A more painful and trying ordeal awaited Dr Brown In 1842, four ministers of Dr Brown's denomination were expelled from the Synod, for holding views subversive of the special reference of the atonement as held by their body At the meeting of Synod in October 1843, in consequence of the transmission of an overture by the Presbytery of Paisley, the Synod requested the two senior professors, Drs Balmer and Brown, to express their sentiments on the doctrinal points, regarding which differences from the views of the body were alleged to be held by these ministers This the professors accordingly did, much to the satisfaction, with the conference that followed, of the Synod, as stated in their finding on the occasion Subsequently Dr Marshall published a pamphlet entitled 'The Catholic Doctrine of Redemption Vindicated,' in the Appendix to which he threw out certain imputations against Drs Brown and Balmer, of which they complained to the Synod A committee was appointed to take Dr Marshall's statements into consideration, and also the published speeches of the two professors The result was that Dr Marshall disavowed the insinuation that they taught anything inconsistent with the standards of the church and he spontaneously intimated his purpose to suppress the Appendix altogether But the matter did not end here, as it was thought it would, for Dr Marshall returned to the charge

At the meeting of the Synod in May 1845, Dr Brown, by the advice of his presbytery, presented a complaint in reference to a pamphlet published, shortly before, by Dr Marshall, entitled, 'Remarks on the Statements on certain doctrinal points made before the United Secession Synod at their request, by the two senior Professors,' in which he pronounced the doctrine enunciated by them to be "subverting the very foundation of our hopes, entirely subverting the doctrine of election, rendering the gospel little more than a solemn mockery," with more to the same effect, and he requested that the Synod would either enter on the investigation of these charges "in due form," or release him from his professorial duties The Synod, after finding that Dr Brown had acted with great propriety in bringing the matter before them, expressed their satisfaction with the explanation which he had given in his 'Statement' and otherwise, declaring also their entire confidence in his soundness in the faith, and their trust that he would continue to discharge his important functions with equal honour to himself and benefit to the church In regard to Dr Marshall, they found that in his recently published pamphlet he had reiterated serious charges, formerly brought forward on insufficient grounds against Dr Brown, in a still more offensive form, that he ought to have brought the matter before the church courts in the only competent way, and that he should, therefore, be admonished at the bar of the Synod After this decision, Dr Marshall intimated his intention of bringing a libel against Dr Brown, and another meeting of Synod was appointed in July, that he might have the opportunity of producing his libel before the next meeting of the Divinity Hall

Accordingly, in the following July, Dr Marshall, assisted by Dr Hay of Kinross, presented a libel against Dr Brown, being the first prosecution for heresy by libel that had ever taken place in the Synod of the Secession church The libel contained five counts, and Dr Brown was triumphantly acquitted on them all On the whole case the Synod unanimously adopted the following finding

"The Synod finds that there exists no ground even for suspicion that he holds, or has ever held, any opinion on the points under review inconsistent with the Word of God, or the subordinate standards of this church The Synod, therefore, dismisses the libel, and while it sincerely sympathizes with Dr Brown in the unpleasant and painful circumstances in which he has been placed, it renews the expression of confidence in him given at last meeting, and entertains the hope that the issue of this cause has been such as will, by the blessing of God, restore peace and confidence throughout the church, and terminate the unhappy controversy which has so long agitated it"

During the whole discussions in this unhappy case, Dr Brown displayed great wisdom and Christian temper, and his own congregation sympathized with him most sincerely in the trying and painful circumstances in which he had been placed As a mark of their affection and sympathy, they met in the following September, and presented him with a valuable testimonial

On the death of Dr Peddie, senior pastor of Bristo Street congregation, Edinburgh, 11th October, 1845, Dr Brown preached his funeral sermon to his congregation, which was afterwards printed In the movement for the union of the Secession and Relief bodies, he took a warm part After that work had been accomplished, and the United Presbyterian Church formed in 1847, he devoted his remaining efforts to expository comments on the Sacred Scriptures

In 1856, on the completion of the fiftieth year of his ministry, his jubilee was celebrated His attached congregation, on that occasion, presented him with a purse containing £600 This noble gift he at once generously devoted, with an added sum, to the formation of a fund for the annual relief of aged ministers of the United Presbyterian church

The duties of his professorship Dr Brown discharged with much enthusiasm and assiduity till 1857, when increasing infirmities rendered him unequal to the labours which it imposed His pulpit ministrations he was also compelled to relinquish at the same time, but occasionally, when his health permitted, he would appear in public to cheer and instruct his flock

For some time he suffered severely from internal pains, and it was supposed that his liver was affected, but latterly he enjoyed a complete immunity from these. His personal appearance, which was fine and dignified, was, previously to his death, greatly changed, in reference to which he himself expressively said, "The Master changes our countenance, and sends us away"

Dr Brown died at his house, Arthur Lodge, Newington, Edinburgh, 13th October, 1858, in his 74th year So high was the estimation in which he was held, that he may be said to have had a public funeral The Lord Provost and magistrates of Edinburgh attended in their official robes He was followed to the grave, in the Lower Calton burying-ground, by his former congregations of Biggar and Rose Street, as well as by his people of Broughton Place church, and by ministers of all denominations All felt that a good man and "a prince in Israel" had been gathered to his rest On the Sunday succeeding his funeral, his colleague, Dr Andrew Thomson, and Dr Harper, North Leith, preached funeral sermons in Broughton Place church He was twice married, first, to Jane Nimmo, daughter and sister of two eminent physicians in Glasgow She died in 1816, and, secondly, to Margaret Fisher Crum, of the Thornliebank family, descended from Ebenezer Erskine and Mr Fisher, two of the five fathers of the Secession He left three sons and as many daughters Two of his sons were educated for the medical profession, Dr John Brown of Edinburgh, and Dr William Brown The third son was but a youth at the time of his father's death

The influence of Dr Brown in his own denomination was very great But he was never an ecclesiastical leader, in the generally understood sense of the term He had little turn for the platform, and he spoke but rarely in church courts In all public questions, however, he took a deep and enlightened interest, and when he did express his opinions on any subject, it was with an authority which showed that he had thoroughly considered it, and was familiar with all its bearings Both as a preacher and a lecturer, he was an evangelical of the highest order, closely resembling the founders of his denomination in a religious aspect, vigorous, pure, fervent, manly, and profoundly pathetic

Deemed the ripest Biblical scholar of his age, it was only late in life that he became a theological writer He had a magnificent library, probably the largest clerical library in Scotland, except one His Greek New Testaments, which he commenced to hoard when he was fourteen, were, it is believed, unique in number and in quality for a private library, and his Latin and French theological authors, of the 16th century, were all but complete He had also a fine collection of classics, which he read to the last Although he taught as a professor for a quarter of a century, his series of commentaries, on which his name must chiefly rest, were published within the last ten years of his life The publication of more than ten octavo volumes by a man considerably above sixty when he began, and several of these on some of the most difficult Epistles of the New Testament, is certainly something unusual in the history of literature

BROWN, JOHN, M D, the founder of the Brunonian system of medicine, was born in 1735 or 1736, either in the village of Lintlaws or that of Preston, parish of Buncle, Berwickshire His parents, who were Seceders, were in the humblest condition of life, his father's occupation not being above that of a day-labourer Nevertheless they were anxious to give their son a decent and religious education It was a frequent expression of his father's, "that he would gird his belt the tighter to give his son John a good education" He early discovered uncommon quickness of apprehension, and he was sent to school to learn English much sooner than the usual period Before he was five years of age, he had read through almost the whole of the Old Testament When he was little more than five years of age, he had the misfortune to lose his father His mother afterwards married a weaver, by whose assistance he was enabled to continue at school, where he was distinguished for his unwearied application, his facility in mastering the tasks assigned to him, and the retentiveness of his memory Before he was ten years of age, he had gone through the routine of grammar education required previously to entering college But as his mother could not afford to put him to the university, he was bound apprentice to a weaver For this occupation he had a rooted aversion, and Mr Cruickshank kindly offered to allow him to attend the school gratuitously He therefore resumed his studies, with the view of ultimately becoming a preacher of the Secession In a short time he became so necessary to his master, that he was occasionally deputed to instruct the younger scholars

At this period, we are told, "he was of a religious turn, and was so strongly attached to the sect of Seceders, or Whigs, as they are called in Scotland, in which he had been bred, that he would have thought his salvation hazarded, if he had attended the meetings of the established church He aspired to be a preacher of a purer religion" A circumstance which happened about his thirteenth year had the effect of making him altogether relinquish the idea of becoming a seceding minister Having been persuaded, by some of his schoolfellows, to hear a sermon in the parish church of Dunse, he was in consequence summoned to appear before the session of the congregation of Seceders to which he belonged, to be rebuked for his conduct, but his pride got the better of his attachment to the sect He resolved not to submit to the censure of the session, and in order to avoid a formal expulsion, he at once renounced their authority, and professed himself a member of the established church He afterwards acted for some years as usher in Dunse school, and about the age of twenty, was engaged as tutor to the son of a gentleman in the neighbourhood This situation he left in 1755, when he went to Edinburgh, where, while he studied at the philosophy classes, he supported himself by instructing his fellow-students in the Greek and Latin languages He afterwards attended the divinity hall, and had proceeded so far in his theological studies as to be called upon to deliver, in the public hall a discourse upon a prescribed portion of scripture, the usual step preliminary to being licensed to preach

About this time, on the recommendation of a friend, he was employed by a gentleman then studying medicine to translate into Latin an inaugural dissertation The superior manner in which he executed his task gained him great reputation, which induced him to turn his attention towards the study of medicine Shortly afterwards he retired to Dunse, and resumed his former occupation of usher At Martinmas 1759 he returned to Edinburgh, and a vacancy happening in one of the classes of the High School, he became a candidate, but without success Being unable to pay the fees for the medical classes, at the commencement of the college session in that year, he addressed an elegantly composed Latin letter, first to Dr Alexander Monro, then professor of anatomy, and afterwards to the other medical professors in the university, from whom he immediately received gratis tickets of admission to their different courses of lectures

For two or three years he supported himself by teaching the classics, but he afterwards devoted himself to that occupation which is known at the university by the name of 'grinding,' that is, preparing medical candidates for their probationary examinations, which in his time were conducted in Latin For composing a thesis, he charged ten guineas, and for translating one into Latin, his price was five In 1761 he became a member of the Royal Medical Society, where, in the discussion of medical theories, he had an opportunity of displaying his talents to advantage He enjoyed the particular favour of the celebrated Cullen, who received him into his family as tutor to his children, and treated him with every mark of confidence and esteem He even made him assistant in his lectures—Brown illustrating and explaining to the pupils in the evening the lecture delivered by Dr Cullen in the morning In 1765, under the patronage of that eminent professor, he opened a boarding-house for students attending the university, the profits of which, with those of his professional engagements, enabled him to marry a Miss Lamond, the daughter of a respectable citizen of Edinburgh In spite of all his advantages, however, his total want of economy, and his taste for company and convivial pleasures, reduced him, in the course of three or four years, to a state of insolvency, and he was under the necessity of calling a meeting of his creditors, and making a compromise with them

tomical professorship in one of the infant colleges of America, he at this time devoted himself to obtaining an intimate knowledge of anatomy and botany, but Cullen, who found him useful in conducting his Latin correspondence, persuaded him to relinquish the design of leaving Scotland Soon afterwards he became a candidate for the vacant chair of the theory of medicine, and was again unsuccessful, Dr Gregory having been appointed On this occasion, an anecdote got into circulation, which, if true, reflects little credit on his heretofore friend and patron, Dr Cullen Coming forward without recommendation, it was reported, that when the magistrates, who are the patrons of the professorships, asked who this unfriended candidate was, Cullen, so far from giving him his support, observed, with a sarcastic smile, "Surely this can never be our Jock!" Attributing his disappointment to the jealousy of Cullen, Brown resolved to break off all connection with him This he did after his rejection on applying to become a member of the society which published the Edinburgh Medical Essays, admission into which Cullen could easily have procured him

Shortly after this he commenced giving lectures in Latin upon a new system of medicine, which he had formed in opposition to Cullen's theories, and employed the manuscript of his 'Elementa Medicinæ,' composed some time previously, as his text-book The novelty of his doctrines procured him at first a numerous class of pupils, and the contest between his partisans and those of his opponents was carried to the highest possible extreme In the Royal Medical Society, the debates among the students on the subject of the new system were conducted with so much vehemence and intemperance, that they frequently terminated in a duel between some of the parties A law was in consequence passed, by which it was enacted that any member who challenged another on account of anything said in the public debates, should be expelled the society In the autumn of 1779 Brown took the degree of M D at the university of St Andrews, his rupture with the professors of Edinburgh preventing him for applying for it from that university Not only the medical professors, but the medical practitioners, were opposed to his system, and he was visited with much rancorous obloquy and misrepresentation by his opponent Dr Cullen and his abettors The imprudence of his conduct in private life, and his intemperate habits, gave his enemies a great advantage over him One of his pupils informed Dr Beddoes "that he used, before he began to read his lecture, to take fifty drops of laudanum in a glass of whisky, repeating the dose four or five times during the lecture Between the effects of these stimulants and his voluntary exertions, he soon waxed warm, and by degrees his imagination was exalted into phrensy"

His design seems to have been to simplify the science of medicine, and to render the knowledge of it easily attainable All general or universal diseases were reduced by him to two great families or classes, the sthenic and the asthenic, the former depending upon an excess of excitement, the latter upon a deficiency of it Apoplexy is an instance of the former, common fever of the latter The former were to be removed by debilitating, the latter by stimulating medicines, of which the most powerful are wine, brandy, and opium, the stimuli being applied gradually, and with much caution "Spasmodic and convulsive disorders, and even hemorrhages," he says in his preface to the 'Elementa Medicinæ,' "were found to proceed from debility, and wine and brandy, which had been thought hurtful in these diseases, he found the most powerful of all remedies in removing them" In order to prejudice the minds of the public against the "Brunonian system," as it was called, his enemies spread a report that its author cured all diseases with brandy and laudanum, the latter of which, till the proper use of it was pointed out by Dr Brown, had been employed by physicians very sparingly in the cure of diseases

In 1780 he published his 'Elementa Medicinæ,' which his opponents did not venture openly to refute, but those students who were known to resort to Dr Brown's lectures were marked out, and in their inaugural dissertations at the college, any allusion to his work, or quotation from it, was absolutely prohibited "Had a candidate," says Dr Brown's son in the life of his father, prefixed to his works, "been so bold as to affirm that opium acted as a stimulant, and denied that its primary action was sedative, or had he asserted that a catarrh, or a similar inflammatory complaint, was occasioned by the action of heat, or of heating things, upon a body previously exposed for some time to cold, and that it would give way to cold and antiphlogistic regimen—facts which are now no longer controverted—he might have continued to enjoy his new opinions, but would have been very unlikely to attain the object he had in view in presenting himself for examination" The number of students attending his classes became in consequence very much reduced

In 1776 Dr Brown had been elected president of the Royal Medical Society, and, notwithstanding the violent opposition made to his system by the older physicians, he was again chosen to the chair in 1780 In 1785 he instituted the Mason Lodge called the "Roman Eagle," with the design of preventing as far as possible, the rapid decline of the language and literature of the ancient Romans Several gentlemen of talent and reputation became members of this society, and among others the celebrated Crosbie, at that time one of the chief ornaments of the Scottish bar His motives in instituting this lodge have been variously represented, and one of his biographers has asserted, it appears erroneously, that it was with the view of "gaining proselytes to his new doctrine" The obligation signed by the members of the institution sufficiently points out the objects of the association Upon this occasion he received the compliments of all who wished well to polite literature At the meetings of the institution, at which nothing but Latin was spoken, Brown usually presided, and addressed the members in the Latin language with fluency, purity, and animation In the same year in which he founded the Roman Eagle Lodge, he published anonymously his English work, entitled 'Outlines,' in which, under the character of a student, he points out the fallacy of former systems of medicine, and farther illustrates the principles of his own doctrine His excesses had gradually brought him and his system into discredit with the public, and at one time his pecuniary difficulties were so great, that he was reduced to the necessity of concluding a course of lectures in prison, where he had been confined for debt In this distressing situation, a one hundred pound note was secretly conveyed to him from an unknown person, who was afterwards traced to be the late generous and patriotic Lord Gardenstone

His prospects and circumstances becoming worse daily, in the year 1786 he quitted his native country for London, hoping that his merit would be better rewarded in the capital of the empire than it had been in Edinburgh He was now in the fifty-first year of his age, and had a wife and eight children dependent on him, but his expectations of success were very sanguine Soon after his arrival he delivered three successive courses of lectures at the Devil Tavern, Fleet Street, which, being attended only by a few hearers, added little to his income From Mr Johnson, bookseller, of St Paul's Churchyard, he received a small sum for the first edition of the translation of his 'Elementa Medicinæ' We learn from his son's memoir of his life, that about this time, in consequence of a paltry intrigue, he was deprived of the situation of physician to the king of Prussia, that monarch having written to his ambassador in London to find him out, and send him over to Berlin, and another person of the name of Brown, an apothecary, having gone to Prussia without the ambassador's knowledge It is also said that, on a previous occasion, the interference of his enemies prevented him from obtaining the professorship of medicine in the university of Padua, where his system had many adherents, as well as in Italy generally In Germany, too, it found much favour, being propagated with great zeal by Girtanner and Weikard Having furnished his house in Golden Square on credit, the broker from whom he got his furniture in a few months threw him into the King's Bench prison, without any previous demand for the money due to him During his confinement he was applied to by a bookseller, named Murray, for a nostrum or pill, for which the popularity of his name would ensure an extensive sale As he was only offered a trifle for the property of it, he rejected the proposal Soon after he was solicited by no less than five persons to make up a secret or quack medicine, but as they could never come to terms, he steadily refused all their entreaties Their object was to take advantage of his necessities, and without making him an adequate recompense, to extort from him the possession of a nostrum, which would have been a fertile source of gain to them, but a disgrace to him as a respectable physician By the friendly assistance of a countryman of the name of Miller, and the liberality of the late Mr Maddison, stock-broker, of Charing Cross, he at length obtained his liberty, in the early part of the year 1788

He now applied himself with earnestness to execute different works which he had planned while in prison Besides the translation of his 'Elementa Medicinæ,' which he had published, he proposed among other works to bring out a new edition of his 'Observations,' a 'Treatise on the Gout,' for which he was to receive £500 from a bookseller, also a treatise on 'The Operation of Opium on the Human Constitution,' a new edition of the 'Elementa,' with additions, and a 'Review of Medical Reviewers' His prospects were beginning to brighten and his practice to increase, when a sudden stroke of apoplexy at once put a period to his life, and to the illusive hopes of future prosperity which he had been cherishing He died October 7, 1788, in the 53d year of his age, having the day preceding that of his death, delivered the introductory lecture of a fourth course, at his house in Golden Square He had taken, as was his custom, a considerable quantity of laudanum before going to bed, and he died in the course of the night In 1795 Dr Beddoes published an edition of his 'Elements of Medicine,' for the benefit of his family, with a life of the author In 1804 his eldest son, Dr William Cullen Brown, published his works, with a memoir of his father in 3 vols 8vo Dr Brown's system was undoubtedly one of great ingenuity, but although some of his conclusions have proved useful in the improvement of medical science, his opinions, never generally adopted in practice, have long ago been abandoned by the profession In 'Kay's Edinburgh Portraits,' Dr Brown figures as a very prominent character His works are

BROWN, JOHN an ingenious artist and elegant scholar, the son of a goldsmith and watchmaker, was born in 1752 at Edinburgh, and was early destined to the profession of a painter In 1771 he went to Italy, where for ten years he improved himself in his art At Rome he met with Sir William Young and Mr Townley, and accompanied them as a draftsman into Sicily Of the antiquities of this celebrated island he took several very fine views in pen and ink, which were exquisitely finished, and preserved the appropriate character of the buildings which he intended to represent On his return to Edinburgh he gained the esteem of many eminent persons by his elegant manners and instructive conversation on various subjects, particularly on those of art and music, of both of which his knowledge was very extensive and accurate He was particularly honoured by the notice of Lord Monboddo, who gave him a general invitation to his table, and employed him in making drawings in pencil for him

In the year 1786 he went to London, where he was much employed as a painter of small portraits with black lead pencil, which, besides being correctly drawn, faithfully exhibited the features and character of the persons whom they represented After some stay in London, the weak state of his health, which had become impaired by his close application, induced him to try the effects of a sea voyage, and he returned to Edinburgh, to settle his father's affairs, who was then dead On the passage from London he grew rapidly worse, and was at the point of death when the ship arrived at Leith With much difficulty he was conveyed to Edinburgh, and placed in the bed of his friend and brother-artist, Runciman, whose death occurred in 1784 Here Brown died, September 5, 1787

In 1789 his 'Letters on the Poetry and Music of the Italian Opera,' 12mo, with an introduction by Lord Monboddo, to whom they were originally written, was published for the benefit of Brown's widow His lordship, in the fourth volume of 'The Origin and Progress of Language,' speaking of

Mr. Brown, says "The account that I have given of the Italian language is taken from one who resided above ten years in Italy, and who, besides understanding the language perfectly, is more learned in the Italian arts of painting, sculpture, music, and poetry, than any man I ever met with His natural good taste he has improved by the study of the monuments of ancient art to be seen at Rome and Florence, and as beauty in all the arts is pretty much the same, consisting of grandeur and simplicity, variety, decorum, and a suitableness to the subject, I think he is a good judge of language, and of writing, as well as of painting, sculpture, and music" A well written character in Latin, by an advocate in Edinburgh, is appended to the Letters Mr Brown left behind him several very highly finished portraits in pencil, and many exquisite sketches in pencil and pen and ink, which he had taken of persons and places in Italy The peculiar characteristics of his hand were delicacy, correctness, and taste, and the leading features of his mind were acuteness, liberality, and sensibility, joined to a character firm, vigorous, and energetic His last performances were two exquisite drawings, one from Mr Townley's celebrated bust of Homer, and the other from a fine original bust of Pope, supposed to have been the work of Rysbrack From these two drawings, two beautiful engravings were made by Mr Bartolozzi and his pupil Mr Bovi A portrait of Brown with Runciman, disputing about a passage in Shakspeare's Tempest, the joint production of these artists, is in the gallery at Dryburgh Abbey

BROWN, Robert, styled of Markle, an eminent agricultural writer, was born in 1757 in the village of East Linton, Haddingtonshire, where he entered into business, but his natural genius led him to agricultural pursuits, which he followed with singular success He commenced his agricultural career at Westfortune, and soon afterwards removed to Markle He was intimately acquainted with the late George Rennie of Phantassie, who chiefly confined his energies to the practice of agriculture, while Mr Brown gave his attention to the literary department His 'Treatise on Rural Affairs,' and his articles in the Edinburgh 'Farmer's Magazine,' which he conducted for fifteen years, evinced the soundness of his practical knowledge, and the vigour of his intellectual faculties His best articles have been translated into the French and German languages He died February 14, 1831, at Drylawhill, East Lothian, in his 74th year

BROWN, Thomas, an eminent metaphysician, youngest son of the Rev Samuel Brown, minister of Kirkmabreck, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and of Mary, daughter of John Smith, Esq, Wigton, was born at the manse of that parish, January 9, 1778 His father dying when he was not much more than a year old, his mother removed with her family to Edinburgh, where he was by her early taught the first rudiments of his education It is said that he acquired the whole alphabet in one lesson, and everything else with the same readiness, so much so, that he was able to read the Scriptures when between four and five years of age In his seventh year, he was sent to a brother of his mother residing in London, by whom he was placed at a school, first at Camberwell, and afterwards at Chiswick In these and two other academies to which he was subsequently transferred, he made great progress in classical literature In 1792, upon the death of his uncle, Captain Smith, he returned to Edinburgh, and entered as a student at the university of that city In the summer of 1793, being on a visit to some friends in Liverpool, he was introduced to Dr Currie, the biographer of Burns, by whom his attention was first directed to metaphysical subjects, Dr Currie having presented him with Mr Dugald Stewart's 'Elements of the Philosophy of the human mind,' then just published The winter after, young Brown attended Mr Stewart's moral philosophy class, in the college of Edinburgh, and at the close of one of the lectures he went forward to that celebrated philosopher, though personally unknown to him, and modestly submitted some remarks which he had written respecting one of his theories Mr Stewart, after listening to him attentively, informed him, that he had received a letter from the distinguished M Prevost of Geneva, containing similar arguments to those stated by the young student This proved the commencement of a friendship, which Dr Brown continued to enjoy till his death

At the age of nineteen, he was a member of that association which included the names of Brougham, Erskine, Jeffrey, Birkbeck, Logan, Leyden, Sydney Smith, Reddie, and others, who established the academy of physics at Edinburgh, the object of which was, "the investigation of Nature, and the laws by which her phenomena are regulated" From this society originated the publication of the 'Edinburgh Review' Some articles in the early numbers of that work, and particularly the leading article in the 2d number, upon Kant's Philosophy, were written by Dr Brown In 1798 he published 'Observations on the Zoonomia of Dr Darwin,' the greater part of which was written in his eighteenth year, and which contains the germ of all his subsequent views in regard to mind, and of those principles of philosophising by which he was guided in his future inquiries In 1799 he was a candidate for the chair of Rhetoric, and on the death of Dr Finlayson, for that of Logic, but in both cases unsuccessfully In 1803, after attending the usual medical course, he took his degree of M D

In the same year he published the first edition of his poems in two vols, written principally while he was at college His next publication was an Examination of the Principles of Mr Hume respecting Causation, which was caused by a note in Mr Leslie's Essay on Heat, and the great merits of which caused it to be noticed in a very flattering manner in the Edinburgh Review, in an able article by Mr Horner Professor Stewart also spoke very highly in favour of Dr Brown's Essay, and Sir James Mackintosh has pronounced it the finest model in mental philosophy since Berkeley In 1806 he brought out a second edition of this treatise, considerably enlarged, and in 1818 the third addition appeared, with many additions, under the title of 'An Inquiry into the Relation of Cause and Effect' Having commenced practice as a physician in Edinburgh he entered, in 1806, into partnership with the late Dr Gregory Mr Stewart's declining health requiring him occasionally to be absent from his class, he applied to Dr Brown to supply his place, and in the winter of 1808-9, the latter officiated for a short time as Mr Stewart's substitute "The moral philosophy class at this period," says his biographer, Dr Welsh, "presented a very striking aspect It was not a crowd of youthful students led into transports of admiration by the ignorant enthusiasm of the moment, distinguished members of the bench, of the bar, and of the pulpit, were daily present to witness the powers of this rising philosopher Some of the most eminent of the professors were to be seen mixing with the students, and Mr Playfair, in particular, was present at every lecture The originality, and depth, and eloquence of the lectures, had a very marked effect upon the young men attending the university, in leading them to metaphysical speculations" In the following winter, Dr Brown's assistance was again rendered necessary, and in 1810, in consequence of a wish expressed by Mr Stewart to that effect, he was officially conjoined with him in the professorship In the summer of 1814 he concluded his poem called the 'Paradise of Coquettes,' which he published anonymously in London, and which met with a favourable reception In the succeeding year he brought out another volume of poetry under the name of 'The Wanderer in Norway In 1816 he wrote his 'Bower of Spring,' near Dunkeld in Perthshire In 1818 he published a poetical tale, entitled 'Agnes' In the autumn of 1819, at his favourite retreat in the neighbourhood of Dunkeld, he commenced his text book, a work which he had long meditated for the benefit of his students Towards the end of December of the same year his health began to give way, and after the recess, he was in such a state of weakness as to be unable for some time to resume his official duties His ill health having assumed an alarming aspect, he was advised by his physicians to proceed to London, as he had, upon a former occasion, derived great benefit from a sea voyage Accompanied by his two sisters he hastened to the metropolis, with the intention of going to a milder climate as soon as the season allowed, and took lodgings at Brompton, where he died, April 2, 1820 His remains were put into a leaden coffin, and removed to Kirkmabreck, where they were laid, according to his own request, beside those of his parents, his mother, whom he tenderly loved, having died in 1817

A portrait of him by Watson, taken in 1806, is said faithfully to preserve his likeness The following woodcut of it is from the engraving by W Walker

He was distinguished for his gentleness, kindness, and delicacy of mind, united with great independence of spirit, a truly British love of liberty, and an ardent desire for the diffusion of knowledge, virtue, and happiness among mankind All his habits were simple, temperate, studious, and domestic As a philosopher, he was remarkable for his power of analysing, and for that comprehensive energy, which, to use his own words, "sees, through a long train of thought, a distant conclusion, and separating, at every stage, the essential from the accessory circumstances, and gathering and combining analogies as it proceeds, arrives at length at a system of harmonious truth" As a poet, Dr Brown exhibited much taste and gracefulness, but his poetry is not of a character ever to become popular His lectures, which were published after his death, in four volumes, 8vo, have passed through several editions An account of his life and writings was published by the Rev Dr David Welsh, in one volume, 8vo, in 1825 His works are

BROWN, WILLIAM LAWRENCE, D D, an eminent theological writer, the son of the Rev William Brown, a native of Scotland, minister of the English church at Utrecht, in Holland, was born in that city, January 7, 1755 His mother was Janet Ogilvie, daughter of the Rev George Ogilvie, minister of Kirriemuir Being Scotch by both father and mother, his life is usually given in Scottish biographies In 1757 his father, an eminent Latin scholar, was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in the university of St Andrews, and in consequence, returned to Scotland with his family After receiving the usual education at the grammar school, young Brown, who early showed great quickness, was, at the age of twelve, sent to the university, where he devoted his attention chiefly to the study of classical literature, logic, and ethics He passed through his academical course with much credit to himself, having received many of the prizes distributed by the chancellor for superior attainments After he had been five years at the college, he became a student of divinity, and took his degree of M A He attended the divinity class for two years, and in 1774 removed to the university of Utrecht, where he prosecuted the study of theology, and also of the civil law In 1777, on the death of his uncle, Dr Robert Brown, who had succeeded his father as minister of the English church at Utrecht, the magistrates of that city, in compliance with the wishes of the congregation, offered the vacant charge to his young relative, who accepted it

Returning to Scotland, he was licensed and ordained by the presbytery of St Andrews, and, in March 1778, he was admitted minister of the English church at Utrecht His congregation, though highly respectable, was not numerous, nevertheless, he was very assiduous in his preparations for the pulpit To increase his income, he received pupils into his house, and among many other young men of rank and fortune, Lord Dacre is mentioned as one of whom he has spoken in very favourable terms While he remained at Utrecht he made various excursions into France, Germany, and Switzerland, thereby enlarging his sphere of knowledge and observation, and becoming acquainted with the manners and habits of our continental neighbours On the 28th May 1786, he married his cousin, Anne Elizabeth Brown, the daughter of his immediate predecessor, and by her, who was also a native of Holland, he had five sons and four daughters

In 1783, the curators of the Stolpian Legacy at Leyden, which is appropriated to the encouragement of theological learning, proposed, as the subject of their annual prize, the Origin of Evil, when Mr Brown appeared in the list of twenty-five competitors On this occasion he received the second honour, namely, that of his dissertation being published at the expense of the trust the first prize being gained by a learned Hungarian of the name of Joseph Paap de Fagoras Mr Brown's Essay was printed among the Memoirs of the Society, under the title of 'Disputatio de Fabrica Mundi, in quo Mala insunt, Naturæ Dei perfectissimæ haud repugnante' In 1784 the university of St Andrews conferred on him the degree of D D On three different occasions, we are told, he obtained the medals awarded by the Teylerian Society at Haarlem for the best compositions in Latin, Dutch, French, or English, on certain prescribed subjects In 1786 he obtained the gold medal for his Essay on Scepticism, in 1787 the silver medal for his dissertation in Latin on the Immortality of the Soul, and in 1792 the silver medal again for his Essay on the Natural Equality of Men The Latin dissertation has never been printed, but the two English Essays were published, the first at London in 1788, and the other at Edinburgh in 1793 A second edition of the latter work, the most popular of all his publications, and which even attracted the attention of the British Government, appeared at London in the course of the following year

Previous to this he had been exposed to much annoyance on account of his attachment to the Orange dynasty, and had even repaired to London to endeavour to procure some literary situation in Great Britain, that he might be enabled to leave Holland altogether The armed interposition of the Prussians in 1788 restored his friends to power in that country, and was the means of his appointment to a chair in the university The states and the magistrates of Utrecht having jointly instituted a professorship of moral philosophy and ecclesiastical history, selected Dr Brown to fill the new chair The lectures were to be in the Latin language, and he had two courses to deliver, to be continued during a session of nearly eight months, for which he was allowed only a few weeks for preparation Such an arduous task was very prejudicial to his health, and laid the foundation of complaints, from which he never fully recovered The inaugural oration which he pronounced upon entering on his new duties was immediately published under the title of 'Oratio de Religionis et Philosophiæ Societate et Concordia maxime salutari' Traj ad Rhen 1788, 4to Two years afterwards he was nominated rector of the university, and his address on the occasion, entitled 'Oratio de Imaginatione, in Vitæ Institutione regenda,' was published in 4to, 1790 Having been offered the Greek professorship at St Andrews, he was induced to decline it, on the curators of the university of Utrecht promising to increase his salary To his other offices was now added the professorship of the law of nature, usually conjoined with the law of nations, and taught by members of the law faculty During the period of his residence at Utrecht, Dr Brown discharged his public duties with credit and reputation, but the war which followed the outbreak of the French revolution compelled him at last to quit Holland, on the rapid approach of the invading army of France

of Holland in an open boat, and landed in England after a stormy passage In the summer of that year, on the resignation of Dr Campbell, professor of divinity in Marischal College, Aberdeen, Dr Brown, principally through the influence of Lord Auckland, whose acquaintance he had made while ambassador at the Hague, was appointed to the vacant chair, and he was soon afterwards nominated by the Crown principal of that university. On the death of Dr Campbell in the ensuing April, Dr Brown preached his funeral sermon, published at Aberdeen in 8vo, 1796 He also published, about this time, a Fast Sermon, entitled 'The Influence of Religion on National Prosperity,' and a Synod Sermon, called 'The Proper Method of Defending Religious Truth in Times of Infidelity' He was a sound and impressive preacher, and an able and effective speaker on the popular side in the church courts

In the first General Assembly of which he was a member, he made a very powerful speech in the case of Dr Arnot, respecting his settlement at Kingsbarns, which was afterwards published In 1800 Dr Brown was named one of his Majesty's chaplains in ordinary for Scotland, and in 1804 dean of the Chapel Royal, and of the most ancient and most noble Order of the Thistle In 1825 he was appointed to read the Gordon course of lectures on practical religion in the Marischal College He was also one of the ministers of the West Church in Aberdeen

His greatest literary effort was the essay which obtained Burnet's first prize, amounting to £1,250 The competitors were about fifty in number, and the judges were, Dr Gerard, professor of divinity, Dr Glennie, professor of moral philosophy, and Dr Hamilton, professor of mathematics, all in Aberdeen The second prize, amounting to £400, was awarded to Dr Sumner, bishop of Chester Dr Brown's essay was published under the title of 'An Essay on the Existence of a Supreme Being possessed of Infinite Power, Wisdom, and Goodness, containing also the Refutation of the Objections urged against his Wisdom and Goodness,' Aberdeen, 1816, 2 vols 8vo In 1826 his last work of importance was published at Edinburgh, entitled 'A Comparative View of Christianity, and of the other Forms of Religion which have existed, and still exist, in the World, particularly with regard to their Moral Tendency,' 2 vols 8vo.

Dr Brown died, at four in the morning of May 11, 1830, in the 76th year of his age. For two years his strength had imperceptibly declined, and although the decline became rapid about a week before his decease, he did not relinquish his usual employments Reduced as he was to extreme weakness, he wrote part of a letter to two of his sons on the very last day of his mortal existence, to his third son, the Greek professor in Marischal college, he dictated a few sentences within six hours of his decease "To an unusual share of classical learning," says the writer of his life in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' seventh edition, to which we are indebted for most of these details, "Dr Brown added a very familiar acquaintance with several of the modern languages Latin and French he wrote and spoke with great facility His successive study of ethics, jurisprudence, and theology, had habituated his mind with the most important topics of speculation, relating to the present condition of man, and to his future destiny His political sentiments were liberal and expansive, and connected with ardent aspirations after the general improvement and happiness of the human race His reading in divinity had been very extensive, and he was well acquainted with the works of British and foreign theologians, particularly of those who wrote in the Latin language during the seventeenth century"—His works are

BROWN, Robert, D C L, an eminent botanist, see Supplement

BROWNE, James, LL D, author of the 'History of the Highlands and of the Highland Clans,' was born at Whitefield, parish of Cargill, Perthshire, in 1793 His father was a manufacturer at Cupar Angus, having in his employment a number of weavers He unfortunately met with some losses in trade, but while in more thriving circumstances he had contrived to give his son James a good education As he was intended for the ministry of the Church of Scotland, he was sent to the university of St Andrews, where he early distinguished himself by the great facility with which he mastered the classics, as well as for the vigour and force of his conversational talents Even at this period, he was noted for a strong tendency to romancing, which, though circumscribed by his intended profession, could not be altogether suppressed, and formed by far the most remarkable feature of his character After passing through the ordinary literary and philosophical curriculum at the university, he entered on the study of divinity, and in due time was licensed to preach the gospel His classical attainments having eminently fitted him for a teacher of youth, he soon found employment as a tutor in several families of distinction, with one of whom he visited the continent On his return to Scotland, he became assistant teacher of Latin, under Mr Dick, of the Perth academy, and, at the same time, officiated as interim assistant to the Rev Lewis Dunbar, minister of the parish of Kinnoul in Perthshire As a preacher, Browne was remarkable for the vigour of his language and the enthusiasm of his manner, but his sermons, as we have been informed by a hearer, were but slenderly tinged with doctrinal divinity It was about this time that he published, anonymously, his 'History of the Inquisition,' which at one period was rather a popular book In 1817, on the death of the Princess Charlotte, he published the sermon which he preached on that mournful occasion He afterwards resolved upon abandoning the ministry, and proceeding to Edinburgh, he shaped his studies for the bar, while, for a livelihood, he devoted himself to literary pursuits He passed advocate in the year 1826, and received the degree of LL D from the university of St Andrews His mind, however, was too thoroughly imbued with literary tastes to fit him for success as a lawyer, in fact, the entire framework of his intellect had nothing in it akin to the dull precise formulæ of legal pleadings, and although occupying the status of an advocate, he fell back upon literature and science as his only available source for a subsistence He was for a considerable time editor of Constable's Magazine, as the Scots Magazine was called, and wrote largely for the reviews, magazines, and periodicals of the day, and was always remarkable for his tendency to strong statement In one of the numbers of Blackwood's Magazine an article appeared, referring to him, entitled 'Some passages in the Life of Colonel Cloud,' which was strikingly illustrative of this weakness in his character It was understood to be from the pen of Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd In 1827 Dr Browne was appointed editor of the Caledonian Mercury, one of the oldest of the Scottish newspapers, and while he was so, he became involved in a controversy with Mr Charles M'Laren, the editor of the Scotsman, which terminated in a duel between them, of a bloodless nature, however, as both parties, after exchanging shots, left the field unhurt In 1826 Dr Browne published a 12mo volume, entitled 'Critical Examination of Dr M'Culloch's Work on the Highlands and Western Isles' It was mainly owing to his articles in the Caledonian Mercury, that in 1827 the horrible murders in the West Port were brought to light, and the wretch Burke tried, condemned, and executed. In 1830, owing to some dispute with the proprietors, Browne left the Caledonian Mercury, and in conjunction with Mr Daniel Lizars, bookseller, started the North Briton, a twice a-week paper, which, though vigorously written and ably conducted, did not long exist He afterwards for a short time resumed his old post of editor of the Caledonian Mercury Subsequently he became sub-editor of the seventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, where he displayed much industry, and his literary resources appeared to great advantage To his exertions and vast fund of information on almost every subject, that important work owed much of its excellence and its value He wrote some elaborate and able articles for it, among the rest those on the Army, Egyptian Hieroglyphics, Libraries, Newspapers, &c, besides a number of biographical articles, such as that of Bossuet, Fenelon, &c He likewise wrote two articles on Egyptian Hieroglyphics for the Edinburgh Review, which attracted considerable attention at the time, as they embodied all that was then known on the subject His contributions to the Edinburgh Geographical and Historical Atlas, a work compiled by him, with David Buchanan and H Smith, which came out in folio in 1835, as also his contributions to the North Briton newspaper, were published separately His 'History of the Highlands and of the Highland Clans,' which is in 4 volumes 8vo, possesses much force and vividness in its descriptions, and is marked by all the peculiar characteristics of his style In politics Dr Browne was, throughout his career, a consistent liberal In the latter years of his life, he became a proselyte to popery, principally through the influence of his wife, who had been educated in that faith She was a daughter of Mr Stewart of Huntfield, and cousin of General Stewart of Garth Dr Browne died in 1841, and was buried in Duddingstone churchyard A critical review of Scott's prose works, written by him, was posthumously published Notwithstanding his being endowed with a strong bodily constitution, he was, while yet, it may be said, in the prime of life, worn out by over mental exertion, and fell at last a victim to paralysis It is much to his credit that he was the sole support of his parents in their old age. His daughter married James Grant, at one time an ensign in the 62d foot, author of the 'Romance of War,' and other novels

BRUCE, or as it was anciently written, BRUS, the name of a family of Norman descent, which became one of the most illustrious in the annals of Scotland The name, originally Brusi, had its origin among the Scandinavians or Northmen and appears—through their matrimonial alliances with the vikingrs of Norway, who subdued the Orkney islands—in connection with the royal family of Scotland at a very early period of its authentic history Sigurd the Stout, jarl or earl of Orkney, who married the daughter of Melkolm, probably Malcolm the Second, king of Scots, had four sons, Thorfinn, Sumarled, Brusi, and Einar Brusi, the third son, the Orkneyinga Saga, as quoted in the 'Collectanea de Rebus Albanicis,' printed for the Iona Club, informs us, was a very peaceful man, and clever, eloquent, and had many friends After the death of Sumarled, disputes arose amongst the brothers about the division of his lands in Orkney and Caithness, and wars and scarcity ensued, but Brusi was contented with his third of Orkney, and 'in that part of the land which Brusi had there was peace and prosperity"

From a branch of this family came, according to Burke, Robert de Brusi, a descendant of Einar, fourth jarl of Orkney, brother of the famous Rollo, (great-great-grandfather of William the Conqueror,) who in 912 acquired Normandy, and became its first duke This Robert de Brusi built the castle of La Brusee, now called Brix, in the diocese of Coutanse, near Volagnes By his wife, Emma, daughter of Alain, count of Brittany, he had two sons, Alain de la Brusee, lord of Brusee castle, (married Agnes, daughter of Simon Montfort, earl of Evreux,) whose posterity remained in Normandy, and Robert de Brusee, the ancestor of the Bruses, and the first of that name who appeared in England He accompanied William the Conqueror there in 1066, but died soon after By his wife, Agnes, daughter of Waldonius, count of St Clair, he had two sons, William and Adam, who both attended their father into England, and acquired great possessions, the former in Sussex, Surrey Dorsetshire, and other counties, and the latter in Cleveland, of which the barony of Skelton was the principal Adam died in 1098, leaving, by Emma his wife, daughter of a knight named Sir William Ramsay, three sons, namely, Sir Robert his heir, William, prior of Guisburn, and Duncan After the death of his father, Sir Robert had forty-three lordships in the East and West Ridings of that county, and fifty one in the North Riding, whereof Guisburn in Cleveland was one [Dugdale's Baronage, v i p 147]

His son, Robert de Brus of Cleveland, served as a companion in arms under Prince David, afterwards David the First of Scotland, during his "residence," says our authority, "at the court of Henry the First of England," but in reality, and as in all probability and consistency, during the conquest and a part of the period of his government of Cumbria—the district comprising the Lothians and Galloway is bestowed on that prince upon the death of his brother Edgar,—and received from him, along with the hand of a lady, a native of the land and heiress thereof, as his second wife, a grant of the lordship of Annandale, comprising all that territory called in Norman French Estra-hanent, 'beyond or across Annent or Annant,' (afterwards altered into Strathannan or Annandale,) and all the lands from Estra-nit (Strathnith) the bounds of the property of Dunegall, (ancestor of the Randolphs earls of Moray) into the limits of Ranulph de Meschines, then lord of Cumberland, with a right to enjoy his castle there, with all the customs appertaining to it [Ibid] The charter by which this large domain was conferred upon him established the tenure by the sword, that is, gave a right to take possession and retain by force of arms For this princely gift, which he held by the tenure of military service, he did homage to the Scottish king In 1138, during the civil war between King Stephen who had usurped the throne of England, and Matilda, the rightful heiress, niece of the king of Scots, when the latter, in support of the claims of his relative, had led an expedition into England and advanced as far as Northallerton, de Brus was sent, by the barons of the north of England, (who, if not attached to the cause of Stephen, were satisfied it was their safety to maintain it and had assembled a force for that purpose,) in order to gain time to increase their strength, to negotiate, or rather to remonstrate with him At the commencement of the war, he had renounced his allegiance to David, and resigned his lands in Annandale to his son by his second marriage He represented that the English and Normans, against whom he was then arrayed, had repeatedly restored the power and authority of the Scottish monarchs when driven out by their subjects of the ancient races of the country, and that they were more faithful to the royal family than were the Scots themselves, who rejoiced at this unnatural war, because it afforded them an opportunity of displaying their resentment against those who had often frustrated their treasonable devices He dwelt on the savage outrages which that portion of the army, consisting of native forces, had committed, urged him to prove the truth of his disavowal of them by withdrawal, assured him of the determined resistance of the Yorkshire barons, and concluded (as reported by their common friend Aldred) in the following affectionate strain —"It wrings my heart,' said he, "to see my dearest master, my patron, my benefactor, my friend, my companion in arms, in whose service I am grown old, thus exposed to the danger of battle, or to the dishonour of flight," and then he burst into tears David also wept, but his resolution to maintain the rights of his sister's daughter, to whom as her first subject he had sworn fealty, continued unchanged The battle of the Standard followed, 11th August, 1138, in which the army of King David, after a partial success in the first onset, was completely defeated At this famous battle de Brus took prisoner his second son, Robert, a youth of fourteen years of age, who, being hegeman to the Scottish king for the lands of Annandale, which had been renounced in his favour by his father, had fought on the Scots side Robert de Brus, first lord of Annandale, founded a monastery at Guisburn, now Guisborough, in Yorkshire, in 1119, and amply endowed it with lands and possessions, in which he was joined by Agnes, his first wife, daughter of Fulk Paynell, with whom he got the manor of Carleton in Yorkshire, and Adam his son and heir His death took place 11th May 1141, when his English estates were inherited by his eldest son Adam, whose male line terminated in Peter de Brus of Skelton, constable of Scarborough castle, who died 18th September 1271, leaving his extensive estates to four sisters, his coheiresses, all married to powerful English barons

Robert de Brus, his son by the second marriage, inheriting Annandale in right of his mother and by cession of his father, was by him, after the battle of the Standard, sent prisoner to King Stephen, who ordered him to be delivered up to his mother On telling his father that the people of Annandale had no wheaten bread, he conferred on him the lordship of Hert and the territory of Hertness in the bishopric of Durham, to hold of him and his heirs, lords of Skelton He soon, however, returned to Scotland, and gave to the monastery of Guisburn, founded by his father, the churches of Annand, Lochmaben, Kirkpatrick, Cummertrees, Rampatrick, and Gretenhou (or Graitney, now Gretna), and entered into a composition with the bishop of Glasgow, concerning these churches, to which that prelate laid claim. "To show that he looked upon his chief settlement to be in Scotland he quitted his father's armorial bearings (argent, a lion rampant, gules) and assumed the coat of Annandale (or a saltire and chief gules)' King William the Lion conferred on him by a charter yet extant, dated at Lochmaben, the grant of Annandale made to his father by David the First He and his wife Euphemia gave to the monks of Holmcultram the fishing of Torduff in the Solway Frith He had two sons, Robert and William

Robert, the elder son and third lord of Annandale, described as "a nobleman of great valour and magnanimity, and at the same time pious and religious," married, in 1183, Isabella, a natural daughter of William the Lion, by whom he had no issue He died before 1191 His widow married, a second time, a baron named Robert de Ros

The second son William had a son named Robert, fourth lord of Annandale, surnamed the noble, who took to wife Isobel, second daughter of David, earl of Huntingdon and Chester, younger brother of William the Lion, and thus laid the foundation of the royal house of Bruce "By this royal match the lords of Annandale came to be amongst the greatest subjects in Europe, for, by the said Isobel (as coheiress, with her two sisters, of her father's property,) Robert, exclusive of his paternal estate in both kingdoms, came to be possessed of the manor of Writtle and Hatfield in Essex, together with half the hundred of Hatfield She likewise brought him the castle of Kildrummie and the lordship of Garioch in Aberdeenshire, and the manor of Conmington in Huntingdonshire, and Exton in Rutlandshire" He died in 1245, and was buried with his ancestors in the abbey of Guisburn, in Cleveland

His eldest son, also named Robert, was the competitor with John Baliol for the crown of Scotland He died in 1295

Robert de Brus, his eldest son, sixth lord of Annandale, and first earl of Carrick of the name, [see ANNANDALE, lord of, and CARRICK, earl of] maintained his pretensions to the Scottish throne Nevertheless, he accompanied Edward the First into Scotland, and fought on the English side at the battle of Dunbar He died in 1304

His eldest son, Robert de Brus, (as it was written and used by all parties in that Norman French which was the spoken language of Scotland during his lifetime, but in after ages not very accurately translated into English as The Bruce,) the conqueror at Bannockburn, and the restorer of the Scottish monarchy, was the seventh lord of Annandale, and second earl of Carrick in right of his mother

In the genealogy of the royal line of Brus, it appears that there had been nine persons in direct descent from de Brus of Doomesday Book to de Brus of Bannockburn, the first king of the name, inclusive, eight of whom were named Robert, and one William, the latter being the grandson of the Norman knight Robert de Brus, and younger brother of the third Robert

Of the lives of the three last of these Bruces as more particularly connected with the history of Scotland the details are more fully given in their order, as also that of Edward, one of the brothers of King Robert, viz —

grandson the conqueror at Bannockburn He was born in 1210, and on the death of Margaret of Norway in 1290, being then in his eighty-first year, he became a claimant with John Baliol for the crown of Scotland [See BALIOL, JOHN, p 220] On this occasion, he alleged that more than fifty years before, or in 1238, while in the 28th year of his age, when Alexander the Second was about to proceed on an expedition against the western isles, and then despairing of heirs of his own body, he was acknowledged by that monarch, in presence and with consent of his barons, as the nearest heir in blood to the throne, but the birth of a son to Alexander by his second wife, in 1241, put an end at that period to his hopes of the succession Lord Hailes thinks Brus's allegation a fiction, Sir Francis Palgrave, with fuller materials, certainly shows reasons for believing it correct [Documents Illustrative of Scottish History, 1837, Introduction, pp xxiii—xxix]

In 1252, on the death of his mother the princess Isobel, he did homage to Henry the Third as heir to her lands in England, and in 1255 he was constituted sheriff of Cumberland and constable of the castle of Carlisle The same year, on the breaking up of the regency of the Comyn party, which was that of the independent interest as being opposed to the English supremacy in Scotland, [see ante, p 84,] he was appointed one of the fifteen regents of the kingdom, during the minority of the young king, Alexander the Third Nine years later, that is in 1264, during the famous struggle of King Henry the Third with his barons headed by Simon de Montfort, in conjunction with John Comyn and John de Baliol, de Brus led a large Scottish force to the assistance of the English monarch, who, however, was defeated at the battle of Lewes, 14th May of that year, when de Brus was taken prisoner, along with Henry and his son, Prince Edward After the battle of Evesham, 5th August 1265, which retrieved the fortunes of King Henry, Bruce was set at liberty, and was reinstated in the governorship of Carlisle castle

On the death of Alexander the Third in 1286, a parliament assembled at Scone, 11th April, in which a regency, consisting of six guardians of the realm, was appointed, three for the country north of the Forth, namely, William Fraser bishop of St Andrews, Duncan earl of Fife, and Alexander Comyn earl of Buchan, and three for the country south of the Forth, namely, Robert Wishart bishop of Glasgow, John Comyn lord of Badenoch, and James the Steward of Scotland Then properly may be said to have commenced the contest for the succession to the crown, between the partisans of Brus and Baliol, although these were not the only claimants The heiress to the throne, Margaret, granddaughter of Alexander and grandniece of Edward the First, was still alive and in Norway, but she was an infant, and the different competitors began to collect their strength and indulge in ambitious hopes, in the anticipation of a struggle for the sovereignty The most powerful of the Scottish barons met, September 20, 1286, at Turnberry, the castle of Robert de Brus, earl of Carrick in right of his wife (see the following article), son of Robert de Brus, the subject of this notice, lord of Annandale and Cleveland They were joined by two powerful English barons, Thomas de Clare, brother of Gilbert, earl of Gloucester, brother-in-law of the lord of Annandale, and Richard de Burgh, earl of Ulster Among those assembled at Turnberry were Patrick, earl of Dunbar, with his three sons, Walter Stewart, earl of Menteith, de Brus's own son, the earl of Carrick, and Bernard de Brus, James, the high Steward of Scotland, who had married Cecilia, daughter of Patrick, earl of Dunbar, with John, his brother, Angus, son of Donald the lord of the Isles, and Alexander his son "These barons," says Tytler, "whose influence could bring into the field the strength of almost the whole of the west and south of Scotland, now entered into a bond or covenant, by which it was declared that they would thenceforth adhere to and take part with one another, on all occasions, and against all persons, saving their allegiance to the king of England, and also their allegiance to him who should gain the kingdom of Scotland by right of descent from King Alexander, then lately deceased Not long after this the number of the Scottish regents was reduced to four, by the assassination of Duncan, earl of Fife, and the death of the earl of Buchan, the Steward, another of the regents, pursuing an interest at variance with the title of the young queen, joined the party of de Brus, and heart-burnings and jealousies arose between the nobility and the governors of the kingdom These soon increased, and at length broke out in open war between the parties of de Brus and Baliol, which for two years after the death of the king continued its ravages in the country" Tytler adds that this war, hitherto unknown to our historians, is proved by documents of unquestionable authority [Hist of Scotland, vol i p 56, and notes] It will be remembered, although the popular impression is to the contrary, that at this period the Comyn party, to which belonged John de Baliol, lord of Galloway, whose sister Marjory was the wife of the Black Comyn and mother of the Red Comyn (afterwards slain by Robert de Brus), were and had been the constant supporters of the Scottish or independent interests, and the de Brus party, which appeared to be the strongest, had all along been in alliance with England A pleading of de Baliol, in old Norman French, then the language of state affairs both in England and Scotland, addressed to Edward the First, during the suit for the crown, and stating reasons why his claim was preferable to that of de Brus, is still extant The seventh and last of these reasons is that Brus had committed acts of rebellion against the peace of the realm during the regency, by assaulting the castles of Dumfries, Wigton, and a place called Bot , [the latter part of the name is obliterated,] and expelling the troops of the queen therefrom [Palgrave's Documents, &c Introduction, pp lxxx, lxxxi]

In the negotiations during the years 1289 and 1290, relative to the proposal of a marriage between the infant queen and Edward, the young son of Edward the First of England, the lord of Annandale was actively engaged, and with the bishops of St Andrews and Glasgow, and John Comyn, he was one of the Scottish commissioners at the conference at Salisbury, who signed the treaty there Although it is reasonable to suppose that the anxiety manifested throughout these negotiations, to avoid any concession prejudicial to the independence of the Scottish crown was strongly felt by the parties then in power, yet it would be unfair without further grounds to infer that the nobles who were leagued against the Comyns were not as earnest for the same result On the death of Margaret, it is well known that King Edward interfered in the settlement of the succession to the throne Two of the regents, William Fraser bishop of St Andrews, and John Comyn lord of Badenoch, had set aside their colleagues, the Steward and the bishop of Glasgow, and had taken into their own hands the entire administration of the realm It was their policy to appoint John de Baliol to the vacant throne, and on the 7th October 1290, before the report of the death of the young queen had been certainly confirmed, Fraser wrote a letter to King Edward recommending Baliol in a particular manner to his favour By their own authority the joint regents had nominated sub-guardians of the realm, and delegated to them the right of maintaining order These sub-guardians had, in name of the two regents, adopted violent measures for enforcing their authority in various parts of the kingdom, and especially in Moray A large portion of the nobles and community of Scotland were opposed to the proceedings of the regents, and maintained the right of Robert de Brus to succeed to the crown It now appears that the intervention of Edward the First in the affairs of Scotland, which has been so much misunderstood by historians, was caused not by the famous letter of Bishop Fraser, as has commonly been supposed, but by three formal and regular appeals made to him by three competent parties, namely 'the seven earls of Scotland,' (see ante, p 67,) Donald earl of Mar, and Robert de Brus lord of Annandale Claiming it as their privilege, by immemorial custom, as a peculiar estate in the realm, to appoint a king, whenever there was a vacancy, and to invest him with the royal authority, the seven earls came forward and appealed, on the ground that the regents were infringing, or intended to infringe, this their constitutional franchise Donald earl of Mar, one of the seven earls, appealed against the unconstitutional appointment of sub-guardians, and against the damages done by certain of these guardians in the lands of Moray, and Robert de Brus lord of Annandale appealed against the understood intention of the regents to appoint Baliol to the throne, and thus violate his rights, and the rights of the seven earls [See Palgrave's Documents Illustrative of

Scottish History] The consequence of these appeals was the famous summons of the English monarch that the nobility and clergy of the Scottish kingdom should meet him at Norham, in the English territories, on the 10th of May 1291 Having accordingly met him at the time and place appointed, after declaring that he was ready to do justice to all the competitors, he required them, in the first place, to acknowledge him as lord paramount of the kingdom To this unexpected demand no reply for a time was given At length some one observed that it was impossible to give an answer whilst the throne continued vacant "By holy Edward, whose crown I wear," said the imperious king, "I will vindicate my just rights or perish in the attempt" He then granted them three weeks for deliberation

On the 2d of June the Scottish barons and clergy again met King Edward at Upsettlington, when eight competitors for the crown were present These were, Robert de Brus, lord of Annandale, Florence, count of Holland, John de Hastings, Patrick de Dunbar, earl of March, William de Ros, William de Vesey, Robert de Pinckeny, and Nicholas de Soulis John de Baliol, lord of Galloway, attended next day The chancellor of England, addressing himself to de Brus, demanded whether he acknowledged Edward as lord paramount of Scotland, and he expressly and publicly declared that he did On the same question being put to the other competitors, the same answer was given Baliol, on his appearance on the following day, after some hesitation, also acknowledged the same These preliminary steps being taken, after a full investigation of the claims of all the candidates, Edward, upwards of seventeen months after the commencement of the inquest, pronounced in favour of Baliol, on the 17th November 1292 There is no reason to believe that in this decision Edward was otherwise than influenced by a just regard to the true law of succession, and there are many considerations that would have induced him, and he was understood privately to incline, to favour the cause of de Brus

The appeals of the Seven Earls having, as we have seen, constituted the foundation of all the proceedings of Edward above recorded, it may be proper here to inquire, In what sense did the Seven Earls and the others appeal to Edward? Was it in the sense in which he accepted the appeal,—namely, as an appeal of a portion of the community of Scotland to him as their lawful superior, and was the reluctance which, we are informed, the Scottish nobility and clergy exhibited to comply with his demand, that they should acknowledge him as Lord Paramount, the mere reluctance of the rest of the community to give their assent to a proposition already virtually admitted by the appellants, or, as possibly may have been the case, was it the reluctance also of the appellants themselves, to make a formal and open avowment of a proposition necessarily implied in their appeal, but which, as they knew it to be unpopular, they would have been glad to escape avowing in so express and glaring a manner, as that in which the wily Edward made them do it?

Sir Francis Palgrave, who, with so much ability, and with the advantage of the additional light afforded by the documents which he has given to the world, has revived the long obsolete question of the English supremacy over Scotland, holds that, in appealing as they did to Edward, de Brus and the Seven Earls meant to admit his title to give judgment as the lawful Over-Lord of the Scottish kingdom They submitted to Edward's judgment, he says, "not as to an arbitrator selected to determine a contested question, but as to a lawful superior whose protection and defence they implored" [Palgrave, Documents, &c Introduction, p xxi] And farther on, expanding the same remark, he says, "The Scottish writers upon Scottish history, warmed by the courage and heroism of de Brus and Wallace, as represented in the poetry and popular legends and traditions of their country, have characterized the repeated submissions to the English king as acts of disgrace, and stains upon the national honour But the justice of the cause must be judged according to the conscience of the parties, and if the prelates, the peers, the knights, the freeholders, and the burgesses of Scotland, believed that Edward was their Over-Lord, it is not their obedience, but the withdrawing it, that should be censured by posterity

There is not any reason for believing that, until the era of Wallace, there was any insincerity on the part of the noble Normans, the stalwart

Flemings, the sturdy Northumbrian Angles, and the aboriginal Britons of Strathclyde and Reged, whom we erroneously designate as Scots—in admitting the legal supremacy of the English crown, until the attempts made by Edward I to extend the incidents of that supremacy beyond their legal bounds provoked a resistance deserved by such abuse' [Ibid pp xlii xliii]

Now, so far as the appeals of de Brus and the Seven Earls are concerned, it cannot be denied but that Sir Francis Palgrave is in the right The language of the appeals themselves it would be difficult to interpret otherwise than as a recognition of the superior authority of the crown of England over the Scottish nation, although it may certainly be remarked that the writers seem to have been studious to avoid any explicit statement of that fact in so many words The question, however, as regards de Brus, would be set at rest, if it could be shown that Sir Francis Palgrave is right in supposing that the following letter, published by him for the first time, along with the appeals, in the volume above referred to, was written by de Brus The letter, which is written in Norman French, is evidently that of a competitor for the Scottish crown, who wishes to ingratiate himself with Edward by inordinate eagerness to admit his claim to the feudal superiority over Scotland We translate as literally as the gaps will permit —"I have heard from my father, and from ancient men of the time of King David, that there was war between the king of England and king David And in that time that Northumberland was lost, there was a peace made between the king of England and the king of Scotland, to wit that, if the king of Scotland should ever in anywise refuse obedience to the king of England, or to his crown, then the Seven Earls of Scotland should be bound by oath to the king of England, and to his crown in Afterwards

obediences were made But afterwards came King Richard, and sold the homage of the king of Scotland We do not think that this sale can be valid, for well is the king of England who is so wise, and his council also, able to advise, whether the crown can be dismembered of such a member And seeing that the crown ought to be kept entire, let it be known to him by Elias de Hauville, that at what hour he will make his demand regularly, I will obey him, and will aid him with myself, and all my friends, and all my lineage my friends will do And I pray your grace for my right, and for the truth which I wish to manifest before you, and meanwhile I by speaking with the ancient men of the land, to find out the evidence of your interests, as "

Sir Francis Palgrave's statement, however, that "the prelates, the peers, the knights, the freeholders, and the burgesses of Scotland, believed that Edward was their Over-lord," is too sweeping It ignores the fact, that a feeling had existed with a part at least of the Scottish community, for nearly a hundred and fifty years previous to this memorable epoch, of antipathy to this very claim of English supremacy There was a germ and a root of repugnance to England in the Celtic portion of the nation But a network of Norman colonization had overspread nearly the whole British island, which remained entire and connected throughout its whole length, so that the northern part of it, i e the Scoto-Normans, did not feel themselves yet separated from the southern part of it, i e the Anglo-Normans Besides this, another strong tie co-operated in enabling England to grapple Scotland towards herself This was the traditional claim of legal supremacy asserted by England over Scotland, a claim which, as Sir Francis Palgrave's investigations have made clear, had, whether well or ill founded, a real place in the beliefs of the period Edward the First seems clearly to have believed that, in virtue of certain old transactions, he, as king of England, had a claim upon the allegiance of the people of Scotland Looked at from this point of view, therefore, his crime in the matter of Scotland may have been, as Sir Francis Palgrave calls it, a mere attempt to "extend the incidents of his legal supremacy beyond their legal bounds" On the other hand, too, it seems pretty clear that, among the Scottish nobles, there was, during the whole of the period referred to, no decided conviction that the claim of English supremacy was illegal in any absurd degree The feeling of at least a portion of them, relative to this claim, seems to have been rather a desire to disencumber themselves of it, than such a contempt for it as would have been inspired by a sincere belief that it was the mere pretext of an invader Hence it is found that, during the whole of that period, though inclined to escape the claim of homage to England whenever they could, on the least pressure they were found ready to yield to it

The lordship of Annandale being held, as already stated, by the tenure of military service, to avoid doing homage to his successful rival, Robert de Brus resigned it to his eldest son retaining only for himself his English estates "I am Baliol's sovereign, not Baliol mine," said the proud baron, "and rather than consent to such a homage, I resign my lands in Annandale to my son, the earl of Carrick" He seems thenceforth to have lived in retirement He died in 1295, at his castle of Lochmaben, at the age of eighty-five He had married an Englishwoman, Isabel, daughter of Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, one of the most powerful barons of England, and by her he had Robert de Brus, earl of Carrick, two other sons, and a daughter

BRUCE, or DE BRUS, ROBERT, eldest son of the competitor, and father of King Robert the Bruce, accompanied King Edward the First of England to Palestine in 1269, and appears to have enjoyed the confidence and friendship of that monarch On his return, he married, in 1271, Margaret, the young and beautiful countess of Carrick, whose husband, Adam de Kilconath, (Kilconquhar?) earl of Carrick in her right, was slain in the Holy Land By this lady, who was the only child of Nigel, earl of Carrick and lord of Tunberry, and Margaret, a daughter of Walter, the high steward of Scotland, de Brus had his celebrated son Robert, afterwards king of Scotland, Edward de Brus, lord of Galloway, crowned king of Ireland in 1316, three other sons and seven daughters

The circumstances attending this marriage as related by our historians, are of as singular and romantic a character as any in Scottish annals One day in the autumn of 1271, while Martha, as she is generally called, though Marjory, or Margaret, appears to have been her proper name, countess of Carrick in her own right, was engaged in the exercise of hunting, surrounded by a retinue of her squires and damsels, in the grounds adjoining her castle of Turnberry in Ayrshire, the ruins of which still remain, she accidentally met with de Brus, then about thirty years of age, who had just returned from the Holy Land, and was passing on horseback through her domains Struck by his noble figure, the young countess invited the knight to join her in the chase and to be her guest for a time Aware of the peril he encountered in paying too much attention to a ward of the king, as the countess was, de Brus, it is said, declined the invitation so courteously given, when, at a signal from the countess, her retinue closed in around him, and the lady, seizing his bridle reins, led him off, with gentle violence, to her castle at Turnberry He was thus constrained to partake of the hospitality of the countess, and, after fifteen days' residence with her, he married her, without the knowledge of the relatives of either party or the consent of the king, which, as she was a ward of the crown, ought to have been previously obtained So flagrant a violation of his feudal rights provoked even the good tempered Alexander the Third, and the castle and estates of the countess were instantly seized By the intercession of friends, however, the king was induced to pardon the youthful offenders, first inflicting on the lady the payment of a heavy fine Her husband became in her right earl of Carrick, and their eldest son was Robert de Brus, the greatest of our monarchs, this union being thus an auspicious event for Scotland Such is the tale told by our historians, and in most points it is true, but to take away somewhat from its romance, one account, which seems the most probable, states that de Brus had been the companion in the Holy Land, as well as the fellow-crusader of the lady's first husband, Adam de Kilconath, and it is not unlikely that, on the death of the latter without issue, he returned to Scotland with the design of marrying his widow, who, besides being young and beautiful, had a proud title and extensive estates to confer on whomsoever she bestowed her hand His solitary ride through the woods of Turnberry was thus not without an object

When the future monarch of Scotland was yet a minor, his father, following his grandfather's example, to avoid doing homage to Baliol, resigned to his son the earldom of Carrick, which he held in right of his wife, just then deceased The youthful de Brus, on obtaining the title and lands, immediately swore fealty to Baliol as his lawful sovereign His father shortly after retired to England, leaving the administration of the family estates of Annandale also in his hands In 1295, the same year in which the aged de Brus, the competitor, died, Edward the First appointed de Brus the elder, the father of king Robert, constable of the castle of Carlisle In 1296, when Baliol, driven to resistance by the galling yoke which Edward endeavoured to force upon him, (by attempting to exercise a jurisdiction in Scottish affairs which none of his predecessors had ever pretended to possess,) revolted from his authority, and, assisted by the Comyns, took up arms to assert his independence, de Brus the elder, cherishing, no doubt, the natural hope that as the next heir to the throne he might, on the event of the overthrow and deposition of his rival, receive the vacant crown from the English monarch, accompanied Edward's expedition into Scotland, and with his party, which was numerous and powerful, gave them assistance to the English king Our Scottish historians indeed assert that a promise to this effect was made to him by Edward, but it receives no countenance in English history, and is quite inconsistent with what we know of Edward's character or purposes Baliol, in consequence, seized upon the lordship of Annandale, and bestowed it on John Comyn, earl of Buchan, who immediately took possession of the castle of Lochmaben

After the decisive battle of Dunbar, 28th April 1296, in which the Scottish army was defeated, and Baliol compelled to surrender the sovereignty, it is said by the writers referred to that the elder Bruce reminded Edward of his promise to bestow on him the vacant crown, and received the following reply "What! have I nothing else to do than to conquer kingdoms for you?" But although Tytler does not venture to omit this incident, later writers have so far treated it as doubtful as to soften the request into a simple application, without reference to any previous promise, a mode of regarding it more consistent with probability and with the well known character for probity borne by Edward [Papers on Robert Bruce in Lowe's Edinburgh Magazine, March 1848, p 345] After this he seems to have retired to his English estates In 1297, Sir William Wallace, one of the greatest heroes of which the annals of any nation can boast, nobly stood forward as the defender of his country's freedom, but his patriotic achievements failed to rouse de Brus from his inactivity, or to induce him to consider Wallace as seeking more than either to restore Baliol or as aspiring to the throne himself In the fatal campaign of 1298, which concluded with the disastrous battle of Falkirk, our Scottish historians represent Brus the son to have accompanied the English monarch, and to have fought in his service against his countrymen After a gallant resistance, they assert that Wallace was compelled to retreat along the banks of the Carron, pursued by de Brus at the head of the Galloway men, his vassals Here a conference is represented to have taken place between the two leaders, which ended in de Brus's resolving to forsake the cause of Edward

Wallace is described as having upbraided de Brus as the mean hireling of a foreign master, who, to gratify his ambition, had sacrificed the welfare and independence of his native land He is represented to have urged him to assume the post to which he was entitled by his birth and fortune, and either deliver his country from the bondage and oppression of Edward, or gloriously fall in asserting its liberties By Wallace's reproaches and remonstrances, de Brus, it is said, was melted into tears, and swore to embrace the cause of his oppressed country Such is the story of Wynton and Fordun, and of course of Boece, Blind Harry, and Buchanan, and it may be accepted as one of the most curious instances that could be adduced of the operation of the mythical or dramaturgic faculty to the falsification of history Not only do the old Scottish writers make Bruce fight on Edward's side at the battle of Falkirk, but in contradiction to all possibility they make him and Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, jointly decide the fate of the battle against the Scots It is certain, however, that the younger de Brus was not at the battle of Falkirk at all, but, as stated by an author who was in Scotland and with Edward's force at the time (Heningford), he was then in guard of the castle of Ayr, in the interest of the Scottish cause maintained at Falkirk by Wallace Since this fact was brought to light by Lord Hailes, writers—including a recent translator of Buchanan—have represented that it was de Brus the father who was present at Falkirk and had the interview with Wallace, but there is no warrant in the older historians for this transposition of the person referred to All early accounts state that de Brus the father ceased to take any interest in Scottish affairs after the refusal of Edward to accede to his request for the vacant crown It could not be de Brus the elder who fought on the side of Edward at Falkirk at the head of his Galloway vassals, as the original story has it, when he had no vassals in Galloway, and when all Galloway was then in the power of the patriots, with young de Brus his son, at the head of his Carrick tenantry, as their leader The part moreover assigned to young de Brus in that fight, viz , the moving behind the Scottish 'schiltrons' and attacking them in the rear, is precisely that described by the historian eye-witness to have been taken by Sir Ralph de Basset, who was second in command to Anthony a Beck, the warlike bishop of Durham It was this Sir Ralph, and not young de Brus that, as described by Wynton (who wrote 110 years after the event)—

> "With Sir Anton the Beck, a wily man, > (Of Durham bishop he was than),
> About ane hill a well far way,
> Out of that stour then pricked they > Behind backs all sae fast,
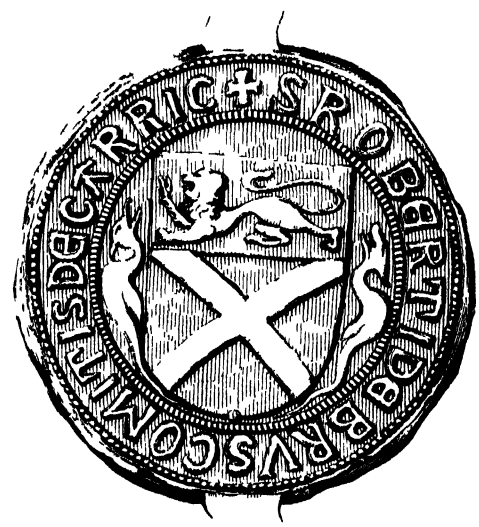
> There they come on, and laid on fast,
> Sae made they the discomfiture"

It is not impossible, therefore, that the whole story may have originated in a blunder in some old document,—a circumstance not uncommon in copying the writings of that age,—and that Sir R Basset may have been misread or miscopied, as Sir R Brus *

* A singular instance of this nature occurs in a document referred to in the next life, where Irvine is rendered Sir William Wallace, thus 'Escrit a Irewin,' (written at Irvine) for 'escrit a Sirewm,' afterwards divided into Sire Wm , and again elongated into Sire Willaume, as printed in Rymer Hailes naturally supposed it to mean Sir William Wallace

The famous meeting, therefore, of de Brus with Wallace after the battle of Falkirk—the most exquisite, it is admitted, of Scottish legends—is a mythus, an imaginary fact or circumstance, in which the popular national feeling regarding the two heroes has bodied itself forth At the death of de Brus in 1304, he transmitted his English estates to his son, the future king of Scotland, who was then thirty years of age, whether, at the same time, he bequeathed to him a nobler legacy, namely, that of atonement and true patriotism, exhorting him, with his latest breath, to avenge the injuries of his suffering country, and to re-establish the independence of Scotland, as is asserted by authors in connection with the legend above referred to, is more than doubtful This at least is clear, that the crown of Scotland, to which both conceived they had an undoubted right, was never out of the view of the latter, who, in gaining it, secured at the same time, the independence of his kingdom

The following seal of Robert de Brus the father represents only the arms of the ancient earldom of Carrick



BRUCE, or DE BRUS, ROBERT, the restorer of the national monarchy, eldest son and second child of the preceding, and of the Lady Martha, sole daughter of Nigel, earl of Carrick, was born on the 11th of July 1274 It has been generally believed that Turnberry castle was the place of his birth, and in his Lord of the Isles, canto v , stanza 33, Sir Walter Scott assumes this to have been the case, but there is no evidence on the subject. Tradition on the contrary, if we may assume it to be represented by the mendacious Boece (Bellenden's Translation, xiv 5), describes him as "an Englishman born," and that excellent authority, Collins' Peerage (article earl of Aylesbury), expressly states that on his return from the Holy Land, de Brus went to reside in England Although, however, the lines of welcome to its halls on the occasion of his return from Rachrine, described in Scott's poem,

> "Once more behold the floor I trod
> In tottering infancy!
> And there the vaulted arch whose sound > Echoed my joyous shout and bound
> In boyhood, and that rung around > To youth's unthinking glee!"

cannot be literally true, there can be no doubt that Turnberry castle became the abode of his father during a part of his boyhood, and whilst the events, described in the life of his grandfather, page 403, as occurring there from 1286 to 1290, were taking place

In conformity with the practice of the barons of that age to send their children to the household of some noble, superior in rank, there to acquire the graces of society and the art of arms, young de Brus appears to have been placed in the household of Edward, king of England, where he was trained in those exercises of war and chivalry for which he became afterwards so distinguished That this was the consequence of the early friendship that existed between his father and that monarch, of which the language of a deed still extant bears witness, and not because the family of the elder de Brus was considered as aliens to Scotland, appears from the circumstance, that his grandfather continued to reside until his death in the ancestral castle of Lochmaben, and that all his sisters, six in number, were in early life married to Scottish barons In 1293, when just entering his seventeenth year, young de Brus was infefted in his mother's lands, and in the title of earl of Carrick, which devolved on him through her, lately deceased, and he rendered homage to Baliol for the same at his second parliament, held at Stirling in August and September of that year One chief cause of this infeftment was the unwillingness of his father to acknowledge the title of Baliol At the time this took place, as we are informed in the Scoto Chronicle, young Robert was "a young man in King Edward's chamber," when he was sent for by his father He also conferred on him the administration of his lands in Annandale at the same time In 1294, on the occasion of a war breaking out between England and France, a writ appears to have been sent to him as earl of Carrick by Edward, to serve in person during the expected campaign, but whether he complied with it does not appear He seems to have taken the same part as his father in aid of the English monarch, during his invasion of Scotland in 1296, on the occasion of the revolt of Baliol, which led to their castle of Lochmaben in Annandale being temporarily seized by Comyn, earl of Buchan, leader of the Scottish army, and after the decisive fight of Dunbar, 28th April, he was employed to receive for Edward the submissions of his own men of Carrick In August of the same year, when Edward held a parliament at Berwick for the settlement of Scotland, Bruce, then earl of Carrick, with the rest of the Scots nobility, renewed his oath of homage to the English monarch Up to and ever after this period, it is probable that not only both father and son but all the Scottish magnates of their party, who joined with them in that act of homage, entertained the expectation that when all was tranquilly settled in Scotland, the English king would confer the government of that kingdom as a king-fief of his crown upon the former The idea of his ruling it, even as lord paramount, except through the instrumentality of a native prince, was in antagonism not only to all historical precedent, but must have been repugnant to every feeling of nationality in their bosom If so, however, the establishment by Edward, on his leaving for England later in the autumn of that year, of the earl de Warenne as governor of Scotland, with Cressingham and Ormesby as treasurer and justiciary, proved the futility of their hopes

That young de Brus was dissatisfied with this settlement of the kingdom it was but natural to suppose, and on the appearance of Wallace, in the following summer (1297), carrying on a private warfare against the English in the south-west of Scotland, in which he was joined by various chiefs in the neighbourhood, his conduct became so equivocal, that, as Hemingford relates, the English wardens of the western marches summoned him to Carlisle to renew his oath of fidelity to Edward Probably being then unprepared to act on the offensive, he proceeded there with his vassals, and took a solemn oath on the consecrated host and the sword of Thomas à Becket, to assist Edward against the Scots and all his enemies To prove his sincerity, on his return to Annandale he made an inroad with his armed vassals upon the lands of William lord Douglas, knight of Liddesdale, one of the insurgent lords, and, after wasting them, carried off his wife and children to his castle at Tunberry

No sooner, however, was the danger over than the correctness of their suspicions was manifested by his joining the conspiracy of the Scottish leaders, and attempting on his return to Carrick to induce his father's vassals to rise with him In this perhaps he was not so much an active as a passive agent The revolt against the English rule had become so general, says Hemingford, as entirely to assume a national character, and the vassals of the barons could not be restrained by their chiefs from adhering to it By opposing it his own safety was likely to be compromised, and it seemed probable that all chance of his claim to the throne ever being recognised by the nation would be cut off There seems to have been strong hopes held out to him that the insurgents would adopt his cause It was publicly at this time reported, according to Hemingford, that he aspired to the throne All the leaders of the insurrection, except Wallace and Sir Andrew Moray, were those who had invariably supported the claims of his family Wishart, bishop of Glasgow, who had counselled their rising, was his firm friend, and the Comyns, who were his rivals in their own right and in that of Baliol, were with their partisans in confinement in England The men of Annandale, however, at first hesitated, asked a day to consider the matter, and quietly dispersed to their homes during the night With his own vassals of Carrick, however, he took up arms, and might, notwithstanding of his youth, have rendered important service to the national cause, had unity prevailed in their counsels, and had not the English forces been too active to permit it Wallace had determined to support the cause of Baliol He was the soul of the party, and not a few of the insurgents joined in his views The Comyns also had adherents in the camp The Scottish forces were numerous and strongly posted, but their leaders were actuated by opposing views First one, then others of them, left the camp and went over to the English Being thus taken at disadvantage by an army under Sir Henry Percy and Sir Robert Clifford, commanding in Scotland, the confederates were constrained to yield upon conditions at Irvine, on the 9th of July 1297 The document embodying their submission has been published in its original Norman French by Sir F Palgrave, and is that referred to in the note in the preceding life as having contained an error in transcription On this occasion so much difficulty was felt by the English commanders with respect to de Brus, that, as appears by another document of the same date, his daughter Marjory, then about four or five years of age, was required to be delivered to them as an hostage, and three magnates, of whom two were parties to the convention, became joint securities for his loyalty "with their lives, limbs, and estates," until that hostage should be delivered into their hands This Marjory was his only child by his first marriage with the daughter of the earl of Mar, who survived this bereavement only for a few months The conduct of Wallace on this occasion shows a fierce and intractable disposition Although included in the capitulation he refused to accede to its terms Ascribing the arrangement to the counsels of Wishart, bishop of Glasgow, he set fire to his house, plundered all his goods, and led his family captive The other barons honourably fulfilled their engagement

In the subsequent struggles of Wallace and his party de Brus took no active part, but in 1298, when Edward entered Scotland with a formidable army, he shut himself up in the castle of Ayr, and maintained a doubtful neutrality After the defeat of Wallace at Falkirk, Edward was about to attack the castle of Ayr, when de Brus, dreading the consequences, razed it to the ground, and retired into the recesses of Carrick In 1298, when Wallace had resigned the regency, John Comyn of Badenoch and Sir John Soulis were chosen guardians of the kingdom About a year afterwards, Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews, and the earl of Carrick then only in his twenty-fifth year, were, by general consent, added to the number

The conduct of de Brus, at this juncture, as throughout the entire period prior to his assumption of the crown, not being understood, has excited the wonder and regret of posterity Supple, dexterous, and accommodating,—now in arms for his country, and then leagued with her oppressors,—now swearing fealty to the English king, and again accepting the guardianship of Scotland in the name of Baliol, it seems to require all the energy, perseverance, and consummate prudence and valour of after years to redeem his character from the charge of apparent and culpable weakness De Brus the guardian of Scotland in the name of Baliol! says Lord Hailes, is one of those historical phenomena which are inexplicable Yet this conduct we have attempted to explain, and in part to vindicate, by the peculiarity of his circumstances, which necessitated a course different from what he would have chosen His grandfather, after vainly endeavouring to establish his pretensions to the throne of Scotland, had quietly acquiesced in the elevation of Baliol His father, sometime earl of Carrick, had submitted uniformly and implicitly to the superior ascendency of the English monarch Bruce, therefore, though convinced of his right to the Scottish throne, and determined to assert it, could not in the meantime, with decency or hope of success, urge a claim in his own person In doing so he would have had to contend with a rival who was at that time one of the most powerful men in the kingdom Baliol had renounced for ever all claim for himself, and his son was in captivity, but the claims and hopes of his family centred in John Comyn, commonly called the Red Comyn, the son of his sister Marjory, who was allied to many of the noblest families in Scotland and England, and who, by the decision of Edward, possessed, in succession, a clear right to the Scottish crown Between the families of Bruce and Comyn there had existed for many years all the jealousy and hatred which rival and irreconcileable interests could create The movements of both families, not only during the contests which occurred between the abdication of Baliol and the death of Wallace, but long afterwards, seem to have been decided rather by a regard to family interests than the good of their country They were uniformly ranged on opposite sides, with the exception of the brief period now referred to, when Bruce and Comyn were associated in the regency of the kingdom

All writers seem to think that this coalition had been mainly produced by a desire to crush Wallace, whose patriotism and influence endangered their common pretensions, and that that end once gained they returned to their former course of factious opposition and strife That the existence on the part of both of this feeling is true, and that, as respects Comyn at least, this was the ruling motive, we are not prepared to deny It was only the leaders of the army, however, who refused to serve under Wallace But de Brus was not with the army, nor in communication with it, until some time after the appointment of Comyn as guardian The battle of Falkirk was fought on 22d July 1298, Wallace's resignation followed immediately thereafter, as well as the appointment of Comyn as guardian, whilst the first appearance of the name of de Brus in connection with the office is on 13th Nov 1299 It has been supposed that de Brus was pressed upon the other guardians by Lamberton, the primate, as a condition of his (Lamberton's) accepting the same office, and for the sake of union and conciliation, and Lamberton was a friend of Wallace raised to the primacy by the determined will of that patriot alone [Palgrave documents] A more satisfactory explanation of his conduct may therefore be found in the not improbable conjecture, that the regency of 1299 was the result of a compromise in which the claims of Baliol, then in hopeless captivity in England, were understood to be abandoned The joint guardianship, whether established or not on this understanding, lasted only for a short time Lamberton and de Soulis went over to France as commissioners, with five others, there to watch over the national interests A cautious and far-seeing, but selfish policy, must have taken alarm on the prosperous appearance which Baliol's affairs soon afterwards began to assume, and probably offence at the proceedings of his representatives thereupon When the cause of the late imprisoned and abdicated king was taken up by the courts of France and Rome, when the genuineness of the deed of his resignation of the throne was denied by the Scottish emissaries at the latter court, when his person was released from prison, and delivered over to the Pope's nuncio at Witsand, 18th July 1299, and when a bull admonitory, in his interest, was served on Edward himself, by no less a personage than the archbishop of Canterbury (June 1300), we find that soon thereafter,—his lands of Annandale and Carrick having in the meantime been laid waste by the army of Edward,—de Brus once more abandoned a cause which had become again not that of his country but of his rival, and made his peace with Edward, by surrendering himself to John de St John, the English warden of the western marches

This view of the character of the guardianship of de Brus, amongst other proofs too minute for detail, receives confirmation from the circumstance that in the only public transaction occurring during its brief existence of which authentic documents have descended to us, namely, the adjustment of a truce with Edward, no mention is made by either party of Baliol as king of Scotland During the three successive campaigns which took place previous to the final subjugation of Scotland and the submission of the Comyns in 1304, de Brus continued faithful to Edward In all the proceedings which ensued upon that occasion, de Brus was treated by Edward with favour and confidence, and the settlement of Scotland was arranged by the English king on the plan recommended by de Brus

On the death of his father in 1304 he received possession of his lands in Annandale and in England, and became one of the most powerful of the northern barons There is no evidence that up to the death of Comyn in 1305-6 de Brus had entertained serious thoughts of attempting to assert his right to the Scottish crown He certainly was occupied in strengthening his friendships by bonds of the character of those that were common in that age, and that with the ulterior object of improving any occasion that might arise for this end But his knowledge of the character of Edward, and the closeness with which his proceedings were watched, were likely to induce him to postpone all hostile projects until more favourable circumstances should arise

The murder of John Comyn, younger of Badenoch, 10th February 1305-6, is one of those passages in the obscure history of that period which has exercised the patience and tried the candour of historians The contradictory and most improbable details of this event given by our Scottish historians, written as they were long after the event took place, can only be regarded as the embodiment and embellishment of national traditions, and unfortunately the contemporary writers of England are silent as to nearly all but the fact itself, and the accounts of later ones are as difficult to reconcile with probability as those of the Scottish Dismissing not a few particulars now proved to be either impossible or false, the circumstances which these historians relate as having led to and accompanied this murder are as follows That at a conference which took place between the rivals at Stirling, de Brus, after lamenting the misery to which the kingdom was reduced, made to him this proposal —"Support," says he, "my title to the throne, and I will give you all my lands, or bestow on me your lands, and I shall support your claim," that Comyn cheerfully acceded to the former alternative, waiving his own claims in favour of his rival, that a formal bond was, in consequence, drawn up and signed by the parties, that de Brus returned to London, matters not being yet matured sufficiently for open resistance to the English, and that Comyn, anxious to regain the favour of Edward, betrayed the plot to that monarch, and transmitted to him the agreement signed by de Brus

It is added that King Edward, on receiving this information, cherishing the design not only of seizing his person, but of involving him and his brothers in one common destruction, was so imprudent as to discover his purpose to some of the nobles of his court, that that very night the earl of Gloucester, under pretence of repaying a loan, sent de Brus a purse of money and a pair of gilded spurs—a hint which the latter understood, and, accompanied by a single attendant, he took horse and escaped with all speed into Scotland, that when near the Solway sands, he met a messenger travelling alone, whom he recognised as a follower of Comyn, that his suspicions were now awakened, and slaying the courier, he possessed himself of his despatches, in which he found further proofs of Comyn's treachery, accompanied by a recommendation to Edward to put his rival to instant death, that Bruce proceeded hastily on his journey, and repairing to Dumfries, requested a private interview with Comyn, which was held February 4, 1305, in the church of the Minorite Friars, that at first the meeting was friendly, and the two barons walked up towards the high altar together, that Bruce accused his rival of having betrayed their agreement to Edward,—"It is a falsehood you utter," said Comyn, and Bruce, without uttering a word, drew his dagger and stabbed him to the heart, that hastening instantly from the church, he rejoined his attendants, who were waiting for him without, and that seeing him pale and agitated, they eagerly inquired the cause,—"I doubt I have slain the red Comyn," was his answer "You doubt!" cried Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick fiercely, "Is that a matter to be left to doubt? I'se mak siccar," (I will make sure,) and rushing into the church with Sir James Lindesay and Sir Christopher Seton, they found the wounded man, and immediately despatched him, slaying, at the same time, Sir Robert Comyn, his uncle, who tried to defend him Lord Hailes, however, investigated this obscure transaction in 1767, with his usual impartiality and discrimination, and the conclusions at which he arrived have not been invalidated but rather confirmed by subsequent researches

We concur with him in thinking it was most improbable that de Brus should have made such a proposal to Comyn as is there stated, or that Comyn could suppose him to be sincere in doing so Fordun does not say which alternative Comyn accepted Barbour makes the proposal to have come from Comyn The answer given by de Brus was, "I will take the crown, it is mine of right," an answer likely to revive the old contention Barbour and Fordun represent the agreement to have been by indenture, of which each held a copy signed by the other—a most extraordinary circumstance, as they must have called in a third party Winton, on the other hand, describes it as a mere conversation as they were "riding fra Stirling" It is most improbable that Edward, in possession of such a document, should have concealed or delayed his purpose of apprehending de Brus for a single day Barbour reports that on receiving Comyn's part of the indenture Edward summoned a parliament, at which de Brus appeared,—that he there exhibited the indenture, and accused de Brus of treason,—and that de Brus asked to look at the paper till next day, and then disappeared Of course we know there was no such parliament, nor would that be the mode of procedure at one Not less unlikely is it that Edward would in a moment of unguarded festivity reveal his purpose against de Brus, if he was, as is stated, anxious to secure his absent brother It is altogether incomprehensible that the king's son-in-law Ralph de Monthermer, called by courtesy the earl of Gloucester, should have betrayed the secrets of his sovereign and benefactor Our historians have, evidently under mistake, meant this for the previous earl's father, who was a relation of de Brus's mother The purse of money and pair of gilded spurs should be "twelve pence and a pair of spurs," as in Fordun, a most mysterious and improbable restitution and mode of communication of danger

The whole antecedents would appear to be prepared, under the inventive powers of tradition, to account for the murder of Comyn as an act contemplated beforehand, whereas it is most evident that it was as unexpected on the part of de Brus as on that of his victim It was a hasty quarrel between two proud-spirited rivals De Brus had made no preparations to assert his pretensions to the crown, nor had he a single castle except Kildrummie in Aberdeenshire at his disposal Amidst a mass of contradictory improbabilities one genuine public contemporary document is worth a hundred conjectures In his first public instrument after the slaughter of Comyn, King Edward expressly says, that he reposed entire confidence in de Brus [Fœd ii 938] It is not easy to see how he could have done so, if he were possessed of written evidence to prove that the intentions of de Brus were hostile It was as little likely that de Brus could have known Comyn was to be present at Dumfries as that he would have proposed a sanctuary—a place so tremendous in the notions of those days—for the scene of action It is probable, however, that Comyn might have been endeavouring to instil some suspicions into the mind of Edward from jealousy of de Brus, and indeed there is a hint to this effect given by Hemingford, the most authentic because the best informed contemporary, and that reports of these might have reached the ears of de Brus or been referred to by Edward himself On meeting Comyn, therefore, de Brus demanded a private interview and an explanation In their conversation some hot words took place, and de Brus struck Comyn with his dagger The impetuous zeal of his followers aggravated the crime, and gave to the whole transaction the appearance of premeditated assassination Such is the conclusion at which we have been compelled to arrive, after a careful consideration of all the circumstances of an event which decided de Brus's destiny

Two months thereafter, March 27, Bruce, as we shall now call him, was crowned king at Scone The whole proceedings indicate haste and lack of preparation The regalia of Scotland, with the sacred stone and the regal mantle, had been carried off by Edward in 1296, but on this occasion the bishop of Glasgow furnished from his own wardrobe the robes in which Bruce was arrayed, he also presented to the new king a banner embroidered with the arms of Balliol, which he had concealed in his treasury A small circlet of gold was placed by the bishop of St Andrews on his head, and Robert the Bruce, sitting in the state chair of the abbot of Scone, received the homage of the few prelates and barons then assembled The earl of Fife, as the descendant of Macduff, possessed the hereditary right of crowning the kings of Scotland Duncan, the then earl, favoured the English interest, but his sister Isabella, countess of Buchan, with singular boldness and enthusiasm, repaired to Scone, and, asserting the privilege of her ancestors, a second time crowned Bruce king of Scotland, two days after the former coronation had taken place

The news of the murder of Comyn reached Edward while residing with his court at Winchester, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health He immediately nominated the earl of Pembroke governor of Scotland, ordered a new levy of troops, and, proceeding to London, held a solemn entertainment, in which his eldest son, the prince of Wales, with three hundred youths of the best families in England, received the honour of knighthood and, with the king, made a vow instantly to depart for Scotland, and take no rest till the death of Comyn was avenged on Bruce, and a terrible punishment inflicted on his adherents The earl of Pembroke and Henry Percy having reached and fortified Perth, Bruce, with his small band of followers, arrived in the neighbourhood, and sent a challenge to Pembroke, whose sister was the widow of the red Comyn, to come out and fight with him on the 18th of June Pembroke returned for answer that the day was too far spent, but that he would meet him on the morrow Satisfied with this assurance, Bruce retreated to the wood of Methven, where his little army, towards the close of the day, was unexpectedly attacked by Pembroke Bruce made a brave resistance, and after being four times unhorsed, was at last compelled, with about four hundred followers, to retreat into the wilds of Athol Here he and his small band for some time led the life of outlaws Having received intelligence that his youngest brother Nigel had arrived with his queen at Aberdeen, he proceeded there, and, on the advance of a superior body of the English, conducted them in safety into the mountainous district of Breadalbane The adventures through which, at this period, the king and his followers passed, and the perils and privations which they endured, are more like the incidents of romance than the details of history The lord of Lorn, Alexander, chief of the Macdougalls, who had married the aunt of the red Comyn, at the head of a thousand Highlanders, attacked the king at Dalry, near the head of Loch Tay, in a narrow defile, where Bruce's cavalry had not room to act, and he was compelled to retreat, fighting to the last At Craigrostan, on the western side of Benlomond, is a cave, to which tradition has assigned the honour of affording shelter to King Robert Bruce, and his followers, after his defeat by Macdougall Here, it is said, the Bruce passed the night, surrounded by a flock of goats, and he was so much pleased with his nocturnal associates that he afterwards made a law that all goats should be exempted from grassmail or rent Finding his cause becoming every day more desperate, he sent the queen and her ladies to Kildrummie castle, under the charge of Nigel Bruce and the earl of Athol, while he himself, with his remaining followers, amounting now only to about two hundred, resolved to force a passage to Kintyre, and escape from thence into the northern parts of Ireland On arriving at the banks of Loch Lomond, there appeared no mode of conveyance across the loch After much search, Sir James Douglas discovered in a creek a crazy little boat, by which they safely got across

While engaged in the chase, a resource to which they were driven for food, Bruce and his party accidentally met with Malcolm earl of Lennox, a staunch adherent of the king, who, pursued by the English, had also taken refuge there By his exertions the royal party were amply supplied with provisions, and enabled to reach in safety he castle of Dunaverty in Kintyre, where they were hospitably received by Angus of Isla, the lord of Kintyre After a stay of three days the king embarked with a few of his most faithful adherents, and, after weathering a dreadful storm, landed at the little island of Rachrine, about four miles distant from the north coast of Ireland On this small island he remained during the winter

In his absence the English monarch proceeded with unrelenting cruelty against his adherents in Scotland Nigel Bruce, with those chiefs who had aided him in the defence of Kildrummie castle, which they were compelled to surrender, were hurried in chains to Berwick, and immediately hanged Many others of noble rank shared a similar fate Even the female friends of Bruce did not escape King Edward's fury The queen her daughter Marjory, and their attendants, having taken refuge in the sanctuary of St Duthac, in Ross-shire, were sacrilegiously seized by the earl of Ross, and committed to an English prison The two sisters of Bruce were also imprisoned The countess of Buchan was suspended in a cage of wood and iron from one of the outer turrets of the castle of Berwick, in which she remained for four years

Bruce's estates, both in England and Scotland, were confiscated, and he himself and all his adherents were solemnly excommunicated by the Pope's legate at Carlisle Of these dire national and personal misfortunes, the king, in his island-retreat, was happily ignorant, and he had so effectually concealed himself, that it was generally believed that he was dead On the approach of spring, 1307, Bruce resolved to make one more effort for the recovery of his rights He set sail for the island of Arran, with thirty-three galleys and three hundred men He next made a descent upon Carrick, and, surprising at midnight the English troops in his own castle of Turnberry, then held by the Lord Henry Percy, he put nearly the whole garrison to the sword He now ravaged the neighbouring country, and levied the rents of his hereditary lands, while many of his vassals flocked to his standard

Meantime, an English force of a thousand strong, being raised in Northumberland, advanced into Ayrshire, and, unable to oppose it, Bruce retired into the mountainous districts of Carrick Percy soon after evacuated Turnberry castle, and returned to England This success was counterbalanced by the miscarriage of the king's brothers, Thomas and Alexander Bruce, who, with seven hundred men, attempting a descent at Loch Ryan, in Galloway, were attacked by Duncan Macdowall, a Celtic chief, and almost all cut to pieces The two brothers being taken prisoners, were conveyed to Carlisle and executed

While English reinforcements continued to pour into Scotland from all quarters, Bruce, shut up in the fastnesses of Carrick, found himself with only sixty men, the remainder having deserted him in the belief that his cause was hopeless Beset on every side by the English, he was also exposed to danger from private treachery, and his escapes were often almost miraculous Among the most inveterate of his foes were the men of Galloway, who, hoping to effect his destruction and that of all his followers, collected about two hundred men, and accompanied by bloodhounds, came to attack his encampment, which was defended in the rear by a rapid mountain stream, the banks of which were steep and covered with wood Bruce received timely notice of his danger, and crossing the stream at night, withdrew his men to a swampy level at a short distance from the rivulet, which had only one narrow ford, over which the enemy must necessarily pass Commanding his soldiers to remain quiet and keep a strict watch, he and two followers went forward to reconnoitre The pathway which led to the ford could allow only one man at a time to advance through it The yell of a bloodhound in the distance told him of the approach of his enemies, and in a short space he perceived, by the light of the moon, the Galloway men on horseback on the opposite bank They soon passed the ford, and one by one began to make their appearance up the path to the spot where the king stood, calmly awaiting their coming On first seeing them, he had sent off his attendants to order his soldiers to advance instantly to his relief The foremost of his foes rode boldly forward to attack the solitary individual who was thus hardy enough to dispute the passage, when a thrust of Bruce's spear laid him dead on the spot The next and the next shared the same fate, and as each fell, Bruce, with his short dagger, stabbed their horses, and the dead bodies formed a sort of rampart against the others At length, the loud shout of the king's followers, advancing to the rescue, with Sir Gilbert de la Haye at their head, warned the enemy to retire, after sustaining a loss of fourteen men Bruce was shortly afterwards rejoined by Sir James Douglas, but his whole force at this time did not exceed in all four hundred men, with which he resolved to meet the earl of Pembroke, and his old enemy John of Lorn, who, with a superior army of English cavalry and savage Highlanders, were advancing against him Being attacked by the English in front, and at the same time by the men of Lorn in the rear, Bruce's little band suddenly divided into small parties, and fled in separate directions Lorn had with him a bloodhound which had once belonged to Bruce himself, and which being now let loose, singled out his master's footsteps, and followed on his track, until, coming to a running stream, the king, who was accompanied only by a single follower, plunged into the water, and turning with his companion into the adjoining thicket, continued his retreat in safety Having regained the place agreed upon as the rendezvous of his followers, that night the advanced post of the English was surprised by Bruce, and upwards of a hundred put to the sword The earl of Pembroke in consequence retired to Carlisle

Bruce now ventured down upon the low country, and reduced the districts of Kyle, Carrick, and Cunningham Having received a reinforcement from England, the earl of Pembroke again advanced into Ayrshire at the head of three thousand men, principally cavalry, and was met, May 10, 1307, by Bruce at Loudon Hill, with only six hundred men, when the English sustained a total defeat It was here that Bruce first learned that great lesson in warfare, which now forms one of the most efficient features of modern strategy, namely, that a firm unflinching infantry, drawn up in square, can successfully resist the encounter of mounted troopers, and this secret it was the more important for him to know, as the English excelled in cavalry Three days after, Bruce encountered Ralph Monthermer, earl of Gloucester, and defeated him with great slaughter These successes

so animated the Scots, that they flocked from all quarters to the national standard

Edward the First at this time lay upon his deathbed at Carlisle, but, roused by intelligence of the repeated victories gained by Bruce, whom he thought dead and Scotland totally subdued, he summoned the whole force of his kingdom to assemble, and hanging up his litter, in which he had hitherto accompanied his troops, above the high altar of the cathedral of Carlisle, he mounted his war-horse, and attempted to lead his army northward But the hand of death was upon him In four days he had only advanced six miles, and he expired at Burgh-upon-Sands, an obscure village on the Borders, July 7, 1307, in the 69th year of his age, and the 35th of his reign With his last breath he directed that his heart should be sent to Jerusalem, and that his skeleton, after the flesh had been boiled from the bones, should be carried at the head of the army, to frighten the Scots into subjection Edward the Second solemnly swore to observe the dying requests of his father, but he performed neither—the deceased monarch being buried, with his heart entire, and his bones unboiled, at Westminster The new king marched as far as Cumnock in Ayrshire, appointed the earl of Pembroke guardian of the kingdom, and then hurried back to London

Bruce now made an expedition into the north of Scotland, and brought under his dominion the territories of Argyle, and afterwards took the fortresses of Inverness, Forfar, and Brechin Conducting his army into Buchan, the country of the Comyns, he wasted the land with fire and sword, and nearly depopulated the district He soon after stormed and demolished the castle of Aberdeen, which was held by an English garrison In the meantime, Sir James Douglas was not idle For the third time he took his own castle of Douglas, and reduced the whole forest of Selkirk, besides Douglasdale and Jedburgh, to the subjection of Bruce Bruce and his army next attacked and defeated the Lord of Lorn at the pass of Brandir, in the Western Highlands, and gave up his country to plunder The Lord of Lorn having taken refuge in the castle of Dunstaffnage, was besieged in that fortress and compelled to surrender, when he swore fealty to the conqueror

In February 1309, the clergy of Scotland met in a provincial council at Dundee, and issued a declaration that the Scottish nation had chosen for their king Robert the Bruce, who, through his father and grandfather, possessed an undoubted right to the throne, and that they willingly did homage to him as their sovereign Edward the Second, harassed by the dissensions of his nobility, found it necessary to agree to a truce, which, though only of short duration, enabled Bruce to consolidate his power, and complete his preparations for the invasion of England At the expiry of the truce he accordingly advanced into Durham, laying waste the country with fire and sword, and giving up the whole district to the unbridled licence of the soldiery In the same year, Edward, in his turn, with an immense army, invaded Scotland, and proceeded as far as Edinburgh, but the winter approaching, and finding that the Scots had removed all their provisions into the mountain fastnesses, he was compelled ingloriously to retreat to Berwick-upon-Tweed After this the Scots, now inured to conquest, again and again broke into England, ravaging the country, and driving home the flocks and herds of their enemies At one period Edward sent his favourite Gaveston, earl of Cornwall, with an army into Scotland, but that doughty commander was not the most likely person to vanquish Robert the Bruce and his hardy Scots The town of Perth, one of the chief garrisons of the English in Scotland, was soon afterwards gallantly stormed, the king himself being the first person who scaled the walls

In harvest 1312, Bruce again invaded England, and several towns, among which were Hexham and Corbrigg, were given to the flames Although repulsed in their assaults on Carlisle and Berwick, the Scots only consented to a truce on the immediate payment of a large sum of money by the clergy and inhabitants of Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland The castle of Linlithgow was taken by a countryman, named William Binnock or Binnie, who, concealing eight men in a load of hay, with several more lying in ambush in the copsewood near the castle gate, surprised that strong fortress, and put the whole of the English to the sword The strong border fortress of Roxburgh was also captured by

Sir James Douglas, and, about the same time, the castle of Edinburgh, which, from its situation, was considered nearly impregnable, fell into the hands of Randolph, the son of Isabel Bruce, the king's sister In the same year, nearly all the fortresses in the kingdom remaining in the possession of the English, were taken, one after another, by the Scots

Bruce himself had led an expedition against the Isle of Man, which, after having expelled the powerful sept of the Macdowalls, his inveterate enemies, he reduced to his sway On his return home in the autumn of 1313, he found that his brother, Edward Bruce, was engaged in the siege of the castle of Stirling, which was held by Sir Philip Mowbray for the English Mowbray gallantly defended it for some time, but as the garrison began to suffer from famine, he prevailed on Edward Bruce to agree to a treaty, by which he bound himself to surrender the castle, if it was not relieved by an English army before the 24th of June in the ensuing year This agreement the king of Scotland heard of with displeasure, nevertheless, as the honour of his brother was pledged, he resolved to abide by it King Edward, on his part roused himself from the lethargy into which he had fallen He reconciled himself for the time to his nobles, and summoned all his barons and fiefs, not only in England, but in Ireland and Wales, to aid him with all their followers, and he appointed the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed to be the rendezvous of the forces, on the 11th June The troops collected there that day amounted, at the lowest calculation, to a hundred thousand men, the most numerous and best appointed army that had ever advanced against Scotland Of these forty thousand were cavalry, three thousand of whom were armed, from head to foot, in plate and mail To this force Bruce could only oppose an army of thirty thousand men, but these were hardy, brave, and experienced troops, led by the first warrior of his age, and all burning to avenge the wrongs of their country The camp-followers, baggage-drivers, sutlers, &c, amounted to about fifteen thousand more, and these, though useless in the field of battle, were destined to perform a signal service in the approaching struggle Bruce judiciously chose his ground at Bannockburn, within four miles of Stirling On his left, where the ground was bare and open, and favourable for the movements of cavalry, he caused parallel rows of pits to be dug, each about a foot in breadth, and about three feet deep, which, after having sharp-pointed stakes placed in them, were carefully covered over with sod His brother Edward Bruce, his nephew Randolph, earl of Moray, Walter, the high steward of Scotland, and Sir James Douglas, were the leaders of the principal divisions The king himself took the command of the reserve, consisting chiefly of his own vassals of Carrick and the men of Argyle, Kintyre, and the Isles The battle of Bannockburn was fought on the 24th of June 1314

At the moment when the English, vigorously attacked by Bruce himself at the head of the reserve, seconded by the divisions under Edward Bruce, Randolph, and Sir James Douglas, were, throughout their whole line, thrown into confusion, the waggoners, sumpter-boys, and followers of the camp, having formed themselves into squadrons, with sheets, blankets, &c, fixed upon poles, to look like military banners, suddenly appeared on the summit of the Gillieshill, and at once decided the fortune of the day The already dispirited English, supposing them to be a fresh army come to the assistance of the Scots, threw down their arms, and fled in all directions Thirty thousand English were left dead upon the field, and among them were two hundred knights and seven hundred esquires Twenty-seven of the noblest barons of England were laid with their banners in the dust The young earl of Gloucester, the brave Sir Giles d'Argentine, Sir Robert Clifford, and Sir Edward Mauley, seneschal of England, were among the slain King Edward himself only escaped by the fleetness of his horse So great was the moral effect of this memorable victory, that, according to Walsingham, a contemporary English historian, at this time a hundred of his countrymen would have fled from before the face of two or three Scotsmen The day after the battle, the castle of Stirling surrendered, and Sir Philip Mowbray entered into the service of Scotland The earl of Hereford, escaping to the castle of Bothwell, was retained a prisoner by Sir Walter Fitz-Gilbert, who held it for the English king, but who, changing sides at this critical juncture, received a grant of lands and became the founder of the noble house of Hamilton For the earl of Hereford, the wife, sister, and daughter of Bruce, with Wishart, bishop of Glasgow, and the young earl of Mar, were exchanged by the English, and restored to their country Three times within the same year did the victorious Scots invade England, ravaging the districts through which they passed, and returning home laden with spoil

The Irish of Ulster having solicited aid from the king of Scots, Edward Bruce passed over to that country, whither he was soon followed by the king himself, who, after defeating the Anglo-Irish, under the baron of Clare, returned home in safety, leaving his brother to pursue his projects of conquest, till his defeat and death in the battle at Dundalk in 1318 In the meantime, the war with England was renewed, but the events connected with it belong rather to history than to the personal details of Bruce's life Baffled in all his attempts against the Scots, Edward the Second procured from the Pope, John the Twenty-second, a bull, commanding a truce for two years between Scotland and England Two cardinals were intrusted with this mission, and they also received private authority from the Pope to excommunicate the king of Scotland, and whomsoever else they thought fit, if necessary The cardinals, on their arrival in England, sent two messengers into Scotland, to convey the apostolic mandate Bruce listened with attention to the Pope's message, but when the letters sealed and addressed "Robert Bruce, Governor of Scotland," were presented to him, he firmly but respectfully declined to receive them "These epistles," he said, "I may not open or read Among my barons there are many of the name of Robert Bruce, and some of them may have a share in the government of Scotland These letters may possibly be intended for one of them—they cannot be for me, for I am King of Scotland!" The nuncios attempted to excuse the omission, by saying, that "the Holy Church was not wont, during the dependence of a controversy, to say or do aught which might prejudice the claims of either contending party" The reply of the king, the nuncios, with all their sophistry, found it impossible to answer "Since then," said he, "my spiritual father and my holy mother would not prejudice the cause of my adversary by bestowing on me the title of king during the dependence of the controversy, they ought not to have prejudiced my cause by withdrawing that title from me It seems that my parents are partial to their English son! Had you," he added with dignity, "presumed to present letters with such an address to any other sovereign prince, you might perhaps have been answered more harshly, but I reverence you as the messengers of the Holy See" The disappointed nuncios returned to England, upon which the cardinals sent a priest, named Adam Newton, to Scotland, to proclaim the papal truce He found Bruce encamped with his army in a wood near Old Cambus, preparing for the assault of Berwick, which still remained in possession of the English On demanding to see the king, he was ordered to give what letters he had to the king's seneschal, who would deliver them to his master These, addressed as before, were instantly returned to him unopened, with a message from Bruce that "he would listen to no bulls until he was treated as king of Scotland, and had made himself master of Berwick" The monk was refused a safe conduct home, and, on the road to Berwick, he was attacked by four outlaws, who tore and scattered to the winds his papers and credentials, plundered him of his bull and the greater part of his clothes, and left him to find his way as best he could

Berwick shortly afterwards fell into Bruce's hands, and, in the spring of 1318, the Scottish army invaded England by Northumberland, and took several castles, returning home, "driving their prisoners like flocks of sheep before them" Resolved to recover Berwick, Edward the Second, on the 24th of July 1319, invested that town by land and sea, but was unsuccessful in all his attacks Douglas, to create a diversion, invaded England, and September 20, defeated a large army of priests and rustics under the archbishop of York, at Mitton on the river Swale On account of the great number of ecclesiastics who fell in this battle, it is known in history as "the Chapter of Mitton" The siege of Berwick was in consequence raised, and the English king attempted in vain to intercept the Scottish army on their homeward march Bruce having been, at the instigation of Edward, excommunicated by the Pope, the estates of the kingdom, April 6, 1320, transmitted a spirited manifesto to his holiness, which caused him to recommend to Edward pacific measures, to which that ill-fated monarch would not hearken He led a great army into Scotland as far as Edinburgh, but Bruce having laid waste the whole country to the Frith of Forth, his soldiers were in danger of perishing for want of provisions A solitary lame bull, which they picked up at Tranent, was all the prey that they could secure in their march "Is that all ye have got?" said the earl de Warenne to the foragers as he eyed the sorry animal "By my faith, I never saw beef so dear!" Edward was compelled to retreat, and on their way back to England, his half-famished soldiers in revenge burned the monasteries of Dryburgh and Melrose, after plundering the shrines, and murdering the monks

Bruce himself, subsequently, at the head of an army, invaded England, and after besieging Norham castle, defeated Edward once more at Biland Abbey, in Yorkshire A truce was in consequence ratified between the two kingdoms at Berwick, June 7, 1323, to last for thirteen years Bruce was now anxious to be reconciled to the Pope, and accordingly despatched Randolph to Rome for the purpose, when his holiness agreed not to renew his former censures In 1327, on the accession of Edward the Third to the English throne, hostilities between the two kingdoms almost immediately recommenced, but the Scots being again victorious, the English government were at last convinced of the necessity of agreeing to a permanent peace After several meetings of the commissioners of both countries, the treaty was finally ratified in a parliament held at Northampton, March 4, 1328, the principal articles of which were the recognition of the independence of Scotland, and of Bruce's title to the throne, and the marriage of Joanna, sister of the king of England, to David, the son and heir of the king of Scots Bruce's glorious career was now drawing to a close This last act was a fitting consummation of his labours He had achieved liberty, independence, and peace for his country, the three greatest blessings he could bequeath to it, and he now prepared to depart in peace The hardships and sufferings which he had endured had reduced his once strong constitution, and he became sorely afflicted with a disease in his blood, called a leprosy, which brought on premature old age The last two years of his life were spent in comparative seclusion, in a castle at Cardross, on the northern shore of the Frith of Clyde, where he devoted his time principally to the building of ships, and to aquatic and fishing excursions, hawking, and other sports He was very charitable to the poor, and kind and courteous to all who approached him It is also known that, among other animals, he kept a tame lion beside him, of which he was very fond He contemplated the approach of death with calmness and resignation The only thought that troubled him in his dying hours was, that he was still under the excommunication of the church, and to make all the reparation in his power, he commissioned Sir James Douglas to carry his heart to Palestine, and bury it in the holy city This great monarch, unquestionably the greatest of the Scottish kings, expired June 7, 1329, in the 55th year of his age, and 23d of his reign His heart was extracted and embalmed, and delivered over to Douglas, who was killed fighting against the Moors in Spain, and the sacred relic of Bruce, with the body of its devoted champion, was brought home, and buried in the monastery of Melrose Bruce's body was interred in the Abbey Church of Dunfermline.

where, in the year 1818, in clearing the foundations for a third church on the same spot, his bones were discovered King Robert the Bruce was twice married, first to Isabella, daughter of Donald, tenth earl of Mar, by whom he had one daughter, Marjory, the wife of Walter the high steward, whose son was afterwards Robert the Second, and, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Aymer de Burgh, earl of Ulster, by whom he had David, who succeeded him, and two daughters

BRUCE, EDWARD, crowned king of Ireland, was the brother of Robert the Bruce, and companion in many of his exploits In 1308 he was sent by his brother, with a considerable force, into Galloway, to reduce that country to subjection He took and dismantled several castles and strongholds held by the enemy, defeated the English twice, once under Sir Ingram de Umfraville, and again under the earl of Pembroke, and, after encountering and dispersing a numerous army of the inhabitants under Donald of the Isles, and Sir Roland, a Galwegian chief, he made himself lord of Galloway He was actively engaged in all the scenes of strife and contention of that eventful period In 1313, after having besieged for a long time the strong castle of Stirling in vain, he concluded an agreement with Sir Philip de Mowbray, the English governor, that the castle should be surrendered, if not relieved by Edward the Second before the feast of St John the Baptist, at the ensuing midsummer This agreement led to the decisive victory of Bannockburn, which secured the independence of Scotland, and, with the subsequent successes of the Scots, induced the Irish to solicit their aid against their English oppressors In 1315 a number of the chieftains of Ulster and others made an offer of the crown of Ireland to Edward Bruce, on condition of his assisting them in expelling the English from the island Edward, though deficient in the coolness and sagacity that distinguished his brother, possessed a chivalric bearing, and a dashing impetuous valour, which was not exceeded by any warrior of his time "This Edward," says Barbour, "was a noble knight, of joyous and delightful manners, but outrageously hardy in his enterprises, and so bold in what he undertook, that he was not to be deterred by any superiority of numbers, as he had gained such renown amongst his peers, that he was accustomed very commonly to conquer a multitude of the enemy with a handful of his own men" He was of a fierce disposition, restlessly ambitious, and fond of dangerous enterprises In many points, both of his character and life, making due allowance, of course, for the difference of times, he strongly resembled Joachim Murat, king of Naples Eagerly embracing the offer, Edward Bruce embarked at Ayr, in May 1315, and landed on the 25th of the same month, near Carrickfergus, at the head of a small army of six thousand men, having with him as leaders, Randolph, earl of Moray, Sir John Soulis, Sir John Stewart, Sir Fergus of Ardrossan, and other knights No sooner had he found a footing in Ireland, than he attacked the English wherever he met them, and in spite of their superior numbers, was always victorious He soon made himself master of the province of Ulster, and was crowned king of Ireland, May 2, 1316 His small army being much reduced by the constant fighting in which he was engaged, he received an accession of force from his brother, and in the spring of 1317, King Robert himself arrived in Ireland with reinforcements After gaining a victory over the Anglo-Irish army near Carrickfergus, and penetrating a considerable distance into the country, King Robert, from the vast superiority of numbers of the English, and the fickleness and treachery of the Irish, soon became convinced that the permanent occupation of Ireland was impracticable, and returned to Scotland Edward Bruce, on his part, remained in Ulster, resolved to maintain with his sword the precarious crown he had won But his life and conquests were terminated at once by the fatal battle of Dundalk, October 5, 1317 The Scottish prince, with only two thousand men, resolved to encounter the English army, which amounted to nearly forty thousand troops On this occasion the Irish deserted their Scots allies, and retreated to a neighbouring eminence, and the English, as might have been expected, gained a complete victory Edward Bruce was killed in an early part of the battle He had been singled out by an English knight named John Maupas, who, after a desperate hand to hand combat, slew him, but not before he had himself received his death-wound At the close of the battle, the bodies of the two champions were found lying stretched upon each other as they had fallen The English leaders ungenerously mangled and divided the body of Edward Bruce into four quarters, and preserved the head in salt in a little kit or barrel, to be sent as an appropriate present to the king of England But, according to Barbour, the body thus ignominiously treated was that of Gilbert Harper, a yeoman belonging to Edward Bruce's household, whose intrepidity on a former occasion had saved the Scots army on being surprised at Carrickfergus, and who, by a customary practice of those days, wore the armour and surcoat of the king, his master, on the day of battle, whilst Edward Bruce himself was plainly dressed, and without any ornament or indication of his rank The small remnant of the Scottish army, under the command of John Thomson, leader of the men of Carrick, retreated to Carrickfergus, whence they embarked for Scotland

From the Bruces of Clackmannan, whose direct male line became extinct in July 1772, most of the families of the name in Scotland trace their descent The progenitor of that house was Sir Robert Bruce, who obtained from King David the Second a charter,—granted to his "beloved and faithful cousin," delecto et fideli consanguineo suo Roberto Bruis,—of the castle and manor of Clackmannan, dated 9th December 1359 By his wife Isabel, daughter of Sir Robert Stewart, ancestor of the family of Rosythe, he had a numerous issue He died about 1390 Sir Robert, his eldest son married a daughter of Sir John Scrimgeour of Dudhope, ancestor of the earls of Dundee, and had two sons The elder carried on the line of the family Thomas, the younger, was the progenitor of the Bruces of Kennet near Clackmannan, which family having terminated in a female, Margaret, only daughter of the sixth Bruce of Kennet, by his wife, a daughter of Kinnimmount of that ilk in Fifeshire, she married in 1568, Archibald Bruce, son of David Bruce of Green, and grandson of Sir David Bruce, the sixth baron of Clackmannan Robert Bruce, great grandson of this Archibald, was father of David Bruce, from whom the family of Kennet are descended, one of whom, Robert, was a lord of session, under the title of Lord Kennet He was the son of Alexander Bruce of Kennet, by Mary, second daughter of Robert, fourth Lord Burleigh He passed advocate 15th January 1713 was appointed professor of the law of nature and nations in the university of Edinburgh, 22d June 1759, in the following year he was constituted sheriff depute of the counties of Stirling and Clackmannan, and 4th July, 1761, was promoted to the bench, and took his seat as Lord Kennet On the 16th November 1769 he became a lord of justiciary He died at Kennet 8th April 1785 Through Lord Kennet's mother the laird of Kennet claims the barony of Burleigh [See BARFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Lord, ante, p 211 The Rev Alexander Bruce of Gartlet, second son of the above Robert, and brother of David Bruce of Kennet, was an eminent divine His line is now represented (1856) by William Downing Bruce, F S A of Lincoln's Inn, barrister-at law

Sir David Bruce, the sixth baron of Clackmannan, was father of Sir Edward Bruce of Kinloss, whose grandson, Edward Bruce, the celebrated lawyer, was created in 1602 Lord Bruce of Kinloss Thomas Bruce, the grandson of the latter, was, in 1633, created earl of Elgin in Scotland, and made a baron of England by the title of Lord Bruce of Whorlton [See ELGIN, earl of] From Sir George Bruce of Carnock, younger brother of the first lord Bruce of Kinloss, the present earl of Elgin is descended in a direct male line

Henry Bruce, the fifteenth and last baron of Clackmannan, chief of the Bruces, married Catherine, daughter of Alexander Bruce, Esq, of the family of Newton, by whom he had two daughters, who both died in infancy His own death took place in 1772 His widow died in 1796, at the advanced age of ninety-five In August 1787 she was visited by the poet Burns, accompanied by Mr M Adair, (afterwards Dr Adair of Harrowgate) who, in his account of the excursion, says, "A visit to Mrs Bruce of Clackmannan, a lady above ninety, the lineal descendant of that race which gave the Scottish throne its brightest ornament, interested the poet's feelings powerfully This venerable dame, with characteristic dignity, informed me, on my observing that I believed she was descended from the family of Robert Bruce, that Robert Bruce was sprung from her family Though almost deprived of speech by a paralytic affection, she preserved her hospitality and urbanity She was in possession of the hero's helmet and two-handed sword, with which she conferred on Burns and myself the honour of knighthood, remarking that she had a better right to confer that title than some people" At her death she bequeathed to the earl of Elgin, the representative of her family, and chief of the house of Bruce, the sword and what was said to have been the helmet of Bruce above spoken of They were long preserved in the tower or keep of Clackmannan, (the remains of a castle of King Robert Bruce,) a view of which is given in Grose's 'Antiquities of Scotland,' and are now at Broomhall in Fifeshire, a seat of the earl of Elgin

Sir Alexander Bruce of Airth, in the county of Stirling, lineally descended from Sir Robert Bruce, knight of Clackmannan, married Janet, daughter of Alexander, fifth Lord Livingston, and had several sons Sir John Bruce, the eldest son, was ancestor of the Bruces of Airth, represented by Bruce of Stenhouse in Stirlingshire, whose ancestor was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1629

The Rev Robert Bruce, the second son, whose life is subsequently given, became the progenitor of the Bruces of Kinnaird, and also of the Bruces of Downhill, in the county of Londonderry, Ireland, on which latter family a baronetcy was conferred in 1804

Thomas Bruce, another son, was ancestor of Robert, Viscount de Bruce of Paris

BRUCE, EDWARD, an eminent lawyer and statesman, the second son of Sir Edward Bruce of Blairhall, Fifeshire, by his wife, Alison, daughter of William Reid of Aikenhead, county of Clackmannan, sister of Robert, bishop of Orkney, was born about the year 1549 He was educated for the law, and soon after being admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, he was appointed one of the judges of the commissary court at Edinburgh, in the room of Robert, dean of Aberdeen, who had been also a lord of session, and was superseded in January 1576, on account of his "inhabilitie" From the Pitmedden manuscript in the Advocates' Library we learn, that on the 14th of July 1584, Bruce appeared before the judges of the court of session, and declared, that though nominated commissary of Edinburgh in the place of the dean of Aberdeen, he would take no benefit therefrom during the life of Mr Alexander Sym, also one of the commissaries, but that all fees and profits of the place should accrue to the lords of session On the 27th July 1583 he was made commendator of Kinloss, under a reservation of the liferent of Walter, the abbot of Kinloss About the same time he was appointed one of the deputes of the lord justice general of Scotland In 1587, when the General Assembly sent commissioners to parliament to demand the removal of the Tulchan bishops from the legislature, Bruce energetically defended the prelates, vindicating their right to sit and vote for the church, and addressing himself directly to the king, who was present, he complained that the Presbyterian clergy having shut them forth of their places in the church, now wanted to exclude them from their places in the state Mr Robert Pont, a Presbyterian minister, one of the commissioners of the church, was interrupted in his reply by the king, who ordered them to present their petition in proper form to the lords of the articles When it came before the latter it was rejected without observation In 1594 Bruce was sent on an embassy to Queen Elizabeth, to complain of the harbour afforded to the earl of Bothwell in her dominions, when, rather than deliver him up, she commanded the earl to depart the realm of England In 1597 Bruce was named one of the parliamentary overseers of a taxation of two hundred thousand pounds Scots, at that time granted to James the Sixth, for "Reiking out ambassadors and other wechty affairs," and on 2d December of that year he was appointed one of the lords of session In the subsequent year he was again sent to England, to obtain the queen's recognition of James as her successor to the English throne Although he failed in the object of his embassy, his skill and address enabled him to secure many of the English nobility to his sovereign's interest In 1601 he was for the third time despatched to England with the earl of Mar, to intercede for the earl of Essex, but they did not arrive till after the execution of that unhappy nobleman Not wishing, however, to appear before Elizabeth without an object, the ambassadors adroitly converted their message into one of congratulation to the queen on her escape from the conspiracy in which Essex had been engaged On this occasion Bruce did not neglect his master's cause, having had the good fortune to establish a correspondence between James and Cecil, which contributed materially to James's peaceable accession to the throne of England On his return he was knighted, and raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Bruce of Kinloss Two years afterwards he accompanied King James to England, and March 3, 1603, was nominated a member of the king's council Shortly after he was made master of the rolls, when he resigned his seat as one of the lords of session He died January 14, 1611, in the 62d year of his age, and was buried in the Rolls chapel, in Chancery Lane London, where a monument was erected to his memory, with his effigies in a recumbent posture, in his robes as master of the rolls, an engraving of which is inserted in Pinkerton's Gallery of Scottish Portraits, vol i He had married Magdalene, daughter of Sir Alexander Clerk of Balbirnie, in Fife, some time lord provost of Edinburgh, by whom he had two sons and a daughter Through one of his sons he was ancestor of the noble house of Aylesbury in the British peerage, and through the other of that of Elgin and Kincardine in Scotland The male lines of both houses are now extinct [See ELGIN, earl of] The daughter was the wife of William, second earl of Devonshire, to whom King James, with his own hands, gave ten thousand pounds as her marriage portion

BRUCE, ROBERT, a distinguished minister and a principal leader of the church of Scotland during the reign of James the Sixth, was born, some accounts say in 1554, and others in 1556, but according to Wodrow, about 1559 He was the second son of Alexander Bruce of Airth, in the county of Stirling, by Janet, daughter of Alexander fifth Lord Livingstone, and Agnes, daughter of the second earl of Morton By descent, he was a collateral relation of his great namesake King

Robert the Bruce, while James Bruce the Abyssinian traveller, was his descendant in the sixth generation His father, a rude and powerful baron, was occasionally engaged in feuds with his neighbours, like others of his class, and we find it recorded in Birrel's Diary (p 13) that on the 24th November 1567, at two in the afternoon the laird of Airth and the laird of Wemyss met in the High Street of Edinburgh, when they and their followers fought a bloody skirmish, many being wounded on both sides, with 'shot of pistol' The eldest son, as he was to inherit the family property, was educated at home, but the second son, being designed for the law, after attending a course of philosophy in the university of St Andrews, was sent to Paris, where and at the university of Louvain in the Low Countries, he studied humanity and the principles of Roman jurisprudence He completed his education at the university of Edinburgh, and conducted for some time his father s affairs before the court of session, as well as managed such business as was intrusted to him by his friends and acquaintances 'His reputation,' says Wodrow, 'for knowledge in law and practice was so much daily advancing that a design was formed to make him one of the senators of the college of justice, and with this view his father provided him in the lands and barony of Kinnaird' It is stated that the corrupt system of those days, which extended even to the court of session, enabled his father to secure for him a judgeship by patent He preferred however to enter the ministry, contrary to the wishes of his parents, and in particular of his mother, who only consented, after his father had given his reluctant permission, on condition that he relinquished the estate of Kinnaird, in which he had been infeft 'That,' he says, 'I did willinglie, cast my clothes from me, my vaine and glorious apparell, sent my horse to the faire, and emptied my hands of all impediments' [Calderwood's History of the Kirk of Scotland, vol iv p 636] In October 1583, he went to the university of St Andrews, to study theology under Andrew Melville, then professor of divinity in the New College, and continued there till 1587 He said to Mr James Melville, one day while walking with him in the fields, 'that ere he cast himself again in that torment of conscience which was layed on him for resisting the calling of God to the studie of theologie and ministrie, he had rather goe through a fire of brimstone half a mile long' [Ibid p 19]

In the beginning of February 1584, Andrew Melville was summoned to appear before the secret council at Edinburgh, for using certain expressions in a fast-day sermon, which were held to be seditious On his appearance he denied the charge, declined the authority of any civil court in matters of religion, and appealed to a trial at St Andrew's by his brethren, and the testimony of his own congregation The university sent Mr Bruce, then a student in theology, and Mr Robert Wilkie, with an attestation signed by thirty of that body, declaring his innocence To avoid imprisonment, however, he was obliged to retire to England, but in April 1586 was permitted to return to St Andrews, and while Bruce enjoyed the advantages of his lectures as theological professor, he seems to have imbibed no small portion of his indomitable spirit In June 1587, he accompanied Melville to Edinburgh, and in the General Assembly which met the 20th of that month, and of which Melville was elected moderator, he was chosen one of the assessors He was also appointed one of the commissioners to present the acts and petitions of the Assembly to the king and parliament By Melville he was recommended as a fit person to succeed the deceased Mr James Lawson, the successor of John Knox, as one of the ministers of Edinburgh He was accordingly chosen by the Assembly, but at first declined to accept the charge, promising, however, to preach till the next Synod, as he preferred rather to go to St Andrews, where he had a call, "for," he says, "I had no will of the court, for I knew weill that the court and we could never agree" A deputation was, however, soon sent to St Andrews, to invite him back to Edinburgh A few weeks after his return, being present at the administration of the sacrament, one of the ministers employed in the service desired Mr Bruce to sit beside him, and after having dispensed the ordinance in part, left the church, and sent a message to Mr Bruce to serve the rest of the tables Imagining the minister to have been taken suddenly ill, and being pressed by many in the congregation to undertake the service, he proceeded to the remainder of the dispensation He afterwards accepted the charge, but would never submit to ordination, deeming that he had sufficient warrant, in the unanimous call of the people and the approbation of his brethren, for undertaking the duties of the ministry, and as he had dispensed the sacrament he would not allow any subsequent ceremony to disannul that act

On the 6th February 1588, he was chosen moderator of an extraordinary meeting of the General Assembly, called to consider the great dangers to the protestant faith and the realm, arising from the intrigues of the popish party, previous to the threatened invasion of the Spanish Armada In the ninth session the chancellor, by desire of the king, appeared and accused James Gibson minister of Pencaitland, of stating in one of his sermons that the king had been the real cause of all the evils brought upon the church by his favourite the earl of Arran, and that, if he persisted in his injurious measures he would be 'like Jeroboam the son of Nebat, the last of his race' Gibson was cited before the Assembly in its fourteenth session, but not appearing when called upon he was judged contumacious, and ordered to be suspended This manifest yielding to the court seems to have been much against the conscience of the moderator Mr Bruce, who withdrew himself when the sentence was about to be pronounced, having the previous night been admonished in a dream not to be present on the occasion, by a voice saying to him, "Ne interis condemnationi servi Dei" Mr Gibson's suspension was taken off by the following Assembly Thenceforward Bruce's name appears prominently in all the proceedings of the church, and especially in those contests, for supremacy on the one hand and independent jurisdiction on the other, that were constantly taking place between the king and the clergy

On the thanksgiving day appointed for the overthrow of the Spanish armada, Mr Bruce preached at Edinburgh from the 76th Psalm His two sermons on this subject were printed by Waldegrave in 1591, and display a strength of sentiment and language seldom to be met with in the writers of those times

At this juncture there were three parties in Scotland, namely, the popish faction, the church party, and the courtiers The popish faction consisted chiefly of the earls of Angus, Errol, and Huntly, the murderer of the "bonnie earl of Moray," and their followers, with whom the turbulent earl of Bothwell, although a protestant, had joined for his own purposes The party of the church included those lords who had been banished for the raid of Ruthven, the object of which was to carry off the king, many of whom had acted in the Reformation in Scotland, and now depended for support on the English court The court party, with the king himself at its head, was composed of the secret favourers of episcopacy, the titular bishops, and the immediate servants of the crown The commission of the church, of which Mr Bruce was a principal member, was appointed at this time to meet weekly, and the popish party were prosecuted throughout the kingdom by a regularly organized body, with the utmost severity

On the 17th February 1589, the queen of England transmitted to King James intelligence of the discovery of a conspiracy of the popish lords, abetted by Spain Huntly, Errol, and Bothwell, who were then at court, were immediately imprisoned They soon found means of gaining the king's pardon, but the church insisted on their public repentance, before being admitted to favour again

On the 22d October of the same year, King James sailed to Norway, to marry his queen, the princess Anne of Denmark Previous to his departure he constituted Bruce, for whom he entertained feelings of blended respect and fear, a member of the privy council, and desired him to take cognizance of the affairs of the country, and the proceedings of the council, in his absence, professing that he had more confidence in him and the other ministers of Edinburgh than in all his nobles Nor was he disappointed, for the country was never in greater peace than whilst the king was out of the kingdom on this occasion Under the supervision of the clergy, the nobles suspended for the time their feuds and faction fights, and the people enjoyed an interval of repose from the disorders and bloodshed which usually distracted the realm Desirous of gaining the good will of the clergy, the earl of Bothwell, who with the duke of Lennox had been left joint governor of the kingdom, offered to Mr Bruce and Mr Robert Rollock, to make his public repentance Accordingly, on Tuesday the 9th of November, after a sermon by Bruce, from 2 Timothy ii 22—26 (printed with his other sermons in 1591), the earl humbled himself on his knees in the High Church (in the Little Kirk beforenoon, and in the Great Kirk afternoon, says Calderwood), and, with tears, confessed his licentious and dissolute life, promising to prove another man in time coming, which, indeed, he proved by becoming worse instead of better That same night, according to Calderwood, or soon after, he carried off the earl of Gowrie's daughter from Dunfermline, and his evil courses were so far from being restrained that the atrocity of his past conduct was soon exceeded by greater crimes

From Upsal in Norway the king wrote a friendly letter to Bruce, thanking him for the care he had taken of the peace of the country in his absence, and acknowledging that he was worthy of the quarter of his "petite kingdom" He subsequently received two other letters from his majesty, dated from the castle of Cronebuirg, 19th February and 4th April 1590, announcing his intention of returning home, which, in the former, he said would be "like a thief in the night," and desiring him to take order that he and his queen might have a proper reception on their arrival The chancellor Maitland, who was with the king, also wrote him three letters on state matters, which, with the king's, are all given in full in Calderwood's History

On the 1st May 1590, the king returned, with his queen, at whose coronation in the Abbey church of Holyrood, on Sunday 17th May, Messrs Bruce, Lindsay, Balcanquhal and the royal chaplains were appointed to assist, and Bruce had the honour of anointing her majesty with oil This he did, not as a religious rite but a civil ceremony On the 24th the king went to the Great Kirk and returned thanks to Mr Bruce and the clergy for the religious and civil care of his kingdom which they had taken in his absence On the 9th of the ensuing June Bruce himself was married to Margaret, daughter of James Douglas of Parkhead, when his father restored to him his inheritance of Kinnaird His father-in-law, Douglas, some years afterwards became known in history as the assassin of James Stuart, earl of Arran, the former favourite of King James, and the inveterate enemy of the clergy

Next to Andrew Melville, Bruce had the greatest influence in the church, and he at all times used the utmost boldness in his admonitions to the king, both from the pulpit and in his private conferences with him The spirit of the age knew not toleration, and the characteristics of the leading clergy at this period were a want of charity for those of a different opinion, an uncompromising and contemptuous public censure of the sovereign and the court, and a constant dictation to the civil government, in matters of state as well as of religion, altogether unwarranted, and which often led to sedition and anarchy Austere, however, as were their doctrines, their lives were pure and their motives upright, while the discipline which they established in Scotland has for long preserved the religion of our countrymen

From James' want of due energy in administering justice, the feuds and disorders of the nobility and people broke out again, after his return from Denmark, with increased violence On Sunday, 6th June 1591, the king attended divine service in the Little Kirk, when Mr Bruce preached from Hebrews xii 14, 15 In the course of his sermon he asked, "What could the great disobedience of the land mean now, when the king was present, seeing some reverence was borne to his shadow when he was absent? It meant, he said, the universal contempt of his subjects, therefore, he counselled the king, to call to God, before he either ate or drank, that the Lord would give him a resolution to execute justice upon malefactors, although it should be with the hazard of his life, which if he would enterprise courageously the Lord would raise many to assist him, and all these impediments would vanish away, which are now cast in the way, otherwise, he added, you will not be suffered to bruik (enjoy) your crown alone, but every man will have one" [Calderwood, vol v p 129] This rebuke rankled in the king's mind, and on the Tuesday following, he called the ministers of Edinburgh before him and the court of session, and complained of these personal censures from the pulpit, but without effect The ministers, and particularly Bruce, continued their public exhortations to his majesty, whenever occasions arose to call for them, of which numerous instances are recited in Calderwood's History of the Kirk. The freedom with which Bruce opposed the encroachments, and censured the follies and vices, of the court had begun to excite feelings of jealousy and alarm in the breast of the king, and his fearless maintenance of the rights and privileges of the church, joined to his great power over the people, added to his majesty's growing hatred of him

On 21st May 1592, Mr Bruce was again elected moderator of the General Assembly On the 5th of the following month parliament passed the long and anxiously expected act by which presbyterianism was established as the religion of Scotland In November of the same year Mr Bruce and other ministers were appointed a standing council of the church at Edinburgh, to watch the designs of the papists, who, at that juncture, were particularly active, arising, in a great measure, from the favour shown to the popish lords by the king himself This council of the clergy was viewed with great dislike by James as an encroachment on his prerogative, and in the following December, irritated at the opposition given by the ministers to the arrival at court of his favourite, Captain Stuart, sometime earl of Arran, and the countenance supposed to be shown by them to the turbulent earl of Bothwell, after the raid of Falkland, he sent for the magistrates and ministers of Edinburgh, and brought a special charge of treason against Bruce, for harbouring that restless nobleman Bruce denied the charge, and demanded the author Several were promised, but none were given On the following Sunday he and Balcanquhal, at the request of the king, warned the people against Bothwell from the pulpit, and desired them not to give him any encouragement or protection On the 8th of the same month some of the ministers went down to the palace to urge a proof of the treason whereof Bruce was accused The king, however, had had time for reflection, and he wished the matter passed over This would not satisfy the ministers, and a day was fixed for producing the accusers,—of whom two, the Master of Gray and Mr Thomas Tyrie, were named On Sunday, the 10th of the same month, Bruce, lecturing from 1 Samuel xii, said that the king was surrounded with liars, and that he would discontinue preaching until he were freed from that heinous accusation which had been brought against him, namely, that he and others had conspired to take the crown off the king's head, and put it on Bothwell's The presbytery, the kirk session, and the town council, as well as Bruce himself, were urgent for a trial, and the Master of Gray, mentioned as the principal accuser, indignantly quitted the court, and by letter vindicated Bruce from the charge, offering 'on Bruce's honest quarrel in that behalf,' to fight any man, except the king himself Assuredly, for such an unfounded calumny the pusillanimous monarch was sufficiently harassed On Thursday, the 14th of December, the day appointed for the production of the accusers, Bruce, accompanied by the kirk session and others, again proceeded to the palace, and demanded that they should be brought forward, but none were forthcoming, and the king, who was heartily tired of the whole business, and 'mislyked' that it had been insisted on so far, put them off with fair promises, and so the matter ended On the 7th of the following January, Bruce exhorted the king, in his sermon, now to execute justice impartially, otherwise, the Chronicles, he said, will keep in memory king James the Sixth to his shame After Bothwell had forced his way into Holyroodhouse, in August 1593, it is well known that he got a remission for his past offences from the king, till the tenth of November, when the parliament should sit and confirm it An agreement was subsequently entered into betwixt the king and Bothwell, that the former might go to Falkland, or where he pleased, and take what persons he liked with him, and the latter should refrain from the court, and in the meantime would not be molested To this agreement Bruce was a witness In the month of September, however, the king, in violation of it, published a severe proclamation against Bothwell On the 8th of October the three popish earls were excommunicated by the Synod of Fife The king, notwithstanding, continued to show them countenance, and by his influence got the act of abolition passed in their favour This act, sometimes called the act of oblivion, allowed liberty to the accused to pass freely among the king's subjects, on certain conditions Alarmed at this, the friends of the church met, as they had long been accustomed to do, in the gallery of Bruce's house, and framed a petition to the king that the popish lords should be closely committed to prison till they made their public recantation Mr Bruce, preaching before the chancellor, secretary, and justice-clerk, December 16th, said that the king's reign would be short and troublesome, if the act of abolition were not rescinded In March 1594, after the forfeiture of Bothwell, and his mustering men to appear in arms against the king, Bruce told James from the pulpit that, however Bothwell were out of the way, he should never want a particular enemy till he fought the Lord's battles against the wicked, that Lord Bothwell had taken protection of the good cause, at least the pretence thereof, to the king's shame, because he took not upon him the quarrel, and he understood not how he could pursue Bothwell, till he had proven the last band broken and indenture betwixt them, whereto he was one witness These speeches, says Calderwood, galled the king On the 9th of April, Sir Robert Melville and the laird of Carmichael were sent by the king to the presbytery of Edinburgh, to ask their advice as to how Bothwell's forces could be dispersed Deeming this but a snare the brethren gave a general answer, and though pressed for a more particular one, they declined it Sir Robert complained that the nobility had left the king Mr Bruce said that the king's doings and proceedings lost him esteem among all his subjects, especially the meaner sort, who were oppressed, and though the ministry should exhort them to assist him, they would not if he amended not, therefore his advice was that he would turn and repent of his sins

The year 1596 is marked by her historians as the period when the Presbyterian church of Scotland had attained to her full glory In the summer of that year, Mr Bruce was appointed by the assembly to visit the churches in the province of Glasgow, where he was received with the greatest respect and honour, so high was his reputation for faithfulness, wisdom, and usefulness The king, offended at the warmth of his reception in the west, vowed he should lose his head for his conduct in regard to Bothwell It is related by Maxwell, bishop of Ross, in a pamphlet entitled, 'The Burden of Issachar,' published in 1646, that when Bruce returned to Edinburgh, "entering the Canongate, King James, looking out at his window in the palace of Holyrood, with indignation (which extorted from him an oath), said, Master Robert Bruce, I am sure, intends to be king, and declare himself heir to Robert de Bruce" If this be true, the story told by the same writer, and by Spottiswood, and repeated by all the episcopalian historians, as to Bruce's saucy bearing and insolent answers to the king, in the matter of the proposed recall of the three popish earls, cannot be relied upon As Bruce was, at this time, entirely out of favour at court, it is not at all likely that he would have been consulted by the king on such an occasion He is said to have been sent for to Holyrood, and on being ushered into the king's bedchamber, James opened unto him his views upon the English crown, and his fears lest the papists in Scotland, of whom these lords were the chief, should join with the Romanists in England, and endeavour to prevent his succession He proposed, therefore, to pardon and recall them, in order to gain them to his interests To this Bruce is represented to have answered, "Sir, you may pardon Angus and Errol and recall them, but it is not fit, nor will you ever obtain my consent to pardon or recall Huntly" The king desired him to consider the matter till next day, but he continued inexorable, and finally declared to the king, "Sir, I see your resolution is to take Huntly into favour, which, if you do, I will oppose, and you shall choose whether you shall lose Huntly or me, for both of us you cannot keep" [Spottiswood, p 417] We do not believe the statement The crisis of the church's fate had arrived, and Bruce's own troubles and sufferings were now about to commence, so that his word had ceased to have any effect on the self-will and determination of King James, who may be said to have been the first of his family that aimed, in a systematic manner, at arbitrary power This he did by endeavouring to overthrow the church, which had proved such a strong check upon his proceedings The clergy, on their part, contended for complete independence On both sides the encroachment was great The ministers were perpetually asserting the liberty of the church, to which the king, from the belief that it interfered with his prerogative, and the freedom and frequency of their personal rebukes, had conceived an utter aversion It is impossible to defend the conduct of either party The popular impression has for long been against the king, but whoever examines, with a candid and impartial spirit, the histories of Knox and Calderwood, will readily discover that the high-handed conduct of the clergy approached to an intolerable tyranny Charles the First and his two successors persecuted both the church and the people of Scotland, but his father only opposed a dominancy on the part of the clergy which, if not thwarted as it was at the outset, would in time have overturned the monarchy

The banished noblemen, finding favour at court, returned without formal leave, and to the mortification of the clergy and the astonishment of the people, the countess of Huntly made her way into the confidence of the queen, whilst Lady Livingston, also a papist, was intrusted with the care of the infant princess The grievances of the church were immediately carried to the throne, but they were heard with coldness, or dismissed without relief Bruce and Melville were appointed by the Assembly to wait on the queen, and treat with her about the religious reformation of her household, but they were denied admittance, as she was engaged at a dance! The ministers appointed the first Sunday of December as a day of fasting and humiliation for the dangers that threatened religion In the meantime one of the ministers of St Andrews, named David Black, was cited by the king, before the privy council, for using in a sermon certain expressions, alleged to be seditious, against the king and queen, and against Queen Elizabeth Black declined the authority both of the king and the privy council, till the church first took cognizance of the matter The clergy supported him, and the court and the church were now at open and irreconcilable collision with each other The proceedings of the court were sufficiently arbitrary On the 15th December a proclamation was issued charging the commissioners of the General Assembly to leave Edinburgh, which was at once obeyed, and on the night of the 16th another appeared commanding twenty-four of the citizens to depart from the town, under pain of treason Next day, the famous 17th December 1596, a tumult was suddenly raised by the populace of Edinburgh, for which, though mainly incited by the two rival court parties, the Cubiculars, or gentlemen of the bed-chamber, and the Octavians, as the eight commissioners of the treasury were called, the clergy were blamed, and his majesty took advantage of this unhappy riot to carry out his designs for a change in the whole framework and constitution of the church On the day mentioned, Balcanquhal preached from the pulpit of St Giles', to a numerous concourse of people, consisting of the well-affected citizens of Edinburgh and of such noblemen and gentlemen as supported the protestant cause, and after sermon, he requested those present to assemble in the east or Little Kirk, to consider how the danger threatening religion might be avoided At this meeting Mr Bruce made an exhortation, showing the perils of the church from the return of the popish lords, and he desired all present to hold up their hands and swear to defend the present state of religion against all opposers whatsoever A petition to the king was agreed to, praying that his majesty would secure them from the dangerous plots of the papists, and that the citizens who had been banished without a cause, might be put upon their trial, or have liberty to return to their homes A deputation, consisting of the Lords Lindsay and Forbes, the lands of Balgeny and Balquhan, two bailies of Edinburgh, and Messrs Bruce and Watson, was sent to present the petition to the king A minister named Cranston, till the return of the deputies, read to those assembled the history of Haman and Mordecai, and similar passages of Scripture James was, at the time, sitting with his privy council in the Tolbooth adjoining St Giles', in a room above that where the court of session was held, and on entering, Bruce, addressing him, said, "They were sent by the noblemen and barons convened in the Little Kirk, to bemoan the dangers threatened to religion by the dealings that were against the two professors" The king demanded "What dangers?" Bruce replied, "Our best affected people that tender religion are discharged of the town, the Lady Huntly, a professed papist, entertained at court, and it is suspected her husband is not far off" Without deigning a reply, the king inquired "who they were that dared to assemble without his authority?" "Dare!" said Lord Lindsay, "we dare more than that, and shall not suffer the truth to be overthrown, and stand tamely by" This language and the pressure of the people into the apartment alarmed the king for his personal safety, for which he was, at all times, nervously apprehensive He abruptly quitted the room, and hurried down stairs to the hall where the judges sat The deputation returned to their friends, and while acquainting them with what had taken place, the people without, fancying that the ministers were in danger, flew to arms, and displayed the Blue Blanket, the banner of the city The uproar was increased by an enthusiastic citizen, named Edward Johnston, crying out, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon against the courtiers, enemies of the truth" [Balfour's Annals, vol i p 400] The riot was at last suppressed, and the king, highly incensed against the clergy and the inhabitants, returned next day to Linlithgow, after issuing a severe proclamation, ordering all who were not indwellers to remove out of Edinburgh, and appointing the courts of justice to be held at Perth On the part of his brethren, Bruce wrote a letter to Lord Hamilton, requesting him to intercede with his majesty for the ministers, and to defend them against the machinations and calumnies of their enemies, but instead of doing so, that nobleman sent a garbled copy of his letter to his majesty, which much enraged him On the 20th December two proclamations were issued, the one charging the four ministers of Edinburgh and some special citizens, to enter in ward in the castle, and the other commanding them to compear before the council at Linlithgow on 25th December, to answer for treasonably stirring up the tumult of the 17th of that month Mr Bruce proposed to remain in the city as he had not mixed in the tumult, but his friends, convinced of his danger, pressed him to withdraw himself He and Mr Balcanquhal, therefore, retired into England, but before his departure he wrote a spirited declaration of his innocence This characteristic monument of his eloquence, his independence, and his injuries, will be found in Calderwood He also wrote a letter of bitter remonstrance to Lord Hamilton, renouncing his friendship, and saying that even the earl of Huntly, his lordship's nephew, would not have acted in the manner that he had done

In the course of a few months after, the king was reconciled to the city, and Mr Bruce obtained permission to return, with the rest of his brethren On the 24th April 1597, they got access to the king, who approved of their leaving the country, and said if they had not fled he might have done that in his fury which he might have afterwards repented of They were not, however, permitted to preach till the 24th of July Soon after, Mr Bruce and his colleagues were ordered to remove from Edinburgh to any place they might select They answered that this was quite contrary to the last conference they had with his majesty, and before they would submit to such an ignominy, they would renounce the favour they had obtained, and submit themselves to trial, though it should bring their heads under the axe In January 1598, when the proposed appointment of four new ministers to Edinburgh came before the commissioners of the Assembly, Mr Bruce objected to the settlement of Mr Peter Hewatt and Mr George Robertson, two of those named, as being too young and not acceptable to the people Calderwood gives a detail of the many turns that took place in this matter, which occasioned Mr Bruce fresh trouble and perplexity, and copies his meditations on the subject from his own Diary or Journal It was not till the meeting of the Dundee assembly of that year that the king declared himself reconciled to Mr Bruce and the other obnoxious ministers Before James was brought to this point, says Calderwood, Mr Bruce offered five or six times to enter in ward, and abide the law for the tumult of the 17th December The king said that were it not for pleasuring the commissioners of the Assembly, with whom he professed to take plain part, a dozen of them had trotted over Tweed ere that time [Calderwood's History, vol v p 691] In this Assembly Mr Bruce joined his brethren in maintaining that ministers should have no vote in parliament, a measure proposed by the court, in order to introduce bishops into the church The measure was carried, as the assemblies were now managed entirely by the king, and even the commissioners of the church were all pre-appointed by the court

In May of the same year (1598) Mr Bruce was admitted to the Little Kirk of Edinburgh At first he refused the imposition of hands, thinking that it would invalidate his former ministry The king and the commissioners of the Assembly, who were entirely subservient to his majesty, insisted upon it, and after a good deal of disputation with them, the full details of which will be found in Calderwood's History, he ultimately submitted to it as a ceremony not of ordination but merely of confirmation and entry His troubles however did not end there The king was determined to cause him as much annoyance as possible, and took every opportunity to molest him It really looks as if he had a special delight in tormenting and personally persecuting him In January 1599, he was called before the council, with the other ministers, for their freedom in reproving the prevailing vices of the time, and the king vainly attempted to persuade them to promise to obey certain acts of assembly passed according to his own purposes, and to refrain in future from meddling, in their sermons, with any of his laws or proceedings In the following month he arbitrarily deprived Mr Bruce of a pension which had been conferred upon him out of the abbey of Arbroath, of twenty-four chalders of victual, by a gift under the seals, for his life, and transferred it to Lord Hamilton, the nobleman who had garbled Mr Bruce's letter, as already stated But Mr Bruce raised an action against his lordship before the court of session, and had judgment pronounced in his favour, in spite of an attempt on the part of the king to overawe the judges His majesty's wrath against Mr Bruce rose to such a pitch that for fifteen weeks he sent some frivolous message or other to him every Saturday, to disturb him in his studies, so that he was most anxious to leave Edinburgh In the following December the king in the absence of Bruce in the country, ordered the process to be revived, or as it is technically called, 'wakened,' in the court of session, relative to his pension The lords were threatened not to give judgment in his favour, and even the advocates were debarred from pleading in his behalf On his return he went to the king to remonstrate "I have," he said, "your majesty's grant, written with your own hand, wherein you were pleased to say I deserved it, though it had been the quarter of your kingdom, which I shall keep as a monument to posterity, as your majesty also bade me" The king turned calm, and said, "Save my honour, Mr Robert, and I shall not hurt you" "What way?" asked Bruce "Come up the morn," said the king, "submit to my will, and render the gift" "Pardon me," said Bruce, "I will not benefit my enemy, nor give my right to any subject, but if your majesty will have it to your own use, I will give up my grant most willingly, providing you gratify not my competitors, nor bereave me causelessly of my right, for the pleasure of any other subject" This the king promised Next day, when the case was called in the court of session, Mr Bruce appeared for himself, and declared, "I had my gift of his majesty's free liberality If his majesty think that gift meet for his own use, look, how freely his majesty gave it me, I will as freely render it again But as for my Lord Hamilton, or any neighbour man of the ministry, I am no way obliged to them, so I look that his majesty will suffer me to enjoy my right against them" But the chancellor, under the control of the king, who was present, refused Mr Bruce's bill The decreets in his favour were annulled, and the pension was bestowed on the minister of Arbroath

In August 1600, the Gowrie conspiracy took place, and Bruce, being unfortunately for himself and for the church, one of those who entertained doubts as to the treason of the earl of Gowrie, (who had been brought up under his direction,) and his brother, refused to offer up thanks in the pulpit for his majesty's deliverance from the conspiracy, though he had no objection to do so in general terms for his preservation from danger Although the king himself had related the story in public at the cross of Edinburgh, Bruce and three of his brethren absolutely refused to repeat it to their congregations "Ye have heard me, ye have heard my minister, ye have heard my council, ye have heard the yerle of Mar," exclaimed the enraged monarch with eagerness, that half betrayed the suspicion of his heart The chancellor instantly pronounced a sentence dictated by the council, prohibiting them from preaching in the kingdom under pain of death On the day following, they gave in a supplication, with articles of the extent to which they were willing to comply, but they were ordered to beg the king's pardon, believe the whole report and publish it as truth Still refusing, the ministers were summoned to Stirling for their obstinacy Mr Bruce offered to publish it from the pulpit as far as he understood the conspiracy, and to believe in it for his own part, if Henderson, the earl of Gowrie's servant, should confess at his execution that he had been put into the secret room to assassinate the king Sir David Murray the comptroller, interrupted him by saying, "Will ye believe a condemned man better than the king and council?" "My lord," replied Bruce, "if he die penitent I will trust him If God receive his soul, I think we may receive his testimony" "You will not trust me, and the noblemen that were there with me, except ye try me," said the king "Will cannot be restrained," was Bruce's answer "I may well lie to you with my mouth I cannot trust but after trial" The other three ministers, on their submission, were allowed to return to their charges, but Bruce was ordered to enter into ward in the tower of Airth, a fortress built by his ancestors, and celebrated in popular tradition as the scene of one of the exploits of Wallace Thence he was ordered to quit the kingdom on the eleventh of November, and continue in exile during the royal pleasure "A great impediment to the course of episcopacy," says Calderwood, "was thus removed out of the way From that time, the banner of the truth was never so bravely displayed in the pulpits of Edinburgh as before"

Knowing James' character as he did, and his determination to get rid of every one who was at all obnoxious to him, Bruce might justly have fancied that the king had very much exaggerated the circumstances of the case, and it must be confessed that there was enough of mystery in the conspiracy as described, to cause grave doubts to be entertained regarding the exact truth, but there can be no question that Bruce's conduct in stickling as he did, on such a matter, gave the king a mighty advantage, and tended to hasten the overthrow of the church of which he was one of the most influential leaders His proscription and banishment, at the time of her greatest danger, removed a formidable obstacle in the way of James' designs for the full introduction of episcopacy, and proved fatal to the independence and almost to the existence of the presbyterian church, which she did not recover till the memorable year 1638, when, as if to prove how "the whirligig of time brings about its own revenges," one who had been converted by his preaching, the celebrated Alexander Henderson, was the principal instrument of her restoration

Bruce sailed from Queensferry at midnight of the 5th November (1600) for Dieppe in Normandy, where he arrived in five days At the moment of his embarkation, a luminous glow spread itself over the heavens in an unusually brilliant manner, which the people, ignorant of such phenomena, superstitiously imputed to the divine approbation of his conduct In May of the following year, the Lady Mar obtained a license to Mr Bruce to go to London to confer with Lord Mar and Edward Bruce, Lord Kinloss, the king's ambassador, who had previously sent for him twice He accompanied his lordship to Berwick, where he remained till October, when he received his majesty's permission to return to Scotland, though he still refused to proclaim Gowrie's treason from the pulpit, saying he was not persuaded of it He was commanded to keep ward in his own house of Kinnaird, where he continued till 15th January 1602 He afterwards had a conference with the king at Brechin, and another at Perth, and on June 25th subscribed a resolution to the effect that he was convinced of his majesty's innocence and the guilt of the Ruthvens, according to the acts of parliament This, however, he did as a subject, not as a minister When the commissioners of the church urged him to proclaim his acknowledgment of the conspiracy, and ask pardon for his incredulity, he boldly answered that he could not preach injunctions, to which the Scottish church had never been accustomed, that in the chair of God he would preach the words of truth as the Spirit should direct, and that he plainly saw they were not anxious about his obedience to the act, but the disgrace of his ministry In consequence he was not allowed to preach in Edinburgh The people of his former charge were most anxious to have him back again, and sent two commissioners to the Assembly which met in November 1602, to desire that they would restore him, one of whom was the celebrated George Heriot, who was a firm friend of Bruce After several conferences, from which no good resulted, he resolved to retire from the unequal contest, and on the 25th February 1603, his church was declared vacant by the Assembly His last interview with King James took place April 5, 1603, at the moment when his majesty was setting out for England, but though very well received and rather as a baron than a minister, there was nothing said of his being restored to his charge in Edinburgh After the king had mounted his horse, Mr Bruce went again to him, when the king, at parting, said, "Now all particulars are passed between me and you, Mr Robert" Notwithstanding this gracious reception, he had resolved that Bruce should never again be a minister of Edinburgh

The various conferences that took place between Mr Bruce and the king and privy council, on the subject of the Gowrie conspiracy, are given in full both by Calderwood and Wodrow The 'Narrative by Mr Robert Bruce, concerning his troubles,' printed in the Bannatyne Club Miscellany, also contains a considerable portion of them Mr Pitcairn, in the second volume, and in the appendix to the third volume of his 'Criminal Trials,' has gathered together a valuable collection of materials for illustrating the truth of this famous conspiracy, and with his usual discrimination has done ample justice to Bruce's character "Throughout the protracted controversy," he says, "between Bruce and the king, the latter obviously had the worst of the argument, and tyrannically put down his able but dauntless and pertinacious antagonist by a most unlawful stretch of arbitrary power, after he had failed in all his attempts at foiling him with his own weapons"

Beyond a threat by the Commissioners of the Assembly to bring him to trial for his disobedience and distrust in the Gowrie affair, he does not seem to have been again disturbed till February 27, 1605, when they summoned him to Edinburgh to hear himself formally deposed On his appearance, after a good deal of debate, they inhibited him from preaching He appealed to the Assembly, and still continued to preach In August, he was ordered to Inverness, under pain of outlawry, where for four years he preached every Sunday forenoon and Wednesday afternoon One day, while passing through Fisher street in that town, with two of his friends, he was shot at by a gun, but the ball fortunately missed him At the request of the magistrates of Aberdeen he went to that city, where he remained about a quarter of a year, but was afterwards charged to return to Inverness On a vacancy occurring at Forres, he preached there for some months, at the desire of the magistrates and people, but subsequently went back to Inverness. In August 1613, at the solicitation of his son, who was then at court, he received permission to return to Kinnaird He preached for some time at Stirling during a vacancy Afterwards he obtained leave from the privy council to retire to his house at Monkland, but in consequence of his preaching to those who came to hear him, he was, at the instance of the bishop of Glasgow, obliged to return to Kinnaird In 1621, when the Scots Estates were about to ratify the celebrated five articles of Perth, Bruce ventured to appear in Edinburgh, and in consequence of a letter from the king, he was cited before the council, and after being questioned, was committed to Edinburgh castle, where he remained for several months, after which he was again banished to Inverness The council wrote to the king interceding for him to be allowed to stay at his house of Kinnaird till the winter was past, but his majesty, hearing of the crowds that flocked to hear him, refused him any indulgence, saying in his answer, "We will have no more popish pilgrimages to Kinnaird, he shall go to Inverness" He continued there till September 1624, when he obtained a license to return to Kinnaird about his domestic affairs In the following March King James died, when the severity against him was much mitigated, and he was not required to go north again In 1629 Charles the First wrote to the council to restrict him to Kinnaird and to two miles around it The church of Larbert, which was within his limits, having been neglected and left without a minister by the bishops, he not only repaired it, but preached there every Sunday to large congregations Amongst others who came to hear him was Alexander Henderson, minister of Leuchars in Fife, who by one of his sermons on John x 1, was converted from episcopacy, and afterwards, as above stated, took a prominent part in restoring presbyterianism to its former supremacy At the celebrated Shotts communion in 1630 Mr Bruce was present and took part in the services He died August 13, 1631 On the morning of that day, having breakfasted with his family in the usual manner, he felt death approaching, and warned his children that his Master called him He then desired a Bible to be brought, and finding that his sight was gone, he requested his daughter to place his hand on the two last verses of the Epistle to the Romans When his hand was fixed on the words, he remained for a few moments satisfied and silent He had only strength to add, "Now God be with you, my children, I have breakfasted with you, and shall sup to-night with the Lord Jesus Christ" He then closed his eyes, and peacefully expired He was buried in the aisle of the church of Larbert, and Calderwood says that between four and five thousand persons followed his body to the grave

The person of Robert Bruce was tall and dignified His countenance was majestic, and his appearance in the pulpit grave, and expressive of much authority His manner of delivery was slow and engaging In public prayer, which with him was always extemporary, he was short and sententious, but so emphatic was his language, so ardent were his expressions, that he appeared to his audience to be inspired His knowledge of the Scripture was extensive, and accurate beyond the attainment of his age His skill in the languages and in the science of those times, as well as his acquaintance with the laws and constitution of the kingdom, was equal if not superior to that of any of the Scottish reformers Less violent than Melville, more enlightened than Knox, says a writer in the Scots Magazine, he viewed with a brighter and milder eye the united interests of the church and nation His capacity for civil affairs was perceived and acknowledged by his sovereign, and to this may be imputed his misfortunes and disgrace

The subjoined portrait of Mr Bruce is from an engraving by J Stewart, from an original miniature in the possession of Bruce of Kinnaird, prefixed to the Scots Magazine for December 1802

His sermons, of which sixteen were printed during his life, in two volumes, (1590 and 1591) display a boldness of expression, a regularity of style, and a force of argument seldom to be found in the Scottish writers of the sixteenth century Being written in the genuine Scottish of the time of James the Sixth, a translation of the two volumes into English was published at London in 1617, 4to, and is that which for a long time was most common in Scotland An edition of his sermons, with his life by Wodrow, was printed in one volume for the Wodrow Society in 1843, from the MS in the library of the university of Glasgow

By his wife he left a son, Robert, his successor in the lands of Kinnaird, and two daughters

Contemporary with the subject of this notice was another Robert Bruce, a trafficking popish priest, whose letters are, in the 'Scots Worthies,' most erroneously ascribed to this leading minister of the Reformed Church of Scotland

BRUCE, Sir William, designed of Kinross, an architect of eminence in the seventeenth century, was the second son of Robert Bruce, third baron of Blairhall, by Jean his wife, daughter of

Sir John Preston of Valleyfield He was a steady loyalist, and, according to Sir Robert Douglas, having got acquainted with General Monk, he pointed out to him in such strong terms the distress and distractions of our country, and the glory that would be acquired in restoring the royal family, that the general at last opened his mind to him, and signified his inclination to serve the king, but said it must be done with caution and secrecy [Douglas' Baronage, p 245] This, however, is extremely unlikely, as it is well known that Monk kept his intentions closely concealed from every one to the very last Bruce had the honour, it is farther stated, of communicating Monk's plans to the king himself, in consequence of which, when Charles the Second came to the throne, he appointed him clerk to the Bills, the very year of the Restoration Subsequently, in consideration of his great taste and architectural skill he was appointed master of the king's works and architect to his majesty He acquired the lands of Balcaskie in Fife, and was created a baronet by his majesty's royal patent to him and his heirs male, 21st April 1668 From the earl of Morton he obtained the lands and barony of Kinross, by which he was ever after designated When after the Restoration it was determined to erect additions to the palace of Holyroodhouse, Sir William Bruce designed the quadrangular edifice as it now stands, connecting it with the original north-west towers, now forming part of the quadrangle In 1685 he built the mansion-house of Kinross, which was originally intended for the residence of James duke of York (afterwards James the Second of England and Seventh of Scotland) in the event of his royal highness being prevented by the Exclusion Bill from succeeding to the throne In 1702, he designed Hopetoun house, the seat of the earl of Hopetoun, in Linlithgowshire He also designed Moncrieffe house, Perthshire He died in 1710 Sir William Bruce was twice married, first to Mary, daughter of Sir James Halket of Pitfirrane, Bart, and secondly, to Magdalene Scott His son, Sir John Bruce, married Lady Christian Leven, daughter of John duke of Rothes, and widow of the third marquis of Montrose, but died without issue, when the title devolved on his cousin Sir Alexander Bruce, second son of the fourth baron of Blairhall, on whose death, as he never married, it became extinct The estates went to Anne, sister of the second baronet, who married, first, Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, by whom she had three sons, and, secondly, Sir John Carstairs of Kilconquhar, and had to him one son and three daughters After her death, this son inherited the estates of his grandfather, Sir William Bruce

BRUCE, JAMES, a celebrated traveller, eldest son of David Bruce, Esq of Kinnaird, and of Marion Graham of Auth, was born at Kinnaird House, in Stirlingshire, December 14, 1730 His family were descendants of a younger son, by his grandmother, Helen Bruce, the heiress of Kinnaird, of Robert de Bruce, and the estate had been in possession of her family for upwards of three centuries His grandfather, David Hay, Esq of Woodcockdale, changed his name to Bruce on marrying that lady and succeeding to Kinnaird At the early age of eight he was sent to school in London, and after three years spent there, he was removed to the celebrated seminary at Harrow-on-the-Hill, in Middlesex, where he made great proficiency in classical knowledge, and where he remained till May 1746 On his return to Scotland, he was, in the winter of 1747, entered at the university of Edinburgh as a student of law, but, not liking the pursuit, and partly on account of his health, he soon went home, where he took great delight in the sports of the field His views being directed towards the East Indies, in July 1753 he went to London, for the purpose of soliciting the permission of the East India Company, to go out and settle under their auspices as a free trader In the metropolis he became acquainted with Mrs Allan, the widow of an opulent wine-merchant, whose daughter, Adriana, he soon married, in February 1754, and, becoming a partner in the business, was induced to give up his intention of going to India Mrs Bruce falling into a consumption, her husband set out with her to the south of France, in the hope that she would be benefited by a residence there, but she died at Paris, within a year of her marriage Bruce continued in the partnership, but, committing the principal management of the business to another, he applied himself to the acquirement of the Spanish and Portuguese languages.

which he learnt to speak with accuracy and ease In July 1757 he proceeded on a journey, first through Portugal, and afterwards through Spain While at Madrid, he was very anxious to explore the collections of Arabic manuscripts, buried in the monastery of St Lawrence, and contained in the library of the Escurial, but, by the jealousy of the government, was refused permission

He afterwards visited France and the Netherlands, and on receiving the intelligence of his father's death, he returned to London in 1758 Some of his remarks on the countries through which he passed are quoted from his manuscript journals, in his Life by Dr Murray The family estate to which he succeeded yielded him an income, which, though moderate, was sufficient to enable him to retire from the wine trade, which he did in 1761 He now devoted himself to the study of the languages of the East, particularly the Arabic and the Ethiopic, and to improving himself in drawing There being a rumour of a war between Great Britain and Spain, Bruce, through his friend Mr Wood, then under-secretary of state, obtained an introduction to Mr Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham, to whom he submitted a project for a descent upon Spain, at Ferrol in Galicia He was soon after informed by Mr Wood, that the minister intended to employ him on a particular service, and advised him to settle his affairs in Scotland, and be ready at a moment's notice The resignation of Mr Pitt put an end to his hopes of employment at that time But a memorandum of the intended expedition which he had drawn up for Mr Pitt, had been laid before the king, and was strongly recommended by Lord Halifax He also received some encouragement from Lord Egremont and Mr George Grenville, but, by the death of the former, his expectations were again disappointed At the beginning of 1762, Lord Halifax, at the suggestion of Mr Wood, proposed to him a journey to the coast of Barbary, with the view of exploring the interior of that country, and making sketches of the Roman antiquities, which, according to Dr Shaw, were to be found there In a conversation which Bruce had with his lordship, the discovery of the source of the Nile was one of the topics touched upon, and the adventurous spirit of our traveller was at once kindled into enthusiasm at the idea of such an enterprise To investigate those remains of Roman art, and Grecian colonization, which had hitherto baffled the researches of modern travellers, to penetrate to the mysterious sources of the Nile, which Julius Cæsar had in vain desired to discover, were pursuits worthy of his ambition, and gratifying to his fondest wishes Sweden had just sent out Hasselquist, Kalm, and others, pupils of the great Linnæus, to explore the most distant regions of the earth The king of Denmark had lately employed a company of scientific missionaries, to investigate the ancient and present state of Arabia, and other Eastern countries France and Spain were sending out philosophers to Siberia and Peru, with the object of ascertaining, by means of an astronomical process, the precise figure of the earth The love of science, and the desire to promote the civilization of mankind, had everywhere inspired a wish to prosecute discoveries, and Bruce, impelled by similar motives, and urged by the most generous ambition, promptly acceded to the proposal that was made to him, and was appointed consul-general at Algiers, which at that juncture became vacant After being supplied with the best instruments necessary for his purpose, he set out for Italy through France At Rome he received orders to proceed to Naples, to await his Majesty's commands, from Naples he again returned to Rome, and proceeding to Leghorn, he embarked there for Algiers, where he arrived March 15, 1763, taking with him an able Italian draughtsman While he remained in Italy, he spent several months improving himself in the study of drawing and of antiquities He made sketches of the temples at Pæstum, which he caused to be engraved and intended to publish, but as he afterwards complained to his friend, Mr (subsequently Sir Robert) Strange, some one had obtained access to the engravings at Paris, and published them by subscription at London He spent about two years at Algiers, and, having a facility in acquiring languages, he in that time qualified himself for appearing on any part of the continent of Africa, without the help of an interpreter He also learned the rudiments of surgery from the consulate surgeon A dispute with the Dey, relative to Mediterranean passes, had de tained him longer then he expected at Algiers, but it was at last adjusted, and Bruce seems to have throughout sustained the functions of his official character with spirit and firmness In May 1765 a successor was appointed, on whose arrival he proceeded to Mahon, and thence to Carthage He next visited Tunis, and travelled to Tripoli across the Desert He journeyed over the interior of these states, and made drawings of the architectural remains which he met with in his way At Bengazi, a small town in the Mediterranean, he suffered shipwreck, and with extreme difficulty saved his life, though with the loss of all his baggage He afterwards sailed to Rhodes and Cyprus, and, proceeding to Asia Minor, travelled through a considerable part of Syria and Palestine, visiting Hassia, Latikea, Aleppo, and Tripoli, near which last city he was again in imminent danger of perishing in a river The ruins of Palmyra and Baalbec were next carefully surveyed and sketched by him, and on his return to England, his drawings of these places were deposited in the royal library at Kew, "the most magnificent present in that line," to use his own words, "ever made by a subject to a sovereign" He published no particular account of these various journeys, but Dr Murray, in the second edition, introduced from Bruce's manuscripts some account of his travels in Tunis In these different journeys several years passed, and he now prepared for the grand expedition, the accomplishment of which had ever been near his heart, the discovery of the source of the Nile In the prosecution of that perilous undertaking, he left Sidon, June 15, 1768, and arrived at Alexandria on the 20th of that month He proceeded from thence to Cairo, where he was introduced to Ali Bey, the chief of the Mamelukes, from whom he received letters to the shereef of Mecca, the naybe of Masuah or Masowa, and the king of Sennaar He also met at Cairo father Christopher, a Greek whom he had known at Algiers, who was now archimandrite, under Mark, patriarch of Alexandria, and was furnished by the patriarch with letters to several Greeks in high stations in Abyssinia

On the 12th of December following he embarked on the Nile, and sailed up the river as far as Syene, visiting in the way the ruins of Thebes From the Nile he crossed the desert to Cosseir on the Red Sea, from whence he sailed for Jidda, in April 1769, but instead of going direct, he went up the gulf to Tor, and thence along the Arabian coast to Jidda, where he arrived on the 3d of May There he had the good fortune to meet a number of his own countrymen from India, ship-captains and merchants in the service of the East India Company, who paid him every attention, and kindly exerted their influence with the authorities on his behalf Metical Aga, the minister of the shereef of Metica, who was originally an Abyssinian slave, interested himself warmly in Bruce's welfare He ordered one of his confidential servants, Mahomet Gibberti, a native of Abyssinia, to accompany him in his journey, and he wrote to Ras Michael, the governor of Tigre, at that time the most powerful chief in Abyssinia, recommending the traveller, as an English physician, to his protection

In September 1769 Bruce sailed for Masuah, the maritime key of the entrance into Abyssinia, on the western coast of the Red Sea He was detained there for several weeks, exposed to great danger of his life by the villany of the naybe, a chief whose cruelty and avarice caused him to be dreaded by all travellers After many perils from the fierceness, the deceit, and the thievish rapacity of the inhabitants, he at last made his way to Gondar, the capital of Abyssinia, where he arrived about the middle of February 1770 At that time, the country was engaged in one of the fiercest civil wars that had ever wasted it Ras Michael and the young king were absent with the army, but Bruce became acquainted with Ayto Aylo, a man of rank and influence, and having been successful in curing many persons of the smallpox, which was at that time raging in the capital, he was introduced by Ayto to the iteghe, or queen dowager, and to her beautiful daughter, Ozoro Esther, the wife of Ras Michael, who, with several of the young nobility, became his friends and protectors, and continued to be so during his stay in Abyssinia When Ras Michael and the young king returned to the capital, he was presented to them, and received a very flattering reception His expertness in horsemanship, and his boldness and intrepidity, recommended him to the Abyssinians generally, while the king and his minister conceived a warm partiality for him The Alexandrian patriarch had, by a pastoral letter, enjoined the Coptic and Greek Christians, then in Gondar, to pay him all honour and homage He endeared himself to most of the young nobility by instructing them in some of the military exercises of Arabia and Europe High offices in the court were offered for his acceptance To obtain the protection necessary to enable him to accomplish the purposes of his journey, he accepted the government of a small province, and even enrolled himself among the lords of the Bed Chamber of the Abyssinian monarch Several months were employed in attendance on the king, and in an unsuccessful expedition round the lake of Dembea He obtained at length a feudal grant of the territory in which the fountains of the Nile had been so long hidden, and towards the end of October he set out for the sources of the Bahr el Azrek, which he supposed to be the principal branch of the Nile, though it is now generally agreed that the main stream is the Bahr el Abiad At this long-desired spot, the source of the Nile, he arrived on the 14th of November, and his feelings on the occasion were of a very singular and mixed character At first he felt a degree of exultation that he had seen what, he imagined, no European had ever witnessed before him, but immediately the most afflicting dejection overpowered his spirits when he compared the small benefits likely to result from his labours, with the difficulties which he had already experienced, and the dangers which he had still to encounter Having accomplished the chief object of his journey, he now directed his thoughts towards returning to his native country He arrived at Gondar, November 19, 1770, but found it was by no means an easy task to obtain permission to quit Abyssinia

The country being distracted with a civil war, several engagements took place between the king's troops and the forces of the rebels, particularly three actions at Serbraxos, on the 19th, 20th, and 23d of May, 1771 In each of them Mr Bruce acted a prominent part, and for his valiant conduct in the second he received, as a reward from the king, a chain of gold, consisting of one hundred and eighty-four links At Gondar, after thus distinguishing himself, he again earnestly solicited the king's permission to return home, but his entreaties were long resisted His health at last giving way, from the anxiety of his mind, the king consented to his departure, on condition of his engaging, by oath, to return to Abyssinia in the event of his recovery, with as many of his kindred as he could engage to accompany him After a residence of nearly two years in that wretched country, Mr Bruce left Gondar, December 16, 1771 Convinced that if he should again put himself within the power of the naybe of Masuah, he would not be allowed to escape so easily as he did before, he did not attempt to return by the same route as that by which he had entered Abyssinia He preferred rather to journey through those deserts, hitherto unexplored by European travellers, in which the armies of the Persian Cambyses had perished in ancient times

When he left the capital of Abyssinia he was accompanied by many friends, at parting with whom he shed tears That province, of which he himself had been solicited to accept the government, was the last within the limits of the Abyssinian empire through which he had to pass A Moor, named Yasine, who had accidentally been the companion of his journey on his first entrance into Abyssinia, and who had been appointed by him deputy-governor of the province, took this last opportunity of testifying his gratitude to his benefactor, by entertaining him with respectful hospitality, and negotiating for his friendly treatment by the Arabs, through whose territories he was next to travel Committing himself to the desert, he made his way, in a few days, to Teawa, where he arrived, March 21, 1772 Carrying powerful recommendations to the sheikh of this place, Bruce expected to be hospitably entertained, and to obtain fresh camels, water, and guides, but he was miserably disappointed The sheikh Fidele was one of the most faithless, rapacious, and needy of all the Arabian chiefs, and a great deal worse than the naybe of Masuah Fancying that the traveller possessed immense riches, he resolved, either by craft or violence, to make these riches his own. But Bruce not only refused to comply with his demands, but signified his determination to resist force by force, and secretly despatched messengers to solicit assistance from Abyssinia and Sennaar In the meantime he was supplied with lodging and entertainment the sheikh's own wives cooked his meals, and he was called, under his character as a physician, to administer remedies to the Arab chief and his family On one occasion, when the sheikh was under the influence of intoxication, he menaced the traveller with instant death unless he produced his treasures, but Bruce, who always carried arms, quickly overpowered the treacherous and cowardly Arab by his promptness and intrepidity He had won the favour of the chief's daughter, and, warned by her and her women, he was enabled to guard himself against the secret snares of the wily sheikh At last sufficient protection arrived for him, and having predicted an eclipse of the moon, which was exactly accomplished on the 17th April, the sheikh was glad to get rid of him Camels, guides, water, and other necessaries, were now readily supplied, and at parting, Bruce, much to the sheikh's astonishment, bestowed upon him a handsome but an ill-deserved remuneration

After encountering many perils, he arrived, April 29, at the capital of the kingdom of Sennaar Here the selfish knavery of a banker, on whom he had an order for a supply of money, which he declined to pay, reduced him to the necessity of disposing of the greater part of the gold chain which he had earned by his bravery at Serbraxos, by which he was enabled to make preparations for his dangerous journey through the deserts of Nubia He left Sennaar, September 5, and arrived, October 3, at Chendi, which he quitted on the 20th, and travelled through the desert of Gooz, to which village he came, October 26, and left it November 9 He then entered upon the most dreadful and perilous part of his journey He and those with him travelled in constant dread of being suddenly attacked and robbed by the wandering Arabs Their water began to be exhausted, their camels became lame, and their own feet were lacerated and swollen To add to their miseries, the direful simoom, whose blast is death, repeatedly overtook them, and had they not, though with infinite difficulty, avoided inhaling its poisonous breath, they must have all instantly perished Gigantic columns of sand started suddenly up in ranks before and behind, and approached with rapid and tremendous movements, as if to overwhelm them Even their camels, at last overcome with fatigue, sunk under their burdens and expired They were now under the necessity of abandoning their baggage in the desert, and it is impossible to describe the anguish of Mr Bruce's feelings when he saw himself obliged to relinquish his journals, his drawings, his collection of specimens, his precious Ethiopic manuscripts, every memorial, in short, that could testify to the inhabitants of Europe that he had indeed travelled into Abyssinia, and penetrated to the sources of the Nile With the greatest difficulty he reached Assouan, where he arrived, November 19 After some days' rest, having procured fresh camels, he returned into the desert and recovered his baggage He now proceeded gaily down the Nile to Cairo, where he arrived, January 10, 1773, after more than four years' absence An act of kindness to one of the officers of Mohammed Bey, who had by this time supplanted Ali Bey in the administration of the Egyptian government, proved the occasion of introducing him to that ruler Grateful for the favours he had received from the servants of the East India Company at Jidda, he procured from Mohammed Bey a firman, permitting British vessels belonging to Bombay and Bengal to arrive at that port with their merchandise, on the payment of more moderate duties than had ever before been exacted from them in any port of the Red Sea

This was Bruce's last memorable transaction in the East At Cairo his career was nearly finished, by a disorder in his leg, occasioned by a worm in the flesh This accident kept him five weeks in extreme agony, and his health was not established till about a year afterwards, at the baths of Porretta, in Italy On his return to Europe, he was received with all the admiration due to his enterprising character After passing a considerable time in France, particularly at Montbard, with his celebrated friend the Count de Buffon, he at last arrived in England, which he reached in the summer of 1774, having been absent from it about twelve years

His reception at court was very flattering The drawings which he presented to the king were accepted to enrich the collection of his sovereign at Kew; and his majesty bestowed upon him, in return, the sum of two thousand pounds These drawings were so exquisitely beautiful, that it was insidiously stated that they were not executed, as he pretended, by his own pencil During his long absence, his relations considering him dead, took measures to possess themselves of his property A number of lawsuits was the inevitable consequence of his return He was also, soon after returning to his paternal estate, attacked by the ague, which he had caught at Bengazi, where he had suffered shipwreck, and which tormented him from time to time for sixteen years His biographer, Captain Head, has done justice to "the steady courage with which he encountered danger, and the tact and judgment with which he steered his lonely course through some of the most barren and barbarous countries in the world"

He married a second time, May 20, 1776, Mary, eldest daughter of Thomas Dundas of Fingask By Mrs Bruce, who died in 1784, after a long and lingering illness, he had two sons and one daughter His travels were not published till 1790, when they appeared in five large quarto volumes, embellished with plates and charts, and dedicated to the king The work abounds with adventures so extraordinary, and describes instances of perseverance and intrepidity so wonderful, and gives such curious accounts of the manners and habits of the people of Abyssinia, that it startled the belief of many The statement, in particular, that the Abyssinians were in the practice of eating raw meat cut out of a living cow, was deemed altogether unworthy of credit, and set down as a fabrication of the author's fertile imagination De Tott in France, and Dr Johnson and others in England, doubted the accuracy of many of his statements, and treated his pretensions to veracity with ridicule Bruce was vindicated, however, by Daines Barrington, Sir William Jones, and Buffon, and posterity has done him ample justice His statements have been verified and corroborated by every traveller who has since been in or near Abyssinia From his discoveries, geography and natural history have derived considerable improvements, and his illustrations of some parts of the sacred writings are both original and valuable

Mr Bruce spent the latter years of his life chiefly at Kinnaird, the mansion-house of which he rebuilt, and of which a representation is annexed, dividing his attention betwixt his museum his books, and his rural improvements His figure was above the common size, being upwards of six feet high, his limbs were athletic and well proportioned, his complexion sanguine, his countenance manly and good-humoured, and his manners affable and polite He excelled in all personal accomplishments, and was master of most languages, being so well skilled in oriental literature, that he revised the New Testament in the Ethiopic, Samaritan, Hebrew, and Syriac, adding many useful notes and observations The first edition of his work was disposed of in a short time, and he was preparing a second edition for the press when death interrupted his labours On the evening of April 26, 1794, on the departure of some company whom he had been entertaining at his house at Kinnaird, in handing a lady to her carriage, his foot slipped on the stairs, and he fell down headlong He was taken up speechless, his face, particularly the forehead and temples, being severely cut and bruised, and the bones of his hands broken He remained in a state of insensibility for eight or nine hours, when he expired on Sunday April 27, 1794, in the 65th year of his age His usual dress, when in the country, was a spotted flannel jacket and a turban, with a long staff in his hand — Life by Capt Head

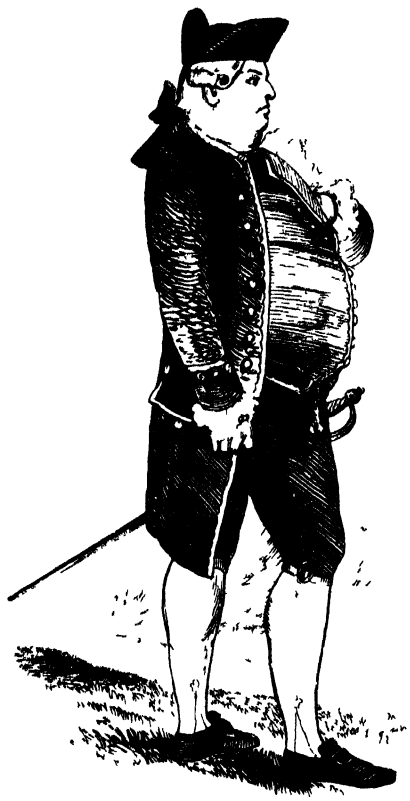
The following is a full length portrait of him, from an engraving by Kay



BRUCE, MICHAEL, a tender and ingenious poet, the fifth son of Alexander Bruce, weaver, was born at Kinnesswood, in the parish of Portmoak, Kinross-shire, March 27, 1746 His mother belonged to a family of the same name and humble rank in the neighbourhood Both parents were Burgher-Seceders, and were remarkable for their piety, industry, and integrity He early discovered superior intelligence, which, with his fondness for reading and quiet habits, induced his father to educate him for the ministry In his younger years he was employed as a herd on the Lomond Hills He received the usual course of instruction at the village school of Portmoak, and the neighbouring town of Kinross In 1762 he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, where he applied himself, during the four succeeding years, with no less assiduity than success, to the study of the several branches of literature and philosophy Before leaving home, he had given evident signs of a propensity to poetry, in the cultivation of which he was greatly encouraged by Mr David Arnot, a farmer on the banks of Loch Leven, who directed him to the perusal of Spencer, Shakspeare, Milton, and Pope, supplied him with books, and acted as the judicious guide and friendly counsellor of his youthful studies Mr David Pearson, of Easter Balgedie, a village in the neighbourhood of Kinnesswood, a man of strong parts, and of a serious and contemplative turn, also contributed, by his encouragement and advice, to lead him to the study of poetry, and the names of these two unpretending individuals, for their disinterested kindness to the friendless Bruce, are worthily recorded in all the memoirs of his life

Soon after his coming to Edinburgh, he contracted an acquaintance with Logan, then a student at the same university A congenial feeling and a similarity of pursuits, soon led these two poets to become intimate companions When not at college, Bruce endeavoured to earn a scanty livelihood by teaching a school In 1765 he went to Gairney Bridge, near Kinross, where he taught the children of some farmers in the neighbourhood, who allowed him his board and a small salary This he quitted in the summer of 1766, in which year he entered as a student in the divinity hall of the Burgher Synod, and removed to a school at Forrest Mill, near Alloa, in which he appears to have met with less encouragement than he expected At this place he wrote his poem of 'Lochleven' In the autumn of that year, "his constitution," says Dr Anderson in his British Poets, "which was ill calculated to encounter the austerities of his native climate, the exertions of daily labour, and the rigid frugality of humble life, began visibly to decline Towards the end of the year, his ill health, aggravated by the indigence of his situation, and the want of those comforts and conveniences which might have fostered a delicate frame to maturity and length of days, terminated in deep consumption During the winter he quitted his employment at Forrest Mill, and with it all hopes of life, and returned to his native village, to receive those attentions and consolations which his situation required from the anxiety of parental affection and the sympathy of friendship" He lingered through the winter, and in the spring he wrote the well-known and deeply pathetic elegy on his own approaching death, beginning —

"The spring returns, but not to me returns
The vernal joy my better years have known,
Dim in my breast life's dying taper burns,
And all the joys of life with health are flown"

This was the last composition which he lived to finish By degrees his weakness increased, till he was gradually worn away, and he expired July 6, 1767, in the twenty-first year of his age

Soon after his death his poems, which are not numerous, were revised and corrected by his friend Logan, who published them at Edinburgh in 1770, with a preface, but in this edition several other poems were injudiciously inserted to fill up the volume, which afterwards led to much uncertainty as to which were really Bruce's The beautiful 'Ode to the Cuckoo,' the episode of 'Levina,' in the poem of 'Lochleven,' the 'Ode to Paoli,' and the 'Eclogue after the manner of Ossian,' which are clearly ascertained to have been the composition of Bruce, were subsequently claimed by Logan's biographer as his Logan himself, it seems, put forth some pretensions to being the author of the 'Ode to the Cuckoo,' and in July 1782 applied for an interdict in the court of session against John Robertson, printer in Edinburgh, and William Anderson, bookseller, and afterwards provost of Stirling, who were about to bring out an edition of Bruce's works, containing the poems mentioned, which interdict was removed in the succeeding August, Mr Logan not being able to substantiate his pleas The attention of the public was called to Michael Bruce's poems by Lord Craig, in a paper in the Mirror in 1779, and they were reprinted in 1784 In 1795 Dr Anderson admitted the poems of Bruce into his excellent collection of the British poets, and prefixed a memoir of the author In 1797 a new edition, including several of Bruce's unpublished pieces, was published by subscription, under the superintendence of the venerable principal Baird, for the benefit of the poet's mother, then in her ninetieth year In 1837 appeared a new edition of Bruce's poems, with a life of the author, from original sources, by the Rev William Mackelvie, Balgedie, Kinross-shire, which contains all the information that can now be collected regarding the poet In Dr Drake's 'Literary Hours,' there is a paper written with a view of recommending the works of Bruce to the admirers of genuine poetry in England, as Lord Craig, in the Mirror, had long before recommended them to readers of taste in Scotland In 1812 an obelisk, about eight feet high, was erected over Bruce's grave in Portmoak churchyard, bearing as an inscription merely the words—"Michael Bruce, Born March 27, 1746 Died 6th July, 1767"

Bruce's characteristics as a poet are chiefly simplicity and tenderness He possessed in a high degree judgment, feeling, and sensibility, and without much imagination or enthusiasm, he is always graceful, elegant, and pleasing His 'Lochleven,' the longest and most elaborate of his poems, is in blank verse, and shows considerable strength and harmony His 'Sir James the Rose' contains all the attributes of the historical ballad His two Danish odes possess the true fire of poetry, and appear to have been modelled upon the Norse odes of Gray His song of 'Lochleven no more' is full of a sad and touching pathos which goes directly to the heart The 'Ode to the Cuckoo,' has been characterised by no less a judge of literary merit than Edmund Burke, as "the most beautiful lyric in our language"

BRUCE, Archibald, the Rev, a voluminous writer, and eminent minister of the Secession church, was born at Broomhall, near Denny, Stirlingshire, in 1746 He gave early indication of decided piety, and even from his boyhood his views were directed to the office of the holy ministry Having received the elements of a classical education at a country school, he prosecuted the study of the languages and philosophy at the university of Glasgow He studied divinity under Professor Moncrieff of Alloa, and in August 1768, was ordained minister of the Associate (Antiburgher) congregation at Whitburn After the death of Mr Moncrieff of Alloa, in 1786, he was elected professor of divinity in his room, by the General Associate Synod, and continued to occupy the chair till the year 1806, when he separated from that body, owing to his disapproving of the doctrines of the 'Narrative and Testimony,' on the subject of the powers of the civil government in religious matters He and three others having declined the authority of the Synod, and withdrawn from its communion, formed themselves into what was then called the "Constitutional Associate Presbytery," afterwards the "United Original Seceders," at the formation of which Mr Bruce presided as moderator He disobeyed the summons of Synod to appear before the presbytery of Edinburgh, and sentence of deposition was accordingly pronounced against him Two of those who had joined with him, Mr James Aitken, minister at Kinnemun, and Mr Thomas M'Crie, of Edinburgh, afterwards the celebrated Dr M Crie, were also deposed The fourth, Mr James Hog, minister at Kelso, escaped deposition, by dying during the progress of the proceedings in the church courts against him The reader is referred to the life, in this collection, of Dr M'Crie, for the reasons of this secession The majority of the Synod of Original Seceders was at the meeting of the Assembly of 1852, united to the Free Church of Scotland, of which they are now a component part

After Mr Bruce's separation from the General Associate Synod, he continued to superintend the theological class connected with the Constitutional Presbytery He died February 28, 1816 About the beginning of that year he was seized with occasional fainting fits, which alarmed his friends, and on the day of his death, which was the Lord's day, he had performed as usual, though somewhat indisposed, the exercises of the pulpit After returning home, and while conversing with a member of his congregation, he almost instantaneously expired, without a struggle or a groan He was in the seventieth year of his age "He possessed," says Dr M'Crie, "talents of a superior order, which he had cultivated with unwearied industry To an imagination which was lively and fertile he united a sound and correct judgment His reading, which was various and extensive, was conducted with such method, and so digested, that he could at any time command the use of it, and during a life devoted to study he had amassed a stock of knowledge, on all the branches of learning connected with his profession, extremely rare" "He was more qualified for writing than public speaking, but though his utterance was slow, and he had no claims to the attractions of delivery, yet his discourses from the pulpit always commanded the attention of the judicious and serious, by the profound views and striking illustrations of divine truth which they contained, and by the vein of solid piety which ran through them His piety, his erudition, his uncommon modesty and gentlemanly manners, gained him the esteem of all his acquaintance, and these qualities, added to the warm interest which he took in their literary and spiritual improvement, made him revered and beloved by his students" In a note appended to the Life of Dr M'Crie, by his son, the latter says, "It may be mentioned as a curious illustration of the zeal with which Mr Bruce prosecuted his literary labours, that he brought a printer to Whitburn, and employed him exclusively for many years in printing his own publications"

Of his numerous works a list is subjoined

The Kirkiad, or Golden Age of the Church of Scotland, Canto I, a satire on the reign of Moderatism published anonymously, 1771 This poem he intended afterwards to have continued but graver subjects prevented him

Free Thoughts on the Toleration of Popery, published under the assumed name of Calvinus Minor, Scoto Britannus, 1780, a work frequently quoted by Mr M'Gavin in 'The Protestant,' as evincing much talent and research

True Patriotism, or a Public Spirit for God and Religion recommended, and the want of it reprehended, a Sermon preached before the General Associate Synod, on a day appointed for humiliation, from the text, Judges, v 23, 'Curse ye Meroz,' &c 1785

Annus Secularis, or the British Jubilee, a Review of an Act of Assembly, appointing the 5th of November 1788, an anniversary thanksgiving in commemoration of the Revolution, 1788, large 8vo In this work, which was published under the assumed name of Calvinus Presbyter, the author enters at great length, into the origin, progress, and tendency of religious festivals both in ancient and modern times, and seems to have bestowed a great deal more labour on the subject than its practical utility appears to have required

The Catechism Modernized and adapted to the meridian of patronage, and late improvements in the Church of Scotland, with suitable Creeds and Prayers, a small anonymous treatise, 1791 This was a cutting satire on the chief promoters of patronage in the shape of a parody on the Assembly's Shorter Catechism, each question in the Catechism having its corresponding question in the treatise The parody, it was thought, was carried too far, and in the advertisements of his publications, this treatise was never included

Reflexions on the Freedom of Writing, and Impropriety of attempting to suppress it by Penal Laws, occasioned by a proclamation issued against seditious publications, 1794 published under the character of a North British Protestant

A Penitential Epistle and Humble Supplication to his Holiness the Pope, in the name of the People of Great Britain, for a perfect reconciliation and perpetual alliance with Rome, 1797, a clever anonymous poem, in which he is very successful in exposing and ridiculing the superstitions of the Romish church

Introductory and Occasional Lectures to Students, as read in the Theological Hall at Whitburn Vol i, 1797 The second volume was in the press and nearly ready for publication, at the time of Mr Bruce's death It was completed and edited by Dr M'Crie

A Translation from the French, of Pictet's Discourses on True and False Religion, with a vindication of the religion and reformation of Protestants, and an account of the life and writings of the author prefixed, 1797

Principal Differences between the religious principles of those called the Anti-Government Party and of other Presbyterians, especially those of the Secession in Scotland, on the head of magistracy A small pamphlet, 1797

A Historico-Politico-Ecclesiastical Dissertation on the supremacy of civil powers in matters of religion, 1798 This was a subject which, at that period, was keenly agitated in the Secession Church, on the bringing forward their new 'Narrative and Testimony'

The same year (1798) he edited, from a manuscript in the theological library at Whitburn, Memoirs of the Public Life of James Hog of Carnock, and of the Ecclesiastical Proceedings of his Times This interesting pamphlet contains notices of some of the leading events in several meetings of Assembly immediately after the Revolution

A Review of the proceedings of the General Associate Synod, and of some Presbyteries, in reference to the Ministers who protested against the imposition of a new Testimony One volume 8vo of 400 pages

Poems, Serious and Amusing, by a Rev Divine, 1812 In this small volume are collected the poems which, in the course of several years, he had sent to the periodicals of the day

A critical account of the Life of Mr Alexander Morus, a celebrated preacher and professor of theology in Geneva and Holland, with select Sermons of Morus appended, translated from the French by Mr Bruce, 1813

Shortly before his death, he was engaged in preparing for publication a volume of sermons on Practical Subjects

Besides the publications here noticed, Mr Bruce wrote several pamphlets on questions that were keenly agitated in his day, which were published anonymously

BRUCE, James, the Rev, a miscellaneous writer, born of parents in a humble station in life, was a native of the north-west part of Forfarshire About the year 1780 he was a distinguished scholar at the university of St Andrews He afterwards removed to Cambridge, where he became a Fellow in Emmanuel college, and took his degree of M A He subsequently entered into holy orders in England, where he remained many years in the capacity of a curate About the beginning of the present century he returned to Scotland, and became a clergyman in the Scottish episcopal church About the year 1803 he began to furnish reviews for the Anti-Jacobin Magazine and Review, now discontinued, and to the British Critic, two monthly publications, which were then the only periodical works which devoted any part of their space to the interests of the Church of England These two publications were for a long time chiefly conducted and supported by Mr Bruce, and his friend, the late Right Rev Dr George Gleig, bishop of Brechin, and Primus Notwithstanding his talents and his varied and solid attainments, Mr Bruce never rose to any church preferment, but died in the year 1806 or 1807, in comparative obscurity in London, after leading a most laborious literary life He does not appear however to have published any separate work, except—

A Sermon preached at Dundee on the death of George Yeaman, Esq, entitled The Regard which is due to the Memory of Good Men, 1803, 8vo

Mr Bruce's Reviews extend from vol xv to vol xxii of the Anti-Jacobin Of the following, among many other works, the criticisms were written by him —Overton's True Churchman, Gleig's Sermons, Abdollatiph's History, Skinner's Primitive Truth, Bishop of Lincoln's Charge, Daubeney's Vindiciæ, Pinkerton's Geography, Repton's Articles, Bisset's History, Grant's Poems, Dialogues, &c, Godwin's Life, Hill's Synonymes, a very able and learned critique, Academicus' Remarks, Davis's Attic Researches, Martin's Sermons, Barrow's Travels, Remarks on Bishop of Lincoln's Charge, Hill's Theological Institutes, and Godwin's Fleetwood

Brunton, a surname evidently derived from the lands of Brunstane on Brunstane burn, a small stream in Mid Lothian, which separates the parish of Duddingston from Inveresk and Liberton on the south, and flows into the Frith of Forth near Fisherrow The ruins of Brunstane castle on the Esk, built about 1580, are of considerable extent Crichton of Brunston, the secret agent of Henry the Eighth in the conspiracy against Cardinal Bethune, generally signed himself Brounston in his letters

BRUNTON, Mrs Mary, an ingenious novelist, the only daughter of Colonel Thomas Balfour of Elwick, was born in the Island of Burra, in Orkney, November 1, 1778 Her mother was Frances, only daughter of Colonel Ligonier of the 13th dragoons, and niece of field-marshal the earl of Ligonier, to whose charge she had early been left an orphan Under her mother's care, she became a considerable proficient in music, and an excellent French and Italian scholar While yet young, she evinced a strong partiality for the perusal of works of poetry and fiction In her sixteenth year the charge of her father's household devolved upon her, and from that period till her twentieth year, she had little leisure for self-improvement When she was only twenty, she married the Rev Alexander Brunton, then minister of the parish of Bolton, near Haddington, afterwards D D , professor of oriental languages, and librarian in the university of Edinburgh, and one of the ministers of the Tron church of that city In the quiet of a Scottish manse, Mrs Brunton's taste for books returned in all its strength, and, under the direction of her husband, she pursued a course of reading not only in criticism and the belles lettres, but in philosophy and history She also acquired some knowledge of the German language, and taught herself to draw At this time she felt so little inclination for composition, that the mere writing of a letter was irksome to her

In autumn 1803, on the removal of her husband to Edinburgh, she accompanied him , and her circle of acquaintances being now widened, she mingled more with people of talent and distinction in literature than she had had the opportunity of doing in East Lothian It was chiefly for the employment of accidental intervals of leisure, as we are informed by her husband, that Mrs Brunton began the writing of 'Self-Control,' a considerable part of the first volume of which was finished before she informed her husband of her project This novel was published at Edinburgh in 1811, in two volumes , it was dedicated to Miss Joanna Baillie, and its success was so complete, that it had not been out above a month, when a second edition was called for The faults of the book were great , but as a first appearance it was a most promising performance The beauty and correctness of the style, the acuteness of observation, the discrimination of character, and the loftiness of sentiment which it displayed, were universally acknowledged The work was published anonymously In December 1814 appeared, 'Discipline,' in three volumes , the reception of which was more favourable than the author herself had anticipated She afterwards designed a collection of short narratives, under the title of 'Domestic Tales' The first of these, the 'Runaway,' was to contain the story of a truant boy, whose hardships should teach him the value of home , with which she wished to blend some account of the peculiar manners of Orkney While arranging her plans for this series of tales, she commenced the story of 'Emmeline,' the object of which was to show how little chance there is of happiness when a divorced wife marries her seducer This tale she did not live to finish

In the summer of 1818, Mrs Brunton had the prospect of being for the first time a mother , but a strong impression had taken possession of her mind, that her confinement was to prove fatal Under this belief she made every preparation for death, with the same tranquillity as if she had been making arrangements for a short absence from home The clothes in which she was laid in the grave were selected by herself , she herself had chosen and labelled some tokens of remembrance for her more intimate friends , and she even drew up in her own handwriting a list of the persons to whom she wished intimations of her death to be sent But these gloomy anticipations, though so deeply fixed, neither shook her fortitude nor diminished her cheerfulness They altered neither her wish to live, nor the ardour with which she prepared to meet the duties of returning health, if returning health was to be her portion Her forebodings proved only too well-founded After giving birth to a still-born son, on the 7th of December, and recovering for a few days with a rapidity beyond the hopes of her medical attendants, she was attacked with fever, which advanced with fatal violence, terminating her valuable life on December 19, 1818, in the forty-first year of her age In the spring of 1819 the unfinished tale of 'Emmeline,' with some extracts from her correspondence, and other pieces, was published by her husband, who prefixed a brief but elegant and affecting memoir of her life, to which we are indebted for these details

BRUNTON, George, a miscellaneous writer, the eldest son of a respectable citizen of Edinburgh, was born in that city, January 31, 1799 He received the rudiments of his classical education at the Canongate high school, an institution now discontinued Having adopted the legal profession, he became in 1831 an advocate's first clerk, which entitled him to practise as a solicitor before the supreme courts of Scotland The bent of his genius, however, was towards literary pursuits He wrote several articles, both in prose and poetry, in the 'Edinburgh Magazine,' the 'Scottish Literary Gazette' and 'Tait's Magazine' In 1834, he became editor of the 'Scottish Patriot,' an Edinburgh newspaper, as he had previously been of another called the 'Citizen' In conjunction with Mr David Haig, assistant-librarian to the faculty of advocates, a gentleman distinguished in Scottish history and antiquities, Mr Brunton published, in 1832, 'An Historical Account of the Senators of the College of Justice, from its Institution in 1532,' of which he compiled the earlier portion It had so happened that at the time Mr Brunton was collecting materials for a similar work, Mr Haig had been for a year or two previous engaged in an undertaking of the same nature An accidental conversation which the latter had with Mr Brunton in the Advocates' Library, led to a discovery that, unknown to each other, both were contemplating a work exactly the same, the only difference being in the plan and arrangement The result was, an agreement between them to combine their researches About the same time, one of Mr Brunton's brothers entered into partnership with the brother of Mr David Haig, as booksellers and stationers in Edinburgh, and with a view to promote the success of their relatives, they commenced a weekly periodical, entitled 'The Scots Weekly Magazine,' which was exclusively devoted to the elucidation of Scottish history and antiquities, and Scottish life and manners, but which not being successful was soon discontinued In the beginning of April 1836, Mr Brunton's declining health induced him to proceed to the Continent, and he died at Paris, June 2 of that year, leaving a widow and three children

BRYCE, a surname supposed to have been originally Bruce, which in early records is indifferently written Brus or Bruys There is one well authenticated instance in which the name of Bruce was changed into Bryce, by an ancestor of the family of Bruce of Scoutbush and Killroot, in the county of Antrim, Ireland, a scion of the ancient Scotch house of Bruce of Airth, being descended from the Rev Edward Bruce, or Bryce, younger brother of the laird of Airth, who settled in Ireland about 1608 The name continued for a long time Bryce, but in 1811, the possessor of Scoutbush, resumed, by royal license, the family name of Bruce The reason for changing the name is thus described by Mrs Bruce's grandfather, in a letter to his son, relative to the family descent, in 1774-5 "One of my ancestors had a dispute with his chief who attacked him He, according to the laws of Scotland, retreated as far as wood, water, &c, would allow him, then turned in his own defence and killed his chief In those days, two or three hundred years ago, the chiefs had great influence He was prosecuted with great virulence The sentence was, 'that he should be either banished or change his name' He said he had done nothing sinful or shameful to fly his country, but put a tail to the s and made it y, thus it was Bryce, but when my grandfather went to Ireland, he spelled his name with an s, and since it has so remained"—Burke

Bryce is sometimes used as a first or Christian name From 1203 to 1222, one Bryce or Bricius, a son of the noble family of Douglas, was bishop of Moray

BRYCE, ALEXANDER, the Rev, an eminent geometrician, was born at Boarland, parish of Kincardine, in 1713 He received the first rudiments of his education at the school of Doune, Perthshire, and, after studying at the university of Edinburgh, proceeded to Caithness, in May 1740, as tutor to a gentleman's son He resided there for three years, and during that time, at his own expense, and in the midst of much obstruction, he completed a 'Map of the North Coast of Britain, from Raw Ston of Assynt, to Wick in Caithness, with the Harbours and Rocks, and an account of the Tides in the Pentland Frith,' which was published in 1744 by the Philosophical, afterwards the Royal, Society of Edinburgh In June 1744 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Dunblane, and, in August 1745, having received a presentation from the earl of Morton, he was ordained in the church and parish of Kirknewton, in the Presbytery of Edinburgh In the winter of 1745-46 he taught the mathematical classes in the university of Edinburgh, during the last illness of Professor Maclaurin In 1752, after much anxious search, he discovered, among some old lumber in a garret at Stirling, the Pint Jug, the standard, by statute, for weight and for liquid and dry measure in Scotland, committed by an old act of parliament to the keeping of the magistrates of that burgh At the request of the magistrates of Edinburgh, he afterwards superintended the adjustment of the weights and measures kept by the dean of guild, and, for so doing, was made a burgess and guild brother in 1754 He wrote several scientific papers, which were published in the Transactions of the Royal Society of London, amongst which may be mentioned 'An Account of a Comet observed by him in 1766,' 'A new

Method of measuring the Velocity of the Wind,' and 'An Experiment to ascertain to what quantity of Water a fall of Snow on the Earth's Surface is equal' He also contributed several papers to Ruddiman's Weekly Magazine By the influence of Stuart Mackenzie, lord privy seal of Scotland, for whom he planned the observatory at Belmont castle, he was appointed one of his majesty's chaplains in ordinary In 1774 the freedom of the town of Stirling was conferred on him, in consequence of his advice and assistance in supplying that town with water In 1776 he made all the requisite calculations for an epitome of the solar system on a large scale, afterwards erected by the earl of Buchan at his seat at Kirkhill Mr Bryce died January 1, 1786

BRYDONE, PATRICK, F R S, author of an ingenious and entertaining Tour in Sicily and Malta, the son of a clergyman in the neighbourhood of Dumbarton, was born in 1741 He received an excellent education at one of the universities, and subsequently distinguished himself by his tours in foreign countries About the time of his first proceeding to the continent, Dr Franklin's discoveries in electricity had aroused the curiosity of scientific men, and, with the view of ascertaining the precise state and temperature of the air on the summits of the highest mountains in Europe, Mr Brydone, after providing himself with the necessary instruments, visited Switzerland and Italy, and crossed both the Alps and the Apennines In these excursions he often witnessed phenomena of a most remarkable nature, but not uncommon in those regions In 1767, or 1768, he accompanied Mr Beckford of Somerly, in Suffolk, in a scientific excursion to the continent He next travelled, in 1770, to Italy, and some of the islands of the Mediterranean, with a gentleman of the name of Fullarton, who subsequently commanded in India, and was a commissioner for the government of Trinidad In 1771 he returned to England, and soon after obtained an appointment under government In 1773 he published his 'Tour through Sicily and Malta' He was a member of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, and of several other learned bodies He died at Lennel House, near Coldstream, 19th June 1818 He married the eldest daughter of Principal Robertson, the historian. His own eldest daughter was countess of Minto, who died in 1853 His works are

BUCCLEUCH, duke of, in the peerage of Scotland, a title possessed by the distinguished house of Scott, which has long held a very high rank in titles, worth, and importance in the kingdom, while their territorial possessions are more extensive and valuable than those of any other family in Scotland The history of the earliest generations of the Buccleuch family is involved in obscurity There is in the possession of the present Lord Polwarth, who is himself a noble branch of the Scotts, a genealogical table, prepared by and holograph of Sir Walter Scott, of Abbotsford, Bart, in which he traces the origin and descent of this family as follows —

I Uchtred Fitz-Scott, or Filius Scott, who flourished at the court of King David I, and was witness to two charters granted by him to the abbeys of Holyroodhouse and Selkirk, dated in the years 1128 and 1130 It is, however, believed that from the days of Kenneth III the barony of Scotstoun in Peebles-shire had been possessed by the ancestors of this Uchtred, who, being descended from Galwegian forefathers, were called Scots, Galloway being then inhabited by the clan to whom that name properly belonged

II Richard Scott, son of Uchtred, witnessed a charter granted by the bishop of St Andrews to the abbey of Holyroodhouse about the year 1158

III Richard Scott, son of Richard, who married Alicia, daughter of Henry de Molla, with whom he received lands in Roxburghshire in the reign of Alexander the Second

IV William Scott, son of Richard, attended the court of Alexander the Second, and witnessed several of his charters.

V Sir Richard Scott, son of William, married the daughter and heiress of Murthockstone of that ilk, in the county of Lanark, by which marriage he acquired the property of Murthockstone, now called Murdieston He then assumed into his arms "the bend of Murdiestoun," and disposed thereon his own paternal crescents and star He swore fealty to Edward I in 1296 and died in 1320

VI Sir Michael Scott of Murthockstone, son of Sir Richard and the heiress of Murthockstone, was a gallant warrior, who distinguished himself at the battle of Halidon hill, 19th July 1333 He was one of the few who escaped the carnage of that disastrous day, but he was slain in the unfortunate battle of Durham, thirteen years after

In the Genealogical Table of Sir Walter Scott, from which these six generations of the family are stated, it is said that this Sir Michael left two sons, "the eldest of whom (Robert) carried on the family the second (John) was ancestor of the Scotts of Harden'

Robert Scott of Murthockstone died before 7th Dec. 1389, as appears from a crown charter of that date to his son Walter

Walter Scott of Murdieston and Rankelburn, son of Robert, obtained a charter from King Robert II of the superiorities of the barony of Kirkurd, in the county of Peebles, dated 7th December 1389 He was one of the principal persons on the borders who were bound to keep the peace of the marches in 1398. He is said to have been killed at the battle of Homildon, on 14th Sept 1402, but this is inconsistent with an instrument entered in the Buccleuch Inventory by which he gave sasine to Andrew Ker of Altounburne of the lands of Lurdenlaw, dated 30th July, 1413

Robert Scott of Murdieston and Rankelburn, obtained a charter from John Inglis of Manr, of the half lands of Branxholm, &c dated at Manr kirk, last of January 1420 This appears to have been the first acquisition by the family of the lands of Branxholm Robert died in 1426, leaving two sons, Sir Walter his heir, and Stevin Scott of Castlelaw

Sir Walter Scott of Kirkurd, knight, the eldest son, had a charter of the lands of Leinpetlaw, within the barony of Sprouston, from Archibald, earl of Douglas, on the resignation of Robert Scott his father, dated 2d July 1426 He likewise obtained a charter of the lands and barony of Eckford, &c from King James II, dated 3d May 1437 He exchanged his lands of Murdieston in Clydesdale, with Thomas Inglis of Manr, for his half of the barony of Branxholm, (poetically Branksome,) in Roxburghshire, 23d July 1446 According to tradition, Inglis having one day complained of the injuries which his lands of Branxholm sustained from the inroads of the English borderers, Scott offered him his estate of Murdieston in exchange, which was instantly agreed to, and when the bargain was completed, he drily observed that the Cumberland cattle were as good as those of Teviotdale He immediately commenced, like a true border chieftain, a system of reprisals upon the English, which was regularly pursued by his descendants for several generations Sir Walter Scott of Branxholm was one of the conservators of truces with England in 1449, 1451, 1453, 1457 and 1459 He exerted himself in an eminent degree in suppressing the rebellion of the Douglases in 1455, and was one of the many Scottish barons who rose upon the ruins of that once potent family, having obtained from James the Second a grant of their lands of Abbington, Pharcholm, and Glendonarrig, by charter, dated 22d February, 1458–9 That monarch also granted to him and to Sir David his son, the remaining half of the barony of Branxholm, to be held in blanch for the payment of a red rose, for their brave and faithful exertions in favour of the king against the house of Douglas They likewise had conferred on them part of the barony of Langholm in the county of Dumfries Sir Walter established the principal residence of the Buccleuch family at Branxholm castle, and died sometime between 1467 and 1470, possessed of a great part of those pastoral lands in Selkirkshire and Roxburghshire, which still form a principal part of the family property By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Cockburn of Henderland, in the county of Peebles, he had two sons, Sir David, his heir, and Sir Alexander Scott, who was rector of Wigton, director of the chancery, and clerk register of Scotland, in 1483 He fell on the side of James the Third at the battle of Sauchieburn, 11th June, 1488, leaving two sons, Walter and Adam

Sir David Scott of Branxholm was concerned in most of the transactions of the reign of James the Third, and sat in the parliament of 1487, under the designation of 'dominus de Buccleuch,' being the first of the family so designated He enlarged and strengthened the castle of Branxholm, which Sir Walter Scott has made the principal scene of his poem of 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel' He was instrumental in suppressing insurrections on the borders, and was a conservator of peace with England He died in March 1492 By his wife, a daughter of Lord Somerville, he had three sons and two daughters David, the eldest son, erroneously represented by the peerage writers to have carried on the line of the family, predeceased him previous to March 1484, without issue, as did also William, the second, and Robert, the third son, the latter designed of Allanhanch and Quhitchester, who deceased between 1490 and 1492, leaving two sons, Sir Walter and Robert of Allanhanch

Sir Walter, the eldest son, was served heir to his grandfather, Sir David, in the lands of Branxholm, &c, on 6th November, 1492 He accompanied King James the Fourth to the battle of Flodden in 1513, and was one of the few who escaped the carnage of that fatal day He died in 1516 By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Walter Ker of Cessford, widow of Philip Rutherford, son and heir of Rutherford of that ilk, he had two sons, Sir Walter and William of Quhithope 1515

Sir Walter Scott was served heir to his father in 1517 He was warden of the west marches, and besides various deeds of valour during the minority of James the Fifth, is celebrated for an abortive attempt to rescue that monarch from the control of the earl of Angus, when his majesty accompanied that powerful and ambitious noble, in 1526, on an expedition against the turbulent border clan of the Armstrongs James sent him a secret message, complaining bitterly of the durance in which he was held by the Douglases, and soliciting his aid, and as Angus, with the young king, and a considerable retinue, was returning to Edinburgh by Melrose, "Walter Scott of Buccleuch suddenly appeared on a neighbouring height, (at Haydon near Melrose, 18th July 1526) and at the head of a thousand men, threw himself between the earl of Angus and the route to the capital Angus instantly sent a messenger, who commanded the border chief in the royal name, to dismiss his followers, but Scott bluntly answered that he knew the king's mind better than the proudest baron amongst them, and meant to keep his ground, and do obeisance to his sovereign, who had honoured the borders with his presence The answer was intended and accepted as a defiance, and Angus instantly commanded his followers to dismount His brother George, with the earls of Maxwell and Lennox, forming a guard round the young king, retired to a little hillock in the neighbourhood, whilst the earl, with Fleming, Home, and Ker of Cessford, proceeded with levelled spears, and at a rapid pace, against Buccleuch, who also awaited them on foot His chief followers, however, were outlawed men of the borders, whose array offered a feeble resistance to the determined charge of the armed knights belonging to Angus, the conflict, accordingly, was short, eight of the party of Buccleuch were slain, the chief (wounded) was compelled to retire, and on the side of the Douglases, the only material loss was the death of Ker of Cessford, a brave baron, who was lamented by both parties" [Tytler's History of Scotland, vol v page 202] This event occasioned a deadly feud betwixt the Scots and the Kers, which raged for many years on the borders, and caused much bloodshed

A summons of treason was raised against Sir Walter, but the king, after emancipating himself from the domineering influence of the Douglases, declared in parliament, 5th September 1528, that he was innocent of all the crimes imputed to him, and ordered the summons to be cancelled When the property of the earl of Angus was confiscated, Sir Walter obtained a grant of the lordship of Jedburgh forest by charter, 3d September 1528 In the following year, whilst the king was executing summary justice upon Johnnie Armstrong and the marauders of the borders, Sir Walter, with those of the border chieftains under whose protection they were, was imprisoned until after his return Buccleuch, having used satirical expressions against Henry the Eighth, became extremely obnoxious to the English, and the earl of Northumberland, in October 1532, with fifteen hundred men ravaged and plundered his lands, and burnt Branxholm castle, but failed in their principal object, which was to kill or take him prisoner In retaliation Sir Walter and other border chiefs assembled three thousand men, and conducting them into England, laid waste Northumberland as far as the river Beamish, baffled and defeated the English, and returned home loaded with booty In 1536, he was summoned before the justiciary at Edinburgh, for alleged assistance given to Lord Dacre and Sir Kerstall Dacre, at the time of the burning of Caveris and Denholm He appeared in court 19th of April that year, and submitted himself to the will of the king, who put him in prison An accusation so little consistent with his uniform hostility towards the English, probably had its origin in the feuds betwixt the Scotts and the Kers It is mentioned in the notes to the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' that Sir Walter was imprisoned and forfeited in 1535, for levying war against the Kers, but the assistance given to the Dacres is the only point insisted on in the summons against him After the death of James the Fifth he was restored by act of parliament, 15th March 1542–3, during the regency of Mary of Lorraine He distinguished himself at the battle of Pinkie in 1547, but eventually lost his life in a nocturnal rencontre on the High Street of Edinburgh with a party of the Kers, headed by Sir Walter Ker of Cessford on 4th October 1552 He was thrice married, first, to Elizabeth Carmichael, of the Hyndford family, by whom he had two sons secondly, to Janet Ker, daughter of Andrew Ker of Fernehirst (contract dated January 1530), and thirdly to Janet, daughter of John Bethune of Creich By the last he had two sons and four daughters

This lady, the heroine of 'the Lay of the Last Minstrel,' was a woman of a masculine spirit, as appears by her riding at the head of her clan after her husband's murder, and by her efforts to avenge his death Upon 25th June 1557 dame Janet Bethune, Lady Buccleugh, and a great number of the name of Scott were delated (accused) for coming to the kirk of St Mary of the Lowes (now Yarrow) to the number of two hundred persons bodin in feir of weire (arrayed in armour), and breaking open the doors of the said kirk, in order to apprehend the Laird of Cranstoun for his destruction On the 20th July, a warrant from the queen regent is presented, discharging the justice to proceed against the Lady Buccleuch till a new calling Before her marriage with Buccleuch she is said to have been twice married, first to Sir James Creichton of Cranston-Riddel, who died about 1539, (this marriage, however, is not well authenticated), and secondly to Simon Preston of Craigmillar, from whom she was divorced, and on 2d December 1544, she took for her third husband the Laird of Buccleuch This masculine lady in the superstition of the age, was accused of administering love potions to queen Mary, to make her enamoured of the earl of Bothwell, with whom she herself is represented as having carried on a criminal connexion after the death of Buccleuch One of the placards preserved in Buchanan's Detection accuses of the murder of Darnley "the Erle Bothwell, Mr James Balfour, the persoun of Flisk, Mr David Chalmers, blak Mr John Spens, wha was principal deviser of the murder, and the quene assenting thairto, throw the persuasion of the Erle Bothwell, and the witchcraft of Lady Buccleuch"

David the eldest son of Sir Walter, and Elizabeth Carmichael, predeceased his father before 1544, without issue Sir Walter was succeeded in 1552 by his second son, Sir William Scott of Fawsyde, who married Grizel, second daughter of John Bethune of Creich, the sister of his father's third wife, and by her he had a son, Sir Walter, who was served heir to Sir Walter his grandfather 6th January 1558

This Sir William Scott signed the association in support of James the Sixth in 1567, but subsequently joined the party of the unfortunate Mary, and remained till her death one of her most zealous and conspicuous adherents The day after the regent Murray was assassinated, he and Ker of Ferneyhurst, before they could have learned the fact by ordinary means, broke across the English border, plundered and burnt the country, and continued and extended their depredations in the hope of kindling a war betwixt the two kingdoms Being asked how he could venture upon such an outrage so long as the earl of Murray was regent, he answered, "Tush, the regent is as cold as my bridle-bit" It would thus appear that, like the Hamiltons and other partisans of Mary, he must have been aware beforehand of the intended assassination In retaliation the earl of Sussex and Lord Scrope, by order of Queen Elizabeth, entered Scotland, the one on the east and the other on the west, and laid waste the adjacent counties with fire and sword The castle of Branxholm was blown up by gunpowder, and the lands of the chief of Buccleuch plundered to its very gates As soon as the English had retired he set about rebuilding and enlarging his castle It was not finished, however, till after his death, as appears by inscriptions on its walls quoted by Sir Walter Scott in the notes to 'the Lay of the Last Minstrel' In the well-concerted enterprise against the king's party in Stirling, 4th September 1571, when the town was surprised, and the regent Lennox and several of the chief nobility made prisoners Scott of Buccleuch was one of the principal actors, but by too long a delay in leaving the place, the whole were rescued, except Lennox who was killed in the contest, and Buccleuch who surrendered himself to the earl of Morton He died 17th April 1574 By his wife, Lady Margaret Douglas, eldest daughter of David, seventh earl of Angus, he had a son, Sir Walter, and two daughters

His only son, Sir Walter Scott of Branxholm, was infeft in the baronies of Branxholm, &c as heir to umquhil David Scott, his "guidchirs," (grandfather) brother, on 21st June and 10th October 1574 He received the honour of knighthood from James the Sixth, by whom, in 1590, on the fall of his step-father, the earl of Bothwell, [see BOTHWELL, earl of, ante, p 360] he was appointed keeper of Liddesdale, and warden of the west marches In the following year when Bothwell broke out into rebellion he expected the assistance of his stepson, but Buccleuch, for his own security, joined Ker of Cessford, Home of Broxmouth, Lauder of Bass, Ker of Linton, Douglas of Cavers and others, in a bond (recorded Aug 6th 1591) to use their utmost endeavours to take Bothwell, and amongst other conditions they engage to "lay aside all particular querrellis, deidlie feidis and contrauersies standing amangis thame, and for no caus sall schrink frome his Majesties seruice" On the following day he found security to leave the country for three years, when he retired to France, and on the 29th was deprived of his office of keeper of Liddesdale, on account of his quitting the realm After his return a commission was granted to him and Lord Hume, warden of the east marches, and Sir Robert Ker, heir of Cessford, warden-depute of the middle marches, to convocate the lieges within their bounds to oppose the earl of Bothwell He subsequently carried on an active predatory warfare against the English, and is renowned for the singularly daring exploit of rescuing one of his dependents, known by the name of Kinmont Will, from Carlisle castle on April 13th, 1596 This achievement is the subject of the ballad of Kinmont Willie, inserted in the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish border." On the occasion of a truce, as was the custom of the marches, of a single day for the transacting of business, William Armstrong, a follower of Scott, was towards evening set upon and taken prisoner by a party of the English whilst riding home alone on the north bank of the Liddle. He was conveyed to the castle of Carlisle, and brought before Lord Scrope, to whom he complained loudly of the breach of the truce in his person. Buccleuch made a regular application to Lord Scrope for delivery of the prisoner, but receiving no satisfactory answer, he next applied to Bowes, the English ambassador, who advised Lord Scrope to liberate Willie at once. His lordship made some excuse about advertising Queen Elizabeth, when, impatient of delay, Buccleuch sent him a challenge, which, however, he declined to accept. He now resolved to attempt his rescue himself, although a peace then subsisted between the two countries, and he assembled two hundred chosen horsemen. Their trysting place was at Woodhouselee, upon the Esk, the nearest point to the castle of Carlisle upon the Scottish marches, and not above ten or twelve miles from that fortress. The hour of rendezvous was after sunset, and the night being dark, Buccleuch and his men arrived unperceived under the castle, where failing to scale the walls, they forced their way through a small postern into the fortress, and with shouts and sound of trumpet relieved Willie.

Elizabeth, highly indignant at this daring exploit, ordered her ambassador Bowes to complain to King James. Bowes made a long speech in the convention at Edinburgh, 27th May 1596, and concluded by stating that peace could no longer continue between the two kingdoms, unless Sir Walter Scott were delivered into the queen's hands to be punished at her pleasure. Buccleuch answered that he went to England to relieve a subject of Scotland unlawfully taken on a day of truce, and that he committed no hostility nor offered the least wrong to any within the castle, yet he was content to be tried by commissioners appointed by both sovereigns. To this, as might be expected, Elizabeth would not agree. Some English borderers having crossed into Liddesdale and wasted the country, the chief of Buccleuch retaliated by a 'raid' into England, in which he not only carried off much spoil, but apprehended thirty-six of the Liddesdale thieves, all of whom he put to death. In a letter to Bowes, printed in the Fœdera, Elizabeth expressed her indignation at this farther outrage, and there seems to have been at one time a design entertained of assassinating a chieftain who had made himself so formidable on the borders, to which, it was alleged, Queen Elizabeth herself was privy. Matters were at length settled by commissioners, that delinquents should be delivered up on both sides, and that the chiefs themselves should enter into ward in the opposite countries, till these were given up and pledges granted for the maintenance of the future peace of the borders. It is said that it required all King James' authority to induce Buccleuch and Ker of Fernihirst to agree to this arrangement. Buccleuch chose for his guardian, during his residence in England, Sir William Selby, master of the ordnance at Berwick, and surrendered himself into his hands, 7th October 1597. He appears to have remained in England till February 1598. According to an ancient family tradition he was presented to Elizabeth, who asked him how he dared to undertake an enterprise so desperate as that of attacking the castle of Carlisle? He boldly answered, "What is there, madam, that a man may not dare?" The queen, it is said, was struck with the reply, and remarked to those around her, "This is a man indeed. With ten thousand such men our brother of Scotland might shake the firmest throne in Europe." After the succession of James to the English throne, Buccleuch was very active in quieting the borders, and to accomplish this end he raised a regiment of the boldest and most desperate of the borderers, and carried them over to fight against the Spaniards in the wars of Holland. He attained considerable renown as a military commander under Maurice prince of Orange, and was, for his services and military merit, raised to the peerage of Scotland, 16th March 1606, under the title of Lord Scott of Buccleuch.

The locality of the title is in one of the minor vales of Selkirkshire, and tradition attributes its origin to a recess, or in modern Scotch, a cleugh therein. A tradition preserved by Scott of Satchells in his True History of the Right Honourable name of Scott, published in 1688, and quoted by Sir Walter Scott in the notes to 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel,' gives the following romantic origin of the name of Buccleuch: 'Two brethren, natives of Galloway, banished for a riot or insurrection, came to Rankelburn in Ettrick Forest, where the keeper received them joyfully on account of their skill in the mysteries of the chase. Kenneth MacAlpin, king of Scotland, came soon after to hunt in the royal forest, and pursued a buck from Ettrickheuch to the glen now called Buckleuch, about two miles above the junction of Rankelburn with the river Ettrick. Here the stag stood at bay, and the king and his attendants, who followed on horseback, were thrown out by the steepness of the hill and the morass. John, one of the brethren from Galloway, had followed the chase on foot, and now coming in, seized the buck by the horns, and, being a man of great strength and activity, threw him on his back, and ran with this burden about a mile up a steep hill, to a place called Craera-cross, where Kenneth had halted, and laid the buck at the sovereign's feet, who said,

> "'And for the buck thou stoutly brought
> To us up that steep heuch, > Thy designation ever shall > Be John Scott in Buckscleuch.'

But Jamieson confirms and places beyond doubt the correctness of the definition of the word cleugh given by Ruddiman, viz. "a rock or hill, a cliff or cliff, from the Anglo-Saxon clif," as used at least until long after the origin of the name Buccleuch.

It is synonymous, or at least then was, with heugh, a height. The word buck is also by Jamieson and Richardson, derived from the Teutonic buck-en, to bow, to bend, and when used as an adjective it means of a round or circular shape, as buck-basket, a round basket for clothes, buck-wheat, rounded wheat, bucket, a small round vessel for water. It occurs also in the Scotch, as buckie shell, a round or spiral shell, buckstane, a large round stone, and in topography in the Buck of the Cabroch (in Aberdeenshire), a circular portion of that remarkably deep and continuous hollow or dell. The word Buccleuch, therefore, would appear to imply the round or circular rock or hill which gives name to the ravine in question, and the tradition may be regarded as one of those attempts to unlock the etymology of local names which, setting alike chronology and history, whether general or family, at defiance, have nevertheless a plausible air, and pass, because unquestioned, with the majority of mankind.

The first Lord Scott of Buccleuch married Mary, daughter of Sir William Ker of Cessford, sister of Robert first earl of Roxburgh, and died in 1611.

His only son Walter, second lord, was created, 16th March 1619, earl of Buccleuch, with the secondary title of Lord Scott of Whitchester and Eskdale, with remainder to his heirs male, and afterwards extended to heirs whatsoever. He had the command of a regiment in the service of the states of Holland against the Spaniards He married Lady Mary Hay, fourth daughter of Francis, ninth earl of Errol, by whom he had a son Francis and two daughters He died in 1633

Francis, second earl of Buccleuch, added Dalkeith to the family property, having acquired it from the Morton family in 1642 He was a zealous royalist, and on that account his heirs were mulcted by Cromwell in the large fine of fifteen thousand pounds sterling, now equal to about two hundred thousand pounds He died in 1651, in the twenty-fifth year of his age By his countess, Lady Margaret Leslie, only daughter of John earl of Rothes, widow of Lord Balgonie, he had two daughters, Mary and Anne

The elder daughter, Mary, succeeded as countess of Buccleuch in her own right Being one of the greatest matches in the kingdom, she instantly became, though a mere child, the object of deep matrimonial intrigues At the early age of eleven she was married to Walter Scott, eldest son of Sir Gideon Scott of Highchester, of the house of Harden At the time of the marriage her husband was only in his fourteenth year, and a student at the university of St Andrews He was afterwards created earl of Tarras for life [See TARRAS, earl of] They were married by Mr Hary Wilkie minister of Wemyss, without proclamation, by virtue of an order from the presbytery of Kirkcaldy The marriage was principally brought about by her mother, "a witty, active woman," as Baillie styles her, in reference to whom it was said that Monk "governed Scotland through her" [Baillie's Letters, vol iii p 138] This marriage caused a great noise at the time, and became the subject of discussion before the provincial Synod of Fife in 1659, upon an accusation against the presbytery, for granting a warrant for the marriage without proclamation of the banns The presbytery was, however, absolved, because the order was grounded upon an act of the General Assembly, allowing such marriages in case of necessity or fear of rape, and the Lady's friends were apprehensive of her being carried off On an application to the court of session, by the curators of the countess, she was separated from her husband until she should be twelve years of age Various parties contended for the charge and custody of the youthful countess during this period, and Oliver Cromwell was even appealed to on the subject It was at length arranged that General Monk should be her custodier His residence was fixed at Dalkeith House, of which, and the Parks, he obtained a lease for five years Tradition says that he planned the Restoration in the rooms overhanging the river, still existing in the House During the separation of the countess from her husband, they carried on a very affectionate correspondence as husband and wife, and so soon as she became twelve years of age, to enable her to contract marriage legally, the parties were remarried In Lamont's Diary, under date 18th June 1660, it is mentioned that "the Lady Baldeuch took journey for London, and while there was touched by his majesty for the cruells in her arme" The countess died in two years afterwards without issue She was succeeded in the titles and estates by her only sister,

Anne, countess of Buccleuch, born in 1651, at Dundee, then the place of refuge of the principal nobility about the time that it was besieged by Monk This lady, who was esteemed the greatest heiress of her time, was in 1663, at the age of twelve, married to the duke of Monmouth (then only fourteen), son of Charles the Second, by Lucy Walters, daughter of Richard Walters, Esq of Haverfordwest, county of Pembroke Lamont mentions that "the marriage feast stood at London in the earl of Wevins' house, where his majesty and the queen were present with divers of the court" On his marriage Monmouth assumed the name of Scott, and himself and his duchess were, 20th April 1663, created duke and duchess of Buccleuch and earl and countess of Dalkeith, with remainder to their heirs male, in default of which to the heirs whatever descending from the duke's body succeeding in the estate and earldom of Buccleuch His grace's honours, Scottish and English, were forfeited upon his execution 15th July, 1685 The duchess had the liferent of the Scotch titles and estates in terms of a crown charter of regrant, (proceeding on a resignation,) dated 16th January 1666 To prevent the Scotch titles becoming extinct at her death, she resigned them into the hands of the crown, and obtained a regrant on 17th November 1687 to herself, and after her death to James earl of Dalkeith, her eldest son, and his heirs male, and of tailzie This is still the regulating grant of the honours and estates The affecting scene between Monmouth and his duchess, previous to his execution, is well known It is said that James the Second, (of England, seventh of Scotland,) while he ingoriously condemned his nephew to the block, entertained, nevertheless, a strong degree of favour for the duchess Her grace possessed great decision of character, which, however, she only displayed in the management of her family, and of her great possessions, to which she added considerably She appears never to have interfered in politics, and preserved the favour both of James II and of William III She added to the present palace of Dalkeith, and occasionally lived there in princely splendour Six children were the fruits of the marriage Of these two were sons, James earl of Dalkeith, and Henry, created earl of Deloraine in 1706 [See DELORAINE, earl of] The duchess married, secondly, Charles, third Lord Cornwallis, by whom she had one son and two daughters, and died 6th February 1732 Till the day of her death she continued to keep up the state of a princess of the blood, being attended by pages, served on the knee and covered with a canopy in her room, and no one was allowed to sit in her presence Lady Margaret Montgomery related that she had dined with the duchess at Dalkeith, and being a relative was allowed a chair, but the rest of the guests stood during the dinner

Her eldest son, James earl of Dalkeith, lived chiefly in Flanders during the reign of King William, but returned to Scotland on the accession of Queen Anne in 1702, and died in 1705, in the thirty-first year of his age He married Lady Henrietta Hyde, second daughter of Lawrence first earl of Rochester, leaving four sons and two daughters, and, predeceasing his mother, his eldest son Francis (born 11th January 1695) became, at her death, second duke of Buccleuch In 1743 he obtained by act of parliament a restoration of the earldom of Doncaster and barony of Scott of Tyndale, two of the English honours of his grandfather, the duke of Monmouth He married, first, 6th April 1720, Lady Jane Douglas, eldest daughter of James second duke of Queensberry, by whom he had a son, Francis, earl of Dalkeith, who predeceased his father and secondly, Miss Powell, but by that lady had no issue On the approach of the Pretender to Edinburgh in 1715 he sent his tenantry to assist in defending the city He died 22d April 1751 His son, the earl of Dalkeith, had married Caroline, eldest daughter and coheiress of the famous John duke of Argyle and Greenwich, by whom he had four sons and two daughters His eldest son, Henry, succeeded his grandfather One of the daughters, Frances, married to Archibald Lord Douglas, was a posthumous child

Henry, third duke of Buccleuch, was born 13th September 1746 In March 1764 his Grace and his brother the Hon. Campbell Scott set out on their travels, accompanied by the celebrated Dr Adam Smith The brother was assassinated on the streets of Paris on the 18th October 1766 in his nine-tenth year His remains were brought home by the duke, and deposited in the family vault at Dalkeith On his grace's return he devoted himself principally to the improvement of his vast estates On the commencement of the war with France in 1778, he raised a regiment of fencibles, chiefly from among his own tenantry, and by his condescension and kindness of manners and close application to his military duties, he secured the affection and esteem of all under his command He married, in 1767, Elizabeth, daughter of the last duke of Montague, by whom he had three sons and four daughters, viz George, who died in infancy, Charles William Henry, earl of Dalkeith, Henry James Montague, who succeeded as Lord Montague in 1790, on the death of his grandfather the duke of Montague, but died in 1815, without male issue, when the title became extinct, Mary, married to James George, earl of Courtown, Elizabeth, to the earl of Home, Caroline, to the marquis of Queensberry, and Harriet, to the sixth marquis of Lothian On the decease of William fourth duke of Queensberry without issue, 23d December 1810, Duke Henry succeeded to that dukedom [see QUEENSBERRY, duke of] and to considerable estates in Dumfries-shire It was to the influence of this duke of Buccleuch that Sir Walter Scott was indebted for his appointment in December 1799, to the office of sheriff depute of Selkirkshire, and afterwards, in 1806, to that of one of the principal clerks of the court of session His Grace died 11th January 1811

His eldest son, Charles William Henry, fourth duke of Buccleuch and sixth of Queensberry, was born 24th May 1772, and in 1807 was summoned to the House of Peers as Baron Tynedale He married, 23d March 1795, Harriet Katherine Townshend, youngest daughter of Thomas first Viscount Sydney Her grace died in 1814 There is a very affecting correspondence on this event between the duke and Sir Walter Scott, in Lockhart's life of the poet The duke was a constant friend and correspondent of Sir Walter and at an early period of his difficulties he gave his name as security for a loan of four thousand pounds to the embarrassed man of letters He also bestowed on the Ettrick Shepherd the life-rent of the farm of Altrive, on his favourite braes of Yarrow By his duchess he had two sons, Walter Francis, earl of Dalkeith, who succeeded him, and Lord John Douglas Scott, an officer in the army, and six daughters He died at Lisbon, 20th April 1819

Walter Francis Montague Douglas Scott, fifth duke of Buccleuch, and seventh of Queensberry, was born 25th November 1806, married, 13th August 1829, Lady Charlotte Thynne, youngest daughter of the second marquis of Bath, with issue His grace sits in the House of Peers as earl of Doncaster He was lord privy seal from February 1842 to January 1846, lord president of the council from January to July 1846, is lord lieutenant of Mid Lothian and of Roxburghshire, captain general of the king's body guard in Scotland, and high steward of Westminster His grace presented to the Bannatyne Club an edition of the Chartulary of Melrose, prepared at his own expense, containing a series of ancient charters, from the eleventh to the fourteenth century, highly interesting to the students of Scottish history, which was issued in 1837, in 2 vols 4to

His grace was educated at St John's college, Cambridge, and graduated M A in 1827 In 1834 he received the degree of D C L from Oxford, and in 1842 that of LL D from Cambridge His eldest son, William Henry Walter, earl of Dalkeith, was born in 1831, lord-lieut of Dumfries-shire, 1858, elected M P for Mid Lothian 1853, subsequently re-elected In Sep 1839, an entertainment was given by his tenantry to the duke at Branxholm, the ancient seat of the Buccleuch family A pavilion was erected on the occasion, constructed in the form of an ancient baronial hall, and seated to contain upwards of one thousand persons The ancient war cry of the clan, 'Bellenden' from a place of that name situated near the head of Borthwick water, painted in bold letters, was prominent over the seat of the duke Of Branxholm castle (celebrated in the poetry of Sir Walter Scott), the only portion remaining is part of a square tower, which is connected with the present mansion house, the residence of his grace's chamberlain

Dalkeith palace, the principal residence of the family, has twice in the present century been honoured by a visit from royalty, viz, in 1822, when George the Fourth came to Scotland, and in September 1842, when Queen Victoria first arrived in this country

BUCHAN, anciently BOQUHAN or BUCQUHANE, a surname originally derived from the district of Buchan, formerly a county of itself, which comprises the north-eastern part of Aberdeenshire, with part of Banffshire The name, like that of Bouchaine in France Buchanico in Naples, and some others, seems to have had its origin from Bou or Boi, an old French word now only found in the Spanish and Portuguese, primarily from the Latin word bos, an ox, and in reference to the flesh of oxen or cattle, although the district is now more famed for its corn than its cattle It is probable that the names of many similar places in England, as Bukenham or Buckingham, &c, had the same origin In another form we have it in Buccaneers, a Spanish word indicating the kind of food (Bucan, dried ox flesh) on which these freebooters of the new world almost exclusively sustained themselves

The earldom of BUCHAN, in the Scottish peerage, at present enjoyed by the Erskine family, but formerly possessed by the Comyns, is one of the most ancient in Scotland

The first earl of Buchan on record was Fergus, who flourished about the time of William the Lion He is supposed to have been one of the seven earls of Scotland who, being displeased at Malcolm the Fourth's serving under Henry the Second of England at Toulouse, were disposed to seize his person and eject him from the throne in the assembly at Perth in 1160 He had no family name, but is Skene affirms that all the earldoms of Scotland were given by King Edgar to members of the royal family at that time, it is probable he was related to the line of Malcolm Canmore He is mentioned as having made a grant of a mark of silver annually to the abbacy of Aberbrothwick, founded by King William

His only child Marjory or Margaret, countess of Buchan in her own right, took for her second husband, in 1210, William Comyn, sheriff of Forfar and justiciary of Scotland, who became earl of Buchan in right of his wife He was the third of the Comyns in Scotland, and had been previously married to a lady whose name is not known, and by whom he had two sons, of whom Walter, the second son, was earl of Menteith (which title see) By his second wife, the countess of Buchan, he had three sons and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to William earl of Mar He died in 1233, and was survived by his countess

Their son, Alexander Comyn, second earl of Buchan of this name, acted a prominent part in the busy reigns of Alexander the Second and Third In 1244 he was one of the guarantees of the peace with England, and in 1251 was appointed justiciary of Scotland, but being one of the Scottish party who were obnoxious to King Henry the Third, he was removed from that high office four years afterwards In 1257, however, he was restored to it, and held it till his death He married Elizabeth, second daughter of Roger de Quincy, earl of Winchester and constable of Scotland, on whose death, in 1264, without male issue, the earl of Buchan obtained, in right of his wife, a full share of her father's estates in Galloway and in other counties, and on the resignation of the office of constable by Margaret countess of Derby, the elder sister of his wife, in 1270, he became in right of the latter, constable of Scotland He was one of the magnates Scotiæ, who, on 5th February 1284, engaged to maintain the succession of the princess Margaret of Norway to the crown, on the death of her grandfather, being the first of thirteen earls present at the parliament held at Scone on that day In 1286, on the death of Alexander the Third, he was chosen one of the six guardians of Scotland He died in 1289, and was succeeded by his son John, also constable of Scotland

John, third earl of Buchan of the Comyn family adhered to the English interest, and with a tumultuous band of followers he encountered King Robert the Bruce, 25th December 1307, but his troops fled at the first onset of Bruce's army In the following year he assembled a numerous force, but was defeated by Bruce, with great slaughter, at Inverury, 22d May 1308 Soon afterwards he retired to England, where he died before 28th April 1313 His wife, Isabel, the daughter of Duncan, earl of Fife, was the high-spirited lady who placed the crown on the head of Robert the Bruce, as referred to in that article

John's brother Alexander was styled fourth earl of Buchan, and Henry de Beaumont, an Englishman who married Alexander's eldest daughter, Alice, assumed the title of fifth earl of Buchan, in right of his wife He died in 1341

In 1371 a grant of this earldom was obtained from Robert the Second by Sir Alexander Stewart, knight, his fourth son by his first wife, Elizabeth More, long known, from his savageness, by the name of the Wolf of Badenoch He had also the earldom of Ross for life, in right of his wife, Euphame, countess of Ross, by whom he had no issue, but he left five natural sons, Alexander, earl of Mar, Sir Andrew, Walter, James and Duncan, from whom several families of the name of Stewart are descended Having seized the bishop of Moray's lands he was excommunicated, and in revenge he, in May and June 1390, burnt the towns of Forres and Elgin, with the church of St Giles, the maison dieu, and the cathedral, and eighteen houses of the Canons, for which he did penance in the Blackfriar's church of Perth, before the altar, and was obliged to make full satisfaction to the bishop He died 24th July 1394

At his death it devolved on his brother Robert, duke of Albany, when it was granted to John Stewart, his eldest son, born in 1380, to whom his father gave the barony of Coul and O'Neil in Aberdeenshire, and who, for his valour, was surnamed "the brave John o' Coul" In 1416, he was sent to England to complete the treaty for the release of James the First, in which he was unsuccessful In 1420, he went to France, at the head of seven thousand Scotch auxiliaries, to support the right of Charles the Seventh to the French crown against the English At the battle of Beaugé in Anjou, 22d March 1421, he defeated the English under the duke of Clarence [See ante, p 39] He was slain at the battle of Verneuil in Normandy, 17th August 1424 His portrait will be found at p 43 By his wife Lady Elizabeth Douglas, second daughter of Archibald, fourth earl of Douglas and duke of Touraine, he left an only daughter, Margaret, married to George, second Lord Seton, and from them were descended, in a right line, all the lords of the now extinct house of Seton, earls of Winton (see WINTON, earl of)

The earldom of Ross which his father had procured for him fell to the crown on his death, but the earldom of Buchan devolved on his brother Murdoch, duke of Albany, at whose execution in 1425, it was forfeited

In 1466, it was bestowed on James Stewart, surnamed "Hearty James," uterine brother of King James the Second. He was the second son of Sir James Stewart, the black knight of Lorn, by Jane, queen of Scotland, the widow of James the First In 1471, on the fall of Lord Boyd, he was constituted high chamberlain of Scotland, and in 1473, he was sent ambassador to France, when he obtained a safe conduct for passing through England He died before 1500

His son and grandson both succeeded as earls of Buchan

John, master of Buchan, eldest son of the latter, had, by his second wife, Margaret, daughter of Walter Ogilvie of Boyne, a daughter, Christian Stewart, who succeeded to the title, and by her marriage in 1469 with Robert Douglas, second son of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven, uterine brother of the regent Moray, he became earl of Buchan, in right of his wife

They had two daughters, and a son, James, who became fifth earl of Buchan of this family He died 26th August, 1601, aged 21 By his wife, Margaret, second daughter of Walter, first Lord Ogilvy of Deskford, he had an only child, Mary Douglas, countess of Buchan, in her own right, by whose marriage with James Erskine, son of John, seventh earl of Mar, lord high treasurer of Scotland, and first Lord Cardross, [see CARDROSS lord] this earldom passed into the Mar branch of the Erskine family Of this first earl of Buchan of the house of Erskine, there is a portrait in Smith's Iconographia Scotica, of which the following is a cut

James Erskine, sixth earl of Buchan, was one of the lords of the bedchamber to King Charles the First, and resided much in England He died in 1640 His eldest son James, seventh earl, married Lady Marjory Ramsay, eldest daughter of the first earl of Dalhousie, by whom he had four daughters and one son William, who succeeded in October 1664 as eighth earl of Buchan At the revolution he adhered to the party of King James, but falling into the hands of King William's forces, he was committed prisoner to the castle of Stirling, where he died in 1695, unmarried At his death, the succession to the earldom opened to David, fourth lord Cardross, eldest son of Henry the third lord, and in the parliament of 1698 an act was passed allowing him to be called in the rolls of parliament as earl of Buchan

Henry David, the tenth earl, married Agnes, daughter of Sir James Steuart of Coltness, baronet, and granddaughter of Sir James Steuart, lord advocate to King William and Queen Anne, popularly called Jamie Wylie, and by him had with a daughter and a son David who died young, David Steuart Erskine, the eleventh earl, and his two celebrated brothers, the Hon Henry Erskine, father of the 12th earl, and Thomas, created Lord Erskine, lord chancellor, notices of whom are subsequently given in their place, under the head of ERSKINE

Earl Henry the father of these three celebrated brothers, was a man of infinite good nature and polite manners, but ordinary understanding In 1745, when the young Chevalier arrived in Edinburgh, he had a great desire to be introduced to him, but not wishing to commit himself by joining the standard of rebellion, he, along with his brother-in-law, the celebrated Sir James Steuart of Coltness, requested their friend Lord Elcho, who was Sir James's brother-in-law, and one of the prince's firmest adherents, to take them, as it were, upon compulsion, to the court at Holyroodhouse Next day, therefore, according to concert, they were seized at the cross of Edinburgh, by a party under the command of Elcho, and straightway brought into an ante-chamber of the palace The prince, however, on the matter being explained to him, refused to see them, unless as avowed adherents Sir James Steuart consented, was introduced, and turned, while the earl of Buchan, with a low and sarcastic obeisance to Lord Elcho, turned upon his heel, and left the palace He thus saved his estates from confiscation, but unfortunately, it was only to squander much of their value in another way At his death in 1767 he left his children little better inheritance than their talents, for which they were more indebted to their mother than to him

Henry David Erskine, twelfth earl of Buchan of the name son of the celebrated Hon Henry Erskine, by his wife, the daughter of George Fullerton, Esq of Broughton Hall, died in 1857 Born in 1783, he was three times married His eldest son Henry, Lord Cardross, died in 1837, leaving a son, born in 1884, and died in 1819 His second son, David Stuart Erskine, born in 1815 succeeded as 13th earl, married, with issue Besides that of Lord Cardross, the earl also holds the secondary title of Lord Auchterhouse, conferred in 1606

Of the principal families of this name are the Buchans of Auchmacoy, in the parish of Logie-Buchan, Aberdeenshire, who have been proprietors of that estate, as appears from Robertson's Index of Scarce Charters, since the year 1318, holding it of the earl of Buchan until the forfeiture of the Comyns in the reign of King Robert the Bruce In 1503, James the Fourth gave Andrew Buchan of Auchmacoy a new charter, and erected his lands into a free barony which has been inherited by his lineal male descendants ever since The family of Auchmacoy were remarkable for their steady loyalty to the Stuarts, and their opposition to the Covenant Of this family was the celebrated Major-General Buchan, the last officer who had the chief command of King James's forces in Scotland, after the revolution of 1688 He was the third son of James Buchan of Auchmacoy, by Margaret, daughter of Alexander Seton of Pitmedden, and was born about the middle of the seventeenth century He entered the army young, and after serving in subordinate ranks in France and Holland, he was in 1682 appointed by Charles the Second lieutenant-colonel, and in 1686, by James the Seventh, colonel of the earl of Mar's regiment of foot in Scotland He received the thanks of the privy council for various services, and in 1689 was promoted by King James to the rank of major-general After the fall of the Viscount Dundee at Killiecrankie and the subsequent repulse of his successor, Colonel Cannan, at Dunkeld, he was appointed by King James, who was then in Ireland, commander-in-chief of all the Jacobite forces in Scotland He took the field in April 1690 and on his arrival from Ireland a meeting of the chiefs and principal officers was held at Keppoch, to deliberate on the course which they ought to pursue, when it was unanimously resolved to continue the war As, however, the labours of the spring season were not over, they postponed the muster of the clans till these should be completed, and in the meantime directed Major-general Buchan to employ the interval in beating up the enemy's quarters, along the borders of the lowlands, for which purpose a detachment of twelve hundred foot was to be placed at his disposal [Balcarres] It so happened that the general's brother, Lieutenant-colonel Buchan, had joined the party of the government, and at this time commanded King William's forces in the city and county of Aberdeen, and he was directed by General Mackay to march upon any point where he could co-operate with Sir Thomas Livingston, who, at the head of a large force, was acting as a check upon the movements of the Jacobite forces in the Southern Highlands At Cromdale, early in the morning of the first of May (1690), Livingston surprised and defeated General Buchan and the forces under his command, then reposing in the low grounds, on the south banks of the Spey, which gave rise to the well-known song of 'The Haughs of Cromdale,' beginning—

As I came in by Auchindown
A little wee bit frae the town
When to the Highlands I was bown,
To view the haws o Cromdale
I met a man in tartan trews
I speer'd at him what was the news
Quo he the Highland army rues
That ever we came to Cromdale

We were in bed sir every man
When the English host upon us came A bloody battle then began
Upon the haws of Cromdale
The English horse they were so rude,
They bathed their hoofs in Highland blood
But our brave clans they boldly stood,
Upon the haws of Cromdale

But alas! we could no longer stay,
For over the hills we came away,
And sore we do lament the day,
And view the haws of Cromdale

The names of Montrose and Cromwell are, in the rest of the song, by an absurd anachronism, substituted for those of

Buchan and Livingstone, while some of the clans enumerated were not in the skirmish at all The popular songs of a country sometimes make sad havoc with fact and even probability, as history is often "made void through traditions"

Buchan afterwards, at the head of a considerable force, being joined by Farquharson of Inverey with about six hundred of Braemar Highlanders, left the neighbourhood of Abergeldie, where he had been for some time, and descended into the low parts of Aberdeenshire, Mearns, and Banff, but were opposed by the master of Forbes and Colonel Jackson, with eight troops of cavalry Buchan, however, purposely magnified the appearance of his forces, by ranging his foot over a large extent of ground, and interspersing his baggage and baggage horses among them, which inspired the Master of Forbes and Jackson with such dread that they considered it prudent to retire before a foe apparently so formidable They accordingly retreated to Aberdeen at full gallop, a distance of twenty miles Buchan, who had no immediate design upon Aberdeen, followed them, and was joined in the pursuit by some of the neighbouring noblemen and gentlemen The inhabitants were thrown into a state of the greatest consternation at his approach, and the necessary means of defence were adopted, but Buchan made no attempt to enter the town, and marched southward On the advance, however, of General Mackay, he crossed the hills to the right, and proceeded to Inverness, where he expected the earl of Seaforth's and other Highlanders to join him, when he intended to have attacked the town, but Seaforth was obliged to surrender to the government, and crossing the river Ness, Buchan retired up along the north side of the Loch At length, unable to collect or keep any considerable body of men together, after wandering through Lochaber he dismissed the few who still remained with him, and along with Sir George Barclay, and other officers, took up his abode with Macdonell of Glengarry After the submission of the Highland chiefs to the government of King William, Buchan and Cannan, with their officers, in terms of an agreement with the ruling powers, were transported to France, to which country they had asked and obtained permission from King James to retire, as they could no longer be serviceable to him in Scotland Although he had failed to retrieve the fortunes of the fallen monarch, there are letters to him and other documents in the possession of Mr Buchan of Auchmacoy, from James himself, and his queen, their secretary Melfort and others, expressive of their undiminished confidence in his military skill and attachment to their cause On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, the marquis of Huntly wrote a letter to General Buchan, soliciting him to join the forces of the earl of Mar, and he is supposed, though not in command, to have been present with the marquis of Huntly's troops at the battle of Sheriffmuir, Nov 13, 1715, but when the marquis, to save his life and estates, withdrew from the earl of Mar's army, a few days after, it is doubtful whether the general followed his example, as by a letter from the countess of Errol, dated 15th May 1721 it appears that he was still in communication with the exiled family His portrait is in the house of Auchmacoy, Aberdeenshire

A family of the name of Buchan possesses the estate of Kelloe in Berwickshire Lieut-general Sir John Buchan, son of George Buchan, Esq of Kelloe by the daughter of Robert Dundas Esq of Arniston, who distinguished himself in the Peninsular war was for his services created a knight commander of the Bath in 1831 He died in 1850 For additional information as to this family see SUPPLEMENT

BUCHAN, WILLIAM, M D, a medical writer of great popularity, was born in 1729, at Ancrum in Roxburghshire His father possessed a small estate, and in addition rented a farm from the duke of Roxburgh He was sent to Edinburgh to study divinity, and spent nine years at the university At an early period he exhibited a marked predilection for mathematics, in which he became so proficient as to be enabled to give private lessons to many of his fellow-students He afterwards resolved to follow the medical profession, in preference to the Church Before taking his degree, he was induced by a fellow-student to settle in practice for some time in Yorkshire He soon after became physician to the Foundling Hospital at Ackworth, in which situation he acquired the greater part of that knowledge of the diseases of children which was afterwards published in his 'Domestic Medicine,' and in his 'Advice to Mothers' He returned to Edinburgh to become a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and soon after married a lady named Peter On the Ackworth Foundling Hospital being dissolved, in consequence of parliament withdrawing its support from it, Dr Buchan removed to Sheffield, where he appears to have remained till 1766 He then commenced practice in Edinburgh In 1769 he published his celebrated work, 'Domestic Medicine, or, the Family Physician,' dedicated to Sir John Pringle, president of the Royal Society In the composition of it he is said to have been assisted by Mr William Smellie It was published at Edinburgh at six shillings, and so great was its success, that, in the words of the author, "the first edition of five thousand copies was entirely sold off in a corner of Britain, before another could be got ready" The second edition appeared in 1772, and before the author's death nineteen large editions had been sold The work was translated into every European language, and became very popular, not only on the continent, but in America and the West Indies From the empress Catherine of Russia the author received a large medallion of gold, with a complimentary letter Many other letters and presents from abroad were also transmitted to him Dr Buchan subsequently removed to London, where for many years he enjoyed a lucrative practice In his latter years he went daily to the Chapter Coffee-house, St Paul's, where patients resorted to him, to whom he gave advice Before leaving Edinburgh he delivered several courses of natural philosophy, illustrated by an excellent apparatus bequeathed to him by his deceased friend, James Ferguson, the celebrated lecturer On his removal to London, he disposed of this collection to Dr Lettsom He died February 25, 1805, and was interred in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey He left a son, also an eminent physician and the author of several medical works

BUCHAN, or SIMPSON, ELSPETH, the foundress of a sect, partly enthusiastic millenarians, and partly harmless fanatics, was born in 1738 She was the daughter of John Simpson, the keeper of an inn, at Fetney-Can, situated half-way between Banff and Portsoy, and, in her 22d year, she went to Glasgow, and entered into service There she married Robert Buchan, a potter, one of her master's workmen, in the delft-work, Broomielaw, by whom she had several children Although educated an Episcopalian, she adopted, on her marriage, the principles of her husband, who was a Burgher Seceder Afterwards, laying claim to the gift of inspiration, which she supported by asserting that she had had a vision "in the fields," when about six or seven years of age, and that at the age of thirty-four "the power of God wrought so powerfully upon her senses that she could make no use of food for weeks," she began, sometime about the year 1779, to promulgate singular doctrines Mr Hugh White, a minister of the gospel, a licentiate of the Church of Scotland, and recently admitted into connection with the synod of Relief at Irvine, being called to Glasgow at the April sacrament of 1783, Mrs Buchan heard him preach, and being much taken with his discourse, she wrote several letters to him, and a correspondence ensued, which terminated, four months afterwards, in her visiting him at Irvine On her appearance there she was kindly received, and by her artful conversation soon converted not only Mr White but his wife to her own peculiar notions, and through him a few of his hearers, none of whom, however, were of the wealthy of his flock The latter portion of his congregation, disapproving of their minister's conduct, brought him before the presbytery, who after he had disregarded a suspension, and continued to preach his new doctrines, were compelled to depose him from the office of the ministry He afterwards preached, and otherwise laboured to propagate his fanatical tenets, first in a tent, and subsequently in his own house His adherents met during the night, sung hymns, which was a great part of their worship, and the uninitiated were instructed in the new faith by their pretended prophetess, who signed her name "Elspat Buchan," and, though illiterate, had some natural ability She gave herself out to be the woman spoken of in the 12th chapter of the Revelation, and Mr White to be the man-child she had brought forth This and some other of her ravings brought upon her and her party the indignation of the townspeople They rose, assembled round Mr White's house, broke the windows, and might have proceeded to greater extremities but for the interposition of the magistrates After repeated applications to have her proceeded against as a blasphemer, the magistrates thought it prudent, in April 1784, to dismiss her and several of her adherents from the town They conducted her safely without the bounds of the borough, but at parting, she and her companions were pelted by the youthful mob who were following them, with dirt and stones The first night they stopped in the neighbourhood of Kilmarnis, and being joined by Mr White and a few others in the morning, the whole proceeded till they came to the parish of Closeburn, Dumfries-shire, where they took up their abode for a season The farm of New Cample in the parish of Closeburn, in the outhouses or offices of which they took up their abode, (now called Buchan Ha',) continued to be their residence till 24th December of that year, when, under a popular belief that Mrs Buchan was a dealer in witchcraft, they were assailed by a mob of rustics, but were protected by the sheriff, and forty-two of the rioters tried before him for the breach of the peace The persons who came from Irvine were mostly females, but among them were a few men of respectable character and easy circumstances, including a Mr Hunter, a lawyer and fiscal of that town They were joined at New Cample by a lieutenant of marines, by name Charles E Conyers, who resigned his commission, and by a few from the counties on the English border, but their number never amounted to more than fifty Their proceedings and the few conversions they made caused a sensation, and they were beset with letters inquiring into their principles and views They could number one countess at least among their correspondents, besides several clergymen of the church of England, and they began vauntingly to publish their correspondence They also issued from the press two parts of a work called 'The Divine Dictionary,' containing their notions and revelations, each accompanied with the following blasphemous attestation

"The truths contained in this publication, the writer received from the Spirit of God in that woman, predicted in Rev xii 1 though they are not written in the same simplicity as delivered—by a babe in the love of God, HUGH WHITE Revised and approven of by ELSPAT SIMPSON"

Nothing could be more injurious to their cause than to write such a book So little reason was mixed with their madness, that it is difficult at times in its pages to comprehend their meaning or to correctly grasp at their belief It showed them to be illiterate, visionary, and rhapsodical

Their main doctrine was that a coming of Christ in person, or what is called the millennium, was just at hand, on which occurring, they would be taken up to meet him in the air, transformed into his likeness, and would reign with him for a thousand years They believed that none of them were to taste of death, that the approach of the Saviour would be hastened by their assuming the position of waiters or expectants, and in particular by their living like the angels in heaven They emaciated their bodies by fasting They renounced all earthly connections Such of them as were in the relation of husband and wife ceased to know each other as such They asserted that sin no longer existed in their heart,—that there was impropriety in praying for the pardon of sin,—that the soul had no existence separate from the body,—that at conversion a spiritual life was infused, which consisted in rejoicing in God, singing hymns, and waiting in ecstacy for the appearing of their Redeemer Mrs Buchan was not only the high priestess but the treasurer of the party She kept the common stock of the brethren and sisters, for they had all things in common All the funds they brought with them, and they were considerable, she contrived to get into her hands She dealt out their food to them—and that in small portions, she led their hymns, she poured out her rhapsodies over the Bible, she asserted herself to be not only the woman mentioned in the Apocalypse, but the mother of Christ, who had been wandering in the world ever since his days, and that she would never die Although she had a husband and son left behind in Glasgow, and two daughters who were of the party and living before her eyes, she asserted, and got her followers to believe her, that every thing was false about her parentage, marriage, or motherhood Notwithstanding these absurd views, the Buchanites were temperate, civil, and peaceful in a remarkable degree The young women particularly excited much commiseration When the trial of the rioters came on, they would not prosecute, nor scarcely bear witness in reference to the injuries they had received, until the one first called had been imprisoned for suppressing the truth

After the trial they saw they could only be in safety by having a little spot of ground they could call their own Accordingly they removed to the neighbouring county of Galloway, and possessed a farm called Auchencairn, near the village called 'the Nine-mile Tollbar' Here they remained until the death of the prophetess Various defections, however, took place The young women were induced to marry in the neighbourhood, or otherwise returned into society The former was even the case with Mrs Buchan's daughters A few continued, however, until she died in May 1791

On her death-bed, this wretched impostor called her followers together, and endeavoured to cheer their drooping spirits by asserting that though she now appeared to die, they need not be discouraged, for in a short time she would return and conduct them to the New Jerusalem After her death, her credulous disciples would neither dress her corpse nor bury her, until compelled by the authorities The last survivor of the sect, whose name was Andrew Innes, died in 1848 He had kept the skeleton of Mrs Buchan beside him, always expecting that she would come alive again as she had foretold, and carry all her followers to heaven The Buchanites were remarkably peaceable and industrious, and excelled in the manufacture of spinning wheels, since superseded by the spinning-jennies of the great steam-factories

BUCHAN, PETER, an industrious ballad collector, see SUPPLEMENT

BUCHANAN, a surname belonging to a numerous clan in Stirlingshire, and the country on the north side of Loch Lomond The reputed founder of the Buchanans was Anselan, son of O'Kyan, king of Ulster in Ireland, who is said to have been compelled to leave his native country, by the incursions of the Danes, and take refuge in Scotland He landed, with some attendants, on the northern coast of Argyleshire, near the Lennox, about the year 1016, and having, according to the family tradition, in all such cases made and provided, lent his assistance to King Malcolm the Second in repelling his old enemies the Danes, on two different occasions of their arrival in Scotland, he received from that king for his services, a grant of land in the north of Scotland The improbable character of this genealogy is manifested by its farther stating that the aforesaid Anselan married the heiress of the lands of Buchanan, a lady named Dennistoun, for the Dennistouns deriving their name from lands given to a family of the name of Danziel, [see DENNISTOUN, surname of,] who came into Scotland with Alan the father of the founder of the abbey of Paisley, and the first dapifer, seneschal, or steward of Scotland, no heiress of that name could have been in Scotland until long after the period here referred to It is more probable that a portion of what afterwards became the estate of Buchanan formed a part of some royal grant as being connected with the estates of the earls of Lennox, whom Skene and Napier have established to have been remotely connected with the royal family of the Canmore line, and to have been in the first instance administrators, on the part of the crown, of the lands which were afterwards bestowed upon them

The name of Buchanan is territorial, and is now that of a parish in Stirlingshire, which was anciently called Inchcalleoch, ('old woman's island,') from an island of that name in Loch Lomond, on which in earlier ages there was a nunnery, and latterly the parish church for a century after the Reformation In 1621 a detached part of the parish of Luss, which comprehends the lands of the family of Buchanan, was included in this parish, when the chapel of Buchanan was used for the only place of worship, and gave the name to the whole parish

Regarding the etymology of Buchanan (or, as it was formerly spelled, Bouchannane) the following curious passage occurs in Blaeu's Atlas, published in Holland in 1653 "Buchanan qui ont de belles Seigneuries sur la riviere d'Aneric du coste du Midi, et sur le lac de Lemond du coste du l'occident, l'une desquelles appartient au chef de la famille, qui s'appelle vulgairement Buchanan, laquelle a donne le nom a toute la maison le mot, qui signifie une possession, est compose, et veut dire un terroir bas et proche des eaux, car Much ou Buch signifie un lieu bas, et Annan de l'eau, et en effet il est ainsi," &c [Tome vi pp 96, 97] We have not a doubt that the name Buchanan has the same origin as the word BUCHAN (see ante, p 403), being its diminutive of Buchanno or Buquhannno, the little Buquhan or cattle-growing district

Anselan (in the family genealogies styled the third of that name) the seventh Lord of Buchanan, and the sixth in descent from the above-named Irish prince, but not unlikely to be the first of the name, which is Norman French, is dignified in the same records with the magniloquent appellation of seneschal or chamberlain to Malcolm the first earl of Levenax (as Lennox was then called) He had two of his sons, Gilbert and Methlen, are witnesses to a charter granted by the same earl to Gilmore son of Maoldonich, of the lands of Luss, in the reign of King Alexander the Second, a nobleman of no great influence or power, descended from administrators of one of the abthaneships of Dull, or royal lands reverting to the crown by demise of younger branches, in which charter they are more correctly designed the earl's clients or vassals In 1225, this Anselan obtained from the same earl a charter of a small island in Lochlomond called Clarenich, witnesses Dougal, Gilchrist, and Amalyn the earl's three brothers, the name of which island afterwards became the rallying cry of the Buchanans The same Anselan is also mentioned as a witness in a charter granted by the earl of Lennox of the lands of Dalmanoch in mortification to the old church of Kilpatrick, by the designation of Absalon de Buchanan, Absalon being the same as Anselon He had three sons, viz Methlen, ancestor of the MacMillans, Colman, ancestor of the MacColmans, and his successor Gilbert

His eldest son, Gilbert, or Gillebrid, appears to have borne the surname of Buchanan There is a charter of confirmation of that of Clarenich, and some other lands of Buchanan, granted in favour of this Gilbert by King Alexander the Second in the seventeenth year of his reign, and of our Lord 1231 The same Gilbert is also witness to a charter, by Malcolm earl of Lennox, to the abbot and monks of Paisley, dated at Renfrew in 1274 [Chartulary of Dumbartonshire]

Sir Maurice Buchanan, grandson of Gilbert, and son of a chief of the same name, received from Donald earl of Lennox, a charter of the lands of Sallochy, with confirmation of the upper part of the carrucate of Buchanan As his name does not appear on the roll of parties who swore fealty to Edward the First, his descendants claim the merit of his having refused to do so To the bond of fealty, however, a Malcolm de Buchanan attached his name Sir Maurice also obtained a charter of confirmation of the lands of Buchanan from King David the Second in the beginning of his reign

Allan, the second son of the first Sir Maurice, married the heiress of Leny of that ilk, descended from Gillespic Mor de Leny, supposed to have lived about the beginning of the tenth century According to a family manuscript pedigree, quoted in Buchanan of Auchmar's account of the Leny branch, the early proprietors of the estate of Leny had no charters, but carefully preserved a large sword, and one of the teeth of St Fillan, the possession of which was held to be a sufficient title to the lands John, the third son, was always reputed the ancestor of the Buchanans of Auchmaven

Sir Maurice de Buchanan the second, above mentioned, married a daughter of Menteith of Rusky, and had a son, Walter de Buchanan, who had a charter of confirmation of some of his lands of Buchanan from Robert the Second, in which he is designed the king's 'consanguineus, or cousin His eldest son, John, married Janet, daughter and sole heiress of John Buchanan of Leny, fourth in descent from Allan already noticed John, who died before his father, had three sons, viz Sir Alexander, of whom next paragraph Walter, who succeeded his father, and John, who inherited the lands of Leny, and carried on that family

Sir Alexander Buchanan, the eldest son, accompanied the earl of Buchan to France, when he went to assist the French king Charles against Henry the Fifth of England, and distinguished himself at the battle of Beaugé in Normandy, in March 1421 The victory was principally owing to the valour of the Scots auxiliaries It is stated in Buchanan of Auchmar's account of the martial achievements of the family of Buchanan that it was Sir Alexander Buchanan who, in this battle, slew the duke of Clarence, a feat commonly attributed to the earl of Buchan He is said to have pierced the duke through the left eye and brain, on which the latter fell, when seizing his coronet, Buchanan bore it off on his spear-point He is also said to have sold the coronet, which was set round with jewels, to Stewart of Darnley for one thousand angels of gold, and that the latter pawned the same to Sir Robert Houston for five thousand angels Sir Alexander Buchanan was killed at the battle of Verneuil, on the 17th of August of the same year

The armorial bearings of the Buchanans lend countenance to the assertion that Sir Alexander Buchanan assisted in slaying the duke of Clarence The crest is a hand holding a ducal crown The double tressure with fleurs de lis was granted to him by the king of France The mottoes "Audaces Juvo," and "Clamor Hinc Honos," are correspondent to each other and to the devices

Sir Alexander died unmarried, and the second son, Sir Walter, succeeded to the estate of Buchanan

This Sir Walter de Buchanan married Isabel, daughter of Murdoch, duke of Albany governor of Scotland, by Isabel, countess of Lennox in her own right With a daughter, married to Gray of Foulis, ancestor of Lord Gray, he had three sons, viz Patrick, his successor Maurice, treasurer to the princess Margaret, the daughter of King James the First, and dauphiness of France, with whom he left Scotland, and Thomas, founder of the Buchanans of Carbeth

The eldest son, Patrick, acquired a part of Strathyre in 1430, and had a charter under the great seal of his estate of Buchanan dated in 1460 He and Andrew Buchanan of Leny made in 1455 mutual tailzies of their estates in favour of one another, and the heirs of their own bodies, passing some of their brethren of either side He married Galbraith, heiress of Killearn, Bamore, and Auchenreoch He had two sons and a daughter, Anabella, married to her cousin, James Stewart of Baldorran, grandson of Murdoch, duke of Albany

Their younger son, Thomas Buchanan, was, in 1482, founder of the house of Drumakill, whence, in the third generation, came the celebrated George Buchanan One of Sir Walter Scott's colleagues at the clerk's table of the court of session was Hector Macdonald Buchanan, Esq of Drumakill, "a frankhearted and generous gentleman," says Lockhart, "not the less acceptable to Scott for the Highland prejudices which he inherited with the high blood of Clanranald, at whose beautiful seat of Ross priory, on the shores of Lochlomond, he was almost annually a visitor, a circumstance which has left many traces in the Waverley novels"

Patrick's elder son, Walter Buchanan of that ilk, married a daughter of Lord Graham, and by her had two sons, Patrick and John, and two daughters, one of them married to the laird of Lamond, and the other to the laird of Ardkinglass

John Buchanan, the younger son, succeeded by testament to Menzies of Arnprior, and was the factious "King of Kippen," and faithful ally of James the Fifth The local proverb, "Out of the world, and into Kippen," was meant to show the seclusion and singularity of this district of Stirlingshire, of which the feudal lord was formerly styled King The name is supposed to be derived from the Gaelic word Ceap-beinn, 'foot of the mountain,' and the parish is partly in Perthshire An insulated portion of the latter county, about two miles long and half-a-mile broad, embraces the village of Kippen The minister's manse stands on the eastern boundary, so that his dinner is cooked in Perthshire and eaten in Stirlingshire The way in which the laird of Arnprior got the name of "King of Kippen" is thus related by a tradition which Sir Walter Scott has introduced into his Tales of a Grandfather [History of Scotland]—"When James the Fifth travelled in disguise, he used a name which was known only to some of his principal nobility and attendants He was called the Goodman (the tenant, that is) of Ballengeich Ballengeich is a steep pass which leads down behind the castle of Stirling Once upon a time when the court was feasting in Stirling, the king sent for some venison from the neighbouring hills The deer was killed and put on horses' backs to be transported to Stirling Unluckily they had to pass the castle gates of Arnprior, belonging to a chief of the Buchanans, who chanced to have a considerable number of guests with him It was late, and the company were rather short of victuals, though they had more than enough of liquor The chief, seeing so much fat venison passing his very door, seized on it, and to the expostulations of the keepers, who told him it belonged to King James, he answered insolently, that if James was king in Scotland, he (Buchanan) was king in Kippen, being the name of the district in which Arnprior lay On hearing what had happened the king got on horseback, and rode instantly from Stirling to Buchanan's house, where he found a strong fierce-looking Highlander, with an axe on his shoulder, standing sentinel at the door His grim warder refused the king admittance, saying that the laird of Arnprior was at dinner, and would not be disturbed 'Yet go up to the company, my good friend,' said the king, 'and tell him that the Goodman of

Ballengeich is come to feast with the King of Kippen' The porter went grumbling into the house, and told his master that there was a fellow with a red beard at the gate, who called himself the Goodman of Ballengeich, who said he was come to dine with the King of Kippen As soon as Buchanan heard these words, he knew that the king was come in person, and hastened down to kneel at James's feet, and to ask forgiveness for his insolent behaviour But the king, who only meant to give him a fright, forgave him freely, and, going into the castle, feasted on his own venison, which Buchanan had intercepted Buchanan of Arnprior was ever afterwards called the King of Kippen" He was killed at the battle of Pinkie in 1547

The elder son, Patrick, who fell on Flodden field, during his father's lifetime, had married a daughter of the earl of Argyle She bore to him two sons and two daughters

The younger son, Walter, in 1519 conveyed to his son Walter, the lands of Spittal, and was thus the founder of that house On the 14th December of that year, he had a charter from his father of the temple-lands of Easter-Catter In 1531, he had a remission from James the Fifth for seizing and detaining in the castle of Glasgow, John duke of Albany, then governor of Scotland In this deed he is styled "Walter Buchanan in Spittel," the property of which was then in the hands of his brother George Buchanan of that ilk, who resigned his lands of Spittel of Easter-Catter to Edward, son of the said Walter Buchanan, as appears by the confirmation in favour of this Edward, by Gavin, archbishop of Glasgow, dated 18th September 1531

The elder son, George Buchanan of that ilk, succeeded his grandfather, and was sheriff of Dumbartonshire at the critical epoch of 1561 He must have succeeded to the estate when very young, as in the register of the privy seal of Scotland quoted in the appendix to Pitcairn's Collection of Criminal Trials, under date July 11, 1526, there is a respite to George Buchanan of that ilk, and twenty-two others, 'extract furth of the respitt of Johne erle of Lennox, for his tressonabill assesing, taking and withhalding of our soueraine lordis castle and fortalice of Dumbertane fra his seruandis keparis thairof" He was at the battle of Pinkie, on the queen's side, in 1547, in which, besides Buchanan of Arnprior, many others of the name of Buchanan were slain He was also at the battle of Langside fighting for Queen Mary, in 1568 On January 26, 1593-4, Robert Buchanan of Spittel, Mungo Buchanan in Tullichewne, and eight other Buchanans, were ordained to be denounced rebels, for not relieving George Buchanan of that ilk, of a decreet-arbitral, pronounced by Ludovick duke of Lennox, upon a submission entered into by the laird of Buchanan, taking burden on him for his friends, on the one part, and Allan or Awlay M'Caula of Ardincaple and his friends, on the other part, "be the quhilk decrete, the said George has been decernit to mak payment to the said Allane, and vtheris his friendis, of a certane sowme of money, for sum violence done, and attemptit agains thame be the said George friendis" [Pitcairn's Trials, vol i part ii p 306] By Margaret, daughter of Edmonstone of Duntreath, George Buchanan had a son, John, who died before his father, leaving a son By a second lady, Janet, daughter of Cunninghame of Craigans, he had William, founder of the now extinct house of Auchmar A descendant of this house, William Buchanan of Auchmar, published at Glasgow, in 1723, a quarto volume entitled an 'Historical and Genealogical essay upon the family and surname of Buchanan, with an Enquiry into the Genealogy and present state of ancient Scottish surnames, and more particularly of the Highland Clans' An octavo edition of the same appeared at Edinburgh in 1775 In drawing up this account of the Buchanans, Auchmar's work has of course been consulted, but in the early portion especially of the genealogies, we should not be disposed to rely implicitly on its statements, either in respect of the name of Buchanan or any other of the "ancient Scottish surnames" which it contains

John Buchanan, above mentioned as dying before his father, George Buchanan of that ilk, was twice married, first to the Lord Livingston's daughter, by whom he had one son, George, who succeeded his grandfather, and secondly to a niece of Chisholm, bishop of Dunblane, and had by her a daughter married to Mr Thomas Buchanan of Ibert, lord privy seal

The son, Sir George Buchanan, married Mary Graham, daughter of the earl of Monteith, and had, with two daughters, a son, Sir John Buchanan of that ilk, who in 1618, mortified (or bequeathed) six thousand pounds Scots to the university of Edinburgh, for maintaining three bursars at the study of theology there, and in equal sum to the university of St Andrews, for maintaining upon the interest thereof, three bursars at the study of philosophy there, and constituted the magistrates of Edinburgh managers or patrons of both mortifications This on the authority of Buchanan of Auchmar, although Bower in his History of the University of Edinburgh does not mention any such bequest Sir John married Anabella Erskine, daughter of Adam, commendator of Cambuskenneth, a son of the Master of Mar He had a son, George, his successor, and a daughter married to Campbell of Raheny

Sir George Buchanan the son married Elizabeth Preston, daughter of the laird of Craigmillar He was colonel of the Stirlingshire regiment during the whole of the civil wars in the reign of King Charles the First, and was, with his regiment, at the battle of Dunbar in 1650 He was also at the fatal conflict of Inverkeithing in the following year, and with Major-general Sir John Brown of Fordel, colonel of the Mid Lothian regiment, at the head of their regiments, stopped the passage of Cromwell's troops over the Forth, for some days The Scots were, however, eventually defeated with great loss, and Sir George Buchanan, with Sir John Brown and other officers, taken prisoner, in which state he died in the end of 1651, leaving, with three daughters, one son, John, the last laird of Buchanan, who was twice married, but had no male issue By his second wife, Jean Pringle, daughter of Mr Andrew Pringle, a minister, he had a daughter Janet, married to Henry Buchanan of Leny John, the last laird, died in December 1682 His estate was sold by his creditors, and purchased by the ancestor of the duke of Montrose

The barons or lairds of Buchanan built a castle in Stirlingshire, where the present Buchanan house stands, formerly called the Peel of Buchanan Part of it exists, forming the charter-room A more modern house was built by these chiefs, adjoining the east side This mansion came into the possession of the first duke of Montrose, who made several additions to it, as did also subsequent dukes, and it is now the chief seat of that ducal family in Scotland

The principal line of the Buchanans becoming, as above shown, extinct in 1682, the representation of the family devolved on Buchanan of Auchmar This line became, in its turn, extinct in 1816, and in the absence of other competitors, the late Dr Francis Hamilton-Buchanan of Bardowie, Spittal, and Leny, as heir-male of Walter, first of the family of Spittal, established in 1826 his claims as chief of the clan Of this gentleman, the author of an account of Nepaul, and other works on India, a separate notice is given See BUCHANAN, HAMILTON FRANCIS

The last lineal male descendant of the Buchanans of Leny was Henry Buchanan about 1725, whose daughter and heiress, Catherine, married Thomas Buchanan of Spittal, an officer in the Dutch service, who took for his second wife, Elizabeth, youngest daughter of John Hamilton of Bardowie, the sole survivor of her family, and by her he had four sons and two daughters Their eldest son John, born in 1758, succeeded to the estate of Bardowie, and assumed the additional name of Hamilton, but dying without male issue, was succeeded by his brother, the above named Dr Francis Hamilton-Buchanan

The first of the Buchanans of Ardoch was William Buchanan who, in 1693, acquired that estate in the parish of Kilmaronock, Dumbartonshire He was descended from John Buchanan, eldest son of the second marriage of Thomas Buchanan of Carbeth, grandson of Thomas Buchanan, third son of Sir Walter Buchanan, thirteenth laird of Buchanan

The Buchanans of Ardinconnal and Auchintorlie, in the same county, are also a branch of the ancient house of Buchanan of that ilk and of Leny Of this family was George Buchanan, a merchant in Glasgow, and his three brothers, Andrew of Drumpellier, in Lanarkshire, Niel, of Hillington, county of Renfrew, M P for the Glasgow district of burghs, whose male line is now extinct, and Archibald of Auchintorlie These four brothers were the original promoters, in 1725, of the Buchanan Society of Glasgow, one of the most flourishing benevolent institutions in the west of Scotland Mary, their sister, married George Buchanan of Auchintoshen in Dumbartonshire The Drumpellier branch of the Buchanan family is represented by the descendant of Andrew's second son, Robert Carrick Buchanan, Esq of Drumpellier

The name of Buchanan was at one time so numerous in heritors that it is said that the laird of Buchanan could, in a summer's day, call fifty heritors of his own surname to his house, upon any occasion, and all of them might with convenience return to their respective residences before night, the most distant of their homes not being above ten miles from Buchanan castle

In Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol ii pp 544—557, is given, under date of May 31, 1608, the trial of one Margaret Hertsyde, wife of John, afterwards Sir John Buchanan, a female servant of her majesty, Anne, queen of James the Sixth, for stealing the queen's jewels The uncommon nature of the crime, and the interest of the pleadings induced him to insert the entire arguments He remarks that the real cause of the criminal prosecution of this servant of the queen is understood to have originated in Mrs (afterwards Lady) Buchanan's being too deeply versed in certain court intrigues, and it was deemed necessary to get rid of her, even in the face of the most strenuous remonstrances on the part of her majesty She was in the following August found guilty, and banished to Orkney On this case Balfour has the following entry in his Annals, (vol ii p 26,) "John Buchanan and his wyfie, Margaret Hartesyde, that had layin longe in prisson heire, for the allegeit stealling some of the quenis jewells (bot the courtiers talked, that it was for revelling some of the quenis secretts to the king, with a wysse chalmbermaide wold not have done), was, by ane sentence, condemned to perpetuallie exyle, in the ylandes of Orkney, and declared to be ane infamous persone" The sentence was, however, recalled in the following November

Volume third of the same Collection contains the indictment of several persons of the name of Buchanan, and among them Patrick the son of George Buchanar of Auchmar under date June 6, 1623, for the slaughter of one Duncan M'Farlane, in the preceding April The accused gave in a supplication which revealed incidents of a most horrible nature It appears from it that the M'Farlanes had seized one William Buchanan, while hunting, and after torturing him for ten hours had barbarously murdered him His tongue and entrails they cut out, and having slain his dogs, they took out the tongue and entrails of one of them and transferred them to each other, and so left him and the dogs lying on the earth, where they were not discovered for eight days the offence of Buchanan being that he had inquired after some goods said to have been stolen by the said Duncan M Farlane, and the latter having afterwards stolen an ox from one of the party, he was pursued, and firing his gun at them was slain in self-defence The M'Farlanes on their part also gave in a supplication giving a different complexion to the case, and the laird of Buchanan came forward and offered to submit the matter, as it arose out of the murder of one of his clan, to the earls of Mar, Menteith, Wigtoun, and Linlithgow, but no records remain as to the result of this extraordinary case

BUCHANAN, GEORGE, a distinguished reformer and Latin poet, is perhaps the only man but one whom Scotland has ever produced who was acknowledged by the acclamations of Europe to be the princeps—"Poetarum sui seculi facile princeps"—the decidedly first in the art he cultivated, not only of his country but his age This applies, however, only to poets writing in Latin or Greek He was born at Killearn in Stirlingshire, on the western bank of the rivulet of Blane, in February 1506 —As Richardson writes,

> "Triumphant even the yellow Blane,
> Though by a fen defaced,
> Boasts that Buchanan's early strain
> Consoled her troubled breast"

He belonged to a family which was rather ancient than rich He was the third son of Thomas, second son of Thomas Buchanan of Drumikill, who, having received the farm of Moss, otherwise called Mid-Leowen, from his father, was called Thomas Buchanan of Moss George's father died of the stone in the flower of his age, and owing to the insolvency of his grandfather about the same time, his mother, Agnes, daughter of James Harlet of Trabrown, was left in extreme poverty, with five sons and three daughters Her brother, James Harlet, is said to have sent him, (after he had, according to a doubtful tradition, received the rudiments of his education at a school supposed to have been then established at Killearn,) about 1520, to Paris, where he improved his knowledge of Latin, acquired the Greek language without the aid of a tutor, and began to cultivate his poetical talents He seems to have possessed a knowledge of the Gaelic, (which Dr Irving incorrectly conjectures to have been the current speech of his native district at that period, there being evidence that the Macfarlanes, who occupied the wild region of the Dumbarton Highlands in the vicinity, spoke English before his time, although they also use the Celtic to this day,) for it is related that when in France, having met with a woman who was said to be possessed with the devil, and who professed to speak all languages, he accosted her in Gaelic, and as neither she nor her familiar returned any answer, he entered a protest that the devil was ignorant of that tongue,—a trait of humour in entire accordance with the gravity of his after character The death of his uncle, two years afterwards, having deprived him of his resources, he returned to Scotland in 1522 It is stated that at this time his poverty was so great that in order to get back to his native country, he joined the corps then in course of being raised in France as auxiliaries to the duke of Albany in Scotland In 1523, after a twelvemonth spent at home for the recovery of his health, being then only seventeen years of age, he served as a common soldier with the French auxiliaries, and proceeded with them when, under the command of the regent Albany in person, they marched across the borders, and about the end of October of that year laid siege to the castle of Wark, from which they were compelled to retreat After one campaign he became tired of a military life, and the fatigue and hardships he had endured on this occasion so much affected his health, which in his youth seems not to have been robust, that he was confined to his bed for the remainder of the winter The brief notice he gives of this in his short biography of himself, would seem to imply that he considered this service a useful part of education His words are "studio rei militaris cognoscendæ in castra est perfectus" "The exercise which I commend first," says Milton, "is the exact use of their weapon, to guard and to strike safely with edge or point, this will keep them healthy, nimble, strong and well in breath, is also the likeliest means to make them grow large and tall, and to inspire them with a gallant and fearless courage, which, being tempered with seasonable lectures and precepts to them of true fortitude and patience, will turn into a native and heroic valour, and make them hate the cowardice of doing wrong" Milton wrote these words about the year 1650, a time when recent events had given him good cause to appreciate the effect of such a character upon a nation's welfare, and to comprehend the distinction between the logic of the schoolmen, and the logic of Oliver Cromwell and of

In the ensuing spring Buchanan and his brother, Patrick, entered students at the university of St Andrews, and he took the degree of bachelor of arts, October 3, 1525, at which time he was a pauper or exhibitioner In the following summer he accompanied John Mair, or Major, then professor of logic in St Salvador's college, St Andrews, to Paris, and became a student in the Scottish college there In March 1528 he took the degree of M A, and in June 1530, after being the previous year defeated as a candidate, he was chosen procurator of the German Nation, which comprehended the students from Scotland The principles of Luther having, about this time, made considerable progress on the Continent, Buchanan, whose mind was more embued with the spirit of classical antiquity than with the trammels of the Catholic church, readily adopted them, and became a steady friend to the Reformation He had in 1529 received the appointment of professor in the college of St Barbe, where he taught grammar for three years, without deriving much remuneration from his labours In an elegy, apparently composed about this period, he paints in forcible and gloomy colours the miseries to which the professors of humanity in Paris were then exposed

In 1532, whilst at this college, he became tutor to Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Cassillis, "a youth of the most promising talents, and of an excellent disposition," then residing near the college of St Barbe, and to his lordship he inscribed his first work, being a translation of the famous Thomas Linacre's Rudiments of Latin Grammar, which was published in 1583 He resided with the earl in France for about five years, and in May 1537 he returned with him to Scotland

"While he was residing at the earl's seat in the country," says his biographer, Dr Irving, "he composed a little poem which rendered him extremely obnoxious to the ecclesiastics, an order of men whom it is generally hazardous to provoke In this poem, which bears the title of 'Somnium,' and is a happy imitation of Dunbar, he expresses his own abhorrence of a monastic life, and stigmatizes the impudence and hypocrisy of the Franciscan friars The holy fathers, when they became acquainted with this specimen of his sarcastic wit, speedily forgot their professions of meekness, and resolved to convince him of his heterodox presumption in disparaging the sacred institutions of the church It has repeatedly been alleged that Buchanan had himself belonged to a religious order which he has so frequently exposed with the most admirable powers of ridicule, but this seems to have been a tale fabricated by the impotent malice of his theological enemies That he had actually assumed the cowl, has never been affirmed by any early writer sufficiently acquainted with his history it is not, however, improbable, that during the convenient season of his youthful misfortunes, the friars were anxious to allure so promising a novice, and this suggestion is even countenanced by a passage in one of his poetical productions"

Buchanan had determined to resume his former occupation in France, but King James the Fifth retained him in Scotland in the employment of tutor to his eldest natural son, (by Elizabeth Shaw, of the family of Sauchie,) James Stewart, afterwards the abbot of Kelso, who died in 1548, and not his half brother, the famous earl of Murray, as erroneously stated in several of his memoirs We learn from the lord High treasurer's accounts, quoted in the Appendix to the first volume of Pitcairn's 'Criminal Trials,' that, August 21, 1537, Buchanan was paid, by order of the king, twenty pounds, and the same sum in July 1538, when he also received a rich gown of Paris black, with a cassock, on occasion of Mary of Guise's public entry into Edinburgh At the request of the king, to whom the incensed priests had found means of representing him as a man of depraved morals and dubious faith, he wrote his 'Palinodia' and 'Franciscanus,' the latter a powerful and bitter satire against the Franciscan friars "This production," says Dr Irving, "as it now appears in its finished state, may without hazard be pronounced the most skilful and pungent satire which any nation or language can exhibit He has not servilely adhered to the model of any ancient poet, but is himself original and unequalled To a masterly command of classical phraseology, he unites uncommon felicity of versification, and his diction often rises with his increasing indignation to majesty and splendour The combinations of his wit are variegated and original, and he evinces himself a most sagacious observer of human life No class of men was ever more completely exposed to ridicule and infamy, nor is it astonishing that the Popish clergy afterwards regarded the author with implacable hatred The impurities and the absurdities which he rendered so notorious, were not the spontaneous production of a prolific brain, their ignorance and irreligion presented an ample and inviting harvest Of the validity of his poetical accusations, many historical documents still remain Buchanan has himself related in plain prose, that about this period, some of the Scottish ecclesiastics were so deplorably ignorant, as to suppose Martin Luther to be the author of a dangerous book, called the New Testament"

The following account and (in part) only translation yet attempted of this admirable satire is from the pen of an able but anonymous critic, and will not be unacceptable to our readers

After asking his friend—

"Unde novus rigor in vultu! tristisque severi Frons caperata minis, tardique modestia gressus?
Illaque frenatæ constans custodia linguæ? &c"

He makes him thus reply—

"Oft musing on the ills of human life,
Its buoyant hopes, wild fears, and idle strife,
And joys of hue—how changeful! tho' serene,
That flit ere you can tell where they have been—(Even as the bark, when ocean's surges sweep, Rais'd by the warring winds, along the deep,
Is headlong by the howling tempest driven,
While the staid pilot, to whose charge is given

Her guidance, skilfully the helm applies,
And in the tempest's face she fairly forward flies,)
I have resolved, my earthly wanderings past,
In rest's safe haven to secure at last Whate'er of fleeting life, by Fate's decree, Ere end my pilgrimage, remains to me,—
To give to heaven the remnant of my days—
And wash away in penitence and praise,
Far from this wild world's revelry uncouth,
The sins and follies of my heedless youth
O, blest and hallowed day! with cincture bound,
My shaven head the grey hood veiling round,
St Francis, under thine auspicious name,
I will prescribe unto this fleshly frame
A life æthereal, that shall upward rise,
My heavenward soul commercing with the skies
This is my goal—to this my actions tend—
My resting-place—original and end"

To this explanation of his friend's object, the poet thus replies—

"If 'tis thine aim to reach the goal of life
Thro' virtue's path, and, leaving childish strife,
To free thy darken'd mind from error's force,
To trace the laws of virtue to their source,
And raise to heavenly things thy purged sight,
I view thy noble purpose with delight,
But if a shadowy good doth cross thy way,
And lure thee, phantom-like—but to betray—
Oh! while 'tis time, restrain thy mad career
And a true friend's yet timely warning hear,
Nor let old error with bewildered eye,
Nor let the blind and senseless rabble's cry,
More move thee than stern reason's simple sway,
That points to Truth the undiscovered way —
But deem not, that high heaven I dare defy Or raise again vain war against the sky,
For, from my earliest youth I have revered
The priests and holy fathers, who appeared,
By virtue's and religion's holy flame,
Worthy a bright eternity of fame
But seldom underneath the dusky cowl,
That shades the shaven head and monkish scowl,
I picture a St Paul the priestly stole Oft covers the remorseless tyrant's soul,
The glutton's and the adulterer's grovelling lust,
Like soulless brute each wallowing in the dust,
And the smooth hypocrite's still smiling brow,
That tells not of the villany below"

After some preliminary remarks, the poet goes on to enumerate the various classes of men who compose this respectable body—

"Principio huc omnes tanquam ad vivaria currunt, Quos res nulla domi est, quibus est irata noverca, Quos durus pater, aut plagosi dextra magistri, Irritat, aut legum timor, aut quos dedita somno Exercet nullis Lethæa ignavia curis
Deinde quibus gelidus arcum præcordia sanguis Obstitit ingenio, quos sacro a fonte Camœnæ, Quos Pallas Phœbusque fugat, quos sidere torvo Aspicit infausto volucer Tegeæticus ortu
* * * * *
Adde his, quos fibris, quos vexat dira phrenesis, &c
* * * * *
Adjice præterea quos præceps alea nudat, Quos Venus enervat &c"

He rapidly sums up his sketch of the order, as of a set of men

"Whom fear, wrath, frenzy, dulness, sloth, and crime, Ambition, ruin, weariness of time,
Unhappy love home chang'd or hostile found,
And dark hypocrisy together bound"

In allusion to this precious collection, he then makes the following caustic remarks—

"Still deathful is the drug envenomed draught, Tho' golden be the bowl from which 'tis quaff'd
The ass, in Tyrian purple tho' array'd
Is as much ass, as asslike when he bray'd,
Still fierce will be the lioness—the fox
Still crafty—and still mild the mighty ox—
The vulture still will whet the thirsty beak—
The twittering swallow still will chirp and squeak
Thus tho' the vesture shine like drifted snow,
The heart's dark passions lurk unchang'd below
Nor when the viper lays aside his skin Less baleful does the venom work within,
The tiger frets against his cage's side
As wild as when he roam'd in churlish pride
Thus neither crossing mountains nor the main,
Nor flying human haunts and follies vain,
Nor the black robe nor white, nor cowl-clad hood,
Nor munching ever black and mouldy bread,
Will lull the darkly-working soul to rest,
And calm the tumults of the troubled breast
For always, in whatever spot you be,
Even to the confines of the frozen sea,
Or near the sun, beneath a scorching clime,
Still, still will follow the fierce lust of crime—
Deceit, and the dark working of the mind, Where'er you roam will not be left behind"

The king appears to have been either unable or unwilling to protect the author of this poem against the powerful and vindictive body of men whom he had attacked He was accordingly comprehended in the general arrest of persons suspected of Lutheranism, "and to the eternal infamy of the nation," says Dr Irving, "his invaluable life might have been sacrificed to the rancour of an unholy priesthood After he was committed to custody, Cardinal Beaton endeavoured to accelerate his doom by tendering to the king a sum of money as the price of his innocent blood * * While his keepers were fast asleep, he escaped through the window of the apartment in which he was confined, and fled into England" But his disasters were not over On the borders he was molested by the moss-troopers, who at that time had possession of the whole frontier of the two kingdoms, and his life was again exposed to great danger from the contagion of a pestilential disease then raging in the north of England On reaching London, he was entertained by Sir John Ramsford, an English knight, to whom he has gratefully inscribed a small poem He proceeded in the course of the same year to Paris, and thence, on the invitation of Andrew Govea, a learned Portuguese, who was principal of the college of Guienne, lately founded in that city, to Bordeaux There he became professor of Latin, and taught with applause for three years, in which time he wrote four tragedies, two of which, entitled 'Baptistes,' and 'Jephthes,' were original, and on scriptural subjects, but on the Greek model, and the other two were translations of the 'Alcestis' and the 'Medea' of Euripedes His 'Baptistes,' the earliest of his dramatic compositions, and his translation of the 'Medea,' were performed on the academical stage with applause surpassing his expectations The great theme of the former is civil and religious liberty, and some of his allusions in it bear ready application to the persecuting conduct of Cardinal Beaton "Buchanan's tragedies," says a contemporary critic, "are not considered among the most perfect of his compositions We have no intention here to enter upon a criticism of them It may be sufficient to mention, as a proof how little he preserved the keeping of his picture, that he frequently alludes to the classical mythology, and to things with which the Hebrews were unacquainted To some of the characters in Jephthes he gives Greek names, and the chorus speaks of the wealth of Crœsus, who was not born till about six hundred years after Jephtha At the same time it ought to be added, that the language of his translation of the Medea appeared to his learned contemporaries so thoroughly classical, that he was suspected by some of having published in his own name, a genuine relique of antiquity This we conceive to be one of the highest testimonies that could be adduced of the classical purity of Buchanan's Latin style—higher than any evidence founded merely on the authority of any modern scholar In the tragedies of Buchanan, represented in the college of Guienne, the celebrated Michael de Montaigne was a frequent performer And Buchanan appears at one time to have formed a project of composing a work on education, in which he intended to exhibit as a model, the early discipline of his pupil Montaigne, a very remarkable one (his father gave him an old German professor in place of a nurse, that he might learn Latin as his mother tongue—and he did it) We certainly have great doubts as to the excellence of George's scheme of education, nor do we think the world has suffered much by the loss of it

In the Baptistes, Buchanan attacks priestcraft as keenly as in the Franciscanus, as the following terse and vigorous lines will amply testify —

> Nostrique cœtus vitium id est vel maximum,
> Qui sanctitatis plebem imagine fallimus > Præcepta tuto liceat ut spernere Dei, > Contra instituta nostra si quid audeas, > Conamur auro evertere adversarios,
> Tollere veneno, subditisque testibus
> Opprimere falsis regias rumoribus
> Implemus aures quicquid inimum offendent
> Rumore falso ulciscimur, et incendimus
> Animum furore turbidum, et calumnus
> Armamus iræ sævientis impetum

One of Milton's biographers has ascribed to Milton, but without foundation, an English version of the Baptistes This was Mr Peck (New Memoirs of the Life and Poetical Works of Mr John Milton Lond 1740, 4to,) who first indeed declared that the translation of the Baptistes under this title 'Tyrannical Government Anatomized, or, a discourse concerning evil councillors, being the Life and Death of John the Baptist,' was an original work of Mr Milton's, announcing it in the following terms 'His Baptistes is the sixth of Mr John Milton's nine most celebrated English poems, and one of the hitherto unknown pieces of his, whereof I am now to give an account'"

Buchanan also wrote several poems on various subjects, particularly one with the object of securing the patronage of Olivier, chancellor of the kingdom, to the college of Guienne, in which he succeeded Besides these, he addressed a Sapphic ode to the youth of Bordeaux, with the view of recommending to them the study of the liberal arts During his residence there, the Emperor Charles the Fifth passed through Bordeaux, on which occasion, in name of the college, he presented his majesty with an elegant Latin poem

He was still, however, exposed to danger from the malice of Cardinal Beaton, who wrote to the archbishop of Bordeaux to have him apprehended, but his letter fell into the hands of one who was friendly to the poet, and he was suffered to remain unmolested In 1543, the plague having broken out at Bordeaux, he quitted that place, and became for some time domestic tutor to Montaigne, then ten years old, who records the fact in his Essays In 1544 he went to Paris, where, as one of the regents or professors, he taught the second class in the college of the Cardinal de la Moine, and appears to have remained there for the next three years In 1547 he accompanied his friend, Andrew Govea, to Portugal, and became one of the professors in the university of Coimbra, then recently established, and of which Govea was appointed principal His brother, Patrick Buchanan, was also one of the professors, and Dempster says, but not truly, other two Scotsmen, John Rutherford and William Ramsay It was the weakness of this writer to magnify the learning of our countrymen, although in that age of strife and persecution at home they might have been students there The death of Govea, in the ensuing year, left him, and those of his colleagues who, like himself, were foreigners, at the mercy of the bigoted priests, and three of them were subjected to the discipline of a moderate confinement in the dungeons of the Inquisition, among whom was Buchanan himself, who was accused of being an enemy to the Romish faith, and of having eaten flesh in Lent, and other equally heinous crimes After being confined a year and a half, he was sent to a monastery, with the view of receiving edifying lessons from the monks, whom he represents as men by no means destitute of humanity, but totally unacquainted with religion Here he continued several months, and employed his leisure in writing a considerable part of his inimitable Latin version of the Psalms, not as a penance as has been absurdly stated, but for occupation and his own pleasure He obtained his liberty in 1551, and received a small pension from the king, but found his situation extremely disagreeable In a poem entitled 'Desiderium Lutetiæ,' he expresses his anxious desire to leave what he in another poem ('Adventus in Galliam') characterises as

> Jejuna inscia tesqua Lusitaniæ, > Glebasque tantum fertiles penuria, and to return to Paris, (which he represents under the allegorical name of Amaryllis), in the following beautiful lines —

> O formosa Amaryllı, tua jam septima bruma
> Me procul aspectu, jam septima detinet æstas
> Sed neque septima bruma nivalibus horrida nimbis, > Septima nec rapidis candens fervoribus æstas
> Extinxit vigiles nostro sub pectore curas
> Tu mihi mane novo carmen, dum roscida tondet
> Arva pecus, medio tu carmen solis in æstu, > Et cum jam longas præceps nox porrigit umbras, > Nec mihi quo tenebris condit nox omnia, vultus
> Est potis occultare tuos te nocte sub atra > Alloquor amplector, falsaque in imagine somni > Gaudia sollicitam palpant evanida mentem,
> At cum somnus abit, &c

Buchanan returned to France by way of England in the beginning of 1553, when he was appointed a professor in the college of Boncourt It seems to have been about this time that he wrote some of those satirical pieces against the monks which are found in his 'Fratres Fraterrimi' Having dedicated a poetical tribute, written on the capture of Vercelli in 1553, and also his tragedy of Jephthes, published in 1554, to the Marshal Comte de Brissac, then governor of the French dominions in Italy, that nobleman, in 1555, sent Buchanan to Piedmont, as preceptor to his son, Timolesse de Cossé In this capacity

he continued for five years, residing with his pupil alternately in Italy and France He now devoted his leisure to examining the controversies on the subject of religion which then agitated Europe He also composed part of his philosophical poem 'De Sphera,' and wrote his Ode on the surrender of Calais, his Epithalamium upon the marriage of Mary Queen of Scots to the Dauphin, and published the first specimens of his version of the Psalms and his translation of the Alcestis

On the breaking out of the civil war in France, in 1560, Buchanan quitted the family of Brissac, and from the alarming aspect of affairs in that country, returned to Scotland The precise period of his return has not been ascertained, but it must have been either that year or the following one, as in January 1562 he was at the Scottish court, where, though a professed adherent of the Reformed religion, he was well received In the following April we find him officiating as classical tutor to the queen Mary was then in her twentieth year, and a letter from Randolph, the English ambassador, states that Buchanan read with her every afternoon a portion of Livy* With reference to this incident Dr Irving contends that Buchanan's manners must have been courteous and polished We own we cannot assent to this opinion The general manners of the age were not very refined But we think there is evidence to show that George Buchanan's manners were coarse even for his age The answer, energetic but coarse, which he is reported to have made to the countess of Mar, when she demanded how he had presumed to lay his hand upon "the Lord's anointed," is quite characteristic of the man Dr Irving also defends Buchanan from a more serious imputation to which some of his writings have given rise, and instances poets, both ancient and modern, who protested with solemnity that, though their verses were loose, their conduct was correct The excuse appears to us a lame one And this instance only confirms our dislike to celibate schoolmasters

In 1563 he was appointed by parliament with others to inspect the revenues of, and regulate the instruction at, the universities, and, by the General Assembly of the Church, which met 25th December that year and of which he was a member, one of the commissioners to revise 'The Book of Discipline' In 1564 the queen conferred on him for life the temporalities of Crossraguell Abbey, then vacant by the death of Quentin Kennedy, which amounted annually to the sum of five hundred pounds Scots In 1566 he was appointed by the earl of Murray, who, as commendator of the priory of St Andrews, held the right of nominating to that office, principal of St Leonard's college, St Andrews, in which capacity it appears to have been one of his duties to read occasional lectures in divinity Although a layman, he was as one of its members, on account of his extraordinary abilities and learning, chosen moderator of the General Assembly of the church which met at Edinburgh on the 25th of June 1567

It is uncertain at what precise period his admirable version of the Psalms was first printed, but a second edition appeared in 1566 The work was inscribed, in an elegant dedication, to Queen Mary To the earl of Murray he inscribed his 'Franciscanus' during the same year

The conduct of Mary had justly excited against her the indignation of a large portion of her subjects, and after the murder of Darnley and her marriage to Bothwell, Buchanan, who had formerly praised her immoderately, now attacked her in terms equally unmeasured, heaping upon her all the stores of invective which his copious vocabulary afforded We are no admirers of that weak and flagitious woman, but Buchanan had been treated by her with courtesy and kindness—had even received very considerable benefits at her hands, and assuming that his former praises were sincerely bestowed, because he believed them merited, when the object of those praises had put on a character the reverse of that for which they were intended, though neither his defence nor even his approbation of her new character would by any reasonable person have been required, yet the exposure, the reprobation, and the punishment of her faults, her follies, and her crimes, would have come more becomingly from another hand than his He also joined the party of the earl of Mur-

* "There is with the Queene one called Mr George Bowhanan, a Scottishe man, verie weill lerned, that was schollemaster unto Mons de Brisack's sone, very godlye and honest"—Randolph to Cecil, Edin Jan 30th, 1561

ray, whom he accompanied to the conference at York and afterwards to that at Hampton Court At the desire of the earl he was prevailed upon to write his famous 'Detectio Mariæ Reginæ,' which was produced to the Commissioners at Westminster, and afterwards circulated with great industry by the English court It was not, however, published till 1571, a year after the regent Murray's assassination by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh On that event taking place he wrote 'Ane Admonitioun direct to the trew Lordis, Mantenaris of the Kingis Graces Authoritie,' in which he earnestly adjured those whom he addressed to protect the young king and the children of the late regent from the perils which seemed to await them About the same time he also wrote a satirical tract in the Scottish dialect, entitled the 'Chamæleon,' with the view of exposing the vacillating policy and conduct of Secretary Maitland

Shortly after the assassination of the regent, and in the same year (1570) Buchanan was appointed by the Estates of the realm one of the four preceptors to the young king, then in his fourth year, on which occasion he resigned the office of principal of St Leonard's college Various anecdotes are told of his severity, and the impression he left on the mind of his pupil appears to have been anything but an agreeable one Francis Osborne [Advice to a Son, p 19] relates that King James used to say of a person in high place about him, that he ever trembled at his approach, it reminded him so of his pedagogue There is no saying how far the severity of the pedagogue, taken along with other circumstances connected with his birth, may have tended to produce that extreme timidity of character which marked the royal pedant through life All the tutor's pains, though they may have forced into him some "glancings and nibblings of knowledge," did not, however, succeed in imparting any love for his principles of government King James regarded his History of Scotland as an infamous invective, and admonished his heir-apparent to punish such of his future subjects as should be guilty of retaining it in their custody It may be said that it would have been no easy matter to have made a hero, or even an average king, out of such materials as were to be found in the character of James, from whatever parentage inherited Still we cannot help thinking that Buchanan must have committed some grievous faults in his education, for he evidently had it in his power to produce some impression—and the impression he made was entirely of the genus pedant Homer tells us that the precept which Peleus impressed particularly upon his son Achilles was—

Αἰὲν ἀριστεύειν καὶ ὑπείροχον ἔμμεναι ἄλλων

And the sorts of excellence which he sought after were such as might be supposed to have been pointed out to him by his tutors, his father Peleus, and the centaur Chiron James, too, had some vague glimmering of an idea of excelling—but of excelling in what? in writing bad prose and worse verse—for we have carefully read some of his works, and we cannot agree with his panegyrists that they exhibit any degree of excellence, except perhaps that of producing a laugh by their transcendent absurdity As to the "purity of style" which some have found in them, we can only say that to us the style or language appears to be on a level with the logic, which is of the most despicable description In short, James's idea of his vocation was—

> "To stick the doctor's chair into the throne, > Give law to words, or war with words alone,
> Senates and courts with Greek and Latin rule,
> And turn the council to a grammar school"

And a very poor grammar school it would have been of which he was master Not forgetting also

> "The right divine of kings to govern wrong"

About the same time that he was nominated preceptor to the king, Buchanan received the appointment of director of the Chancery, which he held but a short time Soon after, the office of keeper of the privy seal was conferred on him This office, which he held for several years, entitled him to a seat in parliament He likewise received from Queen Elizabeth a pension of one hundred pounds a-year The office of lord privy seal he resigned in favour of his nephew Thomas Buchanan of Ibert In 1578, he was joined in several parliamentary commissions, legal and ecclesiastical, and particularly in a commission issued to visit and reform the universities and colleges of the kingdom The scheme of reformation suggested, and afterwards approved of by parliament, was drawn up by him

In his dialogue 'De Jure Regni apud Scotos,' with a dedication to King James, dated at Stirling, January 10, 1579 (in which dedication he certainly administers a dose of something very like flattery to the young king, when he tells him that "he perceives that by a kind of natural instinct he abhors flattery, the nurse of tyranny"), Buchanan maintains that all power is derived from the people, that it is more safe to intrust our liberties to the definite protection of the laws, than to the precarious discretion of the king, that the king is bound by those conditions under which the supreme power was originally committed to his hand, that it is lawful to resist and even to punish tyrants During the minority of King James, several coins were struck with a naked sword on one side, supporting a crown on its point, and surrounded with this legend, pro me si merear in me furnished, it may be inferred, by Buchanan The work is exhibited in the form of a dialogue between the author and Thomas the son of Sir Richard Maitland, and that his opinions were far in advance of his time appears from the fact of their being attacked, among others, by his learned countrymen Blackwood, Winzet, and Barclay, while the work itself was condemned, in 1584 by the Scottish parliament, in 1664 by the privy council of Scotland, and in 1683 by the university of Oxford, which in that year doomed Buchanan's political works, with those of Milton, Languet, and other dangerous writers, to the flames In the seventy-fourth year of his age he composed a brief sketch of his own life The last twelve years of his existence he employed in writing in Latin his History of Scotland, 'Rerum Scoticarum Historia' Of this work the history of the period in which he himself lived occupies the largest portion, and is by far the most interesting More accurate information than what was known in Buchanan's time now enables the reader to disregard the many fictions and traditions disfiguring the earlier portion of our annals, which he has introduced into his narrative, but in what relates to his own times his recital of facts may be considered in general correct He survived the publication of this, the greatest and the last of his works, scarcely a month Broken by age and infirmities, he had retired the preceding year from the court at Stirling to Edinburgh, resigning all his public appointments, and calmly awaiting death

Shortly before his death, some of his friends having gone to the printing office to look at his history, found the impression had proceeded as far as the passage relative to the interment of David Rizzio, and being alarmed at the boldness with which the historian had there expressed himself, they returned to Buchanan's house, whom they found in bed, and stated to him their apprehensions that it would give offence to the king "Tell me, man," said Buchanan, "if I have told the truth" "Yes, Sir," replied his nephew, "I think so" "Then," rejoined the dying historian, "I will abide his feud, and all his kin's Pray to God for me, and let him direct all" Buchanan expired a little after five in the morning on Friday the 20th September 1582, in the 77th year of his age He was buried in the cemetery of the Greyfriars, and, says Dr Irving, "his ungrateful country never afforded his grave the common tribute of a monumental stone"

It was unfortunate for Buchanan that his country's language was so rude and unformed at the time he wrote, for no writer, we apprehend, can hope to live, who writes in any other but his own "land's language" But Buchanan, if for nothing else, cannot fail to be held in lasting remembrance as a man who bearded kings when it was something to beard them, and who, though but a poor scholar, when a scholar was little more than a despised menial, spoke defiance with his dying breath against the whole race of the Stuart kings

Take him all in all, Buchanan was certainly a remarkable man Of his merits as a poet, an historian, and a political writer, he has left enduring memorials in his works As a philologist he was consulted and his opinion respected by the first scholars of Europe in an age which was fertile in great scholars But, with the exception of certain jests, many of them not of the most refined nature, little or nothing is known by most of the present generation of the man or of his writings Even his own countrymen, if inquired of respecting him or them, can reply only by vague generalities.

His death took place in his house in a close in the High street, Edinburgh, now removed, which stood on the site of the west side of Hunter square, called Kennedy's close Buchanan's residence was in the first court on the left hand going down, the close having consisted of two courts connected by a narrow passage, the first house in the turnpike and above a tavern Finding, when on his deathbed, that the money he had about him was not sufficient to defray the expenses of his funeral, he sent his servant to divide it among the poor, adding,—"that if the city did not choose to bury him, they might let him lie where he was" An edition of his works was published by Ruddiman at Edinburgh, in 2 vols folio, in 1715, and another by Peter Burmann, Leyden, in two vols 4to, in 1725 In the latter the editor, besides his own critical annotations, incorporated the notes, dissertations, &c of his predecessor

A Censure and Examination of Mr Thomas Ruddiman's Notes on Buchanan's Works Aberdeen, 1753, 8vo

Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Buchanan, by David Irving, LL D Edin 1817, 8vo, originally published in 1807

BUCHANAN, DAVID, a learned writer of the seventeenth century Very little is known with certainty respecting him Sibbald says he was descended from the same family as George Buchanan, "David Buchananus, ex eadem familia oriundus," but on this Dr Irving remarks, "we cannot discover his authority for such a statement" If, however, Buchanan of Auchmar is to be followed, he was the second son of William Buchanan of Arnprior, and consequently grandson of the first Buchanan of Arnprior, "King of Kippen," who was second cousin of the great Buchanan Irving further says that "a student named David Buchanan was admitted of St Leonard's College at St Andrews in the year 1610 His identity with the subject of this memoir may perhaps be inferred, but cannot easily be proved" He appears to have resided for some years in France, where he published his 'Historia Humanæ Animæ,' in 1636 It is supposed that his 'Histoire de la Conscience' was also published at Paris in 1638, the place of publication, however, is not mentioned on the title-page On his return he seems to have taken a strong interest in the events springing out of the civil wars It was probably with a view to influence the public mind at this juncture that, in 1644, he brought out an edition of the History of the Reformation by John Knox, adapting it to the times In this edition he omitted the celebrated author's preface, and inserted one of his own Many years afterwards Mr Wodrow, the celebrated historian, meeting in the library of the university of Glasgow with a manuscript copy of the original work, presented to that institution by Robert Fleming, the grandson of Knox, was surprised, on collating it with the work issued by David Buchanan, to find various interpolations and omissions, of which he gives an account in a letter to Bishop Nicolson, published in the appendix to his Scottish Historical Library, No vi Amongst other observations it is stated that in a note on the margin "fides sit penes authorem," he appears to doubt a story which is inserted on his own authority To this work a life of Knox was prefixed, in which he took as great liberties as with the history

In 1646 Buchanan published a work entitled 'Truth its Manifest,' relating to the conduct of the Scottish nation during the civil war, which excited a great sensation In Baillie's Letters his name occurs in connection, it is probable, with this publication, and the following extract from them, with its title as given below, will perhaps best explain its nature as well as the circumstances which called it forth Writing to his friend William Spang, then in Holland, under date April 24, 1646, Baillie says, speaking of the Scottish Commissioners, "many of our friends thought it necessare to have our papers printed among others, Mr Buchanan, a most sincere and zealous gentleman, who hes done both in write and print, here and over sea, many singular services to this parliament, to his nation, and the whole cause, gott a copie of our late papers by his private friendshipe, and hazarded to print them with a preface of his owne and an introduction, both very harmless and consonant to the three following papers which we had given in to both Houses In two dayes or three, 3 or 4000 of these papers were sold, they gave immediately to the people so great satisfaction with our proceedings as was marvellous our small friends were thereby so inflamed that they carried first the House of Commons and then the House of Lords, albeit with the great grief and opposition of the better partie in both Houses, to vote these papers false and scandalous, and as such to be burnt by the hand of the hangman, the publisher, Mr Buchanan, to be ane incendarie betwixt the two nations, and a declaration to be made for undeceaving of the people In all this they knew none of us, they grounded the offence on the preface and introduction, not on our papers themselfe, so we held our peace The burning of the papers, and the House of Commons declaration, very shie and cunning, hes not yet done much prejudice to us, only it has made the extraordinar malice and pride of some men shyne more clearly Mr Buchanan is gone to a place safe enough, if he come among yow, he is a man worthy of great honour for many good services"

In the preface to the 'Truth its Manifest,' he speaks of himself as being possessed of moderate means and as being content with little, "and so," he adds, "not being urged by a near nipping necessity, or imaginary poverty, he dare be bold to speak home to the point, and tell downright the truth of things, according to his best information"

In the latter part of his life he appears to have been on terms of intimacy with Sir Robert Gordon of Straloch, and was his coadjutor in his contributions to Bleau's Atlas [See GORDON, SIR ROBERT of Straloch] According to Bishop Nicolson, David Buchanan revised a great deal of the first projected draughts of the Theatrum Scotiæ in that work, "but," adds the bishop, "his life ended before the troubles [that is, before the Restoration], and he only finish'd a very few of the county descriptions" [Scottish Historical Library, p 17] In the Bannatyne Miscellany, (vol ii p 389,) may be found a Latin description of the city of Edinburgh ascribed to David Buchanan, and it is supposed, on good grounds, that he furnished to the Theatrum Scotiæ the passages relative to Stirlingshire According to the same authority (Bishop Nicolson), he had composed "several short discourses concerning the antiquities and chorography of Scotland," which, in bundles of loose papers, Latin and English, were in safe custody when the bishop wrote, and are sometimes quoted by him It is perhaps of these that Buchanan of Auchmar speaks, when he says that he wrote a large Etymologicon of all the shires, cities, rivers, and mountains in Scotland, which are printed, and from which Sir Robert Sibbald quotes some passages in his History of the shires of Stirling and Fife, and Nicolson seems to refer to him, when he mentions a passage of David Buchanan's writings as being "in notis MSS p D R S"

The MS of a work entitled 'De Scriptoribus Scotis,' preserved in the Advocates' Library and in the university library at Edinburgh, is attributed to David Buchanan, and was for the first time printed for the Bannatyne Club, under the superintendence of Dr Irving, in 1837, in one volume quarto Sir Robert Sibbald states in reference to his 'Historia Literaria,' "The greatest assistance I had is from some manuscripts of Mr. David Buchanan, who hath written upon our learned men in ane excellent style of Latin" [Memoirs of the College of Physicians, p 27]

Buchanan died in August 1652 The last testament of a David Buchanan, supposed to be his, is inserted in the appendix to the 'De Scriptoribus Scotis,' printed for the Bannatyne Club

The separate works attributed to David Buchanan are

Historia Humanæ Animæ, auctore Davide Buchanano Scoto, Paris, 1636, 8vo, a work of about 700 pages A subsequent edition has the words, "Impensis Authoris Venundantur apud Melem Mondiere," 1638, 8vo

Buchanan of Auchmar mentions a large Natural History which he had begun, but which was not completed at his death, and therefore never printed, and Watt, in his Bibliotheca Britannica inserts among his works one entitled A Short View of the present condition of Scotland, London, 1645, 4to Watt's list, however, is not otherwise correct

BUCHANAN, DUGALD, an eminent Gaelic poet, was born in the year 1716, in the parish of Balquidder, Perthshire His father was a small farmer who also rented a mill, and who appears to have given him a better education than was commonly taught in country schools Having been sent, at the early age of twelve, to teach in a family, he was tainted by the bad morals of his associates, and fell into vice, of which he afterwards deeply repented He was afterwards apprenticed to a house-carpenter in Kippen, whence he removed to Dumbarton Having afterwards become a sincere Christian, he was appointed schoolmaster and catechist at Kinloch-Rannoch, on the establishment of the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, where he composed those hymns which will make his name known while the language in which they are written endures His mental powers were of a high order, and during many years he laboured, with extraordinary zeal and devotedness, in enlightening and instructing the inhabitants of that remote district At that period the extensive tract of country which surrounds Loch-Rannoch was under the charge of but one minister, who, in consequence of the wide circuits he was obliged to make, could only perform divine service at the end of the loch, where Buchanan was stationed, once in three weeks On those Sabbath days, however, that the clergyman was absent, Buchanan used to assemble the people together, and after prayer and an exhortation, he read to them a portion of the Scriptures He is said to have rendered essential service to the Rev James Stewart of Killin, in translating the New Testament into the Gaelic language, and to have accompanied him to Edinburgh for the purpose of aiding in correcting the press While there, he availed himself of the opportunity to attend the university, where he heard lectures on anatomy, and the various departments of natural philosophy Some gentlemen, struck by his talents, endeavoured, unknown to him, to procure him a licence to preach the gospel, but without success He published his hymns about the year 1767 Of these upwards of fifteen editions have been printed He died June 2, 1768, of fever, in the fifty-second year of his age "During his illness he was frequently delirious, and in that state would sing of the 'Lamb in the midst of the throne' In his lucid intervals he expressed his full hope in the resurrection of the just, and his desire to depart and be with Christ The people of Rannoch wished his remains to be buried among them, but his relations carried the body away to their own country, and he was buried in the burying-ground of the Buchanans at Little Lenny, near Callander In his person he was considerably above the middle size, and rather of a dark complexion, but upon a close inspection his countenance beamed affection and benevolence Among his intimate acquaintance he was affable, free, jocular and social, and possessed much interesting information and innocent anecdotes in consequence of which his company was much sought after by all the families in the country In his dress he was plain and simple, wearing a blue bonnet and a black dress, over which he generally wore a blue great-coat After his death his widow removed to Ardoch, where she remained till the time of her death He left two sons and two daughters, one of the latter was alive in 1836"

"'The Day of Judgment,"' says the editor of the Beauties of Gaelic Poetry, "displays great force of imagination, and fixes the mind on the sublime and awful scenes of a world brought to an end, amidst the wreck of elements, and the assemblage of the whole human race to judgment

"'The Scull' is full of good poetry, with appropriate reflections on the vanity of mortal enjoyments It shows the fierce tyrant and the lowly slave—the haughty chief and the humble tenant—the mighty warrior and the blooming virgin—the mercenary judge and the grasping miser—all reduced to one level, the grave, to feed the lowly worm and the crawling beetle

"'The Dream' contains useful lessons on the vanity of human pursuits, and the unsatisfactory rewards of ambition The following lines ought to be remembered by every one who envies greatness —

"'Cha 'n 'eil neach o thriobluid saor,
A' meas a' chumne-daonn' air fad
'S co honnhor osna aig an righ,
Is aig a neach is isle staid'

"'The Winter' begins with a vivid description of the effects of that season, and the preparation of men and animals to provide food and shelter The poet then draws a comparison between the winter and the decline of human life, warning the old man to prepare for his future state, as the husbandman prepares food and fuel for winter—to imitate the prudent foresight of the ant and the bee, and not the idle and improvident fly, dancing joyously in the sunbeams till he perishes by the winter's frost This excellent poem is deservedly admired as one of the finest specimens of didactic poetry in the Gaelic language" — Mackenzie's Beauties of Gaelic Poetry, 1841

BUCHANAN, CLAUDIUS, D D , a divine distinguished by his devotion to the diffusion of learning and Christianity in India, was the son of Alexander Buchanan, a man of respectable learning and of excellent character, who was engaged in various parts of Scotland as a teacher, and was shortly before his death appointed rector of the grammar school of Falkirk He was born at Cambuslang, in Lanarkshire, March 12, 1766 His mother was the daughter of Mr Claudius Somers, who had been one of the elders of the church at Cambuslang about the period of the extraordinary occurrences which took place in that parish in 1742, in consequence of the preaching of the celebrated Mr Whitefield, and retained ever afterwards a deep and lasting sense of real religion In 1773 young Buchanan entered the grammar school at Inverary in Argyleshire, of which his father was then master, where he remained till 1779, having made considerable proficiency in the Latin and Greek languages He spent the vacation of that year with a schoolfellow, John Campbell, at his father's estate of Aunds near the island of Mull, and in the following year (1780), at the early age of fourteen, he became, according to the practice still observed among the gentry of these parts, where parish schools are distant and otherwise ill-suited, tutor in the elementary parts of education to the two sons of Campbell of Dunstaffnage Being by his parents intended for the ministry of the Church of Scotland, in 1782 he left the family of Mr Campbell and went to the university of Glasgow, where he remained for two sessions In 1784 from what cause does not appear, but probably the want of pecuniary resources, he left Glasgow, and resumed private teaching in the family of Mr Campbell of Knockmelly in Islay, and afterwards at Carradell in Kintyre In 1786 he attended with credit one session in the logic class, and returned to Carradell, but his studies were put a stop to, by a romantic idea which he sometime before had formed of making a pedestrian tour of Europe in imitation of Oliver Goldsmith His chief view in this project was to see the world, but with an idea of turning his journey to literary account, it might have remained a project, however, when an imprudent attachment to a young lady his superior in birth and fortune, a visitor to the family in Carradell where he was tutor, hastened the execution of the long-formed design Their affection was mutual, but the disparity of their rank and station seemed to form an insuperable barrier to their union Pretending, in order to obtain the consent of his parents, that he had been invited by an English gentleman to accompany his son upon a tour to the continent, he proceeded to Edinburgh as if to meet the party who had engaged him, and in August 1787, putting on coarse clothes becoming his apparent calling, that of an itinerant musician, he left that city with the intention of travelling to London on foot, and thence to the continent, carrying his violin, on which he could then play tolerably well, under his arm He called at gentlemen's houses and farm-houses, playing reels, and he sometimes received five shillings, sometimes half-a-crown, and sometimes nothing but his dinner and lodging On reaching Newcastle, tired with his journey and with living on charity, he resolved to proceed by sea, and accordingly embarking at North Shields, he arrived in London on the 2d of September Reflection, whetted by the sufferings and danger of a very stormy voyage, now induced him to relinquish the idea of going to the continent, yet he continued the delusion as respects his parents by addressing all his letters to his friends at home from places abroad

After suffering much distress, being obliged to sell and pawn his clothes and books, and often wanting a dinner, he one day observed an advertisement in a newspaper for a clerk to an attorney, and offered himself, when he was accepted He subsequently obtained a better situation with another gentleman in the law, and was next employed by a solicitor at a salary not exceeding forty pounds per annum At this period he led a thoughtless and somewhat dissipated life, but about three years after he had gone to London, he began to have serious impressions, and soon became decidedly religious Having written an anonymous letter, describing his state of mind, to the Rev John Newton, minister of St Mary's Woolnoth, London, the friend of the poet Cowper, that eminent clergyman intimated from the pulpit his wish that the writer should call upon him An early interview accordingly took place between them, and the result was that Mr Newton introduced him to a benevolent gentleman of fortune, Henry Thornton, Esq , who, in 1791, generously sent him at his expense to Queen's College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself in mathematics, and received a testimonial from his college, but declined to take public honours He afterwards repaid Mr Thornton four hundred pounds for the four years during which he had maintained him at college He also placed at Mr Thornton's disposal a sum of money sufficient to support a young man of religious character and good ability in poor circumstances, at the same university

In September 1795, Mr Buchanan was ordained deacon in the Church of England, by Dr Beilby Porteous, then bishop of London, and admitted curate to his friend Mr Newton On 30th March 1796, by the influence of Mr Charles Grant (father of the late Lord Glenelg), he was appointed one of the chaplains to the Honourable East India Company, and having received priest's orders from the bishop of London, after visiting his friends in Scotland, he sailed from Portsmouth for Bengal, August 11th of that year

Soon after his arrival, 10th March 1797, at Calcutta, he was appointed chaplain at Barrackpore, a military station about sixteen miles above that city, where, however, there was no place for public worship, nor was divine service ever required by the staff to which he was attached, a circumstance which caused him much concern at that period On the 3d April 1799 Mr Buchanan married Mary, third daughter of the Rev Richard Whish, then rector of Northwold in Norfolk, who with her uncle and aunt and her eldest sister had shortly before gone out to India Mr Buchanan and his friends had been much disappointed that after his arrival in India no opportunity was for some time given to him to promote the great object of his thoughts, the advancement of Christianity, but he bore his seclusion with patience, although forbidden by the rules of the Company to preach to the Hindoos He soon, however, had a way opened up to him of usefulness beyond his highest expectations Towards the close of 1799 he was appointed by the earl of Mornington (afterwards Marquis Wellesley), third chaplain to the Presidency at Calcutta, and he immediately removed to that city and entered on his new duties In the succeeding February he preached a sermon at the new church of Calcutta before his lordship and the principal officers of the government, on the day appointed for a general thanksgiving for the signal successes then recently obtained For this sermon Mr Buchanan received the thanks of the governor-general in council, with a direction that it should be printed and circulated

In 1800, on the institution of the college of Fort William at Calcutta, founded by Lord Wellesley, and a sketch of the constitution of which was, by his lordship's desire, drawn up by Mr Buchanan, who took an active part in the formation and subsequent conduct of that establishment, he was appointed professor of the Greek, Latin, and English classics, and vice provost of the college Already tolerably versed in the oriental languages, he conceived he should best promote the honour of God, and the happiness of mankind, by enabling every Hindoo to read the Scriptures in his own tongue , and in order to carry out these views had to overcome considerable opposition He eventually succeeded in issuing the first versions of the gospels in Persian and Hindostanee, which were printed in India, as well as other translations of the Scriptures Although issued from the college of Fort William, only a very small part of the expense of these translations was borne by the public, the rest being at the private cost of various members of that institution, among whom Mr Buchanan and the excellent provost held the first rank He took a deep interest in the moral and intellectual improvement of the natives of India, and with the view of interesting the learned corporations of Britain in this measure, in October 1803 he despatched letters to the heads of all the different universities in Britain, and to the head-masters of Eton, Westminster, Winchester, and the Charter-house schools, with the following proposals, viz 'For the most approved essay in English prose on the best means of extending the blessings of civilization and true religion among the sixty millions, inhabitants of Hindostan, subject to British authority,' in each university one hundred pounds For the best English poem on 'the revival of letters in the East,' sixty pounds For the best Latin ode or poem on 'Collegium Bengalense,' twenty-five pounds, and the same sum for the best Greek ode on Γενέσθω φῶς The sum of fifty pounds each for the best Latin and Greek poems was offered to the successful candidate at each of the public schools No less a sum than sixteen hundred and fifty pounds was thus appropriated by Mr Buchanan to this benevolent and patriotic purpose These proposals were accepted in the summer of 1804, by the several bodies to which they were offered, with the exception of the university of Oxford, by which they were declined on the ground of certain objections in point of form Of the prize compositions the greater number were afterwards published, as well as a few of those which had been unsuccessful One of these prize productions was a poem on 'the restoration of learning in the East,' by Mr Charles Grant, then fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge, afterwards Lord Glenelg In 1805 Mr Buchanan transmitted to England a work called 'An Account of the College of Fort William,' as also his interesting 'Memoir of the Expediency of an Ecclesiastical Establishment for British India,' a scheme which has since been carried into effect by the appointment of bishops in India, both of which were published The same year his name appears in the list of members of the Asiatic Society

On the 4th of June 1805, Mr Buchanan addressed proposals of second prizes, of five hundred pounds each, to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, for compositions in English prose on the following subjects, viz The probable design of Divine Providence in subjecting so large a portion of India to the British dominion, the duty, the means, and the consequences of translating the Scriptures into the Oriental tongues, and of promoting Christian knowledge in Asia, and, A brief historic view of the progress of the gospel in different nations since its first promulgation He afterwards addressed a letter of considerable length to the archbishop of Canterbury, upon the promotion of Christian knowledge in India, chiefly with reference to an ecclesiastical establishment, and the translation of the Scriptures into the oriental languages He was soon after appointed provost of the college of Fort William, under a new regulation which admitted only of one superintending officer, this appointment, however, he declined in favour of his colleague, the Rev David Brown, the former provost The same year (1805) the university of Glasgow conferred upon him the degree of D D The university of Cambridge some years after conferred on him the same honour So great was his anxiety on the subject of oriental translations of the holy Scriptures, that about this time he transmitted proposals to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge that two sermons should be preached before each of these learned bodies on that subject, by such persons as they should appoint, accompanied with a request that each of the four preachers would accept the sum of thirty guineas, on condition of the delivery to his agents of a printed copy of the sermon for the college of Fort William These offers were in each university accepted He sent a similar proposal, with an offer of fifty pounds for the sermon, to the Directors of the British and Foreign Bible Society, which was at first accepted, but afterwards respectfully declined as being considered irregular

In May 1806 Mr Buchanan set out on a journey to the coast of Malabar, and after visiting the temple of Juggernaut, he passed a week with the native Christians at Tanjore, and afterwards visited the Rajah of Travancore From the sea-coast he proceeded into the interior of the country, to visit the ancient Syrian Christians who inhabit the hills at the bottom of the great mountains of Malayala An account of his journey was afterwards printed in his Christian Researches In the course of this journey he was successful in obtaining Syriac, Hebrew, and Ethiopic manuscripts of great rarity and value, which he afterwards presented to the university of Cambridge Previous to his return to Calcutta he made arrangements for the translation of the Scriptures into the native language of Malabar

Thus far he had succeeded in his design, and laid the foundation of that extensive distribution of the holy Scriptures in their own languages among the native tribes of the East which, in no long time after, was to be vigorously prosecuted, under the auspices even of the governments in India, who, owing to a change of policy, were at that time, from motives of shortsighted political expediency, opposed altogether to the enlightenment and christianization of the Hindoo On his return to Calcutta he found that the college of Fort William, which, during seven years of its existence, had been productive of benefit so important to the service of the East India Company, to oriental learning, and to religion, had been all but entirely abolished, and his office of vice-provost, as well as that of provost, suppressed, and his labours and influence greatly diminished A sketch of his proceedings on the coast of Malabar, which, under the title of 'Literary Intelligence,' he had drawn up, he was obliged to print as a pamphlet, for the governments of Calcutta and Madras refused to authorize its appearance in the newspapers of these presidencies, although it seems to have been admitted into the Bombay Gazette Even the advertisement of a volume of sermons which, after his return to Calcutta, he had preached on the prophecies, having reference to the spread of the gospel among the Hindoos, and which his congregation wished to have in print, was not only, by authority, refused insertion in the government Gazette, the press being at that period entirely under the control of the governor, but he was required, in a letter from the chief secretary, to transmit his manuscripts for the inspection of the government It appears from his letters that this hostility arose in part from the steady adherence of Dr Buchanan to the principles of the administration of the marquis of Wellesley, and in part from dislike on the part of the executive to his evangelical objects and plans This prohibition led to a well-timed and excellent memorial from him, on the subject of the hostility to religion and its progress in India manifested by the government, which will be afterwards noticed

While in the neighbourhood of Juggernaut, as Gibbon first derived the idea of his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire from visiting the Capitol at Rome, Dr Buchanan conceived the design of the foundation of some great literary Institution, which might, by means of books, extend the knowledge of revealed religion and aid in the translation of the Scriptures, but have no connection with missions, and he afterwards prepared and even printed, though by his friends in England it was deemed, in the then unfavourable disposition of the Court of Directors, not expedient to publish, an elaborate plan of such an establishment under the title of 'The Christian Institution in the East, or the College for translating the Holy Scriptures into the Oriental Tongues' The design was but partially carried into effect, and though its failure is to be regretted, it reflects great honour both on the heart and head of its originator, whose single purpose, during all his labours in the East, was the evangelization of the inhabitants of India

In December 1807 he left Calcutta, on a second visit to the coast of Malabar, on his way to Europe About the middle of the following August he arrived in England, without any thoughts of again returning to India In September he hastened to Scotland to visit his aged mother, and during his stay he preached in the Episcopal chapel at Glasgow He soon after went to Bristol, where, on the 26th February 1809, he preached a sermon for the benefit of the Church Missionary Society, afterwards published, entitled 'The Star in the East' This was the first of that series of able and well-directed efforts by which, in pursuance of the resolution he had formed in India, he endeavoured to cherish and extend the interest he had already excited for the promotion of Christianity in the East In April 1809 he spent some days at Oxford, collating oriental manuscript versions of the Bible He afterwards visited the duke of Marlborough's library at Blenheim, which is also rich in oriental manuscripts He next proceeded to the university of Cambridge, where he deposited the valuable biblical manuscripts, twenty-five in number, which had been collected by himself in India It was at this time that this university conferred on him the degree of Doctor in divinity

her return from England, whither she had gone on account of her health, on the 18th June 1805, leaving him two daughters, and in February 1810, he married, a second time, a daughter of Henry Thompson, Esq of Kirby Hall, near Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire This lady died in childbirth in March 1813 She was the mother of two sons, who both died soon after their birth After preaching for some time in Welbeck chapel, London, Dr Buchanan retired to Kirby Hall, the seat of his father-in-law, where for a short period he took up his residence The latter part of the year 1810 was occupied in preparing for the press his 'University Sermons,' and his great work, the 'Christian Researches in Asia' The sale of the latter work was extraordinary, four editions being taken off in the course of a few months The labour, however, which he had undergone in preparing this remarkable volume for the press, led to serious consequences as respects his health In the spring of 1811, he had been visited with a slight paralytic stroke and temporary loss of speech, and on account of his state of health, he proceeded on a tour to Scotland, and subsequently visited Ireland and Wales At this time he formed the plan of a journey to Palestine, but a second stroke in the following December, which left him in a state of great nervous debility, put an end to the project

In April 1813 the affairs of India came before parliament As already stated, previous to quitting Bengal in 1807, Dr Buchanan had addressed a memorial to Lord Minto, then governor-general, on the subject of the hostility which had been shown, since the period of the marquis of Wellesley's administration, to the progress of the gospel in India To this memorial Lord Minto did not deign a reply, but transmitted it to the Court of Directors in England, accompanied by a commentary of his own, of which Dr Buchanan remained perfectly ignorant till the subject was brought before parliament, when, with many other documents relative to Christianity in India, it was laid on the table of the House of Commons He had himself, however, sent a copy of it at the time, to the Court of Directors, with a letter in which he expressed a hope that some general principles on the comparative importance of religion in political relations in India, might be established at home, and transmitted to our eastern governments for their guidance This letter was not published with the memorial to the governor of Bengal, nor does it seem to have been noticed by the court Neither of these addresses, however, though unacknowledged at the time, was unproductive of good In Bengal a more favourable disposition on the part of the government towards the promotion of Christianity appeared shortly after, and the reply of the Directors to the representations of the governor-general in council, though not friendly to Dr Buchanan, was strongly marked by those enlightened and liberal views, which he had been so anxious to see established for the guidance of our Indian governments In the course of the debates which took place in the House of Commons on the affairs of India, Dr Buchanan's name and writings were frequently mentioned, and Sir Henry Montgomery and Mr Lushington took it upon them to deny many of his statements as to the cruel and immoral superstitions of the Hindoos They were, however, ably and eloquently replied to by Mr Wilberforce, and Dr Buchanan himself addressed private letters to these gentlemen in answer to their remarks The account given by him of the atrocities of the idol-worship at Juggernaut was also impugned and attempted to be invalidated by Mr C Buller, M P for West Looe, who addressed a letter to the Court of Directors on the subject Dr Buchanan immediately published a letter to the Hon East India Company in reply to Mr Buller's statements, and also his 'Apology for promoting Christianity in India' He had previously published a work entitled 'Colonial Ecclesiastical establishment,' being a brief view of the state of the colonies of Great Britain, and of her Asiatic empire, in respect to religious instruction, prefaced by some considerations on the national duty of affording it He subsequently went to reside first at Cheshunt, afterwards at Wormley, and latterly at Broxbourne, in Hertfordshire, where at the time of his death, he was engaged in superintending the printing of an edition of the New Testament for the use of the Syriac Christians residing on the coast of Malabar He died at Broxbourne, February 9, 1815, at the early age of 48, and was buried at Little Ouseburn in Yorkshire, near the remains of his second wife and two infant sons A monumental inscription, written by the Rev W Richardson of York, records in plain but expressive language the leading particulars of his life and character His Memoirs, by the Rev J Pearson, with extracts from his correspondence, were published in 1817 in 2 vols , and were republished in 1834, in a condensed form by Dr Bickersteth for the Christian Library, from which the annexed portrait is taken

BUCHANAN, DAVID, an enterprising publisher and printer, of whose ancestry, any more than of others of the same name in this work, no more is known than that, as bearing the name of a barony, he was, and must have been, descended from the ancient family of Buchanan of that ilk, at some stage, more or less remote, of its various ramifications He was born in Montrose in 1745, and studied at the university of Aberdeen, where he obtained the degree of M A He commenced the art of a printer in his native town, at a time when that art had made comparatively little progress in the north of Scotland, and, indeed, was practically unknown in most of the provincial towns, combining with it the business of publishing In the course of his trading he republished several standard works in a style equal, if not superior, to anything previously attempted in Scotland, among these were the dictionaries of Johnson, Boyer, and Ainsworth, the first of which was then accounted a great undertaking He also printed the first of the small or pocket editions of Johnson's Dictionary, which was abridged and prepared by himself, to which may be added a great variety of the English classics in a miniature form Being acquainted with the classics, he revised the press himself, correcting previous errors and supplying omissions to the dictionaries Thus the Montrose press of that day acquired a high reputation, and its productions were extensively circulated Mr Buchanan died in 1812.—Family information

BUCHANAN, DAVID, eldest son of the preceding, a miscellaneous writer of some ability, was born at Montrose in 1779. His earliest essay as a political writer was in Cobbett's Political Register, being a reply to certain theories advanced by that politician on a question in political economy. He was a contributor to the Edinburgh Review, shortly after the commencement of that periodical, but the first literary effort of his which attracted general attention was a pamphlet published in 1806 or 1807, showing the inefficiency of the volunteer system of Pitt. The opinions so ably advocated in this pamphlet were supported by Mr Wyndham in the House of Commons, and received considerable notice from other public men of the day. At the time Mr Buchanan wrote this pamphlet, he resided at Montrose with his father, but encouraged by the promises and support of a number of gentlemen belonging to the liberal party, including Francis Jeffrey and Francis Horner, he repaired to Edinburgh about the end of the year 1808, and started a newspaper called the Weekly Register. This paper, although conducted with much ability, did not continue longer than a year. The services of Mr Buchanan were then transferred to the Caledonian Mercury, of which paper he was editor from 1810 to 1827. A vacancy having, in the latter year, occurred in the management of the Edinburgh Courant, the editorship of that paper was offered to the subject of this notice, who at once accepted of it. He was succeeded in the Caledonian Mercury by Dr James Browne, author of the 'History of the Highlands and of the Highland Clans.' In 1857 it came under the editorship of Mr James Robie, who had for many years conducted the Banner of Ulster, a Belfast paper, and to his exertions must be attributed the popular character and prosperous condition to which it soon attained.

About the year 1814 Mr Buchanan brought out an edition of 'Smith's Wealth of Nations,' with a Life and extensive notes, and a volume of additional matter. He also edited an edition of the Edinburgh Gazetteer in six volumes, and supplied a considerable portion of the articles of that work. A few years before his death he wrote a small volume on the principles of commercial taxation, containing valuable matter. To the seventh edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, he contributed, amongst others, the articles on Arabia, Asia, Statistics of France, Hindostan, Siberia, United States, and Van Diemen's Land, as well as the article on general Statistics,—he also, with Dr Browne and Mr H. Smith, compiled the information contained in the Edinburgh Geographical Atlas, a work published in folio, in 1835. Mr Buchanan died at Glasgow, whither he had gone on a visit to his son-in-law, Mr Duff, engineer in that city, on the 13th August 1848. For the last five or six years of his life, he had suffered much from disease of the heart, and was at last cut off by it so suddenly that, only a few hours before his death, he had written a paper on taxation for the immediately succeeding publication of the Edinburgh Courant. He was connected with the newspaper press of Scotland for the long period of forty years. His style of writing was at all times clear and concise. He was a man of unobtrusive habits, mild and gentle in his demeanour, and held in high respect by all who had an opportunity of forming an estimate of his character.—Family information, and Obituary at the time

BUCHANAN, (HAMILTON) FRANCIS, of Leny, surgeon, and author of several works relative to India, third son of Thomas Buchanan of Spittal (mentioned in the preliminary notice of the surname of Buchanan, ante, p. 462,) and Elizabeth Hamilton, heiress of Bardowie, in the county of Lanark, was born at Branziet, in the parish of Callander, Perthshire, February 15th, 1762. He received the elementary parts of his education at Glasgow, but studied for the medical profession at the university of Edinburgh, where he received his degree in 1783. Soon after he was appointed assistant surgeon on board a man-of-war, but after serving for some time, he was obliged to retire from that situation on account of bad health, which kept him for some years at home. He appears to have gone out to the East Indies some time before 1791, as we find the following reference to him in Dr Robertson's account of Callander sent to the editor in that year, "The most learned person who is known to have belonged to this parish is Dr Francis Buchanan, at present in the East Indies In classical and medical knowledge he has few equals, and he is well acquainted with the whole system of nature" In 1794 he was appointed surgeon in the East India Company's service on the Bengal establishment, and was sent with Captain Symes on his mission to the court of Ava at Amerapoora in 1795, when the latter had the satisfaction of concluding an advantageous treaty of amity and commerce with the Burmese emperor, of which he afterwards published an account, under the title of 'Embassy to the Kingdom of Ava' In the course of his medical studies Dr Buchanan had paid particular attention to botany and the kindred branches of natural science, and during his voyages to and from, and his stay in, the Burman empire, he was enabled to make some valuable collections of the plants of Pegu, Ava, and the Andaman islands, which, with several drawings, he transmitted to the Court of Directors at London, and by them they were presented to Sir Joseph Banks, then president of the Royal Society of London He was subsequently stationed for two years at Luckipore, near to where the Brahmaputra, the largest river in India, joins the Ganges, the united rivers forming the easternmost deltoid branch of the latter, ten miles wide, and falling into the sea in the Bay of Bengal At that place he principally occupied himself in describing the fishes found in the neighbourhood

In 1798, the board of trade at Calcutta, on the recommendation of Dr Roxburgh, superintendent of the botanical garden recently established in that city, employed Dr Buchanan to visit the district and neighbourhood of Chittagong, or Chatigong, on the west border of the Burman Empire, and here, too, he collected numerous specimens of plants, which were, as the previous ones, transmitted to Sir Joseph Banks, and extended his knowledge of the natural history of Assam In the following year he was employed in describing the fishes of the Ganges, of which he published an account in 1822, with plates His attainments in the departments of natural history and statistics became so highly appreciated that, in 1800, he was chosen by the Marquis Wellesley, then governor-general of India, to examine into, and report upon, the entire agricultural and manufacturing systems and products of Mysore, then recently acquired by the British arms, as well as those of the adjacent province of Malabar, with suggestions for their improvement, as also upon the general condition of the inhabitants and the climate and physical aspect of the country At that period the rapid progress of the English conquests made it impossible for the local government to find officers versant in the local languages of their acquisitions, and Dr Buchanan, whose labours had been confined to the northern region of the territories of the Company, was necessarily unacquainted with the dialects of the south It was his practice to travel a certain distance every day, and each morning before setting out from the place where he had rested during the night, he assembled those who resided in the neighbourhood, and questioned them on the several points contained in his instructions The answers were such as suited the hearers to give and the interpreter to communicate, and the patient and confiding Doctor noted all down faithfully in his daybook for the use of the government Thus, while everything that he saw was described perspicuously and correctly enough it was not unfrequently very different with what he heard The result of his inquiries was, after his first return to England, published in 1807, under the patronage of the Court of Directors, with the title of 'Travels in the Mysore,' in three large quarto volumes, illustrated with maps and drawings The work, from the manner in which the author collected his information, is more in the nature of a journal than a regular and digested account of Mysore, yet, as a writer in the Edinburgh Review for October 1808 justly remarks, "After all the deductions that can be made from Dr Buchanan's authority, his book remains an interesting and valuable publication relating to a country then scarcely known in Europe He has rendered an essential service to the Indian historian by collecting a variety of inscriptions extant in the temples of the peninsula" The reviewer sums up his opinion of this work by saying that "those who will take the trouble to peruse Dr Buchanan's book will certainly obtain a far more accurate notion of the actual condition and appearance of India, and of its existing arts, usages, and manners, than could be derived from all the other books relating to it in existence, but they will frequently be misled as to its religion, literature, and antiquities, and must submit to more labour than readers are usually disposed for, in collecting and piecing together the scattered and disjointed fragments of information of which the volumes are composed"

In 1802 Dr Buchanan was appointed to accompany Captain Knox on his embassy from the governor-general to Nepaul, thus again changing the scene of his labours from the south to the northern part of Hindostan In the course of this journey, and residence in Nepaul, he made large additions to his collections of rare plants A description of Nepaul, which he wrote at this time, he transmitted to the Court of Directors, and it remained unpublished till 1819, after he had retired from the Company's service, and was independent of their smile or their frown, when with fuller materials he brought it out under the name of an 'Account of the Kingdom of Nepaul' Notwithstanding the researches of later travellers, Dr Buchanan's work still remains the standard authority of the country of which it treats Indeed it and the similar work of Colonel Kirkpatrick on the same state (published in 1811) have furnished the principal materials for most of the recent works on that country In Blackwood's Magazine for July 1852, there is a review of various publications, all having reference to that kingdom, and all published many years subsequent to Dr Buchanan's work, and they are one and all stated to be "very largely indebted to the Doctor and the Colonel, although their authors rarely remember to acknowledge their obligations" Such a testimony is honourable to the observation and acuteness of Dr Buchanan, who was among the first to visit and to describe that remote region of Hindostan

On his return from Nepaul, he was appointed surgeon to the governor-general, the Marquis Wellesley, of the great merit of whose administration he had, like his namesake Dr Claudius Buchanan, formed a very high estimate The liberal and enlightened policy of that eminent statesman did more for the regeneration and civilization of India than did that of any of the governments which, for many years, had either preceded or succeeded him His wise and energetic measures, joined to his selection and patronage of men distinguished for their attainments and ability, in the precise departments for which they were best fitted, enabled him to establish upon a broad basis the foundations of our vast and mighty empire in India When not occupied in official duties, Dr Buchanan devoted much of his leisure to the superintendence of the menagerie founded at Calcutta by the marquis, and to the description of the animals which it contained In 1805, on the recall, at his own request, of his noble patron, he accompanied him to England, and in the following year he was again sent out to India by the Court of Directors, for the purpose of making a statistical survey of the territory under the presidency of Fort William, which comprehends Bengal Proper, and several of the adjoining districts Several papers taken from this survey were communicated by him to the Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society After being engaged in this laborious occupation for upwards of seven years, he returned to Calcutta, and in 1814, on the death of Dr Roxburgh, he became superintendent of the botanical garden in that city, having been appointed successor to that eminent botanist by the Court of Directors as early as 1807

Dr Buchanan had repeatedly received the public thanks of the Court of Directors, and of the Governor-general in council, for his useful collections and his valuable information on matters relative to the different countries of India which had been the scene of his exertions and his investigations The objects of his ambition had now been fully attained in India, his services had been not only honourably acknowledged but liberally rewarded by the East India Company, he had acquired an ample fortune, and he naturally felt anxious to retire from the enervating influence of an eastern climate and the responsibility and labours of public service, to spend the remainder of his life, and enjoy his well-earned wealth and reputation, in his native land He accordingly left Calcutta in 1815, and on his arrival in London, he presented to the Court of Directors his collections relative to India, consisting of drawings, of plants, minerals and drugs, coins and manuscripts, as also some papers on the geography of Ava, several genealogical tables, and his notes on natural history Before leaving Calcutta, probably on account of his being officially employed to prepare them, he had been deprived by the marquis of Hastings, the then governor-general, of all the botanical drawings which had been made under his inspection during his last stay in India, and which he intended to have given, with his other collections, to the library of the India House in Leadenhall street, London This circumstance, Dr Buchanan referred to in a paper which he contributed to the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh

Soon after his arrival in England, Dr Buchanan proceeded to Scotland, and spent the latter years of his life at Leny in Perthshire, an estate to which his father had succeeded as heir of entail, and which, on the death of his eldest brother, Colonel Hamilton (who had taken his mother's name on inheriting Baldowie), without children, came into his possession with the other family estates, when he also assumed the name of Hamilton as a prefix to his paternal one He married a Miss Block, and had a son, John Hamilton Buchanan, who succeeded him, and a daughter, who died young In 1821, when the marquis Wellesley was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, Dr Buchanan was asked to accompany him in an official capacity, but he declined the offer on account of his health and love of retirement In 1826 he was appointed a deputy lieutenant of Perthshire The same year he established his claim to be considered the chief of the clan Buchanan [see ante, p 461] He devoted much of his time to the improvement of his residence at Leny, and introduced into his garden and grounds many curious plants, shrubs, &c He was a member of several learned and scientific societies, and a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh He died June 15, 1829, in the 67th year of his age

His works are

Buist, a surname derived from the old Scottish word buist or boist, a small wooden box or chest, from boceta, old Norman, a little box of wood Thus, in the accounts of the lord high-treasurer of Scotland, under date October 11, 1540, (reign of James the Fifth) mention is made of "ane Boist to keip Hoistis in," that is, a box to keep the host or eucharist, also in the indictment against Effy or Euphemia Mackalzane for witchcraft, &c, June 9, 1591, one of the numerous charges against her was that she had sent with her servant Janet Drummond, "ane pictoure of walx (wax) in ane buist" (box) to the celebrated witch Anny Simpson, to be enchanted by the devil [See Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i part i page *306, and vol i part ii page 253]

Bunkill, Bonkil, or Bunkhill, (probably from bonacle, a contraction of the Latin word bonaculum, a little good or gift, and applied to lands that may have been bestowed on some religious body at an early period,) a surname derived from the lands of Bunkle in Berwickshire, the principal family of the name being anciently Bunkle of that ilk in that county The name has been supposed to have had some relation to a buckle, as those who bore it carried three buckles in their arms, but these might have been more likely the symbols of the service by which the first grantee held the lands from his superior Sir John Stewart, second son of Alexander, high steward of Scotland, married the heiress of Bunkle, and thereafter was designated Sir John Stewart of Bonkle He was the ancestor of the Stewarts earls of Angus, and one of the oldest branches, after the royal family, of the name Bunkle is now the name of a parish in Berwickshire The name of Bonde appears at an early period in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials as connected with legal proceedings Vol i p 158, vol ii p 417

Burgess, a surname evidently derived from a citizen of a burgh, possessing all the burgh privileges The name, however, is more English than Scotch An ancient family of this surname was long settled in Berkshire, a descendant of which, Sir James Bland Burgess, was created a baronet in 1795

Burke, a surname in Scotland, the same as De Bourg, De Burgh, Bourke, or Burke in Ireland, and Burroughs in England, derived from De Bourg, originally French The family of De Bourg or Burke was one of the most powerful of the Norman settlers in England, and under Strongbow, the principal branch settled in Ireland in 1169 In process of time, the name was written Bourk in England and Ireland, and in many Irish families it is now Burke, but in 1752 King George the Second, by letters under his signet royal and sign manual, granted to the earl of Clanricarde, (Ulrick Bourke of London,) and Thomas Bourke of Ireland, and their descendants, full power, licence, and authority, to assume and use the name of De Burgh In Scotland the name is limited and never attained to any eminence

BURGH, JAMES, a voluminous writer, was born at Madderty in Perthshire in 1714 After receiving the rudiments of education at the school of his native place, he was sent to the university of St Andrews, with the view of studying for the church, but bad health soon obliged him to quit college Having given up all thoughts of becoming a clergyman, he entered into the linen trade, which not proving successful, he went to England, where he was employed at first as a corrector of the press About a year afterwards he removed to Great Marlow, where he was engaged as assistant in a free grammar school It was here that he commenced author by writing a pamphlet, entitled 'Britain's Remembrancer,' published in 1746, which was followed by various others This one, however, being adapted to the feeling of the times, went through five editions in three years, and was ascribed to some of the bishops In 1747 he opened an academy at Stoke Newington in Middlesex, where, and at Newington Green in the neighbourhood, for nineteen years he conducted his school with great success Having acquired a competence, Mr Burgh determined upon retiring from business, his more immediate object being to complete one of his works called 'Political Disquisitions,' the first two volumes of which appeared in 1774 and the third in 1775 Upon quitting his school in 1771, he settled in Colebrooke Row, Islington, where he continued to reside till his death, August 26, 1775, in the 61st year of his age —Stark's Biographia Scotica

Mr Burgh's works (most of which have long since ceased to be read) are

BURLEIGH, lord, an extinct title in the peerage of Scotland See BALFOUR of BURLEIGH, lord, ante, p 209

BURNES, a surname which, like the name of Burn, or Burns, has been supposed to have been shortened from De Burnville, a family of that name having settled in Scotland in the reign of David the First One of them held the lands of Broesmouth in East Lothian under William the Lion As the name of De Burnville is not now known in North Britain, this derivation of the now celebrated name of Burns does not appear quite so fanciful as at first sight seems likely, but a more probable origin to the name of Burnes and Burns than has yet been brought forward has been given, founded on documents relative to the pedigree and name of Burnes, registered in the Lord Lyon's office in Scotland on occasion of Dr James Burnes, the eldest brother of the late Sir Alexander Burnes, being appointed in 1837 a knight of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic Order

The name of Burnes, it is there stated, is mentioned so early as 1290, in a bull of Pope Nicholas the Fourth, to Edward the First of England, in which his holiness acknowledges letters brought to him from England, "quas delecti filii Johannes de Burnes miles, et Guhelmus de Lincolnia, tunc nuncii, presentarunt," and, in various forms of orthography, the name is found occasionally in the obscure records of Scottish history, till the seventeenth century, when it emerges, traditionally, in connexion with the ancestors of Robert Burns, the national poet

Among the documents furnished by Dr Burnes, is a letter from John Burness of Stonehaven, author of 'Thrummy Cap,' a tale in Scottish verse, to his kinsman, Provost Burnes of Montrose, the doctor's father, of date 1824, which letter assigns as the progenitor of the poet's family, a fugitive Campbell of Burnhouse, of the noble house of Argyle This it does on the authority of the Rev Alexander Greig, Episcopal minister in Stonehaven, then an old man, whose mother was a Burness

The Lord Lyon's patent of arms to the family of Burnes of Montrose, traces its descent, in consequence, from Walter Campbell, the proprietor of a small estate in Argyleshire, named Burnhouse, who fled to Kincardineshire in the north of Scotland, during the civil wars of the 17th century, where, for political reasons or personal concealment, dropping the patronymic of Campbell, he was known only by the name of Burnhouse, which he assumed in its stead, hence the subsequent corruptions of the name into Burness, Burnes, and, finally, Burns

It is a curious fact, in connexion with the alleged descent of the poet's family from the Campbells, that the famous John, duke of Argyle, after defeating the Pretender's army at the battle of Sheriffmuir, in 1715, carried on a secret correspondence with the exiled prince, under the assumed name of Burnus, as may be seen in a letter of Horace Walpole to Sir Horace Mann, dated June 30, 1742 It may also be stated that in Ayrshire, on the road between Beith and Kilmarnock, there is a village of the name of Burnhouse

In a writ of privy seal by King James the Fifth, dated Stirling 1528, there is a John Burnes described as having been "art and part of the convocation and gadering of our leges in arrayit battell against umqll Johne Erle of Caithness"

In a public law document, dated at Edinburgh, April 1637, there is recorded as a witness "J Burnes," residing at Thornton, in Kincardineshire, within a few miles of Brawlymuir, the place from whence the poet's family are known to have come

The above named Walter of Burnhouse, when forced to abandon his native Argyleshire, and wander, for refuge, into the lowlands, was accompanied by his only son, Walter, then a boy He settled in the parish of Glenbervie, and there he died in indigent circumstances His son Walter, being an industrious youth, learned a trade, saved a little money, married, and ultimately took a lease of the farm of Bogjorgan, in the same parish, where he lived till his death

Walter had four sons, the youngest of whom, James, was born in 1696, and died 23d January 1713, aged 87 years His wife, Margaret Falconer, died December 1719, aged 90 years These dates, and many others referring to the name and family history of Burnes, are found on old tombstones in the churchyard of Glenbervie

James also had four sons William, the eldest, succeeded him in Brawlymuir, and on his death James the youngest, removed from Hawkhill of Glenbervie, to the paternal farm The latter had several sons, and died in April 1778, aged 88 years

George took the farm of Lilfhill, in the parish of Fetteresso and Robert, the grandfather of the poet, became the tenant of the farm of Clochanhill, in the parish of Dunnottar

He had three sons, namely, James, the great grandfather of Dr Burnes and Sir Alexander Burnes, William, the father of the poet, and Robert He had also four daughters

The three brothers mentioned above proceeded southwards from the Mearns, about 1738 William the father of the poet, then in his nineteenth year, removed first to the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and afterwards went to Ayrshire James, the elder brother, settled in Montrose, where he followed the trade of a working wright, and became a burgess and town councillor of that ancient burgh He died in 1763, aged 41

His son was also named James He spelled the name Burness, and this is the only exception to the original orthography till the poet thought fit to abbreviate it into Burns This James Burnes was the relative to whom, on his deathbed, the poet appealed for some pecuniary assistance, which however arrived too late for the poet himself, but to his widow and children he showed through life every mark of kindness

James Burnes, his son, and second cousin of the sons of Burns, was a writer in Montrose, and at one period provost of that burgh, and justice of the peace for Forfarshire He was also principal town clerk of Montrose, and held several official appointments in that locality He was born in April 1780, and married early in life, Elizabeth, daughter of Adam Glegg, Esq, at one time provost of Montrose, and had by her six sons and four daughters He took a great interest in matters connected with his native town, was an early friend of Joseph Hume, M P, and a reformer all his life He died at Edinburgh in 1852, universally respected The most distinguished of his sons was the following

BURNES, Sir Alexander, C B, an enterprising Eastern traveller and diplomatist, the third son of the above named James Burnes, provost of Montrose, was born in that town May 16, 1805 His great-grandfather was, as we have shown, the brother of William Burnes, the father of the poet Burns He was educated at Montrose academy, and greatly distinguished himself by his proficiency Having thereafter obtained the appointment of cadet in the Bombay army, he left school at the age of sixteen, and arrived at that presidency, October 31, 1821 On the 25th of December 1822 he was appointed interpreter in the Hindostanee language to the first extra battalion at Surat, and his thorough knowledge of the Persian language soon after obtained for him, without solicitation on his part, from the judges of the Sudder Adawlut, the employment of translating the Persian documents of that court His rise in the army was also rapid His regiment, the 21st native infantry, in which he held the rank of lieutenant, having, early in 1825, been ordered to Bhooj, he accompanied it, and during the serious disturbances at Cutch, in April of that year, he was appointed quartermaster of brigade, on which occasion he gave early promise of that energy and decision which characterised his after proceedings Although not yet twenty years of age, he was, in November of the same year, on the recommendation of the adjutant-general, Sir D Leighton, appointed Persian interpreter to a force of eight thousand men, commanded by Colonel M Napier, of his majesty's 6th foot, assembled for the invasion of Scinde In August 1826 he was confirmed on the general staff as a deputy-assistant quartermaster-general At this period he drew up an able and elaborate paper on the Statistics of Wagur, which was forwarded to Government, in January 1827, by Colonel Shuldham, quartermaster-general, with many high encomiums on the industry and research of the reporter, and on the value of the information which the document contained For this report, Lieutenant Burnes received the thanks of Government, with a handsome reward in money He had also the high testimony of the governor, Mountstuart Elphinstone, in his favour In the following year marks of approbation were bestowed on him for a valuable memoir on the eastern branches of the delta of the Indus In addition to the customary forms of approbation

Lieutenant Burnes was, on this occasion, complimented on the proofs which his labours afforded of a disposition to combine the advancement of general knowledge with the exemplary discharge of his official duties. A few months after, he furnished the authorities with a Memoir supplementary to the report already mentioned. In the early part of the same year (1828) he presented a memorial, applying for permission to visit the line of country immediately beyond our northern frontier, lying between Marwar and the Indus, including the examination of the Loonee river. The projected journey was, however, for a time delayed, and on the 18th March he was appointed assistant quartermaster-general to the army.

In September 1829 he acted, in concert with Major Holland, as assistant to the political agent in Cutch, in prosecution of the survey of the north-west frontier, of which an account, written by himself, will be found in the Transactions of the Royal Geographical Society of London, 1834. In 1830 he was appointed ostensibly to take charge of a rich gift, consisting of English dray horses, sent by William the Fourth to Runjeet Singh, the ruler of Lahore, but in reality to acquire more accurate information as to the geography of the Indus, which, although an unusual route, was the one selected on this occasion, the horses having been trans-shipped from Bombay, where they were landed, to a port in Cutch, near the embouchure of that great river. That a better colour might be given to a deviation from the customary route, at least so far as Hyderabad in Scinde, then capital, he was intrusted with presents to the ameers of Scinde. A regular escort of British troops was declined, and a guard of wild Beluchees was found sufficient to insure protection, while they permitted an intercourse with the natives, which a more regular force would have prevented. The expedition left Mandavee, in Cutch, on the 1st of January 1831, and arrived at Lahore on the 18th of July, Lieutenant Burnes having succeeded in making a full survey of the whole Indus delta, as well as a map of a portion of its course.

After his return from this mission, having proposed to Lord William Bentinck, then governor-general of India, to undertake, with the sanction of the Indian government, an expedition into Central Asia, the journey was commenced on the 2d of January 1832. The details of this journey have been published in his celebrated 'Travels to Bokhara,' one of the most interesting works in the English language. To use his own words, he had "retraced the greater part of the route of the Macedonians, trodden the kingdoms of Porus and Taxiles, sailed on the Hydaspes, crossed the Indian Caucasus, and resided in the celebrated city of Balkh, from which Greek monarchs, far removed from the academies of Corinth and Athens, had once disseminated amongst mankind a knowledge of the arts and sciences, of their own history, and the world." He returned to Bombay, January 18, 1833, and soon after, he laid the result of his travels before the governor-general, whose special thanks he received, and his memoirs were ordered to be transmitted to the Court of Directors. In the following June he received orders to proceed to England as the bearer of his own despatches, and he arrived in London early in October, the fame of his adventures having long preceded him. His reception at the India House, as well as by the Board of Control, was cordial in the extreme, and on the 30th of December he was introduced at court. He afterwards received the special acknowledgments of the king, William the Fourth, for the unpublished map and memoir which he had presented to his majesty. His celebrated work on Bokhara was published, at London, in the early part of 1834, and its success was almost unprecedented for a book of travels. Nearly nine hundred copies were sold in a single day. Mr. Murray, the publisher, of Albemarle street, gave the author eight hundred pounds for the copyright of the first edition. It was immediately translated into the German and French languages, and Burnes, in his next visit to Cabul, in 1837, found that the Russian emissaries had been using the French edition as a handbook on their way.

While in England, in 1834, Burnes was made a fellow of the Royal Society, and an honorary member of several other learned bodies. In May of that year he received, from the Royal Geographical Society, the fourth royal premium of fifty guineas for his navigation of the river Indus, and his journey to Balkh and Bokhara across Central Asia. At the meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society, on February 21, 1835, the late earl of Munster, vice-president, in the chair, Lieutenant Burnes was elected an honorary member for having "fixed, with accuracy, the position of Bokhara and Balkh, and the great Himalayan mountains, and having done more for the construction of a map of those countries than had been done since Alexander the Great" On this occasion he was complimented by Sir Alexander Johnstone, for having almost ascertained a continuous route and line of communication between Western Asia and the Caspian Sea, as also for his excellent diplomatic arrangements with the ameers of Singh While yet a mere youth, he had contributed, from India, many valuable papers to the Royal Asiatic Society, and the museum of that society contains the Bokhara cloak worn by him in his travels in the Punjaub He was also the author of some papers in the 'Journal of the Royal Geographical Society of London' To the British Museum he presented one of the richest collections of Indian coins in this country, for which he received a letter of thanks from the trustees of that national institution

After a sojourn of eighteen months in Great Britain, during which time he visited his native town, Montrose, Lieutenant Burnes left London on April 5, 1835, and reached India on the 1st of June, through France and Egypt, and so by the Red Sea packet On his arrival at Bombay he was directed to resume the duties of assistant to the resident at Cutch, Colonel Pottinger In the following October he was deputed on an important mission to Hyderabad in Scinde, and, in all the momentous affairs in which he was engaged, and in subsequent negociations, he displayed his accustomed ability and judgment, and accomplished the most important results In November, 1836, he was intrusted with a mission to Dost Mohammed, the ruler of Afghanistan, with the view of entering into commercial relations with him, and proceeding from Scinde through the Punjaub, and by Peshawur to Cabul, he arrived at the latter place September 20th, 1837 Meantime, Mohammed, Shah of Persia, had besieged Herat with an army of sixty thousand men, and the Indian government had become alarmed at the prospect of Persia and Russia uniting their forces with those of Afghanistan, and making a conjoint attack on our Indian empire The Persians, indeed, were forced to retreat from Herat, but the presence of the Russian agent Vicovitch, at Cabul, perplexed and alarmed Burnes, who pressed upon Dost Mohammed the propriety of dismissing him, which he refused to do, but gave Burnes himself his dismissal, April 24, 1838 On this Burnes was directed to repair to the governor-general, then at Simla, and he was there in August of that year Here it was resolved to replace Shah Shoojah on his throne at Cabul, a resolution which led to the most disastrous consequences to our troops and to Burnes himself Whilst at Shikarpoor, he received a copy of the London Gazette, announcing his having been knighted, and advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the Indian army He next proceeded from Scinde on a political mission into Beluchistan, in which, however, he failed, and in April 1839, he joined the army at Quettah On the final restoration of the Shah Shoojah to the throne of Cabul, in September 1839, Sir Alexander was appointed political resident at that capital, with a salary of three thousand pounds a-year The indiscreet state of security into which the British allowed themselves to fall on taking possession of Cabul was fatal to their long continuance in that capital In one of the last letters which Burnes wrote to his brother he states that he was residing quietly in a little cottage in the neighbourhood of Cabul, in every way as securely as if in the vicinity of Montrose But this state of things was not to last At the very outset of the insurrection which took place in favour of Dost Mohammed, on the 2d November 1841, Colonel Burnes was slaughtered, along with his brother Charles, and seven other officers, in the 36th year of his age After his death, was published 'Cabool being a Narrative of a Journey to and Residence in that city, in the years 1836-7-8 By the late Lieut-Col Sir Alexander Burnes' London, 8vo

Sir Alexander Burnes was the first traveller who opened the Indus to the policy of England, and extended his researches to the shores of the Oxus, the ruins of Samarcand, and those remote territories which have, within so short a space of time, become the scene of great political events, and of his own melancholy and untimely fate His chief characteristics were intrepidity, discretion, and wonderful sagacity As a proof of these, it is narrated of him that he dined one Christmas day, in great state, with one of the rajahs, whose watches he had on that day twelvemonth regulated, in the disguise of an Armenian watchmaker Had he been discovered, his head would not have remained five minutes on his shoulders His brother, Lieutenant Charles Burnes, of the 17th regiment of native infantry, who was massacred with him, was born on January 12, 1812, and appointed a cadet on the Bombay establishment, in 1835, by Mr Lush, as a compliment to the services of Sir Alexander Dr James Burnes, who was created K H in 1837, was long physician-general to the Bombay army He is the author of a Narrative of a Visit to the Court of Scinde, and a Sketch of the History of Cutch, 8vo, 1831, and of a Sketch of the History of the Knights Templars, 1837 Another brother, Mr Adam Burnes, is a solicitor of great respectability in Montrose Dr David Burnes, physician in London, mother of the brothers, who had preserved every letter which Sir Alexander had addressed to him during twenty years, died in Montrose in 1849

BURNET, or BURNETT, originally BURNARD, a surname of Saxon derivation Robert Burnard, who settled in Teviotdale as early as 1128, was the first of the name in Scotland In the charter of the foundation of the abbacy of Selkirk by Earl David, younger son of Malcolm Canmore, Robertus de Burnard is a witness, and he, or his son of the same name, is also witness in the same prince's charters, after he had become King David the First

There are two principal families of the name in Scotland, namely, Burnet of Barns, in Peebles-shire, recently designed of Burnetland, or of that ilk, and Burnet of Leys in Kincardineshire Both claim the chiefship The first profess to be descended from the above-named Robertus de Burnard, but there is no trace of them in authentic history till the year 1500, when returns of the services of the portion of a widow of one nomination of tutors to another of the name are extant, by which it appears they had borne for some time the designation of Burnets of Burnetland, but having also acquired lands called Barns, afterwards became designated as Burnets of Barns Of this family was descended Dr Alexander Burnet, archbishop of St Andrews after Archbishop Sharp, that is from 1679 till his death in August 1684 He had previously been bishop of Aberdeen, and subsequently archbishop of Glasgow, and while in the latter see, he preached a funeral sermon on the death of the marquis of Montrose, from the text, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord" published at Glasgow in 1673, 4to

The other principal family of the name, Burnett of Leys has flourished for more than five centuries in the north of Scotland In 1324, Alexander de Burnard, ancestor of the Burnetts of Leys, obtained a charter from Robert the Bruce of lands in the shire of Kincardine. The grandson of this Alexander, John de Burnard, held the office of king's macer His eldest son, Robert Burnett, was the first that bore the designation of Leys Alexander Burnett, eleventh proprietor of Leys, had, with seven daughters, six sons 1 Alexander, who predeceased his father, without issue 2 Thomas, first baronet 3 James, of Craigmyle, progenitor of the Burnetts of Monboddo and Kemno 4 Robert, Lord Crimond, a lord of session (1661), father of the celebrated Bishop Burnet (see next article) 5 George, died unmarried 6 John, factor for the Scots at Campvere

The second son, Sir Thomas, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 31st April 1626 He was an earnest supporter of the covenant The 3d baronet, Sir Thomas, member for Kincardineshire in the last Scottish parliament was a strenuous opponent of the union At the death of Sir Robert, 5th baronet, unmarried the title devolved upon his cousin, Sir Thomas, 6th baronet, eldest son of William Burnett of Criggie, 2d son of 3d baronet He married Catherine, sister of Sir Alexander Ramsay, 6th baronet of Balmain, with issue He died in 1783 His eldest son, Sir Robert, 7th baronet, an officer in the Royal Scots Fusileers, served throughout the first American war, and was taken prisoner at Saratoga, on the surrender of General Burgoyne in 1777 He died in 1837

His brother, Alexander Burnett of Strachan, 2d son of the 6th baronet, assumed the name of Ramsay, in lieu of his patronymic, Burnett, and was created a baronet, 13th May 1806 on inheriting the estates of his uncle, Sir Alexander Ramsay, 6th baronet of Balmain (See RAMSAY)

Sir Thomas Burnett, 8th baronet of Leys eldest son of 7th baronet died in February 1849, when his brother, Sir Alexander, H I C S became 9th baronet, and died, unmarried, 20th March 1856 His next brother, Sir James Horn Burnett, succeeded as 10th baronet

According to Sir George Mackenzie, the Burnetts of Leys, in their arms carry the hunting horn, in base, with a Highlander in a hunting garb and a greyhound, for supporters, to show that they are the king's foresters in the north

BURNET, GILBERT, D D, a celebrated historian and divine, eldest son of Robert Burnet, of Crimond, (see above,) was born at Edinburgh Sep 18, 1643 His father, who was strongly attached to episcopacy, was after the restoration appointed one of the lords of session under the title of Lord Crimond His mother, Rachel Johnston, was sister of Sir Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston His youngest brother, Sir Thomas Burnet, was an eminent physician in Edinburgh

Gilbert, after being instructed by his father in Latin, was at ten years of age sent to Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M A before he was fourteen years of age His inclination at first led him to the study of the Law, but he soon applied himself to that of divinity, and was licensed to preach, in 1661, before he had reached his eighteenth year, when his cousin, Sir Alexander Burnet, offered him a bene-

fice, which he refused, on account of his youth In 1663, about two years after the death of his father, he went for about six months to Oxford and Cambridge In 1664, he made a tour in Holland and France, where, especially in the former country, he acquired those principles of toleration in religious matters which afterwards distinguished him On his arrival in London, on his way home, he was admitted a member of the Royal Society

On his return to Scotland, he was, by Sir Robert Fletcher, presented to the parish of Saltoun in East Lothian, in 1665, on which occasion he received ordination from the bishop of Edinburgh He remained at Saltoun for five years, and while there he distinguished himself by his pastoral assiduity So great was his generosity and self denial, that of his stipend, all that remained above what was required for his own subsistence, he gave away in charity A parishioner whose goods had been seized for debt, once applied to him for some little assistance He inquired how much it would take to enable him again to begin business, and on being told he ordered his servant to give him the money "Sir, said his servant, "it is all the money we have in the house" "It is well," was the reply, "go and pay it to the poor man You do not know the pleasure there is in making a man glad" Although he afterwards rose to dignity and wealth, he ever retained an affectionate remembrance of the parishioners of Saltoun, his first cure, and on his death he bequeathed twenty thousand merks for the benefit of that parish, to be applied in erecting and partially endowing a new schoolhouse, in enlarging a library for the use of the parochial incumbent, in clothing and educating thirty poor children, and in relieving the necessities of the parochial poor The children who continue to reap the fruits of his bequest are popularly called "bishops," and occupy in the church a gallery which bears the name of "the bishop's laft"

While employed in his ministerial duties, Burnet was not inattentive to the neglect and misconduct of many of the clergy who had been thrust into benefices after the violent introduction of episcopacy at the Restoration, and in 1666 he drew up and circulated in manuscript, a strong representation, or memorial, against certain abuses of their authority, which he imputed to the Scottish bishops In 1668 he was consulted by the government as to a remedy for the disorders that prevailed in consequence of the overthrow of the presbyterian form of church government, which was most in accordance with the feelings, the rights, and the spirit of the people, and at his suggestion the expedient of an Indulgence to the presbyterian ministers was, in the following year, adopted This, however, only made matters worse, as all compromises have inevitably a tendency to do About this time he became acquainted with Anne, duchess of Hamilton, who intrusted him with the papers belonging to her father and uncle, upon which he drew up the 'Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton,' which appeared in London in folio in 1677

In 1669 he was elected professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, and at the urgent recommendation of Archbishop Leighton, whose acquaintance he had made in 1662, he accepted of the appointment, and removed to Glasgow, where, the same year, he published his 'Modest and Free Conference between a Conformist and a Non-Conformist' With Leighton he appears to have lived upon terms of great cordiality, and to Burnet the world is indebted for a copious and most interesting record of the evangelical virtues of that eminent and amiable prelate

While engaged upon his memoirs of the dukes of Hamilton, he was invited to London by the duke of Lauderdale, by whom he was introduced to the king At this time he was offered his choice of one of four vacant Scottish bishoprics, but he refused to accept any of them Soon after his return to Glasgow, he married Lady Margaret Kennedy, daughter of the earl of Cassillis, a lady of distinguished piety and knowledge, whose sentiments were strongly in favour of the presbyterians A collection of Letters from this lady to John duke of Lauderdale was published at Edinburgh in 1828

In 1672 Mr Burnet published 'A Vindication of the Authority, Constitution, and Laws of the Church and State of Scotland,' in consequence of which he was again offered a Scottish bishopric, with a promise of the next vacant archbishopric which he also declined He resisted all the efforts that were made to engage him in support of the oppressive measures of the court In 1673 he revisited London, when he was appointed one of the king's chaplains in ordinary In the ensuing year he deemed it expedient to resign his chair at Glasgow, when he removed altogether to London The freedom which he used in speaking to the duke of Lauderdale, regarding the measures of his government, lost him the friendship of that unprincipled minister, and his opposition to the popish designs of the court caused his name to be struck out of the list of his majesty's chaplains In 1675, on the recommendation of Lord Hollis, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls chapel by Sir Harbottle Grimstone, Master of the Rolls He was soon after chosen lecturer of St Clement Danes in the Strand, and became one of the most popular preachers then in the metropolis In 1679 he published the first volume of his 'History of the Reformation,' which procured for him the thanks of both houses of parliament The second volume appeared in 1681, and the third, which contained a supplement to the two former, in 1714

Having attended the sick bed of a woman who had been one of the paramours of the profligate earl of Rochester, that nobleman sent for him, and for a whole winter held various conversations with him upon those topics with which sceptics and men of loose principles attack the Christian religion The happy effect of these conferences, in leading the earl to a sincere repentance, occasioned the publication of Mr Burnet's interesting account of the life and death of that nobleman, published in 1680

During the affair of the popish plot, Dr Burnet was often consulted by Charles the Second on the state of the nation The king offered him the bishopric of Chichester, then vacant, "if he would entirely come into his interests," but he declined it on such terms, preferring to remain true to his principles In 1682 he published the Life of Sir Mathew Hale, and some other works About this time also he wrote his celebrated letter to King Charles, reproving him in the severest style, both for his public misconduct and his private vices His majesty read it twice over, and then threw it into the fire In 1683, after the execution of Lord Russell, whom he attended on the scaffold, he was examined before the House of Commons, with regard to that nobleman's last speech, which it was suspected he had written for him In 1683 he published a 'Translation of Sir Thomas More's Utopia,' and one or two other translations In 1684 he was, by mandate from the court, discharged from his lecture at St Clement Danes, and also prohibited from again preaching at the Rolls chapel In 1685 he brought out his 'Life of Dr William Bedell, bishop of Kilmore'

On the accession of James II and VII to the throne, he obtained leave to go out of the kingdom, and first went over to Paris, but afterwards made a tour in Italy, an account of which he published in letters addressed to Mr Boyle He subsequently pursued his travels through Switzerland and Germany Having arrived at Utrecht, by the invitation of the prince of Orange he went to the Hague, and had a share in the councils concerning the affairs of England He became in consequence an object of great jealousy to king James, who ordered a prosecution for high treason to be commenced against him both in England and Scotland, but having obtained the rights of naturalization in Holland, when James demanded his person from the States, they refused to deliver him up His wife, Lady Margaret, being dead, he about this time married a Dutch lady of fortune, of the name of Mary Scott, descended from the family of Buccleuch

Dr Burnet had a very important share in the whole conduct of the Revolution of 1688, the project of which he gave early notice of to the court of Hanover He accompanied the prince of Orange to England in the quality of chaplain, and he was rewarded for his services with the bishopric of Salisbury, being consecrated March 31, 1689 In a 'Pastoral Letter' to his clergy, concerning the oaths of allegiance and supremacy to King William and Queen Mary, he maintained their right to the throne on the ground of conquest, which gave so much offence, that, three years afterwards, this 'Letter' was ordered by parliament to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman In 1698 he was appointed preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, the son of the princess (afterwards Queen) Anne. On this occasion he wished to resign his bishopric, but was prevailed upon to retain it at the request of King William himself In preference to all the ministers, he was by the king appointed to name the princess Sophia, Electress of Brunswick, next in succession to Queen Anne, in the famous bill for settling the succession to the throne, and in 1701 he was chairman of the committee to which the bill was referred Having lost his second wife by the smallpox, in that year he married Elizabeth, the widow of Robert Berkeley, Esq This lady died in 1709, leaving a pious book, entitled 'Method of Devotion' In 1699 he published his 'Exposition of the Thirty nine Articles' The scheme for the augmentation of poor livings, out of the first fruits and tenths due to the Crown, originated with Bishop Burnet He died 17th March, 1715, and was buried at St James', Clerkenwell, where a monument is erected to his memory His 'History of his Own Times' was published after his death by his son, Mr, afterwards Sir Thomas, Burnet Bishop Burnet possessed a considerable share of vanity and bustling officiousness, and seems not to have had the most capacious judgment, but these weaknesses in his character were amply compensated for, by the excellence of his heart, by his disinterestedness, his courage and his public spirit, and by the remarkable ability which he displayed both as a divine and a historian The following is his portrait

THOMAS, the third son, studied at Leyden and Oxford, and was destined for the law By his dissipation in early life, he gave his father much uneasiness In 1712 and 1713, he wrote several political pamphlets in favour of the Whigs, and against the administration of the last four years of Queen Anne One of these caused his being taken into custody in January 1713 One day being unusually grave, his father asked him what was the subject of his meditation —"A greater work," he replied, "than your lordship's History of the Reformation" "What is that, Tom?" asked the father "My own reformation, my lord" He afterwards became one of the best lawyers of his time He was for several years his majesty's consul at Lisbon, and in 1741 was appointed one of the judges of the court of common pleas He also received the honour of knighthood, and was admitted a member of the Royal Society He died January 5, 1753 He was introduced by Pope into the Dunciad, and some poems of his were published in 1777

BURNET, JAMES, an eminent lawyer, and a learned and ingenious writer, better known by his judicial title of Lord Monboddo, son of James Burnet, Esq of Monboddo, and Elizabeth, only sister of Sir Arthur Forbes of Craigievar, Bart, was born in 1714, at the family seat in Kincardineshire He was educated at home, under Dr Francis Skene, afterwards professor of philosophy in Marischal college, Aberdeen, and was subsequently sent to study at that university, where he distinguished himself by his proficiency in ancient literature, the study of which, in after life, became his ruling passion Being designed for the bar, according to the custom at the time he repaired to Holland to study the civil law, and after attending for three years the lectures in the university of Groningen, he came to Edinburgh, where he arrived on the forenoon of September 7, 1736, and that night was an involuntary witness of the famous Porteous Mob His lodgings were in the Lawnmarket, near the Bowhead, and when about to retire to rest, his curiosity was excited by a noise and tumult in the street In place of going to bed he slipped to the door half undressed, and with his nightcap on his head He speedily got entangled in the crowd, and was hurried along with it to the Grassmarket, where the unfortunate Captain Porteous was summarily executed by the mob This scene made so deep an impression on his mind as not only to deprive him of sleep during the remainder of the night, but to induce him to think of leaving the city altogether Being by some one who knew him recognised in the crowd, in the sort of disguise which his half dressed condition seemed to indicate, he was in danger of being brought into trouble for his unwilling share in the transaction of that memorable night, and was only saved from being implicated by being able to prove that he had only that very day arrived in Edinburgh from pursuing his studies on the continent, and consequently knew nothing of the matter till borne away with the crowd, as above stated In after life his lordship frequently related this incident, and described with much force the effect which it had upon him at the time

He passed his civil law examinations upon the 12th of February 1737, and, being found duly qualified, was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates His practice at the bar, in course of time, came to be considerable, but he may be said to have been first brought prominently into notice in consequence of being engaged as counsel for Mr Douglas, in the celebrated Douglas cause In his client's behalf he went thrice to France to assist in leading the proof taken there In 1764 he was appointed sheriff of his native county, Kincardineshire, and on the 12th February 1767, he was, through the interest of the duke of Queensberry, then lord-justice-general, raised to the bench of the court of session, as successor to Lord Milton, when he assumed the title of Lord Monboddo His first work was on the 'Origin and Progress of Language,' the first volume of which appeared in 1771, the second in 1773, and the third in 1776 This work was so severely criticised in the 'Edinburgh Magazine and Review,' by Dr. Gilbert Stuart, its editor, that it is said the downfall of that publication, from the general offence which the article gave, was the consequence His greatest work he styled 'Ancient Metaphysics,' or the Science of Universals, with an appendix, containing an Examination of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy, also in 3 vols 4to, the first published in 1778, and the last in 1799, only a few weeks before his death Lord Monboddo was an enthusiastic admirer of the works of Plato and the Grecian philosophers He carried his enthusiasm in favour of classical literature so far as to get up suppers in imitation of the ancients These he called his learned suppers He gave them once a-week, and his guests generally were Drs Black, Hutton, and Hope, and Mr William Smellie, printer, including occasionally Mr Alexander Smellie, his son His lordship was very partial to a boiled egg, and often used to say, "Show me any of your French cooks, who can make a dish like this"

Lord Monboddo's writings contain many acute and interesting observations, but they, at the same time, exhibit some peculiar and very singular opinions He was a firm believer in the existence of satyrs and mermaids, and in his dissertation on the 'Origin and Progress of Language,' he advanced some whimsical theories, relative to a supposed affinity between the human race and the monkey tribe, particularly that the former "were originally gifted with tails," an assertion which exposed him to a good deal of ridicule on the first publication of that work It was in allusion to this extraordinary idea that Lord Kames, to whom he would on a certain occasion have conceded precedency, declined it, saying, "By no means, my lord, you must walk first that I may see your tail!" His patrimonial estate was small, producing only during his life about three hundred pounds a-year, yet he would never raise his rents, nor dismiss a poor tenant for the sake of obtaining an increase from a new one It was his boast to have his lands more numerously peopled than any estate of equal size in the neighbourhood When in the country, during the vacation of the court of session, he wore the dress of a plain farmer, and lived on a footing of familiarity with his tenantry, which greatly endeared him to them His private life was spent in the enjoyment of domestic felicity and in the practice of all the social virtues Though his habits were rigidly temperate, he took great delight in the convivial society of his friends He was a zealous patron of merit, and amongst those who experienced his friendship was the poet Burns An annual journey to London became a favourite recreation of his during the vacations of the court of session He first began the practice in 1780, and continued it for many years, till he was upwards of eighty years of age In May 1785, during one of these visits to the metropolis, he was present in the Court of King's Bench, when an alarm was raised that the court room was falling, and judges, lawyers, and audience, rushed simultaneously towards the door Lord Monboddo, however, being short-sighted and rather deaf, sat still unconcerned, and on being asked why he did not bestir himself to avoid being buried in the ruins, coolly replied, "That he thought it was an annual ceremony, with which, as an alien to the English laws, he had nothing to do" He performed all his journeys between Edinburgh and London on horseback, with a single servant attending him A carriage, a vehicle that was not in common use among the ancients, he considered as an effeminate conveyance, to be dragged at the tails of horses, instead of being mounted on their backs, seemed in his eyes to be a ludicrous degradation of the genuine dignity of human nature On his return from his last visit, he became very ill on the road, and unable to proceed, when, fortunately, he was overtaken by his friend, Sir John Pringle, who prevailed upon him to travel the remainder of the stage in a carriage Next day, however, he resumed his journey on horseback, and got safe to Edinburgh, though he was obliged to proceed somewhat slowly While in London he often went to court, and the king is said to have taken pleasure in his conversation He died at Edinburgh, May 26, 1799, at the advanced age of 85

In spite of his eccentricities, Lord Monboddo was a man of real learning and ability, an acute lawyer, and an upright judge He did not generally assent to the decisions of his colleagues On the contrary, he was often in the minority, and not unfrequently stood alone, and more than once had the gratification of having his decision confirmed in the House of Peers, when it was directly opposed to the unanimous opinion of his brethren Even in his official capacity many peculiarities marked his lordship's conduct Amongst these was his never sitting on the bench with the other judges, but underneath with the clerks, but though this practice was said to have been owing to the circumstance of their lordships having on one occasion decerned against him, in a case when he was pursuer for the value of a horse, and in which he pleaded his own cause at the bar, the deafness under which he laboured affords a much more satisfactory reason The first time he sat there was upon occasion of the decision of the Douglas cause, when having been originally, as mentioned above, the leading counsel on behalf of Mr (afterwards Lord) Douglas, he felt a delicacy in giving his opinion from the bench, and preferred delivering it at the clerk's table His speech in favour of the paternity is admitted to have been the most able one on that side of the question His character is thus summed up in the first four lines of an epitaph written on him by the unfortunate James Tytler, who had experienced his benevolence

"If wisdom, learning, worth demand a tear,
Weep o'er the dust of great Monboddo here,
A judge upright, to mercy still inclined,
A gen'rous friend, a father fond and kind"

He married, about 1760, the beautiful Miss Farquharson, a relative of Marshal Keith, by whom he had a son and two daughters His wife died in childbed, his son died young, and his second daughter was cut off by consumption at the early age of twenty-five Her beauty was thus, in his 'Address to Edinburgh,' celebrated by Burns

"Thy daughters bright thy walks adorn!
Gay as the gilded summer sky,
Sweet as the dewy milk-white thorn,
Dear as the raptured thrill of joy!

Fair Burnet strikes th' adoring eye,
Heaven's beauties on my fancy shine,
I see the Sire of love on high,
And own his work indeed divine"

And her early death was most touchingly commemorated by him, in his 'Elegy on the late Miss Burnet of Monboddo,' of which the following are the commencing verses

"Life ne'er exulted in so rich a prize
As Burnet, lovely from her native skies,
Nor envious death so triumph'd in a blow,
As that which laid the accomplish'd Burnet low

Thy form and mind, sweet maid, can I forget?
In richest ore the brightest jewel set!
In thee, high Heaven above was truest shown,
As by his noblest work the Godhead best is known

In vain ye flaunt in summer's pride, ye groves, Thou crystal streamlet with thy flowery shore,
Ye woodland choir that chaunt your idle loves, Ye cease to charm—Eliza is no more!"

Burns was a frequent guest at 13 John Street, Lord Monboddo's town residence, during the poet's stay in Edinburgh in 1788 His lordship's eldest daughter was married to the late Kirkpatrick Williamson, Esq, formerly his clerk, afterwards keeper of the Outer House rolls —Scots Magazine for 1797 —Tytler's Life of Lord Kames —Kay's Edinburgh Portraits

BURNET, JAMES, a landscape painter of great promise, fourth son of George Burnet, general surveyor of excise in Scotland, and Anne Cruikshank, his wife, was born at Musselburgh in 1788 The family belonged originally to Aberdeen He early displayed a taste for drawing, and with his brother John, who is acknowledged the first modern engraver in Europe, received instructions in the studio of Scott, the landscape engraver He afterwards studied at the Trustees' academy, under Graham, and was noticed for the natural truth and beauty of his delineations In 1810 he arrived in London "He had sought," says his biographer, Allan Cunningham, "what he wanted in the academy, but found it not, he therefore determined, like Gainsborough, to make nature his academy, and with a pencil and sketch-book he might be seen wandering about the fields around London, noting down scenes which caught his fancy, and peopling them with men pursuing their avocations, and with cattle of all colours, and in all positions" His first picture was 'Cattle going out in the Morning,' which was soon followed by 'Cattle returning Home in a shower' The latter placed him in the first rank as a pastoral painter Ten other productions of his are mentioned with great praise, mostly cattle-pieces Several of those pictures were eagerly sought after, and purchased by different noblemen at high prices, others were reserved for his relations and friends This promising young artist resided in his latter days near Lee, in Kent, the beautiful churchyard of which was one of his favourite resorts He died of consumption, July 27, 1816, aged 28 years, and was buried at Lewisham —Allan Cunningham's Lives of Painters

BURNET, JOHN, founder of the literary prizes at Aberdeen, was born in that city in 1729 His father was an eminent merchant there, and he himself, after receiving a liberal education, in the year 1750 commenced business on his own account as a general merchant His parents were of the episcopal communion, but though educated in that profession, and undoubtedly a man of piety and virtue, he himself never attended public worship, his religious sentiments not being in unison with those of any Christian church Having acquired a fortune in trade, about 1773 he and one of his brothers, who had then returned from India, discharged the debts of their father, paying on his account between £7,000 and £8,000 He was never married, and died November 9, 1784 His small landed estate of Dens in Buchan, Aberdeenshire, was inherited by his brother, and afterwards by his nephew With the exception of this property, and of some moderate legacies and annuities to various relatives, the remainder of his fortune was bequeathed to charitable purposes A small portion he directed to be set apart, annually, and allowed to accumulate, first, for two prizes on subjects prescribed, and, secondly, for the benefit of the poor of Aberdeen This accumulated fund is for ever to be applied to its objects at the end of every fortieth year The accumulation of the first 25 years, if not less than £1,600, was to be given thus £1,200 for the best essay, and £400 for the next in merit, on "the evidence that there is a Being, all-powerful, wise, and good, by whom everything exists, and particularly to obviate difficulties regarding the wisdom and goodness of the Deity, and this, in the first place, from considerations independent of written revelation, and, in the second place, from the revelation of the Lord Jesus, and from the whole to point out the inferences most necessary and useful to mankind" The premiums were to be awarded by three judges, chosen by the principals and professors of King's and Marischal colleges, the established clergy of Aberdeen, and the trustees of the testator These prizes were first announced to the public in 1807, and repeated notices were given in the newspapers of their amount, and the subject and conditions of the essays, one of which was that they were to be given in on 1st January 1814 On that occasion the judges awarded the prizes in favour of the treatises of William Laurence Brown, D D, then principal of Marischal college, and the Rev John Bird Sumner, of Eton college, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, which have both been published

BURNETT, John, author of a valuable treatise on various branches of the Criminal Law of Scotland, was born at Aberdeen about 1764. He was the son of William Burnett, procurator-at-law in that city, and, having been educated for the bar, was admitted advocate December 10, 1785 In 1792 he was appointed advocate-depute, and, in October 1803, on the resignation of Law of Elvingston, was created sheriff of Haddingtonshire In April 1810, on the death of the learned R H Cay, he was appointed judge-admiral of Scotland He was also for some time standing counsel for his native city He died December 8, 1810, while engaged printing his work on the Criminal Law

Burns, a surname rendered for ever famous by its being that of the national poet of Scotland, for the origin of which see Burnes

BURNS, Robert, the most distinguished of the poets of Scotland, was born January 25, 1759, in a small clay-built cottage, about two miles from the town of Ayr His father, William Burnes, a man of superior understanding and uncommon worth, was the son of a farmer in the county of Kincardine, and owing to the reduced circumstances of his family, was obliged in the nineteenth year of his age, with Robert his elder brother, to quit the place of his nativity, to push his fortune in some other part of Scotland "On the top of a hill," says Dr Irving, "in the vicinity of their native hamlet, the two youthful adventurers separated from each other, in an agony of mind which the uncertainty of their future destiny could not fail to produce" On leaving Kincardineshire, William Burnes repaired to Edinburgh, and in the vicinity of that city was employed as a gardener for several years He afterwards removed to Ayrshire, where he was engaged in a similar capacity by the laird of Fairly In the service of this gentleman he continued for two years, and was next employed by Mr Crawford of Doonside From Dr Campbell, a physician in Ayr, he afterwards took a perpetual lease of seven acres of land, with the intention of converting the ground into a public garden and nursery Here he erected with his own hands that little clay-built cottage in which his poet-son was born, and to which, in after times, crowds of enthusiastic "pilgrims from many lands" were to repair to do homage to the genius of Scotland's bard

In December 1757 William Burnes married Agnes Brown, who bore him six children, and of these the poet was the eldest Before he had reduced his ground to a proper state of cultivation, he was engaged as overseer and gardener to Mr Ferguson, a gentleman who had purchased the estate of Doonholm, and in consequence he seems to have abandoned his project of commencing as a nurseryman

In the sixth year of his age, at which time he could read tolerably well, Robert was sent, with his younger brother Gilbert, to a private school at Alloway Mill, about a mile distant from his father's house His first teacher's name was Campbell, but that gentleman, within the space of a few months, having been appointed master of the workhouse at Ayr, a young man of the name of John Murdoch was engaged by the poet's father and some other cottagers, to supply his place, boarding with each family in turn By Mr Murdoch, who afterwards wrote an excellent account of the early part of his life, he was instructed in English grammar Before he was nine years old, his propensity for reading was so ardent that he perused with enthusiasm every book that came in his way His taste for poetry and romantic fiction was first inspired, as he tells us himself, by the chimney-corner tales of an old woman in his father's family, remarkable for her ignorance, credulity, and superstition, whose memory was plentifully stored with stories of the marvellous "She had, I suppose," says Burns, writing in 1787, "the largest collection in the country of tales and songs concerning devils, ghosts, fairies, brownies, witches, warlocks, spunkies, kelpies, elf candles, dead-lights, wraiths, apparitions, cantraips, giants, enchanted towers, dragons, and other trumpery This cultivated the latent seeds of poetry, but had so strong an effect on my imagination that, to this hour, in my nocturnal rambles, I sometimes keep a sharp look-out in suspicious places, and though nobody can be more sceptical than I am in such matters, yet it often takes an effort of philosophy to shake off these idle terrors"

When about thirteen years of age, to improve his writing, his father sent him to the parish school of Dalrymple, week about with his brother, during a summer quarter In 1772, Mr Murdoch, being one of five candidates, was appointed master of the English school at Ayr, and during the following year Burns went to board and lodge at his house, for farther instruction in the principles of grammar In ten days after he was called home, to assist his father with the harvest In a short time, however, he returned to Ayr, where he remained only another fortnight, but during that period he commenced learning the French language, under Mr Murdoch On his return home, he continued the study of it, during his leisure hours, and made himself so proficient in it, that he could read and understand any French author in prose His fondness for French phrases was shown by his frequently using them in his letters at this period of his life He next began the Latin with the assistance of Mr Robertson, schoolmaster at Ayr, and attempted it at home without the aid of a master, but found it so difficult to acquire that he soon abandoned it He subsequently spent a summer quarter at the parish school o Kirkoswald, where he acquired some knowledge in mensuration, surveying, dialling, &c, and this, with the brief interval that he spent at Dalrymple, was all the school education he ever received In his letter to Dr Moore he expresses himself as having, by reading, about this period of his youth, the lives of Hannibal and of Wallace, been excited towards a military life by the former, and been filled with strong patriotic emotions by the latter At an early period he met with the works of Allan Ramsay, and the poems of Robert Fergusson, written chiefly in the Scottish dialect, which tended to give his genius a bias towards poetry, in which he soon surpassed them both

But in knowledge of a different sort, the knowledge of human nature, he soon became considerably initiated At Kirkoswald, a village on the Carrick shore, he obtained, by intercourse with parties following a contraband trade, an insight into the vices and follies of mankind, and learned but too well to imitate and adopt them, and what is worse to take pride in them He formed an attachment with a young girl of the village, of which he speaks as having greatly agitated him at the time, but of which no permanent result appears afterwards "I returned home from Kirkoswald," says he, "very considerably improved My reading was enlarged with the very important addition of Thomson's and Shenstone's works I had seen human nature in a new phasis, and I engaged several of my schoolfellows to keep up a literary correspondence with me This improved me in composition I had met with a collection of letters by the wits of Queen Anne's reign, and I pored over them most devoutly I kept copies of any of my own letters that pleased me, and a comparison between them and the composition of most of my correspondents flattered my vanity I carried this whim so far that, though I had not three farthings' worth of business in the world, yet almost every post brought me as many letters as if I had been a broad plodding son of the day-book and ledger "

In the year 1766 his father obtained from Mr Ferguson a lease of the farm of Mount Oliphant, in the parish of Ayr, that gentleman advancing him at the same time one hundred pounds to stock it with Here, after the day's labour was over, he instructed the family himself in arithmetic and the principles of religion At this place he continued to struggle for the support of his family for the space of eleven years The soil of the farm was extremely barren, and this, with the loss of cattle and other accidents, involved them in great poverty The whole family were in consequence obliged to toil early and late, and Robert, the eldest, thrashed in the barn at thirteen years of age, and at fifteen was the principal labourer on the farm "This kind of life," he says, "the cheerless gloom of a hermit, with the unceasing moil of a galley-slave, brought me to my sixteenth year, a little before which period I first committed the sin of rhyme You know our country custom of coupling a man and woman together as partners in the labours of harvest In my fifteenth autumn, my partner was a bewitching creature, a year younger than myself I did not know," he adds afterwards, in language which portrays a juvenile passion so truly that it may serve for all emotions of a like nature in every human being,—"I did not know myself why I liked so much to loiter behind with her, when returning in the evening from our labours, why the tones of her voice made my heart-strings thrill like an Æolian harp, and, particularly, why my pulse beat such a furious ratan, when I looked and fingered over her little hand to pick out the cruel nettle-stings and thistles Among her other love-inspiring qualities, she sung sweetly, and it was her favourite reel to which I attempted giving an embodied vehicle in rhyme " A Miss E, to whom he seems to have been seriously devoted, escaped immortality by jilting him Her very name is unknown, but he seems pretty soon to have got over the mortification to his feelings caused by this event The object of his most fervent attachment, however, was Mary Campbell, a simple Highland girl, who was dairymaid at Colonel Montgomery's house of Coilsfield He intended to marry her, but she died at Greenock, on her return from a visit to her relations in Argyleshire Their last parting on the banks of the Ayr is described in beautiful language in his poem, beginning—

"Ye banks, and braes, and streams around The castle of Montgomery"

The address 'To Mary in Heaven,' written on the anniversary of her death, is one of the most exquisite of his poems In 1777 his father removed to Lochlea, a farm in the parish of Tarbolton, where Burns continued from his 17th to his 24th year

In the year 1780 he formed a kind of literary institution, called the Bachelor's Club, in a small public house in the village of Tarbolton, consisting of himself, his brother Gilbert, and other young men of the same condition of life, amongst whom David Sillar, who himself published a volume of poems in the Scottish dialect, and who is also known from two poetical epistles addressed to him by Burns, was afterwards admitted The laws and regulations were furnished by Burns, and the last one in particular, drawn up by him, shows the characteristics of his mind at that period It declares that every member "must be a professed lover of one or more of the female sex," and that none "whose only will is to heap up money" can be admitted into membership This club, being soon deprived of its most powerful member, was not long preserved from dissolution, but he established a similar institution on his removal shortly afterward to Mauchline, which still subsists, and appeared in the list of subscribers to the first or Kilmarnock edition of his works Before leaving Tarbolton, he had become a free mason and attended two lodges

He and his brother Gilbert had for sometime held a small portion of land from their father, on which they raised flax, in disposing of which Burns formed the idea of commencing flax-dresser, and in 1781 he joined a person in the town of Irvine, to learn the trade About six months thereafter the shop accidentally took fire, while he and some of his companions were 'giving a welcome carousal to the new year,' when the whole stock was consumed, and he was left without a sixpence Unfortunately his associates at Irvine were not of a character calculated to increase his reverence for virtue, or to strengthen in his mind those pious lessons which had been early instilled into it by his parents Among other intimates he numbered a young sailor of a manly and independent spirit, but whose laxity of moral principles exerted a very deleterious effect upon his mind and conduct "I had pride before," he says, "but he taught it to flow in proper channels His knowledge of the world was vastly superior to mine, and I was all attention to learn He was the only man I ever saw who was a greater fool than myself where woman was the presiding star, but he spoke of illicit love with the levity of a sailor, which hitherto I had regarded with horror Here his friendship did me a mischief, and the consequence was, that soon after I resumed the plough, I wrote the 'Poet's Welcome'"—that is, the verses entitled 'Rob the Rhymer's Welcome to his Bastard Child'

Meantime, a misunderstanding had arisen between his father and his landlord, respecting the conditions of the lease of the farm of Lochlea, and the dispute was referred to arbitrators, whose decision involved his affairs in ruin, and he died soon afterwards on the 13th February, 1784

For the benefit of the family, the two brothers, Robert and Gilbert, now took the farm of Mossgiel, near Mauchline, belonging to the earl of Loudon, on a sublease from Mr Gavin Hamilton, writer in that town This farm consisted of a hundred and eighteen acres, and was rented at ninety pounds a-year Each member of the family gave his assistance towards the stocking and management of the farm, and was allowed a proportion of the produce in the form of stipulated wages Robert's amounted to the annual sum of seven pounds, and such was his frugality at this period, that, according to the statement of his brother Gilbert, his expenditure never, during the four years of their residence at Mossgiel, was allowed to exceed his income "The four years," says Mr Lockhart, in his Life of the poet, "during which Burns resided on this cold and ungrateful farm of Mossgiel, were the most important of his life It was then that his genius developed its highest energies, on the works produced in these years his fame was first established, and must ever continue mainly to rest, it was then also that his personal character came out in all its brightest lights, and in all but its darkest shadows, and, indeed, from the commencement of this period, the history of the man may be traced, step by step, in his own immortal writings Burns now began to know that nature had meant him for a poet, and diligently, though as yet in secret, he laboured in what he felt to be his destined vocation Gilbert continued for some time to be his chief, often indeed his only confidant, and anything more interesting and delightful than this excellent man's account of the manner in which the poems included in the first of his brother's publications were composed, is certainly not to be found in the annals of literary history"

While at Mossgiel he became acquainted with Jean Armour, who afterwards became his wife She was the daughter of a respectable man, a master-mason in the village of Mauchline, and his first meeting with her was characteristic Burns was shooting by the river side, and Miss Armour, described as then "a bonny lively lass of seventeen, with a piercing black eye, a jimp waist, and a foot and ankle cast in the most perfect mould," was washing clothes in the Scottish fashion, and lilting a Scottish song The poet's dog ran over the clothes in the green, and the laughing damsel threw a stone at him 'If you liked me you would like my dog,' said Burns,—and from this simple introduction an intimacy took place which had an important effect on the future happiness of both. Burns at this time is represented to have been "a tall, coarse-featured young man, with a flashing eye, and great colloquial powers, frank and affable, and a heart extremely susceptible to tender emotions" Such a youth was a dangerous lover for a simple country maiden like Jean Armour, and she soon found herself in a state which could no longer be concealed At this time the circumstances of the poet were not in a condition to permit of his marrying The farming speculation in which he and the rest of the family were engaged had utterly failed, and he had resigned his share in the lease, which he tells us was only nominally his He was anxious, however, to afford the only reparation in his power to Miss Armour, and agreed to make a legal declaration of their having been privately married, and afterwards embark for the West Indies to push his fortune But to this, her father, with whom she was a great favourite, would not agree He had not previously suspected her real situation, but on being informed of their marriage, his distress was so great that he fainted He desired his daughter to cancel the marriage-lines with which Burns had presented her, and in the anguish of her heart she obeyed Burns, on his part, "offered," says his brother Gilbert, "to stay at home and provide for his wife and family by his daily labours Even this offer they did not approve of, for humble as Miss Armour's station was, and great though her imprudence had been, she still, in the eyes of her partial parents, might look to a better connexion than that with my friendless and unhappy brother, at that time without house or biding-place" In the distraction of his mind, he wished to leave the country as soon as he could, and accordingly he entered into an agreement with a Dr Douglas, to go out to Jamaica as an assistant overseer, clerk, or bookkeeper on his estate He had not, however, sufficient money to defray the expenses of the voyage, and the vessel in which Dr Douglas was to procure a passage for him was not expected to sail for some time To procure a little money to assist him before leaving his native land, he was advised by Mr Gavin Hamilton to publish his poems by subscription This was the crisis of his fate—the turning-point in his history The suggestion was immediately acted upon Subscription-bills were issued, and the printing of his poems commenced at Kilmarnock, his preparations going on at the same time for his voyage to Jamaica, a voyage which was never to take place "I weighed my productions," says Burns, "as impartially as was in my power I was pretty confident my poems would meet with some applause but at the worst, the roar of the Atlantic would deafen the voice of censure, and the novelty of West Indian scenes make me forget neglect I threw off six hundred copies, of which I had got subscriptions for about three hundred and fifty My vanity was highly gratified by the reception I met with from the public, and besides I pocketed, all expenses deducted, nearly twenty pounds This sum came very seasonably, as I was thinking of indenting myself, for want of money to procure my passage As soon as I was master of nine guineas, the price of wafting me to the torrid zone, I took a steerage passage in the first ship that was to sail from the Clyde" He describes himself as skulking at this time from covert to covert, under all the terrors of a jail, as Jean Armour having become the mother of twins, her father had sent the sheriff officers to apprehend him and force him to find security for the maintenance of his twin children, and the parish officers were also after him on the same grounds, so that he was literally hunted like a partridge on the mountains But the day-dawn was at hand which was to scatter the clouds around his path, and light him on his onward way to immortality

His volume of poems was published at Kilmarnock in 1786, under the title of 'Poems chiefly in the Scottish Dialect,' and immediately took hold of the national mind "No sooner had the volume appeared," says the Ettrick Shepherd, in his characteristic memoir of Burns, "than old and young, grave and gay, high and low, learned and ignorant, were alike delighted, agitated, and transported Shepherds, ploughboys, and maid-servants cheerfully gave the last savings of their penny fee, to purchase the works of Robert Burns, and many protested that they would have given the same sum to have seen the man who made them laugh, cry, or feel with regard to all things, past, present, and to come, as he listed" The first impression being speedily disposed of, his friends advised him to print a second, but his printer at Kilmarnock declined to risk another edition, unless the poet advanced the price of the paper, which he was altogether unable to do In this emergency, Mr Ballantyne, provost of Ayr, generously offered to advance the requisite sum, but ere this, Burns, harassed and impatient to be gone, had bidden farewell to his friends, and sent off his chest by night, for fear of its being arrested, to Greenock, intending himself to follow in a few days, for the purpose of embarking for Jamaica He had also composed the last song he thought he should ever measure in Caledonia, 'The gloomy night is gathering fast,' when his course was suddenly changed, and a bright but all too brief gleam of prosperity shone out dazzlingly on the head and the fortunes of Robert Burns Before leaving Scotland, as he thought, for ever, he sent a collection of his poems, including several that were not published till many years afterwards, to Mrs General Stewart of Stair, from the possession of whose grandson they passed into a private hand, and were made known to the public in 1852 The collection is curious as showing how much the pieces were afterwards improved by revision

A friend had, in the meantime, been secretly exerting himself on his behalf, and at the twelfth hour, ere its shadow had for ever passed from the dial, his exertions were crowned with success The Rev Dr Lawrie, minister of Loudon, who had been very kind to Burns, had sent a copy of his poems to Dr Blacklock of Edinburgh, the amiable blind poet and divine, whom Dr Johnson, in his visit to Scotland, eleven years before, had "beheld with reverence" That gentleman, in acknowledging the volume, highly commended the poems, and concluded his letter with these words —"It has been told me by a gentleman to whom I showed the performances, and who sought a copy with diligence and ardour, that the whole impression is already exhausted It were therefore much to be wished, for the sake of the young man, that a second edition, more numerous than the former, could immediately be printed, as it appears certain that its intrinsic merit and the exertion of the author's friends might give it a more universal circulation than any thing of the kind which has been published within my memory" On receiving Dr Blacklock's letter, Dr Lawrie immediately sent it off by express to Gavin Hamilton, who himself rode after the bard, and delivered it into his hand Burns immediately set out for Edinburgh, where he arrived in November 1786

Some of his biographers, and amongst others Dr Irving and Professor Wilson, the latter in his admirable vindication of the poet, have stated that his first journey to Edinburgh was performed on foot But this is not correct, as appears by a letter from Mr Archibald Prentice, editor of the Manchester Times, to the professor, dated March 8, 1841 The father of that gentleman, a farmer in Covington Mains, and a subscriber for twenty copies of the Kilmarnock edition of the poems, had been introduced to the poet, and it was arranged, he says, "that Burns should, on his journey to Edinburgh, make the farm-house at Covington Mains his resting-place for the first night All the farmers in the parish had read with delight the poet's then published works, and were anxious to see him They were all asked to meet him at a late dinner, and the signal of his arrival was to be a white sheet attached to a pitch-fork, and put on the top of a corn-stack in the barn-yard The parish is a beautiful amphitheatre, with the Clyde winding through it, with Wellbrae Hill to the west, Tinto and the Culter Fells to the south, and the pretty, green, conical hill, Quothquan Law, to the east My father's stack-yard, lying in the centre, was seen from every farm-house in the parish At length, Burns arrived, mounted on a 'pownie,' borrowed of Mr Dalrymple, near Ayr Instantly the white flag was hoisted, and as instantly were seen the farmers issuing from their houses and converging to the point of meeting A glorious evening, or rather night which borrowed something from the morning, followed, and the conversation of the poet confirmed and increased the admiration created by his writings. On the following morning he breakfasted with a large party at the next farm-house, tenanted by James Stodart, brother to the Stodarts, the pianoforte-makers of London, took lunch, also with a large party, at the Bank, in the parish of Carnwath, with John Stodart, my mother's father, brother to the late Robert Stodart, of Queen Street, in your ancient and magnificent town;

and rode into Edinburgh that evening on the 'pownie,' which he returned to the owner in a few days afterwards by John Sampson, the brother of the immortalized 'Tam' Mr Sampson took with him a letter to Mr Reid, in which the poet expressed the great pleasure he had experienced in meeting his friends at Covington

"My father was exactly the sort of man to draw forth all the higher powers of Burns' mind He combined physical with mental strength in an extraordinary degree, had a great deal of practical knowledge, had read and thought much, had a high relish for manly poetry, much benevolence, much indignation at oppression, which nobody dared to exercise within his reach, and no mean conversational powers Such was the person to appreciate Burns, ay, and to reverence the man who penned 'The Cottar's Saturday Night,' and, accordingly, though a strictly religious and moral man himself, he always maintained that the virtues of the poet greatly predominated over his faults I once heard him exclaim, with hot wrath, when somebody was quoting from an apologist, 'What! do they apologise for him! One half of his good, and all his bad, divided among a score o' them, would make them a' better men'

"When a lad of seventeen, in the year 1809, I resided for a short time in Ayrshire, in the hospitable house of my father's friend, Reid, and surveyed, with a strange interest, such visitors as had known Burns I soon learned how to anticipate their representations of his character The men of strong minds and strong feelings were invariable in their expressions of admiration, but the prosy, consequential bodies all disliked him as exceedingly dictatorial"

His name had reached Edinburgh before him, and he was now caressed by all ranks In the ninety-seventh number of the 'Lounger,' a weekly periodical then published at Edinburgh, Mr Henry Mackenzie inserted 'An account of Robert Burns, the Ayrshire ploughman, with extracts from his poems,' which tended still farther to extend his fame In Ayrshire he had known Mr Dugald Stewart, professor of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, and had dined with him at his seat of Catrine, and by Mr Alexander Dalzell he had been introduced to the earl of Glencairn, of whose generous friendship he always spoke in enthusiastic terms From Dr Laurie he carried a letter of introduction to Dr Blacklock, who had been the means of inducing him to visit Edinburgh By the exertions of such influential friends as these, he was speedily introduced into the literary and fashionable circles of the metropolis, and he did no discredit, but the contrary, to the society, in every way so new to him, among which he was now, by a turn of fortune's wheel, so unexpectedly placed But yesterday he was a homeless, skulking fugitive, without a friend to become security for him to the law, and cared for by nobody except the sheriff and parish officers who were in search of him To-day, he had "troops of friends," and was "the cynosure of all eyes," "the observed of all observers" His deportment, in whatever company he happened to find himself, was manly and becoming His unfailing good sense supplied all deficiencies of education, and his brilliant conversational powers seem to have struck every person with whom he came in contact with as much admiration as his poetry Under the patronage of the earl of Glencairn—the last who possessed the title, and who thus shed a parting ray of light upon it to gild, as it were, its dying honours,—Principal Robertson, Professor Dugald Stewart, Mr Henry Mackenzie, —all illustrious and unfading names,—and other persons of influence and standing, a new edition of his poems was published in April 1787 Amid all the adulation which he at this time received, he ever maintained his native simplicity and independence of character By the earl of Glencairn he was introduced to the members of the Caledonian Hunt, and in gratitude for their kindness, he dedicated to them the second edition of his poems, in an address which must be familiar to every reader of them On this his first visit to Edinburgh, it appears that he lodged with a writer's apprentice named Richmond, sharing his room and bed, in the house of Mrs Carfrae, Baxter's close, Lawnmarket, at eighteen pence a week

Mr Dugald Stewart, who, as already stated, knew him in Ayrshire, before the first fruits of the full measure of his fame burst upon him, in his letter to Dr Currie of Liverpool, the first biographer and editor of Burns, says that "the attentions he received during his stay in Edinburgh, from all ranks and descriptions of persons, were such as would have turned any head but his own. I cannot say," he continues, "that I could perceive any unfavourable effect which they left on his mind He retained the same simplicity of manners and appearance which had struck me so forcibly when I first saw him in the country, nor did he seem to feel any additional self-importance from the number and rank of his new acquaintance His dress was perfectly suited to his station, plain and unpretending, with a sufficient attention to neatness If I recollect right, he always wore boots (by this is meant top-boots, for in those days Wellingtons and Hessians, the latter now extinct in Britain at least, were unknown), and when on more than usual ceremony, buckskin breeches"

Being now enabled to see a little more of his own country, than his limited means had hitherto permitted him to do, he resolved upon visiting some of the pastoral and classic districts of Scotland Accordingly, leaving 'the gay and festive scenes' of Edinburgh, on the sixth of May, after being about six months in that city, he set out on a tour to the south of Scotland, accompanied part of the way, by the late Robert Ainslie, Esq, writer to the signet, one of the young men of literary tastes whose acquaintance he had made shortly before They travelled on horseback During this excursion he was introduced to several men of eminence in their station, and among the rest to Mr Brydone, the traveller, to whom he carried a letter of introduction from Mr Henry Mackenzie, and the Rev Dr Somerville of Jedburgh, the historian, whom he describes as "a man and a gentleman, but sadly addicted to punning" The love of fun is inherent in human nature, and at a certain time of life is innocent and natural, just as at a particular period of the circus performances, a clown, the humblest of all actors, makes his appearance, with his commonplace jokes and worn-out witticisms, and some such association as this must have been at the foundation of Dr Johnson's celebrated saying, that 'punning is the lowest of all kinds of wit' At Jedburgh, Burns was presented with the freedom of the town, an empty honour, but the only one which corporations have it in their power to bestow Since the passing of the Burgh Reform Act in 1832, it has scarcely any meaning, but in Burns' time it had immense significance

Having crossed the border into Northumberland, he visited Alnwick castle, the hermitage and old castle of Warksworth, Morpeth and Newcastle In the latter town he spent two days, and then proceeded to the south-west by Hexham and Wadrue, to Carlisle He then returned to Scotland, taking Annan in his way, and thence through Dumfries and Sanquhar to Mossgiel, where he arrived about the 8th of June, 1787, after an absence of about seven busy and eventful months He remained with his mother, his brothers and sisters, for a few days, and, proceeding again to Edinburgh, immediately set out on a tour to the Highlands Returning to Mossgiel, he spent the month of July in the society of his relatives In August he again visited the metropolis, and accompanied by Mr Adair, afterwards Dr Adair of Harrowgate, he the same month set out on another short excursion to Clackmannanshire, returning to Edinburgh by Kinross, Dunfermline and Queensferry When they reached Dunfermline, Burns hastened to the churchyard to pay his devotions at the tomb of Robert the Bruce, for whose memory he had more than common veneration "He knelt and kissed the stone," says the Doctor, "with sacred fervour, and heartily (suus ut mos erat) execrated the worse than Gothic neglect of the first of Scottish heroes" This neglect has been repaired When the new parish church of Dunfermline was erected in 1818, it was made to enclose the burial-place of the kings who had been interred there, and on this occasion the tomb of the Bruce was opened The body of the hero was found reduced to a skeleton The lead in which it had been wrapped up was still entire, and even some of a fine linen cloth, embroidered with gold, which had formed his shroud His bones having been placed in a new leaden coffin, half-an-inch thick, seven feet long, two feet five inches broad, and two feet in depth, into which was poured melted pitch to preserve them, he was re-interred with much state and solemnity, by the Barons of the Exchequer, many distinguished noblemen and gentlemen of the county being present The pulpit of the new church now marks the spot where all that remains on earth of the patriot-monarch is deposited In September of the same year, the poet again set out from Edinburgh on a more extensive tour to the Highlands, accompanied by Mr Nicol, one of the masters of the High School of that city, a man of congenial sentiments, and the 'Willie' of 'We are na fou' At Athole house, Burns was hospitably entertained by the ducal family Of his behaviour during this visit, Professor Walker, who was then an inmate of the duke's family, gives the following description "My curiosity was great," he says, "to see how he would conduct himself in company so different from what he had been accustomed to His manner was unembarrassed, plain, and firm He appeared to have complete reliance on his own native good sense for directing his behaviour He seemed at once to perceive and appreciate what was due to the company and to himself, and never forgot a proper respect for the separate species of dignity belonging to each He did not arrogate conversation, but, when let into it, he spoke with ease, propriety, and manliness He tried to exert his abilities, because he knew it was ability alone gave him a title to be there The duke's fine young family attracted much of his admiration, he drank their healths as 'honest men and bonnie lasses,' an idea which was much applauded by the company" At Athole-house he met for the first time Mr Graham of Fintry, to whom he was afterwards indebted for his office in the excise He afterwards visited the duke of Gordon at Gordon castle, from which he was hurried away by the petulance and false pride of his companion Nicol, who took offence at the poet's visiting the castle without him

Returning to Edinburgh, Burns spent the greater part of the ensuing winter there, and again entered into the society and dissipation of the metropolis On the last day of December he attending a meeting to celebrate the birthday of Prince Charles Edward, the lineal descendant and unfortunate representative of Scotland's ill-fated race of kings, the Stuarts, and on this occasion he produced an ode, breathing Jacobite sentiments throughout Prince Charles died the following year, and thus for ever put an end to the hopes of his adherents Among the most pleasing incidents of his life in Edinburgh was his tracing out the grave of his predecessor, Fergusson, in the Canongate churchyard, over whose ashes he erected a humble monument During his residence in Edinburgh at this time he resided with Mr Cruickshanks, then one of the masters of the High School, who lived in St James' Square, New Town, and was in the habit of visiting in General's Entry, Potterrow, Mrs M'Lehose, the wife of a gentleman in the West Indies, to whom his 'Letters to Clarinda' are addressed He was for some time at this period lame, from a fracture or dislocation of his knee, and was attended by Mr Alexander Wood, the celebrated surgeon

The copyright of his poems he had sold to Mr Creech for a hundred pounds, but his friends suggested a subscription for an edition for the benefit of the author, ere the bookseller's right should commence This was immediately set on foot, the subscription copy being six shillings After settling accounts with his bookseller, in the summer of 1788, he returned to Ayrshire with nearly five hundred pounds, where he found his brother Gilbert, who still possessed the farm of Mossgiel, struggling to support their widowed mother, three sisters, and a brother He immediately advanced them two hundred pounds, and with the remainder he took and stocked the farm of Ellisland, about six miles above Dumfries, on the banks of the Nith The relatives of his "bonny Jean" were not now so averse to their union as before, and they were soon regularly married Previous to this event she had again become the mother of twins, he being the father It was in 1788 that Burns entered upon the possession of Ellisland, and this was perhaps for a few months the happiest period of his life But the occupation of a farmer speedily lost all charm for him He wanted something more stirring and active, and on the recommendation of Mr Graham of Fintry, he was appointed, on his own application, an officer of excise for the district in which his farm was situated "His farm," says one of his biographers, "was, after this, in a great measure abandoned to servants, while he betook himself to the duties of his new appointment He might, indeed, still be seen in the spring, directing his plough, a labour in which he excelled, or with a white sheet containing his seed corn slung across his shoulders, striding with measured steps, along his turned-up furrows, and scattering the grain on the earth But his farm no longer occupied the principal part of his care or his thoughts It was not at Ellisland that he was now in general to be found Mounted on horseback this high-minded poet was pursuing the defaulters of the revenue, among the hills and vales of Nithsdale, his roving eye wandering over the charms of nature, and muttering his wayward fancies as he moved along" When he exclaims in one of his songs, 'I hae a guid braid sword,' we are to understand him literally In the summer of 1791 two gentlemen who came to visit him, found him accoutred in warlike trim On his head he wore a cap made of a fox's skin, and from a belt which served to confine the wandering of a loose great coat, depended an enormous claymore In this garb he stood on a rock that projects into the Nith, and amused himself with angling After having occupied his farm about three years and a half, he found himself obliged to resign it to his landlord, Mr Miller of Dalswinton About the end of 1791 he removed with his family to Dumfries, where on a salary of seventy pounds per annum, being all his income as an exciseman, he spent the remainder of his life

His fame was now widely circulated over the three kingdoms His name and his songs had become dear to every Scottish heart, and his company was eagerly courted by all who could appreciate genius Unfortunately, Burns had not the firmness to resist the many temptations to dissipation which were thrown in his way, or the moral courage to refuse the constant invitations which were sent to him, consequently, he was led into habits of excess, which injured his constitution, and, in the intervals between his fits of intemperance, caused him to suffer the bitterest pangs of remorse. At this period many of his most beautiful pieces were written, especially the best of his songs, which were contributed to an Edinburgh publication called 'Johnson's Musical Museum,' and afterwards to a larger work, the well known 'Collection of Original Scottish Airs,' edited and published by Mr George Thomson To the former work his contributions amounted to no less than two hundred and twenty-eight On this point the late Captain Charles Gray, R M, author of 'Lays and Lyrics,' in one of a series of papers which he contributed to the Glasgow Citizen on the lyric poetry of Scotland, has the following remarks "None of his numerous biographers hitherto has done him justice as to the amount of his contributions to the 'Scots Musical Museum' Currie hints, cautiously, that Burns 'contributed songs liberally to "Johnson's Musical Museum."' Lockhart, who is always equal to the task when dealing with the higher part of our bard's biography, fails when putting together the lighter parts of his materials That he wished to do every justice to the character of Burns, as a man and a poet, is unquestionable, but he lacked the necessary research The drudgery overcame his diligence,—hence his account of what Burns did for the Museum, is very vague and unsatisfactory Cromek, perhaps the most ardent admirer of the genius of our poet that ever was born south of the Tweed, says, 'Burns contributed, gratuitously, no less than one hundred and eighty-four original, altered, and collected songs,' and Allan Cunningham states, that he 'had seen one hundred and eighty transcribed by his own hand for the Museum' It will be observed, that these statements are far below the mark, as Mr Stenhouse, from whom our information is gleaned, had a far better opportunity of ascertaining the truth (the whole of the materials composing the Museum having passed through his hands) than either Cromek or Cunningham, and we learn from him that Burns contributed no less than two hundred and twenty-eight songs to that work, as has been already stated, and we take credit to ourselves for being the first to claim for him the merit of his collecting and preserving above fifty Scottish melodies This labour of love alone would have entitled Burns to the thanks and gratitude of his countrymen, had he done nothing else, but it was lost in the refulgent blaze of his native genius, which shed a light on our national song that shall endure as long as our simple Doric is understood In the lapse of ages even the lyrics of Burns may become obsolete, but other bards shall arise, animated with his spirit, and reproduce them, if possible, in more than their original beauty and splendour We hold our national melodies to be imperishable As no one can trace their origin, it would be equally futile to predict their end Their essence is more divine than the language to which they are wedded They can only expire with the lilt of the linnet, and the lay of the laverock—with the rich and mellow strains of the mavis, and the bold and thrilling notes of the blackbird More than one author of the present day has asserted that the peasant muse of Scotland died with Robert Nicholl Such an assertion is arrant nonsense But granted that she > '—— died a cadger pownie's death,

> At some dyke-back,' is Nature unable to reproduce another great original mind, in the pastoral ranks, when ages shall have changed the phases of society? Why should people of liberal minds give way to such narrow fancies? The peasant muse of Scotland is 'not dead, but sleepeth' She will start up in another garb, and make the 'heights and howes,' the 'streams and burnies' of the land of cakes as vocal as when erst the Bard of Coila

> 'Follow'd his plough upon the mountain side "'

Burns' promotion in the excise was prevented by the imprudence of speech in which he expressed himself in approval of the principles of the first French revolution, and the freedom with which he declaimed concerning the urgent necessity of a radical reform in the parliamentary representation and government of this country He even went so far as to send four carronades, which he had purchased at the condemnation and sale of a smuggler brig, he had assisted in capturing in the Solway Firth in February 1792, as a present to the French convention Both the present and the letter which accompanied it were intercepted at the custom-house of Dover, the guns retained, and the letter transmitted to the Board of Excise in Scotland The Board of Excise, in consequence, deemed it expedient to appoint a superior officer to investigate his conduct In an eloquent letter addressed to one of their number, he exculpated himself with becoming dignity from the charges which had been preferred against him; and the officer who had been commissioned to institute a formal inquiry, could discover no substantial grounds of accusation Mr Graham of Fintry, in whom he had always found a steady and zealous friend, was ready on this emergency to secure him from the threatened consequences of his imprudence, but the board, although they suffered him to retain his office, sent him an intimation that his advancement must now be determined by his future behaviour A report having gone abroad that he had been dismissed from the excise, some gentlemen proposed a subscription for the relief of his supposed necessities This benevolent offer he at once declined, and in the letter which conveyed his acknowledgments, he took occasion to allude to the reports which had been industriously circulated to his prejudice "The partiality of my countrymen," he says in a lofty spirit of indignation, "has brought me forward as a man of genius, and has given me a character to support In the poet I have avowed manly and independent sentiments, which I hope have been found in the man Reasons of no less weight than the support of a wife and children have pointed out my present occupation as the only eligible line of life within my reach Still my honest fame is my dearest concern, and a thousand times have I trembled at the idea of the degrading epithets that malice or misrepresentation may affix to my name Often in blasting anticipation have I listened to some future hackney scribbler, with the heavy malice of savage stupidity, exultingly asserting that Burns, notwithstanding the fanfaronade of independence to be found in his works, and after having been held up to public view, and to public estimation, as a man of some genius, yet, quite destitute of resources within himself to support his borrowed dignity, dwindled into a paltry exciseman, and slunk out the rest of his insignificant existence in the meanest pursuits, and among the lowest of mankind In your illustrious hands, sir, permit me to lodge my strong disavowal of such slanderous falsehoods Burns was a poor man from his birth, and an exciseman by necessity, but I will say it, the sterling of his honest worth poverty could not debase, and his independent British spirit oppression might bend, but could not subdue."

In 1795 Burns entered the ranks of the Dumfries Volunteers During this year Mr Perry of the Morning Chronicle, offered him fifty pounds a-year for a poem weekly for that paper, which would have been a handsome addition to his income, but from the peculiar feeling he entertained of the sacredness of poetry, probably fancying that if he became, what he so much dreaded, "the hireling of a party," his muse would refuse to give her aid, he foolishly declined the proposal His health was now much impaired, and in the autumn of that year he lost his only daughter, which made a deep impression upon him Soon afterwards he was seized with a rheumatic fever Before he had completely recovered, he had the imprudence to join a convivial circle, and on his return from it, he caught a cold which brought back the fever with redoubled severity He tried the effect of sea-bathing, but with no durable success This illness was the cause of his premature death, which took place July 21, 1796 On the 26th of the same month, his remains were interred with military honours by the Dumfries Volunteers, in the South churchyard of Dumfries, and the ceremony was rendered the more imposing, by the presence of at least ten thousand individuals of all ranks, who had collected from all parts of the country He left a widow and four sons On the day of his interment Mrs Burns was delivered of a fifth son, named Maxwell, who died in his infancy An edition of his works, in 4 vols 8vo, with a Life, was published by Dr Currie of Liverpool in 1800, for the benefit of his widow and family Innumerable other editions of his poems have since appeared

In 1828 Mr Lockhart published his Life of Burns, and a complete edition of his Poems and Letters, in eight volumes, with a Life by Mr Allan Cunningham prefixed, appeared in London in 1834 Besides these, an edition of Burns' Works with a Life and Notes by the Ettrick Shepherd and the late William Motherwell, and illustrations, was published by Messrs A Fullarton and Co in 1836

Burns is the most popular poet that Scotland ever produced With his poems, all, from the highest to the lowest of his countrymen, are familiar His principal characteristics as a lyrical poet were his sensibility and his truth, and though he undoubtedly possessed more feeling than imagination, the range and variety of his powers were really wonderful, of which 'The Cottar's Saturday Night,' 'Scots wha hae,' 'Holy Willie's Prayer,' 'Tam o' Shanter,' 'Death and Dr Hornbook,' and 'The Beggar's Cantata,' all differing in style and sentiment, but all unsurpassed in their way, are striking examples His humour in delineating Scottish character and manners has never been equalled, and the language of his country will be perpetuated in his verses long after it has ceased to be spoken, even by the common people, to whom it is now almost entirely confined. His songs may be divided into two classes, the tender, humorous, and pathetic, and the social and heroic Those of the first class are the most numerous Burns was peculiarly sensible to those impressions which produce tender emotions in the mind, and which are ever awakening sympathies of the pleasing or the painful To the beauties of nature he was tremblingly alive, but to the grander and more magnificent scenes his muse seems to have paid little devotion, although, from the emotions with which he was inspired by the wildness of a tempest howling over a mountain, or raving through the trees of a forest, it might have been expected that his songs would have more frequently depicted the grand or sublime in scenery "There is scarcely any earthly object," said Burns, "gives me more—I do not know if I should call it pleasure—but something which exalts me, something which enraptures me—than to walk in the sheltered side of a wood or high plantation, in a cloudy winter day, and hear the stormy wind howling among the trees, and raving over the plain It is my best season for devotion to Him who, in the pompous language of the Hebrew bard, 'Walks on the wings of the wind'"

Such scenes and objects, however, are not the legitimate subjects for lyric poetry, they are themes for a loftier muse, for a more sustained effort, such as the sublime ethics of Milton, the descriptive 'Childe' of Byron, or the more beautiful didactic 'Pleasures' of Campbell and Rogers.

In delineating all the emotions and operations of love Burns particularly excelled With a master's pen he painted its kindling, exciting, and ever-

changing caprices, as well as its deeper, steadier and more settled sentiments, and displayed its predominating influence over all other considerations where it had taken full possession of the heart That sickly cast of love which scarcely ever permits a natural sentiment to fall from its lips was not to be found in a single heroine of Burns all his females were natural, sincere, and unaffected, and the glorious stores of the forest, the field, and the mountain were plundered of their beauties to adorn them Their purity was seen in the opening gowan, wet with the dew, and their modesty beamed in the eye of the violet, their breath breathed in the scented flower of the hawthorn, and their smile "illumed the dark prospects of life, as Aurora gilded with brightness the sky of the morning" All nature acknowledged subserviency to her own bard for his images, and her sweet and simple graces were gathered with an eager hand to embellish her fairest creations Diamond eyes, ruby lips, and ivory teeth, with all their polish and brightness, were tawdry and tinsel similes of art, which found no favour in his sight He was the bard of nature, and he breathed nothing but nature He surveyed her fields with the enthusiasm of devotion, and unfolded their charms in every varied and vivifying hue The opening of spring, the luxuriance of summer, the golden plenty of autumn, and the majesty of a Caledonian winter spread their riches before him His eye kindled at the contemplation of their individual enjoyments, his benevolence sought to make others participators of his joy, his mind burned to give utterance to his feelings, whilst poetry flowed spontaneously from his lips, and the music of his country waited on his call to follow his breathings wherever he went To use his own expressive words, he tuned "his wild artless notes, and sung the loves, the joys, the rural scenes, and rural pleasures, of his native soil, in his native tongue," and in the nature, simplicity, and truth of his lays consist their marvellous power and beauty

Of his personal appearance perhaps the most truthful as well as most graphic description is by Sir Walter Scott, who was once in his company in 1786-7 Scott, who was then a lad of seventeen, just removed from the High School to a desk in his father's office, was invited by his friend and companion, the son of Dr Ferguson, to accompany him to his father's house on an evening when Burns was to be there The two youngsters entered the room, sat down unnoticed by their seniors, and looked on and listened in modest silence Burns, when he came in, seemed a little out of his element, and, instead of mingling at once with the company, kept going about the room, looking at the pictures on the walls One print particularly arrested his attention It represented a soldier lying dead among the snow, his dog on one side, and a woman with a child in her arms on the other Underneath the print were some lines of verse descriptive of the subject, which Burns read aloud with a voice faltering with emotion A little while after, turning to the company and pointing to the print, he asked if any one could tell him who was the author of the lines No one chanced to know, excepting Scott, who remembered that they were from an obscure poem of Langhorne's The information, whispered by Scott to some one near, was repeated to Burns who, after asking a little more about the matter, rewarded his young informant with a look of kindly interest, and the words, (Sir Adam Ferguson reports them,) "You'll be a man yet, sir" "His person," says Scott, in reference to this interview, "was strong and robust, his manners rustic, not clownish, a sort of dignified plainness and simplicity, which received part of its effect, perhaps, from one's knowledge of his extraordinary talents His features are represented in Mr Nasmyth's picture, but to me it conveys the idea that they are diminished, as if seen in perspective I think his countenance was more massive than it looks in any of the portraits I would have taken the poet, had I not known what he was, for a very sagacious country farmer of the old Scottish school—i e none of your modern agriculturists, who keep labourers for their drudgery, but the douce gudeman who held his own plough There was a strong expression of sense and shrewdness in all his lineaments, the eye alone, I think, indicated the poetical character and temperament It was large, and of a dark cast, and glowed (I say, literally glowed) when he spoke with feeling or interest I never saw such another eye in a human head, though I have seen the most distinguished men in my time His conversation expressed perfect self-confidence, without the slightest presumption Among the men who were the most learned of their time and country, he expressed himself with perfect firmness, but without the least intrusive forwardness, and when he differed in opinion, he did not hesitate to express it firmly, yet at the same time with modesty I do not remember any part of his conversation distinctly enough to be quoted, nor did I ever see him again, except in the street, where he did not recognise me, as I could not expect he should He was much caressed in Edinburgh, but (considering what literary emoluments have been since his day) the efforts made for his relief were extremely trifling I remember on this occasion I mention, I thought Burns' acquaintance with English poetry was rather limited, and also, that having twenty times the abilities of Allan Ramsay and of Fergusson, he talked of them with too much humility as his models, there was doubtless national predilection in his estimate"

Somewhere about the very day on which the interview above referred to happened, Francis Jeffrey, then a lad of thirteen, was going up the High Street of Edinburgh, and staring diligently about him, was attracted by the appearance of a man whom he saw standing on the pavement He was taking a good and attentive view of the object of his curiosity, when some one idling at a shop-door tapped him on the shoulder, and said, "Ay, laddie, ye may weel look at that man! That's Robert Burns"

Of Burns' family, it may be mentioned that Robert, the eldest son of the poet, was for twenty-nine years in the Legacy department of the Stamp office, Somerset House, London, and afterwards he for some years resided at Dumfries, on a retiring allowance He married in London, but his wife died and is buried at Dumfries They had one daughter, Eliza Burns, who, under the patronage of her uncle William, went out to India, where she married an Irishman, the surgeon of a regiment Her husband returned home in bad health, and died in Ireland, leaving an only daughter William Nicol Burns, the second son, and James Glencairn Burns, the youngest, both entered the East India Company's service, from which they both retired, the first as colonel, and his brother as lieutenant-colonel. The former married in India, but returned a widower, without children The latter married twice, but was also left a widower, and the father of two daughters Another of his sons died in 1803 The centenary of Robert Burns was held throughout the civilized world in January 1859, with great enthusiasm, and an account of the proceedings on the occasion was soon after published in an imperial 8vo volume by Messrs A Fullarton & Co

Robert Burns, the poet's eldest son, besides being an excellent linguist and an accomplished musician, was also himself a poet of no mean merit The following little Scottish song written by him, is not unworthy of his gifted sire

PRETTY MEG, MY DEARIE

"As I gaed up the side o' Nith, Ae summer morning early,
Wi' gowden locks on dewy leas,
The broom was waving fairly,
Aloft unseen in cloudless sky,
The lark was singing cleerly,
When wadin' through the broom I spied
My pretty Meg, my dearie
Like dawin' light frae stormy night,
To sailor sad and weary,
Sae sweet to me the glint to see,
O pretty Meg, my dearie

Her lips were like a half-seen rose,
When day is breaking paly,
Her een, beneath her snawy brow,
Like raindrops frae a lily,—
Like twa young bluebells fill'd with dew,
They glanc'd baith bright and clearly,
Aboon them shone, o' bonnie brown,
The locks o' Meg, my dearie
Of a' the flowers in sunny bowers,
That bloom'd that morn sae cheerie,
The fairest flower that happy hour,
Was pretty Meg, my dearie!

I took her by the sma' white hand,—
My heart sprang in my bosom,— Upon her face sat maiden grace,
Like sunshine on a blossom
How lovely seem'd the morning hymn,
Of ilka birdie near me,
But sweeter far the angel voice,
O' pretty Meg, my dearie

While summer light shall bless my sight,
Or bonnie broom shall cheer me,
I'll ne'er forget the morn I met
My pretty Meg, my deare!"

"The meeting described in the song," says the author, "is no fiction, neither is the heroine a fictitious personage,—her name is Margaret Fullarton If the song has no other merit, it at least gives her portrait with faithful exactness She is besides of a shape which is elegance and symmetry personified She is now (1850), and has long been, the wife of Mr Ross, gardener at Mount Annan, and has a family of beautiful children Many years ago, on a summer Sunday morning, myself and Mr Smith took a walk up the left bank of the Nith When we came opposite to Ellisland, we took off our shoes and stockings, and waded the water, when we had passed Ellisland, on our way to Friar's Carse, we met Miss Fullarton 'wadin' through the broom to meet us, under the exact circumstances described in the song The tune is a composition of Neil Gow He calls it in his collection 'Mrs Wemyss of Cuttlehill's Strathspey' Every bar speaks the rough and spirited accent of the music of the banks of the Spey"

BURNS, John, M D, author of 'The Principles of Midwifery,' was born in Glasgow in 1774 His grandfather, Mr John Burns, was a teacher of English in Glasgow, and author of 'Burns' English Grammar,' a popular school book in the west of Scotland in the early part of the eighteenth century, and his father was the Rev John Burns, D D, for sixty-nine years minister of the Barony parish of Glasgow Dr Burns died in 1839, and was known previously to his death as the "Father of the Church of Scotland," having lived to the age of 96 At an early age John, who was his eldest son, commenced the study of medicine, and was appointed surgeon's clerk to the Royal Infirmary of Glasgow, when that institution was first opened for the reception of patients in 1792 At this time he applied himself to the study of anatomy, especially to that department of it styled relative or surgical anatomy He afterwards gave instruction in it to students, and was the first individual unconnected with any public institution who professed to teach anatomy in Glasgow His lecture-room was at the north-west corner of Virginia street, behind the present Union Bank of that city In those days all subjects for dissection were obtained by the students robbing the churchyards Mr Burns being detected in something of this sort, the magistrates agreed to quash proceedings against him, on condition that he gave up lecturing on anatomy This he agreed to do, but his younger brother, Allan, took up the lectures on anatomy, while John began to lecture on midwifery Their lecture-room was a brick flat, built on the remains of the old Bridewell, on the north side of College street The brothers Burns were extremely popular as lecturers Allan was monotonous and unpleasing as a speaker, but first-rate as a demonstrator John was much more agreeable in manner His substance was excellent, his knowledge exact, and his views practical, while his lectures were interspersed with jokes and anecdotes, which quite captivated the students

Hitherto the subject of this sketch was not known as a practitioner, and when no lectures or dissections were in hand, he was to be found, day after day, in Stirling's Library, reading On being asked on one occasion, by an acquaintance, what became of his patients while he sat there, he answered, "I have none!" Mr Burns now came forward as a medical author His first work of any importance was the 'Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus,' which appeared in 1799 This was followed in 1800 by two volumes on 'Inflammation,' in which he first described a species of cancer, now known by the name of fungus hæmatodes These two works were followed by others on professional subjects, one of which, 'The Principles of Midwifery,' has been translated into various European languages, and has reached a tenth edition At an early period of his professional career, Mr Burns became surgeon to the Royal Infirmary, and distinguished himself by the nerve with which he operated He subsequently became the partner of Mr Muir, and, after Mr Muir's death, of Mr Alexander Dunlop — a connection which brought him speedily into excellent family practice Nevertheless, he continued to lecture on midwifery till 1815, when the Crown having instituted a professorship of surgery in Glasgow university, he was appointed to that chair, in which he remained till his death. Mr Burns bred his son, Allan, to the medical profession, and, relieved by his assistance, he graduated, and having been appointed physician to the Royal Infirmary, was a good deal employed as a consulting physician In 1843, however, young Allan died of the intermittent fever then prevalent, after which Dr Burns gave up his practice, but continued the duties of his professorship In religion Dr Burns was an Episcopalian, having left the church of his fathers He lived in good style, and was of a cheerful disposition In person he was under the middle height, with grey flowing locks, and his dress was very neat and antique He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London and a member of the French Institute With a niece Dr Burns was unfortunately lost in the Orion steamer, on his return from Liverpool, when that vessel struck on a rock near Portpatrick, on 18th June 1850 His eldest son John, a major in the army, was his heir.

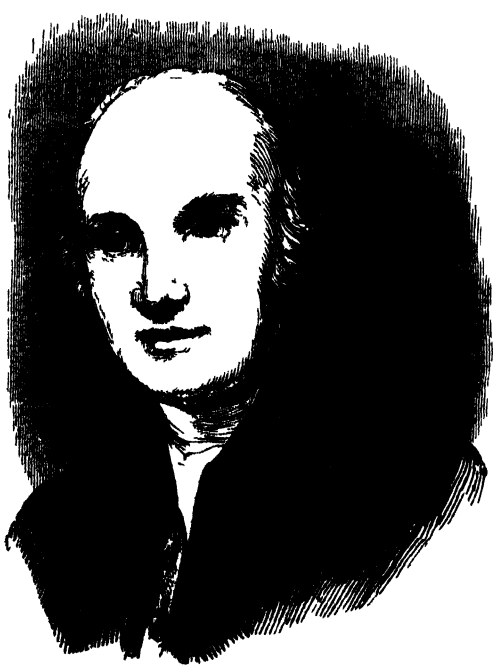
There is a fine portrait of Dr Burns, in the attitude of lecturing, by Mr Graham Gilbert, engraved by Mr James Faed, from which the subjoined is a woodcut



Besides his valuable professional publications, he was the author of a work on the evidences and principles of Christianity, which was at first published anonymously; and it is related that his father, on reading it, expressed himself much pleased, and said to his son, "Ah! John! I wish you could have written such a book"

The following are his works.

The Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus; with Practical Inferences relative to Pregnancy and Labour Glasg 1799, 8vo

Dissertations on Inflammation 1 On the Laws of the Animal Economy 2 On the histories, causes, consequences and cure of Simple Inflammation. 3 On the Phagedenic and some other Species of Inflammation 4. Popular Directions for the Treatment of the Diseases of Women and Children Glasg 1811, 8vo

Principles of Christian Philosophy 12mo Lond, 1828

Principles of Surgery 2 vols 8vo 1838

BURNS, ALLAN, a younger brother of the preceding, was born at Glasgow, September 18, 1781 He was early sent to study for the medical profession, and such was his proficiency, that at the age of sixteen he was enabled to undertake the direction of the dissecting-rooms of his brother In 1804, having gone to London with the view of entering the medical service of the army, he received and accepted of the offer of director of a new hospital, on the British plan, established at St Petersburg by the empress Catherine, having been recommended to the Czar by his physician, and accordingly proceeded to Russia, where he did not remain above six months On his leaving the Russian capital, in January 1805, he received from the empress, in token of her good will, a valuable diamond ring In the winter after his return to Glasgow, he began, in place of his brother, to give lectures on anatomy and surgery In 1809 he published 'Observations on some of the most frequent and important Diseases of the Heart,' illustrated by cases In 1812 appeared his second publication, entitled 'Observations on the Surgical Anatomy of the Head and Neck,' also illustrated by cases. Both of these works, which embrace all his separate publications, are held in the highest estimation by the profession Early in 1810 his health began to decline, and although he continued for two years longer to deliver lectures, it was often amid great personal suffering He died June 22, 1813

Observations on some of the most frequent and important Diseases of the Heart, on Aneurism of the Thoracic Aorta, on Preternatural Pulsations in the Epigastric Regions, and on the unusual origin and distribution of some of the large Arteries of the Human Body Illustrated by Cases Edin 1809, 8vo

Observations on the Surgical Anatomy of the Head and Neck Illustrated by Cases and Engravings Edin 1812, 8vo

An edition of his 'Surgical Anatomy of the Head and Neck' was published in America, with a life of the author, and additional cases and observations, by Granville Sharp Pattison, professor of Anatomy in the university of Maryland

Mr Burns also contributed to the Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal an Essay on the Anatomy of the parts concerned in the operation for Crural Hernia, and one on the operation of Lithotomy

BURNTISLAND, LORD, a title in the peerage of Scotland conferred, 15th April 1672, for his life only, on Sir James Wemyss of Caskieberry, the husband of Margaret, countess of Wemyss in her own right On his death in 1685, it, of course, became extinct His son David succeeded his mother as earl of Wemyss in 1705 [See WEMYSS, earl of] The ancient name was Bertiland or Bryntiland, now corrupted into Burntisland

BURREL, or BUREL, JOHN, a minor poet, who wrote a description in verse of the entry of Anne of Denmark, the queen of James the Sixth, into Edinburgh in 1590, preserved in Watson's Collection of Scots poems, was a burgess of Edinburgh, and is supposed to have been a goldsmith, and one of the printers at the king's mint This conjecture is strengthened by the minuteness with which he dwells on the jewellery displayed on that occasion, when the citizens of Edinburgh put on all their finery, and had recourse to all the usual devices and allegories of the age, to welcome home their queen The name of his poem, which, though quaintly enough expressed, is interesting and curious as a record of the manners and rejoicings of the period, is 'The Description of the Qveenis Maiesties maist honourable entry into the tovn of Edinbvrgh' The display made by the citizens on this occasion is thus referred to

"To recreat hir hie renoun,
Of curious things thair wes all sort,
The stairs and houses of the toun
With tapestries were spred athort, Quhair Histories men micht behauld,
With Images and Antucks auld"

And again,

"All curious pastimes and consaits,
Cud be imaginat be man,
Wes to be seen on Edinburgh gaits,
Fra time that brauitie began,
Ye might haif hard on euerie streit,
Trim melodie and musick sweit"

He sums up the inventory of jewellery exhibited on the occasion by this expressive verse

"All precius stains micht thair be sene,
Quhilk in the warld had ony name,
Save that quhilk Cleopatra Queene
Did swallow ore into hir wame!"

In Sibbald's Chronicle of Scottish Poetry, vol viii p 465, this poem was reprinted Burrel was also author of another poem, entitled 'The Passage of the Pilgrims,' inserted in Watson's Collection Dr Irving describes both poems as "insipid"

Little is known of Burrel's personal history Among the title-deeds of part of the old property at the foot of Todrick's Wynd, Edinburgh, was found a disposition of a house by "John Burrell, Goldsmith, yane of the printer's in his majestie's cunzie-house," 1628, and he is supposed to be the same person —Wilson's Memorials of Edinburgh

BUTE, MARQUIS OF, a title in the peerage of Great Britain, possessed by a branch of the Stewart family descended from Sir John Stewart a natural son of King Robert the Second The Scotch title is earl of Bute, and dates only from 1703 The higher title of marquis was conferred in 1796, on the fourth earl, the son of the celebrated prime minister in the early part of the reign of George the Third

Sir John Stewart, the founder of this noble family, received from his father, about 1385, a grant of lands in the Isle of Bute, the ancient patrimony of the Stewarts, Malcolm the Second, sometime before the year 1093 having granted Bute to Walter the first lord-high-steward of Scotland, who gave it to a younger son, with whom and his posterity it remained about a century, when it was re-annexed to the possessions of the lord-high-steward, by the intermarriage of Alexander Stewart with Jean, daughter and heiress of James, lord of Bute The island of Bute afterwards became subject to the Norwegians, but did not long remain so, and it would appear that on its restoration to the Scottish crown, it reverted to the possession of the family of the high-steward, for in the fatal battle of Falkirk betwixt the English and Scotch in 1296 the men of Buteshire, known at that time by the name of the lord-high-steward's Brandanes, served under Sir John Stewart, and were almost wholly cut off with their valiant leader

Along with the lands, King Robert the Second conferred on his son above named, Sir John Stewart, the hereditary office of sheriff of Bute and Arran These Robert the Third confirmed by charter, 'dilecto fratri nostro, Joanni Senescallo de Bute,' 11th November 1400 There is a tradition that Sir John Stuart's mother's name was Leitch Although designated "Sir" in Duncan Stewart's History of the Stewarts and by peerage writers, who generally follow each other, no authority is given for the title, and he is not so called in any contemporary document. Of the different varieties of spelling of the name of Stewart, the Bute family have preferred that of Stuart, the mode of orthography adopted by Mary queen of Scots on going to France, there being no w in the alphabet of that country

A descendant of this Sir John Stewart in the seventh generation, Sir James Stuart of Bute, grandfather of the first earl, was created a baronet by King Charles the First, 28th March 1627 He was a firm adherent of that unfortunate monarch, and early in the civil wars garrisoned the castle of Rothesay, and, at his own expense, raised a body of soldiers in the king's cause He was appointed by his majesty his lieutenant over the west of Scotland, and directed to take possession of the castle of Dumbarton Two frigates were sent to his assistance, but one of them was wrecked in a storm, and Sir James was ultimately obliged to retire to Ireland, to avoid imprisonment His estate was sequestrated, and on recovering possession of it, he was obliged, by way of compromise, to pay a fine of five thousand marks, imposed by parliament in 1646 When Cromwell obtained possession of Scotland, the castle of Rothesay was again taken out of his hands, and a military force placed in it Sir James was also deprived of his hereditary office of sheriff of Bute, and declared incapable of any public trust He died at London in 1662, and was buried in Westminster Abbey By his wife, Isabella, eldest daughter of Sir Dugald Campbell of Auchinbreck, baronet, he had two sons and three daughters His eldest son, Sir Dugald Stuart, succeeded him, and died in 1672, leaving a son, Sir James Stuart, the third baronet of the family, and first earl of Bute

Sir Robert Stuart of Tillicultry, the second son, was appointed a lord of session, 25th July, 1701 He was also a commissioner of justiciary, and was created a baronet 29th April 1707 He was member of parliament for the county of Bute, and one of the commissioners for the union, which he steadily supported In 1709 he resigned his seat on the bench in favour of his nephew Dugald Stuart of Blairhall, the brother of the following

Sir James Stuart of Bute, the third baronet of the elder branch, succeeded his father in 1672 On the forfeiture of the earl of Argyle in 1681, he was solicited by government to take the management of the county of Argyle, and in April 1683 he was appointed colonel of the militia of the counties of Argyle, Bute, and Dumbarton, and in June 1684 sheriff of the district of Tarbert. In the following February he was appointed sheriff of Argyleshire, and on the 25th March was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates He supported the revolution, and early declared his adherence to King William and Queen Mary On the accession of Queen Anne, at which time he was member of the Scots parliament for the county of Bute, he was sworn a privy councillor In 1702 he was named one of the commissioners to treat of a union with England, which did not then take effect. By patent, dated at St James', 14th April 1703, he was created in the peerage of Scotland, earl of Bute, viscount of Kingarth, Lord Mountstuart, Cambrae, and Inchmarnock, to himself and his heirs male whatever, and took the oaths and his seat as a peer in parliament, 6th July 1704 He opposed the union with England, and did not attend the last Scottish parliament, in which the union treaty was discussed and finally agreed to His lordship died at Bath, 4th June 1710, and was buried with his ancestors at Rothesay His epitaph in Latin is quoted in Crawford's Peerage He was twice married, first to Agnes, eldest daughter of Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, Lord Advocate in the reigns of Charles the Second and James the Seventh

James, the second earl of Bute, the only son of this marriage, inherited, after much litigation, the extensive estates of his grandfather, Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh After the accession of George the First he was appointed one of the commissioners of trade and police in Scotland, lord-lieutenant of the county of Bute, and a lord of the bed-chamber During the rebellion of 1715 he commanded the Bute and Argyle militia at Inveraray, and prevented any outbreak in that part of the country He was one of the representatives of the Scots peerage at the general elections of 1715 and 1722 He died in January 1723, at the age of thirty-three years He married Lady Anne Campbell, only daughter of Archibald first duke of Argyle, and by her (who afterwards married Fraser of Strichen, in the county of Aberdeen) he had two sons and four daughters James, the second son, succeeded to the large estates of his great grandfather, Sir George Mackenzie, and assumed the additional surname of Mackenzie This gentleman, who was a member of parliament for different places in Scotland, from 1742 to 1784, was envoy extraordinary to the king of Sardinia in 1758, where he lived in a splendid style for some years In April 1763, he was constituted keeper of the privy seal of Scotland, and sworn of the privy council He was deprived of the privy seal in June 1765, but reinstated in office for life in 1766 He married his cousin, Lady Elizabeth Campbell, fourth daughter of the great John duke of Argyle and Greenwich, but had no surviving issue Her ladyship died in July 1799, and her husband, Mr Stuart Mackenzie, only survived her about nine months, dying of grief for her loss 6th April 1800, in his eighty-second year An arch within the rails of the duke of Argyle's monument in Westminster Abbey contains a bust of Mr Stuart Mackenzie, by Nollekens, and a tablet, with mathematical instruments, and an appropriate inscription As he left no male issue, the succession to his Scottish estates fell to be regulated by an entail executed by Sir George Mackenzie in 1689 Although the latter was one of the first lawyers of his day, his settlements were so ambiguously worded that they gave rise to protracted litigation His estates were claimed by the Hon James Archibald Stuart Wortley, next brother of the first Marquis of Bute, and his nephew, Lord Herbert Windsor Stuart, second son of the Marquis The judgment of the court of session was in favour of the former, and, on appeal, it was affirmed by the House of Lords, 4th March 1803 [See MACKENZIE, SIR GEORGE.]

John, third earl of Bute, the first and favourite minister of George the Third, was born in the Parliament close, Edinburgh, May 25, 1713 The lofty old buildings in that famed locality, which formed the fashionable flats of the early part of the last century, where so many of the Scots nobility, judges, and eminent citizens of the capital, at one period resided, were destroyed by the great fire of 1824, and the whole close has been remodelled to such an extent with modern improvements that it has lost all its original features, and to complete the change the good old name of Close, which connected it with St Giles' cathedral, "and which," says Wilson, "is pleasingly associated with the cloistral courts of the magnificent cathedrals and abbeys of England, has been replaced by the modern, and, in this case, ridiculous, one of Square" [Memorials of Edinburgh, vol i p 118] The third earl of Bute received his education at Eton, and succeeded his father in 1723, when he was only ten years old In April 1737 he was chosen one of the representative peers of Scotland, and re-chosen at the general elections of 1761, 1768, and 1774 In 1738, he was made a knight of the Thistle On the landing of the Pretender in Scotland in 1745, the earl proceeded to London, and offered his services to the government Under the act of 1747, abolishing the heritable jurisdictions, he had an allowance of two thousand pounds for the sheriffship, and one hundred and eighty-six pounds, nine shillings and threepence for the regality of Bute, in all, two thousand one hundred and eighty-six pounds nine shillings and threepence, in full of his claim of eight thousand pounds

At an exhibition of private theatricals his lordship attracted the notice of Frederick, prince of Wales, in consequence of which he was invited to court, and, in October 1750, was appointed by his royal highness, a lord of his bed-chamber After the death of the prince, he was, in 1756, nominated by the widowed princess, groom of the stole to her son, the young heir-apparent, afterwards George the Third In this capacity he obtained unbounded influence with the princess of Wales, in consequence of which the tutors of her son, the earl of Harcourt and the bishop of Norwich, resigned their offices, and their successors, Lord Waldegrave and the bishop of Lincoln, also opposed him unsuccessfully Two days after the accession of George the Third to the throne, in October 1760, Lord Bute was sworn a privy councillor, and appointed groom of the stole to his majesty In March 1761, on the dismissal of the whig ministry, he resigned that office, and was appointed one of the principal secretaries of state The same year, on the resignation of the princess Amelia, he was appointed ranger and keeper of Richmond park, and invested with the order of the garter, and, May 29, 1762, he was constituted first lord of the treasury He signalized his administration by the patronage which he extended to literature and it was by his recommendation that a pension was conferred on Dr Johnson Home, the author of the tragedy of 'Douglas,' was also indebted to him for a place His principal measure, as prime minister, was the conclusion of a treaty of peace with France, after a sanguinary and expensive war, the peace of Paris being concluded February 10, 1763, but the English nation, intoxicated with the successes which had crowned the British arms, disapproved of the treaty, and the earl became so unpopular as a minister that he and his country were attacked in the most scurrilous terms by Wilkes and other party writers, through the medium of the 'North Briton,' and similar unprincipled publications He was also accused of bestowing many lucrative government offices on his countrymen, and a popular odium was excited against Scotsmen in London, which has long since happily passed away Even Dr Johnson himself, with all his enlargement of feeling, was remarkable for the prejudice which he entertained against the natives of Scotland

On 8th April, 1763, Lord Bute suddenly retired from office, and although he never afterwards openly interfered with public business, he retained the confidence of the king, and was, but without reason, suspected of exerting a secret influence over the royal counsels He was even blamed as the author of the Stamp Act, which kindled the first flame of discord between Great Britain and her North American colonies. The remainder of his life was spent in retirement chiefly at a residence at Christchurch in Hampshire, in the cultivation of literature and science He employed the architect Robert Adam to build a splendid mansion for him at Luton Hoo, in Bedfordshire, where he accumulated a valuable library, and one of the richest collections of paintings, especially of the Dutch and Flemish schools, in the kingdom The architects George and Robert Adam, and Joshua Kirby, were all employed and munificently encouraged by him His favourite study was botany, and he wrote, in nine vols 4to, a botanical work which contained all the different kinds of plants in Great Britain, and only sixteen copies of which were printed, though the expense exceeded a thousand pounds Butea, a genus of plants belonging to the natural order Leguminosæ, was named after him In 1765, his lordship was elected one of the Trustees of the British Museum He also held the office of chancellor of the Marischal college, Aberdeen, and on the institution of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland in 1780 he was chosen their president He was an honorary fellow of the Royal College of Physicians at Edinburgh, and to him the university of that city was indebted for its botanic garden He died at London, March 10, 1792 He married, Aug 24, 1738, Mary, only daughter of Edward Wortley Montagu, M P, eldest son of Sidney Wortley Montagu, second son of Edward first earl of Sandwich, K G Her mother was the celebrated Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whose own name was Pierrepont, the daughter of Evelyn, first duke of Kingston The countess was born at Pera, during her father's embassy at Constantinople, in February 1718, and on the death of her father in February 1761, she succeeded to the inferent of his vast estates in Yorkshire and Cornwall, her brother, Edward Wortley Montagu, having been disinherited on account of the eccentricity of his conduct On the 3d April of the latter year she was created a peeress of Great Britain by the title of baroness Mountstuart of Wortley, in Yorkshire, with remainder to the heirs male of her body, by her husband the earl of Bute, and died at Isleworth 6th November 1794, in her 77th year, having had five sons and six daughters The eldest son, John, succeeded as fourth earl

The second son, the Hon James Archibald Stuart, (Wortley Mackenzie,) born in 1747, was M P from 1768 to 1806, during which period he sat thrice for the county of Bute In 1779 he raised the ninety-second regiment of foot, and on 27th December of that year was appointed its lieutenant-colonel commandant In 1780 he proceeded with his regiment to the West Indies, where his health was severely affected by the extreme heat of the climate At the peace of 1783, the regiment was disbanded In 1794 he succeeded his mother, the baroness Mountstuart, in her extensive property in Yorkshire and Cornwall, and in consequence assumed, by sign manual, the surname of Wortley, 17th January 179-, and six years afterwards, namely in 1800, he also succeeded his uncle, the Right Hon James Stuart Mackenzie, in his estates in Scotland, his claim to which, as already stated, was confirmed by a final decision of the House of Lords, in 1803, on which he took the additional name of Mackenzie for himself only Mr Stuart Wortley Mackenzie married in 1767 Margaret, daughter of Sir David Cunninghame of Milncraig, in Ayrshire, baronet, by Lady Mary Montgomery, daughter of Alexander, ninth earl of Eglinton, by whom he had issue His son, James Archibald Stuart Wortley, lord privy seal, and subsequently lord president of the council, was in 1826 created Baron Wharncliffe in the peerage of the United Kingdom, and dying in 1845 was succeeded by his son John Stuart Wortley, second Lord Wharncliffe

The Hon Frederick Stuart, the third son of the third earl, was M P for Bute, and died at London, 17th May 1802, in the fifty-first year of his age, unmarried

The Hon Sir Charles Stuart, the fourth son, a distinguished general, was made a knight commander of the Bath in January 1799, for his conquest of Minorca, in November of the preceding year, and died in May 1801 His eldest son, Charles Stuart, for his diplomatic services, was, in January 1828, created Baron Stuart de Rothesay, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, but dying in 1845, without issue, his title became extinct

The Hon William Stuart, the fifth son, born in March 1755, was educated for the church at Winchester school, and at the university of Cambridge, and in 1779 was presented by his father to the vicarage of Luton In 1793, he was installed a canon of Windsor and consecrated bishop of St David's, and on 25th November 1800 was translated to the archiepiscopal see of Armagh and primacy of Ireland He married 3d May 1796, a daughter of Thomas Penn, Esq, proprietor of Pennsylvania, and left issue He died in 1800

BYRES, a surname derived from a barony in the county of Haddington, which for many centuries belonged to the noble family of Lindsay, ancestor to the earls of Crawford, from whom it was acquired about the beginning of the seventeenth century, by the earl of Haddington, who is baron of Binning and Byres The barony is now the property of the earl of Hopetoun [See LINDSAY OF THE BYRES, LORD]

CADELL, anciently Cadell, a surname which has acquired a high standing in the literary history of our country, from its connexion with the publication of some of the most valuable and standard works of modern times, and particularly the popular editions of the writings of Sir Walter Scott The principal family of this name in Scotland is Cadell of Cockenzie, now Tranent, in East Lothian The name is supposed to be originally Welsh, but is more likely to have been of French origin, and is the same as Calder [See CALDER surname of]

CADELL, ROBERT, an eminent publisher, whose connexion with Sir Walter Scott's works will perpetuate his name, was born at Cockenzie on the 16th December 1788 He was the son of Mr Cadell of Cockenzie in East Lothian, and about 1807 entered into the employment of the late Mr Archibald Constable, the eminent publisher About the end of 1811, he was admitted into partnership with him, on the retirement of Mr A G Hunter of Blackness from the firm The business was for a long period extensively carried on under the well-known firm of Constable and Company He married in 1817 the daughter of Mr Constable, who died in a year afterwards, and in January 1821, he married Miss Mylne, daughter of Mr George Mylne, accountant in Edinburgh By this lady, who survived him, he had eight daughters

In 1826, after the failure of Constable and Co, Mr Cadell became the sole publisher of Scott's works In Lockhart's life of his father-in-law there are some very interesting notices relative to Cadell's connexion with the great novelist, who has recorded in his Diary that "Constable without Cadell is like getting the clock without the pendulum, the one having the ingenuity, the other the caution of the business" Sir Walter's opinion of him is thus favourably expressed in his Diary, at the time his publishers were about to fail —"Cadell came at eight to communicate a letter from Hurst and Robinson, intimating they had stood the storm I shall always think the better of Cadell for this—not merely because 'his feet are beautiful upon the mountains who brings good tidings,' but because he showed feeling—deep feeling, poor fellow He, who I thought had no more than his numeration-table, and who, if he had his whole counting house full of sensibility, had yet his wife and children to bestow it upon I will not forget this, if all keeps right I love the virtues of rough-and-round men —the others are apt to escape in salt rheum, salvolatile, and a white pocket-handkerchief"

A large stock of Sir Walter's works in the hands of his bankrupt publishers was sold off for half its cost, a circumstance which created an impression among the London booksellers that the value of the copyrights had been wrought out Mr Cadell, however, had a different opinion, and having secured among the members of his own family sufficient money to carry out a scheme which he had quietly matured, he first communicated it to Mr Ballantyne the printer, and finding that he coincided with him in the calculations he had made, they went together to Abbotsford to propound it to Sir Walter Scott In December 1827, Mr Cadell became joint-proprietor of the copyright of all Sir Walter's works then published Mr Lockhart, in his 'Life of Scott,' thus details the circumstances.—"The question as to the property of the 'Life of Napoleon,' and 'Woodstock,' having now been settled by the arbiter, (Lord Newton) in favour of the author, the relative affairs of Sir Walter and the creditors of Constable were so simplified that the trustee on that sequestrated estate resolved to bring into the market, with the concurrence of Ballantyne's trustees, and, without further delay, a variety of very valuable copyrights This important sale comprised Scott's novels from 'Waverley' to 'Quentin Durward' inclusive, besides a majority of the shares of the poetical works Mr Cadell's family and private friends were extremely desirous that he should purchase part at least of these copyrights, and Sir Walter's were not less so that he should seize this last opportunity of recovering a share in the prime fruits of his genius The relations by this time established between him and Cadell were those of strict confidence and kindness, and both saw well that the property would be comparatively lost were it not secured, that henceforth the whole should be managed as one unbroken concern It was in the success of an uniform edition of the Waverley novels, with prefaces and notes by the author, that both anticipated the means of finally extinguishing the debt of Ballantyne and Company, and, after some demur, the trustees of that house's creditors were wise enough to adopt their views The result was that the copyrights, exposed to sale for behoof of Constable's creditors, were purchased, one-half for Sir Walter, the other half for Cadell, at the price of eight thousand five hundred pounds, a sum which was considered large at the time

Sir Walter's Diary, of date December 20, 1827, has the following allusion to this event —

"Anent the copyrights, the 'pock puds' were not frightened by our high price They came on briskly, four or five bidders abreast, and went on till the lot was knocked down to Cadell at £8,500, a very large sum certainly, yet he has been offered a profit on it already The activity of the contest serves to show the value of the property On the whole, I am greatly pleased with the acquisition" "Well might the 'pock puddings' (the English booksellers)," continues Mr Lockhart, "rue their timidity on this day, but it was the most lucky one that ever came for Sir Walter Scott's creditors A dividend of six shillings in the pound was paid at this Christmas on their whole claims The result of their high-hearted debtor's exertions between January 1826, and January 1828, was in all very nearly £40,000 No literary biographer, in all likelihood, will ever have such another fact to record The creditors unanimously passed a vote of thanks for the indefatigable industry which had achieved so much for their behoof"

Into this new enterprise, which was a scheme of Mr Cadell's, he threw all the energy of his character, his business skill, and the zeal springing from his enthusiastic confidence in Sir Walter's popularity, and his own unbounded love and veneration for the Great Magician The whole series of novels were republished in small octavo five-shilling volumes, neatly got up, with plates and embellished title-pages, and explanatory notes by the author

After the death of Sir Walter, a fresh arrangement was come to with regard to the copyright, of which Mr Lockhart, in his 'Life of Scott, gives the following account —"Shortly after Sir Walter's death, his sons and myself, as his executors, endeavoured to make such arrangements as were within our power for completing the great object of his own wishes and fatal exertions We found the remaining principal sum of the Ballantyne debt to be about £54,000 £22,000 had been insured upon his life, there were some moneys in the hands of the trustees, and Mr Cadell very handsomely offered to advance to us the balance, about £30,000, that we might, without further delay, settle with the body of creditors This was effected accordingly on the 2d of February, 1833, Mr Cadell accepting, as his only security, the right to the profits accruing from Sir Walter's copyright property and literary remains, until such times as this new and consolidated obligation should be discharged"

In May, 1847, Mr Cadell took upon himself all the remaining debts upon the estate, on the transfer to him by the family of their remaining claim over Sir Walter's writings This debt included an heritable bond over the lands of Abbotsford for £10,000 This transaction Mr Lockhart says

"crowned a long series of kind services to the cause and memory of Sir Walter Scott"

Mr. Cadell died 20th January 1849 His health had been in a declining state for nearly a year During the last few months of his life he was in treaty for the sale of the entire copyrights, which were valued at the enormous sum of £60,000 In 1851, they were purchased by Adam and Charles Black, publishers in Edinburgh Mr Cadell issued Scott's works in every form and shape There was an edition suited to every class of society, from the splendid Abbotsford, on which he spent about £40,000, down to the cheap people's edition in parts, of which he used to boast that he sold about 70,000 copies Sir Walter's manuscripts were preserved by him with great care, and it was with pride that he used to exhibit these literary treasures to his friends His taste was sound and discriminating, his plans comprehensive and liberal, and his application unwearied His punctuality was almost proverbial Exactly at nine o'clock every morning, except Sunday, he entered his carriage at Ratho, and, along the road to Edinburgh, the country people knew the time to a minute, by the appearance of what they called "the Ratho coach" The same order and regularity were conspicuous at his place of business in St Andrew's square, Edinburgh In the beginning of 1845, Mr Cadell had bought the estate of Ratho, where he resided in his latter years

CAITHNESS, earl of, in the peerage of Scotland, a title possessed since 1455 by the "lordly line of high St Clair," or Sinclair It is, however, of very great antiquity, and has been held by different families It was one of the titles of the ancient Vikings or sea kings In Torfæus' History of the Orcades, a work which he compiled from the ancient sagas and the Danish records, mention is made of Dungaldus earl or jarl of Caithness so far back as the year 875 In the 'Islands Landnamabok,' quoted in the 'Collectanea de Rebus Albanicis,' it is stated that after Thorstein the red, son of Audur the wealthy, had, in conjunction with earl Sigurd the rich, "conquered Kateness and Sudrland, Ross and Moray, and more than the half of Scotland, Thorstein reigned as king over these districts until he was betrayed by the Scotch, and slain in battle Audur was in Kateness when she heard of her son Thorstein's death," and flying to Orkney, she there gave away in marriage Groa, the daughter of Thorstein the red, "to Dungadr, jarl of Kateness, and his daughter Grelauga, by her marriage with Thorfinn, earl of Orkney, brought the former district once more into the possession of these earls" This was sometime after the year 920 In the same century, one Liotus was earl of Caithness and Orkney He was probably a Norwegian, and had defeated his brother Scullius in battle in a contest for the earldom

In a charter of King David the First to the monastery of Dunfermline, in the year 1129, one Macwilliam is designated earl of Caithness.

Harold earl of Caithness and Orkney, a powerful chieftain, was a good and faithful subject of King William the Lion till 1196, when he broke out into rebellion The king marched an army into Caithness, on which the earl submitted, but his sons, Roderick and Torphin, attacking the royal troops, near Inverness, were defeated, and Roderick slain The following year, the earl, instigated by his wife, the daughter of Macbeth, again appeared in arms, and was encountered by the king's forces, who defeated him and took him prisoner On being led fettered before the king, he ordered him to be closely confined in a turret of Roxburgh castle, where he remained until the king's anger was pacified towards him, when he was dismissed on his humble submission, his son, Torphin, having surrendered himself as a pledge for his fidelity On this occasion the southern division of Caithness, called Sutherland, was taken from Harold [Chalmers' Caledonia, page 633] and given to Hugh Freskin, sheriff of Inverness, the progenitor of the earls of Sutherland Harold having again rebelled soon after, the king ordered Torphin's eyes to be put out, and his body otherwise mutilated, and he died miserably in prison The earl himself died in 1206 This Harold is said to have murdered John bishop of Caithness

In 1222, John earl of Caithness and Orkney possessed these earldoms, when Adam bishop of Caithness, a rigorous exactor of tithes, was assaulted in his episcopal palace at Halkirk, by the people of his diocese, and burnt to death, a monk who attended him, named Serlo, being at the same time killed The descent of this Adam, says the Orkneyinga Saga, "nobody knew, for the child had been found at the door of some church" The men of Caithness thought him rather hard in his episcopal government, and chiefly attributed that to the monk Serlo It was an ancient custom that the bishop should have a spann of butter of twenty cows from every proprietor in Caithness Bishop Adam wanted to increase this impost, and have a spann, first of fifteen, afterwards of twelve, and, these being successively granted, ultimately of ten cows The people complained to the earl of the bishop's exactions, but he declined to interfere in the dispute, on which, in a highly excited state, they attacked the bishop's residence The bishop and his followers were drinking in an upper apartment, and when the people came, the monk went out to the door, and he was immediately hewn across the countenance and fell dead into the room The bishop then went out, intending to make peace with the people, but seizing him they conveyed him to a smaller house than his own, and set fire to it, when the unfortunate bishop was burnt to death The earl, as he had refused to interpose for the prevention of this deed, was supposed to have connived at it, and he was, in consequence, deprived of his estate by the king, Alexander the Second, but was afterwards permitted to redeem it, on the payment of a large sum of money, and the giving up the third part of the earldom Earl John was murdered in his own house by his servants in 1231, and his body was consumed to ashes by way of retaliation for the slaughter of the bishop

"There is," says Lord Hailes (Annals of Scotland, vol. i. p 48 note), "an obscurity in our histories concerning the earls of Caithness, which I am not able to dispel" This obscurity has greatly puzzled the peerage writers and genealogists, who are unable to reconcile certain discrepancies in dates and persons occurring in connexion with the earldom According to Crawford's peerage, Magnus, second son of Gilbrede, earl of Angus, obtained this earldom from King Alexander the Se-

ARMS OF SINCLAIR, EARL OF CAITHNESS

Quarterings —1 for the title of Orkney 2 3 and 4 for the title of Caithness Over all, a cross engrailed dividing the 4 quarters sable for Sinclair

cond, in 1222 [if so, this must have been on the forfeiture of Earl John] on payment of a yearly duty of ten pounds sterling to the king and his successors He had a son, Malcolm, who succeeded him, of whom nothing is known but his name His son John, earl of Caithness, was one of the Scottish nobles to whom King Edward addressed a letter proposing the marriage of his son to Margaret of Norway, the young queen of Scotland, dated at Brigham, 12th March 1289–90 He was also one of the peers who made default when Baliol held his first parliament at Scone 10th February 1292–3 In 1296 he swore fealty to Edward the First, but his name does not occur in the Remarks on the Ragman Roll He died about 1330 His succession is involved in perplexity It would appear, however, that this earl John was succeeded by a daughter or sister, married to Magnus, earl of Orkney, to whom she brought the earldom of Caithness, that Magnus, earl of Caithness and Orkney, had two daughters, his heiresses, Margaret, married to Simon Fraser, (supposed to be the Simon Fraser killed at Halidonhill in 1333,) and Isabella, married to Malise, earl of Strathearn, who, in her right, was also earl of Caithness and Orkney, and accordingly was styled earl of Strathearn, Caithness, and Orkney, and that he had four daughters, coheiresses, the eldest, whose name is not given, married to William, earl of Ross, Isabel, to Sir William Sinclair of Roslin, Matilda, to a person named de le Arde, and the youngest, whose name also has not been recorded, to Reginald Chene [Douglas' Peerage, vol i page 293]

The title was next possessed by a branch of the royal family of Stewart, Prince David, earl-palatine of Strathearn, eldest son of King Robert the Second, by his second wife, Euphamia Ross, having been by his father created earl of Caithness early in his reign In several charters he is styled earl-palatine of Strathearn and earl of Caithness [See STRATHEARN, earl of] His daughter Euphamia, countess palatine of Strathearn, resigned the earldom of Caithness in favour of her uncle Walter, Lord Brechin, second son of King Robert the Second, by Euphamia Ross, and he accordingly obtained from King Robert the Third a charter of the earldom of Caithness and regality thereof On being afterwards created earl of Athol, he resigned the earldom of Caithness in favour of his second son, Alan, who obtained from King James the First, a grant of the earldom, dated at Perth 15th May 1430, to himself and legitimate heirs male, whom failing to revert to his father, Walter, earl of Athol The following year Donald Balloch, a near relation of the potent lord of the isles, landed in Lochaber, with a considerable force, and ravaged that district in the most relentless manner To check his ferocity and defend the western coast, Alan earl of Caithness and Alexander earl of Mar marched with the royal army, and met the island warrior at the ancient castle of Inverlochy, near Fort William, in the county of Inverness A bloody conflict ensued, in which the royal troops were completely defeated The earl of Caithness was slain, and sixteen of his personal attendants, besides many barons and knights, were left dead on the field Having no issue, the earldom reverted to his father, and on his attainder for the execrable murder of his nephew, King James the First, in 1437, it was forfeited and annexed to the crown

The next possessor of the title was Sir George de Crichton, the elder of two sons of Stephen Crichton of Cairns, of the family of Crichton of Crichton Having acquired the favour of King James the Second, Sir George was constituted lord high admiral of Scotland, and obtained several considerable grants of land from that monarch in 1450, 1451, and 1452, and in the latter year he was created earl of Caithness, the honours being limited to the heirs male of his body, by his second wife, Janet Borthwick, daughter of Sir William Borthwick of Borthwick and relict of James Douglas, Lord Dalkeith He had a daughter Janet, who inherited the lands of Barnton, in the county of Edinburgh, and who married John Maxwell, supposed to be a younger son of Herbert second Lord Maxwell, by whom she had a son George Maxwell The earl of Caithness died in 1455, when the title became extinct, and the large estates of the earldom, with the exception of Barnton and Cairns, appear to have reverted to the crown.

The earldom was next, by James the Second, conferred, 28th August, 1455, on William Sinclair, third earl of Orkney [see ORKNEY, earl of], lord high chancellor of Scotland, in compensation, as the charter bears, of a claim of right which he and his heirs had to the lordship of Niddesdale He was afterwards designated earl of Orkney and Caithness, but after 1471, in which year he surrendered to King James the Third the earldom of Orkney, he was styled earl of Caithness alone From him the present branch of the family which now enjoys the title is remotely descended He was twice married, and had a son by each wife, both named William Sinclair Passing by the son of the first marriage, he resigned, in 1476, the earldom of Caithness in favour of his son by his second wife, Marjory, and he, in consequence, obtained a charter of the whole lands of the earldom, &c , to him and his heirs whatsoever, 7th December of that year

William Sinclair, the second earl of this race, was killed, with his royal master, James the Third, at the battle of Flodden in 1513 He married Mary, daughter of Sir William Keith of Innerugy, by whom he had two sons, John, his successor, and Alexander Sinclair of Stamster

John Sinclair, the third earl, in 1516 entered into bonds of friendship and alliance, for mutual protection and support, with Adam, earl of Sutherland, from whom, on account thereof, he received a grant of some lands upon the east side of the water of Ully, notwithstanding of which he joined the Mackays, and other enemies of the earl of Sutherland, and took part in all the feuds and quarrels of the country against the Sutherland family The earl of Sutherland, in consequence, brought an action before the lords of council and session against the earl of Caithness to recover back from him the lands of Strathully, on the ground that he had not fulfilled the condition on which the lands were granted to him There were other minor points of dispute between the earls, to get all which determined, they both repaired to Edinburgh, where, by the advice of mutual friends, they referred the decision of their differences to Gavin Dunbar, bishop of Aberdeen, who pronounced his award 11th March 1524, which put an end to all controversies, and made the earls live in peace with one another ever after In 1529, he and Lord Sinclair [see SINCLAIR, lord] invaded Orkney with a numerous force, in order to assert some claim which they professed to have to the Orkney islands, arising out of the renewed lordship of the earldom of Orkney, and were encountered by the Orcadians, under the command of James Sinclair, governor of Kirkwall castle, at Summerdale or Bigswell in Stenness, 18th May of that year, and there they sustained a most disastrous and signal defeat, the earl of Caithness and five hundred of his followers being slain, and Lord Sinclair and the survivors taken prisoners. In the old Statistical account of Frith and Stenness a copy is inserted of a nineteen years' respite to Edward Sinclair and his accomplices, for art and part of the convocation and gathering of the lieges in arrayed battle against umquhile John earl of Caithness, and for art and part of the slaughter of the said earl and his friends By Elizabeth his wife, daughter of William Sutherland of Duffus, he had two sons, William, who appears to have died before his father, and George, fourth earl of Caithness

The fourth earl was a cruel and avaricious nobleman, who scrupled not at the commission of the greatest crimes for the attainment of his purposes The bishop of Caithness being in banishment in England, the earl and Donald Mackay, a chief with whom he was in terms of friendship, took possession of the bishop's lands, and levied the rent, for the behoof, as they pretended of the exiled bishop Mackay possessed himself of the castle of Skibo, one of the bishop's palaces, which he fortified, while the earl, on his part, took possession of the castle of Strabister, another of the episcopal residences But upon the restoration of the bishop, both the earl and Mackay absolutely refused to surrender to him these, or any other parts of his possessions, or to account to him for the rents they had collected in his name On their refusal, the earl of Huntly, who was at that time Lieutenant-general in the north of Scotland, and the earl of Sutherland, summoned them to appear before them at Helmsdale, to answer for their intromissions with the bishop's rents, and for their usurpation of his residences The earl immediately obeyed the call, and although the river of Helmsdale was greatly swollen by recent heavy rains, he, in order to show his ready submission, crossed it on foot, to the great danger of his life, as the water was as high as his breast Having made a final and satisfactory arrangement, the earl returned into Caithness Mackay was committed a prisoner to the castle of Doulis

On the arrival of the queen regent at Inverness, in July 1555, having undertaken a journey to the north at that period, for the repression of the tumults and disorders then prevalent, she was met by the earls of Caithness and Sutherland The former had been requested to bring his countrymen along with him to the court, and having neglected or declined to do so, he was committed to prison at Inverness, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, successively, and was not restored to liberty till he had paid a considerable sum of money He obtained a remission under the great seal, 15th December 1556, and had two charters of the office of justiciary from Portinculter to the Pentland Firth, 17th April 1566 and 14th February thereafter, ratified in parliament 19th April 1567 On the 12th of the latter month and year, he was one of the jury on the trial of the earl of Bothwell for the murder of Darnly, and when the verdict of acquittal was returned, he protested in their name that no crime should be imputed to them on that account, because no accuser had appeared, and no proof was brought of the indictment He took notice, also, that the 9th instead of the 10th of February was specified in the indictment, as the day on which the murder was committed

This George, fourth earl of Caithness, had long borne a mortal hatred to John, earl of Sutherland, and it is said that he instigated his cousin, Isobel Sinclair, wife of Gilbert Gordon of Gartay, and sister of William Sinclair of Dumbaith, to poison the earl and countess, who was near her confinement, while at supper at Helmsdale, in the month of July 1567 Their only son, and heir, Alexander Gordon, made a very narrow escape, not having returned in time from a hunting excursion to join his father and mother at supper The earl and countess were carried next morning to Dunrobin, where they died within five days thereafter, and to free himself from the imputation of being concerned in this murder, the earl of Caithness punished some of the earl of Sutherland's most faithful servants, under the colour of avenging his death The deceased earl's friends, however, apprehended Isobel Sinclair, and sent her to Edinburgh for trial, but, after being condemned, she died in prison on the day appointed for her execution During all the time of her illness she uttered the most dreadful imprecations on the earl of Caithness, for having incited her to the horrid act The eldest son of this woman, John Gordon, was the next male heir to the earldom of Sutherland after Alexander the son of the murdered earl, and happening to be in the house when his mother had prepared the poison, and becoming extremely thirsty, he called for a drink One of his mother's servants, not aware of the preparation, presented to the youth a portion of the poisonous liquid, which he drank This occasioned his death within two days, a circumstance which, with the appearances of the body after death, gave a clue to the discovery of his mother's guilt

The earl of Caithness now formed a design to get the young earl of Sutherland into his hands, and prevailed upon Robert Stewart, bishop of Caithness, to write a letter to the governor of the castle of Skibo, in which the earl of Sutherland resided, to deliver up the castle to him, a request with which the governor complied Having taken possession of the castle, the earl carried off the young man into Caithness, and though only fifteen years of age, he got him married to Lady Barbara Sinclair, his daughter, then thirty-two years old Mackay of Far, an ally of the earl of Caithness, was the paramour of this lady, and for continuing the connexion with him, she was afterwards divorced by her husband In the meantime the earl of Caithness fixed his residence at Dunrobin castle, in Sutherlandshire, the seat of his minor son-in-law, whom he treated with great indignity, and burnt all the papers belonging to the house of Sutherland, on which he could lay his hands He expelled many ancient families from Sutherland, put several of the inhabitants to death, and banished others, after disabling them in their persons, by new and unheard of modes of torture, and stripping them of all their possessions He even entertained the intention of destroying the earl of Sutherland himself, and marrying William Sinclair, his own second son, to Lady Margaret Gordon, the eldest sister of the earl of Sutherland, but the latter being apprised in time of his designs, made his escape from Dunrobin castle In revenge, the earl of Caithness sent his eldest son, John Master of Caithness, surnamed from his great strength, Garrow [from the Gaelic word garbh, rough or strong] with a large party of followers, to attack Hugh Murray of Aberscors and others of that name, residing about the town of Dornoch, who were firmly attached to the family of Sutherland, and who, after various skirmishes, took refuge in the town and castle of Dornoch, which were besieged by the Caithness men, and for a while manfully defended After burning the Cathedral and reducing the town, the master attacked the castle, and the Murrays were, in the end, obliged to capitulate, and having undertaken to depart out of Sutherland within three months, they delivered three hostages for fulfilment of the conditions The earl refused to ratify the treaty concluded by his son, and basely beheaded the three hostages This took place in 1570, and in 1576 the castle of Girnigo, which was at that period the baronial residence of the earl of Caithness, became the scene of one of the most fearful atrocities on record John Garrow, the master of Caithness, had incurred the suspicion and displeasure of his father, the earl, on account of the treaty concluded with the Murrays, because he did not, when he had the opportunity, extirpate the whole inhabitants of Dornoch While conversing with his father, he was arrested by a party of armed men, who, upon a secret signal being given by the earl, had rushed in at the chamber-door He was instantly fettered, and thrust into a dark dungeon below the castle, in which he dragged out for seven years a wretched existence. At last his keepers, David and Ingram Sinclair, relatives of his own, determined to destroy him, and after having kept him for some time without food, they gave him a large mess of salt beef, and then withholding all drink from him, left him to die of raging thirst

The inhuman earl died at Edinburgh 9th September 1582, and his body was buried in St Giles', where a monument was erected to his memory His heart was cased in lead, and placed in the Sinclair's aisle in the church of Wick, where his murdered son was interred He had married Lady Elizabeth Graham, second daughter of William second earl of Montrose, and had three sons and five daughters. In an incursion of the earl of Sutherland into Caithness in 1588, afterwards mentioned, one of his followers having entered the church of Wick, found the leaden box which enclosed the heart of the cruel earl of Caithness, and disappointed in his expectations of treasure, he broke the casket open, and flung the corrupted heart to the winds His eldest son, John Garrow, had married Lady Jean Hepburn, only daughter of Patrick, third earl of Bothwell, sister of the husband of Queen Mary, widow of John prior of Coldingham, and mother of Francis the turbulent earl of Bothwell, and had issue George the fifth earl of Caithness, three other sons, and a daughter, married to Sir John Home of Coldingknows

George the fifth earl succeeded his grandfather in 1582 He began his career by avenging his father's death on his two murderers David Sinclair, one of them, resided at Keiss, and the other, Ingram Sinclair, at Wester The daughter of the latter was to be married, and a large party were invited to the wedding Earl George met David on his way to Wester, and ran him through the body with his sword The earl then rode over to Wester, and accosted Ingram as he was playing at football on the green "Do you know," said he, "that one of my corbies," so he called his pistols, "missed fire this morning?" and drawing it from the holster as if to look at it, shot him through the head In 1585 he had a meeting with the earl of Sutherland at Elgin, in the presence of the earl of Huntly, and other friends, when the differences between the two earls being adjusted, they were reconciled for the time to each other Another meeting subsequently took place between the two earls at the hill of Bengrime in Sutherland, when they entered into a confederacy against the clan Gunn On the 19th May of the same year (1585) the earl of Caithness had a remission under the great seal to himself and twenty-two other persons, for being art and part in the slaughter of David Hume of Crewschawis and others In 1587 the old feud broke out again between the rival houses of Caithness and Sutherland, and both parties assembled their forces at Helmsdale, but by the mediation of mutual friends a truce was agreed upon, after the expiry of which the earl of Sutherland invaded Caithness, in February 1588, when great slaughter and spoil took place The town of Wick was also pillaged and burnt, but the church was preserved The earl of Caithness, shut up in the castle of Girnigo, which was strongly fortified, desired a cessation of hostilities, and a conference with the earl of Sutherland Another truce was the consequence, which, however, did not last long, and various battles, skirmishes, and forays ensued between the rival earls and their followers The earl of Huntly and others, friends of the parties, in vain endeavoured to reconcile them effectually, till March 1591, when the earls met at Strathbogie and agreed to live on terms of amity in future, but in the year 1600, the earl of Caithness, under the pretence of going on a hunting expedition, again invaded Sutherland, and encamped near the hill of Bengrime, on which the Sutherland and Strathnaver men assembled in great force, and marched against him After some messages had passed between the two earls, the army of the earl of Caithness retired, and both in a day or two after disbanded their forces He made another attempt in July 1607, to disturb the peace of Sutherland, but was prevented from accomplishing his purpose by the sudden appearance in Strathully of the earl of Sutherland at the head of a considerable force By the mediation of the marquis of Huntly the earls again met at Elgin with their mutual friends, and once more adjusted their differences In the following year, some servants of the earl of Orkney, being forced by stress of weather to land in his country, the earl of Caithness apprehended them, and after forcing them to swallow a quantity of spirits, which completely intoxicated them, he ordered one side of their heads and beards to be shaved, and compelled them to go to sea, although the storm had not abated On reaching Orkney they complained to their master, who immediately laid the case before the king His majesty referred the matter to his council for trial, but the earls of Caithness and Orkney having arrived in Edinburgh, they were induced by their friends to adjust the business amicably between themselves

The criminal conduct of this earl of Caithness procured for him the name of "the wicked earl," and involved him in constant quarrels and difficulties To recruit his exhausted resources he took into his employment a coiner named Arthur Smith, who had been tried and condemned to death for counterfeiting the coin of the realm, but who, on the intercession of Lord Elphinston, the Lord Treasurer of Scotland, had obtained a pardon This person continued in the employment of the earl of Caithness for seven or eight years His workshop was under the rock of castle Sinclair, in a quiet retired place called the Gote, to which there was a secret passage from the earl's bedchamber No person was admitted to Smith's workshop but the earl, and in a short time Caithness, Orkney, Sutherland, and Ross were filled with base money, which was first detected by Sir Robert Gordon, brother of the earl of Sutherland, when in Scotland in 1611, and on his return to England he made the king acquainted therewith His majesty thereupon addressed a letter to the lords of the privy council, authorising them to grant a commission to Sir Robert to apprehend Smith and bring him to Edinburgh In the following year Smith was apprehended in his own house in the town of Thurso, and in an endeavour to rescue him, John Sinclair of Stirkage, nephew of the earl of Caithness, was slain, and James Sinclair, brother of the laird of Dun, severely wounded and to prevent the escape of Smith he was at once put to death by those in whose custody he was The earl of Caithness, at that time in Edinburgh, summoned the leaders of the parties who had killed his nephew and wounded his kinsman, to appear at Edinburgh and answer for their conduct On the other hand his son, Lord Berriedale, and several of their followers, were prosecuted by Sir Robert Gordon for resisting the king's commission and attacking those who bore it Previous to this affair, Sir Robert Gordon had caused the earl to be denounced and proclaimed a rebel to the king The parties were ordered to appear before the council at Edinburgh, and on the day appointed they met accordingly, attended, as the custom then was, by their respective friends. The council spent three days in investigating the matter, both parties being, in the meantime, bound over in their recognizances to keep the peace, in time coming, towards each other The privy council ultimately granted a warrant for deserting the criminal prosecutions, on a submission being entered into, July 17, 1612, between the earls of Caithness and

Sutherland, of all the matters in dispute between them In the previous month, the earl created a disturbance on the High street of Edinburgh, by assaulting George Lord Gordon, and great slaughter might have been committed but for the extreme darkness of the night, owing to which the parties could hardly distinguish their own friends Soon after he rendered his name for ever infamous by betraying his kinsman John Lord Maxwell, then under hiding for the murder of Sir John Johnstone, whom he lured to Castle Sinclair, under the pretence of affording him shelter and secrecy until he could conveniently leave the country for Sweden His real motive, however, was that he might obtain favour at court by delivering him up The countess of Caithness, (Lady Jean Gordon, only daughter of George, fifth earl of Huntly,) who was Lord Maxwell's cousin, was likewise deceived by her husband, having been told by him that a report was spread abroad that it was already known at court that Lord Maxwell was in concealment in Caithness, and that it was necessary for their mutual safety to set off for Edinburgh, to explain the matter, and thus time would be afforded for Lord Maxwell's escape That unfortunate nobleman, then in weak health, was advised to leave Caithness, and pass through Sutherland, that he might not be taken in the territories of his treacherous kinsman, but so anxious were the earl's servants to execute their commission that Maxwell was actually taken within the county of Caithness, conducted to Thurso, where Captain George Sinclair, a bastard nephew of the earl, was impatiently waiting his arrival, and carried back a prisoner to Castle Sinclair, where he had so lately been a favoured and honoured guest By command of the lords of the privy council, Lord Maxwell was shortly afterwards delivered up, and on 21st May 1613, was beheaded at the cross of Edinburgh In 1614 the earl was appointed king's lieutenant for quelling the rebellion of his old enemy, Patrick, the notorious earl of Orkney, in which he was successful, and his despatches to the king and secretary of state are quoted in full in the third volume of 'Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, pp 286—292 He seems to have intruded himself into this commission, by eagerly volunteering his services to the privy council, so as, if possible, to ingratiate himself with his sovereign, by suppressing a rebellion which had excited the alarm even of the court of England For his services he obtained a pension of a thousand crowns, and shortly after his return from his expedition to Orkney, he was made one of the lords of the privy council in Scotland His restless disposition and lawless proceedings, however, soon involved him in ruin Enraged at the Lord Forbes having succeeded, on the death of his brother-in-law, George Sinclair, to his lands of Dunray and Dumbarth, he seized every opportunity of annoying him in his possessions, by oppressing his servants and tenants, under the pretence of discharging his duty as sheriff, to which office he had been appointed by the earl of Huntly on his marriage with his sister Complaints were made from time to time against the earl, on account of these proceedings, to the privy council of Scotland, who in some measure afforded redress, and to protect his tenants more effectually, Lord Forbes took up his temporary residence in Caithness On this, the earl secretly instigated two of the Clan-Gun to burn the corn of William Innes, a servant of Lord Forbes at Sanset in Caithness in November 1615, and to remove suspicion from himself he industriously spread a report that the fire-raising had been done by the tenants of Mackay, the nephew of Sir Robert Gordon, with whom the Forbeses were then at feud The matter, however, having soon been disclosed by the Guns, who were the actual perpetrators, the earl was closely prosecuted, and he only obtained his remission, after a long interval, on the following conditions 1st, By engaging to satisfy his numerous creditors, 2d, By resigning into the king's hands the sheriffship and justiciary of Caithness, 3d, by engaging to present to justice the incendiaries whom he had employed to burn the corn, and, lastly, to resign to the bishop of Caithness the house of Strabister, with certain feu lands of that bishopric, amounting to the yearly value of two thousand merks Scots, in augmentation of the bishop's scanty revenues His son, Lord Berriedale, whose character was quite different from that of his father, was imprisoned for his father's debts for above five years, but the earl himself obtained a 'supersedere,' or protection from legal diligence from the privy council The creditors, however, apprized or sequestrated all his lands He was denounced rebel in 1621, and his own son, Lord Berriedale, on the suggestion of Sir Robert Gordon and others, applied for and obtained a commission to pursue his father! After his long imprisonment he was released for that purpose, on finding due caution to return to ward after having executed his commission In September 1628, Lord Berriedale and Sir Robert Gordon, the king's commissioners, having taken the field against the earl, he precipitately fled to Orkney, intending to go thence to Norway and Denmark Castle Sinclair, and his other principal castles, were immediately taken possession of in the king's name, and the commissioners succeeded in restoring peace to the county of Caithness He died in comparative obscurity, at Caithness, in February 1643, at the advanced age of 78 During his last years he received an aliment from his creditors out of his dilapidated estates By his countess he had three sons and one daughter, Lady Anne Sinclair, married to George thirteenth earl of Crawford

William Lord Berriedale, the eldest son, appears to have predeceased his father By his wife, Mary, daughter of Henry, third Lord Sinclair, he had a son, John, master of Berriedale, who died of fever at Edinburgh in September 1639, and was buried in the abbey church of Holyroodhouse He had married Lady Margaret Mackenzie, eldest daughter of Colin, first earl of Seaforth, and had a son George, who succeeded his great-grandfather as sixth earl of Caithness He was committed a prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh 24th July 1668, on account of the slaughter of a soldier sent to quarter for deficiency of cess and excise He married in 1657 Lady Mary Campbell, third daughter of Archibald, marquis of Argyle, but had no issue Being deeply involved in debt, in 1672 he executed a disposition of his titles, estates, and heritable jurisdictions, in favour of Sir John Campbell of Glenurchy, his principal creditor, who, after the death of the earl, in May 1676, took possession of the estates, in virtue of the above-mentioned disposition, and in June 1677 was created earl of Caithness On 7th April following he married the widowed countess His right to the title and estates was disputed by George Sinclair of Keiss, son of Francis, second son of George, fifth earl of Caithness, the heir male of the family, who, when the new earl was in London the same year (1678) entered Caithness with an armed force, and took violent possession of the lands of Keiss, Lister, and Northfield, which had been included in the disposition of 1672 Earl John, on his return to Scotland, complained to the privy council, and an order to the sheriff of Caithness was, in consequence, issued, to call the parties before him, and ascertain which of them had the best right to the lands The sheriff decided in favour of the earl, and charged George Sinclair to remove, but the messenger was deforced To support his claim to the lands in dispute, earl John obtained an order from the privy council, 7th June 1680, to General Dalzell, to assist with a party of troops, and raising his own friends and followers, he marched from the banks of the Tay to beyond the promontory of the Ord Keiss, on his part, collected a force of four hundred men, and waited his coming in the burgh of Wick. There he plentifully regaled his followers, who had not recovered from their revel, when, on 13th July, they were informed that "the Campbells were coming" across the country towards them Inflamed with drink and hatred of the intruders, the adherents of Keiss rushed furiously upon their assailants, who were strongly posted on the western bank of the burn of Altimarlach, on the northern side of the river of Wick A total rout of Sinclair's men immediately ensued. Turning their backs, they fled through the gully, towards the river, and so great were the numbers killed in attempting to cross, that, according to tradition, the Campbells, in pursuit of the fugitives, passed over dryshod on the bodies of the slain George Sinclair, thus deprived of his lands, prosecuted the more earnestly his claim to the title of earl of Caithness, and the privy council, under a reference from parliament, found that he had a right to that dignity, and he accordingly took his place as a peer, 15th July 1681 Sir John Campbell, on being thus obliged to relinquish that peerage, was created earl of Breadalbane [See BREADALBANE, earl of, ante, p 879]

In November 1680 George Sinclair, earl of Caithness, preferred a complaint to the privy council that Breadalbane had abused, to cruelty and oppression, the power which the council had given him of fire and sword Breadalbane recriminated against him that, among many other things, he had wilfully burnt the mansion house of Thurso east Both complaints were remitted to the court of justiciary In December of that year articles of treason were exhibited against Breadalbane for fire-raising, murder, treasonable garrison of houses, convocation of the lieges, and acting beyond his warrant from council, but these charges were not brought to trial In the following August the earl of Caithness petitioned parliament to put him in repossession of his paternal estate of Keiss, Tister and Northfield, and on the 23d September, the privy council, to whom the petition had been referred, found that he had been unwarrantably deprived of these lands, and therefore ordained him to be restored to them After the death of the earl, however, in 1698, the earl of Breadalbane again obtained possession of Keiss and the other two estates mentioned, but he was hated by the Sinclairs, who burned the corn and houghed the cattle of the tenants on the estates, till at last he divided the whole of his lands in Caithness into sixty-two portions, great and small, and sold them to different persons Jane Sinclair, sister and heiress of the deceased earl, and the wife of Sir James Sinclair of Mey, was forcibly removed out of the house of Keiss, which she possessed after the death of her brother, by a writ of ejectment and a party of armed men

On the death of the seventh earl, the title devolved on the heir male, John Sinclair of Mey, the grandson of Sir James Sinclair of Murchil, second son of John, master of Caithness, and brother of the fifth earl John, who thus became the eighth earl, took the oaths and his seat in parliament 20th July 1704 He died in 1705, leaving by his wife, Janet Carmichael of the Hyndford family, three sons and one daughter

Alexander, the eldest son, was the ninth earl of Caithness The Hon John Sinclair of Murchil, or Murkle, the second son, became a member of the faculty of advocates in 1713, was appointed a lord of session, 3d November 1733, and died at Edinburgh, 5th June 1755 He married Lady Anne Mackenzie, daughter of George, first earl of Cromarty, but had no issue

The ninth earl took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 17th December 1706, while the treaty of union was before the house, and voted against all the articles of that treaty discussed subsequent to that date. He possessed the title sixty years, outliving every peer who had sat in the Scots parliament, and died 9th December 1765, in the 81st year of his age He married 15th February 1738, Lady Margaret Primrose, second daughter of Archibald, first earl of Rosebery, and had one child, Lady Dorothea Sinclair, married to James, second earl of Fife, without issue The ninth earl had devised his own estate, and that of Murkle, (to which he had succeeded on his brother's death,) failing his own heirs male and the heirs male of his brother Francis, and the younger sons, successively of his daughter, the countess of Fife, if she had any, to George Sinclair of Woodhall, one of the lords of session, and his heirs male, his nearest lawful heir male of line A competition arose for the landed property betwixt the countess of Fife and Sir John Sinclair of Stevenson, nearest male heir of line of Lord Woodhall The court of session preferred Sir John Sinclair, 24th June 1766, and its decision was affirmed on appeal 6th April 1767

The earldom of Caithness devolved on William Sinclair of Ratter, fifth in descent from Sir John Sinclair of Greenland, third son of John, master of Caithness, the father of the fifth earl This William Sinclair was born 2d April 1727, and on the death of Alexander the ninth earl in 1765, he sued out a brief from the chancery for serving himself heir male to that earl One James Sinclair likewise sued out a brief to the same effect, and stated his pedigree to be from Sir James Sinclair of Murchil, second son of John, master of Caithness At the peers' election, 21st August 1766, the latter claimed his place as earl of Caithness, but was not admitted by the lord register At subsequent elections he tendered his vote, but with the same result On the 28th November 1768, William Sinclair of Ratter was served nearest lawful heir male to Alexander, ninth earl of Caithness He then presented a petition to the king, claiming that title and dignity, which petition was, by his majesty's command, remitted to the House of Lords and it was resolved by the committee of privileges, 7th May 1772, that he had made out his right, and he accordingly became the tenth earl He died at Edinburgh 29th November 1779, in the 53d year of his age By his countess, Barbara, daughter of Sinclair of Scotscalder, he had issue, John, eleventh earl of Caithness, another son, and two daughters

John, the eleventh earl, entered the army as an ensign in the 17th foot, in September 1772, and became major of the 76th foot, 29th December 1777 He served some years in America, and was wounded in the groin by a musket ball while reconnoitring with Sir Henry Clinton at the siege of Charlestown He succeeded his father in 1779, and had the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army, 19th February 1783 He died suddenly at London, 8th April 1789, in the 33d year of his age His lands of Ratter and Hollandmark were brought to a judicial sale, and sold for £13,313 His brother having died childless, the title went to a very distant branch of the family, Sir James Sinclair of Mey, the ninth in lineal descent from George Sinclair of Mey, third and younger son of the fourth earl

James, the twelfth earl, was born at Barrogill castle, 31st October 1766 He succeeded his father, Sir John Sinclair of Mey, baronet, in the baronetcy in 1774, (that title having been conferred on the family, 2d January 1631,) and became twelfth earl in 1789, but did not immediately assume the title His lordship was chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers, at the general election in 1807 He was lord-lieutenant of the county of Caithness and lieutenant-colonel of the Ross-shire militia He died in October 1823 He married at Thurso castle, 2d January 1784, Jane, second daughter of General Alexander Campbell of Barcaldine, deputy governor of Fort George, niece of the late Sir John Sinclair of Ulbster, baronet, and had issue, John, Lord Berriedale, who died 1st June 1802, in his fourteenth year, Alexander, Lord Berriedale, who succeeded as thirteenth earl, four other sons, and three daughters,

The thirteenth earl was born 24th July 1790 In early life he was for some time in the army as ensign and lieutenant in the 42d regiment Died in 1855 He married, 22d November 1813, Frances Harriet, youngest daughter and coheiress of the Very Rev William Leigh of Rushall Hall, Staffordshire, dean of Hereford, issue, James, 14th earl, born 16th Dec 1821, married in 1847, the youngest daughter of Sir George Richard Philips, baronet, two other sons one of whom died young Issue of 14th earl, a daughter born 1851, and a son, Lord Berriedale, born 1858

The earldom of Caithness says Douglas in his Peerage, is not in its proper place in the union roll, being postponed to Rothes, Morton, Buchan, Glencairn, Eglinton, and Cassillis, although these six were created subsequently to 1455

CALDER, an ancient surname assumed from the lands of Calder, now Cawdor, in Nairnshire, but derived originally from the French name of de Cadella, from which the name of Cadell takes its rise, Hugo de Cadella being thane of Calder in the reign of King Malcolm Canmore, in whose restoration he was very instrumental, and in consequence was liberally rewarded by that monarch His son, Gilbertus de Cadella, in 1101 obtained from King Edgar a grant of the lands of Calder, &c in the county of Nairn His son, Alexander, who succeeded him, discovered a conspiracy of the Macdonalds, Murrays, and Cummings to assassinate King Alexander the First at Bell-Edgar in his expedition to the north, for which good service, that monarch, on his return, confirmed to him the thanedom of Calder, in 1112 For three generations nothing more appears on record concerning the family of Calder, except that in the year 1230, Helen, daughter of the family, was married to Schaw Macintosh of Macintosh In 1295 Donald, thane of Calder was one of the inquest on the extent of Kilravock and Easter Geddes, in the parish of Nairn, the property of his neighbour, Hugh Rose of Kilravock His supposed son, William, had a charter of the Thanage from Robert I, 1310 He had a son, William, mentioned in his father's lifetime, 1350 The next ascertained thane of Calder was Andrew Boece relates that one Thomas, a valiant knight supposed to be thane of Calder, was killed fighting on the side of the Cumyn faction against the regent, Andrew de Moravia, before 1338, Robert Cumyn and William Cumyn being slain at the same time, but this seems an invention of his own, as no such event is known in history Local tradition avers that the thane Andrew was murdered by Sir Alexander Rait of that ilk, and the lands of Rait being forfeited, were given to the thane of Calder's heir, in consideration of his father's murder His son, Donald, succeeded him Donald's son, William, succeeded in 1442 In 1454 he is designated by the king, James II, as his loved familiar squire, dilectus familiaris scutifer With Thomas Carmichael, canon of Moray, he held the joint office of Crown chamberlain beyond Spey He was the original builder of the castle of Cawdor Tradition mentions another son, Hutcheon or Hugh, who in 1452 attended Alexander earl of Huntly, the king's lieutenant, in his expedition against the earls of Crawford and Douglas, then in rebellion, and Huntly having routed the forces of these two earls at the battle of Brechin, Hutcheon, being too eager in the pursuit, was taken prisoner by the enemy, and brought to Finhaven, whither Crawford had retired, but he being alarmed while at supper with the news of Huntly's approach, fled with such precipitation that Hutcheon and several other prisoners made their escape Hutcheon carried off the silver cup out of which Crawford drank, and presented it to Huntly at Brechin as a sure evidence of Crawford's flight, for which service, says the History of the family of Gordon incorrectly, Huntly, upon his return home, gave him the lands of Asswanly, and George duke of Gordon gave to his successor a massy silver cup gilded, whereon the history of the transaction was engraved From this Hutcheon was supposed to have descended the family of Calder, baronet of Muirtown (see following article), but in a note appended by the late Admiral Sir Robert Calder, baronet, to a copy of 'Nisbet's Heraldry' in the Advocates' library, the appendix to which contains an account of the family of Calder, it is stated that "the Calders of Asswanly are not descended from Hutcheon, second son of Donald thane of Calder, nor has the grant of the lands of Asswanly any reference to the battle of Brechin, which was fought on the 18th May 1452, twelve years subsequent to the date of the grant of the foresaid lands of Asswanly, as appears by a charter of confirmation from the king, dated at Edinburgh 8th July 1450, of the grant of the lands of Asswanly, by Sir Alexander Setonne to Hugh Calder, son and heir of Alexander Calder, and to his spouse Elizabeth Gordonne, dated at Elgin, the last day of August 1440" This note is dated Edinburgh, 29th September 1802, and the original charter was stated to be in the possession of the said Rear admiral Sir Robert Calder

William thane of Calder, in his father's lifetime, under the name of William de Calder, was a witness in a charter of confirmation granted by Alexander earl of Ross to Sir Walter Innes, of the lands of Aberkerder, dated 22d February 1438 He went with William earl of Douglas, to the Jubilee at Rome in 1450 [Abercromby's Martial Achievements, vol ii p 348, in which he is styled the lord Calder] In 1467 thane William attended parliament as proxy of the earl of Ross, and died in 1468 He had a brother, Alexander, who, or another brother whose name has not been transmitted to us, went, with several other Scots gentlemen, to assist Charles VII of France against the English, and from him is descended the family of De la Campigna in Toulouse William's son, William, thane of Calder, is mentioned among the barons present in parliament in 1469 and 1471, and in the former year he served upon the assize which convicted Alexander Boyd of high treason The thanedom and other lands belonging to William were erected into a free barony in his favour in the year 1476, and declared to be within the shire of Nairn, although they are situated in different shires He died about 1503 William, his eldest son, being lame and meaning to enter the church renounced his right to the estate, upon 29th April 1488, which his father entailed on his second son, John, and his heirs In virtue thereof, John was infeft in the year 1493, and the father, then aged, gave up the estate to him He married, in 1492, Isabella, daughter of Hugh Rose of Kilravock, and died in 1498 Two daughters Janet and Muriel, were born after his death Janet died while yet a mere child, and Muriel succeeded to the estate, in virtue of the above-mentioned entail

Archibald earl of Argyle, and Hugh Rose of Kilravock, uncle to the young heiress, were appointed tutors dative to her by King James the Fourth in 1494, and Campbell of Innerliver was sent to Kilravock in 1499 with sixty men, to convey her to Inverary, to be educated in the family of Argyle But on their way thither with the infant heiress, they were pursued by Alexander and Hugh Calder, her uncles, at the head of a considerable force They overtook the party of Campbell in Strathnairn, on which the latter sent her forward with one of his sons and a few men, and the rest kept the Calders in check, till he was sure that his young charge was safe and at a considerable distance He then, after some loss on both sides, followed and conducted her to Inverary, where she was educated, and in 1510, she married Sir John Campbell, 3d son of the 2d earl of Argyle, and ancestor of the earls of Cawdor [See CAWDOR, EARL OF] The thanes of Calder, as constables of the king's house, resided in the castle of Nairn, and had a country-seat at what is now called Old Calder, vestiges whereof still remain But by a royal license, dated 6th August 1454, they built the present tower of Calder, now Cawdor

The founder of the Calders of Muirtoune, Robert Calder, was infeft in the lands of Asswanly, as above mentioned, in 1440 He had two sons, the younger, James Calder, settled at Elgin, and had a son who appears to have been in business there from 1607 to 1636 His son, Thomas Calder, purchased in 1639 the lands of Sheriffmills, near Elgin He was provost of Elgin in 1665, and in 1669 completed the building of a noble mansion there His eldest son, James Calder, Lord of Muirtoune, was created a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia, 5th November, 1686 By his wife, Grizzel, daughter of Sir Robert Innes, Baronet, of Innes, he had a son, Thomas, the second baronet, and several other children His grandson, Sir James Calder, the third baronet, married Alice, daughter of Admiral Robert Hughes, by whom he had two sons, and a daughter, the latter married to Admiral Roddam of Roddam, county of Northumberland He was succeeded by his elder son, Sir Henry, a major-general in the army, whose son, Sir Henry Roddam Calder, is the fifth baronet Sir Robert Calder, the second son, and uncle of the latter, was the distinguished admiral, a notice of whom follows

CALDER, SIR ROBERT, Bart, vice-admiral of the blue, second son of Sir Thomas Calder of Muirtoune, was born in the family mansion, county of Elgin, July 2, 1745 At the age of fourteen he entered as a midshipman on board of a man-of-war In 1766 he accompanied the Hon George Faulkener, as lieutenant of the Essex, to the West Indies Some years after he obtained the rank, first of master and commander, and then of post-captain of the navy During the American war he was employed in the Channel fleet In 1782 he commanded the Diana, which was engaged as a repeating frigate to Rear-admiral Kempenfelt, who was lost in the Royal George, in Spithead Roads, on the 29th August of that year At the commencement of the war with France, he was appointed first captain to his brother-in-law, Admiral Roddam, whose flag was then flying on board the Barfleur He afterwards commanded the Theseus of 74 guns, which formed part of Lord Howe's fleet in 1794, but having been despatched with rear-admiral Montague's squadron, to protect a valuable convoy destined for the colonies, he did not participate in the brilliant victory of the 1st of June

In 1796 he was appointed by Sir John Jervis, afterwards earl St Vincent, captain of the fleet under his command, and accordingly served in that capacity on board the Victory, off Cadiz with a squadron of fifteen sail of the line and seven frigates For his conduct in the battle off Cape St Vincent, Captain Calder, who was sent home with the despatches, was knighted, and on 22d August 1798, was created a baronet of Great Britain

On the 14th February 1799, he obtained his flag as rear-admiral by seniority, and April 23, 1804, he was advanced to the rank of vice-admiral of the white While employed in this latter capacity, he was selected, in 1805, by Admiral Cornwallis, then commanding the Channel fleet, to blockade the harbours of Ferrol and Corunna The force intrusted to him on this occasion proved very inadequate to the service He, however, retained his station, notwithstanding the manœuvres of the Brest fleet, and on being joined by rear-admiral Stirling, with five sail of the line from before Rochefort, together with a frigate and a lugger, he proceeded to sea for the express purpose of intercepting the French and Spanish squadrons from the West Indies under Admiral Villeneuve They soon after, near Cape Finisterre, descried the combined fleet, consisting of twenty sail of the line, five frigates, and two brigs, while the English force amounted to no more than fifteen ships, two frigates, a cutter, and a lugger In the action which ensued, and which continued for four hours, two sail of the enemy's line, the Rafael of 84, and the Firme of 74 guns, were captured, while Sir Robert did not lose a single sail of his own

His success on this occasion obtained the full approbation of his commander-in-chief, who soon after despatched him, with a considerable squadron, to cruize off Cadiz in order to watch the motions of the enemy, but, in the days when Lord Nelson's splendid exploits led those in power to expect great things from our commanders at sea, so incomplete a victory even over a superior fleet, did not satisfy parties at home, and Sir Robert immediately demanded a court-martial for the purpose of explaining his conduct The court found that, in spite of his inferior force, he had not done his utmost to renew the engagement, and to take and destroy every ship of the enemy, and accordingly adjudged him to be severely reprimanded This sentence was as harsh as it was unreasonable and unmerited, and accordingly it was condemned by the nation in general, and the admiralty soon after appointed Sir Robert port-admiral at Portsmouth The hardship of his case was brought under the notice of parliament by the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Romney Sir Robert Calder died at Holt, in Hampshire, August 31, 1818 He had married, in May 1779, Amelia, only daughter of John Mitchell, Esq of Bayfield Hall, Norfolk, by whom he had no issue, and his baronetcy accordingly became extinct

CALDERWOOD, a local surname, derived, as well as the river Calder, which flows into the Clyde at Bothwell castle in Lanarkshire, from an ancient lordship and manor of the name, comprising also the town and village of Great and Little Calderwood This estate was anciently possessed by the ancestors of David Calderwood, the ecclesiastical historian, a notice of whose life follows, but it went out of the family long before his birth, and the Calderwoods were dispersed some into the south of Scotland, and many to Ireland

The proprietor of Calderwood appears to have done homage in 1296, to Edward the First of England

From a genealogical table and notices by Mr David Laing, in the eighth volume of the Wodrow Society's edition of Calderwood's work, it appears that a family of the name of Calderwood existed in Dalkeith towards the middle of the sixteenth century, that one of that family named James died in October 1567, leaving a son called Alexander Calderwood, and a nephew called William Calderwood, that this William, as stated in sundry instruments relative to a property in Dalkeith possessed by him and them, had two sons, one of whom, the eldest, was also called William Calderwood, the younger was David the historian, that Alexander Calderwood, son of James and nephew to the historian, was bailie in Dalkeith, and commissioner to the parliaments of 1648, 1649, and March 1661, and a justice of peace 1663, that he had nine sons, of whom the sixth was Sir William Calderwood, born 1661 sheriff depute of Edinburgh from 1696 to 1701 knighted 1706, raised to the bench as Lord Polton 1711, and died at the age of 73 in August 1733 An account of his descendants by James Denniston, Esq, is continued in the appendix to the Coltness Collections of the Maitland Club, 1842 It further appears that besides William, and David the historian, William Calderwood the elder had a younger son, Archibald, a commissioner of war in the parliament of March 1647, and that two nephews of the historian, viz David, an apothecary in Edinburgh, died 1657, and James his brother, minister of Humbie, died 1679, were the sons of his elder brother, William Another near relative of the historian was Thomas Calderwood, styled merchant, but a stationer and bookseller, &c, in and bailie and dean of guild of, Edinburgh from 16?? to 167?, a commissioner of tends 1672 died 167?, leaving two sons, William, minister of Dalkeith, died 1680, and Archibald, minister of Holyrood-house Abbey, died 1681 The Calderwoods of Polton are now merged in the family of Calderwood-Durham of Largo

A numerous branch of the Calderwoods flourished at the same time in Musselburgh, but they do not seem, says Mr Laing, to have had any immediate connexion with those of Dalkeith

CALDERWOOD, DAVID, an eminent divine of the Church of Scotland, and ecclesiastical historian, was descended of an ancient family, which at one period possessed the estate of Calderwood in Lanarkshire His immediate relatives, as above shown, belonged to Dalkeith and the neighbourhood He himself was born in that town in 1575, and received his education at the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of A M in 1593 Being early designed for the ministry, he applied with great diligence to the study of the Scriptures in the original tongues, the works of the Fathers, and the best writers on church history About the year 1604, he was settled as minister of Crailing, near Jedburgh, and early began to take a prominent part in the ecclesiastical proceedings of the period He was one of those unyielding presbyterian ministers who strenuously opposed the designs of James the Sixth for the introduction of episcopacy into Scotland In 1608, when Mr James Law, bishop of Orkney, made a visitation of the presbyteries of Merse and Teviotdale, Mr Calderwood, together with George Johnston, minister of Ancrum, declined his jurisdiction by a paper under their hand, dated May 5th of that year These two ministers had been elected members of the General Assembly, but to exclude them from this and other ecclesiastical courts, the episcopalian visitor ordered them to be "put to the horn" the very same night The registration of the writ in the sheriff's books was with great difficulty prevented, but in consequence of Bishop Law's information, the king directed the privy council to punish the two refractory ministers in the severest manner By the intercession, however, of the earl of Lothian, with the chancellor and the earl of Dunbar, they were ordered to be confined to their respective parishes, a restriction which continued for several years

in England, in each of the two archbishoprics of St Andrews and Glasgow "This commission," says Calderwood, "and execution thereof, as it exalted the aspyring bishops farre above anie prelat that ever was in Scotland, so it putt the king in possessioun of that which he had long tyme hunted for, to witt, of the royall prerogative, and absolute power to use the bodeis and goods of the subjects at pleasure, without forme or processe of the common law" [Calderwood's Hist vol vii p 62] In May 1617, the king arrived in Edinburgh, and the Scots parliament assembled on the 17th of June During its sitting the ministers held several meetings in the Little Kirk, one or more of the bishops being always present Their chief consultation was about augmentation of stipends and provisions to ministers On one of these occasions when four or five ministers were deliberating on this subject, Calderwood entered and hearing Knox, bishop of the Isles, make some allusion to the English convocation, he protested that such a meeting should not be acknowledged as a General Assembly, or any other meeting equivalent to it, "or anie wayes to be a meeting answerable to the Convocation house of England in time of their parliaments" He was assured that no alteration was to be apprehended, prejudicial to the liberties of the kirk, and that the bishops had faithfully so promised Of their fidelity in keeping their promises, he said, they had had sufficient proofs for the last sixteen years, and he was proceeding to show what had been the encroachments of the bishops, when he was interrupted by Dr Whiteford and Dr Hamilton, "clothed in silks and satins," who urged upon the meeting to attend to the subject before them, of the plantation of kirks and the augmentation of stipends Finding that they were not disposed to listen to his suggestions, he left the meeting with the indignant remark, "It is an absurd thing to see men sitting in silks and satins, and crying povertie, povertie, in the meane time when puritie is departing" [Ibid p 251]

The two archbishops, being informed of what had taken place, repaired to the meeting next day, and solemnly declared that no such innovations were intended, "or els they sall be content to be ledd out to the Mercate Crosse, and be execute on a scaffold," and yet, the day following, an article was passed among the Lords of the Articles to the effect that the king, with the advice of the bishops and such a number of the ministry as his majesty might deem expedient, might frame new laws for the church, in consequence of which a considerable number of the ministers assembled in the music-school, and resolved upon drawing up a remonstrance to be presented to his majesty and to parliament Two of the Edinburgh clergy, Mr Peter Ewart and Mr William Struthers were appointed to prepare it, and when it was finally revised and agreed to, Mr Archibald Simson, minister of Dalkeith, was directed to sign it as clerk of the meeting in name of the rest, and the names of the others, fifty-five in number, were subscribed in a separate paper, and delivered to him as his warrant The clerk register, to whom a copy of the remonstrance had been presented, refused to read it in parliament, and Simson having been summoned before the high commission, declined to produce the list of signatures, and was committed a prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh The list he had intrusted to the master of the music-school, Patrick Henryson, who delivered it to Calderwood The latter was therefore cited to appear at St Andrews on the 8th of July, there to exhibit the roll of names, and "to answer for his mutinous and seditious assistance to the said assembly" Ewart and Simson were summoned at the same time, and they all made their appearance, but the examination was deferred till the 12th, that the king might be present, and take part in the proceedings Ewart and Simson were deprived, and the former ordered to be confined in Dundee and the latter in Aberdeen A long account of Calderwood's examination is given in his History, vol vii commencing at page 261 On this occasion James endeavoured, using alternately threats and cajoleries, to prevail on him to yield, and "to come in his will," but he was neither to be overawed by any earthly authority which he conceived to be unjustly exercised, nor induced by any amount of wheedling, to relinquish the grounds which had brought him in question before the high commission From the pains taken with him it would appear that both James and the bishops thought him a more dangerous antagonist than either Ewart or Simson, whose cases had been so easily disposed of, as if they had had some prophetic warnings of the service which he was afterwards to do the church by his invaluable History. Finding him inflexible, sentence of suspension from the ministry till the following October was pronounced against him, on which he denied their power to pass such a sentence, when the king, having whispered something in the ear of the archbishop of St Andrews, the latter said, "His majesty sayeth, that if ye will not be content to be suspended spiritually, ye shall be suspended corporally." Calderwood, turning to the king, undauntedly replied, "Sir, my body is in your majesty's hands to do with it as it pleaseth your majesty, but, as long as my body is free, I will teach, notwithstanding of their sentence." The king demanded if he would abstain from teaching, for a certain time, if he should command him by his regal authority, as from himself. In the confusion, being at the time pestered with the importunities of the bishops and others beside him, he answered, thinking his majesty had been still urging obedience to the sentence of suspension, "I am not minded to obey." The question being repeated, and the same answer given, the king, in a rage, ordered him to close confinement in the tolbooth of St Andrews, till his farther pleasure were known. On his way to prison, accompanied by about forty ministers and gentlemen, in charge of Sir David Murray, Lord Scoon, some one asked the latter, "Where away with that man, my lord?" "First to the tolbooth, and then to the gallows," he replied, probably anticipating that Calderwood's declared refusal to obey the king himself would have the latter result. That same night, finding from the statements of those who resorted to him in prison, that he had mistaken the king's meaning, he drew up a petition to his majesty, offering to obey his majesty's own commands, if set at liberty, in desisting to preach for a certain time, but refusing to acknowledge the sentence of suspension pronounced by the bishops. Enraged at the distinction, the bishops and their favourers not only prevented the king from granting him his request, but gave out that he had made a recantation of his principles. By an order of the lords of secret council he was soon after removed to the jail of Edinburgh, and after being there ten days, on giving security (his cautioner was James Cranstoun the son of Lord Cranstoun) to banish himself from the kingdom before the ensuing Michaelmas, and not to return without the royal license, he was released from prison.

Hearing that the king was about to return to England, and that he was to be in Carlisle, he accompanied Lord Cranstoun to that town, where that nobleman presented to his majesty a petition in his favour. He offered himself as cautioner that, if Calderwood were allowed to remain in his own parish, he should not resort either to presbytery or any other meetings of ministers, either public or private. The king inveighed against Calderwood, and at last repelled Lord Cranstoun with his elbow. On bidding good night, his lordship again ventured to speak in behalf of the petitioner. He entreated his majesty to permit him to remain in Scotland till the last day of April, that the winter season might be over before he undertook a voyage, and his stipend taken up, for the crop of that year. His majesty, however, was not to be moved. He declared that it was no matter if he begged his bread, "he would ken himself better the next time," and "as for the season of the year, if he drowned in the seas, he might thank God that he had escaped a worse death." Notwithstanding this ungracious reply, his lordship still pressed his suit, but the only answer he received was, "I shall advise with my bishops." The king was heard several times afterwards to call Calderwood "a refractory fool," and when congratulated by any of the English ministers on his return, his common answer to them was, "I hope you will not use me so irreverently as one Calderwood in Scotland did." Lord Cranstoun subsequently gave in a petition to the council for an extension of the time of his departure from the realm, but it was referred to the bishops, to whom also his lordship applied, and a conference was held with Calderwood himself, who made some offers to the bishops, but they were not accepted, and as he could not be prevailed upon to conform to the new regulations in the church, the application, like all the rest, was ineffectual. He continued, however, to remain in Scotland for some time, lurking principally in and about Edinburgh, and during this time he began the publication of his anonymous works in support of the presbyterian cause

In 1618, he printed a Latin tract on the polity of the Church of Scotland, and in the following year he produced a work, in English, the object of which was to show the nullity of the famous Perth assembly of 25th August 1618, and the unlawfulness of the five articles passed at it, relative to kneeling at the sacrament, the observance of festivals, confirmation, private baptism, and private communion Soon after the publication of this last book, an attempt was made to apprehend him at Edinburgh in the house of James Cathkin, a bookseller, but the officers found neither him nor any copies of his work Calderwood was, in the meantime, concealed at Cranstoun, in a secret apartment allotted to him by Lady Cranstoun, who rendered him many services He afterwards removed from one place to another, till the 27th of August 1619, when he embarked at Newhaven, and sailed for Holland, where, in 1623, he published his celebrated controversial work, entitled 'Altare Damascenum,' in which he rigorously examined the origin and authority of episcopacy From Row's Ecclesiastical History it appears that he was known, while abroad, by the quaint title of "Edwardus Didoclavius," being an anagram on his name, Latinized

During his absence from his native country, having suffered for a long time from illness, his enemies supposed him to be dead, and one Patrick Scott, a landed gentleman near Falkland in Fife, having wasted his estate, and anxious to recommend himself at court, endeavoured to impose upon the world, a recantation under his name, with the title, 'Calderwood's Recantation, or, a tripartite discourse, directed to such of the ministry and others in Scotland, that refuse conformitie to the ordinances of the church, wherein the causes and bad effects of such separation, the legall proceedings against the refractarie, and nullitie of their cause, are softly launced, and they lovingly invited to the Uniformitie of the Church Lond 1622, 4to' Scott alleged to some of his friends that the king had furnished him with the matter, and he set it down in form as he received it Soon after, Calderwood's 'Altare Damascenum appeared, and finding that he was alive, Scott went over to Holland, and sought him in various towns, and especially in Amsterdam, for the purpose of assassinating him, but he found that Calderwood had already returned to Scotland [Calderwood's History, vol vii page 583]

In 1625, after the death of King James, Calderwood returned to Edinburgh For some years he was engaged collecting all the memorials relating to the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation there to the death of James the Sixth The original MS of his history is preserved in the British Museum, having been presented to that national institution by the author's grand-nephew, Lord Polton, and abbreviated transcripts of considerable portions of it are also to be found in the university library of Glasgow, and in the Advocates' Library In 1648 the General Assembly voted him a yearly pension of eight hundred pounds Scots to complete the design An abridgment of it, entitled 'The True History of the Church of Scotland,' was printed in 1646, under the authority of the General Assembly In 1638 he was settled as minister of Pencaitland, near Edinburgh In 1643, he was appointed by the Assembly, with Henderson and Dickson, one of the committee for drawing up the Directory of Public Worship It was he who introduced the practice in church courts, now confirmed by long usage, of dissenting from the decision of the Assembly, and requiring the protest to be entered in the record In 1619 an act having been introduced respecting the election of ministers, he proposed that the right of electing should be vested in the presbytery, leaving to the people the power of declaring their dissent, upon reasons of which it should be competent for the presbytery to judge, but this suggestion was not adopted, and according to Baillie, "Calderwood entered a very sharp protestation against our act, which he required to be registered This is the first protestation we heard of in our time, and had it come from any other it had not escaped censure" [Baillie's Letters, vol ii page 340]

Calderwood died at Jedburgh on 29th October, 1650 In 1841, the Wodrow Society, which was formed in Edinburgh in that year, brought out the first volume of his History of the Kirk of Scotland from the original manuscript preserved in the British Museum Seven other volumes were published subsequently They were edited by the Rev Thomas Thomson

CALDWELL, a surname derived from lands in Renfrewshire, possessed by an ancient family of that name for some centuries Early in the 14th century Easter Caldwell was obtained in marriage with a daughter of the family of Caldwell, by Gilchrist Mure (See MURE) In 1703, Wester Caldwell was purchased by Baron Mure of Caldwell

John Caldwell, born at Prestwick, Ayrshire, died 1639, became a merchant in Enniskillen His son was created a baronet of Ireland 23d June 1683 The great-grandson of the latter, Sir James Caldwell, was created a count of Milan in the Holy Roman empire in 1749, and the latter title remains in the family The second baronet was a distinguished officer in the Austrian service, and the fifth was treasurer-general of Lower Canada

CALLANDER, a surname derived from the lands of Callendar in Stirlingshire, (supposed to be a corruption of choille-tor, wood-hill,) which were bestowed by Alexander the Second in 1246, on one Malcolm the son of Duncan, who had received, in 1217, from Maldum earl of Lennox, the lands of Glaswell, Kilsyth, &c., in the same county It is probable, however, that it was the British name for the district extending over the middle portion of the Forth A Roman station was at Calentarra, supposed to be the camp at Ardoch, near the village of Callander in Perthshire, and the army of William the Conqueror passed through Callantrae on their way to Abernethy on the Tay, against Malcolm Canmore One of the portions of the Scottish army under David the First, at the battle of the Standard (1138), were the men of Callantrae Malcolm was succeeded by Alum de Cullenter his son, who took his name, as was usual in those days, from his estate In the Ragman Roll, among those who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1292 and 1296, occur the names of 'Johannes de Callentar, miles,' and 'Johannes de Callentyr,' the former being the head of the ancient family of the Callendars of that ilk, and the latter, it is likely, a son or nephew Patrick de Callendar of that ilk was forfeited by David the Second, for adhering to the party of Edward Baliol, upon which Sir William Livingston, ancestor of the earls of Linlithgow and Callendar, [see LIVINGSTON, surname of,] obtained the estate of Callendar, by a charter, dated 10th July 1347, and to prevent his title to the lands from being afterwards called in question, he married Christian Callendar, the daughter and heiress of the said Patrick [See CALLENDAR, earl of]

CALLANDER, JOHN, of Craigforth, Stirlingshire, a distinguished antiquary, was born about the beginning of the eighteenth century Being educated for the bar, he was admitted advocate, but he devoted the greater part of his time in early life to classical studies, and was the author of various works, which display great scholarship His first publication was a translation from the French of M de Brosses, entitled 'Terra Australis Cognita, or Voyages to the Southern Hemisphere, during the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries,' which appeared at Edinburgh in 1766, in 3 vols 8vo In 1779 appeared at Glasgow his 'Essay towards a literal English Version of the New Testament, in the Epistle to the Ephesians' The work by which he is best known was published at Edinburgh in 1782, in 8vo, entitled 'Two ancient Scottish Poems, the Gaberlunzie Man, and Christ's Kirk on the Green, with Notes and Observations' In editing these he does not appear to have consulted the most correct editions, but, as regards the latter especially, gave "such readings as appeared to him most consonant to the phraseology of the sixteenth century" In April 1781 he was elected a fellow of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, founded in the preceding November by the late earl of Buchan, and appointed secretary for foreign correspondence In August of the same year, he presented the society with five folio volumes of manuscripts, entitled 'Spicelegia Antiquitatis Græcæ, sive ex Veteribus Poetis, Deperdita Fragmenta,' and also with nine folio volumes of manuscript annotations on Milton's Paradise Lost Of the latter, a specimen, containing his notes on the first book, was printed at Glasgow, by Messrs Foulis, in 1750 An admirable paper in Blackwood's Magazine on these annotations, in which Mr Callander was accused of having taken, without acknowledgment, the greater part of his materials from a folio work on the same subject, published by Mr Patrick Hume, at London, in 1695, led, on the suggestion of Mr David Laing, librarian to the signet library, to the appointment, in 1826, of a committee of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries for the purpose of examining the manuscripts Their report, published in the third volume of the Transactions of that Society, vindicated Mr Callander from the charge of plagiarising the general plan, on the largest portion of his materials, from Mr Hume's work, but stated that there are some passages where the similarity is so striking, that there can be no doubt of his having availed himself of the labours of his predecessor, and of these he has made no acknowledgment

In 1778, Mr Callander printed in folio a specimen of a 'Bibliotheca Septentrionalis' In 1781 appeared 'Proposals for a History of the Ancient Music of Scotland, from the age of the Venerable Ossian to the beginning of the Sixteenth Century,' and the same year, a specimen of a Scoto-Gothic Glossary is mentioned in a letter to the earl of Buchan But none of these projected works appear ever to have been completed Mr Callander died September 14, 1789 By his wife, Mary, daughter of Sir James Livingstone of Westquarter, Bart, he had seventeen children From a little work, entitled 'Letters from Thomas Percy, D D, afterwards bishop of Dromore, John Callander of Craigforth, Esq, David Herd, and others, to George Paton, which appeared at Edinburgh in 1830, we learn that Mr Callander had a taste for music, and was an excellent performer on the violin, and that in his latter years he became very retired in his habits, and saw little company, his mind being deeply affected by a religious melancholy, which entirely unfitted him for society The estate of Craigforth originally belonged to Lord Elphinstone, but in the year 1684, it was acquired by Mr Alexander Higgins, advocate That gentleman, shortly after his purchase, became much embarrassed, and in consequence of large sums of money advanced by John Callander, the king's master smith in Scotland, Mr Higgins conveyed the estate to him Craigforth has since remained in the possession of his descendants, notwithstanding a strenuous effort which was made by Mr Higgins to regain it Mr Callander, the smith, is traditionally said to have made the greater part of his money by a mistake of some English government officials, who paid him a large sum in pounds sterling, instead of pounds Scots

James Callander, born in 1745, the eldest son of the antiquary, was a person of some notoriety in his day He left Scotland when very young, and remained upwards of twenty years on the continent In 1810, on the death of his cousin, Sir Alexander Campbell of Ardkinglass, bart, he succeeded, as heir of entail, to that estate, on which he dropped the name of Callander, and assumed the name and title of Sir James Campbell, baronet When the succession opened to him, he was resident in France, and being one of those who were detained by Napoleon, he sent a French lady, whose acquaintance he had formed, named Madame Lina Talma Sassen, as his commissioner to Scotland In the power of attorney with which he furnished her on the occasion, she was designed his "beloved wife," but when he arrived in Scotland himself he disclaimed the marriage, in consequence of which, Madame Sassen raised an action against him Although the judges of the court of session found the marriage not proven, they awarded her a sum of three hundred pounds sterling per annum On appeal to the house of lords, however, the judgment was reversed The lady afterwards brought various actions against Sir James, in the court of session, having been admitted to sue in forma pauperis, and the superintendence of these suits formed the occupation of her life, they were only terminated by the death of the parties, within a fortnight of each other It is said that latterly Sir James offered her a very liberal compromise, which she rejected, as she would accept nothing short of a complete recognition of all her claims She was a constant attendant in the parliament house during the sittings of the court of session She was little in stature, and in her youth had been a pretty woman Sir James died in 1832 He published Memoirs of his own life in 2 vols 8vo, a work not remarkable for the accuracy of its facts

CALLENDAR, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, (attainted in 1716,) conferred in 1641 on the Hon Sir James Livingstone, third son of Alexander, first earl of Linlithgow [See LINLITHGOW, earl of] Sir James, in his youth, distinguished himself greatly in the wars in Bohemia, Germany, Holland, and Sweden, and on his return to Scotland he was appointed one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to King Charles the First, and created Lord Livingstone of Almond, by patent dated at Holyroodhouse 19th June 1633, to him and his heirs male for ever On 12th June 1634 he had the lordship of Callendar and several other lands near Falkirk erected into a free barony In 1640, when the Scots covenanters raised an army to oppose the attempt of King Charles the First to coerce them into his measures, he was appointed by the war-committee lieutenant-general or second in command under General Alexander Leslie, afterwards created earl of Leven On the 20th August the Scots army crossed the Tweed, the van being led on foot by the earl of Montrose, who had not then declared himself for the king After defeating on the 28th, a large body of the king's troops sent to defend the fords at Newburn on the Tyne, they took possession of Newcastle and other towns, and eight commissioners being soon after sent to treat with commissioners on the part of the king the treaty of Ripon, concluded the last day of October, which put an end to hostilities for the time, was the consequence On his return to Scotland Montrose secretly formed an association in favour of the king, and Lord Almond was one of the first who subscribed the bond, at Cumbernauld, in July 1641 He afterwards revealed the matter to the earl of Argyle, who reported it to the committee of parliament, and the bond was in consequence delivered up and burned When Charles visited Scotland in August of that year, he was pleased to create him earl of Callendar, Lord Livingstone and Almond by patent dated at Holyroodhouse, 6th October 1641, to him and the heirs male of his body In 1643, when the Scots army were about to enter England, Lord Callendar was offered his former post of lieutenant-general, but he declined it In the following year, however, he accepted the command of five thousand covenanters raised to oppose Montrose, who had erected the royal standard at Dumfries Montrose, however, did not wait for them, but in two days made a precipitate retreat to Carlisle Advancing into England, the earl of Callendar joined the Scots army under the earl of Leven, employed in the siege of Newcastle, which was taken by storm in October 1644 After the king had taken refuge in the Scots camp at Newark in May 1646, the earl of Callendar waited on his majesty, by whom he was graciously received He obtained a patent, dated at Newark 22d July 1646, granting to him, in the event of failure of heirs male of his body the power of nominating the person who should succeed him in his titles and estates, and in default of such nomination then to devolve on Alexander Livingstone, the son of his brother, and his heirs of entail His lordship was sent back to Edinburgh, with a letter to the committee of estates, expressive of his majesty's resolution to comply with the wishes of his Scots parliament, but all was rendered abortive by his majesty's declining to afford them full satisfaction in matters of religion In 1647 he waited on the king at London, and obtained from his majesty a grant of the office of sheriff of the county of Stirling In the following year, when the "engagement" for the rescue of the king, then a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, was entered into, the earl was, 11th May 1648, appointed lieutenant-general of the army raised for the purpose, being second in command under the duke of Hamilton On this occasion, he was attended by a body of his Falkirk retainers This army, amounting to about ten thousand foot and four thousand cavalry, marched into England, and on 12th July took Carlisle, of which place the earl of Callendar was appointed governor The Scots, however, were totally routed at Preston in Lancashire, by Cromwell, on the 17th of August, when his lordship escaped in disguise to Holland His Falkirk troop valiantly forced their way through the victorious army, and on their return home they were summoned before the congregation, at the instance of the kirk session, and were publicly "admonished" for being in what was called "the late unlawful engagement" The session record contains the names of seventy-seven of the persons so dealt with, and among these the names of Sir William Livingstone of Westquarter, and of other gentlemen appear [New Statistical Account of Scotland, art Falkirk, p 6] Lord Callendar was one of the persons excepted in Cromwell's act of grace and pardon At the restoration, having no issue of his own, the earl obtained a new patent, of date 21st November 1660, of his titles and estates in favour of his nephew, Alexander Livingstone, second son of Alexander second earl of Linlithgow, and the heirs male of his body, which failing to the second son of George, third earl of Linlithgow Lord Callendar married, in 1633, Margaret, only daughter of James seventh Lord Yester, sister of John first earl of Tweeddale, and widow of Alexander first earl of Dunfermline, high-chancellor of Scotland, but her ladyship had no children to him He died in 1672, and was succeeded by his nephew Alexander

The second earl of Callendar was a zealous covenanter, and a copy of the Solemn League and Covenant is still preserved in Falkirk, bearing his signature, with that of many others On two different occasions the troops of government took possession of Callendar house, near Falkirk, but on the first of these in 1678, a mob from that town put the intruders to flight He married, in 1663, Lady Mary Hamilton, third daughter of the second duke of Hamilton, but by her had no issue He had, however, a natural son, Sir Alexander Livingstone of Glentirran The earl died in 1685, when the titles and estates devolved on Alexander Livingstone, the second son of George third earl of Linlithgow

The third earl of Callendar died in December 1692, leaving, by his wife, Lady Ann Graham, eldest daughter of James second marquis of Montrose, a son, James, the fourth earl, and two daughters

The fourth earl of Callendar, on the death of his uncle George fourth earl of Linlithgow, in August 1695, succeeded to that title [See LINLITHGOW, earl of] His titles and estates were forfeited in consequence of his engaging in the rebellion of 1715 The last earl of Callendar and Linlithgow died in exile on the continent His estate of Callendar was sold about 1720 to the York Buildings Company, whose affairs having become disordered, it was brought to sale in 1783, under the authority of the court of session, and purchased by William Forbes, Esq, merchant in London The titles both of Callendar and Linlithgow are claimed by the baronetted family of Livingstone of that ilk and Westquarter

CAMERON, or CHAMERON, the name of a numerous family or clan in Lochaber, the distinguishing badge of which is the oak Mr Skene, in his history of the Highlanders, appears to take it as an undoubted and established fact that the Camerons are an aboriginal or Celtic clan, but it is not consistent with this theory that the Camerons themselves have a tradition that they were descended from a younger son of the royal family of Denmark, who assisted at the restoration of Fergus the Second in 778, and that their progenitor was called Cameron, from his crooked nose, ("cam shron," the s in shron being silent) a surname which was adopted by his descendants, and that the name appears to have been borne (as will appear in the course of the work) at an early period of history by individuals in the south and west

Notwithstanding, therefore, of this traditionary origin of the name, which is universally accepted by the clan, it does not seem improbable that it was originally French, and not dissimilar to the modern French name of Cambronne In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of 'Robertus de Camburn, dominus de Balgrenach, miles,' who swore fealty to Edward the First of England, 'apud Sanctum Johannem de Perth,' 22d July 1296 There are also, in the same roll, the names of Johannes Cumbrun, who, in other deeds, is designed 'dominus de Balvgrenoch,' and Robertus Camburn de Balnely, all supposed to be the same as Cameron

This tribe, from its earliest history, had its seat in Lochaber, to which, contrary to all tradition, they appear to have come from the south, having obtained from Angus Og, of the family of Islay, a grant of Lochaber in the reign of Robert the Bruce Their more modern possessions of Lochiel and Locharkaig, situated upon the western side of the Lochy, still further in the Celtic or Highland region, were originally granted by the Lord of the Isles to the founder of the Clan Ranald, from whose descendants they passed to the Camerons This clan originally consisted of three septs,—the MacMartins of Letterfinlay, the MacGillonies of Strone, and the MacSorlies of Glennevis, and the tradition is, that it was by intermarriage with the MacMartins of Letterfinlay the eldest branch, that the Camerons of Lochiel who belonged to the second branch, or the MacGillonies of Strone, first acquired the property in Lochaber Being the oldest cadets they assumed the title of Captain of the Clan Cameron Drummond of Hawthornden describes the Camerons as "fiercer than fierceness itself"

The Camerons obtained a charter of the barony of Lochiel and the lands of Garbh-dhoch, in the 13th century, the first of them being styled "de Knoydart" They also possessed extensive property around the castle of Eilean-Donnan, Rossshire of which they were deprived through the hostility of the Gordon family The lands of Glenloy and Locharkaig were purchased by Sir Ewen Cameron in the reign of Charles II These, with the barony of Lochiel and a portion of the lands of Mamore, are still in possession of the family

The Camerons of Lochiel are a family not only distinguished as the head of the clan, but by the personal characteristics of many of their chiefs, of whom Sir Ewen Cameron of Lochiel, above mentioned, and his grandson Donald, "the gentle Lochiel of the '45,' are separately noticed The family of Cameron of Lochiel are further distinguished by having raised, and during many years sustained, the 79th regiment of the line, known as the Cameronian Highlanders This occurred through the patriotic energy of Sir Alan Cameron of Erroch, a cadet of that family, who distinguished himself in the first American war When on detached service he was taken prisoner, and immured for nearly two years in the common gaol of Philadelphia, under the plea that he had been engaged in exciting the native tribes to take up arms in favour of Great Britain In attempting to escape from this confinement, he had both his ankles broken, and he never perfectly recovered from the painful effects of these injuries He was subsequently placed upon half pay, but, aroused by the dangers and alarms of 1793, principally by his personal influence over his countrymen, he, in little more than three months, at his own expense, patriotically raised the 79th, or Cameron Highlanders, of which he was appointed first major-commandant and afterwards (January 1794) lieutenant-colonel

His regiment was afterwards draughted into the 42d and other regiments Sir Alan Cameron, on his return to Scotland, was commissioned by the duke of York to raise the Cameron Highlanders anew, which was done in 1798 in little more than six months His gallant commander was twice severely wounded in the battle of Bergen-op Zoom in 1799 In 1800 at Ferrol, Cadiz, &c, in 1801 in Egypt, in the descent upon Zealand, in Sweden in 1808, and afterwards in the Peninsula, in the same year, the Cameron Highlanders and their commander greatly distinguished themselves

At the battle of Talavera Sir Alan had two horses shot under him He commanded a brigade in the action at Busaco Extreme ill health then compelled him to retire from active service On 25th July 1810 Sir Alan was appointed a major-general, after the peace a K C B, and on 12th August 1819 a lieutenant-general He died March 9, 1828

John Cameron, bishop of Glasgow and chancellor of the kingdom in the latter part of the reign of James I, was of the family of Lochiel In 1422 he was official of Lothian, afterwards confessor and secretary to the earl of Douglas In 1434 he was provost of Lincluden, and the same year "Secretario Regis" In February 1440 we find him keeper of the great seal, and soon after keeper of the privy seal In 1426 he was elected bishop of Glasgow, and in 1428 he was appointed lord chancellor, in office which he held until the end of that reign He built the great tower at the episcopal palace on which his coat armorial and ecclesiastical was placed He established two commissary courts, Hamilton and Campsie, the jurisdiction of which extended over parts of the counties of Dumbarton, Renfrew Stirling, Lanark, and Ayr He is said to have died on Christmas eve, 1446, but his name appears in a safe conduct (inserted in Rymer) dated 30th November 1447 and his successor in the see of Glasgow was appointed in 1446

Charles Cameron son of the Lochiel of the '15, was allowed to return to Britain, and lent his influence to the raising of the Lochiel men for the service of government His son, Donald, was restored to his estates under the general act of amnesty of 1784 The eldest son of the latter, also named Donald, born 25th September 1796, obtained a commission in the Guards in 1814, and fought at Waterloo He retired from the army in 1832, and died 14th December 1858, leaving two sons and four daughters His eldest son, Donald, succeeded as chief of the clan Cameron

The family of Cameron of Fassifern, in Argyleshire, possesses a baronetcy of the United Kingdom, conferred in 1817 on Ewen Cameron of Fassifern, the father of Colonel John Cameron, of the 92d Highlanders, slain at the battle of Quatre Bras, 16th June 1815, while bravely leading on his men for that officer's distinguished military services, with two Highlanders as supporters to his armorial bearings, and several heraldic distinctions indicating the particular services of Colonel Cameron On the death of Sir Ewen in 1828, his second son, Sir Duncan, succeeded to the baronetcy

General Sir Alexander Cameron, K C B, who died in 1850 at his seat of Inverralort house, Inverness-shire, was also an eminent officer, having first entered the army in 1799, when he served under the duke of York in Holland He was the eighth son of Donald Cameron, Esq of Murlugan, by the daughter of Alexander M'Donald, Esq of Achtrichtan, and was born in 1778 In 1800 he was with his regiment at Ferrol, in 1801, in Egypt, where he was severely wounded in the arm and side, in 1807 at Copenhagen, in 1808 at Vimiera, in that and the following year in Spain, in 1813 at Vittoria, till wounded, and in 1814 in Holland At Waterloo he was severely wounded in the throat In 1828 he was appointed deputy-governor of St Mawes, and in 1838 major-general in the army, in which latter year he was created a knight commander of the bath In 1846 he became colonel of the 74th foot He received a medal and two clasps for his services in command of the rifle brigade at Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajoz and Salamanca, and had a pension of five hundred pounds a-year in consideration of his long services and wounds He married in 1818 the only daughter of C M'Donnell, Esq of Barisdale

CAMERON, Sir Ewen, or Evan, of Lochiel, a chief of the clan Cameron, distinguished for his chivalrous character, was born in February 1629 He was called by his followers Mac'onnuill Dhu, or the son of Black Donald, according to the custom of their race, after his father Donald, the chief who preceded him, also Ewen Dhu, or Black Evan, from his own dark complexion He was brought up at Inverary castle, under the guardianship of his kinsman the marquis of Argyle, under whose charge he was placed in his tenth year, being regarded as a hostage for the peaceable behaviour of his clan Argyle endeavoured to instil into his mind the political principles of the covenanters, but it is said that he was converted to the side of the king by the exhortations of Sir Robert Spottiswood, formerly president of the Court of Session, who had been taken at the battle of Philiphaugh in September 1645, and was afterwards executed At the age of eighteen he quitted Inverary castle, with the declared intention of joining the marquis of Montrose, who, however, had previously disbanded his forces, and retired to the Continent Although the royal cause seemed lost, Lochiel kept his clan in arms, and was able to protect his estate from the incursions of Cromwell's troops

In 1652 he was one of the first to join the insurrection under the earl of Glencairn when that nobleman raised the royal standard in the Highlands, and for nearly two years greatly distinguished himself at the head of his clan, in a series of encounters with General Lilburne, Colonel

Morgan, and others of Cromwell's officers In a sharp skirmish which took place between Lord Glencairn and Colonel Lilburne at Braemar, Lochiel gallantly maintained a pass with the defence of which he had been intrusted, and thereby saved Glencairn's army His services were rewarded by a letter of thanks from Charles the Second, dated at Chantilly, the 3d of November, 1653

In 1654 Lochiel continued to aid Glencairn in a fresh insurrection headed by him Being himself opposed to Morgan, a brave and enterprising officer, Lochiel was often hard pressed, and sometimes nearly overpowered, but by his courage and presence of mind, he was always able to extricate himself from positions of the utmost difficulty and danger

Monk was now commander-in-chief of the parliamentary forces in Scotland, and he resolved to establish a garrison at Inverlochy, now Fort William, with the view of reducing the royalist clans in the neighbourhood Lochiel lay in wait on a hill to the north of the fort, with thirty-eight of his clan, and observing a body of men about to land at a place called Achdalew, to cut down his woods, and to carry off his cattle, he proceeded along in a line with the vessels, under cover of the woods, until he saw the English soldiers disembark, one hundred and forty of them having axes, hatchets, and other working implements, while the rest remained under arms, to protect their operations Notwithstanding the disparity of their forces, Lochiel at once gave orders to advance He ordered his brother Allan to be bound to a tree, to prevent his taking any part in the conflict, and so not deprive his clan of a chief, should he himself be cut off But Allan prevailed on a little boy, who was left to attend him, to unloose his cords, and soon plunged into the thickest of the fight The Camerons rushed on the enemy, discharged against them a destructive shower of shot and arrows, and before they could recover from their surprise attacked them with their broadswords The combat was long and obstinate At last the English, retreating slowly, yet contesting every step of ground, and with their faces towards their assailants, were giving way when Lochiel sent two men and a piper round the flank, to sound the pibroch, raise the war-cry of the clan, and fire their muskets, as if a fresh party of Camerons had arrived, hoping thereby to create a panic among the English soldiers But this only rendered the latter more desperate, and instead of throwing down their arms they fought more resolutely than before, as they expected no quarter They were, at length, completely borne down, and fled, pursued to the sea, when those who had been left in the boats received the fugitives, and firing at the Camerons drove them back, the chief himself advancing till he was chin-deep in the water In the course of the struggle an English officer of great size and strength singled out Lochiel, and as they were pretty equally matched, they fought for some time apart from the general battle Lochiel succeeded in knocking the sword out of his adversary's hand, but the Englishman closing on him, bore him to the ground, and fell upon him, the officer being uppermost The latter was in the act of reaching for his sword, which lay near, but when extending his neck in the same direction, Lochiel, collecting his energies, grasped his enemy by the collar, and springing at his throat, seized it with his teeth, and gave so sure and effectual a bite that the officer died almost instantly Of the English the number killed in this encounter exceeded that of Lochiel's men engaged in it, in the proportion of three to one, whilst only seven of the Camerons fell

By this and similar attacks, now on the garrison at Inverlochy, now in conjunction with General Middleton, he harassed the forces of the Protector with general success After the defeat of Middleton in July 1654, and his retreat to the continent, Lochiel was the only chief who remained opposed to Cromwell The English, desirous to have peace with this formidable chief, made various overtures to him to that effect, but without success, until he was informed that no express renunciation of the king's authority or oath to the existing government would be required of him, but only his word of honour to live in peace An agreement on this basis took place about the end of that year Reparation was made to Lochiel for the wood cut down by the garrison of Inverlochy, and to his tenants for all the losses they had sustained from the troops; while a full indemnity was granted for all acts of depredation and for all crimes committed by his men All tithes, cess, and public burdens which had not been paid, were remitted to his clan

In 1680 the last wolf known to have existed wild in Great Britain was slain by the hand of this brave and hardy chief in the district of Lochaber In 1681, when the duke of York, afterwards James the Second, was residing at Holyrood, as commissioner to the parliament of Scotland, Lochiel took a journey to Edinburgh to solicit the pardon of one of his clan, who, while in command of a party of Camerons, had fired by mistake on a party of Athole men, and killed several The duke received him with great distinction, and granted his request On this occasion he was knighted by the duke After knighting him, the duke presented his sword to Sir Ewen, to keep as a remembrance

In 1689 Sir Ewen joined the viscount of Dundee when he raised the standard of King James General Mackay had, by the orders of King William, offered him a title and a considerable sum of money, apparently on the condition of his remaining neutral, but this offer he rejected with disdain Though then far advanced in years, he distinguished himself with his usual heroism, and had a conspicuous share in the victory at Killiecrankie Before the battle commenced he spoke to each of his men individually, and took them promise that they would conquer or die On first seeing Dundee's force, General Mackay's army had raised a kind of shout, on which Lochiel exclaimed, "Gentlemen, the day is our own, I am the oldest commander in the army, and I have always observed something ominous or fatal in such a dull, heavy, feeble noise as that which the enemy has just made in their shout" Encouraged by this prognostication of victory, the Highlanders, with their usual impetuosity, rushed on the troops of Mackay, and in half an hour gained the victory

In this battle Lochiel was attended by the son of his foster brother, who followed him everywhere like his shadow Shortly after the commencement of the action the chief missed this faithful adherent from his side, and turning round to look for him, he saw him lying on his back in a dying state, with his breast pierced by an arrow With his last breath he informed Sir Ewen that observing an enemy, a Highlander, in General Mackay's army, aiming at him with a bow and arrow from the rear, he sprung behind him to cover him, and thus, like his father, received in his own body the death-wound intended for his chief

After the battle of Killiecrankie, Sir Ewen Cameron retired to Lochaber, leaving the command of his men to his eldest son He survived till the year 1719, when he died at the age of ninety Notwithstanding all the battles and personal encounters in which he had been engaged, he never lost a drop of blood, or received a wound He was thrice married, and had four sons and eleven daughters —Stewart's Sketches of the Highlanders and Highland Regiments —Browne's History of the Highlands and Highland Clans

CAMERON, DONALD, of Lochiel, grandson of the preceding, is celebrated in history for the important part he took in the rebellion of 1745 Though called young Lochiel by the Highlanders, from his father being still alive, he was at that period rather advanced in life His father, John Cameron of Lochiel, eldest son of Sir Ewen, had joined the earl of Mar, when that nobleman raised the standard of the Chevalier in 1715, for which he was attainted He died in Flanders in 1748

Donald, his eldest son, succeeded, in consequence of the attainder of his father, to the estate, on the death of his grandfather, in 1719 He was styled captain of the clan Cameron, a title given to the leader or next in succession who commands a clan in absence, or during the minority, of the hereditary chief Previous to the landing of Prince Charles in the Highlands, the Chevalier de St George, sensible of the great influence which young Lochiel possessed among the clans, had opened a correspondence with him, and invested him with full powers to negotiate with his friends in Scotland, on the subject of his restoration He was one of the seven chiefs and noblemen who, in 1740, signed a bond of association to restore the Chevalier Upon the failure of the expedition of 1740 he had urged the prince to get another fitted out, but was against any attempt being made without foreign assistance On the prince's landing, Lochiel was summoned with other chiefs to meet Charles at Borodale

As the prince had brought neither troops nor arms with him, Lochiel went to the interview determined to dissuade him from making any rash attempt On his way he called at the house of his brother, John Cameron of Fassifern, who, on being told the object of his journey, advised him not to proceed to Boradale, but to impart his mind to the prince by letter "No," said Lochiel, "I ought at least to wait upon him, and give my reasons for declining to join him, which admit of no reply" "Brother," said Fassifern, "I know you better than you know yourself If this prince once sets eyes upon you he will make you do whatever he pleases" Finding all his arguments ineffectual to prevail on Lochiel to take up arms in his cause, Charles declared his firm determination to take the field, how small soever might be the number of his adherents "Lochiel," said he, "who, my father has often told me, was our firmest friend, may stay at home, and from the newspapers learn the fate of his prince" This appeal was irresistible "No!" exclaimed Lochiel, "I'll share the fate of my prince, and so shall every man over whom nature or fortune has given me any power" Had Lochiel remained steadfast in his determination not to join the Pretender without foreign aid, the other chiefs would have also refused, but his yielding led to their collecting with their followers round the prince's standard, and thus he may be said to have been the chief cause of the insurrection that followed

Although possessed of an estate which at that time yielded scarcely seven hundred pounds a-year, Lochiel brought fourteen hundred of his clan into the rebellion, and during his brief campaign he displayed much of the heroism and bravery of his grandfather, Sir Ewen Cameron He acquired the respect of both parties, and obtained the name of the "gentle Lochiel" On all occasions he was honourably distinguished by his endeavours to mitigate the severities of war, and deter the insurgents from acts of vindictive violence, or insubordination As an example to the rest he even ordered one of his own men, caught in the act of theft, to be shot He led on his clan with great gallantry at the battle of Preston, as he subsequently did at the battle of Falkirk He accompanied Prince Charles in his march into England and during the retreat from Derby, and was severely wounded in both ankles at the battle of Culloden, when he was borne from the field by his two henchmen After that disastrous defeat, he skulked in his own country for about two months, and then sought an asylum among the Braes of Rannoch, where he was attended by Sir Stewart Threipland, an Edinburgh physician, for the cure of his wounds He afterwards lurked for some time in Badenoch with Cluny MacPherson, and some other fugitives Here in the course of his wanderings he was joined by the prince, though not without great risk and danger on both sides They took up, for a time, their residence in a hut called the Cage, curiously constructed in a deep thicket on the side of a mountain called Benalder, under which name is included a great forest or chase, the property of Cluny In this Cage they lived in tolerable security and enjoyed a rude plenty, which the prince had not hitherto known during his five months' wanderings On the 20th September 1746 two French frigates having appeared off the coast, Lochiel embarked along with the prince, as did nearly a hundred others of the relics of his party, and safely arrived in France, where the king gave him the command of the regiment of Albany, formed of his expatriated countrymen, with the power of naming his own officers He was thus enabled, though his estate was forfeited, to live according to his rank He died in 1748, and a tribute to his memory appeared in the Scots Magazine for December of that year He married Anne, daughter of Sir James Campbell, fifth baronet of Auchinbreck, by whom he had three sons and four daughters His eldest son Charles, who returned to Scotland in 1759, obtained the restoration of the family estate, which is now in the possession of his descendant

CAMERON, JOHN, one of the most famous theologians of the seventeenth century, was born, of respectable parents, at Glasgow, about 1579 He received his education in his native city, and after completing the ordinary course of study, he read lectures on the Greek language, that is, he taught Greek, in Glasgow university, for a year In 1600 he went to Bordeaux in France, and having made the acquaintance of two protestant clergymen of that city, one of whom was his coun

tryman, Gilbert Primrose, he was, through their recommendation, appointed a regent or professor in the then newly founded college of Bergerac, as teacher of the learned languages He was so deeply skilled in the Greek especially, that one of his pupils, the learned Cappel, affirms that he spoke it with as much fluency and elegance as any other person could speak Latin Soon after his settlement at Bergerac, he was, by the duke de Bouillon, appointed a professor of philosophy in the university of Sedan, where he remained for two years He then resigned his professorship, and visited Paris, after which he returned to Bordeaux, with the intention of studying for the ministry

In the beginning of 1601, Mr Cameron was nominated one of the students of divinity who were maintained at the expense of the protestant church at Bordeaux, and who for the period of four years were at liberty to prosecute their studies in any protestant seminary During this time he acted as tutor to the two sons of Caligñon, chancellor of Navarre After spending one year with them at Paris, they went to Geneva, where they remained the next two years, and thence removed to Heidelberg, in which city they resided for nearly twelve months A series of theses, 'De triplici Dei cum Homine Fœdere, which he publicly maintained in this university, on 4th April 1608, have been printed among his works In the same year a vacancy having occurred in the protestant church at Bordeaux, by the death of one of the ministers, he was recalled to that town, and appointed colleague to his friend and countryman Primrose

In 1617 two sea captains were at Bordeaux condemned to death for piracy, as they professed the reformed faith, Cameron attended them in their last moments, and afterwards published a letter entitled 'Constance, Foy, et Résolution à la mort des Capitaines Blanquet et Gaillard,' which by the parliament of Bordeaux, in its popish animosity to protestantism, was ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common executioner In the following year he was appointed professor of divinity in the university of Saumur, the principal seminary of the French protestants, where he had for a colleague Dr Duncan, another of his learned countrymen, who were then very numerous in France The high reputation which he had acquired by such of his works as had already been published, was now increased by his academical lectures In 1620 he engaged in a formal disputation which lasted for four days, on the doctrines of grace and free will, with Daniel Tilenus, a native of Silesia, who had adopted the theological opinions of Arminius An account of this Amica Collatio was printed at Leyden in the subsequent year The theological faculty of that university were not satisfied with some of Cameron's explanations, and when Rivet, as dean of the faculty, communicated to him their dissent, he defended his opinions in a brief answer The civil wars in France in 1620 had the effect of dispersing nearly all the students of the university of Saumur, on which Cameron, with his family, removed to England For a short time he read private lectures on divinity in London, and in 1622 he was appointed by King James principal of the university of Glasgow, in the room of Robert Boyd of Trochrig, removed in consequence of his firm adherence to presbyterianism Cameron, on the other hand, was more inclined to favour episcopacy, and it seems that among other doctrines taught by him was the dangerous one of passive obedience, which was not calculated to render him popular with the presbyterian students of those days After teaching divinity for about a year, he resigned his situation According to Calderwood, he "was so misliked by the people, that he was forced, not long after, to remove out of Glasco" [Hist vol vii p 567] He returned to Saumur, where he was only permitted to read private lectures

The province of Anjou, in 1623, made an application to the national Synod of Charenton, that he might be reinstated in his professorship, but the king, in a letter to the commissioner to this synod, declared against his appointment to any ministerial or academical office in France, and the request was, in consequence, not granted, but on a representation by Cameron to the same synod, that he was then without employment, and destitute of any adequate means for the support of his family, the synod voted him a donation of a thousand livres In the following year (1624) he was permitted to accept of the professorship of divinity in the university of Montauban, whither he removed before the close of the year The disputes between the protestants and romanists were at this period carried very high, and having opposed the duke de Rohan, who endeavoured to induce the people of Montauban to take up arms, Cameron was attacked in the streets by an unknown miscreant, supposed to have been a Catholic zealot, and severely assaulted, after languishing for some time he died at Montauban in 1625

He was twice married By his first wife, Susan Bernard of Tonneins on the Garonne, whom he had married in 1611, he had a son, born at London 10th May 1622, and four daughters, but the son and the eldest daughter died before their father Their mother having died of consumption, he married, secondly, at Montauban, Susan Thomas, with whom he only lived a few months, and who had no child The maintenance of his surviving family was undertaken by the protestant churches of France

"With respect to his person," says Dr Irving, in his Life of Cameron, "he was of the middle size, somewhat inclining to a spare habit, sound but not robust in his constitution His hair was yellow, his eyes were brilliant, and the expression of his countenance was lively and pleasant He appeared to be always immersed in deep meditation, and was somewhat negligent in his apparel, and careless in his gait, but in his manners he was very agreeable, and although he was not without a considerable share of irritability his anger was easily appeased, and he was very ready to acknowledge his own faults" [Irving's Lives of Scotish Writers, vol i page 341] "From this distinguished person," he adds, "a very considerable party among the French protestants derived the name of Camerontes They endeavoured to explain the doctrine of grace and free will so as to establish the conclusion, that no one is absolutely excluded from a participation in the benefits of Christ's sufferings, though all are not enabled to embrace the offered salvation Their opinions on this subject they attempted to reconcile with those of Calvin Those who held such opinions were likewise denominated Universalists They were sometimes described as Amyraldists, from the name of Amyraut, who had been Cameron's pupil at Saumur, and was afterwards a professor of divinity in that university" [Ibid page 345] In fact Amyraut received from Cameron those peculiar theories which he developed in his 'System of Universal Grace' Sir Thomas Urquhart says that because of his universal reading, Cameron was called "The Walking Library"

He wrote many Latin poems, which have not been preserved His most considerable works were published by others, from copies taken by his pupils

Opera Being his collected theological works, with a sketch of the author's life and character, written by Cappel Genev 1642, 1658, fol

CAMERON, Richard, a zealous preacher and martyr of the Church of Scotland of the seventeenth century, was the son of a small shopkeeper at Falkland in Fife, and at first was schoolmaster and precentor of his native parish under the episcopalian clergyman He was afterwards converted by the field preachers, and persuaded by the celebrated John Welch to accept a licence to preach the gospel, which was conferred upon him in the House of Haughhead, Roxburghshire, having for some time resided in that part of the country as preceptor in the family of Sir Walter Scott of Harden From the freedom with which he asserted the spiritual independence of the Church of Scotland, he excited the hostility of that portion of the presbyterian clergy who had taken advantage of the act of indulgence of 1672, and in 1677 he was reproved for his boldness at a meeting of them held at Edinburgh He afterwards went to Holland, where his great zeal and energetic character made a strong impression upon the ministers who were then living in exile in that country At his ordination, Mr Ward retained his hand for some time on the young preacher's head, and exclaimed, "Behold, all ye beholders, here is the head of a faithful minister and servant of Jesus Christ, who shall lose the same for his Master's interest, and it shall be set up before the sun and the moon in the view of the world" In 1680 he returned to Scotland, and in spite of the severe measures of the government, immediately began the practice of field preaching The cruel and tyrannical proceedings of the executive against him and the small party with which he was connected, and who considered him their head, led him to take a bold and desperate step On the 20th of June 1680, in company with about twenty other persons, well armed, he entered the little remote burgh of Sanquhar, and made public proclamation at the Cross, that he and those who adhered to him renounced their allegiance to the king, Charles the Second, on account of his having abused the government, at the same time declaring war against him and his brother, the duke of York, whose succession to the throne they avowed their resolution to resist A reward of five thousand merks was immediately offered by the privy council for Cameron's head, and three thousand merks for the heads of the rest, and parties of soldiers were immediately sent out to arrest them The little band kept together in arms for a month in the mountainous country between Nithsdale and Ayrshire On the 20th of July they were surprised on Ardsmoss by Bruce of Earlshall, with a party of horse and foot much superior to them in numbers Cameron, who was believed by his followers to have a gift of prophecy, is said to have that morning washed his hands with particular care, in the expectation that they were immediately to become a public spectacle His party at the sight of the enemy gathered closely around him, and he uttered a short prayer, in which he thrice repeated the expression, "Lord! spare the green, and take the ripe!" He then said to his brother, "Come! let us fight it out to the last!" After a brief skirmish, in which they were allowed even by their enemies to have fought with great bravery, Bruce's party, from their superiority of numbers, gained the victory

Cameron was among the slain, and his head and hands, after being cut off, were carried to Edinburgh, along with the prisoners, among whom was the celebrated Hackstoun of Rathillet The father of Cameron was at this time in prison for nonconformity, and the head and hands of his son were shown to him with the question, "Did he know to whom they belonged?" The old man seized the bloody relics with all the eagerness of parental affection, and, kissing them fervently, exclaimed, "I know, I know them, they are my son's, my own dear son's, it is the Lord, good is the will of the Lord, who cannot wrong me or mine, but has made goodness and mercy to follow us all our days" The head and hands were then fixed upon the Netherbow Port, the fingers pointing upward, in mockery of the attitude of prayer The body was buried with the rest of the slain on the spot where they fell at Ardsmoss, where a plain monument was in better times erected over them The small but zealous body of presbyterians who adhered to Cameron in his life, were from him designated Cameronians, a name which is sometimes given to the members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church

CAMERON, Hugh, a person of humble origin, yet deserving a place in this work as one of the greatest local benefactors to the Breadalbane district of Perthshire, was born in 1705, and was no more than a country millwright After acquiring a knowledge of his business, he settled at Shiam of Lawers, where he built the first lint-mill that ever was erected in the Highlands of Scotland Before his time only the distaff and spindle were used for spinning lint and wool in that part of the country, and he was not only the first who constructed spinning-wheels and jack-reels in Breadalbane, but he was likewise the first who taught the people there how to use them The number of lint-mills afterwards erected by him throughout the Highlands cannot be reckoned at less than a hundred In short, almost all the lint-mills in the Highlands of Perthshire, and many in the counties of Inverness, Caithness, and Sutherland, were of his erecting He also constructed the first barley-mill that was built upon the north side of the Forth, for which he was highly complimented by Maca Ghlasarich,—Campbell the bard,—in a very popular song, called 'Moladh di Eobhan Camashran Muillen hin,' that is, 'A song in praise of Hugh Cameron, the lint miller' This singular character died in 1817, at the extraordinary age of 112 years Though he could only be called a country-wright, he was a man of uncommon genius, of great integrity, and of a very shrewd and independent mind

CAMERON, William, the Rev, author of the excellent congratulatory song on the restoration of the forfeited estates, 1784, inserted in Johnson's Musical Museum, was born in 1751, and having studied for the Church of Scotland, was in the usual time licensed to preach the gospel In 1785 he became minister of the parish of Kirknewton His first work, a 'Collection of Poems,' printed at Edinburgh in 1780, 12mo, was anonymous In 1781, along with the Rev John Logan, of Leith, and the Rev Dr John Morison, minister of Canisbay, in the county of Caithness, (who died in 1798,) Mr Cameron rendered material assistance in preparing the collection of Paraphrases now in use in the Church of Scotland He died at the manse of Kirknewton on the 17th of November 1811, in the 60th year of his age, and the 26th of his ministry A posthumous volume of poems was published by subscription at Edinburgh in 1813, 8vo His song, on the restoration of the forfeited estates, beginning "As o'er the Highland hills I hied," was adapted to the fine old air, called "The Haughs o' Cromdale"—Notes to Johnson's Musical Museum edited by W Stenhouse

Campbell, a surname of great antiquity in Scotland, and of frequent occurrence in Scottish history It is stated by Pinkerton to have been derived from a Norman knight, named de Campo Bello, who came to England with William the Conqueror As respects the latter part of the statement, it is to be observed that in the list of all the knights who composed the army of the Conqueror on the occasion of his invasion of England, and which is known by the name of the Roll of Battle-Abbey, the name of Campo Bello is not to be found But it does not follow, as recent writers have assumed, that a knight of that name may not have come over to England at a later period, either of his reign or of that his successors Mr Pinkerton has associated with this account of the origin of the name a theory that the Campbells were not only not Celts but Goths, in which, however, he is assuredly mistaken

It has been alleged in opposition to this account that in the oldest form of writing the name, it is spelled Cambel or Kambel, and it is so found in many ancient documents, but these were written by parties not acquainted with the individuals whose name they record, as in the manuscript account of the battle of Halidon Hill, by an unknown English writer, preserved in the British Museum, in the Ragman Roll, which was compiled by an English clerk, and in Wyntoun's Chronicle There is no evidence, however, that at any period it was written by any of the family otherwise than as Campbell, notwithstanding the extraordinary diversity that occurs in the spelling of other names by their holders, as shown by Lord Lindsay in the account of his clan, and the invariable employment of the letter p by the Campbells themselves would be of itself a strong argument for the southern origin of the name, did there not exist, in the record of the parliament of Robert Bruce held in 1320, the name of the then head of the family, entered as Sir Nigel de Campo Bello

The writers, however, who attempt to sustain the fabulous tales of the sennachies, assign a very different origin to the name It is personal, say they, "like that of some others of the Highland clans, being composed of the words cam, bent or arched, and beul, mouth, this having been the most prominent feature of the great ancestor of the clan, Diarmid O'Dwhin, or O'Dwin, a brave warrior celebrated in traditional story, who was contemporary with the heroes of Ossian In the Gaelic language his descendants are called Siol Diarmid, the offspring or race of Diarmid"

Besides the manifest improbability of this origin on other grounds, two considerations may be adverted to, each of them conclusive

First, It is known to all who have examined ancient genealogies, that among the Celtic races personal distinctives never have become hereditary Malcolm Cannore, Donald Bane, Rob Roy, or Ivan Dhu, were, with many other names, distinctive of personal qualities, but none of them descended, or could do so, to the children of those who acquired them

Secondly, It is no less clear that, until after what is called the Saxon Conquest had been completely effected, no hereditary surnames were in use among the Celts of Scotland, nor by the chiefs of Norwegian descent who governed in Argyle and the Isles This circumstance is pointed out by Tytler in his remarks upon the early population of Scotland, in the chapter in his second volume of the History of Scotland The domestic slaves attached to the possessions of the church and of the barons have their genealogies engrossed in ancient charters of conveyances and confirmation copied by him The names are all Celtic, but in no one instance does the son, even when bearing a second or distinctive name, follow that of his father

According to the genealogists of the family of Argyle, their predecessors, on the female side, were possessors of Lochow, in Argyleshire, as early as 404 In the eleventh century, Gillespic (or Archibald) Campbell, a gentleman of Anglo-Norman lineage, acquired the lordship of Lochow, by marriage with Eva, daughter and heiress of Paul O'Dwin, lord of Lochow, denominated Paul Insporran from his being the king's treasurer

Sir Colin Campbell of Lochow, sixth in descent from this personage, distinguished himself by his warlike actions, and was knighted by King Alexander the Third in 1280 In 1291 he was one of the nominees on the part of Robert

Bruce in the contest for the Scottish crown He added largely to his estates, and on account of his great prowess he obtained the surname of More or great, from him the chief of the Argyle family is in Gaelic styled Mac Chaillan More

According to the universally received opinion for several centuries, the distinctive Mac is understood to imply son, or the son of, and Mac Chaillan would accordingly imply the son of Chaillan But it is not anywhere said or supposed that Sir Colin's father or any of his immediate ancestors bore the name of Chaillan He is described as Dominus Colinus Camp-bell Miles filius Dominus Gileaspec Camp-bel, in an acquisition referred to in a charter of the monks of Newbattle abbey of the lands of Symontoun in Ayrshire, the reddendo of which Sir Colin made over to that abbey in 1293 The father of this Gillespic is said to have been Duncan Campbell, married to a lady of the name of Sommerville, of the house of Carnwith, and the father of Duncan, an Archibald Campbell, but there is no authentic instance of their being styled of Lochow Other instances occur where the prefix Mac is used without signifying son, as, for example, in Macbeth, who is not known to have been the son of Beth, and whose son Madoch did not bear that name, and also in the genealogies of the Celtic slaves already referred to quoted by Tytler in his history, where the word Mac occurs in the name of a son which is not the same as that of his father It is also found in compound words, as Macpherson, Macfarquharson, &c, where the English word son is also incorporated We are therefore led to look for another explanation of this frequent prefix It is not found in Welsh names In the few Irish names in which it appears, a Scotch origin can frequently be traced, and it is often used in the form of Mag, as Magune, Magmnes, as it is also along with the C in the Scotch names MacGlashan, MacGillivray, &c In the oldest Irish records the word Mic occurs, and is translated son, and this mic is frequently found combined with Mac, as Mic Mac There is a curious instance in Irish history of the prefix Mac being employed to signify great or big, as in a chief in the reign of Elizabeth, who is said to have been called Mac Manus, great hand, from the length of his arms It is not therefore improbable that the word mac or mag may have originally been a contraction of Magnus great or big, employed in the first instance by the priests, the only chroniclers and namegivers in the corrupted Latin of those ages, either as an independent personal distinctive, or to designate, among several of the same name, the individual of greatest size and strength, and which in later ages, when surnames came into use, might be continued by their descendants to distinguish them from the children of others of the same name, on whom such a personal distinctive had not been bestowed It may be remarked, that in this sense it sometimes occurs in British or Welsh, as well as in Celtic or Irish, topography, as Mackinleith, the great place on the Leath, a hundred and town of great antiquity in Montgomeryshire, Magmnis, the great island, the ancient name of the peninsula between Lough Strangford and Dundrum, also, corrupted into Muck or Mug, as Mucross, the great cross, and in composition as Carrickmacross, the rock of the great cross It is probable that it has been used in other countries in composition of names, as Magellan, or Magalhaen, the great stranger, the name of the discoverer of Cape Horn

On this supposition also the word Mac Chaillan appears to be the Celtic orthography, according to their pronunciation of Mag Allan or Alune, the latter a word which is not only a frequent name in the Romance language (with which the Norman-French, as spoken in Scotland in the twelfth century is nearly identified), but was also used in that language to signify what that word actually meant, viz, alcanus, stranger, or alien, and Mac Caillane would thus imply the tall or large-bodied stranger The appellative mor or more, although frequently used in modern Celtic, in a physical sense, as great, was in earlier times more properly a distinctive of superior rank, as maormor, the ancient name for the Pictish chiefs, viz, chief of the heads (maors, or mayors, a corrupted Gotho-Latin term,) of the tribes This term mor is still preserved in the Spanish and Portuguese languages, which are descended from the Romance, to express such a distinction of rank or order, as alcayde mor, the head alcade, capitan mor, head captain, an officer equivalent to commander-in-chief of the military force in Portuguese colonies, thesaureno mor, head treasurer, &c, &c The identity of many of the Romanç ero terms preserved in peninsular languages, with those occurring in the earliest forms of Celtic words, presents matter of speculation to the philologist and antiquary, but may perhaps be accounted for by the earlier prevalence of that tongue and its larger use also in the north of Scotland than even the Saxon itself, as the conquerors under Canmore and his descendants were chiefly of that race, and in mixing with the natives, they may have retained a number of these Gotho-Latin terms whilst adopting along with them in the course of that amalgamation, the general idiom of the conquered people

It is therefore suggested that the Celtic name Mac Chaillan Mor, is in reality a compound of corrupted Latin and Romance words implying the great or tall stranger chief, a suggestion which singularly aids the opinion which, after considerable attention to the matter, we have formed, viz that the first of the Campbells or Campbellos was a military knight, one of whose ancestors may have assisted Alexander the Second in his conquest of Argyle, and received, along with the Steward of Scotland, who obtained all Bute and Cowal on the same occasion, the adjacent lands of Lochow as his fee or reward, when these were forfeited by the rebellion or death of the original possessor, probably receiving the hand of the daughter of the latter as a further security for his acquisition Whether this latter circumstance occurred or not, it was not until a later age, when the fourth earl of Argyle had acquired the jurisdiction over that region, that the Norman bearing gyronny of eight for Campbell, came to be quartered in the armorial bearings of the family, with the galley having furled sails, oars in action, and flag and pendants flying for the lordship of the Isles The surrounding people, compelled to acquiesce in this arrangement, would naturally describe a knight, or the son of a knight, so injected into their midst by the appellation of the great stranger chief In the account given of the origin of the name Campbell, by Jacob in his English peerage, under their English title of Sundridge, vol ii p 698, London, 1767, there is a statement apparently contradictory of the foregoing theory, viz, that the name Mac Chaillan, or as rendered by him Mac Callin, is that of Sir Colin himself, "so called by the Irish" Admitting this to be the case, although its similarity is not apparent, its only effect would be that instead of the great stranger chief, the distinctive Mac Caillan More would mean Colin the great or tall chief

Sir Colin Campbell had a quarrel with a powerful neighbour of his, the Lord of Lorn, and after he had defeated him, pursuing the victory too eagerly, he was slain (in 1294, according to Jacob in the account referred to) at a place called the String of Cowal, where a great obelisk was erected over his grave This is said to have occasioned bitter feuds betwixt the houses of Lochow and Lorn for a long period of years, which were put an end to by the marriage of the daughter of Ergadia, the Celtic proprietor of Lorn, with John

Stewart of Innermeath about 1386 Sir Colin married a lady of the name of Sinclair, by whom he had five sons

Sir Niel Campbell of Lochow, his eldest son, swore fealty to Edward the First, but afterwards joined Robert the Bruce, and fought by his side in almost every encounter, from the defeat at Methven to the victory at Bannockburn King Robert rewarded his services by giving him his sister, the Lady Mary Bruce, in marriage, and conferring on him the lands forfeited by the earl of Athol Sir Niel, who was also styled Mac Chaillan More, was one of the commissioners sent to York in 1314, to negotiate a peace with the English His next brother Donald was the progenitor of the Campbells of Loudon [See LOUDON, earl of] His three younger brothers, Dugal, Arthur, and Duncan, all swore fealty to King Edward in 1296, but also became devoted adherents of Robert the Bruce, and shared his favours By his wife, the Lady Mary Bruce, Sir Niel had three sons, Sir Colin, John, created earl of Athol, upon the forfeiture of David de Strathbogie, the eleventh earl, [see ATHOL, earl of,] and Dugal

Sir Colin, the eldest son, obtained a charter from his uncle, King Robert Bruce, of the lands of Lochow and Ardscodniche, dated at Arbroath, 10th February, 1316, in which he is designated Colinus filius Nigelli Cambel, militis In 1316, he accompanied King Robert to Ireland to assist in placing his brother, Edward Bruce, on the throne of that kingdom Sir Colin assisted the steward of Scotland in 1334, in the surprise and recovery of the castle of Dunoon, in Cowal, belonging to the Steward, but held by the English and the adherents of Edward Baliol, and put all within it to the sword, a feat which gave the first turn of fortune in favour of King David Bruce As a reward Sir Colin was made hereditary governor of the castle of Dunoon, and had the grant of certain lands for the support of his dignity Wyntoun states that it was his brother Dugal who did this service, but Crawford has shown that this is wrong Sir Colin died about 1340 By his wife, a daughter of the house of Lennox, he had three sons and a daughter, namely, Sir Gillespic or Archibald, John, from whom the Campbells of Barbreck and Succoth, and other families of the name, are said to be descended, Dugal, who joined Edward Baliol, and in consequence his estates in Cowal were forfeited by King David the Second, and given to his eldest brother, and Alicia, married to Alan Lauder of Hatton

The eldest son, Sir Gillespic or Archibald, who added largely to the family possessions, was twice married, first to a lady of the family of Menteith, and, secondly, to Mary, daughter of Sir John Lamont, and had a son, Sir Colin Campbell of Lochow who married Margaret second daughter of Sir John Drummond of Stobhall, sister of Annabella, queen of Robert the Third He had three sons, Duncan, Colin, and David, and a daughter, married to Duncan Macfarlane of Arrochar Colin, the second son, was designed of Ardkinglass, and of his family the Campbells of Ardentinny, Dunoon, Carrick, Skipnish, Blythswood, Shawfield, Rachan, Auchwillan, and Dergachie, are branches

Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow, the eldest son, was one of the hostages in 1424, under the name of Duncan lord of Argyle, for the payment of the sum of forty thousand pounds (equivalent to four hundred thousand pounds of our money) for the expense of King James the First's maintenance during his long imprisonment in England, when Sir Duncan was found to be worth fifteen hundred marks a-year He was the first of the family to assume the designation of Argyle By King James he was appointed one of his privy council, and constituted his justiciary and lieutenant within the shire of Argyle He became a lord of parliament in 1445, under the title of Lord Campbell He died in 1453, and was buried at Kilmun He married, first, Marjory or Mariota Stewart, daughter of Robert duke of Albany, governor of Scotland In Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, there are portraits of both the first Lord Campbell and his wife, of which the following are woodcuts

By his first wife he had three sons, Celestine, who died before him, Archibald, who also predeceased him, but left a son, and Colin, who was the first of Glenorchy, and ancestor of the Breadalbane family, [see BREADALBANE, earl and marquis of, ante, p 876] Sir Duncan married, secondly, Margaret, daughter of Sir John Stewart of Blackhall and Auchingown, natural son of Robert the Third, by whom, also, he had three sons, namely, Duncan, who, according to Crawford, was the ancestor of the house of Auchinbreck, of whom are the Campbells of Glencardel, Glensaddel, Kildurkland, Kilmore, Wester Keuns, Kilberry, and Dana, Niel progenitor, according to Crawford, of the Campbells of Ellengreg and Ormidale, and Arthur or Archibald, ancestor of the Campbells of Ottar, now extinct It is said that the Campbells of Auchinbreck and their cadets, also Ellengreg and Ormadale descend from this the youngest son, and not from his brothers

The first Lord Campbell was succeeded by his grandson Colin, the son of his second son Archibald He acquired part of the lordship of Campbell in the parish of Dollar, by marrying the eldest of the three daughters of John Stewart, third lord of Lorn and Innermeath He did not, as is generally stated, acquire by this marriage any part of the lordship of Lorn (which passed to Walter, brother of John, the fourth Lord Innermeath and heir of entail), but obtained that lordship by exchange of the lands of Baldoning and Innerdoning &c in Perthshire, with the said Walter In 1457 he was created earl of Argyle He was one of the commissioners for negotiating a truce with King Edward the Fourth of England in 1463, and in 1465 was appointed, with Lord Boyd, justiciary of Scotland which office he filled for many years by himself after the fall of his colleague In 1470 he was created baron of Lorn, and in the following year he was appointed one of the commissioners for settling the treaty of alliance with King Edward the Fourth of England, by which James, prince of Scotland, was affianced to Cecilia Edward's youngest daughter He was also one of the commissioners sent to France to renew the treaty with that crown in 1484, and he eventually became lord-high-chancellor of Scotland In 1475 this nobleman was appointed to prosecute a decree of forfeiture against John, earl of Ross and lord of the Isles, and in 1481 he received a grant of many lands in Knapdale, along with the keeping of Castle Sweyn, which had previously been held by the lord of the Isles He died in 1493

The manner in which the lordship of Campbell and Castle Campbell in the parish of Dollar came into the possession of the family of Argyle, is detailed in the New Statistical Account of Scotland with considerable research, Isabella Stewart, supposed to be the eldest daughter of John third Lord Innermeath, and first countess of Argyle, inherited about 1460 one-third of the lands of Dollar and Gloom, supposed to be the uncontrolled portion of the estate of Innermeath, as heir-portioner with her two sisters,—Margaret, married to Sir Colin Campbell of Glenorchie, ancestor of the marquis of Breadalbane, and Marion, married to Arthur Campbell of Ottar The third belonging to Lady Campbell of Glenorchie, was ceded to the Argyle family by her son Duncan in a deed of renunciation still extant How the third portion passed into the Argyle house does not appear, but it is all included in a charter of confirmation by James the Fourth of a charter by the bishop of Dunkeld, dated 11th May 1497 Muckartshill, a barony to the east of Dollar, appears about the same period (1491) to have been feued by Shivez bishop of St Andrews to the earl of Argyle In 1489, by an act of the Scottish parliament the name of Castle Gloom, its former designation, was changed to Castle Campbell It continued to be the frequent and favourite residence of the family till 1644 when it was burnt down by the Macleans in the army of the marquis of Montrose, along with every house in Dollar and Muckart,—two houses only, and these by mistake, escaping their savage fury It was at Castle Campbell that Knox tells us in his history he visited Archibald the fourth earl of Argyle, and preached during successive days, to him and his noble relatives and friends Although never repaired, the castle and lordship of Castle Campbell remained in the possession of the Argyle family till 1808, when it was sold

CASTLE CAMPBELL

By Isabel Stewart, his wife, eldest daughter of John, lord of Lorn, the first earl of Argyle had two sons and seven daughters Archibald, his elder son, became second earl, and Thomas the younger, was the ancestor of the Campbells of Lundie in Forfarshire One of his daughters was married to Angus the young lord of the Isles, and was believed by the islanders to have been the mother of Angus' son, Donald Dubh, who was imprisoned in the castle of Inchconnell from his infancy Another daughter was married to Torquil Macleod of the Lewis Having acquired the principal part of the landed property of the two sisters of his wife, the first earl of Argyle entered into a transaction with Walter Stewart, Lord Lorn, their uncle, on whom the lordship of Lorn and barony of Innermeath, which stood limited to heirs-male, had devolved, in consequence of which Walter resigned the lordship of Lorn in favour of the earl of Argyle, who thereupon added the style and designation of Lord Lorn to his other titles, Walter retaining the barony of Innermeath, had the title of Lord Innermeath [See ATHOL, earl of, ante, p 163]

Archibald, second earl of Argyle, succeeded his father in 1493, and is designed lord high-chancellor of Scotland, in a charter to him by Elizabeth Menteith, Lady Rusky, and Archibald Napier of Merchiston, her son, of half of the lands of Inchrua, Rusky, &c , in the county of Argyle, 28th June, 1494 The same year he had the office of master of the household Crawford, in his Peerage, page 17, says he was lord-chamberlain in 1495, but his name does not occur as such in Crawford's Officers of State, and he is not designed lord-chamberlain in any of the charters granted to him, which were numerous, under the great seal, from 1491 to 1512 In 1499 he and others received a commission from the king to let on lease, for the term of three years, the entire lordship of the Isles as possessed by the last lord, both in the Isles and on the mainland, excepting only the island of Isla, and the lands of North and South Kintyre He also received a commission of lieutenandry, with the fullest powers, over the lordship of the Isles, and, some months later, was appointed keeper of the castle of Tarbert, and bailie and governor of the king's lands in Knapdale In 1501, when the insurrection of the islanders under Donald Dubh, who had escaped from prison, broke out, Argyle, with Huntly, Crawford and Marischal, the Lord Lovat, and other powerful barons, were charged to lead the royal forces against the rebels, but the insurrection was not finally suppressed till 1506 From this period the great power formerly enjoyed by the earls of Ross, lords of the Isles, was transferred to the earls of Argyle and Huntly, the former having the chief rule in the south isles and adjacent coasts [Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland] At the fatal battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513, his lordship and his brother-in-law, the earl of Lennox, commanded the right wing of the royal army, and with King James the Fourth, were both killed in that sanguinary engagement, so disastrous to Scotland By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Stewart, eldest daughter of John, first earl of Lennox, he had four sons and five daughters His eldest, Colin, was the third earl of Argyle Archibald, his second son, had a charter of the lands of Skipnish, and the keeping of the castle thereof, &c , 13th August 1511 His family ended in an heir-female in the reign of Mary Sir John Campbell, the third son, at first styled of Lorn, and afterwards of Calder, married Muriella, daughter and heiress of Sir John Calder of Calder, now Cawdor, near Nairn, as previously mentioned [See CALDER, surname of, ante, page 527]

According to tradition, she was captured in childhood by Sir John Campbell and a party of the Campbells, while out with her nurse near Calder castle Her uncles pursued and overtook the division of the Campbells to whose care she had been intrusted, and would have rescued her but for the presence of mind of Campbell of Inverliver who, seeing their approach, inverted a large camp kettle as if to conceal her, and commanding his seven sons to defend it to the death hurried on with his prize The young men were all slain, and when the Calders lifted up the kettle, no Muriella was there Meanwhile so much time had been gained that farther pursuit was useless. The nurse, at the moment the child was seized, bit off a joint of her little finger, in order to mark her identity—a precaution which seems to have been necessary, from Campbell of Auchinbreck's reply to one who, in the midst of their congratulations on arriving safely in Argyle with their charge, asked what was to be done should the child die before she was marriageable? "She can never die," said he, "as long as a red-haired lassie can be found on either side of Lochawe" From this it would appear that the heiress of the Calders had red hair The earl of Cawdor is the representative of Sir John Campbell and his wife Muriella, (see CAWDOR, earl of,) and the Campbells of Ardchattan, Auds, and Cluny are their collateral descendants Donald, the fourth son of the second earl of Argyle, was abbot of Cupar, and ancestor of the Campbells of Keithock in Forfarshire

Colin Campbell, the third earl of Argyle, was, immediately after his accession to the earldom, appointed by the council to assemble an army and proceed against Lauchlan Maclean of Dowart, and other Highland chieftains, who had broken out into insurrection and proclaimed Sir Donald of Lochalsh lord of the Isles This he was enabled to do the more effectually, as in anticipation of disturbances among the islanders, he had taken bonds of fidelity from his vassals and others who had attached themselves to the late earl his father Owing to the powerful influence of Argyle, the insurgents submitted to the regent, after strong measures had been adopted against them, and, upon assurance of protection, he prevailed upon them to appear at court, and arrange in person the terms of pardon and restoration to favour, in consequence of which considerable progress seems to have been made in the pacification of the Isles Argyle and his followers took out a remission for ravages committed by them in the isle of Bute in the course of the insurrection, and rendered necessary, it may be supposed, from some of the rebels having there found shelter and protection In 1517 Sir Donald of Lochalsh again appeared in arms, but being deserted by his principal leaders, he effected his escape His two brothers, however, were made prisoners by Maclean of Dowart and Macleod of Dunvegan, who had submitted to the government The services of the earl of Argyle had mainly contributed to this state of matters in the Isles He had, early in that year, presented to the regent and council a petition, requesting "for the honour of the realm and the commonweal in time coming," that he should receive a commission of lieutenandry over all the Isles and adjacent mainland, on the grounds of the vast expense he had previously incurred, of his ability to do good service in future, and of his having broken up the confederacy of the islanders, which commission he obtained with certain exceptions He also claimed and obtained authority to receive into the king's favour, all the men of the Isles who should make their submission to him and become bound for future good behaviour, by the delivery of hostages and otherwise, the last condition being made imperative, "because the men of the Isles are fickle of mind, and set but little value upon their oaths and written obligations" Sir Donald of the Isles, his brothers, and the Clandonald were, however, specially excepted from the benefit of this article The earl likewise demanded and received express power to pursue and follow the rebels with fire and sword, to expel them from the Isles, and to use his best endeavours to possess himself of Sir Donald's castle of Strone in Lochcarron [Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, pages 119, 120] It would appear, however, that Argyle's services were not treated with that consideration at the capital which he thought they were entitled to receive, as in 1519, on his advice to the council that Sir Donald should be forfeited for high treason, meeting with some opposition, he took a solemn protest before parliament that neither he nor his heirs should be liable for any mischiefs that might in future arise from rebellions in the Isles, as, although he held the office of lieutenant, his advice was not taken as to the management of the districts committed to his charge, neither had he received certain supplies of men and money, formerly promised him by the regent for carrying on the king's service in the Isles [Ibid page 125]

In the parliament which met at Edinburgh 25th February 1525, Argyle was appointed one of the four governors of the kingdom, the duke of Albany's regency, from his continued absence in France, having been declared at an end In January 1526, he accompanied the young king, James the Fifth, against the queen-mother and the rebel lords, and was a member of the new secret council appointed in that year For some years the Isles had continued at peace, and Argyle employed this interval in extending his influence among the chiefs, and in promoting the aggrandisement of his family and clan, being assisted thereto by his brothers, Sir John Campbell of Calder, so designed after his marriage with the heiress, and Archibald Campbell of Skipnish The former was particularly active In 1527 an event occurred, which forms the groundwork of Joanna Baillie's celebrated tragedy of 'The Family Legend,' acted at the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh with great success in 1810 [see ante, p 185] It is thus related by Gregory "Lauchlan Cattanach Maclean of Dowart had married Lady Elizabeth Campbell, daughter of Archibald, second earl of Argyle, and, either from the circumstance of their union being unfruitful, or more probably owing to some domestic quarrels, he determined to get rid of his wife Some accounts say that she had twice attempted her husband's life, but, whatever the cause may have been Maclean, following the advice of two of his vassals, who exercised a considerable influence over him from the tie of fosterage, caused his lady to be exposed on a rock, which was only visible at low water, intending that she should be swept away by the return of the tide This rock lies between the island of Lismore and the coast of Mull, and is still known by the name of the 'Lady's Rock' From this perilous situation, the intended victim was rescued by a boat accidentally passing, and conveyed to her brother's house Her relations, although much exasperated against Maclean, smothered their resentment for a time, but only to break out afterwards with greater violence, for the laird of Dowart being in Edinburgh, was surprised when in bed, and assassinated by Sir John Campbell of Calder, the lady's brother The Macleans instantly took arms to revenge the death of their chief, and the Campbells were not slow in preparing to follow up the feud, but the government interfered, and, for the present, an appeal to arms was avoided" [Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p 128]

On the escape of the king, then in his seventeenth year, from the power of the Douglases, in May 1528, Argyle was one of the first to join his majesty at Stirling He accompanied the king to Edinburgh on the 6th of the following July, and on the confiscation of the vast estates of the Douglas family, he obtained, 6th December 1528, a charter of the barony of Abernethy, in Perthshire, forfeited by Archibald, earl of Angus The same year he was appointed lieutenant of the borders and warden of the marches On the refusal of the earl of Bothwell to lead the royal army against the earl of Angus, who had appeared in arms, and repeatedly defeated the king's forces, the task of the expulsion of this formidable rebel from Coldingham, where he had taken up his quarters, was committed to the earl of Argyle, who, with the assistance of the Homes, compelled him to fly into England, whence he did not return till after the death of James Argyle afterwards received an ample confirmation of the hereditary sheriffship of Argyleshire and of the offices of justiciary of Scotland and master of the household, by which these offices became hereditary in his family He had the commission of justice-general of Scotland renewed 25th October 1529 He died in 1530 In his last years he was engaged in endeavouring to suppress a formidable insurrection in the South Isles, headed by Alexander of Isla and the Macleans, who readily seized the opportunity to revenge the death of their late chief The combined clans made descents upon Roseneath, Craignish, and other lands belonging to the Campbells, which they ravaged with fire and sword, killing at the same time many of the inhabitants The clan Campbell retaliated, by laying waste great part of the Isles of Mull and Tiree and the lands of Morvern Argyle demanded extraordinary powers from the king to enable him to reduce the Isles once more under the dominion of the law, but James suspecting his motives, resolved upon trying conciliatory measures, and offered pardon to any of the island chiefs who would submit to the government, in which he was successful

By his countess, Lady Jane Gordon, eldest daughter of Alexander, third earl of Huntly, the third earl of Argyle had three sons and a daughter, the latter married, first, to James earl of Moray, natural son of King James the fourth, and had a daughter, and, secondly, to John tenth earl of Sutherland, without issue His sons were, Archibald, fourth earl of Argyle, John, ancestor of the Campbells of Lochnell, of which house the Campbells of Balcarno and Stonefield are cadets, and Alexander, dean of Moray

Archibald, the fourth earl of Argyle, was, on his accession to the title in 1530 (not 1533, as stated by Douglas in his Peerage as the date of his father's death) appointed to all the offices held by the two preceding earls In 1531 he commanded an expedition against the South Isles, while the earl of Moray, natural brother of the king, proceeded against the North Isles, but in both districts order was soon restored by the voluntary submission of the insurgent chiefs A suspicion had begun to be entertained by some of the members of the privy council, which is said to have been shared in by the king himself, that many of the disturbances in the Isles were secretly fomented by the Argyle family that they might obtain possession of the estates forfeited by the chiefs thus driven into rebellion, and an opportunity soon presented itself, which the king eagerly availed himself of, to curb the increasing power of the earl of Argyle in that remote portion of the kingdom Finding that the timely submission of Alexander of Isla, Maclean of Dowart, and the lesser chiefs, placed them beyond his interference, the earl presented a complaint to the council against the first of those named, charging him with various crimes Alexander being summoned to answer the charges made his appearance at once, but Argyle absenting himself, the island chief gave in to the council a written statement, denying the crimes laid to his charge, and offering, if commission were given to himself or any other chief, for calling out the army of the Isles, in the event of war with England, or any part of the realm of Scotland, to bring more fighting men into the field than Argyle, with all his influence, could levy in the Isles, also, in case Argyle should be disposed at any time to resist the royal authority, to cause the earl to quit his own country of Argyle, if he had the king's commands to that effect, and compel him to dwell in another part of Scotland where "the king's grace might get reason of him,' and concluding by stating that the disturbed state of the Isles was mainly caused by the late earl of Argyle and his brothers, Sir John Campbell of Calder, and Archibald Campbell of Skipnish In consequence of this appeal of Alexander of Isla the king made such an examination into the complaints of the islanders as satisfied him that the family of Argyle had been acting more for their own benefit than for the welfare of the country, and the earl was summoned before his sovereign to give an account of the duties and rental of the Isles received by him, the result of which was that James committed him to prison soon after his arrival at court He was soon liberated, but James was so much displeased with his conduct that he deprived him of the offices he still held in the Isles, some of which were bestowed on Alexander of Isla whom he had accused [Gregory's Highlands and Isles, page 141] On March 17, 1532, a remission was granted to the earl and eighty-two others for their treasonable fire raising, with his standard unfurled, in the islands of Mull, Jura, and Morvern, as already stated in the end of the notice of his father In August 1541, five thousand pounds were given to him out of the king's treasury, on his resignation of Makmes lands in the isles to the crown In a charter to him of the king's lands of Cardross in Dumbartonshire, dated 28th April 1542, he is designed master of the king's wine cellar, "cellæ regis vinariæ magister" After the death of James the Fifth he appears to have regained his authority over the Isles, and Donald Dubh, who claimed to be lord of the Isles, having appeared in arms there, at the head of several of the clans, the earl prepared to defend his insular acquisitions, but in 1543 Donald, with a force of fifteen hundred men, invaded Argyle's territories, slew many of his vassals, and carried off a great quantity of plunder Argyle was one of the peers who, in July of that year, entered into an association to oppose the marriage of the young queen Mary and the youthful prince Edward, afterwards King Edward the Sixth of England, and the consequent union of the two crowns, 'as tending to the high dishonour, perpetual skath, damage and ruin of the liberty and nobleness of the realm" In 1544 an expedition was sent by Henry the Eighth to aid the earl of Lennox in his claim to the regency, to harass the coasts of Scotland, and thus put down the opposition to the proposed royal marriage An attempt on the part of the earl of Lennox, who was in the command of the English forces, with eighteen vessels of war and eight hundred men, to seize the castle of Dumbarton failed, and on his ships passing down the Clyde they were fired at by the earl of Argyle, who, with a large body of his vassals and some pieces of artillery, had taken post at the castle of Dunoon On his arrival at Bute, Lennox determined to attack Argyle in turn The latter, with seven hundred men, attempted to oppose the landing of Lennox's troops at Dunoon, but was unable to withstand the superior artillery of the English vessels After a skirmish in which Argyle lost eighty men, many of them gentlemen, the village of Dunoon was burnt and plundered by the invaders, Argyle sustaining further loss in attempting to harass their retreat Four or five days thereafter Lennox, with five hundred men landed in another part of Argyle, and laid waste the surrounding country At the disastrous battle of Pinkie, 10th Sept 1547, the earl of Argyle had the command of a large body of Highlanders and Islanders, and he also distinguished himself at the siege of Haddington in the following year In June 1555 a commission was given to the earls of Argyle and Athole over the Isles, and on the queen regent (Mary of Guise) proceeding to the north, in July 1556, to hold justice-courts for the punishment of great offenders, the earl of Argyle was one of those who accompanied her He was the first of the Scots nobles who embraced the principles of the Reformation, and employed as his domestic chaplain, Mr John Douglas, a converted Carmelite friar, who preached publicly in his house The archbishop of St Andrews, in a letter to the earl, endeavoured to induce him to dismiss Douglas, and return to the Romish church, but in vain, and on his death-bed he recommended the support of the new doctrines and the suppression of Popish superstitions to his son He died in August 1558 He was twice married By his first wife, Lady Helen Hamilton, eldest daughter of James first earl of Arran, he had a son, Archibald, fifth earl of Argyle His second wife was Lady Mary Graham, only daughter of William, third earl of Monteith, by whom he had Colin, sixth earl, and two daughters Lady Margaret Campbell, the older daughter, married James Lord Down, ancestor of the earls of Moray Lady Janet, the younger, became the wife of Hector Maclean of Dowart, Gregory says of James Macdonald of Isla, the great rival of the Argyle family in the Isles

Archibald, fifth earl of Argyle, was educated under the direction of Mr John Douglas, his father's domestic chaplain and the first protestant archbishop of St Andrews, and distinguished himself as one of the most able among the Lords of the Congregation In December 1557, when styled lord of Lorn, with his father and the earls of Glencairn and Morton, Erskine of Dun, and other leading reformers, he had subscribed at Edinburgh the first bond entered into in Scotland for the support of the gospel and the maintenance of faithful ministers, but for some time he adhered to the party of the queen-mother In November 1558, soon after his accession to the title, he and Lord James Stuart, prior of St Andrews, afterwards the regent Moray,—the one, as Douglas remarks, the most powerful, and the other the most popular leader of the protestant party,—were appointed to go to Paris, with the crown and other ensigns of royalty, to crown Francis, dauphin of France, as king of Scotland, on his marriage with the young Queen Mary, "that they, being employed abroad, matters of greater importance, namely anent religion, might be overturned at home in their absence The consideration of the death of Mary, queen of England, who ended her life the seventeenth day of this same month of November, stayed them altogether, for it was thought that the queen and her husband the king, would assume to themselves greater titles" [Calderwood, vol i page 122] And indeed Francis and Mary did soon after assume the title of king and queen of England, as well as of Scotland and France

On the occurrence of the memorable riot at Perth, in May 1559, when the "rascal multitude," as Knox called them, after destroying the popish altars and images, proceeded to level with the ground several of the monasteries and other religious houses, the queen regent, then at Stirling, enraged at the tumult, hastened to Perth, at the head of seven thousand men, chiefly French auxiliaries commanded by D'Oysel, with the purpose of inflicting signal vengeance on the inhabitants By deceitful promises she had induced the protestant leaders to dismiss their armed followers, and she hoped to impose the town before any new or effective force could be collected to oppose her, but, on reaching the neighbourhood of Perth, she found that the Reformers had assembled from all parts to the assistance of their friends The gentlemen of Fife, Angus, and Mearns, with their followers, had formed a camp near Perth, where they were speedily joined by the earl of Glencairn, with two thousand five hundred men from the west country Instead, therefore, of attacking the town, the regent sent the earl of Argyle and the Lord James Stuart, to enter into a negotiation with the protestant leaders, having, with her usual duplicity, persuaded these two noblemen reformers themselves, that the reformation of religion was a mere pretence with those who opposed her authority, and that they meant nothing but rebellion Ultimately, on the 28th of May, a treaty was concluded, principally through the means of the earl and the Lord James Stuart, whereby it was agreed that the two armies should return peaceably to their homes, that the town of Perth should be evacuated by the protestant party and the queen regent allowed to enter it, that no molestation should be given to those in arms, nor to the protestants generally, that no French garrison should be stationed in Perth, that no Frenchman should come nearer that city than three miles, and that in the approaching assembly of the three estates, the work of the reformation should be finally established The leaders of the Congregation subscribed this agreement, but under strong apprehensions that it would not be adhered to, and before they separated, a new bond was entered into for the defence of each other and the maintenance of the true religion, which was signed by Argyle, the Lord James Stuart, the earl of Glencairn, Lords Boyd and Ochiltree, and Mathew Campbell of Tarringhame As they feared, the regent very soon violated the treaty She entered Perth on the 29th, attended by French soldiers, some of whom, firing their hackbuts on the altar of Patrick Murray, who was known to be a reformer, killed his son a boy about twelve years of age This being told to the regent, she said in mockery, "It is pity it chanced on the son, and not on the father, but seeing it hath so chanced, one cannot be against fortune" The inhabitants generally were harassed with every kind of outrage, and not only were the magistrates dismissed and creatures of her own put in their place, but the popish service was restored, with all its rites and ceremonies On being remonstrated with on this infraction of the treaty, she answered that she was not bound to keep faith with heretics, and that "princes were not to be strictly held to their promises," adding, "I myself would make little conscience to take from all that sort their lives and inheritances, if I might do it with honest excuse" Disgusted at her perfidy, and having no further confidence in her word, the earl of Argyle and the Lord James Stuart deserted the queen regent, and at once went over to the Congregation, as the great body of the reformers were called, with whom their sympathies had been all along The queen sent a charge to them, under the pain of her highest displeasure to return, but they answered that with safe conscience they could not When she departed from Perth she left in it a garrison of four hundred soldiers

In the meantime the earl of Argyle and the lord James Stuart proceeded to St Andrews, and on the way sent missives to Erskine of Dun, the laird of Pittarrow, Halyburton, provost of Dundee, and other leading reformers, to meet them in that city, on the 4th of June, to take measures for the promotion of the Reformation John Knox, after preaching at Cupar in Fife, at Crail, and at Anstruther, in all which places, as at Perth, the people had demolished the altars, the images, and all other monuments of idolatry, proceeded to St Andrews, where he had agreed to meet the earl of Argyle and Lord James Stuart The popish archbishop came to the town, accompanied with a hundred soldiers, and sent a message that if Knox offered to preach in his cathedral church, he would have him shot with a dozen hackbuts, his friends, anxious for his safety, endeavoured to dissuade him from preaching, but he would not be prevented The subject of his discourse was the ejection of the buyers and sellers from the temple, which "the provost and bailies with the commonalty" of the town applied to the circumstances of the times, and straightway proceeded to pull down and destroy their splendid cathedral, with the other churches, razing the monasteries of the Black and Grey friars to the ground, and destroying all the monuments of antiquity within the city The archbishop hastened to Falkland, where the regent was, with her French troops, and gave her the first intimation of the outrages that had been committed The regent immediately issued a proclamation summoning her troops and adherents to assemble at Cupar next day The lords of the Congregation, on their part, despatched earnest representations to their friends for assistance, and though only attended by a hundred cavalry and the same number of infantry, instantly marched for Cupar Their adherents hastened to their aid, and by the following morning they were joined by an army of three thousand men Lord Ruthven brought some horsemen to them from Perth, the earl of Rothes, hereditary sheriff of Fife, also came with a goodly company, the towns of St Andrews and Dundee sent them most effective men, and Cupar poured forth its population, to defend itself and aid the general cause The army of the regent, on the morning of the 13th June, encamped upon an eminence in the neighbourhood of Cupar, called the Garlebank It consisted of two thousand Frenchmen under General D'Oysel, and about one thousand Scots under the duke of Chatelherault, (Lord Hamilton, second earl of Arran) The troops of the Congregation, the command of which had been assigned to Halyburton, provost of Dundee, were stationed on the high ground called Cupar muir, to the west of the town, and their ordnance was so posted as to command the surrounding country Astonished both at the strength of their opponents and the skilfully-selected position which they occupied, and from which, by twice feigning a retreat, they endeavoured in vain to draw them, and knowing that they could not depend on the Scots in their own ranks, should a battle take place, the commanders of the royal forces recommended to the regent, who had remained at Falkland, to enter into a negotiation with the lords of the Congregation Yielding to necessity she consented, and a truce for eight days was, after considerable discussion, agreed upon between the duke of Chatelherault and D'Oysel, for the regent and the earl of Argyle and the Lord James Stuart for the Congregation, on condition that the French troops should immediately be transported to Lothian, and that the regent should send certain noblemen to St Andrews, to adjust finally the articles of an effectual peace The lords of the Congregation then dismissed their troops, and retired to St Andrews but though the regent so far kept her word as to send her French troops and artillery across the Forth, the reformers waited in vain for the appearance of her commissioners At this time, in a letter from the earl of Argyle and the Lord James Stuart, the regent was respectfully but earnestly entreated to withdraw the garrison which she had left at Perth, but no attention was paid to their request It was, therefore, resolved to expel the garrison by force The lords of the Congregation again appeared in arms at the head of their followers, and on the 24th of June marched upon Perth The earl of Huntly, chancellor of the kingdom, with the Lord Erskine, and Mr John Bannatyne, justice-clerk, hastened to entreat the lords to delay besieging the town for a few days They were told that it would not be delayed even for an hour, and that if one single protestant should be killed in the assault, the garrison should be put indiscriminately to the sword The garrison were twice summoned to surrender, but as they refused to do so, the batteries of the Congregation were opened upon the town, and on the 26th of June, the garrison capitulated The burning of the royal palace and abbey of Scoon followed The earl of Argyle and Lord James Stuart, with Knox and the provost of Dundee exerted themselves to save them, but in vain Being apprized that the regent intended to seize and garrison Stirling castle, and to fortify the bridge over the Forth, so as to prevent their passage, the earl and the lord James Stuart left Perth at midnight, and appeared at Stirling, with their forces, in the morning On this occasion they were accompanied by three hundred inhabitants of Perth, who had joined the standard of the Congregation, and to indicate their zeal and resolution they wore ropes about their necks, that they might be ignominiously hung with them if they deserted their colours. A picture of the march of this resolute body is still preserved in Perth, and the circumstance of their substituting ropes for neckerchiefs or ribbons is the subject of the popular allusion to "St Johnstone tippets"

The two convents of the Black and Grey friars of Stirling and the venerable abbey at Cambuskenneth in its neighbourhood, were laid in ruins, and after remaining three days at Stirling, the army of the Congregation on the fourth proceeded to Linlithgow, where they destroyed the churches and monastic houses The earl of Argyle and the lord James Stuart then directed their march upon Edinburgh, which they entered on the 29th of June, on which the regent retreated to Dunbar The force which the confederates had with them was not very great, but wherever they went they were joined by the populace, and the popish party were so effectually daunted that they could make no head against them The efforts of the magistrates to preserve the churches and religious houses of the capital were energetic, but they were in vain Upon the first rumour of the approach of the earl of Argyle the mob attacked both the monasteries of the Black and Grey friars, and left nothing but the bare walls standing When the earl entered the capital they proceeded to still further "purification" Trinity college church and its prebendal buildings were assailed and some parts of them pulled down The altars in St Giles church and St Mary's or the Kirk of Field, were removed, and the images destroyed or burnt At Holyrood Abbey also the altars were overthrown, and the church otherwise defaced Preachers were, at the same time, appointed to expound to the people the pure gospel The mint, with the instruments for coining, was seized, as the stamping of base money had raised the price of the necessaries of life, but though it was alleged against the reformers that they had possessed themselves of large sums of money, this does not appear to have been the case

During these proceedings, the regent issued a proclamation against the Congregation, declaring that under the pretence of religion they sought to overturn the government, commanding them to leave Edinburgh in six hours, and enjoining all good subjects to avoid their society under the pain of treason This proclamation had its effect to a certain extent, as many of the Congregation retired to their homes The lords, in a letter to the queen regent, dated 2d July (1559) were careful to exculpate themselves from the charges brought against them, and offered to explain all their views and wishes in presence of the regent, if they were permitted free access to her After several communings, the regent requested that the earl of Argyle and the lord James Stuart might be sent to her, but as some treachery was suspected, it was deemed expedient that they should not go near her The duke of Chatelherault had been persuaded that the object of the Congregation was to deprive Mary of her crown, and also the duke and his heirs of their right of succession, but in a proclamation they showed, as the preachers did in their sermons, that their real motive was the reformation of religion and complete liberty of conscience Recourse was then had to negotiations, and after a conference at Preston, which led to no result, the queen dowager left Dunbar, and with her troops took possession of Leith, and approached within two miles of Edinburgh On being informed by the governor of the castle (Lord Erskine) that he would fire if her entrance was opposed, a treaty was entered into, on the 25th July, by which the Congregation agreed that the town of Edinburgh should be open to the regent, that Holyrood-house, the mint, and the instruments of coinage should be delivered up to her, and that they should be obedient to her authority and the laws, and should abstain from injuring the papists, or employing violence against the churches or religious houses, till the 10th of the ensuing January, when a parliament was to meet The regent, on her part, agreed that the inhabitants of Edinburgh might adopt what religion they thought proper, that their preachers should not be molested, nor themselves troubled in their persons or their goods, that no French garrison or Scottish mercenaries should be stationed within the city, and that, in other places of the kingdom, similar toleration should be given to the protestants and their preachers These conditions Chatelherault and Huntly, at a subsequent private interview with the lords of the Congregation, held at the Quarry Holes near Calton Hill, declared their resolution to see observed, or else to leave the queen dowager's party On the following day the lords of the Congregation left Edinburgh and proceeded to Stirling, where they held a council, and on the first of August entered into a third league or bond for mutual defence

When at Glasgow, on his return to his own district, Argyle and Stuart received an invitation from the duke of Chatelherault, to visit him at Hamilton, where they remained a night, and met the duke's eldest son, the earl of Arran, newly arrived from Paris, having escaped death or imprisonment from the Guises on account of his protestant principles [See HAMILTON, duke of] The duke had become dissatisfied with the violent and arbitrary measures of the queen regent, and convinced of her perfidy, he and Arran, his son, had now resolved upon joining the lords of the Congregation Arran accordingly, on the 10th of September, accompanied Argyle and Lord James Stuart to a convention of the lords of the Congregation held at Stirling, which resulted in the principal chiefs accompanying these two lords in a second visit to the residence of the duke, there to mature their further proceedings, of which the convention entered into shortly thereafter, for the entrance of English troops into Scotland, was the most important

In the subsequent transactions the earl of Argyle acted a principal part When, at the commencement of the siege of Leith, on the last day of October 1559, the French soldiers, in a sally from the fort, drove the troops of the Congregation back to Edinburgh, after capturing their ordnance, and pursued them to the middle of the Canongate and up Leith Wynd, Argyle, with his Highlanders, was the first to stop the flight, and give a check to the pursuers His name appears the fifth of the noblemen who signed the Contract of Berwick, which led to the introduction of the English army, under the Lord Grey, to the assistance of the Congregation, and the expulsion of the French from Scotland In this Contract occurs the following clause personal to the earl "And also, the erle of Argile, lord justice of Scotland, being present the joyned with the said duke (of Chatelherault) sall employ his force and good will where he sall be required by the queen's majestie (Elizabeth) to reduce the north parts of Ireland to the perfyte obedience of England, conforme to a mutuall and reciprock contract to be made betwixt her majesties lieutenant or deputie of Ireland, being for the time, and the said erle, wherin sall be conteaned what he sall doe for his part, and what the said lieutenant and deputie sall doe for his support, in case he sall have to doe with James Makconnell, or anie other of the iles of Scotland, or realme of Ireland" The Makconnel here referred to is supposed to be a miswriting for James Macdonald of Isla, who had been stirred up by the queen regent to attack the lands of Argyle For performance of his part of this contract Argyle gave as a hostage his cousin Colin Campbell On the 27th of April, the lords of the Congregation entered into a fourth bond, for their mutual protection and assistance, and in this they were joined by the earl of Huntly, who had hitherto opposed their proceedings

On the 10th of June 1560, the queen regent died in the castle of Edinburgh, which put an end to hostilities for the time Before her death she expressed to Argyle and other lords, in an interview she asked with them, her deep regret for her conduct, which she attributed to the counsels of her relatives on the continent The earl of Argyle's name appears the third of the nobility who subscribed the First Book of Discipline, and soon after, when the lords passed an act that all remaining monuments of idolatry should be destroyed he was ordered with the earl of Glencairn to assist the earl of Arran in the west in seeing this done in that district

The earl of Argyle was of the cortege that received Queen Mary on her landing at Leith 19th August 1561 He was immediately thereafter sworn a privy councillor Early in 1562 he was one of the lords engaged in making provision for the ministers, against the inadequacy of which Knox appealed On the 13th of September, the queen went to Stirling, and on the Sabbath a riot took place in that town, in consequence of an attempt being made to perform mass "The earl of Argyle," says Randolph, the English ambassador, in a letter to Cecil, "and the lord James Sturt so disturbed the quire that some, both priests and clerks, left their places with broken heads and bloody ears" On the 26th May 1563, the queen opened parliament with extraordinary splendour On this occasion the duke of Chatelherault carried the crown, Argyle the sceptre, and Moray the sword

The earl had married Jean, natural daughter of King James the Fifth by Elizabeth daughter of John Lord Carmichael, but he does not seem to have lived on very happy terms with her, as we find that John Knox had been employed, on more occasions than one, to reconcile them after some domestic quarrels In 1563, at the third conference between Queen Mary and Knox, her majesty requested him again to use his good offices on behalf of her sister, the Lady Argyle, who, she confessed, was not so circumspect in everything as she could wish, "yet," she added, "her husband faileth in many things" "I brought them to concord," said Knox, "that her friends were fully content, and she promised before them she should never complain to any creature, till I should first be made acquainted with the quarrel, either out of her own mouth, or by an assured messenger" "Well," said the queen, "it is worse than you believe Do this much for my sake, as once again to reconcile them, and if she behave not herself as becometh she shall find no favour of me, but in no case let my lord know that I employed you" Knox, in consequence, wrote to the earl on the countess's behalf, exhorting him "to bear with the imperfections of his wife, seeing that he was not able to convince her of any crime since the last reconciliation, but his letter was not well received" [Calderwood, vol ii p 215] Her majesty passed the summer of the same year at the earl's house in Argyleshire, in the amusement of deer-hunting

His lordship was against the marriage of the queen with Lord Darnley, and in the midst of the preparations for that ill fated union, he and the earl of Moray appeared at Edinburgh with a body of five thousand horsemen, ostensibly for the purpose of attending a court to which the earl of Bothwell had been cited, but really, as the queen considered, more to overawe herself than to frighten that nobleman She, therefore, ordered the justice-clerk to adjourn the court Two months previous to the marriage, she created Darnley earl of Ross, when the duke of Chatelherault, and the earls of Argyle, Moray, and Glencairn, immediately retired from the court, and began to concert measures for opposing the match by force of arms After the marriage, when the discontented lords took refuge in England, the earl retired to Argyle, but after the murder of Rizzio, on the 9th of March, 1566 (the countess of Argyle being then with the queen at supper), the banished lords were received into favour, and the processes of treason against them discharged In the ensuing April the queen sent for the earls of Argyle and Moray, and reconciled them to the earls of Huntly, Bothwell, and Athole, and in June, when her majesty went to the castle of Edinburgh to be confined of James the Sixth, she ordered lodgings to be provided for the earl next her own, probably that her sister the countess might be near her His lordship, however, was not present at the baptism of the young prince in Stirling castle, on account of the popish ceremonies, but his countess stood sponsor for Queen Elizabeth, and held the child at the font

The earl of Argyle's name appears second on the famous bond subscribed by some of the nobility in favour of the queen's marriage with Bothwell, and the ratification of it afterwards signed by the queen was committed to his care, in case her majesty should repent of the match At this time he seems to have played a double part On the marriage taking place, he was one of the noblemen who entered into the bond of association for the defence of the young prince, but the day after he revealed all their designs to the queen. He carried the sword of state at the coronation of James the Sixth, 29th July 1567, and attended the convention at Edinburgh the 15th August, at which the regency of the earl of Moray was confirmed In the General Assembly which met in the following December the earl and his countess were censured, he for separation from his wife, although he alleged that the blame was not in him, and she for assisting at the baptism of the king "in papistical manner" Afterwards, deeming the queen very ill used in being kept a prisoner, he entered into the association for procuring her liberty on reasonable conditions, and signed the bond to that effect 8th May 1568 He was created her lieutenant, and was chief commander of her forces at Langside on the 13th of the same month, but just as the hostile armies were about to take their ground, he was seized with an apoplectic fit, which delayed the advance of Mary's troops and contributed not a little to her defeat After this he retired to Dunoon, and refused to submit to the regency of his old friend and confederate the earl of Moray, but twice appeared in arms at Glasgow, to concert measures with the Hamiltons for the restoration of Mary He was in consequence summoned to St. Andrews in the following April, when he took an oath to remain quiet, and made his peace on easy terms

On the assassination of the regent Moray, Argyle and other noblemen of the queen's party assembled at Linlithgow, 10th April 1570, and with the duke of Chatelherault and the earl of Huntly, was constituted her majesty's lieutenant in Scotland In 1571 he was prevailed on by the regent Lennox to submit to the king's authority, and to appear in the parliament at Stirling in September of that year Lennox being murdered on the 4th of that month, Argyle was a candidate for the regency, but the choice fell on the earl of Mar, and Argyle was sworn a privy councillor On Morton becoming regent in November 1572, Argyle was appointed lord-high-chancellor, and on the 17th January 1573 he obtained a charter under the great seal of that office for life That same day he carried the sceptre, on the regent going in state to the low council house of Edinburgh, to choose the Lords of the Articles He died of the stone, 12th September 1575, aged about 43, and is celebrated by Johnston in his Heroes His countess, Queen Mary's half sister, having died without issue, was buried in the royal vault in the abbey of Holyrood-house, and he married, a second time, Lady Johanna or Joneta Cunningham, second daughter of Alexander fifth earl of Glencairn, but as she also had no children, he was succeeded in his estates and titles by his brother

Colin, sixth earl of Argyle, previous to succeeding to the earldom was styled Sir Colin Campbell of Boquhan He early engaged in the quarrel against the regent Morton, arising out of the following circumstances In 1576, as hereditary justice-general of Scotland he claimed that a commission of justiciary, formerly given by Queen Mary to the earl of Athole over the territory of the latter, should be annulled This Athole resisted, and not only refused to surrender for trial two of the Athole Stewarts against whom Argyle alleged various crimes, but seized two of the Camerons charged with the murder of the late chief of that clan, whom he detained in prison, although claimed by Argyle as his vassals The two earls collected their retainers in arms, to settle the dispute between them in the field, when the regent interposed, and obliged them to disband their forces Having obtained secret information that Morton intended to prosecute them for treason, they agreed to forget their private quarrels, and unite for mutual defence They disregarded the citation of the regent to appear before a court of justice, and as he dreaded their joint power, he was forced unwillingly to abandon his project In the end of the following year the earl of Argyle was still further incensed against Morton, by his sending for the jewel called the H, because the precious stones were set in the form of that letter, signifying Henrie, and which it was supposed had been given by Queen Mary to her sister the late countess of Argyle He was not inclined to comply with the request, but on being charged by an officer to deliver it up, as it belonged to the king, he at once resigned it About this time the land of Glengarry presented a petition to the privy council, complaining that the earl of Argyle, who, since his rupture with Morton, had been living in his own country, was collecting a large force, ostensibly with the view of punishing some disturbers of the public peace, but really, as he alleged, to attack and harass him, the said land, on which proclamation was made, prohibiting the earl from assembling any of the leges in arms, and from troubling Glengarry, under the pain of treason Various other complaints were made against Argyle for oppressive and illegal conduct, particularly by John, the son and heir of James Macdonald of Castle Camus in Skye, and John Maclean, the uncle of Lauchlan Maclean of Dowart who were both kept prisoners in Argyle's castle of Inchconnell in Lochow, without warrant, and by Lauchlan Maclean, the young chief of Dowart, whose isle of Loyng was invaded and plundered by a party of Campbells sent by Argyle [Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p 216]

On 4th March 1578, the earls of Argyle and Athole, with other noblemen, assembled at Stirling, and advised the king to deprive Morton of the regency, and to take the government into his own hands, which was accordingly done On this occasion Argyle was made a member of the new council chosen to direct the king, who was then only twelve years of age A few weeks thereafter, however, Morton again got possession of the king's person, when Argyle and Athole took up arms to rescue his majesty, and issued a proclamation against the late regent The forces on both sides gathered at Stirling, the earl of Argyle alone bringing two thousand five hundred Highlanders to the assistance of those who opposed Morton's return to power By the mediation, chiefly, of Bowes, the English ambassador, an accommodation was brought about between the hostile factions, and on the 10th August 1579, Argyle was appointed lord high chancellor of the kingdom After this he was apparently reconciled to Morton's administration On the 28th of January 1581, with the king and many of the nobility, he subscribed the second Confession of Faith He was one of the jury on the trial of Morton, 1st June of that year At the opening of the parliament held the following October, he bore the sword, and on the last day of November, when the king went again in state to the Tolbooth, he carried the sceptre He died in October 1584, after a long illness He married, first, Janet, eldest daughter of Henry, first Lord Methven, without issue, secondly, Lady Agnes Keith, eldest daughter of William, fourth earl Marischal, widow of the regent Moray, by whom he had two sons, Archibald, seventh earl of Argyle, and the Hon Sir Colin Campbell of Lundie, created a baronet in 1627

Archibald, seventh earl of Argyle, was under age when he succeeded his father The dissensions among his guardians, and the assassination of Campbell of Calder, one of them, have been already related at page 374 [ante, ART BREADALBANE, earl and marquis of] The conspiracy among the chiefs of the western Highlands, having for its object the death of the young earl of Argyle, as well as that of the "bonnie earl of Murray," is likewise there alluded to The principal person interested in his death was his kinsman Archibald Campbell of Lochnell, one of his guardians, and the next heir to the earldom, a dark and ambitious spirit, who never relinquished his designs against the lives of the earl and his brother, that he might succeed to the title and estates In 1592, when little more than sixteen years of age, the earl married Lady Anne Douglas, fifth daughter of William first earl of Morton of the house of Lochleven "There is reason to believe," says Gregory, "that the conspirators, notwithstanding the refusal of Ardkinglass (Sir James Campbell, another of the young earl's guardians) to join them, continued for some time their machinations for the murder of the earl, and that, during a severe illness with which he was attacked at Stirling, soon after his marriage, in the year 1591, some of his household were bribed to poison him, if, indeed, the disease itself was not caused in the first instance by poison Argyle, however, escaped all the attempts of his enemies, and lived to exercise, for many years, an overpowering influence in the affairs of the Highlands and Isles" [Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p 251] At the 'riding of the parliament,' 29th May 1592, he bore the sword In the same year he and the earl of Athole, and the laird of Grant, plundered and laid waste the earl of Huntly's lands, for the slaughter of the earl of Murray, till the earl of Angus was sent by the king, as lieutenant to the north, for the purpose of preventing further spoliation At the 'riding of the parliament,' 16th July 1593, he carried the sceptre

In 1594, although then only eighteen, Argyle was appointed king's lieutenant against the popish earls of Huntly and Errol, who had raised a rebellion With Argyle were associated the earl of Athole and Lord Forbes Having raised an army of six thousand men—some accounts say twelve thousand--partly among his own vassals, and partly among other clans, particularly the Macleans, Macneills, Macgregors, Macintoshes, and Grants, Argyle marched into Badenoch, and thence towards Strathbogie, after having in vain attempted, in his way, to reduce the castle of Ruthven, which was gallantly held out for Huntly by the Macphersons On his arrival near Glenlivet, he found that Huntly and Errol were in the vicinity, with about fifteen hundred men, principally cavalry, and, in consequence, he took up a strong position on the declivity of a hill, betwixt Glenlivet and Glenrinnes, in two parallel divisions, until he could be joined by Lord Forbes, who was at no great distance with eleven hundred men His opponents, however, had in their ranks a number of brave gentlemen, well mounted and armed, who were anxious to be led to the attack, and a communication from a traitor in Argyle's camp, Archibald Campbell of Lochnell, already mentioned, commander of one of the divisions of his army, encouraged them to attempt it By a private message which he sent to Huntly he promised to go over to him, with his division, as soon as the battle commenced, and suggested that some pieces of artillery possessed by Huntly, should be fired at Argyle's banner, hoping thus both to get rid of that nobleman by an apparent chance shot, and to discourage the Highlanders, who were unacquainted with the use of artillery The advice of Lochnell was followed The assault was made on Argyle's forces while they were at prayers, but,—just reward of treachery,—with fatal effect on Lochnell himself As Huntly approached, the guns were fired at the yellow standard of Argyle, who escaped unhurt, whilst his treacherous kinsman Lochnell, a brother of the latter, and the son of Macneill of Barra, were slain on the spot After a severe conflict, both parties fighting with great bravery, the one, says Sir Robert Gordon, "for glorie, the other for necessitie," Huntly succeeded in routing Argyle's forces, who, from the mountainous nature of the country, which impeded pursuit, escaped with a loss comparatively trifling The success of Huntly was mainly owing to the treachery of Lochnell, and of John Grant of Gartenbeg, one of Huntly's vassals, who retreated with his men as soon as the action began, by which act the centre and the left wing of Argyle's army were completely broken Among the trophies found on the field was the ensign belonging to Argyle, which was carried with other spoils to Strathbogie, and placed on the top of the great tower The conduct of Lachlan Maclean of Dowart, one of Argyle's officers, was worthy of all praise It was his division which inflicted the principal loss on the rebels, and, at the close of the battle, he retired in good order with them It is said that after the battle, he offered, if Argyle would give him five hundred men in addition to his own followers, to bring the earl of Huntly prisoner into Argyle's camp The proposal was rejected, but having come to the ears of Huntly, incensed him greatly against Maclean, whose son afterwards, according to tradition, lost a large estate in Lochaber, through the animosity of that powerful nobleman [Gregory's Highlands and Isles, p 209]

This battle was fought, 3d October 1594 Weeping with indignation at his defeat, the young but high spirited earl of Argyle was carried out of the field by his friends, and hastened to inform the king at Dundee of his discomfiture His majesty immediately marched against the rebels, who dispersed at his approach In the Scottish poems of the sixteenth century, edited by Dalzel, Edinburgh 1801, there is, at page 136 of vol i 'A faithful narrative of the great and miraculous victory obtained by George Gordon, earl of Huntly, and Francis Hay, earl of Errol, catholic noblemen, over Archibald Campbell, earl of Argyll, lieutenant, at Strathaven, 3d Oct 1594,'—the battle being sometimes called the battle of Glenrinnes, Strathaven, or Altconlachan, as well as of Glenlivet. Early in the following year, for oppression alleged to be committed by his clan, the earl was put in ward in the castle of Edinburgh "This," says Calderwood, "was the reward he gott for his good service in the North" [Church History, vol v page 361] He was soon, however, liberated, and in the summer of the same year he and the duke of Lennox were employed to reduce Huntly's vassals to obedience After "killing and burning in the north," as Calderwood phrases it, Argyle sent deputies to Huntly's lands to obtain their submission On November 14, 1598, Argyle with some others was charged to produce certain persons of the name of Campbell and Macgregor, for whom he was responsible, as the king's lieutenant of the bounds or district within which these Campbells and Macgregors resided, in which capacity he had found security for the lawless tribes over whom he had command, they in their turn becoming liable to him in relief, under separate bonds In 1599, when measures were in progress for bringing the chiefs of the Isles under subjection to the king, the earl of Argyle and his kinsman, John Campbell of Calder, were accused of having secretly used their influence to prevent Sir James Macdonald of Dunyveg and his clan from being reconciled to the government The frequent insurrections which occurred in the South Isles in the first fifteen years of the seventeenth century have also been imputed by Mr Gregory, with what degree of truth cannot now be ascertained, to Argyle and the Campbells, for their own purposes It seems difficult, however, to understand what means could be employed by them to influence their inveterate and hereditary enemies to adopt such a course of conduct The proceedings of these clans were, however, so violent and illegal, that the king became highly incensed against the Clandonald, and finding he had a right to dispose of their possessions both in Kintyre and Islay, he made a grant of them to the earl of Argyle and the Campbells This gave rise to a number of bloody conflicts between the Campbells and the Clandonald, in the years 1614, 1615 and 1616, which ended in the ruin of the latter, and for the details of which, and the intrigues and proceedings of the earl of Argyle to possess himself of the lands of that clan, reference may be made to Gregory's 'History of the Highlands and Isles of Scotland,' chapters seven and eight

In the meantime, on the 23d February, 1603, the king, previous to his departure for England, succeeded in reconciling the earls of Argyle and Moray to the earl of Huntly, an object which he had long laboured to effect In that same month the Macgregors, who were already under the ban of the law, made an irruption into the Lennox, and after defeating the Colquhouns and their adherents at Glenfruin, with great slaughter, plundered and ravaged the whole district, and threatened to burn the town of Dumbarton For some years previously, the charge of keeping this powerful and warlike tribe in order had been committed to the earl of Argyle, as the king's lieutenant in the "bounds of the clan Gregor," and he was answerable for all their excesses Instead of keeping them under due restraint, Argyle has been accused by various writers of having from the very first made use of his influence to stir them up to acts of violence and aggression against his own personal enemies, of whom the chief of the Colquhouns was one, and it is further said that he had all along meditated the destruction of both the Macgregors and the Colquhouns, by his crafty and perfidious policy The only evidence on which these heavy charges rests is the dying declaration of Allester Macgregor of Glenstrae, the chief of the clan, to the effect that he was deceived by the earl of Argyle's "falsete and inventiouns," and that he had been often incited by that nobleman to "weir and truble the laird of Luss," and others, but as these charges were not believed at the time, they ought to be received with some hesitation by the impartial historian now Indeed, it is difficult to believe that the earl of Argyle would, for his own sake, have counselled the perpetration of such outrages as the Macgregors committed, and still less that the Macgregors, who detested his authority, would have carried them into effect to please him The enmity alleged to have existed between the Colquhouns and Argyle is assumed without proof of any sort, and is not supported by any probability, whereas the hatred between the Macgregors and Colquhouns was an hereditary feud, and a war of races However this may be, the execution of the severe statutes which were passed against the Macgregors after the conflict at Glenfruin, was intrusted to the earls of Argyle and Athole, and their chief, with some of his principal followers, was enticed by Argyle to surrender to him, on condition that they would be allowed to leave the country Argyle received them kindly, and assured them that though he was commanded by the king to apprehend them, he had little doubt he would be able to procure a pardon, and, in the meantime, he would send them to England under an escort, which would convey them off Scottish ground It was Macgregor's intention, if taken to London, to procure if possible an interview with the king, but Argyle prevented this, yet, that he might fulfil his promise, he sent them under a strong guard beyond the Tweed at Berwick, and instantly compelled them to retrace their steps to Edinburgh, where they were executed 18th January 1604 How far there may have been deceit used in this matter, whether, according to Birrel, Argyle "keipit ane Hielandman's promise, in respect he sent the guard to convey him out of Scottis grund, but thai were not directit to part with him, but to fetch him bak agane," or whether their return was by orders from the king, cannot at the present time be ascertained This at least is certain, that so many families were bereaved of their sons by the atrocities of the Macgregors that there was no probability of a pardon having been obtained from James

In the decreet of ranking of the Scots nobility, 5th March 1606, the earl of Argyle was placed second in the list of earls In 1608 he and the Marquis of Huntly were sent against the proscribed Macgregors, and almost totally extirpated that persecuted and unfortunate clan In 1617, after the suppression by him of the Clandonald, Argyle obtained from the king a grant of the whole county of Kintyre, which grant was ratified by a special act of parliament the same year At this time he seems to have been in high favour at court, and on the visit of King James to Scotland in that year, he was one of those who, at the command of the king, repaired to Holyroodhouse on Whitsunday the 8th of June, and partook of the communion, then and there celebrated after the English form, he and those with him, says Calderwood, "communicated kneeling, not regarding either Christ's institution, or the ordour of our kirk" But this need not have surprised the worthy chronicler had he known that for some years Argyle had been a concealed papist His first countess, to whom Sir William Alexander, afterwards earl of Stirling, inscribed his 'Aurora' in 1604, having died, his lordship had in November 1610, married, a second time, Anne, daughter of Sir William Cornwall of Brome, ancestor of the Marquis Cornwallis This lady was a Catholic, and although the earl was a warm and zealous protestant when he married her, she gradually drew him over to profess the same faith with herself After the year 1615, as Gregory remarks, his personal history presents a striking instance of the mutability of human affairs In that year, being deep in debt, he went to England, but as he was the only chief that could keep the Macdonalds in order, the Privy Council wrote to the king urging him to send him home, and in his expedition against the clan Donald, he was accompanied by his son, Lord Lorn. On the 17th of June 1617, he carried the crown, at the opening of the parliament, and this seems to have been his last public appearance in his native country In 1618, on pretence of going to the Spa for the benefit of his health, he received from the king permission to go abroad, and the news soon arrived that the earl, instead of going to the Spa, had gone to Spain, that he had there made open defection from the protestant religion, and that he had entered into very suspicious dealings with the banished rebels, Sir James Macdonald and Allaster MacRanald of Keppoch, who had taken refuge in that country The king, upon this, wrote to the privy council at Edinburgh, recalling the license given to Argyle to go abroad, and directing that nobleman to be summoned to appear before the council in the following February under the pain of treason In the meantime, various efforts were made to make the barons and gentlemen of Argyle answerable for the good rule of that extensive earldom The result was that in December 1618, twenty of these barons and gentlemen appeared in presence of the council and made an arrangement for effecting the desired object, Campbell of Lundy undertaking the principal charge On the 16th of February, the earl of Argyle having failed to make his appearance, he was, with sound of trumpets, and two or three heralds at arms, openly declared rebel and traitor, at the market cross of Edinburgh, and he remained under this ban until the 22d of November 1621, when, by open proclamation at the same place, with sound of trumpet and Lyon heralds, he was declared the king's free liege Nevertheless, he did not venture to return to Britain during the reign of James the Sixth, nor, indeed, till 1638, and he died in London soon after his return, in that year, aged 62 While on the continent he distinguished himself in the military service of Philip the Second of Spain, against the states of Holland From the time of his leaving Scotland, he never exercised any influence over his great estates, the fee of which had, indeed, been previously conveyed by him to his eldest son, Archibald, Lord Lorn, afterwards eighth earl of Argyle By his first wife he had a son, Archibald, eighth earl, and four daughters, namely, 1st, Lady Anne, married in 1607, to George, second marquis of Huntly, 2d, Lady Annabella, married to Robert, second earl of Lothian, of the house of Cessford, her eldest daughter, Lady Anne, inherited the title of Lothian, and carried it into the house of Fernyhirst, 3d, Lady Jane, married first to the first Viscount Kenmure, and, secondly to the Hon Sir Henry Montgomery, of Giffen, second son of the sixth earl of Eglinton, and 4th, Lady Mary, who became the wife of Sir Robert Montgomery of Skelmorly By his second wife, the earl had a son and a daughter, viz, James, earl of Irvine, and Lady Mary, married to James, second Lord Rollo [See ROLLO, lord]

His first countess was introduced by Lord Walpole into his Appendix, for having collected and published in Spanish, a set of sentences from the works of St Augustine Her portrait will be found in Walpole's 'Royal and Noble Authors,' Park's edition, 1806, vol v p 71 Douglas says, and it seems likely, that the portrait may be that of Lady Anne Douglas, but the authoress must have been Anne Cornwallis, his second wife, as the latter was in Spain with him, but the former died many years before he went to that country The

Of the more illustrious personages of the family of Argyle, memoirs are subsequently given in larger type The conspicuous figure which they made in the history of their country, and the prominent part which the family has always acted in Scottish affairs, entitle its more celebrated members to separate biographies

CAMPBELL, Archibald, eighth earl and first marquis of Argyle, an eminent patriot and statesman, was the son of Archibald, seventh earl, by his first wife Lady Anne Douglas, daughter of the earl of Morton He was born in 1598, and educated in the protestant religion, according to the strict rules of the Church of Scotland, as it was established at the Reformation After his father went to Spain, as already narrated, (at page 555,) he managed the affairs of his family and clan in his absence In 1626 he was sworn a privy councillor, and in 1634 appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session On the death of his father in 1638, he succeeded to his titles The estates he had held previously He attended the General Assembly at Glasgow, that year, at which presbyterianism was declared to be the established religion of Scotland In 1639, when Charles prepared for the invasion of Scotland, Argyle raised nine hundred men to oppose the Macdonalds of the Isles and the earl of Antrim, who were to attack the kingdom on the west In June 1640 he marched to the north against the earl of Athol and the Ogilvys, who had taken up arms for the king, and forced them to submit

Of Argyle's ascendancy in the senate the marquis of Montrose at this time became particularly jealous, and he transmitted an accusation against him to court, of having declared in the presence of Athol and others that the states intended to depose the king The fact was denied by all the witnesses, said to have been present, and Stewart, commissary of Dunkeld, the informer, who retracted his statement, was convicted and executed, while Montrose was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh In 1641, when Charles the First came to Scotland, his majesty created him marquis of Argyle

In 1644, after the marquis of Huntly, whom the king had appointed his lieutenant-general in the north of Scotland, had taken Aberdeen, Argyle was, by the convention at Edinburgh, commissioned to raise an army to oppose him He, accordingly, assembled at Perth, a force of five thousand foot and eight hundred horse with which he advanced on Aberdeen Huntly fled to Banff, where he disbanded his army, and retired to Strathnaver Argyle, after taking possession of Aberdeen, proceeded northward and took the castles of Gight and Kellie The lands of Gight and Haddo he made prisoners and sent to Edinburgh, where the latter was afterwards beheaded In July 1644, Alexander Macdonald, who had been despoiled of his patrimony by Argyle's father, landed in the west from Ireland, with fifteen hundred men, with the purpose of joining the marquis of Montrose, on the side of the king Argyle collected an army to oppose his progress, and to cut off his retreat to Ireland he sent some ships of war to Loch Eishord, where Macdonald's fleet lay, which captured or destroyed them

After the battle of Tippermun, Montrose's victorious army proceeded through Angus and the Mearns to Aberdeen, where he again defeated the army of the Covenanters On the 4th of September, four days after the battle of Tippermun, Argyle, who had been pursuing the Irish forces under Macdonald, had arrived with his Highlanders at Stirling, where, on the following day, he was joined by the earl of Lothian and his regiment With an increased force, amounting to three thousand foot and two regular cavalry regiments, besides ten troops of horse, Argyle arrived at Aberdeen on the 19th, and issued a proclamation, declaring the marquis of Montrose and his followers traitors to religion, and to their king and country, and offering a reward of twenty thousand pounds Scots, to any person who should bring in Montrose dead or alive Spalding, vol ii page 271, laments with great pathos and feeling the severe hardships to which the citizens of Aberdeen had been subjected by the frequent visitations of hostile armies at this period, but forgets to add how much the citizens of Aberdeen had done to bring it on themselves by their sympathy with Montrose Three days after his arrival in Aberdeen, Argyle put his army in motion in the direction of Kintore On hearing of his approach, Montrose concealed his cannon in a bog, and marched his army into the forest of Abernethy Argyle proceeded as far as Strathbogie, and allowed his troops to lose their time in plundering and laying waste the lands of the Gordons in that district, and in the Enzie On the 27th of September Argyle mustered his forces at the Bog of Gight, and found them to amount to about four thousand men The army of Montrose did not amount to much more than a third of that number At this time the two armies were within twenty miles of each other, but Montrose passed unscathed through the forest of Rothiemurchus, and following the course of the Spey, marched through Badenoch Argyle, on this, set his army in motion along Spey-side, and marched through Badenoch in pursuit On entering Badenoch, having been delayed by illness, Argyle found Montrose several days' march in advance of him, and had crossed the Grampians to Strathbogie, where he arrived on the 19th of October and remained till the 27th Contrary to his expectations, Montrose was joined by but a small party of the Gordons, the marquis of Huntly keeping aloof altogether, while his sons were on the side of the parliament

After spoiling the lands of those in Badenoch and Athole who had joined Montrose, Argyle followed him across the Dee, and passing through Aberdeen and Kintore, he reached Inverury on 25th October, with a force of about two thousand five hundred foot, and twelve hundred horse, and suddenly appeared within a very few miles of the camp of Montrose on the 28th of the same month Montrose's foot amounted only to fifteen hundred men, and about fifty horse, yet with this inferior force he resolved to await Argyle's attack He accordingly drew up his little army on a rugged eminence behind the castle of Fyvie, on the uneven sides of which several ditches had been cut and dikes built to serve as farm fences Here he was attacked by Argyle, whose men, charging with great impetuosity, drove the forces of Montrose up the eminence, of a considerable part of which they got possession The assailed, however, were soon rallied by Montrose, who directed in attack in turn with complete success A subsequent attack of cavalry was resisted by interlining with his few horse a body of musketeers In the evening Argyle drew off his forces, and although he returned to the position on the following and subsequent days, the attack was not renewed

After nightfall of the second day, Montrose retreated towards Strathbogie, followed by Argyle, all whose attempts, however, to bring him to action in the open country proved unavailing against an antagonist of military genius so much superior to his own Recourse was then had by Argyle to negotiation, but to a request for a personal meeting with the view of arranging a cessation of arms, Montrose, lest Argyle should avail himself of the occasion to tamper with his men, proposed in a council of war to retire to the Grampians The council at once approved of this suggestion, on which Montrose resolved to march into Badenoch, and afterwards descended by rapid marches into Athole

In the meantime, Argyle disbanded his Highlanders, and went to Edinburgh, where, according to Spalding, vol ii page 287, he "got but small thanks for his service against Montrose" So far from this being the case, the Committee of Estates passed an act of approbation of his services, "principally because he had shed no blood" [Guthry, page 121] To retaliate upon Argyle and his clan the miseries which he had occasioned in Lochaber, Montrose proceeded to ravage the country possessed by the Campbells, beginning with Glenurchy, on which Argyle hastened to his castle at Inveiary, and gave orders for the assembling of his followers He took no precautions, however, to guard the passes leading into Argyle, although so important did he consider them that he had frequently declared he would rather forfeit a hundred thousand crowns than that an enemy should know them While reposing in fancied security, some shepherds from the hills brought him the alarming intelligence that Montrose's forces were within two miles of his castle He immediately took refuge on board a fishing-boat in Loch Fyne, in which he sought his way to the Lowlands For upwards of six weeks, the district of Argyle, as well as that of Lorn, was laid waste, so that, before the end of January, 1645, a single male inhabitant was not to be seen throughout then whole extent Montrose then proceeded northwards, with the view of seizing Inverness, but, on his route, learning that Argyle had entered Lochaber with an army of three thousand men, and had advanced as far as Inverlochy, burning and laying waste the country wherever he appeared, he crossed the mountains, and reached Glennevis before Argyle had the slightest notice of his approach Committing his army to the charge of his cousin, Campbell of Auchinbreck, who had considerable reputation as a military commander, Argyle went on board a boat on the loch, accompanied by Sir John Wauchope of Niddry, Sir James Rollock of Duncrub, Archibald Sydserf, one of the bailies of Edinburgh, and Mungo Law, a minister of the same city His excuse for doing so, was some contusions he had received by a fall two or three weeks before At sunrise on Sunday, 2d February 1645, Montrose gave orders to his men to advance, when Argyle's forces were totally defeated, no less than fifteen hundred of his family and name being killed, and amongst the slain was Campbell of Auchinbreck, then commander After this action, which was called the battle of Inverlochy, Argyle arrived in Edinburgh, "having," says Guthrie, "his left arm tied up in a scarf, as if he had been at bones-breaking" He was present at the battle of Kilsyth, 15th August 1645, as the head of a committee of noblemen appointed by the estates to attend General Baillie, the general of the Covenanters, who sustained a signal defeat from Montrose By way of retaliation for the destruction of Castle Campbell, and the properties of his vassals, by the Macleans, who had joined Montrose's army, he had previously caused the house of Menstrie, the seat of the earl of Stirling, the king's secretary, and that of Authrie, belonging to Sir John Graham of Braco, to be burnt Just before the battle he had, with a small body of troops, taken his route over the hills from Stirling, and crossing the Carron, at a ford still bearing his name, joined the main body under Baillie The loss of the battle of Kilsyth, the most disastrous defeat which the Covenanters ever sustained, is mainly to be attributed to the interference of Argyle and the "field committee," with that general's dispositions and arrangements All Baillie's officers fled in various directions, while Argyle hastened to the south shore of the Frith of Forth According to Bishop Guthry, he "never looked over his shoulder until, after twenty miles riding, he reached the South Queensferry, where he possessed himself of a boat again" [Memoirs, page 154] Wishart sarcastically observes that this was the third time that Argyle had saved himself by means of a boat, and, even then, he did not reckon himself secure till they had weighed anchor and carried the vessel out to sea" [Memoirs, page 171] He afterwards took refuge in Ireland, until Montrose's subsequent defeat at Philiphaugh Among the prisoners executed by the Covenanters after that event was Sir William Rollock, one of Montrose's principal officers, the chief cause of whose condemnation, Wishart says, (Memoirs, page 223,) was that he would not consent to assassinate Montrose, at the instigation of Argyle, a crime which, notwithstanding all the ferocity of the times, and all the enmity which subsisted between these two rival chiefs, it is impossible to believe Argyle to have been guilty of

In July 1646, when the king had surrendered to the Scottish army, the marquis went to Newcastle to pay him his respects He was afterwards employed at London in the conference with the parliament of England on the Articles presented by them to his majesty He was, besides, charged with a secret commission from the king, to consult with the duke of Richmond and the marquis of Hertford, as to the expediency of getting the Scottish parliament and army to declare for him; but was told that if the Scots should declare for the king, it might prove his majesty's ruin, by turning the affair into a national dispute, in which all parties in England would unite, to prevent the kingdom from being conquered. Argyle returned to Scotland to attend parliament, which met 3d November, 1646, and on the 7th of that month, the convention of estates passed an "act of approbation to the marquis of Argyle and remanent commissioners at London." In the same parliament a sum of money was voted to him for his various services, all his estates having been plundered by the Irish and other followers of Montrose. In 1647, also, the parliament voted him an additional sum for his family's subsistence, and for paying annual rents to some necessitous creditors on his estate, and a collection was ordered throughout all the churches in Scotland, for the relief of the people of Argyle plundered by Montrose.

The marquis of Huntly, who had appeared in arms for the king, having been taken prisoner, in December 1647, by Lieutenant-colonel Menzies, in Strathdon, and carried to Edinburgh, a reward of a thousand pounds sterling was bestowed on his captor, who, for payment of this sum, obtained an order, 6th January 1648, from the committee of estates. It has been made the ground of a charge, by the author of the history of the family of Gordon, against Hamilton and Argyle, that they were the first signers of this order, but they merely signed the document in the order of precedence of rank before the rest of the committee. It is related by Spalding that, taking advantage of Huntly's situation, Argyle bought up all the comprisings on Huntly's lands, and that he caused summon at the market cross of Aberdeen, by sound of trumpet, all Huntly's wadsetters and creditors, to appear at Edinburgh in the month of March following, to produce their securities before the lords of session, otherwise they would be declared null and void. Some of Huntly's creditors sold their claims to him, and having thus bought up all the rights he could obtain upon Huntly's estate, he granted bonds for the amount, which, according to Spalding, he never paid. In this way did Argyle possess himself of Huntly's estates, which he continued to enjoy upwards of twelve years, namely, from 1648 till the restoration in 1660. There can be no doubt, however, that in thus acting it was for the benefit of his nephew, Lord Gordon, and not for his own aggrandizement, Huntly's estates being forfeited by the parliament.

In 1648, when the duke of Hamilton formed an association to attempt the rescue of the king, which went under the name of "the Engagement," Argyle and his party opposed it. After the defeat of the army led by Hamilton into England, a new commotion was raised in Scotland by those who had disapproved of the "Engagement." The principal authors were the marquis of Argyle, the earls of Cassillis and Eglinton and the earl of Loudon, chancellor. To oppose them the committee of estates raised an army and conferred the command on the earl of Lanark, who was soon joined by Sir George Monro, with a small body of troops which he had conducted home from England. Argyle, having collected a small body of Highlanders in his own country, marched eastward to form a junction with Loudon and Eglinton. Halting at Stirling, after assigning to his troops their different posts, he went to dine with the earl of Mar at his residence in that town. But while the dinner was serving up, the advanced guard of Lanark's forces, under Sir George Monro, entered the town, on which, mounting his horse, he galloped across Stirling bridge, and never looked behind him till he reached the North Queensferry, where he instantly crossed the Firth in a small boat. He then proceeded to Edinburgh, and with Loudon, the chancellor, and the earls of Cassillis and Eglinton, as committee of estates, summoned a parliament to meet on the 4th of January. In the meantime, Cromwell had laid siege to Berwick, and was waited upon at Mordington, by Argyle, Lord Elcho, and Sir Charles Erskine, and after the surrender of that town they conducted him and General Lambert to Edinburgh. Cromwell took up his residence in the house of Lady Home in the Canongate, where he received frequent visits from Argyle, Loudon, the earl of Lothian, and others, both peers and ministers It is said that during these conferences, Cromwell communicated to his visitors his intentions with respect to the king, and obtained their consent It was with reference to this that Argyle made his celebrated declaration on the scaffold

Although Argyle and his friends had now the principal power in Scotland, he exerted himself in vain to prevent the execution of that eminent royalist, the marquis of Huntly, his brother-in-law, and when it was carried against him, 16th March 1649, he withdrew in disgust from the parliament But when his great rival, Montrose, was conducted with every mark of ignominy, in May 1650, up the Canongate to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, Argyle, surrounded by his family and friends, appeared publicly on a balcony in front of the earl of Moray's house in the Canongate, to gaze at him He refused, however, to assist at or concur in the barbarous sentence pronounced against him, declaring that he was too much a party to be a judge He was not present at Montrose's execution, and is said to have shed tears on hearing of the particulars of his death

Argyle had the principal hand in bringing over Charles the Second to Scotland, where he arrived in June 1650 It is mentioned by Lord Dartmouth, in his MS notes on Burnet, quoted in Rose's Observations on Fox (p 176), that on his arrival, Argyle informed his majesty that he could not serve him as he desired, unless he gave some undeniable proof of a fixed resolution to support the presbyterian party, which he thought would be best done by marrying into some family of quality and influence attached to that interest, and thought his own daughter would be the properest match for him What truth there may be in this, it is impossible to say, but certain it is that the presbyterian party, at the head of which was Argyle, was then the strongest, and it is likely that with a sincere desire to serve his majesty, the ambition of that nobleman might have led him to entertain such a design, with a view of advancing both his majesty's interests and his own, as well as the cause of the presbyterian religion, while the report that the king was to marry his daughter was prevalent at the time

After the fatal defeat of the Scots army at Dunbar, 3d September, 1650, Argyle continued to exert himself for the defence of the country and the promotion of the cause of the king, who was so sensible of his zeal, and diligence in his service, that he drew up a paper which he presented to him with his sign manual, promising, on "the word of a king," to create him duke of Argyle, knight of the garter, and one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, when he (Argyle) should think fit, and whenever it should please God to restore him to his just rights in England, to see him paid forty thousand pounds sterling, which was due to him On the king's coronation at Scone, 1st January 1651, Argyle placed the crown on his Majesty's head, and was the first to swear allegiance to him When Charles, in June of that year, resolved to march into England, Argyle endeavoured to dissuade him from it, but, nevertheless he would have accompanied his majesty, had not his countess been then lying at the point of death, and he took leave of the king at Stirling After Charles's defeat at Worcester, Argyle retired to Inveraray, where he continued for a year to act on the defensive, but, falling sick, he was surprised by General Dean, who conducted him a prisoner to Edinburgh Having received orders from General Monk to attend a privy council, he was thus entrapped to be present at the ceremony of proclaiming Oliver Cromwell lord protector A paper was tendered to him to sign, containing his submission to the government as settled, which he refused, but afterwards, when he was in no condition to struggle, he did sign a promise to live peaceably under the protectorate, and under Richard Cromwell he sat in the parliament for the county of Aberdeen

At the restoration he went to London to congratulate the king, arriving there 8th July 1660, but, without being allowed to see his majesty, he was committed to the Tower, and after lying there for five months, he was sent down to Scotland to be tried for his compliance with the usurpation On the voyage down he narrowly escaped shipwreck by a storm When he arrived in Edinburgh he was confined in the castle At his trial, his inveterate enemy, the earl of Middleton, presided as lord high commissioner, and, after the evidence had been closed on both sides, an express arrived from Monk with some private letters from Argyle to him and others, proving his full compliance with the usurpation Being condemned for high treason, he was beheaded with the Maiden at the Cross of Edinburgh, May 27, 1661 On sentence being pronounced, the marquis, lifting up his eyes, said, "I had the honour to set the crown upon the king's head, and now he hastens me to a better crown than his own" He prepared for death with a fortitude not expected from the natural timidity of his character, wrote a long letter to the king, vindicating his memory, and imploring protection for his poor wife and family, and on the day of his execution, dined at noon with his friends, with great cheerfulness, and was accompanied by several of the nobility to the scaffold, where he behaved with singular constancy and courage His last words were, "I desire all that hear me to take notice and remember, that now, when I am entering on eternity, and am to appear before my Judge, and as I desire salvation, I am free from any accession by knowledge, contriving, counsel, or any other way to his late majesty's death" His head was exposed on the west end of the tolbooth, on the same spike from which that of Montrose had recently been removed, while his body was carried to St Magdalene's chapel in the Cowgate, and lay there for some days, until it was removed by his friends to the family burial-place at Kilmun The head remained on the top of the tolbooth till 8th June 1664, when a warrant was obtained from Charles the Second for taking it down and burying it with his body

Mr Granger, in his Biographical History of England, observes that "the marquis of Argyle was in the cabinet what his enemy the marquis of Montrose was in the field, the first character of his age and country for political courage and conduct"—The woodcut on the preceding column is from an engraving after the original at Inveraray

The marquis of Argyle is inserted in Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors having published his 'Instructions to his Son,' 12mo Edinburgh, 1661, written during his confinement, on which Walpole remarks, it is observable that he quarrelled with both his father and his son, and 'Defences against the grand indictment of high treason,' 1661 Park, in his edition of Walpole, (vol v p 115, edition 1806,) says, in 1612 was printed "the marquis of Argyll's speech on peace, to be sent to his Majestie" By his wife, Lady Margaret Douglas, second daughter of William, second earl of Morton, he had with three daughters, two sons, namely, Archibald, ninth earl of Argyle, and Lord Niel Campbell of Ardmaddie who was governor of Dumbarton castle, and died in 1693 Lord Niel was twice married and Dr Archibald Campbell, his second son by his first wife, Lady Vere Ker, third daughter of the third earl of Lothian was bishop of Aberdeen [See a subsequent notice (CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD) bishop of Aberdeen] His second wife was Susan, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander Menzies of Weem, baronet, sister of Captain James Menzies, who had married his lordship's daughter, Anna Lord Niel's widow afterwards married Colonel Alexander Campbell of Finnab, and had two sons, Niel Campbell, advocate, and Alexander Her only surviving child Jean, married Campbell of Inverawe Lord Niel Campbell's descendants have long been extinct in the male line Menzies of Castlemenzies, baronet, and the Fergusons of Pitcullo in Fife descend from him in the female line

The marquis' eldest daughter, Lady Anne, died unmarried His second, Lady Jean, became the wife of the first marquis of Lothian, and Lady Mary, the third, married first the sixth earl of Caithness, and after his death the first earl of Breadalbane, and had one son to him

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, ninth earl of Argyle, eldest son of the preceding, was educated by his father in the true principles of loyalty and the protestant religion, and had from his youth distinguished himself by his steady attachment to the royal cause After receiving his education he went to travel in France and Italy in 1647, and remained on the continent till the end of 1649 In 1650, when Charles the Second was invited to Scotland, the commission of colonel of foot guards was given to him by the convention of estates, which he declined to accept until it should be ratified by the king He served with great bravery against Cromwell at the battle of Dunbar, in September of that year After the king's defeat at Worcester, he kept a party in arms in the Highlands, ready to act on any favourable opportunity In 1654 he joined the earl of Glencairn with nearly a thousand men, and received the commission of lieutenant general from Charles the Second He was, in consequence, exempted from the general amnesty published by Cromwell in April of that year Towards the end of the same year he was so reduced that he retired to an island with only four or five persons about him It was not till 1655, when he received orders from General Middleton, sanctioned by the king's authority, that he would consent to submit to Cromwell In November of that year he was compelled by General Monk to find security for his peaceable behaviour, to the amount of five thousand pounds sterling In spring 1657 Monk committed him to prison, where he remained till the Restoration

In March 1658, while confined in Edinburgh castle, the lieutenant of that garrison, an Englishman, was one day amusing himself in throwing a bullet, when it glanced from a stone with so much force on Lord Lorn's head, that it fractured his skull He was obliged to undergo the operation of trepanning and recovered with difficulty [Burnet's Hist vol i p 106]

On the restoration, his lordship hastened to London to congratulate his majesty, being charged with a letter from his father, the marquis of Argyle, to the king, containing assurances of his duty His majesty received him in so gracious a manner as to induce the marquis himself to undertake a journey to London, when, without being admitted to the king's presence, he was committed to the Tower, and subsequently sent down to be tried in Scotland for treason During all the time of his trial, Lord Lorn remained at court and laboured assiduously, but in vain, to save his father's life A letter to Lord Duffus, written after the marquis' execution, in which he said that he had convinced the earl of Clarendon of the injustice done to his father, being intercepted, was carried to the earl of Middleton, who exhibited it to the parliament, as a libel on their proceedings That body, on 24th June 1662, transmitted a representation to the king that the eldest son of the late marquis of Argyle had both written and spoken against their authority, and requesting that he might be sent down to Scotland to stand his trial By the express command of the king, Lord Lorn proceeded to Edinburgh, and on the day of his arrival he appeared in his place in parliament, and made a long speech in his own justification He was, nevertheless, committed close prisoner to the castle, and a process raised against him for the crime of leasing-making, or creating dissension between the king and his subjects, on which he was found guilty, and condemned to lose his head, but the day of his execution was left to his majesty's pleasure, in consequence of a positive order of the king to the earl of Middleton When the news of his condemnation reached the court at London it struck all there with astonishment, and the earl of Clarendon declared that if the king suffered such a precedent to take place, he would get out of his dominions as fast as his gout would let him Lord Lorn suffered a long and severe imprisonment in the castle of Edinburgh, and was only released on 4th June, 1663, when Middleton had lost his power

Sensible of his services and of the injustice with which he had been treated, Charles, the same year, restored to him the estates and title of earl of Argyle, which had been forfeited by his father

His residence while in Edinburgh, during his attendance on the Scots parliament, was in the Mint court, High street, as appears from a curious case reported in Fountainhall's Decisions, vol i page 163

In 1681, when the duke of York went to Scotland, a parliament was summoned at Edinburgh, which, besides granting money to the king, and voting the indefeasible right of succession, passed an act for establishing a test, obliging all who possessed offices, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, to take an oath not to attempt any change in the constitution of church and state as then settled When Argyle took the test as a privy councillor, he added, in presence of the duke of York, an explanation which he had before communicated to that prince, and which he believed to have been approved of by him, to the effect that he took it as far as it was consistent with itself and with the Protestant religion The explanation was allowed, and he was admitted to sit that day in council To his great surprise, however, he was a few days thereafter committed to prison, and tried for high treason, leasing-making, and perjury Of five judges three did not scruple to find him guilty of the two first charges, and a jury of fifteen noblemen gave a verdict against him The king's permission was obtained for pronouncing sentence, but the execution of it was ordered to be delayed Having no reason to expect either justice or mercy from such enemies, the earl made his escape from prison in the train of his step-daughter, Lady Sophia Lindsay, disguised as her page He made his way to London, and though the place of his concealment was known at Court, it is said that the king would not consent to his being arrested In the meantime, the privy council of Scotland publicly proclaimed his sentence at the cross of Edinburgh, and caused his coat of arms to be reversed and torn

The earl soon after went over to Holland, where he resided during the remainder of Charles' reign On his death in 1685, deeming it his duty, before the coronation of James the Second, to do his best to restore the constitution, and preserve the civil and religious liberties of his native country, he concerted measures with the duke of Monmouth, and, at the head of a considerable force, made a descent upon Argyle, but, disappointed in his expectations of support, he was taken prisoner, and being carried to Edinburgh, was beheaded upon his former unjust sentence, June 30, 1685 Previous to his execution he was brought directly from the castle to the Laigh council room in the Tolbooth, and thence his farewell letter to his wife is dated Fountainhall tells us, "Argile came in coach to the Toune Counsell, and from that on foot to the scaffold, with his hat on, betwixt Mr Annand, dean of Edinburgh, on his right hand—to whom he gave his paper on the scaffold—and Mr Lawrence Charteris, late professor of divinity in the college of Edinburgh He was somewhat appaled at the sight of the Maiden—present death will dunton the most resolute courage—therefor he caused bind the napkin upon his face ere he approached, and then was led to it" Under his misfortunes he evinced great firmness and self-possession He ate his dinner cheerfully on the day of his death, and, according to his usual custom, slept after it for a quarter of an hour or more very soundly At the place of execution he made a short, grave, and religious speech, and such was the calmness of his spirit that he took out of his pocket a little ruler, and measured the block Perceiving that it did not lie even, he pointed out the defect to a carpenter, and had it rectified After a solemn declaration that he forgave all his enemies, he submitted to death with extraordinary resolution and composure His body was interred in the Greyfriars churchyard, Edinburgh, under a monument, with a poetical inscription composed by himself in prison the day before his execution on account of which he has been admitted into Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, vol v edition 1806 He was twice married, first, to Lady Mary Stuart, eldest daughter of James, fifth earl of Moray, and, secondly, to Lady Anne Mackenzie, second daughter of Colin, first earl of Seaforth (dowager of Alexander, first earl of Balcarres) By the latter he had no issue, but by the former he had four sons and three daughters

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, tenth earl, and first duke of Argyle, son of the preceding, was an active promoter of the Revolution, and accompanied the prince of Orange to England In 1689 he was admitted into the Convention as earl of Argyle, though his father's attainder was not reversed He was one of the commissioners deputed from the Scots parliament to offer the crown of Scotland to the prince of Orange, and to tender him the coronation oath For this and other eminent services the family estates which had been forfeited were restored to him, he was admitted a member of the privy council, and in 1690 made one of the lords of the treasury In 1694 he was appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session, and, in 1696, colonel of the Scots horse guards He afterwards raised a regiment of his own clan, which greatly distinguished itself in Flanders On the 23d June 1701 he was created, by letters patent, duke of Argyle, marquis of Lorn and Kintyre, earl of Campbell and Cowal, viscount of Lochow and Glenila, baron Inverary, Mull, Morvern, and Tiry He died 28th September 1703 Though undoubtedly a man of ability, he was too dissipated to be a great statesman The scandal of the time alleged that his death was caused by a wound received in a brothel He married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Lionel Talmash, by whom he had two sons, the elder being John, the celebrated duke of Argyle and Greenwich

Lord Teignmouth, in his 'Sketches of the Coasts and Islands of Scotland,' [vol ii pp 380—382,] gives the following interesting anecdote of the second duchess of Argyle "The trees which adorn the shore of the bay were planted about a hundred and fifty years ago by a duchess of Argyle, who was extremely partial to Kintyre, fixed her residence chiefly at Campbellton, and inhabited a house on a site now occupied by a small farm-house, to which, however, it was much inferior This lady was the mother of the great duke John, and she is said to have adopted the following singular method of acquiring, for the duke, possession of the estates of the different proprietors, Campbells, to whom Argyle, after his conquest of Kintyre, had granted them On pretence of revising, as the tradition goes, she got into her hands and destroyed the charters of these unsuspecting people Thus the Argyle family revoked their original grants Campbell of Kildalloig, ancestor of the present proprietor of this estate, pleasantly situated on the outside of the bay, owed the preservation of it to the shrewdness of a servant, who suspecting the intentions of the duchess, ran off, carrying away his master's charter, and restored it not to him, till the fraud became apparent The family of this man were, till within few years, employed, in grateful recollection of his services, by the family at Kildalloig The duchess is said to have associated with herself, in her retreat, several young ladies of rank, whom she watched with Argus-eyed vigilance, lest they should stoop to alliance with the lairds of Kintyre Impatient of restraint, they eluded her observation, and are said to have preferred humble freedom to splendid chains"

CAMPBELL, JOHN, second duke of Argyle, and also duke of Greenwich, a steady patriot and celebrated general, the eldest son of the preceding, was born October 10, 1678 On the very day on which his grandfather suffered at Edinburgh, in June 1685, he fell from a window on the upper floor of Lethington, near Haddington, then the seat of his grandmother, the duchess of Lauderdale, without receiving any injury His father, anxious to put him in the way of advancement, introduced him to King William, who, in 1694, when not full seventeen years of age, gave him the command of a regiment On the death of his father in 1703, he became duke of Argyle, and was soon after sworn of the privy council, made captain of the Scots horse guards, and appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session

In 1704, on the revival of the order of the Thistle, he was installed one of the knights of that order He was soon after sent down as high commissioner to the Scots parliament, where, being of great service in promoting the projected Union, for which he became very unpopular in Scotland, he was, on his return to London, created a peer of England by the titles of baron of Chatham, and earl of Greenwich

In 1706 his Grace made a campaign in Flanders, under the duke of Marlborough, and distinguished himself at the battle of Ramillies, in which he acted as a brigadier general, and also at the siege of Ostend, and in the attack of Meenen, of which he took possession on the 25th of August After that event he returned to Scotland, in order to be present in the Scots parliament, when the treaty of Union was agitated In

1708 he commanded twenty battalions at the battle of Oudenarde He likewise assisted at the siege of Lisle, and commanded as major-general at the siege of Ghent, taking possession of the town and citadel, January 3, 1709 He was afterwards raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded in chief at the attack of Tournay He had also a considerable share, September 11, 1709, in the victory at Malplaquet On December 20, 1710, he was installed a knight of the Garter

In January 1711 he was sent to Spain as ambassador, and at the same time appointed commander-in-chief of the English forces in that kingdom On the peace of Utrecht he returned home Having changed his views regarding the Union, in June 1713 he supported an unsuccessful motion in the House of Lords for its repeal, occasioned by a malt bill being brought into the House for Scotland, on the ground that the Union had disappointed his expectations In the spring of 1714 he was deprived of all the offices he held under the crown On the accession of George the First he was made groom of the stole, and was one of the nineteen members of the regency nominated by his majesty On the king's arrival in England he was appointed general and commander-in-chief of the king's forces in Scotland

At the breaking out of the Rebellion in 1715 his grace, as commander-in-chief in Scotland, defeated the earl of Mar's army at Sheriffmuir, and forced the Pretender to retire from the kingdom In March 1716, after putting the army into winter quarters, he returned to London, but was in a few months, to the surprise of all, divested of all his employments In the beginning of 1718 he was again restored to favour, created duke of Greenwich, and made lord steward of the household, on resigning which, he was appointed master-general of the ordnance In 1722 the duke of Argyle distinguished himself in the House of Lords in a very interesting debate on the bill for banishing Dr Atterbury, bishop of Rochester It was chiefly owing to his grace's persuasive eloquence that this bill passed In 1726 he was appointed colonel of the prince of Wales' regiment of horse Such was his zeal for his native country that he warmly opposed the extension of the malt-tax to Scotland In Jan 1735-36 he was created field-marshal In 1737, when the affair of Captain Porteous came before parliament, his grace exerted himself vigorously and eloquently in behalf of the city of Edinburgh, a bill having been brought in for punishing the lord provost of that city, for abolishing the city guard, and for depriving the corporation of several ancient privileges, and when the queen regent threatened, on that occasion, to convert Scotland into a hunting park, replied, then it was time that he should be down to gather his beagles In 1739, when the convention with Spain was brought before the house, he spoke with warmth against it, and, in the same session, his grace opposed a vote of credit, as there was no sum limited in the message sent by his majesty

In April 1740 he delivered a speech with such warmth against the administration that he was again deprived of all his offices To these, however, on the resignation of Sir Robert Walpole, he was soon restored, but not approving of the measures of the new ministry, he gave up all his posts for the last time, and never afterwards engaged in affairs of state This amiable and most accomplished nobleman has been immortalized by Pope in the lines

> Argyle, the state's whole thunder born to wield
> And shake alike the senate and the field"

Thomson, in his poem of Autumn, also introduces an encomium on his grace, and he is mentioned by Tickell, Broome, and other poets of his time He was twice married By his first wife, Mary, daughter of John Brown, Esq, (and niece of Sir Charles Duncombe, Lord Mayor of London in 1708,) he had no issue By his second wife, Jane, daughter of Thomas Warburton of Winnington in Cheshire, one of the maids of honour to Queen Anne, he had five daughters His eldest daughter, Caroline, was created, in 1767, baroness Greenwich, but the title became extinct on her death in 1794 To his fifth daughter, Lady Mary Campbell, widow of Edward Viscount Coke, the son of the earl of Leicester, Lord Oxford dedicated his celebrated romance of the 'Castle of Otranto' As the duke died without male issue, his English titles of duke and earl of Greenwich and baron of Chatham became extinct, while his Scotch titles and patrimonial estate devolved on his brother He died of a paralytic disorder, October 4, 1743, and a beautiful marble monument, was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey There is an engraving of John duke of Argyle and Greenwich in Birch's Lives, from a portrait by Aikman, of which the following is a woodcut

CAMPBELL, Archibald, third duke of Argyle, the brother of the preceding, was born at Ham, Surrey, in June 1682, and educated at the university of Glasgow He afterwards studied the law at Utrecht, but entering the army, he served under the duke of Marlborough, was colonel of the 36th foot, and governor of Dumbarton castle He soon abandoned a military life, and employed himself in acquiring the qualifications necessary for a statesman In 1705 he was constituted lord high treasurer of Scotland, in 1706 one of the commissioners for treating of the Union between Scotland and England, and 19th October of the same year, for his services in that matter, was created viscount and earl of Ilay, and baron Oransay, Dunoon, and Arrase In 1708 he was made an extraordinary lord of session, and after the Union, was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland In 1710 he was appointed justice-general of Scotland, and the following year was called to the privy council Upon the accession of George the First, he was nominated lord register of Scotland, and when the rebellion broke out in 1715, he took up arms for the defence of the house of Hanover By his prudent conduct in the West Highlands, he prevented General Gordon, at the head of three thousand men, from penetrating into the country and raising levies He afterwards joined his brother, the duke of Argyle and Greenwich, at Stirling, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir In 1725 he was appointed keeper of the privy seal, and in 1734 of the great seal, which office he enjoyed till his death Upon the decease of his brother, in September 1743, he succeeded to the dukedom

As chancellor of the university of Aberdeen, he showed himself anxious to promote the interest of that as well as of the other universities of Scotland, and he particularly encouraged the school of medicine at Edinburgh He was the confidant of Walpole, and as he had the chief management of Scots affairs, he was very attentive in advancing the trade and manufactures and internal improvement of his native country He excelled in conversation, and besides building a very magnificent seat at Inveraray, he collected one of the most valuable private libraries in Great Britain He died suddenly, while sitting in his chair at dinner, April 15, 1761 He married the daughter of Mr Whitfield, paymaster of marines, but had no issue by her grace On his death the title of earl of Ilay became extinct By Mrs Anne Williams of Shrewburn, to whom he left his whole real and personal property in England, he had a son, William Williams, otherwise Campbell, who was appointed auditor of excise in Scotland 4th January 1739, and was a lieutenant-colonel in the army To the son of the latter, Archibald Campbell, Mr Coxe expresses his acknowledgments for the papers of his grandfather, Archibald, duke of Argyle, among which he found several original letters of Sir Robert Walpole

The third duke of Argyle was succeeded by his cousin, John, fourth duke, son of the Hon John Campbell of Mamore, second son of Archibald, the ninth earl of Argyle, (who was beheaded in 1685,) by Elizabeth, daughter of John, eighth lord Elphinstone The fourth duke was born about 1693 Before he succeeded to the honours of his family, he was an officer in the army, and saw some service in France and Holland During the rebellion of 1715, he acted as aide-de-camp to his chief, John duke of Argyle and Greenwich He was at the battle of Dettingen in 1741, as a brigadier-general He had the rank of major-general 24th February 1744, and served a campaign in Germany in that capacity When the rebellion of 1745 broke out, he was appointed to the command of all the troops and garrisons in the west of Scotland, and arrived at Inverary, 21st December of that year, and, with his eldest son, joined the duke of Cumberland at Perth, on the 9th of the following February He had the rank of lieutenant-general 27th April 1747, and was appointed, in 1761, governor of Limerick He was one of the grooms of the bedchamber both to George the Second and George the Third, and on succeeding as duke, he was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage He was a privy councillor, a knight of the Thistle, and became general 22d February 1765 He died 9th November 1770, in the 77th year of his age He married in 1720 the Hon Mary Bellenden, third daughter of the second Lord Bellenden, and had four sons and a daughter, Lady Caroline, married, first, to the third earl of Aylesbury, and secondly to field marshal Conway, brother of the marquis of Hertford Their only daughter, Anne Seymour, born 8th November 1748, married, 14th June 1767, the Hon George Damer, (eldest son of Joseph, Lord Milton, afterwards earl of Dorchester,) was a celebrated female sculptor She took lessons in the art from Ceracci and Bacon, and afterwards studied in Italy The colossal statue of George the Third, which adorns the interior of the Register House, Edinburgh, was executed by her, and presented to her uncle, Lord Frederick Campbell, Lord Clerk Register She also cut the figure of the eagle in the gallery at Strawberry Hill, thus inscribed, "Non me Praxiteles fecit, sed Anna Damer," by the earl of Orford, who bequeathed that beautiful Gothic villa and the principal part of his fortune to her Her husband died without issue in 1776, and she herself in 1808 Her uncle, Lord Frederick abovementioned, was the third of the sons of the 4th duke of Argyle He was appointed lord clerk register in November 1768, and laid the foundation stone of the General Register House at Edinburgh 27th June 1774 In January 1792 he obtained from the king a permanent sum of five hundred pounds a-year for the support of the fabric, and for defraying the various contingent expenses connected with it Observing the perishing condition of the parliamentary records of Scotland, he formed the design of getting them printed for the public benefit as the journals of both houses and the parliamentary rolls had been done in England In 1793 he obtained from his majesty an order for the removal to the General Register House at Edinburgh of a manuscript which, besides transcripts of many deeds relative to Scottish affairs, contained minutes of several parliaments of Scotland, antecedent to the earliest parliaments mentioned in the statute book, that had been discovered in the state paper office at London For this service he received the thanks of the court of session

John, fifth duke of Argyle, born in 1723, eldest son of the fourth duke, was also in the army, and attained the rank of general in March 1778, and of field-marshal in 1796 He was created a British peer, in the lifetime of his father, as Baron Sundridge of Coomb-bank in Kent, 19th December 1766, with remainder to his heirs male, and failing them to his brothers, Frederick and William, and their heirs male successively He was chosen the first president of the Highland Society of Scotland, to which society, in 1806 he made a munificent gift of one thousand pounds, as the beginning of a fund for educating young men of the West Highlands for the navy He died 24th May 1806, in the 83d year of his age He married at London, 3d March 1759, Elizabeth, widow of James, sixth duke of Hamilton, the second of the three beautiful Miss Gunnings, daughters of John Gunning Esq of Castle Coote, county Roscommon, Ireland Her grace was created a peeress of Great Britain, as Baroness Hamilton of Hameldon, Leicestershire, 4th May 1776, and died Dec 20 1790 By her the duke had 3 sons and 2 daughters 1 George John earl of Campbell and Cowal, born in 1763, died in infancy, 2 George William marquis of Lorn and 6th duke, 3 John Douglas Edward Henry, 7th duke, 4 Lady Augusta, m to General Clavering, 5 Lady Charlotte Susan Maria, styled the "Flower of the House of Argyle," born in 1775, m, first, in 1796, Colonel John Campbell, son of Walter Campbell, Esq of Shawfield, by whom (he died in 1809) she had a large family, and 2dly, in 1818, the Rev Edward John Bury, rector of Litchfield Hampshire, by whom she had a daughter He died in 1832 Lady Charlotte Bury died in April 1861 She was the authoress of several novels

George William, sixth duke of Argyle, born 22d September 1768, succeeded on the death of his uterine brother, Douglas, duke of Hamilton, in 1799, to his mother's baronage of Hamilton, and took his seat in the house of lords, as Baron Hamilton, 11th February, 1800 He was appointed his majesty's vice-admiral over the western coasts and islands of Scotland, excepting the shires of Bute and the islands of Orkney and Shetland, 9th February 1807 He married, 29th November, 1810, Caroline Elizabeth, daughter of the fourth earl of Jersey, whose previous marriage with the marquis of Anglesea had been dissolved in Scotland, at her ladyship's suit, but had no issue His grace died 22d October 1839

His brother, John Douglas Edward Henry, (Lord John Campbell of Ardincaple, M P) succeeded as seventh duke He was born 21st December 1777, and was thrice married, first, in August 1802, to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of William Campbell, Esq of Fairfield, who died in 1818, secondly, 17th April, 1820, to Joan, daughter and heiress of John Glassel, Esq of Long Niddry, and thirdly, in January 1831 to Anne Colquhoun eldest *d*r of John Cunningham, Esq of Craigends By his 2d wife he had 2 sons and one *d*r, namely, John Henry born in 1821 died in 1857, George Douglas, marquis of Lorn, who succeeded as 8th duke, and Lady Emma Augusta, born in 1825 His grace died 26th April 1847

The duke of Argyle is hereditary master of the queen's household in Scotland keeper of the castles of Dunoon, Dunstaffnage, and Carrick and heritable sheriff of Argyleshire

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, bishop of Aberdeen, and a religious writer of some note in his day, was the son of Lord Niel Campbell, and Lady Vere Ker, the former the second son of the great marquis of Argyle, and the latter the third daughter of the third earl of Lothian The date of his birth is uncertain He was educated for the episcopal-ian ministry, and after being long in priest's orders, he was, on the death of Bishop Sage, consecrated a bishop at Dundee, in the year 1711, by Bishops Rose, Douglas, and Falconar, but without any particular diocese On the 10th of May 1721, he was elected, by the clergy of Aberdeen, to be their ordinary, but never visited his diocese, residing chiefly in London, and finding that his views with regard to certain usages were not approved by the greater number of his brethren, he resigned his new office in 1724 [Keith's Scottish Bishops, App page 530] Skinner says of Bishop Campbell, that "he was highly commendable for his learning and other valuable accomplishments, which his curious writings, though out of the common line in some things, abundantly testify His affairs led him to reside mostly at London, where he long acted as a Scottish bishop, and in that character was of great service to our church [the Scots episcopal communion], having been among the first projectors, and, by his activity and connexions, a constant promoter of that charitable fund which was a great support to the poorer clergy in their straitened circumstances He had got into his hands the original registers of the General Assemblies produced by [Johnston of] Warriston in the rebellious Assembly of Glasgow in the year 1638, [in Mr Skinner's view that famous Assembly was 'rebellious,'] which he generously communicated to such of his brethren as had any use to make of them, and at last, in 1737, made a gift of them to Sion college for preservation In his latter days, he carried his singularities to such a length as to form a separate nonjuring communion in England, distinct from the Sancroftian line, and even ventured, in contradiction to the advice and opinion of his brethren in Scotland, upon the extraordinary step of a single consecration by himself, without any assistant, for keeping up the separation which, though Mr Lawrence, Mr Deacon, and some others, subsists in some of the western parts of England to this day" [Skinner's Ecclesiastical History, vol ii p 608] The records of the General Assemblies above referred to, were borrowed by the House of Commons, and the librarian of Sion's College holds the speaker, Mr Manners Sutton's receipt for them They were burnt in the great fire which destroyed the two houses of parliament in 1834 In 1717 Bishop Campbell became acquainted with Arsenius, the metropolitan of Thebais, who was then in London, and with others of his nonjuring brethren, made a proposition to that prelate, towards a union with the Eastern church, which Arsenius, on his going to Russia, communicated to the emperor Peter the Great His majesty not only approved of the design, but directed one of his clergy, of the order of Archimandrites, or chiefs of monasteries, from amongst whom the bishops of the Greek church are always chosen, to assure Bishop Campbell and his associates of his readiness to promote so good a work by all the means in his power A letter of thanks was returned to the emperor, but as there were five points, assimilating to the superstitious observances of the church of Rome, in which Campbell and his coadjutors could not agree with the Eastern church the union never took effect Bishop Campbell died in 1744

Donald Campbell, abbot of Cupar, elected bishop of Brechin in 1558, and lord privy seal to Queen Mary, was a son of the family of Argyle He never assumed the title of bishop, the election not being approved of by the Pope

The first protestant bishop of Brechin was Alexander Campbell, a son of Campbell of Ardkinglass In 1566, while yet a mere boy, he got a grant of the bishopric by the recommendation of the earl of Argyle, and he afterwards alienated most part of the lands and tithes of that see to his chief and patron, returning, says Keith, for his successors scarce so much as would be a moderate competency for a minister in Brechin It may be some set off against the displeasure of the worthy bishop, that this alienation was not a private arrangement, but done with the consent of the heads of the state, and confirmed by parliament On 7th May 1567 the bishop got a license from Queen Mary to depart and continue forth from the realm for the space of seven years, but it would appear that he did not leave Scotland for more than two years thereafter In the books of Assumptions there is particular instruction that this bishop was abroad at Geneva, "at the schools," on the 28th January 1573-4 After his return to Scotland, he sometimes exercised the office of particular pastor at Brechin, though he still retained the designation of bishop He died in the year 1606

The Campbells of Lochnell Argyleshire, are descended from Hon John Campbell, second son of Colin, third earl of Argyle, and in default of male descendants of John, fourth duke of Argyle, are heirs to the titles and estates Archibald Campbell of Lochnell, born in 1777, is the eleventh laird of Lochnell in direct descent

Four families of the name of Campbell enjoy the dignity and title of a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia, namely Campbell of Aberuchill and Kilbryde, created in 1627, Campbell of Ardnamurchan, Campbell of Auchinbreck, these two baronetcies being created in 1628, and Campbell of Muirhmont, in 1665 Six are baronets of the United Kingdom, namely, Campbell of Succoth (1808) Fitzgerald Campbell (1815), Cockburn-Campbell of Garscadden, Ross shire (1821), Campbell of Barcaldine and Glenure (1831), Campbell of Burmah (1831), (see SUPPLEMENT), and Campbell of Dunstaffnage (1836)

The founder of the Aberuchill family was Colin Campbell, second son of Sir John Campbell of Lawers, and uncle of the first earl of Loudoun, who got a charter from the Crown, in 1596, of the lands of Aberuchill, Perthshire His son, Sir James Campbell of Aberuchill a devoted royalist, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles I 10th Dec 1627 His representative, Sir James Campbell of Aberuchill, was born in 1818

The first baronet of the Ardnamurchan family was Sir Donald Campbell, natural son of Sir John Campbell of Calder, who was killed in 1592, by an assassin employed by Campbell of Ardkinglass, and others of the name of Campbell [See ante, page 374, art BREADALBANE] He was originally educated for the church, and became dean of Lismore, but he was of too restless a disposition to confine himself to his ecclesiastical duties His talents and activity recommended him to Argyle, by whom he was, in 1612, commissioned to reduce the district of Ardnamurchan to obedience He afterwards received from the earl a lease of Ardnamurchan, and made himself very obnoxious to the natives by his severities In May 1618, John Macdonald, captain of the Clanranald, united with the clan Ian, who acknowledged him as their chief, and expelled Campbell and his adherents from Ardnamurchan He was, however, afterwards repossessed in the disputed lands, and in 1625 he became heritable proprietor under Lord Lorn of the district of Ardnamurchan and Sunart, for which he paid an annual feu duty of two thousand merks He was created a baronet on 14th June 1628, with remainder to his heirs male whatsoever, which, in 1634, was changed to remainder to his nephew and his heirs male He was succeeded by his nephew, George Campbell, who inherited the estate of Airds in Argyleshire, but not that of Ardnamurchan which, owing to Sir Donald's having no male issue, reverted to the family of Argyle Neither this gentleman, however, nor any of his three successors assumed the title It was taken up by the sixth baronet, Sir John Campbell, born 15th March, 1767 only son of Alexander Campbell of Airds, on being served heir male to Sir Donald Campbell, the first baronet The seventh baronet, Sir John Campbell, born in 1807, admitted advocate in 1831, succeeded his father in 1834 He was lieutenant-governor of St Vincent's, and died there in 1853 His eldest son, Sir John William Campbell, born in 1836, succeeded as eighth baronet He served as an officer in the artillery in the campaign in the Crimea in 1854-5 in the trenches with the siege train before Sebastopol

The first baronet of the Auchinbreck family was Sir Dugald Campbell of Auchinbreck, knight the baronetcy being conferred on him 21st March 1628, with remainder to his heirs male whatsoever Sir Louis Henry Dugald Campbell, the eighth baronet, born March 2d, 1844, succeeded his father 9th December 1853

CAMPBELL, GEORGE, D D, a religious writer, born in Argyleshire in 1696, and educated in St Salvator's college, St Andrews, first obtained a living in the Highlands of Scotland In 1718 he was appointed professor of church history in the new college of St Andrews Certain of his publications, entitled 'Oratio de vanitate linguæ naturæ,' 'The Apostles no Enthusiasts,' and 'An Inquiry into the original of Moral Virtue' having been submitted for examination to a committee appointed by the commission of the General Assembly of 1735, were found to contain various unsound and objectionable passages, of an Armenian and Pelagian nature, similar to those taught by Professor Simson, professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, and for which the latter had been twice called to the bar of the General Assembly, and in the Assembly of 1736, Dr Campbell was allowed to give in an explanation and defence, the substance of which was that his meaning was quite different from what his words expressed, and that he did not hold the sentiments which were attempted to be drawn from them The Assembly, without passing any censure, agreed to a recommendation to Dr Campbell, and all ministers and teachers of divinity within the national church, to be cautious not to use doubtful expressions or propositions which might lead them hearers or readers into error, however sound such words or propositions might be in themselves, but "to hold fast the form of sound words" In the same year he published a Vindication of the Christian Religion He died in 1767, aged 71

CAMPBELL, Colin, an architect of reputation in the early part of last century, was born in Scotland, but the year of his birth is uncertain The best of his designs are Wanstead House, since pulled down, the Rolls, and Mereworth in Kent, the latter avowedly copied from Andrea Palladio He distinguished himself by publishing a collection of architectural designs in folio, entitled 'Vitruvius Britannicus,' the first volume of which appeared in 1715, the second in 1717, and the third in 1725 Many of these were his own, but plans of other architects were also introduced Two supplementary volumes by Woolfe and Gandon, both classical architects, appeared in 1767 and 1771 Campbell was surveyor of the works at Greenwich Hospital, and died about 1734 —Walpole's Anecdotes of Painters, &c

CAMPBELL, John, author of the Lives of the Admirals, a miscellaneous writer of considerable merit, was born at Edinburgh, March 8, 1708, and when five years old his mother removed with him to England Being intended for the law, he was articled to an attorney, but his taste leading him to literature, he did not pursue the legal profession His early productions are not known In 1736 he published, in 2 vols folio, 'The Military History of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough' The reputation he acquired by this work led to his being engaged to assist in writing the ancient part of the 'Universal History,' which extended to sixty vols 8vo The first two volumes of his 'Lives of the English Admirals and other Eminent Seamen,' the work by which he is best known, he published in 1742, and the two remaining volumes appeared in 1744 He wrote many of the articles in the 'Biographia Britannica,' which was commenced in 1745, his contributions to which work, extending through four volumes, and marked by a strain of almost unvarying panegyric, are distinguished by the initials E and X

For the 'Preceptor,' published by Dodsley in 1748, Mr Campbell wrote the Introduction to Chronology, and the Discourse on Trade and Commerce He was next employed on the modern part of the 'Universal History' In 1756 he had the degree of LL D bestowed on him by the university of Glasgow After the peace of Paris in 1763, he wrote, at the request of Lord Bute, a pamphlet in defence of it, pointing out the value of the West India Islands which had been ceded to this country For this service he was, in March 1765, appointed his majesty's agent for the province of Georgia in North America He was the author of many other publications, a list of which is subjoined Dr Campbell died at London, December 28, 1775 His works, so far as can be ascertained, are —

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, Colonel of the 29th regiment of infantry, and a brigadier general on the West India staff, was the younger son of an ancient family in Argyleshire, and related to the noble house of Argyle He served in the American war with great gallantry On his regiment coming to England, the majority being vacant, a commission was made out at the war office appointing another gentleman major On its being laid before the king for the royal signature, his majesty threw it aside, and ordered another to be drawn up for Major Campbell, saying, "A good and deserving officer must not be passed over" In 1792 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel of the 21st, and afterwards to that of the 29th He was with his regiment on board the fleet in the glorious action of the 1st of June 1794 In 1795 he was sent with the troops to the West Indies, where, on his arrival, he was appointed brigadier-general His merits in this service were conspicuous, but unfortunately he was seized with a fever, of which he died, August 15, 1796

CAMPBELL, WILLIELMA, viscountess Glenorchy, a lady of great piety and usefulness, the daughter of William Maxwell, Esq of Preston, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, a branch of the Nithsdale family, was born, after her father's death, September 2, 1741 Her education, and that of her sister, devolved upon her mother, a lady of a proud and ambitious spirit, who strove to instil the same character of mind into her daughters The two sisters were married about the same time, Mary, the eldest, to the earl of Sutherland, premier earl of Scotland, and Willielma to John, Viscount Glenorchy, the second son and heir of John, the third earl of Breadalbane Highly accomplished and beautiful, she was well fitted to adorn her high station, and for some time after her marriage she spent her time in the usual gaieties and pleasures of fashionable life, in the course of which she resided for two years on the continent Her attention was first awakened to the subject of religion, through an intimacy which she contracted with the pious family of Sir Rowland Hill at Hawkstone, in the neighbourhood of her occasional residence, Great Sugnal, in Staffordshire Early in the summer of 1765, while residing at Taymouth castle, Perthshire, she was seized with a dangerous fever, in recovering from which her thoughts were more particularly directed to religious matters, and from a correspondence which she carried on with Miss Hill, a member of the Hawkestone family, and a relative of the celebrated Lord Hill, she derived much spiritual instruction and consolation Her husband having sold his estate of Sugnal in Staffordshire, purchased that of Barnton near Edinburgh, and the change of residence was particularly pleasing to her ladyship

With Lady Maxwell, who, like herself, was zealous in the cause of religion, she joined in the plan of having a place of worship in which ministers of every orthodox denomination should preach With this design, Lady Glenorchy hired St Mary's chapel in Niddry's Wynd, Edinburgh, which was opened for the purpose on Wednesday, March 7, 1770, by the Rev Mr Middleton, then minister of a small episcopal chapel at Dalkeith The countenance which she gave to the Methodist preachers led to her acquaintance with Mr Wesley, and caused the ministers of the establishment to decline officiating in the chapel Her ladyship, therefore, resolved to select a pious clergyman, who, besides acting as her domestic chaplain, should regularly preach there On the recommendation of Miss Hill, the Rev Richard de Courcy, an episcopalian minister, was appointed to that office A private chapel had been erected at Barnton, but in little more than a month after Lord and Lady Glenorchy's arrival there his lordship died, 14th November, 1771, bequeathing to her his whole disposable property, and her father-in-law, Lord Bredalbane, having paid the balance of the purchase-money of that estate, presented it to her After her husband's death, Lady Glenorchy took up her residence at Holyroodhouse, spending the summer usually at Taymouth castle Being now possessed of considerable wealth, she formed the design of erecting a chapel in Edinburgh, in communion with the Church of Scotland, which was speedily built at the old Physic Gardens, in the park of the Orphans' Hospital, and opened for divine worship on Sabbath, May 8, 1774 Shortly after this, at the request of Mr Stuart, minister of Killin, she built and endowed a chapel at Strathfillan, placing it under the direction and patronage of the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian knowledge She also employed, at her own expense, two licensed preachers as missionaries in the Highlands, under the sanction and countenance of the same society In the Synod of Lothian and Tweeddale, in 1775, a strong attempt was made, which for the time was successful, to prevent the chapel of Lady Glenorchy from being admitted into the communion of the church The unfavourable decision of the Synod, however, was reversed by the General Assembly in the following May

After repeated disappointments in the choice of a minister for her chapel in Edinburgh, Lady Glenorchy fixed upon the Rev Francis Sheriff, chaplain in one of the Scots regiments in Holland, who soon died The Rev Mr afterwards Dr Jones, assistant minister at Plymouth Dock, was next appointed, and having been duly ordained by the Scots presbytery in London, he officiated as minister of Lady Glenorchy's chapel for upwards of half a century Her ladyship also purchased Presbyterian chapels in Exmouth, Carlisle, and Matlock, and built one at Workington in Cumberland, and another in Bristol, in the latter of which she was aided by a bequest of two thousand five hundred pounds, from her friend and companion in her latter years, Lady Henrietta Hope, daughter of the earl of Hopetoun Lady Glenorchy died about 1786 Previous to her death she sold the Barnton estate to William Ramsay, Esq, then an eminent banker in Edinburgh Lady Glenorchy's chapel in the Orphan Park was taken down in 1845, with other buildings there, for the formation of the North British Railway A Life of her ladyship was published by the Rev Dr Jones, after her death, which is much esteemed

CAMPBELL, JOHN, a naval officer of merit, of whose origin and early history nothing is known, accompanied Lord Anson in his voyage round the world He was then a petty officer on board the Centurion Soon after his return he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and in 1747 was appointed captain of the Bellona In 1755 he was promoted to the Prince, of 90 guns In 1759 we find him under Sir Edward Hawke, as captain on board the Royal George His valour was conspicuous in the battle which ended in the total defeat of the marquis de Conflans, off Belleisle, and he was despatched to England with intelligence of the victory, when the offer of knighthood was made to him, but he declined it In 1778 he was promoted to the rank of rear admiral, and afterwards became progressively vice-admiral of the Blue and of the White He died December 16, 1790

CAMPBELL, JOHN, a lieutenant-colonel in the army, who, during his too brief career, greatly distinguished himself by his valour and merit, and gave promise of rendering important services to his country, was the second son of John Campbell, Lord Stonefield, a judge of the court of session, descended from the Campbells of Lochnell, and Lady Grace Stewart, sister of John earl of Bute, and was born at Edinburgh, December 7, 1753 He received his education at the high school of his native city, and at the age of eighteen became an ensign in the 57th regiment Three years afterwards he was appointed lieutenant of the 7th foot, or Royal Fusileers, with which regiment he served in Canada, where he was made prisoner In 1775 he was promoted to a captaincy in the 71st foot, and some time after was appointed major of the 74th, or Argyleshue Highlanders In Feb 1781 he exchanged into the 100th regiment, and with this corps he served with distinction in the East Indies, against the troops of Hyder Ali, during which period he was appointed to the majority of the second battalion of the 42d regiment In one engagement with Tippoo Sultan, when the latter was repulsed with great loss, Major Campbell was wounded, but did not quit the field till the enemy was defeated He was afterwards engaged in the siege of Annantpore, which he reduced and took from the enemy In May 1783 he was appointed to the provisional command of the army in the Bidnure country His defence of the important fortress of Mangalore, where he was stationed, against the prodigious force of Tippoo, amounting to about one hundred and forty thousand men, with a hundred pieces of artillery, is justly accounted one of the most remarkable achievements that ever signalised the British arms in India The garrison, under Major Campbell's command, consisted only of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three men, of whom not more than two or three hundred were British soldiers, the remainder being Sepoys, or native infantry This little garrison, however, resisted for two months and a half all the efforts of Tippoo, after which, a cessation of hostilities taking place, the siege was turned, for a time, into a blockade The bravery and resolution displayed by Major Campbell on this occasion, were so much admired by Tippoo, who commanded his army in person, that he expressed a wish to see him The major, accompanied by several of his officers, accordingly waited on Tippoo, who presented to each of them a handsome shawl, and after then return to the fort, he sent Major Campbell an additional present of a very fine horse, which the famishing garrison afterwards killed and ate After sustaining a siege of eight months, during which they were reduced to the greatest extremities by disease and famine, the garrison at length capitulated, January 24, 1784, and on the 30th they evacuated the fort, and embarked for Tellicherry, one of the British settlements on the coast of Malabar He had now attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, but the fatigue which he endured during this memorable siege had undermined his constitution and, in the following month, he was obliged, by ill health, to quit the army and retire to Bombay, where he died, March 23, 1784, in the 31st year of his age A monument was erected to his memory in the church at Bombay, by order of the East India Company

CAMPBELL, GEORGE, a minor poet, was born in Kilmarnock in 1761 His father died when he was very young Who he was, or what trade or profession he followed, is not known His mother, whose maiden name was Janet Parker, earned a scanty subsistence by winding yarn for the carpet works His education was very limited, and he was bred a shoemaker Being of a religious cast of mind, he formed the resolution of studying for the ministry, and to procure the means necessary for prosecuting his studies at college, he laboured at his trade not only very hard during the day, but frequently during the night, when others were asleep, and by thus working industriously, he raised himself above the occupation of shoemaking, and became teacher of a small school in Kilmarnock In his efforts he was greatly befriended by the late Rev Dr Mackinlay of Kilmarnock, who assisted him by lending him books, and otherwise placing within his reach the means of intellectual improvement To aid in defraying his expenses at college, he collected and published his poetical pieces, in the year 1787 They were printed in Kilmarnock at the press of John Wilson, from which had been issued in the preceding year, the first edition of the poems of Robert Burns The book was of a 12mo size, containing 192 pages, and was entitled 'Poems on Several Occasions, by George Campbell' In the preface the author states "that it is the production of a tradesman, obliged at the time it was composed to labour for his daily maintenance," and that his sole intention in writing the various pieces in the volume was "to celebrate virtue, to ridicule vice, and to paint the works of nature and the manners of mankind" Though displaying neither richness of imagination nor depth or originality of thought, and not remarkable for elegance of diction, his poems are not deficient in merit, and exhibit in numerous instances much plain good sense, with a shrewdness of observation and a chasteness of expression which few minor poets possess The longest poem in the volume is founded on the Book of Esther, and bears that name, but, with the exception of a few passages, it is inferior, as poetry, to some of his other productions The best of the pieces are, 'A Morning Contemplation,' 'Ossian's Address to the Sun,' and 'A Winter Evening—Scene, A Farm-House in the Country,' which are all in the heroic verse

After attending the ordinary period at college, Mr Campbell was licensed to preach the gospel by the Burgher Associate Synod, and was appointed pastor to a congregation in that connection at Stockbridge, near Dunbar As a preacher he is said to have displayed considerable ability and zeal In 1816 he published at Edinburgh a collection of Sermons, in an octavo volume of 479 pages, more with the desire, as he hints in his preface, of being useful as a teacher of Christianity than distinguished as an author In appearance Mr Campbell was somewhat slender He died of consumption, at Stockbridge, the place of his ministry, about the year 1818 —Contemporaries of Burns

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER, a miscellaneous writer, born in 1764, at Tombea, Loch Lubnaig, Perthshire, was the son of a country wright or carpenter, who, by perseverance and economy, had saved five hundred pounds, which, with the exception of a trifling dividend, he lost by lending to his landlord, who became bankrupt Old Campbell then removed to Edinburgh, where he soon after died, leaving a widow, two sons and three daughters Alexander, the younger son, who was only eleven years old when this event occurred, had received some education at the grammar-school of Callander, and with his elder brother, John (for twenty years a teacher in Edinburgh, and leader of psalmody in the parish church of Canongate), became a pupil of Tenducci, an accomplished musician who had fixed his residence in Edinburgh about this period

Alexander was first known as a teacher of the harpsichord and of singing, officiating at the same time as organist to an episcopal chapel in the neighbourhood of Nicolson street, Edinburgh Amongst his pupils was Sir Walter Scott, who describes him as "a warm-hearted man and an enthusiast in Scotch music, which he sang most beautifully." Of Scott, however, he could make nothing, as the great novelist had no ear for music His first publication was a volume of 'Odes and Miscellaneous Poems' His 'Introduction to the History of Poetry in Scotland,' of which only ninety copies were printed, appeared in 1798 After publishing four years later 'A Tour through North Britain,' which obtained him some reputation, he signally failed in a volume of poetry brought out in 1804 The object of this publication was to expose the depopulation policy of the Highland proprietors, and to direct the attention of the legislature to some remedy for it But the poetry was not of a very superior order and the work 'fell dead from the press' One incident, however, related in a note, led to the institution of the Edinburgh "Destitute Sick Society," which still exists By this time he had been twice married, the second time to the widow of Ranald Macdonald, Esq of Keppoch On marrying this lady he relinquished the profession of teacher of music, and studied medicine, in the hope of obtaining an appointment through the influence of his friends, but in this he was disappointed In order to encourage him, however, a sum of money was voted by the Highland Society of Scotland to enable him to make a collection of Gaelic melodies and vocal poetry He forthwith set out on a tour through the Highlands and Western Islands Having performed a journey of between eleven and twelve hundred miles, in which he collected one hundred and ninety-one specimens of melodies and Gaelic vocal poetry, he returned to Edinburgh, and laid the fruits of his gleanings before the Society, who expressed their approbation of them The result of these labours appeared in his 'Albyn's Anthology,' a compilation published some time afterward Among those who furnished pieces for this publication were Sir Walter Scott, Mr , afterwards Sir Alexander Boswell, Hogg, Maturin, Mrs Grant of Laggan, and other eminent song writers of the day In this work he claims authorship of the air to Tannahill's beautiful song of "Gloomy winter's now awa'" The question has been discussed by Mr Stenhouse (Musical Museum, vol vi p 508,) but is not important, and it does not appear that Campbell made out his claim, as an air time out of mind known as "The Coldwaimer's march" was the basis of Smith's set During the latter years of his life Campbell was employed by Sir Walter Scott in the transcription of manuscripts, which, indeed, formed his chief mode of subsistence Although a man of many accomplishments, they were, says Sir Walter, dashed with a bizarrerie of temper which made them useless to their proprietor

Mr Campbell died of apoplexy, May 15, 1824, in the sixty-first year of his age, and an obituary notice of him, from the pen of Sir Walter Scott, appeared in the Edinburgh Weekly Journal

After Mr Campbell's death, his books, manuscripts, and other effects, were sold under judicial authority, and amongst other manuscripts was a tragedy, which was purchased by the late Mr William Stewart, bookseller Both he and his brother, Mr John Campbell, were caricatured by Kay, and biographical sketches of them are inserted in 'Kay's Edinburgh Portraits'

The following is a list of his works

CAMPBELL, JOHN, a zealous missionary and African traveller was born at Edinburgh in March 1766 His father died when he was not more than two years old, and his mother when he was only six A maternal uncle, of the name of Bowes, a sincere Christian, who was an elder or deacon of the Relief church, received him and his two brothers under his roof, and attended strictly to their religious training, as well as to their domestic comfort With his brothers he was educated at the High School of his native place, then under the rectorship of Dr Adams, after leaving which he was apprenticed to a respectable goldsmith and jeweller in Edinburgh About 1789, when on a journey to London, he became acquainted with the Rev John Newton, with whom he regularly corresponded for a long period In the same year he began to publish and circulate religious tracts, at first privately, and that chiefly among his friends and their families It afterwards occurred to some of his friends that a plan might be formed to print small pamphlets on religious subjects, to be distributed gratis, or sold at a cheap rate, and Mr Campbell, in July 1793, was one of about a dozen who formed themselves into a Religious Tract Society, in Edinburgh, the first society of the kind that ever existed in the world His name, therefore, deserves to be recorded, as one of the founders, if not the originator, of Tract Societies His next scheme for the advancement of religion was the establishment of Sabbath evening schools, of which very few then existed in Scotland In 1795, he established Sabbath evening schools at the Archer's Hall, and in the hall of the Edinburgh Dispensary, and engaged teachers, at a small salary, to instruct the children in the essential truths of the gospel At Loanhead, then a colliery village, about five miles south of Edinburgh, he himself taught, for two years, a Sabbath evening school, which he had also commenced there The success that followed his efforts in and around Edinburgh induced him, in connexion with Mr J A Haldane, to visit Glasgow, Paisley, Greenock, and other places in the west, to urge the formation of similar institutions, and the result was that sixty Sabbath schools were formed in those places within three months

In 1796 Mr Campbell's attention was directed to the degraded condition of the female streetwalkers of Edinburgh, and with a view to their reformation, he was mainly instrumental in forming the Philanthropic Society, which was the commencement of the institution known as the Magdalene Asylum, and was its secretary till he left Edinburgh for Glasgow, where he was one of the first originators of a similar institution in that city Towards the end of the same year Mr Haldane applied to Mr Campbell to accompany him and his associates, Dr Bogue and Messrs

Ewing and Innes, on their intended mission to Bengal At first he was willing to go, but the arguments of his friends, Mr Newton, and the pious countess of Leven, were effectual in leading him to abandon the design He now commenced a system of village preaching, and at Gilmerton, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, he succeeded in establishing a regular Sabbath evening service, which was supplied by students of divinity and lay preachers Messrs Aikman and Haldane, as well as Mr Campbell, commenced their exertions as lay-preachers in Gilmerton He afterwards frequently preached also at Lasswade, Dalkeith, Musselburgh and Linlithgow, and other places near Edinburgh On the formation of the Edinburgh Missionary Society he was chosen one of the Directors. In 1798 he suggested the establishment of the Tabernacle in Edinburgh, which was so long presided over by Mr J A Haldane Early in 1799 he gave up his business of a hardware merchant, went to Dundee, and joined a class under Mr (afterwards Dr) Innes, preparatory to his entering on the regular ministry, and in 1800, he, with the other students, removed to Glasgow, under Mr Greville Ewing, who had shortly before left the Established Church and joined the Independents At this time he occasionally preached in the suburbs, particularly at Rutherglen In June of that year Mr Campbell and Mr Haldane itinerated in the south of Scotland, and in the autumn they preached through Kintyre After leaving the class Mr Campbell returned to Edinburgh, and assisted Mr Haldane in the Tabernacle for sometime, and aided in the instruction of the students the academy being then removed from Glasgow In April 1808, he again visited Kintyre, and in the following month he accompanied Messrs Haldane and Innes on a tour to the counties of Perth, Inverness, Ross, and Caithness, and to the islands of Orkney Subsequently he and Mr Haldane went on an itinerating tour to the southern counties of Scotland and the northern counties of England Mr Campbell afterwards accepted a call to take the pastoral office at Kingsland chapel, London, [being ordained in the beginning of 1804] the duties of which he discharged for thirty-seven years, with credit to himself, and great usefulness to others For the instruction of the young, he set on foot 'The Youth's Magazine,' of the first ten volumes of which he was editor He was one of the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of the London Hibernian Society, and of the Female Penitentiary As his income was small, he had to take up a school at Kingsland to add to it In 1812, at the request of the Directors of the London Missionary Society, he visited their stations in South Africa, and again in 1818 On his return from each of his voyages to Africa, he travelled through most of the counties of England and Scotland, and also visited Ireland, to plead in behalf of the Missionary Society He died April 4, 1840, aged 74 His works are

Alfred and Galba or the History of the Two Brothers, supposed to be written by themselves Lond 1807, 8vo

Remarkable Particulars in the Life of Moses Lond 1808, 12mo

Voyages and Travels of a Bible 1808

Travels in South Africa undertaken at the request of the Missionary Society London, 1814, 8vo 2d edit 1815, 8vo

Second Journey in South Africa, 1818 2 vols 8vo London, 1822

He also prepared an abridgment of his African Travels, in two small volumes, for the Religious Tract Society, and added to them a similar volume, giving an account of his voyages

He was also the author of a small unpretending but useful little book, entitled 'African Light,' the object of which was to illustrate passages of Scripture by a reference to his own observations in South Africa

Walks of Usefulness

CAMPBELL, Thomas, a distinguished poet, the most perfect lyrical writer of his time, was born at Glasgow on the 27th of July, 1777 Alexander Campbell, the father of the poet, was the youngest of the three sons of the laird of Kinnan, and was born in 1710 He was educated for the mercantile profession, and early in life went to America, where he entered into business, and resided many years at Falmouth, in Virginia There he had the pleasure of receiving his brother Archibald, on his first quitting Jamaica to settle in the United States, and there also, about ten years afterwards, he formed an intimate acquaintance with Daniel Campbell, a clansman, but no relation, with whom he returned to Glasgow, and there entered into partnership with him as Virginian traders, under the firm of Alexander and Daniel Campbell For some years their business prospered, and both partners were highly esteemed as men of probity and experience Daniel, the junior partner, had a sister named Margaret, whom Alexander took to be his wife, and she became the mother of the poet They were married in the cathedral church of Glasgow on the 12th of January 1756 At this time Mrs Campbell was about twenty, while her husband had reached the mature age of forty-five They had eight sons and three daughters, and the poet, who was the youngest of the family, was born when his father had reached his 67th year, the age at which he himself died

The outbreak of the war with America in 1775, two years before the poet's birth, ruined the Virginia trade, and many of the Glasgow merchants suffered severely in their business and fortunes Amongst others, the old and respectable firm of Alexander and Daniel Campbell sustained losses from which they never recovered, and saw very nearly the whole amount of forty years' successful industry swept away at once, from the failure of other houses with which they were connected The poet's father is stated by his biographer to have lost at this disastrous time a sum of not less than twenty thousand pounds, while his uncle, Daniel Campbell, always estimated his own individual loss at eleven or twelve thousand pounds

The poet's father died at the age of 91, in the spring of 1801, and his death is recorded in the 'Edinburgh Magazine,' with high encomiums on his moral and religious character He is mentioned as a gentleman of unblemished integrity and amiable manners, who united the scholar and the man of business, and amidst the corroding cares of trade, cherished a liberal and enthusiastic love of literature His mother was a person of much taste and refinement, and well educated for the age and the sphere in which she moved She is described as being passionately fond of music, particularly sacred music, and she sang many of the popular melodies of Scotland with taste and effect She knew many of the traditional songs of the Highlands, especially those of Argyleshire, and from her it seems probable that the love of song was early imbibed and cultivated by her children

The poet was born in his father's house in the High street of Glasgow, which stood nearly opposite the university, but has long since been taken down He was baptized by Dr Thomas Reid professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow, who preached in the college-hall on Sabbaths, and after whom he was named He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school, now called the high school, of his native city At the age of seven he commenced the study of the Latin language under the Rev David Allison, a teacher of much reputation At this time he possessed a vivacity of imagination and a vigour of mind surprising in a boy so young A strong inclination for poetry was already discernible in him, and at an early age he began to write verses At the grammar school he became an enthusiastic admirer of Greek, and a passion for the Greek poets and orators distinguished him during life In October 1791, when in his thirteenth year, he entered Glasgow university At this period he is described as having, with uncommon personal beauty, possessed a winning gentleness and modesty of manners, a cheerful and happy disposition, and a generous sensibility of heart, which made him the object of universal favour and admiration

His biographer says that even while a student, he was not characterized by the virtue of close application "While a mere boy," he states, "Campbell appears to have had the enviable tact of looking into a book, and extracting from it whatever was valuable He took the cream, and left what remained for the perusal of less fastidious readers" In his first year at college he gained three prizes He also, after a formidable competition with a student nearly twice his own age, who was considered one of the best scholars in the university, gained the exhibition, called in Scotland a bursary, on Archbishop Leighton's foundation, for a translation of one of the comedies of Aristophanes, which he executed in verse He continued seven years at the university, and his proficiency was each year rewarded by an academical prize being conferred on him In translations from the Greek he was so successful that his fellow-students at last declined to compete with him His poetical version of several entire plays of Aristophanes, Æschylus, and others obtained the high praise of his professor, who, in awarding him the prize for a translation of 'The Clouds' of Aristophanes, accompanied it with the flattering and unusual compliment, publicly expressed, "that, in his opinion, it was the best performance which had ever been given in within the walls of the university." Some of these translations he afterwards published among his poems. By Professor Young, who then filled the Greek chair in the university of Glasgow, he was encouraged to cultivate that love for the language and literature of Greece, which he had already so successfully displayed. On one occasion he gained the professor's favour, and a holiday for the students, by a Greek poem, in the form of a petition, which he had slipt into the professor's Greek text book. One of his early poetical attempts at this period he got printed, in the ballad form, on slips of paper, and distributed among his fellow-students.

While at college he was obliged by his necessities to give elementary instruction to younger lads, but while thus prosecuting vigorously his classical studies, he continued to pursue his poetical fancies and work his upward way in the path that was to lead him to lasting fame. In 1793, while yet only in his fifteenth year, during the college vacation, he attended for several weeks in the office of Mr Alexander Campbell, a writer in Glasgow, author of several pamphlets on the bankruptcy laws, a relation by his mother's side, but he went there only on trial, and disliking the business, he soon left it. During his third session at college, according to the late Dr Duncan of Ruthwell, who was his fellow-student, he made several enemies by the severity of his satirical effusions, particularly on the Irish students, but many of them were the cause of amusement, rather than of anger. In the logic class he was commended for his exercises by Professor Jardine, although not in the warmest terms, for, at this period, it would appear that although an excellent Latin and Greek scholar, he could not spell or write the English language with propriety. Before leaving college he also attended the lectures of Professor Millar, who then filled, with much distinction, the chair of civil law. He seems at one period to have had an intention of studying for the church of Scotland, but the want of any hope of efficient patronage caused him to change his purpose. He next thought of studying for the medical profession, but this required a greater outlay than his circumstances permitted, and after attending some preliminary lectures this idea was also abandoned. He then entered the counting house of a merchant where he remained for some time, still hankering after the church, studying Hebrew in his leisure hours, and writing religious poetry.

Undecided as to his future pursuits, he went in the summer of 1795 to the island of Mull, to act as tutor in the family of Mrs Campbell of Sunipol. There he remained for five months, and returned to Glasgow for his fifth session. During the winter he supported himself by private tuition. Among other scholars, he had a youth named Cunninghame, who became an advocate and was afterwards made a lord of session under the title of Lord Cunninghame.

After leaving college he passed some time as a tutor in the family of General Napier, who was then residing at Downie, on the romantic banks of Loch Goil, among the mountains of Argyleshire. He disliked, however, the profession of a tutor, and on leaving Downie he went to Edinburgh, where the reputation he had acquired at the university gained him a favourable reception into the distinguished circle of science and literature for which that city was then renowned. At this time the poet proposed to establish a magazine, but funds were wanting. Through the recommendation of Mr Cunninghame he found employment in the Register House. He was subsequently engaged in the office of a Mr Whytt, and being introduced to Dr Robert Anderson, the biographer of the poets, received through him an engagement for an abridged edition of 'Bryan Edward's West Indies,' for which he was paid £20. He returned to Glasgow to meet a brother whom he had never seen, and to finish his abridgment. At that time he wrote 'The Wounded Hussar,' and 'The Dirge of Wallace,' two of his most popular lyrics.

At the age of nineteen he was again in Edinburgh, figging for Messrs Mundell and Son, the publishers, at a very limited rate of remuneration. About this period he formed arrangements to proceed to Virginia, in North America, but the state of his health set them aside. He commenced to write 'The Pleasures of Hope,' about 1797. He resided at this time in a small house on St John's Hill, and of the young men then resident in Edinburgh, with whom he associated, several raised themselves to eminence and consideration Amongst them were the two lawyers who subsequently became Lords Cockburn and Brougham He published 'the Pleasures of Hope' in 1799, when he was scarcely twenty-two, the volume being dedicated to Dr Robert Anderson It was sold to the Mundells for £60 in cash and books, but for two or three years the publishers gave him fifty pounds on every new edition, besides allowing him to print a splendid edition of the work for himself The success of this work was such as at once to place the young author in the foremost rank of the poets of the time In planning the poem he seems to have taken Pope and Goldsmith as his models and to have caught something of the spirit of Gray, but in harmony of versification, and elegance, and above all genuine fervour of style, he far exceeds them all, as well as every other poet that had gone before him In these and other essential qualities, indeed, this exquisite production is not surpassed by anything in British poetry In the original manuscript the different sections of the poem had separate distinctive titles, but by the advice of Dr Anderson these were dispensed with, and 'the Pleasures of Hope' came before the world as a complete poem Some lines at the beginning were also omitted Soon after its publication, Mr Campbell entered into an engagement with Mr Mundell for another poem, descriptive of Scottish history, to be called, 'The Queen of the North,' of which the prospectus was published, and arrangements for its illustration were made with Mr Williams, a landscape painter, but the work was never completed

Anxious to become acquainted with German literature at its fountainhead, as well as to visit foreign parts, in the summer of 1800 he left for Hamburgh This he was enabled to do by the profits arising from the sale of his 'Pleasures of Hope' He had originally fixed on the university of Jena for his first place of residence, but on his arrival at Hamburgh, he found by the public prints that a victory had been gained by the French near Ulm, and that Munich and the heart of Bavaria were the theatre of war From the walls of the monastery of St Jacob, he witnessed the memorable battle of Hohenlinden, fought on the 3d December 1800 between the French under General Moreau, and the Austrians under the Archduke John, when the latter were signally defeated "One moment's sensation," he observes in a letter to a relation in this country, "the single hope of seeing human nature exhibited in its most dreadful attitude, overturned my past decisions I got down to the seat of war some weeks before the summer armistice of 1800, and indulged in, what you will call, the criminal curiosity of witnessing blood and desolation Never shall time efface from my memory the recollection of that hour of astonishment and suspended breath, when I stood with the monks of St Jacob to overlook a charge of Kienan's cavalry upon the French under Grenier, encamped below us We saw the fire given and returned, and heard distinctly the sound of the French pas de charge, collecting the lines to attack in close column After three hours waiting the issue of a severe action, a park of artillery was opened just beneath the walls of the monastery, and several waggoners, that were stationed to convey the wounded in spring waggons, were killed in our sight" His spirit-stirring lyric of 'The Battle of Hohenlinden' was written on this event—a poem which, perhaps, contains more grandeur and martial sublimity than is to be found anywhere else, in the same compass of English poetry He afterwards proceeded to Ratisbon, where he was at the time it was taken possession of by the French, and expected, as a British subject, to be made prisoner, but, he observes, "Moreau's army was under such excellent discipline, and the behaviour both of officers and men so civil, that I soon mixed among them without hesitation, and formed many agreeable acquaintances at the messes of their brigade stationed in town, to which their chef-de-brigade often invited me This worthy man, Colonel Le Fort, whose kindness I shall ever remember with gratitude, gave me a protection to pass through the whole army of Moreau"

After this Mr Campbell visited different parts of Germany, and had the misfortune to be plundered, amongst the Tyrolese mountains, by a Croat, of his clothes, his books, and thirty ducats in gold About mid-winter he returned to Altona, where he remained four months While in Germany, he made the friendship of the two Schlegels, and passed an entire day with Klopstock At Altona

he casually became acquainted with some refugee Irishmen, who had been engaged in the rebellion of 1798, and their story suggested to him his beautiful ballad of 'The Exile of Erin.' The hero of the poem was an Irish exile, named Anthony M'Cann, whom he had met at Hamburgh. A claim was subsequently got up by the editor of an Irish provincial paper, on the part of an Irishman of the name of Nugent, to the authorship of this song, professing to have drawn his information from Nugent's sister, but the question was conclusively settled by the certificate of the late Lord Nugent, a relative of the person by whom the song is said to have been composed, which stated that for a considerable period, Mr Nugent, the supposed author, was quite familiar with the song, knew it in Campbell's works, and never personally claimed the authorship. The circumstances connected with the song were all well known to the party of Irish exiles whom Campbell met at Altona, by whom it was first sung, and on whose account it had been written. His beautiful verses addressed to Judith, the Jewess, were also written in Altona. About this time also, he wrote 'Ye Mariners of England,' after the model of an old song 'Ye Gentlemen of England.' A war with Denmark was at that time expected, and seems to have suggested to the poet the idea of this noble lyric. The fifth line of the second stanza was originally different, but after the battle of Trafalgar, Mr Campbell introduced the name of Nelson, making it read,

'Where Blake and mighty Nelson fell

Early in the spring of 1801 war was declared against Denmark, when the English residents were obliged to leave Altona, and Campbell sailed for England on the 6th of March. They were allowed to pass the English batteries without molestation, and sailed under convoy to England. There were only two Scottish vessels in convoy, and they were carried to Yarmouth along with the English fleet. Mr Campbell arrived in London with only a few shillings in his pocket, for all his resources had been expended in assisting a friend at Altona. Though unprovided with a single letter of introduction, the fame of his poetry procured him immediate admission into the best literary society. While on the continent it would appear that Mr Perry of the Morning Chronicle was paying him for poems contributed to that journal from the seat of war. Although he had never seen Mr Perry, he was obliged to call upon him and explain his situation to him, and he had no cause to repent of it. Writing to one of his Scotch correspondents the poet says, "I have found Perry. His reception was warm and cordial, beyond what I had any right to expect. 'I will be your friend,' said the good man. 'I will be all that you could wish me to be.'" In reference to this his first visit to London, he says, in his own notes, "Calling on Perry one day, he showed me a letter from Lord Holland, asking about me, and expressing a wish to have me to dine at the King of Clubs. Thither with his lordship I accordingly repaired, and it was an era in my life. There I met in all their glory and feather, Mackintosh, Rogers, the Smiths, Sidney, and others." After a short stay in London he returned to Edinburgh, for the purpose of visiting his mother. On the voyage to Leith, a lady, a passenger on board, who had read his poems, without knowing him, surprised him by expressing her regret that the poet Campbell had been arrested in London on a charge of high treason, was confined in the Tower, and would probably be executed. On his arrival at Edinburgh he took up his residence with his mother and sisters in Alison square. He found his mother greatly troubled by the rumour of his apprehension, which she had heard previous to his coming. It was a period of high political excitement, and he at once determined to wait on the sheriff, Mr Clerk, and report his position. That functionary frankly told him that they were aware of his guilt, but they did not want to see him. He asked the grounds of the charge against him, and was told that "it seems you have been conspiring with General Moreau, in Austria, and with the Irish at Hamburgh, to get a French army landed in Ireland. You attended Jacobin clubs at Hamburgh, and you came over from thence in the same vessel with Donovan, who commanded a regiment of the rebels at Vinegar-hill." A box, with a number of the poet's papers, had been seized at Leith, in the expectation of finding treasonable documents among his manuscripts. 'The Exile of Erin' was somewhat suspicious, but 'Ye Mariners of England,' found in his box, was in his favour "The sheriff," he says, "began to smoke the whole bubble, and said, 'This comes of trusting a Hamburgh spy Mr Campbell,' he added, 'this is a cold wet evening—what do you say to our having a bottle of wine during the examination of your democratic papers?'"

While in Edinburgh his mother and sisters were dependent on him solely for support During the food riots in Edinburgh, in the year 1801, he began part of a poem, entitled 'The Mohade,' in a style altogether different from his other works, which was never printed till it appeared in Dr Beattie's 'Life and Letters of Thomas Campbell' From Lord Minto, whom he met, at his lordship's own desire, at the house of the late Dugald Stewart, he received great kindness, and was invited to Minto House, Roxburghshire While there he wrote 'Lochiel's Warning,' during the night His evening thoughts had been turned to the wizard's warning, and in the course of the night he awoke, repeating the idea for which he had been searching for days, rang for the servant, had a cup of tea, and produced 'Lochiel's Warning' before day-dawn

Early in 1803, Mr Campbell repaired to London, to settle, as the only field that promised any permanent and profitable exercise of his talents On his arrival there he resided for some time in the house of his friend and brother poet, Mr Telford, the celebrated engineer On the 10th of September of that year he married his cousin, Miss Matilda Sinclair, of Greenock, a lady who was surpassingly beautiful After residing a year in London, he took and furnished a house in the village of Sydenham, in Kent, about seven miles from London He now devoted himself, most industriously, to writing and compiling for the booksellers, and furnishing occasional articles to the daily press, and other periodical publications He wrote on all subjects, even including agriculture, for the most part anonymously, and by writing on the latter subject he acquired so much information, as to have been more than once complimented, as he states himself, on that knowledge by practical farmers Soon after his marriage he wrote a work, entitled 'Annals of Great Britain, from the accession of George III,' to the Peace of Amiens, which was published in 1808, in three volumes 8vo, without his name Besides his other literary work, he accepted an engagement to write and translate foreign correspondence for the 'Star' newspaper, and the 'Philosophical Magazine' conducted by Mr Tulloch, the editor of 'The Star,' for which he received at the rate of two hundred pounds a-year He also contributed several papers to 'Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopedia,' especially biographies, an account of the drama, and an extended historical notice of Great Britain, which were all marked with the taste and judgment that invariably distinguished his writings

During the first year of his residence at Sydenham, among other poetical pieces which he elaborately polished were 'Lord Ullin's Daughter,' 'The Soldier's Dream,' and 'The Turkish Lady,' the first of which, we are told by his biographer, had been sketched in the island of Mull, and the two latter in Bavaria,—but were not revised and finished until this period 'The Battle of the Baltic' was composed at short intervals during the winter, and, as soon as it came before the public, "was set to music and sung with applause by the great vocalists of the day" Through the influence principally of Charles James Fox, a pension of £200 a-year was, in 1806, conferred on him by his majesty George III

In 1809 appeared his second volume of poems, containing 'Gertrude of Wyoming,' a simple Indian tale, in the Spenserian stanza, the scene of which is laid among the woods of Pennsylvania, 'Glenara,' 'Lochiel's Warning,' 'Lord Ullin's Daughter,' and 'The Battle of the Baltic,' the noblest of his lyrics To a subsequent edition was added the touching ballad of 'O'Connor's Child' This volume greatly increased his popularity In the same year he delivered a course of lectures on poetry, at the Royal Institution, which excited much attention at the time, and were afterwards published He was also employed by Mr John Murray, the publisher, to edit selections from the British poets, intended as specimens of each, with biographical and critical essays, and this work appeared in 1819, in seven volumes

reside in London, he became editor of a new series of the 'New Monthly Magazine,' for Mr Colburn, the publisher, to which, however, at that time, he contributed little besides a few of his minor poems, and a series of lectures on Greek dramatic literature His connexion with this magazine ceased in 1831, when he was engaged for a brief period as editor of the 'Metropolitan' magazine He had even been assisted by Mr Samuel Rogers, the poet, with five hundred pounds, to purchase a third share of the 'Metropolitan,' but finding the concern, as he styled it, at that time "a bubble," he got back the money, and immediately repaid it to Mr Rogers That periodical was afterwards conducted with great spirit and talent, under different auspices In 1821 appeared his 'Theodric,' a brief poetical tale of modern life, but the fire of his genius was beginning to burn low, and the poem disappointed public expectation The volume, however, had, for the time, an extensive sale, and was declared by an anonymous punster of that day, to have been "the odd trick" of the season

In November 1826, Mr Campbell was elected by the students Lord Rector of the university of Glasgow, after a severe opposition on the part of the professors He went down to his native city, delivered an inaugural address, which he got printed, and sent a copy of it to each of the students, the presentation inscription being in his own hand, which greatly enhanced the value of such a gift No event in his life seems to have gratified his feelings so highly, and he always spoke of his election with honest pride The honour was enhanced by his being three times chosen Lord Rector successively On his re-election, the students presented him with a silver bowl, which, in his will, he styled one of "the jewels of his property" At the same time, a literary club was formed in Glasgow, and named after him, 'The Campbell Club,' which still exists, and possesses an excellent library, many of the books having been donations from the poet, who also presented the club with an elegant silver cup The students of Glasgow university he addressed in a series of articles inserted in the 'New Monthly Magazine' The senatus academicus conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws but he never assumed the title of Doctor before his name He contributed in no small degree to the establishment of the London university, in which project Lord Brougham was an active coadjutor, but Campbell might, with some propriety, be considered its founder

During the struggle for independence in Greece, Mr Campbell took an active interest in the cause of that country, as he subsequently, and indeed all his life did in that of Poland In 1832, in conjunction with the Polish poet Niemcewicz, Prince Czartoryski, and others, he founded the society styled the "Literary Association of the friends of Poland," for collecting, publishing, and diffusing information relative to that unhappy country, and for the aid and support of the Polish exiles in England

In the month of September 1828, Mrs Campbell died He had lost his youngest sister and his mother some time previously In 1830 he went into chambers and for some years he resided, in a state of comparative loneliness, at No 61 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London Two sons were the fruit of his marriage, one of whom, a youth of great promise, died early The other, having shown symptoms of insanity, was for years in a private asylum, but soon after the poet's death, he was restored to society, by the verdict of a jury de lunatico inquirendo, which declared him to be of perfectly sound mind

In 1832, Mr Campbell visited Algiers, and on his return he furnished an account of his journey to the 'New Monthly Magazine,' which he afterwards published, in a collected form, under the name of 'Letters from the South,' in two volumes In 1834 he published his 'Life of Mrs Siddons' On the death that year of his friend, Mr Telford, the engineer, after whom he had named his surviving son, he, as well as Mr Southey, received a legacy of £500

The first time that I saw Mr Campbell was in the year 1838 It was in the studio of an eminent sculptor in London, to whom the poet was at that time sitting for his bust On being introduced to him, he received me with an affability and kindness of manner which put me at once at my ease He was about the middle size, and remarkably well made In his younger days he was considered particularly handsome, but at this period time, and care, and thought, had begun to make visible inroads on his frame He never had a robust constitution, and his domestic calamities had fallen heavily on his nervous and sensitive mind I shall never forget the quiet beauty of his eyes, which were large and of a deep blue colour, and when he became animated there was a sparkling poetical expression in them peculiarly striking He wore a wig of chestnut brown His manner was frank and unreserved, and his conversation agreeable and instructive He was fond of discoursing about poetry, and his criticisms were at all times marked by good taste and correct appreciation When he descanted on the beauties of the Greek and English poets, he occasionally enriched his remarks by quotations, which he had by heart, and recited with the greatest enthusiasm Often have I, while sitting in his company, been electrified by the beauty and power with which he recited favourite passages from the Greek poets, with whose writings his mind was richly stored, and which he appreciated and praised with the characteristic warmth of one who was himself a master in their divine art The following incident, to which I myself was a witness, shows the genuine benevolence and kindness of his heart Calling one forenoon, in the year 1839, on the poet at his Chambers 61 Lincoln's Inn Fields, I found him busily engaged looking over his books, on the shelves around the room, while near the fireplace, was seated an elderly gentlewoman in widow's weeds I was desired to take a chair for a few minutes Presently the poet disappeared into his bedroom, and returned with an armful of books, which he placed among a heap of others that he had collected on the floor "There now," he said, addressing the widow, "these will help you a little, and I shall see what more I can do for you by the time you call again I shall get them sent to you in the course of the day" The widow thanked him with tears in her eyes, and, shaking her cordially by the hand, he wished her a good morning On her departure, he said to me, with great feeling,—"That lady whom you saw just now is the widow of an early friend of mine, and as she is now in somewhat reduced circumstances, she wishes to open a little book and stationery shop, and I have been busy looking out all the books for which I have no use, but which will be of use to her, to add to her stock She has taken a small shop in the neighbourhood of town, and I shall do all I can to serve her, and forward her prospects, as far as my assistance and influence extend old times should not be forgotten" On another occasion, soon after this, on introducing to him, in that same room, a friend of mine from Edinburgh of the name of Sinclair, he said, while he shook him by the hand, "I am glad to see you, Sir, your name recommends you to me," adding, with much tenderness, "my wife's name was Sinclair"

In 1842, Mr Campbell published his 'Pilgrim of Glencoe,' and other poems, which he dedicated to his friend and physician, Dr William Beattie, whom in his will he named one of his executors, and who became his biographer Mr William Moxon, of the Middle Temple, barrister, the brother of the publisher, was also named an executor Among Mr Campbell's other works are a 'Life of Petrarch,' and 'Memoirs of Frederick the Great' In the year last mentioned Mr Campbell again visited Germany, and, on his return to London, he took a house at No 8, Victoria Square, Pimlico, his niece Miss Mary Campbell, daughter of his deceased brother, Mr Alexander Campbell, formerly of Glasgow, having gone to London, to reside with him But his health had long been declining, and for change of air, in the summer of 1843, he retired to Boulogne, in France, where he died on Saturday afternoon, 15th June 1844, aged 67 years His niece, his friend Dr Beattie, Mr Moxon, the publisher, and his medical attendants were with him when he breathed his last, as was also the Rev Mr Hassell, a clergyman of the church of England His last hours were marked by calmness and resignation His body was brought to England, and buried in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey, on Wednesday, July 3d, the funeral being attended by a great number of noblemen and gentlemen, and by several of the most eminent authors of the day

Mr Campbell was extremely studious, but at the same time social in his disposition, and gentle and endearing in his manners With a delicate and even nervous sensibility, frequently allied to real genius, he was yet eminently domestic in his disposition and habits, and admirably fitted to shine in society To his niece, Mary Campbell, afterwards Mrs W Alfred Hill, whose kindness and attention cheered his latter days, he left the great bulk of his property and effects, his son being otherwise provided for Campbell is decidedly the most classical of our modern poets He never wearied retouching and polishing what he had written, and yet, notwithstanding his extreme fastidiousness in this respect, no poet of his day has exhibited, in his lyrics, so much originality and freedom, or so much energy of thought and style His works are

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of, of Lundie, and of Gleneagles, a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom, conferred in 1831 on the Right Hon Robert Dundas Duncan Haldane, second viscount Duncan, third but eldest surviving son of the celebrated admiral, first viscount (see vol II page 82) Born in 1785, he succeeded his father in the viscounty in 1804, and took his seat in the house of lords in 1806, soon after attaining his majority On the coronation of William IV he was elevated to the rank of earl, and on that occasion the king was pleased, as his own special act, and as a tribute to the memory of the first viscount Duncan, to adopt the unusual step in the case of a new creation of giving his lordship's brother and sisters the rank of earl's children His lordship (K T 1848), died in 1859 He had assumed the name of his maternal grandmother Haldane His eldest son, Adam Duncan-Haldane, viscount Duncan, M P for Forfarshire, born in 1812, a lord of the Treasury from March 1855 to Feb 1858, succeeded as 2d earl, married, 1839, with issue

CANT, ANDREW, a rigid Covenanting minister born about the end of the sixteenth century, appears to have belonged to East Lothian In terms of a contract with Lord Forbes, he appears to have been minister of Alford, Aberdeenshire, in 1617, and held lands there in mortgage till 1649 In October 1620, being chosen one of the ministers of Edinburgh, the king and bishops would not sanction his election, and a Mr William Forbes of Aberdeen was appointed in his stead Nevertheless, on a vacancy again occurring, in 1623, the dissentients protested, but in vain, against proceeding to another election, on the ground that Cant had been already chosen, and was of right then minister About 1638 he was appointed minister to the then newly erected parish of Pitsligo, on the north coast of Aberdeenshire In July of that year, he was sent by the Tables—as the convention at Edinburgh of the representatives of the national party then opposed to the proceedings of Charles were called—to Aberdeen, to induce the inhabitants of that city to subscribe the Covenant, having for his coadjutors the earl, afterwards marquis, of Montrose, Lord Couper, the master of Forbes, and other gentlemen, with two ministers So earnest were they in their work that, to the displeasure of the citizens of Aberdeen, they declined all refreshments until the Covenant was signed, a procedure quite contrary to the practice always hitherto observed in that hospitable city In the November following he sat in the General Assembly at Glasgow, which abolished episcopacy He was with the army when the Scots obtained possession of Newcastle, August 30 1640, and preached by appointment in one of the churches of that town He was subsequently appointed one of the ministers of Aberdeen According to Mr Kennedy, in his 'Annals' of that city, for some time Mr Cant had the whole ministerial charge He exercised his ecclesiastical authority with rigour, and fulminated anathemas against the magistrates for not complying with his dictates His congregation complained that no person could be admitted to communion by him, except those who were found qualified to partake of that ordinance In place of yielding to the remonstrances of the magistrates, however, he declaimed against them from the pulpit for their interference in what pertained to the kirk session The matter was represented to the provincial synod, but both the magistrates and the congregation were compelled to submit to his decrees Spalding mentions that one Sunday afternoon, during sermon, some children made a noise outside the church, when Cant, who was preaching, sprang out of the pulpit and pursued them to some distance, and when he had dispersed them he returned and finished his sermon, but the people wondered at his behaviour

When Charles the First visited Scotland, in 1641, it being then his policy to conciliate the nation, Mr Cant was appointed to preach before him at Edinburgh, August 21st He frequently preached also before the Scots parliament He was of that party in the church of Scotland hostile to the employment of individuals who had served Charles against the partisans of the first covenant, and known as the Protesting party He was opposed to the bringing over of Charles the Second from Holland to Scotland in 1650, and according to Balfour (Annals, vol iv page 160), used all his influence to prevent the nation from undertaking to place him on the throne of England In 1660, a complaint was presented to the magistrates of Aberdeen, charging Mr Cant with having published a work written by Samuel Rutherford, entitled Lex Rex, and containing opinions then deemed seditious, and for fulminating anathemas and imprecations against many of his congregation The proceedings which took place in consequence caused him, although no judgment was given against him, to relinquish his charge, and withdraw himself from the town with his family Mr Cant died about 1664

A Mr Andrew Cant, supposed to have been his son, appears to have changed sides, as he was one of the Episcopalian ministers of Edinburgh, deprived at the Revolution On 17th October, 1722, he was consecrated bishop of Glasgow

In No 147 of the Spectator the opprobrious word 'cant' is described as having been derived from the name of this minister, who is there styled 'illiterate,' but this is equally in violation of sound scholarship and good feeling, as the etymology is certainly the Latin word Cantus, 'a song,' so expressive of the singing or whining tone of certain preachers

CARDROSS, LORD, a title first conferred on the earl of Mar, but now a secondary title of the earl of Buchan The first possessor having been invested with the right of conferring it on any of his male heirs renders the title of Lord Cardross unique in the peerage either of Scotland or England There is no other instance of such a power having been granted to a subject David, who became, on his grandfather's death in 1634, second Lord Cardross, was one of the Scottish peers who protested against the delivering up of Charles the First to the English army at Newcastle in 1646 He died in 1671 Of his eldest son, Henry, third Lord Cardross, distinguished for his patriotism, a separate notice is given under the head of ERSKINE, HENRY, third Lord Cardross A younger son, the Hon Colonel John Erskine of Carnock, was father of John Erskine, the well-known author of the 'Institutes of the Law of Scotland,' and grandfather of the celebrated Dr John Erskine, minister of Greyfriars, Edinburgh, of both of whom notices are given under ERSKINE On the death, in 1695, of William Erskine, eighth earl of Buchan, the succession of that title opened to David, fourth Lord Cardross, eldest son of Henry, the third lord, and in the parliament of 1698, an act was passed allowing him to be called in the rolls of parliament as earl of Buchan [See BUCHAN, Earl of, ante page 455]

CAREY, DAVID, a writer of some versatility, a poet and a novelist, was the son of a manufacturer in Arbroath, where he was born in the year 1782 Having completed his school education, he was placed in his father's counting-house, but cherishing an inclination for literary pursuits, he soon removed to Edinburgh, and was by Mr Constable the publisher appointed to the temporary charge of a department of his business allied in some degree to the profession of literature As a better field for the exercise of his talents, he repaired soon after to London, where he obtained, through several gradations, the direction of various departments of the periodical press He began to publish in 1802 The order and titles of his works will be found annexed The ability he displayed in advocating the measures of the Whig party, whose side he had espoused, gained for him the notice of Mr Wyndham, who offered him a situation at the Cape of Good Hope, which he declined On the change of ministry he wrote a satire on their successors, entitled 'Ins and Outs, or the state of parties, by Chrononhotonthologos,' of which two large editions were sold in a few weeks On the establishment of the 'Inverness Journal' newspaper, in 1807, he was invited, on the recommendation of Mr Constable, to undertake the office of editor, which, under many disadvantages, he discharged during nearly five years with general satisfaction, continuing his literary publications at the same time During a considerable part of the year 1812, he conducted the

'Boston Gazette' He next repaired again to London, and renewed his connexion with the public journals there With the exception of a short visit to Paris, on some literary speculation, at a subsequent period, his labours from this time were devoted to the press At length, weary of perpetual struggles and disappointments, feeling his health much impaired, he returned to his native place, to receive the attentions of parental affection He died at his father's house at Arbroath, of consumption, after eighteen months' illness, on 4th October 1824, in the 42d year of his age Besides the works enumerated below, he contributed largely to 'The Poetical Magazine, or the Temple of the Muses,' consisting chiefly of original poems, published in 1804, in two volumes 8vo, of which he was the editor His poems are distinguished generally by elegance and harmony, and, with a good deal of purity and feeling, are not deficient in sentiment and imagery

CARGILL, a local surname, derived from a parish so called in Perthshire In the fishing village of Auchmithie, Forfarshire, in 1859, out of a population of 370, 123 bore the surname of Cargill

CARGILL, DONALD, an eminent preacher of the Church of Scotland, in the reign of Charles II was the son of respectable parents in the parish of Rattray, Perthshire, where he was born about the year 1610 He studied at Aberdeen, and became minister of the barony parish, Glasgow, in 1650 On the establishment of the episcopal church, he refused to accept collation from the archbishop, or celebrate the king's birthday, which caused his banishment, by act of council, beyond the Tay Paying little regard to this order, he was, in 1668, called before the council, and commanded peremptorily to observe their former edict In September 1669, upon his petition, he was permitted to go to Edinburgh upon some legal business, but not to reside in that city, or go near Glasgow He now became a field preacher, and so continued for some years, during which period he had many remarkable escapes from the vigilance of the government He refused the indulgence offered to the presbyterian clergy, and denounced all who accepted it

In 1679 he was at Bothwell Bridge, where he was wounded, but made his escape He afterwards went to Holland, but early in the summer of 1680 was again in Scotland On June 3d of that year, he made a narrow escape from being seized in a public-house in Queensferry by the governor of Blackness, who, in the struggle, mortally wounded his companion, Mr Henry Hall of Haugh-head In the pockets of the latter was found a paper of a violent nature, generally supposed to have been written by Mr Cargill, which is known in history by the name of the Queensferry Covenant, from the place where it was found Mr Cargill also appears to have been concerned with Richard Cameron in publishing the declaration at Sanquhar on the 22d of June In the subsequent September he preached to a large congregation in the Torwood, between Falkirk and Stirling, when he formally excommunicated the king, and the dukes of York, Monmouth, Lauderdale, and Rothes, Sir George Mackenzie, and Sir Thomas Dalzell In consequence of this violent proceeding, the privy council offered a reward of 5,000 merks for his apprehension, but for several months he eluded the vigilance of the soldiery In May 1681 he was seized at Covington, in Lanarkshire, by Irving of Bonshaw, who treated him with great cruelty, and carried him to Lanark on horseback, with his feet tied under the horse's belly He was soon after sent to Edinburgh, where, on the 26th of July, he was tried, and being condemned to suffer death for high treason, was accordingly hanged and beheaded, July 27, 1681

CARLYLE, Lord, an extinct title in the peerage of Scotland conferred in 1473 by King James the Third, on Sir John Carlyle of Torthorwald, knight The first of this name in Scotland was one of the English colonists brought by Robert de Brus into Annandale, when he obtained a grant of that district from King David the Second The surname appears to be local, and was probably assumed from the town of Carlisle in Cumberland In the reign of King William the Lion, one Eudo de Carlyle was witness to a charter of mortification, by Eustace de Vescy, of twenty shillings per annum out of the mill of Sprouston to the monastery of Kelso, about 1207 Adam de Carleolo had a charter of several lands in Annandale, from William de Brus, who died in 1215 Gilbert de Carlyle was one of the Scottish barons who swore fealty to King Edward the First in 1296 Sir William de Carlyle obtained in marriage the lady Margaret Bruce, one of the daughters of Robert earl of Carrick, and sister of King Robert the Bruce, as appears by a charter of that monarch to them of the lands of Crumanston, in which she is designated "our dearest sister" Their son, William Carlyle, obtained a charter from Robert the First, under the name of William Karlo, the king's sister's son, of the lands of Culyn, now Collin, in the county of Dumfries He also possessed the lands of Roucan in the vicinity There are now two villages bearing these names in the immediate neighbourhood of Dumfries

William Carlyle was one of the numerous train of knights and esquires, who attended the princess Margaret of Scotland, daughter of James the First, into France, on her marriage to Louis the dauphin, in 1436

Sir John Carlyle of Torthorwald, the first Lord Carlyle, was active in repelling the invasion of the banished Douglases in 1455, when James earl of Douglas, at the head of a considerable force, entered Scotland by the west marches and being met in Annandale by the earl of Angus, the lord Carlisle of Torthorwald, Sir Adam Johnstone of Johnstone, and other barons, at the head of their vassals, sustained a total defeat, Archibald, earl of Moray, one of his brothers, was killed, and Hugh earl of Ormond another of them, was taken prisoner by Lord Carlyle and the laird of Johnstone, for which service King James the Second granted to them the forty pound land of Pettinain in Lanarkshire He sat as Lord Carlyle of Torthorwald in the parliament of November and December 1475 He was subsequently sent on an embassy to France, and in recompense for the great expense attending it, he had several grants from the crown in 1477 Among others he received a charter of the lands of Drumcoll, forfeited by Alexander Boyd On the accession of James the Fourth these lands were claimed by the king, as pertaining to him and his eldest son, and his successors, by letters of annexation made of Drumcoll, perpetually to remain with the kings and princes of Scotland, their sons, previous to the grant of the same to Lord Carlyle, and on 19th January 1488-9 the lords auditors decreed that the said lands of Drumcoll were the king's property His lordship died before 22d December, 1509 He was twice married By his first wife, Janet, he had two sons, John and Robert, and a daughter, married to Simon Carruthers of Monswald His second wife, Margaret Douglas, widow of Sir Edward Maxwell of Monreith, had also two sons to him, namely, John and George John, master of Carlyle, the eldest son, died before his father, leaving a son, William, second Lord Carlyle, who was one of the three persons invested with the honour of knighthood, 29th January 1487-8, when Alexander, second son of King James the Third, was created duke of Ross By Janet Maxwell, his wife, daughter of Robert Lord Maxwell, he had two sons, James, third lord, and Michael, fourth lord Carlyle The latter signed the bond of association for the support of the authority of King James the Sixth in 1567, and was the only peer signing it who could not write his name He was obliged, in consequence, to have recourse to the assistance of a notary Soon after, however, he joined Queen Mary's party, and entered into the association on her behalf, at Hamilton, 8th May 1568 He had three sons, namely, William, master of Carlyle; Michael, and Peter His eldest son died in 1572, in the lifetime of his father, leaving an only child, Elizabeth Carlyle, who married Sir James Douglas of Parkhead, slain by Captain James Stewart, on the High Street of Edinburgh, 31st July, 1608 On the death of his eldest son, Lord Carlyle granted a charter of alienation of the barony of Carlyle, &c, in favour of Michael, his second son, dated at Torthorwald, 14th March, 1573, to which Adam Carlyle of Bridekirk, Alexander Carlyle his son, John Carlyle of Brakenquhat, and Peter Carlyle, the third son of his lordship, were witnesses Of the family of Bridekirk, here mentioned, the late Dr Alexander Carlyle of Inveresk, a notice of whom follows, was the male representative The above settlement of the estate was set aside, after a long litigation at a ruinous expense and the barony of Carlyle was, on the death of the fourth lord in 1580, found to belong to his grand-daughter, Elizabeth, already mentioned, who thus succeeded to the peerage, in her own right A charter was granted to George Douglas, second legitimate son of George Douglas of Parkhead, of the barony of Carlyle, &c, in the counties of Dumfries and Lanark, dated on the last day of February, 1594 It is supposed that he had acquired that estate from his brother Sir James, who, as above stated, married the heiress of the title and estates, and had three sons, Sir James, Archibald, and John, the two latter of whom died without issue

Sir James Douglas, the eldest son, was, in right of his mother, created Lord Carlyle of Torthorwald, in 1609 He married, first, Grizel, youngest daughter of Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, by whom, it is said, he had a son, William, who sold his estate, and died abroad without issue, secondly, Anne Saltonstall, and by her he had a son, James, baptized at Edinburgh, 2d January 1621 According to Crawford James Lord Carlyle, resigned his title in 1638, to William earl of Queensberry, who had acquired his estate

In 1730, William Carlyle of Lochartur, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, was served heir to Michael, fourth Lord Carlyle, as descended from Michael, his second lawful son This William Carlyle died about 1757, and was succeeded by his brother, Michael Carlyle of Lochartur, who, on his death, left his estate to the heir-male of the family By a decree of the House of Lords in 1770, the heir male was found to be George Carlyle, whose ancestor had settled in Wales In him also it was thought lay the right to the peerage, but after dissipating his estate at Dumfries, in a few years he returned to Wales The Rev Joseph D Carlyle, professor of Arabic in Cambridge university, who died in 1831 was understood to have been the next heir

This surname has acquired considerable literary lustre from its being borne by Thomas Carlyle, a celebrated contemporary author, a native of Dumfries-shire

CARLYLE, ALEXANDER, D D, an accomplished presbyterian divine, son of the minister of Prestonpans, was born January 26, 1722, and received his education at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Leyden In 1745, when only 23 years of age, he enrolled himself in a body of volunteers, raised in Edinburgh to defend the city against the rebels, but which, on the approach of the Highland army, was dissolved He then retired to his father's manse at Prestonpans, and on the morning of the 21st September, witnessed from the top of the village steeple the defeat of the royal army Previously he had been for a short time in the hands of a party of the Highlanders, but had made his escape He studied for the church, and, about 1748, was presented to the parish of Inveresk, in the neighbourhood of Musselburgh, where he remained 57 years His talents as a preacher were of the highest order, and in the General Assembly he long took an active and prominent part on the moderate side It was owing principally to his exertions that the parochial clergy of Scotland were exempted from the house and window tax With this object in view he spent some time in London, and was introduced at court, where the elegance of his manners and the dignity of his appearance, are said to have excited equal surprise and admiration He was intimate with all the celebrated men whose names have conferred lustre on the literary history of the latter part of the eighteenth century, and Smollett in his 'Humphrey Clinker,' mentions that he owed to him his introduction to the literary circles of Edinburgh Being a particular friend of Home, the author of Douglas, he was present at the first representation of that tragedy, for which he was prosecuted before the church courts, censured and admonished It is even said that, in the first private rehearsal, he forgot his character so far as to enact the part of Old Norval To Dr Carlyle the world is indebted for the recovery of Collins' long lost 'Ode on the Superstitions of the Highlands' The author considered it the best of his poems, but he had kept no copy of it, and Dr Carlyle finding it accidentally among his papers, presented it to the Royal Society of Edinburgh It was printed in the first volume of their Transactions. Dr Carlyle left behind him a Memoir of his own Time, which, though long promised, has not yet been published He died at Inveresk, August 25, 1805, aged 84

The only things Dr Carlyle published were, the Statistical Account of the Parish of Inveresk, in Sir John Sinclair's work, two detached sermons, the names of which are subjoined, and two ironical pamphlets on the subject of the tragedy of Douglas, both the latter, of course, anonymously One of them was entitled 'An Ironical argument to prove that the tragedy of Douglas ought to be publicly burnt by the hands of the hangman, Edinburgh,' 1757, 8vo, pp 24. He is also said to have written the prologue to Herminius and Espasia, a tragedy, acted at Edinburgh, and published in 1754

The titles of his sermons are —

The Tendency of the Constitution of the Church of Scotland to form the Temper, Spirit, and Character of her Ministers, a Sermon on Psalm xlviii 12 13 1779, 12mo

National Depravity the Cause of National Calamities, a Fast Sermon, from Jerem vi 8 Edin 1794, 8vo

CARMICHAEL, a local surname, of great antiquity in Scotland, derived from the lands and barony of Carmichael, in the parish of that name, in the upper ward of Lanarkshire, of which the earls of Hyndford (a title now extinct), whose family name it was, were the proprietors The parish appears to have been so named from St Michael under whose protection it was placed

The first of the family known was William de Carmichael, who is mentioned in a charter of the lands of Ponfeigh about 1350 John de Carmichael, supposed to be his son, was infeft in the lands of Carmichael, on a precept from James earl of Douglas and Mar, killed at Otterburn in 1388 The name of William de Carmichael, probably his son, occurs in a charter of donation to the priory of St Andrews in 1410 Sir John de Carmichael, supposed to be the son of this William, accompanied the Scottish auxiliaries sent to the assistance of Charles the Sixth of France, against the English At the battle of Beaugé in Anjou, in 1422, he is said to have unhorsed the duke of Clarence, who commanded the English army, a feat which decided the victory in favour of the French and Scots In the encounter he broke his spear, and his descendants bear for crest a dexter hand and man armed holding a broken spear This deed has been attributed to the earl of Buchan, and Sir Alexander Buchanan [see ante, page 460 art BUCHANAN], as well as to Sir John de Carmichael, and the honour of it must be equally divided among these three Sir John died in 1436 By his wife, supposed to have been a lady Mary Douglas, he had three sons, namely, William, his successor, Robert, ancestor of the Carmichaels of Balmadie, and John, provost of St Andrews, who was one upon a perambulation of some lands and marches in that neighbourhood in 1434

William the eldest son, was one of the inquest upon the service of Sir David Hay of Yester, in 1437 He had two sons, Sir John, and George The latter, a doctor of divinity, was elected bishop of Glasgow in 1482, but died before his consecration, in the following year He had previously been treasurer of that see, as rector of Carnwath The same year that he was elected bishop, he was joined in commission with several lords and barons, to treat of a peace with England

Sir John Carmichael, the elder son, had three sons and a daughter William, the eldest, had also three sons, Bartholomew, who predeceased him, William, who succeeded him, and Walter, the progenitor of the Hyndford line On the 8th March 1528 a remission was granted to William Carmichael of that ilk, and three others, for art, part and assistance given by them to Archibald sometime earl of Angus, his brother and eme (or uncle) William's son, John Carmichael, married Elizabeth, third daughter of the fifth lord Somerville, and had two sons John and Archibald, and a daughter, Mary, married to John, son of Sir Robert Hamilton of Preston. John Carmichael, the father, his son John, his brother Archibald, James Johnstone of Westraw, and thirty-one others, were, January 8th, 1564, indicted before the high court of justiciary, for wounding and deforcing a sheriff's officer of Lanarkshire, when apprizing certain head of cattle, and for taking one of his assistants captive and keeping him in confinement in various places They were ordered to enter into ward on the north side of the water of Spey, and remain there during her majesty's pleasure

Sir John Carmichael, the elder son, was, in 1584, with his son Hugh, and William Carmichael of Rowantreecross, forfeited for being concerned in the raid of Ruthven The forfeiture, however, appears soon to have been taken off, as we afterwards find him appointed warden of the west marches, and in 1588, he was one of the ambassadors sent to Denmark, to negotiate the marriage between King James the Sixth and the princess Anne, daughter of the Danish king About the same time he was constituted captain of his majesty's guard In 1590 he was sent ambassador to Queen Elizabeth In 1592 he resigned the wardenship of the west marches in favour of the earl of Angus, but in 1598, on that nobleman's demitting that office, Sir John was restored to it, and as he was going to hold a warden's court at Lochmaben, for the punishment of offences committed on the borders, he was murdered, 16th June, 1600, by Thomas Armstrong, 'sone to Sandeis Ringane,' and nephew of Kinmont Willie, and several associates, on their return from a match at football, such meetings being often, in those days, arranged for the perpetration of deeds of violence The Armstrongs being the most turbulent of the border clans, the warden had announced his intention to punish severely some of their recent thefts and forays, and to prevent this they sent to him a brother of old William Armstrong of Kinmont, (the noted Kinmont Willie,) whose name was Alexander Armstrong, alias Sandeis Ringan of Niman On being admitted to a conference with the warden he found that there was no lenity to be expected from him, and some of Carmichael's young retainers having, in mockery of Ringan, slipped his sword out of his scabbard and put yolks of eggs in it, whereby his sword, when sheathed, would not draw, he vowed in a rage that they should see his sword out, if they went on ground where he could avenge the insult When he returned home he told his sons that he had been "made shame of," and he would be "equal" with them yet Next day they waylaid the warden, and shot him with a hagbut For this murder, Thomas Armstrong was tried before the High Court of Justiciary, 14th November, convicted and executed Before he was hanged his right hand was struck off at one stroke by the executioner He was thereafter hung in chains on the Boroughmuir, the first instance on record, in Scotland, of a criminal having been hung in chains The murder of Sir John Carmichael sealed the fate of many of the Armstrongs, the most distinguished of the warlike thieves of the Scottish border, and led to the adoption of measures of the utmost severity against all those of the name who were thereafter convicted, or even suspected of any crime Sir Walter Scott supposes that the well-known verses 'Armstrong's Good Night,' were composed by Thomas Armstrong, called by him 'Ringan's Iam' previous to his execution In February 1606, another of the Armstrongs, called Alexander, or Sandie of Rowanburne, was executed for this murder An epitaph on Sir John Carmichael, by John Johnstone, is printed in Crawford's peerage By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir George Douglas of Pittendriech, sister of the regent Morton, he had three sons and four daughters

Sir Hugh Carmichael, the eldest son, was sworn a privy councillor, and appointed master of the horse in 1593 The same year he was sent ambassador to Denmark. He married Abigail, daughter of William Baillie of Lamington, and had a son, Sir John, who died without issue. His estate was inherited by his cousin, Sir James Carmichael of Hyndford, created Lord Carmichael in 1647, and grandfather of the first earl of Hyndford (See HYNDFORD, earl of) He was descended from Walter Carmichael, of Hyndford and Park third son of William Carmichael of Carmichael above mentioned John Carmichael of Howgate, third son of Walter's grandson James Carmichael, had a son, John, a colonel in the Russian service, who became governor of Plescow

From the first-mentioned William de Carmichael to Sir Wyndham Carmichael-Anstruther, baronet, who, in right of his ancestor, Sir John Anstruther, marrying, in 1717, the Lady Margaret Carmichael, daughter of the second earl of Hyndford, succeeded his nephew in the estate in 1831, inclusive, there were 20 generations during a period of 481 years

One of the mistresses of King James the Fifth was Katherine Carmichael, daughter of Sir John Carmichael of Meadowflat, Captain of Crawford, described in that curious work 'The Memorie of the Somervilles,' as "a young lady, admired for her beautie, handsomenes of persone, and vivacity of spirit." By her the king had John, prior of Coldinghame, &c, father of the turbulent Francis Stewart, earl of Bothwell She afterwards married Sir John Somerville of Camnusnethan

Of the third earl of Hyndford, the most distinguished of the noble family of Carmichael, the following is a notice

CARMICHAEL, JOHN, third earl of Hyndford, an eminent diplomatist, son of the second earl, was born, according to Douglas' Peerage, at Edinburgh, 15th March 1701, but according to the Old Statistical Account, at Carmichael house, Lanarkshire, in April of that year He was for some time an officer in the third regiment of footguards, and succeeded his father in his titles and estates, in 1737 The following year he was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage, and four times afterwards rechosen In March of the same year (1738) he was appointed one of the lords of police, an office long since abolished He was twice lord high commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, viz in 1739 and 1740 He was always high in the favour of George the Second, and in 1741, when the king of Prussia invaded Silesia, the earl of Hyndford was sent, as envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary, to that monarch, and was so successful in accommodating matters, that preliminaries of peace, between the empress queen of Hungary and the king of Prussia, were signed at Breslau, 1st June, 1742 On the conclusion of the treaty, his lordship was nominated a knight of the Thistle, and vested with the insigna of that order, at Charlottenburg, 2d August, 1742, by the king of Prussia, in virtue of a commission from King George the Second In 1744 he was sent, on a special mission, to Russia, and by his memorable negociations with that power, was instrumental in accelerating the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle In 1750 he returned to England, and was sworn a privy councillor 29th March that year, and appointed one of the lords of the bedchamber In 1752 he was sent ambassador to Vienna, which situation he held till 1764, when he was nominated vice-admiral of Scotland, and on that occasion he resigned his seat at the board of police He spent the remainder of his life at his seat in Lanarkshire Some idea may be formed of his assiduity, from the fact that in the library in Westraw, there are twenty-three MS volumes of his political life, in his own handwriting Besides this, during the whole of his stay abroad, he kept up a regular correspondence with his factor at Carmichael, in which he evinces an accurate knowledge of architecture, agriculture, and rural affairs in general A few years before his death, he granted leases of fifty-seven years' duration, in order to improve his lands, and even at that early period, when agriculture in Scotland was in a very rude state, he introduced clauses into the new leases which have since been adopted as the most approved mode of farming The greater part of the beautiful plantations which adorn the now deserted family mansion of Carmichael house, and which are excelled by none in Scotland, were reared from seeds which his lordship selected when on the continent, but particularly when he was in Russia, and for many years he employed a great number of workmen in the buildings and plantations of Carmichael and Westraw He died 19th July 1767, in the 67th year of his age, and his remains were interred in the family burial ground in the parish of Carmichael

CARMICHAEL, GERSHOM, M A, a learned divine, was born at Glasgow in 1682, and educated in the university of that city, where he took his degrees He was afterwards ordained minister of Monimail, in Fifeshire, and, in 1722, appointed professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow For the use of his students, he wrote some learned notes on 'Puffendorfii de Officiis Hominis' He died at Glasgow in 1738, aged 56

CARMICHAEL, FREDERICK, son of the preceding, was born at Monimail in 1708, and received his education in Marischal college, Aberdeen He was ordained minister of Monimail in 1737, on the presentation of the earl of Leven In 1743 he was translated to Inveresk, and in 1747 he was elected one of the ministers of Edinburgh, having previously declined an offer made to him of the divinity chair in Marischal college In 1751 he was seized with a fever, of which he died, aged 45 He left one volume of sermons

CARNEGIE, a local surname, derived from the lands and barony of Carnegie in the county of Forfar

In the reign of King David the Second, Walter Maule granted to John de Bonhard a charter of the lands of Carnegie, in the barony of Panmure and parish of Carmylie, when the latter assumed, in consequence, the surname of Carnegie

The family of Carnegie of that ilk became extinct in the direct line. The next principal family of that name was Carnegie of Kinnaird The first of it was Duthacus, a descendant of Carnegie of that ilk, who obtained a charter from Robert duke of Albany, governor of Scotland, of half of the lands of Kinnaird, in Forfarshire, and the superiority

From him lineally descended Sir Robert Carnegie of Kinnaird, appointed one of the senators of the College of Justice in 1547, and ambassador to France in 1551, of whom a notice is subjoined He and his predecessors were said to be cupbearers to the kings of Scotland, for which they were in use to carry a cup of gold on the breast of their eagle to show their office

His grandson, Sir David, was created Lord Carnegie of Kinnaird, 14th April, 1616, in which year he was constituted one of the lords of session In June 1633, he was elevated to the earldom of Southesk [See SOUTHESK, Earl of] These honours were attainted, under James, the fifth earl, for being engaged in the rebellion of 1715, but restored in 1855 (See vol iii p 493)

Sir John Carnegie, the second son of David Carnegie of Panbride, designed of Colutht, and brother of David, first earl of Southesk, obtained from his father the lands of Aithie, &c, in Forfarshire, and was elevated to the peerage, 20th April, 1639, as Lord Lour or Lower, and advanced 1st November, 1647, to the dignity of earl of Ethie He suffered for his fidelity to Charles the First, and after the restoration his lordship, in 1662, got an exchange of his titles for those of Baron Roschill of Roschill, and earl of Northesk [See NORTHESK, Earl of] He died in 1667, at the age of about 88

The seventh earl of Northesk, who distinguished himself as a naval officer, will be noticed in the article NORTHESK

CARNEGIE, SIR ROBERT, of Kinnaird, a lawyer and statesman, the son of John de Carnegie, who was killed at the battle of Flodden, was some time chamberlain of Arbroath, and having attached himself to the regent Arran, was, July 4, 1547, appointed a lord of session, but on the condition that, until an actual vacancy occurred, he should be entitled to no salary or emolument In 1548 he was sent to England to treat for the ransom of the earl of Huntly, chancellor of Scotland, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Pinkie Soon afterwards he was despatched on a mission to France, and when there, was requested by the French king, Henry the Second, to use his influence with the duke of Chatelherault, on his return, for the resignation of the regency in favour of Mary of Guise, the queen dowager In 1551 we find him clerk to the treasurer of Scotland, and one of the commissioners named to conclude a peace with England In 1554 and 1556 he was similarly employed When the Reformation took place, he at first attached himself to the queen regent's party, and was employed by her majesty in negociating with the lords of the congregation He afterwards joined the latter, and was sent by them to the courts of England and France to explain and vindicate their intentions He died July 5, 1566 In the queen's letter, nominating his successor on the bench, he is described as a person "well inclined to justice, and expert in matters concerning the common weill of this realm" He is supposed to have been the author of the work on Scots law, cited in Balfour's Practicks as Lib Carneg, or Carnegie's Book By Margaret, his wife, daughter of Guthrie of Lunan, he had, with other sons, David, one of the eight commissioners of the Treasury, called Octavians, who, by his second wife, a daughter of Sir David Wemyss of that ilk, had Sir David Carnegie, abovementioned, first earl of Southesk

CARNEGIE, WILLIAM, seventh earl of North esk See NORTHESK, Earl of

CARNWATH, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1639, on Sir Robert Dalzell, descended from Thomas de Dalzell, one of the great barons who swore fealty to King Edward the First in 1296, and who was afterwards one of the patriots that joined King Robert the Bruce The family possessed the lands and barony of Dalzell in Lanarkshire from a very early period, but which they forfeited in the fourteenth century For the origin of the name and family of Dalzell, see DALZELL, surname of Hamilton of Wishaw, in his 'Description of the shires of Lanark and Renfrew,' says, that the parish and barony of Dalzell did formerly belong to the Dalzells of that ilk, till the forfeiture of Sir Robert Dalzell by King David the Second, for his remaining in England without the king's permission Nisbet and others say that the lands were bestowed by the king on Sir Malcolm Fleming, 20th June 1318, but according to Hamilton, they were given to Robert the Steward of Scotland, who granted them, with one of his daughters, to a knight of the name of Sandilands, and by the marriage of the grandaughter of the latter to the heir of Sir Robert Dalzell, they were restored to the ancient proprietors

The earls of Carnwath (the name is derived from carn, 'a heap of stones,' and wath, 'a ford,') were, at all times, and to their own injury,—the title having been for more than a hundred years attainted,—distinguished for their steadfast loyalty to the house of Stuart Sir Robert Dalzell, first earl of Carnwath, was the son of Robert Dalzell of Dalzell, by Janet, his wife, daughter of Gavin Hamilton of Raploch, commendator of Kilwinning After having received the honour of knighthood, he was, "in consideration of his own personal merits, as well as of the constant loyalty of his ancestors in all times past," raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Dalzell, by patent dated at Whitehall, 18th September, 1628, to him and his heirs male of the name of Dalzell The title of earl of Carnwath was conferred with limitation to the heirs male of his body The estate of Dalzell had continued directly in the family, till the death of one of the young lairds of Dalzell, leaving only two daughters, the eldest married to the heir male of the family, and the other to a son of the laird of West Nisbet, who got with her the one half of the lands, and, with his successors, was commonly called the baron of Dalzell Lord Dalzell, however, purchased from the latter his half, and in 1634, his lordship acquired the estate of Carnwath from James, earl of Buchan, eldest son of the second marriage of John earl of Mar, treasurer of Scotland In 1647 he sold the principal part of the Dalzell estate to James Hamilton of Boggs, second son of John Hamilton of Orbieston, by his wife, Christian Dalzell, the earl's sister, and it still remains in the possession of Hamilton's descendants The first earl died soon after By his countess, Margaret, daughter of Sir Robert Crichton of Cluny, he had, with a daughter, Lady Mary, married to Sir James Murhead of Lachop, Lanarkshire, two sons, Robert, second earl, and the Hon John Dalzell of Glenae in Dumfriesshire, who was created a baronet, 11th April, 1666, and died in September 1685 He married, first, Miss Sandilands of the Torphichen family, by whom he had two daughters, both married, secondly, Lady Margaret Johnston, third daughter of James, earl of Hartfell, without issue, thirdly, Violet, daughter of Riddel of Haining, by whom he had, with four daughters, two sons, of whom afterwards, as his grandson, Sir Robert Dalzell succeeded as sixth earl

Robert, the second earl, adhered firmly to Charles the First, and was, with five other earls, accused before the convention of estates of having written a letter to the queen from Derby, informing her of the design of the Scots to take up arms against Charles the First, for which they were summoned before them in June 1643 They all obeyed the summons except the earl of Carnwath, who retired to England On the 21th of the same month, he was decerned to pay a fine of ten thousand pounds Scots, for contumacy, in not entering his person in prison, on some words spoken by him to his majesty, with which the estates were dissatisfied, and on the 25th of the following February, decreet of forfeiture was passed against him He was at the battle of Naseby, so disastrous to the king, fought on the 14th June, 1644, and according to Lord Clarendon, the loss of that battle was mainly owing to Lord Carnwath He rode next to his majesty, and when the king was on the point of charging at the head of his guards, the earl, (a man never suspected of infidelity, nor yet one from whom his majesty would have taken counsel in such a case) on a sudden, laid his hand on the bridle of the king's horse, and "swearing two or three fullmouthed Scottish oaths," said, "Will you go upon your death in an instant?" and before his majesty understood what he would have turned his horse round, on which the word ran through the troops that they should march to the right, and they all turned their horses, and rode, upon the spur, off the field His lordship died soon afterwards By Christian, his wife, daughter of Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, he had two sons, Gavin, third earl, and the Hon William Dalzell, who died unmarried about the end of 1646

Gavin, third earl of Carnwath, was compelled to pay a hundred thousand merks for his father's liferent of his estates He was served heir to his brother William 19th January 1647 He accompanied King Charles the Second into England in August 1651, was taken at the battle of Worcester 3d September of that year, and remained in prison for several years He died in June 1674 He sold the estate of Carnwath to Sir George Lockhart, Lord President of the court of session, and it still remains in the Lockhart family The third earl was twice married, first, to Margaret, the elder of the two daughters of David Lord Carnegie, son of the first earl of Southesk, and by her had two sons, James and John, successively earls of Carnwath, and a daughter, Lady Jean, married to Claud Muirhead of Lachope, and secondly, to Lady Mary Erskine, eldest daughter of Alexander third earl of Kelhe, without issue

James, fourth earl of Carnwath, married Lady Mary Seton, youngest daughter of the second earl of Winton, and by her he had one daughter, Lady Mary, married to Lord John Hay, second son of the second marquis of Tweeddale, without issue He died in 1688, and was succeeded by his brother, John, fifth earl of Carnwath, a nobleman eminent for his learning and for his knowledge in the science of heraldry He died, unmarried, in June 1703 The first appearance of mantelés (a term in heraldry) in Scotland was on his funeral escutcheon

The title reverted to the grandson of the Hon Sir John Dalzell of Glenae, baronet, already mentioned, as having three sons and four daughters The sons were, 1st, Sir John, 2d, James, an officer in the army of King James the Seventh, but who, at the Revolution, quitted the service He engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and was taken at Preston, in November of that year He married a Miss Graham, by whom, with a daughter, he had a son, John, who took to wife Harriet, daughter of the sixth earl of Kenmure, and 3d, Colonel Thomas Dalzell of the Scots guards, who died in 1743 The latter married Janet, only daughter of the second son of Ferguson of Craigdarroch, by whom he had a son, David Dalzell, a merchant in Glasgow, and three daughters

Sir John Dalzell of Glenae, the eldest son, was served heir to his father, 2d September 1686, and died in 1689 By his wife, Harriet, second daughter of Sir William Murray of Stanhope, baronet, he had two sons, namely, Sir Robert, sixth earl of Carnwath, and John, and a daughter, Mary, married to the sixth Viscount Kenmure, who was beheaded for his accession to the rebellion of 1715 The Hon John Dalzell, the second son, was a captain in the army on half-pay, and on the rumoured arrival of the earl of Mar in Scotland in the beginning of August of that year, he sent in a resignation of his commission to the earl of Orkney, that he might join the standard of the Pretender, and set off immediately to Elliock, the residence of his brother the earl of Carnwath, to apprize him of Mar's expected arrival He advanced with the insurgent army into England, and was at the battle of Preston After their defeat there, while negotiations were going on with General Wills, the English commander, relative to a surrender, he appeared at Wills' head quarters, and requested to know what terms he would grant separately to the Scots Wills answered that he would not treat with rebels, nor grant any other terms than those already offered, namely, unconditional surrender as prisoners of war He was among the prisoners taken on that occasion, and was immediately tried by a court martial as a deserter, but acquitted, having proved that previous to joining the rebels he had resigned his commission in the service of government He married a daughter of William Tildesly of Lodge, Esq, and had a son settled in St Christophers

Sir Robert Dalzell of Glenae, the elder son, on the death of John, fifth earl of Carnwath, in 1703, became the sixth earl He was early instructed by his tutor in the now exploded doctrines of hereditary right, passive obedience and non-resistance, which entailed so much misery and misfortune on those who held them He was educated at the university of Cambridge, where he imbibed a strong affection for the services of the Church of England His disposition is described as having been naturally sweet, and his address affable, and, with other gifts and graces, he possessed a ready wit and considerable power of language He engaged in the rebellion of 1715 with great ardour On receiving from his brother notice of the expected arrival of the earl of Mar in Scotland, on 7th August that year, to raise the standard of the Pretender, he despatched expresses to the earl of Nithsdale, the viscount Kenmure, and other Jacobite chiefs with the intelligence. He attended the grand hunting match at Aboyne in Aberdeenshire, on 27th August convened by the earl of Mar, at which it was resolved to take up arms in support of the Chevalier, and was one of those summoned by the Lord Advocate to appear at Edinburgh to give bail for their allegiance to the government, but he paid no attention to the summons He joined the insurgent army, on their advance into England, and on their arrival at Kelso, his chaplain, Mr William Irvine, an old episcopalian minister, delivered a sermon, on the afternoon of Sunday, 23d October, full of exhortations to his hearers to be zealous and steady in the cause of the Chevalier This discourse, he afterwards acknowledged, he had formerly preached in the Highlands, about twenty-six years before, in presence of Lord Viscount Dundee and his army On the following Sunday, the 30th October, the rebels, having arrived at Langholm, sent forward to Ecclefechan, during the night, a detachment of four hundred horse, under the earl of Carnwath, for the purpose of blocking up Dumfries till the foot should come up This detachment arrived at Ecclefechan before daylight, and after a short halt, proceeded in the direction of Dumfries, but they had not advanced far, when they learned that great preparations had been made for the defence of the town The earl immediately forwarded the intelligence to Langholm, and in the meantime halted his men at Blacket-ridge, a moor in the neighbourhood, till further orders His express was met by the main body of the insurgent army about two miles west from Langholm, on its march to Dumfries, the intended attack on which town was in consequence abandoned He was taken prisoner at Preston, 14th November, and on the 19th January following, with Lords Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Wintoun, Nairn, Widdrington, and Kenmure, he was brought before the House of Lords, on an impeachment of high treason Here his steadfastness failed him He pleaded guilty, and threw himself on the mercy of the king, beseeching their lordships to intercede for him with his majesty, assuring them that if his life were granted, he should deem himself obliged to live under the strictest ties of loyalty to King George for the future He was condemned with six other lords, and sentenced to be beheaded as a traitor his titles attainted, and his estate, which then amounted to £863 per annum, forfeited to the crown After being respited, he received a pardon, so far as his life and estates were concerned, and died at Kirkmichael in July 1787 He was 4 times married, 1 to Lady Grace Montgomery, 3d daughter of 9th earl of Eglinton, issue 2 daughters, 2 3d June 1720, to Grizel, daughter of Alexander Urquhart of Newhall, issue 1 son, Alexander, 3 to Margaret, daughter of John Hamilton of Bangor, issue a daughter, 4 in July 1735, to Margaret, 3d daughter of Thomas Vincent of Bamburgh Grange, Yorkshire, issue a son, Robert, married to Miss Acklom of Wiseton, in the same county

Alexander Dalzell, the attainted earl's elder son, assumed the title of earl, after his father's death He died at Kirkmichael, 3d April 1787 By his wife Elizabeth Jackson, he had 5 sons, all of whom, except the 2d, died young, and 2 daughters, styled Lady Margaret and Lady Elizabeth Dalzell, the former married to Sir Robert Grierson of Lagg, baronet The latter died unmarried

Richard, the eldest son, b in 1753, m Elizabeth Johnstone, and had a dr m. to her cousin, Alexander Grierson, Esq, younger of Lag

Robert Dalzell of Glenae, the second and only surviving son, studied for the bar, and passed advocate in 1776 On his father's death, he inherited the estates, but did not assume the title He died at Glenae house, 13th February, 1808 He married, 18th March, 1788, Anne, daughter of David Armstrong of Kirtleton, Dumfries-shire, advocate, and by her had two daughters, namely, Margaret, wife of Major Dougal Stuart-Dalziel, and Elizabeth, of Henry Douglas, Esq, third son of Sir Charles Douglas, baronet of Kelhead, and a son, John, the youngest of the family, born 18th August 1795 He succeeded his father in 1808 He was an officer in the royal navy, and fell in action off New Orleans, 10th October, 1814 As he died unmarried, the issue male of the attainted earl's eldest son, Alexander, styled the seventh earl, became extinct, and the estates fell to Robert Alexander Dalzell, a lieutenant general in the army, born 13th February 1768, descended from the attainted earl's younger son, Robert To General Dalzell, the earldom of Carnwath was restored by act of parliament, 26th May 1826 He married, first, 23d September 1789, Jane, daughter of Samuel Parkes, Esq of Cork, and by her, (who died 3d September 1791) he had a daughter, Elizabeth, who died young, secondly, 26th April, 1794, Andalusia, daughter of Lieutenant-colonel Arthur Browne, by whom he had four sons and three daughters This lady died in 1833, and the earl married, thirdly, 11th October, 1838, Jane, relict of Major Alexander Morison of Gunnersbury Park, Middlesex, and of John Carnell, Esq of Correnden and Hazel Hall, Kent His lordship died January 1, 1839

His eldest son, Thomas Henry Dalzell, succeeded as eleventh earl in succession (including those who should have possessed the title during the attainder) He was born in 1797, married, 1st, Mary Anne, eldest daughter of Rt Hon Henry Grattan, widow of John Blashford, Esq, died in 1853, without issue, married, 2dly, in 1855, Isabella Eliza, daughter of Colonel Eardley Wilmot, R A, widow of J H Lecky, Esq, issue, a son, Henry Arthur Hew, Lord Dalzell

CARRICK, a surname derived from the southern of the three districts into which the county of Ayr is divided The name appears to have originated from the British carrig, a rock, probably in reference to Ailsa Craig, a lofty rock in the sea which lies opposite to, and not very distant from, its seaboard, and which likewise gave his title to the Marquis of Ailsa

---

CARRICK, earl of, an ancient title, first held by Duncan, son of Gilbert, one of the two sons of Fergus, lord of Galloway, a chief descended of a Saxon family, long previously placed over these wild people by the English earls of Northumberland, who, having rebelled against Malcolm the Fourth, was subdued by him, and became a subject of the Scottish crown in the twelfth century At that period, the district of Carrick formed a portion of Galloway On Fergus' death, in 1161, his lands were, according to the law of the country, divided between Gilbert and his brother Uchtred They attended William the Lion on his invasion of Northumberland in 1174, but no sooner was he taken prisoner than, returning into Galloway at the head of their fierce and rapacious clans, they broke out into rebellion, attacked and demolished the royal castles, murdered the Anglo-Normans who had settled among their mountains, and expelled the officers of the king of Scots They proceeded next to dispute about pre-eminence and possessions among themselves On the 22d September, 1176, Gilbert attacked Uchtred, while residing in his father's house in Loch-Fergus, and having overpowered him, caused his son Malcolm to put him to death, after depriving him of his sight and tongue, but was unable to acquire his possessions, valiantly defended by Roland the son of Uchtred On William the Lion regaining his liberty, in the following year, he invaded Galloway, subdued Gilbert, and exacting a pecuniary satisfaction, allowed him to resume possession of his inheritance Gilbert died on the 1st of January 1184-5, when Roland, the son of the murdered Uchtred, seizing the favourable opportunity, attacked and dispersed his uncle's adherents, 5th July 1185, and obtained possession of all Galloway as his own inheritance This procedure was, however, opposed by Henry the Second of England, then lord paramount of Scotland who marched an army to Carlisle, and although William would have been well pleased to see Roland in possession of the whole country, both he and Roland were forced to submit the matter to the decision of the English court Satisfied with this acknowledgment of his paramount right, Henry left the settlement of the question to William who granted the district of Carrick to Duncan, son of Gilbert as a full satisfaction This took place about 1186, and Duncan was thereupon created earl of Carrick About 1240, he founded the famous abbey of Crossraguel or Crossregal, two miles from Maybole, for Cluniac monks, and amply endowed it with lands and tithes He also gave to the monks of Paisley and Melrose, several donations out of his estate, for the welfare of his soul

His son, Nigel or Niel, second earl of Carrick, like his father, was very liberal to the church In 1255, a commission was granted by Henry the Third for receiving 'Niel earl of Karricke,' and other Scotsmen into his protection He was one of the regents of Scotland and guardians of Alexander the Third and his queen, appointed in the convention at Roxburgh, 20th September, 1255, and died the following year He married Margaret, daughter of Walter, high-steward of Scotland, by whom he had a daughter, Margaret, countess of Carrick, in her own right, and the mother of ROBERT THE BRUCE She was twice married, first, to Adam de Kilconeath (or Kilconquhar), who, in her right, in accordance with the practice of those days, was third earl of Carrick Having joined the crusade of 1268, under the banner of Louis the Ninth of France, he died at Acon in the Holy Land in 1270 The following year she married, secondly, Robert Brus, son of Robert Brus, lord of Annandale and Cleveland, under the romantic circumstances already related [See ante, p 407, art BRUCE] Brus, in consequence, became fourth earl of Carrick The countess died before 1292, and on 27th November of that year, her husband resigned to Robert the Bruce, his eldest son, the earldom of Carrick, with all the lands he held in Scotland in right of his wife He still however, continued to be styled earl of Carrick He and his son swore fealty to Edward the First at Berwick, 28th August 1296, on which occasion they are styled in the record 'Robert le Brus le veil (vieil) e Robert de Brus le jouene Counte de Carrick' The elder Brus died in 1304 By the countess of Carrick he had five sons and seven daughters, viz 1 Robert the Bruce, fifth earl of Carrick and king of Scots, 2 Edward, sixth earl, crowned king of Ireland, 3 and 4, Thomas and Alexander, who, being taken prisoners in Galloway, 9th February, 1306-7, by Duncan Macdowal, when bringing succours to their brother Robert from Ireland, after an engagement in which they were both severely wounded, and presented by him at Carlisle to Edward the First, were, by his order, immediately executed, and, 5, Niel, a young man of singular beauty, one of those who surrendered at Kildrummie castle to the earls of Lancaster and Hereford in 1306 He was tried by a special commission at Berwick, condemned, hanged and beheaded The daughters were, 1 Lady Isabel, married, first, to Sir Thomas Randolph of Strathdon, high-chamberlain of Scotland, by whom she had Thomas earl of Moray, regent of Scotland, secondly, to an earl of Athol, and thirdly, to Alexander Bruce, by whom she had a son of the same name Among the charters of Robert the Bruce is one to Isobel countess of Athol and Alexander Bruce her son, of the lands of Culven and Sannaykis. Two others are granted to Isabell de Atholia and Alexander Bruce, 'filio suo nepoti nostro,' of the lands of Balgillo in Forfarshire, 2 Lady Mary, married, first, to Sir Niel Campbell of Lochow, ancestor of the Argyle family, and secondly, to Sir Alexander Frazer, high-chamberlain of Scotland, 3 Lady Christian, married, first, to Gratney, earl of Mar, secondly to Sir Christopher Seton of Seton, who was put to death by the English in 1306, and thirdly, to Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, 4 Lady Matilda, married to Hugh, earl of Ross, 5 Lady Margaret, married to Sir William Carlyle of Torthorwald and Crunington, 6 Lady Elizabeth, married to Sir William Dishington of Ardross in Fife, and 7 the youngest daughter, whose name has not been preserved, married to Sir David de Brechin

King Robert the Bruce, the eldest son, married, first, Isabella, daughter of Donald, tenth earl of Mar, by whom he had a daughter, Marjory, who fell into the hands of the English in 1306, and was detained a prisoner in England, in charge of Henry de Percy till after the battle of Bannockburn in 1314 when she was conducted back to Scotland by Walter the high-steward to whom she was married in 1315 She died in March 1315-16, leaving an only child, afterwards King Robert the Second The Bruce married, secondly, in 1302, Lady Elizabeth de Burgo, eldest daughter of Richard, second earl of Ulster In 1306, she fled to the sanctuary of St Duthac at Tain, in Ross-shire, but the earl of Ross, violating the sanctuary, delivered her up to the English The directions given for her entertainment while a prisoner, are preserved by Rymer She was to be conveyed to the manor of Brustewick, to be allowed a waiting woman and a maid servant, advanced in life, sedate, and of good conversation, a butler, two men servants and a footboy for her chamber, sober and not notous, to make her bed, three greyhounds, when she inclined to hunt, venison, fish, and the fairest house in the manor In 1308 she was removed to another prison, and in 1312, to Windsor castle, when twenty shillings weekly were allowed for her maintenance Her last place of confinement was the castle of Rochester, whither she was conveyed in 1314 The same year, after Bannockburn, the queen, the sister and daughter of Bruce, with the bishop of Glasgow and the earl of Mar, were exchanged for the earl of Hereford She died 26th October 1327, and was buried at Dunfermline Her issue were, a son, King David the Second, and three daughters, namely, 1 Margaret, married, first, to Robert Glen, who, with his wife, received a grant of Piteddy in Fife from her brother, David the Second, and, secondly, to William, fourth earl of Sutherland, and died in 1358, leaving issue by the earl, 2 Matilda, married to Thomas Isaac, a simple esquire, and had two daughters, Johanna, married to John, lord of Lorn, and Catharine, who died young Their mother died at Aberdeen 20th July, 1353, and was buried at Dunfermline, and 3 Elizabeth, married to Sir Walter Oliphant of Aberdidgy, for which Crawford refers to a charter of 11th January 1364, whereby King David erects the lands of Gask into a free barony, 'dilecto et fideli suo Waltero Olyfant et Elizabeth, sponsæ suæ, dilectæ sorori nostræ' Besides these children, King Robert the Bruce had a natural son, Sir Robert Bruce, knight, who obtained from his father grants of the lands of Liddisdale, the barony of Sprouston, the forfeited lands of Alexander de Abernethy, and various other lands, in which grants he is generally styled 'filius noster charissimus' He fought gallantly at the disastrous battle of Dupplin, where he was killed, 12th August, 1332

Sir Edward Bruce, the second son, on whom and the heirs male of his body, without reference to legitimacy, the earldom of Carrick was conferred by charter by his brother King Robert, and who was also lord of Galloway and king of Ireland, married Isabella, daughter of William earl of Ros, for which he received a dispensation from the Pope, dated at Avignon 1st June 1317, as they were within the third and fourth degrees of consanguinity, for the purpose of putting an end to feuds between their parents, relatives, and friends Edward, king of Ireland, had no legitimate issue, but he left three natural sons, Robert, Alexander, and Thomas, successively earls of Carrick [See ante, p 122]

Robert, seventh earl, the eldest son, inherited that earldom in virtue of the charter granted by Robert the First to the heirs male of the body of his brother, Edward Bruce without restricting the succession to legitimate sons He fell at the battle of Dupplin, 12th August, 1332, without issue

Alexander, eighth earl, his brother and heir, with many others of the Scottish nobles, submitted to Balıol after the battle of Dupplin At the battle of Annan soon after, where Balıol was surprised and defeated, he was taken in arms by the earl of Moray, who saved him from the punishment of a traitor Balfour says that he had been constrained to follow Balıol to Annan At the battle of Halidonhill, 19th July, 1333, he held a command in the third division of the Scots army, which was led by the regent himself, and fell, fighting valiantly against the English, thus atoning, says Lord Hailes, for his short defection from his cousin David the Second He married Eleanor, only daughter of Archibald de Douglas, sister of William first earl of Douglas, and by her had an only daughter, Lady Eleanor Bruce, married to Sir William de Cunynghame, who, in her right, became tenth earl of Carrick The countess, her mother, after the death of her husband, earl Alexander, was four times married again namely, to James Sandilands of Calder, of the Torphichen family, William Towers of Dalry, Sir Duncan Wallace of Sundrum, and lastly, in 1376, to Sir Patrick Hepburn of Hales In the Fœdera is a safe-conduct for Alianora de Bruys, countess of Carrick (the daughter), going into England, with sixty horse in her train, to visit the shrine of Thomas á Becket at Canterbury, to endure for one year dated 8th December, 1373

Thomas Bruce, ninth earl, succeeded his brother Alexander He was one of the associates of Robert the Steward, guardian of Scotland, whom he joined with the flower of the gentry of Kyle, in 1394, but died soon afterwards without issue

On his death the earldom of Carrick reverted to the crown, and was conferred on Sir William de Cunynghame, knight, husband of Lady Elenor Bruce, as appears from an incomplete charter of King David the Second, without a date The earldom, however, soon again reverted to the crown, and was conferred by David the Second on John Stewart, Lord of Kyle, great grandson of King Robert the Bruce, eldest son of Robert Steward of Scotland, earl of Strathern, by a charter in the parliament at Scone, 22d June 1363 In 1356 he had defeated the English in Annandale, and obliged the inhabitants to submit to the Scots government John Stewart eleventh earl of Carrick, was present in the parliament held by David at Perth, 23d October 1370, when the earldom of Ross was resigned into the king's hands After the accession of his father to the throne, he resigned the earldom into his majesty's hands, and obtained a new charter thereof to him and Lady Annabella Drummond, his spouse, in liferent, and to the heirs procreated between them, in fee, 1st June 1371 Succeeding to the crown of Scotland in 1390, by the title of Robert the Third, he conferred the earldom of Carrick on his eldest son the ill-fated duke of Rothesay, who thus became the twelfth earl After the death of that prince, the king, 10th December 1404, granted in free regality to his second son James, steward of Scotland, afterwards James the First the whole lands of the stewartry of Scotland, including the earldom of Carrick That earldom ever after composed part of the inheritance of the princes and stewards of Scotland and is one of the titles of the prince of Wales, duke of Rothesay

The title of earl of Carrick was, for a short time, held by another John Stewart, the second son of Robert earl of Orkney, a natural son of James the Fifth He was first created a peer of Scotland by the title of Lord Kinclevin, 10th August, 1607, and had charters of the dominical lands and mill of the monastery of Crossraguel, of the lands of Ballochmorn, Knockrommill, and of the barony of Girvan, &c, 29th August 1616 Being thus in possession of part of the ancient earldom of Carrick, he obtained from King Charles the First a patent of the title of earl of Carrick At the privy council held 22d July 1628, the procurator for his lordship delivered to the earl of Mar, lord treasurer, a patent under the great seal, whereby his majesty had been pleased to advance him to that dignity, which patent the lord treasurer having exhibited to the council, Sir Thomas Hope, lord advocate, reminded the council that the title of earl of Carrick belonged to the king's eldest son, the prince of Scotland, and was not communicable to any subject, and he recommended to the council to advise with his majesty on the subject, before any 'forder wer proceedit heirein' The difficulty appears to have been got over by the earls alleging that the title was taken not from the earldom of Carrick in Ayrshire but from a small place called Carrick on his lordship's estate in Orkney, for, on 14th December 1630, the lord chancellor delivered to the earl of Carrick a patent under the great seal, whereby his majesty made him and the heirs male gottin' of his own body earls of Carrick, which patent the said earl reverently accepted on his knees, his ambition now being completely gratified His lordship died without male issue in 1652, when his titles became extinct

In the peerage of Ireland, the title of earl of Carrick created in 1748, is enjoyed by a family of the name of Butler descended from a common ancestor with the house of Ormonde The first Viscount Ikerrin, (created in 1629) the second title of the earl of Carrick, was Sir Piers Butler of Ismallon, a lineal descendant of Edmund, created in 1315 earl of Carrick-Mac-Griffyne, for his services against the Scots, a sort of opposition title when, at the same time, it was borne by Edward Bruce, afterwards crowned king of Ireland The eighth Viscount Ikerrin obtained the earldom in 1748

CARRICK, JOHN DONALD, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Glasgow in April 1787 His father was in humble circumstances, and after receiving the common elements of education, he was at an early period placed in the office of a Mr Nicholson, an architect in his native city In 1807, unknown to his parents, with the view of trying his fortune in London, he set off on foot, with but a few shillings in his pocket, sleeping under hedges, or wherever he could obtain a dormitory. On his arrival in the great city he offered his services to various shopkeepers, but at first without success At last a decent tradesman, himself a Scotsman, took compassion on the friendless lad, and engaged him to run his errands, &c He was afterwards in the employment of several other persons In the spring of 1809 he obtained a situation in the house of Messrs Spodes & Co, in the Staffordshire pottery line of business In the beginning of 1811 he returned to Glasgow, and opened a large establishment in Hutcheson street, as a china and stoneware merchant, in which business he continued for fourteen years In 1825, he published a 'Life of Sir William Wallace,' in two volumes, which was written for Constable's Miscellany This, his principal work, was favourably received He also wrote, about this time, some comic songs and humorous pieces In that year he gave up his business, and travelled for two or three years, chiefly in the West Highlands, as an agent for some Glasgow house He afterwards became sub-editor of the 'Scots Times,' a newspaper of liberal principles then published at Glasgow, and wrote many of the local squibs and other jeux d'esprit which appeared in that paper He contributed 'The Confessions of a Barker,' 'The Devil's Codicil,' and other pieces, to 'The Day,' a periodical published for six months at Glasgow in 1832 Afterwards to a collection of songs and pieces of poetry, sentimental and humorous, entitled 'Whistle-Binkie' Mr Carrick contributed 'The Scottish Tea-Party,' 'Mister Peter Paterson,' 'The Harp and the Haggis,' 'The Gudeman's Prophecy,' 'The Cook's Legacy,' and 'The Muirland Cottagers,' in that vein of humour in which he excelled In 1833 he was editor of the 'Perth Advertiser' during eleven months In February 1834 he was editor of the 'Kilmarnock Journal,' but being afflicted with an affection which finally settled into tic douloureux in the head and mouth, he returned to Glasgow in January 1835, where he superintended the first edition of the 'Land of Logan,' a collection of Scottish anecdotes and facetiæ, which appeared in June of that year, and of which he was projector and principal contributor, and he contributed papers to the 'Scottish Monthly Magazine,' a periodical published for a short time in Glasgow Mr Carrick died August 17, 1837, and was interred in the burying-ground of the High Church of his native city As a writer he is principally distinguished for humorous satire, and a thorough knowledge of the manners and customs of his countrymen To an enlarged edition of the 'Land of Logan' we are indebted for these details of his life

CARRUTHERS, a surname derived from an ancient parish of the same name in Dumfries-shire, which with Penersax was united to Middlebie in 1609, and they now form one parish, under the latter name On a height above the site of the ancient hamlet of Carruthers stood a British fortlet whence came the name Caer-rhythyr, 'the fort of the assault' The lands of Penersax (written also Penesax and Pennisax, vulgarized into Peniestughs,) belonged in the fifteenth century to Kilpatrick of Dalgarnock, but passed, in 1199, to Carruthers of Mouswald, and in the reign of James the Sixth were acquired by the Douglases of Drumlanrig, the ancestors of the dukes of Queensberry A statue of Sir Simon Carruthers of Mouswald who married a daughter of that ducal house, lies in the aisle of the parish church of Mouswald (originally Moswald, 'the wood near the moss') its head pillowed, its feet on a lion, and its hands in the elevated posture of supplication, but it has neither date nor inscription In 'Pitcairn's Criminal Trials,' (vol i part 1,) under date, September 13, 1563, a bond is quoted as recorded in the Caution Book (Liber Plegiacionis,) whereby Marion Carruthers an heiress of Mouswald, finds caution not to marry any chief traitor or other 'broken' man One William Carruthers in Clonhide, was, January 26, 1508-9, convicted of transporting cattle to England (taken from the land of Newby), and of art and part of the slaughter at the same time of Robert Hood and of an infant of two years old, as well as of the burning of the place and mill of Newby, in company with Andrew Johnston 'and the traitors of Leven,' and was sentenced to be drawn and hanged, and all his goods forfeited The crime of sending, or treasonably outputting,' as it was called of cattle to England, was, in those days, always visited with the severest punishments, as during the wars between the two countries, frequent famines took place in Scotland, and the constant force maintained on the borders led to the necessity of bringing cattle from, rather than sending them to, the English counties On May 19, 1563, John Carruthers of Holmends (properly Holmains or Howmains), George and William his sons, Edward Irvine of Bonshaw, David Irvine of Robgill, and several others their accomplices, were indicted for hurting Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, and slaying several persons whose names were given, but the indictment appears to have been departed from On 18th March 1618 John Carruthers of Rammerscales, and William Johnston, called of Lockerbie, were indicted for the slaughter of Christopher Wigholme (now Wigham or Whigham), burgess of Sanquhar, committed in June 1594, but the charge was not pressed against Carruthers For the slaughter of John Carruthers of Dormont one Habbie Rae in Mousewald and twenty-one others were put upon their trial, 3d February 1619, but the case was remitted to the circuit court at Dumfries, and the result is not recorded

CARSON, Aglionby Ross, M A , LL D , rector of the High School of Edinburgh, a classical scholar of reputation, was born at Holywood, Dumfries-shire, in the year 1780 He received the elements of his classical education in the endowed school of Wallace Hall, in the neighbouring parish of Closeburn, in which institution he subsequently acted as an assistant teacher In 1797 he entered the university of Edinburgh , and from May 1799, till October 1800, acted as assistant to Mr John Taylor, of the grammar school, Musselburgh He was enrolled a student of divinity in the university of Edinburgh in 1799 The grammar school of Dumfries having become vacant by the removal of Mr Gray to Edinburgh, Mr Carson was unanimously elected his successor, on the 15th of October, 1801 In January 1806, in consequence of Mr Christison's promotion to the chair of humanity in Edinburgh, Mr Carson obtained a mastership in the High School In 1820, when Mr Pillans vacated the rector's chair, in consequence of having succeeded Professor Christison in the university, the patrons of the High School placed Mr Carson at the head of the school His appointment as rector took place on the 30th of August, 1820 He had, three months prior, declined acceptance of the Greek professorship in the university of St Andrews, to which, though not a candidate, he had been elected Six years afterwards, that university, in token of his great learning, conferred on him the degree of LL D On the 9th of October, 1845, he found it necessary, on account of the precarious state of his health, to tender his resignation as rector of the High School into the hands of the patrons On this occasion the magistrates and council testified their appreciation of his long and faithful services by settling upon him an annuity for life of a hundred pounds At a meeting of his colleagues, a series of resolutions were passed, expressive of their deep regret at his resignation of rector, and bearing testimony to the merit, acumen, and profundity of his contributions to critical literature—especially in regard to his treatise on the Latin relative The resolutions also spoke of his long, laborious, and valuable services in the High School, and his popularity as a teacher They characterized him as a man of unobtrusive worth—endowed with rare powers of instruction, and as possessing a playful manner even in matters of discipline, while he maintained order by the gentlest means

A half-length portrait of Dr Carson, painted in 1833 by Watson Gordon, Esq , president of the Royal Society of Arts, ornaments the hall of the High School, of which the following is a woodcut

The expense was defrayed by a subscription by several of his pupils, and was presented to the school by Dr Balfour

He was succeeded in the office of rector of the High School, on the 16th of December, 1845, by Dr L Schmitz, a native of Lupen, a village near Aix-la-Chapelle, in the Rhenish province of Prussia Dr Carson died at Edinburgh on the 4th November 1850 — Dr Steven's History of the High School

Dr Carson's contributions to literature are an edition of Phædrus, 'Mair's Introduction,' 'Tunci's Grammatical Exercises,' and particularly an edition of 'Tacitus' all of which, especially the last, are highly valued

Of the excellence of his work entitled 'The Relative, Qui, Quæ, Quod ' ample testimony is borne by its universal adoption as a guide to the tyro

He also contributed largely to the 'Classical Journal,' the 'Scottish Review and the Encyclopædia Britannica.'

CARSTAIRS, a surname derived from the parish of Carstairs, in the upper ward of Lanarkshire In charters of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the name appears in the form of Castleterres or Castletarres, and in documents subsequent to that date in that of Carstares, Carstures, and Carstairs The prefix car or caer, which occurs in the old British language, signifies either a fort, walled place, or city, and most probably therefore any place built of stone and lime originally derived from the Latin calx, cal, lime, used in countries where Roman colonies once existed, to denote a building of stone and lime, as caes, a quay or wharf, in its abstract form of caero or caeiro, lime-kiln, or place where lime is used, still met with in the Spanish and Portuguese languages The frequent use of this word caer, in Saxon names of places, in England and Scotland, as Carhampton, &c, and the fact of its not occurring in British or Welsh topography until after the regions had been visited by the Saxons, if not conquered by them, makes it doubtful if it be originally of British origin The word is thus synonymous with the other prefix castel The affix stairs or stair, anciently staer or ster, is a corrupt form of the word terræ or terrace signifying lands pertaining to or holding of the castle There was an old family of this name who possessed the lands of Kilconquhar in Fife, and from them that estate came to the ancestors of the present proprietor, Sir John Lindsay Bethune, Bart, descended from the Lords Lindsay of the Byres

CARSTAIRS, William, a divine of great political eminence, was born, February 11, 1649, at Cathcart, near Glasgow, of the high church of which city his father, who was descended from an ancient family in Fife, was minister In 'Balfour's Annals,' (vol iv p 168,) under date 22d November 1650, the following entry, relative to his father in the proceedings of the Estates, occurs 'The Committee of estaits remitts to the Com of quarterings the exchange of prissoners, anent Alex Jeffray and Mr Johne Carstar, minister, with some Englishe prissoners in the castle of Dumbartan' His mother, Jane Mun, was of the family of Glanderston, in Renfrewshire When very young he was sent to a school at Ormiston in East Lothian, then kept by a Mr Sinclair, which under his care had attained to great celebrity At this school many of the sons of the nobility and gentry who afterwards distinguished themselves in life, were his companions With several of them he formed an intimacy which continued through life, and to this, he was wont to ascribe, in a great measure his future fortunes In due time he was entered a member of the university of Edinburgh, but afterwards, in consequence of the distracted state of the times in Scotland he went to Utrecht, where his prudence and address recommended him to the notice of the prince of Orange, to whom he was introduced by the pensionary Fagel In 1682 he returned to Scotland with the view of entering the church, but, discouraged by the persecution to which the presbyterians were subjected at that period, he, after receiving a licence to preach, resolved to return to Holland As he had to pass through London, he was instructed by Argyle and his friends to treat with Russell, Sydney, and the other leaders of that party in England who wished to exclude the duke of York from the succession to the throne, whereby he became privy to the Rye-House Plot, on the discovery of which he was apprehended in Kent, and frequently examined While, however, he avowed the utmost abhorrence of any attempt on the life of the king or the duke of York, he refused to give farther information, and was sent down to Scotland to be tried After a rigorous confinement in irons, he was twice put to the torture, on the 5th and 6th of Sept 1684, which he endured with great firmness, but being afterwards promised a full pardon, and deluded with the assurance that his answers would never be used against any person, he consented to make a judicial declaration The privy council immediately published a statement, which he declared to be a false and mutilated account of his confession, and, in violation of their engagement, produced his evidence in court against his friend, Mr Baillie of Jerviswood After the Revolution, the privy council of Scotland made Mr Carstairs a present of the 'thumbikins,' which had formed the instrument of his torture On his release he returned to Holland, in the winter of 1684–5, when the prince of Orange made him one of his own chaplains, and procured his election to the office of minister of the English congregation at Leyden He attended the prince in his expedition to England, and was constantly consulted by him in affairs of difficulty and importance On the elevation of William and Mary to the throne Carstairs was appointed his majesty's chaplain for Scotland to which were annexed all the emoluments of the chapel royal, and was the chief agent between the church of that country and the court The king required his constant presence about his person, assigning him apartments in the palace when at home, and when abroad with the army, allowing him five hundred pounds a-year for camp equipage

William was at first anxious that episcopacy should be the religion of Scotland as well as of England, but Carstairs convinced him of the impropriety of this project, which the king was forced to abandon, and the establishment of the presbyterian form of church government was the consequence He was also, in 1694, of great service to the church in getting the oath of allegiance, with the assurance, declaring William to be king de jure, as well as de facto, dispensed with, the clergy naturally being averse to the taking a civil oath as a qualification for a sacred office

On the death of William he was no longer employed in public business, but Anne continued him in the office of chaplain-royal On 12th May 1703, he was appointed principal of the university of Edinburgh, for which he drew up new rules In the same year he was presented to the church of Greyfriars in that city, and three years after was translated to the High Church He was four times chosen Moderator of the General Assembly To the universities of his native country he was a great benefactor In 1693 he obtained from the Crown, out of the bishops' rents in Scotland, a gift of three hundred pounds sterling per annum to each of the Scottish universities, and at various times he procured donations for them for the encouragement of learning When the union between the two kingdoms came to be agitated, he took an active part in its favour He vigorously opposed the patronage act of Queen Anne, and at all times vigilantly watched over the liberties and privileges of the Church of Scotland He warmly promoted the succession of the House of Hanover to the throne of these realms, and was continued by George the First in his post as chaplain to the king Principal Carstairs died in December 1715, while holding the office for the fourth time of Moderator of the General Assembly In 1774 his State Papers and Letters, with an account of his Life, were published, in one vol 4to, by the Rev Dr Joseph M'Cormick, principal of the university of St Andrews There is a portrait of him in the university of Edinburgh Another, by Aikman, is in possession of Alexander Dunlop, Esq of Keppoch, which has been often engraved

The following is a woodcut from an engraving by H Adlard

Principal Carstairs was a man of great learning and eminence in the church So complete was his mastery of the Latin language that Dr Pitcairn, who regularly attended the, in those days, customary opening Latin oration of the principal, delivered before the professors and students in the common hall of the university, used to observe that when Mr Carstairs began to address his audience he could not help fancying himself transported to the forum in the days of ancient Rome "He managed," says Bower, "Scottish affairs with such discretion, during the reigns of William and Anne, that he made few public enemies, and such was his knowledge of human nature, his prudence, and conciliating temper, that he was held in the highest estimation by those who still adhered to the house of Stuart So great was his influence in church and state that he was generally called Cardinal Carstairs"

CASSILLIS, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by the marquis of Ailsa, and conferred, in 1509, on David, third Lord Kennedy The first of the family mentioned in any charter was Duncan de Carrick, who lived in the reign of Malcolm the Fourth, which began in 1153 His son, Nicol de Carrick granted, in 1220, the church of St

Cuthbert at Maybole, to the nuns of North Berwick Nicol's son, Roland de Carrick, obtained a grant of the bailiary of Carrick from Nigel, earl of Carrick, who died in 1256, to himself and his heirs male, to be 'caput totius progeniei suæ,' that is, chief of his name, and to have the command of all the men in Carrick, under the said earl and his successors, which grant was confirmed by Alexander the Third, by a charter dated at Stirling, 20th January 1275–6, and ratified by Robert the Second, by charters dated at Ayr, 1st October 1372

Sir Gilbert de Carrick, knight, son of Roland, in 1285 submitted a difference between him and the nuns of North Berwick to Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, father of Robert the First, and Robert bishop of Glasgow, to which submission his seal is appended, having the same shield of arms as that borne by the earls of Cassillis He was one of the securities for Robert, earl of Carrick, on his obtaining the resignation of that earldom from his father in 1292

His son, also named Gilbert, received from king Robert the Bruce a remission for Arthur his son-in-law having surrendered Lochdoon castle to the English, and was restored to the government thereof with the lands thereto belonging Sir Gilbert de Carrick was one of the prisoners taken at the battle of Durham in 1346

His son, Sir John Kennedy of Dunure, is designed in many authentic writs, the son of Sir Gilbert de Carrick He was forfeited in the reign of king David the Second, as appears from a charter of that monarch to Malcolm Fleming of the lands of Leigne, which belonged to him He, however, obtained from that monarch a charter confirming the donations, grants, and conditions made to him by Marjory de Montgomery, senior, and by his wife, Marjory de Montgomery, daughter of Sir John Montgomery, of the lands of Castlys (Cassillis) in the county of Ayr, with other territorial possessions which he had acquired in Carrick This, and other charters obtained by him are entitled, 'confirmatio Johannis Kenedy,' the family having changed their name from Carrick to Kennedy, the latter a Gaelic compound signifying the head of the house or family [See KENNEDY, surname of] He had three sons From the second, John, it is supposed that the old Kennedys of Culloan, now spelled Colzean, are descended

His eldest son, Sir Gilbert Kennedy, was one of the hostages delivered to the English in 1357, for the liberation of King David the Second He married, first, Marion, daughter of Sir James Sandilands of Calder, by Eleonora, countess of Carrick, and had by her four sons, namely, 1 Gilbert, who, on account of his next brother marrying a princess of Scotland, was disinherited by his father, 2 James, of whom afterwards, 3 Alexander, and 4 Sir Hugh Kennedy of Aldstinchar, who accompanied the Scots troops, under the command of the earl of Buchan, to France, and distinguished himself at the battle of Beaugé, 22d March 1421, in consequence of which he was honoured by the king of France with his armorial bearings, azure, three fleurs de lis, or, which he and his successors marshalled in the first and fourth quarters with those of Kennedy in the second and third From him descended the Kennedys of Bargany, Kirkhill, and Bunning, in Ayrshire Sir Gilbert married, secondly, Agnes, daughter of Sir Robert Maxwell of Calderwood and had by her three sons, namely, John, Thomas and David, the latter one of the retinue of knights who attended the princess Margaret of Scotland into France on her marriage to Louis the dauphin in 1436

Sir James Kennedy of Dunure, the second son, married the princess Mary Stewart, daughter of King Robert the Third, and widow of George first earl of Angus of the house of Douglas. By this marriage the wealth and influence of the family were greatly increased From his father-in-law he obtained a charter of confirmation of the bailiary of Carrick, and of the lands and barony of Dalrymple, to himself and the princess his wife, dated at Dundonald, 27th January 1405–6 He was killed in the lifetime of his father, in a quarrel with his elder brother, Gilbert, who had been disinherited in his favour Gilbert went to France, and died in the French service The princess Mary, their father's widow, was afterwards again twice married By her, Sir James Kennedy had two sons, Gilbert his successor, and James, bishop of St Andrews, the celebrated founder of the college of St Salvator in that city, of whom there is a memoir under the head of KENNEDY, JAMES post

Sir Gilbert Kennedy of Dunure, knight, obtained from King James the Second, a charter of the keeping of the castle of Lochdoon, and of the pennylands thereto belonging, to him and the heirs male of his body, 17th May 1450 He was created a peer of Scotland in 1452, by the title of Lord Kennedy, and on the death of James the Second in 1460 he was appointed one of the six regents of the kingdom during the minority of James the Third He died in 1473 He married Catherine, daughter of Herbert Lord Maxwell, by whom he had three sons and two daughters

His eldest son, John, second Lord Kennedy, was a privy councillor to king James the Third, and a commissioner to treat with the English for peace in 1484 He died in 1508 He married first, Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander, Lord Montgomery, by whom he had a son, David, third Lord Kennedy, and secondly, Lady Elizabeth Gordon, daughter of George earl of Huntly, relict of the second earl of Errol, and by her he had, with two daughters, three sons, namely, Alexander, ancestor of the Kennedys of Girvanmains and Barquhanny, John, and William The elder of the two daughters, Janet Kennedy, was the mistress of James the fourth She is said to have been the third wife of Archibald fifth earl of Angus, celebrated in Scottish history as Bell-the Cat According to Hume of Godscroft, Archibald earl of Angus was confined to the isle of Arran for taking Jean Kennedy, daughter of the earl of Cassillis, (a mistake for Lord Kennedy) out of Galloway, (the district of Carrick was then considered a part of Galloway,) to whom the king bore affection, and to whom the earl gave infeftment and seisin of the lands of Bothwell, though he never married her She does not appear, indeed, ever to have borne the title of countess of Angus James the Fourth granted to her a life-charter of the lands of Bothwell, dated 1st June 1501 She had by the king a son, James Stewart, created earl of Moray, the same year The younger daughter, Helen, married Adam Boyd of Pinkhill

The eldest son, David, third Lord Kennedy and first earl of Cassillis, was one of those who were advanced to the honour of knighthood by King James the Third, on the creation of his second son Alexander as duke of Ross, 29th January 1487–8 He was of the privy council of James the Fourth, and by that monarch he was created, in 1509, earl of Cassillis He married, first, Agnes, daughter of William, Lord Borthwick, by whom he had three sons, and 2dly, Grizel, daughter of Thomas Boyd, earl of Arran, relict of Alexander Lord Forbes, without issue He fell at the battle of Flodden

His eldest son, Gilbert, second earl, was a nobleman of superior abilities, and was employed in several offices of high trust He had a safe-conduct to go into England as an ambassador from Scotland, 6th February 1515–16 In 1523, when the regent duke of Albany sailed for France, the keeping of the young king's person was committed to him and three other lords. He was sworn a privy councillor to King James the Fifth, and signed the association to support his majesty's authority, 30th July 1524. On the 4th September following, he concluded a truce with the duke of Norfolk on the part of Henry the Eighth at Berwick. In November of the same year he was sent ambassador to London, to treat for a lasting peace, and a marriage between the young king (James the Fifth) and his cousin the princess Mary, daughter of Henry the Eighth. In January 1525 he returned to Scotland for fresh instructions, and the following month he was with the queen dowager, Margaret, in the castle of Edinburgh, when the earl of Angus her husband, with the earls of Lennox and Argyle, and other confederated lords, took possession of the city. His attachment to the queen dowager rendered him obnoxious to the faction of Angus, and in a parliament convoked by the latter, his lands were assigned to the earl of Arran. They were, however, soon after restored to him. He was assassinated at Prestwick, near Ayr, by Hugh Campbell, sheriff of Ayrshire, 22d December 1527. He married Lady Isabel Campbell, second daughter of the second earl of Argyle, by whom he had seven sons. His fourth son, Quentin Kennedy, abbot of Crossraguel, is famous for the dispute which, for three days, he maintained, in 1562, with John Knox at Maybole, on the subject of the mass. He was remarkable for his singular piety and great austerity of manners, and his zeal and learning so much gratified the Romish clergy that, on his death in 1564, he was publicly canonized as a saint. He published 'Ane compendius tractive, conforme to the Scripturis of Almychtie God, to ressoun, and authoritie, declaring the nerrest and onlie way to establische the conscience of ane Christiane man, in all materis quhilk ar in debate concerning faith and religioun.' His Correspondence with Willock will be found in the Appendix to Bishop Keith's History of Scotland.

Gilbert, the third earl, born in 1515, was only twelve years old when he succeeded his father. He was then at the university of St Andrews, where, in February 1527-8, only two months after his accession to the title, he was compelled to sign the sentence of death pronounced on Patrick Hamilton the protomartyr, for heresy. He was subsequently sent to Paris, to complete his education. While there he became acquainted with George Buchanan, at that time a regent or professor in the college of St Barbe, and engaged him as his domestic tutor in 1532. After residing with him for five years Buchanan accompanied the earl on his return to Scotland, and at his seat of Cassillis in Ayrshire, composed his bitter satire, entitled 'Somnium,' against the Franciscan friars. In 1535, the earl was one of the ambassadors sent to France, for the purpose of concluding a matrimonial alliance with a French princess, and in the following year when King James the Fifth went over to Paris, he and the other ambassadors met his majesty at Dieppe, and were present at his marriage with the princess Magdalene, eldest daughter of the French king.

At the fatal rout of the Scottish army at Solway Moss in November 1542, the earl was among the prisoners taken by the English, and was committed to the charge of Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, who not only entertained him very honourably, but strengthened his lordship in the profession of the Reformed religion, to which he was before greatly inclined. With some of the other nobles who were prisoners like himself, he only obtained his liberty by agreeing to the conditions of Henry the Eighth, to support his grand scheme for a marriage between his son Prince Edward and the infant Queen Mary, and the perpetual union of England and Scotland, and by giving as hostages for his ransom, which was fixed at a thousand pounds, his uncle Thomas Kennedy of Coiff, and his brothers David and Archibald, who were placed under the custody of the archbishop of York. As he zealously supported the English connection, Henry the Eighth gave him a pension of three hundred marks. In the following year, after the regent Arran had become reconciled to Cardinal Bethune and abjured the protestant religion, the marriage treaty with England was interrupted, and Henry issued a proclamation for the Scottish prisoners to return into England, to which no attention was paid. In Lodge's Illustrations, vol. i. p. 461, is a piteous letter from his hostages to the earl of Cassillis, dated at York, 11th December 1543, entreating him to enter himself in all haste, for if he did not, they should suffer death, and that right shortly. David Kennedy appeals to the fraternal affection of the earl for his poor brother 'Dandy,' and his uncle desires him to remember that the laird of Coyff has four motherless bairns, and to take heed not to make them fatherless for his cause. In the same work also is a letter from the archbishop of York to the earl of Shrewsbury, dated 20th August, 1544, mentioning that since the hostages for the earl of Cassillis had been with him, that is for a year and a half, they had not received from his lordship, nor from any of their friends, towards the finding of their apparel, to the sum of twenty pounds sterling, so that he was constrained to give them both coats and gowns, and other things, and therefore entreating Shrewsbury to write to Cassillis that it touched his honour, forasmuch as they were so near of kin, and also pledges for him, to see that they lacked no necessaries. The archbishop added that he was content to bestow on them other things besides apparel, both for themselves and horses at his charge, but that Lord Cassillis must provide for the rest, or else, the winter coming on, they shall lack many things. Finding the popish party, with Cardinal Bethune at their head, intent on a French alliance, he and the other lords who supported the English interest, entered into a bond or covenant by which they agreed to employ their united strength in promoting the projects of the English king. This paper was intrusted to Lord Somerville, to be delivered to Henry, but that nobleman being arrested, it was intercepted, on which a parliament was convoked, and it was determined to proceed against Cassillis and the other subscribing lords, for high treason. To escape the sentence of forfeiture, they transmitted to the regent Arran, a similar bond, dated in January 1543-4, in which they bound themselves to remain true and faithful to the queen and her authority, to assist the regent in the defence of the realm against 'their old enemies' of England, to support the liberties of holy church and to maintain the true Christian faith, meaning thereby the Romish religion. Notwithstanding this agreement, the parties to which were the earls of Cassillis, Angus, Lennox, and Glencairn, they still continued their intrigues with the English monarch. The consequence was that a hostile fleet appeared in the frith of Forth in the following May, and an English army, under the earl of Hertford, took possession of Leith, and after plundering that town, set fire to it.

In June of the same year (1544) the earl of Cassillis was one of those who signed the agreement of the principal Scots nobility to support the authority of the queen-mother as regent of Scotland, against the earl of Arran. Soon after, he was, with Angus, Glencairn, and Somerville, at the siege of Coldingham, then held by the English, and joined in the disgraceful rout which took place on that occasion. In a parliament held at Edinburgh 12th December of the same year, he and the other noblemen in the Douglas or English interest, obtained a remission for all treasons committed by them, except against the queen's person, in return for the good services which they had rendered the country, although what these were does not clearly appear

After the defeat of the English at Ancrum Moor, Henry resolved to conciliate the Scots, and with this view he intrusted the management of the negotiation to the earl of Cassillis The earl accordingly repaired to the English court, February 28th, 1545, when his hostages were released, and his ransom being discharged, and himself loaded with presents from the English king, he returned, after a short absence, to Scotland At a convention of the nobility, held at Edinburgh, on the 17th April, Cassillis, as the envoy of Henry, acquainted them that if they consented to the treaties of peace and marriage with England, King Henry would overlook the past, and forbear to avenge the injuries which he had received His efforts, however, were in vain The Convention declared the treaties of peace and marriage at an end, and it was resolved cordially to embrace the assistance of France On the 20th, Cassillis by letter, informed Henry of the complete failure of his negotiation, and advised the immediate invasion of Scotland with a strong force Henry, on his side, finding Cardinal Bethune more than a match for him, encouraged the earl in organizing a conspiracy for his assassination This plot, so damning both to Cassillis and the king, was altogether unknown to our historians, both Scotch and English, until it was discovered by Tytler in the secret correspondence of the state paper office [See Tytler's History of Scotland, vol v p 387] It appears that Cassillis had addressed a letter to Sir Ralph Sadler, Henry's agent on the borders, in which he made an offer for the killing of the cardinal, if his majesty would have it done, and promise, when it was done 'a reward' Sadler showed the letter to the earl of Hertford and the council of the North, and by them it was transmitted to the king Cassillis communicated his purpose to the earls of Angus, Glencairn, and Marischal, and Sir George Douglas, and these persons requested that one Forster, an English prisoner, should be sent to Edinburgh to communicate with them on the design Hertford accordingly consulted the privy council upon his majesty's wishes in this affair They replied, as directed by the king, that Forster might set off immediately, but as to the assassination of the cardinal his majesty "will not seem to have to do in it, and yet not misliking the offer," he desired Sadler to write to Cassillis to say that "if he were in the earl's place he would surely do what he could for the execution of it, believing verily to do thereby not only an acceptable service to the king but also a special benefit to the realm of Scotland" No reward, however, was promised, as that would be to set a price upon the head of the cardinal as well as to offer an indemnity to those who should slay him, and the scheme was abandoned by Cassillis and his associates

The earl of Cassillis was among the chief supporters of George Wishart, after his return to Scotland in the summer of 1543 It was by the invitation of the earl and the gentlemen of Kyle and Cunningham that he ventured to Edinburgh in the beginning of 1544, but as they failed to meet him he retired to East Lothian, where he soon after fell into the hands of the cardinal and was burnt at the stake at St Andrews March 28, the assassination of Bethune himself following exactly two months after

In June 1546 the earl deserted the English party, and was named an extraordinary lord of session 31st July following Previous to the battle of Pinkie, he and other noblemen advised the regent to send the young queen with her mother, under the charge of Lords Erskine and Livingstone to the isle of Inchmahome, for security In May 1550, he was one of the noblemen who accompanied the queen-mother on her visit to France In 1554 on the queen-mother obtaining the regency, she appointed the earl of Cassillis lord-high-treasurer In 1557 he was a chief commander in the army destined to attack Berwick and invade England, but which was disbanded without effecting any thing In 1558 he was one of the eight commissioners elected by parliament to go to France to be present at the nuptials of the youthful Queen Mary with Francis, dauphin of France On the crown matrimonial being demanded the commissioners discovered a fixed resolution not to consent to any thing that tended to introduce any alteration in the order of succession to the crown, which gave great offence to the French court, and on their way home, the commissioners were taken ill at Dieppe, where the earls of Cassillis and Rothes, and Bishop Reid, lord president of the court of session, died, all three in one night, 18th November 1558, under strong suspicions of poison Lord Fleming, another of the commissioners, died at Paris The body of the earl was brought to Scotland, and interred with his ancestors in the collegiate church of Maybole His virtues have been recorded by Buchanan in his History of Scotland, and in an epitaph published in his works He is also celebrated by Johnston in his Heroes

His lordship married Margaret, daughter of Alexander Kennedy of Bargany, and had, with two daughters, two sons, namely, Gilbert his successor, and the Hon Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean, commonly called the tutor of Cassillis, who received the honour of knighthood at the coronation of James the Sixth He married Elizabeth, daughter of David MacGill of Cranstoun-Riddel, and had three sons and one daughter, Helen, married to Murc of Auchindrane Sir Thomas fell a victim to revenge, being assassinated by Kennedy of Drummuchie, May 11, 1602, thereto instigated by his own son in law, Murc [See MURE, surname of, and KENNEDY, origin of name] His youngest son, Sir Alexander Kennedy of Culzean, eventually carried on the line of the family

Gilbert, fourth earl, a nobleman of most rapacious and unscrupulous character, was popularly called the king of Carrick In 1562 he was sworn a privy councillor to Queen Mary, and in 1565 was appointed justiciary of Carrick On the night of Darnley's murder in February 1567, he and the earls of Argyle and Huntly accompanied the queen, when she took her last farewell of her ill fated husband at Kirk of Field His name occurs the fifth of the noblemen who subscribed the bond in favour of Bothwell's marriage to the queen, at the famous supper given to the nobility by that reckless adventurer, and he fought on the side of Mary at the battle of Langside, 13th May 1568 In the parliament of 19th August following, he was declared guilty of treason, but judgment was suspended At the convention held 14th April 1569, he acknowledged, by oath and subscription, the king's authority, and on 17th November following, the regent declared that his lordship had made due obedience to the king He was afterwards appointed one of the privy council Nevertheless, we find, in March 1570, his name attached to a letter signed by a number of the lords of the queen's faction, and sent to Queen Elizabeth in Mary's behalf, and in the spring of the following year the regent Lennox was obliged to go to Kyle and Carrick, to pursue the earl of Cassillis for persecuting and oppressing those who acknowledged the king's authority On this occasion, to prevent the wasting of his lands, he gave his brother in pledge that he would enter the 15th day of May at Stirling, to confirm the conditions craved and agreed upon

On the death of Quentin Kennedy, the last abbot of Crossraguel, in 1564 a pension had been conferred on George

Buchanan, of five hundred pounds a-year out of the abbey revenues, payment of which he appears to have found great difficulty in obtaining, owing to the seizure of the lands by the earl of Cassillis That rich and celebrated abbey lay in the vicinity of the earl's castle, and after he had, by forgery and murder, possessed himself of the abbacy of Glenluce, he cast his eye on Crossraguel, and the criminal records of the period exhibit an act of horrible cruelty perpetrated by him in 1570, for the purpose of adding the abbey lands to his estates Allan Stewart, the commendator of the abbey, who had succeeded Quentin Kennedy, and who lived under the protection of the laird of Bargany, was enticed, under hospitable pretences to leave his safeguard and pass some days in Maybole with Sir Thomas Kennedy, brother of the earl On the 29th August, while visiting the bounds of Crossraguel, he was apprehended by the earl, and conveyed to the castle of Dunure, the original seat of the family, the ruins of which still stand gloomily on a rock, washed by the sea, on the western boundary of Maybole parish The barbarous treatment to which he was subjected, to compel him to sign a feu charter of the abbey lands, forms a striking part of the 'Historie of the Kennedyis,' published in 1830, by Mr Pitcairn, from an original manuscript in the Advocates' Library The most graphic account, however, of the transaction is given by Richard Bannatyne, in his 'Journal,' and every part of his narrative is distinctly confirmed by the commendator's own statements in his 'Bill of Supplication to the Lords of Privy-Council' It appears that, unable to succeed in his purpose by any other means, the earl, on the 1st September, caused his baker, his cook, his pantryman, and some others, to convey the commendator to the 'black vault of Dunure,' where a large fire was blazing, under 'a grit iron chimbley' "My lord abbot," said the earl, "it will please you to confess here that with your own consent you remain in my company, because you dare not commit you to the hands of others" The commendator answered, "Would you, my lord, that I should tell a manifest lie for your pleasure? The truth is, my lord it is against my will that I am here, neither yet have I any pleasure in your company' "But," rejoined the earl, "you shall remain with me at this time" "I am not able to resist your will and pleasure," said the commendator, "in this place" "You must then obey me," replied the earl He then presented to him certain documents to sign, and, on his refusal, he commanded 'his cooks,' says the annalist, 'to prepare the banquet,' and so, first they stripped the unhappy commendator, to his 'sark and doublet,' and next they bound him to the chimney, 'his legs to the one end and his arms to the other,' basting him well with oil, that 'the roast should not burn' When nearly half roasted he consented to subscribe the documents, without reading or knowing what was contained in them Then the earl swore those who assisted him in this cruel proceeding, on the Bible never to reveal it to any one Not content with this, on the 7th September, on the commendator's refusal to ratify and approve the documents he had signed, before a notary and witnesses, the torment was renewed, till Stewart besought them to put an end to his sufferings by killing him at once, nor was he released till eleven o'clock at night, when they saw his life in danger and his flesh consumed and burnt to the bone And thus the earl obtained, in the indignant words of the describer of the scene, 'a fyve yeare tack and a 19 yeare tack, and a charter of feu of all the landis of Crocerague11, with the clausses necessaire for the erle to haist him to hell For gif adulterie, sacrledge, oppressione, barbarous crewelte, and thift heaped upon thift diserve hell, the great king of Carrick can no more eschape hell for ever nor the imprudent abbot eschaped the fyre for a seasoune" [Bannatyne's Journal, edn 1806, p 57] Having thus attained his purpose, the earl left the commendator in the hands of his servants at Dunure, and the laird of Bargany, who knew nothing of the treatment to which he had been subjected, raised letters of deliverance of his person, which not being attended to by the earl, he was for contempt thereof denounced rebel and put to the horn On the 27th April following, a complaint was given in to the regent and lords of secret council, by Allan Stewart, the 'half-roasted' commendator, on which the earl was summoned before them On his appearance he pleaded that the points alleged in the said complaint were either civil or criminal, and that he ought not to answer thereto except before competent judges Without prejudice of the ordinary jurisdiction, the regent, with the advice of the council, ordered the earl to find security in two thousand pounds, not to molest the person or property of the commendator He was also, at the request of his father's old preceptor, George Buchanan, 'pensioner of Crossraguel,' ordered to find the like security with regard to him and his pension And he was sent to Dumbarton castle until he implemented (obeyed) these orders

In August of the same year, by the persuasion of the earl of Morton, the earl, with other lords of the queen's faction, finally joined the king's party, and attended the parliament held at Stirling in September, at which his escheats were remitted, in consequence of his owning the king's authority He obtained charters of several lands belonging to the abbacies of Crossraguel and Glenluce in 1572 and two following years, and had a charter of the lands and castle of Turnberry to himself and Margaret Lyon his wife (daughter of the ninth Lord Glamms) 8th March 1575 According to Knox, by the persuasion of his countess he became a protestant and caused his kirks in Carrick to be reformed [Knox's History, p 398] He died in September 1576 He had three sons, John, who succeeded him, Hugh, designed master of Cassillis, to whom and to John Boyd his servant, and Hugh Kennedy of Chipel, a remission under the great seal was granted, for the slaughter of Andrew M'Kewan in Archatrochie, 14th September 1601, and Gilbert, also designed master of Cassillis, as his brother Hugh appears to have died without issue Gilbert married Margaret, daughter of Uchtred Macdowall of Garthland, and by her had a son, John who became sixth earl

The eldest son, John, fifth earl, being very young at his father's death, was placed under the guardianship of his uncle, Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean In November 1597, he married Jean, only daughter of James fourth Lord Fleming, relict of Lord Maitland of Thirlestane, high-chancellor of Scotland, against the will of all his friends, as the lady was considerably older than himself and described as "past childbearing" In 1599 he was appointed lord high-treasurer of Scotland, having advanced forty thousand marks for that office, but as he was removed the same year he lost his money This earl is remarkable chiefly for the slaughter of Gilbert Kennedy of Bargany The feuds between the earls of Cassillis and the lairds of Bargany had been of long continuance On the 11th December 1601, the earl of Cassillis having learned that the young laird of Bargany was to ride from the town of Ayr to his own mansion on the water of Girvan, attended only by a few followers, determined to waylay and attack him, and for that purpose, with two hundred armed retainers, he took his station at the Lady Corse, about half-a-mile north of Maybole The laird of Bargany, with his small retinue, soon appeared at the Brochloch, on the opposite side of the valley, and seeing the earl thus attended, said to his men that he desired no quarrel, and would not throw himself in the earl's way He accordingly led them down the north bank of the rivulet by Bogside, with the view of avoiding a collision with the earl, at so great disadvantage to himself The earl followed down the south side, and coming to some 'feal dykes,' which offered a good support for the firearms of his followers, he ordered them to discharge their pieces at Bargany and his men, by which the young laird, whose daring courage led him with only four gentlemen to advance upon this disproportionate force, was slain with two of his followers, after comporting himself with more than chivalrous gallantry Bargany appears to have been a youth of great promise "He was," says the historian of this murderous assault, "the brawest manne that was to be gotten in ony land, of hiche stature, and weill maid, his hair blak, bott of ane cumlie feace, the brawest horsemanne, and the best at all pastymis" This tragedy was of too flagrant a nature to be passed over, but the countess of Cassillis, who had friends at court, rode to Edinburgh, and obtained his majesty's favour to her husband, who "gott this mukill grantit, that my lord suld cum himself and deall with the thesaurer (treasurer) for his escheitt,"—"and by reason," adds the historian, "of ten thousand markis given to him, there was obtent to me lord ane act of counsall, making all that me lord had done gude service to the king!" Auchendrane had married the sister of the gallant youth who thus fell, and out of the events of this bloody action arose the series of dark and tragical deeds on which Sir Walter Scott founded his 'Ayrshire Tragedy,' in his prefatory notice to which he relates the circumstances more favourably to the earl of Cassillis [See MURE, surname of] The earl died in 1615, without issue His brother, Gilbert, master of Cassillis, predeceased him, but his son, John, became sixth earl of Cassillis In the Appendix to Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol iii, is a bond, dated 4th September 1602, by the fifth earl of Cassillis, to his brother, Hugh Kennedy, commonly called the master of Cassillis, to pay him and his accomplices twelve hundred merks yearly, with corn for six horses, as a bribe to induce him to murder the laird of Auchindrane, another striking and characteristic illustration of the barbarous state of society and manners in some parts of Scotland at that period

The sixth earl, styled "the grave and solemn" earl, is described as a person of great virtue and of considerable abilities, and so sincere that he never would permit his words to be understood but in their direct sense Being zealously attached to the presbyterian form of worship, he took a prominent part in the proceedings of the Covenanters in 1638, and following years, and in June 1639, when the Lyon king at arms was sent to their camp at Dunse Law, with a proclamation from the king, the earl of Cassillis offered a protest, adhering to the last General Assembly held at Glasgow, which the Lyon refused to receive On the 17th September, 1641, he was nominated of his majesty's privy council He was one of the three ruling elders sent to the assembly of divines at Westminster in 1643, to ratify the solemn league and covenant In September 1646, he was one of the commissioners directed to repair to Charles the First, to urge his majesty to accept of the propositions made to him by the English parliament In 1648 he opposed the 'Engagement to march into England, to attempt the relief of the king In 1649, on the dismissal of the earl of Crawford as treasurer, Cassillis was made one of the four lords of the treasury After the execution of Charles, he was sent by the Scots parliament, in March 1649, with the earl of Lothian, Lord Burly, and others, as commissioners, to Charles the Second at Breda, to offer him the crown of Scotland on certain conditions These commissioners acted in a double capacity, and had instructions both from the estates and from the commission of the kirk, in both of which the earl of Cassillis was the chief person Charles endeavoured to prevail on them to modify some of the conditions, but Cassillis adhered firmly to his instructions. On his return to Scotland, his lordship was appointed justice-general, and gave his oath 'de fideli administratione,' 29th June of the same year On 3d July he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session In 1650 he was again one of the commissioners sent by the parliament to treat with the king at Breda After the battle of Dunbar, a deputation was sent by the estates, consisting of Cassillis, Argyle, and other members, to the western army "to solicit unity for the good of the kingdom," General Leslie having threatened to resign his command if they did not unite with him, but their efforts were in vain The earl afterwards refused to come into any terms with Cromwell

On the settlement of the court of session after the Restoration, his lordship, 1st June 1661, was re-appointed one of the four extraordinary lords, but was superseded in July 1662, on account of his refusal to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy without an explanation, which the parliament would not allow of In the Scots parliament his lordship moved for an address to the king to marry a protestant, but found only one to second him When the persecution of the presbyterians commenced, he obtained a promise under the king's hand that he and his family should not be disturbed in serving God in any way he pleased He died in April 1668 He married, first, Lady Jean Hamilton, born 8th February 1607, daughter of the first earl of Haddington, and by her, who was the heroine of the popular ballad of 'Johnie Faa, the Gypsy Laddie,' he had a son, James, Lord Kennedy, who died unmarried, and two daughters His elder daughter, Lady Margaret, became the wife of the celebrated Bishop Burnet, but had no issue She was a lady of considerable piety and knowledge, but not remarkable for her political discretion It is related of her that one day during the commonwealth, as she was standing at a window, she reviled some of Cromwell's soldiers as murderers of their king The soldiers threatened that, unless she held her tongue they would fire at her, but she continued in the same strain, on which they fired, and a bullet passed between her and another lady beside her, narrowly missing them both Her sentiments inclined strongly towards the presbyterians, with whom she was in high credit and esteem Owing to the disparity of their ages, the day before her marriage, the bishop delivered to her a deed renouncing all claim to her fortune, which was considerable Her younger sister, Lady Catherine, married in 1658, William Lord Cochrane, eldest son of the first earl of Dundonald The earl of Cassillis married, secondly, Lady Margaret Hay, only daughter of the tenth earl of Errol, relict of Henry Lord Ker, and by her he had a son, John, seventh earl, and two daughters, Ladies Mary and Elizabeth

There are various versions of the story of the ill-starred lady, his first countess The opening stanzas of the ballad which refers to her, run thus

"The gypsies cam to lord Cassillis yett,
And O! but they sang bonnie,
They sang sae sweet, and sae complete,
That doun cam our fair lady

'She cam tripping doun the stairs,
Wi' a' her maids before her,
As soon as they saw her weelfar'd face,
They cuist their glamourie ower her'

It is said that the lady Jean Hamilton previous to her marriage with the earl, had been betrothed to a gallant young knight, a Sir John Faa of Dunbar, which town was not more than three miles distant from her father's seat of Tynningham When the earl of Cassillis offered for her, the match was esteemed so advantageous that she was commanded by her father to break off her former engagement, but she arranged with her lover that he should go to the continent, under a solemn pledge that he would return in a few months Two full years, however, passed away, without any tidings of or from him, and a letter having been received from the English ambassador at Madrid, giving assurance of his death by the hands of some bravos, the lady at last reluctantly consented to marry the earl Finding that the countess preferred solitude to his society, he is said to have treated her with the utmost indifference One evening as she was taking her accustomed walk on the battlements of the castle of Cassillis on the left bank of the Doon, she descried a band of gypsies hastily approaching Such bands were very common at that period, but the number and suspicious appearance of this company were calculated to create considerable alarm, the more especially as the earl was from home attending the assembly of divines at Westminster On arriving at the house however, instead of offering violence, they commenced some of their wild strains, and the countess was in the act of dropping some pieces of money from the window to them, when all at once she recognised in their leader, the tall commanding figure of her former lover, Sir John Faa An interview immediately took place, and the mysterious cause of his long absence was fully explained He had been confined for four years in the Inquisition, on account of some unguarded expression he had used respecting the church of Rome On obtaining his liberty he hastened to London, where he learned for the first time that she was married He prevailed upon her to elope with him, but they had not proceeded far when the earl most unexpectedly arrived with a powerful retinue He immediately pursued the fugitives whom he speedily overtook, and after a short encounter captured the whole party, but one, at a ford over the Doon, still called "the Gypsies' steps," a few miles from the castle Sir John Faa and his followers, fifteen in all, were hanged on a tree, known by the name of the "dule," or dolor, tree, a splendid and most umbrageous plane, which still flourishes on a little knoll in front of the castle gate, while the countess was compelled by her husband to survey from a window the dreadful scene The particular room in the stately old house where the unhappy lady endured this torture is still called "the Countess' room" After a short confinement in that apartment, a house at Maybole, which formed the earl's winter residence, and which is now occupied by the factor of the family, was fitted up for her reception, by the addition of a fine projecting stair-case, upon which were carved fifteen heads representing those of her lover and his band Being removed thither she there languished out the short remainder of her life in strict confinement She is said to have occupied herself in working a prodigious quantity of tapestry, so as to have completely covered the walls of her prison In this she represented her unhappy flight, but with circumstances unsuitable to the details of the ballad, for she is shown mounted behind her lover, gorgeously attired, on a superb white horse, and surrounded by a group of persons who bear no resemblance to a band of gypsies This fragmentary piece of old tapestry, which is said still to be preserved at Culzean Castle, seems to owe its name and interest to the inventive faculties of the housekeepers, who of course have the old tradition by rote, and connect the countess with what never may have had the slightest relation to her

The above version of the story is different from that recited in the ballad, which is supposed to have been composed by the only one of the band who escaped There is extant a letter from the earl to the Rev Robert Douglas, written shortly after his first wife's death, in which he expresses a respect and tenderness for her memory quite inconceivable had she been guilty of endeavouring to elope from him, so that it is very doubtful if the Lady Jean Hamilton was the "frail fair one" after all A portrait of the countess is shown at Holyrood house, but its authenticity is doubted It is thought rather to be a portrait of Lady Sunderland, the Sacharissa of Waller Another portrait of the countess, said to be a correct likeness, is preserved at Culzean castle An engraving of it is given in Constable's Scots Magazine for 1817, from which the following woodcut is taken

John, seventh earl, held the same religious principles as his father, and pursued the same independent line of conduct He was the only person in the Scots parliament of 1670 who voted against the act for punishing conventicles This gave great offence to the duke of Lauderdale and the Scots privy council, who then had the administration of affairs, and in January 1678, fifteen hundred men of the 'Highland Host" were quartered in Carrick chiefly on the Cassillis estates, which they plundered His lordship was ordered to attend at Ayr, 22d February, and on his appearance there a bond was tendered to him to sign, obliging him, under a heavy penalty, to be answerable that his whole family, tenants, and labourers, and their respective families should not attend conventicles nor harbour any of the covenanters or field preachers This he refused to do, as contrary to law, and impossible for him to perform He was, in consequence, denounced an outlaw, and prohibited from quitting the kingdom Nevertheless, with the duke of Hamilton and twelve other peers he repaired to London, to complain of Lauderdale's proceedings, but as they had left Scotland without permission they were at first refused an audience At length they were heard, 25th May, in presence of the cabinet council, but declining to reduce their complaints to writing, without a previous indemnity, as the most cautious remonstrance it was possible to frame could be converted into leasing-making, the king declared his full approbation of the Scottish measures On the rising of the Covenanters in 1679, the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Cassillis, and the other Scottish lords then in London, humanely offered to put down the insurrection, without arms or effusion of blood, if the sufferings of the people were relieved, but the offer was rejected They afterwards obtained an audience, and were fully heard on their complaints against Lauderdale, but in vain On the Scots council writing to the king to cause the earl of Cassillis to be sent down prisoner to Edinburgh to be tried, according to law, for contemning his majesty's proclamation, the king refused, and a stop was put to all further proceedings against him He entered heartily into the Revolution, and in 1689 was sworn a privy councillor to King William, and appointed one of the lords of the Treasury He died 23d July 1701 He was twice married, first, to Lady Susan Hamilton, youngest daughter of James first duke of Hamilton, and had by her a son, John, Lord Kennedy, and a daughter, Lady Anne, married to her cousin-german John earl of Selkirk and Ruglen, 2dly, to Elizabeth or Mary Foix, and had by her a son, the Hon James Kennedy, who died without issue, and a daughter, Lady Elizabeth The second countess found that her peerage formed no protection to her in violating the law in keeping a gambling house, for on 29th April 1715 the House of Lords being informed that claims of peerage were made and insisted on by the Ladies Mordington and Cassillis, in order to intimidate the peace officers from doing their duty in suppressing the public gaming houses kept by these ladies, resolved that no person is entitled to privilege of peerage against any prosecution for keeping any public or common gaming house, or any house, room, or place for playing at any game or games prohibited by law She died 12th September 1716

His son, John, Lord Kennedy, married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Charles Hutcheson, Esq of Owthorpe, in the county of Nottingham and died in 1700, in the lifetime of her father, leaving one son, John, who became the eighth earl His widow married a second time her husband's cousin-german and brother-in-law, John, earl of Selkirk and Ruglen without issue After the marriage of his son, the earl of Cassillis executed a strict entail of his estate, 5th September, 1698

John, eighth earl, born in April 1700, succeeded his grandfather when he was little more than a year old He held the office of governor of the castle of Dumbarton Under the act of 1747, for the abolition of heritable jurisdictions, he received eighteen hundred pounds for the regality of Carrick, in full of his claim of thirteen thousand one hundred pounds He died at London 7th August, 1759, and was buried in St James' Church, but in June 1760, his body was removed to the Collegiate church of Maybole He married, 26th October 1738, his cousin, Lady Susan Hamilton, the youngest daughter of his stepfather, John, earl of Selkirk and Ruglen, by Lady Anne Kennedy, daughter of the seventh earl of Cassillis, but had no issue by her His lordship, on 29th March 1759, when his countess was at a ball, privately executed a settlement, in nature of a strict entail, of the whole lands and estates of Cassillis in favour of Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean, baronet, the nearest male heir of the family, and several other heirs and substitutes therein named Lady Cassillis died 8th February 1763, and was buried in the abbey of Holyroodhouse

On the death of the eighth earl, William, earl of March and Ruglen, afterwards duke of Queensberry, grandson of the above-named Lady Anne Kennedy, countess of Selkirk and Ruglen, daughter of the seventh earl of Cassillis, assumed the title of earl of Cassillis, and founding on the entail of 5th September 1698, purchased brieves for having himself served heir of tailzie and provision to the last earl He was opposed, however, by Sir Thomas Kennedy, who claimed under the entail of 1759, and got himself served heir male to the same earl An action of reduction, brought by the earl of March, for setting aside the latter entail, was unsuccessful in the court of session, 29th February 1760, and on appeal the judgment was confirmed by the House of Lords, thereby establishing the right of Sir Thomas Kennedy to the estate of Cassillis Petitions were presented to the House of Lords by both parties, claiming the title Their lordships, 27th January, 1762, adjudged it to belong to Sir Thomas Kennedy, who thus became ninth earl

The ninth earl derived his descent from the Hon Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean, called the tutor of Cassillis, second son of Gilbert, the third earl He was the second son of Sir John Kennedy of Culzean, great-great-grandson of the tutor of Cassillis, by his wife Jean Douglas, of the family of Mains in Dumbartonshire His elder brother, Sir John Kennedy, died before him, in April 1744, and he succeeded to his estate He was then an officer in the British army in Flanders He was served heir to his brother, 12th July, 1747 At the general election of 1774, the earl was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scots peerage He died, unmarried at Culzean, 30th November, 1775

His next brother, David, succeeded as tenth earl He was bred a lawyer, and in 1752 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates At the general election of 1768, he was chosen member of parliament for the county of Ayr The year after his accession to the title, namely on 14th November 1776, on a vacancy occurring, he was elected one of the sixteen representative Scots peers, and rechosen at the general elections of 1780 and 1784 He supported Fox's India Bill in 1783, and signed the protest in favour of the prince of Wales' right to the regency in 1788 On 2d February 1790 he executed a deed of entail of the estates of Cassillis and Culzean, in favour of Captain Archibald Kennedy, royal navy, and the heirs male of his body, grandson of Alexander Kennedy of Craigoch, second son of Sir Alexander Kennedy of Culzean, youngest son of the tutor of Cassillis The earl died unmarried at Culzean, 18th December 1792, when the earldom and estates devolved upon the above named Captain Archibald Kennedy

Archibald, eleventh earl, was the son of Archibald Kennedy, collector of customs at New York, having gone there about 1722, by his first wife, a Miss Massam He entered the navy in 1744, and became captain in 1757 He distinguished himself by many brilliant actions when commander of the Flamborough in 1759, particularly in one when on the Lisbon station, in consequence of which he was presented by the merchants of Lisbon with a handsome piece of plate. He succeeded to a large estate called Pavonia at Second River, in the state of New York, which had belonged to his father, but during the war of Independence his house was burned and all his papers destroyed He had the command of a squadron on the coast of North America, and died at London, 30th December 1794 He married, first, a Miss Schuyler, a lady of great property in New Jersey without issue, and, secondly, Anne, daughter of John Watts of New York, Esq, and by her, who died at Edinburgh, 29th December 1793 he had three sons and a daughter and was created first baron and then marquis of Ailsa In 1790 he raised an independent company of foot, and in 1793 was lieutenant-colonel of the west lowland fencible regiment, but resigned that commission the same year He succeeded his father in 1794, and was chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers at the general election in 1802 He was created a baron of the united kingdom by the title of Baron Ailsa of Ailsa, Ayrshire, 4th November 1806, to himself and the heirs male of his body, and in 1831 he received the higher title of marquis of Ailsa. The title was taken from the "ocean pyramid" called Ailsa Craig, at the mouth of the Frith of Clyde and nearly opposite his seat of Culzean castle The marquis was also a knight of the Thistle He married at Dun 1st June 1793, Margaret, youngest daughter and eventually heiress of John Erskine, Esq of Dun, Forfarshire, and had by her two sons and four daughters The eldest son Archibald, Lord Kennedy till his father was created marquis of Ailsa, when he took the title of earl of Cassillis, was esteemed the best shot in the kingdom in his day He died suddenly 12th August 1832 before his father He married Eleanor, daughter and heiress of Alexander Allardyce, Esq of Dunottar, by whom he had nine sons and a daughter, Lady Hannah Eleanor, married to Sir John Andrew Cathcart, of Carleton, baronet The second son of the first marquis, Lord John Kennedy Erskine, married Lady Augusta Fitzclarence, a daughter of William the Fourth, and resided at Dun House, near Montrose, sometime previous to his death He was designed of Dun, and took the name of Erskine as heir to that estate Lady Anne, the eldest daughter of the marquis, married Sir David Baird of Newbyth, Baronet, and has issue The first marquis died 8th September 1846 and was buried at Dun He was succeeded by his grandson, Archibald, eldest son of Lord Kennedy, earl of Cassillis

Archibald, second marquis of Ailsa, born 2oth August, 1816, was a lieutenant in the 17th dragoons, but retired in 1842 He married, 10th November 1846 Julia, 2d daughter of Sir Richard Mountenev Jephson baronet of Springvale, Dorsetshire, issue a son, Archibald, earl of Cassillis, born in 1847, two other sons and three daughters The marquis is the sixteenth in direct lineal descent from John de Kennedy, who first changed the name from Carrick to Kennedy

CATHCART, a surname supposed to be derived from Ker keit, or caer-cart, 'the castle on the Cart, a river in Renfrewshire Mr Ramsay, in his 'Sketches of that county, prefers the etymology Caeth-cart, 'the strait of Cart,' the river at the parish of Cathcart running in a narrow channel The surname was first assumed by the proprietors of the lands and barony of Kethcart in the reign of William the Lion, who succeeded to the crown in 1165

CATHCART, Earl a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom, possessed by a family of the same surname of great antiquity in the west of Scotland, conferred in 1814 on William, Lord Cathcart (a baron in the peerage of Scotland, date of creation 1447) for his military services This noble family's great ancestor, Ranaldus de Kethcart, as early as 1178, was witness to a charter by Alan, the son of Walter, 'dapifer regis,' of the patronage of the church of Kethcart, to the monastery of Paisley Willam de kethcart, his son, is witness to a charter, whereby Dungallus filius Christini judicis de Levenax exchanged the lands of Knoc with the abbey of Paisley, for lands lying near Walkinshaw, to which Alan his son is also a witness, about 1199 or 1200 His son Alan de Cathcart appends his seal to a resignation made by the judge of Levenax to the abbot and convent of Paisley, of the lands of Culbethe in 1234 He is also witness to a charter dated in 1240 of the great steward of Scotland to Sir Adam Fullarton of the lands of Fullarton, in the bailiary of Kyle He had a daughter, Cecilia, married to John de Perthick, this lady made a donation to the monastery of Paisley of all her lands in the village of Rutherglen in 1262, and a son, William de Cathcart, one of the barons of Scotland who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296

Sir Alan de Cathcart, his son, was one of the patriotic barons who gave effectual aid to Robert the Bruce in maintaining the independence of Scotland He was with Bruce at the battle of Loudonhill in 1307, when the English troops under the earl of Pembroke were defeated The following year he formed one of a party of fifty horsemen under Edward Bruce, who, under cover of a thick mist, surprised on their march, fifteen hundred cavalry under John St John in Galloway, attacked and dispersed them The particulars of this rencontre he related to Barbour, who thus describes him

> "A knight that then was in his rout
> Worthy and wight stalwart and stout, > Courteous and fair and of good fame
> Sir Alan Cathcart was his name

On this Lord Hailes remarks, 'It is pleasing to trace a family likeness in an ancient portrait' [Annals of Scotland, vol ii p 29 note] He is designed dominus ejusdem in a donation which he made to the Dominicans of Glasgow in 1336 By his wife, the sister of Sir Duncan Wallace of Sundrum, the fourth husband of Elenor Bruce countess of Carrick, he had a son, Alan de Cathcart, who succeeded him On the death of Sir Duncan Wallace about 1374 without issue, Alan de Cathcart, in right of his wife, inherited the baronies of Sundrum and Dalmellington in Ayrshire

His son Alan de Cathcart, dominus ejusdem, entered himself a hostage for King James the First in England in June 1424, in room of Malcolm Fleming He died in 1440

His grandson, Sir Alan de Cathcart, added largely to his paternal estate In 1447 he redeemed several lands in Carrick from John Kennedy of Coyfil, which had been mortgaged by Sir Alan de Cathcart his grandfather The same year he was, by James the Second, raised to the Scots peerage by the title of Lord Cathcart He obtained by charter the lands of Auchencruive and other lands in Ayrshire, 2d July 1460, and on 11th April 1481, he was sworn into the office of warden of the west marches, at Holywoodhouse He had a grant from King James the Third of the custody of his majesty's castle of Dundonald and of the lands thereof in Ayrshire, 13th December 1482 He also obtained the lands of Inbeath in King's Kyle, then in the crown by the forfeiture of Lord Boyd, and in 1485, he was constituted master of the artillery He died before 12th August 1499 By his wife, Janet Maxwell, he had four sons, and one daughter, namely Alan, master of Cathcart, who predeceased his father, leaving a son, John, second Lord Cathcart, David, who also died before his father Hugh, ancestor of the Cathcarts of Trevor, and John of Gabrine Helen, the daughter married David Stewart of Craigiehall in the county of Linlithgow

John, second Lord Cathcart, succeeded on the death of his grandfather He had a charter to himself and Margaret Douglas, his wife, of the lands of Auchencruive, 12th August 1499, and other lands in Ayrshire, forfeited to the king, as steward of Scotland, for the alienation of the greater part of the same by the first Lord Cathcart, without his majesty's consent 6th March 1500 He died in December 1535 He married, first, Margaret daughter of John Kennedy of Blair

quhan, by whom he had a son, Alan master of Cathcart, secondly, Margaret, daughter of William Douglas of Drumlanrig, and by her he had four sons and four daughters Alan, master of Cathcart, and his two half-brothers, Robert and John, were killed at Flodden Robert married Margaret, daughter and heiress of Alan Cathcart of Carleton, and by her he had a son, Robert Cathcart, from whom are descended Sir John Andrew Cathcart of Carleton and Killochan castle, Ayrshire, baronet, (baronetcy conferred in 1703), and the Cathcarts of Genoch The third son of the second marriage, David Cathcart, married Agnes, daughter of Sir George Crawford of Liffnoris, by whom he had Alan, his son and heir, who added to his paternal estate the barony of Carbiston, by marrying Janet, daughter and heiress of William Cathcart of Carbiston From him were descended Major James Cathcart of Carbiston, of the nineteenth regiment of light dragoons, who distinguished himself in the East Indies, and his brother Captain Robert Cathcart, royal navy The fourth son of the second marriage was Hugh, ancestor of the Cathcarts of Coiff, a family now extinct

Alan, third Lord Cathcart, the son of Alan, master of Cathcart, by his second wife Margaret, daughter of Patrick Maxwell of Newark, succeeded his grandfather in 1538 He fell at the battle of Pinkie 10th September 1547 By Helen, his wife, eldest daughter of the second Lord Sempill, he had a son, Alan, fourth Lord Cathcart, and a daughter, Marjot, married to Gilbert Graham of Knockdolian in Carrick About 1546 his lordship sold his estate of Cathcart to his wife's uncle, Gabriel Sempill of Ladymuir, younger son of the first Lord Sempill In this branch of the Sempills the estate continued till the beginning of the eighteenth century, when it was sold to John Maxwell of Williamwood In the end of the century it was disposed of in parcels The castle and principal messuage were acquired by James Hill, from whose representatives they were purchased by the tenth lord and first earl of Cathcart in 1801 Thus after the lapse of two centuries and a half, this portion of the barony returned to the direct male heir of its ancient owners The earl afterwards acquired another portion named Symshill

Alan, fourth Lord Cathcart, was a zealous promoter of the Reformation, particularly in the west, where his influence was great In 1562, when John Knox was preaching in Kyle, a bond was drawn up for the maintenance of the reformed religion, which was signed by many of the barons and gentlemen of Ayrshire, among whom Lord Cathcart's name appears In 1567 he entered into the bond of association for the defence of James the Sixth At the battle of Langside, 13th May 1568, he fought at the head of his vassals on the side of the regent Murray A place is still pointed out on an eminence fully in view of the field of battle, and near the castle of Cathcart where the unfortunate Mary anxiously awaited the result In 1579 he was appointed master of the household, and on 28th January 1581, he subscribed the second confession of faith, commonly called the King's Confession which was signed by his majesty and his household with several others During the regency of the earl of Morton he had several grants from the crown, which were afterwards resumed His lordship died in 1618 He had married Margaret, daughter of John Wallace of Craigy, by whom he had a son, Alan, master of Cathcart, who died before his father in 1603, leaving by his wife, Isabel, daughter of Thomas Kennedy of Bargany, a son Alan fifth Lord Cathcart

The fifth Lord Cathcart was served heir to his grandfather, 8th May 1619, and died on 18th August 1628 He married, first Lady Margaret Stewart eldest daughter of Francis earl of Bothwell, without issue, secondly, Jean, daughter of Sir Alexander Colquhoun of Luss, and by her had a son,

Alan, sixth Lord Cathcart, born in 1628, the same year his father died He is described as a nobleman of much goodness and probity, but does not seem to have taken any prominent part in public affairs His attendance in parliament is mentioned in Balfour's Annals in the second session of the second triennial parliament, 23d June 1649, with the remark that "there were ten noblemen only present from the downsitting to this day,—often fewer, but never more" He died 13th June 1709, in the eighty-first year of his age He married Marion, eldest daughter of David Boswell of Auchinleck, and had three sons, namely, Alan, seventh lord, Hon James, and Hon David Cathcart killed in the public service at the time of the Revolution

Alan, seventh Lord Cathcart, born about 1647, was in his sixty-second year when he succeeded his father He died in 1732 in the eighty-fifth year of his age He married the Hon Elizabeth Dalrymple, second daughter of James first Viscount Stair, the eminent lawyer, and had three sons and one daughter Alan, the eldest son, perished at sea in August 1699, on his passage to Holland Charles, the second son, became eighth Lord Cathcart, and James, the third son, a major in the army, was killed in a duel by Gordon of Ardoch The daughter, Hon Margaret Cathcart, married Sir John Whitefoord of Blairquhan, baronet, and had issue

Charles, the eighth lord born about 1686, was a distinguished military commander He entered early into the army, and had a captain's commission 29th June 1703 In the following year he went over to Flanders, where he had a company in General Maitland's regiment, and soon afterwards he commanded the grenadier company He quitted that regiment in 1706 for a troop in the second regiment of dragoons or royal Scots Greys In 1707 he acted as major of brigade under the earl of Stair In 1709 he became major in the Scots Greys, and was afterwards promoted to be lieutenant-colonel of that distinguished corps On the accession of George the First, he was appointed one of the grooms of his majesty's bed chamber At the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he, being then Colonel Cathcart, joined the duke of Argyle at Stirling, and, on 23d October, was despatched by his grace with a detachment of dragoons against a body of the rebels, consisting of two hundred foot and one hundred horse, who had been sent towards the town of Dunfermline, for the purpose of raising contributions Receiving intelligence that they had passed Castle Campbell, and had taken up their quarters for the night in a village on the road, Colonel Cathcart continued his march during the whole night, and coming upon their resting-place unperceived at five o'clock in the morning, surprised the party, some of whom were taken while in bed In the fray several of the insurgents were killed and wounded, and the prisoners amounted to eleven gentlemen and six servants He returned to the camp at Stirling the same evening, having sustained no loss, as only one of his men was wounded in the check, and one horse hurt At the battle of Sheriffmuir, which followed 13th November, when Argyle perceived that he could make no impression in front upon the numerous masses of the insurgents, and that he might be outflanked by them he resolved to attack them on their flank with part of his cavalry, while his foot should gall them with their fire in front He therefore ordered Colonel Cathcart to move along the morass to the right with a strong body of cavalry, and to fall upon the flank of Mar's left wing, a movement which he executed with great skill Cathcart, after receiving a fire from the rebel horse, immediately charged them, but they sustained the assault with great firmness After nearly half-an-hour's contest, however, they were compelled to give way, and the rebel foot being also forced to fall back, a general rout of the left wing of the insurgents in consequence ensued

Colonel Cathcart was promoted to the command of the 9th regiment of foot, 15th February 1717, and of the 31st, 13th August 1728 On 1st January 1731 he received the command of the 8th dragoons He succeeded his father as Lord Cathcart in 1732, and was appointed one of the lords of the bedchamber to George the Second in January 1733, in room of the duke of Hamilton resigned He was made colonel of the third regiment of horse or carbineers, 7th August 1733 He was chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers at the general election of 1734 In the following year he was appointed governor of Duncannon fort, and in 1739 of Londonderry, with the rank of major-general in the army

In 1740, after war had been declared against Spain, it was resolved to attack the Spanish dominions in South America, and Lord Cathcart was appointed general and commander in chief of all the British forces in this service He sailed from Spithead in October of that year, but never reached his destination, as he died at sea, after thirteen days' illness, 20th December 1740, aged fifty-four years, and was buried on the beach of Prince Rupert's bay, Dominica, where a monument is erected to his memory His death, happening at the time it did, was considered as a national loss His lordship married, first, at London, 29th March 1718, Marion, only child of Sir John Shaw, baronet, of Greenock, county of Renfrew, and by her, who died in 1733 he had five sons and five daughters The eldest two, twins, died young Charles, the third son, succeeded as ninth Lord Cathcart The Hon Shaw Cathcart, the fourth son, an ensign in the third regiment of foot guards, fell in the sanguinary battle of Fontenoy, 30th April 1745, in his twenty third year, unmarried Lord Cathcart married, secondly, in 1739, Mrs Sabine, the daughter of a Mr Malyn of Southwark and Battersea, but by her he had no issue The history of this lady was somewhat remarkable She married, first, James Fleet, Esq, lord of the manor of Tewing in Hertfordshire, secondly, Captain Sabine, younger brother of General Joseph Sabine of Quinohall in Tewing, thirdly, Lord Cathcart, fourthly, 18th May 1745, Hugh MacGuire, an Irish officer in the Hungarian service, for whom she purchased a lieutenant-colonel's commission in the British army, but was not encouraged by his treatment of her to verify the posey on her wedding ring

"If I survive I shall have five"

The colonel took her over to Ireland, and secluded her in a solitary place in the country, keeping her in confinement till his death, which, to her great satisfaction, happened in 1764, when she returned to England She danced at Welwyn assembly when past eighty years of age, with all the spirit and gaiety of a young woman She died at Tewing 3d August 1789, in her ninety-eighth year, after having enjoyed the liferent of the manor of Tewing for fifty-six years In the well-known novel of Castle Rackrent, by Maria Edgeworth and her brother, Richard Lovell Edgeworth, several particulars concerning the harsh treatment of Lady Cathcart by Col MacGuire are given by Mr Edgeworth, who mentions that he was acquainted with Colonel MacGuire, and had lately questioned the servant who lived with him, during the time that Lady Cathcart was confined by him, which was nearly twenty years

Charles, ninth Lord Cathcart, born at Edinburgh 21st March 1721, was also an officer of distinction He succeeded his father in 1740, and became a captain in the 20th regiment of foot in 1742 He was aide-de-camp to field-marshal the earl of Stair, under whom he served at the battle of Dettingen, June 16, 1743 Subsequently he was appointed one of the lords of the bedchamber to the duke of Cumberland, and was aide-de-camp to his royal highness, commander-in-chief at the hard-fought battle of Fontenoy, April 30, 1745, where his lordship was severely wounded in the face and his only brother fell He accompanied the duke, with three others of his aides-de-camp, when, in January 1746, he arrived in Scotland to put down the rebellion, and was present at the battle of Culloden, where he was wounded He was also wounded at the battle of Laffeldt, July 2, 1747 In the following year Lord Cathcart and the earl of Sussex were nominated hostages for the delivery of Cape Breton to the king of France, in virtue of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle They were presented to Louis the Fifteenth, 27th November 1748, and remained in France till October 1749 On 12th April 1750, his lordship was appointed adjutant-general to the forces in North Britain, with the rank of colonel In November 1762, he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and re-chosen at all succeeding elections during his life In 1755, he was appointed lord high commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and continued to fill that high office for the eight subsequent years to 1763, inclusive He attained the rank of major-general, 21st January, 1758, and of lieutenant-general, 14th December 1760 In June 1761, he was appointed governor of Dumbarton castle, and in 1763 was invested with the order of the Thistle In January 1764 he was named first lord of police, on which he resigned the governorship of Dumbarton castle

William Shaw, tenth Lord Cathcart, born at Petersham, in Surrey, 17th September, 1755, and received part of his education at Eton college, but in 1768, on the appointment of his father as ambassador to Russia, he accompanied the family to St Petersburg, where he pursued his classical studies, under his private tutor, Mr Richardson, professor of humanity in the university of Glasgow After his return to Scotland he studied for the bar, and in 1776, was admitted advocate The same year he succeeded his father, when he turned his views to the army, and in 1777 had a cornet's commission in the 7th dragoons Proceeding to America, then in a state of revolt against Britain he served as aide-de camp, first to Major General Sir Thomas Spencer Wilson, and afterwards to Sir Henry Clinton, and distinguished himself on various occasions In 1778 he was in your-commandant of the British Legion, a body of volunteer infantry raised in North America, but resigned that command in 1780, preferring to serve with the 33d regiment of foot, of which he had been appointed major the previous year He also held the office of quarter-master-general in America Being appointed to a company in the Coldstream regiment of foot-guards, he returned to England, and continued in that regiment till October 1789, when he exchanged into the 29th foot, long stationed at Windsor, of which regiment he was made lieutenant-colonel He was elected one of the sixteen representative Scots peers on a vacancy, 10th January 1788, by a majority of one over the earl of Dumfries, and he was re-chosen at every subsequent general election, till raised to the peerage of the united kingdom He filled the office of chairman of the committees of the House of Lords from 1790 to July 1794, when the duties being incompatible with foreign service Lord Walsingham was chosen in his stead In January 1795, Lord Cathcart was appointed vice-admiral of Scotland He attained the rank of colonel in the army, 11th November 1790, and was promoted to the command of the 29th foot, 5th December 1792 In December 1793 he had the rank of brigadier-general on the continent, and in 1794 accompanied the earl of Moira to the relief of Ostend In the face of a formidable body of the French they succeeded in effecting a junction with the duke of York at Malines, July 9 He commanded a brigade at the defeat of the French at Bommel, and attained the rank of major-general 4th September the same year With the 14th, 27th, and 28th regiments of foot, he attacked the French, 8th January 1795, near Buren, and after an action of several hours succeeded in driving them beyond Gelderenalsen, taking from them a piece of cannon, and maintained his ground till night, in spite of repeated assaults from fresh bodies of the enemy, who poured in from different quarters This post so gallantly defended by his lordship was, however, too much exposed to be retained in the face of a strong army The troops, therefore, retired to Buren, and the whole British forces, under the command of Sir David Dundas, were obliged to evacuate Holland Lord Cathcart proceeded to Germany, and remained on the Weser, and in other places, having been intrusted by his majesty with the command of the British light cavalry and the foreign light corps in British pay, in all thirty squadrons, till December 1795, when he embarked at Cuxhaven for England On 7th August 1797 he was appointed colonel of the 2d regiment of life guards, and was sworn a privy councillor at Weymouth, 28th September 1798 He had the rank of lieutenant-general in the army, 1st January 1801, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland, 28th October 1803

In 1805, Lord Cathcart received the appointment of ambassador extraordinary to the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia, and at his audience of leave at Windsor, 23d November that year, was invested with the order of the Thistle As both monarchs were then in the field, it was deemed advisable, on account of the critical situation of affairs, to postpone his embassies to the spring, and they were never carried into effect In the meantime he was appointed to the command of the British, in a combined army of British, Russians, Swedes, and Prussians He had the local rank of general on the continent, 30th November 1805, and the following month took the command of the British troops in Hanover After the battle of Austerlitz he returned home with the army, in February 1806, and the same year, was appointed commander of the forces in Scotland

In the summer of 1807, to prevent the Danish fleet at Copenhagen from falling into the hands of the French, it was resolved by the British government to take possession of it, and on this important service an army was sent under the command of Lord Cathcart, with a fleet under Admiral Gambier After waiting the result of ineffectual negociation, Lord Cathcart proceeded to invest Copenhagen, which he bombarded with so much effect that, after a siege of eighteen days, a capitulation was entered into, on 6th September in consequence of which the citadel and arsenal were put into the possession of the British, and the Danish fleet, consisting of sixteen ships of the line, fifteen frigates, six brigs, and twenty-five gunboats, and an immense quantity of naval stores and ammunition, brought to England

On his return home, Lord Cathcart was, on 3d November, created a British peer, by the titles of Baron Greenock of Greenock, and Viscount Cathcart of Cathcart in the county of Renfrew On the 7th he arrived at Edinburgh, to resume the command of the forces in Scotland, and had the freedom of the city voted to him, 17th November On the 28th of the following January the thanks of parliament were voted to his lordship and to Lord Gambier His lordship attained the full rank of general in the army in January 1812, and retained his command in North Britain until May 1813, when he was called upon to undertake another mission to St Petersburg In the same year the emperor Alexander conferred upon him the order of St Andrew and the Cross of the military order of St George of the fourth class On 18th June 1814, he was advanced to the dignity of an earl of Great Britain, by the title of earl Cathcart Besides being governor of Hull, he was a member of the board of general officers, and a commissioner of the royal military college, and royal military asylum He died, the senior general in the service 16th June 1848, at the advanced age of eighty-eight, retaining his active habits and vigour of mind to the last He married, 10th April 1779, Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew Elliot, Esq of Greenwells, Roxburghshire, collector of customs at New York By her he had six sons and four daughters William, the eldest son, born at London 30th June 1782, chose the navy for his profession, and served his time in the Mediterranean and in the inshore squadron off Brest He was acting lieutenant of the Medusa frigate at Boulogne, on board of which Nelson had hoisted his flag, and commanded the cutter of that vessel at the attempt on the French flotilla, 16th August 1801, when his critical assistance rescued Captain Parker (who was mortally wounded), in charge of one of the divisions, and his crew, when their boat had fallen alongside a French ship This gallant young officer fell a victim to the yellow fever, in Jamaica, when in command of the Clorinde frigate, with the rank of post-captain, 5th June 1804, in his 22d year unmarried

The second son Charles Murray Cathcart, became eleventh baron and second earl After his brother's death he was styled Lord Greenock Born at Waltens, Essex, 21st December, 1783, he entered the army in 1799 as an ensign in the 71st foot After being in various regiments, he was made capt in in the 39th foot, 9th July 1803, and served as assistant quarter-master-general in Ireland, and in the Mediterranean He was in the expedition to the Scheldt, at the siege of Flushing, &c, served in the Peninsular war, and was at the battle of Waterloo He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in November 1841, and of general in 1854 He was governor of Edinburgh castle and commander of the forces in Scotland from 1837 to 1842 In March 1846, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, &c, and in 1847 he became colonel of the 3d dragoon guards He married in France, 30th September 1818, and remarried in England, 12th February, 1819, Henrietta, second daughter of Thomas Mather, Esq, issue, two sons and two daughters The second earl died 16th July 1859 His elder son, Alan Frederick, Lord Greenock, born 15th November 1828, succeeded as twelfth baron and third earl, married, with issue The younger son, the Honourable Augustus Murray Cathcart, born in 1830, is also an officer in the army

The third son of the first earl, the Hon Frederick Macadam Cathcart of Craigengillan, born at Twickenham Common, Middlesex, 28th October 1789, also chose the profession of arms, in which his family had acquired so much distinction In January 1805, he was appointed cornet of the 2d dragoons or Royal Scots Greys, and became lieutenant 1st May 1806 He served as one of the aides-de camp to his father in 1805, 1806, and 1807, and in the latter year was sent home with the intelligence of the surrender of the citadel of Copenhagen and the Danish navy On the 8th September his father wrote "I send this despatch by Lieutenant Cathcart, who has been for some time my first aide-de-camp, who has seen everything that has occurred here and at Stralsund, and will be able to give any further details that may be required" He was minister plenipotentiary at St Petersburg from 1820 to 1822 and at Frankfort from 1824 to 1826 A knight of the Russian order of St Anne He was aide-de-camp to his father, when commander of the forces in Scotland, and in 1837 became a colonel in the army He married, 18th October 1827, Jane, daughter and heiress of Quentin Macadam, Esq of Craigengillan Ayrshire, and in consequence assumed the surname of Macadam before that of Cathcart, issue, a son and several daughters

The Hon Sir George Cathcart the fourth and youngest son, born in 1794, received a cornet's commission in the 2d Life Guards in 1810, and served as aide-de camp to his father in the campaigns of 1813 and 1814, in Germany and France In 1815, as aide de-camp to the duke of Wellington, he was present at the battle of Quatre-Bras He held a high command in Canada during the insurrection there In 1851 he became major-general, and was appointed governor and commander-in chief of the forces at the Cape of Good Hope Subsequently nominated a K C B in 1853 he was appointed lieutenant-general and commander of the 4th division of the British army during the Crimean war He was killed at Inkerman in 1854

The family of Cathcart of Carleton, Ayrshire, is a junior branch of the noble family of the same name The castle and lands of Carleton originally belonged to, and took their name from, a family named Carrol, subsequently possessors of Craggleton Castle, Wigtownshire (see M Kerrie, surname of) A charter of Carleton was granted in 1324 by Robert the Bruce Another charter was obtained from Robert II dated in 1386 The Hon Sir John Cathcart, 4th son of the 1st Lord Cathcart, married the daughter and heiress of Carleton of that ilk, and had a son, Alan Cathcart, who became proprietor of Carleton, and Dec 3, 1509, received from James IV a charter of the lands of Carleton and others His only daughter and heiress, Margaret, married her relative, Hon Robert Cathcart 2d son of 2d lord, by whom he had a son, also named Robert On March 26 1547, Thomas Kennedy of Knockdow, and David and Fergus, his sons, found security that they would satisfy Robert Cathcart of Carleton, for mutilating his left hand, and for wounding him in the face, and on May 10, 1549 the two latter were respited from the same The Cathcarts seem to have been, from an early period, opposed to the Kennedys Accordingly we find that so late as 1607 John Cathcart of Carleton and John his son were put to the horn, for assisting Murc of Auchindrane in an attack on the earl of Cassillis in the fields at Maybole, when the master of the household of the latter was slain, and several of his followers wounded

The "fause knight," of the old ballad of May Colean is popularly said to have resided at Carleton castle, which gives title to this branch of the Cathcarts It is situated about two miles to the south of Girvan, a tall old ruin standing on the brink of a bank which overhangs the sea, and the country people affirm that the heroine, May Colean, was a daughter of the family of Kennedy of Culzean, now represented by the marquis of Ailsa The ballad begins

Oh! heard ye of a bludie knicht,
Lived in the south countrie?
He has betrayed eight ladies fair,
And drowned them in the sea

Then next he went to May Colean
A maid of beauty rare
May Colean wes this lady's name
Her father's only heir

She refuses at first to wed him, but by means of a charm, she consents to accompany him, when he takes her to a lonely place called Bunion Bay, where he commands her to strip herself of her clothes and ornaments, previously to drowning her like the rest, but under the pretence that she could not take off her clothes in presence of a man, she prevailed upon him to turn his back, when she seized him in her arms and threw him into the sea She then mounted his 'dapple grey,' and galloped off, and according to the tradition, acquired all his immense wealth May there not be in this ballad some covert allusion to the frequent feuds between the Cathcarts and the Kennedys?

The son of the above Robert Cathcart, John Cathcart of Carleton, built the castle of Killochan, the present family residence He was a leading supporter of the Reformation, and in 1570 when Kirkaldy of Grange began to show his hostility to John Knox, and a report spread that he had become his enemy and intended to slay him, the land of Carleton, Lord Ochiltree, the earl of Glencairn, and ten others of the principal reformers of Kyle and Cunningham, sent him a formal letter from Ayr, solemnly warning him of any attempts to injure Knox, "that man whom God had made the first planter and waterer of his church" In 1581 he was one of the committee named by the General Assembly to deliberate as to the bishops sitting in parliament and performing judicial functions both civil and criminal, when they gave in a report recommending that commissioners from the Assembly should take the place of the bishops in parliament, and that their temporal jurisdiction should be exercised by head bailiffs By his wife, Helen, he had a son, Hew, from whom are lineally descended the Cathcarts of Greenock, and Hew Cathcart of Carleton who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia 20th June, 1703 The latter married, in 1695, a daughter of Sir Patrick Broun, baronet, of Colstoun His son, Sir John Cathcart, married, first, in 1717, Catherine, daughter of Robert Dundas, Lord Arniston, his issue by whom, a son and two daughters, died before him, and, secondly, in 1729, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Kennedy of Culzean, baronet, by whom he had a numerous family His eldest son, Sir John Cathcart, died, without issue, in 1785, when the title and estates devolved on his next brother, Sir Andrew Cathcart, a lieutenant-colonel in the army, at whose death, without issue, in 1828, in his 87th year they passed to his grand-nephew, the 4th baronet, John Andrew Cathcart eldest son of his nephew, Hugh Cathcart Sir John Andrew Cathcart, 5th baronet born in February 1810 at one time a captain in 2d Lifeguards, married, in 1836 Lady Eleanor Kennedy only daughter of the earl of Cassillis, and grand daughter of 1st marquis of Ailsa, issue, Reginald Archibald Edward, born in 1838 two other sons and a daughter

There is a tradition in the Cathcart family that either Sir Alan Cathcart, the companion in arms of Robert the Bruce, or his son, attended Douglas to Spain, on his way to the Holy Land, with the heart of the patriot king, in consequence of which the Cathcarts carry a heart in their coat of arms

CAWDOR, earl of, a title in the peerage of the united kingdom, possessed by a branch of the ducal house of Argyle The founder of this family was Sir John Campbell, third son of the second earl of Argyle, who in 1510 married Muriel, daughter and heiress of Sir John Calder of Calder, in the county of Nairn (See CALDER surname of, ante, p 526, and CAMPBELL surname of, p 547)

The name was anciently Caldei, but it was known in the latter form to Hector Boece, and Shakspeare makes the witches in Macbeth hail him as thane of Cawdor This way of spelling the name was adopted as the family title when the peerage was conferred in 1796 In Bleau's Atlas it is given as 'Cathel,' hence Caddel (see CADDELL and CALDER surnames of)

Sir John Campbell died 1st May 1546 Muriel survived till about 1575 Their eldest son, Archibald died in 1551 His next brother, John, was bishop of the Isles John, Archibald's son, tutor to the young earl of Argyle, was assassinated by Campbell of Ardkinglass in February 1591 (see vol i p 378) Sir John his eldest son, acquired Isla He resigned the estates in favour of his son John in 1622, and died circa 1642 John, commonly called "the Fair," married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Urquhart of Cromarty In 1639 he was cognosced as a lunatic, and died in June 1654 He was succeeded by his nephew, Sir Hugh who was knighted in 1660 Being especially anxious for the introduction of the Lord's prayer as a part of the regular service in the Presbyterian church, he repeatedly addressed letters to the presbytery of Inverness, to Principal Carstairs of Edinburgh, and to the General Assembly He also published the following two works on the subject 'An Essay on the Lord's Prayer,' 1704 8vo, and 'Letters relative to an Essay on the Lord's Prayer,' Edinburgh, 1709 8vo Sir Hugh resigned in favour of his eldest son Sir Alexander, in 1693, and died in 1716

Sir Alexander served in several parliaments as commissioner for the county of Nairn, and like the other commissioners, he received an allowance from his shire for his expenses He married Elizabeth, sister and heiress of Sir John Gilbert Fort, baronet of Stackpole court, Pembrokeshire, on whose death in 1698 that estate passed to the Campbells of Calder, and is now possessed by the earls of Cawdor Sir Archibald's son John Campbell, Esq of Cawdor castle M P for the county of Pembroke, was appointed a lord of the admiralty in 1736, and of the treasury in 1746 He sold Isla and the Argyleshire lands He married Mary, eldest daughter and co-heiress of Lewis Pryse, Esq of Gogerthen, Wales, and died in 1775 He had three sons and three daughters His sons were, Pryse, his heir, John Hooke Campbell, Lord Ivon of Scotland, and Alexander a lieutenant-colonel in the army, father of General Sir Henry Frederick Campbell, K C B, and G C H

Pryse Campbell of Cawdor castle, the eldest son, was elected member of parliament for the counties of Cromarty and Nairn in 1762, and appointed a lord of the treasury in 1766 He married Sarah, daughter and co-heiress of Sir Edmund Bacon, Baronet, and had two sons, John, his heir, first Lord Cawdor Sir George, admiral of the white who died in 1821, and a daughter, Sarah

John Campbell of Cawdor castle, the eldest son, was born and in part educated in Scotland, but resided chiefly on his estate in Wales In 1774 he was returned member of parliament for the town of Cardigan, and rechosen in 1780, 1784 and 1790 He was created a baron in the peerage of Great Britain, 21st June, 1796, by the title of Lord Cawdor of Castlemartin, county of Pembroke In 1797, when the French landed at Fishguard, a sea-port town in the county of Pembroke, his lordship encountered them at the head of a body of peasantry, assisted by a few troops, and compelled twelve hundred French soldiers to surrender themselves prisoners In 1799, he spoke, in the House of Lords, on the Volunteer Exemption Bill, which he did not altogether approve of, as precluding the services of many who took refuge in these corps for no other purpose than exemption from the militia In 1804 his lordship expressed his dissent to the Militia officers bill He did not vote on the trial of Viscount Melville, but divided with those peers who wished to go into a committee on the Irish Roman Catholic petition, and on the meeting of the new parliament in 1807, he assisted at the great dinner of the party in opposition to the ministry of the duke of Portland He m 27th July 1789, Lady Caroline Howard, eldest daughter of 5th earl of Carlisle, and had two sons, John Frederick first earl of Cawdor and George Pryse, captain R N He died in 1821

CESSFORD, Baron a title of the duke of Roxburgh from Cessford castle in the parish of Eckford, Roxburghshire [See ROXBURGH, duke of, and KER, surname of]

CHALMER erroneously Chalmers (Lat de Camera) a surname derived from the office of 'Camerarius regis, chamberlain of the king held by Herbertus, the first on record of the ancient Ayrshire family of Chalmer of Gadgirth, latterly Gadgirth, but at first spelled Galdgirth, the girth of Galdus This Herbertus was Camerarius Scotiæ, or great chamberlain of Scotland, in the reign of David the First, from 1124 to 1153 [Crawford's Officers of State] He is witness to the grant which King David made 'ecclesiæ sancti Kentigerni de Glasgow,' of the lands of Govan, which afterwards became an endowment for a prebend in that cathedral church Besides his lands in Ayrshire, which remained for more than six hundred years in the family, he had also the barony of Kinneil in Linlithgowshire, as appears from the first charter of these lands to Sir David Hamilton, in the reign of David the Second, in which it is expressed that they were to be held as freely as 'quondam Herbertus Camerarius Regis David' held the same In his old age this Herbertus Camerarius took orders and became abbot of Kelso [Nisbet's System of Heraldry, vol ii App p 20] The name de Camera from him was retained by the family down to the reign of James the Fifth

His son, Reginaldus de Camera, (born before his father was in holy orders,) was possessed of the barony of Gadgirth in the reign of William the Lion between 1165 and 1214, and as Nisbet remarks, assumed the name of de Camera, as a surname, in the same manner as the family of the great Stewards of Scotland assumed that of Stewart as a cognomen from the office of their great progenitor He is a frequent witness to the gifts and donations made by Walter the High Steward, from his lands in Kyle, in the neighbourhood of Gadgirth, to the monks of Paisley, when he founded that monastery in 1160 This remote antiquity of the family is farther established by a writ under the great seal of Scotland in 1609, referred to by Nisbet, in which it is acknowledged by the crown that the family of Chalmer had possessed the barony of Gadgirth for upwards of five hundred years before that period In consequence of several of the earliest charters of the family having been lost, a chasm occurs in the line of succession for about a hundred years or more, till about 1296, when William de Camera, with others of the barons of Kyle, swore an extorted allegiance to King Edward the First of England

Reginald de Camera, the son of this William, joined Robert the Bruce, and continued faithful to him throughout all his vicissitudes and struggles After the battle of Bannockburn he received from that monarch a charter, under the great seal, of his own estate of Gadgirth, under the title of 'Reginaldi de Camera terrarum de Galdgirth' This charter has no date, as was usual in many of the writs of those days, but it is supposed to have been about 1320

His son, William de Camera, adhered to King David Bruce, even when his fortunes were at the lowest ebb, and after that monarch's release from his long captivity in England, he was appointed in 1369, clerk-register and justice-clerk north of the Forth, the kingdom at that time being divided into two justiciary districts of north and south of that river His son, Reginald de Camera, besides the estate of Gadgirth, had a charter from King Robert the Second of the lands of Craigmitoch in Renfrewshire in the year 1375, which, in 1507, were alienated to the Lord Sempill In the rolls of the county of Renfrew they were anciently called Craigmitoch-Chalmer, but afterwards they acquired the name of Craigmitoch Sempill

Sir John de Camera of Gadgirth, the son of this Reginald, in several authentic documents is called dominus or lord of Gadgirth, a designation which infers that this family was considered at that time in the rank and character among the proceres and magnates regni, or greater barons of the kingdom, and as such to have had a hereditary right to a seat in parliament His son, also named John, dominus de Gadgirth, was one of fifteen barons of Ayrshire, (his name appears first on the list,) who were unpannelled as a jury in a cause in 1417, in which the burgh of Irvine had claim to a piece of muir ground, which was decided by their verdict in favour of the town [Robertson's Ayrshire Families, vol ii p 265] He was one of the Scots auxiliaries who, under the earls of Buchan and Douglas, went to France in 1419, to the assistance of Charles the Seventh against the English At the battle of Vernueil, 17th August, 1424, gained by the Scots, he highly distinguished himself, and in consequence had a fleur de lis added to his coat of arms, held by a lion in his dexter paw which for some centuries afterwards was borne as their crest by the family, instead of as previously a hawk volant, but the latter was in the course of time revived According to tradition this John de Camera of Gadgirth was slain at the battle of the Herrings in France, before 1429 After that time, at least his name is no more mentioned

had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by King James the Third In 1468, he received a charter erecting the lands of Gadgirth and Culraith in Ayrshire, into one barony He sat as a baron in 1484, the date of the first parliament of James the Fourth as dominus de Gaitgirth, taking place and enrolment 'inter dominum Ker et dominum Balcomie,' two barons of great rank, that is, after the one and before the other He married dame Elizabeth Hamilton, daughter of Sir James Hamilton of Cadzow, and sister of the first Lord Hamilton, by whom he had a son, John, who succeeded him, and a daughter, Marion, married William Dalrymple of Stair, ancestor of the earls of Stair It is stated in Douglas' Peerage, [Edited by Wood, vol ii p 520,] that "She was a lady of excellent worth and virtue, and one of the Lollards of Kyle summoned in 1494 before the king's council on account of their heretical doctrines, but the magnanimity of James the Fourth treated the charges with contempt, and the accused persons were dismissed"

The son, John de Camera, married, in 1491, Marion Hay, daughter of Peter Hay of Menzean, brother of John Lord Hay of Yester ancestor of the marquis of Tweeddale, and had a son, James, and three daughters, who were all well married. The son, James de Camera, on 1st October 1501, as heir to his father, was infeft, on a precept of chancery, in the lands of Culraith and Chalmerhouse, from which latter had sprung the designation of that ilk He married a daughter of Alexander Stewart of Galston, brother of John first earl of Lennox and Darnley, by whom he had a son Robert, and a daughter, Margaret married to Robert Cunningham of Cunninghamhead

Robert de Camera of Gadgirth the son, by his wife the daughter of Sir Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, had two sons, James, of whom next paragraph, and Andrew, styled of Nether Bruntshiels, and a daughter, Margaret, married to Alan Cathcart of Carleton

James Chalmer of Gadgirth, the elder son, was a zealous reformer, and is described by Archbishop Spottiswood, John Knox and other ecclesiastical historians as one of the boldest of the leaders of the reformation in Scotland In 1558, when the preachers were summoned to appear at Edinburgh, and in consequence the professors of the reformed religion flocked in great numbers to the capital on the day fixed, (the 19th of July,) the bishop of St Andrews and the priests procured a proclamation to be made, that all who had come to the town without commandment or warrant, should repair to the borders and remain there fifteen days The bishop of Galloway said in rhyme to the queen

> 'Madame because they are come without order
> I red you send them to the border

It happened that those of the west country who supported the reformed religion had arrived that same day in Edinburgh, and hearing of the proclamation, they went in a body to the privy chamber, where the queen regent and the bishops were, and complained of this strange proceeding of the priests, on which the queen began to put in practice some of her usual craft, when a zealous and bold man, as Calderwood calls him, James Chalmer of Gadgirth, said, "Madam, you know that this is the malice of the javvels (a term of reproach much in use in those days, supposed to have the same meaning as jail birds) and of that bastard (meaning the bishop of St Andrews) that standeth by you We vow to God we shall make a day of it They oppress us and our tenants, for feeding their idle bellies They trouble our preachers, and would murder them and us Shall we suffer this any longer? No, Madam, it shall not be so,' and thereupon every man put on his steel bonnet [Calderwood's History, vol i p 344] The queen regent found herself obliged to temporise She denied all knowledge of the proclamation, and forbade the bishops to trouble either the professors or their preachers The bishops were in consequence obliged to adjourn the day of compearance till the first of September In May 1559, he was one of the barons of the west who hastened to the relief of Perth, when the queen regent threatened to march against that town with her French troops In September 1562 he was among the barons and gentlemen of Ayrshire who subscribed the famous bond at Ayr, for the defence of the "holy Evangel," and their own mutual protection, and in July 1567, as a member of Assembly, he was one of the commissioners of towns who signed the articles then agreed to, for the maintenance of the authority of the young king, James the Sixth, the defence of the reformed religion, and the utterly rooting out of popery in the realm He had several charters under the great seal in 1541 and 1548, of parts of his estates both in the counties of Ayr and Wigton John Knox, when in the west, preached in Gadgirth castle, situated in the parish of Coylton, and found, as did all the reforming ministers, a warm friend and fearless defender in its possessor He married Annabella, daughter of Cunningham of Caprington, and had James, his son and successor, and three daughters, the second of whom, Margaret, was married to James Boyd of Trochrigg archbishop of Glasgow, and was the mother of the famous Dr Robert Boyd of Trochrigg, principal of the university of Glasgow James Chalmer, the son, married Marion, daughter of John Fullarton of Dreghorn, and had by her a son, James, and four daughters

This latter James Chalmer was infeft in the estate in 1580, as heir to his father By his wife Isabella, daughter of Sir Patrick Houston of that ilk, he had, with three daughters, a son, James Chalmer of Gadgirth, who by commission under the great seal, 8th September 1632, was by King Charles the First made sheriff principal of Ayrshire, when the crown acquired that heritable jurisdiction from the earl of Loudoun In 1633, he was one of the representatives of Ayrshire in parliament In 1641 he was conjoined with the earl of Cassillis and the laird of Caprington as commissioners from the Scots parliament to Newcastle In the same year he and Sir William Mure of Rowallan were appointed auditors of the accounts of the commissary-general In 1643 he was a commissioner of supply, and also one on the committee of management In 1646 he was on the committee of war, and in 1649 he had a troop in Colonel Robert Montgomery's regiment of horse By his wife Isabel daughter of John Blair of Blair, he had five sons and five daughters His sons were John, his successor, Reginald of Polquhairn David of Elsick in Galloway, Bruce, and Robert

His grandson, John Chalmer of Gadgirth, was a member of the convention parliament in 1689, and in the same year of the first parliament of William and Mary He married Margaret, eldest daughter of Colonel James Montgomery of Coilsfield, third son of the sixth earl of Eglinton, and, with three daughters, had three sons, John, James, and Hugh The latter, when scarcely seventeen years of age, was killed at the battle of Malplaquet in September 1709

John, the eldest son, at the age of sixteen entered the service of the United Provinces as a volunteer in the regiment commanded by Lieutenant-general George Hamilton, in which he afterwards obtained a captain's commission In 1714, when a general reduction of the army took place, and that regiment was disbanded, he was continued in the establishment of Great Britain on half-pay till December 1726, when he got a command in the seventh foot Owing mainly to the great debts which had been incurred by the family from their active adherence to the party of Charles the First, and which were accumulated in subsequent years, adjudications were carried on against the estate in 1692, and in April 1695, Hugh earl of Loudoun, James Viscount Stair, and David Cunninghame of Milncraig (afterwards Sir David), who seem to have been the curators during the minority of Captain Chalmer, entered into a contract amongst themselves, in which they allotted certain portions of the estate to each other, at sixteen years purchase, for which they became bound to pay the preferable debts affecting it On his return home, however, Captain Chalmer challenged the parties at law for thus parcelling out among themselves the lands of his fathers, when he recovered part of them He died unmarried about 1740, when he was succeeded in that portion of the estate which he retained possession of, by his three sisters, Mary Anna and Elizabeth Mary, the eldest, married the Rev John Steel, minister of Stair, but dying, at a very advanced age, without issue, she left her portion of the estate to her husband, and he, marrying again, had two daughters, the elder of whom married a Mr Redfearn, who sold his part of Gadgirth to Colonel Burnet who had married the youngest daughter, Anna the second daughter married Mr Farquhar of Townhead of Catrine, and had no issue Elizabeth, the youngest, became the wife of Mr John Mure of Ayr, and had several children Their eldest son was John Mure Chalmer, W S On the death of his parents he obtained that portion of the lands of Gadgirth which was his mother's, and his aunt Anna engaged in her lifetime to make over her share of the estate to him on his assuming the family name He married Miss E Farquhar of Edinburgh, and by her had a son George, and several other children

George Chalmer Esq, the only son, first a lieutenant in the royal navy, afterwards an advocate at the Madras bar, where he realized a considerable fortune, married at Madras Elizabeth, daughter of Francis Latour, Esq of that presidency by whom he had a son, Francis Day Chalmer, and two daughters, Anne, married to John Jenkins Esq (brother of Dr Jenkins master of Balol, and vice chancellor of the university of Oxford) and Eliza, the wife of Robert Haig, Esq of Viewpark, fourth son of James Haig of Blairhill, county Perth, and Lochrin, county Edinburgh

Francis Day Chalmer, the 25th in direct descent of this ancient family, major 7th dragoon guards, married 25th May 1833, Sarah Mary Emily, daughter of James Robertson, Esq, captain of engineers, Bengal army This lady was the cousin and heiress of the late Sir Gilbert Stirling of Mansfield, baronet, who left his estate of Larbert and his large personal fortune, to be invested in land to be entailed on her heirs Her eldest son, Gilbert Stirling Chalmer Stirling born 18th January 1843 will inherit these estates, and the direct lineal representation of Herbertus de Camera, great chamberlain of Scotland in the reign of David I, (1124—1153) The younger children of Major Chalmer are 2 Reginald, 3 George, 4 Francis, 1 Anne, 2 Emily Eliza 3 Catherine Frances, 4 Charlotte Amy Rachel

There was a family of the name of Chalmers settled in France, who were barons of Tartas in Normandy They are said to have been descended from the ancient family of Chalmers in Scotland by means of Job Chalmers who, leaving that country, married in France Martha de Cuiglosse, heiress at Tartas, in the year 1440 The reason of his leaving Scotland was that seven brethren of the family of Chalmers, of which this Job Chalmers was supposed to be one, had murdered the baron of Balgonie, and in consequence were banished the kingdom and their estates confiscated. In a letter written at Paris the 26th October 1644, by the Abbe Chalmers, a Scotsman, nominated bishop of Vance in Provence, in answer to one from Mons Chalmers, counsellor to the king and Lieutenant-general Tartas at Tartas, whom he styles his cousin, he says that the decay of their ancient family in Scotland was "by reason of the unhappiness of the times, and chiefly by means of the heresy whereof his great grandfather and grandfather were such furious protectors that they were known to have ransacked the churches at Aberdeen, whereof their ancestors were as perpetual governors for five hundred years, as he adds, "may be seen at this day by their magnificent tombs in the said city' He also says that the baron of Balgonie was killed by the seven brethren, "for ane abuse done to their father' A memorandum sent to Blaise Chalmers, lieutenant-general of Tartas, by David Chalmers, lord of Dormont (Ormond), a judge of the court of session, (of whom a notice follows,) about a hundred years before, states that the baron of Gadgirth was the chief of the name of Chalmers The father of this David Chalmers, as we learn from that document, was Andrew Chalmers of Strequelin (Strichen), in the county of Aberdeen Mention is also made of Peter Chalmers, councillor to the king (of France) and lieutenant-general of the jurisdiction of Tartas Of all these parties the arms were stated to be the same as those of the family of Gadgirth Notwithstanding their thus connecting themselves with the Ayrshire family, we rather think that the branch in France belonged to the house of Chalmers of Aberdeenshire, which was altogether of distinct origin

The family of Chalmers of Balnacraig, in Aberdeenshire, is considered by all Scottish genealogists as springing from the clan Cameron, and a totally different family from that of Gadgirth, although of the same surname This is instructed by the difference in their coats of arms, for there is not one figure in the arms of the one that corresponds with those of the other, and antiquaries generally allow that the origin and ancient descent of families are better ascertained by armorial bearings than by surnames, arms being of greater antiquity It is supposed that the ancestors of the family of Balnacraig were settled at an early period in the north of Scotland, but the first that can be fixed upon with any certainty was Robert Chalmers of Kintore, who married Helen Garvielhugh or Garioch, sister of Sir James Garvielhaugh, knight, a gentleman of good descent, who had from Sir Thomas Randolph, the great earl of Moray, tenant of Duncan earl of Fife in the estate of Lumphanan, a charter of the lands of Balnacraig, Belode (Beltie), Claychock (Cloak), and Falanschyn (Lillyching), with their patents, &c This Robert Chalmers of Kintore received, jointly with his wife, from her nephew, Andrew Garvielhaugh of Caskieben, the son of the above knight, a charter of the lands named, dated at Aberdeen, 8th August, 1507, to be holden of the earl of Moray and his heirs, for a pair of white gloves rendered yearly at the manor of Caskieben if asked for and became the founder of a house which flourished for more than four hundred years This charter was confirmed by Isabel Randolph, daughter and heiress of the said earl of Moray, lord of Annandale and Man Robert and Helen Chalmers left a son, William Chalmers or de Camera, as the name was then spelled, who was several times provost of Aberdeen from 1392 until 1404 He seems to have had a son or brother, Thomas Chalmers, who was also provost of that city in 1412 Alex ander Chalmers, probably his son, was provost in 1443, and for several different years thereafter, down to 1495, when he is designed of Murthill In the public registers is a charter granted by Alexander Chalmers of Balnacraig to Henry Forbes, of the lands of Thomaston and Fullarton, with an annual rent of five shillings out of the king's lands of Kinkell and Dyce, in the thanage of Kintore and shire of Aberdeen, dated 7th April, and confirmed at St Andrews 1st March, 1535 In the eighteenth century the estate of Balnacraig passed into the possession of the Farquharsons of Finzean, and Patrick Chalmers, Esq of Auldbar in Forfarshire, is believed to be the representative of the Balnacraig family

In 1716, while a party of military were preparing to burn the old mansion house of Balnacraig, in the parish of Aboyne, one of the soldiers thrust his head into a jar of honey, and could only be extricated by a portion of the mouth of the jar being broken off, which was done amid the jeers of his comrades During this scene a counter order to save the house arrived The honey-jar, with its broken lip, was in consequence preserved at the house as the cause of its preservation

The family of Chalmers of Cults, in the parish of Farland was an early cadet of that of Balnacraig Alexander Chalmers, the first of Cults, is supposed to have been a grandson of the William Chalmers above-named He married Lady Agnes Hay, daughter of the earl of Errol Alexander Chalmers of Cult the fifth in descent from the above-named Alexander, the first of Cults, was provost of Aberdeen in 1567 By his wife, Janet, daughter of Dunsden of Cushnie he had two sons, Gilbert his successor, and William, minister of Boyndie, of whose descendants afterwards His elder son, Gilbert Chalmers of Cults, received a charter of confirmation of part of his paternal estates in November 1601 He seems also to have sold the greater portion of them to Sir James Gordon of Lesmore in 1612, among which were the lands of Cults, which now belong to the duke of Richmond By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Frazer of Dores he had a son, Alexander Chalmers, who appears nevertheless to have been designated of Cults He married Janet, daughter of James Irvine of Drum, and had a son, Alexander Chalmers of Cults, who married Marjory daughter of Robert Dunsden of Cushnie, advocate, by whom he had an only daughter, Marjory, the wife of John Urie, of Pitfichy, and their son was Sir John Urie or Urrie, lieutenant general in 1643, under the great marquis of Montrose In this Alexander Chalmers ended the elder male branch of the family of Cults

William, second son of Alexander Chalmers of Cults, the provost of Aberdeen, above referred to, was the first protestant minister at the kirk of Boyndie, in Banffshire and was planted there in the early part of the reign of Charles the First He married Elizabeth, daughter of William Chalmers of the same family of Cults, minister of Skene, and had four sons, who were all episcopal clergymen, namely, 1st, William Chalmers, minister at Fettercairn After the revolution he was sent to London by the episcopal clergy of the north of Scotland, to attend to their affairs at court, and soon after the accession of Queen Anne, he presented to her an address from his brethren, when her majesty conferred a pension of a hundred pounds a-year on him He married Elizabeth, daughter of Barclay of Towie, and had two sons, William, minister at Glammis, and James, minister at Cullen 2d, James, parson of Paisley He was first one of the professors of philosophy in Marischal college, Aberdeen, which office he held in 1660, when Charles the Second was in Scotland, and while at Aberdeen his majesty distinguished him with particular marks of favour On one occasion, especially when he waited on the king, Charles, in the hearing of all present, saluted him with these words, "God save you, Mr Chalmers!" Having entered into holy orders, he was presented to New Machar, within seven miles of Aberdeen, but soon after was translated to the kirk of Cullen, of which his nephew James was afterwards incumbent During his ministry here, preaching once on Jotham's parable (Judges, chap ix) in the time of Cromwell's usurpation, he gave so great offence to a company of soldiers, then quartered there, that they carried him prisoner to Elgin, where he was confined for some time After the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland in 1662, he was promoted to the kirk of Dumfries, and there is an act of the lords of secret council in his favour, dated 11th December that year, registered in the council books, allowing him to draw the year's stipend due to the late minister of Dumfries, as well as his own due from Cullen It was after this that he became parson of Paisley He was nominated by Charles the Second to the bishopric of Orkney, but died at Edinburgh before he could be consecrated, and was buried in the Chalmers' tomb in Greyfriars churchyard of that city He married, first, a daughter of William Scroggie, bishop of Argyle, and, secondly, Elizabeth, sister of Robert Petrie of Portlethen, provost of Aberdeen from 1664 to 1671, and had two sons, James, minister of Kirkpatrick-Fleming, and Charles who was admitted writer to the signet, 16th October 1701, but afterwards entered the army, and was for some time a captain in the Scots guards, but sold his commission in 1714 He was killed at the battle of Sheriffmuir, on the side of the Pretender, in 1715 He was twice married, and had two sons, Roderick, Ross herald and herald painter in Edinburgh, and James, who was also an artist 3d, John, minister of Peterhead, and chaplain to John earl of Middleton, commissioner to the first Scots parliament after the restoration He married Mary, daughter of Keith of Whiteriggs, sheriff of Mearns 4th, Patrick, succeeded his father as minister of Boyndie By his wife, Anne, daughter of James Ogilvie of Ragged in that parish, he had two sons and a daughter The elder son was a clergyman of the Church of England in the county of Essex The younger died a youth at Marischal college, Aberdeen The daughter married George Ogilvy of New Ravne

A baronetcy was conferred in 1664 on a member of the younger branch of the Cults family, but the name of the grantee is not known

Although the title is of Cults, the family had ceased to possess that property and gradually fell into decay About the middle of the last century the grandson of the first baronet was Sir Charles Chalmers, captain in the royal regiment of artillery, who died at Pondicherry in the East Indies, in November 1760, and was succeeded by his brother Sir George Chalmers of Cults baronet, who was long resident in India He died in 1764, and is supposed to have left a son, Sir George Chalmers, nominally of Cults, an eminent painter He was a native of Edinburgh, and the scholar of Ramsay, but he afterwards studied at Rome The honours of his family descended to him without fortune, their estates having been previously sold, as already related Sir George was in consequence obliged to make art his profession He resided a few years at Hull, where he painted several portraits, and frequently exhibited at the Royal Academy He died in London about the early part of 1791 There is a mezzotinto print of General Lord Blakeney, after a painting by Chalmers, done in 1755, at Minorca, when his lordship, who was his particular friend, was governor of that island In Bromley's Catalogue of engraved portraits, mention is made of a portrait of his relation Roderick Chalmers, Rose Herald and Painter of Edinburgh, in his Herald's coat, which was engraved by G Chalmers, J He married at Edinburgh, 4th June 1768 Isabella, daughter of John Alexander, Esq, historical and portrait painter in that city, and had a son, Sir Robert Chalmers, baronet, commander of the Alexander Lazaretto, stationed at the Motherbank He died at Portsea in 1807 His son, Sir Charles W Chalmers, an officer in the royal navy, was the last baronet of whom there is any account

The office of principal of King's College, Old Aberdeen, was held for nearly sixty years by Dr John Chalmers, who died 7th May 1800 William Chalmers, of the family of Strichen, was professor of medicine there The first newspaper in the north of Scotland, the Aberdeen Journal was begun in 1746 by his son, Mr James Chalmers, printer in that city, and his grandson in 1771 established the Aberdeen Almanack there

Major General Sir William Chalmers, knight and C B eldest son of William Chalmers, Esq of Glencricht Perthshire and nephew of Sir Kenneth Douglas, baronet, of Glenbervie, born in 1787, entered the army in 1803 He served in the whole campaigns of the war with France, chiefly as a staff officer, in Portugal, in Spain, at Walcheren, in Belgium and France He was severely wounded in the assault of the entrenchments at Sarre, and had nine horses killed or wounded under him in action, three of them at the battle of Waterloo where he commanded a wing of the 52d foot, he received the brevet of major for his services at the Pyrenees, and that of lieutenant-colonel for Waterloo He was created a military companion of the Bath in 1838, a knight commander of the order of Guelphs of Hanover in 1837, and a knight bachelor by letters patent in 1844 He was made a major general in the army in 1846, a lieutenant general in 1854, and was colonel of 78th foot He married in 1826 the daughter of Thomas Page, Esq, issue, two sons and three daughters Sir William Chalmers died 2d June 1860

CHALMERS, DAVID, judicially styled Lord Ormond, an historian, priest, and lawyer, was born in the county of Ross, about 1530, and educated in the university of Aberdeen In some biographies his name is erroneously spelled Chambers, but according to the continuator of Nisbet he belonged to the family of Chalmers of Strichen, in Aberdeenshire, and his father's name was Andrew Chalmers After taking orders, he proceeded to France and Italy, where he studied theology and the canon and civil laws, as was customary in those days In 1556 he was a pupil of Marianus Sozenus, at Bologna On his return to Scotland, he became successively parson of Suddy, provost of Creichton, and chancellor of the diocese of Ross On 26th January 1565, he was appointed by Queen Mary one of the lords of session on the spiritual side, when he assumed the title of Lord Ormond In the letter of presentation he was styled the queen's "weil beluffit clerk and familiar servitor," and he was also named a privy councillor In 1566, he was employed, with other legal functionaries, in compiling and publishing the Acts of the Scottish parliament The volume in which these are contained is known by the name of the "Black Acts," from being printed in black letter The same year, Buchanan says, Queen Mary lived in the Exchequer, "quod in propinquo diversabatur David Camerius, Bothuelchens, cujus posticum erat hortis Reginæ vicinum, qua Bothuelius, quoties lubitum esset commearet" A curious tale is told the use made of these apartments may be found in Buchanan's 'Detection,' p 6 In December of that year, he obtained a charter of the lands of Castleton and others in the earldom of Ross, "in maist ample forme, with all and haill the landis, castellis, towris, fortalicis, manerplaces, milnis, woddis, fischingis, annexis, connexis, and pertinentis of the same, lyand within the schirefdomis of Ross and Cromertie, quhilk pertenit to umquhile Johne Erle of Ross, Lord of the Ilis, and Governour of the realme of Scotland, and to Donald Dowe of the Ilis, his sone, and to Alexander Erle of Ross, his sone, and to Johne Erle of Ross, his sone, and to Johne Erle of Ross, his sone, and to Johne and dedicated to the French king, Henry the Third In 1579, he published other two works in the French language (see following list) Sometime afterwards he returned to Scotland, and on 4th September 1583, received at Falkland his "highness' pacification," restoring him to all the lands and offices, benefices, dignities, honours and privileges, which had formerly pertained to him Against this measure the General Assembly of the church strenuously remonstrated with the king, as Lord Ormond still lay under the suspicion of having been accessary to the death of his majesty's father, in consequence of which, although the remission was ratified in parliament, 22d May 1584, it was clogged with a proviso that it should not extend to the "odious murthers of our sovereane Lordis dearest fader and two Regentis" He was, however, never brought to trial for this or any other crime, and on the 21st of June 1586, he was restored to his seat on the bench He died in November 1592 His works are

CHALMERS, GEORGE, a distinguished historical, political, and antiquarian writer, descended from the family of Chalmers of Pittenseat, in the county of Moray, was born at Fochabers in the end of the year 1742 He received the early part of his education at the grammar school of his native town, and afterwards removed to King's college, Old Aberdeen, where he had as one of his preceptors the celebrated Dr Reid, then professor of moral philosophy From thence he went to Edinburgh, where he studied law for several years In 1763 he sailed to America with an uncle, to assist him in the recovery of a tract of land of considerable extent in Maryland He subsequently settled at Baltimore, where he practised as a lawyer till the breaking out of the revolutionary war On his return to Britain in 1775 he settled in London, where he applied to literary pursuits, and in 1780 produced his 'Political Annals of the United Colonies,' and in 1782 his 'Estimate of the Comparative Strength of Great Britain during the Present and four Preceding Reigns' These works are said to have recommended him to the notice of government, and in August 1786 he was appointed chief clerk of the Committee of Privy Council, for the consideration of all matters relating to trade and foreign plantations He also acted as colonial agent for the Bahama islands A list of the various works of Mr Chalmers, who was a member both of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, as well as an honorary member of the Antiquaries of Scotland, and of other learned bodies, is subjoined His greatest production is his 'Caledonia,' the first volume of which appeared in 1807, and which he himself styled his "standing work" This truly national publication was intended to illustrate the antiquities, the language, the history, civil and ecclesiastical, and the agricultural and commercial state of Scotland from the earliest period, and displays a vast amount of research and erudition It was left unfinished, only three out of four volumes having appeared He had for many years been engaged in collecting materials for a 'History of Scottish Poetry,' and 'A History of Printing in Scotland' Under the name of Oldys he published a Life of Thomas Paine His Life of Ruddiman the grammarian, throws much light on the state of literature in Scotland during the earlier part of the eighteenth century, and his Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, is a work of great labour and research, but it is understood not to have been entirely original Mr Chalmers published various pamphlets, apologising for those who, like himself, believed in the authenticity of the Shakspeare manuscripts of Vortigern and Rowena, forged by Mr Ireland He died May 31, 1825, aged 82 years His publications are

Besides these works he had prepared for the press an elaborate History of the Life and Reign of David I

In 1812, on the murder of Mr Perceval, Chancellor of the Exchequer, a pamphlet appeared entitled "An Appeal to the generosity of the British nation on behalf of the family of the unfortunate Bellingham," with Mr Chalmers' name as the author, but it was an impudent forgery, as he knew nothing of it till it was published Nevertheless, in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica it is mentioned among his works

CHALMERS, ALEXANDER, M A, F S A, a biographical and miscellaneous writer, the youngest son of James Chalmers and Susanna Trail, daughter of the Rev James Trail, minister at Montrose, was born at Aberdeen, March 29, 1759 His father was a printer at Aberdeen, of great classical attainments, who established the Aberdeen Journal, the first newspaper published in that city Having received a classical and medical education, about 1777 he left his native city, and never returned to it He had obtained the situation of surgeon in the West Indies, and had arrived at Portsmouth to join his ship, when he suddenly changed his mind, and proceeded to the metropolis, where he soon became connected with the periodical press His literary career commenced as editor of the Public Ledger and London Packet He also contributed to the other popular journals of the day In the St James' Chronicle he wrote numerous essays, many of them under the signature of Senex To the 'Morning Chronicle,' the property of his friend, Mr Perry, he for some years contributed paragraphs, epigrams, and satirical poems He was also at one time editor of the 'Morning Herald' Being early connected in business with Mr George Robinson, the celebrated publisher in Paternoster-Row, he assisted him in judging of manuscripts offered for sale, as well as occasionally fitting the same for publication He was also a contributor to the 'Critical Review,' then published by Mr Robinson, and to the 'Analytical Review,' published by Mr Johnson

In 1793 he published a continuation of the History of England,' in letters, 2 vols, which reached four editions, the fourth being published in 1821 His publications after this were numerous, and followed each other in constant succession A list of them is subjoined In 1805 he was elected a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries Besides other works edited by him in previous years, in 1809 he edited Bolingbroke's Works, 8 vols 8vo, and in this and subsequent years he contributed many of the lives to the magnificent volumes of the 'British Gallery of Contemporary Portraits,' published by Cadell and Davies In 1811 he revised through the press Bishop Hurd's edition of Addison's Works, 6 vols 8vo, and an edition of Pope's Works, 8 vols 18mo In the same year he republished, with corrections and alterations, a periodical paper, entitled 'The Projector,' 3 vols 8vo, the essays contained in which were originally printed in the Gentleman's Magazine He had previously written a periodical paper, called 'The Trifler,' in the Aberdeen Magazine, but the essays under that head were never separately printed The work on which Mr Chalmers' fame as an author chiefly rests is 'The General Biographical Dictionary' The first four volumes of this work were published monthly, commencing May 1812, and then a volume every alternate month, to the thirty-second and last volume in March 1817, a period of four years and ten months of incessant labour, and of many personal privations, as is too commonly the fate of professional authors In November 1816 he republished 'The Lives of Dr Edward Pocock, the celebrated orientalist, by Dr Twells, of Dr Zachary Pearce, Bishop of Rochester, and of Dr Thomas Newton, Bishop of Bristol, by themselves, and of the Rev Philip Skelton, by Mr Burday,' in 2 vols 8vo

Mr Chalmers was a valuable contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine, to which he was very partial, finding it of the greatest use in the compilation of his biographical works During the last few years of his life, he suffered much from illness He died at London, December 10, 1834 He belonged to various literary clubs of the old school, of which he was nearly the last surviving member

His works and editions are

seaport town on the east coast of Fife His father was a dyer, shipowner, and general merchant, descended from a family long connected with that part of the country His great-grandfather, Mr James Chalmers, son of John Chalmers, laird of Pitmedden, was ordained minister of Elie in 1701 In the year after his ordination he married the daughter of an episcopal clergyman, who, by the savings of economy, purchased the estate of Radernie, which is still held by her descendants Her eldest daughter was married to Mr T Kay, minister of Kilrenny, and it was to Mrs Kay's son-in-law, Dr Adamson of St Andrews, that Dr Chalmers was indebted for the presentation to Kilmany parish The eldest son (the eldest brother of Dr Chalmers' grandfather) succeeded his father as minister of Elie, and was afterwards translated to Kilconquhar Mr Chalmers' second son (Dr Chalmers' grandfather) married Barbara Anderson, Easter Anstruther, and settled in that town as a merchant He was succeeded in business by his second son, Mr John Chalmers (Dr Chalmers' father), who married Elizabeth Hall, daughter of a wine merchant at Crail They had a numerous family—consisting of nine sons and five daughters—all of whom, save one, reached manhood Dr Chalmers was the sixth child, and fourth son When yet almost an infant, he was committed to the care of a nurse, "whose cruelty and deceitfulness haunted his memory through life" To escape this woman he went to school when only three years old, but here he was tormented by a pedantic and irritable schoolmaster, named Bryce, "a sightless tyrant," who used to steal behind upon his victims, like a tiger, guided by the sound of their voices This man had an assistant named Daniel Ramsay, who was as easy as his principal was severe, and both were equally inefficient In his old age Ramsay fell into a state of destitution, and was often relieved by his old pupil, Dr Chalmers, who gave him many a pound note

The stories and precepts of the Bible, at a very early period, made an impression on his mind When only about three years of age, he was one evening found pacing up and down the nursery alone, in the dark, excited and absorbed, repeating 'O, my son, Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son!" It would appear that as soon as he could form or announce a wish, he declared that he would be a minister, and the sister of one of his schoolfellows relates that breaking in one day on her brother and young Chalmers, she found the future divine standing on a chair, and preaching vigorously to his single auditor on the text, "Let brotherly love continue!"

In November 1791, whilst not yet twelve years of age, accompanied by his eldest brother William, he entered as a student the united college of St Andrews, and among his fellow students was John Campbell, the son of the minister of Cupar, who afterwards became Lord Campbell, lord chief justice of the queen's bench At that time he could not write at all correctly, his letters were full of bad grammar and words mis-spelled As in the case of many other great men, his talents did not develope themselves early He was volatile and idle in his habits, and paid little attention to his classes during the first two years of his college course He excelled at football, but still more at handball, owing to his being left handed His third session at college was his intellectual birthtime His physical powers had now been matured, and science awoke the mental activity and force of will, which never afterward slumbered Dr James Brown, the assistant mathematical professor, was the means of kindling young Chalmers' enthusiasm, and a friendship commenced between the pupil and teacher, which lasted for many years In November 1795, when fifteen years old, he was enrolled a student of divinity His attainments in theology did not at first attract much notice, indeed his biographer tells us that theology occupied very little of his thoughts, but he early discovered a predilection for mathematics and chemistry Towards the close of the session, however, he turned his attention to Edwards on Free Will, and studied that author so intensely that some were afraid his mind would lose its balance At that time the members of the university assembled daily in the public hall for prayer, which was performed by the theological students in rotation When it came to Chalmers to officiate for the first time, his prayer was an amplification of the Lord's Prayer, so eloquently expressed as to excite wonder, and when the people of St Andrews knew it to be his turn to lead the devotions, they flocked to the hall, which was open to the public

For the cultivation of his talent for composition, he was largely indebted to debating societies formed among the students' In session 1798-9, he took as a subject for the debating society connected with the college, "Is man a free agent?" and defended the negative side Even then, though but eighteen years of age, he was a formidable antagonist in debate It was about this time that he penned a college essay on religious enthusiasm, which is said to have been the groundwork of the splendid speech delivered by him forty years afterwards, in a solemn convocation of four hundred evangelical ministers, when in November 1842, they met to decide upon separating from the Church of Scotland, and produced an effect as overwhelming as anything he ever uttered

After his college course was finished, he became tutor in a family who treated him with great superciliousness From his private letters at this time it would appear that he was sadly mortified at the conduct of this family—even the very servants treating him with marked disrespect "The whole combined household," says his son-in-law and biographer, Dr Hanna, "were at war with him The undaunted tutor resolved nevertheless to act his part with dignity and effect Remonstrances were vain To the wrong they did him in dismissing him, when company came, to his own room, they would apply no remedy He devised therefore a remedy of his own —He was living near a town in which, through means of introductions given him by Fifeshire friends, he had already formed some acquaintances Whenever he knew that there was to be a supper from which he would be excluded, he ordered one in a neighbouring inn, to which he invited one or more of his own friends To make his purpose all the more manifest, he waited till the servant entered with his solitary repast, when he ordered it away, saying, 'I sup elsewhere to night'—Such curiously-timed tutorship suppers were not very likely to be relished by Mr ——, who charged him with unseemly and unseasonable pride 'Sir,' said he, 'the very servants are complaining of your haughtiness You have far too much pride, sir'—'There are two kinds of pride, sir,' was the reply 'There is that kind of pride which lords it over inferiors, and there is that pride which rejoices in repressing the insolence of superiors The first I have none of—the second I glory in"

When but nineteen years of age, he applied for license as a preacher, which was granted on the plea that he was "a lad o' pregnant parts" He was licensed 31st July 1799, and preached his first sermon in Chapel-lane Chapel, in Wigan, on 25th August On the following Sabbath he preached in Liverpool His brother James, who heard him preach, wrote to his father that he thought Thomas more occupied with his mathematical studies than with his religious, and referred in proof, to some documents in Thomas' handwriting, adding, "if you can read them,"—for even then his handwriting was so bad that his father is said to have laid aside his letters till he returned home to read them himself He subsequently attended for two sessions the classes of chemistry and natural philosophy at Edinburgh, under Dr Hope and Professor Robison He had also a ticket to Dr Brown's class of moral philosophy About this period, he became an admirer of the works of Godwin, and thenceforth the philosophical scepticism which for a time characterised him commenced In a letter to his father, he mentioned that he was getting into a stock of sermons, which would render "the business abundantly easy," when he got a church, which he was at that time expecting

In 1801 he became assistant minister of the parish of Cavers, near Hawick, in Roxburghshire At this period of his life he evinced nothing, either in his mode of preaching or in general ability, to distinguish him from the ordinary run of young probationers, except perhaps in the positive character of his habits, and a somewhat self-willed and independent spirit of abstraction In 1803, when little more than twenty-two years of age, he was appointed assistant to Professor Vilant, the professor of mathematics in the university of St Andrews This situation was quite to his taste "His thirst for literary distinction was intense, to fill the mathematical chair in one of the universities, the high object of his ambition, to this the assistantship at St Andrews might prove a stepping-stone" This prospect influenced his literary ardour to the ut most His lectures were eloquent, and unusually brilliant, and his students regarded him with admiration The old professors, in the true spirit of all mediocrity, were envious, and tried to disparage him He repelled their attempts to injure him with indignation, and maintained his independence as a man of science "Under his extraordinary management," writes one of his pupils, "the study of mathematics was felt to be hardly less a play of the fancy, than a labour of the intellect, the lessons of the day being continually interspersed with applications and illustrations of the most lively nature, so that he received, in a singular manner, the confidence and attachment of his pupils"

In 1803, through the influence of his relative, Dr Adamson, professor of civil history at St Andrews, as already stated, he was presented by his university to the living of Kilmany, a small scattered village in the county of Fife, situated about midway between Cupar and Dundee, to which charge he was ordained on the 12th of May in that year Soon after this envy deprived him of his assistant professorship His father, also, who wished him to attend exclusively to his ministerial duties, did not approve of his teaching in the university During the first session differences arose between him and the professor, so that he was told that his services would not be required He resolved to vindicate his injured honour by opening classes of his own at the very door of the university, which he did in the session of 1804 His class was most numerously attended He also lectured upon chemistry as well as mathematics The opening of this private class, in apparent opposition to the university professor, brought upon him, as well as upon the students who attended him, the full indignation of the United college His presbytery also interfered with him, because he gave so much of his time to these lectures But he met them in the same spirit of defiance, and as they could not bring against him any charge of neglect of duty, he told them that he had as good a right to indulge in this "amusement" as they had to enjoy themselves in their own favourite pastimes

So far from being deterred by the opposition of the professors, on a vacancy occurring, in 1804, he became a candidate for the natural philosophy chair in the university of St Andrews, but was unsuccessful Finding the manse of Kilmany old and in wretched repair, he made many efforts to get it rendered habitable for himself and his two sisters who were to reside with him Not content with his labours at St Andrews, he gave courses of lectures on chemistry, &c, in various of the neighbouring towns It is related that having, by his chemical acquirements, lighted up his manse of Kilmany with gas, his parishioners were hugely astonished thereat, as at that period this new lighting power, now become so common, was almost unknown in this country Their feelings on the subject, however, need not be considered matter of surprise, when it is stated that even Sir Walter Scott at one period scoffed at the idea of light from gas, and yet lived to introduce it into his house at Abbotsford, and afterwards became chairman of the Edinburgh Gas Company

At the time of the threatened invasion of Great Britain by the French, when the volunteers were organised, Mr Chalmers showed his patriotic feelings by enrolling himself in the St Andrews corps, holding a double commission as chaplain and lieutenant In 1805 he joined the corps at Kirkaldy, where it was then on permanent duty

When the chair of mathematics in the university of Edinburgh became vacant in that year (1805) by the translation of Professor Playfair to the chair of natural philosophy, in the same university, Mr Chalmers was one of the many candidates, who competed with the late Sir John Leslie for the vacant professorship He withdrew, however, at an early period of the protracted contest which ensued, and in the end Sir John was elected It is understood to have been in compliance with the wishes of his father and nearest relatives, who were anxious that he should remain a minister, that he retired from the competition, and for a time sat down quietly in his charge Nothing but a strong sense of filial obligation could have induced him thus reluctantly to forego the prospect of realizing his heart's warmest desire, and continue to perform in his village charge the somewhat monotonous though highly honourable and responsible duties of a country minister It was on occasion of this contest that his first publication was called forth Mr Playfair, in his letter to the Lord Provost of

Edinburgh, from the number of clergymen who had come forward as candidates, was led to observe that there were very few Scottish clergymen eminent in mathematics or natural philosophy, and that the vigorous and successful pursuit of these sciences was incompatible with clerical duties and habits Mr Chalmers immediately took up his pen, and under the title of 'Observations on a Passage in Mr Playfair's Letter to the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, relative to the mathematical pretensions of the Scottish Clergy,' he published a tract vindicating the character of his brethren, and asserting that they had sufficient leisure for literary pursuits In that pamphlet he alleged that one weekday was quite enough for the duties of the parish, and the rest was leisure time After he changed his views of the nature of the work of the ministry, he endeavoured to recall this unfortunate pamphlet

At the beginning of 1808, he first commenced authorship in that department in which he afterwards excelled, namely, political economy His volume was entitled 'An Inquiry into the Extent and Stability of National Resources,' and he found some difficulty at first in obtaining a publisher The object of this work was chiefly to show that if our native resources were properly cultivated, and our means duly economised, there would be no necessity for depending on foreign trade,—a theory which he was subsequently convinced was not altogether a correct one Amidst much that was questionable, the volume inculcated some sound views in political science, but its vehemence of tone, although at times lofty and eloquent, prevented it from making any great impression, and it was in some instances very severely assailed by the Reviewers

At this period the mind of this extraordinary man seems to have been more occupied with subjects of a political and scientific than of a religious nature For some years after his settlement at Kilmany, he attracted very little attention as a preacher beyond the limits of his own parish Indeed, for a number of years, from his violent and excited mode of delivery, he was rather unpopular in the pulpit

In May, 1809, he made his maiden speech in the General Assembly, on a question of augmentation of stipends, and that speech caused a great sensation, and was published by request He used to say that 'Butler's Analogy,' which he commenced to study at an early period, "made him a Christian" The deaths of his sister and his uncle, and a long illness which followed, led him about this time to serious thought, and to a complete change in his religious views On 17th March, 1810, he says he had completed his thirtieth year, and lamented that on a review of the last fifteen years of his life, at least two-thirds of that time had been uselessly spent He became, about this time, greatly fortified in his belief of Christianity One day he called on a friend, and said, "Tell me all you ever heard against Christianity from its enemies—I am more than able to refute them all The evidences of our religion are overwhelming" He at this time reviewed Dr Charters' Sermons, and intended the criticism for the Edinburgh Review, but sent it to the Rev A Thomson for the 'Christian Instructor' The latter demurred to it as a review, but inserted it among the miscellaneous contributions In a note Mr Thomson regretted the absence of the peculiar doctrines of the cross in the volume under review About the beginning of 1811 Mr Chalmers took up Wilberforce's 'Practical View of Christianity,' and he got on in reading it till he felt himself on the eve of a great revolution in all his opinions about the gospel He wrote his mother that he had reached the conclusion that his profession required all his talents and energy—a change of views, certainly, on this point So great an improvement was now observable in his mode of preaching, that his congregation was equally surprised and delighted, and from this important era in his life may be dated the commencement of that distinction to which he was soon after to advance He had become intimately acquainted with Dr (afterwards Sir David) Brewster, and was engaged by him to write several articles for the Edinburgh Encyclopædia conducted by him, and amongst others the paper on 'Christianity' In the course of the research and investigation into which he was led while preparing this celebrated article, which he afterwards expanded into his well-known Treatise on the Evidences, he became deeply impressed with far more serious and heartfelt views of the great truths of the Gospel, than he had ever previously entertained, and the result was soon apparent From a mere formal preacher, he became a bold, eloquent, and earnest pulpit orator, upon whose discourses hung enchained thousands of admiring hearers He broke through all at once, like the sun from behind a cloud, and his parishioners were filled with amazement at the sudden transformation "It was not long," says his biographer, "till the whole aspect of the Sabbath congregations in Kilmany church was changed The stupid wonder which used to sit on the countenances of the villagers or farm servants who attended divine service, was turned into a fixed, intelligent and devout attention It was not easy for the dullest to remain uninformed, for if the preacher sometimes soared too high for the best trained of his people to follow him, at other times, and much oftener, he put the matter of his message so as to force for it an entrance into the most sluggish understanding" So remarkable, indeed, was the change that the parish church of Kilmany, which had till then been attended by a thin and listless auditory, was now thronged, not only by the inhabitants of the parish, but by crowds of strangers from the surrounding towns and villages, thousands flocking from St Andrews, and even from Dundee, to hear him

His fame, as a preacher, soon reached Edinburgh, the capital, where he preached on several occasions, with great acceptance, and henceforward he was universally acknowledged to be the most powerful and popular preacher in the Scottish Church

In November 1814 he was elected by the Town Council of Glasgow minister of the Tron church in that city, and was admitted to that charge on the 21st of the following July Here he preached those eloquent discourses which soon raised him to the rank of one of the first preachers in Europe The characteristics of his eloquence have often been described The provincial Scotch accent, the guttural voice, the heavy blue eye kindling into fury and the uncouth gestures which distinguished him, were all forgotten when he spoke His amazing powers of oratory, and great command of language, enabled him to triumph over all these apparent defects Before leaving Kilmany, he published 'The Duty of Giving an Immediate Diligence to the Business of the Christian Life,' being an address to the inhabitants of that parish In his farewell sermon preached July 9, 1815, he affectingly alludes to the change which had taken place in his views of religious truth since coming among them For the greater part of twelve years, he says, his preaching was attended with little reformation of heart or conduct, and he adds—"Out of your humble cottages have I gathered a lesson, which, I pray God, I may be enabled to carry with all its simplicity into a wider theatre and to bring with all the power of its subduing efficacy upon the vices of a more crowded population"

On the 21st of February, 1816, the degree of D D was conferred on Mr Chalmers by the Senatus Academicus of the university of Glasgow In May 1817 Dr Chalmers appeared for the first time in a London pulpit, having on the 14th of that month preached in Surrey chapel, the anniversary sermon for the London Missionary Society His reputation had preceded him, and although the service did not commence till eleven o'clock, "at seven in the morning the chapel was crowded to excess, and many thousands went off for want of room" On the following Thursday he preached again in the same place on behalf of the Scottish Hospital, and on the succeeding Sunday in the Scotch church, London Wall, and in the Scotch church, Swallow Street Many of the clergy of the Church of England, peers, and members of parliament, flocked to hear him Among the latter were Huskisson, Wilberforce, and Canning, and the latter, on one occasion, when the preacher paused to take breath after one of his electrifying bursts of oratory, was overheard to whisper to a gentleman beside him "This is indeed true eloquence The tartan beats us all"

The amount of misery and wretchedness which he found existing among the poorer classes of Glasgow, filled his heart with sorrow, and to the work of the pastor was soon added that of the philanthropist He now devoted much of his attention to the Christian and civic economy of towns, and laboured anxiously to introduce an improvement in the mode of maintaining the poor, with the design of ameliorating their condition, as well as doing away with compulsory assessment His sagacity foresaw that our poor-laws would pauperise Scotland, and that the more given by legal sanction the more would pauperism be created Having explained his views to the magistrates of Glasgow, they were favourably entertained, and he was translated to the parish of St John's, in that city, that he might be the better enabled to develop his plans For this purpose, on the 18th of August 1819, the Town Council unanimously resolved that "Dr Chalmers should have a separate, independent, and exclusive management and distribution of the funds which may be raised by voluntary or charitable collections at the doors of St John's church, for the relief of the poor resident in said parish"

In St John's, then containing a population of nearly 12,000 souls, who had been, till then, much neglected, he laboured with great zeal and success in the moral and religious education of the poor In carrying out his great design of "excavating the heathen"—one of his own happy and significant phrases—he went boldly to the lanes and alleys of his parish, to compel them "to come in" His aptitude for familiarising himself with those he visited, and disarming prejudice and opposition, is well illustrated by the following incident — Going the round of his visitations, he called one day upon a poor cobbler, who was industriously engaged with awl and ends, fastening sole and upper The cobbler kept fast hold of the shoe between his knees, perforating the stubborn bend, and passing through the bristled ends right and left, scarcely noticing his clerical visitor, but the glance that he gave showed evident recognition, then rosining the fibrous lines, he made them whisk out on either side with increased energy, showing a disinclination to hold any parley "I am," said the Doctor, "visiting my parishioners at present, and am to have a meeting of those resident in this locality, in the vestry of St John's (on a day which he named) when I shall be happy to have your presence along with your neighbours" The shoemaker kept his spine at the suter's angle, and, making the thread rasp with the force of the pull, coolly remarked, "Ay, step your wa's ben to the wife and the weans, as for me, I'm a wee in the deistical line, Doctor' With that intuitive perception of character and tact in addressing himself to the variety of dispositions and characters in society, which distinguished him, he entered into conversation with the cobbler, asking questions about his profession, and the weekly amount of his earnings, sympathising with him on the exceedingly limited amount of his income, compared with the outlay necessary for food, clothing, house rent, &c Then taking up one tool after another, he asked and obtained explanations of their different uses, and, following up the conversation by a chain of moral reasoning, from cause to effect, led the cobbler away from his last, and obtained a patient hearing, which ended in the latter becoming a steady church goer

The church of St John's was soon found to be far too small for the eager crowds anxious to hear him He not only preached twice every Sunday, but once on the week-days His splendid 'Astronomical Discourses,' perhaps the most fascinating of all his works, were part of the fruits of his week-day preachings Though week-day sermons were by no means popular, he was attended by crowds of all ranks and classes, and noblemen jostled with humble tradesmen in the great desire to hear Dr Chalmers The same continued till his last pulpit appearance, wherever and whenever it was known that he was to preach

Among the works published by Dr Chalmers during his residence in Glasgow, were the following 'Thoughts on Universal Peace, a Thanksgiving Sermon,' 1816, 'The Utility of Missions, a Sermon,' 1816, 'A Series of Discourses on the Christian Revelation, viewed in connection with the Modern Astronomy, 1817, 'A Sermon delivered at Glasgow, on November 19th, 1817, the day of the Funeral of the Princess Charlotte,' 'Sermons Preached in the Tron church, Glasgow,' 1819-20, 'The Importance of Civil Government to Society, A Sermon,' 1820, 'The application of Christianity to the Common and Ordinary affairs of Life, in a Series of Discourses,' 1820, 'The Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns,' 2 vols, 1821-1823, 'Sermons Preached on Public Occasions,' 1823, and 'The Evidences of Christian Revelation,' 1824 His works became very popular and sold rapidly, but he preferred devoting himself to his parochial duties, at a time when his writings would have brought him large remunerating prices from the publishers

At the commencement of his ministry at St John's, that he might not be impeded in his philanthropic schemes in that parish, the whole parochial arrangements being on his shoulders, and guided and impelled by him by almost superhuman energy, he had secured the services of the Rev Edward Irving, then a licentiate of the church, as an assistant Mr Irving also assisted him in household visitation

In 1822, he started on a tour through England, in search of information as to the state and prospects of its poor-law administration, on which occasion he again visited London, and had intercourse with Lord Calthorpe, Lord Teignmouth, Mr Wilberforce, Mr Clarkson, Mr Malthus, and others

In 1823, he was elected professor of moral philosophy in the university of St Andrews Attached to a college life, and believing that his greater usefulness consisted in teaching, he now saw his wishes in this respect accomplished, and that in his own alma mater He accepted the chair in preference to a pastoral charge in Edinburgh, to several of which he had been invited He demitted his charge of St John's on the 5th November, and was installed and delivered his introductory lecture at St Andrews, on the 17th of the same month

His professional labours at St Andrews gave an impulse to that ancient seminary which, in some measure, tended, for the time, to restore it to some portion of its former fame, and while he continued there he also delivered a separate course of lectures on political economy as connected with the moral philosophy class But it was a sphere too limited for his usefulness, and by far too narrow for his genius, and a larger field, and higher office soon opened to him in the Scottish metropolis itself, which was destined to become the scene of his greatest triumphs

In 1828 on the divinity chair in the university of Edinburgh becoming vacant, Dr Chalmers was unanimously elected to the professorship, by the magistrates and town council of that city, and he at once accepted the appointment He entered on the duties of his new chair by pronouncing an address of surpassing eloquence and splendour, and, during the fifteen years that he held it, he was eminently successful in his lectures, and has left the impress of his original genius, and vast stores of theological instruction, on the minds of many of the students, who afterwards became ministers of the gospel

Although the theological chair in the university of Edinburgh is considered the highest academical professorship in Scotland, that chair is but poorly endowed in comparison to the corresponding chair in the university of Glasgow, and the latter, in consequence of its being richer, is of more consideration to a man, who like Dr Chalmers, had a family, whose disposition was generous in the extreme, and whose benevolence was unbounded On the professorship of theology, therefore, becoming vacant in the university of Glasgow, he offered himself as a candidate, but the election was vested in the college, and as Chalmers was a leader among the non-intrusionists—that is, those who were opposed to the exercise of patronage in appointments to livings in the church, and an anti-pluralist to boot—he had become obnoxious to the university authorities, and was rejected

In 1829 Dr Chalmers took an active part in favour of the emancipation of the Roman Catholics,—a concession which, there is reason to believe, he lived to regret In 1832 appeared the evidence given by him and the Right Rev J Doyle, before a Select Committee of the House of Commons, on the State of Ireland In that year were also published two of his works, namely, 'On Political Economy in connection with the Moral state and Moral prospects of Society,' and 'The Supreme Importance of a right Moral to a right Economical State of the Community'

His treatise on 'The Power and Wisdom and Goodness of God, as manifested in the adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man,' appeared in 1833 This was one of the celebrated Bridgewater Treatises The Right Hon and Rev Earl of Bridgewater, who died in 1829, left the sum of £8,000, at the disposal of the president of the Royal Society, as a reward to the author of the best treatise on the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God as illustrated in Creation, &c That gentleman took the opinions of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, as well as of a nobleman, a friend of the deceased earl, on the best means of carrying out the bequest, and it was very judiciously resolved that instead of being given to one man, for one work, the money should be allotted to eight different persons for eight separate treatises on separate subjects, though all connected with the same primary theme Dr Chalmers was selected as one of the writers, and in 1833, accordingly, appeared from his pen, in two volumes, the work already mentioned His collected works revised by himself, were published in 1836, in 25 duodecimo volumes His valuable Lectures on St Paul's Epistle to the Romans, were published in 1837

During what was called the great voluntary controversy, Dr Chalmers took a very active and influential part in support of the obligation of civil rulers to provide for the religious instruction of the people, and for the maintenance of a national religion He delivered a series of valuable lectures on the Importance of Church Establishments, which made a great impression at the time He was also the chief promoter of church extension in Scotland For his successful labours in this cause he repeatedly received the thanks of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland In 1838, he was invited to London to deliver a course of lectures on the Establishment and Extension of National Churches, which he did in the Hanover Square rooms, to overflowing audiences Amongst his hearers on this occasion were the Duchess of Kent, the Duke of Cambridge, many of the prelates and clergy of the Church of England, and the most distinguished members of both houses of parliament These lectures were said to be got up at the expense of a nobleman, who desired to strengthen the existing institutions of the country, and were designed principally for the higher classes of society

When he preached in London the Duke of Wellington, the late Earl of Eldon, the Duke of Sussex, with several other members of the royal family, and many among the higher ranks, whom the journalists of the day remarked "they were not accustomed to elbow at a place of public worship," were found among the crowded congregations assembled from all parts to hear him None, indeed, ever enjoyed a larger share of popularity —"that thing," as he expressed it in his own graphic language, "of stare, and pressure, and animal heat"

Dr Chalmers continued to occupy the chair of divinity in the university of Edinburgh, till the disruption took place in the Established Church of Scotland, in May 1843, when, at the head of more than four hundred ministers, he quitted the Establishment, and immediately founded the Free Protesting Church of Scotland As a matter of course, he resigned his chair in the university, and was elected principal and primarius professor of theology to the seceding body Driven by conscience from the walls of the Establishment, he did not relinquish one jot of his Establishment principles, and, indeed, what is called the voluntary doctrine forms no part or portion of the Free Church creed The fundamental doctrine of the Free Church, as distinguished from the Established Church, is that the State, while bound to provide for the interests of religion, and to protect and defend the church, has no right whatever to interfere, and ought not to be allowed to interfere, in things pertaining to the spiritual province of the church, that patronage is a sin and crying grievance, and that no minister should be "intruded" on any parish or congregation contrary to the will of the people Hence the distinctive name, before the disruption, of Intrusionists and Non-Intrusionists These principles are very plain and simple, and yet Dr Chalmers used to complain that he could never get an Englishman to understand them

In the proceedings of the new church, Dr Chalmers took a leading part, and was the principal framer of the scheme of the Sustentation Fund for the support of the clergy In 1845, he retired from the management of the more weighty and important business of the Free Church, and confined his attention almost entirely to what belonged to the new college In his address on the occasion he stated that he had "neither the vigour nor the alertness of former days," that he found his strength sufficient neither for the debates o

the Assembly nor the details of committees or of correspondence, and he therefore resigned "a general care of the church for a more special and intense care of those students who are to the church her future guides and guardians" He planted a church on the territorial system, in the West Port of Edinburgh, in one of the poorest and most destitute localities of Scotland's capital, and in the near vicinity of the spot where Burke and Hare committed their wholesale murders in 1827, and one of his last appearances in an Edinburgh pulpit was on opening that humble and obscure place of worship Three weeks before his death, he was called to London, to give evidence before the committee of the House of Commons on the refusal of certain landholders in Scotland to allow sites for churches on their properties to adherents of the Free Church While in the metropolis on this his last visit, he preached three times to crowded congregations, among whom, as usual, were many of the great and noble of the land, and having finished his testimony, he returned from London on Friday the 28th of May, to his own house at Morningside, about two miles from Edinburgh On the succeeding Sunday he attended public worship, along with the Rev Dr Cunningham, in Morningside Free Church, and at an early hour that evening, he retired to rest in his usual health Next morning, the 31st of May, 1847, he was found dead in his bed "It appeared," says the 'Witness' newspaper, "that he had been sitting erect when overtaken by the stroke of death, and he still retained in part that position The massy head gently reclined on the pillow The arms were folded peacefully on the breast There was a slight air of oppression and heaviness on the brow, but not a wrinkle or a trace of sorrow or pain disturbed its smoothness The countenance wore an attitude of deep repose No conflict had preceded dissolution"

The union in one person of such zeal and eloquence as Dr Chalmers displayed, is exceedingly rare As a preacher the grandeur of his conceptions, the novelty and amplitude of his illustrations, and the graphic force and significancy of his diction, with the irresistible earnestness of his manner, altogether formed such a combination of qualities as is seldom found in modern oratory The celebrated Robert Hall said that Dr Chalmers' preaching "stopped people's breath" The effect he produced, it has been remarked, was like that of the sage in Rasselas—"when he spoke, attention watched his lips, when he reasoned, conviction closed his periods"

His accent and his appearance were both against him The former was broad provincial Scotch, the latter was dull and heavy, and by no means conveyed any idea of the wonderful fertility and energy of his mind In stature he was about the middle height, stout, large-boned, and muscular, but not at all approaching to corpulency His grey eye, which in his ordinary moods had a placid expression, when excited shone with intense brilliancy, his forehead was broad and massy, but not particularly lofty, his step was quick and eager, his accents fast and hurrying, his gesture awkward, and his delivery monotonous, but yet, when roused from his lethargy, when fairly within his subject, these drawbacks were all forgotten in the powerful and rapid stream of his eloquence He usually commenced speaking in an undertone, and it was not until he had gone on for some time that feelings of admiration began to be kindled, at the exhibition of those wondrous powers which made him the first pulpit orator of the age His eloquence, it may be said, did not flow on in a continuous strain He allowed himself and his hearers intervals of repose, during which he uttered nothing very striking But these pauses, like the breathings which ever and anon the wind takes in a tempest, or like the temporary cessation of the thunder when it appears to be collecting all its force for a new explosion, were succeeded by bursts of the most electrifying nature, which perfectly enthralled his hearers Those who never heard him preach can collect from his published discourses no adequate conception of the effect which his pulpit addresses produced on his audiences "His earnest and massive eloquence," says one of his newspaper biographers, "bore down all before it His accents might at first appear uncouth, but all this impression speedily disappeared before a torrent of rapid and brilliant thoughts He seized on his text, turned it over and over in a thousand shapes, showed it in a thousand lights, and never left it till it was written on the hearts of his hearers Even the cool and critical Jeffrey said that there was something remarkable about that man, he reminded him more of what he had read of Cicero and Demosthenes than any orator he had ever heard"

Although a thorough Calvinist, deeply imbued with the theology of the great man whose system he had imbibed, he carefully and faithfully divided the word of truth While he was anxious to point out the only ground of a sinner's acceptance, no one ever urged so earnestly and eloquently the "duties and decencies, and respectabilities and charities of life" Besides the degree of D D which, as already mentioned, he obtained from the university of Glasgow, he received that of LL D from the university of Oxford He was also a corresponding member of the Royal Institute of France, and a fellow of the Royal Society of London He married in 1812, Grace, second daughter of Captain Pratt of the 1st royal veteran battalion This lady survived him He also left six daughters, two of whom were married to Free Church ministers, the one to the Rev Mr Mackenzie of Ratho, and the other to the Rev Dr Hanna, formerly of Skirling, now of Edinburgh, at one time editor of the North British Review, to the pages of which Dr Chalmers himself regularly contributed, and author of the Memoirs of Dr Chalmers, published after his death His third daughter was married in November 1852, to William Wood, Esq, accountant, Edinburgh, son of the late John Philip Wood, Esq, auditor of excise and editor of Douglas' Peerage —His works are

CHAMBERS, a surname supposed to have been originally the same as Chalmers It seems, however, of French origin, being derived from de la Chambre. In the Ragman Roll occur the names of Robert de la Chambre and Symon de la Chambre, as among those barons who swore a forced fealty to Edward the First in 1296, conjectured by Nisbet, without stating any grounds, to have been among the predecessors of Chalmer of Gadgirth in Ayrshire Sir George Mackenzie, in his Genealogical Manuscript of the Families of Scotland, says, "One of the clan Cameron going to France, put his name in a Latin dress, by designing himself Camerario, which in French is de la Chambre, who upon his return to Scotland was, according to our dialect, called Chambers" In the article on Chalmer of Gadgirth we have shown that Camerarius was the undoubted origin of that surname, at a very early period in Scotland [See ante, p 615]

CHAMBERS, DAVID, a Roman Catholic writer, who flourished in the seventeenth century, was the author of a curious work, styled 'Davidis Camerarii Scoti, de Scotorum Fortitudine, Doctrina et Pietate Libri Quatuor,' published at Paris in small 4to in 1631 It contains an account of all the saints connected with Scotland, and is dedicated to Charles the First Scarcely anything is known concerning him

CHANCELLOR, a surname derived from the office of that name, and supposed to have come from France at the Norman conquest with the Somervilles A family of great antiquity named Chancellor have held the lands of Shieldhill and Quothquhan in Lanarkshire for more than four centuries, as appears from a charter of confirmation still extant granted by Thomas Lord Somerville to one of their ancestors, dated 6th March 1434. In the 'Memorie of the Sommervilles,' it is stated that a firm friendship subsisted between the house of Lord Somerville and the family of Chancellor of Shieldhill and Quothquhan as early as the time of Robert the Bruce, in 1317 In July 1474, William Chancellor rode with the rest of the third Lord Somerville's vassals, to meet King James the Third on his way from Edinburgh to Cowthally castle, to partake of the festivity of the "speates and raxes" [See SOMMERVILLE, Lord, post] In 1567, William Chancellor of Shieldhill joined the adherents of Queen Mary at Hamilton, after her escape from Lochleven, and fought for her at the battle of Langside, in consequence of which his mansion-house at Quothquhan was soon afterwards burnt down by a party of horsemen, sent out by the victorious regent Murray to demolish the houses of those who had remained faithful to his unfortunate sister The residence of the family was then removed to Shieldhill, its present site After the battle of Bothwell-bridge, James Chancellor of Shieldhill was imprisoned on suspicion of having harboured some of the fugitive insurgents, but nothing being proved against him he was liberated after some days confinement The same gentleman was returned as elder by the presbytery of Biggar to the first General Assembly which met after the revolution of 1688

Of this name, Chancellor, was a celebrated English navigator, of the sixteenth century, who was the means of establishing the Russian Company

CHAPMAN, a surname evidently derived from trade, as chapman is the old Saxon word for a small trader, a dealer in petty wares, or more properly a pedlar Burns, in the commencement of Tam O'Shanter, says,

> "When Chapman billies leave the street,
> And drouthy neighbours neighbours meet

It was the name of an English poet, who was contemporary with Shakspeare and Spencer

CHAPMAN, or CHEPMAN, WALTER, the first person who introduced printing into Scotland, (about 1507,) is supposed to have held some respectable office in the household of King James the Fourth He was a citizen of wealth and importance, and in his titles is styled Walter Chepman de Everland That his office was not of an ecclesiastical character is proved by the fact that his wife, Agnes Coburn, is mentioned in the same titles, and he consequently was not bound by vows of celibacy His name is frequently mentioned in the Accounts of the Lord High Treasurer of Scotland, inserted in the Appendix to Pitcairn's Criminal Trials On the 21st February 1496 there is the following item "Giffen to a boy to lynne fra Edinburgh to Linlithg to Watte Chepman, to signet twa letteris to pas to Woddis, 12d"

In August 1503, on occasion of the king's marriage, in a list which is titled "Pro Servitoribus," there is an entry "for five elne Inglis claith to Walter Chepman, ilk elne, 34s" "Chepman," says Mr Pitcairn, "was an extensive merchant and burgess of Edinburgh, as well as the earliest Scottish printer" From a grant under the privy seal, dated September 15, 1507, printed in the first volume of Blackwood's Magazine, it appears that it was at the special request of King James that Walter Chepman, and his partner, Andro Millar, also a merchant and burgess, were induced to set up a printing press in Edinburgh, and, for their encouragement, the king conferred upon them the sole privilege of "imprenting within our Realme of the bukis of our Lawis, actis of Parliament, cronicles, mess bukis, and portuus efter the use of our Realme, with addicions and legendis of Scottish sanctis, now gadderit to be eikit thairto, and al utheris bukis that salbe sene neces sar, and to sel the sammyn for competent prices" In the Treasurer's Accounts there is a payment entered under date December 22, 1507, of fifty shillings, for "three prentit bukes to the king, tane fra Andro Millaris wyff" The printing office of Chapman and Millar, the first printers in Scotland, appears to have been in the Cowgate, then called the South gaitt, near to what is now King George the Fourth's Bridge This appears from the imprint on the rare edition of "The Knightly Tale of Golagros and Gawane," and others of the earliest issues from their press in the year 1508

In January 1509, we find Chapman asserting his patent against "Wilyam Frost, Francis Frost, William Sym, Andro Ross, and divers utheris, merchandis within the brugh of Edinburgh," for having infringed it, by importing books into Scotland contrary to the privilege granted to him by the king, and the lords of council accordingly prohibited these parties, and all others, from encroaching on his right in future "It affords evidence," says Wilson, in his Memorials of Edinburgh, (vol i p 30) "of the success that attended the printing press immediately on its introduction, that in the year 1513, Walter Chepman founded a chaplainry at the altar of St John the Evangelist, on the southern side of St Giles' church, and endowed it with an annuity of twenty-three marks" A set of works produced by Chapman and Millar are preserved in the Advocates' library We learn from a passage in the Traditions of Edinburgh, that Walter Chapman, on 12th August 1528, founded another chaplainry at the altar in the chapel of Holyrood, in the Nether Kirkyard of St Giles', and endowed it with his tenement in the Cowgate The year of his death is not known, but there is good reason for believing that he was interred in the south transept of St Giles' church

A list of the works printed by Chapman and Millar, some of which are very rare, will be found in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica

CHAPMAN, GEORGE, LL D, author of some educational works, was born at the farm of Little Blacktown, in the parish of Alvah, Banffshire, in August 1723 At King's college, Aberdeen, he obtained a bursary by competition, which enabled him to study there for four seasons He was afterwards appointed master of the parish school of Alvah In 1747 he became assistant in Mr John Love's school in Dalkeith In 1751 he removed to Dumfries as joint-master of the grammar school there, in which situation he continued for twenty years Having acquired some wealth, he was induced, from the increase in the number of pupils who boarded in his house, to relinquish the school, but finding that his success in this line injured the prospects of his successor, he generously gave up his boarding school, quitted Dumfries and went to reside on his native farm in Banffshire, where he kept a small academy Being invited by the magistrates of Banff to superintend the grammar school of that town, he converted it into an academy He finally removed to Edinburgh, where, for some years, he carried on business as a printer His treatise on Education appeared in 1782 He also published some smaller works on the same subject Dr Chapman died February 22, 1806 —His works are

CHARTERIS, the surname of an Anglo-Norman family which, says Douglas in his Baronage, "is of great antiquity in Scotland, and it is the opinion of some antiquaries that they are of French extraction, that William a son of the earl of Chartres in France, came to England with William the Conqueror, that a son or grandson of his came to Scotland with King David the First, and was progenitor of all of the surname of Charteris in this kingdom, and certain it is they began to make a figure in the south of Scotland soon after that era"

The immediate ancestor of the family of Charteris of Amisfield, (anciently Emsfield and sometimes Hempisfield,) in Dumfries-shire, was Robert de Charteris, who flourished in the reigns of King Malcolm the Fourth and King William the Lion In a charter of confirmation by the latter to the monastery of Kelso, Robert de Charteris is one of the witnesses It has no date, but as Ingelram bishop of Glasgow, another of the witnesses, died in 1174, it must have been granted in or before that year His son, Walter de Charteris, is mentioned in a donation to the monastery of Kelso, and also the son of the latter, Thomas de Charteris, who lived in the reign of King Alexander the Second His son, Sir Robert de Charteris, made a donation to the same monastery of the patronages of two churches in Dumfries-shire, by a charter, in which he is designed Robert de Cornoto, miles It is to be observed that in ancient charters the family name is often thus Latinized, but when Englished it is invariably called Charteris

The son of this Sir Robert, Sir Thomas de Charteris, was in 1280 appointed lord high chancellor of Scotland by King Alexander the Third, and seems to have been the first layman who held that office He was also, with Sir Patrick de Graham, Sir William St Clair, and Sir John Soulis, nominated on an embassy extraordinary to the court of France, to negociate the king's marriage which important negociation they quickly accomplished, but King Alexander's untimely death soon after prevented the good effects of it Sir Thomas died in 1290 His son, Andrew de Charteris, was among the barons of Scotland who were compelled, in 1296, to make submission to Edward the First of England, but he soon retracted what he had done, for which he was forfeited the same year, and his lands of Amisfield bestowed on an Englishman Several others of the name who had possessions in different counties, were also at the same time forced to swear allegiance to the English king, as William de Charteris, Robert de Charteris, and Osborn de Charteris

Andrew's son, William de Charteris, did homage to King Edward in 1304, for his lands in Dumfries-shire, but he took the first opportunity of joining the party of Bruce and was one of those patriotic barons who attended the latter at Dumfries when Comyn was slain in 1306 With Walter de Percys he resigned the half of their barony of Wilton in Roxburghshire, in favour of Henry de Wardlaw He died about 1330 His son, Sir Thomas Charteris of Amisfield, was a most faithful subject of David the Second In 1335, when that monarch was in France, he was, by the estates of the kingdom, appointed one of the ambassadors extraordinary to the court of England, and, 20th March 1341, he was again sent on another embassy to treat with the English After King David's return to Scotland, he appointed him, in 1342, lord high chancellor He was killed in 1346 at the battle of Durham, where his royal master was taken prisoner

His descendant in the sixth generation, John Charteris of Amisfield, married Janet, a daughter of Sir James Douglas of Drumlanrig, ancestor of the dukes of Queensberry Between the families of Amisfield and Kilpatrick of Kirkmichael there were constant feuds In Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i, under date March 19 and 20, 1526, John Charteris of Amisfield, Robert and John his sons, Robert Charteris his brother and thirty-nine others, found caution to underlie the law on May 29, in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, for the slaughter of Roger Kilpatrick son and heir of Sir Alexander Kilpatrick of Kirkmichael, knight, and for the mutilation of the latter, and on the 24th of the same month, Sir Alexander Kilpatrick and his sons, Robert, John, and William, found caution to appear the same day to answer for all crimes to be imputed against them by John Charteris of Amisfield He also became security for the entry of William Kilpatrick his brother, the two sons of the latter, and twenty-three others the same day

His son, Sir John Charteris of Amisfield, held, in the reign of James the Fifth, the office of warden of the west marches, one of the most important under the crown, and appears, from various charters, to have possessed an immense estate which is said to have been much reduced from the following circumstance, according to a traditionary story narrated in 'Forsyth's Beauties of Scotland,' vol ii page 312 King James the Fifth being at Stirling, previous to setting out on a progress to the borders for the redress of grievances, received a complaint from an old woman, a widow, who lived on the water of Annan, that in a recent incursion of the English into the district, her only son and two cows, her whole support and comfort on earth, had been carried off, and that Sir John Charteris of Amisfield, warden of the west marches, on being informed of the outrage, and that the marauders were only a few miles distant, not only refused to pursue them, but also treated her with rudeness and contempt The king told her he should shortly be in Annandale, and would attend to the matter When he arrived at the head of Nithsdale he left his attendants, and went forward in disguise to the castle of Amisfield He requested the porter to tell the warden that he came express to inform him of an inroad of the English The porter, unwilling to disturb his master said he had gone to dinner, but the king, bribing him first with one silver groat, and then with two, prevailed upon him to convey two messages to Sir John, the latter being that the general safety depended on his immediately firing the beacons and alarming the country On this second message, Sir John, in a rage, threatened to punish the intruder, when the king bribed another servant to inform Sir John that the goodman of Ballangeigh had waited a considerable time at his gate for admittance, but in vain, and throwing off his disguise, he sounded his bugle horn for his attendants Sir John, in great alarm, hastened to meet his sovereign, who reprimanded him for neglect of his duty, and commanded him to pay the widow her loss tenfold, adding that if her son was not ran-somed within ten days, he (Sir John) should be hanged And, as a further token of his displeasure, he billeted upon him his whole retinue, in number two thousand knights and barons, and obliged him to find them in provender during their stay in Annandale

In 1581 the son of this baron, Sir John Charteris (or Charterhouse, as it was sometimes spelled), as cautioner for George Douglas of Parkhead, was "unlawit in the pane of ane hundreth poundis," for the non-appearance of the latter to take his trial for high treason, in not delivering up the castle tower and fortalice of Torthorwald to Robert Maxwell, messenger, sheriff in that part, &c On December 22, 1593, a commission was granted to William Lord Herries and nine others, among whom appears the name of "John Charterhous of Amysfield," for the preservation of the peace of the west borders, on account of the rebellion of Sir James Johnston of Dunskellie and others of his name By his wife Lady Margaret Fleming, daughter of John earl of Wigton, he had a son, Sir John Charteris, who succeeded him At the parliament held at Edinburgh, 15th July 1641, Sir John Charteris of 'Emisfield' was present as commissioner for Dumfries-shire, and on 16th November of that year, he was appointed one of the commissioners of parliament for confirming the Ripon treaty He was an active loyalist, and suffered many hardships on account of his attachment to Charles the First In April 1646, he was cited before the parliament, and obliged to find security for his good behaviour, nevertheless sentence of banishment was immediately thereafter passed against him Having been engaged with the marquis of Montrose, he was apprehended and imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh His brother, Captain Alexander Charteris was one of five of Montrose's most distinguished officers who, after that nobleman's execution, were beheaded by the Maiden at Edinburgh, having been with him when he appeared in arms in Caithness in 1650 Captain Charteris was the last who suffered, and his death excited great regret "He was,' says Browne, "a man of a determined mind, but his health being much impaired by wounds which he had received, he had not firmness to resist the importunities of his friends, who, as a means of saving his life, as they thought, prevailed upon him to agree to make a public declaration of his errors This unhappy man, accordingly, when on the scaffold, read a long speech, which had been prepared for him by the ministers, penned in a peculiarly mournful strain, in which he lamented his apostasy from the covenant, and acknowledged other things which he had vented to them (namely, the ministers) in auricular confession! Yet notwithstanding the expectations which he and his friends were led to entertain that his life might be spared, he had no sooner finished his speech than he was despatched" [History of the Highlands, vol ii page 50] Sir John Charteris married Lady Catherine Crichton, daughter of William, earl of Dumfries, by whom he had two sons, Thomas his heir, and John, father of the notorious Colonel Francis Charteris On the death of his uncle Thomas without male issue, Colonel Charteris became undoubted male representative of the ancient family of Amisfield, but the estate went to his cousin Elizabeth, only child and sole heiress of his uncle She married John Hogg, Esq, and her son, Thomas Hogg, assumed the name of Charteris as heir to his mother, and was ancestor to the present family of Amisfield in Dumfries-shire Colonel Charteris having purchased the lands of Newmills near Haddington, changed the name to Amisfield, from the ancient seat of his forefathers in Nithsdale He married Helen, daughter of Alexander Swinton, a lord of session, under the title of Lord Mersington, and by her had an only daughter, Janet, his sole heiress, who married James, fourth earl of Wemyss, and her second son, the Hon Francis Wemyss, afterwards fifth earl of Wemyss, inherited the estates of his maternal grandfather, and in consequence assumed the name and arms of Charteris. [See WEMYSS, Earl of, post] Arbuthnott's epitaph on Colonel Charteris, who acquired a vast fortune by usury and other vices, has been much admired as a complete and masterly composition of its kind It is as follows "Here continueth to rot, the body of Francis Charteris, who with an inflexible constancy and immitable uniformity of life, persisted, in spite of age and infirmities, in the practice of every human vice, excepting prodigality and hypocrisy, his insatiable avarice exempted him from the first, his matchless impudence from the second Nor was he more singular in the undeviating pravity of his manners than successful in accumulating wealth, for, without trade or profession, without trust of public money, and without bribe-worthy service, he acquired, or more properly created, a ministerial estate He was the only person of his time who could cheat without the mask of honesty, retain his primeval meanness when possessed of ten thousand a year, and having daily deserved the gibbet for what he did, was at last condemned to it for what he could not do Oh indignant reader! Think not his life useless to mankind! Providence connived at his execrable designs, to give to after ages a conspicuous proof and example of how small estimation is exorbitant wealth in the sight of God, by his bestowing it on the most unworthy of all mortals" In Pope's Works, vol ii p 142, the following paragraph appears "Francis Chartres, a man infamous for all manner of vices When he was an ensign in the army, he was drummed out of the regiment for a cheat, he was next banished to Brussels, and drummed out of Ghent on the same account After a hundred tricks at the gaming tables, he took to lending of money at exorbitant interest and on great penalties, accumulating premium, interest, and capital into a new capital, and seizing to a minute when the payments became due, in a word, by a constant attention to the vices, wants, and follies of mankind, he acquired an immense fortune He was twice condemned for rapes, and pardoned, but the last time not without imprisonment in Newgate, and large confiscations He died in Scotland in 1731, [at Stoneyhill near Musselburgh, in February 1732 in the fifty-seventh year of his age] The populace at his funeral raised a great riot, almost tore the body out of the coffin, and cast dead dogs, &c, into the grave along with it" As Colonel Charteris' character, it is remarked in another place, was singular in every other respect, so it is said to have been in this, that he was a coward who had his fighting days He would suffer himself to be banged and basketed for refusing a challenge one day, and on the next he would accept another, and kill his man [Blog Brit Kippis' edit vol i page 240]

The founder of the old family of Charteris of Kinfauns in Perthshire,—which disputed the chieftainship with the family of Amisfield in Dumfries-shire,—is said by tradition to have been Thomas de Chartres, commonly called Thomas de Longueville, a Frenchman of an ancient family, who having killed a nobleman at the court of Philip le Bel, in the end of the thirteenth century, turned pirate, under the name of the Red Reaver, and was encountered and made prisoner by Sir Wilhem Wallace on his supposed voyage to France, in 1301 or 1302, and, after being pardoned and knighted by his own sovereign, accompanied Wallace to Scotland, and fought against the English, first under his banner and afterwards under that of Bruce, who, as a reward for his bravery, con ferred upon him the lands of Kinfauns, in the neighbourhood of Perth, as an evidence of which a double-handed sword, called the sword of Charteris, is professed still to be shown in the modern castle of Kinfauns! In every account of the origin of the Perthshire house of Charteris we find the same story told, but we think it extremely improbable It is more likely that that family was a branch of the family of Charteris in Dumfries-shire, as the name had become much extended in Scotland at that period, and that the Sir Patrick Charteris, who was present with the earl Marshal and Lord Crawford at the conflict of the clan Chattan and the clan Kay, on the North Inch of Perth, in 1396, was a direct descendant of the founder of the house of Amisfield

In the fifteenth century and beginning of the sixteenth, the family of Kinfauns was one of great influence in Perthshire In 1465, Andrew Charteris of Kinfauns was provost of Perth and continued to be so till 1471, inclusive He again filled the office in 1473 and 1475 In the latter year one Gilbert Charteris, who was afterwards dean of guild, was one of the bailies In 1484 Andrew Charteris was again provost, and at various times thereafter till 1503, which appears to have been the last time he held the office In 1507 John Charteris was provost, and also in 1509 Others of the name frequently held situations in the magistracy of that city In 1529 William Lord Ruthven was elected provost, the first of his family that ever filled the office, there could thus, up to that time, be nothing hereditary in his occupancy of the provostship, as is commonly believed Between the Kinfauns family and the Ruthvens a rivalry and feud seem to have existed, which, on several remarkable occasions, led to fatal results On 25th February that year, Patrick Charteris of Cuthilgurdy, a near kinsman of the laird of Kinfauns and who had been provost of Perth, from 1521 to 1525, both inclusive and in 1525, and again in 1527 provost and sheriff, found Robert Mauk of Pannure as his cautioner that he would underlie the law for art and part of the fire raising and burning of the village of Cowsland, and for the plunder of certain cattle and other goods, from the tenants thereof, and from William Lord Ruthven, and on 28th of the same month, John Charteris his brother, and eleven others found security to answer for the same crime On September 20, 1530, Patrick Charteris of Cuthilgurdy received a letter of licence to pass in pilgrimage beyond the seas On 30th September 1538, John Charteris of Kinfauns was elected provost of Perth, but he seems to have died soon thereafter as on June 13, 1539, we find Thomas Charteris of Kinfauns, convicted of art and part using a forged acquittance or discharge of a certain large sum of money assigned by the king to James Ross, his servant, due to his majesty by the death of Alexander bishop of Moray, as his heir, or granted to the king by the privilege of the pope He was sentenced to be warded in Edinburgh castle during the king's pleasure, and all his moveables to be escheated but by petitioning the lords of privy council he was admitted to 'free ward, on finding security that he would not attempt to escape [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials]

On August 1st 1543, the regent Arran issued an order to the provost, bailies, and community of Perth, charging them to obey John Charteris of Cuthilgurdy and Thomas Charteris of Kinfauns in all votes, in preference to letters already issued in favour of Lord Ruthven, and on 1st October following, John Charteris was elected provost On 26th January succeeding he was, however, by the regent and lords of secret council discharged of the office, and on 15th April a proclamation by the queen appointed against the said Thomas and John Charteris, and their accomplices to the number of eighty, denouncing them rebels, and commanding them to be apprehended On 7th October the same year (1544) Patrick, Lord Ruthven, was elected provost of Perth, and in the following January, on Cardinal Bethune's persecuting visit to that city with the regent Arran, he instigated the latter to turn Lord Ruthven out of the provostship, and restore John Charteris of Kinfauns to that office The citizens refused to acknowledge Charteris for their provost, and would not allow him to enter the town He therefore applied to Lord Gray, to whom he was allied, and persuaded him, and Norman Leslie, and others of his friends, to assist him with their armed forces, in attacking the town The master of Ruthven, aided by the laird of Moncrieff and the citizens, resolved to defend it at all hazards Lord Gray was to enter the town from the bridge, while Norman Leslie was to bring up ammunition and ordnance by water to storm it on its open side, but the tide was against him, and he did not arrive in time The former finding the bridge undefended, marched up into the town as far as the Fishgate, when he was encountered by the master of Ruthven, who routed and repulsed his party, about sixty of whom were slain The Ruthvens ever after had possession of the provostship till May 1584, when William, earl of Gowrie, then provost, was executed at Stirling In 1552, John Charteris of Kinclaven, in Perthshire, was killed by the master of Ruthven, on the High Street of Edinburgh, 'upon occasion,' says Bishop Lesly, "of old feud, and for staying of a decret of ane proces, which the said John pursued against him before the Lords of Session" [Bishop Leslie's History, p 247] This led to the passing of an act by the following parliament, that whosoever should slay a man for pursuing an action against him, should forfeit the right of judgment in his action, in addition to his liability to the laws for the crime

On the 29th of May 1559, when the queen regent entered Perth with her French troops, Lord Ruthven, then provost, was dismissed, with the rest of the magistracy, and John Charteris of Kinfauns, who was not only no friend to the Reformers, but entertained a hostile feeling to the citizens ever since 1544 was appointed provost in his place He was the queen's tool in fining, imprisoning, and banishing the inhabitants, but his reign was short, lasting only till the 26th of June, when Perth capitulated to the Reformers

The family of Kinfauns appear also to have been at feud with the Blins of Balthayock On May 2, 1562, John Charteris of Kinfauns, with David, his brother, and thirty nine others, found surety to take them trial on the 15th of that month for attacking Thomas Blin of Balthayock and his followers, and giving them injurious words He protested that the finding of the security should be no prejudice to him because he was a parish-clerk, that is, that as a churchman he was liable only to the jurisdiction of the church courts Thomas Blair, on his part, and sundry of his friends, also found security to underlie the law, for the slaughter of Alexander Rae, in the feud with the laird of Kinfauns Owing to the loss of a scroll-book the result of these cases is unknown [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials]

In 1537 one Andrew Charteris, a brother of the provost of Dundee, a friar, fled out of Scotland to England, where he stayed a year, and thereafter retired to Germany, where he cast off his cowl After residing at Wittenberg for twelve months he went to Antwerp, and was robbed by the way, but was relieved by some of his countrymen when he arrived at the latter town Thence he went to Zealand, and in a letter still extant to his brother, the provost, he inveighed vehemently against the whole Roman Catholic hierarchy, bishops, priests, abbots and monks,

"Black friars and grey,
With all their trumpery"

He was a man of a ready genius and goodly appearance, so much so that King Henry said to him, after he had talked with him an hour, "It is a pity that ever you were a friar" [Calderwood's History, vol i p 113]

An eminent printer and bookseller, in the Scottish capital in the sixteenth century, was Henry Charteris, who published Sir David Lindsay's works in 1568 He mentions that he was present at the performance of Sir David's 'Pleasant Satyre of the Three Estaitis," when it was "playit besyde Edinburgh in 1514, in presence of the Quene Regent," and that he sat patiently for nine hours on the bank at Greenside to witness it In 1589, he was one of thirteen commissioners appointed by a convention of noblemen, ministers, burgesses, &c, held at Edinburgh, to meet weekly to consult as to the defence of the reformed religion, and in 1596, the Confession of Faith was printed by him in folio In 1604 his name appears among those members of the Edinburgh presbytery who subscribed it of new

His son, Mr Henry Charteris, was educated for the church, and about 1590 he became one of the regents in the university of Edinburgh On the death of Principal Rollock, 8th January 1599, he was senior regent, and on 14th February following he was appointed principal in his place, and professor of divinity in the university He held these offices for twenty-one years Although an eminent scholar, he was a man of singular modesty, for in 1617, says Bower, when he arrived at the honour of being principal and professor of divinity, he declined presiding at the disputation which was held in the presence of the king at Stirling He was the author of the only Greek epitaph, among twenty-eight, on Principal Rollock, and of two others in Latin His father was probably king's printer and printer to the university, and was for a very considerable time in the magistracy, but does not seem to have lived to see his son so honourably distinguished as he became In 1620 he accepted the parochial charge of North Leith, on which he resigned the principalship and the divinity chair, but in 1626 he was restored to the latter He died two years afterwards in the sixty-third year of his age

CHEYNE, formerly written Cheim and Chien, a surname of great antiquity in Scotland Sir Reginald le Chein, (nephew of John Comyn, lord of Badenoch, who was killed by Bruce at Dumfries in 1305,) was great chamberlain of Scotland from 1267 to 1269 He was baron of Inverugie, Strabrock, &c in Aberdeenshire, where, as well as in Caithness-shire, he had immense estates In 1285, he gave the lands of Ardlogy and Leuchendy, in the parish of Fyvie, in the former county, to the priory of Fyvie, in connection with the abbey of Arbroath He is generally styled puter, to distinguish him from his son of the same name Sir Reginald was one of the Magnates Scotiæ, who concurred in settling the succession to the crown on Margaret of Norway, grand-daughter of Alexander the Third, in 1284 He was also one of the barons who in 1289 addressed Edward the First of England, on the subject of a marriage between the young queen of Scots and his son the prince of Wales, with the view of uniting the kingdoms He made his submission to the English monarch at Aberdeen, on 17th July 1296, and his name, as well as that of Reginaldus le Chein, filius, is found in the Ragman Roll

His brother, Henry le Cheyn, was bishop of Aberdeen, from 1281 to 1333, (although according to Boece and other writers he died in 1329) The house of the Carmelite friars in Aberdeen had been built and endowed by his father, Reginald le Cheyn, who, besides other revenues, bestowed upon it two pounds yearly out of the lands of Blackwater in the parish of St Fergus, Aberdeenshire, which entirely belonged to him Henry, like his brother and nephew, swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296, and on Bruce's asserting his right to the throne, he was obliged for a time to retire into England, but was permitted by King Robert, after being settled on the throne, to return to his see, when, according to tradition, he applied all the rents of his bishopric, which, during his absence had accumulated to a considerable amount, in building the fine old Gothic bridge with one arch, over the river Don, (the celebrated Brig of Balgownie,) near Aberdeen It is probable that if he had any concern in the bridge at all, it was at the command of King Robert Bruce that he thus devoted the unapplied rents of his see to such a purpose In the account of the bishop in Boece's Lives, there is no mention made of such a work, while the distinct assertion in the charter of Sir Alexander Hay, who bequeathed, in 1605, an annual sum of two pounds, five shillings, and eightpence, for the support of this bridge, that certain annals testified that it was erected by the order and at the expense of King Robert, is a fair proof that the structure was the work of that monarch, and not of the prelate, who had rendered to his authority an unwilling obedience, and to whom it has ever been popularly imputed

The above-named Sir Reginald le Chein, chamberlain, was succeeded by his son, who, as already stated, bore the same name Nisbet mentions a charter without a date, granted "by Reynald Chein, son of Reynald, of the lands of Dury, which he disponed to Gilbert, son of Robert of Strathern, and which charter was afterwards confirmed by Adam of Kilconchaugh, earl of Carrick, and after that, King Robert the Bruce gives the lands of Dummany, which formerly belonged to Rodger Moubray, to Sir Reginald Chein, as that king's charter bears" Sir Reginald, the son, was taken prisoner at the battle of Halidonhill in 1333, and died, without male issue, in 1350 He had two daughters, Mariota and Mary Of these the following story is related Sir Reginald, who possessed more than a third of Caithness including the district which now forms the parish of Wick is still famous in the Highland districts as a mighty hunter under the name of Morar na Shien He was most anxious for a son to heir his vast estates, and when his wife, Mary, brought him a daughter, in a paroxysm of fury he ordered the child to be destroyed It was, however, conveyed away, and a subsequent daughter escaped, in a similar manner, the rage of the twice disappointed chief Years rolled on, and Morar na Shien often lamented his childless condition At length, on some public occasion, a great festival was held, at which Sir Reginald noticed two young ladies, who far outshone the rest of the company He expressed his admiration, and lamented to his wife his cruel infatuation, which had led him to order the death of his daughters, who, had they been allowed to live, would have been about the age of these peerless beauties Mary de Cheyne hastened to confess her justifiable disobedience to her husband's orders, and introduced the young ladies to him as his own daughters Overpowered with joy, Sir Reginald de Cheyne acknowledged them as his, and constituted them heiresses of his extensive possessions Mariota, the elder daughter, married, first, Sir John Douglas, and after his death, without issue, John de Keith, of Ravens Craig, second son of Sir Edward Keith, great marischal of Scotland, and with her the estate of Inverugie passed into the Keith family They had a son, Andrew, who became possessed, in right of his mother, of the lands of Ackergill and other estates in Caithness-shire The descendants of this marriage continued a separate branch of the Keiths for seven or eight generations Mary or Marjory, the younger, was heiress of Duffus, and married Nicol Sutherland, second son of Kenneth, third earl of Sutherland, who fell at the battle of Halidonhill in 1333, and with her obtained the barony of Duffus in the county of Elgin [see DUFFUS, lord] In consequence he added the arms of Cheyne to his paternal coat of Sutherland

From the Cheynes of Inverugie descended several very considerable families, as the Cheynes of Arnage, Esselmont, Straloch, Dundarg, Pitfitchie, &c Most of these are now extinct in the male line The last of the family of Arnage was the learned James Cheyne (Jacobus Cheynæus ab Arnage), professor at Douay of whom a notice follows

A son of Cheyne of Inverugie married the heiress of Marshal of Esselmont, and with her got the lands of that name, on account of which the family quartered the arms of Marshal with their own From this family was descended the eminent physician, Dr George Cheyne, of whom also a notice follows

Christian Cheyne, a daughter of Cheyne of Straloch, married Sir Alexander Seton of Seton, ancestor of the earls of Winton, and governor of Berwick, whose son, Thomas, was hanged by Edward the Third of England, in July 1333, because his father would not deliver up the town of Berwick to him, before the time agreed upon, he being then a hostage in his hands

This name was, by Charles the Second, ennobled in the peerage of Scotland, the title of Viscount Newhaven, Lord Cheyne, having been in 1681 conferred on Charles Cheyne of Chelsea, in the county of Middlesex [See NEWHAVEN, Viscount]

CHEYNE, JAMES, rector of the Scots college at Douay, was born in Aberdeenshire in the sixteenth century He was of the ancient family of Arnage in that county After studying at Aberdeen, he went to Paris, and taught philosophy at the college of St Barbe, from whence he removed to Douay, and, after teaching there with great reputation, became the head of the seminary He was also canon and great penitentiary of the cathedral of Tournay, and died in 1602 His works are

CHEYNE, GEORGE, a physician and medical writer of considerable eminence in his day, was born in 1671, at Auchencrieve, parish of Methlick, Aberdeenshire, and educated at Edinburgh under the celebrated Dr Pitcairn, whom, in the preface to one of his works, he styles his "grand master and generous friend" After taking the degree of M D, he repaired, about the thirtieth year of his age, to London He had passed his youth in close study and great abstemiousness, but after going to the metropolis, finding it necessary to frequent taverns in order to get into practice, and indulging in habits of excess, he grew fat, short-breathed, lethargic, and listless, and swelled to such an enormous size, that he at one time exceeded thirty-two stones in weight Having tried medicine in vain, he next retired to the country, and lived very low This proving ineffectual, he went to Bath, and drank the waters, but without permanent relief On his return to London he had recourse to a milk and vegetable diet, which removed his complaints His bulk was reduced to almost one-third, he recovered his strength, activity and cheerfulness, with the free and perfect use of his faculties, and, by regular observance of this regimen, he reached a good old age It was his custom to practise in London in winter, and in Bath in summer He died at the latter place April 12, 1743, in his 72d year Besides his medical publications, he was the author of 'Philosophical Principles of Natural Religion,' published in 1705, at which time he was a fellow of the Royal Society, and dedicated to the earl of Roxburgh, at whose request, and for whose use, it was written, and also of a work on Fluxions, which was replied to by the celebrated French mathematician Abraham de Moivre, and regarding which he himself in after life said that it was conceived in ambition and brought forth in vanity —Dr Cheyne's works are

CHISHOLM, a surname derived from the Norman French chese, to choose, and the Saxon holme The family who first bore it in Scotland possessed lands in Roxburghshire and Berwickshire so early as the reign of Alexander III The chief of the name was Chisholme of Chisholme in the former county, of whom Chisholme, now of Stitches, also in Roxburghshire, is the direct heir male and representative In the Ragman Roll appear the names of Richard de Cheseholme, counte de Rokesbrugh, and his son John de Cheseholme, afterwards Sir John de Chesholme, who married in 1335, Ann, dr of Sir Robert Lauder of Quarrelwood, Nairnshire and constable of the royal castle of Urquhart, Invernessshire In 1346, his son, Sir Robert de Chescholme was taken prisoner with David II, at the battle of Durham In 1359 he succeeded his father-in-law as constable of Urquhart castle, and died in 1372 His eldest son, John succeeded to the border estate and the lands of Quarrelwood in Nairnshire, while his second son, Alexander, married Margaret de la Ard, heiress of Erchless, and founded the family of Erchless and Strathglass, in Inverness-shire He is mentioned in a deed of date 1368 as compositioner, along with Lord Fenton, in the barony of Ard, and was succeeded by his son, Thomas, as appears by an indenture, dated 1403, entered into between William de Fenton of Baky on the one part, and Margaret de la Ard, domina de Erchless, and Thomas de Chisholme, her son and heir, on the other part Thus Thomas died without issue His brother, Alexander, who succeeded him, had only daughters, who conveyed the estate into other families by marriage, and so the family of Chisholme of Strathglass came to an end William, the third son, was treasurer of Moray John, the eldest son, had three sons John, Robert, who succeeded John, and Edmund founder of the house of Cromlix, after mentioned John's only daughter, Morella, married Alexander Sutherland of Duffus, who got with her Quarrelwood and other lands in Nairnshire Robert's great-grandson, John Chisholme, tenth of that ilk, forfeited the estate during the minority of James V, but in 1531, it was restored to his brother George, by Douglas of Drumlanrig, to whom it had been granted His son, Walter, is styled baron of Chisholme in the parliamentarian roll of chieftains, anno 1587 He was succeeded, in 1589, by his eldest son, Walter, whose son, also named Walter, a minor on his father's death, married a lady named Stirling, against the will of his guardian and feudal superior, Douglas of Drumlanrig As the lands held from the latter by the old feudal tenure of ward of marriage, he became liable in a fine of 5,600 merks Scots, and failing to pay it the estates were attached and lost to the family He had two sons, Walter and William The former acquired the estate of Stitches from Thomas Scott of Whitslade in 1660 His eldest son, William, the second of Stitches, was succeeded by his eldest son, John (died in 1755), whose son, also named John, was succeeded in 1794, by his third son, Gilbert, the elder two having predeceased him By his second wife, Elizabeth, second daughter of John Scott, Esq of Whitehaugh, Gilbert had two sons and two daughters, and died in 1820 The eldest son, John Chisholme, the sixth of Stitches and twentieth in descent from Richard de Chisholm, married in 1840, Margaret, eldest daughter and coheiress of Robert Walker, Esq of Mumrills, Stirlingshire, with issue On succeeding, in 1852, to the lands of Whitehaugh, he assumed the name of Scott Chisholme

The old family estate of Chisholme was purchased, about 1784, by William Chisholme, a great-grandson of Walter the first of Stitches, from Sir James Stewart of Coltness, and on the death of his son, Charles, without issue, it fell to his cousin, Scott of Coldhouse, who also assumed the name of Scott Chisholme

The modern clan CHISHOLM in Inverness-shire, though claiming to be of Celtic origin, are, it is probable, descended from one of the northern collaterals of the original family of Chisholme of Chisholme in Roxburghshire, and cannot be traced further back than the reign of James IV, when a Wiland de Chesholm obtained a charter of the lands of Comer dated 9th April 1513 At a later period they obtained a gift of the lands of Erchless and others In 1587, the chiefs on whose lands resided "broken men," were called upon to give security for their peaceable behaviour, among whom appears "Chesholme of Cummer" After the battle of Killiecrankie, in 1689, Erchless castle, the seat of the chief, was garrisoned for King James, and General Livingstone, the commander of the government forces, had considerable difficulty in dislodging the Highlanders In 1715, Ruari or Roderick MacIan, the chief, signed the address of a hundred and two chiefs and heads of houses to George the First, expressive of their attachment and loyalty, but no notice being taken of it, he engaged very actively in the rising under the earl of Mar, and at the battle of Dunblane, the clan was headed by Chisholm of Crocfin, an aged veteran for which the estates of the chief were forfeited and sold In 1727, he procured, with several other chiefs, a pardon under the privy seal, and the lands were subsequently conveyed, by the then proprietor, to Roderick's eldest son, who entailed them on his heirs male In 1745, this chief joined the standard of the Pretender with his clan, and Colin, his youngest son was appointed colonel of the clan battalion Lord President Forbes thus states the strength of the Chisholms at that period "Chisholms — Their chief is Chisholm of Strathglass, in Gaelic called Chrsalloch His lands are held of the crown, and he can bring out two hundred men" At the battle of Culloden, William Chisholm, a near kinsman of the chief, was flag-bearer of the clan He fought long and manfully, and even after the retreat had become general, he rallied and led his clansmen again and again to the charge A body of the Chisholms ultimately sought shelter in a barn, which was soon surrounded by hundreds of the soldiers of the royal army, but William Chisholm cut his way through them until he was shot by some Englishmen His widow, Christiana Fergusson, a native of the parish of Contin Ross-shire, where her father was a blacksmith, composed a beautiful lament for him in Gaelic, 'Cumha do dh' Uilleam Siseal,' which is still popular in the Highlands One of the seven outlaws who sheltered Prince Charles in a cave in the Braes of Glenmoriston, during his wanderings after the battle of Culloden, was a Chisholm, who, with another of the men named Grant, safely conveyed him to the coast of Arisaig, resisting the temptation of thirty thousand pounds offered for his capture From this man, Hugh Chisholm, who afterwards resided for many years in Edinburgh, Mr Home obtained some of his information for his account of the Rebellion Sir Walter Scott knew him personally, and in his Tales of a Grandfather gives some interesting details respecting him, but too long for insertion here besides being somewhat inflated, and probably in part apocryphal

Alexander Chisholm, chief of the clan, who succeeded in 1785, left an only child, Mary, married to James Gooden Esq, London, and dying in 1793, the chiefship and estates, agreeably to the deed of entail, devolved on his youngest brother, William, who married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Duncan MacDonnell, Esq of Glengarry, and left two sons and one daughter On his death in 1817 he was succeeded by the elder son, Alexander William, once member of parliament for Inverness-shire, who died, prematurely, in September 1838, and of whose amiable life an interesting memoir has been published "His eminent classical and scientific attainments," says the writer of the account of the parish of Kilmorack, in the Statistical Account of Scotland, "graced and sanctified by his unostentatious and unfeigned piety rendered him peculiarly fitted for the honourable situation of representative of his native county in parliament To that situation he was called at an early period of his life, but death cut short his career almost in its commencement" He was succeeded by his brother, Duncan MacDonnell Chisholm, who died in London 14th September 1858, aged 47, when the estate devolved on the descendants of Archibald Chisholm, eldest son of Chisholm of Muckrath

The prefix 'The' is employed occasionally and appropriately by the chiefs of clans who use the name Mac or Magnus, as The Macnab, The MacGregor, meaning the chiefs of the clans Nab and Gregor It is also used in the same sense by the head of an Irish family, viz "The O Connor Don," the Spanish adjunct Don, Dominus, or lord, having the same meaning "The Chisholm" is the only instance of its use without the accompanying term of headship An old chief of the clan Chisholm once not very modestly said that there were but three persons in the world entitled to it—'the pope, the king, and the Chisholm'

One of the chiefs of this clan having carried off a daughter of Lord Lovat, placed her on an islet in Loch Beannach, where she was soon discovered by the Frazers, who had mustered for the rescue A severe conflict ensued, during which the young lady was accidentally slain by her own brother A plaintive Gaelic song records the sad calamity, and numerous tumuli mark the graves of those who fell

The once great family of Chisholme of Cromlix, sometimes written Cromleck, in Perthshire, which for above a century were hereditary bailies and justiciaries of the ecclesiastical lordship of Dunblane, and furnished three bishops to that see, but which is now extinct, was also descended from the border Chisholmes, the first of that family, Edmund Chisholme of Cromlix, early in the fifteenth century, being the son of Chisholme of Chisholme in Roxburghshire, who also possessed the estate of Lindale in England. He married, first, Margaret Sinclair, a widow, a daughter of the house of Dryden, and the mother of Sir John Ramsay of Balmain, the unworthy favourite of James the Third, afterwards for a time Lord Bothwell [see ante, p 353] By this lady he had two sons, James, of whom afterwards, and Thomas He married, secondly, Janet, daughter of James Drummond of Coldoch, brother of John Lord Drummond, and by her he had two sons, Sir James, who succeeded him, and William, bishop of Dunblane, and also three daughters

His elder son, by the first marriage, James Chisholme, was chaplain to James the Third, and having been sent by that monarch to Rome, was by Pope Innocent the Eighth made bishop of Dunblane in 1486, but was not consecrated till the following year In his old age, after having been forty years in the see, he resigned it in the year 1527, in favour of his half-brother, William Chisholme, above mentioned, retaining the administration of the fruits of his bishopric, and died in 1534

Sir James Chisholme, the elder son of the second marriage, succeeded his father, as second laird of Cromlix He married Lady Catherine Grahame, sister of the third earl of Montrose, and by her had three sons and four daughters His eldest son, Sir James, succeeded him William, the second son, succeeded his uncle William, as bishop of Dunblane, and Alexander, the third son, was parson of Comrie William Chisholme, the youngest son of Edmund Chisholme, and full brother of the first Sir James, was consecrated bishop of Dunblane in April 1527 He was a great opponent of the Reformation, and alienated the episcopal patrimony of his see to a considerable extent Most of it he gave to his nephew, Sir James Chisholme of Cromlix, but large portions of it were also bestowed on James Chisholme of Glassengall, his own natural son, and on his two natural daughters, one of whom was married to Sir James Stirling of Keir, and the other to John Buchanan of that ilk He died in 1564 His nephew, William Chisholme, was, in June 1561, by papal brief, constituted coadjutor and successor to him in the see of Dunblane His nephew was much employed by Mary queen of Scots in public affairs, and was one of the commissioners for the divorcing of the earl of Bothwell from Lady Jane Gordon, previous to the marriage of that nobleman with the queen He dilapidated what his uncle had left of the revenues of his bishopric, and was forfeited for noncompliance with the new measures both in church and state Retiring into France, he was made bishop of Vaison, and in his old age he resigned that see in favour of his nephew, also named William Chisholme, and became a friar at Grenoble He died at Rome

Sir James Chisholme, the third laird of Cromlix, married Jean Drummond, daughter of Sir John Drummond of Inverpeffray, by his wife, Lady Margaret Stuart, widow of Lord Gordon, and daughter of King James the Fourth By this lady he had four sons and four daughters Sir James, the eldest, succeeded him William the second son, was born at Inverpeffray, March 11, 1551, and was educated in France On his uncle's resigning his see in his favour, he became bishop of Vaison John Chisholme, the third son, born at Dunblane in August 1557, lived chiefly in France, and was the secret agent of the king of Spain and the duke of Parma with the Scottish Catholic lords, of whom mention is made infra Thomas Chisholme the fourth son, whose name in old documents is spelled Cheeseholm, was portioner of Butter-Gask, and died without heirs The eldest daughter, Jean, was married to James Drummond, second son of

David Lord Drummond, and by her he got the lands of Inverpeffray, which were her mother's portion He first bore the title of Lord Inchaffray, being commendator of that abbacy, but was, in 1607, created Lord Maderty, a title merged in 1711, in the viscounty of Strathallan, the second title of which is Lord Drummond of Cromlix [See STRATHALLAN, Viscount of] Helen, the second daughter, was married to Charteris of Kinfauns, Margaret, the third to Mushet of that ilk, and Agnes, the youngest, to Napier of Merchiston

Sir James Chisholme, eldest son of Sir James, the fourth laird of Cromlix, was born at Muthil, 10th September 1550 The first Lord Balmerinoch, principal secretary of state in Scotland, on his trial in 1608, for high treason, for sending a letter to the Pope, in his majesty's name, without his authority, confessed that, in 1598, he had written to his holiness, in the king's name, for a cardinal's hat for the bishop of Vaison (William Chisholme, secundus) Lord Balmerinoch was a connection of the Cromlix family, and hence the interest he took in their advancement [See ante, p 228] Robertson in his History of Scotland, and Douglas in his Peerage, erroneously call this bishop Drummond, a very natural mistake, as the Chisholmes and Drummonds were very nearly connected by frequent intermarriages, but he was William Chisholme, second of the name and surname It was also stated, on that occasion, by the lord privy seal, that, in 1588, the same bishop came to Scotland, with great offers from the Pope, that if King James made any kind of acknowledgment of him, he would have prevented the sailing of the great Armada, "and after him came Sir James Chisholme, who dealt in the same course, and because he did not prevail, he broke his heart and so died" On the alarm of the Spanish Armada that year, the General Assembly remitted to the presbytery of Edinburgh, to summon before it certain papists and apostates, among whom was the abovenamed John Chisholme, brother of the bishop of Vaison (William Chisholme, tertius), and son of Sir James Chisholme of Cromlix, who, in the intercepted correspondence between the duke of Parma and the Catholic lords was, for better concealment, called John Jamison, while the duke was styled "our miller" Robert Bruce, the Roman Catholic trafficker, in his letter to the duke, intercepted in January 1589, speaks of Sir James Chisholme as the eldest brother of this John Chisholme, and with reference to the money which he had brought from the duke, he says that he would be guided by his advice in the disposal of it, "for he is a man confident and wise, and one upon our part and very little suspected" [Calderwood's History, vol v p 22] Sir James married dame Anna Bethune, daughter of the laird of Creich, and by her he had his successor, Sir James, and other children

The eldest son, Sir James Chisholme, styled of Dundurn and Cromlix, knight, was one of the masters of the household to King James the Sixth, and high in the favour of that monarch Notwithstanding of his position and prospects, however, he seems to have been much mixed up with the intrigues of the Catholic lords for the overthrow of the reformed religion in Scotland, and in 1592, it was intended that he should proceed to Spain, on their part, to procure assistance for the advancement of their projects, but not being ready in time, Mr George Kerr went in his stead That gentleman was apprehended in the island of Cumbray, and upon him were found, besides seventeen letters of a treasonable and dangerous character, eight others, signed in blank by the earls of Huntly, Angus, and Errol, and by Gordon of Auchindown which, on being known, created great consternation and alarm in the kingdom An account of the discovery of this Popish plot called the affair of the "Scottish Blanks," has been reprinted, from a rare tract of the time, in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, (vol i p 317,) to which the reader is referred On February 15, 1592-3, Sir James Chisholme was denounced for not appearing to answer "touching his practising and trafficking in sundry treasonable matters against the true religion," &c , and at the provincial synod of Fife convened at St Andrews, 25th September 1593, he was, with the Catholic earls, Angus, Huntly, and Errol, and Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindown, formally excommunicated, but in 1595, on his appearing before the Assembly, which met in June of that year at Montrose, confessing his apostacy, and declaring his adherence to the reformed faith, he was released from the sentence of excommunication, and admitted a member of the reformed church

This Sir James Chisholme was the author of the touching and interesting love-song of 'Cromlet's Lilt,' written in his youth, when absent in France, on the supposed inconstancy of his betrothed, Helen Murray, commonly called "Fair Helen of Ardoch," daughter of William Stirling, brother of the laird of Ardoch, and grand daughter of Murray of Strowan, one of the seventeen sons of Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, already referred to [see ante, Art ATHOL, p 164] It begins

'Since all thy vows false maid,
Are blown to air,
And my poor heart betray'd
To sad despair
Into some wilderness
My grief I will express
And thy hard heartedness
O cruel fair!

And ends most pathetically,

'And when a ghost I am I'll visit thee
O thou deceitful dame,
Whose cruelty
Has kill'd the kindest heart
That ever felt Cupid's dart
And never can desert
From loving thee

It is pleasant to know that fair Helen became, after all, the wife of Chisholme, notwithstanding her forced and unconsummated marriage with his treacherous confident, which was annulled on his return to Scotland, on the exposure of the treachery and villany of his false friend, who had kept up his letters, and prepossessed the lady against her absent lover By her Sir James had two sons, James, and John, who both inherited the estate of Cromlix besides several daughters The estate afterwards became the property of General Drummond, by purchase

A John Chisholme, son of Chesholme of Chesholme, Roxburghshire, and a relative of the Cromlix family, was in the reign of Queen Mary comptroller of artillery, and as such was in 1564 infeft in the building, called the King's Work, at the mouth of Leith harbour The ancient buildings had shared in the conflagration which signalized the departure of the army of Henry VIII of England in 1544 and they would appear to have been rebuilt by Chisholme in a most substantial and magnificent style The following are the terms in which the queen confirms her former grant — 'Efter hir Hienes lauchfull age, and revocation made in parliament, hir majeste sett in feu farme to hir lovite suitour Johne Chisholme his airis and assignais, all and haille hir landis callet the King's Werk in Leith, within the boundis specifit in the infeftment, maid to him thairupon, quhilk is

CHISHOLM, ALEXANDER, an artist of considerable merit, was born at Elgin, in 1792, or 1793 He was intended by his father for the humble occupation of a weaver, for which he entertained a strong aversion He early manifested a predilection for art, and he was accustomed, from his own untaught impulses, to sketch on the cloth on which he was occupied at the loom, all the odd figures he saw, and remarkable objects which struck him He had been placed with a master weaver at Peterhead, and when his leisure permitted him, he used to resort to the seashore, and sketch on the sand When about thirteen or fourteen years of age he walked from Peterhead to Aberdeen, and wandered about the streets for some time, his attention was at length arrested before a shop window by seeing some advertisement about colours He entered the shop, introduced himself to the shopkeeper, and from him received his first lessons in light and shade At this time there was a meeting of the Synod of Aberdeen, the members of which he was permitted to sketch, and his work gave such satisfaction that he was forthwith commissioned to paint them, but was compelled to decline doing so, from his ignorance of the use of colours When he was about nineteen or twenty, he proceeded to Edinburgh, where he was patronized by Lord Elgin and the earl of Buchan, and was subsequently appointed an instructor at the Academy of Painting, &c He married Miss Susanna Stewart Fraser, one of his private pupils In 1818, he went to London, and obtained a considerable share of encouragement His favourite style of art was history He also painted portraits with considerable success In the Exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy of 1830 he had a picture very well treated, 'Shall I fight or not?' in that of 1843 one of 'The Fair Maid of Perth listening to the instructions of the Carthusian Monk,' and in that of 1847, one of a bolder character than either, 'The Signing of the Covenant in Greyfriars Churchyard, February 28, 1638' The point of time in the picture is when Mr Henderson is administering the oath, which was "taken with drawn swords in their hands and tears in their eyes" Having suffered affliction during nine years before his death, his latter paintings do not exhibit that degree of vigour which characterized his earlier works Mr Chisholm died at Rothesay, in the Isle of Bute, on the 3d of October 1847

CHRISTIE, HUGH, master of the Grammar School at Montrose, was born there in 1730 He was the author of several classical works, of some repute in their day He died in 1774 His publications are

CLAPPERTON, Hugh, a distinguished African traveller, was born in Annan, Dumfries-shire, in 1788 His grandfather, Robert Clapperton, M D, a native of the north of Scotland, studied medicine at Edinburgh and Paris, and, marrying Elizabeth Campbell, a distant relative of the Campbells of Glenlyon, settled in Dumfries-shire, first at a place called Crowden-Nows, and afterwards at Lochmaben He acquired some reputation in the locality as a physician, and an amateur both in mineralogy and antiquities He made a collection of objects in natural history in the district mines, and of antiquities at the site of the camps of Agricola, and some old border ballads and genealogies communicated by him were inserted in the 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border' With one daughter, he had six sons, all of whom were medical men, except the youngest who, in the beginning of 1793, became second lieutenant of marines George, the eldest son, the father of the traveller, was a surgeon in Annan He was twice married, and is said to have had in all twenty-one children By his first wife, a daughter of John Johnstone, proprietor of the lands of Thornwhate and Lochmaben castle, he had ten or eleven sons and one daughter Of this marriage Hugh was the youngest child The limited circumstances of his father prevented him from obtaining a classical education, but he was early placed under the tuition of Mr Bryce Downie, a mathematical teacher of some eminence at Annan, under whom Edward Irving also studied, and after acquiring an elementary knowledge of practical mathematics, he was, at the age of thirteen, at his own wish, apprenticed to the owner of a vessel, named the Postlethwaite of Maryport, trading between Liverpool and North America, in which he made several voyages across the Atlantic After one of these, as it proved to him the last, when the ship was at Liverpool, being caught by a custom house officer bringing ashore a few pounds of rock-salt in his handkerchief, for the use of his landlady, he was threatened with imprisonment for smuggling, but having consented to go on board the Tender, then in that port, he was carried round to Plymouth, and draughted on board of his majesty's ship Gibraltar, of eighty guns In 1806, he arrived at Gibraltar in a naval transport, from which he was impressed, with others, on board the frigate Renommée, captain Sir Thomas Livingstone Fortunately for him, during the time he was there the Saturn, captain Lord Amelius Beauclerc, belonging to Lord Collingwood's fleet off Cadiz, arrived at Gibraltar for the purpose of watering and refitting, and learning that his uncle was captain of marines on board of her, young Clapperton sent him a letter describing his situation in the Renommée The uncle immediately waited upon Sir Thomas Livingstone, who was an old messmate of his, when they were both lieutenants at the Cape of Good Hope many years before, and through his intercession, Sir Thomas at once placed his nephew on the quarter-deck as a midshipman The Renommée soon after left Gibraltar for the Mediterranean, and when on the coast of Spain, had occasion to send boats to attack some of the enemy's vessels on shore Clapperton being in one of the boats, was slightly wounded in the head, and for a time suffered much annoyance from the wound On the Renommée being paid off in 1808, he joined the Venerable, Captain King, in the Downs, as a midshipman, but learning from his friends at home, who were interesting themselves in his advancement, that by getting into the Clorinde frigate, Commander Briggs, this object was likely to be facilitated, he applied to be transferred to that vessel His request was granted, but as the Clorinde had previously sailed for the East Indies, he was ordered by the admiral to have a passage in a ship proceeding to the same destination In the course of the voyage he was nearly drowned in attempting to aid a vessel in distress, which passed near their ship

Clapperton remained on board the Clorinde frigate, and in the East Indies, from March 1810 to the end of 1813 He then returned to England, and was, with some other clever midshipmen, sent to Portsmouth dockyard, for the purpose of being instructed, by the celebrated swordsman Angelo, in the improved cutlass exercise recently introduced, and in which he afterwards excelled When these midshipmen were distributed to the different ships of the fleet as drill-masters, Clapperton was appointed to Sir Alexander Cochrane's flagship, the Asia, to instruct the officers and crew in the use of the cutlass The Asia sailed from Spithead in the end of January 1814, and during the passage to Bermuda, his services as drill-master were performed on the quarter-deck On her arrival, he was sent to Halifax, and thence to the Canadian Lakes, just then about to become the scene of warlike operations With the utmost diligence in the discharge of his duty, he is described as having been at the mess-table the soul and life of the party He could sing a good song, tell a merry tale, paint scenes for the ship's theatricals, sketch views and draw caricatures, while his conversation was at all times extremely amusing He thus became a general favourite on board He arrived at Upper Canada in 1815, and during the winter he was placed in command of a blockhouse on Lake Huron, with a party of seamen, and one small gun, for the purpose of defending it Being attacked by an American schooner, the blockhouse was destroyed, and he found that himself and party must either become prisoners of war, or cross Lake Michigan upon the ice, a journey of nearly sixty miles, to York, the nearest British depot The latter alternative was adopted, and the party, after great suffering and remarkable devotion and humanity on the part of Clapperton, by attempting to carry a poor boy who was unable to proceed, and died of exhaustion while on his back—reached York emaciated, almost famished, and nearly out of clothing Owing to the long inaction of his left hand in holding up the boy, Clapperton lost, from the severity of the frost, the first joint of this thumb

Soon after, on Sir Edward Owen being appointed to the command upon the Canadian lakes, he gave to Clapperton an acting order as lieutenant, and appointed him to the command of the Confiance schooner While she rode at anchor near the shores of Lake Erie or Lake Huron, he occasionally repaired to the woods, and with his gun kept himself well supplied with fresh provisions In these excursions he cultivated an acquaintance with the aborigines, whose mode of life he very much admired His acting order as lieutenant he had sent to England for confirmation by the Board of Admiralty, but a very large promotion having just previously taken place, the board declined confirming the commission On this disappointment, he formed the idea of abandoning the navy altogether, and becoming a denizen of the North American forests, but this romantic notion he soon abandoned At this time he occasionally dined on shore, and being an expert swimmer he not unfrequently plunged into the water with his clothes on and swam to the schooner This he did, partly to show his dexterity, but chiefly for the purpose of keeping his men on the alert The practice, however, had very nearly proved fatal to him, as he was one night so much exhausted that he could scarcely make those on board hear his cries, till he was on the point of sinking, when he was luckily observed and taken on board, but he never again tried the experiment

About the end of 1816, when Sir Edward Owen returned to England, he got Clapperton's commission of lieutenant confirmed by the Board of Admiralty, and in 1817, on our vessels on the Canadian lakes being paid off and laid up, Lieutenant Clapperton came home, and, with many more, was put on half-pay In 1818, he retired to Lochinaben, where he lived with an aged sister of his mother, and amused himself principally with rural sports In 1820, he removed to Edinburgh, where he became acquainted with Dr Oudney, a young Englishman who was then about to embark on a mission to the interior of Africa, and requested permission to accompany him Dr Oudney was told by a friend, a medical man, who knew Clapperton well, that in all varieties and under every circumstance, however trying, he would find him a steady and faithful friend, and that his powerful and athletic form and excellent constitution had never been surpassed, great recommendations for a companion on such a hazardous enterprize Lieutenant, afterwards Colonel Denham, having volunteered his services, and it being intended that researches should be made to the east and west of Bornou, where Dr Oudney was to reside as British consul, Clapperton's name was added to the expedition by Earl Bathurst, then secretary of state for the colonial department After their arrival at Tripoli, the travellers set out, early in 1822, in a line nearly south to Mourzook, which place they reached on the 8th of April Clapperton, with his friend Oudney, then made an excursion to the westward of Mourzook, into the country of the Tuaricks, and penetrated as far as Ghraat, in the eleventh degree of east longitude On the 29th November the travellers left Mourzook, and arrived at Lake Tchad, in the kingdom of Bornou, February 4, 1823, after a journey of eight hundred miles On the 17th they reached Kouka, where, being well received by the Sultan, they remained till the 14th of December, when they set out for the purpose of exploring the course of the Niger They arrived in safety at Murmer, where Dr Oudney died, January 12, 1824

Clapperton pursued his journey alone to Kano, and from thence to Saccatoo, the capital of the Felatah empire On the road he was met by an escort of one hundred and fifty horsemen, with drums and trumpets, which Bello, the sultan, had sent to conduct him to his capital Not being permitted to proceed to the Niger, which was only five days' journey to the westward, he returned to Kouka, July 8th, 1824 He was here rejoined by Colonel Denham, who did not at first know him, so altered was he by fatigue and illness The travellers now returned to England, where they arrived June 1, 1825, and on the 22d of the same month Clapperton was made a commander in the navy

The result of this expedition was a work published at London in 1826, in one volume quarto, entitled 'Narrative of Travels and Discoveries in Northern and Central Africa, in the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, by Major Denham, Captain Clapperton and the late Dr Oudney' Although the disputed questions of the course and termination of the Niger were left undecided, the geographical information collected was of great value, inasmuch as it determined the position and extent of the kingdoms of Mandara, Bornou, and Houssa, with the situation of their principal cities Before he could finish this work for the press, he was engaged again by Lord Bathurst, colonial secretary, to take the management of another expedition, by the way of the western coast of Africa, near the Bight of Benin, to carry presents from his sovereign to the Sultan Bello, and to El Kanemy, the sheikh of Bornou He sailed from Portsmouth in his majesty's sloop Brazen, Captain Willis, and was accompanied by Dr Dickson, Captain Pearce, royal navy, and Dr Morrison, a naval surgeon, and also by Richard Lander, a young Englishman, who attended him in the capacity of confidential servant They called at Sierra Leone, from that sailed to Benin, where they landed, and thence proceeded up the country, and on 29th November Clapperton arrived at Badagry Dr Dickson had left him near Whidah, and Captain Pearce and Dr Morrison died a short time after leaving the coast Quitting Badagry, December 7, 1825, accompanied by his faithful servant, Richard Lander, he pursued a north-easterly direction, with the intention of reaching Saccatoo

In January 1826, he reached Katunga, the capital of Youriba, and soon after crossed the Niger at Boussa, the place where Park met his fate Continuing his journey north, he reached Kano, and leaving Lander there with the baggage, he proceeded westward to Saccatoo, the residence of Sultan Bello, who, though he accepted his presents, refused to allow him either to return to Kano, or to revisit Bornou, on account of the war in which he was then engaged with the sheikh of the latter place He was, in consequence, detained five months at Saccatoo, and in the meantime the Sultan had inveigled Lander to the capital, and obtained possession of the presents intended for the sheikh, and then refused both master and servant permission to leave by way of Bornou While thus detained, Captain Clapperton was attacked with dysentery, and died April 13, 1827, at Chungary, a village about four miles from Saccatoo He was the first European who traversed the region of Central Africa, extending from the Bight of Benin to the Mediterranean He was about five feet eleven inches in height, possessed a frank and generous disposition, and had acquired a thorough knowledge of the habits and prejudices of the inhabitants of Central Africa On Lander's return to England, a quarto volume appeared, entitled 'Journal of a Second Expedition into the Interior of Africa, from the Bight of Benin to Saccatoo By the late Commander Clapperton, R N To which is added the Journal of Richard Lander, with a portrait of Captain Clapperton' From this portrait, which was painted by Gildon Manton, and engraved by Thomas Lupton, the following woodcut is taken

CLELAND, a surname belonging to an old family in Lanarkshire, and derived from the lands of that name in the parish of Dalzell The Clelands of that ilk were hereditary foresters to the old earls of Douglas, and had for arms a hare saliant, argent, with a hunting horn, proper, about its neck, crest, a falcon standing on a left hand glove, proper At other times, for supporters they had two greyhounds James Cleland of Cleland, was one of the patriots who joined Sir William Wallace, and fought, under his command, against the English He also remained faithful to King Robert Bruce, and for his services received from that monarch several lands lying within the barony of Calder in West Lothian From him was descended William Cleland of that ilk, who, in the reign of King James the Third, married Jean, daughter of William Lord Somerville From them branched Cleland of Faskine, Cleland of Monkland, and Cleland of Cartness About the beginning of the seventeenth century, Sir James Cleland purchased the barony of Monkland from Sir Thomas Hamilton of Binning, first earl of Haddington, but his son and heir, Ludovick Cleland, sold it to James, marquis of Hamilton On 6th September 1615, this Sir James Cleland of Monkland was, with two others, indicted for trial, for treasonably resetting Jesuits, hearing of mass, &c, offences very seriously punished in those days, but the diet was deserted against them The Cartness family terminated in an heiress, previous to the middle of the eighteenth century, married to Sir William Vere of Blackwood in the same county

Alexander Cleland of that ilk, with his cousin, William Cleland of Faskine, were both killed at Flodden in 1513 James Cleland of that ilk, an eminent man in the time of King James the Fifth, whom he frequently attended while hunting, married a daughter of Hepburn of Bonnytoun, descended from the earl of Bothwell, by whom he had a son, Alexander Cleland of that ilk, who was a faithful adherent of Queen Mary He married Margaret, a daughter of Hamilton of Haggs by whom he had William his successor, who married the sister of Walter Stewart, first Lord Blantyre Their eldest son, Alexander, married the sister of John Hamilton, first Lord Bargeny, and their son and heir sold the lands of Cleland to a cousin of his own name

Major William Cleland, the great-grandson of the last mentioned Alexander Cleland of that ilk, was one of the Commissioners of the Customs in Scotland, about the middle of the last century

The name was formerly Kneilland, with the k pronounced In 1603 Mr Andrew Kneilland was justice depute, and there are several instances of Cleland of Cleland being called Kneilland of that ilk, thus, among the persons who were 'delated' for being art and part in the murder of King Henry Darnley were William Kneland of that ilk, and Arthur Kneland of Knowhobbilhill, afterwards softened into Connoblehill, in the parish of Shotts (See KNEILAND, surname of)

CLELAND, WILLIAM, a brave and accomplished soldier and poet, was born about 1661 Of his family or lineage nothing is recorded At the conflict of Drumclog, when he was scarcely eighteen years of age, he acted as an officer of foot in the Covenanters' army, and at Bothwell Bridge he held the rank of captain After the latter affair, he and his brother were, among other leaders of the insurgents, denounced by proclamation, being described as "James and William Clelands, brethren-in-law to John Haddoway, merchant in Douglas' It is likely that, on the defeat at Bothwell, he made his escape to Holland, as we find that he published 'Disputatio Juridica de Probationibus,' at Utrecht, in 1684 He was in Scotland, however, in 1685, "being then under hiding," among the wilds of Lanarkshire and Ayrshire

After the Revolution he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the earl of Angus' regiment, called the Cameronian regiment, from its being chiefly raised from the extreme presbyterian party

On the 21st August 1689, before he was twenty-eight years of age, Colonel Cleland was killed at the head of his corps, while manfully and successfully defending the churchyard of Dunkeld against a superior force of Highlanders, the remains of the army of Dundee, which had been victorious at Killiecrankie in the preceding month

His poetical pieces were published in a small duodecimo volume in 1697 The first in the book, 'Hollo, my Fancie, whither wilt thou go?' was written by him the last year he was at college, and before he was eighteen years of age This poem, which displays considerable imagination, will be found in Watson's Collection of Scottish Poems His principal piece, entitled 'A Mock Poem on the Expedition of the Highland Host, who came to destroy the Western Shires in Winter 1678,' is in the Hudibrastic vein, and conceived in a style of bitter sarcasm

Colonel Cleland is erroneously stated to have been the father of William Cleland, Esq, born in 1673, one of the commissioners of the customs in Scotland, and author of the Prefatory Letter to the Dunciad This person, said by Sir Walter Scott, in the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, to have been also a Colonel Cleland, (he was only a major, see previous page,) is mentioned by some of the annotators on Pope as the original of Will Honeycomb in the Spectator He died in 1741, leaving a son, John Cleland, the author of an infamous novel, entitled 'Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure,' published in 1750, for which Ralph Griffiths, a bookseller, gave him 20 guineas, and the profits of which are said to have exceeded £10,000 Want of money and want of principle were alike the cause of this prostitution of his talents To rescue him from such pursuits, Earl Granville allowed him a hundred pounds a-year He afterwards wrote two novels of a more innocent description, and not destitute of merit, entitled 'Memoirs of a Coxcomb,' and 'The Man of Honour' He published, besides, an etymological work, entitled 'The Way to Things by Words, and to Words by Things,' 1765, 8vo, and a 'Specimen of an Etymological Vocabulary, or Essay, by means of the Analytic Method, to Retrieve the Ancient Celtic,' 1768 He died in 1789, aged 82 —Chalmers's Biog Dict, Art John Cleland —Browne's History of the Highlands

CLELAND, JAMES, LL D, a distinguished statistical writer, was born at Glasgow in the month of January 1770 His parents, though highly respectable, were in a humble station of life, his father's trade being that of a cabinet-maker, to which his son was likewise brought up Although he himself had received but a scanty education, Mr Cleland, senior, who possessed great shrewdness of character, had the good sense to be aware of the advantages of a good one, and, accordingly, James was early initiated in English grammar and the rudiments of the Latin language, and made considerable progress in arithmetic In the workshop of his father he continued till 1789, when, in order to render himself perfect in his business, he went to London, in which city he remained for two years On his return, he entered into partnership with his father, and from his peculiar tact and straightforward mode of conducting business, he, in a short period, rendered the trade in which he was concerned one of the most flourishing in Glasgow It was while thus engaged that he first exhibited his inclination to figures, the foremost of his printed productions being 'Tables for showing the Price of Packing-Boxes of sundry Dimensions and Thicknesses,' an opuscule which was highly thought of at the time, and which is still in common use amongst tradesmen

In 1814 the office of superintendent of public works at Glasgow having become vacant, Dr Cleland was unanimously elected to it by the Town Council, and in this situation he continued until 1834, when, owing to some alteration in the distribution of offices—consequent on the operation of the Municipal Reform Bill, he deemed it expedient to resign Many of his fellow-citizens, however, considering that some compensation should be afforded him, called a public meeting on 7th August of that year, at which it was unanimously resolved, that a subscription should immediately be set on foot, in order to present Dr Cleland with some tangible mark of the esteem in which he was held by them This was accordingly done, and in the course of a very few weeks, when the subscription list was closed, the sum collected amounted to no less than £4,600,—which it was agreed upon by a committee should be expended on the erection of a productive building, to be placed in a suitable part of the city, and to bear the name of the "Cleland Testimonial" That this very superb present, however, was not totally undeserved, will be apparent even from the following isolated trifling fact —Previously to Dr Cleland's election to the office of superintendent of public works in 1814, the caravans of performers, who were accustomed to meet at Glasgow during the fair week in July, had been allowed to be pitched on ground belonging to the town, without paying anything for such a privilege But when Dr Cleland entered on his duties, he imitated the example of the corporation of London with regard to Bartholomew Fair, and by charging a small sum for each steading of ground, he was enabled, during the period between 1815 and 1834, to pay into the hands of the city chamberlain, from this source alone, no less than £2,500

In 1821 Dr Cleland was employed by government to draw up and classify the enumeration of the inhabitants of Glasgow, and, from the following high eulogium contained in the government enumeration volume, it will be observed in what point of view his services were regarded at headquarters,—"It would be unjust," observes the writer, "not to mention, in this place, that Mr Cleland has transmitted documents containing very numerous and very useful statistical details concerning the city and suburbs of Glasgow, and that the example has produced imitation in some other of the principal towns in Scotland, though not to the same extent of minute observation by which Mr Cleland's labours are distinguished" In 1831 Dr Cleland again drew up the enumeration for government, and the very flattering mode in which it was received, both at home and in several of the countries of the European continent, attests its value

From 1820 until 1834 the bills of mortality for Glasgow were drawn up by him, and from the following panegyric on them by the highest authority on the subject, we may judge of their accuracy and value —"Of all the statements derived from bills of mortality and enumerations of the people," observes Joshua Mylne, Esq in the Encyclopedia Britannica, "only those for Sweden and Finland, Dr Heysham's for Carlisle, and Dr Cleland's for Glasgow, have been given in the proper form, and with sufficient correctness to afford the information, which is the most important object of them all, viz that which is necessary for determining the law of mortality" In the year 1836 a number of gentlemen having united themselves into a society for promoting the advancement of statistical inquiry, Dr Cleland was unanimously elected president, and in the first part of their Transactions there appeared a paper written by him on his favourite subject, the State of the City

From the date of his resignation to his death, which took place after an illness of nearly a year's duration, on 14th October 1840, Dr Cleland never ceased to entertain a lively regard for the interest and prosperity of his native city, and not a month before he expired, he published a pamphlet, 'On the Former and Present State of Glasgow' By the university of Glasgow he was honoured with the degree of doctor of laws He was a member of the Society of Civil Engineers of London, a Fellow of the Statistical Societies of London, Manchester, and Bristol, a corresponding member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and a short period before his decease, he was elected an honorary member of the Société Français de Statistique Universelle

CLEPHANE, a surname belonging to a family of great antiquity which, in very early times, possessed lands in the counties both of Fife and Berwick The immediate ancestor of the family was Alanus de Clephane in the reign of King William the Lion He was sheriff of Lauderdale, and is witness in a donation to the monastery of Kelso by Roland lord of Galloway, also, in a donation to the monastery of Newbottle by the said Roland In another donation to the monastery of Kelso he is designed "Alanus de Clephane, vicecom de Lawdyr," &c, &c, anno 1203 He died in the end of the reign of William the Lion His son and successor, Walterus de Clephane, is mentioned in a donation without a date to the monastery of Newbottle by Thomas of Galloway, fifth earl of Athol, who died in 1234 This Walter is supposed in the reign of William the Lion, to have married the daughter and heiress of William de Carslogie, son of Richard de Carslogie, in Fife, and with her got the lands and barony of Carslogie, which became the chief title of the family He died in the reign of King Alexander the Second His son, David de Clephane, succeeded to the estate of Carslogie, and died in the reign of Alexander the Third He had three sons, John his heir, Marcus de Clapan, miles, who was witness to several charters by dominus Alexander de Abernethy of Abernethy In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Marcus de Clypan, as having sworn fealty to Edward the First, 5th August 1296, at Arbroath This appears to have been the same Marcus William, the third son, was also forced to submit to King Edward the First The eldest son, John, got a charter from Duncan, earl of Fife, (supposed to have been Duncan the twelfth earl), of the lands of Carslogie, which bears him to possess them "adeo libere sicut David de Clephan pater ejus et prædecessores eas tenuerant" As was usual with such documents in those days, this charter is without a date, but from the witnesses to it, "dominis Alexandro de Abernethy, Michaele et David de Wemyss, Hugone de Lochor, Johanne de Ramsay, Willielmo de Ramsay, et Henrico de Ramsay, cum multis aliis," it appears to have been granted in the beginning of the reign of Robert the First He had two sons, Alan his heir, and John de Clephane, who was killed near Norham in England, fighting against the enemies of his country, in 1327 His elder son, Alan Clephane of Carslogie, fought with Bruce on the field of Bannockburn, where he is said to have lost his right hand, and had one of steel made in its stead and so fitted with springs as to enable him to wield his sword He is mentioned in the chartularies of Dunfermline and Balmerino in 1331, and by Sir Robert Sibbald in 1332

His descendant in the fourth degree, John Clephane of Carslogie, lost by apprisings, &c, the bulk of the family estate in Lauderdale, which had been about three centuries in their possession This appears by a charter under the great seal from King James the Fifth dated 2d September 1516 Alexandro Tarvet de eodem, quadraginta mercatas terrarum de Quhelplaw in baliviat de Lauderdale, infra vice-comitat de Berwick, quæ appretiatæ fuerunt a Johanne Clephane de Carslogie, &c By his wife, a daughter of Sir John Wemyss of that ilk, he had a son, George Clephane of Carslogie, who married Christian, daughter of Learmont of Dairsie, by whom he had two sons and two daughters James, the elder, carried on the line of succession William, the younger, was progenitor of James Clephane, Esq, who went early into the service of the estates of Holland, where he rose to the rank of major He subsequently entered the British service, and in 1757, as major to Colonel Fraser's regiment, he was at the siege of Louisburg, and served with great reputation in all the campaigns in America till the expulsion of the French from Canada in 1760 He died in 1768 His brother, Dr John Clephane, was physician to the British army, and died in 1758

The last of the eldest branch of the family, Major-general William Maclean Douglas Clephane, who died in 1804, was the twenty-first laird, in the direct male line, without the intervention of a female or the succession of a younger branch He sold the remaining portion of the barony, and it is a singular coincidence that when the property went entirely from the family, the eldest male line became extinct The general married the daughter of Mr Maclean of Torloisk, Mull, and after his death Sir Walter Scott was chosen by his daughters to be their guardian His eldest daughter married, in 1815, the second marquis of Northampton Her ladyship died in 1830 The Clephanes are said to have been an exceeding tall, strong race of men, and General Clephane was far above the usual height His brother, Andrew Clephane, Esq, Advocate, sheriff of the county of Fife, who died in 1838, though not so tall, exhibited in his person evident marks of the family characteristic in this respect The old house of Carslogie, for centuries the residence of the Clephanes, became the property of the Rev Mr Laing, an English clergyman

According to tradition, in ancient times, when private feuds were common among the Scottish barons, the lords of Carslogie entered into a league of mutual defence with the proprietors of Scotstarvet, whose residence, Scotstarvet tower, is situated on a lower ridge or shoulder of Tarvet hill, about two miles to the south The tower of Carslogie being situated in a hollow, might have been approached by an enemy without his being observed until very near it, but as the more commanding situation of Scotstarvet enabled the warden on the battlements to see to a greater distance, he, on occasions of danger, instantly sounded his horn, which was replied to by the warden from Carslogie, and the vassals were immediately in arms for the defence of the castle Mr Leighton in his History of Fife, believes on good grounds, that this league was not with the Scotts of Scotstarvet, who only acquired possession of that estate in the seventeenth century, but with the previous proprietors of Upper Tarvet, a family of the name of Inglis The horn of Carslogie, with which the call to battle was sounded, has been rendered famous by Sir Walter Scott, and is said to be still preserved by the representatives of the family of Clephane Besides the horn, the steel hand already mentioned, which was also commemorated by Sir Walter Scott, was long in possession of the family One tradition is that this steel hand was a present from an ancient king of Scotland to a baron of Carslogie, who had lost his hand in battle, in defence of his country It does not seem, however, to be agreed what king this was, or which of the long line of barons of Carslogie received the royal gift The more popular account has it that the hand, as above stated, was lost at Bannockburn, and that the gift was made by Robert the Bruce to Alan de Clephane, but others, bringing the story down to a later period, say, that it was presented to the great grandfather of the late General Clephane, the last direct male heir of the Clephanes of Carslogie This famous steel hand is said to be still possessed either by the representatives of the family or by the third marquis of Northampton, General Maclean-Douglas-Clephane's grandson

CLERK, a surname, as already stated, derived from the word Clericus, the designation given in the dark ages to those of the clergy and the few other persons who acquired the arts of reading and writing, for the purpose of being able to transcribe the orders of the sovereign, the sentences of courts, and the acts of the legislature, kings and nobles, in those remote times, confining their attention almost exclusively to martial exercises and deeds of arms Blackstone observes "that the Judges were usually created out of the sacred order, and all the inferior offices were supplied by the lower clergy, which has occasioned their successors to be denominated clerks to this day"—Comm i 17 "Adam the clerk, son of Philip the scribe, occurs as the designation of a person mentioned in an ancient record at Newcastle" [Lower on English Surnames] The name of Clericus was assumed both by those who held such offices, and by their descendants Clark and Clarke, the English method of spelling it, are but variations of the same name Though the spelling may be different, the pronunciation is invariably Clark

The family from which the Clerks of Pennycuik are descended can be traced as far back as the year 1180, and the reign of William the Lion

In the charter of a donation by King William to the Abbacy of Holyrood-house, Hugo Clericus regis, Hugo Clericus cancellarii, Johannes Clericus, and several others, append their names as witnesses

The witnesses to such deeds were always of high rank, and, from different sources it appears that, in early times, there were many Scottish barons, and proprietors of estates, of this name

In 1296 Richard Clerk, a considerable freeholder, was compelled to submit to Edward the First of England, after his invasion of Scotland, while another baron of the same name, a strenuous defender of the liberties of his country, scorning to comply with the demands of the usurper, was carried prisoner to London

William Clerk, descended from a branch of this family settled in Perthshire He was an eminent merchant and patriot, and attended David the Second in his unfortunate expedition into England in 1346 He was taken prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross, near Durham, on the 17th October of that year carried to London and retained in captivity there, until liberated, along with his sovereign, eleven years afterwards

John Clerk, merchant-burgess and chief magistrate of Montrose, became one of the hostages for the ransom of King David, in 1357

His family continued in the direction of the affairs of that ancient burgh for several centuries, the provost of Montrose, as appears from the books of council, being of his name and descent down to the reign of Queen Mary

The grandfather of the first proprietor of Pennycuik, of the name of Clerk, was possessor of the lands of Kilhuntly, of Badenoch, Inverness-shire, but having attached himself to the party of Mary, queen of Scots, in opposition to his superior, the earl of Huntly, he was obliged to leave that part of the country in 1568

His son, William, a merchant in Montrose, died in 1620 A son or brother, Richard Clerk, vice-admiral of the fleet, who served under Gustavus Adolphus, gifted a large lamp or chandelier to the parish church of Montrose

John Clerk, William's son, born at Montrose in 1611, was also bred a merchant He removed to France in 1634, and settled in Paris In 1647 he returned to Scotland, with a considerable fortune, and purchased the lands of Pennycuik (Gaelic, Beun na Cuachaig, the 'Hill of the Cuckoo,') Mid Lothian, which have ever since remained in possession of his descendants He married a daughter of Sir William Gray of Pittendrum, ancestor of Lord Gray, by whom he had five sons and five daughters

He was succeeded in 1674 by his son John, who was created the first baronet of Pennycuik, by a royal patent from Charles the Second, dated 21th March 1679 In 1700 he acquired the lands of Lasswade, in the same county He died in 1722 He was twice married, first, to Elizabeth daughter of Henry Henderson, Esq of Elvington, by whom he had three sons and three daughters, and secondly to Christian, daughter of the Rev James Kirkpatrick, and had four other sons and four daughters Of his eldest son, John, second baronet, a notice follows

Sir James Clerk, the third baronet, son of the second, married Elizabeth daughter of the Rev John Cleghorn, but dying in 1782 without issue, was succeeded by his brother Sir George Clerk-Maxwell fourth baronet, of whom also a notice is subsequently given He married Dorothea, daughter of his uncle William Clerk-Maxwell, Esq, by his wife Agnes Maxwell, heiress of Middleby in Dumfries-shire, and had five sons and four daughters He died in 1784, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir John Clerk, who died in 1798 He married Mary, daughter of Mr Dacre of Kirklington in Cumberland, but had no issue

His nephew, the Right Hon Sir George Clerk, sixth baronet, succeeded He was the son of James Clerk, third son of the fourth baronet, by Janet, daughter of George Irving, Esq of Newton He was born in 1787, and married in 1810, the daughter of Ewan Law, Esq, and niece of the first Lord Ellenborough He was a lord of the admiralty from 1819 to 1830, except for a short interval, secretary of the treasury from November 1834 to April 1835, and again from September 1841 to February 1845 In the latter year he was sworn a member of the privy council He became master of the mint, and vice-president of the board of trade in February 1846, and continued so till July 1846 He represented the county of Edinburgh in several parliaments previous to 1832, but had no seat from that time till 1835, when he was again returned for that county He sat for Stamford from 1838 to 1847, when he was elected for Dover He is a deputy lieutenant of the county of Edinburgh

On the entry of Charles the First into Edinburgh, 15th June, 1633, Sir Alexander Clerk lord provost, was by his majesty dubbed a knight in honour of the occasion A descendant of his, Mr Robert Clerk, who died in 1810, was for many years a bookseller and publisher in the Parliament Square, Edinburgh, an account of whom is given in the second volume of Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, page 29

The Clerks of Brae-Letham were free barons, and had considerable possessions in Argyleshire, as far back as the reign of James the Second There were also several families of this name in the county of Fife, who had large possessions, such as the Clerks of Balbirnie, of Pittzoucher, and of Luthrie, &c The clan Chattan and some other Highland families also claim a connection with the Clerks as descended from them

The family of Listonshiels in Mid Lothian was a branch of the Pennycuik family Robert Clerk, born in 1661, a physician in Edinburgh, and an intimate friend of the celebrated Dr Pitcairn, was the fifth and youngest son of John Clerk, the first proprietor of Pennycuik His eldest son John, born in 1689, also studied medicine, and for above thirty years was the first physician in Scotland At the institution of the Philosophical Society in Edinburgh in 1739, he was chosen one of their two vice-presidents, an office which he enjoyed as long as he lived In 1740 he was elected president of the Royal College of Physicians in Edinburgh, and continued president for four years He purchased the lands of Listonshiels and Spittal in Mid Lothian, and got a charter under the great seal He died in 1757 He had married in 1720, Margaret, eldest daughter of Thomas Rattray, Esq of Craighall Rattray in Perthshire, by whom he had several children Robert, the second son, was a colonel in the army David, the third, was physician to the Royal Infirmary in Edinburgh He died in 1768 By his wife Helen, daughter of James Duff, Esq of Craigston, Aberdeenshire he had two sons, James and Robert James Clerk, the eldest son, became, in right of his grandmother, proprietor of Craighall Rattray, and assumed the surname of Rattray in addition to his own He distinguished himself at the Scottish bar as an advocate, and was constituted a baron of the Exchequer in Scotland He married in January 1791, Jane, daughter of Admiral Duff of Fetteresso, and dying 29th August 1831, left, with one daughter, Jane, a son and successor, Robert Clerk-Rattray, Esq of Craighall Rattray [See RATTRAY, surname of]

CLERK, SIR JOHN, second baronet of Pennycuik, author of the humorous Scotch song, 'O merry may the maid be that marries the Miller,' (with the exception of the first stanza, which belongs to an older song,) and one of the barons of exchequer in Scotland for nearly half a century, was the son of the first baronet, by his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Henry Henderson, Esq of Elvington, and was born about 1684 He was one of the commissioners for the Union, and was appointed a baron on the constitution of the exchequer court 13th May 1708 He succeeded his father in his title and estates in 1722 He possessed great learning and accomplishments, and was generally acknowledged to be one of the most enlightened men of his time Along with Baron Scrope, in 1726, he drew up an 'Historical View of the Forms and Powers of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland,' which was printed at the expense of the barons of Exchequer for private circulation, Edinburgh 1820, large quarto Besides two papers in the 'Philosophical Transactions,' (one an 'Account of the Stylus of the Ancients and their different sorts of Paper,' printed in 1731, and the other 'On the effects of Thunder on Trees,' and 'Of a large Deer's Horns found in the heart of an Oak,' printed in 1739,) he was the author of a tract entitled 'Dissertatio de quibusdam Monumentis Romanis,' &c, written in 1730 and printed in 1750, quarto For upwards of twenty years he also carried on a learned correspondence with Roger Gale, the English antiquary, which forms a portion of the 'Reliquiæ Galeanæ,' in Nichols' 'Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica,' 1782

Sir John Clerk was one of the friends and patrons of Allan Ramsay He "admired his genius and knew his worth" During his latter years much of the poet's time was spent at Pennycuik-house, and at his death, Sir John erected at his family seat an obelisk to Ramsay's memory

To Sir John Clerk are ascribed some amatory lines sent to Susanna, daughter of Sir Archibald Kennedy of Culzean, baronet (ancestor of the marquis of Ailsa) whom he courted unsuccessfully, as she became the third wife of Alexander, ninth earl of Eglinton They were thus entitled — "Verses sent anonymously, with a flute, to Miss Susanna Kennedy, afterwards Countess of Eglintoune, by Sir John Clerk of Pennycook, Baronet" On attempting to blow the flute it would not sound, and, on unscrewing it, the lady found the following —

"Harmonious pipe, how I envye thy bliss,
When press'd to Sylphia's lips with gentle kiss'
And when her tender fingers round thee move
In soft embrace, I listen and approve
Those melting notes, which soothe my soul to love
Imbalm'd with odours from her breath that flow,
You yield your music when she's pleased to blow,
And thus at once the charming lovely fair
Delights with sounds, with sweets perfumes the air Go happy pipe, and ever mindful be
To court the charming Sylphia for me,

Tell all I feel—you cannot tell too much—
Repeat my love at each soft melting touch,
Since I to her my liberty resign,
Take then the care to tune her heart to mine"

It was to this lady that Allan Ramsay, in 1726, dedicated his 'Gentle Shepherd'

Sir John Clerk held the office of one of the barons of exchequer till his death, which took place at Pennycuik on the 4th of October 1755 He was twice married, first, February 23, 1701, to Lady Margaret Stewart, eldest daughter of Alexander, third earl of Galloway She died December 26th, the same year, in childbed of a son, John, who died unmarried in 1722 On the death of this young man Allan Ramsay addressed some elegiac verses to his father, Sir John, which are preserved in his works He married, secondly, Janet, daughter of Sir John Inglis, of Cramond, by whom he had seven sons and six daughters

CLERK-MAXWELL, Sir George, of Pennycuik, baronet, distinguished for his spirited efforts to advance the commercial interests of his native country, second son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh in October 1715, and studied at the universities of Edinburgh and Leyden He established, at considerable expense, a linen manufactory at Dumfries, and set on foot many different projects for working lead and copper mines In 1755 he addressed two letters to the trustees for fisheries, manufactories, and improvements in Scotland, containing observations on the common mode of treating wool in this country, and suggesting a more judicious scheme of management These were published by direction of that board in 1756 He likewise wrote a paper on the advantages of shallow ploughing, which was read to the Philosophical Society, and is published in the third volume of their Essays In 1761 he was appointed king's remembrancer in the exchequer, and, in 1763, commissioner of the customs in Scotland He was likewise a trustee for the improvement of the fisheries and manufactures of Scotland In 1782 he succeeded his elder brother, Sir James Clerk, in the baronetcy As already stated, on marrying his cousin, he assumed his wife's name of Maxwell, in addition to his own He died in January 1784

CLERK, John, of Eldin, inventor of the modern British system of naval tactics, was the sixth son of Sir John Clerk of Pennycuik, baronet, and a younger brother of the preceding In early life he inherited from his father the estate of Eldin, in the county of Edinburgh, and married Susannah Adam, the sister of the two celebrated architects of that name Although the longest sail he ever enjoyed was no farther than to the island of Arran, in the frith of Clyde, he had from his boyhood a strong passion for nautical affairs, and devoted much of his attention to the theory and practice of naval tactics In 1779 he communicated to some of his friends his new system of breaking the enemy's line In 1780 he visited London, and had some conferences with men connected with the navy, among whom have been mentioned Mr Richard Atkinson, the particular friend of Sir George, afterwards Lord, Rodney, and Sir Charles Douglas The latter was Rodney's "captain of the fleet," in the memorable action of April 12, 1782, when the experiment was tried for the first time, and Rodney gained a decisive victory over the French, under De Grasse, between Dominica and Les Saintes, in the West Indies Since that time the principle has been adopted by all the British admirals, and Howe, St Vincent, Duncan, and Nelson, owe to Clerk's manœuvre their most signal victories In the beginning of 1782, Mr Clerk, who was a Fellow of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, and also of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, printed fifty copies of his 'Essay on Naval Tactics,' which were privately distributed among his friends This valuable essay was reprinted and published in 1790, the second, third, and fourth parts were added in 1797, and the work was republished entire in 1804, with a preface explaining the origin of his discoveries Although Lord Rodney, as appears by a fragmentary life of Clerk, written by Professor Playfair, published in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, never concealed in conversation his obligations to Mr Clerk as the author of the system, yet the family of that distinguished admiral, in his memoirs, maintain that no communication of Mr Clerk's plan was ever made to their relative Sir Howard Douglas, too, has come forward in various publications to claim the merit of the manœuvre for his father, the late

Admiral Sir Charles Douglas The honour of the suggestion, however, appears to rest indisputably with Mr Clerk, who died May 10, 1812, at an advanced age

CLERK, JOHN, LORD ELDIN, a distinguished lawyer, the son of the preceding, was born in April 1757, and in 1775 was bound apprentice to a writer to the signet His original destination had been the civil service in India, and an appointment in that department had been promised him, but, some political changes occurring before it was completed, the views of his friends were disappointed, and he turned his attention to the law At first he intended to practise as a writer and accountant, but he soon abandoned that branch of the profession, and in 1785 was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates As a lawyer, Mr Clerk was remarkable for great clearness of perception, never-failing readiness and fertility of resource, admirable powers of reasoning, and a quaint sarcastic humour that gave a zest and flavour to all he uttered For many years he had the largest practice at the Scottish bar In private life he was distinguished for his social qualities, his varied accomplishments, his exquisite taste in the fine arts, and his eccentric manners He had a large collection of paintings, and at one period he published a volume of etchings by himself He was raised to the bench in 1823, when he assumed the title of Lord Eldin, and died at Edinburgh in June 1832, aged 74

CLUNIE, a surname derived from the parish of that name in the district of Stormont, Perthshire It is the modern orthography of the old Celtic word Cluain, which signifies "a green pasture between woods"

CLUNIE, the Rev JOHN, author of the well-known Scots song, 'I lo'e na a laddie but ane,' was born about 1757 He was educated for the Church of Scotland, and after being licensed to preach the gospel, he became schoolmaster at Markinch in Fife, and having an excellent voice, he also acted as precentor He was afterwards, about 1790, ordained minister of the parish of Borthwick, in Mid Lothian Burns, in one of his letters to Mr Thomson, dated in September 1794, thus celebrates him for his vocal skill "I am flattered at your adopting 'Ca' the yowes to the knowes,' as it was owing to me that it saw the light About seven years ago I was well acquainted with a worthy little fellow of a clergyman, a Mr Clunie, who sung it charmingly, and at my request Mr Clarke (Stephen Clarke the composer) took it down from his singing Mr. Clunie died at Greenend, near Edinburgh, 13th April, 1819

CLYDE, Baron of the United Kingdom, a title conferred in 1858 on General Sir Colin Campbell See SUPPLEMENT

Clydesdale is also a surname Mr George Clydesdale, minister of the parish of Glassford, Lanarkshire, died in the month of January 1627 In the Inventory of the effects of George Cleland of Glenhoof, Monkland, who "deceist in the moneth of Marche, 1647" it is stated that being an aged man living in company and household with his son, he "had no guds nor geir, at the time of his deceis, except allanerlie the sowme of ffourtie punds Scotts money of yeirlie yairn maill, awand to him be Richard Chddisdaill and George Neilsone, weiflaris (weavers) for the maill of twa yairds in Dryguit, Glasgow"

COCHRAN or COCHRANE, an ancient surname in Scotland, derived from the barony of Cochrane, in the county of Renfrew, and the family name of the earls of Dundonald In the reign of Alexander the Third, Waldenus de Coveran or Cochran, was a witness to the charter given by Dungal (Duff-Gallus,) the son of Swayne, to Walter Cumming, earl of Monteith, of the lands of Skipness and others in Cantyre, in the year 1262 William de Cochran was one of the Scots barons who swore fealty to Edward the First of England in 1296

In the reign of David the Second lived Gosilme de Cochran, father of William Cochran of that ilk, and from him was lineally descended William Cochran of that ilk, who obtained a charter of confirmation from Queen Mary, of the lands of Cochran in 1576, and having erected the ancient seat of Cochrane, he ornamented it with extensive plantations July 7, 1581, he was with John Whiteford of that ilk, and seven others, "delated" of art and part of the cruel slaughter of Patrick Maxwell of Stanley, committed in the previous January, but the laird of Whiteford was the only one put upon trial, and he was acquitted of the charge By his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir Robert Montgomery of Skelmorly, in the county of Ayr, William Cochrane of Cochrane had a daughter, Elizabeth, his sole heiress, and in 1593, he made a settlement of his estate in her favour She married Alexander Blair, a younger son of John Blair of Blair, in Ayrshire, when, in terms of her father's settlement, the latter assumed the name of Cochrane Of this marriage there were seven sons and three daughters The eldest son, Sir John Cochrane, was a colonel in the army of Charles the First, by whom he was sent to solicit the assistance of foreign princes, and was afterwards despatched by Charles the Second on an embassy into Poland in 1650 He died, without issue, before the Restoration, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir William Cochrane of Cowdon, knight, a distinguished loyalist, created, in December 1647, Lord Cochrane of Ochiltree, and in May 1669, earl of Dundonald [See DUNDONALD, earl of]

COCHRAN, ROBERT an eminent architect of the fifteenth century, was born in Scotland, and

educated at Padua in Italy, where he spent several years in the study of the fine arts, particularly architecture On his return he was employed by James the Third to erect several noble structures He first became known to that monarch by his conduct in a duel, and he was afterwards his principal adviser The king, forsaking his nobility, made architects and musicians his principal companions These the haughty barons of Scotland termed masons and fiddlers Cochran, Rogers, a musician, Leonard, a smith, Hommel, a tailor, and Torphichen, a fencing master, were his counsellors and familiars James created Cochran earl of Mar, the title borne by the king's own brother, whom, at the suggestion of his unworthy favourites, he had caused to be put to death All the petitions to the king had to pass through Cochran's hands, and as he received bribes to give his countenance and support he soon amassed great wealth He caused the silver coin of the realm to be mixed with brass and lead, thereby decreasing its real value, while a proclamation was issued that the people were to take it at the same rate as if it were composed of pure silver The people refused to sell their corn and other commodities for this debased coin, which introduced great distress, confusion, and scarcity Some one told Cochran that this money should be called in, and good coin issued in its stead, but he was so confident of the currency of the Cochran placks, as they were called, that he said,—"The day I am hanged they may be called in, not sooner" This speech, which he made in jest, became, in no long time thereafter, sad reality While the king with an army of fifty thousand men lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Lauder, many of the nobility, determined to get rid of the king's favourites, held a secret council in the church of Lauder for the purpose, and when thus engaged a loud knocking was heard at the door This was Cochran himself, attended by a guard of three hundred men, all gaily dressed in his livery of white, with black facings, and armed with partisans He himself was attired in a riding suit of black velvet, and had round his neck a fine chain of gold, whilst a bugle-horn, tipped and mounted with gold, hung by his side Having learnt that there was some consultation holding among the nobility, he came to ascertain its object Sir Robert Douglas, of Lochleven, who had the charge of the door, when he heard the knocking, demanded who was there Cochran answered, "The earl of Mar," on which he was allowed to enter, when Archibald, earl of Angus, met him, and rudely pulled the gold chain from his neck, saying, "a halter would better become him" Sir Robert Douglas, at the same time, snatched away his bugle-horn, saying, "Thou hast been a hunter of mischief too long" "Is this jest or earnest, my lords?" said Cochran, astonished rather than alarmed at this rude reception "It is sad earnest," said they, "and that thou and thy accomplices shall feel, for you have abused the king's favour towards you, and now you shall have your reward according to your deserts" Cochran, who was naturally a man of great courage, offered no resistance, and a party of the nobility having gone to the king's pavilion, they seized in his presence Leonard, Hommel, Torphichen, and the rest, with Preston, one of the only two gentlemen amongst King James' minions, and condemned them to instant death, as having misled the king and misgoverned the kingdom Cochran vainly requested that his hands might not be tied with a hempen rope, but with a silk cord, at the same time offering to furnish it from the cords of his pavilion, which, with the pavilion itself, were of silk instead of the ordinary materials He was told he was but a false knave, and should die with all manner of shame, and his enemies were at pains to procure a hair-tether or halter, as still more ignominious than a rope of hemp With this they hanged Cochran over the centre of the bridge of Lauder, long since demolished, in the middle of his companions, who were suspended on each side of him This took place in July 1484

COCHRAN, William, an artist of considerable reputation in his time, was born at Strathaven in Lanarkshire, December 12, 1738 At the age of 28 he went to Italy, and studied at Rome under his countryman, Gavin Hamilton On his return he settled as a portrait painter in Glasgow, where he soon realized a respectable independence Besides portraits, he painted occasionally historical pieces, two of which, 'Dædalus' and 'Endymion,' rank high in the opinion of connoisseurs He died at Glasgow, October 23, 1785, and lies buried in the cathedral there

COCKBURN, a surname of old standing in Scotland, supposed to be a corruption of COLBRAND In the Ragman Roll of those who swore fealty to Edward I in 1296, occur the names of Piers de Cockburn and Thomas de Cockburn, great ancestors of the Cockburns of Langton, Ormiston, and Clerkington, very ancient vassals of the earls of March, from whom all the Cockburns in Scotland are descended

The principal family of the name are the Cockburns of Langton Their immediate ancestor, Sir Alexander de Cockburn, obtained the barony of Carriden, in Linlithgowshire, from David the Second in 1358, which barony had been forfeited to the crown, by what in the law of Scotland is denominated recognition, or a vassal disponing of his property without the consent of his superior This Sir Alexander de Cockburn was twice married, first to Mary, daughter of Sir William de Veteriponte, or Vipont, proprietor of Langton in Berwickshire, who fell at Bannockburn in 1314, and in her right he obtained the lands and barony of Langton, and, secondly, to Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir John Monfode of Braidwood in Lanarkshire By his first wife he had two sons, Sir Alexander de Cockburn, knight keeper of the great seal between 1389 and 1396, and created by Robert the Second hereditary ostiarius parliamenti, an office annexed to the barony of Langton, by charter of James the Fourth, February 20, 1504 John, the second son, married Jean, daughter and heiress of John Lindsay of Ormiston in East Lothian, and from him descended the Cockburns of Ormiston, of whom afterwards This John Cockburn of Ormiston, or his son, was constable of Haddington, an office hereditary for a long time in the family By his second wife, Sir Alexander Cockburn, the father, had Edward, ancestor of the Cockburns of Skirling, long since extinct In March 1567 Sir William Cockburn of Skirling was appointed by Queen Mary keeper of the castle of Edinburgh, an office which he retained till the following April, when he was succeeded by Sir James Balfour of Pittendreich In 1568 Sir John Cockburn of Skirling was one of the commissioners to England for Mary queen of Scots

From Sir Alexander the son, descended Sir William Cockburn of Langton, knight, who in 1595 obtained a grant of the lands and barony of Langton, with the office of principal usher, and its fees and casualties, to himself and his heirs male whatsoever, bearing the arms and surname of Cockburn He married Helen, daughter of Alexander fourth Lord Elphinstone, and was succeeded by his son, William Cockburn, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1627 In 1641 he was commissioner to the Scots parliament for Berwickshire, and on 13th August of that year he presented a petition to the house concerning the office of great usher, inherited from his ancestors, against John earl of Wigton, who had assumed the office, when a committee was appointed to consider the complaint and report On the 17th of the same month, while the question was still in dependence, on his majesty, Charles the First's entry into the house, Sir William, with a baton in his hand, "too rashly," as Baillie in his Letters says, went before his majesty as principal usher, and "offered to make civil interruption for maintenance of his right against the earl of Wigton" [Balfour's Annals, vol iii p 140] The king, offended at his presumption, immediately signed a warrant for his committal to the castle of Edinburgh as a prisoner The same day, the house interceded with his majesty on his behalf, and after much entreaty the king altered the warrant to confinement in his own chamber till next day On the 18th, his majesty declared in parliament that when he signed the warrant he did not know that Sir William was a member of the house, and he there promised for himself, his heirs and successors, not to commit any member of parliament during session, without the advice and consent of the house, and ordained that declaration and promise to be recorded in the books of parliament The conduct of Sir William in this matter thus led to the recognition of a great constitutional privilege He subsequently alienated one half of the ushership, and became joint usher with Colonel Cunningham

His only son, Sir Archibald Cockburn, second baronet of Langton, was, in 1657, returned heir to his father in the office of principal usher, held jointly with Colonel Cunningham, and also in the barony of Langton and other property In 1664, having purchased Cunningham's interest, he obtained a new grant of the office, with a salary of two hundred and fifty pounds, and other emoluments, for ever Like the Humes of Polwarth and Redbraes, and the Kerrs of Nisbet, this distinguished family was eminent for piety, and suffered in the cause of civil and religious liberty In 1679 they established a meeting in one of the houses attached to Langton castle, where they had regularly preaching from Mr Luke Ogle, Mr John Veitch of Westruther, and Mr Daniel Douglas

Sir Archibald married Lady Mary Campbell, daughter of the earl of Breadalbane, and died in 1705 His eldest son, Sir Archibald Cockburn, third baronet, died without issue, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir Alexander Cockburn, fourth baronet, who was killed at the battle of Fontenoy He was succeeded by his grandson, Sir Alexander Cockburn, fifth baronet, on whose decease the title devolved on his cousin, Sir James, sixth baronet, member of parliament for Peebles-shire in 1762 He married, first, the daughter of Douglas of Muirth, by whom he had three daughters, and secondly, Miss Ayscough, daughter of the dean of Bristol and niece of George Lord Lyttleton, by whom he had five sons and a daughter He died 26th July 1804

Langton was in 1758 sold to David Gavin, Esq, whose daughter married the first marquis of Breadalbane

His eldest son, Sir James Cockburn, 7th baronet, and knight grand cross of Hanover, was in 1806 one of the under secretaries of state, in 1807 governor and commander in chief at Curacoa, and in 1811 governor of the Bermudas He married in 1801 the Hon Marianna Devereux, eldest daughter of the 13th Viscount Hereford, and had an only daughter, Marianna Augusta, married in 1834, to Sir James John Hamilton, baronet, of Woodbrook, county Tyrone, Ireland Dying 26th Feb 1852, he was succeeded by his brother, Admiral Sir George Cockburn

The Right Hon Sir George Cockburn, G C B , the 2d son, admiral of the fleet, and major-general of marines, succeeded his brother as 8th baronet Born in London 22d April 1772, he entered the navy in 1787, and served at the battle of St Vincent, the reduction of Martinique, and in the expedition to the Scheldt In 1810 he commanded at the siege of Cadiz, and in 1814 and 1815 his daring achievements, on the coast of the United States, mainly contributed to the termination of the war with America In 1815 he was appointed commander-in-chief at the Cape and at St. Helena, to which island he conveyed the emperor Napoleon In 1818 he was created a military knight grand cross of the Bath, and in 1827 was sworn a privy councillor In November 1841 he became an admiral of the red, and in 1847 rear-admiral of the United Kingdom He was senior lord of the admiralty from September 1841 to July 1846 He represented Portsmouth in the parliament of 1818, and Weobley in 1820, and sat for Ripon from October 1841 to July 1847 He died August 19, 1853, leaving a daughter, the wife of Captain Hoseason of the navy

His next brother, the Rev William Cockburn dean of York, succeeded as 9th baronet, and died April 30, 1858 His nephew Sir Alexander James-Edmund Cockburn, then became 10th baronet He was made solicitor-general and knighted 1850, attorney general 1851, chief justice of the common pleas 1856, a privy councillor 1857, and lord chief justice of England 1859 Is a son of Alexander Cockburn, 4th son of sixth baronet, minister plenipotentiary to Columbia, (died 1852)

Sir Francis Cockburn, 5th son of Sir James Cockburn, the sixth baronet, general in the army, was in 1837 governor and commander-in-chief of the Bahama islands He was knighted by patent in 1841 He served in Canada and was governor at Honduras

The Cockburns of that ilk and Rysland, also in Berwickshire, are a branch of the same family, their immediate ancestor being Sir William Cockburn, of Langton, knight, who fell at the battle of Flodden Field, 9th September, 1513 By his wife, Anna Home, daughter of Lord Home, he had three sons, namely, Alexander, who was killed fighting by his side at Flodden, John, and Christopher John, the elder of these two, was succeeded by his eldest son, Alexander Cockburn, to whom succeeded his eldest son, William Cockburn, designed of Cockburn and Rysland He married Margaret daughter of John Spottiswood of that ilk, in the same county, and his only son, John Cockburn of Cockburn and Rysland, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1628 He married Mary, daughter of William Scott of Harden, Roxburghshire, and had three sons The eldest, Sir James, second baronet, married Jane, daughter of Alexander Swinton of Swinton, Berwickshire His only son, Sir William, third baronet, was succeeded by his eldest son Sir James, fourth baronet His second son, William Cockburn, was physician-general to the forces under the great duke of Marlborough The fourth baronet died without issue, when the title devolved upon his kinsman, Sir William Cockburn, great-grandson of Dr William Cockburn, who had been succeeded by his second son, Dr James Cockburn This latter had two sons, William Cockburn, doctor in divinity, vicar-general and archdeacon of Ossory in Ireland, and James Cockburn, a colonel in the army and quarter-master, who was father of Sir William the fifth baronet, by Letitia Little, heiress of the ancient houses of Rossiter and Devereux in Ireland Sir William was a lieutenant-general in the army He married, 1st January 1791 Elizabeth Anne, daughter of Colonel Frederick Creutzer, of Manheim in Germany, an officer in the royal horse-guards, and descended, through her mother, the grand daughter of Elizabeth Brydges, sister of the first duke of Chandos, from the royal house of Plantagenet He died in March, 1885, leaving a son and a daughter The son, Sir William Sarsfield Rossiter Cockburn, M A , is the sixth baronet By his wife, Anne, eldest daughter of the Rev Francis Coke of Lower Moor, Herefordshire, he has several children His eldest son, Devereux Plantagenet Cockburn, was born in 1828

The Ormiston branch was for several generations distinguished as lawyers and statesmen On the marriage, as already stated, in 1368, of John, second son of Sir Alexander Cockburn, knight, with the only daughter of Sir Alexander Lindsay of Ormiston in Haddingtonshire, he obtained from his father-in-law a grant of these lands, which was confirmed by a charter of King David the Second the same year Patrick Cockburn of Ormiston kept the castle of Dalkeith for King James the Second against the ninth earl of Douglas, then in rebellion, on account of the murder of his brother the eighth earl Having obtained the command of the town, he put himself at the head of the king's troops, defeated the rebels, though his army was inferior to theirs, and obliged them to retire In 1508, King James the Fourth granted a charter of the lands of Ormiston, on the resignation of John Cockburn in favour of his son John Cockburn younger of Ormiston, and his spouse, Margaret Hepburn On 30th October 1535, Christopher Armstrong, Thomas Armstrong of Mangerton, brother of the celebrated Johnny Armstrong and chief of the clan, with several others, were denounced rebels for not underlying the law for art and part carrying off, under silence of night, on the preceding 27th July, seventy draught oxen and thirty cows from John Cockburn of Ormiston, with three men their keepers

Alexander, son of Sir Alexander Cockburn, born in 1535, having travelled some years for the improvement of his mind, was cut off at the early age of twenty-eight He was a young man of great promise, and was for some time, with two of the sons of the laird of Longniddry, under the charge of John Knox, who, in his History, speaks of him as possessing great accomplishments He was also much esteemed by Buchanan who wrote two elegies on his death

The old house of Ormiston, the seat of the Cockburns, is associated with the memory of George Wishart, the martyr In January 1545, after preaching at Haddington, that eminent reformer went on foot with Cockburn of Ormiston and two of his friends to the house of Ormiston, where the earl of Bothwell made him prisoner, and delivered him to Cardinal Bethune On March 29, 1546, James Lawson of Highriggs and two others, found caution to underly the law for art and part of the assistance afforded to William Cockburn of Ormiston and the young laird of Calder in breaking their ward from the castle of Edinburgh In 1547, John Cockburn of Ormiston and Crichton of Brunston, on account of their favouring the reformed doctrines, were, by the regent Arran and his brother, Archbishop Hamilton of St Andrews, banished the kingdom, and their estates forfeited On August 3, 1548, Ormiston found caution to underly the law

The family of Ormiston for a long series of years occasionally held the office of lord justice-clerk The first of them who filled that office was Sir John Cockburn of Ormiston, who succeeded to the estate in 1583 In July 1588, he was admitted an extraordinary lord of session in the room of Lord Boyd, resigned, and on the death of Sir James Bellenden he was knighted, and appointed lord justice-clerk He was ad mitted an ordinary lord of session 15th February 1593 At the parliament held at Perth in July 1604 he was chosen one of the commissioners to go to England to treat of a project of union then in contemplation In 1621 he voted in parliament in favour of the five articles of Perth In 1623, he resigned the office of lord-justice clerk, and died in June of that year A curious letter is extant, quoted in the appendix to Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol iii, from the Denmylne MSS in the Advocate's Library, addressed by Mr Alexander Colville, justice-depute, to Viscount Annand, a great favourite at court, dated December 20, 1622, relative to the justice-clerkship, in which it is stated that the laird of Ormiston, the then justice-clerk, was "so afflicted with extreme age, blindness and other infirmities that he is altogether disabled either from walking abroad, or discharging the duties," and advising that in the appointment of his successor it should be considered that "young men and men of great clans are most dangerous for that place" Sir John Cockburn married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sir John Bellenden of Auchinoul, and widow of James Lawson of Humbie

The next of the family who filled the office was Adam Cockburn of Ormiston, a younger son of John Cockburn of Ormiston, by his wife Margaret Hepburn He succeeded his brother John, as heir-male in the family estate, 28th December 1671 He was commissioner for the county of Haddington at the convention of estates in the years 1678, 1681, and 1689, and in the Scots parliament for 1696 He was nominated one of the commissioners to treat of the union, 19th April 1689 On 28th November 1692, he was appointed lord justice clerk, in place of Sir George Campbell of Cessnock, and about the same time was sworn a privy councillor On 28th May 1695, he was named one of the commissioners to inquire into the massacre of Glencoe, and about this period he seems to have become unpopular, as in his letters to Mr Carstairs he complains of the "lies raised against him" In one of these, dated 23d July 1695, he particularly complains of the earl of Argyle, who, he observes, 'reflected on the whole commission of Glencoe" On his part, Argyle, in a letter addressed to Carstairs, complains bitterly of the authority given to the lord justice clerk, "who," he says, "with Sir Thomas Livingstone, has powers to seize persons, horses, and arms, without being obliged to be accountable to the council, make close prisoners, or otherwise as they see fit" In February 1699 he was appointed treasurer depute, or chancellor of the exchequer There seems also at this time to have been an intention of making him an ordinary lord of session, which, however, was violently opposed by Argyle, who addressed a strong letter of remonstrance to Mr Carstairs, dated 31st January 1699 On the accession of Queen Anne, he was dismissed from all his offices In January 1705, however, he was again appointed lord justice clerk, and made an ordinary lord of session In 1710 he was superseded in his office of justice clerk by James Erskine of Grange, but retained his place as a lord of session till his death, 16th April 1735, in the seventy-ninth year of his age He was a man of a good understanding and of great application to business, but of a hot and overbearing temper Macky, in his Memoirs, (p 224) writing of him when he was fifty years old, describes him as "a bigot to a fault, and hardly in common charity with any man out of the verge of presbytery, but otherwise a very fine gentleman in his person and manners, just in his dealings, with good sense, and of a sanguine complexion" Dr Houston, however, speaks most unfavourably of him He says, "Of all the (whig) party, Lord Ormiston was the most busy, and very zealous in suppressing the rebellion (of 1715), and oppressing the rebels so that he became universally hated in Scotland, where they called him the curse of Scotland, and when ladies were at cards, playing the nine of diamonds, commonly called 'the curse of Scotland,' they called it 'the Justice Clerk'" He married Lady Susan Hamilton, third daughter of the fourth earl of Haddington, and had two sons, John and Patrick The latter, an advocate, married in 1731 Miss Alison Rutherford of Fairnalee, authoress of one of the sets to the tune of "The Flowers of the Forest" Of his son John, the last but one of the family, and the great promoter of modern agricultural improvement in East Lothian, a notice is given immediately under

Cockburn of Henderland, the famous border freebooter, resided at the old square tower of Blackhouse, once a stronghold of the Douglases on Douglas burn in Selkirkshire, celebrated in song, and his tombstone is still pointed out in that locality With Adam Scott of Tushielaw, he was hanged on the 27th July 1529, by order of King James the Fifth during that monarch's progress for the suppression of disorders on the borders

A distinguished person of this name was Sir Richard Cockburn of Clerkington, lord privy seal in the reign of James the Sixth He was the son of Sir John Cockburn by Helen, daughter of Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, and on 22d April 1591, was appointed secretary of state, on the resignation of his uncle, Sir John Maitland On November 11th the same year he was admitted a lord of session He was afterwards knighted, and in 1594 was sent by King James to demand assistance from Queen Elizabeth to pursue the popish peers, and was absent about six months On the accession of the Octavians to power, he was forced to exchange with John Lindsay of Balcarres, his place of secretary for that of lord privy seal In 1610, when a new privy council was formed, he was continued a privy councillor, and at the same time was appointed a member of the high court of commission for church affairs then constituted On 14th February 1626, he was removed from the bench, in consequence of the resolution of Charles the First that neither nobleman nor officer of state should remain in that judicatory He died in the latter end of that year

In 1401 Patrick Cockburn of Newbigging, lord provost of Edinburgh, was appointed governor of the castle, and named, with other commissioners, after the defeat of the English in the battle of Sark, to treat for the renewal of a truce

COCKBURN, Henry, Lord Cockburn See Supplement

COCKBURN, John, of Ormiston, in East Lothian, the great improver of Scottish husbandry, son of Adam Cockburn of Ormiston, lord-justice-clerk after the Revolution, by his wife Lady Susan Hamilton, was born about 1685 During his father's life he was a member of the Scots parliament, and gave his support to the union of the two kingdoms He afterwards represented East Lothian, in the parliament of Great Britain, from 1707 to 1741, and at one period was a lord of the admiralty, and also held several other public situations, but he was chiefly distinguished by his patriotic exertions to promote the improvement of his native county He succeeded to the family estate in

1714 At that time agriculture in Scotland was in a very low state Mr Cockburn resolved to endeavour not only to rouse up a spirit among the landed proprietors for promoting improvements, but also, by every means of encouragement, to animate the tenantry to conduct their operations with energy and vigour For this purpose he determined to sacrifice his own private interests, and to grant long leases at such low rents as would tempt the most indolent to exercise proper management An attempt was made at one time to set aside these leases, but it did not succeed His enterprising spirit did not rest content even with this He brought down skilful agriculturists from England, who introduced the field culture of turnips, and of red clover, and at the same time he sent up the sons of his tenants to England to study husbandry in the best cultivated counties of that kingdom He also established at Ormiston a society for promoting agricultural improvements His exertions, however, were not confined to husbandry alone In 1726 he erected a brewery and distillery at Ormiston With a view also to promote the growth of flax, he obtained premiums from the board of trustees for encouraging its culture He established a linen manufactory on his estate, and erected a bleachfield for whitening linens, which was the second in Scotland of the kind It was conducted and managed by persons from Ireland, and to this Irish colony, it is said that Scotland is in a great measure indebted for the introduction of the potato, which was raised in the fields of Ormiston so early as 1734 To disseminate a spirit for agricultural improvement through the country, in 1736 he instituted a club or society composed of noblemen, gentlemen, and farmers, who met monthly for the purpose of discussing some appropriate question in rural or political economy It subsisted above ten years He also exerted himself in making the public roads and keeping them in repair He married, first, in 1700, the Hon Beatrix Carmichael, eldest daughter of the first earl of Hyndford, and secondly an English lady related to the duchess of Gordon, by whom he had a son named George In 1718 Mr Cockburn was under the necessity of disposing of his estate to the earl of Hopetoun He died at his son's house in the navy office, London, November 12, 1758 His son, George, who succeeded him, is no farther deserving of notice than as being the last of that distinguished family He was appointed a captain in the navy in 1741, and one of the commissioners of the navy in 1756 He died at Brighton in 1770 He married Caroline, baroness Forrester in her own right, and had a daughter, Anna Maria Cockburn, also baroness Forrester in her own right, who died in 1808 unmarried

COCKBURN, ALICIA, or Alison, authoress of the beautiful lyric, 'I've seen the smiling of fortune beguiling,' which forms one of the popular sets of the 'Flowers of the Forest,' was a daughter of Robert Rutherford of Fairnalee in Selkirkshire The exact year of her birth has not been ascertained It is supposed to have been about 1710 or 1712 We learn from Stenhouse's notes to Johnson's 'Scots Musical Museum,' that her writing of the song which has immortalized her name, was occasioned by the following incident "A gentleman of her acquaintance, in passing through a sequestered but romantic glen, observed a shepherd at some distance tending his flocks, and amusing himself at intervals by playing on a flute The scene altogether was very interesting, and being passionately fond of music, he drew nearer the spot, and listened for some time unobserved to the attractive but artless strains of the young shepherd One of the airs in particular appeared so exquisitely wild and pathetic, that he could no longer refrain from discovering himself, in order to obtain some information respecting it from the rural performer On inquiry, he learned that it was 'The Flowers of the Forest' This intelligence exciting his curiosity, he was determined, if possible, to obtain possession of the air He accordingly prevailed on the young man to play it over and over, until he picked up every note, which he immediately committed to paper on his return home Delighted with this new discovery, as he supposed, he lost no time in communicating it to Miss Rutherford, who not only recognised the tune, but likewise repeated some detached lines of the old ballad Anxious, however, to have a set of verses adapted to his favourite melody, and well aware that few, if any, were better qualified than Miss Rutherford, for such a task, he took the liberty of begging this favour at her hand She obligingly consented, and, in a few days thereafter, he had the pleasure of receiving the stanzas from the fair author "

In her youth Miss Rutherford must have been very beautiful, for in a work by a Mr Fairbairn, styled "Professor of the French," published at Edinburgh in 1727, entitled 'L'Eloge d'Ecosse, et des Dames Ecossoises,' in which all the rank and beauty of the time are described in the most glowing terms, we find her mentioned as among the most charming ladies of that day, with Mademoiselles Peggie Campbell, Murray, Pringle, Drummond, and nineteen others, her name, Alice Rutherford, as perhaps the youngest, being the last in the list She married, in 1731, Patrick Cockburn, advocate, youngest son of Adam Cockburn, of Ormiston, lord justice clerk of Scotland, and brother of the subject of the preceding notice Her husband "acted as commissioner," says Sir Walter Scott, "for the duke of Hamilton of that day, and being, as might be expected from his family, a sincere friend to the Revolution and protestant succession, he used his interest with his principal to prevent him from joining in the intrigues which preceded the insurrection of 1745, to which his grace [who was then only in his twenty-second year], is supposed to have had a strong inclination" Mr Cockburn died at Musselburgh, "after a tedious illness," 29th April, 1753 His widow survived him for more than forty years She was distantly related to the mother of Sir Walter Scott, who was the eldest daughter of Dr John Rutherford, professor of medicine in the university of Edinburgh, a relation of Mr Rutherford of Fairnielee, and through life she continued in habits of great intimacy with Mrs Scott

Sir Walter's own personal recollections of this highly gifted and accomplished woman are very interesting "A turret in the old house of Fairnalee," says he, "is still shown as the place where the poem ('I have seen the smiling,' &c) was written The occasion was a calamitous period in Selkirkshire, or Ettrick Forest, when no fewer than seven lairds or proprietors, men of ancient family and inheritance, having been engaged in some imprudent speculations, became insolvent in one year" At the time of the rebellion of 1745 he describes Mrs Cockburn as a keen whig, or adherent of the government She was the authoress of several parodies and little poetical pieces, and Sir Walter mentions particularly a set of toasts descriptive of some of her friends, and sent to a company where most of them were assembled, which were so accurately drawn that the originals were at once recognised on their being read aloud One upon Sir Walter Scott's father, then a young and remarkably handsome man, is given as a specimen

To a thing that's uncommon—
A youth of discretion,
Who, though vastly handsome,
Despises flirtation
To the friend in affliction,
The heart of affection,
Who may hear the last trump
Without dread of detection

"My mother and Mrs Cockburn were related, says Sir Walter, "in what degree I know not, but sufficiently near to induce Mrs Cockburn to distinguish her in her will Mrs Cockburn had the misfortune to lose an only son, Patrick Cockburn, who had the rank of captain in the dragoons, several years before her own death She was one of those persons whose talents for conversation made a stronger impression on her contemporaries, than her writings can be expected to produce In person and features she somewhat resembled Queen Elizabeth, but the nose was rather more aquiline She was proud of her auburn hair, which remained unbleached by time, even when she was upwards of eighty years old She maintained the rank in the society of Edinburgh, which Frenchwomen of talents usually do in that of Paris, and in her little parlour used to assemble a very distinguished and accomplished circle, among whom David Hume, John Home, Lord Monboddo, and many other men of name were frequently to be found Her evening parties were very frequent, and included society distinguished both for condition and talents The petit souper, which always concluded the evening, was like that of Stella, which she used to quote on the occasion —

A supper like her mighty self,
Four nothings on four plates of delf

But they passed off more gaily than many costlier entertainments She spoke both wittily and well, and maintained an extensive correspondence, which, if it continues to exist, must contain many things highly curious and interesting My recollection is, that her conversation brought her much nearer to a Frenchwoman than to a native of England, and, as I have the same impression with respect to ladies of the same period and the same rank in society, I am apt to think that the vieille cour of Edinburgh rather resembled that of Paris than that of St James's, and particularly, that the Scotch imitated the Parisians in laying aside much of the expense and form of these little parties, in which wit and good humour were allowed to supersede all occasion of display The lodging where Mrs Cockburn received the best society of her time, would not now afford accommodation to a very inferior person"

In the notes to the first volume of Johnson's Scots Musical Museum, Stenhouse's edition, two songs by Mrs Cockburn are inserted, which were communicated by Mr Kirkpatrick Sharpe, who has added marginal notes explanatory of the allusions to the persons described in them The one is entitled 'A Copy of Verses wrote by Mrs Cockburn on the back of a picture of Sir Hew Dalrymple,' to the tune of 'All you ladies now at Land,' the other is a lively drinking piece beginning 'All health be round Balcarras' board,' to the same tune, which seems to have been a favourite with her Sir Walter Scott mistook her first name, and called her Catherine instead of Alice In the entry of her marriage in the parish registers of Ormiston, under date 12th March 1731, she is styled Alison Rutherford She died at Edinburgh on the 22d of November 1794, when she was above eighty "Even at an age," says Sir Walter Scott, (in his 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,' vol iii page 338, edition 1833,) "advanced beyond the usual bounds of humanity, she retained a play of imagination, and an activity of intellect, which must have been attractive and delightful in youth, but were almost preternatural at her period of life Her active benevolence, keeping pace with her genius, rendered her equally an object of love and admiration The editor, who knew her well, takes this opportunity of doing justice to his own feelings, and they are in unison with those of all who knew his regretted friend" The following extract of a letter from a lady to Charles K Sharpe, Esq, in reference to Mrs Cockburn, is inserted among Mr David Laing's illustrative notes to Stenhouse's edition of Johnson's Musical Museum —"She had a pleasing countenance and piqued herself upon always dressing according to her own taste, and not according to the dictates of fashion Her brown hair never grew grey, and she wore it combed up upon a toupee—no cap—a lace hood tied under her chin, and her sleeves puffed out in the fashion of Queen Elizabeth, which is not uncommon now, but at that time was quite peculiar to herself" She left property to the amount of £3,800, the bulk of which went to two nieces, Anne Pringle and Mrs Simpson Her last will and testament, in which Mark Pringle, Esq of Clifton, and Alexander Keith, W S, are named executors, was confirmed 23d January 1795 The bequest to Sir Walter Scott's mother is thus mentioned "I promised Mrs Walker (a mistake for Walter) Scott my emerald ring, with it she has my prayers for her and hers Much attention she and her worthy husband paid me in my hours of deepest distress, when my son was dying" She mentions some of her poorer relations in affectionate terms, and leaves them small annuities, and frequently alludes to her son, who died in 1780 A lock of her hair was enclosed for two hair-rings for her "earliest and most constant and affectionate friends, Mrs Keith of Ravelstone, and her brother, William Swinton" Also a ring with Sir Hugh Dalrymple's hair, intended for Mrs Dalrymple, "is now to be given to her son Sir Hugh D, for whom Mrs C has great affection" She desires that her sister Fauntlie, if she outlives her, "may have twenty pounds for mourning, besides the ring already mentioned, and also, I leave her the charge of my favourite cat" She gives some directions about her funeral, and seems to have written an epitaph for herself, as she adds, "Shorten or correct the epitaph to your taste"

COCKBURN, Patrick, a learned professor of the oriental languages, was a son of Cockburn of Langton in the Merse, and educated at the university of St Andrews After taking holy orders, he went to the university of Paris, where he taught the oriental languages for several years In 1551 and 1552 he published at Paris two religious works which brought him under the suspicion of heresy, and compelled him to quit Paris On his return to Scotland he embraced the doctrines of the Reformation He taught the languages for some years at St Andrews, and in 1555 published there some pious meditations on the Lord's Prayer He was afterwards chosen minister of Haddington, being the first protestant preacher in that place He died far advanced in years, in 1559 He left several manuscripts on subjects of divinity, and some letters and orations, of which a treatise on the 'Apostles' Creed' was published at London, 1561, 4to His published works are

COLQUHOUN, an ancient surname in Scotland, borne by a clan whose territory is in Dumbartonshire, and whose badge is the hazel The principal families of the name are Colquhoun of Colquhoun and Luss, the chief of the clan, a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia, created in 1704, and of Great Britain in 1786, Colquhoun of Killermont and Garscadden, Colquhoun of Aldenconnell, and Colquhoun of Glenmallin There was likewise Colquhoun of Filliquhoun, a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia (1625), but this family is extinct

The origin of the name is territorial One tradition deduces the descent of the first possessor from a younger son of the old earls of Lennox, because of the similitude of their armorial bearings It is certain that they were anciently vassals of that potent house

The immediate ancestor of the family of Luss was Humphry de Kilpatrick, who, in the reign of Alexander the Second, obtained a grant of the lands and barony of Colquhoun, pro servitio unius militis, &c , and in consequence assumed the name of Colquhoun, instead of his own

His son, Ingelram de Colquhoun, lived in the reign of Alexander the Third In a charter of Malcolm, fourth earl of Lennox, in favour of Malcolm, son and heir of Sir John de Luss, of the lands of Luss, in 1280, Ingelram de Colquhoun is a witness His son, Humphry de Colquhoun, is witness in a charter of Malcolm, fifth earl of Lennox, in favour of Sir John de Luss, which was confirmed by Robert the First in 1316 The following remarkable reference to the construction of a house for the Colquhounorum, by order of King Robert

Bruce, is extracted from the Compotum Constabularii de Cardross, vol 1, in the accounts of the Great Chamberlains of Scotland, under date 30th July 1329, as quoted by Mr Tytler in the appendix to the second volume of his History of Scotland "Item, in construccione cujusdam domus ad opus Culquhanorum Domini Regis ibidem, 10 solidi" Mr Tytler in a note says that Culquhanorum is 'an obscure word, which occurs nowhere else—conjectured by a learned friend to be 'keepers of the dogs,' from the Gaelic root Gillen-au-con—abbreviated, Gillecon, Colquhoun"

Sir Robert de Colquhoun, the son of the last mentioned Humphry, in the reign of David Bruce, married the daughter and sole heiress of Humphry de Luss, lord of Luss, head or chief of an ancient family of that name, whose extensive possessions lay in the mountainous but beautiful and picturesque district on the margin of Loch Lomond and the sixth or seventh in a direct male line from Maldum, dean of Lennox, who, in the beginning of the twelfth century, received from Alwyn, second earl of Lennox, a charter of the lands of Luss Sir Robert was afterwards designed dominus de Colquhoun and de Luss, in a charter dated in 1368, since which time the family have borne the designation of Colquhoun of Colquhoun and Luss He is also witness in a charter of the lands of Auchmar by Walter of Faslane, lord of Lennox, to Walter de Buchanan in 1373 He had three sons, namely Sir Humphry, his heir, Robert, first of the family of Camstraddan, from whom several other families of the name of Colquhoun in Dumbartonshire are descended, and Patrick, who is mentioned in a charter from his brother Sir Humphry to his other brother Robert

The eldest son, Sir Humphry, is a witness in two charters by Duncan earl of Lennox in the years 1390, 1394, and 1395 He had two sons and two daughters Patrick, his younger son, was ancestor of the Colquhouns of Glenns, from whom the Colquhouns of Barrowfield, Piemont, and others were descended The eldest son, Sir John Colquhoun, was appointed governor of the castle of Dumbarton in the minority of King James the Second From his activity in punishing the depredations of the Highlanders, who often committed great outrages in the low country of Dumbartonshire, he rendered himself obnoxious to them, and a plot was formed for his destruction He received a civil message from some of their chiefs, desiring a friendly conference, in order to accommodate all their differences Suspecting no treachery he went out to meet them but slightly attended, and was immediately attacked by a numerous body of Islanders, under two noted robber chiefs, Lachlan Maclean and Murdoch Gibson, and slain in Inchmurren, on Loch Lomond, in 1440 By his wife, Jean, daughter of Robert Lord Erskine, he had a son, Malcolm, a youth of great promise, who was one of the hostages for the ransom of King James the First He died before his father, leaving a son, Sir John, who succeeded his grandfather in 1440 This Sir John Colquhoun was one of the most distinguished men of his age in Scotland, and highly esteemed by King James the third, from whom he got a charter, under the great seal, of several lands in 1462, and in 1463 he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him The same year he was appointed clerk register for Scotland From 1465 to 1469 he held the high office of comptroller of the Exchequer He was subsequently appointed sheriff principal of Dumbartonshire In 1465 he got a grant of the lands of Kilmardinny, and in 1472 and in 1473, of Roseneath, Strone, &c In 1474 he was appointed lord high chamberlain of Scotland, and immediately thereafter was nominated one of the ambassadors extraordinary to the court of England, to negociate a marriage between the prince royal of Scotland, and the princess Cicily, daughter of King Edward the Fourth By a royal charter dated 17th September 1477 he was constituted governor of the castle of Dumbarton for life He was killed by a cannon-ball, in defending that fortress against besiegers 1st May 1478 By his wife, daughter of Thomas Lord Boyd, he had two sons and one daughter His second son, Robert, was bred to the church, and was first rector of Kippen and Luss, and afterwards bishop of Argyle from 1473 to 1499 The daughter, Margaret, married Sir William Murray, seventh baron of Tullibardine (ancestor of the dukes of Athol), and bore to him seventeen sons His eldest son, Sir Humphry Colquhoun, died in 1493, and was succeeded by his son, Sir John Colquhoun, who received the honour of knighthood from King James the Fourth, and obtained a charter under the great seal of sundry lands and baronies in Dumbartonshire, dated 4th December 1506 On 11th July 1526 he and Patrick Colquhoun his son received a respite for assisting John earl of Lennox in treasonably besieging, taking, and holding the castle of Dumbarton On 20th July 1535, Patrick Colquhoun and Adam his brother, with twenty-five others, found security to underly the law for intercommuning with and assisting Humphry Galbraith and his accomplices, rebels and "at the horn," for the slaughter of Stirling of Glorat Sir John Colquhoun himself would also have been prosecuted for the same, but that he was "proved to be sick," and he died soon after, as on 16th August 1536 one Walter Macfarlane found caution that he would appear at the next justice-air at Dumbarton and take his trial, for convocation of the lieges in warlike manner, and besetting the way of the widow of Sir John Colquhoun and David Farnely of Colmiston, being for the time in her company, for their slaughter By his first wife, Margaret Stewart, daughter of John earl of Lennox, ancestor of the royal family, Sir John Colquhoun had two sons and four daughters, and by his second wife, Margaret, daughter of William Cunninghame of Craigends, he had two sons His eldest son, Sir Humphry Colquhoun, married Lady Catherine Graham, daughter of William first earl of Montrose, and died in 1537 His son, Sir John Colquhoun, married Agnes, daughter of the fourth Lord Boyd, ancestor of the earls of Kilmarnock, by whom, with two daughters, he had three sons, namely, Humphry, John, and Alexander He died before 1583 His eldest son, Humphry, acquired the heritable coronership of the county of Dumbarton, from Robert Graham of Knockdolhan, which was ratified and confirmed by a charter under the great seal in 1583 In July 1592 some of the Macgregors and Macfarlanes came down upon the low country of Dumbartonshire, and committed vast ravages, especially upon the territory of the Colquhouns At the head of his vassals, and accompanied by several of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, Sir Humphry Colquhoun attacked the invaders, and after a bloody conflict, which was only put an end to at nightfall, and in which he was worsted, he retired to his strong castle of Bannachrea, but was closely pursued by a party of the Macfarlanes, who broke into his castle and found him in a vault, where they put him to death under circumstances of extreme atrocity His next brother, John, seems to have been implicated in this cruel murder, as he was beheaded at Edinburgh for the crime on the last day of November 1592 Sir Humphry married first Lady Jean Cunningham, daughter of Alexander, fifth earl of Glencairn, widow of the earl of Argyle, by whom he had no children, and, secondly, Jean daughter of John Lord Hamilton, by whom he had a daughter Having no male issue he was succeeded by his younger brother, Alexander

quhoun, got a charter under the great seal of the lands of Woltoun, Auchindouarie, &c, in Dumfries-shire, dated 5th February 1597 In his time occurred the bloody clan conflict of Glenfruin, between the Colquhouns and Macgregors, in February 1603, regarding which the popular accounts are so much at variance with the historical facts The Colquhouns had taken part in the execution of the letters of fire and sword issued by the crown against the Macgregors some years before, and the feud between them had been greatly aggravated by various acts of violence and aggression on both sides One of these, tradition, mistaking the name of the chief of the Colquhouns, namely, Alexander, for his brother Sir Humphry, murdered eleven years previously in his castle of Bannachrea, relates as follows Two of the clan-Gregor were said to have been benighted in the territory of the Colquhouns, and applied at the house of a dependent of the laird of Luss for food and shelter, which were denied them Returning to an outhouse they killed a sheep, for which, after they had partaken of it, they offered payment, but instead of its being accepted, they were seized and carried before the chief of the Colquhouns, who ordered them to be instantly executed To revenge their death the chief of the clan-Gregor, Allester Macgregor of Glenstrae, assembled a force of about four hundred men, and marched towards Luss The chief of the Colquhouns hastily mustered his retainers, and being joined by the Buchanans and other friendly septs, and by a body of the citizens of Dumbarton, under the command of Tobias Smollett, a magistrate of that town, and an ancestor of the author of Roderick Random, his forces soon amounted to double the number of the Macgregors Logan, in his History of the Gael, follows the tradition in naming the chief of the Colquhouns Sir Humphry, and Sibbert, in his History of the Highland clans, not only adopts this mistake, but goes still farther wrong in making Sir Humphry's murder take place sometime after the conflict at Glenfruin, and then at the instigation of a man of power whom the laird of Luss had offended, rather than from private motives of enmity on the part of the Macfarlanes, as already narrated If there is any truth in the story of the execution of the two Macgregors, it must have been done by order of Alexander Colquhoun But in the dying declaration of Allester Macgregor, who was hanged at Edinburgh with some of the clan, there is nothing said respecting the execution of these two men as the cause of the conflict The invasion of the Lennox by the Macgregors was but the result of the lasting feud which subsisted between the two clans The Macgregors and Colquhouns met at Glenfruin, a short distance from Luss, on the day named, and after a fierce contest, the latter were defeated, with one hundred and forty men slain The laird of Luss escaped only by the fleetness of his horse The Macgregors carried off six hundred head of cattle, eight hundred sheep and goats, two hundred and eighty horses, with the "whole plenishing, goods and gear of Luss" The fatal field was ever after called by the Highlanders, the vale of Sorrow or Lamentation After the battle, many of the widows of the slain Colquhouns appeared in deep mourning, before King James the Sixth at Stirling, and exhibiting on spears eleven score bloody shirts belonging to their deceased husbands, demanded vengeance on the Macgregors The device succeeded The whole Macgregor race was proscribed and their very name prohibited, and it was not till the year 1774 that the severe penal enactments against them were finally repealed A curious letter from Alexander Colquhoun, the laird of Colquhoun and Luss, to James the Sixth, has been preserved It bears date 1606, and shows that Alexander had proceeded actively against the Macfarlanes for their murder of his brother, as well as for many other alleged injuries, including "slaughters, murthers, harishps, thefts, reivings, and oppressions, fire-raising, demolishing of houses, cutting and destroying woods and plantings" For merely civil compensation the courts had decreed to him sixty-two thousand pounds Scots, a large sum in those days, but the laird of Luss refers his whole injuries, civil and criminal, to the royal consideration By his wife Helen, daughter of Sir George Buchanan of that ilk, he had five sons and a daughter

The eldest son, Sir John, in his father's lifetime, got a charter under the great seal of the ten pound land of Dunnerbuck, dated 20th February 1602 He was by King Charles the First created a baronet of Nova Scotia by patent dated the last day of August 1625 He adhered firmly to the royal cause during all the time of the civil wars, on which account he suffered many hardships, and, in 1654, was by Cromwell fined two thousand pounds sterling He married Lady Lillias Graham, daughter of the fourth earl of Montrose, brother of the great marquis, by whom he had three sons and two daughters His two eldest sons succeeded to the baronetcy From Alexander, the third son, the Colquhouns of Killyquhoun were descended

Sir John, the second baronet of Luss, married Margaret, daughter and sole heiress of Sir Gideon Baillie of Lochend, in the county of Haddington, and had one son, John, who died unmarried, and four daughters He was succeeded, in 1676, by his brother, Sir James, third baronet of Luss, who married Penuel, daughter of William Cunningham of Balleichan in Ireland He had, with one daughter, a son, Sir Humphry, fourth baronet The latter was a member of the last Scottish parliament, and strenuously opposed and voted against every article of the treaty of union By his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir Patrick Houston of that ilk, baronet, he had an only daughter, Anne Colquhoun, his sole heiress, who, in 1702, married James Grant of Pluscardine, second son of Ludovick Grant of Grant, immediate younger brother of Brigadier Alexander Grant, heir apparent of the said Ludovick Having no male issue, Sir Humphry, with the design that his daughter and her husband should succeed him in his whole estate and honours, in 1704 resigned his baronetcy into the hands of her majesty Queen Anne, for a new patent to himself in liferent, and his son-in-law and his heirs therein named in fee, but with this express limitation that he and his heirs so succeeding to that estate and title should be obliged to bear the name and arms of Colquhoun of Luss, &c It was also specially provided that the estates of Grant and Luss should not be conjoined Sir Humphry died in 1718, and was succeeded in his estate and honours by James Grant his son in law, under the name and designation of Sir James Colquhoun of Luss He enjoyed that estate and title till the death of his elder brother, Brigadier Alexander Grant, in 1719, when, succeeding to the estate of Grant, he relinquished the name and title of Colquhoun of Luss, and resumed his own, retaining the baronetcy, it being by the last patent vested in his person He died in 1747 By the said Anne, his wife, he had a numerous family His eldest son, Humphry Colquhoun, subsequently Humphry Grant of Grant, died unmarried in 1732 The second son, Ludovick, became Sir Ludovick Grant of Grant, baronet, [see GRANT of GRANT, and SEAFIELD Earl of], while the third son James succeeded as Sir James Colquhoun of Luss He is the amiable and very polite gentlemen described by Smollett in his immitable novel of Humphry Clinker, under the name of "Sir George Colquhoun, a colonel in the Dutch service" He married Lady Helen Sutherland, daughter of William Lord Strathnaver, son of the nineteenth earl of Sutherland, and by her he had three sons and five daughters. In 1777 he founded the town of Helensburgh on the frith of Clyde, and named it after his wife To put an end to some disputes which had arisen with regard to the destination of the old patent of the Nova Scotia baronetcy, (John Colquhoun of Tillyquhoun, as the eldest cadet, having, on the death of his cousin-german, Sir Humphry Colquhoun, in 1718, assumed the title as heir male of his grandfather, the patentee,) Sir James was, in 1786, created a baronet of Great Britain His second youngest daughter, Margaret, married William Baillie, a lord of session under the title of Lord Polkemet and was the mother of Sir William Baillie, baronet Sir James died in November 1786

His eldest son, Sir James Colquhoun, 2d bart, sheriff-depute of Dumbartonshire, was one of the principal clerks of session By his wife, Jane, daughter and co-heir of James Falconer, Esq of Monktown, he had five sons and four daughters He died in 1805 His eldest son, Sir James, third baronet, was, for some time, M P for Dumbartonshire He married, on 13th June 1799, his cousin Janet, daughter of Sir John Sinclair, baronet, and had three sons and two daughters Of this lady, who died October 21, 1846, and who was distinguished for her virtues, piety, and benevolence, a memoir by the Rev James Hamilton, D D, London was published in 1849 from which the following portrait is taken

Hope and Despair, a Narrative founded on fact 1822

Thoughts on the Religious Profession and Defective Practice of the Higher Classes in Scotland By a Lady 1823

Impressions of the Heart, relative to the Nature and Excellence of Genuine Religion 1825

The Kingdom of God, containing a brief account of its Properties, Trials, Privileges, and Duration 1836

The World's Religion as contrasted with Genuine Christianity 1839

The eldest son, Sir James Colquhoun, the fourth baronet of the new creation, and the eighth of the old patent, succeeded on his father's death, 3d Feb 1836, chief of the Colquhouns of Luss, Lord-lieutenant of Dumbartonshire, and M P for that county from 1837 to 1841 He married in June 1843, Jane, daughter of Sir Robert Abercromby of Birkenbog She died 3d May 1844, leaving one son, James, born in 1844

The family mansion, Ross-dhu, is situated on a beautiful peninsula, as the name indicates As the family possessions all lie between an arm of the sea and an inland lake—Loch Gare and Loch Lomond—the name of Colquhoun, in Scotland pronounced Co-whoon (whence the surname Cowan), or as humorously adverted to by Smollett in his Humphry Clinker, Coon is, among other conjectures, supposed to be derived from Col, in old French, a hill, or rather an elevated neck connecting two mountains or detached peaks, and quhon, quom, or quhom, (pronounced cune or whoon, in modern Spanish,) an angular wedge, which would correctly describe the nature of the property, being the high wedge-shaped land extending between two mountains at the angle where Loch Gare issues from the Clyde These possessions may therefore have been so called from the Normans who appear to have accompanied David when, as count, he governed the southern portion of Scotland, or Cumbria, during the reign of Alexander the First, and, as we learn by a curious inquest held in the reign of Alexander the Second, resided in the neighbourhood of Dumbarton To the possessions of the family of Colquhoun was added in 1852 the estate of Ardincaple, purchased from the duchess dowager of Argyle

Robert, a younger son of Sir Robert Colquhoun of that ilk, who married the heiress of Luss, was the first of the Colquhouns of Camstrodden, which estate, with the lands of Achmaghan, he obtained by charter, dated 4th July 1395, from his brother Sir Humphry Sir James Colquhoun, 2d baronet, purchased that estate from the hereditary proprietor, and reannexed it to the estate of Luss

The estate of Tillichewan (or as now written Tillechewan), once belonging to the eldest branch of the Colquhouns became the property of William Campbell, Esq, merchant, Glasgow

COLQUHOUN, PATRICK, a metropolitan magistrate, and well-known writer on statistics and criminal jurisprudence, descended from an ancient family, was born at Dumbarton, March 14, 1745 His father, who held the office of registrar of the records of the county of Dumbarton, was nearly related to Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, baronet He was a class-fellow of Smollett, and died at the early age of forty-four His son, the subject of this notice, before he had attained his sixteenth year went to Virginia to engage in commercial pursuits In 1766 he returned home, and settled in Glasgow, where, in 1775, he married a lady of his own name In January 1782 he was elected Lord Provost of Glasgow, and having devised a plan for a chamber of commerce and manufactures in that city, he obtained a royal charter for it, and became its chairman He filled several other civic offices with great credit and reputation

In November 1789 he removed to London with his family, and having composed several popular treatises on the subject of the Police, he was, in 1792, when seven public offices were established, appointed to one of them, through the influence of his friend Mr Henry Dundas, afterwards Viscount Melville, and as a police magistrate, he distinguished himself by his activity and application In 1795 he published a 'Treatise on the Police of the Metropolis,' which passed through six large editions This work procured him, in 1797, the degree of LL D from the university of Glasgow He was also appointed, by the legislature of the Virgin Islands, in the West Indies, agent for the colony in Great Britain In 1800 appeared his 'Treatise on the Police of the River Thames,' containing an historical account of the trade of the port of London, and suggesting means for the protection of property on the river and in the adjacent parts of the metropolis His plan was afterwards adopted, and a new police-office erected at Wapping As some acknowledgment of the success of his endeavours to promote the safe navigation of the river Thames, it may be stated that the West India merchants presented him with the sum of five hundred pounds, while the Russia Company voted him a piece of plate to the value of one hundred guineas Mr Colquhoun died April 25, 1820, aged seventy-five, having resigned his official situation about two years previous to his decease By his will he left the sum of two hundred pounds sterling to the ministers and elders of the parish of Dumbarton, the interest of which to be divided yearly among poor people of the name of Colquhoun, in the parishes of Dumbarton, Cardross, Bonhill, and Old Kilpatrick, not receiving parochial aid His works are

COLQUHOUN, JOHN, D D, an eminent minister of the Church of Scotland, was the son of a small farmer on the estate of Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, baronet, in Dumbartonshire, where he was born on New Year's day, 1748 In his boyhood he herded sheep on the Mulea hill, and till thirty years of age plied the shuttle of a hand loom weaver He received the rudiments of education at a neighbouring school under the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge in Scotland, and as an instance of his early desire for religious information, it is related that a perusal of Boston's Fourfold State having been recommended to him by his teacher, he travelled to Glasgow, (a distance of nearly fifty miles in going and returning,) in order to procure a copy of the work With the view of studying for the church, he became a student at the university of Glasgow about the year 1768, and remained there for the greater part of ten years After attending a session at the university of Edinburgh, he was licensed at Glasgow to preach the gospel in August 1780 He soon received a call to the new church, or chapel of ease (now St John's church), South Leith, and was ordained its pastor March 22, 1781 From that period, for nearly half-a-century, he continued to discharge the duties of his ministry at Leith with distinguished zeal, his time being exclusively devoted to study and his pastoral office Not the least interesting and salutary portion of his labours were the weekly conversations held on the Friday evenings at his own house All who chose to come were welcome, and many students were in the habit of attending to profit by his instructions, and to obtain his advice, ever readily extended, as to the prosecution of their studies Towards the close of his life, an unhappy misunderstanding took place with his congregation respecting the appointment of an assistant For several years he had been unable to preach regularly, and appeared for the last time in the pulpit on the forenoon of the 18th November 1826 His death, however, did not take place till the 27th November 1827 He was interred in the churchyard of South Leith, and his funeral sermon was preached by Dr Jones of Lady Glenorchy's chapel, Edinburgh

The Rev Dr James Hamilton of the National Scottish Church, Regent Square, London, in his Memoir of Lady Colquhoun, (pp 143–144) pays the following well-deserved and appropriate tribute to Dr Colquhoun's memory —"For nearly fifty years he was minister of the New Kirk, Leith, and to his solid and systematic expositions of scripture, hearers resorted not only from the city of Edinburgh but from places as remote as Dalkeith and Newbattle Besides Boston and the Erskines, his theological models were Witsius and Maestricht, Voetius and Cloppenburg, and his own mind had all the system and precision of a Dutch divine No modern better merited the title so often bestowed on the Puritans, — 'a painful preacher of the holy gospel' His expositions were ready-made commentaries, and every sermon was a chapter in a forthcoming treatise, whilst his deliberate enunciation, like an audible typography, rendered ample justice to every italic, dot, and hyphen It would, however, be a great mistake to fancy that he was a mere systematist Much as they valued his methodical arrangement and exhaustive copiousness, the best of his hearers prized still more his affectionate applications of the truth, and the singular judgment with which he handled questions of conscience And in the midst of his mild catholicity, to many there was a peculiar charm in his covenanting fervour Some of them can still remember (this was written in 1849) with what pathos he used to pray that the Most High 'would revive the credit of a covenanted work of reformation, that he would repair the carved work of the sanctuary, which had been broken down, and build up the breaches of Zion, which are wide as the sea,' and they can tell how, in concluding an exposition of the Psalms which had lasted seventeen years, he remarked, 'I have much reason to bless the Lord that I have never, like many of my brethren, been so far left to myself as to use in the public worship of God hymns of human composition' Dr Hamilton describes him as having a "fair, soft countenance, surmounted by its sleek, yellow wig" A portrait of Dr Colquhoun, taken in 1793, will be found in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits He was twice married, but had no children His works are

COLT, a surname originally French, introduced into Scotland by Blais-Coult, who fled from France during the persecution of the Huguenots, and repairing to St Andrews, became a professor in the college there He was the ancestor of the Colts of Auldhame in Haddingtonshire, and Gartsherrie in Lanarkshire His son, Oliver Colt, was a lawyer in the time of Mary queen of Scots, and Oliver's son, Adam Colt, was educated for the church, and became minister of Inveresk, being the second after the Reformation He distinguished himself among those ministers who opposed the arbitrary proceedings of King James the Sixth in his disputes with the General Assembly In 1601, when the king was headstrong to have the ministers of Edinburgh transported, he opposed the king face to face in the Assembly on their behalf The king's chief argument was that he himself, who was a principal parishioner in his chief city, could not be edified by them Mr Adam Colt answered that by that reason, when he is angry at any minister in the country, he may, if he will, have him transported, the preparative whereof had already passed in St Andrews, which was very dangerous The king called him a seditious knave, and asked, "Why he supposed such a thing?" "I suppose," he added, "Mr Adam Colt would steal neate, then he should be hanged" [Calderwood's History, vol vi p 120] In 1606 he was one of eight ministers sent for to court, by a letter from the king, under the pretext of conferring as to the state of the church, but the real object was to have them out of the way, until the king had got his designs more matured with regard to the establishment of episcopacy, under colour of a national assembly With Messrs Andrew and James Melville, and the others, he took part in the conferences with the king held at Hampton Court in September of that year Finding that the intention was to detain them in England, the eight ministers used means for their license to return, and on March 8, 1607, gave in a supplication to the privy council for that purpose On the 1st of May they received orders to depart, but to restrict themselves to various places, principally to their own parishes Mr Colt was minister at Inveresk for upwards of fifty years

His son, Oliver Colt, succeeded him, and was minister of Inveresk till 1679 The latter's son, Sir Robert Colt, was an eminent lawyer, and solicitor to James the Seventh He was the father of Adam Colt, an advocate and dean of faculty Adam's son, Oliver Colt, Esq of Auldhame, in Haddingtonshire, and Inveresk, county of Edinburgh, married the Hon Helen Stuart, daughter of Robert seventh Lord Blantyre, and had two sons and four daughters The elder son, Robert Colt, Esq of Auldhame and Gartsherrie, born in 1756, married in 1778, Grace, daughter of the Right Hon Robert Dundas of Arniston, lord president of the court of session, and by her he had nine children He died in 1797 His only surviving son, John-Hamilton-Colt, Esq of Inveresk and Gartsherrie, born 12th May 1789, by his wife, Sarah, youngest daughter of Joseph Mannering, Esq, had three sons and five daughters He died 10th September 1840 His eldest son, John-Hamilton-Colt, Esq, designed of Gartsherrie, was born 19th August 1811, and married, 13th May 1834, Jane, second daughter of George Cole Bambridge, Esq of Gattonside House, Roxburghshire, issue, three sons and two daughters

COLVILLE, a surname derived from Colvile, a castle on a hill, col in old French meaning hill, and vile a castle A town in Normandy, whence the race originally sprung, is still called Colville

The original ancestor of the Colvilles, Gilbert de Colavilla, de Colville, or Colvyle, accompanied William the Conqueror, when he came over to England, and he and his descendants acquired various possessions in that country. An account of the English Colvilles is given by Dugdale in his Baronage, vol i page 626 He does not, however, mention the origin of the family The first noticed by him is Philip de Colville, in the reign of King Stephen About that time a branch of them settled in Scotland, and founded a house which produced the two noble lines of Colville of Culross and Colville of Ochiltree, both barons in the peerage of Scotland The latter title, however, has been dormant since the death of David, the fourth lord, in 1782

COLVILLE OF CULROSS, lord, in the peerage of Scotland, a title possessed by a family, the first of whom in North Britain was Philip de Colville in the twelfth century Along with Robert, bishop of St Andrews and others, he was witness to a general confirmation by King Malcolm the Fourth of all donations made by his predecessors to the monastery of Dunfermline before 1159, in which year Robert died, also, another by the same monarch of several donations to the priory of St Andrews in 1160 He was one of the hostages for the release of King William the Lion from captivity in 1171 The first possessions which he obtained in Scotland were Hcton and Oxenhame (now Oxnam) in the county of Roxburgh He also acquired lands in various parts of the country, particularly in Ayrshire

His son, Thomas de Colville, is witness to several charters of King William the Lion betwixt 1189 and 1199 In 1210, being unjustly suspected of a conspiracy against that monarch, he was imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh, but was liberated after six months' confinement and received again into favour On the 28th April 1214, a discharge was granted by King John to William de Harcourt of several hostages put into his majesty's hands, among others Thomas de Colville and Gervase Avenel, obsides regis Scotiæ He died in 1219 By Amabilis his wife he had a son, William de Colville, who granted to the monks of Newbattle, the lands which belonged to his father "super le Ness" He settled at Morham under William the Lion He was proprietor of the barony of Kinnaird in Stirlingshire, as appears from a lease granted by him of part of these lands to the abbot and convent of Holyrood-house, confirmed by King Alexander the Second, 15th September 1228 Eustace, the heiress of Sir William Colville of Oxnam, who possessed also the lands of Ochiltree in Ayrshire, married Sir Reginald Chene of Inverugie, who died soon after 1291, an aged man She survived her husband, and having sworn fealty to Edward the First in 1296, she had livery of her lands in the shires of Aberdeen, Ayr, Banff, Forfar, Inverness and Kincardine This lady, according to the Remarks on the Ragman Roll, in 'Nisbet's Heraldry,' (Appendix, vol ii page 27) was the heiress of the principal house of Colville

In the reign of Alexander the Third Sir John Colville was proprietor of Oxnam and Ochiltree In 1296 Thomas de Colville swore fealty to King Edward the First, as did also Adam de Colville During the reign of Robert the First, Eustace de Colville granted to the monks of Melrose the church of Ochiltree with all its pertinents, a grant which was confirmed by a charter from Robert de Colville, dominus de Oxnam, designed also Baro baroniæ de Ochiltree, in 1324 [Great Chartulary of Melrose] This Robert, who is also witness to a donation to the monastery of Kelso in 1350, had a charter of the barony of Ochiltree in Ayrshire from King David the Second Among the charters of that monarch are two to Duncan Wallace and Malcolm Wallace of the lands of

Oxenham, and lands in the county of Dumfries, forfeited by Robert Colvill The family, however, retained the title of Oxnam till the reign of King James the First, when they assumed the designation of Ochiltree, and were among the greatest barons below the degree of lords of parliament in the kingdom

Robert Colville of Oxenham, probably the son of the above Robert, is witness to a charter of John Turnbull of Myntou (Minto), to Sir William Stewart of Jedworth (Jedburgh), his grandson, of the lands of Myntou, 8th December 1390, which was also witnessed by his son, Thomas Colville of Oxenham This Thomas had been witness to a charter of Margaret countess of Douglas and Mar in 1384, and in the reign of King Robert the Third granted a charter to Henry Preston of his part of Fromertem (Formartyn) in Aberdeenshire, with the castle and tolls of the burgh of Fyvie He was one of the numerous train of knights and esquires who in 1436 attended Margaret of Scotland into France, on her marriage with Louis the Dauphin

Robert de Colville of Oxenham was one of the hostages for King James the First, in room of Robert Stewart, allowed to return home, 22d June 1432 In the year 1449, Sir Richard Colville, knight, according to Balfour, (a mistake evidently for Sir Robert Colville,) set upon John Auchinleck, a familiar friend of the earl of Douglas, and slew him with several of his friends, on account of certain wrongs and injuries done to him by the former, which had remained unredressed, although reparation had frequently been required from him for the same To avenge Auchinleck's fate, Douglas collected his retainers, and after pillaging all the lands belonging to Colville, besieged and took his castle and put him and all that were with him to the sword Robert Colville married Margaret Colville, by whom he had a son, Sir Robert de Colville, who had a charter of the barony of Uchiltree, 26th May, 1441, on his father's resignation, and another to himself and Christina de Crichton, daughter of Sir Robert Crichton of Sanquhar, knight, of the barony of Uchiltree, 16th February 1450-1 He and Andrew Ker of Auldtounburn entered into an indenture binding themselves to stand by, assist, and defend one another against all mortals, the king and the earl of Douglas excepted, dated at Jedburgh 10th June 1453 He gave in a complaint to the lords auditors concerning the wrongous occupation of the lands of Maxtoun, belonging to him, and got a decree in his favour, 17th October 1467 As heir of his father, he was pursued before the lords auditors by Sir John Achlike (Auchinleck) of that ilk, knight, for withholding from him sixty-five marks, contained in an obligation of his father, for himself and his heirs, to the deceased James Auchinleck, father of Sir John, and decreet was given against him, 19th July 1476 He was succeeded by his son, Sir William Colville of Ochiltree, knight Chalmers, in his Caledonia, mentions, "that, as early as the year 1498 there had been a feud between Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, the sheriff of Ayr, and Sir William Colville of Uchletree, knight," when the king granted an exemption to Sir William Colville and his tenants and servants from the jurisdiction of Hugh Campbell and his deputies, 'because it was notoriously known that there is a deadly feud betwixt them" Sir William died in 1508-9, leaving two daughters his coheiresses, Elizabeth, who married Robert Colville, son and heir of William Colville of Ravenscraig, without issue, and Margaret, said to have been married to Patrick Colquhoun of Drumskeath, nephew of the laird of Luss. The names of the daughters seem by some mistake to have been exchanged, for in the public registers there are two charters to Patrick Colquhoun of Drumskeath and Elizabeth (not Margaret) Colville his wife, of date 12th July 1527 and 8th February 1531-2 They had an only daughter and heiress, Frances or Francesca, married to Robert Colville of Cleish, ancestor of the Lords Colville of Ochiltree, of whom afterwards.

Robert Colville of Hilton, the heir-male of the family, had the office of steward to Margaret, queen of James the Third, and had a charter from that monarch to himself, senescallo Margaretæ Reginæ, and Margaret Logan his wife, of the lands of Hilton, in the barony of Tillicoultry, in the county of Clackmannan, 10th October 1483 He appears to have joined actively the party of King James the Fourth against his father, as six days after his accession to the throne the office of director of the chancery was conferred on him by royal charter 17th June 1488 He obtained charters of various lands in Ayrshire, Clackmannanshire, and Roxburghshire, from August 1502 to April 1508, and 10th April 1509 he had a charter of half of the lands and barony of Ochiltree, with the castle, Barnwell and Symontoun, and thereafter was styled of Ochiltree He fell with his royal master at the battle of Flodden 9th September 1513 In his Caledonia, Chalmers says, "After the disastrous battle of Flodden, many violent acts were committed in Scotland, particularly in the south In Ayrshire, the strong houses of Cumnock and Uchletree were both violently taken possession of, their owners having fallen on Flodden Field" This Robert Colville was twice married first to Margaret Logan, and, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter and coheiress of Walter Arnot of Balbarton, and had two sons, James and Robert

Sir James Colville of Ochiltree, the elder son, was appointed to the office of comptroller before 1527 In that year he granted an annual rent of ten pounds for the support of a chaplain, to officiate at St Mary's altar in the church of Ochiltree, and the grant was confirmed by the king in 1527 8 In 1530, he exchanged the lands of Ochiltree with Sir James Hamilton of Finnart, a natural son of James first earl of Arran, for the barony of East Wemyss and Lochorshyre in Fife, and obtained a charter of the same in December of that year In 1528 he had been appointed a director of the chancery He was one of the commissioners of parliament on the 24th April and 13th May 1531, 15th December 1535, and 29th April 1536 He was nominated lord of the articles on 13th May 1532 and 7th June 1535, and on the same day was chosen by the barons one of their commissioners for the taxation of six thousand pounds, granted by the three estates to King James the Sixth on his approaching marriage

At the first institution of the college of justice, 20th May 1532, Sir James Colville of Easter Wemyss, as he was now designed, was appointed one of the judges on the temporal side of the bench He was one of the commissioners at the truce of Newcastle, on the 1st October 1533, shortly previous to which date he had been knighted, and in the following year he was again sent to England to treat of peace He lost the king's favour and brought on his own ruin, by siding with the Douglases

In 1538 the comptroller's place was taken from him and conferred on David Wood of Craig, and on 30th May 1539, a summons of treason was executed against him, charging him with having, on the 14th of July 1528, when comptroller, director of the chancery, and a privy councillor, made a pretended assignation of the ward, relief, and marriage of John Kennedy of Culzean, to certain individuals, for the benefit of Archibald Douglas of Kilspindy, although he knew that a summons of treason against the latter had been at that time executed, and further, with having afforded treasonable assistance and counsel to the earl of Angus, and keeping a

treasonable convocation with his brother George Douglas at Newcastle He appeared personally in parliament 18th July 1539, to answer the summons, and the king's advocate having passed from the latter charges, he submitted himself, as to the former, "to the king's will," as the phrase was in those days of arbitrary power On the 21st August he was ordered to enter himself in ward in the castle of Blackness This order he disobeyed, and retiring to England, associated with "Archibald sum tyme earl of Anguiss, and George Douglace, his broder-german, his grace's rebellis, and traitouris, traitand with yame ye destructioune of his grace, his leges and realme" This rash and treasonable proceeding, however, he did not long survive, having died previous to the 10th of January 1541, on which day a summons was executed against his widow and children, to see and hear that "the said deceased James Colville, while he lived, had incurred the crime of lese-majesty, for his disobedience to enter himself in ward, as just mentioned" He was accordingly forfeited on the 15th March 1541 His estate was annexed to the crown, but was afterwards given to Norman Leslie of the family of Rothes The forfeiture was rescinded in parliament on 12th December 1543, under the direction of Cardinal Bethune, which so offended the Leslies that, according to Father Hay, it was the proximate cause of his murder by Norman Leslie [Hay's Memoirs, MS, vol ii p 108] Sir James Colville married, first, Alison, eldest daughter of Sir David Bruce of Clackmannan, secondly, Margaret Forrester, who survived him Besides other children, he had a son, James, and two daughters, Margaret, married to James Lindsay of Dowhill, Kinross-shire, and Alison, mentioned in the records of parliament, 1540 He had likewise two natural sons, specified in the charter of Easter Wemyss, dated in 1530 1, namely, Robert, ancestor of the Lords Colville of Ochiltree, and James, who had a charter of the lands of Crummy, 31st May 1565

Sir James Colville, his legitimate son, was only eight years of age at his father's death His father's forfeiture, as already stated, was rescinded by parliament 12th December 1543 in his favour, and he had a charter of the lands of Easter Wemyss in 1554 He died in 1580 By his wife, Janet, second daughter of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven, sister of William, sixth earl of Morton, he had two sons, Sir James, and Alexander, commendator of Culross and a lord of session, who carried on the line of the family, of whom afterwards

Sir James Colville of Easter Wemyss, the elder son, first Lord Colville of Culross, served with much reputation in the French wars, under Henry of Navarre, afterwards Henry the Fourth of France On Friday 27th July 1582, he returned to Scotland in company of Francis Stewart, earl of Bothwell, bringing letters from the king of Navarre and prince of Conde to King James He was one of those who were engaged in the raid of Ruthven, on the 22d August following, and his name appears among others in the sentence of forfeiture afterwards passed against the members of the raid They subsequently got a remission from the king, which was confirmed by the estates He had a charter of the manor of Culross, Valleyfield, &c, erected into the temporal barony of Culross, 20th June 1589, but was not designed Lord Culross Having obtained a grant of the landed property of the Cistertian abbey of Culross, on the resignation of his nephew, John, they were erected into a temporal lordship, and Sir James Colville was created a peer, by the title of Lord Colville of Culross, to him and the heirs male of his body, which failing, to his heirs male whatsoever, 20th January 1609 In Carmichael's Tracts the date of his creation is fixed at 25th April 1604, and Lord Colvil of Culrosse is, in the list of the nobility settled by the decreet of ranking, 5th May 1606, placed before the Lord Scoon

According to the Old Statistical Account of Scotland, (vol xv page 212), after his return from France, he resided at Tilliecoultry, in Clackmannanshire, that estate being in the Colvill family from 1483 to 1634, when it was sold to William Alexander of Menstrie, afterwards earl of Stirling, the distinguished poet In his old age, Lord Colville revisited the French court As he appeared in the old-fashioned military dress, which he had formerly worn in the wars, the courtiers were all amazed when he entered the royal presence But no sooner did King Henry observe the old warrior than he clasped him in his arms, and embraced him with the greatest affection, to the utter astonishment of all present In his latter years Lord Colville spent much of his time at Tilliecoultry He was particularly fond of walking on a beautiful terrace, at the north end of the Kirkhill, and of reposing himself under a thorn-tree, the venerable trunk of which still remains It unfortunately happened that standing one day on a stone, and looking up to the thorn-tree, describing his battles, he fell down the sloping bank of the terrace, and it is said was killed on the spot in the year 1620 His lordship was twice married, first, to Isabel, second daughter of Patrick, Lord Ruthven, sister of William, first earl of Gowrie, and secondly to Helen Shaw, relict of Robert Moubray, younger of Barnbougle By his first wife only he had issue, namely, two sons, James and Robert, who both died before their father, and a daughter, Jane, married to Sir James Campbell of Lawers, and the mother of John, earl of Loudoun, lord high chancellor of Scotland

Robert, master of Colville, the second son, had charters of the barony of Easter Wemyss in 1598, and on his death in 1615, he left a son, James, second Lord Colville of Culross, who succeeded his grandfather, the first lord, in 1620, and died, without issue, in 1640 His cousin, John Colville of Westercumbrie, son of Alexander Colville commendator of Culross, younger brother of the first Lord Colville, fell heir to the title, but did not assume it, and it remained dormant till May 1723, when it was taken up by his descendant as after mentioned About the period of the death of James second Lord Colville the lands of Easter Wemyss were purchased by John first earl of Wemyss, and joined to the barony of Wemyss, after a separation of two hundred years

We now revert to Alexander Colville, abbot or commendator of Culross, who was the second son of Sir James Colville of Easter Wemyss, above mentioned He had a charter for all the days of his life, of the abbey of Culross, 4th February 1566-7, and it was declared by act of secret council, 20th January 1574, that five hundred marks only should be paid by him for the thirds of this benefice He adhered to the party of King James the Sixth, in the civil wars in Scotland of the sixteenth century, and during the regency of the earl of Morton was appointed one of the judges of the court of session, before the 20th October 1575 On the 15th July 1578, a commission was appointed by parliament to "visit, sycht, and consider" the laws, of which he was named a member, and he was at the same time constituted one of the parliamentary arbiters to stanch a deadly feud then existing between the great families of Gordon and Forbes, to the decision of which the ordinary judicatories were deemed unequal On 11th November 1579, he was named a privy councillor by act of parliament, and was also appointed a lord of the articles, and a commissioner for settling the jurisdiction of the church He was present at Holyrood House on the 19th October 1582, when James was forced to emit a declaration approving of the raid of Ruthven, but he does not appear to have taken any very prominent share in that enterprize In 1585, after the return of Hamilton, Angus, and the other banished lords, he was again chosen a privy councillor with advice of parliament In the end of May 1587, on account of illness he resigned his seat on the bench, and on the first of June, his nephew, John Colville, precentor or chanter of Glasgow, was appointed in his place This transaction appears to have been only a family arrangement, as on the 21st of the same month of June, the uncle, having in the meantime recovered his health, made his appearance in court, with his nephew, when the latter dutifully resigned his seat on the bench, which he had held only nineteen days, and the former was re-appointed In 1592, the commission for reformation of hospitals was revived, the commendator of Culross being again appointed a member He died in 1597, it is supposed in May, as his successor was appointed on the 21th of that month Lord Culross collected the decisions of the court of session from 1570 to 1584 By his wife, Nicolas, daughter of Alexander Dundas of Fingask, he had, with two daughters, two sons, John of Wester Cumbrie, and Alexander, professor of divinity in the university of St Andrews, and appointed justice depute 2d June 1607 Of John Colville, chanter of Glasgow, above mentioned, an account is given below

John Colville of Wester Cumbrie, elder son of Alexander Colville, commendator of Culross, became of right, on the death of his cousin in 1640, third baron, but he did not assume the title, and he died shortly afterwards By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Melville of Hallhill, he had three sons His eldest son, Alexander Colville of Kincardine, of right fourth Lord Colville of Culross, like his father, did not assume the title He was professor of divinity at Sedan in France, and by his wife, Ann le Blanc, had two sons The elder, John Colville of Kincardine, who also declined to assume the title of Lord Colville, married Mary, second daughter of Sir George Preston of Valleyfield, baronet, by whom he had two sons, and was succeeded by the elder, Alexander, by right sixth baron, who likewise declined the title By his wife, Mary, daughter of the Hon Sir Charles Erskine of Cambo, baronet, lord lyon king at arms, a younger brother of the second and third earls of Kellie, he had five sons and six daughters

John Colville, the eldest son, of right seventh Lord Colville of Culross, was an ensign at the battle of Malplaquet in 1709 On 3d April 1722 he was served heir to John second Lord Colville of Culross, and at the general election on the 21st of that month, he requested to be added to the roll of peers, but was refused on the ground that the peerage was not upon the roll at the time of the Union Next year he presented a petition to the king, under the designation of "John Lord Colville of Culross," claiming the peerage Being referred to the House of Lords, 27th May 1723, the claim was determined in his favour, and his lordship was accordingly placed on the roll, after Lord Cardross and before Lord Cranstoun In 1727 Lord Colville was an officer in the 26th regiment of foot or Cameronians, at the siege of Gibraltar, and the same year was promoted to a company of the 25th foot In 1739, when war was declared against Spain, his lordship was appointed, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, to the command of a battalion in Colonel Gooch's American regiment, and in 1741 proceeded to Carthagena, where he fell a victim to the epidemic disease so fatal to thousands, on board a transport in the harbour, in April 1741, in the 52d year of his age When in Ireland in 1716, his lordship married a Miss Johnston, by whom he had six sons and three daughters

His next brother, the Hon Charles Colville, born in 1691, was a distinguished officer in the army, and commenced his military career as a cadet at the battle of Malplaquet in 1709 In the following year he had an ensign's commission in the 26th or Cameronian regiment of foot, in which also his elder brother was an officer In 1715 he was wounded at the attack on the rebels at Preston, in Lancashire In 1727 he served at Gibraltar during the siege of that fortress, and was there in 1735, when he was promoted to a company in the same regiment In 1741 he was appointed major to the 21st regiment of foot, or Royal North British fusileers, which he accompanied to Flanders At the battle of Dettingen in 1743, his horse was shot under him, and he received three cuts in the arm In 1745 he commanded his regiment at the battle of Fontenoy, in which three of the fingers of his left hand were shot off, and besides other slighter hurts, he received a severe wound in his foot The same year he was, with the fusileers, at Ostend, when it was besieged by the French, and in 1746 he commanded his regiment at the battle of Culloden The following year he was ordered back to Flanders, and commanded the regiment at the battle of Lafeldt, in 1747 He rose to the rank of lieutenant-general in 1770, and died at Edinburgh, unmarried, 29th August, 1775, in his 85th year The Hon Alexander Colville, the next brother, entered the royal navy in 1710, but on the reduction of the naval force at the peace he retired from the service, and was appointed collector of the customs at Dundee, whence he was, in 1735, removed to Inverness, where he died, unmarried, 20th April 1765

Alexander, eighth baron (but the fourth who assumed the title), eldest son of the seventh baron Colville of Culross, distinguished himself as a naval officer He was born 21th February 1717, and entered the navy in 1731 On the breaking out of the war in 1739, he was appointed lieutenant of a bomb vessel, and sailed to the West Indies under Admiral Vernon He was employed in the bombardment and destruction of Fort Chagre, and then proceeded to the expedition against Carthagena, where, in 1741, he performed the mournful office of closing the eyes of his father He soon afterwards returned to England, lieutenant in the Hampton Court, and then, sailing to the Mediterranean, joined the fleet under Admiral Matthews, who appointed him master and commander, and, 6th March 1744, promoted him to the rank of post-captain with the command of the Leopard of 50 guns After the peace in 1749, his lordship returned to England, and was appointed to the Success frigate, destined for the Boston station He subsequently got the command of the Northumberland, a guardship at Plymouth, on board of which he went to America under Admiral Boscawen in 1755 Two years afterwards he accompanied Admiral Holburne in the ineffectual expedition against Louisburg, and was left at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, in command of the ships on that station, with a commodore's broad pendant, in the winter of 1757-8 In the latter year he served under Admiral Boscawen at the reduction of Louisburg, and was again left in command of the ships in North America. When Quebec was besieged by the French in the winter of 1759-60 Lord Colville received directions to proceed with a squadron to the relief of that place, as soon as the navigation of the St Lawrence was open He arrived at Quebec, 18th May 1760, at a period of the year earlier than it was ever known that a ship of war, far less a squadron, had ever gone so high up the river On receiving notice of his approach, the French raised the siege, and made a precipitate retreat two days previous to his arrival After an expedition from Halifax to drive the French out of Newfoundland which they had got possession of by surprise, and recovering that important island, his lordship returned to England, and was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the white, 21st October 1762 The preliminaries of peace at this time only prevented him from obtaining the chief command in the Mediterranean He continued with his flag flying at Spithead, and doing the duty of port-admiral at Portsmouth, till peace was concluded, when he was appointed to the same station at Plymouth At the earnest request of Lord Sandwich, then first lord of the admiralty, he consented to resume the command in North America, and hoisting his flag on board the Romney of 50 guns, proceeded to Halifax, in order to protect the coast of North America, and the new conquests in the gulf and river of St Lawrence There he remained till 1766, when he retired from the service In 1768 he fixed his residence in Scotland, and in 1769 was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral He died, without legitimate issue, at Drumsheugh near Edinburgh, 21st May 1770, in the 54th year of his age He married, 1st October 1768 Lady Elizabeth Erskine eldest daughter of the sixth earl of Kelhe, widow of Walter MacFarlane of MacFarlane, the eminent antiquary He was succeeded by a younger brother, John, fifth (properly ninth) Lord Colville of Culross His next brother, Charles, died an infant George, the third brother, an officer in the army, was nominated in 1739 one of the thirty lieutenants sent out to North America, to discipline Colonel Gooch's new raised regiment, destined for the Carthagena expedition, but died of a fever at New York, in his twentieth year Another brother also named Charles, born April 21, 1726, was an officer in the same regiment as his uncle the Royal North British fusileers and first served as a cadet at the battle of Dettingen At the battle of Fontenoy he was shot through the cheek He was subsequently at Ostend then besieged by the French and afterwards, under the duke of Cumberland pursued the rebels into Scotland In 1747 he was at the battle of Lafeldt, and in 1751 accompanied his regiment to Gibraltar Being ordered, with a detachment of that garrison, on board the fleet commanded by Admiral Byng he was present in the action with the French off Minorca, for which that unfortunate naval commander was tried and executed Captain Colville returned to England with his regiment in 1759 and in 1761 was in the expedition against Belleisle He died at Newcastle, on his march with the 21st into Scotland 10th March 1763, in the 37th year of his age, unmarried The Hon James Colville, the seventh and youngest son, entered the royal navy in 1711 and sailed to the East Indies with Admiral Watson He commanded the Newcastle in the engagement betwixt Admirals Pocock and D'Ache, 3d August 1758 when the French were defeated He had the rank of captain in the royal navy 17th October of the same year and commanded the same ship in the engagement between the same admirals, 10th August 1759, when, after a very severe action the French were obliged to retreat Subsequently he was promoted to the command of the Sunderland of 60 guns, one of Admiral Stevens' squadron employed in the blockade of Pondicherry, and from his spirit and ardour to carry on the important service in which he was engaged he would not put to sea on the approach of a dreadful hurricane, because no signal to that effect was made by the admiral, in consequence of which the Sunderland with other ships of that squadron foundered on the 21st of January 1761 and Captain Colville perished, with all his ship's company, except two black sailmakers in the 27th year of his age unmarried

John, the fifth who assumed the title of Lord Colville, was born at Dundee 24th January 1724 old style, and entering the army in January 1741 served in the West Indies, under General Wentworth His regiment being disbanded, he returned to England early in 1748, and in the following June, became first lieutenant in the 21st foot, or Royal North British fusileers, in which also his brother and uncle held commissions He was at the battle of Fontenoy, in Ostend when besieged the same year, served under the duke of Cumberland, at the taking of Carlisle that winter, at the battle of Culloden, and at the action of Lafeldt In 1761 he accompanied his regiment to Belleisle in the Bay of Biscay, which was reduced after the capture of the citadel of Palais, the capital of the island In 1764 he retired from the army, after a service of twenty-four years, and had the office of inspector-general of the outposts in Scotland He succeeded to the title, on the death of his brother in 1770 He married at Gibraltar, 18th July 1758, Miss Webber, by whom he had eight sons and four daughters His lordship died in 1811, and was succeeded by his fourth son, the Hon John Colville, his two eldest born having died while infants, and his third son the Hon James John Colville, a naval officer, having died unmarried, 18th February, 1786, in the 25d year of his age

John, sixth Lord Colville of Culross who assumed the title, but the tenth baron, born 10th March 1768, entered the navy in 1780, and was present in Lord Rodney's action with Count de Grasse, 12th April 1782 He served at the capture of the West India Islands in 1794 He attained the rank of post captain 6th December 1796, and was in command of the Ambuscade frigate of 36 guns, when the peace of Amiens took place, March 27, 1802 On the renewal of hostilities he was appointed to the Romney of 50 guns, which was wrecked on the coast of Holland, 25th November 1804, but was saved and sent home, with his officers, by the humane Dutch admiral Kerkert He commanded l'Hercule in the expedition to Copenhagen in 1807, and attained the rank of admiral of the white in February 1847 He was one of the representative peers of Scotland and an extra lord of the bed chamber to Prince Albert His lordship married first, at Wexford, in Staffordshire 14th October 1790, Elizabeth third daughter of Francis Lord of the island of Barbadoes, sister of Sir Francis Ford baronet, M P, by whom he had a daughter, who died an infant Lady Colville died in 1839 and his lordship married secondly, 10th October 1841, the Hon Anne Law, third daughter of the first Lord Ellenborough but by her had no issue His lordship died in December 1849 His next brother and his youngest brother, both died infants The Hon Sir Charles Colville, the sixth son of the fifth (properly ninth) Lord Colville, born in 1770 was an officer in the army and in 1796 became lieutenant-colonel of the 13th regiment of foot which he commanded in the memorable campaign in Egypt in 1801, and in the various active services in which that regiment was subsequently employed He had the rank of colonel in the army, 1st January 1805, was afterwards a brigadier general in the West India staff, and commanded a brigade at the capture of Martinique in 1809 He was G C B, G C H and K T S, a general in the army, and colonel in the 5th foot and distinguished himself in the late war He married in 1818 [illegible], eldest daughter of William Mure, Esq of Caldwell in Ayrshire, by whom he had two sons and three daughters, and died 27th March, 1843 On the 21st of May, scarcely two months after his death, his widow, Lady Colville, expired at her residence, Rosslyn House Hampstead from the effects of injuries she received from her dress taking fire His next brother, the Hon George Colville, was a lieutenant in the 11st regiment of foot, and after having survived all the dangers and fatigues of a most active (light infantry) service, at the siege of Fort Bourbon, and in the reduction of the three islands under Sir Charles Grey, fell a victim to the pestilential fever at St Domingo on 24th June 1794, in the 24th year of his age

The tenth baron was succeeded by his nephew Charles John Colville, eleventh baron and seventh Lord Colville of Culross, eldest son of the Hon General Sir Charles Colville, G C B He was born at Edinburgh in 1818, succeeded his uncle in Dec 1849 and was at one period a captain in the eleventh hussars He was elected a representative peer of Scotland in August 1851, for some time chief equerry and clerk marshal to her majesty He married in 1853 the eldest daughter of second Lord Carrington, issue, a son, Hon Charles Robert, master of Culross, born 1854, and a daughter

Colville of Ochiltree, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, first conferred on 4th January 1651, on Robert Colville of Cleish, great-grandson of Robert Colville, natural son of Sir James Colville of Easter Wemyss above mentioned, who granted to his said son and Francesca Colquhoun his wife (by whom he had a son and three daughters) a charter of the barony of Cleish, in Kinross shire, 15th July 1537 confirmed on the 21st of the same month This Robert Colville, the first styled of Cleish, was forfeited by parliament, 10th December 1540, for treason, having, like his father, favoured the Douglases, but his forfeiture was rescinded, 12th December 1543 He held the office of master of the household to Lord James Stewart, afterwards the regent Murray, and was a hearty promoter of the Reformation He joined the lords of the Congregation, and in June 1559, when Knox had announced his intention of preaching in the Cathedral church of St Andrews Archbishop Hamilton desired him to tell the lords that in case John Knox presented himself to the preaching place in his town and cathedral church he should be saluted with a dozen of harquebuts Knox set the proud prelates threats at defiance and preached in spite of him He was in the army in the attack upon the French at Leith 7th May 1560, when he received a shot in the thigh, and died two hours afterwards Knox describes him as 'a modest, stout and wise man'

Robert, first Lord Colville of Ochiltree, was the elder of two sons of Robert Colville of Cleish, grandson of the above, by his wife Beatrix daughter of John Haldane of Gleneagles He was served heir to his father 12th September 1613 and was knighted by Charles the First On the 4th January 1651, as already stated he was created a peer by Charles the Second, by the title of Lord Colville of Ochiltree by patent, to him and his heirs male He married Janet, second daughter of Sir John Wemyss of Wemyss, sister of the first earl of Wemyss but had no issue He died at Crombie, 20th August 1662, and was succeeded by his nephew Robert the son of his brother David

Robert, second Lord Colville of Ochiltree, married Margaret daughter of David Wemyss of Lingask, by whom he had, with two daughters, (the elder, Margaret, wife of Sir John Ayton of Ayton and the younger married to the Rev Mr Logan minister of Torry,) a son Robert Colville third Lord Colville of Ochiltree, who died without issue Robert Ayton, his grandnephew, his heir of line, took the name of Colville, and was designated Robert Ayton Colville of Craigflower The title was assumed by David Colville son of William Colville tenant at Balcormie Mill in Fife, but he never voted at the elections of Scots representative peers He held the rank of major and died unmarried in London 8th February 1782 when his pretensions to the peerage descended to his cousin Robert Colville, whose vote, registered at the election of 1788, was subsequently disallowed by the house of Lords

The Colvills of Clontarf house, county Dublin, Ireland, are descended from James Colvill (stated to be a brother of John, third Lord Colville of Culross, and of the Rev Alexander Colville, D D, professor of divinity at St Andrews, Fife, and afterwards surrogate of Down, father of Sir Robert Colvill, and great-grandfather of the first countess of Mountcashell), who went to Ireland in 1630, and settled in the north

COLVILLE, JOHN, a controversial writer, of a turbulent and restless disposition, of the family of Colville of Easter Wemyss, was some time minister of Kilbride and chanter or precentor of Glasgow In 1578, for nonresidence at his church, he was ordered by the General Assembly "to be taken order withal by the synod of Glasgow, for deserting of his ministry," and having obtained an introduction to Court, he was appointed, in 1579, Master of Requests He was soon after engaged in the treasonable conspiracy of the raid of Ruthven, and was on that occasion sent by the conspirators as their representative to Queen Elizabeth, who had favoured the enterprise When the king recovered his liberty, Colville was ordered to enter in ward, but instead of doing so, he retired to England, and August 22, 1584, forfeited in parliament He was soon, however, restored to favour, and on June 2d, 1587, he was appointed by the king a lord of session in the room of his uncle, Alexander Colville, commendator of Culross, who had resigned from illness This office, however, he did not hold long, for, on the 21st of the same month, his uncle having recovered his health, resumed his seat on the bench, and the nephew, who, about the same time, represented the burgh of Stirling in parliament, seems to have been afterwards appointed collector of the taxation granted for King James' marriage expenses

Being disappointed in his expectations at court, Colville joined the turbulent earl of Bothwell, and was with him when he made his attack upon the king on the night of the 27th December 1591, for which he was again forfeited in parliament On the 24th July 1593, he again accompanied Bothwell to Holyroodhouse, when they both went on their knees and craved pardon for their former attacks, to the great alarm of James, and the disturbance of the court and city On Bothwell's flight, Colville obtained his pardon, by betraying his associates He had treacherously given assu-ance of his life to Bothwell's natural brother, Hercules Stewart, who, nevertheless, was hanged in 1595 Finding, in consequence, that he had fallen into disgrace and discredit in his own country, he went to France Subsequently he made several attempts to obtain his recall, but in vain He then became a Roman Catholic and wrote bitterly against the protestants In 1600, a treatise by him was published at Edinburgh, entitled, 'The Palinode,' which he represented to be a refutation of a former work of his own against James' title to the English crown This was merely a manœuvre to ingratiate himself with that monarch, as no such work had he ever written He died while on a pilgrimage to Rome in 1607 —His works are

The Palinode Edin, 1600, 8vo

Parænesis ad Ministros Scotos super suis conversationc, or Admonition of John Colville (lately returnit to the Catholic Roman Religion, in whilk he was baptesit and brocht up till he had full 11 years of age) to his countrymen, which was translated and published at Paris in 1602, 8vo

He was also the author of 'Capita Controversa,' and 'De Causa Comitis Bothwellii'

Chalmers, in his Lives of Scotch Writers, (MSS, in Advocates' Library) adds to Colville's works, 'Oratio funebris Jacobi Elizabeth destinata'

The author of the History of Sutherland speaks of a MS relating to the affairs of Scotland by Mr John Colvin, as the name Colville was sometimes spelled in Scotland

COLVILLE sometimes called COLWILL, ALEXANDER, a Scottish episcopalian divine, of right fourth lord Colville of Culross, was born near St Andrews, in Fifeshire, in 1620 He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, where he took his degree of D D, and was settled minister at Dysart In early life he had been professor of theology in the university of Sedan in France, under the patronage of the Reformed churches in that country Besides delivering lectures on theology, he also taught Hebrew in that seminary, —the revival of the study of which language was much attended to by protestants on the continent He wrote several pieces against the presbyterians, all of which are now forgotten, except a humorous poem, entitled 'The Scotch Hudibras,' written in the manner of Butler He died at Edinburgh in 1676 There seems to have been another Colvil, who also wrote an imitation of Butler as, in 1681, one Samuel Colvil published at London, 'The Mock Poem, or the Whig's Supplication,' 12mo

This Alexander Colville is often confounded with a Mr William Colville, who was elected principal of the university of Edinburgh, on the death of Principal Adamson in 1652 He was at this time minister of the English church at Utrecht He accepted the invitation, but owing to some obstruction, it is thought, on the part of Cromwell's government, he did not at that time take possession of the office, and it was declared vacant on 17th January 1653 As he had given in his demission to his church and left Holland, he was allowed a year's stipend for his trouble and expense, and Dr Leighton, afterwards bishop of Dunblane, was elected principal On the promotion of Dr Leighton to the see of Dunblane in 1662, Mr William Colville was admitted principal of the university of Edinburgh Although a member of the General Assembly, he had espoused the episcopal doctrines of divine right and absolute obedience as early as 1648, and he even went so far as to attempt forming a party, between the presbyterians and episcopalians On this account he had been, along with Mr Andrew Ramsay, suspended from the office of the ministry, by the Assembly, which sentence was revoked in 1655 The episcopalian party, says Bower in his History of the University of Edinburgh, (vol i p 276) represented him as a man of a very moderate temper, and alleged that he had been offered several Scottish bishoprics, but he would never accept of preferment He was the author of a work entitled 'Ethica Christiana,' which was in considerable repute in those days His sermons on the 'Righteous Branch' discover a great vein of piety, as well as show that his religious opinions corresponded with the doctrines of the Westminster Confession of Faith

COLVILLE, evidently the same as, and derived from, Collier, a surname assumed by Sir Alexander Robertson, of the family of Strowan, created a baronet 20th February 1677 and the ancestor of the earls of Portmore, a title now extinct —See PORTMORE, earl of

COMBE, ANDREW, M D, an eminent physiological writer, was the fifteenth child and seventh son of George Combe or Combe, brewer at Livingston's Yards, (a small property lying under the south-west angle of Edinburgh castle) and Marion Newton, of the Newtons of Currichill, his wife, and was born there on 27th October 1797 He received the elementary part of his education under a Mr Brown, one of the town's teachers, who kept a school in Frederick street, and afterwards went to the high school In October 1810 he entered the university of Edinburgh, and attended the Greek and Latin classes for the next two college sessions In 1812 he was bound apprentice to Mr Henry Johnston, surgeon in Edinburgh, and after attending the medical classes passed surgeon in 1817 He subsequently pursued his studies at Paris, and, after a visit to Switzerland and Lombardy, returned to Edinburgh, where, on 22d February 1820, he was one of the four individuals who founded the Phrenological Society, his brother, George Combe, being another He subsequently, on account of his health, went to Italy, and there and in France remained for about two years He returned to Edinburgh in the summer of 1822, and soon after entered upon practice The first of his printed essays was one "on the effects of injuries of the brain upon the manifestations of the mind," which was read before the Phrenological Society, and subsequently published in their Transactions Subsequently he contributed several essays to the Phrenological Journal, as well as to the British and Foreign Medical Review Having become a member of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh, an essay on phrenology written by him, was read before that society, in November 1823, and gave rise to some unpleasant discussion at the time, the opposition to that science being very strongly shown by the members on the occasion In 1825 he took the degree of M D In reply to an able and eloquent article of Mr Jeffrey in the Edinburgh Review against phrenology, Dr Combe in the following year furnished an essay "on Size as a measure of power" to the Phrenological Journal In 1831 he published a work on mental derangement, which received the approbation of the profession and had a rapid sale In the same year, in consequence of a second attack of pulmonary disease, he proceeded to Paris, and thence by Marseilles to Naples, and after visiting Rome, he returned to Edinburgh and resumed practice In 1834 appeared his principal work, 'On Physiology applied to health and education' In January 1836, on the recommendation of Dr (afterwards Sir James) Clark, he was appointed physician to the king of the Belgians, but in a few months was obliged to resign his appointment from bad health He dedicated his work on Physiology to his majesty King Leopold, and in March 1838, he was appointed one of the physicians extraordinary for the queen in Scotland, an office of honour, but without duties or emolument Owing to increased bad health he subsequently made two voyages to Madeira, where he resided for some time In April 1847 he sailed for New York, and after visiting Philadelphia he returned home in the subsequent June, and died at Gorgie Mill, near Edinburgh, 9th August of that year His Life and Correspondence by his brother, George Combe, was published at Edinburgh in 1850, with a portrait

Congalton, an ancient surname in Scotland, derived from the barony of Congalton in the parish of Dirleton in East Lothian The family of Congalton of Congalton subsisted for twenty generations in the male line The first on record was Robert de Congaltoun, who witnessed a charter of Richard de Moreville, constable of Scotland, without date, but granted about 1162, engraved in 'Anderson's Diplomata' In the Ragman Roll, occurs the name of Walter de Congleton, supposed by Nisbet to be one of this family The name occurs again in a charter by Patrick earl of March of the lands of Stonypath in 1316 "On 8th May 1509, a royal charter was granted by King James the Fourth to Henry Congalton of Congalton of the king's island and lands of Petheray, along with the hill of the castle (Monte-Castri) of the same called Tarbet, also all and whole the king's island and lands of Craigleith, with the pertinents of the same, lying within the Frith of Forth, county of Edinburgh and constabulary of Haddington, creating, uniting, annexing, and incorporating all these islands, lands, and hill of the castle aforesaid, with the pertinents of the same, in one whole and free barony, to be called the barony of Tarbet, to be held of the king, paying one penny of Scots money, at the said hill of the castle of Tarbet, in name of blench farm if required, along with the marriage of the said heirs of Henry Congalton when it shall happen" [Great Seal Register, Book xv, No 115]

The elder branch of the family succeeding through heiresses to the estates of Hepburn of Keith in East Lothian, and Rickart of Rickartoun, in the county of Kincardine, assumed the names of Rickart and Hepburn [See RICKART, and HEPBURN, surnames of]

Robert Hepburn Congalton of Keith and Congalton, the eighteenth generation of the family, sold Congalton to his brother, Charles, whose son, William Congalton of Congalton, married Mary, daughter of David Bethune of Balfour in Fife His son, Charles Congalton of Congalton, succeeding to the estate of that ancient and distinguished family, of whom was Cardinal Bethune, took the name and arms of Bethune of Balfour, and sold Congalton, which was afterwards purchased by the heir male, Colonel Robert Rickart Hepburn, of Keith and Rickartoun, member of parliament for the county of Kincardine, who dying in 1804, was buried with his ancestors in the church of Golyn Congalton was sold to a gentleman of the name of Grant, in whose family it remains

CONSTABLE, a surname derived from the ancient high and honourable office of comes stabuli, count of the stable Under the French kings the person who held this office was the first dignitary of the crown, the commander-in chief of the armies, and the highest judge in military affairs In England there was at one time a lord high constable of the kingdom, an officer of the crown of the highest dignity The earl of Errol is hereditary grand constable of Scotland Constable was the family name of the viscounts of Dunbar, a title dormant since 1721 See DUNBAR, Viscount

CONSTABLE, ARCHIBALD, one of the most enterprising publishers that Scotland has produced, was born February 24, 1775, at Kellie, parish of Cairnbee, county of Fife He was the son of Thomas Constable, overseer or land steward on the estate of the earl of Kellie He received all the education he ever got at the school of Cairnbee In 1788, he was apprenticed to Mr Peter Hill, bookseller in Edinburgh, the friend and correspondent of Burns While he remained with Mr Hill, he assiduously devoted himself to acquiring a knowledge of old and scarce books, and particularly of the early and rare productions of the Scottish press On the expiration of his apprenticeship he married the daughter of Mr David Willison, a respectable printer in Edinburgh, who assisted him shortly after his commencing business, which he did in 1795, in a small shop on the north side of the High street of that city

Mr Constable's obliging manners, professional intelligence, personal activity, and prompt attention to the wishes of his visitors, recommended him to all who came in contact with him Amongst the first of his publications of any importance were Campbell's 'History of Scottish Poetry,' Dalyell's 'Fragments of Scottish History,' and Leyden's edition of the 'Complaint of Scotland In 1800 he commenced a quarterly work, entitled the 'Farmer's Magazine,' which, under the management of Mr Robert Brown of Markle, obtained a considerable circulation among agriculturists In 1801 he became proprietor of the Scots Magazine, a curious repository of the history, antiquities, and traditions of Scotland, begun in 1739

Mr Constable's reputation as a publisher may be said to have commenced with the appearance, in October 1802, of the first number of the Edinburgh Review His conduct towards the conductors and contributors of that celebrated Quarterly was at once discreet and liberal, and to his business tact and straightforward deportment, next to the genius and talent of its projectors, may be attributed much of its subsequent success In 1804 he admitted as a partner Mr Alexander Gibson Hunter of Blackness, after which the business was carried on under the firm of Archibald Constable and Co In December 1808 he and his partner joined with Mr Charles Hunter and Mr John Park in commencing a general bookselling business in London, under the name of Constable, Hunter, Park and Hunter, but this undertaking not succeeding, it was relinquished in 1811 On the retirement of Mr A G Hunter from the Edinburgh firm in the early part of the latter year, Mr Robert Cathcart of Drum, writer to the signet, and Mr Robert Cadell, then in Mr Constable's shop, were admitted partners Mr Cathcart having died in November 1812, Mr Cadell remained his sole partner In 1805 he commenced the 'Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal,' a work projected in concert with the late Dr Andrew Duncan In the same year, in conjunction with Longman and Co of London, he published the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' the first of that long series of original and romantic publications, in poetry and prose, which has immortalized the name of Walter Scott In 1806 Mr Constable brought out, in five volumes, a beautiful edition of the works of Mr Scott, comprising the Lay of the Last Minstrel, the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, Sir Tristrem, and a series of lyrical pieces In 1807 he purchased the copyright of Marmion, before a line of it was written, from Mr Scott, for £1,000 Before it was published, he admitted Mr Miller of Albemarle Street, and Mr Murray, then of Fleet Street, to a share in the copyright, each of these gentlemen having purchased a fourth

Amongst other works of importance published by him may be mentioned here Mr J P Wood's edition of Douglas' Scottish Peerage, Mr George Chalmers' Caledonia, and the Edinburgh Gazetteer in 6 vols In 1808 a serious disagreement took place between Mr Scott and Constable and Co, owing, it is understood, to some intemperate expression of Mr Constable's partner, Mr Hunter, which was not removed till 1813 In 1812 Mr Constable purchased the copyright and stock of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' When he became the proprietor, the fifth edition was too far advanced at press to admit of any material improvements being introduced into it, but as he saw that these were largely required, he originated the plan of the Supplement to the later editions, which has enhanced to such an extent the value, the usefulness, and the celebrity of the work In 1814 he brought out the first of the 'Waverley Novels,' and as that wonderful series of romantic tales proceeded, he had not unfrequently the merit of suggesting subjects to their distinguished author, and of finding titles for more than one of these memorable works, such, for example, was the case with 'Rob Roy' In the same year he published Mr Scott's edition of 'Swift's Works' Besides these publications, he brought out the Philosophical Works of Mr Dugald Stewart He himself added something to the stock of Scottish historical literature In 1810 he published, from an original manuscript, a quarto volume, edited by himself, entitled the 'Chronicle of Fife, being the Diary of John Lamont of Newton, from 1649 to 1672,' and, in 1822, he wrote and published a 'Memoir of George Heriot, Jeweller to King James, containing an Account of the Hospital founded by him at Edinburgh,' suggested by the introduction of Heriot into the 'Fortunes of Nigel,' which was published during the spring of that year He also published a compilation of the 'Poetry contained in the Waverley Novels' His first wife having died in 1814, Mr Constable married, in 1818, Miss Charlotte Neale, who survived him

In the autumn of 1821, in consequence of bad health, he had gone to reside in the neighbourhood of London, and his absence from Edinburgh and its cause are feelingly alluded to in the introductory epistle to the 'Fortunes of Nigel,' where Mr Constable is commended as one "whose vigorous intellect and liberal ideas had not only rendered his native country the mart of her own literature, but established there a court of letters, which commanded respect even from those most inclined to dissent from many of its canons' Indeed, his readiness in appreciating literary merit, his liberality in rewarding it, and the sagacity he displayed in placing it in the most favourable manner before the public, were universally acknowledged

In the summer of 1822 Mr Constable returned to Edinburgh, and in 1823 he removed his establishment to more splendid and commodious premises in Prince's Street, which he had acquired by purchase from the connections of his second marriage In that year he was included by the government in a list of justices of the peace for the city of Edinburgh

In January 1826 the public was astonished by the announcement of the bankruptcy of his house, when his liabilities were understood to exceed £250,000

The year 1825 was rendered remarkable in Great Britain by an unusual rage for speculation, and the employment of capital in various schemes and projects, under the name of joint-stock companies

At this period the House of which the late Mr Constable was the leading partner, was engaged extensively in various literary undertakings, on some of which large profits had already been realized, while the money embarked in others, though so far successful, was still to be redeemed Messrs Hurst, Robinson, and Co, the London agents of Constable's house, who were also large wholesale purchasers of the various publications which issued from the latter, had previously to this period acquired a great addition of capital and stability, as well as experience in the publishing department, by the accession of Mr Thomas Hurst, formerly of the house of Messrs Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, and Brown, as a partner But the altogether unprecedented state of the times, the general demolition of credit, and the utter absence of all mercantile confidence, brought Messrs Hurst, Robinson, and Co to a pause, and rendered it necessary to suspend payment of their engagements early in January 1826

Their insolvency necessarily led to that of Messrs Constable and Co, who, without having been engaged in any speculations extraneous to their own business, were thus involved in the commercial distress which everywhere surrounded them

The liberal character of the late Mr Constable in his dealings with literary men, as well as with his brethren in trade, is well known His extensive undertakings, during the period in which he was engaged in business, tended much to raise the price of literary labour, not merely in Scotland, but throughout Great Britain "To Archibald Constable," says Lord Cockburn, "the literature of Scotland has been more indebted than to any other publisher Ten, even twenty guineas a sheet for a review, £2,000 or £3 000 for a single poem, and £1,000 each for two philosophical dissertations (by Stewart and Playfair), made Edinburgh a literary mart, famous with strangers, and the pride of its own citizens" In the department of commercial enterprise to which he was particularly devoted, and which, perhaps, no man more thoroughly understood, his life had been one uniform career of unceasing and meritorious exertion In its progress and general results, (however melancholy the conclusion,) we believe it will be found, that it proved more beneficial to those who were connected with him in his literary undertakings, or to those among whom he lived, than productive of advantage to himself or to his family In the course of his business, also, he had some considerable drawbacks to contend with His partner, the late Mr Hunter of Blackness, on succeeding to his paternal estate, retired from business, and the amount of his share of the profits of the concern, subsequently paid over to his representatives, had been calculated on a liberal and perhaps over-sanguine estimate The relieving the Messrs Ballantyne of their heavy stock, in order to assist Sir Walter Scott in the difficulties of 1813, must also have been felt as a considerable drag on the profits of the business In the important consideration as to how far Messrs Constable and Co ought to have gone in reference to their pecuniary engagements with Messrs Ballantyne, there are some essential considerations to be kept in view Sir Walter's power of imagination, great rapidity of composition, the altogether unparalleled success of his writings as a favourite with the public, and his confidence in his own powers, were elements which exceeded the ordinary limits of calculation or control in such matters, and appear to have drawn his publishers farther into these engagements (certainly more rapidly) than they ought to have gone Yet, with these and other disadvantages, great profits were undoubtedly realized, and had not such an extraordinary crisis as that of 1825-6 occurred, the concern, in a few years, would have been better prepared to encounter such a state of money matters as then prevailed in every department of trade The disastrous circumstances of the time, and the overbearing demands of others, for the means of meeting and sustaining an extravagant system of expenditure, contributed to drag the concern to its ruin, rather than the impetuous and speculative genius of its leading partner

Mr Constable was naturally benevolent, generous, and sanguine At a glance, he could see from the beginning to the end of a literary project, more clearly than he could always impart his own views to others, but his deliberate and matured opinion upon such subjects, among those who knew him, was sufficient to justify the feasibility or ultimate success of any undertaking which he approved In the latter part of his career, his situation as the most prominent individual in Scotland in the publishing world, as well as his extensive connection with literary men in both ends of the island, together with an increasing family, led him into greater expense than was consistent with his own moderate habits, but not greater than that scale of living, to which he had raised himself, entitled him, and in some measure compelled him to maintain It is also certain that he did not scrupulously weigh his purse, when sympathy with the necessities or misfortunes of others called upon him to open it In his own case, the fruits of a life of activity, industry, and exertion, were sacrificed in the prevailing wreck of commercial credit which overtook him in the midst of his literary undertakings, by which he was one of the most remarkable sufferers, and, according to received notions of worldly wisdom, little deserved to be the victim

At the time his bankruptcy took place, Mr Constable was meditating a series of publications, which afterwards appeared under the title of 'Constable's Miscellany of Original and Selected Works, in Literature, Art, and Science,'—the precursor of that now almost universal system of cheap publishing, which renders the present an era of compilation and reprint, rather than of original production The Miscellany was his last project Soon after its commencement he was attacked with his former disease, a dropsical complaint, and he died, July 21, 1827, in the fifty-third year of his age He left several children by both his marriages His frame was bulky and corpulent, and his countenance was remarkably pleasing and intelligent The portrait painted by the late Sir Henry Raeburn is a most successful likeness of him The preceding woodcut is taken from it His manners were friendly and conciliating, although he was subject to occasional bursts of anger He is understood to have left memorials of the great literary and scientific men of his day

COOK, GEORGE, D D, an eminent minister of the church of Scotland, was the second son of the Rev John Cook, professor of moral philosophy in the university of St Andrews, who succeeded to the estate of Newburn in the county of Fife, and of Janet Hill, daughter of the Rev John Hill, minister of St Andrews, Fife, and sister of Principal Hill He was born in December 1772, and at an early age became a student at the united college of St Salvator's and St Leonard's, St Andrews Devoting himself to the ministry, after attending the divinity hall of St Mary's in that university, he was licensed to preach the gospel on the 30th of April 1795 About three months after, he was presented to the living of Laurencekirk, in the gift of St Mary's college, and was ordained and settled there on the 3d of September in that year He remained at Laurencekirk till 1829 During his whole life Dr Cook was distinguished by great energy and activity of mind To his pastoral duties he devoted himself with great assiduity Unaffected and kindly in manner, and singularly easy of access, his people regarded him with much affection and respect His leisure time he early devoted to studies congenial to the duties in which he was engaged, and he published in 1808 a treatise in one vol octavo, under the title of 'An Illustration of the General Evidence establishing the Reality of Christ's Resurrection,' which was at the time very favourably received He had early begun to take a prominent part in the deliberations of church courts, and was led to a careful investigation of the history of the church, which had not then attracted the amount of attention which, in consequence of his labours and those of Dr M'Crie and others, it subsequently received The result of his investigations, carried on under considerable disadvantage from his distance from public libraries, but with great industry and much research, was the appearance of his 'History of the Reformation in Scotland,' in 1811, in 3 vols octavo, embracing the period from the beginning of the Reformation to the appointment of the earl of Murray to the regency in 1567 This was followed by the 'History of the Church of Scotland,' which appeared in 1815, in 3 vols octavo, continuing the narrative from the regency of Murray down to the Revolution The two works form a full and interesting ecclesiastical history of a period out of which momentous consequences to Scotland resulted They are written with great calmness and impartiality, and the researches of later historians have in no particular of the least importance affected their accuracy A third important work was published in 3 vols 8vo, in 1822, entitled a 'General and Historical View of Christianity'

In addition to these larger works, Dr Cook published in 1820 a life of his uncle, Principal Hill, who had long directed the counsels of the General Assembly, in which much important information as to the ecclesiastical proceedings of that venerable body during the period is conveyed In July 1826 a commission was issued by the crown for the visitation of the universities of Scotland, of which Dr Cook was a member To the duties of that commission he devoted himself with his usual mental activity, and on him a large portion of its important work was devolved He drew up for the commissioners elaborate reports of the history and present state of the universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, and the draft of the general Report—services which were acknowledged in a special communication to Dr Cook made by the earl of Rosebery, the chairman of the commission These services were continued till near the conclusion of the year 1830, and as a gratifying mark of the estimation in which his character as a clergyman was held, he was appointed dean of the Order of the Thistle in June that year, the highest honour that the Crown has to confer on a minister of the Church of Scotland

In the course of the summer of 1828 Dr Cook received the intimation that he was to be appointed professor of moral philosophy in the university of St Andrews, and he accordingly entered on the duties of the chair in the following college session To his regular course, of 115 lectures, on moral philosophy, he added in the ensuing year a shorter course, of 49 lectures, on political economy

From an early period of life Dr Cook took a deep interest in the deliberations of the General Assembly, and soon distinguished himself in debate by his knowledge of the constitution and history of the church He was attached, by a deep conviction of their soundness, to those principles maintained by what was called the moderate party in the church—principles which might seem hereditary to his family, for they were those so powerfully advocated by his uncle Principal Hill, and by his father's kinsman Principal Robertson, and which had been maintained by a long line of clerical ancestors But Dr Cook was too independent to tie himself down to party, or to allow others to determine for him what were the principles which, as a member of a party, he should in consistency entertain In the year 1813 he differed with those with whom he had till then acted, as to the important question of pluralities and non-residence To non-residence he was strongly opposed,—his views on this subject will be found expressed in a pamphlet entitled, 'Substance of a speech delivered in the General Assembly, 22d May 1816, containing an Inquiry into the Law and Constitution of the Church of Scotland, respecting Residence and Pluralities,' &c, 8vo The subject excited for a time a strong feeling against Dr Cook on the part of the leading men of the moderate party, and in consequence he was opposed by them in the General Assemblies of 1821 and 1822, when brought forward as a candidate for the moderator's chair On the latter occasion he addressed the Assembly in a speech, subsequently published, in which he vindicated, with great judgment and temper, the course he had followed In 1825, however, he was unanimously chosen moderator, and from that period unquestionably held the leading position in the counsels of the party to which he was attached In all the debates which led to the disruption of the Church of Scotland in May 1843, he took a prominent part on the moderate side, and his name was a "tower of strength" to his party His views on the Veto Act, and on the different questions which were originated by it, as expressed in the Assembly, are fully stated in a pamphlet entitled, 'A few Plain Observations on the Enactments of the General Assembly of 1834, relating to

Patronage and Calls,' published in that year, and in several speeches published since The duties of the Assembly of 1844 were very heavy, and although Dr Cook appeared to be in his usual health, he was attacked almost immediately after with sudden illness, supposed to be connected with disease of the heart The attack was of short duration, but it occasionally returned On the 13th of May 1845, in passing down to the Bank in St Andrews, he was observed to fall heavily on the street, and when taken up it was found that life had fled To Dr Cook's character and usefulness the following tribute was borne by the Assembly that met in 1845,—"The General Assembly desire to record the deep feelings of regret with which they regard the loss which this court and the church at large have recently sustained, in the death of one of its most distinguished members—the Rev Dr George Cook, whose eminent abilities and profound knowledge of the principles and practical constitution of our church, while they highly qualified him for becoming her historian, no less enabled him, in combination with that sound wisdom, clear reasoning, and manly eloquence, which were equally characteristic of his mind, to afford the most valuable aid in conducting the deliberations of the Assembly The cool judgment, enlarged views, and unwearied perseverance of Dr Cook the Assembly regard as having been, under providence, instrumental in no ordinary degree to the safety of the church during the perils with which she was lately surrounded—and the valuable counsels so promptly and kindly afforded by him, as often as inferior judicatories or individual clergymen applied in cases of perplexity for his aid, will be long and gratefully remembered through the church"

Dr Cook married, 23d February, 1801, Diana, eldest daughter of the Rev Alexander Shank, sometime minister at St Cyrus Of seven children, five survived him, namely, the Rev Dr John Cook, minister of Haddington, Mrs Marjoribanks, wife of the Rev Thomas Marjoribanks, Stenton, Alexander Shank Cook, Esq, advocate, the Rev George Cook, chaplain at Bombay, and Henry David Cook, a civil servant of the East India Company at Madras Dr Cook's eldest brother, John Cook, D D, professor of divinity at St Andrews, was the author of a valuable 'Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Books of the New Testament,' published in 1821 He died in 1824 His son, Dr John Cook, is minister of St Leonards, St Andrews, another, the Rev George Cook, of Kincardine O'Neil A younger brother of Dr George Cook is Mr Walter Cook, W S The youngest of the family is the Rev Henry David Cook, minister of Kilmany

COOPER, COWPER, or COUPER, a surname derived from the parish of Cupar in Fife In ancient documents the name is variously spelled, and appears under the several forms of Cupar, Culpvre, Cypre, Cypium, Cowpar, and Coupar The etymology of the name is uncertain, but the word is apparently Celtic, and probably bore reference to the ancient castle or the rising ground on which it was situated

A family of this name, styled of Gogar, possessed a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred in 1638, on John Cooper, Esq, who married Christian, daughter of Robert Skene, Esq of Halliards Among those who were killed with the earl of Haddington, at the blowing up of the castle of Douglas, 30th August 1640, was John Couper of Gogar In 1640, John Cooper, probably his son, was one of the commissioners of the Scots parliament who approved of the treaty of Ripon The first baronet was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir John Cooper at whose death, towards the close of the seventeenth century, without male issue, the title became dormant, but was revived by his great grandnephew, 1st August 1775, Sir Grey Cooper, who represented Rochester in parliament in 1765, and was an energetic supporter of the marquis of Rockingham, under whose administration, as well as under those of the duke of Grafton and Lord North, he was secretary to the treasury In 1783 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the treasury, and in April 1796, sworn a member of the privy council On the death of the seventh baronet, Sir Frederick Cooper, unmarried, in 1850, the title became extinct

A family of the name of Cowper have occupied the same farm on the Abercrombie estate in Fife for more than three hundred years, and it is thought that it is of this family that Cowper the poet of Olney thus writes to Mrs Courtenay, one of his friends "While Pitcairne whistles for his family estate in Fifeshire, he will do well if he will sound a few notes for me I am originally of the same shire, and a family of my name is still there" [New Statistical Account of Scotland, vol ix, page 344, Note, article ABERCROMBIE]

COPLAND, a surname originally English, and signifying a headland, from caput, a head At the battle of Neville's Cross in 1346, King David the Second of Scotland was disarmed and taken prisoner by John Copeland, a gentleman of Northumberland, who was governor of Roxburgh Castle, although not without having knocked out two of Copeland's teeth with his gauntlet, in the struggle to free himself Copeland conveyed the wounded and bleeding monarch off the field, and on refusing to deliver him up to the queen, who had remained at Newcastle during the battle, King Edward, then at Calais, sent for him, when he excused his refusal so handsomely that the king bestowed on him a reward of five hundred a-year in lands near Wooler, which still bear the name of Copland, and made him a knight banneret From this Sir John Copeland descended the Coplands of Colleston in Dumfries-shire, as well as others of the name in Scotland

COPLAND, PATRICK, LL D, professor of natural philosophy at Aberdeen, son of the minister of Fintray, in Aberdeenshire, was born at the manse of that parish in January 1749 Having obtained a bursary by competition, he received his education at Marischal college and university of Aberdeen, and, on March 28, 1775, he was elected professor of natural philosophy in that institution In April 1779 he was transferred to the chair of mathematics in the same university, which he filled till July 9, 1817, when he again became professor of the natural philosophy class He taught with great reputation and success, for upwards of forty years, and, on June 27, 1817, his colleagues conferred on him the honorary degree of LL D in acknowledgment of his eminent services His course of natural philosophy was illustrated by one of the most extensive and complete sets of apparatus in the kingdom, mostly the work of his own hands, or made by workmen under his superintendence As a lecturer, he was distinguished by his clear method and impressive manner of communicating knowledge, and fixing the attention of his hearers He was the first in the north of Scotland who gave a regular series of popular lectures on natural philosophy, divesting that science of its most abstruse calculations, and suiting the subject to the mechanic and operative tradesman His attention was also successfully directed to other sciences In Mr Samuel Parkes's 'Chemical and Philosophical Essays,' due credit is given to Dr Copland for having introduced into this country an expeditious method of bleaching by oxymuriatic acid, which had been shown to him merely as a curious chemical experiment by the celebrated Professor De Saussure, while at Geneva with the duke of Gordon, in 1787 Mr Thomas Thomson, however, in the article Bleaching in the Encyclopædia Britannica, denies that Dr Copland had any claim to the first introduction of the new process into Great Britain, ascribing the merit of it to the celebrated James Watt During his long and useful life, Dr Copland was in frequent correspondence with Watt, Telford, Maskelyne, Leslie, Olinthus Gregory, M Biot, Dr Hutton, and other distinguished literary and scientific men In 1782 he was elected a corresponding member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and, in 1807, an associate of the Linnæan Society of London Declining health caused him, in September 1822, to resign his professorship, and he died November 10th of that year, in the 73d year of his age He married Elizabeth, daughter of Dr David Ogilvy, surgeon, R N, by whom he had three sons and one daughter

CORBET (from Corbeau, a raven), the surname of a family, whose ancestor, Roger Corbet, came over from Normandy, with William the Conqueror and obtained extensive grants of lands in Shropshire and on the marches of Wales. In England this family held many high offices in the state, and not less than nineteen of them are in the rolls, of those who served at Agincourt, the sacking of Cadiz, the wars against the Welsh, Scots, French, &c Between 1192 and 1625, seventy-one were made knights, and one a banneret, and since that time two of the Corbets of Shropshire have been created baronets

A branch of the family seem early to have settled in Scotland, and to have obtained possession of the lands of Mackerstoun in Roxburghshire Walter Corbet, "dominus de Mackerstoun in Teviotia," is witness with others to a charter of Malcolm the Fourth preserved in Anderson's Diplomata. This Walter was the son of Robert Corbet, who is witness in the inquisition made by David prince of Cumberland of the lands belonging to the church of Glasgow, and also in other deeds of that prince, when king of Scots In the Chartulary of Melrose, Walter de Corbet is mentioned as a donor of the church of Mackerstoun to the abbacy of Kelso Avicia de Corbet of this family was the wife of Richard Morville, high constable of Scotland, who died in 1191 In the charters of Alexander the Second, Nicolas Corbet is frequently mentioned as a witness Among those who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296, occur the names of Roger Corbet and Adam Corbet the former of Mackerstoun and the latter supposed to be of Hardgray in Annandale The barony of Mackerstoun was afterwards possessed by the Frasers of Drummelzier, and in the reign of David the Second, was inherited by an heiress, Margaret Fraser, who married Dougall Macdougall, and is now in possession of General Sir Thomas Macdougall Brisbane, baronet, who received it on his marriage, in 1819, with the eldest daughter and heiress of Sir Henry Hay Macdougall, baronet, the descendant of the above Dougall Macdougall

The Corbets of Hardgray in Dumfries-shire, resided latterly in Clydesdale A charter by Thomas de Corbet, dominus de Hardgray, Joanni de Corbet, filio suo, of the lands of Limekilns in Annandale in 1405, was confirmed by the earl of Douglas The Corbets of Hardgray became extinct in the male line in the early part of the eighteenth century Mr Hugh Corbet of Hardgray, the last proprietor left two daughters, coheiresses of his estate, the elder married, first, to John Douglas of Mains, and secondly, to Sir Mungo Stirling of Glorat, and the younger to James Douglas of Mains

A John Corbet, who is styled minister of Benhill, (Bonhill?) published at Dublin in 1639, a quarto work, entitled 'The Ungirding of the Scottish Armour, in answer to the information for Defensive Arms against the King's Majesty, which were drawn up by the Covenanters at Edinburgh' He also published at London, in 1646, 'A Vindication of the Magistrates and Ministers of the city of Gloucester,' 4to Another John Corbet, also a Scotsman, beheaded in the Irish rebellion in 1641, was the author of 'The Epistle Congratulatorie of Lysimachus Nicanor to the Covenanters in Scotland

CORMACK, JOHN, D D, an eminent divine of the Church of Scotland, was born in 1776 At an early period of his life he distinguished himself by his superior attainments in divinity; and when a student at the Hall, he carried off the prize then annually awarded, for the best essay on a given subject in theology In 1807 he was ordained minister of Stow, in the presbytery of Lauder and county of Edinburgh, and in this parish he officiated with great acceptance for nearly 34 years On every subject connected with theological literature Dr Cormack had amassed a large stock of sound and valuable information, and the fruits of his researches appeared in various little works, original and translated, with which, from time to time, he favoured the public Dr Cormack died suddenly in his own church, on Sunday December 20, 1840, in his 64th year —His works are

CORNWALL, a surname derived from the county of that name in England, the first in Scotland of this surname having come from that district Among those who were slain with King James IV at Flodden was John Cornwall of Bonhard His son Peter then a minor, was infeft in these lands in obedience to a brief directed from the chancery, mentioning that his father was killed in that disastrous battle

On 27th April, 1601, a town-officer of Edinburgh, named Archibald Cornwall, was hanged in that city, for no other offence than having, at the sale of some sequestrated goods at the cross, driven a nail into the gibbet standing close by, intending to suspend on it a portrait of the king on a board that was among them, for the purpose of its being better seen but was dissuaded from doing so by those present In the same reign one Robert Cornwall was minister of Linlithgow, and in 1610 he was a member of the General Assembly which was held at Glasgow on the 8th of June of that year

CORRIE, a surname derived from a Gaelic word signifying a narrow glen It is the name of an old parish, (conjoined in 1609 with Hutton), and of a river and lochlet in the district of Annandale, Dumfries-shire The lands of Corrie, forming the southern division of the united parish of Hutton and Corrie, were, in the twelfth century, held by a family vassals of Robert de Bruce, who, from them, took the surname of Corrie In the Ragman Roll is the name of Walter Corrie of this family

In the 33d year of David II, a grant was made to Robert de Corry (and his spouse), son and heir of the late Thome de Torthorwald, 'our kinsman who died at the battle of Durham," of the lands of Coulyn and Ruchane He had another grant of lands from the same monarch in the 40th year of his reign In the Rotuli Scotiæ, is recorded in 1367-68, a safe conduct granted by Edward III to "Robertus Corry de Valle Annandiæ de Scot cum sex equitibus"

Adam de Corry is a witness to a charter of Confirmation by Robert, duke of Albany in 1411

The Corries of that ilk and of Newby in Dumfries-shire are frequently mentioned in the Public Records of the 15th and 16th centuries In the reign of James V, one of the Johnstones of Annandale acquired the estate by marriage with the daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Corrie

A branch of the same family possessed the lands of Kelwood, in Dumfries shire, until the end of the 16th century, when they passed to the Charteris family In 1572, at the meeting of parliament at Edinburgh, George Corry de Kelwood was one of the barons present

Although the ancient possessions of the family passed into other hands, the name did not become extinct in Dumfries-shire Early in last century, James Corrie, Esq of Speddoch, provost of Dumfries, son of John Corrie by his wife Jean Paterson, sister of William Paterson, who planned the Darien scheme, married Janet, daughter of Mr Goldie of Craigmuir, Kirkcudbright-shire, and left numerous descendants Thomas Corrie, Esq of Shielston and Newton Auds, for many years manager of the British Linen Co Bank, was his male representative

James Corrie's brother, Joseph Corrie, Esq, proprietor of various lands in Dumfries shire, married a daughter of Judge Phipps, and his only daughter, Sophia Corrie, married William Hope Weir Esq of Craigie Hall

From their half brother, William Corrie of Redbank, are descended families of the name, occupying a prominent rank among the citizens of London and Liverpool

Their sister married the Rev Mr Ewart of Troqueer One of her sons, Joseph, was ambassador from the British Court at Berlin, and died at the early age of 33 Another son, William, a merchant in Liverpool, was the father of William Ewart, Esq, M P for the Dumfries district of Burghs (See EWART, surname of, vol ii p 182)

CORSAN, (now Carson,) the surname of a family which once possessed the estate of Meikleknox in Dumfries-shire The first of their ancestors in Scotland was an Italian gentleman of the Corsini family, who came to this country with an abbot of New Abbey, or Dulce Cor, in Galloway, about the year 1280 Sir Alexander Corsane was witness to a charter by Archibald the Grim earl of Douglas, superior of Galloway, to Sir John Stewart, laird of Garyton, of the lands of Calie The charter is without a date, but it must have been before 1400, as the earl died in that year The principal family of Corsan was designed of Glen, which, in the reign of James IV, passed with Marion, daughter and only child of Sir Robert Corsan of Glen, by marriage to Sir Robert Gordon, who thereupon styled himself of Glen, and on the death of his elder brother at the battle of Flodden was afterwards designed of Lochinvar Of that lady descended lineally the barons of Lochinvar and viscounts of Kenmure [See KENMURE, viscounts of]

Sir John Corsane, an early cadet and next heir male of this family of Glen, settled at Dumfries and had a lineal succession of heirs male for 18 generations, all of the name of John Some of their brethren were ecclesiastics, particularly Dominus Thomas Corsanus, designed perpetual vicar of Dumfries, in a charter granted by him for some church-lands in Dumfries dated in 1408

In the reign of King James VI, John Corsan, 13th in descent from the said Sir John Corsan was provost of Dumfries, as appears from an inscription on his funeral monument erected by his son He was commissioner in parliament for that burgh in 1621, when the five articles of the Perth assembly received the sanction of law He was provost of Dumfries 45 years, and died in 1629, aged 75½ years, and was buried with eleven of his grandfathers He m Janet Maxwell, one of Lord Maxwell's family, who bore him several children One of his daughters, Marion, was married to Stephen Laurie of Max-

welton, ancestor of the Lauries, baronets, of Maxwelton His eldest son, John Corsan, advocate, married Margaret Maxwell, one of the daughters and coheiresses of Robert Maxwell of Dinwoody, a branch of the family of Maxwell, by whom he had John his heir, who predeceased him, leaving a son, who succeeded his grandfather, Helen, and several others With his wife he got the lands of Barndennoch, and in consequence was sometimes designed of that place He died in 1671 He was provost of Dumfries about the time of the civil wars, and when that burgh was attacked by the royalists, he was, with others, a considerable loser It is said that a third part of the burgh of Dumfries belonged to him, and there were at one time many old houses in the town which bore the arms of the family, some of them quartered with those of the families into which he and his predecessors had married The family ended, in Februarv 1721, in a daughter, Agnes Corsan, the wife of Mr Peter Rae, minister at Kilbride Her mother was of the family of Maxwell of Tinwald Mrs Rae had twelve children Her eldest son, Robert Rae, assumed the name and arms of Corsan, on succeeding to the estate of Meikleknox The Corsans of Dalwhat, in the parish of Glencairn, belonged to an elder branch of the same family The name, which has been corrupted into Carson, is very prevalent in Dumfries shire Of the learned Dr Carson, rector of the High School Edinburgh, a native of that county, a notice is given ante, p 599

COUPAR, Lord a title in the peerage of Scotland (attainted in 1746) conferred in 1607, on the Hon James Elphinston second son of James first Lord Balmerinoch, by his second wife Marjory, daughter of Hugh Maxwell of Tealing On the distribution made by James the Sixth of the lands which fell to the crown on the dissolution of the religious houses, after the Reformation, his majesty erected the Cistertian abbey of Coupar in Angus into a temporal lordship in his favour by the title of Lord Coupar, and the heirs male of his body, which failing, to his father and his heirs male and entail, by royal charter dated 20th December 1607 His name after this often occurs in the rolls of parliament the influence and superior talents of his elder brother, Lord Balmerinoch, having forced him into notice In January 1641 he was one of the committee of four of each of the three estates sent by the parliament to Perth to assist General Baillie in opposing the progress of the marquis of Montrose, and on the subsequent 29th November, he was one of the commissioners appointed to be judges of the processes of all delinquents cited by the estates, with power to examine witnesses, &c On 7th June 1649, his lordship was constituted one of the extraordinary lords of session, in room of his brother, Lord Balmerinoch, deceased Speaking of this appointment Sir James Balfour says "The Lord Balmerinoch's extraordinary place of the session they have bestowed on his brother the Lord Coupar, whose head will not fill his brother's hat" [Annals, vol ii page 390] The following epitaph, quoted in Brunton and Haig's Lives of the Senators of the College of Justice, from the Balfour MS, A 7 34, in the Advocates' Library, is to the same effect

> "Fy upon death,
> He's worse than a trooper,
> That took from us, Balmerinoch,
> And left that howlet Coupar"

In 1650 Lord Coupar was appointed a colonel of one of the regiments of foot for the county of Perth, raised to resist Cromwell, and for his loyalty a fine of three thousand pounds was imposed upon him by that personage, 12th April 1654 He married, first, Margaret, daughter of Sir James Halyburton of Pitcur, secondly, Lady Marion Ogilvy, eldest daughter of James, second earl of Airlie, who afterwards became the wife of John, third Lord Lindores, but had no issue by either wife He died in 1669

A curious decision of the court of session, in a case in which his lordship was concerned, preserved by Lord Stair, and quoted by Douglas, in his Peerage (vol i p 863, note, Wood's edition), was given 3d July 1662 Lord Coupar, sitting in parliament, taking out his watch, handed it to Lord Pitsligo, who refusing to restore it, an action was brought for the value Lord Pitsligo said that Lord Coupar having put his watch in his hand to see what hour it was, Lord Sinclair putting forth his hand for a sight of the watch, Lord Pitsligo put it into Lord Sinclair's hand, in the presence of Lord Coupar, without contradiction, which must necessarily import his consent Lord Coupar answered, that they being then sitting in parliament, his silence could not import a consent The Lords repelled Lord Pitsligo's defence, and found him liable in the value of the watch

The title and estates of the first Lord Coupar devolved upon his nephew, John, third Lord Balmerinoch, whose grandson, John, fifth Lord Balmerinoch, on being appointed a lord of session, 5th June 1714, assumed the title of Lord Coupar The titles were forfeited by his half-brother, Arthur, fourth Lord Coupar and sixth Lord Balmerinoch, in 1746 — See BALMERINO, Baron, ante, p 228, and ELPHINSTON, ARTHUR

COUPER, WILLIAM, a learned prelate, the son of a merchant at Edinburgh, was born in that city in 1566, and studied at the university of St Andrews Going young to England, he was engaged for about a year as an assistant teacher to a Mr Guthrie, who kept a school at Hoddesden, in Hertfordshire He subsequently visited London, where he was hospitably received by the famous Hugh Broughton, who assisted him in his theological studies At the age of nineteen he returned to Edinburgh, was licensed to preach in 1586, and in 1587 was ordained minister of the parish of Bothkennar in Stirlingshire In 1592 he was removed to Perth, where he continued for nineteen years In 1608, he was appointed by the General Assembly one of the commissioners to go to London to give advice to his majesty regarding the suppression of papistical superstition, and while at court was sent by the king to deal with Mr Andrew Melville, then a prisoner in the Tower, but he failed in making any impression on that champion of presbyterianism He was at one time much opposed to episcopacy, and in 1606 he wrote a letter to the bishop of Dunblane against the course he had taken in accepting a bishopric Nevertheless his views changed, and in 1613, he was appointed bishop of Galloway, and dean of the Chapel-Royal, by James the Sixth He died at his residence in the Canongate of Edinburgh, February 15, 1619 His body was interred in the Greyfriars' churchyard of Edinburgh His character, not in his favour, but much the reverse, is drawn at length by Calderwood in his History of the Kirk of Scotland (vol vii page 349) His works are

COUPER, ROBERT, M D, a minor poet of some merit, was born at the farm-house of Balsier (of which his father was tenant), parish of Sorbie, Wigtonshire, 22d September, 1750 In 1769 he entered as a student at the university of Glasgow, and studied at first for the Church of Scotland, but his parents having died, and left him little or nothing, he accepted of an office as tutor in a family in the state of Virginia, America On the breaking out of the American revolution he returned to Scotland in 1776 He now studied medicine at the college of Glasgow, and on passing as surgeon, he began to practise at Newton-Stewart, in his native county On the recommendation of Dr Hamilton, professor of midwifery, Glasgow, to the duke of Gordon, he settled in Fochabers in Banffshire, in 1788, as physician to his grace He obtained the degree of M D from the college of Glasgow, and was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh In 1804 he published at Inverness two volumes of 'Poetry, chiefly in the Scottish language,' which he dedicated to Jane, duchess of Gordon He was the author of a very beautiful song, 'Red gleams the sun,' inserted in his works under the title of 'Kinrara,' tune, Niel Gow He wrote some other lyrical pieces, one of which, written "to a beautiful old Highland air," called 'Geordy again,' is inserted in Campbell's 'Albyn's Anthology, vol ii p 28 The author states that he wrote this song at the request of Lady Georgiana Gordon, afterwards duchess of Bedford, and that it alludes "to her noble brother (the marquis of Huntly), then with his regiment in Holland" Dr Couper left Fochabers in 1806, and died at Wigton, on the 18th January 1818 Dr Thomas Murray, the author of the 'Literary History of Galloway,' communicated a short notice of Dr Couper to Mr David Laing for his Illustrative Notes to Stenhouse's Johnson's 'Scots Musical Museum,' to which we have been indebted for these particulars

COUTTS, the surname of a family celebrated as bankers Their most remote traceable ancestor was William Coutts, said to have been a Coutts of Auchintoul, a vassal of the family of Macdonald, settled in Montrose, at the close of the 16th century, who became provost of the town His grandson, Patrick, was a tradesman in Edinburgh At the death of the latter in 1704, he left £2,500 to his wife and three children John Coutts, the eldest of his family, the head of the firm of John Coutts & Co, general merchants, Edinburgh, became lord provost of that city Having gone to Italy on account of his health, he died at Nola near Naples, in his 52d year A few days before his leaving Scotland, he had executed a new deed of copartnery, in which he, his eldest son Patrick and Mr Trotter were partners The entire stock of this firm was only £4,000 sterling "Their business was dealing in corn, buying and selling goods on commission, the negotiation of bills of exchange on London, Holland, France, Italy, Spain and Portugal," that is, merchants and bankers Provost Coutts left four sons, of whom Thomas, the youngest, was the survivor Separating himself entirely from the firm of John Coutts & Co, of Edinburgh, (which some years subsequently, changed its title to that of W Forbes, J Hunter & Co, and in 1830 became the Union Bank of Scotland,) he went to London, and originated the bank of Coutts & Co in the Strand A memoir of him follows

COUTTS, THOMAS, a wealthy metropolitan banker, fourth and youngest son of John Coutts, general merchant in Edinburgh, was born in Scotland about 1731 His brother James had become a partner in a banking-house in St Mary Axe, London, and afterwards went into partnership with the subject of this notice in a bank in the Strand On the death of James, in 1778, Thomas became the sole manager, and becoming the banker of George the Third, and of many of the principal of the aristocracy, with habits of great economy he soon amassed an immense fortune He died February 24, 1822 He was twice married, first to Susan Starkie, a female servant of his brother, by whom he had three daughters Susan, married, in 1796, to George Augustus, third earl of Guildford, Frances, married, in 1800, to John, first marquis of Bute, and Sophia, married, in 1793, to Sir Francis Burdett, baronet In 1815 his first wife died, and, within three months, he took for his second wife Harriet Mellon, an actress, to whom, at his death, he bequeathed all his property, and who was afterwards married to the duke of St Albans Miss Burdett Coutts, his grand-daughter, inherited the greater part of his wealth

CRAIG, a surname derived from a Scottish word meaning a crag or steep rocky cliff, and often prefixed to the names of places in hilly or mountainous districts in various parts of Scotland The name seems to belong particularly to the north of Scotland, while the surname of Craigie is derived from an estate in Linlithgowshire See CRAIGIE, surname of

In 1335, when the castle of Kildrummy, in Aberdeenshire, was besieged by the followers of Edward Baliol, Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, William Douglas of Liddesdale, and the earl of March advanced to its relief with eight hundred men, natives of the Lothians and the Merse They were joined by three hundred men from the territory of Kildrummy, under the command of John Craig Surprising the army of Baliol, under the earl of Athol, in the forest of Kilblean, they signally defeated them, Athol then leader, being among the slain Some writers assert that this John Craig was captain of the garrison at Kildrummy, but Lord Hailes, with more probability, thinks that the reinforcement which he brought to the patriot army were the vassals of the earldom of Mar, whereof Kildrummy was the capital messuage, and not a detachment from the garrison of the castle Fordun calls the commander quidam Johannes Craig, which plainly shows that he did not mean to speak of John Crabbe the Fleming, whom he had previously mentioned, yet later authors suppose them to have been the same [Dalrymple's Annals of Scotland, vol ii p 180, note]

Of the name, the Craigs of Riccarton were the most conspicuous family The first of it was the distinguished feudal lawyer, Sir Thomas Craig of Riccarton, of whom a notice is given below James Craig the fourth son of his great grandson, was professor of civil law in the university of Edinburgh, to which chair he was appointed October 18, 1710 He died in 1752 By his wife, a daughter of Robert Dundas of Arniston, one of the senators of the college of justice, he had two sons, Thomas, usually styled "the laird," and Robert The two brothers for many years resided together, and neither ever married Though very wealthy, they were men of primitive and simple habits On the death of the elder brother, Thomas, 22d January, 1814, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, his younger brother, Robert, succeeded him The latter, who had passed advocate in 1754, was, about the year 1776 appointed one of the judges of the commissary court, which office he resigned in 1791 He was a liberal in politics, and in 1795 he published anonymously at Edinburgh, a pamphlet entitled, 'An Inquiry into the Justice and Necessity of the present War with France,' 8vo, of which a second and improved edition was published the following year Its object was to demonstrate the right which every nation has to remodel its own institutions and choose its own form of government, referring, by way of precedent, to the various revolutions which have taken place in Great Britain, without producing any attempt at interference on the part of other states. He died on 13th March 1823, at the advanced age of ninety-three Pursuant to a deed of entail, Mr James Gibson, writer to the signet, (afterwards Sir James Gibson Craig, baronet, the baronetcy being conferred in 1831) succeeded to the estate of Riccarton, when he assumed the name and arms of Craig (For notice of, see page 692) At his death in 1850, his son Sir William, became second baronet

Another family of the name were the Craigs of Dalnair and Costerton, Mid-Lothian, who became connected by marriage with the Tytlers of Woodhouselee, Anne Craig, daughter of James Craig, Esq of Costerton, writer to the signet, having in 1784, married the eminent antiquarian writer, William Tytler of Woodhouselee She was the mother of Alexander Fraser Tytler, usually styled Lord Woodhouselee Her sister, Miss Craig of Dalnair, married Mr Alexander Keir, a wine merchant at Bordeaux, father of James Keir, Esq of Blackshiels The last of the Dalnair family, Sir James Henry Craig, K B, governor-general of British North America, died in 1812

CRAIG, SIR THOMAS, of Riccarton, a distinguished lawyer and writer on the feudal law, was born at Edinburgh about 1538 It is uncertain whether his father was Robert Craig, a merchant in Edinburgh, or William Craig of Craigfintry, afterwards Craigston in Aberdeenshire In 1552 he was entered a student of St Leonard's college, in the university of St Andrews, which he quitted in 1555, after receiving his degree as bachelor of arts He then proceeded to the university of Paris, where he studied the civil and canon laws He returned to Scotland about 1561, was called to the bar in February 1563, and, in 1564, was made justice-depute In 1566, when Prince James was born, Craig wrote a Latin hexameter poem of some length on the event, entitled 'Genethliacon Jacobi Principis Scotorum,' which is highly spoken of by Mr Tytler in his Life of Sir Thomas Craig This, and his 'Paræneticon,' a poem written on the departure of King James for England, are inserted in the 'Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum' Craig soon acquired an extensive practice at the bar, which he enjoyed for upwards of forty years He was a convert to the protestant religion, and appears to have kept himself apart from the political intrigues and commotions of those distracted times, devoting himself to his professional duties, and, in his hours of relaxation, cultivating

a taste for classical literature His principal work is his learned treatise on the feudal law, entitled 'Jus Feudale,' which is held in such high estimation, that it has often been quoted both by historians and lawyers It was completed in 1603, but not published till forty-seven years after his death In January 1603 he wrote a Latin treatise on the right of James to the crown of England, an English translation of which was, by Dr Gatherer, published in 1703 He was present at King James' entry into London, as well as at his coronation, which events he commemorated in a Latin hexameter poem Having repeatedly declined the honour of knighthood, King James ordered that he should nevertheless enjoy the style and title In 1604 he was one of the Scots commissioners nominated by his majesty to confer with others on the part of England, regarding the probability of a union between the two countries, a favourite project with King James Sir Thomas wrote a work on this subject, which still remains in manuscript He also wrote a treatise on the independent sovereignty of Scotland, entitled 'De Hominio,' which was translated into bad English by Mr George Ridpath, and published in 1695 In the latter part of his life he became advocate for the church Sir Thomas Craig died at Edinburgh, February 26, 1608 His portrait is given in the preceding column

He had married Helen, daughter of Heriot of Trabrown, in East Lothian, by whom he had four sons and three daughters His eldest son, Sir Lewis Craig, born in 1569, was educated at the university of Edinburgh, under the eye of his father, and took his degree of master of arts on 30th July 1597 He afterwards studied the civil law for two years at Poitiers, and on his return to his native country was admitted an advocate, 11th June 1600 He was knighted and appointed a lord of session sometime between the 24th February 1604 and 19th June 1605 He sat as a lord of session, under the title of Lord Wrightshouses, while his father was still a pleader at the bar The judges at that time wore their hats on the bench, but, "whenever," says Mr Tytler, "his father appeared before him, Sir Lewis, as became a pious son, uncovered, and listened to his parent with the utmost reverence" [Life by Mr P F Tytler] Sir Lewis died before 6th June 1622 —Sir Thomas Craig's works are

CRAIG, JOHN, an eminent preacher of the Reformation, and colleague of John Knox, was born in 1512, and soon after lost his father in the disastrous battle of Flodden He received his education at the university of St Andrews, and going afterwards to England, became tutor to the family of Lord Dacre In consequence of the war which broke out between England and Scotland, he returned to his native country, and became a friar of the Dominican order Falling under the suspicion of heresy, he was thrown into prison, but was soon liberated In 1537 he left Scotland, and after in vain attempting to procure a place at Cambridge, proceeded to France, and thence to Italy At the recommendation of Cardinal Pole he was admitted among the Dominicans at Bologna, and such was his merit, that he was soon raised to the rectorate of that body Finding a copy of Calvin's Institutions in the library of the Inquisition, he was induced to read that work, when he became a convert to the protestant doctrines Making no secret of his change of sentiments, he was exposed to considerable danger, but was advised by an old monk, a countryman of his own, to obtain his discharge, and depart from the monastery He now entered as tutor into the family of a neighbouring nobleman who had embraced protestant principles, but both he and his patron being accused of heresy, were seized and sent to Rome, where he was brought to trial, and, with some others, condemned to be burnt on the 20th of August 1559 Luckily for him, the pope, Paul the Fourth, died on the evening before the day appointed for his execution and the populace having excited a tumult in the city, the prison doors were thrown open, and Craig and his fellow captives effected their escape, and took refuge in a house beyond the suburbs They were pursued by a company of soldiers, and on entering the house, their leader looked Craig eagerly in the face, and, taking him aside, asked if he recollected of once relieving a poor wounded soldier whilst walking in the fields in the vicinity of Bologna Craig replied that he did not remember the circumstance "But I remember it," replied the grateful soldier, "I am the man whom you relieved, and Providence has now put it in my power to return the kindness which you showed to a distressed stranger You are at liberty, your companions I must take along with me, but, for your sake, shall show them every favour in my power" He then supplied him with money, and allowed him to depart

Craig soon found his way back to Bologna, but afraid of being denounced to the Inquisition, he left that city, and avoiding all the public roads, endeavoured to reach Milan, his money failing him on the road, he laid himself down by the side of a wood to ruminate on his sad condition, when, to his surprise, a strange dog came fawning up to him with a purse in its mouth Viewing this as "a singular testimony of God's care of him," he now prosecuted his journey with renewed strength Having reached Vienna, and announced himself a Dominican monk, he was employed to preach before the archduke of Austria, afterwards the Emperor Maximilian the Second, with whom he became a favourite But the new pontiff applying to have him sent back to Rome as a condemned heretic, the archduke dismissed him with a safe conduct In 1560 he arrived in England, and being informed of the establishment of the Reformed religion in his native country, he hastened to Edinburgh, and was admitted to the ministry Having, during an absence of twenty-four years, nearly forgotten his native language, he preached for a short time in Latin to some of the learned in Magdalene chapel, in the Cowgate He was afterwards appointed minister of the Canongate, where he had not officiated long till he was elected, in 1562, colleague to John Knox, in the parish church of Edinburgh, where he continued for nine years In 1564, in one of his sermons he inveighed against the hypocrisy of the times with so much truth and point that many of the courtiers were highly offended, and in particular Maitland of Lethington, secretary to the queen, who soon after, in the famous conference between the court lords and the leading members of the Assembly, carried on the discussion singly with John Knox In the following year he and his colleague Knox were ordained by the Assembly to prepare the form of the exercise to be used at a public fast, and to cause it to be printed This treatise of fasting was long preserved in the Psalm-books In the memorable year 1567 he proclaimed the banns of marriage between the queen and Bothwell, declaring at the same time that the marriage was odious and scandalous to the world, for which he was called before the council In the General Assembly of July 1568, with six other ministers he was appointed to revise the form and order of excommunication which had been prepared by Knox, and in that of July 1569, he and Knox, with Mr David Lindsay and the superintendant of Lothian, received commission to revise the acts of the General Assemblies Of the Assembly which met at Edinburgh on 1st March 1570 he was chosen moderator He was re-elected to the same office in the meeting of the General Assembly 24th October 1576, and was a third time elected moderator on 17th October 1581

About 1572 Craig was sent by the General Assembly to preach at Montrose, and two years afterwards he was appointed minister at Aberdeen In 1579 he was appointed one of the chaplains to James the Sixth, and thereupon returned to Edinburgh, and took a leading part in the General Assemblies of the Church He assisted in compiling the Second Book of Discipline, and was the writer of the National Covenant which was signed in 1580 by the king and his household, and from this was called the king's covenant or Confession of Faith On the 19th September 1582, he rebuked the king from the pulpit for issuing a proclamation in which the ministers of the church were severely reflected upon, for their conduct in excommunicating Robert Montgomery, archbishop of Glasgow, whereat, it is said, the king wept, saying that he might have told him privately Mr Craig had taken great pains in collecting the acts of Assembly, which were approved of by the Assembly of 1583 In the following year he and several ministers were summoned before the council for their bold speeches, and their opposing such acts of parliament as they thought contrary to the liberties of the church, on which occasion the earl of Arran, the king's favourite, started to his feet, and said they were too pert, he should shave their heads, pare their nails, and make them an example to all who should rebel against king and council They were charged to compear before the king and council at Falkland on the 4th September They obeyed, when some warm discussion took place between Mr Craig and the bishop of St Andrews, and Arran endeavoured to browbeat him and those with him Mr Craig was discharged from preaching, and he and the other accused ministers were commanded to compear again before the council the 16th of November He afterwards subscribed the bond of obedience He officiated at the coronation of the queen in 1590, and on her subsequent entry into Edinburgh, his son, "a young boy, made a short oration to her" In 1591 he prepared, by order of the General Assembly, the form of an examination before the Communion, which was ordered to be printed, and taught in schools and families, in place of the catechism On 29th December in that year, he again rebuked the king from the pulpit for not doing justice to his people, to the great wrath of his majesty In 1595, from the infirmities of age, he resigned his office of minister to the king, and retired from public life He died December 4, 1600, aged 88

CRAIG, ALEXANDER, a poet, of whom little is known His amorous songs, sonnets, and elegies, were published in London in 1606

CRAIG, JOHN, a learned mathematician and divine, was a native of Scotland, but the place and date of his birth are unknown He settled at Cambridge in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and distinguished himself as a mathematical writer by a number of papers on Fluxions, and other subjects, in the Philosophical Transactions, and in the Acta Eruditorum He had a controversy with John Bernoulli on the quadrature of curved lines and curvilinear figures, in which Leibnitz took the part of Craig But his most extraordinary work is a pamphlet of thirty-six pages 4to, entitled 'Theologiæ Christianæ Principia Mathematica,' published at London in 1699 The object of this curious tract is to calculate the duration of moral evidence and the authority of historical facts He establishes, as his fundamental proposition, that whatever we believe upon the testimony of men, inspired or uninspired, is nothing more than probable He then proceeds to suppose that the probability diminishes in proportion as the distance of time from this testimony increases, and by means of algebraical calculations, he arrives at length at the conclusion, that the probability is, that the Christian religion will last only fourteen hundred and fifty-four years from the date of his book! His tract was republished at Leipsic in 1755, by J D Titius of Wittemberg, with a refutation of his arguments The Abbe Houteville also combated his learned but absurd reveries The date of Craig's death is not known The following list of his writings is from Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica, in which it is stated he was sometime vicar of Gillingham, Dorsetshire

CRAIG, JAMES, a very popular preacher in his day, was born at Gifford, in East Lothian, in 1682 He was educated in the university of Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M A, and was ordained minister at Yester During the time he remained there, he wrote a volume of 'Divine Poems,' which passed through two editions. He afterwards became minister at Haddington, and, in 1732, was translated to Edinburgh, where he died in 1744, aged 62 His sermons, in three volumes 8vo, chiefly on the heads of Christianity, published at Edinburgh in 1732, were at one time much esteemed, but they are now become scarce

CRAIG, WILLIAM, D D, an eminent divine, was the son of a merchant in Glasgow, where he was born in February 1709 At college he distinguished himself by his uncommon proficiency in classical learning He was licensed to preach in 1734, and in 1737, having received a presentation from Mr Lockhart of Cambusnethan, he was ordained minister of that parish He afterwards accepted of a presentation to Glasgow, and became minister of St Andrew's church in that city He married the daughter of Mr Anderson, a considerable merchant in Glasgow, by whom he had several children, two of whom, William, an eminent lawyer, afterwards Lord Craig, and John, a merchant, survived their father His wife died in 1758, and he subsequently married the daughter of Gilbert Kennedy, Esq of Auchtifardel Dr Craig died in 1784, in the 75th year of his age His sermons were much admired for their eloquence

CRAIG, WILLIAM, LORD CRAIG, an eminent judge, son of the preceding, was born in 1745 He studied at the university of Glasgow, and was admitted advocate in 1768 In 1787 he became sheriff-depute of Ayrshire, and in 1792, on the death of Lord Hailes, was raised to the Bench, when he assumed the title of Lord Craig In 1795 he succeeded Lord Henderland as a judge of the court of justiciary, which situation he held till 1812, when he resigned it on account of infirm health While still an advocate, he was one of the chief contributors to 'The Mirror,' a celebrated periodical published at Edinburgh, the joint production of a society of gentlemen, all connected with the bar, except Mr Henry Mackenzie, author of 'The Man of Feeling' This society was at first termed the 'Tabernacle,' and usually met in a tavern for the purpose of reading their essays When the publication of these was resolved upon, the idea of which originated with Mr Craig, the name was changed to that of the 'Mirror Club' The Mirror was commenced January 23, 1779, and finished with the 110th number, May 27, 1780 The whole was afterwards republished in 3 vols 8vo Mr Craig's contributions, next to those of Mr Mackenzie, were the most numerous The thirty-sixth number, written by him, "contributed in no inconsiderable degree," says Dr Anderson, in his Lives of the Poets, "to rescue from oblivion the name and writings of the ingenious and amiable young poet, Michael Bruce" Mr Craig also wrote many excellent papers for 'The Lounger,' which was started some years after by the same club His lordship, who was the cousin of Mrs M'Lehose, the celebrated Clarinda of Burns, died July 8, 1813 From a portrait of Mr Craig by Kay the woodcut on the preceding page has been taken

CRAIG, JAMES, an eminent architect of the eighteenth century, was the son of William Craig, merchant in Edinburgh, and Mary, youngest sister of James Thomson, the author of the Seasons His plan for the new town of Edinburgh, published in 1768, and dedicated to George the Third, first brought him into notice It was altered by Craig himself in 1774 Various other changes were effected on the plan, ere it assumed a permanent shape even on paper It was selected as the best from a great number of competing designs On publishing it, he appended to it the following quotation from his uncle's Seasons

> "August, around what public works I see!
> Lo! stately streets, lo! squares that court the breeze, > See long canals, and deepen'd rivers join
> Each part with each, and with the circling main,
> The whole entwined Island"

A part of Craig's design was to preserve and extend the North Loch, at the back of Edinburgh Castle, in the form of a long canal It is now turned to much better use, after being drained, as the site of that portion of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway which runs into the Edinburgh terminus Craig was presented with a gold medal bearing the city arms and a suitable inscription, and received along with it the freedom of the city of Edinburgh in a silver box The Physician's Hall, a chaste Grecian edifice, designed by him, which stood on the south side of George street, but removed in 1845, seems to have been his best work The foundation stone of it was laid in 1774 by the celebrated Dr Cullen, but that building was removed in 1845, and the Commercial Bank of Scotland, remarkable for its lofty and magnificent portico, now occupies its site In 1786 Craig issued a quarto pamphlet, illustrated with engravings, containing a scheme for remodelling the old town, but its suggestions were not adopted His professional skill was for a long time almost entirely exercised on the private dwellings of the new town, and these generally are so elegantly designed, and the streets so uniform as to have acquired for the new town of Edinburgh, the proud title of "the city of palaces" He died at Edinburgh, on the 23d June, 1795

CRAIG, SIR JAMES GIBSON-, an eminent citizen of Edinburgh, and one of the leading local politicians of his time, was born on the 11th October, 1765, and belonged to the ancient family of Gibson, of Durie, one of whom married the daughter of Sir Thomas Craig, of Riccarton, the learned author of the 'Treatise on the Feudal Law,' and in consequence the subject of this notice, on the extinction of the male line, succeeded as heir of entail to the Riccarton estate His father, William Gibson, Esq, a merchant in Edinburgh, died in 1807 By his wife, Mary Cecilia, a daughter of James Balfour, Esq, of Pilrig, he had nine sons and a daughter Sir James, the second son, was educated at the High School of his native city, and in 1786 was admitted a member of the Society of Writers to the Signet Latterly he was at the head of the list of that body From his earliest years he entertained a zealous attachment to the principles of civil and religious liberty, and throughout his long life had always been regarded as one of the most able and active of the liberals of Scotland On the breaking out of the French Revolution of 1789, he was one of those who came prominently forward to agitate for parliamentary reform, and by his purse, his pen, his influence, and professional counsel, undismayed by the frowns of those in power, he aided the liberal cause, and proved himself the friend of the friends of liberty when more cautious and less zealous supporters of liberal opinions shrunk from the hazards and dangers which then attended such a bold and honest course as was adopted by him and a few others holding similar sentiments At a later period, when Harry Erskine, John Clerk of Eldin, Adam Gillies, afterwards Lord Gillies, David Cathcart, afterwards Lord Alloway, and others of the Edinburgh Whigs, were joined by Cranstoun, Jeffrey, Moncrieff, Cockburn, and Murray, James Gibson was still the active and indomitable agent in conducting the policy of the party "In fact," says a writer in a local journal, "the presence and counsel of Sir James were always deemed indispensable when a movement was to be made, for he was one of the main springs when speculation gave way to action During that period of excitement which followed a few years after the peace, when men, undistracted by the shock of contending hosts, had time to revert to political reform, we find Sir James receiving his full share of the abuse then lavished by the 'Beacon' on the leaders of the Whig party One charge made by that journal involved his professional reputation and personal honour, and he sought recourse in the jury court, when, after an elaborate trial, during which the most satisfactory testimony was borne to his high character and honour, by certain of the most eminent of his professional brethren, although on the opposite side of politics, he triumphantly established his case, and the jury returned a verdict for him with £500 damages" He was on terms of intimacy with Fox and most of the leaders of the old whig school, and figures prominently in the sarcastic ballad against the Whigs written by Sir Alexander Boswell in 1822, which led to the fatal duel with Mr Stuart of Dunearn, in which Boswell was shot

During the Reform agitation of 1830-31, and 32, his unimpaired energies and undying zeal in the cause, enabled him, though then verging on his seventieth year, to discharge, with admirable skill, courage, and boldness, the duties of that leadership to which he was called by his services and character His tall and commanding figure might be seen at all the public meetings of that stormy period, with his characteristic top-boots, and, although no orator, he could express his sentiments in public, in a style which, from its brevity and force, told powerfully on his audience Shrewd common sense, a practical knowledge of the subject, and a business-like way of handling the question, were his principal characteristics on these occasions He attended and took part in the King's Park demonstrations in favour of reform, and all the other meetings in Edinburgh, and they were numerous, of that exciting period, and was one of the foremost at the Jubilee of 1832, in celebrating the triumph of the liberal party To the last he retained his interest in public and political matters, yet, though for many years known to be the confidential adviser and agent of the leaders of the liberal party in Scotland, few citizens of Edinburgh have ever been more generally respected, or their name been more truly honoured, not only in that city, but throughout Scotland This he owed to the strength, ardour, and firmness of his mind, his judgment and resolution, and particularly to his honesty of purpose, and straightforward honourable course of conduct

In 1831, during the ministry of Earl Grey, as a reward for his political services to his party, he was created a baronet of the united kingdom The whig patronage for Scotland was supposed to have been vested for a considerable period in his hands, but he was never known to use his influence unfairly to promote his own interests, or those of his party He had no personal ambition but to serve and promote the liberal cause Though he was understood, from his influential position and the services he had rendered them, to have a large claim on the whig party, he never solicited any office for himself In 1806, when the Whigs obtained a brief tenure of the ministry, he was appointed solicitor of stamps, an office which he did not long continue to hold

Up to a short period of his death he regularly attended at the chambers of the eminent firm of which he was the head—Messrs Gibson-Craigs, Wardlaw, and Dalziel, writers to the signet—taking an active part in the professional business, and also in that of the banks and public companies with which he was officially connected as a director

It was on the motion of Sir James Gibson-Craig, that, at the meeting of Sir Walter Scott's creditors and trustees on the 17th December, 1830, after the failure of the latter, Sir Walter was requested to accept of his furniture, plate, linens, paintings, library, and curiosities at Abbotsford, as the best means they had of expressing their very high sense of his most honourable conduct, and in grateful acknowledgment of his exertions on their behalf

He married, in September 1796, a daughter of James Thomson, Esq, of Edinburgh He assumed the additional surname and arms of Craig, in 1818, on succeeding Robert Craig, Esq of Riccarton, in virtue of the provisions of an entail made by his predecessor He died 6th March 1850, and was succeeded in the baronetcy, and estates of Inglston and Riccarton, by his eldest son, William Gibson-Craig, Esq, sometime member of parliament for Edinburgh

CRAIGIE, a surname originally Creagach, a Celtic word signifying a craggy ridge, and derived from the lands of Craigie in the parish of Dalmeny, Linlithgowshire, now called Craigiehall They formerly belonged to a family who took their name from them Joannes de Crugin, or Craigie, was one of the witnesses to the original charter of Dundas of Dundas, the Superior, in the reign of David the First In the Ragman Roll (1296) is the name of John de Craigy, supposed on good grounds to belong to this family In 1367, John de Craigy of that ilk is made mention of in the Chartulary of St Giles He got the lands and barony of Braidwood in Lanarkshire by his marriage with Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir John de Monfode, by whom he had an only daughter, Margaret, called domina de Craigy, heiress of Craigy and Braidwood, who, in 1387, married Sir John Stewart, a younger son of Sir Robert Stewart of Durrisdeer Of this marriage came the Stewarts of Craigiehall, who possessed the estate for about two hundred and fifty years, and ultimately sold it in 1643, to John Fairholm, treasurer of the city of Edinburgh Mr Fairholm's grand-daughter married the first marquis of Annandale, who in her right obtained Craigiehall Their only surviving child, Henrietta, on her marriage with the first earl of Hopetoun carried the estate into that family, and it is now possessed by Mr Hope Vere, their descendant, the additional name of Vere or Weir having been assumed on the marriage of the Hon Charles Hope, second son of the said earl of Hopetoun, with the heiress of Blackwood, in Lanarkshire, whose name was Vere

Another principal family of the name were the Craigies of Kilgraston, in the parish of Dumbarnie, Perthshire, two of whom were eminent judges Robert Craigy of Glendoick, in the parish of Kinfauns, in that county, lord president of the court of session, born in 1685, was the son of Lawrence Craigie of Kilgraston Admitted advocate 3d January 1710, he was, on 4th March 1742, appointed lord advocate On the death of Robert Dundas of Arniston, he was promoted lord president, and took his seat on the bench 2d February 1754 On 18th June 1755 he was named by patent one of the commissioners for improving the fisheries and manufactures of Scotland He died 10th March 1760 Lord Woodhouselee, in his Life of Lord Kames, (i 41) has preserved his character both as a judge and a lawyer Another Robert Craigie of the same family, born in 1754, second son of John Craigie of Kilgraston was also on the bench, under the title of Lord Craigie He passed advocate 13th July 1776, was appointed sheriff-depute of Orkney, November 1786, and of Dumfriesshire 3d December 1791, on which occasion he was presented with the freedom of the burgh of Dumfries, and was elevated to the bench 18th November 1811 He died in 1834, and was buried in the old churchyard of Dumbarnie He was considered an excellent feudal lawyer The estate of Kilgraston was purchased in 1784 by John Grant, Esq, chief justice in the island of Jamaica, who died in 1793, and was succeeded by his brother Francis, in whose family it remains — See SUPPLEMENT for additional information

The Craigies of Dumbarnie, in the parish of that name, are a branch of the family who formerly possessed Kilgraston "They were remarkable," says the New Statistical Account, "for the elegant improvements they made on their estates, and it is to their public spirit that the community is indebted for several avenues of trees which adorn the roads in the parish" Half a mile south from Perth there is a village of the name of Craigie There is also a parish in Ayrshire of the name

CRAIGINGELT, a surname derived from lands of that name in Stirlingshire In November 1595 Mr Alexander Livingston, and three others of the same name, with three of their servants, found surety to underly the law for art and part of the mutilation of John Craigingelt of that ilk and Robert his son of their left arms, committed within the burgh of Stirling on the preceding 21st of August In 1614, Thomas Craigingelt of that ilk was one of the assize on the trial of Helen Erskine, Isobel Erskine and Annas Erskine, sisters of Robert Erskine, brother of the laird of Dun, for poisoning their nephew John Erskine, heir-apparent of David Erskine, their eldest brother, and his brother, Alexander Erskine They were found guilty, and two of them executed, the third, Helen, being banished the kingdom In 1600, George Craigingelt, one of the earl of Gowrie's attendants, was tried for his share in the Gowrie conspiracy, and being found guilty was, on the 22d August, hanged with two others of his lordship's retainers who were condemned for the same crime, at the market-cross of Perth It does not appear that he had any direct hand in the conspiracy, but he was seen keeping the back gate, with a drawn double-handed sword in his hand, during the time of the fray He had previously been ill in bed, but on hearing the noise he rose and ran up the close, and cried with the rest of the town there convened, 'Give us our provost, or the king's green coats shall pay for it" His deposition will be found inserted at length in the second volume of Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, pages 157, 158

CRAIK, an old surname found in the Ragman Roll Nisbet remarks that it seems to be a south country name In the stewartry of Kirkcudbright there is a family of the surname of Craik who possess the estate of Arbigland, bought in 1722 by the ancestor of the present proprietor, from the earl of Southesk, for twenty-two thousand merks The son of the first Craik of Arbigland died in 1735, and his son, William Craik, Esq, was one of the most successful agriculturists of his day In his younger years he employed his time in the grazing of cattle, and was the first who undertook to improve the soil in the south of Scotland Arbigland was then in its natural state, very much covered with whins and brooms, and yielding little rent, being only about three thousand merks a-year (eighteen merks make one pound sterling) The estate is in the parish of Kirkbean, the church of which was built in 1776, according to a plan of William Craik, Esq then of Arbigland

Mr George L Craik, M A , for a long time connected with Mr Charles Knight, the London publisher, as editor of some of his publications, and elected in 1849 professor of History and English literature in Queen's College, Belfast, a native of Dumfries-shire, may be of the same family

CRAIL, a surname derived from lands near "the East Neuk" of Fife, and the name of a parish there In the twelfth century there was a family of some consequence, who adopted the name of Crail as their surname Adam Crail or Karail, who died in 1227, was one of the clerici regis, and bishop of Aberdeen

CRAMOND, a surname supposed to be derived from what is now the parish of that name in the counties of Linlithgow and Edinburgh There was an old family Cramond of Auldbar in Forfarshire In a charter of John de Strathern, 1278, William de Cramond is designed clericus de Warderoba domini regis In the fifteenth century Catherine Cramond, daughter of the proprietor of Auldbar, married Sir Thomas Maule, ancestor of the Panmure family This lady was his second wife In 1575, James Cramond, the then laird sold the barony to Lord Glammis, in whose family it continued till 1670, when Patrick, first earl of Strathmore, sold it to Sir James Sinclair, who again sold it to Peter and James Young In 1753, it was purchased by William Chalmers of Hazlehead, the ancestor of the family of Chalmers of Auldbar

CRAMOND, a barony in the peerage of Scotland (now supposed extinct), one of the very few which has been held by natives of England, having no connexion whatever, either of blood, birth, or estate, with North Britain It was conferred, on the last day of 1628, by Charles the First, on Elizabeth the second wife of Sir Thomas Richardson, knight, lord chief justice of the court of king's bench, the only instance, as remarked by Crawford in his Peerage, of any female creation in the Scottish Roll Lady Cramond was the daughter of Sir Thomas Beaumont, knight, of Stoughton Grange, Leicestershire, and had previously been married to Sir John Ashburnham of Ashburnham in Sussex, knight and by him, who died 29th June 1620, aged twenty-nine had several children Her eldest son, John, was the ancestor of the earls of Ashburnham Her second husband, Sir Thomas Richardson, the son of Dr Thomas Richardson, was born at Hardwick in Suffolk, 3d July 1569 and died 4th February 1634 The peerage of Cramond was conferred on his wife for her life, with remainder as she had no issue of her own to the son of Sir Thomas, by his first wife, (Ursula, daughter of John Southwell, of Barham Hall, Suffolk, by whom he had one son and four daughters) and his heirs male which failing to the heirs male of his father Collins, in his Baronetage (ed 1771, vol ii page 164) says, probably the reason why the title was not granted to Sir Thomas himself was on account of his being a judge, it being in those days unusual Lady Cramond died 16th April 1651 Her second husband, Sir Thomas Richardson, distinguished himself as an opponent of Laud, having issued an order against the ancient custom of wakes, and directed every minister in England to read it in his church This was considered an encroachment on the ecclesiastical authority by Laud, then bishop of Bath and Wells, and Richardson was brought before the council, and so severely reprimanded that he came out complaining that he had been almost choked by a pair of lawn sleeves This step was the means of the Book of Sports, which afterwards proved so fatal to that intolerant prelate

Sir Thomas' son, also named Sir Thomas Richardson, died in 1642, aged forty-five He was twice married By his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Hewett, knight, he had with other children, a son, Thomas, Lord Cramond, who succeeded his stepmother in the title He had also a family by his second wife, Mary, widow of Sir Miles Sandys, knight The son, Thomas Richardson, Lord Cramond, elected member of parliament for the county of Norfolk in 1660, married Anne, daughter of Sir Richard Gorney, knight, lord mayor of London, and died 16th May 1674 His eldest son, Henry Richardson, Lord Cramond, born in 1650, married Frances, daughter of Sir John Napier, baronet, of Luton Hoo widow of Sir Edward Barkham of Southacre in Norfolk On his death, 5th January 1701, he was succeeded by his brother William Richardson, Lord Cramond, born 2d August 1654, married, first, Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Edward Barkham, Esq , of Southacre, and secondly, Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of James Daniel of Norwich, goldsmith The former had no issue, but by the latter his lordship had a son and a daughter, William his heir , and Elizabeth, heiress of her brother, married in 1735 to William Jermy, Esq , of Bayfield in Norfolk They sold Southacre Hall, the last remains of the great Cramond property in Norfolk, to Sir Andrew Fountaine, knight Lord Cramond died 7th March 1719, and was succeeded by his son William Richardson, Lord Cramond, born in 1714 He died, unmarried, 28th July 1735, when the peerage is supposed to have become extinct

On this peerage the lords of session, in their return to an order of the House of Lords, dated 12th June 1739, remark that it does not appear that any person ever sat or voted as Lord Cramond, or that any one offered to vote at any election since the Union under that title, but as the descendants of Sir Thomas Richardson, if any were, had probably their residence in England, their not having claimed hitherto can be no objection to their title if they can verify their right to it

CRANSTON, a surname derived from the lands of Cranston in the counties of Edinburgh and Roxburgh, anciently possessed by the ancestors of the noble family of that name A parish on the eastern verge of Edinburghshire now bears the name of Cranston In the charters of the twelfth century it was written Cranestone, the Anglo-Saxon Craenston,—signifying the territory or resort of the crane, a bird which, when armorially carried, as by all families of the name of Cranston, is the emblem of piety and charity Their motto, however, seems to be the reverse of this, as it is, "Thou shalt want ere I want" In a charter of King William the Lion to the abbacy of Holyroodhouse, Elfric de Cranston is witness He is also witness to a convention betwixt Roger de Quincy and the abbot and convent of Newbottle in 1170 In the reign of Alexander the Second, Thomas de Cranston made a donation to the monastery of Soltray, of some lands lying near Paiston in East Lothian, for the welfare of his own soul, and those of his ancestors and successors, and in that of Alexander the Third, Andrew de Cranston is witness to a charter of Hugo de Riddel,—knight, the proprietor of the district, from whom one portion of it acquired the name of Cranston-Riddel—to the abbacy of Newbottle Hugh de Cranston was one of the Scottish barons who swore fealty to King Edward the First in 1296 Radolphus de Cranston, dominus de New Cranston, son and heir of Andrew, lord of Cranston, made a donation to the abbacy of Newbottle 27th May, 1338, and confirmed to the monastery of Soltray, totam illam terram in territorio meo de Cranston, quem habui ab antecessoribus meis, betwixt 1330 and 1340, in which confirmation his son John de Cranston, is particularly named From King David the Second, Thomas de Cranston got a charter of the lands of Cranston

In the year 1582 Thomas Cranstoun of Morristoun, or Muneston, descended from Cranstoun of that ilk, was one of the jury on the trial of George Hume of Spott, indicted for being concerned in the murder of Lord Darnley, when Hume was acquitted In 1591, John Cranstoun of Morristoun granted, with his wife, Barbara, a reversion of the lands of Toderick In the following year Thomas Cranstoun, younger of Moriestoun, and his brother John Cranstoun were amongst the persons summoned on a charge of treason, and forfeited, for assisting the turbulent earl of Bothwell in his nocturnal attack on the palace of Holyroodhouse, and Thomas Cranstoun was denounced rebel for not appearing to answer for the same William Cranstoun, the son of the above Thomas Cranstoun and Barbara his wife, married Sarah, daughter and heiress of Sir John Cranstoun of that ilk, the first Lord Cranstoun, afterwards noticed On June 11, 1600, Sir John and his son William were indicted for the reset of the said Thomas Cranstoun, a declared traitor, and on 19th June they produced the king's warrant that proceedings should be stayed against them, when they were commanded to their lodgings John Cranstoun did not receive a remission of his forfeiture till 1611

Another family of the name, the Cranstouns of Corsbie in Berwickshire, were at one period of some consideration on the borders In 1530, Jasper Cranstoun of Corsbie was one of the Berwickshire barons who were proceeded against for neglecting to fulfil their bonds "to keep good rule within their respective bounds," as was also John Cranstoun of that ilk They found surety to stand their trial, when required, and also submitted themselves to 'the king's will' On June 20, 1548, Cuthbert Cranston of Dodds found George Lord Hume security for himself and fifteen others to underlie the law for treasonable assistance afforded to "our old enemies" of England, and on 9th October following Cuthbert Cranston of Mains found caution to answer for the same crime Cuthbert Cranstoun of Thirlestanemains and Thomas Cranstoun of that ilk were among thirty-two border barons who subscribed a bond at Kelso, 6th April 1569, for preserving the peace of the borders, against the thieves of Liddesdale, Eskdale, Ewesdale, and Annandale, the Armstrongs, Johnstones Elliotts, &c On November 9, 1570, Sir William Cranstoun of Dodds, commissary of Lauder, found security to underlie the law for the slaughter of James Brownlee In Birrell's Diary, under date October 20, 1596, there is the following entry "Gilbert Lawder slain at Linlithgow by the Cranstouns" In March 1612 Alexander French of Thornedykes and James Wight, his nephew, were found guilty of the slaughter of John Cranstoun, brother of Patrick Cranstoun of Corsbie, and beheaded on the Castlehill of Edinburgh, and on 3d September 1613, Gilbert Cranstoun, uncle of the said Patrick, was tried and found guilty of stealing a gray stallion from the stables of his nephew, and of various other acts of theft, and of shooting George Home of Bassendean in the thigh, committed in September 1609 and hanged for the same on the Castlehill of Edinburgh

Of this name were several ministers eminent in their day The first minister of the parish of Liberton, Mid Lothian, after the Reformation was Mr Thomas Cranstoun who had previously been minister of Borthwick He entered to his stipend, (which only amounted to two hundred merks or eleven pounds two shillings and twopence,) at Lammas 1569, and was translated to Peebles at Whitsunday 1570 Mr John Cranstoun was minister of Liberton from 1625 to 1627

In August 1563, a serious disturbance took place at Edinburgh, in consequence of the queen's domestics at Holyrood, during her absence at Stirling, being found attending mass at the chapel there Patrick Cranstoun, "a zealous brother," as Knox styles him, entered the chapel, and finding the altar covered, and a priest ready to celebrate mass, he demanded of them how they dared thus openly to break the laws of the land? The magistrates were summoned, and peace restored with difficulty

In the reign of James the Sixth, Mr Michael Cranstoun was minister of Cramond Calderwood characterizes him as a timeserver, but he seems to have been decided in his opposition to the measures of the court regarding the church With other ministers he was ordered to be apprehended for the treasonable and seditious stirring up of the tumult and uproar in Edinburgh, on the 17th December 1596, his share in that memorable affair being that he read the history of Haman and Mordecai to the people assembled in the Little Kirk, while certain commissioners appointed by them went to King James, who was then sitting in the Tolbooth administering justice, in consequence of which he entered in ward, but did not long continue in it, as his majesty's fury was chiefly directed against Mr Robert Bruce, and the other ministers of Edinburgh

In the same reign, Mr William Cranstoun was minister of Kettle in Fife, of whom Calderwood relates that on the 18th August 1607, on the meeting of the Synod of Fife, when the king sent four commissioners to force Archbishop Gladstanes on the synod as moderator, Mr William Cranstoun, moderator of the previous synod, walking in the session house, which was within the kirk, at his meditation, and finding himself troubled at the closeness of the air, went up to the pulpit, not knowing that any other was appointed by the commissioners to preach, and while sitting in the pulpit, a messenger came to him with a letter, which he put in his pocket without reading it A little while after another messenger was sent, in the lords commissioners' name, to bid him come down He answered that he came to that place in the name of a greater Lord, whose message he had not yet discharged, and with that named a psalm to be sung, because he saw the people somewhat amazed Then one of the bailies went and whispered to him that he was commanded by the lords to desire him to come down He replied, "And I command you in the name of God to sit down in your own seat, and hear what God will say to you by me" The bailie obeyed At last, when he was commencing his prayer, the conservator of the privileges of the merchants in the low countries, being a councillor, went to him, and desired him to desist, for the lords had appointed another to preach "But the Lord," said Mr Cranstoun, "and his kirk have appointed me, therefore, beware how ye trouble this work," and immediately proceeded with his prayer and preaching [Calderwood's History, vol vi page 674] For his conduct on this occasion he was afterwards put to the horn On the 10th of May 1620, John Spottiswood, archbishop of St Andrews, held a court of high commission in that city, when he deprived this aged and worthy minister of his charge

CRANSTOUN, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by a family of the same name, descended from Thomas de Cranston who, in the reign of King David the Second, had a charter from the earl of Mar, of the barony of Stobbs, within that of Cavers, in the shire of Roxburgh His supposed grandson, Thomas de Cranstoun, scutifer regis, was a personage of considerable influence in the reign of James the Second Along with Sir William Crichton, the chamberlain, and William Fowles, keeper of the privy seal, he was in May 1426, sent ambassador to Eric, king of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, to adjust the debt due to him for the relinquishment of the Hebrides to King Alexander the Third, which they amicably settled He was afterwards much employed in negociations with England He had letters of safe conduct, with Lord Crichton, chancellor, and others, commissioners for treating of peace, 3d April 1448, again in 1449, 1450, and 1451 In the latter year he was one of the conservators of the truce with England, and in 1453 he and William de Cranstoun, his son, were conservators of the truce, again in 1457 and 1459, and in the latter year Thomas de Cranstoun was one of the wardens of the marches He died about 1470 On a pillar on the north side of where the altar stood in the church of St Giles, Edinburgh, are his armorial bearings He had two sons, the younger of whom was ancestor of the Cranstouns of Glen

William de Cranstoun, the elder son, is designed of Crailing in a charter to William Lord Crichton, 7th April 1450, in his father's lifetime On 2d March, 1451-2, he had a charter to William Cranstoun of Cralyn He appears among the barons in parliament, 18th March 1481-2 He died in 1515 William de Cranstoun had two sons, John and Thomas John, the elder son, married Janet Scott, and died in 1552 His eldest son, Sir William Cranstoun, had a charter to himself and Elizabeth Johnstone his wife, and John Cranstoun, their son, of the lands of New Cranstoun, in the county of Edinburgh, 30th May 1553 On the 25th June 1557, dame Janet Bethune, Lady Buccleuch, and several persons of the name of Scott were accused of going to the kirk of St Mary of the Lowes, to the number of two hundred, 'bodin in feire of war,' (that is, arrayed in armour,) and breaking open the doors of the said kirk, in order to apprehend the laird of Cranstoun, for his destruction, and for the slaughter of Sir Peter Cransfoun On July 14, 1563, William Cranstoun of that ilk, James his brother, and another, found caution to underlie the law at the next court at Selkirk, for art and part going to the steading of Williamshope, belonging to Alexander Hoppringill of Craigleith, and hamstringing and slaying three of his cattle By his wife, who was the daughter of Andrew Johnstone of Elphinstone, Sir William Cranstoun had two sons, John and Thomas, and two daughters The elder son, John, married Margaret, eldest daughter of George Ramsay of Dalhousie, by whom he had a son, also named John, who seems to have died without succeeding to the estate, and seven daughters

On the 23d August 1600, Mr Thomas Cranstoun, one of the earl of Gowrie's attendants, was, with two others of his retainers, executed at Perth, for drawing swords in the time of the tumult during the mysterious transactions of the Gowrie conspiracy He was the brother of Sir John Cranstoun of Cranstoun, a zealous professor of religion, with whom Mr Robert Bruce the celebrated Edinburgh minister passed some time in retirement at Cranstoun in 1603, when persecuted by the court

Sarah, the eldest of the seven daughters of the above John Cranstoun, married William Cranstoun, first Lord Cranstoun He was the son of John Cranstoun of Morriestoun and captain of the guard to King James the Sixth, by whom he was knighted He was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Cranstoun, by patent dated 17th November 1609, to him and his heirs male bearing the name and arms of Cranstoun On the 20th August 1617, his lordship, with the lords Sanquhar and Buccleuch, William Douglas of Cavers, sheriff of Teviotdale, and three others, the landlords of the east and west marches, compeared personally before the lords of council, and bound themselves to make their whole men, tenants and servants, answerable and obedient to justice, and that they should satisfy and redress parties wronged, conform to the laws and acts of parliament, and general bond made in 1602, which was the strictest ever made on the borders. The first Lord Cranstoun died in June 1627, having had four sons and one daughter James, the second son, was in 1610 brought before the council for sending a challenge to the son of Sir Gideon Murray, and committed to Blackness castle, while the latter for concealing the same, with the intention of meeting his opponent, was warded in Edinburgh castle James Cranstoun, for repeating the offence, was afterwards banished forth of his majesty's dominions The fathers at the same time were bound for all of their sons come to man's age, under the pain of ten thousand merks, that they should keep the peace with each other

John, the eldest son, second Lord Cranstoun, married first, Elizabeth, youngest daughter of Walter first Lord Scott of Buccleuch, secondly, Helen, youngest daughter of James, seventh Lord Lindsay of Byres, but had no issue by either He was succeeded by his nephew, William, son of James, master of Cranstoun above mentioned, the second son of the first lord This gentleman was twice married, first, to Margaret, only daughter of David Macgill of Cranstoun-Riddell, by whom he had a daughter Margaret, who became the wife of Thomas Craig of Riccarton, in the county of Edinburgh, and, secondly, to Lady Elizabeth Stewart, eldest daughter of Francis earl of Bothwell, and had a son, William, third Lord Cranstoun, and three daughters

William, third Lord Cranstoun, marched into England with King Charles the Second in 1651, and being taken at the battle of Worcester, was committed prisoner to the Tower He was particularly excepted out of Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, April 1654, by which his estates were sequestrated, but a portion of the lands, of the yearly value of two hundred pounds, were settled on his wife and children He married Lady Mary Leslie, third daughter of Alexander, first earl of Leven, and had a son James, fourth Lord Cranstoun, who married Anne, daughter of Sir Alexander Don of Newton, in the county of Roxburgh, baronet, and had two sons, William, fifth Lord Cranstoun, and the Hon Alexander Cranstoun who died at Darien, without issue

William, fifth Lord Cranstoun, the elder son, supported the treaty of union in the last Scots parliament He died 27th January 1727 By his wife, Lady Jane Ker, eldest daughter of William, second marquis of Lothian, who survived him forty-one years, he had seven sons and five daughters

About the history of the Hon William Henry Cranstoun, the fifth son, born in 1714, there is something very uncommon He was a captain in the army, and married at Edinburgh on the 22d of May 1744, Anne, daughter of Mr David Murray, merchant in Leith, who was the son of Sir David Murray of Stanhope, bart The marriage was a private one, on pretence that its being known might prevent his preferment in the army, as she was a Roman Catholic No witness was present but a single woman The clergyman was brought by Captain Cranstoun, and was not known to Miss Murray or the other woman They lived together, in a private manner, till sometime in July thereafter Then the lady went to an uncle's house in the country, while the captain staid among his own relations till November, and then proceeded to London A close correspondence was kept up between them as husband and wife Before he left she acquainted him of her being in the way of becoming a mother, and he, in consequence, in his absence wrote very affectionately both to herself and her uncle acknowledging her to have been his wife from the mid

die of the preceding May, but still insisted on the marriage being kept secret He afterwards informed all his relations of it, and they visited and corresponded with her as his wife At her confinement she was attended by one of his sisters A daughter was born at Edinburgh, on February 19th, 1745, and was baptized by a minister of the established church, in presence of several of the relations on both sides The child was held up to baptism by one of the captain's brothers, and named after his mother, by express orders from himself Notwithstanding all this, Captain Cranstoun disowned his marriage in 1746, alleging that they were never married, that he had only promised to marry her in case she should turn protestant, that double the time agreed for her changing her religion was now elapsed, without her doing so, that what he had said to his friends was only to amuse them and save her honour, and that now he would never marry her, but was willing to support her to the utmost of his power The lady raised a declarator of her own marriage, and of her daughter's legitimacy, before the commissaries of Edinburgh, the summons of which was executed in October 1746 In the process, a great number of letters written by the captain and the lady were produced, and after a tedious litigation the commissaries on the 1st March 1748, decreed them to be married persons, and the child to be their lawful daughter, on the 7th of April following, they decerned the captain to pay the lady an annuity of forty pounds sterling for herself, and ten pounds for their daughter so long as she should be alimented by her, both to commence from the date of citation, and on the 11th of May, they ordained him to pay her forty pounds of costs, and nearly sixty pounds for extracting the decreet Captain Cranstoun advocated the case to the court of session, but he was equally unsuccessful there It seems that during the proceedings he courted a young lady in Leicestershire, but all hopes of a union with her were put a stop to, when the match was nearly concluded, on the lady's friends hearing that he was already married About the year 1746, having gone to Henley to recruit, Miss Mary Blandy, the daughter of a retired attorney at Reading, possessing, according to report, ten thousand pounds, fell in love with him, and as her father disapproved of the captain's addresses on account of his having a wife alive in his native country, she poisoned him on the 5th of August 1751, with some powder which Capt Cranstoun had sent her from Scotland, in a packet containing Scots pebbles, and labelled "to clean pebbles with," having mixed it in his gruel For this heinous crime she was tried at Oxford in February 1752, and being found guilty she was hanged on the Castle green of that city, on the 6th of April thereafter In Miss Blandy's statement after her condemnation, she alleged that the powders were sent to her by her lover to be given to her father as love-potions, to make him kind to them both, and induce him to consent to their marriage, and that he had written to her that he had consulted a Mrs Morgan, "a cunning woman" in Scotland, who had assured him that they would have that effect, which she thoroughly believed There does not appear to have been any grounds for supposing that the captain was in any way accessary to the murder He died 2d December 1752, a few months after Miss Blandy's execution

His younger brother, the Hon George Cranstoun of Longwarton, the seventh son of the fifth Lord Cranstoun, married Maria daughter of Thomas Brisbane of Brisbane, in Ayrshire, and had by her two sons and three daughters He died at Edinburgh 30th December 1788 The second son, George Cranstoun, was an eminent judge of the court of session, under the judicial title of Lord Corehouse He was originally designed for the army, but studied the law He passed advocate, 2d February 1793, was appointed one of the depute advocates in 1805, and sheriff depute of the county of Sutherland in 1806 He was chosen dean of the faculty of advocates, 15th November 1823, and elevated to the bench, on the death of Lord Hermand in 1826, from which he retired in 1839 His title was taken from his seat near the celebrated fall of Corra linn in Clydesdale, one of the most beautiful and romantic places in Lanarkshire where he was visited by Sir Walter Scott in 1827 His acquaintance with the author of Waverley began in the winter of 1788, when they were both students of civil law in the university of Edinburgh, and their intimacy lasted during life When practising at the bar, Mr Cranstoun was the author of the celebrated jeu d'esprit, entitled the "Diamond Beetle Case," (inserted in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, vol i pp 384—387,) in which the judicial style and peculiar manner of several of the judges, in delivering their opinions, are most happily imitated He was a superior Greek scholar, which rendered him a great favourite with Lord Monboddo, who used to declare that Cranstoun was the only scholar in all Scotland Lord Corehouse was an excellent judge and a first-rate lawyer especially in all feudal questions

His eldest sister, Margaret Nicolson, married, 25th February 1780, William Cuninghame of Lainshaw, in Ayrshire The second, Jane Anne afterwards countess of Purgstall, was an early confident and correspondent of Sir Walter Scott She was the first person to whom, in April 1796, he read the manuscript of his first published piece, the translation of Burger's Lenore, and she early predicted his poetical excellence, writing to a friend in the country at that period, she said, "Walter Scott is going to turn out a poet—something of a cross, I think, between Burns and Gray" On the 23d June 1797 she married Godfrey Wenceslaus, count of Purgstall, a German nobleman who had been some time residing in Edinburgh He was a count of the Holy Roman empire, of noble and ancient descent and possessed large estates in the province of Styria "This lady," says Lockhart in his Life of Scott (under date 1821), "had undergone domestic afflictions more than sufficient to have crushed almost any spirit but her own Her husband, the count Purgstall, had died some years before this time, leaving her an only son, a youth of the most amiable disposition, and possessing abilities which, had he lived to develop them, must have secured for him a high station in the annals of genius This hope of her eyes, the last heir of an illustrious lineage, followed his father to the tomb in the nineteenth year of his age The desolate countess was urged by her family in Scotland to return, after this bereavement, to her native country, but she had vowed to her son on his death-bed, that one day her dust should be mingled with his, and no argument could induce her to depart from the resolution of remaining in solitary Styria. By her desire, a valued friend of the house of Purgstall, who had been born and bred up on their estates, the celebrated orientalist Joseph Von Hammer, compiled a little memoir of 'The two last Counts of Purgstall,' which he put forth in January 1821, under the title of 'Denkmahl,' or Monument" The copy of a letter of acknowledgment of the receipt of this work by Sir Walter Scott to the countess, but which by some inadvertence was never sent, will be found in Lockhart's Life of Scott An account of a Visit to the Countess de Purgstall during the last months of her life by Captain Basil Hall, has been published See his Schloss Hainfeld Of Helen D'Arcy, Lord Corehouse's youngest sister, the wife of Professor Dugald Stewart, a notice follows and died at London 4th July 1778 He married Sophia, daughter of Jeremiah Brown of Abscourt in Surrey, with whom he obtained twelve thousand pounds, and she afterwards succeeded to a larger fortune She had an estate in the West Indies, and a jointure of seven hundred pounds Her ladyship remained only four months a widow, as she took for her second husband, on 10th November, 1778, Michael Lade, Esq, councillor at law, and died 26th October 1799 By this lady, Lord Cranstoun had five sons and two daughters The eldest, William, and the third, James, successively enjoyed the title The Hon George Cranstoun, the fifth son, born in 1761, was captain of an independent company of foot in Africa, which was reduced in 1783 In 1795 he became captain in the 131st foot, was appointed major of a West India regiment in 1796, and the same year was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of that corps In 1801 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 64th regiment of foot, which regiment he commanded at the capture of Surinam in May 1804, when he was wounded. He had the rank of colonel in the army 1st January 1805, and died at Surinam, 8th March 1806, in his 45th year, unmarried.

William, seventh Lord Cranstoun, the eldest son, born at Crailing, 3d September, 1749, succeeded his father in 1773, and died unmarried at London, 1st August 1778, aged 29

His brother James, the third son, eighth Lord Cranstoun, was a distinguished naval officer He was born in 1755, and had the rank of lieutenant in the royal navy 19th October 1776, and of captain, 31st January 1780 He commanded the Bellequieux, of 64 guns, in the engagements between Sir Samuel Hood and the Count de Grasse, off St Christophers, 25th and 26th January, 1782 After the victory over De Grasse gained by Admiral Lord Rodney, 12th April 1782, he was sent home with the despatches announcing it, in which his lordship declared that Lord Cranstoun had acted as one of the captains of the Formidable during both actions, and that he was much indebted to his gallant behaviour, on both occasions He commanded the Bellerophon in Admiral Cornwallis' squadron, 17th June 1795, when, with five ships of the line and two frigates, he sustained an attack of the French fleet, of thirteen ships of the line, seven frigates, seven rasees and two brigs, and obliged them to give over, after a running fight of twelve hours, wherein eight ships of the line were so shattered that they could not engage any longer In his despatches the admiral stated that he considered the Bellerophon as a treasure in store, having heard of her former achievements, and observing the spirit manifested by all on board, joined to the activity and zeal showed by Lord Cranstoun during the whole cruise The thanks of parliament were, on 17th November 1795, voted to the admiral, captains, &c, "for the skill, judgment, and determined bravery displayed on this occurrence, which reflected as much credit as the achievement of a victory" In 1796 his lordship was appointed governor of Grenada and vice-admiral of that island, but before he could set out to his government, he died at Bishop's Waltham in Hampshire, 22d September 1796, in the forty-second year of his age His death was occasioned by drinking cyder impregnated with sugar of lead, from being made in a leaden cistern He was buried in the garrison chapel at Portsmouth His character, both as a man and a naval officer, was most honourable The contemporary journals said that "his death would be felt as a public loss by those who knew his professional merits, and will be long and deeply lamented by all who were acquainted with his exemplary worth in private life" He married at Darnhall, 19th August 1792, Elizabeth, youngest daughter of Lieutenant-colonel Lewis Charles Montolieu, sister of Lady Elibank, but had no issue by her She died at Bath, 27th August, 1797, aged twenty-seven His lordship was succeeded by his nephew, James Edward, ninth Lord Cranstoun, the son of the Hon Charles Cranstoun, (who died in November 1790,) fourth son of the sixth lord by his wife, Elizabeth Turner, of the county of Worcester

James Edward, the ninth lord, married at the Retreat in St Christophers, 25th August, 1807, Anne Lunnington, eldest daughter of John Macnamara, Esq of that island, by whom he had two sons and two daughters, and died 5th September 1818

His elder son, also named James Edward, tenth Lord Cranstoun, born 12th August, 1809, is unmarried His brother, the Hon Charles Frederick Cranstoun, born in 1813, is the heir presumptive

CRANSTOUN, HELEN D'ARCY, authoress of the beautiful and pathetic song of 'The tears I shed must ever fall,' was the third daughter of the Hon George Cranstoun, youngest son of William, fifth Lord Cranstoun, and was born in 1765 On the 26th of July 1790 she became the second wife of Dugald Stewart, of Catrine, Ayrshire, professor of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, and died at Warriston House, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, 28th July 1838 A copy of verses, attributed to her, beginning "Returning spring, with gladsome ray," which breathe the same strain of tender feeling as her justly admired song, 'The tears I shed,' is inserted among the Notes to Johnson's Musical Museum, last edition

CRAW, (the same as Crow,) the surname of an old family in the Merse, styled of Auchincraw, which became extinct about the beginning of the eighteenth century The branches of that family in Berwickshire, such as the Craws of East Reston, Nether Byer, and Heughhead, had for crest a crow proper On September 26, 1528, George Craw of Reston, and three others were americated for not appearing to underlie the law, for their riding with their friends, tenants, and servants, and assisting Archibald, formerly earl of Angus, and his accomplices, in raising the siege of the castle of Newark, contrary to the king's proclamation, &c [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i p 139] In 1431, one Paul Craw, a Bohemian, was burnt at St Andrews, for teaching the doctrine of John Huss and Wichff, one of the earliest martyrs for the reformed faith in Scotland

CRAWFORD, CRAUFURD, or CRAUFORD, a surname derived from the barony of Crawford in Lanarkshire, of which the origin is unknown

The family of Crawford is of undoubted Norman origin The site of the ruins of Crawford castle is still called Norman Gill, and the early names of this family are all pure Norman The account of their descent from an Anglo-Danish chief, as given by George Crawfurd, and adopted by Robertson in his Ayrshire Families, is altogether erroneous Burke, [History of the Commoners, vols ii and iii,] conjectures that they are descended from that old and distinguished race, the earlier earls of Richmond, with whose armorial bearings theirs nearly correspond, being Gules, a fesse ermine in the former and a bend in the latter According to his hypothesis, Reginald, youngest son of Alan, fourth earl of Richmond, who died in 1146, and great-grandson of Galfridus, duke of Brittany, who died in 1008, obtained large grants of land from King David the First in Clydesdale, being one of the thousand Norman knights whom he established in his dominions These grants may have originated in his (Reginald's) connection with the royal family of Scotland, as his brother Conan le Petit, fifth earl of Richmond, married a grand daughter of David, namely, Margaret, daughter of Prince Henry, and sister of King William In connection with this relationship and settlement of Reginald in Scotland, Theobaldus the Fleming, the reputed ancestor of the Douglases, who held lands in Yorkshire under the earls of Richmond, appears to have followed his fortunes into that kingdom, as also Baldwin of Biggar, formerly of Multon in Yorkshire, under that family, who afterwards married the widow of Reginald He is presumed to be the party who assumed the surname of Crawford, according to the practice of that age, from his barony of Crawford in Clydesdale He is alluded to, in a charter of William de Lindsey, afterward confirmed by King William, early in that prince's reign, wherein mention is made of Johannis de Craufurd, filius Reginaldi In 1127 there were two brothers of this name, knights, sons most probably of this Reginald, namely, Sir John Crawford and Sir Gregan Crawford, both in the service of King David the First On the foundation of the abbey of Holyrood by that monarch, Sir Gregan's arms were placed thereon, as he was instrumental in saving his majesty's life from a stag that had unhorsed him whilst hunting on that spot on Holyrood day, in 1127 [Nisbet's System of Heraldry, vol i p 334] The old stones on which his arms were emblazoned, taken from the ruins of Holyrood Abbey, were built over the lintels of the Canongate church porch, this church having been a dependency of the Abbey He carried in his armorial bearings, argent, a stag's head erazed, with a cross crosslet, between his attires gules, laying aside his paternal bearing, gules, a fesse ermine, carried by some branches of the Crawfords On the abbey of Holyrood are the arms of Archibald Crawford, treasurer to James IV, and brother of Crawford of Henning, as shown in the subjoined cut, viz a fesse ermine with a star in chief, and the shield adorned on the top with a mitre Sir Gregan had a grant of lands from King David in Galloway, called after him, Dalmagregan This appellation is most probably a corruption of 'De la Mag Gregan" and implies "the lands of the chief Gregan," and is an instance of the adoption of the prefix Mac in connection with the Romanesque Dal, as well as in reference to a Norman knight.

Galfridus, styled Dominus Galfridus de Crawford, frequently occurs among the magnates Scotiæ, as a witness to the charters of King William inter 1170 et 1190 He married the sister of John le Scot, earl of Chester, and niece of the king She was the daughter of David earl of Huntingdon, second son of David the First of Scotland by his queen Maud He is termed kinsman by John le Scot earl of Chester, nephew of the king, in a charter quoted by George Crawford, along with John le Scot's two natural brothers, where they are all styled fratribus, in accordance with the practice of that age in the use of this term

Reginald de Crawford, probably the son of Galfridus above mentioned, is witness in 1228, to a charter of Richard le Bard (the original of the name of Baird) to the monastery of Kelso Reginald was succeeded by his second son, Sir John de Crawford, designed dominus de eodem, miles, in several donations to the monasteries of Kelso and Newbottle He died, without male issue, in 1248, and was buried in Melrose Abbey He is said to have had two daughters, the elder of whom, Margaret, married Archibald de Douglas, ancestor of the dukes of Douglas, and the younger became, about 1280, the wife of David de Lindsay of Wauchopedale, ancestor of the earls of Crawford There is, however, no proof of this latter marriage, and William de Lindsay of Erceldun possessed the barony of Crawford long before the date assigned to it (See LINDSAY, name of) The Lindsays held it till the year 1488, when David duke of Montrose was deprived of it and it was given to Archibald Bell the Cat, earl of Angus Others say that the duke exchanged it with Earl Archibald for lands in Forfarshire

Contemporary with the above Galfridus de Crawford was Gualterus de Crawford, witness to a charter of Roger, bishop of St Andrews, sometime between 1189 and 1202 From him came Sir Reginald de Crawford, who, about 1200, married Margaret de Loudoun, the heiress of the extensive barony of Loudoun in Ayrshire He was the first vice comes or high sheriff of the county of Ayr, an office hereditary in his family In consequence of this marriage he quartered the arms of Loudoun with his own He witnessed a donation of David de Lindsay to the monastery of Newbottle, confirmed by Alexander the Second in 1220 It was under this Sir Reginald, as hereditary sheriff principal of Ayrshire, that the three bailiwicks of Carrick, Kyle, and Cunningham were first formed into a county, in 1221 [See Chalmers' Caledonia, vol iii p 452]

His son, Hugh Crawford of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, in a charter of Walter, son of Alan, high steward of Scotland, of a donation to the monaster of Paisley, of the lands of Dalmullin (De la Mouline) in 1226, is designed Hugo, filius Reginaldi By a grant of Allan, son of Roland of Galloway, he had, pro homagio et servitio suo, the lands of Monoch, which is ratified by a charter of King Alexander the Second, at Cadihou (Cadzow) the last day of March, 1226 He had another charter from the great constable his superior, de tota terra de Crosby, afterwards enjoyed by his descendants the Crawfords of Auchinames He was one of the magnates et barones Scotiæ, who put themselves into the protection of the king of England in the commotions that happened in 1255 He died in the end of the reign of Alexander the Second His son Sir Hugh Crawford, sheriff of Ayr, had a letter of safe-conduct to go to England in the year last mentioned He settled a contest with the abbot of Kelso, cum consensu Alicie sponsæ suæ He had two sons and a daughter the latter, Margaret, married Sir Malcolm Wallace, of Elderslie, knight, and became the mother of Sir William Wallace, the hero of Scotland. As old Wintoun says

"His father was a manly knight, His mother was a lady bright."

Sir Hugh was succeeded by his son, Sir Reginald Crawford of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, who, in 1288, witnessed a charter of donation of James, high steward of Scotland, to the monastery of Paisley In 1292, he was one of the nominees on the part of Robert Bruce in his competition for the crown of Scotland with Baliol, and in 1296, with many others, he swore fealty to King Edward the First of England, when he overran Scotland with his armies. In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Radolphus de Crawforde (Nisbet's Heraldry, App vol ii p 10 ed 1742), on which Nisbet remarks, "This is the same person with Reginaldus de Crawford, in the same record entitled vice comes de Air" Believing that the oath to Edward, as it had been exacted by force, was not binding on him, he joined with the first of the Scottish patriots who rose in arms against Edward He, with other Scottish knights, is described by Blind Harry as having lost his life at the mysterious transaction called the conference of Ayr in 1297, a deed avenged shortly afterward by his nephew Sir William Wallace By Cecilia his wife he had a son, Sir Reginald or Reynauld (otherwise Ronald) Crawford, of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, who was among the first of the Scottish barons to join Wallace his cousin, and was with him in all his struggles and dangers He was also among the first to join Robert the Bruce In 1306, he accompanied Thomas and Alexander, the brothers of Bruce, in their descent on Galloway, with seven hundred men, when, being attacked on their landing at Loch Ryan by Duncan M'Dowal, or MacDougall (Magnus du Gall, or chief of the Gall or Wallense), a powerful chieftain, their little army was totally defeated, 9th February 1306-7, and the two brothers, with Sir Reginald Crawford were grievously wounded and made prisoners M'Dowall carried them to the English king at Carlisle, where they were ordered to instant execution, their heads being placed on the castle and gates of that town He left an only child, Susanna Crawford of Loudoun, his sole heiress, who married Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochawe, ancestor of the earls of Loudoun (see LOUDOUN, earl of)

In the Ragman Roll the surname of Crawford occurs no less than eight times as that of Scottish barons who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1292, 1296, 1297, &c Nisbet remarks that this surname was then so frequent that it is difficult to distinguish them from one another

The Crawfords of Kerse in the district of Kyle, Ayrshire, a branch of the Crawfords of Loudoun, ultimately became the representatives of the Dalmagregan Crawfords, and, in consequence, carried in their armorial bearings a stag's head, as did also the Crawfords of Drumsoy and the Crawfords of Comlarg The first of the Kerse family was Reginald, son of Hugh Crawford of Loudoun He got a grant of the lands from his brother Hugh in the reign of King Alexander the Third Notices of various individuals of this family occur in the reigns of James the First and Fourth, Esplin being at that period a favourite Christian name with them In 1508, David Crawford of Kerse, David his son, John Crawford, 'proctour,' Esplane Crawford, and seven others, came in the king's will, for hindering the sitting of the bailiary court of Carrick, when the laird of Kerse was amerciated in five pounds, and each of the others in forty shillings This case arose out of one of the numerous feuds for which the district of Carrick was at one time notorious On October 5th, 1527 Bartholomew Crawford of Kerse, David and Duncan his brothers, George Crawford of Lochnorris, and William his brother, John Crawford of Drongan, John and William his sons, with a great number of others, found caution to underlie the law for assisting Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, in the cruel slaughter of Gilbert earl of Cassillis The grandson of this Bartholomew, David Crawford of Kerse, in consequence of having only female issue, entailed the estate in 1585, and on his death in 1600, he was succeeded by Alexander Crawford of Balgregan in Galloway, the next remaining heir male, descended from a son of David, the brother of Bartholomew, and designed of Culnorris and Balgregan The original lands of Kerse appear subsequently to have gone to the next heir of entail, who seems to have been of the Comlarg family In 1680, Alexander Crawford of Kerse is infeft in the lands of Nether Skeldon, as heir of his father Alexander Crawford of Kerse This Alexander Crawford appears to have been the last male proprietor of Kerse of the name of Crawford His only daughter, Christian Crawford of Kerse, married Mr Moodie of Melcster, and having no succession, she disponed the lands of Kerse to William Ross of Shandwick, writer in Edinburgh, who was, soon after, drowned on his passage to Orkney, when the estate of Kerse devolved on his heirs, who afterwards sold it to Mr Oswald of Auchencruive, in whose family it still remains

The Crawfords of Kerse were famed for their feuds with the Kennedies, and a characteristic poem, called 'Skeldon Haughs, or the Sow is Flitted,' by the late Sir Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck, baronet, one of whose ancestors married a daughter of the laird of Kerse, founded on a traditional story current in Carrick, and the date of which Sir Alexander assigns to the fifteenth century, was printed at the celebrated Auchinleck press, and will be found in the appendix to the Account of the Kennedies Edin 1830, 4to

The Craufurdland branch of the Craufurds, one of the oldest of the name, descend from Sir Reginald de Crawford, sheriff of Ayr, who married the heiress of Loudoun His third son, John, obtained from him several lands in Clydesdale, and in right of his wife, Alicia de Dalsalloch, became chief proprietor of that barony This John conferred Ardoch, to which he gave the name of Craufurdland, in Ayrshire, upon his second son, John Craufurd, who lived in the time of Alexander the Second His grandson, James Craufurd of Craufurdland, fought under his cousin, Sir William Wallace, and a descendant of his, John Craufurd of Giffordland, living in 1480, was ancestor of the Crawfords of Birkheid

Sir William Craufurd of Craufurdland, of this family, one of the bravest warriors of his day, was knighted by James the First He was one of the Scottish auxiliaries in the service of Charles the Seventh of France, and in 1423 he received a severe wound at the siege of Crevelt in Burgundy, where a bloody battle was fought between the French and Scots and the English, when the Scots, under James Stewart, Lord Darnley, being basely deserted by the French, were defeated, with a loss of three thousand killed, and two thousand taken prisoners Douglas (in his Baronage, p 432) states that Craufurd was among the slain, but this is a mistake, as in the following year, he was amongst the prisoners released, with James the First

Robert Craufurd, the youngest son of Robert Craufurd of Auchencairn, a son of the laird of Craufurdland, died in 1487, of a wound received at the Wylielee in Ayrshire, in defending

James Boyd, earl of Arran, when that nobleman was attacked and slain by the earl of Eglinton, with whom he was at feud His father, Archibald Craufurd of Craufurdland, had two other sons, namely, Thomas, ancestor of the Craufurds of Classlogie and Powmill in Kinross-shire, and William, secretary to the earl of Morton, and progenitor of the Craufords who settled in Tweeddale Betwixt the lairds of Craufurdland and the lairds of Rowallan, the superiors of the lands of Ardoch, there had been a long feud, in the course of which the title deeds of both families were destroyed In 1476, in a justice-eyre, holden at Ayr, by John Lord Carlyle, chief justice of Scotland, on the south side of the Forth, Robert Muir of Rowallan and John Muir his son, and diverse others their accomplices, were indicted for breaking the king's peace against Archibald Craufurd of Craufurdland By means of the sister of the second wife of the latter, dame Margaret Boyd, who had been mistress to King James the Fourth, and married Muir of Rowallan, this feud was at length extinguished, and a new charter, upon resignation, granted to the laird of Craufurdland of the lands of Ardoch

His grandson, John Craufurd of Craufurdland, by his prudent conduct, reconciled the Boyds and Montgomeries, and obtained, in marriage Janet Montgomery, daughter of the laird of Giffin, and with a daughter, Renee, had two sons, John his successor, and Archibald, born after his father's death

This Archibald Craufurd was bred to the church, and became parson of Eaglesham, in the shire of Renfrew, and as such had a manse in the Drygate of Glasgow, which he conveyed, in free property, to his chief the laird of Craufurdland He was secretary and almoner to Queen Mary of Guise, regent of Scotland, with whose corpse he was sent to France in 1560, to see it deposited in the Benedictine monastery of St Peter at Rheims, where his own sister Renee was then abbess When in France, he got a commission from the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots, renewing to him his office of secretary and almoner, and expressive of her obligations for his great services rendered to her late mother, which commission was dated at Joinville in France, 17th April 1561 After Mary's return to Scotland, in consequence of the attacks that were sometimes made on the chapel of Holyroodhouse, where the popish worship was allowed to be performed for the queen's household, and the danger of its being pillaged at any time when she might be absent from Edinburgh, the queen, on January 11, 1561-2, directed Sir James Paterson, the sacristan or keeper of the sacred utensils, to deliver to her valet de chambre, Servais de Conde, the furniture of her chapel to be kept by her almoner, Mr Archibald Craufurd, in the wardrobe of her palace at Edinburgh, from whence it could easily be conveyed as often as was necessary On the restoration of the jurisdiction of the archbishop of St Andrews in 1563, Mr Archibald Craufurd was one of the judges deputed by that prelate to exercise it In March of that year, he was cited before the justice court, for celebrating mass, but the result is not stated [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i p 29] He was appointed by Queen Mary, a lord of session on the spiritual side, on the death of the bishop of Brechin, and took his seat on 26th April 1566 After the queen had been sent a prisoner to Lochleven, in June 1567, an inventory was taken of all her plate, jewels, &c., at Holyroodhouse, and the specie thereof was, by the confederated lords, melted and converted into coin It appears, however, that her majesty found means to put into the hands of Mr Archibald Craufurd, her almoner, certain pieces of plate, for the service of her table, which he faithfully kept in his possession till the following November at which time they were demanded from him by the treasurer, Mr Robert Richardson, and, on the 13th of that month, were delivered by the said treasurer to the regent Murray, who granted his acquittance for the same to Mr Archibald Craufurd On June 2d, 1568, his place on the bench of the court of session was given to the prior of Coldinghame, "as being vacand through his inhabilitie, and divers offences committed be him, quhilk merit his deprivatioun" His attachment to the queen was most likely his principal offence. Among other public acts, he erected the west church of Glasgow, and built the bridge of Eaglesham

His elder brother, John Craufurd of Craufurdland, accompanied James the Fourth to the fatal field of Flodden, where he fell in the flower of his age The eldest son of the said John, also John Craufurd of Craufurdland, in his father's lifetime, got from Mary queen of Scots, a gift of the ward of the lands of Redhall in Annandale The deed of gift, having the queen's signature, is dated at Edinburgh 26th December 1561 Hugh, his second son, portioner of Rutherglen, had several sons, who all went to Germany, and settled there John Craufurd of Craufurdland, who died in 1686, had several sons Of these, John, the eldest, who succeeded him, was imprisoned in 1684, on suspicion of being concerned in the rising of Bothwell Bridge, Alexander, the second son, was designed of Fergushill, and William, the third, a merchant and burgess of Glasgow, was the father of Matthew Craufurd, designed of Scotstoun, author of the Ecclesiastical History deposited in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, in manuscript The grandson of John, also named John Craufurd of Craufurdland, succeeded, on his father's death in 1744 He was twice married, and in right of his first wife, a daughter and heiress of John Walkinshaw of Walkinshaw, assumed the additional surname and arms of that family

His son, John Craufurd of Craufurdland entered the army at an early age, and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel He was present at the victory of Dettingen, and distinguished himself in the hard-fought field of Fontenoy He was the intimate and faithful friend of the ill-fated earl of Kilmarnock, who was beheaded on Towerhill for his share in the rebellion of 1745, and attended that unhappy nobleman to the scaffold, for which act of trying friendship his name, it is said, was placed at the bottom of the army list Nevertheless, in 1761 he was appointed falconer to the king for Scotland Colonel Craufurd died at Edinburgh, unmarried, in February 1793, aged seventy-two He settled his estate, by deed made on his deathbed, on Thomas Coutts, Esq, the eminent London banker This deed was, however, disputed by his aunt and next heir, Elizabeth Craufurd, and after a protracted litigation, carried on by herself and her successor, it was eventually reduced by a decree of the House of Lords in 1806, and the ancient estates came back to the rightful heir This Elizabeth Craufurd was twice married first to William Fairlie of that ilk, by whom she had one daughter, who died in infancy, and, secondly, on 3d June, 1744, to John Howison, Esq of Braehead, in the parish of Cramond, Mid Lothian She died in 1802, aged ninety-seven, and was succeeded by her only surviving child, Elizabeth Howison-Craufurd of Braehead and Craufurdland This lady married, in 1777, the Rev James Moodie, who assumed the additional surnames of Howison and Craufurd He died in 1831 On the death of his wife, 1st April 1823, she was succeeded by her only surviving son, William Howison-Craufurd of Craufurdland and Braehead, born 29th November 1781, married 14th June 1808, Jane Esther, only daughter of James Whyte, Esq of Newmains, by his wife, Esther Craufurd, with issue

The Howisons possessed Braehead in Mid Lothian since the reign of James the First According to a tradition, which is embodied in the popular drama of 'Cramond Brig,' part of the estate was conferred by James the Second or Third, as a reward to one of their ancestors for having gone to the rescue of the king, then wandering about in disguise, when attacked by a gang of gipsies, and with no other weapon than his flail, with which he had been thrashing corn in his barn, delivering him from his assailants The tenure by which this land is held, is the presenting of a basin of water and a napkin to the king of Scotland, to wash his hands, King James, on entering Howison's cottage, before partaking of refreshment, having asked for water and a cloth to wipe the marks of the scuffle from his clothes This service was performed by Mr Howison-Crawfurd, then younger of Crawfurdland, in right of the lairdship of Braehead, to King George the Fourth, at the banquet given to his majesty by the city of Edinburgh, 24th August, 1822, when he was attended by masters Charles and Walter Scott, the one a son, the other a nephew of the author of Waverley, as pages, attired in splendid dresses of scarlet and white satin The rose-water then used has ever since been hermetically sealed up, and the towel which dried the hands of his majesty on that occasion has never been used for any other purpose All the documents mentioned as granted to the above-named Archibald Crawfurd almoner to Queen Mary, are likewise carefully preserved by the Craufurdland family

The Crawfords of Drumsoy, in Ayrshire, are descended from Duncan Crawford of Comlarg, who lived in the reign of James the Fourth, and was the third son of David Crawford of Kerse His daughter, Margaret, married John Crawford of Drongan, and their youngest son, William, became the founder of this branch of the family John Crawford of Comlarg having a feud with the Kennedys, was, on the last day of July 1564, attacked in the sheriff-court of Ayr, while the court was sitting, by Barnard Bergusson of Kilkerran, and fifty-three others, of the Kennedy faction, and defended by this William Crawford of 'Drummishoy,' David his brother, David Crawford of Kerse, and several others For this offence both parties were subsequently tried [See Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, under date December 12, 14, and 15, 1564] His grandson, Sir Robert Crawford, in his father's lifetime, married Agnes, only daughter of David Fairlie of that ilk, and in consequence assumed the additional surname of Fairlie His eldest daughter Agnes, heiress of Drumsoy, married her cousin, Robert Crawford, a descendant of whom, in the fourth generation, was David Crawford of Drumsoy, historiographer to Queen Anne, a biographical notice of whom is given below in its place On his death in 1710, he left an only daughter, Emilia Crawford of Drumsoy, who died, unmarried, in 1731 At her instance the estate was sold, when it was purchased by her grand-uncle, Patrick Crawford, merchant in Edinburgh, third son of David Crawford, sixth laird of Drumsoy He had previously become the proprietor of the estate of Auchinames at a judicial sale, 25th February, 1715 This Patrick Crawford was twice married, first to a daughter of Gordon of Turnberry, by whom he had two sons Thomas, the elder, after being secretary to the embassy of the earl of Stair to the French court, became himself envoy extraordinary to the same court, and died in Paris in 1724

Robert, the poet, usually but erroneously designed of Auchinames, was the younger He is also sometimes called William instead of Robert He was author of the beautiful pastoral ballad of 'Tweedside,' 'The Bush aboon Traquair,' and other popular Scottish songs, first contributed to Ramsay's 'Tea-Table Miscellany' He resided long in France. He died, or according to the information obtained by Burns was drowned on his return to Scotland in 1733 A notice in a manuscript obituary kept by Charles Mackie, professor of civil history in the university of Edinburgh, states the time of his death to have been in May 1733, in which month and year his father also died Robert's body appears to have been recovered, and brought to Scotland for interment He was never married According to Sir Walter Scott, the lady celebrated in Crawford's song of 'Tweedside' was a Miss Mary Lillias Scott, one of the daughters of Walter Scott, Esq of Harden, an estate delightfully situated on the north side of the Tweed, about four miles below Melrose She was the descendant of another celebrated beauty, Mary Scott, daughter of Mr Scott of Dryhope, in Selkirkshire, known by the name of 'The Flower of Yarrow'

By his second wife, Jean, daughter of Archibald Crawford of Auchinames in Renfrewshire, Patrick Crawford had as his eldest son, Patrick, who succeeded his mother on her death in 1740, in the estate of Auchinames He was M P for Ayrshire from 1741 till 1754, and for Renfrewshire from 1761 till 1768 He died 10th January 1778 The second son, George, was lieutenant-colonel of the 53d regiment, and died in 1758

Patrick Crawford, M P, above mentioned, had two sons, John, his heir, and James, colonel in the guards, one of the equeries to Queen Charlotte, and governor of Bermuda, who died in 1811 The elder son, John Crawford of Drumsoy, Auchinames, &c, was the associate and friend of Charles James Fox, member for Old Sarum in the parliament of 1768, and afterwards for the county of Renfrew He died, unmarried, in 1814, when he was succeeded by his cousin, John Crawford, grandson of Colonel Crawford, third son of the above mentioned Patrick Crawford, who purchased the estates of Drumsoy and Auchinames He is designed of Auchinames and Crosby Born 4th January 1780, he married 16th August 1814, Sophia Marianna, daughter of Major-general Horace Churchill, and great-granddaughter of Sir Robert Walpole

The laird of Auchinames is the sole representative of the family of Drumsoy, and therefore the designation of Drumsoy is still retained, as is also that of Kerse, the original property He is also considered the sole representative of the Dalmagregan Crawfords, as those of Comlarg, Balgregan, Drongan, &c, all merged in the house of Drumsoy The estate of Ardneil (or Arnele) is of modern acquisition, having been purchased in 1746 by Patrick Craufurd of Auchinames from the Boyds of Kilmarnock, to whom it was granted by King Robert the Bruce Many royal charters are dated from Ardneil

The Crawfurds of Auchinames were descended from Hugh Crawfurd, second son of Sir Reginald Crawford of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr in 1296 This Hugh appears to have inherited the lands of Monoch or Manock, and also Crosby near Kilbride in Ayrshire His son, Reginald Crawfurd of Crosby, in 1320 obtained a grant of the lands of Auchinames in Renfrewshire for his services to Robert the Bruce, as well as an augmentation to his arms, of two lances in saltire, commemorative of his exploits at the battle of Bannockburn Auchinames, being the larger possession, became the designation of the family, though in a different county and a less ancient estate His grandson, Thomas Crawford of Auchinames, mortified several lands to the church of Kilbarchan, in 1401, for a monk to say mass for the salvation of his soul, and his wife's, and his father's and mother's, and for the soul of Reginald Crawford his grandfather His son Archibald had two sons, the younger, Thomas, was ancestor of the Crawfurds of Thirdpart, while the elder, Robert Crawford of Auchinames, must have been a person of some consideration in his day, as he had for his first wife Isabel Douglas, youngest daughter of George master of Angus, sister of Archibald, sixth earl of Angus, who married the widowed queen of James the Fourth His son who was also Robert Crawford of Auchinames, was slain at Flodden in 1513 A subsequent laird, John Crawford of Auchinames, fell at the battle of Pinkie in 1547 His grandniece Jane, on whom were settled the lands of Crosby, married, about 1606, Patrick Crawfurd, the then laird of Auchinames, and thus the ancient estates of the family were again united. Their grandson, Archibald Crawford, the sixteenth baron of this family, was the last laird of Auchinames in a direct male line

Robert Crawfurd of Nethermains, Ayrshire, third son of Patrick Crawfurd of Auchinames and his spouse Jane Crawford of Crosby, continued the representation of the original family of Auchinames (see Crawfords of Drumsoy p 703) and was the progenitor of the Crawfords of Newfield His eldest son, Robert Crawfurd, M D of Nethermains, married a daughter of the Rev George Crawford, minister of West Kilbride, about 1640, of whom the following characteristic anecdote is preserved in Crawfurd's 'Genealogical Collections,' in the Advocates' Library "Mr George Crawfurd, a son of Thirdpart, was minister at Kilbride He was deposed in the strick times of the Covenant for warldly-mindedness and selling a horse on the Sabbath day, as old Portincross (Robert Boyd of Portincross, who dyed very aged, near 100 years of age, in 1721) told me, who knew him minister of Kilbryde, and was a witness against him at the presbytery"

Dr Crawfurd's next brother, Patrick Crawfurd of Nethermains, had an only daughter, Agnes, who sold that estate On the death of her father without male issue, the representation devolved on his younger brother, Moses Crawfurd, who died in 1723 His grandson, Moses Crawfurd, went to India about 1765, and there attained the rank of major in the military service of the East India Company He was second in command at the capture of Beechigar, a strong hill fort on the Ganges, and was left in command of that place with a garrison of two thousand men He returned home in 1783, and purchased the estate of Newfield in Ayrshire He died in 1794, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Robert Crawfurd, Esq of Newfield, formerly a captain in the 7th Hussars, with which regiment he served in the Peninsula A second son, John, major of the 44th foot, was present at the battles of Salamanca and Orthes, and was wounded and taken prisoner in the latter engagement Robert Crawfurd, Esq of Newfield, an officer in the Rifle Brigade, the son of the last-mentioned Robert, succeeded in 1843, and is the representative of the original Crawfords of Crawford.

The first Craufurd mentioned as laird of Fergushill is Alexander Craufurd, whose name appears in the rolls of the Convention parliament among those of the commissioners for ordering out the militia of Ayrshire He was a commissioner of supply for that county in 1695, and lastly in 1704 His eldest son, John Crawford, married Anna, the younger sister of Major Daniel Ker of Kersland, a celebrated covenanter, who was killed in 1692, at the battle of Steinkirk, where nearly the whole of his regiment, the Cameronians (now the 26th), was cut to pieces, and by an arrangement with his wife's eldest sister, Jean, he became proprietor of Kersland, and assumed the name of Ker He was the well-known John Ker of Kersland, who wrote the 'Memoirs, containing his secret transactions and negotiations in Scotland England the courts of Vienna, Hanover, &c' (London, 1726, 8vo), and was otherwise remarkable for his political tergiversations in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne The property of Fergushill was alienated from the Craufurd family in 1728.

Of the Giffordland Crawfords, the third laird was killed at the battle of Flodden, and the fifth fell at Pinkie They were both named John Crawford The latter had three daughters, the youngest of whom, Margaret, married Thomas Craufurd, a younger son of the laird of Craufurdland, to whom she had two daughters, Grizel and Isabel The elder married John Blair of Windyedge, and Giffordland became inherited by their descendants under the name of Blair

The Craufurds of Baidland, now of Ardmillan, in Ayrshire, are lineally descended from a younger brother (whose name has not been preserved) of Sir Reginald Craufurd, sheriff of Ayr in 1296 The name in the ancient titles is spelled sometimes Crauford and sometimes Craufurd By the marriage of James Craufurd of Baidland, not many years after the Restoration, with a daughter of Hugh Kennedy of Ardmillan, he ultimately succeeded to that estate, which from that time became the title of the family This gentleman made a conspicuous figure on the government or persecuting side, in the civil and religious troubles towards the end of the reign of Charles the Second On the 20th March 1683, James Craufurd of Ardmillan was, by the privy council, appointed commissioner for the bailliary of Carrick, and on the 28th July, the same year, he was included in the royal commission for the county of Ayr, along with John Boyle of Kelburn, Colonel White, and Captain Inglis According to Wodrow (vol ii p 225), in the transfer of heritable jurisdiction from many of the leading nobility which took place in those unsettled times, Graham of Claverhouse and he were the only untitled persons on whom these honours were conferred, the regality of Tongland and sheriffdom of Wigton being taken from the families of Kenmuir and Lochnaw, and given to "the laird of Claverhouse," and the bailliary of Carrick and regality of Crossraguel from the earl of Cassillis and given to "the laird of Ardmillan" He had a large family, some of whom settled in Ireland, where several branches still remain His daughter became the wife of David Crawford of Drumsoy, and the mother of David Crawford, historiographer to Queen Anne for Scotland His eldest son, William Craufurd, was distinguished for his defence of the fortress of the Bass, the prison of the Covenanters, against King William's government in 1691 He predeceased his father, who, in 1698, executed a settlement in favour of a younger son, John, but it was set aside by the court of session, and ultimately by the House of Lords, in 1712 This John settled in England, and was the ancestor of the Crawfurds of Sussex Archibald Craufurd, eldest son of the above William Craufurd, in consequence of the above decision, succeeded to Ardmillan, but the original estate of Baidland had been sold to Hugh Macbride, merchant in Glasgow This Archibald Craufurd was a keen Jacobite, and after the rebellion of 1745, was compelled to reside for some time under surveillance in Edinburgh He died in 1748 His elder son, Archibald Craufurd of Ardmillan, who died in 1784, was deeply involved in the unfortunate banking copartnery of Douglas, Heron, and Co, in consequence of which the estate of Ardmillan was brought to a judicial sale, during the minority of his son, Archibald Craufurd, writer to the signet, and bought by his uncle, Thomas Craufurd, who had been long in the army, and having for his military services been rewarded with a lucrative office under government at Bristol, he was thereby enabled to preserve the estate from going out of the family He had a son, Archibald-Clifford-Blackwell Craufurd, major in the army, and two daughters, Margaret, married to her cousin, Archibald Craufurd, writer to the signet, above mentioned, and Anne, the wife of MacMiken of Grange The said Archibald Craufurd, W S, died 16th May 1824, leaving, with other children, a son, Thomas MacMiken Craufurd of Grange

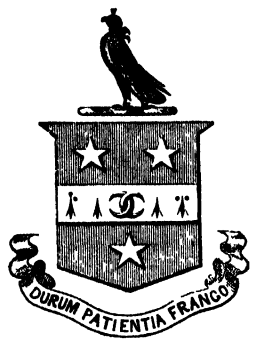
James Craufurd, a judge of the court of session by the title of Lord Ardmillan, son of Major Archibald C B Craufurd of Ardmillan, born at Havant, Hants, in 1805, was educated at the Ayr Academy, and afterwards studied for the bar at Glasgow college and at the university of Edinburgh Passed advocate in 1829, in February 1849 he was appointed sheriff of Perthshire In November 1853 he became solicitor-general for Scotland In January 1855 he was appointed a lord of session, and in June of the same year a judge of the high court of justiciary Subjoined are the arms of the family The motto is, "Durum Patientia Frango"



A branch of the Baidland family possessed the estate of Haining in Stirlingshire Archibald Craufurd, lord high treasurer of Scotland a younger son of William Craufurd of Haining, was in 1457 nominated abbot of Holyrood, and appointed a lord of council in 1458 He was ambassador to England, and negotiated, with others, a treaty of marriage betwixt James III and Edward IV in 1482, in which it was contracted that James duke of Rothesay, afterwards James IV, should marry the princess Cicely, second daughter of Edward IV, and a great part of the portion was delivered, though the marriage did not take place He died in 1483, and his arms were beautifully cut on the fly buttresses on the north side of the nave of the abbey of Holyrood —a fesse ermine, with a star of five points in chief, Or, surmounted with an abbot's mitre

The immediate ancestor of the Crawfurds of Jordanhill in Renfrewshire, was Lawrence Craufurd of Kilbirnie in Ayrshire, progenitor of the viscounts of Garnock (merged in the earldom of Crawford in 1749, see CRAWFORD, earl of, below), and the eleventh generation of that illustrious family in a direct male line The lands of Kilbirnie anciently belonged to a branch of the potent family of Barclay John Barclay of Kilbirnie, the last male heir of that house, died in 1470, and his only daughter, Marjory, married Malcolm Crawfurd of Easter Greenock (which barony he possessed in right of his mother, a Galbraith), a descendant of the house of Crawfurd of Loudoun The above Lawrence Craufurd of Kilbirnie flourished in the reign of James the Fifth He exchanged the barony of Crawfordjohn, the ancient inheritance of his ancestors with Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart for the lands of Drumry, in the county of Dumbarton, for which he got a charter under the great seal, dated 5th April 1529 About the year 1546, he endowed a chapel at Drumry, with the lands of Jordanhill, for the support of a chaplain, and died 4th June 1547 By his wife, Helen, daughter of Sir Hugh Campbell, ancestor of the earls of Loudoun, he had six sons From the eldest, Hew, his successor, who fought on Queen Mary's side at the battle of Langside, was lineally descended Sir John Craufurd of Kilbirnie, created a baronet by Charles the First in 1642, the grandfather of John Craufurd of Kilbirnie, created by Queen Anne, in 1703, viscount of Garnock (see GARNOCK, viscount of), the son of Margaret, second daughter of the said Sir John Craufurd, and her husband, the Hon Patrick Lindsay, (second son of John, the fifteenth earl of Crawford and first earl of Lindsay,) on whose heirs, male and female he entailed his estate of Kilbirnie, on their assuming the surname and arms of Craufurd

The sixth son of the above Lawrence Craufurd of Kilbirnie was the celebrated Captain Thomas Craufurd of Jordanhill, whose daring exploit of surprising and carrying by escalade, in April 1571, the almost impregnable castle of Dumbarton, which had long held out for Queen Mary, is familiar to every one acquainted with the history of Scotland during the minority of James the Sixth Of this bold enterprize, an interesting account, written by himself to John Knox, is inserted in Bannatyne's Journal He appears to have commenced his military career at a very early age, as he was taken prisoner at the disastrous battle of Pinkie in 1547, but after some time obtained his liberty by paying ransom In 1550 he retired to France, and entered into the military service of Henry the Second, under the command of James earl of Arran, and in 1561, he returned with Queen Mary to Scotland Previously to this, he had, with consent of his eldest brother, Hew Craufurd of Kilbirnie, received from Sir Bartholomew Montgomery, chaplain of Drumry, the lands of Jordanhill, which had been bestowed by his father on that chaplainry, and the grant was confirmed by a charter under the great seal, dated 8th March, 1565-6 He was long attached to the Lennox family, and was one of the gentlemen of Lord Darnley, the husband of the queen On her unexpected visit, in January 1567, to her sick husband at Glasgow, Darnley sent Craufurd to meet her majesty, with a message excusing himself from waiting on her in person, on account of his illness After Mary had left him, Darnley called Craufurd and informing him fully of all that had passed between the queen and himself, bade him communicate it to his father the earl of Lennox He then asked what he thought of the queen's proposal to remove him to Craigmillar "She treats your majesty," replied Craufurd, "too like a prisoner Why should you not be taken to one of your own houses in Edinburgh?" "It struck me," said Darnley, "much in the same way, and I have fears enough but may God judge between us, I have her promise only to trust to" On the murder of Darnley, soon after, he joined in the association with the earls of Argyle, Morton, Athol, Glencairn, &c, for the defence of the young king's person and the bringing the murderer to trial He was examined on oath before the commissioners at York, December 9, 1568, when he produced a paper which he had written immediately after the conversations between himself, and the queen and Darnley His deposition, indorsed by Cecil, is quoted by Tytler, in his History of Scotland (vol vii p 78) He afterwards accused Lethington of participation in the king's murder

For his capture of the castle of Dumbarton, Captain Craufurd obtained from James the Sixth, the lands of Blackstone, Barns, Bishopsmeadow and others, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, with an annuity of two hundred pounds Scots, during his life, payable out of the priory of St Andrews He commanded in several expeditions against the queen's party, and was captain of the king's forces all the time of the calamitous civil war which raged during the regencies of Lennox, Mar, and Morton In September 1571, when a body of Kirkaldy's troops from the castle of Edinburgh, surprised the town of Stirling, and the regent Lennox was killed, Captain Crawfurd, with the assistance of a party from Stirling castle and some of the citizens, chased the attacking faction out of the town In the following year, he had some skirmishes in the wood of Hamilton with the Hamiltons Previous to the surrender of the castle of Edinburgh, in 1573, the regent Morton appointed him and Captain Hume to keep the trenches, and at the head of their respective companies and a band of English, on the morning of the 26th May, they advanced to storm the Spur, an outwork of the castle of great strength, in the form of a half-moon A dull old ballad, entitled the 'Sege of the Castell,' (Scots Poems of the Sixteenth Century,) says

"That Hume and Craford to the lave were gyde
With certain sojours of the garysoune,
Four captains followit at their back to byde, Semphill and Hector, Ramsay and Robesoune

The attempt proved successful After a desperate conflict which lasted for three hours, the ravelin was stormed, and the standard of James the Sixth immediately displayed upon it The surrender of Edinburgh castle put an end to the civil war, and during his latter years, Captain Crawfurd resided at Kersland, in the parish of Dalry, Ayrshire, the heiress of which, Janet Ker was his second wife On the 15th September 1575, the king wrote him the following characteristic letter "Captain Crawfurd, I have heard sic report of your guid service done to me from the beginning of the wars against my onfriends, as I shall sum day remember the same, God willing, to your great contentment, in the mean quhyle be of guid comfort, and reserve you to that time with patience, being assured of my favour Fareweel Your guid friend James Rex" He afterwards got a charter under the great seal "acras terrarum ecclesiasticarum vicarus pensionaris de Dalry," &c, in Ayrshire, dated 20th March 1578, and another charter to himself and Janet Ker his spouse, of the lands of Blackstone, &c, in the shire of Renfrew, dated 24th October, 1581 The latest notice we have of him is in the same year, when the king, by a gift, dated at Holyrood, grants him a hundred pounds Scots, yearly, "out of the superfluo of the third of the benefices not assignat to the maintenance of the ministrie" He died 3d January 1603, and was buried in the old churchyard of Kilbirnie On his monument, which was erected in his lifetime, in 1594, to himself and his spouse, is inscribed "God schaw the Richt," a motto given him by Morton, in memory of his bravery in the fight of the Gallowlee, between Leith and Edinburgh, in which, however, he had been repulsed

His eldest son, David, succeeded to his mother's estate of Kersland, and assumed the name of Ker, but his male line has long been extinct The second son, Hew, carried on the Jordanhill family This Hew had, with two daughters, five sons, namely, 1 Cornelius, his heir, whose second son, Thomas, was progenitor of the Crawfurds of Cartsburn, 2 Thomas, a colonel in the Russian service, 3 John, rector of Halden in the county of Kent, 4 Laurence, a major-general in the Scots army, in the reign of Charles the First, killed at the siege of Hereford, in September 1645, and, 5 Daniel, a lieutenant-general in the army of the czar of Muscovy, at one time governor of Smolensko, and at his death in 1674 governor of Moscow

Hew Crawfurd of Jordanhill, the seventh laird, only son of Hew, the sixth laird, was on 19th July, 1765, served heir male to the above-mentioned Sir John Crawfurd of Kilbirnie, baronet, ancestor of the families of Kilbirnie and Jordanhill He married Robina, only child of Captain John Pollok of Balgray, third son of Sir Robert Pollok of Pollok, baronet, and in her right became Sir Hew Crawfurd Pollok, baronet He had a large family, several of whom died when young The eldest daughter, Mary, was married in 1775 to General Fletcher of Saltoun (then Campbell of Boquhan), and afterwards to Colonel John Hamilton of Bardowie in Stirlingshire, and the third, Eucken, to General John Gordon Skene of Pitlurg, Aberdeenshire, by whom she had ten children Another of his daughters, and one of his sons, Captain Hew Crawfurd, form the subject of two caricatures by Kay, and some curious notices of them will be found in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits The eldest son, Sir Robert Crawfurd Pollok, baronet, died, unmarried, in August 1845, and was succeeded by his nephew, Sir Hew Crawfurd of Pollok and Kilbirnie, baronet, now the representative of the family See vol ii p 27*a*

The estate of Jordanhill continued in the possession of the Crawfurds till 1750, when it was sold to Alexander Houston, merchant in Glasgow, whose son, Andrew Houston, sold it, in 1800, to Archibald Smith, youngest son of Andrew Smith of Craigend, in Stirlingshire, and it afterwards became the property of his eldest son, James Smith, Esq of Jordanhill

CRAWFORD, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, first conferred, in 1398, on Sir David Lindsay of Glenesk, whose ancestor, William de Lindsay of Ercildun, in the reign of Malcolm the Fourth, was the first of the family who possessed the barony of Crawford in Clydesdale That line terminated, in 1249, in an heiress, Alice de Lindsay, the wife of Sir Henry Pinkeney, a great baron of Northamptonshire, whose grandson, Sir Robert Pinkeney, claimed the crown of Scotland at the competition in 1292, as descended from the princess Marjory through his grandmother Alice de Lindsay The barony of Crawford was afterwards forfeited, and bestowed on Sir Alexander Lindsay of Luffness, the ancestor of the more recent house of Crawford [see ante, page 700, and LINDSAY, surname of]

Sir David Lindsay, the first earl of Crawford, is supposed to have been born in 1366 He succeeded his father, Sir Alexander Lindsay, in Glenesk (which had belonged to his mother, Catherine, daughter of Sir John Stirling of Glenesk), in 1382, and his cousin Sir James Lindsay of Crawford in 1397 Having married the princess Catherine, fifth daughter of King Robert the Second, he received with her the barony of Strathnairn in Inverness-shire In his twenty-fifth year, he proved the victor in the celebrated tournament with John Lord Welles at London-bridge in May 1390 That nobleman had been sent ambassador to Scotland by Richard the Second, and at a banquet with the Scottish nobles, where the conversation turned on deeds of arms, on Sir David Lindsay extolling the prowess of his countrymen, Welles exclaimed, "Let words have no place, if you know not the chivalry and valiant deeds of Englishmen, assail ye me, day and place where ye list, and ye shall soon have experience" Then said Sir David, "I will assail ye!" Lord Welles naming London Bridge for the place, Sir David appointed the festival of St George for the day of combat For this tourney he obtained a safe conduct for himself and his retinue of twenty-eight persons, including two knights, squires, valets, &c He was received with high honour by King Richard, and on the appointed day, in presence of the king and court, and after the usual preliminary ceremonies, at the sound of the trumpet the two champions encountered each other, upon their barbed horses, with spears sharply ground Both spears were broken, but in this adventure the Scottish knight sat so strong that although Lord Welles' spear was shivered to pieces upon his helmet and visor, he stirred not, and the spectators cried out that, contrary to the law of arms, he was bound to the saddle, whereupon he vaulted lightly off his horse, and leapt back again into his seat, without touching the stirrup In the third course he threw Lord Welles out of his saddle to the ground He then dismounted, and a desperate foot combat with their daggers ensued, when Sir David, fastening his dagger between the joints of his antagonist's armour, lifted him off his feet, and hurled him to the ground, where he lay at his mercy Instead of putting an end to his life, as the laws of these combats permitted, he raised his opponent, and after presenting him to the queen, who gave him his liberty, he supported him in the lists till assistance came, and afterwards visited him every day till he recovered A full description of this famous tourney is given in Wyntoun's Cronykil Two years after Sir David nearly lost his life in an affray with some of the clan Donachie, who, with Duncan Stewart, natural son of the Wolf of Badenoch, were ravaging Glenisla, the north-west of Angus, and were encountered at Glenbrerith, about eleven miles north of Gaskclune, by the Lindsays and Ogilvies Armed at all points, and on horseback, Sir David made great slaughter among the cataranes, but having pierced one of them with his lance, and pinned him to the ground, the latter writhed his body upward on the spear, and collecting all his force, with a last dying effort, fetched a sweeping blow with his broadsword, which cut through the knight's stirrup-leather and steel boot

[Wyntoun's Cronykil tom ii p 361]

On the 21st April 1398, Sir David Lindsay was, by King Robert the Third created earl of Crawford The barony of Crawford was at the same time regranted with a regality, conferring privileges on him and his posterity, akin to those of the earls palatine of England and the Continent He had frequently safe-conducts granted him to England, being charged with negociations with the English court, and sometimes he sought for adventure and honour in foreign wars "Between a visit to England in October 1398 and the 29th of December 1404,—the date of his safe-conduct for entering England with one hundred persons, horse and foot, in his train, and passing through to Scotland, (being then one of the commissioners to treat of peace with England,)—his name is not once mentioned in the Rotuli Scotiæ, and it is merely from foreign sources that we learn that he gave a letter of service and homage, under his seal of arms, to Louis duke of Orleans, on the 1st of January 1401-2, and that in May that year he was hovering with a fleet on the coast of Corunna in Spain, probably as a partisan of France" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 99] In December 1406 he was again and for the last time one of the ambassadors to the English court to treat of peace He died in February 1407 at his castle of Finhaven, and was buried in the family vault in the Greyfriars church at Dundee The following is the seal of David, first earl of Crawford

A letter in French from the first earl of Crawford to Henry the Fourth of England, in February 1405, inserted in the first volume of the Lives of the Lindsays (p 105), on the occasion of a merchant-ship of St Andrews having been seized and confiscated by the English, in violation of the truce, is interesting as showing that the merchants and town of St Andrews were under his protection and also that at that period French or Latin was the language used by the Scottish nobles in their intercourse with the court of England, so much so that the celebrated earl of March, writing to Henry five years before, apologizes for his letter being in English, as it was "mare clere" to his understanding "than Latyne or Fraunche" With three sons, Alexander, second earl, David, of Newdosk, and Gerard, he had three daughters, Lady Margaret or Matilda, married to her cousin, Archibald, fifth earl of Douglas, duke of Touraine, Lady Marjory, to Sir William Douglas of Lochleven, and Lady Elizabeth, to Sir Robert Keith, great marshal of Scotland Ingelram [illegible]say, bishop of Aberdeen from 1442 to 1458, is also said [illegible]have been a son of the first earl of Crawford, but, says Lord Lindsay, strict proof of his filiation is wanting

Alexander, second earl, the year after his father's death, had a safe-conduct to go to France In 1416, with the earls of Douglas and Mar, he had letters of safe-conduct to England, to negociate the temporary release of the captive king, James the First, on his leaving hostages for his return, but the negociation was suddenly broken off In 1421, however, it was renewed for the entire liberation of the king, when the earl was again one of the commissioners On James' return in 1423, Crawford was among the nobles who met him at Durham and escorted him to Stone, where he was crowned on the last day of May After receiving the accolade of knighthood from his majesty's hand, Crawford departed for England, being one of the twenty-eight hostages pledged for his sovereign, his kinsman, Sir John Lindsay of the Byres, being another In the treaty for James' release, the annual income of the hostages is stated—the earl of Crawford being rated at one thousand merks, and Lindsay of the Byres at five hundred The latter obtained his liberty in 1425, but the earl was detained in England till November 1427, when he had leave to return on giving an equivalent He is said to have been active in the capture of the assassins of James the First, and died in 1438, the year after

His son, David, third earl, entered into a league of association and friendship with the powerful earl of Douglas, lieutenant-general of the kingdom, with the object of drawing to their party the other great feudal families, and, thus united, to rule paramount in the state [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 126] On the discovery of this league, Kennedy, bishop of St Andrews and primate of Scotland, joined with Crichton, the chancellor, to oppose their machinations In resentment, the earl of Crawford, assisted by his kinsman Alexander Ogilvie of Inverquharity, and other allies, invaded the bishop's lands in Fife, burning his granges and tenements, and carrying off an immense booty After fruitlessly remonstrating against this outrage, Kennedy formally excommunicated the earl, for a year, and before it expired he received his death-wound in a desperate conflict at Arbroath on the 13th January 1445-6, between the Lindsays and Ogilvies, which arose from the following cause The Benedictines of the abbey of Arbroath had appointed his eldest son, Alexander, master of Crawford, their chief justiciar, or supreme judge in civil affairs throughout their regality, but he proved so expensive to the monks, by his retinue of followers and manner of living, that they formally deposed him, and appointed in his place Alexander Ogilvy of Inverquharity, nephew of John Ogilvy of Airlie, who had a hereditary claim to the office As, however, the master of Crawford had taken forcible possession of the town and abbey, an appeal to the sword was rendered necessary Both parties assembled their forces Douglas sent one hundred Clydesdale men to the aid of Lindsay, and the Hamiltons also assisted him with some of their vassals The Ogilvies on their part found an unexpected auxiliary in Sir Alexander Seton of Gordon, afterwards earl of Huntly, who, as he returned from court, happened to arrive the night before the battle at the castle of Ogilvy, on his road to Strathbogie, and although in no way personally interested in the dispute, found himself compelled to assist the Ogilvies by a rude law of ancient Scottish hospitality, which bound the guest to take part with his host, in any quarrel or danger, so long as the food eaten under his roof remained in his stomach With the small train of attendants and friends who accompanied him, he marched with the Ogilvies to Arbroath, where they found the Lindsays, in great force drawn up in battle array before the gates As the battle was about to commence, the earl of Crawford, anxious to avert bloodshed, suddenly galloped into the field from Dundee, where he had heard of the approaching conflict, but before he could inter fere, one of the Ogilvies' men darted his spear through his mouth and neck, and mortally wounded him. The Lindsays instantly attacked the Ogilvies and their allies with great fury, and they were driven from the field with the loss of five hundred men, while that of the Lindsays did not exceed a hundred. Earl David expired after a week of lingering torture, and his body lay for four days unburied, until Bishop Kennedy sent the prior of St Andrews to take off the excommunication. The superstitious feeling of the times did not fail to notice that the battle of Arbroath was fought on that day twelvemonth that the slain earl of Crawford had ravaged "St Andrew's land" in Fife. [Ibid page 130.] Ogilvy of Inverquharity, sorely wounded, was taken prisoner and carried to the castle of Finhaven, where he died. According to the tradition of the district, the countess of Crawford, who was his own cousin-german, in the agony of finding that her husband had been mortally wounded in the affray, rushed to Inverquharity's chamber, and smothered him with a down pillow. The Lindsays afterwards burnt and wasted the lands and houses of the Ogilvies, and from this time the feud between the two clans raged incessantly until the accession of James the Sixth to the English throne. By his wife, Marjory, daughter of Alexander Ogilvie of Auchterhouse, hereditary sheriff of Angus, the earl had five sons, Alexander fourth earl of Crawford, Walter Lindsay of Beaufort and Idzell, William Lindsay of Ekequhy ancestor of the Lindsays of Evelick in Perthshire and their various cadets, Sir John Lindsay of Brechin and Pitcarlie killed at the battle of Brechin in 1452, ancestor of the house of Pitcarlie in Fifeshire and their junior branch of Carmie and James, who, accompanying the princess Eleanor, daughter of James the First to Germany, when she went to be married to Sigismund of Austria, espoused an heiress near Augsburg, where his descendants, the Crafters, were reported to be residing in the last century.

Alexander, fourth earl, the victor at Arbroath, was styled "the tiger," or "earl Beardie," from the ferocity of his character and the length of his beard, or rather, as one writer suggests from the little reverence in which he held the king's courtiers, and his readiness to "beard the best of them." [Lives of the Lindsays, vol. i. page 134.] In 1446, he had the office of heritable sheriff of Aberdeen, and besides being justiciary of the abbey of Arbroath, as already mentioned, was also justiciary of the abbey of Scone. He was one of the guarantees of a treaty of peace with England, one of the wardens of the marches and ambassador to the English court in 1451. With the earl of Douglas and Macdonald of the Isles, titular earl of Ross, he entered into a league of mutual alliance, offensive and defensive, against all men, not excepting the king himself, on hearing of which, the king—James the Second, then in his seventeenth year—sent for Douglas to Stirling castle and after vainly urging him to break it, on his refusal, drew his dagger, and stabbed him to the heart. Crawford immediately flew to arms, and assembling all his forces encamped at Brechin, with the intention of intercepting the earl of Huntly, his old antagonist at Arbroath, now appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, who was hastening with an army to his sovereign's assistance. The contending parties met on the 18th May 1452, on a level moor, about two miles north-east of Brechin. The forces of Huntly far outnumbered those of Crawford, but the victory, which had long remained doubtful, was at last inclining to the latter, when John Collace of Balnamoon, one of his most trusted vassals, who commanded a division of three hundred men, stationed in the left wing, deserted to Huntly. Before the battle he had requested Crawford that, in the event of their victory, his son might be put in fee of the lands of Ferne, which lay near his house. "The time is short," replied the earl, "stand bravely by me to day, and prove yourself a valiant man, and you shall have all and more than your desire." His defection was fatal to the earl, whose troops, weakened by the departure of Balnamoon's division, and furiously attacked by Huntly's forces, took to flight in every direction. Among the slain were the earl's brother, and nearly sixty gentlemen with numerous persons of inferior rank, while on Huntly's side the loss did not exceed five barons, and a small number of yeomen, but he had to lament the loss of two brothers. Earl Beardie fled to Finhaven, and on alighting from his horse he called for a cup of wine, and was heard to exclaim that he would willingly pass seven years in hell, to gain the honour of such a victory as had that day fallen to Huntly." He had already been denounced a rebel, and his lands, life, and goods, were declared forfeited to the state, his coat of arms being torn, and his bearings abolished. The lordship of Brechin, with the hereditary sheriffship of Aberdeenshire, was also taken from him, and given to Huntly, his victorious opponent. His power, however, was little weakened by this defeat and as soon as he had recruited his forces, he took a terrible revenge on all who had either refused to join his banner, or, like Balnamoon, had deserted him in the battle ravaging their lands, and destroying their castles and houses. But after the submission of the Douglases, being abandoned by many of his allies, he took an opportunity of the king passing through Forfarshire, in April 1453, on his way to the north, to appear before his majesty, in a mean habit, bareheaded and barefooted, and with tears in his eyes he made a speech, in which he acknowledged his offence, and craved mercy for his adherents, being more concerned for their safety than for his own. "When the earl had endit," says Pitscottie, "the noble and gentle men of Angus that came in his company to seek remission, held up their hands to the king most dolorously, crying, 'Mercy!' till their sobbing and sighing cuttit the words that almost their prayers could not be understood." At the intercession of Huntly and Kennedy, bishop of St Andrews, with whom he had been privately reconciled and by whose advice he had thus acted, he was pardoned, and afterwards entertained James magnificently in his castle of Finhaven. As, however, the king had sworn, in his wrath, "to make the highest stone of Finhaven the lowest, his majesty went up to the roof of the castle, and threw down to the ground a stone which was lying loose on one of the battlements, thus keeping his oath strictly to the letter. Earl Beardie became a loyal subject, but in six months afterwards, he was seized with a fever, of which he died in 1454. By his wife, Elizabeth Dunbar, he had two sons, minors, David, fifth earl of Crawford, created duke of Montrose, by James the Third, and Sir Alexander Lindsay of Auchtermonzie, who long after succeeded as seventh earl. He had also a daughter, Lady Elizabeth Lindsay, wife of John, first Lord Drummond.

In the time of this earl a noble Spanish chestnut tree nearly forty-three feet in circumference, ornamented the court of the castle of Finhaven, and, according to tradition, a gillie or messenger-lad having cut a walking-stick from it, the earl was so enraged that he hanged him on one of its branches, and from that moment the tree began to decay. The ghost of the gillie it is locally said, has ever since walked between Finhaven and Carriston, under the name of Jock Barefoot.

David, fifth earl, appears, soon after his accession to the title, to have been a prisoner to James earl of Douglas, on a second rebellion of that nobleman, speedily suppressed, in

March 1454, as in a charter, dated 27th February 1458-9, he grants Herbert Johnstone of Dalbank, ancestor of the house of Westerhall, the lands of Glencybank, with the office of bailie of the regality of Kirkmichael in Dumfries-shire, "for his faithful service at the time when he was held a captive by the late James earl of Douglas, and chiefly for the liberation and abduction of his person from captivity, and from the hands of the said earl" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 145] His lordship had a charter of the office of sheriff of Forfar, 19th October 1466, on the resignation of James Stewart, afterwards earl of Buchan On the downfall of the Boyds, he rose daily in power and influence, and for twenty years,—from 1465 to 1485,—was employed in almost every embassy or public negociation with England On 9th March 1472-3 he obtained a grant from King James the Third of the lordships of Brechin and Navar for life, in July 1473 he was appointed keeper of Berwick for three years, on the 26th October 1474, he appeared as procurator for King James on the betrothment of the princess Cecilia, youngest daughter of Edward the Fourth of England, and the prince royal of Scotland, which took place in presence of various English commissioners and gentlemen in the Low Greyfriars' church at Edinburgh, and a description of which is given in Tytler's History of Scotland, vol iv p 242, and in May, 1476 he was constituted high admiral of Scotland for the suppression of the rebellion of the earl of Ross, (MacDonald of the Isles,) who, alarmed at the formidable preparations against him, speedily submitted

In 1474, this earl made a new entail of the family estates, settling them on his heirs-male for ever, a document which regulated the succession for many generations afterwards In 1480, he was appointed master of the king's household, and after the raid of Lauder in 1482, he became lord chamberlain Although one of the purifiers of the royal council, as they termed themselves, and present at the famous secret meeting of the nobility, where Archibald earl of Angus acquired the name of Bell the-Cat, and wherein it was resolved to put to death Cochrane and the other favourites of the king, he would not be a party to the plot for deposing his sovereign, and on being made aware of such a design, he abandoned the factious nobles, and gave his whole support to the throne In 1487 he was appointed justiciary of the north, along with the earl of Huntly After the disbanding of the royal forces at Blackness and the hollow pacification that then took place, the earl of Crawford was created duke of Montrose, by royal charter, dated 18th May, 1488, to himself and his heirs, being the first instance of the title of duke having been conferred on a Scottish subject, not of the royal family The grant conveyed to his grace the castle and borough of Montrose, with its customs and fisheries, and the lordship of Kincleven in Perthshire, to be held in free regality for ever, with courts of justiciary, chamberlainship, &c, on the tenure of rendering therefrom a red rose yearly on the day of St John the Baptist On this creation the duke added to his arms an escutcheon argent, charged with a rose, gules, which he carried by way of a surtout over his arms Subjoined is an engraving of his seal and his autograph, from the first volume of Lord Lindsay's Lives of the Lindsays A new royal or public herald was also created on this occasion under the name of 'Montrose,' as appears by the Exchequer Rolls At the battle of Sauchieburn, soon after, (11th June 1488,) the duke eminently distinguished himself, on the side of his unfortunate sovereign, James the Third, but was severely wounded, and being taken prisoner was compelled to ransom himself and his followers, and was deprived of all his public offices The act rescissory which, on the 17th October following was passed in the Estates, annulling all grants of lands, and creations of dignities, conferred by the late king since the 2d of February preceding was conceived not to affect the original patent of this ducal title, as the young king James the Fourth, had previously directed a free pardon, by letters patent, to be issued under his privy seal, to the duke of Montrose, which he placed in the hands of Andrew Lord Gray, to remain in his possession until the duke should resign to that nobleman the hereditary sheriffship of Forfarshire This was accordingly done on the 6th November 1488, in his grace's name by procurators appointed by him for the purpose he having previously protested against the whole proceeding as illegal and unjust On the 19th September 1489, he received a new patent or charter, under the great seal, of the dukedom of Montrose, and in February following, he was appointed a member of the secret council but subsequently to the battle of Sauchieburn he took little part in public affairs He died at Finhaven, at Christmas 1495, in his fifty-fifth year

The dukedom of Montrose, it has been decided by the House of Peers, ended with him, as having been by the renewed patent conferred for life only In 1848, the earl of Crawford and Balcarres presented a petition to the queen, claiming the title of duke of Montrose, on the ground of its being vested in the heir male This petition, in accordance with the rule and practice in contested peerage cases, was referred to the House of Lords, and the claim was opposed both by the duke of Montrose, of the noble house of Graham, and by the Crown After a lapse of nearly five years the House of Lords gave their decision on 5th August 1853, by adopting a resolution to the effect that the earl of Crawford and Balcarres had not made out his right to the dignity (See MONTROSE Duke of, vol ii page 171)

By his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of James, first Lord Hamilton, the duke had 2 sons, Alexander, Lord Lindsay, and John, styled master of Crawford, who became 6th earl

His elder son, Alexander, Lord Lindsay, when a mere stripling, had revived an old feud with the Glammis family, and that with such violence as to require the interference of parliament, March 6, 1478 On the 22d April 1479, he was committed to the castle of Blackness for chasing two monks In the autumn of 1489 he quarrelled and fought with his younger brother John, by whom he was wounded, and died shortly after at his castle of Inverquoich He had married Lady Janet Gordon (afterwards the wife of Patrick, son of Lord Gray), whom popular rumour accused of having smothered her first husband with a down pillow, while lying ill of his wound

John, the second son, became the sixth earl of Crawford In 1504, on the abortive rebellion of the Hebrideans and Western Islanders, in support of Donald Dhu grandson and heir of John, Lord of the Isles, he was appointed, conjointly with Huntly, Argyle, Marischal, Lord Lovat, and other powerful barons, to lead the array of the whole kingdom north of Forth and Clyde, against them [Gregory's History of the Western Highlands, p 98] Lord Lindsay says that this earl's extravagance was great Besides alienating lands held in capite of the crown, and thus incurring the displeasure of the king, he was reduced to resign the hereditary sheriffdom of Aberdeenshire to William, earl of Errol, 10th February 1510, and it was not regained for many years after his death [Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 180] On 23d April, 1512, twenty-three years after his brother's death, letters "to search John, earl of Crawford, for the slaughter of Alexander, his brother," were issued by Lord Gray, sheriff of Angus, charging the earl, his cousins, Sir David and Alexander Lindsay, and others their accomplices, to give surety to appear before the king's justiciary, on the third day of the next justice-eyre at Dundee to "underlie the law" for the said crime, and not appearing they were denounced rebels, 24th July 1513 Two months afterwards, the earl was killed at Flodden, where he had a chief command His children all died in infancy, but a natural son, John Lindsay of Downie, in Forfarshire, was father of Patrick Lindsay, archbishop of Glasgow

Alexander, seventh earl, the younger son of Earl Beardie, and previously styled Sir Alexander Lindsay of Auchtermonzie (a barony inherited from his mother), succeeded his nephew, as collateral heir male He was one of the four noblemen appointed by parliament, 1st December 1513, continually to remain with the queen-mother, to give her counsel and assistance as regent of the kingdom For the suppression of the deadly feuds that then raged both in the Highlands and on the borders, he was appointed high-justiciary north of the Forth, while Lord Home received the same office south of that river Crawford, however, died shortly afterwards, at a great age, in May 1517 By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Campbell of Ardkinglass, he had David, his successor, another son, Alexander, of Rathillet, who died without issue, and a daughter, married to Sir Archibald Douglas of Kilspindie, high treasurer of Scotland

David, eighth earl, took part with the queen-mother and Angus against the regent duke of Albany, and on the departure of the latter for France in 1524, he was one of the nobility who attended her majesty when she brought the young king, then only thirteen years of age, from Stirling to Edinburgh, and, on 30th July of that year, made him assume the government The earl was subsequently deprived by James of large estates in the Lowlands, and of his lands in the Hebrides, which so incensed him against the king that it was believed he might easily have been induced to join the English interest but the unnatural conduct of his son (by his first wife, Lady Marion Hay, only daughter of the third earl of Errol), withdrew his attention from all but his domestic sorrows This son, Alexander, called the "evil" or "wicked master" of Crawford, had been put in fee of the earldom by his father, as future earl, and the barony of Glenesk had been assigned to him in consequence, by charter under the great seal, 2d September 1527 Being, however, of an unruly and turbulent disposition, he seized his father's fortress of Dunbog and, at the head of a band of robbers and outlaws, pursued a wild and lawless life, oppressing the lieges, tyrannizing over the inferior clergy, and exacting 'black mail' from the whole surrounding country In 1526 his father had been obliged to appeal to the crown for protection from "bodily harm," threatened against himself, his second wife (Isabel, daughter of Lundy of Lundy), and his friends, by his unnatural son, who, on expressing his contrition, was, through the intervention of the archbishop of St Andrews, and others, received into favour, on condition of his banishing his evil associates, and relapsing not into crime In 1530, he was indicted for killing a servant of Lord Glammis, and on the 16th February 1530-1, he was arraigned at a justice-eyre held at Dundee, the king himself presiding in person, for, among other crimes alleged against him and his accomplices, having besieged his father's castles, with the intention of murdering him, surprising him at Finhaven, laying violent hands upon him, and imprisoning him in his own dungeon for twelve weeks, and on another occasion carrying him by force to Brechin, and confining him for fifteen days, besides, breaking open his coffers, pillaging his writs, and seizing his rents and revenues He was found guilty, but his life was spared Both he and his issue had forfeited their right to the succession, which opened in due course of law to the next heir-male under the entail of 1471 namely, David Lindsay of Edzell A special charter of entail thereafter passed the great seal, dated 16th October 1541, to the said David Lindsay and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to others therein enumerated, and failing them, to the earl's own nearest legitimate heirs male whatsoever bearing the name and arms of Lindsay Soon after, "the wicked master" was ignominiously slain at Dundee having been stabbed by a cobbler "for taking a stoup of drink from him" His father, after a lingering illness, died at the castle of Cairnie in Fife, on the 27th or 28th November 1542

David Lindsay of Edzell succeeded as ninth earl Having no issue by his first wife, (the dowager Lady Lovat,) in his generosity he adopted David Lindsay, the son of "the wicked master," who had been secluded from the succession by his father's forfeiture, and in his favour resigned all the lands of the earldom, with the exception of Glenesk and Feirne, executing the requisite charters under the great seal 2d May, 1546, by which that youth was reinstated in his birthright, and put in fee of the earldom as master of Crawford By his second wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir John Campbell of Lorn and Calder, whom he married in 1549, the ninth earl had five sons Sir David Lindsay of Edzell, whose male line is extinct, John, Lord Menmuir, ancestor of the earls of Balcarres (see ante, p 199), Sir Walter Lindsay of Balgawies, a convert to popery, and the most zealous and daring 'confessor' of his time, James, the protestant rector of Fetteresairn, who died young, 15th June 1580, while on a mission to Geneva, (an elegy to his memory by the celebrated Andrew Melville is inserted in the Delicæ Poetarum Scotorum), and Robert, of Balhall The earl had also two daughters, Margaret and Elizabeth, the wives respectively of John earl of Athol, and Patrick third Lord Drummond He died in September 1558

David, tenth earl, the son of "the wicked master," proved very ungrateful to his benefactor, the ninth earl He joined the association for Queen Mary in 1568, and adhered steadily to her interest He had married, soon after his restoration to the family succession, Margaret, daughter of Cardinal Bethune In the contract dated at St Andrews, 10th April 1546, the cardinal expressly called the bride his daughter, and he gave her four thousand merks in dowry The nuptials were solemnized at Finhaven with great pomp and magnificence in presence of the cardinal, who was assassinated the following month The earl had four sons David, eleventh earl, Sir Henry of Kinfauns, thirteenth earl, Sir John Lindsay of Ballinscho and Woodwray, and Alexander first Lord Spynie (see SPYNIE, lord), and a daughter, Lady Helen, married to Sir David Lindsay of Edzell

David, eleventh earl, is described in the family genealogies as "ane princely man," but a sad spendthrift Soon after his accession to the title, the old family feud with the house of Glammis was revived through the following unfortunate accident On the evening of the 17th March 1577-8, the earl and Lord Glammis, then chancellor, happened to meet, at the head of their respective followers, in a narrow street, called the School-house Wynd, in Stirling, as Crawford was passing to the castle, and the chancellor returning to his lodging, after making his report to the young king, James the Sixth They made way for each other, and called to their attendants to do the same, all obeyed, except the two last, who, having jostled, drew their swords, and attacked each other In the uproar which ensued, Glammis received a mortal wound in the head by a pistol-bullet, from whose hand is uncertain, but the earl was unjustly blamed for it Thomas Lyon, uncle of the chancellor, and tutor or guardian of his infant son, and usually styled master of Glammis, as presumptive heir to that barony, to avenge his nephew's death, immediately carried fire and sword into the Lindsay's country, while the earl himself was imprisoned in Stirling, but soon released He was indicted for the crime, but his trial it appears was postponed, as David Lindsay of Edzell and Patrick Lord Lindsay of the Byres, his sureties were fined for his nonproduction to undergo the law, 5th March 1579 [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i part 2, p 85] The 3d of November was appointed for his subsequent appearance, and it is presumed that he was then acquitted From a curious circular addressed to his principal friends, and printed in the appendix of the first volume of the Lives of the Lindsays, the earl on this occasion seems to have had recourse to the usual practice of the Scottish barons of those days, namely, to appear at his trial with such a host of attendants as was likely to overawe the judges Not long afterwards he and the earl of Huntly went to France, whence he proceeded to Italy He returned to Scotland by the last day of October 1581, when he sat in the parliament then held in Edinburgh

After the raid of Ruthven in 1582 he joined the association formed to liberate the king and on the escape of James to St Andrews Crawford Huntly, Argyle, and others of the banded nobles, occupied the town, with their followers, while Gowrie and the other insurgent lords made their submission The king then commanded two chief nobles of each faction, Angus and Mar on the one side, and Crawford and Huntly on the other, to withdraw from court for a season, to "prevent the renewal of factious debates" Shortly after this, the master of Crawford was appointed chief master stabler to King James, who wrote to the magistrates of Dundee, "commanding them to elect and take Crawford to be their provost, albeit they had chosen their own provost" He was one of the jury on the trial of the earl of Gowrie, and in the confiscations that were subsequently carried on by Arran and his friends, Crawford obtained the abbey lands of Scone, and the church lands of Abernethy On the 1st of November 1585 the banished lords, supported by Queen Elizabeth, entered Scotland, with a large army, and marched unexpectedly on the king at Stirling No one was with him except Arran and the earls of Crawford and Montrose, who garrisoned the castle with their followers Arran fled, but Crawford and Montrose retired into the castle with the king The castle soon surrendered, and Crawford and Montrose were committed to the charge of Lord Hamilton

The earl had been converted to the popish faith by father William Crichton, a well-known jesuit, and on the arrival of the news of the decapitation of Mary queen of Scots at Fotheringay 7th February 1586-7, he and the other Catholic lords, Huntly and Errol, entered into a correspondence with Spain, then preparing the invincible armada for an attack upon England In the previous year they had assembled their forces at the Bridge of Dee, when the king marched to oppose them, and the simple fact of Arran, Huntly, Montrose and Crawford having subsequently held a meeting at the lodging of the latter, had created new suspicion against them At the celebrated reconciliation banquet which took place at Holyrood-house early in 1587, Crawford and Glammis, and other hereditary enemies, walked together hand in hand to the cross, where they drank to each other amid the thunder of the castle guns, and the songs and shouts of the citizens But this reconciliation was but a hollow one Long standing feudal enmities could not be so easily healed In May of that year, Crawford, Huntly and Both well were accused of treasonable insurrection against the king, but nothing was established against them In their correspondence with the prince of Parma, they undertook, with the aid of six thousand men, to render the king of Spain master of Scotland This correspondence falling into the hands of Elizabeth, was by her sent to James In the meantime, a preliminary plot, for seizing the king's person, and excluding from court the chancellor Maitland and the master of Glammis, high treasurer, the king's chief councillors, came to light, and on Huntly's arrival in Edinburgh he was arrested, when, news being brought of Crawford and Errol's having come in arms to the North Ferry, the whole kingdom was alarmed, but the earls made their submission A few days after, Crawford and Huntly met at Perth, and at first designed to fortify that town, but hearing that the treasurer Glammis had arrived in Angus, they waylaid him, and chased him to the house of Kirkhill, which being set fire to, he was obliged to surrender to his cousin the laird of Auchindown, who kept him some weeks' prisoner in the north In April 1589, the three earls, Crawford, Huntly, and Errol, collected their forces in Aberdeen, whence they issued a rebellious proclamation, but the king advancing against them, their followers dispersed Crawford fled, and the treasurer, being released, interceded with the king for him and Huntly They "offered to enter their persons in ward, and submit themselves to the punishment his majesty might be pleased to impose" Crawford went to Edinburgh on the 20th of May, and was warded in his own lodging On the 24th he was tried, with Huntly and Bothwell, also implicated in the same rebellion, and all found guilty of repeated acts of treason James, however, would not allow any sentence to be pronounced against them, but committed Crawford to Blackness, Bothwell to Tantallon, and Huntly to his old quarters in Edinburgh castle, and after keeping them a few months in confinement, he took occasion, amidst the public rejoicings on the approach of his marriage, to set them at liberty A key to his majesty's conduct on this occasion is furnished by the fact of his having, on the first news of his mother's execution, connived at, if he did not encourage, the treasonable correspondence with Spain, and permitted jesuits and other popish priests to travel unmolested through the kingdom, and had himself instigated the rebellion Soon after the earl had a safe-conduct to pass through England, on his way to France He returned to Scotland in 1601, after an absence of eleven years, and died 22d November 1607 He was twice married His first wife, Lilias, daughter of David second Lord Drummond, with whom he received the then large tocher of ten thousand merks, died young This earl was of a suspicious and jealous disposition, and an old north country ballad, entitled 'Earl Crawford,' (printed in Buchan's Ancient Ballads of the North of Scotland,) relates that a merry jest of Lady Crawford as to the father of her child (David, who died in infancy) was taken by her husband in earnest

"I turn'd me right and round about
And ave the blythe blink in my e'e —
It was ae word my merry mou spake
That sinderit my guid lord and me"

He sent her home to her family in disgrace, when her brother offered to marry her to

— ——— — 'as fine a knicht
That is nine times as rich as he'

She answered,

Oh! haud your tongue my brother dear
And ye'll let a your folly be
I'd rather ae kiss o Crawford's mouth
Than a' his goud and white monie'

She rode back to her husband's castle to entreat his forgiveness and "comfort," but he refused to listen to her Soon after he rode over to Stobhall the seat of the Drummonds, to sue for pardon himself, but the lady returned him the same answer he had given her

'Indeed I winna come mysel
Nor send my waiting maid to thee —
Sae take your ain words hame again
At Crawford castle ye tauld me'

The earl's second wife was Lady Griselda Stuart, daughter of the earl of Athol The following is the autograph of the eleventh earl

His eldest son, David the twelfth earl, was so reckless and extravagant that he acquired the name of the "prodigal earl" He had been sadly neglected by his father in his youth, and while at the university of St Andrews, was often left without clothes or food, but what his tutor, Mr Peter Nairn could procure for him, "as his poverty and credit could serve" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 50] He afterwards gathered a band of broken Lindsays around him, and pursued with unrelenting fierceness his feudal and personal enemies On the 25th October 1605, he slew, "under assurance," between Brechin and the Place of Idzell, his kinsman Sir Walter Lindsay of Balgawies, brother of Lord Edzell [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol iii pp 65 and 248], and the son of that earl to whose generosity his father owed his estates and honours The relations of Sir Walter bitterly resented this injury, and his nephews especially determined to be revenged On the 5th July 1607, between nine and ten o'clock at night, the latter, with eight followers, six of them Lindsays, attacked, in the High Street of Edinburgh, the master of Crawford, then without attendants, and accompanied only by Lord Spynie, the uncle of both parties, and who was anxious for a reconciliation between them, and Sir James Douglas of Drumlanrig All three were wounded, the master severely, and Lord Spynie mortally Sir David Lindsay of Edzell, (styled Lord Edzell, as a lord of session,) and Alexander Lindsay of Canterland, his second son were subsequently, on the 6th September 1609, indicted as suspected connivers at the death of Lord Spynie, but no one appearing against them, on the 19th of that month they formally protested that no one should at any future time be allowed to call them to account To prevent the continual alienations of the estates of the earldom carried on by this earl, the family got him imprisoned in Edinburgh castle, where he spent the last years of his life under surveillance, but acting in every respect otherwise as a free agent In consequence he was sometimes styled 'Comes Incarceratus,' or the 'captive earl' He died in the castle in February 1621, and was buried in the chapel of Holyroodhouse He had been divorced from his wife, Lady Jean Ker, of the Lothian family, and had only one child, a daughter, Lady Jean Lindsay, who having run away with a common "Jockey with the horn," or public herald, lived latterly by begging [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 51] By a grant under the privy seal, of date 4th June 1663, King Charles the Second granted her a pension of one hundred a-year, 'in consideration of her eminent birth and necessitous condition"

The prodigal earl was succeeded by his uncle, Sir Henry Lindsay of Kinfauns, thirteenth earl of Crawford He had been master of the household to the queen (Anne of Denmark), and in his younger days he built the house of Carnaldstone (now Carnston) in Forfarshire On 2d September 1592, David Cochrane of Pittoun complained to the king and council that he had raised letters against Harry Lindsay of Kinfauns for having come to his house, at the head of a band of armed men, forcibly expelled his wife "with nyne young bairnes," and taken violent possession of it Lindsay was accordingly charged to deliver up the house, &c, and to answer before the king and council for this act of oppression, on which he delivered up the house to its lawful possessor, and withdrew his men from it After he had succeeded to the title, it is recorded of him that he gathered "all he could together of the wrackit estate of the earldom of Crawford" [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 52, note] He died in 1623 By his wife, Beatrix, daughter and heiress of George Charteris of Kinfauns, he had four sons Sir John of Kinfauns, (invested with the order of the Bath at the coronation of James the First of England in 1603,) who died without issue, and George, Alexander, and Ludovic, successively fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth earls of Crawford

George, fourteenth earl, succeeded to a dilapidated estate, and having, in 1629, sold Finhaven to his kinsman, Lord Spynie, he quitted Scotland, and served with distinction, as colonel of a foot company of Dutch or Germans, under Gustavus Adolphus, but was basely killed in 1633, by a lieutenant of his own regiment whom he had been provoked to batoon A council of war (consisting of Germans) being held upon the latter, he was acquitted of the slaughter, on account of its being contrary to the Swedish discipline to cudgel any officer

But General Leslie (afterwards commander-in chief of the Covenanters, and earl of Leven), being then governor of Stirling, where the earl was buried, caused his murderer to be immediately apprehended and shot [Lives of the Lindsays, vol ii p 56] The earl left an only child, Lady Margaret Lindsay, who died in 1655, in Caithness

His brother, Alexander, fifteenth earl, who had attained the rank of colonel in the Swedish service, became insane, and was kept in confinement till his death in 1639

His youngest brother, Ludovic, sixteenth earl, had entered the Spanish service, in which he rose to the rank of colonel In 1641, he returned to Scotland, to give his support to Charles the First, whose cause he upheld with so much constancy during the whole civil wars, as to be distinguished by the name of the "loyal earl" The strange plot known in history as "the Incident," was the joint concoction of him and Montrose Its object was to seize the marquis of Hamilton, his brother the earl of Lanark, and the marquis of Argyle, the most powerful of the covenanting nobles, and convey them on board a vessel in Leith Roads, where they were to be detained till the king should gain such an ascendancy in Scotland, as would enable him to try them as traitors Crawford and his men were to seize Edinburgh the same night, capture the castle, release Montrose, then a prisoner and deliver it into his hands as governor On the discovery of the plot (through the information of a gentleman who was invited to join in it,) Crawford was arrested, but liberated without caution or security, in little more than a month afterwards While in prison the earl of Lindsay paid him a visit, and proposed to save his life, on condition of his resigning the earldom of Crawford in his favour To this he is said to have assented, and thereby, through Lindsay's interest, to have escaped punishment Accordingly on the 15th January, 1642, Crawford resigned his earldom into the king's hands at Windsor, for new investiture to himself and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to John, earl of Lindsay and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to his own heirs male collateral for ever This transaction has been usually but erroneously assigned to 1644

On the raising of the royal standard at Nottingham, 25th August 1642, the earl of Crawford joined Charles there immediately, and was created commander of the volunteers At the head of his own regiment of horse, he fought gallantly under Charles, at the unfortunate battle of Edgehill, on 23d October following, and, at the battle of Lansdowne on 5th July 1643, he contributed greatly to the rout of the parliamentary forces Soon after being sent for a supply of powder, he was intercepted by Sir William Waller, and defeated with the loss of his ammunition, and a troop or two of his regiment Having subsequently received a reinforcement of cavalry from the king at Oxford Crawford, commissary Wilmot, and Sir John Byron (ancestor of the noble poet of that name), attacked and defeated Waller, killing six hundred of his men taking eight hundred prisoners, with seven pieces of cannon, and all their colours He fought at Newbury, 20th September 1643, and at Reading Five days after he had a narrow escape in an attempt to gain the town of Poole for the king, through the treachery of Captain Sydenham, one of the garrison, who for forty pounds and a promise of preferment, agreed to admit him and a force under him into the town, but having previously acquainted the governor, no sooner had a portion of them got in than they were unexpectedly attacked and nearly all killed or taken prisoners The earl was one of the few who cut their way out Soon after, in company with Sir Ralph Hopeton he invaded Sussex and took Arundel castle But being attacked at Alton near Farnham, by Waller, he made his escape with a few only of his troops, the rest, to the number of nine hundred, being all taken, with twelve hundred arms.

With the marquis of Montrose, he marched into Scotland, in the beginning of April 1644, when Dumfries was taken by them, but they were soon obliged to retreat to Carlisle For this he was, on the 26th of the same month, excommunicated by the commission of the General Assembly Sentence of forfeiture was pronounced against him in absence by the Scots parliament, on the 26th July thereafter, and on the same day was passed a ratification in favour of the earl of Lindsay of his right and patent as earl of Crawford, which title was conferred on him by parliament, and he was thereafter designated earl of Crawford-Lindsay

Earl Ludovic had, in the meantime, rejoined the royalists, and he acted as a general in Prince Rupert's army, when it was defeated at Marston-moor, 2d July 1644 He afterwards, with Lord Reay and other Scots officers, threw himself into Newcastle, but that town being taken by storm by the Scots army under General Leslie, in the following October, his lordship was made prisoner and sent to Scotland He arrived at Edinburgh, 7th November, and was conducted bareheaded, and with every mark of indignity, by the Watergate of the Canongate to the Tolbooth Soon after he was tried and condemned to death as a traitor, mainly according to Wishart, through the influence of his cousin the earl of Lindsay, who had usurped his honours, and now thirsted for his blood It was debated whether he should be at once beheaded, or his execution delayed for some days, that he might suffer along with the other prisoners, and the last alternative was carried After the battle of Kilsyth, August 15, 1645, the marquis of Montrose despatched the master of Napier and Nathanael Gordon to release Lords Crawford and Ogilvie and other imprisoned royalists The humblest prayers were now made to these two noblemen by the magistrates of Edinburgh, for their intercession with the victorious Montrose, which they cheerfully promised His lordship was at the battle of Philiphaugh, 13th September the same year, where the royalists were totally defeated He escaped however, and met Montrose the next day at a ford beyond the Clyde, where they again separated, Montrose conducting what remained of the foot to Inverness, and Crawford the horse to the Mearns They then retired to the Highlands, and in the various skirmishes, retreats, &c that afterwards took place, the earl figured conspicuously In the beginning of 1646 he advanced into Buchan, and burnt the town of Fraserburgh He then went to Banff, but was compelled to retire hastily into Moray with some loss in February, by a division of Middleton's army He continued with Montrose till the king delivered himself up to the Scottish army at Newark, and sent them his commands to lay down their arms With Montrose and three others he was specially excepted from pardon by the articles of Westminster, 11th July 1646, but by an agreement made betwixt General Middleton and Montrose, he was permitted to retire unmolested beyond the seas, on which he accompanied the Irish auxiliaries to Ireland, in order to consult with the marquis of Antrim, as to a new scheme which he had organized with Montrose for the king's rescue, and having obtained from that nobleman a promise of two thousand men he proceeded to Paris, where he arrived on the 13th October, and communicated his plan to the queen, Henrietta Maria Finding, however, himself and his scheme neglected and discountenanced, he repaired to Spain, "to crave arrears" says Bishop Guthry (Memoirs, p 180), "due to him by that king," and received the command of a regiment of Irish infantry in the Spanish service In 1651 he was again in Paris, as, in the midst of the tumults of the Fronde, he appeared as a partisan of Cardinal de Retz, guarding him in his citadel of Notre Dame, with fifty Scottish officers, who had served under Montrose He is said to have died in France in 1652 This chivalrous and loyal nobleman was the last of the old original line of the earls of Crawford He had married Lady Margaret Graham, second daughter of William earl of Strathern, Menteith, and Airth, (dowager Lady Garlies,) but had no issue

The male representation of the family of Crawford devolved on George third Lord Spynie (see SPYNIE, lord), at whose death in 1671, John Lindsay of Edzell, descended from David ninth earl of Crawford, became heir male of the family, and entitled in terms of the charters of 1546 and 1565, and the act of parliament 1567, to the earldom of Crawford He preferred his claim thereto in the second parliament of James the Seventh, but was not successful

The title was taken up, as already mentioned, by the earl of Lindsay, who under the name of Crawford-Lindsay became seventeenth earl This was John, tenth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, (see LINDSAY, lord,) born about the year 1596, and served heir to his father 1st October 1616 He was created earl of Lindsay by patent, dated the 5th May 1633, but in consequence of joining Lords Balmerino and Rothes, and the party who opposed the king in the act of uniformity, the patent was stopped at the chancery He continued to act a conspicuous part on the side of the covenanters, and was considered one of the leaders of the party In November 1641, he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, obtained a patent as earl, with precedence from the date of the warrant, and was also constituted one of the commissioners of the treasury then named This commission expiring in 1644, the estates, on the 23d July of that year, appointed him lord treasurer until the next triennial parliament The office was confirmed to him in 1646 by King Charles, after his surrender at Newark In January 1645 he was chosen president of the parliament in room of the earl of Lauderdale Possessing most of the principal offices of the state, it seems beyond a doubt that it was by his instigation and influence that the Scots parliament passed sentence of forfeiture against Ludovick earl of Crawford in 1644, when he himself immediately assumed the title [Crawford Case, p 26] Besides his various offices, he acquired also the revenues of five bishoprics, those of Caithness, Ross, Moray, Dunkeld, and Dunblane He was one of the council of war that directed the movements of General Baillie's troops against Montrose, and when Baillie in the north vainly attempted to bring the latter to a battle, the earl was stationed at the castle of Newtyle with an army of reserve, to prevent Montrose from crossing the Forth His lordship had severely censured the campaigns of Argyle, and insinuated that the result would have been different had he possessed the command The force under him was newly raised, while he himself was without military experience, and he was saved from disgrace and defeat only by the desertion of the Gordons from Montrose, when the army of the latter had arrived within seven miles of his camp In consequence of this event, Montrose retraced his steps northward, in pursuit of Baillie, who, in the meantime, was encamped on Deeside, where he was joined by Crawford-Lindsay, who, exchanging a thousand of his raw recruits for a similar number of Baillie's veterans, the earl returned with these and the remainder of his army, through the Mearns into Angus Thereafter, he entered Athol, and in imitation of Argyle, plundered and burnt the country After the battle of Kilsyth so disastrous to the covenanters Crawford-Lindsay, with Argyle, Lanark, and others, sought refuge in Berwick, from the victorious army of Montrose, but the defeat of the latter at Philiphaugh, retrieved their affairs again

After the surrender of the king to the Scots army in 1646, the earl was sent, with the duke of Hamilton and the earl of Cassillis, to his majesty at Newcastle, to entreat him to accede to the Westminster propositions, but in vain In December of that year, he ineffectually opposed the vote by which the Scots parliament resolved to deliver up the king to the English, and in his speech on that occasion appealed to the national honour and generosity in his behalf In signing officially, as president of the parliament, the public warrant of surrender, he recorded his solemn protest against it as an individual, and after the restoration he presented a paper to the high commissioner and the parliament, explanatory of the same, and requiring that its truth should be investigated by witnesses, in order that he might be acquitted of all individual participation in the transaction The inquiry was accordingly made, and the truth of his statement substantiated to his satisfaction

In 1647, when Charles was a prisoner at Carisbrook, Crawford-Lindsay and his brother in-law the duke of Hamilton became the head of the constitutional royalists, in opposition to the earl of Argyle and the extreme presbyterians, and in the following year he entered with zeal into the 'Engagement,' for raising an army to attempt the rescue of the king The endeavours of Hamilton, at this juncture, to propitiate Argyle and the protestors, created a suspicion among the ultra-loyalists that he had a secret understanding with them and to efface this impression he is said to have got up a mock duel between Crawford-Lindsay and Argyle Taking offence at some speech of his in parliament, the latter sent a challenge to the former, and they met at Musselburgh Links, but the duel was prevented from taking place For his conduct in this business Argyle was obliged by the commission of the General Assembly to perform public repentance before them, and Lindsay was desired to do the same, but refused

On the defeat of the royal army at Preston, and its subsequent dispersion, Argyle and his party got into power, and Crawford-Lindsay was by the act of classes, deprived of his offices of high treasurer, president of the parliament, and lord of session, voted a public enemy, secluded from parliament, and ordered to be confined to his house, under a penalty of one hundred thousand marks, decree being pronounced against him on the 10th February 1649 On the arrival of Charles the Second in Scotland in 1650, a coalition of parties took place, when he was admitted to court, having, at the king's command, with some other noblemen, consented to make public acknowledgment of repentance for accession to the late 'Engagement,' as required by the church He had, the previous year, peremptorily refused to make this acknowledgment, and escaped to Holland After the defeat of Argyle at Dunbar by Cromwell, Crawford Lindsay and his friends again took the lead in the state, and at the coronation of the king at Scone, on January 1st, 1651, he carried the sceptre "On Saturday the 15th day of February," says Sir James Balfour, "his majesty came at night to the Struthers, (his lordship's family seat,) where he was entertained by the earl of Crawford till Monday the 17th" [Annals, vol iv] He had previously obtained from Charles a ratification of the resignation of the earldom of Crawford in his favour, which was confirmed by act of parliament after the restoration, in 1661

in Scotland, and he also received a commission as commander-in-chief under the earl of Leven, general of the forces raised in that country A meeting of the Committee of Estates was held at Alyth in Forfarshire, 28th August, 1651, when they were surprised by a body of Monk's cavalry sent from Dundee for the purpose, and Crawford-Lindsay, with several others, was taken prisoner He was sent by sea to England, and confined, first in the Tower of London, and afterwards in Windsor castle, for nine years The following interesting notice appears in Lamont's Diary, (page 45,) "Aug 1652 — About the beginning of this month, the Lady Crawford took journey from Leith for to go to London to her husband, now prisoner in the Tower She went in the journey coach, that comes ordinarily betwixt England and Scotland" The earl was specially excepted out of Cromwell's Act of grace and pardon, 5th May 1654, by which lands of the clear yearly value of four hundred pounds sterling were settled, out of his estate, upon his countess (Lady Margaret Hamilton, second daughter of the second marquis of Hamilton) and her children By the authority of the English parliament, then reinstated in power by General Monk, the earl was, at last, on the 3d of March, 1660, released from his long and tedious imprisonment After the restoration, he was restored to his offices of high treasurer, president of the council, and extraordinary lord of session, the treasurership being granted to him for life, by patent dated 19th January 1661, and, after being detained for sometime at court, with the king, he was received with enthusiasm on his return to Scotland His entrance into Edinburgh was a triumphal procession, "being met and convoyit with numbers of horsemen, and saluted with a volley of the greatest ordnance of the castle" [Nicoll's Diary, page 308]

In the subsequent attempted establishment of episcopacy, the earl was the only member of the government in Scotland who remained true to the covenant He was "the champion and sole hope" of the presbyterians, and both in parliament and at court defended their cause with constancy and zeal, till the king was, at last, convinced by the earl of Middleton, that his removal from office was indispensable for the success of their favourite project In 1663, at the suggestion of Archbishop Sharp, notwithstanding that he had been that ambitious prelate's first patron, the king in an interview which the earl had with his majesty, put it to him whether he would consent to the abjuration of the covenant commonly called the Declaration, passed in the fifth session of parliament, 1662 He replied that he could not do it with a safe conscience, and at once surrendered the white staff as treasurer, which was given to his son-in-law, the earl, afterwards duke of Rothes In the following year he resigned his place of extraordinary lord of session, and retired from all public business to his country-seat of Struthers He died in 1678, in his eighty-first year He had two sons, William, eighteenth earl, and the Hon Patrick Lindsay, ancestor of the viscounts Garnock [see GARNOCK, viscount of], and four daughters, Lady Anne, duchess of Rothes, Lady Christian, countess of Haddington, Lady Helen, married to Sir Robert Sinclair, baronet of Stevenston, Haddingtonshire, and Lady Elizabeth, countess of Northesk

William, eighteenth earl of Crawford, and second earl of Lindsay, concurred heartily in the Revolution, for years previous to which event he had been living in retirement Before the death of Charles the Second, he had determined on emigrating, but was refused permission to leave the kingdom By King William he was appointed, 5th June 1689, president of the parliament, 15th April 1690, a commissioner of the treasury, and 9th May following, one of the commission for settling the government of the church He was one of the most active agents in effecting the overthrow of episcopacy His correspondence with Lord Melville, secretary of state for Scotland at that eventful period, has been printed among the 'Leven Papers,' and several of his letters are inserted in the appendix to the second volume of the 'Lives of the Lindsays' He died March 6th, 1698, leaving a numerous family His second son, the Hon Colonel James Lindsay, was killed at the battle of Almanza in Spain in 1707

The eldest son, John, nineteenth earl of Crawford and third of Lindsay, was sworn a privy councillor in 1702 He was an officer in the army, and was made colonel of the horse guards, 4th May, 1704 He afforded a steady support to the treaty of union, among the subordinate details of which was the settlement of a question of precedency which had long been debated between the earls of Crawford and Sutherland, and after protracted investigations, was decided in favour of the earls of Crawford, who rank accordingly as the premier Scottish earls on the union roll He was one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage chosen by the last parliament of Scotland, 13th February 1707, and was rechosen at the general election in 1708 He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1710, and died in 1713. He left a son, and two daughters, Lady Catherine Wemyss, wife of General Wemyss, governor of Edinburgh castle, and Lady Mary Campbell, wife of Dugald Campbell of Glensaddell, and ancestress of the Campbells of Newfield, heirs of line of the family

Of the son, John, twentieth earl of Crawford and fourth earl of Lindsay styled "the gallant earl," and one of the most distinguished soldiers in Europe of his time, a memoir is given at page 718 in larger type

On the death of John, twentieth earl of Crawford, in 1749 without issue, the titles of Crawford and Lindsay devolved on his cousin, George, fourth viscount of Garnock, only surviving son of Patrick the second viscount (see GARNOCK, viscount of) He was the great grandson and direct male heir of Patrick, younger son of John, seventeenth earl of Crawford, and first earl of Lindsay, and thus became the twenty first earl of Crawford, fifth earl of Lindsay, and fourth viscount Garnock, to which latter title he had succeeded in 1708 He served as a volunteer with the allied army in the Netherlands against the French, and was one of the reconnoitring party who owed their lives to the presence of mind of the gallant earl of Crawford on the morning before the battle of Roucoux, as related in that nobleman's life (see under) In 1747 he was a lieutenant in Lord Drumlanrig's regiment in the service of Holland In 1749, he succeeded to the earldom, and devoted himself to the restoration of the family fortunes, by buying up the debts that affected it He also purchased various lands contiguous to the estates His lordship married, 26th December 1755, Jane, eldest daughter and heiress of Robert Hamilton of Bourtreehill in Ayrshire He had gone to reside at Kilbirnie castle, in that county, which he repaired and ornamented, Struthers in Fifeshire, the seat of the Lindsays of the Byres, being then totally ruinous On one fine Sunday evening in April 1757, a servant, going to the stables, saw smoke issuing from the roof, and gave the alarm of fire, in a few minutes the castle was in flames Lord Crawford ran to the countess' room, and catching up his infant daughter (Lady Jean Lindsay, afterwards countess of Eglinton), hurried with her into the open air They took refuge in the manse, and then removed to Bourtreehill, and afterwards to Fifeshire, where the earl built a house near the ruins of Struthers subsequently enlarged and named Craw ford Priory He died on the 11th August, 1781 He had four sons, and a daughter

His eldest son, George Lindsay Crawford, twenty-second earl of Crawford, and sixth of Lindsay, born at Bourtreehill 31st August 1758, entered the army in 1776, and rose to the rank of major-general, which he reached 1st January 1805 He had been appointed in 1798 lord-lieutenant of the county of Fife, but was deprived of that office in 1807 On the change of administration, however, he was reinstated therein 23d May same year He died, unmarried, 30th January 1808 His three brothers having predeceased him, without issue the whole male descendants of the treasurer, John seventeenth earl of Crawford, then became extinct, and the succession to the earldom of Crawford reverted, in terms of the patent of 1642, to the earls of Balcarres, the heirs male of earl Ludovic (see ante p 207) The Crawford-Lindsay estates, being destined to heirs-female, went to the twenty-second earl's only sister, Lady Mary Lindsay Crawford The succession of her ladyship was opposed, unsuccessfully by Colonel William Claud Campbell, grandson of Lady May Lindsay, sister of "the gallant earl," and heir of line of the Crawford-Lindsay family

The titles of earl of Crawford and Lindsay, and viscount Garnock, were assumed by David Lindsay, serjeant in the Perthshire regiment of militia, then quartered at Dover, who directed an advertisement to be inserted in the Edinburgh Weekly Journal, of 16th March, 1808, cautioning the tenants on the estates as to the payment of their rents He was served heir to his grandfather, John Lindsay of Kirkforther, the same year, and died, without issue, early in 1809 He appears to have been de jure Lord Lindsay of the Byres [See LINDSAY, surname of]

In 1810 Mr John Crawfurd from Castle Dawson, in Ireland, preferred a claim to the titles and estates of Crawford and Lindsay, as the nearest heir, asserting himself to be the lineal descendant of the Hon James Lindsay, third son of John, first Viscount Garnock Some of the documents on which he relied, having been found to have been vitiated and otherwise altered, the claimant and another person were in 1812, tried on a charge of forgery, and, being convicted, were sentenced to fourteen years transportation In 1820, having through strong influence exerted on his behalf, procured a pardon, he returned from New South Wales, when he renewed his claim, and large sums having been subscribed on his behalf by many who thought it well-founded, he assumed the title of earl of Crawford, and twice voted at the election of peers in Holyrood house On his death during the prosecution of his suit, his son asserted his pretensions with equal assurance, but in 1839 they were found untenable, and his counsel abandoned the case Ample information of one of the most singular instances of peerage imposture on record, will be found in the work by Dr Adams entitled 'The Crawford Peerage,' (manifesto of John Crawford,) published at Edinburgh in 1829, quarto, and in the 'Examination of the Claim of John Lindsay-Crawford to the estates and honours of Crawford,' in refutation of that work, by Mr Dobie, writer, Beith, 1831, 4to

The titles of earl of Crawford and Lord Lindsay were by judgment of the House of Lords, on 11th August 1848, declared to belong to James, seventh earl of Balcarres, who, thereupon became the twenty-fourth earl of Crawford, and thus this long-litigated question was at last set at rest.

CRAWFORD, DAVID, of Drumsoy historian, was born in 1665 at Drumsoy, near Glasgow, and was educated for the bar He preferred however, history and antiquities to the study of the law, and was appointed historiographer royal of Scotland by Queen Anne In 1706 he published 'Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, containing a full and impartial Account of the Revolution in that Kingdom, begun in 1567' This work, which went through two editions, was held in so much estimation, as to be frequently quoted as an authority by Hume, Robertson, and others, until Mr Malcolm Laing published, in 1804, 'The Historie and Life of King James the Sexth,' from the original manuscript To this manuscript Crawford formally referred for the authentication of certain passages in his 'Memoirs,' although it contained nothing that could in the least countenance them Every statement in the 'Historie' unfavourable to Queen Mary, or to Bothwell, he carefully suppressed, while every vague assertion in Camden, Spottiswoode, Melville, and others, or in the State Papers, he had transcribed from the Cotton MSS, is inserted in the Memoirs, and these writers are quoted in the margin as collateral authorities Crawford having thus constructed spurious memoirs of his own, had the impudence to declare on the title page, and in the preface, that the work was "faithfully published from an authentic manuscript" Truly, therefore, might Mr Laing style Crawford's work "the most early, if not the most impudent, literary forgery ever attempted in Scotland" He died at Drumsoy in 1726 —His works are

Courtship à la-mode, a Comedy 1700
Love at First Sight, a Comedy 1704
Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, from 1566 to 1581, containing a full and impartial Account of the Revolution in that Kingdom in the year 1567, to which is added, The Earl of Morton's Confession Edin 1706, 8vo 2d edit Edin 1707, 12mo

CRAWFORD, WILLIAM, a clergyman of considerable repute in his day, was born in Kelso in 1676 He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and after taking his degrees, was ordained minister of Wilton, a small country parish in the Merse In 1711 he made a most energetic opposition to the settlement of ministers by presentations, instead of by popular election, in which he was supported by some of the most eminent clergymen then in the Established Church He wrote a small work, entitled 'Dying Thoughts,' and some sermons He died in 1742.

CRAWFORD, twentieth earl of, (John Lindsay, fourth earl of Lindsay,) a distinguished military commander, was born 4th October 1702 He was the son of John, nineteenth earl of Crawford, by a daughter of Lord Doune (son of the sixth earl of Moray), and widow of Thomas Fraser of Strichen He lost his mother when he was a child, and as his father's military duties required him to reside generally in London, the care of himself and two sisters was committed to an old governante at the family seat of Struthers in Fife When he was a boy in frocks the question of the union was the all engrossing topic of discussion, and his lordship frequently, in after life, related that one day when the dukes of Hamilton and Argyle were dining with his father, (who supported the treaty,) a warm debate on the subject took place between them, as he was playing about the room, when the duke of Argyle took him up in his arms, and set him on the table among the bottles and glasses, saying to his father, "Crawford, if this boy lives, I wonder whether he will be of your sentiments" The earl replied, "He certainly will, if he has a drop of my blood in his body" Whereupon his grace kissed him, and set him down, saying, "I warrant he will make a brave fellow"

On the death of his father in December 1713, when he was only eleven years old, his grand-aunt, the dowager-duchess of Argyle, sent for the children to her house in Kintyre, where the young earl resided till of age for the university, when he was first sent to Glasgow, and afterwards to Edinburgh Mr Rolt, his biographer, relates that during his residence in the Highlands he fell in love with a young shepherdess, in whose company he spent a great deal of his time among the hills, not even going home to meals, which he was accustomed to make on her oaten bread, and his lordship afterwards often declared that the pleasing sensations and harmless recreations, which he enjoyed with his little shepherdess, made a stronger impression on his mind than all the gallantries of the politer world, and all the pleasures of a court While at college he gave many proofs of resoluteness and daring, and became the champion of the university, his fellow students generally choosing him for their leader in their disputes with the citizens His favourite study was history, and he is represented as being more pleased with one lesson in Quintus Curtius, than with twenty lectures in philosophy, and more eager to understand a stratagem in the Commentaries of Cæsar, than to explain the abstrusest subject in logic From Edinburgh he returned to the duchess of Argyle, with whom he continued, under the tuition of a private tutor, till he was nineteen years of age, when, after spending a short time in London, he was, in 1721, entered at the military academy of Vaudeuil at Paris He continued there for two years His progress in learning was so rapid, and his acquirement of all the manly and elegant accomplishments usual with young men of rank and fortune so great, that his talents excited general admiration In horsemanship, fencing, and dancing, particularly, he surpassed all competitors The following instance of his boldness is recited by his biographer A grand entertainment was given at Versailles in 1723, by the young king, Louis the Fifteenth, on occasion of his being declared of age, and among other amusements a fishpond was to be drawn in the gardens The earl was among the spectators on the occasion, and being pressed upon and insulted by a French marquis in his court robes, he took the offender up in his arms, and threw him, robes and all, headlong into the pond, in presence of the king, to the great mirth of the spectators

After quitting the academy, he remained some time at Paris, and then returned to England, one of the most accomplished gentlemen of the age In December 1726, he obtained a captain's commission in one of the three additional troops of the second regiment of Scots Greys, then commanded by General Sir John Campbell On these troops being disbanded in 1730, he retired to the seat of the duchess-dowager of Argyle at Campbelltown, where he continued about eighteen months, during which time he studied mathematics, history, and military strategy His recreations were sailing in a small Norway boat, and hunting, in which he took extraordinary delight, following the hounds on foot over the mountains when inaccessible for horses

seventh or queen's own regiment of dragoons The same year he was elected one of the sixteen representatives of the Scots peerage, in the room of the earl of Loudoun deceased, and was thrice rechosen afterwards In June 1733, he was appointed a gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, in February following he obtained the captain lieutenancy of the first regiment of foot-guards, and in the subsequent October was nominated to a company of the third regiment of foot-guards

Finding no chance at that time of distinguishing himself in the British service, and being desirous of acquiring military experience in the field, his lordship obtained the king's permission to go out as a volunteer to the Imperial army, the emperor of Germany being then at war with France He joined the Imperialists at Bruchsal, near Heidelberg, on the Rhine, in June 1735, and was received by their commander, the celebrated Prince Eugene of Savoy, with every mark of distinction There being, however, no prospect of active duty in that quarter, with Count Nassau, Lord Primrose, Mr Stanhope, and Captain Dalrymple, also volunteers, he proceeded to the army under Count Seckendorff, by whom, October 17, 1735, they were sent on a reconnoitring excursion, when, meeting with a party of the enemy, three times their number, a skirmish ensued, in which Count Nassau was shot by a musket-ball, and expired next day, and Lord Primrose severely wounded, close beside Lord Crawford The same afternoon was fought the battle of Clausen, in which Lord Crawford highly distinguished himself by his bravery and good conduct, and the result of which compelled the French to repass the Moselle

The preliminaries of peace being concluded the same month, the earl quitted the Imperial army, and after making the tour of the Netherlands, returned to Britain, where he remained inactive for two years Anxious to be again employed, he obtained the king's permission to serve as a volunteer in the Russian army, under field-marshal Munich, then engaged with the Imperialists in a war against the Turks In April 1738 he embarked at Gravesend for St Petersburg, and on his arrival there he was gratified with a most kind and gracious reception from the czarina, Anne Iwanowna, who conferred on him the command of a regiment of horse, with the rank of general in her service In the beginning of May he left the Russian capital for the army, and after a harassing journey of more than a month, during which he was exposed to imminent danger from the enemy, he at length arrived at the camp of Marshal Munich, who received him with all the respect due to his rank and character

The army having passed the Bog, on its way to Bender, was three times attacked by the Turks, who were as often repulsed A fourth sanguinary battle took place July 26, when the Turks and Tartars were again defeated, and the Russians took post on the Dniester, July 27 In this last engagement Lord Crawford, who accompanied the Cossacks, excited their astonishment and admiration by his dexterity in horsemanship, and having sabred one of the Tartars, whom he had engaged in personal combat, he brought his arms with him to England as a trophy of his prowess Munich afterwards retreated to Kiow, when the earl left him to join the Imperialists near Belgrade, with whom he continued for six weeks On the Imperial army going into winter quarters, his lordship proceeded with Prince Eugene's regiment to Comorra, thirty-three miles from Presburg, where, and at Vienna, he remained till the middle of April 1739, occupying his leisure with drawing plans, and writing observations on the Russian campaign He then joined the Imperialists under marshal Wallis, at Peterwaradin, and was present at the battle of Krotzka, near Belgrade, commenced July 22, 1739, about three in the morning, when he had his favourite black horse shot under him, and while in the act of mounting a fresh horse, he received a severe wound in the left thigh by a musket ball, which shattered the bone and threw him to the ground General count Luchesi, observing his lordship lying as if dead, ordered some grenadiers to attend to him They accordingly lifted him up, and placed him on horseback, but were compelled to leave him in that condition He remained in that situation till about eight o'clock, when he was discovered by one of his own grooms, holding fast by the horse's mane with both hands, his head uncovered, and his face deadly pale He was carried into Belgrade suffering the most excruciating agony His wound was at first considered mortal, but though not immediately fatal, he never recovered from its effects He was removed from Belgrade, September 26, to a vessel on the Danube, in which he sailed to Comorra, where he arrived December 27, and there the principal part of the bullet was extracted February 20, 1740 He left that place April 28, and proceeded up the Danube to Vienna, where he arrived May 7, being all the time in a recumbent posture, pieces of the fractured bone continually coming away He was able to walk on crutches for the first time September 3, and on the 20th of that month he was removed to the baths of Baden, where he remained till August 11, 1741 Then proceeding by Presburg, Vienna, Leipsic, and Hanover, he arrived at Hamelin October 3, and had several interviews with George the Second, who was there at that time He now departed for England, where, during his absence, he had not been neglected, for, in July 1739, he was made colonel of horse and adjutant-general, on October 25 of the same year, colonel of the 42d Highlanders, and December 25, 1740, colonel of the grenadier guards

In May 1742 he went for relief to the baths of Bareges in France, where he arrived June 12, and after frequent bathing, on July 12, three years after he had received his wound, he was able to walk about with one crutch and a high-heeled shoe He left Bareges September 25, and after visiting the king of Sardinia at Chambery, proceeded to Geneva Afterwards passing through Milan, Genoa, Modena, Verona, and Venice, he travelled by Trieste, Gratz, Lintz, and through Bohemia and Saxony, to Hochstet, where he joined the British army, of which field-marshal the earl of Stair was commander, May 24, 1743, George the Second being also there at the time At the battle of Dettingen, fought June 16, the earl of Crawford commanded the brigade of life guards, and behaved with his usual coolness and intrepidity After encouraging his men by a short speech, he led them to the charge, the trumpets at the time playing the animating strain of "Britons, strike home" At the beginning of the battle his lordship had a narrow escape, a musket ball having struck his right holster, penetrated the leather, and hitting the barrel of the pistol it contained, fell into the case without doing him any injury The earl showed the ball to King George next day at Hanau, where his majesty, on seeing him approach, exclaimed, "Here comes my champion!"

Having been promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, his lordship joined the combined armies in camp near Brussels, in the beginning of May 1744 At the battle of Fontenoy, April 30, 1745, he behaved with great gallantry and judgment, and conducted the retreat in admirable order Of this battle he wrote a very interesting memoir, described by General Andreossi "as essential to the history of that war" The earl was made major-general May 30 following

On the breaking out of the rebellion in Scotland, in 1745, his lordship was ordered home, to take the command of the corps of six thousand Hessians, employed by government in that service With these troops he secured the towns of Stirling and Perth, with the passes into the low country, while the duke of Cumberland proceeded north after the rebels On this visit to his native country the earl formed the acquaintance of Lady Jane Murray, eldest daughter of the duke of Athole, whom he married at Belford, in England, March 3, 1747 When the rebellion was suppressed, his lordship rejoined the army in the Netherlands, and at the battle of Roucoux, October 1, 1746, he commanded the second line of cavalry, which drove back the French infantry with great slaughter Previous to the battle, being out with a few other gentlemen reconnoitring, he was very nearly surprised by a party of the enemy, had not his own admirable presence of mind saved him and those who attended him from the danger Upon his lordship and his friends coming in their view which was not until they were close upon them the French party immediately levelled, and presented their pieces to fire His aide-de-camp and another gentleman had mistaken them for Austrian troops, and were riding up to them to let them know they were friends, when his lordship, discovering them to be French, and finding it too late to retreat, at once resolved upon personating a French general, and riding boldly up to them, he said in French to the officer, "Ne tire pas, nous

sommes amis" (Don't fire, we are friends), and without giving him time to ask any questions, proceeded to demand the name of his regiment The officer replied, "The regiment of Orleans," on which his lordship said in French, "It is very well, keep a good look-out with your post I am going a little farther to reconnoitre the enemy more distinctly" He then rode off quietly, followed by his friends, and when fairly out of reach, they clapped spurs to their horses, and so got safely to their own quarters In 1743, the earl had been made colonel of the fourth or Scottish troop of horse guards, and on its being disbanded in 1746, the command of the 25th foot was given to him, December 25th of that year He got the command of the Scots Greys on the death of the earl of Stair, May 22, 1747, and on the 26th of September following, he attained the rank of lieutenant-general

At the conclusion of the campaign he went to Aix la-Chapelle, for the benefit of the baths His wound again breaking out, occasioned him much suffering, and while confined to his bed, his countess was seized with a violent fever, of which she died, after four days' illness, October 10, 1747, seven months after her marriage, and before she had completed her twentieth year At the opening of the campaign of 1748, the earl joined the duke of Cumberland and the confederate army at Eyndoven, and remained with them till the conclusion of peace in that year He commanded the embarkation of the British troops at Williamstadt, February 16, 1749, and then returned to London, where after suffering the most excruciating tortures from his wound, he died, December 25, 1749, in the 48th year of his age Having no issue, the earldoms of Crawford and Lindsay devolved on his cousin George, viscount of Garnock, as above mentioned His Life, by Richard Rolt, was published at London in 1753 in quarto, printed for Mr Henry Kopp, his faithful servant, who brought him off the field of battle when wounded so severely at Kiotzka

His lordship has been admitted into Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, in virtue of the following work

Memoirs of the life of the late Right Honourable John earl of Crawford, describing many of the highest military atchievements in the late wars, more particularly the campaigns against the Turks, wherein his lordship served both in the Imperial and Russian armies Compiled from his lordship's own papers and other authentic memoirs London, 1769, 8vo

CRAWFORD (properly Craufurd), ROBERT, a distinguished general of division, third son of Sir Alexander Craufurd, baronet, of Kilburnie, Stirlingshire, entered the army young, and on 1st November 1787, was appointed captain of the 75th Highlanders, with which he served in India In the short interval of peace following on the treaty of Amiens, signed March 27, 1802, he visited the continent to improve himself in the scientific branches of his profession He afterwards again served in India In the end of October 1806, having now attained the rank of major-general, he was sent out to South America with the command of an expedition, consisting of four thousand two hundred men, destined originally to effect the conquest of Chili, but on the arrival of the news of the expulsion of the British from Buenos Ayres, ordered to that city to serve with the force under General Whitelocke In May 1807 they reached that city, when the inhabitants attacked the British troops with such fury that a third part of them were destroyed, and Crawford and three regiments taken prisoners Whitelocke concluded an unfavourable and disgraceful capitulation, in virtue of which the prisoners were restored and the whole British troops were withdrawn from the river Plata Crawford afterwards distinguished himself greatly in the Peninsula At the battle of Roleia (17th August, 1808), where the British and French were for the first time opposed to each other, he led one of the divisions of the right wing He was also at the battle of Vimeira fought on the 21st of the same month From that time till he received his death-wound at Ciudad Rodrigo in January 1812, at the head of his division, he commanded the advance of the army in pursuits, its rear-guard in retreats, its outposts when in position, and its detached corps, when such by any chance was needed, nor, in any of these situations, did he fail to earn the decided approbation of Lord Wellington Indeed, in point of intelligence and military skill he was regarded as second only to that great commander, and his unremitting attention to the wants of the troops under his charge secured for him both their attachment and their respect

In the army of Sir John Moore he had the command of the light brigade In the memorable retreat upon Corunna, in December 1808, the hazardous operation of crossing the Esla on the road to Benevente, then a roaring torrent swollen by melting snow, and over planks laid across the broken arches of the bridge of Castro, in the dark, was successfully performed by General Crauford with the rear-guard, after which he blew up the bridge He was subsequently sent by Sir John Moore with three thousand men, on the road to Vigo, to secure that port for the embarkation of the troops, should it be found impossible to do so at Corunna With these General Crauford joined the army under Wellington, the morning after the battle of Talavera This gallant band, at the distance of nearly sixty miles from the field of battle, were met by several Spanish runaways from the action of the 27th (July 1809), with tidings that the British were defeated and Lord Wellington killed Withdrawing fifty of the weakest from his ranks, Crauford hurried on with the remainder, and reached Talavera at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 29th, having marched sixty-two English miles in twenty-six hours This march, says Alison, deserves to be noted as the most rapid made by any foot soldiers of any nation during the whole war

After the surrender to the French of Ciudad Rodrigo, July 10, 1810, Wellington found it necessary to retreat before the superior force of Massena He had commanded the advanced guard under General Crauford to fall back, which they did after making a gallant resistance, and on the 16th they took shelter under the guns of Almeida In the retreat he commanded the rear-guard, four thousand five hundred strong, and on the 24th of July he was assailed on the banks of the Coa by a French force of twenty thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry, with thirty guns, and after a bloody combat of two hours, a heavy rain separated the contending parties, and Crauford retired with his division to the main body of the army In this contest, a loss of about five hundred men was sustained on both sides As this engagement took place in opposition to positive orders of Wellington, to avoid fighting under their then circumstances, it created some discussion at the time, and General Crauford published his own statement of the affair in one of the newspapers, in reply to a boasting official despatch of Massena The Sierra de Busaco was considered by Wellington a favourable position for checking the pursuit, and there, on September 27, a battle took place Three divisions of Ney's corps advanced on Crauford's division He commanded part of them to withdraw behind the crest of the ridge whereon they had been formed, while he remained in front, alone, observing the enemy On the approach of the French he gave the word to charge, when two regiments, the 43d and 52d, concealed behind the hollow, obeyed his command, and the French were bravely repulsed That same night he drove the enemy from the village where they had taken up their quarters, after first sending them a polite message desiring them to retire He also distinguished himself at Fuentes d'Onore, May 5, 1811, and Wellington's despatch contained his well-deserved eulogy

After the combat of El Bodon, September 24, 1811, the British troops were ordered to be concentrated around Fuente Guinaldo Crauford, eager for fighting, remained with his division all night sixteen miles off, while only fifteen thousand men under Wellington were collected in front of the whole French army under Marmont, sixty thousand strong It was only next day at three o'clock that Crauford's division arrived When he came back, Wellington only said, "I am glad to see you safe, Crauford" The latter replied, "Oh! I was in no danger, I assure you" "But I was from your conduct," said his lordship In any other officer such a neglect to obey orders would not have been overlooked

At the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo, on the 19th January 1812, General Crauford was at the head of his division, directing his men, when a musket-ball took his left arm, and, penetrating into his side, lodged in the lungs He fell back into the arms of one of his soldiers, and was instantly carried to the rear, where the medical attendants bled him twice He then dropped into a slumber, from which he did not awake till long after dawn next day He never entertained an idea of his recovery, and when General Stewart, who remained constantly with him, and others of his attendants, talked of future operations, he shook his head, and replied in a feeble voice, that his futurity, at least upon earth, would be of short duration On the 23d, the pain of his wound abated, and he spoke, from that moment, with greater composure and apparent ease, his conversation being chiefly of his wife and children He repeatedly entreated his aide-de-camp to inform his wife that "he was sure they would meet in heaven," and that there was "a providence over all which never yet forsook, and never would forsake, the soldier's widow and orphans" About two o'clock on the morning of the 24th he fell into another deep sleep, from which he never awoke He was buried, on the evening of the same day, at the foot of the breach which his division had so gallantly carried His funeral was attended by Lord Wellington, General Castanos, Marshal Beresford, and a number of staff and other officers He had introduced a system of discipline into the light division, which he had so long commanded, that made it unrivalled in the army

General Crauford married Bridget, daughter of Henry Holland, Esq, and had three sons, Charles, Robert, and Henry A monument, by Bacon, junior, has been erected to his memory, and that of Major-general Mackinnon, who also fell at Ciudad Rodrigo, in St Paul's Cathedral, London

Between Sir Thomas Picton and General Crauford there was always a great rivalry They were, says a veteran who knew them well, not formed by nature to act cordially together The stern countenance, robust frame, saturnine complexion, caustic speech, and austere demeanour of the first, promised little sympathy with the short thick figure, dark flashing eyes, quick movements, and fiery temper of the second, nor, indeed, did they often meet without a quarrel Nevertheless, they had many points of resemblance in their character and fortunes Both were inclined to harshness and rigid in command, both prone to disobedience, yet exacting entire submission from inferiors, and they were both alike ambitious and craving of glory They both possessed decided military talents—were enterprising and intrepid, yet neither was remarkable for skill in handling troops under fire This also they had in common, they both, after distinguished services, perished in arms fighting gallantly, and being celebrated as generals of division

CRAWFURD, Quentin, a learned writer, was a native of Scotland, but resided many years in France, and died at Paris in 1819 He was the author of

Sketches relating to the History, Religion, Learning, and Manners of the Hindoos Lond 1792, 2 vols 8vo

Essai sur la Litterature Française Paris, 1803 2 vols 4to

Melanges d Hist et de Litt, &c 1809, 4to

CRAWFURD, Archibald, a minor poet, was born, of humble parentage, in the town of Ayr, about 1779 After receiving the mere rudiments of English reading, when only thirteen years of age he went to London to learn the trade of a baker with the husband of his sister After an absence of eight years he returned to his native town, and, at the age of twenty-two, attended the classes of the writing-master in Ayr academy for a quarter of a year, which was all the instruction he ever received in penmanship He then proceeded to Edinburgh, and obtained employment with a gentleman of the name of Charles Hay, Esq, with whom he remained for several years, and who indulged him with free access to his extensive library Hence, he soon became acquainted with the best English writers, particularly in the departments of history and the drama On quitting Edinburgh, Mr Crawfurd next engaged in the family of Leith Hay, Esq, at one time member of parliament for Perth, in whose service he continued for upwards of five years It was on a daughter of this gentleman that he wrote his popular song of 'Bonnie Mary Hay,' set to music by R A Smith It originally appeared in the Ayr and Wigtonshire Courier, and he afterwards introduced it into his tale of 'The Huntly Casket' This sweet little lyric was composed as a grateful acknowledgment of the kindness experienced at the hand of the young lady, while the author was suffering under typhus fever

Having saved a little money from his earnings, about 1811 he returned to Ayr, and entered into business as a grocer This speculation, however, proved unsuccessful, and after struggling for a year or two, he was compelled to compound with his creditors He then became an auctioneer, took a small shop for the sale of furniture, got married, and soon saw his children growing up around him It was not till a late period of his life that he ventured on authorship During the political excitement of 1819, he produced a satirical pamphlet, published anonymously, entitled 'St James' in an uproar,' of which not less than three thousand copies were sold in Ayr and the neighbourhood This production having attracted the notice of the authorities, the printer was apprehended, and compelled to give bail for his appearance, but luckily no prosecution followed To the columns of the Ayr and Wigtonshire Courier, a journal of moderate politics commenced in 1819, Mr Crawfurd contributed several pieces both in prose and verse, and particularly his 'Tales of my Grandmother,' the principal portion of which first appeared in that newspaper At this period he occupied a small furniture shop in the High Street of Ayr, with a single apartment in the back premises for the accommodation of his family In this room, under the most discouraging circumstances, were the greater part of his tales and poetry composed Urged by his friends, Crawfurd commenced taking the names of subscribers for a volume of his 'Tales of my Grandmother,' which was printed at the press of the 'Ayr Courier' in 1824 This edition being cancelled, the work, with some additional tales, was published by Messrs A Constable and Co of Edinburgh, with whose imprint it appeared in 1825 in two volumes 12mo It was well received by the public, and flatteringly noticed in most of the literary journals of the day The tales are chiefly founded on traditions familiar in the west of Scotland, told in a brief sketchy style, and with considerable dramatic effect Scattered through the volumes are some very pretty verses The crisis of 1826 having caused the bankruptcy of Messrs Constable and Co, their bill for payment of his portion of the profit was unpaid, and instead of making a profit he lost twenty-four pounds by the transaction

Shortly after, Mr Crawfurd, in conjunction with one or two literary friends, commenced a small weekly periodical in Ayr, under the title of 'The Correspondent,' the price of which was three halfpence, being among the first of the modern cheap publications It met with great encouragement, but a misunderstanding amongst the parties concerned led to its discontinuance He subsequently brought out a periodical on his own account, entitled 'The Gaberlunzie,' which continued for a few months This little production contained several interesting tales and some poetry of a superior order from his pen Amongst the latter of these, the song 'Scotland, I have no home but thee,' afterwards set to music, soon became popular His later years were spent in the exercise of his business as an auctioneer, while in his leisure hours he continued to indulge his fancy in tale-writing, with an occasional poetical production He died at Ayr in 1843

CREECH, a surname supposed to be derived from land There are two parishes of the name, one in Fife and one in Sutherland, but spelled Creich or Creich The name may perhaps be a corruption of carche, stony, from car, a stone or rock, and iche, a Gothic termination signifying abundance, as l'eniche, a local name in Portugal and Spain, signifying full of pinnated rocks Carriches is a town in Spain Iche is the same as the modern termination ish When the rocks are large, the augmentative ac or accas is used, as Caracas, (the district of large rocks) a province of Venezuela in South America, Caraca, a mountain of Brazil, and La Carraca, a rocky island in Spain, near Cadiz, which gave name to the caracas, or heavy ships of burden, of which it was the station

CREECH, WILLIAM, an eminent publisher and bookseller, son of the Rev William Creech, minister of Newbattle, and of Mary Buley, an English lady, was born April 21, 1745 After receiving his education at the school of Dalkeith, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, with a view to the medical profession But preferring to be a bookseller, he was bound apprentice to Mr Kincaid, subsequently lord provost of Edinburgh In 1766 he went to London for improvement, and afterwards spent some time in Holland and Paris, returning to Edinburgh in 1768 In 1770 he accompanied Lord Kilmaurs, son of the earl of Glencairn, in a tour to the continent On his return in 1771, he entered into partnership with his former master, Mr Kincaid, who in 1773 withdrew from the firm, and the whole devolving on Mr Creech, he conducted the business for forty-four years with singular enterprise and success For a long period the shop occupied by him, situated in the centre of the High Street, was the resort of most of the clergy and professors, and other pub lic men and eminent authors in the Scottish metropolis, and his breakfast-room was a sort of literary lounge, which was known by the name of "Creech's Levee"

Mr Creech filled the office of lord provost of Edinburgh from 1811 to 1813, and was elected a fellow of the royal society of Scotland He carried on a considerable correspondence with many eminent literary men both in Scotland and England, and on him Burns wrote his well-known poem of 'Willie's awa',' on occasion of his having gone to London for some time in May 1787 Mr Creech died unmarried, January 14, 1815, in the 70th year of his age During one period of his life he was fond of contributing essays and sketches of character and manners to the Edinburgh newspapers These he collected into a volume, and published under the name of 'Fugitive Pieces' in 1791 They were republished after his death, with some additions, a short account of his life, and a portrait

CRICHTON, a surname assumed from the barony of that name in the county of Edinburgh, and amongst the first mentioned by historians in the reign of Malcolm the Third To the charter of erection of the abbacy of Holyroodhouse by King David the First, Thurstanus de Creichton is a witness William de Crichton is mentioned as dominus de Crichton about 1210 Thomas de Crichton, supposed to be his son, was one of those barons who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296 By Eda his wife he had three sons William, the second son, acquired by marriage with Isabel de Ross, one of the two daughters and coheiresses of Robert de Ross (a cadet of the earls of Ross, lords of the Isles), half of the barony of Sanquhar in Dumfries-shire The other half was subsequently purchased by his successors, and it became the chief title of the family Sir Robert de Crichton of Sanquhar, a descendant of this William de Crichton, had charters of the barony of Sanquhar, and of the office of sheriff of the county of Dumfries, 23d April 1464, of the lands of Kilock, 21st October same year, and of the office of coroner of Nithsdale, 8th January 1468-9 His eldest son, Sir Robert Crichton of Sanquhar, signalized himself at Lochmaben against the duke of Albany and the earl of Douglas, when they invaded Scotland in 1484 He was created a peer of parliament by the title of Lord Crichton of Sanquhar, by King James the Third, 29th January, 1487-8, and died in 1502 See SANQUHAR, Lord The title is now merged in the earldom of Dumfries [see DUMFRIES, earl of], now held by the marquis of Bute [See BUTE, marquis of, ante, page 515]

The name Crichton may probably be a corruption of Caer-ric-ton, (as Cramond is of Caer-almond,) and be therefore a variety of Ric-caer-ton,—the stone place of the Ric-ton, or rich land. Many local names appear in the Lothians to be corruptions of Caer or place of stones

CRICHTON, Lord, a title conferred in 1445, on Sir William Crichton, lord high chancellor of Scotland, of whom a memoir is subsequently given in larger type He was a descendant of the above-mentioned William de Crichton and the son of Sir John Crichton, who obtained a charter of the barony of Crichton from King Robert the Third His cousin, Sir George de Crichton, high admiral of Scotland, (designed son and heir of Stephen Crichton of Cairns, brother of the said Sir John Crichton,) was in 1452 created earl of Caithness, the honours being limited to the heirs male of his own body by his second wife, Janet Borthwick He died in 1455, without issue of his second marriage, and the title became extinct in his family (see CAITHNESS, earl of, ante, p 521) The first Lord Crichton had a son and two daughters

James, the son second Lord Crichton, was knighted by James the First, at the baptism of his eldest son in 1430 He married Lady Janet Dunbar, eldest daughter and coheiress of James earl of Moray, with whom he got the barony of Frendraught in Banffshire, but the earldom of Moray was, to his prejudice, bestowed on Archibald Douglas, (third son of the seventh earl of Douglas,) who had married the younger sister of his wife Under the designation of Sir James Crichton of Frendraught, he was appointed great chamberlain of Scotland in 1440, and he held that office till 1453 He died about 1469 He had three sons, William, Gavin, and George

William, the third lord, joined the duke of Albany in his rebellion against his brother, James the Third, and garrisoned his castle of Crichton in his behalf He was in consequence attainted for treason, by parliament, 24th February 1483–4 His brothers were also forfeited for joining in the same rebellion On his forfeiture, his castle of Crichton, a very ancient and magnificent structure, the ruins of which overhang a beautiful little glen through which the Tyne slowly meanders, was granted to Sir John Ramsay of Balmain From him it afterwards passed, by forfeiture, to Patrick Hepburn, chief of that name, and third Lord Hales, ancestor of the celebrated James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, the husband of Mary queen of Scots. On the forfeiture of this last nobleman in 1567, Crichton became the property of the Crown, but was granted to Francis Stewart, earl of Bothwell It subsequently passed through the hands of several proprietors, from one of whom, Hepburn of Humbie, who acquired it about the year 1649, it obtained the name, among the country people, of 'Humbie's Wa's' In the fourth canto of Marmion, Sir Walter Scott has minutely described this relic of the feudal ages

The third lord had married Margaret, second daughter of King James the Second, and had, with a daughter, a son, Sir James Crichton of Frendraught The direct descendant of the latter, in the fifth generation, James Crichton of Frendraught was, in 1642, created Viscount Frendraught and Lord Crichton, in consideration of his father being heir-male of Lord-chancellor Crichton See FRENDRAUGHT, viscount of

The other principal families of the name were Crichton of Cranston, descended from Frendraught, (David Crichton of Cranston was one of the commissioners nominated by King James the Third, in his treaty of marriage with Margaret daughter of the king of Denmark), Crichton of Ruthven, descended from the second son of Stephen Crichton of Cairns abovementioned, Crichton of Easthill, Crichton of Naughton, Crichton of Cluny, Crichton of Invernyty, Crichton of Brunston, Crichton of Lugdon, and Crichton of Crawfordtoun

George Crichton, a son of Crichton of Naughton, became bishop of Dunkeld in 1525, having previously been abbot of Holyroodhouse According to Spotswood, he succeeded the celebrated Gavin Douglas in that see, but this is a mistake, as another prelate, named Robert Cockburn, intervened between them In the beginning of 1527, he was one of the bishops present at St Andrews at the condemnation of Patrick Hamilton, the protomartyr In 1529, he is said to have been lord privy seal, and to have held the same office in the beginning of 1539 He appears as an extraordinary lord of session in the sitting of that court, November 17, 1538 He died on 24th January 1543-4, having previously transmitted to the pope a resignation of his bishopric in favour of his nephew Robert Crichton, then provost of St Giles It was this bishop of Dunkeld that in 1539, on the examination of Dean Thomas Forret, vicar of Dollar, accused of heresy, said he thanked God that he never knew what the old and the new Testament was, and that he would know nothing but his breviary and his pontifical! His nephew, Robert Crichton, notwithstanding his uncle's resignation in his favour, and his own application, was prevented from immediately succeeding to the see, by the stronger influence of the earl of Arran, governor of the kingdom, upon whose natural brother, John Hamilton, it was conferred, but on his translation to the archbishopric of St Andrews in 1550, Crichton was promoted to Dunkeld, and continued bishop there till the establishment of the Reformed religion in 1560 At the parliament, wherein the Confession of Faith was ratified, 17th July of that year, he was one of the three popish bishops who were present In 1567 he was appointed a commissioner for divorcing the earl of Bothwell from Lady Jane Gordon

Robert Crichton of Elliock, the father of the admirable Crichton, (of whom a memoir is hereafter given in its place,) having been educated for the bar, was appointed lord advocate, jointly with John Spens of Condie, 8th February 1560 He appears to have been favourable to Queen Mary's cause in the beginning of her son's reign and was sent for by that unfortunate princess into England after the death of the regent Murray, but was prevented from going by the regent Lennox who made him find caution to the extent of four thousand pounds Scots that he would not leave Edinburgh On the death in January 1581, of David Borthwick of Lochill, who had succeeded Spens as his colleague, and was appointed a lord of session in October 1573, Crichton was nominated his successor on the bench, and at the same time was constituted sole lord advocate He took his seat 1st February 1581 In the same year he was appointed one of the parliamentary commissioners for the reformation of hospitals He died in June 1582

An account of the feud betwixt the Crichtons and the Maxwells the two most powerful barons in Nithsdale, will be found under the head of SANQUHAR, lord In 1512, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, ancestor of the noble house of Queensberry, accused of the slaughter of Robert Crichton of Kilpatrick, on the complaint of Robert Lord Crichton of Sanquhar, pleaded that the person killed was at the time a declared rebel and at his majesty's horn when the jury delivered a verdict freeing him and his accomplices from the charge This case is thought to have given rise to the subsequent "Act anent the Resset of Rebellis," &c, in which it is expressly stated that "gif ony persons happins to committ slaughter upone the said rebellis and persons being at the horne, the tym of the taking or apprehending of them, sal be no point of dittay (indictment), bot the slaaris of them to be rewardit and thankit tharfore" On October 24, 1526, Andrew Crichton of Crawfordtoun, John Crichton of Kilpatrick and forty-six others, were denounced rebels and put to the horn for not appearing to underly the law for the convocation of the leges in great numbers in arms, and attacking Archibald earl of Angus and James earl of Arran, his majesty's lieutenants, near the church of Linlithgow, for their slaughter and destruction On November 24th 1536, Marjota Home countess of Crawford the widow of that earl who was slain at Flodden, and Patrick Crichton of Camnay, with seventeen others, found caution (namely, Sir John Stirling of Keir, and John Crichton of Cranstoun) to satisfy John Moncur of Balluny, for seizing a "wayne" or waggon from him, with four oxen and two horses, and on the 12th December following, the same John Moncur, with Mariota Douglas, his wife, and four others, found caution to underly the law at the next justice-aire of Perth, for oppression done to the countess of Crawford, in breaking up the soil and ditches of her lands of Potento, and wounding her in the throat. This shows a strange state of society at that period

One of the leading friends of Wishart the martyr and most resolute conspirators against Cardinal Bethune, was Crichtor of Brunston in Mid Lothian He had been at one time a familiar and confidential servant of the cardinal, who, on the 10th of December 1539, intrusted him with secret letters to Rome, which were intercepted by Henry the Eighth He next attached himself to Arran the governor, who employed him in diplomatic missions to France and England He afterwards gained the confidence of Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador in Scotland, to whom he furnished secret intelligence, and subsequently entered into correspondence with King Henry himself On the 17th of April 1544, the Lord of Brunston is said to have engaged in that secret correspondence with Henry the Eighth, in which, on certain conditions, he offered to procure the assassination of Bethune Tytler paints his character in very dark colours, but his representations should undoubtedly be taken with considerable reservation [See his History of Scotland, vol v Appendix, p 453] Among others who were banished by the regent Arran, and his natural brother, the archbishop of St Andrews, for alleged crimes against the state, but in reality on account of their professing the reformed religion, was Crichton of Brunston Soon after the assassination of the cardinal he was indicted on a charge of treason, but the process against him was afterwards withdrawn

The family of Makgill of Rankeillor in Fife, assumed the additional surname of Crichton in 1839, in consequence of the then proprietor of that estate, David Maitland Makgill-Crichton, being, in June of that year, served heir of line in general to the first Viscount Frendraught, his ancestor, Sir James Makgill of Rankeillor, having married, in 1665 the Hon Janet Crichton, daughter of the first viscount [See FRENDRAUGHT, viscount of, and MAKGILL, surname of]

The noble family of Crichton, who enjoy the earldom of Erne, in the peerage of Ireland, are also descended from a branch of the house of Frendraught in the Scottish peerage

CRICHTON, SIR WILLIAM, chancellor of Scotland during the minority of James the Second, was a personage of great abilities and political address In 1423 he proceeded to Durham, with other barons, to conduct James the First home after his long captivity At the coronation of his majesty in 1424, he was knighted, and appointed chamberlain to the king On 8th May 1426, a commission was issued constituting him and two others ambassadors to treat with Eric, king of Norway, for a lasting peace, and soon after his return home, he was appointed one of the king's privy council, and master of the household On the accession of James the Second, he was in possession of the castle of Edinburgh Between him and Sir Alexander Livingston, of Callendar, there was an unhappy rivalship, which weakened the authority of the government During the two years succeeding his coronation the young king continued to reside entirely in the castle of Edinburgh, under the care of Crichton, its governor, greatly to the displeasure of the queen and her party, who thus found him placed entirely beyond their control She accordingly visited Edinburgh, professing great friendship for Sir William Crichton, and a longing desire to see her son, by which means she completely won the good will of the former, and obtained ready access with her retinue, to visit the prince in the castle and take up her abode there At length, having lulled all suspicion, she gave out that she had made a vow to pass in pilgrimage to the white kirk of Brechin for the health of her son, and bidding adieu to the governor over night, with many earnest recommendations of the young king to his fidelity and care, she retired to her devotions Immediately on being left at liberty, the young king was cautiously pinned up among the linen and furniture of his mother, and so conveyed in a chest to Leith, and thence by water to Stirling, and placed in the hands of Livingston Immediately thereafter, the latter raised an army and laid siege to Crichton in the castle of Edinburgh, on which he applied to the earl of Douglas for assistance, when that chief replied that he was an enemy to both parties, and in consequence refused his aid Thereupon Crichton and Livingston became reconciled to each other, and having deprived Cameron, bishop of Glasgow, a partisan of the house of Douglas, of the office of chancellor, it was conferred upon Crichton, while Livingston obtained the guardianship of the king's person, and the chief management in the government Soon after, however, Crichton seized the person of the young monarch in the royal park at Stirling, while proceeding to the chase, and removed him to Edinburgh castle, but a second reconciliation took place between him and Livingston Douglas died in 1439, and owing to the overgrown power of his son who succeeded him, it was resolved to get rid of him by summary means With this view he invited him to attend a parliament then about to be held at Edinburgh, and having inveigled him and his brother into the castle, ordered them to be executed on the Castle-hill This took place in 1440 The new earl of Douglas having been reconciled to James, and admitted into the royal councils, Crichton immediately fled to the castle of Edinburgh, on which he was denounced as a rebel, and his estates confiscated Douglas laid siege to the castle, and after an investment of nine weeks, Crichton entered into a treaty with Livingston and Douglas, and surrendered it to the king In 1445 he was created Lord Crichton, and in 1448 he was sent on an embassy to France, to treat with Arnold, duke of Gueldres, for the marriage of his daughter Mary with his royal master, now in his eighteenth year He accompanied the bride to Holyrood, where the nuptials were solemnized with much pomp Douglas afterwards endeavoured to assassinate the chancellor, who continued to enjoy the king's confidence and favour till his death in 1454

CRICHTON, JAMES, styled "The Admirable," from his extraordinary endowments both mental and physical, was the son of Robert Crichton of Eliock, lord advocate of Scotland in the reigns of Queen Mary and James the Sixth, and was born in 1557, or, according to some accounts, in 1560 His mother was Elizabeth Stewart, a descendant, through Andrew Stewart, Lord Avondale, of the family of Stewart of Morphie, founded by Walter Stewart, sixth son of Sir James the Gross, fourth son of Murdoch, duke of Albany Eliock-house, on Eliock-burn, Dumfries-shire, is said to have been the birthplace of the Admirable Crichton, and the apartment in which he was born is carefully preserved in its original state Soon after his birth, his father sold Eliock to the Dalzells, afterwards earls of Carnwath, and removed to an estate which he had acquired in the parish of Clunie in Perthshire, a circumstance which has occasioned the castle of Clunie to be mistaken as the place of his nativity He received the rudiments of his education at Perth school, and completed his studies at the university of St Andrews, where he took his degree of M A at the age of fourteen Before he was twenty, he had mastered the whole circle of the sciences, and could speak and write ten different languages besides his own He also excelled in riding, dancing, fencing, painting, singing, and playing on all sorts of instruments On leaving college he went abroad to improve himself by travel On his arrival at Paris, in compliance with a custom of the age, he affixed placards on the gates of the university, challenging the professors and learned men of the city to dispute with him in all the branches of literature, art, and science, and offering to give answers in any of the following languages, viz Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, Latin, Spanish, French, Italian, English, Dutch, Flemish, and Sclavonic, and either in prose or verse, at the option of his antagonist On the day appointed three thousand auditors assembled. Fifty masters proposed to him the most intricate questions, and with singular accuracy he replied to them all in the language they required Four celebrated doctors of the church then ventured to dispute with him, but he refuted every argument they advanced A sentiment of terror mingled itself with the admiration of the assembly In the superstitious feeling of those days they conceived him to be Antichrist! This famous exhibition lasted from nine o'clock in the morning till six at night At the conclusion, the president expressed, in the most flattering terms, their high sense of his talents and erudition, and amid the acclamations of all present, bestowed on him a diamond ring with a purse of gold It was on this occasion that he was first saluted with the proud title of "The Admirable Crichton!" During the interval between giving the challenge, and the day appointed for accepting it, we are told, that so far from preparing himself by study, he had devoted his time almost entirely to amusements The day after the disputation, he attended a public tilting match in the Louvre, and in presence of the princes of France and a great many ladies, bore away the ring fifteen times, and "broke as many lances on the Saracen"

Crichton afterwards appeared at Rome, and disputed in presence of the Pope, when he again astonished and delighted the audience by the universality of his attainments He next went to Venice, where, becoming acquainted with Aldus Manutius, the younger, he inscribed to him one of the four little Latin poems, which are all that remain to prove the poetical powers of this "prodigy of nature," as he was styled by Imperialis Having been presented to the doge and senate, he made an oration before them of surpassing eloquence Here also he disputed on the most difficult subjects before the most eminent literati of that city

He arrived in Padua in the month of March 1581 The professors of that university assembled to do him honour, and on being introduced to them, he made an extemporary poem in praise of the city, the university, and the persons present, after which he sustained a disputation with them for six hours, and at the conclusion delivered an unpremeditated speech in praise of Ignorance, to the astonishment of all who heard him

He subsequently offered to point out before the same university the innumerable errors in the philosophy of Aristotle, and to expose the ignorance of his commentators, as well as to refute the opinions of certain celebrated mathematicians, and that in the common logical method, or by numbers or mathematical figures, and by a hundred different kinds of verses, and we are assured that he performed that stupendous task to the admiration of every one After defeating in disputation a famous philosopher named Archangelus Mercenarius, he proceeded to Mantua, where he challenged in fight a gladiator, or prize-fighter, who had foiled the most expert fencers in Europe, and had already slain three persons who had entered the lists with him in that city On this occasion the duke and the whole court were spectators of the combat Crichton encountered his antagonist with so much dexterity and vigour that he ran him through the body in three different places, of which wounds he immediately expired The victor generously bestowed the prize, fifteen hundred pistoles, on the widows of the men who had been killed by the gladiator The duke of Mantua, struck with his talents and acquirements, appointed him tutor to his son, Vincentio di Gonzaga, a prince of turbulent disposition and licentious manners For the entertainment of his patron he composed a comedy, described as a sort of ingenious satire on the follies and weaknesses of mankind, in which he himself personated fifteen characters But his career was drawing to a close One night during the festivity of the Carnival in July 1582, or 1583, while he rambled about the streets playing upon the guitar, he was attacked by six persons in masks With consummate skill he dispersed his assailants, and disarmed their leader, who, pulling off his mask, begged his life, exclaiming, "I am the prince, your pupil!" Crichton immediately fell upon his knees, and presenting his sword to the prince, expressed his sorrow for having lifted it against him, saying that he had been prompted by self-defence The dastardly Gonzaga, inflamed with passion at his discomfiture, or mad with wine, immediately plunged the weapon into his heart Thus prematurely was cut off "the Admirable Crichton" Some accounts declare that he was killed in the thirty-second year of his age, but Imperialis asserts that he was only in his twenty-second year at the time of his death, and this fact is confirmed by Lord Buchan His tragical end excited a great and general lamentation According to Sir Thomas Urquhart, the whole court of Mantua went for nine months into mourning for him, innumerable were the epitaphs and elegies that were stuck upon his hearse, and portraits of him, in which he was represented on horseback with a sword in one hand, and a book in the other, were multiplied in every quarter Such are the romantic details which are given of the life of this literary phenomenon Dr Kippis, in the Biographia Britannica, was the first to call in question the truth of the marvellous stories related of him But Mr Patrick Fraser Tytler, in his Life of Crichton, published in 1823, has adduced the most satisfactory evidence to establish the authenticity of the testimonies and authorities on which the statements regarding Crichton rest

Dr Clarke gives the following list of his works, but does not say when or where they were published

CRICHTON, GEORGE, an author of considerable merit in the seventeenth century, was professor of Greek in the university of Paris He was a native of Scotland, but very little is known of his personal history He wrote several poems and orations in the Latin language

CRICHTON, or CREYGHTON, ROBERT, a learned prelate, was born of an ancient family, at Dunkeld, in Perthshire, in 1593 He was educated at Westminster school, whence, in 1613, he was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and was chosen Greek professor and university orator In 1632 he was made treasurer of the cathedral of Wells, of which he was canon residentiary He was also prebendary of Taunton, and had a living in Somersetshire In 1637 he was admitted to the degree of D D In the beginning of the civil wars he joined the king's troops at Oxford But he was obliged afterwards to escape into Cornwall, in the dress of a day-labourer He subsequently found his way to the Continent, when Charles the Second employed him as his chaplain, and bestowed on him the deanery of Wells, of which he took possession at the restoration In 1670 he was promoted to the see of Bath and Wells, which he held till his death, November 21, 1672 His only publication was a translation from Greek into Latin of Sylvester Sguiopulus's History of the Council of Florence, printed at the Hague, 1660 Wood says some of his Sermons were also in print

CROMARTY, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland (attainted in 1746) conferred in 1703 on Sir George Mackenzie of Tarbat, descended from a branch of the ancient family of Mackenzie of Kintail (see MACKENZIE, surname of) A memoir of the first earl is given at page 731 in larger type His lordship was twice married By his first wife, Anne, daughter of Sir James Sinclair of Mey, baronet, he had, with four daughters, John, second earl, Hon Sir Kenneth Mackenzie of Cromarty, and Hon Sir James Mackenzie of Royston both created baronets the same day, 8th February 1704 The latter became an advocate on 19th November 1698, and on the resignation of his uncle (Roderick Mackenzie), a lord of session under the title of Lord Prestonhall, he was appointed his successor on the bench, and took his seat 7th June, 1710, as Lord Royston By his second wife, Margaret, countess of Wemyss in her own right, widow of James Lord Burntisland, the first earl of Cromarty had no issue

John, second earl of Cromarty, was member of parliament for the county of Ross, at the date of his father's being raised to the peerage, when the parliament resolved that he could not, in consequence, continue to possess a seat in that house, and a warrant for a new election was, therefore, issued, 23d April 1685 In August 1691, he was tried before the high court of justiciary, for the murder of Elias Poiret, Sieur de la Roche, at Leith, on 8th March preceding, and acquitted He succeeded his father in 1714, and died at Castle-leod, 20th February 1731 He was thrice married By his first wife, Lady Elizabeth Gordon, only daughter of Charles first earl of Aboyne, he had no issue, by his second wife, the Hon Mary Murray, eldest daughter of the third Lord Elibank, he had, with two daughters, George, third earl, and three other sons, Roderick, William, and Patrick, and by his third wife, the Hon Anne Fraser (previously twice a widow), second daughter of Hugh tenth Lord Lovat, he had three sons and a daughter

George, third earl, joined the Pretender in 1745 with about four hundred of his clan, and was at the battle of Falkirk He and his son Lord Macleod were surprised and taken prisoners at Dunrobin castle, by a party of the earl of Sutherland's militia, 15th April 1746, and sent to London, and committed to the Tower With the earl of Kilmarnock and Lord Balmerino, he was on the 28th July following, brought to trial before the House of Lords, when he pleaded guilty, and threw himself entirely on the king's mercy On the 30th, being called up for judgment, he began a humiliating but pathetic appeal, by declaring that he had been guilty of an offence which merited the highest indignation of his majesty, their lordships and the public, and that it was from a conviction of his guilt that he had not presumed to trouble their lordships with any defence "Nothing remains, my lords," he continued, "but to throw myself, my life, and fortune, upon your lordships' compassion," and he earnestly besought them to intercede with his majesty on his behalf On the 1st of August he was sentenced to death, and his estates and honours forfeited He immediately petitioned the king for mercy In support of this application his countess (Isabel daughter of Sir William Gordon of Invergordon, baronet) waited upon the lords of the cabinet council, and on the Sunday following the sentence she went to Kensington palace in deep mourning, to intercede with his majesty in behalf of her husband She took her station in the entrance through which the king was to pass to chapel, and when he approached she fell upon her knees, seized him by the coat, and presenting her supplication, fainted away at his feet The king raised her up, and taking the petition, gave it in charge of the duke of Grafton, one of his attendants. The dukes of Hamilton and Montrose, the earl of Stair, and other courtiers, backed these petitions The king granted a respite to the earl He was permitted to leave the Tower, and to lodge at the house of a messenger, 18th February, 1748 In August following he went to Devonshire, where he was ordered to remain A pardon passed the seals for his lordship, 20th October, 1749, with the condition that he should remain in such place as directed by the king He died in Poland Street, London, 28th September, 1766 He had three sons, and seven daughters His life was published in 1746, in 4to

John, Lord Macleod, the eldest son, was born in 1727 At his trial in London, on 20th December 1746, for his share in the rebellion, he pleaded his youth and his father's example in mitigation of his guilt An unconditional pardon passed the great seal in his favour, 26th January 1748, on which he went abroad in quest of employment in foreign service He sojourned sometime at Berlin with Field-marshal Keith, through whose interest, it is believed, he obtained a commission in the Swedish army At this time his means were so limited that he was unable to equip himself in an officer-like manner, but the Chevalier de St George, on the recommendation of Lord George Murray, generously sent him a sum of money to defray the expenses of his outfit After serving the crown of Sweden for twenty-seven years with distinguished approbation, he obtained the rank of lieutenant-general, and was, by his Swedish majesty, created Count Cromarty, and made one of the commandants of the order of the sword He returned to England in 1777, and was presented to George the Third, who received him very graciously At the suggestion of Colonel Duff of Muirtown, who had served in Keith's Highlanders, he offered his services to raise a regiment, and so great was the influence of his name in the North, that eight hundred and forty Highlanders were enrolled in a very short time, forming two battalions of the 73d, now the 71st, or Glasgow light infantry The first battalion under Lord Macleod, as colonel (commission dated 19th December 1777) embarked for the East Indies in January 1779, the second battalion, under the command of his brother, the Hon Lieutenant-colonel George Mackenzie, was sent to Gibraltar, where it formed part of the garrison during the celebrated siege of that place, which lasted upwards of three years In India Lord Macleod served with the force under Sir Hector Munro, and had the local rank of major-general in 1781 Sometime after the battle of Conjeveram, his lordship took shipping for England, having, it is said, differed in opinion with General Munro on the subject of his movements In 1782 he had the rank of major-general in the army After his return he had the family estates restored to him by act of parliament in 1784, on payment of nineteen thousand pounds of debt affecting that property He died at Edinburgh 2d April 1789 in his sixty-second year, and was buried, with his mother, in the Canongate church-yard, where there is a monument to their memory He had married, 4th June 1786, Margery, eldest daughter of James, sixteenth Lord Forbes, but having no issue by her (who, 11th March 1794, became the second wife of John, fourth duke of Athol) he was succeeded in the family estates by his cousin, Kenneth Mackenzie of Cromertie, son of the Hon Roderick Mackenzie, second son of the second earl This gentleman dying without male issue, 4th November 1796, the Cromarty estates devolved on Lady Elibank (Lady Isabel Mackenzie), eldest sister of Lord Macleod On her death in December 1801, her elder daughter, the Hon Maria Murray, married to Edward Hay of Newhall, the brother of the seventh marquis of Tweeddale, got that extensive property, and her husband assumed the name of Mackenzie in addition to his own They had four children Dorothea, Isabella, Georgina, and John The eldest daughter married, in 1849, the marquis of Stafford and Lord Strathnaver, eldest son of the second duke of Sutherland, who in her right is now in possession of the vast estates formerly belonging to the earl of Cromarty His son and heir, Cromertie, Earl Gower, was born in 1851

CROMARTY, first earl of, an eminent statesman, was the son of Sir John Mackenzie of Tarbat, (created a baronet 21st May 1628,) by Margaret, daughter of Sir George Erskine, (a lord of session under the title of Lord Innerteill,) and was born in 1630 He succeeded his father in 1654, and having applied for and received from Charles the Second, during his exile, a commission to levy forces to promote his restoration, with a large body of men, he, the same year, joined General Middleton, then in arms for the royal cause, and with him carried on for about a year an irregular warfare with the parliamentary forces, but was at last forced to capitulate, in 1655, to Colonel Morgan, when they were obliged to leave the kingdom At the Restoration, Middleton had the chief direction of Scottish affairs, when Mackenzie became his principal confidant On 14th February 1661, he was appointed one of the lords of session, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Tarbat In the Memoirs of his namesake, Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, it is stated that being a violent cavalier, he was the chief instigator of the Act Rescissory, by which the proceedings of all the previous parliaments since 1633, were at once annulled In 1662, he was sent up to court with the famous act of billetting, of which he was the inventor and manager, and the object of which was to get the earl of Lauderdale, the earl of Crawford-Lindsay and ten others declared incapable of holding any office of public trust, but the king refused his assent, and Middleton was dismissed from all share in the administration A particular account of this curious piece of state-craft will be found in Sir George Mackenzie's Memoirs of the affairs of Scotland, and in Burnet's History of His own Times, vol i For his participation in the contrivance, Lord Tarbat was deprived of his seat on the bench on the 16th February 1664, in terms of a letter from the king, dated on the 4th of that month, and he remained without any public employment during the principal part of the long administration of Lauderdale Having eventually become reconciled to that nobleman, by his influence he was restored to the royal favour, and on October 16, 1678, was appointed lord-justice-general of Scotland, an office which had been hereditary in the family of Argyle, till it was surrendered in the preceding year On the 11th November follow ing he was admitted a privy councillor, and next day presented a letter from the king to the court, dated 27th September previous, in which his majesty declares his having pardoned him "for the wrong he had committed in that affair" As the former letter had been recorded in the Books of Sederunt, the king directs that this should be so too He was appointed lord clerk register by patent dated 16th October 1681, and reinstated in his place as a lord of session, on the 1st of the following November

During the last years of Charles the Second, and the whole of the short reign of James the Seventh, he had the chief management of Scottish affairs On 15th February 1685, immediately after the accession of James, he was created viscount of Tarbat, and Lord Macleod and Castlehaven in the Scottish peerage At the revolution he proposed in council to disband the militia, by which artful advice that important matter was accomplished without bloodshed He was one of the first to make advances to King William, having gone to court, where he was well received, but the arbitrary proceedings in the two former reigns in which he had largely shared, had rendered him so odious in Scotland, that his majesty declined his services, and in consequence he lost all his employments On 5th March 1692, however, he was restored to his office of clerk register, but resigned it in the end of 1695, when he received a pension of four hundred a-year He has been accused of having, during the period he held this important office, repeatedly falsified the minutes of parliament, as well as of having issued orders in private causes in name of parliament, which had never been made

On the accession of Queen Anne, Lord Tarbat was sent for to court, appointed one of the principal secretaries of state, and created earl of Cromarty, by patent, dated 1st January 1703 The following year he resigned the office of secretary, and was appointed, in its stead, lord-justice-general, 26th June 1705 This office, in its turn, he resigned in 1710, in favour of Archibald Lord Ilay He was a zealous supporter of the union, and died at New Tarbat, August 17, 1714, in the eighty-fourth year of his age He was a man of superior endowments and great learning, but totally devoid of principle as a statesman In Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors is a portrait of his lordship, from which the annexed woodcut is taken

He was one of the original members of the Royal Society, and contributed some valuable articles to the earlier volumes of the Philosophical Transactions Macky (in his Characters of the Nobility of Scotland, p 188) says that he had a great deal of wit, and was the pleasantest companion in the world, had been very handsome in his person, was tall and fair-complexioned, much esteemed by the Royal Society, a great master in philosophy, and well received as a writer by men of letters The earl of Cromarty was the author of the following works

A Vindication of King Robert III from the Imputation of Bastardy, by the clear proof of Elizabeth Mure (daughter of Sir Adam Mure of Rowallan) her being the first lawful wife of Robert the Second, then Steward of Scotland and Earl of Strathern, by George Viscount of Tarbat, &c In the dedication to the king he says that all the crowned heads in Europe are concerned in this vindication Edinburgh, 1695

CROSSBY a surname originally given to one who dwelt beside the market cross, or near a cross-road In the baronetage of Scotland and Nova Scotia, there is a baronetcy possessed by an Irish family of this name, conferred in 1630 on the son of the bishop of Ardfert, and brother of David Crosbie, ancestor of the ancient earls of Glandore in Ireland

CROSBIE, ANDREW, of Holm, a celebrated advocate, and the original of 'Councillor Pleydell' in Sir Walter Scott's novel of 'Guy Mannering,' was one of the most eminent citizens of Edinburgh during the middle of the eighteenth century On Dr Johnson's visit to the Scottish capital in 1774, he was almost the only one who had the courage to maintain his own opinion against him in conversation Mr Boswell describes him as his "truly learned and philosophical friend," and Mr Croker, in a note, says, "Mr Crosbie, one of the most eminent advocates then at the Scotch bar Lord Stowell recollects that Johnson was treated by the Scotch literati with a degree of deference bordering on pusillanimity, but he excepts from that observation Mr Crosbie, whom he characterizes as an intrepid talker, and the only man who was disposed to stand up (as the phrase is) with Johnson" Mr Crosbie resided at that period in a house in Advocate's Close in the High Street of Edinburgh He afterwards removed to the splendid mansion erected by himself on the east side of St Andrew's Square of that city, which stands the first house to the north of the Royal Bank, and became a principal Hotel, but he was involved, with many others, in the failure of the Douglas and Heron bank at Ayr, in which he had a thousand pounds share, and died in such poverty, in 1785, that his widow owed her sole support to an annuity of fifty pounds granted by the Faculty of Advocates

CRUDEN, a local surname, derived from the parish of Cruden, or Crudane, in the district of Buchan, Aberdeenshire, which is usually supposed to have taken its name from the battle fought there in 1005, by Malcolm the Second and Canute, (afterwards king of England,) son of Sweno, king of Denmark and Norway, although Pinkerton has shown that the alleged Danish wars of Malcolm the Second were mere fabrications of Hector Boece It is more likely to have been derived from Cruthen, the first king of the Picts (commenced his reign A C 28, and reigned twenty-five years), from whom the Irish called the Picts Cruithnich He was sometimes called Crudne, and as the n and ne in Gothic are, after a consonant, pronounced en, we have at once the name Cruden

CRUDEN, ALEXANDER, author of the well-known and most useful 'Concordance of the Bible,' the son of a merchant and bailie of Aberdeen, was born in that city, May 31, 1701 He received his education in the grammar school of his native town, and was entered a student at Marischal college there, but having manifested incipient symptoms of insanity, it was found necessary to place him in confinement On his liberation in 1722 he quitted Aberdeen, and proceeding to London, obtained an appointment as tutor in a family in Hertfordshire, where he continued for several years He was afterwards engaged in the same capacity in the Isle of Man In 1732 he settled in London, where he was employed by Mr Watts, printer, as corrector of the press He also engaged in trade as a bookseller, which he carried on in a shop under the Royal Exchange, and, on the recommendation of the lord mayor and aldermen, was appointed bookseller to the Queen At this time all his leisure was devoted to the compilation of 'A Complete Concordance of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament,' a work which, with great labour and perseverance, he at length accomplished The first edition, dedicated to Queen Caroline, was published in 1737 Her majesty graciously promised to keep him in mind, and perhaps she intended to fulfil her word, but, unfortunately for him, she died suddenly a few days after receiving the book He now shut up his shop; and becoming soon again a prey to his phrenetic disorder, he was confined in a private madhouse at Bethnal Green As soon as he obtained his release, he published a pamphlet, entitled 'The London Citizen exceedingly Injured, or a British Inquisition Displayed,' London, 1739, and also commenced an action against Dr Monro, his physician, and others, for cruelty, which was tried in Westminster Hall, July 1739, when he was nonsuited For the next fifteen years he lived chiefly by correcting the press, and superintended the printing of several of the Greek and Roman Classics In 1753 the return of his malady obliged his relatives to shut him up a third time in a madhouse When he was once more at liberty, he published another pamphlet, entitled 'The Adventures of Alexander the Corrector' In September of that year, he endeavoured to persuade one or two of his friends, who had been instrumental to his confinement, to submit to imprisonment in Newgate, as a compensation for the injuries they had inflicted on him To his sister, Mrs Wild, he proposed what he deemed very mild terms, namely, the payment of a fine of ten pounds, and her choice of Newgate, Reading, and Aylesbury jails, or the prison at Windsor Castle When he found that his persuasions were of no avail, he commenced an action against her and three others, fixing his damages at ten thousand pounds The cause was tried in February 1754, and a verdict again given in favour of the defendants

In accordance with the whimsical title he had assumed of "Alexander the Corrector," he now devoted himself to the task of reforming the manners of the age, maintaining, wherever he went, that he was divinely commissioned to correct public morals, and to restore the due observance of the Sabbath Having published a pamphlet, entitled 'The Second Part of the Adventures of Alexander the Corrector,' he went to present it at court, and was very earnest with the lords in waiting, the secretaries of state, and other persons of rank, that his majesty should confer on him the honour of knighthood At the general election in 1754, he offered himself as a candidate to represent the city of London in parliament Of course, he was disappointed in both these objects Amidst all his eccentricities he lost no opportunity of showing his loyalty He wrote a pamphlet against Wilkes, and went about with a sponge in his hand effacing No 45, the title of that demagogue's obnoxious pamphlet against Scotland, wherever he found it written on the walls, or doors, &c, of the metropolis

In 1762 Mr Cruden, whose benevolence was unwearied, was the means of saving the life of a poor sailor named Richard Potter, who had been capitally convicted at the Old Bailey, for uttering a seaman's will, knowing it to be forged Firmly convinced that he was a fit object for the royal clemency, he never ceased his applications to the secretary of state till he obtained the commutation of the sentence to that of transportation for life In 1763 he published an interesting account of this affair, under the title of the 'History of Richard Potter' In 1769 he revisited Aberdeen, where he remained about a year, during which time he gave a lecture on the necessity of a general reformation of manners, &c On his return to London, he took lodgings in Camden Street, Islington, where, on the morning of November 1, 1770, he was found dead on his knees, apparently in the attitude of prayer He died unmarried, and bequeathed his moderate savings to his relatives, except a certain sum to the city of Aberdeen for the purchase of religious books for the use of the poor He also left one hundred pounds for a bursary, or exhibition, of five pounds per annum, to assist in educating a student at Marischal college An edition of his 'Concordance' was published under the superintendence of Mr Deodatus Bye in 1810, and in 1825 the work had reached the tenth edition His works are

CRUIKSHANK, a surname of the same class as Longshanks, Heavisides, Greathead, Longnesse, &c, indicative of some personal peculiarity in their original possessors, and not uncommon in that form in Scotland In England it has been anglicised into that of Crookshanks

CRUIKSHANK, WILLIAM, an eminent surgeon and anatomist, the son of one of the examiners of the excise at Edinburgh, was born in that city in 1745 He was baptized William Cumberland, in compliment to the "butcher" conqueror at Culloden, but he showed his good sense by seldom using the name In his fourteenth year he was entered as a student at the university of his native place, with the view of studying for the church He was soon afterwards sent to the university of Glasgow, where a strong propensity for anatomy and medicine induced him to direct his studies to these branches of science In 1771 he removed to London, having, on the recommendation of Dr Pitcairn, been engaged as librarian to the celebrated Dr William Hunter On the retirement of Mr Hewson, who had been for some time the doctor's assistant at the anatomical theatre in Windmill Street, Mr Cruikshank became his assistant, and subsequently his partner At his death in 1783, Dr Hunter left the use of his theatre and anatomical preparations to Mr Cruikshank and his nephew, Dr Baillie, and these gentlemen having received an address from the students requesting that they would assume the superintendence of the school, were induced to continue it In 1794, a paper, written by Mr Cruikshank, entitled 'Experiments on the Nerves of Living Animals,' was inserted in the Transactions of the Royal Society, as was also, two years afterwards, another paper of his on the 'Appearances in the Ovaria of Rabbits in different stages of Pregnancy' His publications, of which a list follows, prove him to have been an excellent anatomist, and an acute and ingenious physiologist In 1797 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society He enjoyed an excellent practice, particularly as an accoucheur, and though not without some share of personal as well as intellectual vanity, was much esteemed for his benevolence Mr Cruikshank died at London, July 27, 1800 His works are

CULEN, king of Scotland, son of Indulf, succeeded to Odo, surnamed by the Celtic part of his subjects, Duff, or the Black, in 965, and after a reign of five years, was slain in battle by the Britons of Strathclyde

CULLEN, a surname derived from lands in the parish of that name in the county of Banff The name is taken from the burn which flows through it, the etymology of which is unknown, but from the depth of water and height of its banks it may be an old French word signifying colina, a pool, or from the situation of the town and parish on the Moray frith, it may have been derived from colon, a planter, hence colony

CULLEN, WILLIAM, M D one of the most celebrated physicians of his time, the son of a farmer, was born in the parish of Hamilton, Lanarkshire, December 11, 1710 He was educated at the grammar school of his native town, and having served a short apprenticeship to a surgeon and apothecary in Glasgow, he went several voyages as surgeon in a merchant vessel sailing between London and the West Indies Becoming tired of this employment, he returned to Scotland about the beginning of 1732, and practised for a short time as a country surgeon in the parish of Shotts, he then removed to Hamilton, with a view to obtaining medical practice there The duke of Hamilton having been suddenly taken ill, Cullen was called in, and prescribed with success, which, with the charms of his conversation, secured for him the patronage of his grace During his residence in Hamilton, the chief magistrate of which he was in 1739 and 1740, he, and the afterwards equally celebrated Dr William Hunter, who was a native of the same part of the country, entered into partnership as surgeons and apothecaries, which, however, in consequence of Dr Hunter's success in London, was soon dissolved, but during the time it continued Cullen attended the medical classes at Edinburgh for one session

During the residence of Dr Cullen in Hamilton, Archibald earl of Ilay, afterwards duke of Argyle, being in that part of the country, required some chemical apparatus It was suggested to him that Dr Cullen was likely to have what his lordship wanted He was accordingly invited to dinner by that nobleman, and made himself very agreeable This interview was one of the chief causes of his future rise in life He had secured the patronage of the prime minister of Scotland, besides the countenance of the duke of Hamilton

In September 1740, Cullen took the degree of M D at Glasgow In 1746, through the interest of the earl of Ilay and the duke of Hamilton, he was appointed lecturer on chemistry in that university, and in 1751 was chosen regius professor of medicine, when he appears to have taught both classes In 1756, on the death of Dr Plummer, professor of chemistry in Edinburgh, Dr Cullen accepted of an invitation to the vacant chair In 1758, after finishing his course of chemistry, he delivered to a number of his particular friends and favourite pupils, nine lectures on the subject of agriculture In these few lectures, he for the first time laid open the true principle concerning the nature of soils, and the operation of manures On the death of Dr Alston in 1763, he succeeded him as lecturer on the Materia Medica, and in 1766 he resigned the chemical chair to his pupil, Dr Black, on his being appointed, on the death of Dr Whytt, professor of the institutes or theory of Medicine Dr John Gregory, a short time before, had succeeded to the chair of the practice of medicine, and these two professors continued each to teach his own class for three sessions At the conclusion of the session 12th April 1769, Dr Cullen proposed to the patrons that Dr Gregory and he should alternately teach the institutes and the practice This was complied with, and it was declared that the survivor should have in his option which professorship he preferred On the death of Dr Gregory in February 1773, Dr Cullen chose the chair of the practice of medicine, and held it with distinguished honour for the remainder of his life As a lecturer Dr Cullen exercised a great influence over the state of opinion relative to the mystery of the science of medicine He successfully combated the specious doctrines of Boerhaave depending on the humoral pathology, his own system is founded on an enlarged view of the principles of Frederick Hoffman His lectures were invariably delivered from a few short notes, and he carried with him both the regard and the enthusiasm of the pupils

Dr Cullen continued his practice as a physician, as well as his medical lectures, till a few months before his death, when the infirmities of age induced him to resign his professorship On the 8th of January 1790, the lord provost, magistrates, and town council of Edinburgh voted a piece of plate, of fifty guineas value, to Dr Cullen, as a testimony of their respect for his distinguished services to the university, during the period of thirty-four years that he had held an academical chair A meeting of his pupils was held on the 12th, in the Medical Hall, when an address to the doctor was agreed upon A motion was also made and unanimously agreed to, that a statue, or some durable monument of the doctor, should be erected in some proper place, to perpetuate his fame The Royal Physical Society also agreed to an address to the venerable professor, to which a suitable answer was returned by his son Henry, Dr Cullen himself being much indisposed Similar addresses were presented by the Hibernian Medical Society, and by the American Physical Society of Edinburgh The senatus academicus of the university of Edinburgh also held a meeting, at which they passed a resolution agreeing to allow for the proposed monument a conspicuous place in the new college Dr Cullen did not long survive these flattering testimonials of respect He died February 5, 1790 He had married, while in Hamilton, Miss Johnston, the daughter of a clergyman in the neighbourhood, and by her he had five sons and four daughters Two of his sons were Robert, a lord of session, of whom a memoir follows, and Dr Henry Cullen

CULLEN, Robert, an eminent judge under the title of Lord Cullen, the eldest son of the preceding, studied at the university of Edinburgh, and was admitted advocate, 15th December 1764 His practice at the bar was extensive, and in addition to considerable legal knowledge, he was distinguished as an acute and logical reasoner He was a contributor to the Mirror and Lounger and the various essays from his pen in these publications were much admired His manners were polished and agreeable, and he was one of the few individuals who were spoken favourably of by the Rev George William Aurrol Hay Drummond, in his 'Town Eclogue,' (Edinburgh, 1804, 8vo,) in which he is styled "courteous Cullen" In his youth he was an excellent mimic, and some amusing anecdotes of his imitative talents are given in the sketch of him which accompanies his portrait in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits On the death of Lord Alvah in 1796, he was appointed a lord of session, and took his seat by the title of Lord Cullen, on 18th November of that year, and on 29th June 1799, he succeeded Lord Swinton as a lord of justiciary He died at Edinburgh on 28th November 1810 Late in life, he married a servant girl of the name of Russell, but by her had no issue After his lordship's death, she married a gentleman of property in the West Indies, where she died in 1818

Cumming, properly Comyn or de Cumyn, a surname derived originally from the ancient house of de Commes in France Wyntoun (who wrote about 1420) absurdly states that the first of the name of Comyn in Scotland, a keeper of the royal chamber, acquired his designation from saying to all who knocked at the king's door, "Cum in!" It is impossible to attribute to ignorance alone this exquisite blunder, as the antecedents of the noble family were too familiar to be utterly forgotten in that age, especially by the prior of Lochleven, any more than the fact that French had been the exclusive language of the court and nobles of Scotland for upwards of two centuries, during which period the family held sway But they had been the vanquished party, and it was the fashion of that age to vilify the unfortunate This incident shows how little reliance is to be placed on our earliest Scottish historians, especially where national or party prejudices are concerned John count de Comyn in Normandy, descended from Charlemagne, on being appointed governor of the chief towns in that duchy, assumed the name of De Burgo His eldest son, Hubert de Burgo, married Arlota mother of William the Conqueror, and from their son Robert the noble house of Clanricarde in Ireland, and all the families of the name of De Burgh or Burke, in that kingdom, are said to derive their descent In 1068, William the Conqueror, learning of an invasion on the part of the Danes, in conjunction with the disaffected English, aided by Malcolm the Fourth of Scotland, appointed Robert de Comyn governor of Northumberland, who by a rising of the natives was massacred with his whole garrison at Durham shortly after The earliest mentioned in Scottish annals was William de Comyn He had been educated for the church under Gaufred, bishop of Durham, sometime chancellor to Henry the First of England He held the lands of Northallerton and others in England, and from Prince Henry, the son of King David, he obtained a grant of the estate of Linton-Roderick in Roxburghshire, which is said to have been the first place of settlement in North Britain of the powerful family of the Comyns In 1133, he was, by David the First, nominated chancellor of Scotland His name appears as such in some of the charters of that monarch In 1142, he seized on the bishopric of Durham, under a grant from the empress Maude, but soon after resigned that see, reserving only certain of the episcopal estates for behoof of his nephew and heir, Richard In the reigns of Malcolm the Fourth and William the Lion, the name of Richard de Comyn, appears among the witnesses to some of the charters of those monarchs In the reign of the former, he was a man of great power and authority in Scotland, and by King William he was created "justiciar" of Scotland, as only what is now the northern part of the kingdom was then called He married Hexilda, great-granddaughter of King Duncan, and died about 1190

His son William was, in 1200, sent as envoy by William the Lion to congratulate King John on his succeeding to the throne of England He was also engaged in several other embassies to the English court He was sheriff of Forfar, and like his father, also held the office of justiciary for Scotland, and various grants of land were made to him He distinguished himself by putting down a rebellion of the native tribes under Guthred, of the family of Heth, otherwise Mac-William who had landed from Ireland, and whom he put to death Through his marriage, in 1210, with Marjory, countess of Buchan in her own right, he became earl of Buchan This was his second marriage and his son by it, Alexander Comyn, succeeded him in the earldom, on his death in 1233, (see earldom of BUCHAN, ante, p 453) By his first wife (a lady whose name has not descended to us), William earl of Buchan had two sons, Richard and Walter In 1230, Walter who had become earl of Menteith in right of his wife, acquired the extensive lordship of Badenoch by a grant from Alexander the Second, (see BADENOCH, surname of, and MENTEITH, earl of,) and thus became the founder of the senior branch of the Comyns He possessed large estates in the south of Scotland, and nearly caused a war between Alexander the Second and Henry the Third, by erecting two castles, one in Hermitage in Liddesdale and another in Galloway, without the consent of the king of England to whom the suzerainty of these districts of right pertained As he died without leaving heirs male of his body, all his possessions went to the descendants of his brother Richard The son of the latter, John Comyn, who was the first of the name known as the "Red Comyn," acted a conspicuous part during the minority of Alexander the Third He was justiciary of Galloway, and joined the other barons who demanded security from Henry the Third of England before they would allow his daughter the young queen of Scotland to go to London for her accouchement In 1264, with John Baliol and Robert de Bruce, he led a body of Scots to the assistance of Henry against his rebellious barons He died about 1274 William, his eldest son, appears to have married his cousin, the heiress of Menteith, but left no issue John, the second son, known as the "Black Comyn," became lord of Badenoch, and was named among the magnates of Scotland who settled the Norwegian marriage of the princess Margaret in 1281 In 1286, on the decease of Alexander the Third, he was chosen by a parliament which met at Scone, one of the six guardians or regents of Scotland, during the minority of the Maiden of Norway, his cousin, the earl of Buchan, being also one of them On the death of the infant queen, the "Black Comyn" became one of the original candidates for the crown, as descended from King Duncan by the daughter of his son Donald-bane, and at the meeting of Edward the First with the competitors at Holywell-haugh, on 2d June 1291, he readily took the oaths offered to him, acknowledging Edward as feudal superior of Scotland He afterwards, with the other competitors, the regents of the kingdom, and many other barons, swore fealty to the English king After the election of Baliol to the vacant throne, he seems to have retired from public life It is uncertain when he died, but he was alive in 1299 He married Marjory, sister of King John Baliol Their son, John, also, like his grandfather, styled the "Red Comyn," possessed the same right to the Scottish throne which was vested in Baliol himself, had the latter died without issue He adhered to the English interest as long as Edward supported his kinsmen the Baliols, but when his insulting treatment of John Baliol drove the Scots nobles to arms, he joined the army which, in 1296, under the leadership of the earl of Buchan, invaded England, and carried fire and sword through the county of Cumberland Soon after he was among the Scots nobles and knights who, with a strong force of followers, were admitted into the castle of Dunbar by the countess of March, (Marjory Comyn, daughter of Alexander, earl of Buchan,) and held in check the large army which Edward despatched under Warrene, earl of Surrey After the battle of Dunbar, April 28, 1296, the castle surrendered to Edward himself On this occasion Comyn was taken prisoner but was soon released After the signal defeat of the English by Wallace at the bridge of Stirling, on 11th September 1297, Comyn joined the patriot army, and at the battle of Falkirk, July 22, 1298, he commanded the cavalry, but scarcely had the battle begun when the whole body under his command turned their horses' heads, and shamelessly fled from the field He afterwards threatened to impeach Wallace for treason for his conduct during the war, and that hero in consequence voluntarily resigned the office of governor of Scotland, on which Comyn and John de Soulis were chosen regents, and after some time Bruce earl of Carrick and Lamberton bishop of St Andrews were associated with them in the government In 1300, when Edward again invaded Scotland, the earl of Buchan and John Comyn of Badenoch had an interview with that monarch when they demanded that Baliol their lawful king should be permitted peaceably to reign over them, and that their estates, which had been unjustly bestowed upon the English nobles, should be restored Edward treated these propositions with an unceremonious refusal, and, after declaring that they would defend themselves to the uttermost, the king and the Scottish barons parted in wrath In 1302 he joined forces with Sir Simon Fraser of Tweeddale, and on the muir of Roslin defeated the English in three battles in one day, the 25th February 1303 The English came up in three divisions, one after the other, each exceeding the Scots in number, and they were successively defeated as they advanced, the first under Sir John de Segrave, the English governor of Scotland, the second led by Sir Ralph de Manton, styled Ralph the Cofferer from his office as clerk of Edward's wardrobe, and the third headed by Sir Robert de Neville After that threefold victory he continued at the head of the patriots, with Sir Simon Fraser and Sir William Wallace, throughout the unequal and terrible struggle that ensued, thus nobly redeeming his character, which had been tarnished by his flying from the brunt of battle at Falkirk Scotland having been again overrun by a fresh army under Edward in person, Comyn, Wallace, and Fraser, unable to make head against him, were driven into the wilds and fastnesses, where they still carried on a sort of guerilla war against the convoys of the English Langtoft, the English historian, thus writes

> 'The lord of Badenauh, Froselle, and Walais, > Lived at thieves' law, ever robbing alle wayes

Edward is said at this time to have penetrated as far north as Cromdale, and to have staid some time in the castle of Lochindorb, then the chief stronghold of the Comyns Sir ling castle was almost the only fortress which remained in the hands of the Scots, and the regent Comyn, with the view of preventing a siege, attempted to defend the passage of the Forth against Edward, but his small force was routed and dispersed by the English, and on 9th February 1304, the earls of Pembroke and Ulster, with Sir Henry Percy, met Comyn at Strathurd (probably now Struthers) in Fife, and a negotiation took place, in which the late regent and his followers, after stipulating for the preservation of their lives, liberties, and lands, delivered themselves up, and agreed to the infliction of any pecuniary fine which the conqueror should impose From this negotiation Wallace and some others were specially excepted. Comyn's conduct in the subsequent revolution which seated his great rival Robert the Bruce on the throne, has already been referred to (see art BRUCE, or DE BRUS, ante, pp 413, 414) It was he who was stabbed by Bruce before the high altar of the church of the Minorite Friars at Dumfries, and slain, with his uncle Sir Robert Comyn, by Bruce's attendants, Lindsay and Kirkpatrick, on the 4th of February 1305-6 Besides his claim to the crown of Scotland, he was also allied by blood to the royal family of England, having married Joan, sister and co-heir of Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, whose father was uterine brother of Henry the Third

John, his only son, died in 1325, without issue, and with him terminated the male line of the principal family He had two sisters, one of whom, Joan, married the earl of Athol of the time, who obtained with her some small share of the vast domains of the once powerful family of the Comyns of Badenoch, but having revolted against Bruce, his estates were forfeited The power of the Comyns was effectually broken after the battle of Inverury, 22d May 1308, in which King Robert the Bruce, although very ill at the time, took the field in person against the third earl of Buchan of the Comyn family, and defeated him and his followers with great slaughter The name afterwards sunk into an obscurity from which it did not emerge for centuries

Mr Carrick, in his 'Life of Wallace,' says that "while the Scots in the low country cried out against the 'fause Cumyn's kyn,' their vassals in Badenoch and Lochaber re-echoed the charge, till the very name became cognominal with deceit," so much so that, in those parts of the Highlands where their influence extended, there was a Gaelic proverb, the English of which was, that "while there are trees in a wood, there will be deceit in a Cumyn"

Seldom have the claims of Celtic traditionists been less happy than is that adopted by Logan (Clans, vol ii art Clann Chuimein), to establish the existence of an extensive and powerful native clan Cumming in Badenoch, at a period before the reach of other record The attempt rests on the circumstance that the second abbot of Icolmkill was named Cumine anno 597, and that the sixth abbot (living in 657) was Commeus Albus, as well as that the name Cumming occurs in local topography, and in one instance in connection with the prefix Kil or Cil so frequent in Scotch and Irish topography, viz Killie-Cumming (Kil-Chuimein), the original name of Fort Augustus in Inverness shire This ecclesiastical word, (which however Logan and others assuming to be Celtic translate variously as a druidical circle, a grave, &c,) is from the Latin cella, a cell, and exactly describes those edifices which, up to a later age than moderns are prepared to believe, served as places of devotion for the rude inhabitants of the country, which Henry of Huntingdon describes as "not built of stone but of wood and covered with reeds as is the custom in Scotland," and which under the same name are referred to by him as constructed even in his age in remote parts of England They are not universally dedicated to saints, as has been supposed, but are frequently called after parties by whom they were erected or supported, and when the local topography of Britain shall have been better understood will be found to have as many Norman and Saxon terminations and compounds and founders as early British or Celtic Kellet the little cell, two localities in Bolton le Sands, Lancashire, Kelling (Kellina), another Romanesque diminutive having the same meaning, a parish in Norfolk, are examples under the variety Kel, and Kilgrant, the cell of Grant, or Powerstown, in Tipperary, Kildalkey, the cell De la key or of the rock, in Meath, Kilbarry, the cell of Barri or De Barri in Waterford, and among others Kilconquhar, the cell with the quhair or choir, in Fife, under its more frequent form of Kil It is therefore most natural that a similar rude edifice, constructed for devotion amongst their dependents in Badenoch by one of the Norman conquerors of that name, should be called after him Kil Cumein or Killie-Cumming The assumption of the badge of the cumin plant for the supposed clan, a plant that is only found in the region of Egypt, but which happens to be named in the Old Testament, is scarcely correct It is rather the common sallow, a species of willow, that the Cummings have adopted as their clan badge, although Logan calls it the cumin plant

In the reign of Alexander the Third, as stated by Fordun, there were of the name in Scotland, three earls, Buchan, Menteith, and Athol, and one great feudal baron, Comyn lord of Strathbogie, with thirty knights all possessing lands The chief of the clan was lord of Badenoch and Lochaber, and other extensive districts in the Highlands Upwards of sixty belted knights were bound to follow his banner with all their vassals, and he made treaties with princes as a prince himself One such compact with Llewellyn of Wales is preserved in Rymer's Fœdera

The Cummings, as the name is now spelled, are numerous in the counties of Aberdeen, Banff, and Moray, but a considerable number changed their names to Farquharson, as being descended from Ferquhard, second son of Alexander the fourth designed of Altyre, who lived in the middle of the fifteenth century, in consequence of being prevented, for some reason, from burying their relatives in the family burial-place It is from them that the Farquharsons of Balthog, Haughton, and others in the county of Aberdeen derive their descent

From Sir Robert Comyn, younger son of John lord of Badenoch, who, (as already mentioned,) died about 1274, are descended the Cummings of Altyre, Logie, Auchry, (one of whom in 1760 founded the village of Cummestown in Aberdeenshire,) Relugas, &c His son, Thomas Cumming was, by an act of parliament held at Perth in 1320, excepted out of the forfeiture of the Cummings, from which it would seem that he was never engaged in the Baliol interest His eldest son, Sir Richard Cumming, was in high favour with David the Second, by whom he was in 1368, sent on an embassy to the court of England to negotiate affairs of state, for which he got a safe conduct from King Edward the Third He received two charters from King David, the one dated 6th January 1368, and the other 15th December 1370 By the former he got the lands of Devally, with the office of forester of the forest of Fernway (Darnaway) in the county of Moray, &c, where he seems to have resided, but in 1371, at a court held at Perth, by Robert the Second he resigned the castle of Darnaway to Thomas, son of John the Grant, whose daughter he had married for their faithful and praiseworthy service to Thomas Randolph, earl of Moray, regent of Scotland, during the minority of David the Second, and Thomas and John, his sons Sir Richard's second son, Duncan Cumming of Lochtervandich, was progenitor of the Cummings of Auchry, one of whom, William Cumming, the first who possessed that estate, born in 1634 (and eighth from Duncan), bequeathed, on 12th October 1693, some lands near Elgin, for the support of four decayed merchants of that town who are called "Cumming's Bedmen" He also built the church of Monquhitter

Ferquhard Cumming the eldest son of Sir Richard, was the first of the family designed by the title of Altyre Sir Thomas Cumming of Altyre, the eldest son of Ferquhard, obtained in 1419, a warrant from the crown to build the castles and fortalices of Dollas and Earnside His eldest son, James, died without issue, and was succeeded by the second son, Alexander, who died in the reign of James the Third John, the third son, was progenitor of the Cummings of Earnside He had also a daughter, Jane, called for her beauty, "the fair maid of Murray," the fourth wife of the first earl of Huntly

Alexander's eldest son, Sir Thomas Cumming of Altyre, by his prudent management, in 1470, compromised and adjusted all the differences which for some time had subsisted between his family and the town of Forres, concerning the mosses of Blair and Kirktown of Altyre His son, Alexander Cumming of Altyre, when a young man, was, in 1502, chosen one of the arbiters for settling some differences between Andrew bishop of Moray and Hugh Rose of Kilravock On 24th July 1548 Alexander Cumming of Altyre became cautioner for John and Hugh Cumming his son and brother, and ten others, to underly the law for cutting and slaying with their swords eleven oxen and cows belonging to Alexander Urquhart of Burnsyards, and for casting down and destroying two houses built on his lands, and for other acts of oppression committed by them He had also a feud with the laird of Brodie, as we find that on November 14 1550, Alexander Brodie of that ilk, and one hundred and twenty-six others, were denounced rebels and put to the horn, for not standing their trial for attacking Alexander Cumming of Altyre and his servants between his place of Altyre and the lands of Balnaferry, for their slaughter, and putting them to flight in great numbers on horse and foot, and for the cruel mutilation of one of them, a servant of Cumming On the 26th June of the same year he had obtained a decreet of exemption for himself, his kinsmen, clan, and friends from attending the sheriff court of Moray His grandson, Alexander, (eldest son, and apparent heir of Thomas Cumming of Altyre,) a man of great bravery and resolution, joined his cousin the earl of Huntly in the reign of King James the Sixth, and had the command of a troop of horse at the battle of Glenlivet, where the king's troops under the command of the earl of Argyle were defeated, 3d October, 1594

In 1627 Robert Cumming of Altyre gave his bond to the council of Scotland for the peace of the Highlands His second son John, was direct ancestor of the Cummings of Logie In 1657, his eldest son, Robert Cumming of Altyre, took for his second wife, Lucy, daughter of Sir Ludovick Gordon of Gordonstown, baronet, and was great-great grandfather of Alexander Cumming, Esq of Altyre, who entered the army early, was in the expedition to Carthagena in 1741, and received promotion for his gallantry in the attempt to storm the Boccachicca fort By Grace Pearce, niece and sole heiress of John Penrose, Esq of Penrose, in the county of Cornwall, he had six sons and three daughters His eldest son, Alexander Penrose Cumming of Altyre, being heir and representative of the last Sir William Gordon of Gordonstown, bart, who died in 1795, in obedience to the last will of that gentleman, assumed the name and arms of Gordon of Gordonstown, and was created a baronet, 21st May, 1804 Early in life Sir Alexander had entered the army as an officer in the 13th regiment He was subsequently lieutenant-colonel of the Strathspey Fencibles, and received the thanks of the commander-in-chief for suppressing a mutiny at Dumfries in 1794 He was M P for the Inverness district of burghs, and died 10th February 1806 He had married, in 1773, Helen, daughter of Sir Ludovic Grant of Grant, baronet, and had four sons and nine daughters His eldest son, George, of the Hon East India Company's service, died unmarried, in 1800 The second son, Sir William Gordon-Cumming, the second baronet, born 20th July 1787, sat in parliament for the Elgin burghs at the period of the passing of the Reform Bill He died 23d December 1854 He married, first, in 1815, the eldest daughter of John Campbell, Esq, by whom he had six sons and five daughters His first wife having died in 1842, he married, 2dly, the 2d daughter of Mackintosh of Geddes and had one daughter by her His eldest son, Sir Alexander Penrose Gordon Cumming, born 17th August 1816, a captain 4th light dragoons, and 71st light infantry, became third baronet, married the only daughter of Rev Augustus Campbell, rector of Liverpool, issue, two sons and one daughter He is head and representative of the ancient family of the Comyns so celebrated in Scottish history, heir general to the Penrose family of Cornwall, and inherits through female descent, the estate of the Gordons, premier baronets of Nova Scotia (baronetage now extinct The second son Roualeyn George Gordon-Cumming, born March 15, 1820, when a young man was an officer in the Madras cavalry and afterwards in the Cape mounted rifles An enterprising traveller and lion-hunter in the interior of South Africa he published a work entitled 'Five Years' Adventures in the far interior of South Africa,' with numerous illustrations 2 vols post 8vo 1850 He made himself known also by an exhibition of hunting trophies, native arms and costume, one of the most unique of its kind

The name Roualeyn appears to have been taken from an ancient possession of the family of that name in the district of Cunningham, Ayrshire, afterwards belonging to the Mures and now called Rowallan In Anderson's 'Diplomata Scotiæ' is an acquittance of Walter Cumin, dominus de Roualeyn, to Richard de Bovle of Calburne (now Kelburne) ancestor of the earls of Glasgow, of forty shillings annually paid out of the lands of Malderland in that barony

Sir William's younger brother, Charles James Cumming, having married Mary Bruce of Kinnaird, granddaughter of the Abyssinian traveller (with issue, Mary Elizabeth, countess of Elgin, who died in 1843,) assumed the name of Cumming Bruce, and is designated of Rossesle and Kinnaird One of his sisters, Helen, married Sir Archibald Dunbar, baronet of Northfield, and another, Louisa John Hay Forbes, Esq, a lord of session under the title of Lord Medwyn, resigned in 1852

A branch of the Cummings of some consideration in its time, was the family of Culter, the first of which, Jardine Cumyn, was second son of William Cumyn earl of Buchan, who received from his father in 1270 the lands of Inveralloch in Buchan Alexander Cumyn, the fourteenth of this family, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1672 The second baronet was a very eccentric personage, and a memoir of him follows The title became extinct on the death of the third baronet born in 1737, towards the end of last century James Cumming of Culter was one of the assize on the celebrated trial of the master of Forbes in 1537, for treasonable conspiracy against the king's life and for plotting the destruction of the Scots army at Jedburgh, and Mr Archibald Cumming, flar of Culter, was also one of the assize on the trial of Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh in 1580, for the murder of the regent Moray

In the list of the grand jury of Elgin and Forres, of date 1556, we find the names of Alexander Cumming of Earnside and William Cumming without any designation

On June 11, 1596, "Ane callit Cuming the Muncke was hangit for making of false wrettis," [Birrell's Diary]

In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Wilhelmus Cumine of Kilbride, Lanarkshire, as having sworn fealty to Edward the First His son, John Cumine, was forfeited for adhering to the English

A celebrated modern bearer of the name is the Rev John Cumming, D D, born in Aberdeen Nov 10, 1810, and ordained in 1832 minister of the Scotch church, Crown Court, London, who has distinguished himself by his able championship of the doctrines of the Reformation, and by his numerous theological writings

The first of the family styled of Relugas, in the county of Moray, was James Cumming, who lived in the reign of James the Sixth He was the son of William Cumming of Presley, head of a tribe of the Cumming clan in the same county, and his youngest son, George Cumming, was an officer of rank in the army of Gustavus Adolphus His eldest son, John Cumming of Relugas, had, with four daughters, seven sons James Cumming, the eldest, married Jean, daughter of Robert Cumming of Altyre, and had two sons, Robert, his heir, and John, a physician in Irvine, father of another John, who, being also educated for the medical profession, succeeded him in his practice in that town William Cumming, the second of the seven sons of the second laird, was professor of philosophy in the university of Edinburgh John, the third son was minister of Auldearn, and dean of Moray The eldest son of the latter, also named John Cumming, a doctor of divinity, was in 1695 appointed regius professor of divinity and ecclesiastical history in the university of Edinburgh His appointment created considerable excitement at the time, as it was the first regius professorship that had been founded in any of the Scottish universities, and no professor had ever been admitted a member of the senatus academicus of Edinburgh college, without being nominated by the town council, the patrons of the university On this occasion, however, the chair of ecclesiastical history had been instituted by the government without consulting the council as to the propriety or expediency of the measure, and they naturally felt that their rights had been encroached upon in the matter The other professors recognised at once the validity of his appointment, but the town council was not so easily satisfied He does not appear to have qualified before the magistrates till the 10th of November 1702, and at a meeting of the town council held on the 15th February 1703, at which a visitation of the college was resolved upon, the lord provost acquainted the council that "Mr Cumming was come into the college as a master of some profession, and that it was fit to see his gift, (or commission,) and know his profession, that the council may give rules and directions thereanent" The council accordingly ordained Mr Cumming to give in his commission to the clerk to that effect This requisition not being complied with, the salaries of the professors were ordered to be stopped, till they produced their acts of admission "This," says Mr Bower, "could only be designed as a check upon the manner in which the professor of ecclesiastical history had been admitted, and they calculated that they could thus indirectly obtain the information they required" But after several ineffectual efforts to compel him to produce his commission, the matter was compromised This professor continues to be appointed by the crown, and although like other regius professors, he is introduced to the senatus academicus by the college bailie, it is under protest [Bower's History of University of Edinburgh, vol ii pp 25 and 319]

Patrick, the sixth son of John Cumming, second laird of Relugas, above mentioned, was minister of Ormiston, and Duncan Cumming, the seventh and youngest son, was physician to King William of Orange at the battle of the Boyne This may explain the interest which his nephew, Dr John Cumming, had in obtaining the institution of a new chair in the university of Edinburgh in his favour

Robert Cumming, the fourth of Relugas, and fifth from William of Presley, had a son, Patrick Cumming of Relugas, D D, who, like his father's cousin, was regius professor of divinity and ecclesiastical history in the university of Edinburgh, to which chair he was appointed, December 7, 1737, on the death of professor Crawford He was also one of the ministers of Edinburgh He gave lectures in the university upon Jo Alphonsi Turretini Compendium Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ He was a man of very extensive critical knowledge, and took an active part in the business of the General Assembly, of which he was three times moderator As a preacher he is represented as being equalled by few "in an easy, fluent, neat, and elegant style" Of his two published sermons one was preached on the occasion of a fast appointed by the king for the Rebellion of 1745 He married Jane, eldest daughter of Mr David Lauder, third son of Sir John Lauder of Fountainhall, baronet, by whom he had five sons and a daughter He resigned his professorship, on 18th June 1762, in favour of his eldest son, Robert, also a clergyman, who never delivered any lectures in the college On his death, in 1788, he was succeeded in the chair by Dr Thomas Hardie, one of the ministers of Edinburgh Patrick Cumming, a younger brother of Robert, was professor of the oriental languages in the university of Glasgow

CUMMING, or COMYN, SIR ALEXANDER, Baronet, an enthusiast of great but misapplied talents, the son of Sir Alexander Cumming of Culter, who was created a baronet in 1672, was born about the beginning of the eighteenth century It appears by his Journal, which was in the possession of the late Isaac Reed, Esq, that he was bred to the law in Scotland, but was induced to quit that profession by a pension of three hundred pounds a-year being assigned to him by government, which was withdrawn in 1721 In 1729, in consequence of a dream of Lady Cumming, (Anna, daughter of Lancelot Whitehall, a gentleman belonging to a family of that name in Shropshire, commissioner of the customs for Scotland,) he undertook a voyage to America for the purpose of visiting the Cherokee nations, and on the 3d of April 1730, in a general meeting of chiefs at Nequisee among the mountains, he was crowned commander and chief ruler of the Cherokees He returned to Charlestown, April 13, with six Indian chiefs, and on June 5 arrived at Dover On the 18th he presented the Indians to George the Second at Windsor, when he laid his crown at his majesty's feet, on which occasion the chiefs also did homage In consequence of the feelings of dissatisfaction which Sir Alexander found to prevail in America, he formed the design of establishing banks in each of the provinces dependent on the British exchequer, and accountable to the British parliament, as the only means of securing the dependency of the colonies In 1748 he laid his plans before Mr Pelham, the Minister, who treated him as a visionary enthusiast He connected this scheme with the restoration of the Jews, for which he supposed the time appointed to be arrived, and that he himself was alluded to in various passages of Scripture as then delivered Finding that the Minister would not listen to his projects, he proposed to open a subscription himself for five hundred thousand pounds, for the purpose of establishing provincial banks in America, and settling three hundred thousand Jewish families among the Cherokee mountains He next turned his thoughts to alchemy, and began to try experiments on the transmutation of metals Being deeply involved in debt, he was indebted for support chiefly to the contributions of his friends In 1766, Archbishop Secker appointed him a pensioner in the Charter-house, London, where he died at an advanced age in August 1775, and was interred at East Barnet, where Lady Cumming had been buried in 1743 His son, who had succeeded him in his title, was a captain in the army, but became deranged in his intellects, and died in indigence At his death the title became extinct

CUMMING, William, a learned physician, the son of Mr James Cumming, merchant in Edinburgh, was born September 30, 1715 He studied medicine for four years in the university of his native city, and in 1735 spent nine months at Paris, improving himself in anatomy In 1738 he quitted Edinburgh, and ultimately settled at Dorchester, where his practice became very extensive To Mr Hutchins' History of Dorsetshire he rendered the most useful assistance In 1752 he received a diploma from the university of Edinburgh, and was soon after elected a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians there In 1769 he was elected Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries of London, and in 1781, of that of Scotland He died of a dropsy, March 25, 1788, in the seventy-fourth year of his age

Cunningham, a surname derived from the northern district of Ayrshire, anciently written Konigham (Teutonic), signifying regnum domicilium, or the king's house or habitation The name, although a common one in Scotland, is not so prevalent in the district whence it originally sprung (as is now, indeed, the case pretty generally with many of the names of the more ancient families of local origin), there having been in 1852, in the whole forty six parishes of the county of Ayr, only forty-two persons bearing this surname, as ascertained from the Ayrshire Directory of that year

The first of the name in Scotland was one Wernebald, who came from the north of England in the beginning of the twelfth century, and settled in the district as a vassal under Hugh de Morville, lord high constable of Scotland, from whom he obtained the manor of Cunningham, which comprehended the church and most of the parish of Kilmaurs, and in consequence assumed the name The statement of Van Bassen, a Norwegian genealogist, that one Malcolm, the son of Friskin, obtained the thanedom of Cunningham, for assisting Malcolm Canmore when prince of Scotland, in escaping from Macbeth, by forking hay over him in a barn in which he had taken shelter, and that his posterity, from that circumstance, adopted Cunningham as a surname and a shakefork for their arms, with the motto "over fork over," is one of those traditionary figments with which the origin of the surnames of most of our ancient families have been invested, by writers anxious to give to them a greater antiquity, or to ascribe to them some distinguished feat of loyalty or enterprize in the service of our earlier kings Sir George Mackenzie, in his 'Science of Heraldry,' says that this family being by office masters of the king's stables, took for their armorial figure, the instrument whereby hay is thrown up to horses, which in blazon is called a shakefork Sir James Dalrymple absurdly conjectures that the first of the Cunninghams in Scotland was one of the four knights who murdered Thomas a Becket, and who fled from England, and assumed the pale in their arms, being after the same form as the shakefork, and is taken by some for an episcopal pall, as that carried in the arms of the see of Canterbury

In an old genealogical memoir of the Cummings in manuscript quoted in 'Hamilton's Description of the Shires of Lanark and Renfrew,' (p 21, note) the origin of the Cunninghames is thus ingeniously traced to that clan "And moreover, I am able to prove at this present tyme, 1622, ther is not so maney noble men as yet of one surname in all Europe as professeth the name of Cuming, sua that they wer all with ther lands and livings in one realme, and to qualifie and mack my alleadgeance good, I have insert heir, as efter followeth, the names of their houss, styls and surnames quho confesseth themselves to be laufullie descended of the said surname of Cumings Quhilk certainlie I have in pairt be some of ther owne confessiones, for being at super in the E of Glenkairnes hous, in Kilmarnoch, quhair my lord wes present, with his sone, the master, as also the old laird of Watterstoun, Cunnynghame to his surname, and my lord goodschirs (goodfather's) brother, quho did all thrie confess and confer that Cuming was ther right surname, quhilk wes to be seen in my lord's ancient evidents, as my old lord did confess at this tyme, in presence of the whoill compame, quhair ther wer divers noble men And as for the surname of Cunnynghame, they took it of that province quhilk wes called of auld Cunnynghame, as Comrnauld (Cumbernauld) wes called Cumings hald Farder I have omitted to sett doune heirfor, the cause whey the earle of Glencairn and surname of Cunnynghames confesseth that thair ryte surname should be Cuming, and wearrs not the Cuming's armes the thrie Shawes. The reason whey, as I understand Quhen as the principall noblemen of Cumings was banished, as said is, tho' he that remained within the realme of Scotland was not suffered to bruik that surname of Cumings, nor wear their armes, nevertheles, for the love and favor that the Cunynghames had naturallie to ther oune surname of Cumings, they, of ther humilitie, took the schaich (shake fork) for the tother arms, quhilk is and signifies as servand to the schewes This I dyte not be my inventione, but be more ancient and learned men, whose more curious to know the doubts of their genologie"

The above-named Wernebald had two sons, Robert and Galfridus The latter, under the designation of Galfridus de Cunninghame, is witness in a charter of King Malcolm the Fourth, of a donation to the abbey of Scone Robert, the elder son, styled of Kilmaurs, with the consent of Richinda or Rescinda Barclay, his spouse, daughter and heiress of Sir Humphrey Barclay of Garntilly, in the reign of Malcolm the Fourth, bequeathed the lands of Glenferchartland, or Glenfarquharlin, in the county of Kincardine, to the abbey of Arbroath He gave also his village of Cunningham, the patronage of the kirk of Kilmaurs and half a carrucate of land belonging to the said kirk, to the abbacy of Kelso, which gift was confirmed by Richard de Morville, constable of Scotland, in 1162 The consideration of this grant was an easy reception into the fraternity of that house, and he gave to the same abbey two parts of such goods as should belong to him at his death He was a witness in a charter granted by Richard de Morville of the lands of Hermistoun to Henry Sinclair His grandson, Stephen de Cunningham, was one of the fifteen hostages given to Henry the Second of England for the liberation of King William the Lion in 1174

Richard Cunningham, the fifth from Wernebald, is witness to a charter granted by Allan lord of Galloway, of the lands of Stephenston, Corsbie, and Monoch, to Hugh Crawford, ancestor of the earls of Loudoun In the cartulary of Paisley the name frequently occurs Fergus de Cunningham, sixth in descent from Wernebald, and Malcolm his son resign all their lands in Kilpatrick, to Maldouin earl of Lennox, and when that earl disponed them to Paisley, they are specified, and called Dundrinnans Immediately after, in the Inquest of seven men about the lands of Mokineran, Fergus appears, of date June 1239, and in a gift of a net upon the water of Leven by earl Maldouin, Fergus is designed "filius Cunningname" From him were descended the Cunninghames of Ranfurly

Robert, son and heir of Sir Robert de Cunninghame, is witness in the confirmation of the lands of Inglistoun by Thomas, son of Adam Carpentarius, supposed to have been in the reign of Alexander the Third

Hervey de Cunningham, son of Robert de Cunningham of Kilmaurs, behaved gallantly at the battle of Largs in 1263, and from Alexander the Third in the following year he got a charter of the lands of Kilmaurs He died before 1268 He had two sons, William and Galfridus The latter was ancestor of the Cunninghams of Glengarnock Sir William, the elder son, is witness to a charter of Malcolm earl of Lennox, about 1275 His son, Edward de Cunningham, mortified the lands of Grange to the monastery of Kilwinning, and died about 1290 He had two sons, Gilbert and Richard The younger son was ancestor of the Cunninghams of Polmaise Gilbert or Gilmore, the elder, was one of the nominees of Robert de Brus, in his competition for the crown of Scotland in 1292 He afterwards swore allegiance to Edward the First He had three sons, Robert, James and Donald James, the second son got from Robert the Bruce, the lands of Hassendean in Roxburghshire Sir James of Cunninghame is witness in a charter by Walter Stewart of Scotland of the kirk of Largs to Paisley dated the 3d of February 1318 Nigel de Cunnighame, the son of James, had a charter of the lands of Westbarnys (Barns) in Life, 8th December 1376, on the resignation of Sir Patrick de Polwarth, knight, and from him the Cunninghams of Beltan and Barns are descended

Sir Robert de Cunningham of Kilmaurs the eldest son, swore fealty to King Edward the First in 1296, in consequence of which his name appears in the Rigman Roll, but afterwards declared for Robert the Bruce, from whom he got a charter under the great seal, of the lands of Lambrughton in Cunningham in 1319 He had two sons, William and Andrew The latter was ancestor of the Cunninghams of Drumquhassel, Ballindalloch, Balbougie, Banton, and other families of the name

Sir William Cunningham of Kilmaurs, the eldest son, is witness to a donation to the monastery of Kelso in 1350 He was one of the Scottish gentlemen proposed as a hostage for King David the Second in 1354 He married the lady Eleanor Bruce, sister and heiress of Thomas, earl of Carrick and in her right had a charter of the earldom from King David the Second in 1361 It has generally been affirmed that she was his second wife, and from the circumstance that the earldom did not descend in his family, genealogists have usually stated that she had no issue, and that his sons, of which he is said to have had three, were the offspring of a previous marriage There is good reason, however, for believing that she had five sons to him, and it appears from certain charters, and particularly one of the lands of Kinclaven, that Sir William married a second time a lady, whose christian name was Margaret, but of what family is not known In the charter to him of the earldom, no mention is made of heirs, and on Lady Eleanor's death, it was reassumed by Robert the Second, who soon after conferred it on his own eldest son, John, during Sir William's lifetime Thomas, his third son, was ancestor of the Cunninghams of Caprington, baronets, and of the Cunninghams of Enterkin and Bedlan Robert, the eldest son, one of the hostages for King David the Second in 1357, died before his father His second son, also Sir William Cunningham, had a share of the forty thousand francs sent by the king of France, to be distributed among the principal persons in Scotland in 1385 He is witness in a permission by Sir John Blair to draw water through his lands of Adamton in Kyle, to the mill of Monkton, in 1390, wherein he is designed "vicecomes de Air" He founded the collegiate church of Kilmaurs, by charter of date 13th March 1403, and in 1401 is witness to the confirmation of the lands of Thornly He married Margaret, the elder of the two daughters and coheiresses of Sir Robert Denniston of that ilk (see DENNISTON, Lord), and with her acquired large possessions, namely, the lands and baronies of Danielston and Finlayston in Renfrewshire, Kilmaronock in Dumbartonshire, Glencairn, whence his descendants took their title of earl, in the county of Dumfries, and Redhall and Collinton in Mid Lothian, as appears from the original contract of division of the coheiresses in 1404 He died in 1418 He had three sons Robert, William, ancestor of the family of Cunninghamhead, and Henry, who distinguished himself at the battle of Beaugé in 1421

Sir Robert, the eldest son, got a charter of the lands of Kilmaurs from Robert duke of Albany, governor of Scotland, on his father's resignation of the same in 1413 He was knighted by King James the First, and sat on the jury on the trial of Murdoch duke of Albany in 1425 He and Sir Alexander Montgomery of Ardrossan, ancestor of the earls of Eglinton, had a joint commission for governing and defending Kintyre and Knapdale, 10th August, 1430 By his wife, Ann, a daughter of Sir John de Montgomery of Eglinton and Ardrossan, he had two sons, Alexander, and Archibald, designed of Waterston

Alexander de Cunningham, of the fourteenth generation from Warnebald, was created Lord Kilmaurs, by King James the Second, in 1445, and earl of Glencairn, by King James the Third, 28th May 1488 See GLENCAIRN, earl of

The earl of Glencairn, for supporters to his arms had two cowes, proper rolative to the name of Cunningham or Conningham

The immediate ancestor of the Cunninghams of Caprington was Thomas, third son of Sir William Cunningham of Kilmaurs, who lived in the reign of David the Second He got from his father in patrimony the lands of Baidland in Ayrshire, by charter dated in 1385 His son, Adam Cunningham, who succeeded him, married one of the daughters and coheiresses of Sir Duncan Wallace of Sundrum, by whom he got the lands of Caprington, which became the chief designation of the family, and in consequence they were long in use of quartering the arms of Wallace with their own Adam Cunningham of Caprington was, in 1491, one of the hostages for King James the First, in the room of Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig He died in the end of the reign of King James the Second

His son, Sir Adam Cunningham, had the honour of knighthood conferred on him by King James the Fourth He married Isabel, daughter of Malcolm Crawford of Kilburney, progenitor of the viscounts Garnock, and died in 1500 His son, John Cunningham of Caprington, seems to have been engaged in many of the feuds of the period, as his name often occurs in the Criminal Records of the time On November 21, 1527, with several kinsmen of the name of Cunningham, and six other persons, he found caution to appear before the justiciary, for intercommuning with Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, a declared rebel and at the horn, for the slaughter of Gilbert earl of Cassillis In May 1530, he and seventeen others were charged with being art and part in the cruel slaughter of John Tod, and not appearing, they were denounced rebels, along with David Boswell of Auchinleck, for this crime On August 9 1537, he and the said David Boswell, with twenty-seven others, found caution to underly the law at the next justice-aire of Ayr, for art and part of the mutilation of John Sampson, of the thumb of his right hand, of forethought felony By his first wife, Annabella, daughter of Sir Matthew Campbell of Loudoun, he had two sons, William, and Thomas, who is supposed to have got from his father the lands of Baidland

William Cunningham of Caprington, the elder son, was a person of considerable note and influence in his day His name, with that of the laird of Cunninghamhead, appears at the famous missive sent in 1570, by some of the barons of Ayrshire, to Kirkaldy of Grange, relative to his rumoured intention of slaying John Knox At the parliament held at Stirling 15th July 1578, the laird of Caprington was one of the persons appointed to examine and report on the Book of Policy presented by the church, which the lords had refused to ratify He was one of the assize on the trial, December 28, 1580, of William Lord Ruthven, lord high treasurer, and eighty-two others, his attendants and servants, for the slaughter of John Buchan, a servant of Lawrence Lord Oliphant, when they were acquitted At the meeting of the General Assembly at Glasgow, the 24th April 1581, William Cunningham of Caprington was appointed the king's commissioner to the church, and presented his majesty's letter to the Assembly The instructions given to him by the king on the occasion will be found inserted in Calderwood's History of the Kirk of Scotland, vol iii pp 516—519 Early in 1584 he was one of the commissioners sent from the king to the earl of Gowrie in Perth, to command him to take a remission for the raid of Ruthven, and to condemn the act as treason, which he did In the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh on 6th February 1588, he was one of the persons appointed to concur with the moderator, and advise upon the special matters to be considered in the Assembly at extraordinary hours He was also one of thirteen members appointed to meet and confer with six of the king's council concerning papistrie, the plantation of kirks, &c He died about 1597 He had three sons, William, his successor, John, of Broomhill, who carried on the line of the family, and Hugh, of Previck, progenitor of the family of Enterkine

The eldest son, William Cunningham of Caprington, being, with Daniel Cunningham of Dalbeith, charged, in the beginning of February 1598, to attend the raid of Dumfries, appointed by the earl of Angus, lieutenant and warden of the west marches, for the pursuit and punishment of disorderly persons, as was the custom of those days, went to the gathering with their followers armed in warlike manner, but finding there James Douglas of Torthorwald, who was then "a rebel and at the horn" for slaying the king's cousin, James Stewart of Newton, "and their near kinsman," they returned home without giving Angus the assistance required by the proclamation, and also abstained from going to another raid appointed by him at Dumfries in September 1599, and being afterwards indicted at law for abiding from these raids, they produced a letter from the king and council, dated 16th February 1600, discharging the justices from all procedure against them, and freeing them from ever attending any raid to which they might be summoned, where the said James Douglas was sure to be "This letter," says Mr Pitcairn, "affords a striking illustration of the insecure and disturbed state of the country and the weakness of government Douglas of Torthorwald residing so near the borders, seems to have been too powerful a subject to be sued even for the slaughter of a Stewart, 'cousin to the king' Although 'at the horn' for this slaughter, the lieutenant scruples not to accept of the assistance of this rebellious subject to restore peace to the borders, instead of delivering him up to justice for his crimes!" [Criminal Trials, vol ii page 108, note]

Sir William Cunningham of Caprington, the son of this laird, was, in 1618, knighted by King James the Sixth He was, at one period, possessed of an immense estate, but partly by his expense in building and profuse manner of living, and partly by his taking the losing side in the politics of the troubled times in which he lived, he contracted a load of debt that he could not get rid of, and his estate was sold by his creditors to the Chancellor Glencairn He first joined the side of the parliament, and in 1640 was nominated one of their committee In 1641, he was appointed one of the committee for stating the debts of the nation, and one of the up-

lifters of the English supply, also one of the members for planting of kirks He subsequently went over to the marquis of Montrose, for which parliament in 1646 imposed upon him a fine of fifteen hundred pounds sterling, and he was ordered to be imprisoned in Edinburgh castle till it was paid, but it being found that he could neither pay the money nor give security for the amount, he was liberated in 1647, on his giving bond to appear before the committee when called upon He married Lady Margaret Hamilton, second daughter of the first marquis of Abercorn, and died without issue, whereby the male line of the first branch of the family of Caprington became extinct

The representation devolved upon the descendants of John Cunningham of Broomhill, second son of William Cunningham, fourth laird of Caprington This John Cunningham had received from his father, in patrimony, the lands of Broomhill, which continued to be the chief designation of this the second branch of the family till they acquired the lands of Caprington in the second generation following The son of this John, William Cunningham, appears also to have been engaged on the parliament side, for we find Mr William Cunningham of Broomhill one of the commissioners from the covenanters to the king, in 1639 He married, first, Janet daughter of Patrick Leslie, Lord Lindores, by whom he had eighteen children in nine years (the first single, four times twins, and thrice three at each birth), but only three daughters survived to be married By his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of William Sinclair of Ratter (great-grandfather of William, tenth earl of Caithness, and thirteenth in descent from King Robert Bruce) he had three sons and four daughters His second son James was designed of Geise

His eldest son, Sir John Cunningham, an eminent lawyer, was, on 19th September 1669, created a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles the Second He possessed the lands of Lambruchtan, by which he was designated before he purchased back the lands of Caprington from the chancellor Glencairn That nobleman had bestowed that estate on his son, Lord Kilmaurs, and it was burdened with the jointure of his widow (Lady Betty Hamilton, a daughter of William duke of Hamilton) who lived in the castle of Caprington for fifty years after her husband's death, so that Sir John paid at last for the estate above three times its value He is mentioned with great commendation as a lawyer, by Sir George Mackenzie, and also by Bishop Burnet in his 'History of his own Times' He was, by many of the nobility and gentry, chosen, with Sir George Lockhart, to plead against the duke of Lauderdale's misgovernment in Scotland, before Charles the Second in council at London, Sir George Mackenzie, the lord advocate, being employed in his grace's behalf The duke's fall happened soon after Sir John died in 1684 By his wife, Margaret, daughter of William Murray of Polmaise and Touchadam in Stirlingshire, he had with a daughter two sons William, his successor, and John, who, like his father, was an eminent lawyer, and the first that undertook to read lectures on the Roman law in Scotland, as also on the Scots law He kept up a constant correspondence with the celebrated Dutch lawyer, Voet and by this method he perfected his classes in the Roman law, and saved many families the expense of a foreign education to their sons, there being no professorships of these branches of a legal education in Scotland at the time He continued to read his lectures till the year 1710, when he died Janet, the daughter, became the wife of George Primrose of Dunipace, and was the mother of Sir Archibald Primrose of Dunipace, executed at Carlisle in 1746 for his share in the rebellion of the preceding year

The elder son, Sir William Cunningham of Caprington, the second baronet, married Janet, only child and heiress of Sir James Dick of Prestonfield, baronet, (who died in 1728,) by whom he had six sons and four daughters

The baronetcy of Prestonfield devolved, first on William the third son (James the second son having died young), and on his death in 1746, upon the fourth but third surviving son, Alexander, who also inherited the estate, and in conformity with an entail executed by his grandfather, assumed the name of Dick Previously to succeeding to the title he had made an extensive continental tour with Allan Ramsay, the son of the author of the Gentle Shepherd, and a Journal which he kept on that occasion has been inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1853 He afterwards practised as a physician with great reputation in the county of Pembroke, as Dr Alexander Cunningham [See Dick, Sir Alexander, baronet]

On the death of his father, Sir William Cunningham, in 1740, the eldest son, John, became third baronet of Caprington He was esteemed one of the most learned and accomplished personages of his day Most of his time was spent in literary retirement at his castle of Caprington, and he is represented as having read Homer and Ariosto every year for the last thirty years of his life He was blessed with constant good health, and his faculties continued unimpaired to the last Sitting at supper with his usual cheerfulness, at Caprington, 30th November 1777, he was seized with a fit of apoplexy, fell back in his chair, and calmly expired, in the eighty-second year of his age He married in 1749, Lady Elizabeth Montgomery, eldest daughter of Alexander, ninth earl of Eglinton, and had by her two sons, William, his successor, and Alexander, an officer in the army

His elder son, Sir William Cunningham, fourth baronet, born 19th December 1752, died without issue, in January 1829, when the baronetcy and estate of Caprington devolved on his cousin, Sir Robert Keith Dick of Prestonfield, baronet who thus inherited two baronetcies He died in 1849, and was succeeded by his son, Sir William Hanmer Dick, born at Sylhet in Bengal in 1808, who assumed by authority of parliament the name of Cunningham, married with issue See DICK, surname of

The family of Cunningham of Cunninghamhead in Ayrshire, one of the oldest and most powerful cadets of the noble family of Glencairn, had at one time large possessions not only in that county but in Lanarkshire and Mid Lothian About the end of the seventeenth century it began to decline, and in 1724, the male line of the family became extinct The founder of it was William, second son of Sir William Cunningham of Kilmaurs, who married the heiress of Denmeston He received from his father the lands of Woodhead, in the parish of Dreghorn, on which the name was changed to Cunninghamhead, in compliment to the family name

This branch of the Cunninghams had a feud with the Mures of Rowallan, and on November 3, 1508, Robert Cunningham of Cunninghamhead, the second proprietor of the estate, was at the Ayr justice-aire, convicted of having, with convocation of the leges, gone to the kirk of Stewarton, against John Mure of Rowallan and his men, for the office of parish clerk of the said kirk, also of art and part of the oppression done to Elizabeth Ross, Lady Cunninghamhead, in occupying and manuring her third part of the lands of Cunninghamhead and Bonailly, and of thereby breaking the king's protection upon her, in the year 1508, and of art and part of the oppression done to the abbot and convent of Kilwinning, and to Hew earl of Eglinton, their tenant, in the "spulzie" of the teind sheaves of the lands of Middleton, in the parish of Perston, and of breaking the "safeguard" of the king upon the said earl, in the year 1508

William Cunningham of Cunninghamhead, the fifth in descent from Sir William Cunningham of Kilmaurs, was that laird of Cunninghamhead who, in 1559, was sent, with the laird of Pittarrow, to the queen regent to explain the designs of the Lords of the Congregation He was present in the great parliament of 1560, and in 1562 subscribed the far-famed bond for support of the reformed religion, drawn up by John Knox On May 12th of the latter year William Cunningham of Cunninghamhead was indicted for abiding from the raid of Jedburgh, and his son, "the young laird," was amerciated for his non entry to underly the law The laird of Cunninghamhead was a member of the renowned General Assembly which met at Edinburgh on 25th June 1565, that was so obnoxious to the popish party at the time, and he was one of the committee appointed to present its articles to the queen After the "Chase-About Raid," the same year, he was one of the leaders of the Reformed party who with the earl of Moray, afterwards regent, retired to Carlisle for a time In 1570 he was among the Ayrshire barons who signed the famous letter to Kirkcaldy of Grange in behalf of John Knox

A succeeding laird, his grandson or nephew, was, on 11th March 1607, retoured heir to his father, John Cunningham of Cunninghamhead, in the lands in Ayrshire as well as in those of Woodhall and Bonailly in Mid-Lothian (part of the ancient estate of the Dennestons, and which continued in a branch of this family for nearly a hundred years longer) By his wife Mary, eldest daughter of Sir James Edmonstone of Duntreath, he had William, his successor, and two daughters The elder daughter, Barbara, married in 1624, James Fullarton, younger of Fullarton and their descendant Colonel William Fullarton, was served heir to this family of Cunninghamhead on 17th December 1791

The son, Sir William Cunninghame, succeeded about 1607, and was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, in 1627 He died about 1640 Barbara, his eldest daughter, married Mure of Caldwell, and was, by the prelatical party, subjected to much suffering on account of her adherence to the Covenant His son Sir William, the second baronet, married in August 1661, the Hon Anne Ruthven, eldest daughter of Thomas first Lord Ruthven of Freeland, who survived him, and took for her second husband William Cunninghame of Craigends The second baronet was, in 1662, by the ruling party, for his support of the covenant, fined two hundred pounds sterling In 1664 he was arraigned as a delinquent before the high commission, and escaped with difficulty In 1665 he was committed to prison In the following year, when several other gentlemen were liberated, he was detained, and in 1688 he was still more strictly confined He got little respite till December 1669, when he was finally discharged, and died in 1670

His only son Sir William, third baronet, was served heir to his mother in 1679, and on the decease of David, second Lord Ruthven, in 1701, without issue, he assumed the name of Ruthven in addition to his own, but did not take that peerage, (although there was no male claimant, and he was the son of the elder daughter of the first Lord Ruthven) but allowed his cousin, Isabel the daughter of his mother's youngest sister, Elizabeth, to enjoy the title of Lady Ruthven, and her descendants now possess the peerage of Ruthven Like his father he suffered much from religious persecution, even when but a schoolboy He died without issue in 1724, when the baronetcy became extinct Cunninghamhead was sold, in that year, to John Snodgrass, Esq, and is still possessed by his descendant, Mr Snodgrass Buchanan The representative of the family is now in the person of Fullarton of Fullarton, as lineally descended from Barbara, eldest daughter of John Cunninghame of Cunninghamehead, married to his ancestor in 1624

The Cunninghames of Aiket, also in Ayrshire, a very ancient family, now extinct, descended from Gilbert or Gilmore de Cunningham, mentioned (on page 748) as one of the nominees of Robert de Brus in the competition with Baliol They seem to have been actively engaged in the feuds of the Cunningham family with the Sempills, the Mures, and the Montgomeries, as on November 20, 1533, Robert Cunningham of Aiket and William his son were among those who found caution to underly the law for besetting the way, on two occasions, of William Lord Sempill, for his slaughter, and on November 4th, 1570, William Cunninghame of Aiket and two of his servants, with John Raeburn of that ilk, his son-in-law, were put upon their trial for the murder of John Mure of Caldwell, when they pleaded that the deed was committed by the deceased Alexander Cunninghame of Aiket, and they were unanimously acquitted On January 12th, 1578-9, Helen Colquhoun, the wife of William Cunninghame of Aiket, was accused of administering poison to her husband, but did not make her appearance for trial Alexander Cunninghame of Aiket, was, in 1586, concerned in the murder of Hugh, fourth earl of Eglinton (see EGLINTON, fourth earl of), Captain James Cunninghame, the seventh from the above Robert, was retoured heir to his father, James Cunninghame, in Aiket and some adjacent lands He is supposed to be the same with Major James Cunninghame of Aiket who appears as a commissioner of supply for Ayrshire in 1704, and it is likely was the same gentleman who made such a distinguished opposition to the union in 1707, as mentioned in the histories of that period Two aged ladies who in 1823 were living in Ayr were said to have been the last of this family

The first of the Cunninghams of Robertland in Ayrshire, was William Cunningham of Craigends in Renfrewshire, of the noble family of Glencairn He bestowed that estate on his second son, David Cunningham of Bartonholme, whose son and grandson, both also named David, succeeded to the estate The latter, who was knighted, was in 1586 a party concerned in the murder of Hugh fourth earl of Eglinton (see EGLINTON, fourth earl of) His son, also Sir David Cunningham, had three sons David, his successor, Alexander, and Sir James, gentleman of the bedchamber to King Charles the First In 1644, when the duke of Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanark were put under arrest at Oxford, Sir James Cunningham was extremely instrumental in aiding the escape of the latter The eldest son, David, was served heir to his father in 1628, previous to which, according to Crawfurd, he was master of the works to King James the Sixth He was, by Charles the First, created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 25th November 1630, by patent to him and his heirs male whatsoever In the subsequent civil wars he suffered much on account of his loyalty to that unfortunate monarch His successor Sir David, supposed to be his son, was a commissioner of supply for Ayrshire in 1661, and died before 1675, when his uncle, Sir Alexander, became third baronet Sir David, the sixth baronet, in 1696 had a protection in his favour from parliament He was succeeded by his kinsman, William Cunningham (son of William Cunningham of Auchenskeith, whose father, John Cunningham of Waterston, was the son of Christian, killed at the siege of Namur, second son of Sir David, the first baronet) He married in 1741 Margaret, daughter of William Fairlie of Fairlie, in the same county, and in 1778 was served heir to Sir David Cuningham of Robertland, and assumed the title He died 25th October 1781 He had two sons, William, his heir, and Alexander Cuningham, collector of customs at Irvine

Sir William, the seventh baronet, was the gentleman referred to by Burns as his informant of the anecdote relative to the circumstances under which Allan Ramsay, when on a visit at Loudoun castle, composed his song of the 'Lass of Patie's Mill' He assumed the additional surname of Fairlie, and on his death in 1811, he was succeeded by his eldest son Sir William, who died February 1, 1837 Sir William's brother, Sir John Cuningham Fairlie, born 29th July 1779, succeeded him as 7th baronet He married, 8th August 1808 Janet Lucretia, daughter of John Wallace, Esq of Kelly, but without issue Died 1852, when his next brother, Sir Charles Cuningham Fairlie, became 8th baronet Died 1859, when his son, Sir Percy Arthur, born in 1815, became 9th baronet

A baronetcy is also possessed by the family of Cuninghame of Corsehill, in the same county, descended from Andrew, second son of the fourth earl of Glencairn From his father he got certain lands in Ayrshire, the two Corsehills being particularly specified, and the grant was confirmed to him and his wife, Margaret Cuningham (of the family of Polmaise), by royal charter, dated 4th May 1537 and 4th January 1548 Like his elder brother, Alexander, fifth earl of Glencairn, he was actively engaged in support of the Reformation, and being convicted of heresy before the lords spiritual in 1538, had his estate forfeited He afterwards received a pardon, and obtained a new charter of his lands He died in 1545

His eldest son, Cuthbert, married Matilda, daughter of Cunninghame of Aiket, and died in 1575 He had with two daughters, two sons, Patrick and Alexander, minors at the time of his death The former was slain in the feud between the Cunninghams and the Montgomeries The latter, who succeeded, died in May 1646 With three daughters, he had two sons, Alexander and David of Dalbeath His great-grandson, Alexander Cuninghame, succeeded in 1667, and on 26th February 1672, he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, by diploma, to himself and the heirs male of his body His son, Sir Alexander, second baronet, succeeded in 1685, and died in 1730 His son, Sir David Cuninghame, the third baronet, married Penelope Montgomery, niece and heiress of Sir Walter Montgomery, baronet, of Kirktonholm (descended from the Montgomeries of Skelmorley) by whom he had three sons and a daughter The eldest son, Alexander Cuninghame, a captain in the army, served in the wars in Flanders On succeeding to the estate of Kirktonholm, he adopted the name and arms of Montgomery, in consequence of a clause to that effect in the deed of entail He married Elizabeth, eldest daughter and thereafter heiress of David Montgomery of Lainshaw, descended from Sir Neil Montgomery of Lainshaw, and representative of the family of Lyle Lord Lyle He predeceased his father, Sir David, by a few months in 1770 He had five sons and two daughters His third son, Alexander, served as an officer in the duke of Hamilton's regiment during the American war, and died unmarried in 1782, and his youngest, Henry Drumlanrig, entered the navy and was lieutenant on board the Alfred in Rodney's great engagement, 12th April 1782 He died in 1785

Sir Walter, eldest son of Captain Alexander Cuninghame, and fourth baronet, sold the estate of Lainshaw, in 1779, to William Cuninghame, second son and heir of Alexander Cuninghame of Bridgehouse in the same county On his death, unmarried, in March 1814, he was succeeded by his brother, Sir David, fifth baronet, who had previously been in the royal North British dragoons. He also died unmarried, in November following His only surviving brother, Sir James, the fifth son of Captain Alexander Cuninghame, became the sixth baronet He married Jessie, second daughter of Thomas Cuning, Esq banker in Edinburgh, representative of the ancient family of Cuming of Earnside, whose curious figure is among the most characteristic of "Kay's Edinburgh Portraits" Sir James had five sons and two daughters, and died in 1837 The eldest son, Sir Alexander David Montgomery Cuninghame, died 8th June 1846, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir Thomas Montgomery Cuninghame, eighth baronet, married, with issue, three sons and three daughters, one of the claimants of the dormant earldom of Glencairn, as lineal male descendant of William, fourth earl (See GLENCAIRN, earl of)

The Cunynghames of Milncraig, Ayrshire, and Livingstone, Linlithgowshire, who also possess a baronetcy, are likewise sprung from the above-mentioned William Cuninghame of Craigends, from whom descended Cunyngham of Polquhaine, who obtained the estate of Milncraig, by marrying one of the daughters and coheiresses of William Cathcart of Corbiestoun (a junior member of the noble family of Cathcart), and was great-grandfather of David Cunynghame of Milncraig and Livingstone, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia 3d February, 1702 Sir David Cunynghame was a person of eminent talents, a distinguished lawyer, an eloquent member of the Scottish parliament, and the friend and coadjutor of Fletcher of Saltoun His eldest son, Sir James Cunynghame, died, unmarried, in 1747, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir David, a lieutenant-general in the army, and colonel, in 1757, of the 57th regiment of infantry He died suddenly, of the gout in his stomach, 10th October, 1767 His son, Sir William Augustus, fourth baronet, for many years M P for Linlithgowshire, long held several respectable offices in the public service He died 17th March 1828 His eldest son, Sir David Cunynghame, fifth baronet, born in 1769, died in 1854 He was a colonel (1797) and served at Famars, St Amand, and Lincelles, where he was severely wounded, also served at the siege of Valenciennes, and the action at Ostend in May 1798 He was thrice married, the first time, in 1801, to a daughter of Lord-chancellor Thurlow His eldest son Sir David Thurlow Cunynghame born in 1803, succeeded as 6th baronet, married, with issue

The family of Cuninghame of Craigends in Renfrewshire, so often mentioned, is lineally descended from Sir William Cunningham, the second son of Alexander first earl of Glencairn He received the lands of Craigends from his father before the end of the fifteenth century One of the family named William Cuninghame of Craigends was, in 1534, killed by Gabriel Semplll of Cathcart Another, Gabriel Cuninghame, fell at the battle of Pinkie in 1547 In 1689 the freeholders of Renfrewshire elected William Cuninghame of Craigends their commissioner to the convention of estates, where, and in the several subsequent sessions of parliament, he was distinguished by his great fidelity and honour The family is at present represented by a gentleman of the same name

The Cuninghames of Lainshaw were descended from Adam Cunninghame of Bridgehouse, a cadet of the family of Caprington William Cuninghame, the third from this Adam and fourth of Bridgehouse, purchased in 1779 the estate of

Lanshaw, in the vicinity of Stewarton, from Sir Walter Montgomery Cunninghame, baronet of Corsehill He was thrice married, and had a large family By his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of James Campbell, merchant in Glasgow, he had one son, William Cunninghame, who succeeded him in Lanshaw This gentleman, who died November 6, 1849, was well-known for his piety and benevolence, and for his writings He published various works on prophecy and scriptural chronology, of which a list is subjoined

CUNNINGHAM, ALEXANDER, an historical writer of some note, son of the Rev Alexander Cunningham, minister of Ettrick, was born there in 1654 He acquired the elementary branches of his education at home, and according to the custom of the times, went to Holland to finish his studies In 1688 he accompanied the prince of Orange to England He afterwards became tutor and travelling companion to the earl of Hyndford, and his brother, the Hon William Carmichael, subsequently to John Lord Lorn, afterwards duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and thereafter to Viscount Lonsdale He seems to have been employed by the English ministry in some political negociations on the Continent, and we are informed that he sent an exact account to King William, with whom he was personally acquainted, of the military preparations throughout France In Carstairs' State Papers, published by Dr MacCormick, there are two letters from Mr Cunningham, dated Paris, August 22 and 26, 1701, giving an account of his conferences with the French minister, relative to the Scottish trade with France In 1703 he visited Hanover, and was graciously received by the elector and the princess Sophia On the accession of George the First he was sent as British envoy to Venice, where he resided from 1715 to 1720 He died at London in 1737, at the advanced age of 83 His works are

CUNNINGHAM, ALEXANDER, a critic of acknowledged learning, often confounded with the preceding, was a native of Ayrshire Early in life he went to Holland, where he is supposed to have taught the civil and canon law He published the works of Horace, with animadversions on Bentley's edition of that poet, in 2 vols 8vo, 1721 He died at the Hague in December 1730

CUNNINGHAM, CHARLES, an historical painter of considerable genius, was born in Scotland in 1741 He early displayed such a capacity for design and such a lively imagination that his friends sent him to Italy, where he had for his master Raphael Mengs After finishing his studies he went to Russia, where he painted several historical pictures for Prince Potemkin His success was so brilliant that he resolved to settle in St Petersburg, but the rigour of the climate affected his health, and he was obliged, in consequence, to quit Russia The glory surrounding the name and deeds of Frederick the Great allured him to Prussia Soon after his arrival at Berlin he became a member of the Academy of the Fine Arts, and painted several pictures the subjects of which were taken from Prussian history, and of which Frederick was generally the hero Of these, the battle of Hochkirk, fought Oct 14, 1758, in which Frederick was surprised by Marshal Daun, and defeated, was the most celebrated The academy expressed its admiration of this picture in terms which were alike honourable to the arts and the artist The king, Frederick William II, wishing to reward Cunningham for this great work with something more substantial than thanks, ordered his minister to enter his name for the first pension which should fall vacant This intention was rendered nugatory, however, by the premature death of Cunningham, which took place in 1789

CUNNINGHAM, THOMAS MOUNSEY, a lyric poet of considerable merit, second son of John Cunningham, and his wife, Elizabeth Hailey and elder brother of Allan Cunningham, was born at Culfaud, in the county of Kirkcudbright, June 25th, 1776, and was named after Dr Mounsey of Rammerscales, near Lochmaben His father, who was a farmer, being unsuccessful in his speculations, relinquished agriculture on his own account, and became steward or factor to Mr Syme of Barncailhe, and on the death of the latter, he went with his family to reside at Blackwood on the Nith, the seat of Copland of Collieston Thomas Cunningham received the first part of his education at Kellieston school, in that neighbourhood, and was afterwards removed to the schools of Dumfries, where, to reading, writing, and arithmetic, he added book-keeping, mathematics, a good deal of French, and a little Latin When he was about sixteen, he became clerk to John Maxwell of Terraughty, a distant connection of his mother, with whom he did not long continue Having been offered a clerkship in a mercantile house in South Carolina, he was preparing to set out, when Mr Patrick Miller of Dalswinton, to whom his father was now engaged as steward, being consulted, gave it as his opinion that he should not go, and Thomas was apprenticed, instead, to a neighbouring millwright He began when very young to write verses in the language of his district, and in a strain of country humour calculated to please a rustic audience His first poem of a graver kind was called the 'Harst Kirn,' descriptive of a farm-house scene at the conclusion of harvest, written in 1797 On the expiration of his apprenticeship, in October of that year he went to England, and obtained employment at Rotherham The parting scene with his family he embodied in a little poem called 'The Traveller' His employer having become bankrupt, he made his way to London, and began to entertain a design of going to the West Indies, on a speculation of sugar-mills, but his former master having recommenced business at Lynn, in Norfolk, he was induced to return to his employment He afterwards went to Wiltshire, and subsequently to the neighbourhood of Cambridge While here, he wrote his exquisite song, 'The Hills o' Gallowa',' also, a satirical poem, styled 'The Cambridgeshire Garland,' and a more serious one, called 'The Unco Grave' In 'Brash and Reid's Poetry, original and selected,' will be found his 'Har'st Home,' the first of his pieces, we believe, that appeared in print He now became a constant contributor to the Edinburgh Magazine, to which he sent not only poems and songs, but also, some years subsequently, Sketches of Modern Society, Stories of the Olden Time, Snatches of Antiquarianism, and Scraps of Song and Ballad The Ettrick Shepherd was so much struck with the native force and originality of his strains, that he addressed a poetical epistle to him in that periodical, a reply to which, by Cunningham, also in verse, shortly afterwards appeared in the same Magazine

Having gone to Dover in search of employment, Cunningham was there in August 1805, and witnessed that naval combat between our cruisers and the French flotilla, in which Lieutenant Marshall fell One of his poems written about this time was entitled 'London,' and had as little of the romantic in it as the great city itself He subsequently settled in the metropolis, having obtained employment in the establishment of Mr Rennie He afterwards became foreman to a Mr Dickson, and on quitting him, he undertook the superintendence of Fowler's chain cable manufactory near the London Docks A clerkship becoming vacant in Rennie's establishment, he was, in 1812, re-engaged there, and latterly became chief clerk, with liberty to admit his eldest son as an assistant In 1809, when the Ettrick Shepherd planned 'The Forest Minstrel,' he requested sixteen pages or so of verse from 'Nithsdale's lost and darling Cunningham,' who permitted several of his shorter pieces to appear in that collection He had ceased to write anything, either in prose or poetry, for many years A poem, called 'Brakenfell,' which he composed in 1818, and the scene of which was laid at Blackwood on Nithside, is highly spoken of by his brother, who tells us that, from blighted views in literature, in his latter years he burnt many of his manuscript tales and poems, and 'Brakenfell' among the rest On the 23d October 1834, just one week after the marriage of his daughter to Mr Oliver, a South American merchant of respectability, Cunningham was seized with cholera, and after eight hours' severe illness, expired a little after twelve o'clock at night The chief characteristics of his poetry are tenderness, oddity, and humour Besides the pieces specified, his 'Hallowmass Eve,' and 'Mary Ogilvy,' are mentioned as happy instances of the romantic and the imaginative

CUNNINGHAM, ALLAN, a poet and novelist, was born at Blackwood, near Dalswinton, in Dumfries-shire, on the 7th December, 1784 His father was gardener to a gentleman in that neighbourhood, but soon after Allan's birth, he became factor or land-steward to Mr Miller of Dalswinton, the landlord of Burns the poet, at Ellisland After receiving the rudiments of his education, Allan was taken from school, when only eleven years of age, and apprenticed as a stone-mason to an uncle of his, who was a country builder in considerable business, with the view of joining or succeeding him in his trade, but this project was never carried into execution Notwithstanding the disadvantageous circumstances under which he entered on life, he contrived to acquire a considerable amount of varied information, from great though desultory reading He early contributed poetical effusions to the periodical works of the day, and made a pilgrimage on foot to Edinburgh for the sole purpose of seeing the author of 'Marmion,' as he passed along the street He afterwards, in 1820, had the opportunity of being introduced to Sir Walter Scott, when he communicated to him Sir Francis Chantrey's wish that he should sit to him for his bust When Cromek, the London engraver visited Scotland, for the purpose of collecting any unpublished fragments of Burns that could be gleaned, he was directed to Allan Cunningham as the most likely person to assist him in his researches Allan was then a journeyman stonemason and a married man He advised Cromek to form a collection of the ancient ballads and songs of Nithsdale and Galloway, and wrote various happy imitations of them which he sent to Cromek as genuine relics of ancient song Indeed, nearly all the songs and fragments of verse in Cromek's 'Remains of Nithsdale and Galloway Song,' published in 1810, are of Cunningham's composition, though believed by Cromek, who was imposed upon by their beauty, to be undoubted originals The same year (1810) Allan Cunningham removed to London, and was for some time employed as a writer for the newspapers In

1814 he was engaged as clerk of the works, or superintendent, in the studio of Sir Francis Chantrey, the eminent sculptor, in whose establishment he continued till his death He was a most industrious writer, and published various works in different departments of literature, a list of which is subjoined Previous to the publication of his 'Sir Marmaduke Maxwell,' in 1822, he submitted the MS to Sir Walter Scott, for his opinion and advice, which the latter conveyed in two letters, inserted in Lockhart's Life of Scott He highly approved of the drama, though he did not think it altogether fitted for the stage Cunningham's collection of 'The Songs of Scotland,' with notes, appeared in 1835 He also edited an edition of the works of Burns, in eight volumes, to which he prefixed a life of the poet, interspersed with original anecdotes and enriched with new information He was a boy of twelve years of age at the time of Burns' death, and as he saw him just previous to that event, and was a witness of his funeral, his account of the closing scenes of the poet's life, and the state of feeling in Dumfries at the time, is intensely interesting His last work, completed just two days before his death, was the life of his friend, Sir David Wilkie, the distinguished artist, in three volumes Allan Cunningham died suddenly of apoplexy, at his house 27 Lower Belgrave Place, London, on the 29th October, 1842, aged 58 Through the influence of Sir Walter Scott, two of Mr Cunningham's sons obtained, in 1828, cadetships in the service of the East India Company He left two other sons

Allan Cunningham's genius was strong, vigorous, and earnest, but not well regulated It has been remarked of him that his taste and attainments in the fine arts were as remarkable a feature in his history as his early ballad strains, which undoubtedly are his best poetical effusions His prose style, when engaged on a congenial subject, was justly admired for its force and freedom Strong nationality and inextinguishable ardour formed conspicuous traits in his character His works are.

CURRIE, a surname which appears to have been derived from Korsa or Corus, a Roman station The parish of Currie, in Mid Lothian, is one of those districts which still retain their ancient Latin appellation

Piers de Currie, descended from the family of Currie of that ilk, in Annandale, is celebrated in the Norse Chronicle, as well as in old Scottish ballad, for his exploits at the battle of Largs, where he was slain in 1263

The elder branch of the Curries of that ilk merged in the Johnstones of Annandale, by the marriage of one of that family with the heiress of Currie about 1540 From a cadet Cuthbert Currie, of Kirklands, Dunse, living about 1570, descended William Currie, (died in 1681,) ancestor by a younger son, of the celebrated Dr Currie, the biographer of Burns (of whom a notice follows), while from his eldest son was descended Sir Frederick Currie, baronet, (created 17th December 1816,) one of the secretaries to the government in India a member of the supreme council in India, and a director of the L I C Thrice married issue, 8 sons and 3 daughters

CURRIE, JAMES, an eminent physician, the biographer of Burns, was the son of the Rev James Currie, minister of Kirkpatrick-Fleming in Dumfries-shire, where he was born, May 31, 1756 After receiving the rudiments of education at the parish school of Middlebie, of which parish his father had become minister, he was sent at the age of thirteen to a seminary at Dumfries, conducted by Dr Chapman, the author of a work on education He afterwards went to Virginia with a view to the mercantile profession, but the dissensions between Great Britain and her American colonies, which soon put a stop to the trade of the two countries, and the ungenerous treatment of his employers, disgusted him with commerce, and turning his attention to politics, he published in an American paper, under the signature of 'An Old Man,' a series of letters in defence of the right of the mother country to tax her colonies He returned to his native country in 1776, and studied medicine at

Edinburgh till 1780 Having procured an introduction to General Sir William Erskine, he was appointed by him ensign and surgeon's assistant in his own regiment With the view of obtaining the situation of physician, or assistant physician, to the forces, with an expedition then going out to Jamaica, he took his degree of M.D at Glasgow, and immediately proceeded to London On his arrival in the metropolis, however, he found that the appointment had been given to another By the advice of his friends, he was induced, in October 1780, to settle in Liverpool, where he was soon elected one of the physicians to the Infirmary, and obtained an extensive practice In 1783 he married Lucy Wallace, daughter of a respectable merchant, the lineal descendant of the hero of Scotland, and by her he had a numerous family

In conjunction with Mr Roscoe, and the late Mr William Rathbone, Dr Currie laid the foundation of a literary club, the first institution of the kind in Liverpool He was chosen a member of the Literary Society at Manchester, to whose Transactions he contributed some ingenious papers He was elected a member of the London Medical Society in 1790, and in 1791 a fellow of that Society His various medical publications raised his name very high, but he was less successful in his miscellaneous political writings. These latter were invariably on the unpopular side, and a letter which he addressed to Mr Pitt in 1793 raised him a host of enemies During an excursion which he made into Scotland in 1792, on account of his health, he had become personally acquainted with Robert Burns On the death of the poet, at the request of his old friend Mr Syme of Ryedale, and for the benefit of Burns' family, he undertook the superintendence of the first complete edition of his works, with an account of his life, and criticisms on his writings, which was published in 1800, in 4 vols 8vo

In 1804 Dr Currie was seriously attacked by a pulmonary complaint, to which he had been for many years subject, and having relinquished his practice at Liverpool, he spent the ensuing winter alternately at Bath and Clifton In March 1805 he felt himself so far recovered, as to take a house at Bath and commence practice there But all his complaints returning with increased violence, he went, as a last resource, to Sidmouth in Devonshire, where he died, August 31, 1805, in the 50th year of his age, leaving a widow and five children His works are
