) in the peerage of Scotland, first conferred, in 1639, on Sir John Hamilton of Carriden, only son of Sir John Hamilton of Letterick, natural son of John first marquis of Hamilton The father of the first peer had obtained a legitimation under the great seal 22d December 1600 and acquired considerable estates in the counties of Ayr and Lanark Among the rest he had charters of Bargeny, which had formerly belonged to the Kennedys, Cunlok, and other lands in Ayrshire, 23d December 1631 From the former his son, the first lord, took his designation This peerage was created with limitation to the heirs male of the first lord's body In 1648 Lord Bargeny accompanied the duke of Hamilton, in his unfortunate expedition into England, and was excepted by Cromwell out of his act of grace and pardon, 12th April, 1654 He died April 1658 He married Lady Jean Douglas second daughter of William first marquis of Douglas, and had two sons and five daughters

The elder son, John, second Lord Bargeny, was served heir to his father 17th October, 1662 His liberal principles made him obnoxious to the ministry of Charles the Second, and he was imprisoned in Blackness castle in November 1679 From thence he was removed to Edinburgh, and indicted for high treason, for having compassed the life of the duke of Lauderdale and others of the nobility, encouraged rebellion to the sovereign, and openly declaimed against episcopacy, then the established religion in Scotland From want of evidence, however, this indictment was not brought to trial A letter from the king, dated 11th May 1680, was laid before his privy council in Scotland, bearing that his majesty had received a petition from Lord Bargeny, representing his father's loyalty and sufferings, and declaring his innocence of the crimes laid to his charge in consequence of which he was released, on finding security to stand trial, in fifty thousand merks After being set at liberty he discovered that Cunningham of Mountgrennan and his servant, two of the prisoners taken at Bothwell-bridge, were suborned by Sir Charles Maitland of Hatton and Sir John Dalrymple, to give false evidence against him Their depositions, which also affected the duke of Hamilton, were prepared beforehand, and they were promised a share of the confiscated estates, but when the trial approached, their consciences revolted against the crime Lord Bargeny's evidence was ready to be produced before parliament, 28th July 1681, but the duke of

York interposed to prevent inquiry [Anderson's History of the House of Hamilton, p 218] His lordship entered heartily into the Revolution, and in 1689 he raised a regiment of six hundred foot for the public service He died 20th May 1693 He was twice married, first, to Lady Margaret Cunningham, second daughter of William ninth earl of Glencairn, lord high chancellor of Scotland, and had issue two sons and a daughter, the latter, named Nicolas, married to Sir Alexander Hope of Kerse, baronet, secondly, in 1676, to Lady Alice Moore, dowager countess of Clanbrassil, eldest daughter of Henry first earl of Drogheda, by whom he had no children His eldest son, John, Master of Bargeny, died before his father He married, 19th June 1688, Jean, daughter of Sir Robert Sinclair of Longformacus, baronet, and had one daughter, Joanna, heiress of Bargeny, married, in 1707, to Sir Robert Dalrymple of Castleton, knight

The younger son, William, succeeded his father in 1693, and became third Lord Bargeny He took the oaths and his seat in the Scotch parliament 9th May 1695, and exerted himself in opposition to the treaty of Union in 1706 He died about 1712 He was twice married first to Mary, eldest daughter of Sir William Primrose of Carrington, sister of the first Viscount Primrose, by whom he had a daughter, the Hon Grizel Hamilton, married 15th February 1713 to Thomas Buchan of Carnbulgh, advocate, and secondly, to Margaret, eldest daughter of Robert Dundas of Arniston, a lord of session, sister of the first President Dundas, by whom he had a son,

James, fourth Lord Bargeny, born 29th November 1710 He succeeded his father in 1712 and completed his education by visiting foreign countries, as appears from Hamilton of Bangour's epitaph on the companion of his travels, who,

> 'With kind Bargeny, faithful to his word,
> Whom heaven made good and social though a lord,
> The cities viewed of many-languaged men'

His lordship died unmarried at Edinburgh, 28th March, 1736, in the 26th year of his age, and was buried, 5th April, in the Abbey-church of Holyrood-house The title has remained dormant ever since A competition arose for the estate, between first, the children of Joanna Lady Dalrymple, only daughter of John, Master of Bargeny, secondly, the children of the Hon Mrs Buchan of Carnbulgh, daughter of the third lord, and thirdly, Sir Alexander Hope of Kerse, son of the Hon Nicolas Hamilton, daughter of the second lord It was ultimately decided in the House of Lords in favour of the first, by whose representative, Henrietta Dundas Dalrymple Hamilton, Duchess de Coigny, daughter of the late Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton of North Berwick, baronet, it came to be possessed

The murder of the young Kennedy of Bargeny by the earl of Cassillis in December 1601, led to the dark and bloody deeds which form the subject of the Auchindrane tragedy, dramatised by Sir Walter Scott, and included in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, arising out of the feuds between the earls of Cassillis and the lords of Bargeny See CASSILLIS, earl of

BARNARD, LADY ANNE, (born Lindsay,) authoress of the beautiful and touching ballad of 'Auld Robin Gray,' was the eldest daughter of the fifth earl of Balcarres, by his Countess Anne, daughter of Sir Robert Dalrymple of Castleton, knight, an account of whom will be found under the BALCARRES branch of the Lindsays [see ante, p 204] She was born on the 8th of December, 1750 Her youth was chiefly spent at her father's seat in Fife, varied by occasional visits to Edinburgh At her mother's house in that city she became, in early life, acquainted with all the men of character and distinction of the day in the Scottish metropolis, among whom were Hume the historian, Henry Mackenzie, the author of 'The Man of Feeling,' Lord Monboddo, and other eminent literary men of that period When Dr Johnson visited Edinburgh in 1773, she also had an opportunity of becoming known to him Later in life she and her sister Lady Margaret, who had been married while very young to a gentleman named Fordyce, resided together in London, her sister being then a widow Her nephew, Col Lindsay of Balcarres, mentions that her hand was sought in marriage by several of the first men of the land, as her friendship and confidence were by the most distinguished women, but her heart had never been captured, and she remained single till 1793, when she married Andrew Barnard, Esq, the son of the bishop of Limerick, an accomplished but not wealthy gentleman, younger than herself, whom she accompanied to the Cape of Good Hope, when he went out as colonial secretary under Lord Macartney The journals of her residence at the Cape, and excursions into the interior country, illustrated with drawings and sketches of the scenes described, are preserved among the family MSS in the library of Lord Balcarres A few extracts from them, remarkable for a style at once lively and graphic, are printed in the third volume of the 'Lives of the Lindsays' Nine years afterwards she returned to Scotland Her husband died at the Cape, in 1807, without issue, and, after his death, Lady Anne, and her sister Lady Margaret, again resided together in Berkeley Square, London, till the latter was married, for the second time, in 1812, to Sir James Burgess Of Lady Margaret, who was celebrated alike for her personal charms and mental accomplishments, an account has been given under the BALCARRES branch of the Lindsays, ante, p 207

Among their familiar guests and friends in London were Burke, Sheridan, Wyndham, Dundas, and the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV

The attachment of the latter to Lady Anne Barnard continued unabated during life "I recollect," says her nephew, Colonel Lindsay, "George IV sending for her to come and see him when he was very ill He spoke most affectionately to her, and said, 'Sister Anne (the appellation he usually gave her,) I wished to see you, to tell you that I love you, and wish you to accept this golden chain for my sake,—I may never see you again '" The ballad of 'Auld Robin Gray' was written by Lady Anne in 1771, when in her twenty-first year, soon after her sister's first marriage, and consequent departure from the family home Notwithstanding the popularity to which it immediately attained, being translated into almost every European language, the real author of it long remained unknown, and it was claimed by more than one person, and in particular by a clergyman residing on the coast It was not till about two years before her death that Lady Anne publicly acknowledged the authorship of this simple and celebrated ballad In 'the Pirate,' which appeared in 1823, the author of Waverley compared the condition of Minna to that of Jeanie Gray, "the village-heroine in Lady Anne Lindsay's beautiful ballad," and quoted the second verse of the continuation, or second part This induced Lady Anne to write to Sir Walter Scott, and confide its history to him From her characteristic letter, dated July 8, 1823, the following are interesting extracts "Robin Gray, so called from its being the name of the old herd at Balcarres, was born soon after the close of the year 1771 My sister Margaret had married, and accompanied her husband to London I was melancholy and endeavoured to amuse myself by attempting a few poetical trifles There was an English Scotch melody of which I was passionately fond Sophy Johnstone, who lived before your day, used to sing it to us at Balcarres She did not object to its having improper words, though I did I longed to sing old Sophy's air to different words, and give to its plaintive tones some little history of virtuous distress in humble life, such as might suit it While attempting to effect this in my closet, I called to my little sister, now Lady Hardwicke, who was the only person near me, 'I have been writing a ballad, my dear, I am oppressing my heroine with many misfortunes I have already sent her Jamie to sea, and broken her father's arm, and made her mother fall sick, and given her auld Robin Gray for a lover, but I wish to load her with a fifth sorrow within the four lines, poor thing! Help me to one!—'Steal the cow, sister Anne,' said the little Elizabeth The cow was immediately lifted by me, and the song completed At our fireside, and amongst our neighbours, 'Auld Robin Gray' was always called for I was pleased in secret with the approbation it met with, but such was my dread of being suspected of writing anything, perceiving the shyness it created in those who could write nothing, that I carefully kept my own secret — Meantime, little as this matter seems to have been worthy a dispute, it afterwards became a party question between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries 'Robin Gray' was either a very ancient ballad, composed, perhaps, by David Rizzio, and a great curiosity, or a very modern matter, and no curiosity at all I was persecuted to avow whether I had written it or not,—where I had got it Old Sophy kept my counsel, and I kept my own, in spite of the gratification of seeing a reward of twenty guineas offered in the newspapers to the person who should ascertain the point past a doubt, and the still more flattering circumstance of a visit from Mr Jerningham, secretary to the Antiquarian Society, who endeavoured to entrap the truth from me in a manner I took amiss Had he asked me the question obligingly, I should have told him the fact distinctly and confidentially The annoyance, however, of this important ambassador from the antiquaries, was amply repaid to me by the noble exhibition of the 'Ballat of Auld Robin Gray's Courtship,' as performed by dancing dogs under my window It proved its popularity from the highest to the lowest and gave me pleasure while I hugged myself in my obscurity " The following were the words with which Lady Anne closed the interview with Mr Jerningham, after having been subjected to a very rigid cross-examination by that gentleman "The ballad in question," said she, "has in my opinion met with attentions beyond its deserts It set off with having a very fine tune put to it by a doctor of music, (the Rev William Leeves, rector of Wrington, who died in 1828, aged 80,) was sung by youth and beauty for five years and more, had a romance composed from it by a man of eminence, was the subject of a play, of an opera, and of a pantomime, was sung by the united armies in America, acted by Punch, and afterwards danced by dogs in the street—but never more honoured than by the present investigation" The old air is now only retained to the first verse It belonged to a song of no great delicacy, called 'The Bridegroom greits when the sun gaes down'

Sir Walter Scott printed in 1824, in a thin quarto volume for the Bannatyne club, a revised version of 'Auld Robin Gray,' and two continuations by the authoress, sent to him by her ladyship at his request for the purpose The preface contains her letter to him, explanatory of the origin of the ballad The second part was written many years after the first, at the request of the countess, her mother, who often said, "Annie! I wish you would tell me how that unlucky business of Jeanie and Jamie ended" It is far inferior to the first, although it has touches that are both beautiful and characteristic In it auld Robin falls sick, confesses that it was he who stole the cow, in order to oblige Jeanie to marry him, then leaving all his wealth to his widow, dies, and Jamie of course is at last married to his Jeanie Writing to her ladyship subsequently, Sir Walter Scott says "I have sometimes wondered how many of our best songs have been written by Scotchwomen of rank and condition The Hon Mrs Murray, (Miss Baillie of Jerviswood born) wrote the very pretty Scots song,

'An 'twere not my heart's light I wad die —

Miss Elliot, of Minto, the verses to the 'Flowers of the Forest,' which begin

'I have heard a lilting,' &c

Mrs Cockburn composed other verses to the same tune,

'I have seen the smiling of fortune beguiling,' &c

Lady Wardlaw wrote the glorious old ballad of 'Hardyknute'—Place 'Auld Robin' at the head of this list, and I question if we masculine wretches can claim five or six songs equal in elegance and pathos out of the long list of Scottish minstrelsy"

Lady Anne Barnard died 6th May, 1825, in her 74th year "Her face," says Mr Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, "was pretty, and replete with vivacity, her figure light and elegant, her conversation lively, and, like the rest of her family, peculiarly agreeable Though she had wit, she never said ill-natured things to show it, she gave herself no airs either as a woman of rank, or as the authoress of Auld Robin Gray" "Her stores of anecdote," says her relative Lord Lindsay, "on all subjects, and of all persons, her rich fancy, original thought, and ever-ready wit, rendered her conversation delightful to the last, while the kindness of her heart,—a very fountain of tenderness and love,—always overflowing, and her sincere but unostentatious piety, divested that wit of the keenness that might have wounded—it flashed, but it was summer lightning" His lordship has given ample extracts from her lively and interesting sketches of the home-circle of her youth in the second volume of his 'Lives of the Lindsays,' a work from whence have been derived most of the materials for this notice

BARON, [Latin baro, or vir, a man, German bar, a freeman, Spanish varo, a stout noble person,] a feudal honour of great antiquity Barons were those who held their lands of a superior by military and other services For some time before the Norman Conquest this name was commonly used in France to denote a person of the first dignity, but after that event it was introduced into England, and used to signify an immediate vassal of the Crown, bound for his lands to give personal service to the king in his wars, to attend at his court and council when summoned, and to do homage to him and acknowledge himself his "man" or baron The name is now used as the title of the lowest order of the nobility

The feudal system, of which the baronage formed so important a part, and which exerted so beneficial an influence on Scottish civilization, was, as exhibited in its most flourishing state during the middle ages, introduced into Scotland by the Anglo Norman adventurers, (a term used to distinguish not only Normans, but French, Flemings, and others speaking the French language, all, however, knights of reputation,) who accompanied David the First when after spending his youth and receiving his education in England, he, as independent Count or Prince of Cumbria, undertook the subjugation of the West Lothians and Galloway, as well as afterwards on his accession to the throne, and to whom he granted lands in all parts of the country "His education and tastes," says Mr Burton (Life of Lord Lovat, page 3,) "attached him to the gallant race who, wherever they went, were first in arms and arts, and mingled the sternest powers of man with his finest social enjoyments He courted the presence of the lordly Normans They had nearly exhausted England, and the new territory opened to them, if less rich and fertile, was still worth commanding The charters and other law documents anterior to the war of independence, are full of high-sounding Norman names, many of which subsequently disappeared from the Scottish nomenclature—Morevilles, De Viponts, D'Umfravilles, De

Quinceys, D'Angains, &c." In reference to this remark it may be stated that, except ecclesiastics, from David the First downwards, none were admitted as witnesses in the royal charters but tenants in capite, barons or magnates "It was chiefly," continues Mr Burton, "in the fertile plains of the south, and in the neighbourhood of the English border, that they (the Anglo-Norman knights) were most thickly congregated, but some of them had found their way far north, to the wild districts beyond the Grampians, where the greatness of the estate was some compensation for its barrenness But wherever their lot was cast—among the Saxons of Mid-Lothian, the Celts of Inverness, or their brother Norsemen of Caithness—these heroes, who united the courage and fierceness of the old sea-king to the polished suavity of the Frank, became the lords of the land, and the old inhabitants of the soil became their subordinates" These Anglo-Norman barons and their successors, in the then state of society in Scotland, acquired powers and privileges of a high order, and in some sense, were independent even of the monarch to whom they owed their homage, and who possessed the right of resumption of their lands Partly by direct grants, but more frequently by marriages with the heiresses of Celtic nobles, the entire nobility and great part of the baronage of the kingdom had soon nearly become Norman in name as well as in blood

The powers of a feudal baron were very great Within his own lands he had high and even sovereign jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, which in the general sense he might exercise, either by himself or by his deputy, called a bailie His criminal jurisdiction, in particular, was most extensive According to the laws ascribed to Malcolm M'Kenneth (c 13) it reached to all crimes except treason, and what lawyers call the four pleas of the crown, namely, robbery, murder, rape, and fire-raising, and even in some cases he could judge as to the latter, and in processes for breaking of orchards, destroying of green wood and of planting, provided the offenders were taken in the fact, and in riots and bloodwits, the fines of which he had the power to appropriate to himself [Erskine's Institutes, Book I Title iv p 91]

Our parliaments or national councils, for the word parliament was not in use till long after, consisted at first only of the king's barons, or freeholders, and under the same appellation, it would seem that the dignified clergy were included on account of their freeholds [Erskine's Institutes, Book I Title iii p 50] Every Scottish baron, whatever were his holdings, if he had a barony and the power of pit and gallows, had a right to sit and vote in the national council Few or none of the smaller lairds, however, availed themselves of a privilege involving the obligation of distant journeys and much expense, and the consequence was a great accession of power to the higher nobles Hence came the distinction of the greater and lesser barons, which was not known in Scotland till towards the end of the reign of James the First In a general council held at Perth, on the 1st March 1427, an act was passed dispensing with the attendance of the lesser barons and free tenants in parliament, on condition of their electing from each sheriffdom, in proportion to its extent, two or more commissioners as their representatives [Act 1427 c 101] From this dispensation, however, the greater barons were expressly excepted These were sufficiently distinguished from the lesser barons by their grants or patents of peerage whereby they were dignified by the titles of duke, earl, or baron

In England the distinction between greater and lesser barons seems to have arisen from the latter holding of the former Dugdale says, 'Those who were the king's chief tenants, id est, his principal freeholders, had the title of barones majores And as they thus holding of the king in capite by barony were called his barons, so had most of the great earls, in those elder times, their great freeholders under them, whom they also called barons, as is evident by their charters, wherein they usually wrote Omnibus Baronibus suis, tam Francis quam Anglicis, &c And as these great tenants of the king, who had their titles from their principal seats or heads of their baronies, were called his barones majores, so were his other tenants or freeholders who held of him by military service in capite termed barones minores, of which two sorts of tenants, together with the bishops and earls, the parliaments of this realm did anciently consist, only the barones majores had summons by several writs, and the others, who held by military service in capite, by one general summons from the sheriff in each county" [Preface to Baronage, p 3]

It is worthy of notice that while the English feudal barons are frequently styled lords by the English genealogists, as Lord Percy, Lord Neville, Lord Mowbray, &c, it was not usual so to designate the Magnates Scotiæ, or great barons of Scotland, although their tenure, status, and rank were precisely the same On this point Lord Lindsay aptly remarks "There might have been differences in wealth and power, but all the magnates, strictly speaking, were peers Neither the Bruces till the marriage of the elder Bruce with the countess of Carrick, nor the Balliols till their elevation to the throne, nor the High Stewards till after the middle of the fourteenth century, possessed any title higher than that of simple 'Sire,' or Seigneur—like the De Coucys of France" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 57 note] It may be added, that of the thirteen competitors for the Scottish crown, on the death of Margaret of Norway, eight were untitled barons, while two others were styled lords of their respective possessions, as Comyn, lord of Badenoch, and Bruce, lord of Annandale

In England the barons ceased to be peers, unless so created, during the thirteenth century but in Scotland, up to the year 1587,—in which year, various acts, drawn up by Lord Menmun [see article BALCARRES, ante, p 199] were passed for regulating the form and order of parliament and the vote of the barons,—the title of baron was common to all the landed proprietors or lairds, holding their lands directly of the Crown As one object of these acts was to free the barons from their dependence on noblemen, they were bitterly opposed by the nobility, headed by the earl of Crawford who, in name of his order, protested against their receiving the small barons to a voice in parliament by their commissioners

Under the feudal system the king, when he gave a grant of lands for military service, conferred on the grantee a jurisdiction within them of sheriffship, barony, or regality, and as they descended to his heirs, each new possessor, on inheriting the lands, doing homage for them, the jurisdiction also became heritable

Regalities were feudal rights of land granted by the king in liberam regalitatem Those to whom they were granted, though sometimes only commoners, were called "lords of regality," on account of the high and regal jurisdiction which they conveyed The civil jurisdiction of a lord of regality was in all respects equal to that of a sheriff, but his criminal was, as Erskine observes, "truly royal" He had, says Burton, "at least as many of the privileges of an independent prince as a Margrave or Pfalzgrave His courts were competent to try all questions, civil or criminal, that of high treason against the sovereign alone excepted He appointed judges and executive officers, who were responsible only to himself He had within his territory a series of municipal systems—corporations with their municipal officers, privileged markets harbours and mills, with internally administered regulations of police, applicable to weights and measures, fishing privileges, and other like useful institutions He could build prisons and coin money When any of his people were put on trial before the king's courts he could 'repledge' the accused to his own court, only finding recognizances to execute justice in the matter,—a nominal check, which would seldom divert the lord and his 'bailie' or judge from acting according to their own particular views" [Burton's Life of Simon Lord Lovat, p 162] "An analogy," adds Mr Burton in a note, "will be seen between the regalities and the palatinates created in England The jealousy with which any dispersal of the privileges of the Crown among the great barons was watched in England brought back two of the three palatinates to the king at a very early period, while the third (Durham) being in the hands of a bishop, could not be the means of throwing any dangerous power into the hands of a particular house, and remained in existence till the year 1836" Mr Riddell, in his Remarks on peerage law (p 57), observes, "Although we had, in fact, many palatinates, according to English notion, that is to say, fiefs invested with royal jurisdiction, yet the term was almost wholly unknown in Scotland Only one earldom, that of Strathern, was styled a palatinate, but what the peculiar nature of the distinction was does not appear"

Some ecclesiastics, as bishops and abbots, possessed the rights of barons, and some of the abbeys had a right of regality over their lands These hereditary jurisdictions passed from hand to hand with the lands to which they were attached, and the regality of Dunfermline abbey continuing attached to the temporal lordship after the dissolution of the monasteries, we find the newspapers, so late as the year 1732, recording a conviction by the judge of the regality, of some gipsies who lived in a cave and plundered the neighbourhood, in these terms 'This day was finished here a very tedious trial of four gypsies, (or gypsies habit and repute,) strollers, or vagabonds, which lasted between eighteen and nineteen hours, by the honoured Captain Hilkett, James Dewar of Lassodie, and Henry Walwood of Gravock, deputies of the most honourable the marquis of Tweeddale, as heritable bailie of the justiciary and regality courts of Dunfermline, when on a full and plain proof, James Ramsay, one of the gang, was sentenced to be hanged the 22d of March next, and the other three to be whipped, the first Wednesday of each month, for one half year, and afterwards to be banished the regality for ever' [Extract from Caledonian Mercury, Chalmers, p 246]

The power which these heritable jurisdictions conferred on the greater barons became at last formidable to the state, and enabled some of them openly to defy the law The history of the reigns of the first Jameses is but the record of the struggle of the Crown against the feudal aristocracy Immediately upon the forfeiture of the earl of Douglas, June 10, 1455, an act was passed whereby it was ordained that no regality should be granted for the future without the authority of parliament, and another that no office should be given afterwards in fee or heritage Our sovereigns, nevertheless, continued to make grants of heritable jurisdictions, most of which were confirmed by parliament, others, without such ratification, were strengthened by the immemorial exercise of these jurisdictions, till it became at last the general opinion that those statutes of 1455 had lost their authority By the treaty of Union, article 20, all heritable offices and jurisdictions were reserved to the owners as rights of property The heritable jurisdictions in Scotland were finally abolished in 1747, the holders of them receiving compensation for the same, parliament having voted one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling for the purpose By the act abolishing them (20 George II c 43) the civil jurisdiction of a baron in Scotland was reduced to the power of recovering from his vassals and tenants the rents of his lands, and of condemning them in mill services, and also of judging in causes where the debt and damages do not exceed forty shillings sterling His criminal jurisdiction was, by the same statute, limited to assaults, batteries, and other smaller offences, which may be punished by a fine not exceeding twenty shillings sterling, or by setting the offender in the stocks (now disused) The obligation which was long imposed by the law of Scotland on barony vassals to attend the baron's head courts was about the same time prohibited

The power of the high feudal aristocracy within their own territories was as great as that of the monarch himself, and many of them, as the Douglases, the Lindsays, the Hamiltons and others, affected a state and magnificence equal to those of the sovereign An account of the feudal state of one of the great barons will be found under the head of the earl of Crawford as described by Lord Lindsay [see CRAWFORD, earls of] The picture drawn by him bears a close resemblance to the feudalism of England and the continent "But," adds his lordship, "owing to the mixture of Celtic and Norman blood, a peculiar element mingled from the first in the feudality of Scotland, and has left its indelible impress on the manners and habits of thought of the country Differently from what was the case in England the Scoto-Norman races were peculiarly prolific, and population was encouraged as much as possible This was evinced by the ramifying tendency of the Scotch Stuarts, Douglases, Hamiltons, Lindsays, &c, as compared with the Howards, Percies, Mowbrays De Veres, &c, many of which houses have become entirely extinct, while most of the old Scottish families number their hundreds and thousands, in every class and station of life The earl or baron bestowed a fief, for example, on each of his four sons, who paid him tribute in rent and service, each son subdivided his fief again among his own children, and they again among theirs, till the blood of the highest noble in the land was flowing in that of the working peasant, at no remote interval This was a subject of pride, not shame, in Scotland" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 117]

A BURGH OF BARONY was a corporation holding of a baron within his domain and governed by magistrates, the right of electing whom was sometimes vested in the inhabitants themselves and sometimes in the baron their superior The ground granted to the burgh, and on which it was erected continued as truly a portion of the barony as if it were the holding of a single vassal When the magistrate who ruled such a burgh was appointed by the superior he was styled a baron bailie, and, as the baron's deputy, possessed within the burgh all the rights belonging to the baron himself This was a class of magistrates peculiar to Scotland The right of the barons, and some of them of no great note, to constitute burghs, and appoint magistrates, or to give authority to the feuars or burgesses to elect their own magistrates, who, by such authority only, were legally authorised to administer justice and pass laws for maintaining peace and order in the burgh, is one proof of the great and peculiar powers of the Scottish aristocracy, which distinguishes Scotland from all the other nations of Europe Greenock, now a flourishing seaport, and the sixth town in Scotland in point of population is a case in point In 1635, being then a mere village, it was erected into a burgh of barony holding of John Shaw, proprietor of the barony, and till 1741 the affairs of the burgh were superintended by the superior or by a baron bailie ap pointed by him. By a charter dated in that year, and by another in 1751, Sir John Shaw, the superior, empowered the feuars and subfeuars to meet yearly for the purpose of choosing nine feuars residing in Greenock to be managers of the burgh funds, of whom two were to be bailies, one treasurer, and six councillors The last-mentioned charter gave power to hold weekly markets, to imprison and punish delinquents, to choose officers of court, to make laws for maintaining order, and to admit merchants and tradesmen as burgesses on payment of a small sum This instance is one of many that might be cited of the extent to which the pure feudal system had prevailed, and of its continuance in Scotland after it had disappeared everywhere else in Europe The Burgh Reform act of 1833 put the jurisdiction and government of Greenock on a different footing, as it did all the other burghs of Scotland

BARON, now generally spelled BARRON, a surname derived from the feudal title of Baron A family of this name formerly possessed the lands of Kinnaird in Fife In the time of James the Fifth, Magdalen, princess of Eleho, feued these lands to Alexander Leslie, whose grand-daughter and heiress married James Baron, merchant in Edinburgh, who thus acquired the lands Of this family were two learned doctors of divinity, named John and Robert Baron The latter was professor of theology in Marischal College, Aberdeen, and the author of various philosophical works He was elected bishop of Orkney, but died at Berwick in 1639, before he could be consecrated The son of Mr Baron disponed the lands to Sir Michael Balfour of Denmiln, the father of Sir James Balfour, lord lyon Sir James was during his father's life, invested with the lands of Kinnaird, and was always designed of Kinnaird [See ante, p 211]

There was a family of the name of Baron in the dukedom of Florence, from Scotland The first of them is said to have accompanied William, the brother of Achaius, to assist Charlemagne in his wars, and he settled in Italy His family continued for a long time, but failed at last, much regretted by a Florentine author, Ugolinus Verinus, (De Reparatione Florentiæ, lib iii) in these verses

"Clara potensque diu, sed nunc est nulla BARONUM
Extra progenies, extremisque orta Britannis

BARR, a surname derived from the small village of Barr in the parish of that name in the district of Carrick, Ayrshire It is conjectured that the village took its name from its inaccessibleness, "being hemmed in on every side by precipitous hills, and approachable only by rugged glens and across a stream, which dwindling into a purling rill in summer, rushes with a torrent's fury in winter, and destroys every vestige of a roadway along its gravelly banks The parish did, indeed, constitute a strong natural barrier between Galloway on the south and Ayrshire to the north, and was nearly inaccessible till about the beginning of the present century" [New Stat Account of Scotland, vol v p 407] The name may also have been derived, in some instances, from the estate and castle of Barr in Renfrewshire, which anciently belonged to a family named Glen Sir Robert Barr, a burgess of Glasgow, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia but the date of creation is not exactly known, and the baronetcy is extinct

BARRET, Baron BARRET of Newburgh, a peerage of Scotland now extinct, conferred by King Charles the First on Sir Edward Barret, knight, of Bellhouse in Essex, by patent dated at Whitehall 17th October 1627, to himself and the legitimate heirs male of his body, bearing the name and arms of Barret His lordship was chancellor of the exchequer in England from 1635 to 1642 He married Anne, daughter of Sir Edward Cary, knight, and died in 1644 without issue, when the title became extinct His kinsman, the Hon Richard Lennard of Horseford, in Norfolk, (youngest son of Richard Lord Dacre,) to whom Lord Barret bequeathed his property in Essex, took the name of Barret, and was ancestor of Thomas Barret Lennard, Lord Dacre, who died in 1786

BARRY, a surname more prevalent in Ireland than in England or Scotland, and in the former country ennobled in the family of the earls of Barrymore, (a title now extinct,) descended from William de Barri, a knight of Norman origin BARRIE, the Scottish mode of spelling the name, is evidently derived from the parish of Barrie in Forfarshire

BARRY, GEORGE, D D , the author of the History of the Orkney Islands, a native of Berwickshire, was born in 1748 He studied for the ministry at the college of Edinburgh, and having become private tutor to the sons of some gentlemen in Orkney, he was, by their patronage, appointed second minister of Kirkwall About 1796 he was translated to the island and parish of Shapinshay The statistical account of his two parishes, inserted in Sir John Sinclair's Statistical Reports, first brought him into notice In consequence of his zeal and efficiency in the education of youth in his parish, the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge in Scotland, about 1800, elected him one of their members, and gave him a superintendence over their schools at Orkney Soon after, the university of Edinburgh conferred upon him the degree of D D His valuable 'History of the Orkney Islands,' comprehending an account of their present as well as their ancient state, on which he had been engaged for some years, was not published till after his death He died May 14, 1805

BARRY, THOMAS, Provost of Bothwell, was the author of a Latin poem on the battle of Otterburn, fought in 1388, but there is little known concerning him

BARTON, a surname supposed to have been originally derived from Bereton, that is, the farm of bere or barley It is the name of numerous localities in England, as Barton-on-Humber, and others, amounting to nearly forty in all In some instances the name may have been given to a small port, having a bar of sand blocking up its entrance, and in others applied to a small enclosure or farm having a bar gate It is also the name of a peculiar kind of block and tackle of great power

Barton is properly an English name The Bartons of Barton Hall were an ancient family in Lancashire, having branches in Ireland and Scotland There was also an old family of Barton of Smithills in the same county, recorded in the Herald's Visitation of 1567, but subsequently established in the palatinate of Chester

BARTON, Andrew, a distinguished naval commander, of the reign of James the Fourth, belonged to a family which, for two generations, had produced able and successful seamen, and were intrusted by the king with the principal authority in all maritime and commercial matters in Scotland To the increase of his navy, and to nautical affairs in general, King James paid particular attention, and the Bartons not only purchased vessels for him on the continent, and invited into Scotland the most skilful foreign shipbuilders, but sold to him some of their own ships In the reign of the fourth James the Scottish navy consisted of sixteen ships of war, besides one vessel called the Great Michael, the largest then known to be in the world, and which, as an old author says, "cumbered all Scotland to get her fitted out for sea" The daring and skill of the Bartons, of whom there were three brothers, and of Andrew in particular, had raised them to a renown scarcely inferior to that of the famous admiral, Sir Andrew Wood himself, who flourished in the same reign, and the prowess of Andrew Barton was put to the proof on the following occasion A small fleet of Scottish merchantmen had been piratically attacked by some Dutch ships, and plundered of their cargoes, while the crews, after being murdered, were thrown overboard Andrew Barton was instantly despatched with a squadron to take signal vengeance on the perpetrators of this cruel deed Many of the pirates were captured, and the admiral commanded the hogsheads, which were stowed in the holds of his vessels, to be filled with the heads of his prisoners, and sent as a present to his royal master So early as the year 1476, the ships belonging to the Bartons were plundered by a Portuguese squadron, and as the king of Portugal refused to make any amends, letters of reprisal were granted to the Barton family by the Scottish monarch, authorizing them to take all Portuguese vessels which should come in their way, until they had fully indemnified themselves for their losses The Portuguese mariners, on their part, were not slow to retaliate, and in 1507, the Lion, commanded by John Barton, the father of Andrew, was seized at Campvere, in Zealand, and its commander thrown into prison His sons procured from King James a renewal of their letters of reprisal, and fitted out two strong ships, the larger called the Lion, and the lesser the Jenny Pirwen, which they placed under the command of Andrew Barton With these he cruised in the Channel, intercepting and capturing, at various times, many of the richly laden vessels returning from the Portuguese settlements in India and Africa, and, as Tytler remarks, the unwonted apparition of blackamoors at the Scottish court, and black empresses presiding over the royal tournaments, is to be traced to the spirit and success of the Scottish privateers Not content, however, with stopping the Portuguese ships, and making prizes of them, whenever they could, the Bartons detained and searched English merchant vessels bound for Portugal, or coming from that country, under the pretence that they had Portuguese goods on board In consequence of this, they were treated by the English as pirates, and the council board of England, at which the earl of Surrey, (afterwards created Duke of Norfolk,) presided, was continually receiving complaints from the sailors and merchants, that Barton was in the practice of intercepting English vessels, and playing redress King Henry, not willing to come to a rupture with the king of Scotland, at first paid little attention to these complaints The earl of Surrey, however, could not conceal his indignation, and, on hearing of some late excesses of the privateers, declared that "the narrow seas should not be so infested whilst he had an estate that could furnish a ship, or a son who was able to command it" He accordingly fitted out two men-of-war, which were manned by well selected crews, archers, and men-at-arms, and placed under the command of his two sons, Sir Thomas Howard, called by old historians Lord Howard, afterwards created earl of Surrey in his father's lifetime, and Sir Edward Howard, afterwards lord high admiral of England Having put to sea he fell in with Andrew Barton cruising in the Downs, having been guided to his whereabouts by the captain of a merchantman which Barton had plundered on the previous day This took place in July, 1511 On approaching Barton, the English vessels showed no colours or ensigns of war, but put up a willow wand on their masts, that being the emblem of a trading vessel But when Barton ordered them to bring to, the English threw out their flags and pennons, and fired a broadside The Scotch admiral then knew that he had English vessels to contend with Barton commanded his own ship, the Lion, to which was opposed Sir Thomas Howard, his other vessel was only an armed pinnace, named the Union, called by Hall the bark of Scotland, but far from being dismayed at the odds against him, he engaged boldly, and in a rich dress and bright armour, appeared on deck, with a whistle of gold about his neck, suspended by a golden chain, and encouraged his men to fight valiantly A gold whistle was in those days the sign of the office of high admiral The battle that ensued was most obstinately contested On both sides the most determined valour was displayed, till the Scottish admiral was desperately wounded It is said that even then this bold and experienced seaman continued to encourage his men with his whistle till death closed his career

In an old ballad, on this seafight, fought before England had a navy at all, entitled 'Sir Andrew Barton,' it is related that

With pikes and gunnes, and bowemen bold,
The noble Howard is gone to the sea,
With a valyant heart, and a pleasant cheare,
Out at Thames mouth sayled hee
And days he scant had sayled three
Upon the 'voyage' he took in hand
But there he met with a noble shipp
And stoutly made itt stay and stand

"Thou must tell me," Lord Howard sayes,
"Now who thou art, and what's thy name,
And shewe me where thy dwelling is
And whither bound and whence thou came"
"My name is Henrye Hunt," quoth hee,
With a heavye heart, and a carefull mind
"I and my shipp doe both belong To the Newcastle that stands upon Tyne"

"Hast thou not heard now, Henrye Hunt,
As thou hast sayled by dave and by night,
Of a Scottish rover on the seas,
Men call him Sir Andrew Barton, Knight?"
Then ever he sighed, and sayd alas!
With a grieved mind, and well away,
"But over well I knowe that wight,
I was his prisoner yesterday"

If we are to believe this ballad, Barton's ship, the Lion, was furnished with a peculiar contrivance suspending large weights or beams from his yardarms, for the purpose of being dropped down upon the enemy when they should come alongside This was an old stratagem of the Romans, which the Scottish admiral had adopted with great success Barton and these beams are thus described by the said "Henrye Hunt"

"He is brasse within, and steele without,
With beames on his topcastle stronge,
And thirtye pieces of ordinance
He carries on each side alonge,
And he hath a pinnace deerlye dight,
St Andrewes crosse itt is his guide,
His pinnace beareth ninescore men,
And fifteen cannons on each side

"Were ye twentye shippes, and he but one,
I sweare by kirke, and bower, and hall,
He wold orecome them every one,
If once his beames they doe downe fall
"This is cold comfort," sayes my lord,
"To welcome a stranger on the sea,
Yett He bring him and his shipp to shore,
Or to Scotland he shall carry mee"

The ballad proceeds to relate that Henry Hunt guided Howard to the place where Barton's ships lay, and on coming up with them, he ordered all his ensigns to be furled

"Take in your ancyents, standards eke
So close that no man may them see,
And put me forth a white willowe wand,
As merchants use that style the sea"
But they stirred neither top or mast, Stoutly they past Sir Andrew by,
"What English churles are yonder," he sayd
That can so little curtesye

"Now by the roode, three years and more
I have been admirall on the sea,
And never an English nor Portingall
Without my leave can passe this way"
Then called he forth his stout pinnace,
"Fetche backe yond pedlars nowe to mee,
I sweare by the masse, yon English churles Shall all hang at my maine-mast tree"

With that the pinnace itt shott off,
Full well Lord Howard might it ken,
For it strake downe his foremast tree
And killed fourteen of his men

The English commander then ordered his gunner, "good Peter Simon," to fire off his ordnance, which he did with effect,

And he lett goe his great gunnes shott,
Soe well he settled itt with his ee,
The first sight that Sir Andrew sawe,
He sawe his pinnace sunke i' the sea

And when he sawe his pinnace sunke,
Lord, how his heart with rage did swell!
"Nowe cutt my ropes, itt is time to be gon,
He fetch yon pedlars backe mysel"
When my lord sawe Sir Andrewe loose,
Within his heart he was full faine,
"Nowe sprende your ancyents, strike up drummes, Sound all your trumpetts out amaine!"

The English seem to have been most apprehensive of the beams on the yardarms, but to make use of this contrivance, it was necessary that some one should ascend the mainmast, and Howard had stationed in a proper place a Yorkshire gentleman, named Horseley, the best archer in his ship with strict injunctions to let fly an arrow at every one who should attempt to go up the riggings of Barton's vessel Two of Barton's officers, named Gordon and James Hamilton, the latter his "only sister's sonne," were successively killed in the attempt Barton himself, confiding in the strong armour which he wore, then began to ascend the mast Lord Thomas Howard called out to the archer to shoot true, on peril of his life "Were I to die for it," answered Horseley, "I have but two arrows left" The first which he shot bounded from Barton's armour, without hurting him, but as the Scotch admiral raised his arm to climb higher, the archer took aim where the armour afforded him no protection, and wounded him mortally through the armpit

Sir Andrew he did swarve the tree
With right good will he swarved then,
Upon his breast did Horseley hitt,
But the arrow bounded back agen
Then Horseley spyed a privie place
With a perfect eye in a secrette part
Under the spole of his right arme,
He smote Sir Andrew to the heart

Jumping upon deck, Barton addressed his men "Fight on," he said, "my brave hearts, I am a little wounded, but not slain I will but rest awhile, and then rise and fight again, meantime, stand fast by St Andrew's cross," meaning the flag of Scotland

"Fight on, my men," Sir Andrew sayes
"A little I'm hurt, but yett not slaine, I'le but lye downe and bleede awhile,
And then I'le rise and fight againe
Fight on, my men," Sir Andrew sayes,
"And never flinche before the foe,
And stand fast by St Andrewe's crosse,
Untill you heare my whistle blow"

They never heard his whistle blow,
Which made their hearts waxe sore adread,
Then Horseley sayd, "Aboard, my lord,
For well I wott Sir Andrew's dead"
They boarded then his noble shipp,
They boarded it with might and maine,
Eighteen score Scotts alive they found,
The rest were either maimd or slaine

Lord Howard tooke a sword in hand,
And off he smote Sir Andrewe's head,
"I must ha' left England many a dave,
If thou were alive as thou art dead"
He caused his bodye to be cast,
Over the hatchborde into the sea,
And about his middle three hundred crownes,
"Wherever thou land this will bury thee"

Barton's ship, the Lion, thus captured, was carried into the Thames, and became the second man-of-war in the English navy The Great Harry, which had been built only seven years before, namely in 1504, was properly speaking the first On this celebrated ship Henry the Seventh expended £14,000, a great sum in those days, equivalent to the cost of a modern ship of the line With that monarch the rise of a royal navy in England is said to have originated Before his time, when the king wanted a fleet, the five ports, then the largest in England, and still called the Cinque Ports, furnished a certain equipment of ships and men, vessels were also hired from merchants, and manned and armed for war Ambitious of being independent of the irregular navy derived from such various and uncertain sources, Henry paid great attention to the building of large ships exclusively for warlike purposes, and he took care to keep them in a highly efficient and progressive state His son, Henry the Eighth, caused to be constructed the then largest English ship, called Henry Grace de Dieu, or the Great Harry after the ship of the same name, built by his father This is said to have been the first ship which had four masts, and was considered the wonder of the sixteenth century

Thus died Andrew Barton With King James he was a personal favourite, and he sent a herald to King Henry to demand redress for the death of his ablest officer, and the loss of his ships, but Henry returned no milder answer than that the fate of pirates ought never to be a matter of dispute among princes He, however, after a short imprisonment dismissed Barton's crew, with a small sum each to defray their homeward charges This affair was one of the remote causes of the disastrous battle of Flodden, in which James the Fourth was slain —Tytler's History of Scotland, vol v —Scott's Tales of a Grandfather — Percy's Relques of Ancient English Poetry

BASSANTIN, a corruption of Bassendean or Bissingdene, a surname derived from an estate in the parish of Westruther Berwickshire, which seems at one period to have belonged to a family of the same name, and subsequently was a vicarage belonging to the nuns of Coldstream Soon after the Reformation, Andrew Currie, vicar of Bassendean, conveyed to William Home, third son of Sir James Home of Coldenknows, "terras ecclesiasticas, mansionem, et glebam vicariæ de Bassendene," whereupon, he obtained from James the Sixth, a charter for the same, on the 11th of February, 1573–4 This William was a progenitor of the Homes of Bassendean the most distinguished of which family was George Home of Bassendean, who suffered much for his zealous attachment to the cause of civil and religious liberty during the persecuting reigns of Charles the Second and James the Seventh, and was one of those expatriated Scotsmen who brought about the Revolution of 1688

Of the ancient family of Bassantin, Bassantoun, or Bassendean, was the subject of the following notice

BASSANTIN, JAMES, an eminent astronomer and mathematician, the son of the laird of Bassendean, in Berwickshire, was born in the reign of James IV , and, after studying mathematics at the university of Glasgow, he travelled for further information on the continent He subsequently went to Paris, where, on a vacancy occurring in the mathematical chair of the university, he was elected professor, and he remained there for some years He returned to Scotland in 1562, and spent the remainder of his life on his patrimonial estate of Bassendean The prevailing delusion of that age, particularly in France, was a belief in judicial astrology In his way home through England, as we learn from Sir James Melville's Memoirs, he met with Sir Robert Melville, the brother of that gentleman, who was at that time engaged, on the part of the unfortunate Mary, in endeavouring to effect a meeting between her and Elizabeth, when he predicted that all his efforts would be in vain, "for, first, they will never meet together, and next, there will never be bot discembling and secret hatrient (hatred) for a whyle, and at length captivity and utter wrak for our Quen by England" Melville's answer was, that he could not credit such news, which he looked upon as "false, ungodly, and unlawful," on which Bassantin replied, "Sa far as Melanthon, wha was a godly theologue, has declared and written anent the naturall scyences, that are lawfull and daily red in dyvers Christian universities, in the quhilkis, as in all othir arts, God geves to some less, to some man and clearer knawledge than till othirs, be the quhilk knawledge I have also that at length, that the kingdom of England sall of ryght fall to the crown of Scotland, and that there are some born at this instant that sall brink lands and heritages in England Bot, alace, it will cost many thein lyves, and many bluidy battailes will be fouchen first, and the Spaniartis will be helpers, and will take a part to themselves for their labours" The first part of Bassantin's prediction, which he might very well have hazarded from what he may have known of Elizabeth's character and disposition, and also from the fact that Mary was the next heir to the English throne, proved true, the latter portion showed, in the result, how little faith should be placed in the pseudo-science of astrology, which is now exploded Bassantin was a zealous protestant, and a supporter of the Regent Murray He died in 1568 His principal work is a Treatise or Discourse on Astronomy, written in French, which was translated into Latin by John Tornæsius, (M de Tournes,) and published at Geneva in 1599 He wrote four other treatises Although well versed for his time in what are called the exact sciences, Bassantin had received no part of a classical education Vossius observes, that his astronomical discourse was written in very bad French, and that the author knew "neither Greek nor Latin, but only Scotch" Bassantin's Planetary System was that of Ptolemy His works contain a laborious collection of the theories and observations of preceding astronomers, and are monuments of his own extensive acquirements The following is a list of them

BASSOL, JOHN, the favourite disciple of Duns Scotus, was born, according to Mackenzie, in the reign of Alexander III In his younger years he applied himself to the study of philosophy and the belles lettres, after which he went to the university of Oxford, where he studied theology under Duns Scotus, with whom, in the year 1304, he removed to Paris, and studied for some time in the university there In 1313 he entered the order of the Minorites Being afterwards sent by the general of his order to Rheims, he there applied himself to the study of medicine, and taught philosophy for seven or eight years in that city In 1322 he was sent to Mechlin, in Brabant, where he taught theology He died there in 1347 His master, Duns Scotus, had such a high opinion of him, that, when he taught in the schools, he usually said, that "If only Joannes Bassiolis were present, he had a sufficient auditory" The only work he wrote was entitled 'Commentaria seu Lectuiæ in Quatuor Libros Sententiarum,' folio, which, with some miscellaneous treatises in philosophy and medicine, was published in Paris in 1517 Bassol was a man of great learning, and, in lecturing or writing, he handled his subject with so much order and method, that he was styled Doctor Ordinatissimus, or the most orderly or methodical doctor, for, at that period, eminent scholars and divines were distinguished by such titles It was objected to him, however, that, in common with most of the schoolmen of that and the succeeding age, he was too subtle and nice in obscure questions, for they were fond of proposing objections that could never have occurred to any but themselves So subtle, indeed, was one of them, called 'The Calculator,' that Cardan, an old author, says, only one of his arguments was enough to puzzle all posterity, and that, when he grew old, he wept because he could not understand his own books!—Mackenzie's Scots Writers

BATHGATE, a surname derived from what is now the town and parish of Bathgate in Linlithgowshire The etymology of the name itself is uncertain In a grant by Malcolm the Fourth to the monks of Holyrood of the church of Bathgate with a portion of land, it is called Batket, and in other charters and deeds of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, the name is variously written Bathket, Bathgatt Bathcat and Bathkat The barony of Bathgate formed part of the dowery of Marjory Bruce, on her marriage with Walter, High Steward of Scotland, in 1316 In the castle of Bathgate, the said Walter died in 1328, that being one of his chief residences

BAXTER, ANDREW, an ingenious metaphysical writer, the son of a merchant in Old Aberdeen, was born there in 1686 or 1687 He was educated in King's College in his native city, and afterwards became a private tutor Among his pupils were the Lords Gray and Blantyre, and Mr Hay of Drumelzier About 1730 he published 'An Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul,' wherein its immateriality is evinced from the principles of reason and philosophy This work, which originally appeared without a date, was praised in high terms by Dr Warburton In 1741 he went abroad with Mr Hay, having also the charge of Lord Blantyre, and remained for some years at Utrecht, his wife and family in the mean time residing at Berwick-upon-Tweed On the continent he contracted a very extensive acquaintance, and could speak the French, Dutch, and German languages fluently He also wrote and read the Italian and Spanish It is related of him, that, during the whole of his residence at Utrecht, he presided at the ordinary which was frequented by all the young English gentlemen there, with much gaiety and politeness, and in such a manner as gave general satisfaction In 1747 he returned to Scotland, and resided at Whittingham in East Lothian, till his death, which took place April 23, 1750, aged 63 He left a widow, the daughter of a clergyman in Berwickshire, three daughters, and one son He wrote, for the use of his pupils, a Latin treatise, entitled 'Matho, sive Cosmotheoria puerilis Dialogus,' which he afterwards translated into English, and published in two vols 8vo In

1750 appeared an Appendix to his 'Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul,' in which he endeavours to answer the objections that had been advanced against his notions of the vis inertiæ of matter, by Mr Colin Maclaurin, in his 'Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discourses' Hume also controverted his arguments Mr Baxter dedicated the Appendix to his Enquiry to the celebrated John Wilkes, whose acquaintance he had made on the continent, and with whom he kept up a correspondence till within a short time before his death —He left many manuscripts behind him, and would gladly have finished his work upon the human soul "I own," says he, in a letter to Mr Wilkes, "if it had been the will of Heaven, I would gladly have lived till I had put in order the second part of the Enquiry, showing the immortality of the human soul, but infinite wisdom cannot be mistaken in calling me sooner Our blindness makes us form wishes" This, indeed, he considered his capital work

BEATTIE, JAMES, LL D, a distinguished poet, moralist, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Laurencekirk, Kincardineshire, October 25th, 1735 His father, who kept a little retail shop in that village, also rented a small farm in the neighbourhood, in which his forefathers had lived for many generations He was the youngest son, and his father dying when he was yet a child, his elder brother David, on whom, with his mother, the care of the family devolved, placed him at the village school, where, as he soon began to write verses, his companions bestowed on him the title of "The Poet" In 1749 he was removed to Marischal College, Aberdeen, where he obtained a bursary or exhibition He studied Greek under Dr Thomas Blackwell, author of 'The Court of Augustus,' and 'An Inquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer,' who was the first to encourage Beattie's genius He made great progress in his studies, and acquired that accurate and classical knowledge for which he was afterwards so eminent In 1753 he obtained the degree of A M, and having completed his course of study, he was appointed in August of that year schoolmaster and parish clerk to the parish of Fordoun, at the foot of the Grampians, six miles from his native village It is related of him that he loved at this time to wander in the fields during the night, and watch the appearance of the coming dawn, feeding his young dreams of poesy "in lone sequestered spots" His early productions, inserted in the Scottish Magazine, gained him some local reputation, and he attracted the favourable notice of Mr Garden, advocate, afterwards Lord Gardenstone, then sheriff of Kincardineshire, Lord Monboddo, and others in the neighbourhood, who invited him to their houses, and with whom he ever after maintained a friendly intercourse He had at one time an intention of entering the church, and in consequence attended the divinity class at Marischal College, but circumstances led him to change his views In 1757 a vacancy occurred in the grammar school of Aberdeen, and Beattie was induced to become a candidate for the situation, but did not succeed He acquitted himself so well, however, that on a second vacancy in June 1758, he was elected one of the masters of that school In 1760 he published at London a volume of poems and translations, which, though it met with a favourable reception, he endeavoured at a future period, when his fame was established, to buy up and suppress Some of these will be found in the Appendix to Sir William Forbes' Life of Beattie By the influence of the earl of Errol and others of his friends, he was the same year appointed professor of moral philosophy and logic at Marischal college Among his brother professors in the Aberdeen universities at that time were such men of genius and learning as Dr Campbell, Dr Reid, and Dr Gregory In 1762 he wrote his 'Essay on Poetry,' which was published in 1776, with others of his prose works In 1765 he published an unsuccessful poem on 'The Judgment of Paris,' in quarto He afterwards reprinted it in a new edition of his poetical works which appeared in 1766 On the 28th June 1767 he married Mary, daughter of Dr James Dunn, the Rector of the grammar school at Aberdeen, his union with whom was not happy, in consequence of a hereditary disposition to madness on her part, which made its appearance a few years after the marriage, and which subsequently caused her to be put in confinement

In 1770 appeared the work which first brought Dr Beattie prominently into notice, viz, 'An Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth, in opposition to Sophistry and Scepticism,' written with the avowed purpose of confuting the pernicious doctrines advanced by Hume and his supporters, which at that time were very prevalent His motives for engaging in this task are fully explained in a long letter to Dr Blacklock, which will be found in Forbes' account of his Life and Writings The design, he says, "is to overthrow scepticism, and establish conviction in its place, a conviction not in the least favourable to bigotry or prejudice, far less to a persecuting spirit, but such a conviction as produces firmness of mind, and stability of principle, in consistence with moderation, candour, and liberal inquiry" This work was so popular, that in four years five large editions were sold, and it was translated into several foreign languages The 'Essay on Truth,' which Hume and his friends treated as a violent personal attack, was intended to be continued, but general ill health, and an inveterate disinclination to severe study, prevented him from completing his design In the same year he published anonymously the First Book of 'The Minstrel, or the Progress of Genius,' 4to, which he had commenced writing in 1766 This poem was at once highly successful It was particularly praised by Gray the poet, who wrote him a letter of criticism, which is preserved in Forbes' Life of Beattie Shortly afterwards he visited London, and was flatteringly received by Lord Littleton, Dr Johnson, and other ornaments of the literary society of the metropolis In 1773 he renewed his visit, and owing to the most powerful influence exerted on his behalf, he obtained a pension of £200 a-year, on account of his 'Essay on Truth' George III received him with distinguished favour, and honoured him with an hour's interview in the royal closet, when the queen also was present Among other marks of respect, the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of LL D at the same time with Sir Joshua Reynolds That great artist having requested him to sit for his portrait, presented him with the celebrated painting containing the allegorical Triumph of Truth over Sophistry, Scepticism, and Infidelity He was also pressed to enter the Church of England by the Archbishop of York and the bishop of London, which he declined, on the ground chiefly lest the opponents of revealed religion should assert that he was actuated by motives of self-interest One prelate offered him a living worth nearly £500 a-year, which also he refused, "partly," he says, "because it might be construed into a want of principle, if, at the age of 38, I were to quit, with no other apparent motive than that of bettering my circumstances, that church of which I have hitherto been a member." In 1774 appeared the Second Book of the 'Minstrel,' which has become one of the standard poems in our language. A vacancy having occurred in the chair of natural and experimental philosophy in Edinburgh, he was advised by several of his friends to become a candidate, but this he declined, preferring to remain in Aberdeen. In 1777 he brought out by subscription a new edition of his 'Essay on Truth,' to which were added some miscellaneous dissertations on 'Poetry and Music,' 'Laughter and Ludicrous Composition,' and 'The Utility of Classical Learning.' In 1783 he published 'Dissertations, Moral and Critical,' 4to, and in 1786 'Evidences of the Christian Religion,' 2 vols. 12mo. In 1790 he edited an edition of Addison's papers, which appeared at Edinburgh that year. The same year he published the first volume of his 'Elements of Moral Science,' the second followed in 1793. To the latter volume was appended some remarks against the continuance of the slave-trade. Long before the abolition of that iniquitous traffic was mooted in parliament, Dr Beattie had introduced the subject into his academical course with the express hope that the lessons of humanity which he taught would be useful to such of his pupils as might thereafter proceed to the West Indies. His last production was 'An Account of the Life, Character, and Writings of his eldest Son, James Hay Beattie,' an amiable and promising young man, his assistant in the professorship, who died in 1790, at the age of 22, (see next article). This great affliction was followed in 1796 by the equally premature death of his youngest son Montague, in his 19th year. These bereavements, with the melancholy fate of his wife, quite broke his heart. Looking at the corpse of his boy, he said, "I am now done with this world," and although he performed the duties of his chair till a short time previous to his death, he never again applied to study, he enjoyed no society or amusement, even music, of which he had been passionately fond, lost its charms for him, and he answered few letters from his friends. Yet he would sometimes express resignation to his childless condition. "How could I have borne," he would feelingly say, "to see their elegant minds mangled with madness!" He had been all his life subject to headaches, which sometimes interrupted his studies, but now his spirits and his constitution were entirely gone. — In April 1799 he was struck with palsy, and, after some paralytic strokes, he died at Aberdeen, August 18, 1803. Subjoined is a portrait of Dr Beattie from the painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Dr Beattie's metaphysical writings are clear, lively, and attractive, but not profound, and the 'Essay on Truth,' once so much read and admired, has now fallen into comparative neglect, from its merits having been much overrated at the time it appeared. His poem of the 'Minstrel,' his 'Odes to Retirement and Hope,' and his 'Hermit,' will perpetuate his name as one of the most popular and pleasing poets of the eighteenth century, when his philosophical productions are no longer read. "Of all his poetical works," says

Sir William Forbes, "the Minstrel is beyond all question the best, whether we consider the plan or the execution The language is extremely elegant, the versification harmonious, it exhibits the richest poetic imagery, with a delightful flow of the most sublime delicate, and pathetic sentiment It breathes the spirit of the purest virtue, the soundest philosophy, and the most exquisite taste In a word, it is at once highly conceived and admirably finished" The descriptions of natural scenery in this fine poem are not exceeded in beauty by those of any of his contemporaries The following stanza was declared by Gray to be "true poetry"

O! how can'st thou renounce the boundless store
Of charms which Nature to her votary yields!
The warbling woodland, the resounding shore,
The pomp of groves, and garniture of fields;
All that the genial ray of morning gilds,
And all that echoes to the song of even,
All that the mountain's sheltering bosom shields,
And all the dread magnificence of Heaven,
O! how canst thou renounce, and hope to be forgiven!

In private life Dr Beattie was a man of amiable and unassuming manners, and a warm attachment to the principles of morality and religion pervades all his writings His life, by Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo, baronet, an old and intimate friend of his, which appeared in two volumes 4to in 1806, contains some interesting selections from his private correspondence In his latter years Dr Beattie was assisted in the duties of his professorship by his relation, Mr George Glennie, afterwards D D, and one of the ministers of Aberdeen, who succeeded him

BEATTIE, JAMES HAY, son of the preceding, was born at Aberdeen, November 6, 1768 "He had reached his fifth or sixth year," says his father, "knew the alphabet, and could read a little, but had received no particular information with respect to the Author of his being, because I thought he could not yet understand such information, and because I had learnt from my own experience, that to be made to repeat words not understood, is extremely detrimental to the faculties of a young mind In a corner of a little garden, without informing any person of the circumstance, I wrote in the mould with my finger the three initial letters of his name, and sowing garden cresses in the furrows, covered up the seed, and smoothed the ground Ten days after, he came running up to me, and with astonishment in his countenance, told me that his name was growing in the garden I smiled at the report, and seemed inclined to disregard it, but he insisted on my going to see what had happened Yes, said I, carelessly, I see it is so, but there is nothing in this worth notice, it is mere chance, and I went away He followed me, and taking hold of my coat, said, with some earnestness, It could not be mere chance, for somebody must have contrived matters so as to produce it So you think, I said, that what appears so regular as the letters of your name cannot be by chance? Yes, said he, with firmness, I think so Look at yourself, I replied, and consider your hand and fingers, your legs and feet, and other limbs, are they not regular in their appearance, and useful to you? He said they were Came you, then, hither, said I, by chance? No, he answered, that cannot be, something must have made me And who is that something? I asked He said, he did not know I had now gained the point I aimed at, and saw that his reason taught him, though he could not so express it, that what begins to be must have a cause, and that what is formed with regularity must have an intelligent cause I therefore told him the name of the Great Being who made him and all the world, concerning whose adorable nature I gave him such information as I thought he could in some measure comprehend The lesson affected him greatly, and he never forgot either it or the circumstance that introduced it" The first rules of morality taught him by his father were to speak truth and keep a secret, and "I never found," he says, "that in a single instance he transgressed either" Having received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of Aberdeen, he was entered at the age of 13, a student in the Marischal College, and was admitted to the degree of M A in 1786 In June 1787, when he was not quite nineteen, on the recommendation of the Senatus Academicus of Marischal College, he was appointed by the king assistant professor and successor to his father in the chair of moral philosophy and logic In this character, it is stated, he gave universal satisfaction, though so young He was so deeply impressed with the importance of religion, as always to carry about with him a pocket Bible and the Greek New Testament He studied music as a science, and performed well on the organ and violin, and contrived to build an organ for himself He early began to write poetry, and had he been spared, he would no doubt have produced something worthy of his name But his days were numbered In the night of the 30th November 1789, he was suddenly seized with fever, before morning a perspiration ensued, which freed him from all immediate danger, but left him weak and languid Though he lived for a year thereafter, his health rapidly declined, and he was never again able to engage much in study He died November 19, 1790, in the 22d year of his age Over his grave, in the churchyard of St Nicholas, Aberdeen, his afflicted father erected a monument to his memory, and, as already stated in the life of Dr Beattie, his writings in prose and verse were published by the latter in 1799, with a memoir of the author "His life," says Dr Beattie in a letter to the Duchess of Gordon, giving an account of his death, "was one uninterrupted exercise of piety, benevolence, filial affection, and indeed every virtue which it was in his power to practise" He was an excellent classical scholar, and his talents were considered of the highest order by all who had an opportunity of knowing him

BEATTIE, GEORGE, author of 'John o' Arnha',' was born in the parish of St Cyrus, county of Kincardine, in 1785 His parents were respectable, and he received a liberal education In 1807 he commenced business as a writer in Montrose His abilities soon brought him into notice He had a strong turn for poetry, some pieces of which have been published In September 1823 a disappointment in love brought on a depression of spirits, under the influence of which he deprived himself of life, in the church-yard of St Cyrus, where a tombstone has been erected to his memory, with an appropriate inscription The fifth edition of 'John o' Arnha',' a humorous and satirical poem, somewhat in the style of 'Tam o' Shanter,' appeared at Montrose in 1826, to which was added 'The Murderit Mynstrell,' and other poems The opening lines of 'The Murderit Mynstrell,' which is in the old Scottish dialect, are very fine —

How sweithe shonne the morning sunne
Upon the bonnie Ha'-house o Dun Siccan a bien and lovelie abode
Micht wyle the pilgrime aff his roade,
But the awneris' hearte was harde as stane,
And his Ladye's was harder still, I weene
They neur gaue amous to the poore,
And they turnit the wretchit frae their doore, Quhile the stranger, as he passit thair yett,
Was by the wardowre and tykkes besett
Oh! there hvit there ane bonnie Maye Mylde and sweit as the morning raye,
Or the gloamin of ane summeris daye
Hir haire was faire, hir eyne were blue,
And the dymples o' luve playit round hir sweit mou, Hir waiste was sae jimp, hir anckel sae sma,
Hir bosome as quhyte as the new-driven snawe

Sprent o'er the twinne mountains of sweit Caterthunne, Beamand mylde in the rayes of a wynterie sunne Quhair the myde of a fute has niver bein,
And not a cloud in the lift is sein
Quhen the wynd is slumb ring in its cave
And the barke is sleeping on the wave,
And the breast of the ocean is as still
As the morning mist upon Morven Hill
Oh sair did scho rue, baith nighte and daye, Hir hap was to be this Ladye's Mave

In addition to the above there were found among his manuscripts, at the period of his death, two volumes of Lectures, in a state of complete readiness for the press, which it was his intention to publish, but increasing debility prevented him from carrying his intention into effect There were also two small volumes, which he had prepared at the request of one of his publishers, the one being a series of discourses on the parable of the Ten Virgins, and having for its title, 'The Visible Church in the Last Days,' the other consisting of discourses on the promises, and entitled, 'Christian Instruction in Hope, in Warning, and in Example'

BELHAVEN and STENTON, Baron, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred by King Charles the First on Sir John Hamilton of Biel, eldest son of Sir James Hamilton of Broomhill, in consideration of his fidelity to his cause, by patent dated 15th December, 1647 The title was derived from the village of Belhaven in Haddingtonshire In 1648 his lordship accompanied the duke of Hamilton in his unfortunate expedition into England to attempt the rescue of the king, and escaped from the rout at Preston In 1675 he resigned his title into the hands of King Charles the Second, who, by patent, dated at Whitehall, 10th February 1675, conferred the peerage on him for life, with remainder, after his decease, to the husband of one of his grand-daughters, John Hamilton, eldest son of Robert Hamilton of Barncluth, one of the principal clerks of council and session, and after the Revolution one of the judges of the supreme court, under the title of Lord Pressmannan, and to the heirs male of his body, which failing, to his nearest heirs male whatever The first Lord Belhaven married Margaret, natural daughter of James, second marquis of Hamilton, by whom he had three daughters He died in 1679 Margaret, his eldest daughter, married Sir Samuel Baillie, younger of Lamington, and had issue, Anne the second, became the wife of Sir Robert Hamilton of Silvertonhill, and had two sons and four daughters Elizabeth, Lord Belhaven's youngest daughter, was the third wife of Alexander, first Viscount Kingston, but had no issue

Of John Hamilton the second Lord Belhaven, the most distinguished of those who have held the title, a notice follows

John, third Lord Belhaven, the eldest son of the second lord, succeeded his father in 1708, and at the general election in 1715 was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage He was about the same time appointed one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to George, Prince of Wales At the battle of Sheriffmuir, 13th November 1715, he commanded the East Lothian troop of horse, on the side of the government In 1721 he was appointed governor of Barbadoes, and sailed for that island on board the Royal Anne galley, which was unfortunately lost going down the Channel, on the Stag Rocks, near the Lizard point, about midnight 17th November 1721, when his lordship was drowned, with the whole persons on board, two hundred and forty in number, with the exception of two men and a boy, who drifted on shore on pieces of the wreck He had married Anne, daughter of Andrew Bruce, merchant in Edinburgh, a cadet of the family of Earlshall in Fife, by whom he had four sons and one daughter, namely, John, fourth Lord Belhaven, Andrew, an officer in the army, died unmarried in 1736, James, fifth Lord Belhaven, Robert, a major in the army in the expedition to Carthagena under Lord Cathcart in 1741, who also died unmarried in 1743, and Margaret, married to Alexander Baird, son of Sir William Baird of Newbyth

John, fourth Lord Belhaven, succeeded his father in 1721 He was general of the mint, and one of the trustees for the encouragement and improvement of trade manufactures, and fisheries in Scotland He died unmarried at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 28th August, 1764

James, fifth Lord Belhaven, succeeded his brother He was bred to the law, and in 1727 he became a member of the faculty of advocates In 1733 he was appointed assistant-solicitor to the boards of excise and customs, and on the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in 1747 he was appointed sheriff depute of the county of Haddington He died at Biel, 25th January 1777

The title remained some years subsequently dormant By virtue of an entail executed by the second Lord Belhaven, 17th October 1701, confirmed by the fifth lord by another entail of 14th May 1765, the husbands of the heirs female being excluded from inheriting the property, and the whole male descendants of the second lord's father, Lord Pressmannan, having entirely failed, the family estates, of great value, devolved upon Mrs Mary Hamilton Nisbet of Pencaitland, Saltcoats, and Dechmont, wife of William Nisbet, Esq of Dirleton She was accordingly served heir to James, fifth Lord Belhaven, 3d December, 1783 The whole male descendants of James Hamilton of Barncleuth, from whom the second lord sprang, having likewise failed, the title of Lord Belhaven and Stenton devolved on Robert Hamilton of Wishaw, he being the nearest male heir existing in the collateral line of John, second Lord Belhaven, according to the usual course of descent established by the law of Scotland

By this course of descent, it is settled that in the case of three brothers, should the middle brother fail, the younger, and not the elder is entitled to succeed as heir male

The title of Lord Belhaven was assumed by William Hamilton, captain of the 44th regiment of foot, lineal descendant and heir male of John Hamilton of Coltness, the eldest of the three brothers, and he voted at the general election in 1790 as Lord Belhaven An objection was taken to his right, and evidence was given that there were male descendants of the body of William Hamilton of Wishaw, the youngest of the three brothers consequently the character of heir male whatever of John, second Lord Belhaven, the patentee of 1765, could not belong to the gentleman who had assumed the title and voted at the election This argument was supported by the Attorney-General, attending on behalf of the crown, and the Lords' Committee of Privileges, on 5th June 1793, unanimously resolved that the votes given at the election by the said Captain Hamilton, under the title of Lord Belhaven, were not good, and this resolution was confirmed by the house of peers Soon after, William Hamilton of Wishaw, eldest son and heir of Robert already mentioned as the nearest male heir, who had died in 1784, presented to the king a petition claiming the title, honours, and dignity, of Lord Belhaven, which petition was, as is customary, referred to the House of Peers and the Lords' Committee of Privileges The claim was decided in his favour in 1799

Robert Hamilton of Wishaw, who, as above explained, on the death of James, fifth Lord Belhaven, in 1777 became, in the legal course of succession, entitled to the honours, was of right the sixth Lord Belhaven but he did not assume the title He married at Edinburgh, 1st February 1764, Susan, second daughter of Sir Michael Balfour of Denmiln, in Fife, Baronet, and by her, who died 9th January 1789, he had three sons and five daughters, the younger children taking the style of Honourable, as their father was legally entitled to the peerage of Belhaven

The eldest son, William, seventh Lord Belhaven, was born 13th January 1765, and succeeded his father in 1784, but did not assume the title till the decision of the house of peers in his favour in 1799 His lordship was an officer in the third, or king's own regiment of dragoons, afterwards colonel of the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Fencible cavalry, and lieutenant-colonel of the Royal Lanarkshire Militia He married at Edinburgh, 3d March 1789 Penelope, youngest daughter of Ronald Macdonald of Clanronald in Inverness-shire, and had issue two sons and five daughters, namely, Robert Montgomery, eighth Lord Belhaven, Hon William, East India Company's service, born in 1797, married Mrs M A Mendes, widow of J P Mendes, Esq, and died in 1838, Hon Penelope, Hon Susan-Mary, married 16th November, 1820, to Peter Ramsay, Esq, Banker, Edinburgh, Hon Flora, Hon Jean, and Hon Bethia

Robert Montgomery Hamilton, eighth Lord Belhaven, was born in 1793, and succeeded his father, on his death, in 1814 He was one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage, and in 1831 was created Baron Hamilton of Wishaw, in the peerage of the United Kingdom For many successive years Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and always reappointed under the Whig administration, Vice-lieutenant and Convener of the county of Lanark He married, in 1815, Hamilton, second daughter of Walter Campbell, Esq of Shawfield, and Mrs Mary Hamilton of Pencaitland, Saltcoats, &c , without issue Heir presumptive to the title believed to be James Hamilton, son of the Hon William Hamilton, who, as already stated, died in 1838

BELHAVEN, second Lord, whose own name was John Hamilton, a distinguished patriot, was born July 5, 1656 He was the eldest son of Robert Hamilton of Barncluith, one of the senators of the college of justice, under the name of Lord Pressmannan, as stated above, and he married Margaret, grand-daughter of the first Lord Belhaven, who died in 1679 After his accession to the title he took a prominent part in public affairs, and soon became conspicuous for his opposition to the tyrannical measures of Charles the Second's government in Scotland In the Scots parliament of 1681, when the act for the test was brought forward, Lord Belhaven declared "that he saw a very good act for securing our religion from one mother among the subjects themselves, but he did not see an act for securing our religion against a popish or fanatical successor to the Crown" For these words, he was committed prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh, and the King's Advocate declared that there was matter for an accusation of treason against him But a few days thereafter his lordship was, on his submission, restored to liberty

After the Revolution, he attended the meeting of the Scottish nobility in London, held in January 1689, and concurred in the address to the Prince of Orange to assume the government He was present in the subsequent Convention of Estates, and contributed much to the settling of the Crown upon William and Mary He was chosen one of the new king's privy councillors for Scotland, and appointed a Commissioner for executing the office of lord register At the battle of Killiecrankie, July 27, 1689, he commanded a troop of horse On the accession of Queen Anne he was continued a privy councillor, and in 1704 was nominated one of the commissioners of the treasury, which office he only held a year

When the treaty of union with England was under discussion, Lord Belhaven was one of those who principally distinguished themselves by their determined opposition to the measure and his nervous and eloquent speeches on the occasion are preserved in various publications In 1708, when the Pretender, assisted by the French, attempted to make a descent on Scotland, Lord Belhaven was apprehended on suspicion of favouring the invasion, and conveyed to London His high spirit burst at the disgrace, and he died of inflammation of the brain, June 21, 1708, immediately after his release from imprisonment A contemporary writer says that he was of a good stature, well set, of a healthy constitution, a graceful and manly presence, had a quick conception, with a ready and masculine expression, and was steady in his principles, both in politics and religion The following is a portrait of his lordship from one in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery

The following are Lord Belhaven's publications in virtue of which he has been admitted into Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors

BELL, ANDREW, D D and LL D, founder of the Madras system of education, born at St Andrews in 1753, was educated in the university there Some part of his early life was spent in America, and having entered into holy orders, in 1789 he went to India as chaplain to the Hon E I Company at Fort-George, and minister of St Mary's at Madras Whilst in this capacity he was led by circumstances to the formation of a new and improved system of education, the advantages of which were early acknowledged Having undertaken the superintendence of the Military Male Orphan Asylum, which had been instituted by the Company at that station, he introduced the plan of mutual tuition by the scholars themselves, and it is highly honourable to his character that he declined to receive the remuneration of 1,200 pagodas (£480) allowed by the Company as the salary of the superintendent, the institution being supported chiefly by voluntary subscriptions It was while engaged in this pleasing duty, that he invented that excellent plan of instruction which is now known by the name of the Madras System of elementary education He returned to England in 1797, on account of his health On leaving India, the directors of the asylum passed a resolution for providing him a free passage home, declaring, at the same time, that, "under the wise and judicious regulations which he had established, the institution had been brought to a degree of perfection and promising utility, far exceeding what the most sanguine hopes could have suggested at the time of its establishment, and that he was entitled to their fullest approbation for his zealous and disinterested conduct" Soon after his arrival in England, he published a pamphlet, entitled 'An Experiment in Education, made at the Male Asylum of Madras, suggesting a System by which a School or Family may teach itself, under the superintendence of the Master or Parent' In 1798 his system was adopted in St Botolph's, Aldgate, and in the Kendal Schools of Industry The system, indeed, has been found to work so well in practice, that it has since been adopted in every civilized nation in the world In Great Britain alone there were, in 1833, "ten thousand schools, without any legislative assistance, wherein six hundred thousand children were educated by voluntary aid and charity," and the number has been every year since then on the increase The most gratifying testimonials were transmitted to Dr Bell, in proof of the excellence of his plan These he had the satisfaction of receiving not only from the highest quarters in this country, but from several governments and learned bodies throughout Europe, Asia, and America. A vast improvement in the religious and moral condition of the lower classes is found to take place wherever his system is adopted, and the labours of this illustrious individual well entitle him to be considered one of the greatest benefactors of mankind Mr Lancaster's plan was not propounded till the year 1803, and in his early publications he not only admitted the priority of Dr Bell's system, but acknowledged his obligations to him for some improvements which he had grafted on his own, although he afterwards endeavoured to claim the whole merit of the invention to himself The original discovery, however, is now universally allowed to belong to Dr Bell, "who," in Lancaster's own words, "so nobly gave up his time and liberal salary, that he might perfect that institution, (the Male Asylum at Madras,) which flourished greatly under his fostering care" The evening of Dr Bell's pious and useful life was passed at Cheltenham, where his benevolence and many virtues gained him the affection and respect of all classes of the community He had amassed a large fortune, which, with the generous feelings which ever actuated him, he bequeathed for educational purposes to several institutions in Scotland To his native city of St Andrews he left £10,000, besides a sum of £50,000 for the building and endowment of a new college there Altogether he distributed no less a sum than £120,000 among various national institutions and public charities The mastership of Sherborn Hospital, Durham, was conferred on him by Bishop Barrington He was also a fellow of the Asiatic Society, and of the Royal Society of Edinburgh In 1819 he received a Prebendal Stall at Westminster Among the valuable works which, in his later years, he published on the system of education, were 'The Elements of Tuition,' 'The English School,' and 'Mutual Tuition and Moral Discipline, or a Manual of Instructions for conducting schools through the agency of the scholars themselves, for the use of Schools and Families With an Introductory Essay on the Object and Importance of the Madras system of Education, a brief Exposition of the Principles on which it is founded, and an historical sketch of its Rise, Progress, and Results' The seventh edition of the latter work appeared in 1823 These will ever occupy a distinguished place in the educational department of our national literature Dr Bell died at Lindsay cottage, Cheltenham, January 27, 1832, and was buried in Westminster Abbey The committee of the National Society for the education of the poor passed the following resolution at its first meeting after his decease "That the committee having learnt that it has pleased Almighty God to remove from this present life the Rev Dr Bell, the superintendent of the Society's schools, deem it incumbent upon them to pay a public mark of respect to the memory of a man who may justly be regarded as the founder of a system of education, which, under the divine blessing, has been productive of incalculable benefits to this church and nation, and that, as it is understood that his remains are to be interred in Westminster Abbey, the secretary be directed to ascertain the day fixed for his interment, and communicate the same to the committee for the information of such members as may find it convenient to attend" In the funeral procession were the carriages of the archbishop of Canterbury, and of several bishops and persons of distinction

BELL, Benjamin, an eminent surgeon, the son of a respectable farmer, was born at Dumfries in 1749 His father, Mr George Bell, had in his youth been engaged in the Levant trade, but, having met with serious losses, and been made prisoner by the Spaniards, on his return to Scotland, he took a farm in Eskdale, belonging to the duke of Buccleuch, where he lived to an advanced age Benjamin received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of his native town the rector of which was Dr George Chapman, author of an esteemed work on education, who paid great attention to the classical instruction of his scholars The estate of Blackett House in Dumfries-shire, which for several centuries had belonged to his progenitors, having devolved on him on the death of his grandfather, he gave a remarkable instance of disinterested generosity by disposing of it, and applying the sum received for it in educating himself and the younger branches of the family—fourteen in number After serving his apprenticeship to Mr Hill, surgeon and apothecary in Dumfries, in 1766 he proceeded to Edinburgh, and entered upon his medical studies In due time he passed the usual examinations at Surgeons' Hall, and was admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh In 1770 he visited Paris and London, remaining in each capital for several months, in order to improve himself in surgery In 1772 he returned to Edinburgh, and immediately commenced his professional duties Both as a skilful operator and consulting surgeon, his reputation soon rose very high, and in a short time he was established in an extensive practice In 1778 he published the first volume of his System of Surgery The remaining volumes appeared at intervals, until the whole work was completed in six volumes 8vo, in 1788 For this work there was an extensive demand, and it reached to seven editions, the last of which was much improved, and had an additional volume In 1793 he published a treatise on Gonorrhœa, and in the year following a 'Treatise on Hydrocele,' but these were never very popular He died April 4, 1806 A portrait of him, from a painting by Sir Henry Raeburn, engraved by Beugo, appeared in the Scots Magazine for 1801 The subjoined is from Kay

BELL, John, of Antermony, a celebrated traveller, the son of Patrick Bell, who inherited that estate from an honourable line of ancestors, and of Anabel Stirling, daughter of Mungo Stirling of Craigbarnet, was born in the parish of Campsie, Stirlingshire, (where his paternal estate was situated,) in 1691 He received an excellent education, and having chosen the medical profession, he passed physician in the twenty-third year of his age He soon after resolved to travel Of his motives for doing so he has himself informed us, in the preface to his interesting book of travels, in which he says, "In my youth I had a strong desire of seeing foreign parts, to satisfy which inclination, after having obtained, from some persons of worth, recommendatory letters to Dr Areskine, chief physician and privy counsellor to the Czar Peter the First, I embarked at London in the month of July 1714, on board the Prosperity of Ramsgate, Captain Emerson, for St Petersburg" On Bell's arrival he was introduced to Peter the Great, who at that very time was preparing an embassy to Persia, and Dr Areskine having recommended him, as one skilled in surgery and physic, to Artemy Petrovich Valensky, the person chosen to go to the Persian court as Russian ambassador, he was immediately engaged as surgeon and physician to the expedition On the 15th July 1715 the embassy left St Petersburg "That city," he says, "which has since grown so considerable, was then in its infancy, having been founded only ten or eleven years before" They proceeded to Moscow, and thence to Cazan, where the severity of the weather compelled them to remain till June 4, 1716 They next sailed down the Wolga to Astracan, and then went by the Caspian sea to Derbent, and proceeded by Tarnus and Saba to Ispahan, where they arrived March 13, 1717 After remaining in that city about six months, they set out on their return to St Petersburg, which they reached December 30, 1718 In these long journeys Bell found ample gratification for his "strong desire of seeing foreign parts," as well as for his spirit of adventure, and, accordingly, the account which he published of the places he visited, and the scenes he passed through, is full of interest At the close of it he informs his readers, that in spite of the Swedish war, in which the Czar was then engaged, the Russian capital had been so improved and beautified during his absence, that he scarcely knew it again On his arrival he learnt, to his great grief, that his patron Dr Areskine, was dead, but Peter the Great being about to send a grand embassy to China, he was recommended by Valensky to Leoff Vasilovich Ismayluff, the ambassador appointed to go to Pekin, who readily engaged his services They departed from St Petersburg, July 14, 1719, and travelled by Moscow, and through Siberia and the great Tartar deserts, to the celebrated wall of China, arriving at Pekin "after a tedious journey of sixteen months" They quitted the Chinese capital March 2, 1721, and arrived at Moscow January 5, 1722 His account of this journey, and particularly his description of the manners, customs and superstitions of the Chinese, is the most interesting part of his book Peter the Great having concluded peace with Sweden, resolved to assist the Shah of Persia against the Afghans, who had invaded his territories, and seized upon Candahar and other provinces on the frontiers In May 1722, Bell, whose services were engaged in this expedition, accompanied the Czar and his empress with the army to Derbent, a celebrated pass between the foot of the Caucasus and the Caspian sea He returned to St Petersburg in December 1722 During their march homewards the Russians were much annoyed by the incessant attacks of the half-savage mountain tribes, and Peter and his empress were frequently exposed to great danger on the journey In his account of this expedition, Bell gives a brief but excellent description of Tzercassia, or Circassia Soon after, Mr Bell revisited his paternal estate in Scotland, where he resided for some time, and seems to have returned to St Petersburg about 1734 In 1737, in consequence of the war in which Russia was then engaged with Turkey, he was singled out as the fittest person to go to Constantinople to treat of peace, the Czar wishing to put an end to hostilities This mission he undertook at the desire of Count Osterman, grand chancellor of Russia, and of Mr Rondeau, British minister at the Russian court Quitting St Petersburg, December 6, 1737, he arrived at Constantinople with only one servant who could speak the Turkish language He returned to the Russian capital May 17, 1738 He seems to have afterwards settled as a merchant at Constantinople, where he continued for some years About 1746 he married Mary Peters, a Russian lady, and in 1747 returned to Scotland The latter part of his active life was spent in ease and affluence on his estate He is described as a warm-hearted and benevolent person, and such was his sincerity and good faith, that he obtained from his friends the title of "Honest John Bell" He died at Auchtermony, July 1, 1780, at the age of 89 Although fond of talking about his journeys and adventures, he does not seem to have had any desire to publish his travels, till urged to it by one distinguished friend In his preface, dated Oct 1, 1762, he tells us that about four years before, "spending some days at the house of a right honourable and most honoured friend," his travels became the subject of conversation, and he was pressed to prepare his work for publication, which he diffidently consented to The work, under the title of 'Travels from St Petersburg in Russia to Various Parts in Asia,' 2 vols 4to, was published by subscription in Glasgow in 1763 A writer in the Quarterly Review for 1817, who styles this work "the best model perhaps for travel-writing in the English language," adds in a note —"For many years after Mr Bell returned from his travels, he used to amuse his friends with accounts of what he had seen, refreshing his recollection from a simple diary of occurrences and observations The earl Granville, then president of the council, on hearing some of his adventures, prevailed on him to throw his notes together into the form of a narrative, which, when done, pleased him so much that he sent the manuscript to Dr Robertson, with a particular request that he would revise and put it into a fit state for the press The literary avocations of the Scottish historian at that time not allowing him to undertake the task, he recommended Mr Barron, a professor in the university of Aberdeen, and on this gentleman consulting Dr Robertson as to the style and the book of travels which he would recommend him to adopt for his guide, the historian replied, 'Take Gulliver's Travels for your model, and you cannot go wrong' He did so, and 'Bell's Travels' have all the simplicity of Gulliver, with the advantage which truth always carries over fiction" The latter part of this story is very unlikely The simplicity of the style is an evidence that the book was Bell's own composition Of Bell's work there have been various editions, and a French translation, including a Journal kept by M de Lange, attaché to the embassy to Pekin, was published on the continent, where it became very popular —M'Crie's History of Glasgow —Quarterly Review for 1817

BELL, JOHN, an eminent surgeon and anatomist, the first who, in Scotland, successfully applied the science of anatomy to practical surgery, was born in Edinburgh, May 12, 1763 His paternal grandfather was minister of Gladsmuir in East Lothian, and he was the second son of the Rev William Bell, who while very young, was induced to become a member, and afterwards a minister, of the episcopalian church in Edinburgh His mother was Miss Morrice, the grand-daughter of Bishop White There were eight children of the marriage, and of these four distinguished themselves in their respective professions, namely, his eldest brother, Robert Bell, Esq, Advocate, professor of conveyancing to the Society of Writers to the Signet, author of the Scots Law Dictionary, and of several other works on the law of Scotland, who died in 1816, John Bell, the subject of this article, George Joseph Bell, Esq, Advocate, professor of the Scots law in the university of Edinburgh, appointed one of the principal clerks of Session, in 1831, and author of Commentaries on the Law of Scotland, of whom a notice immediately follows, and Sir Charles Bell, F R S, London, a distinguished anatomist, a memoir of whom is also subsequently given

The following interesting anecdote is told, to account for John's being educated for the medical profession About a month before his birth, his father, then 59 years old, had submitted to an operation for the cure of stone, and his gratitude for the relief he had experienced led him to devote to the cause of medicine, and the benefit of mankind, the talent of the son, born while he was recovering from that severe malady John Bell, after receiving his education at the High School of Edinburgh, became the pupil of the late Mr Alexander Wood, surgeon there He entered on his medical studies with enthusiasm, and was soon distinguished for his attainments both in midwifery and chemistry The Edinburgh university at that period could boast of possessing some of the most accomplished professors in Europe Of these Dr Black, Dr Cullen, and the second Dr Monro, were the most eminent Bell studied anatomy under the latter, and it was while attending his classes that the idea of teaching the application of anatomy to surgery, a branch of medical instruction which was overlooked by Monro, first suggested itself to him Before entering on his professional career, he travelled for some time in Russia and the north of Europe On his return he began to lecture on surgery and anatomy In 1790 he built a theatre in Surgeons' Square, Edinburgh, where he carried on dissections, and laid the foundation of a museum This establishment of a separate school on his part was considered at the time as an encroachment on the rights of the professors In 1793 he published the first volume of his 'Anatomy of the Human Body,' consisting of a description of the Bones, Muscles, and Joints In 1797 appeared the second volume, containing the Heart and Arteries, and in 1802 the third volume, containing the Anatomy of the Brain, description of the course of the Nerves, and the Anatomy of the Eye and Ear Being in the habit of introducing into his lectures remarks derogatory to Dr Monro's eminence as an anatomist, as well as of criticising severely Mr Benjamin Bell's system of surgery, a pamphlet was published in 1799, entitled 'Review of the Writings of John Bell, Esq by Jonathan Dawplucker,' which, under the pretence of eulogising the first volume of his Anatomy, represented him as a plagiarist, and vindicated Dr Monro and Mr Benjamin Bell from his unfavourable observations The author of this pamphlet was supposed to be some friend of the latter Mr John Bell replied by publishing a second number of the Review, under the same name of Jonathan Dawplucker, addressed to Mr Benjamin Bell, in which he retaliated in a similar strain on the latter's system of surgery, which from that time quite lost its popularity with the students In 1796 he was induced, by the increase of his practice, to discontinue his lectures, in which his brother Charles had been for some time united with him, the one taking the surgical and the other the anatomical department About this time the dispute as to the right of the junior members of the College of Surgeons in Edinburgh to perform operations in the Royal Infirmary, engrossed the medical profession in that city almost exclusively, and led to much bad feeling among them By the new system adopted in the surgical attendance at the Infirmary, principally on the recommendation of Dr Gregory, Mr Bell, whose expertness as an operator was universally acknowledged, was with his pupils excluded from that institution To the memorial given in by Dr James Gregory to the managers of the Infirmary on this occasion, he wrote an answer which was published in 1800 He likewise made an appeal personally to the board of the Infirmary, at the same time producing, as evidence of the utility and necessity of his system of teaching, six folio books filled with surgical drawings and cases But his remonstrance proving ineffectual, he brought the question before the courts of law, whether the managers had the power to exclude him from the Infirmary, and it was decided against him In this unfortunate controversy both Dr Gregory and Mr Bell were indefatigable in writing against each other, the principal work produced by Bell on the subject being 'Letters on Professional Character and Manners,' addressed to Dr Gregory, and published at Edinburgh in 1810, which is conceived in a tone of great bitterness and sarcasm In 1798 he went to Yarmouth, and passed some weeks among the men belonging to Lord Duncan's fleet who had been wounded at Camperdown, applying himself with his accustomed activity to the cure of the sufferers In 1803, when Great Britain was threatened by Buonaparte with invasion, he made an offer to government for the embodying of a corps of young men to be instructed in military surgery, and in the duties of the camp and hospital, with the view of their being of service in defence of the country The offer was first accepted, but subsequently declined He now devoted himself with increased zeal to his practice, which was very extensive, his works and his high character as an operator and consulting surgeon having made his name celebrated not only in Great Britain, but on the continent In 1805 he married the daughter of Dr Congalton, a retired physician of Edinburgh, but had no family Early in 1816 he was thrown from his horse, and seems never to have entirely recovered from the effects of this accident His constitution was never very strong, and his health having very much declined, he was induced, in the autumn of that year, to travel on the continent After visiting Paris he proceeded to Italy, and ultimately arrived at Rome, where he died of dropsy, April 15, 1820, in the 57th year of his age In the course of his last journey he had made notes of his 'Observations on Italy,' which were published by his widow after his decease, edited by the late Bishop Sandford of Edinburgh This work shows that he possessed talents for general literature of a very superior order, which required only cultivation to have made him as eminent in this department as his professional attainments had rendered him distinguished in his own peculiar sphere

Mr Bell was under the middle size, but exceedingly well-proportioned He was of a generous disposition, lively temperament, and independent character In the fine arts his tastes had been highly cultivated His anatomical drawings were remarkable for the correctness and skill with which they were executed His musical parties were celebrated in their day Although his income was large, it was not sufficient for his style of living, which demanded an expenditure greater than his resources could at all times meet, hence he was sometimes placed in circumstances of great embarrassment Endowed with varied talents, and possessing great energy and industry, with uncommon facility in communicating his ideas, and singular acuteness and discrimination in availing himself of all knowledge essential to surgical science, this eminent man had yet little acquaintance with the world, and but small patience with the prejudices which society and the profession continued to retain Popular and eloquent as a lecturer, he was an entertaining and instructive writer, and an acute and powerful controversialist, though often severe and bitter in his remarks, even beyond his intention and wish

The Anatomy of the Human Body, vol i containing the Bones, Muscles, and Joints Edin 1793, 8vo Vol ii containing the Heart and Arteries Edin 1797, 8vo Vol iii containing the anatomy of the Brain, Description of the course of the Nerves, and the Anatomy of the Eye and Ear, 1803 Complete edition, with plates by Charles Bell, third edition, 1811, 8vo

BELL, GEORGE JOSEPH, author of 'Principles of the Law of Scotland,' and other legal works, a brother of the preceding, was born at Fountainbridge, near Edinburgh, on the 26th of March, 1770 He was educated at Edinburgh, and passed advocate in 1791 He early turned his attention to the study of mercantile law, a department of Scottish jurisprudence at that time almost unregarded His investigations, however, were not limited to the law of Scotland, as he applied his powerful mind to the thorough investigation of the principles of the mercantile jurisprudence of the empire, the value of which in connection with the growing commercial importance of Great Britain he clearly foresaw He was perhaps one of the greatest masters of commercial jurisprudence generally that ever lived, and in particular of that department of it relating to the laws of bankruptcy, and the various suggestions for their improvement, contained in his published and unpublished writings (which have in great part been adopted into the legislation of the country), claim the gratitude of posterity In 1822 he was chosen by the Faculty of Advocates to fill the chair of

Scots law in the university of Edinburgh As a Lecturer on Scots Law he was unsurpassed His style was terse and lucid in a remarkable degree In 1823 Mr Bell was appointed a member of the commission for inquiring into Scottish judicial proceedings He was selected by his colleagues to draw up their Report, and soon after he was called up to London in order to assist the Committee of the House of Lords in framing the bill Subsequently he was named member of a commission to examine into and simplify the mode of proceeding in the court of session The report of this commission was the groundwork of the Scottish Judicature Act, prepared by Mr Bell, by which many important changes were effected in the forms of process, the Jury Court, as a separate judicature being abolished, and conjoined with the Court of Session

In 1831 Mr Bell was appointed one of the principal clerks of session, and in 1833 he was named chairman of the Royal Commission to examine into the state of the law in general About the year 1831 he prepared a bill for the establishment of a Court of Bankruptcy in Scotland, and in his valuable notes accompanying the Bill for this Act he paved the way for the introduction of the institution of Bankruptcy courts with official assignees in the United Empire, by which already some millions have been saved to the commercial world He died 23d September, 1843 The following is a list of his works

A Treatise on the Laws of Bankruptcy in Scotland Edin 1804, 2 vols 8vo Enlarged edition, with the title Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland, and on the principles of Mercantile Jurisprudence, considered in relation to Bankruptcy, Compositions of Creditors, and Imprisonment for Debt Edin 1810, 4to, fifth edition, 1826, 2 vols 4to

Examination of the Objections stated against the Bill for better regulating the Forms of Process in the Courts of Scotland Edinburgh, 1825, 8vo

Principles of the Law of Scotland, for the use of Students in the University of Edinburgh Edin, 1829, 8vo The same Edin, 1830, 8vo Fourth edition Edin, 1839, 8vo

BELL, Sir Charles, a distinguished surgeon, lecturer, and medical writer, youngest brother of the preceding, and of John Bell the celebrated surgeon, was born in Edinburgh in 1778 He was educated at the High School of his native place, and, while yet a mere youth, he assisted his brother John in his anatomical demonstrations, and lectured to some hundreds of pupils on anatomy In 1799 he was admitted a member of the College of Surgeons, Edinburgh In the year previous, he had published the first part of his 'System of Dissections' He was soon afterwards appointed one of the surgeons of the Royal Infirmary, where, throughout all his connection with that hospital, he exhibited remarkable skill as an operator In 1806 he left Edinburgh for London, the latter being a wider and more promising field for professional exertion In 1811, he associated himself with Mr James Wilson, in the Hunterian school of Great Windmill Street, as a lecturer on anatomy and surgery, and afterwards succeeded to it altogether Here he officiated for some years with great success In 1814 he was elected one of the surgeons of Middlesex hospital, where, from the first week of his appointment, he delivered clinical lectures, which were spoken of with high approbation in the Medical Gazette, and obtained the spontaneous recommendation of many of the most distinguished physicians and surgeons of the metropolis This institution he raised to the highest repute, and on retiring from it in 1836, he justly boasted of leaving it with "full wards, and one hundred and twenty thousand pounds in the Funds"

Having long been anxious to make himself acquainted with the subject of gun-shot wounds, he twice relinquished his engagements in London, in order to obtain a knowledge of this department of practice One of those occasions was in 1809, immediately after the battle of Corunna, when the wounded, hurried home in transports, were landed on the southern coasts of England, and the other was after the battle of Waterloo, when he repaired to Brussels Of the former opportunity he particularly availed himself, and published a useful practical essay 'On Gun-shot Wounds,' as an Appendix to his 'System of Operative Surgery,' which appeared in two volumes in 1814 On occasion of his professional visit to Brussels, after the battle of Waterloo, he was put in charge of an hospital, and af forded his assistance to no fewer than 300 men "The drawings," says Mr Pettigrew, in his Medical Portrait Gallery, "with which he was thus enabled to enrich his portfolio, have been referred to as the finest specimens of water-colouring in the English anatomical school" In 1812 he was admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of London It is related, that on this occasion the examiners asked Mr Bell, with suitable gravity, what was his opinion of the probable fate of Napoleon Bonaparte, and immediately on receiving his answer, declared themselves satisfied "with the candidate's proficiency!"

The most important of his professional studies are those which relate to the 'Nervous System,' various papers on which from his pen were inserted in the 'Philosophical Transactions,' the first of which appeared in 1821 It was read before the Royal Society, and excited immediate attention The main views there laid down had been printed in a pamphlet entitled 'Idea of a New Anatomy of the Brain,' issued for distribution amongst his friends, in 1811 This was fortunate for Mr Bell, as various persons, recognising the value of his discovery, soon came forward to claim the merit of it The discovery was, indeed, a most important one, and is thus explained by the writer of his biography in the National Cyclopædia "Before the time of Bell, all nerves were held to be alike in character, and were considered simply to give more or less nervous susceptibility to any organ, in proportion to the numbers in which they were there distributed Bell discovered, and showed, that the nerves were naturally distinguished among themselves and clearly classified, and that the nerves of sense (whether peculiar or general), and those of motion, were totally distinct in their character and origin He, in fact, laid bare, for the first time, the great fact of a distinction existing in the nature and quality of the nervous energy, which, before his Discourses, had been all huddled together under one interpretation As respects the body and spinal marrow, Bell discovered a division of the nerves perfectly analogous to that detected by him in relation to the brain The common nerves distributed over the animal trunk fulfil the two grand functions of giving sensation and motion On cutting a spinal nerve, the older anatomists found both feeling and motion to be lost by the part which is thence supplied with nervous energy, and they concluded that the nerve carried both qualities conjointly But Bell looked deeper into the matter, and he was rewarded by the discovery that the two roots, by which the spinal nerves are connected with the vertebral medulla, derive and bear from them different qualities—the anterior root conveying the motor power, and the posterior that of sensation, or the sensor power Following up his inquiries, he discovered, likewise, the special nerve of respiration, and others with particular qualities, as to which before his time not even a conjecture had been made Before quitting this subject, in which Bell may be named as a discoverer equal even with Harvey, we ought to point to one of his practical inferences from his own views, which establishes the existence of a sixth sense—that by which we attain our knowledge of distance, size, weight, form, texture, and resistance of objects Two of his essays, 'On the Nervous Circle,' and 'On the Eye,' have reference to this theory The basis of it is, that the nerves of sensation play the part of reporters on the motor nerves, and indicate to the central seats of perception the condition of things within the influence of these nerves, thus forming the sixth or muscular sense"

In 1824, he was appointed senior professor of anatomy and surgery in the Royal College of Surgeons, London, and he subsequently became a member of the council At the request of Lord Brougham, he had written some papers on the animal economy, for 'The Library for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge,' which were published in 1828–29, and became deservedly popular, particularly his two dissertations on 'Animal Mechanics,' which had formed a portion of his lectures at the London College of Surgeons He afterwards edited, conjointly with his lordship, the illustrated edition of 'Paley's Evidences or Natural Religion,' published in 1836

On the accession of William the Fourth, in 1831, he was one of the five eminent men in science on whom the Guelphic Order of knighthood was conferred, the others being Sir John Herschel, Sir David Brewster, Sir John Leslie, and Sir James Ivory On the establishment of the London university, now University College, in 1826, the governors of the new institution offered to place Sir Charles at the head of their new medical school He accordingly delivered the general opening lecture in this section of the college, and followed it by a regular course of characteristic lectures on Physiology In a short time, however, he gave in his resignation, and confined himself to his practice, which, though very extensive, was chiefly in nervous affections By his valuable writings, the surgical knowledge of his time was much advanced, and his discoveries on the nervous system gave him a European fame

Sir Charles was one of the eight eminent men who were selected to write the celebrated Bridgewater Treatises, On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Works of Creation, his contribution being on 'The Hand, its mechanism and vital endowments, as evincing design,' which was published in 1834 For this work he received the premium of one thousand pounds

In 1836 he was elected professor of surgery in the university of Edinburgh, in the room of Dr Turner, when he removed to Edinburgh, having been absent from that city thirty years His opening lecture as surgical professor was numerously attended by professional and non-professional men of eminence, and he held that chair with great distinction till his lamented death The only great work which, in his later years, he was enabled to finish, was a new edition of his 'Anatomy of Expression,' largely increased and improved by his observations on an Italian journey undertaken by him in one of the intervals betwixt his sessions at college Sir Charles died suddenly of an attack of spasms of angina pectoris, to which he was subject, on the morning of April 28, 1842, at Hallow Park, near Worcester, the seat of Mrs Holland, with whom he and Lady Bell were making a short stay on their way to London His body was interred on the 2d of May in Hallow churchyard He was a Fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, and a member of some other learned bodies He married, in 1811, the second daughter of Charles Shaw, Esq of Ayr His wife survived him — Subjoined is a portrait of Sir Charles

BELL, HENRY, the first successful applier of steam to the purposes of navigation in Europe, was the fifth son of Patrick Bell, a mechanic, and was born at Torphichen, in the county of Linlithgow, April 7, 1767 He received what little education he ever possessed at the parish school, and in 1780 was sent to learn the art of a stone mason Disliking this employment, in 1783 he was bound apprentice to his uncle, a millwright in the neighbourhood He afterwards went to Borrowstounness, to be instructed in ship-modelling, and in 1787 he engaged with Mr James Inglis, engineer at Bell's Hill, with the view of completing his knowledge of mechanics Having subsequently repaired to London, he was for some time employed by the celebrated Mr Rennie About the year 1790 he returned to Glasgow, and for several years worked there as a house-carpenter In 1808 he removed to Helensburgh, nearly opposite Greenock, where, while his wife kept the principal inn, he employed himself chiefly in pursuing a series of mechanical projects and experiments, which generally ended in failure and disappointment, but he at last hit upon the important discovery of the successful application of steam to the purposes of navigation Dr Cleland, in his work on Glasgow, states, that it may be said, without the hazard of impropriety, that he "invented" the steam-propelling system, "for he knew nothing of the principles which had been so successfully followed out by Mr Fulton," a Scottish engineer in America, who, on Oct 3, 1807, launched his first steamboat on the Hudson In 1811, Bell caused a vessel, 40 feet in length, to be built on a plan entirely his own, which was named 'the Comet,' that year being remarkable for the appearance of a large comet He constructed the steam engine himself, and in January 1812, the first trial in Europe of a steam-vessel took place on the river Clyde Dr Cleland adds, "After various experiments, the Comet was at length propelled on the Clyde by an engine of three-horse power, which was subsequently increased to six Mr Bell continued to encounter and overcome the various and indescribable difficulties incident to invention, till his ultimate success encouraged others to embark in similar undertakings" Bell himself did not realize any advantages from his discovery In his old age he would have been in a very destitute condition, had it not been for the liberality of the citizens of Glasgow, and other places, who benevolently came to his aid A public subscription having been entered into on his behalf, a considerable sum was raised Besides this, he received from the trustees of the river Clyde an annuity of one hundred pounds, which he enjoyed for several years, and the half of which at his death was continued to his widow He died at Helensburgh, November 14, 1830

BELL, THOMAS, the Rev, author of several religious works, and father of James Bell, the geographical writer, was born at Moffat, December 24, 1733 After having studied at the university of Edinburgh, he was in 1767 licensed as a preacher by the presbytery of Relief, and the same year became the minister of the Relief congregation at Jedburgh In 1777 he obtained the pastoral charge of a congregation in the Relief communion in Glasgow, in which city he died, October 15, 1802 He published in 1780 a work entitled 'The Standard of the Spirit lifted up against the Enemy coming in like a Flood,' being the substance of several sermons preached at Glasgow In 1785 appeared 'A Proof of the true and eternal Godhead of the Lord Jesus Christ,' a translation from the Dutch He likewise translated a work from the Latin, 'On the Controversies agitated in Great Britain under the unhappy names of Antinomians and Neonomians,' with notes, which, with 'Sermons on various important Subjects,' and 'A View of the Covenants of Works and Grace,' were published at Glasgow after his death He left several works in manuscript

BELL, JAMES, an eminent geographical writer, son of the preceding, was born at Jedburgh in 1769 In 1777, he removed with his father to Glasgow, where he received a liberal education, and afterwards served his apprenticeship to the weaving business In 1790 he commenced trade on his own account, as a manufacturer of cotton goods upon a large and respectable scale, and with every prospect of success In consequence, however, of the mercantile depression that occurred in 1793, Mr Bell was obliged to give up business, and he subsequently acted for a number of years as a common warper in the warehouses of different manufacturers About the year 1806 he quitted the warping, and became a teacher of the classics to young men attending the university, which he continued for some years, he himself, with untiring zeal, pursuing at the same time a course of study in various branches, particularly in history, systematic theology, and especially in geography About the year 1815 he was engaged to edit a new edition of the Glasgow System of Geography, an original work in two volumes, which had met with deserved encouragement, and which was now, by his valuable additions and improvements, extended to five volumes This afterwards formed the basis of his principal work, 'A System of Popular and Scientific Geography,' which was published at Glasgow in six vols Previous to the latter publication he had brought out 'Critical Researches in Geography,' and also an elegant edition of Rollin's 'Ancient History,' copiously illustrated with notes Besides these works, he had commenced preparing a general gazetteer, upon a new and improved plan His Gazetteer of England and Wales was in course of publication at the time of his death He had resided for some years for the benefit of his health at Lukeston, near Campsie, where he died, May 3, 1833

BELLENDEN, Baron, a dormant title in the Scotch peerage since the death in 1805 of William, fourth duke of Roxburgh, seventh Lord Bellenden

On the 26th March, 1499, Patrick Bellenden, the ancestor of the Auchinoul family, obtained a charter from John, earl of Morton, of the lands of Auchnolnyshill in the county of Edinburgh, to him and his spouse, Mariota Douglas, and their heirs [Douglas' Peerage, vol i p 209] He had a son, Thomas, and a daughter, Catherine The latter married Oliver Sinclair, the favourite of King James the Fifth, and general of the Scottish army at the unfortunate rout of Solway in 1542

Thomas Bellenden of Auchinoul, the son, succeeded his father, and in 1535 he was appointed by James the Fifth a Judge of the Court of Session, which had been instituted only two years previously, his appointment taking place at the same time with that of Mr Arthur Boyce, brother of Henry Boyce, the historian On the 10th September, 1538, he was appointed director of Chancery, and on 26th December 1539 the king conferred on him the office of Justice Clerk, which was held after him by both his son and his grandson In January 1541 he and Henry Balnaves of Halhill were sent as commissioners to meet Sir William Eure, the English commissioner, for the settlement of some of the interminable disputes of the borders Writing to the keeper of the privy seal in England, 26th January of that year, Eure narrates some conversations which he had had with Bellenden, concerning the court and character of James the Fifth, and describes him as "a man of aged experience and eminent ability" [Pinkerton's Scotland, vol ii p 240] He died in 1546, leaving two sons, Sir John Bellenden and Patrick Bellenden designed of Stenhouse in Orkney, sheriff of Orkney

Sir John Bellenden of Auchinoul, the elder of the two brothers, was appointed Justice Clerk 25th June 1547, and according to Haig and Brunton he appears as an ordinary lord of session for the first time 4th July thereafter [Senators of the College of Justice, p 91] Douglas, however, states that he was not admitted a lord of session till 18th November 1554 [Peerage, vol i p 211] He had a charter to himself and Barbara Kennedy his wife, of certain lands in the regality and barony of Broughton, from Robert, commendator of Holyroodhouse, 1st May 1559 He was employed by the queen regent, Mary of Guise, as a mediator between her and the lords of the Congregation, but he soon joined the Reformers On the young queen Mary's arrival in Scotland in 1561, he was, 6th September of that year, sworn a privy councillor He obtained the office of usher of exchequer 31st May 1565 Being implicated in the assassination of Rizzio, he fled from Edinburgh, 18th March 1566, on the approach of Mary and Darnley at the head of an army, but was shortly afterwards restored to favour He carried Mary's commands to Mr John Craig to proclaim the banns of marriage between her majesty and Bothwell, and "had lang reasoning" with the kirk, "to induce them to obey the royal orders" [Keith's Hist, p 587] Notwithstanding this, he joined the association against the queen and Bothwell, and in consequence, on the imprisonment of Mary, he was continued in his office He was also one of the members of the privy council of the regent Murray, with whom he was a favourite He is said to have obtained the lands of Woodhouselee from Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, on condition of his procuring for that individual a remission for some crime which he had committed, a transaction which indirectly led to the assassination of Murray [See STUART, JAMES, earl of Murray] In the beginning of 1573, Sir John Bellenden was employed in framing and completing the well-known pacification of Perth According to Home of Godscroft, he was, the same year, occupied in the difficult task of convincing the General Assembly, on behalf of the regent Morton, that the supreme magistrate should be the head of the church as well as of the state The dispute, after being continued for twelve days, was adjourned "till a more convenient season" He died before

April 1577, and Thomas Bellenden of Newtyle was appointed a lord of session in his place Sir John Bellenden was twice married, first to Barbara, daughter of Sir Hugh Kennedy of Girvenmains, by whom he had two sons, Sir Lewis and Adam, and, secondly, to Janet Seton, said to be of the family of Touch, and by her he had three daughters, Elizabeth, the eldest, married, first, James Lawson of Humbie, secondly, Sir John Cockburn of Ormistoun, Lord Justice Clerk Margaret, the second daughter, married William Stewart, writer in Edinburgh, and was the mother of Sir Lewis Stewart of Kirkhill, the famous advocate, Marion, the youngest daughter, became the wife of John Ramsay of Dalhousie, but had no issue

The eldest son, Sir Lewis Bellenden of Auchinoul, was appointed Justice Clerk in 1578, the year following his father's death He was one of the conspirators in the treasonable affair known as the Raid of Ruthven, and Godscroft represents him as extremely violent on the occasion [p 366] He managed, however, to keep free of the ruin in which the other conspirators were involved, and on the 17th July 1584, he was appointed an ordinary lord of session, in place of Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington In 1585 he was resident in London from James the Sixth, when he was much in the interest of Queen Elizabeth [Robertson's History, vol ii p 301] He had a principal share in the downfall of Arran, and the return of the banished lords, although he had been despatched by the former, then ignorant of his intentions, to accuse the latter at the court of Elizabeth He was at Stirling the same year (1585) when, as had been agreed upon, the banished lords surprised the king and Arran there The latter intended to have slain the Justice Clerk, the Master of Gray, and the Secretary, "but they drew to their armes, and stude on their awn defence" In 1589 he accompanied James on his matrimonial excursion to Norway, and in the following spring he was sent as ambassador to the court of Elizabeth, probably to notify the nuptials Among other charters of lands which he obtained was one of the barony of Broughton and other lands erected into a free barony, 15th August 1591 He died the same month and year By his wife, Margaret, second daughter of William, sixth lord Livingstone, he had Sir James, his heir, and Mariota, married to Patrick Murray of Fallahill, ancestor of Philiphaugh His widow afterwards married Patrick Stewart, second earl of Orkney

Adam Bellenden, the brother of Sir Lewis, was bishop of Aberdeen He was, first, minister of Falkirk, in 1608 In 1615 he was promoted to the see of Dunblane, and in 1635 was transferred to that of Aberdeen In 1638 he was deprived of his bishopric, on the overthrow of episcopacy by the Glasgow Assembly, after which he retired to England, where he soon after died [Keith's Scottish Bishops, p 132]

Scott of Scotstarvet states that Sir John Bellenden by a third marriage had another son, named Thomas, to whom he left the barony of Carlowrie and Kilconquhar in Fife, with certain other lands about Brechin, and that he was drowned in the loch of Kilconquhar [Staggering State, p 131] A Thomas Bellenden was admitted an ordinary lord of session 14th August 1591, but does not seem to have retained his seat long, as his place was declared vacant on the 17th November following Scotstarvet's statement is evidently a mistake, as the oldest tombstone in the churchyard of Kilconquhar, bearing an inscription, is upon the grave of William (not Thomas) Bellenden, laird of Kilconquhar, who was drowned while skating on the loch, 28th February 1593, aged twenty-eight years [New Statistical Account, vol ii p 317] According to Scotstarvet, his son dying young, the estate went to Adam, bishop of Aberdeen, who sold it to Sir John Carstairs He says also that Sir John Bellenden, his father, was archdeacon of Murray and canon of Ross, but this was a different person from Sir John Bellenden of Auchinoul Of this John Bellenden a notice is given below

Sir Lewis' son, Sir James Bellenden of Broughton, married Margaret, daughter of Sir William Ker of Cessford, and sister of Robert first earl of Roxburgh, by whom he had a son, Sir William, and a daughter, Margaret, married to the Hon Henry Erskine, third son of John, seventh earl of Mar and mother of David Lord Cardross, ancestor of the earl of Buchan, heir of line of the Bellenden family Sir James Bellenden died 8d November 1606

His son, Sir William Bellenden of Broughton, was treasurer depute in the reign of Charles the Second During the civil wars he adhered to the royal cause, and was created a peer by patent dated at Whitehall 10th June 1661, by the title of Lord Bellenden of Broughton, and sworn a privy councillor He adopted John Ker, fourth son of William, second earl of Roxburgh, and settled his estate upon him On the death of his lordship, unmarried, in 1670, Ker assumed the name and arms of Bellenden, and inheriting the estate and honours, became second lord Bellenden William, the seventh lord, succeeded, as heir of entail, to the dukedom of Roxburgh on the death, without issue, of the third duke, and on his own death, in 1805, the title of Lord Bellenden became dormant, and is claimed by Mr Thomas Bellenden Drummond [See ROXBURGH, duke of]

The hart's head carried by the Bellendens of Broughton, the armorial bearing of the abbacy of Holyroodhouse, and the baronies belonging thereto, as the Canongate and Broughton, was assumed by them on account of the last barony

BELLENDEN, or BALLANDEN, sometimes written BALLENTYNE, JOHN, archdeacon of Moray and canon of Ross, often confounded with Sir John Bellenden of Auchinoul, a distinguished lawyer, referred to in the above article, is supposed to have been a native of the county of Haddington or Berwick, and appears to have been born towards the close of the 15th century The exact year of his birth is uncertain, and very little is known of his personal history He received the first part of his education at the university of St Andrews, where a student of his name, described as belonging to the Lothian nation, was matriculated in 1508 He completed his studies at Paris, and took the degree of D D at the Sorbonne He returned to Scotland during the minority of James V, with whom he became a great favourite, and at whose command he was employed in 1530 and in 1531 in translating from the Latin into the Scottish vernacular, 'The History and Chroniklis of Scotland,' being the first seventeen books of Hector Boece, which had been published in Paris in 1526 Some writers assert that he had the superintendence of the education of his young sovereign, but this is evidently a mistake, his office in the royal household being clerk of the accounts The manuscript copy of his translation was delivered to the king in the summer of 1533 Into this work he introduced two poems of some length, entitled 'The Proheme of the Cosmographe,' which is the most poetical of his works, and 'The Proheme of the History' He closed the whole by a prose 'Epistil direckit be the Translatoure to the Kingis Grace' According to Mackenzie, this work was printed in 1536 The book bears to be "imprentit in Edinburgh be me, Thomas Davidson, prentar to the Kyngis nobyle Grace" An elegant edition of this translation, edited by Mr Maitland, was published in 1821 by Mr William Tait of Edinburgh

Bellenden seems to have been dismissed from the king's service, as we learn from the Proheme of the Cosmographe

"And fyrst occurrit to my remembring
How that I wes in service with the kyng,
Put to his grace in zeris tenderest,
Clerk of his compts, thoucht I wes inding,
With hart and hand, and euery other thing
That mycht hym pleis in ony manner best,
Quhill he may me from his service lest,
Be thaym that had the court in gouerning
As bird but plumes heryit of the nest"

He is supposed afterwards to have entered into the service of Archibald, earl of Angus, because a person of the same name was the earl's secretary in 1528, but this individual is stated by Hume to have been Sir John Bellenden, with whom his name has so frequently been mistaken [History of the Houses of Douglas and Angus, p 258] He was soon afterwards an attendant at court, and at the request of the king he translated the first five books of Livy's Roman History, and from the manuscript copy preserved in the Advocates' Library, his version was printed in 1822 by Mr Maitland In the treasurer's book there are various entries of the sums paid to Bellenden, "be the Kingis precept," for these translations He seems to have received in all £114, that is, £78 for the translation of Boece, and £36 for that of Livy Nor was this the whole of his remuneration He received from the king the archdeaconry of Moray, during the vacancy of the see, and two clergymen, of the names of John Duncan and Alexander Harvey, having solicited the Pope in favour of James Douglas, were convicted of treason, and their property escheated to the Crown The annual emoluments arising from the pensions and benefices of Duncan, who was parson of Glasgow, and from all the property belonging to Alexander Harvey for the two years 1536 and 1537, were bestowed upon Bellenden, he paying a composition, for the first grant, of 350 merks, and for the second of 300 It is supposed that about the same period he was appointed a canon of Ross In the succeeding reign, being strongly attached to the Roman catholic religion, he opposed the progress of the Reformation Afterwards quitting Scotland, upon what account we are not informed, he visited Rome, where he died in 1550 John Bellenden has been eulogised as one of the greatest scholars of his time Sir David Lindsay, in a poem supposed to have been written in the year 1530, thus mentions him

'Bot now of late is starte up haistelie
Ane cunnyng clark quhilk wrytith craftelie, Ane plant of poetis callit Ballendyne,
Quhose ornat warkis my wit can nocht defyne
Get he into the court auctoritie,
He will precell Quintyn and Kennedie'

Many of his original compositions have been lost "He was unquestionably," says Dr Campbell, "a man of great parts, and one of the finest poets his country had to boast So many of his works remain as fully prove this, in as much as they are distinguished by that noble enthusiasm which is the very soul of poetry" In the 'Proheme of the Cosmographe' the principal incidents are borrowed from the ancient allegory of the Choice of Hercules His poem entitled 'Vertue and Vyce' was also addressed to James V Some specimens of Bellenden's style will be found in Carmichael's 'Collection of Scottish Poems'—Irving's Scottish Writers

He is likewise author of several poems in MS Two copies of his unpublished prolusion on the conception of Christ are to be found in Bannatyne's MS, from which Allan Ramsay published his Evergreen

BELLENDEN, WILLIAM, an author eminent for his learning, was, in 1602, professor of humanity in the university of Paris, and, according to Dempster, advocate in the parliament there He appears to have been the son of John Bellenden of Lasswade, near Edinburgh, and is supposed to have been born between 1550 and 1560 Dempster also states that both Queen Mary and James the Sixth employed him in some diplomatic services, and that the latter nominated him master of requests, or examiner of petitions As he spent the greater part of his life in France, this appointment must have been a sinecure As he practised at the bar, says Dr Irving, his early education must have been French, and as he was a regent or professor in one of the colleges, he may be supposed to have adhered to the Popish religion After the massacre of St Bartholomew, which had proved fatal to Ramus and other men of learning, there probably had been no Protestant professor in any college in Paris His nephew, William Bellenden, was a popish priest Anxious to return to Scotland, he addressed a French letter to the King, with the object of obtaining some regular establishment at court, but his application seems to have been unsuccessful His death is supposed to have taken place before 1630

Bellenden's first work, published in 1608, was entitled 'Ciceronis Princeps,' being a selection of passages from the works of Cicero on the duties of a prince To this was prefixed an original essay, entitled 'Tractatus de Processu et Scriptoribus Rei Politicæ' His next treatise, entitled 'Ciceronis Consul, Senator, Senatusque Romanus,' consisting, like the former, of passages from Cicero, regarding the duties of consul, senator, and senate, among the Romans, appeared in 1612, and was dedicated to Henry Prince of Scotland and Wales The most original of his works, styled 'De Statu prisci Orbis in Religione, Re Politica, et Literis,' was printed in Paris in 1615, dedicated to Charles Prince of Wales, his brother Henry being now dead The work describes the first origin of states, their progress in politics, philosophy, and religion, and in what respects they differ from each other These three treatises were, in 1616, collected into a volume, bearing the title of 'De Statu, Libri Tres' The last book published by himself consisted only of two short Latin poems He had commenced another work of a very elaborate nature, intended to be finished in three parts, one of which only was completed, under the name of 'De Tribus Luminibus Romanorum,' whom he conceives to be Cicero, Seneca, and the elder Pliny, it was published in 1633 or 1634, some years after the author's death It extends to 824 pages, closely printed, and gives a comprehensive account of the history of Rome, from the foundation of the city to the time of Augustus, in the precise words of Cicero, as extracted from his writings From this work, Dr Conyers Middleton, keeper of the library of Cambridge university, borrowed, without acknowledgment, the matter and arrangement of his 'Life of Cicero,' a barefaced plagiarism which was deservedly exposed by Warton and Dr Samuel Parr, the latter of whom, in 1787, brought out an edition of Bellenden's 'De Statu, Libri Tres,' with a Latin preface of some length —Irving's Scottish Writers

The following is a catalogue of William Bellenden's writings

BERNARD, abbot of Arbroath, in 1303, the first chancellor of Robert the Bruce after his elevation to the throne in 1306, is supposed to have composed the remonstrance, so remarkable in the history of Scotland, which, in 1320, was sent by the Scottish nobility to the Pope He held the great seal till his death in 1327 Crawford supposes the abbot's surname to have been Linton

BERRIEDALE, Lord, the second title of the noble family of Sinclair, earls of Caithness, from the district of Berriedale or Berrindale in Caithness shire See CAITHNESS, earl of

BERRY, WILLIAM, an ingenious artist, was born about the year 1730 He was bred to the business of a seal engraver, having served his apprenticeship with a Mr Bolton of Edinburgh On commencing business on his own account, he soon became distinguished for the superiority of his workmanship, particularly for the elegance of his designs, and the clearness and sharpness of his mode of cutting coats of arms and other devices For many years he did not attempt any thing higher in his art than the common routine of the trade at the time His first essay in the style of the antique intaglios was a head of Sir Isaac Newton, which he executed with astonishing precision and delicacy Nevertheless, the greater part of his life was occupied in cutting armorial bearings, as he found a greater demand in this branch of the art than for fine heads, and there were very few that could afford to pay the price During the course of his life, he did not execute more than a dozen heads in all, any one of which was sufficient to insure him lasting fame Among these were Thomson the poet, Mary queen of Scots, Oliver Cromwell, Julius Cæsar, a young Hercules, and Hamilton of Bangour Of these, only two were copies from the antique, and they were executed in the finest style of the art Wherever these heads were known, they were admired as superior to anything produced in modern times Pickler, a famous artist in the same line at Rome, who had had more practice, was the only person that could be compared to him, but each, in the true spirit of genius, gave the palm of superiority to the other

Berry possessed not merely the art of imitating busts or figures set before him, but he could execute with fidelity a figure in relievo, copied from a drawing or painting upon a flat surface, as was proved with the head he executed of Hamilton of Bangour, who had been dead for some years, and which he finished from an imperfect sketch, being all the likeness that remained of him Besides these heads he executed some full-length figures both of men and other animals, in a style of superior elegance But the interests of his family made him pursue rather the more lucrative employment of cutting heraldic seals, which may be said to have been his constant employment for forty years In this department he was, without dispute, the first artist of his time The following anecdote is told of his excellence in this branch of art Henry, duke of Buccleuch, on succeeding to his estate, was desirous of having a seal cut with his arms, &c, properly blazoned upon it But as there were no less than thirty-two compartments in the shield, which was of necessity confined to a very small space, so as to leave room for the supporters, and other ornaments, within the compass of a seal of an ordinary size, he found it a matter of great difficulty to get it executed Though a native of Scotland himself, his grace never expected to find a man of first rate eminence in Edinburgh, but applied to the most celebrated seal engravers in London and Paris, all of whom declined it, as a thing exceeding their power to execute At this the duke was highly disappointed and having expressed to a gentleman, who was on a visit to him, the vexation he felt on this occasion, his visitor asked if he had applied to Mr Berry "No," said his grace, "I did not think I should find any one in Edinburgh who could execute a task that exceeded the powers of the first artists in London and Paris" The gentleman advised his grace to take it to Berry, who, he would undertake, could execute it The duke accordingly went to Edinburgh with his visitor next morning, and called upon Mr Berry, whom he found, as usual, sitting at his wheel Without introducing the duke, or saying anything particular to Berry, the gentleman showed him an impression of a seal that the duchess dowager had got cut many years before by a Jew in Lon don, who was dead, and which had been shown to the others as a pattern, asking him if he could cut a seal the same as that After examining it a little, Berry answered readily that he could The duke, pleased and astonished at the same time, exclaimed, "Will you, indeed!" Berry, who thought this implied a doubt of his abilities, was a little piqued at it, and turning round to the duke, whom he had never seen before, said, "Yes, Sir, if I do not make a better seal than this, I shall take no payment for it" His grace, highly pleased, left the pattern with him, and went away The pattern seal contained indeed the various devices on the 32 compartments, distinctly enough to be seen, but none of the colours were expressed Berry, in due time, finished the seal, on which the figures were not only done with superior elegance, but the colours on every part so distinctly marked, that a painter could delineate the whole, or a herald blazon it, with the most perfect accuracy For this extraordinary exertion of talent he charged no more than thirty-two guineas, though the pattern seal had cost seventy-five! Notwithstanding his great talents, his unequalled assiduity, and the strict economy observed in his family, his circumstances were far from affluent He was highly respected on account of the integrity of his character, and his strict principles of honour He married a daughter of Mr Andrew Anderson of Dressaling, by whom he had a numerous family He died July 3, 1783, in the 53d year of his age

BETHUNE, or BEATON, a surname of French origin, which belonged to an illustrious house in France, from which sprung the duke de Sully the celebrated minister of Henry IV It was derived from Bethune, a town in French Flanders The Bethunes came into England with William the Conqueror One of them was the companion of Richard Cœur de Lion, on his return from the Holy Land, and was made prisoner along with him by the duke of Austria Duchesne, in his 'Histoire de la Maison de Bethune,' derives the Scottish branch from a certain Jacobin de Bethune, who, he says, came to Scotland about 1448, but there are authentic documents to prove that the family were settled in this country as early as 1165 In the end of the reign of William the Lion, or beginning of that of his son, Alexander the Second, Robert de Beton is witness to a charter by Rogerus de Quincy, comes de Wincestre (incorrectly called Winton and sometimes Wigton, in the current genealogies of ancient families), constabularius Scotie, to Severus de Seton, of an annuity out of the mln and mln lands of Travernent or Tranent In a charter of mortification of lands "in territorio de Kermuir" (now Kirriemuir) in the county of Angus, to the monks of Aberbrothwick, David de Beton and Joannes de Beton are witnesses It was in that county that the family of the Bethunes then had their principal possessions The chief of them was the laird of Westhall, of whom the rest are descended In the beginning of the reign of Alexander the Third, about 1250, Dominus David de Betun and Robertus de Betun are, with several others, witnesses to a charter of Christiana de Valoines, Lady Panmure, to John Lydell, of the lands of Balbamin and Panlathine Among those who swore fealty to Edward the First of England, and were present at the discussion of the pleas for the crown of Scotland betwixt John Baliol and Robert Bruce was Robert de Betune [See Prynne's History], and amongst the seals, yet preserved, that are appended to King Edward's decision 1292, is "sigillum Roberti de Betune de Scotia, which is a fesse, and on a chief a file of three pendants" Several of this name are witnesses to charters by Duncan earl of Fife

David de Betun, miles, and Alexander de Betun, were at the parliament held at Cambuskenneth, 6th November 1314, and to the act of forfeiture passed in that parliament is appended one of their seals, which is the same coat of arms that is on the forementioned seal of Robert de Betune Alexander de Bethune continued faithful to the family of Bruce, and was knighted for his valour He was slain in the battle of Dupplin 12th August, 1332

As stated in the article on the surname of Balfour [which see, ante, page 208, first column], in the fifth year of the reign of Robert the Second, Robert de Bethune, styled "familiarius regis," a younger son of the above-named Sir Alexander, married the daughter and heiress of Sir John Balfour of that ilk, and his son succeeding to the estate, the family was afterwards designed Bethune of Balfour Of that family several of the Fife heritors were descended, and James Bethune, archbishop of St Andrews and chancellor of Scotland, his nephew Cardinal Bethune, and the cardinal's nephew, James Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow, were all sons of this house of Balfour Notices of these three remarkable personages follow this article in their order In all our histories the name is incorrectly spelled Beaton The descendants of the family prefer it in its original and more illustrious form of Bethune

In the reign of James the Fourth, the estate of Creich in the parish of that name in Fife was acquired by Sir David Bethune, second son of Sir John Bethune of Balfour and Marjory Boswell, daughter of the laird of Balmuto Sir David was brought up from his youth with James the Fourth, who held him in great favour He was first appointed comptroller of the exchequer, and subsequently lord high treasurer of the kingdom, which office he retained till his death [Crawford's Officers of State, p 368] He acquired the lands of Creich from the Littles or Liddels, in 1502 He married a daughter of Duddingston of Sandford in Fife Janet, their elder daughter, from whom many of the chief nobility and gentry in Scotland are descended, was married first to Sir Thomas Livingston of Easter Wemyss, and after his death she became the third wife of James, the first earl of Arran of the Hamiltons, and nephew of King James the Third Her eldest son by the latter marriage was James, second earl of Arran and duke of Chatelherault, who became regent of the kingdom Mary, the younger daughter, married Lord Lyle This Sir David Bethune was an uncle of the cardinal, being a younger brother of his father, the laird of Balfour

His son and heir, Sir John Bethune the second proprietor of Creich of the name of Bethune married Janet Hay, daughter of John Hay, provost of Dundee, and niece of the laird of Naughton in Fifeshire, by whom he had four sons and seven daughters Janet, their eldest daughter, married, first, the laird of Cranston, secondly, the laird of Craigmillar, and

thirdly, Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, ancestor of the dukes of Buccleuch [see BUCCLEUCH, duke of] To her last husband she bore four daughters She appears to have been a woman of a masculine spirit, as she rode at the head of the clan when called out to avenge the death of Buccleuch "She possessed also," says Sir Walter Scott, "the hereditary abilities of her family in such a degree that the superstition of the vulgar imputed them to supernatural knowledge' This belief in her witchcraft and the spirit of faction led to the foul accusation against her of having instigated Queen Mary to the murder of her husband This daughter of the house of Creich has become familiarly known from the prominent place she occupies in Sir Walter Scott's poem of the Lay of the Last Minstrel A copy of a letter of hers, to the queen-regent, Mary of Guise, is published in the Maitland Club Miscellany Sir John Bethune was keeper of the palace of Falkland, as his father had been, and steward of Fife, during part of the reign of James the Fifth

He was succeeded by his eldest son, David, who died, unmarried, in 1589, when the second son, Robert Bethune, inherited the family estate The latter was early attached to the royal household, and attended the young queen, Mary, to France as a page On her return to Scotland in 1561, he was appointed master of the household, heritable steward of Fife, and keeper of Falkland palace He married a French lady, Joanna Renwall or Gryssoner, a maid of honour to the queen By her he had two sons and eight daughters His eldest daughter, Mary Bethune, was one of the queen's "four Maries," whose extraordinary beauty has been nearly as much celebrated as her own An original portrait of Mary Bethune, in full court dress, is still preserved at Balfour house in Fife, as is also one of the Cardinal She married, in 1566, Alexander Ogilvy of Boyne, the representative of an old and respectable branch of the noble family of Findlater Both she and her husband were alive in 1606 The marriage contract between these parties has been published by the Maitland Club, in Part I of their Miscellany It is subscribed by the queen and Henry Darnley, and by the earls of Huntly, Argyle, Bothwell, Murray, and Athol, as cautioners for the bridegroom, by Ogilvy himself as Boyne and by Mary Bethune The signatures of the bride's father and Michael Balfour of Burleigh, his cautioner, are wanting The beauty of Mary Bethune has been celebrated by George Buchanan in his Valentinana.

David Bethune, the eldest son of Robert, succeeded him as fifth proprietor of Creich He married Euphan P B Leslie, daughter of the earl of Rothes, by whom he had an only daughter, but being desirous that the estate of Creich should continue to be possessed only by those of the name of Bethune, he disponed it to his brother, James, parson of Roxburgh, who married, first, Helen Leslie, heiress of Kinnaird, and after her death, Margaret Wemyss, eldest daughter of David Wemyss of that ilk, from whom it is said the earls of Wemyss are descended Their eldest son and grandson succeeded to the estate as the seventh and eighth proprietors

The latter, David Bethune, married Lady Margaret Cunninghame third daughter of the eighth earl of Glencairn, but she having no family to him, and his brother William having no male children, he sold the estate of Creich to James Bethune, then fiar of Balfour, reserving to himself the liferent of the most part, and to his lady the liferent of thirty-two chalders of victual Lamont, in his Diary of Fife, mentions that this laird of Creich, soon after disponing his property, died at his dwelling-house at Denbough, 4th March 1660 The estate was afterwards united to that of Balfour

During the period in which the Bethunes of Creich flourished probably no family of their rank in Scotland formed so great a number of matrimonial connexions with the noble and more powerful families of the kingdom than did its members.

BETHUNE, BEATON, or BETON, JAMES, Archbishop of St Andrews in the reign of James V, was the sixth and youngest son of John Bethune of Balfour, by Mary, daughter of Sir David Boswell of Balmuto Being a younger brother, he was early destined for the church, and, while yet young, was by the earl of Angus appointed provost of the collegiate church of Bothwell He received his first benefice in 1503, and next year was advanced to the rich preferment of abbot of Dunfermline, or Dumferling, as it was then called In 1505, upon the death of his brother, Sir David Bethune, the king bestowed upon him the staff of the high treasurer, and he was thereafter considered one of the principal ministers of state In 1508 he was promoted to the bishopric of Galloway, and before he had held that see a year, he was made archbishop of Glasgow, on which he resigned the treasurer's staff, that he might have more leisure to attend to his diocese It does not appear that he had any share in the counsels that drove King James IV into a war with England, which led to the fatal and disastrous battle of Flodden Field, where that unfortunate monarch was slain On the king's death, the regent duke of Albany appointed Archbishop Bethune to be high chancellor, and gave him for the support of his dignity the two rich abbeys of Kilwinning and Arbroath, which he held with his archbishopric in commendam, and by this means drew him over from the faction of the Douglas to his own party In 1517, on the duke of Albany going to France, the archbishop was appointed one of the governors of Scotland, but the kingdom was in such confusion, that they were glad to devolve their whole power upon the earl of Arran A convention of estates being summoned to meet at Edinburgh, April 29, 1520, the earl of Arran, with the chief of the western nobility, assembled together in the archbishop's house, at the bottom of Blackfriars Wynd, where they resolved to apprehend the earl of Angus, alleging that his power was so great, that so long as he was free, they could not have a free parliament Angus, informed of their design, sent his uncle, Douglas, bishop of Dunkeld, to the archbishop, offering, if he had failed in any point of his duty, to submit himself to the convention then about to meet, and the bishop earnestly recommended a compromise to prevent the effusion of blood Bethune, who had put armour on under his cassock, laid the blame wholly on the earl of Arran, but concluded with saying, "There is no remedy! Upon my conscience, I cannot help it" And striking his breast with his hand, to give force to his asseveration, his concealed coat of mail rattled so loud as to be heard by Bishop Douglas, who exclaimed, "How now, my lord, methinks your conscience clatters, we are priests, and to put on armour, or to bear arms, is not consistent with our character," and so left him The two factions having come to an engagement in the streets, Arran's party were defeated, when the archbishop fled for sanctuary to the church of the Blackfriars, and was taken out from behind the altar, part of his dress being torn, and would certainly have been slain, had not the bishop of Dunkeld interceded for him In 1523 he was appointed archbishop of St Andrews by the duke of Albany, who had returned from France two years before and resumed the regency On the abrogation, soon after, of the regent's power by parliament, the earl of Angus having placed himself at the head of the government, the archbishop was dismissed the court, and obliged to resign the office of chancellor When the Douglases were driven from court, the archbishop came again into power, but did not recover the office of chancellor He now resided principally at the palace of St Andrews, where at the instigation of his nephew, the cardinal, he proceeded violently to persecute the protestants, and caused Patrick Hamilton, the protomartyr of Scotland, a young man of piety, talents, and noble birth, to be burned to death The sentence was subscribed by the two archbishops, three bishops, six abbots and friars, and eight divines It is stated that the archbishop was himself averse to these severities, and the following two stories are told to show that he was not naturally inclined to such proceedings It happened that, at one of the consultations of the clergy, some vehemently pressed for the continuance of rigorous measures against all who preached the reforming doctrines, when one Mr John Lindsay, a man in great credit with the archbishop, said, "If you burn any more of them, take my advice, and burn them in cellars, for I dare assure you, that the smoke of Mr Patrick Hamilton has infected all that it blew upon" The other case was of a more serious nature One Alexander Seton, a Black Friar, preached openly in the church of St Andrews, that, according to St Paul's description of bishops, there were no bishops in Scotland, which being reported to the primate, not in very precise terms, he sent for Seton, and reproved him sharply for having said, according to his information, "That a bishop who did not preach was but a dumb dog, who fed not the flock, but fed his own belly" Seton said that those who had reported this were liars, upon which witnesses were produced, who testified very positively to the words having been uttered On which Seton, in reply, delivered himself thus "My lord, you have heard, and may consider, what ears these asses have, who cannot discern between Paul, Isaiah, Zechariah, Malachi, and Friar Alexander Seton In truth, my lord, I did preach that Paul saith, it behoveth a bishop to be a teacher Isaiah saith, that they that feed not the flock are dumb dogs, and the prophet Zechariah saith, that they are idle pastors Of my own head I affirmed nothing, but declared what the Spirit of God before pronounced, at whom, my lord, if you be not offended, you cannot justly be offended with me" How much soever the bishop might be incensed, he dismissed Friar Seton without punishment, who soon after fled out of the kingdom The archbishop in future, instead of acting himself, granted commissions to those who were more inclined to proceed against such as preached the doctrines of the Reformation, which seems to justify the remark of Spottiswood "Seventeen years," says that writer, "he lived bishop of this see, and was herein most unfortunate, that, under the shadow of his authority, many good men were put to death for the cause of religion, though he himself was neither violently set, nor much solicitous, as it was thought, how matters went in the church" He had, in fact, committed the charge of all church matters to his nephew the cardinal For the promotion of learning, he founded the New College in the university of St Andrews, which he did not live to finish, and to which he left the best part of his estate, but, after his death, it was misapplied, and did not come, as he intended, to that foundation One of the last acts of his life was the being present at the baptism of the young prince, born at St Andrews the very year in which he died The king retained to the last so great an affection for the archbishop, that he allowed him to dispose of all his preferments as he thought proper He died in 1539, and was interred in the cathedral church of St Andrews, before the high altar, having held the primacy of Scotland sixteen years —Keith's Scottish Bishops —Pitscottie's History

BETHUNE, BEATON, or BETON, David, cardinal, primate, and lord high chancellor of Scotland, nephew of the preceding, was the third son of John Bethune of Balfour, elder brother of the archbishop, by Isobel, daughter of David Monypenny of Pitmilly He was born at the mansion-house of Balfour in 1494, and in October 1511 became a student at the university of St Andrews He was afterwards sent to Paris, where he studied theology and the canon and civil laws for some years In due time he entered into holy orders, and was preferred by his uncle to the rectory of Campsie in Stirlingshire, in the diocese of Glasgow In 1519 the duke of Albany, regent during the minority of James V appointed him resident for Scotland at the French court In 1523 his uncle, being translated from Glasgow to St Andrews, and become primate of Scotland, resigned in his favour the abbey of Aberbrothwick, or Arbroath, retaining for himself one half of the rents thereof On his return to Scotland in 1525, he took his place in parliament as superior of the abbey of Arbroath, the yearly revenues of which exceeded £10,000 sterling of our money In October 1527, as we learn from Pitcairn's 'Criminal Trials,' John Bethune of Balfour, and others, having been indicted for an assault upon the sheriff of Fife, and bail found for their appearance, the abbot of Arbroath became bound to relieve John Wardlaw of Torry of the cautionary obligation In 1528 he was appointed by the young king, to whom he had recommended himself by his address and abilities, lord privy seal, in the place of the bishop of Dunkeld He is said to have been the adviser of James in instituting the college of justice, or court of session, in 1530, the idea of which was suggested by the constitution of the parliament of Paris In February 1533, Bethune, now prothonotary public, was sent ambassador to France, with Sir Thomas Erskine, to obtain a renewal of the ancient league between the two nations, and to negotiate a marriage between James and the Princess Magdalene His skilful penetration enabled him to transmit to James much important intelligence respecting the plans of his uncle Henry VIII, by which he avoided a serious quarrel with the English monarch He returned to Scotland with James V and his young queen whom he had married in France, January 1, 1537 On Queen Magdalene's death, of consumption, on the 7th July following, he was again sent to France to negotiate a second marriage of James with Mary, daughter of the Duke of Guise, widow of the duke of Longueville Returning with the princess, he solemnized the marriage in the cathedral church of St Andrews It is supposed that when he was in France on this occasion, he procured the papal bull, dated February 12, 1537 for the erection of St Mary's college, St Andrews In November of the same year, Francis I conferred upon him all the privileges of a native-born subject of France, and gave him the rich bishopric of Mirepoix, in Languedoc, to which see he was consecrated in the succeeding December On his return home, he became coadjutor to his uncle now much advanced in years, in the see of St Andrews On the 28th of December 1538, on the recommendation of the king of France, and in consideration of his zeal, talents, and influence in his native country, Pope Paul III advanced him to the dignity of a cardinal, by the title of Cardinal of St Stephen in Monte Cœlis, and June 20 1539, the king of France renewed his letters of naturalization, allowing his heirs, though born in Scotland, to inherit his estate in that country

In the autumn of 1539, on his uncle's death, he succeeded him in the primacy, and soon after his instalment he commenced a furious persecution of the Reformers, for the total extirpation of the Protestant doctrines In order to be invested with supreme authority in all matters ecclesiastical, he obtained from the Pope the appointment of legatus

natus, and legate a latere, in Scotland In May 1540, accompanied by the leading nobility and clergy, he made a public entrance into St Andrews with great pomp and splendour, and from his throne in the cathedral delivered a long address to those assembled, declaring the dangers which threatened the Holy Catholic Church from the proceedings of Henry VIII in England, and the increase of heresy in Scotland, which, he said, had invaded the precincts of the royal court Sir John Borthwick, provost or captain of Linlithgow, denounced for heresy, whom he had caused to be cited to answer there before him, not appearing, was condemned as a heretic and seditious incendiary, his goods confiscated, and all intercourse prohibited with him on pain of excommunication Borthwick was accordingly burned in effigy, both at St Andrews and Edinburgh, but he himself had taken refuge in England, and so escaped the fury of the cardinal To remove the odium of the persecutions, on which he had now entered, from the clergy, the cardinal had the address to induce the king to appoint a Court of Inquisition to inquire after heretics in every part of the kingdom, promising him a yearly sum of 30,000 crowns of gold from the clergy, and persuading him that he could add to his revenues at least 100,000 crowns per annum more, by annexing the estates of convicted heretics to the crown Of this court of inquisition, Sir James Hamilton, natural brother of the earl of Arran, was appointed Judge, but he was the same year executed for high treason The cardinal had, it is said, prepared a black list, which was presented to the king, of three hundred and sixty of the chief nobility and gentry suspected of heresy, at the head of which was the earl of Arran, but the disastrous overthrow of the Scots at Solway Moss prevented the contemplated prosecutions and confiscations being carried into execution On the king's death at Falkland soon after, December 14, 1542, the cardinal, who, with some others, was with him at the time of his decease, was accused of having forged his will, by which he and the earls of Huntly, Argyle, and Murray, were appointed regents during the minority of the infant Queen Mary His scheme was, however, defeated Within a week after, the earl of Arran, being supported by most of the nobility, was proclaimed regent and governor of the kingdom

On January 20, 1542–3, the cardinal was arrested, and imprisoned in the castle of Blackness, charged with writing to the duke of Guise to bring a French army into Scotland, drive Arran from the regency, and overthrow the negotiations which were then forming between the English monarch and the ruling party in Scotland, for a marriage between the young Prince of Wales, afterwards Edward VI, and the infant Queen of Scots For this charge Arran admitted to Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador, that there was no evidence, "but," he said, "we have other matters to charge him with, for he did forge the late king's testament, and when the king was even almost dead, he took his hand in his, and caused it to subscribe a blank paper, and, besides that, since he has been a prisoner, he has given special and secret command to his men to keep his stronghold and castle of St Andrews against us, which is plain disobedience and rebellion" The cardinal's imprisonment created great consternation among the clergy "The public services of religion," observes Mr Tytler in his History, "were instantly suspended, the priests refused to administer the sacraments of baptism and burial, the churches were closed, a universal gloom overspread the countenances of the people, and the country presented the melancholy appearance of a land excommunicated for some awful crime" He was soon after liberated, and reconciled to his cousin the regent, who was induced publicly, in the church of the Franciscans at Stirling, to abjure the protestant faith, which he had for some time professed On the young queen's coronation, the cardinal was again admitted of the council, and the regent appointed him chancellor of the realm

In January 1545–6, the cardinal, accompanied by the regent and several of the nobility, made a diocesan visitation of the counties under his jurisdiction, with the object of punishing with the utmost severity all the protestants he could find On his arrival at Perth a number of persons were accused of heresy by a friar named Spence Of these, four citizens and a woman were, on the 25th January, cruelly put to death, the men being hanged and the woman drowned The names of these martyrs were, William Anderson, Robert Lamb, James Ronald, and James Finlayson, and Helen Stark, the wife of Finlayson The crime of three of the men consisted, according to Knox and others, in having "eaten a goose on Good Friday" The woman was accused of having refused to invoke the Virgin during her labour, declaring that she would direct her prayers to God alone in the name of Christ The cardinal is said to have witnessed the execution from a window in the Spy tower, a building in the earl of Gowrie's garden Some of the citizens of Perth were banished from the city Lord Ruthven, the provost, was deposed from his office, and Charteris of Kinfauns, a neighbouring proprietor, although by no means friendly to the cardinal, or averse to the protestant doctrines, appointed in his place The citizens of Perth, however, would not acknowledge him as provost, and, urged by the cardinal and regent to take possession of the city by force, he was compelled to retire, after a fight where sixty of his followers were slain The cardinal and regent now proceeded towards Dundee, where the New Testament in the original Greek had been some time taught, but within a few miles of that town, they were stopped by the approach of the earl of Rothes and Lord Gray, both noblemen favourable to the Reformation, at the head of a large body of their armed retainers In consequence, they returned to Perth, where, by a manœuvre of the cardinal, both Rothes and Gray, who had followed them, were arrested and lodged in prison Rothes soon obtained his liberty, but Gray was not released for some time At Arbroath, whither the cardinal and his party next went, he succeeded in apprehending a Black Friar named John Rogers, who had been going about preaching the protestant doctrines, and whom he confined in the sea tower of the castle of St Andrews A few mornings thereafter Rogers was found dead among the rocks under the castle, as if he had fallen and broken his neck while attempting to make his escape during the night But there were not wanting those who stated and believed that the cardinal had caused the friar to be privately murdered, and thrown over the wall

Shortly after Bethune presided at a provincial council of the clergy held in the church of the Black Friars, Edinburgh, when he enforced upon them the necessity of proceeding vigorously against all those who either encouraged, or were suspected of encouraging, the protestant doctrines, at the same time recommending to them to reform their own lives, that no further complaints might be heard against the church In the midst of their deliberations, the cardinal received intelligence that the celebrated George Wishart, the most eminent protestant preacher of his time, was residing at the house of Cockburn of Ormiston, in Haddingtonshire A troop of horse was immediately sent off to secure him, but Cockburn refusing to deliver him up, the cardinal himself and the regent followed, blocking up every avenue to the house, so as to render escape impossible The earl of Bothwell being sent for, pledged his faith to Cockburn, that he would stand by Wishart, and see that his life and person would be safe, on which Wishart delivered himself up, and Bothwell having basely surrendered him to the cardinal, he was conveyed first to Edinburgh Castle, and afterwards to St Andrews, where he was committed to the castle prison Being brought before the ecclesiastical tribunal, he was condemned for heresy, and burnt with great cruelty The cardinal and other prelates witnessed the scene from a window in the castle, and, according to Buchanan and others, the following prediction was uttered by Wishart in the midst of the torturing flames "He who now so proudly looks down upon me from yonder lofty place, (pointing to the cardinal,) shall in a few days be as ignominiously thrown down as now he proudly lolls at his ease" This cruel execution was conducted in defiance of a letter which the regent had written to him, to stay the proceedings until he should come himself to St Andrews, and threatening that, if he did not, the blood of Wishart would be required at his hands Wishart died with great firmness, constancy, and Christian courage, and his death caused great excitement in the kingdom, which, however, the cardinal, conceiving that he had done a meritorious action, paid no attention to

In April 1546, shortly after the martyrdom of Wishart, the cardinal proceeded to the castle of Finhaven, to the marriage of the eldest of his illegitimate daughters by Mis Marion Ogilvy, of the house of Airly, with whom he had long lived in scandalous concubinage, and there, with infamous effrontery, married her to the eldest son of the earl of Crawford, giving with her 4,000 merks of dowry The marriage-contract, subscribed by him, in which he styles her "my daughter," is yet extant In the midst of the marriage rejoicings, intelligence was received that an English fleet had appeared off the coast, and he immediately returned to St Andrews, and began to fortify his castle, but while thus engaged preparing against foreign enemies, he had no suspicion of any at home He had procured from Norman Leslie, eldest son of the earl of Rothes, a bond of manrent or feudal service for the estate of Easter Wemyss, which Leslie had resigned to the cardinal on a promise of an advantageous equivalent Demanding the fulfilment of the bargain, the proud priest refused, on which, dreading the primate's vengeance, Norman concerted measures with his uncle, Mr John Leslie, a violent enemy of the cardinal, and some other persons, to cut him off There were very few concerned in this conspiracy, the principal persons being the two Leslies, William Kirkaldy of Grange, Peter Carmichael of Fife, and James Melville of Raith, most of whom had some private cause of wrong against the cardinal On the 28th of May 1546, Norman Leslie entered St Andrews with some followers, but not so many as to excite suspicion The others assembled in that city during the evening, Kirkaldy came there on the previous day, John Leslie arrived late, lest his appearance should excite alarm Next morning they assembled early in the vicinity of the castle, and on the porter lowering the drawbridge, to admit the workmen whom the cardinal had been employing incessantly at the fortifications, Norman Leslie entered with three men, and while speaking to the porter, as to the hour when the cardinal would be stirring and could be seen, Kirkaldy of Grange and his party also gained admission into the court-yard John Leslie now appeared with a few attendants, but when the porter saw him he suspected the design, and attempted to lift the drawbridge He was prevented by Leslie, who sprang across the gap with his attendants, slew the porter, threw the body into the foss, and seized the keys of the fortress The workmen and domestics, about one hundred and fifty individuals, were then ejected, and being now in full possession of the fortress, before there was even an alarm in the town, they dropped the portcullis, and closed the gates The cardinal, roused by the noise, arose from his couch According to Knox, Marion Ogilvy had been with him the preceding night, and she was "espy'd to depart from him by the privy postern that morning" Opening the casement, he inquired the cause of the noise A voice answered him that Norman Leslie had taken the castle. He ran to the postern, but finding it locked, he returned to his apartment, and seizing a sword, proceeded to barricade the door with the heaviest furniture, assisted by the page or attendant who waited on him John Leslie now advanced to the prelate's room, and demanded admittance "Who is there?" inquired the cardinal "My name is Leslie," replied the assailant "Which of the Leslies?" asked the cardinal, "are you Norman?—I must have Norman, he is my friend" "Content yourself with those who are here," was the reply, "for you will get no other" They then insisted that the cardinal should open the door, which he refused to do While they were attempting to force it, the prelate concealed a box of gold under some coals in a corner of the room, and then sat down on a chair, exclaiming to those outside, "I am a priest, I am a priest" Finding them resolute to gain admittance, he at length asked them if they would save his life "It may be that we will," replied John Leslie "Nay," said the cardinal, "swear unto me by God's wounds, and I will admit you" The elder Leslie now called out for fire, the door from its strength resisting all their exertions A quantity of burning coals was brought to burn the door, when the cardinal, or his chamberlain, seeing farther resistance hopeless, opened the door, on the strongest assurances of personal safety On their entrance he cried out, "I am a priest, I am a priest, you will not slay me!" They rushed on the cardinal, and John Leslie, and another conspirator named Carmichael, repeatedly struck him But Melville of Raith, who had been intimately acquainted with Wishart, perceiving them in a furious passion, pushed them aside, saying, "This work and judgment of God, although it be secret, ought to be done with greater gravity," and presenting the point of his sword, he thus addressed the wounded prelate —"Repent thee of thy former wicked life, but especially the shedding of the blood of that notable instrument of God, Mr George Wishart, who, although the flame of fire consumed before men, yet cries for vengeance upon thee, and we from God are sent to avenge it Remember that neither the hatred of thy person, the love of riches, nor the fear of thy power, moved or moveth me to strike thee, but because thou hast been an obstinate enemy of Christ and the holy gospel" Melville then passed his sword through the cardinal's body several times, who sunk into his chair, and saying, "I am a priest, fie, fie, all is gone!" instantly expired The alarm had by this time been given in the town, the bells were rung, and the citizens, headed by the provost, surrounded the entire wall of the castle "What have you done with my lord cardinal?" they clamorously demanded "Have you slain my lord cardinal?" They were answered by the conspirators from the battlements, that it would be as well to return to their houses, for the man whom they called the cardinal had received his reward, and would trouble them no more This reply having only the more enraged them, they were addressed by Norman Leslie as unreasonable fools, who demanded an audience with a dead man Dragging the bleeding body of the murdered primate to the spot, they suspended it by a sheet over the wall, by the same window from which he had but a short time before witnessed the martyrdom of Mr George Wishart, exclaiming, "There is your God, and now that you are satisfied, get home to your houses,"—a command with which, in horror and amazement, they eventually complied The body of the cardinal was salted, and after being treated with disgusting indignity, was thrown into the ground-floor of the sea-tower His death excited joy among the Protestants, and consternation among the Catholics, the feelings of the more moderate being well expressed in Sir David Lindsay of the Mount's oft-repeated verse

"As for the cardinal, I grant
He was a man we well might want—
God will forgive it soon
But of a truth, the sooth to say
Although the loon be well away,
The deed was foully done"

The engraving given of Cardinal Bethune is from a rare portrait at St Mary's College, Blairs, near Aberdeen With him fell the last prop of the papal church in Scotland He understood well the policy of the courts of France and Rome, and thought that the interests of Scotland could only be promoted in accordance with it In times of danger he evinced resolution of mind, steadiness of purpose, and a firm and unswerving attachment to the principles which he conceived to be the most fitted for the prosperity of his native country He was a man of commanding talents, and a politician of the highest order—one thoroughly acquainted with the temper, influence, and weight of the whole feudal nobility of Scotland, but, says Keith, (Hist p 45,) "it were to be wished the same praise could be given him with respect to his morals Mrs Marion Ogilvy, a daughter of the predecessors of the earls of Airlie, bore him several children, some of whose descendants, both of the male and female line, are known to be persons of good note in our country at this day" A contemporary writer, Paulus Jovius, says of him "His pride was so great, that he quarrelled with the old archbishop of Glasgow (Dunbar) in his own city, and pushed this quarrel so far that then men fought in the very church His ambition was boundless, for he took into his own hands the entire management of the affairs of the kingdom" He was haughty, cruel, licentious, and intolerant in the extreme Devoted to the Church of Rome, he upheld her doctrines by the most sanguinary measures He possessed little learning, and knew scarcely anything of the controversial writings of the age Dempster mentions that he wrote 'Memoirs of his own Embassies,' a 'Treatise on 'St Peter's Supremacy,' and 'Letters to several Persons,' of which that author observes there are several copies extant in the national libraries at Paris His great riches he bequeathed to his natural children, having three sons and three daughters One of his sons became a Protestant, his daughters were married into families of distinction

a nephew of the cardinal, was educated chiefly at Paris In 1552 he was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Glasgow, and, according to some writers, was consecrated at Rome, whither it is conjectured he was sent to give the Pope an account of the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland after the murder of his uncle the cardinal In 1557 he was one of the commissioners appointed to witness the marriage of the young Queen Mary to the Dauphin of France, and was present at the ceremony in the cathedral church of Notre Dame, April 24, 1558 On his return, he acted as a privy counsellor to the queen-mother, Mary of Guise, appointed regent by her daughter on her going to France Owing to the disputes about religion which then agitated the kingdom, and the proceedings of the Reformers, the archbishop returned to France in July 1560, carrying with him the treasures and records of his archiepiscopal see, and carefully deposited them in the Scots college at Paris On his departure the protestants in Scotland appointed a preacher in Glasgow, and seized all the revenues of the archbishopric As his capacity and fidelity were well known to the queen his mistress, she resolved, after the death of the king her consort and her return to Scotland, to leave her affairs in France in his hands Accordingly, in 1561, he was declared her ambassador to France, and, in June 1564, his commission was renewed He resided in Paris as ambassador, first from Queen Mary, and afterwards from King James, till his death in 1603, enjoying all that time the highest confidence of his sovereign. Having carefully preserved Queen Mary's letters, and other papers communicated to him, these would have formed valuable materials for history, had the greater part of them not been taken away or destroyed While in France, he received scarcely any money from Scotland, but, when King James came of age, he restored him both to the title and revenues of his archbishopric Previous to this, he had obtained several ecclesiastical preferments in France He died April 24, 1603, aged 86 He is represented as a prelate of great prudence, moderation, loyalty, and learning He was succeeded in his see by the celebrated Spottiswood According to Dempster, he wrote 'A Commentary on the Book of Kings,' 'A Lamentation for the Kingdom of Scotland, 'A Book of Controversies against the Sectaries;' 'Observations upon Gratian's Decretals,' and 'A Collection of Scotch Proverbs,'—none of which were ever printed —Spottiswood's History

BETHUNE, ALEXANDER, a literary peasant, of unpretending worth and rare talent, was the son of an agricultural labourer of the same name, and was born at Upper Rankeillor, in the parish of Monimail, Fifeshire, about the end of July 1804 From the extreme poverty of his parents, he received but a scanty education, having, up to the age of twenty-two, been only four or five months at school, while his brother John, the subject of the following article, who was a few years younger, was at school but one day To their mother, whose maiden name was Alison Christie, they were mainly indebted for the cultivation of those talents which subsequently obtained for them a very respectable standing in the literary world At the age of fourteen Alexander was engaged in the occupation of a labourer He describes himself as having been set to dig at raw fourteen, and for more than a year afterwards, his joints, in first attempting to move in the morning, creaked like machinery wanting oil Previous to this his parents had removed to the hamlet of Lochend, near the loch of Lindores At the age of twenty-one, he enrolled himself in the evening classes taught by the Rev John Adamson, afterwards of Dundee, who about 1825 kept a school at Lochend With the view of improving his condition, he commenced learning the weaving business, under the instruction of his brother, (see next article,) but after expending all their savings in the purchase of the necessary apparatus, they were compelled, from the general failures which took place in 1825 and following year, to seek employment as outdoor labourers, at the rate of one shilling a-day In 1829, while employed in a quarry, Alexander was thrown into the air by a blast of gunpowder, and so dreadfully mangled that those who came to his aid after the accident, anticipated his speedy death He, however, recovered, and in four months after he was able to resume his labours Three years thereafter he met with an accident of a similar kind, by which he was again fearfully disfigured, and from the effects of which he never altogether recovered His leisure hours were diligently devoted to literary pursuits, and besides contributing several tales and other pieces to the periodicals of the day, he completed a series of 'Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry,' a work which, on its publication in 1838, was justly admired for its truthfulness and vigorous delineation of rustic character, as well as for the author's general knowledge of human nature The risk of the publication was undertaken by Mr Shortreede, then a printer in Edinburgh, who gave for the copyright the price of the first fifty copies sold, an arrangement with which the author was perfectly satisfied

His brother John having, in the meantime, obtained the situation of overseer on the estate of Inchrye, he accompanied him as his assistant Before the end of a year, however, that estate passed into the hands of a new proprietor, and their engagement came to an end As they were obliged, at the same time, to quit the house at Lochend, which formed part of the Inchrye property, the brothers came to the resolution of feuing a piece of ground near Newburgh, and immediately set about building a house for themselves In concert with his brother, he had prepared a series of 'Lectures on Practical Economy,' which were published in 1839, but did not meet with the success which had been anticipated After the death of his brother the same year he undertook the revision of his poems, which he published in a volume, with a memoir, and the first impression of seven hundred copies having been disposed of, a second edition was soon called for A copy of the work having fallen into the hands of Mrs Hill, the wife of Mr Frederick Hill, inspector of prisons, that lady wrote to Alexander Bethune, offering to use her influence to procure him a situation as teacher or in some other way connected with the prisons, but after a week's probation as a turnkey at Glasgow in March 1841, he declined the proposal, and wrote that he did not wish an application to be made for one who had no qualifications above the average rate of a common labourer In 1842 he visited Edinburgh, and entered into arrangements with the Messrs Black for the publication of 'The Scottish Peasant's Fireside,' which appeared early in the following year Previous to this he had been seized with fever, from which he never thoroughly recovered, the disease merging into pulmonary consumption During his partial recovery, an offer was made to him to undertake the editorship of the Dumfries Standard, a newspaper then about to be started, but after conditionally accepting of the situation, should his health permit, he felt himself compelled to abandon all hope of ever being able to enter on the duties of editor He died at Newburgh at midnight of the 13th June 1843 Previous to his death he consigned his manuscripts to his friend Mr William M'Combie, a farmer in Aberdeenshire, and like himself a writer on social economy, who in 1845 published at Aberdeen his Life, with Selections from his Correspondence and Literary Remains In as far as regards character and conduct, Alexander Bethune and his brother were as fine specimens of the Scottish peasantry as could anywhere be found They were, in fact, models of the class, humble, without meanness, frugal, industrious, persevering, and unostentatiously religious, without bigotry or intolerance The productions of his intellect caused him to be courted and esteemed by many in the upper ranks of society This, however, did not make him vain, or turn him from the even tenor of his way He was, all his life, a sturdy independent peasant, never ashamed in the least of his calling, digging, quarrying, felling wood, breaking stones on the highway, or building dry-stone walls, as long as he was able, by his own hands, to minister to his own wants, and on wet days and intervals of leisure, turning his attention to literary composition, as a relaxation from his ordinary toil

BETHUNE, JOHN, the author of several poems and tales, younger brother of the preceding, was born in 1812, in the parish of Monimail, Fifeshire At Martinmas 1813, his father removed to a place called Lochend, near the loch of Lindores, where the greater part of John Bethune's short life was passed He never was but one day at school He was taught to read by his mother, and received lessons in writing and arithmetic from his brother, Alexander Bethune, who, soon after his death, published a selection from his poems, with a sketch of his life When yet scarcely thirteen years of age, he and his brother earned their subsistence by breaking stones on the road between Lindores and Newburgh Having been apprenticed to the weaving business in the village of Collessie, he soon became so expert at the loom, that at Martinmas 1825 he commenced business on his own account, in a house adjoining his father's, with his brother as his apprentice But, not succeeding, he and his brother resumed their former occupation of outdoor labourers Most of his pieces were written amidst great privations, and, as we are told by his brother, upon such scraps of paper as he could pick up Before the year 1831 he had produced a large collection of pieces, he also wrote and planned a number of tales, the greater part of which was left in manuscript In October 1829 he was engaged on the estate of Inchrye as a day-labourer, and afterwards in 1835, on the death of the overseer, he was appointed in his place, at a salary of twenty-six pounds yearly, with fodder for a cow, when he engaged his brother as his assistant There he remained for one year To his brother's 'Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry,' published in 1838, he contributed five pieces In the following year appeared 'Lectures on Practical Economy' by both brothers, on the title-page of which he designated himself a "Fifeshire Forester" This work, though designed to teach poor people habits of thrift and saving, and well spoken of by the press, did not succeed with the public, as stated in the life of his brother As a "Fifeshire Forester" he contributed a number of poems to the 'Scottish Christian Herald' He also wrote some pieces for the 'Christian Instructor' In 1838, having received some small remuneration for one or two contributions to a periodical, and finding his health failing him, he determined to give up manual labour, and trust to his pen for his future support He did not long fish in the uncertain waters of literature, as he was cut off by consumption on the forenoon of Sunday the 1st of September 1839 He died at the early age of 27 He was a man of considerable powers of mind His whole life seems to have been a scene of constant disappointment and suffering, but he possessed a cheerful, contented disposition, and a spirit of so much independence, that when an Edinburgh friend offered to exert his influence to procure him a government situation, he at once declined it, choosing rather to support himself by his own unaided industry

BETHUNE, Sir Henry Lindesay, of Kilconquhar, baronet, a distinguished general in the Persian service, was born 12th April, 1787 He was descended from the ancient family of the Lords Lindsay of the Byres, who afterwards became earls of Crawford and Lindsay The immediate ancestor of the branch of the noble and ancient house to which he belonged was William Lindsay, second son of Patrick fourth Lord Lindsay, who obtained a charter of the lands of Pyetston in Fifeshire, in March, 1529 The direct line of Pyetston had failed towards the close of the seventeenth century, but a younger branch survived in the Lindsays of Wormestone, of which the subject of this notice was the representative He was the son of Major Martin Eccles Lindesay Bethune, by the daughter of General Tovey He entered the military service of the East India Company in early life, and in it attained the rank of major Being sent from Madras to Persia for the purpose of instructing and assisting the celebrated Abbas Mirza, crown prince of Persia, the eldest son of Futteh Ali Shah, in the organization of his artillery, the talent, resolution and perseverance exhibited by him, in the execution of this arduous duty, gained him the entire respect and confidence of the prince, and his heroism and intrepidity in the field established his fame throughout Persia An instance of this is recited during the hostilities with Russia which preceded the peace negociated by Sir Gore Ouseley Abbas Mirza had quitted his camp with his staff and suite on a shooting excursion, taking with him the artillery horses to beat for game The Russians took advantage of his absence to surprise the camp, and carry off Major Lindesay's six brass guns Lindesay, on his return, seeing with a glass his cannon ranged in front of the enemy's lines, instantly harnessed his horses, and, galloping across the intervening plain through the hostile advanced posts, cut down the guards, and brought off the guns in the face of the whole Russian army Repeated feats of this daring character, his lofty and commanding stature, being six feet seven inches in height, and his great personal strength, always highly admired by Orientals, justified the epithet familiarly applied to him in the Persian armies, of "Rustum"—the Hercules of ancient Persian story, while his humanity and justice, and regular distribution of pay to the troops under his command—too often withheld or delayed by native officers—secured their personal attachment and esteem

After a period of about sixteen years thus usefully spent in the service of Persia, Major Lindesay returned to his native country, where he had inherited the estate of Kilconquhar, in Fifeshire, having succeeded his grandfather, who assumed the name of Bethune, by virtue of a deed of entail made by David Bethune of Balfour in 1779 He married, in 1822, Coutts, eldest daughter of the late John Trotter of Dyrham Park, county Herts, and with her lived in domestic retirement till 1834, when the critical state of affairs in Persia called him once more into active service

On the demise of Futteh Ali Shah, in that year, the throne devolved on Mahomed-Mirza, his grandson, the son of the gallant Abbas Mirza, who had died during his father's lifetime But Mahomed's succession was opposed by Zulli Sultan, the younger brother of Abbas and uncle of Mahomed, he raised the standard of revolt, and Persia was involved in a civil war Mahomed appealed to England, and Sir Henry Bethune simultaneously repaired to London, and offered his services to government The foreign secretary, Lord Palmerston, accepted them, conferred on him the local rank of colonel in Asia, and despatched him as an accredited agent of the British government He was received with delight by the Shah, and his arrival was instantly noised throughout Persia The "magical influence" of the name of "Lindesay Sahib," still powerful after so many years' absence, spread confidence throughout the royal army, and consternation through that of the rebel Zulli Sultan, who set a price of four thousand tomauns on his head Some difficulties at first arose, in consequence of Sir Henry's juniority in the service to certain British officers already high in station, but they were soon removed by his nobly consenting to take an inferior command, having solely at heart the public interests, and placing himself under the orders of the chief of those officers as a temporary arrangement

An expedition was sent against the rebel uncle, headed by Sir Henry Bethune, who commanded the advanced guard of the Shah's army, and, by a singularly rapid march—or, as it is described in a letter in the St Petersburg Gazette, "dragging the army after him"—he surprised, attacked, and defeated the rebel force, and took Sulli Sultan prisoner, enabling the Shah to make his triumphal entry into Teheran in December, 1834 His services were acknowledged by a firman from the Shah, investing "the high in degree and rank, the wise and prudent, the zealous and brave, the sincere and devoted, the great among Christians, Sir Henry Bethune, descended from the Lindesays," with the rank of general and Ameer-i-Toop Kana, or master general of artillery, and requesting him to select the best Arab horse in his stables, which being done, the Shah mounted the fiery animal, rode him into Teheran, and then dismounted, and presented him to Sir Henry The ministers and courtiers, on hearing of this gift, petitioned the Shah not to allow so famed a steed to leave the royal stud, but the Shah replied, that he would rather lose fifty such horses, if such could be found, than disappoint Sir Henry The Shah further conferred upon him, by a distinct firman, a "Medal of Fidelity," with five others in pure gold, as rewards for services rendered on particular occasions, declaring, at the same time, that he had surpassed all others in his bravery in the field, and commanding that this testimony to Sir Henry's worth and good service should be inscribed in the books of the records of the kings of Persia

Nor was the testimony of the British envoy, Sir John Campbell, less marked and gratifying In his despatch to Lord Ellenborough, dated 6th May, 1835, he refers to the "unbounded confidence reposed in Sir Henry Bethune by the Persian government, and by the military of all classes," to the "fame which he had acquired during his former services in Persia," to the "very extraordinary influence of his name and reputation," to "his knowledge of the language and of the habits of the people," and to "the successful result, beyond what could possibly have been anticipated," of all his operations, as fully justifying his (Sir John's) accession to the wish of the Shah and the Court of Persia, "that the direction of all hostile operations should be intrusted to him" "His proceedings," he states in another letter, of the 30th April, 1835, "have been energetic as well as conciliatory, and his efforts have been seconded by the British officers attached to his force Owing to the subordination preserved, little or no injury has been done to the country The ryots (or peasantry) have appealed to him against the oppression of their own native authorities, and have duly appreciated the contrast between the conduct of an army marching under British, and one marching under native commanders, and numberless letters and verses have been received by the Persian government in praise of the English name" We may add to this the following extract from a private letter from Persia, printed in the United Service Gazette —"Great is the name of Lindesay in this country, and great ought it to be, for certainly he was just formed for service in Persia in troubled times like these The confidence the soldiers have in him is quite wonderful, and all classes talk of him as if there never had appeared on earth before so irresistible a conqueror"

Having thus seated the son of his early friend and leader on the throne of his grandfather, Sir Henry Bethune returned to his native country and his family in September 1835 Soon after his arrival, he received a letter from Lord Palmerston, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, informing him that his Majesty, the late King William the Fourth, had conferred upon him the honour of a baronetcy, (7th March 1836,) "as an acknowledgment of the brilliant and important services" which he had performed in Persia, and in accordance with a request of Mahomet Shah, expressed in a letter to the king, that his Majesty would confer some rank upon Sir Henry, "which, in the English State, may descend lineally to his posterity, and always remain in his family"

Sir Henry Bethune remained in Scotland till the year 1850, employing himself in adding to and decorating his venerable mansion of Kilconquhar—celebrated in local story as the scene of the murder of Macduff's wife and children—and fulfilling in other respects the quiet and unostentatious duties of a private country gentleman During the last year of his life, his health having been much shaken, and thinking that a change of air and a milder climate might restore it, he went to Persia, to the land of his early exploits and affections, there to spend the winter He died at Tabreez on the 19th of February, 1851, in his sixty-fourth year—surrounded by friends, even in that distant clime Nothing could exceed the marked kindness of the Shah and the Ameer during his illness The interest and anxiety of the queen-mother were not less marked and considerate

He was interred in the churchyard of the Armenians, with the full service of their church, and with every military honour which Persia could bestow The bazaars and the streets were thronged with spectators, and the whole Christian population of Tabreez attended the ceremony He left three sons and five daughters, and was succeeded in his title and estate by his eldest son, Sir John Trotter Bethune

BINNING and BYRES, Lord, the second title of the earl of Haddington, derived from an ancient parish in the county of Linlithgow See HADDINGTON, earl of

The surname of BINNIE or BINNY is evidently a contraction of BINNING, which appears to have been originally French, Benigne being the name of several persons of learning and distinction both in France and Italy The first archbishop of Dijon was named St Benigne In the county of Linlithgow there is an eminence called Binnie Crag, which rises to the height of about four hundred and fifty feet In 1307, during the wars of independence under Robert the Bruce, a peasant named Binny, styled the William Tell of Scotland, by a successful stratagem, obtained possession of the Castle of Linlithgow, which was held by an English garrison under Peter Lubard This daring exploit is thus related by Tytler in his History of Scotland (vol i p 291) "Binny, who was known to the garrison, and had been employed in leading hay into the fort, communicated his design to a party of Scottish soldiers, whom he stationed in ambush near the gate In his large wain he contrived to conceal eight armed men, covered with a load of hay, a servant drove the oxen, and Binny himself walked carelessly at his side When the portcullis was raised, and the wain stood in the middle of the gateway, interposing a complete barrier to its descent, the driver cut the ropes which harnessed the oxen, upon which signal the armed men suddenly leapt from the cart, the soldiers in ambush rushed in, and so complete was the surprise that with little resistance the garrison were put to the sword, and the place taken" According to tradition six of the armed men concealed in the wain were Binny's sons Bruce rewarded the brave peasant with a grant of the lands of Easter Binning, and his descendants long survived, bearing in their coat of arms a hay wain, with the motto, "virtute doloque"

From the Binnings of Easter Binning were descended the Binnings of Wallfoord and the Binnings of Carlowryhall, both of which have been for a long period extinct In Wallfoord's charter-chest Nisbet states there was a charter by King James the First of the lands of Easter Binning to David de Binning, upon the resignation of William de Binning, his father Sir Thomas Hamilton, the first Lord Binning and Byres (created, in 1619, earl of Melrose, a title which he relinquished for that of earl of Haddington), besides other lands in Linlithgowshire, had charters of the lands of West Binny and the ecclesiastical lands of Easter Binny, 11th Nov 1601

About 1722, when the first volume of Nisbet's System of Heraldry was published, Mr Charles Binning of Pilmuir, advocate, was one of his Majesty's solicitors-general He was a younger son of Sir William Binning of Wallfoord, sometime Lord Provost of Edinburgh

BINNING, Lord, see Hamilton, Charles

BINNING, Hugh, the Rev, a preacher of the seventeenth century, of extraordinary eloquence and learning, the son of John Binning of Dalvennan, a gentleman of landed property in Ayrshire, was born about 1627 His mother was Margaret M'Kell or M'Kail, a daughter of Mr Mathew M'Kail, minister at Bothwell, the brother (some accounts say the father) of Mr Hugh M'Kail, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and uncle to the celebrated Hugh M'Kail, the young licentiate who was executed at Edinburgh, 22d December 1666, for being concerned in the insurrection at Pentland At the grammar school he made so great proficiency in the Latin that he outstripped all his fellows, and before he was fourteen years old he entered upon the study of philosophy at the university of Glasgow, in which he made considerable progress After taking the degree of master of arts, which he did on the 27th July 1646, he began the study of divinity A vacancy having occurred in the chair of philosophy in Glasgow college, by the resignation of Mr James Dalrymple, afterwards Lord Stair, who had been his master, Binning was induced to become a candidate, and his great acquirements and extraordinary genius caused him to be elected to the vacant professorship before he was nineteen years of age At the expiration of his third year as professor of philosophy he received a call from the parishioners of Govan, in the immediate vicinity of Glasgow, to be their minister, and in January 1650, he was ordained to that charge Soon after he married Barbara (or Mary) Simpson, the daughter of a presbyterian clergyman in Ulster, in Ireland

When the unhappy division took place in the church into Resolutioners and Protesters, (for an explanation of these terms, see life of James Guthrie, minister of Stirling,) he sided with the latter, but with the view of bringing about a reconciliation, he wrote his 'Treatise on Christian Love' The eloquence, fervour, and great theological attainments he displayed in the famous dispute which Oliver Cromwell caused to be held at Glasgow, in April 1651, between his own Independent clergymen and the Scottish Presbyterian ministers, astonished even the protector himself Finding that Binning had completely nonplussed his opponents, Cromwell asked the name "of that learned and bold young man" On being told it was Mr Hugh Binning, he replied in the true spirit of Alexander with "the Gordian knot," "He hath bound well, indeed, but (putting his hand on his sword) this will loose all again!" Binning died of consumption in 1653, in his 26th year He was buried in the churchyard of Govan, where Mr Patrick Gillespie, then principal of the university of Glasgow, caused a monument to be erected to his memory with a Latin inscription It is a simple marble tablet, surmounted with a heart, and the emblems of mortality It was placed in a niche in the front wall of the old parish church, but, in 1826, when the present church was erected, it was removed to the vestibule The inscription may be turned into English, thus "Mr Hugh Binning is buried here, a man distinguished for his piety, eloquence, and learning, an eminent philologist, philosopher, and theologian, in fine, a faithful and acceptable preacher of the gospel, who was removed from this world in the 26th year of his age, and in the year of our Lord 1653 He changed his country, not his company, because when on earth he walked with God If thou wish to know anything beyond this, I am silent as to anything further, since neither thou nor this marble can receive it"

Binning's miscellaneous writings, which are chiefly of a religious nature, were published in one volume, in 1732 A selection from these, entitled 'Evangelical Beauties of Hugh Binning,' with a memoir of the author by the Rev John Brown of Whitburn, was published in 1829 Binning, says a reviewer in 'The Edinburgh Christian Instructor' for that year, was "a writer of no common order There is a depth and solidity of thinking about his works, a richness of scriptural and pious sentiment, coupled with an exuberance of beautiful and striking illustration, such as none but a very highly gifted and sanctified mind could command We see in them, in fact, a delightful union of true genius with the most exalted piety, of the fervour and the flow of youth, with the riper judgment and experience of age We are not conscious of overrating his power, when we say that neither in the richness of his illustrations, nor in the vein of seraphic piety which pervades his writings, is he at all inferior to Leighton, whom, perhaps, on the whole, he most resembles "

Binning's widow was afterwards married to one Mr James Gordon, presbyterian minister of Comber, in the county of Down, Ireland His only son John inherited the estate of Dalvennan at the death of his grandfather, after whom he was named, but having been engaged in the insurrection of Bothwell Bridge in 1679, his estate was forfeited, and he continued dispossessed of it till the year 1690, when the forfeiture and fines were by act of parliament rescinded It appears, however, that one Roderick Mackenzie, who had been a depute advocate in the reign of James the Seventh, contrived to obtain possession of the estate, on the pretext of having advanced money for the benefit of John Binning, far exceeding the value of his land, and that the latter, having fallen into poverty, taught a school for some time The General Assembly showed kindness to him, on different occasions, for his father's sake In 1702, the commission of the Assembly being informed by a petition from himself of his "sad circumstances," recommended him to the provincial synods of Lothian and Tweeddale, and of Glasgow and Ayr, "for some charitable supply" In 1704 he applied for relief to the General Assembly, and stated that he had obtained from the privy council a patent to print his father's works, of which twelve years were then unexpired, and that it was his intention to publish them in one volume The Assembly recommended "every minister within the kingdom to take a double of the same book, or to subscribe for the same" They likewise called upon the different presbyteries in the church to collect among themselves something for the petitioner The last application he made to the Assembly for pecuniary aid was in 1717, when he must have been far advanced in life [Life of Binning prefixed to Fullarton's edition of his works, with Notes by Dr Leishman]

The following is a catalogue of Binning's works, all of which were published posthumously

The Common Principles of the Christian Religion clearly proved and singularly improved, or a practical catechism, wherein some of the most concerning foundations of our faith are solidly laid down, and that doctrine which is according to godliness is sweetly yet pungently pressed home, and most satisfyingly handled Glasgow, 1659, 12mo 5th Impression, Glasgow, 1666 Edin 1672, 12mo

BIRNIE, a surname derived from a parish of that name in the county of Elgin About the beginning of the thirteenth century this parish was named Brenuth, "a name probably derived from Brae-nut, that is, 'high land abounding in nuts,' for many hazel trees once grew upon the sides of the hills and banks of the rivulets and the general appearance of the parish is hilly The natives pronounce it Burn-nigh—that is, 'a village near the burn or river' This etymology is descriptive enough of the particular place now called Birnie' [Old Statistical Account of Scotland, vol ix p 155]

As a specimen of the absurd and oftentimes fabulous accounts given by genealogists of the origin of old families, we find in Nisbet's Heraldry (Appendix, vol ii page 68,)

the following Sennachy's tradition of the origin of the family of Birnie, said to have been formerly in the possession of the Birnies of Broomhill — One Birnie (an Irish word signifying bright, a name bestowed upon him from his glittering armour), with his two sons, were in the army of Kenneth the Second, king of the Scots, raised to avenge the death of his father, Alpin, by the Picts in 838 or thereby, and when pressing furiously one evening into the thickest of the Pictish force, were all made prisoners, and chained by the leg to a stock of wood To obtain their freedom, says the legend, they cut off their bound leg, and in the next battle were observed—upon their remaining leg—to behave themselves with extraordinary courage In reward of their valour, a barony of lands near Elgin was bestowed upon the father by the victor, which still bears his name And in confirmation of the fable, it is gravely added, that—(in anticipation, we suppose, of an institution and of terms not known in Scotland until centuries afterwards)—he gave them for their arms Gules, in resemblance of a bloody battle, a Fesse, the mark of honour, betwixt a bow and arrow in full draught, and three legs couped on the thigh It might have been nearer the truth to have conjectured that as Byrne or Birnie is obviously derived from Biron (the origin of the modern English Byron) pronounced short as in France, Birnie may have been the usual diminutive of Birony, as Barry, from Bar, and that Birony, like Barry and others, may have been the name of some Anglo Norman follower of Malcolm IV, who received a grant of lands in Morav (Elgin) on the occasion of the conquest and transportation thence of the native inhabitants

The estate of Birnie continued in the possession of the Birnies till about the end of the civil wars in the minority of King James the Sixth The last proprietor of this family was William Birnie, who married Margaret, daughter of Frazer of Philorth, after her husband's death she was by Queen Mary made Mistress of the Mint Their only son, Mr William Birnie, when he came of age, and after three years' study abroad, entered the church, and on the 28th December 1597, he was presented by King James the Sixth, to the church of Lanark He was also appointed by the king a member of both the courts of high commission It is recorded of him that "because of the several quarrels and feuds amongst the gentlemen of his parish, he not only learnedly preached the gospel, but was obliged, many times, as he well could, to make use of his sword" He was the author of an old and learned work published in Edinburgh in 1606, quarto, entitled 'The Blame of Kirk-Buriall, tending to persuade to Cemeterial Civilitie,' an interesting reprint of which was, a few years ago, made by William Turnbull, Esq, Advocate In quaint but powerful language the author inveighs against the practice of burying in the area of churches, but delivers many admirable sentiments on the honour due to the resting-places of the dead He married Elizabeth, a niece of Lindsay of Covington, and had issue, John, a merchant, who died without heirs male, James, a merchant in Poland, afterwards secretary to John Cassimir, king of Poland, who had no male issue, and Robert, who, by presentation from King Charles the First, of date 23d November 1643, was also, like his father, made minister at Lanark Robert married Christian, the daughter of Dr Patrick Melville, professor of the oriental languages at St Andrews, of the family of Raith, a lady of so great proficiency in the Hebrew language, that she was able to English it in any part, even without the points They had issue a son and a daughter The daughter, Janet, married John Irvine of Saphock, ancestor of the Irvines of Drum The son, John Birnie, styled of Birnie, married Jean, daughter of James Hamilton of Broomhill, Bishop of Galloway, second son of Sir James Hamilton of Broomhill, baronet, a younger brother of Lord Belhaven, from whom the bishop seems to have acquired the lands of Broomhill The bishop had two sons, both of whom died without issue, and the estate of Broomhill came into possession of his daughter Jean abovementioned, through whose right it devolved upon the Birnies She was succeeded by her eldest son, John Birnie of Broomhill

Sir Andrew Birnie of Saline, her second son, was admitted advocate 14th June 1661, elected dean of faculty 1st February 1675, and became a lord of session, under the title of Lord Saline, 28th November 1679 He retained his seat on the bench till the Revolution

The estate of Broomhill, which is in the parish of Dalserf, Lanarkshire, remained in possession of the Birnies till about 1825, when, from the death of the last direct descendant, a lady, the estate was sold by her heirs to James Bruce, Esq, a native of the parish, who had returned from India, with a fortune

BIRNIE, Sir Richard, chief magistrate of the public office, Bow street, London, was born in Banff, of comparatively humble but respectable parents, about the year 1760 He was bred to the trade of a saddler, and, after serving his apprenticeship, went to London, and obtained a situation as journeyman in the house of Macintosh and Co, then saddle and harness makers to the royal family, in the Haymarket His application and industry soon recommended him to the favourable notice of his employers, but his subsequent advancement in life was in some degree the effect of accident Upon one occasion, when both the foreman and the senior partner in the firm were absent on account of illness, a command was received from the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV, for some one to attend him, to take his orders to a considerable extent, and young Birnie was directed to wait upon his Royal Highness The orders of the prince were executed so completely to his satisfaction, that he afterwards, on similar occasions, specially desired that "the young Scotchman" should be sent to him At that period Sir Richard occupied a furnished apartment in Whitcomb Street, Haymarket By his diligence, perseverance, and honesty, he at length became foreman of the establishment, and eventually a partner in the firm Previous to the latter event, he had made the acquaintance of the lady to whom he was afterwards united She was the daughter of an opulent baker in Oxendon Street, and on marrying her, he received in her right a considerable sum of money, a cottage and a piece of valuable land at Acton, Middlesex He then took up house in St Martin's parish, and soon distinguished himself by his activity in parochial affairs He served successively, as he has often been heard exultingly to state, every parochial office, except watchman and beadle He was always a warm loyalist, and during the troublesome times of the latter part of the Pitt administration, he gave a proof of his devotion to the constitution, by enrolling himself as a private in the Royal Westminster Volunteers, in which corps, however, he soon obtained the rank of captain After serving the offices of constable, overseer, auditor, &c of the parish, he became, in 1805, church warden In conjunction with his colleague in office, Mr Elaim, a silversmith in the Strand, and Dr Anthony Hamilton, then vicar of St Martin's parish, he founded the establishment of a number of almshouses, together with a chapel, called St Martin's chapel for decayed parishioners, in Platt's Street, Camden Town, an extensive burying ground being attached thereto As St Martin's parish is governed by a local act of parliament, two magistrates require to be resident in the parish, and at the special request of the late duke of Northumberland, Mr Birnie was placed in the commission of the peace From this period he began to give frequent attendances at Bow Street office, and at the same time employed himself in studying the penal statutes and magisterial practice in general He was in the habit of sitting in the absence of Sir Richard Ford, Mr Graham, and other stipendiary magistrates of the day, and was considered an excellent assistant He was at length appointed police magistrate at Union Hall In February 1820 he headed the peace officers and military in the apprehension of the celebrated Cato Street gang of conspirators Sir Nathaniel Conant, the chief magistrate at Bow Street, died shortly after, and Mr Birnie was much disappointed at Sir Robert Baker, of Marlborough Street, being preferred to the vacant office, saying to a brother magistrate publicly on the bench, while the tears started from his eyes, "This is the reward a man gets for risking his life in the service of his country!" He soon afterwards, however, attained what might be fairly said to be the summit of his ambition In August 1821, at the funeral of Queen Caroline, Sir Robert Baker having declined to read the riot act, which Mr Birnie deemed necessary, in consequence of the riotous disposition of the mob, he took the responsibility upon himself, and read it amid great tumult. Sir Robert retired from the chair immediately afterwards, having given great offence to the ministry by his want of decision, and Mr Birnie was appointed to the office of chief magistrate at Bow Street On the 17th September following, he received the honour of knighthood He died April 29, 1832, leaving a son and two daughters Sir Richard was an especial favourite with George the Fourth He was ever ready to assist the needy, especially where he discovered a disposition to industry As a magistrate his loss was severely felt In all matters of importance connected with the peace and welfare of the metropolis, he was for years consulted by those who filled the highest offices in the state He was remarkable for his close application to business

BISSET, BYSET, or BISSERT, originally an Anglo-Norman name, belonging to a family which came into Scotland about the reign of William the First, and settled in two branches, the one in the province of Moray, and the other in Berwickshire After Malcolm the Fourth had subdued, in 1160, the turbulent and rebellious inhabitants of Moray, and transported to Galloway all who had taken up arms against him, which included the greater portion of the population, he bestowed their lands upon strangers, and among the new settlers, besides the earls of Fife and Strathearn, and other powerful families, were the once potent Comyns and Bisset Ostiarii, who obtained large estates in the province, especially in that part which now forms a portion of Inverness-shire

Dugdale, in his Baronage (vol i p 632), says that the first mention of the name of Bisset in England was in the nineteenth year of the reign of King Stephen, when Manser Bisset was one of the witnesses to that accord then made betwixt Stephen and Henry duke of Normandy, touching the succession of the latter to the crown of England After this being sewer to that king, he founded an hospital at Mayden-Bradley, in Wiltshire, for leprous women and secular priests He was succeeded by his son Henry, who, dying without issue, another Henry, his nephew, became his heir, to whom succeeded John Bisset, brother and heir of William Bisset This John, being chief forester of England, was in the great tournament held at Northampton in 1241, (25th Henry the Third,) occasioned by Peter de Savoy earl of Richmond against earl Roger Bigod On his death he left three daughters but no son

In the reign of Alexander the Second one Walter Bisset was a witness in a charter by that king to the abbacy of Paisley, and also with William Bisset was witness in another charter of the same monarch to the abbacy of Dunfermline By the Chartulary of Melrose Walter Bisset, in the year 1233, married a daughter of Roland, lord of Galloway These parties appear to be of the branch of the Bissets established in Berwickshire, to whom the following story refers —In 1242

Walter de Bisset was accused of the murder of Patrick, sixth earl of Athol, at Haddington [See Life of ALEXANDER II, ante, p 75] That the murder might be concealed, the assassins set fire to the house in which the earl lodged The murdered earl had been victor in a tournament with Walter Bisset, and it is remarked by Mr Burton, [Life of Lord Lovat, p 5,] as probable that he had no farther concern with the murder than his inability to restrain the fiery spirit of his Celtic followers, burning for vengeance But in this he seems to be mistaken, as the Berwickshire Bissets were not likely to have Celtic followers, nor even those of Moray of that epoch, most of the native inhabitants having, as stated above, been transported to Galloway The Scottish nobility, headed by Patrick, earl of March, and instigated by David de Hastings, who had married the aunt of Athol, raised their followers, and demanded Bisset's life Bisset sought and obtained the protection of the king, Alexander the Second, who, however, could not shield him long, so powerful was the combination against him, and he was compelled to leave the kingdom, when his estates were forfeited, and all his family were involved in his ruin The Bissets fled to Ireland, from whence Bisset himself proceeded to England, and incited Henry the Third to take up arms against the Scottish king, which led to the treaty of Newcastle, 13th August 1244 [See ante, life of ALEXANDER II, p 76] Henry the Third bestowed upon Bisset large possessions in the barony of Glenarm, county of Antrim, Ireland In 1316, after Edward Bruce had been crowned king of Ireland, and was endeavouring to secure himself in that country, we find one Hugh Bisset mentioned as having, with John Loggan, defeated the Scottish force in Ulster with considerable slaughter The castle Olderfleet, in the vicinity of Larne, the ruins of which still exist is supposed to have been erected by one of the Bissets The monastery of Glenarm was founded in 1465 by mother of them, named Robert Bisset

About the year 1400, John Mor Macdonald of Isla, founder of the clan Ian Vor, second son of the Lord of the Isles and Lady Margaret Stewart, daughter of King Robert the Second, acquired large possessions in Ulster, by his marriage with Mary or Marjory Bisset, daughter of Sir John Bisset, and heiress of the Glens in the county of Antrim, a district which included the baronies of Carey and Glenarm On his death in 1427, the territory of the Glens was inherited by his eldest son, Donald, surnamed Balloch, a celebrated Highland chief, who, in 1431, defeated the earls of Mar and Caithness at Inverlochy, and who, having, by a stratagem, escaped the vengeance of King James the First, afterwards took so prominent a part in the rebellions of John, earl of Ross and Lord of the Isles [Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p 61] The footing which this branch of the Macdonalds thus obtained in Ulster, was, in later times, improved by their successors, and thus it was that the Macdonells, earls of Antrim, became entitled to the Bisset's property in Ireland

The property in Inverness-shire which afterwards came into the possession of the Frasers, lords Lovat, formed a portion of the large territories in the north of Scotland belonging to the Bisset family John Bisset, in 1230, founded a priory of the order of Vallis Caulium or Val des Choux in Rossshire, which, from the beauty of its situation he called Beaulieu, now Beauly, and which gave name to the small river which flows past A cut of the ruins of this edifice, from the rare work of Adam de Cardonell, is subjoined, as they existed in 1788 It is one of many instances of Norman, or rather French, names given at this early age to localities in the north of Scotland The tower and fort of Lovat, founded in the same year, near the eastern bank of the Beauly, was anciently the seat of the Bissets.

In 1240, Sir John Bisset of Lovat was imprisoned in the castle of Inverness for the imputed crimes of connection with the murder of the earl of Athol, and of fealtyship to the Lord of the Isles In 1258 Sir John Bisset of Lovat mortified an annuity out of his lands to the bishop of Moray He died without heirs of his own body, leaving his estate to his three daughters, the eldest of whom married David Grahame, thereafter designed of Lovat, as in an agreement betwixt him and the bishop of Moray, concerning the fishing of the water of Lorn The second daughter became the wife of Sir William Fenton of Beaufort and the third of Sir Andrew de Bosco

In 1291, amongst the barons convened at Berwick, at the desire of Edward the First of England, as arbitrators between the competitors for the crown of Scotland, was William Bisset, probably the same person who in the regulations adopted for the government of Scotland by Edward the First in 1301, is mentioned as sheriff and constable of Stirlingshire His grandson, Sir Thomas Bisset, lord of Upsethynton, became, in 1362, fifteenth earl of Fife, by his marriage, he being her third husband, with the Countess Isobel, eldest daughter and heiress of Duncan MacDuff, earl of Fife, she having the earldom in her own right Bisset, on his marriage, received from David the Second a charter granting to him and his heirs male by Isobel, his countess, the earldom of Fife, with all its pertinents He died in 1366, without issue, and in 1371 the countess resigned the earldom to Robert Stuart, earl of Menteith and duke of Albany, the brother of Walter Scott, her second husband, who died young, without issue

In the accounts of the High Treasurer of Scotland, during the reign of James the Fifth, quoted in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials (vol i part i Appendix, p 286), under date September 25, 1537, there is the following entry "Item, to James BISSAT Messinger, to pas with Letteris to the Provest and Bailleis of Dundee and Sanct Jonestoune (Perth) to serche and seik John Blacat and George Lawett, suspect of the

Habakkuk Bisset, writer to the signet, clerk to Sir John Skene, lord clerk register in the reign of James the Sixth, is the reputed author of 'Ane Short Forme of Proces, presently used and observed before the Lords of Counsell and Session,' appended to Skene's Scottish translation of the Regiam Majestatem, published in 1609 This work forms one of the articles in a scarce volume entitled, 'A Compilation of the Forms of Process in the Court of Session, during the earlier periods after its establishment, with the variations which they have since undergone, and likewise some ancient tracts concerning the manner of proceeding in Baron Courts, published by order of the Commissioners lately appointed by his majesty for inquiring into the administration of justice in Scotland' 8vo Edinburgh, 1809 [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials Vol i part ii page 286, note]

BISSET, Bissat, or Bissart, Peter, professor of canon law in the university of Bologna, in Italy, was born in the county of Fife, in the reign of James the Fifth He studied grammar, philosophy, and the laws at St Andrews, whence he removed to Paris, and having completed his education in that university, he went to Bologna, where he received the degree of doctor of laws, and was afterwards appointed professor of canon law in that city He continued there for several years, and died in the latter part of the year 1568 He possessed a high reputation not only as a civilian, but also as a poet, an orator, and a philosopher Bisset has frequently been confounded by Scottish biographical writers with an Italian poet and historian of the 16th century, named Peter Bizari, who was in Scotland during the regency of the earl of Murray, and some of whose minor poems will be found in Gruter's 'Deliciæ Poetarum Italorum' A quarto work, entitled 'Patricii Bissarti Opera Omnia, viz Poemata, Orationes, Lectiones Feriales, et Libri de Irregularitate,' was published at Venice in 1565 Bisset is said by a recent biographer [Chambers' Scottish Biography] to have been a descendant of Thomas Bisset or Bissert, earl of Fife in the reign of David the Second But this is probably a mistake, or if he were so, it must have been by a previous marriage, as the Sir Thomas Bisset who married the widowed countess of Fife, and received from the crown a charter of the earldom of Fife, to be held by him and his heirs-male by the countess, left no issue by her

BISSET, Charles, M D, an able medical and military writer, the son of an eminent lawyer and scholar, was born in 1717 at Glenalbert, near Dunkeld He studied medicine at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1740 was appointed second surgeon in the military hospital, Jamaica During the years he passed in the West Indies, he devoted his attention to acquiring a knowledge of the diseases peculiar to the torrid zone, and the result of his inquiries appeared at Newcastle in 1766, in a volume entitled 'Medical Essays and Observations,' the principal papers in which treated particularly of the diseases of that climate In 1745, in consequence of ill health, he resigned his situation, and returned to England In May 1746 he purchased an ensigncy in the gallant 42d regiment, when he began to improve his natural ingenuity, by studying engineering, in which department he soon distinguished himself In September 1748 the regiment was unsuccessfully employed on the coast of Brittany, but on the commencement of the ensuing campaign, it was ordered for foreign service against the French in Flanders Some sketches made by Dr Bisset of the enemy's approaches at the action of Sandberg, and at Bergen-op-Zoom, were presented by his colonel, Lord John Murray, to the duke of Cumberland, the commander-in-chief, who thereupon ordered him to attend the siege of the latter place, with the view of keeping a regular journal of the attack and defence, when he was frequently observed to walk on the ramparts, with the utmost unconcern, amidst the enemy's shot, the more nearly to observe the exact position of the French attacks His journal, illustrated with plans, was duly forwarded to the duke, then at the head of the allied army, at Maestricht On the recommendation of his royal highness, the duke of Montagu, then master-general of the ordnance, appointed him engineer extraordinary to the brigade of Engineers He also at the same time received his commission as lieutenant On the conclusion of the war he was placed on half-pay, when he visited several of the principal fortified places on the continent In 1751 he published his first work, being an 'Essay on the Theory and Construction of Fortifications' Having now retired from active service, he settled as a physician at the village of Skelton, in Cleveland, Yorkshire, where his practice became very extensive In 1755 appeared his 'Treatise on the

Scurvy,' dedicated to the lords of the admiralty In 1762 he published 'An Essay on the Medical Constitution of Great Britain,' inscribed to his friend, Sir John Pringle In 1765 he received from the university of St Andrews the degree of M D A few years before his death, he placed in the library of the Infirmary at Leeds a manuscript, extending to nearly 700 pages, of medical observations, for which he received a vote of thanks A manuscript treatise on Fortification, which he presented to the prince of Wales, afterwards George IV, was deposited in his royal highness's private library Dr Bisset wrote also a small treatise on Naval Tactics, and a few political papers on subjects of temporary importance He died at Knayton, near Thirsk, in May 1791, in the 75th year of his age —Gentlemen's Mag vol lxi

BISSET, James, an eccentric but ingenious artist, was born in Perth about 1742 When he was about fifteen years of age he went to Birmingham, where he resided for about thirty-six years, having established there a museum and shop for the sale of curiosities In 1813 he removed to Leamington, where he had opened a news-room and picture gallery the preceding year His collection consisted principally of articles in natural history, particularly birds, the costume and arms of savage nations, models in wax and rice paste, &c In 1814, we find him styling himself Modeller to his Majesty He had a remarkable facility in writing rhymes, which he indulged in on all occasions Even his Guides and Directories were half prose and half verse To the works subjoined, of which he was the author, might be added a long series of ephemeral verses, which his loyal and patriotic muse poured forth on every public occasion, and particularly on the periodical recurrence of the Shakspearian jubilee at Stratford, a few of which were admitted into the pages of the 'Gentleman's Magazine' In a letter to the editor of that periodical, dated in 1831, he said that there was not a single newspaper taken in, in Leamington, till he established public rooms there His mind was ever active in suggesting public improvements, and there is no doubt that that now fashionable and increasing watering-place owes much to Bisset's enterprise and public spirit He collected many paintings of value, and executed some very good pieces himself On his death, his pictures were disposed of by auction He died August 17, 1832

A Poetic Survey round Birmingham, with a brief Description of the different Curiosities and Manufactures of the Place, accompanied by a Magnificent Directory, with the names and professions, &c, superbly engraved in emblematical plates 12mo, 1800

BLACK, a name, like Brown, White, &c, originally given, when surnames began to be first used, which in Scotland was not till about the beginning of the twelfth century, to persons in the middle or lower ranks who had no lands, from the colour of the visage or hair, or some peculiarity in the mental or personal character, and when the surname was not assumed from a trade or occupation, as Smith, Cook, Hunter, &c, or from the name of the father, with the addition of son, as Williamson, Johnson, Robertson, &c

BLACK, JOSEPH, M D, the founder of pneumatic chemistry, though not a native of Scotland, was of Scottish descent, and long resided in this country He was born on the banks of the Garonne in France in 1728 His father, John Black, who was a native of Belfast, but of a Scottish family, had settled at Bordeaux, as a wine merchant, and lived in intimacy with the celebrated Montesquieu, who expressed his regret in strong terms on Mr Black's quitting Bordeaux, when he retired from business, as appears by several of his letters His mother was a daughter of Mr Robert Gordon of Hillhead, Aberdeenshire, and by her Dr Black was nearly related to the wives of Dr Adam Fergusson and Mr James Russell, professor of Natural Philosophy at the University of Edinburgh In 1740, when he was twelve years old, he was sent to Belfast, to receive the rudiments of his education In 1746 he entered as a student at the university of Glasgow, where Dr Cullen the same year became professor of chemistry He prosecuted his studies, particularly in physical science, with so much assiduity and success that he soon attracted the notice of this eminent man, who made him his assistant in all his chemical experiments In 1751, having chosen the profession of medicine, to complete his medical studies he went to the university of Edinburgh, at that time rising into reputation as a medical school, where in 1754 he took the degree of M D His inaugural thesis on this occasion was entitled 'De Acido a Cibis orto, et de Magnesia Alba,' in which was contained an outline of his celebrated discovery of fixed air, or carbonic acid gas, which he now, for the first time, showed to be the true cause of the causticity of alkalies This important discovery, with that of latent heat, for which we are also indebted to Dr Black, laid the foundation of modern pneumatic chemistry, which has opened to the investigation of the philosopher a fourth kingdom of nature, viz the gaseous kingdom In 1755 he published his 'Experiments on Magnesia, Quicklime, and other Alkaline Substances,' which more fully developed his views on the subject he had touched upon in his thesis His opinions, of course, gave rise to considerable discussion, particularly in Germany, but he was enabled satisfactorily to answer and refute all objections In 1756, Dr Cullen having removed to Edinburgh, Dr Black was appointed his successor, as professor of anatomy and lecturer on chemistry, in the university of Glasgow The former chair he soon exchanged for that of medicine, for which he was better qualified One of his pupils at Glasgow was Watt, the celebrated inventor of the improved steam-engine, who was led by Dr Black's views and theories respecting the nature of steam, and particularly on the subject of evaporation, to make those great improvements which have been of so much benefit to science Between the years 1759 and 1763, Dr Black matured those speculations on latent heat which had for some time engaged his attention An observation of Fahrenheit's, recorded by Dr Boerhaave, that water would become considerably colder than melting snow, without freezing, and would freeze in a moment if disturbed, and in the act of freezing emit many degrees of heat, seems to have suggested to Dr Black the notion that the heat received by ice during its conversion into water was not lost, but was contained in the water The experiments by which he demonstrated the existence of what he termed latent heat in bodies will be found fully detailed in his 'Lectures' The result of these he first read, in April 1762, to a select society in Glasgow, and afterwards before the Newtonian Society in Edinburgh He remained in Glasgow, occasionally practising as a physician, till 1766, when Dr Cullen being appointed professor of medicine in Edinburgh, Dr Black was removed to the chemical chair in that university, where he continued for about thirty years He contributed a paper to the 'Philosophical Transactions of

London,' for 1774, entitled 'Observations on the more ready freezing of water that has been boiled' The only other paper written by him was published in the second volume of the 'Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh,' being an 'Analysis of the Waters of some boiling Springs in Iceland,' in which he found a considerable quantity of silica The following portrait of Dr Black is engraved from the painting by Sir Henry Raeburn

Dr Black was never married He long resided in the house in Nicholson Street, Edinburgh, which now forms the Blind Asylum He was simple in his habits, and very abstemious in his diet He died suddenly November 26, 1799, while sitting at table with his usual fare, viz , some bread, a few prunes, and a measured quantity of milk diluted with water Having the cup in his hand, feeling the approach of death, he set it carefully down on his knees, which were joined together, and kept it steady in his hand, in the manner of a person perfectly at ease, and in this attitude expired, without spilling a drop, and without a writhe in his countenance, as if an experiment had been wanted to show to his friends the facility with which he departed He was in the 71st year of his age

Dr Black was of a cheerful and sociable disposition, and, as his mind was well stored with information, he was, at all times an entertaining companion His company was therefore much courted, and as his circumstances were affluent, he dedicated as much time to the pleasures of society as was consistent with his avocations He left the principal part of his fortune, which is said to have been considerable, among the children of his brothers and sisters After his death his 'Lectures on Chemistry' were published from his notes in 2 vols 4to, by his friend and colleague, Dr Robison late professor of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh —Thomson's History of Chemistry —Scots Mag for 1803

BLACKADDER, a surname derived from lands on the stream of that name in the Merse division of Berwickshire The true meaning of the word is Blackwater,—adder, from the Cambro-British awedur, signifying 'a running water' When applied to the stream, the word is usually pronounced, and sometimes written, Blaukater

There was an ancient family named Blacader, or Blackadder, who possessed the lands of Tullialan in Perthshire The ruins of the old castle of Tullialan, which formerly belonged to them, are still standing The modern castle of that name belongs to the baroness Keith, by marriage Countess Flahaut in France

The original family was Blackadder of that ilk in Berwickshire, who distinguished themselves in the Border feuds so early as the minority of James the Second, towards the middle of the fifteenth century They received the lands whence they derived their name from that monarch, conferred as a reward for defending the eastern frontier against the incursions of the English Beatrice, eldest daughter of one of the two portioners of Robert Blackadder of Blackadder, married John Home, fourth of the seven sons of Sir David Home of Wedderburn, so well known in border song as "the seven spears of Wedderburn," and thereby got the estate of Blackadder

This marriage, however, was brought about in a very violent manner on the part of the Homes, with the view of acquiring the lands of Blackadder, having, by rapacity and fraud, appropriated to themselves, in course of time the greater part of Berwickshire The person on whom James the Second conferred the lands, and who from them took the surname of Blackadder, as a reward for military services, was named Cuthbert, styled the "Chieftain of the South" The royal grant is dated in 1452 On his expeditions against the English who crossed the borders for plunder he was accompanied by his seven sons who, from the darkness of their complexion, were called the "Black band of the Blackadders" [Writs of the Family, quoted in Crichton's Life of the Rev John Blackadder] When the country required to be put in a posture of defence against the preparations of Edward the Fourth, the Blackadders raised a body from among their kindred and retainers, the Elliots, Armstrongs, Johnstons, and other hardy and warlike borderers to the number of two hundred and seventeen men, all accoutred with jack and spear Their castle, a fortress of some strength, was planted with artillery, and furnished with a garrison of twenty soldiers [Ibid Redpath's Border History] Cuthbert and his sons joined the train of adventurers from Scotland, who had embarked in the wars of York and Lancaster, marshalling themselves under the banner of the Red Rose, and fighting for the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry the Seventh, at Bosworth, where the father and three of his sons were left dead on the field Andrew, the eldest of the surviving brothers, succeeded to the barony of Blackadder Robert and Patrick entered into holy orders The former became prior of Coldingham, the latter was made dean of Dunblane The fourth brother, William, remained in England, where he obtained a title and opulent possessions [Writs of the Family of Blackadder] In memorial of their services at Bosworth, King James granted the family permission to carry on their shield the roses of York and Lancaster It was afterwards quartered with the house of Edmonstone, held, azure, cheveron, argent, upper left hand, gules, crest, a dexter hand holding a broadsword, motto 'Courage helps fortune'

Andrew Blackadder the proprietor of the estate, married a daughter of the house of Johnston of Johnston, ancestor of the earls of Annandale and had two sons Robert and Patrick Robert, the elder son, espoused Alison Douglas, fourth daughter of George, Master of Angus, and sister of Archibald, earl of Angus He followed the standard of the Douglases at Flodden in 1513, and was slain with his father-in-law and two hundred gentlemen of the name of Douglas, on that disastrous field, leaving a widow and two daughters, Beatrix and Margaret, who, at the time, were mere children [Redpath's Border History] Of Patrick, the younger son, described as a man of chivalry, who obtained by marriage the estate of Tullallan in Perthshire, the succeeding paragraph gives an account From the unprotected state of Robert's daughters, the Homes of Wedderburn formed the design of seizing the lands of Blackadder, and the way in which they succeeded in their villanous projects but too illustrative of the manners of those rude times to be omitted, especially as by it the patrimonial estate of the Blackadders was for ever wrested from the rightful owners They began by cutting off all within their reach, whose affinity was dreaded as an hereditary obstacle They attacked Robert Blackadder, the prior of Coldingham, at the village of Lamberton, while following the sports of the chase, and assassinated him and six of his attendants [Leslie's Hist of Scotland, p 389 History of the Homes] His brother, the dean of Dunblane, shared the same fate Various others were despatched in a similar manner Patrick Blackadder, the cousin of the late prior, endeavoured to obtain the priory of Coldingham, but on the active interference of the Homes, it was bestowed on William Douglas, brother of the earl of Angus They now assaulted the castle of Blackadder, where the widow and her two young daughters resided The garrison refused to surrender, but the Homes succeeded in obtaining possession of the fortress, and seized the widow and her children, compelling them to marriage by force Sir David Home of Wedderburn married the widow The two daughters were contracted to his brothers, John and Robert, in 1518, and as they were then only in their eighth year, they were confined, by John Home, in the castle of Blackadder till they came of age [Douglas' Peerage, vol ii p 174] The estate, however, had been entailed in the male line, and should have passed to Sir John Blackadder, then baron of Tullallan, the cousin and tutor of the ladies, as nearest heir of tailzie But the Homes, who obtained the sanction of the earl of Angus to marry his nieces, refused to quit possession of the lands, or deliver up the fortress Sir John applied to the legislature for redress against them but at that period there was no regular administration of justice in Scotland, and both parties had recourse to the sword During the long minority of James the Fifth, they were involved in mutual hostilities Sir John Blackadder was beheaded in March 1531 for the murder of James Inglis, abbot of Culross, "because when he was absent at Edinburgh, the said abbot gave ane tack above his head to the Lord Erskine of the lands of Balgowne' Happening to meet with him on his return, he resolved to be avenged Both parties being of equal number, about sixteen horse, a rencontre took place 'at the Ionhead of Rosyth near Culross,' which ended in the slaughter of the abbot Patrick, archdeacon of Glasgow, succeeded his brother in Tullallan He held also, by the king's special commission, the wardenship of Blackadder, to which he had been appointed, under warrant and command from the governor of Scotland While archdeacon he had authority granted him by the Pope, in 1510, to visit all kirks and monasteries within the bounds of the see of Glasgow He got also, in 1521, the priory of Coldingham, (which William Douglas had forcibly held,) by the king's seal, with consent of the duke of Albany, protector and governor of Scotland In this office he was succeeded by his brother, Adam Blackadder, abbot of Dundrennan in Galloway, the first worth two thousand pounds, the latter one thousand pounds a-year For bearing Sir Patrick's expenses in travelling to France to procure these appointments from Albany, who was there at the time, the said Adam bound himself to pay three thousand pounds, for which he gave in pledge two massy silver cups till the debt was discharged [Writs of the Family, quoted in Crichton's Life of the Rev John Blackadder] Sir Patrick renewed the process against the Homes, for the recovery of Blackadder Under pretence of submitting the dispute to friends, to have all differences settled in an amicable way, the Homes appointed a day to meet Sir Patrick at Edinburgh Thither accordingly he repaired, without suspicion of treachery, having received warrant of safe convoy from Archibald, earl of Angus, under the great seal, and accompanied by a small retinue of domestics, fifteen or sixteen horsemen, who usually rode in his train, but was clandestinely waylaid by a body of fifty horse, that lay in ambush near the Dean, within a mile of Edinburgh Being well-mounted he made a gallant charge, and broke through the ambuscade, killing several with his own hand Overpowered with numbers he fled, taking the road towards the West Port, fiercely pursued On approaching the city, he was surprised by a fresh troop of horse, secretly posted in a hollow, where St Cuthbert's church now stands These joining in the pursuit, he made the best of his speed to gain the entrance by the Nether Bow, or the Canongate, but before he could reach the ford of the Loch a party of foot sallied out from another place of concealment to intercept him Finding himself beset on all hands, he ventured to take the North Loch, near to the place called Wallace's tower (properly Well-house tower) on the Castle brae, when his horse becoming embogged, he and all his attendants were basely murdered This was in the year 1526 Hume of Godscroft has recorded this affray, (Hist of House of Angus, vol ii p 86,) but he makes the archdeacon the aggressor This was the last attempt that the Blackadders made to obtain redress The estate of Blackadder, of which they were thus fraudulently dispossessed, remained in the family of Home Both Hume and Buchanan, mistakenly, call Patrick archdeacon of Dunblane instead of Glasgow, and the brother of Robert heir of Blackadder, whereas he was his nephew

As above stated Sir Patrick, younger son of Andrew Blackadder, acquired the lands of Tulhallan in Perthshire, by his marriage with Elizabeth, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir James Edmonstone of Edmonstone Her dowery was only half the lands, but Sir Walter Ogilvy, who had married her younger sister, "excambed his moiety with Sir Patrick, in 1493, for the thanedom of Boyne" Robert Blackadder, his son, was, in 1480, being then at Rome, with a public character from King James the Third, consecrated bishop of Aberdeen by Pope Sixtus the Fourth In 1484 he was translated to the bishopric of Glasgow He had so much favour at Rome that he obtained from the Pope the erection of the see of Glasgow into an archbishopric He was frequently employed in the public transactions of the period with the English, and particularly in the year 1505 With the earl of Bothwell, and Andrew Forman, prior of Pittenweem, he negotiated the marriage between King James the Fourth and Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry the Seventh, which laid the foundation for the union of the two kingdoms of Scotland and England He stood, likewise, with the earl of Bothwell, godfather to the young prince, who did not long survive The archbishop died in 1508, while on a journey to the Holy Land [Keith's Scottish Bishops, p 254]

In the Appendix to Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, (vol i part i page 100,) under date August 18, 1499, there is a 'Remission to Andro Blacatar of that Ilk and Nimiane Nesbit, for the forthocht felony done be thaim apone Philip Nesbit of Wester Nesbit and Johne, his brother, Patrick Nesbit in Mongois Wall, &c And for the cruell slauchter of umquhile the said John Nesbit, and Philip Nesbit in Mongois Wall, apone forthocht felony committit And for the spulzeing of thair gudis, &c And of all crimes that in onywise may be input to thaim for the committing of the said slauchter and forthocht felony, in the kingis palace and residence, quhare his hienes was personallie present' In the same valuable work [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i, part i, p 41] is given in full, a special respite, granted by James the Fourth, on 28th August, 1504, in favour of the 'men, kin, tenentis, factouris, and servandis of Robert, archbishop of Glasgow, (then about to proceed to Rome on the king's business,) and especially for the slauchter of umquhile Thomas Ruthirfurde within the abbaye of Jedworthe' Among the persons mentioned in the said 'Respuyt,' as taken under the special protection of the king in the archbishop's absence, are 'Andro Blacader of that ilk, Schirris Johne Forman of Ruthirfurde, Baldrede Blacader, knychtes, Adam Blacader, Charlis Blacader, Dame Elizabeth Edmonstoune ladv of Tullyallane, Patrick Blacader hir sone and aire, Margaret Blacader lady of Carnschallo, Johne Maxwel hir sone and aire, Master Johne Blacader, Persone of Kirkpatrick-Flemyng, Schir Patrik Blacader, Persone of Ranpatrik, Robert Blacader, sone and apperand aire to Andro Blacader of that ilk,' &c

The name properly should be Blackader, but according to modern orthography it is usually spelled with two ds Besides the noble family of Angus, the house of Blackadder formed intermarriages with the family of Graham, earls of Menteith, and Bruce of Clackmannan, whose line still survives in the earls of Elgin and Kincardine "They espoused the part of the unfortunate Mary, and sided with the cavaliers in the parliamentary wars of Charles the First There was a cadet of this family in the Spanish service, under Ludovic, earl of Crawford, and another served with Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden, in his campaigns for the relief of the distressed protestants in Germany One of their last lineal representatives raised a body of troops, and joined the earl of Glencairn, who, with some of the Highland chiefs, in 1653, assembled a considerable force in the north to repel the usurpations of Cromwell" [Crichton's Life and Diary of Col J Blackadder, p 15]

The estate and castle of Tulhallan continued to be possessed by the Blackadders for five generations The next baron after Sir Patrick was John In 1532 he undertook a pilgrimage, probably to expiate his father's sacrilege, and during his stay beyond seas, King James granted a warrant of protection to all his domestics, tenants and vassals He adhered to the interests of the ill-fated queen Mary, and an insurrection having taken place of some of the nobles who were discontented at her marriage with Darnley, she addressed a letter to him, with her own hand, "to meet her at Stirling, on the 13th of August, 1565, with his kin, friends, and household, to pursue the rebels, [as they were called,] who had directed their march southward" Disagreeing among themselves, however, the insurgent nobles durst not hazard an engagement with the queen's forces, but fled from Edinburgh, and took their way through Biggar to Dumfries, "the king all the while dogging them at their heels" This was called the Runaway Raid, or Wild Goose Chase [Hist of the House of Angus, vol ii page 155] John Blackadder's son, Captain William Blackadder, was with the queen's army at Langside After that event he was taken and executed, being also accused of having been concerned in the murder of Darnley With three others, he was drawn backward on a cart to the cross of Edinburgh, and there hanged and quartered, on the 24th of June 1567 Roland Blackadder, subdean of Glasgow, was a younger brother of John The next laird of Tulhallan was James Blackadder, who married Alison, daughter of Bruce of Clackmannan His only son inherited his estate about 1602 The latter married Elizabeth Bruce of Balfouls, by whom he had Sir John Blackadder, born in 1596 He was, in 1626, created a baronet of Nova Scotia—a dignity which none of his posterity ever enjoyed Being of a wasteful and extravagant turn he impoverished his estate, and retired to the Continent He bore a commission for some time in the French guards, and died in America about 1651 He married Elizabeth Graham, daughter of John, sixth earl of Menteith, and had two sons and a daughter, Marriott, married to Laurence, eldest son of Laurence Oliphant, Esq of Condie, Perthshire

lineal heir, having survived all nearer claimants, but as the prodigality of its first possessor had reduced it to an empty honour, it was never assumed either by himself or any of his descendants He was of a younger branch of the Tullhallan family, who possessed the lands and barony of Blairhall, near Culross His grandfather, Adam Blackadder of Blairhall, married Helen, daughter of the celebrated Robert Pont, minister of St. Cuthbert's, near Edinburgh, and one of the last of the clerical order that sat as a Lord of Session The only fruit of this marriage was John, father of the Rev John Blackadder, minister of Troqueer The minister himself had seven children, five sons and two daughters

The eldest son, William, was born in 1647, and studied medicine In 1665, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh He was present at Bothwell Brig, and took an active part in that affair He graduated at Leyden in Holland in 1680 In 1685 he returned to Scotland with the earl of Argyle in his unfortunate expedition, and was taken prisoner on his landing at Kirkwall in Orkney After he had been more than a year in prison, a remission came down from London in his favour, and he was set at liberty, on which he proceeded to Holland, where he remained till 1688, some weeks before the prince of Orange came over In the month of August that year, he and Colonel Cleland were sent to Scotland, to prepare the way for the Prince's landing in the subsequent November Having imprudently ventured up to the castle of Edinburgh, to see one Captain Mackay, a patient of his, he was apprehended by the duke of Gordon, the governor of the castle After being subjected to several examinations before a committee of the council, on rumours of the prince of Orange's invasion reaching Edinburgh, he was set at liberty, without being put to the torture, though it was frequently threatened After the Revolution Dr Blackadder was appointed physician to King William, and died, without issue, about the year 1704

The second son, Adam, was bred to the mercantile profession in Stirling, and in the month of November 1674, while yet an apprentice, was, with several others, apprehended for not subscribing the black bond, as it was called, and for attending conventicles His brother, Dr Blackadder, presented a petition to the council, and after some time obtained his freedom He was twice afterwards imprisoned, once in Fife, and another time in Blackness The latter was for being at his father's preaching at Borrowstounness, where he baptized twenty-six children He was afterwards a merchant in Sweden, where he resided for about nine years, and married a Swedish woman, whom he converted from Lutheranism to Calvinism, on account of which he was obliged to fly with her from her country, escaping with great difficulty, it being at that time death in Sweden for a native Swede to turn either Catholic or Calvinist About the end of 1684 he returned to Scotland, and settled in Edinburgh He wrote an account of his father's sufferings, which he transmitted to the historian Wodrow, and some political tracts concerning the Darien expedition, and the state of parties in Scotland The late Mr John Blackadder, accountant-general of excise, was his grandson

Robert, the third son studied theology at the university of Utrecht, where he died in 1689

Thomas, the fourth son, appears also to have been a merchant He went to New England shortly after his father's imprisonment, and died in Maryland before his father

The fifth and youngest son was named John after himself, and became a lieutenant-colonel in the army His Life and Diary, by Andrew Crichton, the biographer of his father, was published at Edinburgh in 1824 He was born at Barndennoch, in the parish of Glencairn, Dumfries-shire, September 14, 1664 He very early evinced a religious disposition, and at the age of twelve is said to have partaken of the Lord's Supper He entered the army in 1689, in his twenty fifth year, as a cadet, at sixpence a day, in the regiment (now the 26th of the Line), raised at the Revolution by the Cameronians, under the command of the earl of Angus, only son of the marquis of Douglas, of which the accomplished soldier and poet, William Cleland, was the lieutenant colonel In less than two months he became lieutenant. He was engaged in the affair at Dunkeld, 21st August 1689, when the Cameronians were attacked by the Highlanders, and in which their gallant lieutenant-colonel, Cleland fell, an interesting account of which, in a letter to his brother, written on the spot, was printed in the periodical papers of the time, and is inserted in Crichton's Life and Diary of Col Blackadder, (pp 102—105) On this occasion the Highlanders, victorious at Killiecrankie in the previous month, were signally defeated and repulsed It is stated that an attempt was made by Colonel Cannan, their commander, to induce the Highlanders to renew their attack on the Cameronian regiment, but they declined, for this reason, that although still ready to fight with men, they would not again encounter devils [Life and Diary of Colonel Blackadder, p 98] Blackadder afterwards accompanied his regiment abroad, and gradually rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel He served with distinguished honour under the great duke of Marlborough in the wars of Queen Anne He was present at the battles of Donawert, Blenheim, Ramilies, and most of the engagements of that celebrated campaign He was a member of the General Assembly in 1716, and died deputy-governor of Stirling castle in 1729 He had the character of a brave soldier and a devout Christian

One of Mr Blackadder's daughters died young in Glencairn The other, Elizabeth, married, in 1687, a Mr Young, a writer in Edinburgh Having fallen into difficulties, he went to London, with a design to improve his circumstances While there he wrote an excellent consolatory letter to his wife in Edinburgh, which has often been printed under the title of Faith Promoted, and Fears Prevented, from a proper view of affliction as God's rod' Mrs Young appears to have been a lady of remarkable piety and superior learning She kept a diary or 'Short Account of the Lord's providence towards her,' which gives a summary of the memorable events of her life from 1700 until 1724 She died in 1732 The descendants of her family still survive —Crichton's Memoirs of the Rev. John Blackadder

BLACKADDER, JOHN, an eminent minister of the Church of Scotland, was born in 1615 He was the representative, as above-stated, of the Blackadders of Tullhallan, and the grand nephew of the celebrated topographer Timothy Pont He studied divinity in Glasgow, under the eye of his mother's brother, Principal Strang of that university Having been duly licensed, in 1652 he received a call to the parish church of Troqueer, in the neighbourhood of Dumfries In 1662, when episcopacy was attempted to be forced on Scotland, Mr Blackadder, in his sermons on several Sundays, energetically exposed its unlawfulness, and, to use his own phrase, "entered his dissent in heaven" against it In consequence of this, and the refusal of the presbytery of Dumfries to celebrate, by order of parliament, the anniversary of the Restoration, he and some of his brethren were conducted to Edinburgh, by a troop of fifty horse sent for the purpose, but after a few examinations, he soon obtained his liberty An episcopal incumbent having got possession of his charge, he and his wife, who was a Miss Haining, daughter of a merchant in Dumfries, and their numerous family, went to reside at Caitloch, in the parish of Glencairn, where he occasionally preached to large assemblages of people, which coming to the knowledge of the authorities, he was obliged once more to remove For several years after this he seems to have led a wandering life, preaching in the fields wherever he could get it done without molestation His exertions were not confined to Dumfries shire or Galloway, but extended to almost every county south of the Tay There was scarcely a hill, we are told, a moor or a glen in the southern and western districts of Scotland, where he did not hold a conventicle, or dispense the sacrament In these excursions he was frequently the companion and coadjutor of Welsh, Peden, Cargill, and other undaunted Covenanters, who in the face of peril and the sword unflinchingly maintained the right and the liberty of the national worship

In 1670, having conducted divine worship at a place near Dunfermline, where the people had armed themselves in self-defence, he was summoned before the privy council, but did not obey the citation When the search for him had become a little relaxed, he renewed the custom of preaching wherever opportunity offered On one particular occasion he delivered a sermon at Kinkell, near St Andrews, when, notwithstanding the injunctions of Archbishop Sharp, the people all flocked to hear him It is stated that when Sharp desired the provost to march out the militia, to disperse the congregation, he was told it was impossible, as the militia had gone there already as worshippers In 1674 Blackadder was outlawed, and a reward of a thousand merks offered for his apprehension In 1680 he proceeded to Holland, and settled his eldest son at the university of Leyden, to graduate as a doctor of medicine After a few months' absence he returned to Scotland, and in 1681 was arrested in his own house at Edinburgh, and confined in the state prison on the Bass Rock, where he remained about four years His health being much impaired by the dampness and closeness of his place of confinement, his friends applied to government for his liberation, but unwilling to grant him his release, it was at first proposed to remove him to the jail either of Haddington or Dunbar At length he was offered his freedom, with permission to reside at Edinburgh, on condition of his granting a bond for five thousand merks So much delay, however, took place, that, before he could regain his liberty, he sunk under the cruel hardships to which he was subjected, among which "hope deferred" was not one of the least He died in the prison of the Bass in December 1685, in his 70th year, and was buried in North Berwick churchyard His cell in the Bass is still pointed out to the visitor Of his children an account has been given in the preceding article Blackadder's Life, by Dr Andrew Crichton, was published in 1823

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, D D, an ingenious poet and divine, the son of poor but industrious parents, natives of Cumberland, was born at Annan, in Dumfries-shire, November 10, 1721 Before he was six months old, he was deprived of sight by the small-pox As he grew up, his father educated him at home to the best of his ability, and read to him instructive and entertaining books, particularly the works of Spenser, Milton, Prior, Pope, and Addison He was also partial to those of Thomson and Allan Ramsay By the aid of some of his companions who attended the grammar school, and pitied his misfortune, and were won by the gentleness of his disposition, he acquired an imperfect knowledge of the Latin tongue He began to compose poetry when he was only about twelve years of age, and one of his early pieces is preserved in the collection published after his death When he was little more than nineteen, his father, a bricklayer, was killed by the falling of a malt kiln Some of his pieces having, about a year thereafter, come into the hands of Dr John Stevenson, an eminent physician in Edinburgh, that gentleman, struck with his talents, took upon himself the charge of his education, and invited him to that city, where he arrived in 1741 After attending a grammar school for a short time, he was enrolled as a student at the university, where he continued till the year 1745, when, in consequence of the Rebellion, and the disturbed state of the metropolis, he retired to Dumfries, to the house of Mr M'Murdo, who had married his sister At the close of the civil commotions he returned to Edinburgh, and pursued his studies at college for six years longer He not only made considerable progress in the sciences, but obtained a thorough knowledge of the Greek, Latin, and French languages, the latter of which he acquired by conversation with the lady of Provost Alexander, who was a native of France Although the chief inlets to poetical ideas were closed to him, the beauties of creation and all external objects being hid from his view, he wrote poetry, not only with facility, but with success In 1746 he published at Glasgow an 8vo volume of his poems, and in 1754 he brought out at Edinburgh another edition, which was very favourably received, and attracted the notice of the Rev Joseph Spence, professor of poetry at Oxford, who wrote an account of his life and writings, with the design of introducing his name and character to the English public In 1756 a quarto edition of his poems was published in London by subscription, which yielded him a considerable sum

After the completion of his university course, he began to prepare himself for giving lectures on oratory to young men intended for the bar or the pulpit but by the advice of Hume the historian, who interested himself warmly in his behalf, he abandoned the project, and turned his attention towards the church Having devoted the usual time to the study of divinity, he was, in 1759, duly licensed for the ministry by the presbytery of Dumfries On the alarm of a French invasion, in 1761, he published a discourse 'On the right improvement of Time,' and in the same year he contributed some poems to the first volume of Donaldson's collection of original poems, published in Edinburgh In 1762 he married Sarah, the daughter of Mr Joseph Johnston, surgeon in Dumfries The earl of Selkirk obtained for him from the Crown a presentation to the church of Kirkcudbright, and his ordination took place a few days after his marriage, but his appointment was opposed by the parishioners, and after nearly two years' legal contention, he resigned his living, by the advice of his friends, for a moderate annuity He returned to Edinburgh in 1764, and added to his income by receiving, as boarders into his house, a number of young gentlemen, whom he assisted in their studies This system he continued till 1787, when age and increasing infirmities obliged him to give it up In 1766 he obtained the degree of D D from the Marischal college, Aberdeen In 1767 he published 'Paraclesis, or Consolations deduced from Natural and Revealed Religion,' in two dissertations, and in 1768 'Two Discourses on the Spirit and Evidences of Christianity,' translated from the French of M Armand, minister of the Walloon church in Hanau In 1774 appeared his last publication, 'The Graham,' a heroic ballad, in four cantos, intended to promote a good feeling betwixt the inhabitants of England and Scotland, but this poem, being considered of inferior merit, has been excluded from Mackenzie's collection of his works

Dr Blacklock was one of the first to appreciate the genius of Burns the poet, and it was owing to a letter from him to the Rev Dr Lawrie, minister of Loudon, Ayrshire, that Burns, in November 1786, relinquished his design of quitting his native land for Jamaica, and trying his fortune in Edinburgh On his arrival in the metropolis, the doctor treated him with great kindness, and introduced him to many of his literary friends "There was, perhaps, never one among all mankind," says Heron, in a Life of Burns, in the Edinburgh Magazine, "whom you might more truly have called an angel upon earth than Dr Blacklock He was guileless and innocent as a child, yet endowed with manly sagacity and penetration His heart was a perpetual spring of overflowing benignity, his feelings were all tremblingly alive to the sense of the sublime, the beautiful, the tender, the pious, and the virtuous Poetry was to him the dear solace of perpetual blindness, cheerfulness, even to gaiety, was, notwithstanding that irremediable misfortune, long the predominant colour of his mind In his latter years, when the gloom might otherwise have thickened around him, hope, faith, devotion, the most fervent and sublime, exalted his mind to heaven, and made him maintain his wonted cheerfulness in the expectation of a speedy dissolution "

Dr Blacklock died at Edinburgh, July 7, 1791, and was buried in the ground of St Cuthbert's chapel of ease A monument was erected to his memory, with an elegant Latin inscription, from the pen of his friend and frequent correspondent, Dr Beattie Next to conversation, music was his chief recreation He was a performer on several instruments, particularly the flute He generally carried in his pocket a small flageolet, on which he played his favourite tunes He composed with taste, and one of his pieces in this department was inserted in the Edinburgh Magazine and Review for 1774, under the title of 'Absence, a Pastoral, set to Music, by Dr Blacklock' He left a great many sermons in manuscript, together with a treatise on morals, which were never published The article 'Blind,' in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' was contributed by him in 1783 He published in 1756 'An Essay towards a Universal Etymology,' besides one or two sermons In 1793 appeared a quarto edition of his poems, with his life by Henry Mackenzie His attainments in science and in general knowledge, considering his blindness, were truly wonderful, and in all respects he must be considered one of the most singular literary phenomena that has ever appeared in this or any other country

BLACKWELL, THOMAS, an eminent scholar and author, was born at Aberdeen, August 4, 1701 His father, the Rev Thomas Blackwell, was for some time one of the ministers of Aberdeen In 1717 he was appointed principal of Marischal College in that city, and died in 1728 He bestowed the greatest attention on the education of his sons, Thomas and Alexander, a notice of whom follows After receiving the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of his native city, Thomas was sent to study in Marischal College, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1718 Being deeply versed in the Greek language and literature, he was, in December 1723, appointed by the Crown, professor of Greek in the university where he had been educated In 1737 he published at London, without his name, 'An Inquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer,' 8vo, "a production," says Dr Irving, "which displays more erudition than genius, and more affectation than elegance" In 1748 he published anonymously, 'Letters concerning Mythology,' 8vo, which, says the same author, may be classed among pompous trifles The same year, on the death of Principal Osborn, he was appointed principal of Marischal College by the Crown, on whom the patronage had devolved on the forfeiture of the Marischal family in 1716 Soon after he married the daughter of a merchant in Aberdeen, by whom he had no children At the commencement of the session, 1752, on his recommendation, a new order in teaching the sciences was introduced into Marischal College, being that now in operation, the plan of academical education previously in use being found insufficient In the same year he took the degree of doctor of laws, and in 1753 he published the first volume of his 'Memoirs of the Court of Augustus,' 4to The second volume appeared in 1755, and the third, which was posthumous, and left incomplete by the author, was prepared for the press by John Mills, Esq, and published in 1764 This work was severely criticised by Dr Johnson, and, like all Blackwell's productions, is now seldom looked into On account of declining health, Dr Blackwell was advised to travel, but could proceed no farther than Edinburgh, where he died of a consumptive disease, March 6, 1757, in his 56th year His widow survived him for many years, and in 1793, she founded a professorship of chemistry in Marischal College She also left a premium of £10 sterling to be annually given to the person who should compose and deliver the best discourse in the English language upon a certain specified subject —Biog Brit —Blackwell's works are

BLACKWELL, ALEXANDER, a man of great natural genius, and an accomplished Greek and Latin scholar, brother of the preceding, was born in Aberdeen about the beginning of the eighteenth century In the Encyclopædia Britannica, 7th edition, he is stated to have been the son of a dealer in knit-hose in Aberdeen, but this is evidently a mistake, his father, as stated in the preceding life, being one of the ministers of Aberdeen, and principal of Marischal College After completing his academical education at Marischal College, he went to Leyden, where he studied physic under the celebrated Boerhaave, and took the degree of M D ELIZABETH, his wife, the authoress of the most extraordinary botanical work of her day, was the daughter of a stocking merchant in Aberdeen of the same name, and probably a relative of her husband, to whom she was secretly married, and some accounts say that he eloped with her to London, but it appears that he had first endeavoured to establish a practice in his native city, and not succeeding, he removed to the British metropolis, and became corrector of the press to Mr Wilkins, a printer He afterwards commenced the printing business himself in the Strand, and continued to carry it on till 1734, when, in consequence chiefly of an action being brought against him for not having served a regular apprenticeship to the trade, he became involved in debt, and was thrown into prison Luckily his wife possessed a taste for the drawing and colouring of flowers, which she now turned to account Engravings of flowers were then very rare, and Mrs Blackwell thought that the publication of an Herbal might yield her such a remuneration as would enable her to discharge her husband's debts Having submitted her first drawings to Sir Hans Sloane and Dr Mead, these eminent physicians encouraged her to proceed with the work She also received the kindest countenance from Mr Philip Miller, then well known as a writer on horticulture She was also patronised by Mr Rand of the botanical garden at Chelsea, by whose advice she, in the year 1735, took lodgings in the neighbourhood of this garden, for more ready access to those flowers and plants which she required for her work, and proceeded to make drawings of them, thereafter engraving them on copper, and colouring the work herself Her husband added the Latin names of the different plants, and a brief description of each, chiefly taken, by permission, from Miller's 'Botanicum Officinale' The first volume of her Herbal, containing 252 plates, appeared in 1737, and the second, with 248 plates, in 1739 It was published in a complete form, under the title of 'A curious Herbal, containing five hundred Cuts of the most useful Plants which are now used in the practice of Physic, engraved on folio copperplates, after drawings taken from the Life, by Elizabeth Blackwell, to which is added a short Description of the Plants, and their common uses in Physic,' folio This work raised Mrs Blackwell very high in public estimation, and by its means she was enabled to free her husband from prison The college of physicians, to whom she was permitted to present in person the first volume on its completion, not only made her a handsome present, but gave her a testimonial, signed by the president and censors of the institution, strongly recommendatory of her work

After his release, the duke of Chandos employed Blackwell to superintend some agricultural operations at Cannons Having published a work on agriculture, a copy of it was transmitted to the king of Sweden by his ambassador in this country, in consequence of which he was offered an engagement at Stockholm, which he accepted About 1740, leaving his wife and child in London, he sailed for the Swedish capital On his arrival he was ordered apartments in the house of the prime minister, and allowed a pension Having, during a dangerous illness of the king, prescribed with success for his majesty, he was, on his recovery, appointed one of the king's physicians At this time he was in the full enjoyment of the favour of the court, and having submitted to the king a scheme for draining certain large fens and marshes, this was tried, and found to be successful To his wife, who was on the point of joining him, he remitted large sums of money, but his career in Sweden was destined soon to come to a fatal close He was arrested on suspicion of being concerned in a plot with Count Tessin to overturn the government, and alter the line of succession After being subjected to the torture, he was tried before a royal commission, and sentenced to be broken alive on the wheel, for which beheading was afterwards substituted He was executed August 9, 1748, protesting his innocence to the last Having prayed for a short time, he laid his head on the block, but in a wrong posture, on which, in the spirit of jesting which distinguished Sir Thomas More at his execution, he excused himself for his awkwardness, as it was his first experiment in that way The date of his wife's death is unknown An edition of her work was published on the continent

BLACKWOOD, ADAM, a learned but bigoted writer of the sixteenth century, who distinguished himself as the antagonist of Buchanan and the defender of Queen Mary, was born at Dunfermline in 1539 He was the son of William Blackwood, a gentleman by birth, by his wife, Helen Reid, granddaughter of John Reid of Aikenhead, who was slain at Flodden Her uncle, Robert Reid, bishop of Orkney and president of the court of session, bequeathed eight thousand merks for the foundation of a college in Edinburgh, and has, therefore, some claim to be considered the founder of that university [See REID, ROBERT, an eminent prelate] Blackwood's father was slain in battle before he had reached his tenth year, and his mother did not long survive him His grand-uncle, the bishop of Orkney, having undertaken the charge of his education, sent him at a proper age to the university of Paris At the age of nineteen he lost his relative and benefactor, who died at Dieppe, on the 15th September 1558 Soon after, young Blackwood returned to Scotland By the munificence of Queen Mary, at that time residing with her first husband, the dauphin, at the court of France, he was enabled to resume his academical career at Paris He now applied himself to the study of mathematics and philosophy, and also to the acquirement of the oriental languages He afterwards attended a course of law at the university of Toulouse, where he resided for two years On his return to Paris he sought for employment as a teacher of philosophy In 1574 he published his earliest work, a poem on the death of Charles the Ninth of France, whose reign has been for ever rendered infamous by the massacre of St Bartholomew In the following year appeared his first two books on the connexion of religion and government A third book was added in 1612 On the recommendation of James Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow, then living in exile in Paris, Queen Mary bestowed upon him the office of a counsellor, that is, judge, of the parliament of Poitiers The province of Poitou had been assigned to her for the payment of her dowry, and her letters patent were confirmed by the French king, Henry the Third According to Dr Mackenzie [Lives of Scots Writers, vol iii p 488] he was likewise appointed professor of the civil law in the university of Poitiers, but this is evidently a mistake A list of his works is given below Among them is his 'Apologia pro Regibus,' which appeared in 1581, intended as an answer to the eloquent and masterly dialogue of Buchanan on the rights of the crown of Scotland He inscribed his work to the queen, who had nominated him a privy councillor, and to her son, afterwards James the Sixth When Mary was a prisoner in England, in the hope of rendering her some material service during her captivity, he made more than one voyage to England, and soon after her tragical death he published in French a long account of her treatment, under the title of 'Martyre de la Reyne d'Escosse,' with a zealous vindication of her character In this work he bitterly reviles the enemies of Mary, not sparing John Knox and Queen Elizabeth in his wrath, describing the former as "a true member and apostle of Satan," and recommending a general crusade of Christian princes against the latter as "a foul murderess" To this work was added a collection of poems in Latin, French, and Italian, upon Mary and Elizabeth, those on the latter written in a style of the most intense vituperation

In 1604, Blackwood again visited London, and having been presented to King James, he was honoured with a very gracious reception In 1606 he published a Latin poem which he had written on the accession of James the Sixth to the throne of England He also wrote some pious meditations in prose and verse, and projected a continuation of Boyce's History of Scotland, which, from his extreme and bigoted views, it is as well that he did not live to finish He died in 1613, in the 74th year of his age, and was interred in St Por-

charius' church at Poitiers, where a marble monument, with a long inscription, was erected to his memory

He had married Catherine Courtinier, daughter of the "procureur de roi" of Poitiers His wife bore to him four sons and seven daughters One of his sons became a judge of the same court Another fell in battle during the civil wars of France One of his daughters was married to his countryman, George Crichton, doctor of the canon law, royal professor of Greek in the university of Paris, after whose death, she became the wife of François de la Mothe le Vayer Of the rest of the family there are no memorials In France the name is Blacwod [Irving's Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i]

An elegant edition of Blackwood's works in Latin and French, appeared at Paris in one volume, thirty-one years after his death, under the title of 'Adami Blacvodæi, in Curia Præsidiali Pictonum, et Urbis in Decurionum Collegio, Regis Consiliarii, Opera Omnia, cum ejus Vita, à Gabriel Naudeo. Paris, 1644, 4to This volume, says Dr Irving contains a portrait of the author by Picart He appears in his official robes

BLACKWOOD, HENRY, physician, elder brother of the preceding, was, about the year 1551, a teacher of philosophy in the university of Paris, where he had been educated Having applied himself to the study of medicine, and taken the degree of M D, he became dean of that faculty and was at one time physician to the duke of Longueville He died about 1613, at an advanced age He was the author of various medical and philosophical treatises His son, who bore the same name, and followed the same profession, became professor of physic in the Royal College, and died at Rouen in 1634 According to the Biographie Universelle, (tom iv p 549,) the younger Henry Blackwood "était un homme de beaucoup de talent, mais très inconstant, philosophe, orateur, médecin, soldat, courtisan, voyageur, et intriguant dans tout ces états" He published an edition of Hippocratis Coi Prognosticorum libri tres, ad veterum exemplarium fidem emendati et recogniti Paris, 1625, 24to

Another brother of Adam Blackwood was George Blackwood, who was also educated at Paris, and taught philosophy in that city about the year 1571, but having subsequently entered into holy orders, he obtained considerable preferment in the French church [Irving's Lives of Scottish Writers, vol i p 168]

BLACKWOOD, WILLIAM, an eminent publisher, and founder of the magazine that bears his name, was born at Edinburgh, November 20, 1776 His parents were respectable, though in a humble station, and he received an excellent education In 1790 he entered on his apprenticeship with Messrs Bell and Bradfute, the well known publishers, and while in their employment he stored his mind with reading of all sorts, especially Scottish history and antiquities In 1797, after the expiry of his apprenticeship, he was engaged by Messrs J Mundell and Co, extensive booksellers in Edinburgh, to go to Glasgow to take the superintendence of a branch of their business in that city, where, having the sole charge, he acquired those habits of decision and promptitude for which he was so remarkable At the end of a year he returned to Bell and Bradfute, with whom he continued another year In 1799 he entered into partnership with Mr Robert Ross, bookseller and book auctioneer, but this connection being dissolved in the course of a few years, he went to London, to the shop of Mr Cuthell, where he obtained a thorough knowledge of the old book trade In 1804 he returned to Edinburgh, and commenced business on his own account, on the South Bridge, as a dealer in old books, in which department his knowledge was allowed to be unusually great He soon after became agent for several of the London publishers, among whom were Messrs Murray, Baldwin, and Cadell, and also commenced publishing for himself Among other works brought out by him were 'Grahame's Sabbath,' 'Kerr's Voyages and Travels,' 18 vols 8vo, and the 'Edinburgh Encyclopedia,' 18 vols 4to In 1812 appeared his celebrated catalogue, containing upwards of fifteen thousand books in various languages, all properly classified, which, we are told, continues to the present day to be a standard authority for the prices of old books In 1816 he disposed of his extensive stock of classical and antiquarian books, and removed to the New Town of Edinburgh, where he thenceforth devoted his energies to the business of a general publisher In April 1817 he brought out the first number of 'Blackwood's Magazine,' which speedily acquired a high character and an extensive circulation Among its first contributors were Mr John Wilson, author of 'The Isle of Palms,' elected in 1820, professor of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, and Mr John G Lockhart, Advocate, afterwards editor of the 'Quarterly Review' Mr Blackwood himself never wrote more than two or three articles for its earlier numbers, but the whole management and arrangement of the magazine devolved upon him, and he executed the editorial duties with unusual tact, skill, and vigour Besides the publications already mentioned, he published the principal works of Messrs Wilson, Lockhart, Hogg, Galt, Moir, and other distinguished contributors to his magazine, as well as several of the productions of Sir Walter Scott He was twice chosen a magistrate of Edinburgh, and while in that capacity, he took a prominent part in the affairs of the city Mr Blackwood died at Edinburgh, September 16, 1834, in the 58th year of his age He was a man of straightforward and independent character, enlarged understanding, and liberal disposition "No man," says the obituary notice which appeared in the magazine after his decease, "ever conducted business in a more direct and manly manner than Mr Blackwood His opinion was on all occasions distinctly expressed, his questions were ever explicit, his answers conclusive His sincerity might sometimes be considered as rough, but no human being ever accused him either of flattering or of shuffling, and those men of letters who were in frequent communication with him soon conceived a respect and confidence for him, which, save in a very few instances, ripened into cordial regard and friendship The masculine steadiness, and imperturbable resolution of his character, were impressed on all his proceedings, and it will be allowed by those who watched him through his career, as the publisher of a literary and political miscellany, that these qualities were more than once very severely tested He dealt by parties exactly as he did by individuals Whether his principles were right or wrong, they were his, and he never compromised or complimented away one tittle of them No changes, either of men or of measures, ever dimmed his eye, or checked his courage" He left a widow, seven sons, and two daughters His two eldest sons succeeded to his business His third son was an officer in the service of the Hon East India Company —Blackwood's Magazine for 1834

BLAIR, a surname of great antiquity in Scotland, and like so many others in that kingdom, is territorial The word Blair or Blar properly signifies a plain clear of woods, but the Celtæ in general choosing such plains for their hostile encounters, the word came at length to signify a field of battle The family of Blair of Blair in Ayrshire, have maintained since the thirteenth century a high position in that county, and a branch of it acquired the lands of Dunskey, in Wigtonshire, by purchase in the year 1658 The Blairs of Blair and the Blairs of Balthyock in Perthshire long disputed the honour of the chiefship James the Sixth, to whom the point was referred, decided that 'the oldest man, for the time being, of either family, should have the precedency' Both families have had several considerable landed families descended from them Those from Balthyock are settled in Perthshire, Forfarshire, and the north, those from Blair of that ilk in the counties of Ayr, Wigton, Renfrew, &c, in the south and west Their arms bear no affinity, but as it will afterwards appear, it does not follow that they may not have descended from the same stock

Of the family of Blair of Blair, the first on record was William de Blair, who, in 1205, during the reign of William the Lion, is mentioned in a contract of agreement, in the charter chest of the burgh of Irvine, betwixt Ralph de Eg-

lingtoun and the village of Irvine It is well-known that many Normans and English came into Scotland during this and the previous reigns, who received grants of lands from the crown The circumstance of his son being a witness to a royal charter (which only tenants-in-chief of the crown, nobles, and ecclesiastics, were privileged to do), proves that the lands he held were a royal fief, and his Norman surname of William, which was also that of his son, never having been borne by natives in Scotland until after Prince Henry, eldest son of David I had bestowed it upon his second son, (the then reigning monarch), along with the Norman prefix de, lends probability to the conjecture that William was an Anglo-Norman warrior, on whom had been bestowed these lands of Blair He died in the reign of Alexander II, and left a son, William de Blair A William de Blair is witness in a charter of King Alexander III to the abbacy of Dunfermline, about the year 1260, but it is uncertain if this is the same William de Blair is said to have had two sons, Sir Bryce, his heir, and David

Sir Bryce, the elder son, was treacherously slain by the English, with other Ayrshire barons, at Ayr in 1296 He left no issue, and was succeeded by his brother David Blair or Blare, who was compelled to swear fealty to King Edward I of England, in 1296, the year of his brother's death In the critical remarks on the Ragman Roll (Prynne's copy) he is mentioned as one of the progenitors of the family David's son, Roger de Blair of that ilk, was a firm friend of King Robert the Bruce, from whom he obtained a charter under the great seal, 'Rogero de Blair, dilecto et fideli nostro' of four chalders of victual yearly out of the lands of Bountrees, in the barony of Cunningham, Ayrshire, to him and his heirs for ever Roger died in the reign of David II

His son, Hugh de Blair, is said to have succeeded him A Hugone del Blare et Johne fratre suo, are mentioned in a charter of confirmation during the reign of David II, to the monastery of Kilwinning as witnesses

Hugh was succeeded by his son, James Blair of that ilk, an adherent of King David Bruce, from whom he got a grant of several tenements of land about the town of Ayr, which had fallen into the king's hand by forfeiture This is confirmed by a charter under the great seal from the said King David, dated at Edinburgh, 3d February, 1368, in the 39th year of his reign Robertson, in his 'Ayrshire Families, states that he had two sons, James, who succeeded him and Sir John, progenitor of the Blairs of Adamton, Ayrshire The lands of Adamton appear from a charter of David II, to have been acquired in or before 1363, by their father in excambion with Sir Robert de Erskine, for the lands of Malerbe and others in Perthshire The Blairs of Adamton flourished for a long series of years until Catherine, only daughter and heiress of David Blair of Adamton, married, in 1776, Sir William Maxwell, baronet, of Monreith She sold Adamton to Robert Reid, Esq, and died in 1798

The next laird, James Blair of that ilk, son of the former, obtained a charter from Robert II, dated 8th May 1375 confirming a charter, granted to his father by David II, of the lands of Corshogyll, &c, in Dumfries-shire, and another, of 28d July, the same year, of the lands of Hartwood, &c He died in the reign of James the First, leaving a son, called David by Douglas in his Baronage (p 194), but his name was more probably Hugh, as Sir Hugh Blair of that ilk appears as witness to several charters of the period in which he lived, the commencement of the fifteenth century

It is supposed that he was succeeded by a son of the name of James, and he by his nephew (Sir Hugh's grandson), John Blair of that ilk, who was served heir to his grandfather, and obtained from James the Third a charter, 'Johanni Blair, de eodem, nepoti et hæredi Jacobi, &c., terrarum baroniæ de Blair, 19 January 1477' He left, with two daughters, Egidia, married to James Kennedy of the family of Cassillis, and Elizabeth, married to Ninian Stewart, of Bute, a son, John Blair of that ilk, who married Lady Elizabeth Montgomery, fifth daughter of Hugh first earl of Eglinton, and had issue John his heir, and Margaret, married to John Crawford of Crawfurdland In Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, there is an entry under date May 18, 1545, the fourth year of Queen Mary, that John Blair and Patrick his son, both then at the horn, found security to underly the law for abiding from the queen's armies at Anerum, on the previous February 27, and Coldingham on December 31, and from other raids

John Blair of that ilk, his son, died in the early part of the reign of James the Sixth, and was succeeded by his son, John Blair of Blair In the work just quoted, under date May 21, 1577, John Blair of that ilk, William Blair his brother, Robert Blair, brother of William Blair of Halie, with twenty-five others, their servants and followers, are indicted for shooting with pistolets, following and chasing one Thomas Crawford and his servants, for their slaughter, upon forethought felony The laird of Blair, and his brother, William, being found guilty, they respectively found security to enter their persons in ward within the castle of Blackness by eight o'clock in the evening, and not to escape therefrom until they were relieved, John Blair under the penalty of five thousand pounds, and William Blair, under that of two thousand pounds By his wife, Grizel, daughter of Robert, third Lord Sempill, this John Blair of Blair had, with three daughters, five sons, viz, John, who married Isobel, daughter of Thomas, fifth Lord Boyd, and who predeceased his father, leaving three daughters all well married, Bryce, who succeeded to the estate on the death of his father in 1609, Alexander, who married Elizabeth, only daughter and heir of William Cochrane of that ilk, when he took his name and arms, and thus became ancestor of the noble family of Dundonald, his grandson, Sir William Cochrane, knight, being created earl of Dundonald in 1669, [See DUNDONALD, earl of], James, and Robert of Bogtown, father of Sir Adam Blair of Bogtown

Bryce Blair of Blair, the second son, married Annabell Wallace, and had two sons and five daughters, the latter of whom were all well married He died 4th February 1639, and was succeeded by his elder twin-son, Sir Bryce Blair, who was knighted by Charles the First He married, in 1618, Marian, daughter of Walter Dundas of Dundas, and died a few months after his father He was succeeded by his son, John Blair, who died soon after without issue, and was succeeded by his uncle, John Blair, who married Lady Jean Cunningham, daughter of William, eighth earl of Glencairn, and dying in 1662, was succeeded by his son, William Blair of Blair This gentleman was named by the restoration government of Scotland a member of the Commission in Ayrshire for holding courts on the Covenanters, but he early joined the Revolution party, and was a member of the Convention of estates, 16th March 1689, and one of the committee for settling the government Having raised a troop of horse in support of King William, he marched with it into Perthshire Information of this having reached the Viscount Dundee, then in arms in Athol for King James, he determined to surprise them, and accordingly he left Athol, and proceeded with celerity during the night towards Perth, which city he entered unawares early next morning, and seized both the laird of Blair and the laird of Pollock, who was with him, and two other officers, in their beds, and carried them off prisoners to the Highlands, where the laird of Blair died very soon after He had mar-

William Blair of Blair, who was a commissioner of supply for the county of Ayr, in the Convention parliament which met in 1689 He married Magdalene daughter of James Campbell of Cargunnock, by whom, besides a daughter, Magdalene, he had a son, John, to whom he disponed his estate, reserving to himself a liferent His son predeceased him unmarried, and was succeeded by his sister, Magdalene Blair, who married William Scott, Esq, advocate second son of John Scott, Esq, of Mallony, in Mid Lothian, (an ancient branch of Buccleuch,) and had a son, William, her heir The heiress of Blair is supposed to have died before the year 1715, and Mr Scott, her widower, who had assumed the name and arms of Blair, the latter quartered with those of Scott, married, secondly, Catherine, only daughter of Alexander Tait, of Edinburgh, merchant, and had by her five sons and six daughters Hamilton, the eldest, succeeded his half-brother, William, on the death of the latter, unmarried, in 1782 He had early entered the army, and in 1760 was major of the Scots Greys He married Jane, daughter of Sydenham Williams, Esq of Herringston Dorsetshire, and had a son and 2 daughters William Blair of Blair, his son succeeded him in 1782 The latter married Magdalene, daughter of John Fordyce, Esq of Ayton, Berwickshire, for many years commissioner of the woods and forests and land revenue, and had 5 sons and 7 daughters His eldest sons having predeceased him he was succeeded in 1841, by his 3d son, William Fordyce Blair, Captain R N The latter married July 28, 1840, Caroline-Isobella, youngest dr of John Sprot, Esq, London, issue, 2 drs, Mary and Caroline-Madalina, and 2 sons, William Augustus born June 24, 1848 and Frederick Gordon, born Nov 11, 1852 Mrs Blair died Oct 24, 1857

The ancestor of the Blairs of Balthyock, Perthshire, was Alexander de Blair, who flourished in the reigns of William the Lion and his son Alexander the Second He married Ela, daughter of Hugh de Nyden of that ilk, in Fifeshire, and got a charter of the lands of 'Konakin in Fifeshire, holding of the bishop of St Andrews, to which Malcolm, seventh earl of Fife, and Duncan and David, his brothers, are witnesses' This charter bears no date, but Malcolm, seventh earl of Fife, succeeded his father in 1203, and died in 1229 A comparison of dates makes it not impossible that this Alexander de Blair may have been a son of William de Blair of Blair, in which case he appears to have called his son after the name of his grandfather William By his wife, Ela, he got also a part of the lands of Nyden or Nydie, which remained a long time in possession of the Blairs The arms borne by this family may have been those of de Nyden, as at that period they generally followed the lands, irrespective of the name of the possessor As this fact has not been hitherto recognised by genealogical writers, and a contrary opinion as to the connection of the two families from the one now indicated has, in consequence, been held, we annex an instance in illustration taken from that interesting relic of chivalry 'The Siege of Karlaverock,' premising that what is there said of banners must needs hold true of family bearings in general, inasmuch as the banners formed their chief features in such bearings 'Ralph de Monthermer, a private baron, became earl of Gloucester by marriage with Joan, daughter of Edward I, and widow of Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, by which title he was frequently summoned to parliament On the occasion of the siege of Caerlaverock, A D 1300, he led his followers, not under his own banner but under that of Clare, the earl of Gloucester, whilst he was himself vested in a surcoat of his paternal arms, which he also bore in his shield On his decease, his successor in the earldom (a son of his wife by her first husband) assumed the arms and dignities of the estate of Clare, and Montherner was summoned in the very next parliament as a private baron only This practice probably continued—and in the case of heiresses particularly—until quarterings by marriage were introduced.' Alexander de Blair's son, Sir William de Blair, was steward of Fife under Alexander the Second, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood This is instructed from the chartulary of Dunfermline, where 'dominus Wilhelmus de Blair, senschallus de Fife,' is particularly mentioned in 1235 He was also a witness in a charter of Malcolm, eighth earl of Fife, together with Andrew, bishop of Moray, who died in 1242 He appears to have died in the beginning of the reign of King Alexander the Second He had two sons, Sir Alexander, his heir, and Walter, who is mentioned in a charter of Friskin de Moravia in 1260

Sir Alexander Blair, the elder son, is designed 'dominus Alexander de Blair, miles,' in a charter of Malcolm, eighth earl of Fife, 'de ecclesia de Innerawn,' &c, in or before the year 1266, in which year earl Malcolm died By his wife Helen, sister of Sir William Ramsay, Sir Alexander had a son, John Blair, who succeeded him The son of the latter, David de Blair, is said by Douglas in his Baronage (p 187), in his father's lifetime, and when but a young man, to have been, with many of his countrymen, compelled to swear fealty to King Edward the First of England, when he had overrun Scotland in 1296

David de Blair, of the Balthyock family, died in the reign of David the Second He left two sons, Patrick, the first who was designed of Balthyock, and Thomas, progenitor of the Blairs of Ardblair

Patrick de Blair, besides the estate of Balthyock in Perthshire, of which he obtained a charter from Nicholas de Erskine, lord of Kinnoul, the superior, dated 22d October 1370 appears from charters quoted by Douglas, to have possessed also the lands of Quilt in Fife, and Balgilloch or Balgillo in Forfarshire He married the daughter and coheiress of John Ardler of that ilk, and died soon after 1393

His son, Thomas Blair, second baron of Balthyock, received a charter under the great seal, from King Robert the Third of the lands of Ardblair, Baldowie, and Balgillo in Forfarshire, dated in the tenth year of his reign, which is 1399

His grandson, Thomas Blair of Balthyock, was one of the gentlemen upon several inquests in settling the marches of the lands of the abbacy of Arbroath with their neighbours in 1483 and 1484 He died in the beginning of the reign of James the Fourth He had two sons, Alexander his heir, and John of Balmyle and Potento Alexander married Jean, daughter of Andrew third lord Gray, and had a son, Thomas, who succeeded him in 1509

In Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, under date March 10, 1540, there is a remission to 'Thomas Blaire of Bathyok' for treasonably abiding from the army at Solway From numerous cases in the same work it appears that about this period the various families of the Blairs of Balthyock and Ardblair, the Charteris of Kinfauns and Cuthilgurdy, the Drummonds, and other barons and lairds in Perthshire, were constantly involved in feuds with each other, and occasionally with burgesses and citizens of Perth, and others On 7th March 1549, 'Thomas Blare of Balthvock,' Thomas his son, and others, found security to underly the law for the slaughter of Sir Henry Dempster, chaplain, and six others. John Blair of Ardblair, Andrew Blair and Thomas Blair, his sons, Peter Blair Alexander Blair, half brother to John Butter of

Gormok, who was also implicated, David Blair of Knockmaher, with John and Patrick Blair his sons, and various others, were, on the 3d June 1554, summoned for being art and part in the slaughter of George Drummond of Leidcrieff, and William, his son Various of the accused made satisfaction and obtained pardon, but Patrick Blair in Ardblair, and Robert Smyth in Drumlochy, were beheaded on 12th December thereafter Under date May 2, 1562, Thomas Blair, of Balthyock, Alexander, William, and Patrick Blair, his sons, Thomas, his grandson, and Alexander Blair, tutor of Balmyle, with forty-six others, found sureties to appear for the 'crewell slauchter of umquil Alex ander Raa, burges of Perthe, and diverse uthers crymes contemt in the Letteris,' while on the same day John Charteris of Kinfauns, David, his brother, and thirty-nine others, found surety for the convocation of various persons, to the number of twenty-four, and coming upon Thomas Blair laird of Balthyock, and his accomplices, and giving of them injurious words

Thomas Blair of Balthyock, above mentioned, had two sons and three daughters His eldest son, Alexander Blair of Balthyock, is described as a man of parts and integrity, and highly esteemed by King James the Sixth, who, with his own hand, wrote a friendly letter to him, 13th September 1579, concerning his lands and other affairs in his part of the country, wherein he expressed himself in the kindest manner, saying that he confided chiefly in him for the management of all his concerns in that neighbourhood He married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Laurence Mercer of Aldie, by whom he had three sons and one daughter, the latter married to George, son and heir apparent of John Charteris of Kinfauns

Laurence, his eldest son died before his father, leaving a son, Alexander Blair, younger of Balthyock, one of the witnesses in the Gowrie conspiracy, his deposition is given in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol ii p 188

Thomas, the second son, married a lady of rank in France, and settled in that country His posterity retained the name of Blair, and became allied with some of the most considerable families in France, as De Gevres, de la Rochefoucauld de Nouailles, de Agremont, de Champignelle, de Brimont, des Gilbert, des Jolly, de Fleury, &c The third son, Patrick Blair, was progenitor of the Blairs of Pittendreich Glasclune, &c

Sir Thomas Blair of Balthyock the grandson of Laurence Blair, and son of the above-named Alexander Blair, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir George Halliburton of Pitcur, had the honour of knighthood conferred on him by King Charles the First He married first, Margaret, daughter of Sir John Ayton of Ayton, in the county of Fife, by whom he had three sons and five daughters, secondly, Margaret, daughter of Sir Alexander Gibson of Durie relict of Sir Thomas Fotheringham of Powrie, by whom he had no issue He died about 1652, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir Alexander Blair Andrew, the second son obtained from his father the lands and estate of Inchyra in Perthshire, which became the title of his family John, the third son, was designed of Balmyle Sir Alexander married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Fotheringham of Powrie, heir of line of that family, and by her he had three sons and two daughters He died in 1692

His eldest son, Thomas Blair, died without issue, and was succeeded by his brother John Blair, who married Margaret, daughter of Patrick Butter of Gormack, by whom he had only one daughter, Margaret, his sole heiress, who succeeded to the estate of Balthyock, and in 1723 married David, son of Mr David Drummond, advocate, who in consequence assumed the name and arms of Blair of Balthyock He died in 1728, and his son John Blair succeeded to the estate The latter married Patricia, daughter of John Stevens, Esq of Edinburgh, and had a son, David, and five daughters

The eldest daughter, Margaret Blair, married Major Johnston, and had an only daughter and heir, Jemima Johnston, who became representative of the family of Blair of Balthyock She married, 26th November 1811, Adam Fergusson Esq, and had issue Neil-James Fergusson of Balthyock, and six other sons

BLAIR, JOHN, the chaplain of Sir William Wallace, was born in Fifeshire in the reign of Alexander the Third, and was educated in the same school with Wallace at Dundee He afterwards studied for some time in the university of Paris, and became a monk of the order of St Benedict On his return to Scotland he was appointed chaplain to Wallace, then governor of the kingdom whom he accompanied in almost all his battles and after his cruel death wrote his life and exploits in Latin verse, a chronicle from which Blind Harry derived most of his materials for his heroic poem on Wallace Of this work, which might have been of great value in illustrating the history of that troubled period, an inaccurate fragment only is left, which was copied by Sir James Balfour out of the Cottonian library, and published in 1705 with a commentary, by Sir Robert Sibbald Hume, in his 'History of the Douglases,' introduced a translation of it Blair, who, on becoming a Benedictine, adopted the name of Arnold, belonged to the monastery of that order in Dunfermline The exact period of his death is unknown He was the author of another work, entitled 'De Liberata Tyrannide Scotia,' which is no longer to be found —Mackenzie's Scots Writers

BLAIR, ROBERT, an eminent minister of the Church of Scotland, in the days of the Covenant, was born at Irvine, Ayrshire, in 1593 He was the sixth and youngest son of John Blair of Windyedge, in that county, a branch of the family of Blair of Blair, and of Beatrix Muir, of the family of Rowallan He studied at the university of Glasgow, and was for a short time employed as assistant to a teacher in that city In his twenty-second year he was appointed a regent or professor in the college In 1616 he was licensed as a preacher of the gospel Having, in 1622, resigned his charge, in consequence of the appointment of Dr Cameron, who favoured episcopacy, as principal of the university, he went over to Ireland, and was for some years minister of a presbyterian congregation at Bangor The bishop of Down having expelled him from his charge, he, with various other clergymen, fitted out a ship, and set sail with the intention of emigrating to New England Being driven back by a storm, Blair preferred returning to Scotland, where he arrived at a very critical period He preached for some time at Ayr, and was afterwards settled by the General Assembly at St Andrews In 1640 he accompanied the Scottish army into England, and assisted at the negotiations for the peace of Rippon After the Irish Rebellion of 1641, Blair again went over to Ireland, with several other clergymen, the Presbyterians of that country having solicited a supply of ministers from the General Assembly He did not long remain there, however, having returned to St Andrews, where he proved himself to be a useful and zealous preacher In 1645 he was one of the Scottish ministers who went to Newcastle to reason with the king, and, on the death of Henderson, he was appointed by his majesty his chaplain for Scotland After the restoration, he was subjected, like many other worthy men of God, to the persecutions of Archbishop Sharp, and for years had no regular place of worship, but preached and administered the sacraments wherever opportunity offered He was prohibited from coming within twenty miles of St Andrews, and during his latter years, he found a refuge at Meikle Couston, in the parish of Aberdour, where he died, August 27, 1666 He was buried in the churchyard of that parish, where a tablet was erected to his memory He was the author of a Commentary on the Book of Proverbs, and of some political pieces, none of which have been preserved His descendants, Robert Blair, author of 'The Grave,' Dr Hugh Blair, the celebrated sermon writer, and the late Right Hon Robert Blair, lord president of the court of session, added fresh lustre to the family name —Scots Worthies

BLAIR, Robert, the Rev, author of 'The Grave,' a poem, eldest son of the Rev David Blair, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, chaplain to the king, and grandson of the eminent minister of St Andrews of the same name, the subject of the preceding notice, was born at Edinburgh in 1699, and studied for the church at the university of his native city After spending some time on the Continent, he was, on January 5, 1731, ordained minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, where he continued till his death He was an anxious and animated preacher, and an accomplished scholar, and evinced a peculiar predilection for the natural sciences, particularly botany, in which he was allowed to excel He carried on a correspondence with Mr Henry Baker, F R S, author of several works on the microscope From this, it should seem, that he employed part of his time in optical researches His first poem (originally published in Dr Anderson's collection) was one dedicated to the memory of Mr William Law of Elvingston, in East Lothian, professor of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, whose daughter, Isabella, he afterwards married She was the sister of Mr Law, who succeeded to the estate of Elvingston, and was sheriff of Haddington for fifty years Among the most respected of his friends was the lamented Colonel Gardiner, who was killed at the battle of Prestonpans in 1745, and who appears to have been the medium of his opening a correspondence with Dr Watts and Dr Doddridge, on the subject of his 'Grave' On the 25th February 1741–2, he addressed a letter to Dr Doddridge, the following extract from which contains some interesting information as to the composition and publication of his celebrated poem — "About ten months ago," he says, "Lady Frances Gardiner did me the favour to transmit to me some manuscript hymns of yours, with which I was wonderfully delighted I wish I could, on my part, contribute in any measure to your entertainment, as you have sometimes done to mine in a very high degree And that I may show how willing I am to do so, I have desired Dr Watts to transmit to you a manuscript poem of mine, entitled 'The Grave,' written, I hope, in a way not unbecoming my profession as a minister of the gospel, though the greatest part of it was composed several years before I was clothed with so sacred a character I was urged by some friends here, to whom I showed it, to make it public, nor did I decline it, provided I had the approbation of Dr Watts, from whom I have received many civilities, and for whom I had ever entertained the highest regard Yesterday I had a letter from the Doctor, signifying his approbation of the piece in a manner most obliging A great deal less from him would have done me no small honour But at the same time, he mentions to me that he had offered it to two booksellers of his acquaintance, who, he tells me, did not care to run the risk of publishing it They can scarce think, considering how critical an age we live in, with respect to such kind of writing, that a person living three hundred miles from London could write so as to be acceptable to the fashionable and polite Perhaps it may be so, though at the same time I must say, in order to make it more generally liked, I was obliged sometimes to go cross to my own inclinations, well knowing that whatever poem is written upon a serious argument, must, upon that very account, be under peculiar disadvantages, and, therefore, proper arts must be used to make such a piece go down with a licentious age, which cares for none of those things I beg pardon for breaking in upon moments precious as yours, and hope you will be so kind as to give me your opinion of the poem" The 'Grave' was not published till after the author's death The first edition of it was printed at Edinburgh, in 8vo, in 1747 It "is unquestionably," says Pinkerton, "the best piece of blank verse we have, save those of Milton"

Mr Blair died of a fever, February 4, 1746, in the 47th year of his age He was succeeded at Athelstaneford by Mr John Home, author of 'Douglas' By his wife, who survived him for several years, Mr Blair had five sons and one daughter The late Robert Blair of Avontoun, lord president of the court of session, of whom a notice follows, was his fourth son An edition of 'the Grave, and other poems, to which are prefixed some account of the author's life and observations on his writings, by Robert Anderson, M D,' was published at Edinburgh in 1826, 12mo

BLAIR, Hugh, D D, an eminent divine and sermon writer, a great grandson of Robert Blair, minister of St Andrews, and a descendant of the Blairs of Blair, was born at Edinburgh, April 7, 1718 His father, John Blair, cousin to the author of 'The Grave,' was at one time a respectable merchant in that city, but afterwards, from impaired fortune, he held an office in the Excise Hugh, the subject of this article, was educated for the church at the university of Edinburgh, which he entered in October 1730, and spent eleven years in his studies In his sixteenth year, while attending the logic class, an 'Essay on the Beautiful,' written by him in the usual course of academical exercises, attracted the particular notice of Professor Stevenson, who appointed it to be read in public at the conclusion of the session, a mark of distinction which determined the bent of his genius to polite literature About this time, for the more accurate acquirement of knowledge, he commenced making regular abstracts of the most important books which he read, particularly in history, and, assisted by some of his fellow-students, he constructed a very comprehensive scheme of chronological tables, which, devised by him for his own private use, was afterwards improved, filled up, and given to the public by his learned relative, Dr John Blair, prebendary of Westminster, (a notice of whom is given subsequently) in his valuable work, 'The Chronology and History of the World' In 1739 Dr Blair took his degree of M A, and in October 1741 was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Edinburgh Soon after the earl of Leven presented him to the parish of Collessie in Fifeshire, to which he was ordained September 23, 1742 In less than ten months thereafter he was elected second minister of the Canongate Church, Edinburgh, to which he was inducted July 14, 1743 Here he continued eleven years Notwithstanding an inveterate burr, which somewhat impeded his pronunciation, he soon became the most popular preacher of his day, from the care and attention to style which he bestowed on his discourses In 1745, on the breaking out of the rebellion, he preached a sermon, strongly inculcating the principles of loyalty to the reigning family, which was afterwards printed In October 1754 he was translated by the town council to Lady Yester's, one of the parish churches of Edinburgh In June 1757 he received the degree of D D from the university of St Andrews In June 1758 he was promoted to the High Church of Edinburgh, at the request of the lords of session and other distinguished persons who officially sat in that church

church, and contributed one or two papers, among which was a review of Dr Hutcheson's System of Moral Philosophy, to the first Edinburgh Review, begun in 1755, two numbers only of which were published In December 11, 1759, having obtained the sanction of the university, he commenced a course of lectures on literary composition in the college, which was so much approved of, that the town council, the patrons of the university, agreed in the following summer to institute a rhetoric class, as a permanent part of their academical course, and April 7, 1762, the king was graciously pleased, on their recommendation, to erect and endow a professorship of rhetoric and belles lettres in the university of Edinburgh, and to appoint Dr Blair regius professor thereof, with a salary of seventy pounds In 1788, when increasing years obliged him to retire from the duties of his chair, he published the lectures he had delivered, and they were universally acknowledged to contain a most judicious and comprehensive system of rules for the formation and improvement of style in composition

His first publication of importance was, 'A Critical Dissertation on the poems of Ossian,' defending their authenticity, which, published in 1763, was prodigiously overrated on its first appearance, being declared "one of the finest pieces of critical composition in the English language" Dr Blair took great credit to himself for his exertions in rescuing Ossian's Poems from oblivion In a letter to Burns, the poet, dated May 4, 1787, he says "I was the first person who brought out to the notice of the world the Poems of Ossian, first by the 'Fragments of Ancient Poetry' which I published, and afterwards by my setting on foot the undertaking for collecting and publishing 'the Works of Ossian,' and I have always considered this as a meritorious action of my life" We are informed by his biographer, that it was at his solicitation and that of Home, the author of Douglas that Mr M'Pherson was induced to publish the 'Fragments of Ancient Poetry,' and that their patronage was of essential service in procuring the subscription, which enabled him to make his tour through the Highlands to collect the traditionary poetry which bears the name of Ossian's Poems

The first volume of his famous sermons was published in the year 1777 "It was not till that year," says his colleague and biographer, Dr Finlayson, "that he could be induced to favour the world with a volume of the sermons which had so long furnished instruction and delight to his own congregation But this volume being well received the public approbation encouraged him to proceed, three other volumes followed at different intervals, and all of them experienced a degree of success of which few publications can boast They circulated rapidly and widely wherever the English tongue extends, and were soon translated into almost all the languages of Europe" Soon after its first publication, the first volume attracted the notice of George the Third and his consort, a portion of the sermons, it is said, having been first read to their majesties in the royal closet, by the eloquent earl of Mansfield, and the king was so highly pleased that by a royal mandate to the exchequer in Scotland, dated July 25, 1780, he conferred a pension of two hundred pounds a-year on the author, which continued till his death Boswell, in his 'Life of Johnson,' states that Dr Blair transmitted the manuscript of his first volume of Sermons to Mr Strahan, the king's printer in London, who, after keeping it for some time, wrote a letter to him discouraging the publication Mr Strahan, however, had sent one of the sermons to Dr Johnson for his opinion, and after his letter to Dr Blair had been sent off, he received from Johnson, on Christmas eve, 1776 a note in which was the following paragraph "I have read over Dr Blair's first sermon with more than approbation to say it is good is to say too little" After a conversation with Dr Johnson concerning these sermons, Mr Strahan candidly wrote again to Dr Blair, enclosing Johnson's note, and agreeing to purchase the volume, for which he and Mr Cadell gave one hundred pounds The sale was so rapid and extensive, that the publishers made Dr Blair a present of fifty pounds, and afterwards of the same sum, thus voluntarily doubling the stipulated price For the second volume they gave him at once three hundred pounds, and we believe for the others he received six hundred pounds each A fifth volume was prepared by him for the press, and published after his death, in 1801, with 'A Short Account of his Life,' by James Finlayson,

D D A larger Life, by Dr Hill, appeared in 1807 Dr Blair died at Edinburgh, December 27, 1800 He was heard at times to say that "he was left the last of his contemporaries"

His celebrated sermons are little more than moral discourses, and they never could have attained their popularity, a popularity unprecedented in the history of theological literature, without that high polish of style so peculiar to the author They are now comparatively neglected Nor can we wonder at this In his desire for elegant diction and correctness of language, he was too apt to lose sight of the illustration of scriptural doctrines, and in many instances the truths of revelation were made to give place to cold and unsatisfying moral disquisitions In church politics Dr Blair was attached to the moderate party but he did not take a prominent part in ecclesiastical discussions From natural diffidence he never could be prevailed upon to become moderator of the General Assembly He was very fond of reading novels, and was scrupulously particular as to his dress and appearance He was likewise rather vain, and not unsusceptible of flattery One of the most effective sermons he ever delivered he composed and preached in 1799, when past his eightieth year, in behalf of the fund for the benefit of the sons of the clergy He had married, in April 1748, his cousin Catherine, daughter of the Rev James Bannatine, one of the ministers of Edinburgh Mrs Blair died in 1795, by her he had a son, who died in infancy, and a daughter, who lived to her twenty first year The above is a portrait of Dr Blair, taken from one by Kay in 1799

BLAIR, ROBERT, of Avontoun, a distinguished lawyer and judge, fourth son of the author of 'The Grave' and also a great-grandson of the minister of St Andrews of the same name, was born at the manse of Athelstaneford in East Lothian in 1711, and educated for the bar After receiving his elementary education at the High school of Edinburgh, he entered the university, where, among others, he commenced a friendship with Henry Dundas, afterwards Lord Melville, which lasted during their lives He was admitted advocate in 1764, and his great talents soon acquired for him an extensive practice He early became a leading counsel, and had generally for his opponent in important cases the Hon Henry Erskine, he and Mr Blair being at that time the two most eminent members of the Scottish bar He was for several years one of the assessors of the city of Edinburgh, and an advocate-depute, and in 1789 he was appointed solicitor-general for Scotland In 1801 he was unanimously elected dean of the faculty of advocates In 1806, on the change of ministry, he was succeeded as solicitor-general by the late John Clerk, afterwards Lord Eldin On this occasion he received a polite apology from the new minister, stating the necessity he was under of promoting his own political friends Far from being out of temper at the change, Mr Blair showed his magnanimity by offering his successor the use of his gown until the latter should get one prepared for himself In 1807, on the return of the Tories to power, he was again offered the solicitor-generalship, but he declined both this and the higher office of lord advocate In 1808, on the resignation of Sir Islay Campbell, he was appointed lord president of the court of session, and his conduct as judge gave universal satisfaction He did not long enjoy that high office He died suddenly, May 20, 1811, aged 68, only a few days before his friend Lord Melville, who had come to Edinburgh to attend his funeral On returning from his usual walk on the day of his death, when the door of his house in George's Square was opened, he fell into the arms of his servant, and expired in a few minutes In an ably written character of President Blair which appeared in the Caledonian Mercury, May 23, it is said —"Of the first years of his life, or of the course of severe study by which he prepared himself to be what he became, little is known beyond the circle of his private friends, but never surely was there exhibited upon the great theatre of public business, a more profound erudition, greater power of discrimination, nor a more stern and invincible rectitude, combined with a degree of personal dignity, that commanded more than respect, even from his equals If any one indeed were to be selected from many great features as peculiarly distinguishing his character, we should certainly be apt to fix upon that innate love of justice, and abhorrence of iniquity, without which, as he himself emphatically declared, when he took the chair of the court, all other qualities avail nothing, or rather they are worse than nothing, a sentiment that seemed to govern the whole course of his public duty In the multiplicity of transactions, to which the extended commerce of the country gives rise, cases must occur to illustrate the darker side of the human character Such questions seemed to call forth all his energy, and they who heard the great principles of integrity vindicated and enforced, in a strain of indignant eloquence, could scarce resist the impression that they beheld, for a moment, the earthly delegate of Eternal Justice During the short period for which his lordship filled the chair of the court, it seemed to be his object to settle the law of Scotland upon great and permanent foundations Far from seeking to escape from the decision of points of law under an affected delicacy, which he well knew might be a cloak for ignorance, he anxiously dwelt upon such questions, and pointed them out for discussion that, by means of a deliberate judgment, he might fix a certain rule for the guidance of future times With all his knowledge of law, his opinions upon these subjects were formed with singular caution, and what was at first thrown out merely as a doubt, was found, upon examination, to be the result of profound research, matured by the deepest reflection" In 'Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk,' President Blair is thus referred to "It would appear as if the whole of his clear and commanding intellect had been framed and tempered in such a way as to qualify him peculiarly and expressly for being, what the Stagyrite has finely called 'a living equity'—one of the happiest, and perhaps one of the rarest, of all the combinations of mental powers By all men of all parties the merits of this great man also were alike acknowledged, and his memory is at this moment alike held in reverence by them all Even the keenest of his political opponents (the late Lord Eldin)—himself one of the greatest lawyers that Scotland ever has produced—is said to have contemplated the superior intellect of Blair with a feeling of respectfulness not much akin to the common cast of his disposition After hearing the President overturn, without an effort, in the course of a few clear and short sentences, a whole mass of ingenious sophistry, which it had cost himself much labour to erect, and which appeared to be regarded as insurmountable by all the rest of his audience, this great barrister is said to have sat for a few seconds, ruminating with much bitterness on the discomfiture of his cause, and then to have muttered between his teeth—'My man! God Almighty spared nae pains when he made your brains!' Those that have seen Mr Clerk, and know his peculiarities, appreciate the value of this compliment, and do not think the less of it because of its coarseness "

President Blair was an accomplished scholar, and retained, at an advanced age, a keen relish and fresh remembrance of the beauties of Greek and Roman literature As a pleader he was noted for a command of sarcastic wit and raillery, but he never left the case to seek for opportunities to indulge in this vein, and his wit was always to the point He was above the middle size, and of an erect and portly aspect His countenance was a very fine one, expressive of dignified composure his eye in particular was full and penetrating and on occasions which engaged his feelings, it had a slow turn of emotion that was peculiarly noble As a judge he possessed all the high qualifications for discharging to the best advantage the duties of President of the Supreme Court of Justice,—a profound and comprehensive knowledge of the law, the purest honour and integrity, abilities of the highest class, a sound and sagacious judgment, unwearied patience and assiduity, candour and impartiality that were proof against every trial, propriety and elevation of feeling on all subjects, a frank and liberal and independent turn of mind, and a generous contempt of everything low or disingenuous, these high endowments being graced and seasoned by an earnest and vivid elocution, and by a natural dignity of manner and animated majesty of countenance, which struck the evildoer with awe, and gave assurance of the native worth and energy of the spirit that reigned within A statue of Lord President Blair, by Chantry, formerly in the first division of the court of session, has been removed to the outer house He married Isabella, youngest daughter of Colonel Halkett of Lawhill, Fifeshire, by whom he had one son and three daughters His eldest daughter became the wife of Alexander Maconochie of Meadowbank, appointed one of the lords of session and justiciary in 1819, resigned in 1843 About twenty years previous to his death, the Lord President purchased the small estate of Avontoun near Linlithgow, which continued always to be his favourite residence, and as he took great pleasure in agricultural improvements, he brought it to the highest state of cultivation

The following portrait of Lord President Blair was taken in 1799, and represents him in the act of pleading

BLAIR, JOHN, LL D, an eminent chronologist, and descendant of the Rev Robert Blair of St Andrews, falls to be noticed in connection with his eminent relatives whose lives have now been given He was born at Edinburgh where he was educated He afterwards went to London, and was for some time usher of a school in Hedge Lane, having succeeded his friend and countryman, Mr Andrew Henderson, author of a History of the Rebellion of 1745, in that situation In 1754 he brought out a valuable and comprehensive work, entitled 'The Chronology and History of the World, from the Creation to the Year of Christ 1753, illustrated in fifty six Tables,' and dedicated to Lord Chancellor Hardwicke It was published by subscription, on account of the great expense of the plates In his preface the author acknowledged his great obligations to the earl of Bath, and announced some chronological dissertations, in which he proposed to illustrate the disputed points, to explain the prevailing systems of chronology, and to establish the authorities upon which some of the particular eras depend The hint of this work was, as we have already shown in the life of his relative, Dr Hugh Blair, taken from the latter's ingenious scheme of chronological tables At this time he seems to have taken orders in the Church of England In January 1755 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society In September 1757 he was appointed chaplain to the princess dowager of Wales, and mathematical tutor to the duke of York In March 1761, on Dr Townshend's promotion to the deanery of Norwich, Dr Blair's services were rewarded with a prebendal stall at Westminster Six days after, the vicarage of Hinckley happening to fall vacant, Dr Blair was presented to it by the dean and chapter of Westminster The same year he was chosen a fellow of the Antiquarian Society In September 1763 he attended the duke of York in a tour to the continent, and returned with him to England in 1764 In 1768 he published an improved edition of his Chronological Tables, which he dedicated to the princess of Wales To this edition were annexed fourteen maps, with a dissertation prefixed, on the Progress of Geography In March 1771 he was transferred by presentation of the dean and chapter of Westminster to the vicarage of St Bride's in the city of London, and again in April 1776, to the rectory of St John the Evangelist, Westminster He was also rector of Horton in Buckinghamshire He died of influenza June 24, 1782 While suffering under this malady, he received intelligence of the death of his brother, Captain Blair, in the preceding April, and the shock is supposed to have hastened his own This able officer, for his gallant conduct in the Dolphin frigate in the engagement with the Dutch on the Dogger Bank, August 5, 1781, was promoted to the command of the Anson, a new ship of 64 guns He distinguished himself under Sir George Rodney, in the memorable sea-fight with Count de Grasse, April 12, 1782, and in this action fell gloriously in the service of his country He was one of the three to whom parliament on this occasion voted a monument With this brief notice of Capt Blair we close the series of the descendants of the worthy presbyterian divine Dr Blair's 'Lectures on the Canons of the Old Testament' were published after his death —Chalmers' Biog Dict

BLAIR, JAMES, an eminent episcopalian divine, the projector of the university of Williamsburg in Virginia, was born and educated in Scotland, but the date of his birth is not mentioned Having entered into holy orders sometime in the reign of Charles the Second, he was duly appointed to a benefice in his native country, but becoming discouraged in consequence of the dislike manifested by the Scottish people to the establishment of episcopacy, he resigned his living, and removed to England Being introduced to Dr Compton, then bishop of London, that prelate prevailed upon him, in 1685, to go out to Virginia, as a missionary, and by his conduct and ministerial labours he was eminently serviceable in promoting the cause of religion in that colony In 1689, he was appointed by the same prelate his commissary for the province, the highest office in the church there Finding that the want of proper seminaries for the advancement of religion and learning proved a great obstacle to all attempts for the propagation of the gospel, he formed a design of erecting and endowing a college at Williamsburg, then the capital of Virginia, for professors and students in academical learning With this view he raised a considerable sum of money by voluntary subscription, and in order the more effectually to accomplish his object, he sailed for England in 1693 The design met the approval of King William and Queen Mary, and a patent was passed for erecting and endowing a college by the name of "the college of William and Mary," the establishment of which was aided by an endowment from the king of two thousand pounds, and twenty thousand acres of land from the royal domain, together with a tax of a penny a pound on tobacco exported from Virginia and Maryland to other plantations, as the American colonies, now forming the United States, were then called Of the new college, Mr Blair was appointed president, and enjoyed that office nearly fifty years He was also rector of Williamsburg, and president of the council in that colony He wrote 'Our Saviour's Divine Sermon on the Mount explained, and the practice of it recommended, in divers sermons and discourses,' which was published with a recommendatory preface, by the Rev Dr Waterland, in 4 volumes octavo, London, in 1742 Mr Blair died in 1743 —Burnet's Hist of his Own Times, vol iii, page 165, octavo edition

BLAIR, Patrick, an eminent physician and botanist, was born, it is supposed, in Dundee, where he practised physic and surgery In the year 1706, having dissected an elephant belonging to an exhibition, which had died in that town, he wrote an account of its anatomy and osteology, which was published in 1710 in the Philosophical Transactions, Numbers 326 and 327 This first made him known as an anatomist In a subsequent number of the Transactions, he gave a description of the ossicula auditus, accompanied with engravings His account of this dissection was also published separately in 1711, 4to, with figures It contains an accurate description of the proboscis and its muscles, and confirms, according to Haller, the opinion formerly given that the elephant has no gall-bladder In 1715, when the rebellion broke out in Scotland, Dr Blair, being of well-known Jacobite principles, was for a short time imprisoned on suspicion He afterwards removed to London, and acquired considerable reputation by some discourses on the sexes of flowers, which he read before the Royal Society He also republished his 'Anatomy of the Elephant' In 1718 he brought out a volume of 'Miscellaneous Observations on the Practice of Physic, Anatomy, Surgery and Botany,' in 8vo In 1720 he produced the work by which he rendered the greatest service to botany, being 'Botanical Essays,' 8vo, in two parts, with illustrations, containing the 'Discourses on the Sexes of Plants,' which he had read before the Royal Society, much enlarged, and published at the request of several of its members It is divided into five essays The three first treat of what is peculiar to plants, and the two last on what is common to them and animals He confirms the arguments in favour of the sexes of plants by sound reasoning and several additional experiments Some of his notions are now abandoned by botanists, but his work contains information which, even at this advanced period of the science, is considered useful and correct Having removed to Boston, in Lincolnshire, where Dr Pulteney conjectures he practised as a physician during the remainder of his life, he published a work, entitled 'Pharmaco-Botanologia, or an Alphabetical and Classical Dissertation on all the British Indigenous and Garden Plants of the New Dispensatory,' London, 1723-1728 This work, in which he introduced several of the rarer plants discovered by himself in the vicinity of Boston, came out in decades, and extends only to the letter H He wrote various papers for the Philosophical Transactions, particularly a 'Method of Discovering the Virtues of Plants by their external Structure,' and 'Observations on the Generation of Plants' The time of his death is not known, but it is supposed to have taken place soon after 1728 —Pulteney's Sketches

BLAIR, Sir James Hunter, Bart, an eminent banker, descended paternally from the Hunters of Hunterston, in Ayrshire, the second son of Mr John Hunter of Brownhill, merchant in Ayr, was born there February 21, 1741 In 1756 he was placed as an apprentice in the banking-house of Messrs Coutts, Edinburgh, where Sir William Forbes was also a clerk In 1763, on the death of Mr John Coutts, he and Sir William were admitted to a share of the business, and ultimately became the principal partners In December 1770 he married Jane, eldest daughter of John Blair of Dunskey, in Wigtonshire, in right of whom he acquired, in 1777, the family estate, when he assumed the name of Blair in addition to his own The improvements which he introduced on the estate of Dunskey were of the most extensive and judicious kind The writer of his memoir in the Edinburgh Mag for 1794, says, "He nearly rebuilt the town of Portpatrick, he repaired and greatly improved the harbour, established packet boats of a larger size on the much frequented passage to Donaghadee in Ireland, and, lastly, while the farmers in that part of Scotland were not very well acquainted with the most approved modes of farming, he set before them a successful example of the best modes of agriculture, the greatest service, perhaps, which can be performed by a private man to his country" In September 1781 he was chosen M P for the city of Edinburgh, and at the general election in 1784 was re-elected, but he soon resigned his seat in favour of Sir Adam Fergusson, Baronet At Michaelmas 1784 he was elected lord provost of Edinburgh, and to him that city is indebted for many improvements, particularly the rebuilding of the college, and the plan and erection of the South Bridge, the foundation-stone of which was laid August 1, 1785 He was created a baronet in 1786, and died at Harrowgate, July 1, 1787, in the 47th year of his age He is buried in the Greyfriars' churchyard, Edinburgh Hunter Square and Blair Street, Edinburgh, are called after Sir James, and a portrait of him in his robes as lord provost of that city is given in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits He had fourteen children, twelve of whom survived their infancy His eldest son, Sir John, died in 1800, unmarried, when his next brother, Sir David, succeeded to the title and estate of Blairquhan in Ayrshire The third son, James, lieutenant-colonel of the Ayrshire militia, inherited the estates of Dunskey and Robertland He was for a considerable time M P for Wigtonshire, and died in 1822, when his next surviving brother, Forbes, succeeded to his estates The latter became a candidate, on the conservative interest, for the representation in parliament, of Edinburgh, in the first election after the passing of the Reform bill, and died soon after in 1833 His younger brother, Thomas, an officer in the army, then became proprietor of Dunskey This gentleman was wounded at the battle of Talavera, where he was made prisoner, and detained in France till the peace in 1814 He was a second time wounded at the battle of Waterloo in 1815, and promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel He subsequently served as brigadier-general in the Burmese war Two views of old Dunskey castle are given in the second volume of Grose's antiquities of Scotland, accompanied with a brief description

BLANE, the name of a family in the county of Ayr, said to be descended from St Blane, one of the most distinguished saints in the Scotch Calendar It is however, more probably territorial, and derived from lands—of which there were many in the west of Scotland—bestowed for support of an establishment, or a place of worship, called after his name

BLANE, SIR GILBERT, of Blanefield bart, an eminent physician, the fourth son of Gilbert Blane, Esq of Blanefield, in Ayrshire, an opulent merchant who had been long settled in London, was born in the family mansion in the county of Ayr, August 29, 1749 One of his brothers, Andrew, had studied for the law, and became a respectable writer to the signet in Edinburgh Gilbert was originally destined for the church, and with that object he studied for five years at the university of Edinburgh, which he entered at the age of fourteen, but in the course of his academical career his views changed, and he resolved to study medicine He accordingly pursued his medical studies for five years more, and his character stood so high among his fellow-students that he was elected one of the presidents of the Medical Society On November 25, 1767, he was admitted a member of the Speculative Society, then in its infancy The essays he read to the society during the time that he was a member, were on the following subjects —The Influence of situation on Character, The comparative faculties of Man and other animals, Beauty

After obtaining his degree of doctor of medicine, he repaired to London, where he spent two years longer in study Being recommended by

Dr Cullen to Dr William Hunter, at that time the most eminent teacher of anatomy in London, through his influence he was appointed private physician to the earl of Holderness This appointment introduced him to the notice of many distinguished individuals, and among others to Admiral Sir George Rodney, afterwards Lord Rodney, who nominated him his private physician, in which capacity he accompanied him, when, in 1780, he assumed the command of the squadron in the West Indies He was present at no less than six general engagements with that renowned commander In the course of the first engagement, every officer being either killed, wounded, or employed, Dr Blane was intrusted by the admiral with the duty of conveying his orders to the officers at the guns, and in one of these dangerous missions he was severely wounded As a reward for his services on this occasion, on the recommendation of the admiral, he was, without going through the subordinate grades, appointed at once physician to the fleet, a situation which he held till the conclusion of the war in 1783 He was present at the engagement between the English and French fleets, April 12, 1782, when Rodney gained the celebrated victory over Count De Grasse, of which he wrote an account For this victory Sir George Rodney was created a baron of the United Kingdom, under the title of Lord Rodney

While on board the fleet, Dr Blane kept a regular account of his discoveries, experience, and practice in the service, which, with the conclusions drawn from the returns of the surgeons of the ships, he published, in 1783, under the title of 'Observations on the Diseases incident to Seamen,' a work several times reprinted, with additions On the conclusion of the war, on the unanimous recommendation of the Flag officers and captains of the West India fleet to the board of admiralty, his majesty conferred on him a pension, half-pay not being then established

On settling in London as a physician, he was, by the influence of the duke of Clarence, afterwards William the Fourth, whom he had frequently met in the West Indies when his royal highness was serving as a midshipman on board the Prince George, appointed physician extraordinary to the prince of Wales Soon after he was nominated physician to the Household, and in 1785 he was elected physician to St Thomas' Hospital

On the appointment of Earl Spencer as first lord of the admiralty, Dr Blane was nominated one of the commissioners of sick and wounded sailors, the duties of which important office he continued to execute till the peace of Amiens, when a reduction of all the naval establishments took place Soon after this his pension was doubled, on a representation of the board of admiralty to the king in council

In 1786 Dr Blane was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1788 he was chosen to deliver the Croonian lecture, when he selected for his subject, 'Muscular Motion' The lecture was published in 1791, and reprinted in his 'Select Dissertations,' 1822 He also wrote in the year 1790, for the Transactions of the Royal Society, volume lxxx, an essay on the 'Nardus Indica,' or spikenard of the ancients In 1795 he was placed at the head of the Navy Medical Board, and during the time that Earl Spencer remained in office, with the assistance of that nobleman, he effected the introduction into every ship, of the use of lemon juice, as a preventive and cure of scurvy This measure has had the beneficial effect of almost completely eradicating scurvy at sea

On several important occasions, Dr Blane's professional opinion was solicited and followed by government In conjunction with the king's physicians and other leading characters, he was called upon to draw up the regulations on the subject of quarantine, which formed the basis of the act of parliament on this head In the year 1800, his advice was likewise resorted to on the proper mode of accommodating the convicts in the hulks at Woolwich, to prevent the progress of infection For the same purpose he officially visited Newgate by the authority of the secretary of state for the home department The army from Egypt was transported to Britain, in the manner pointed out by him, at the desire of the secretary for war and colonies, to avoid the danger of importing the plague into this country The Board of Control applied for his suggestions, in ameliorating the regulations of the medical service in India, and the transports carrying the convicts to Botany Bay were, under his direction, fitted up so as to lessen the mortality of former voyages, by a free ventilation and cleanliness, which he was called upon to do by a warrant from the home secretary During the scarcity of 1799 and 1800, his opinion was requested by a committee of the House of Commons, and to correct the popular prejudices then entertained, he published a small tract on the subject of forestalling and combination In the unfortunate Walcheren expedition in 1809, when the government were undecided what measures to adopt, Dr Blane was despatched to give his opinion as to the troops remaining on the island, and his report, which was afterwards published, made with the concurrence of the army physicians, determined government to abandon the expedition Besides a liberal remuneration from government, he received the thanks of the commander-in-chief, officially conveyed to him through the war-office In consequence of his great merit and public services he was created a baronet by patent, dated December 26, 1812

In 1805 his private practice having become very extensive he resigned his office of physician to St Thomas' Hospital, and in the fourth volume of the 'Transactions of the Medical and Chirurgical Society' he published an 'Exposition of the prevailing Diseases of the Metropolis,' during the twenty years that he had held that situation This paper was reprinted in his 'Select Dissertations' In 1813 he succeeded Sir Henry Halford as president of the Medical and Chirurgical Society In 1819 he published his 'Elements of Medical Logic,' in which he gives his ideas respecting medical education, and certain topics connected with it This work has reached several editions In 1826 he was elected a member of the Institute of France In November 1829, with the sanction of the lords of the admiralty, he founded a prize medal for the best journal kept by the surgeons of the navy The medal is awarded every second year, the Commissioners selecting four journals, and the president of the college of physicians, with the president of the college of surgeons, deciding which of such four is best entitled to this honorary distinction In 1830, on the accession of King William the Fourth, he was nominated first physician to his majesty In 1831 he published a 'Warning to the British public against the alarming approach of the Indian Cholera' Sir Gilbert was a Fellow of the College of Physicians, and of the Royal Society of Edinburgh as well as of London, a proprietor of the Royal Institution, and a member of the Imperial Society of Sciences at St Petersburgh Having been consulted by the sovereigns of Russia and Prussia, and the president of the United States of America, on subjects of public police and national interest, he received from the two former gold medals, expressive of their high sense of his professional merit, and from the last a letter of thanks His latter years were spent in retirement from professional labours He died June 27, 1834, in his 85th year

Besides Blanefield in the county of Ayr, Dr Blane possessed the estate of Culverlands in Berkshire He had married July 11, 1786, Elizabeth, only daughter of Abraham Gardner, merchant, by whom he had six sons and three daughters His two eldest sons having predeceased him, he was succeeded by his third son, Sir Hugh Seymour Blane, who served with distinction at Waterloo, as an officer of the third guards One of Sir Gilbert's daughters, Louisa, was accidentally drowned in a piece of water on her uncle's estate at Winkfield Park, August 24, 1813, aged 19 His other daughters died in infancy Sir Gilbert Blane's works are

BLANTYRE, Baron, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by a branch of the illustrious house of Stuart The ancestor of this noble family was Sir Thomas Stuart of Minto, who lived in the beginning of the reign of James the Third He was the third son of Sir William Stuart of Dalswinton and Garlies, progenitor of the earls of Galloway [see GALLOWAY, earl of] He received from his father the lands of Minto, Smlaws, and Merbottle in Roxburghshire, of which he had two charters under the great seal, 2d November 1476, and by his marriage with Isabel, eldest daughter and co-heir of Walter Stewart of Arthurly, of the Castlemilk family, he acquired extensive estates in the counties of Lanark and Renfrew He died in 1500, leaving three sons and three daughters

Sir John, the eldest son, styled of Minto, married Janet Fleming, of Lord Flemings family, by whom he had a son, named Robert Sir John had a charter to himself and Janet his wife, of the barony of Minto and lands of Busby, which had belonged to his father, 23d February, 1502–3 He was killed at the battle of Flodden, 9th September, 1513 William, the second son, an eminent churchman of his day, was, whilst dean of Glasgow, 2d October 1530, appointed high treasurer of Scotland, and about the same time was made provost of Lincluden, an ecclesiastical title, under which he sat in parliament, 26th April 1531 In November of the following year, he was elected bishop of Aberdeen, and in February 1534, along with Sir Adam Otterburn of Redhall, his Majesty's advocate, he was sent on an embassy to England to treat of a pacification which was happily concluded In 1537, he resigned the office of high treasurer, and died 17th April 1545 [Crawford's Officers of State, page 37]

Sir John Stuart's son, Sir Robert Stuart of Minto, married Janet Murray of the house of Touchadam and Polmaise He had four sons, Sir John, his heir, Walter, Robert, prior of Whithorn, and Malcolm, and a daughter

His eldest son, Sir John Stuart of Minto, assisted at the coronation of King James the Sixth in 1567 He was provost of Glasgow and had the command of the castle of that town He married, first, Joanna Hepburn, by whom he had a son, Matthew, whose male line became extinct in the person of Sir John Stuart who died in the expedition to Darien in 1697, secondly, Margaret, second daughter of James Stewart of Cardonald, heir to her brother James, and had a son, Walter, who became first Lord Blantyre, and four daughters

Walter Stuart, Sir John's only son by the second marriage, and the first Lord Blantyre, was educated, along with King James the Sixth, under the eye of George Buchanan, and had the priory of Blantyre in Lanarkshire bestowed upon him by that monarch The name Bla-an tir is Gaelic, signifying 'a warm retreat,' descriptive of the whole district of Blantyre, now a parish The priory was founded by Alexander the Second, sometime before 1296, and the ruins still remain They are situated in a most retired situation, on the top of a rock, which rises perpendicularly from the Clyde, exactly opposite the noble ruins of Bothwell Castle The revenues were in 1561, £131 6s 7½d

In 1580, Walter Stuart was nominated a 'minion,' or gentleman of the king's bed-chamber, on which occasion he was designed commendator of Blantyre On 14th November, 1582, he was sworn a privy councillor, whereby he became one of the lords of the secret council, he was also constituted keeper of the privy seal, vacant by the death of Thomas Buchanan of Ibest [Crawford's Officers of State, page 393] The feuing-out of his Majesty's lands within the regality of Glasgow having been committed to his care, he performed this duty to good purpose According to Spottiswood [History, page 848], he was instrumental in procuring the pardon of Archibald Douglas, titular parson of Glasgow, for having intruded himself into the parsonage On 28th May, 1593, he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, in the room of Sir Thomas Lyon of Auldbar, and on 12th January, 1596, he was constituted one of the eight commissioners of the treasury and exchequer, called from their number Octavians, to whom King James intrusted the management of his affairs In the distribution of offices which this body made amongst themselves, he received the office of high treasurer, which was formally conferred upon him by letters patent, under the great seal, dated 6th March, 1596, with a preamble very honourable to him [Crawford, page 395] On this occasion he resigned the custody of the privy seal to Lindsay of Balcarres

In the expedition against Kintyre and Isla, resolved upon by King James the Sixth in 1596, under the leadership of Sir William Stewart of Houston, commendator of Pittenweem, Lord Blantyre, as high treasurer, took an active part Early in October he was in the west, superintending the progress made in the preparations for it, and from a letter addressed by him to the secretary of State, it appears that the sum of seven thousand merks were still wanting to enable the expedition to sail [Balcarres papers, quoted in Gregory's History of the Highlands and Isles, page 268] Having purchased the barony of Blantyre, on 18th January 1598, he had a charter of it, as well as of Wrightslands and Cardonald in Renfrewshire, when he was designated 'Walter Lord Blantyre, our treasurer' On 17th May 1599, he incurred the displeasure of the king by a decision in a cause between Mr Robert Bruce and the ministers of Angus, and besides being deprived of his offices of treasurer and extraordinary lord of session, was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh According to Crawford he was soon released and restored to favour In 1604, he was nominated one of the commissioners for a proposed treaty of union with England, and on 10th January 1606, he was one of the lords of secret council who assisted, as assessors, at the famous trial of John Welch and the other five ministers at Linlithgow, for treason, in declining the jurisdiction of the privy council, and holding a general assembly, after being charged not to do so, when they were found guilty, and banished from the kingdom On 10th July of the same year (1606) he was created a peer of Scotland, under the title of Lord Blantyre On the trial of George Sprot, notary in Eyemouth, 12th August, 1608, for concealment of Earl Gowries conspiracy, he formed one of the assessors, and on 13th January, 1610, he was restored to his former post as an extraordinary lord of session

Lord Blantyre died 8th March 1617 He had married Nicolas daughter of Sir James Somerville of Cambusnethan, by whom he had a daughter, Anne, married to John, eighth Lord Abernethy of Salton, and three sons, William, who succeeded him, James, and Walter

William, second Lord Blantyre, married Helen daughter of Sir William Scott of Ardross, by whom he had three sons, viz, Walter, Alexander, and James, and two daughters, Jean and Margaret, the latter married, in 1645, to John Swinton of Swinton, and had issue

The second son of the first lord the Hon Sir James Stuart, was named after James the Sixth, who conferred on him the order of the Bath Some reproachful words having passed between him and Sir George Wharton, son of Lord Wharton, a duel ensued at Islington, 8th Nov 1609, when both were killed on the spot, and two days thereafter they were interred in one grave in Islington churchyard The letters written from one to the other previous to the duel are printed in the

Gentleman's Magazine for November 1800, from the Harleian MS 787, fol 596 The challenge was sent by Sir George, and accepted by Sir James, who thus wrote "To that end I have sent you the length of my rapyer, which I will use with a dagger, and so meet you at the farther end of Islington, at three of the clocke in the afternoon" He married Lady Dorothy Hastings, second daughter of George, fourth earl of Huntingdon, but had no issue by her

The Hon Walter Stuart, the third son of the first lord, and a doctor of medicine, was the father of the celebrated court beauty, Frances Theresa Stuart, who became Duchess of Richmond, and of another daughter named Sophia, married to the Hon Henry Bulkeley, master of the household to Charles the Second, and also to his brother James, fourth son of Thomas, first Viscount Bulkeley Of the eldest daughter, the 'la belle Stuart,' of Grammont's Memoires, King Charles the Second was supposed to have been desperately enamoured, and that he might be at liberty to marry her, he is said to have entertained the design of getting divorced from his queen This scheme, however, was, to his great indignation, rendered abortive, by Miss Stuart's privately marrying Charles, fourth Duke of Richmond and Lennox, a match which is thought to have been promoted by Lord Clarendon, to prevent the king carrying his intention into effect The marriage was publicly declared in 1667 In the Memoires de Grammont is a fine portrait of this famous beauty, from an original picture by Sir Peter Lely, of which the following is a woodcut

Out of compliment to her, Charles ordered her figure to be perpetuated as Britannia on our copper coins The youngest daughter, Sophia, was the mother of Anne, wife of James, duke of Berwick, natural son of King James the Second, and other children

On the death of William, second Lord Blantyre, 29th November 1638, he was succeeded by his eldest son Walter, third lord, who married Margaret daughter of Sir William Mure of Rowallan, but had no issue He died in October 1641, when his brother, Alexander, became fourth Lord Blantyre. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of John Shaw of Greenock, he had a daughter, Helen, married to James Muirhead of Bredisholm, and a son Alexander, who succeeded him as fifth lord

The fifth Lord Blantyre was very zealous for the revolution He raised a regiment to support King William, from whom he received a pension At the meeting of the convention, 9th June 1702, his lordship was one of the seceding members who protested against its legality, and was by them sent up to London, with an address to Queen Anne, containing the reasons of their procedure This her majesty refused to receive, but allowed Lord Blantyre to wait upon her His lordship took the oaths and his seat in the Scottish parliament 12th July 1703, the day the act of security was discussed Having given utterance to some intemperate and undutiful expressions, in presence of her majesty's advocate, against the high commissioner, a complaint was exhibited against him by the Lord Advocate, and he was in consequence placed in custody by order of the Lord High Constable On the 13th August a petition from his lordship was read, entreating the commissioner and the estates of parliament to accept of his submission and most humble acknowledgments of the expressions of which he had been guilty On the petition being read, he was ordered to the bar of the house, to the end that he might there, kneeling, beg pardon of the commissioner and the estates for his said offence, pay a fine of five thousand pounds, and continue in custody until the fine be paid, or a valid bond be given for the payment thereof On being brought to the bar accordingly, the Lord Chancellor declared that the Commissioner was pleased to dispense with his making his acknowledgments on his knees, to which the estates agreed His lordship gave obedience to the rest of the sentence, and thereupon was dismissed from the bar, and allowed to take his place He died 20th June 1704 Macky describes him as a little active man, very low in stature, shortsighted, fair complexioned, towards fifty years old [Macky's Memoirs, p 232] He was twice married, first to Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir John Henderson of Fordel, in Fife, baronet, without issue, and, secondly, to Anne, daughter of Sir Robert Hamilton, Lord Pressmennan, sister of John, second lord Belhaven, and by her he had five sons, Walter and Robert, who both succeeded to the title, John, an advocate, James, who died at sea, and Hugh, and four daughters

The eldest son, Walter, sixth Lord Blantyre, was born 1st February 1683 He took the oaths and his seat in the Scots parliament 5th August 1704, and strenuously opposed the union, adhering to all the protests against it At the general election in 1710 he was chosen one of the representatives of the Scottish peerage He died at London, 23d June 1713

His brother, Robert, seventh Lord Blantyre, was a captain in the army, and fort major of Fort St Philip in Minorca when the title devolved upon him He died at Lennoxlove, a seat of the family in Haddingtonshire, 17th November 1748 He married first, Lady Helen Lyon, eldest daughter of John, fourth earl of Strathmore, by whom he had a son, who died young, secondly, Margaret, daughter of the Hon William Hay of Drummelzier, brother of the first marquis of Tweeddale, and by her he had six sons, Walter, William, Alexander, who all succeeded to the title, John, died unmarried, James, captain in the third regiment of foot guards, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army, killed at the battle of Guildford, in North Carolina, 15th March, 1781, and Charles, in the civil service of the Hon East India company, a member of the Supreme Council of Bengal, particularly mentioned in Dirom's narrative of the campaign in India, 1792, as giving efficiency to the measures of Lord Cornwallis in his campaign against Tippoo, and four daughters.

Walter, eighth Lord Blantyre, resided much on the continent, and died unmarried at Paris 21st May 1751, in the 25th year of his age Contemporary accounts represent him as a young nobleman of great promise, accomplished manners, and amiable character, and in the Scots Magazine for 1751 are two poetical tributes to his memory

His next brother, William, ninth Lord Blantyre, was a colonel in the service of the states of Holland He died, unmarried, at Erskine, 10th January 1776

Alexander, tenth Lord Blantyre, on succeeding to the title, went to reside at Erskine house, in Renfrewshire, the principal seat of the family "He had," says the author of the Old Statistical Account of that parish (vol xix page 63), "for a number of years before that time, been engaged in a course of practical farming in East Lothian, in consequence of which he had not only acquired an accurate and extensive knowledge of the general principles of agriculture, but was able to descend into detail, and to direct and oversee every minute operation" He died at Clifton, 5th November, 1787 He had married Catherine, eldest daughter and heiress of Patrick Lindsay of Eaglescairnie, Haddingtonshire, an ancient branch of the noble family of Halyburton, and had a daughter, born 26th December 1775 married, 5th October 1809, to Rev Dr Andrew Stewart, minister of Bolton, and four sons, viz, Robert Walter, who succeeded to the title, Patrick, who inherited Eaglescairnie, lieutenant-colonel of the 19th regiment of foot, William, captain in the 1st regiment of foot-guards, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, who served in the expedition to Holland in 1799, and Charles, barrister-at-law

Robert Walter, eleventh Lord Blantyre, was born 10th June 1777, and at the age of eighteen entered the army, having obtained an ensign's commission in the 3d regiment of foot-guards in 1795 He was afterwards captain in the 31st regiment of foot, and became lieutenant-colonel of the 42d He rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and was a companion of the Bath He served in Holland in 1799, in Egypt in 1801, as aid-de-camp to General Stuart, in the expedition to Pomerania and Zealand in 1807, and with Lord Wellington in Spain and Portugal in 1809 At the general election of 1806, he was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage He was for some time lord-lieutenant of Renfrewshire After having escaped the dangers of many a bloody battle-field, his lordship was accidentally shot by a musket ball when looking from the window of his hotel during the commotions at Brussels, 22d September, 1830 He married Frances, second daughter of the Hon John Rodney, grand-daughter of the celebrated Admiral Lord Rodney, by whom he had six sons and five daughters His eldest son Alexander, died young in 1814, and he was succeeded by his second son, Charles Walter, twelfth Lord Blantyre, born 21st December 1818 He was a lieutenant in the Grenadier Guards He married, 4th October, 1843, Lady Evelyn Leveson-Gower, second daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, and has issue a son, Hon Walter Stuart, born at Erskine House in 1851, and several daughters

BOECE, BOEIS, BOYCE, or BOETHIUS, HECTOR, a celebrated historian, was born at Dundee about 1465, or, as other accounts say, 1470 He was descended from an ancient family, who had possessed the barony of Panbride, or Balbride, in Forfarshire, since the reign of David the Second From the place of his birth he had the appellation of Deidonanus, being so styled in the edition of his history published by Ferrerius After receiving the rudiments of his education in his native town, and studying for some time at Aberdeen, he went to the university of Paris, where he took the degree of bachelor of divinity Having applied himself to the study of divinity, philosophy, and history, he was in 1497 appointed professor of philosophy in the college of Montagu in that university Amongst other eminent persons with whom he there became acquainted was Erasmus, who maintained a correspondence with him, and who, in one of his epistles, styles him "a man of an extraordinary happy genius, and of great eloquence"

On the erection, in 1500, of King's College, Aberdeen, by William Elphinstone, bishop of the diocese, Boece was by that prelate invited back to Scotland, and appointed principal of the new university, in which he was also professor of divinity His sub-principal, William Hay, also a native of Forfarshire, and his fellow-student at Dundee and Paris, succeeded him as head of the college His brother, Arthur Boece, chancellor of the cathedral of Brechin, was appointed professor of canon law, and June 22d, 1535 became a judge of the court of session His talents and high reputation tended very much to the prosperity and success of the institution Besides being principal of the college, Boece was a canon of Aberdeen, and rector of Tyrie, in the same county On the death of Bishop Elphinstone, in 1514, Boece wrote his life in Latin, with those of his predecessors in the see of Aberdeen This work, published, under the title of 'Episcoporum Murthlacensium et Aberdonensium,' at Paris in 4to in 1522, has been reprinted by the Bannatyne Club Murthlack in Banffshire was originally the seat of the bishops, before it was removed to Aberdeen, which accounts for the title of the work He next wrote, also in Latin, his more celebrated work, the History of Scotland, introduced by a copious geographical description of the country This work first appeared at Paris in 1526, under the title of 'Scotorum Historia ab illius Gentis Origine' The first edition contained seventeen books, and ended with the death of James the First Another edition, containing the eighteenth book, and part of the nineteenth, bringing the history down to the reign of James the Third, was published in 1574 by Joannes Ferrerius, a Piedmontese, who had resided several years in Scotland and who added an appendix of thirty-five pages It was printed at Lausanne, and published at Paris Boece's History was translated into the Scotch language for the benefit of James the Fifth, by John Bellenden, archdeacon of Moray, as already stated in the life of that author A metrical version of it, containing about seventy thousand lines, done by some one whose name has not been ascertained, is preserved in the library of the university of Cambridge In 1527 James the Fifth bestowed upon Boece a pension of fifty pounds Scots yearly, to be paid by the sheriff of Aberdeen out of the royal casualties, until the king should promote him to a benefice of a hundred merks Scots of yearly value This benefice was the rectory of Tyrie, which he held till his death In 1528 Boece took the degree of D D at Aberdeen, and we learn from the Burgh Records of that city, under date 5th September of that year, that on this occasion the magistrates voted him a present of a tun of wine when the new wines should arrive, or the sum of twenty pounds Scots, "to help to by him bonatis, quhilk of thame he thinkis maist expedient, at his awin plesour And the said counsail to convene this day eftermowne, in the prowest mans, to se and devise quhat this mony sal be eshast gotten" [Extract from Council Register of Aberdeen published for the Spalding Club, 1398—1570, p 121]

Boece died at Aberdeen, it is supposed, about the year 1536, aged about seventy, and was buried in the chapel of the college, near to the tomb of Bishop Elphinstone In the front of the chapel is his coat of arms, with 'H B ob 1536' His History of Scotland, considering the age in which he wrote, is remarkable for its elegance and purity of style, but his credulity and fondness for the marvellous detract greatly from its value, and deprive him of all title to be considered an authority He adopted, without inquiry, and without even seeming to have any doubt of their authenticity, the fables of the monastic chroniclers that preceded him, as well as the no less absurd fictions and traditions of his own age Some writers accuse him of having invented many details in the earlier part of his history, but from this charge of fabrication he has been vindicated by Mr Maitland, in his biographical introduction to Bellenden's translation It is enough that he has to bear the imputation of having been the great stumbling-block to a truthful history of his own times, for his falsehoods, after having been once and again disproved, come up again fresh, as if uncontradicted, to garnish the tales of the novelist, the tale-writer, and the would-be historian In his private character Boece is described as having been discreet, generous, affable, and courteous

Boece's works are

BOGUE, BOAG, and BOOG, varieties of a surname common in the south of Scotland From its similarity as used in the most ancient families, to the old French name De Bogue, it is probably of French or Norman origin The word Bogue, in old Norman-French and Spanish, signifies a mouth (Boca), and is used in Spanish topography to describe a narrow channel or passage of water, as Bogue Chito, (little mouth,) in Louisiana It is met with also in the names of a few places in Scotland, but all in the province of Moray, as in the old residence of Bog o' Gight, now Gordon Castle, near the new or small mouth of the Spey, and which may be the same as Bogue Chito, even when pronounced in modern Spanish, Boat-of-Bog, the village of the old ferry at the above mouth or channel of the Spey, and perhaps the water of Bogie itself, which is not so much a river as a mouth, channel, or passage, by which the two streamlets Craig and Corchinnan, after a short course, reach the Deveron It would almost appear from this nomenclature as if, when Malcolm IV drove out the ancient inhabitants of Moray, and introduced a new colony in their stead, that these latter were natives of Toulouse or of the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees where the Spanish tongue was spoken, a circumstance the less unlikely, as it was for having served under Henry II at Toulouse, and in defence of that people against the king of France, that the

Moravians professed to have rebelled against him The word occurs in English in disembogue, to discharge by a mouth Embogue, the opposite of this latter word, is used as a noun in an old writer (Florio in 1613) in a sense so similar to bog —which originally implied not a soft mud but a body, and ofttimes a large body of water, without an outlet—as to suggest its being the original of the latter term The subject of the following notice is the only individual who has obtained a place in Biography, but the name is common in old writings

BOGUE, DAVID, the Rev, one of the fathers and founders of the London Missionary Society, was born at Hallydown, parish of Coldingham, Berwickshire, February 18, 1750 He was the fourth son of John Bogue, land of Hallydown, and Margaret Swanston, his wife He commenced his classical education at the school of Eyemouth, and afterwards studied for the church at the university of Edinburgh, and in due time was licensed as a preacher of the gospel In 1771 he went to London, and was for some time employed as usher in an academy at Edmonton afterwards in the same capacity at Hampstead, and ultimately went to the Rev Mr Smith's at Camberwell, whom he assisted also in his ministerial duties He subsequently became minister of an Independent chapel at Gosport In 1780, besides his clerical charge, he undertook the duties of tutor to an institution in that town, for the education of young men destined for the ministry, in connection with the Independent communion At the same time, he originated the design of a grand missionary scheme, which afterwards led to the formation of the London Missionary Society Soon after he took an active part in the establishment of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Religious Tract Society To the latter body he contributed the first of a series of very useful publications In 1796, he and the Rev Greville Ewing of Glasgow, and the Rev William Innes of Edinburgh, who, like himself, had left the Church of Scotland and become Independent ministers, agreed with Robert Haldane, Esq of Auchtrie, who sold his estate to furnish funds for the purpose, to go out to India to preach the gospel to the natives The East India Company, however, refused their sanction to the undertaking, and the design was in consequence abandoned, providentially for them, as a massacre of Europeans afterwards took place at the exact spot which had been fixed upon for the missionary station, where a seminary was to have been built for the education of missionaries In 1815 the Senatus Academicus of Yale college, North America, conferred upon him the degree of D D Dr Bogue was in the practice of making an annual tour to the country in behalf of the Missionary Society In one of these journeys, in which he had been requested to assist at a meeting of the Sussex Auxiliary Society, he became unwell at the house of the Rev Mr Goulty of Brighton, and after a short illness, died there, October 25 1825 in the 75th year of his age At the time of his death he was president of the seminary of missions at Gosport He was an eminently amiable, energetic, and pious man, and contributed much towards a revival of religious feeling in the age and body with which he was connected His history of Dissenters is written with considerable feeling of dislike to the persecuting party, as he called them It is mentioned and it is creditable to him, that before his death he expressed regret for the harsh manner in which he wrote respecting some members of the English church His works are

BORTHWICK, Baron a title, at present dormant, in the peerage of Scotland, formerly possessed by a family of that name in the county of Edinburgh Douglas is of opinion that the surname is local, assumed "from lands of that name on Borthwick water, in the county of Selkirk" The name of the water of Borthwick, like that of most streams in Scotland, is of immemorial antiquity and like the similar one of Borthoc in Forfarshire, is also of British Celtic origin It is said, but on no reliable authority, that the ancestor of the noble house of Borthwick was one Andreas, a son of the lord of Burtick in Lyonia, who accompanied Edgar Atheling and his two sisters, Margaret, afterwards wife of Malcolm Canmore, and Christina, to Scotland in 1067, and obtaining possession of some lands in this country, settled here

BONAR, a surname See SUPPLEMENT

BORTHWICK, Baron a title, at present dormant, in the peerage of Scotland, formerly possessed by a family of that name in the county of Edinburgh Douglas is of opinion that the surname is local, assumed "from lands of that name on Borthwick water, in the county of Selkirk" The name of the water of Borthwick, like that of most streams in Scotland, is of immemorial antiquity, and like the similar one of Borthoc in Forfarshire, is also of British Celtic origin It is said, but on no reliable authority, that the ancestor of the noble house of Borthwick was one Andreas, a son of the lord of Burtick in Livonia, who accompanied Edgar Atheling and his two sisters, Margaret, afterwards wife of Malcolm Canmore, and Christina, to Scotland in 1067, and obtaining possession of some lands in this country, settled here

His posterity, accordingly, with some small alteration in the spelling, are stated to have assumed the surname of Borthwick, from the birthplace of their progenitor The territorial origin of the name is, however, by far the more probable one

In the reign of King David the Second, Thomas de Borthwick obtained, probably by excambion, or exchange with his patrimony of Borthwick, some lands near Lauder in Berwickshire, from Robert Lauder of Quarrelwood, and in that of King Robert the Second, Sir William Borthwick was possessor of the lands of Catkune in Edinburghshire, as appears by a charter dated in 1378 These lands he called Borthwick after his own name On the estate of Harvieston in the parish of Borthwick are the ruins of a very ancient castle, known by the name of the old castle of Catkune, which are traditionally assigned as the seat of the family before it became possessed of the domain of Locherworth Previous to their assumption of the title of Borthwick of that Ilk, they were promiscuously designed as of Catkune, Legertwood, and Hermot-muir

During the fifteenth and following centuries, the lords of Borthwick had immense possessions and great influence in that portion of Edinburghshire which now forms the parish of Borthwick, a district famed for its romantic scenery

The first Lord Borthwick was Sir William Borthwick of Borthwick, in the reign of James the First, but previous to him there seem to have been two persons of the name of Sir William Borthwick, occupiers of the castle of Catkune A Sir William de Borthwick is repeatedly mentioned by Rymer in his Fœdera, vols 8 and 9, and Douglas (Peerage 1pp vol ii page 601) enumerates several grants of land, charters, and public appointments held by a personage of this name About 1387 Sir William de Borthwick witnessed a charter of James, second earl of Douglas and Mar, of the barony of Drumlanrig In the reign of King Robert the Third William de Borthwick obtained, from Margaret, countess of Mar and Angus, a charter of the lands of Ludmuchi and Wester Drumtanachy in the barony of Kirkmuir, Forfarshire In October and November 1398 Sir William of Borthwic was one of the commissioners on the part of the duke of Rothesay to conclude a treaty for a truce and the liberation of prisoners, with commissioners on the part of John, duke of Lancaster, at Haudenstank and Clochmabenstane William Borthewyk, chivaler, was a commissioner to treat with the English 21st December 1400 and had a letter of safe conduct as such into England, 26th April 1401 On 24th August 1404, William de Borthwick, miles, was a commissioner to treat with the English, and again 8th March and 27th August 1405 On the 21st of September the same year William de Borthwick, miles, was one of the hostages for the earl of Douglas, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon On 27th April 1409, a safe conduct was granted to William de Borthwick de Lidgertwood, knight as a commissioner from Scotland to England, and William de Borthwik, miles, was one of the commissioners to treat with the English, 21st April 1410 Robert, duke of Albany, granted a charter, dated 4th June of that year, 'dilecto nostro Willielmo de Borthwick, militi' of the lands of Borthwic and Thoftcotys in Selkirkshire on the resignation of Robert Scott, (probably a second excambion by which he resumed the ancient patrimony of the family) On 23d May and 24th September 1411, and 7th August 1413, Sir William de Borthwick was a Commissioner for treating with the English William, dominus de Borthwick, in the year 1421, was one of the hostages for the return of James the First when it was proposed that his Majesty should visit Scotland, 31st May of that year, on his parole A safe conduct was granted to William de Borthwic de eodem, miles, to proceed to England as a commissioner to treat for the release of James the First, 12th May 1423, and to William de Borthwick, dominus de Heriot, to repair to that kingdom to meet his majesty, 13th February 1424 Willielmus Borthwick ejusdem, miles, was one of the jury on the trial of Murdoch, duke of Albany, in May 1425

Sir William Borthwick, father of the first Lord Borthwick, besides his son, had two daughters, Janet, married, first, to James Douglas, Lord Dalkeith, and secondly to George Crichton, earl of Caithness The second daughter became the wife of Sir John Oliphant

The son appears to have been created Lord Borthwick before 1430,—it is supposed in 1424,—for in October of the former year, at the baptism of the twin sons of James the First, several knights were created, and among the rest William, son and heir of Lord Borthwick In the records there is no patent found constituting this peerage The first Lord Borthwick was one of the substituted hostages for the ransom of King James the First He was sent to England 16th July 1424, and remained there till 9th July 1427, when an order was issued for his liberation, he being then in the custody of the bishop of Durham By a charter under the great seal, of date June 2, 1430, he obtained a license from James the First, to build a castle on the spot called the Mote or Lochwarret or Locherworth, which he had bought from Sir William Hay In the description of Borthwick parish in the new Statistical Account of Scotland [vol i p 162] it is stated that the family of Hay, afterwards of Yester, ancestor of the Marquises of Tweeddale, were at that time occupiers of the domain of Locherworth The Borthwicks and the Hays appear to have thus been neighbours, and there is a tradition relating to the old castle of Catkune, that in consequence of the then possessor of it, of the Borthwick family, having married a lady of the family of Hay, the Hays consented to part with a portion of their property to the knight of Catkune Another version of the tradition is, that the lady belonged to the house of Douglas Lord Borthwick erected a stately castle on the spot indicated, and, under the name of Borthwick castle, it became the chief residence of the family, giving its name to the parish in which it is situated "Like many other baronial residences in Scotland, he built this magnificent pile upon the very verge of his own property The usual reason for choosing such a situation was hinted by a northern baron to whom a friend objected this circumstance as a defect at least an inconvenience 'We'll bruy yont' (Anglice, press forward,) was the baron's answer, which expressed the policy of the powerful in settling their residence upon the extremity of their domains, as giving pretext and opportunity for making acquisitions at the expense of their neighbours William de Hay, from whom Sir William Borthwick had acquired a part of Locherworth, is said to have looked with envy upon the splendid castle of his neighbour, and to have vented his spleen by building a mill upon the lands of Little Locherworth, immediately beneath the knoll on which the fortress was situated, declaring that the lord of Borthwick, in all his pride, should never be out of the hearing of the clack of his neighbour's mill The mill, accordingly, still exists, as a property independent of the castle" [Provincial Antiquities, p 200] The first Lord Borthwick died before 1458 He seems to have been cupbearer to William St Clair, earl and prince of Orkney, founder of Roslin chapel, who maintained his court at Roslin castle with regal magnificence In an aisle of the old church of Borthwick may still be seen two monumental statues, in a recumbent posture, of this lord Borthwick and his lady His lordship is in full armour, while his lady, a beautiful female figure, with a gentle and

William, second Lord Borthwick, was, in 1429, in the lifetime of his father, and under the appellation of Wilhelmus de Borthwick, junior, ambassador, with the bishops of Aberdeen and Dunblane, and seven others, to the court of Rome He had a safe conduct as a commissioner to treat with the English, 13th July 1459, and on 1st September that year he concluded a treaty with them at Newcastle On 24th September 1461, he had a safe conduct as an ambassador to England, and on 5th December 1463, he had another He seems to have died about 1464 He had a daughter, Margaret, married to Sir John Maxwell of Calderwood, and three sons, William, third Lord Borthwick, Sir Thomas Borthwick of Colylaw, and James Borthwick of Glengelt

His son, William, third Lord Borthwick, sat in parliament 9th October 1466, and 11th October 1467, and in several subsequent parliaments, down to 1505 He had a safe conduct as ambassador to England 7th August 1471, and again on 24th August 1473 Sir William of Borthwic, knight, his son, appears as defender in an action of debt, 4th July 1476 when judgment was given against him Lord Borthwick was one of the lords of articles pro hominibus, in the parliament that sat down at Edinburgh 4th October 1479 William, Lord Borthwick, and Sir William of Borthwick, knight, his son and heir, had a judgment in their favour 16th October of that year, and of the same date Sir William of Borthwick knight, is sole defender in a civil suit On 20th September 1484, Lord Borthwick was one of the guarantees of a treaty with England [Fœdera xii p 241,] and on 30th September 1497, and 12th July 1499 he was one of the conservators of a treaty with the same power [Ibid pp 676 and 726] The third Lord Borthwick was slain at the battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513 He married Maryota de Hope Pringle, or Hoppringill, as it was spelled in those days, and with several daughters, had two sons, William, his successor, and Alexander Borthwick of Nenthorn

William, fourth Lord Borthwick, immediately after the battle of Flodden, was appointed by the council of the kingdom to the command of the castle of Stirling, which was ordered to be well fortified, with the important charge of the infant monarch, James the Fifth He set his seal to the treaty with England 7th October 1517 [Ibid xiii p 600] The fourth lord died in 1542 He had married in 1491, Margaret, eldest daughter of John, Lord Hay of Yester, by whom, besides two daughters, he had two sons, the master of Borthwick, who died in the lifetime of his father, and John, fifth lord

John, fifth Lord Borthwick, opposed the Reformation in 1560, saying that he would believe as his fathers had done before him He assisted the queen regent against the Lords of the Congregation, and died in 1565 He married Lady Isabel Lindsay, eldest daughter of David, seventh earl of Crawford, by whom he had a son, William, sixth Lord Borthwick, and a daughter, Mariota, married to Andrew Hope Pringle of Galashiels Notwithstanding his attachment to the 'ancient religion,' his servants, in 1547, were guilty of an insult to a church officer, which one would scarcely have expected would have been committed at Borthwick castle The incident, whimsical enough in its way, is thus related by Sir Walter Scott, who has published his authority in an extract from the Consistory Register of St Andrews "In consequence of a process betwixt Master George Hay de Minzeans and the Lord Borthwick letters of excommunication had passed against the latter, on account of the contumacy of certain witnesses William Langlands, an apparitor or macer [bacularius] of the see of St Andrews, presented these letters to the curate of the church of Borthwick, requiring him to publish the same at the service of high mass It seems that the inhabitants of the castle were at this time engaged in the favourite sport of enacting the Abbot of Unreason, a species of high jinks, in which a mimic prelate was elected, who, like the lord of Misrule in England, turned all sort of lawful authority, and particularly the church ritual, into ridicule This frolicsome person, with his retinue, notwithstanding of the apparitor's character, entered the church, seized upon the primate's officer without hesitation, and dragging him to the mill-dam, on the south side of the castle compelled him to leap into the water Not contented with this partial immersion, the Abbot of Unreason pronounced that Mr William Langlands was not yet sufficiently bathed, and therefore caused his assistants to lay him on his back in the stream, and duck him in the most satisfactory and perfect manner The unfortunate apparitor was then conducted back to the church, where, for his refreshment after his bath, the letters of excommunication were torn to pieces, and steeped in a bowl of wine, the mock abbot being probably of opinion that a tough parchment was but dry eating Langlands was compelled to eat the letters, and swallow the wine, with the comfortable assurance, that if any more such letters should arrive during the continuance of his office, they should 'gang the same gait"

William, sixth Lord Borthwick, was a steady friend of Queen Mary That ill-fated princess occasionally visited the castle of Borthwick, and at last took refuge in it with Bothwell, when they were nearly surprised by the party of Murray and Morton Bothwell escaped before their arrival, and Mary fled, two days afterwards, in men's apparel

Lord Borthwick married Grizel, eldest daughter of Sir Walter Scott of Branxholm, ancestor of the duke of Buccleuch, by whom he had two sons, William, master of Borthwick, who died before his father and James, seventh Lord Borthwick On 10th January 1579–80, Lady Borthwick and her two sisters were made, at the same time, the subjects of legal prosecution by the dominant party on account of alleged gross irregularity of life and manners As none of these charges were established, notwithstanding the predominance and spite of the prosecuting party, it is possible they were intended merely to excite the popular odium against Lord Borthwick and the ladies of his family as supporters of the queen But it is a sad picture of the state of Scotland at the time, whether we can suppose the accusations to be true or false [See Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i part ii pp 83 and 84]

James, seventh Lord Borthwick, married Margaret Hay, eldest daughter of William, Lord Hay of Yester December 23, 1599, he was charged, with sundry other persons, "under deidly feud" with the lands of Craigmillar and Bass, to appear before the king and Council 'at Halyrudhous,' and 'that they keip thair lugeingis efter thair cumming, quhill (till) thay be specialie sent for,' &c At his apprehension for not obeying this order, there seems to have been a riot, for on 15th January following John Hadden, dagmaker, and others, were ordered to be denounced rebels, for not answering 'tuiching the riot committit be thame laitlie, againis the Provost and Bailleis of the Burgh of Edinburgh, in thair convoy and taking to warde of James, Lord Borthwik' [Ibid pp 352 and 353] July 30, 1603, Marion Wardlaw, spouse of John Kennedy, gauntlet-maker in Edinburgh, was dilated of 'art, part, red and counsall of the murder committit be

Williame Borthuik, tutor of Borthuik, Johne Borthuik his brother, and uthers, thair complices, in cuming to James Fraimnis' dwelling-house in the Cannogait, under scylence of nycht, and strykeing of him nyne straikis in the body and heid, to the effusion of his body, and levand him for deid" [Ibid pp 352, 353]

The seventh lord was succeeded by his son, John, eighth Lord Borthwick, who married Lady Lilias Kerr, fifth daughter of Mark, first earl of Lothian, by whom, besides a daughter, he had a son, John ninth Lord Borthwick born 9th February 1616 He adhered firmly to the royal cause during all the time of the civil war After the battle of Dunbar Borthwick castle held out against Cromwell until artillery were opened upon it, but seeing no appearance of relief, Lord Borthwick surrendered on honourable terms, namely, liberty to march out with his lady and family unmolested, and fifteen days allowed to remove his effects He married, 23d August 1649 Lady Elizabeth Kerr, second daughter of William, third earl of Lothian, but died without issue in 1672

From that period till 1762, the title remained dormant In 1727, Henry Borthwick, descendant and heir male of Alexander Borthwick of Nenthorn, second son of the third Lord Borthwick, was served heir male in general of William, the first lord Borthwick, and in 1734, he voted as Lord Borthwick at the election of a representative peer, and continued to do so at all the subsequent elections till 14th December 1761, when the House of Lords made an order on him and on several others who had assumed dormant peerages not to take on them their titles until the same should be allowed in due course of law

The above-mentioned Henry Borthwick obtained the title in 1762, by decision of the House of Lords, and was the tenth Lord Borthwick He married at Edinburgh 5th March 1770, Margaret, daughter of George Drummond of Blair in Stirlingshire but died, without issue at Newcastle on his way to London, 6th September 1772 when the title again became dormant and so remains At the time of his death his heir male, Archibald Borthwick was in Norway In 1807,his claim to the title which was before the House of Lords was opposed by John Borthwick Esq of Crookston as descended through nine generations in a direct male line from John de Borthwick of Crookston second son of the first Lord Borthwick Mr Borthwick of Crookston acquired the property of Borthwick castle by purchase He married in 1787, Grizel eldest daughter of George Admston, Esq of Carcant, and left at his decease, a son and successor, John Borthwick, Esq of Crookston and Borthwick castle Various proceedings have taken place in the case before the House of Lords, but as yet there has been no decision

James Borthwick of Stow, a cadet of the Crookston family practised as a physician in Edinburgh, and deserves notice as having caused the disjunction of the corporation of surgeons from that of the barbers which previously formed one corporation

A view of Borthwick castle is given in Grose's Antiquities of Scotland, and in Billings' Baronial and Ecclesiastical Antiquities, vol i It consists principally of a vast square tower, with square and round bastions at equal distances from its base The walls are thirteen feet thick near the bottom, and towards the top are gradually contracted to about six feet Besides the sunk story they are, from the adjacent area to the battlement, ninety feet high, and if the roof is included, the whole height will be about one hundred and ten feet The great hall is forty feet long, and so high in the roof that says Nisbet 'a man on horseback might turn a spear in it with all the ease imaginable' The following is a woodcut of this once magnificent structure

The master gunner of James the Fourth was named Robert Borthwick and seven great cannons cast by him, called the seven sisters were taken out of the castle of Edinburgh to the fatal field of Flodden Of this person Balfour, in his Annals [vol i p 232] under the year 1509, has the following notice This zeare the king entertained one Robert Borthwick quha foundit and caste manie pices of brasse ordinance of all sises in Edinburgh castle, all of them having this inscription 'Machina sum Scoto Borthwick fabricata Roberto'

Among those persecuted by Cardinal Bethune, on account of their adopting the principles of the Reformation, was Sir John Borthwick who was cited before the ecclesiastical court at St Andrews in 1540 for heresy Thirteen charges were preferred against him but in particular that he had dispersed heretical books Sir John fled to England, and not appearing in court when called the charges against him were held as confessed He was condemned on the 28th May to be burnt as a heretic, his goods were confiscated his effigy was burnt in the market place of St Andrews and all men were inhibited from harbouring or protecting him Sir John was graciously received by Henry the Eighth and sent by him on a mission to the Protestant princes of Germany, to concert a confederacy between them, in defence of the reformed religion

BORTHWICK, David, of Lochhill, a learned lawyer and judge, was lord advocate of Scotland in the reign of James the Sixth, before which time he was usually designated "Mr David Borthwick of Auldstone" He was one of the nine advocates selected by the court of session, on the first March 1549, to plead "before thame in all actions and causes." In 1552 he was made a member of the public commission appointed to treat with the English commissioners on border affairs In the Burgh Records of Aberdeen we find the following entry under date 17th August, 1562 "The said day, the prowest, baillies, and counsell ordanis Patre Menzes, thesaurar, to send Maister David Borthuik, procuratour for the toun in the cause of varandiæ mowit agains thame be William Forbes, to defend the said mater, sax pound Scottis' [Extracts from Burgh Records of Aberdeen, 1398—1570, printed for the Spalding Club, p 346] In June 1564 he was counsel for the magistrates and town-council of Edinburgh in a prosecution against them, and in May 1567, as counsel for the earl of Bothwell, he took instruments of Queen Mary's pardon and forgiveness of him and his accomplices for her abduction to Dunbar, which her majesty pronounced in court on the 12th of that month In 1573, Borthwick became, with Crichton of Elhock, father of the admirable Crichton, joint king's advocate, when, as was then customary, he took his seat as a lord of session He appears to have been the first who bore the title of "Lord Advocate" The salary of this functionary at that period was forty pounds Scots yearly, and that of a lord of session amounted to about the same sum, considered a good deal of money in those days Borthwick died in January 1581 He had acquired estates in the counties of Berwick, Haddington, and Fife, in which, before his death, he had infeft his son James, whose extravagance and improvidence caused some of them to be sold even in his father's lifetime This circumstance induced the old gentleman, on his deathbed, to exclaim bitterly, "What shall I say? I give him to the devil that doth get a fool, and maketh not a fool of him," a saying that became proverbial, as David Borthwick's testament — Haig and Brunton's Senators of College of Justice

BOSTON, Thomas, a learned theological writer, author of the 'Fourfold State,' the youngest of seven sons of a small landed proprietor in the neighbourhood of Dunse, was born in that town March 17, 1676 His father being confined in the prison of Dunse for nonconformity, when he was a little boy, took him with him into the prison to keep him company, an incident which left a deep impression on his mind He received the usual elements of education at the grammar school of his native place, and in 1692 went to the university of Edinburgh, where he attended the usual course for three years, and entered on the study of divinity In 1696 he taught a school at Glencairn, and was then appointed tutor to Andrew Fletcher of Aberlady, a boy nine years of age, but was enabled to attend the divinity class at the university of Edinburgh He afterwards accompanied his pupil to the house of Colonel Bruce of Kennet in Clackmannanshire, who had married the boy's mother, where he remained for about a year In June 1697 he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Dunse and Chirnside, and in September 1699 he was ordained to the living of Simprin, one of the smallest charges in Scotland not containing in his time above ninety examinable persons It is now united to the parish of Swinton In 1700 he married Catherine Brown of Culross, whom, in his memoirs of himself, he describes as "a woman of great worth, a stately, beautiful, and comely personage, of bright natural parts, an uncommon stock of prudence, and of a quick and lively apprehension, and remarkably useful to the country side, through her skill in surgery" About this time he first became acquainted with a book which proved of much service to him, and afterwards occasioned a long and important controversy in the Church of Scotland, entitled 'The Marrow of Modern Divinity,' written by Edward Fisher, M A, Oxford, 1627 It had been brought into his parish from England by one of his parishioners, who had been a soldier in the civil wars He was a member of the first General Assembly held under Queen Anne in March 1703, which was suddenly dissolved by the commissioner, the earl of Seafield, while discussing an overture for preventing the marriage of protestants with papists In May 1707 he was translated to Ettrick, then one of the wildest parishes in the south of Scotland, where he remained till his death

On the occasion of the imposition of the abjuration oath, 1712, he was one of those ministers of the Church of Scotland who refused to take it This oath was originally proposed by the leaders of the presbyterian party to be inserted in a bill granting toleration to episcopalian worship in Scotland, in the expectation that by refusing to take it the indulgence to the episcopalian clergy, who were all Jacobites, would be nullified, but by the counter policy of the court party, it was extended to, and made obligatory on, presbyterian ministers likewise Their conscientious objections, however, were not to the oath itself, but to a clause in it recognising the act of succession, which provided that the successors to the crown of Great Britain should be of the communion of the Church of England—a recognition which they deemed inconsistent with their principles To provide against the worst, Boston made over to his eldest son a house in Dunse, which he had inherited from his father, and assigned all his other goods to his precentor, John Currie, so that he might elude the penalty of five hundred pounds sterling, which was attached to the refusal to take the oath within a certain specified time, but the penalty was never demanded Having devoted much of his attention to the study of the Hebrew accents, which he was persuaded are the key to the true version of the Hebrew text, he wrote an 'Essay on the Hebrew Accentuation,' which was not published till 1738, when it was brought out at Amsterdam under the care of the learned David Mill, professor of oriental languages in the university of Utrecht His 'Human Nature in its Fourfold State' was at first brought out in 1720 under the auspices of Mr Robert Wightman, treasurer to the city of Edinburgh, who prefixed a preface, and added many of his own emendations, but these Mr Boston could not agree to, and they were omitted in the second edition Mr Boston died May 20, 1732, in the 57th year of his age His works have had a wide circulation, particularly his 'Fourfold State' They were collected into a large folio volume in 1768, and in 1773 his 'Body of Divinity,' 3 vols 8vo, was published from his manuscripts The most remarkable of his posthumous pieces is the 'Memoirs of his Life, Times, and Writings,' written by himself, and published in one closely printed 8vo volume in 1776 He was survived by his wife, and by two sons and two daughters, whose descendants still remain near Ettrick

BOSTON, Thomas, one of the founders of the Relief church, the youngest son of the preceding, was born April 3, 1713 He seems to have been very early brought under the influence of religious impressions, and having made choice of the ministry, he pursued his studies at the university of Edinburgh He was only nineteen years of age when his father died, and though his course of theological study was not completed, so great were his attainments, and such was the desire of all parties that he should succeed his father in the parish of Ettrick, that he was licensed to preach the gospel, earlier than the laws of the church allowed His gifts as a preacher, we are told, soon won for him a distinguished reputation Mr Bogue of Gosport, who often heard him, when he was in his prime, declared that, next to Whitefield, Thomas Boston was the most commanding preacher he had ever heard From Ettrick, he was, after several years, translated to Oxnam, a few miles from Jedburgh Mr Boston entertained strongly his father's sentiments as respects some features of the national establishment, being opposed to patronage and a friend of free communion, and even in the height of his popularity he planned a secession from the Church of Scotland different from that which had taken place under the Erskines On this account he was obnoxious to the ruling party, and in 1751 a competing call to Dundee in his favour was rejected as informal, the magistrates, with whom the patronage rested, having named another candidate In 1755, a vacancy took place in the church of Jedburgh, and the people were anxious for Mr Boston to be their minister The church, however, was in the patronage of the Crown, and a presentation was granted in favour of Mr John Bonar, minister at Cockpen, but so great was the opposition to his settlement that, on the case being carried to the Assembly, the Lord Advocate deemed it wise to depart from the presentation Mr Douglas of Kenmore, who was still more unpopular, was next presented to the vacant charge, and as the Assembly of May 1757 peremptorily ordered his settlement to be proceeded with, it was resolved, on the part of the townspeople, to separate from the established church, and have the minister of their choice They, therefore, sent Mr Boston a call to be their minister, which he accepted of, and in the short space of six months, a place of worship was built for him in the town of Jedburgh At the meeting of the established presbytery in that town, on the 7th December 1757, he formally demitted his charge of Oxnam, giving his reasons for taking this step, and two days thereafter he was inducted into the new church built for him at Jedburgh, when at least two thousand people were present on which occasion the bells were rung, and the magistrates and council, in their robes of office, walked in procession to the meeting-house His admission was performed by Mr Roderick Mackenzie, an Independent minister from England, who was shortly to accept a charge in the same way, at Nigg in Ross-shire After his induction Mr Boston preached to crowded audiences, and persons from a great distance formed a considerable portion of his congregation At his first dispensation of the sacrament, the concourse of people was very great It took place in the open air on a little holm called the Ana, on the banks of the Jed, and close by the town of Jedburgh The scene was august and most impressive A touching incident marked his second dispensation of the Lord's Supper He had invited to assist him Mr Thomas Gillespie of Dunfermline, who, in 1752, when minister of Carnock, had been deposed for not obeying an order of the General Assembly to attend at the induction of an unpopular minister to the church of Inverkeithing "Mr Gillespie," says Dr Struthers, in his History of the Relief Church, "acceded to his request It was not so easy travelling then as now between Dunfermline and Jedburgh On Saturday he did not arrive, on Sabbath morning he was not come Boston went to the church, where the sacrament was to be dispensed by him, alone A whole day's services were before him, and taking strangers along with his own congregation, (aged persons report that) 1,800 would at times communicate with him During the morning prayer, Mr Boston heard the pulpit door open, and a foot come gently in behind him It was then the custom for the assistant minister to go to the pulpit during the action sermon He could scarcely be deceived as to his visitant His prayer was speedily drawn to a close Turning round—it was Mr Gillespie In the face of the whole congregation, whose feelings were wound up to the highest pitch of excitement, he gave him a most cordial welcome From this time forward they followed joint measures for promoting the liberty of the Christian people, and affording relief to oppressed parishes, though they did not constitute themselves into a regular presbytery till three years afterwards" It was on the 22d October, 1761, at Colingsburgh in Fife, that Messrs Boston and Gillespie, with the Rev Mr Collier of Colingsburgh, and representative elders from the three churches of Jedburgh, Dunfermline, and Colingsburgh, formed themselves into a presbytery for the relief of Christians oppressed in their Christian privileges The Relief church gradually extended throughout Scotland till 1847, when it was united to the Secession church, and both together now form the United Presbyterian Synod. Mr Boston died in 1767 He was the author of a volume of essays, two of which were published by his son after his death, as well as of some well-written prefaces to religious reprints —Struthers' History of the Relief Church

Boswell, originally Bosville, or Bosvile, a surname of French extraction which is found in England from the time of the Conquest, when it was introduced by Sieur de Bosville, who came over with the Conqueror, and had a considerable command at the battle of Hastings It is derived in Scotland from a branch of the English Bosviles, who settled in North Britain in the reign of David the First, and soon spread into different parts of the country No connection can be traced betwixt this name and that of St Boswell's, a parish in Roxburghshire, for it is ascertained that that place took its name from a monk of Melrose, called Boisil, a disciple of St Cuthbert, who is said to have founded the church of the parish, and died many centuries before the Bosvilles arrived in Scotland

Robert Bosville, the ancestor of the Boswells of Balmuto, in Fife, appears to have been much about the court of King William the Lion In a charter of that monarch to William Hay of Errol in 1188 he is a witness, as he is in another charter of the same prince confirming a donation to the religious at Coldstream, in or before 1200 His name also appears in many other charters of the same king He was proprietor of the lands of Oxnum and others in Berwickshire, which were afterwards called Boswell's lands, from his name This Robert Bosville was the father of Adam de Bosville de Oxnum, &c, who is mentioned in an obligation of Philip de Lochore, the 21st year of the reign of King Alexander the Second (1235) His son and successor, Roger de Bosville, got a charter of the lands of Oxnum from that monarch Roger's son, William de Bosville of Oxnum, &c, was witness in a donation to the monastery of Soltray by Bernard de Houden in the reign of King Alexander the Third In 1292 this William de Bosville was compelled, with other Scottish barons to submit to Edward the First of England, when he overran Scotland with his armies, and in 1296 he was again forced to swear fealty to the English king His son Richard Bosville of Oxnuir besides his estate in Berwickshire, was proprietor of other lands near Ardrossan in Ayrshire, as appears by a charter under the great seal from King Robert the Bruce, about 1320 He left two sons William and Roger William, the eldest, the last of the Boswells of Oxnuir, is mentioned as a witness in charters of donation to the monastery of Kelso in 1330, and again in 1345 In a donation to the monastery of Dryburgh, William de Bosville, designed 'aldermanus de Roxburgh,' is a witness, in 1338

Roger de Boswell, second son of Richard of Oxnum, was the first of the name who settled in Fife In the beginning of the reign of King David Bruce, he married Mariota, daughter and co-heiress of Sir William Lochore of that ilk, knight, with whom he got the half of the barony of Auchterderran in that county His son, John de Boswell, succeeded him in all his lands In 1365 he obtained a safe conduct to England, from King Edward the Third, and returned the following year John de Boswell married Margaret, daughter of Sir Robert Melville of Carnbee His son, Sir William Boswell, was one of the judges in a perambulation of the lands of Kirkness and Lochore He married Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Alexander Gordon, brother of Umphryd Jerdan of Appiegirth, with whom he got some lands in the constabulary of Kinghorn His son, Sir John Boswell, the first designed of Balgregie, obtained the barony of Balmuto, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, by his marriage with Mariota, daughter and co-heiress of Sir John Glen, to whom it had previously belonged.

This Sir John Boswell, the first of Balmuto, died before 1430, and was succeeded by his son, David, who married first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Melville of Raith, by whom, besides six daughters, he had two sons, David, his heir, and Robert, parson of Auchterderran, a man of great piety and learning, who lived to the advanced age of a hundred years David, the father, took, for his second wife, Isabel, daughter of Sir Thomas Wemyss of Rires, relict of David Hay of Naughton, by whom he had a daughter, Isabel, married in 1488 to Thomas Lundin, junior, of that ilk

David, the elder son, had a charter under the great seal from King James the Second, of his father's lands of Glasmont, in Fife, dated 4th November 1458, after which he was designed of Glasmont as long as he lived He was twice married By his first wife, Grizel, daughter of Sir John Wemyss of that ilk, he had two sons and two daughters David, the elder son, predeceased his father Alexander, who was afterwards knighted, succeeded to the estate of Balmuto By his second wife, Lady Margaret Sinclair, daughter of William, earl of Orkney and Caithness, whom he married in 1480, he had five sons of whom Thomas, the eldest, was the progenitor of the Boswells of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire

Sir Alexander Boswell of Balmuto, the surviving son by the first marriage, was in great favour with King James the Fourth, whom he accompanied to the fatal field of Flodden together with his brother, Thomas Boswell of Auchinleck and were both left with their royal master among the slain

His eldest son, David Boswell of Balmuto, was held in great estimation by King James the Fifth, Queen Mary, an King James the Sixth, from all of whom he had several friendly and familiar letters He was engaged in most of the public transactions of his time, and died, 8th May, 1582, in the 84th year of his age He married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Moncreiff of that ilk, by whom he had ten sons and ten daughters George, his ninth son, was chirurgeon to King James the Sixth His youngest son was parson of Auchterderran, and wrote a genealogical history of the family of Balmuto

David, his eldest son, designed of Glasmont, was killed, in the lifetime of his father, with his brother Robert, at the battle of Pinkie in 1547, leaving, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir David Wemyss of that ilk, an infant son, Sir John Boswell, who succeeded his grandfather, and married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Sandilands of St Monance Sir John had four sons and ten daughters, and died in 1610, in the 64th year of his age He is described as a man of excellent parts and a great favourite with James the Sixth, from whom he had many friendly letters By one of these it appears that he had lent his majesty one thousand merks, a little before the arrival of his queen from Denmark, a favour which is acknowledged in a kind letter from the king to Balmuto, dated at Falkland, 2d September, 1589 At the baptism of Prince Henry in 1594 the honour of knighthood was conferred on him and on his eldest son by the king Besides several baronies of lands bestowed on his younger sons, and considerable portions given to his daughters, on their marriage, he left a good estate to his eldest son, Sir John Boswell The latter married Janet, daughter of Sir James Scott of Balweary, and had seven sons and six daughters Robert Boswell, his fifth son, a major of horse in the service of King Charles the First was killed at the battle of Worcester in 1651

David Boswell of Balmuto, his eldest son, succeeded, before the year 1640 He married Nicholas, daughter of Sir Peter Young of Seaton, afterwards of Auldbar, eleemosinary to King James the Sixth, by whom he had five sons and seven daughters His eldest son, David, was succeeded, soon after 1667, by his son also named David The eldest son of the latter, Andrew Boswell of Balmuto, by his extravagance, found himself under the necessity of disposing of the estate of Balmuto, and, accordingly, in 1722, he sold it to his kinsman, John Boswell, second son of David Boswell of Auchinleck, reserving to himself and his heirs the coal and all below ground, such as mines, minerals, &c His son David, representative of the Boswells of Balmuto, enjoyed no part of the estate, except the coal, &c

The estate of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire, was bestowed by James the Fourth on Thomas Boswell, eldest son of David Boswell of Balmuto, by Lady Margaret Sinclair, as above mentioned, he being held in high estimation by that monarch He was slain at Flodden, 9th September, 1513 By his wife, Annabella, daughter of Sir Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, he had an only son, David Boswell of Auchinleck The latter married Lady Janet Hamilton, daughter of James, first earl of Arran, progenitor of the dukes of Hamilton, and was succeeded by his son, John, who was twice married, first, to Christian, daughter of Sir Robert Dalzell of Glenae, progenitor of the earls of Carnwath, and by her he had three sons, James, his heir, John or Mungo, who received from his father the lands of Duncansmuir, and was progenitor of the Boswells of Craigston, and Robert, secondly to a daughter of the lord Stewart of Ochiltree, by whom he had a son, William, who obtained the estate of Knockroon

July 2, 3, and 4, 1600, James Boswell fiar or younger of Auchinleck, and several other persons were indicted for abiding from the Raid of Dumfries, ordained to have convened with Archibald, earl of Angus, in the previous September A variety of procedure took place in this and other similar cases, when some of the parties were fined, others discharged, &c James Boswell of Auchinleck was one of the prolocutors, or counsel, for John Mure of Auchindrane, when put on his trial for the slaughter of Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean, June 24, 1602

James Boswell of Auchinleck, eldest son of John, married Marion Crawford, a daughter of the ancient family of Kerse, and had six sons and several daughters His three youngest sons entered the service of Gustavus Adolphus, and after fighting in his wars settled in Sweden, where their posterity still exists He died in 1618, and was succeeded by his eldest son, David Boswell of Auchinleck, who married Isabel, daughter of Sir John Wallace of Carnhill, by whom he had four daughters David was a faithful adherent of Charles the First, and was fined in the sum of ten thousand merks for refusing to take the covenant He died in 1661, having settled his estate on his nephew David, son of his next brother, James Boswell, by his wife, a daughter of Sir James Cunninghame of Glengarnock His son, David Boswell of Auchinleck, the successor to his uncle, married Anne, daughter of James Hamilton of Dalziell, by whom, besides three daughters, he had James his heir, and Robert, a writer in Edinburgh, who, by great diligence in his profession, acquired a handsome fortune, and purchased the estate of Balmuto in Fife, from his kinsman, Andrew Boswell, as above mentioned

The son of this Robert, Claud Irvine Boswell, succeeded to the estate of Balmuto He was born in 1742, and being educated for the bar, passed advocate, 2d August, 1766 In 1780 he was appointed sheriff depute of Fife and Kinross, and in 1798 he became a lord-of-session, under the title of Lord Balmuto He resigned his seat on the bench in January 1822, and died suddenly 22d July 1824 He had married, in 1788, Miss Anne Irvine, who, by the death of her brother and grandfather, became heiress of Kincoussie He left one son and two daughters

The eldest son of the above named David Boswell of Auchinleck, James Boswell, who succeeded him in that estate, was a lawyer of great eminence in his day He married, in 1704, Lady Elizabeth Bruce, daughter of Alexander, second earl of Kincardine, by whom he had two sons and a daughter, viz Alexander, his heir, afterwards Lord Auchinleck, John, doctor of medicine, censor of the royal college of physicians in Edinburgh, and Veronica

Alexander, the elder son, succeeded to Auchinleck on his father's death in 1748 He was educated for the bar, and became a lord of session and justiciary He was a sound scholar, a respectable and useful country gentleman, and an able and upright judge On his elevation to the bench in 1756, in compliance with Scottish custom he assumed the distinctive title of Lord Auchinleck He married Euphemia, daughter of Colonel John Erskine of Alva, son of Sir Charles Erskine of the house of Mar, and had James, his successor, the biographer of Dr Johnson, of whom a memoir follows, John, an officer in the army, and David Boswell, a merchant for ten years in Valencia in Spain, where he adopted the name of Thomas, instead of David, the Spaniards having a prejudice against that name, imagining that it belongs to the hated race of the Jews On returning to England he was employed in the Navy Office, and was for twenty years at the head of the Prize department He was proprietor of Crawley Grange, Buckinghamshire, and married Anne Catherine, daughter of Colonel Green, killed at the battle of Minden, and sister of Sir Charles Green, baronet, leaving, at his decease, in 1826, an only son Thomas Alexander Boswell of Crawley Grange

Of Sir Alexander Boswell and James Boswell, the two sons of the biographer of Johnson, notices follow in their order Sir Alexander was created a baronet in 1821, and was killed in a duel in 1822, with Mr Stuart, of Duncarn, arising from a political dispute He left a daughter, married in 1826 to Sir William Francis Elliot, baronet, of Stobs and Wells, and a son, James, who succeeded him, born in December 1806, married in 1830, Jessie-Jane, daughter of Sir James Montgomery Cunninghame, baronet, with issue a daughter Having no sons, and Auchinleck being strictly entailed in the male line, Sir James Boswell, in the year 1851, sought to set the entail aside, on the ground that in the deed of entail, the first five letters (namely, tried,) in the word unredeemably, in the clause fettering the right of sale, were written on an erasure, of which no notice was contained in the testing clause In consequence, the judges of the court of session declared that the entail under which Sir James Boswell held the lands and barony of Auchinleck was defective as regards the prohibition against sale Notwithstanding all the care and anxiety of Lord Auchinleck and his son, James, to make the entail as stringently binding as possible, it was thus set aside on the ground stated

Sir James, the second baronet, was a deputy-lieutenant of Ayrshire He died in 1857, when his title, in default of male issue, became extinct

BOSWELL, James, the friend and biographer of Dr Johnson, was born at Edinburgh, October 29, 1740 He was the eldest son of Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck, above referred to, a lord of session and justiciary, under the judicial title of Lord Auchinleck His mother was a woman of exemplary piety He received the rudiments of his education partly at home under private tuition, and partly at the school of Mr Mundell in Edinburgh He afterwards studied civil law in the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, in the latter of which he became associated with several students from England This society confirmed his preference for English manners, and his desire to see London, which he has often been heard to say was originally derived from a perusal of the Spectator In 1760 he, for the first time, visited London, which he calls the great scene of action, of ambition, and of instruction The circumstances of this visit he used afterwards to detail, with that felicity of narration for which he was so remarkable, and his friend Dr Johnson advised him to commit the account to paper and preserve it Boswell was intended by his father for the bar, but he himself wished to obtain a commission in the Guards Lord Auchinleck, however, having signified his disapprobation, he returned to Edinburgh, and resumed the study of the law In 1762 he revisited London a second time, and the same year he published the little poem entitled 'The Club at Newmarket, a Tale' In 1763 he went to Utrecht to attend the lectures in civil law of the celebrated German Professor Trotz When in London on his way to the continent, on May 16th of that year, he had "the singular felicity," to use his own words, "of being introduced to Dr Johnson," for whom he had long entertained the most enthusiastic admiration He remained a winter at Utrecht, during which time he visited several parts of the Netherlands He afterwards made the tour of Europe, then deemed indispensable to complete the education of a young gentleman Passing from Utrecht into Germany, he pursued his route through Switzerland to Geneva, whence he crossed the Alps into Italy, having visited in his journey Voltaire at Ferney, and Rousseau in the wilds of Neufchatel He continued some time in Italy, where he met and associated with Lord Mountstuart, to whom he afterwards dedicated his 'Theses Juridicæ' The most remarkable incident in his tour was his visit to Corsica, the brave inhabitants of which were then struggling for independence with the republic of Genoa Mr Boswell travelled over every part of the island, and formed an intimate acquaintance with General Pasquale de Paoli, in whose palace he resided during his stay in Corsica He subsequently went to Paris, whence he returned to Edinburgh in 1766, and soon after was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates Having endeavoured to interest the Administration in behalf of the Corsican patriots, he had the honour of an interview with Lord Chatham on their account The celebrated Douglas cause was at this period the subject of general discussion Boswell, thinking that the public would scarcely have the patience to extract the real merits of the case from the voluminous mass of papers printed on the question, compressed them into a pamphlet, entitled 'The Essence of the Douglas Cause,' which, on being published, was supposed to have procured Mr Douglas the popularity he at that time enjoyed In 1768 Mr Boswell published his 'Account of Corsica, with Memoirs of General Paoli,' of which Dr Johnson thus expressed himself to the author "Your Journal is curious and delightful I know not whether I could name any narrative by which curiosity is better excited or better gratified." The work was very favourably received, and was speedily translated into the German, Dutch, Italian, and French languages In the following winter, Mr Boswell wrote a Prologue on occasion of the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, being opened by David Ross, Esq, the effect of which was to secure to the manager the uninterrupted possession of his patent till his death in 1790 In 1769, at the celebration at Stratford-on-Avon of the jubilee in honour of Shakspeare, Mr Boswell rendered himself conspicuous by appearing as an armed Corsican chief This year he married his cousin, Margaret Montgomery, daughter of David Montgomery, Esq, related to the illustrious family of Eglintoun, and representative of the ancient peerage of Lyle She was a lady of good sense and a brilliant understanding She did not like the influence which Dr Johnson seemed to possess over her husband, and upon one occasion said with some warmth —"I have seen many a bear led by a man, but I never before saw a man led by a bear" She died in June 1799, leaving two sons, Alexander and James, and three daughters Mr Boswell wrote an affectionate tribute to her memory.

In 1773 Mr Boswell and Dr Johnson made their long projected tour to the Hebrides, on which occasion Johnson visited him in Edinburgh, a journey rendered memorable by the lively and characteristic accounts which both published of it He was residing in James' Court, High Street, Edinburgh, when he received and entertained Paoli, in 1771, and Dr Johnson, when the latter visited him in 1773

In 1782 his father, Lord Auchinleck, died, and Mr Boswell succeeded to the family estate In 1783, when the coalition ministry was driven from office, he published his celebrated 'Letter to the People of Scotland,' which was honoured by the commendation of Johnson, and the approbation of Mr Pitt In the following year, a plan having been in agitation to reform the court of session, by reducing the number of judges one-third, he, in a 'Second Letter to the People of Scotland,' remonstrated warmly against the measure, and it was abandoned In December 1784 he lost his illustrious friend Dr Johnson

Mr Boswell had a fair share of practice at the Scottish bar He enjoyed the intimate acquaintance of the most eminent of his countrymen, among whom may be mentioned, Lord Kames, Lord Hailes, Dr Robertson, Dr Blair, and Dr Beattie, but his strong predilection for London induced him at last to settle in the metropolis

At Hilary Term, 1786, he was called to the English bar, and in the ensuing winter he removed with his family to London In 1785 he had published his Journal of 'A Tour to the Hebrides and the Western Islands,' which, among other things of interest, contains a lively and affecting account of the adventures and escapes of the young Pretender, after the disastrous battle of Culloden By the interest of Lord Lowther, he was appointed recorder of Carlisle, but owing to the distance of that town from London, he resigned the recordership, after holding it about two years From the period of his settling in London, he devoted himself, almost entirely, neglecting his professional occupation for its sake, to preparing for publication the life of the great lexicographer, for which he had been collecting materials during nearly the whole course of their intimacy This work, entitled "The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL D, appeared in 1790, in 2 vols 4to, and was received by the public with extraordinary avidity From the stores of anecdote which it contains, and the minute and faithful picture of Johnson's habits, manners, and conversation, therein given, the book may fairly be considered one of the most entertaining pieces of biography in the English language It is valuable also as illustrative of the literary history of Great Britain, during the greater part of the latter half of the eighteenth century The work is written with dramatic vivacity, the style is simple and unaffected, notwithstanding his enthusiastic admiration of Johnson, the author is free from all attempt at imitating his majestic and pompous diction The preparation of a second edition of his great work, which was afterwards published in 3 vols 8vo, was his last literary effort Soon after his return to London, from a visit to Auchinleck, he was suddenly seized with ague, and the confinement to which it subjected him brought on the disorder that terminated in his death He died at his house in London, June 19, 1795, in the 55th year of his age His portrait is subjoined

In his private character Mr Boswell was vain and fond of distinction "Egotism and vanity," he says, in one of his letters published in 1785, "are the indigenous plants of my mind they distinguish it I may prune their luxuriancy, but I must not entirely clear it of them, for then I should be no longer as I am, and, perhaps, there might be something not so good" His admission, in 1773, into the literary club, which then met at the Turk's Head in Gerard Street, Soho, gave him the opportunity of associating with Burke, Goldsmith, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Garrick, and other eminent persons, this, with his passionate attachment to the society and conversation of Dr Johnson, induced him to make frequent visits to London, where he assiduously cultivated the acquaintance and friendship of every person of any note that he could possibly obtain an introduction to So romantic and fervent, indeed, was his admiration of Johnson, that he tells us, that he added five hundred pounds to the fortune of one of his daughters, because, when a baby, she was not frightened at his ugly face

With considerable intellectual powers, he possessed a gay and active disposition, a lively imagination, and no small share of humour Yet he was often subject to depression of spirits, and he has described himself as being of a melancholy temperament In one of his gloomy intervals he wrote a series of essays under the title of 'The Hypochondriac,' which appeared in the London Magazine for 1782, and which he once intended to collect into a volume Besides the pieces above mentioned, he published in 1767 a collection of 'British Essays in favour of the Brave Corsicans' His ardent character and amusing egotism may be said to have been first publicly displayed in the efforts he made in behalf of these patriotic islanders, and his conduct in this respect was so satisfactory to himself, that at the Stratford jubilee he exhibited a placard round his hat, on which was inscribed "Corsica Boswell," also in his tour he proclaimed to all the world that at Edinburgh he was known by the name of "Paoli Boswell!" When General Paoli, after having escaped with difficulty from his native isle, on its subjection to the French, found an asylum in London, Boswell gladly renewed his acquaintance and friendship with the exiled chief In politics he was, like his friend Johnson, a staunch loyalist, and in religion, a member of the church of England He takes care to inform us, however, that he had no intolerant feelings towards those of a different communion In spite of his eccentricities, he was a great favourite with his friends, and his social disposition, great conversational powers, and unfailing cheerfulness, made him, at all times, an acceptable companion There have been several editions of his Life of Johnson, but the most complete is the one published in 1835, in ten volumes, by Mr John Murray, which contains anecdotes of Johnson's various biographers, and notes by Mr Croker, Mr Malone, and various others Boswell's works are

BOSWELL, Sir Alexander, Bart, a distinguished literary antiquary, eldest son of the preceding, was born October 9, 1775, and succeeded his father in the family estate of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire He was educated at Westminster school, and afterwards went to the university of Oxford With a lively imagination, he possessed a considerable fund of humour, and some of his satirical pieces in verse occasionally caused no little excitement in his own circle In 1803 he published a small volume, entitled 'Songs, chiefly in the Scottish dialect,' several of which have taken a permanent place among the popular songs of his native land, among which may be mentioned, 'Auld Gudeman, ye're a Drucken Carle,' 'Jenny's Bawbee,' 'Jenny Dang the Weaver,' and 'Taste

Life's Glad Moments,' a translation of the German song, 'Freu't euch des Libens,' done by him at Leipzig in 1795, and generally, though erroneously, ascribed to Moore In 1810 he published, under an assumed name, a poem in the Scottish vernacular, entitled 'Edinburgh, or the Ancient Royalty, a sketch of former Manners, by Simon Gray,' in which he laments the changes that had taken place in the manners and customs of the inhabitants In 1811, appeared 'Clan-Alpin's Vow,' a poetical fragment, founded on an event which took place on the eve of the marriage of James the Sixth to Anne of Denmark He subsequently established a printing press at Auchinleck, from which he sent forth various pieces in prose and verse In 1816 appeared 'Skeldon Haughs, or the Sow is flitted,' a tale, also in Scottish verse, founded on a traditionary story regarding an old Ayrshire feud between the Kennedys and the Crawfords In August 1821 Mr Boswell was created a baronet of Great Britain, as a reward for his patriotism and loyalty

During the high political excitement which prevailed in Scotland about that period, Sir Alexander, who was a warm and active supporter of the then tory administration, was one of the contributors to a newspaper published at Edinburgh, called 'The Beacon,' the articles in which, aimed at the leading men on the Whig side, gave great offence Some letters and pieces of satirical poetry of a similar kind having appeared in a paper styled 'The Sentinel,' subsequently published at Glasgow, these were traced to him by James Stuart, Esq, younger of Duncarn, who had been personally attacked, and who in consequence sent a challenge to Sir Alexander The parties met near Auchtertool in Fife, March 26, 1822, the Hon John Douglas, brother to the marquis of Queensberry, being the baronet's second, and the late earl of Rosslyn, Mr Stuart's, when Sir Alexander received a shot in the bottom of his neck, which shattered the collar bone, and next day caused his death Mr Stuart was afterwards tried for murder by the High Court of Justiciary, but acquitted [See STUART, James, younger of Duncarn]

Sir Alexander Boswell left a widow, a son, who succeeded him, and a daughter In him society was deprived of one of its brightest ornaments, his country lost a man of superior abilities, and his family had to mourn the bereavement of a most affectionate husband and father He was the possessor of the famous "Auchinleck Library," consisting of valuable old books and manuscripts, gradually collected by his ancestors, from which in 1804 Sir Walter Scott published the Romance of 'Sir Tristram' Its stores also furnished the black letter original of a disputation held at Maybole between John Knox and Quentin Kennedy in 1562, which was printed at the time by the great Reformer himself, but had latterly become exceedingly rare A fac-simile edition of this curiosity in historical literature was printed at Sir Alexander Boswell's expense in 1812 'He was," says Mr Croker in a note to Murray's edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson, "a high spirited, clever, and amiable gentleman, and like his father, of a frank and social disposition, but it is said, that he did not relish the recollections of his father's devotion to Dr Johnson, but like old Lord Auchinleck, he seemed to think it a kind of derogation " He sang his own songs with great spirit and effect, and had a fund of amusing stories and entertaining anecdote Mr Lockhart, in his Life of Scott, relates that Sir Alexander had dined with the author of Waverley only two or three days before the fatal meeting occurred, having joined the party immediately after completing the last arrangements for his duel Several circumstances of his death are exactly reproduced in the duel scene of the novel of St Ronan's Well

His works, besides his fugitive satirical pieces, are

Songs, chiefly in the Scottish dialect Edin 1803
Edinburgh, or the Ancient Royalty, a Sketch of former Manners, by Simon Gray Edin 1810
Clan-Alpin's Vow, a poetical fragment Edin 1811
Skeldon Haughs, or the Sow is Flitted, a poetical tale in the Scottish language 1816

BOSWELL, JAMES, M A, barrister-at-law, second son of the biographer of Johnson, and brother of the preceding, was born in 1778, and received his education at Westminster school In 1797 he was entered of Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and subsequently was elected fellow on the Vinerian foundation He was afterwards called to the English bar, and became a commissioner

bankrupts He possessed talents of a superior order, sound classical scholarship, and a most extensive and intimate knowledge of our early literature He was equally remarkable for his industry, judgment, and discrimination, his memory was unusually tenacious and accurate, and he was always ready to communicate his stores of information for the benefit of others These qualifications, with the friendship which he entertained for him, induced the late Mr Malone to select Mr Boswell as his literary executor, and to his care he intrusted the publication of an enlarged and amended edition of Shakspeare's Plays, which he had long projected This elaborate work was completed in 1821 in twenty-one volumes 8vo Mr Malone's papers were left in a state scarcely intelligible, and no other individual than Mr Boswell could have rendered them available To this edition the latter contributed many notes, he also collated the text with the earlier copies In the first volume Mr Boswell stepped forward to defend the literary reputation of Mr Malone, against the severe attack which had been made, by a writer of distinguished eminence, upon many of his critical opinions and statements a task of great delicacy, but which he has performed in so spirited and gentlemanly a manner, that his preface may be fairly quoted as a model of controversial writing In the same volume are inserted the 'Memoirs of Mr Malone,' originally printed by Mr Boswell for private distribution, and a valuable Essay on the Metre and Phraseology of Shakspeare, the materials for which were partly collected by Mr Malone, but their arrangement and completion were the work of Mr Boswell He likewise contributed a few notes to his father's Life of Johnson, which are quoted in Murray's edition Mr Boswell died at his chambers in the Middle Temple, London, February 24, 1822, and was buried in the Temple church, his brother, Sir Alexander, who was so soon to follow him to the grave, being the principal mourner He inherited from his father his love for London society, his conversational powers, his cheerfulness of disposition, and those other amiable qualities which contribute to the pleasures of social intercourse "He was very convivial," says Mr Croker, "and in other respects like his father, though altogether on a smaller scale" The brightest feature of his character was the goodness of his heart, and that warmth of friendship which knew no bounds when a call was made upon his services —Obituaries of the time

BOTHWELL, lord of, a title anciently possessed by the De Moravia or Moray family, descendants of Freskin, a person of Flemish origin, who came to Scotland in the reign of David the First, and in return for assistance rendered that monarch in suppressing a rebellion of the inhabitants, obtained a grant of extensive lands in the province of Moray See MORAVIA DE, MORAY, or MURRAY, surname of

BOTHWELL, lord, a title conferred by King James the Third on an unworthy favourite, John, created by him Sir John Ramsay, son of John Ramsay of Corstoun, (descended from the house of Carnock in Fife, one of the most ancient families of the name) He was the only one of the favourites who escaped being put to death when they were hanged over Lauder bridge by the insurgent nobles, in July 1482 He owed his safety to his clinging closely to the person of the king, and to James himself earnestly pleading for him, on account of his youth, he being then only eighteen years of age In the following year, on the forfeiture of Lord Crichton, grandson and successor of the famous Lord-chancellor Crichton, for taking part in the conspiracy of the duke of Albany against his brother, King James, his majesty bestowed on Sir John Ramsay his forfeited estates, including Crichton castle, and the lands, barony and lordship of Bothwell in Lanarkshire, with forty merks of land in the barony of Moneypenny He also raised him to the peerage by the title of Lord Bothwell, all which was confirmed by parliament, as appears from its records, 16th February 1483–4 He sat as Lord Bothwell in several parliaments These honours heaped upon a youth of nineteen years of age, who had rendered no service to the country, may well have disgusted the nobility In 1486 when he was little more than twenty two, he was sent to England, to negotiate a truce for three years, and in the following year he was appointed, with the bishop of Aberdeen to meet with the ambassadors of Henry the Seventh, who had arrived at Edinburgh to arrange as to a lasting peace On this occasion a marriage was proposed between various members of the two royal houses, which was of course never carried into effect, the death of James soon after putting an end to the project After the murder of James the Third, Lord Bothwell, as a minion of that weak monarch, was forfeited, 8th October 1488, and the lordship of Bothwell, so imprudently bestowed upon him, was conferred on Patrick Hepburn, Lord Hales, who was created earl of Bothwell, on the 17th of the same month [See following article] The forfeited lord fled to England, where with Sir Thomas Todd of Shieldshaws, another banished favourite of the late king, he concocted the following scheme for raising money Having obtained access to Henry the Seventh, they proposed, by the assistance of their friends in Scotland, with whom they kept up a private correspondence, to deliver the king of Scots and his brother into his hands, and desired only some pecuniary aid On April 17, 1491, indentures were entered into at Greenwich between King Henry and 'John Lord Bothwell and Sir Thomas Thodde [Todd] knight, of the realm of Scotland, as well for and in name of themselves as also of dyvers others named in the said indentures,' declaring that 'they shall take, bringe, and delyver into the said king of Englandis handes the king of Scottes now reynyng and his brother the duke of Roos, (Ross) or at the leste the said king of Scotland' In expectation of this service King Henry lent Sir Thomas Todd the sum of £266 13s. 4d. sterling, for the repayment of which at the following Michaelmas, he stipulated that Sir Thomas should leave his son and heir in pledge. [Rymer's Fœdera, vol xii page 440] The transaction appears to have terminated with the pecuniary advance, and this singular agreement was never known until Rymer published the document in 1711

Lord Bothwell received a pardon from King James, and returned to Scotland, but was only acknowledged as Sir John Ramsay Two letters from him to the English monarch, the first dated 8th September 1496, giving a minute account of the support afforded by King James to Perkin Warbeck, are quoted by Mr Pinkerton, from which it has been inferred that Ramsay acted as a spy for Henry the Seventh at the court of his own sovereign In both letters he subscribes himself 'Jhone L Bothvalle' He seems notwithstanding his acting the spy upon him, to have become a favourite of James the Fourth, for on 18th April 1497, he obtained a formal remission and letters of rehabilitation under the great seal He was not, however, restored to his title and estates, these being in other hands, but he received from the king, instead, charters of the lands of Tealing and Polgavy in Forfarshire, Tarrinzeane in Ayrshire, and others, 27th April 1497, and 13th Sept 1498, of a house and garden in Edinburgh, 30th May 1498, and of another house there, 6th November 1500, also, under the designation of Sir John Ramsay of Tarrinzean, knight, he had a charter, to himself and his heirs, dated 13th May 1510, of the lands of Balmain, Fesque, and others, in the county of Kincardine, which were erected into a free barony, to be called the barony of Balmain In the beginning of 1513 King James proposed to send him on an embassy to Henry the Eighth, but although a safe conduct was got it never took effect Sir John Ramsay died soon after, leaving a son, William Ramsay, who succeeded him He was the lineal ancestor of Sir Alexander Ramsay of Balmain, baronet, M P for the county of Kincardine, who died without issue, at his seat of Hursley, near Northallerton, in Yorkshire, 12th February 1806, in his ninetieth year, and who was succeeded in his estates by his nephew Alexander Burnett of Strachan, second son of his sister Catherine, the wife of Sir Thomas Burnett of Leys, baronet On succeeding to his uncle's estates, Alexander Burnett took the name and arms of Ramsay, and was created a baronet of Great Britain 13th May 1806 Dying in 1810, he was succeeded by his son Sir Alexander Ramsay of Balmain baronet See RAMSAY, surname of

BOTHWELL, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, formerly possessed by the family of Hepburn, and rendered remarkable in Scottish history by the marriage of its possessor, the fourth earl, with the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots [For the origin of the name of Hepburn, and the different branches of the family, see HEPBURN, surname of] Patrick Hepburn, third Lord Hales, created earl of Bothwell in 1488, as above mentioned, was descended from one Adam Hepburn, of a Northumberland family, who in the reign of David the Second, received from the earl of March, charters of various lands in Haddingtonshire The eldest son of the said Adam Hepburn, Sir Patrick Hepburn of Hales, born about 1421, appears, from the frequent mention made of him in reference to safe conducts into England in Rymer's Fœdera, to have been a person of consequence His seal is appended to the act of settlement of the crown of Scotland, 27th March 1371, the achievement being two hons pulling at a rose on a chevron, still the arms of the Hepburns At the battle of Otterbourne in 1388, he and his son, Patrick, led on one party of the Scots, and prevented the banner of Douglas from falling into the hands of the English By his first wife, whose Christian name was Agnes, he was the father of Patrick Hepburn younger of Hales, styled by Fordun [ii p 433] 'miles magnanimus et athleta bellicosus' On 22d June, 1402, during the lifetime of his father, on his return from a hostile incursion into England, the party which he commanded were intercepted by the earls of March and Northumberland at West Nesbit, near Dunse An obstinate conflict ensued, in which the Scots had the advantage, but the son of March arriving with a reinforcement, the victory turned in favour of the English Young Hepburn and several other gentlemen, with the flower of the youth of Lothian, were among the slain By his wife, a daughter and co-heir of the family of Vaux or de Vallibus, Lords of Dirleton, he had two sons Sir Adam Hepburn of Hales, the elder, was one of the commissioners sent to England in 1423, to treat for the release of King James the First from captivity In 1425 he was one of the principal persons arrested along with Murdoch, duke of Albany He was afterwards one of the supplementary hostages for the security of the payment of forty thousand pounds, for the expense of King James the First during the time he had remained in captivity in England, as, 5th February 1425–6, Patrick de Hepburn, William de Hepburn, and John Halyburton, got a safe conduct to England, to attend on the Lord of Hales, then a hostage [Fœdera] He was released by order of 9th November 1427, when William Douglas, lord of Drumlanrig, was substituted in his place In 1435, when the estates of the family of Dunbar and March were seized by the crown, Sir Adam Hepburn was sent with the earl of Angus and Chancellor Crichton, to take possession of the castle of Dunbar, and after it had been delivered up to them, he was left Constable of this important fortress On the 30th September 1436, he assisted William Douglas, earl of Angus, in the conflict with Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, at Piperden, or Pepperdin, near Cheviot, when Sir Robert Ogle was made prisoner, with most of his followers, and on 31st March 1438, the year after the murder of James the First, he was one of the conservators of a truce with England He had four sons Sir Patrick, his heir, William, George Hepburn of Whitsome, Berwickshire, ancestor of the Hepburns of Riccartoun and Blackcastle, John, one of the lords of Council and Session, and bishop of Dunblane from 1467 to 1486, and two daughters

Sir Patrick Hepburn, the eldest son, as we learn from Rymer's Fœdera, was a conservator of truces with England on various occasions, and a commissioner for the burons for ministering justice throughout the kingdom in time of pestilence, 19th October, 1456 In the same year he was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of Lord Hales, under which designation he sat among the nobility in the parliament of 16th October 1467 His eldest son, Adam, second Lord Hales, attached himself to Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock, and his brother, Sir Alexander Boyd of Duncow, and in 1466 was engaged in their audacious enterprize of carrying off King James the Third, then in his thirteenth year, from Linlithgow to Edinburgh [See JAMES THE THIRD] For his share in this affair he obtained a remission from parliament, (which, as well as the young king, was entirely under the influence of the Boyds,) 13th October of that year, ratified under the great seal, 25th of the same month He married Helen, eldest daughter of Alexander, first Lord Home, and by her had five sons, viz, Patrick, third Lord Hales, and first earl of Bothwell, 2d, Sir Adam Hepburn of Craigs, master of the king's stables, 3d George Hepburn, provost of Bothwell and Lincluden, abbot of Aberbrothwick, 9th February 1503-4, high treasurer of Scotland, 1509, bishop of the Isles, 10th May 1510, and commendator both of Aberbrothwick and Icolmkill in 1512, slain at Flodden, 9th September 1513, 4th, John Hepburn, prior of St Andrews, founder of St Leonard's college in 1512, and 5th, James Hepburn, who, after being rector of Dalry and Partoun, was, in 1515, elected abbot of Dunfermline, and 15th June the same year was appointed lord high treasurer In 1516 he was elected bishop of Moray, and 3d October of that year he quitted the treasury He died in 1525, and was buried in Elgin cathedral

Patrick Hepburn third Lord Hales, and first earl of Bothwell, in July 1482, had the command of the castle of Berwick, when that town was invested by the English army, under the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard the Third, and the Scottish king's brother, the duke of Albany After the execution of the king's favourites at Lauder the town of Berwick surrendered to the English, but Lord Hales, in the castle, made a brave defence Leaving four thousand men to block it up, the dukes of Gloucester and Albany advanced to Edinburgh, of which city they took possession without any opposition [Abercrombie's Martial Achievements vol ii p 450 See ante, p 94] On 20th September 1484, Lord Hales was one of the conservators of a truce with England The annexation by James the Third of the rich temporalities of the priory of Coldingham to the chapel royal of Stirling, by giving offence to the Lord Home and his clan, who had been accustomed to consider that priory as very much their own, was one of the principal causes of the rebellion which cost that king his life Lord Home entered into a bond of mutual assistance with Lord Hales, and the Homes and Hepburns opposed with violence the annexation although an act of parliament had been passed declaring it high treason to obstruct that measure Lord Hales was a party to the hollow pacification entered into at Blackness in May 1488, and about the same time he and several others of the disaffected nobles received from Henry the Seventh a safe conduct to England [Fœdera], but the progress of events in Scotland prevented any use being made of it At the battle of Sauchieburn, then called the battle of the field of Stirling, which followed, [June 11, 1488] Lord Hales led the Hepburns in the vanguard against the army of the king and fifteen days thereafter on the surrender of the castle of Edinburgh, the custody of that important fortress was committed to him, with three hundred marks of the customs of that city He was also appointed sheriff-principal of the county of Edinburgh, and within the constabulary of Haddington On 10th September 1488, he received the office of master of the household, and was constituted high admiral of Scotland for life On October 13th of the same year he had a charter of the lands of Crichton castle, with lands in the counties of Edinburgh and Dumfries, and the lordship of Bothwell in Lanarkshire, forfeited by Sir John Ramsay, Lord Bothwell, as above-mentioned Four days afterwards, [17th October 1488,] the young king, James the Fourth, erected the lordship of Bothwell into an earldom, and conferred it on Lord Hales, in full parliament, by girding him with a sword The same day it was declared in parliament that he should have the rule and governance of James, duke of Ross the king's brother The party to which he belonged had then the chief power in the state, and they showered honours and offices on him for the important part which he had acted in the late Revolution On 5th November 1488, he obtained a grant of the office of steward of Kirkcudbright and of the keeping of Thrief castle, with the fruits thereof, and 29th May 1489, he and John Hepburn, prior of St. Andrews, his brother, had letters of a lease of the lordship of Orkney and Zetland, and of the keeping of the castle of Kirkwall, the earl, of the same date, receiving the office of justiciary and bailiary of that lordship. On the 6th July the same year he was constituted guardian of the west and middle marches March 6th, 1491-2, on the resignation of George Douglas, son and heir of Archibald, earl of Angus, he had a charter of the lordship of Liddisdale, with the castle of Hermitage, Angus obtaining in excambion, the lordship of Bothwell, which brought Bothwell castle and its domains into the possession of the Douglases, an arrangement brought about by the king to prevent the house of Angus from becoming so powerful as the elder branch of the Douglases had been In a parliament held at Edinburgh 18th May 1491, the earl of Bothwell, and the bishop and dean of Glasgow, were appointed ambassadors to the courts of France and Spain to find out a proper match and negotiate a marriage for the king, and to renew the ancient alliances with these states The sum of five thousand pounds was advanced for their expenses In the parliament held at Edinburgh, 26th June 1493, a general revocation was issued of all grants made during the minority of the king from which the lands granted to the earl of Bothwell and Sir John Ross, knight, were specially excepted In May 1501, the earl of Bothwell, and Robert, archbishop of Glasgow, and Andrew Forman, papal prothonotary, afterwards archbishop of St Andrews, received a safe conduct to England, which was renewed in the following October, as ambassadors from the king of Scots, sent to conclude the marriage of James the Fourth with the Princess Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry the Seventh The princess was solemnly married to King James at Richmond, by proxy, January 27, 1503 the earl of Bothwell being his Majesty's representative On her arrival in Scotland in the following August on her near approach to Edinburgh, she was received by the king, richly apparelled in cloth of gold, the earl of Bothwell bearing the sword of state before him, and attended by the principal nobility of the court [Leland's Collectanea, vol iv p 287] The earl died soon after 1507 By Lady Janet Douglas, his wife, only daughter of James, first earl of Morton he had issue, with three daughters, three sons, Adam, second earl of Bothwell, John, consecrated bishop of Brechin, from 1517, to August 1558, and Patrick Hepburn, who was educated by his uncle John, prior of St Andrews, whom he succeeded in the priory in 1522 In 1524 he was appointed secretary, in which office he continued till 1527 In 1535 he was consecrated bishop of Moray, and at the same time he held the abbacy of Scone in perpetual commendam When the Reformation took place he had the fate of the other Popish prelates, but he kept possession of his episcopal palace till his death, at Spynie castle, June 20, 1573 Foreseeing what was coming, he feued out all the lands belonging to the see [Keith's Scottish Bishops] This prelate had seven natural sons and two natural daughters, legitimations having passed the great seal for them in 1533, 1545, and 1550

Adam Hepburn, second earl of Bothwell, succeeded his father both in his extensive possessions and in his office of high admiral of Scotland At the disastrous battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513, he commanded the reserve, consisting of his own followers, supported by those of other chiefs connected with the Lothians, and advanced to support the king's attack on the English in so gallant a style that the standard of the earl of Surrey, the English general, was placed in the utmost danger With his sovereign and the greater part of the chivalry of Scotland, he fell on that fatal field

Their king, their lords, their mightiest low
They melted from the field, as snow,
When streams are swoln and south winds blow,
Dissolves in silent dew
Tweed's echoes heard the ceaseless plash,
While many a broken band,
Disordered through her currents dash
To gain the Scottish land,
To town and tower, to down and dale,
To tell red Flodden's dismal tale,
And raise the universal wail
Tradition, legend, tune, and song Shall many an age that wail prolong Still from the sire the son shall hear
Of the stern strife and carnage drear
Of Flodden's fatal field, Where shivered was fair Scotland's spear,
And broken was her shield'

Scott's Marmion

The second earl of Bothwell married in 1511 Agnes Stewart, natural daughter of James earl of Buchan, brother uterine of James the second, by whom he had one son

Patrick, third earl of Bothwell, succeeded when an infant to the titles and estates of his family In the minority of the king, James the Fifth, and the unsettled state of the kingdom, great disorders prevailed on the borders, which were encouraged by the border chiefs, and the duke of Albany, on assuming the regency, did his utmost to suppress the robberies and violations of the law that were continually taking place On April 6, 1528, the earl of Bothwell, then a young man about sixteen, and Patrick Hepburn, master of Hales, and several others their kinsmen and retainers, received a remission for their treasonably assisting George Lord Home, and the deceased David Home of Wedderburn, his brother, and their accomplices, being at the time the king's rebels, and at his horn Towards the end of the same year he was, by King James, committed to prison for protecting marauders on the borders, and after being six months in confinement was only released on the recognizances of his friends to the amount of twenty thousand pounds In December 1531, he secretly passed into England, and held a conference of a treasonable nature with the earl of Northumberland On his return he was, by the king's orders seized and confined in the castle of Edinburgh, where he remained a considerable time, being still there in June 1533 King James the Fifth, determined to have peace on the borders, and considering Liddisdale as a nursery of freebooters, to be held in order only by the royal power, in September 1538 compelled the earl of Bothwell to resign it into his hands It would appear [Pitscottie's History, p 237] that the earl was then banished the kingdom, when he is said to have gone to Venice He appears to have returned to England in 1542, and to have engaged in treasonable negotiations with Henry the Eighth At a parliament held at Edinburgh, 3d December 1542, the earldom of Bothwell, and many other estates, were annexed to the crown The earl returned to Scotland soon after the death, 13th December 1542, of King James the Fifth After the arrest of Cardinal Bethune in the succeeding January, he and the earls of Huntly and Moray offered themselves as surety for his appearance to answer the charges against him, and demanded that he should be set at liberty, which was refused by the governor, Arran He was also one of the Catholic lords, the earls of Huntly, Moray, and Argyle being the others, who met at Perth a powerful body of the barons and landed gentry, and a numerous concourse of bishops and abbots, and despatched a message to the earl of Arran, by Reid, bishop of Orkney, that the cardinal should be set at liberty, and that the New Testament should not be read in the vulgar tongue by the people, which of course could not be listened to, and being charged, under the pain of treason, to return to their allegiance, they did not dare to disobey, but sent in their adherence to the governor [Tytler] He was present in parliament 15th March 1548, when he instituted a summons of reduction of the pretended resignation of the lordship of Liddisdale and castle of Hermitage, said to have been made by him into his majesty's hands In this suit he was successful, as his estates were restored, and when the English ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler, came to Scotland in that year, in order to negotiate a marriage between the infant queen Mary and the young prince, Edward of England, he found Bothwell in possession of Liddisdale Sadler mentions him as opposed to that match and devoted to the French interest In one of his letters, dated May 5th 1548, he thus describes him 'as to the earl of Bothwell, who hath the rule of Liddisdale, I think him the most vain and insolent man in the world, full of pride and folly, and here nothing at all esteemed' [Sadler's State Papers, vol i p 184] In order to embroil the matrimonial negotiations with England, when Cardinal Bethune and the earl of Huntly assembled their forces in the north, and Argyle and Lennox theirs in the west, Bothwell, Home, and the Lord of Buccleuch mustered their feudal array upon the borders [Ibid p 236] He joined at Leith the force of ten thousand men under Lennox, Huntly, and Argyle, when they marched to Linlithgow, and obtained possession of the young queen and conducted her in triumph to Stirling He was one of the principal nobles who in June 1554, signed the agreement to support the queen mother, Mary of Guise, as regent, instead of the earl of Arran He became the rival of the earl of Lennox for the hand of the queen dowager, when both earls daily frequented the court, striving in magnificence of apparel and in all courtly games, to excel one another, but finding at length that this method of attracting her Majesty's favour was somewhat costly, Bothwell wisely retired He appears again to have, for a short time, changed sides, for a summons was raised against him for treasonably treating and counselling with the king of England in December 1542 against King James the Fifth by the great gifts and sums of money received by him from Henry of England, for intercommuning with the earl of Hertford and the English army, when Scotland was invaded in May 1544 and for imprisoning Bute pursuivant, in Haddington, Crichton Castle, and Linlithgow, in July of that year From this summons, however, he was assoilzied in parliament, on 12th December 1544 It was by the treachery of this earl of Bothwell that in January 1546 George Wishart was delivered into the hands of Cardinal Bethune Wishart was in the house of Ormiston, about eight miles from Edinburgh, when the house was surrounded by Bothwell and a party of armed men sent by the cardinal to apprehend him Mr Cockburn, the proprietor of Ormiston, at first refused to open the door, but finding it in vain to resist, the earl and a few of his followers were admitted After some expostulations Bothwell gave a promise confirmed by an oath, that he would protect Mr Wishart from the malice of the cardinal, and procure him a fair trial, or set him at liberty, on which Wishart was placed in his hands The earl carried his prisoner to his own castle of Hales, and seemed at first to have some intention of performing his promise, but by the persuasion of the queen dowager, he was soon prevailed upon to break it. As an excuse, on the 19th January, he was brought before the governor and council, and commanded, under the highest penalties, to deliver up his prisoner He complied with that command, and conducted Mr Wishart to the castle of Edinburgh, whence he was immediately carried to the castle of St Andrews, and soon after martyred The earl of Bothwell, notwithstanding this service, was afterwards again imprisoned, and not released till after the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547 The first use he made of his liberty was to wait upon the duke of Somerset, the invading general, 17th September On that occasion he is described as a 'gentleman of a right comly porte and stature, and heretofore of right honourable and just meaning and dealing towards the king's majesty (Henry the Eighth), whom, therefore, my lord's grace did according to his degree and merits, very friendly welcome and entertain' Indignant at his long and frequent imprisonments, he appears now to have wholly espoused the English interest, as an instrument, dated at Westminster 3d September 1549, sets forth that King Edward had taken him under his protection and favour, granting him a yearly rent of three thousand crowns, and the wages of a hundred horsemen, for the defence of his person and the annoyance of the enemy, and if he should lose his lands in Scotland in the English king's service for the space of three years, promising to give him lands of similar value in England [Fœdera, vol iii p 173] He died, (it is supposed in exile,) in September 1556 He married Margaret Home, said to be of the family of Lord Home, and had a son, James, fourth earl of Bothwell, the husband of Mary, queen of Scots, and a daughter, Jean, married, first, 4th January 1562, to John Stewart, prior of Coldingham, a natural son of King James the Fifth, by whom she was the mother of Francis, earl of Bothwell, of whom afterwards She took for her second husband John, master of Caithness

James Hepburn, fourth earl of Bothwell, the unprincipled and ambitious nobleman who became the third husband of Mary, queen of Scots was born about 1536, and was served heir to his father, 3d November 1556 This glorious, rash, and hazardous young man,' as he is happily styled by Walsingham, was destined to act a principal part in the history of that turbulent period Although a Protestant, he adhered to the party of the queen regent and acted with vigour against the Lords of the Congregation On 8th August 1559 along with Ker of Cessford and Maitland of Lethington, he was nominated, by commission from Francis and Mary, for settling differences on the borders In October following, having learned that Cockburn of Ormiston had received four thousand crowns from Sir Ralph Sadler for the use of the Lords of the Congregation, he attacked and wounded him, and carried off the money Sadler mentions that the earl of Arran and the Lord James Stewart, afterwards the Regent Murray, immediately went to Bothwell's house, in the town of Haddington, with two hundred horsemen and a hundred footmen, taking with them two pieces of artillery, in the hope of finding him there, but a quarter of an hour previously he had received notice that troopers were entering the west port of the burgh in search of him, on which he fled down a lane called the Goul, to the Tyne, and running down the bed of the river for about one hundred and fifty yards, stole into the house of Cockburn of Sandybed, by the backdoor, which opened to the river, changed clothes with the turnspit, whose duty he performed in Sandybed's kitchen for some days, till he was enabled to make his escape In return for his protection, Bothwell gave to Sandybed and his heirs and assignees, a perpetual ground annual as it is called in Scotland, of four bolls of wheat, four bolls of barley, and four bolls of oats, to be paid yearly out of his lands of Mainshill, in the county of Haddington This ground annual continued to be paid to the heirs of Cockburn till about 1760, when his descendant, George Cockburn of Sandybed, who, on succeeding to the estate of Gleneagles, in Perthshire, took the name of Haldane, sold it and his property of Sandybed to John Buchan of Letham, and soon after the latter sold and discharged this ground annual to Francis earl of Wemyss, then proprietor of Mainshill [Douglas Peerage, edited by Wood, vol i p 229, note]

In December 1559, Bothwell took the command of the French auxiliaries in Scotland He afterwards went to France, where, by his dutiful demeanour and zeal in her service, he recommended himself to the young queen, Mary, then the wife of the French king, Francis the Second In 1563 he returned to Scotland Immediately thereafter, 'great excitement was created in Edinburgh, by an act of violence perpetrated by the earl of Bothwell, with the aid of the Marquis d'Elbœuf and Lord John Coldingham They broke open the doors of Cuthbert Ramsay's house, in St Mary's Wynd, during the night, and made violent entry in search for his daughter-in law, Alison Craig, with whom the earl of Arran was believed to be enamoured A strong remonstrance was presented to the queen on this occasion, beseeching her to bring the perpetrators to punishment, but the matter was hushed up, with promises of amendment Emboldened by their impunity, Bothwell and his accomplices proceeded to further violence They assembled in the public streets during the night, with many of their friends Gavin Hamilton, abbot of Kilwinning who had joined the reforming party, resolved to check them in their violent proceedings He accordingly armed his servants and retainers, and sallied out to oppose them, and a serious affray took place, between the Cross and the Tron The burghers were mustered by the ringing of the town bells, and rival leaders were sallying out to the assistance of their friends, when the earls of Moray and Huntly, who were then residing in the Abbey, mustered their adherents at the queen's request, and put a stop to the tumult Bothwell afterwards successfully employed the mediation of Knox, to procure a reconciliation with Gavin Hamilton, the earl of Arran, and others of his antagonists' [Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh, vol i p 73] Soon after this he was banished the kingdom for being engaged in a conspiracy against the earl of Moray He returned home in 1565, and on May 2d of that year, he was denounced rebel and put to the horn for not appearing to answer an indictment for high treason, in conspiring to seize the queen's person, &c, having proposed to the earl of Arran, with whom he had been lately reconciled, to carry off the queen to the castle of Dumbarton, 'and thin keep her surelie, or utherwyse demayne hir person at your plesour, quhill scho aggre to quhatsumeuir thing ye shall desyre' [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, v i part 2, p 462], the very method he himself afterwards adopted at Dunbar, to secure the queen's hand Arran revealed the plot to the queen at Falkland, and on being confronted in presence of her majesty and the lords of secret council, Bothwell denied the allegation, whereupon Arran challenged him to judicial combat, and both were committed to the castle of Edinburgh, from which Bothwell escaped, and was once more constrained to quit the kingdom On the indictment being called in court, Alexander Hepburn of Whitsome, his kinsman, protested in his name against sentence of outlawry being passed against him, as he durst not appear at that time on account of the great convention of his enemies, by which his life was endangered On the disgrace and expatriation of the earl of Moray and his friends after the weak attempt at insurrection called the 'Roundabout Raid,' which arose out of their opposition to Mary's marriage with Darnley, Bothwell and other lords, foes to that faction, were recalled from exile by the queen, to strengthen her own party On February 22d, 1566, Bothwell married Lady Jean Gordon, daughter of the fourth earl of Huntly After the assassination of Rizzio, on the 9th March that year, he acquired an undue influence over the mind of the queen It is stated by Pennant [Tour, v i p 70] that he made the first impression on her too susceptible heart, by once galloping, in full armour, down the dangerous steeps of the Calton hill, and leaping his steed into the ring, while a tournament was held in the adjoining valley of Greenside This, however, appears to be nothing more than a tradition of the locality He appeared to the queen the only one of the nobles who was sincerely attached to her, for she had found them all rude and stern, and engaged in fierce and ambitious designs against her Hence, besides his attractive manners, handsome figure, and courtly address, the ascendancy which this profligate nobleman at this time obtained over her He was appointed warden of the Three Marches, an office never before held by one person, created high admiral, and had a grant of the abbeys of Haddington and Melrose By his interest his brother-in-law, the earl of Huntly, was constituted high chancellor of the kingdom, and no matter of importance was transacted without his advice When the queen's attachment to Darnley was converted into aversion, Bothwell's insinuating address and unremitting assiduity had the effect intended on her warm and tender heart, and many instances of her partiality for him are given by contemporary historians, the most striking of which was the following Having proceeded to Liddisdale to apprehend some marauders, Bothwell was, on 7th October 1566, attacked and wounded by one of them The queen was then at Jedburgh holding a Justice Court, and on hearing of his wound she evinced her feelings for him by riding from that town to Hermitage Castle, where Bothwell lay, a journey of twenty Scotch miles, through a country then almost impassable, and infested with banditti Finding that the earl was not dangerously wounded she returned to Jedburgh that same night This rapid journey and the anxiety of her mind on Bothwell's account, threw her into a fever, and her life was, for a short time, despaired of On her recovery, attended by Bothwell, she proceeded, 7th November, to Coldingham, whence she went to Dunbar and Huntallan, and arrived at Craigmillar, 17th of the same month In the following December he accompanied her to Edinburgh, Stirling, and Drymen Two months afterwards, namely, on the 10th of February, 1567, occurred the murder of Darnley, in which Bothwell was the principal actor He had obtained a situation for one of his menials in the queen's service, and so was enabled to obtain the keys of the provost of St Mary's house at Kirk-of-Field, where Darnley was lodged He immediately caused counterfeit impressions of them to be taken [Laing, v ii p 296] Shortly after nine o'clock on the evening of the 9th he left the lodgings of the laird of Ormiston, (James Ormiston of that ilk), in company with whom and several of his own servants, his accomplices in the dark transaction that was about to ensue, he passed down the Blackfriars' Wynd, entering the gardens of the Dominican monastery by a gate opposite the foot of the Wynd, and by a road nearly on the site of what now forms the High School Wynd, they reached the postern in the town wall, which gave admission to the lodging of Darnley Bothwell joined the queen, who was then visiting her husband, while his accomplices were busy arranging the gunpowder in the room below, and, after escorting her home to the palace, he returned to complete his purpose [See Documents illustrative of the murder of Darnley in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials] A loud explosion, about two o'clock in the morning, shook the whole town, and startled the inhabitants from their sleep, and at day dawn the dead body of Darnley and that of his page were found lying in the garden On the 21st of February, the queen and Bothwell went to Seton, where they remained till the 10th of March, on which day they returned to Edinburgh On 19th March Bothwell was appointed governor of Edinburgh castle, when he nominated Sir James Balfour his deputy governor [See ante, p 212] On the 24th of the same month he again accompanied the queen to Seton, and on the 10th April they returned to the capital. The clamours of the people, and the remonstrances of the earl of Lennox, Darnley's father, made it necessary for the queen to bring her favourite to trial, but on the day appointed, Saturday, 12th April, Bothwell appeared with such a formidable retinue as overawed his accusers No witnesses were called to prove the guilt of such a powerful antagonist, and he was in consequence acquitted Nor was this all At a parliament held on the 19th he obtained the ratification of all the possessions and honours which the queen had conferred on him, and was farther appointed captain and keeper of the castle of Dunbar But the sway which he had now acquired over Mary's mind was shown more indisputably by an act in favour of the Reformed religion, to which, at this time, she gave her full assent Immediately afterwards, viz, on the 20th April, Bothwell invited several of the nobles to an entertainment at his house, and at a late hour, when they were excited with wine, he opened to them his purpose of marrying the queen By mingled promises and threats, he prevailed on all present to subscribe a paper or bond approving of the match, and engaging to support it, if acceptable to Mary, with their united forces, lives, and fortunes Eight bishops, nine earls, and seven barons, signed this document, armed with which Bothwell, in accordance with his own former advice to the earl of Arran, resolved that she should not have the power to refuse him On the 21st April, the queen went to Stirling to visit her son, on her return on the 24th Bothwell, at the head of a thousand horse, met her at Cramond Bridge, and dispersing her slender train, conducted her, without the least opposition on her part, to the castle of Dunbar, where she remained for ten days, and where, it is said, he forcibly ravished her From Dunbar he conveyed her to Edinburgh castle, and the preparations for their marriage were hurried on with indecent haste On May 3d, he was divorced from his wife for adultery with her maid, and on the 7th his marriage with Lady Jean Gordon was formally annulled On the 12th he was created marquis of Fife and duke of Orkney On the 14th the marriage contract of the queen and Bothwell was signed, and on the 15th their nuptials were publicly solemnized in the chapel of Holyrood, first according to the rites of the Protestant church, and afterwards, in private, in the Popish form, Adam Bothwell, bishop of Orkney, officiating at the former ceremony That same night the distich of Ovid [Fasti, book v] was affixed to the palace gate and from the misery and ruin that sprung from this fatal union, is traced the vulgar prejudice that still regards it as unlucky to marry in the month of May

Bothwell was now anxious to secure the person of the young prince, for whose protection, almost as soon as the marriage was celebrated, a considerable body of the nobles had entered into an association at Stirling Alarmed at this confederacy Mary issued a proclamation requiring her subjects to take arms for her defence On the 7th June Bothwell and the queen went to Borthwick castle, whence the former proceeded to Melrose, to arrange an expedition against Lord Home, and then returned to the queen at Borthwick On the 11th June the confederated lords appeared suddenly before that strong fortress Bothwell, having timely warning of their approach, escaped hastily to Dunbar, whither two days afterwards he was followed by the queen On the 15th, exactly one month after Queen Mary's fatal marriage with this nobleman, the army of the queen and that of the confederated lords met at Carberry hill, on the same ground which the English had possessed at the battle of Pinkie The forces of the queen, consisting of four thousand men of Lothian and the Merse, were commanded by Bothwell, having under him the Lords Seton, Yester, and Borthwick, with four barons of the Merse, viz Wedderburn, Langton, Cumledge, and Hirsel, and those of the Bass, Waughton, Ormiston in Lothian, and Ormiston of that ilk in Teviotdale The confederate army was led by the Lord Home and the earl of Morton, afterwards regent Gallantly arrayed in brilliant armour, Bothwell "showed himself mounted on a brave steed," and offered by single combat to decide the quarrel His proffered gage was eagerly seized by Kirkaldy of Grange, but Bothwell would not accept of him as an opponent as being of inferior rank to himself He likewise rejected Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, and his brother, Murray of Purdovis, for the same reason Bothwell then challenged Morton, who accepted the challenge, and the combat was appointed to take place on foot, but old Lord Lindsay of the Byres requested Morton to allow him to meet Bothwell instead, being his right as next of kin to the murdered Darnley Morton consented, and Lindsay, kneeling down before both armies, audibly implored the Almighty to 'strengthen the arm of the innocent, that the guilty might be punished' Twenty knights were to attend on each side, and the lists were in course of being marked out, when the other lords interdicted the combat Some authorities say that Mary, making use of her royal prerogative, prohibited the encounter She demanded a conference with Kirkaldy of Grange, who approached and knelt before her, and while he was urging the queen to separate herself from Bothwell, and join the confederates, who sought only the re establishment of order and good government, that unscrupulous and unprincipled nobleman secretly desired one of his harquebussiers to shoot him The man was in the act of levelling his piece at the unsuspecting knight, when the queen observed him, uttering a scream, she threw herself before the harquebuss, and exclaimed to Bothwell that surely he would not disgrace her so far as to murder one to whom she had promised protection [Life of Kirkaldy, p 171] Bothwell then took his last farewell of Mary, and rode off the field with a few followers For a short time he took refuge among his vassals in the castle of Dunbar, then, equipping a few vessels, which, as lord high admiral, he was easily enabled to do, he proceeded by sea to the north, and remained for sometime with the earl of Huntly and his uncle, Adam Hepburn, bishop of Moray He was soon, however, abandoned by them, when he sailed for Orkney After in vain attempting to obtain admittance into the castle of Kirkwall, he plundered the town, and, retiring to Shetland with two small vessels, turned pirate On 11th August a commission was granted, by the lords of the secret council, to Kirkaldy of Grange and Murray of Tullibardine, to pursue him by sea and land, with fire and sword [Anderson's Collections] The laird of Grange, on board the Unicorn of Leith, was accompanied in the pursuit of the obnoxious earl, by Adam Bothwell, bishop of Orkney, (of whom in next article), although not three months before he had performed the marriage ceremony for him and Mary While pursued by Kirkaldy's fleet a violent storm arose, and Bothwell's ship, becoming unmanageable, was driven towards the coast of Norway, after parting company with the other vessel, which contained his plate, furniture, valuables, and armour, brought from the castle of Edinburgh [Bothwell's Declaration] Off the Norwegian shore he fell in with a vessel richly laden, and immediately attacked it After a desperate fight, despairing of victory, he resolved to seek safety in flight, leaving his ship stranded and bulged on a sandbank In a small boat, alone and unattended, he reached Carmesund, in Norway Thence he fled to Denmark, where his person being recognised he was put into close confinement in the castle of Draxholm For eight years he languished in captivity, deprived of his reason, and in that unhappy condition he died 14th April, 1578

"Thus perished the chief of the Hepburns, whose sounding titles of 'the most potent and noble prince, James, duke of Orkney,' marquis of Fife, earl of Bothwell, lord of Hales, of Crichton, Liddisdale, and Zetland, high admiral of Scotland, warden of the three marches, high sheriff of Edinburgh, Haddington and Berwick, baillie of Lauderdale, governor of Edinburgh castle and captain of Dunbar, only served to make the scene of the fettered felon, expiring in the dungeons of Draxholm, a more striking example of retributive fate, and of that guilty ambition, misdirected talent, and insatiable pride, the effect of which had filled all Europe with horror and amazement' [Life of Kirkaldy, p 191] Before his death, in an interval of returning reason, the miserable Bothwell confessed his own share in the murder of Darnley, and fully exculpated Mary from any participation in his crimes He left no issue Lady Jean Gordon, his first wife, who is described as a lady of great prudence, was afterwards twice married, first, on 13th December 1578, to Alexander, eleventh earl of Sutherland, who died in 1594, and secondly, to Alexander Ogilvy of Boyne She enjoyed a jointure out of Lord Bothwell's estates in Haddingtonshire, till her death in 1629, in the 84th year of her age The earl of Bothwell was forfeited by the Scottish parliament 29th December, 1567, and thus the Hepburns were for ever deprived of the landed property and titles which they had enjoyed for so long a period, taking the first rank among the families of East Lothian

The narrative written by the last earl of Bothwell of the house of Hepburn, embracing his personal history after his flight from Scotland, his adventures on the coast of Norway, and imprisonment in Denmark, has been privately printed for the Bannatyne Club from the original in the royal library at the castle of Drottningholme in Sweden, and was presented to the members of the club by Messrs Henry Cockburn and Thomas Maitland (Lords Cockburn and Dundrennan), under the title of 'Les Affaires du Conte de Bodwell, l'An MDXXVIII' An English translation also appeared in the 'New Monthly Magazine,' in which periodical the authenticity of the document is fully established M Mignet, the French historian, in a History of Mary Queen of Scots, in two volumes, published in 1851, attempts, from a collection of Mary's letters said to be in the possession of Prince Labanoff, and certain Spanish manuscripts obtained by his own researches in the archives of Simancas, to prove Mary's complicity in Darnley's murder, but however guilty as a woman and faulty as a queen she might have been, and however far led away by her passion for Bothwell, we hesitate to believe her so deeply criminal as to be a consenting party to the assassination of her own husband

The next and last possessor of the title of earl of Bothwell was Francis Stewart, eldest son of John Stewart, prior of Coldingham, natural son of King James the Fifth, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Carmichael, captain of Crawford The prior obtained a legitimation under the great seal of Scotland 7th February 1551, and died at Inverness in 1563, when on a northern circuit with his brother, the earl of Moray He had married, 4th January 1562 Lady Jane Hepburn only daughter of Patrick, third earl of Bothwell, and sister of the turbulent earl, the murderer of Darnley This marriage was celebrated at Seton house in East Lothian with great splendour, Queen Mary honouring the nuptials with her presence Two sons were the issue, Francis and Hercules Francis, the elder, was, by the special favour of King James the Sixth, in consideration of his descent from the Hepburns, created, 29th July 1576, earl of Bothwell, and had a grant of several lands, with the offices of sheriff-principal of the county of Edinburgh and within the constabulary of Haddington, and lord high admiral of Scotland He was also appointed sheriff of the county of Berwick and bailiary of Lauderdale This nobleman rendered himself remarkable by his restless disposition, and his several daring attempts to obtain possession of the person of the king In his youth he went for a short time to France, but in July 1582 he returned to Scotland, and soon took part against James Stewart, earl of Arran, the most unprincipled of all the favourites of James the Sixth In conjunction with Lord Home and the laird of Cowdenknows he fortified Kelso, and bade defiance to Arran's power Having a personal altercation with Sir William Stewart, Arran's brother, in presence of the king at Holyroodhouse, Stewart gave him the lie in very rude language A few days afterwards, on the 30th July 1588, they accidentally met in the High Street, when each had his retainers with him A battle immediately ensued Sir William, driven down the street by the superior numbers of his opponents, retreated into Blackfriar's Wynd There he was thrust through the body by Bothwell, and slain on the spot [Birrel's Diary, p 24] Feuds of this kind were so common at that turbulent period that little notice seems to have been taken of this affray, and Bothwell was never seriously prosecuted for it

In 1587, on the news reaching Scotland of the execution of Queen Mary, a strong desire was manifested to attack England, and avenge her death Bothwell refused to put on mourning, and declared that the best dule weed' was a steel coat In 1588, he aided the Catholic earls of Huntly, Errol, and Angus, in their rebellion against the king, and on James' proceeding to the north he threatened to ravage the borders and compel his return, but his forces gradually left him, and when the king came back to Edinburgh he threw himself on his knees before his majesty in the chancellor's garden, and was sent prisoner to Holyrood

On the 28th May 1589, with the earls of Huntly and Crawford, he was brought to trial on a charge of high treason and other crimes, and especially in trafficking with strangers, such as Jesuits and seminary priests, for the overthrow of the protestant religion Bothwell was farther charged with having received from one Colonel Semple a thousand crowns, and from France, by the earl of Errol, the same sum, which he made use of to raise soldiers, without having his majesty's commission to do so They denied the principal charges but were found guilty of treason The king, however, would not consent to their execution, and the matter was allowed to remain in abeyance for upwards of two years, when the earls of Huntly and Crawford received a full pardon [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol 1 part 2, pp 172—181] Lord Bothwell was imprisoned in Tantallan Castle, but after a few months he was released on payment of a heavy fine to the Crown In October of that year, when King James went to Denmark on his marriage expedition, Bothwell and the duke of Lennox were appointed to govern the kingdom in his absence, and it is recorded that while they were at the head of the government, 'greater peace, tranquillity, and justice were not heard of long before' But on the return of the king his troubles commenced In January 1591, a midwife of the name of Agnes Sampson, known as the 'wise wife of Keith,' and some other persons were burnt at Edinburgh for sorcery and witchcraft By some of these persons the earl of Bothwell was accused of having consulted them, in order to know the time of the king's death, and of having employed their art to raise the storms which had detained him so long in Denmark, as well as endangered the lives of the king and queen during their voyage to Scotland in the preceding year Being in consequence cited to appear before the Secret Council, he obeyed the citation According to Sir James Melville, he voluntarily surrendered himself a prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, very naturally insisting that 'the devil, who was a lyer from the beginning, nor yet his sworn witches, aught not to be credited' In the 'Historie of King James the Sext, we are told that after appearing before the lords of the secret council he was 'committed to prison within the castle of Edinburgh, till farther trial should be taken of him For the king, at the persuasion of Chancellor Maitland, suspected the said Bothwell, that he meant and intended some evil against his person, and remained long constant in that opinion divers years after The king wrote to all the nobility at diverse times to convene for his trial, but they all disobeyed, because they knew that the king had no just occasion of grief nor crime to allege against him, but only at the instigation of Chancellor Maitland, whom they all hated to the death for his proud arrogance used in Denmark against the earl Marischal' The latter was ambassador extraordinary to the Danish court After lying twenty days in prison, Bothwell, on the 22d June 1591, effected his escape from the castle of Edinburgh, by the agency of one Lauder, captain of the watch, whom he gained over, and who fled with him On this it was resolved to put in force his former conviction for treason On the 25th of the same month, sentence of forfeiture was pronounced against him at the cross of Edinburgh, and it was declared high treason for any one to 'reset, supply, show favour, intercommune, or have intelligence with him' The earl fled to the borders, and assembled his retainers, under pretence of driving Chancellor Maitland from the king's councils On the 2d August a proclamation was issued for the pursuit of the earl, and the king resolved to march against him in person On the 7th, however, the king issued another proclamation dispensing with the attendance of those whom he had summoned to arms, as he had abandoned the proposed expedition against Bothwell On the 27th of December, the earl repaired to Edinburgh, and being favoured by some of the king's attendants, he was admitted with his followers, late in the evening, into the courtyard of Holyroodhouse, in which the king was then residing He advanced directly towards the royal apartments, the doors of which were instantly shut He attempted to force open some of them with hammers and other weapons, and called for fire to burn others, but the alarm being communicated to the city, the inhabitants ran to arms An attack was also made on the queen's apartments, on the supposition that the king was there, but the door of the gallery was ably defended by Henry Lindsay, the master of her majesty's household, and the king was conveyed for safety to a turret above During the fray a gentleman named Scott, brother of Scott of Balwearie in Fife, was shot in the thigh, and the king's master-stabler, named William Shaw, was killed, as was also one with him named Peter Shaw The earl was at last repulsed, and made his escape with difficulty, but eight of his men were taken, and on the following morning they were hanged without trial, on a new gallows that was erected opposite the palace gate for the purpose [Birrel's Diary] For this extraordinary attempt to seize the king, Bothwell and his accomplices, among whom we find his countess, James Douglas of Spott, Archibald Wauchope, younger of Niddry, John Hamilton of Samuelston, and other country gentlemen, were attainted in parliament, 12th July 1592 On the 17th of the same month he and his partisans made another desperate attempt in Falkland palace to seize the person of the king, who, betrayed by some of his courtiers, and feebly defended by others, had very nearly fallen into their hands He owed his safety to the fidelity and vigilance of Sir Robert Melville, and the irresolution of Bothwell's followers Foiled in this enterprise, the earl fled to England, where he was taken under the protection of Queen Elizabeth His countess, who had been left in Scotland, was received into the royal favour on the 17th of November, but on the 23d of the same month a proclamation was issued ordering that no one 'should resset her, give her entertainment, or have any commerce of society with her in any case' This lady was Lady Mary Douglas, eldest daughter of David, seventh earl of Angus, and widow of Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, who died in 1574 All resetters and assisters of Bothwell having been ordered by parliament not to approach nearer to the royal presence than ten miles, and many of them having disobeyed, on the 8th December, a warrant was issued to the lord provost and magistrates of Edinburgh to apprehend Dame Margaret Douglas, countess of Bothwell, Archibald Wauchope, younger of Niddrie, John Hamilton of Samuelston, Sir James Scott of Balwearie Andrew Ker of Fernihirst, Walter Scott of Harden, and several others, all avowed partisans of the outlawed earl A great variety of proclamations were at this time issued against Bothwell and his adherents, and a number of persons were denounced rebels for resetting him and his accomplices The Criminal Records of the period are full of such denunciations, and even the town of Kelso did not escape prosecution for the same offence On the 12th of May 1593, the inhabitants, with only one exception, a person named William Lauder, were ordered to find security that they shall 'satisfy his Majesty's will in silver, providing the same shall not exceed the sum of two thousand merks' On the 17th, judgment was given against them, and they were ordered to pay a fine of 'seventeen hundred merks, and to find caution in the Bukis of Secret Counsall that they shall not resett, supplie, or intercommune with the said sometime earl or his accomplices, furnish them meit, drink, house, nor harbery, under whatsomever colour or pretence, under the penalty of twa thousand punds' [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i part ii] On the 1st June of that year (1593) the sometime earl,' and four others, namely, Gilbert Pennycuik, John Rutherford of Hunthill, elder, Thomas Rutherford of Hunthill, younger, and Simon Armstrong, younger of Whitehaugh, were summoned 'for certane crymes of treasone and lese-majestie,' at the instance of Mr David Macgill and Mr John Skene, advocates to our sovereign lord.' In this summons, which is a long document in Latin, the invasion of the palaces of Holyroodhouse and Falkland, and other matters are all recapitulated On this occasion the previous 'summons and executions' were produced, with letters of relaxation, dated March 16, 1592–3, bearing that Bothwell had been 'relaxit frae the process of horning led against him' On the 21st of July, the earl was called of new,' as it is termed, at the window of the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, and failing of course to appear, he was solemnly declared a traitor, his property was confiscated, and his armorial bearings were torn by the heralds at the Cross in the presence of a great number of spectators

Bothwell had still many powerful friends, especially among the noblemen and gentlemen of his own name of Stewart, and it is said that Queen Elizabeth herself interceded with James for his pardon The repeated proclamations against him, in which he and his resetters were denounced with the utmost rigour, had excited a vast sympathy in his favour, and many, especially the enemies of the court favourites, viewed him as a persecuted individual A number of his friends held a meeting at Edinburgh, and it was resolved to take advantage of the odium which Chancellor Maitland had recently incurred, to invite Bothwell to appear before the king, and to 'offer himself to his clemency and mercy' Accordingly, he was invited back to Scotland by the duke of Lennox, the earl of Athole, and Lord Ochiltree, all noblemen of his own name, to whom he was related On the 24th July 1593, only three days after he had been solemnly declared a traitor, this daring and rebellious peer seized the gates of the palace of Holyroodhouse, and, accompanied by a person of the name of Colville, brother of the laird of Easter Wemyss, was introduced into the royal apartments with a numerous train of armed followers The king, deserted by his attendants and incapable of resistance, called to Bothwell to consummate his treasons by piercing his sovereign to the heart, but the earl fell on his knees and implored pardon James yielded from necessity to his entreaties, and a few days afterwards he signed a capitulation, whereby he pledged himself to grant him a remission of all past offences, to procure a ratification of it in parliament, and to dismiss Chancellor Maitland from his councils and presence Bothwell, on his part, promised to withdraw from the court, and, 'by reason the original cause of his trouble was the suspicion of witchcraft, he offered himself to trial by whomsoever of his majesty's subjects he should please to appoint upon the jury, and a short day was assigned to that effect' The trial accordingly took place on 10th August, when Bothwell was acquitted of consulting with witches against the king's life That same night he slept at Holyroodhouse, and detected a plot for the escape of the king to Falkland, which he prevented from being carried into effect, and the next day he gave a banquet to his Majesty at his house in Leith He now became the leader of the English party and of the kirk His enemies, Lord Home, Chancellor Maitland, or more properly Lord Thirlestane, the Master of Glammis, and Sir George Home, were banished the court, and on the 26th July a proclamation was issued in favour of the earl of Bothwell his countess, James Douglas of Spott, and others, charging the lieges that 'nane of them tak upon hand to slander, murmur, reproach, or backbite the said earl and his friends' His triumph, however, was of short duration On the 7th of September, at a convention of the nobility and others at Stirling, called by the king, and which was attended only by the duke of Lennox, the earls of Glencairn, Mar, Morton, and Montrose, and Lords Hamilton,

Lindsay, and Livingstone, with two or three commissioners for the boroughs, his majesty entered into a long detail about Bothwell and his proceedings, alleging that the earl kept him in thraldom and captivity, that he had been compelled to grant him a remission of his offences against law and his own free will, and he desired that they should by their general votes acknowledge the same The convention, however, unanimously answered that 'captive he could not be esteemed, seeing that since his last talking with Bothwell at Holyrood-house he had been at Falkland, next at Edinburgh, and last of all at extreme liberty and pastime for the space of many days in the palace of Hamilton, unaccompanied by any suspected person on the part of Bothwell,' and they farther declared that they really 'could not condescend to his majesty on that point' All that the king could persuade them to sanction was a declaration, on the 13th of September, that 'his Highness, as a free prince, may at his pleasure call sik of his nobilitie, counsall, officers, and others gude subjects as his Highness has, or best shall like, and Bothwell and certain individuals were ordered not to approach nearer the king than ten miles without the royal permission A memorial signed by the king was also transmitted to the earl, who was then residing in Edinburgh intimating that if he would renounce the former conditions extorted by force in Holyrood-house, being a breach of the royal prerogative, a remission would be granted for all past offences, which would be ratified by the parliament to be held on the 20th of November, the earl finding security that he would forthwith retire out of the kingdom, and remain 'furth of the same' during the king's pleasure The king at the same time wrote to him to proceed to the prior of Blantyre and Sir Robert Melville, to confer with them on the subject, but, fearing that some plot was concocted against him, his lordship sent an excuse On the 11th October he was served with a summons to appear before the king and council on the 25th, to answer sundry charges of high treason, and, having failed to appear, he was denounced a rebel On the 11th of December he was put to the horn, and repeated proclamations were issued against him On the day last named Birrel mentions that he fought a duel with Ker of Cessford Returning to the borders, the earl succeeded in raising a force of five hundred moss-troopers, with which he entered Kelso on the evening of the 1st of April, 1594, and on the following day he marched to Dalkeith At that time considerable excitement prevailed in the kingdom, occasioned by some correspondence which had been carried on by the earls of Huntly, Errol, and other Roman Catholic noblemen and gentlemen with Spain, the chief object of which was believed to be the subversion of the Protestant religion in Scotland, and the restoration of popery Of this Bothwell cleverly took advantage to create a feeling in his favour While at Dalkeith, he issued a long proclamation, in which he made the correspondence with Spain a prominent topic of grievance He also addressed letters to the English ambassadors on the subject, and one to his 'right reverend and loving brethren,' as he calls them, 'the synodal assemblie of ministers then convenit at Dunbar' On the 3d of April he proceeded to Leith with between four and five hundred troopers, accompanied by Lord Ochiltree and several partisans of inferior rank On hearing that the earl was at Leith, the king proceeded to St Giles church, and addressing the people he declared to them that if they would assist him against Bothwell he would banish all the Catholic lords A large body of the citizens mustered at his call, and headed by James in person, marched to Leith Bothwell had drawn up his men in battle-array on the south-west side of that town, but as soon as he perceived the force under the king advancing from Edinburgh, he retreated to Hawkhill near Restalrig castle, which overlooks Lochend, and then at an easy pace he passed through the village of Restalrig, and proceeded to the mill at Wester Duddingstone, about a mile and a half distant Thence he continued his march with the utmost leisure to the little village of Niddry Marischal, on the property of Wauchope of Niddry, whose eldest son was one of his chief supporters, and had been often prosecuted on his account Ascending an eminence called the Wowmat, he dismissed his followers, (according to Douglas they abandoned him,) reserving only a few Lord Home, the Master of Glamms, and others, were commanded by the king to pursue the earl with both horse and foot On their approach to Niddry Green, they sent forward three gentlemen to view the ground, but being perceived, the earl's watches fell upon them, and compelled them to return to their friends Bothwell and his few attendants immediately charged Home and Glamms, with great impetuosity, and forced them and their followers to flee in every direction He pursued them till within half a-mile of the spot where the king stood The foot fled to the neighbouring castle of Craigmillar, upon the field in front of which Bothwell sounded a retreat in sight of the king and his supporters, and marched back unmolested to the Wowmat, whence he proceeded to Dalkeith, where he remained during the night, and on the following day he took himself to the south From Birrel's Diary and Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, it appears that in 1594, several persons were executed for receiving and entertaining Bothwell, among whom was the governor of Blackness castle, who was accused of agreeing with the earl to receive the king as a prisoner in that fortress On the 16th September the same year a proclamation was issued, declaring it treasonable to have any intercourse with his lordship, and on the 30th of that month, another appeared, rehearsing all his treasons, and asserting that his 'dissembled hypocrisy thir three years past had procured to him the favour of ower many of people, by the quhilk he was enabled to work all thir insolencies against his Highness' His brother, Hercules Stewart, suffered on the scaffold the same year

Bothwell fled to England, but Queen Elizabeth, in compliance with the earnest remonstrances of James, obliged him to leave her kingdom James had also influence enough with the presbyterian ministers to induce them to excommunicate him After an abortive attempt to join Huntly and the Catholic lords in another rebellion, the earl fled to Caithness, whence he was compelled to retire for safety to France, and afterwards to Spain and Italy where he renounced the protestant faith, and lived many years in obscurity and indigence, plunging into the lowest and most infamous debauchery He died at Naples, in the year 1624, in great misery Before engaging in his treasonable attempts, he had made over his large estates to his stepson, Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, in whose family they remained long after the earl's attainder Bothwell had three sons and three daughters Francis, the eldest son, obtained a rehabilitation under the great seal of Scotland 30th July 1614, which was ratified by act of parliament 28th June 1633 The titles were never restored, but according to Scott of Scotstarvet, the last earl of Bothwell's eldest son received from the earl of Buccleuch, by decret arbitral of Charles the First, the extensive estates of his father, which he sold to the Winton family, having married Lady Isabella Seton, only daughter of Robert first earl of Winton The offspring of this marriage was a son and a daughter The son Charles is stated, on the authority of Scott of Scotstarvet, to have been a trooper in the civil wars He was served heir to his father in 1647 His name and that of his sister, Margaret, are entered in the parish register of Tranent, from which it appears that he was born in April 1618 John, the second son of the earl, was the last commendator of Coldingham, and he got the lands and baronies which belonged to that priory united into a barony in 1621 On the 2d June 1638 his son Francis had a charter of the burgh of barony of Coldingham In the Memoirs of Captain Creighton [Swift's Works, vol xiv p 297] it is stated that Francis Stewart, grandson of the earl of Bothwell, was a private gentleman in the Horse Guards in the reign of Charles the Second, by whom he was made captain of dragoons, and he commanded the cavalry on the left in the action against the Covenanters at Bothwell Bridge in 1679 The reader of Scott's works will readily remember the Sergeant Bothwell of Old Mortality Henry Stewart, the earl's third son, had also a charter of the lordship of Coldingham in 1621 Of the earl's three daughters, Elizabeth, the eldest, married James, second son of William first Lord Cranstoun, and was the mother of William the third lord Margaret, the second, became the wife of Alan, fifth Lord Cathcart, without issue, and Helen, the youngest, married Macfarlane of Macfarlane, by whom she had several children

The surname of Bothwell is of great antiquity, being derived from the lordship of Bothwell in Lanarkshire The name Botheville, Bothel, Boothwell, Bothell, or Bothwell, has been supposed to have originated in the Celtic Both, an eminence, and wall, a castle, the castle of Bothwell standing considerably elevated above the Clyde A more probable conjecture is that it is a compound of the two Celtic words Both, in its signification of a dwelling, and ael or hyl, a river, which is strictly descriptive of Bothwell castle, as it is also of the castle of Bothell or Bothall in Northumberland situated on the Wentsbeck In the reign of Alexander the Second the barony of Bothwell was held by Walter Olifard, justiciary of Lothian, who died in 1242 The writer of the genealogy of the Bothwells, Lords Holyroodhouse, in the Appendix to 'Nisbet's System of Heraldry' (vol ii p 242,) quoting the Chartulary of the Episcopal See of Glasgow thinks it highly probable that the Olifards got the barony of Bothwell by the marriage of an heir female of the surname of Bothwell [See Olifhant, surname of] It afterwards passed by marriage to the Morays or Murrays In the time of King Edward the First it was given to Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, appointed by him governor of the south part of Scotland Upon his forfeiture, it was bestowed by King Robert the Bruce on Andrew Moray, lord of Bothwell, who married Christian sister of that monarch

The ancestor of the noble family of Bothwell, Lords Holyroodhouse, was John de Bothwill, who received from King David the Second a charter (dated at Dundee, 31st July 1369), in which he is styled his beloved cousin, of ten pounds sterling and four chalders of grain yearly, due to the king from the thanage of Doun in Banffshire for his life, and another 19th April 1371, of all his majesty's lands of the park of Gargwall in the same shire, also for his life The family of Bothwell fixed their residence in Edinburgh, where they ranked among the principal citizens, and near which city they had a considerable estate in lands Richard Bothwell was provost of Edinburgh in the reign of King James the Third He married Elizabeth, daughter of William Sommerville of Plean in Stirlingshire, by whom he had two sons and a daughter The second son, Richard Bothwell, was prebendary of Glasgow and rector of Ashkirk, doctor of the civil and canon laws and provost of the church of St Mary in the Fields, within the walls of the city of Edinburgh He was director of the Chancery in the reign of King James the Fifth, by whom he was appointed a lord of session, at its first institution, 25th May, 1532 On account of his advanced age the king dispensed with his attendance, 7th March 1539, but reserved to him his salary and privileges [Haig and Brunton's Senators of College of Justice] He died in 1547 The daughter, Margaret, married Sir Duncan Forrester of Garden, comptroller to James the Fifth in 1503

Francis Bothwell, the eldest son, was likewise appointed a senator of the College of Justice on its first institution, on the temporal side while his brother, Dr Richard Bothwell, was named on the spiritual side Francis had a charter of two pieces of waste ground in Edinburgh, and served the office of provost of that city in 1585 He married Janet, one of the two daughters and coheirs of Patrick Richardson of Meldrumsheugh, burgess of Edinburgh, with whom he got lands in the neighbouring regality of Broughton He had two sons and a daughter, namely, Richard, provost of Edinburgh in the reign of Queen Mary, whose male line is extinct, and Adam, the celebrated bishop of Orkney, of whom a notice follows Janet, the daughter, married Sir Archibald Napier of Merchiston, and became the mother of John Napier, the inventor of the logarithms

Adam Bothwell, the second son was preferred to the see of Orkney by Queen Mary, 8th October 1562 after being duly elected by the chapter, and on 13th November 1565, he was appointed a lord of session He was one of the four Scottish bishops who embraced the Reformation, and as he had in his own person the property of the bishopric of Orkney, he made an exambion of the greater part of it with Robert Stewart, abbot of Holyroodhouse, one of the natural brothers of the queen for his abbey, which was ratified by a charter under the great seal of Scotland, 25th September 1569 He was one of the eight bishops who signed the bond granted by the nobility to the earl of Bothwell, engaging to support his marriage with Queen Mary (see ante, p 358), and, as already stated, he performed the marriage ceremony between them according to the rites of the protestant church He was one of the first to desert the party of the queen, and only two months after her fatal marriage with Bothwell, he placed the crown on the head of her infant son At the meeting of the General Assembly in December of that same year (1567), "the haill kirk found that he transgressed the act of the kirk in marrying the divorced adulterer, and, therefore, deprived him of all functione of the ministrie, conforme to the tenor of the act made thereupon ay and whill [until] the kirk be satisfied of the sclander committed be him" [Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland, p 71] In the Assembly held in July 1568, the bishop made due 'obedience and submission,' and engaged "upon some Sonday to make ane sermone in the kirk of Halyrudehouse, and in the end thereof to confess his offence in marrying the queene with the erle of Bothwell," whereupon the kirk restored him again to the ministry [Ibid p 104] The same year (1568) the ancient barony of Broughton and the surrounding lands comprehended within its jurisdiction, were granted to him by James the Sixth, but in 1587 he surrendered them to the Crown, in favour of Sir Lewis Bellenden of Auchnoull, lord-justice clerk The bishop was much employed in matters of state, and in September 1568, he accompanied the Regent Moray to York as one of the commissioners against Queen Mary For his opposition to the Regent Morton, he was for a short time imprisoned in the castle of Stirling He died 23d August, 1593, at the age of 67 and was interred in the nave of the Abbey Church of Holyrood where a monument was erected to his memory [Keith's Scottish Bishops] This monument is still to be seen in the ruined chapel, attached to the second pillar from the great east window that once overlooked the high altar By his wife, Margaret, daughter of John Murray of Touchadam, he had three sons and one daughter, the latter married to Sir William Sandilands of St Monance A vignette view of the bishop's mansion in Byre's Close, High Street, Edinburgh, (now the warehouse and property of Messrs Clapperton and Co,) as seen from the north, is given in Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh, vol ii p 7

A tradition exists that the heroine of the touching ballad, named 'Lady Ann Bothwell's Lament, beginning

'Balow, my boy, lie still and sleip'
It grieves me sair to see thee weip, was a daughter of Adam Bothwell, bishop of Orkney Mr Robert Chambers, in his Scottish ballads, speaking of this pathetic lament, has committed a mistake when he says that the bishop was raised to a temporal peerage, under the title of Lord Holyroodhouse It was his son, and not himself, who was the first Lord Holyroodhouse His daughter, Anna, it is said, was betrayed, when very young and by the aid of her nurse, into a disgraceful connexion with the Hon Sir Alexander Erskine, third son of John, seventh earl of Mar, of whom a portrait still exists by Jamieson, in which he is represented in a military dress, with a cuirass and scarf He is said to have been one of the handsomest men of his time, with a noble and expressive countenance The desertion of his unfortunate victim was believed by his contemporaries to have exposed him to the signal vengeance of heaven He was blown up, along with the earl of Haddington, and about eighty other persons of distinction, in the castle of Dunglas, Berwickshire, in 1640, the powder magazine having been ignited by a servant boy, out of revenge against his master In the ballad, supposed to have been written by the heroine herself, who was at one time conjectured to have been the countess of Bothwell, and at another a Miss Boswell of Auchinleck, the following verses seem prophetic of his fate

'Balow my boy thy father's fled
When he the thriftless son has play'd
Of vows and oaths forgetful he Prefers the wars to thee and me
But now perhaps, thy curse and mine
Makes him eat acorns with the swine

"Yet I can't chuse but ever will Be loving to thy father still Where'er he gae, where'er he ride
My love with him doth still abide
In weel or wae, where'er he gae
My heart can ne'er depart him frae

'Then curse him not perhaps now he Stung with remorse, is blessing thee
Perhaps at death, for who can tell Whether the judge of heaven or hell
By some proud foe, has struck the blow
And laid the dear deceiver low

"I wish I were into the bounds
Where he lies smothered in his wounds
Repeating, as he pants for air
My name, whom once he called his fair
No woman's yet so fiercely set
But she'll forgive, though not forget Balow, my boy, be still and sleip'
It grieves me sair to see thee weip

These two last verses, however, are not to be found in the version of the ballad in Bishop Percy's collection, which differs considerably from that in Chambers' Scottish Ballads.

John Bothwell, the eldest son of the bishop, designed of Alhammer, succeeded his father as commendator of the abbey of Holyroodhouse, and was appointed a lord of session, 2d July 1593 Enjoying the favour and confidence of King James the Sixth, he was sworn of his privy council, and accompanied him to England in 1603 On the journey he received the keys of the town of Berwick, in his majesty's name He was created a peer by the title of 'Lord Halyrudhous,' by charter dated at Whitehall, 20th December 1607, to him and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs male of Adam, bishop of Orkney, his father, whom failing, to his own lawful and nearest heirs His lordship married Mary, daughter of Sir John Carmichael of Carmichael, with whom he got twelve thousand marks of portion, and died in November 1609, leaving an only son, John, second Lord Holyroodhouse, who died, unmarried, in 1635 The title remained dormant for ninety-nine years

William Bothwell, third son of Adam bishop of Orkney, had a son, Adam Bothwell, whose grandson, Alexander Bothwell of Glencorse, as lineally descended from Sir Richard Bothwell, provost of Edinburgh, the bishop's elder brother, served himself heir before the sheriffs of Edinburgh, 4th February, 1704, to his grandfather, Adam Bothwell of Whelpside, grandchild of Sir Francis, the provost, as also to the second Lord Holyroodhouse He married Janet, daughter of John Trotter of Mortonhall, by whom he had a son, Henry Bothwell of Glencorse, who was served heir to John Lord Holyroodhouse, 8th February 1734, and presented to the king a petition claiming the title This petition was by his majesty's commands laid before the House of Lords, 20th March 1734, but no determination was ever come to respecting it He nevertheless assumed the title, and died in the Canongate, Edinburgh, 10th February 1755 By his wife, Mary daughter of Lord Neil Campbell of Ardmaddie, second son of Archibald marquis of Argyle, he had five sons and four daughters None of his sons had male issue, and the peerage may now be said to be extinct

BOWER, a surname, contracted from Bowmaker, originally from England In former times, before the invention of gunpowder, a bowmaker was a very honourable and lucrative profession, and on being assumed as a surname, it was in process of time shortened into Bower There was an ancient family, Bower of Kinnettles in Angus, who, like all of a similar surname, carried bows in their arms as relative to the name In the accounts of the lord high treasurer of Scotland, under date 2d December 1532, there is the following entry "Item, to the Inglise (English) Bowar for ane dozane of bowis and six dosane of arrows deliverit at the kingis command to Alexander Canosoune, and for four dosane of arrowis deliverit to the kingis grace for his ane schuting, xx lb" In the history of the Gowrie conspiracy occurs the name of James Bower, called Laird Bower, a 'servitor' of Logan of Restalrig, who was employed to convey letters between Logan and the earl of Gowrie, and having shown some of them to one George Sprott, a notary in Eyemouth, the latter was executed eight years afterwards for concealment of the plot The English name Bowyer is the same as Bower Playfair conjectures [Antiquities, vol vi p 436] that the word is composed of the Gothic word Boo or Bow, used to express a dwelling, a farm-house, or village, and the Saxon Er, an inhabitant, as Bower or Bowyer, the inhabitant of a house or village In the Orkney islands, where the Gothic was long preserved in greater purity than any other part, the principal farm-house on an estate is, in many instances, called a bow, and in Ayrshire the tenant of a dairy is called a Bower The English name o "owes, now borne by the earl of Strathmore, (see STRATHMORE, earl of,) seems to have been derived from the same trade It will be recollected that the first wife of John Knox was named Marjory Bowes

BOWER, WALTER, the continuator of Fordun's Scotichronicon, was born at Haddington in 1385 At the age of 18 he assumed the religious habit, and after finishing his philosophical and theological education he went to Paris, to study the civil and canon law After his return to Scotland, he was unanimously elected abbot of St Colm in 1418 On the death of Fordun, the historian, Sir David Stewart of Rossyth requested him to transcribe and complete the Scotichronicon, or Chronicles of Scotland, which had been brought down only to the 23d chapter of the fifth book Bower readily undertook the task, and instead of executing a mere transcript, he inserted large interpolations in the body of the work, and continued the narrative to the death of James the First, completing it in sixteen books The materials for this continuation had, however, principally been collected by his predecessor This work, the result of the joint labours of Fordun and Bower, was useful to Hector Boece in writing his history, and on the Scotichronicon almost all the early histories of Scotland are founded —Irving's Scots Poets — See FORDUN

BOWER, ARCHIBALD, an author of talents and industry, but of very equivocal religious character, was born at or near Dundee, January 17, 1686 His parents were respectable Roman Catholics, and in September 1702, when he was sixteen years of age, they sent him to the Scots college of Douay, whence he was removed to Rome, and in 1706 he was admitted into the order of the Jesuits After a noviciate of two years he went to Fano, where he taught the classics, and in 1717 he was recalled to Rome, to study divinity in the Roman college In 1721 he was sent to the college of Arezzo, and made reader of philosophy and consultor to the rector of the college He was then removed to Florence, where he made his last vows He afterwards went to the college at Macerata, where he was chosen a professor, and where, according to his own account, he was a counsellor and secretary to the court of Inquisition If we are to believe his own statement, he here became disgusted at the enormities committed by the Inquisition, but his enemies assert that, forgetting his vows of celibacy, he engaged in an amorous intrigue with a nun, to whom he was confessor Certain it is that, in 1726, he was obliged to leave Macerata for Perugia, and from thence he secretly made his escape to England, where he arrived in June or July of that year, after, by his own account, meeting with many extraordinary adventures, which are to be found detailed in the Edinburgh Magazine for 1785, p 138

On his arrival in England, he got introduced to Dr Aspinwall, who, like himself, had formerly belonged to the order of the Jesuits, and Dr Clark After several conferences with these gentlemen, and some with Dr Berkeley, bishop of Cloyne, then dean of Londonderry, he professed himself a convert to the Protestant faith, quitted the order of the Jesuits, and withdrew himself entirely from all connection with the Roman Catholic Church This took place in November 1726, but it was not till six years after that he openly conformed to the Church of England By Dr Aspinwall's means, he became known to many persons of influence and respectability, among others, he was introduced to Dr Goodman, physician to George the First, and by him recommended to Lord Aylmer, who wanted some one to assist him in reading the classics The education of two of his lordship's children was also confided to his care With this nobleman he continued several years on terms of the greatest intimacy, and was by him made known to all his lordship's connections, and particularly to the Hon George, afterwards Lord Lyttleton, who subsequently became his warm, steady, and to the last, when deserted by almost every other person, his unalterable friend During the time he lived with Lord Aylmer, he undertook, for Mr Prevost, a bookseller, the 'Historia Literaria,' a monthly review of books, the first number of which was published in 1730 In 1735 he agreed with the proprietors of the 'Universal History' to write part of that work, and he was employed upon it till 1744, being nine years The money he gained by these occupations he paid or lent to Mr Hill, a Jesuit, who transacted money matters, as an attorney, and it appears, from undoubted evidence, that this was done by way of peace-offering to the society, into which he was re-admitted about 1744 Subsequently, repenting of the engagement he had made with his old associates, the Jesuits, he claimed and recovered the money he had advanced to them

In 1746 he put forth proposals for publishing, by subscription, a 'History of the Popes,' a work which, he says, he commenced some years before at Rome, and then brought it down to the pontificate of Victor, that is, to the close of the second century In the execution of this work at that period, he professes to have received the first unfavourable sentiments of the Pope's supremacy On the 13th of May 1748 he presented to the king the first volume of his 'History of the Popes,' and on the death of Mr Say, keeper of Queen Caroline's library, he was, through the influence of Lord Lyttleton, appointed librarian in his place In August 1749 he married a niece of Bishop Nicholson, and daughter of a clergyman of the Church of England, a younger son of a gentleman in Westmoreland, with whom he received a fortune of four thousand pounds sterling In 1751 the second volume of his 'History of the Popes' made its appearance His friend Lord Lyttleton now appointed him clerk of the buck warrants,—an office probably of no great emolument His 'History' was continued to seven volumes, but in it he displayed such a violent zeal against popery, as exposed him to the animadversions of Roman Catholic writers, particularly Alban Butler, a learned priest, who, in a pamphlet printed at Douay in 1751, assailed the two first volumes of the 'History of the Popes,' being all which were at that period published Unfortunately for his reputation, his money transactions and correspondence with the Jesuits were brought to light, and notwithstanding his spirited and confident defences, and his denial upon oath of the authenticity of letters fully proved to be his, he lost his character both as an author and a man, and was generally believed by the public to be destitute of moral and religious principle The letters themselves were published in 1756 by Dr Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, with a commentary proving their authenticity He scarcely retained a friend or advocate, except his patron, Lord Lyttleton, who, by withholding his permission, prevented Garrick from making Bower's apostasy and double-dealing the subject of a stage performance, for having mentioned in a contemptuous manner, that eminent actor and his lady in his 'Summary View of the Controversy between the Papists and the Author' Bower's latter years seem to have been spent in virulent attacks upon his enemies, the Papists, and in vainly endeavouring to recover his reputation, and that of his 'History of the Popes' In 1761 he appears to have assisted the author of 'Authentic Memoirs concerning the Portuguese Inquisition,' in a series of letters to a friend, 8vo He died September 3d, 1766, at the age of eighty By his will, which does not contain any declaration of his religious principles, he bequeathed all his property to his wife, who some time after his death published an attestation of his having died in the Protestant faith

BOWMAN, a surname derived from the ancient practice of archery, the bearer of a bow and arrows being called a bowman The name is properly English, though found in Scotland On the 29th December 1572, one Janet Bowman, or 'Jonet Boyman,' as it is spelled in the Criminal Records, described as 'spous to William Steill,' was indicted for witchcraft, and being convicted was burnt at Edinburgh About the middle of the last century the lands of Togie, in the parish of that name in Fife, were the property of Walter Bowman, Esq, who long resided at Egham in Surrey This gentleman executed a very strict entail of the property, his library especially being placed under the most particular injunctions for its preservation He had travelled much on the continent, and appears to have collected a considerable portion of the books there With many valuable editions of the ancient classics, particularly a fine edition of Pliny's Natural History, and a splendid illuminated edition of Ptolemy, the library contains a rich collection of engravings, a great number of maps and charts, and a well preserved copy of Blaeu's Atlas By the terms of the entail, the heir is prohibited from lending the books out, but he is bound to keep a suitable room for them in his house, and to allow free access to it to the neighbouring gentlemen, there to read and study He is also bound to have a basin at hand, with water and a towel, that the books may not be soiled with unclean hands Women and children are expressly prohibited from admission to the library [Leighton's History of County of Fife, vol ii p 50]

BOWMONT, marquis of, the second title of the duke of Roxburghe, usually borne by the eldest son of that nobleman [See ROXBURGHE, duke of]

BOYCE, BOYS, or BOIS, a surname of French origin It was originally De Bois or Du bois, written latterly as one, the

Dubois, the name of the well-known French cardinal It was early translated in England into its Saxon synonym of Wood, or á Wood, as Anthony á Wood, the historian of Oxford. But in Scotland where the early French prevailed, long after it ceased to be the vehicle of speech in England, it retains nearly its original form The families of Boys in England, of whom was Alderman Boys, the patron of the fine arts and illustrator of Shakspere, is of Scotch extraction It was frequently written in the Latin of the middle ages as De Bosco which was at the same time its form in the Italian and Romanesque languages, both words implying precisely the same thing In the thirteenth century Sir Andrew de Bosco married the third daughter of Sir John Bisset of Lovat, and with her, as there was no male heir, he got the third part of that estate [See ante, p 304] In 1303, when Edward completed his conquest of Scotland, the castle of Urquhart in Ross-shire was, by his forces, after an obstinate siege, taken by storm, and Alexander de Bois, the governor, and every person in it, except his wife, who was then pregnant, were put to death The child thus saved by the pious scruples of the English proved a boy, and is said to have been the founder of the house of Forbes The reason assigned for this by Boece is sufficiently ridiculous as well as improbable, but in the earliest forms of the word, Forbas, Forbos, Forbois, there are unmistakeable confirmations of the tradition of the family descent, which being then recent, and affecting his immediate kinsmen, we cannot suppose Boece, mendacious as he was in earlier story, to have been bold enough to invent in toto [See FORBES, surname of] In the 'Historical and Critical Remarks on the Ragman Roll,' it is stated that de Boys was a surname peculiar to a family in Angus, designed of Panbride, of which the learned Hector Boethius, Boece, or Boyce, was a son See BOECE, HECTOR

BOYD, a surname of very considerable antiquity in Scotland according to our genealogical writers The first recorded ancestor of the Boyds, earls of Kilmarnock, was Simon, brother of Walter, the first high steward of Scotland, and youngest son of Alan the son of Flathald (the fabulous Fleance of Shakspere) who, following his brother into Scotland, witnessed his foundation charter of the monastery of Paisley in 1160 and is therein designated "frater Walteri filii Alani, dapifer" He is said to have been the father of Robert, called Boyt or Boyd, from his fair complexion, the Celtic word buidhe signifying fair or yellow He died before the year 1210, and from him descended the various families of that name in Scotland

But the account is not without its improbabilities It is most unlikely that there were any Celtic people around the family of the high steward, in those days, of importance or influence enough to bestow any appellative upon his nephew, it being known, according to Lord Lindsay, that the Norman barons surrounded themselves exclusively with their own families and dependents, and in the case of the stewards this is proved by the De Nizes—ancestors of the Dennistons—the Croes or Croques—of the Crooks of Crookston and others, who received grants of land from that family, and are named in the charters and other papers relative to Paisley abbey still extant Still less is it likely that any appellative bestowed by a remote and conquered people would have become hereditary amongst those haughty chiefs The fondness of Scottish genealogists for finding Celtic origins for Norman and Saxon names proceeds from an error of the most transparent character Because Scotland was at one time peopled by a Celtic race, they imagine that a large proportion of that people must have been inhabiting the whole country at the commencement of Scottish history But it is evident that the region between the Forth and Clyde on the north, and the Tweed and Solway on the south, had, with the exception of Galloway, by the conquest of the Saxons, and afterwards of the Danes and Norwegians, been for centuries previous to the last Saxon conquest, as it is called, in the possession of other races, never amalgamating in any instance with the Celtic, whom they must therefore have driven out or retained in a state of slavery And in the Inquisition, as it is styled, into the lands which anciently belonged to the bishopric of Glasgow, made during the government of Count David, afterwards David the First, king of Scotland, when that region was considered a province of England—the most ancient and authentic historical document extant of native origin—this important fact is distinctly brought out In the names of witnesses cited in that document, moreover consisting as they do of judges of Cumbria, or Lothian, and other natives, as in all the grants and writings of that prince connected with that district, there is not a Celtic name to be found, all being either Saxon or Norman, along with one or two Danish or Norwegian names, although this occurred at a period anterior to the settlement of Alan, the founder of the Stewards, in that country It is to be noted still further that amongst the Saxon names of witnesses occurs that of Boed or Boyd, as a person of some consequence at that time It may therefore be less improbable to suppose that the name is derived from a descendant of this individual, and who may afterwards have become connected by marriage with the family of the Steward

The lands of Kilmarnock, Bondington, and Hertschaw, which belonged to John de Baliol, and other lands in Ayrshire, were granted by Robert the Bruce to his gallant adherent, Sir Robert Boyd, the ancestor of the earls of Kilmarnock See KILMARNOCK, earls of

The Boyds of Pinkhill, and of Trochrig, were descended from Adam Boyd, third son of Alexander, the second son of Robert lord Boyd, the famous chamberlain of Scotland in the minority of James the Third

BOYD, MARK ALEXANDER, an extraordinary genius, and eminent scholar of the sixteenth century, was the son of Robert Boyd, eldest son of Adam Boyd of Pinkhill, in Ayrshire, brother to Lord Boyd He was born in Galloway, January 13, 1562, and it is recorded of him that two of his teeth were fully formed at his birth Having lost his father early, he was educated, under the superintendence of his uncle, James Boyd of Trochrig, titular archbishop of Glasgow, at the university of that city, where he was equally conspicuous for the quickness of his parts, and the turbulence of his disposition At that period the principal of Glasgow college was the celebrated Andrew Melville, who sustained the discipline of the university with great vigour and address In Dr Irving's Memoir of Melville, 'Lives of Scottish Writers,' it is stated that "some of the students connected with powerful families were guilty of most flagrant insubordination, and collected a mixed multitude to overawe the principal and the rector Two of those delinquents were Mark Alexander Boyd, related to the noble family of that name, and Alexander Cunningham, related to the earl of Glencairn, who both proceeded to acts of outrageous violence, and being supported by many other disorderly youths, as well as by many adherents of their respective families, were at first disposed to set all academical authority at open defiance Cunningham, who had assaulted J Melville with a drawn sword, was finally reduced to the necessity of making a public and humiliating apology, with his feet as well as his head uncovered John Maxwell, a son of Lord Herries, had likewise been implicated in some very disorderly proceedings, but when his father was informed of his conduct, he hastened to Glasgow, and compelled him on his knees, and in an open area of the college, to beg the principal's pardon " We know not what was Boyd's punishment, but, impetuous and headstrong, it is not likely that he would submit to ask forgiveness We are told that he was of so untractable a spirit that he quarrelled with his preceptors, beat them both, threw his books into the fire, and forswore learning for ever! While yet a mere youth, he presented himself at court, in hopes of obtaining advancement there, but the violence of his temper involved him in numberless quarrels, and after fighting a duel, his friends persuaded him to go abroad, and follow the profession of arms He accordingly proceeded in 1581 to Paris, where he lost all his money in gaming, which seems to have roused him at last to reflection He now applied himself to his studies with all his characteristic ardour, attending the lectures of several professors in the university of Paris After some time he went to the university of Orleans to learn the civil law, under J Robertus, chiefly known for his temerity in becoming the rival of the celebrated Cujacius Boyd soon quitted Orleans for Bourges, where Cujacius, the principal civilian of the age, delivered his lectures To this professor he recommended himself by writing some verses in the antiquated Latin language, Cujacius having a preference for Ennius and the elder Latin poets The plague having broken out at Bourges, he fled first to Lyons, and afterwards to Italy, where he contracted a friendship with a person whom he names Cornelius Varus, who, finding that Boyd prided himself on the excellence of his Latin poetry, addressed some verses to him, in which he declares that he excelled Buchanan and all other British poets in a greater degree than Virgil surpassed Lucretius, Catullus, and all other Roman poets Having been seized with an ague, he returned to Lyons for change of air, about the year 1585 In 1587 he served in the French army against the German and Swiss mercenaries who had invaded France in support of the king of Navarre, and during the campaign he was wounded by a shot in the ankle In 1588 he went to reside at Toulouse, and again applied himself to the study of the civil law, under Roaldes, an eminent professor About this period he seems to have written several tracts on the science of jurisprudence, and he even had it in view to compose a system of the law of nations A popular insurrection having taken place at Toulouse, in which the first President Duranty, the Advocate-General Dafis, and several other persons, were murdered, Boyd was thrown into prison, and, from the hatred of the Jesuits, was in great danger of his life He obtained his liberty, however, by the intercession of some learned men of Toulouse, and went first to Bourdeaux, and thence to Rochelle On the journey to the latter place, he was attacked by robbers, when he lost all the property he had with him He afterwards, in consequence of the climate of Rochelle disagreeing with him, fixed his residence in Fontenay in Poictou, where he devoted much of his time to study, occasionally resuming the avocation of a soldier About the year 1591 he seems to have had an intention of reading lectures on the civil law, and the heads of his prelections on the Institutes of Justinian are still preserved among his other papers in the Advocates' Library In 1592 a collection of his poems and epistles was printed at Antwerp in 12mo, which he dedicated to James the Sixth, whom he represented as superior to Pallas in wisdom, and to Mars in arms! The dedication had been originally intended for another person who had really distinguished himself in war, but the name was afterwards altered, and that of the king substituted in its place, while the dedication itself was allowed to remain as originally written Boyd's own vanity was very great, and it is said that he assumed the name of Alexander from its being more pompous than his own name of Mark

In 1595, while preparing to return to Scotland, he received intelligence of the death of his elder brother William, for whom he entertained a sincere regard On his return home, after a lapse of fourteen years, he undertook to accompany the earl of Cassillis in a tour to the continent, as his travelling preceptor, and having completed that engagement, he finally revisited his native country, where he died at his father's seat in Ayrshire, of a slow fever, April 10, 1601, in the fortieth year of his age A sketch of his life, written by Lord Hailes, was published in 1783, with a portrait Boyd is said to have been able to dictate at once, in three different languages, to three amanuenses He was the author of Notes upon Pliny, and published an excellent little book, addressed to Lipsius, in defence of Cardinal Bembo, and the ancient eloquence He translated Cæsar's Commentaries into Greek, in the style of Herodotus He also wrote in Latin, epistles after the manner of Ovid, and a work called 'Hymni,' which is not hymns, as might be supposed, but a description of different plants and shrubs He left many Latin poems, which have not been printed, and several manuscripts on philological, political, and historical subjects, in Latin and French, in which he also cultivated poetry These manuscripts, an exact list of which is given by Lord Hailes, in his life of Boyd, are preserved in the Advocates' Library His 'Epistolæ Heroidum,' and his 'Hymni,' were inserted in the 'Delicæ Poetarum Scotorum,' printed at Amsterdam, in two volumes 12mo, in 1637 —Life by Lord Hailes

BOYD, ROBERT, of Trochrig, an eminent divine, was born at Glasgow in 1578 He was the son of James Boyd, titular archbishop of Glasgow, and the cousin of the subject of the preceding notice His mother was Margaret, daughter of James Chalmers of Gaitgirth, chief of the name of Chalmers After receiving the rudiments of his education at a grammar school in Ayrshire, he went to the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of master of arts, studying philosophy under Mr Charles Ferme, [see FERME or FAIRHOLM, Charles,] one of the regents, as the professors were then called, and theology under the celebrated Robert Rollock In 1604, according to the custom of the times, he went to France, where he made great proficiency in learning, particularly in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew On the invitation of the university of Montauban, he became professor of philosophy there, he also studied divinity, and was ordained a minister of the French Reformed Church at Verteuil In 1606, he was transferred to a professorship at Saumur, where he remained till 1614, officiating also as pastor in the church, and where he married a lady of the family of Malivern

The fame of his learning having attracted the notice of his sovereign, James the First of England, his majesty sent for him, and appointed him professor of divinity and principal of the university of Glasgow He entered on his new duties in 1615, and in 1617, when King James visited Glasgow, Boyd, as principal of the college, delivered a congratulatory speech, which, as usual in that age, was highly encomiastic As principal, he was required to teach alternately theology one day, and Syriac the next, also to preach on Sunday in the parish church of Govan, near Glasgow, the temporalities of the rectory and vicarage of which had been annexed, with the condition of preaching, to the principal's chair Although he had thus apparently not much time to prepare his lectures, which were delivered in Latin, as customary at that period, he "uttered them," says Wodrow, "in a continued discourse, without any hesitation, and with as much ease and freedom of speech, as the most eloquent divine is wont to deliver his sermons in his mother-tongue" Principal Baillie, who studied under Mr Boyd, mentions that, at a distance of thirty years, the tears, the solemn vows, and the ardour of the desires produced by his Latin prayers, were still fresh in his memory

The attempt of the king to assimilate the presbyterian to the episcopalian form of church government placed Principal Boyd in a very embarrassed position Although the son of an archbishop, and connected with episcopalian families, he was strongly attached to the presbyterian church, and finding that he could not consistently with his principles retain his situation, having refused to comply with the five Perth articles, he resigned the principalship, after having held it for seven years, and retired to his estate of Trochrig in Carrick, Ayrshire He was not, however, allowed to remain long in retirement In October 1622, he was elected principal of the university of Edinburgh, but his sentiments on the subject of episcopacy being well known, his arrival in Edinburgh was the signal for persecution to assail him on the part of the court Scarcely two months after his election as principal, "upon the 23d of December 1622," says Calderwood, "the provost, baillies, and counsel of Edinburgh, were challenged by a letter from the king, for admitting Mr Robert Boyde to be principal of their college, and commandit them to urge him to conforme, or to remove him They sent to court to the countesse who sent the challenge in the king's name, and desired him to intreate the king not to take in ill part Mr Robert's admission, in respect of his gifts and peaceable disposition" [Calderwood's History, vol vii p 566] "Upon the last of Januar, the provost, baillies, and counsel of Edinburgh were commandit of new again to urge Mr Robert Boyd with conformitie, and if he refused, to remove him, his wife, and familie, out of the toun The king's words, answering to their former letter of recommendation, were these following 'On the contraire, we thinke his biding there will doe much evill, and, therefore, as ye will answeir to us on your obedience, we command you to put him, not onlie from his office, but out of your toun, at the sight hereof, unlesse he conform totallie And when ye have done, thinke not this sufficient to satisfy our wrathe for disobedience to our former letter' Mr Robert was sent for to the counsel The king's will was intimate to him, which the counsel said they wolde not withstand Mr Robert quitt his place, and tooke his leave" [Ibid p 569] He again retired to his estate, and was ordered to confine himself within the bounds of Carrick He was subsequently minister of Paisley, but soon left it, in consequence of a disagreement with the countess of Abercorn, who had become a Roman Catholic He died at Edinburgh, whither he had gone for medical advice, or, as others say, at Trochrig, January 5, 1627, aged forty-eight From an original portrait of Principal Boyd in the university of Glasgow, an engraving was published by Pinkerton, of which the following is a woodcut

An interesting life of Robert Boyd of Trochrig from the original manuscript in the Wodrow collections in the Glasgow university library, was printed for the use of the members of the Maitland Club of that city His works are

A Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians, written in elegant Latin, and published under the title of "Roberti Bodii Scoti, Prælectiones in Epistolam ad Ephesios" London, 1652, folio, a work which shows him to have been well acquainted with the whole body of divinity Prefixed is a Memoir of the Author, by Dr Rivet, the errors in which Wodrow has corrected

Monita de filii sui primo geniti Institutione, 8vo, published in 1701, from the author's manuscripts, by Dr Robert Sibbald

He also wrote some Latin poems Of these the 'Hecatombe ad Christum,' dedicated to his cousin, Andrew Boyd, bishop of Argyle, and in ode to Dr Sibbald, are preserved in the 'Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum,' and in the 'Poetarum Scotorum Musa Sacræ' A laudatory poem on King James by him will be found in Adamson's 'Muses Welcome' Extracts from his 'Philotheca,' a kind of obituary, which, with sermons in English and French, had remained in manuscript in possession of the family of Trochrig, have been printed in the second part of the Miscellany of the Bannatyne Club

seventeenth century, was born before 1590 He was descended from the Boyds of Pinkhill in Ayrshire, and was cousin of Mr Andrew Boyd, bishop of Argyle, and of the subject of the preceding article After being taught the rudiments of his education at the school of Kilmarnock, he entered upon his studies at the university of Glasgow About 1607 he went to France, and became a student at the university of Saumur under his cousin Robert Boyd of Trochrig In 1611 he was appointed a regent in that university, and is said to have declined the principalship, which was offered to him

He spent sixteen years in France, during four of which he was a preacher of the gospel In 1621 the persecutions to which the protestants in that country were subjected compelled him to return to Scotland He resided at first privately at Edinburgh, with Dr Sibbald the physician, and afterwards he lived successively with Sir William Scott of Elie, and the marquis and marchioness of Hamilton at Kinneil In 1623 he was appointed minister of the Barony parish, Glasgow, where he continued till his death In 1629 he published his principal prose work, entitled 'The Last Battell of the Soule,' dedicated to "the most sacred and most mightie monarch," Charles the First, in a prose address, and also in a poetical one These were followed by a dedication in French to Queen Henrietta

His poetical address, 'Ad Carolum Regem,' is short, and may be quoted here —

"This life, O Prince, is like a raging sea, Where frothy mounts are heaved up on hie,
Our painted joys in blinks that are ful warme,
Are, like raine-bowes forerunners of a storme,
All flesh with grace is prickt within, without, Crownes carie cares, and compasse them about Your state is great, your place is high What then?
God calls you gods, but ye shall die like men"

Mr Boyd's feelings of loyalty and devotion to his sovereign were very strong In 1633, when Charles the First came to Scotland to be crowned, he happened to meet his majesty the day after the coronation in the porch of Holyrood Palace, when he addressed the king in a Latin oration full of the most loyal and laudatory sentiments In 1634 he was elected rector of the university of Glasgow, also in 1635, and again in 1645 When the attempt to impose episcopacy upon Scotland, and the violent and arbitrary proceedings of the government, led to the signing of the Solemn League and Covenant, Mr Boyd and the other members of Glasgow college at first refused to subscribe it, deeming it preferable to yield something to the wishes of the sovereign He afterwards found it expedient, with most of his colleagues, to sign the national document, to which he faithfully adhered; although he did not, like some of his brother-divines, engage actively in the subsequent military transactions The fight at Newburnford, August 28, 1640, by which the Scottish army gained possession of Newcastle, was commemorated by him in a poem of sixteen 8vo pages, but the versification of this piece is very homely, and in some parts it approaches even the burlesque In 1643 he published his 'Crosses, Comforts, and Councels, needfull to be considered, and carefullie to be laid up in the hearts of the Godlie, in these boysterous broiles, and bloody times'

After the defeat of the Scottish forces at Dunbar, in September 1650, Cromwell visited Glasgow Mr Boyd had the courage to remain, when the magistrates and other persons of influence had left the city, and, in preaching before the protector, he bearded him and his soldiers to their very faces "Cromwell," says Baillie, "with the whole body of his army, comes peaceably to Glasgow The magistrates and ministers all fled away, I got to the isle of Cumray with my Lady Montgomery, but left all my family and goods to Cromwell's courtesy, which indeed was great, for he took such measures with the soldiers that they did less displeasure at Glasgow than if they had been at London, though Mr Zachary Boyd railed on them all to their very face in the High Church" His allusions and reproaches were so bitter, that one of Cromwell's officers, said to be Thurloe his secretary, is reported to have asked the protector, in a whisper, for permission "to pistol the scoundrel"—"No, no," said Cromwell, "we will manage him in another way" He invited Mr Boyd to dinner, and gained his respect by the fervour of the devotions in which he spent the evening, and which, it is said, continued till three o'clock next morning!

Mr Boyd died about the end of 1653, or the beginning of 1654, and was succeeded by Mr Donald Cargill. Shortly before his death he completed an extensive manuscript work, bearing the title of 'The Notable Places of the Scripture expounded,' at the conclusion of which is added, "Heere the author was neere his end, and was able to do no more, March 3, 1653."

He was twice married His first wife was named Elizabeth Fleming, and his second Margaret Mure, the third daughter of William Mure of Glanderston, Renfrewshire, who, surviving him, took for her second husband Mr James Durham, author of the Commentary on the Revelation A traditional anecdote says that when he was making his will, his wife requested him to leave something to Mr Durham "No, no Margaret," was his reply, "I'll lea' him naething but thy bonnie sel'" Another version runs in this sarcastic strain, "I'll lea' him what I cannot keep frae him" Mr Boyd had amassed a considerable amount of property, which he divided, by his will, between his widow and the college of Glasgow The sum he bequeathed to the college amounted to twenty thousand pounds Scots, equal to about sixteen hundred pounds sterling, no small sum in those days The college also got his library and manuscript compositions His bust, with an inscription, commemorative of these donations, ornaments the gateway of the university, and the divinity hall of the college contains his portrait, an engraving of which is given in Pinkerton's collection On next column is a woodcut of it During his life he published nineteen works, chiefly of a religious cast, but none of them very large A list of them is subjoined His manuscript productions, eighty-three in number, are principally comprised within thirteen small 4to volumes, written in a very close hand, and appear to have been prepared for the press Besides these there are three others in manuscript, entitled 'Zion's Flowers, or Christian Poems for Spiritual Edification,' 2 vols 4to 'The English Academie containing Precepts and Purpose for the Weal both of Soul and Body, divided into Thirtie and one dayes exercise,' 12mo , and 'The Four Evangels in English verse,' 12mo These are all deposited in the library of the College of Glasgow

Mr Neil, in his life of Boyd, prefixed to a new edition of his 'Last Battell of the Soule, published at Glasgow in 1831, says — "Mr Boyd appears to have been a scholar of very considerable learning He composed in Latin, and his qualifications in that language may be deemed respectable His works also bear the evidence of his having been possessed of a critical knowledge of the Greek, Hebrew, and other languages As a prose writer, he will bear comparison with any of the Scottish divines of the same age He is superior to Rutherford, and, in general, more grammatically correct than even Baillie himself, who was justly esteemed a very learned man His style may be considered excellent for the period Of his characteristics as a writer, his originality of thought is particularly striking He discusses many of his subjects with spirit and ingenuity, and there is much which must be acknowledged as flowing from a vigorous intellect, and a fervid and poetical imagination This latter tendency of his genius is at all times awake, and from which may be inferred his taste for metaphor, and love of colouring, so conspicuous in his writings One of his most popular attempts to render himself serviceable to his country was in pre paring a poetical version of the Book of Psalms for the use of the church It had been previous to 1646 that he engaged in this, as the Assembly of 1647 when appointing a Committee to examine Rous's version, which had been transmitted to them by the Assembly at Westminster, recommended them to avail themselves of the Psalter of Rowallan, and of Mr Zachary Boyd, and of any other poetical writers' It is further particularly recommended to Mr Zachary Boyd 'to translate the other Scriptural Songs in metre, and to report his travails therein to the Commission of that Assembly, that after examination thereof they may send the same to the presbyteries, to be there considered until the next General Assembly' Mr Boyd complied with this request, as the Assembly, August 10, 1648, 'recommends to Mr John Adamson and Mr Thomas Crawfurd to revise the labours of Mr Zachary Boyd upon the other Scripture Songs, and to prepare a report thereof to the said Commission for publick affairs,' who, it is probable, had never given in any 'report of their labours' Of his version, Baillie had not entertained a high opinion, as he says, 'our good friend, Mr Zachary Boyd, has put himself to a great deal of pains and charges to make a Psalter, but I ever warned him his hopes were groundless to get it received in our churches, yet the flatteries of his unadvised neighbours made him insist in his fruitless design' There seems to have been a party who did not undervalue Mr Boyd's labours quite so much as Baillie, and who, if possible, were determined to carry their point, as, according to Baillie's statement, 'The Psalms were often revised, and sent to presbyteries,' and, 'had it not been for some who had more regard than needed to Mr Zachary Boyd's Psalter, I think they (that is, Rous's version) had passed through in the end of last Assembly but these, with almost all the references from the former Assemblies, were remitted to the next' On 23d November 1649, Rous's version, revised and improved, was sanctioned by the Commission with authority of the General Assembly, and any other discharged from being used in the churches, or in families Mr Boyd was thus deprived of the honour to which he aspired with some degree of zeal, and it must have been to himself and friends a source of considerable disappointment Among other works, he produced two volumes, under the title of 'Zion's Flowers, or Christian Poems for Spirituall Edification,' and it is these which are usually shown as his Bible, and have received that designation These volumes consist of a collection of poems on select subjects in Scripture history, such as that of Josiah, Jephtha, David and Goliath, &c, rendered into the dramatic form, in which various 'speakers' are introduced, and where the prominent facts of the Scripture narrative are brought forward and amplified We have a pretty close parallel to these poems in the 'Ancient Mysteries' of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and in the sacred dramas of some modern writers" In this work there are some homely and even ludicrous passages, but a fine strain of devotional feeling pervades the poetry of which the two volumes are composed

As a specimen, a portion of Abraham's Soliloquy when about to offer up Isaac as a sacrifice may be quoted

" That hill's the place where, with this bloody knife
I must bereave mine Isaac of his life,
That hill's the place, where fire of flaming hot Shall Isaac burn, when I have cut his throat,
That hill's the place, appointed by and by,
Where slaughter'd Isaac shall in ashes lye,
That hill's the place, where as a sacrifice
Mine Isaac shall be torne, a bloody guise,
That hill's the place, where I anone must spill Mine Isaac's blood, and make it downe to trill,
That hill's the place, whence fearefull grief and smart
Shall rent in pieces my poor Sarah's heart,
That hill's the place, whence to the whirling pole,
Shall now depart of mine Isaac the soule,
That hill's the place, where Isaac by and by,
Burnt in a fire shall all in ashes lye
But all those thoughts not move or trouble mee,
I mind my Lord t'obey most chearfullie,
And to doe more if he command me farther,
Hee steeles my faith soe that I doe not stagger
All one hand mercy, and might at the other,
Doe hinder doubts, which here my faith might smother
A God of mercy hee hath beene to mee,
Him to obey I will still ready bee
* * * * * *
To mee it is, as a most glorious treasure,
To doe for God what is to him a pleasure
If for his sake wee chearfull beare a crosse,
He by his grace can soone make up our losse

I of his might or mercy doe not neede
To doubt. hee can him raise up from the dead
My faith which I as breast plate now put on,
Is perell proof against affliction
God in this sea, a pilot wise, can steere,
My tossed pinnace, to her wished peere,
At his command I'le doe as hee hath said,
With Isaac's blood I will now glut my blade,
His flesh and bones I'le on the altar burne,
When that is done I'le to my house returne"

Jonah's soliloquy within the whale's belly is more graphic, and though some of the images may appear ludicrous, the piece is marked by a strong religious spirit which goes far to redeem it

"I did rebell, heere is my day of doome,
Feasts dainty seeme untill the reck'ning come,
Alas! too late it now repenteth mee
That I refused to go to Nineve
* * * * * *
Here apprehended I in prison ly,
What goods will ransom my captivity?
What house is this, where's neither coal nor candle,
Where I nothing but guts of fishes handle?
I and my table are both here within,
Where day neere dawned, where sunne did never shine,
The like of this on earth man never saw,
A living man within a monster's maw
Buried under mountains which are high and steep, Plung'd under waters hundreth fathoms deep
Not so was Noah in his house of tree,
For through a window he the light did see,
He sailed above the highest waves—a wonder,
I and my boat are all the waters under,
Hee in his ark might goe and also come,
But I sit still in such a straitened roome
As is most uncouthe, head and feet together,
Among such grease as would a thousand smother
I find no way now for my shrinking hence,
But heere to lie and die for mine offence
Eight prisoners were in Noah's hulk together Comfortable they were, each one to other
In all the earth like unto me is none,
Far from all living, I heere lye alone
* * * * * *
This grieves me most, that I for grievous sin, Incarc'rd ly within this floating In,
Within this cave my heart with griefe is gall'd,
Lord heare the sighes from my heart's centre hal'd, Thou know'st how long I have been in this womb,
A living man, within a living tomb
Oh! what a lodging! wilt thou in these vaults,
As in a Hell most dark correct my faults,
I neither kno when day doth shine, or night
Comes for my rest, I'm so depriv'd of sight,
Though that the judgment's uncouth sure, I share,
I of God's goodnesse never will despaire"

Breadalbane (properly Broadalbin) earl and marquis of the former a title in the peerage of Scotland, and the latter in that of Great Britain possessed by a branch of the noble family of Campbell Sir Colin Campbell the ancestor of the Breadalbane family and the first of the house of Glenurchy was the third son of Duncan first Lord Campbell of Lochow progenitor of the dukes of Argyle by Marjory Stewart daughter of Robert duke of Albany regent of Scotland In an old manuscript preserved in Taymouth castle, named the Black Book of Taymouth (printed by the Bannatyne Club 1853) containing a genealogical account of the Glenurchy family, it is stated that Duncan Campbell commonly callit Duncan in Aa, knight of Lochow (lineallie descendit of a valiant man, surnamit Campbell quha cam to Scotland in King Malcolm Kandmon his time about the year of God 1067, of quhom came the house of Lochow) flourischeid in King David Bruce his dayes The foresaid Duncan in Aa had to wyffe Margarit Stewart dochter to Duke Murdoch [a mistake evidently for Robert], on whom he begat twa sones the elder callit Archibald the other namit Colin, wha was first laird of Glenurchay That estate was settled on him by his father It had come into the Campbell family, in the reign of King David the Second, by the marriage of Margaret Glenurchy with John Campbell and was at one time the property of the warlike clan MacGregor who were gradually expelled from the territory by the rival clan Campbell Sir Colin was born about 1400 He was one of the knights of Rhodes, afterwards designed of Malta The family manuscript, already quoted, says that "throch his valiant actis and manheid he was maid knicht in the Isle of Rhodes, quhilk standeth in the Carpathian sea neir to Caria and countrie of Asia the less and he was three sundrie tymes in Rome After the murder of James the First in 1437 he actively pursued the regicides and brought to justice two of the inferior assassins named Chalmers and Colquhoun, for which service King James the Third afterwards bestowed upon him the barony of Lawers He was appointed guardian of his nephew Colin first earl of Argyle, during his minority and concluded a marriage between him and the sister of his own second wife, one of the three daughters and co heiresses of the Lord of Lorn In 1440 he built the castle of Kilchurn on a projecting rocky elevation at the east end of Lochawe under the shadow of the majestic Ben Cruachan, where—now a picturesque ruin —

> Stands like a spirit of the past, lone old Kilchurn

According to tradition Kilchurn (properly Coalchurn) castle was first erected by his lady, and not by himself, he being absent on a crusade at the time and for seven years the principal portion of the rents of his lands are said to have been expended on its erection An old legend connected with this castle states that once while at Rome, having been a long time from home, Sir Colin had a singular dream, for the interpretation of which he applied to a monk, who advised him instantly to return to Scotland, as a very serious domestic calamity could only be averted by his presence in his own castle. He hastened immediately to Scotland and arrived at a place called Succoth, where dwelt an old woman who had been his nurse. In the disguise of a beggar, he craved food and shelter for the night, and was admitted to the poor woman's fireside. From a scar on his arm she recognised him, and immediately informed him of what was about to happen at the castle. It appeared that for a long period no tidings had been received of or from him, and a report had been spread that he had fallen in battle in the Holy Land. This information surprised Sir Colin as he had repeatedly sent messengers with intelligence to his lady, and he at once suspected treachery. His suspicions were well founded. A neighbouring baron, named M'Corquadale, had intercepted and murdered all his messengers, and having succeeded in convincing the lady of the death of her husband he had prevailed upon her to consent to marry him the next day being that fixed for their nuptials. Early in the morning Sir Colin, still in the disguise of a beggar, set out for his castle of Kilchurn. He crossed the drawbridge, and undiscovered entered the gates of the castle, which on this joyous occasion were open to all comers. As he stood in the courtyard one of the servants of the castle accosted him, and asked him what he wanted. "To have my hunger satisfied and my thirst quenched" was his reply. Food and liquor were immediately placed before him. Of the former he partook, but he refused the latter, except from the hand of the lady herself. On being informed of this, she approached, and handed him a cup of wine. Sir Colin drank to her health, and dropping a ring into the empty cup returned it to her. On examining the ring, she recognised it at once as her own gift to her husband on his departure. Rushing towards him she threw herself into his arms. The baron M'Corquadale was allowed to depart in safety, but was afterwards attacked and overcome by Sir Colin's son and successor, who is said to have taken possession of his castle and lands. Sir Colin died before June 10, 1478, as on that day the lords auditors gave a decreet in a civil suit against "Duncan Cambell, son and air of umquhile Sir Colin Cambell of Glenurquha, knight." He was interred in Argyleshire, and not as Douglas says at Finlarig, at the north west end of Lochtay, which afterwards became the burial place of the family. He was four times married. Nisbet, giving as his authority the contract of marriage still extant in the archives of the Breadalbane family, says, that his first wife was Lady Mary Stewart, one of the daughters of Duncan, earl of Lennox, and that she died soon after the marriage without issue, but he has evidently mistaken the lady's name as the three daughters of Duncan, the last earl of Lennox, executed in 1425, none of whom were named Mary, were all married in 1392, eight years before Sir Colin Campbell was born, and there never was another earl of Lennox named Duncan. His second wife was Lady Margaret Stewart, the second of the three daughters and co-heiresses of John Lord Lorn, with whom he got a third of that lordship, still possessed by the family, and thenceforward quartered the galley of Lorn with his paternal achievement. Of this lady there is a portrait by Jamesone in the Breadalbane collection at Taymouth, an engraving of which is given in Pinkerton's Scottish gallery. By her he had a son, Sir Duncan, who succeeded him. His third wife was Margaret, daughter of Robert Robertson of Strowan, by whom he had a son and a daughter. John, the son, according to Nisbet, [Heraldry, v. ii. p. 212,] was educated for the church and on the demise of Angus, bishop of the Isles, was preferred to that see. In 1506 he was joined in commission from the crown with David, bishop of Argyle, and James Redheugh, burgess of Stirling, comptroller to the king, to set in tack the crown lands of Bute. He died in 1509. Douglas, however, thinks the existence of this John doubtful [Peerage, v. i. p. 284.] Keith [Cat. of Scottish Bishops, p. 305] leaves the surname blank, and says that John, bishop of the Isles, was a privy councillor to King James the Fourth, and from that prince with consent of the Pope, he got, in 1507, the abbacy of Icolmkill annexed in all time coming to the episcopal see of the Isles. The daughter, Margaret, married first Archibald Napier of Merchiston, and secondly John Dickson, Ross Herald. Sir Colin's fourth wife was Margaret, daughter of Duke Stirling of Keir by whom he had a son, John, ancestor of the earls of Loudon [see LOUDON, earl of], and a daughter, Marion, married to William Stewart of Baldoran.

Sir Duncan Campbell, the eldest son, obtained the office of bailiary of the king's lands of Discher, Foyer, and Glenlyon, 3d September 1498 for which office, being a hereditary one his descendant, the second earl of Breadalbane, received, on the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland, in 1747, the sum of one thousand pounds, in full of his claim for six thousand. Sir Duncan also got charters of the king's lands of the port of Lochtay &c. 5th March 1492, also of the lands of Glenlyon, 7th September 1502, of Finlarig, 22d April 1505, and of other lands in Perthshire in May 1508 and September 1511. He fell at the battle of Flodden. He was twice married. First, in 1479, to Lady Margaret Douglas, fourth daughter of George fourth earl of Angus, by whom he had three sons and a daughter, viz., Sir Colin, Archibald ancestor of the Campbells of Glenlyon, and Patrick, of whom nothing is known. The daughter married Toshach of Monyvaird in Perthshire. The second wife was Margaret, daughter of Monereff of Monereff in the same county, by whom he had a son, John, styled by Dougas bishop of the Isles, (Keith states that the John Campbell who was bishop of the Isles in 1558 and 1560 was a son of Campbell of Calder in Nairnshire,) and two daughters, Catharine, married to William Murray of Tullibardin, and Annabella, who in 1533 became the wife of Alexander Napier of Merchiston.

Sir Colin the eldest son, the third laird of Glenurchy was of great use in assisting his cousin, the celebrated Gavin Douglas, to obtain possession of the see of Dunkeld to which he had been nominated in 1515 in opposition to Andrew Stewart, his own brother-in-law, who having procured himself to be chosen bishop by the chapter, had garrisoned the palace and the steeple of the cathedral with his servants. This Sir Colin is mentioned as having "bigget the chapel of Finlarig to be ane burial for himself and posteritie." He married Lady Marjory Stewart, sixth daughter of John earl of Athol, brother uterine of King James the Second, and had three sons, viz., Sir Duncan, Sir John, and Sir Colin, who all succeeded to the estate. The last of them, Sir Colin, became laird of Glenurchy in 1550, and according to the "Black Book of Taymouth," he "conquessit" (that is, acquired) "the superiority of M'Nabb his haill landis." He was among the first to join the Reformation, and sat in the parliament of 1560, when the Protestant doctrines received the sanction of the law. In 1573 he was one of the commissioners for settling a firm and lasting government in the church. In the "Black Book of Taymouth," he is represented to have been "ane great justiciar all his tyme, throch the quhilk he sustenit the deidly feid of the Clangregor ane lang space, and besides that he causit execute to the death many notable lymaris, he behiddit the laird of Macgregor himself at Kandmoir, in presence of the Erle of Athol, the justice-clerk, and sundrie other nobilmen" In 1580 he built the castle of Balloch, in Perthshire, one wing of which still continues attached to Taymouth Castle, the splendid mansion of the Marquis of Breadalbane He also built Edinample, another seat of the family Sir Colin died in 1583 By his wife, Catherine, second daughter of William, second lord Ruthven, he had four sons and four daughters Archibald, the fourth son, got part of the barony of Monzie by his marriage with Margaret, daughter and heiress of Andrew Toshach of Monzie, but had no issue Beatrix, the eldest daughter, married Sir John Campbell of Lawers, Margaret, the second, married, in 1574, James, seventh earl of Glencairn, and had issue, Mary, the third, married John, sixth earl of Menteith, with issue, and Elizabeth, the youngest, became the wife of Sir John Campbell of Ardkinglass

Sir Duncan Campbell of Glenorchy, the eldest son, was named by King James the Sixth, 18th May 1590, one of the barons to assist at the coronation of his queen, Anne of Denmark, when he was knighted On the death of Colin, sixth earl of Argyle, in 1584, he had been nominated by that nobleman's will, one of the six guardians of the young earl, then a minor, the others being Dougal Campbell of Auchinbreck, John Campbell of Calder, Sir James Campbell of Ardkinglass, comptroller to the king, father of the above-named Sir John, Archibald Campbell of Lochnell, and Neill Campbell, bishop of Argyle The guardians soon split into rival factions Glenorchy, Auchinbreck, and Lochnell, who was the nearest heir to the earldom, being on the one side, and Calder, Ardkinglass, and the bishop on the other The influence of the three latter preponderated, but jealousies soon broke out between Ardkinglass and Calder, and on the death of the former in 1591, his feelings of hostility were transmitted to his son and successor, Sir John, who being of a weak and vacillating disposition, was easily induced by his brother-in-law Glenurchy to enter into his plans The principal administration of the affairs of the earldom now centred in Calder He was supported by many of the nobility connected with the family of Argyle, and particularly by the earl of Murray, commonly called the "bonnie earl," who was murdered in his own house of Donnibirsel in Fife, in February 1592, by a party of the Gordons, under the command of the earl of Huntly In the same month John Campbell of Calder was assassinated in Lorn Both crimes, by a late discovery, appear to have been the result of the same conspiracy, in which Glenurchy and other barons and chiefs in the West Highlands were involved, and one object of which was the death of the young earl of Argyle, as well as that of the "bonnie earl of Murray" Gregory expressly charges Sir Duncan Campbell of Glenurchy with being the principal mover in the branch of the plot which led to the murder of Calder "Glenurchy," he says, "knowing the feelings of personal animosity cherished by Ardkinglass against Calder, easily prevailed upon the former to agree to the assassination of their common enemy, with whom Glenurchy himself had now an additional cause of quarrel, arising from the protection given by Calder to some of the Clangregor who were at feud with Glenurchy After various unsuccessful attempts, Ardkinglass procured, through the agency of John Oig Campbell of Cabrachan, a brother of Lochnell, the services of a man named M'Ellar, by whom Calder was assassinated with a hackbut, supplied by Ardkinglass, the fatal shot being fired at night through one of the windows of the house of Knepoch in Lorn, when Calder fell, pierced through the heart with three bullets Owing to his hereditary feud with Calder, Ardkinglass was generally suspected, and being, in consequence, threatened with the vengeance of the young earl of Argyle, Glenurchy ventured to communicate to him the plan for getting rid of the earl and his brother, and for assisting Lochnell to seize the earldom Ardkinglass refused, although repeatedly urged, to become a party to any designs against the life of the earl, proposing to make his peace with Argyle, by disclosing the full extent of the plot The inferior agents, John Oig Campbell and M'Ellar, were both executed, nor could all the influence of Calder's relations or friends obtain the punishment of any of the higher parties Glenurchy was allowed to clear himself of all concern in the plots attributed to him, by his own unsupported and extrajudicial denial in writing He offered to abide his trial, which, he well knew, the chancellor, Thirlestane, and the earl of Huntly were deeply interested in preventing" [History of the Western Highlands and Isles, pp 250—253]

In 1617 Sir Duncan had the office of heritable keeper of the forest of Mamlorn, Bendaskeilie, &c, conferred upon him He afterwards obtained from King Charles the First the sheriffship of Perthshire for life He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia by patent, bearing date 30th May 1625 Although represented as an ambitious and grasping character, he is said to have been the first who attempted to civilize the people on his extensive estates He not only set them the example of planting timber trees, fencing pieces of ground for gardens, and manuring their lands, but assisted and encouraged them in their labours One of his regulations of police for the estate was "that no man shall in any public house drink more than a chopin of ale with his neighbour's wife, in the absence of her husband, upon the penalty of ten pounds, and sitting twenty-four hours in the stocks, toties quoties" [New Stat Account, vol x p 464] According to the 'Black Book of Taymouth,' "in the zeir of God 1627, he causit big ane brig over the watter of Lochay, to the great contentment and will of the countrie" He died in June 1631 He was twice married, first, in 1574, to Lady Jean Stewart, second daughter of John earl of Athol, lord high chancellor of Scotland, by whom he had seven sons and three daughters Archibald Campbell of Monzie, the fifth son, was ancestor of the Campbells of Monzie, Lochlane, and Finnab, in Perthshire Jean, the eldest daughter, married Sir John Campbell of Calder, and had issue, Anne, the second, married Sir Patrick Ogilvy of Inchmartine, and was mother of the second earl of Findlater, Margaret, the third, married Sir Alexander Menzies of Weem His second wife was Elizabeth, only daughter of Patrick fifth Lord Sinclair, by whom he had a son, Patrick, on whom his father settled the lands of Edinample, and a daughter, Jean, married to John earl of Athol, and had issue

His second son, Robert, was engaged in 1610 in the Fight or Skirmish of Bintoich, also known as 'the Chase of Ranefray,' against the M'Gregors The fight appears to have taken place at Bintoich, and the chase or pursuit to have reached as far as Ranefray The transaction is thus narrated in 'the Book of Taymouth' "Attoure, Robert Campbell, second sone to the Laird (of Glenurquhey) Sir Duncan, persewing ane great number of them (the Clan Gregor) through the countrie, in end overtuik them in Ranefray, in the Brae of Glenurchy, quhair he slew Duncan Abrok Makgregor, with his son Gregor in Ardchyllie, Dougall Makgregor M'Coulchier in Glengyle, with his son Duncan, Charles Makgregor (M') Cane in Brackhe, quha was principallis in that band, and twenty utheris of their compleises slain in the chaiss" A contemporary historian, Sir Robert Gordon, in his 'History of the Earldom of Sutherland,' (p 247,) says of this affair, that "here (meaning at Bintoich) Robert Campbell, the laird of Glen-Vrquhie his sone, accompanied with some of the Clanchamron, Clanab (M'Nabs), and Clanronald, to the number of two hundred chosen men, faught against three score of the Clangregar, in which conflict tuo of the Clangregar were slain, to wit, Duncan Aeerigh, one of the chieftanes, and his son Duncan. Seaven gentlemen of the Campbell's syd wer killed ther, though they seemed to have the victorie" The same Robert Campbell, styled of Glenfalloch, in January 1611, besieged a garrison of the Clan Gregor in the small island of Varnak, near the western extremity of Loch Katrine, on its north shore, opposite Portnellan, but he was obliged to abandon the siege, owing, as stated in 'the Book of Taymouth,' to a storm of snow In July 1612 several of the Clan Gregor were hanged at the Borough-muir of Edinburgh for the slaughter of a bowman of the laird of Glenurchy and eight other persons, and several other crimes, consisting of fire-raising, theft, and intercommuning with their proscribed clansmen

Sir Colin Campbell, the eldest son of Sir Duncan, born about 1577, succeeded as eighth laird of Glenurchy Little is known of this Sir Colin, save what is highly to his honour, namely his patronage of George Jamesone, the celebrated portrait painter The family manuscript which records the genealogy of the house of Glenurchy contains the following entries, written in 1635 —"Item, the said Sir Colme Campbell gave unto George Jamesone, painter in Edinburgh, for King Robert and King David Bruysses, kings of Scotland, and Charles I king of Great Brittane, France and Ireland, and his majesties queen, and for nine more of the queins of Scotland, their portraits, quhilks are set up in the hall of Balloch, (new Taymouth) the sum of tua hundreth thrie scor punds —Mair, the said Sir Colme gave to the said George Jamesone for the knight of Lochow's lady, and the first countess of Argylle, and six of the ladys of Glenurquhay, their portraits, and the said Sir Colme his own portrait, quhilks are set up in the chalmer of deas (principal presence room) of Balloch, ane hundreth four scoire punds" The family tree of the house of Glenorchy, eight feet long by five broad, described by Pennant, was also painted by Jamesone In a corner is inscribed "The genealogie of the House of Glenurquhie, quhairof is descendit sundrie nobil and worthie houses 1635, Jameson faciebat" Sir Colin married Lady Juliana Campbell, eldest daughter of Hugh first Lord Loudon, but had no issue He died 6th September 1640, aged 63 In Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery are portraits of Sir Colin at the age of 56, and of Lady Juliana, his spouse, at the age of 52, both taken from the original paintings in the Breadalbane collection at Taymouth Castle

He was succeeded by his brother, Sir Robert, at first styled of Glenfalloch, and afterwards of Glenurchy "In the year of God 1644 and 1645, the laird of Glenurquhay his whole landis and esteat, betwixt the foord of Lyon and point of Lismore, were burnt and destroyit be James Graham, some time erle of Montrose, and Alex M'Donald, son to Col M'Donald in Colesue, with their associattis The tenants then whole cattle were taken away be their enemies, and their cornes, houses, plenishing, and whole insight weir burnt, and the said Sir Robert pressing to get the inhabitants repairit, wairit £48 Scots upon the bigging of every cuple in his landis, and als wairit seed cornes, upon his own charges, to the most of his inhabitants The occasion of this malice against Sir Robert, and his friends and countrie people, was, because the said Sir Robert joinit in covenant with the kirk and kingdom of Scotland, in maintaining the trew religion, the kings majestie, his authoritie, and laws, and libertie of the kingdom of Scotland, and because the said Sir Robert altogether refusit to assist the said James Graham and Alex M'Donald, their malicious doings in the kingdom of Scotland So that the laird of Glenurquhay and his countrie people, their loss within Perthshire and within Argyleshire, exceeds the soume of 1,200,000 merks" Sir Robert married Isabel, daughter of Sir Lachlan Macintosh, of Torecastle, captain of the clan Chattan, and had five sons and nine daughters William, the third son, was ancestor of the Campbells of Glenfalloch, the representative of whom is now the heir presumptive to the Scottish titles of earl of Breadalbane, &c. Alexander, the fourth son, got from his father the lands of Lochdochart in 1648, and was ancestor of the Campbells of Lochdochart Duncan, the fifth son, possessed Auchlyne, and from him descended the now deceased James Goodlet Campbell of Auchlyne, who by his wife, a sister of Logan of Logan, had a son, Hugh Campbell, merchant in Glasgow Margaret, the eldest daughter, married to John Cameron of Lochiel, was the mother of Sir Ewen Cameron, Mary, the second daughter, married James Campbell of Ardkinglass, Jean, the third, became the wife of Duncan Stewart of Appin, Isabel, the fourth, of Robert Irvine of Fedderet, son of Sir Alexander Irvine of Drum, and Julian, the fifth, of John Maclean of Lochbury The other daughters were the wives respectively of Robertson of Lude, Robertson of Faskally, Toshach of Monyvaird, and Campbell of Glenlyon

The eldest son, Sir John Campbell of Glenurchy, married first, Lady Mary Graham, eldest daughter of William, earl of Strathern, Menteath, and Airth, and had a son, Sir John, first earl of Breadalbane, and a daughter, Agnes, who became the wife of Sir Alexander Menzies of Weem, baronet Sir John married, secondly, Christian, daughter of John Muschet of Craighead in Menteith, by whom he had several daughters, of whom are descended the Campbells of Stonefield, Airds, and Ardchattan Isabel, one of them, was married to John Macnachtane, and Anne, another, to Robert Macnab of Macnab, whom she survived, and died at Lochdochart 6th September 1765

Sir John Campbell of Glenurchy, first earl of Breadalbane, only son of Sir John, was born about 1635 He gave great assistance to the forces collected in the Highlands for Charles the Second in 1653, under the command of General Middleton He subsequently used his utmost endeavours with General Monk to declare for a free parliament, as the most effectual way to bring about his majesty's restoration He served in parliament for the shire of Argyle Being a principal creditor of George, sixth earl of Caithness, [see CAITHNESS, earl of,] whose debts are said to have exceeded a million of marks, that nobleman, on 8th October 1672, made a disposition of his whole estates, heritable jurisdictions, and titles of honour, after his death, in favour of Sir John Campbell of Glenurchy, the latter taking on himself the burden of his lordship's debts, and he was, in consequence, duly infefted in the lands and earldom of Caithness, 27th February 1678 The earl of Caithness died in May 1676, when Sir John Campbell obtained a patent creating him earl of Caithness, dated at Whitehall, 28th June 1677 But George Sinclair of Keiss, the heir male of the last earl, being found by parliament entitled to that dignity, Sir John Campbell obtained another patent, 13th August 1681, creating him instead, earl of Breadalbane and Holland, Viscount of Tay and Paintland, Lord Glenurchy, Benederaloch, Ormelie, and Weik, with the precedency of the former patent, and remainder to whichever of his sons by his first wife he might designate in writing, and ultimately to his heirs male whatsoever On the accession of James the Seventh, the earl was sworn a privy councillor At the Revolution he adhered to the Prince of Orange, and after the battle of Killiecrankie and the attempted reduction of the Highlands by the forces of the new government, he was empowered to enter into a negotiation with the Jacobite chiefs to induce them to submit to King William, and a sum of fifteen thousand pounds sterling was placed at his disposal for the purpose by his majesty This negotiation was for a time interrupted, principally at the instigation of Mackian or Alexander Macdonald of Glencoe, between whom and the earl a difference had arisen respecting certain claims which his lordship had against Glencoe's tenants for plundering his lands, and for which the earl insisted for compensation and for retention out of Glencoe's share of the money with which he had been intrusted by the government to distribute among the chiefs The failure of the negotiation was extremely irritating to the earl, who threatened Glencoe with his vengeance Following up this threat, he entered into a correspondence with Secretary Dalrymple, the master of Stair, and between them it is understood, a plan was concerted for cutting off the chief and his people Whether the "mauling scheme" of the earl, to which Dalrymple alludes in one of his letters, refers to a plan for the extirpation of the tribe, is a question which must ever remain doubtful, but there is reason to believe that if he did not suggest, he was at least privy to the foul massacre of that unfortunate chief and his people, an event which has stamped an infamy upon the government of King William, which nothing can efface

The hand that mingled in the meal
At midnight drew the felon steel,
And gave the host's kind breast to feel Meed for his hospitality!
The friendly hearth which warmed that hand
At midnight armed it with the brand
That bade destruction's flames expand
Their red and fearful blazonry

There woman's shriek was heard in vain
Nor infancy's unpitied plain
More than the warrior's groan could gain Respite from ruthless butchery!
The winter wind that whistled shrill
The snows that night that cloaked the hill Though wild and pitiless had still Far more than Southern clemency

On the 29th April 1695, upwards of three years after the massacre, a commission was issued to inquire into it The Commissioners appear to have discovered no evidence to implicate the earl of Breadalbane but merely say, in reference to him, that it "was plainly deponed' before them, that, some days after the slaughter, a person waited upon Glencoe's sons, and represented to them that he was sent by Campbell of Balcalden, the earl's chamberlain or steward, and authorized to say that if they would declare, under their hands, that his lordship had no concern in the massacre, they might be assured the earl would procure their "remission and restitution" While however, the Commissioners were engaged in the inquiry they ascertained that, in his negotiations with the Highland chiefs, the earl had acted in such a way as to lay himself open to a charge of high treason in consequence of which discovery, he was, 10th June 1695, committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, but he was soon released from confinement as it turned out that he had professed himself a Jacobite that he might the more readily execute the commission with which he had been intrusted, and that King William himself was a party to this contrivance When the earl of Nottingham, on the part of the English government, wrote to Lord Breadalbane to account for the money he had received for the Jacobite chiefs, the latter returned this laconic answer, "My lord, the Highlands are quiet, the money is spent, and this is the best way of accounting among friends." When the treaty of union was under discussion, his lordship kept aloof, and did not even attend parliament. At the general election of 1713, he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, being then seventy-eight years old. At the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he sent five hundred of his clan to join the standard of the Pretender, and he was one of the suspected persons, with his second son, Lord Glenorchy, summoned to appear at Edinburgh within a certain specified period, to give bail for their allegiance to the government, but no farther notice was taken of his conduct The earl died in 1716, in his 81st year Macky [Memoirs, p 199] erroneously styles him Marquis of Breadalbane, and says, "It is odds if he live long enough but he is a duke He is of a fair complexion, and has the gravity of a Spaniard, is as cunning as a fox, wise as a serpent, and as slippery as an eel" His lordship married, first, at London, 17th December 1657, Lady Mary Rich, third daughter of Henry first earl of Holland, who was executed for his loyalty to Charles the First, 9th March 1649 The marriage is thus entered in the register of the parish of St Andrews, Baynard Castle —"Mr John Campbell of Glanorchy, in the county of Perth, in the nation of Scotland, Esqr, was married to the Lady Mary Rich" By this lady he had two sons, Duncan, styled Lord Ormelie, who survived his father, but was passed over in the succession, and John, in his father's lifetime styled Lord Glenorchy, who became second earl of Breadalbane He married, secondly, 7th April 1678, Lady Mary Campbell, third daughter of Archibald, Marquis of Argyle, dowager of George, sixth earl of Caithness, and by her had a son, Hon Colin Campbell of Ardmaddie, who died in 1708, aged 29 By a third wife he had a daughter, Lady Mary, married to Archibald Cockburn of Langton

John Campbell, Lord Glenorchy, the second son, born 19th November 1662, was by his father nominated to succeed him as second earl of Breadalbane, in terms of the patent conferring the title In 1721, at the keenly contested election for a representative of the Scots peerage, in room of the Marquis of Annandale deceased, his right to the peerage was impugned on the part of his elder brother, on the ground that any disposition or nomination from his father to the honours and dignity of earl of Breadalbane "could not convey the honours, nor could the crown effectually grant a peerage to any person and such heir as he should name, such patent being inconsistent with the nature of a peerage, and not agreeable to law, and also without precedent" [Robertson's Proceedings, p 88] These objections were overruled At the general election of 1736 his lordship was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers, and in 1741 was rechosen He was lord-lieutenant of the county of Perth He died at Holyroodhouse, 23d February 1752, in his ninetieth year He married, first, Lady Frances Cavendish, second of the five daughters of Henry, second duke of Newcastle She died, without issue, 4th February 1690, in her thirtieth year He married, secondly, 23d May 1695, Henrietta, second daughter of Sir Edward Villiers, knight, sister of the first earl of Jersey, and of Elizabeth, countess of Orkney, the witty but plain-looking mistress of King William the Third By his second wife he had a son, John, third earl, and two daughters, Lady Charlotte and Lady Henrietta, who both died unmarried

John, third earl, born in 1696, was educated at the university of Oxford, and when very young he exhibited an unusual degree of talent as well as progress in his studies. In 1718, at the age of twenty-two, he was sent as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of Denmark He was invested with the order of the Bath at its revival, in 1725 At the general election of 1727 he was chosen member of parliament for the borough of Saltash in England, and in 1734 was re-elected In December 1731, he was appointed ambassador to Russia. In 1741 he was chosen to represent Oxford in parliament, and spoke frequently in the House of Commons in support of Sir Robert Walpole's measures On 14th May 1741, he was appointed one of the lords of the admiralty, but was removed from that board, 19th March 1742, on the dissolution of the Walpole administration In January 1746 he was nominated master of his majesty's jewel office In February 1752 he succeeded his father, and was elected a representative peer, 9th July of that year, in the room of the earl of Dunmore, deceased In 1761, he was appointed lord chief justice in eyre of all the royal forests south of the Trent, and he held that office till October 1765 He was constituted vice-admiral of Scotland, 26th October 1776 He died at Holyroodhouse, 26th January 1782, in his 86th year He married, first in 1721, Lady Amabella Grey, eldest daughter and coheir of Henry duke of Kent, K G, and by her—who died at Copenhagen in March 1727—he had a son, Henry, whose death took place a few weeks after his mother, and a daughter, Lady Jemima Campbell born 9th October 1723, who succeeded her grandfather the duke of Kent, as Baroness Lucas of Crudwell and Marchioness de Grey, 6th June, 1740 This lady married, 22d May of that year, Philip, second earl of Hardwicke and by him had two daughters The eldest Lady Amabella Yorke, who married Lord Polwarth, son of the third earl of Marchmont, succeeded her mother as Baroness Lucas in 1797, the title of Marchioness de Grey then becoming extinct Lord Breadalbane married, secondly, 23d January 1730 Arabella, third daughter and heiress of John Pershall, by Charlotte daughter of Thomas Lord Colepepper, by whom he had two sons George, born in January 1733 died at Moffat in April 1744, in the twelfth year of his age, and John, Lord Glenorchy, born in London 26th September 1738, died in the lifetime of his father, and without surviving issue, at Barnton, in the county of Edinburgh, an estate he had recently purchased 14th November, 1771, in the 34th year of his age He married at London, 26th September 1761, Wilhelmina, second and posthumous daughter and coheir of William Maxwell of Preston, a branch of the Nithsdale family, and had a son, who died in his infancy Of this lady, the celebrated Lady Glenorchy, a memoir is given under the head of CAMBELL Wilhelmina

The male line of the first peer having become extinct in 1782, on the death of the third earl, the clause in the patent in favour of heirs general transferred the peerage, and the vast estates belonging to it, to his kinsman, John Campbell born in 1762, eldest son of Colin Campbell of Carwhin, descended from Colin Campbell of Mochaster, (who died in October 1688,) second son of Sir Robert Campbell of Glenurchy The mother of the fourth earl and first marquis of Breadalbane, was Elizabeth, daughter of Archibald Campbell of Stonefield, sheriff of Argyleshire, and sister of John Campbell, judicially styled Lord Stonefield, a lord of session and justiciary He was educated at Westminster school, and afterwards resided for some time at Lausanne in Switzerland In 1784, he was elected one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, and was rechosen at all the subsequent elections, until he was created a peer of the United Kingdom in November 1806, by the title of Baron Breadalbane of Taymouth in the county of Perth, to himself and the heirs male of his body In 1793 he raised a fencible regiment, called the Breadalbane Fencibles, for the service of government. It was afterwards increased to four battalions One of these was in July 1795 enrolled, as the 116th regiment, in the regular service, his lordship being constituted its colonel He was one of the state counsellors of the prince of Wales for Scotland, and ranked as major-general in the army from 25th October 1809 In 1831, at the coronation of William the Fourth, he was created a marquis of the United Kingdom, under the title of marquis of Breadalbane and earl of Ormelie In public affairs he did not take a prominent or ostentatious part, his attention being chiefly devoted to the improvement of his extensive estates, great portions of which, being unfitted for cultivation, he laid out in plantations In 1809, he received the gold medal of the Society of Arts, for his success in planting forty-four acres of waste land, in the parish of Kenmore, with Scotch and larch firs, a species of rather precarious growth, and adapted only to peculiar soils In the magnificent improvements at Taymouth, his lordship displayed much taste and the park has been frequently described as one of the most extensive and beautiful in the kingdom He married, 2 September, 1793, Mary Turner, eldest daughter and coheiress of David Gavin, Esq of Langton, in the county of Berwick, by Lady Elizabeth Maitland, eldest surviving daughter of James, seventh earl of Lauderdale, and by her had two daughters and one son The elder daughter, Lady Elizabeth Maitland Campbell, married in 1831, Sir John Pringle of Stitchell, baronet, and the younger, Lady Mary Campbell, became in 1819 the wife of Richard, marquis of Chandos, who in 1839 became duke of Buckingham The marquis died, after a short illness, at Taymouth castle, on 29th March 1834, aged seventy two The whole of his personal estate, exceeding, it is said, £300,000, was directed by his will to accumulate for twenty years, at the end of which period it was to be laid out on estates to be added to the entailed property, but his settlement was partly set aside by the marquis of Chandos in right of his wife, who obtained an affirmance by the House of Peers of the decision of the Court of Session, declaring that the marchioness and her husband, in her right, were entitled to demand legitim

The marquis' only son, John Campbell, earl of Ormelie, born at Dundee, 26th October 1796, succeeded, on the death of his father, to the titles and estates He married, 23d November 1821, Eliza, eldest daughter of George Baillie, Esq of Jerviswood, without issue He represented Perthshire in the parliament of 1832 In 1834 he succeeded his father as 5th earl and 2d marquis of Breadalbane In 1838 he was made a knight of the Thistle, and in 1841 was elected Lord Rector of the university of Glasgow He was Lord-chamberlain of the household from July 1848 to Feb 1852, and again from Jan 1853 to Feb 1858 He was president of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and Lord-lieutenant of Argyleshire He died Nov 8, 1862, when the marquisate, with its secondary titles, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, became extinct, and he was succeeded in the Scotch titles by a distant kinsman, William John Lamb Campbell of Glenfalloch, Perthshire, born in 1790

BRECHIN, a surname derived from a lordship comprising the ancient town of that name in Forfarshire The word has been supposed to have been derived from the Scottish brachen or breckan, which signifies 'female fern,' but this seems not very probable, as that plant is by no means abundant in the neighbourhood Its similarity to the British name Brecknemoc or Brycheinog, Anglicised into Brecknock, or Brecon, (in ciently Aberhodni) the chief town of Brecknockshire, which Giraldus Cambrensis (1188) and even earlier authorities derive from Brackan, a regulus or prince of that country, who died about the year 450, renders it probable that it is likewise called after some individual of British or Cumbrian origin of that name Nor is it impossible that, being a town of great ecclesiastical antiquity, its round tower being one of the only two extant in Scotland, and not of later date than the sixth or seventh century, it may have originated in a church dedicated to the family of this Brackan, who, according to Giraldus, William de Worcester, and Leland, (as quoted by Sir Richard C Hoare in his annotations to the Itinerary of Archbishop Baldwin, by Giraldus, vol i p 61 London, 1806,) had twenty-four sons and as many daughters, who all embraced a religious life, and were the founders of numerous churches, and on that account the family of Brackan are stated in the Welsh Triads (idem, p 60) to have received the appellation of the holy family, and the highest of the three holy families of Britain on account of his (Brackan's) "bringing up his children and grandchildren in learning, so as to be able to show the faith in Christ to the Cumbrae or Cymri, where they were without faith" The names of his children are given by the authors in the quotations above referred to, and two of them, viz Saint Almeyda, Aled, or Elyned, a female saint who suffered martyrdom, not included in these lists, and Saint Canoc, who appears in one of them, have found places in the Roman calendar of saints It is singular, and may lend some probability to this conjecture, that the name of Iona appears in two of the lists referred to, as well as Ehe or Hehe, Maben, and other names still preserved in localities in Scotland connected with ecclesiastical sites

BRECHIN, lord of, a title possessed by a powerful family in the thirteenth century Henry de Brechin, natural son of David, earl of Huntingdon in England, earl of Garioch and Lord Brechin in Scotland, and brother of King William the Lion, obtained from his father the lordship of Brechin, whence he took his surname. He is witness to a charter of William the Lion to Malcolm, earl of Fife, in which he is designed, 'Henricus filius comitis David, patris mei' In a donation of his brother John, earl of Chester, to the canons of St. Andrews, he is designed, 'Henricus de Brechin, filius comitis David,' and a mortification by the same earl to the abbey of Aberbrothwick, is witnessed by 'Henrico de Brechin, fratri mei' By his wife, Julian, he had a son, Sir William de Brechin, who founded the Maison Dieu, or St Mary's Hospital, at Brechin, in 1256, and confirmed by James the Third in 1477, for the welfare of the souls of William and Alexander, kings of Scotland, John, earl of Chester and Huntingdon, his uncle, Henry his father, and Julian his mother, and of his own soul To the foundation charter, in which he designates himself 'Wilhelmus de Brechin, filius Henrici de Brechin, filius comitis David,' Albinus bishop of Brechin, Robert de Monte Alto, and several other persons of note, are witnesses With Alexander Stewart of Scotland and David de Graham, he is witness to a charter of David, bishop of St Andrews, to the monks of Paisley in 1247, in which he is styled 'Wilhelmo de Brechin, barone et milite' In 1254 he was arbitrator in a dispute between Peter de Maule, lord of Panmure, and Christina de Valonis, his wife, with the abbot of Aberbrothwick, about the marches of Aberbrothwick and Panmure, which Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan, justiciary of Scotland, had perambulated by the king's special command During the minority of Alexander the Third, he was one of the heads of the English party in Scotland, in opposition to the Comyns In 1255 he was one of the Magnates Scotiæ with whose counsel that monarch gave commission to the Earls of Menteith, Buchan, and Mar, to treat with the English On the 20th September of that year, he was appointed one of the regents of Scotland and guardians of the king and queen, during the king's minority At the parliament held at Scone 5th February 1283-4, he was among the nobles who became bound to acknowledge Margaret of Norway as the heir to the crown, in the event of the death of Alexander the Third without issue He appears to have died soon afterwards He married the fourth daughter of the above-named Alexander Comyn, earl of Buchan, constable and justiciary of Scotland, by whom he had a son, named David, who succeeded him

Sir David de Brechin was one of the Scottish barons who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296, and with others he was summoned to attend that monarch into France, but the same year was allowed to come to Scotland, upon giving his obligation to return to the service of King Edward In the struggle for independence under Bruce he fought on the English side, and took Sir Alexander Fraser prisoner at the battle of Methven in 1306 [Fœdera] In 1308 he was one of King Edward the Second's council, and received the circular letter which he addressed to the nobles in his interest, thanking them for past services and encouraging them to remain faithful to him He continued on the English side, with his relations the Comyns, till after the battle of Inverury, 22d May of that year, in which, with John Comyn, earl of Buchan, and Sir John Mowbray, he commanded the army opposed to Bruce, who gained a complete victory He then retired to his castle of Brechin, which he garrisoned, but being besieged, is said to have soon after made his peace with King Robert Before the close of the thirteenth century he appears to have married the sister of Robert Bruce, who was then in private life, by whom he had two sons, Sir David de Brechin, and Sir Thomas de Brechin, the latter of whom obtained from his father the lands of Lumquhat in Fife [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol i p 77], also a daughter, Mar-

The elder son, Sir David de Brechin, was called 'The Flower of Chivalry,' from his prowess in arms He distinguished himself against the Saracens in the Holy Land, whither he went when very young He was one of the barons who signed the bold letter to the Pope, 6th April 1320, in behalf of Robert Bruce and the independence of Scotland But the same year he was made privy to the conspiracy of William de Soulis, the countess of Strathern, and others, against the king his uncle, and for not discovering it, he was tried in a parliament held at Scone, in August 1320, called 'the Black Parliament,' and sentenced to the death of a traitor He was accordingly executed, with three others His fate was much deplored, being, says Buchanan, 'omnium etatis suæ juvenum et belli et pacis artibus longè primus' Historians generally have spoken of him as being unjustly put to death, as, although aware of the plot against the life of the king, he entirely disapproved of it, and notwithstanding the plausible reasons to the contrary given by Tytler—who suffers nothing to the discredit of his hero Bruce to pass uncontested—such will probably continue to be the verdict of posterity "There is evidence in the records of the Tower," says Tytler, "that both Soulis and Brechin had long tampered with England, and been rewarded for their services In the case of Brechin we find him enjoying special letters of protection from Edward In addition to these he was pensioned in 1312, was appointed English warden of the town and castle of Dundee, and employed in secret and confidential communications, having for their object the destruction of his uncle's power in Scotland, and the triumph of the English arms over his native country It is certain that he was a prisoner of war in Scotland in the year 1315, having probably been taken in arms at the battle of Bannockburn In the five years of glory and success which followed, and in the repeated expeditions of Randolph and Douglas, we do not once meet with his name, and now, after having been received into favour, he became connected with, or at least connived at, a conspiracy which involved the death of the king Such a delinquent is little entitled to our sympathy There was not a single favourable circumstance in his case, but he was young and brave, he had fought against the infidels, and the people could not see him suffer without pity and regret" [History of Scotland, v 1 p 371] It is true, as he says, that the name of Sir David de Brechin appears in connection with the English interest during many previous years, but besides that the same occurs with many of the highest of the Scottish nobility, including Randolph the nephew and afterwards the best commander of Bruce, there is no evidence that this individual was not Sir David the father rather than Sir David the son There is no evidence that the father made his peace with Robert previous to 1312, when a Sir David de Brechin was appointed joint warden with William de Montfichet, in the English interest, of the town and castle of Dundee, nor even in 1315, when a person of that name was a prisoner of war in Scotland If the unfortunate sufferer was, as Buchanan states and Tytler confirms, young and brave when he died in 1320 and had passed many years of his life in fighting against the Saracens, his absence from the expeditions of Randolph and Douglas may be easily accounted for A reason for his death, which was not likely to occur to Tytler, however, was the fact that, both by the male and female line, he was nearer to the throne than Bruce himself, and as the object of the conspiracy was to place Soulis on the throne, instead of Bruce, the latter was not likely to allow any ordinary scruple to interfere with the opportunity of relieving himself of an accomplished gentleman and popular warrior, who might himself prove a dangerous rival Sir David's lands were all given by the king to David de Barclay, the husband of Sir David's daughter, Margaret de Brechin, and to Maria, wife of Malise de Strathern His brother, Thomas de Brechin, was involved in his forfeiture, he also having been privy to the conspiracy, and his lands of Lumquhat in Fife were bestowed on John Ramsay

Of the BARCLAYS, lords of Brechin, an account has already been given, under the head BARCLAY, see ante, pp 240, 241 The lordship of Brechin was annexed to the crown in 1437

BREWSTER, surname of, see SUPPLEMENT

BRISBANE, or BIRSBANE, a surname belonging to an ancient family which appears to have possessed Bishoptoun in Renfrewshire, holding of the lordship of Erskine, with lands in the counties of Stirling and Ayr, long prior to the date of any charters they have preserved, and now represented by the line of Brisbane of Brisbane in Ayrshire, and Mackerstoun in Roxburghshire. One of the earliest of the family known in history is supposed to have been William Brisbane, who, in 1332, was chancellor of Scotland [Hailes' Annals] In Brisbane house in the parish of Largs, Ayrshire, is preserved an old oaken chair, with the date 1357 and the arms and initials of the family carved on the back The arms are three cushions or woolsacks, which should seem to have been adopted from the office of chancellor But if Crawford be correct in his History of Renfrewshire, where he mentions Bishoptoun as 'the ancient inheritance of the Brisbanes, the chief of that name,' in his reference to 'Allanus de Brysbane filius Wlielhelmi de Brysbane,' who obtained, shortly after 1334, from Donald earl of Lennox, a grant of the lands of Macherach and Holmedalmartyne in Stirlingshire, there were Brisbanes of Brisbane even before the time of this chancellor Thomas and Alexander Brisbane, brothers, are witnesses to a charter, granted 9th September 1361, by Thomas earl of Mar, and confirmed by King David the Second Thomas Brisbane is witness to a charter by Robert duke of Albany, dated at Perth, 22d September 1409 Previous to that year the family had acquired the ten pound land of Killincraig and Gogo in the parish of Largs To these, several other lands that belonged to the archbishop of Glasgow and the abbey of Paisley, were afterwards added, and in 1595 the estate of Largs was erected into the barony of Gogoside, and the town into a burgh of barony called the Newton of Gogo In 1650, this barony, with the lands of Noddesdale and others, was erected into the barony of Noddesdale Soon after, having acquired the property of Over Kelsoland, which had for a long period belonged to the family of Kelso, the whole estate was, in 1696 by a crown charter erected into the barony of Brisbane, which thenceforth became the usual territorial designation of the family

Mathew Brisbane of Bishoptoun, the fifth proprietor of Bishoptoun in a direct descent, fell at Flodden 9th September 1513, and was succeeded by his brother, John Brisbane, whose son, also named John, was slain at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547 His son John Brisbane of Bishoptoun, on November 9, 1555, with Thomas Brisbane his servant, William Brisbane, servant of Lord Sempill, and six others, found John Lord Erskine, his superior in the lands of Bishoptoun, as surety on bail for their appearance, to take their trial at the next assizes at Renfrew, for "hamesucken at the monastery of Paisley,' and mutilating John Hamilton of his arm Robert Brisbane of Bishoptoun married, in 1562, Janette, daughter of James Stewart of Ardgowan and Blackhall, a neighbouring fam-

fly descended from King Robert the Third, and died in 1610 His elder son, John Brisbane of Bishoptoun, who succeeded him, and died in 1635, married, first, Anna, daughter of the laird of Blair, and, secondly, a daughter of Lord Sempill His eldest son, John Brisbane of Brisbane, had a son, John, who died before his father, without male issue, on which he entered into a contract of marriage, 26th June 1657, between Elizabeth, his eldest daughter and his nephew James Shaw of the Shaws of Ballygelhe in Ireland, by which the estate was settled on the heirs male of that marriage, James Shaw assuming the name and arms of Brisbane On the death of his father in law, Mr Shaw accordingly became James Brisbane of Brisbane In 1671 he acquired the lands of Over Kelsoland already mentioned, now forming part of the estate of Brisbane, and about the same period he disposed of the estate of Bishoptoun to different people, to be held in feu of himself and his heirs There is a letter of remission to this James Brisbane, from James the Seventh of Scotland, dated 26th February, 1686, for fines imposed on him for any irregularity committed by his wife in attending conventicles He had issue John, his heir, two other sons, and a daughter

John Brisbane of Brisbane, the eldest son, married Margaret, daughter of Sir Archibald Stewart of Blackhall, and had two sons and four daughters James, his heir and successor, died without issue Thomas, his second son, married, in 1715, Isabel, daughter of Sir Thomas Nicolson of Ladykirk, by whom he had two sons, of whom John the second son, entered the navy, and distinguished himself in the American war He attained the rank of admiral, and died in 1807 He married a daughter of Admiral Young, and besides daughters, had several sons John Douglas, the eldest, was drowned on board of one of the French prizes, after Rodney's action in 1782 Thomas-Stewart Brisbane rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army, and was killed at St Domingo, in 1795 while commanding a corps with great distinction A third son, William Henry Brisbane, a naval captain, was poisoned by the French prisoners at Gibraltar in 1796 A fourth son Sir Charles Brisbane, entered the navy under the auspices of his father, with whom he served in Sir George Rodney's fleet, and was wounded in the memorable engagement of the 12th April 1782 He served with distinction under Hood and Nelson in 1794-5 He was made lieutenant in 1798, commander in 1795, and post-captain in 1796 On his own responsibility, having a squadron under his command sent to reconnoitre the Dutch island of Curaçoa in the West Indies, and to ascertain the disposition of the inhabitants, he assaulted it, and carried it by coup de main, on the 1st January 1807 being himself the first to scale the walls of Fort Amsterdam For this gallant exploit he received the gold medal, and was knighted He was nominated knight of the Bath in 1815, and advanced to the rank of rear admiral in 1819 This gallant officer died in 1829, leaving by his wife, daughter of Sir James Pate'y, two sons, one in the army and another in the navy, besides two daughters Sir James Brisbane, youngest son of Admiral John Brisbane above mentioned, was also a gallant naval officer who attained the rank of admiral By his wife, only daughter of John Ventham, Esq he left one son, James Stewart, a commander R N, and two daughters Admiral John Brisbane had also six daughters, five of whom were married The third, Mary, was the mother of Lord Corehouse, and of the wives of Dugald Stewart and Cuninghame of Lainshaw, and of Count Purgstall in Styria The fourth, Helen, became the lady of Sir Charles Douglas, a distinguished admiral

Thomas, eldest son of Thomas the second son of John Brisbane of Brisbane, and elder brother of Admiral John above mentioned, succeeded his uncle James in the family estates, and was served heir to him on the 15th September, 1770 He married Eleanora, daughter of Sir Michael Bruce of Stenhouse, baronet, and had with a daughter, Mary, two sons, viz, Thomas, his successor, and Michael, who went out to India, and died there in the service of the Honourable East India Company

Sir Thomas Makdougall Brisbane, a general in the army succeeded his father on his death in 1812, and in 1819 he married Anna Maria, only daughter of Sir Henry Hay Makdougall baronet of Makerstoun, Roxburghshire, a kinsman of Sir Walter Scott, and representative of one of the most ancient families in Scotland, and on his death he succeeded, in right of his wife, to his extensive and valuable domains, when he assumed the name of Makdougall before his own, being authorized by sign manual, dated 14th August 1826 This distinguished officer and astronomer entered the army as an ensign in 1790, when he joined the 38th regiment in Ireland, where he remained till the breaking out of the war in 1793, when he was promoted to a captaincy in the 53d In the spring of that year he proceeded with his regiment to Flanders, and was present with it in all the duke of York's campaigns, at the storming of the French entrenched camp at Famars, the sieges of Valenciennes, Dunkirk, Nieuport, Nimeguen, and the sorties from that fortress, also, in the actions of Aswin, Premont, Chateau Cambresis, &c, and in that of Tournay, where he was wounded, as well as in the affairs of Boxtel, Buren, Culemburg, and Gilder-Matrin In the spring of 1795, he returned to England with his regiment, in which he obtained a majority by purchase, and embarked in the expedition under Sir Ralph Abercrombie for the West Indies In 1796 he served at the reduction of St Lucia, the siege and sortie of Morne Fortune, and the affairs of Chabot Castries, and Vigie, also in the reduction of the island of St Vincent and in the whole of the Carib war In 1797 he was at the taking of the island of Trinidad, and commanded his regiment at the siege of Porto Rico In 1800 he became, by purchase, lieutenant-colonel of his regiment, and in 1801 he joined it in Jamaica, and commanded it till its return to England in 1805 On its being ordered to India, he, under medical advice, as labouring under a severe liver complaint, and being unable to effect an exchange into the guards or cavalry, was compelled for a time to retire on half pay After serving two years as adjutant general in the Kent district, he embarked for the Peninsula in 1812, and thenceforth he commanded a brigade in the duke of Wellington's army taking part in almost all the battles fought in Spain, the Pyrenees, and the south of France He had a cross and one clasp for Vittoria, Pyrenees Nivelle, Orthes, and Toulouse, where he was again wounded In 1813 he received the thanks of parliament for his gallant conduct in the field of Orthes The next year he went with the detachment of the Peninsular army that was ordered to North America, and commanded a brigade at the affairs of Plattsburg, Richlieu, &c In 1815 he obtained the grand cross of the Bath, while still serving in America On the return of the Emperor Napoleon from Elba in March of that year, Sir Thomas was recalled, and after the battle of Waterloo joined the army in Paris with twelve brigades, comprising nearly ten thousand men, which on being reviewed, drew from the duke of Wellington the exclamation 'Had I had these regiments at Waterloo, I should not have wanted the Prussians" Sir Thomas Brisbane remained in France during the whole period that the Allies occupied the French soil, and in the interim was unanimously elected corresponding member of the Institute of France In 1820 he was appointed to the staff in Ireland, and he commanded the Munster district until the end of that year, when he was appointed governor of New South Wales, on this occasion he was presented with the freedom of the city of Cork In 1824 he received the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Edinburgh At the close of 1825 he returned from New South Wales, and in the following year he was appointed by the duke of York colonel of the 34th regiment In 1828 he was awarded a gold medal by the Royal Astronomical Society, for the services he had rendered to science, and for having founded an observatory in New South Wales, which has since been adopted by the government, and is now in active operation In 1831 he became a knight grand cross of the Guelphs of Hanover In 1832 he received the honorary degree of doctor of civil law from the university of Oxford, and the same year was elected president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh In 1833 he received the degree of A M at Cambridge when he was nominated president of the British Association for the following year In 1836 Sir Thomas was created a baronet of the United Kingdom, and in 1837 he received the grand cross of the order of the Bath In 1841 he became a general in the army He was also a fellow of the Royal Society of London Died 27th January 1860, succeeded by his nephew the son of Admiral Brisbane

BRODIE, a surname belonging to an ancient family in the county of Elgin, the first of which was one Michael, son of Malcolm, thane of Brothie and Dyke in the reign of Alexander the Third This Michael, in 1311, had a charter of the lands of Brodie from King Robert Bruce, as his father's heir, and from the lands took the surname In ancient writings the name is called Brothie, afterwards softened into Brodie In the Gaelic the word Broth signifies a ditch or mire, the same as dyke in Saxon and digue in French, and the parish in which the lands of Brodie are principally situated is named Dyke Shaw in his History of the Province of Moray, (p 146, edition 1827,) says "The mire, trench or ditch that runneth from the village of Dyke to the north of Brodie-house seemeth to have given this place the name of Brodie Be this as it will, the antiquity of this name appeareth from this that no history, record, or tradition (that I know of) doth so much as hint that any other family or name possessed the lands of Brodie before them, or that they came as strangers from another country I incline much to think that they were originally of the ancient Moravienses, and were one of those loyal tribes, to whom King Malcolm the Fourth gave lands about the year 1160, when he transplanted the Moray rebels At that time surnames were fixed, and the MacIntoshes, Inneses, Rosses, then assumed their names, and probably so did the Brodies, and their arms being the same with those of the Morays showeth that they were originally the same people" In Austrian Galicia is a town of the name of Brody, probably from some peculiarity in its site similar to that of the estate of Brodie in the parish of Dyke, in Moray

The old writings of the family of Brodie of Brodie were either carried away or destroyed by Lord Lewis Gordon (third marquis of Huntly), when he burnt Brodie house in 1645 The family, however, can be traced back for five hundred years John de Brothie is mentioned in the Chartulary of Moray, 11th October 1380, as in attendance on the earl of Mar, lieutenant of the north, about the year 1376 Thomas de Brothie also appears in the Chartulary of Moray, with his two sons, John and Alexander, in a negotiation regarding the vicarage of Dyke, 4th December 1386 His younger son was vicar of Dyke Alexander Brothie of Brothie was chief of the jury who served William Sutherland heir to Duffus, and was summoned before the lords of council to answer for his verdict, 26th January 1484 He died in 1491 John of Brodie is repeatedly mentioned in the Chartulary of Moray as an arbiter in 1492 He assisted the Mackenzies against the Macdonalds at the battle of Blair-na-park in 1466, and is witness in an indenture between the thane of Calder and the baron of Kilravock in 1482 His great grandson, Alexander Brodie of Brodie, John Hay, son of the laird of Park, and one hundred and twenty-five other persons were, in November 1550, denounced rebels for not submitting to the law, for 'umbesetting' the way of Alexander Cumming of Alter (Altyre,) and his servants, and for the cruel mutilation of one of them His eldest son, David Brodie of Brodie, had a charter from his brother George, of the dominical lands of Brodie, 29th May, 1596, and his estate was erected into the barony of Brodie, 22d July 1597 According to the diary of his grandson, afterwards mentioned, he was born in 1553, and died in May 1626, aged seventy-four He had six sons and one daughter, of whom an account is given in Shaw's 'History of Moray' Alexander, the second son, purchased the lands of Lethen, Pitgavenie, and Kinloss in the counties of Nairn and Moray, and was ancestor of the Brodies of Lethen and Coulmony, now represented by Mr James Campbell Brodie

His eldest son, also David Brodie of Brodie, was born in 1586, and died 22d September, 1652 He married a niece by the mother's side of the admirable Crichton Alexander Brodie of Brodie, the eldest son of this marriage, styled Lord Brodie as a senator of the College of Justice, born 25th July 1617, sent to England, 1628, and succeeded to the estate in 1632, was a man of extraordinary piety, learning, and ability His diary, containing the record of his religious experience, gives a curious account of his life, and illustrates some parts of the history of the times in which he lived Extracts from it were published in 1740 He represented the county of Elgin in the parliaments of 1643 and following years, and from the many parliamentary committees of which he was a member, he appears to have been greatly in the confidence of the estates In March 1649 he accompanied Mr George Winram, advocate, afterwards a lord of session under the judicial title of Lord Libberton, to Holland, when he went with the commissioners from parliament appointed to treat with Charles the Second, and was appointed an ordinary lord of session on 22d June of that year He accepted the situation, and gave his oath de fideli administratione in presence of parliament, on the 23d July, but did not take his seat on the bench till 1st November 1649 Shortly afterwards he proceeded to Breda to arrange with Charles the Second as to the conditions of his return to Scotland He was a member of the various committees of estates, appointed to rule in Scotland during the intervals of parliament, and Commissary-general to the army in October 1650 In June 1653, he was cited to London by Cromwell to treat of a union between the two kingdoms, but according to the words of his own diary, "resolved and determined in the strength of the Lord, to eschew and avoid employment under Cromwell" He accordingly resisted all the requests made to him, to accept of office as a commissioner for the administration of justice, until after the death of the Protector, but shortly after that event he took his seat on the bench on the 3d December 1658 After the restoration he was fined £4,800 Scots, although the monies disbursed by him at Breda had not been yet repaid He died in 1679, having married a daughter of Sir Robert Innes, by whom he had a son, James, and a daughter, Grizel

mentioned, and next brother of Lord Brodie, called "of Aslisk," had, by a daughter of Dundas of Duddingstone, two sons who survived him, George, who afterwards succeeded to the estate of Brodie, and James of Whitehall, who purchased Coltfield and Spynie The latter married, in 1698, his cousin, Margaret, the sixth daughter and co-heiress of James Brodie of Brodie, and had a son, James Brodie of Spynie, advocate, and sheriff-depute of Moray and Nairn (died in 1756), who wedded Emilia Brodie, and had (with three daughters) three sons, namely, James, who inherited Brodie, upon the death of his cousin Alexander in 1759, George, a colonel in the army, and Alexander, who made a large fortune at Madras and bought Arnhall in Kincardineshire By his wife, Elizabeth Margaret, daughter of the Hon James Wemyss of Wemyss castle, the latter had an only daughter and heiress, Elizabeth, married in 1813 to George, fifth and last duke of Gordon, who died in 1836

James Brodie of Brodie, son of Lord Brodie, born 15th September 1637, succeeded in 1679 He took to wife Lady Mary Ker, sister of Robert, first marquis of Lothian The event is thus recorded in Lord Brodie's diary, "28th July, My son was married with Lady Mary Ker, and on the 31st July 1659, she did subscribe her covenant to and with God, and became his, and gave herself up to him" In 1685 the laird of Brodie was fined £24,000 He died in March 1708 He had nine daughters, viz Ann, married to Lord Forbes, Catherine, to her cousin, Robert Dunbar of Grangehill, Elizabeth, to Cumming of Altyre, Grizel, to Dunbar of Dunphail, Emilia, to Brodie of Aslisk, Margaret, to his brother, Brodie of Whitehill, Vere, to Brodie of Muirhouse, Mary, to Chivez of Muirtown, and Henrietta died unmarried Having no son, he was succeeded by his cousin-german, George Brodie, (son of Joseph Brodie of Aslisk,) already mentioned, who married Emilia, fifth daughter and coheiress of his predecessor, James Brodie of Brodie By her he had three sons and two daughters, and died in 1716 Of the daughters, Henrietta, the elder, married, in 1714, John Sinclair of Ulbster in Caithness, grandfather of the late Right Hon Sir John Sinclair, baronet, Ann, the younger, became the wife of George Monro of Novar in Ross-shire James Brodie of Brodie, the eldest son, died young in 1720, and was succeeded by his brother, Alexander Brodie of Brodie, born 17th August 1697, appointed lord lyon king at arms in 1727, and died in 1754 By his wife, Mary Sleigh, daughter of Major Sleigh, celebrated as well as himself in various sonnets of Allan Ramsay, he had an only son, Alexander, and a daughter, Emilia, married to John Macleod, younger of Macleod

Alexander Brodie of Brodie, son of the foregoing, dying unmarried in 1759, was succeeded by his second cousin, James Brodie of Brodie, son of James Brodie of Spynie above mentioned He married Lady Margaret Duff, youngest daughter of William, first earl of Fife, by whom he had two sons and three daughters His wife was unfortunately burnt to death at Brodie house, 24th April 1786, and he himself died 17th January 1824 He was a man of considerable talent and scientific acquirements He especially distinguished himself as a botanist, and added a number of plants to the British Flora. His elder son James, was in the civil service of the East India Company at Madras, and by the upsetting of his coat in the surge along the shore, was drowned in his father's lifetime, leaving, by Ann, his wife, daughter of Colonel Story (who married, secondly, Lieut-General Sir Thomas Bowser, K C B), two sons and five daughters William Brodie of Brodie, the eldest, succeeded his grandfather, and became the representative of one of the most ancient families in Europe George, the second, in the Madras cavalry, died in 1826 Four of the daughters married gentlemen of rank in the East India Company's service during the lifetime of their father, and the eldest died in that country, unmarried, in the same year with himself

The celebrated surgeon, Sir Benjamin Collins Brodie, serjeant surgeon to the queen, is descended from a younger branch of this ancient family, which settled in England about the beginning of the last century

BROUN, or BROWN, a surname common in Scotland, as Browne is in England and Ireland, the same as Brun or Brune in France In its first form there is an ancient family, the Brouns of Colstoun, in the county of Haddington, a younger branch of which enjoys a baronetcy, and according to tradition, was founded soon after the Conquest, by a French warrior, bearing the arms of the then royal family of France, with which he claimed alliance In the roll of Battle Abbey there is a knight named Brone among the Norman adventurers who accompanied William the Conqueror into England, but whether this be the ancestor of any of the innumerable families of the name of Brown in this country, it is impossible to say The name, doubtless, in ancient times was bestowed, in some instances, from the colour or complexion of those who adopted it as a surname

Early in the twelfth century one Walterus le Brun is found flourishing in Scotland He was one of the barons who witnessed the inquisition of the possessions of the church of Glasgow made by Earl David in 1116, in the reign of his brother, Alexander the First

Sir David le Brun was one of the witnesses, with King David the First, in laying the foundation of the abbey of Holyroodhouse, 13th May 1128

> 'A thowsand a hundyr and twenty yhere,
> And awcht to thai, to rekyne clere, > Foundyd wes the Halyrwd hows,
> Ira thine to be relygyows'
> Wyntoun

He devised to that abbacy "lands and acres in territories de Colstoun," for prayers to be said for "the soul of Alexander and the health of his son" Thomas de Broun is witness to a charter by Roger de Moubray to the predecessor of the lairds of Moncrieff, in the time of King Alexander the Second

The name of Ralph de Broun appears in the Ragman Roll as that of one of the barons of Scotland who swore fealty to Edward the First at Berwick, in 1296

Richard de Broun, keeper of the king's peace in Cumberland, was forfeited in the Black parliament in 1320 He is styled an esquire, and was beheaded, with Sir David de Brechin and two other knights, Sir Gilbert de Malherbe and Sir John Logie, for being concerned in the conspiracy of de Soulis that year (See BREICHIN, lord of, ante, p 383)

From King David the Second, the family of Colstoun received a charter, "Johanni Broun filio David Broun de Colstoun"

William Broun, baron of Colstoun, in the reign of James the First, married Margaret de Annand, co-heiress of the barony of Sauchie, descended from the ancient lords of Annandale

Sir William Broun of Colstoun, warden of the west marches, commanded a party of Scots in a battle fought on what was anciently a moor in the parish of Dornock, Dumfries-shire, against a party of English, led by Sir Marmaduke Langdale and Lord Crosby, when the English were defeated, and both their commanders slain So sanguinary was the conflict that, according to tradition, a spring-well on the spot, still called Sword well, ran blood for three days

Towards the end of the fifteenth century William Broun of Colstoun was lord director of the court of chancery in Scotland

With other Haddingtonshire barons, the Brouns of Colstoun appear to have favoured the Homes, as on April 6, 1529, precepts of remission were granted to Mr William Broun, tutor of Colstoun, and four others, and to George Fawside of that ilk, for their treasonably assisting George, Lord Home and the deceased David Home of Wedderburn, his brothers and accomplices, being the king's rebels and at his horn

George Broun of Colstoun, who lived in the beginning of the seventeenth century, married Jean Hay, second daughter of Lord Yester, ancestor of the Marquis of Tweeddale The dowry of this lady consisted of the famous "Colstoun pear," which Hugo de Gifford of Yester, her remote ancestor, famed for his necromantic powers, described in Marmion, and who died in 1267, was supposed to have invested with the extraordinary virtue of conferring unfailing prosperity on the family which possessed it Lord Yester, in giving away his daughter, is said to have informed his son-in-law that good as the lass might be her dowry was much better, because while she could only have value in her own generation, the pear, so long as it continued in the family, would cause it to flourish to the end of time Accordingly, the pear has been carefully preserved, in a silver box, as a sacred palladium About the seventeenth century, the lady of one of the lairds of Colstoun, on becoming pregnant, felt a longing for the forbidden fruit, and took a bite of it Another version of the story says that it was a maiden lady of the family who, out of curiosity, chose to try her teeth upon it Very soon after two of the best farms on the estate were lost in some litigation, while the pear itself straightway became stone-hard, and so remains to this day, with the marks of the lady's teeth indelibly imprinted on it The origin of this wondrous pear is, by another tradition, said to have been thus —One of the ancestors of the Colstoun family married a daughter of the above-named Hugo of Yester, the renowned warlock of Gifford, and as the bridal party were proceeding to the church, the wizard lord stopped beneath a pear tree, and plucking one of the pears, handed it to his daughter, telling her that he had no dowry to give her, but that as long as that gift was kept, good fortune would never desert her or her descendants Apart from the superstition attached to it, this curious heirloom is certainly a most wonderful vegetable curiosity, having existed for nearly six centuries

George Broun, baron of Colstoun, in the reign of Charles the First, married a daughter of Sir David Murray of Stanhope, and had, with a younger son, George (ancestor of the present baronet of Colstoun) to whom he granted by charter the barony of Thornydyke, in Berwickshire, an elder son, Sir Patrick Broun of Colstoun, who, in consequence of his eminent services and the fidelity of the ancient family he represented, was created a knight and baronet of Nova Scotia, 16th February 1686, with remainder of the title to his heirs male for ever Sir George Broun, the second baronet, his son, married a daughter of the first earl of Cromarty, and died in 1718, leaving an only daughter, who inherited the estate, while the baronetcy went to the heir male The family thus became split betwixt the heirs male and the heirs of line, the title devolving upon the Thornydyke branch, and the estates upon an heiress, who married George Broun of Eastfield, from whom descended George Broun of Colstoun judicially styled Lord Colstoun, who became a lord of session in 1756 and died in 1776, and the late Christian, countess of Dalhousie, only child and heiress of Charles Broun, Esq of Colstoun, and died 22d February 1839 The present marquis of Dalhousie (James Andrew Broun-Ramsay) in right of his mother, is the representative of the elder branch

Sir George Broun, son of Alexander Broun of Thornydyke castle and Bassendean, Berwickshire, and of a lady of the ancient house of Swinton of Swinton, succeeded his cousin as third baronet, and dying without male issue, his brother, Sir Alexander, became fourth baronet He married Beatrice, daughter of Alexander Swinton, Lord Mersington, and died in 1750 His son, Sir Alexander, fifth baronet, having died in 1775, without male issue, the baronetcy devolved upon his cousin, the Rev Sir Alexander Broun, minister of Lochmaben, who declined to take up the title He married Robina, daughter of Colonel Hugh M'Bride of Beadland, Ayrshire, and died in 1782 With several daughters he had two sons, viz, James, who, in 1825, revived the title, and William, of Newmains, who married and settled in the island of Guernsey, where his descendants are still to be found

Sir James, the seventh baronet, left a family of four sons and two daughters at his death, 30th Nov 1844 His eldest son, Sir Richard Broun, eighth baronet, a knight commander of the order of St John of Jerusalem, was secretary of the Langue of that order in England, and also to the Committee of Baronets for Privileges He was also secretary of the Central Agricultural Society, and the author of various works on heraldry, colonization, railway extension, &c Born in 1801, he died unmarried in Dec 1858 Before succeeding to the baronetcy he endeavoured to establish the right of the eldest sons of baronets to the title of knight, and in 1842 assumed the title of "Sir" His brother Sir William, a solicitor in Dumfries, became ninth baronet

BROWN, JAMES, an eminent linguist and traveller, the son of James Brown, M D, was born at Kelso, in the county of Roxburgh, May 23, 1709 He was educated under the Rev Dr Robert Friend at Westminster School, where he was well instructed in the classics In the end of 1722 he went with his father to Constantinople, and having a great natural aptitude for the acquirement of languages, he obtained a thorough knowledge of the Turkish and Italian, as well as the modern Greek In 1725 he returned home, and made himself master of the Spanish language About the year 1732 he first started the idea of a London Directory, or list of principal traders in the metropolis, with their addresses Having laid the foundation of this useful work, he gave it to Mr Henry Kent, a printer in Finch Lane, Cornhill, who, continuing it yearly, made a fortune by it

In July 1741 he entered into an agreement with twenty-four of the principal merchants of London, members of the Russian Company, of which Sir John Thompson was then governor, to go to Persia, to carry on a trade through Russia, as their chief agent or factor On 29th September of the same year he sailed for Riga, whence he passed through Russia, and proceeding down the Volga to Astracan, voyaged along the Caspian Sea to Reshd in Persia, where he established a factory He continued in that country nearly four years, and, upon one occasion, went in state to the camp of Nadir Shah, better known by the name of Kouli Khan, to deliver a letter to that chief from George the Second While he resided in Persia, he applied himself to the study of the Persian language, and made such proficiency in it, that, after his return home, he compiled a very copious Persian Dictionary and Grammar, with many curious specimens of the Persian mode of writing, which he left behind him in manuscript

Dissatisfied with the conduct of the Russian Company in London, and sensible of the dangers to which the factory was constantly exposed from the unsettled and tyrannical nature of the Persian government, he resigned his charge, and returned to England on Christmas-day 1746 In the following year the factory was plundered of property to the amount of eighty thousand pounds sterling, which led to a final termination of the Persian trade The writer of his obituary in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for December 1788, says, that he possessed the strictest integrity, unaffected piety, and exalted but unostentatious benevolence, with an even, placid, and cheerful temper In May 1787 he was visited with a slight paralytic stroke, but soon recovered his wonted health and vigour Four days before his death, he was attacked by a much severer stroke, which deprived him, by degrees, of all his faculties, and he expired without a groan, November 30, 1788, at his house at Stoke Newington, Middlesex Mr Lysons, in his 'Environs,' vol iii, states, that Mr Brown's father, who died in 1733, published anonymously a translation of two 'Orations of Isocrates

BROWN, JOHN, author of the 'Self-Interpreting Bible,' the son of a weaver, was born in 1722, in the small village of Carpow, county of Perth His parents dying before he was twelve years of age, it was with some difficulty that he acquired his education "I was left," he says, "a poor orphan, and had nothing to depend on but the providence of God" He was but a very limited time at school "One month," he says himself, "without his parents' allowance, he bestowed upon Latin" Nevertheless, by his own intense application to study, before he was twenty years of age, he had obtained an intimate knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, with the last of which he was critically conversant He was also acquainted with the French, Italian, German, Arabic, Persian, Syriac, and Ethiopic His great acquisition of knowledge, without the assistance of a teacher, appeared so wonderful to the ignorant country people, that a report was circulated far and wide that young Brown had acquired his learning in a sinful way, that is, by intercourse with Satan! In early youth he was employed as a shepherd He afterwards undertook the occupation of pedlar or travelling merchant In 1747 he established himself in a school at Gannay Bridge, in the neighbourhood of Kinross, a place celebrated as the spot where the Associate Presbytery was first constituted The same school was afterwards taught by Michael Bruce the poet Here Brown remained two years He subsequently taught for a year and a half another school at Spital, near Linton Having attached himself to the body who, in 1733, seceded from the Church of Scotland, in 1748 he entered on the regular study of philosophy and divinity in connection with the Associate Synod In 1750 he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Associate Presbytery of Edinburgh, at Dalkeith, and soon after received a call from the Secession congregation at Stow, also one nearly at the same time from Haddington He chose the latter, and was ordained pastor of the Haddington congregation 4th July 1751 In 1758 he published an 'Essay towards an Easy Explication of the Catechisms,' intended for the use of the young, and in 1765 his 'Christian Journal,' once the most popular of all his works In 1768 he was elected professor of divinity under the Associate Synod This situation he held for twenty years His 'Self-Interpreting Bible,' by which his name is best known, appeared in two quarto volumes in 1778 Of this popular and useful work numerous stereotyped editions have appeared both in Scotland and England, each having very extensive circulation, and each successively improved in form or arrangement A recent one, with the additions of his grandson, J B Patterson, surpasses all previous ones in form, type, and illus trations His piety and learning, and fame as an author, made his name extensively known, not only in Scotland, but in England and America, and in 1784 he received a pressing invitation from the Reformed Dutch Church in New York, to be their tutor in divinity, which he declined He died at Haddington June 19, 1787 He was twice married, and had six sons and one daughter The sons were 1 John, for many years Burgher minister at Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, a memoir of whom is given below 2 Ebenezer, Burgher minister at Inverkeithing, whose apostolic look and person and mode of preaching, are mentioned as most remarkable 3 Thomas Brown, D D, Burgher minister at Dalkeith, and author of an octavo volume of sermons 4 Samuel, merchant, Haddington, the founder of itinerating libraries He was the father of Dr Samuel Brown, an eminent chemist, who died young in 1856 5 David, bookseller in Edinburgh 6 Dr William Brown, of Duddingstone, long the secretary of the Scottish Missionary Society, and the author of a 'History of Missions,' and of a memoir of his father The only daughter, Mrs Patterson, was the mother of two sons and a daughter The elder son, the Rev John Brown Patterson, minister of Falkirk, styled by Lord Cockburn "Athenian Patterson," died in his early prime He was the author of the memoir of his grandfather, prefixed to Fullarton's edition of his 'Self-Interpreting Bible' The younger son, Alexander Simpson Patterson, D D, minister of Free Hutchesontown Church, Glasgow, and the author of several theological works, is editor of an edition published in 1858, of his brother's fine characteristic posthumous work on our Lord's Farewell Discourse

BROWN, JOHN, a pious and useful divine, eldest son of the preceding, by his first wife, Janet Thomson, daughter of Mr John Thomson, merchant, Musselburgh, was born at Haddington, 24th July, 1754 From his youth he gave decided indications of piety He was sent to the university of Edinburgh, when he was scarcely fourteen years of age, and about the year 1772 he entered on the study of divinity, under the superintendence of his father He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Associate presbytery of Burghers at Edinburgh, 21st May 1776 Soon after, he received a call from the Burgher congregation of Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, and was ordained to that charge, 22d May 1777 During a long career of ministerial usefulness, he maintained a high degree of popularity, his preaching being characterized by the simplicity and seriousness of his manner, and by the highly evangelical tone of his sentiments He exerted himself in promoting the various religious institutions of the day, and took a deep interest especially in the spiritual improvement of the Highlanders of Perthshire

When his strength began to decline, his people gave a call to Mr William Millar, to be his colleague and successor, and he was accordingly ordained as such 15th November 1831 After the ordination, Mr Brown preached only eight Sabbaths He was seized with a severe paralytic attack, and after lingering for a few weeks, he died 10th February 1832, in the 78th year of his age, and 56th of his ministry

Evangelical Beauties of Archbishop Leighton. 12mo, 1829

After the death of Mr Brown, were published Letters on Sanctification, some of which had previously appeared in the Christian Repository and Monitor, with a Memoir of his Life by his son-in-law, the Rev David Smith of Biggar

BROWN, JOHN, D D, an eminent divine, the son of the subject of the preceding memoir, was born July 12, 1784, at the house of Burnhead, in the parish of Whitburn, Linlithgowshire Having, from early life, chosen the ministry as a profession, in November 1797, he entered the university of Edinburgh, where he studied for three sessions In April 1800, when scarcely sixteen years of age, he went to Elie, Fifeshire, as a teacher In the following August, he was examined by the Associate presbytery of Perth at Newburgh, and subsequently entered the divinity hall of that body at Selkirk, under Dr George Lawson, who had succeeded his grandfather, in 1787, as professor of divinity to the Secession church

While pursuing his studies for the ministry, Mr Brown became, in April 1803, a private teacher in Glasgow, and in February 1805 he was licensed at Falkirk to preach the gospel by the Burgher presbytery of Stirling and Falkirk He had very soon calls to both Stirling and Biggar, and in September 1805, was appointed to the latter place In October of the same year he proceeded to London for three months, to supply the pulpit of Dr Waugh, Wells Street, one of the originators of the London Missionary Society

at North Leith, but the Associate Synod would not consent, at that time, to his removal from Biggar

On the translation, in 1821, of the Rev Dr James Hall from Rose Street chapel, Edinburgh, which had been built for him, to a larger place of worship, also erected for him, in Broughton Place of that city, Mr Brown received a call from the Rose Street congregation to be his successor This call he accepted On May 1, 1822, he was translated by deed of Synod to that congregation, and on June 4, was admitted pastor of Rose Street church

Dr Hall died November 28, 1826, and, on the following Sabbath, Dr Brown preached his funeral sermon in Broughton Place church Subsequently he received a call from the congregation, but was continued in his own charge by the synod at their meeting in May 1828 Having received a second call, he was translated by the Synod to Broughton Place church, in April 1829, and admitted 20th May following On the institution of the professorship of Exegetical Theology by the United Secession Synod in 1834, he was, in April that year, appointed to that chair, which had been reorganized according to a plan of which he was the author, and in which the fundamental importance of this study, which has since impressed itself on all Scottish churches, was for the first time recognised

In the religio-political controversies of the period, Dr Brown not unfrequently found himself involved, from his fervour in the cause of what he conceived to be the truth The first of these was on what was then called the Apocrypha question This controversy arose in consequence of the British and Foreign Bible Society having permitted the Apocrypha to be inserted in the Bible, and ultimately hinged upon its sincerity in professing to reject it from their editions of that work Dr Andrew Thomson, minister of St George's, Edinburgh, stood forth as the assailant of the Society, his principal opponents being Drs Grey and Brown, and his chief supporter, Robert Haldane

The question as to the lawfulness and expediency of the existing connexion between church and State was the next It was not a new one, but it now assumed a bolder and more conspicuous aspect than it had ever before held, and excited an extraordinary degree of ferment in the public mind, in consequence of an attack made upon its lawfulness on more exclusively scripture grounds, by a leading member of Dr Brown's denomination, Dr Andrew Marshall, in a Sermon published in May 1829 In this controversy Dr Brown took a prominent and consistent part A voluntary church association having been formed in Edinburgh, (Dr Brown being one of the committee,) led, in February 1833, to the formation of an association at Glasgow for promoting the interests of the Church of Scotland, and thenceforth "the battle of Establishments" waxed hotter and hotter Voluntary church associations and Church Defence associations were formed over the whole kingdom, and for several years after, churchmen and dissenters no longer acted together as brethren, either in religious societies or in the social intercourse of private life
