travelled to Europe, through Turkey, and passed some time at Constantinople. In 1802, during the short peace of Amiens, he resided for a time at Paris. From 1803 to 1805, he served with his regiment in Ireland In the latter year it was ordered out to the West Indies, and he remained without active employment till the spring of 1808, when Sir John Moore being sent, with ten thousand men, to the assistance of the king of Sweden, Colonel Graham obtained permission to go with him as aide-de-camp He availed himself of the opportunity to traverse the country in all directions Sir John Moore's mission having failed, he was ordered to proceed to Spain, whither Colonel Graham accompanied him, and served with him during the whole campaign of 1808, and in the arduous and disastrous retreat to Corunna On that gallant commander receiving his death-wound at the battle of Corunna, Colonel Graham was one of the officers who hastened to his assistance, and among the last inquiries of the dying general, just previous to his death, was one in which his name was mentioned, "Are Colonel Graham and all my aides-de-camp well?"

On the embarkation of the troops, Colonel Graham accompanied them to England He was promoted to the rank of major-general, July 25, 1810, and appointed to command a division in the expedition to Walcheren At the siege of Flushing, he was actively employed, but being attacked by fever he was obliged to return home On his recovery, he was sent, with the rank of lieutenant-general, to take the command of the British and Portuguese troops in Cadiz, which, at that time, was blockaded by the French

On the 21st February, 1811, an expedition sailed from Cadiz, under the command of lieutenant-general Graham and the Spanish general, Don Manuel La Pena, to join the Spanish forces at St. Roche, with the object of making a combined attack on the rear of the French engaged in the blockade, a movement which led to the memorable battle of Barossa in the following March On the day following, the expedition landed at Algesiras, and on the 23d marched to Tarifa, without any other road than a mule path, which was found difficult for the advance of the cavalry, which, with all the artillery, were sent onwards by sea. The British force consisted of a brigade of artillery, with ten guns, two battalions of foot guards, the 28th, 67th, and 87th regiments, a battalion composed of flank companies, which joined from Gibraltar, two companies of the 47th regiment, and two of the 20th Portuguese regiment, with six companies of the rifle brigade, and one squadron of cavalry The Spanish army, under the command of General La Pena, to whom, being senior officer, General Graham ceded the chief command, consisted of two divisions, in all, between ten and eleven thousand men On getting the artillery and horses on shore, the Anglo-Spanish force proceeded to Veger, where they remained all day, and after a night march of sixteen hours, they arrived on the morning of the 5th March on the low ridge of Barossa, about four miles to the southward of the mouth of the Santi Petri river A well-conducted and successful attack on the rear of the enemy's lines near Santi Petri, by the vanguard of the Spanish division of the combined force, under Brigadier-general Ladrizabel, having opened the communication with the Isla de Leon, General Graham, whose division had halted on the eastern slope of the Barossa height, received General La Pena's directions to move down from the position of Barossa to that of the Torre de Bermeya, about half-way to the Santi Petri river, to secure the communication across, a bridge having been recently erected there The ground between Barossa and Bermeya is a rough uneven plain, skirted by a great pine forest General Graham's division accordingly marched about twelve o'clock through the wood towards the Bermeya On the march he received intelligence that the enemy had appeared in force in the plain and was advancing towards the heights As he considered that position the key of that of Santi Petri, he immediately gave orders for a counter-march, in order to support the troops left in its defence, but before the British could get disentangled from the wood, the Spanish force posted on the heights were seen retiring, while the enemy's left wing was rapidly ascending

The force of the enemy which had thus seized the heights, after having dislodged the Spanish troops, amounted to not less than 3,500 men, under General Rufin Another body of 4,000 men was drawn up on the left of Rufin to oppose the approach of the British The total of the French force opposed to the latter, and to the latter alone, was thus about 7,500 men, being nearly double the force under General Graham "A retreat," says General Graham in his despatch, "in the face of such an enemy, already within reach of the easy communication by the sea-beach, must have involved the whole allied army in all the danger of being attacked, during the unavoidable confusion of the different corps arriving on the narrow ridge of Bermeya nearly at the same time Trusting to the known heroism of British troops, regardless of the numbers and position of their enemy, an immediate attack was determined on Major Duncan soon opened a powerful battery of ten guns in the centre Brigadier-general Dilkes, with the brigade of guards, Lieutenant-colonel Browne's (of the 28th) flank battalion, Lieutenant colonel Norcott's two companies of the 2d rifle corps, and Major Acheson, with a part of the 67th foot, separated from the regiment in the wood, formed on the right Colonel Wheatly's brigade, with three companies of Coldstream guards under Lieutenant-colonel Jackson, separated likewise from his battalion in the wood, and Lieutenant-colonel Barnard's flank battalion, formed on the left As soon as the infantry was thus hastily got together, the guns advanced to a more favourable position, and kept up a most destructive fire The right wing proceeded to the attack of General Rufin's division on the hill, while Lieutenant-colonel Barnard's battalion and Lieutenant-colonel Busche's detachment of the 20th Portuguese, were warmly engaged with the enemy's tirailleurs on our left General Laval's division, notwithstanding the havoc made by Major Duncan's battery, continued to advance in very imposing masses, opening his fire of musketry, and was only checked by that of the left wing The left wing now advanced, firing, a most determined charge, by the three companies of guards, and the 87th regiment, supported by all the remainder of the wing, decided the defeat of General Laval's division A reserve formed beyond the narrow valley, across which the enemy was closely pursued, next shared the same fate and was routed by the same means Meanwhile the right wing was not less successful. The enemy, confident of success, met General Dilkes on the ascent of the hill, and the contest was sanguinary, but the undaunted perseverance of the brigade of guards, of Lieutenant-colonel Browne's battalion, and of Lieutenant-colonel Norcott's and Major Acheson's department overcame every obstacle, and General Rufin's division was driven from the heights in confusion, leaving two pieces of cannon "

The despatch then proceeds to bear testimony to the gallantry and devotion of every officer and soldier engaged, specifying as usual those by name who had more particularly distinguished themselves In less than an hour and a half from the commencement of the action, the French were in full retreat The retiring divisions met, halted, and seemed inclined to form, but the British artillery still advancing, quickly dispersed them The exhausted state of the troops made pursuit impossible The eagle of the 8th Imperial regiment was taken by Sergeant Masterman of the 87th, who was afterwards rewarded for his brave achievement by a commission Generals Rufin and Rosseau, severely wounded, were among the prisoners, and General Bellegarde, an aide-de-camp of Marshal Victor, and many other officers, among the killed This celebrated victory was gained, in spite of every possible disadvantage, as to position and locality, on the side of the British They had to attack the enemy in their own position, and to fight for ground which they had lost only by the weakness of the Spanish general As has been well remarked, Barossa was to General Graham what Almarez was to Lord Hill, and Albuera to Lord Beresford—the greatest event of their lives, and the source of all their distinctions A vote of thanks was immediately passed in parliament to Lieutenant-general Graham, and to the brave force under his command He was at that time a member of the House of Commons, and in his place in parliament he received that distinguished token of a nation's gratitude In his reply, after stating that it would ill become him to disguise his feelings on the occasion, for he well knew the inestimable value of such thanks to a soldier, he added, "I have formerly often heard you, Sir, eloquently and impressively deliver the thanks of the house to officers present, and never without an anxious wish that I might one day receive this most enviable mark of my country's regard. This honest ambition is now fully gratified, and I am more than ever bound to try to merit the good opinion of the house" At the same time he obtained the Grand Cross of the order of the Bath, which entitled him to the designation of a knight

The battle of Barossa was distinguished as the first fight in which the English captured a French eagle. Sir Walter Scott pays the following well merited tribute to the gallant Graham —

"Nor be his praise o'erpast, who strove to hide
Beneath the warrior's vest affection's wound,
Whose wish Heaven for his country's weal denied,
Danger and fate he sought, but glory found
From clime to clime, where'er war's trumpets sound,
The wanderer went, yet, Caledonia! still Thine was his thought in march and tented ground,
He dreamed, 'mid Alpine cliffs, of Athole's hill,
And heard, in Ebro's roar, his Lynedoch's lovely rill

"O! hero of a race renowned of old,
Whose war-cry oft has waked the battle swell,
Since first distinguished in the onset bold,
Wild sounding when the Roman rampart fell!
By WALLACE' side it rung the Southron's knell,
Alderne, Kilsyth, and Tiber own'd its fame,
Tummel's rude pass can of its terrors tell,
But ne'er from prouder field arose the name, [GRAHAM."
Than when wild Ronda heard the conquering shout of

Colonel Napier, in his History of the War in the Peninsula, referring to the battle of Barossa says, "All the passages in this extraordinary battle were so broadly marked, that observations would be useless The contemptible feebleness of La Pena furnished a surprising contrast to the heroic vigour of Graham, whose attack was an inspiration rather than a resolution, so wise, so sudden was the decision, so swift, so conclusive was the execution . . Indeed such was La Pena's misconduct, that the French, although defeated, gained their main point, the blockade was renewed, and it is remarkable that during the action, a French detachment passed near the bridge of Zuazo without difficulty, and brought back prisoners . In Cadiz violent disputes arose La Pena, in an address to the Cortes, claimed the victory for himself He affirmed that all the previous arrangements were made with the knowledge and approbation of the English general, and the latter's retreat into the Isla he indicated as the real cause of failure Lasey and General Cruz-Murgeon also published inaccurate accounts of the action, and even had deceptive plans engraved to uphold their statements Graham, stung by these unworthy proceedings, exposed the conduct of La Pena in a letter to the British envoy, and when Lasey let fall some expressions personally offensive, he enforced an apology with his sword, but having thus shown himself superior to his opponents at all points, the gallant old man soon afterwards relinquished his command to General Cooke, and joined Lord Wellington's army" Of that army he succeeded Sir Brent Spencer as second in command, and in January 1812, the immediate direction of the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo was intrusted to him Subsequently, he was left in charge of Badajoz, but in consequence of a complaint in his eyes, occasioned by the use of a prospect glass under an almost vertical sun, he was obliged to revisit England for a short time Early in 1813, however, he again repaired to the Peninsula, and on the 21st June of that year, he commanded the left wing of the British army at the battle of Vittoria He was directed to turn the right of the French, and to intercept their retreat by the road to Bayonne, and while the right and centre of the British army were driving the enemy back upon Vittoria, the left, under Sir Thomas Graham, having made a wide circuit, was moving upon that city by the high road leading to it from Bilboa A part of his troops turned the enemy's right, and gained some strong heights covering the village of Gamarra Mayor, which command the bridge over the Zadorra at that place This village was carried by storm at the point of the bayonet, under a heavy fire from the artillery and musketry of the French, who suffered severely, and lost three pieces of cannon The possession of this and of another village cut off the enemy's retreat by the high road to Bayonne They still, however, had, on the heights on the left of the Zadorra, two divisions of infantry in reserve, and it was impossible for Sir Thomas Graham to cross by the bridges, until the troops from the centre and right had driven the enemy from Vittoria. This was effected about six o'clock in the evening, and then passing the river, he took possession of the road to Bayonne, and forced the French to retreat by that leading to Pampeluna. The whole of the army now joined in the pursuit

Mr Abbot, then speaker of the House of Commons, and afterwards Lord Colchester, in alluding to General Graham's career at this period, stated that his was "a name never to be mentioned in our military annals without the strongest expression of respect and admiration," and the Right Hon Richard Brinsley Sheridan, speaking of the various excellent qualities, personal and professional, which adorned his character, said "Never was there seated a loftier spirit in a braver heart" Referring to his services in the retreat of the British army to Corunna, he continued "In the hour of peril Graham was their best adviser, in the hour of disaster Graham was their surest consolation" A song composed on the battle of Vittoria, by Mr W Glen, and at the time very popular, thus commences

'Sing a' ye bards wi' loud acclaim,
High glory gie to gallant Graham
Heap laurels on our Marshal's fame,
Wha conquer'd at Vittoria"

He was subsequently despatched by Wellington to invest San Sebastian, twenty-two miles south-west of Bayonne That town was then defended by Emmanuel Rey, and General Graham besieged and bombarded it from the beginning of July (1813) On the 24th of that month he attempted to carry it by storm, but was repulsed with the loss of 2,000 men, and on the 27th, he was compelled to raise the siege It was renewed, however, after the defeat of Soult at the foot of the Pyrenees, on the 28th and 29th, and in repeated assaults the British suffered severely On the 31st August Sir Thomas Graham became master of the most important works, at a loss of 3,000 men, and on the 9th September the citadel surrendered At the passage of the Bidassoa river, which separates France and Spain, Sir Thomas Graham had the command of the left wing of the British army, and on the 7th of October, after an obstinate resistance from the enemy, he succeeded in establishing our victorious troops on the territory of France. Soon after, in consequence of ill-health, he resigned his command to Lieutenant-general Sir John Hope, and returned to England In 1814, he was appointed commander of the forces in Holland, with the local rank of general He defeated the French at Merxem, but failed in the assault on Bergen-op Zoom On the 3d May of the same year, he again received the thanks of parliament, and was created a peer of the United Kingdom, by the title of Lord Lynedoch of Balgowan in the county of Perth, but nobly refused a grant of £2,000 per annum, to himself and his heirs, which was intended to accompany his elevation to the peerage In 1821 he was raised to the full rank of general In 1826 he was nominated colonel of the 14th foot, and in 1834 was removed to the colonelcy of the royals In 1829, he was appointed governor of Dumbarton castle, a post rather honorary than lucrative, its salary being only £170 per annum Besides his other honours, he was a knight Grand Cross of the order of St Michael and St George, of the Tower and Sword in Portugal, and of the Spanish order of St Ferdinand

In his latter years, Lord Lynedoch passed much of his time upon the Continent, chiefly in Italy, the climate of which country was greatly more congenial to his health than that of either Scotland or England In 1842, however, when Queen Victoria visited Scotland for the first time, so anxious was he to manifest his sense of loyalty and his personal attachment to his sovereign, that, though then in his 92d year, he came from Switzerland, for the express purpose of paying his duty to her majesty in the metropolis of his native land This distinguished officer and most excellent man died at his house in London, 18th December 1843, at the advanced age of 93 As he died without issue, his title became extinct, and his estates devolved upon his cousin, Robert Graham of Redgorton in Perthshire, advocate, for a short time a lord of the Treasury in Lord Melbourne's administration

GRAHAM, JOHN, an eminent historical painter, was born at Edinburgh in 1754, and in early life was apprenticed to Mr Farquhar, at that period the principal coach-painter in the Scottish metropolis. He was afterwards employed as a coach-painter in London for many years Having been admitted a student of the Royal Academy, he was induced to devote his attention to the more elevated walk of historical painting, which he subsequently followed with great success About 1798, on the death of Mr David Allan, he was appointed master of the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, which situation he filled with credit to himself, with benefit to his pupils, and with advantage to the progress of the arts in Scotland This institution, originally founded to promote the mechanical arts and manufactures of the country, for the instruction in drawing of carvers, painters, weavers, &c, became, on the accession of Mr Graham, a school of design To this end the liberality of the Board of Trustees greatly contributed, by their procuring for the use of the pupils a magnificent set of casts from the antique, only surpassed in Britain by the collection of the Royal Academy in London Many young men who received the rudiments of their profession in the Trustees' Academy, under Mr Graham, afterwards became celebrated for their genius in art, of whom may be mentioned Sir David Wilkie, Mr John Burnet the eminent engraver, and his brother, and Mr William Allan

The principal works painted by Mr Graham are—David instructing Solomon, in the possession of the earl of Wemyss, the Burial of General Frazer, two pictures for the Shakspeare Gallery, &c He also executed many smaller works, and some portraits His composition, though not remarkable for any striking originality of conception, is pure and chaste In the distribution of his groups, in his large works, he was singularly fortunate His drawing, though without the vigour and energy of the Florentine school, is correct, his draperies are large and finely cast, his colouring excellent, and his handling broad and masterly His portraits, however, are inferior to his other works He also executed, with great truth and force of expression, several pictures of lions, tigers, and other animals, from studies made from nature in the menagerie of the Tower He died November 1, 1817, aged 68

GRAHAME, Simion, or Simeon, a quaint old writer, the son of Archibald Grahame, a burgess of Edinburgh, was born in that city about 1570 He seems to have been indebted for his education to the patronage of James the Sixth; and we learn from the 'Epistle Dedicatorie' of his 'Anatomie of Humours' to the earl of Montrose, that he was at different periods a traveller, a soldier, and a courtier Sir Thomas Urquhart describes him as "a great traveller and very good scholar, but otherwise licentious, and given over to all manner of debordings," but we have the testimony of Dempster, that, in his mature years, he became repentant, and assumed the habit of St Francis He spent some time in exile on the Continent, and when there wrote a poem addressed 'From Italy to Scotland, his Soyle' In 1604 he published at London a small collection of poems, entitled 'The Passionate Sparke of a Relenting Minde,' inscribed, in a long poetical dedication of fifty-nine verses, to his earliest patron, James the Sixth His 'Anatomie of Humours' appeared at Edinburgh in 1609, a work, principally prose, but interspersed with verse, which Dr Irving is of opinion may have suggested to Burton the first idea of his 'Anatomie of Melancholie,' published in 1624 The two works mentioned are all of Grahame's writings that are extant, although both Urquhart and Dempster represent his publications as numerous Grahame subsequently retired again to the Continent, and spent the last years of his life as an austere Franciscan He died at Carpentras, on his return to Scotland, in 1614 A beautiful edition of his 'Anatomie of Humours,' and 'Passionate Sparke,' was printed by the Bannatyne Club in 1830

GRAHAME, James, the author of 'The Sabbath,' and other poems, was the son of a writer in Glasgow, where he was born April 22, 1765 He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of his native city, and after passing through a regular academical course at the university there, he was removed to Edinburgh, in 1784, and apprenticed to his cousin, Mr Lawrence Hill, writer to the signet On the expiration of his apprenticeship, he became, in 1791, a member of the Society of writers to the signet, but the confinement of the writing desk being found injurious to his constitution, which was naturally weak, he turned his attention to the bar, and, in March 1795, was admitted advocate In March 1802 he married the eldest daughter of Mr. James Grahame, town-clerk of Ayr

While at the university, he had printed and circulated a collection of poetical pieces, which, in an amended form, appeared in 1797, and in 1801 he published 'Mary Stuart, an Historical Drama' The poem on which his reputation rests, 'The Sabbath,' made its appearance in 1804, and at first was published anonymously So cautious was he that he should not be known as the author of this beautiful production, that we are told he exacted a promise of secrecy from the printer he employed, and used to meet him clandestinely, at obscure coffee-houses, in order to correct the proofs, but never twice at the same house, for fear of attracting observation The work soon became popular, and on his wife expressing her high admiration of it, he acknowledged himself the author, much, as may be supposed, to her gratification In 1805 he brought out a second edition of 'The Sabbath,' to which he added 'Sabbath Walks,' and such was the demand for the book, that three editions were called for in the same year In 1806 he published the 'Birds of Scotland, and other Poems,' in 1807 he brought out his 'Poems' in 2 vols, in 1809 appeared the 'British Georgics,' 4to, and, in 1810, 'Poems on the Abolition of the Slave Trade,' embellished with engravings from designs by Smirke

From early life, Mr Grahame had entertained a strong prepossession for the church, and his father's death having released him from all wish to continue in the law in May 1809 he went to London, where he was ordained by the bishop of Norwich, and soon after obtained the curacy of Shefton Mayne, in Gloucestershire, which he held till the succeeding April when he resigned it, owing to some family matters requiring his presence in Scotland While in Edinburgh, he was an unsuccessful candidate for St George's Episcopal chapel in that city In the following August he was engaged to officiate for some time as sub-curate of St Margaret's, Durham, where his eloquence as a preacher soon collected a large congregation Through the interest of Mr Barrington, the nephew of the bishop of Durham, he obtained the curacy of Sedgefield in the same diocese, where he commenced his duties on the 1st of May 1811; but the decline of his health soon compelled him to revisit Edinburgh for medical advice. After staying a short time there, he proceeded with his wife to Glasgow, but died at Whitehill, the seat of his eldest brother, Mr Robert Grahame, on September 14, 1811, in the 47th year of his age, leaving two sons and a daughter

GRANGER, or Grainger, a surname derived from the superintendent of a grange the name of a farm anciently belonging to some religious house.

GRAINGER, JAMES, an eminent physician and poet, was born at Dunse, in Berwickshire, in 1724 He was the son of John Grainger, Esq., formerly of Houghton Hall, in the county of Cumberland, but who, from some unfortunate mining speculations, had been obliged to sell his estate, and accept of an appointment in the excise In early life young Grainger was placed as an apprentice with Mr George Lauder, surgeon in Edinburgh, where he attended the medical classes, and, on the completion of his studies, he entered the army as surgeon in Pulteney's regiment of foot, with which he served during the rebellion of 1745 He afterwards went with his regiment to Germany, where he remained till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, when he returned home, and, quitting the army, took the degree of M D, and settled as a physician in London Not meeting at first with the success which he expected, he attempted to bring himself into notice by the publication in 1753 of an able Latin treatise on the diseases of the army, entitled, 'Historia Febris Anomalæ Batavæ, annorum 1746-7-8' &c which having been anticipated by Sir John Pringle's work on the same subject, did not attract much attention In 1755 he contributed to Dodsley's Collection 'An Ode on Solitude,' which, though an imitation of Milton's Allegro and Penseroso, at once procured for him a high reputation as a poet, and introduced him to the society and friendship of Shenstone, Glover, Dr Percy, Dr Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other distinguished men of the time Soon after Dr Grainger became tutor to a young gentleman of fortune, who settled upon him an annuity for life. In 1758 he published a translation of the Elegies of Tibullus, and of the Poems of Sulpicia, with Notes. This work having been criticised with great severity by Dr Smollett in the Critical Review, Dr. Grainger replied in a Vindicatory Letter, in which he assailed Smollett's character and writings in a style of personal invective that provoked an equally hostile rejoinder.

A short time after the publication of Tibullus, Dr Grainger was induced to go out to the island of St Christopher's to practise as a physician, and having, during the voyage, formed the acquaintance of Mrs and Miss Burt, the wife and daughter of the governor, he married the latter soon after his arrival on the island He thus commenced practice there under the most advantageous circumstances At the peace of 1763, he paid a visit to England, where, the year following, he published a didactic poem, in blank verse, entitled 'The Sugar Cane' He also furnished Dr Percy with the beautiful ballad of 'Bryan and Pereene,' which appeared in the first volume of the 'Reliques of English Poetry' He returned to St Christopher's in 1765, and resumed his practice, but died at Basseterre of an epidemic fever, December 24, 1767

His works are

Besides these works, he was the author of 'Translations from Ovid's Heroic Epistles,' and a 'Fragment of the Fate of Capua, a Tragedy,' inserted in Dr Anderson's edition of his works.

GRANT, a surname derived from the French word grand, great or valorous. There is scarcely a name in Scotland about the origin of which there have been so many conjectures, and although the first persons of this surname in Britain are stated, with more or less plausibility, to have come from Denmark and from Ireland, it is certain that they originally came from Normandy, into England, where many persons of the name appear to have held public employments before the surname was known in Scotland. In 1229 Richard Grant was made archbishop of Canterbury The English chroniclers of that time, writing in Latin, call him Richardus Magnus, that is, Richard Grand or Great, taking Grant to be the same with the French grand and the Latin magnus.

The Gaelic derivation of the surname is not only fictitious but absurd. According to the received dictum of the Gaelic genealogists, the founder of the clan Grant is said to have been Gregor, second son of Malcolm chief of the MacGregors, (living in 1160), who, from his ungainly appearance, bore the designation of grannda, ill-favoured, hence the name of the clan Grant. Dr John MacPherson, however, as quoted by Logan, has a far more improbable hypothesis as to the origin of the name He derives it from an extensive moor in Strathspey, the country of the Grants, called Granntach, otherwise Sliabh Grunnas, or the plain of the Sun, the many Druidical remains scattered over it indicating it to have been a place consecrated to the worship of that luminary, the great object of Celtic adoration, and the crest borne by the name of Grant, burning mount, is referred to as representing the Baal-teine, or fire raised in honour of the Celtic deity This would give the clan and the name a settlement in Strathspey as ancient as the days of the Druids for which no evidence whatever exists.

The first of the name on record in Scotland is Gregory de Grant who, in the reign of Alexander the Second, (1214 to 1249,) was sheriff of the shire of Inverness, which then, and till 1583, comprehended Ross, Sutherland, and Caithness, besides what is now Inverness-shire By his marriage with Mary, daughter of Sir John Bizet of Lovat, he became possessed of the lands of Stratherrick, at that period a part of the province of Moray, and had two sons, namely, Sir Lawrence, his heir, and Robert, who appears to have succeeded his father as sheriff of Inverness.

The elder son, Sir Lawrence de Grant, with his brother Robert, witness to an agreement, dated 9th September, 1258, between Archibald, bishop of Moray, and John Bizet of Lovat, is particularly mentioned as the friend and kinsman of the latter Chalmers (Caledonia, vol i p 596) states that he married Bigla, the heiress of Comyn of Glenchernach, and obtained his father-in-law's estates in Strathspey, and a connection with the most potent family in Scotland Douglas, however, in his Baronage, (p 321) says that she was the wife of his elder son, John He had two sons, Sir John and Rudolph They supported the interest of Bruce against Baliol, and were taken prisoners in 1296, at the battle of Dunbar After Baliol's surrender of his crown and kingdom to Edward, the English monarch, with his victorious army, marched north as far as Elgin On his return to Berwick he received the submission of many of the Scottish barons, whose names were written upon four large rolls of parchment, still extant, called the Ragman Roll Most of them were dismissed on their swearing allegiance to him, among whom was Rudolph de Grant, but his brother, John de Grant, was carried to London He was released the following year, on condition of serving King Edward in France, John Comyn of Badenoch being his surety on the occasion Robert de Grant, who also swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296, is supposed to have been his uncle

At the accession of Robert the Bruce in 1306, the Grants do not seem to have been very numerous in Scotland, but as the people of Strathspey, which from that period was known as "the country of the Grants," came to form a clan, with their name, they soon acquired the position and power of Highland chiefs.

Sir John had three sons Sir John, who succeeded him, Sir Allan, progenitor of the clan Allan, a tribe of the Grants, of whom the Grants of Auchernick are the head, and Thomas, ancestor of some families of the name. The eldest son, Sir John, on 9th July, 1333, was a commander in the right wing of the Scottish army at the battle of Halidonhill, under Randolf, earl of Moray, in whose charter from Robert the Bruce, dated in 1318, all the barons and chiefs within the earldom, extending then from Speymouth to Lorn, were bound to follow the king's standard.

His son, John de Grant, was in 1359, one of the three ambassadors sent to France, to renew the ancient league with that country He was also frequently employed in negotiations with England He had a son, and a daughter, Agnes, married to Sir Richard Comyn, ancestor of the Cummings of Altyre.

The son, Sir Robert de Grant, in the beginning of the reign of Robert the Second, according to a MS history of the family, fought and vanquished an English champion of undaunted courage and unusual strength of body In 1385, when the king of France, then at war with Richard the Second, remitted to Scotland a subsidy of 40,000 French crowns, to induce the Scots to invade England, Sir Robert de Grant was one of the principal barons, about twenty in all, among whom the money was divided He died in the succeeding reign

At this point there is some confusion in the pedigree of the Grants. The family papers state that the male line was continued by the son of Sir Robert, named Malcolm, who soon after his father's death, began to make a figure as chief of the clan On the other hand some writers maintain that Sir Robert had no son, but a daughter, Maude, or Matilda, heiress of the estate, and lineal representative of the family of Grant, who about the year 1400 married Andrew Stewart, son of Sir John Stewart, commonly called the Black Stewart, sheriff of Bute, and son of King Robert the Second, and that this Andrew sunk the royal name, and assumed instead the name and arms of Grant This marriage however, though supported by the tradition of the country, is not acknowledged by the family or the clan, and the very existence of such an heiress is denied

Malcolm de Grant, above mentioned, had a son, Duncan de Grant, the first designed of Freuchie, the family title for several generations. By his wife, Muriel, a daughter of Macintosh of Macintosh, chief of the clan Chattan, he had, with a daughter, two sons, John and Patrick. The latter, by his elder son, John, was ancestor of the Grants of Ballindalloch, county of Elgin, of whom afterwards, and of those of Tomnavoulen, Tulloch, &c., and by his younger son, Patrick, of the Grants of Dunlugas in Banffshire

Duncan's elder son, John Grant of Freuchie, with a body of his clan, joined the Gordons, Forbeses, Frasers, and other loyal clans, who were upon their march to the assistance of King James the Third in 1488, but arrived too late, the battle of Sauchieburn having been fought, and that unfortunate monarch foully murdered. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir James Ogilvy of Deskford, ancestor of the earls of Findlater, he had, with a daughter, married to her cousin, Hector, son of the chief of Macintosh, three sons John, his heir, Peter or Patrick, said to be the ancestor of the tribe Phadrig, or house of Tullochgorum, and Duncan, progenitor of the tribe called clan Donachie, or house of Gartenbeg By the daughter of Baron Stewart of Kincardine, he had another son, also named John, ancestor of the Grants of Glenmoriston

His eldest son, John, the tenth laird, called, from his poetical talents, the Bard, succeeded in 1508. He obtained four charters under the great seal, all dated 3d December 1509, of various lands, among which were Urquhart and Glenmoriston in Inverness-shire. The latter is remarkable as the place where Dr Johnson, in visiting it in 1774, first conceived the thought of his 'Tour to the Hebrides.' James the Fourth, when projecting the war with England which ended so disastrously at Flodden, took John Grant of Freuchie bound to give him "the aid of three knights with all the serviceable men of the Grant clan at any convocation of the leiges by him or his successors, within or without the kingdom, for the purposes of war" He had three sons, John, the second son, was ancestor of the Grants of Shoggle, and of those of Corrimony in Urquhart, from the first of which lineally descended Charles Grant, the eminent East India Director, of whom a memoir follows, and other families of the name The younger son, Patrick, was progenitor of the Grants of Ronhard in Perthshire. John the Bard died in 1525

His eldest son, James Grant of Freuchie, called from his daring character, Shemas nan Creach, or James the Bold, was much employed, during the reign of King James the Fifth, in quelling insurrections in the northern counties. His lands in Urquhart were, in November 1513, plundered and laid waste by the adherents of the lord of the Isles, and again in 1544 by the Clanranald, when his castle of Urquhart was taken possession of On the latter occasion, at the head of his clan, he joined the earl of Huntly's expedition against the Clanranald, and on the supposed suppression of the latter he returned with the earl into Strathspey It was immediately after this that the Frasers of Lovat met with so bloody a defeat at the battle of Kinloch-lochy, called by the Highlanders "The Field of Shirts" (see page 262). This chief of the Grants was in such high favour with King James the Fifth that he obtained from that monarch a charter, dated in 1535, exempting him from the jurisdiction of all the courts of judicature, except the court of session, then newly instituted He died in 1553 He had, with two daughters, two sons, John and Archibald the latter the ancestor of the Grants of Cullen, Monymusk, &c.

His elder son, John, usually called Evan Baold, or the Gentle, was a strenuous promoter of the Reformation, and was a member of that parliament which, in 1560, abolished popery as the established religion in Scotland He died in 1585, having been twice married, first, to Margaret Stewart, daughter of the earl of Athol, by whom he had, with two daughters, two sons, Duncan and Patrick, the latter ancestor of the Grants of Rothiemurchus, and, secondly, to a daughter of Barclay of Towie, by whom he had an only son, Archibald, ancestor of the Grants of Bellintomb, represented by the Grants of Monymusk.

Duncan, the elder son, predeceased his father in 1581, leaving four sons John, Patrick, ancestor of the Grants of Easter Elchies, of which family was Patrick Grant, Lord Elchies, a lord of session, afterwards noticed, Robert, progenitor of the Grants of Lurg, and James, of Ardnelhe, ancestor of those of Moyness.

John, the eldest son, succeeded his grandfather, in 1585, and was much employed in public affairs. In 1590, when the council passed an act for apprehending Jesuits, popish priests, and excommunicated persons, he was appointed one of the committee of noblemen and gentlemen for executing that act. Four years thereafter he joined the king's general, the young earl of Argyle, against the popish earls of Huntly and Errol. A large body of his clan, at the battle of Glenlivet, was commanded by John Grant of Gartenbeg, to whose treachery, in having, in terms of a concerted plan, retreated with his men as soon as the action began, as well as to that of Campbell of Lochnell, Argyle owed his defeat in that engagement. This laird of Grant greatly extended and improved his paternal estates, and is said to have been offered by James the Sixth, in 1610, a patent of honour, but which he declined. In 1614 he was one of the jury on whose verdict Patrick Stewart, earl of Orkney, was beheaded for treason. From the Shaws he purchased the lands of Rothiemurchus, which he exchanged with his uncle Patrick for the lands of Muchrach. On his marriage with Lilias Murray, daughter of John, earl of Athol, the nuptials were honoured with the presence of King James the Sixth and his queen Besides a son and daughter by his wife, he had a natural son, Duncan, progenitor of the Grants of Cluny He died in 1622

His son, Sir John, by his extravagance and attendance at court, greatly reduced his estates, and when he was knighted he got the name of "Sir John Sell-the-land" He had eight sons and three daughters, and dying at Edinburgh in April 1637, was buried at the abbey church of Holyroodhouse.

His elder son, James, joined the Covenanters on the north of the Spey in 1638, and on 19th July 1644, was, by the estates, appointed one of the committee for trying the malignants in the north After the battle of Inverlochy, however, in the following year, he joined the standard of the marquis of Montrose, then in arms for the king, and ever after remained faithful to the royal cause. In consequence of his defection a detachment from the garrison of Inverness plundered the house of Elchies, carrying off his lady's wearing apparel, trinkets, and jewels, of which, says Spalding, "she had store." After the restoration he was a member of the Scots estates that met in 1661 In 1663, he again went to Edinburgh, to see justice done to his kinsman, Allan Grant of Tulloch, in a criminal prosecution for manslaughter, in which he was successful, but died in that city soon after his arrival there. A patent had been made out creating him earl of Strathspey, and Lord Grant of Freuchie and Urquhart, but in consequence of his death it did not pass the seals. The patent itself is said to be preserved in the family archives. He had two sons, Ludovick and Patrick, the latter ancestor of the family of Wester Elchies on Spevside.

Ludovick, the elder son, being a minor, was placed under the guardianship of his uncle, Col Patrick Grant, who faithfully discharged his trust, and so was enabled to remove some of the burdens on the encumbered family estates. Ludovick Grant of Grant and Freuchie, took for his first wife Janet, only child of Alexander Brodie of Lethen, who, in 1685, was fined forty thousand pounds Scots, on account of the favour shown by him to the persecuted presbyterians. This fine was given by King James the Seventh to the popish college at Douay By the favour of his father-in-law the laird of Grant was enabled to purchase the barony of Pluscardine, which was always to descend to the second son For favouring the Covenanters he was himself fined in forty-two thousand five hundred pounds Scots, but he contrived to put off payment from time to time, till the Revolution relieved him of it. In 1686, being then a member of the estates, when the court proposed the repeal of the statutes against popery, he was one of the few patriots who publicly protested against the measure, and insisted that his protest should be put on record. At the Revolution, he was a member of the convention which met at Edinburgh, on 14th July, 1689, and was one of the committee nominated by the estates for settling the government. By King William he was appointed colonel of a regiment of foot, and sheriff of Inverness. After the battle of Killiecrankie he joined Colonel Sir Thomas Livingston's force, which gave such a check to the Jacobite Highlanders at Cromdale, on 1st May that year, that they soon after dispersed. On this occasion Livingston's main body was led by some gentlemen of the name of Grant. In 1690 he was one of the committee appointed by parliament to visit the universities, and to turn out all insufficient, immoral, or disloyal professors. In 1700 he raised a regiment of his own clan, being the only commoner that did so, and kept his regiment in pay a whole year at his own expense. In compensation, three of his sons got commissions in the army, and his lands were erected into a barony With respect to his father-in-law Lethen's fine, half of which he had paid, as he obtained in right of his wife a portion of that estate, he was referred to the committee for rescinding fines, and although an act was made in his favour, the Douay fine was never recovered He died at Edinburgh in 1718, in his 66th year, and, with his father and grandfather, was buried in Holyrood abbey

Alexander, his eldest son, after studying the civil law on the continent, entered the army, and soon obtained the command of a regiment of foot, with the rank of brigadier He was early returned to parliament, and in 1706 was one of the commissioners to treat of the union between the two kingdoms. He was a member of the first five British parliaments, and supported the measures of government until about 1710, when a Jacobite ministry came into power In 1711, when the great duke of Argyle was deprived of all his places, Brigadier Grant, who is stated to have been his inseparable companion, lost his regiment, but in 1714, on the accession of George the First, both were restored to their former appointments. In 1715, on the failure of Lord Drummond's attempt to surprise the castle of Edinburgh, and the imprisonment of Colonel Stuart, the deputy-governor, for remissness of duty on the occasion, Brigadier Grant had that important office committed to him When the rebellion broke out, being with his regiment in the south, he wrote to his brother Captain George Grant, to raise the clan for the service of government, which he did, and a portion of them assisted at the reduction of Inverness. In October of the same year, when a body of the insurgents, under Mackintosh of Borlum, took possession of Leith, he attended the duke of Argyle as a volunteer, and aided in causing them to evacuate that place In the following month he accompanied his grace to the battle of Sheriffmuir, although his regiment was not in the action He was soon after made governor of Sheerness, but in 1716, on a change of ministry he lost that office. As justiciary of the counties of Inverness, Moray, and Banff, he was successful in suppressing the bands of outlaws and robbers which infested these counties in that unsettled time He succeeded his father in 1718, but died at Leith the following year, aged 40 Though twice married, he had no children

His brother, Sir James Grant of Pluscardine, was the next laird. In 1702, in his father's lifetime, he married Anne, only daughter of Sir Humphrey Colquhoun of Luss, baronet. By the marriage contract it was specially provided that he should assume the surname and arms of Colquhoun, and if he should at any time succeed to the estate of Grant, his second son should, with the name of Colquhoun, become proprietor of Luss. In 1704 Sir Humphrey obtained a new patent in favour of his son-in law, James Grant, who on his death, in 1715, became in consequence Sir James Grant Colquhoun of Luss, baronet. On succeeding, however, to the estate of Grant four years after, he dropped the name of Colquhoun, retaining the baronetcy, and the estate of Luss went to his second surviving son. [See COLQUHOUN, surname of, vol i. page 665] Sir James was for several years M P for the county of Inverness, and generally supported the government

In his latter years he retired very much from public business. Although the chief of the Grants had represented the county of Inverness ever since the union, and no flaw could be found in their loyalty, at the general election following the battle of Culloden, President Forbes brought forward the laird of Mac-Leod in opposition to Sir James, who was elected for the Cullen and Banff burghs. He died, soon after, on January 16, 1747 With five daughters, he had as many sons, viz. Humphrey, who predeceased him in 1732, Ludovick, of whom afterwards, James, a major in the army, who succeeded to the estate and baronetcy of Luss, and took the name of Colquhoun, Francis, who died a general in the army; and Charles, a captain R N

The second son, Ludovick, was admitted advocate in 1728, but on the death of his brother, he relinquished his practice at the bar, and his father devolving on him the management of the estate, he represented him thereafter as chief of the clan. During the rebellion of 1745 he gave his support to the government, and when the duke of Cumberland arrived at Aberdeen he waited on him there, and was very well received. He was M P for Morayshire from 1741 until 1761, when his son, James, was elected in his stead He was twice married first, to a daughter of Sir Robert Dalrymple of North Berwick, by whom he had a daughter, who died young, secondly, to Lady Margaret Ogilvie, eldest daughter of James earl of Findlater and Seafield, in virtue of which marriage his grandson succeeded to the earldom of Seafield By his second wife Sir Ludovick had one son, James, and eleven daughters, six of whom survived him Penuel, the third of these, was the wife of Henry Mackenzie, Esq, author of the 'Man of Feeling,' and mother of Joshua Henry Mackenzie, a lord of session, who died in 1852, and Helen, the fifth, married Sir Alexander Penrose Cumming Gordon of Altyre and Gordonstown, baronet. Sir Ludovick died at Castle Grant, 18th March 1778

His only son, Sir James Grant of Grant, baronet, born in 1738, was distinguished for his patriotism and public spirit. Besides representing the county of Moray in parliament, as already mentioned, he was subsequently for some time a member for Banff On the declaration of war by France in 1793, he was among the first to raise a regiment of fencibles, called the Grant or Strathspey fencibles, of which he was appointed colonel It continued embodied till 1799, and was quartered successively in most of the towns in the south of Scotland In 1794 he raised another corps, a regiment of the line, called the 97th or Strathspey regiment, of which he was also appointed colonel It was immediately marched to the south of England, and sent on board Lord Howe's fleet in the Channel, in which it served as marines for a few months. In autumn 1795, it was drafted into other regiments, the two flank corps being incorporated with the 42d, then about to embark for the West Indies.

In 1784, when the Highland Society of Edinburgh was instituted, Sir James was one of its original office-bearers. In 1794 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Inverness-shire, which office he was compelled by ill health, to resign in 1809, when his son was nominated his successor In 1795 he was appointed cashier to the excise, when he vacated his seat in parliament After a lingering illness he died at Castle Grant on 18th February 1811 He had married in 1763, Jean, only child of Alexander Duff, Esq of Hatton, Aberdeenshire, and had by her three sons and three daughters. Sir Lewis Alexander Grant, the eldest son, in 1811 succeeded to the estates and earldom of Seafield, on the death of his cousin James earl of Findlater and Seafield, and his brother, Francis William, became in 1840, sixth earl. The younger children obtained in 1822 the rank and precedency of an earl's junior issue (See SEAFIELD, Earl of.)

The Grants of Ballindalloch, in the parish of Inveraven, Banffshire,—commonly called the Craig-Achrochean Grants,—as already stated, descend from Patrick, twin brother of John, ninth laird of Freuchie. Patrick's grandson, John Grant, was killed by his kinsman, John Roy Grant of Carron, as afterwards mentioned, and his son, also John Grant, was father of another Patrick, whose son, John Roy Grant, by his extravagant living and unhappy differences with his lady, a daughter of Leslie of Balquhain, entirely ruined his estate, and was oblige to consent to placing it under the management and trust of three of his kinsmen, Brigadier Grant, Captain Grant of Elchies, and Walter Grant of Arndilly, which gave occasion to W Elchies' verses of "What meant the man?"

Several of the latter lairds of Ballindalloch were officers in the army Colonel William Grant of Ballindalloch raised one of the five companies that composed the Black Watch, afterwards embodied in the 42d regiment. General James Grant of Ballindalloch succeeded to the estate on the death of his nephew, Major William Grant, in 1770 After having studied the law, he entered the army as an ensign in 1741, at the age of 22, and in 1747, when captain, he was aide-de-camp to General St. Clair, on his embassy to Vienna. He afterwards served both in the Netherlands and in America, and held several important commands during the American war He was second in command to Lord Albemarle at the taking of the Havannah, defeated Count d'Estaing, with an inferior force, conquered St. Lucia in 1779, and was for many years governor of East Florida. He was subsequently governor of Dumbarton castle, and in 1789 appointed to that of Stirling castle He was colonel first of the 5th, and afterwards of the 11th regiment of foot, and was for many years M P for the county of Sutherland. He was noted for his fondness for good living, and in his latter years became very corpulent. He died at Ballindalloch on 13th April, 1806, at the age of 86 Having no children, he was succeeded by his maternal grand-nephew, George Macpherson, Esq, of Invereshie, who assumed in consequence the additional name of Grant, and was created a baronet in 1838 [See MACPHERSON, surname of.]

The Grants of Glenmoriston, in Inverness-shire, are sprung from John More Grant, natural son of John Grant, ninth laird of Freuchie. His son, John Roy Grant, acquired the lands of Carron from the marquis of Huntly In a dispute about the marches of their respective properties, he killed his kinsman, John Grant of Ballindalloch, in 1588, an event which led to a lasting feud between the families. John Roy Grant had four sons Patrick, who succeeded him in Carron; Robert of Nether Glen of Rothes, James an Tuim, or James of the hill, the famous outlaw, of whom afterwards, and Thomas.

The murder of John Grant of Ballindalloch above mentioned is said to have been at the instigation of the laird of Grant, the chief of the tribe, who had conceived a grudge against him. A few years previous to the year 1628, James Grant, afterwards the well-known James an Tuim, happening to be at a fair at the town of Elgin, observed one of the Grants of the Ballindalloch family pursuing his brother Thomas Grant, whom he knocked down in the street, and wounded severely before his eyes. He was in his turn attacked by James Grant, who killed him upon the spot. The laird of Ballindalloch cited the latter to stand his trial for the slaughter of his kinsman but as he did not appear he was outlawed. The chief of the Grants made many attempts to reconcile the parties, and an offer was made that James Grant should go into exile, and that compensation should be made in money and goods, according to the usual practice of amythment, but nothing less than the blood of James Grant would satisfy Ballindalloch James Grant, in consequence put himself at the head of a party of robbers, whom he collected from all parts of the Highlands, and making no distinction between friends and foes, attacked all parties, plundering and despoiling their property Grant of Dalnebo, one of the family of Ballindalloch, fell a victim to their fury, and many of the kinsmen of that family suffered greatly from their depredations. Under the supposition that John Grant of Carron, the nephew of James Grant, secretly assisted his uncle in his illegal proceedings, John Grant of Ballindalloch, in the year 1628, collected sixteen of his friends, with whom he went to the woods of Abernethy, where Carron was cutting down timber, and killed him, but not before he and Alexander Grant had slain several of Ballindalloch's friends, among whom was Thomas Grant of Dalvey Alexander Grant afterwards annoyed Ballindalloch and killed several of his men, and assisted the outlaw James Grant to lay waste his lands. In his History (page 416) Sir Robert Gordon quaintly says, "Give me leave heir to remark the providence and secrait judgement of the Almightie God, who now hath mett Carron with the same measure that his forefather John Roy Grant of Carron, did serve the ancestour of Ballendallogh, for upon the same day of the moneth that John Roy Grant did kill the great-grandfather of Ballendallogh (being the eleventh day of September), the verie same day of this moneth wes Carron slain by this John Grant of Ballendallogh many years thereafter And, besides, as that John Roy Grant of Carron was lefthanded, so is this John Grant of Ballendallogh lefthanded also, and moreover, it is to be observed that Ballendallogh, at this killing of this Carron, had upon him the same coat-of-armour, or maille-coat, which John Roy Grant had upon him at the slaughter of the great grandfather of this Ballendallogh, which maillie-coat Ballendallogh had, a little befor this tyme, taken from James Grant, in a skirmish that passed betwixt them Thus wee doe see that the judgements of God are inscrutable, and that, in his own tyme, he punisheth blood by blood"

To avoid the dangers to which he was continually exposed in the north, from the enmity and constant plundering incursions of James and Alexander Grant, Ballindalloch was obliged to take refuge in Edinburgh A party of the clan Chattan having one night in December 1630, unexpectedly attacked James Grant at Auchnachyle, in Strathdon, he was taken prisoner, after receiving eleven wounds, and the death of four of his band He was sent to Edinburgh for trial, and while confined in the castle there, observing Grant of Tomnavoulen pass one day, he called out, "What news from Speyside?" "None very particular," replied the person addressed, "the best is that the country is rid of you" "Perhaps we shall meet again," rejoined the outlaw By the aid of ropes concealed in a cask of butter, conveyed to him by his wife, he made his escape, and fled to Ireland, but after a while returned, and skulked about for some time in the north His hiding-place is said to have been a cave in the mountain Benrinnes, in the parish of Inveraven Banffshire. By degrees he became bolder, and at last ventured to appear openly in Strathdon and on Speyside. Patrick Macgregor, an outlaw like himself, was hired by Ballindalloch to apprehend him, but was himself killed in the attempt. Shortly afterwards, he succeeded in luring his bitter enemy, Ballindalloch, from his own house at night, under the pretence of a friendly meeting, and confined him in a kiln at a distance from his home, exposed to the greatest hardships, for twenty-one days, but, in his absence he contrived to escape, by gaining over Leonard Leslie, one of his guards, the son-in-law of the outlaw's brother The latter, Thomas Grant, was, for this outrage, executed at Edinburgh. Among other atrocities of James as 7ears, which are related, was his having slain Grant of Tomnavoulen and his son, soon after his return to Speyside. In Spalding's History of the Troubles and Memorable Transactions in Scotland in the reign of Charles the First, there are various references to him In 1638 we find him at the head of 500 men, joining the royalist party, who. after the rout of Turriff, took possession of the city of Aberdeen, expelling the Covenanters, and plundering the inhabitants.

The Glenmoriston branch of the Grants adhered faithfully to the Stuarts. Patrick Grant of Glenmoriston appeared in arms in the viscount of Dundee's army at Killiecrankie. He was also at the skirmish at Cromdale against the government soon after, and at the battle of Sheriffmuir in 1715 His estate was, in consequence, forfeited, but through the interposition of the chief of the Grants, was bought back from the barons of the Exchequer The laird of Glenmoriston in 1745 also took arms for the Pretender, but means were found to preserve the estate to the family The families deriving from this branch, besides that of Carron, which estate is near Elchies, on the river Spey, are those of Lynachoarn, Aviemore, Croskie, &c.

The favourite song of 'Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch,' (the only one she was ever known to compose,) was written by a Mrs. Grant of Carron, whose maiden name was Grant, born, near Aberlour, about 1745 Mr Grant of Carron, whose wife she became about 1763, was her cousin After his death she married, a second time, an Irish physician practising at Bath, of the name of Murray and died in that city in 1811

The Grants of Dalvey, who possess a baronetcy are descended from Duncan, second son of John the Bard, tenth laird of Grant. By his wife Mary, a daughter of Hugh Rose of Kilravock, Duncan had two sons, namely, John, and Sweton, whose descendants carried on the line of the family John's grandson, James Grant, previously designed of Gartenbeg, acquired the estate of Dalvey, in 1680, by purchase from the family of Ballindalloch He served the office of lord advocate during the short reign of James the Seventh, and was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1688, with remainder to his heirs male whatsoever He died in 1695 without issue, when the baronetcy and estates devolved upon his kinsman, Patrick Grant, first designed of Inverlochmen, lineal descendant of Sweton Grant, above mentioned This gentleman is said not to have assumed the title of baronet, and soon after his accession he sold the estate of Dalvey to Brigadier Grant. He married Lydia, sister of Brigadier Macintosh of Borlum, celebrated for his exploits in the rebellion of 1715, and died in 1756, in the 101st year of his age. His eldest son, Sir Alexander Grant, revived the dormant title, and purchased the estate of Grangehill in the parish of Dyke, county of Elgin, to which he gave the name of Dalvey He was for many years M P for the Inverness burghs. He was succeeded by his brother, Sir Ludovick fourth bart., who died in 1790 The son of the latter, Sir Alexander, fifth bart., married in 1780, Sarah, daughter and heiress of Jeremiah Cray, Esq of Ibesley, Hampshire, and, with other children, had a son, Sir Alexander Cray Grant, born 30th November, 1782 who on the death of his father on 25th July 1825, succeded as sixth baronet. M P from 1812 to 1843, he was chairman of committees from 1826 to 1832. In Sir Robert Peel's administration of 1834–5, he was a member of the board of control. On receiving the appointment of one of the commissioners for auditing the public accounts in 1843, he accepted the Chiltern hundreds, being then M P for Cambridge.

He died Nov 29, 1854, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir Robert Innes, 7th baronet, born April 8, 1794, m. in 1825 Judith, eldest daughter of Cornelius Durant Battelle, Esq of St. Croix, West Indies, issue, 2 sons, Alexander, born in 1826, and Robert Innes, born in 1833, and 2 daughters. Sir Robert Innes Grant died in Aug. 1856, when his elder son, Sir Alexander, became 8th baronet. Born at New York in 1826, the latter was educated at Harrow and Oxford, and in 1849 was elected Fellow of Oriel. In 1855 he was appointed by the board of control examiner in the department of moral sciences for the India civil service appointments, in 1857 public examiner in the classical school, Oxford, and in 1858 inspector of schools in the Madras Presidency In 1859 he m. the 2d daughter of James Frederick Ferrier, Esq, professor of moral philosophy in the university of St. Andrews.

The Grants of Monymusk, who also possess a baronetcy, (date of creation, Dec. 7, 1705,) are descended from Archibald Grant of Ballintomb, an estate conferred on him by charter dated 8th March, 1580 He was the younger son of John Grant of Freuchie, called Evan Baoid, or the Gentle, by his 2d wife, Isobel Barclay With 8 daughters, Archibald Grant had 2 sons. The younger son, James, was designed of Tombreack. Duncan of Ballintomb, the elder, had 3 sons: Archibald, his heir, Alexander, of Allachie, and William, of Arndillie The eldest son, Archibald, had, with 2 daughters, 2 sons, the elder of whom, Archibald Grant, Esq of Bellinton, had a son, Sir Francis, a lord of session, under the title of Lord Cullen, the first baronet of this family

This eminent judge was born about 1660, and received the academical part of his education at the university of Aberdeen, but, being intended for the profession of the law he was sent to finish his studies at Leyden, under the celebrated civilian, John Voet. His proficiency was so great that many years after he had left Leyden, Voet often mentioned him as having conferred honour upon the university there On his return to Scotland, he was entered at the bar January 29, 1681, and soon obtained an excellent practice. At the Revolution of 1688 he joined the party of the prince of Orange, and distinguished himself in the memorable convention, which met early in 1689, by his speech in favour of conferring on the prince the sovereignty of the kingdom, with the necessary constitutional limitations. In 1703, eight years before the passing of the Act of Queen Anne, he published a pamphlet against the restoration of patronage in the church. He was created a baronet by Queen Anne by patent, Dec. 7, 1705, and on June 10, 1709, was raised to the bench, when he assumed the title of Lord Cullen Some years previous to his death he sold his paternal estate, and purchased from the Forbeses the estate of Monymusk, which is still held by his descendants. His lordship died March 16, 1726. According to Wodrow, who says he understood his father to have been a clergyman, "he was a living library, and the most ready in citation. When the lords wanted anything in the civil or canon law to be cast up, or acts of parliament, he never failed them, but turned to the place. He seemed a little ambulatory in his judgment as to church government, but was a man of great piety and devotion, wonderfully serious in prayer and learning the word." Certain pamphlets entitled 'Essays on Removing the National Prejudices against a Union,' have been attributed to Lord Cullen

From George I Lord Cullen obtained a special warrant, granting him licence to use as a coat of arms—the field red, charged with three crowns gold, as descended from Grant of that ilk, within a border ermine, in quality of a judge, supported with two angels upon a helmet as baronet, and a book expanded for his crest, above which a scroll, with this motto, Suum Cuique, and upon a compartment below the arms—Jehovah Jire, the only instance, it is said, in Scottish Heraldry, of a Hebrew motto

Lord Cullen was thrice married first, to Jean, dr of Rev William Meldrum of Meldrum, without issue, 2dly, to Sarah, daughter of Rev Mr Fordyce of Ayton, Berwickshire, by whom, with 3 drs., he had 3 sons, Archibald, William, and Francis, and, 3dly, to Agnes, dr of Henry Hay, Esq, without issue. The daughters were 1 Jean, m., to Garden of Troup, with issue, 2 Christian, to George Buchan, Esq of Kelloe, with issue, and 3. Helen, to Andrew M'Dowall, Lord Bankton, a lord of session, and author of a much-esteemed work on the Institutes of the law of Scotland

William, the 2d son, was also a lord of session Admitted advocate Feb 24, 1722, he soon distinguished himself at the bar In May 1731 he was elected procurator for the Church of Scotland, and principal clerk to the General Assembly, on June 20, 1737, he was appointed solicitor-general, and on August 28, 1738, was named one of the commissioners for improving the fisheries and manufactures of Scotland. On Feb. 26, 1746, he was constituted lord advocate, in which office he had a principal part in preparing and promoting the acts for the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions, and for suppressing the use of the peculiar garb of the Highlanders. In 1747 he had been elected M P for the Elgin burghs, and in Nov 1754 he was named a lord of session and of justiciary, when he took the judicial title of Lord Prestongrange. In 1754 he was appointed one of the trustees for the annexed estates. He was also the author of an able political pamphlet, published in 1745, entitled the 'Occasional Writer, in answer to the second manifesto of the Pretender's son' He died May 23, 1764, at Bath, where he had gone for the benefit of his health. He had 3 daughters, 1 Janet, Countess of Hyndford 2 Agnes m. Sir George Suttie, Bart. of Balgonie, with issue. 3. Jane, wife of Hon. Robert Dundas of Arniston, lord president of the court of session, issue, 4 sons.

Francis, the 3d son, a merchant in Edinburgh, long resided for mercantile purposes at Dunkirk in France. On his return to Scotland in 1747, he was appointed inspector-general of the forfeited estates.

The eldest son of Lord Cullen, Sir Archibald Grant, 2d baronet, was also educated for the law, and passed advocate in 1711. He relinquished practice, however, on being chosen M P for the county of Aberdeen, and was frequently re-elected. In July 1749, he was appointed principal clerk and keeper of the Hornings. He died Sept. 17, 1778, at an advanced age. He was four times married; first to Anne, daughter of Hamilton of Pencaitland, issue, two daughters, who died young; 2dly, to Anne, daughter of Charles Potts, Esq of Derbyshire, issue, a son, Archibald, and a daughter, Mary, who became 2d wife of Dr Gregory Grant, an eminent physician of Edinburgh, of whom there is a full-length likeness, taken in 1799, in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, 3dly, in 1751, to Elizabeth Clark, widow of Dr James Callander of Jamaica, and four years after, her daughter by Dr Callander, became the wife of Sir Archibald's only son, and, 4thly, to the widow of Mr Andrew Millar, the celebrated London bookseller, the two last without issue

His only son, Sir Archibald, 3d baronet, raised, in 1748, a company of 100 men, and went with them, in the service of the East India Company, to St. David's in the East Indies, but on the peace his company was reduced, and he returned to Scotland. He married, 1 Mary, dr of James Callander, Esq, Jamaica, and 2dly, in 1794, Jessie, daughter of Macleod of Colbecks, and died Sept. 30, 1796 By his first wife, he had 2 sons, Archibald, his successor, and James Francis, a clergyman of the Church of England, and a daughter, Mary, married 2d son of Sir Joseph Radcliffe, a Yorkshire baronet.

The elder son, Sir Archibald, 4th baronet of Monymusk, married, in 1788, Mary, daughter of Major John Forbes, of Newe, and had 4 sons and 5 daughters. Archibald, the eldest son, having predeceased his father, James, the 2d son, became 5th baronet, on his father's death in April 1820, and died in 1859 His brother, Sir Isaac, 3d son, born in 1792, succeeded as 6th bart. Heir presumptive, his nephew, Archibald, born in 1823, eldest son of Robert Grant of Tillyfour, 4th son, deputy-lieut. of Aberdeenshire, deceased

The Grants of Kilgraston in Perthshire are lineally descended, through the line of the Grants of Glenlochy, from the ninth laird of Grant. Peter Grant, the last of the lairds of Glenlochy, which estate he sold, had two sons, John and Francis. The elder son, John, chief justice of Jamaica from 1783 to 1790, purchased the estates of Kilgraston and Pitcaithley, lying contiguous to each other in Strathearn, and, dying in 1793, without issue, he was succeeded by his brother, Francis. This gentleman married Anne, eldest daughter of Robert Oliphant, Esq of Rossie, Postmaster-general of Scotland, and had 5 sons and 2 daughters. He died in 1819

His eldest son, John Grant, of Kilgraston, b June 13, 1798, m. 1st, in 1820, Margaret, daughter of Francis, 15th Lord Gray, issue, a daughter, Margaret, m. in 1840 Hon David Murray, 3d son of 3d earl of Mansfield. He m. 2dly, in 1828, Lady Lucy Bruce, 3d daughter of 7th earl of Elgin, issue, 7 sons and 6 drs Francis Augustus, the eldest son, b Feb. 24, 1829, died Oct. 1, 1854, in the Crimea, after Alma

Major-general Sir James Hope Grant, K C B, 5th and youngest son of Francis Grant, Esq of Kilgraston and Pitcaithley, born January 18, 1808, was educated in Scotland and at Hoffville in Switzerland, and entered the army as cornet in 1826. He was brigade major in the war with China under Lord Saltoun, and received a medal for his services there, and subsequently in India under Lords Gough and Hardinge. At the battle of Sabraon in 1846 he commanded the 9th lancers, for which he also received a medal. He also commanded the regiment in the Punjaub campaign, including the passage of the Chenab at Ramnaggur, and the battle of Chillianwallah. He was also present at the battle of Goojerat. In 1854 he received the brevet of colonel, and took an active part in the suppression of the Indian mutiny in 1857–8, for his services on which occasion he was made a Knight commander of the order of the Bath He had the local rank of lieut.-gen in India. In 1858 he became major-general, and in 1859 he received the thanks of parliament for "his eminent services in India," during the mutinies. In 1860 he was in command of the British forces during the operations in China, and in Nov of that year was decorated with the Grand Cross of the order of the Bath In 1847 he married Helen, daughter of B Tayler, Esq

The badge of the CLAN Grant was the pine or cranberry heath, and their slogan or gathering cry, "Stand fast, Craigellachie!" the bold projecting rock of that name ("the rock of alarm") in the united parishes of Duthil and Rothiemurchus, being their hill of rendezvous. The Grants had a long standing feud with the Gordons, and even among the different branches of themselves there were faction fights, as between the Ballindalloch and Carron Grants. The clan, with few exceptions, was noted for its loyalty, being generally, and the family of the chief invariably, found on the side of government In Strathspey the name prevailed almost to the exclusion of every other, and to this day Grant is the predominant surname in the district, as alluded to by Sir Alexander Boswell, baronet, in his lively verses

"Come the Grants of Tullochgorum,
Wi their pipers gaun before em,
Proud the mothers are that born em

Next the Grants of Rothiemurchus, Every man his sword and durk has,
Every man as proud's a Turk is."

GRANT, PATRICK, LORD ELCHIES, an eminent lawyer, son of Captain Grant of Easter Elchies, was born in 1690 Admitted advocate Feb 12, 1712, he obtained an extensive practice at the bar, and was appointed a judge of the court of session Nov 3 1732, and of the court of justiciary March 3, 1736 He died at the house of Inch, near Edinburgh, July 27, 1754, in his 64th year He collected the Decisions of the Court of Session from 1733 to 1757, which were printed in 1813, in 2 vols 4to, by W M Morison, Esq, advocate, uniform with his Dictionary of Decisions He likewise wrote Annotations upon Lord Stair's Institutes, which were also printed in 1824 The session papers belonging to Lord Elchies, in the Advocates' library, Edinburgh, contain voluminous manuscript notes, all in his lordship's handwriting "He had a head," says Lord Woodhouselee, in his Life of Lord Kames, (vol i. p. 39,) "peculiarly fitted for the investigation of the most intricate points of the law, which his genius devel-

ped as by a species of intuition, reducing every question to some great and leading principle, and thence showing its derivation either as a necessary corollary, or accounting for its departure from the general axiom upon some obvious ground of exception It was from him that Mr Home (Lord Kames), as I have heard him frequently acknowledge, learned that habit of logical investigation, which he found of the utmost advantage in the daily practice of his profession of a barrister, and which he carried into all his researches on the subject of law as a science" He had a son, John Grant, who was also bred to the law, and after being sheriff-depute of the counties of Moray and Nairn, was appointed one of the barons of the Exchequer in Scotland He sold the estate of Elchies to the earl of Findlater, after it had been in possession of the Grants for 300 years It now forms a portion of the earl of Seafield's estates

GRANT, JAMES, of Corrimony, author of 'Essays on the Origin of Society,' was an advocate in Edinburgh, and at the time of his death the father of the Scottish bar He was born in 1743 Being early distinguished for his liberal principles, he numbered among his friends the Hon Henry Erskine, Sir James Macintosh, Francis Jeffrey, and many others, eminent for their attainments and their high political character He died in 1835, at the advanced age of 92

Essays on the Origin of Society, Language, Property, Government, Jurisdiction, Contracts and Marriages, interspersed with Illustrations from the Gaelic and Greek Languages. London, 1785, 4to.

Thoughts on the Origin and Descent of the Gael, with an account of the Picts, Caledonians, and Scots, and observations relative to the authenticity of the Poems of Ossian Lond. 1813, 8vo. Edin 1814, 8vo.

GRANT, CHARLES, an eminent philanthropist and statesman, was born in the north of Scotland in 1746 His father was slain at the battle of Culloden only a few hours after his birth, and the care of his youth in consequence devolved upon an uncle, at whose expense he received a good education in the town of Elgin In 1767 he sailed in a military capacity for India, and on his arrival he was taken into the employment of Mr Richard Becher, a member of the Bengal council In 1770 he revisited his native country, where he married a lady of the name of Fraser In May 1772, accompanied by his wife and some of her relatives, he again went to India as a writer on the Bengal establishment. In the course of the voyage he formed an intimacy with the Rev Christian Frederick Swartz, the celebrated missionary, after whose death, on Mr Grant's recommendation, a monument was erected to his memory in St. Mary's church at Fort St George, at the expense of the East India Company

Soon after Mr Grant's arrival at Calcutta, he was, June 23, 1773, promoted to the rank of factor, and shortly afterwards was appointed secretary to the Board of Trade In 1781 he was stationed as commercial resident in charge of the Company's valuable silk factory at Malda, on the Ganges, in the immediate vicinity of the stupendous ruins of the once magnificent city of Gour, the ancient capital of Bengal In June 1784 he obtained the rank of senior merchant, and in February 1787 he was recalled to Calcutta, to occupy the seat of the fourth member of the Board of Trade, conferred on him by Lord Cornwallis In less than three years after, the impaired health of his family compelled him suddenly to quit India, and his return to England was accompanied by unusually strong expressions of the high satisfaction with which the Government regarded his zealous and faithful services in the commercial department

While in the east Mr Grant distinguished himself by his regard to religion, and his exertions to promote the cause of Christianity He not only contributed liberally to the rebuilding of St John's church, Calcutta, but redeemed from ruin the Protestant mission church, styled Beth-Tephillah, or "House of Prayer," at a personal expense to himself of ten thousand rupees, after which he vested it in trust for sacred and charitable purposes for ever

In May 1794 Mr Grant was elected one of the directors of the East India Company, in which capacity he was instrumental in effecting various essential measures of economy He also supported the projects in agitation for the opening of the trade of India, and for preventing the abuse of the patronage of the Company In April 1804 he was elected deputy chairman of the Court of Directors, and in April 1805 succeeded to the chair, which he filled, either as chairman or deputy chairman, in rotation, till April 1816

In 1802 he had been elected a member of the House of Commons for the Inverness burghs, and in 1804 was returned for the county of Inverness In his place in parliament he invariably opposed the measures of Lord Wellesley's administration in India, and, on April 5, 1805, gave his support to the resolution brought forward by Sir Philip Francis, "That to pursue schemes of conquest and extension of dominion in India are alike repugnant to the wish, the honour, and the policy of this nation" His opinions on all questions relative to India were received with great attention in the House of Commons, where he ever proved himself to be the zealous and powerful supporter of the Company, and the indefatigable friend and advocate of the native population of British India. The education of the Company's servants destined for India was with Mr Grant a question of vital importance, and the plan of the college at Hailey bury, in Hertfordshire, is said to have originated with him

Mr Grant had in 1792 written and printed, for private circulation, a most valuable tract, entitled 'Observations on the State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain' This pamphlet he laid before the court of directors in 1797, accompanied with an introductory Letter, recommending some measures for communicating Christianity to the natives of India, by granting permission for missionaries to proceed thither In June 1813 this paper was called for by the House of Commons, and ordered to be printed for the use of the members The results of Mr Grant's persevering and benevolent exertions for the improvement of the intellectual and moral condition of the inhabitants of India, appear to have been the augmentation of the ecclesiastical establishment of British India, the grant of a privilege to missionaries to visit that country, and the appropriation of a sum for the promotion of education among the natives In 1818 Mr Grant was elected chairman of the commissioners for the issue of exchequer bills. He was also included in the commission appointed by parliament to superintend the erection of new churches He was, besides, a member of the Society in London for Promoting Christian Knowledge, as well as of another Society of the same name connected exclusively with the Highlands and Islands of Scotland He was elected a vice-president of the British and Foreign Bible Society upon its institution in 1804, and was connected with the church missionary and other societies of a religious and charitable description He died October 31, 1823 By his wife, Jane, daughter of Thomas Fraser, Esq, a younger son of Fraser of Balnain, Inverness-shire, he had three sons, namely, Charles, created Lord Glenelg, 8th May, 1836, Robert, of whom a memoir follows, and Thomas William Grant, who died 15th May 1848 One of his daughters was married to Samuel March Phillipps, Esq, at one period under secretary of state for the home department, and another to Patrick Grant, Esq of Redcastle

GRANT, Sir Robert, Right Hon, governor of Bombay, the second son of the preceding, was born in 1785 With his elder brother Charles, Lord Glenelg, he was entered a member of Magdalene college, in the university of Cambridge, of which they both became Fellows He obtained a Craven scholarship in 1799, and in 1801 the brothers took their degree of bachelor of arts together, when Charles was third and Robert fourth wrangler, Charles first and Robert second medalist, so equal were their studies and attainments, and so parallel their success In addition, Charles obtained, 1802, the second bachelor's prize Robert took his degree of M A in 1806, having been preceded in that step two years by his brother He adopted the profession of the law, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's-Inn, January 30, 1807 Subsequently to 1813, he was appointed to the office of king's sergeant in the Duchy Court of Lancaster, and was made one of the commissioners of bankrupts

In 1826 he was returned to parliament for the Inverness district of burghs In 1830 he was elected for Norwich, and again in 1831 When his brother became president of the Board of Control, he was appointed one of the commissioners In 1831 he was sworn a privy councillor, and in 1832 he was nominated judge advocate-general. At the first election for the new borough of Finsbury in 1832, he was returned as one of its first members by a very large majority. In June 1834 he was appointed governor of Bombay, and continued in the discharge of his high duties till July 9, 1838, when he expired at Dapoorie in his 53d year. He had, on the 19th June, left the Presidency in good health for the hills; but having imprudently ridden out during a heavy fall of rain, he was attacked by fever; from which, however, he in some degree recovered, but suffering a relapse, his brain became affected, and he sank under the effects of the malady He married Margaret, daughter of the late Sir David Davidson of Cantray, county of Nairn, by whom he left an infant family. A volume of his Poems was published a short time after his decease, edited by his brother, Lord Glenelg.

His works are

Sketch of the History of the East India Company, from its foundation to the passing of the Regulating Act, in 1773, with a Summary View of the Changes which have taken place since that period in the internal Administration of British India. Lond. 1813, 8vo.

The Expediency maintained of continuing the System by which the Trade and Government of India are now Regulated. Lond. 1813, 8vo

GRANT, Sir William, the Right Hon, an eminent lawyer, descended from the Grants of Beldornie, one of the branches of the ancient clan of that name, was born in 1754 at Elchies, on the banks of the Spey, in the county of Moray His father was originally bred to agricultural pursuits, but died collector of Customs in the Isle of Man The subject of this notice received the elementary part of his education at the grammar school of Elgin, with his younger brother, who became collector at Martinico After completing his studies at King's college, Old Aberdeen, he went to London to follow the profession of the law He was entered at Lincoln's-Inn, and, before being called to the bar, was, at the age of twenty-five, considered competent to fill the situation of attorney-general of Canada; to which colony he accordingly proceeded, and soon obtained undisputed preeminence in the Canadian courts. Canada was at that time overrun by the revolutionary armies of America, and Mr. Grant was present at the memorable siege of Quebec, and the death of General Montgomery. He was himself engaged in active military duty, and commanded a body of volunteers. He remained in Canada for a considerable period, but the unsettled state of the colony, and the hope of succeeding better at the English bar, induced him to resign his office of attorney-general, and to return to London. He was called to the bar by the Society of Lincoln's-Inn in 1787, when he engaged in practice in the courts of Common law, and joined the home circuit. Being nearly unknown, however, in England, he went the circuit for several years without obtaining a single brief Happening to be retained in some appeal cases from the court of session in Scotland to the House of Lords, Lord Chancellor Thurlow was much struck with his powers of argument, and having learnt his name, observed to a friend, "Be not surprised if that young man should one day occupy this seat." In consequence of an invitation from Lord Thurlow, he subsequently left the common law bar, and thenceforward practised solely in the court of chancery

At the general election of 1790, Mr Grant was returned for Shaftesbury, and soon distinguished himself as a powerful coadjutor of Mr Pitt. He seldom spoke in the House, but when he did, it was on questions with which he was fully acquainted In 1791 he distinguished himself so much in a debate relative to the laws of Canada that he was highly complimented by Mr. Fox, who declared that he was one of his most formidable antagonists In 1792 he made a most able, acute, and argumentative speech in defence of the ministry on the subject of the Russian armament. In 1793 he was called within the bar, with a patent of precedence, and in the same year was appointed a Welsh judge, when a new writ was ordered for Shaftesbury on the 20th June, and he was not rechosen However, on a vacancy occurring for Windsor in the following January, he was elected for that borough He was at that time solicitor-general for the queen In 1796 he was elected member of parliament for the county of Banff In 1798 he was appointed chief-justice of Chester, in 1799 he succeeded the late Lord Redesdale as solicitor-general, when he was knighted; and on May 29, 1801, on the promotion of Sir Pepper Arden to be chief-justice of the common pleas, he was nominated master of the rolls He continued member for Banffshire until the dissolution of parliament in 1812, and during a period of upwards of sixteen years, he filled the judicial chair in the Rolls court with undiminished ability and reputation He retired about the end of 1817 and in his latter years lived chiefly at Barton House, Dawlish, the residence of his sister, the widow of Admiral Schanck Sir William Grant died, unmarried, May 25, 1832

GRANT, ANNE, usually designated Mrs Grant of Laggan, a popular and instructive miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was M'Vicar, was born in Glasgow in 1755 Her father was an officer in the British army, and, on her mother's side, she was descended from the ancient family of Stewart of Invernahyle, in Argyleshire Shortly after her birth, her father went with his regiment to America, with the intention, if he found sufficient inducement, of settling there His wife and infant daughter soon after joined him They landed at Charlestown, and though the child was then scarcely three years old, she retained ever after a distinct recollection of her arrival in America During her residence in that country, she was taught by her mother to read, and she never had any other instructor But she was so apt and diligent a scholar, that before her sixth year, she had perused the Old Testament, with the contents of which she was well acquainted About the same age she also learned to speak the Dutch language, in consequence of being domesticated for some time with a family of Dutch colonists in the state of New York From the sergeant of a Scottish regiment she received the only lessons in penmanship she ever obtained and observing her love of books, he presented her with a copy of Blind Harry's 'Wallace,' the perusal of which excited in her bosom a lasting admiration of the heroism of Wallace and his compatriots, and a glowing enthusiasm for Scotland, which, as she herself expressed it, ever after remained with her as a principle of life Her fondness for reading also procured for her, from an officer of her father's regiment, a copy of Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' which, young as she was, she studied with much attention Indeed, to her diligent perusal of this book she herself ascribed the formation of her character, observing that, whatever she possessed of elevation of spirit, expansion of mind, or taste for the sublime and beautiful, she owed it all to her familiarity with Milton The effect of this became so evident in her conversation and habits as to secure for her the notice of several of the most eminent settlers in the state of New York, and, in particular to procure for her the friendship of the celebrated Madame Schuyler, whose worth and virtues Mrs Grant has extolled in her 'Memoirs of an American Lady'

Mrs Grant's father had, with the view of permanently settling in America, received a large grant of land, to which, by purchase, he made several additions, but, from bad health, he was obliged to leave the country very hurriedly, without having had time to dispose of his property He returned to Scotland with his wife and daughter in 1768, and a few years afterwards he was appointed barrack-master of Fort-Augustus — Soon after the revolutionary war broke out in America, and before his estate there could be sold it was confiscated, and thus the family were deprived of the chief means to which they had looked forward for support While her father continued in the situation of barrack-master, the office of chaplain to the Fort was filled by the Rev James Grant a young clergyman of accomplished mind and manners, connected with some of the most respectable families in the neighbourhood, who was soon afterwards appointed minister of the parish of Laggan, in Inverness-shire, and in 1779 he married Miss M'Vicar the subject of this notice When she went to Laggan, she set herself assiduously to learn the customs and the language of the people among whom she was to reside, and soon became well versed in both Mr Grant died in 1801 Of the marriage twelve children were born four of whom died in early life

For some time after her husband's death Mrs Grant took the charge of a small farm in the neighbourhood of Laggan, but in 1803 she found it necessary to remove to the vicinity of Stirling, where she was enabled, with the assistance of her friends, to provide, in the meantime, for her family She had always found delight in the pursuits of literature, and having early shown a taste for poetry, she was occasionally accustomed to write verses. Of her poems, which were generally written in haste, her friends formed a much higher opinion than she herself did. She usually gave them away, when finished, without retaining a copy It occurred to some of those persons who felt interested in her welfare, that a volume of her poems might be published with advantage; and, before she was well aware of their kind intentions, the prospectus was dispersed all over Scotland for printing such a volume by subscription At this time Mrs Grant had not even collected the materials for the proposed publication, but, in a short period, the extraordinary number of upwards of 3,000 subscribers were procured by her influential friends The late celebrated duchess of Gordon took a lively interest in this project, and Mrs. Grant was in this way almost forced before the public The poems were well received on their appearance in 1803, and even the Edinburgh Review, that then universal disparager of poetic genius, was constrained to admit that some of the pieces were "written with great beauty, tenderness, and delicacy" From the profits of this publication Mrs Grant was enabled to discharge some debts which had been contracted during her married life In 1806 appeared her well-known 'Letters from the Mountains,' which went through several editions, and soon rendered her name highly popular

In 1810 Mrs Grant removed from Stirling to Edinburgh, where she resided for the remainder of her life Here it was her misfortune to lose by death all her children except her youngest son In 1808 she prepared for the press her 'Memoirs of an American Lady,' in two volumes, and in 1811 appeared her 'Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlanders of Scotland,' also in two volumes, both of which were favourably received The former work was greatly esteemed both in this country and in America, and contains much vigorous writing with some highly graphic sketches of Transatlantic scenery, and habits of the people, previous to the Revolution In 1814 she published a poem in two parts, entitled 'Eighteen Hundred and Thirteen,' and the following year she produced at London her 'Popular Models and Impressive Warnings for the Sons and Daughters of Industry,' in two volumes

In 1825 an application was made on her behalf to George the Fourth for a pension, which was signed by Sir Walter Scott, Lord Jeffrey, Mr Mackenzie, 'The Man of Feeling,' and other influential persons in Edinburgh, in consequence of which Mrs. Grant received a pension of £100 yearly on the civil establishment of Scotland, which, with the emoluments of her literary works, and some liberal bequests left her by deceased friends, rendered her circumstances in her latter years quite easy and independent She died November 7, 1838, aged 84

GRANT, Joseph, a pleasing writer of tales and poetry, chiefly in the Scottish dialect, was born in Kincardineshire, May 26, 1805 His father was a small farmer, and when old enough he was employed in summer in tending cattle, while in winter he was sent to the school of his native parish, where he may be said to have acquired all the education he ever received From his earliest years he was devoted to reading, and began to compose verses at the age of fourteen In 1828 he published 'Juvenile Lays,' a collection of poems, and in 1830 appeared his 'Kincardineshire Traditions,' in one small volume At a later period of his life he contributed several interesting Tales and Sketches to 'Chambers' Edinburgh Journal' In 1831 he engaged as an assistant to a shopkeeper in Stonehaven, but the latter giving up business in a few months, he returned to his father's farm of Affrusk Subsequently he was employed as a clerk in the Guardian newspaper office, Dundee, and latterly in that of Mr Alexander Miller, writer there He was engaged preparing a volume of his Tales for the press, when he was seized with a cold which settled on his lungs, and, returning home for the benefit of his native air, he died at Affrusk, April 14, 1835 The volume alluded to was published, in 1836, under the title of 'Tales of the Glens, with Ballads and Songs,' and a Memoir by Robert Nicoll, author of 'Poems and Lyrics'

Gray, Baron, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by a family of the same name, descended from the Greys of Chillingham in Northumberland The surname is originally French, being first borne by Fulbert, great chamberlain of Robert, duke of Normandy, from whom he got the castle and lands of Croy or Gray in Picardy, and hence assumed the surname. He is said to have had a son, John, and a daughter, Arlotta, the mother of William the Conqueror. If so, this Fulbert must have been a tanner at Falaise before being elevated to the office of great chamberlain. The first of the name who came to England with William the Conqueror, and from that monarch obtained several lordships, is stated to have been the Conqueror's kinsman. He was progenitor of several families, who spelled the name Grey, and were raised to high rank in the peerage of England, some of them obtaining a prominent place in history, such as the dukes of Suffolk and Kent, the earls of Stamford and Tankerville, De Grey and Grey, the barons Grey of Codnor, Ruthyn, Wilton, Rolleston, Wark and Chillingham To the Suffolk family belonged the amiable and accomplished Lady Jane Grey, who fell an innocent victim to the ambition of her father, on February 12, 1554.

Lord Grey of Chillingnam is stated to have given the lands of Broxmouth in the county of Roxborough to a younger son of his family, in the reign of William the Lion. In the reign of Alexander the Third, John de Gray (the Scottish way of spelling the name), steward to the earls of March, is witness to many donations to the monastery of Coldstream Sir Hugh de Gray, a subsequent proprietor of Broxmouth, left three sons Sir Hugh de Gray, Henry de Gray, and John de Gray The two elder brothers were among those who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296, and the eldest, Sir Hugh de Gray, died about 1300

His son, Sir Andrew Gray, faithfully adhered to Robert the Bruce, and in 1307 was joined with Sir James Douglas and Sir Alexander Fraser in command of a detachment sent against the lord of Lorn. In 1312 he was present at the taking of the castle of Edinburgh, with Randolph, nephew of Robert the Bruce, when Frank or Francis, the guide, was the first that scaled the walls, Sir Andrew Gray followed him, and Randolph himself was the third For his services he obtained from King Robert a grant of several lands, among the rest the barony of Longforgund, now Longforgan, in Perthshire, which had belonged to Edmund de Hastings. This was the first connection of the Grays with the county of Perth, in which the family ever after had their residence Sir Andrew Gray married Ada Giffard, daughter of Thomas Lord Yester, and had two sons, Sir David, and Thomas. The latter, in 1346, accompanied King David the Second to the battle of Durham, where he was taken prisoner, and not released till ten years afterwards.

The elder son, Sir David de Gray, fourth baron of Broxmouth, and second of Longforgan, died between 1354 and 1357 His son, Sir John Gray, was one of the twenty young men of quality proposed to be sureties for King David's ransom in 1354, and after the king's release in 1357, he was appointed his clerk register, in which office he was continued by Robert the Second. He died in 1376. He had two sons, John and Patrick. John, the elder, was one of the noble Scottish heirs who were sent to England for King David's ransom in 1357 He died before his father, without issue.

Sir Patrick, the younger son, was in great favour with both King Robert the Second and his successor He added considerably to his possessions in Perthshire, and from the former monarch he had a pension of £26 13s. 4d sterling In 1413 he entered into a bond of manrent at Dundee, with the earl of Crawford, that he, the said Sir Patrick, 'is becumyn man of special retinue till the said earl, for the term of his life, nane ontaken but amitie and allegiance till our lord the king, for which he shall have in his fee of the said earl, the town of Lhth," &c. He had four sons and three daughters. Sir Andrew, the eldest son, was one of the Scottish nobles who met King James the First at Durham in 1423, to concert measures for his liberation He was created a peer of parliament, under the title of Lord Gray, before 9th October 1437, when he was one of the lords of the articles in parliament for the peers. He died before July 1445 He was twice married: first, to Janet, a daughter of Sir Roger de Mortimer, with whom he got the lands of Fowlis in Perthshire, and, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Walter Buchanan. By his first wife he had, with seven daughters, a son, Sir Andrew, 2d Lord Gray, and by his second wife four sons and one daughter

The eldest son, Andrew, second Lord Gray of Fowlis, was one of the hostages for King James the First, in his father's lifetime, March 20, 1424, when his annual revenue was estimated at six hundred merks. He obtained liberty to return to Scotland in 1427, and was one of the train of knights who accompanied the princess Margaret of Scotland to France in 1436, on her marriage to the dauphin He was employed in most of the public transactions of his time, and in 1449 was one of the ambassadors to England who that year concluded a two years' truce, for which, and for a renewed truce for three years on its expiration in 1451, he was one of the guarantees on the part of Scotland He obtained the royal license, of date August 26, 1452, to build a castle upon any part of his lands, and, in consequence, he erected in Longforgan the beautiful edifice called Castle Huntly, long the principal residence of the family The tradition of the country is that he named it after his lady, a daughter of the earl of Huntly, but like most other traditions, it is wrong in its main incident, as his lady's name was Elizabeth Wemyss, eldest daughter of Sir John Wemyss of Rires in Fife A subsequent Lord Gray married the daughter of the second earl of Huntly, and this may have given rise to the mistake In 1615 Castle Huntly, with the estate attached to it, was sold to the Strathmore family then earls of Kinghorn, and becoming a favourite residence of Earl Patrick, the name was changed to Castle Lyon, and the estate, by charter of Charles the Second in 1672, was erected into a lordship called the lordship of Lyon This name it retained till 1777, when it was purchased by Mr Paterson, the father of George Paterson, Esq, who marrying Anne, daughter of the twelfth Lord Gray restored the name of Castle Huntly In the beginning of 1455, the second Lord Gray accompanied William, earl of Douglas, and James, Lord Hamilton, on a pilgrimage to Canterbury, for which they got a safe-conduct from the English monarch The same year, he was appointed master of the household by King James the Second, and four years afterwards one of the wardens of the marches. He got charters of a great many lands, and died in 1469 With two daughters, he had two sons, Patrick, master of Gray, and Andrew The latter had several sons, one of whom, a merchant in Aberdeen made a considerable fortune, and was ancestor of the Grays of Schives and Pittendrum

Patrick, master of Gray, was one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to King James the Second, and when that monarch stabbed the eighth earl of Douglas, he seconded the blow with a stroke from his battle-axe. He had a son and three daughters. Predeceasing his father, his son, Andrew, became third Lord Gray This nobleman was one of the lords of the privy council of King James the Third, and after that monarch's murder, the hereditary office of sheriff of the county of Forfar was conferred on him, on the forced resignation of David, duke of Montrose and earl of Crawford, 14th December, 1488 He had the office of justice-general north of the Forth, on the forfeiture of Lord Lyle in 1489, and in 1506 he was appointed lord-justice-general of Scotland He died in February 1513-14 He married, first, Janet, only daughter of John, Lord Keith, and had a son.

Patrick, and two daughters; secondly, Lady Elizabeth Stewart, third daughter of John, earl of Athol, brother uterine of King James the Second, and by her had four sons, namely, Robert, of Litfie, killed at Flodden, without issue, Gilbert, of Buttergask, who carried on the line of the family, Andrew, of Muirtoun, and Edward, an ecclesiastic, and five daughters.

Patrick, fourth Lord Gray, died at Castle Huntly, in April 1541. It was this nobleman who married Lady Janet Gordon, the second daughter of the second earl of Huntly, chancellor of Scotland, and relict of Alexander, master of Crawford. He had three daughters, and dying without issue male, he was succeeded by his nephew, Patrick, eldest of three sons of his brother of the half-blood, Gilbert.

Patrick Gray of Buttergask, fifth Lord Gray, was one of the prisoners taken at the rout of Solway in 1542, but soon released, on payment of a ransom of five hundred pounds sterling. He was, we are told, feared by Cardinal Bethune, "because at that time," says Calderwood, "he used the company of those that professed godliness, and carried small favour to the cardinal." The latter, therefore, strove to set his lordship and Lord Ruthven, whom "he hated for knowledge of the word," at variance, and had the art to induce the regent Arran, when at Perth with him in 1544, to confer the office of provost of Perth, held by Lord Ruthven, on John Charteris of Kinfauns, who was allied to Lord Gray. The citizens, however, refused to acknowledge the cardinal's nominee, and, with Ruthven at their head, would not allow him to enter the town. Having applied to his friend Lord Gray for assistance, the latter, at the head of an armed force, attacked the town from the bridge, but the tide did not answer the designs of Charteris, who with Norman Leslie, and others of his friends, was bringing up great guns by water to storm the open side of the town. Ruthven had purposely withdrawn his guards from the bridge into the neighbouring houses, and Lord Gray, ignorant of the snare thus laid for him, boldly marched up into the town, when Ruthven suddenly sallied out, and briskly charging him, routed his party, sixty of whom were slain. This skirmish took place on 22d July 1544. In the following January Lord Gray was ordered to attend the regent and the cardinal at Dundee, and by a stratagem they got his lordship, the earl of Rothes, and Mr Henry Balnaves, into their power, and immediately sent them prisoners to Blackness castle, where they remained for some time. Lord Gray was one of the first promoters of the Reformation in Scotland, and in 1567 he joined the association for the defence of King James the Sixth. He died in 1582. He had six sons and as many daughters. The sons were Patrick, master of Gray, Andrew, ancestor of the Grays of Invergowrie, James, who had a charter of Buttergask, and was one of the equeries of the queen's guards in 1564, Robert of Drummelzier, and another Patrick.

Patrick, sixth Lord Gray, before succeeding to the title, was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, 5th May 1578, in room of Lord Boyd, but on the 25th October following, the latter was restored, and the master of Gray lost his place. Boyd was again superseded, on 10th December 1583, by the notorious James Stewart, earl of Arran, on whose promotion, Lord Gray was reappointed to a seat on the bench, on 12th November following. He held his seat till 27th June 1587, when Lord Boyd again dispossessed him of it. He died in 1609. He had four sons and five daughters. The sons were, Patrick, master of Gray; James, gentleman of the bedchamber to James the Sixth, Gilbert, of Ballumby in Fifeshire, Robert, of Millhill, and Andrew, grandfather of Sir James Gray, British envoy at the court of Naples.

Patrick, the eldest son, was the celebrated master of Gray, the favourite of James the Sixth, and rival of the earl of Arran. He is described as having possessed a handsome countenance, most graceful manners, and an insinuating address, united to a boundless ambition and a restless and intriguing spirit. He was educated at the college of St. Andrews, where he professed the Protestant religion, but when very young he went to France, and getting acquainted with one Friar Gray, he was through him introduced to the popish bishop of Glasgow, the Scottish Jesuits and Papists of the seminary of Paris, and spent some time at the court of France. As he always professed the deepest attachment to the unhappy Mary queen of Scots, then a captive in England, he was employed by the house of Guise as a confidential envoy in their negociations with her. On the 18th November 1583, he returned with the duke of Lennox to Scotland, and immediately set himself to obtain the favour of the young king, James the Sixth, by revealing all he knew of his mother's secrets, and was appointed one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, master of the wardrobe, one of the members of his privy council, and in 1584 commendator of the monastery of Dunfermline. In the latter year he was sent ambassador to Elizabeth, and by his smooth and specious representations soon obtained her favour, as he had done that of his own sovereign. To ingratiate himself the more with her, he offered to do his utmost to prevail on James to recall the banished lords, and to promote a league between England and Scotland for the defence of the protestant religion. This line of policy Elizabeth accordingly adopted, and on his return to Scotland he had the art to defeat a project of an association which had been contemplated between James and his mother. In his secret correspondence with Elizabeth the master of Gray wrote to her under the title of Le Lecteur. In 1585, on the imprisonment of the earl of Arran at St. Andrews, on the charge of being accessory to the death of Lord Russell, an English nobleman slain by his kinsman Ker of Fernyhurst, on the borders, by a bribe to the master of Gray, he was allowed to go to his own castle of Kinneil, there to remain under ward. Afraid of his return to court, the master, on 14th August of that year, addressed a letter to Archibald Douglas, who had been present at the murder of Darnley, and was then in exile in England, offering his aid for the return of the protestant lords, but was counterplotted by Arran, who was fast regaining his influence with the king, in consequence of which it is said that Gray even contemplated his assassination. In the following October, on the banished lords reaching Berwick on their return, Arran, breaking from his ward, hurried to the king, then at Stirling, and rushing into James' presence, declared that the lords were already in Scotland. Accusing the master of Gray as the author of the whole conspiracy, he urged James to send for him instantly, and put him to death. Gray was at that time in Perthshire raising his friends, and at once determined upon obeying the summons. Posting to court, he defended himself so ably from the accusation, and was so graciously received by the king, that Arran and his faction were obliged to retire. On the approach of the banished lords, a siege of the castle was commenced, when the king sent out the master of Gray, with a flag of truce, to demand the cause of their coming. The negociation was conducted by Gray, who was at the bottom of the whole plot, and the result was, that the banished lords were admitted to an audience with the king. In 1586, when Elizabeth had resolved upon the death of the hapless Mary, James despatched the master of Gray and Sir Robert Melville to intercede for her, and although on his arrival in the English court, on 29th December, in his public conferences with Elizabeth and her ministers, and in his open despatches to Scotland, he exhibited great apparent activity and interest on her behalf, he privately encouraged Elizabeth in her design of putting her to death, and even whispered in her ear that "the dead don't bite." His request, however, that Mary's life might be spared for fifteen days to give time to communicate with James, was peremptorily refused. The following year his own fall occurred. On the accusation of Sir William Stewart, then about to proceed on an embassy to France, he was tried for high treason, condemned, and on the point of being executed, but, on the intercession of the earl of Huntly and Lord Hamilton, his life was spared, and the sentence changed to banishment. In his "dittay" or indictment, (Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol i p. 157,) are contained various points of treason "But his most flagrant offence," says Tytler, (Hist. of Scotland, vol. ix. p. 18,) "was the base betrayal of his trust in his recent negotiation in England, where he secretly recommended the death, instead of pleading for the life of the Scottish queen At first, with his wonted effrontery, he attempted to brazen out the matter, and overawe his enemies, but in the end he pleaded guilty, and as abject as he had been insolent, threw himself on the king's mercy None lamented his disgrace." He retired first to France, and afterwards to Italy, but in 1589 was permitted to return to Scotland, and was even received at court, though he never recovered his former position In 1592 we find him named as one of the accusers of the celebrated preacher, Mr Robert Bruce, on the unfounded charge of harbouring the turbulent earl of Bothwell At this time Gray had promised that restless nobleman to get him restored to the king's favour, but Bothwell, apprehensive of his treachery, did not keep an appointment which had been fixed between them, and Gray, so far from bringing any accusation against Bruce, became his champion, for on leaving the court he offered "to fight his honest quarrel in that behalf" with any man but the king (See vol i p 428, art. BRUCE.) He succeeded his father as Lord Gray in 1609, and died three years afterwards. He married, first, Elizabeth, second daughter of Lord Glammis, chancellor of Scotland, without issue, secondly Lady Mary Stewart, eldest daughter of Robert, earl of Orkney, and had by her two sons, Andrew, eighth Lord Gray, and William, and six daughters. It is stated in a 'Discourse' inserted in Calderwood's History, (vol iv p. 258,) that when at St. Andrews in his youth "he was married to a young gentlewoman of good parentage and fame, whom he repudiated, lyke as his father also cast away his mother So, about a yeere after his marriage, he passeth to France," &c. An adventure in which his brother James was engaged in 1593 affords an apt illustration of the rude manners of the times. He had carried off a gentlewoman, the daughter and heiress of one John Carnegie, but by order of the council, she was delivered up to her father Notwithstanding this, he again carried her off from a house in Edinburgh where she and her father were residing, and we are told, (Calderwood's Hist. vol v p. 252,) that she "was hailled doun a closse to the North Loche, and convoyed over in a boat, where there were about ten or twelve men on the other side to receave her They sett her upon a man's sadle and convoyed her away, her haire hanging about her face The Lord Hume keeped the High Street with armed men till the fact was accomplished."

Andrew, eighth Lord Gray, was lieutenant of the gens d'armes in France, under Lord Gordon, in 1624, and was much engaged in the wars in that country He resigned the hereditary office of sheriff of Forfarshire, which had been held by his family for more than 150 years, to King Charles the First, for 50,000 merks (about £3,000 sterling), for which he got his majesty's bond, but the civil wars breaking out shortly thereafter, he was never paid. Being with the marquis of Montrose on 6th October 1645, he was ordered to be banished the kingdom by the Estates, never to return on pain of death, but after being delayed till the following June, the sentence does not appear to have been carried into effect. In 1649 he was excommunicated by the commission of the General Assembly, on account of his being a Roman Catholic, and was fined £1,500 by Cromwell, who excepted him out of his act of grace to the Scotch in 1654. He was soon after prevailed upon by Charles the Second and his brother the duke of York, then in exile in France, to resign his lieutenancy of the gens d'armes in favour of Marshal Schomberg This office had long been held by a Scotsman, and could never afterwards be recovered Lord Gray died in 1663. He was twice married first, to Margaret Ogilvie, countess of Buchan, daughter of Matthew, Lord Deskford, by whom he had a son, Patrick, master of Gray, killed at the siege of a town in France, unmarried, and a daughter, Anne, of whom afterwards, and, secondly, to Catherine Cadell, by whom he had one daughter Having no surviving male issue, Lord Gray, in 1639, made a resignation of his honours into the hands of King Charles the First, and obtained a new patent, dated 8th January that year, in favour, after himself, of his daughter and heiress, Anne, who had married William Gray, younger of Pittendrum, and had the honours conferred on his son-in-law, with the style, during his own life, of master of Gray, which patent was ratified in parliament 7th November, 1641 This William Gray was eldest son of Sir William Gray of Pittendrum, who had been created a baronet by King Charles the First. His father was Thomas Gray of Brighouse, nephew of Andrew Gray of Schives, and he acquired great wealth as a merchant in Edinburgh For corresponding with the marquis of Montrose Sir William was fined by the parliament at St. Andrews, 100,000 merks Scots, and at the desire of General Leslie, he was imprisoned in the castle and tolbooth of Edinburgh, but on the application of his friends to the committee of Estates the fine was reduced to 85,000 merks, which was paid by his son, the master of Gray The sum of £10,000 sterling was also extorted from him, by way of a loan, and never repaid Sir William died in 1648. By his wife, Egidia, sister of Sir John Smith of Grothill and King's Cramond, provost of Edinburgh, he had 6 sons and 12 daughters. William, the eldest son, married Anne, mistress of Gray as already mentioned, Robert the 2d son, was killed at Inverkeithing, leaving a son, John Gray of Crichie, who became 10th Lord Gray, David, the 3d son, was killed at Tangier, Alexander the 4th son, died unmarried, and Andrew, the youngest, was minister of Glasgow His sermons are highly prized They are entitled 'Eleven Communion Sermons' with a Letter subjoined written on his deathbed to Lord Warristoun Edin 1616, 8vo Lond 1679, 8vo

William master of Gray the eldest son had 232,000 merks given him by his father on his marriage Like the rest of his family he was a staunch loyalist, and at the battle of Worcester in 1651, he commanded a regiment in the army of Charles the Second which had been raised mostly at his own expense He was killed in a duel near London, by the earl of Southesk, in Aug 1660 By his first wife Anne, mistress of Gray, he had three sons Patrick, ninth Lord Gray, William, who died unmarried, and Charles admitted advocate, 21st December 1675 By his second wife, a daughter of Gibson of Durie, who had been twice a widow, he had no issue

leaving a daughter, Marjory, mistress of Gray, who married her father's cousin-german, John Gray of Crichie. The ninth Lord Gray, with consent of his only surviving brother, Charles, on 20th February 1707, made a new resignation of the honours into the hands of Queen Anne, and obtained a new patent of the same, with the former precedency, to the said John Gray of Crichie, and to his eldest son by the said Marjory, mistress of Gray, and their heirs, in virtue of which patent John Gray of Crichie became tenth Lord Gray, even during the life of the ninth lord, and on 11th March following he took the oaths and his seat in parliament. Marjory, his wife, died before her father In September 1686, her husband obtained from King James the Seventh an order to the commissioners of the treasury in Scotland, for a sum of £1,500 sterling, in consideration of his loyalty, and that of his family, and the losses sustained by his grandfather during the civil wars. He died in 1724 He had three sons and three daughters.

John, his eldest son, eleventh Lord Gray, died 15th December 1788. His son, John, twelfth lord, greatly embellished the family estates, by planting and other improvements. At the election of peers of Scotland 12th May 1789, he protested for precedency, and against the calling of Lord Forbes or any other baron before him He married, 17th October 1741, Margaret Blair, heiress of Kinfauns in Perthshire, by which marriage that fine property came into possession of the family He had four sons, three of whom succeeded to the title, and seven daughters. The twelfth lord died at Kinfauns, 28th August 1782, in his 67th year

Alexander, 13th lord, an officer in the first regiment of dragoon guards, quitted the army in 1783, and died at Edinburgh, Dec. 18, 1786, in his 35th year, unmarried. His brother, William John, 14th lord, an officer in the Scots Greys, died Dec. 12, 1807, also unmarried, in his 54th year

His brother, Francis, 15th Lord Gray, born at Edinburgh, Sept. 1, 1765, was major in the first battalion of Breadalbane fencibles in 1793, and in August 1807 was appointed postmaster-general of Scotland. He succeeded to the title the same year, and in 1810 resigned the office of postmaster-general. He was for many years one of the Scottish representative peers. In 1822 the superb edifice of Kinfauns castle, about 8 miles from Perth, was built by him, from a design by Smirke. Gray house, in Forfarshire, is another seat of the family Broughty castle, (long in ruins,) near Dundee, was built in the end of the 15th century by the 3d Lord Gray, the first hereditary sheriff of Forfarshire of this family on whom the lands of Broughty had been conferred by James IV In 1547, after the battle of Pinkie, Fort de Gray as Broughty was termed, was delivered by Patrick, Lord Gray, to the English, and remained in their occupation till Feb. 20, 1550 In 1666 it was sold to Fothringham of Powrie and Fothringham The 15th Lord Gray m. in 1794, Mary Anne, daughter of Lieutenant-colonel James Johnston issue 1 son, John his successor, and 8 daughters, 1st, Madelina, 2d, Margaret, married in 1820 John Grant, Esq., of Kilgraston, and died in 1822, leaving a daughter Margaret, married Hon. Capt. D Murray, brother of 3d earl of Mansfield, 3d, Jane Anne, married in 1834 Col. Charles Philip Ainslie, 14th light dragoons, which marriage was dissolved in 1843 His lordship died 20th August, 1842.

The only son, John, 16th Lord Gray, born May 12th 1796, a representative peer, and deputy-lieutenant of Perthshire, married July 23d, 1833, Mary Anne, daughter of Colonel Charles Philip Ainslie, 4th dragoons, 2d son of Sir Philip Ainslie, of Pilton, without issue. As the peerage, failing male heirs, descends in the female line, his lordship's sister, the Hon Madelina Gray, born 11th November 1799, is heiress presumptive to the title and estates (1861).

A branch of the family of Gray has possessed the estate of Carntyne, in Lanarkshire, since before 1595

GRAY, Gilbert, a learned principal of Marischal college, Aberdeen, was appointed to that dignity in 1598, being the second after the foundation of that university He studied under Robert Rollock, the first principal of the university of Edinburgh, whose worth and learning he has commemorated in a curious Latin oration, which he delivered in 1611, in praise of the illustrious writers of Scotland, and which will be found prefixed to Mackenzie's Lives. It is entitled 'Oratio de Illustribus Scotiæ Scriptoribus,' habita a magistro Gilberto Grayo, Gymnasiarcha Academiæ Novæ Abredoniæ, A D 1611 Many of the authors named in it are fictitious, especially as regards the Scottish kings, the worthy principal being a firm believer in the fabulous stories of Fergus the First having written on the subject of law 300 years before the birth of Christ, Dornadilla, a century after, composing rules for sportsmen, Reutha, the seventh king of Scotland, being a great promoter of schools and education, and King Josina, a century and a half before the Christian era, writing on botany, and the practice of medicine! Principal Gray died in 1614.

GRAY, James, the Rev, the friend of Burns, and himself a poet of no mean pretensions, was originally master of the High School of Dumfries, and associated a good deal with Burns while residing in that town He was afterwards appointed to the High School of Edinburgh, where he taught with much reputation for upwards of twenty years, but being disappointed in obtaining the rectorship, he quitted that situation, and was made rector of the academy at Belfast He subsequently entered into holy orders, and went out to India as a chaplain in the Hon East India Company's service He was stationed at Bhooj in Cutch, near the mouths of the Indus, and the education of the young Rao of that province having been entrusted to the British government, Mr Gray was selected as well qualified for the office of instructor to that prince, being the first Christian who was ever honoured with such an appointment in the East. He died there in September 1830, deeply regretted by all who knew him, having been much esteemed for the primitive simplicity of his heart and manners. He was the author of 'Cuna of Cheyd,' and the 'Sabbath among the Mountains,' besides innumerable miscellaneous pieces. He left in manuscript a poem, entitled 'India,' and a translation of the Gospels into the Cutch dialect of the Hindostanee

Mr Gray married Mary Phillips, eldest sister of Mrs Hogg, wife of the Ettrick Shepherd, and his family mostly settled in India. "He was," says Hogg, "a man of genius, but his genius was that of a meteor, it wanted steadying A kinder and more disinterested heart than his never beat in a human bosom" Hogg introduced him into the 'Queen's Wake,' as the fifteenth bard who sung the ballad of 'King Edward's Dream' He is thus described

"The next was bred on southern shore,
Beneath the mists of Lammermore,
And long, by Nith and crystal Tweed,
Had taught the Border youth to read
The strains of Greece, the bard of Troy,
Were all his theme and all his joy
Well-toned his voice of wars to sing,
His hair was dark as raven's wing,
His eye an intellectual lance,
No heart could bear its searching glance
But every bard to him was dear,
His heart was kind, his soul sincere.
* * *
Alike to him the south or north,
So high he held the minstrel worth,
So high his ardent mind was wrought,
Once of himself he scarcely thought.
Dear to his heart the strains sublime,
The strain admired in ancient time,
And of his minstrel honours proud,
He strung his harp too high, too loud"

GRAY, ALEXANDER, founder of an hospital for the sick poor at Elgin, youngest child of Deacon Alexander Gray, a wheelwright and watchmaker in that town, by his wife, Janet Sutherland, sister of Dr Sutherland, a physician who at one time practised at Bath, was born in 1751 After receiving a liberal education, he became the apprentice of Dr Thomas Stephen, a physician in his native town, and completed his medical studies at the university of Edinburgh Soon after he was appointed assistant-surgeon on the Bengal establishment, in the service of the Hon the East India Company, and was a long time resident in Calcutta. In advanced life he married a lady much younger than himself, from whom he separated some time before his death, which occurred in 1808 He had no children, and having, by economical habits, accumulated a considerable fortune, he left £26,000 for the endowment of an hospital for the sick poor of the town and county of Elgin The building was erected in 1819, on a slight but spacious eminence at the west end of the town Its situation is remarkably well chosen, and being a very handsome edifice in the Grecian style, with a projecting portico of Doric columns on its eastern front from a design of Gillespie, it forms a splendid termination to the High Street of Elgin He also bequeathed a handsome annuity to his sister, the only surviving member of his family, with other legacies, and the annual interest of £2,000 to "the reputed old maids in the town of Elgin, daughters of respectable but decayed families" The interest of £7,000 was settled during life upon his widow, £4,000 of the principal at her death to be appropriated to the building of a new church at Elgin, and until such church is required, the interest of that sum to be applied to the use of the hospital

GRAY, CHARLES, Captain R M, a minor poet, was born in Anstruther, Fifeshire, in 1782 In early life he obtained a commission in the royal marines, in which he rose to the rank of captain, and after continuing in the service for a period exceeding thirty-six years, he retired on full pay about 1839 He belonged to the Woolwich division of his corps, to which a maternal uncle, (the excellent and truly Christian, Major-general Burn,) and several brothers, were also attached, some of whom fell in battle In 1811 Captain Gray published a small volume of poems and songs, and in 1841 he collected all his best pieces into an elegant volume, entitled 'Lays and Lyrics,' which had for frontispiece a full-length portrait of himself in uniform, and a vignette of Anstruther, his birthplace, and was dedicated to his friend and schoolfellow, William Tennant, author of 'Anster Fair,' &c As a song-writer Charles Gray will be remembered for not a few simple and genial lays, some of which were published in Wood's

Book of Scottish Song, a work to which his extensive knowledge of Scottish songs and song-writers enabled him to contribute much useful and interesting information His knowledge of the writings of Ramsay, Fergusson, and Burns, and of our earlier Scottish poets, was extensive and minute For the works of Burns, especially, he entertained an enthusiastic admiration

About 1845 he contributed to the Glasgow Citizen a series of vigorous and tasteful papers on the songs of Burns, and a critical examination of the various biographies of the poet occupied his attention during the long illness which terminated in his death. He died at Edinburgh, where he had spent the latter part of his life, on the 13th April, 1851, in the 69th year of his age

GREGORY, a surname, originally a baptismal name, not confined to Scotland, as it was that of several popes and illustrious men on the continent, but remarkable as the surname of a family, by descent MacGregors, distinguished for literary and scientific talent, of the different members of which memoirs are here given In 1624 about three hundred of the clan Gregor were transported to the north by the earl of Moray, from his estates in Monteith, to oppose the Macintoshes, most of whom settled in Aberdeenshire. In 1715, when Rob Roy was sent by the earl of Mar to that county to raise a part of their descendants, who were of his own family (the race of the Ciar Mohr), he became acquainted with a relation of his own, Dr James Gregory, professor of medicine in King's college, Aberdeen, in return for whose kindness and hospitality he offered to take with him to the hills, and "make a man of him," his son Dr James Gregory, then a boy, but afterwards, like his father, professor of medicine in King's college—a request which, of course, was delicately declined. (See Introduction to Sir Walter Scott's Novel of Rob Roy)

GREGORY, DAVID, of Kinnairdie, an elder brother of the inventor of the reflecting telescope, and who himself possessed a remarkable turn for mathematical and mechanical knowledge, was born in 1627 or 1628 He was the son of the Rev John Gregory, minister of Drumoak, in Aberdeenshire, by his wife, the daughter of Mr David Anderson of Finshaugh, commonly called, at Aberdeen, "Davie Do a' Thing," from his multifarious attainments, whose brother, Alexander Anderson, was, about the beginning of the 17th century, professor of mathematics in the university of Paris. David Gregory was educated by his father for trade, and served an apprenticeship to a mercantile house in Holland In 1655, having relinquished all commercial pursuits, he returned to Scotland, and succeeded, on the death of an elder brother, to the estate of Kinnairdie, situated about forty miles north of Aberdeen, where he lived many years, and where thirty-two children were born to him by two wives Three of his sons were professors of mathematics at the same time in three of the British universities, namely, David at Oxford, James at Edinburgh, and Charles at St Andrews, and one of his daughters was mother of the celebrated Dr Thomas Reid of Glasgow Devoting himself, in his retirement, to the cultivation of science and the study of medicine, which he practised gratuitously among his neighbours, and being, moreover, the only one in that part of the country who possessed a barometer, by which he obtained a knowledge of the weather, he incurred the suspicion of the ignorant and superstitious as a dealer in the 'black art,' and narrowly escaped being formally tried by the presbytery of the bounds for witchcraft or conjuration A deputation of that reverend body waited upon him to inquire into the ground of certain reports that were in circulation concerning him, but he was able to give them the most ample and satisfactory explanation, whereby a prosecution was averted

About the beginning of the eighteenth century he removed to Aberdeen with his family, and having invented an engine to make the shot of great guns more destructive to the enemy, he sent a model of it to his son, the Savilian professor at Oxford, that he might obtain his and Sir Isaac Newton's opinion of it The latter at once condemned this improvement in artillery as calculated to increase the horrors of war, and recommended that it should be destroyed As the machine was never afterwards found, it is supposed that the professor followed Newton's advice On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715 Mr. Gregory went a second time to Holland, but returned when it was over to Aberdeen, where he died about 1720, aged ninety-three He left behind him a history of his own time and country, which was never published

GREGORY, DAVID, son of the preceding, and nephew of the celebrated inventor of the reflecting telescope, and himself an eminent mathematician, was born at Aberdeen, June 24, 1661 He received the rudiments of his education at his native place, but afterwards removed to the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M A Having early devoted himself to the study of mathematics, he was in 1684 elected to the mathematical chair at Edinburgh On the publication of Sir Isaac Newton's 'Principia' in 1687, Mr. Gregory adopted the Newtonian philosophy, and was the first in any of the universities to introduce it into his lectures.

In 1691, being informed of Dr Edmond Bernard's intention to resign the Savilian professorship at Oxford, Mr Gregory left Edinburgh, and, repairing to London, was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society, to whose Transactions he afterwards contributed some valuable papers, the first, and one of the best, of which was his solution of the famous Florentine problem, sent as a challenge to the British mathematicians He next proceeded to Oxford, where, February 8, 1692, he was incorporated M A of Baliol college, and on the 18th of the same month he received the degree of M D He was elected professor of astronomy there in the room of Dr Bernard, having been preferred to the celebrated Dr Halley, who soon after became his colleague, in the Savilian chair of geometry

In 1695 he published at Oxford a valuable treatise on Optics, chiefly as regards the construction of telescopes In 1697 his demonstration of the properties of the Catenarian Curve appeared in the Philosophical Transactions, and in 1702 was published his most celebrated work, 'Astronomiæ Physicæ et Geometricæ Elementa,' folio, which was afterwards translated into English, with additions In 1703, in pursuance of a design projected by Sir Henry Savile, namely, to print a uniform series of the ancient mathematicians, he published an edition of the books of Euclid, in Greek and Latin, folio, and afterwards, in conjunction with Dr Halley, he commenced the Conics of Appollonius, but was prevented from completing the work by an illness, which terminated in his death, October 10, 1710 He had married, in 1695, Elizabeth, daughter of Mr Oliphant of Langtown, by whom he had four sons

GREGORY, James, a distinguished mathematician, and, excepting Newton, the greatest philosopher of his age, was born at Drumoak, in Aberdeenshire, in 1638 He was a younger brother of Mr David Gregory of Kinnairdie, a notice of whom has been given on p 376 He was educated in Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he became well versed in classical learning The works of Galileo, Des Cartes, and Kepler, were, however, his principal study, and he began early to make improvements on their discoveries in optics, the most important of which was his invention of the reflecting telescope, which still bears his name In 1663 he published at London a description of this instrument, in a quarto work, entitled 'Optica promota, seu abdita radiorum reflexorum et refractorum mysteria Geometricæ enucleata' In 1664 he visited London for the purpose of perfecting the mechanical construction of the instrument, but not being able to obtain a speculum ground and polished, of a proper figure, he abandoned the design for a time, and set out on a tour for Italy He staid some time at Padua, the university of which was at that time famed for mathematical science, and while there he published, in 1667, a treatise on the Quadrature of the Circle and Hyperbola, which was reprinted at Venice in 1668, with an appendix on the transmutation of curves

On his return to England, Mr. Gregory was elected a member of the Royal Society, whose Transactions he enriched with some valuable papers His treatise on the Quadrature of the Circle involved him in a discussion with Mr Huygens, who attacked his method in a scientific journal of that period, and Gregory replied in the Philosophical Transactions. Both controversialists, but particularly Gregory, conducted the dispute with much unnecessary warmth and asperity In 1668 he was elected professor of mathematics in the university of St. Andrews, and in 1669 he married Mary, the daughter of George Jamesone, the celebrated painter, styled by Walpole the Scottish Vandyke By this lady he had a son and two daughters

In 1672 Mr Gregory published a small satirical tract, under an assumed name, the object of which was to expose the ignorance displayed in his hydrostatical writings by Mr George Sinclair, formerly professor of natural philosophy in Glasgow Some objections made by Sir Isaac Newton to the construction of the telescope invented by Gregory, gave rise, in 1672, to a controversy between these two illustrious men, which was conducted for two years with praiseworthy courtesy and good faith on both sides In 1674 Mr Gregory was invited to fill the mathematical chair at Edinburgh, and accordingly removed thither with his family In October 1675, after being engaged one evening in pointing out to some of his pupils the satellites of Jupiter, he was suddenly struck with total blindness, and died three days thereafter, in the 37th year of his age

GREGORY, JOHN, M.D, an eminent medical and moral writer, and one of the most distinguished members of his illustrious family, which has furnished such a number of gifted professors to the British universities, was born at Aberdeen, June 3, 1724 He was the youngest of three children of James Gregory, professor of medicine in King's college, Old Aberdeen, and the grandson of the celebrated inventor of the reflecting telescope He received his academical education at King's college, and in 1742 he removed with his mother to Edinburgh, where he studied medicine for three years under Professors Monro, Sinclair, and Rutherford In 1745 he went to the university of Leyden, and during his residence there he received from King's college, Old Aberdeen, the degree of M D In 1747 he returned home, and was elected professor of philosophy in that university, where he lectured on mathematics, and moral and natural philosophy, and in 1749 resigned his chair from a desire to devote himself to the practice of medicine In 1752 he married the daughter of Lord Forbes In 1754 he repaired to London to practise, where he became acquainted with Lord Lyttleton, Lady Mary Wortley Montague, and other eminent persons, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society In 1755, on the death of his brother, Dr James Gregory, he was elected his successor in the chair of medicine at Old Aberdeen, when he returned to his native city, and entered on the duties of his professorship in 1756 His first publication, entitled 'A Comparative View of the State and Faculties of Man with those of the Animal World,' appeared in 1764, under the patronage of his friend, Lord Lyttleton This work he had at first composed as essays for 'The Wise Club,' a society projected by Drs Reid and Gregory, and consisting of the professors of both Marischal and King's college, and other literary and scientific gentlemen of Aberdeen, who met weekly in a tavern in that city, for the purpose of hearing essays on literary and philosophical subjects read by its members.

About the beginning of 1765 Dr Gregory removed to Edinburgh, with a view to the increase of his practice, and two years afterwards he was appointed professor of the practice of physic in the university there, in the room of Dr Rutherford,

Dr John Gregory

who resigned in his favour In 1766, upon the death of Dr Whytt, he was nominated first physician to his majesty for Scotland In consequence of an arrangement with his colleague, Dr Cullen, they lectured for many years alternately on the theory and practice of medicine, to the great benefit of the young men attending their classes. One of Dr Gregory's students having taken notes of his preliminary lectures on the practice of physic, an extended copy of which he offered to a bookseller for publication, he was induced to bring out a correct edition of these lectures himself, which he did in 1770, under the title of 'Observations on the Duties and Office of a Physician, and on the Method of prosecuting Inquiries in Philosophy,' the profits of which he generously gave to a poor and deserving student The same year he published his 'Elements of the Practice of Physic,' intended as a syllabus to his lectures, but from want of leisure the work was never completed. Dr Gregory, who had from the age of eighteen been subject to repeated attacks of hereditary gout, died suddenly in his bed on the night of February 9, 1773 He left in manuscript an invaluable little treatise, entitled 'A Father's Legacy to his Daughters,' written after the death of his wife, who died in 1761, and designed for the private instruction of his own family It was published soon after his death by his eldest son, James, the subject of the following notice, who succeeded Dr Cullen as professor of the practice of physic in the university of Edinburgh Besides Dr James Gregory, he had another son and two daughters, namely, the Rev William Gregory, rector of St Mary's, Bentham, Dorothea, the wife of the Rev W Allison of Baliol college, Oxford, and Margaret, wife of John Forbes, Esq of Blackford, Aberdeenshire

GREGORY, JAMES, M D, an eminent physician and medical professor, eldest son of the preceding, by his wife, the Hon Elizabeth Forbes, daughter of the thirteenth Lord Forbes, was born at Aberdeen in 1753 He received his education partly at the grammar school instituted by Dr Patrick Dunn in his native city, and after his father's removal to Edinburgh, at the university there In 1774 he took his degree as M D, his thesis being 'De Morbis Cæli Mutatione Medendis' Repairing to Leyden, he attended the lectures of the celebrated Gobius, the favourite student and immediate successor of the great Boerhaave In 1776, when only twenty-three years of age, he was appointed professor of the theory of physic in the university of Edinburgh, and as a text-book for his lectures, he published in 1780-2 his 'Conspectus Medicinæ Theoreticæ,' in 2 vols, which soon became a standard work In 1790, on the death of Dr Cullen, Dr Gregory was appointed to the chair of the practice of physic in the same university, the duties of which he discharged for thirty-one years with a lustre equal, if not superior to that conferred on the university by his immediate predecessor He was distinguished for his classical attainments, and early directed his attention to the study of metaphysics In his 'Philosophical and Literary Essays,' published in 1792, in two volumes, 8vo, he opposed the doctrine of fatalism maintained in Dr Priestley's work entitled 'Philosophical Necessity' It is said that previous to publication he forwarded the manuscripts of his Essays to Dr Priestley for perusal, but that the latter declined to read them, on the ground that his mind was made up, and that he had ceased to think of the subject

In controversies of a professional and temporary nature Dr Gregory had an active share In 1793 an anonymous work, reflecting on some of the professors of the university, having appeared, under the title of 'A Guide for Gentlemen studying Medicine at the University of Edinburgh,' he issued a pamphlet, in which he endeavoured to prove, by internal evidence, that it was the production of Dr Hamilton, professor of midwifery, and his son who was afterwards his assistant A paper warfare was the consequence, Dr Hamilton, junior, having replied in a well-written pamphlet, in which he showed the groundlessness of the charge, as well as the unprovoked asperity of his accuser To discover the author of the 'Guide,' law proceedings were instituted against the publisher, while Dr Hamilton, on his part, raised an action against Dr Gregory, for traducing his character In 1800 he published a 'Memorial addressed to the Managers of the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, complaining of the younger members of the College of Surgeons being allowed to perform operations there' This was replied to by Mr John Bell, surgeon, and the question engrossed for some time the whole attention of the medical profession of Edinburgh In 1806 he entered into a warm discussion with the College of Physicians, in consequence of some proceedings on the part of that body which he considered derogatory to the profession

As a physician Dr Gregory enjoyed an extensive and lucrative practice His great eminence, and his high literary and scientific reputation, caused him to be elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and a member of the French Institute Whilst returning from visiting a patient, his carriage was accidentally overturned, his arm broken, and his constitution severely injured After being repeatedly attacked with inflammation of the lungs, he died at Edinburgh April 2, 1821, in his 68th year. The following is his portrait, in the uniform of the Edinburgh volunteers, taken by Kay in 1795

Dr Gregory was twice married, and by his second wife, a daughter of Donald Macleod, Esq of Geanies, he had a large family His eldest son, John, having been educated for the bar, was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates in 1820 Another son, Dr William Gregory, was elected in 1839, professor of medicine and chemistry in King's college, Old Aberdeen, where he remained till 1844, when he was appointed by the town council of Edinburgh to the chair of chemistry and chemical pharmacy in the university of that city A younger son, Donald Gregory, was for several years joint secretary to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland He was also secretary to the Iona Club, founded in 1833, the objects of which were to investigate and illustrate the history, antiquities, and early literature of the Highlands of Scotland, honorary member of the Ossianic Society of Glasgow, and of the Society of Antiquaries, Newcastle on Tyne, and member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of the North at Copenhagen In 1836 he published a valuable work in one volume, entitled 'History of the Western Highlands and Isles of Scotland from 1493 to 1625; with a brief Introductory Sketch from 80 to 1493,' dedicated to Lord Macdonald of the Isles. This work is important as forming one of the first attempts to investigate the history of the West Highlands and Isles, by the most careful examination of original documents, and the various public records, and it must prove essentially useful to every future writer on the history of the Highlands. He intended to have followed it up with another volume relating to the Central Highlands, he had also collected materials for a dissertation 'On the Manners, Customs, and Laws of the Highlanders,' but his death the same year put a stop to his designs Mr Gregory died in October 1836, in the prime of life His valuable and extensive collection of documents came into the possession of the Iona Club, and several valuable communications by him were inserted in the 'Collectanea de Rebus Albanicis,' edited by that Club, and issued to the members in 1839

Dr George Gregory, a nephew of the celebrated Dr James Gregory, died at London in January 1853 He had been a distinguished member of the medical profession for upwards of forty years, and as long as thirty-five years physician to the Small-pox and Vaccination Hospital in London He was elected a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians in 1839 He was also a physician to the Adult Orphan Asylum He was the author of several valuable medical treatises on small-pox and vaccination, lectures on eruptive fevers, and the elements of medicine, &c

GREIG, a surname which may either be the diminutive of Gregor or Gregory, and in this respect assumed by one of the MacGregor clan when that name was proscribed, or, as is more probable, a corruption of Gregan, a christian name as used by Sir Gregan Crawford in the reign of David the First, see vol. i page 700. Grego, or Gregano, 'of the flock,' may be the Latin form of the name given by the clergy to persons intrusted with the charge of their sheep, and is equivalent to shepherd

GREIG, SIR SAMUEL. (Carlowitch,) a distinguished admiral in the Russian service, the son of Captain Charles Greig, master mariner of Inverkeithing, Fifeshire, was born in that small seaport, November 30, 1735, and educated at the parish school He entered the royal navy while yet young, and soon rose to the rank of lieutenant, distinguished himself at the defeat of the French admiral, Conflans, in 1759, by Admiral Hawke, the taking of Havannah, and several other engagements After the peace of 1763, he was selected as one of five British naval officers who, at the request of the court of St Petersburg, were sent out to improve the Russian fleet, when his skill in naval affairs, and diligence in the discharge of his duties, soon attracted the notice of the Russian Government, and he was speedily promoted to the rank of captain in the Russian navy In the war which in 1769 broke out between Russia and Turkey, Captain Greig was appointed commodore of the fleet sent to the Mediterranean, under the command of Count Orloff There they met the Turkish fleet, and though the latter were much superior in force to their opponents, the Russians did not hesitate in giving them battle After a severe engagement, the Turks were compelled to take refuge during the night close to the island of Scio, where they were protected by the batteries on land The Russian admiral having resolved to destroy the Turkish fleet by means of his fireships, Captain Greig was appointed to the command of this dangerous enterprise Accordingly, at one o'clock in the morning he bore down upon the Turks, and succeeded in totally destroying their fleet, setting the match to the fireships with his own hands In this hazardous exploit he was assisted by Lieutenant Drysdale, another British officer, who on this occasion acted under him As soon as the match was fired, Greig and Drysdale leaped overboard, and, though exposed to a tremendous fire from the Turks, succeeded in reaching unhurt their own boats Following up this success, the Russian fleet immediately attacked the town and batteries on shore, which, before nine o'clock in the morning, they utterly demolished For this important service Commodore Greig was, by Count Orloff, at once nominated rear-admiral, and the appointment was confirmed by an express from the empress.

On peace being concluded, Admiral Greig devoted himself to the improvement of the Russian fleet, in all its departments, and to the remodelling of its code of discipline, and justly earned for himself the title of "Father of the Russian navy" He was appointed admiral of all the Russias, and governor of Cronstadt The empress also conferred upon him the different orders of the empire, namely, St Andrew, St Alexander Newskie, St George, St. Vladimir, and St. Anne Adopting the custom of the Russian nobility, who add the Christian name of their father to their own, with the termination of owitch (the son of), he signed and designated himself "Samuel Carlowitch Greig" In 1774 he served against the Turks in the Mediterranean From the emperor of Germany he received, with a present of 10,000 roubles, an estate in Livonia, which after his death remained in possession of his descendants He next served with distinction against the Swedes, whose fleet he blocked up in port, but while employed in this duty in the Baltic, he was attacked by a violent fever, and having been carried to Revel, died October 26, 1788, on board his own ship, the Rotislaw, in his 53d year His funeral, by order of the empress, was conducted with great pomp and magnificence

His son, John, died in China in 1793 Another son, Sir Alexis Greig, was a pupil at the High School of Edinburgh in 1783 He entered the Russian navy, and in 1801 was exiled to Siberia for remonstrating with the Czar Paul for his severity to some British sailors He served as a volunteer on board the Culloden, under Admiral Trowbridge, and commanded the Russian fleets at the sieges of Varna and Anapa in 1828 He became admiral in the Russian navy, and knight of all the imperial orders. In 1840, he visited Inverkeithing, his father's birthplace His son, Woronzow Greig, was aide-de-camp to Prince Menschikoff during the Crimean war, and bore a flag of truce from Sebastopol to Lord Raglan. He died on the field of Inkermann

GRIERSON, a surname synonymous with MacGregor, (see MACGREGOR, surname of,) and sometimes abbreviated into Grier, or Greer

The family of Grierson of Lag in Dumfries-shire is descended from Gilbert, 2d son of Malcolm, dominus de MacGregor, who died in 1374. Before 1400, Gilbert MacGregor received charter from "George de Dunbar, earl of March," of "the Netherholm of Dalgarnock," to him and his "heirs male, to be called by the surname of Grierson" The said earl also granted charter, dated at Dunbar, 1400, "of the lands of Airdes, &c., lying in the barony of Tyberis, and shire of Dumfries, to the said Gilbert, for his many good deeds done to the said earl." The lands of Lag, from which the family take their title, were conveyed to the said Gilbert by the earl of Orkney, by charter, dated Dec. 6, 1408, which describes them as "the lands of Lag, lying in the Brokenbarony, among the monk lands of the monastery of Melrose, giving yearly a pair of gilt spurs at the castle of Dumfries, as blench farm" The family thus appear to have settled in Dumfries-shire, from the Highlands, in the beginning of the 15th century The said Gilbert Grierson is designed armour-bearer to Archibald earl of Douglas, lord of Galloway and Annandale, in a charter of the lands of Drumjoan, in 1410 He had 2 sons, Gilbert, who m. Janet de Glendoning of Parton, and Vedast. The latter succeeded in 1457, and had two sons, Gilbert, who predeceased his father, and Roger who succeeded, and married Isobel, daughter of David de Kirkpatrick, with whom he got the lands of "Rocail," now Rockhall In Playfair's British Family Antiquity, vol. 8, app. p. ccxlvii., it is stated that it was his grandfather, Gilbert Grierson, who married Isobel de Kirkpatrick, lady of Roukel, she dying in 1472, and the grandson's wife's name is given as Isobel only, the surname being a blank. Roger was wounded at the battle of Sauchieburn in June 1488, and died soon after He had 2 sons, Cuthbert, who succeeded his father, and died in 1513, and Roger, his successor, who m. Agnes Douglas, dr of James, 5th baron of Drumlanrig, and was killed at Flodden, 9th September 1513 He had three sons, 1 John, 2 Gilbert, married Jane Maxwell of the Kirkconnell family, issue, a son, who died canon of St. Peter's Church, Anderleb, near Brussels, in 1544, 3. Cuthbert, killed in battle in 1514, and three daughters.

John, the eldest son, as heir and successor to his uncle Cuthbert, obtained a charter in 1517 under the great seal, "de totis et integris terris de messuagis lands et Grenan jacentibus infra commitatum de Dumfries quæ fuerunt dicti quondam Cuthberti et in meritis quondam patris Domini regis recognitæ fuerint ob alienationem earundem" John died in 1566. He was twice married, 1st to Nicholas Herys, and 2dly to Egidia or Giles Kennedy, dr of Sir John Kennedy of Culzean, and had 3 sons, William, who predeceased him, Roger, of whom afterwards, and John, the latter two sons of the 2d wife

There was a John Grierson (supposed to belong to this family) who was principal of King's college and university, Old Aberdeen, in 1500 He was a Dominican friar, greatly esteemed for his learning, and for thirty years was provincial of his order According to Dempster, he wrote two books concerning the miserable state, poverty, and decay of his order in Scotland. One of them was a collection of Letters, published in the History of that Order, written by the R. F Plandius of Bononia. He was the last provincial Dominican friar in Scotland, and died at Aberdeen in 1564.

A branch of this family possessed the estate of Straharlie, the first of which was named Robert. His eldest son, James, was a knight banneret, and known by the name of "Sir James Grier, knight." For his faithful adherence to Charles I., he was driven from the tower of Lag by Cromwell With his family he went to Cumberland, where his eldest son, Henry, married Mary, daughter of General Turner of Turnerstead, in that county General Turner's son, Thomas, married Ann, daughter of Sir James Grier and sister of Henry They went to Ireland, and founded the family of Turner of Turner Hill, county Armagh. Henry Grier also emigrated to Ireland, settled at Redford, near Grange, county Tyrone, and was ancestor of the family of Greer of Grange MacGregor in that county The family of Lag seem to have shortened their name to Grier, which they bore for some generations, in consequence, it is supposed, of the proscription of the name and clan of MacGregor

Roger Grierson of Lag, 2d but eldest surviving son of John, "Baron of Lag," above mentioned, was one of the subscribers of the bond of association entered into, in 1567, by many of the nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, for the support of the authority of the infant king, James VI He died in 1593

His only son, Sir William Grierson of Lag, joined the Maxwells of Nithsdale against the Johnstones of Annandale, and fought at the sanguinary battle of Dryfe Sands, when the former were defeated, with a loss of 700 men, on 7th Dec. 1593 He was knighted by King James VI about 1608, and in 1623 appointed the keeper of certain rolls. He died about 1629 He m. Nicolas Maxwell, only dr of William, Lord Herries, whom he "seised in the lands of Rocail, for the trouble and care tane by her, upon his direction, in eddyfing and bigging the said place of Rocail, lately constructed by him, and others, his honourable affairs, according to the duty of ane loving wife," 1613 He had one son, Sir Robert, and two daughters, 1 Agnes, m. John, eldest son and heir of Stephen Laurie of Maxwellton, 2 Isobel, m. Edward Maxwell of Lagun

The only son, Sir Robert, knighted in his father's lifetime was a member of the Scots parliament. He m in 1622, Margaret, 3d daughter of Sir James Murray of Cockpool, now Comlongan, an ancestor of the Viscounts Stormont, issue, 4 sons, and one daughter The dr, Nicolas, m 2d earl of Galloway, and had to him 3 sons and a dr The earl died in 1671, and the countess m. 2dly Scott of Scotstarvet, Fifeshire, issue, 1 d., Marjory, m. David, 5th Viscount Stormont, issue, 14 children Their 4th son, William Murray, became lord chief justice of England and 1st earl of Mansfield. She died at Comlongan July 1732 Sir Robert died in or before 1654

The eldest son, Sir John, succeeded, retoured February 21, 1654, m. 1st, Lady Jean Fleming, d. of 2d earl of Wigton, 2dly, Isobel Boyd, dr of 6th Lord Boyd and widow of John Sinclair of Stevenston, issue, one son, Robert, and a daughter, Margaret, m. Archibald Stewart of Shanballie. Oliver Cromwell gave commission to serve the son, Robert, heir to his father, April 5, 1658.

The second son, James, had one son, Sir Robert, (afterwards mentioned,) who succeeded his cousin, Robert, son of Sir John, and was the first baronet, the terrible laird of Lag of Scottish history

The 3d son was named Roger The 4th, Lancelot of Dalscairth, was captain of the parish of Troqueer under the commission of Estates. Sir John's son, Robert, dying without issue, the succession fell to Robert, son of James, 2d brother of Sir John

Sir Robert succeeded in 1669, and on 28th March 1685, he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, by patent to him and his heirs. He also obtained a pension from King James VII of £200 sterling. This was that laird of Lag who rendered his name detested throughout Scotland for the active part which he took in the persecution of the Covenanters. One of his most cold-blooded atrocities may be mentioned In the year that he received his baronetcy he surprised John Bell of Whiteside, and some others, in the muir of Kirkconnell, parish of Tongland, and barbarously ordered them to be instantly put to death, not allowing them time for prayer, nor would he permit their bodies to be buried. Mr Bell was the only son of the heiress of Whiteside, who, after her husband's death, had married the viscount Kenmure. This nobleman meeting Lag soon after with Graham of Claverhouse, in Kirkcudbright, accused him of cruelty Lag retorted in highly offensive language, which so provoked the viscount that he drew his sword, and would have run him through the body, had not Claverhouse interfered and saved his life The persecutor married Lady Henrietta Douglas, sister to 1st duke of Queensberry, and had four sons and one daughter, Lady Laurie of Maxwelltoun In 1704, he and his eldest son, William, were commissioners of supply for Dumfries-shire He died at Dumfries, 15th April 1736, and was buried in the old churchyard of Dunscore, the ancient burying-place of the family He was the last who inhabited the tower of Lag, now in ruins, said to have been built in the reign of James III

His eldest son, Sir William Grierson, 2d baronet, died in 1740, without issue, when his brother, Sir Gilbert, became 3d baronet, m. Elizabeth, d. of Colonel Maitland of Soutra, East Lothian, governor of the Bass, and died 7th February 1776 His son, Sir Robert, 4th baronet, distinguished himself as a country gentleman, in the improvement of his estate, planting, &c., m. Lady Margaret Dalzell, d of the earl of Carnwath, and had a large family The only surviving son, Colonel Grierson of Bardennoch, was the intimate friend of Sir Walter Scott before the latter was known to fame. He married Miss Beattie of Crieve and Mucklutah, issue, one son and one daughter The son died at Umballah, India, from wounds and fatigue suffered at the siege of Delhi, where he particularly distinguished himself, the daughter was married to the third son of Mr Hope Johnstone, M P for Dumfries-shire. Sir Robert died in 1839, aged 102 years. His eldest son, Sir Alexander Gilbert Grierson, 5th baronet, died in 1840 His son, Sir Richard, became 6th baronet, and on his death in 1846, the title devolved on his brother, Sir Alexander William, 7th baronet, at one time an officer in the 78th Ross-shire Highlanders, married, no issue

The Griersons of Lag possessed vast estates in Dumfries-shire, Galloway, and Ayrshire Besides Lag and Rockhall, they had the baronies of Ross, Carlyle, and Gretna, the whole of the lands of Collyn'-Dalscairth, and the estate of "Between the Waters,"—being the lands from the river Nith on the west in the parish of Troqueer, to the river Urr, in the parish of Urr "Capenoch," and other lands in the parish of Closeburn, and Longacheane, Doremole, Culnane, with others, in Ayrshire A great portion of these were lost by cautionry, in which Sir Robert 1st baronet, and his predecessor, were bound for James, earl of Queensberry The family residence, which stood on the bank of the Nith in the parish of Troqueer, was burnt down, and the whole family records, silver plate, &c., destroyed The ruins of the tower or castle of Lag, in the parish of Dunscore, and a pendicle of land attached, still belong to the present baronet, with the beautiful and compact little estate of Rockhall, which has been in the family since 1468.

The chief families of the name, besides of Lag, were the Griersons of Chapell, and of Dalgoner, also in the parish of Dunscore, Dumfries-shire. The family of Dalgoner is the only one that retains their ancestral estate. The proper title of Sir Alexander Grierson is Rockhall; the lands which anciently formed the barony of Lag having passed out of the family, now belong to the Whighams of Hallidayhill.

GUILD, a surname, from the Anglo-Saxon Gild-an, to yield or pay (Dutch Gilde,) German Gilde, applied to a society or company associated as a commercial or trade corporation.

WILLIAM GUILD, an eminent divine of the 17th century, the son of a wealthy armourer in Aberdeen, was born in that city in 1586. He received his education at Marischal college, and was appointed, in 1608, minister of the parish of King Edward, presbytery of Turriff In 1617, he sat in the Assembly held in Aberdeen at which it was resolved that a liturgy should be prepared for Scotland, a project, however, which was afterwards abandoned. In 1619 he dedicated his work, 'The Harmony of all the Prophets,' to the learned Dr Young, dean of Winchester, a countryman of his own, through whose influence he was appointed one of the royal chaplains. About the same time the degree of D D was conferred upon him

In 1631 Dr Guild was appointed by the magistrates of Aberdeen one of the ministers of that city, and, having become patron of the incorporated trades, he purchased the ancient convent of the Trinity Friars there, and liberally endowed it as an hospital for decayed workmen, the deed of the foundation of which was ratified by royal charter in 1633 In July 1638, when commissioners arrived in Aberdeen to enforce the Covenant, Dr Guild subscribed it, under certain limitations, implying a loyal adherence to the king, but no condemnation of episcopal government. In the same year he was chosen one of the commissioners from the presbytery of Aberdeen, to the famous General Assembly which met at Glasgow and formally abolished Episcopacy in Scotland In the following March, when an army approached the city, to compel an unconditional subscription of the Covenant, and the clergy and professors, rather than consent to it, abandoned their charges, and clandestinely left the city, Dr Guild took refuge in Holland, but soon returned. He now endeavoured to recommend moderation, by publishing 'A Friendly and Faithful advice to the Nobility, Gentry, and Others,' which, however, attracted no particular attention. In August 1640, on the deprivation of Dr William Leslie, principal of King's college, Old Aberdeen, for refusing to subscribe the Covenant, Dr Guild was chosen in his room, when he made no scruple to sign that document. On June 27, 1641, he preached his last sermon as one of the ministers of Aberdeen, in which situation he was succeeded by the famous Andrew Cant.

In 1651, he was deposed from the office of principal of King's College, by a military commission under General Monk. After this he lived in retirement in Aberdeen, and chiefly employed his time in writing theological treatises. In his latter years he also employed himself in improving the Trades Hospital, and in other works of benevolence. He died in August 1657, in the 71st year of his age. His portrait graces the walls of Trinity Hall His widow transmitted a manuscript work, which he left, to Dr John Owen, who published it at Oxford, in 1659, under the title of 'The Throne of David, or an Exposition of the Second Book of Samuel' At her death, Mrs. Guild left an endowment for the maintenance of six students of philosophy, four scholars at the public school, two students of divinity, six poor widows, and as many poor men's children His works are

GUNN, the name of a Celtic clan from the Gaelic word Guineach, signifying sharp, fierce, or keen The clan, the badge of which was the juniper bush, a martial and hardy, though not a numerous race, originally belonged to Caithness, but in the sixteenth century they settled in Sutherland. They are said to have been descended from Gun, or Gunn, or Guin, second son of Olaus, or Olav, the Black, one of the Norwegian kings of Man and the Isles, who died 18th June 1237 One tradition gives them a settlement in Caithness more than a century earlier, deducing their descent from Gun, the second of three sons of Olaf, described as a man of great bravery, who, in 1100, dwelt in the Orcadian isle of Graemsay The above-mentioned Gun or Guin is said to have received from his grandfather on the mother's side, Farquhar, earl of Ross, the possessions in Caithness which long formed the patrimony of his descendants, the earliest stronghold of the chief in that county being Halbury castle, or Easter Clythe, situated on a precipitous rock, overhanging the sea. From a subsequent chief who held the office of coroner, it was called Crowner Gun's castle. It may be mentioned here that the name Gun is the same as the Welsh Gwynn, and the Manx Gawne. It was originally Gun, but is now spelled with two nn.

The clan Gunn continued to extend their possessions in Caithness till about the middle of the fifteenth century, when in consequence of their deadly feuds with the Keiths, (see KEITH, surname of,) and other neighbouring clans, they found it necessary to remove into Sutherland, where they settled on the lands of Kildonan, under the protection of the earls of Sutherland, from whom they had obtained them Mixed up as they were with the clan feuds of Caithness and Sutherland, and at war with the Mackays as well as the Keiths, the history of the clan up to this time is full of incidents which have more the character of romance than reality [See Browne's Highlands, vol. i.] Sir Robert Gordon, in his 'Genealogical History of the Earldom of Sutherland,' written up to 1630, and continued by another party to 1651, has several incidental notices regarding the clan Gunn and the battles in which they were engaged. In one place (p. 174), alluding to "the inveterat deidlie feud betuein the clan Gun and the Slaught-ean-Aberigh,"—a branch of the Mackays,—he says "The long, the many, the horrible encounters which happened betwein these two trybes, with the bloodshed and infinit spoils committed in every part of the diocy of Catteynes by them and their associats, are of so disordered and troublesome memorie," that he declines to give details.

Previous to their removal into Sutherland, George Gun, commonly called the Chruner, or Coroner, and by the Highlanders, Fear N'm Braisdeach-more, from the great brooch which he wore as the badge of his office of coroner, was killed by the Keiths of Caithness (see KEITH, surname of), under the following circumstance A long feud had existed between the Keiths and the clan Gun, to reconcile which, a meeting was appointed at the chapel of St. Tayr in Caithness, of twelve horsemen on each side. The "Crowner," with some of his sons and principal kinsmen, to the number of twelve, arrived at the appointed time, and entering the chapel, prostrated themselves in prayer before the altar On his side George Keith of Aikregell also came with his party, but had perfidiously brought with him two men on each horse, making his number twenty-four On dismounting, the whole of the Keiths rushed into the chapel, and attacked the kneeling Guns unawares. The latter defended themselves with great intrepidity, but the chief and seven of his party, some accounts say the whole of them, were slain According to Sir Robert Gordon, (History of the Earldom of Sutherland, page 92,) the Chruner was "a great commander in Catteynes in his tyme, and wes one of the greatest men in that countrey, because, when he flourished, there wes no earle of Catteynes, that earldom being yit in the king's hands, and wes thereafter given to William Sinkler, the second son of William earl of Orkney, by his second wife." He had therefore been appointed to the high office of coroner, that is, justiciary, or representative of the king, in that district.

Another version of the fray between the Guns and the Keiths states that five of the former, sons of the chief, retired from the fight to the banks of a stream, where they washed and dressed their wounds, and where Eanruig, or Henry, the youngest, prevailed on two of his brothers, the slightest wounded amongst them, to follow the victors, to recover if possible his father's sword, mail, and brooch of office. The Keiths had gone to the castle of Dalraid, and approaching the narrow window, Henry observed them carousing with a party of Sutherlands, to whom they were relating the result of the battle. Singing out the chief, he bent his bow, and shot him through the heart, exclaiming in Gaelic, "The compliments of the Guns to Keith"

The Crowner's eldest son, James, succeeded as chief, and he it was who, with his family and the greater portion of his clan, removed into Sutherland. The principal dwelling-house of the chiefs was, thereafter, Killernan, in the parish of Kildonan, until the house was accidentally destroyed by fire about 1690 From this chief, the patronymic of Mac-Sheumais, or MacKeamish, (that is, the son of James,) which then became the Gaelic sept-name of the chiefs, is derived. From one of the sons of the Crowner, named William, are descended the Wilsons of Caithness, (as from a subsequent chief of the same name, the Williamsons,) and from another, Henry, the Hendersons. Another son, Robert, who was killed with his father, was the progenitor of the Gun Robsons, and another son, John, also slain by the Keiths, of the Gun MacEans, or Maclans, that is Johnsons, of Caithness. The Gallies are also of this clan, a party of whom settling in Rossshire being designated as coming from Gall-'uobh, the stranger's side. A lady of the clan Gun, supposed to have been the daughter of the Crowner, married Hugh Macdonald of Sleat, third son of Alexander earl of Ross. By this lady "he had a son, Donald, (called Gallach, from being fostered by his mother's relations in Caithness,) who afterwards became the heir of the family, and from whom the present Lord Macdonald is descended" (Gregory's Western Highlands and Isles, page 60)

James Gun was succeeded as chief by his son William, called Uilleam-Mac-Sheumais-Mhic-Chruner, and also Cattigh, who distinguished himself at the battle of Torran-Dubh against the Mackays, and shortly after he killed George Keith of Aikregell, very likely the son of the former George Keith, with his son and twelve of their followers, at Drummoy, in Sutherland, as they were travelling from Inverugie to Caithness, in revenge of the slaughter of his grandfather, the Crowner The fame of the first MacKeamish, as a brave and successful leader of his clan, has, we are told, been celebrated in some Gaelic verses and songs which still exist. In the year 1565, Alastair or Alexander Gun, who is said to have been a very able and strong man endowed with many good qualities, (Sir Robert Gordon's Hist. p. 144,) the son of John Robson, chief of the clan Gun, was put to death through the means of the earl of Moray, afterwards regent, from the following cause. On one occasion when the earls of Sutherland and Huntly happened to meet the earl of Moray in the High Street of Aberdeen, Alexander Gun, then in the service of the earl of Sutherland, and walking in front of his master, declined to give Moray the middle of the street, and forced him and his company to give way To punish him for his contempt, the earl of Moray, on the earl of Sutherland's absence in Flanders, by means of Monroe of Miltoun, entrapped Gun, and made him a prisoner at a place near Nairn, whence he was taken to Inverness, and after a mock trial, executed His father at this time acted as the chief factor of the earl of Sutherland, in collecting the rents and duties of the bishop's lands within Caithness which belonged to him

As the clan Gun were accounted the principal authors of the troubles and commotions which disturbed that district of the country where they resided, at a meeting held at Elgin between the rival earls of Sutherland and Caithness, in 1585, their extermination, and particularly of that portion of them who dwelt in Caithness and Strathnaver, was resolved upon For this purpose, two companies were to be sent against them, which were to surround them in such a way as to prevent escape. Reinforced by a party of Strathnaver men, under the command of William Mackay, the Guns took up a strong position on a hill, and although much inferior in force resolutely attacked the Sinclairs, the first that came against them. After pouring upon them a flight of arrows which did great execution, they rushed down the hill, and put them to flight, slaying 140 of their party, with their leader, Henry Sinclair, cousin of the earl of Caithness. Had not the darkness of the night favoured their flight they would all have been destroyed. The earl of Caithness immediately hanged John Robson, the chief of the clan Gun, whom he had kept captive for some time. A new confederacy was formed against the devoted clan, who, under George MacIan-MacRob, the brother of the deceased chief, were pursued by the Sutherland men to Lochbroom in Ross-shire, where, after a sharp skirmish, they were overthrown, and thirty-two of them killed. George, their leader, was severely wounded, and taken prisoner, after an unsuccessful attempt to escape by swimming across a loch near the field of battle. After a short imprisonment he was released, and ever after remained faithful to the earl of Sutherland.

William Gunn, the eighth MacKeamish, an officer in the army, was killed in battle in India, without leaving issue, when the chiefship devolved on Hector, great-grandson of George, second son of Alexander, the fifth MacKeamish, to whom he was served nearest male heir, on 31st May 1803, and George Gunn, Esq of Rhives, county of Sutherland, his only son, became, on his death, chief of the clan Gunn, and the tenth MacKeamish

GUTHRIE, a surname derived from lands in Forfarshire, belonging to a family of the name, the oldest in that county The precise origin of the name is not known. An absurd story is told of its having originated in a fisherman proposing to "gut three" fishes for one of the early Scots kings who had taken shelter, with two attendants, in his hut, and had ordered two haddocks to be fried for them, as they were hungry, but this is a mere fable In 1299, after Sir William Wallace had resigned the guardianship of Scotland and retired to France, the northern barons sent Squire Guthrie to him to request his return. Embarking at Aberbrothwick, he landed at Sluys, whence Wallace and his retinue were conveyed back to Scotland, landing at Montrose. In 1348, Adam de Guthrie with Walter de Maule were witnesses in a decreet of the burgesses of Dundee. According to Crawford, (Lives of Officers of State,) the Guthries held the barony of Guthrie by charter from David the Second. Master Alexander Guthrie of Guthrie is witness to a charter granted by Alexander Seaton, lord of Gordon, to William, Lord Keith, afterwards Earl Marischal, dated 1st August, 1442, and he obtained the lands of Kincaldrum, in the barony of Lower Leslie and sheriffdom of Forfar, to himself and Marjory Guthrie his spouse, by charter dated 10th April 1457, from George Lord Leslie of Leven, the superior He had three sons.

The eldest, Sir David Guthrie of Guthrie, armour-bearer to King James the Third, and sheriff of Forfar in 1457, was constituted lord-treasurer of Scotland in 1461 In that office he continued till 1467, when he was appointed comptroller of the exchequer In 1468 he obtained a warrant under the great seal, to build a castle at Guthrie, which is still the residence of the family, the domain of Guthrie having been continued to the present day in the same family unfettered by any deed of entail. The following year he was nominated lord register of Scotland, and in 1472 he was one of the Scots commissioners, who met those of England, on 25th April of that year, at Newcastle, and concluded a truce till the month of July 1473. In the latter year he was appointed lord-chief-justice of Scotland. He founded and endowed a collegiate church at Guthrie for a provost and three prebends, (afterwards augmented to eight by his son,) dedicated to the Virgin, which was confirmed by a bull from Pope Sextus the Fourth, dated at Rome, 14th June, 1479

His eldest son, Sir Alexander Guthrie, with his eldest son, three sons-in-law, David, William, and George Lyon, and a nephew, Sir Thomas Maule, fell at Flodden in Sept. 1513. Sir Alexander's second son, also named Alexander, obtained from his father the lands of Kincaldrum and Lower, and was the great-grandfather of David Guthrie, a subsequent inheritor of the estate of Guthrie. George, the third son, received the lands of Kincraich, as his portion John, of Hilton, the youngest son, was ancestor of John Guthrie, bishop of Moray, of whom afterwards. Sir Alexander was succeeded by his grandson, Andrew Guthrie, who married a daughter of Gardyne of Gardyne, and had a son, Alexander Guthrie of Guthrie, one of the barons who subscribed the articles agreed upon in the General Assembly on 25th July 1567, for the support of the Reformed religion in Scotland. He was also one of those who, the same year, signed the bond for upholding the authority of the young king, James the Sixth. This laird of Guthrie was assassinated at his house of Inverpeffer by his cousin, Patrick Gardyne of Gardyne, a feud having arisen between them. His second son, William Guthrie of Gagie, at the instigation of his mother, a daughter of Wood of Bonnytown, in revenge for the murder of his father, slew the murderer and his brother, as they were coming from Arbroath, for which slaughters he obtained a remission under the great seal, 6th July 1618. He was the father of Francis Guthrie, afterwards laird of Guthrie.

The eldest son, Alexander Guthrie of Guthrie, was one of the twenty-five gentlemen pensioners appointed by command "to attend the king's majesty at all times in his riding and passing to the fields." His eldest son, Alexander, having no issue male, was succeeded in the estate by his brother, William Guthrie of Memus, on whose death, his cousin, David Guthrie, above referred to, became laird of Guthrie. With his son, Alexander, he disponed the estate to his brother, Patrick Guthrie. The son of the latter, who succeeded in 1686, disponed the lands to his kinsman, John Guthrie, bishop of Moray This prelate was first ordained minister of Perth In 1619 he was one of the clergy nominated on the high commission which was then renewed, to force compliance with the five articles of Perth, and in the following year he was translated to Edinburgh. In 1623 he was consecrated bishop of Moray, in which see he continued till the abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland by the Glasgow Assembly of 1638. By an act of the same Assembly he was appointed to make his public repentance at Edinburgh for having, in 1633, preached in a surplice before King Charles the First, in the High church of that city, under pain of excommunication. As he did not comply with the demand, the sentence was duly carried into effect. He resided at Spynie castle (now in ruins), the palace of the bishopric, till 1640, when he was forced to surrender it to Colonel Monroe. Retiring to his own estate of Guthrie, he died there before the Restoration He had a daughter, Barbara, married, in 1647, to Francis Guthrie of Gagie, who, in consequence, got the lands of Guthrie, and in his line they have continued ever since. He was the son of William Guthrie, 2d son of Alexander Guthrie of Guthrie, as above mentioned. The 5th in direct descent from him, John Guthrie of Guthrie, married July 22, 1798, Anne, daughter of William Douglas of Brigton, and with 5 daughters had 2 sons, John and William, both at one time officers in the army He died Nov 12, 1845. His elder son, John Guthrie of Guthrie, deputy lieutenant of Forfarshire, born July 23, 1805, married, July 23, 1844, Harriet, daughter of Barnabas Maude, Esq, and granddaughter of Joseph Maude, Esq., of Kendal (See Maude of Kendal in Burke's Commoners) issue, 1st, Harriet Maude, b. Oct. 18, 1850, 2d, Edith Douglas, b. March 20, 1852, 3d, Mary Berthia, b. Sept. 10, 1853; 4th, John Douglas Maude, b. March 5, 1856

The family of Guthrie of Haukerton, in the same county is a branch of the family of Guthrie of Guthrie. Sir James Guthrie, baron of Haukerton, younger brother of Sir David Guthrie, armour-bearer to king James III, held the office of royal falconer in Angus, whence arose the name of the barony Harrye Guthrie, 9th baron of Haukerton, on the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland in 1747, relinquished that title. His eldest daughter, Euphemia, marrying Wright of Duddingston, was mother of Thomas Guthrie Wright of Duddingston His son, Matthew Guthrie, left two daughters, the elder of whom, Anastasia-Jessye, m. in 1807, Thomson Grahame Bonar, Esq, of Camden, Kent, with issue

The family of Guthrie of the Mount, Ayrshire, ended in an heiress, Christina, only surviving child of Alexander Guthrie, Esq She married Geoffrey, 2d Lord Oranmore and Browne, in the Irish peerage, Dec. 31, 1859, and his lordship, in consequence, assumed the name and arms of Guthrie only

GUTHRIE, HENRY, author of 'Memoirs of Scottish Affairs, Civil and Ecclesiastical,' was born in the beginning of the 17th century, at Coupar-Angus, of which parish his father, Mr John Guthrie, a cadet of the ancient family of that name, was minister After taking his degrees in arts at the university of St Andrews, he became a student of divinity in the New college there Afterwards appointed chaplain in the family of the earl of Mar, through the earl's recommendation, he obtained a presentation to the church of Stirling, to which he was episcopally ordained He was well affected to the government, but disapproved of the measures adopted by the king in 1637, for introducing the liturgy into Scotland In 1638, after the abolition of Episcopacy, Mr Guthrie subscribed the Covenant. Though he has received from his biographers great credit for the moderation of his views, his conduct was so far from being conciliatory, that he was looked upon with some suspicion by the more zealous of his brethren He rendered himself conspicuous by his opposition to some of their favourite measures, by his harsh proceedings against the Brownists, or Congregationalists, and also by getting an act passed, in the Assembly of 1640, against private meetings for religious exercise On Sunday, October 3, 1641, he had the honour of preaching before the king in the Abbey church of Holyrood In the Assembly of 1643, when a letter was presented from the English divines at Westminster, with the declaration of the English parliament, proposing to extirpate Episcopacy "root and branch," he made a speech, which is given in his Memoirs, urging that "this church, which holdeth presbyterian government to be jure divino," could not entertain the proposal, and recommending the Assembly "to deal with the English commissioners present, to desire the parliament and divines assembled at Westminster to explain themselves, and be as express concerning that which they resolved to introduce as they had been in that which was to be removed" His proposition, however, did not even meet with a seconder

In 1648, when the Scots parliament declared for the engagement, and ordered a levy of 30,000 foot and 6 000 horse, to obtain the liberation of the king from his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight, Mr Guthrie and some others preached in favour of the design, though it had been condemned by the General Assembly, as it contained no provision for the maintenance of the national religion No notice of their conduct was taken at the time, but after the defeat of the Scots army under the duke of Hamilton, the Assembly proceeded to depose those of the clergy who had been guilty of "malignancy," that is, of adherence to the royal cause, and among the rest Mr Guthrie and his colleague, Mr John Allan, were, on November 14, 1648, dismissed from their charges He lived in retirement at Kilspindie in Perthshire, till after the Restoration, and when Episcopacy was revived by act of parliament, in 1661, he was restored by law to his former charge at Stirling, which, indeed, had become vacant by the martyrdom of Mr James Guthrie for his zealous attachment to the cause of the Covenant The Rev Mr M'Gregor Stirling, in his edition of Nimmo's History of Stirlingshire, says that he was invited by the magistrates to resume his pastoral functions at Stirling, but declined on account of bad health Although he had formerly signed the Covenant, Mr Guthrie, it appears, like some others of the temporizing clergymen of those days, did not hesitate to take the oath of supremacy, whereby the Covenant, both national, as explained by the Glasgow Assembly of 1638, and the league with England, in 1643, was declared of no obligation, force, or effect for the future

Being well known to the earl of Lauderdale, who had then the sole management of affairs in Scotland, and who, like himself, had once been a Covenanter, his lordship recommended him, in 1664, for the bishopric of Dunkeld, then void by the death of Bishop Halliburton, who had only held the see for two years He was soon after consecrated with the usual ceremonies, and his appointment was ratified by letters patent under the great seal, January 31, 1665 He held the see till his death, which took place in 1676 His only work is Memoirs of Scottish Affairs, Civil and Ecclesiastical, from the year 1637 to the Death of King Charles I London, 1702, 8vo. 2d edition, Glasgow, 1747, 12mo. Though professing to be an impartial relation, it is not always entitled to that character

GUTHRIE, JAMES, a faithful and zealous minister of the Church of Scotland, and one of the first who fell a sacrifice for religion after the Restoration, the son of the laird of Guthrie, was born previous to 1617 He was educated at St Andrews, and having gone through the regular course of classical learning, he commenced teaching philosophy in that university, and was highly respected both for his calmness of temper and able scholarship He had been brought up an Episcopalian, and in his early youth held highly prelatical views, but after he went to St Andrews, by conversing with Mr Samuel Rutherford and others, and especially by his joining the weekly meetings for prayer and conference, he was led to adopt Presbyterian principles, to which he ever after faithfully adhered, and sealed his attachment to them with his blood Having passed his trials, he was, in 1638, ordained minister of Lauder, where he remained for several years In 1646 he was one of the ministers selected by the committee of Estates to attend the king at Newcastle In 1649 Mr Guthrie was translated to Stirling, where he continued till unjustly put to death by a profligate and tyrannical government Throughout his ministerial career he displayed great zeal and boldness in defence of the Covenant.

In 1650, in consequence of the hostility which the earl of Middleton had always shown to the Covenant, and his connection with an unsuccessful attempt made in that year to disturb the peace of the kingdom by an intended rising in the north in favour of the king, Mr Guthrie proposed to the commission of the General Assembly that that nobleman should be excommunicated This being agreed to, Mr Guthrie himself was appointed to pronounce the sentence of excommunication, at Stirling, on the ensuing Sabbath, which he did accordingly, taking no notice of a letter he received on the morning of that day to delay the sentence Although the commission of the Assembly, at their next meeting on January 2, 1651, released Middleton from the censure of the church, he continued ever after to entertain a rooted enmity to Mr Guthrie, and was the principal cause of his being subsequently condemned to death.

Mr Guthrie openly preached against the resolutions in favour of Charles II, concluded on by the more moderate clergy at Perth, December 14, 1650, and became the leader of the opposing party called Protesters For their conduct in this respect, he and his colleague, Mr Bennet, were, by a letter from the chancellor, cited to appear before the king and the committee of Estates at Perth in the subsequent February, and on the 22d of that month they came before the Estates, and delivered in a protestation to the effect, that while they freely acknowledged his majesty's jurisdiction in all civil matters, they declined his authority in questions purely ecclesiastical, and on the 28th they presented another protestation, much the same as the former, though expressed in stronger terms Both these documents will be found in Wodrow's Church History After this the king and committee thought proper to dismiss them, restricting them in the meantime to Perth and Dundee, and the prosecution was allowed to drop, but Mr Guthrie's declining the king's authority in matters spiritual at this time was made the principal article in his indictment a few years thereafter An intimation had been given that all who were not satisfied with the resolutions should be cited to the General Assembly, as liable to censure, and at the Assembly which met at Dundee in the subsequent July, the protesters appeared and protested against this course of procedure, denying the freedom and lawfulness of the Assembly itself For this, James Guthrie, Patrick Gillespie, and James Simpson were deposed, but,

Soon after the Restoration, Mr. Guthrie and some of his brethren who had assembled at Edinburgh, with the object of drawing up a supplication to his majesty, were apprehended and imprisoned in the castle From thence he was removed to Dundee, where he remained till before his trial, which took place at Edinburgh, February 20, 1661, when he was arraigned for writing a paper called the Western Remonstrance, a pamphlet, styled 'The Causes of the Lord's Wrath,' and the Humble Petition, dated August 23, 1660, also for disowning the king's authority in ecclesiastical matters, and for some treasonable expressions he was alleged to have uttered in 1650 or 1651 When brought to trial on April 11, he defended himself with such eloquence, knowledge of law, and strength of argument, as utterly amazed his friends and confounded his enemies He was, however, found guilty of high treason, and condemned to death, his head to be fixed on the Netherbow, his estate to be confiscated, and his arms torn On receiving sentence he thus addressed the judge "My lord, my conscience I cannot submit, but this old crazy body and mortal flesh I do submit, to do with it whatsoever you will, whether by death, or banishment, or imprisonment, or any thing else only I beseech you to ponder well what profit there is in my blood It is not the extinguishing me or many others that will extinguish the Covenant and work of reformation since the year 1638 My blood, bondage, or banishment will contribute more for the propagation of those things than my life or liberty could do, though I should live many years" During the interval between his sentence and execution, he is described as having enjoyed perfect composure and serenity of mind On the last night that remained to him in this world he had some friends to supper, when he called for some cheese, which he had not used for several years, having been forbidden it by his physicians on account of the gravel, to which he was subject, and jocularly said he was now beyond the hazard of that complaint On the scaffold he conducted himself with the utmost fortitude and magnanimity, and addressed the people, assembled on the occasion, for a full hour, "with the composedness," says Bishop Burnet, "of a man delivering a sermon, rather than his last words. He justified all he had done, and exhorted all people to adhere to the Covenant, which he magnified highly," declaring that he would not exchange that scaffold for the palace or mitre of the greatest prelate in Britain He gave a copy of his last speech and testimony to a friend to be delivered to his son, then a child, when he came of age Just before he was turned over, he lifted the napkin off his face, and cried, "The Covenants, the Covenants, shall yet be Scotland's reviving" His execution took place on June 1, 1661, and his head remained fixed on the Netherbow Port till 1688, when Mr. Alexander Hamilton, then a student of divinity at the university of Edinburgh, at the hazard of his life, took it down and buried it, after it had stood a public spectacle for twenty-seven years Mr Hamilton was afterwards minister of Stirling for twelve years Besides the papers already mentioned, for which he suffered, Mr Guthrie wrote several others, particularly one against Oliver Cromwell, in consequence of which he was subjected to some hardships during the protectorate In 1660 he published 'Some Considerations concerning the Dangers which threaten Religion and the Work of Reformation in Scotland,' which was reprinted in 1738, with his last Sermon preached at Stirling A Treatise on Ruling Elders and Deacons, written about the time he entered upon the ministry, is prefixed to one of the editions of his cousin, Mr William Guthrie's 'Christian's Great Interest'

GUTHRIE, WILLIAM, a distinguished divine, and author of the standard treatise entitled 'The Christian's Great Interest,' was born at Pitforthy, Forfarshire, in 1620 His father, a cadet of the ancient family of Guthrie, was proprietor of the lands of Pitforthy, and his mother was a daughter of the house of Easter-Ogle He was the eldest of eight children His brother Robert was licensed for the ministry, but died early Alexander, another of his brothers, became minister of Strickathrow, in the presbytery of Brechin, about 1645, and died in 1661 John, his youngest brother, obtained the parish of Tarbolton, in Ayrshire, from which he was ejected at the Restoration, and died in 1669.

William, the subject of the present notice, distinguished himself at school by his rapid acquirement of the Latin and Greek languages. He studied at the university of St. Andrews, under the guardianship and direction of his cousin, the celebrated James Guthrie, then professor of philosophy in the New college there, and one of the earliest victims of the persecuting and tyrannical government of Charles the Second Having taken the degree of M.A, he applied himself to the study of theology, under the famous Samuel Rutherford, at that period professor of divinity at St Andrews In order more effectually to dedicate himself to the service of God in preaching the gospel, he made over his estate of Pitforthy to one of his brothers, and was licensed by the presbytery of St Andrews in August 1642, being at that time in the 22d year of his age He was soon after appointed tutor to Lord Mauchline, eldest son of the earl of Loudon, then chancellor of Scotland About a year after he had entered this nobleman's family, he happened to preach in the parish church of Galston, on a preparation day previous to the celebration of the Lord's Supper, when some inhabitants of the recently erected parish of Fenwick, then without a pastor, chanced to be present, and they were so much pleased with his sermon that they recommended him warmly to their neighbours as one well qualified to be their minister Though opposed in their choice by Lord Boyd, the patron of the parish, they were supported by the heritors, and a call having been moderated to him, he was ordained by the presbytery to the pastoral charge of Fenwick on November 7, 1644 He speedily acquired great popularity as a preacher, and persons from various places at a distance were in the habit of coming almost regularly to hear him, so that he soon had a crowded congregation As Fenwick had formed part of the extensive and overgrown parish of Kilmarnock, most of his parishioners had hitherto been destitute of the common means of moral and religious instruction, and in consequence were sunk into a state of extreme ignorance and neglect of the ordinances of the gospel But in the course of a few years his labours wrought a remarkable improvement in their character and condition He did not limit his ministerial duties to the pulpit, but made it a practice regularly to visit his people in their houses. He rendered even his amusements and recreations subservient to the great object he had in view As his health required much rural exercise, he was greatly attached to fishing and fowling, and in his dress as a sportsman he had often more influence in persuading the persons whom he met in the fields, or at the river's side, to attend church, and embrace a religious life, than he would have had in his proper character as a minister While angling for trout he did not forget his duty as a "fisher of men" It is related of him, that in his sporting habiliments he once called upon a person who he was anxious should perform family worship, but who declined it on the ground that he could not pray On which Mr Guthrie prayed himself to the family's great surprise On going away he engaged them to come to the church next Sabbath, when, to their consternation, they discovered that it was the minister himself who had been their visitor There was another person in his parish who had a custom of going a fowling on the Sabbath day, and neglecting the church On Mr Guthrie asking him what he could make by that day's exercise, he replied that he could make half-a-crown Mr Guthrie told him that if he would go to church on Sabbath he would give him as much, and by that means got his promise After sermon, Mr Guthrie said to him, that if he would come back next Sabbath day he would give him the same, which he did, from that time he became a regular attendant at the church, and was afterwards a member of his session

In August 1645, Mr Guthrie married Agnes, daughter of David Campbell, Esq of Skeldon, in Ayrshire, a remote branch of the Loudon family Shortly after he was chosen by the General Assembly to attend the army as chaplain On the defeat of the Scottish army at Dunbar he retired with the troops to Stirling, from thence he went to Edinburgh, and soon after returned to his parish In consequence of his great talents and success in preaching he received calls from Linlithgow, Stirling, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, but he preferred his country charge to them all. When the church unfortunately divided into the two parties of Resolutioners and Protesters, Mr Guthrie joined the latter; and in the Synod held at Glasgow in April 1661, when the days of persecution had begun, he presented the draught of an address to the parliament, for the better securing the privileges of the church, and the purity of religion in Scotland The Synod approved of it, but the divisions among the clergy, and the great distractions of the times, caused it to be abandoned

Before the Restoration Mr Guthrie had had an opportunity of doing a kind service to the earl of Glencairn, when that nobleman was in prison on account of his attachment to the royal cause, which his lordship had not forgotten, and by his good offices Mr Guthrie escaped much of the evils that now overtook many of his brethren But the time at length came when, like other faithful Presbyterian ministers, he was to be driven from his charge by the orders of Dr Alexander Burnet, archbishop of Glasgow, one of the most intolerant and haughty of the Episcopalian clergy of that age Lord Glencairn in vain attempted to intercede with that proud prelate in behalf of Mr Guthrie, to his request that the latter should, for the present, be overlooked, he peremptorily and disdainfully answered, "It cannot be, he is a ringleader and a keeper up of schism in my diocese" A commission was immediately made out for Mr Guthrie's suspension, and the archbishop had to bribe one of his curates with the paltry sum of five pounds to put it in execution The Wednesday before its enforcement was observed by his parishioners as a day of humiliation and prayer He met his people for the last time on the morning of the Sabbath following, being the day fixed upon by Archbishop Burnet for the execution of his suspension, and after addressing his congregation with more than his usual earnestness and fervour, he took farewell of them amid the tears and blessings of all present He dismissed the congregation by nine o'clock, says his biographer, "and nothing now remained but to wait the arrival of the curate The people had quietly dispersed, and the stillness of the hallowed day prevailed around the manse and church The bell sounded not as usual to disturb the placidity of the scene At length the trample of horses was heard, soldiers appeared with their helmets gleaming in the distance, and at the head of the party was seen a rider in black, as the messenger of final separation between this great and good man and his mourning parishioners. They soon alighted and entered the manse, where they found Mr Guthrie ready to receive them The curate presented his commission from the archbishop of Glasgow, and he went through the ceremony of preaching the church vacant, and discharging Mr Guthrie from the exercise of his ministry there, without any molestation, and to no other congregation than the party of soldiers who had accompanied him" This took place July 24, 1664, and Mr Guthrie remained for some time in the parish, but never preached On the death of his brother, to whom he had, on entering the ministry, assigned his estate, he returned to Pitforthy, his paternal home, in the autumn of 1665 His health, however, had been latterly declining, and he was now seized with a severe attack of the gravel, which had afflicted him for years, accompanied by gout and ulcer in the kidneys After suffering the severest pain, in the midst of which he comforted those around him with the expressions of love, gratitude, and resignation to the will of God, which continually fell from his lips, he died in the house of his brother-in-law, the Rev Lewis Skinner of Brechin, October 10, 1665, in the 45th year of his age His valuable and excellent work, 'The Christian's Great Interest,' would, perhaps, never have seen the light but for the circumstance that a volume, containing imperfect notes of a series of sermons preached by him from the 55th chapter of Isaiah, had been printed surreptitiously at Aberdeen, with a most ostentatious title-page He, therefore, deemed it only an act of justice to the public and himself to publish a correct and genuine edition of these sermons, which he did under the above title It soon became a great favourite both at home and abroad, and was translated into the Dutch, German, and French, and even into some of the Eastern languages In the Memoir of his life in the 'Scots Worthies,' it is mentioned that there were also some discourses of Mr Guthrie's in manuscript, of which seventeen were transcribed by John Howie, and published in 1779 The most of Mr Guthrie's papers were, in 1682, carried off from his widow by a party of soldiers who entered her house by violence, and took her son-in-law prisoner, when they fell into the hands of the bishops In 1680 a work was published purporting to be "the heads of some Sermons preached at Fenwick in Aug 1662, by Mr William Guthrie," which being wholly unauthorized by his representatives, was disclaimed by his widow in a public advertisement, a copy of which is preserved among Wodrow's Collections, in the Advocates' Library To the Memoir of Mr Guthrie, prefixed to his 'Christian's Great Interest,' we have been mainly indebted for the materials of this notice His life has also been written by the Rev William Muir, the editor of 'The History of the House of Rowallan' Mr Guthrie had six children, of whom only two daughters survived him One was married to Mr Miller of Glenlee, in Ayrshire, and the other, in December 1681, to the Rev Patrick Warner, whose daughter Margaret became the wife of Mr Robert Wodrow, minister of Eastwood, near Glasgow, the indefatigable author of the 'History and Sufferings of the Church of Scotland'

GUTHRIE, WILLIAM, an industrious historical and miscellaneous writer and compiler, the son of an Episcopal minister, and a cadet of the ancient family of Halkerton in Forfarshire, was born at Brechin, according to one account, in 1701, or, to another, in 1708 He was educated at King's college, Old Aberdeen, where he took his degrees, and afterwards followed for some time the profession of a schoolmaster He is said to have been induced to remove to London, owing to a disappointment in love, or, as some accounts state, in consequence of his Jacobite principles preventing him holding any office under the then government He arrived in the metropolis some time before 1730, and, commencing author by profession, he seems at first to have found employment from Cave the printer, for among his earliest occupations was the compilation of the parliamentary debates for the Gentleman's Magazine, previous to Dr Johnson's connection with that periodical Guthrie's name seems to have become very popular with the booksellers, for it is prefixed to a great variety of works, in the writing of most of which he appears to have had little or no part. In the list of works to which his name is attached is included, 'A New System of Modern Geography, or a Geographical, Historical, and Commercial Grammar' This well known work, however, by which his name is now chiefly preserved, was not written by Guthrie, but is believed to have been compiled by a bookseller in the Strand of the name of Knox The astronomical information contained in it was supplied by James Gregory

Mr Guthrie was the author of a great many political papers and pamphlets, which came out anonymously In 1745-46 he received a pension of £200 a-year from the Pelham ministry, for defending the measures of Government with his pen, and, in 1762, he renewed the offer of his services to the Bute administration He was also placed in the commission of the peace for Middlesex, although it is said he never acted as a magistrate In compiling the 'English Peerage' he was assisted by Mr Ralph Bigland, and each article was submitted to the revision of the representative of the noble family treated of, yet, notwithstanding all their care, the work is full of errors Boswell informs us that Dr Johnson considered Guthrie of importance enough to wish that his life had been written He also mentions that Guthrie himself told him that he was the author of a beautiful little poem, 'The Eagle and Robin Redbreast,' printed in the collection of poems called the 'Union,' where, however, it is said to have been written by Archibald Scott, before 1600 Guthrie died March 9, 1770, and was interred in Marylebone churchyard, where a monument, with a suitable inscription, was erected by his brother to his memory

The works which bear his name are

HACKSTON, a surname corrupted from Halkerston

A brave young man, named David Halkerston, the brother of the ancestor of Hackston of Rathillet, a memoir of whom is given below, was killed in 1544, in a miserable alley or close, (the first below North Bridge Street,) on the north side of the High Street of Edinburgh, called from him Halkerston's Wynd, when defending the town against the English, under the earl of Hertford

HACKSTON, DAVID, of Rathillet, in the parish of Kilmany, Fifeshire, one of the most resolute of the leaders of the Covenanters, is said in his youth to have followed a wild and irregular life, and to have been first converted by attending the field preachings of the persecuted ministers From his great courage and zeal in the cause of the Covenant, he soon acquired considerable influence over his associates He was present on May 3, 1679, on Magus Moor, in Fifeshire, with other eight gentlemen, when Archbishop Sharpe accidentally came in their way, and was by them put to death, although Hackston himself had no hand in the deed The party wished him to act as their leader on the occasion, but he refused, on the twofold ground that he was by no means assured of the lawfulness of the action, and that, as there was a private difference subsisting betwixt Sharpe and himself, the world would be apt, if he took an active part in his destruction, to say that he had done it out of personal hatred and revenge, of which he professed himself entirely free After the murder he retired for a short time to the north, but about the end of the same month Hackston and five of his companions joined the body of Covenanters assembled in Evandale, Lanarkshire On the 29th, the anniversary of the Restoration, he and Mr Douglas, one of the persecuted clergymen, published, at the market-cross of Rutherglen, a declaration which had been drawn up against the Government Returning to Evandale, he was with the Covenanters when they were attacked by Graham of Claverhouse, upon June 1st, near Drumclog, where, being appointed one of the commanding officers, by his presence of mind and intrepidity he greatly contributed to the discomfiture of the king's troops At the battle of Bothwell Bridge, on the 22d of June, he again displayed uncommon valour, being, with his troop of horse, the last to leave the field where his party had sustained such a disastrous defeat A reward having been offered for his apprehension, he was forced to lurk in concealment for about a year, but was at length taken prisoner at Airsmoss, on July 22, 1680, by Bruce of Earlshall, after a desperate resistance, in which Hackston was severely wounded, and Richard Cameron and nine of his adherents killed Having been conveyed to Edinburgh, he was, after two preliminary examinations before the council, brought to trial on the 29th, and being found guilty, was, on the 30th, immediately after receiving sentence, executed under circumstances of unparalleled cruelty When taken to the place of execution, his right hand was cut off, and after a considerable interval his left He was then hung up by the neck, and while struggling in the agonies of death, his breast was cut open, and his heart torn out and exposed on the point of the executioner's knife, while its palpitations and the convulsed quivering of his frame showed that life and consciousness were not yet gone His body was afterwards quartered, and his head fixed upon the Netherbow Different parts of his body were fixed up at St Andrews, Magus Moor, Cupar, Burntisland, Leith, and Glasgow. His heirs continued in possession of the estate of Rathillet till after the middle of the eighteenth century His descendants are said to have possessed a considerable share of his talents and courage One of them was engaged on the government side against the rebels of 1715 Another was sheriff of Fifeshire The last of the male branch of the family was Mr Helenus Hackston, well known in his day for his talents and eccentricity, who sold the estate of Rathillet about 1772 to a Mr Sweet, by whom it was again sold to Mr David Carswell, in whose family it remains

HADDINGTON, Viscount of, a title (extinct) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1600, on Sir John Ramsay, brother of George, first Lord Ramsay of Dalhousie, (see RAMSAY, surname of,) for having been instrumental in saving the life of James the Sixth, in the mysterious affair called the Gowrie conspiracy He was a favourite page of the king, and, on that occasion, when his majesty had retired with Alexander Ruthven, brother of the earl of Gowrie, he agreed to take charge of a hawk for one of the servants, while the latter was at dinner On the alarm arising that the king had ridden forth, Ramsay hurried to the stable for his horse, and in doing so, he heard the king's voice at the window of Gowrie house, crying, "I am murdered! Treason! My lord of Mar, help! help!" On which, running up a back staircase, he rushed against the door of the chamber, and burst it open, when he found Alexander Ruthven struggling with the king, who, on seeing him, exclaimed, "Fy! strike him low, he has secret armour on" Casting from him the hawk which still sat upon his hand, Ramsay drew his dagger, and plunged it twice in Ruthven's body, and the king, exerting all his strength, threw him down stairs, where he was despatched by Sir Thomas Erskine and Hugh Herries, the king's physician The earl, supported by seven of his attendants, in attempting to force his way into the house, was encountered by Ramsay, who pierced him through the heart, and forced his attendants to retreat. For this signal service the king heaped dignities upon him, and retained him constantly in his favour On being created viscount of Haddington he received, for an augmentation of honour, an arm holding a naked sword and a crown in the midst thereof, with a heart at the point, to impale with his own arms, and the motto, "Hæc dextra vindex principis et patriæ." Besides being viscount of Haddington and Lord Ramsay of Barns in the peerage of Scotland, he was, in 1620, created a peer of England, by the titles of earl of Holderness and baron of Kingston upon Thames, with the special addition of honour that upon the 5th of August annually, the day appointed to be observed in giving thanks to God for the king's preservation, he and his male heirs for ever should bear the sword of state before the king, in remembrance of his happy deliverance. He died, without surviving issue, in 1625, when his titles became extinct.

HADDINGTON, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1627 on Sir Thomas Hamilton, an eminent advocate and judge, a memoir of whom is given in larger type at page 434. His title was at first earl of Melrose, but eight years afterwards it was changed to Haddington. The first earl's grandfather was Thomas Hamilton of Orchartfield, Bathgate, and Ballencrieff, second son of Hugh Hamilton of Innerwick, descended from a branch of the Hamiltons of Cadzow, the original stock of the ducal family of Hamilton. This Thomas Hamilton of Orchartfield was killed at Pinkie, 10th Sept. 1547, leaving two sons, Thomas his successor, and John, a secular priest, a memoir of whom, from a sketch by the accurate Lord Hailes, will be found at page 428. The elder son, Sir Thomas Hamilton of Priestfield, was knighted before 1597, and had a charter, 30th May 1597, of the estates of Balbyn and Drumcairn in Perthshire, which his father had received in excambion with James Hamilton of Innerwick, for the lands of Ballencrieff in Linlithgowshire, and another of Priestfield the same year By the influence of his son, the first earl of Haddington, he was admitted a lord of session 29th May 1607, when he took the judicial title of Lord Priestfield, but the following year resigned his seat on the bench to his second son, Sir Andrew Hamilton of Redhouse, an estate which he received in marriage with the daughter and sole heiress of John Laing of Redhouse, also one of the lords of session Sir Andrew, on being raised to the bench on 28th June 1608, assumed the judicial title of Lord Redhouse. He was a privy councillor to King James the Sixth, and died in 1637 A younger brother, Sir John Hamilton of Magdalens, was also a lord of session under the title of Lord Magdalens, having been appointed to a seat on the bench on 27th July 1622. As he held also the appointment of lord clerk-register, conferred the same year, he was obliged, in February 1626, to resign his seat on the bench, in accordance with a resolution of Charles the First that officers of state should not be lords of session. At the same time he was removed from the exchequer, but to this latter situation he was restored on 12th July following. He was again admitted to a seat on the bench, as an extraordinary lord, on 2d November 1630, and died at Holyroodhouse on 28th November 1632. A fourth son of Sir Thomas Hamilton, Lord Priestfield, was Patrick Hamilton of Little Prestoun, secretary to his brother, the earl of Haddington, and founder of the family of Fala. Alexander, the fifth and youngest son, a general of artillery, had a high command in the army sent to the assistance of the king of Sweden, under the first duke of Hamilton in 1631, and died in 1649

The first earl of Haddington was thrice married. By his first wife, a daughter of Borthwick of Newbyres, he had an only daughter, by his second wife, a daughter of Foulis of Colinton, county of Edinburgh, he had three sons and six daughters, and by his third wife, a daughter of Ker of Fernieherst and the widow of Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth, he had an only son, the Hon Robert Hamilton of Wester Bin ning, who was killed at Dunglass castle, when that fortress was blown up in 1640, as afterwards related.

Thomas, the eldest son, second earl of Haddington, born 25th May 1600, succeeded his father in 1637 In the great civil war he adhered to the cause of the Covenanters, and was appointed colonel of one of their regiments. In 1640, when General Leslie marched into England, Lord Haddington was left in Scotland, to watch the motions of the garrison of Berwick. He fixed his quarters at Dunglass castle, in the county of Haddington, where a considerable quantity of gunpowder was stored up. On the 30th of August, about midday, as he was standing in the court of the castle, reading a letter which he had received from General Leslie to a number of gentlemen, the powder-magazine blew up, and one of the side walls in its fall overwhelmed his lordship and all his auditors, except four who, by the force of the explosion, were thrown to a considerable distance. The earl's body being found among the ruins, was buried at Tyninghame. With his lordship was killed, besides his youngest son, several of his kinsmen of the name of Hamilton Scotstarvet states that a report prevailed that a faithless page, an English boy of the name of Edward Paris, in resentment of the earl's jestingly saying to him that his countrymen were a pack of cowards to suffer themselves to be beaten, and to run away at Newburn, thrust a red-hot iron into a barrel of gunpowder, and so was killed with the rest. This incident is often erroneously connected with Dunglass castle on the Clyde, though the two places are separated by the whole breadth of the island. The second earl was twice married first to Lady Catherine Erskine, fourth daughter of the seventh earl of Mar, and by her had Thomas, third earl, John, fourth earl, two other sons, and a daughter, and, secondly, to Lady Jean Gordon, third daughter of the second marquis of Huntly, and by her had a posthumous daughter

Thomas, third earl, was a boy under thirteen years of age at the time of his father's death Soon after he visited the Continent, and espoused by contract at Chatillon in France, 8th August 1643, Henrietta de Coligny, eldest daughter of Gaspard, Count de Coligny, and great-granddaughter of Admiral Coligny, celebrated for her wit, beauty, and adventures, afterwards the countess de la Suze He died of consumption, 8th February 1645, while scarcely eighteen years old. His brother John succeeded as fourth earl, and died 1st September 1669 By his countess, Lady Christian Lindsay, second daughter of the fifteenth earl of Crawford, he had an only son, Charles, fifth earl, and three daughters, the eldest of whom, Lady Margaret, married John, earl of Hopetoun, who was drowned on his voyage to Scotland when accompanying the duke of York, 5th May 1682

Charles, fifth earl, born in 1650, married Lady Margaret Leslie, eldest daughter of John, duke of Rothes, lord-high-chancellor of Scotland. On her father's death in 1681, the dukedom became extinct, but the countess succeeded as countess of Rothes. The earl died in 1685, aged 35, and the countess in 1700 They had three sons John, who succeeded as eighth earl of Rothes (see ROTHES, earl of); Thomas, in whose favour his father resigned his earldom of Haddington, and to whom a new patent, with the former precedency, was granted, and Charles, who died young

Thomas, the second son, became sixth earl of Haddington Born 29th August, 1680, he was trained up in whig principles, under the care of his uncle, Adam Cockburn of Ormiston, and distinguished himself as a warm supporter of the liberty of the people He had a charter of the earldom of Haddington, 25th February 1687, and another of the hereditary office of keeper of the park of Holyroodhouse, 23d January 1691 He was a zealous supporter of the treaty of union. On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he accompanied the duke of Argyle to Stirling, 16th September, and served as a volunteer under his grace, two months afterwards, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, where he received a wound in the shoulder, and had a horse shot under him In 1716 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of the county of Haddington, and invested with the order of the Thistle, being also constituted one of the lords of the police. The same year he was elected one of the sixteen representative Scots peers, and rechosen at the general elections of 1722 and 1727 He died at New Hailes, 28th November, 1735, in his 55th year To this earl have been attributed a collection of Fescennine verses, published surreptitiously at Edinburgh, and afterwards at London, with the titles of 'Forty Select Poems, on several occasions,' and 'Tales in Verse, for the amusement of Leisure Hours.' He is the author of 'A Treatise on the manner of Raising Forest Trees,' in a letter to his grandson, dated at Tyninghame 22d December 1733. Published at Edinburgh in 1761 Subjoined is his portrait, in the character of Simon the Skipper, from an engraving in Park's edition of Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, vol. v

At the age of sixteen, his lordship had married his cousin, Helen, only daughter of John Hope of Hopetoun, and had two sons and two daughters. The elder son, Charles Lord Binning, author of several elegant poems, a memoir of whom is afterwards given in larger type, died before his father The second son, the Hon John Hamilton, a member of the faculty of advocates, died in 1772 The younger daughter, Lady Christian Hamilton, married Sir James Dalrymple of Hailes, baronet, and was mother of the celebrated Sir David Dalrymple, Lord Hailes. Lord Binning had married Rachel, youngest daughter, and at length sole heiress, of George Baillie of Jerviswood, by whom he had five sons and three daughters. Thomas, the eldest, born in October, 1720, became, on the death of his grandfather, seventh earl of Had dington. George, the second, on succeeding to his maternal grandfather's estate of Jerviswoode, took the name of Baillie, and died at Mellerstain, 16th April 1791, aged 74. The Hon Charles Hamilton, the youngest son, entered the army. He died governor of Blackness castle in 1806, in his 79th year

The eldest son, Thomas, 7th earl of Haddington was educated at the university of Oxford, and in 1740, accompanied by his brother George, he set out on his travels to the Continent. Both brothers became members of the "Common Room," established at Geneva the same year His lordship died at Ham in Surrey, May 19, 1794, in his 74th year He was twice married, first, to Mary, daughter of Rowland Holt, Esq of Redgrave, Suffolk, by whom he had 2 sons, Charles, 8th earl of Haddington, and Hon Thomas Hamilton, who died young, and 2dly, to Anne, eldest daughter of Sir Charles Gascoigne, knight, issue one daughter, who died in infancy

Charles, 8th earl, born July 5, 1753, was, when Lord Binning, captain of the grenadier company of the duke of Buccleuch's fencible regiment in 1778. In 1804, he was appointed lord lieutenant of Haddingtonshire, and at the general election of 1807, was chosen one of the 16 representative Scots peers. He died March 17, 1828.

His only son Thomas, 9th earl, born at Edinburgh, June 1, 1780, was educated at the university of his native city, and graduated at Oxford. In July 1802, he was elected M P for St. Germains, in 1807 for Cockermouth, and for Callington, at the general election the same year He was afterwards member for Rochester, and a commissioner for the affairs of India. In 1814 he was sworn a privy councillor In July 1827, in his father's lifetime, he was created a peer of the United Kingdom as Baron Melros of Tyningham and in 1828 he succeeded his father In December 1834, he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but continued in that post only to the following April He was first lord of the admiralty from Sep. 1841 to Jan 1846, when he was constituted lord-privy-seal, but retired from that office in the following July In 1843 he received £43,000, as remuneration for the office of hereditary keeper of Holyrood Park, that office being then abolished. He m. Lady Maria Parker, dr of 4th earl of Macclesfield without issue. He died Dec. 21, 1858

He was succeeded in all his titles, except that of Baron Melros, by his cousin, George Baillie, Esq of Mellerstain and Jerviswoode, grandson of Hon George Hamilton; born in 1802, married in 1824 Georgina, daughter of Archdeacon Robert Markham; issue, 5 sons and 3 daughters. His eldest son, George, Lord Binning, born in 1827, m. Helen, dr of Sir John Warrender, Bart., with issue. By royal license, dated Dec. 31, 1858, he was authorized to take the surname of Arden in addition to Baillie. See BAILLIE, vol. i., page 174 In April 1859, the 10th earl assumed, by royal licence, the additional original surname of Hamilton

The earl's sisters and brothers were, by royal warrant, 1859, raised to the rank of an Earl's children They are, 1 Eliza, born in 1803, m. in 1821, 2d marquis of Breadalbane. 2. Charles Baillie, b. in 1804, admitted advocate 1830, sheriff of Stirlingshire, 1853, lord advocate of Scotland, 1858, M P for Linlithgowshire, 1859, a lord of session as Lord Jerviswoode same year, m. in 1831, Hon Anne Scott, 3d dr of Hugh, Lord Polwarth, with issue. 3. HADDO, Lord, a secondary title of the earl of Aberdeen. See GORDON of Haddo, p. 324 of this vol.

HAIG, a surname, originally del Haga, possessed by an ancient family in the Merse, proprietors from an early period of the lands of Bemerside in Berwickshire, relative to whom Sir Thomas the Rhymer, whose estate of Ercildon adjoined theirs, has this prophecy

> "Tide whate'er betide, > There's aye be Haigs of Bemerside."

Some writers are of opinion that they are of Pictish or British extraction, (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 134,) but the name del Haga is evidently Norman Petrus del Haga, propretor of the lands and barony of Bemerside, lived in the reigns of King Malcolm the Fourth and William the Lion In a donation of Richard de Morville, constable of Scotland from 1162 to 1188, of the chapel of St. Leonard's in Lauderdale to the monastery of Dryburgh, Petrus del Haga de Bemerside is a witness. He also appears as witness to three other charters in the Chartulary of Kelso. Petrus del Haga is also witness in a charter of confirmation (No. 75 in Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ) of the said Richard de Morville, of lands to Sir Henry Sinclair and others, before 1188 In the same era, according to a manuscript history of the family was Henry del Haga, said to have been killed in the expedition of King William against Harold earl of Caithness in 1199 Petrus del Haga, the son of the first-mentioned Petrus, in various charters is designed dominus de Bemerside, an evidence that this family were considerable barons even in those early times. This Petrus, with Sir Alexander Davenant, was appointed by King Alexander the Second to pursue and apprehend John de Bisset, for burning Patrick, earl of Athol, in his own house at Haddington in 1242 (see vol. i. p. 75). John, his son, third baron of Bemerside, was compelled, with many other Scots barons, to swear fealty to Edward the First in 1296, but he took the first opportunity of joining Sir William Wallace in the struggle for independence, and was with him at the battle of Stirling in 1297 His son, Petrus, adhered to Bruce, and fought with him at the battle of Bannockburn, but was killed at Halidonhill in 1333 John, fifth baron of Bemerside, the son of Petrus, was slain at the battle of Otterburn, at an advanced age, five years after Gilbert Haig, the eighth baron, was present with the earl of Ormond, commander of the Scots army, when he obtained a complete victory over an English force under the earl of Northumberland at Sark in 1449 He also assisted the earl of Angus in suppressing the power of James, earl of Douglas, in 1455 His son, James, ninth laird of Bemerside, was a warm adherent of James the Third, and after the murder of that unfortunate monarch in 1488, he was obliged to conceal himself till, through the interposition of friends, he had made his peace with the young king, James the Fourth. This, however, could only be effected on condition of resigning his estate to his son William, which he did 13th February, 1489 This William Haig of Bemerside fell at Flodden. His son, Robert, who succeeded to the estate, had a command in the army, under the regent Arran, which engaged the English near Ancrum in 1544, and the laird of Bemerside having taken prisoner Ralph, Lord Evers, one of the English leaders, he obtained a discharge of all the duties due by his family to the Crown. The great-grandson of this baron, James, fourteenth laird of Bemerside, married a daughter of William Macdougal of Stodrig, who had been nurse to Princess Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, daughter of James VI, and had a pension settled on her Of eight sons, the four eldest were killed in the service of the elector palatinate, king of Bohemia, in 1629 and 1630 David, the fifth son, (1638,) carried on the line of the family He was succeeded by his son Antony, an officer in the service of Sweden, who married Jean, daughter of Home of Bassenden, and had James Zerobabel, his heir, and two younger sons. James Zerobabel Haig of Bemersyde, married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Gordon, Esq, principal clerk of justiciary, (of the family of Aberdeen,) and had issue, James Antony, who succeeded him, and eleven daughters, of whom the second, Mary, married in 1735 or 1736, Thomas Potts, Esq, sheriff-clerk of Roxburghshire, and had issue: 1st, James, sheriff-clerk of Roxburghshire, died s p, and 2d, Thomas. (The eldest daughter of James Zerobabel Haig married the Hon James Home of Aytonhall, second son of Charles, 6th earl of Home, without issue.) The 2d son of Thomas Potts and Mary Haig, Thomas Potts, Esq, married in 1777, Jane, third daughter of Robert Robertson, Esq of Prenderguest, Berwickshire, and had an only child, Thomas Potts, Esq, now of the Dawson, Torquay, Devonshire, born 30th June, 1784, married 1st (in 1813), Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Chatto, Esq of Mainhouse, Roxburghshire, issue, William John Potts, Esq, barrister at law (of Lincoln's Inn), born 23d July, 1824 and Elizabeth, married 1st to the Rev William Nicholson, rector of St. Maurice, Winchester, and 2d, (in 1852) to Gerard Noel Bolton, Esq, major of the Waterford militia artillery Mr Potts of the Dawson married 2d (1852), Elizabeth Dorothea, daughter of Foliot Scott Stokes, Esq of London After the three daughters (and their heirs) of James Zerobabel Haig of Bemersyde, Mr Potts is heir of line and representative of the ancient family of De Haga, which has possessed the estate of Bemersyde for upwards of 700 years. James Antony Haig, the only son, married the eldest daughter of William Robertson, Esq of Ladykirk, and left two sons, James Zerobabel, afterwards of Bemersyde, and Isaac, died s p The elder, James Zerobabel of Bemersyde, married Isabella, daughter of Samuel Watson, Esq, Edinburgh, issue, five sons, who died s. p, and three daughters, viz, Barbara, (Miss Haig of Bemersyde), Sophia, and Mary, (1860)

HALDANE, a surname derived from Haldenus, a Dane, who first possessed the lands on the borders called from him, Halden-rig "In old charters," says Mr Alexander Haldane, in his Memoirs of Robert and James A Haldane, (London, 1852,) "in the rolls of parliament, and in other public documents, the name is variously written Halden, Haldane Hadden, or Hauden There is no doubt that it is of Norse origin" In the 12th century a younger son of the border Haldens of that ilk became possessed of the estate of Gleneagles, Perthshire, by marrying the heiress of that family, and assumed the arms but not the name of Gleneagles. In 1296 the name of Aylmer de Haldane of Gleneagles appears in the Ragman Roll as among the barons who swore fealty to Edward I Sir Bernard Haldane of Gleneagles married a daughter of William, Lord Seton His son, Sir John Haldane, in 1460 married Agnes Menteith of Ruskie, one of the two coheiresses of the half of the lands and honours of her maternal great-grandfather Duncan, last of the ancient Saxon earls of Lennox, beheaded by James I in 1424, and in consequence assumed their armorial bearings. This Sir John Haldane was sent by James III ambassador to Denmark He was also master of the king's household, sheriff principal of the shire of Edinburgh, and lord-justice-general of Scotland beyond the Forth In 1478 he was allowed to take out brieves in chancery for serving him one of the heirs of Duncan last earl of Lennox, and he had a long and tedious lawsuit with Lord Darnley as to the superiority of the earldom, which was gained by the latter In 1482, when the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. of England, invaded Scotland, Sir John Haldane, and three others, were appointed "joint captains, chieftains, keepers, and governors of the town of Berwick, and to defend it against the invasion of our old enemies of England" The memorable defection, however, of the rebellious nobles at the bridge of Lauder, speedily caused the capitulation of that town Sir John died in 1493. His son, Sir James, was, in 1505, appointed keeper of the king's castle of Dunbar, but died soon after The son of the latter also Sir John Haldane, fell at Flodden

The Haldanes of Gleneagles gave their hearty support to the Reformation in Scotland, and in 1585, when the earl of Angus and the other banished lords returned from England, the laird of 'Glennegeis,' as he is styled by Calderwood, (vol iv p. 890,) took a prominent part in what was called "the raid of Stirling," which had been concocted with the exiled nobles by the master of Gray (see page 872). He was a prisoner in the town when it was attacked, but was enabled to join the assailants, and assisted in the armed remonstrance with the king, which brought back the banished ministers, and drove the earl of Arran into disgrace and banishment. When Sir William Stewart, colonel of the royal guard, was repulsed from the West Port of Stirling, he "was followed so hardlie that Mr James Haddane, brother-german to the laird of Glennegeis, overtooke him, and as he was laying hands on him, was shott by the colonell's servant, Joshuah Henderson" In 1650 Sir John Haldane of Gleneagles was a leader in the Presbyterian army opposed to Cromwell, and fell in the rout at Dunbar His successor, also Sir John Haldane, conferred a large portion of the Menteith or Lanrick estates on a younger son, Patrick Haldane The eldest son, Mungo Haldane of Gleneagles, a member of the Scottish parliament, is mentioned by Nisbet in his account of the gorgeous public funeral of the duke of Rothes, lord-chancellor, in 1681, as in the procession bearing the banner of his relative, the earl of Tullibardine, afterwards marquis of Athol. On his death in 1685 he was succeeded by his son John Haldane, who, previous to the Revolution, sat in the Scottish parliament for Dumbartonshire. In 1688 he was a member of the convention parliament, and at the Union was one of the four members for Perthshire. He was the first member for the county of Perth in the first British parliament, and one of the commissioners for settling the equivalents at the union He took a prominent part in the politics of his day, and on the passing of the Septennial act in 1716, he spoke strongly in its favour He was twice married first, to Mary, third daughter of David Lord Maderty, and, secondly, to Helen, only daughter of Sir Charles Erskine of Alva, ancestor of the earls of Rosslyn, and had a large family by both wives. His eldest son, successively M P for the counties of Perth and Stirling, died in 1757, at the age of seventy-three, unmarried He was succeeded by his brother, Patrick, who was first professor of history at St. Andrews, then M P for the St. Andrews burghs, then solicitor-general, a royal commissioner for selling the forfeited estates, and in 1721 was appointed a lord of session "This appointment," says Mr Alexander Haldane, "gave rise to a curious lawsuit as to the right of the Crown to appoint a judge or senator of the college of justice, 'without the concurrence of the college itself' The matter was carried by appeal to the House of Lords, (see Robertson's Appeal Cases, p 422,) and decided in favour of the Crown; but Patrick Haldane's right was not insisted on, and he received another appointment. He was objected to as not being a practising advocate, but the pamphlets which appeared on the occasion, one of them attributed to the celebrated Duncan Forbes of Culloden, indicate strong political and personal rancour Mr Patrick Haldane is, amongst other things, not only charged with bribery at his elections, but with having induced his younger brother, James Haldane, then under age, the grandfather of Robert and James Alexander Haldane, to assist in carrying off and imprisoning hostile voters, on pretended charges of high treason and Jacobitism" [Memoirs, page 8, Note.] Patrick's only son, George, a brigadier-general in the army, and M P for the Dundee and Forfar burghs, died in 1759 governor of Jamaica, predeceasing his father ten years. The estate of Gleneagles being very much burdened, was sold to Captain Robert Haldane, a younger brother of the half-blood, who had returned from India, with a large fortune, being the first Scotsman who ever commanded an East India Company's ship. He also acquired by purchase the estate of Airthrey, near the Bridge of Allan, Stirlingshire, and becoming M P for the Stirling burghs, is referred to in the Letters of Junius. He died at Airthrey, 1st January 1768, leaving that estate to his nephew, Captain James Haldane, of the Duke of Albany, East Indiaman, and entailing Gleneagles and Trinity Gask, in Perthshire, on the male descendants of his two sisters, Margaret, wife of Cockburn of Ormiston, East Lothian, and Helen, married to Alexander Duncan of Lundie, mother of the celebrated admiral Viscount Duncan with remainder to his nephew, the said Captain James Haldane George Cockburn, the son of the elder sister, on succeeding to Gleneagles, took the name and arms of Haldane, but on his death, without issue male, in 1799, that estate devolved on Admiral Lord Duncan, the eldest surviving son of the younger sister, the maternal grandmother of Robert and James Alexander Haldane, of whom a memoir is given in the following pages. Their father, Captain James Haldane of Airthrey, was the only son of Colonel James Haldane, who served from 1715 to 1741, in that squadron of the royal horse now known as the 2d regiment of life-guards. He died at sea, 9th December, 1742, near Jamaica, on the Carthagena expedition, in command of General Guise's regiment of infantry On 15th December 1762, his son married his first cousin, Katherine, daughter of Alexander Duncan of Lundie, and had, with a daughter, who died in infancy, two sons Robert, born at London 28th February 1764, and James Alexander Haldane, a posthumous child, both of whom acquired a prominent name in the modern religious history of Scotland, as narrated in a subsequent memoir The elder son, Robert, succeeded to the estate of Airthrey, and built Airthrey castle in 1791 A few years previously he had constructed a lake covering thirty acres on his grounds, in which, soon after, he was nearly drowned "It was winter," says his nephew, the biographer of the family, "and during the frost, there was a large party of visitors and others on the ice, enjoying the amusement of skating and curling He was himself standing near a chair on which a lady had been seated, when the ice suddenly broke, and he was nearly carried under the surface. With his usual presence of mind, he seized on the chair, which supported him, and quietly gave directions to send for ropes, as a rash attempt to extricate him might have only involved others in the impending catastrophe. Providentially there was help at hand, and by laying hold of the ropes brought by a gamekeeper and an old servant, he was happily extricated from his perilous position." [Memoirs, p. 42] The estate of Airthrey is now the property of Lord Abercromby, having been purchased from Robert Haldane in 1798, by the celebrated General Sir Ralph Abercromby

Of the Lanrick branch of the Haldanes, above referred to, Mr Alexander Haldane informs us that it only lasted two generations. He says, "Patrick, the first proprietor, died young, having married Miss Dundas of Newliston, who was, through her mother, one of the younger coheiresses of the original stock of Halden of Halden-rig in the south The eldest coheiress of that family was married to John, first earl of Stair, who, in her right, acquired the lands of Newliston. Patrick Haldane left two younger sons, one of whom was a professor at St. Andrews, and was burned to death whilst reading in bed. John, the elder son, took part in the rebellion of 1745, but contrived to escape forfeiture, and returned after many years of exile to die at Lanrick, in 1765, at the age of 85. He left six daughters, who had numerous descendants. Some of the male heirs of Lanrick are said to be still found in the north of Scotland. James Oswald, Esq of Auchencruive, is the male representative of the eldest daughter of John Haldane. The Rev James Haldane Stewart, vicar of Lumpsfield, in England, is descended from the Lanrick family, his grandfather, Stewart of Ardshiel, who commanded the right wing of the rebel army at Culloden, having married a granddaughter of Patrick. Mr Stewart of Ardshiel on one occasion fought with and disarmed Rob Roy Sir Walter Scott has borrowed the incidents of this adventure in his tale, giving the catastrophe a turn more suited to the dignity of his hero. It is the scene at the clachan of Aberfoyle." [Memoirs of the Haldanes, p. 6, Note.]

HALDANE, JAMES ALEXANDER, distinguished for his Christian labours, was born at Dundee on the 14th July 1768, within a fortnight after the death of his father, Captain James Haldane of Airthrey, in the county of Stirling, who was cut off by sudden illness at the early age of thirty-nine His widow, Katherine Duncan, only survived her husband about six years, when her two sons, Robert, and James Alexander, were left under the guardianship of her brothers—the elder of whom was Lieutenant-colonel Alexander Duncan of Lundie, and the younger, Adam Duncan, was the future hero of Camperdown

The pious example and instructions of their mother exercised an important influence on both her sons After receiving the first part of their education under private tutors, and at the grammar school of Dundee, the brothers were sent to the High school and college of Edinburgh, and boarded with Dr Adam, the rector, the celebrated author of the 'Roman Antiquities,' and other valuable works. In his seventeenth year, James A Haldane entered the service of the East India Company, as a midshipman, on board the Duke of Montrose Previous to joining which an offer was made to his uncles by Mr Coutts, the eminent banker, to take him into his bank, but which was declined. For three generations the family had possessed the chief interest in one of the Company's chartered ships, the property of which was shared with Mr Coutts, and with the family of Dundas of Arniston At the time Mr James Haldane entered the service, the command of the Melville Castle was held by Captain Philip Dundas, the brother of Viscountess Duncan, and the father of Robert A Dundas, Esq , afterwards Mr Christopher, M P for Lincolnshire An arrangement provided, that as soon as Mr J A Haldane attained the age which qualified him for the command, Captain Philip Dundas should retire in his favour During the eight years which intervened, Mr Haldane made four voyages to Bengal, Bombay, and China In his fourth voyage he was second mate, and in 1793, having passed the necessary examinations, he obtained the command of the vessel named, the Melville Castle He was then in his twenty-fourth year, and was considered a skilful navigator, a good seaman, and an officer distinguished alike for his firmness and suavity of manner

His life at sea was distinguished by many of those narrow escapes from dangers to which a sailor is often exposed During his first voyage, when going aloft as a midshipman to reef the sails, the man next to him, and whom the captain had ordered to go first, was knocked from the yard, and drowned in the sea At another time, Mr Haldane fell out of a boat at night, and was only saved by keeping fast hold of the oar with which he had been steering On another occasion he narrowly escaped being murdered by Malays on an island, where, led by curiosity, he had penetrated alone into the woods He came to the fire where the savages had been carousing, but escaped without injury, whilst one of the boat's crew was killed, and another badly wounded At a later period he had received a very eligible appointment from Sir Robert Preston, as third officer of the Foulis Indiaman. But he was detained in Scotland too long, and on his arrival in London, found that the ship had sailed the day before, and that his place had been filled up This was a great disappointment, but it turned out for him a providential circumstance, as the Foulis was never heard of

During the months he remained in command of the Melville Castle, a desperate mutiny on board the Dutton (one of the East India fleet, lying near Spithead) gave occasion for the display of that daring courage and presence of mind for which he was at all times conspicuous The mutiny broke out in the night, and the crew threatened to carry off the ship to a French port. Shots were fired, and blood was shed. The captain of the Dutton, expecting to be overpowered, left the ship to seek for assistance from the admiral at Portsmouth It was in the midst of this scene of confusion, in a dark night, that Captain Haldane ordered out his own boat, and went alongside the Dutton The mutineers threatened to sink him if he did not sheer off, and to murder him if he dared to board Regardless of the menaced violence, he effected his purpose by a skilful manœuvre, and threw himself into the midst of the angry mutineers, when, partly by that calm and resolute determination, before which the guilty are ever disposed to quail, and partly by kindly and persuasive appeals to their reason and good sense—to which they listened the more readily, because he was himself always popular as an officer—he quelled the mutiny without further bloodshed He was both publicly and privately complimented for the combination of gallantry and judgment shown in this timely service, by which he had averted serious mischief This, however, was only one of the many instances of his characteristic zeal, enterprise, and resolution One of the captains under whom he sailed, was wont to say, that if in the night it blew hard, he never slept in comfort unless James Haldane was on deck On one occasion he was enabled, by his skilful seamanship and prompt resolution, to avert the loss of the ship in the Mozambique Channel, nearly under the same circumstances, and in the same seas, where the Winterton was wrecked in 1792, when commanded by the late Captain Dundas of Dundas

It was during the detention of the East India fleet at the beginning of 1794, that the change took place which altered the whole current of his future life It was not sudden, but gradual—not the result of enthusiastic excitement, but of calm reflection, as will be seen by the following extract from a letter to one of his old messmates —"I had a book by me, which, from prejudice of education, and not from any rational conviction, I called the Word of God I never went so far as to profess infidelity, but I was a more inconsistent character—I said that I believed a book to be a revelation from God, whilst I treated it with the greatest neglect, living in direct opposition to all its precepts, and seldom taking the trouble to look into it, or if I did, it was to perform a task—a kind of atonement for my sins I went on in this course till, whilst the Melville Castle was detained at the Motherbank by contrary winds, and having abundance of leisure for reflection, I began to think that I would pay a little more attention to this book The more I read it, the more worthy it appeared of God, and after examining the evidences with which Christianity is supported, I became fully persuaded of its truth." Instead of being, as heretofore, careless about religion, he now came to see that it was the most important interest of man, and an unexpected opportunity having occurred, which enabled him to transfer his command, he sold out of the service, and relinquishing the prospect of the great fortunes made by his contemporaries—several of whom became East India Directors, and members of parliament —he retired into private life. His biographer says that his brother had previously laboured earnestly, although without success, to induce him to settle at home, and in the neighbourhood of Airthrey When, therefore, he heard that an opportunity had occurred of disposing of the command for the sum of £9,000, being at the rate of £3,000 a voyage, exclusive of the captain's share in the property of the ship and stores, which amounted in all to £6,000 additional, Mr Haldane wrote strongly recommending that this offer should be accepted His letter decided the matter, and Captain Haldane returned with his wife to Scotland early in the summer of 1794

Nothing, however, was further from Mr Haldane's purpose at this time than to become a preacher It was his intention to purchase an estate, and lead the quiet life of a country gentleman But, during his residence in Edinburgh, he became acquainted with Mr David Black, minister of Lady Yester's, and with Dr Walter Buchanan, previously minister of Stirling, but then of the Canongate church, through whom he was introduced to several pious men actively engaged in schemes of usefulness. His enterprising mind gradually became interested in their plans for instructing the poor and neglected population in Edinburgh and the surrounding villages, and he was further stimulated to engage in preaching by the visit of the celebrated Charles Simeon, of King's college, Cambridge, whom, in 1796, he accompanied in a tour from Airthrey through a considerable part of the Highlands Mr Simeon, in his journal, relates that, a short time before their tour ended, they ascended together to the top of Benlomond, and there, impressed by the grandeur of the surrounding scenery, kneeled down and solemnly consecrated their future lives to the service of Almighty God

His brother, Mr Robert Haldane, had in early life a decided inclination towards the ministry of the Church of Scotland, but his guardians had dissuaded him from following it out In 1780 he entered the navy, joining the Monarch ship of war under his uncle, Admiral Duncan, from which ship he was shortly transferred to the Foudroyant, in which he evinced signal proofs of naval skill and intrepidity in the action with the Pegasé, under Admiral Jervis, afterwards Earl St Vincent, and also when the vessel formed part of the fleet of Earl Howe in his successful expedition to Gibraltar On the peace of 1783 he retired from the navy, and after residing for some time at Gosport, enjoying the intercourse of his friend Dr Bogue, an eminent clergyman of the Independent persuasion, he became a student in the university of Edinburgh before the close of the ensuing year For two sessions he divided his time between studying at college and travelling on the Continent, and having married in 1785, he settled at Airthrey in the autumn of that year Shortly after his brother James Haldane's devotion of himself to the service of God, being determined to dedicate his life, talents, and property to the diffusion of the gospel in India, Robert sold his beautiful and romantic estate of Airthrey to the late General Sir Robert Abercromby, and applied to Government and the East India Company for permission to go to Bengal with three Presbyterian clergymen—the Rev Dr Bogue of Gosport

the Rev Dr Innes, then minister of Stirling and chaplain to the castle, and the Rev Greville Ewing, assistant to Dr. Jones of Lady Glenorchy's church, Edinburgh Mr Haldane was to have defrayed all the expenses of this mission, which included several catechists, or Scripture readers, and he also became bound to pay to each of his three principal associates £3,500, in order to secure their worldly independence This benevolent design was frustrated by the refusal of the East India Company to sanction it, and both Mr Robert Haldane and his brother James thereupon resolved to devote themselves to propagating the gospel at home

Mr James Haldane preached his first sermon on the 6th May 1797, at the school-house of Gilmerton, near Edinburgh, then a very neglected spot, and inhabited chiefly by colliers Several laymen, invited by a pious tradesman in the village, had previously preached there—especially the excellent Mr Aikman, a gentleman of independent fortune, whose time and means, like those of Mr Haldane, were given to the advancement of the gospel The well-known Dr Stuart of Dunearn was present at Mr Haldane's first sermon, and was so struck with it, that he pronounced him to be indeed a "Boanerges" Subsequently Mr Haldane attracted great attention, preaching on Sunday evening with great earnestness in the open air to thousands on the Calton Hill, in Bruntsfield Links, or in the King's Park, Edinburgh

In the summer of 1797, he made a very extensive tour, in company with his friends Mr Aikman and Mr Rate, through the northern counties of Scotland and the Orkney Isles This tour, partly from the novelty of lay preaching, and partly from the previous lethargy of the times, produced a great sensation The common people thronged in crowds to hear, and whilst much good was effected, not a little opposition was awakened in some quarters At Aberdeen the town drummer was fined a guinea for intimating a sermon by Mr Haldane in the College Close, but the preacher sent him the money, that he might be no loser On a subsequent occasion he preached in the streets of Aberdeen on a Sabbath evening, and next morning, one of his hearers was found dead, on his knees, in the attitude of prayer In the following summer the celebrated Rowland Hill visited Scotland with the view of preaching In his published journal there is a graphic description of his first interview with Mr James Haldane He had arrived at Langholm, where he met Mr Haldane, accompanied by Mr. Aikman, who were on a preaching tour through the south of Scotland "These gentlemen," says Mr Hill, "were then unknown to me I was told, but in very candid language, their errand and design, that it was a marvellous circumstance—quite a phenomenon—that an East India captain—a gentleman of good family and connection—should turn out an itinerant preacher, that he should travel from town to town, and all against his own interest and character This information was enough for me I immediately sought out the itinerants When I inquired for them of the landlady of the inn, she told me she supposed I meant the two priests who were at her house, but she could not satisfy me what religion they were of The two priests, however, and myself soon met, and, to our mutual satisfaction, passed the evening together"

The same system of preaching tours was carried on for a succession of years, in conjunction with Mr Aikman, Mr Innes, Mr John Campbell, afterwards well known as a missionary and traveller in Africa, and others, till the gospel had been thus proclaimed not only in every part of the mainland, from the north to the south, but also in the Orkney and Shetland islands, where the most striking effects were produced The two brothers were among those who, in December 1797, established in Edinburgh 'The Society for Propagating the Gospel at Home,' and they formed two of the first committee of twelve directors, all of whom were laymen, and nine of them engaged in business

Up to this period neither of the Messrs. Haldane had left the Church of Scotland, but the visits of Mr Simeon and Mr Rowland Hill, and, above all, the excitement produced throughout the country by the itinerants, induced the General Assembly to issue 'a Pastoral Admonition,' warning the people against strange preachers, and prohibiting Episcopalians or other strangers from occupying the pulpits of the Scottish church

Hitherto preaching in Edinburgh had been conducted in the Circus in Leith Street, so as not to interfere with the hours of public worship in the city churches; but after the pastoral admonition, the brothers Haldane, with Mr Aikman, several ministers, and many of their lay friends, seceded from the establishment. Mr Robert Haldane, at an expense of £30,000, erected or purchased large places of worship in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Perth, Dunkeld, Dumfries, Elgin, and several other places in Scotland Mr James Haldane undertook to officiate in a newly erected chapel in Leith Walk, called after Mr Whitfield's places of worship, a Tabernacle But he stipulated that this should not interfere with his labours as an itinerant preacher "in the high-ways and hedges" His ordination took place on Sunday, 3d February 1799

In 1798, Mr Robert Haldane had accompanied Mr Rowland Hill in a preaching tour through Scotland, and subsequently into Gloucestershire and during his journey, besides resolving upon the erection of these places of worship, he conceived the idea of educating a number of pious young men for the ministry unconnected with any church In following out this project he established theological seminaries in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee Elgin, Granton in Strathspey, Gosport, &c, under Messrs Ewing, Innes, Aikman, John Campbell, Cowie Ballantyne, Macintosh, Dr Bogue, &c, and expended large sums of money, the students being all maintained at his expense, both married and unmarried The number thus trained for the preaching of the gospel amounted to about four hundred, amongst whom were some who in their after career acquired considerable eminence, such as, Dr Russell of Dundee, Principal Dewar of Aberdeen, Mr John Angell James of Birmingham, Mr Orme of Camberwell, Mr Maclay of New York, and others He also undertook to defray the expenses of bringing over to England, and educating in the principles of Christianity, a number of African children from Sierra Leone, with the view of sending them back to their own land to act as missionaries among their countrymen, a scheme which originated with Mr John Campbell Twenty boys and four girls were accordingly brought to England by Governor Zachary Macaulay, in June 1799, but as that gentleman objected to their education being under the sole management of Mr. Haldane,—who had taken the lease of a house and prepared it for their reception in the King's Park, Edinburgh, afterwards used for the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and immortalised by Sir Walter Scott in the Heart of Mid Lothian, as that of the laird of Dumbiedykes —he declined to act under a committee, and the children were educated by funds provided in London

The establishment of churches on the Congregational plan gave great offence to many of the friends of the two brothers, and their motives were often questioned, while their objects and character were exposed to much unmerited obloquy and misrepresentation The pastoral admonition of the General Assembly of the Established church, passed in 1799 against vagrant teachers and Sunday schools, already referred to, was not the only ecclesiastical attempt which was made to crush the itinerating preachers In 1796 the General Associate Synod had passed a Resolution against the constitution of missionary societies, and testified against co-operating with persons in religious matters not of their communion The Cameronians at Glasgow, and the Relief Synod also prohibited any of their members or ministers from countenancing them, or giving them the use of their pulpits The Antiburgher Synod, in 1799, even went so far as to depose the Rev George Cowie of Huntly, one of their most eminent ministers, for attending the sermons of the so called missionary preachers Of Mr James A Haldane, Mr Cowie declared that "he carried his credentials as a preacher with him" Previous to 1800, Mr J A Haldane had preached the gospel, says his biographer, "in every part of Scotland, and abundantly distributed religious tracts, from the Solway Frith in the south round about to the Tweed, and thence beyond Caithness and the clustering Orkneys and Shetlands even to the Ultima Thule of the Romans He had also skirted the fastnesses of the Highlands from Dunkeld to Sutherland, but had felt the difference of language an obstacle to his progress in those districts" During the panic in this country produced by the French Revolution, party spirit ran high in Scotland, and in the excitement of the times the two brothers, but especially Mr Robert Haldane, were charged with holding levelling and revolutionary opinions So persevering and reiterated were these attacks, that in 1800 the latter found himself compelled, in self-vindication, to publish a narrative of his proceedings with, a statement of his principles, in a pamphlet, which had an extensive circulation, entitled, 'Address to the Public, by Robert Haldane, concerning Political Opinions, and the plans lately adopted to promote Religion in Scotland' This publication was well-timed, and proved very useful in silencing the calumnies which had been circulated regarding his views and designs, and particularly it was thought to be instrumental in putting a stop to a proposed measure of Mr Pitt, then prime minister, for the suppression of unlicensed preaching and the punishment of lay-preachers

In June 1800 Mr James Haldane entered upon a new preaching tour, his fourth, accompanied by Mr Campbell This time their journey extended to Arran and Kintyre At Ayr, two years before, he had met with strong opposition from the magistrates, at North Berwick he had also experienced some obstruction, as had been the case at Aberdeen, as already related At Kintyre, on this occasion, he and Mr Campbell were both arrested at a place not far from Campbelton, for preaching in the open air The gentleman who made himself most conspicuous in their arrest was a major in the army, the heir to a baronetcy They were conducted under the escort of a sergeant and a party of volunteers, thirty miles to the residence of the sheriff of Argyle, spending a night on the road in custody at Lochgilphead After some conversation the sheriff ordered them to be set at liberty, thus admitting the lawfulness of field-preaching, and, on their return the same route, they preached at all the villages where they had been previously expected, when the people flocked in crowds to hear them Their arrest had excited much interest in the district, and on this occasion Mr Haldane preached with more than his usual power For the work of an itinerating preacher he was peculiarly fitted, especially where he had to contend with opposition "The habits he had acquired at sea," says Dr Lindsay Alexander, in the funeral sermon which he preached on his death in February 1851, "in battling with the elements and with the untamed energy of rude and fearless men, stood him in good stead when called to contend for liberty of speech and worship, in opposition to the bigoted and tyrannical measures of those who would fain have swallowed up alive the authors of the new system He was not a man to quail before priestly intolerance or magisterial frowns Dignified in manner, commanding in speech, fearless in courage, unhesitating in action, he everywhere met the rising storm with the boldness of a British sailor and the courtesy of a British gentleman, as well as with the uprightness and the unoffensiveness of a true Christian To the brethren who were associated with him, he was a pillar of strength in the hour of trial, while, upon those who sought to put down their efforts by force or ridicule, it is hard to say whether the manly dignity of his bearing or the blameless purity of his conduct produced the more powerful effect in paralysing their opposition, when he did not succeed in winning their applause"

Mr Robert Haldane also engaged in field-preaching, but not so extensively as his brother, who, in September 1801, crossed over to Ireland, and preached to crowded congregations in various parts of Ulster On the death of his second child, a little girl under six years old, on 5th June 1802, Mr James Haldane published an interesting little memoir, entitled 'Early Instruction recommended, in a Narrative of Catherine Haldane, with an address to Parents on the Importance of Religion' He afterwards again visited Ireland on a preaching excursion, and in 1805 made a second tour into Breadalbane, extending it this time as far as Caithness, which was the last of his long itinerating tours From this period till his death he was never absent long from his congregation in Edinburgh About 1808, various discussions which had arisen relative to church order, apostolic practice, and baptism, led to a rupture in the Tabernacle church, and Mr James Haldane, who had adopted Baptist sentiments, was deserted by some who had till then been his colleagues In consequence of a dispute with Mr Greville Ewing, styled "the father of Congregationalism in Scotland," relative to the Tabernacle in Glasgow, built by Mr Robert Haldane for that gentleman, the latter also, in 1811, left the new connexion, and Mr Haldane published two pamphlets explanatory of the transactions between them [See memoir of the Rev GREVILLE EWING, p 183]

Towards the end of 1809 Mr Robert Haldane had bought the estate of Auchingray, in Lanarkshire, as a country residence In the summer of 1816 he entered upon a missionary tour on the continent, and his name thenceforth became connected with the revival of vital Christianity in France and Switzerland In Geneva particularly, by his conversational meetings with the theological students, he was enabled to lead them to right views of the great doctrines of the gospel, a cold and dry Socinianism being all that at that period was taught in their divinity course The Rev Dr Cæsar Malan, Dr Merle D'Aubigne, the author of the History of the Reformation, and other eminent ministers, were among his converts while at Geneva In the following year he went to Montauban, on the Tarn, the centre of education for the Protestants of the Reformed church in France, where he resided for two years, and was also the means of effecting much good among the ministers and students of theology in that place A translation of his 'Evidences of Christianity,' and his 'Commentary on the Romans,' in French, were published at Montauban, while he was there, the latter in two volumes 8vo, and copies distributed all over France and Switzerland For long after, each student of divinity, on leaving college at Montauban, received a copy of the Commentary out of a stock left for the purpose From his residence at Geneva and Montauban originated the establishment of the Continental Society, an active auxiliary of which was, mainly through his influence, founded at Edinburgh in the spring of 1821 It was formed on the model of his own original association in Scotland for propagating the gospel at home At the end of 1824, he was the originator of the Bible Society controversy, in which Dr Andrew Thomson of St. George's church, Edinburgh, took such a prominent part, and published various pamphlets against the circulation of the Apocrypha with the Bible by the British and Foreign Bible Society This controversy lasted nearly twelve years, and led to the purification of the Society and to the circulation of the pure Word of God without any intermixture. His last labours were bestowed on a careful revision of his 'Exposition of the Romans,' which was published in 1842, with a valuable treatise on the 'Testimony of the Word of God, with regard to the state of the Heathen destitute of the Gospel.' He died 12th December 1842, in his 79th year, and was buried within one of the aisles of the old cathedral of Glasgow No portrait of him exists He had married in April 1786, Katherine Cochrane Oswald, second daughter of George Oswald of Scotstown, by whom he had a daughter, Margaret

His brother, Mr James Haldane, survived him nine years His labours and itinerancies had been the means of awakening thousands to concern for their eternal welfare, of which there were many testimonies Dr Andrew Thomson of St George's (of whom a memoir is afterwards given in its place) remarked, that in examining candidates for admission he found a greater number of instances of awakenings attributed to the preaching of Mr James Haldane than to any other preacher in Edinburgh For five years he conducted 'The Scripture Magazine,' the chief object of which was to establish the grand truths of the gospel, and, amongst other valuable essays from his pen, and 'Notes on Scripture,' it contains a series of articles which he once thought of collecting into a volume, under the title of the 'Revelation of Mercy' This design he never accomplished, but he published, in 1818, a valuable little tract, 'The Revelation of God's Righteousness,' embodying an epitome of his views Like his brother, he condemned the erroneous doctrines enunciated by the Rev Edward Irving, and published a "Refutation" of them He subsequently published a treatise on the Atonement On the completion of the fiftieth year of his pastoral office, on 3d February 1849, a jubilee meeting was held, on 12th April thereafter, which was very gratifying to him This eminent servant of the Lord died on 8th February 1851, in his 84th year From a portrait of him, by Colvin Smith, prefixed to Memoirs of Robert and James A. Haldane by their nephew, Alexander Haldane, Esq, Barrister in law, (published in 1852) the following woodcut is taken

He was twice married His first wife, whom he married immediately after his appointment as captain of the Melville Castle, was Mary, only daughter of Alexander Jonas, Esq of Collelnwart, Banffshire, by Elizabeth, eldest sister of the celebrated Sir Ralph Abercromby By this lady he had three sons and six daughters She died 27th February 1819, and he married a second time, 23d April, 1822, Margaret, daughter of Dr Daniel Rutherford, professor of botany in the university of Edinburgh, the maternal uncle of Sir Walter Scott, and by her he had three sons and three daughters.

It may be said of both the brothers Haldane, as has been well remarked by the writer of one of their obituary notices, that in all their undertakings for the promotion of religion at home, they proceeded hand in hand. Although each was distinguished by a determined will, and strong adherence to his own views of duty, there was between them a remarkable harmony of design and oneness of spirit, and never, during their long and honourable course of mutual co-operation, was there one jarring feeling to distract their zeal for the common object which they steadily pursued That object was the glory of Christ and the salvation of their fellow-men, and from the moment they undertook to devote their lives to labour in the gospel, there was no looking back to the gay world which they had left. Wealth, honour, worldly renown and reputation, were all forsaken, nor did the seducing hope of earning a name and a place in the Christian world ever tempt their ambition In the matter of personal sacrifice, the one abandoned a beautiful estate, with its natural accompaniments of worldly position and influence the other relinquished an honourable and lucrative post, with the certain prospect of fortune Each dedicated intellectual talents of no common order to the same cause the one by his preaching, but much more by his writings, the other by his writings, but much more by his preaching, taught and vindicated the same truths While the elder brother was expending thousands and tens of thousands of pounds in the education of missionaries and preachers—in the erection of chapels, and in the circulation of the Scriptures—the other was, at his own cost, travelling through the destitute parts of Scotland, and the north of Ireland, preaching the gospel to listening multitudes, and afterwards, for more than half a century, discharging without emolument, or the shadow of worldly recompense, the daily duties of a minister

HALES, ALES, or ALESSE, ALEXANDER, a celebrated theologian and divine of the confession of Augsburg, was born in Edinburgh, 28th April, 1500, and was at first a canon in the cathedral of St Andrews He early entered into the controversy against Luther, and also had a dispute with Patrick Hamilton, the martyr, whose constancy at the stake, however, induced him to entertain doubts as to the Popish creed, and on the change in his sentiments becoming known, he was obliged to fly into Germany, where he became a Protestant In 1535 he went to London, and was held in high esteem by Henry the Eighth, Cranmer, Latimer, and other Reformers In 1540 he was appointed by the elector of Brandenburg, professor of divinity at Frankfort In 1542 he went to Leipsic, where he held the same situation He died in 1565 He wrote a number of theological and controversial works, of which a list is subjoined He also wrote a description in Latin of Edinburgh in his time, which is of great interest as giving a clear and accurate account of the Scottish capital in the middle of the sixteenth century Of the Cowgate he says, "Infiniti viculi, qui omnes excelsis sunt ornati aedibus, sicut et Via Vaccarum, in qua habitant patricii et senatores urbis, et in qua sunt principum regni palatia, ubi nihil est humile aut rusticum, sed omnia magnifica" [Boundless streets, which are all ornamented by lofty houses, such as the Cowgate, in which reside the nobles and senators of the city, and in which are the principal palaces of the kingdom, where nothing is humble or homely, but all is magnificent] What a contrast to this does the Cowgate present in our day! It is now one of the meanest and dirtiest of all the streets of the Scottish metropolis Alesse's description of Edinburgh is illustrated by the oldest and most valuable map of the ancient capital in existence, a facsimile of which is given in the first volume of the Bannatyne Miscellany The original map is preserved in the British Museum

HALKERSTON, a surname, originally Hawkerton, derived from lands in the Mearns held by the king's Falconer, and so called from his office, having charge of the king's hawks. See art. FALCONER, p. 187

HALKET, a surname generally considered to be derived from the lands of Halkhead in Renfrewshire. In ancient writings, however, it is spelled Haket, Hacat, and Hacet, and a family of a different name have always been in possession of the estate so called. The Halkets of Pitfirrane in Dunfermline parish, were settled in Fifeshire before the fourteenth century In the reign of David the Second, David de Halket was proprietor of the lands of Lumphennans and Ballingall in that county He was the father of Philip de Halket, who lived in the reigns of Kings Robert the Second and Third and acquired the third part of the lands of Pitfirrane from his cousin, William Scott of Balwearv, in 1399 His eldest son, Robert de Halket, was, in 1372, appointed sheriff of Kinross-shire for life. The sheriff's son, David, the first of the family that can be traced with the designation of Pitfirrane, is mentioned as early as 8d June 1404 He had two sons James, his successor, and William, who, by his marriage with Janet, daughter and coheiress of Walter Fenton of Balry in Forfarshire, became the progenitor of the Halkets of the north His grandson, Sir William Halket, received in 1472, a charter under the great seal, of the lands of Peternothy In 1478, there is a commission by King James the Third to William Halket of Basset, appointing him justice-clerk, during life, north of the river Forth, and within the lordship of Galloway, Arran, and Cowell, but there is no certainty that he was of this family

Sir William's direct descendant, in the reign of Queen Mary, George Halket of Pitfirrane, had three sons. Robert, the eldest, succeeded him, John, the second, was knighted by King James the Sixth, and entering the army of the States of Holland, rose to the rank of colonel. He had the command of a Scots regiment in the Dutch service, and was likewise president of the grand court marischal in Holland. He was the ancestor of the Halketts in Holland, represented by Charles Craigie Halkett of Hallhill and Dumbarnie, Fifeshire. Of the Holland branch was Charles Halkett, who died at his house near the Hague, 16th October 1758, in his 75th year, being then a lieutenant-general, and colonel of one of the Scots regiments in the Dutch service Appointed an ensign in 1700, he was wounded at the battle of Ramillies in 1706, in which battle also his father, then lieutenant-colonel of Colyear's regiment, received a dangerous wound, and died at Liege. From this branch also descended Major-general Frederick Halket, who had two sons, who both distinguished themselves in the army, namely, General Sir Colin Halket, K C B, and G C H, who received a cross for his services as colonel in command of a brigade of the German legion at Albuera, Salamanca, Vittoria, and Nive, and was severely wounded at Waterloo, and General Hugh Halket of the Hanoverian service. Patrick, the third son of George Halket of Pitfirrane, above mentioned, was progenitor of the Halkets of Moxhill in Warwickshire

The eldest son, Sir Robert Halket of Pitfirrane, also knighted by King James the Sixth, was served heir to his father in 1595 His eldest son, Sir James Halket of Pitfirrane, appears to have been deeply engaged with the Covenanters in the reign of King Charles the First. In 1649 he was elected M P for Fifeshire, and about the same time was employed to examine into the state of the fortifications on the small rocky island of Inchgarvie in the Frith of Forth, nearly opposite his own property He subsequently raised a regiment of horse, of which he was appointed colonel. He was twice married first, to a daughter of Sir Robert Montgomery of Skelmorly, by whom he had a son and two daughters, and, secondly, to Anne, daughter of Mr Thomas Murray of the family of Woodend, and by her had four children Of this lady, styled, in the courtesy of her day, Lady Anne Halket, and celebrated for her learning, a memoir follows.

The son, Sir Charles Halket of Pitfirrane, was created a baronet 25th January, 1662 At the Revolution, being then burgess of Dunfermline, he was a member of the famous convention parliament which declared that James the Seventh had forfeited the crown, and in 1689 he was one of the commissioners appointed by the convention to treat of a union with England. On the rising of the Viscount Dundee on behalf of the exiled monarch, Sir Charles put himself at the head of his friends in the counties of Fife and Kinross, on the side of the government, but the death of that nobleman at Killiecrankie, soon after, rendered farther active proceedings unnecessary His son, Sir James Halket, second baronet, died without issue in March 1705, and in him ended the male line of the Halkets of Pitfirrane. The baronetcy, in consequence, became extinct He had six sisters, the second of whom, Elizabeth, married Sir Henry Wardlaw of Pitreavie, baronet, and was the authoress of the popular ballad of 'Hardyknute' Janet the eldest, who succeeded to the estates, married Sir Peter Wedderburne of Gosford, who had been created a baronet in 1697 He was the eldest son of Sir Peter Wedderburne, a lord of session under the title of Lord Gosford. In consequence of this marriage he and his descendants inheriting Pitfirrane were obliged to take the name and arms of Halket. He had four sons and three daughters. The eldest of his sons, Sir Peter Halket, second baronet of Gosford, was member for the Dunfermline burghs in the parliament of 1784 He was lieutenant-colonel of Lee's regiment at the battle of Preston or Gladsmuir, where Sir John Cope was defeated, in 1745, and was taken prisoner by the rebels, but dismissed on his parole. In February 1746 he was commanded by the duke of Cumberland to rejoin his regiment, on the threat that his commission would be forfeited, but with four other officers, he refused, and their reply, that "his royal highness was master of their commissions but not of their honour," was approved by government. In 1754, Sir Peter embarked for America, in command of the 44th regiment, and was killed, with his youngest son, James, a lieutenant in the same regiment, in General Braddick's defeat by the Indians near the river Monongahela, 9th July, 1755, on the first expedition against Fort de Quesne He had three sons. Peter, the eldest, third baronet, died unmarried in 1779 Francis, the second son, major in the Black Watch, had died in 1760, also unmarried, and James, above mentioned. The fourth baronet was Sir John Wedderburne of Gosford, cousin of the third baronet, and son of Charles, the second son of the first baronet. On succeeding to the title and estate of Pitfirrane, he assumed the name of Halket, the estate of Gosford devolving on a younger brother, whose daughter and heiress sold it in 1781, and it is become the property of the earl of Wemyss. The lands of Pitfirrane were valuable principally for the coals produced there, and the family had the right of exporting them to foreign countries free of duty, by the small seaport of Limekilns, belonging to them. The original privilege was renewed by Queen Anne, December 21, 1706, and ratified by parliament March 21, 1707, but in 1788 it was purchased by government for £40 000 sterling, when the property that could injure the revenue was nearly exhausted Sir John died August 7, 1798. He was twice married. By his 1st wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew Fletcher of Salton lord-justice-clerk, he had a daughter, Elizabeth, who married the Marquis Lally Tolendal, peer of France. By his 2d wife, Mary, daughter of Hon John Hamilton, he had, with 7 daughters, 6 sons, 1st, Charles, who succeeded him, 2d, Peter, admiral of the Red; 3d John, governor of the Bahamas, and first commissioner for West Indian affairs, 4th, Sir Alexander, K.C H, a general in the army The latter served at the capture of the French West India Islands in 1794 at St. Domingo till 1796, and was aide-de-camp to Sir Ralph Abercromby at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope in 1804 He died in 1851

The eldest son Sir Charles, 5th baronet, on his death, January 26, 1837 was succeeded by his brother, Admiral Sir Peter, 6th baronet, who died in October 1839 With two drs, he had a son, Sir John Halket, 7th baronet, commander R.N Sir John died Aug. 4, 1849, leaving 3 sons and 2 drs.

The eldest son Sir Peter Arthur Halket of Pitfirrane, 8th baronet, born May 1, 1834, at one time captain 42d Royal Highlanders, exchanged to 3d light dragoons in 1856, a deputy lieutenant of Fifeshire, 1859 He m., in 1856, eldest daughter of Capt. R. Kirwan Hill, 52d Foot, issue a son, Wedderburn Conway, born in 1857, and 3 daughters. Sir Peter served throughout the whole of the Crimean war and carried the queen's colour of the 42d at the battle of the Alma.

The popular ballad of 'Logie of Buchan,' was composed by one George Halket, a schoolmaster at Rathen, in Aberdeenshire, in 1736 and 1737 He was also the author of the well-known Jacobite song of 'Whirry Whigs awa, man,' although he fathered it on one William Jack He died in 1756

HALKET, LADY ANNE, celebrated for her learning and piety, born in London, January 4, 1622, was the daughter of Robert Murray, Esq, of the family of Tullibardine, preceptor to Charles I when a boy, and afterwards provost of Eton college, by his wife, Jane Drummond, allied to the noble family of Perth, governess to the duke of Gloucester and the princess Elizabeth Though London was the place of her birth, her origin, descent, connections, and education were Scottish She was instructed in every polite accomplishment, and next to divinity, she took great delight in the studies of physic and surgery, to which she was at first led by her charitable disposition In the latter she acquired great skill, and performed many cures, so that persons came or sent to her from all parts of England and Scotland, and even from the Continent It was, however, chiefly the poor that she assisted with her advice. On the imprisonment of King Charles, she aided in the escape of the duke of York to the Continent, making the clothes for his disguise, &c., for which, and her known loyalty, after the execution of the king, she was obliged to retire to Scotland, when she resided for some time with the earl and countess of Dunfermline at Dunfermline When Charles the Second arrived in Scotland in 1650, she had the honour of kissing his majesty's hand at Dunfermline On this occasion he thanked her for the service done to his brother, and told her if he ever came to command what he had a right to, there should be nothing in his power he would not do for her At this time he was profuse in promises, which were never fated to be fulfilled After the battle of Dunbar she accompanied the countess to Kinross, where she attended about sixty wounded soldiers, dressing their wounds, and giving them all the attention of a regular surgeon On subsequently going to Perth with the countess, the king, on being informed of what she had done, expressed his thanks to her for her charitable offices, and gave orders for appointing surgeons to several towns, and when he arrived at Aberdeen, he commanded fifty pieces to be sent to her She and the countess afterwards returned to Fife, where she remained for two years While there, she also attended some of Cromwell's soldiers, and availed herself of the opportunity to exhort them to return to their allegiance to their rightful sovereign On March 2, 1656, she married at London, Sir James Halket, of Pitfirrane, to whom she had four children, who all died young, except one, named Robert While pregnant with her first child, being apprehensive that she would die in childbirth, she wrote an excellent little tract, entitled 'The Mother's Will to her Unborn Child'

On the death of Charles the First, she had been deprived of her interest, to the value of £412 sterling yearly, in Barhamstead, a house and park of the king, of which her mother had a lease, having paid a fine for it to the Exchequer, and which had been left to her and her brother, for twelve years of the lease unexpired She had also received from her mother a bond for £2,000 of the earl of Kinnoul's, on which she had raised proceed-

ngs, but during the commonwealth, her "malignancy," as adherence to the cause of the king was styled, operated against her obtaining justice On the restoration she made application to the king for some compensation for the losses she had sustained, but though she received flattering expressions of kindness and favour from Charles and the duke of York, she was not successful in anything she petitioned for After long attendance and many disappointments, all that she at length obtained was £500 out of the Exchequer, and £50 from the duke as a gift to one of her children born in London at this time After her husband's death in 1671, she removed to a house she had taken at Dunfermline, where she spent the remainder of her life As her lawsuit and her unbounded charities had involved her in debt, she was obliged, in her latter years, to take the charge of the children of several persons of rank, who were sent to her house to be educated, among them was the son of the lord-advocate of Charles II, Sir George Mackenzie In 1685, through the influence of the earl of Perth, then chancellor, she received from the king a pension of £100 a-year Her son, Robert, an officer in the army, died in Holland in 1692 She herself survived her husband 28 years, and died, April 22, 1699 She left no fewer than 21 MS volumes, all on religious and spiritual subjects, namely, 5 in folio, 15 in 4to, and only one in 8vo Of these, her Meditations on the 25th Psalm, Meditations and Prayers, upon the First Week, with Observations on each day of the Creation, and Instruction for Youth, were published at Edinburgh in 1701

HALL, a border surname, (from a manor-house, or place where courts were held), and common both to England and Scotland

A family of this name holds the lands of Dunglass in East Lothian, and possesses a baronetcy, conferred, Oct. 8, 1687, on John Hall of Dunglass. This gentleman m., 1st, Anne, dr of Sir Patrick Hume, 8th baron of Polwarth, without issue, 2dly, Margaret, dr of George Fleming, Esq, of Kilconber, with issue. His eldest son, Sir James, 2d baronet, was also twice married, 1st, to Lady Anne Hume, dr of the earl of Marchmont, and, 2dly, to Margaret, dr of Sir John Pringle, of Stitchel, baronet, dying in 1742, he left, with other children, a son, Sir John, 3d baronet, who was one of the jury for the trial of the rebels at Edinburgh 1748. On his death July 3, 1776, he was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir James, 4th baronet, distinguished for his writings on architecture and the sciences, of whom a memoir is given at p. 409 in larger type. His eldest son, Sir John, 5th baronet, succeeded June 23, 1832 Of his second son, Captain Basil Hall, R.N, a memoir also follows. Sir John died April 2, 1860, when his son, Sir James, born in 1824, became 6th baronet.

HALL, HENRY, of Haugh-head, a devoted adherent of the Covenant, rendered himself conspicuous after the year 1661, by the countenance which he gave to the persecuted preachers, and by his own zeal for the gospel His estate lay in the parish of Eckford in Teviotdale, and he hesitated not to give his ground for field-preaching when few else would venture to do so He had an active part in most of the transactions of the Covenanters, and was one of the commanding officers in their army from the skirmish at Drumclog, to the defeat at Bothwell Bridge, in June 1679 He afterwards escaped to Holland, but soon returned home, and lurked, chiefly in company of Mr Cargill, in Fifeshire, and in the neighbourhood of Queensferry, where they were surprised by Middleton, governor of Blackness castle, on the 3d June 1680, when his brave resistance secured the escape of Cargill, but he was himself mortally wounded in the struggle that ensued and died in his way to Edinburgh, a prisoner Upon him was found a rude draught of an unsubscribed paper, afterwards called the "Queensferry Paper," from the place where it was seized, which is inserted in the Appendix to Wodrow's History

HALL, SIR JAMES, Bart, of Dunglass, eminent for his attainments in geological and chemical science, and author of a popular work on Gothic Architecture, was the eldest son of Sir John, the third baronet, by Magdalen, daughter of Sir Robert Pringle of Stitchell, Berwickshire, and was born at Dunglass in East Lothian, January 17, 1761 He succeeded, on his father's death, to the baronetcy, July 3, 1776 After studying for some years at Christ's college, Cambridge, he proceeded, with his tutor, on a tour to the Continent, and on his return to Edinburgh, attended some of the classes in the university of that city In 1782 he again visited the Continent, where he remained for more than three years At the military academy for young noblemen formerly existing at Brienne in France, he was the fellow-student of the Emperor Napoleon, and as the latter declared to his son, Captain Basil Hall, at St Helena, he was the first native of Great Britain whom he recollected to have seen On his return to Scotland, he devoted himself to geological investigations, and particularly distinguished himself by his experiments to illustrate Dr Hutton's Theory of the Earth, especially with reference to the fusion of stony substances, whereby he established the identity of the composition of whinstone and lava. He likewise ascertained that carbonate of lime, as common marble, might be fused without decomposition, if subjected to a degree of pressure equal to that of the water of the sea at the depth of about a mile and a half from the surface The result of his inquiries, which tended to establish the truth of the igneous origin of minerals, and to vindicate the authority of Dr James Hutton, in opposition to the theory of Werner, he embodied in an elaborate paper, which was read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which he was president, in 1806, and published in their Transactions, as were also several other valuable contributions from his pen

In 1808 Sir James was returned to parliament for the borough of St Michael's, in Cornwall, but after the dissolution of 1812 he did not again offer himself as a candidate He died at Edinburgh, after a long illness, June 23, 1832 He married, November 10, 1786, Lady Helena Douglas, second daughter of Dunbar, third earl of Selkirk, by whom he had three sons and three daughters

HALL, Basil, Captain, R.N , an eminent traveller and author of various works, second son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh in 1788 He entered the royal navy in 1802, and in 1808 received his first commission as lieutenant. In 1813, when acting commander of the Theban on the East India station, he accompanied Sir Samuel Hood, the admiral, in a journey over the greater part of the island of Java. The following year he was promoted to the rank of commander, and in 1817 to that of post-captain Having been appointed to the command of the Lyra, a small gun-brig, he accompanied the expedition which, in the year 1816, took out Lord Amherst as ambassador to China. On this occasion he visited the places of greatest interest in the adjacent seas, and on his return to England, he published 'A Voyage of Discovery to the Western Coast of Corea and the great Loo-Choo Island in the Japan Sea,' which, from the interesting nature of its contents, excited great attention In 1827 it formed the first volume of Constable's Miscellany, and in this edition Captain Hall gave an interesting account of his interview with the exiled emperor Napoleon at St Helena, when the conversation chiefly related to Loo-Choo and its inhabitants

He was next employed on the South American station in command of the Conway The Spanish colonies of South America were then in the midst of their struggle for independence , and on his return to England in 1823, he published Extracts from his Journal, written while on that station Captain Hall omitted no opportunity of 'taking' notes' wherever he went, with the view of publication An instance of this practice, somewhat obtrusively displayed, is mentioned in Lockhart's Life of Scott, on occasion of his visiting Abbotsford at Christmas 1824 "One of the guests," says Lockhart, "was Captain Basil Hall, always an agreeable one , a traveller and a savant, full of stories and theories, inexhaustible in spirits, curiosity, and enthusiasm Sir Walter was surprised and a little annoyed on observing that the captain kept a notebook on his knee while at table, but made no remark." Various extracts from the Journal which he kept at Abbotsford are given in the Life of Scott by his son-in-law In 1825 he married Margaret, youngest daughter of Sir John Hunter, consul-general for Spain, and in April 1827, he and his wife and child sailed from Liverpool for the United States, where they remained above a year, during which period Captain Hall travelled nearly nine thousand miles The result of his travels he afterwards published In 1834 he met at Rome the countess Purgstall, a Scotch lady married to an Austrian nobleman, formerly

Miss Cranstoun, the sister of Mrs. Dugald Stewart, and of Lord Corehouse, a lord of session From her he accepted an invitation to visit her schloss or castle, near Gratz in Styria, and his work entitled 'Schloss Heinfeld, or a Winter in Lower Styria,' was the result of his notes during his residence there. It was a supposition of his that Die Vernon in Sir Walter Scott's romance of Rob Roy was sketched from this lady before she left Scotland He afterwards published an account of a visit to Madame de Purgstall, during the last moments of her life In the summer of 1831, when Sir Walter Scott's prostrated strength rendered a cessation of his literary labours necessary, and he was recommended to go to Italy for the improvement of his health, Captain Hall addressed a letter, unknown to him, to Sir James Graham, then first lord of the admiralty, suggesting that a government vessel should be placed at his disposal, and the Barham frigate being ordered for the purpose, Sir Walter embarked on board of her at Portsmouth on the 27th October of that year In his third series of 'Fragments of Voyages,' some interesting details are given of the great novelist's departure, Captain Hall having gone to Portsmouth to show him all the attention in his power

In 1842, Captain Hall was seized with mental aberration, when he was placed in the Royal Hospital, Haslar, Portsmouth, where he died, 11th September 1844, in his 56th year He was a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, and a member of the Astronomical Society of London —His works are

A Voyage of Discovery to the Western Coast of Corea, and the great Loo-Choo Island in the Japan Sea, with an Appendix, and a Vocabulary of the Loo-Choo Language, by H. J Clifford. London, 1818, 4to 2d edition, without Appendix and Vocabulary, 1820, Constable's Miscellany, 1st vol Edinburgh, 1827

Patchwork. London, 1841, 3 vols. 8vo. This, his last work, consists of detached papers, embracing recollections of foreign travel, incidents worked into short tales, and a few Essays.

To the Transactions of the Royal Society, he contributed An Account of the Geology of the Table Mountain and other parts of the peninsula of the Cape (1815 Vol. vii p. 269), Details of Experiments made with an invariable Pendulum in South America, and other Places, for determining the figure of the Earth, and Observations made on a Comet at Valparaiso.

Among his other Scientific papers are, A Sketch of the Professional and Scientific Objects which might be aimed at in a Voyage of Research, and A Letter on the Trade Winds, in the Appendix to Daniell's Meteorology, with contributions to Brewster's Journal, Jameson's Journal, and the Encyclopædia Britannica.

HALL, Robert, an eminent army surgeon, descended from the ancient family of the Halls of Haugh-head in Roxburghshire, was born there in 1763 He received his education at the grammar school of Jedburgh, and having duly qualified himself for the medical department of the navy, he sailed for the West Indies as surgeon's first mate of the Ruby, 74 At the conclusion of the war he returned to England, acting surgeon on board a frigate The solicitation of an uncle induced him to quit the service and to repair to Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M D He afterwards established his residence in London, and distinguished himself by contributing to several medical periodical works and editing others He subsequently entered the army as surgeon, in which capacity he served for nearly twelve years, after which he joined the expedition to the Niger, having been appointed to accompany the military division as the medical officer Unfortunately, an injury he received by an accidental fall into the hold of the vessel, while outward-bound, acted, in conjunction with the unhealthiness of the climate of Senegal, so strongly on his constitution, that, in the course of a few weeks, he was compelled to proceed to Madeira, as the only chance of preserving his life He afterwards returned to Europe, but his health was never fully re-established He died in 1824 He was the author of a great va riety of medical tracts, with various other papers inserted in the London medical and physical Journal, between the years 1800 and 1810 He likewise left behind him several useful manuscripts, among which are some valuable remarks on the Medical Topography of Senegal

HALLIDAY, a surname, from holiday, originally belonging to a border clan settled in Annandale, but for more than six centuries common on both sides of the Solway When a plundering excursion on the English border was determined upon, "a holiday" was the slogan or gathering cry of the Annandale mosstroopers, and the small hill where they were accustomed to assemble on such occasions, still retains the name of the "Halliday hill" The chieftain who first assumed, or to whom was first given, the surname of Halliday, had his castle or strong tower at Corehead, near the source of the river Annan, and about three miles from the village of Moffat, celebrated for its medicinal waters. In the time of the Crusades, of the five thousand men who were sent by William the Lion, under his brother the earl of Huntingdon, to the assistance of Richard the Lion-heart in Palestine, one thousand were from Annandale, and nearly all of them Hallidays. Several persons of this surname subsequently settled in England, chiefly, at first, in Wiltshire and Somersetshire. In 1485 Thomas Halliday of Pontefract commanded five hundred archers in Sir John Shirley's division of the English army at the battle of Agincourt. In 1470, Walter Halliday, called "The Minstrel," a younger son of the Annandale chieftain, was master of the Revels to Edward the Fourth It was no unusual thing for a mosstrooper to find his way at court. George Armstrong, of the same family as Willie Armstrong, hanged by King James the Fifth, was the celebrated court fool of King James the Sixth Walter the Minstrel was the first of the Hallidays of Rodborough in Gloucestershire, to which family the learned Baron Halliday belonged. In 1605, Sir Leonard Halliday (knighted by King James) was lord mayor of London The first chairman of the united East India Company was William Halliday, merchant and alderman of London, who died in 1628.

The direct Scottish line failed in the fifteenth century Walter the Minstrel's great-grandson, Theobald Halliday, married in Holland a Miss Hay, heiress of Tullibole, Fifeshire, only daughter of Colonel Hay, in the Dutch service, and at her death, their son, Sir John Halliday, inherited that estate. In the youthful days of James the Sixth, during the progress of the court from Stirling to Falkland, that monarch often slept at Tullibole house, midway on the journey, and, on one of these occasions, he is said to have knighted the laird. In 1722, Catherine Halliday, daughter and heiress of John Halliday of Tullibole, the descendant of this Sir John Halliday married the Rev Archibald Moncrieff, who obtained the estate of Tullibole in her right. Her great-grandson, Sir James Wellwood Moncrieff, bart. of Tullibole, a lord of session, died in 1851 (See MONCRIEFF, surname of). Sir John's 2d son, William Halliday, provost of Dumfries, and one of its representatives in parliament, had the honour of entertaining King James VI. at his house in that royal burgh, after his accession to the crown of England, on his last visit to Scotland. One of the provost's sons, Thomas Halliday, who had gone to England, returned in 1679, in the army of the duke of Monmouth, sent to suppress the Covenanters, but left the king's service on finding that all his kinsmen were on their side Among those who suffered in Galloway in the persecutions of the seventeenth century, were several of the name of Halliday, particularly David Halliday, portioner of Mayfield, who, on 21st February 1685, was, with Bell of Whitsands, and three others, surprised by Grierson of Lag on Kirkconnell Muir, parish of Tongland, and barbarously shot on the spot, 'without so much as allowing them to pray, though earnestly desired' [Wodrow's Hist. vol. iv p. 242]. Another David Halliday, once in Glengape, was also shot, on 11th July following. By his marriage with Miss Wright, an heiress of the Four Towns, Thomas Halliday acquired some property at Berngaw, Annandale, which became the title of the family His second son, Simon Halliday, acquired the lands of Whinnyng, on the banks of the Solway Frith, and his descendants still bear that designation.

William Halliday, the elder son of the provost of Dumfries, inherited Berngaw, and on his decease in 1745, he was succeeded by his son, Thomas Halliday of Berngaw, who married Margaret, daughter of Archibald Porteous, portioner of the Copewood. He died in 1804, leaving an only surviving son, Sir Andrew Halliday, a memoir of whom follows. Sir Andrew married Helen, daughter of Peter Carmichael, Esq, merchant in Edinburgh

Of the Galloway line of the family, were Mr Halliday of Chapmanton, and Dr Alexander Halliday of Calcutta. Dr Matthew Halliday, who, about the middle of the last century, distinguished himself as a physician at Moscow, and was one of the physicians of the Empress Catherine of Russia, was the son of Mr William Halliday, farmer at Lochbrow, parish of Johnstone, Dumfries-shire, who derived from a junior branch of the Corehead family that never left Annandale.

HALLIDAY, SIR ANDREW, an eminent physician, was born in Dumfries-shire in 1783 He was educated for the church, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the parish school of Duncow, Dumfries-shire He afterwards changed the clerical for the medical profession Like his dalesman and friend, Telford the engineer, he was of reduced parentage, though of good and ancient blood, being a descendant of that brave "Thom Halliday, my sister's son so dear," spoken of by the renowned Sir William Wallace. After finishing his studies, he travelled through Russia and Tartary, and subsequently settled at Halesworth, near Birmingham, where, having taken his degree of M D at Edinburgh, he for some time pursued the practice of medicine. He afterwards served on the staff of the army, both in Portugal and Spain, as surgeon to the forces, was at the assault of Bergen-op-Zoom, and at the battle of Waterloo He was subsequently appointed domestic physician to the duke of Clarence, and was knighted by George the Fourth shortly after his accession to the throne.

With the history and antiquities, the poetry and traditions of his native land, Sir Andrew was familiarly acquainted He possessed a vast fund of general information, with a fine taste in literature, and a love of science, as his 'History of the House of Hanover,' published in 1826, and his 'Account of the West India Islands,' which came out in 1837, sufficiently testify In November 1838 he was appointed inspector of army hospitals in the West Indies, from whence he returned in 1836 He had early turned his attention to the sad and neglected state of the insane poor in Great Britain and Ireland, with the benevolent view of leading to an amelioration of their condition, and his representations and communications to the public, and to persons in power, on the subject, some of which were anonymous, were so appalling, and found to be so true, that they procured the appointment of the select committee of the House of Commons of 1806-7 He died at Dumfries, September 7, 1839 He was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh and Göttingen, and a member of several other learned and scientific institutions —His works are HALYBURTON, a surname derived from lands of that name in Berwickshire These lands, Meikle and Little Halyburton, almost contiguous to each other, were at first called only Burton, or Burghton, but a chapel (a pendicle of the church of Greenlaw) being afterwards built at one of them, it was thence called Holy or Haly Burton. Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i p. 102) thinks that it was from a holy man named Burton that it had its name.

HALYBURTON of Dirleton, Lord, a title (forfeited in 1600) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1440, on Sir Walter Halyburton of Dirleton, a descendant of the first person who assumed the name of Halyburton from his lands. This was Walter, son of David, son of Tracte, who, under the designation of Walterus de Halyburton, confirmed a donation of his father made in 1176, of his church of Halyburton to the abbacy of Kelso. Walter's great-grandson, Sir Henry Halyburton, swore allegiance to King Edward the First, in 1296, for his lands in Berwickshire, and on 23d May 1308, he was one of the sureties for the liberation of Lamberton bishop of St. Andrews, then a prisoner in Windsor castle. His son, Sir Adam, had three sons Sir Walter, Sir John, and Alexander Sir Walter, the eldest son, was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham in 1346. He was first confined in the Tower of London, whence he was conveyed to the castle of Windsor, and had ten merks sterling allowed him to bear his charges on the journey, by King Edward the Third. He obtained his liberty with King David the Second in 1357, and the following year had a safe-conduct to go to England, to negociate affairs of state. In 1364 he was high sheriff of Berwickshire, and one of the Scottish commissioners at Murhouselaw, 1st September 1367 He died about 1385

The second son, Sir John Halyburton, a valiant warrior against the English was killed at the battle of Nisbet, in 1355 He married the daughter and coheiress of William de Vaux or Vallibus, lord of Dirleton, with whom he got that estate, and in consequence quartered the arms of Vaux with his own His son, Sir John Halyburton of Dirleton, died in 1392 He married Margaret, daughter of Sir John Cameron of Bellegarno, coheiress with her sister, Jean, (the wife of Sir Nicol Erskine of Kinnoul,) of their father, whose great estates in the counties of Perth and Haddington were divided between them He had, with a daughter, two sons Sir Walter, and George Halyburton of Gogar, of which lands he had a charter from his brother, 8th June 1409

The eldest son, Sir Walter Halyburton of Dirleton, was one of the hostages for King James the First, on his liberation in 1424, when his annual revenue was estimated at eight hundred merks, and he obtained liberty to return to Scotland in 1425 In 1430 he was appointed one of the ambassadors extraordinary to the court of England, and one of the wardens of the marches. In 1439 he was constituted high treasurer of Scotland, and in the following year he was created a peer of parliament. In 1444 he founded at Dirleton a collegiate church He died in 1449 By his wife, Lady Isabel Stewart, eldest daughter of the regent Albany, and relict of the earl of Ross, he had, with a daughter, four sons, namely, John, second Lord Halyburton of Dirleton, Walter, Robert, and William

Walter, the second son, married Catherine, daughter and coheiress of Alexander de Chisholm, with whom he got the barony of Pitcur, in the parish of Kettins, Forfarshire, of which he had a charter in 1482 The Halyburtons of Pitcur, (of whom afterwards,) acted a distinguished part in support of the Reformation in Scotland in the sixteenth century

John, second Lord Halyburton, married Janet, daughter of Sir William Seton of Seton, by whom he had two sons, Patrick and George, who both bore the title.

Patrick, third lord, married Margaret, eldest daughter of Patrick, first Lord Hales, but died without issue. George, fourth lord, had three sons: Archibald, Patrick, and Andrew The eldest son, Archibald, predeceased his father, but having married Helen, daughter of Shaw of Sauchie, he had a son, James, fifth lord, on whose decease, his uncle, Patrick, became sixth Lord Halyburton of Dirleton The latter died in 1606, leaving three daughters, coheiresses, namely, Janet, married to William, Lord Ruthven; Marion, to George, Lord Home, and Margaret, to George Ker of Fawdonside, Roxburghshire. The sixth lord had a natural son, David Halyburton, in whose favour a legitimation passed the great seal, 19th April, 1548. The title descended to the eldest daughter, Lady Ruthven, and remained in Patrick, her son. Her grandson, William, Lord Ruthven and Dirleton, was in 1581 created earl of Gowrie, and her great-grandson, John, third earl of Gowrie, forfeited it in 1600. (see GOWRIE, Earl of, p. 389,) and thus the title of Lord Halyburton of Dirleton reverted to the crown.

The most celebrated of the Halyburtons of Pitcur, was James Halyburton, provost of Dundee at the era of the Reformation in Scotland, and uncle and tutor (or guardian) of Sir George Halyburton of Pitcur In 1558, he was one of the commissioners sent by the Estates of Scotland to France to negociate the marriage of the infant Queen Mary to the dauphin He early joined the lords of the Congregation, and in 1559, when the queen regent began to persecute the preachers of the reformed doctrines, she desired him to apprehend Paul Methven, one of the leading reformers, but, instead of doing so, he sent the latter a secret message to that effect, that he might escape in time. [Calderwood's Hist. vol i. p 439] He was among the barons who went to St. Andrews on the 4th June of the same year, summoned there by the earl of Argyle and Lord James Stewart, afterwards the regent Moray, in consequence of the perfidious conduct of the queen regent towards the reformers. He had the command of the troops of the Congregation stationed on the high ground called Cupar moor, to oppose the army which the queen regent had marched from Falkland on the 18th of the same month, and he had so skilfully posted their ordnance as completely to command the surrounding country To avoid bloodshed, however, a negociation was entered into, which led to a temporary truce. At the burning of Scone, soon after, he and his brother, Captain Alexander Halyburton, hastened with Knox and other leaders of the reformation to prevent acts of violence by the mob, but without effect, as the palace and abbey were entirely destroyed. Captain Alexander Halyburton was killed in a skirmish with the French soldiers at Leith in the following November In 1560 the provost of Dundee was one of the leading reformers who met at Cupar for the purpose of electing commissioners to meet the duke of Norfolk at Berwick, to arrange the conditions on which Queen Elizabeth was to send an English army to their assistance The instructions given them, signed, among others, by James Halyburton, are inserted in full in Calderwood's History (vol i. p. 579). In 1564 he was one of the commissioners appointed by the General Assembly to present certain articles against popery to the lords of secret council. In 1565, after "the Round-about Raid," with the earls of Murray, Glencairn, and other leaders of the Reformed party, he took refuge in England the queen and Lord Darnley being then too powerful for them. He afterwards fought at Langside on the side of the regent Moray In 1570 he assisted the regent Lennox in dispersing the troops of the earl of Huntly at Brechin, when he appeared in arms on behalf of Queen Mary. In the subsequent skirmishes with "the queen's men," between Edinburgh and Leith, he was also actively engaged. He was with the earl of Morton, the leader of the king's army, when he attacked the lords of the queen's faction near Restalrig, on 16th June 1571. At this time he held the rank of colonel, and at a skirmish which took place on the evening of the last day of August of that year, he was taken prisoner by a party from Leith, who had driven back to the Netherbow gate of Edinburgh a strong force of the opposite faction that had gone out to give them battle, but appears soon to have regained his liberty In 1578 he was one of the commissioners who were directed by the king to hold a conference at Stirling castle, on 22d December, to settle the policy of the church, and in 1582, he and Captain William Stewart, brother of the notorious favourite, Colonel James Stewart, temporary earl of Arran, were commissioners from the king to the General Assembly which met on 9th October of that year He was also one of the king's commissioners in the Assembly which met 24th April 1583. He seems for a time to have lost the king's favour, probably in consequence of having joined in the Raid of Ruthven, as, according to Calderwood, he was deprived of the provostship of Dundee, after he had held it for thirty-three consecutive years, when it was conferred on the earl of Crawford In the Assembly of February 1588, he was again one of the king's commissioners, and in this and the next Assembly, in August following, he was nominated one of the assessors to the moderator He died the same year, aged 70, and was interred in the South church, Dundee, receiving a public funeral, at the expense of the corporation His monument remained under the floor of the lateran (the clerk's or precentor's desk) on the north side of the pulpit, till the churches of Dundee were destroyed by fire in 1841

Pitcur was inherited by Agatha Halyburton, wife of the fourteenth earl of Morton, whose second son, the Hon Hamilton Douglas, became possessed of it, and according to the entail, assumed the name of Halyburton On his death in 1784, it went to his aunt, Mary, countess of Aboyne, whose second son Colonel the Hon Douglas Gordon, afterwards Lord Douglas Gordon Halyburton, succeeded to it, and on his death in 1841, his nephew, Lord Frederick Gordon, became the proprietor, also taking the name of Halyburton, being the lineal male heir and representative of that ancient family

A lateral branch of the same family were the Haliburtons of Foderance in the same county, one of whom, Sir George Haliburton, was admitted a lord of session 8th November, 1627, and knighted by Charles the First at Holyrood, on 14th July, 1633 In the latter year he was appointed a parliamentary commissioner for surveying the laws, and was elected president of the court for the ensuing session on 1st November 1642 He was a member of a commission for revising and arranging the laws, passed on 15th March 1649, but died soon after

HALYBURTON, THOMAS, an eminent divine and theological writer, was born in December 1674, at Dupplin, near Perth His father had been for many years minister of the parish of Aberdalgy, but was ejected at the Restoration, and died in 1682 Thomas accompanied his mother to Holland, from whence he returned to Scotland in 1687, and, after attending the usual classes at the university, he entered himself a student of divinity. He was licensed in 1699, and in 1700 was ordained minister of the parish of Ceres in Fifeshire. In 1710, upon the recommendation of the synod of Fife, he was appointed professor of divinity in St. Leonard's college, St. Andrews, by patent from Queen Anne In his inaugural discourse he chose for his subject, a work of the celebrated Dr Pitcairn of Edinburgh, which contained an attack on revealed religion, under the title of 'Epistola Archimedis ad Regem Gelonem albæ Græcæ reperta, anno æræ Christianæ, 1688, A Pitcairno, M D ut vulgo creditur, auctore" Professor Halyburton died in September 1712, in his 38th year He distinguished himself by his writings against the Deists, but his published works were all posthumous They are

HAMILTON, a surname originally derived from the lordship and manor of Hambledon in Leicestershire, the seat of the ancient family of Hamilton, the first of whom settled in Scotland in the thirteenth century In the time of William the Conqueror, as we learn from the index to Domesday Book, there were several places in England of the names of Hameldun, Hameldune, Hameledone, Hameltun, Hameltune, and Hameledune; and different families of the name were established in various parts of England, about the time of the early Scottish Hamiltons, but there is no reason to suppose that any of them settled in Scotland A William de Hamilton, who belonged to a Yorkshire family, is repeatedly taken notice of in the Fœdera Angliæ, from 1274 to 1305, being employed in various negociations and transactions of importance. He was archbishop of York and lord-chancellor of England during the reign of Edward the First, and one of the commissioners appointed by that monarch who met at Upsettlington, near Norham castle, on 2d June 1292, to determine the claims of the competitors for the Scottish crown In Cleland's 'Annals of Glasgow,' vol ii p. 484, there is inserted the translated copy of a charter from Malcolm Canmore (who reigned between 1057 and 1093) to the masons of Glasgow, granting them very ample privileges, one of the witnesses to which is designed Andrew Hamilton, bishop of Glasgow, but the authenticity of the deed is doubted from the fact that there were no bishops of Glasgow for a considerable period after this, the first, according to Chalmers, having been John, (preceptor of David I,) who died in 1147

The first person of the name in Scotland that can be relied upon was Walter de Hamilton, usually designed Gualterus filius Gilberti, or Walter Fitz-Gilbert, and from him the ducal family of Hamilton are descended. His father, Sir Gilbert Hamilton, is said to have been the son of Sir William de Hamilton, one of the sons of Robert de Bellomont, surnamed Blanchemaine, third earl of Leicester, who died in 1190 The story told by Hector Boece, Lesly, Buchanan, and others, of the first Hamilton who settled in Scotland having been obliged to flee from the court of Edward the Second in 1328, for slaying John Despencer, is quite in character with the legendary origins of families formerly so universal, and is evidently an invention The fable goes on to state that having been closely pursued in his flight, Hamilton and his servant changed clothes with two woodcutters, and taking the saws of the workmen, they were in the act of cutting an oak-tree when his pursuers passed. Perceiving his servant to notice them, Sir Gilbert cried out to him "Through," which word, with the oak-tree and saw through it, he took for his crest. Sir Gilbert's son, Sir Walter, however, was settled in Scotland long before this period. In the chartulary of Paisley he appears as one of the witnesses to the charter of confirmation by James, great steward of Scotland, to the monastery of Paisley, of the privilege of a herring fishery in the Clyde, in 1294, and in 1292, and again in 1296, we find him among the barons who swore fealty to King Edward the First, for lands lying in Lanarkshire and different other counties. During the contest which ensued for the succession to the Scottish crown he adhered to the English or Baliol interest. By Edward the Second he was appointed governor of the castle of Bothwell, and he held that important fortress for the English at the period of the battle of Bannockburn He is mentioned by Barbour as "Schyr Waltre Gilbertson" He seems soon after to have been taken into favour with Robert the Bruce, as that monarch bestowed on him the barony of Cadyow in Lanarkshire, and several other lands and baronies in that county, and in Linlithgowshire and Wigtonshire. He continued faithful to King David Bruce, the son of his great benefactor, and during his minority he accompanied the regent Douglas to the relief of Berwick, then threatened with a siege by the English He was also present at the battle of Halidon-hill, where he had a command in the second great body of the army under the young Stewart. He was twice married His second wife was Mary, only daughter of Adam de Gordon, ancestor of all the Gordons in Scotland He had two sons Sir David, and John de Hamilton, who, marrying Elizabeth, daughter of Alan Stewart of Dreghorn, got with her the lands of Ballencrief, &c. Of him are descended the Hamiltons of Innerwick, the earls of Haddington, and others. Sir Walter had two brothers, Sir John de Hamilton de Rossaven, and Hugo de Hamilton The former had a charter from his nephew, Sir David de Hamilton de Cadyow, of the barony of Fingaltoun in Renfrewshire, dated in 1339 He was ancestor of the Hamiltons of Fingaltoun and Preston, from whom are sprung the families of Airdrie and Ellershaw, and from the latter are said to be descended the Hamiltons of Cairnes, and the Hamiltons of Mount Hamilton in Ireland.

Sir David de Hamilton, lord of Cadyow, was, like his father, a faithful adherent of David the Bruce, and after that monarch's return from France, he accompanied him in all his excursions into the northern counties of England He was taken prisoner with the king at the disastrous battle of Durham, 17th October, 1346, but soon obtained his freedom on payment of a heavy ransom He is mentioned as one of the magnates Scotiæ, at a meeting of the Estates held at Scone, 27th March 1371, to settle the succession, when John earl of Carrick was unanimously acknowledged to be the eldest lawful son of King Robert the Second, and undoubted heir to the crown. He had three sons: Sir David, his successor; Walter de Hamilton, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Cambuskeith and Grange in Ayrshire, and Alan de Hamilton of Lethberd or Larbert in Linlithgowshire.

The eldest son, Sir David de Hamilton, was knighted by Robert the Second, who, in 1377, made him a grant of the lands of Bothwell muir He died before 1392 He married Janet or Johanetta de Keith, only daughter and heiress of the gallant Sir William Keith of Galston, and the ancestrix, not only of the noble family of Hamilton but of their cousins the Stewarts of Darnley, from whom James the First of England, and the subsequent monarchs of the house of Stuart, were lineally descended By this lady he had; with a daughter, Elizabeth, married to Sir Alexander Fraser of Cowie and Dores, ancestor of the Frasers, Lord Saltoun; five sons, namely, Sir John, his successor, George, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Boreland in Ayrshire, William, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Bathgate, Andrew, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Udston, and John, ancestor of the family of Bardowie.

The eldest son, Sir John Hamilton of Cadyow, when returning from France, in 1398, with Sir John Hamilton of Fingaltoun, and some other Scottish gentlemen, was captured at sea by the English. Prompt complaints of this breach of public faith having been made by the Scottish government, King Richard the Second issued an order, dated 28th October 1398, for them to be set at liberty, the ship and cargo restored, and the damages made good The following year he was one of the Scottish commissioners appointed for receiving the oath of King Richard for the fulfilment of the truce with Scotland, and, some time after, he was present with the duke of Albany on the borders, when he and the duke of Lancaster on the part of England, prolonged the truce between the two countries. With a daughter Catherine, married to Sir William Baillie of Lamington, he had three sons, viz. Sir James, his successor, David, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Dalserf, Blackburn Green, &c., and Thomas of Darngaber, common ancestor of the Hamiltons of Raploch, Milburne, Stanehouse, Neilsland, Torrance, Aikenhead, Dechmont, Barnes, &c., as well as of the earls of Clanbrassil, and other families of note in Ireland. Thomas de Hamilton of Darngaber was ordered to be released out of the Tower of London, having been for some time a prisoner of war The order is dated 12th April 1413, immediately after the accession of King Henry the Fifth.

The eldest son, Sir James Hamilton, and his next brother, David, obtained letters of safe-conduct, dated 6th September 1413, from King Henry the Fifth, to travel into England, as far as the castle of Calthorpe in Lincolnshire. He was one of the hostages for James the First, when he was allowed to return to Scotland in 1421, and in 1424 he was one of those who went to London as sureties for their sovereign. He had five sons, namely, Sir James, his successor, first Lord Hamilton, Alexander, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Silvertonhill and Westport; John, designated of Whistleberry, Gavin, provost of the collegiate church of Bothwell, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Orbiston, progenitor of the Hamiltons of Dalziel, Haggs, Monkland, Kilbrachmont, Parkhead, Longharmiston, Barr, &c.; and Robert.

James, the eldest son, was created a lord of parliament by royal charter, on July 8, 1445, under the title of Lord Hamilton of Cadyow In 1449, he was one of the commissioners appointed to meet on the borders and renew the truce with England. In accordance with the practice of the age amongst the great landed proprietors of forming collegiate establishments, Lord Hamilton obtained from Pope Sextus V authority to erect the parish church of Hamilton (formerly Cadyow) into a collegiate church, and to add to it a provost and six prebendaries to a former foundation of two chaplainries in the said church. A new church having been built in 1732, the old Gothic fabric erected by his lordship was pulled down, with the exception of one of the aisles, which now covers the burying vault of the Hamilton family In 1450 he accompanied the earl of Douglas on his celebrated tour to Rome, and after their return to Scotland the following year, he went with him on a pilgrimage to St. Thomas' tomb at Canterbury He joined the confederacy which Douglas had formed with the earls of Moray, Crawford, and Ross, and in 1452, when King James invited that powerful nobleman to the fatal conference in Stirling castle, he accompanied him to the gate; but on attempting to follow Douglas within it, he was rudely thrust back by the porter, and drawing his sword to avenge the insult, his relation, Sir Alexander Livingston, from within held him back with a long halbert till they got the gate made fast. Afterwards, when he heard of the murder of Douglas, he knew that his being denied entrance was done for his safety A friend in the castle, privily conveying a pair of spurs to Lord Hamilton, (a hint for him to escape,) gave the first intimation to Douglas' friends in the town of his fate. As he adhered to the earl's brother, Sir James Douglas, who succeeded as ninth and last earl of Douglas, the king, in November 1454, after ravaging Douglasdale, proceeded to Lord Hamilton's lands in Avondale and Clydesdale, which he also laid waste He afterwards went to England to solicit from King Henry the Sixth assistance in men and money for Douglas, but although he failed in his efforts as regarded the earl, he obtained for himself a considerable sum of money with which, on his return, he equipped a body of 300 horse and 300 foot. Soon after, the earl, at the head of 40,000 men, took the field in open rebellion against his sovereign He encamped on the south bank of the Carron, about three miles from the Torwood in Stirlingshire. The king at the same time advanced from Stirling with an army of 30,000 men At this crisis, Bishop Kennedy sent a private message to Lord Hamilton, offering, in the king's name, a free pardon for all that was past, and great rewards in future, if he deserted Douglas, and submitted to the government. Immediately repairing to that nobleman, as his troops were drawing out from the camp, he represented to him that as he never would probably again be at the head of a more numerous and well-appointed force, so he never could have a better opportunity of fighting the king to advantage, and added, that he would find it extremely difficult to keep his troops longer together The earl haughtily replied, "That if he (Lord Hamilton) was tired or afraid, he might be gone." The same night, collecting his kinsmen and followers, Lord Hamilton carried them over to the royal camp, and was received by the king with open arms, but, for the sake of appearances, he was sent to Roslin castle for a few days. In consequence of this and other desertions, the earl of Douglas, with two hundred horse, all that remained to him, hastily retired to the borders. The following year (1455) he renewed his depredations on the estates of the royalists, but being overtaken at Ancrum moor in Teviotdale, by a body of troops under the earl of Angus and Lord Hamilton, he was routed with great loss, and driven out of the kingdom Lord Hamilton subsequently obtained from his grateful sovereign grants of extensive territorial possessions in Lanarkshire and other counties, and among others, of the lands of Fynnart in Renfrewshire, forfeited by the earl of Douglas. In 1455 he was appointed one of the commissioners on the part of Scotland to treat of peace, with the Lord Montague and others, on the part of England, for which purpose they met at York. He was employed again in 1461, 1471, 1472, and in 1474, in which last year he was one of the ambassadors extraordinary to the court of England. Two years thereafter, he was one of the commissioners appointed to meet the plenipotentiaries of England to prolong the truce, and to negociate a marriage between the Princess Cicely, the daughter of Edward IV, and the duke of Rothesay, prince of Scotland, both of whom were then in their childhood—a union that never took place. His name appears frequently in the 'Acta Dominorum Concilii,' as one of these judges, during the years 1478 and 1479, in which latter year he died. He was married, first, to Lady Euphemia Graham, eldest daughter of Patrick earl of Strathearn, and widow of Archibald, fifth earl of Douglas and second duke of Touraine, and, secondly, in 1474, to the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of King James the Second, and widow of Thomas Boyd, earl of Arran By the former he had two daughters, Elizabeth, married to David, fourth earl of Crawford, created, by James III, duke of Montrose, and Agnes, married to Sir James Hamilton of Preston, and by the latter he had a son, James, 2d Lord Hamilton, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to Matthew, 2d earl of Lennox. He had also several natural sons, but of these only are known James de Hamilton, whose name appears in the succession charter of 1455, Sir Patrick Hamilton of Kincavel, father of Patrick Hamilton, the martyr, (see p. 427), and John Hamilton of Broomhill He had also a daughter, married to Sir John Macfarlane, chief of the clan Macfarlane.

James, second Lord Hamilton and first earl of Arran, was held in high estimation by his cousin, King James IV, who made him one of his privy councillors. In 1503 he was sent, with some other noblemen, to the court of England, to negociate a marriage betwixt the Princess Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII, and his royal relative, which was concluded the following year On this occasion King James made him a grant of the island of Arran, at the same time creating him earl thereof, by letters patent, dated 11th August 1503 He also gave him a charter or commission of justiciary within the island. During the marriage rejoicings, in 1504, Lord Hamilton and the celebrated French knight, Anthony D'Arcy, better known by the name of the Sieur de la Beauté, renowned all over Europe for his martial prowess, tilted together in presence of the whole court, and after several trials, neither could boast of any advantage over the other, "only," says Sir J Balfour in his Annals, "the Lord Hamilton, one day at Falkland, was judged to have the honour, which La Beauté did impute to his own indisposition of body that day" The same year (1504) he was appointed to the command of a force of 10,000 men which James IV sent to the assistance of the king of Denmark, when engaged in hostilities with the Swedes and Norwegians. In 1507, with the archbishop of St. Andrews, he was sent as ambassador to France. On his return through England, the following year, accompanied by his natural brother, Sir Patrick Hamilton, he was arrested in Kent by Vaughan an officer of Henry the Eighth. He was at first treated with distinction, but, on his refusal to swear fidelity to king Henry, he was committed to the custody of a guard. The English monarch having sent an envoy to Scotland to vindicate himself, King James desired this ambassador to inform his master that he highly approved of the earl's conduct in refusing to swear fealty to England, adding, that to obtain the freedom of his kinsman, he would delay the renewal of the league with France, if he were released. In June following, the bishop of Moray repaired to London again to solicit his liberation, but without effect, and it appears that he was not set at liberty till towards the end of the year During his residence in England, his brother, Sir Patrick (whom André of Toulouse, in his Diary for the year 1508, styles a most famous knight,) vanquished, in single combat, an Irish gentleman of eminent skill in arms. Soon after, the earl was appointed to the command of a body of auxiliaries which was sent to the assistance of Louis the Twelfth of France, who, for the seasonable aid thus rendered him, settled an annual pension on the earl for life, besides making him many valuable presents. On his return to Scotland, he was driven by stress of weather into the port of Carrickfergus in Ireland, but the inhabitants of that place having maltreated his men, the earl landed a choice body of his sailors, assaulted and stormed the town, and gave it up to be plundered.

During his absence on this expedition, James the Fourth, with the flower of his nobility, had been slain at Flodden, and the queen-mother had been declared regent of the kingdom. On her resignation of that office, soon after, an assembly of the estates was held at Perth to elect a new regent, when the voices were much divided between the duke of Albany, then in France, and the earl of Arran Through the influence, however, of Elphinston, bishop of Aberdeen and Lord Home, the former was elected, and Sir Patrick Hamilton and the Lyon King at arms sent to France, to notify the election to him. In 1515, after Albany had taken prisoner Lord Home, whose overgrown power and turbulent disposition had become dangerous to the state, he committed him to the custody of the earl of Arran, governor of the castle of Edinburgh The latter, who disliked the regent, was easily persuaded by Home to retire with him to the borders, where they commenced hostilities, on which he was required to surrender himself within fifteen days, to avoid being proclaimed a rebel as Home and his brother had been At the same time, the regent, at the head of a select body of troops, and a small train of artillery, proceeded to invest the castle of Cadyow, the earl's principal stronghold, and required its immediate surrender His mother, the Princess Mary, aunt of Albany, resided at that time in Cadyow castle, and on her solicitation the regent consented to pardon Arran, on his returning to his duty, which he accordingly did. In the following year, at the instigation of the English king, Arran, who still aimed at the regency, associated with the earls of Glencairn, Lennox, and the majority of the noblemen and gentlemen of the west, and seized the royal magazines at Glasgow They also sent a body of troops to take possession of some French ships, with supplies of arms and ammunition for Albany, which had arrived in the Clyde. The vessels, however, had sailed, but a quantity of gunpowder and other ammunition landed from them, they brought to Glasgow, where, lest it might fall into the hands of their enemies, the powder was thrown into a draw-well The earl of Arran, at the same time, by a stratagem made himself master of the castle of Dumbarton, expelling Lord Erskine, the governor An accommodation, however, between the regent and the leaders of the malcontents was soon brought about, chiefly through the means of Forman, archbishop of Glasgow In 1517, on Albany's departure for France, Arran was constituted lieutenant-general and one of the lords of the regency, and, on the murder of the Sieur de la Beauté, warden of the marches. In the latter capacity he committed to prison Sir George Douglas, the brother of Angus, and Mark Ker, for some misdemeanor, and took possession of the castles of Hume, Wedderburne, and Langton By the members of the regency he had been elected their president, but was, upon all occasions, opposed by the earl of Angus. Having, in 1519, while the plague raged at Edinburgh, conveyed the young king, for greater security, to the castle of Dalkeith, he was, on his return to Edinburgh, denied entrance by the citizens, on the instigation of Angus, and the gates shut against him. His followers and those of Angus had a fierce encounter on the High Street of Edinburgh, 30th April 1520, when several were slain on both sides, and the Hamilton party obliged to disperse. Arran himself and his son, Sir James Hamilton, fighting their way through the melée, retired down a wynd on the north side of the High Street, where, finding a coal-horse standing, they threw off his burden, and rode through the North Loch, at a shallow place, no one thinking of pursuing them that way Among those slain were Sir Patrick Hamilton of Kincavel, already mentioned, and Sir James Hamilton, younger of Preston In 1523 Arran joined the queen dowager in opposing the regent, and after the final retirement of the latter to France the following year, he had again the chief direction of affairs under the king In 1526, however, on Angus obtaining the superiority, he retired for a time from court to his estates, but on the 4th September of that year, he commanded the royal army against his nephew, the earl of Lennox, at the battle near Linlithgow, where the latter was slain by Sir James Hamilton of Finnart On the forfeiture of Angus he had a charter of the lordship of Bothwell, 16th November 1528. He died before 21st July 1529 He married, first, Beatrix, daughter of John, Lord Drummond, by whom he had a daughter, married to Andrew Stewart, Lord Evandale and Ochiltree, whose grandson was the notorious favourite of James the Sixth, Captain James Stewart, the titular earl of Arran. He married, secondly, Elizabeth sister of Alexander Lord Home, by whom he had no issue It being found that this lady's former husband, Sir Thomas Hay, of the family of Yester, who had gone abroad and was supposed to be dead, was alive, a sentence of divorce was pronounced in 1518. He married, thirdly, Janet, daughter of Sir David Bethune of Creich, comptroller of Scotland, niece of Cardinal Bethune, and widow of Sir Thomas Livingston of Easter Wemyss, and by her had, with four daughters, two sons, namely, James, second earl of Arran, regent of Scotland and duke of Chatelherault, of whom a memoir is given afterwards in larger type, and Gavin He had also four natural sons and one natural daughter The sons were, Sir James Hamilton of Finnart, already mentioned, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Evandale, Crawfordjohn, Gilkerscleugh, &c., Sir John Hamilton of Clydesdale, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Samuelston, James Hamilton of Parkhill, and John, archbishop of St. Andrews, executed at Stirling 1st April, 1570 According to Knox and Buchanan, however, the paternity of the last was doubtful

James, second earl of Arran, and duke of Chatelherault, married Lady Margaret Douglas, eldest daughter of the third earl of Morton, and by her had, with four daughters, four sons, namely, James, third earl of Arran, John, marquis of Hamilton, Lord David Hamilton, who died without issue in March 1611, and Lord Claud, ancestor of the earls of Abercorn. (Marquises of Abercorn, peerage of Great Britain, 1790)

James, third earl of Arran, succeeded his father in 1575. The dukedom of Chatelherault, having been resumed by the crown of France, did not descend to him He was in the castle of St. Andrews when Cardinal Bethune was assassinated in 1546, and was detained prisoner there by the conspirators. As his father was the presumptive heir to the crown, on the 14th August 1546, the Estates of the kingdom passed an act declaring him to be secluded from the succession as long as he happened to be in the hands of those that committed the slaughter of the cardinal, or of any enemies of the realm. He was released on the surrender of the conspirators to the French, and in 1555, he went over to France, where he obtained the command of the Scottish guards. Having become a convert to the reformed doctrines, a plot against his life was formed by the princes of Lorraine, but entertaining suspicions of the design from some expressions dropped by the cardinal of Lorraine, he hastily quitted France in 1559, and on his way home visited the court of Queen Elizabeth. In 1560, the Scottish Estates proposed the earl of Arran as a husband to that princess, but with great professions of regard she declined the alliance. The following year, on the arrival from France of his own sovereign, Queen Mary, he openly aspired to her hand, and on her part she showed great partiality for him, but by his most imprudently opposing the exercise of her religion, he forfeited her favour altogether His love, inflamed by disappointment, gradually undermined his reason, and he was declared, by a cognition of inquest, to be insane. When his brothers, Lord John and Lord Claud Hamilton were attainted in 1579, the earl, though incapable, from his situation, of committing any crime, was involved, by a shameful abuse of law, in the common ruin of his house. He had continued to live secluded at the castle of Craignethan, under the care of some faithful servants of the family, but a party being sent to demand the surrender of that fortress, his servants, after making what defence they could, were forced to yield, and the earl, with his aged mother, the duchess of Chatelherault, sent to Linlithgow and placed under the custody of one Captain Lamble, the same miscreant who insulted Queen Mary on her surrender at Carberry Hill, a creature of Morton's, and a most inveterate enemy of the house of Hamilton Captain James Stewart, grandson of Lady Margaret Hamilton, already mentioned, was appointed his tutor, and afterwards, in 1581, under pretence that he was the lawful heir of the family, he was created earl of Arran, [see vol i p. 160,] which title he held, along with the estates of the Hamilton family, until his downfall in 1585, when they were restored to the rightful owner James Hamilton, third earl of Arran, died without issue in March 1609, and was succeeded by his nephew, James, second marquis of Hamilton

Lord John, the second son of the regent duke of Chatelherault, and first marquis of Hamilton, born in 1532, had the commendatory of the rich abbey of Aberbrothwick conferred on him in 1541 When Queen Mary was imprisoned in 1567 he entered into an association for endeavouring to procure her liberty, and on her escape from Lochleven castle in May of the following year, she hastened to Hamilton, where, in a few days, she was joined by a splendid train of nobles, accompanied by such numbers of followers as formed an army of 6,000 men. But the defeat at Langside, the same month, disconcerted all the measures of her friends. On the death of his father in 1575, the family estates devolved on Lord John His lordship and his brother, Lord Claud, commendator of Paisley, suspected of being accessory to the murder of the regents Moray and Lennox, had been included in a general bill of attainder on that account, and in 1579, at the instigation of the regent Morton, it was resolved, without trial or the examination of any witnesses, to put it in force against them. Timely information having reached the brothers of their danger, they made their escape, but the castle of Cadyow was besieged and taken, and completely demolished. The garrison, with their hands tied behind their backs, were led prisoners to Stirling, where their captain, Arthur Hamilton of Merritoun, was publicly executed. The whole of the Hamilton estates were confiscated, and the most cruel and oppressive proceedings directed against almost all the gentlemen of the name, a number of whom fled from their homes. Lord John Hamilton, disguised as a seaman, retired to France, where he was kindly received by the archbishop of Glasgow, ambassador at the French court for Queen Mary His refusal to change his religion lost him the favour of that bigoted court, on which he returned to England, and joined his brother Lord Claud, who had found a secure asylum at Widdrington, in the north of England, with a relation of the earl of Northumberland. In 1585, they returned to Scotland, with the other exiled nobles, and being admitted into King James' presence at Stirling, Lord John Hamilton, in name of the others, said, "That they were come, in all humility, to beg his majesty's love and favour" The king answered, "My lord, I did never see you before, and must confess that of all this company you have been most wronged. You were a faithful servant to my mother in my minority, and, when I understood not, as I do now, the estate of things, hardly used." They were immediately restored to their estates and honours, and in a parliament held at Linlithgow in December of the same year, an act of oblivion for all that was past, was solemnly ratified. Lord John was sworn a privy councillor and made governor of Dumbarton castle In 1587, while the unfortunate Queen Mary was under sentence of death, she took a ring from her finger, which she ordered one of her attendants to deliver to Lord John Hamilton, and tell him it was all that she had left to witness her great sense of his family's constant fidelity to her, and desired that it should always be kept in the family, as a lasting evidence of her regard towards them. This ring is still preserved in the charter-room at Hamilton palace. In 1589, when the king went to Denmark to bring home his young queen, the Princess Anne, he nominated Lord John Hamilton lieutenant of the three wardenries of the marches, and of the whole of the south of Scotland. The queen, on her arrival, was crowned, with great pomp, in the abbey church of Holyrood, by the earl of Lennox and Lord John.

In 1593, he accompanied the king in his expedition to the north against the popish lords, after the battle of Glenlivet. On this occasion he claimed the leading of the vanguard, which the earl of Angus opposed, alleging that this honour, of right, belonged to him, being the ancient privilege of the Douglases. The king decided that Lord John should have the command at this time, but that this should not in any manner impugn the rights and privileges of the house of Douglas. Lord John sat as one of the jury upon the trial of t e earls of Huntly, Bothwell, and Crawford, when they were found guilty, and sent to separate prisons. Calderwood [Hist., vol. v p. 268] has recorded a curious conversation betwixt the king and Lord John, on the subject of the excommunication of the popish lords. Having failed in his efforts with the Edinburgh clergy to prevent the intimation of the sentence in that city, James paid a visit to Hamilton palace, for the purpose of sounding that nobleman in the matter "You see, my lord," he said, "how I am used, and have no man in whom I may trust more than in Huntly If I receive him, the ministers will cry out that I am an apostate from the religion,—if not, I am left desolate." "If he and the rest be not enemies to the religion," replied his lordship, "you may receive them,—if otherwise, not." "I cannot tell," said his majesty, "what to make of that,—but the ministers hold them for enemies Always I would think it good that they enjoyed liberty of conscience." Upon this Lord Hamilton exclaimed, "Sir, then we are all gone! then we are all gone! then we are all gone! If there were no more to withstand them than I, I will withstand." The king, perceiving his servants approach, put an end to the conversation by saying, with a smile, "My lord, I did this to try your mind." In 1596, when the clergy, preaching against the king's government and measures, forced him to leave Edinburgh, Bruce and Balcanquhal, two of their number, in name of the others, invited Lord John, then at Hamilton, to repair to Edinburgh and place himself at their head. Hastening to the king at Linlithgow, he placed the letter in his hands. He was created Marquis of Hamilton at Holyroodhouse 17th April 1599 So great was King James' regard for him that he requested him to stand godfather to one of his children, and he often visited him at Hamilton He died 12th April, 1604, in his 72d year He married Margaret, only daughter of the eighth Lord Glammis, widow of the fourth earl of Cassillis, and by this lady, who survived him many years, he had two sons, Edward, who died young, and James, second marquis of Hamilton, and one daughter, Lady Margaret, the wife of the eighth Lord Maxwell He had a natural son, Sir John Hamilton of Lettrick, father of the first Lord Bargeny, and a natural daughter, Jean, who was contracted in marriage to Sir Umfra Colquhoun of Luss.

James, second marquis of Hamilton, born in 1589, succeeded his father in 1604, and his uncle, the earl of Arran, in May 1609, in his estates and in the hereditary office of sheriff of Lanarkshire Besides being made one of the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber, he was on 14th January 1618, appointed one of the lords of the privy council, and lord steward of the household, and on 16th June 1619, he was created a peer of England by the title of Earl of Cambridge and Lord Innerdale, titles that had never before been conferred on any but such as were of the blood royal And here it becomes necessary to correct an "historical error" that is almost universally held, namely, that after the present royal family the house of Hamilton is heir to the Scottish crown, and of consequence to the throne of Great Britain, as by the act of Union it is for ever provided that whosoever is heir to the throne of Scotland shall be heir also to the throne of the United Kingdom, and vice versa During the period of nearly a century (previous to the birth of children of the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, which took place in 1613) the head of the Hamilton family was undoubtedly the next heir to the Scottish crown As such, in the year 1542, an act was passed in the Estates of Scotland, by which "all the lordis spirituale, temporale, and commissaris of burrowis, representand the thre estatis of parliament, declarit and declaris James, earle of Arrane, Lord Hamilton (ancestor of the duke of Hamilton) secund persoun of this realme, and narrest to succede to the crown of the same, failyeing of our soverane lady (Queen Mary) and the barnis lauchfullie to be gotten of hir body" And again, in 1546, as already stated, the three estates solemnly recognised the eldest son of the earl of Arran as "the third persoun of the realm," and acknowledged "all his rychtis of successionis alswell of the crowne as of others." The head of the house of Hamilton remained in this distinguished position of "second person of the realm," or heir presumptive to the crown, until the birth of King James the Sixth interposed a third person between him and the throne. After the dethronement of Queen Mary, the house of Hamilton again reverted to its pre-eminence of being next heir to the crown, and held that high position until the numerous issue of King James the Sixth removed them to a distance in the order of succession By the act of Union, confirming previous acts of succession and settlement of the crown, it is enacted "that the succession of the monarchy of Great Britain, after Queen Anne, and in default of issue of her majesty, be, and remain, and continue, to the most excellent Princess Sophia, (the daughter of the Princess Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, daughter of King James the Sixth of Scotland,) and the heirs of her body, being Protestants." It is under the provisions of this act that Queen Victoria and her royal family, as heirs of King George the First, the eldest son of the Princess Sophia, now hold the crown of the United Kingdom, and under the same act, in the event of the failure of the present royal family, the succession to the crown would open up to the next immediate heirs descended of the body of the Princess Sophia. These are very numerous. With every day, therefore, the "historical error" or popular fallacy, of representing the noble house of Hamilton as "after the royal family, heir to the Scottish crown," becomes greater and greater Their boast is that they once were the presumptive heirs to the ancient kingdom of Scotland, and that they still inherit the royal blood of its long line of sovereigns.

The second marquis of Hamilton, chosen a knight of the Garter at Whitehall, 9th February 1621, was high commissioner to the Scottish parliament the same year, in which the five articles of Perth, so obnoxious to the presbyterian party, were ratified by a majority of 27 He died at Whitehall, London, 2d March, 1625, in his 36th year, a few days before King James. As he was said to have been poisoned by the duke of Buckingham, with whom he had some difference, three medical men were appointed to examine his body Two of them declared that he had not been poisoned, but the third, Dr Eglisham, affirmed that he had, and hesitated not to impute the crime to Buckingham He was obliged in consequence to leave England, when he retired to Flanders, where he published his opinions in the shape of a pamphlet. The marquis married Lady Anne Cunninghame, fourth daughter of the seventh earl of Glencairn Of a firm and masculine spirit, this lady, who long survived her husband, distinguished herself on the side of the Covenanters, her father's family having ever been warm friends of the presbyterian interest. In 1633, when her son conducted the English fleet to the Forth, to overawe the Covenanters, she appeared among them on the shore at Leith, at the head of a troop of horse, and drawing a pistol from her saddlebow, declared she would be the first to shoot her son, should he presume to land and attack his countrymen and his country With three daughters, the second marquis had two sons, James, third marquis, and first duke of Hamilton, and William, earl of Lanark, second duke of Hamilton

HAMILTON, Duke of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred, with that of marquis of Clydesdale, in 1643, on James, earl of Arran, the elder son of the second marquis of Hamilton, and now held by the Douglas family, through the marriage of Anne, duchess of Hamilton, niece and successor of the second duke, with the earl of Selkirk Of the first duke of Hamilton a memoir is afterwards given in larger type His grace having only surviving daughters, was succeeded by his brother, William, earl of Lanark.

William, second duke of Hamilton, was born at Hamilton, December 14, 1616, and received his education at the university of Glasgow He afterwards travelled on the Continent, and resided for some time at the French court. On his return, in 1637, he became a great favourite with Charles the First and his queen On the last day of March 1639, he was created a Scottish peer by the titles of earl of Lanark, Lord Machanshyre and Polmont, and in 1640 was made secretary of state for Scotland. In 1644, he was, by the king's order, arrested with his brother the duke, at Oxford, on the false representations of their enemies. The duke was sent prisoner first to Pendennis castle in Cornwall, and afterwards to St. Michael's Mount, where, two years after, he was set at liberty by some of the parliament forces. The earl of Lanark, who was to be sent to Ludlow castle in Wales, made his escape, and went to London, whence he returned to Scotland, where he made it clearly appear that, notwithstanding the hard usage he had experienced, he continued as steadfast to the cause of the king as ever In 1646, when the king put himself into the hands of the Scottish army at Newcastle, he was one of the commissioners sent by the Scots Estates to confer with his majesty, when he used his utmost endeavours to induce Charles to agree to the terms submitted to him, but in vain. When his brother marched into England in 1648, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland. Being soon afterwards deprived, by the act of Classes, of all his public employments for his adherence to "the Engagement," he retired to Holland, but he had scarcely arrived there, when he received the sad intelligence of the execution of his royal master, and soon after of that of his brother, whom he succeeded in his titles and estates. In 1650 he accompanied Charles the Second to Scotland, but was excluded by parliament from the king's councils, and not suffered to remain with his majesty He retired in consequence to the island of Arran, where he remained till the end of January 1651, when he was permitted to go to court, and was received with much distinction by the king.

When the march into England was decided upon, the duke obtained liberty to raise a troop of horse, and he soon collected about a hundred men He afterwards raised seven other troops, who joined the royal army at Moffat, previously to its entering England, which it did by the western marches. At Warrington bridge the royalists defeated General Lambert, who had been sent against them The duke accompanied the king on the whole march until they came to Worcester Here they found themselves surrounded by an army of 30,000 men, commanded by Cromwell in person, who, attacking the royal forces, met with little resistance, except from General Middleton and the duke of Hamilton The duke behaved with uncommon bravery, and charged repeatedly at the head of his regiment, but he was at last wounded and taken prisoner Of this wound he died, September 12, 1651, nine days after the battle, and his remains were interred in the cathedral church of Worcester

He had married in 1638, Lady Elizabeth Maxwell, eldest daughter and coheiress of James, earl of Dirleton, and by her had, James, Lord Polmont, who died an infant, and five daughters, one of whom died young The dukedom of Hamilton, with the titles and estates, devolved on his niece, Anne, duchess of Hamilton By Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, 1654, William duke of Hamilton, deceased, was excepted from all benefit thereof, and his estates were forfeited, reserving out of them £400 a-year to his duchess, during her life, and after her death £100 to each of his surviving daughters. The English titles of earl of Cambridge and Lord Innerdale, granted to his father, the second marquis, in 1619, with limitation to the heirs male of his body, became extinct with him, but the Scottish honours of the same, included in the patent of the dukedom granted to his brother in 1643, descended to his niece along with the other titles.

Anne, duchess of Hamilton, eldest surviving daughter of James, first duke of Hamilton, was born about 1636. She married Lord William Douglas, eldest son of William, first marquis of Douglas, born 24th December 1634, and created earl of Selkirk, Lord Daer and Shortcleugh, 4th August, 1646. He was fined £1,000 by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon of 1654. On the restoration, in consequence of a petition from the duchess, he was created duke of Hamilton for life, 12th October, 1660, and at the same time sworn a privy councillor His prudent management enabled him in the course of a few years to pay off the accumulated debts with which the Hamilton family were at that time burdened, and in the parliament of 1673, he distinguished himself by his opposition to Lauderdale. He and the other leaders of his party went to London, to represent their grievances to the king, and received from him full assurances of redress, but on their return to Scotland, they found that the parliament was dissolved. This excited such popular discontent that the assassination of Lauderdale was contemplated, and only averted by the advice of the duke of Hamilton. He was again invited to court with his friends, when they requested a hearing from the king, but were desired to present their complaints in writing, which they declined, knowing well that the most cautious statement of grievances it was possible to frame would not protect them from the statute of leasing-making. In the following year Lauderdale's opponents were displaced from council, with the exception of the duke of Hamilton, who, however, was removed in 1676, for opposing the sentence against Baillie of Jerviswood. In 1678, the duke and thirteen other peers repaired to London, to complain to the king of Lauderdale's arbitrary proceedings, but as they had left Scotland without permission, an audience was refused. They were at length heard in presence of the cabinet council, and being again required to produce their complaints against Lauderdale in writing, which they declined to do without a previous indemnity, the king declared his full approbation of Lauderdale's proceedings. On the breaking out of the insurrection in Scotland in 1679, the duke and the Scottish lords then in London, generously offered to suppress it, without arms or the shedding of blood, if the grievances of the people were redressed, but their assistance was rejected. They afterwards obtained an audience, and were fully heard on their complaints against Lauderdale, but in vain.

In 1682, after the fall of that unprincipled minister, his grace was invested with the order of the Garter, and on the accession of James the Seventh, he was sworn a privy councillor of Scotland, and appointed one of the commissioners of the Treasury. He was constituted an extraordinary lord of session, 26th March 1686, and sworn a member of the English privy council, 14th April 1687. On the arrival of the prince of Orange in London the following year, he was elected president at a meeting of the Scottish nobility and gentry then in that city, when they framed an address, requesting the prince to assume the government and call a convention of the states at Edinburgh. This convention was accordingly held 14th March 1689. The duke was chosen president of the meeting which declared the throne vacant, and tendered the crown to King William and Queen Mary. His grace was constituted lord high commissioner to King William's first parliament in the following June, and was also president of the council and high admiral of Scotland. He was again high commissioner to the parliament which met 18th April 1693, and on 19th December following re-appointed an extraordinary lord of session. He died at Holyroodhouse, 18th April 1694, in his 60th year. His wife, Anne, duchess of Hamilton, survived him till 1717. She resigned her titles in favour of her eldest son, the earl of Arran, who was accordingly created duke of Hamilton, with the original precedency. They had, with four daughters, seven sons, namely, James, fourth duke of Hamilton, Lord William, who died in France, without issue, Lord Charles, earl of Selkirk (see SELKIRK, earl of), Lord John, earl of Ruglen (see RUGLEN, earl of), Lord George, earl of Orkney (see ORKNEY, earl of), Lord Basil (for whom see SELKIRK, earl of), and Lord Archibald. The latter, Lord Archibald Hamilton of Riccarton and Pardovan a distinguished naval officer, master and one of the commissioners of Greenwich Hospital who died 5th April 1754, was father of the Right Hon Sir William Hamilton, long British ambassador at Naples, of whom a memoir is afterwards given in larger type.

Of James, fourth duke of Hamilton, and first duke of Brandon in the peerage of the United Kingdom, a memoir is afterwards given in larger type. He was twice married, and with six daughters, had three sons. The latter, with four of the daughters, he had by his second wife. The sons were, James, fifth duke, Lord William, M P for Lanarkshire, who died in July 1734, and Lord Anne, so called after Queen Anne, his godmother, an ensign in the army, who died in France in December 1748. By Lady Barbara Fitzroy, third daughter of Charles the Second and the duchess of Cleveland, his grace, then earl of Arran, had a natural son, Charles Hamilton, born at Cleveland House, 30th March 1691, during his father's confinement in the Tower, as afterwards related. Incensed at the discovery of this intrigue, the queen, and the earl's father, the duke of Hamilton, made the retreat of Lady Barbara to the Continent the principal condition of his release from the Tower. She accordingly withdrew to the nunnery of Pontoise, where she died. Her son was reared at Chiswick by his grandmother the duchess of Cleveland, and afterwards sent to France, where his education was intrusted to the earl of Middleton, secretary of state to the exiled monarch. He was held in great consideration by the court of St. Germains, where he was styled count of Arran. After the death of his father, who was killed in a duel with Lord Mohun, in 1712 he went to Antwerp, and sent a challenge to General Macartney, Mohun's second, but it was not accepted. He subsequently went to Switzerland, where he divided his time betwixt the pursuits of alchemy, and a friendly intercourse with the Earl Marischal of Scotland, then in exile. He was the author of 'Transactions during the reign of Queen Anne, from the union to the death of that princess,' published by his son at London in one volume, 1790, 8vo. He died at Paris, 13th August, 1754, aged 64 and was buried at Montmartre. He had married in 1737 Antoinette Courtney of Archambaud, by whom he had an only child, Charles Hamilton, born at Edinburgh 16th July, 1738, captain in the service of the East India Company, and died at Holyroodhouse 9th April, 1800, aged 62. He was the author of 'The Patriot, a Tragedy, altered from the Italian of Metastasio,' London, 1784, 8vo, 'An Historical Relation of the Origin, Progress, and Final Dissolution of the Government of the Rokilla Afghans, in the Northern Provinces of Hindostan, compiled from a Persian MS and other original papers,' Lond 1787, 8vo, 'Hedaya, or Guide, a Commentary on the Mussulman Laws, translated by order of the Governor-General and Council of Bengal,' London, 1791, 4 vols. 4to.

James, fifth duke of Hamilton, and second duke of Brandon, born about 1702, succeeded his father when he was only ten years old. He was installed a knight of the Thistle at Holyroodhouse 31st October 1726, and appointed in 1727 one of the lords of the bedchamber to King George the Second, but resigned that office in 1733, not approving of the measures of Sir Robert Walpole's administration. At the general election in 1734, he was a candidate to represent the Scottish peerage, in opposition to the court list, and died at Bath 9th March 1743, in his 41st year. He was thrice married first, to Lady Anne Cochrane, eldest of the three beautiful daughters of John fourth earl of Dundonald, secondly, to Elizabeth, fourth daughter of Thomas Strangeways of Melbury Sampford, Dorsetshire, and, thirdly, to Anne, daughter and co-heir of Edward Spenser of Rendlesham in Suffolk. By his first duchess he had a son, James, sixth duke of Hamilton, and by his third, a daughter, Anne, countess of Donegal, and two sons, Archibald, ninth duke of Hamilton, and Lord Spencer Hamilton, colonel in the guards and one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to the prince of Wales, who died 20th March 1791, in his 49th year

James, sixth duke of Hamilton, and third duke of Brandon, born in 1724, succeeded his father in 1743, and was invested with the order of the Thistle, 14th March, 1755. He died of inflammation in the chest, caught in hunting, after a few days' illness, at Great Tew in Oxfordshire, on 16th January 1758, in his 34th year He married Elizabeth, second daughter of John Gunning of Castle Coote, in the county of Roscommon, Ireland, one of the three beautiful Misses Gunning, and by her had a daughter, Lady Elizabeth, countess of Derby, James-George, seventh duke of Hamilton, and Douglas, eighth duke The widowed duchess married, secondly, 8d March 1759, John, fifth duke of Argyle, and was created a peeress of Great Britain, 4th May 1766, by the title of Baroness Hamilton of Hameldon, in the county of Leicester, with the dignity of Baron Hamilton to the heirs male of her body She died in 1790

James-George, seventh duke of Hamilton, and fourth duke of Brandon, born at Holyroodhouse, 18th February 1755, succeeded his father when only three years old. On the death of Archibald, duke of Douglas, in 1761, he became the male representative and chief of the illustrious house of Douglas, and succeeded to the titles of marquis of Douglas, earl of Angus, and lord of Abernethy and Jedburgh Forest. His guardians having asserted his right to the Douglas estates as male representative of that family, under the belief that Mr Douglas, born at Paris, son and heir of Lady Jane Stewart, sister of the last duke of Douglas, was a supposititious child, the protracted lawsuit, known as "the great Douglas cause," was the consequence. In Paris it was decided in favour of the duke of Hamilton, and the claim was again sustained by the court of session in Scotland, but on appeal to the House of Lords, it was ultimately decided in favour of Mr Douglas, afterwards created a peer of the United Kingdom by the title of Lord Douglas of Douglas (see page 49). Outgrowing his strength, the duke of Hamilton died at Hamilton palace, 7th July 1769, in his 15th year On his monument in the family cemetery, is a poetical inscription by Dr Moore, (father of Sir John Moore,) who had attended his grace to the Continent, and resided with him

Douglas, eighth duke of Hamilton, and fifth duke of Brandon, born 24th July 1756, succeeded his brother in 1769 In his travels on the Continent he was attended by Dr Moore, whose work, in four volumes, 8vo, entitled 'A View of Society and Manners in France and Italy,' contains an account of their excursion The duke came of age in 1777, when he raised the 82d regiment of foot, which highly distinguished itself in the American war, and in which he accepted a captain's commission, but resigned it in 1779 He had a grant of the offices of keeper of the palace of Linlithgow and castle of Blackness 25th November 1777, and a further grant of the same, with power to appoint deputies, 10th January, 1778. Having presented a petition to the king for a summons to parliament as duke of Brandon, his majesty, after a reference to the House of Lords, and the opinion of the twelve judges being taken that the 23d article of the Union did not debar the creation of peers of Scotland peers of Great Britain, on 11th June, 1782, caused a summons to be issued accordingly, and his grace, as duke of Brandon, took his seat in the house of peers, of which his family had been for so many years deprived In 1785, he moved the address of thanks for the king's speech, and the following year he was invested with the order of the Thistle. In 1798 he was appointed colonel of the militia and lord-lieutenant of the county of Lanark. He died 2d August 1799, in his 44th year He had married Elizabeth Anne, sister of Peter, Lord Gwydir, but having no issue by her, was succeeded by his uncle, Lord Archibald Hamilton, in all his titles, except that of Lord Hamilton of Hameldon in Leicestershire, which in right of his mother went to his brother uterine the marquis of Lorn, afterwards duke of Argyle.

Archibald, ninth duke of Hamilton, and sixth duke of Brandon, born 15th July 1740, inherited through his mother and grandmother, extensive property in the county of Suffolk, and in Lancashire, and Staffordshire. At the general election of 1768, he was elected M P for the county of Lancaster, but vacated his seat in 1772 He died 16th February 1819 He had married in 1765, Lady Harriet Stewart, 5th daughter of 6th earl of Galloway, and by her, who died in 1788, before her husband's accession to the ducal titles, he had 8 daughters and 2 sons, Alexander tenth duke, and Lord Archibald Hamilton

The latter, born March 16, 1769, distinguished himself as a political reformer and as an active and eloquent public speaker Chosen, in 1802 M P for Lanarkshire, he continued to represent that county till his death, taking a prominent part against the Pitt, Addington, and other Tory governments. In 1804 he published a pamphlet entitled 'Thoughts on the Formation of the Late and Present Administrations,' contending for a ministry on a broad and firm basis, and examining how far that of Mr Pitt answered the idea. He invariably endeavoured to correct abuses, and his exertions in the cause of burgh reform, made his name in his time very popular in Scotland. He died unm. Aug 28, 1827 His sister, Lady Anne Hamilton, eldest daughter of the 9th duke, was the confidential friend and companion of Queen Caroline, wife of George IV, and enjoyed no small amount of popularity for her adherence to that unfortunate princess. She died Oct. 10, 1846 Lady Charlotte, the next daughter, became duchess of Somerset, and died June 10, 1827 Lady Susan, the youngest, married her cousin, the earl of Dunmore, and died May 24 1846.

Alexander, 10th duke of Hamilton, and 7th of Brandon, the elder son of the 9th duke, born Oct. 8, 1767, in early life spent many years in Italy, where he acquired considerable taste in the fine arts. In 1801 he returned home, and the following year he was appointed colonel of the Royal Lanarkshire militia, and lord lieutenant of that county Till he reached the advanced age of fifty-two, he bore the courtesy title of marquis of Douglas and Clydesdale At the general election of 1803 he was elected M P for Lancaster, but on 28th May 1806, he was appointed British ambassador at St. Petersburg, under the administration of Charles James Fox, then for a short time prime minister On this occasion he was sworn a member of the privy council On 4th November of the same year he was summoned by writ to the house of peers as Baron Dutton in Cheshire, one of his father's titles. In 1807 the Whig administration went out of office on the Roman Catholic question, when he resigned the Russian embassy, and after having made an excursion through great part of Russia and Poland, he returned to Scotland the following year In 1819 he succeeded his father His energies after this period were devoted principally to the improvement of his estates, and the embellishment of his princely palace of Hamilton Besides inheriting two dukedoms, a Scottish and an English one, he assumed the title of duke of Chatelherault in France At the coronations of William IV and Queen Victoria, he officiated as high steward. In 1836 he was elected a knight of the Garter He was also a fellow of the royal society, and of the antiquarian society, and president of the royal society of Scotland. He likewise held two marquisates, three earldoms, and eight baronies. He never took any prominent part in politics, but generally gave his votes to the whig party A trait of private generosity is related of him which was highly honourable to his character His father, at his death, had left all his personal property to his second youngest daughter, the duchess of Somerset, to the exclusion of Lord Archibald Hamilton The duke, on being informed of this, immediately presented his brother with £20,000 His grace died in 1852, aged 85 On April 26, 1810, when 48 years of age, he married Susan Euphemia, youngest daughter of Mr William Beckford of Fonthill Abbey, author of 'Vathek,' and grand-daughter of the celebrated London alderman of that name Her grandmother was Lady Margaret Gordon, of the Aboyne family, and her mother was a Hamilton The issue of this marriage was a son, the 11th duke, and a daughter, Lady Susan Harriet Catherine, who was married Nov 27, 1832, to the earl of Lincoln (5th duke of Newcastle), to whom she had 4 sons and 1 dr, but was divorced in 1850

William Alexander Anthony Archibald, 11th duke of Hamilton and 8th of Brandon, born Feb 15, 1811, studied at Oxford, B.A. 1832 He m. in 1843 the princess Mary Amelia Elizabeth Caroline, (born 1818,) daughter of the grand duke of Baden, and cousin-german of Napoleon III, emperor of the French, issue, 2 sons and a daughter, viz, 1 William Alexander Louis Stephen, marquis of Douglas and Clydesdale, born in 1845, 2 Lord Charles George Archibald, born in 1847, 3. Lady Maria Victoria, born in 1850 His grace is hereditary keeper of Holyroodhouse, premier peer of Scotland, and knight marischal of Scotland, 1846, appointed lord lieutenant of Lanarkshire and colonel of its militia, 1852

The dukes of Hamilton have never relinquished their right to the title of duke of Chatelherault, in France, conferred on the Regent earl of Arran in 1548. The title is also claimed by the marquis of Abercorn, as male representative of the house of Hamilton

The most ancient cadet of the house of Hamilton is the family of Hamilton of Preston, East Lothian, and Fingalton Renfrewshire, which possesses a baronetcy of Scotland and Nova Scotia, conferred in 1678, on Sir William Hamilton, born in 1647 the 13th from the original progenitor of this line He was the son of Sir Thomas Hamilton of Preston, whose signature to the Covenant of 1638 is found on one of the few copies of that national compact that have escaped the ravages of time. Lieut.-col in the army which, in 1650 was raised to oppose the English invasion that followed on the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, Sir Thomas was present at the battle of Dunbar After that defeat his estates were plundered and his castle of Preston burnt, his charter chest, containing all his family papers and title-deeds, being consumed His sacrifices and exertions in the royal cause, with his subsequent services and sufferings, are commemorated at length in the records of the Scottish parliament. At the battle of Worcester in 1651, he also distinguished himself He died in 1672, leaving two sons, Sir William and Sir Robert, and a daughter, Janet, wife of the celebrated Alexander Gordon of Earlston, (see p. 325,) whose persecutions she shared Her religious meditations in the solitary dungeons of the Bass, have been frequently republished under the title of 'Lady Earlston's Soliloquies.' The baronetcy was conferred on the elder son, on 5th November, 1678, for the services of his father at Dunbar and Worcester Sir William, 1st baronet, maintained the principles, political and religious, of his family, being a presbyterian and a Whig, though he was wholly adverse to the extravagances and enthusiasm of his brother Robert, the leader of the extreme Covenanters He even accompanied the duke of Monmouth when marching to quell the insurrection headed by his brother His undisguised opposition, however, to the arbitrary measures of the court exposed him to the hostility of the ruling faction, and, proceeding to Holland, in 1681, he joined the Scottish and English malcontents assembled at the Hague. In 1685 he accompanied the earl of Argyle in his descent on Scotland, and after the failure of that ill-starred enterprise, he escaped a second time into Holland He held a high command in the army of the prince of Orange in the expedition to England in 1688, but died at Exeter, of a sudden illness, while the troops were on the march to London, in November of the same year As he left no male issue, he was succeeded in the title and representation of the family by his brother, Sir Robert.

Sir Robert Hamilton, 2d bart., a rigid Covenanter, was born in 1650 He was educated under Bishop Burnet, at the university of Glasgow, and according to the testimony of that author, (Hist. of his own Times, vol i p 471,) was, while at college, a sprightly youth of great promise. When the Presbyterians of Scotland, goaded to desperation by the oppression and tyranny of the Government, at length rose in arms in defence of their civil and religious liberties, Robert Hamilton at once placed himself at their head, and commanded the forces of the Covenanters with great intrepidity in the victory of Drumclog, and the discomfiture of Bothwell Bridge in June 1679 Laing, in his Account of the Western Insurrection, erroneously styles Hamilton a preacher

After the defeat at Bothwell Bridge, Hamilton avoided the consequences of his attainder and condemnation by retiring into Holland, and, along with his brother-in-law, Gordon of Earlston, he acted as commissioner in behalf of the "United Societies," whom he greatly assisted by his influence in obtaining for them the countenance and support of the continental churches. He resided principally at Holland till the Revolution of 1688, when he returned to Scotland His attainder being reversed, he succeeded on his brother's death, in November of that year to the representation and honours of the family, but as we learn from his own letters and his biographer (in Scots Worthies,) he could not, without violence to his notions of religious obligation, "acknowledge an uncovenanted sovereign of these covenanted nations," and he constantly refused to prefer any claim to his brother's estates, as such a proceeding would have necessarily involved a recognition of the title of the prince and princess of Orange to the crown of Scotland. At the same time being unmarried he contented himself with privately securing the entailed settlement of the family inheritance on the issue of his brother's eldest daughter, who had been married to the eldest son of Sir James Oswald

Sir Robert Hamilton's well-known sentiments in religious matters, with the intemperate avowal of his opinions, soon involved him in new troubles. Being suspected, with some show of reason, of having been the author of the Declaration published at Sanquhar, August 10, 1692, he was soon after arrested at Earlston, and detained a prisoner in Edinburgh and Haddington for nearly eight months. During this interval he was frequently brought before the privy council, but, though he declined their jurisdiction, and refused to answer the questions put to him, or take the oath of allegiance, or in any way acknowledge the authority of William and Mary, or enter into any obligation not to rise against their government, he was at length set at liberty in May 1693. From this period he was permitted to testify, without further official molestation, against the backslidings both in church and state; and his biographer (Scots Worthies) informs us that he was, during his life, the principal stay and comfort of that afflicted remnant, who alone, amid the general defection of the times, continued faithful in their adherence to Christ and his covenanted cause. He died unmarried, October 20, 1701, aged 51 years.

The representation and honours of the family devolved on Robert Hamilton of Airdrie, Lanarkshire, fifth in the male line from John, 2d son of Sir Robert Hamilton of Preston, 2d of that name. Born in 1650, with his cousin, Robert Hamilton of Preston, his immediate predecessor, he was implicated in the western rebellion of 1679, and after the defeat at Bothwell Bridge, was, with several of his domestics, arrested and carried prisoner to Edinburgh, but by the interest of his friends, liberated, after a month's confinement, on giving security "not to rise in arms against his majesty or his authority" He died January 18, 1705 He had 4 sons Robert, his successor; John, and James, whose male issue failed in the first generation, and Thomas, professor of anatomy and botany in the university of Glasgow, whose grandson ultimately succeeded to the representation of the family

Robert, the eldest son, embarked in some unfortunate speculations, which obliged him to alienate a great part of what remained of the family estates, and the last fragment of his inheritance was sold, after his death, during the minority of his eldest son By his wife, Mary, daughter of John Baird of Craigton, he had 8 sons, William, John, and Robert, who successively represented the family, and all died unmarried, and 2 daughters, Grizelda, wife of John Arnot, Esq, and Mary, who married Thomas Cochrane, M D

On the death of Robert, the youngest son, at St. Helena, in 1799, on his return from China, the representation of the family devolved on William, grandson of Professor Thomas Hamilton, above mentioned

This Thomas Hamilton married Isabella, daughter of Dr William Anderson, professor of church history in the university of Glasgow, and had a son, William, an eminent surgeon and lecturer on anatomy, born in that city July 31, 1758 He was educated in his native city, and took his degree of M.A in 1775 After studying for the medical profession at Edinburgh under Cullen and Black, he proceeded to London for further improvement. His zeal, application, and regularity of conduct, recommended him to the notice of Dr William Hunter, who invited him to reside with him, and intrusted him with the important charge of his dissecting room. Soon after, he returned to Glasgow, to assist his father in his lectures, and in 1781, when the latter resigned his chair, he was appointed his successor On his father's death in 1782, he succeeded also to his extensive practice In 1783 he married Elizabeth, 2d daughter of William Stirling, Esq, heir male of the ancient family of Calder, and by her had two sons, Sir William, and Thomas, a captain in the army (see page 446). He died March 13, 1790, in the 32d year of his age. A memoir of his life, by Professor Cleghorn, is inserted in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh for 1792

The elder son, William, succeeded to the representation and baronetcy of the family On July 24, 1816, he was retoured heir male in general to Sir Robert Hamilton, 5th of that name, and was the 24th male representative of Sir John Fits-Gilbert de Hamilton, of Rossavon and Fingalton, 2d son of Sir Gilbert, the founder of the house of Hamilton in Scotland. He thus resumed the baronetcy, after its having been in abeyance since the death of the 2d baronet in 1701 A memoir of Sir William Hamilton, professor of logic in the university of Edinburgh, and one of the first metaphysicians in Europe, is given at page 446 in larger type.

On his death, May 6, 1856, he was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir William, 4th baronet, born Sept. 17, 1830 After being educated at Edinburgh and Addiscombe, he became a lieutenant in the Bengal Artillery, being employed as assistant civil engineer, public works department, Punjaub. He married Oct. 15, 1856, Eliza Marcia, eldest daughter of Major Barr, Bengal Horse Artillery His next brother, Hubert, who passed advocate at the Scottish bar in 1860, was born in 1834.

The patent of baronetcy is in remainder to the heirs male general.

The family of Hamilton of Airdrie, was founded by John, 2d son of Sir Robert Hamilton, 7th representative of the house of Preston, by his first wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir John Mowat of Stanehouse. He married before 1503, Helen, daughter of Archibald Crawford, of Ruchsulloch, hereditary bailie of the Monkland, and had 2 sons, Methusalem, his successor, and William Educated in Glasgow University, he repeatedly appears with his brothers, Robert, Patrick, and James, as procurator for his father and other relatives, in actions before the lords of council, in 1507 and 1508.

The elder son, Methusalem, died after 1564, his eldest son, John, having predeceased him in 1561,

His 2d son, Gavin, succeeded him Like most gentlemen of the Hamilton name, he supported the cause of Queen Mary He was engaged in the celebrated capture of the king's party in Stirling in 1571, and was compelled to produce guarantees for his obedience in 1572 and 1579. He married in 1567, Isabella, daughter of James Robertson, of Ernock, issue 4 sons and a daughter He died Aug 17, 1591

His eldest son, John, born in 1569, married Janet, daughter of Robert Hamilton of Torrence, and had 2 sons and 3 daughters. The elder son, John, having predeceased him, without issue, in 1641, he was succeeded, on his death in 1648, by his younger son, Gavin

This gentleman was appointed, in 1649, parliamentary commissioner of war for the county of Lanark, and he accompanied William, duke of Hamilton, and his kinsman, Sir Thomas Hamilton of Preston, in the unfortunate expedition into England under Charles II. in 1651 His estate, like the fortunes of most other gentlemen of his name, was deeply involved by his exertions in the double cause of the covenant and king. Gavin Hamilton married Jane, daughter of Robert Montgomery, of Hazlehead, by Jane, daughter of Sir James Hamilton, of Preston, and died Dec. 29, 1687 His widow survived him for many years; and the male line of her family having become extinct, about the conclusion of the century, that ancient branch of the house of Eglinton is now exclusively represented by her descendants as heirs of line. Gavin Hamilton had two sons, Robert and William, of the latter of whom afterwards.

Robert, the elder son, in 1688 made up titles as heir to his father, and, in 1695, he obtained an act of parliament in his favour, "for the holding of a weekly market and four yearly fairs in his town of Airdrie." He succeeded to the representation of the family, after the death of his cousin, Robert Hamilton of Preston, in 1701, as above mentioned.

Gavin Hamilton of Airdrie's 2d son, William Hamilton, D D, born in 1675, was baptized at a conventicle. In 1694, he was ordained minister of Cramond, and in Oct. 1709, was appointed professor of divinity in the university of Edinburgh In discharging the duties of this chair he peculiarly endeared himself to the students under his care by his kindness, candour, and affability, and after acquiring the highest reputation among his contemporaries for piety and theological erudition, and distinguishing himself as a leader in the government of the Church of Scotland, he was appointed principal of the university He died Nov 12, 1782, leaving a numerous family

One of his sons, Gavin Hamilton, was an eminent publisher in Edinburgh A man of fine taste and high literary and scientific attainments, he occupied a prominent place in Edinburgh society At the time of the Porteous Mob in 1736, he was junior bailie of the city, and while on duty on that eventful night, he received a message from a married sister, in the neighbourhood, intimating that she had something particular to communicate. Supposing it to be of public importance, he made his way through the crowd and went to her house On his arrival, his sister locked the door, and said she would not let him out again, to which he sternly replied, "Madam, I must be on duty to-night, and if you will not let me out at the door, I will jump the window" Seeing him so determined she unlocked the door, and he resumed his station at the prison gate, where he narrowly escaped being killed by a blow from a Lochaber axe. In 1740 he was again in the magistracy, and risked his life in quelling a meal mob in the village of the Water of Leith, where the public granaries of the city of Edinburgh are situated There was a famine in Scotland at the time, and the people were ferocious from want.

In 1745, he was senior bailie of Edinburgh, and the lord provost, Stewart, being a Jacobite, Mr Hamilton, as a staunch supporter of the reigning family, was often exposed to jeopardy in the discharge of the important duties entrusted to him By his wife, Helen, daughter of James Balfour, of Pilrig, he had a large family A memoir of his 8th son, Dr Robert Hamilton, the celebrated mathematician, is given in larger type at page 444 of this volume.

Bailie Gavin Hamilton's brother, Robert Hamilton, D D, born at Cramond, May 19 1707, 4th son of Principal William Hamilton was ordained minister of his native parish April 4, 1731 In 1736, he was appointed minister of Lady Yester's, Edinburgh, and in 1754 professor of divinity in Edinburgh university, when he gave up Lady Yester's. He was also dean of the order of the Thistle. He was respected for his sterling good sense and sound principles, and for his steady opposition to the infidel spirit of the age, encouraged as it was by the popular writings and attractive manners of David Hume. He was known to lament the court paid to that eminent author by some of his brethren of the clergy, saying they were misled by the pride of literary talent. Dr Hamilton married Jean, daughter of John Hay, Esq, of Hayston, Perthshire

His son, Dr James Hamilton, was an eminent physician in Edinburgh He was born in 1749, and educated at the High School there After taking his degree at the university, he spent some years on the Continent. Elected one of the physicians to the Royal Infirmary of the Scottish capital, he afterwards obtained, in succession, the same office in George Heriot's Hospital, the Merchant Maiden, and the Trades Maiden Hospitals in that city and held these appointments for upwards of fifty years. In the two first mentioned hospitals his portrait is preserved. A full length etching of him, in the costume of the old school, with three cocked hat, which he always wore, is also given in 'Kay's Edinburgh Portraits." He was the author of a valuable and elegantly written medical work, entitled, 'Observations on the Utility and Administration of Purgative Medicine in Several Diseases;' the 8th edition of which 'Revised and Improved by the Author, with a Chapter on Cold Bathing, Considered in its Purgative Effect, was published in 1826 Dr Hamilton died at Edinburgh in 1835 His sister, Grizel Hamilton, married Benjamin Bell, Esq, surgeon in that city, of whom a memoir is given in larger type at page 278, vol. i. of this work.

Gilbert Hamilton, D D, a younger son of Principal William Hamilton, born May 16, 1715, was ordained minister of Cramond, May 1, 1737, as successor to his brother Robert. He was a man of an accomplished mind, deeply imbued with the charms of poetry, and a great lover of the classics and general literature. He was so much attached to his parish that he would not remove from it, although solicited to accept of a charge in Edinburgh He married Margaret, daughter of John Craigie, Esq, of Halhill and Dumbarnie, by Susan, daughter of Sir John Inglis, of Cramond, and died in May 1772, leaving 3 daughters 1st, Anne, Mrs. Dinwiddie, mother of Gilbert Dinwiddie, Esq, deputy commissary general, 2d, Susan, wife of Alexander Anderson, Esq, of Kingask, and mother of Major Anderson, of Montrave, parish of Scoonie, Fifeshire, 3d, Mary, died unmarried

Principal Hamilton's daughter, Anne, wife of Rev Mr Horsley, an English clergyman, was mother of Dr Samuel Horsley, bishop of St. Asaph

The Hamiltons of Silvertonhill, Lanarkshire, a family in possession of a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, are descended from Alexander de Hamilton, 2d son of Sir James Hamilton, dominus de Cadzow, and are therefore next to the Abercorn family in the male representation of the house of Hamilton This Alexander de Hamilton had a charter, in 1449, from Alexander, earl of Crawford, wherein he was styled "Alexander de Hamilton, of Quhitecamp, afterwards of Silvertonhill" He had also a charter of a piece of land adjoining the estate of Westport, Linlithgowshire, sold to him by a person of the name of Wilde, a burgess of Linlithgow In a charter of settlement of the Hamilton estates, granted to his brother, the first Lord Hamilton, of date Oct 28, 1455, he was called next in succession after his brother's daughter, Elizabeth, and his natural sons. He appears to have left two sons, James and William, ancestor of the Hamiltons of Westport

James, the elder son, in a charter of settlement of the Hamilton estates granted to James, 1st earl of Arran, of date January 16, 1512 13, was called next in succession, after Sir James Hamilton, of Fynnart, Patrick Hamilton, of Kincavil, and John Hamilton, of Brumehill With his wife, a daughter of the family of Douglas, he got the lands of Newton, in the barony of Drumsargard. He had a son, John, designed of Newton, and a daughter, married to James, Viscount Teviot

John Hamilton, the son, married a daughter of Sir John Somerville, of Quodquhan, and had a son, Andrew, and a daughter Margaret, wife of Archibald Hamilton of Raploch He died, according to Crawford, in 1535

His son, Andrew, who predeceased him, had 3 sons, Andrew, Alexander, tutor of Silvertonhill, who carried on the line of this family, and John, of Cubardy

Andrew, the eldest son, succeeded his grandfather In a charter of settlement of the Hamilton estates, granted to the duke of Chatelherault, of date Sep 15, 1540, he was called next in succession after David Hamilton, of Brumehill. He married a daughter of James Hamilton, of Stanehouse, and died in the beginning of the reign of Queen Mary, leaving an infant son, Andrew

This Andrew Hamilton of Silvertonhill, was carefully educated under the guardianship of his uncle, Alexander He married Elspeth, a daughter of Baillie, of Carfin, and had several children, who all predeceased him but one son

The son, Francis Hamilton, of Silvertonhill, is described as having been "a very enthusiastic, wrong-headed man He fancied himself bewitched by Dame Isobel Boyd, Lady Blair, which appears by several extravagant petitions to parliament from him in 1641. He died not long after this, having greatly squandered away the family estate, and, as he never was married, the representation devolved on the descendants of his grand-uncle, Alexander" (Anderson's Historical and Genealogical Memoirs of the House of Hamilton, page 378.)

Alexander Hamilton, tutor of Silvertonhill, got from his father the lands of Goslingtoun, which for sometime continued to be the title of his family He had 2 sons, Sir Andrew, and John, mentioned in the list of the Hamiltons, circa 1570 Alexander's latter will and testament is dated at Newton, August 31, 1547 Sir Andrew, his son, and Catherine his spouse, were appointed his successors.

The elder son, Sir Andrew Hamilton, of Goslingtoun, was a faithful and loyal subject of Queen Mary, by whom he was knighted He was at the battle of Langside, for which he was forfeited, but had his possessions restored to him, by the treaty of Perth, in 1572 He died in 1592, leaving 3 sons, 1st, Sir Robert, 2d, James Hamilton, of Tweedieside, who, for his attachment to the interests of the Hamilton family, was obliged to take refuge in England, but returned from exile in 1585, 3d, Andrew

Sir Robert Hamilton, of Goslingtoun, the eldest son, married Elizabeth, daughter and sole heiress of Sir William Baillie, of Provan, lord president of the court of session, and had 5 sons, and one daughter Sir Robert died in 1642

His eldest son, Francis, having predeceased him, he was succeeded by his 2d son, Edward, designed first of Balgray, afterwards of Silvertonhill He had a charter, under the great seal, dated July 8, 1635, of the lands of Tweedie, Goslingtoun, Provan, &c., containing an entail, first to himself, and the heirs male of his body, which failing, to Robert Hamilton, his brother, and the heirs male of his body, which failing, to his next brother, James, a merchant burgess of Glasgow, who died in 1655 In this charter there are some lands mentioned which had been evicted from Francis Hamilton of Silvertonhill by John Crawford, and again acquired by Edward, all which are now confirmed to him, and he accordingly took the title of Silvertonhill, which afterwards continued to be that of the family By his wife Marion, daughter of Mure of Caldwell, Edward had 2 sons, Sir Robert, and John, and 2 daughters, Jean, married to the laird of Minto-Stewart, and Christian He died in 1649

The elder son, Sir Robert Hamilton, of Silvertonhill, was a steady adherent of Charles I., by whom he was created a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia about 1646. He married Hon Anne Hamilton, 2d daughter of John, 1st Lord Belhaven, and had 2 sons, Sir Robert, and Thomas, who died in France, and 4 daughters 1st. Margaret wife of John, eldest son of Robert Hamilton of Presmannan, her maternal grandfather, Lord Belhaven, settled on them the estate of Biel, and resigned his title in favour of John Hamilton, who, of course, became 2d Lord Belhaven, on his death in 1679 2d, Anne, married to Sir William Craigie, of Garnie, without issue. 3d. Elizabeth, married to John Livingstone, Esq, a captain of dragoons, whose son, James, married a daughter of Sir James Foulis of Colinton. 4th, Mary Sir Robert sold the lands and barony of Provan to the city of Glasgow in 1652, and otherwise encumbered his fortune.

His elder son, Sir Robert, 2d baronet, was a colonel in the army He was likewise for some time in the service of the States of Holland He also greatly dilapidated the family estate, and died in 1708. He was twice married, 1st, to Amelia Catherine Van Hettingen, a lady of Friesland, and, 2dly, to Isobel, daughter of John Hamilton of Boggs. By his first wife he had 4 sons and 2 daughters, and by his 2d, one daughter The sons were, 1st, James, who entered the army, and was killed in action while yet very young; 2d, Sir John, 3d, William, an officer in the Dutch service, who had a son, John, lieut.-col. of Holstein's regiment, Robert, a captain in the army; and William, a major in the Dutch guards, 4th, George.

His 2d son, Sir John, 3d baronet, lived some time at Hull, Yorkshire, and afterwards in the island of Jersey, and died in 1748. With two daughters he had 2 sons, Sir Robert, and George, a youth of great spirit, who for his zeal, merit, and good behaviour at Quebec, &c., was appointed a captain in the Royal navy, and died at Halifax in 1763, without issue.

The elder son, Sir Robert, 4th baronet, was a lieut.-gen in the army, and colonel of the 108th foot, a regiment reduced at the peace in 1763, when he was appointed colonel of the 40th He was twice married, but had issue only by his first wife, Mary, daughter of William Parr Williams, Esq, an eminent lawyer, namely, a son, John William, Captain 54th regiment, who retired from the army to become under secretary at war in Ireland, and predeceased his father He had married Mary Anne, daughter of Richard St. George, Esq, of Kilrush, county Kilkenny He had a son, Frederick, who succeeded his grandfather, and a daughter, the wife of Lieut.-general Sir William Anson, K.C.B, with issue.

Sir Frederick, 5th baronet, born Dec. 14, 1777, was in the service of the East India Company, as collector of revenues for the district of Benares, and died Aug. 14, 1853 He married Feb. 20, 1800, Eliza Ducarel, youngest daughter of John Collie, M D, Calcutta, issue, 5 sons and 1 daughter

The eldest son, Sir Robert North Collie Hamilton, 6th baronet, born April 7, 1802, entered the civil service of the East India Company on the Bengal establishment as writer, in April 1819, and was for some years resident at the court of Indore in Central India. In 1859 he received the thanks of parliament for his services in the suppression of the Indian mutinies. The same year, he was appointed provisional member of the council of the governor-general. He marries Oct. 6, 1831, Constantia, 3d daughter of General Sir George Anson, G C B, issue, 3 sons, 1st, Robert Howden, died young, 2d, Frederick Hardinge Anson, born in 1836, 3d, Francis, born April 7, 1840, and 3 daughters.

The Hamiltons of Kincavel, Linlithgowshire, were descended from Sir Patrick Hamilton, natural son of James, 1st Lord Hamilton, and brother of 1st earl of Arran Of Sir Patrick Hamilton of Kincavel, some notices will be found at pages 417 and 418 of this volume. He had a charter of the lands of Kincavel, county of Linlithgow, dated September 22, 1498. In a charter of settlement of the Hamilton estates, by the first earl of Arran, dated January 16, 1512-13, he was called next in succession after his brother's natural son, Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart, being the second in succession at that time. Four days afterwards his legitimation passed the great seal He was killed in the skirmish betwixt the Hamiltons and the Douglases on the High Street of Edinburgh, April 30, 1520, called Cleanse the Causeway" He married Catherine, daughter of Alexander, duke of Albany, 2d son of King James II, and had 2 sons, James, his successor, and Patrick, abbot of Ferne, Ross-shire, the protomartyr, a memoir of whom is given next page in larger type.

The elder son, James Hamilton of Kincavel, was sheriff of Linlithgowshire and captain of Blackness. The brother of the protomartyr, he did not escape persecution from the popish party In 1534 he was summoned before the ecclesiastical court to answer to a charge of heresy, but dreading an unfavourable result, he took refuge abroad, and on his non-appearance at Holyrood, on the 16th of August, the day of citation, the bishop of Ross pronounced the doom of heresy against him After an exile of six years, he was permitted in 1540, to return to Scotland for a few months, to arrange his private affairs, at which time, through the medium of his son, he preferred the charge of high treason against his kinsman, Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart, which ultimately brought that personage to the scaffold (see page 428). The sentence of the bishop of Ross was afterwards reversed by the General Assembly in 1563

His son, James Hamilton of Kincavel, a faithful adherent of Queen Mary, was taken prisoner at the battle of Langside, and condemned to death by the Regent Moray, but reprieved and pardoned at the intercession of the Reformed Clergy His estates, which had been confiscated, were restored to him by the treaty of Perth in 1572 On Feb 10 same year, he executed an obligation to maintain the true faith, and not again to relapse into popery, a curious vacillation in the nephew of the protomartyr

Patrick Hamilton of Kincavel, supposed to be the son of James, for adhering to the interests of the Hamilton family, had to fly into England, when his lands were confiscated, but returning with the exiled lords in 1585, they were restored

The Hamiltons of the Peel of Livingston, same county, are supposed to have been the same family as Kincavel.

HAMILTON, PATRICK, abbot of Ferne, usually considered the first martyr in Scotland to the doctrines of the Reformed religion, was born about 1503 He was the second son of Sir Patrick Hamilton of Kincavel, natural brother of the first earl of Arran His mother was the daughter and not the sister, as is commonly supposed, of Alexander duke of Albany, second son of James the Second, king of Scotland He was educated at the university of St Andrews, and, while still very young, had the abbacy of Ferne, in Rossshire, conferred on him, to enable him to prosecute his studies with a view to high preferment in the church Proceeding into Germany, he remained for some time at the university of Wittenberg, and afterwards removed to that of Marpurg, where he was the first to introduce public disputations on theological questions Having become intimate, during his residence on the Continent with Martin Luther and Philip Melancthon, he soon imbibed the opinions of these illustrious reformers, and, on his return to Scotland, he began publicly to expose the corruptions of the Church of Rome, and to promulgate the Reformed doctrines with great zeal, his high reputation as a scholar, his irreproachable moral character, and his courteous demeanour, contributing much to his usefulness in the good work The clergy became alarmed at the progress of the new religion, and their resentment against the youthful Reformer rose to the utmost height of persecuting rage. Under pretence of desiring a friendly conference with him on religious matters, Cardinal Bethune enticed him to St Andrews, at that time the principal seat of the Romish clergy, where one Alexander Campbell, a prior of the Black Friars, had several private interviews with him, and treacherously pretended to acknowledge the force of his objections to the prevailing conduct of the clergy, and even to admit the errors of the Church of Rome This Campbell was afterwards his principal accuser Hamilton was apprehended in the middle of the night, and next day was brought before the cardinal and his convention, charged with maintaining and preaching heretical opinions After a long examination, he was condemned as an obstinate heretic, and delivered over to the secular power, the sentence being signed by the archbishops of St Andrews and Glasgow, the bishops of Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dunblane, and a number of abbots, priors, and doctors, as well as by every person of note in the university The same day he was also condemned by the secular power, and in the afternoon, immediately after dinner, he was hurried to the stake, the fire being prepared in the area in front of the gate of St Salvador's college He suffered with great fortitude and constancy, March 1, 1527, in the 28d year of his age He was the author of Patrick's Places, or, Common Places. Originally written in Latin, and afterwards translated by John Frith into English, under the title of, Fruitfull Gatherynges of Scripture 12mo In 1807 appeared a new edition of Patrick's Places, a Treatise on the Law and Gospel This ingenious and extraordinary composition is inserted in Fox's Acts and Monuments.

HAMILTON, SIR JAMES OF FYNNART, the principal architect in Scotland of his time, was the natural son of the first earl of Arran, by a lady of the name of Boyd, a daughter, according to Lord Somerville, of Lord Boyd, or, according to Crawford, of Boyd of Bonshaw Sir James, while yet a young man, received from his father the barony of Fynnart in Renfrewshire, and became a great favourite with James V, who appointed him cupbearer and steward of the royal household, and superintendent of the royal palaces and castles.

Under his directions the two palaces of Falkland and Linlithgow were erected, and the castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, Rothesay, &c. were re-edified or adorned by his genius His sovereign, whose fine taste in architecture, sculpture, and painting, enabled him to appreciate his merits, rewarded him with several grants of land He acquired besides many other valuable estates, and his possessions altogether equalled those of the first barons in the realm Indeed, few of the nobility, not even the family from which he sprung, appeared at court with such a numerous and splendid retinue He had castles and houses in different parts of the kingdom, and his great opulence and power were shown in the rebuilding of the castle of Craignethan, in Lanarkshire, which afforded shelter to Queen Mary, for a few days, after her escape from Lochleven, and is supposed to be the castle of Tillietudlem, described in the 'Tales of My Landlord'

Sir James' father obtained a legitimation for him under the great seal on January 20, 1512–13, and King James, by charter, dated March 3d, 1530, granted him liberty to incorporate part of the royal arms with his own armorial bearings, which his descendant, Hamilton of Gilkerscleugh, continues to carry till this day

Unfortunately for Sir James, he accepted the office of ecclesiastical judge in all matters of heresy, and in his capacity of Inquisitor-General, he was guilty of great cruelty and severity towards the favourers of the reformed doctrines Pinkerton asserts that he never held this odious office, but it cannot be doubted that he gave his sanction to the persecuting measures of the Romish clergy, which ultimately led to his own downfall A son of his kinsman, James Hamilton of Kincavel, had been denounced as a heretic, and fearing that he would experience the fate of the young man's uncle, the proto-martyr, Patrick Hamilton, who had been burnt at the stake about ten years previously, the father sent a younger son with a private message to the king, who referred him to the treasurer, Kirkaldy, the secretary, Sir Thomas Erskine, and the master of the household, Sir Thomas Learmonth, to whom young Hamilton accused Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart of treason and embezzlement of the moneys he had received for the erection and repair of the royal palaces. Sir James was accordingly brought to trial, and having been found guilty, was beheaded and quartered, and his lands and possessions confiscated to the crown This happened in 1540, but three years afterwards the family estates were restored to his son, Sir James Hamilton of Evandale The king, it is said, regretted much his death, and the historians of that period record several frightful dreams of his majesty relative to his late favourite, whose sudden and unexpected downfall created a great sensation throughout the kingdom

HAMILTON, James, second earl of Arran, regent of Scotland, the first who in that country authorised the Bible to be read in the vulgar tongue, was the eldest son of James, Lord Hamilton, first earl of Arran, by his third wife, Janet, daughter of Sir David Bethune of Creich, niece of Cardinal Bethune He succeeded his father some time before July 1529, and in the summer of 1536, before he came of age, he accompanied James V in an excursion to the Orkneys and Hebrides In September of the same year, he embarked with the king for France, and was present at the nuptials of his majesty to the Princess Margaret, eldest daughter of Francis I, which were solemnized at the church of Notre Dame, Paris, with extraordinary magnificence

On the death of James the Fifth, in December 1542, the earl of Arran, in right of his proximity of blood to the infant queen, was declared regent by the Estates of the realm In his first parliament he passed a number of patriotic acts, one of which sanctioned a translation of the Bible into the language of the laity, which contributed much to the advancement of the Reformation in Scotland He likewise entertained in his family, as domestic chaplains, two of the most noted preachers of the reformed religion, which procured him the favour of the great body of the people.

Henry the Eighth of England having proposed a marriage between his only son Edward, and the young Queen Mary of Scotland, offered, if Arran would deliver the person of Mary into his hands, to make him king of all Scotland beyond the Forth, to give his daughter Elizabeth in marriage to his eldest son, and to support him with all his power in his new dignity, which proposition the regent at once rejected A treaty of peace, however, between the two kingdoms, and one of marriage between the young queen of Scots and Prince Edward, were concluded on July 1, 1543 Against the alliance with England, Argyle, Huntly, Bothwell, and other powerful nobles, openly protested, and by their assistance Cardinal Bethune, who had been intriguing against the regent's authority, but was soon after released, seized the persons of the young queen and her mother, and invited over from France the earl of Lennox, the hereditary enemy of the Hamiltons On his arrival, instigated by the malcontent lords, that nobleman began to collect troops and oppose the measures of the regent A reconciliation having been effected between Arran and the cardinal, the regent was induced to renounce the friendship of England, and enter into a new league with France Lennox had, in the meantime, been joined by the earl of Glencairn, the baron of Tullibardine, and other lords, and after a hollow attempt at an accommodation, he was defeated by the regent near Glasgow, in 1544, and soon after was forced to take refuge in England

In the spring of 1544, King Henry, indignant at the conduct of the Scots, sent the earl of Hertford with a body of troops, destined for the French wars, to invade Scotland Landing at Leith, the earl soon became master of that place, and, marching directly to Edinburgh, after devastating the adjacent country, he laid siege to the castle, which was bravely defended by the governor, James Hamilton of Stanehouse On the approach of a considerable force hastily collected by the regent, the English commander set fire to the city, and, embarking part of his troops on board his fleet, with the remainder made a rapid and disorderly retreat to the borders On February 17, 1545, the regent defeated with great slaughter a considerable body of English under Lord Evers, Sir Brian Latoun, and the earl of Lennox, at Penniehaugh, near Jedburgh, when the two former were among the slain. On the assassination of Cardinal Bethune, May 29, 1546, the archbishopric of St. Andrews was bestowed by the regent on his natural brother, John Hamilton, abbot of Paisley

In September 1547, the earl of Hertford, now duke of Somerset, and protector of England, entered Scotland at the head of eighteen thousand men, while a fleet of sixty ships appeared off the coast, to second his forces on land The regent had foreseen this invasion, and was prepared for it, but the Scots army, in their eagerness to attack the English, unfortunately abandoned a most favourable position which they had taken up, and were defeated at Pinkie, near Musselburgh, with great loss The regent, however, by his prudence, prevented Somerset from reaping any material advantage, and he soon afterwards returned to England Subjoined is his portrait

In 1548 a new treaty was entered into with France, by which the young queen was betrothed to the dauphin, and when she was scarcely six years of age, she was sent to that country for her education, and on February 8th, the regent was created by the French king duke of Chatelherault, in the province of Poitou Owing, however, to the intrigues of the queen-mother, Mary of Guise, and the unceasing exertions of his enemies, a strong party was formed in Scotland against his authority, and after many delays the duke resigned the regency in a parliament which met April 10 1554, when the queen-mother was immediately raised to that high office, which had so long been the object of her ambition On this occasion Arran received from France the confirmation of his French title, with a considerable pension, as well as from the Scottish parliament a formal recognition of his right of succession to the crown, and a public ratification of his conduct during his regency The duke of Chatelherault afterwards joined the lords of the Congregation, and employed all his power and influence in support of the reformed faith, which, after the death of the queen regent, was, by the parliament that met August 1, 1560, recognised as the established religion of the Scottish nation

In consequence of his opposition to Mary's marriage with Darnley, the duke was forced in 1565 to retire first to England, and afterwards to France During his absence occurred the murder of Darnley, the criminal marriage of Mary with Bothwell, the speedy exile of the latter, the queen's deposition and imprisonment in Lochleven castle, the elevation of the earl of Moray to the regency, the escape of Queen Mary, the battle of Langside, and the queen's flight into England On his return to Scotland in 1569, the duke claimed the regency as his by right of blood, and in virtue of a commission from Queen Mary, constituting him lieutenant-general of the kingdom, he began to assemble his friends and raise forces At a meeting, however, which afterwards took place between the duke and the earl of Moray, the former agreed to acknowledge the king's authority, while the latter bound himself to get the forfeiture taken off all those who had supported the queen's interest, and to restore their estates Soon after Moray, under pretence that they were plotting in behalf of Queen Mary, ordered his guards to seize the duke and Lord Herries, and committed them prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh, where they remained till the murder of the regent by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, in the succeeding January, when they were set at liberty The earl of Lennox, on being chosen regent, proclaimed the duke of Chatelherault, the earls of Huntly and Argyle, and the other leaders of the queen's party, traitors and enemies to their country, and in 1571 shamefully beheaded the duke's brother, the archbishop of St. Andrews. For two years after this the country was desolated with the civil war which raged between the regent's party and the Hamiltons, or the "king's men" and "queen's men," as the two factions were called, but after the earl of Morton's elevation to the regency, a treaty was concluded at Perth with the duke and the earl of Huntly, by which the establishment of the reformed religion and the king's authority were secured, and the duke and the queen's friends were relieved of the act of attainder which had been passed against them The duke spent the remainder of his days on his estates, and died at Hamilton palace, January 22, 1575

HAMILTON, JOHN, Archbishop of St Andrews, was the natural son of James, first earl of Arran Mackenzie says that he studied the belles lettres and philosophy at the university of Glasgow, and theology in France, where he entered into holy orders, and that he was nominated, in 1541, abbot of Paisley, but Crawford states that he attained to this dignity in 1525 On his return to Scotland from France in 1543, one of his first measures was to effect a reconciliation between his brother the regent and Cardinal Bethune, who had till then been Arran's determined enemy He now joined the cardinal in his opposition to the proposed matrimonial treaty with England, and prevailed on the regent to renounce the friendship of Henry the Eighth, and to renew the alliance with France In January 1543 he was appointed keeper of the privy seal, and he held that situation till August 1546 In the former year he also succeeded Kirkaldy of Grange as treasurer of the kingdom, an office which he retained till the resignation of the regency by his brother in 1554 In June 1545 he obtained a legitimation under the great seal, and shortly after he was created bishop of Dunkeld On the assassination of Cardinal Bethune in May 1546, he became archbishop of St Andrews, and under his primacy, Adam Wallace, and Walter Mill, an aged preacher of the Reformed doctrines, were burnt at the stake for heresy

In 1551, when the archbishop was confined to his bed, by a dangerous and lingering malady, advantage was taken of his illness by the queen mother, Mary of Guise, to endeavour to get the regency into her own hands, and she was so far successful in her design, that the earl of Arran was induced to enter into a negotiation on the subject, with the view of resigning to her his authority But no sooner was the primate, by the aid of the celebrated Cardan, restored to health, than he used all his influence with his brother to break off the negotiation, and Arran, in consequence, retained possession of the regency for three years more, and only resigned it at last on receiving a parliamentary acknowledgment of his right of succession to the throne The archbishop subsequently endeavoured in vain to obstruct the progress of the Reformation in Scotland, and in 1563, three years after the new religion had obtained the sanction of the legislature, he was committed to the castle of Edinburgh for having celebrated mass contrary to law He was soon, however, liberated, on the intercession of Queen Mary, at whose request he baptized, in 1566, the infant prince James, with the ceremonies of the Church of Rome The queen having soon after restored him to his consistorial jurisdiction, he granted a commission to judges, who pronounced sentence of divorce between the earl of Bothwell and his wife, the Lady Jean Gordon He adhered faithfully to the queen throughout her subsequent misfortunes in Scotland, and after the battle of Langside, he was among those of the name of Hamilton who were proscribed and attainted by parliament On the capture of the castle of Dumbarton, April 2, 1571, the archbishop, who had found a temporary refuge there, was taken prisoner, and carried under a strong guard to Stirling, where an attempt was made to convict him of the murder of the king (Lord Darnley) and the regent (the earl of Moray), but these accusations could not be substantiated He was, however, condemned to death by the regent Lennox, in terms of the act of forfaulture already passed against him, and was accordingly hanged in his pontifical robes on the common gibbet of Stirling, April 5, 1571, being the first bishop in Scotland who had died by the hands of the executioner, and the last Scottish primate of the Roman Catholic church By his mistress, Grizzel Semple, widow of James Hamilton of Stanehouse, he had two sons and one daughter The elder son, was William Hamilton of Blair near Culross, whose grandson, Peter Hamilton, was first episcopal minister at Cramond, afterwards at Leith, and subdean of the chapel-royal By Charles the Second he was promoted to be bishop of Dunkeld, and died after the Revolution, without issue Crawford describes him as "a pleasant facetious gentleman, and an excellent companion over a bottle"

HAMILTON, JOHN, a factious and turbulent secular priest, who, in the sixteenth century, rendered himself conspicuous by his furious zeal in behalf of the Church of Rome, was the second son of Thomas Hamilton of Orchartfield, grandfather of the first earl of Haddington He left Scotland on account of his religion, and fixing his residence at Paris in 1573, was soon after appointed professor of philosophy in the college of Navarre In 1576 he became tutor to the cardinal de Bourbon, and in 1578 to Francis de Joyeuse, afterwards a cardinal

In October 1584 Hamilton was chosen rector of the university of Paris, and in the following year was presented, by the students forming the German nation of that university, to the cure of the parishes of St Cosmus and Damian He was a zealous partisan of the Catholic league of 1586, and in 1590, when Henry IV besieged Paris, he collected the ecclesiastics of the capital, and marshalling them in battle order, advanced at their head against the forces of the heretics In 1591 he was one of the "Conseil des Seize Quartiers," who offered the crown of France to Philip II of Spain, when, among other atrocities, that society of bigots decreed the death of Brisson, president of the parliament of Paris, and of L'Archer and Tardif, two of the councillors Hamilton carried his violence so far as to drag Tardif from a bed of sickness to the scaffold In 1594, on the very day that Henry IV entered Paris, he and some other fanatics like himself, distrusting that monarch's recent conversion to the Catholic faith, endeavoured to expel the king by force of arms The attempt, however, failed, and Hamilton was arrested, but soon after received permission to depart out of France, on which he retired to Brussels In his absence the parliament condemned him to be broken on the wheel for the murder of Tardif, and the sentence was duly executed on his effigy.

In 1601, after an absence of nearly thirty years, he ventured to return to Scotland, where he was joined by Edmond Hay, the Jesuit. No sooner was their arrival known, than the king issued a proclamation ordering their instant departure from the kingdom, on pain of treason, and prohibiting any one from harbouring them Hamilton found a temporary asylum at the castle of Airlie, in Forfarshire, belonging to Lord Ogilvie, but in 1609 he was apprehended by a party of life-guards, sent by the Scottish privy council, and confined in the Tower of London, where he died

He was the author of

HAMILTON, James, third marquis and first duke of Hamilton, elder son of James, second marquis, who in 1619 was created by James the First of England earl of Cambridge in the English peerage, was born in Hamilton palace, June 19, 1606 He received the early part of his education in Scotland, and completed it at Oxford On the death of his father in 1625, he succeeded to the family titles and estates, and at the coronation of Charles the First in that year, he carried the sword of state in the procession He afterwards lived in retirement, chiefly at Brodick castle, island of Arran, till the end of 1628, when, having been pressingly invited by the king, he went to court, and was created master of the horse, gentleman of the king's bedchamber, and privy councillor in both kingdoms. At the baptism of Prince Charles in 1630, he represented the king of Bohemia, as one of the sponsors, when the order of the Garter was conferred on him, together with a grant of the office of chief steward of the house and manor of Hampton Court.

The same year, having been empowered by the king to raise troops in his own name, he joined the famous Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, with 6,000 men, to assist Charles' brother-in-law, the elector palatine, in his attempt to recover his lost hereditary dominions On disembarking his troops near the mouth of the Oder, he received from his Swedish majesty a general's commission, and immediately proceeded into Silesia, where he besieged and took several fortified places, distinguishing himself by his bravery on all occasions. The severity of the service, combined with the ravages of the plague, in a short time reduced his army to two incomplete regiments, and, finding himself treated with neglect by the king of Sweden, he returned to England in September 1632 The following year he attended King Charles to Scotland, and assisted at his coronation there, but took no farther part in public affairs for several years

In 1638 the marquis of Hamilton was appointed his majesty's commissioner to the famous General Assembly, which met at Glasgow, and the proceedings of that body being in opposition to the views of the king, the marquis had recourse to a dissolution of the court. But as, of course, the Assembly could not recognise this exercise of authority, they continued their sittings as usual, went on subscribing the Covenant, and formally abolished Episcopacy in Scotland The king hereupon authorised the marquis to treat with them, and endeavour to get the Covenant recalled, but they plainly told him "that they would sooner renounce their baptism" This year he published a 'Declaration and Vindication of himself,' in 4to

In 1639, when the Scots nation were compelled to defend by arms their civil and religious liberties, the marquis was sent to Scotland with a well equipped fleet and a force of 5,000 men, while the king, at the head of 25,000 foot and 3,000 horse, advanced by land The treaty of Berwick, however, concluded July 18, prevented hostilities for that time In October 1641 a plot was formed, by the marquis of Montrose and the earl of Crawford, against the marquis, his brother, the earl of

Lanark, and the marquis of Argyle, on which he retired with these two noblemen to the house of Kinniel, in Linlithgowshire, till the affair was investigated, and at the end of a few days they resumed their attendance in parliament. This event is styled in history "The Incident"

In 1643, as a reward for his services to the king, the marquis was created duke of Hamilton, and marquis of Clydesdale, &c About the end of the same year, the duke and his brother went to Oxford, to clear themselves from some misrepresentations of their conduct which had been made by their enemies to the king, but were debarred access to his majesty, who ordered them into confinement. The earl of Lanark, as previously mentioned, (see page 420,) made his escape, but the duke was sent prisoner to Pendennis castle, in Cornwall, and afterwards was removed to St Michael's Mount, at the Land's End, where he remained till the end of April 1646, when the castle being captured by the parliamentary forces, he was set at liberty

After Charles had thrown himself into the hands of the Scottish army, the duke went to Newcastle, and again offered his services to the king On August 10, 1646, he had a grant from his majesty of the office of hereditary keeper of the palace of Holyrood In 1648 the duke promoted, with all his power, "the Engagement" entered into by the Scots parliament, to raise an army for the relief of the king Of the force which was hastily collected together, amounting to about 10,000 foot and 4,000 cavalry, the duke was appointed general, the earl of Callendar lieutenant-general, and Middleton and Baillie major-generals With these troops, which were very indifferently appointed and disciplined, and but imperfectly armed, and without artillery, the duke marched into England where he was joined by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with a body of English forces, and by Sir George Monro with 2,000 foot and 1,000 horse After compelling Lambert, the parliamentary general, to retire with precipitation, they passed through Carlisle, and advanced by Penrith, Appleby, and Kendal, driving the enemy before them to Preston, where the retreating force of Lambert was met by Cromwell at the head of a strong reinforcement. A battle ensued on August 17, in which the Royalists were defeated, and great part of their army dispersed The remainder, with the duke, proceeded on to Uttoxeter, in Staffordshire, where, having only a few of the cavalry left, he capitulated with General Lambert, on assurances of safety to himself and his followers The duke was carried to Derby, and from thence to Ashby-de-la-Zouche, where he continued till the beginning of December, when he was brought to Windsor castle, and confined under a strong guard On the 21st of that month, when the king was carried through Windsor on his way to his trial at London, the duke prevailed upon his keepers to permit him to see his majesty, and, as he passed, he fell on his knees, and passionately exclaimed, "My dear master!" The king, lifting him up, embraced him, and said, "I have been so, indeed, to you" No further discourse was allowed between them, and Charles was instantly hurried away

After the king's execution, his grace, apprehensive of his own fate, resolved on making his escape, and by the help of his equery, he succeeded in getting away from Windsor, under night, and reached the neighbourhood of London undiscovered, but entering the city about four o'clock in the morning, contrary to the directions he had received, he was apprehended by a patrol of cavalry, and carried to St James', where he was lodged in the same room with the earl of Norwich, Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, also prisoners, who afterwards suffered with him He was brought to trial February 6, 1649, being indicted as earl of Cambridge, and a natural-born English subject, for having levied war and committed treason against the kingdom and people of England He pleaded that he had acted by command of the Estates and supreme authority of Scotland, which were altogether independent of England, that he was a native of Scotland, and consequently an alien, and not amenable to English jurisdiction, and, finally, that he had surrendered himself a prisoner of war on capitulation, by the articles of which his life and safety were secured His pleas were overruled by the court, and after several adjournments, he was found guilty, and sentenced to be beheaded on Friday, March 9 After his condemnation he was earnestly solicited to save himself by making discoveries, but he rejected all such offers with scorn, saying, there was no choice betwixt a glorious death and an infamous life He was decapitated in Palace Yard, Westminster, suffering death with great fortitude and magnanimity, and his remains were, according to his desire, conveyed to Scotland, and deposited in the burial-place of the family at Hamilton His grace married Lady Mary Fielding, daughter of William earl of Denbigh, and by her, who died May 10, 1638, he had three sons all of whom died young, and three daughters.

HAMILTON, James, fourth duke of Hamilton, eldest son of Anne, duchess in her own right, by her husband, William earl of Selkirk, (who, at the Restoration, was created duke of Hamilton for life, in right of marriage to the duchess,) was born April 11, 1658, and was at first styled earl of Arran He was educated principally at the university of Glasgow, after which he passed some time on the Continent On his return he was appointed, January 17, 1679, one of the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber He had not long been at court before an affair of gallantry involved him in a quarrel with Lord Mordaunt, afterwards the celebrated earl of Peterborough and Monmouth, which led to a duel betwixt the parties in Greenwich Park Lord Arran fired first, and narrowly missed Lord Mordaunt, who discharged his pistol in the air They then engaged with swords, when Lord Mordaunt was wounded in the groin, but running his antagonist into the thigh, his sword broke, so that his life was at the mercy of the earl of Arran, who honourably put an end to the contest, and they parted good friends

In December 1683, Charles II nominated Lord Arran ambassador extraordinary to France, to congratulate Louis XIV on the birth of a grandson He served two campaigns under the French king as his aide-de-camp, the dauphin and his lordship being sworn into that office on the same day On the accession of James the Second and Seventh, his lordship returned to England, and was appointed master of the wardrobe to the new king, who, in the succeeding July, conferred on him the command of the first or royal regiment of horse

On the revival of the order of the Thistle in 1687, the earl of Arran was nominated one of the knights companions thereof He adhered firmly to King James in his declining fortunes, and was one of the four lords who accompanied him to Rochester on his embarkation for the Continent, December 22, 1688 At the meeting of the Scottish nobility and gentry in London, assembled by the prince of Orange, January 7, 1689, of which his father, the duke of Hamilton, was president, Lord Arran made the following speech "I have all the honour and deference for the prince of Orange imaginable I think him a brave prince, and that we owe him great obligations in contributing so much to our delivery from popery, but, while I pay these praises, I cannot violate my duty to my master I can distinguish betwixt his popery and his person, I dislike the one, but have sworn, and do owe, allegiance to the other, which makes it impossible for me to sign away that which I cannot forbear believing is the king my master's right; for his present absence in France can no more affect my duty, than his longer absence from us has done all the while, and the prince, desiring our advice, mine is, that we should move his majesty to return and call a free parliament for the securing our religion and property, which, in my humble opinion, will at last be found to be the best way to heal all our breaches" This proposal received no support from any one. In the subsequent August, being suspected of having a share in Sir James Montgomery's plot for the restoration of King James, and also of corresponding with the abdicated monarch, he was twice committed prisoner to the Tower of London, where he remained several months, but was at length discharged without prosecution On his release he returned to Scotland, where he lived in retirement for some years His father's death, in 1694, brought no accession of honours or estate, both being hereditary in the duchess, but in July 1698 her grace resigned her titles into the hands of King William, in favour of her eldest son, when the earl of Arran was accordingly created duke of Hamilton, with the original precedency

The failure of the Darien expedition having excited much popular ferment in Scotland, the duke of Hamilton took an active part in support of the claims of the African Company, and headed a strong party, which stood firm to the interests of the country, and uniformly asserted the independence of the nation He took the oaths and his seat in parliament May 21, 1700, and distinguished himself on all occasions by his opposition to the measures of King William's government

On the accession of Queen Anne, March 8, 1702, his grace, with other influential persons, went to London, to endeavour to prevail on her majesty to call a new parliament, but she did not think proper to comply with their advice On the opening of the Convention parliament, on June 9, his grace entered a protestation against the legality of the meeting, and, with seventy-nine members, withdrew from its sittings, amid the acclamations of the people. In the parliament of 1703 he exerted his utmost influence to obtain for his countrymen an equality of commercial privileges with England, and in all the discussions of that period he took a prominent part as leader of the country party In August 1704 was passed the famous act of security, which provided for the succession to the crown, and for the maintenance of the liberties and independence of the Scottish nation In this, the concluding parliament of Scotland, the duke's conduct had an important influence on all the measures proposed for the settlement of the affairs of the kingdom In the last session, which met October 3, 1706, the treaty of Union received the determined opposition of his grace, who voted against every article of that treaty, excepting the first clause of the fifteenth article relating to the equivalent, and adhered to every protest against it In the debate respecting the first article, November 2d, he said, "What! Shall we, in half an hour, yield what our forefathers maintained with their lives and fortunes for many ages! Are none of the descendants here of those worthy patriots who defended the liberty of their country against all invaders—who assisted the great King Robert Bruce to restore the constitution, and avenge the falsehood of England and usurpation of Baliol? Where are the Douglases and the Campbells? Where are the peers? Where are the barons, once the bulwarks of the nation? Shall we yield up the sovereignty and independency of Scotland, when we are commanded by those we represent to preserve the same, and assured of their assistance to support us?" Some of the more violent of the opposition had planned a general insurrection against the progress of this obnoxious treaty, and had appointed a body of 7,000 men to rendezvous at Hamilton on a certain day, but the duke's prudence prevented him from entering heartily into the design, and, by sending messengers to countermand the contemplated rising in the west country, he had the merit of saving the country from being involved in civil war

In 1707, when a visit from the Pretender was expected in Scotland, the duke, to avert suspicion from himself of favouring the project, retired to his seat in Staffordshire In 1708, when the French fleet appeared off the coast, his grace was taken into custody and removed to London, but soon obtained his liberty. In June of that year his grace was elected one of the sixteen representative peers, and was rechosen at the next general election in 1710 On the overthrow of the Whig ministry, October 1, 1710, he was appointed lord-lieutenant of the county palatine of Lancaster, ranger of the queen's forests therein, admiral of the sea-coasts of that county, and admitted a privy councillor

In September 1711 his grace was created a peer of Great Britain by the title of Baron Dutton, in Cheshire, and duke of Brandon, in Suffolk On taking his seat in the subsequent December, several interesting debates took place in the House of Lords, as to his right to sit as a British peer while he continued a representative peer of Scotland, and their decision being unfavourable to his claim, the Scottish peers withdrew from the House A motion for taking the opinion of the twelve judges on the point was negatived In consequence of a message from the queen, who was much interested in behalf of the duke, the question was again taken into consideration on January 25, 1712, when the Scottish peers were so far appeased, that they resumed their attendance in the House of Lords The point, however, was not completely set at rest till 1782, when, in the case of Douglas, the eighth duke of Hamilton and fifth duke of Brandon (see page 422) the judges gave an unanimous opinion in favour of the eligibility of Scottish peers to be admitted to the full privileges of peers of Great Britain

On the death of Earl Rivers, the duke was, September 5, 1712, appointed master-general of the ordnance, and, on October 26, was installed a knight of the order of the Garter A few days thereafter, he was appointed ambassador extraordinary to France, upon the conclusion of the treaty of Utrecht, but while splendid preparations were making for that embassy, his grace was slain in a duel, fought in Hyde Park, with Lord Mohun, who was also killed on the spot, on Saturday, November 15, 1712 His grace and Lord Mohun had married two nieces of Charles, earl of Macclesfield, and for several years had been engaged in a chancery suit for part of his estate, which created much animosity, inflamed by their espousing different sides in parliament. The immediate cause of the duel was some high words which passed between them, at a meeting in the chambers of a master in chancery, three days before. Parnell, in his verses 'On the Peace of 1712,' notices the duke's fate in very pathetic terms At the time of his tragical death he was in his 55th year He was twice married first to Lady Anne Spenser, eldest daughter of Robert 2d earl of Sunderland, by whom he had 2 daughters, who died young, and, 2dly, to Elizabeth, only child of Lord Gerard of Bromley, by whom he had 7 children He was succeeded by his eldest son James See page 421 of this volume

HAMILTON, Lord Claud, fourth son of James, second earl of Arran and first duke of Chatelherault, by his wife, Lady Margaret Douglas, eldest daughter of James, third earl of Morton, was born either in 1539, or, according to Keith [Catalogue of Bishops, page 253], in 1543 His father, the duke of Chatelherault, being acknowledged by act of parliament next heir to the crown of Scotland after Queen Mary, and having been appointed regent of Scotland in 1543 during her minority, Lord Claud was, at a very early age, (in 1553,) appointed to the opulent post of commendator of the abbey of Paisley, under the confirmation of a papal bull from Pope Julius III In the bull his age is given as fourteen years old During the civil discords that prevailed in Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary, he, with his father and the other members of the house of Hamilton, warmly espoused her interests, and was one of the principal commanders in her army at the battle of Langside, May 13, 1568, the loss of which was the cause of her flight into England Immediately after the battle, Lord Claud, with many others, was summoned to attend a parliament called by the Regent Moray, and upon his refusal to appear, was outlawed, and his estate forfeited During the regency of the earl of Mar, Lord Claud's lands were bestowed on Lord Semple, who kept a strong garrison in his castle, and exercised on all around a severe military discipline At the head of his faithful tenants, Lord Claud besieged the castle, and compelled Lord Semple to surrender at discretion His forfeiture was repealed by the act of parliament which confirmed the pacification of Perth in 1573.

In the year 1579, King James, having it insinuated to him that the Hamiltons, as declared heirs to the crown, had espoused the queen's cause in that hearty manner, with the view of destroying him, who stood in their way, resolved to apprehend the Lords John and Claud Hamilton, at that time in Edinburgh, under sanction of the articles of agreement ratified the year before They however made their escape Lord John fled in a seaman's habit to England, and went thence to France Lord Claud was in hiding for some time on the borders of Scotland, but ultimately retired into England, and lived for a time at Widdrington, with a relation of the earl of Northumberland During the year that he remained in exile he was constantly engaged in the various attempts made to restore Queen Mary to liberty, and seems to have been regarded by her at that time, as appears from the numerous letters now extant in the State paper office, as the person in whose assistance she had the greatest hope and confidence Amongst many letters of interest relating to him, is one from the unfortunate queen, during her imprisonment at Chartley, dated 20th May 1586, to Sir Charles Paget, who was one of her principal means of communication there with her friends, in which she says—

"I wold then in the meane time yow shold write to the Lord Claude, letting him understande how that the k of Spayne is to sett on this countrye, and desireth to have the assistance of the Catholikes of Scotlande for to stoppe at the least, that from theme the queen of Englande have no socours, and to that effect yow shall pray the sayd Lord Claude to sownde and grope the mindes hereunto of the principall of the Catholike nobilitye in Scotlande and others hereof, under pretextes he might bringe to other moreover that he declare particularly unto vow the names of those that are to enter in this bande, and what forces they are able to make together, and to the ende they may be the more encouraged herein yow may write playnelye to the Lord Claude that vow have charge, of me, to treate with him in this matter But by vowr first letter I am not of opinion that yow discover yowr selfe further to him nor to other at all, untill yow have received answer of the k. of Spayne, which being conform to this desseigment, then may yow open more to the Lord Claude, shewing him that to assure himself of my sonne, and to the end (if it be possible) that things be past and done under his name and authoritye, it shall be nedefull to sease his person, in case that willinglye he cannot be browght to this enterprise, yea and that the surest way were to deliver him into the k. of Spayne his hands, or the Pope's, as shall be thowght best, and that in his absence he depute the L. Claude his leutenant-general and regent in the government of Scotland, which yow are assured I may be easelye persuaded to confirme and approve For if it be possible I will not, for divers respects, be named herein untill the extremitye To persuade hereunto the sayd L. Claude it shall be good that yow assure him to travell to abolish all remembrance or grefe of his brother the Lord of Arbroth (Lord John Hamilton) his proceedings· that indirectly yow put him in hope that I shall make him be declared lawfull heyre to the crowne of Scotland, my sonne fayling without children, and that there unto I shall make the catholike princes of christendome condescende to mayntayne him in that respect. I can write nothing presentlye to the L. Claude him selfe, for want of an alphabete between me and him, which now I send yow herewith enclosed, that yow may send it unto him."

Another letter, to Lord Claud himself, from Chartley, July 1586, is in these terms—

"Right trusty and well-beloved cousin,—Being as yet not very sure of this new way, I will not content my self hereby only to testifie unto youe how much liking and contentment I have had of that which the Englishe lordes brother (Sir Charles Paget) and Fontenay did write unto me in your name, before your return to Scotlande. Youe are now in place, and have meanes to correspond effectually to the expectation which I and all myne have conceaved of youe, wherein I assure youe that I shall not fayle youe in any thing consisting in my owne power, or that I may obtayne by my credit of all Christian princes. Wherefore I praye youe uppon that which I committed last to be imparted unto youe by the said Englishe (desiring youe to credit him as my self) to let me know particularly your own resolution and the inclination of others my good and faithfull subjectes, to the end that according thereunto I may proceede with my principall frendes. This last ligue of my sonnes with the queene of England hath much offended them, labor to make me understand the particularities thereof, and whether if there be any thing passed in the same concerning my particular, either in the publicque treatie or in any secreat articles. For I have been advertised that that unhappy master of Gray hath not desisted to labour with all extremity against me, which moveth me not to feare a litle that so long as he shall remaine neere my sonne, we are not like (I and my sonne) ever to have much good intelligence together, and therefore I pray youe so earnestly as I can to find the meanes to shift him forth of the roome, having behaved himself so traiterously toward me, as that there is no punishment but he hath deserved therefore. The deliverer hereof did serve me very faithfully so long as he was in this contry, and I trust he will do the lyke in all you will employ him there for my service, especially for the sure convoy of your letters and myne by this way God almighty have youe, cousin, in his holly protection Your right loving cousingnes and good frend,

MARIE R"

Lord Claud, with his brother Lord John, returned to Scotland in 1585, and was well received by the king All their estates and honours were restored to them, and in consideration of the constant loyalty, and great losses and sufferings of Lord Claud on behalf of the king's mother, all the lordship and barony of Paisley, with the pertinents of the abbacy and monastery of Paisley, and their extensive lordships and estates, comprising lands in Renfrewshire and nine other counties, and the patronage of twenty-eight churches, were bestowed on him by charter in 1585, and, July 29, 1587, were erected into a temporal lordship, for him and his heirs male, under the title of Baron of Paisley His eldest son also, James, was, during his lifetime, in 1606, created earl of Abercorn, and additional estates were granted to him in Linlithgowshire and elsewhere Lord Claud died in 1622, aged 78, and was buried in the abbey of Paisley. He was the ancestor of the marquis of Abercorn, and also of the Counts Hamilton of Sweden He married Margaret, only daughter of George, sixth Lord Seton, and with a daughter, Margaret, wife of William, first marquis of Douglas, had four sons 1 James, first earl of Abercorn, 2 Hon Sir Claud Hamilton, a gentleman of the king's privy chamber, and by privy seal, dated October 6, 1618, appointed constable of the castle of Toome, county Antrim, Ireland, for life, 3 Hon Sir George Hamilton of Greenlaw and Roscrea, county Tipperary, who behaved with great bravery in the service of Charles I His daughter, Margaret, married, in 1622, Sir Archibald Acheson of Gosford, East Lothian, baronet, a lord of session and secretary of state for Scotland, ancestor of the earls of Gosford in the peerage of Ireland 4 Hon Sir Frederick Hamilton, whose youngest son, Gustavus, lieutenant-general in the army, was by George I, on October 9, 1714, created Baron Hamilton of Stackallan, and in August 1717, advanced to the dignity of Viscount Boyne, in the Irish peerage

HAMILTON, JAMES, first earl of Abercorn, eldest son of the preceding, a nobleman of much ability, and in great favour with King James VI, was one of the lords of his privy council, and a gentleman of the bedchamber By a charter, dated in 1600, the king gave the office of high sheriff of the county of Linlithgow, to him and his heirs male whatever, and by another charter in 1601, he got the lands of Abercorn, Braidmeadows, &c He was created a peer, by the title of Baron Abercorn, April 5, 1603, and in 1604 he was appointed one of the commissioners, on the part of Scotland, to treat of a union with England, which did not take place On July 10, 1606, he was advanced to the dignity of earl of Abercorn [see vol i page 1, of this work], baron of Paisley, Hamilton, Mountcastle, and Kilpatrick, by patent to him and his heirs male whatever King James, after his accession to the crown of England, having founded the plantations of Ulster in the north of Ireland, and wishing to have eminent persons on whom he could depend in connexion with them, granted the earl of Abercorn the same precedence, as an earl, in the Irish parliament and at the council table, as he held in Scotland, and in 1615 he had a grant of a vast estate out of the escheated lands in the barony of Strabane, on which he built a castle, a schoolhouse, and a church

The earl of Abercorn, who usually resided at the Place of Paisley, had the honour of receiving there in 1597 the consort of King James VI, and again the king himself, who, in his progress through Scotland, after a fourteen years' absence, tarried at Paisley in 1617, where "a welcome in the earl of Abercorn his great hall was verie graciously delivered by a prettie boy of nine years of age, son of Sir James Semple of Belltries." The earl died in the lifetime of his father, March 16, 1618, and was buried in the abbey of Paisley He married Marion, eldest daughter of Thomas, fifth Lord Boyd, and with three daughters, had five sons 1 James, 2d earl of Abercorn On the death of William, second duke of Hamilton, of his wounds at the battle of Worcester, September 11, 1651, the second earl of Abercorn became male representative of the family of Hamilton, but the estates and titles of that house devolved on the duke's niece, Anne, duchess of Hamilton 2 Claud, Lord Strabane in Ireland, so created Aug 14, 1684, on his brother's resignation of that title to him The male line having failed in the eldest branch on the death of George, 3d earl of Abercorn, the descent devolved on Claud, grandson of Lord Strabane, who was 5th baron of Strabane and 4th earl of Abercorn 3 Hon Sir William Hamilton, who was long the representative at Rome of Henrietta Maria, queen dowager of England 4 Hon Sir George Hamilton, of Donalong, county Tyrone, and Nenagh, Tipperary, created a baronet of Ireland in 1660 His eldest son, Colonel James Hamilton, who died June 6, 1673, of a wound received in a naval battle against the Dutch, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, was the father of James, 6th earl of Abercorn. Sir George's third son was the celebrated Count Anthony Hamilton, of whom a memoir is given next page 5 Hon Sir Alexander Hamilton of

Holborn, from whom the Counts Hamilton of Germany are directly descended He settled first at the court of Philip William, elector palatine, by whom he was sent envoy extraordinary to King James II. of England He accompanied to Vienna the elector's daughter Eleonora Magdalena, who was married to the Emperor Leopold, and was created a count of the empire, with a grant of the county of Neuberg, near Passau, and other estates in Moravia and Hungary

HAMILTON, JAMES, eighth earl of Abercorn, a nobleman who possessed singular vigour of mind, integrity of conduct, and patriotic views, was born October 22, 1712 He was summoned by writ to the House of Peers in Ireland as Baron Mountcastle, March 23, 1786, and succeeded his father in 1744, as earl of Abercorn and Viscount Strabane In 1745, he purchased from Archibald, duke of Argyle, the barony of Duddingston, Mid Lothian, where he built an elegant mansion, and made it his favourite residence In the imperial parliament he was one of the peers who, on March 11, 1766, voted against the act to repeal the American stamp act, and joined in the protests against the second and third reading of the bill He also voted for rejecting Fox's India bill, December 17, 1783 He was created a peer of Great Britain, August 8, 1786, by the title of Viscount Hamilton, with remainder to his nephew, John James

He was among the first who, in the middle of the eighteenth century, laid the foundation of that improved system of agriculture and rural economy for which Scotland has now become so remarkable To him also is due, in great measure, the advancement of the important manufacturing town of Paisley, which a century ago was but an inconsiderable place, until what is now known as "the new town" was laid out and built by the earl on his patrimonial estate This has been the means of increasing the trade and importance of Paisley, and giving it its present position among the manufacturing towns of the kingdom On his estate in Ireland he built a magnificent house at Baron's Court, near Strabane At his seat, Witham, in Essex, Queen Charlotte slept September 7, 1761, on her journey from Harwich to London The earl sat as a representative peer of Scotland for twenty-three years, from 1761 to 1784. He died unmarried, October 9, 1789, and was buried in the abbey of Paisley His lordship, as heir male of the second earl of Arran and first duke of Chatelherault, claimed the title of duke of Chatelherault in France, a claim afterwards renewed on the part of the second marquis of Abercorn He was succeeded by his nephew, John James, ninth earl and first marquis of Abercorn

HAMILTON, COUNT ANTHONY, author of the 'Memoires du Comte de Grammont,' third son of Sir George Hamilton, fourth son of first earl of Abercorn, and great-grandson of first duke of Chatelherault, was born in Ireland in 1646 During the protectorate of Cromwell he passed most of his time in France, having, with all his father's family, accompanied Charles II in his exile He returned to England at the restoration In 1687, he was a lieutenant-colonel, with the pay of £200 a-year, and although a Roman Catholic, had the command of a regiment of infantry in Ireland, and was governor of Limerick At the revolution he followed James VII into France, and became a lieutenant-general in the French service, as did also his brother Richard

In his 'Memoires de Grammont,' with a pen full of easy and exquisite point, he has portrayed the character of the beauties and wits of the court of Charles II, and detailed the intrigues in which he was himself a considerable actor He was also the author of 'Count Hamilton's Tales,' and other works, in the French language, to which Voltaire gives high praise, and which he says have all the humour without the burlesque of Scarron His 'Epistle to the Count de Grammont' was much read He may be styled the father of the natural romance or novel His works were published collectively in 1749, in 6 vols 12mo, and are all in French Count Anthony Hamilton died at St Germains, April 21, 1720, aged 74 years His elder brother, James, father of the sixth earl of Abercorn, was in great favour with Charles II after his restoration The latter made a grant to him, for his and his children's lives, of Hyde Park in London, which grant was, however, afterwards commuted, for a charge of nine hundred pounds per annum, on the first-fruits and tenths of the dioceses of St David's, Hereford, Oxford, and Worcester.

HAMILTON, ELIZABETH, countess de Grammont, popularly known as "La belle Hamilton" at the court of Charles II, and of whom numerous portraits are extant at Hampton Court Palace and elsewhere, was the eldest daughter of Sir George Hamilton, fourth son of the first earl of Abercorn, and the sister of Count Anthony Hamilton Miss Hamilton was one of the few ladies attached to the court of Charles II who appear to have preserved a reputation, in spite of acknowledged beauty, untainted by suspicion In the brilliant pages of the 'Memoires de Grammont,' she is styled "the chief ornament of the court, worthy of the most ardent and sincere affection,—nobody could boast a nobler birth, nothing could be more charming than her person" She had many noble offers of marriage, and after refusing the duke of Richmond, Jermyn, nephew of the earl of St Albans, and Henry Howard, afterwards duke of Norfolk, she married Philibert, count de Grammont, brother of the duke of that name, and hero of the 'Memoires de Grammont' Charles II, in a letter to his sister, the duchess of Orleans, dated 24th October 1669, bears this testimony to her merits —"I writt to you yestarday by the compte de Grammont, but I beleeve this letter will come sooner to your handes, for he goes by the way of Diep with his wife and family, and now that I have named her, I cannot chuse but again desire you to be kinde to her, for besides the meritt her family has on both sides, she is as good a creature as ever lived I beleeve she will passe for a handsome woman in France, though she has not yett, since her lying in, recovered that good shape she had before, and I am affraide never will" [Dalrymple's Memoirs, vol ii p 26]

After her marriage to the comte de Grammont, she was appointed dame du palais to Maria Theresa of Austria, queen of Louis XIV Her husband died at Paris, January 30, 1707, aged 86 She died January 3, 1708, aged 67 They had two daughters, Claude Charlotte de Grammont, who married Henry Howard, earl of Stafford, and Marie Elizabeth de Grammont, abbess de Ste Marie de Poussay in Lorraine, who died in 1706

HAMILTON, SIR ROBERT, Bart., of Preston, commander of the Covenanters' army, see p 423

HAMILTON, SIR THOMAS, first earl of Haddington, an eminent judge and statesman, eldest son of Sir Thomas Hamilton of Priestfield, (a lord of session 1607–1608,) by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of James Heriot of Trabrown, was born in 1563 According to Scott of Scotstarvet, his grandfather was a merchant in the West Bow of Edinburgh He was, however, Thomas Hamilton of Orchartfield, Bathgate, and Ballencrieff, and was killed at the battle of Pinkie, September 10, 1547, leaving two sons, Sir Thomas, his successor, father of the subject of this notice, and John, a secular priest, whose life is given at page 431 Thomas Hamilton of Orchartfield's father, the great-grandfather of the first earl of Haddington, was also named Thomas Hamilton of Orchartfield, and was the second son of Hugh Hamilton of Innerwick, Haddingtonshire, sprung from John de Hamilton, second son of Sir Walter FitzGilbert de Hamilton, dominus de Cadzow

The subject of this notice was educated at the High School of Edinburgh, but pursued his university and legal studies for six years in France After his return to Scotland, he was, on 1st November 1587, admitted advocate, and soon distinguished himself by his talents and learning As he resided in the Cowgate of Edinburgh, in the 16th century a street of greater consideration than it is now, he acquired from James the Sixth the ludicrous byname of Tam o' the Cowgate In 1592 he was appointed a lord of session, when he took the title of Lord Drumcairn The same year he was nominated one of the commissioners for printing the acts of parliament On 13th January 1595–6, he was constituted one of the eight persons, called from their number Octavians, to whom King James committed the charge of all the state patronage and finances, and in the distribution of offices made by them among themselves, he secured that of king's advocate, although there were already two persons in possession of that office The Octavians, from the invidious nature of their functions and their possession of all the patronage of the kingdom, were an unpopular body, and Hamilton in particular, from his being suspected of a leaning to popery, was so obnoxious to the people, that his life was in extreme danger during the tumult which took place in Edinburgh on 17th December 1596 In the presbytery of Edinburgh, it was even proposed that he and the president of the court of session, Seton, afterwards earl of Dunfermline, should be excommunicated In the famous anonymous letter delivered to the king's porter on the night of 10th January 1597, and by him given to the king, he is described as "Mr Thomas Hamilton, brought up in Paris, with that apostate Mr John Hamilton, and men say the dregs of stinking Roman profession sticke fast in his ribbes." [Calderwood's Hist vol v p 549] On 22d February 1597, an act of sederunt of the court of session was passed, stating that people murmured at his sitting as a judge in the cases in which he was pursuer for the king's interest, and declaring that in such cases he was not to be considered as a party Being afterwards knighted, he was designed Sir Thomas Hamilton of Monkland In 1604, he was named one of the Scots commissioners for the union then projected with England, and in 1606 he attended the celebrated conference at Hampton Court In 1597 he had begun the purchase of land, particularly church lands, and in the course of thirty years he had acquired about twenty large estates, besides all the vast territories and jurisdictions which had once belonged to the knights of St John, the successors of the Templars On 4th April 1607, he obtained a charter of the office of master of the metals, with a lease of all the metals and minerals in Scotland, upon payment of one-tenth of the produce to the king The same year he discovered a silver mine within his lands near Linlithgow, and it is stated that, after having worked it till the vein was exhausted, he sold it to King James for five thousand pounds! "The king," says honest Calderwood, (Hist vol vi p 689,) "sent certan English and Scottish men, to bring a great quantity of the ore to Londoun, to be melted and tryed How it proved, it is not weill knowne to manie, but after that the myne was closed till his majestie advised farther"

On 15th May 1612, Sir Thomas was appointed lord clerk register, but soon after he exchanged this office with Sir Alexander Hay for that of secretary of state At that time the salary attached to the latter place was only one hundred pounds In 1613 he was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Binning and Byres, and on 15th June 1616 he succeeded Preston of Fentonbarns as lord-president of the court of session Mr Tytler, in his Life of Sir Thomas Craig, speaking of Lord Binning, says, "For many years he conjoined, with apparent ease to himself and acknowledged advantage to the country, the occupations of these high offices Nor was this all he was a friend and patron of learned men; he was deeply read, not only in civil law, but in matters of state policy and in general history. To those who, ignorant of its proper distribution, complain of the want of time, it may form a useful lesson to regard the multitudinous labours of this remarkable man According to our modern notions of intellectual labour, the various notes and observations collected by him in the course of his studies, and the marginal references yet seen upon his books, would rather appear the relics of a life wholly devoted to literary labour, than the fruits of those scattered hours which must have been stolen from the duties of the bench, the severer labours of the council-board, or the pleasures and intrigues of a court"

In 1617 Lord Binning was one of the royal commissioners to the General Assembly at Perth, in which the well known six articles savouring of episcopacy were passed, to the great delight of James and dismay of the Presbyterians On 20th March 1619 he was created by patent earl of Melrose, being then in possession of the lands of that abbacy After the death of Sir John Ramsay, viscount of Haddington, eight years afterwards, he exchanged his title of Melrose for that of Haddington, judging it more honourable to take his style from a county than from an abbey, the patent of his new creation being dated at Bagshot, August 27, 1627 From his great wealth, being reputed the richest man in Scotland of his time, he was believed to be in possession of the fabulous philosopher's stone, but as he informed King James on his visit to Edinburgh in 1617, his whole secret lay in never putting off till tomorrow what can be done today, nor ever trusting to another's hand what his own could execute

He resigned the offices of secretary of state and president of the court of session on 15th February 1626, when he was appointed lord privy seal He died May 29, 1637, in his 74th year His valuable collection of manuscripts and charters are preserved in the Advocates' Library Of his shrewdness as a judge, it is related by Forbes, that "in an improbation of a writ, which the lords were convinced was forged, but puzzled for want of clear proof, Lord Binning taking up the writ in his hand, and holding it betwixt him and the light, discovered the forgery by the stamp of the paper, the first paper of such a stamp being posterior to the date of the writ quarrelled," that is, challenged. On another occasion a Highland witness, in a cause in which he had been cited to give evidence for his chief, thus described him to a clansman "I began, and was going to tell my own way, when an awful man that sits in the middle broke in upon me with such a multitude of interrogatories, as they call them, that he quite dumbfoundered me, and then I lay at his mercy, and he whirled the truth out of me as easy as ye would wind the thread off a pirn "

HAMILTON, GEORGE, first Earl of Orkney. See ORKNEY, Earls of

HAMILTON, CHARLES, Lord Binning, an ingenious poet, eldest son of Thomas, sixth earl of Haddington, was born in 1697 He served as a volunteer with his father at the battle of Sheriffmuir, 13th November, 1715, and behaved gallantly against the rebels A song in praise of Æmilius, supposed to be written by him while a youth, in his own commendation, contains a jocular allusion to his father's terror during that conflict, in which, on the contrary, his father's courage was particularly conspicuous In 1722, he was elected member of parliament for St Germains in Cornwall, and appointed knight marischal of Scotland He was also a commissioner of trade Being attacked with the symptoms of a consumption, in the hope of deriving benefit from a change of climate he went, with some of his relations, to Naples, where he died, in the lifetime of his father, January 13, 1733, aged 36 He was the author of a pleasing pastoral entitled 'Ungrateful Nanny,' originally printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1741, and republished by Ritson Another ballad of inferior merit, written in the character of Colonel Charteris, entitled 'The Duke of Argyle's Levee,' published in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1740, has been erroneously ascribed to his lordship From a letter on the subject, believed to be by Lord Hailes, in the Edinburgh Magazine for April 1786, the following paragraph may be quoted "That Lord Binning was the author of that satirical ballad is reported on no better authority than a vague popular rumour To this, I oppose, first, the mild character of that young nobleman, who was a wit, indeed, but without malice Secondly, the assertion of his brother, who told me, that Lord Binning, before he went to Naples, where he died, solemnly declared, that it was not he, but one Mitchell, the author of a book of poems, who wrote that ballad" The person here mentioned is Joseph Mitchell, the dramatist, a memoir of whom is given in a subsequent part of this work Lord Binning, indeed, seems to have been as much beloved for his amiable disposition, as admired for his lyrical genius He married Rachel, youngest daughter, and at length sole heiress of George Baillie of Jerviswood and Lady Grizzel Baillie, and by her he had five sons and three daughters The eldest son, Thomas Hamilton, succeeded his grandfather in 1735, as seventh earl of Haddington

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, of Gilbertfield, Lanarkshire, a poet of some merit, the friend and correspondent of Allan Ramsay, was the second son of Captain William Hamilton of Ladyland, Ayrshire, and is supposed to have been born before 1670 The family to which he belonged, proprietors of Ardoch, in the latter county, was a branch of the Hamiltons of Torrance, Lanarkshire, descended from Thomas Hamilton of Darngaber, third son of Sir John Hamilton, lord of Cadyow, ancestor of the ducal family of Hamilton His father, the second son of William Hamilton of Ardoch, acquired the estate of Ladyland about the middle of the seventeenth century, and succeeded his brother in the lands of Ardoch For refusing to take the test and for nonconformity, he was disarmed in 1684, and severely dealt with by the commissioners for the western shires In 1686 he was one of the commissioners of supply for the county of Ayr He was killed in battle against the French during the wars of King William He had married in 1662, Janet, daughter of John Brisbane of Brisbane, and had two sons, John, his heir, and William the poet The latter entered the army early in life, and after considerable service abroad, he returned to Scotland, on half pay, with only the rank of a lieutenant Gilbertfield, where he went to reside, seems to have been only rented by him, though designed of that place to distinguish him from Hamilton of Bangour, a contemporary poet "His time," says a writer in the Lives of Eminent Scotsmen, London, 1822, 18mo, "was now divided between the sports of the field, the cultivation of several valued friendships with men of genius and taste, and the occasional production of some effusions of his own, in which the gentleman and the poet were alike conspicuous" In familiar Scottish poetry he excelled His principal productions were inserted in a work, the first of its kind in Scotland, entitled 'A Choice Collection of Scots Poems,' by James Watson, published at Edinburgh in 1706, 8vo, with two additional parts in 1709 and 1711 In 1719 Hamilton addressed from Gilbertfield an Epistle in Scottish verse to Allan Ramsay, designating himself "Wanton Willie," which led to a rhyming correspondence between them Three of Hamilton's epistles, with his own replies, and another, on receiving from the lieutenant the compliment of a barrel of Loch Fyne herrings, are inserted in the common editions of Ramsay's works Ramsay says of him that he "held his commission honourably in my Lord Hyndford's regiment" His elegies 'on Bonny Heck,' a dog, and 'on Habby Simpson, Piper of Kilbarchan,' with his familiar epistles and other poems, are remarkable for their easy versification and vein of humour, and it is thought that both Ramsay and Burns, particularly the latter, formed their own manner on some of Hamilton's compositions, in some of their most celebrated pieces in the same measure In 1722 he published at Glasgow, by subscription, an abridgment in modern Scottish, of Henry the Minstrel's Life of Sir William Wallace, which Dr Irving styles "an injudicious and useless work" It has been often reprinted Towards the close of his life Hamilton resided at Letterick in Lanarkshire, where he died at an advanced age, May 24, 1751 He married a lady of his own name, supposed to be a relation of his own, by whom he had a daughter, Anna The property of Ladyland was, about 1712, sold by his brother to the ninth earl of Eglinton, who disposed of it to William Cochrane of Edge The brother, John Hamilton, went to the north of Ireland, where he had purchased an estate His son and successor, William Hamilton, having disposed of the Irish property, returned to Scotland in 1744, and bought the lands of Craighlaw in Wigtonshire from a family of the name of Gordon

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, of Bangour, a pleasing and accomplished poet, was born in 1704 He was descended from the ancient family of Little Earnock, Ayrshire, and was the second son of James Hamilton of Bangour, Linlithgowshire, advocate, by Elizabeth, daughter of John Hamilton of Muirhouse, or Murrays His father's uncle, Sir William Hamilton of Whitelaw, was one of the lords of session, and appointed in 1697 lord justice clerk The subject of this notice received a liberal education, and began in early life to cultivate a taste for poetry He was long an ornament of the fashionable circles of Edinburgh When the rebellion of 1745 broke out he joined the cause of the Pretender, and celebrated his first success at Prestonpans, in the well-known Jacobite ode of "Gladsmuir," which was set to music by MacGibbon After the battle of Culloden, which terminated for ever the hopes of the Stuarts, he took refuge in the Highlands, where he endured many perils and privations, but at last succeeded in escaping into France Through the intercession of his friends at home his pardon was soon procured from government, on which he returned to Scotland

In 1750, on the death, without issue, of his elder brother, John, who married Elizabeth Dalrymple, a descendant of the family of Stair, the poet succeeded to the estate of Bangour His health, however, which was originally delicate, had been injured by the hardships to which he had been exposed, and required the benefit of a warmer climate He, therefore, returned to the continent, and took up his residence at Lyons, where he died of a lingering consumption, March 25, 1754 A volume of his poems, without his consent or name, appeared at Glasgow in 1748, but the first genuine and correct edition of his works was published by his friends at Edinburgh in 1760, with a head by Strange, from which the subjoined woodcut is taken

A discriminating criticism by Professor Richardson of Glasgow, in the Lounger, first drew the public attention to his poems, the chief characteristics of which are liveliness of imagination and delicacy of sentiment. "Mr Hamilton's mind" says Lord Woodhouselee, in his life of Lord Kames, "is pictured in his verses. They are the easy and careless effusions of an elegant fancy and a chastened taste, and the sentiments they convey are the genuine feelings of a tender and susceptible heart, which perpetually owned the dominion of some favourite mistress, but whose passion generally evaporated in song, and made no serious or permanent impression" Had he never written anything but the 'Braes of Yarrow,' that ballad, one of the finest in the language, would have been sufficient to have immortalised his name He married Miss Hall, of the family of Dunglass, and had issue one son, James, who succeeded him

HAMILTON, GAVIN, a distinguished painter, a descendant of the family of Murdieston, was born at Lanark some time in the first half of the eighteenth century, and being sent to Rome while very young, became a scholar of Augustine Massuchi After several years' absence he returned to Scotland, and, with the exception of a few portraits, he devoted himself entirely to historic composition Two full lengths of the duke and duchess of Hamilton are spoken of as his best efforts in the department of portrait painting Returning in the course of a short time to Rome, he made that city his residence for the remainder of his life From his classical taste and superior style he soon acquired a high reputation as an artist, and was one of the three celebrated painters employed by the Prince Borghese to embellish the saloons of the Villa Borghese The subject, represented by Hamilton, is the story of Paris, painted in different compartments, and is described as being one of the finest specimens of modern art to be found in Italy His greatest work, however, was his Homer, consisting of a series of pictures representing scenes in the Iliad One of these, the parting of Hector and Andromache, was in the possession of the duke of Hamilton, another, the Death of Lucretia, was in that of the earl of Hopetoun, and a third, Achilles dragging the body of Hector round the walls of Troy, was painted for the duke of Bedford The whole series can now only be seen continuously in the excellent engravings made of them by Cunego

In 1773 Mr Hamilton published at Rome a folio volume, entitled 'Schola Picturæ Italiæ,' or 'The Italian School of Painting,' consisting of a number of fine engravings by Cunego, all the drawings for which were made by Mr Hamilton himself, forming part of the collection of Piranesi He died at Rome about 1775

HAMILTON, Right Hon Sir William, K B, an eminent virtuoso, celebrated for his works on the Volcanic Phenomena, and Antiquities of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, was born December 13, 1730 He was the youngest son of Lord Archibald Hamilton of Riccartoun and Pardovan, Linlithgowshire, a son of the duke of Hamilton, by Lady Jane Hamilton, daughter of 6th earl of Abercorn In his youth Mr Hamilton held a commission in the third regiment of foot guards, and before his accession to the throne, George III made him his equery In 1758, he married the only daughter of Hugh Barlow of Lawrenny-Hall, Pembrokeshire, with whom he got an estate worth £5,000 a-year In 1761 he was elected member of parliament for Midhurst, and in 1764 was appointed ambassador to the court of Naples, where he resided for 36 years Having abundance of leisure, the volcanic eruptions of the neighbourhood early engaged his attention, and before the middle of 1767 he had visited Vesuvius no less than 22 times, also Mount Etna and the Eolian Islands His researches he detailed in several letters to the Royal Society, inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, and published separately in 1770, also in his splendid work, 'Campi Phlegræi,' 2 vols. folio, published at Naples in 1776–7, a Supplement to which appeared in 1779, containing an account of the great eruption of Vesuvius in August of that year

Always indefatigable in bringing to light the buried treasures of antiquity, he promoted the publication of the magnificent account of Herculaneum, and drew up a description of the discoveries made in Pompeii, which was printed in the fourth volume of the 'Archæologia' He also collected a Cabinet of Greek and Etruscan vases and other antiquities, of which an account was edited by D'Hancarville, and published in 4 volumes, under the title of 'Antiquites Etrusques, Grecques, et Romaines, tirees du Cabinet de M Hamilton' In 1766 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and January 8, 1772, he was created a knight of the Bath About 1775 he lost his only daughter, and in 1782 he was deprived by death of his lady In February 1783 he undertook a journey through Calabria, to observe the effects produced by the dreadful earthquakes which had just before desolated that beautiful province, and transmitted the result of his investigations to the Royal Society His portrait is subjoined

In 1791 Sir William was sworn a privy councillor, and the same year he married a second time Emma Harte, originally a servant in a low tavern, afterwards the goddess Hygeia of the eccentric Dr Graham, the celebrated quack, and better known as the fascinating and licentious Lady Hamilton, celebrated for her connexion with Lord Nelson In December 1798, when the French invaded the kingdom of Naples, Sir William accompanied his Sicilian majesty to Palermo His connexion with the stirring events of that period belong to history By his exertions in getting the English fleet refitted at Palermo, Lord Nelson was speedily enabled to pursue the French, and achieve the glorious victory of Aboukir The English nobility and gentry who visited Naples expressed the warmest acknowledgments for the splendid hospitality he exercised towards them He was recalled in 1800, when he returned to England, and died in London, April 8, 1803, in his 73d year He bequeathed what property remained to him to his nephew, the Hon C F Greville, son of the earl of Brooke and Warwick It was in trying to save this nephew from the wiles of Emma Harte, that Sir William himself fell a victim to her arts After his death, his collection of Antique Vases was purchased by parliament for the British Museum, to which he had made some valuable presents of books, manuscripts, and mineralogical curiosities

HAMILTON, Alexander, M D, an eminent physician and professor of midwifery in the university of Edinburgh, was born in 1739 at Fordoun, in Kincardineshire, where his father, who had been a surgeon in the army, was established as a medical practitioner In 1758 he was appointed assistant to Mr John Straiton, a surgeon in Edinburgh, and on that gentleman's death in 1762, having been induced to remain in that city, he was admitted, on application, a member of the College of Surgeons, and commenced practice for himself He afterwards obtained a medical degree, and was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, being, at a suitable interval, chosen a fellow of the college In 1780 he was appointed joint professor of midwifery in the university of Edinburgh with Dr Thomas Young, on whose death in 1783, he became sole professor. He resigned his professorship on the 26th March 1800, and on the 9th April, his son, who had been his assistant for two years, was elected his successor Dr Hamilton was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh He died on 23d May 1802 His works are

HAMILTON, Robert, LL D, an eminent mathematician and political economist, was the eighth son of Gavin Hamilton, bookseller, Edinburgh, and grandson of Dr William Hamilton, professor of divinity, and afterwards principal of Edinburgh college. He was born June 11, 1743, and studied at the university of his native city Though in early life subject to constitutional weakness of health, he displayed remarkable proficiency in mathematics, and a singular application in the acquisition of knowledge After leaving college, being intended for a commercial profession, he spent some time in the banking establishment of Messrs William Hogg and Son, where he obtained that practical information on money matters which afterwards enabled him to expose, with so much effect, the ruinous nature of the then financial system of the country In 1766, when only twenty-three years of age, he was induced, by the advice of his friends, to offer himself as a candidate for the mathematical chair in Marischal college, Aberdeen, then vacant by the death of Professor John Stuart. Though unsuccessful in his application, Dr Trail being the fortunate competitor, he left a very high impression of his abilities on the minds of the examinators Thereafter he became partner in a paper-mill, established by his father, but which he relinquished in 1769, on being appointed rector of the academy at Perth In 1771 he married Miss Anne Mitchell of Ladath, who died seven years afterwards

In 1779 Dr Hamilton was presented by the Crown to the chair of natural philosophy in Marischal college, Aberdeen, which, in the subsequent year, he exchanged with Dr Copland for the mathematical professorship, as being better suited to his inclination and ability It was not, however, till 1814 that he was formally appointed to the mathematical chair in the same university

In 1782 Dr Hamilton married a second time Jane, daughter of James Morison, Esq of Elsick, and sister of the Rev Dr Morison, minister of Banchory-Devenick

Dr Hamilton's principal work, the 'Inquiry concerning the Rise and Progress, the Redemption and Present State of Management of the National Debt of Great Britain,' was published at Edinburgh in 1813, when he had passed his seventieth year The greater part of this celebrated Treatise is devoted to the consideration of the various measures which had heretofore been adopted for reducing the national debt In opposition to the views advocated by Dr Price in his treatise 'Of Reversionary Annuities,' published in 1771, Dr Hamilton proves the utter uselessness of a borrowed sinking fund, like that of Mr Pitt, and the fallacy, as well as folly, of continuing its operations during war, or when the expenditure of the country overbalances the revenue His arguments are supported and illustrated by tables of practical calculation, and he satisfactorily shows that the excess of revenue above expenditure is the only real method by which the national debt, or any other debt, can be discharged. His principles have not only been sanctioned by the most eminent political economists, but have gradually been adopted by the government

In 1814 Dr Hamilton's increasing infirmities rendering it necessary that he should have an assistant in the duties of his chair, Dr. John Cruickshank was appointed to that office, and became his successor He died, July 14, 1829, at the advanced age of eighty-six By his first wife he had three daughters, of whom, the second, Helen, was married to the late Mr Thomson of Banchory, and the youngest, Marion, to the Rev Robert Swan of Abercrombie, in Fife By his second wife, who died in 1825, he had no family

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, an eminent historical painter, the son of a Scotch gentleman, who resided many years at Chelsea, was born in 1750 He was sent to Italy when very young, and studied under Zucchi, the painter of arabesque ornaments at Rome On his return to England he became a pupil in the Royal Academy, and acquired considerable employment He was engaged by Alderman Boydell for his Shakspeare, and by Macklin for his edition of the Bible and of the Po ets. One of his best works was a picture of the 'Queen of Sheba entertained at a Banquet by Solomon,' a design for a window in Arundel castle. He was elected associate of the Royal Academy November 8, 1784, and a Royal Academician February 10, 1789 He died December 2, 1801.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, D D, an eminent minister of the Church of Scotland, the son of a farmer, was born in 1780, at Longridge, parish of Stonehouse, Lanarkshire He was early sent to the parish school, and in Nov 1796 was enrolled a student in the university of Edinburgh In addition to his ordinary studies, he attended also the classes of anatomy, chemistry, and materia medica.

In the summer of 1802 Mr Hamilton went to reside, as chaplain, in the family of Mr Colquhoun of Killermont, lord register of Scotland, and in Dec. 1804 he was licensed to preach the gospel by the presbytery of Hamilton Shortly after he became assistant to the minister of Broughton, in Tweeddale, where he laboured for about 16 months By the influence of the lord register he subsequently obtained the appointment of assistant and successor to the Rev Mr Maconochie, minister of Crawford, which, however, he was induced to relinquish in favour of another, and accepted the office of assistant to Mr Sym at New Kilpatrick He officiated at the latter place for a year and a half, when he was chosen minister of St Andrew's chapel, Dundee, to which charge he was ordained Dec 23, 1807 After he had been about 20 months in that town, his friend, Mr Colquhoun, procured for him the presentation to the parish of Strathblane, Stirlingshire, to which he was inducted September 14, 1809 He died April 16, 1835 He was the author of the following works

Treatise on Assurance.
Young Communicant's Remembrancer
Mourner in Zion Comforted.
He wrote also a most excellent and edifying autobiography, published with his 'Life and Remains,' edited by his son, the Rev James Hamilton, D D., minister of the Scottish National church, London

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM, Baronet, one of the greatest metaphysicians of modern times, was born in Glasgow in March 1788 His grandfather, Thomas Hamilton, professor of anatomy in the university of that city (who died in 1781) by his wife, Isabella, daughter of Dr. William Anderson, had a son, William (who died in 1793), the father of the subject of this notice. His mother was Elizabeth, second daughter of William Stirling, Esq, heir male of the ancient family of Calder Sir William was the elder of two sons His brother, Thomas Hamilton, Esq., at one time an officer in the army, was the author of 'The Youth and Manhood of Cyril Thornton,' a novel, published in 1827, one of the most vigorously written fictions of its day, 'Men and Manners in America,' published in 1833, 'Annals of the Peninsular Campaigns,' and other popular works

After his father's death, he was boarded for some time with Rev Dr Summers at Mid Calder, and at the age of 12, entered the university of Glasgow He was afterwards sent to a school at Bromley, and returned to Glasgow College Having obtained one of the Snell exhibitions, he went, in 1809, to Baliol College, Oxford, where he took first-class honours The profession which he made, it is stated, on going in for his degree, was unprecedented for its extent. It embraced all the classics of mark, and under the head of science, it took in the whole of Plato, the whole of Aristotle with his early commentators, the Neo-Platonists, and the fragments of the earlier and later Greek schools His examination in philosophy lasted two days, and two hours each day, and he came forth from it, showing that his knowledge was both accurate and extensive

In 1812 he went to Edinburgh, and having devoted himself to the study of the law, he passed advocate at the Scottish bar in 1813 The representation of the family of Hamilton of Preston, East Lothian, and Fingalton, Renfrewshire, the oldest branch of the noble house of Hamilton, having in 1799 devolved upon him, he took the necessary steps to have his right acknowledged, and on July 24, 1816, was by a most respectable jury, before the Sheriff of Mid-Lothian, served heir male in general to Sir Robert Hamilton, the second baronet of the family, who died, unmarried, October 20, 1701, and proved himself to be of the house of Preston and Fingalton, the twenty-fourth in lineal male descent from Sir John Fitz Gilbert de

Hamilton, of Rossaven and Fingalton, who lived about 1330, and was the second son of Sir Gilbert, the founder of the house of Hamilton in Scotland The lands of Rossaven, here mentioned, are in Lanarkshire, and afforded an occasional title to the heir apparent of the family Ross, in the Gaelic, signifies a promontory or peninsula Rossaven, therefore, is the promontory or peninsula formed by the confluence of the Aven and the Clyde, near the town of Hamilton Sir William was, also, of the family of Airdrie, the twelfth male representative

In 1821, Sir William was elected by the Faculty of Advocates and the Town Council, with whom the patronage then lay, to the chair of Universal History in the University of Edinburgh He first distinguished himself by a remarkable series of contributions to the Edinburgh Review, extending from 1826 to 1839 From 1826 to 1828 he wrote elaborate papers against Phrenology and George Combe and Dr Spurzheim, and in preparing for them he dissected several hundred different brains In 1829, he wrote his famous article on Cousin and the Philosophy of the Unconditioned, in 1830, his article on Perception, and on Reid and Brown, and in 1833, that on Whately and Logic These and others were collected and published in 1852, in one volume 8vo, under the title of 'Discussions in Philosophy and Literature, Education and University Reform' By these he became known, on their appearance in the Review, to philosophers on the Continent, and his fame abroad at the time was higher than even in his own country These essays are, in an especial degree, distinguished for vigour and originality of thought, not less than for vast and varied learning, and on their publication in a collected form, the work was translated into French

In 1836, on the death of Dr David Ritchie, one of the ministers of St Andrew's church, Edinburgh, professor of logic in the university of that city, Sir William was appointed by the Town Council, the then patrons, his successor in the chair For this professorship, more than for any other, he was particularly qualified, and he attained in it a reputation equal to that of any of the deepest thinkers yet known Under him, the class, which had long been a mere appendage to the theological course, assumed a new importance, and Scotland as a school of metaphysics, regained the renown it had enjoyed in the days of Dugald Stewart. Having begun to prelect on Dr Thomas Reid in his class, he was led to prepare an edition of Reid's works, which, with selections from his unpublished letters, was published in 1846, but never completed

Sir William also held the office of her majesty's solicitor of teinds for Scotland He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of the Latin Society of Jena, and a doctor in philosophy Previous to his death he was engaged in editing the works of Dugald Stewart His own Lectures, edited by Professor Mansel, Oxford, and Professor Veitch, St Andrews, were published after his decease For a number of years previous to his death he suffered from paralysis, and, being obliged to employ an assistant, it was characteristic of him that he was in the habit of selecting for the office some one of those who had been his more distinguished students

Sir William Hamilton has been described as "the most learned of all the Scottish metaphysicians." "When he was alive," says one who knew him, "he could always be pointed to as redeeming Scotland from the reproach of being without high scholarship Oxford had no man to put on the same level Germany had not a profounder scholar, or one whose judgment, in a disputed point, could be more relied on" Unlike Brown, who, notwithstanding his wide reputation and many admirers, founded no school, Hamilton has numerous professed disciples, and is an established authority in metaphysics "His articles in the Edinburgh Review were above the comprehension," says a writer in the 'North British Review' for November, 1857, who understood what he was writing about, "and still further above the tastes of the great body even of metaphysical students in this country when they appeared But they were translated by M Peisse into the French language, and there were penetrating minds in Britain, America, and the Continent, which speedily discovered the learning and capacity of one who could write such Dissertations By the force of his genius he raised up a body of pupils ready to defend him and to propagate his influence He has, at this present time, a school and disciples, as the Greek philosophers had in ancient times, and as such men as Descartes, Leibnitz, and Kant, have had in modern times."

Sir William Hamilton died at Edinburgh May 6, 1856, of congestion of the brain He had married, in 1829, his cousin, the daughter of Hubert Marshall, Esq, and had three sons, 1st, William, his successor in the baronetcy, (see page 424), 2d, Hubert, who in 1860 passed advocate at the Scottish bar, 3d, Thomas, and one daughter, Elizabeth

A memoir of Sir William Hamilton, by his pupil, Thomas Spencer Baynes, LL B, is given in the "Edinburgh University Essays" for 1856, and in an ably written article on "Scottish Metaphysicians" in the North British Review for November 1857, an account is given of his system and philosophy His works are

Be not Schismatics. Be not Martyrs by Mistake. Part I Pamphlet on the Non-Intrusion Controversy Edin, 1843.

HANDYSIDE, a surname originally Hangingside Peter Handyside, Greenhall, who married Margaret, daughter of James Verner of Holms, and left issue, was the representative of the name. His younger brother, William Handyside, writer to the signet, married Jane, daughter of William Cuninghame of Lainshaw, and his eldest son, Robert, passed advocate 1822, was appointed sheriff of Stirlingshire in 1840, solicitor general in 1853, and made a lord of session, as Lord Handyside, the same year He died April 18, 1858. He married Helen, daughter of Alexander Bruce of Kennet. Through his uncle he succeeded to the property of Pencloe, Ayrshire.

HANNAY, a surname originally Ahanney, and also met with as De Anneth, belonging to an old family in Galloway, supposed to be of Scandinavian origin, which is first mentioned about the end of the 13th century, but without any lands named as belonging to them at that period. In the Ragman Roll, amongst those barons who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296, occurs the name of Gilbert de Hanyethe. The family early obtained the lands of Sorby or Sorbie, from which the parish of that name is called, and which they retained until the latter part of the 17th century Their arms occur in the celebrated MS. volume of emblasonments of Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, Lord Lyon king at arms. Sorbie-place, the seat of the family from the reign of James IV, was anciently a tower of some strength, and is now a picturesque ruin, surrounded with wood, about a mile east of the village of Sorbie. The lands of Sorbie at present belong to the earl of Galloway Various personages of the family of Hannay occur in the public records;—as John de Hanna, 1424, Robert Hannay of Sorbie, son of Odo Hannay of Sorbie, 1488, Alexander Hannay of Sorbie, 1500, &c. Patrick Hannay sat for Wigtown in the Scottish parliament in 1581, and another Patrick Hannay in 1637 One of them married a daughter of Stewart of Garlies, ancestor of the earl of Galloway, early in the sixteenth century Another of the race was James Hannay, dean of Edinburgh, in the time of Charles I., the same who, on reading the liturgy, by appointment of the king, on July 23, 1637, in the Cathedral church of St. Giles, Edinburgh, was assailed by sticks, stones, bindgeons, joint-stools—the day of the "Jenny Geddes" riot. Another, Sir Patrick Hannay, was director of the Chancery in Ireland in the same age.

In 1630, Sir Robert Hannay of Mochrum, descended from the Sorbie family, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia. He left a daughter, Jane, married to Sir Robert Reading of Dublin, whose blood flows in the noble houses of Hamilton and Abercorn.

After the Sorbie estates went to the earl of Galloway in the latter part of the seventeenth century, there still survived some junior branches holding lands of less value in Wigtownshire. Of these were Kirkdale,—the pedigree of which is given below,—and Grennan. Hugh Hannay of Grennan occurs in 1612, and another Hugh in 1631, and John Hannay in Grennan was fined for nonconformity in 1662 Grennan ultimately devolved, through a co-heiress, on Dr Alexander Hannay of Glasgow, whose widow (daughter of James Hannay of Blairinnie) only sold it in our time. Robert Hannay, Esq, East India merchant, Maxwell Hannay, and others, are of the doctor's family A male scion of Grennan, sprung from a marriage in Charles the Second's reign with one of the M'Cullochs of Myrton, was settled at Knock and Garrarie in Wigtownshire, before 1700, as kinsmen to the Maxwells of Monreith Alexander Hannay, Esq, Banker, Dumfries, and Elliott Hannay, Esq, War Office, London, descend from the Knock branch Of this line, too, Robert Hannay, son of John Hannay of Knock, and born in 1720, married a daughter of Maxwell of Newlaw, a lady who was fifth in descent from the great John Maxwell, Lord Herries, of Queen Mary's time. Descended from this marriage are, Captain Hannay of Ballylough, Antrim, Ireland, John Hannay, Esq of Lincluden, Kirkcudbrightshire, James Lennox Hannay of the English bar, and many others, also, James Hannay, Esq, appointed in 1860 editor of the Edinburgh Courant, whose father and grandfather both possessed land in Galloway, and who, besides the Maxwell descent, has a descent also from the old M'Dowalls, Irvings, and Browns of Caraluith Born at Dumfries, February 17, 1827, he was partly educated in England He entered the royal navy in 1840 as a midshipman, and served for the following five years on the Mediterranean station In 1845 he left the service, and settling in London, devoted himself to literature. At the general election of 1857, he became a candidate for the representation in parliament of the Dumfries burghs, which his father had twice contested in other days, but was defeated,—polling 185 votes. The following is a list of his works —

Sketches in Ultra-Marine a Collection of Naval Papers. (1848-52).

Singleton Fontenoy A Naval Novel. 1850, 3 vols 8vo. 1853, cheap edition.

Satire and Satirists. Six Lectures, delivered in the summer of 1853, in London, 1853-4.

Essays contributed to the Quarterly Review 1861

Patrick Hannay, M.A., of the Sorbie family, published, in 1622, a book of curious poems which once had reputation, but are now very rare and almost forgotten. He was the grandson of Donald Hannay of Sorbie, and is supposed to have employed his sword in the service of the unfortunate but high-spirited queen of Bohemia, the daughter of our James VI., and wife of the elector Palatine. These poems procured him some celebrity, and among his eulogists were "Edward Leuenthorpe, Robert Hannay, Johannes Dunbar, John Marshall, John Harmer, J M C, William Lithgow, and Robert Alane." The following is a specimen of the laudatory epistles which were dedicated to him. Galdus, therein referred to, is the celebrated Galgacus, the leader of the confederated Caledonians against the Romans. From his having been thought to have learned the art of war in South Britain, he was called Galdus or Gallus, the British word Gal signifying a stranger. In Scottish history he is known by the name of Corbredus Galdus. (History of Galloway, 1841, vol. i. p 66, Note.) Some accounts affirm that he was slain in a battle on the banks of the Cree, and interred at Carnholy. The poem is given as originally printed

"To His Much Respected Friend Master Patrick Hannay

"Hannay, thy worth bewrayes well whence thou'rt sprunge,
And that that honour'd Name thou dost not wrong,
As if from Sorby's stock no branch could sprout,
But should with rip'ning time bear golden fruit.
Thy Ancestors were ever worthy found,
Else Galdus' grave had grac'd no Hannays ground.
Thy father's father Donald well was knowne
To the English by his sword, but thou art showne
By pen (times changing) Hannay's are Active in acts of worth be't peace or warre,
Goe on in virtue, Aftertimes will tell,
None but a Hannay could have done so well

"King Galdus (that worthie) who so bravely fought with the Romans, lies buried in the lands of Patrick Hannay of Kirkdale in Galloway. Jo Marshall."

The titles of his works are —'Two Elegies on the Death of Queen Anne, with Epitaphs.' London, 1619, 4to. 'A Happy Husband, or Directions for a Maid to choose her Mate. Together with a Wife's Behaviour after Marriage.' London 1619, 8vo. 'Philomel, or the Nightingale, Sheretine and Mariana, A Happy Marriage, Elegies on the Death of Queen Anne, Songs and Sonnets.' London, 1622, 8vo. Of the latter collection, Mr Lowndes, in his Bibliographer's Manual (Part iv., p. 992,) says, "A remarkable volume in five parts, engraved title by Cyprian Passe, in eleven compartments, the bottom centre occupied with a portrait of the author." The last portion, 'Songs and Sonnets,' was reprinted in 1841, in square 12mo, 42 pages, by Mr E V Utterson, at his private press at Baldornie, Isle of Wight, 12 copies only. One of them is in the Advocates' Library. In 1858 a copy sold for £1 19s. An original copy of the 'Two Elegies on the Death of Queen Anne,' small 4to, (London, 1619) is also in the Advocates' Library.

A copy of his Poems, the rare collection in 5 parts, published in 1622, with the original frontispiece by C de Passe, and portraits of the author and Anne of Denmark, and a copy of it cleverly executed by H Rodd, sold at the sale of Archdeacon Wrangham's library for £40. The same work, with a portrait of Anne of Denmark, by Crispin de Passe, inserted, brought at Bindley's sale, £35 14s. It was resold at Perry's sale for £38 6s. Again, at the sale of the books of Sir M M Sykes, it brought £42. Again, at the sale of the library of Rev M Rice, it brought £21. At Heber's sale, the same book, wanting title and frontispiece, sold for £3 9s.

A person of the same surname, Robert Hannay, published at London in 1694 An Account of the Proceedings of the Quakers, at their Yearly Meeting in London, on the 28th of the Third Month,' 1694, 4to.

In 1582, Alexander Hannay, a younger son of the family of Sorbie, purchased the lands of Kirkdale, stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and obtained a charter of the same, from his nephew, Patrick Hannay, Esq of Sorbie, paternal ancestor of the Hannays of Mochrum.

This Alexander Hannay of Kirkdale left a son, John Hannay, who inherited that estate.

John's son, Patrick Hannay of Kirkdale, married Ann, daughter of Partrick Mackie, Esq of Larg.

Their son, also named Patrick Hannay of Kirkdale, by his wife, Agnes, daughter of Gavin Dunbar of Baldoon, had a son, William Hannay of Kirkdale. This gentleman married Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Gordon, Esq of Castraman, a cadet of the ancient family of Lochinvar (afterwards viscounts of Kenmure)

His son, Samuel Hannay, Esq of Kirkdale, married Jane, daughter and coheiress of Patrick Mackie of Larg (by his wife, Agnes, daughter of Sir Patrick Mackie of Larg,) with issue.

Their eldest son, William Hannay of Kirkdale, married Margaret, daughter of Rev Patrick Johnston of Girthon, with issue Alexander Hannay, a younger son of this marriage, entered the army, and fought at Minden. He afterwards went to India, and became very famous there as "Colonel Hannay" in Warren Hastings' time.

His eldest brother, Sir Samuel Hannay of Kirkdale, was, on Sept. 26 1783, served and retoured male heir of Sir Robert Hannay of Mochrum, knight, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, March 10, 1630, with remainder to his male heirs whatsoever. In 1768 he married Mary, daughter of Robert Mead, Esq., and had 4 sons and 4 daughters. The eldest son, Samuel, succeeded his father in December 1790. The 3 other sons all died unmarried. The daughters were 1 Margaretta, died unmarried, 2 Eliza, wife of George Woodroffe, Esq without issue, 3 Jane, married Thomas Ramsford, Esq., and had a large family, 4 Mary Hastings.

The eldest son, Sir Samuel Hannay, the next baronet, born August 12, 1772, was in the service of the emperor of Austria, and held an official post in Vienna. He built a large mansion on his property which forms a fine object from the Wigtownshire side of the bay. The property is supposed to be the principal scene of Sir Walter Scott's novel of Guy Mannering, and Dirk Hatteraick's Cave, once noted for smugglers, is below the house. Sir Samuel died in 1841, when the title became again dormant.

He was succeeded in the estate of Kirkdale, by his sister Mary Hastings Hannay, in virtue of a deed of entail, made by Ramsay Hannay, brother of the first Sir Samuel Hannay, he having purchased the estate on the death of his brother. Mary Hastings Hannay died unmarried in 1850, and was succeeded in the estate of Kirkdale by her nephew William Henry Ramsford Hannay, in right of the said deed of entail, when he assumed the additional name of Hannay. On his death, without issue, in 1856, his brother Frederick Rainsford Hannay, succeeded to the estate.

The family of Hannay of Kingsmuir, Fifeshire, claim to be the representatives of the Hannays of Sorbie, and are so described by Nisbet. As the name implies, the lands of Kingsmuir,—at one period a common muir, on which almost all the neighbouring proprietors had a right of pasturage, and many a right of cutting turf,—originally belonged to the crown About the beginning of the 18th century, Kingsmuir became the property of the ancestor of the present proprietor, George Francis Hannay Esq In 1710, when Sibbald published his "History of Fife," the possessor of the estate was named Peter Hannay Esq of Kingsmuir Ann Hannay, who possessed it shortly after, was married to Erskine of Dun; but dying without issue, left the estates to a kinsman, from whom the present proprietor descends. George Francis Hannay, born in 1788, succeeded his brother, Peter Hannay, lieut. R. N (who fought at Trafalgar in the Defiance) in 1819 He m. Robina, only child of Robert Cunningham, Esq of Pittarthie, captain in the army Heir, his son, George captain Fife artillery, born 1824

The family of Hannay of Rusko, Kirkcudbrightshire, was formerly from Wigtownshire Robert Hannay, Esq of Rusco, born in 1807, married Bridget, daughter of Thomas Smith, Esq., London, with issue Heir, his son, Robert, born in 1836

The Hannay arms are, Three roebucks' heads couped, Azure, collared, Or, with a bell pendent thereat, Gules. On the frontispiece of Mr Patrick Hannay's book of poems are his arms in Tabiduce, with his picture, being Argent Three roebucks' heads, couped, Azure, with a mollet in the collar point, for his difference, his father being a younger son of Hannay of Sorbie, with a croslet fitched, issuing out of a crescent, sable, for crest and motto relative thereto, Per ardua ad alta. The family of Kingsmuir, Fifeshire, carries the last blason without the Mollet, and the same crest, with the motto, Cresco et spero (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol i p 335)

HART, ANDREW, an eminent bookseller and printer, flourished at Edinburgh in the reign of James VI, and died in December 1621, at an advanced age

HASTINGS, LADY FLORA, an accomplished poetess, eldest daughter of Francis, marquis of Hastings, governor general of India, and Flora, countess of Loudon, was born at Edinburgh, Feb 11, 1806 She was Lady of the bedchamber to the duchess of Kent, and having in her latter years been subject to an enlargement of the liver, this unfortunate malady gave rise to a cruel and most unmerited slander, which caused her death, of a broken heart, at Buckingham palace, July 5, 1839, aged 33 Her body was conveyed to Scotland, and interred, July 15, in the family vault at Loudon, Ayrshire

Few events of a domestic character ever roused so vehemently the feelings of the people of Great Britain as the fate of this lady Her mother, the marchioness dowager of Hastings, overcome by grief, died January 9, 1840 After Lady Flora's death, a volume of her poems, edited by her sister, was published by Blackwood of Edinburgh Distinguished by much sweetness, simplicity, and grace, they are the reflected picture of a mind at once pious, pure, amiable, and accomplished

HAY, surname of, for which see page 141 of this vol. In Normandy there were lands and a lordship denominated Hay, and in the roll of the adventurers who accompanied William the Conqueror into England in 1066, le sieur de la Haye is expressly mentioned, besides others of the same name. The two most ancient families of this surname in Scotland are those of Errol (see ERROL, earl of,) and Tweeddale, (see TWEEDDALE, marquis of,) who use the same armorial bearings as do those families of the name in Italy, France, and England. Sir George Hay, descended from a younger branch of the same stock as that of the earl of Errol, was created, in 1627, Viscount Dupplin and Lord Hay of Kinfauns, and in 1633 earl of Kinnoul (see KINNOUL, earl of). Sir James Hay of Fingask, uncle of the first earl of Kinnoul, was created in 1609 Lord Bewlie, and his son, Sir James Hay of Pitcorthie, Fifeshire who accompanied King James the Sixth into England, and was one of his especial favourites, was in 1615 created by him Lord Hay of Sawlie in the peerage of England, in 1618 Viscount Doncaster, and in 1622 earl of Carlisle, which titles became extinct on the death of his only son, James Hay, second earl of Carlisle, in 1660

The family of Hay of Smithfield and Haystone are descended from John, 3d Lord Hay of Yester, of the house of Tweeddale, by his 2d marriage with the daughter and heiress of the ancient family of Dickson of Smithfield, Peebles-shire By this lady he had, with one daughter, Jean, wife of George Broun of Colstoun progenitor of the baronets of that name, one son, John, of Smithfield, living in 1525 The latter had 3 sons. 1 James, 2 Thomas, 3. John, of Kingsmeadows, whose descendants carried on the line of the family

The eldest son, James, succeeded his father, and dying without issue his brother, Thomas, inherited the estate. On this gentleman's death, in 1570, his son, John Hay, became proprietor of Smithfield, and at his decease in 1628, was succeeded by his only surviving son, James.

Appointed by James VI, in 1624, esquire of his body, James Hay of Smithfield was, July 20, 1635, created a baronet of Nova Scotia, the patent being accompanied by a grant of land in Nova Scotia, to be thenceforth called the barony and regality of Smithfield. Sir James had, with a daughter, Mary, married to Sir James Douglas, afterwards earl of Morton, 2 sons, 1 John, his successor in the title, but whom he disinherited with a legacy of £1,000, 2 William, who succeeded to the estates, and died without issue.

Sir James, the 2d baronet, died in 1654. His eldest son, Sir John, 3d baronet, died in 1659

Sir John's eldest son, Sir James, succeeded as 4th baronet. Born in 1652, this gentleman was the last representative of the Smithfield branch. He died, without male issue, in 1688,

The kinsman of the last baronet, James Hay, M D., who had succeeded to Haystone, the property of his father, in 1762, preferred, in 1805, a claim to the dormant title. This Dr Hay was the eldest son of John Hay of Haystone, great-great-grandson of John Hay, Esq of Kingsmeadows, youngest son of the first John Hay of Smithfield. His claim was allowed by a jury assembled at Peebles, Nov 9, the same year (1805,) and he, in consequence, became 5th baronet. He had 3 sons and 4 daughters. He died Oct. 21, 1810

His eldest son, Sir John, 6th baronet, born January 15 1755, married in 1785, Mary Elizabeth, youngest daughter of James, 16th Lord Forbes, and had 5 sons and 6 daughters. He died May 23, 1830.

His son, Sir John, 7th baronet, M P, born Aug 3, 1768 died, without issue, Nov 1 1838.

His brother, Sir Adam, succeeded as 8th baronet. Born Dec. 14, 1795, he married in 1828, Henrietta Callendar, eldest daughter of William Grant, Esq of Congalton, Haddingtonshire, issue, 4 sons and 5 daughters. His eldest son, John William, born Feb. 15, 1824 was at one period a captain Scots fusilier guards.

The family of Hay of Park, Wigtownshire, which possesses a baronetcy of Nova Scotia (1683), are descended from Thomas Hay, Esq of Dalgery, a cadet of the noble house of Errol Soon after the Reformation in Scotland, he acquired the estate of Park, a part of the abbey lands of Glenluce.

His great-grandson, Sir Thomas Hay of Park, 1st baronet with a daughter, wife of Sir A. Agnew of Lochnaw, had a son, Sir Charles, 2d baronet, who m. a daughter of Sir Patrick Agnew, bart. of Lochnaw, and had 2 sons and 2 daughters.

Thomas, the elder son, predeceased his father leaving, by his wife May, daughter of Sir William Maxwell of Monreith, Thomas, and other sons. James, the 2d son, a physician in Dumfries, married Dorothea Crichton of Crawfortoun, with issue, who carried on the line of the family Sir Thomas, grandson of Sir Charles, succeeded him as 3d baronet. By his wife, Jean, daughter of Blair of Dunskey, he had a son Sir Thomas, and a daughter, Susannah

Sir Thomas was succeeded by his only son, Sir Thomas, 4th baronet, on whose death, April 30, 1794, without issue, the estate of Park devolved upon his sister, Susannah, wife of John Dalrymple, Esq of Dunraget, who assumed the additional surname of Hay, and was created a baronet of the United Kingdom, April 20 1798

The baronetcy of 1683 reverted to the cousin of Sir Thomas, James, eldest son of William Hay Esq of Crawfortoun elder son of Dr James Hay, 2d son of Sir Charles, 2d baronet

Sir James, 5th baronet, was succeeded by his son, Sir William, 6th baronet, at whose decease, unmarried, Oct 7, 1801, the title devolved on his cousin, Sir John, 6th baronet, only son of lieut.-col Lewis Hay Royal Engineers, who was killed at the landing of the British troops at the Helder, Aug 27, 1799 Col Hay married Barbara, daughter of John Craigie, Esq of Glendoick, Perthshire, with issue, 2 sons and 5 daughters. The daughters were, 1 Agnes Clark, married John Irving, Esq., Edinburgh. 2. Maria, married J V Thatcher, M D Edinburgh 3 Dorothea Judith, wife of J Taylor, Esq, Solicitor of Stamps and Taxes for Scotland 4 Lewis Hately, married J Richardson, Esq, Edinburgh 5 Elizabeth Graham, died unmarried

The elder son, Sir John, 7th baronet, born Aug 29, 1799, passed advocate in 1821, and was appointed sheriff substitute of Stirlingshire From that office he retired in January 1861 He married, in 1836, Sarah Beresford, daughter of John Cossins, Esq of Weymouth, and grand-daughter of George, 18th Lord Audley, issue, 6 sons and 2 daughters.

The progenitor of the family of Hay of Alderstone and Hermiston, Berwickshire, was Sir John Hay of Barra, of the family of Fala, lord clerk register in the reign of Charles I., lineally descended from Sir Edmund Hay of Linplum, younger brother of Sir David Hay of Yester, ancestor of the marquis of Tweeddale. While very young he was employed by the city of Edinburgh to welcome King James the Sixth at the West Port of that city, on his visit to Scotland in 1617, and his Latin Oration on the occasion is preserved in a work called 'The Muses' Welcome,' published at Edinburgh He at first held the office of town-clerk, and afterwards that of provost of Edinburgh On 9th March 1632 he was knighted by King Charles. On 8th January following, he was preferred to be lord clerk register, and appointed a lord of session In 1637 he was one of the chief advisers of the introduction of the Service Book, and in consequence was forced soon after to retire into England. In 1641 he resigned all his offices into the king's hands, his dismission being dated 17th July that year, when he received a warrant on the Scottish exchequer for £5,000 sterling and £400 per annum during its nonpayment. Being accused of treason, he returned with the king to Scotland to answer the charges brought against him, and was committed to the castle of Edinburgh In January and February 1642 he was tried by a committee of the Estates, but nothing could be proved against him On the marquis of Montrose coming south he joined him, and was taken prisoner at Philiphaugh. It is said he only escaped the scaffold by bribing the earl of Lanark with the rents of his estate during his life. On obtaining his liberty, he retired to Duddingstone, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, where he died 20th November 1654 He was twice married, and had a large family by both wives. His 2d son by his 2d wife, Thomas Hay of Hermiston, was the first of the Hays of Alderstone, and his 3d son, by the same lady, George Hay, was father of Richard Hay, commonly called 'Father Hay," an antiquary of great research Born at Edinburgh in 1601, according to his own expression he was 'thrust' into the Scots College in France in 1673 or 1674 He left France in 1686, to establish a society of canons regular in Scotland, but at the Revolution again went to France, where he died

Thomas Hay, the 2d son of the 2d marriage, married Anna, daughter of Sir John Gibson, baronet of Pentland, issue, Sir John, his heir, and 4 other sons. Alexander Hay of Huntingdon his 3d son, sheriff depute of East Lothian, who died in 1745, left 2 sons, 1 Thomas, a lord of session, under the title of Lord Huntingdon, and 2 John Hay of Restalrig, secretary to Prince Charles, attainted in 1745

Sir John, the eldest son of Thomas Hay, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1703 He married Catherine, daughter of Sir George Suttie, baronet and died in 1706

His eldest son Sir Thomas, 2d baronet, captain of dragoons, died, without issue, Nov 26, 1769 His brother, Sir George, 3d baronet, married Barbara, only child of Henry MacDougall, Esq of Makerstoun Roxburghshire and had a son and a daughter, wife of John Scott, Esq of Gala.

The son, Sir Henry Hay MacDougall, 4th baronet, married in 1782, Isabella, daughter of Admiral Sir James Douglas, baronet, and had 3 daughters, 1 Anna Maria, m. General Sir Thomas Brisbane, bart., 2 Henrietta, and 3 Elizabeth

On Sir Henry's death, April 13, 1825, the title devolved on his kinsman, Sir Thomas Hay, 5th baronet, son of Alexander Hay of Mordington, advocate, eldest son of Lord Huntingdon, above mentioned. Sir Thomas married Anna, widow of Major Bingham and daughter of Sheffield Howard, Esq of New York issue, 2 sons and 2 daughters. Sir Thomas died in 1833

His elder son Sir James Douglas Hamilton Hay, 6th baronet, married in 1819 the daughter of William Sanderson, Esq, issue, 5 sons and 5 daughters.

A baronetcy is also possessed by the family of Dalrymple Hay of Park Place, Wigtownshire, a branch on the male side of the same family as that of the earl of Stair

John Dalrymple, 2d son of James Dalrymple of Stair, became possessed of the estate of Dunragget, which, at one time, belonged to a family of the name of Baillie, a branch of the Baillies of Lamington. The first of the Baillies of Dunragget was Cuthbert, lord high treasurer of Scotland, who died in 1514, and the last was Thomas Baillie, connected by marriage with the M'Kerlies, an ancient Galloway family, (see M'Kerlie, surname of). His father, Alexander Baillie, was in June 2, 1681, served heir to his father, William Baillie, in the lands of Dunragget, &c. His accidental death, having been drowned in the Cree, and his son's childhood, gave the Stair family an opportunity to obtain possession of the estate.

John Dalrymple's son, James Dalrymple of Dunragget, married Grace, daughter of Patrick MacDowall, Esq of Freugh, and died May 15, 1776, leaving a son, John Dalrymple of Park Place, Wigtownshire, who, marrying Susannah, only daughter of Sir Thomas Hay, 8d baronet of Park, assumed the additional surname of Hay, as above stated, on her succeeding, in 1794, to the estates of her brother, Sir Thomas Hay, the 4th baronet of that family, and was himself created a baronet of the United Kingdom, April 20, 1798 He died in May 1812.

His only son, Sir James Dalrymple Hay, 2d baronet, born July 8, 1789, (died March 19, 1861) m. first, in 1819, Elizabeth, dr. of Lieut.-Gen. Sir John Heron Maxwell, of Springkell, baronet, issue, one son, John Charles, 8d baronet, born Feb. 11, 1821, capt. R. N, m. with issue, and 2dly, in 1823, Anne, dr of George Hathorn, Esq, issue, 8 sons and 5 drs.

Alexander Hay of Easter Kennet, of the house of Park, was in March 1564 nominated clerk of the privy council, and in 1577 was appointed director of the chancery In 1579 he obtained the office of clerk register, and made a lord of session, when he took the title of Lord Easter Kennet. In the same year he was nominated a commissioner anent the jurisdiction of the Kirk, and in 1581 a member of the commission for the visitation and reformation of hospitals. He was also an arbiter in the deadly feud then existing between the families of Gordon and Forbes. In 1589 he accompanied King James to Denmark, as interim secretary for the Scottish language. He died Sept. 19, 1594 His younger son, Sir Alexander Hay of Newton and Whitburgh, was also a lord of session (1610), under the title of Lord Newton Appointed clerk register July 30, 1612, he died in 1616, when Sir George Hay, afterwards earl of Kinnoul, succeeded him in the latter office

Of the family of Hay of Braco, in Banffshire, was Lieutenant-general James Hay, C B, who died 10th March 1854 During the Peninsular war he served in the 16th lancers, and was present at the passage of the Douro, and the capture of Oporto, and also in the affair with the French rear-guard at Salamonde, at the battle of Talavera, and the actions at Redinha, Condeixa, Fox d'Avace, and Sabugal, and at the battle of Fuentes d'Onor In an affair with the 'Lancers de Berg,' near Especia, General (then Captain) Hay commanded the regiment, and took their colonel, a 'chef d'escadron,' and seventy-nine men prisoners. In reference to this the duke of Wellington in his despatches, mentions that "Captain Hay greatly distinguished himself" At the commencement of the action at Salamanca his right arm was broken, and he was several times engaged with the enemy during the siege of Burgos, and on the retreat to Portugal. He was also in command at the battles of Vittoria, the Nivelle, and the Nive, the passage of the Bidassoa and the Adour, and the entry into Bordeaux. He commanded the 16th lancers at the battles of Quatre Bras and Waterloo, at which latter he was so severely wounded as to render it necessary that he should be left for eight days on the battle-field before he could be removed into Brussels. For his services in the Peninsula, and in the field generally, he was nominated a commander of the Bath, and promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy For Vittoria and Nive he obtained a gold medal and clasp, and for Talavera, Fuentes d'Onor, and Nivelle, the silver war medal and three clasps, and for the battle of Waterloo was gazetted a companion of the Bath, and in 1851 promoted to be lieutenant-general. At the time of his death he was colonel of the 79th or Cameronian Highlanders.

HEADRICK, James, the Rev, an able agriculturist and mineralogist, was born in 1758 Having studied for the ministry, in 1809 he was presented to the parish of Dunnichen, in Forfarshire Before his induction to the parochial charge, he had travelled over the three kingdoms in pursuit of the knowledge of agriculture and mineralogy He planned out and superintended many large and valuable estates, contributed an able analysis of lime to the Farmer's Magazine, gave to the public in 1807 an excellent description of the Island of Arran, and published, in 1813, an extended account of the husbandry of Forfarshire. He was the author of the account of the parish of Dunnichen, inserted in the New Statistical Account of Scotland Edinburgh, 1845 He there derives the name of Dunnichen from Dun-achan, two Gaelic words, signifying the hill or fort of the valley Mr Headrick died at the manse of Dunnichen, March 31, 1841, aged 83 His works are

View of the Mineralogy, Agriculture, Manufactures, and Fisheries of the Island of Arran, with Notices of Antiquities, and suggestions for improving the Agriculture and Fisheries of the Highlands and Isles of Scotland Edin 1807

General View of the Agriculture of the County of Angus, or Forfarshire, with Observations on the means of its improvement. Published under the auspices of the Hon the Board of Agriculture and Internal Improvement. 1813, 8vo.

Some Mineralogical and Geological Observations, made in the Isle of Arran. Inserted in Nicholson's Journal for 1807

A Treatise on Chemistry, commonly attributed to him, was published by a John Headrick, at London, in 1697, under the title of 'Chymical Secrets.'

HENDERSON, Alexander, one of the most eminent ministers of the Church of Scotland in the most important period of her history, namely, previous to the middle of the seventeenth century, was born in 1583 Of his parents and the circumstances of his early life we have no authentic information, but he is supposed to have been descended from the Hendersons of Fordel, in Fifeshire. He completed his studies at the university of St. Andrews, where he took the degree of M.A., and some time previous to 1611 he was elected regent, or professor, of philosophy, in that ancient seminary. Ambitious of preferment, he early adopted the principles of the prelatical party, then dominant in the church, and having completed the usual course of attendance on the divinity classes, he was, through the patronage of Archbishop Gladstanes, presented to the parish of Leuchars, in Fife His settlement, which took place previous to 1615, was so unpopular, that, on the day of ordination, the church-doors were shut and secured by the people, and the ministers who attended with the presentee were obliged to enter by the window He was at this time strongly prejudiced in favour of Episcopacy

Mr Henderson at first showed but little concern for the spiritual interests of his people, but his sentiments and character soon underwent a complete change Having learned that the celebrated Presbyterian preacher, Mr Bruce of Kinnaird, was to assist at a communion in a neighbouring parish, Mr Henderson, desirous of hearing him, went to the place, and, to prevent being recognised, concealed himself in a dark corner of the church Mr Bruce chose for his text these remarkable words, "He that entereth not in by the door, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber" This passage, so applicable to his situation, and the sermon which followed, made such an impression on his mind as led to an entire change in his views and conduct He now became thoroughly convinced that the proceedings of the prelatical party were injurious to the interests of religion, and he resolved at once to take part with the Presbyterians. An opportunity of publicly declaring his change of sentiments did not present itself till August 1618, when the obnoxious Five Articles of Perth having been carried at a packed Assembly held in that city, Mr Henderson was among those ministers who had the courage to oppose them as episcopal innovations, though the utmost wrath of the Government was threatened against all who persisted in rejecting them In the month of August 1619 he and two of his brethren were cited before the court of high commission at St Andrews, charged with having composed and published a book against the validity of the Perth Assembly On their appearance, Mr. Henderson answered the accusation with so much eloquence and truth, that the bishops could gain no advantage over him and his friends, and were obliged to dismiss them with threatenings From this period till 1637 he seems to have lived retired in his parish, employed in the sedulous discharge of his pastoral duties, and taking no part in any of the public transactions of the period

The rash and ill-judged attempt of Charles the First, in 1637, to force the liturgy or service book on the Church of Scotland, recalled him from his retirement, and caused him to take that leading part in the affairs of the church which has made his name so celebrated In common with other ministers, he had been charged to purchase two copies of the liturgy for the use of his parish within fifteen days, under the pain of rebellion He immediately went to Edinburgh, and, August 23, presented a petition to the privy council, representing that the service book had not received the sanction of the General Assembly, nor was recognised by an act of parliament, and praying a suspension of the charge To this remonstrance the council returned a favourable answer, and the reading of the liturgy was ordered to be suspended until the king's farther pleasure should be known Charles, however, only the more peremptorily insisted that the service book should be received, and from this time forward Mr Henderson took a prominent share in all the proceedings of the nonconformists A great number of the nobility, gentry, clergymen, and representatives of burghs, with others, had assembled in Edinburgh from all parts of the country, and after another supplication had been presented to the privy council, praying them to bring the matter again before the king, a proclamation from his majesty was made, requiring all persons to depart to their homes within twenty-four hours, on pain of being denounced rebels Instead of dispersing, the leaders of the popular party, after some farther ineffectual petitions to the king, resolved to appeal to the people, and the result was the renewal of the National Covenant of 1580 and 1581, with only some slight changes adapted to the circumstances of the times It was prepared by Mr Henderson, assisted by Archibald Johnston, afterwards of Warriston, an advocate in whom, we are told, the supplants chiefly confided, and was sworn and subscribed in the Grey Friars' church of Edinburgh, on February 28, 1638, by thousands of the nobility, gentry, ministers of the gospel, burgesses, and others Mr Henderson addressed the vast multitude assembled with great fervour and eloquence, and the enthusiasm of the people knew no bounds He was subsequently sent with several noblemen, and Messrs Cant and Dickson, to Aberdeen, to prevail on the inhabitants of that city to take the Covenant, and, after urging upon them the strongest arguments in favour of the document, no less than 500 persons subscribed it, many of them being of the highest respectability

At the memorable General Assembly which met at Glasgow the same year, November 21, 1638, the first that had been held for a long period, Mr Henderson, now the acknowledged leader of the clergy, was unanimously chosen moderator And in that difficult and trying situation, he conducted himself with a resolution and prudence, and at the same time with a forbearance and moderation, befitting the occasion After the deposition and excommunication of the bishops, and the formal abolition of Episcopacy, Mr Henderson terminated the proceedings with an eloquent and impressive address to the members of the Assembly, concluding with these striking words —"We have now cast down the walls of Jericho, let him that rebuildeth them beware of the curse of Hiel the Bethelite!"

Before the rising of the Assembly two supplications were given in, the one containing a call to Mr Henderson from St Andrews, and the other from Edinburgh Being much attached to his own parish of Leuchars, of which he had been minister for eighteen years, he expressed his unwillingness to remove from it, pleading that he was now too old a plant to take root in another soil It was carried, however, by seventy-five votes, that he should be translated to Edinburgh, to which he consented, on condition that when old age should overtake him, he should again be removed to a country charge

In 1639 he was one of the commissioners appointed by the Church to treat regarding the articles of pacification with the king, and during the whole of the difficult negotiations that ensued, he behaved with great prudence and candour At the subsequent meeting of the Assembly, in August of that year, the earl of Traquair, commissioner from his majesty, earnestly desired that Mr Henderson might be re-elected moderator, a proposition strenuously opposed by Mr Henderson himself, and rejected by the Assembly, a constant moderatorship being contrary to the constitution of the Church On the 31st of the same month, he was called upon to preach at the opening of parliament, on which occasion he delivered an excellent discourse, in which he treated, with consummate ability, of the end, duties, and utility of magistrates.

In 1640 the town council of Edinburgh, with the view of rendering the system of education at the university more efficient, resolved to appoint annually a rector of that institution, and unanimously elected Mr Henderson to the situation He was empowered to superintend all matters connected with the conduct of the principal and professors, the education of the students, and the disposal of the revenues. In this office, which he appears to have enjoyed, by re-election, to his death, he exerted himself sedulously to promote the interests of that learned seminary Besides devoting his especial attention to the education of candidates for the ministry, he instituted a professorship of oriental languages, a department previously much neglected

The king having refused to ratify some of the points agreed upon at the late pacification, suddenly prorogued the parliament, denounced the Covenanters as rebels, and prepared again to invade Scotland But the successes of the Scots army, which entered England in August 1640, compelled him to accede to another proposition for peace, and a conference was begun at Rippon, which, in a short time after, was transferred to London Mr Henderson was appointed one of the commissioners, on the part of the Church, to conclude the treaty, and during all the time of his residence in London, which was protracted for nine months, he exerted himself, by preaching and otherwise. to promote the views of the commissioners, and wrote a variety of able tracts and papers, some of which were published without his name, while others were laid before the commissioners and parliament of England Before he left London he was admitted to a private conference with the king the special object of which was to procure assistance to the Scottish universities from the rents formerly appropriated to the bishops, when he was graciously received by his majesty

On his return to Edinburgh, in July 1641, he was again chosen moderator of the General Assembly Having delivered in a letter from a number of ministers in London, requesting advice as to the proper form of church government to be adopted, several of their brethren being inclined towards Independency, the Assembly instructed him to answer it, and in his reply he earnestly urged a uniformity of church government in the two kingdoms The Assembly unanimously approved of a motion which he brought forward, to the effect that they should take steps for drawing up a Confession of Faith, Catechism, Directory of Worship, and Form of Government, and remitted to him to prepare the necessary drafts of these documents On the 14th of August the king arrived at Edinburgh to be present at the parliament, on which occasion, wishing to conciliate the presbyterian party, he appointed Mr Henderson his chaplain During his majesty's residence in Edinburgh he performed family worship every morning and evening at the palace, and frequently preached before him in the chapel-royal at Holyroodhouse At this parliament the revenues of the bishoprics were divided, and by Mr Henderson's exertions, what belonged to the bishopric and priory of Edinburgh were bestowed on the university As a recompence for his own laborious and expensive services in the cause of the public, the emoluments of the chapel-royal, amounting to about 4,000 merks a-year, were conferred upon him

Some reports injurious to his character having been industriously circulated, in the ensuing Assembly he entered into a long and impassioned vindication of his conduct His brethren unanimously expressed their sympathy, and assured him of their continued confidence, on which we are told he recovered his cheerfulness.

During the year 1642 Mr. Henderson was employed in managing the correspondence with England respecting ecclesiastical reformation and union He was soon after chosen one of the commissioners appointed to proceed to that country, but was for some time delayed by the civil war Anxious to effect a reconciliation between Charles and his English subjects, he joined with some other leading men in an invitation to the queen to come to Scotland, but this proposition was rejected by the king. Accompanied by the other commissioners, he next went to Oxford, where his majesty then was, to offer him the mediation of Scotland, but the infatuated monarch, instead of making some concessions for the sake of peace, endeavoured to convince him of the justice of his cause, defended all his proceedings, and expressed his high indignation at the interest which the Scots took in the reformation of the church in England On Henderson's return to Edinburgh, his conduct throughout this delicate negociation was pronounced by the General Assembly to have been "faithful and wise"

In 1643 he was, for the third time, chosen moderator of the General Assembly—an occasion which was rendered remarkable by the presence of the English commissioners sent down by the parliament to crave their aid and counsel in the then critical circumstances of both kingdoms He was appointed one of the commissioners who soon after went to London to attend the Assembly of divines at Westminster, to represent there the Church of Scotland, and to obtain the ratification of the Solemn League and Covenant by that Assembly and by both houses of parliament, which was accordingly done on the 25th of September During the three following years he remained in London, unremittingly engaged in assisting the Westminster Assembly in preparing the public formularies for the religious union between the three kingdoms

In the beginning of 1645 he was appointed to assist the commissioners of the parliaments of England and Scotland in conducting the treaty between them and the king at Uxbridge On the breaking off of the treaty he returned to London

In the spring of 1646, when the king had thrown himself into the hands of the Scottish army, he sent for Mr Henderson, who was considered the most competent person to deal with his majesty in his then circumstances He arrived at Newcastle about the middle of May, and received a welcome reception from the king, but soon perceived that Charles was as unwilling as ever to consent to the establishment of presbyterianism It was agreed that the scruples which the king entertained should be discussed in a series of papers between his majesty and Mr Henderson These continued from May 29 to July 15 They are eight in number, five by the king, who was assisted by Sir Robert Murray, and three by his reverend opponent Mr Henderson's health being much impaired, he was obliged to remove by sea to Edinburgh, where he died, August 19, 1646, in the 63d year of his age. His body was interred in the Greyfriars churchyard, where a monument was erected by his nephew to his memory

Subjoined is Henderson's portrait

HENDERSON, Thomas, an eminent astronomer, whose name is connected with the discovery of the parallax of the fixed stars, was the son of a tradesman at Dundee, where he was born December 28, 1798 He received his education in his native town, and both at the grammar school and the academy was distinguished for his attainments, and for the propriety and modesty of his demeanour At the age of fifteen, he was apprenticed, for six years, to a writer (attorney or solicitor) in Dundee During this period he began in his leisure hours the study of practical astronomy, and the history and literature of that science, to which he was so much attached that he prosecuted it often to the injury of his health In 1819, at the age of twenty-one, he went to Edinburgh, and obtained a situation in the office of a writer to the signet. His intelligence and abilities procured for him the patronage of Sir James Gibson Craig, baronet, by whose recommendation he was appointed clerk to the celebrated John Clerk, advocate, afterwards a lord of session, under the title of Lord Eldin On his lordship's retirement from the bench, he was for a time private secretary to the earl of Lauderdale, and subsequently clerk to the lord advocate, Jeffrey In these employments he continued till 1831, still prosecuting in his leisure hours the study of astronomy Having procured an introduction to Professor Wallace, he had free access to the Observatory on the Calton Hill, at that period a small establishment, but sufficiently equipped with instruments to afford valuable opportunities to a learner

In spite of weak health and a tendency to disorder in the eyes, Mr Henderson soon brought himself into notice as an astronomer His first contribution to astronomical science was a method of computing an occultation of a fixed star by the moon, communicated in 1824 to Dr Young, then secretary to the Board of Longitude, of which the latter thought so highly as to cause it to be published in the Nautical Almanac (of which he was superintendent) for 1827 and the four following years About the same time he also contributed other papers on kindred subjects to the Quarterly Journal of Science In 1827 he sent a paper to the Royal Society of London, 'On the Difference of Meridians of the Observatories of London and Paris,' in which he pointed out a small error that had crept into one of the observations, and which, without greatly affecting the result, yet exposed the whole to much doubt In the following year, in conjunction with Mr Maclear, he furnished the Astronomical Society with an ephemeris of the occultations of Aldebaran by the moon, in 1829, calculated for ten different observatories in Europe. He subsequently furnished other lists of lunar occultations computed for the meridian of Greenwich, these phenomena being of much use in determining longitudes

On the professorship of practical astronomy in the university of Edinburgh becoming vacant in 1828, by the death of Dr Blair, the government,—the appointment being in the Crown,—were strongly urged by Dr Young and other astronomers to name Mr. Henderson to the chair, but at that time no nomination took place At Dr Young's death the following year, it was found that that gentleman had placed in the hands of Professor Rigaud a memorandum to be communicated to the admiralty, recommending Mr Henderson as the most competent person to be appointed his successor in the superintendence of the Nautical Almanac. The government, however, confided the trust to Mr Pond, the astronomer royal, who offered Mr Henderson employment, on terms of remuneration, for a great part of his time, but this offer he did not accept

In 1831, on the death of Mr Fallows, he was appointed by the admiralty to succeed him in charge of the observatory then recently completed at the Cape of Good Hope, principally with a view to the determination of the places of the southern stars, for the aid of navigation He arrived at the Cape in April 1832, and from that date he must be considered as a professional astronomer During the thirteen months that he remained there he accumulated a large mass of valuable observations, having devoted himself assiduously to his duties, but finding his health suffering, and being far removed from his friends, he resigned his situation in May 1833, and embarked for England After his return to Edinburgh, having no official engagements, he began the laborious task of reducing the observations he had made at the Cape In 1834, by an agreement between the government and the Astronomical Institution of Edinburgh, the latter gave up their observatory to the university, government agreeing to appoint and provide for an astronomer, who was also to hold the professorship of practical astronomy in the university On the recommendation of the Astronomical Society of London, to whom Lord Melbourne, then prime minister, applied for advice, Mr Henderson was appointed the first astronomer royal for Scotland, being thus placed in the chair of practical astronomy, which had remained vacant since 1828 His regular duty did not interrupt the reduction of his Cape observations, and in 1837 he gave to the Astronomical Society a catalogue of the declinations of 172 principal fixed stars, chiefly in the southern hemisphere The most remarkable result of his labours was the discovery of the annual parallax of one of the fixed stars, by which the distance of these bodies from our globe has been brought within the reach of calculation In comparing his observations of a particular star, which, being near the south pole, is always above the horizon at the Cape, he found that they indicated that change of position or parallax which astronomers had been so long in search of In 1839, after testing the accuracy of his result in various ways, he announced it in a paper read to the Astronomical Society, and the attention of astronomers being thus directed to it, the subsequent observations of Mr Maclear, his successor in the post of astronomer at the Cape of Good Hope, and others, tended to confirm the accuracy of this important discovery

Thus, in the position which, of all others, he would have chosen for himself, and at a time when he was beginning to enjoy that fame and reputation which his research, application, and talents had earned for him, he was suddenly cut off, by disease of the heart, his death having taken place on 23d November, 1844 He had married in 1836, a daughter of Mr Adie, the well-known optician of Edinburgh, but his wife died in 1842, a few weeks after the birth of their only child

A very full account of Mr Henderson's astronomical labours, with a memoir of his life, was inserted in the Annual Report of the Astronomical Society for 1845 The list of his writings consists of upwards of seventy communications, of different degrees of magnitude and importance, to various scientific publications, some of them in foreign astronomical periodicals. He also published at

Edinburgh five quarto volumes of 'Astronomical Observations made at the Royal Observatory,' of that city, comprising the years 1834 to 1839 A sixth volume, left nearly ready for publication, was subsequently added. These six volumes are much valued by astronomers, and have conferred on the observatory a high reputation among the similar institutions of Europe In his astronomical career, he brought to his subject the most methodical habits of business, and as the author of the memoir of his life in the Proceedings of the Astronomical Society observes, "his name will go down to posterity as an accurate observer, an industrious computer, a skilful manipulator, and an improver of the methods in that department to which he devoted himself" He was well acquainted with astronomical literature and other branches of science, and at different times supplied the places of the professors of mathematics and of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh His desire to be informed of all that was doing abroad, made him collect an astronomical library, which, for a man of his limited means, was of extraordinary extent and value In his private character and social relations, he was modest and retiring, yet cheerful and communicative, and distinguished by great warmth of affection and amiability of disposition

HENNING, JOHN, an eminent modeller and sculptor, the discoverer of intaglio, son of Samuel Henning, a house carpenter and cabinet-maker from Galloway, was born at Paisley, on 2d May, 1771 His education was simple enough, consisting only of reading, writing, and arithmetic, and at the age of thirteen he was put to the trade of a carpenter He acquired a knowledge of history by reading the works of Rollin and Hume to his mother while she sat beside him sewing The voyages of Cook, Anson, and Byron made him anxious to be a sailor, and to qualify himself for a seafaring life, he studied geometry, trigonometry, and navigation When nearly seventeen years old, he had packed up his clothes for flight, when his mother's illness caused him to delay his departure, and his bundle being discovered, his father lectured him so severely that he entirely abandoned the idea of going to sea. He had ere this time begun to attempt the pencil, his efforts being confined to that small degree of architectural drawing required by his father's business He was first led to try that peculiar art, namely, of modelling, in which he afterwards excelled, from the following circumstance Having previous to his marriage gone to visit Edinburgh, as he himself informs us, on August 16th, 1799, he got lodgings with a carpenter who was then working for Mr , afterwards Sir Henry Raeburn, the eminent painter, and accompanied him to the house of the latter on the following day Being ushered into a room he recognised a portrait of General Macdowall, but on looking at it again, it did not strike him so forcibly as a likeness He resolved to attempt a portrait himself, and try to model a head in wax On his return to Paisley, he took for his first model a bench comrade, A. Woodrow by name It turned out a strong though a coarse likeness, and he was teased by some of his acquaintances to model their portraits. He did so, working in the evening, and thus gradually improved in his finish In his own immediate neighbourhood the fame of the untaught artist soon began to spread Sitters came to him, tradesmen of Paisley, country farmers, and afterwards country squires Of these he took medallion portraits in wax He still worked, as a carpenter, under his father, whose business fell off, in consequence of the war, until, out of fifteen or twenty journeymen, the only one that Samuel Henning had remaining was his steady and diligent son, who worked at the same business till he was nearly thirty years old In the following year happened the circumstance which decided his fortune, of which the following is his own simple account "Early in 1800, being in Glasgow, on business for my father, I had been obliged to stay the night at the house of a friend Modelling being my hobby at the time, I always carried wax and tools in my pocket I did medallions of my friend and his wife during the evening He showed them to his master, James Monteith, Esq , whereupon Mr Monteith proposed to sit to me I wrote stating that having no intention of following modelling as a profession, I felt sick at the idea of being dragged into public notice, by practising an art to which I was not competent." These objections were overruled by Mr Monteith, who appointed a day for the sitting "This," he continues, "was the 2d of May, my birthday I took my way to Glasgow in a very uneasy state of mind On seeing me, Mr Monteith said, 'I am too engaged to sit, but I have nine sitters ready for you' At this my trepidation increased, and I went away with him, feeling very miserable As we trudged along, a gentleman accosted Mr Monteith, and while they stood talking, I slipped into a close It was not a thoroughfare, or I think, from the humour I was in, that I should have run away, and so have done with modelling for ever" But this was not to be The turning point in John Henning's career was his introduction to Mr Monteith From that time he relinquished the carpenter's tools for those of the sculptor About 1802, he removed to Edinburgh, where he remained for nine years, and his proficiency in his art as a modeller of busts and medallions, his attainments as a linguist, his general literary taste and extensive information, secured him the patronage and esteem of many of the most distinguished philosophers and literary men of that time In the list of afterwards celebrated characters whom Henning numbered among his sitters were a set of young lawyers then just rising into notice, Lord Jeffrey, Lord Murray, Lord Brougham, and Francis Horner Mrs Siddons, also, when visiting Edinburgh had a medallion taken by Mr Henning, probably one of the best likenesses extant of this great actress From this portrait we may date an after-phase of the sculptor's fortune Among his acquaintances and friends he ranked Sir Walter Scott, Adam Fergusson, Dugald Stewart, the Rev Archibald Alison, father of Sir Archibald Alison, baronet, Mrs Grant of Laggan, Professor Wilson, and many of the most eminent members of Edinburgh society at that period

In July 1811, Mr Henning visited London for the first time, being then in his 41st year His friend, Francis Horner, took him to the galleries of the marquis of Lansdowne and Earl Grey, where he made various drawings and studies As he was preparing to return to Scotland, a casual street meeting induced him to visit the Elgin marbles, then newly brought over from Greece, and placed in a stable like apartment in the corner of Burlington House. They struck him with wonder, and having procured a letter of introduction to Lord Elgin for permission to draw or model from the marbles, he thus relates the result "His lordship called on me, saying it was customary to bring a letter from an academician I answered 'My lord, I cannot understand why noblemen or gentlemen should not dare to allow an individual to draw or model from works of art in their possession, I call this the popery of art, and I protest against such slavery' His lordship left me The following morning he came again, accompanied by President West, who praised my drawings and models very much Lord Elgin then said he was going to give me leave to draw from the marbles Mr West replied, 'To allow Mr Henning to draw from your lordship's marbles would be like sending a boy to the university before he had learned his letters' This produced a solemn pause Lord Elgin coloured, the president looked abashed, and I mustered my dancing school science, and bowed them out right gladly His lordship then returned, in a few minutes, and said good-humouredly, 'You are a very odd man not to comply with custom' I said, 'My lord, I never will to what seems to me absurd custom, it has long been my confirmed opinion, that academies, from their selfish spirit of exclusion, have not always been promoters of art, but sometimes have actually retarded willing students to-day has shown me an instance of this which I never can forget'" This frank reply appears to have pleased Lord Elgin, for Mr Henning received a cordially-granted permission to copy from the marbles "I began to draw," he says, "on August 16, 1811, which fixed me in the mud, dust, and smoke of London I was so fascinated with the study, that I was there by sunrise every morning except Sunday, and even the cold of winter did not mar my darling pursuit"

In 1812, his medallion of Mrs Siddons was brought by that lady under the notice of the princess of Wales, afterwards the unfortunate Queen Caroline, and in consequence he had many interviews with her royal highness and the Princess Charlotte, the latter of whom he modelled repeatedly When looking over his drawings from the Elgin marbles, the Princess Charlotte asked him if he could reduce a special group in ivory, restoring all the mutilations of the original. He succeeded, and afterwards seventeen more were executed by him in a similar manner for the marquis of Lansdowne, the duke of Devonshire, &c. He then commenced the chief labour of his life, the restored friezes of the Parthenon, which occupied him "twelve long years, from the morning's dawn to the gloaming" At first the material used was ivory, on which he worked in relief, but an incident occurred which caused him to change this plan, while he made, at the same time, a valuable discovery Poverty obliged him, as he himself expressed it, "to act the dominie" in his own household One day, when giving his youngest son a lesson in arithmetic, he observed the latter amusing himself by cutting a head in the slate with a tool that he himself used to carve ivory with "The same acuteness," says his biographer, "which has converted many a child's toy into a mighty instrument in the hand of science, caused John Henning to reason upon, and apply the experiment The result was the discovery of intaglio In this manner the friezes were done, first cut in slate, and then cast Thus, this man, almost uneducated and unaided, save by the powers of his own strong and active mind, produced a work which is known throughout Europe as the best,—indeed, the only effort at reproducing these glorious remains of Grecian art The value of Mr Henning's work was early proved by that most unjust but most decisive test—imitation No sooner were the friezes completed than they were pirated by innumerable modellers, who, buying the original, were enabled to take from it cast after cast, at an expense comparatively trifling These inferior reproductions were sold everywhere, with Mr Henning's name appended, by which not only was his name injured, but he was deprived of nearly all the profits of his indefatigable industry Before long a firm at Paris brought out a series of anaglyptic engravings from Mr Henning's frieze, the artist's name in the first issues not being even mentioned This omission was afterwards reluctantly rectified, though the engravings were of a character little likely to do justice to the work, yet, in spite of this inferiority, the firm boasted in 1835 that they had sold 12,000 copies." [Biographical Sketch in Art Journal for April 1849]

Henning's Elgin friezes were succeeded by the Cartoons and the Transfiguration of Raffaelle, engraved in intaglio, works of transcendant merit which, for their minuteness of detail and beauty of execution, elicited the warm encomiums of Canova and Flaxman. In this undertaking he was assisted by his sons, now growing up, and following art as a profession Other works in relief were executed by the same united hands, among these were the friezes on Hyde Park gate, of which John Henning, jun, furnished the designs, those on the Athenæum clubhouse, London, and a diplomatic box engraved in steel, after Flaxman These works, together with numberless medallions and busts, occupied the sculptor till 1846 Then, advancing in years, and unequal to much exercise of his art, Mr Henning began to consider a plan whereby he might reap from his long pirated works the benefit which was his due, and which he unfortunately required He agreed with his friend, Mr A R Fairbairn, an eminent engraver, to commence an undertaking whereby the latter was to make anaglyptic engravings of the Restoration of the Parthenon friezes, thus securing for Mr Henning a correct interpretation of his work, as well as the advantage of copyright The series were to be published by subscription, the sculptor and engraver making an agreement that secured to both due remuneration Thereupon, Mr Henning revisited his native place, where he resided for several months with his two sisters He was received by his townsmen in a manner that might well gladden his heart Subscribers were quickly obtained The town council of Paisley unanimously presented him with the freedom of the town, and he was entertained at a public dinner presided over by the provost On that occasion, his old friend, Professor Wilson, went from Edinburgh to do honour to the man who forty years before had followed his lowly trade of carpenter within the precincts of the town The engravings were commenced, but before the second plate was finished, Mr Fairbairn's death put an end to the undertaking Mr Henning himself died at London, 8th April 1851, in his eightieth year. In bas relief, Count Cignari, an accomplished Italian nobleman, declared that Mr. Henning surpassed all ancient or modern artists. To Mr Henning's labours Great Britain is indebted in no small degree for the progress which has been made in the art he cultivated and adorned For the materials of this sketch we have been mainly indebted to an ably drawn up memoir of Mr Henning in the Art Journal

HENRY THE MINSTREL, or BLIND HARRY, as he was familiarly called, who commemorated in vernacular poetry the achievements of Wallace, the champion of Scottish independence, flourished in the fifteenth century He is stated, by Dempster, to have been living in 1361, but Major, whom Crawford supposes to have been born about 1446, records that when he was in his infancy, Henry the Minstrel composed his metrical history of Wallace So few memorials, however, have been preserved of him, that we only know the half of his name, and have no means of ascertaining what his surname was Major farther informs us that he was blind from his birth, and that he gained his livelihood by following the occupation of a wandering minstrel The only manuscript known to be extant of Henry's heroic poem, which is entitled 'Ye Actis and Deidis of ye Illuster and Vaillzeand Campioun Shyr Wilham Wallace,' is preserved in the Advocates' Library, and bears the date of 1488 The first printed edition appeared at Edinburgh in 1570, and the latest and most correct at Perth in 1790 From the poem itself, which abounds in the romantic and marvellous, it would appear that the author had some knowledge of the Latin and French languages, of classical history, of divinity, and even of astronomy For much of his materials, he followed very strictly a book of great authority, being a complete history of Wallace, written in Latin, partly by John Blair, chaplain to that hero, and partly by Thomas Gray, of which, however, there is now no trace

HENRY, PRINCE OF WALES, eldest son of James the Sixth of Scotland, by Anne, sister of the king of Denmark, one of the most accomplished princes of the age in which he lived, was born February 19, 1594 He early proved himself an apt scholar, and his attainments were extraordinary for his years Besides being versant in the learned languages, he spoke the French and Italian fluently He had likewise made considerable proficiency in philosophy, history, fortification, mathematics, and cosmography Of the transcendent abilities of Sir Walter Raleigh, he entertained a very high opinion, and in allusion to the long imprisonment of that great man, he is reported to have said that no king but his father would keep such a bird in a cage Sir Walter Raleigh had designed a second and third volume of his History of the World, and had commenced a discourse on the Art of War by Sea, both of which he intended to dedicate to the prince, but his highness' untimely death discouraged him from proceeding with these works Prince Henry died in November 1612 His death was occasioned by a violent fever, although it was for some time erroneously believed that he was poisoned Subjoined is his portrait

HENRY, DAVID, a miscellaneous writer, was born in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, December 26, 1710, and was bred a printer Early in life he went to London, where a concurrence of circumstances placed him within the notice of Mr Edward Cave of St John's Gate, proprietor of the Gentleman's Magazine, whose sister he married in 1736 After this he began business at Reading, where he started a newspaper, and another at Winchester. In 1754 he became the partner of his brother-in-law, at St John's Gate, where for many years he took an active part in the management of the Gentleman's Magazine, to which he was a frequent correspondent. Mr Henry died at Lewisham, June 5, 1792 —He published the following works

Twenty Discourses, abridged from Archbishop Tillotson, &c. London, 1768

The Complete English Farmer, or a Practical System of Husbandry London, 1772 Published without his name.

An Historical Account of all the Voyages round the World, performed by English Navigators. London, 1774, 4 vols. 8vo Also without his name. To this work he added in 1775 a fifth volume, containing Captain Cook's Voyage in the Resolution, and in 1786 a sixth, comprising the last voyage of Captain Cook

He compiled, besides, a series of useful and popular publications descriptive of the Curiosities and Monuments of Westminster Abbey, St Paul's Cathedral, the Tower of London, &c.

HENRY, ROBERT, D D , an eminent historian and divine, the son of a farmer, was born in St Ninian's, Stirlingshire, February 18, 1718 He received the rudiments of his education at the parish school of his native village, and at the grammar school of Stirling, and completed his studies at the university of Edinburgh He was afterwards appointed master of the grammar school at Annan, and being licensed to preach in March 1746, he was ordained minister of a congregation of presbyterian dissenters at Carlisle, where he remained twelve years In 1760 he removed to Berwick-upon-Tweed, to become pastor of a similar congregation in that town In 1768, through the influence of Mr Lawrie, then lord provost of Edinburgh, who had married his sister, he was appointed minister of the New Greyfriars church, in that city, from whence, in 1776, he was translated to the collegiate charge of the Old church In 1770 the degree of D D was conferred upon him by the university of Edinburgh

The first volume of his 'History of England, on a New Plan,' was published in 1771, and on its appearance, the work was assailed, in various publications, with the most acrimonious criticism, chiefly from the pen of Dr Gilbert Stuart, whose letters on the subject, collected by d'Israeli, the elder, are inserted in the 'Calamities of Authors.' Dr Henry, however, steadily persevered in the prosecution of his design, and four other volumes were published at successive intervals, the last in 1785 Through the recommendation of the earl of Mansfield, George the Third bestowed on him an annual pension of £100 The property of the work had hitherto remained with himself, but in April 1786, when an octavo edition was intended, he conveyed the copyright to Messrs Cadell and Strahan, for the sum of £3,300 He had prepared for the press a sixth volume, bringing down the History to the reign of Henry the Eighth, which, edited by Mr Laing, was published in 1793, with the author's Life prefixed Dr Henry died November 24, 1790, in the 73d year of his age Subjoined is his portrait.

Dr Henry bequeathed his collection of books to the magistrates of Linlithgow, to form the foundation of a public library, for the use of the inhabitants of that town He was interred in the churchyard of Polmont, where a monument is erected to his memory He had married, in 1763, Ann, daughter of Mr Thomas Balderston, surgeon in Berwick, who survived him The fifth edition of his History appeared in 1823, in twelve volumes 8vo A French translation was published in 1789–96.

HENRYSON, Robert, a poet and fabulist of the fifteenth century, is usually styled chief schoolmaster of Dunfermline. Lord Hailes conjectures that he officiated as preceptor to the Benedictine convent of that town He is described by Sir Robert Douglas, in his Baronage of Scotland, as a notary-public. Neither the time nor the place of his birth has been recorded He is supposed, but on no sufficient grounds, to have belonged to the family of Henryson or Henderson of Fordell. His poetical tale, entitled 'Orpheus Kyng, and how he yeid to hewin and to hel to seik his Quene,' was printed by Chepman and Millar in 1508 His 'Testament of Faire Creseide,' first printed at Edinburgh by Henry Charters, in 1593, is usually appended to the common editions of 'Chaucer's Troilus and Creseide,' of which it is professedly the sequel His principal work is his collection of 'Fabils,' thirteen in number, printed at Edinburgh by Andrew Hart in 1621 The best of these Fables is considered to be 'The Borrowstoun Mous and the Landwart Mous,' the story of which is borrowed from Æsop, and has been told also by Horace, and by Cowley, and Fontaine This collection in manuscript is still preserved in the Harleian Library, which is dated in 1571 In the Bannatyne Manuscript 'Henryson's Fabils' also occupy a considerable space Among his Fables there is an allegorical ballad, called 'The Bludy Serk,' which is intended, in the form of a legendary tale of chivalry, to illustrate the sublime truths of Christianity The Fables of Henryson were reprinted in 1832, for the Bannatyne Club, from the edition of Andrew Hart, with an excellent Memoir prefixed by Dr Irving, the editor

Henryson wrote a number of other poems, principally of a moral and reflective character, such as 'The Abbay Walk,' 'The Praise of Age,' 'The Ressoning betwixt Deth and Man,' and 'The Ressoning betwixt Aige and Yowth' His pastoral of 'Robene and Makyne,' which is the earliest specimen of pastoral poetry in the Scottish language, is considered by Dr Irving to be "superior in many respects to the similar attempts of Spenser and Browne" Favourable specimens of his poetry may be found in Irving's Lives of the Scottish Poets, Hailes' Ancient Scottish Poems, Ellis' Specimens, Sibbald's Chronicle of Scottish Poetry, and similar collections The period of his death is unknown, but he appears to have lived to a good old age, and to have written most of his poems in the decline of life. Sir Francis Kinaston tells us "that being very old, he died of a diarrhœa or fluxe" His death must have taken place some time before 1508, as we find his name among the latest of the poets, whose decease is lamented by Dunbar in his poem on the 'Death of the Makkaris,' printed in that year

HENRYSON, Edward, LL D a celebrated civilian and scholar of the sixteenth century, was at one period professor of civil law in the university of Bourges, and at another a senator of the college of justice Previous to 1551 he was a student of law at the above-named university, and about this period he was fortunate in securing the patronage of Ulric Fugger, lord of Kirchberg and Weissehome, a Tyrolese noble of munificent disposition and great wealth, who had previously been the patron of his countryman, Scrimger, and who, besides inviting Henryson to reside at his castle, provided for him an ample supply of books and manuscripts, and conferred on him a pension Henryson afterwards dedicated his works to this liberal-minded nobleman, who devoted a great part of his fortune to the collection of ancient Greek manuscripts and the encouragement of the learned While residing in Germany he is said to have translated into Latin Plutarch's 'Commentarium Stoicorum Contrariorum,' but if he did, his translation is now lost

In 1552 Henryson returned to Scotland, where he practised for some time as an advocate Soon after he went back to the Continent, where he distinguished himself by writing a pamphlet in favour of a Tractatus on Jurisdiction, published by his former preceptor, Equinar Baro, defending it from the attacks of the civilian Govea In 1554 he was chosen professor of the civil law at Bourges, where he had studied, and from which university he received the degree of doctor of laws, and the year after he published another work, entitled 'Commentatio in Tit X. Libri Secundi Institutionem de Testamentis Ordinandis,' which he dedicated to Michael de l Hôpital, chancellor of France.

Having resigned his professorship, Henryson once more made his appearance at the bar in Scotland, and in 1557 we find him nominated counsel for the poor, an office which had been created shortly after the institution of the college of justice, and which was remunerated by a yearly pension of £20 Scots, being half the sum allowed to the king's advocate In 1568 he was appointed to the office of commissary, with a salary of 300 merks In January 1566 he was constituted an extraordinary lord of session In May of the same year he was nominated one of the commissioners for revising and correcting the laws and acts of the Scots parliament, and in the subsequent June he received an exclusive privilege and warrant to imprint and sell them, the license to continue for ten years He was the editor of the folio volume published six months thereafter, entitled 'The Actis and Constitutiouns of the Realme of Scotlande, maid in Parliamentis haldin be the Ryct Excellent, Hie, and Mychtie Princeis, Kingis James the First, Secund, Third, Feird, Fyft, Sext, and in the tyme of Marie, now Quene of Scottis, visoit, correctit, and extractit furth of the Registers be the Lordis depute, be hir Majestie's special commissioun thairto' To this work he wrote the preface On 19th November 1567 Henryson was removed from the bench, on account of being one of the king's counsel In 1573 he was one of the procurators for the church The date of his death has not been recorded His son, Sir Thomas Henderson, also a lord of session under the title of Lord Chesters, erected a monument to his memory in the Greyfriars churchyard, Edinburgh

HEPBURN, a surname derived from the lands of Hepborne or Hayborn in Northumberland, in which county several families of the name, in early times, had possessions. The first of this surname who settled in Scotland was Sir Adam Hepburn, said to have been taken prisoner in battle by the earl of March, who, in testimony of his esteem for the signal bravery which he had displayed, conveyed to him by charter several lands and estates in Haddingtonshire. [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 155] From Robert the Bruce he obtained the lands of North Hailes and Traprene. He had two sons, Sir Patrick, ancestor of the Hepburns, earls of Bothwell (see BOTHWELL, earl of, vol i p. 354), and John, foster brother of the earl of March and Moray, who conferred upon him, by charter, the lands of Over and Nether Merkhull in the sheriffdom of March. He is supposed to have been the ancestor of the Hepburns of Waughton, long a family of the first consequence in the county of Haddington, although Crawford, in his notes to Buchanan, says that this family is older than that of the Bothwell Hepburns.

The Hepburns of Athelstaneford, also in East Lothian, a branch of the Waughton family, held that property feudally of their kinsmen. On 24th November 1569, George Hepburn of Athelstaneford was cited before an assize, for slaying "vmquhile Johnne Geddes, and hurting and wounding diverse utheris," while besieging the place and fortalice of Waughton in January of that year, then held by the king's party, the Hepburns being adherents of Queen Mary As Geddes was slain by Hepburn's son Andrew, he seems to have been absolved from the charge. Nearly all of his surname in Haddingtonshire, we are told, were concerned in this tumult, under Robert Hepburn, younger of Waughton, who was endeavouring to regain possession of his ancestral house. They broke into the barbican, and took sixteen horses from the stables, but the laird of Carmichael, captain of the tower, sallied forth sword in hand, slew three of the assailants, and caused the rest to retire. From Pitcairn's Criminal Trials we also learn that the same George Hepburn was charged with intercommuning with Harry Hepburn of Fortune, and Patrick Hepburn of Kirklandhill, denounced as rebels and traitors for being adherents to their feudal chief, the outlawed earl of Bothwell, duke of Orkney, but acquitted, as he was also of the charge of slaying three of the king's soldiers at the battle of Langside, in the preceding year He had five sons and several daughters, and at his death—before 1616—his eldest son, also named George Hepburn, succeeded him in the estate of Athelstaneford. His second son, John, was the celebrated Sir John Hepburn, a field-marshal of France under Louis XIII, whose 'Memoirs and Adventures,' in one volume, by James Grant, was published at Edinburgh in 1851

Sir John Hepburn, considered "one of the best soldiers in Christendom," in his time, was born about the year 1598 or 1600, and is supposed to have studied for a short time at the university of St. Andrews, as in the beginning of 1615 a Joannes Hepburne was matriculated at St. Leonard's college, there "It is extremely probable," says Mr Grant, "that he was the John Hepburn who studied at St. Leonard's, as that university was founded by one of his family, John Hepburne, prior of the Augustinian monastery, and son of Adam, second Lord Hailes. Many students of his name were studying there during the first twenty years of the seventeenth century, and one of these, James Hepburn, died at Rome, keeper of the Vatican library" In 1615, to improve his mind and obtain a knowledge of foreign languages and manners, with his friend, afterwards Colonel Sir Robert Munro, he visited Paris and Poictiers. Sir David Dalrymple, Lord Hailes, says, "Sir Robert Munro and Sir John Hepburn joined the more important advantages of academical study in foreign parts, as well as at home." In the spring of 1620 he joined, as a volunteer, Sir Andrew Gray, a soldier of fortune then recruiting for the cause of the elector palatine, the unfortunate king of Bohemia, who had married the princess Elisabeth Stuart, daughter of their own sovereign, James the Sixth, and had formed a camp on the Monkrig, a property of the Hepburns in East Lothian About the end of May they sailed from Leith for Holland, and on the 1st October of the same year joined a part of the Bohemian army Soon after he obtained the command of a company of pikes in Sir Andrew Gray's Scottish band, which was employed to guard the king's person. After the battle of Prague, November 8, 1620, the Scottish companies were employed under Ernest, count of Mansfeldt, in Germany and Alsace, and in 1622, after the commencement of the Thirty Years' War, Captain John Hepburn was one of the defenders of Bergen-op-Zoom, against the strong besieging force of the marquis de Spinola.

The troops, under Mansfeldt, "12,000 strong, horse and foot," all soldiers of fortune, subsequently joined the Dutch, and at the sanguinary battle of Fleurus, in Hainault, on 30th August 1622, fought to prevent them entering Flanders, the Scottish bands, led by Captains John Hepburn, Hume, and Sir James Ramsay, are recorded to have evinced the most determined bravery Though defeated, they succeeded in entering Holland, which caused the raising of the new siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, and in the following year Mansfeldt's army was disbanded Under Captain Hepburn the survivors of the Scottish companies went to Sweden, and entered the service of the great Gustavus Adolphus, who had taken up arms in defence of the Protestant cause, then in extreme jeopardy Although a Catholic, Hepburn did not scruple to serve under so great a commander On the other hand, several Scots Presbyterian officers of note were fighting under the Austrian banners. His cousin, James Hepburn, younger of Waughton, also joined the Swedish service, and soon attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, but was killed in Lorraine in 1637 By his ardour and high military qualities, John Hepburn early acquired the favour of Gustavus, who in 1625 appointed him colonel of one of the auxiliary regiments, composed of his countrymen who had served with him in Bohemia and Holland, and of which the first or Royal Scots regiment of the British line is now the direct representative. It is stated by Mr Grant that every historian of the wars of Gustavus extols the brave Hepburn as the most famous of his cavaliers, and Defoe, who introduces him prominently in one of his most graphic novels, says, "he was a complete soldier indeed, and so well beloved by the gallant king (Gustavus) that he hardly knew how to go about any great action without him" The Swedish king is said to have ascribed his great victory at Leipsic to Hepburn's Scottish brigade alone. In 1625, Col Hepburn's regiment formed part of the army which invaded Polish Prussia, and served in that victorious campaign which gave Selburg, Nidorp, Dorpat, and Duneberg to Gustavus, and ended in the total rout of the Polish army on the plains of Semigallia, in the duchy of Courland. "It was," says his biographer, "during this Polish war, that Hepburn began the series of brilliant achievements which marked his career under the banner of Gustavus." Having resolved to effect the relief of Mewe a town of Western Prussia, where his garrison was closely blocked up, Gustavus sent a force of three thousand Scottish infantry, under Hepburn, and five hundred horse under Count Thurn, to cut a passage over a fortified hill defended by thirty thousand men By a secret path at night, they gained the summit of the hill, without being discovered, and furiously attacked the Poles, but after a severe struggle, were compelled to retire. Taking up a position beside a rock, where he received a small reinforcement, Hepburn defended himself for two whole days against the entire Polish army, during which Gustavus achieved the relief of the town He frequently volunteered on desperate duties, and in 1627, with his regiment he accompanied Gustavus into Prussia, where he bore a prominent part in all the operations of that brave and well-disciplined army, which stormed Kesmark, a free town of Hungary, defeated the Poles who were marching to its relief, besieged and captured Marienburg, and again defeated the Poles at Dirschau, a city of the Teutonic knights.

In 1630, previous to which year he had been knighted for his eminent services, he was in the army led by Gustavus in person against the Imperialists in Pomerania, and after the capture of the island of Rugen by Lieutenant-colonel Munro, he was appointed by Gustavus governor of the town and castle of Rugenwalde Soon after he distinguished himself at the siege of the strong fortress of Colberg, and after the capitulation of that place, he marched to the vicinity of Stettin. In March 1631, with his regiment he encamped at Schwedt, in the province of Brandenburg, and, without any increase of rank, received command of a brigade of four chosen Scottish regiments in the service of the Swedish king, called Hepburn's Scots brigade. The honour of leading the van of the Swedish army was given to this brigade, which, from the colour of the doublets, scarfs, feathers, and standards of its soldiers, was also called the Green brigade. At the siege of Frankfort on the Oder, Sir John was severely wounded above the knee, and, on its surrender, after a terrible slaughter, he joined the force under Marshal Horne, which had blocked up Landsberg, a town on the east bank of the Oder, then held by the Imperialists. On the fall of that place his brigade formed part of the force that invested Berlin, and at Old Brandenburg, 34 miles west of that city, he remained until quite cured of his wound. He was afterwards engaged in numerous sharp skirmishes, outfalls, and other hazardous duties. At the great battle of Leipsic, 7th September 1631, where Tilly's army was almost annihilated, the Scottish troops in the service of Gustavus distinguished themselves beyond all others, and Sir John Hepburn, who, as senior colonel, commanded the reserve, consisting of three brigades, whose advance decided the battle, behaved himself so gallantly that, according to Sir Thomas Urquhart, "unto him, in so far as praise is due to man, was attributed the honour of the day"

At the storming of Marienburg, 5th October following, the Scots brigade were also prominently engaged After beating down the gate of the keep, they were about to advance into the heart of the place, when, to their great indignation, Gustavus ordered them to retire, sending forward some Swedish regiments to perform this service instead Soon after, with 800 musketeers, Sir John was sent to defend Ochsenfurt, a town on the Maine, against the Imperialists, and so prevent their vast force, amounting to 50,000 men, from crossing the river Subsequently he was at the storming of Oppenheim, and at the siege of Ments which followed. The city of Donauworth, the key to Suabia, was taken by the Scots under his command, after a desperate resistance, as was also the castle of Oberndorff, and they succeeded in forcing the small river Lech, leading the van as usual, after a hard contested battle, in which the count de Tilly, generalissimo of the Imperial troops, was mortally wounded Sir John was subsequently employed in Bavaria, and on the fall of Munich he was appointed military governor of that capital, but, when Wallenstein advanced with a formidable army, Gustavus found it expedient to evacuate Bavaria. Both armies met at Nuremberg, in the centre of Germany, where Wallenstein, not finding it advisable to risk a battle, remained in his intrenchments, on which an ineffectual assault was made by the Swedish force At this important crisis a rupture took place between Gustavus and Sir John Hepburn, which led to the retirement of the latter from his service. "Of the exact merits of the dispute," says Mr Grant, "there is no proper account preserved Having had high words, Gustavus in his anger was so imprudent as to upbraid Hepburn with his religion, which was Catholic, and also to remark tauntingly, the extreme richness of his armour and apparel Schiller adds that the colonel was 'offended with the king for having, not long before, preferred a younger officer to some post of danger, and rashly vowed never again to draw a sword in the Swedish quarrel'" With the marquis of Hamilton, Sir James Hamilton of Priestfield, and Sir James Ramsay, who had also quitted the Swedish service, Hepburn arrived in London in the autumn of 1632, and was presented by the marquis to Charles the First, who is said to have knighted him, although it is certain that he had received this honour long previously

Before the close of that year he offered his services to the king of France, and from Louis XIII he received a commission, dated 26th January 1633, constituting him colonel of a regiment composed of various old Scots companies which, for some time, had served independently in the French army On his arrival in France, he obtained the rank of mareschalde-camp He and his regiment formed part of the force which invaded Lorraine, on the French king declaring war against Austria, and at the siege of La Mothe, from March to 28th July, 1634, he and the young Vicomte Turenne, afterwards the celebrated marshal of that name, distinguished themselves so greatly, that to their exertions and gallantry, the surrender of the town was principally attributed. With the main army, Sir John and the force under him, soon after crossed the Rhine, and advanced to the relief of Heidelberg, then defended against the Imperialists by some Swedish troops. After several sharp conflicts, he drove the enemy completely out of the vale of the Neckar, and effectually relieved the beleaguered garrison, on 23d December 1634, taking possession of that city and fortress, with all their cannon The French army having formed a junction with a Swedish force under Duke Bernard of Saxe-Weimar, the remnant of his old brigade was again placed under his command, incorporated into one corps, and styled Le Regiment d'Hebron, as Hepburn was spelled and pronounced in France. In the subsequent campaign in Germany, under the Cardinal de Valette, he also served with great distinction, but the French army were at last compelled to retreat, pursued and continually harassed by the Imperialists, Hepburn with his corps covering the rear, and fighting incessantly all the way back to France In the spring of 1636, he served in Lorraine, with the army under the duke of Saxe-Weimar, and so eminent were his services that King Louis ordered the diploma of a marshal of France to be expedited under the great seal for him Before, however, it could, with his marshal's baton, reach the camp, he was killed at the siege of Saverne, by a ball shot from the ramparts, on 21st June 1636, when he was not more than in his 36th or 38th year He was buried, with great splendour, in the southern transept of the cathedral of Toul in French Lorraine, and many years afterwards, a noble monument to his memory was erected above his remains by Louis XIV In 1793 this monument was demolished by the Revolutionary mob, but in 1858, when the cathedral of Toul was undergoing a renovation, in making some excavations, the coffin of Sir John Hepburn was discovered The coffin, composed of lead, was scrupulously respected, and was again interred It bears the following inscription —"Dom Ossa Joannis Hepvrni Scoti Eqvitis Avrati Exercitvs Galici Campi Mareschalli Qvod Tabernas Sclopeto. Trajectvs Occvbvit vii idvs ivlii. MDCXXXVI. Reqviescat in Pace."

The principal branch of the Waughton family terminated in an heiress, who married Sir Andrew Ramsay, baronet, of Abbotshall, Fife. The representation of the family in the male line then devolved on the Hepburns of Smeaton, Haddingtonshire, descended from Adam Hepburn, who, in 1538, got from his father, Sir Patrick Hepburn of Waughton, half of the lands of Smeaton, and the whole lands of Smeaton Crux. The direct male line of this house terminated in George Hepburn of Smeaton, who died, unmarried, 1st March 1764, and was succeeded in that estate by the eldest son of Elisabeth his sister, George Buchan, younger of Letham, who thereupon assumed the name and arms of Hepburn of Smeaton, and was appointed one of the barons of the court of Exchequer in Scotland in 1801. He was created a baronet of the United Kingdom May 6, 1815, and died June 26, 1819 His son, Sir John, 2d baronet, had 2 sons and a daughter, and died October 8, 1833.

Sir John's elder son, Sir Thomas, 3d baronet, born Sept. 30, 1804, passed advocate in 1827, M P for Haddingtonshire from 1838 to 1847, deputy lieutenant of the county; married in 1835 the daughter of Arch Little, Esq., of Sheldon Park, Surrey, issue, 2 sons and 4 daughters.

The cadets of the family of Smeaton were Robert Hepburn of Alderston, predecessor of Hepburn of Bearford, and Francis Hepburn of Benstoun

The Hepburns of Humbie, East Lothian descend from John Hepburn of Kirklandhill, brother of Sir Patrick Hepburn of Waughton, and uncle of Adam Hepburn of Smeaton His great-grandson, Sir Adam Hepburn of Humbie, was appointed clerk to the committee of Estates elected in June 1640, to oppose Charles I., and accompanied the Scottish army to England in the campaign of that year He was knighted Nov 15, 1641, and appointed a lord of session He was representative in the Estates for the county of Haddington, and Aug 17, 1648, appointed collector-general and treasurer to the army He was a member of the various committees of the Estates, and appears to have been among the most zealous and active of his party In 1650 he attended Charles II at Perth, and in August of the following year he was taken prisoner by Colonel Aldriche and 500 horse at Alyth, and sent to London. He died, according to Nicol, in 1656, but according to Lamont, in 1658, leaving his estate to his daughter

Hepburn of Riccarton, Forfarshire, descended from Hepburn of Whitsome in the Merse, brother of Patrick Hepburn, Lord Hailes, about 1450 The Hepburns of Blackhall are a branch of the Riccarton family See SUPPLEMENT

HEPBURN, JAMES, fourth earl of Bothwell, see article BOTHWELL, vol i, p 357

HEPBURN, JAMES BONAVENTURA, a celebrated linguist, was born at Oldhamstocks, East Lothian, July 14, 1573 His father, Thomas Hepburn, a disciple of John Knox, was rector of that parish James was educated in the Reformed religion, and studied at the university of St Andrews, where he became a convert to Popery. He soon after passed over to France, and from thence proceeded into Italy He then travelled through Turkey, Persia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Ethiopia, and most of the countries of the East He is said to have acquired no less than seventy-two different languages On his return from his eastern travels, he embraced the monastic life, and entered into a convent of Minims in the vicinity of Avignon After residing there for some time he removed to Rome, and retired into the monastery of the Holy Trinity The fame of his acquirements soon reached the ears of Pope Paul

V, by whom he was appointed librarian of the oriental books and manuscripts in the Vatican In this situation he remained for six years. A Hebrew and Chaldaic Dictionary, and an Arabic Grammar, compiled by him, forming one volume quarto, appeared at Rome in 1591 He published also translations from Hebrew manuscripts, and other works, amounting altogether to twenty-nine. About 1620 he went to Venice with an intention of translating some Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldaic writings, and died there in that or the following year

HEPBURN, ROBERT, of Bearford, a miscellaneous writer of great promise, was born about 1690 or 1691 After studying the civil law in Holland, he returned to Scotland in 1711, and, when only twenty-one years of age, he brought out at Edinburgh a weekly periodical, entitled 'The Tatler, by Donald Macstaff of the North,' which was a professed imitation of the English work of that name, and, like it, consisted of a series of essays on literature and manners He appears to have possessed vigorous native powers, and a well cultivated mind, but, from his strong turn for personal satire, his papers seem to have given great offence, and his periodical only reached thirty numbers In 1712 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, soon after which he died Two little treatises which he left behind him were published at Edinburgh, the one 'Demonstratio quod Deus sit,' in 1714, and the other, 'Dissertatio De Scriptis Pitcarnianis,' in 1715 The same year appeared 'A Discourse concerning the Character of a Man of Genius, by Mr Hepburn,' supposed to be the subject of this notice

HERD, DAVID, an ingenious collector of Scottish ballad poetry, was born in the parish of St Cyrus, Kincardineshire, about 1732 It is surmised that he served his apprenticeship to a writer in the country He afterwards went to Edinburgh, where he was many years clerk to an accountant. He was editor of a Collection of Ancient and Modern Scottish Songs, Heroic Ballads, &c, published at Edinburgh, in one volume, in 1769, and in two volumes in 1772 Being extensively conversant with the history and biography of his native country, he occasionally contributed to the periodicals of his time interesting observations on Scottish poetry and antiquities. In the introduction to the 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,' Sir Walter Scott acknowledges himself indebted to Mr Herd, whom he styles "the editor of the first classical collection of Scottish songs and ballads," for the use of his manuscripts, containing upwards of ninety songs and ballads, published and unpublished, to which frequent references are made in the notes to that work He died, unmarried, June 25, 1810, at the advanced age of 78 He had collected a well-stored library of books, which, on being sold after his death, yielded the sum of £255, less twopence He is said to have had a natural son, an officer in the army, to whom was bequeathed the property he had by his industry and frugality accumulated

HERIOT, a surname derived from a legal term, heriot or heriot, being, under the feudal system, a due belonging to a lord at the death of his tenant, consisting of his best beast, either horse ox, or cow In some manors, the best goods, piece of plate, &c., are called heriots The word heriot, in the Saxon, also meant a provider of furniture for the army

The name is old in Scotland According to Buchanan, in the time of Edward Baliol's brief usurpation, William John, and Gilbert Heriot, safely conducted Robert the Steward out of the reach of his enemies, when eagerly sought after by the English The lands of Trabrown in East Lothian were granted by the earl of Douglas to John Heriot about 1423, and they continued in the possession of his descendants till the end of the reign of Charles the First. Of this family was the celebrated George Heriot, founder of Heriot's Hospital, of whom a memoir follows in larger type The lands of Elphinston in East Lothian afterwards came into their possession, and these they called Trabrown The Heriots of Niddrie-Marischal belonged to the same family

HERIOT, GEORGE, founder of a magnificent hospital at Edinburgh, was the son of a goldsmith of high respectability in that city, a descendant, as already stated, of the Heriots of Trabrown He is supposed to have been born in June 1563 Being bred to his father's business, to which in that age was usually added the occupation of a banker, he was, May 28, 1588, admitted a member of the incorporation of goldsmiths At the age of twenty-three he married Christian, daughter of Simon Marjoribanks, a substantial burgess of Edinburgh, with whom he received a portion of 1,075 merks, but who appears to have died a few years after, without children In 1597 he was appointed goldsmith to Queen Anne, consort of James VI, and soon after he was constituted goldsmith and jeweller to the king

On the accession of James to the English throne

Heriot followed the court to London, and, by diligent application to business, he amassed considerable riches. Several of the accounts of jewels furnished by him to the queen are given in Constable's Memoirs of Heriot, published in 1822 He took for his second wife Alison, eldest daughter of James Primrose, clerk to the Scottish privy council, grandfather of the first earl of Rosebery By this lady, who died April 16, 1612, he had no issue. His own death took place at London, February 12, 1624, and on the 20th of that month he was buried at St Martin's in-the-fields. By his will, dated January 20, 1623, he bequeathed the greater part of his wealth to the clergy, magistrates, and town-council of Edinburgh, to found and endow an hospital in that city for the maintenance and education of poor fatherless sons of freemen He also left legacies to all his relations, and to two natural daughters, with remembrances to many of his friends and servants

The magnificent Gothic structure of Heriot's Hospital, from a design by Inigo Jones, was begun July 1, 1628 The building was interrupted by the troubles of the period, but was renewed in 1642, and finally completed in 1650, at a cost of £30,000 sterling It has long formed one of the noblest public ornaments of the city of Edinburgh After the battle of Dunbar, Cromwell took possession of it as a military hospital In 1658 General Monk restored it to the governors, and, April 30, 1659, thirty boys were admitted The number afterwards regularly increased, and in 1854 one hundred and eighty boys were maintained and educated in the Hospital By the will of the donor the governors were directed to purchase lands in the vicinity of Edinburgh for the benefit of the institution, and, from the great rise in the value of such property in that neighbourhood, the revenues have very much increased, particularly within the present century In 1837 the annual income amounted to £14,355, and the expenditure to £11,235 The Governors having procured an act of parliament for the purpose, applied the surplus to the erection of schools in various parts of Edinburgh for the education of children of poor inhabitants of that city, those of burgesses having the preference. Certain statutes for the government of the Hospital were drawn up by Dr Balcanquhal, dean of Rochester There is a statue of the founder in the court of the institution, and a portrait of him in the Governor's room A miniature statue of him by Salter was erected at the south-west corner of the Scott monument, Princes Street, Edinburgh, in April 1854 Subjoined is Heriot's portrait

George Heriot was a great favourite with James the Sixth, who gave him the designation of 'Jingling Geordie,' under which name he figures as a prominent character in Sir Walter Scott's novel of 'The Fortunes of Nigel'

HERIOT, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Haddington, April 22, 1760 His father was the sheriff-clerk of the county of East Lothian He received the rudiments of his education at the schools of Dunse and Coldstream, and in 1772 was sent to the High school of Edinburgh He subsequently became a student at the university of that city In 1778 he proceeded to London, and, having entered the navy, saw a good deal of service on board the Vengeance, 74, and the Elizabeth, which formed one of the fleet under the command of Sir Hyde Parker In the battle of April 16, 1780, between the British and the French fleets, the Elizabeth maintained for a considerable time an unequal combat with two line of battle ships, and had nine men killed and sixteen wounded, among the latter Mr Heriot. He was also in the action of May 19 of the same year In the subsequent July he exchanged into the Brune frigate of 32 guns, in which he continued till she was paid off

Having been promoted to a first lieutenancy, Mr Heriot, towards the end of 1782, embarked on board the Salisbury of 50 guns, and subsequently joined the Alexander, 74, but at the general reduction consequent upon the peace, in 1783, he was placed on the half-pay list To assist his parents he mortgaged his half-pay, a step which was productive of much subsequent embarrassment to him The next few years of his life were passed in a mere struggle for existence He wrote two novels, which produced a small fund, on which he lived for nearly two years He was afterwards employed on 'The Oracle,' at the same time that Sir James Macintosh was retained to translate the French journals for that paper He subsequently joined the 'World,' of which he was for a short time the sole editor

Having, by his writings, recommended himself to one of the secretaries of the treasury, that gentleman proposed to him to undertake the establishment of a daily paper The funds were supplied by two individuals connected with the government, but wholly from their own resources Mr Heriot entered actively into the project, and October 1, 1792, under his management, 'The Sun' evening newspaper appeared, and on January 1, 1793, he started also 'The True Briton' With the assistance of able coadjutors, he continued regularly his arduous task of editing two papers a-day, until 1806, when he retired, on being appointed a commissioner of the Lottery In 1809 he was nominated deputy-paymaster to the forces in the Windward and Leeward Islands On his return to England in 1816 he was appointed comptroller of Chelsea Hospital, in which situation he continued till his death, which happened July 29, 1833 In 1798 he published an Account of the Battle of the Nile, drawn up from the Minutes of an officer of rank in the squadron, which has passed through several editions

The Sorrows of the Heart, a Novel. 1787, 2 vols.
The Half-pay Officer, a Novel. 1788, 3 vols. 8vo.
Historical Sketch of Gibraltar, with an Account of the Siege of the Fortress, by the combined Forces of France and Spain. Lond 1792, 8vo.

HERON, Robert, a voluminous miscellaneous writer, the son of a weaver, was born in the burgh of New Galloway, Kirkcudbright, November 6, 1764 His grandmother, Margaret Murray, was the aunt of the celebrated linguist, Dr Alexander Murray He was educated at home till he was nine years of age, when he was sent to the parish school When very young he became master of the parochial school of Kelton, in which he continued two years In 1780 he entered as a student at the university of Edinburgh, with the view of studying for the church, supporting himself principally by private teaching and by translating for the booksellers, chiefly from French works In 1784 he published 'Letters of Literature,' and in 1789 he edited a small edition of 'Thomson's Seasons,' with a critique on the genius and writings of that eminent poet, which, at a subsequent period, was extended into an elaborate treatise, prefixed to a splendid edition of the same work, published at Perth

In 1790-91 Mr Heron read lectures on law, and on municipal jurisprudence, intended to assist unprofessional persons in what he called "The Understanding of History," but not succeeding, they were soon discontinued He afterwards published a syllabus of the entire course From his imprudent habits and extravagant style of living he contracted a number of debts, which led to his incarceration With the view of obtaining his release, he engaged to write a 'History of Scotland,' in six volumes, for Messrs Morrison of Perth, at the rate of three guineas a sheet, and by the intercession of some of his friends, his creditors agreed to liberate him for fifteen shillings in the pound, to be secured on two-thirds of the copyright The first volume, nearly the whole of which was written in gaol, was published in 1794, and a volume came out every year successively, till the work was completed In 1797 he brought out at Edinburgh an interesting 'Memoir of Robert Burns,' which has been much quoted, and in 1798 'A New and Complete System of Universal Geography,' in 4 vols. Besides these and a variety of other works, a list of which is given below, he contributed a variety of papers to the Edinburgh Magazine and other periodicals. A Comic Drama, in Two Acts, which, he says, he wrote in great haste, called 'St Kilda in Edinburgh, or News from Camperdown,' was produced at the theatre in that city, but summarily condemned for its licentiousness He afterwards published his unlucky play, with an angry preface, in which he imputes the blame of its rejection to the stupidity of the audience It met, however, with no sale Mr Heron was long engaged by Sir John Sinclair in the management of 'The Statistical Account of Scotland,' and executed his task with fidelity and judgment

In 1799 he went to London, where, at first, he found constant occupation, and applied himself to his labours with unremitting industry He wrote a great multiplicity of articles in almost every branch of literature, and his communications appeared in most of the principal magazines and other periodical works of that period He also became editor of different newspapers, including the Globe and British Press, and was for some time employed as a reporter of the debates in parliament Unfortunately, however, his success had but the effect of leading him into his former habits of extravagance When in possession of money he spent his days in idleness and recreation, and only resumed his pen when compelled by hard necessity to provide for his daily subsistence

In his latter years he was reduced, as he himself tells us, "to the very extremity of bodily and pecuniary distress" Being consigned by his creditors to the jail of Newgate, he was induced, February 2, 1807, to make an appeal to the Literary Fund for aid His pathetic petition on the occasion will be found inserted in 'D'Israeli's Calamities of Authors' Reduced by want and sickness to nearly the point of death, he was removed to the Fever Hospital, in St Pancras, where, in the course of a week, he died, April 13, 1807 —His publications are

HERRIES, Baron, a title in the peerage of Scotland, attainted in 1716 in the person of William earl of Nithsdale and Lord Herries, but the attainder reversed as to his descendants by act of parliament in 1848, and the title restored to William Constable Maxwell of Nithsdale, the direct descendant, by decision of the house of lords in 1858. The title was first conferred on Sir Herbert Herries of Terregles in 1489, and was subsequently held by the Maxwells of Nithsdale, through the marriage of Lady Agnes Herries, eldest of three daughters of William Lord Herries, with Sir John Maxwell 2d son of Robert Lord Maxwell, before 1st Feb. 1549–50

The original bearers of this name and title are said to derive their descent from a son of the count of Vendôme in France, whose arms, three hedgehogs (in French herissons), were carried by them Chalmers (Caledonia, vol. i p. 185) states that a branch of the Anglo-Norman family of Heris, who had their chief residence at Wyverton (Worton) in Nottinghamshire, came into Scotland during the reign of David the First (1124—1153). William de Heris witnessed two charters by Earl Henry, son of David I, before 1152, one to the monks of Wederdale, and the other to the abbey and monks of Holmcolteram [Dugdale's Mon. Angl., vol. i. pp. 399 and 886] William de Heris witnessed a charter by William the Lion to the monks of Melrose in the period from 1175 to 1199, also in the same reign he witnessed two charters to the monks of Melrose by Walter the son of Alan the Steward and William the son of John de Ranawe [Liber de Melros, tom. i. pp. 88, 52, and 128], also one of Robert de Brus, the competitor, between 1183 and 1190. Many other persons of the name existed in Scotland and in England in the 12th century [Dugdale's Mon. Chart. of Melrose, &c.]

Nigel de Heriz witnessed two charters granted to the monastery of Melrose by Walter the son of Alan the Steward (domini regis dapifer), in the reign of William the Lion [Lib. de Melros, tom. i. pp. 65 and 71] He is also witness to two charters of lands in the territory of Molle about 1190 [Reg Cart. de Kelso, pp. 128 and 145] He was forester in the southern districts to Alexander II, who directed a precept to him and to the sheriffs of Edinburgh and Traquair, to ascertain the extent and value of the pasture of Lathanhope in Tweeddale. He seems to have had lands on the Ettrick, for in a charter by Alexander II. to the monks of Melrose, the lands granted are described as going up "from the river Etreyich by the rivulet of Timeye, as far as the marches of Nigel de Heriz" [Lib de Melros, p. 285]

Henry de Heris, forestarius regis, is witness to a donation to the monastery of Newbottle by Alexander II William and Gilbert, said to be his sons, are witnesses to a charter to monastery of Newbottle in 1266 [Cart. of Newbottle, p. 300]

Wilham de Heris swore fealty to Edward I for his lands in Dumfries-shire in 1296 as per Ragman Roll

Robert de Herris, in an original charter of Robert the Bruce, is designated dominus de Nithsdale in 1323

Sir John Herice had a charter of the lands of Traveregbs (Terregles) from David II on the resignation of the same by Thomas earl of Mar in 1359 The name is given as Traveregbs in 1215, in an agreement to which the abbot and convent of Kelso were parties [Reg Cart. de Kelso, p 266] The word traver appears in early topography as Traverflat (Trailflat), Travernent (Trauent), Travequer (Traquair), &c. It is not unlikely a short form of ter, land, and aber, beyond (the Latin being mixed with and corrupted by the native tongues), and in the case of Traveregbs may imply the land beyond the church The word Treabher Eglais is Gaelic, and implies the same as Kirkton, and is by some preferred Sir John Herice also in 1368, received a grant of the lands of Kirkgunsane (anciently Kirkwinny), which had belonged to the abbey of Holmcoltram in Cumberland. He was one of the commissioners to negotiate affairs of importance with England in 1361 and 1369

Sir John Herries of Terregles, his son, witnessed a charter of King Robert III in 1393 In 1405 he had a safe conduct to go to England to negotiate some affairs with that court

Sir Herbert Herries of Terregles was one of the barons arrested with Murdoch, duke of Albany, and afterwards sat as one of his jury He accompanied the princess Margaret of Scotland to France in 1436, on her marriage to the dauphin, and is said to have died in 1440 One of his brothers, Sir John Herries, who possessed lands in Annandale, was hanged by the earl of Douglas.

Sir John Herries of Terregles, his son succeeded He had safe conduct going into England in 1451—got charters of lands in Kirkcudbright and Dumfries-shire from 1465 to 1469 He became non compos mentis, and his son, Sir David Herries, afterwards of Terregles, was appointed his curator, but becoming unfit for the duty, his son, Sir Herbert Herries, and John, Lord Carlyle, were, in 1478, appointed in his place.

Sir David Herries of Terregles, as son and heir of Sir John Herries, his father, had sasine in the baronies of Terregles, Kirkgunseon, &c., on 7th December 1484

Sir Herbert Herries of Terregles, his son, succeeded before 1489, in which year he was created a lord, and sat in parliament accordingly He died before 28th June 1505

Andrew, the second Lord Herries, his son, succeeded, and was slain at Flodden, with four of his brethren, on 9th Sept 1513. He had a brother, Roger Herries of Maidenpaup, who survived him, and as nearest agnate was tutor to his children.

Wilham, the third Lord Herries, his only son, succeeded when a minor He died 26th Sept. 1543, leaving three daughters, co-heiresses. The eldest, Agnes Lady Herries, married in 1549 Sir John Maxwell, second son of Robert Lord Maxwell, the second daughter, Katherine Herries, married Sir Alexander Stewart of Garlies, the youngest daughter, Janet Herries, married Sir James Cockburn of Skirling

Sir John Maxwell, called of Terregles after his marriage with Lady Agnes, also the master of Maxwell as heir presumptive of his nephew, John Lord Maxwell, was, on 20th March 1551, appointed warden of the west marches, and was one of the commissioners to treat of peace with the English on 9th Dec. 1552 On 29th Aug. 1553, he temporarily resigned the wardenship, on the ground that he was "becum under deidlie feid wt divris clans of ye samyn (west marches), or at the least ye maist part of yame quhairthrow he was not sa habill to serve as of befor," into the hands of his uncle, James Douglas of Drumlanrig until matters were put right. In Feb 1560 he was one of the ambassadors sent from the lords of the congregation to arrange a treaty with the duke of Norfolk on the part of Queen Elizabeth, and on 23d Sept 1563 he concluded another treaty with the English In right of his marriage with Agnes Lady Herries, he became possessed of one-third of the baronies of Terregles and Kirkgunzeon, and subsequently acquired the two thirds which had belonged to her sisters. On 8th May 1566, King Henry and Queen Mary granted a charter to Sir John Maxwell of Terregles, and Agnes Herries his wife, and their heirs male, whom failing to the heirs male of the said Sir John Maxwell This charter was ratified in parliament on 19th April 1567, when as a favour the holding of the lands was changed from ward and relief to blench Previous to this, and at least as early as 12th March 1566–7 he had taken the title of Lord Herries. Sir James Balfour, Lord Lyon, writing however long after the time states that he was created Lord Herries at the baptism of Prince James, on 17th Dec. 1566 It was inferred from this statement, and other circumstances, that a new peerage was created in the person of Sir John Maxwell, and limited to heirs male. This, however, after a lengthened investigation, the house of lords found not to have been the case (23d June 1858) They found the original peerage created in the person of Sir Herbert Herries in 1489 was to heirs general, and that Agnes Lady Herries, the eldest daughter of William Lord Herries, was a peeress in her own right. She was found to have been often called by herself and others Agnes Lady Herries. There is no instance of her being called Lady Terregles from her husband's title, although her sisters are found to have been called Lady Garlies and Lady Skirling Archibald Herries of Maidenpaup, the heir male, the son of Roger Herries before-mentioned, and grandson of Herbert the first Lord Herries, claimed no right to the title, nor did any of his descendants, although they possessed the paternal property down to 1629, and the Lords Herries, descended from Agnes, Lady Herries, sat in parliament ranking from the original creation of Herbert Lord Herries in 1489, claiming that place, which was awarded to them under the decreet of ranking of 1606 and shown to have been retained by a testificate from the clerk register in the parliament of Jan 1661 John Maxwell, Lord Herries, had therefore been as a favour called to the dignity of Lord Herries in right of his wife, a custom not uncommon at the time, and as representing his wife, was the fourth Lord Herries.

After her marriage with Darnley, Queen Mary was led to suppose that Sir John Maxwell, then warden of the west marches, but not yet styled Lord Herries, had joined the earl of Moray and the other lords against her When, however, she came to Dumfries, causing them to fly before her, she was met by Sir John Maxwell, who made his submission, and convinced her of his fidelity, and there is no reason to think she ever afterwards distrusted him In order publicly to proclaim her confidence, Queen Mary and her husband, on 1st Jan. 1565–6, after an examination by the lords of the secret council into all that was alleged against him, granted him a full pardon and exoneration, declaring that they understood the charges against him "to be perfectly untrue and grounded upon particular malice," and as to some of the charges, "they understood right perfectly the plain contrary; he has been and is our true servant and our good justiciar, and in execution of our service has taken great travails and pains, bearing a weighty charge in the common service of this our realm many years bypast, and execute the laws upon the many and notable offenders, defending our good subjects from such enormities and oppressions as is laid to his charge, nor has received no augmentation of any reversion as is unjustly alleged, nor no gold from England, neither has nor will discover our secrets to them nor others to the hurt of us his sovereign, this our realm nor subjects" [Evidence. Herries Peerage, p 215]

Lord Herries is said to have strongly dissuaded Queen Mary from marrying Bothwell. This however is scarcely reconcilable with the facts that he was on the assize which acquitted Bothwell, that he subscribed the paper recommending him to Mary for a husband, and was one of the witnesses to the marriage contract subscribed by them on 14th May 1567, the day before the marriage took place [Ibid. p 224]

At the battle of Langside, 13th May 1568, Lord Herries and his followers were on the side of Queen Mary, and with their assistance she escaped, and came by Sanquhar to Terregles, whence she went to the abbey of Dundrennan, and embarked for England on 16th May 1568. Previous to her embarkation Lord Herries earnestly implored her not to confide in Elizabeth's generosity Lord Herries was forfeited in the Estates of Scotland, 19th August 1568, but sentence was deferred. In the following month he was one of the commissioners on the part of the unfortunate Mary, to go to England, when he discharged his duty with zeal and ability A speech which he made on her behalf before the English commissioners at York on the 1st December will be found printed in Sadler's State Papers.

In February 1569, the earl of Arran, duke of Chatelherault, who claimed the regency as his right by blood, arrived in Scotland from France, accompanied by Lord Herries and the abbot of Kilwinning, and in virtue of a commission from Queen Mary, constituting him lieutenant-general of the kingdom, began to assemble an army in opposition to the regent Moray A meeting took place at Glasgow between the duke and the regent, when the former agreed to resign his pretensions as lieutenant-general for the queen, and acknowledge King James' authority, the regent, on his part, binding himself to get the forfeiture taken off all those who had supported the queen's interest, their estates to be restored, and to call a convention, to be held at Edinburgh on the 10th April, to settle all differences. For the faithful performance of this treaty, hostages were given, and, in the meantime, the duke, the earl of Cassillis, and Lord Herries, set out for Stirling, on a visit to the young king, and were splendidly entertained by the regent and his friends. On going to Edinburgh, to attend the convention in April, he ordered Lord Herries and the duke of Chatelherault to be arrested, and committed them prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh; but on the assassination of the regent soon after, Kirkcaldy of Grange, the governor of the castle, considering himself no longer justified in detaining them, set them at liberty On their release, Lord Herries and the duke had a meeting with the other chiefs of the queen's party at Niddry-Seton, the result of which was, that they all assembled, with their friends and followers, at Linlithgow, about the middle of April, and marched to Edinburgh, the governor of the castle espousing their cause. But the advance of an English army from the borders having alarmed the inhabitants of the capital, the duke and his friends retired, first to Linlithgow and afterwards to Glasgow, where they dispersed different ways.

In 1571 Lord Herries was again actively engaged in the queen's service, being one of those who attended the parliament held in her name by the lords in her interest, on 12th June of that year, but seeing no prospect of an agreement betwixt the opposing parties, he laboured earnestly at Edinburgh with the regent Mar, Randolph the English ambassador, Sir William Drury, the marshal of Berwick, and others, to bring about a pacification, which was at last effected in February 1572.

On the 15th of March 1578, having now entered into the service and confidence of the king, Lord Herries was sent with Lord Glammis, the chancellor, to the earl of Morton, by King James, then in his twelfth year, to require his resignation of the regency, with the castle of Edinburgh, the palace of Holyroodhouse, and the coin house and jewels therein Two days thereafter, Lord Glammis was slain at Stirling, and Lord Herries was one of the new members of council chosen consequent on that event. Soon after he was one of the commissioners from the council to the General Assembly After the raid of Ruthven in 1582, he was one of the lords, favouring the duke of Lennox, (against whom and Arran, it was directed,) who repaired to that nobleman at Edinburgh, and with the lairds of Kilsyth and Corstorphine, he was sent by him to the king, but all private conference was denied to them They, however, returned with answer from the king that the duke must depart out of Scotland within fourteen days. Upon the Lord's day, the 20th January 1582, according to a notice in Calderwood's History (Appendix, vol. viii p. 282), the Lord Herries died suddenly, in time of the afternoon's preaching, going to an upper chamber in William Fowler's lodging, "to see the boys bicker" He said before dinner, he durst not trust himself to go to the afternoon's preaching, because he found himself weak. Leaning to a wall, he fell down by little and little, saying to the woman that followed, "Hold me, for I am not weale." He had five sons William Lord Herries, his successor; Sir Robert Maxwell of Spottes; Edward Maxwell, commendator of Dundrennan and laird of Lamington, James Maxwell and John Maxwell of Newlaw (the two last were probably illegitimate); and seven daughters.

The elder son, William, fifth Lord Herries, and second of the Maxwell name, by favour of the crown, succeeded to the title of Lord Herries immediately on the death of his father On 26th January 1582, William Lord Herries was made a privy councillor in place of his father In 1587, he was one of the noblemen complained of in parliament by the commissioners of the General Assembly for maintaining papists and idolaters. On the 6th February 1588 a proclamation was made at the market cross of Edinburgh to the effect that Lord Herries, warden of the west marches, had not only been negligent in discharging the duties of that office, but had also erected mass, taken up the houses of sundry of the king's councillors, and driven the ministers from Dumfries; he had been charged to answer to these offences, but had disobeyed. The lieges were therefore commanded to repair to Edinburgh on the 5th of March, to accompany his majesty in person to the west borders. On the 16th February the Lords Hamilton, Herries, Huntly, and other nobles of that party, assembled with their forces at Linlithgow, but that same night first Huntly, and then Lord Herries, came to Holyroodhouse and had a conference with the king. In the following year, when James departed for Norway, and governors were appointed to rule the kingdom in his absence, Hamilton was named for the west, to remain at Dumfries, and to take the advice of Herries and other lords of that district. In the end of October 1595, he and several of the surname of Maxwell, and their retainers, to the number of about 400 men, came out of Dumfries to seek some of the Johnstones, with whom they were at deadly feud, at Lockerbie. In the conflict that ensued about twenty of the Maxwells were slain, the laird of Newark deadly hurt, and several other gentlemen wounded, besides many taken prisoners by the Johnstones. On 26th Nov 1601, William Lord Herries, John, master of Herries, and others, were denounced for contravening the acts of parliament "against saying and hearing mass and entertaining priests," and appeared before the privy council on 24th December following. In 1602, among the ministers appointed by the General Assembly to wait upon the Popish lords, we find "for the Lord Herries, Mr Robert Wallace," and in 1606, among the noblemen suspected of popery ordained by the assembly to be confined in certain towns the earl of Home and Lord Herries are mentioned for Edinburgh He died in 1603 He had five sons and four daughters

The eldest son, John, sixth Lord Herries, died in 1631 By his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of John, 7th Lord Maxwell, he had eight sons, John, seventh Lord Herries, James Maxwell of Brakenside, William, Alexander, Robert, Frederick, Edward, and Michael, and a daughter

John, seventh Lord Herries, joined the marquis of Montrose when he took up arms for Charles the First, for which he was excommunicated by the General Assembly, 26th April 1644 He was one of those proposed to be excepted from pardon by the articles of Westminster in July 1646, which Charles refused to ratify In 1667 he succeeded to the titles of earl of Nithsdale and Lord Maxwell (see NITHSDALE, earl of). Died in 1677 He had Robert, his successor, and John and William

Robert, 4th earl of Nithsdale, and 8th Lord Herries died in 1696 He had an only son, William, his successor, and a daughter, Mary, married to Charles, earl of Traquair

William, fifth earl of Nithsdale and ninth Lord Herries, took part in the insurrection of 1715 Tried by the house of peers on 19th January 1716, and found guilty of high treason, he had sentence of death pronounced against him, but escaped from the Tower by the contrivance of his countess, and died 20th March 1744 His only son, William Maxwell of Nithsdale, usually called earl of Nithsdale, succeeded on his father's decease to the fee of the estates of Nithsdale and Terregles, which had been disponed to him in 1712 He married Catherine, daughter of Charles, earl of Traquair, and died in Aug 1776 He had only two daughters 1 Mary, who died in infancy, and 2 Winifred Maxwell, who succeeded

Lady Winifred Maxwell, as she was always called married William Haggerston Constable of Everingham, Yorkshire 2d son of Sir Carnaby Haggerston, of Haggerston, Northumberland and had Marmaduke Constable Maxwell, two other sons, and two daughters. She died July 1801

Marmaduke Constable Maxwell of Nithsdale and Everingham married Teresa Apolonia Wakeman of Beckford, Gloucestershire, and had 1 William Constable Maxwell, 2 Marmaduke C Maxwell, 3 Peter C Maxwell, 4 Henry C Maxwell, 5 Joseph C Maxwell, and two daughters. On 16th May 1814, he executed a deed of entail by which he disponed the Nithsdale estates, or those which had belonged to the family of Maxwell, to his eldest son, William Constable Maxwell, now Lord Herries, and the Terregles estate, which had belonged to the Herries family, to his second son, now the Hon Marmaduke Constable Maxwell. He died in 1819

William Constable Maxwell, now Lord Herries, succeeded to the estates of Nithsdale and Everingham on his father's death in 1819 He petitioned for a reversal of the attainder, and the title of Lord Herries, as the lineal descendant and heir of Herbert, first Lord Herries. An act of parliament being passed in 1848, reversing the attainder as regards the descendants of William earl of Nithsdale, forfeited in 1716, he claimed the title of Lord Herries, which was decided in his favour, June 23, 1858, by the house of lords, William Maxwell of Carruchan, the heir male, having opposed. He may, therefore, but for the attainder, be considered the 18th Lord Herries. He married Marcia, daughter of Hon Sir Edward M Vavasour, Bart., of Hazlewood, Yorkshire, with issue Hon Marmaduke, master of Herries, 6 other sons, and 8 daughters

HEUGH, HUGH, D D, an eminent divine of the United Presbyterian Church, son of Rev John Heugh, minister of the General Associate congregation, Stirling, was born in that town on 12th August, 1782 His paternal grandfather was minister of the parish of Kingoldrum, Forfarshire His great-grandfather was also a minister He was the youngest except one of ten children Educated at the grammar school of his native town, in his 15th year he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, where he studied logic and moral philosophy, while his theological studies were conducted at Whitburn under the superintendence of Professor Bruce On 22d February 1804, he was licensed to preach by the General Associate presbytery of Stirling, when he was only 22 years of age Soon after he received calls from Greenloaning, Hawick, and Stirling, the last to be colleague to his father The ecclesiastical court, which then decided on competing calls, gave the preference to Stirling, and he was ordained on 14th August 1806

His ministry was very successful, being a working as well as a preaching minister "With more than the ordinary vivacity of youth," says Dr Brown, in his Funeral Sermon, "he had much of the sagacity of age, and so conducted himself, both in public and private life, that no man could despise his youth He was a diligent student, and a faithful laborious minister The congregation in every sense of the word, flourished under him, and his ministry was fruitful as well as acceptable" He remained 15 years in Stirling, and long before the close of his pastorate there, had established for himself a high standing in the denomination to which he belonged. After the union of the two sections of the Secession church, the Regent Place congregation, Glasgow, gave him a unanimous call in July 1821, being the third that they had sent to him within two years Another call was presented to him at the same time from Nicolson Street congregation, Edinburgh The Synod decided in favour of Glasgow, and his induction to his new charge took place on 9th October 1821

From the outset of his residence in that city, he ranked high as a preacher, and in 1831, the college of Jefferson, Pennsylvania, conferred upon him the degree of D D He took a prominent part in the management of all matters connected with the Secession church, and in the discussion of the various public questions of the day On account of his health, he spent the summer of 1834 in Geneva, and after his return, a colleague to him was chosen by his congregation Dr Heugh died 10th June 1846, in his 64th year His Life, with a Selection from his Discourses, by his son-in-law, Hamilton M. MacGill, minister of the United Presbyterian Church, Glasgow, and a portrait, was published in 1850, in 2 large volumes 8vo —Dr Heugh was the author of

HISLOP, JAMES, a minor poet, the son of persons in humble life, parish of Kirkconnell, Dumfries-shire, was born in 1798 When a boy he was sent to herd sheep and cattle at the farm of Dalblair, in a neighbouring parish He next became a shepherd boy at the farm of Boghead, parish of Anchinleck, Ayrshire, and some years afterwards removed to Corsebank, and subsequently to Carcoe, near Sanquhar He now obtained private instructions in grammar and Latin, to which he added French and mathematics. After trying an evening school, he removed, towards the end of 1819, to Greenock, and opened a school in that town But not succeeding, he returned to Carcoe, where he devoted himself to the study of French and Italian literature His 'Cameronian

Dream' first appeared in the Edinburgh Magazine for February 1821 Several others of his poems were published in the same periodical He was now induced to open a school in Edinburgh, but soon after was appointed schoolmaster in the Doris frigate Three years after, he visited his relations at Carcoe, where he resumed his contributions to the Edinburgh Magazine, in a series of 'Letters from South America' In 1825 he proceeded to London, and was engaged, for a short period as a reporter for one of the London newspapers

In 1826 he was appointed head master of an academy in the neighbourhood of London, and in the following year he joined, as schoolmaster, the Tweed man-of-war, ordered to the Mediterranean, and afterwards to the Cape of Good Hope Among the numerous poems which he composed at sea at this time, that entitled 'The Scottish Sacramental Sabbath,' after the manner of Burns' 'Cottar's Saturday Night,' is perhaps the best While the Tweed was cruising off the Cape de Verd islands, with one of the officers, the whole of the midshipmen, and the surgeon of the ship, he went to visit the island of St Jago With the exception of the officer, who swam back to the ship, they all slept on shore in the open air, and were, in consequence, all seized with fever, which, in the case of six of them, including the surgeon and four midshipmen proved fatal After lingering for twelve days, Hislop died 4th December 1827, in his 29th year

HOG, Sir Roger, Lord Harcarse, described by Laing as "a learned and upright judge," the son of William Hog of Bogend, advocate, was born in Berwickshire about 1635 He was admitted advocate on 25th June 1661, and in November 1677 was appointed a lord of session, when he was knighted by Charles the Second On 18th November 1678 he succeeded Sir John Lockhart of Castlehill as one of the lords in the justiciary court At this period he represented the county of Berwick in the Scottish parliament In 1688 he was removed from the bench by James the Seventh, for his non-compliance with the wishes of government, in a cause regarding the tutors of the young marquis of Montrose In 1689 Mr Robert Pitilloch, advocate, published a pamphlet against Lord Harcarse, entitled 'Oppression under Colour of Law,' for improper judicial interference in favour of his son-in-law, Aytoun of Inchdairnie This curious production was reprinted by Mr Maidment, advocate, in 1827 His lordship spent his latter years in retirement, and died in 1700, leaving a Dictionary of Decisions from 1681 to 1692, which was published in 1757

HOGG, William, an ingenious translator into Latin of English poems, lived in the seventeenth century, and was a native of Gowrie, in Perthshire To better his condition he went to London, but being disappointed in his views, he was reduced to great distress Dr Birch states that he died of want in the streets In 1690 he published at London 'Paraphrasis Poetica in tria Johannis Miltonis viri clarissimi Poemata, viz Paradisum Amissum, Paradisum Recuperatum, et Samsonum Agonistem,' an edition of which was printed at Rotterdam in 1699 Of this version of Milton the notorious Lauder made considerable use in his dishonest attempt against the reputation of that great poet The other principal translations of Hogg are, 'Liber Primus Principis Arcturi,' (a Rich Blackmore, Esq Aur) Latine red 1706, 'Paraphrasis in Jobum Poetica,' 1682, 'Satyra Sacra, sive Paraphrasis in Ecclesiasten Poetica' Part of his sacred poetry is reprinted in the 'Poetarum Scotorum Musæ Sacræ'

HOGG, James, the Ettrick Shepherd, one of the most remarkable of Scotland's self-taught poets, was born in a cottage on the banks of the Ettrick, Selkirkshire, January 25, 1772, the anniversary of the natal day of Burns His progenitors were all shepherds, an occupation which his father, like himself, followed for many years He received but a scanty education, and spent only about half a year at school At seven years of age he was sent to herd cows, and his boyhood was devoted to keeping sheep upon the hills Among the first books that he read were 'The Life of Wallace,' and 'The Gentle Shepherd,' which he was disappointed were not written in prose instead of verse He also read Bishop Burnet's 'Theory of the Conflagration of the Earth,' which he states nearly "overturned his brain" His first attempts at versification were made in the spring of 1796, and his first published song was 'My name it is Donald M'Donald,' composed, in 1800, on the threatened invasion of Bonaparte, which soon became very popular In 1801, when attending the sheep market at Edinburgh, he ventured to publish a small volume of poems, which, however, was soon consigned to oblivion The attention of Sir Walter, then Mr Scott, being drawn to the poetical talent of Mr Hogg, by his advice he published, in 1807, a volume of ballads, under the title of the 'Mountain Bard' These compositions, emanating from a rough untutored mind, bore many latent indications of that high poetical imagination which afterwards shone out so brightly in 'Kilmeny,' and the work being successful, with its profits and a premium which he gained from the Highland Society for an 'Essay on Sheep,' published the same year, he was tempted to embark in an agricultural speculation, which unfortunately proved a failure

Disappointed in his views, he now determined upon settling in Edinburgh, and following the precarious calling of an author Accordingly, he arrived in that city in February 1810, and the same year he published a volume of songs, called 'The Forest Minstrel,' from which, however, he derived no pecuniary benefit At this period, when poverty was pressing hard upon him, he found kind and steady friends in Messrs Grieve and Scott, hatters, whose well-timed benevolence, we are told, supplied all his wants His next adventure was a literary publication called 'The Spy,' chiefly devoted to moral essays, tales, poetry, and sketches of life But Hogg at this time knew nothing of men and manners, and very little of contemporaneous literature, and his periodical did not outlive the year of its birth.

In the spring of 1813 he produced his 'Queen's Wake,' a legendary poem, which consists mainly of a series of metrical tales written in imitation of the old Scottish ballads, and connected and diversified by a fiction of considerable ingenuity, in which the bards and minstrels of Scotland are represented as contending for prizes before Mary Queen of Scots and her court at Holyrood Overlooking a few defects of style, the 'Queen's Wake' is undoubtedly one of the finest poems in the language, and by far the best and most imaginative piece in the volume is the beautiful episodical tale of 'Kilmeny,' which for sweetness and simplicity cannot be excelled. In the course of a short time the 'Queen's Wake' went through several editions, and at once secured for the author a degree of popularity and fame that has seldom fallen to the lot of a modern writer His portrait is subjoined.

In 1815 Mr Hogg published 'The Pilgrims of the Sun,' a poem of unequal merit, although in some passages worthy of his now established reputation In 1816 appeared 'Mador of the Moor,' in the Spenserian stanza, which is greatly inferior to its predecessor The Shepherd next applied himself to collect original pieces from the principal living poets of Great Britain, but the refusal of Sir Walter Scott to assist him in the project, with other untoward circumstances, caused him to change his plan, and write imitations of the whole himself The 'Poetic Mirror,' published anonymously, was the result of this bold attempt It comprised many pieces of great excellence, and soon passed into a second edition It was followed by 'Dramatic Tales,' in two volumes, a work which, with the exception of 'The Hunting of Badlewe,' a tragedy previously printed separately, contains little surpassing the ordinary standard In 1818 he published 'The Brownie of Bodsbeck, and other Tales in Prose,' 2 vols.

In 1819 he brought out the first volume of the 'Jacobite Relics,' the second volume of which appeared in 1821. In 1820 'Winter Evening Tales, collected among the Cottagers in the South of Scotland,' made their appearance This work was one of his most successful publications In 1822, when George IV visited Scotland, Hogg welcomed his sovereign in 'The Royal Jubilee, a Scottish Masque,' which took no permanent hold of public attention

In 1814 the Shepherd had received, at a nominal rent, from the duke of Buccleuch, the small farm of Altrive Lake, in the wilds of Yarrow, which continued to be his residence till his death After his marriage, in 1820, he determined once more to farm on a large scale, and accordingly took a lease for nine years of the adjoining farm of Mount Benger Having lost about £2,000 by his agricultural speculations, to raise money, he wrote, in a few months, two extravagant Border romances, each in three volumes, the one entitled 'The Three Perils of Man,' for which he received £150, and the other 'The Three Perils of Woman,' which produced the same sum In 1824 he published anonymously a book abounding in horrors, called 'Confessions of a Fanatic,' which had a tolerable sale, though he reaped no benefit from it In 1825 he gave to the world 'Queen Hynd,' an epic poem, by no means one of his happiest efforts About this time he wrote, for Blackwood's Magazine, a series of interesting prose sketches under the title of 'The Shepherd's Calendar,' published separately in two volumes in 1829

In 1832, in which year appeared his 'Queer Book,' Mr Hogg visited London, and during his short sojourn in the metropolis, he was "the observed of all observers," and was honoured with a public dinner In 1834 he produced a volume of 'Lay Sermons,' and shortly after 'Domestic Manners of Sir Walter Scott' In the following year, during the short period that the conservatives were in power, Sir Robert Peel transmitted to him £100 as an earnest of an annual pension to that amount, which he did not live to enjoy His constitution had been long sinking under the united effects of pecuniary embarrassments and intense literary labour, and he died at Altrive Lake, November 21, 1835 He had married, in 1820, Margaret, youngest daughter of Mr Philips of Longbridgemoor, Annandale, who, with five children, survived him In 1854, his widow received a pension from government of £50, in consideration of her husband's services to literature

Hogg was fond of all athletic exercises and field sports, and was long made to figure conspicuously in the 'Noctes Ambrosianæ' of Blackwood's Magazine, which gave his name a celebrity beyond that acquired by his own writings He wrote two interesting autobiographies of himself, which will be found published with his works

HOLYBUSH, JOHN, the principal mathematician of his time, better known as Johannes de Sacrobosco, or Sacrobusto, called also Holywood and Hallifax, flourished in the thirteenth or fourteenth century The place of his birth is a subject of dispute Leland, Bale, and Camden, contend that he was a native of Halifax in Yorkshire, while Stainhurst asserts that his native place was Holywood, near Dublin On the other hand, Dempster maintains that he was born in Scotland, and derived his name from the monastery of Holywood in Nithsdale Mackenzie states that after residing a few years in that monastery, as a canon regular of the order of St Augustin, he went to Paris, and was admitted a member of the university there, June 5, 1221, under the syndics of the Scottish nation According to Sibbald, he was for some time a fellow-student of the monks of Dryburgh, and afterwards studied philosophy and mathematics in the university of Oxford He was appointed the first professor of mathematics in the university of Paris Mackenzie affirms that he died in 1256, but Bulæus fixes the date of his death in 1340 —His works are HOLYROODHOUSE, LORD, a title in the Scottish peerage, now extinct. See BOTHWELL, vol. i. p. 363.

HOME, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, dating from 1605, possessed by the distinguished family of Home, descended from the ancient and potent earls of Dunbar and March (see page 74), originally sprung from the Saxon kings of England and the princes or earls of Northumberland. Patrick second son of Cospatrick, third earl, had a son, William, who, in the early part of the 13th century, took for his second wife his cousin Ada, daughter of Patrick fifth earl of Dunbar and March, and widow of a gentleman named De Courtenay, on her marriage with whom she had obtained from her father, "in liberum maritagium," the lands of Home in the west of Berwickshire. These lands her second husband became possessed of in her right, and in consequence assumed the name of Home. He also carried the armorial bearings of the earls of Dunbar, being a white lion in a red field, with a green field for difference, as relative to his estate of Greenlaw, which with other lands in Berwickshire had been bestowed on his father by his grandfather, Earl Cospatrick. This William de Home made a grant of various lands to the monastery of Coldstream He died in 1266.

His son, William de Home, in many authentic writings styled lord of Home, confirmed in 1268, a grant made by his mother, Ada, to the monastery of Kelso, prior to the year 1240 He had a son, Galfridus or Geoffrey de Home, who was one of the barons who found it expedient to swear allegiance to Edward I in 1296. The son of this Geoffrey, Roger de Home, had a son, Sir John de Home, a gallant border chieftain, who, from his successful forays across the border, always fighting in a white jacket, acquired from the English the nickname of "Willie with the white doublet."

His son, Sir Thomas de Home, in the reign of Robert the Third married Nicholas Pepdie, heiress of Dunglass, and got with her the lands of that name in Berwickshire. He had three sons, Sir Alexander, who carried on the principal line, David, the first of the family of Wedderburn, ancestor of the earls of Marchmont (see MARCHMONT, earl of), and Patrick Home of Rathburn He had also two daughters

Hitherto this warlike family acknowledged as their feudal lords the earls of March, whose vassals they were. When, however, George earl of March sided with the English against his countrymen, they abandoned his banner, and rallied round the standard of the Douglases. Sir Alexander Home, of Home and Dunglass, fought at the head of his clan at the battle of Homildon, 5th May 1402 against Henry Percy and their former chieftain, George earl of March, but was taken prisoner On obtaining his liberty he accompanied the earl of Douglas to France, and was slain with him at the battle of Verneuil in 1424 He married Jean, daughter of William Hay of Locharret, ancestor of the marquis of Tweeddale, and had three sons, namely, Sir Alexander, his heir, Thomas, ancestor of the Homes of Tyninghame, the Homes of Ninewells, of which family was David Hume the historian, and other families of the name; and George, progenitor of the Homes of Spott.

On the forfeiture of the earldom of March in January 1435, the family of Home ceased to be vassals, and became manorial tenants under the crown. As they had risen on the fall of their chiefs, they were often appointed conservators of the peace with England. In 1449, Sir Alexander Home, the eldest son above mentioned, was one of the guarantees of a treaty with England, and warden of the marches. He died in 1456.

The eldest of his five sons, Sir Alexander Home, was, in 1459, one of the ambassadors extraordinary to treat with the English On 2d August 1465 he was appointed by the prior and chapter of Coldingham, to the office of bailie of the lands belonging to the convent, an office which had been held both by his uncle and his father, but which, in his case, was made hereditary The same year he sat in the Estates among the barons. He was created a lord of parliament, by the title of Lord Home, 2d August, 1473, and from 1476 to 1485, he was employed in various negotiations with the English Using with stringent vigour his power as bailie of Coldingham to make the property of the convent his own, when James III., in 1484, obtained the Pope's consent to annex the revenues of the priory to the chapel royal at Stirling, he resented this attempt to wrest them from himself by joining, with all his strength, the party of disaffected nobles who had conspired against him, and took an active part in the rebellion that ended in the death of that unfortunate monarch Lord Home died betwixt 14th May and 16th June 1491 He married first, Mariota, daughter and heiress of Landales of Landales in Berwickshire, and, secondly, Margaret, daughter of Alexander, master of Montgomery By the former he had, with a daughter, three sons, namely, Alexander, George, ancestor of the Homes of Ayton, and Patrick ancestor of the Homes of Fastcastle. By his second wife he had a son, Thomas Home of Lumsdaw, Ayrshire. Alexander, the eldest son, predeceased his father before 1468, leaving two sons, namely, Alexander, second Lord Home, and John of Whiterigs and Fraltain, ancestor of the present earl and of the Homes of Bassenden and a daughter, Elizabeth.

Alexander, second Lord Home, is frequently mentioned in the public records after his grandfather was created Lord Home, under the designation of Alexander Home of that ilk. In May 1488, he was one of the ambassadors sent to England by the disaffected nobles, and immediately after the assassination of James III. in the following month, he got the office of steward of Dunbar, and obtained a joint share of the administration of the Lothians and Berwickshire, during the minority of James IV He was sworn a privy councillor, and constituted great chamberlain of Scotland for life, 7th October 1488. He was served heir to his grandfather in 1492 He had been appointed warden of the east marches for seven years, 25th August, 1489, and at the same time he was nominated captain of the castle of Stirling and governor of the young king. He had committed to him the tuition of the king's brother, John, earl of Mar, 10th January 1490 On the 12th of the same month he had a charter of the office of the bailiary of Ettrick forest, and on 28th April 1491, he was appointed by the Estates to collect the king's rents and dues within the earldom of March and barony of Dunbar He also obtained various lands in the constabulary of Haddington In 1493, in accordance with the superstitious feeling of the age, he made a pilgrimage to Canterbury, for which he got a safe-conduct to pass through England, from Henry VII From 1495 to 1504 he was employed in several negotiations with the English.

In 1497, when James IV invaded England in support of the pretensions of Perkin Warbeck, the Homes formed part of his army on the occasion After devastating the counties of Northumberland and Durham, James, on learning that a superior force, under the earl of Surrey, was marching against him, slowly retreated into Berwickshire, closely pursued b

Surrey, who, in retaliation of his ravages south of the Tweed, overthrew Ayton castle and several other of the strongholds of the Homes, as well as various places belonging to other families in the Merse. Ford, in his dramatic Chronicle of 'Perkin Warbeck,' makes Surrey thus taunt the Scots for allowing these places to be demolished:

> ——————— "Can they
> Look on the strength of Cundrestine defac't,
> The glory of Heydon-hall devasted, that
> Of Edinton cast downe; the pile of Fulden
> Overthrowne, and this the strongest of their forts,
> Old Ayton castle, yielded and demolished,
> And yet not peepe abroad?"

And in Marmion, Sir Walter Scott makes his hero say,

> "I have not ridden in Scotland since
> James backed the cause of that mock prince > Warbeck, the Flemish counterfeit
> Who on the gibbet paid the cheat,
> Then did I march with Surrey's power,
> What time we razed old Ayton tower"

The second Lord Home died in 1506 He had, by his wife Nicolas Ker of Samuelston, a daughter and seven sons. Of these, Alexander, the eldest, was third Lord Home, and George, the second, was fourth lord; David, the third son, was prior of Coldingham, and William, the second youngest son, was arrested and tried with his elder brother, and executed at Edinburgh, 9th October 1516 The rest died without issue.

Alexander, third Lord Home, succeeded to the great power and vast estates of his family, and in 1507 was appointed to the office of lord chamberlain In 1513, in the midst of King James' preparations for a war with England, Lord Home, as warden of the eastern marches at the head of 8,000 men crossed the border, and after laying waste the country, carried off a large booty of cattle and other property, but was surprised and defeated, with great slaughter, at a pass called the Broomhouse, by Sir William Bulmer Five hundred of the borderers were slain upon the spot, and their leader compelled to flee for his life, leaving his banner on the field, and his brother, Sir George Home, and 400 men, prisoners in the hands of the English Incensed at this defeat, James levied one of the finest armies which Scotland ever sent forth, at the head of which he invaded England The disastrous battle of Flodden was the result. Jointly with the earl of Huntly, Lord Home led the vaward or advance of the Scots army, and commenced the battle by a furious charge on the English right wing under Sir Edmund Howard, which, after some resistance, was thrown into confusion, and totally routed. Although he himself escaped the carnage of that dreadful day, a considerable number of his clan were slain, with Cuthbert Home, the lord of Fastcastle, the baron of Blackadder, David Home of Wedderburn, and his son George. Lord Home has been blamed by some historians, and even accused of cowardice and treachery, for not hastening to the relief of his sovereign when he saw him contending with his nobles against the superior force of the earl of Surrey, and in the utmost danger, but he seems to have been the only leader on the Scots side that acted the part of a prudent general in that fatal battle, and the reserve of the English cavalry rendered it impossible for him to go to the aid of the king, to whose impetuosity of temper and chivalrous valour, as well as to the mistimed and precipitate courage of the main body of the Scots, may be attributed his defeat and death The subsequent inroads of the English across the border were retaliated by Lord Home with equal promptitude and destructiveness.

In March 1514, six months after the battle, he was declared one of the standing councillors of the queen-mother, who had been appointed regent, and constituted chief justice of all the territories lying south of the Forth. In 1515, when the regency was withdrawn from Queen Margaret and conferred upon the duke of Albany, Lord Home (erroneously styled an earl by Tytler, in several instances, see History of Scotland, vol. v pp. 76, 108, and 112) joined the party of the queen-mother, and plotted with her and her husband the earl of Angus, with whom he had previously been at deadly feud, to deliver the young king and his infant brother to their uncle the king of England. This intrigue was defeated by the vigilance of the new regent, and on the royal children being demanded from the queen-mother by the authority of the Estates, she named Lord Home as one of the four barons to whom she proposed that the charge of them should be committed. This being deemed an evasion, Albany, among other measures, commanded Home, who was then provost of Edinburgh, to arrest Sir George Douglas, Angus' brother, which he indignantly refused to do, and under cover of night, fled to Newark, a border tower on the Yarrow In a private conference with Lord Dacre, the English agent, he now concerted measures of resistance to Albany's authority, and requested the assistance of an English army Assembling a powerful force, he commenced hostilities by retaking the castle of Home, which had been seized by the regent, and securing the strong tower of Blacater, on the borders, within five miles of Berwick To this stronghold, at the head of an escort of forty soldiers, he conveyed the queen-mother, in consequence of which Albany, at the head of a large force, marched into Berwickshire, and after razing Lord Home's fortlet of Fastcastle, and capturing the castle of Home, he overran and ravaged his estates. Lord Home afterwards made predatory incursions into Scotland, and Albany, having caused the French ambassador to offer him an amnesty and pardon, with the request of a conference, he agreed to meet the regent at Dunglass, where he was instantly arrested, and committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, then under the charge of the earl of Arran He had the address, however, to prevail on Arran, who was his brother-in-law, to let him escape, and to accompany him in his flight to England, whither he was soon after followed by the queen and Angus.

In March 1516, he made his peace with Albany, and was restored to his possessions, but renewing his intrigues with England, and encouraging disorders on the border, Albany resolved to make an example of him as soon as he got him within his power Inveigled by the regent's promises, Home and his brother William imprudently visited the court at Holyrood palace in September 1516, when they were arrested, tried for treason, and convicted Lord Home was executed on the 8th and his brother on the 9th October, and their heads placed on the tolbooth or public prison of Edinburgh, where they remained till 1521, when their kinsman, Home of Wedderburn, had them taken down, and buried with funeral honours in the Greyfriars churchyard Lord Home's title and estates were forfeited to the crown Soon after, another brother, David Home, prior of Coldingham, was assassinated by the Hepburns. For Albany's treachery towards his chief, Home of Wedderburn took fearful revenge Pretending to besiege the tower of Langton in the Merse, he drew Antony Darcy, styled the Sieur de la Bastid, whom Albany had made his lieutenant and warden of the marches, into an ambuscade, and put him to death under circumstances of savage ferocity, on 9th September 1517

Lord Home, having only daughters, was succeeded by his brother George, fourth Lord Home, who had at first taken refuge in England, but by means of his kinsman, Home of Wedderburn, was brought back to his own castle of Home, and put in possession of the family estates. He had charters of several lands forfeited by his brother in 1517, and was restored to the title, and to such of the estates as were held by the crown, 12th August 1522. Conciliated by the clemency manifested to their chief, the Homes deserted Angus, whose cause they had hitherto supported, and taking part with the regent, exerted their influence towards ejecting Prior Douglas from the monastery of Coldingham, in which, however, they were never successful.

In 1524, when Albany finally left Scotland, Angus usurped the regency, and for his hostility towards himself and his kinsman, Prior Douglas, summoned Lord Home to answer a charge of treason before the Estates, by whom, however, he was acquitted It would appear that he fought on Angus' side, in 1526, when an unsuccessful attempt was made by Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch to rescue the young king from his hands, on his return from the borders to Edinburgh In 1528, after James had made his escape from the Douglases, he assisted the earl of Argyle in expelling Angus from the priory of Coldingham, and driving him across the borders. In the arrests that subsequently took place, Home was one of the border chiefs who were imprisoned for not enforcing the laws against thieves and marauders on the borders. In 1542 he did good service, first, by jointly with the earl of Huntly and at the head of four hundred spears, repulsing at Haddenrig an incursion of the English under Sir Robert Bowes and the exiled earl of Angus, and, next, by opposing and harassing, with Huntly and Seton, the more formidable army which, in the subsequent October, invaded Scotland under the duke of Norfolk In the following year he joined the party of Cardinal Bethune, and with Bothwell and Scott of Buccleuch mustered his feudal array upon the borders against the English alliance In a skirmish with the English at Fansside, the day preceding the battle of Pinkie, 9th September 1547, he was thrown from his horse and severely injured He was carried to Edinburgh, where he died His son and heir being at the same time taken prisoner, Home castle, after a stout resistance by Lady Home (Mariota, second daughter and coheiress of the sixth Lord Halyburton of Dirleton) fell into the hands of the protector Somerset, on the 22d of the same month, and was garrisoned by a detachment of his troops. Lord Home had two sons and a daughter

Alexander, fifth Lord Home, the elder son, distinguished himself in the campaigns against the English of 1548 and 1549, and retaking his family castle by stratagem, he put the garrison to the sword He had a charter of the office of bailie of Coldstream, 31st December 1551 He had also the appointment of warden of the east marches, and was one of the Scots commissioners who negotiated the treaty of Upsettlington, 31st May 1559 He supported the Reformation, and sat in the parliament which abolished popery in 1560 In 1565 he attached himself to the party of Mary and Darnley, and in 1566 that unfortunate princess, with a splendid retinue, visited the castles of Home, Wedderburn, and Langton At this time Randolph, the English ambassador, wrote that it was expected that Lord Home would be created earl of March He was one of the nobles who signed the bond in favour of Mary's marriage to Bothwell, but in 1567 he joined the association in favour of the young king, James VI, and in June of that year he was one of those who signed the order for imprisoning Mary in Lochleven castle. After the queen's escape, he led 600 of the border spearmen against her to the battle of Langside, where, though wounded in the face and leg, he is said to have decided the fortune of the field In 1569 he deserted the party of the regent and joined the queen's friends, and on 16th June, 1571, he was taken prisoner in a skirmish with the earl of Morton in the suburbs of Edinburgh. He assisted Kirkaldy of Grange and Maitland of Lethington in holding out the castle of Edinburgh, which, however, surrendered in May 1573, and on 27th October following, he was tried in parliament and convicted of treason, but was pardoned and restored to his estates. He died 11th August, 1575 Melvil says, "He was so true a Scotsman that he was unwinnable to England, to do any thing prejudicial to his country"

His son Alexander, sixth Lord Home, stood high in the favour of King James VI., and in 1589, when that monarch sailed to Denmark to marry the princess Anne, he was named among those nobles to whom the conservation of the public peace was confided. He was very instrumental in suppressing the insurrection of Francis earl of Bothwell in 1592, for which service he had a grant of the dissolved priory of Coldingham In 1599, being a Roman Catholic, he was sent by the king on a suspicious embassy to the papal court. In 1603, when James VI departed for England, he staid a night on his way at Lord Home's castle of Dunglass, and was accompanied by his lordship to London He was sworn a privy councillor, and was there naturalised. On 4th March 1605 he was created earl of Home and Lord Dunglass, the patent being to him and his heirs male whatsoever He died 5th April 1619

His only son, James, second earl of Home, was twice married, but died without issue, in February 1633 He had two sisters, Margaret, married to Lord Doune, afterwards fifth earl of Moray, and Anne, duchess of Lauderdale. These ladies were served heir to him in the greater part of his estates. In him ended the male line of the first son of Alexander, first Lord Home. The titles devolved on the heir male, Sir James Home of Coldingknows, the sixth in descent from John Home of Whitrigs and Ersilton, second son of Alexander, master of Home, son of the first lord

Sir James Home of Coldingknows, third earl of Home, obtained from Charles I a ratification of all the honours, privileges, and precedencies formerly enjoyed by the two earls of Home, his predecessors, to him and his heirs male, 22d of May 1636, by patent dated at Hampton court. He joined the association in favour of Charles I, at Cumbernauld, in January 1641, and during the civil wars that succeeded he maintained a steady loyalty In 1644 he violently dispossessed Sir Patrick Hepburn of Waughton, of Fastcastle and the adjacent lands of Wester Lumsdean, for which he was fined in the sum of £20,000 Scots. In 1648 he was colonel of the Berwickshire regiment of foot in the celebrated "Engagement" set on foot by the duke of Hamilton to attempt the rescue of Charles I His firm adherence to that unfortunate monarch rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to Cromwell, who, in 1650, immediately after the capture of Edinburgh castle, despatched Colonel Fenwick, at the head of two regiments, to seize the earl's castle of Home. In answer to a peremptory summons to surrender, sent him by the colonel at the head of his troops, Cockburn, the governor of the castle, returned two missives, which are worthy of being quoted for their humour The first was: "Right Honourable, I have received a trumpeter of yours, as he tells me, without a pass, to surrender Home castle to the Lord General Cromwell. Please you, I never saw your general. As for Home castle, it stands upon a rock Given at Home castle, this day, before 7 o'clock So resteth, without prejudice to my native country, your most humble service, T Cockburn." The second was expressed in doggerel rhymes, which have long been familiar in the mouths of Scottish children

"I, Willie Wastle,
Stand firm in my castle;
And a' the dogs o' your town
Will no pull Willie Wastle down."

Cockburn, however, notwithstanding these two doughty epistles, was obliged to surrender the castle, which was garrisoned by the soldiery of Cromwell

In 1661 earl James was reinstated in his estates. He died in December 1666. By his countess, Lady Jane Douglas, fourth daughter of William, second earl of Morton, he had three sons, Alexander, fourth earl, who died, without issue, in 1674, James, fifth earl, who died without issue in 1687, and Charles, sixth earl The latter was in 1678 imprisoned in Edinburgh castle for his accession to the clandestine marriage of the heiress of Ayton to the laird of Kimmerghame. In 1681 he was chosen a member of the Estates for Berwickshire, but his election was not sustained. He did not concur in the Revolution, and took a principal lead in the opposition to the Union, but died during the pendency of that treaty, 20th August, 1706 Lockhart of Carnwath, in his Memoirs (p. 215) gives a high character of him as a true patriot. With three daughters, he had three sons, Alexander, seventh earl, Hon James Home of Ayton, who engaging in the rebellion of 1715, had his estate forfeited, and died 6th December 1764, and the Hon. George Home.

Alexander, seventh earl, was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers at the general election of 1710, and the following year was appointed general of the mint. On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, but released at the expiry of the act suspending the habeas corpus bill, 24th June, 1716 He died in 1720 He had six sons and two daughters, most of whom, with Charles, Lord Dunglass, the eldest son, died young. William, the second son, succeeded as eighth, and Alexander, the fifth son, as ninth earl

William, eighth earl, a captain in the 3d regiment of foot guards, (commission dated in July 1743,) served on the continent, but was in Scotland in 1745 when the rebellion broke out. He joined Sir John Cope at Dunbar in September of that year, and was at the battle of Preston, where he endeavoured, but in vain, to rally the dragoons. Having taken the command of the Glasgow regiment of 600 men, with it he joined the royal army at Stirling on the 12th of the following December After passing through the subordinate grades, on 29th April 1752 he was promoted to be colonel of the 25th foot, and on 16th April 1757 was appointed governor of Gibraltar, where he died 28th April, 1761, being then a lieutenant-general in the army He was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers at the general elections of 1741, 1747, and 1754, also on 5th May 1761, a week after his death, which was not then known in Scotland Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his brother, Alexander, ninth earl, a clergyman of the Church of England. This nobleman died at the family seat of Hirsel, Berwickshire, 8th October, 1786. He was thrice married first, to Primrose, second daughter of Charles, ninth Lord Elphinstone and by her, who died 18th December, 1759, had a son, William, Lord Dunglass, a lieutenant in the Coldstream regiment of foot guards, which he accompanied to America, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Guildford, 15th March, 1781 He died soon after, unmarried They had also a daughter, Lady Eleonora Home, married to Major-general Thomas Dundas of Fingask, M P, who fell a victim to pestilential disease on public service in the West Indies in 1794, and to whose memory a monument was erected by a vote of the House of Commons, in St. Paul's cathedral, London The earl's second wife, his cousin, Marion, daughter of the Hon James Home of Ayton, died without issue, 30th Oct. 1763. By his third wife, Miss Ramey of Great Yarmouth, he had two sons and two daughters. The eldest son died in infancy Alexander, the second son, became tenth earl. Lady Caroline, the elder daughter, died unmarried 30th April 1794 Lady Charlotte, the younger, married Rev Charles Baillie, archdeacon of Cleveland and rector of Middleton, 2d son of Hon George Baillie of Jerviswoode, with issue.

Alexander, tenth earl, born at Hirsel, 11th Nov 1769, married Elizabeth, 2d daughter of Henry, third duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, and had three sons 1 Cospatrick Alexander, Lord Dunglas, 2 William Montagu Douglas, born 22d Nov 1800, died 22d July 1822, and 3. Henry Campbell, born 1801, died in infancy His lordship, a representative peer, died 21st October 1841

His only surviving son, Cospatrick Alexander Ramsey-Home, 11th earl, born at Dalkeith House 27th October 1799, was under secretary of state for foreign affairs from June 1828 to Nov 1830, elected a representative peer in 1842, and keeper of the great seal of Scotland from Feb. to Aug 1852 He married in 1832, Hon Lucy Elizabeth Montague, eldest daughter and co-heir of the last Lord Montague (a title in the English peerage extinct in 1848), issue, six sons and three daughters. On the death of her cousin, the 4th Lord Douglas, without issue, 6th April 1857, the countess of Home succeeded to his estates, estimated worth £50,000 per annum

The Homes of Wedderburn were descended from Sir David Home of Thurston, in East Lothian, second son of Sir Thomas Home of Home. He got from Archibald earl of Douglas a grant of the barony of Wedderburn, county Berwick, in 1413, which received a royal confirmation 19th April 1430 He and his wife, Alice, had an additional charter from the superior, Archibald, 4th earl of Douglas, confirmed by royal charter, dated at Stirling, 16th May 1450 He had a son, David, who predeceased him, leaving two sons, George, who succeeded his grandfather, and Sir Patrick Home of Polwarth, immediate ancestor of the earls of Marchmont (see MARCHMONT, earl of), also, of the Homes of Kimmerghame, Castle Hume, &c.

The grandson, George Home of Wedderburn, was killed by the English near his own house in 1497 His son and successor, Sir David Home, was slain at Flodden, with his eldest son, George. He had seven sons altogether, who were called "the spears of Wedderburn" The second son, David, inherited the estate The third son, Alexander Home of Manderston, was ancestor of the Homes, earls of Dunbar (see page 75 of this volume), the Homes of Renton, and the family of Home Drummond of Blair Drummond in Perthshire. The fourth son, John, was progenitor of the Homes of Blackadder, who possess a baronetcy The younger son, Patrick, was styled of Broomhouse.

The second son, Sir David Home, was the energetic baron of Wedderburn, who revenged the execution of his chief, Lord Home, and his brother, by the assassination of Anthony de la Bastie in September 1517 as above related, when he was assisted by his brothers, John and Patrick With Cockburn of Langton and others who had been accessary to the murder, they were cited to appear before the court of justiciary at Edinburgh on 19th February following but disregarding the citation, they were declared by parliament rebels and traitors, and their estates confiscated. When the earl of Arran, at the head of a strong force, entered Berwickshire against him, Sir David shut himself up in the castle of Edrington, about three miles from Berwick, and defied all his attempts to take him prisoner That nobleman at length returned to the capital, after having placed garrisons in the castles of Home, Langton, and Wedderburn. Sir David, however, still possessed so much power in the Merse, that it is stated "none almost pretended to go to Edinburgh, or any where else out of the country, without first both asking and obtaining his liberty" Blackadder, prior of Coldingham, alone refused to submit to him, and having accidentally met one day while following the chase, they fought with such obstinacy that the prior and his six attendants were slain on the spot. He soon recovered the castles which had been garrisoned by the regent's forces, his own fortress of Wedderburn being the first that surrendered to him. He and his kinsmen, the Homes of Ayton, Fastcastle, and Manderston, swelled, with their retainers, the forces of the earl of Angus in the famous street encounter, "Cleanse the Causeway," against the Hamiltons at Edinburgh in 1520. On the return of Albany from France in the following year, with Cockburn of Langton and others concerned in the death of De la Bastie, they put their respective fortresses of Fastcastle, Wedderburn, Buncle, and Billie, into a strong condition. They were again declared traitors, but a compromise was, in August 1522, entered into with Albany, and as the Homes were restored to their estates, they were thenceforth found on the side of the regent. With three daughters, he had three sons.

The eldest son, Sir George Home, with his chief, Lord Home, and his kinsmen of Ayton, Renton, and Fastcastle, were among the number of those who were taken prisoners at Solway Moss in 1542 He was slain at the battle of Pinkie in 1547, and was succeeded by his next brother, Sir David. His youngest brother, John, was styled of Crumstane.

Sir David Home of Wedderburn was taken prisoner at Pinkie With the Homes of Ayton and Manderston, the latter of whom was slain, he fought under the banners of his chief, against Queen Mary at the battle of Langside. He died in 1574 He had, with three daughters, four sons, namely, George, his heir, David, of Godscroft, the well-known author of a 'History of the House and Race of Douglas and Angus,' a memoir of whom is given under Hume.

The eldest son, Sir George Home of Wedderburn, was appointed warden of the east marches in 1578, and comptroller of Scotland in 1597 He died 24th November 1616. He had an only son, Sir David Home of Wedderburn, slain at the battle of Dunbar in 1650, with his son, George Home, whose son, also named George, inherited the estate, and died before 1715 With a daughter, he had two sons, George, his heir, and Francis Home of Quixwood, from whom the claimant of the Marchmont peerage derives his descent.

The elder son, George, was put in possession of the family estate in 1695, and engaging in the rebellion of 1715, was taken at the battle of Preston, tried and condemned, but obtained a pardon, and died at Wedderburn in 1720 By his wife, Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir Patrick Home, baronet, of Lumsdean, he had nine children. David, the eldest son, died laird of Wedderburn, in 1762. His next brother, George, having predeceased him in 1758, he was succeeded by the third son, Patrick, who died in 1766. John and James, the two youngest sons, were captains in the royal navy, and both died, unmarried, in 1758, the latter killed in action with the French Margaret, the eldest daughter, married in 1732, Ninian Home of Billie, and was mother of Patrick Home, who succeeded to the estate of Wedderburn, and was a member of parliament. Isabella, the second daughter, married Alexander Home of Jardinfield, and was mother of Ninian Home of Paxton, in the parish of Hutton, Berwickshire, governor of Grenada, who was murdered there by Fedon, in 1795, and of George Home, who succeeded to the estates of Wedderburn and Paxton, and resided for many years at his seat of Paxton. He was a member of the celebrated literary circle of Edinburgh which included Henry Mackenzie, the author of the Man of Feeling, Lord Craig, &c., and several of his papers appeared in the Mirror and Lounger Jean, the youngest daughter, married the Rev John Tod, minister of Ladykirk, and had three sons and three daughters. None of these married except the eldest daughter, Margaret, who, in 1799, became the wife of John Foreman, Esq., and died in 1820 With a daughter, Jean, married to the Rev Dr Smith, she had three sons, John Foreman Home, born 29th January 1781, who succeeded to the estate of Wedderburn, and married Mademoiselle Adelaide Rocharde, without issue; William Foreman Home, of Paxton House, born 24th April 1782, married in January 1811, Jean, daughter of the Rev George Home of Gunsgreen, and had four daughters, of whom the eldest, Jean Foreman, now of Wedderburn and Paxton, married 30th July 1832, David Milne, Esq, eldest son of Admiral Sir David Milne, G C B, with issue a son, David, and five daughters. Ninian, the third son, died young

The Homes of Blackadder are descended from John Home, fourth son of Sir David Home of Wedderburn, and one of "the seven spears." By his marriage with Beatrix Blackadder, eldest daughter of one of the two heirs portioners of Robert Blackadder of that ilk, he acquired that estate, and was thereafter designed John Home of Blackadder He had one son, also named John, whose son, Sir John Home, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1671 He distinguished himself much by his loyalty and patriotism. By his wife, Mary, daughter of Sir James Dundas of Arniston, he had two sons, Sir John, his successor, and Sir David.

The latter, Sir David Home of Crossrig, was admitted advocate 8d June 1687, having studied the civil law on the continent, and was amongst the first judges in the court of session nominated by King William at the Revolution. He took his seat on the bench 1st November 1689, by the title of Lord Crossrig, and was appointed a lord of justiciary 27th January 1690 Shortly afterwards he was knighted by King William. In November 1700, he presented a petition to parliament respecting the loss of his papers at the great fire in the meal market, Edinburgh, 5th February of that year The fire broke out in the lodging immediately under his house, while part of his family were in bed, and his lordship was going to bed, and the alarm was so sudden that he was forced to escape in his night clothes, with his children undressed. Only a small portion of his papers were recovered. In a letter from Duncan Forbes of Culloden to his brother, giving him an account of the fire, he says, "Many rueful sights, such as Corserig naked, with a child under his oxter, happing for his life." His petition was remitted to a committee of three, upon whose report an act of parliament was passed 31st January 1701, entitled "An act for proving the tenor of some writs in favour of Sir David Home of Crossrig." The writs related chiefly to the lands of Crossrig, which were adjudged to Sir John Home of Blackadder, and his son James, by Elizabeth Home, &c., of Crossrig, and came afterwards to Lord Crossrig by disposition of the above-mentioned James Home, designed of Greenladean. His lordship died 18th April 1707 He was twice married; his second wife was a daughter of Sir Alexander Swinton of Swinton, by whom he had issue.

From Lord Crosrig's eldest surviving son, Mr Home of Eccles, advocate, author of several works professional and historical, descended the Homes of Cowdenknows, the first of that family, Dr Francis Home, an eminent physician of Edinburgh, being his grandson. The latter, who was the third son of Mr Home of Eccles, was born 17th November 1719 He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and was among the few who founded the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh As surgeon of a regiment of dragoons he served in Flanders during the whole of the seven years' war After studying for some time at Leyden, at the termination of the war he settled in Edinburgh, and graduated there in 1750. The subject of his inaugural dissertation was the remittent fever, which had prevailed very severely in the army, a treatise yet quoted as one of the best on that disease. In 1768 he was appointed professor of materia medica in the university of Edinburgh, and continued in that chair for thirty years, having contributed, with his eminent colleagues, to maintain the high character of that university as a medical school. He was also one of the king's physicians for Scotland. He died a bachelor on 15th February 1813, at the advanced age of 94. Dr Home was the author of several valuable medical works. His 'Principia Medicinæ,' written in correct and elegant Latin, contains an excellent scientific history of diseases. It went through several editions, and on the continent was soon adopted by several professors as a text-book. He was the first who described the croup as a separate and distinct disease. His works entitled 'Medical Facts and Experiments,' and 'Clinical Experiments, Histories, and Dissertations,' form valuable collections of very important facts regarding the history of diseases and their treatment. In 1751 he published a treatise on the Dunse Spa, which brought that mineral spring into notice. For a work entitled 'Experiments on Bleaching,' he obtained a gold medal from the Honourable Board of Trustees for the Improvement of Manufactures in North Britain It was published in 1756 by request of the Board His essay on the Principles of Agriculture long continued to be the most scientific account of that most important art and obtained for him in 1790, when it was founded, the first professorship of agriculture in the university of Edinburgh.

Lord Crosrig's elder brother, Sir John Home, 2d baronet of Blackadder, married his cousin, Mary, eldest daughter of Sir James Dundas, 2d of Arniston, and had 2 sons, Sir John, who succeeded him, and William, a colonel in the army

The eldest son, Sir John Home, 3d baronet, had, with a daughter, 4 sons. The eldest, Sir John, 4th baronet, dying without surviving issue, was succeeded by his next brother, Sir James, 5th baronet, who died before 1755 The son of the latter, also Sir James, a clerk to the signet, had, with a daughter, 1 son, Sir George, 6th baronet, who, entering the navy early, became vice-admiral He died in 1809

His eldest son, Sir James, 7th baronet, born March 17, 1790, was in the East India Company's civil service, and died in 1836. He had two sons, Sir John, 8th baronet, born August 4, 1829, who also entered the navy, but died, unmarried, March 26, 1849, and Sir George, 9th baronet, advocate, born Sept. 23, 1832, married, in 1858, Ann Oliphant, only child of Graham Speirs, Esq., Sheriff of Mid-Lothian; captain of the city of Edinburgh volunteer rifles, 1859

The Homes of Renton were descended from Patrick Home of Kill-know, Coldingham, second son of Sir Alexander Home of Manderston, and ancestor of the earls of Dunbar Patrick obtained the lands of Renton, and other estates, by his marriage in 1558 with Janet, daughter and sole heiress of David Ellem of Renton, sprung from an ancient family in the county of Berwick.

His son, Sir Alexander Home of Renton, was appointed sheriff principal of Berwickshire in 1616, on the resignation of Alexander earl of Home, and continued in that office till 1621 He was very rigorous against those accused of witchcraft, and as we learn from a letter from his son to Sir Patrick Home of Polwarth, sheriff, dated May 15, 1634, burned seven or eight witches at Coldingham. His son, Sir John Home of Renton, was bred to the law In 1633 he was one of the commissioners in parliament for the county of Berwick. For his adherence to Charles I, his lands and property were pillaged to the value of £8,000 sterling, for which, after the Restoration, he was rewarded with a grant of the crown fen duties payable out of his estate. He was knighted, sworn a privy councillor, and appointed a lord of session, 4th June 1663, and took his seat on the bench, the 20th, with the judicial title of Lord Renton He was also constituted justice-clerk for life by patent of the same date, and general and master of the ceremonies, his commission for the latter office being dated 10th December 1663 He died in the summer of 1671 According to Wodrow, (vol i. p. 256,) he was one of the greatest zealots for the prelates in Scotland. He married Margaret, daughter of John Stewart, commendator of Coldingham, son of Francis, the turbulent earl of Bothwell, and had three sons, namely, 1st, Sir Alexander Home of Coldingham, whose male line terminated at the death of his grandson, Sir John Home, in January 1788, 2d, Sir Patrick Home of Renton, created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1682 He sat in the Union parliament, and adhered to the protest of the duke of Argyle against that measure. His male line is said to have expired at the death of his grandson, Sir James Home, third baronet, in 1785 3d, Henry Home of Kames, Berwickshire, whose grandson was the celebrated Henry Home, Lord Kames, of whom a memoir is given at page 486.

The old Homes of Kimmerghame and Redhaugh (which lands were exchanged for those of Houndwood and Ferneyside) terminated in an heiress, Elizabeth Home, married first to William Macfarlane Brown of Dalgowrie and Kirkton, and second, on 23d December 1778, to her cousin-german, Robert Robertson of Brownsbank and Prenderguest, Berwickshire Mrs. Robertson died 9th July 1785, leaving her estate of Ferneyside to her distant relative, Sir Abram Hume of Wormleyburgh, baronet, and it is now possessed by his descendant, Earl Brownlow, who assumes the name of Hume and Egerton, as heir of line of the marriage of Sir Abram Hume with Amelia, sister of John, earl of Bridgewater, and granddaughter of Henry de Grey, duke of Kent. Robertson of Prenderguest, on whose second son the estate of Ferneyside had been settled previously to the deed of Mrs. Robertson in favour of Sir Abram Hume, is represented by Robert Bruce Robertson Glasgow, Esq of Montgreenan, Ayrshire, Ensign 27th foot, 18th in descent from Alexander, 1st Lord Home

From the Homes of Greenlaw castle, also in the county of Berwick, descended Sir Everard Home, baronet, an eminent surgeon, born at Hull 6th May 1756, died at London, 31st August 1832 His sister, Anne Home, authoress of a volume of poems printed at London in 1802, was married in July 1771, to the celebrated anatomist, John Hunter

A David Home, a Protestant minister educated in France, was employed by James VI to reconcile the differences between Tilenus and Dumoulin on the subject of Justification; and if possible to induce the Protestants throughout Europe to agree to one single form of doctrine. He is often confounded with David Hume of Godscroft, to whom some of his works have been ascribed.

His chief work is,—Apologia Basilica, seu Machiavelli Ingenium Examinatum. Paris, 1626, 4to.

There are also attributed to him, De Unione Insulæ Britannicæ, Tractatus. Lond. 1605, 4to.

He is likewise the author of several compositions in the Delicie Poetarum Scotorum

HOME, or HUME, LADY GRIZEL, better known as Lady Grizel Baillie, celebrated for her amiable, prudent, and exemplary conduct as a daughter, wife, and mother, as well as for her poetical talents, was the eldest daughter of the first earl of Marchmont, and was born at Redbraes castle, Berwickshire, December 25, 1665 When only twelve years of age, she acted a most heroic and courageous part on two remarkable occasions Her father, then Sir Patrick Hume, and that eminent patriot, Mr Robert Baillie of Jerviswood, were very intimate friends, and on the imprisonment of the latter, Sir Patrick sent his daughter Grizel from Redbraes to Edinburgh, to endeavour to convey a letter to Mr Baillie in prison, and bring back what intelligence she could In this difficult enterprise she succeeded, and having, at the same time, met with his son, George Baillie, afterwards of Jerviswood, a friendship was formed, which, after the Revolution, was completed by their marriage, on September 17, 1692 During her father's concealment in the vaults of Polwarth church, she went every night alone at midnight, carrying victuals to him, which, to prevent the suspicions of the servants, she conveyed from off her own plate into her lap, while she was at dinner. In their subsequent exile in Holland, she managed all the family matters, and by her prudent conduct and cheerful disposition lightened the gloom and hardships of their lot. At the Revolution she was offered the situation of maid of honour to the princess of Orange, which she declined, preferring to return to Scotland with her family Her daughter, Lady Murray of Stanhope, wrote a very interesting account of her life and character, which is appended to Rose's Observations on Fox's Historical Work, in 1809, and was also published separately by Thomas Thomson, Esq, Advocate, in 1822 One or two of Lady Grizel Baillie's ballads were printed in the Tea Table Miscellany, and other collections of Scottish song One of these is the well-known humorous song, 'Were na my heart light I wad dee' Lady Murray says, that she possessed a book of songs of her mother's writing when in Holland, "many of them interrupted, half writ, some broke off in the middle of a sentence," &c. Lady Grizel died December 6, 1746, in the 81st year of her age, and was buried beside her husband at Mellerstain An elegant inscription by Judge Burnet, engraved on marble, was placed on her monument She had one son, who died young, and two daughters, Grizel, married to Sir Alexander Murray of Stanhope, baronet, and Rachel, who became the wife of Charles Lord Binning

HOME, HENRY, LORD KAMES, a judge distinguished for his profound knowledge of law, and for his numerous legal and metaphysical writings, was born in 1696 He was the son of George Home of Kames, in Berwickshire, and received his education at home, under a private tutor In 1712 he was apprenticed to a writer to the signet, and assiduously studied the law at Edinburgh, with the view of practising at the bar In January 1724 he was admitted advocate. In 1728 he published his collection of 'Remarkable Decisions of the Court of Session from 1706 to 1728,' which at once brought him into practice In 1732 appeared 'Essays on several Subjects in Law,' and in 1741 'Decisions of the Court of Session from its first Institution to the year 1740,' in the form of a dictionary, to which two volumes were afterwards added by his friend and biographer, Lord Woodhouselee During the rebellion of 1745 he employed himself in writing 'Essays upon several Subjects concerning British antiquities,' which were published in 1747. These subjects are, Introduction of the Feudal Law into Scotland; Constitution of Parliament, Honour, Dignity, Succession or Descent, with an Appendix on the Hereditary and Indefeasible Rights of Kings In 1751 appeared 'Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion, in two parts' The latter work, in which he advocates the doctrine of philosophical necessity, was believed to have a tendency to infidelity, and it was accordingly attacked in two able pamphlets, by the Rev Mr Anderson, who also brought the subject before the church courts, but his death soon after put an end to the controversy

In February 1752 Mr Home was raised to the bench of the court of session, when he took the title of Lord Kames In 1755 he was appointed a member of the board of trustees for the encouragement of the Fisheries, Arts, and Manufactures of Scotland, and shortly after one of the commissioners for the management of the forfeited estates In 1757 he published, in one volume 8vo, 'The Statute Law of Scotland abridged, with Historical Notes,' which has gone through several editions, and is still among the books consulted by practitioners In 1759, with a view of improving the law of Scotland by assimilating it as much as possible to the law of England, and after corresponding on the subject with Lord-chancellor Hardwicke, he published 'Historical Law Tracts,' which was followed in 1760 by a work, with a similar object, entitled 'The Principles of Equity' In 1761, quitting professional subjects, he brought out a small volume on the elementary principles of education, styled 'Introduction to the Art of Thinking,' which was originally written for the use of his own family In 1762 he published, in three volumes, his 'Elements of Criticism,' a valuable and ingenious work, which, of all others, established his reputation in England

In April 1763 Lord Kames was appointed one of the lords of the justiciary court, and uniformly distinguished himself in the trial of criminals by his strict impartiality, diligence, and ability At all times remarkable for his public spirit, his lordship took an active part in promoting every measure calculated for the improvement of the country In 1765 he published a small pamphlet on the progress of Flax-Husbandry in Scotland, with the patriotic design of stimulating his countrymen to continue their exertions in a most valuable branch of national industry In the year following appeared his 'Remarkable Decisions of the Court of Session from 1730 to 1752,' which includes the period of his own practice at the bar In 1772 he produced 'The Gentleman Farmer, being an attempt to improve Agriculture by subjecting it to the test of Rational Principles;' a very useful work, characteristic of the genius and disposition of the author In 1773 he published, in two volumes, his 'Sketches of the History of Man,' containing some curious metaphysical disquisitions concerning the nature and gradations of the human race

The subjoined woodcut of Lord Kames is from a portrait by D Martin, in the Scots Magazine for July 1801 (vol lxiii), engraved by Bengo

Even after he had attained his 80th year, his mind had lost none of its vigour, and he continued his usual pursuits with unabated ardour and perseverance In 1777 he published 'Elucidations respecting the Common and Statute Law of Scotland,' and in 1780, 'Select Decisions of the Court of Session, from 1752 to 1768' He closed his literary labours with 'Loose Hints upon Education, chiefly concerning the Culture of the Heart,' published in 1781, when the venerable author had reached his 85th year He died of extreme old age, December 27th, 1782 He had married, in 1741, Agatha, daughter of Mr Drummond of Blair, by whom, in 1766, he acquired the extensive estate of Blair-Drummond in Perthshire His son in consequence assumed the name of Home Drummond

HOME, JOHN, an eminent dramatic poet, the son of Mr Alexander Home, town-clerk of Leith, of the ancient family of Bassenden, lineally descended from Alexander first Lord Home, was born in the parish of Ancrum, Roxburghshire, September 22, 1722 He was educated at Edinburgh for the Church of Scotland In April 1745 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and the same year, when the rebellion broke out, he joined a volunteer corps on the side of the government, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Falkirk, but contrived, with some others, to escape from Doune castle, where he was confined In 1746 he was ordained minister at Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, vacant by the death of the Rev Robert Blair, author of 'The Grave' Having written a tragedy, named Agis, he went to London in 1749, and offered it to Garrick, then manager of Drury Lane, who refused it In February 1755 he again visited the metropolis, taking with him his tragedy of Douglas, which was also rejected by Garrick It was, however, performed at Edinburgh with the most enthusiastic applause, December 14, 1756, the author and several other ministers being present at the first representation For this bold violation of the rules of clerical propriety, his friends were subjected to the censures of the church, which he himself only escaped by resigning his living in June 1757 By the influence of the earl of Bute, the tragedy of Douglas, the plot of which is taken from the beautiful old ballad of 'Gil Morice,' was brought out at London with great success, and became a stock piece His tragedy of Agis was now acted, but with temporary success, while the Siege of Aquileia, another play of his, represented in 1759, was a complete failure In 1760 he published his three tragedies in one volume, dedicated to the prince of Wales, who, soon after his accession to the throne, granted him a pension of £300 a-year The sinecure situation of conservator of Scots privileges at Campvere was likewise conferred on him, and, in 1763, he was appointed one of the commissioners of Sick and Wounded Seamen In 1769 was produced The Fatal Discovery; in 1773, Alonzo, and in 1778, Alfred, tragedies which were all unsuccessful In 1770 Mr Home married a lady of his own name, by whom he had no children In 1779 he removed to Edinburgh, where he spent the latter years of his life. Soon after his return the duke of Buccleuch raised a regiment of Fencibles, in which Mr Home accepted of a captain's commission, which he held till the disbandment of the corps on the succeeding peace In 1802 appeared his History of the Rebellion of 1745, which universally disappointed public expectation Home died September 5, 1808, in his 86th year His portrait is subjoined.

HONYMAN, the surname of a family in Orkney, which possesses a baronetcy, descended from Bishop Andrew Honyman, who married Mary Stewart, heiress of Graemsay, and representative of the earls of Orkney of that name. In 1643 he was made colleague to Mr Robert Blair in St. Andrews by the presbytery of that city He was afterwards archdeacon of St. Andrews, and succeeded Bishop Sydserf in the see of Orkney in 1664, being consecrated on 10th April of that year On 11th July 1668, when stepping into the coach of Archbishop Sharp on the High-street of Edinburgh, he received a shot in his wrist with a poisoned bullet, intended for

Sharp, fired by a preacher of the name of James Mitchell, who had been at the rising of Pentland and had been excepted from the indemnity. On the cry arising that a man was killed, the people began to rush to the spot, but some one saying that "it was only a bishop," the crowd quietly dispersed. Mitchell escaped at the time, but ten years afterwards was executed for the deed. The wound never healed, and greatly impaired the bishop's health He died in February 1676, and was buried in the cathedral church of Kirkwall. He was the author of a work called 'The Survey of the insolent and infamous libel entitled Naphtali,' small 4to, 1678, in which he attempts to refute the statements contained in that famous presbyterian publication

His great-great-grandson, William Honyman, Lord Armadale, eldest son of Patrick Honyman of Graemsay by his wife, Margaret, daughter and heiress of M'Kay of Strathy (cousin of Lord Reay), was a distinguished judge of the court of session. Born in December 1756, he was admitted advocate 15th February 1777, and appointed sheriff-depute of Lanarkshire in 1786. On being promoted to the bench, he took his seat, 7th February 1797, with the judicial title of Lord Armadale, from an estate of that name which he inherited from his mother in the county of Sutherland. On 29th June, 1799, he was named one of the lords of justiciary, and created a baronet, 11th May, 1804 He resigned his seat on the bench in 1811, and died at Smyllum Park, his residence in Lanarkshire, June 5th, 1825 He had married in 1777, Mary, eldest daughter of the Right Hon Robert Macqueen, Lord Braxfield, lord-justice-clerk, and had three sons and three daughters. His eldest son, Sir Richard Bemptde Johnston Honyman, second baronet, at one time an officer in the 28th light dragoons, died 23d February 1842, without issue, and was succeeded by his next brother, Sir Ord John Honyman, third baronet, a colonel in the army and major in the grenadier guards (1846), married in 1818 the daughter of Admiral Bowen, issue, two sons and one daughter

Another son of the first baronet. Lieutenant-colonel Robert Honyman, 18th foot, distinguished himself in Egypt under Sir Ralph Abercromby, at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope under Sir David Baird, and in the island of Jamaica, where he died of fever Nov 20, 1809, aged 27

Hope, a surname of standing in Scotland since at least the 13th century Among those who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296, were two barons of the names of Adam le Holp and John de Hope. Nisbet (System of Heraldry, Appendix, vol. ii., p. 96), says that those of this name are said to be descended from the families des H'Oublons in Picardy. The French word Oublon means a hop, and when assumed as a surname it became in Scotland Hope. In the Saxon, the word hope indicated the sheltered part of a hill.

John de Hope, the immediate ancestor of the Hopetoun family, is said to have come to Scotland from France in the retinue of the princess Magdalene, queen of James V, in 1537 He married in France Elizabeth or Bessie Cumming, a Scotch lady, and had a son, Edward Hope, one of the principal inhabitants of Edinburgh in the reign of Queen Mary Being a great promotor of the Reformation, Edward Hope was chosen one of the commissioners for that city to the General Assembly of 1560. His son, Henry Hope, merchant in Edinburgh, having frequent occasion, in the course of business, to visit the continent, married a French lady, named Jaqueline de Tott, or Joanna Juvitot, and had two sons, Sir Thomas of Craighall, the celebrated jurisconsult, a memoir of whom is given in larger type at page 484, and Henry, ancestor of the great and opulent branch of the Hopes, long settled in Amsterdam, a descendant of which, Mr Thomas Hope of Deepdene, Surrey, author of Anastasius and other works, died in 1831

Sir Thomas Hope, the elder son, acquired the estate of Craighall, in the parish of Ceres, Fifeshire. The ruins of Craighall house, built by him, are situated in the high ground, above a deep and beautifully wooded den, about a mile to the south-east of the village of Ceres. A view of these splendid ruins is subjoined.

In this building, says Mr Leighton, we have, what was then rare in Scotland, in private mansions, an attempt to combine the graces of Italian architecture with the strength at that time considered necessary in domestic architecture. The elegant mansion had been erected immediately adjoining the old castle of Craighall, which forms a wing on the south side of the building. The arms of the family still remain emblazoned on the front, and the following motto, in allusion to the family name, is still legible, "Spero suspiro donec."

Sir Thomas was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1628. He married Elizabeth, daughter of John Binning or Bennet of Wallyford, Haddingtonshire, and had nine sons and five daughters.

The eldest son, Sir John Hope, second baronet of Craighall, was knighted and admitted one of the ordinary lords of the court of session, 27th July 1632, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Craighall In 1638 he refused to take the king's covenant until it should be explained by the General Assembly In 1640 he was one of the committee of Estates chosen to oppose the designs of Charles I In 1644 he succeeded his brother, Sir Thomas Hope, of Kerse, as a commissioner for the plantation of kirks. In the following year he was sworn a privy councillor, and in 1646 he succeeded his father as second baronet. He was a member of the various committees of estates constituted during the subsequent years of Charles I and the first years of Charles II In January 1651 his brother, Sir James Hope of Hopetoun, was arrested, by order of Charles II., for advising his majesty to surrender England, Ireland, and part of Scotland to Cromwell, in order to preserve the rest, and on being examined, he declared that it was his brother Lord Craighall's advice to the king, namely, "to treat with Cromwell for the one halff of his cloacke before he lost the quhole." Lord Craighall was, in consequence, cited to attend the committee, but nothing seems to have followed this citation He was appointed one of the commissioners for the administration of justice, and from an entry in Nicol's Diary, he seems to have acted as president of the court. In August 1653, he was elected one of the Scottish members of the Protector's parliament. He died at Edinburgh, 28th April 1654. He had, with six daughters, two sons, Sir Thomas, and Sir Archibald of Rankeillour, of whom afterwards.

The elder son, Sir Thomas Hope, third baronet of Craighall, born 11th February 1633, had a son, Sir Thomas Hope, fourth baronet, who married Anne, daughter and sole heiress of Sir William Bruce of Kinross, baronet, and by her had three sons. The eldest son, Sir William Hope, fifth baronet of Craighall, predeceased his mother, and was succeeded by his next brother, Sir Thomas Bruce Hope of Kinross, sixth baronet of Craighall, who sold the latter estate in 1729 to the earl of Hopetoun He died unmarried, and was succeeded by his youngest brother, Lieutenant-general Sir John Bruce Hope of Kinross, seventh baronet, who married, first, Charlotte, daughter of Sir Charles Halkett, baronet, by whom he had three sons, who all predeceased himself He married, secondly, Mariamne Denune, of the family of Denune of Cadboll, Ross-shire, by whom he had one daughter He died in 1766, when the baronetcy devolved upon his cousin, Sir Thomas, eighth baronet.

Sir Archibald Hope of Rankeillour, the second son of Lord Craighall above mentioned, born 9th September 1639, was admitted advocate 30th June 1664. Having been absent from the king's host at Bothwell Bridge in 1679, on 6th July 1681 he was cited before the privy council to answer for his absence, when he pleaded his privileges as an advocate, and that he sent a man and a horse in his stead. The privy council repelled this, but they remitted to a committee to consider how far his sending a horseman should alleviate the charge. Fountainhall, in his Decisions, ascribes this proceeding of the privy council to political motives, "because he had voted against the duke (of York, afterwards James VII) and the court faction in the election of the commissioners of Fife" (vol. i. p. 146). At the Revolution he was appointed a lord of session, and took his seat on the bench, 1st November 1689, as Lord Rankeillour On 27th January following he was constituted a lord of justiciary, and about the same time was knighted by King William. He died 10th October 1706, aged 67 His eldest son having predeceased him without issue, his second son, Sir Thomas Hope, admitted advocate in 1701, succeeded his cousin, Sir John Bruce Hope, as eighth baronet on his death in 1766; of whom afterwards.

The second son of Sir Thomas Hope, the eminent lawyer and statesman, was Sir Thomas Hope of Kerse, born 6th August, 1606, who was called to the bar on 17th July 1631, and received the honour of knighthood from Charles I at Innerwick 16th July 1633. He was commissioner in parliament for the county of Clackmannan in 1639, 1640, and 1641, and was also speaker for the barons or freeholders. In 1640 he was constituted colonel of the troop of horse raised by the college of justice to attend General Leslie as his lifeguard when he marched into England at the head of the Scots army Appointed on 13th November 1641, a lord of session, he was also constituted lord-justice-general, and was afterwards nominated one of the commissioners to treat with the parliament of England about the most effectual method of suppressing the Irish rebellion He died at Edinburgh 23d August 1643, in the 37th year of his age. He was the author of two treatises, namely, 'Law Repertorie,' and 'Commentarius in libros digestorum nempe XVIII ad XXIV, et in alios nonnullos juris civilis libros;' the first in one, the latter in two volumes folio, MS. His son, Sir Alexander Hope of Kerse, born 12th December 1637, was created a baronet, 30th May 1672 His son, Sir Alexander Hope of Kerse, second baronet of this branch of the family, born 13th August, 1668, married 14th April 1690, the Hon Nicholas Hamilton, only daughter of William second Lord Burgeny, and had a son, Sir Alexander Hope of Kerse, born 3d January 1697, and died 24th February 1749 His son, Sir Alexander Hope, fourth baronet of Kerse, sold his paternal inheritance to Sir Lawrence Dundas, thereafter designed of Kerse, baronet, M P

Sir Alexander Hope of Grantoun, Linlithgowshire, the fifth son of the first Sir Thomas Hope, born 12th March 1611, was cupbearer to King Charles I He married an English lady of fortune, and purchased the estate of Grantoun He died without issue, 13th February 1680, aged 69

The sixth son was Sir James Hope of Hopetoun, born 12th July 1614, an eminent lawyer and mineralogist. He practised as an advocate for several years with great success, and having, in 1638, acquired by marriage with Anne, only daughter and heiress of Robert Foulis of Leadhills, Lanarkshire, that valuable mineral estate, he applied himself to working the lead mines of the district, a subsequent manager of which was Allan Ramsay's father, and where the poet himself was born. In 1641 Sir James Hope was appointed general of the cunzie-house, or governor of the mint at Edinburgh, to which office was afterwards annexed, by act of the Estates, a civil and criminal jurisdiction within the Mint house He was admitted a lord of session on 1st June 1649 In the same year and 1650 he was elected a commissioner to parliament for the county of Stirling, and named one of the committee of Estates, a commissioner for public accounts and for revising the laws. He had an active share in the parliamentary transactions of 1650, and was one of the commissioners sent to command the marquis of Montrose to attend before the Estates to receive sentence. He was president of a committee named to investigate and report on the case of the prisoners taken in the course of the civil wars, and parliament seems to have rewarded him with six of them to work in his lead mines. Having voted at Perth against levying an army to oppose Cromwell, who was then advancing to invade Scotland, he was accused by the marquis of Argyle on 25th November 1650, as an enemy to the king and country, and as a principal plotter and contriver of all the mischief that had befallen both. Shortly afterwards he applied for a pass to leave the kingdom, which was denied, unless he would give in a petition stating his reasons for desiring it. He endured a short imprisonment in the beginning of 1651 for being implicated in the affair of his brother, Lord Craighall (see preceding page), and on his release was ordered to retire to his country seat. In May 1652 he was appointed one of the commissioners, under Cromwell, for the administration of justice in Scotland, and in 1654 he was constituted a commissioner for the sale of the forfeited estates. In July of the same year he was laid aside from the administration of justice, in consequence of not conducting himself to the satisfaction of the Protector at the dissolution of "the little parliament." He died at his brother's house of Granton, 23d November 1661, in the 48th year of his age, two days after he had landed from Holland, whither he had gone regarding his lead business. The disease of which he died was then known as "the Flanders sickness." He was buried in the churchyard of Cramond, where a well-executed marble bust of him was erected, with a suitable Latin inscription He married a second time, Lady Mary Keith, eldest daughter of the seventh earl Marischal, and had issue by both wives. He acquired the lands of Hopetoun in Lanarkshire, which name was transferred by his descendants to lands in Linlithgowshire.

John Hope of Hopetoun, his seventh child and only surviving son, born 16th June 1650, purchased in 1678 the barony of Abercorn, with the office of heritable sheriff of the county of Linlithgow from Sir Walter Seton, and about the same time the barony of Niddry and Winchburgh in Linlithgowshire from the earl of Wintoun He fixed his residence at the castle of Niddry, and in 1681 was elected M P for the county of Linlithgow Being in London, he embarked on board the Gloucester frigate, with the duke of York, (afterwards James VII ,) and several persons of quality in May 1682, and was lost in that ship, when it was wrecked on the 5th of the same month, in the 32d year of his age. By his wife, Lady Margaret Hamilton, eldest daughter of the fourth earl of Haddington, he had, with one daughter, a son, Charles, first earl of Hopetoun, see HOPETOUN, earl of

The original designation of the family of Pinkie was Craighall, which was relinquished by Sir Archibald Hope, knight, son of the second baronet, and a lord of session under the title of Lord Rankeillour His son, Sir Thomas Hope, advocate, eighth baronet, who succeeded his cousin, Sir John Bruce Hope, in 1766, as above mentioned, was a member of the last Scots parliament, in which his father, Lord Rankeillour, also had a seat. Sir Thomas distinguished himself as one of the early promoters of agricultural improvements in Scotland, and having drained and brought into a state of cultivation the marshy piece of ground, on the south side of Edinburgh, anciently the Borough loch, but generally known as the Meadows, it was, in consequence, called from him Hope Park. He died 17th April, 1771. He had five sons and three daughters. His eldest son, Archibald, predeceased him, but left a son, also named Archibald, who succeeded his grandfather in the title and estates.

Sir Archibald Hope, ninth baronet, born in 1735, purchased in 1778, from the marquis of Tweeddale, the estate of Pinkie, near Musselburgh, Mid Lothian, which thenceforth became the family designation. It had formerly belonged to the earls of Dunfermline, a branch of the Setons, and is celebrated for the disastrous battle fought in 1547, during the infancy of Queen Mary, in which the Scots were routed with great slaughter Sir Archibald was secretary to the board of police in Scotland for life, and on the abolition of that board, he received a compensation for the office which he held under it. He devoted himself to the improvement of his lands, and established extensive and profitable salt and coal works on his estate. He resided chiefly at Pinkie House, and was a member of the Caledonian Hunt, of which honourable club he held the office of president in 1789 In Kay's 'Edinburgh Portraits,' there is a characteristic etching of Sir Archibald Hope, as "Knight of the Turf" He died 1st June 1794. He had married in 1758, Elizabeth, daughter of William Macdowall, Esq of Castle Semple, Renfrewshire, by whom, with five daughters, he had two sons, Archibald, born in 1762, died a prisoner at Seringapatam in 1782, and Thomas, tenth baronet. Lady Hope died in 1778, and the following year Sir Archibald took for his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John Patoun, Esq of Inveresk, and by her had, with one daughter, three sons; John, eleventh baronet, Hugh, of the Bengal civil service; and William, master attendant at Calcutta, who died, unmarried, in 1837

The eldest surviving son, Sir Thomas, tenth baronet, born in 1768, died, without issue, 26th June 1801, when the title devolved on his half-brother, John

Sir John Hope, of Pinkie, 11th baronet, born April 13, 1781, was long convener and vice-lieutenant of Mid-Lothian, and for 8 years M P for Edinburgh county He married June 17, 1805, Anne, 4th daughter of Sir John Wedderburn of Blackness and Ballindean, baronet, and, with 2 daughters, had 8 sons. He died June 5, 1858

His eldest son, Sir Archibald, 12th baronet, born at Pinkie House in 1808, a deputy-lieutenant of the county of Edinburgh and major of its militia, and as descended from the elder branch, undoubted chief of the name of Hope in Scotland

The youngest of the five sons of Lord Rankeillour was Robert Hope, a surgeon, who married Marion, eldest daughter of John Glas, Esq of Sauchie, Stirlingshire, and had two sons, Archibald, and John, an eminent physician in Edinburgh, and professor of botany in the university of that city, a memoir of whom is given at page 493, in larger type. Dr John Hope married Juliana, daughter of Dr Stevenson, physician in Edinburgh, and, with a daughter, had four sons. The youngest of these, Dr Thomas Charles Hope, born in 1766, after receiving his education at the High School and university of Edinburgh, was, in October 1787, appointed professor of chemistry in the university of Glasgow In 1789 he became assistant professor of medicine in the same college, and afterwards succeeded to that chair as sole professor In October 1795, he was elected conjunct professor of chemistry with the celebrated Dr Black, in the university of Edinburgh, and on his colleague's death, in 1799, he became sole professor Previous to removing to Edinburgh, he had distinguished himself by discovering a new kind of earth, to which he gave the name of Strontites, since known by the name of Strontia. In 1820 he was admitted an honorary member of the royal Irish academy In 1823 he was elected vice-president of the royal society of Edinburgh. He was also a fellow of the royal college of physicians, and of the royal society of London. In 1826 he instituted a chemical prize in the university of Edinburgh, presenting £200 to the senatus academicus for that purpose. On completing the fifty-first year of his academic labours, an entertainment was given him, in the Assembly Rooms, Edinburgh, on the evening of the 15th May 1838, which was attended by more than 200 gentlemen of rank and learning, Lord Meadowbank, one of the judges of the court of session, in the chair. Dr. Hope died in 1844.

A younger brother of the first earl of Hopetoun, Sir William Hope of Balcomie, born 15th April 1660, was created a baronet 1st March 1698. He was first designed of Grantoun, afterwards of Kirkliston; and in 1705 he purchased the lands of Balcomie in Fifeshire for £7,500. He had served in the army, and for many years was deputy-governor of the castle of Edinburgh. He was celebrated for his skill in fencing and horsemanship, and his gracefulness and agility in dancing, and published 'The Complete Fencing Master, in which is fully described the whole guards, parades, and lessons belonging to the small sword, as also the best rules for playing against either artists or others with blunts or sharps, together with directions how to behave in a single combat on horseback,' Edinburgh, 1686, 12mo; and 'The Parfait Mareschal, or Complete Farrier, translated from the French of the Sieur de Solleysell,' Edinburgh, 1696, folio. He died at Edinburgh, 1st February 1724, in his 64th year, of a fever, caused by having overheated himself dancing at an assembly

His son, Sir George Hope, second baronet, of Balcomie, a captain of foot, died in Ireland, 20th November 1729 His only son, Sir William Hope, third baronet, was first a lieutenant in the navy, afterwards a lieutenant in the 31st foot, and was killed in Bengal, a captain in the East India Company's service, in 1763, without issue, when the title became extinct.

HOPE, Sir Thomas, a celebrated lawyer and statesman of the seventeenth century, was the son of Henry Hope, a merchant of eminence, and at an early age was admitted advocate He first distinguished himself by his conduct on the following occasion. On January 10, 1606, six ministers of the Church of Scotland were tried at Linlithgow for high treason, for resisting the authority of the king in ecclesiastical matters The procurator for the church, Sir Thomas Craig, and also Sir William Oliphant, refused to plead for them, in opposition to the influence of the king and court, when Mr Hope boldly undertook their defence, and managed their case with so much resolution and ability, that, though the majority of the jury, from being unlawfully tampered with, found them guilty, he at once secured the confidence of the presbyterians, and was ever after retained as their standing counsel His practice, in consequence, increased to such an extent, that he was soon enabled to purchase several large estates in different parts of the kingdom In 1626 he was appointed king's advocate by Charles I., by whom he was, two years afterwards, created a baronet of Nova Scotia. These honours, however, failed to detach him from the presbyterians, whose proceedings were chiefly guided by his advice. In 1638 he assisted in framing and carrying into execution the National Covenant. Previous to the meeting at Glasgow of the famous General Assembly of that year, the king, in his perplexity, required the opinions of the law officers of the crown, respecting the legality of the proceedings of the Covenanters, of their holding an assembly without the royal authority, protesting against his proclamations, and entering into a combination or covenant without his knowledge or concurrence Sir Thomas Hope, the lord advocate, and Sir Lewis Stewart, gave their opinions "that the most part of the Covenanters' proceedings were warranted by law and that, though in some things they seem to have exceeded, yet there was no express law against them," "an opinion," says Stevenson, (Church and State, p 213,) "that could give no satisfaction to his majesty, and in which it was not doubted the two last had crossed their inclination, but their solid judgment, and deep knowledge of the law, would not allow them to say otherwise; and for the former, it was shrewdly suspected that the Covenanters had hitherto acted by his advice in the most intricate steps of their management"

At Sir Thomas Hope's recommendation, a convention of Estates met in 1643 to settle the Solemn League and Covenant with the English parliament The same year the ill-fated Charles appointed him his commissioner to the General Assembly, a dignity never held by any commoner but himself, and in 1645 he was named one of the commissioners of the Exchequer Sir Thomas Hope died in 1646 Two of his sons being raised to the bench while he was lord advocate, he was allowed to wear his hat when pleading before them, a privilege which the king's advocate has ever since enjoyed He was the founder of the noble family of Hopetoun (see Hopetoun, earl of)

Besides his well-known Major and Minor Practicks, he wrote the following works

In Carolum I Britannicarum Moharcham, Carmen Seculare. Edin 1626, 4to.

SIR THOMAS HOPE

Puratitillo in Universo Juris Corpore.

Psalmi Davidis et Canticum Solomonis Latino Carmine redditum, which is still in manuscript.

A Genealogie of the Earl of Mar, also still unprinted.

HOPE, JOHN, an eminent botanist, the son of Mr Robert Hope, surgeon, and grandson of Lord Rankeillour, one of the lords of session, was born May 10, 1725 He was educated for the medical profession at the university of Edinburgh, and studied his favourite science, botany, under Jussieu, at Paris. On returning to his native city, he became a member of the Medical Society of Edinburgh He obtained the degree of M D from the university of Glasgow, on 29th January 1760, and was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians on November 6th of the same year In 1761, on the death of Dr Alston, he was appointed king's botanist in Scotland, superintendent of the royal gardens, and professor of botany and materia medica. The chair of materia medica he resigned in 1768, and, by a new commission, was nominated regius professor of medicine and botany in the university He was elected a member of the royal society of London, and of several foreign societies, and was enrolled in the first class of botanists by Linnæus, who denominated a beautiful shrub by the name of Hopea. He was also president of the royal college of physicians, Edinburgh He died there November 10, 1786 He was the first in Scotland who introduced the Linnæan system, and he obtained the removal of the Botanic garden from the low ground east of the North Bridge, Edinburgh, to more suitable ground on the north side of Leith Walk; whence it was again removed in 1822 to a preferable situation at Inverleith Row Besides some useful manuals for facilitating the acquisition of botany by his students, two valuable dissertations by him, the one on the 'Rheum Palmatum,' a rare plant found in the Isle of Skye, and the other on the 'Ferula Assafœtida,' were published in the Philosophical Transactions, of 1769 and 1785.

HOPE, SIR JOHN, fourth earl of Hopetoun, a distinguished military commander, son of the second earl, was born August 17, 1766 In his fifteenth year he entered the army as a volunteer, and, May 28, 1784, received a cornet's commission in the 10th light dragoons He was gradually promoted through the various gradations of military rank till April 26, 1793, when he became lieutenant-colonel in the 25th foot. In 1794 he was appointed adjutant-general to Sir Ralph Abercromby in the Leeward Islands, and during the three subsequent years he served in the West Indies with the rank of brigadier-general. In 1796 he was elected M.P for Linlithgowshire. As deputy-adjutant-general he accompanied the expedition to Holland in 1799, and was wounded at the attack on the Helder In 1800 he joined the expedition to Egypt under Sir Ralph Abercromby He was engaged in the actions of March 8 and 13, 1801, and received a wound at the battle of Alexandria. In June he proceeded with the army to Cairo, where he negotiated the convention for the surrender of that important place. He was made major-general May 11, 1802, and lieutenant general April 25, 1808 He served with much distinction in the Peninsular war, and conducted a column of the army with success through Spain, in the face of a superior body of the French, and, after a long and harassing march, joined Sir John Moore at Salamanca In the subsequent memorable retreat, his prudence and intrepidity were, on several occasions, conspicuously shown, and at the battle of Corunna he commanded the left wing of the British army On the death of Sir John Moore, Sir David Baird being severely wounded, the chief command devolved on General Hope, and under his masterly directions the troops were, after the victory, embarked in good order

On the arrival of the despatches in England, the thanks of both houses of parliament were unanimously voted to him, and he received the order of the Bath, while his brother, the earl of Hopetoun, was created a baron of the United Kingdom

Sir John Hope was soon after appointed to superintend the military department of the unfortunate expedition to the Scheldt, and at its termination was constituted commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland In 1813 he was ordered to the Peninsula, and commanded the left wing at the battle of Nivelle In the campaign in the Pyrenees he served with great credit, and for his gallant conduct in an engagement with the enemy on the heights opposite Sibour, on the high road from

Bayonne, where he was severely wounded in the head, he was mentioned with honour in the despatches of Lord Wellington. In February 1814, he was left with a division of the army to invest Bayonne, and a sortie being made from the garrison, he was wounded and taken prisoner, near the village of St Etienne, and conveyed into the citadel, but soon after obtained his liberty.

On May 3, 1814, he was created a British peer, by the title of Baron Niddry, in the county of Linlithgow He succeeded his half brother as earl of Hopetoun in 1816, and in August 1819 he attained to the rank of general. He died at Paris, August 27, 1823 A bronze equestrian statue of his lordship, by Campbell, stands in the recess in front of the Royal Bank of Scotland, St. Andrew's Square, Edinburgh It was erected in 1835

A beautiful pillar has been erected on the top of the Mount hill of Sir David Lindsay, in Fife, to his memory, another in Linlithgowshire, and a third in the neighbourhood of Haddington

"As the friend and companion of Moore," says the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1823, "and as acting under Wellington in the Pyrenean campaign, he had rendered himself conspicuous But it was when by succession to the earldom, he became the head of one of the most ancient houses in Scotland, and the possessor of one of its most extensive properties, that his character shone in its fullest lustre He exhibited then a model of the manner in which this eminent and useful station ought to be filled An open and magnificent hospitality, suited to his place and rank, without extravagance, or idle parade, a full and public tribute to the obligations of religion and private morality, without ostentation or austerity, a warm interest in the improvement and welfare of those extensive districts with which his possessions brought him into contact—a kind and generous concern in the welfare of the humblest of his dependents—these qualities made him beloved and respected in an extraordinary degree"

HOPETOUN, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1703 on Charles Hope of Hopetoun, son of John Hope of Hopetoun, mentioned on page 491, and great-grandson of the celebrated lawyer, Sir Thomas Hope, lord advocate in the reign of Charles I, three of whose sons were lords of session Charles Hope was born in 1681, and when his father lost his life by the wreck of the Gloucester frigate, which had nearly proved fatal to the duke of York, he was only a year old. As soon as he became of age he was, in 1702, elected a member of the Scots parliament for the county of Linlithgow, being heritable sheriff of that county The following year he was sworn a privy councillor and created a peer of Scotland by the titles of earl of Hopetoun, Viscount Aithrie, and Lord Hope, by patent dated at St. James', 5th April 1703, to him and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs female. He took the oaths and his seat in parliament July 6, 1704, and gave his zealous support to the treaty of Union. In 1715 he was constituted lord-lieutenant of the county of Linlithgow, and in 1723 lord-high-commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. At the general election of 1722 he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and re-elected to every parliament afterwards as long as he lived. In 1733 he was invested with the order of the Thistle. The noble pile of Hopetoun house, Linlithgowshire, commenced under the direction of the famous architect Sir William Bruce and finished by Mr Adam, was erected by him, and he died there February 26, 1742, in his 61st year He married 31st August, 1699, Lady Henrietta Johnstone, only daughter of the first marquis of Annandale, and, with four daughters, had three sons.

The eldest son, John, second earl of Hopetoun, was born at Hopetoun house, September 7, 1704. In 1744, two years after succeeding to the earldom, he was appointed one of the lords of police in Scotland, and held that office till 1760 The whole of the salary which he received from it he devoted to the support of charitable institutions. In 1754 he was lord-high-commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. He had the sole management of the estates of his uncle the third marquis of Annandale, as tutor in law of that nobleman, who was insane. The earl died 12th February, 1781, in his 77th year He married, first, at Cullen house, 14th September 1738, Lady Anne Ogilvy, second daughter of James fifth earl of Findlater and Seafield, and by her he had three daughters and six sons. He married, secondly, Jean, daughter of Robert Oliphant of Rossie, Perthshire, and by her had two daughters and one son, the celebrated military commander, Sir John Hope of Rankeillour, who succeeded in 1816 as fourth earl of Hopetoun.

The eldest son, Charles, Lord Hope, born 9th July 1740, died, unmarried, at Portsmouth, 6th June 1766, in his 26th year, on his return from a voyage to the West Indies, whither he had gone on account of his health

James, the second son, born in 1741, became third earl of Hopetoun He entered the army as an ensign in the 3d regiment of foot-guards 9th May 1758, and, when only eighteen years old, was at the memorable battle of Minden in 1759 He continued in the same regiment till 1764, when he retired from the army, in consequence of the declining health of his elder brother, Lord Hope, with whom he travelled for some time on the continent. At the general election of 1764, three years after he had succeeded to the earldom, he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and again, on a vacancy, in 1794, and took an active part in parliamentary business.

On the death of his grand-uncle of the half-blood, the third marquis of Annandale, on 29th April 1792, he succeeded to the large estates of that nobleman in Scotland, and to the titles of earl of Annandale and earl of Hartfell, but never assumed either of them, only taking the additional surname of Johnstone. On the breaking out of the French war in 1793, when seven regiments of fencibles were directed by the king to be raised in Scotland, the earl embodied a corps called the Southern or Hopetoun Fencibles, of which he was appointed colonel, and soon brought his regiment into a state of efficient discipline. The services of the Hopetoun Fencibles, at first limited to Scotland, were afterwards extended to England, and in 1798 the regiment was disbanded after the regular militia had been organized. His lordship was heritable keeper of the castle of Lochmaben, which had once belonged to Robert the Bruce, and the constabulary of which had been, in 1661, transferred to James Johnstone, earl of Hartfell. He was also lord-lieutenant of the county of Linlithgow, in which capacity he embodied a yeomanry corps and a regiment of volunteer infantry, both of which he commanded as colonel, and they were among the first that tendered their services to government. For his patriotic services, and his brother's gallant conduct in the Peninsula, he was created a baron of the United Kingdom, 28th January 1809, by the title of Baron Hopetoun of Hopetoun in the county of Linlithgow, to him and his heirs male, with remainder to the heirs male of his father He died at Hopetoun house 29th May 1816, at the advanced aged of 75 He married 16th August 1766, Lady Elizabeth Carnegie, eldest daughter of the sixth earl of Northesk, and had six daughters, who all predeceased him, except the eldest, Lady Anne Hope She inherited the Annandale estates, and married Admiral Sir William Johnstone, K C B and K C H, who in her right assumed the additional name of Hope. Her ladyship died in 1818, leaving, with other issue, John James Hope Johnstone, Esq of Annandale

Having no male issue, the third earl was succeeded by his half-brother, the celebrated General Sir John Hope of Rankeillour, then lord Niddry, fourth earl of Hopetoun, a memoir of whom is given on page 498 He was twice married, first, in 1798, to Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the Hon Charles Hope Vere of Craigiehall (see next article), who died without issue in 1801, secondly, in 1803, to Louisa Dorothea, third daughter of Sir John Wedderburn, of Ballindean, baronet, by whom he had ten sons and two daughters. When George IV visited Scotland in 1822 he embarked at Port Edgar, on his return to England, having previously partaken of a repast at Hopetoun house with the earl, his family, and a select company assembled on the occasion The king was accompanied by his lordship from Hopetoun house on his embarkation on the 15th August, and on 1st October 1823 the remains of this gallant and distinguished nobleman were landed at Port Edgar from the sloop of war, Brisk, from France, where he had died on the 27th of the preceding August. His lordship was commander-general of the Royal Archers of Scotland, and acted as such on the day of George the Fourth's arrival at Holyroodhouse As a memorial of that event, they requested the earl to sit for his picture in the dress which he wore on that occasion The painting was executed by Mr (afterwards Sir) John Watson Gordon, and is hung up in the Archer's Hall, Edinburgh

The eldest son, John, born 15th November 1803, succeeded his father as fifth earl, and died 8th April 1843 He married 4th June 1826, Louisa Bosville, eldest daughter of Godfrey Lord Macdonald, and had a son, John Alexander, sixth earl, born in Edinburgh in 1831, educated at Harrow school, entered the army as cornet and sub-lieutenant in the 1st life-guards in 1851 In 1852 he retired from the army, and the same year was appointed a deputy-lieutenant of Linlithgowshire.

Heir-presumptive to earldom (1861), his lordship's cousin John George Frederick Hope-Wallace, born at Quebec in 1839, son of Hon James Hope-Wallace of Featherstone castle Northumberland, born at Rankeillour, Fifeshire, June 7, 1807, On succeeding to the estates of the last Lord Wallace, the latter assumed, under that nobleman's will, the additional surname of Wallace. Appointed captain and lieut.-col. of Coldstream guards in 1837, but retired in 1843; M P for Linlithgowshire from 1835 to May 1838. He married, 4th March 1837, Mary Frances, youngest dr of 7th earl of Westmeath, issue, 3 sons and 4 drs. Col. Hope-Wallace died Jan 7 1854

The second son of the first earl of Hopetoun was the Hon Charles Hope, who, on the death of his uncle, James, second marquis of Annandale, inherited the estate of Craigiehall, Linlithgowshire, and on his marriage, in 1750, to Catherine, only daughter and heiress of Sir William Vere, baronet, of Blackwood, Lanarkshire, assumed the arms and surname of Vere. The Veres had held that property from the time of David I by grant from the abbey of Kelso. Mr Hope Vere was thrice married, and had a large family His second son, by his first wife, John Hope, a merchant in London, M P for Linlithgowshire, and author of a volume of poems in 8vo, entitled 'Thoughts in Prose and Verse, started in his walks;' Stockton, 1780, married, in 1702, Mary, only daughter of Eliab Breton, Esq of Fortyhill, Enfield, Middlesex, and Norton, in the county of Northampton, and had three sons.

The eldest son, Charles Hope, of Granton, long lord-president of the court of session, and lord-justice-general of Scotland, was born on 29th June 1763 He received the rudiments of his education at Enfield school, Middlesex, whence he was transferred to the High school of Edinburgh, where he rose to the distinction of being dux of the highest class. He studied for the bar at the university of Edinburgh, and passed advocate 11th December 1784 He was appointed depute-advocate 25th March 1786, sheriff of Orkney 5th June 1792, and lord-advocate in June 1801 Shortly afterwards he was presented with the freedom of the city of Edinburgh, and a piece of plate of one hundred guineas value, for his services in drawing out and otherwise aiding the magistrates in obtaining a Poor's Bill for the city At the general election of 1802, he had been chosen M P for the Dumfries district of burghs, but in December of the same year, on the elevation of the Right Hon Henry Dundas to the peerage as Viscount Melville, Lord-Advocate Hope was unanimously elected his successor in the representation of the city of Edinburgh.

Short as was the period during which he sat in the House of Commons, it was distinguished by his successful introduction of one or two bills of local importance, and at least one measure of national concern—the Act for augmenting the salaries of the parochial schoolmasters of Scotland One act of his official career—the censure which he expressed on the conduct of a Banffshire farmer who discharged his servant for attending the drills of a volunteer regiment—became in 1804 the subject of a great party debate, brought on by a motion of Mr Whitbread for the production of papers in the case, in which both Pitt and Fox took part. The motion was rejected in favour of Mr Hope, by a majority of 159 to 82, and the case was rendered remarkable by the striking description which the lord-advocate gave of the multitudinous duties of his office.

On the death of Sir David Rae, Lord Eskgrove he was appointed lord-justice-clerk, and took his seat on the bench of the court of session, 28th November 1804. In the justiciary court he presided seven years, and in solemn addresses, whether to prisoners at the bar, or to the court on opening or closing the assize, he especially excelled His charges to juries are described as having been singularly impressive, and most persuasive—grouping evidence with skill, presenting its results with a brevity equalled by its fairness, and adapting himself to the comprehension of the most ordinary minds, while preserving the characteristics of correct and fluent speaking. One or two of his addresses to prisoners sentenced to death are traditionally spoken of as having produced a thrilling effect on the auditors.

On the death of Robert Blair of Avonton, lord-president, in 1811, Mr Hope was promoted to the president's chair of the court of session, and took his seat as the head of the court on 12th November that year He held that high office for the long period of thirty years, a tenure to which the legal records of Scotland show but one parallel, in the case of the great Lord Stair, Sir Hew Dalrymple of North Berwick, who presided over the same court from the year 1698 to the year 1737 In Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk, Mr Lockhart has portrayed the eloquence and dignified bearing of this judge in a case which he witnessed himself In 1820 his lordship presided at the Special Commission for the trial of high treason at Glasgow; and his address to the grand jury was published at their request. In 1836, on the death of the late duke of Montrose, the office of lord justice-general, by virtue of an act of parliament, devolved upon him, and in that capacity, after an absence of a quarter of a century, he returned to preside in the court of justiciary In 1841, when seventy-eight, he resigned his seat upon the bench, and retired into private life.

When sheriff of Orkney, his lordship enrolled himself as one of the first regiment of Royal Edinburgh volunteers, and served in it as a private and captain of the left grenadiers till 1801, when, by the unanimous recommendation of the corps, he was appointed its lieutenant-colonel, and continued to hold that office until disbanded in 1814 He did much for the discipline and efficiency of the regiment, the privates and noncommissioned officers of which acknowledged their sense of his services, in 1807, by the gift of a handsome sword He resumed his military duties for a short time in the year 1819, when the political disturbances in the west led to the re-embodying of the regiment He daily inspected them while doing duty in Edinburgh castle for the regular troops, all of whom were sent to the western counties, where the spirit of disaffection chiefly prevailed

In 1822, the lord-president was sworn a privy councillor He was for many years an elder of the Established church of Scotland, a deputy-lieutenant of Linlithgowshire, a commissioner of the Board of trustees for manufactures, &c. His portrait, in the robes of lord-justice-general,—which he wore at the ceremony of proclaiming Queen Victoria in 1837,—painted by Sir John Watson Gordon, at the request of the Society of Writers to the Signet, is placed in the staircase of their library at Edinburgh

His lordship died in October 1851 He had married on 8th August 1793, his cousin, Lady Charlotte Hope, eighth daughter of the second earl of Hopetoun, and by her ladyship (who died in 1834) had a numerous family The eldest son, John Hope, born in 1794, passed advocate in 1816, was appointed solicitor-general in 1825, and in 1830 was elected dean of faculty In 1841 he was raised to the bench as lord-justice-clerk, on the promotion of David Boyle of Shewalton, who had previously held that appointment, to the office of lord-justice-general. At the same time he was sworn a member of the privy council; an official custodian of the regalia of Scotland; married, with issue. He died June 14th, 1858

The lord-president's next brother, Lieutenant-general Sir John Hope, G C H, born in 1765, entered the army in 1778, as a cadet in General Houston's regiment of the Scots brigade then serving in Holland. In 1787 he was appointed a captain in the 60th foot. The following year he was appointed to a troop in the 18th light dragoons, and in 1792 he was made aide-de-camp to General Sir William Erskine, whom he accompanied to Flanders, and was present at all the actions in which the cavalry were engaged. On his return he was promoted to be major in the 28th light dragoons. Soon after he was made colonel, and embarked with his regiment for the Cape. On his return in 1799, he was appointed to the 37th foot, which regiment he joined at St. Vincent's, in the West Indies. In 1805 he received the rank of colonel. He was next appointed deputy-adjutant-general to the Baltic expedition, and was present at the siege and capture of Copenhagen In 1810 he was promoted to be major-general, and placed on the staff of the Severn district, but in 1812 he was removed to that of the army under Lord Wellington in the Peninsula. In 1819 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and died in 1836. He was twice married. By his first wife, Margaret, daughter and heiress of Robert Scott of Logie, he had three daughters. He married, a second time, in 1814, Jane Hester, daughter of John Macdougall, Esq of Ardintriva, by whom he had three sons and a daughter The next brother, Vice-admiral Sir William Johnstone Hope, G C.B., died 2d May 1831, leaving issue.

The president's uncle, of the half-blood, Vice-admiral Sir George Hope, K C.B, eldest son of the third marriage of the Hon Charles Hope Vere, and fifth child of his father, born 6th July 1767, was a very distinguished naval officer He entered the navy at the age of fifteen in 1782, and after passing through the usual gradations attained the rank of captain in 1793, and that of rear-admiral in 1811 During the interval he had commanded, successively, the Romulus, Alcmene, and Leda frigates, and the Majestic, Theseus, and Defence, seventy-fours. At the battle of Trafalgar he was present in the latter vessel He served as captain of the Baltic fleet during 1808, and the three subsequent years. In 1812 he went to the admiralty, and in the following autumn he was sent to bring over the Russian fleet to England, during the French invasion of Russia. In 1813 he held the chief command in the Baltic, and in the end of that year he returned to the admiralty, where he remained as confidential adviser to the first lord till his death, 2d May 1818.

HORNER, Francis, an able parliamentary speaker and political economist, and one of the early writers in the Edinburgh Review, was the eldest son of a respectable linen merchant in Edinburgh, who was himself a native of England, and was born in that city August 12, 1778 At the High School of his native place, he showed great application and proficiency, and attained the distinction of being dux of the rector's class His first Latin master was the eccentric William Nicoll, the convivial friend of Burns, but the rector was the learned Dr Adam, a memoir of whom is given in the first volume At the university of his native city, under the auspices of the celebrated Dugald Stewart, he made great progress in his studies Robertson the historian was then the principal, and the respective chairs were filled by Professors Dugald Stewart, Playfair, Joseph Black, John Robison, Blair, Dalziel, Monro, and

Gregory After leaving the university, he spent some time with a private tutor in England, the Rev John Hewlett of Shacklewell, for the purpose chiefly of acquiring a purely English accent After his return to Edinburgh he studied law, physical science, political philosophy and English composition To improve himself in the latter, he systematically read the purest English classics, and exercised himself in translating from good French authors He seems to have acquired considerable knowledge of Italian and Spanish without the assistance of masters The historians, philosophers, and economists stood higher in his favour than the poets and imaginative writers He became a member of the Literary, Speculative, and other societies, being admitted a member of the Speculative at the same time with Henry afterwards Lord Brougham, and both took an active part in the proceedings of that Society Among his associates at this time were Lord Henry Petty, afterwards marquis of Lansdowne, Francis, afterwards Lord Jeffrey, Brougham, John Archibald Murray, afterwards a lord of session, his schoolfellow, fellow-student, and friend and correspondent through life, Lord Webb Seymour, a younger brother of the duke of Somerset, and the Rev Sydney Smith For one of his subjects in the Speculative Society he chose "the circulation of money," and in conjunction with Dr Thomas Brown and some others he engaged, while still a law student, in translating the political and philosophical works of Turgot, which were afterwards published

In the summer of 1800 he passed advocate, but he very soon acquired a rooted dislike of the practice and usages of the court of session, and after having walked for above a year the boards of the parliament house, his daily attendance in which gave him a constant headach, he resolved to quit practice there and qualify for the English bar He accordingly entered at Lincoln's Inn Having joined the whig party in 1806, when Lord Henry Petty was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, he and the earl of Lauderdale exerted their influence on behalf of Mr Horner, who, through Lord Kinnaird, was returned member of parliament for St Ives At the following election, however, he lost his seat, but was returned for St Mawes, through the Grenville interest. Before this time he had appeared as counsel at the bar of the house of peers in Scotch appeal cases, and he seems to have soon obtained in this department a large share of professional employment. From his first appearance as a member of the house of commons, he was recognised as a man of ability and information, and as one likely to rise Through the patronage of Lord Minto he obtained the place of one of the commissioners for investigating the claims upon the nabob of Arcot, though without salary

Having been called to the English bar, he chose the western circuit, and was, though slowly, in the way of obtaining a fair share of business. But his reputation as a member of parliament advanced far more rapidly than his character as a lawyer, and this squared with his inclinations and ambition, which had ever strongly prompted him to figure in public life, whatever became of his pecuniary interests In the session of 1810 he distinguished himself by his speeches on the state of the circulating medium He was afterwards placed at the head of the Bullion committee, and made a most elaborate, though unsuccessful, effort for the return of cash payments. In May of the same year, he supported Alderman Combe's motion for a vote of censure on ministers, for having obstructed an address to his majesty from the Livery of London

He continued to take a prominent part on the opposition side of the house in all the important discussions of the day, particularly in those of the regency question, but by constant application to business, his constitution, never very strong, at last gave way For several years before his illness assumed the decided character of pulmonary disease, he had occasionally suffered from a complaint which perplexed the physicians whom he consulted, both in London and Edinburgh An uneasiness amounting to difficulty of breathing was one painful symptom, yet the disease was declared to be neither water on the chest, nor tubercular consumption Dr Baillie alone rightly conjectured the real nature of the unwonted complaint to which Mr Horner, without any apprehension of his end being so near, fell a victim It was an enlargement of the air-cells of the lungs, and a consequent condensation of their substance, a form of disease so unusual that Dr Baillie had known only of three cases of so rare a disorder, and these not in his own practice, but from examining anatomical collections In company with his brother, Leonard, secretary to the Geological Society, for the recovery of his health Mr. Horner went to France, and afterwards proceeded to Italy, without deriving any benefit from the change He died at Pisa, February 8, 1817, in the 38th year of his age A monument was erected to his memory by his friends in Westminster Abbey, and his Memoirs and Correspondence in 2 vols 8vo, edited by his brother, Mr Leonard Horner, was published at London in 1843 Subjoined is his portrait from a painting by Sir Henry Raeburn

HORSBURGH, JAMES, F R S., a distinguished hydrographer, was born at Elie, Fifeshire, September 28, 1762 His parents, though in a humble sphere of life, were pious and respectable. At the age of sixteen, having acquired the elements of mathematical science, book-keeping, and the theoretical parts of navigation, he sailed in various vessels, chiefly in the coal trade, from Newcastle and the Frith of Forth, to Hamburgh, Holland, and Ostend. In May 1780 he was captured by a French ship of twenty guns, close to Walcheren, and detained in prison at Dunkirk for a short time. After his liberation he went on a voyage to the West Indies, and on his return proceeded to Calcutta. In 1784 he was made third mate of the Nancy, bound for Bombay, in which trade he continued for about two years In May 1786, when proceeding from Batavia towards Ceylon, as first mate of the Atlas, he was wrecked upon the island of Diego Garcia, owing to the incorrectness of the charts then in use On his return to Bombay he joined, as third mate, the Gunjava, a large ship belonging to a respectable native merchant, and bound to China. On the vessel's arrival at Canton, he became first mate, in which capacity he continued to sail, in that and other ships, between China, Bombay, and Calcutta, for several years

Mr Horsburgh's experience and observation had enabled him to accumulate a vast store of nautical knowledge, bearing especially on eastern hydrography By the study of books, and by experiments, he familiarized himself with lunar observations, the use of chronometers, &c. He also taught himself drawing, etching, and the spheres. During two voyages to China, by the eastern route, he constructed three charts, one of the Strait of Macassar, another of the west side of the Philippine Islands, and the third of the tract from Dampier Strait, through Pitt's Passage, towards Batavia, accompanied by a Memoir of Sailing Directions, which were published under the patronage of the court of directors of the East India Company, for the use of their ships

In 1805 Mr Horsburgh returned to England, and soon after he published a variety of charts, with Memoirs of his Voyages, explanatory of Indian Navigation In the Philosophical Transactions for 1810 appeared several of his papers which he had presented to Sir Joseph Banks; while others were inserted in Nicholson's Philosophical Journal In 1809 he brought out 'Directions for Sailing to and from the East Indies, China, New Holland, the Cape of Good Hope, and the interjacent Ports,' compiled chiefly from original journals and observations made in the Eastern seas during twenty-one years. This invaluable work has now become a standard authority In 1810, on the death of Mr. Dalrymple, he was appointed hydrographer to the East India Company His energies were now devoted to the construction of various valuable charts and works, amongst which were, an Atmospherical Register for indicating Storms at Sea, published in 1816, a new edition of 'Mackenzie's Treatise on Marine Surveying,' in 1819, and the 'East India Pilot.' He also contributed a paper to the Royal Society on the Icebergs in the Southern Hemisphere, which is printed in the Philosophical Transactions for 1880 In 1835 he published a Chart of the East Coast of China, having the names in the Chinese character and in English, translated by himself, which was his last work He died May 14, 1836 He was married in 1805, and left one son and two daughters. A striking public acknowledgment of his merit is contained in the Report on Shipwrecks of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, which refers to the highly valuable labours of the East India Company's maritime officers and "the zealous perseverance and ability of their distinguished hydrographer, the late Captain Horsburgh, whose Directory and Charts of the Eastern Seas have been invaluable safeguards to life and property in those regions"

HORSLEY, JOHN, an eminent historian and antiquarian, of English parentage, usually described as a native of Northumberland, was born at Pinkie House, in Mid-Lothian, then the property of the earl of Dunfermline, in 1685 After receiving the elementary part of his education at the grammar school of Newcastle, he studied for the ministry at the university of Edinburgh, being admitted master of arts in 1701 Returning to England, he preached for several years without a charge, and, in 1721, was ordained minister of a congregation of protestant dissenters at Morpeth In 1722 he invented a simple and ingenious mode of determining the average quantity of rain that fell, by means of a peculiarly constructed funnel, and soon after he was elected a member of the Royal Society, and commenced delivering public lectures on hydrostatics, mechanics, &c., at Morpeth, Alnwick, and Newcastle; in connection with which he published a small work on experimental philosophy His great work, 'Britannia Romana,' or the Roman Affairs of Britain, in three books, folio, illustrated with maps of the Roman positions, &c, appeared in 1732 He had also designed a History of Northumberland, which he did not live to finish He died at Morpeth, January 15, 1732, aged 46 By his wife, a daughter of Professor Hamilton, at one time minister of Cramond, he had a son, of whom nothing is known, and two daughters, one of whom was married to a Mr Randall, clerk in the Old South Sea House, London, and the other to Samuel Halliday, Esq, an eminent surgeon at Newcastle The greater part of Mr Horsley's unfinished manuscripts, correspondence, &c, fell after his death into the hands of John Cay, Esq, of Edinburgh, and from these was printed at Newcastle in 1831, a small biographical work by the Rev John Hodgson, vicar of Whelpington in Northumberland

HOWE, JAMES, a most skilful animal painter, the son of the minister of the parish of Skirling, in Peebles-shire, was born there, August 30, 1780 He was educated at the parish school, and having early displayed a taste for drawing, he was, at the age of thirteen, sent to Edinburgh to learn the trade of a house-painter, and was employed in his spare hours to paint for Marshall's panoramic exhibitions On the expiry of his apprenticeship he commenced as a painter of animals at Edinburgh, and attracted the notice of various persons of distinction By the advice of the earl of Buchan he was induced to visit London, where he painted the portraits of some of the horses in the royal stud, but owing to George III being at this time afflicted with blindness, he was disappointed in his hopes of securing the patronage of royalty, in consequence of which he returned to Scotland Being considered the first animal painter in his native country, if not in Britain, his cattle portraits and pieces were purchased by many of the nobility and gentry From Sir John Sinclair he received, some time subsequent to 1810, a commission to travel through various parts of Scotland for the purpose of painting the different breeds of cattle, his portraits of which were of much use to Sir John in the composition of his agricultural works Various of Howe's pieces were engraved, and among the most popular of these was his Hawking Party, by Turner.

In 1815 Howe visited the field of Waterloo, and afterwards painted a large panoramic view of the battle, which was highly successful During its representation at Glasgow, he resided there for about two years, but falling into irregular habits, he returned to Edinburgh in bad health and indigent circumstances Being invited by the Hon Mr Maule, afterwards first Lord Panmure, to Brechin castle, to paint some cattle-pieces, he partially recovered his strength, and, after a stay of four months, returned to Edinburgh a richer man than when he left it About the close of 1821, for the benefit of his health, he removed to Newhaven, a fishing village in the neighbourhood of that city, where, applying himself to his professional avocations, he produced a number of large compositions, many hundred sketches, and countless portraits of single animals His wonderful skill in depicting animals remained unimpaired by time, but he every day became more negligent as to the proper finishing of his pieces While he resided at Newhaven, he entered upon the illustration of a work on British Domestic Animals, of which Lizars was the engraver Several numbers were published, containing pictures of cattle of various kinds and breeds, but the work not succeeding, was soon abandoned The latter years of his life were spent at Edinburgh, where he died, July 11, 1836

HOWIE, JOHN, the original compiler of the 'Scots Worthies,' was born at Lochgoin, in the parish of Fenwick, Ayrshire, in 1735 His forefathers had taken up their abode in the moors of Fenwick during the twelfth century They were of the persecuted Waldenses, so many of whom were about that period forced to flee from France, and seek an asylum in Scotland Possessed of a predilection for literary pursuits, and gradually augmenting his extensive fund of knowledge by additions to a well-selected library, John Howie opportunely took up the task of recording the lives of the martyrs and confessors of Scotland—"her Worthies." "He was," says Mr M'Gavin, "a plain unlettered peasant. His ancestors had occupied the same farm for ages, and some of them suffered much in the persecuting period, particularly his great-grandfather, whose house was robbed and plundered twelve times, but he always escaped with his life, and died in peace, three years after the Revolution" The 'Biographia Scoticana, or a Brief Historical Account of the most Eminent Scots Worthies who testified or suffered for the cause of Reformation in Scotland,' compiled by John Howie of Lochgoin, was first published in 1775. An enlarged edition, with notes, by William M'Gavin, Esq, was brought out at Glasgow in 1827 John Howie, who belonged to the religious body named Cameronians, or the Reformed Presbytery, died in 1791, aged fifty-seven, and was buried in Fenwick churchyard.

His son, Mr Thomas Howie, succeeded him as tenant in Lochgoin We are informed by a local writer that in a small apartment at the southern extremity of the steading is deposited an extensive library, accumulated chiefly by the author of the 'Scots Worthies' The visitor of an antiquarian turn of mind, will feel gratified on inspecting many theological works of an early date. There are several specimens of the typography of Christopher Barker, an early printer who has pretty generally obtained the credit of having printed the first newspaper established in Britain There are also some MS volumes in the handwriting of the author of the 'Scots Worthies' His books are interspersed with occasional notes, written apparently in short-hand The manuscript volumes in Lochgoin are chiefly composed of sermons, of which copious notes must have been taken His antique MSS are written in a fair, perpendicular, old-fashioned hand, and are characterised by a precision and regularity only surpassed by letter-press One of the volumes alluded to is occupied with a commentary on the Scriptures This work was written by a young minister, a Mr Wilson John Howie would appear to have made a pilgrimage to the place where Mr Wilson's parents resided, for the purpose of procuring a perusal of the work—the author having died a short time previously. Before returning the book, he carefully copied the whole, and the volume, bound in stout boards, still exists—a monument of the writer's patience and industry

HOWIESON, WILLIAM, A R.S.A, an eminent engraver, the son of a carver and gilder in Edinburgh, was born in 1798, and educated in Heriot's Hospital Having early evinced a taste for art, he was bound as an apprentice to Mr. Andrew Wilson, an engraver in Edinburgh of considerable repute in his day. He was afterwards employed by Mr. Lizars, engraver, and others Some book plates which he executed indicated such an amount of talent as to attract the notice of Mr D O Hill, secretary to the Royal Scottish Academy, whose recommendation influenced Mr George Harvey, R.S A., to intrust to him the engraving of his highly popular painting of 'The Curlers.' The impressions were issued in 1838 In consequence of its excellence as a work of art, Mr Howieson was chosen an associate engraver of the Royal Scottish Academy His next work was an engraving from Sir William Allan's 'Polish Exiles' Harvey's 'Covenanters' Communion' followed, and 'The Skule Skailin,' by the same artist. All these works are of large dimensions, and are engraved in the line manner, with such tasteful beauty and elaborate finish as to entitle Mr Howieson to a very high rank in his own department of art Unseduced by the showy popular attractiveness and facility of what is called the mixed style of engraving, he devoted himself, with unsparing fidelity and application, to the laborious tediousness and comparatively unremunerating practice of what he conceived to be the true and high in his art Mr Howieson died December 20, 1850, leaving a widow and three children

HUMBERSTON, THOMAS FREDERICK MACKENZIE. See SEAFORTH, Earl of, vol. iii.

HUME, a surname, a corruption of HOME, which see.

Alexander Hume of Kennetsidehead, portioner of Hume, was one of the martyrs of the Covenant, and his execution was perhaps the most cruel and unprovoked of the judicial murders, which led the way to the Revolution of 1688. Taken prisoner in 1682, by a brother of the earl of Home, he was conveyed, sorely wounded, to the castle of Edinburgh, and at first tried only on the charge of having held converse with some of the party who took the castle of Hawick in 1679 The proof, however, being defective, the diet was deserted. On November 15, he was again indicted, and accused of levying war against the king in the counties of Berwick, Roxburgh, and Selkirk The diet was again deserted On December 20, however, he was once more indicted for having gone to the house of Sir Henry MacDougall of Mackerstoun, besieged it, and demanded horses and arms, of having entered Kelso, &c., in search of horses and armour, of resisting the king's forces under the master of Ross, &c. The whole of these formidable charges were founded on the simple fact that Mr Hume, riding with sword and holster pistols, the usual arms worn by all gentlemen at that period, after attending a sermon had, on his way home, called, with his servant, at Mackerstoun House, and offered to buy a bay horse. This his counsel, Sir Patrick Hume, offered to prove, but the court repelled the defence. He was found guilty, on these unproved charges, and condemned to be hanged at the market cross of Edinburgh on 29th December, between 2 and 4 afternoon He petitioned for time that his case might be laid before the king, but this was refused, and the day of execution hastened Interest, however, had previously been made at court in his favour, and a remission reached Edinburgh in time, but was kept up by the chancellor, the earl of Perth On the day of his execution his wife, Isobel Hume, went to Lady Perth, and earnestly besought her to interpose for her husband's life, pleading his five small children, but she was inhumanly repulsed His last speech on the scaffold will be found in Wodrow (Hist of Sufferings of Church of Scotland, vol ii pp 268–270) His estate was forfeited, but restored at the Revolution, and it is remarkable, that his family was singularly prosperous. His lineal descendants still possess extensive property in Berwickshire—his heir male and direct descendant is Patrick Home of Gunsgreen and Windshiel, and in the same degree in the female line are Mrs. Milne Home of Wedderburn, and Mr Robertson Glasgow, of Montgreenan, Ayrshire

HUME, ALEXANDER, a sacred poet of the reign of James VI , was the second son of Patrick, fifth baron of Polwarth, and is supposed to have been born about the year 1560 He studied at St Andrews, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1574 After spending four years in France, studying the law, he returned to his native country, and was duly admitted advocate His professional progress is related by himself in an 'Epistle to Maister Gilbert Monterief, Medicinar to the King's Majestie' Not succeeding at the ber, he sought preferment at court But failing in this also, he entered into holy orders, and was appointed minister of Logie, near Stirling He now devoted himself to writing religious songs and poems with the view of correcting the popular taste, and displacing the "godlie and spiritual sangis and ballattis" of that age, which were nothing more than pious travesties of the profane ballads and songs then most in vogue In 1599 he published 'Hymnes, or Sacred Songs, where the right use of Poetry may be Espied,' dedicated to "the faithful and vertuous Lady Elizabeth Melvil," generally styled Lady Culros, who wrote 'Ane Godlye Dream, compylit in Scottish Meter,' printed at Edinburgh in 1603, and at Aberdeen in 1644, which was a great favourite with the Presbyterians. The 'Hymnes, or Sacred Songs' have been reprinted by the Bannatyne Club The best of these is 'The Day Estivall,' being a description of a summer day in Scotland, from dawn to twilight Hume was also the author of a poem on the defeat of the Spanish Armada, entitled 'The Triumph of the Lord after the Manner of Men,' which has been praised by Dr Leyden, but never hitherto printed He died in 1609

A Treatise of Conscience, quhairin diuers secreats concerning that subiect are discouered Edin by Rob. Walgrave, 1594, 8vo.

Hymnes, or Sacred Songes, wherein the right Vse of Poesie may be espied be Alexander Hume Whereunto are added, the Experience of the Author's Youth, and certaine Precepts serving to the practice of Sanctification Edin by Rob Walgrave, 1599, 4to.

Alexander Hume, Scot, his rejoinder to Dr Adam Hill, concerning the Descent of Christ into Hell, wherein the Answer to his Sermon is justly defended, and the rust of his Reply scraped from those Arguments, as if they had neuer been touched with the canker, 4to

HUME, David, of Godscroft, a well-known controversial writer, historian, and Latin poet, was the second son of Sir David Hume of Wedderburn, by his wife, Mary, daughter of Johnston of Elphinston, and is supposed to have been born about 1560 He was educated with his elder brother at the public school of Dunbar, and afterwards went to France, intending to make the tour of Italy, but had reached no farther than Geneva, when he was recalled by the dangerous illness of his brother, on which he returned to Scotland about the beginning of 1581 In 1583 he became confidential secretary to his relative, Archibald, "the Good Earl" of Angus, whom he accompanied on his retirement into England. He availed himself of the opportunity to visit London, and during his residence there he maintained a constant correspondence with the earl, who, with the other exiled lords, remained at Newcastle. In 1585 he returned to Scotland with Angus, and till the earl's death, which happened in 1588, he continued in the capacity of his secretary, and was engaged in some of the public transactions of the time

In 1605 he published the first part of a Latin treatise, 'De Unione Insulæ Britannicæ,' which he dedicated to James VI, advocating his majesty's favourite project of a union between England and Scotland The same year he published his 'Lusus Poetici,' afterwards inserted in the 'Delicæ Poetarum Scotorum' In 1608 Hume entered upon a correspondence on the subject of episcopacy and presbytery with Law, bishop of Orkney, afterwards archbishop of Glasgow, and, in 1618, he began a controversy of the same nature with Cowper, bishop of Galloway About 1611 he wrote the 'History of the House of Wedderburn, by a Son of the Family,' which has been printed for the Abbotsford Club On the death of Prince Henry in 1612, he lamented his fate in a poem, entitled 'Henrici Principis Justa' In 1617 he composed a congratulatory poem on the king's revisiting Scotland, entitled 'Regi Suo Gratulatio' The same year he wrote, but did not publish, a prose work in reply to the injurious assertions relative to Scotland which Camden had asserted in his Britannia, also answered by Drummond

Hume's principal work, supposed to have been written about 1625, is his 'History of the House and Race of Douglas and Angus,' first printed at Edinburgh by Evan Tyler in 1644, and several times reprinted He is conjectured to have died about 1630.

HUME, Sir Patrick, Bart of Polwarth, first earl of Marchmont, a distinguished patriot and statesman, was born January 13, 1641 He succeeded his father in his estates and the title of baronet in 1648, and was educated by his mother, the daughter of Sir Alexander Hamilton of Innerwick, as a strict Presbyterian In 1665 he was elected member of parliament for the county of

Berwick. He took a decided part against the tyrannical administration of the duke of Lauderdale, and went to London in 1674 with the duke of Hamilton and others, to lay before the king the grievances of the nation. In September 1675, for his opposition to the measures of the government, he was imprisoned in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh He was afterwards removed to the castle of Dumbarton, and finally to Stirling castle, from whence he was liberated by order of the king, in July 1679 He subsequently went to England, and had many conferences on the state of the nation with the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Russell, who was his near relative In the autumn of 1684, finding that the government was bent on his destruction, Sir Patrick withdrew from his house, and concealed himself in the family burial vault, under the parish church of Polwarth, where he remained for several weeks, supplied every night with food by his celebrated daughter, Grisel, afterwards Lady Grisel Baillie, then only 12 years of age As winter approached, he removed to a concealed place made by his lady beneath the floor of an under apartment in his own house, where he lived for some time, but, water flowing in to the place of his retreat, he decided on quitting the kingdom, and accordingly departed in disguise He had only been gone a few hours, when a party of soldiers came to his house in search of him He succeeded in getting safely to Holland, where he was received with great respect by the prince of Orange

In 1685 he accompanied the earl of Argyle in his unfortunate expedition to Scotland, and in May of that year his estate was confiscated, and a decree of forfeiture passed against him On the failure of that ill-concerted enterprise he was concealed for three weeks in the house of his friend Montgomery of Lainshaw, in Ayrshire He also lay for a time concealed at Kilwinning, where he wrote a narrative of the expedition, which was first printed in Mr Rose's Observations on Fox's Historical Work, and is inserted in the Marchmont papers, published in 1831 A report of his death was spread abroad to throw the authorities off their guard, and induce them to relax in the search for him, and he effected his escape by a vessel from the west coast, first to Ireland, and then to Bordeaux, whence he proceeded to Geneva, and thence to Holland, where he was joined by his wife and ten children He settled at Utrecht, where, under the borrowed name of Dr Wallace, he remained three years and a half, and during that period endured many privations. His necessities prevented him from keeping a servant, and frequently compelled him to pawn his plate to provide for the wants of his family Not being able to afford the expense of a tutor, he educated his children himself

It appears that whilst at Bordeaux, he gave himself out for a surgeon, as he had done on the occasion of his former exile, and as he could bleed, and always carried lancets, he well represented the character, and that he travelled on foot across France to Holland His estate, forfeited in 1686, was given to the earl of Seaford In June 1688 he addressed from Utrecht a letter, powerful both in style and argument, to his friend Sir William Denholm, written to be communicated to the Presbyterian ministers, to put them on their guard against an insidious plan, which was then in agitation, to induce them to "petition King James for a toleration, which would have included the papists"

At the Revolution of 1688 he came over with the prince of Orange, and took his seat in the Convention parliament, which met at Edinburgh, March 14, 1689, as member for Berwickshire In July 1690 his forfeiture was rescinded by act of parliament, he was soon after sworn a privy councillor, and December 26, 1690, he was created a peer of Scotland by the title of Lord Polwarth In October 1692 he was appointed sheriff of Berwickshire, in November 1693 one of the four extraordinary lords of session, and May 2, 1696, was constituted high-chancellor of Scotland In April 1697 he was created earl of Marchmont, the same year he was appointed one of the commissioners of the treasury and admiralty, and, in 1698, he was appointed lord-high-commissioner to the parliament which met in July of that year In 1702 he represented King William as high-commissioner to the General Assembly, when the death of the king interrupted the proceedings After the accession of Queen Anne he brought in a bill for securing the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover, which was defeated by the prorogation of parliament, and he was soon after deprived of the great seal. He was, subsequently, one of the most influential promoters of the treaty of union After a long life spent in the service of his country, he died at Berwick, August 1, 1724, in the 84th year of his age Besides the Narrative of the Expedition under the earl of Argyle, already mentioned, his correspondence has been published in the Marchmont Papers He wrote also an Essay on Surnames in Collier's Dictionary. His lady, daughter of Sir Thomas Kerr of Cavers, died in 1703 He wrote in her Bible a very affecting testimony to her virtues He had a son, Alexander, who succeeded him (See MARCHMONT, earl of)

HUME, PATRICK, a learned commentator on Milton, and supposed to have belonged to the Polwarth branch of the family of Home or Hume, lived about the close of the seventeenth century The sixth edition of Paradise Lost, published by Tonson in 1695, is illustrated with Notes by him In the fourth volume of Blackwood's Magazine, page 658, number for March 1819, will be found a series of extracts from Hume's Commentary, contrasted with the Notes of Mr Callender of Craigforth, appended to the First Book of Paradise Lost, published by Foulis of Glasgow in 1750

HUME, DAVID, a celebrated historian and philosopher, was born at Edinburgh, April 26, 1711, old style He was the second son of Joseph Home of Ninewells, near Dunse, Berwickshire, and was the first member of the family who adopted the name of Hume His father's family was a branch of the earl of Home's, but of reduced fortune He lost his father in his infancy, and, along with a sister and elder brother, he was reared and educated under the care of his mother, the daughter of Sir David Falconer, Lord Newton, president of the court of session He studied at the university of Edinburgh, and was destined for the law, but his strong passion for literature gave him an insuperable aversion to the legal profession, and, —as he informs us in the memoir called 'My Own Life,' which he wrote shortly before his death, and first published in 1777 by Mr Strahan, to whom he left the manuscript,—while his family believed him to be poring over Voet and Vinnius, he was exclusively occupied with Cicero and Virgil. In 1734, at the persuasion of his friends, he went to Bristol, and entered the office of a respectable merchant in that city, but in a few months he discovered that commercial business was as irksome as the law, and, retiring to France, he resided for some time at Rheims, and afterwards lived for two years at La Fleche, in Anjou, quietly improving himself in literature, and subsisting frugally on his small fortune

In 1737 he went to London with two volumes of his 'Treatise on Human Nature,' which he had composed in his retirement The work was published in 1738, but, as he himself remarks, it "fell dead-born from the press" In 1742 he printed at Edinburgh two volumes of his 'Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary,' prepared while he resided at his brother's house at Ninewells, which met with a more favourable reception In 1745 he was invited to reside with the young marquis of Annandale, whose state of mind at that period rendered a guardian necessary In this situation he remained for a year, and, on the death of Professor Cleghorn, he became a candidate for the vacant chair of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, but failed in his application, on account of his known infidelity.

In 1746 Mr Hume accompanied General St Clair as his secretary in an expedition avowedly against Canada, but which ended in an incursion on the French coast In 1747 he attended the same officer in an embassy to the courts of Vienna and Turin, where he wore the military uniform, in the character of aide-de-camp to the general His appearance at this time is thus described by Lord Charlemont, who met with him at Turin "Nature, I believe, never formed any man more unlike his real character than David Hume The powers of physiognomy were baffled by his countenance, neither could the most skilful in that science pretend to discover the smallest trace of the faculties of his mind, in the unmeaning features of his visage His face was broad and fat, his mouth wide, and without any other expression than that of imbecility His eyes vacant and spiritless, and the corpulence of his whole person was far better fitted to communicate the idea of a turtle-eating alderman than of a refined philosopher. His speech in English was rendered ridiculous by the broadest Scottish accent, and his French was, if possible, still more laughable; so that wisdom, most certainly, never disguised herself before in so uncouth a garb. His wearing a uniform added greatly to his natural awkwardness, for he wore it like a grocer of the train bands. St Clair was a lieutenant-general, and was sent to the courts of Vienna and Turin as a military envoy, to see that their quota of troops was furnished by the Austrians and Piedmontese It was, therefore, thought necessary, that his secretary should appear to be an officer; and Hume was accordingly disguised in scarlet" (Hardy's Life of Lord Charlemont, page 8)

Believing that the neglect of his 'Treatise upon Human Nature' proceeded more from the manner than the matter, he reconstructed the first part of it, and caused it to be published, while he resided at Turin, with the title of an 'Inquiry concerning Human Understanding' It was, however, at the outset, equally unsuccessful with the treatise

On his return from the Continent in 1749, he retired to his brother's house at Ninewells, where he resided for two years In 1751 he repaired to London, where he published the second part of his Treatise remodelled, under the name of 'Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals,' which of all his writings he considered "incomparably the best" The public, however, thought otherwise, and the work, on its appearance, was totally neglected In 1752 he published his 'Political Discourses,' which, says the author, "was the only work of mine that was successful on its first publication" In the same year he succeeded Ruddiman as librarian to the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, an office which gave him the command of an extensive collection of books and MSS, and he now formed the plan of writing the History of England He commenced with the History of the House of Stuart, and on the appearance, in 1754, of the first volume, it was received, to use his own words, "with one cry of reproach, disapprobation, and even of detestation" All sects and parties "united," he says, "in their rage against the man who had presumed to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I and the earl of Strafford" But his equally contemptuous mention of the opposing religious parties, and what Fox calls "his partiality to kings and princes," may rather be considered as the true cause of this outcry Some time afterwards he brought out at London his 'Natural History of Religion,' which was answered in a pamphlet written by Warburton, but attributed to Dr. Hurd In 1756 he published the second volume of his History, embracing the interval from the death of Charles I. to the Revolution, which was more favourably received than the first had been He now resolved to go back to an earlier period, and in 1759 he published his History of the House of Tudor, which excited nearly as much clamour against him as his first volume had done His reputation, however, was now gradually increasing, and he completed his History by the publication of two additional volumes, in 1761 His History of England thenceforth became a standard work Its statements and representations have, however, been ably examined and answered by writers belonging to all parties, and not only his impartiality but his accuracy has frequently with justice been called in question

In 1757 he had relinquished the office of librarian to the faculty of advocates, the salary of which at that time was only about £40 sterling, and by the interest of Lord Bute, he obtained a considerable pension from the Crown In 1763 he attended the earl of Hertford on his embassy to Paris, where he was gratified by a most enthusiastic reception in the fashionable and literary circles of that capital In the summer of 1765 Lord Hertford was recalled to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland, when Mr Hume was appointed secretary to the embassy, and he officiated as chargé d'affaires, until the arrival of the duke of Richmond about the end of the same year In the beginning of 1766 he returned to England, accompanied by Jean Jacques Rousseau, to whom he behaved with a delicacy and generosity which that eccentric individual requited with his usual suspicion and ingratitude He obtained for him from government a pension of £100 a-year, which Rousseau declined to receive, and when he quarrelled with Hume, the latter published the correspondence that had passed between them, with a few explanatory observations

In 1767 Mr Hume was appointed under secretary of state under General Conway, which post he held until the resignation of that minister in 1769 Being now possessed of an income of a thousand per annum, he finally retired to Edinburgh, where he became the head of that brilliant circle of eminent literary men, who then adorned the Scottish metropolis In the spring of 1775 he began to be afflicted with a disorder in his bowels, and for the benefit of his health he went to Bath, accompanied from Morpeth by his attached friends, John Home the author of Douglas, and Dr Adam Smith, who had arrived there from London to be with him On his return to Edinburgh he gave a farewell dinner to his literary friends on the 4th of July 1776 After a tedious illness, sustained by him with singular cheerfulness and equanimity, he died at Edinburgh, August 26th, the same year, in the 65th year of his age His portrait is subjoined

He bequeathed a certain sum for building his tomb, which was afterwards erected in the Calton burying-ground, Edinburgh

Regarding the spelling of his surname he had a good-humoured controversy with John Home, the author of the tragedy of Douglas, and on one occasion he proposed to the latter that they should cast lots to see which name should be adopted by them both "Nay, Mr. Philosopher," said the dramatist, "that is a most extraordinary proposal indeed, for if you lose, you take your own name; and if I lose, I take another man's name." The historian professed to have found authority for Hume instead of Home in the inscription on an old tombstone, and in some other memorials of past times. His own brother, Mr. Home of Ninewells, retained the original spelling of the name. Another point of difference between the dramatist and himself was as to port or claret being the better liquor The historian preferred port, and the dramatist advocated claret as the beverage of the old Scottish gentleman, previous to the Union, before either of them was taxed In reference to these two points of dispute the historian, in a codicil to his will, written with his own hand, thus expresses himself "I leave to my friend John Home of Kilduff, ten dozen of my old claret, at his choice, and one single bottle of that other liquor, called port I also leave to him six dozen of port, provided that he attests, under his hand, signed John Hume, that he has himself alone finished that bottle at two sittings By this concession he will at once terminate the only two differences that ever arose between us concerning temporal matters" This writing is preserved, but not entered on record It is dated 7th August 1776, eighteen days before his death His brother died November 14, 1786 The subject of the following memoir was his second son

HUME, DAVID, an eminent writer on the criminal jurisprudence of Scotland, the second surviving son of John Home, Esq of Ninewells, the brother of David Hume the historian, by his wife Agnes, daughter of Robert Carre, Esq of Cavers, Roxburghshire, was born in 1756 He studied for the bar, and in 1779 passed advocate In 1784 he was appointed sheriff of Berwickshire, and in 1786 professor of Scots Law in the university of Edinburgh Sir Walter Scott, when studying for the bar, attended his classes He copied over his lectures twice with his own hand from notes taken in the class, and he describes Mr Hume, as a lecturer, as "neither wandering into fanciful and abstruse disquisitions which are the more proper subject of the antiquary, nor satisfied with presenting to his pupils a dry and undigested detail of the laws in their present state, but combining the past state of our legal enactments with the present, and tracing clearly and judiciously the changes which took place, and the causes which led to them" In 1793 he became sheriff of Linlithgowshire, in 1811 a principal clerk of the court of session, and in 1822 one of the barons of Exchequer in Scotland, which latter office he held till 1834, when he retired on the statutory allowance The court of Exchequer has been merged in the court of session since 1837 His great work on the criminal law of Scotland has long been considered the text book in that department of jurisprudence, and is constantly referred to as authority both by the bench and the bar. It was published in 1797 in two volumes quarto, under the title of 'Commentaries on the Law of Scotland, respecting the Description and Punishment of Crimes' Baron Hume died at Edinburgh, August 30, 1838 He left in the hands of the secretary of the Royal Society of Edinburgh a valuable collection of manuscripts, and letters belonging or relating to his celebrated uncle, the greater part of which were published in a Life of the historian, by John Hill Burton, Esq advocate, Edinburgh, 1846, 2 vols 8vo

Baron Hume's contributions to the Mirror and Lounger were published in Alexander Chalmers' edition of the British Essayists (1802), and will be found scattered here and there in vols 33 to 40. Not many in number, nowadays they would be considered but of average merit

HUME, JOSEPH, an eminent financial reformer and politician, was born in Montrose, Forfarshire, in January, 1777 A full length statue of him was erected to his memory in his native town in September 1859 His father was the master of a coasting vessel trading from that port, and, after his death, his mother, who was early left a widow, with a large family, kept a little stall in the market-place, for the sale of brown ware, cheap delph, and other articles of "crockery," as such goods are called in Scotland Joseph was a younger son His son, Mr Joseph Burnley Hume, in a memorial of filial piety, written after his father's death, and dated at his grave, says of him

"Benevolent himself, in quenchless hope the earth he trod,
His being one continued act of thanksgiving to God!
And thus a long charmed life he lived, that scarce knew check or fall,
Successful as but few can be and happy beyond all,
Nor will I doubt that e'en on earth, by many a grateful tongue,
At fitting times and seasons shall his meed of praise be sung!
For to his simple soul was given a sturdy common sense
That seized what finer feelings mused, with striking prescience.
To him, by intuition, came high thoughts and bold and new,
And all unawed by custom he embraced the right and true;
And from afar, alone, despite a gibing, roaring throng,
He urged reforms and claimed redress of many a freeman's wrong"

He acquired the rudiments of education, with a little Latin, in his native town About the age of thirteen he was placed apprentice to a surgeon-apothecary there, and remained with him for three years He afterwards studied medicine, first at Aberdeen, and then at Edinburgh, and subsequently "walked the hospitals" in London In 1796 he was admitted a member of the College of Surgeons, Edinburgh, and at the commencement of the following year he was appointed assistant surgeon in the marine service of the East India Company It is stated that, on his second voyage out, when the vessel was crammed with passengers of all classes, conditions, and professions, on the accidental death of the purser, he volunteered to supply his place during the remainder of the voyage, and fulfilled the duties so much to the satisfaction of all on board that, on the arrival of the vessel in Calcutta, the captain, officers, and passengers gave him a public testimonial in acknowledgment of his gratuitous services

He soon gained patrons in India. Observing that few of the Company's servants acquired the native languages, he lost no time in studying them, and soon made himself master of the Hindostanee and Persian He also studied the religions of the East, and the superstitions of that vast and mixed Asiatic population under our sway, a knowledge of whose succession of creeds, moulded into so many sects, is so essential for the proper rule of the millions of India

The authorities early recognised in young Hume a valuable and laborious servant In 1802-3, on the eve of Lord Lake's Mahratta war, much consternation at the seat of government occurred On a discovery that the gunpowder in store was useless from damp, Mr Hume's knowledge of chemistry came fortunately in aid of bad administration. He undertook the restoration of this all important munition of war, and he succeeded He joined the army in Bundelcund in 1801, as surgeon of the 18th native regiment, and was almost immediately selected by Major-general Powell as the interpreter to the commander-in-chief Besides continuing his medical duties, he filled successively important posts in the offices of paymaster and postmaster of the forces, in the prize-agencies, and the commissariat. Not only did he gain high reputation by these multifarious civil employments, but he realized large emoluments, and was publicly thanked by Lord Lake for his efficiency

At the termination of the war in 1807, Mr. Hume returned to the Presidency, and having amassed a fortune of about £40,000, sufficient to justify his retirement from his profession, he resigned his civil employments, and arrived in England in 1808 It was his first intention to settle in the immediate neighbourhood of his native town, but being disappointed in his views of purchasing one of two estates in that vicinity, then in the market, he turned his attention to the active pursuit of mental improvement and the acquirement of practical knowledge In 1809 he made a tour of the United Kingdom, visiting all the principal ports and manufacturing towns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the greater portion of the years 1810 and 1811 he devoted to tours on the Continent, extending his travels to Spain, Portugal, Turkey, Greece, Egypt, the Ionian Isles, and the shores of the Mediterranean

In 1812 he published an English translation, in blank verse, of Dante's "Inferno," 8vo In January of the same year, on the death of Sir John Lowther Johnstone, Bart, the patron of the borough and one of its members, Mr Hume was elected, under the old unreformed system, M P for Weymouth, and entered the House of Commons as a tory, taking his seat on the Treasury bench, as a supporter of the Perceval administration The deceased baronet's solicitor, who was one of his trustees, introduced him to the constituency for a valuable consideration In parliament he soon distinguished himself, particularly by his opposition to the Frame-work Knitters' Bill, which was a formidable attempt to coerce the masters of Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire to the orders of the workmen, on which occasion he received the thanks of the manufacturers

On the dissolution of parliament the following autumn, the patrons of the borough refused him re-election, although he had bargained for a second return The matter was submitted to arbitration, when he obtained a portion of the money back, for the breach of contract

He did not again obtain a seat in parliament till 1818, when he was returned for the Aberdeen burghs. In the interval he was not idle. He was an active member of the Central Committee of the Lancastrian school system, and became deeply interested in the promotion of the moral and intellectual interests of the working classes, and in the improvement of their physical condition. He also published a pamphlet advocating the establishment of savings' banks. He was very ambitious of a seat in the directorship of the East India Company, and although invariably unsuccessful in his efforts for election, he was indefatigable, in the meetings of the proprietary, in the constant exposure of Indian abuses, and in asserting the right of free trade to India, when the charter of the East India Company of 1793 was expiring He was the first man in London who had the courage to maintain that the trade to India ought to be free to the British merchants, and that the opening of the trade would be advantageous to the Company and the nation In a speech which he made at the India house in 1813, he foretold that, instead of the exports and imports between British India and Great Britain being limited to 15 or 18,000 tons, they would, by the opening of the trade, increase to 100,000 tons in a few years From papers laid before parliament it appears that in 1817, four years after even the conditional and restricted opening of the trade, the free tonnage to India had actually exceeded the latter amount The entire opening of the trade did not take place till the 22d April 1834

During his canvass for a seat in the direction at the India house, he became acquainted with the lady destined to be his wife He had obtained an introduction to a proprietor who had four votes, Mr Burnley of Guildford Street, London, a gentleman of great influence, and his forcible representation of Indian abuses, and of the advantages that would accrue to the stockholders by his being elected a director, established him in the good graces of the old gentleman, and, what was of more value, in those of his daughter, whom he afterwards married

In the parliament which met on the 14th January 1819, Mr Hume represented the Aberdeen district of burghs, comprehending, besides that city, his native town of Montrose, with Brechin, Bervie, and Arbroath The whole electors of these then self-elect burghs, members of close corporations, did not at that time exceed a hundred persons. When formerly in parliament, Mr Hume, fresh from India, and accustomed to regard the existing tory administration as the perfection of government, gave it his strenuous support But his reforming and progressive tendencies had since then detached him from the ranks of the tories, and aided by the first Lord Panmure and by the liberal party of the north of Scotland, in a desperate struggle he beat the boroughmongers, and obtained his return This was the stepping-stone to his permanent and independent position in the House of Commons.

In 1830, he was elected, without opposition, member for the county of Middlesex, for which he continued to sit till the dissolution of parliament in 1837 In July of that year, Colonel Wood defeated him by a small majority In the same month, on the nomination of Mr Daniel O'Connell, whose influence was unbounded in Ireland, he was returned for Kilkenny At the general election of 1841, Mr Hume was a candidate for Leeds, but without success In the following year, on the retirement of Mr Chalmers of Auldbar from Montrose, he was elected for that burgh, and he continued to represent his native town till his death

During the long period he was in parliament, he was one of the most laborious and indefatigable members of the house His speeches alone, during thirty-seven years, occupy volumes of 'Hansard's Debates' He was a strenuous and consistent reformer of abuses, an enemy of monopoly, and the most determined and vigilant advocate of economy and retrenchment that ever sat in the legislature As a financial reformer, indeed, he never had an equal He proposed sweeping and repeated plans of reform of the army, the navy, and the ordnance, and of almost every civil department, of the established churches and ecclesiastical courts, of the laws, civil and criminal, of the system of public accounts, of general taxation, duties, and customs It was entirely owing to Mr Hume's exertions that the public accounts came to be presented in an intelligible form, and that the sinking fund system was abandoned He early advocated the abolition of flogging in the army, naval impressment, and imprisonment for debt. He carried the repeal of the old combination laws, the prohibition of the export of machinery, and the act which prevented workmen from leaving the country. He gave his strenuous aid to the Catholic emancipation act of 1829, the repeal of the test and corporation acts, and the Reform Bill of 1832 In the latter year, when the ministry of Earl Grey, who passed that act, was in power, he declared in the House of Commons that he "would vote black to be white rather than risk the existence of the ministry" For this he was exposed to much abuse at the time He was a member of every liberal and radical club and association that was then in active operation

Notwithstanding his stern denunciations of the waste of the public money, he gave his warm and hearty support to every proposal for voting the supplies in the cause of education, or to promote the recreation of the people In the public service he turned his house into an office, and at times, at his own expense, engaged several clerks to assist him in his labours He was never without a secretary He took an active part in every public institution which he thought might be useful to the country, and there was scarcely a society for the improvement of the condition of the people but he subscribed to, and paid his subscriptions Among the last "motions" placed by him on the notice book of the House of Commons was one for more widely extending the benefits of the British Museum and other exhibitions of science and art He served on more committees of the House than any other member In the Select Committee on the Military, Ordnance, and Commissariat Expenditure, he astonished his colleagues by the intelligence and acuteness of his examination of witnesses. On some expression of surprise in the committee, he observed, "You forget I was once commissary general to an army of 12,000 men in India!" Mr. Hume's political character was, on one occasion, thus summed up on the hustings of Middlesex by Lord Robert Grosvenor, "He is one of the fairest men in the House of Commons. He has passed the whole of a long life in serving the people, without fee or reward"

Until the close of the session of 1854 his natural force seemed unimpaired. He died at his seat of Burnley Hall, Norfolk, on 20th February 1855, aged 78. His last words were "Thank God, I have neither ache nor pain, nor any kind of uneasiness:—only the machine is wearing out." He was buried at Kensal Green cemetery. At the time of his death, he was a deputy lieutenant of Middlesex, a magistrate of Westminster and the counties of Middlesex and Norfolk, a vice-president of the Society for the encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, and a member of the Board of Agriculture He was also a fellow of the Royal Society and of the Royal Asiatic Society As one of the Corresponding board of directors of the Society for the Propagation of Christianity in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and as a governor of the Scottish Corporation in London, he always evinced a lively interest in what concerned his native country

Hunter, a surname obviously derived from the chase, and from the great superiority of the Normans in the sports of the field, it is supposed, on good grounds, that the families of this surname in Scotland are of Norman extraction They are accustomed to carry in their armorial bearings three dogs of chase with three hunting horns. "In the castles and domains," says Robertson, "of the great barons, who were 'lords of entire bailiwicks,' appropriated frequently for the accommodation of the sovereign, it appears that various offices exclusively belonging to the sports of the field existed. Johne le Hunter de la Foreste de Paisley, and Hugh and Richard, the hunters of Stragrife (Renfrewshire), appear in the Rag Roll Caled. in p 118, as also does Aylmer de la Hunter of the county of Ayr" [Ayrshire Families, vol iii p. 168.] The office, whatever it was, held by the original bearers of this name, is supposed to have been similar to that of forester, from the fact that the motto of the Foresters of Corstorphine (now represented by the earls of Verulam, in England) was "Hunter! blow your horn" In the remarks on the Ragman Roll, the Aylmer de la Hunter above mentioned is said to be the ancestor, "for certain, of the Hunters of Arneil, designed of Hunterston and of that ilk."

Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i. p. 332) says: "As for the antiquity of the name, Gulielmus Venator, (which I take for Hunter,) is a witness in the charter of erection of the bishopric of Glasgow by David I, when he was prince of Cumberland. In a charter of King Alexander II., of the lands of Manners to William Baddeley, upon the resignation of Nicol Corbat of these lands and others, the lands of Norman Hunter are exempted, as the charter bears 'Quas Nicolaus Corbat nobis reddidit, excepta terra quondam Normani Venatoris quam Malcolmus frater Regis Willielmi ei dedit.' For which see the Haddington Collections."

The most ancient families of the name in Scotland were the Hunters of Polmood in Peebles-shire, and the Hunters of Hunterston in Ayrshire. With regard to the former, which is now extinct, Dr Pennecuik, in his Description of Tweeddale, has inserted a copy (of a translation) of a charter, pretending to be from Malcolm Canmore, to the ancestor of the family, which, says Robertson, if not a foolish translation of a genuine charter, is certainly framed on the traditionary story of the origin of the family, and even in that light possesses considerable interest. It is in these words: "I Malcolm Kenmure, king, the first of my reign, gives to thee Normand Hunter of Powmood, the Hope up and down, above the earth to heaven, and below the earth to hell, as free to thee and thine as ever God gave it to me and mine, and that for a bow and a broad arrow when I come to hunt in Yarrow

> And for the mair saith,
> I byte the white wax with my tooth,
> Before thir witnesses three,
> May, Maald, and Marjorie."

A subsequent writer says, "From the strictest inquiry no such charter exists, though there is strong presumption that William the Lyon did make a similar grant of lands to Norman Hunter, a refugee, who having followed William the Conqueror into England, fled from the arbitrary oppression of his successors to seek shelter in Scotland."

Thomas Hunter of Polmood, who died 20th March 1765, had executed a disposition and deed of entail on the 28th of the previous January, in favour of Alexander Hunter, merchant in Edinburgh, who, though bearing the same name, was no relation As this deed was executed on deathbed, it was liable to reduction, if an heir could be found Thomas Hunter, the last possessor of the estate, was descended from a natural son of Robert Hunter of Polmood, who died in 1689 The estate had been destined to the bastard and the heirs of his body, with a special declaration that, in the event of failure, it should return to the granter, his nearest heirs male, and assignees whatsoever On the death of Thomas Hunter two persons came forward, each claiming to be the heir to the estate, one an old man called Adam Hunter, and the other a man of the name of Taylor, who afterwards withdrew his claim After nearly fifty years' litigation, both the court of session and the House of Lords, to which the case had been appealed, decided that Adam Hunter had not established his pedigree. An ancient prediction that "The Hunters of Polmood were never to prosper," seems in this case to have been verified Mr Alexander Hunter died at Edinburgh, 22d January 1786, and was succeeded by his nephew, Walter Hunter, Esq of Polmood and Crailing, whose eldest daughter, Elizabeth, the wife of the eighteenth Lord Forbes, came into possession of Polmood.

Of the Hunterston line, Crawford (Officers of State, p. 360 Note) says that he had "very carefully perused their writs," and that "from charters they appear to have had at least a part of the estate they possess in Cunningham while the Morvilles were lords of that country, as far back as the reign of Alexander II" (between 1214 and 1249) From Mungo or Quintegern Hunter, the tenth in possession of Hunterston, and the ninth in direct descent from Norman le Hunter above mentioned, descended the Hunters of Abbotshill. Andrew Hunter, D D, the eighth of this family, was the eldest son of Andrew Hunter, Esq of Park, writer to the signet, and Grisel Maxwell, a daughter of General Maxwell of Cardoness, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, one of those who, at the Revolution, accompanied the prince of Orange to England. He was born at Edinburgh in 1748, and having studied for the church, was in 1767 licensed by the presbytery of Edinburgh In 1770 he was presented to the New church of Dumfries, and soon after he sold Abbotshill, and purchased Barjarg in Nithsdale, which had previously belonged to James Erskine of Barjarg and Alva—one of the lords of session—and which is now the designation of the elder branch of the Hunterston family In 1779 Dr Hunter was presented to the New Greyfriars church, Edinburgh, and whilst there, was appointed the colleague of Dr. Hamilton in the divinity professorship of the university. In 1786 he was translated to the Tron church of that city. Several of his sermons on particular occasions have been published. He died on 21st April 1809 By his wife Marion Shaw, eldest daughter of the sixth Lord Napier, he had four children. His eldest son, William Francis Hunter of Barjarg, advocate, married Jane St. Aubyn, daughter and eventually heiress of Francis St. Aubyn of Collin-Mixton, by Jane Arundel, coheiress of the Arundels of Tolverne and Truthall in Cornwall, and through them representative of the earls of Devon. In compliance with the wishes of his wife, he assumed the name of Arundel. Dr Hunter's youngest son, the Rev John Hunter, was appointed in 1832, one of the ministers of the Tron church, Edinburgh From the Hunters of Abbotshill, the Hunters of Doonholm and Bonnytown, Ayrshire, the Hunters of Thurston, East Lothian, and the Hunters of Brownhill, of whom Sir David Hunter Blair of Blairquhan, Ayrshire, is the head, are descended

The above-mentioned Mungo Hunter of Hunterston's eldest son, Robert, succeeded to the estate, and was one of the Ayrshire gentlemen who subscribed the band in defence of the reformed religion, 4th September, 1562 His grandson, Patrick Hunter of Hunterston, was a member of the committee of war for Ayrshire during the troubled time of 1647; and, in 1662, he was fined £600, by one of the arbitrary acts of the earl of Middleton His third son, Francis, is supposed to have been ancestor of the Hunters of Long Calderwood in Lanarkshire, of which family was the celebrated Dr William Hunter and his brother John, the eminent surgeon and anatomist, memoirs of whom are subsequently given (see pages 512 and 513) Their sister, Jane, was the mother of the celebrated Dr Matthew Baillie, and the distinguished poetess Joanna Baillie. (For memoirs of whom see volume I of this work, pages 180 and 188)

Patrick's eldest son, Robert Hunter of Hunterston, had four sons. The second son, Robert, acquired by purchase in 1686, the lands of Kirkland, Ayrshire, and was the ancestor of that family The fourth son, John, was father of General Robert Hunter, who died governor of Jamaica in 1734, and was ancestor,—by his lady, Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Orby of Burton Pedwardine in the county of Lincoln, baronet, and widow of Lord John Hay, second son of the second marquis of Tweeddale,—of the Orby-Hunters of Croyland Abbey, Lincolnshire.

Robert Hunter of Hunterston, who died in 1796, left a daughter, Eleonora, who married her cousin, Robert Caldwell He assumed the name of Hunter, having in his wife's right become proprietor of the estate of Hunterston Charles Hunter, Esq, great grandson of David, younger brother of Robert, represents this branch in the male line.

The first Hunter of Burnside, or "the lands and barony of the Dod," Forfarshire, David Hunter, is noted as having, when a member of the Scots Estates, protested against the delivering up of Charles I to the English parliament in January 1647 A descendant of his, the Mr Hunter of Burnside of that day, was "out" in the rebellion of 1745, and afterwards escaped to France. He is mentioned in 'Roderick Random.' He was killed by a Frenchman in a brawl. His grandson, General David Hunter of Burnside, married a daughter of William Douglas, Esq of Brigton, Forfarshire, a descendant of Archibald fifth earl of Angus, called 'Bell-the-Cat,' and great-granddaughter of Robert Douglas, bishop of Dunblane, who was deprived of his see at the Revolution. She died in 1846. Her son, Major William Hunter, younger of Burnside, was military secretary at Sidney, when Sir Richard Bourke was governor of New South Wales. He afterwards went to India, as aide-de-camp to his uncle, General George Hunter, in Scinde, and died there in 1845, before his father, General David Hunter of Burnside. His eldest son, David Hunter, succeeded to the estate, and died at Prospect-hill, Douglas, Isle of Man, October 1st, 1847, aged 26 years, leaving a son, William George Hunter, born at Prospect-hill, Isle of Man, on the 5th May preceding.

HUNTER, WILLIAM, M D, an eminent physician and lecturer on anatomy, elder brother of the celebrated John Hunter, a memoir of whom follows, was born May 23, 1718, at Long Calderwood, Lanarkshire His father, whose grandfather was a younger son of Hunter of Hunterston, was proprietor of the estate of Calderwood, and he was the seventh of ten children With the intention of studying for the church, he was, at the age of fifteen, sent to the university of Glasgow, where he spent five years But having become acquainted with Dr Cullen, then established in practice in Hamilton, he changed his views, and devoted himself to the profession of medicine In 1737 he went to reside with Dr Cullen, and remained with him for three years, when it was agreed that, after completing his studies, he should be received into partnership with him In November 1740 he repaired to Edinburgh, to attend the medical classes, and in the ensuing spring proceeded to London, and at first lived as a pupil in the house of Dr Smellie, the accoucheur Having become known through a letter of introduction from Mr Foulis, printer in Glasgow, to his countryman, Dr James Douglas, that eminent physician engaged him as an assistant in making dissections for a splendid work on the Anatomy of the Bones, which he was then preparing for publication Dr Douglas died in the following year, but Hunter continued to reside in the family to superintend the education of his son During this period he attended the anatomical classes in St George's Hospital.

In 1745 Mr. Hunter communicated a paper to the Royal Society, respecting the structure of the cartilages of the human body; and in the following winter he commenced a course of lectures on surgery and anatomy In 1747 he was admitted a member of the college of surgeons; and in the subsequent spring he accompanied his pupil on a tour through Holland to Paris. On this occasion he visited the anatomical museum of the great Albinus at Leyden

In 1750 he obtained the degree of M.D. from the university of Glasgow, on which he quitted Dr. Douglas' family, and, taking a house in Jermyn Street, began to practise as a physician. He had previously practised surgery and midwifery, and was appointed accoucheur to the British Lying-in Hospital. He now relinquished the surgical department of his profession, and soon became the first accoucheur in London In 1756 he was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of physicians, and was soon after elected a member of the Medical Society. In the first volume of their 'Observations and Inquiries,' published in 1757, appears Dr Hunter's History of an Aneurism of the Aorta, and he was an important contributor to the subsequent publications of the Society In 1762 he published his 'Medical Commentaries,' and subsequently added a supplement, the object of which was to vindicate his claim to some anatomical discoveries, in opposition to Dr Munro, secundus, and others. The same year he was consulted on the pregnancy of Queen Charlotte, and in 1764 was named one of the physicians extraordinary to her majesty In 1767 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, to which, the year following, he communicated his Observations on the Bones of a supposed Mammoth, found near the river Ohio, in America. In 1768 he became a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and the same year, at the institution of the Royal Academy of Arts, he was appointed by his majesty professor of anatomy The most elaborate and splendid of his publications, 'The Anatomy of the Human Gravid Uterus,' folio, illustrated by thirty-four large plates, appeared in 1775 In 1778 he published 'Reflections on the Section of the Symphysis Pubis,' designed to show the inutility of that surgical operation In 1780 he was chosen a foreign associate of the Royal Medical Society at Paris, and in 1782 of the Royal Academy of Sciences in that city On the death of Dr Fothergill, in January 1781, he was unanimously elected president of the Royal College of physicians of London. His portrait, painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, is preserved in the Hunterian Museum, Glasgow An unfinished painting by Toffany, represents him in the act of giving a lecture on the muscles, at the royal academy, surrounded by a group of academicians.

He is described as having been in person "regularly shaped, but of slender make, and rather below the middle stature" Devoting himself entirely to his profession, he was remarkable for his simple, frugal, and temperate habits When he invited company to dinner he seldom offered them more than two dishes, and he was often heard to say that "a man who cannot dine on one dish deserves to have no dinner" A single glass of wine was handed to each of his guests, and so finished the repast He was an early riser, and spent all his leisure time in his Museum He ever retained a warm feeling for his native country, and on one of his visits to Scotland, before he became famous, as he and Dr Cullen were riding one day in Lanarkshire, the latter pointed out to him his native place, Long Calderwood, at a considerable distance, remarking how conspicuous it appeared "Well," said he energetically, "if I live I shall make it more conspicuous"

Having, by his extensive practice and economical habits, acquired a large fortune, he determined to set apart what was sufficient for his own wants, and devote the remainder of his wealth, which continued to accumulate, to the founding of a museum Accordingly, in 1770, he purchased a spot of ground in Great Windmill Street, London, where he built a house and anatomical theatre, and collected a most extensive and magnificent museum, which, after his death, was valued at £150,000 It consisted of specimens of human and comparative anatomy, fossils, shells, corals, and other curious subjects of natural history, with the most splendid collection of Greek and Latin books that had been accumulated by any person since the days of Dr Mead It was also enriched by a cabinet of ancient coins and medals, for the duplicates of which government paid his executors £40,000, and added them to those in the British Museum Of a part of this collection, his friend Dr Combe published an accurate catalogue in 4to, in 1783

Dr Hunter had been subject to attacks of irregular gout since 1773, and at one time he intended to pass the remainder of his days in retirement in his native country; but the expenses of his museum prevented him from relinquishing his practice He died, unmarried, at London, March 30, 1783, bequeathing the whole of his extensive museum to the university of Glasgow, with £8,000 in cash for an appropriate building for its reception, and a further sum of £500 per annum to bear the charges of its preservation

One of his sisters had married the Rev James Baillie, professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, and was the mother of the celebrated Dr Matthew Baillie, and Joanna Baillie the eminent poetess The family property of Long Calderwood was left to his nephew, Dr Baillie, who generously gave it to John Hunter, who had unfortunately had a quarrel with his brother some years before —Dr William Hunter's works are

surgeon, and medical writer, younger brother of the preceding, was born at Long Calderwood, of which his father was proprietor, parish of Kilbride, Lanarkshire, February 13, or, according to some accounts, July 14, 1728 The former is the date in the parish register He was the youngest of ten children, and at the time of his birth his father was nearly seventy years of age His education was neglected, and it appears that when about the age of seventeen he went to Glasgow, and assisted his brother-in-law, a Mr Buchanan, in his trade as a cabinetmaker Hearing of the success of his elder brother, William, in London, he offered his services to him as an anatomical assistant, and was invited by him to the metropolis, where he arrived in September 1748 Having immediately entered upon the study of surgery, first at Chelsea Hospital, and afterwards at St Bartholomew's, his improvement was so rapid, that in the winter of 1749 he was able to undertake the charge of the dissecting-room In 1753 he entered as a gentleman commoner in St Mary's Hall, Oxford, and the following year he became surgeon's pupil at St George's Hospital, London In 1755 he was admitted to a partnership in the lectures delivered by his brother, when, applying himself assiduously to the acquirement of a knowledge of practical anatomy, he extended his inquiries from the human body to the structure of the inferior animals, and procured from the Tower, and from the keepers of menageries, subjects for dissection

His health became so much impaired by his constant application, that he was obliged to retire from the dissecting-room, and, in May 1756, he became house surgeon of St George's hospital In October 1760 he was appointed, by Mr Adair, surgeon in the army, and in 1761 was at the siege of Belleisle In the subsequent year he accompanied the army to Portugal, and served as senior surgeon on the staff till the peace in 1763, when he returned to England on half-pay, and immediately commenced practice. Having purchased a piece of ground at Brompton, about two miles from London, he there formed a menagerie, and carried on his experiments in a house which he built, for the purpose of studying the habits and organisation of animals. In the beginning of 1767 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. The year following he was appointed surgeon to St. George's Hospital. Among others of his house pupils was the celebrated Dr Jenner, the introducer of vaccine inoculation, who boarded in his house in 1770 and 1771 Mr Hunter's first publication, a treatise 'On the Natural History of the Teeth,' appeared in 1771 In the winter of 1773 he commenced a course of lectures on the theory and principles of surgery, in which he developed some of those peculiar doctrines which he afterwards explained more fully in his printed works His profound acquaintance with anatomy rendered him a bold and expert operator, but his fame chiefly rests on his researches concerning comparative anatomy In January 1776 he was appointed surgeon extraordinary to the king

In 1781 Mr Hunter was chosen a member of the Royal Society of Sciences and Belles Lettres at Gottenburg, and in 1783 of the Royal Society of Medicine and Academy of Surgery at Paris In the latter year he purchased a leasehold in Leicester Square, where he erected a building for his museum, lecture-room, &c. He now became one of the first surgeons in London, and acquired an extensive practice With his friend, the celebrated Dr Fordyce, he instituted a medical society, called the Lyceum Medicum Londinense, the meetings of which were held in his own lecture rooms In 1786 he was appointed deputy-surgeon-general to the army, and the same year he published his celebrated work on the venereal disease. About the same time appeared a quarto volume by him, entitled 'Observations on Various Parts of the Animal Economy,' consisting of physiological essays, most of which had been inserted in the Philosophical Transactions. Having, at various times, read before the Royal Society many valuable communications, in 1787 he received the gold Copley medal. In July of the same year he was chosen a member of the American Philosophical Society. On the death of Mr Adair, in 1789, he was appointed inspector-general of hospitals, and surgeon-general to the army, and about the same time was admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland. In 1792 he was elected an honorary member of the Chirurgico-Physical Society of Edinburgh, and became one of the vice-presidents of the Veterinary College, then just projected in London The last of his publications that he prepared for the press was his 'Treatise on the Blood, Inflammation, and Gun-shot Wounds,' which was published posthumously in 1794, with an account of his Life by his brother-in-law, Sir Everard Home, who had been for six years a pupil in his house, after Mr Hunter's marriage to his sister, and in the last years of his life became his assistant, and also succeeded him in the lecture room Mr Hunter died suddenly in the Board Room of St George's hospital, October 16, 1793, in the 64th year of his age He had long been afflicted with an organic disease, which on occasions of excitement, affected his head and his memory, and brought on severe spasms, and, on a post mortem examination of his body, it was discovered that, among other morbid changes that had occurred, the arteries both of the heart and brain had undergone ossification His museum was purchased by Government for £15,000, and transferred to the Royal College of Surgeons for the benefit of science His portrait is subjoined

He had married, in 1771, the daughter of Mr Robert Home, surgeon in the army, by whom he had two children. His widow, who was an accomplished lyric poetess, and the authoress of 'The Son of Alknomook,' and 'Queen Mary's Lament,' which, with other pieces, were collected into a volume, and published in 1806, survived him till January 7, 1821 —Mr Hunter's works are·

HUNTER, HENRY, D D, a distinguished divine, was born, of poor parents, at Culross, in 1741 After studying theology at the university of Edinburgh, he became tutor to Mr. Alexander Boswell, afterwards a judge of the court of session, under the title of Lord Balmuto, and, subsequently, he was employed in the same capacity in the family of the earl of Dundonald. In 1764 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and two years afterwards was ordained one of the ministers of South Leith In 1769 he visited London, when his sermons attracted so much attention that he received a call from the Scots congregation in Swallow Street, Piccadilly, which he declined, but, in 1771, he accepted an invitation from the congregation at London Wall, and about the same time received from the university of Edinburgh the degree of D D He first published several single sermons, preached on different occasions, which, with some miscellaneous pieces, appeared in a collected form in two volumes after his death In 1788 he published the first volume of his 'Sacred Biography, or the History of the Patriarchs, and Jesus Christ,' which was completed in seven volumes, and has gone through several editions Having entered upon a translation of Lavater's writings on 'Physiognomy,' he visited that celebrated philosopher in Switzerland, and, in 1789, he published the first number of the work, which ultimately extended to five volumes 4to, embellished with above eight hundred engravings, the cost price of each copy being thirty pounds! In 1793 he reprinted a Discourse, by Robert Fleming, first published in 1701, 'On the Rise and Fall of the Papacy,' supposed to contain some prophetic allusions to the events of the French Revolution, which has frequently been reprinted since He had likewise begun the publication, in parts, of a popular 'History of London,' which his death prevented him from completing Dr Hunter was for many years secretary to the corresponding board of the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge in the Highlands and Islands, and chaplain to the Scots corporation in London He died October 27, 1802, in the 62d year of his age, leaving a widow, with two sons and a daughter

HUNTER, JOHN, LL D, an eminent classical scholar and philologist, the son of a respectable farmer in the upper district of Nithsdale, was born in 1747 While yet a boy, he was left an orphan in straitened circumstances, but received a sound elementary education, and studied at the university of Edinburgh, supporting himself by teaching, like many others similarly situated, who afterwards attained to a high rank in literature His scholarship attracted the notice of Lord Monboddo, who for some time employed him as his clerk In 1775 he was elected, by competition, professor of humanity in St Andrews, and he continued to teach that class till the close of the session 1826-27, a period of more than half a century, when he was appointed principal of the united college of St Salvador and St Leonard In 1797 he published a correct and valuable edition of Horace, extended into two volumes in 1813 In 1799 he brought out an edition of the works of Virgil, with Notes. He also published an annotated edition of Livy, and composed an invaluable disquisition on the Verb, printed as an Appendix to Ruddiman's Rudiments An extremely beautiful and subtle grammatical essay, written by him, 'On the Nature, Import and Effect of certain Conjunctions,' is inserted in the Edinburgh Philosophical Transactions, 1788 The article 'Grammar,' in the seventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, contains a digest of his most valuable speculations regarding the Nature of the Relative Pronoun, the Tenses of the Verb, &c., chiefly collected from his own verbal communications, by the then sub-editor of that extensive and useful work

Dr Hunter died of cholera, January 18, 1837, in the 91st year of his age He married while in the employment of Lord Monboddo, and left a large family

HUNTER, WILLIAM, a medical writer and naturalist, was born in Montrose, and studied at Marischal college and university, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M A in 1777 He served an apprenticeship to a surgeon, with whom he remained four years, and after acquiring a thorough knowledge of medicine, he obtained a situation on board an East Indiaman, from which he was transferred in 1781 to the East India Company's medical establishment at Bengal Between 1784 and 1794 he acted as secretary to the Asiatic Society, and professor and examiner at the college of Calcutta, and also as surgeon to Major Palmer's embassy with Dowlat Raj Scindia, in which capacities he had the best opportunities of studying the languages and literature of India From 1794 to 1806 he was surgeon of the marines, and for some years inspector-general of hospitals in the island of Java He died of a fever in India in 1815, when preparing to return to Scotland, after an absence of 38 years —His works are

HUNTLY, Earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1449 on Alexander de Seton, the elder of the two sons of Elizabeth Gordon, only daughter and heiress of Sir Adam Gordon, lord of Gordon, who fell at Homeldon, 14th September, 1402 (see vol i p 818), by her husband Alexander de Seton, second son of Sir William Seton of Seton, descended from a sister of Robert the Bruce. Alexander de Seton and his wife, Elizabeth de Gordon, received a charter from Robert duke of Albany, dated 20th July 1408, in liferent, with remainder to the heirs to be procreated between them, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the said Elizabeth, of the lands and baronies of Gordon and Huntly, and others in Berwickshire, Strabogie, and Boldy-Gordon, Aberdeenshire, and all other lands which had belonged to her said father Her husband was, in consequence, thenceforth styled lord of Gordon and Huntly

Their elder son, Alexander de Seton, lord of Gordon, previous to being created earl of Huntly, was one of the Scots nobles who attended the princess Margaret, of Scotland, daughter of James I., to France, in 1436, on her marriage to the dauphin, Louis, son of Charles VII. The following year, after the murder of King James I. at Perth, he was appointed ambassador to England, to treat of a peace. In 1449 he was created Earl of Huntly Between 1451 and 1458, he was employed in several negotiations to the court of England, and on May 18, 1452, he defeated the earl of Crawford in the neighbourhood of Brechin, that nobleman being then in rebellion against James II The action is called the battle of Brechin, though the spot on which it was fought is not in the parish of that name, but a little to the north-east of it. Two years afterwards the earls of Moray and Ormond, brothers of the earl of Douglas, having excited a rebellion in the north, he raised a force against them, but was defeated at Dunkinty Soon after, however, he forced them to take refuge in the western isles. He died 15th July 1470, and was buried at Elgin, where a monument was erected to his memory He was thrice married By his first wife, Jean, daughter and heiress of Robert de Keith, grandson and heir-apparent of Sir William de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, with whom he got a large estate, he had no issue His second wife, Egidia, daughter and heiress of Sir John Hay of Tullibody, Clackmannanshire, bore to him a son, Sir Alexander Seton, who inherited his mother's estate, and was ancestor of the Setons of Touch By his third wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of William, Lord Crichton, high-chancellor of Scotland, he had three sons and three daughters, who took the name of Gordon, for on the issue of the third marriage, the succession to the earldom of Huntly was settled by charter, dated 29th January 1449-50 The eldest son became, in consequence, second earl The second son, Sir Alexander Gordon of Midmar, was ancestor of the Gordons of Abergeldie Adam, the third son, was dean of Caithness and rector of Pettie.

George Gordon, second earl of Huntly, the eldest son of the third marriage of his father, was one of the conservators of the peace with England in 1484 He was one of the privy council of King James III., to whom he, for a long time, firmly adhered, when the great body of the Scots nobility had combined against him In 1488, he and the earl of Crawford were, in open parliament, appointed lords of justiciary north of the river Forth He is said to have, soon after, been instrumental in bringing about a sort of hollow agreement between the confederated nobles and the king at Blackness, but in consequence of James not fulfilling some of the concessions involved in it, he quitted that unhappy monarch and joined the rebellious lords; though he was always opposed to any violent measure. On the accession of James IV., in June of that year, he was sworn of his privy council, and empowered to repress disorders in the northern parts of the kingdom during the king's minority On 13th May, 1491, he was constituted his majesty's lieutenant in the northern parts of Scotland beyond the river Northesk. In 1498, he was appointed high-chancellor of Scotland, which office he resigned in 1502, and died soon after. He was twice married first, to the princess Annabella, daughter of King James I and widow of the earl of Angus, by whom he had, with six daughters, four sons; and secondly, to Lady Elizabeth Hay, eldest daughter of William, first earl of Errol, relict of Patrick, master of Gray, without issue. His sons, by his first marriage, were 1 Alexander, third earl. 2. Adam, lord of Aboyne, who married Elizabeth, countess of Sutherland, and in her right became earl of Sutherland (see SUTHERLAND, earl of). 3. Sir William Gordon, ancestor of the Gordons of Gight, killed at Flodden 9th September 1513. From this personage Lord Byron, the celebrated poet, was descended through his mother, Catherine Gordon, only child of George Gordon, Esq of Gight. 4 James Gordon of Letterfourie, admiral of the fleet in 1513. The eldest daughter, Lady Catherine Gordon, married in 1496, by direction of James IV., Perkin Warbeck, the pretended duke of York, who had taken refuge in the Scottish court, and after invading England was taken and executed by order of Henry VII. in 1499 That monarch, struck with the beauty, virtues, and misfortunes of Lady Catherine, recommended her to the charge of his queen, and assigned to her a pension, which she long enjoyed. She was popularly styled the White Rose, the badge of her husband's claim She married, secondly, Sir Matthew Craddock, in Wales, ancestor of the earls of Pembroke.

Alexander, third earl of Huntly, the eldest son, received from the Crown, large grants of land in Banffshire, Lochaber, and Strathearn In 1505, a rebellion having broken out in the Isles, he was sent by James IV to invade them on the north, while the king himself led an army against them in person from the south, when many of the chieftains submitted to the royal authority The following year Huntly stormed the castle of Stornoway in Lewis, the stronghold of Torquil Macleod, the great head of the rebellion He was one of the guarantees of a treaty of peace with the English in 1509, and a privy councillor He accompanied James to the fatal field of Flodden, 9th September 1513, and was one of the nobles who endeavoured to dissuade him from risking a battle. Hollinshed says that this earl of Huntly was held in the highest reputation of all the Scots nobility, "for his valiancy, joined with wisdom and policy" In that memorable battle, so disastrous to his countrymen, he commanded, with Lord Home, the van of the Scots army, assisted by his two brothers, Adam, earl of Sutherland, and Sir William Gordon of Gight. Huntly and Home charged the right wing of the English, under Sir Edmund Howard, with so much impetuosity that it was speedily put to flight. With his brother the earl of Sutherland, he escaped the carnage of that dreadful day, although Tytler, (Hist. of Scotland, vol v p. 81,) with his usual inaccuracy, mentions him among the slain

In the parliament which met at Perth in October, when the regency was committed to the queen-mother, it was determined that she should be guided by the counsels of the earls of Huntly and Angus, and Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow During the minority of James V., Huntly was the most influential lord in the north, and in 1517, on the regent Albany's departure for France, he was appointed one of the council of regency By patent dated 26th February 1518, he was constituted the king's lieutenant over all Scotland, except the west Highlands. In 1523, he excused himself from joining, with his vassals, the force which Albany had collected for the invasion of England, on the ground of indisposition, and when Albany finally left Scotland, the same year, Huntly was again appointed one of the members of the regency He died at Perth 16th January 1524. He was twice married first, to Lady Johanna Stewart, eldest daughter of John earl of Athol, brother uterine of King James II., by whom, with two daughters, he had four sons, and, secondly, to a daughter of Lord Gray, widow of the sixth Lord Glammis, by whom he had no issue. His sons, by his first marriage, were, 1. George, who died young. 2. John, Lord Gordon, one of the young noblemen whom Albany carried with him to France in 1517, and who died at the abbey of Kinloss, December 5th the same year, soon after his return to Scotland. By Margaret, his wife, natural daughter of King James IV and Margaret Drummond, Lord Gordon had two sons, George, fourth earl of Huntly, and Alexander, bishop of Galloway, the only Popish prelate who embraced the Reformation, a memoir of whom is given at page 328 of this volume. 3. Alexander, ancestor of the Gordons of Cluny 4. William, bishop of Aberdeen from 1547 to his death in 1577.

George, fourth earl of Huntly, succeeded his grandfather in 1524, being then in his tenth year This nobleman acted a conspicuous part in the historical transactions of his time. From his childhood he was brought up with his uncle, James V, they being nearly of the same age. The earl of Angus, who had then the chief direction of affairs, obtained his guardianship, and intended to have married him to one of his own relations, but his fall in 1528 prevented it. After that event, by the king's express command, he was placed under the care of the most able masters. In 1535, he was sworn of the privy council, and the year following, he was appointed one of the regency during the king's absence in France, when he went to marry the princess Magdalene, daughter of Francis I On the king's return in 1537, he was appointed lieutenant-general of the north, and in 1540 he accompanied the king in his voyage to the Western Isles. He was commander of the forces which defeated Sir Robert Bowes, English warden of the east marches, at Haddon-rig in Teviotdale, 24th August, 1542, taking that commander and 600 of his men prisoners. A larger force, amounting to 30,000 men, under the duke of Norfolk, was in October of the same year, sent into Scotland by Henry VIII, to avenge that defeat, but were kept in check by Huntly, with a force not exceeding 10,000 men

After the death of James V, the earl was sworn a privy councillor to the regent Arran To repress the disorders that had broken out in the Highlands, a special commission was granted to him by Arran, making him lieutenant-general of all the highlands, and of Orkney and Zetland The earl lost no time in raising a large army in the north, with which he marched, in May 1544, against the clan Cameron and the Clanranald and the people of Moydart and Knoydart, who had wasted and plundered the whole country of Urquhart and Glenmorriston, as well as Abertarf, Strathglas, and others, but on his approach they dispersed and retired to their own territories. After the battle of Loch Lochy (see page 262 of this vol) Huntly, at the head of a large force, entered Lochaber, which he laid waste, and apprehended many leading men of the hostile tribes, whom he put to death He was subsequently appointed high-chancellor of Scotland, the great seal being delivered to him in parliament 10th June 1546. He was one of the chief commanders at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547, and being taken prisoner there, was sent first to London and afterwards to Morpeth castle, whence he made his escape in 1548. During his imprisonment, being reproached with opposing the projected marriage between the youthful Queen Mary and Prince Edward, afterwards Edward VI, he excused himself by saying that he did not mislike the match so much as the manner of wooing.

In 1548, on the proposed marriage of Queen Mary to the dauphin of France, he received the order of St Michael from the French monarch. On 12th February 1549, the earl of Huntly had a grant of the earldom of Moray

Being the head of the Scots Catholics at the era of the Reformation, we find him present at the trial for heresy at Edinburgh of Adam Wallace, the martyr, in 1550, and taking a prominent part in the proceedings against him. The promptitude and severity with which he suppressed the insurrections in the north, raised up many enemies against him, and, the same year, as he and his brother, the earl of Sutherland, were about to proceed to France, with the queen-regent, a conspiracy was formed to cut him off, at the head of which was Mackintosh, chief of the clan Chattan The plot being discovered, Huntly ordered Mackintosh to be immediately apprehended and brought to Strathbogie, where he was beheaded On their return from France, the earl was sent by the queen regent, with full authority, on an expedition to the north, for the purpose of apprehending the chief of the Clanranald, who had recommenced his usual course of rapine. Having mustered a considerable force, chiefly Highlanders and of the clan Chattan, he passed into Moydart and Knoydart, but his operations were paralysed by disputes in his camp, and he very soon abandoned the enterprise and returned to the low country (Lesley, p. 251). Attributing the earl's conduct to negligence, the queen-regent committed him a prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, where he remained from October till March. He was compelled to renounce the earldom of Moray and the lordship of Abernethy, with his tacks and possessions in Orkney and Zetland, and the tacks of the lands of the earldom of Mar and of the lordship of Strathdie, of which he was bailie and steward, and condemned to a banishment of five years in France. But as he was about to leave the kingdom, the queen-regent recalled the sentence of banishment, and restored him to the office of chancellor, of which he had been deprived, though she exacted a heavy pecuniary fine from him

In 1554, when the queen-mother was constituted regent, the great seal was taken from Huntly and delivered to Mons. de Rubay, a French advocate, whom she had appointed vice-chancellor, leaving the earl only the name of chancellor He was in the Scots army destined for the invasion of England in Oct. 1557, but the Scots nobles being then opposed to a war with England, the queen regent was obliged to disband her forces. He at first assisted her against the lords of the congregation, and in June 1559, when the army of the protestant lords marched upon Perth, he hastened to entreat them to delay besieging the town for a few days, but was told that it would not be delayed even an hour Soon after, on the part of the queen-regent, he signed the agreement with the protestant lords which led to their evacuation of Edinburgh He afterwards entered into a bond of association with the duke of Chatelherault and the other lords of the reformed party, at the same time stipulating in a separate treaty, for the preservation of his authority and the security of his great possessions in the north. On 25th April 1560, he joined them with 60 horse, and signed the fourth covenant drawn up by the congregation two days after, for their mutual protection and assistance, in which they obliged themselves, not only to support the reformation, but to endeavour to obtain the expulsion of the French from the kingdom The same year the queen-regent, in her last interview with the leaders of the congregation, denounced the crafty and interested advice of the earl of Huntly, who had interrupted the conference at Preston, when she was herself ready to agree to their proposals. In the famous parliament of 1560, in which popery was abolished, he was named one of the twenty-four noblemen and gentlemen from whom the council of twelve was to be chosen, for the government of the kingdom. But he never was hearty in the cause of the congregation, and took the first opportunity of deserting them.

On the death of the young queen's husband, Francis II. of France, when the Estates had resolved to send over Lord James Stuart, prior of St. Andrews, the natural brother of the queen, to present an address to her majesty, Huntly and the other popish nobles met secretly and despatched Leslev, then official of Aberdeen, and afterwards bishop of Ross, to explain their views to Mary, and to offer their service and allegiance. He was one of the seven leading men in Scotland to whom a commission was transmitted from Mary, directing them to summon a parliament, and on her return to Scotland in 1561, the great seal was redelivered to him Between Huntly and the lord James Stuart an inveterate animosity had early begun to be manifested. On one occasion Huntly had boasted that if the queen commanded him he would set up the mass in three shires, when Lord James answered that it was past his power to do so, and so he should find the first moment he attempted it. Lord James, named by the queen earl of Mar in February 1562, preferred the title of earl of Moray, by which he is known in history Huntly, who had previously borne the title, and held the estates, in consequence became his implacable foe. Another cause of enmity was the opposition which Moray made to a project of marriage between Huntly's third son, Sir John Gordon, and the queen, that had been proposed by her French relatives of the house of Guise, with the view of encouraging him to undertake the attempt of restoring the popish religion in Scotland. Upon this young man, Sir John Gordon, Alexander Ogilvy of Ogilvy had, in 1545, settled the estates of Findlater and Deskford in Banffshire, to him and his heirs male, whom failing, to his brothers, William, James, and Adam, they taking the name of Ogilvy This settlement occasioned a violent feud between the Gordons and the Ogilvies, and on 27th June 1562, a street encounter took place between them at Edinburgh, when Lord Ogilvy was dangerously wounded by Sir John. The latter was, in consequence, committed to prison, but made his escape

On an excursion to the northern part of her kingdom, Mary was met at Aberdeen, in August 1562, by the countess of Huntly, who interceded for her son, but the queen declared that he must first return to prison before she could extend to him her clemency The countess begged that the castle of Stirling might be assigned as his place of imprisonment. The queen consented, and Lord Glammis was appointed to conduct him thither, but when near Glammis castle, Sir John left his escort and hastened back to the north The queen had intended to go to Huntly's house of Strathbogie, to which she had been invited, but was met on her way thither, by the earl, who earnestly besought her to pardon his son She continued, however, inexorable, and being suspicious of his designs, determined, instead of going to Strathbogie, to proceed onward to the castle of Inverness. By this departure from her original intention, a plan which Huntly had formed for cutting off Moray, Morton, and Maitland of Lethington, was frustrated. At Inverness, the queen was refused admittance to the castle by the deputy-governor, a dependent of Huntly The force of the country being raised, the castle was besieged, and taken, and the deputy-governor hanged Although informed that Huntly watched to intercept her in the woods on the banks of the Spey, Mary crossed that river without seeing him, and returned at the head of 3,000 men to Aberdeen There the countess of Huntly requested another audience of the queen, which was denied to her, and a proclamation was issued, commanding all who could bear arms in the surrounding districts to attend her majesty Believing his ruin to be contemplated, Huntly resolved upon seizing the queen's person and putting an end to the influence of the earl of Moray After fortifying the castles of Findlater, Auchindoun, and Strathbogie, he assembled his vassals, to the number of 1,500 men, and commenced his march to Aberdeen. As he advanced, his force melted gradually away, and with scarce 500 men he found himself attacked by the queen's army, under the earls of Moray, Morton, and Athol, at a place called Corrichie, on the east side of the hill of Fare, 14 miles west of Aberdeen. Being driven from his position on the hill into a low marshy level, he was there set upon by the spearmen of the earl of Moray, and completely defeated. From his corpulence and the weight of his armour, he was trampled to death in the pursuit, October 28, 1562 Two of his sons, Sir John Gordon, and Adam Gordon, were among the prisoners. The latter was pardoned on account of his youth, being only eighteen years of age, but his brother, Sir John, was beheaded on 31st October, much pitied by the spectators. As he had aspired to the hand of the queen, she was compelled, by the earl of Moray, to witness his going to execution, where he was cruelly mangled by an unskilful executioner Before his death he confessed his treasonable designs, and laid the blame of them on his father The earl's body, after having been embowelled, was conveyed to Edinburgh, and in accordance with an old feudal custom, kept unburied till parliament met, 2d November 1562, when an indictment having been exhibited against him, he was convicted of high treason, and his estates and honours forfeited to the crown

By his countess, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Robert Lord Keith, son and heir-apparent of William third earl Marischal, he had nine sons and three daughters, namely, 1. Alexander Lord Gordon, who married Lady Margaret Hamilton, second daughter of the duke of Chatelherault, and died, without issue, before 11th August 1558 2 George, fifth earl 3. Sir John Gordon, above mentioned. 4 William, who, according to Gordon's History, was designed bishop of Aberdeen, and who died at Paris in the college of Bons Enfans before 1567 5 James, a Jesuit, who died at Paris in 1620 6. Sir Adam of Auchindoun, pardoned by Mary, who, in a feud with the Forbeses, burnt down the old castle of Corgarff in Strathdon in 1551, when twenty-seven persons, among whom were the wife and children of Alexander Forbes, perished in the flames. Subsequently a meeting for reconciliation took place between a select number of the heads of the two houses in the hall of the old castle of Drumminor The differences were made up, and the parties sat down to dinner, when mistaking a gesture of their chief, the Forbeses slew a number of the unsuspecting Gordons. The chiefs looked at each other in silent consternation At length Forbes said, "This is a sad tragedy we little expected, but what is done, cannot be undone, and the blood that now flows on the floor of Drumminor will just help to sloaken the auld fire of Corgarff" (See Pinkerton's Traditionary Stories of Old Families.) Sir Adam took arms in the queen's cause, which he long upheld in the north In 1571, several parties were sent against him, but he defeated the king's adherents in repeated actions. He died at Paris in 1580 7 Sir Patrick, of Auchindoun and Gartly, killed at the battle of Glenlivet 3d October 1594, without issue. 8. Robert, killed accidentally, 25th April 1572, by one of his men, when cleaning his gun 9 Thomas. Lady Elizabeth Gordon, the eldest daughter, became, by marriage countess of Athol. Lady Jean, the second daughter, was thrice married first, on 22d February 1566, to the fourth earl of Bothwell, but their marriage was annulled in May 1567, to enable Bothwell to espouse Queen Mary; secondly, 13th December 1573, to Alexander, eleventh earl of Sutherland, with issue, and, 3dly, to Alexander Ogilvy of Boyne. She died in 1629, aged 84. Lady Margaret, the youngest daughter, married John eighth Lord Forbes.

George, fifth earl of Huntly, the eldest surviving son, had, with other charters, one of the office of sheriff of the county of Inverness and keeper of the castle thereof, on his father's resignation, 7th August 1556. He had married Lady Anne Hamilton, third daughter of the second earl of Arran, duke of Chatelherault, the sister of his brother's widow, Lady Gordon, and after the defeat at Corrichie, he fled for protection to his father-in-law, at Hamilton, but the queen requiring him to be delivered up, he was, on assurance of his life made to the duke, sent to Edinburgh, whence he was committed prisoner to the castle of Dunbar Being convicted of treason, February 8, 1568, he was sentenced to be executed, but was remitted back to Dunbar till the queen's pleasure should be known An order for his execution, surreptitiously obtained from the queen, was sent to the governor of Dunbar castle, who communicated it to Huntly He received it with calmness, but declared that he had every confidence in the assurance made by her majesty that his life would be saved if his enemies, resolved upon his destruction, had not prevailed with her against him The governor rode immediately to Holyrood, and requesting an audience of the queen, informed her that her "commands had been complied with" "What commands?" asked her majesty in surprise. "The execution of the earl of Huntly," replied the governor "I gave no such commands," exclaimed her majesty, "and did not intend that his life should be taken" The governor then informed her majesty that, relying on her assurance of his life, he had not fulfilled the order sent to him Huntly was immediately set at liberty, and restored to the queen's favour He was in the palace of Holyrood at the time of Rizzio's murder, 10th March, 1565, and with the earl of Bothwell he contrived to escape from it, when in possession of the conspirators. When Mary fled from the palace with Darnley, Huntly with other nobles joined her at Dunbar, and on the 20th of the same month (March 1565), on the forfeiture of the earl of Morton, he was appointed high-chancellor of Scotland, although his forfeiture was not then reversed He was one of the lords who proposed to the queen to obtain a divorce from Darnley, and when she retracted her consent, he, with Argyle, Lethington, and Sir James Balfour, signed the band or agreement for his murder On the perpetration of that crime in February 1567, he joined Bothwell in his bedchamber in the palace, whither he had immediately retreated, and these two noblemen, with others belonging to the court, were the first to acquaint the queen with the dreadful fate of her husband. Soon after, Huntly was among the nobles of the court who accompanied the queen to the seat of Lord Seton near Dunbar At this time he fully shared the confidence of the unhappy Mary Tytler, (Hist. of Scotland, vol vii p. 91,) quoting a manuscript letter in the State Paper office, says that scarce two weeks after her husband's death, the court at Seton was occupied in gay amusements. Mary and Bothwell would shoot at the butts against Huntly and Seton, and on one occasion, after winning the match, they forced these lords to pay the forfeit in the shape of a dinner at Tranent. In the parliament following the acquittal of Bothwell, Huntly's attainder was reversed, and his estates and honours restored, April 19th, 1567

The same year, he was one of the nobles who signed the bond recommending Bothwell, though married to his sister, as a husband to the queen. He was in the royal cavalcade, when surprised by Bothwell at Almond bridge, six miles from Edinburgh, and carried to Dunbar castle. On Lething ton joining the confederacy against Bothwell, Huntly and the latter resolved upon his death, when Mary threw herself between them, and declared that if a hair of his head perished, it should be at the peril of their life and lands. He now began to correspond with the queen's enemies, and when the party against Bothwell became too strong to be withstood, he signed the bond to support the authority of the young king, James VI He carried the sceptre at the first parliament of the regent Moray, 5th December, 1567, in which he was chosen one of the committee of the lords of the articles. At this time he was courted by the regent, who held out a prospect to him of giving his daughter to his son in marriage. In the following May, on the escape of Queen Mary from Lochleven, he joined the association in her favour at Hamilton, and went north to raise forces for her service. After the defeat at Langside he lost his office of chancellor He and Argyle and the Hamiltons held a convention at Largs on July 28th, when they resolved to let loose the borderers upon England They also wrote to the duke of Alva, requesting his assistance. Huntly and Argyle kept the field at the head of a large force, and having completely reduced the northern and western parts of the kingdom, they were upon the point of marching southward when they received letters from Queen Mary, then a captive in England, commanding them to disband their forces, as Queen Elizabeth would compel the regent to desist from hostilities against them. Soon after she issued a commission appointing the duke of Chatelherault and the earls of Argyle and Huntly her lieutenants, but in May 1569, they submitted to the regent Moray After the murder of that nobleman in 1570, Mary invested Huntly with the office of lieutenant-general, and for some time he remained at Aberdeen, concentrating the strength of the north He and the leaders of the queen's party were proclaimed traitors by the new regent Lennox. At page 20 of 'Bannatyne's Journal' will be found a letter from Huntly to the duke of Chatelherault, dated Aberdeen, 7th August 1570, relative to some enterprise concerted between the queen's friends, which Bannatyne thinks could be nothing else than the apprehension and destruction of the king's person, but which was more likely to have been intended against Lennox himself Having commenced his march southward with all his forces, he was attacked at Brechin by Lennox, and defeated, the regent having stormed Brechin castle, and hung up 34 of the garrison

At a parliament held at Stirling in 1571, an act of forfeiture was passed against Huntly and his brother, Sir Adam Gordon, one of Queen Mary's most determined adherents, the Hamiltons, Kirkaldy of Grange, and various others. He was one of the leaders of the force sent by Kirkaldy against the regent at Stirling on 3d September of that year, when Lennox was slain Captain Calder, who committed the deed, declared, previous to his execution, that before reaching Stirling, he had received orders both from Huntly and Lord Claud Hamilton, to shoot both the regent and the earl of Morton in revenge for the death of the archbishop of St. Andrews. On being elected regent, Morton set on foot a treaty of peace with Chatelherault, Huntly, and other leaders of the queen's party, and an agreement was signed at Perth, 23d February 1573, whereby the king's authority was recognised by them, and the regent bound himself to get the act of attainder against them repealed and their lands restored. In a parliament which met soon after, this was accordingly done Huntly retired to the north, and died at Strathbogie in May 1576. A detail of the circumstances attending his death, which was very sudden, is appended to 'Bannatyne's Journal,' page 483, ed. 1806, edited by Sir John Graham Dalyell. It appears from this that he was never in better health and spirits than on the morning of his death. After hunting for some time, and killing "thrie hairis and ane tod," (three hares and a fox,) he returned home to dinner, and in the afternoon, while playing at football, he fell down in a severe attack of sickness, and being carried to his bed, died about seven o'clock the same evening, his last words being "Look, look, look!" The account concludes with viewing the earl's death, under the circumstances in which it took place, as a judgment from God for his participation in the murder of Darnley, and the slaughter of the regent Lennox at Stirling, and "also," adds the writer, "of the first regentis murther, whairof experience teiches me some part." Referring to the five who were in the conspiracy against the king, he says, "Four is past with small provisione, to wit, the secretare, Argyle, Bothuell, and last of all Huntlie. I holp in God the fyft sall die mair perfitelie;" meaning Morton, who was afterwards beheaded for being "art and part" in the murder of the king. By his countess, a daughter of the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Huntly had a son, George, sixth earl, and a daughter, Lady Jean, countess of Caithness.

George, sixth earl and first marquis of Huntly, succeeded his father, when a minor At first he possessed the favour of the king, by whom he was personally liked He was a zealous Roman Catholic, and in 1588, about the time of the Armada, he entered into a correspondence with Spain Considering himself in danger from the protestant party, in the following year he raised the standard of rebellion in the north, and the king having marched against him, he and his associates surrendered. On being brought to trial, they were found guilty of repeated acts of treason, but the king would not allow sentence to be pronounced against them After a few months' confinement, James took occasion, among the public rejoicings on account of his marriage, to set them at liberty The earl now retired to his possessions in the north, and one of his first measures was to erect a castle at Ruthven in Badenoch, in the neighbourhood of his hunting forests. This gave great offence to Mackintosh, the chief of the clan Chattan, and his people, as they conceived that the object of its erection was to overawe the clan He was afterwards involved in a dispute with the Grants. In consequence of some outrages committed by John Grant, the tutor of Ballindalloch, that person and such of the Grants as should harbour or assist him, were declared outlaws and rebels, and a commission was granted to the earl of Huntly to apprehend and bring them to justice. In virtue of this commission, he besieged the house of Ballindalloch, which he took by force 2d November 1590, but the tutor effected his escape. Sir John Campbell of Calder, a tool of the chancellor Maitland, who had plotted the destruction of the earl and the laird of Grant, now joined in the conspiracy against him, and stirred up the clan Chattan, and Mackintosh their chief, to aid the Grants. They also persuaded the earls of Athol and Moray, the latter a young nobleman of handsome appearance and great promise, popularly called "the bonny earl of Moray," to assist them against Huntly Entering Badenoch, the earl summoned his vassals, and proclaimed and denounced the tutor and his abettors as rebels and traitors. The earls and others opposed to him met at Forres, to consult on the best means of defending themselves, but the sudden advance of Huntly to that town struck them with terror, and the whole party assembled, with the exception of the earl of Moray left Forres in great haste, and fled to Tarnoway On his approach to that place Huntly found the castle too well fortified to be attacked. He accordingly disbanded his men, 24th November 1590, and returned home. In the following year, when the turbulent earl of Bothwell made an attack on the palace of Holyrood, under cloud of night, with the view of seizing the chancellor Maitland, and was forced to flee to the north, to escape the vengeance of the king, Huntly, who had become reconciled to Maitland, was sent, with the duke of Lennox, in pursuit of him, but he escaped their hands. Having received letters of fire and sword against Bothwell and his followers, Huntly availed himself of these to gratify his own private revenge against the earl of Moray Under pretence that the latter had harboured Bothwell in his castle of Donibristle, in Fife, he surrounded that place with a strong force, and burnt it to the ground. The unfortunate earl fled towards the shore, intending to cross the Forth in a boat, but was overtaken by Sir Thomas Gordon of Cluny and Gordon of Gight, and slain (see MORAY, earl of). Huntly immediately despatched John Gordon of Buckie, who was master of the king's household, to Edinburgh, to lay a statement of the affair before the king. The clergy straightway denounced Huntly as a murderer, and a tumult having, in consequence, taken place at Edinburgh, the king was obliged to cancel the commission he had granted to him. Captain John Gordon brother of Gordon of Gight, although mortally wounded, having been taken prisoner, was tried before a jury, condemned, and executed Huntly himself was summoned to stand his trial. Assured by a private letter from the king, in which he says, "Alwise, I sall remaine constant. When ye come heere, come not by the ferreis, and if yee doe, accompanie yourself, as ye respect your owne preservatioune," he surrendered at Edinburgh, and was committed a prisoner to the castle of Blackness, 12th March 1591 On giving security, however, that he would appear and take his trial when called upon, he was discharged on the 20th of the same month.

The following year the earls of Argyle and Athol, and the lairds of Grant and Mackintosh having ravaged his lands in the north, on account of the slaughter of the earl of Moray, Huntly, after his return home, was engaged in various contests with the Grants and Mackintoshes, for the purpose of keeping them in due order and subjection, frequently laying waste their possessions, and carrying off large booty from them But he had no sooner subdued his enemies in the north than, in consequence of some letters having been intercepted on Mr George Ker, of the Newbottle family, when about to sail for the continent, he found himself accused of having renewed his treasonable correspondence with Spain, and of having entered into a conspiracy with the earls of Errol and Angus, to overturn the protestant religion in Scotland The king and his council appear to have been convinced of their innocence, but being importuned by the ministers to prosecute them, James yielding to necessity, and to the intrigues of Queen Elizabeth, summoned them to St. Andrews on 5th February 1593. On their refusal to obey the citation, they were, with Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindoun, denounced rebels on the 8th of February, and summoned to appear in parliament on the 2d June. It is stated in Calderwood's History (vol v p. 249), that at a convention of the nobility, held in the beginning of May, "the king sought a whinger to throw at William Murray, for compairing Huntlie to Bothwell in wickedness." On the 17th October Huntly, Angus, and Errol appeared in presence of the king, and offered to submit to a legal trial, for which a day was fixed, but on 26th November, it was finally agreed that they should be exempted from prosecution, and that before 1st February 1594, they should either submit to the church, and renounce popery, or leave the kingdom. At a parliament held in the end of May 1594, the three earls were attainted without trial, and their arms torn in presence of the Estates of the realm.

A Spanish ship, which had landed at Aberdeen, having been seized by the citizens, the earls of Angus and Errol with others arrived in that city with about 160 spearmen, and threatened, if the crew, who had been made prisoners, were not liberated, they would burn the town. On the arrival of Huntly soon after, with a larger force, the citizens were obliged to give the men up. An army, amounting to about 7,000 men, commanded by the earl of Argyle, a youth of 19 years of age, was now sent against Huntly and Errol, who collected their forces to the amount of about 1,500 men, mostly horsemen. They met at Glenlivet, in Banffshire, where the royal army was totally routed, 3d October 1594 On Huntly's side, about 14 gentlemen were slain, including Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindoun and the laird of Gight The earl of Errol and a considerable number of persons were wounded. At the conclusion of the battle the conquerors returned thanks to God on the field for the victory Among the trophies found in the field was the ensign belonging to the earl of Argyle, which was carried, with other spoils, to Strathbogie. James now advanced against them in person, when Huntly and his friends retired into Sutherland for a time. Soon after his return, he was accused of a new conspiracy with the earls of Angus, Errol, Bothwell, and Caithness, the object of which was said to be the imprisonment of the king, the crowning of the young prince, and the appointment of Huntly, Errol, and Angus, as regents of the kingdom, but on the 'band' betwixt the traitorous lords being delivered up, it turned out that it related to some compensation being offered to the young earl of Moray, then a minor, for the slaughter of his father The king promised to pardon Huntly, if he would deliver Bothwell, but he refused to betray him Huntly and Errol afterwards had a meeting at Aberdeen with the duke of Lennox, the king's lieutenant in the north, when they agreed to leave the kingdom, during his majesty's pleasure In his absence, his countess made some offers to the synod of Moray in her husband's name, and various efforts were made by his friends to procure his recall, which gave great alarm to the church as their proceedings, recorded in Calderwood's History, testify

After spending sixteen months in travelling through Germany and Flanders, Huntly returned to Scotland, and was received by the king at Falkland 18th August 1596. He arrived in Edinburgh on the 6th of the following December, and he and the earls of Angus and Errol were restored to their former honours and estates by the parliament held at Edinburgh, the 12th of that month On this occasion Huntly bore the sword from the parliament house to the palace of Holyrood. He had a grant of the dissolved abbacy of Dunfermline, was appointed lord-lieutenant of the north, and, on the baptism of the princess Margaret, a daughter of King James, who died young, in testimony of the king's regard for him, he was created marquis of Huntly, by patent, dated 17th April, 1599 At this time he was in high favour at court, and Calderwood, under date 1600, says that he and the king "passed over the time with drinking and waughting" (History, vol. vi p. 100). To waught, in the Scots language means to quaff, to drink in large draughts. On the 23d February 1608, after great pains taken by the king, the earls of Huntly, Moray, and Argyle were reconciled

Having made no secret of his attachment to the Church of Rome, notwithstanding that several ministers had at various times been sent by the General Assembly to remain with him and resolve his doubts, the marquis, in 1606, was accused of encouraging the Roman Catholics, and thereby occasioning a great defection from the reformed doctrines. At a convention held at Linlithgow on 10th December of that year, he was ordered to confine himself with his countess and children at Aberdeen. He was summoned before the General Assembly, which met at Linlithgow July 1608, and not obeying the citation, sentence of excommunication was, by the mouth of Mr James Law, bishop of Orkney, moderator of the Assembly, solemnly pronounced against him. After which, the earl of Dunbar, his majesty's commissioner, assured the Assembly that forty days after the sentence the civil sword should strike, without mercy, him and his. From the civil consequences of the act he was able to protect himself, by living in his fastnesses, and among his vassals in the north. In 1609 he was committed to Stirling castle, but liberated in December 1610, on his engaging to subscribe the confession of faith, and make satisfaction to the church He now began to show what was called "open insolence," by directing his officers to prohibit his tenants from attending the Established church. For this he was in 1616 cited before the court of high commission. On the 12th of June, he appeared before the commission, and on his refusal to subscribe the confession of faith, or to give any kind of satisfaction, he was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, but on the 18th of the same month, the lord-chancellor set him at liberty on his own warrant. Having previously received the king's permission to go to London to court, he now began his journey At Huntingdon, he met Mr Patrick Hamilton, on his way to Scotland, with a letter from the king to the council, sharply rebuking them for releasing him, in contempt of the court of high commission The marquis persuaded Hamilton to return and inform the king that he had come up with the intention of giving his majesty full satisfaction in all points, and to entreat permission to appear at court. The king, pleased with his offer to make satisfaction, authorised him to proceed He was absolved from the sentence of excommunication by the archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth, with the consent of the bishop of Caithness, who was then in London, 7th July 1616, after which he received the communion The news of this created a great sensation in Scotland, being considered a practical revival of the old claim of supremacy which the archbishop of York had anciently set up, but which had always been successfully resisted On the 12th July the archbishop of St. Andrews (Spottiswood) noticed it in his sermon in St. Giles' church, Edinburgh, and said that the king had promised that "the like should not fall out hereafter" (Calderwood's History, vol. vii p. 219) He also wrote a long letter of remonstrance to the king, and James in his answer justified the absolution The archbishop of Canterbury, at the king's desire, also addressed an epistle to him on the subject. These letters gave the Scots clergy great satisfaction, and on the marquis' return to Scotland, it was resolved that he should present a supplication to the General Assembly, which was to meet at Aberdeen, 13th August of that year (1616), acknowledging his offence, promising to continue in the profession of the truth, and to educate his children therein, and that thereupon he should be of new absolved, according to the form used in the Church of Scotland This was, accordingly, very solemnly done by the archbishop of St. Andrews, on the first day of the assembly, and the marquis made oath that he would truly conform to the Established church, and subscribed the confession of faith

by Charles I. to give up to him, for £5,000, the heritable sheriffships of Aberdeen and Inverness, Moray having declared to the king that the marquis of Huntly was so great a man, of such friendships and power, that none could live beside him, unless he and his posterity were deprived of these offices. The same year, the viscount Melgum (see MELGUM, viscount) second son of the marquis, being burnt to death in the house of Frendraught, the Gordons repeatedly plundered the lands of Crichton of Frendraught, and threatened to take his life, (see page 271 of this volume). The marquis, convinced that the burning was wilful, made many unsuccessful attempts to discover the incendiaries, and in 1633, intended to pay a personal visit to King Charles on his arrival in Edinburgh that year, to request him to order an investigation into all the circumstances, but being taken ill on the journey, he sent forward his marchioness and the widowed Lady Aboyne, both in deep mourning, to lay a statement of the case before the king, who promised to see justice done. Soon after, John Meldrum of Redhill, was tried on a charge of being concerned in the fire, and being found guilty, was hanged and quartered at Edinburgh.

The confederacy against Frendraught having become very formidable, the lords of the privy council subsequently wrote to the marquis, desiring him to prevent those of his surname from plundering his lands, as they held him responsible for all such disorders carried on by the Gordons. The marquis returned for answer, that as the aggressors were neither his tenants nor his servants, he could in no shape be answerable for them, that he had neither countenanced nor incited them, and that he had no warrant to pursue or prosecute them Frendraught himself, convinced that the ravages committed on his property were done with the concurrence of the marquis, went to Edinburgh, and entered a complaint against him to the privy council, to whom the king also wrote, desiring them to adopt measures for suppressing the outrages complained of They accordingly cited the marquis, in the beginning of 1635, to appear before them, and on his proceeding to Edinburgh, in compliance with this citation, he was commanded to remain there till the matter was investigated. Several persons of the name of Gordon were committed to prison, and the marquis, although nothing could be proved against him, was obliged to find caution for all persons of that surname within his bounds, that they should keep the peace, and also that he should present the rebels, as the pillagers were called, at Edinburgh, or make them leave the kingdom On his return to the north, most of the guilty parties fled to Flanders, but about twelve were apprehended by the marquis, and sent to Edinburgh, where two of them were executed. The marquis was subsequently accused, by Adam Gordon, second son of Sir Adam Gordon of Park, and one of the principal ringleaders of the conspiracy against Frendraught, of having instigated him and his associates to commit all the depredations that had taken place, and on his appearance at Edinburgh 15th January 1636, he was confronted with his accuser before the committee of the privy council, but although he "cleared himself with great dexteritie, beyond admiration," as Gordon of Sallagh observes, he was, "upon presumption," committed a close prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh By the king's command, however, both he and Gordon of Letterfourie, who had also been imprisoned, were released, and the king enjoined Sir Robert Gordon, who was related to both parties, to bring about a reconciliation between the marquis and Frendraught. He accordingly prevailed upon them to enter into a submission, by which they agreed to refer all differences between them to the arbitrament of friends. The marquis, who had retired to his house in the Canongate of Edinburgh, having fallen into a decline, was desirous of returning north to Strathbogie, and was conveyed, on a bed, in his chariot, as far as Dundee, where he died, on 12th June 1636, in his 74th year. He was interred in the family vault at Elgin, on 30th August following, "having," says Spalding, (page 43,) "above his chist a rich mortcloath of black velvet, wherein was wrought two whyte crosses. He had torch-lights in great number carried be freinds and gentlemen; the marques' son, called Adam, was at his head, the earle of Murray on the right spaik, the earle of Seaforth on the left spaik, the earle of Sutherland on the third spaik, and Sir Robert Gordon on the fourth spaik Besyds thir nobles, many barrons and gentlemen was there, haveing above three hundred lighted torches at the lifting. He is carried to the east port, doun the wynd to the south kirk stile of the colledge kirk, in at the south kirk door, and buried in his own isle with much murning and lamentation The like forme of burriall, with torch light, was not sein heir thir many dayes befor" This author gives the marquis a very high character, which, in many respects, is not borne out by history He certainly was a remarkable man for the age in which he lived The king had the greatest regard for him, and bestowed on him, in marriage, Lady Henrietta Stewart, eldest daughter of his dearest favourite, Esme, duke of Lennox. Being a Roman Catholic, the widowed marchioness was obliged to leave Scotland, on account of her religion, in June 1641, and died in France September 2d, 1642 They had five sons and four daughters. The sons were, 1 George, Lord Gordon, and earl of Ennie, second marquis. 2. John, Viscount Melgum, so created by Charles I in 1627 (see MELGUM, Viscount). 3 Lord Francis, who died in Germany in 1620 4 Lord Laurence. And 5. Lord Adam of Auchindoun The daughters were, 1 Lady Anne, countess of Moray 2 Lady Elizabeth, countess of Lauthgow 3 Lady Mary, marchioness of Douglas. And 4 Lady Jean, married to Claud, Lord Strabane.

George, second marquis of Huntly, when Lord Gordon, was kept for some time at court in England by King James, who took great pains to educate him in the protestant religion He was also styled earl of Ennie. The clan Cameron having, during the years 1612 and 1613, disturbed the peace of Lochaber, he raised a force to overawe them, and having taken prisoner their chief, he soon restored that country to order In 1618 he was involved in some disputes with Sir Lauchlan Mackintosh, chief of the clan Chattan, in consequence of the latter, who was the vassal of his father, the marquis of Huntly, refusing to assist him against the Camerons, and as Mackintosh had not performed certain services for lands held of the earl and his father, he raised an action at law against him He also inhibited him from disposing of the tithes of Culloden to which the earl had a right, and which belonged to Mackintosh Having formerly obtained a decree against the latter for the value of the tithes of the preceding years, he sent two messengers at arms to distrain the corn upon the ground under that warrant. They were, however, resisted by Mackintosh's servants. The earl, in consequence, pursued him before the privy council, and got him and his servants proclaimed rebels. Sir Lauchlan fortified the castle of Culloden, and prepared for a stubborn resistance, but on the approach of the earl, he went off first to Edinburgh, and afterwards to England The castle subsequently surrendered to the earl, who returned the keys to the uncle of Mackintosh, in whose charge the castle had been left. The corn he bestowed on Mackintosh's grandmother, who enjoyed the liferent of the lands of Culloden as her jointure. Having other claims against the turbulent chief, he cited him before the lords of council and session, and failing to appear, Mackintosh was again denounced rebel, and outlawed for disobedience. Being then at court, he complained to the king, and the earl in consequence posted up to London and laid before his majesty a true statement of matters. Sir Lauchlan was thereupon sent to Scotland, and committed to the castle of Edinburgh, until he should give the earl full satisfaction. In 1619, he and the laird of Grant, who had encouraged and assisted him in his proceedings, became reconciled to the earl, but there were afterwards many dissensions between them. In 1622 the earl received a commission from the privy council to proceed against the earl of Caithness, but in consequence of a message from court to go to France on some affairs of state, he left for that country in 1623, accompanied by a party of young gentlemen In 1624 he had a company of the gens d'armes in the French service. He was created viscount of Aboyne 20th April 1632, with remainder, after his death, or succession to his father, to his second son James and his heirs male. On the death of his father in 1636, he was in France, but arrived in Scotland in October of that year In 1639, after Charles I had roused the spirit of the nation, by his rash and ill-judged attempt to introduce episcopacy into Scotland, the marquis of Huntly having received a commission from him as his lieutenant in the north, raised the royal standard, and took possession of Aberdeen in name of the king. Being informed that a meeting of Covenanters was to be held at Turriff on February 14 he resolved to disperse them, and wrote letters to his chief dependents, requiring them to meet him at Turriff the same day One of these letters fell into the hands of the earl of Montrose, then on the side of the Covenanters, who, at the head of 800 men, crossed the range of hills called the Grange-bean, and marched into Turriff on the morning of the day appointed. When Huntly and his party, amounting to 2,000 men, arrived, finding Montrose already there, he ordered his men to disperse, without offering an attack, on the pretence that his commission of lieutenancy only authorised him to act on the defensive (Spalding, vol i p 94). On the approach of Montrose to Aberdeen, the marquis abandoned the town, which the former entered without opposition on 30th March Spalding (vol i 108), after describing their entry, says, 'Here it is to be notted, that few or none of this haill army wanted ane blew ribbin hung about his craig, doun under his left arme, which they called the 'Covenanters' Ribbin.' But the Lord Gordon, and some other of the marquess' kairnes and familie, had ane ribbin, when he was dwelling in the toun, of ane reid flesh cullor, which they wore in their hatts, and called it 'The Royall Ribbin,' as a signe of their love and loyaltie to the king In despyte and derision thereof this blew ribbin was worne, and called the 'Covenanters Ribbin,' be the haill souldiers of the army, and would not hear of the 'Royall Ribbin,' such was their pryde and malice."

The advance of Montrose to Inverury, where he pitched his camp, alarmed Huntly, who despatched Robert Gordon of Straloch, and Dr Gordon, a physician of Aberdeen, to his opponent, to request an interview, which the latter agreed to. At an adjourned conference on the 5th April, the marquis agreed to subscribe the Covenant, with his friends, tenants, and servants. After this arrangement the marquis returned to Strathbogie, where, in a few days, he received a message from Montrose to repair to Aberdeen, with his two sons, the Lord Gordon and the Viscount Aboyne. On the 11th April, at a council of the principal officers of Montrose's army, it was resolved to arrest the marquis and his eldest son, Lord Gordon. To do away, however, with any appearance of treachery, Montrose invited him and his two sons to supper, when he hinted the expediency of resigning his commission of lieutenancy This the marquis agreed to, and also, at Montrose's suggestion, wrote a letter to the king in favour of the Covenanters. That same night sentinels were placed around his lodging. Next morning, Montrose demanded from him a contribution for liquidating a loan of 200,000 merks, which the Covenanters had borrowed from Sir William Dick, a rich merchant of Edinburgh. With this demand the marquis declined to comply, as he was not concerned in borrowing the money Montrose then requested him to take steps to apprehend James Grant, and some others, who had opposed the Covenanters in the Highlands. Huntly objected that, having resigned his commission, he had no longer power to act. Montrose, finally, required the marquis to reconcile himself to Crichton, the laird of Frendraught, (see page 524,) but this he positively refused to do Then changing his tone, Montrose thus addressed him "My lord, seeing we are all now friends, will you go south to Edinburgh with us?" Huntly answered that he could not, as he was just going to Strathbogie. "Your lordship," rejoined Montrose, "will do well to go with us." "My lord," said Huntly, "I came here to this town upon assurance that I should come and go at my own pleasure, without molestation or inquietude, and now I see why my lodging was guarded, and that ye mean to take me to Edinburgh, whether I will or not. This conduct, on your part, seems to me to be neither fair nor honourable." He added, "My lord, give me back the bond which I gave you at Inverury, and you shall have an answer" Montrose thereupon delivered the bond to him Huntly then inquired, "Whether he would take him to the south as a captive, or willingly of his own mind?" "Make your choice," said Montrose "Then," observed the marquis, "I will not go as a captive, but as a volunteer" Viscount Aboyne, his second son, was allowed to return to Strathbogie, but the marquis and Lord Gordon were conveyed to Edinburgh, where they were committed close prisoners to the castle They were, however, soon after set at liberty, in accordance with the seventh article of the treaty of Berwick, 20th June of the same year

In April 1644, the marquis received a new commission from the king, to be his majesty's lieutenant-general in the north, and having collected a considerable body of horse and foot, he proceeded to Aberdeen, which he again took possession of On the approach, however, of the marquis of Argyle, with a large force, he retired to Banff, where he disbanded his army, and retreated into Strathnaver, in Sutherland, where he remained inactive for a year and a half When Montrose, who now supported the king's cause, and had been appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, arrived in the north, Huntly kept aloof from him, and he never could be induced to co-operate with him during the subsequent struggle in which Montrose was engaged He seems to have considered the latter's appointment as trenching on his own authority as lieutenant in the north, and he could not forget the treatment he had formerly received from him In 1646, with a force of 1,500 foot and 600 horse, he appeared at the gates of Aberdeen, which he stormed in three different places, and a third time took possession of that city, but soon returned to Strathbogie

In December of the same year, when the unfortunate Charles had resolved upon escaping from the Scots army, and putting himself at the head of such forces as the marquis of Huntly could raise in the north, he sent Robert Leslie, brother of General David Leslie, with letters and a private commission to the marquis, informing him of his intentions, and desiring him to levy what forces he could Huntly accordingly collected some men at Banff, and fortified that town. In the following month a portion of the covenanting army stationed in Aberdeenshire attempted to dislodge him, but were obliged to retire with loss. He was excepted from pardon, 4th March 1647, and a reward of £1,000 offered for his apprehension. On the approach of General David Leslie with a considerable force in April, the marquis fled, with a few friends, to the mountains of Lochaber for shelter Leslie thereupon reduced all the castles belonging to him in the north. After having been pursued by Lieutenant-general Middleton through Glenmoriston, Badenoch, and other places, the marquis was at length captured by Lieutenant-colonel Menzies at Dalnabo, in Strathdon, in December 1647 He was taken about midnight, just as he was going to bed. He was attended by only ten gentlemen and servants, who made a brave attempt to defend him, in which six of them were killed and the rest mortally wounded. On hearing that he had been taken prisoner, the whole of his vassals in the neighbourhood, amounting to about 500, with Grant of Carron at their head, flew to arms to rescue him Menzies, in consequence, carried the marquis to the castle of Blairfindie in Glenlivet, about four miles from Dalnabo, whence he sent a message to his people dissuading them from attempting his rescue, for that, now almost worn out with grief and fatigue, he could no longer live in hills and dens; and hoped that his enemies would not drive things to the worst, but if such was the will of Heaven, he could not outlive the sad fate he foresaw his royal master was likely to undergo, and be the event as it would, he doubted not but the just providence of God would restore the royal family, and his own along with it. (Gordon's History of the Family of Gordon, vol. ii. p. 546.)

Shortly before the capture of the marquis of Huntly, John Gordon, of Innermarkie, Gordon, younger of Newton-Gordon, and the laird of Harthill, three of his chief friends, had been taken prisoners by Major-general Middleton, and sent to Edinburgh, where they were imprisoned The two latter were condemned to die by the committee of estates, and although their friends procured a remission of the sentence from the king, they were, notwithstanding, both beheaded at the market cross of Edinburgh Harthill suffered on the 26th October 1647, and Newton-Gordon a few days thereafter

Besides the gentlemen and servants attending Huntly's person, there were some Irish who were quartered in the offices about Dalnabo, where he was taken These were carried prisoners by Menzies to Strathbogie, where Middleton then was, who ordered them all to be shot, a sentence which was carried into immediate execution On receiving accounts of the capture of the marquis, the question was debated in the committee of estates at Edinburgh, whether he should be immediately executed or reprieved till the meeting of parliament; but although the Argyle faction, notwithstanding the marquis of Argyle withdrew before the vote was taken, and the committee of the church did everything in their power to procure the immediate execution of Huntly, his life was spared till the meeting of parliament by a majority of one vote. (Guthry, p. 207).

If he had joined heartily with Montrose, instead of keeping apart from him, during the critical period of that chivalric gentleman's brilliant career, he might have changed the whole fortune of the war and of the kingdom. He had not the magnanimity to do this, and his morbid jealousy of Montrose, and resentment for his arrest by him and conveyance to Edinburgh in 1639, ruined the king's cause in Scotland, and brought on his own destruction.

He was carried, under a strong guard of horse, to Leith, and, after being kept two days there, delivered up to the magistrates of Edinburgh, and confined in the tolbooth of that city. For the reward of £1,000 sterling offered for his apprehension, Menzies obtained an order from the committee of Estates. The king, from his prison in Carisbrook castle, wrote a letter to the earl of Lanark, then in London, entreating him to do his best to intercede for him, that his life might be spared; but it does not appear that any attention was paid to this letter After the execution of the king and the duke of Hamilton, the marquis of Huntly, who had been allowed to lie in prison since December 1647, was, by an order of the Scots parliament, beheaded at the market cross of Edinburgh, on 22d March 1649 As he had formerly been excommunicated, one of the ministers, says the author of the History of the Family of Gordon, "asked him, when brought upon the scaffold, if he desired to be absolved from the sentence," to which he replied, "that as he was not accustomed to give ear to false prophets, he did not wish to be troubled by him." He suffered with great courage, professing his loyalty to the last, and declaring that he had charity to forgive those who had voted for his death, although he could not admit that he had done anything contrary to the laws. By his wife, Lady Anne Campbell, eldest daughter of the seventh earl of Argyle, he had five sons and three daughters.

The eldest son, George, Lord Gordon, "of singular worth and accomplishments," served in his youth in Lorraine and Alsace, under the marquis de la Force, and distinguished himself by his valour, particularly at the siege of the fortified town of Spire, where he was wounded in the thigh In April 1639, for appearing in arms for the king, he and his father (see page 525) were committed prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh, but were released in the following June. In 1643, when his father and his brother, Viscount Aboyne, stood out against the covenant, Lord Gordon adhered to the Estates of the kingdom, and in September 1644 he joined the earl of Argyle, his uncle by the mother's side, on his arrival in the north, in pursuit of the marquis of Montrose, then in arms for the king. For not interfering to prevent Argyle's troops from laying waste the lands of the Gordons in Strathbogie and the Ensie, he has been blamed by some writers. Spalding remarks that it was "a wonderful unnatural tie in the Lord Gordon to suffer his father's lands and friends, in his own sight, to be thus wreckt and destroyed, in his father's absence," but it is probable that his lordship had not the power to interfere effectually Soon after, with three troops of horse, he joined the Covenanters, at their rendezvous at the bridge of Dee. On Montrose's arrival at Elgin, in February 1645, after the battle of Inverlochy, in which Argyle was defeated, he was joined by Lord Gordon, with some of his friends and vassals. He had long been kept under the control of his uncle, Argyle, and he now took the first opportunity to declare for the king. Spalding (vol. ii. p. 298) says, "The Lord Gordon being in the Bog, leaped quickly on horse, having Nathaniel Gordon, with some few others, in his company, and that same night came to Elgin, saluted Montrose, who made him heartily welcome, and soupe joyfully together Many marvelled at the Lord Gordon's going in after such manner, being upon the country's service, and colonel to a foot regiment and to a horse regiment." In Strathbogie, whither Montrose proceeded, Lord Gordon speedily raised a force among his father's vassals, of about 500 foot and 160 horse. With these he accompanied Montrose to Stonehaven, which was burnt, but as the lands in Strathbogie were exposed to be plundered by the Covenanters, Lord Gordon and his brother Lord Lewis Gordon, with the Gordon horsemen, returned to defend their father's estates in that district. He had the command of Montrose's horse at the battle of Auldearn, which was fought in the succeeding May, when the troops of the Covenanters, under Major-general Urrie, commonly called Hurry, were defeated. It was to protect the Gordons from the destruction that seemed to await them from the superior force of Urrie that Montrose hastened to Aberdeenshire, and so brought on this battle. General Baillie having been sent north in pursuit of Montrose, another battle took place, on 2d July of the same year (1645) at Alford, on the river Don, when Lord Gordon, conjunctly with Sir Nathanael Gordon, had the command of the right wing of Montrose's army Previous to the battle, observing a party of Baillie's troops driving away a large quantity of cattle which they had collected in Strathbogie and the Ennie, he selected a body of horse, with which he attempted a rescue. This caused a general engagement, in which Baillie was defeated, but the victory on the part of Montrose was clouded by the death of Lord Gordon, "a very hopeful young gentleman, able of mind and body, about the age of twenty-eight years," (Gordon's Continuation, p. 526). His lordship was, unfortunately, shot dead when in the act of pulling General Baillie from his horse, having, it is said, promised to his men, to drag him out of the ranks and present him before them. Wishart (Memoirs, p. 182) gives an affecting description of the feelings of Montrose's army when this amiable young nobleman was killed. "There was," he says, "a general lamentation for the loss of the Lord Gordon, whose death seemed to eclipse all the glory of the victory As the report spread among the soldiers, every one appeared to be struck dumb with the melancholy news, and a universal silence prevailed for some time through the army However, their grief soon burst through all restraint, venting itself in the voice of lamentation and sorrow When the first transports were over, the soldiers exclaimed against heaven and earth for bereaving the king, the kingdom, and themselves, of such an excellent young nobleman, and, unmindful of the victory or of the plunder, they thronged about the body of their dead captain, some weeping over his wounds and kissing his lifeless limbs, while others praised his comely appearance even in death, and extolled his noble mind, which was enriched with every qualification that could adorn his high birth or ample fortune: they even cursed the victory bought at so dear a rate. Nothing could have supported the army under this immense sorrow but the presence of Montrose, whose safety gave them joy, and not a little revived their drooping spirits. In the meantime he could not command his grief, but mourned bitterly over the melancholy fate of his only and dearest friend, grievously complaining that one who was the honour of his nation, the ornament of the Scots nobility, and the boldest assertor of the royal authority in the north, had fallen in the flower of his youth." Lord Gordon was unmarried. He has obtained a place in Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors (vol. v p. 102, ed. 1806,) for having written a few lines 'On Black Eyes,' printed in the third part of Watson's Collection, 1711

The marquis' second son, James, had the title of viscount of Aboyne. In 1639 after his father and elder brother, Lord Gordon, had been sent prisoners to Edinburgh, he collected about 2,000 horse and foot, and for some time watched the movements of the Covenanters in the north, but afterwards disbanding his army, he went by sea to England, to inform the king of the precarious state of his affairs in that part of Scotland. Charles conferred on him the commission of lieutenancy which his father held, and gave him a letter to the marquis of Hamilton, requesting him to afford the viscount all the assistance in his power in his support of the royal cause. From that nobleman, however, he received only a few officers and four field-pieces. "The king," says Gordon of Sallagh, (Continuation, p. 402,) "coming to Berwick, and business growing to a height, the armies of England and Scotland lying near one another, his majesty sent the viscount of Aboyne and Colonel Gun to the marquis of Hamilton, to receive some forces from him, and with these forces to go to Aberdeen to possess and recover that town, (then in the hands of the Covenanters). The marquis of Hamilton, lying at anchor in the Forth, gave them no supply of men, but sent them five ships to Aberdeen." On the viscount's arrival in the bay of Aberdeen, the earl of Montrose, who then supported the Covenanters, abandoned that city, and hastened into the Mearns.

On landing, the viscount issued a proclamation prohibiting the payment of any rents, duties, or other debts to the Covenanters, and requiring every person to take an oath of allegiance to his majesty. On the 10th of June, four days after his landing, he advanced upon Kintore with about 2,000 horse and foot, and compelled the inhabitants of that place to subscribe the oath of allegiance. On the 14th he crossed the Dee, with the intention of occupying Stonehaven, but was attacked by the earl Marischal on the way, and his forces being dispersed, he returned to Aberdeen This affair has been called "the Raid of Stonehaven" After again collecting his army, he resolved to dispute with Montrose, who had advanced to the bridge of Dee, the passage of that river By a stratagem, however, the latter succeeded in withdrawing a part of Aboyne's forces from the defence of the bridge, and thus gained an easy victory When the viscount saw the Covenanters in possession of the bridge, he fled in great haste towards Strathbogie, and afterwards escaped by sea to England. This battle was fought 19th June 1639

In 1643, the viscount was summoned before the council, to answer for his negotiations with the earl of Antrim, an Irish nobleman who had undertaken to raise a force in Ireland to assist Montrose, now created a marquis, in his attempt to restore the king's authority in Scotland, but not appearing, he was forfeited and declared a traitor In April 1644, he attended Montrose to Scotland, when Dumfries surrendered to him, but was obliged, in a few days, to retire with him to Carlisle, to avoid being surprised by the Covenanters. On the 24th of the same month, he was excommunicated by the General Assembly at Edinburgh. The command of the garrison of Carlisle was given to his lordship, but that town being closely besieged, he and some other noblemen and gentlemen contrived to make their escape from it, and immediately hastened to Scotland to join Montrose, which he did in Menteith in April 1645 Accompanying him to the north, he was present at the battle of Auldearn, the following month General Urrie's troops, after their defeat, were pursued for several miles, and might have been all taken or killed, if Lord Aboyne had not, by an unnecessary display of ensigns and standards, which he had taken from the Covenanters, attracted the notice of the victorious party, who halted under the impression that a fresh army was coming up to attack them At the battle of Alford, 2d July, he had the joint command of the left wing of Montrose's army He was also with Montrose at the battle of Kilsyth in August following, but on the commencement of the march of the royal army to the borders, on the 4th September, the viscount left him, and not only carried off the whole of his own men, but induced the other horsemen of the north to accompany him. Indeed, Sir Nathanael Gordon appears to have been the only individual of that name who remained behind. The cause of such a hasty proceeding on the part of Lord Aboyne, does not sufficiently appear, but it seems probable that his lordship had taken some offence at Montrose, who, according to a partisan of the Gordon family, arrogated to himself all the honour of the victories which the viscount had greatly contributed to obtain. (Gordon's Continuation of the History of the Earls of Sutherland, p. 528.) After the battle of Philiphaugh, so disastrous to Montrose, that nobleman retired to the north, and had an interview with Lord Aboyne, whom he prevailed upon to join him at Drumminor, with 1,500 foot and 300 horse, but before reaching Alford, first Lord Lewis Gordon, and then his brother Viscount Aboyne, left him, their father, the marquis of Huntly, being averse to their serving under Montrose. The viscount was, in 1648, excepted from pardon He made his escape to France, and was at Paris, when intelligence of the execution of Charles I arrived there. The grief which this event occasioned him affected him so greatly that he died a few days afterwards, when, being unmarried, the title of viscount of Aboyne became extinct.

The 3d son of the 2d marquis of Huntly was Lord Lewis Gordon, who succeeded his father as 3d marquis. Lord Charles, the 4th son, adhered firmly to the royal cause during the civil wars, and in consideration of his great and faithful services, he was created by Charles II. earl of Aboyne, and Lord Gordon of Strathaven and Glenlivet, by patent to him and the heirs male of his body, dated 10th September 1660 In the following year he had a charter under the great seal of the whole lands and lordship of Aboyne. He died in March 1681 By his countess, Lady Elizabeth Lyon, only daughter of the second earl of Kinghorn, he had four children, namely, 1 Charles, second earl of Aboyne, of whom afterwards. 2 The Hon. George Gordon 3 The Hon John Gordon, who served in the army abroad, and died at Edinburgh at an advanced age, 22d July 1762 And one daughter, Lady Elizabeth, married in 1685, to John, Viscount Tarbet, who after her death became second earl of Cromarty

The fifth son of the second marquis was Lord Henry Gordon, who went into the service of the king of Poland, in which he remained for several years. He returned to Scotland, and died at Strathbogie The marquis's daughters were, Lady Anne, countess of Perth, Lady Harriet, married, first, to Lord Seton, and, secondly, to the second earl of Traquair; Lady Jean, countess of Haddington; Lady Mary, the wife of Alexander Irvine of Drum; and Lady Catherine, who married Count Morstain, high treasurer of Poland, of which marriage Prince Czartorinski and other families of distinction in Poland are descended.

Lewis, third marquis of Huntly, showed, when Lord Lewis Gordon, great changeableness of mind in the contest between the king and the nation. He first took arms in behalf of the king, and in June 1639, when his brother, Viscount Aboyne, landed at Aberdeen, he collected from among his father's friends and tenants, a force of about 1,000 horse and foot, at the head of which he joined him in that city He afterwards fought on the side of the Covenanters, and at the battle of Aberdeen in September 1644, commanded their left wing against the troops of Montrose, then supporting the cause of the king. He also held a high command in Argyle's army, at the battle of Fyvie, soon after, which led to the desertion of a small body of Gordons, who had joined the standard of Montrose. In the following year, Lord Lewis, who is described as of an impetuous temper, deserted the Covenanters and went over to Montrose, but seems to have shared his father's feelings of dislike and jealousy of that nobleman. After the defeat of Montrose at Philiphaugh and his appearance in the north, he joined him with a considerable force, but soon left him. It is related by Wishart, that in 1646, when Montrose had sent three troops of horse to the fords of Spey, to watch the motions of Lieut.-general Middleton, who had been sent in pursuit of him, Lord Lewis invited the officers to an entertainment in the castle of Rothes, which he then kept, and detained them there until Middleton had crossed the Spey with a large army and penetrated far into Moray; then he dismissed his guests with the words, "Go, return to your general, Montrose, who will now have better work than he had at Selkirk." But the story is extremely improbable.

Being the eldest surviving son, Lord Lewis succeeded his father, as third marquis of Huntly, in 1649, and in 1651 was by Charles II. restored to the titles and estates, which had been forfeited. He died in December 1653. By his marchioness, Isobel, daughter of Sir James Grant of Grant, he had one son, George, fourth marquis of Huntly and first duke of Gordon, (see GORDON, duke of, p. 818 of this volume,) and three daughters. The title of marquis of Huntly was thereafter borne by the eldest son of the duke of Gordon, till the death of the fifth duke in 1836, when that title became extinct, and the titles of marquis of Huntly, &c., reverted to the earl of Aboyne.

Returning to the Aboyne family, Charles, second earl of Aboyne, succeeded his father in 1681 On offering to take his seat in the Scots parliament, 27th July 1698, it was objected that, being a professed papist, he ought not to be allowed to sit, but declaring openly in parliament that he had embraced the true protestant religion, and owned the confession of faith as agreeable to the word of God, his lordship was permitted to qualify himself, and he took the oaths and his seat accordingly He died in April 1702. By his countess, who was his cousin, Lady Elizabeth Lyon, second daughter of the third earl of Strathmore and Kinghorn, he had a son, John, third earl of Aboyne, and three daughters.

John, the third earl of Aboyne, died in August 1732. By his countess, Grace, daughter of George Lockhart of Carnwath, he had 1. Charles, fourth earl. 2 The Hon. John Gordon, lieutenant-colonel of the 81st regiment, who died at Kinsale, 30th October 1778. He married his cousin, Clementina, daughter of George Lockhart of Carnwath, and had three sons and two daughters. 3. The Hon Lockhart Gordon, who was educated at the university of Glasgow, and originally designed for the bar, but entered the army, and was captain in the same regiment with Lord Cornwallis. He retired from the service with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and resuming the study of the law, was appointed judge-advocate-general of Bengal in 1787 He died at Calcutta, 24th March 1788. He was twice married By his second wife, Catherine Wallop, sister of the earl of Portsmouth, he had, besides other children, two sons, the Rev Lockhart Gordon, and Lieutenant Loudoun Harcourt Gordon.

Charles, fourth earl of Aboyne, born about 1726, succeeded his father in 1732 After coming of age, being apprehensive that his small estate would not be sufficient to enable him to live suitably to his rank in Scotland, he sent his luggage to Paris, intending to reside in France, but afterwards ordered it to be brought back, and by attending carefully to the judicious cultivation of his landed property, forming plantations, building extensive stone fences to enclose and subdivide his estate, and the introduction of improved modes of agriculture, his tenants were enabled easily to pay advanced rents for their farms, so that he soon cleared the estate of debt. He died at Edinburgh, 26th December 1794, in his 68th year He married, first, at Edinburgh, 22d April 1759, Lady Margaret Stewart, third daughter of the sixth earl of Galloway, and by her he had a son, George, fifth earl of Aboyne, and ninth marquis of Huntly, and two daughters, Lady Cathe-rate and Lady Margaret, the latter the first wife of William Beckford, Esq. of Fonthill-Gifford, author of 'Vathek.' His lordship married, secondly, Lady Mary Douglas, only surviving daughter of the ninth earl of Morton, by his first wife, Agatha, daughter of James Hallyburton of Pitour, and had a son, the Hon. George Douglas Gordon, born in London, 10th October 1777, who, on the death of his cousin, the Hon Hamilton Douglas Hallyburton of Pitour, in 1784, succeeded to his extensive property in Forfarshire, in right of his mother, and in consequence assumed the name and arms of Hallyburton. He was a colonel in the army, and long M P for Forfarshire. On the succession of his brother of the half-blood to the marquisate of Huntly he was allowed the title and precedency of a marquis' youngest son, 24th June 1836. Lord Douglas Hallyburton married Louisa, only child of Sir Edward Leslie of Tarbert, county Kerry, baronet, who had no issue. He died 25th December 1841 His widow survived him for ten years

George, ninth marquis of Huntly, eldest son of Charles, fourth earl of Aboyne, was born at Edinburgh 28th June 1761 Lord Strathaven, as he was then called, entered the army at such an early age, that in December 1777, before he had completed his seventeenth year, he was promoted from an ensigncy in the first regiment of foot-guards to a company in the 81st regiment of foot—then, we believe, a Highland regiment. In 1780 he was appointed one of the aides de-camp to Frederick earl of Carlisle, then lord lieutenant of Ireland. He had a troop in the ninth regiment of dragoons in 1782, when Lord Carlisle was displaced from the Irish viceroyalty, and in March next year he became major of an independent corps of foot, which was reduced at the peace of September 1783. He now visited France, and his agreeable person, sprightly manners, and admirable skill in dancing, soon rendered him as much a favourite at the court of Louis XVI as his ill-fated ancestor, the second marquis of Huntly, had been, a hundred and fifty years before, when, as "Monsieur le marquis de Gordon," he commanded the Scots guard in the court of Louis XIII The attention shown to "the gay Gordon" by Maria Antoinette was one of the points of slander with which that unfortunate princess was assailed. We read, for instance, in the correspondence of Mirabeau with the count de la Marck, that "the Polignacs spoke maliciously of the queen's delight in dancing Ecossaises with young Lord Strathaven, at the little balls which were given at Madame d'Ossun's." At the beginning of the Revolution he left France for England. In 1788 he exchanged from half-pay to the majority of the 35th regiment of foot, and in April 1789 was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel of that regiment. In the same year he exchanged his lieutenant-colonelcy, for the company in the Coldstream guards held by Lieutenant-colonel Lennox, afterwards duke of Richmond and Lennox—the duel between that officer and the late duke of York, then colonel of the Coldstream, rendering it desirable that he should quit the regiment. Lord Strathaven himself left the army in 1792, about a twelvemonth after his marriage with Catherine, second daughter of the late Sir Charles Cope of Bewerne, Oxfordshire, and Overton or Orton Longueville, Huntingdonshire, baronet—a cadet of the family which had for its head the Sir John Cope so famous in the songs and annals of the rebellion of 1745

On the death of his father 28th December 1794, Lord Strathaven succeeded to the titles of earl of Aboyne, and Lord Gordon of Strathaven and Glenlivet, created in the year 1660, to reward, in the person of a younger son, the signal loyalty and sufferings of the house of Huntly during the great civil war In 1796 Lord Aboyne was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, an honour which he enjoyed by successive re-elections until the year 1815, when he was created a peer of the United Kingdom by the title of Lord Meldrum of Morven. In 1803 he had been appointed colonel of the Aberdeenshire militia, and continued to hold that office till his death. He also held a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, of the creation of 1625.

George, fifth duke of Gordon, and eighth marquis of Huntly, died on the 28th May 1836, without issue. The ducal honours, dating from 1684, had been restricted to the heirs male of the body of the first duke, and, in default of these, now expired. The title of marquis of Huntly, created in 1599, had a wider destination It was conferred on the first marquis and his heirs male, and so now appeared to devolve on the earl of Aboyne. His lordship accordingly claimed the honour, and his claim being remitted to the lords committee of privileges, he led proof (1) that the direct male line of Huntly and Gordon, derived through Lewis, third marquis of Huntly, from George, first marquis of Huntly, the patentee, his grandfather, failed in the person of George, fifth and last duke of Gordon; (2) that the younger male descendants of the above class of heirs sprung from the fourth, third, and second dukes of Gordon, have also failed; and (3) that the claimant is the direct male descendant of Charles, first earl of Aboyne, immediate younger brother of Lewis, third marquis of Huntly, and fourth son of George, second marquis of Huntly, son and heir of the patentee, and, as such, the nearest heir male of his body His claim was sustained, and he was accordingly declared to have right to the titles of marquis of Huntly, earl of Enzie, Viscount Melgum and Aboyne, lord of Badenoch and Aboyne. He thus became the premier marquis of Scotland, and the chief of the great House of Gordon This accession of honours brought with it no accession of fortune, for the ancient patrimony of the Gordons, including all that remained to them of the once broad lordships of Strathbogie, Badenoch, and the Enzie, devolved through a female heir on the duke of Richmond and Lennox, and the new marquis of Huntly enjoyed only his paternal barony of Aboyne, which had been settled upon his ancestor, as the appanage of a second son, in the middle of the seventeenth century Lord Huntly had early begun to add to his territorial possessions; but his ambition proved greater than his means, and he had scarcely attained his marquisate when his pecuniary embarrassments—springing in a great measure from ill-advised purchases of land, and the absconding of a confidential agent, disappointing him of at least £80,000,—caused him to procure a sequestration of his estates. His liabilities amounted to £517,500, and by judicious management and his extended age, about seventeen shillings in the pound, without interest, was, in the course of time, paid to his creditors. His lordship in 1827 was chosen a knight of the Thistle. He was also aide-de-camp to the queen, and a deputy lieutenant of Forfarshire and Aberdeenshire. He had never much distinguished himself in political matters, and in his latter years he withdrew altogether into private life. He died June 17th, 1853, within a fortnight of his 93d year By his lady, who died in 1832, he got the estate of Orton Longueville in Huntingdonshire, to which he added largely by the purchase of the two adjoining parishes. He had by her six sons and two daughters, Lady Catherine, married in 1814, to the Hon. Charles Campton Cavendish, and Lady Charlotte Sophia. The sons were 1 Charles, first styled Lord Strathaven, and on his father's becoming marquis of Huntly, earl of Aboyne and Enzie, who succeeded as tenth marquis of Huntly 2 The Rev Lord George, born in 1794, who became, in 1819, rector of Chesterton and Haddon, Huntingdonshire, which had been purchased by his father in 1803. 3. Lord John Frederick Gordon, born 15th August 1799, captain R.N. and K.C.H., and at one period M.P for Forfarshire, who, on succeeding, on his uncle's death, to the estate of Pitfour, assumed the additional name of Hallyburton. He married, in 1836, Lady Augusta Fitzclarence, natural daughter of King William IV, and widow of the Hon John Kennedy Erskine, of Dun, Forfarshire. 4. Lord Henry, born in 1802, in the military service of the Hon. East India Company at Bengal 5 Lord Cecil, born in 1806, who, on his marriage in 1841, to the daughter of Maurice Crosby Moore, assumed the additional name of Moore. 6. Lord Francis Arthur, born in 1808, married in 1835, the only daughter of Sir William Keir Grant, K.C.B., and in 1837 became a captain 1st life-guards.

Charles, tenth marquis of Huntly, born at Orton in 1792, was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he graduated M A in 1812 When Lord Strathaven, (the second title of the earl of Aboyne,) he was M.P for East Grinstead, from 1818 to 1830, and sat for Huntingdonshire in the latter year, but was unsuccessful in the election of 1831 He was a lord in waiting to the queen, but resigned in 1841; a deputy-lieutenant of Aberdeenshire. He married, 1st, in 1826, Lady Elisabeth Henrietta, eldest daughter of the first marquis Conyngham, without issue. She died in 1839, and his lordship married, secondly, in 1844, Mary Antoinetta, only surviving daughter of the Rev Peter William Pegus, by his wife, the countess-dowager of Lindsey, issue, Charles, earl of Aboyne and Enzie, born March 5, 1847, six other sons, and four daughters

HUTTON, JAMES, an eminent geologist and philosopher, the son of a merchant in Edinburgh, who was at one time city treasurer, was born there, June 3, 1726 He was educated at the High school, and entered the university of his native city in 1740 In 1743, he became an apprentice to a writer to the signet, but the bent of his inclination was directed towards chemistry, and we are told that instead of studying the law, he was more frequently found amusing the other young men in the office in which he had been placed, with chemical experiments. Having adopted the profession of medicine, after attending three years at the medical classes of Edinburgh, he repaired to Paris, where he remained two years. He returned home by way of Leyden, at the university of which place he took his degree of M.D. in September 1749 Afterwards, in conjunction with a Mr James Davie, with whom he had become acquainted in London, he established at Edinburgh a manufacture of sal ammoniac from coal soot, which for many years was carried on with considerable success. Having little chance of getting into practice as a doctor of medicine, he resolved to apply himself to agriculture, and, with this view, he resided for some time at the house of a farmer in the county of Norfolk, occasionally making journeys on foot into different other parts of England, and on the road prosecuting his researches in geology and mineralogy He also set out on a similar tour through the Netherlands

In the summer of 1754 he commenced agriculturist on a small property in Berwickshire left him by his father, and having brought a plough and ploughman with him from Norfolk, he introduced the improved mode of husbandry practised in that county In 1768, he removed to Edinburgh, and thenceforth devoted his whole attention to scientific pursuits In 1777, appeared his first publication, a small pamphlet on the distinction between coal and culm, a question then agitated before the board of customs and privy council, for the purpose of ascertaining the proportion of duty which ought to be levied on each, when carried coastwise In 1794 he published a metaphysical work, entitled 'An Investigation of the Principles of Knowledge, and the Progress of Reason from Sense to Science and Philosophy,' 3 vols. 4to In the following year appeared, in two vols 8vo, his great work, entitled 'The Theory of the Earth,' with proofs and illustrations, in four parts. An outline of this 'Theory' had been originally communicated to the Royal Society of Edinburgh, in the first volume of whose Transactions it was published, but his system of geology, which refers the structure of the solid parts of the earth to the action of fire, having excited a warm controversy among men of science, and met with a severe attack from Dr Kirwan of Dublin, Dr Hutton was induced to enlarge and publish separately the entire work In support of his 'Theory' he had, during a long course of years, accumulated a variety of facts, having undertaken journeys not only through Scotland, but also through England and Wales, and different parts of the continent of Europe. His hypothesis was countenanced by the celebrated chemist Dr Black, Mr. Clerk of Eldin, and other scientific men, and was ably defended by Professor Playfair, who, in 1802, published his 'Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth' In the first volume of the 'Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh,' he also published a paper entitled 'A Theory of Rain,' which met with a vigorous opposition from M de Luc, and became a subject of controversy. He next commenced a work, to be entitled 'Elements of Agriculture,' which was intended to form four volumes 8vo, but which his death prevented him from completing His health had begun to decline in 1792, and in the summer of 1793 he was seized with a dangerous illness, from which he never entirely recovered He died, unmarried, 26th March 1797 He retained his faculties to the last, and wrote a good deal the day he died A characteristic portrait of him, in full length, is given in the first volume of Kay's Edinburgh portraits, where is also a head of him in conjunction with that of his friend Dr Black

HYNDFORD, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed from 1701, by a family of the name of Carmichael till 1817, when it became dormant. Sir James Carmichael, son of Walter Carmichael of Hyndford, by Grizel, daughter of Sir John Carmichael of Meadowflat, was originally designed of Westerraw, but on succeeding his cousin, Sir John Carmichael (see vol i. p. 591) in the estates of Carmichael, in Lanarkshire, he took the latter designation He is represented as having been possessed of all the accomplishments of the age in which he lived, and, when young, excelling all his contemporaries in athletic exercises. He was introduced, by the earl of Dunbar, at the court of James VI, who appointed him, first, one of his cupbearers, afterwards his carver, and then chamberlain of the principality In this latter department he conducted himself with prudence and integrity for many years. By Charles I. he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 17th July 1627, appointed sheriff-principal of Lanarkshire, 5th September 1632, and in 1634 was made master of the ceremonies and lord-justice-clerk The latter office he resigned, on being constituted depute-treasurer 14th October 1636. He was admitted one of the judges of the court of session 6th March 1639 In August 1641, he was appointed by the Estates a privy councillor for life, and one of the commissioners for the plantation of kirks and valuation of teinds. On 18th November of the same year he was elected by the king and estates treasurer-depute for life, and the office of lord-high-treasurer being at the same time put into commission, he was named one of the commissioners, without, however, receiving any share of the emoluments.

During the civil wars he remained faithful to Charles I., and lent his majesty considerable sums of money; for which he was created a baron in the Scots peerage, by the title of Lord Carmichael, to him and his heirs male whatever, 27th December 1647, which patent was not made public, and he continued to be styled Sir James Carmichael of that ilk, till 3d January 1651, when another patent was issued ratifying the former He adhered to the 'Engagement' in 1648, for the rescue of the king, and was, in consequence, deprived of all his offices by the Act of Classes, 10th March 1649; that of treasurer-depute being, however, bestowed on his second son, Sir Daniel Carmichael In Douglas' Peerage, it is erroneously stated that after the accession of Charles II he was sworn a privy councillor, and again appointed lord-justice-clerk. By Cromwell's act of grace and pardon he was, in 1654, fined £2,000 He died 29th Nov., 1672, in his 94th year By his wife, Agnes, sister of John Wilkie of Foulden, he had three sons and four daughters. The sons were, 1 William, master of Carmichael, who, in his youth, went over to France, and was one of the gens d'armes of Louis XIII After his return to Scotland he joined the party against the king, and in 1644 and 1645 was one of the committee of Estates. He commanded the Clydesdale regiment in the service of the Estates against the marquis of Montrose at the battle of Philiphaugh, in 1646 He died in 1657 By his wife, Lady Grizel Douglas, third daughter of the first marquis of Douglas, he had, with two daughters, a son, John, second Lord Carmichael. 2 The Hon Sir Daniel Carmichael of Hyndford and Mauldsley, Lanarkshire, treasurer-depute to King Charles II 3 Hon Sir James Carmichael of Bonnytoun, a colonel in the royal army at the battle of Dunbar in 1650

John, second Lord Carmichael and first earl of Hyndford, born 28th February 1638, succeeded his grandfather in the former title in 1672 He entered early into the Revolution, and in 1689 was by King William appointed one of the commissioners of the privy seal, and a privy councillor In 1698 and 1699, he proved himself a true patriot in the important affair of the Darien expedition In the latter year he was lord-high-commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and from 1694 to 1699, both inclusive, he held the same high office In 1693, he had the command of a regiment of dragoons, which he held till reduced at the peace of Ryswick in October 1697 In 1696, he was appointed secretary of state. He was created earl of Hyndford, Viscount Inglisberry and Nemphlar, and Lord Carmichael, 25th June 1701, by patent to him and his heirs male and of entail. On the accession of Queen Anne, he was sworn a privy councillor In 1705, he was one of the commissioners for the treaty of union, which measure he steadily supported in parliament. He died 20th September 1710, in his 73d year He had married, 9th October, 1669, Beatrix Drummond, second daughter of the third Lord Madderty, and with three daughters had seven sons, namely, 1 James, second earl of Hyndford 2 William, of Skirling, who was twice married, and by his first wife, Helen, only child of Thomas Craig of Riccarton, had three sons and two daughters. John, his eldest son, succeeded as fourth earl of Hyndford. 3 Daniel, of Mauldsley, whose grandson, Thomas Carmichael of Mauldsley, became fifth earl 4 David, advocate. 5 John 6 Charles. These two last were drowned on the coast of Holland, as they were going to travel on the continent. 7 Archibald.

James, second earl of Hyndford, was, in 1706, appointed a colonel of dragoons, and in 1710, the year in which he succeeded to the title, he had the rank of a brigadier-general. He died 16th August, 1737 By his countess, Lady Elizabeth Maitland, only daughter of the fifth earl of Lauderdale, he had, with six daughters, five sons, namely, 1 John, third earl 2 Hon. and Right Rev William Carmichael, LL.D, archdeacon of Bucks in 1742, consecrated bishop of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh in Ireland, 5th January, 1758, translated to the see of Leighlin and Ferns, in 1758, to that of Meath in the same year, and, finally, appointed archbishop of Dublin, in June 1765 He died at Bath, 16th December thereafter, without issue. 3. Hon. James Carmichael, M P for the Lanark burghs, who died in 1754, unmarried 4 Hon Archibald Carmichael, page of honour to George II He had a cornetcy of horse in 1731, and died captain of marines at Minorca, of a fever, 7th March, 1745 And 5 the Hon. Charles Carmichael, who died in the service of the East India Company at Bombay, in 1732, aged twenty The eldest daughter, Lady Margaret, married in January 1717, Sir John Anstruther of Anstruther, in the county of Fife, baronet, with issue, in virtue of which marriage, on the failure of the male line of the earls of Hyndford in 1817, their descendant, Sir John Anstruther of Anstruther, succeeded to the entailed estates of the earldom, and in consequence assumed the additional name of Carmichael (see ANSTRUTHER, surname of, vol i page 142).

Of John, third earl of Hyndford, a memoir has already been given in vol i page 592 His lordship was twice married: first, in September 1732, to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the celebrated admiral, Sir Cloudesley Shovel, knight, and widow of the first Lord Romney; and, secondly, to Jean, daughter of Benjamin Vigor of Fulham, Middlesex. By his first wife he had one son, who died in his childhood, 13th August, 1736. By his second wife he had no issue. On his death, the earldom devolved upon his cousin, John, eldest son of the Hon. William Carmichael of Skirling, second son of the first earl.

John, fourth earl of Hyndford, born 5th May 1710, passed advocate in 1737 He succeeded his father in the estate of Skirling in 1759, and his cousin, the third earl, in his titles and estates in 1767 He married Janet, eldest daughter and heiress of William Grant of Prestongrange, a lord of session, under the title of Lord Prestongrange, but had no issue. He died at Edinburgh 21st December 1787, in his 78th year. His paternal property went to his grand-nephew, Sir John Gibson Carmichael of Skirling, and his other estates and his titles to his cousin, Thomas Carmichael of Mauldsley, fourth and then only surviving son of Daniel Carmichael of Mauldsley, eldest son of the Hon Daniel Carmichael, third son of the first earl.

Thomas, fifth earl, succeeded his eldest brother, Daniel, in the estate of Mauldsley in 1778, and his cousin in the earldom and the estate of Carmichael in 1767 He died unmarried, 14th February 1811, and was succeeded by his next brother, Andrew, sixth earl, who had been for several years in the 16th regiment of light dragoons, and served with it in America, during the revolutionary war, but quitted the army in 1794 He died in 1817, when his titles became dormant. The earldom is claimed by Sir James-Robert Carmichael, baronet, the representative of the Carmichaels of Balmaddy who derived from Robert, youngest brother of William, ancestor of the earls of Hyndford. The barony of Carmichael is said to be represented by Andrew Carmichael, Esq, Dublin.

ILAY, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1706 on Lord Archibald Campbell, brother of the duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and merged in the dukedom of Argyle in 1743, on his succeeding to that title (See vol. i p. 568)

INGLIS, a surname of great antiquity in the south of Scotland, generally supposed to be derived from the word English There is, however, a Scottish word that comes nearer to it, namely, ingle, a chimney fire. In the reign of Alexander III this surname had become numerous in Scotland. (See Douglas' Baronage, pages 198 and 264) Walter de Inglis, John de Inglis, Philip de Inglis, and others of the name, were in possession of landed property, when Edward I overran Scotland in 1296 They had large possessions in Roxburghshire in very early times, particularly the lands and barony of Branksome, &c.

The old family of the Inglises of Manner or Mannerhead traced their descent from Sir William Inglis, a knight of great courage in the reigns of Robert II and Robert III., who, in 1395, distinguished himself at Buel-haugh on the borders, when Sir Thomas Struthers, an English champion, had vauntingly defied any Scotsman to meet him in single combat. Sir William Inglis accepted the challenge, and killed him on the spot, and for that gallant action the latter monarch made him a grant of the lands and barony of Manner, by royal charter, dated in 1396 He died about 1420 His son, John Inglis of Manner, got a charter of confirmation of the barony from Archibald duke of Turenne and earl of Douglas, as superior of these lands. According to Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i. p. 84), as he held most of his other lands in Roxburghshire of the earls of Douglas, he added three stars on a chief to his paternal coat of Inglis, to denote his connexion with, and dependence on, that illustrious house. His son, Thomas Inglis of Manner, exchanged, (charter of Excambion dated at Edinburgh, 23d July 1446,) the lands of Branksome or Branksholme, and others in Roxburghshire, with Sir Walter Scott of Murthockstone or Murdieston in Lanarkshire, progenitor of the dukes of Buccleuch, for the lands and barony of Murdieston. These were conferred on his eldest son, and the family continued in the male line as barons of Murdieston, for some generations afterwards, but at last ended in an heiress, married to a descendant of the family of Hamilton, who, in consequence, assumed the name and arms of Inglis of Murdieston. The estate of Manner went to a second son. Thomas, the eleventh baron of Manner, sold it in 1709, and dying without issue, the representation of that branch of the family devolved on his cousin Charles, son of Thomas Inglis of Craigend. This Charles, a writer in Edinburgh, was clerk to the bills. He died in 1743, leaving a son, Charles, who succeeded him in his office of clerk to the bills. The family is now extinct.

Among families of this name, Nisbet also mentions Inglis of Newtonlees, and Inglis of St Leonards, cadets of Murdieston.

The immediate ancestor of the Inglises of Cramond, a family which once possessed a baronetcy, now extinct, was James Inglis a merchant of Edinburgh about the time of the Reformation, 1560 His son, Archibald, also a merchant in Edinburgh, acquired great wealth, and died in 1599, leaving a son, James, who purchased the lands of Nether Cramond, Mid Lothian, and got a charter of the same from Alexander, bishop of Dunkeld, the superior, dated 19th March, 1624 His grandson, Sir James Inglis of Cramond, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia by King James VII, 22d March 1687 On his death, the following year, his son, then a minor, became second baronet. He was appointed postmaster-general for Scotland in 1717, and held that office till 1725 He was again installed into the same in 1742 The title became extinct on the death of Sir Patrick Inglis, the fifth baronet, in December 1817, without issue.

INGLIS, Sir James, a dignified priest, supposed to have been the author of 'The Complaynt of Scotland,' first published at St Andrews in 1548, flourished in the early part of the sixteenth century He was esteemed in his time as a poet and man of learning, and is alluded to by Sir David Lindsay in his Prologue to the Papingo, as writer of "ballattis, farsis, and plesand playis" None of his poetical pieces have come down to us, except 'A General Satire,' printed by Hailes and Sibbald About 1515 he was secretary to Queen Margaret, widow of James IV, and, in February 1527, he is styled chancellor of the royal chapel of Stirling He was soon after created abbot of Culross, and was murdered, March 1, 1530, by Blackater, laird of Tullhallan, with an accomplice, a priest of the same abbey, named Sir William Lothian, and, for the crime, they were beheaded at Edinburgh Mackenzie, evidently confounding him with another person of the same name, inaccurately states that Inglis died in 1554 'The Complaynt of Scotland,' which is the earliest Scottish prose work extant, and contains a minute account of the manners, customs, and popular literature of Scotland at the period at which it was written, has also been attributed to James Wedderburn and Sir David Lindsay

INGLIS, John, D D, an eminent divine, was born in Perthshire in 1763 His father was minister of Tippermuir, a charge to which he himself succeeded Among his brethren he was distinguished for the vigour of his understanding, the soundness of his judgment, and the great knowledge which he possessed of all ecclesiastical matters, so that he was soon enabled to take a lead in all questions relating to the discipline and government of the church In 1796 he was presented to the charge of the Old Greyfriars' church, Edinburgh, in which he became the colleague of Dr Erskine, and the successor of Principal Robertson Moderator of the General Assembly in 1804, he was subsequently appointed one of the deans of the chapel royal For nearly 30 years he was the leader of the presbytery of Edinburgh He died at Edinburgh, Jan 2, 1834, aged 71 Besides some minor publications, he left a work on the Evidence of Christianity, and another in defence of Ecclesiastical Establishments, the latter published in 1838

Inglis, John, eldest son of the preceding born in Edinburgh in 1810, was educated at the High School of his native city, and afterwards studied, first at the university of Glasgow, and then at Baliol College, Oxford, graduating B.A, 1834, and M A Oxon 1836 He passed advocate in 1835 In 1852 he was appointed solicitor general for Scotland, and soon after lord advocate, but only held the latter appointment for 7 months. In November of the same year, he was elected dean of the faculty of advocates. In 1857 he was chosen lord-rector of the university of Aberdeen, and received thence the degree of doctor of laws. In Feb 1858, he was again appointed lord advocate, and elected M P for Stamford In June of the same year, he became lord-justice-clerk, when he took the judicial title, as lord of session, of Lord Glencorse In 1859 he became D C L of Oxford He married the youngest daughter of Lord Wood, (a lord of session) with issue She died in 1855

INGLIS, Henry David, a pleasing and popular writer, whose early works were published under the name of Derwent Conway, was the only son of an advocate in Edinburgh, where he was born in 1795 His maternal grandmother was the daughter of the celebrated Colonel Gardiner, who fell at the battle of Prestonpans, and through this lady, herself the authoress of an heroic poem, Mr Inglis was allied to the noble house of Buchan He is chiefly known as a writer of travels, but he excelled also in fiction His first work was entitled 'Tales of Ardennes,' which was followed, in 1828, by 'Solitary Walks through Many Lands' His 'Travels in Norway and Sweden' appeared in 1829, 'Switzerland and the Pyrenees,' in 1831, 'Spain in 1830,' the same year,

'Travels in the Tyrol,' 1833; and in the subsequent year, 'Ireland in 1834,' and 'The Channel Islands' Of his fictitious works, his 'New Gil Blas' has been ranked as the best, yet it was the only one of them all that was unsuccessful Mr Inglis died at London, of a disease of the brain, March 20, 1835

INNES, a local surname of great antiquity, derived from the British Yyss, (Gaelic Inis,) and having the same signification as its derivative Inch, an island. The name, as given to the barony of Innes in the parish of Urquhart, in Moray, is very appropriate, part of it being an island formed by two branches of a stream running through the estate. The word is also sometimes used to denote level ground near a river One Berowald, a supposed Fleming, a person of considerable rank and distinction in the reign of Malcolm IV (1153—1165) got a charter from that monarch, for good services done against the rebellious natives of Moray, of the lands of 'Innes and Easter Urcart,' wherein he is styled Berowald Flandrensis. This charter is dated, as was the practice in those days, from a remarkable era, "apud Perth, in natali Domini proximo post concordiam regis et Sumerledi," &c. As there were two reconciliations of the Sumerleds to the crown, one in 1154, and the other in 1164, and as William, bishop of Moray, one of the witnesses, died in 1162, the date must refer to Christmas 1154.

Berowald's grandson, Walter, was the first that assumed the surname of Innes from his lands, and thus was the progenitor of all the Inneses in Scotland He got a confirmation of the charter of his estate from Alexander II in 1226. Walter's grandson, William, was the first designed, in the chartulary of Moray, dominus de Innes, and his son, also named William, is mentioned in the burgh records of Elgin as baron de Innes. The grandson of the latter, Alexander, the seventh from Berowald and the eighth of his house, had three sons. 1 Sir Walter, who, on his death in 1393, succeeded him, but died unmarried 2 Sir Robert, who continued the line of the family, and 3 John, bishop of Moray, from 1406 to 1414 It appears from his tombstone that this prelate gave great assistance to the rebuilding of Elgin cathedral.

The second son, called the good Sir Robert, by his marriage with dame Janet Aberkerder, daughter and heiress of Sir David, thane of the lands of that name, was enabled to leave both the estates of Innes and Aberkerder to his son, Sir Walter, who received a charter to the latter estate, dated January 16, 1426, from Lord Lindsay of the Byres, the then superior He had also another in 1433 from the earl of Ross. By his first wife, Eupham Fraser, daughter of the first Lord Lovat, he had, with two daughters, three sons 1 Sir Robert, his heir 2 Berowald-Rufus, or the Red, designed of Hatton, from whom some of the Inneses of Caithness are descended, and 3. John, bishop of Caithness, who died in 1448. By a second wife he had a son, John, of Ardmilly, ancestor of several families of the name of Innes. The eldest son, Sir Robert Innes, distinguished himself at the battle of Brechin in 1452 He married a daughter of the baron of Drumlanrig, by whom he had, with two daughters, three sons: 1 James, his heir 2. Walter, ancestor of the Inneses of Innermarkie, afterwards of Balvenny, of whom were descended the Inneses of Cockstone, Orton, Inchbrakie, Auchintoul, &c.; and 3 Robert, progenitor of the Inneses of Dreynie, &c. He died before 1464. His son, James of that ilk, called "James with the beard," was armour-bearer to King James III., and from that monarch he had charters of several lands in Moray According to the family papers, he married Janet Gordon, daughter of the third earl of Huntly, and, with two daughters, had two sons, Alexander, and Robert; the latter first designed of Cromy, and afterwards of Rathmakenzie, who carried on the line of the family By a second wife, he had four sons, from whom are descended several families of the name of Innes.

Alexander, the eldest son, the 17th laird of Innes, possessed a vast estate, having got no less than six charters under the great seal, of lands and baronies, in the years 1493, 1507, 1528, and 1533. By a precept from his uncle, George, earl of Huntly, dated 8th Sept. in the first mentioned of these years, he was infeft in the whole lands of the forestry of the Boyne. He died before 1541 He had two sons: Alexander, his heir, and William, of Forrester-seat, who, "in his old days," succeeded his brother, and a daughter, Margaret, married to her cousin, James Innes of Cromy The author of the 'Historical Account of the Family of Innes,' (Edin 1820, 4to,) says: "It appears by their many agreements that both these Alexanders (father and son) had been very uneasy to the brother (of the former), Robert of Rathmakenzie and his family, which may be one reason why God, in his justice a little after this, extinguishes the race of Alexander, and leaves the inheritance to the children of his oppressed brother, Robert," (page 32). By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Lord Forbes, Alexander had only a daughter, the wife of William Sinclair, brother of the earl of Caithness. The latter had sent over his brother to engage the lady for him, but she preferred William to his lordship, and brought with her for tocher the lands of Dunbaith and parish of Reay, which had till then belonged to the house of Innes. Alexander had several natural sons, to whom he gave landed estates, and from them some families of the name of Innes are descended

His brother, William, of Forrester-seat, and 19th laird of Innes, had two sons and a daughter, the latter married to Robert Innes, younger, of Innermarkie. The elder son, Alexander Innes of that ilk, married Lady Janet Gordon, eldest daughter of the 14th earl of Sutherland. He is represented as having been of a proud and violent disposition, which involved him in several lawsuits with kinsmen of his own, one of whom was Innes of Pethnok In 1576 he met this gentleman at the cross of Edinburgh, when some high words passed between them, and the laird of Innes killed him on the spot with a blow from his dagger Instead of trying to escape, however, he remained walking up and down at the cross for some time, until the earl of Morton, then regent, sent a guard to apprehend him He was imprisoned in the castle, and for the crime was soon after tried, condemned, and executed. The family account above quoted states (page 36) that, after condemnation, he had made an agreement with the regent for a remission of the sentence, giving him for it, the barony of Kilmalemnock, worth 24,000 merks of yearly rent, but "the evening after the agreement was made, and writ given, being merry with his friends, at a collation, and talking anent the dearness of the ransom the regent had made him pay for his life, he vaunted that, had he his foot once loose, he would fain see what earle of Morton durst come and possess his lands, which being told to the regent that night, he resolved to play sure game with him, and, therefore, though what he spoke was in drink, the very next day he put the sentence of death in execution against him, by causing his head to be struck off in the castle, and then possest the estate." Having no male issue, he was succeeded by his brother, John Innes of Innes. John, of a weak, inactive, and facile disposition, having no issue, was induced to enter into a mutual bond of entail with Alexander Innes of Cromy, his cousin and nearest heir male, son of James Innes of Cromy, who was killed at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547 By this deed, dated 15th March 1577, it was agreed that failing heirs male of either, the other should succeed to their whole estates, and as Alexander of Cromy immediately assumed the title of Innes of that ilk, and acted as head of the family, even in the lifetime of laird John, great dissatisfaction was expressed by the other relatives, particularly by Robert Innes of Innermarkie, who was highly incensed at such a settlement of the estates. The family annalist says that Cromy, who was one of the bravest of his race, offered to meet Innermarkie in single combat, and to lay the deed of entail on the grass, to see if he durst take it up, but that the latter declined this, by, as he pretended, the persuasions of his friends. He had, however, resolved upon Cromy's death and he shortly after carried his design into execution. Alexander of Cromy was twice married, and by his second wife, Isobel, daughter of Arthur Forbes of Balfour, brother of the eighth Lord Forbes, had a son, Robert, who succeeded him In April 1580 he had gone to Aberdeen, for the purpose of seeing his only son, Robert, then about sixteen years old, who had been taken ill at college. With a considerable number of attendants, Innes of Innermarkie and laird John, whom he had induced, by his representations, to believe that he had been cheated out of his inheritance by his cousin, Alexander of Cromy, rode to Aberdeen, and about midnight arrived at Alexander's lodging By raising the cry of "Help! a Gordon! a Gordon!" as if a sudden fray had taken place in the street, they succeeded in arousing him Warmly attached to the Gordons, he started from his bed, and seizing his sword, opened a door that led to the court below, when Innermarkie immediately shot him through the body Such of his followers as were near then fell upon him and stabbed him with their daggers. Laird John was compelled, by threats, to do the same, and Innermarkie actually forced John Innes, afterwards of Cockstone, then a youth at school, to rise from his bed, and plunge a dagger up to the hilt, into the body of his murdered kinsman The assassins next intended to seize the son, Robert Innes, but alarmed by the noise, the young man, sick as he was, had left his bed, and by the help of a friend, escaped by a back-door into the garden, whence he was taken to the house of a neighbour

Innermarkie then took off the dead man's signet ring from his finger, and having bribed one of his servants, he despatched him, with it, to Innes house, to show it to the widow of his master, as from her husband, and to ask, as if by his orders, for the box containing the title-deeds of the estate, with the deed of entail. The lady accordingly delivered up the box, and allowed him to depart. A young kinsman of the family, Alexander Innes, afterwards of Cotts, being then at Innes house, felt a strong inclination to return with the messenger, to see his sick friend, young Robert Innes, and on his leaving the stable he jumped up behind him on the horse's back. A scuffle ensued between them, when the servant drew his dagger, but the youth wrested it from him, and stabbed him with it, so that he fell off the horse dead The youth then returned to Innes house with the box and deeds, and told what had happened. At this very time, another servant arrived from Aberdeen, with the news of the murder Lady Innes secured all the papers, and fled for protection to her friends, who immediately conducted her to the king, to whom she made her complaint. The earl of Huntly, a relation by blood of the family of Innes, on hearing of the murder, hastened to Aberdeen for the protection of young Robert Innes, whom he carried to Edinburgh, and for greater security placed him under the guardianship of the third Lord Elphinstone.

In the meantime, Laird John and Innermarkie had proceeded to Innes house, and the former was re-invested in the estates. Five weeks after the slaughter, on 17th May 1580, Innermarkie got from Laird John a new disposition of the estate of Innes in his favour, reserving his own liferent. Two years afterwards they were declared outlaws, and Robert Innes, who had married Lord Elphinstone's daughter, went north from Edinburgh, with a commission against them both, and all others who had been accessory to his father's death. Laird John endeavoured to escape to the south, but was discovered, apprehended, and sent back to Innes house, by the friends of Lord Elphinstone. Robert did not put him to death, but made him sign his name to various writs, and compelled him to give up the charter chest with all the deeds it contained. Innermarkie took refuge for a while in the hills, but afterwards had a retreat, of difficult access, within the house of Edinglassie. In September 1584, he was surprised there by the young laird of Innes, and a party of adherents, the place of his concealment being first entered by Alexander Innes, the slayer of the faithless servant, who ever after got, in consequence, the name of 'Craig-in-peril' Innermarkie was instantly slain, his head cut off, and conveyed to Lady Innes, who made a journey to Edinburgh with it, for the purpose of laying it at the feet of the king, "a thing," says the relater, "too masculine to be commended in a woman" (Hist. Account of the Family of Innes, pp. 50--58.) The animosity between the families subsisted till November 1587, when, by the interposition of influential friends, all differences were accommodated, and the parties reconciled by mutual contract, the son of Innermarkie having renounced all pretensions to the estate and chiefship of Innes.

Robert, the 23d Innes of that ilk, by his wife, dame Elizabeth Elphinstone, had, with three daughters, two sons, Sir Robert, who succeeded him, and Sir John, styled of Cromy, who was father of Sir Robert Innes of Muirtoun

The elder son, Sir Robert, 24th of that ilk, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, to him and his heirs male whatever, 29th May 1625, being the fourth on the roll The family annalist states that a cadet of the family, Innes of Balveny, with the view of obtaining precedence of his chief, had applied for a baronetcy, of which Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonston, a gentleman of the king's bedchamber, brother of the earl of Sutherland, and an intimate friend of Innes of Innes, sent him timely notice He immediately applied for one of a prior date, which was granted, and Balveny's deferred till 1628 Sir Robert was sworn a privy councillor for life, and appointed one of the committee of estates by the parliament, in 1641 He seems, however, to have been a royalist, for when he was forced to acknowledge the parliament in 1649, he was obliged to get his eldest son, Robert, to become surety for his good behaviour, in time to come. He had three sons and five daughters. The sons were Sir Robert, second baronet, James, of Lochnett, and Captain William Innes of the guards.

The eldest son, Sir Robert, second baronet, married Mary, daughter of Lord Ross of Hawkhead, and had, with six daughters, two sons, the younger of whom died unmarried.

The elder, Sir James, third baronet, married dame Margaret Ker, daughter of Henry, Lord Ker, only son and apparent heir of Robert earl of Roxburghe, in consequence of which marriage his great-grandson obtained the titles and estates of the dukedom of Roxburghe. With three daughters, Sir James had three sons Robert, who died in France before his father; Sir Hary, fourth baronet, and Hugh, who died in Flanders.

Sir Hary, fourth baronet, was elected M.P for Elginshire, in July 1704, and died 12th November 1721. By his wife, Jean, daughter of Duncan Forbes of Culloden, he had a numerous family, most of whom died young. One of his sons, Hary, succeeded as fifth baronet; and another, John, of Lochbroom, was an officer in the army

Sir Hary, fifth baronet, was appointed inspector of seizures in Scotland, in March 1748, and died in 1762. With five daughters, he had three sons. Hary, the eldest, having predeceased him, under age, James, the second, became sixth baronet. In 1767 he sold the estate of Innes to James, earl of Fife, and went to reside at Innes in Devonshire. On the decease of John, fourth duke of Roxburghe, 22d October 1805, Sir James Innes, as heir-general of the first earl of Roxburghe, assuming the additional name of Ker, claimed the titles and estates of that great family, and obtained them by a decision of the House of Lords in 1812 (see ROXBURGHE, duke of). In 1837 the duke of Roxburghe was created earl of Innes in the British peerage. The family annalist states that in the long course of their succession they were fortunate in three things. First, that their inheritance never went to a woman; next, that none of them ever married an ill wife, and, thirdly, that no friend ever suffered for their debt.

The family of Balveny, afterwards designed of Orton and Cockstoune, derive from Robert Innes, fifth baron of Innermarkie, the son of the murderer of Alexander Innes of Cromy above mentioned. He acquired from Lord Ochiltree the lands of Balveny, in Banffshire, to which he got a charter in 1615, and in consequence it became for a time the chief designation of the family He was created by Charles I., a baronet of Nova Scotia, 12th February 1631, the title being to him and his heirs male. He had three sons 1 Sir Walter, 2 William of Kinnermony, and 3. James, a colonel in the army The eldest son, Sir Walter, second baronet, and his son, Sir Robert, third baronet, suffered many hardships for their loyalty in the reigns of Charles I and II, and the family estate being greatly encumbered in consequence, was sold by the latter soon after the Restoration On the death of the fourth baronet without issue, the title devolved upon his cousin James, son of Walter Innes of Orton, in Speyside, and grandson of William Innes of Kinnermony, second son of the first baronet.

Sir James Innes of Orton, fifth baronet, had, with two daughters, five sons, and died in 1722 His eldest son, Sir Robert, of Orton, sixth baronet, received a liberal education, but on his father's death was left with scarcely any land or property, and having been brought up to no trade or profession, was compelled to enlist as a private soldier in a regiment of dragoons, dropping his title for the time. While doing duty as sentry one evening at the quarters of Colonel Winram, the commander of his regiment, he was accosted by a gentleman, who desired to see the colonel The stranger seemed struck with his appearance, and on being admitted, he informed Colonel Winram that the sentry before his door was a baronet of ancient lineage, Sir Robert Innes of Orton, who had disappeared suddenly from society, and it was supposed had entered the army The colonel immediately desired another sentinel to take his place, and Sir Robert to be ushered into his presence. Soon after he procured a cornetcy of dragoons for him. Sir Robert subsequently married the colonel's daughter and heiress, Margery Winram, and had an only surviving daughter, Catherine, married to James, 16th Lord Forbes. He died in 1758, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir Charles, sixth baronet, an officer in the army, on whose death in 1763, his next brother, Sir William, became 8th baronet. The latter died in 1817, when, having only daughters, the title reverted to his kinsman, Sir John Innes, of Edengight, Banffshire, lineal descendant of John Innes of Edengight, great-uncle of Sir Robert Innes, 1st baronet. On his death, March 28, 1829, his elder son, Sir John, became 10th baronet, at whose decease, Dec. 8, 1838, the title devolved on his brother Sir James Milne Innes, 11th baronet, born Feb. 24, 1806, married in 1837 Elisabeth, daughter of Alexander Thurburn, Esq of Keith, issue, John, born Nov. 25, 1840, 4 other sons and 3 daughters; a deputy-lieutenant of Banffshire.

The family of Innes of Rasmour in Kincardineshire is a branch of the family of Balveny above described Alexander Innes of Cowie and Breda, who died in 1788, was 2d son of John, 8th laird of Edingight, by Jane, daughter of Duff of Craigstone. His 2d son, William Innes of Rasmoir, born in 1781, married Jane, daughter of Alex. Brebner of Learney, has 2 sons and a dr Eldest son, Alex. Innes of Cowie, Kincardineshire, born 1812, has 2 sons and a daughter; 2d son, Thomas Innes of Learney, Aberdeenshire, b 1814, has 3 sons.

A family of the name of Innes, formerly designed of Cockstoune, and descended from Peter Innes of the Keam, younger son of Walter Innes of Innermarkie, above mentioned, hold a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, dating from 1631 Sir David Innes, bart., of this family, designed of Orton and Cockstoune, born in 1781, was the son of George Innes, Esq, inspector-general of stamp duties for Scotland, by the daughter of Sir James Innes, Bart. of Cockstoune. He was at one time an officer in the 99th foot. His son, George, was born in 1834; married; an officer in 22d Bombay native infantry

Of the family of Innes of Netherdale, Banffshire, Thomas Gilzean Rose Innes, Esq, only son of James Rose Innes, Esq of Netherdale, is the representative. He passed advocate at the Scottish bar in 1853, and in 1854 was appointed a deputy lieutenant of Banffshire.

INNES, THOMAS, superior of the Scots college at Paris, during the first part of the 18th century. In 1729, he published, at London, 'A Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of the Northern Parts of Britain,' 2 vols 8vo, which contains valuable information According to Wodrow, he was also engaged collecting materials for an 'Early History of the Church of Scotland,' which was never published He died in 1744 He succeeded his brother, Louis Innes, as principal of the Scots college, Paris. Louis held that office when James VII and II sought an asylum in France, and was made almoner to the queen, and secretary of state to the expatriated monarch. To Louis Innes is ascribed the compilation of 'The Memoirs of James II,' an abstract of which was published by Dr J S Clarke, at London, in 1806, in 2 vols. quarto

INNES, JOHN, an anatomist of considerable skill, was a native of the Highlands, and for many years dissector to Dr. Alexander Monro, professor of anatomy in the university of Edinburgh He was the author of a 'Short Description of the Human Muscles,' Edinburgh, 1776, and of 'Eight Anatomical Tables of the Human Body,' published the same year. He died January 11, 1778.

Irvine, a surname of ancient standing in Scotland, supposed to have been originally Erwine, the latter word derived, according to some antiquaries, from the Celtic-Scythic Erin-wine or fein, that is, a stout westland man, Erin, west, (the native name of Ireland, as lying west of Scotland,) and wine, or fein, a strong and resolute man Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol ii. App. p. 69) says that when the colonies of the Gauls came from the west coasts of Spain and seated themselves in the east coasts of Erin and in the west hills and islands of Albyn, the Erwines came to both these islands. In the latter country, they had their seat in that part of Ayrshire called Cunningham, and gave their name to the river, and to their own place of residence, now the town of Irvine. One of them, Orine Erwine, was abthane of Dull, and seneschal and collector of all the king's rents in the western isles. He married the princess Beatrix, eldest daughter of Malcolm II., and was father of Duncan I., king of Scotland Some of this family went south to Dumfries-shire, and settled on the river Esk, where one of them obtained, by marriage, the lands of Bonshaw, in that county A descendant of his, in the 17th century, rendered his name obnoxious by his cruel persecutions of the Covenanters.

The family of Irvine of Drum is descended from Sir William de Irwin, said to have been the eldest son (though more likely to have been a 2d son) of the family of Bonshaw, at the time when Robert the Bruce took arms in support of his claim to the throne of Scotland. He appointed this William de Irvine his armour-bearer, bestowing on him, at the same time, the device which he himself had borne as earl of Carrick, viz., three bunches of holly leaves, supported by two savages, wreathed, with the motto used by himself, 'Sub sole, sub umbra virens.' Having accompanied his royal master in his various wanderings, shared in his narrow escapes, and attended him in all his deeds of desperate valour, till his 'crowning victory' at Bannockburn, he was in 1323 rewarded for his services and fidelity, with a grant, by charter under the great seal, of the forest of Drom or Drum, in Aberdeenshire, originally part of a royal forest, and one of the hunting seats of the kings of Scotland. The park of Drum, which formed part of the Chase, was reserved. The charter is still extant, and is dated 'Apud Berwicem super Tweddem, primo die Februarii, anno regni nostri septimo decimo.' Among the family papers is another charter by Robert I., dated at Kynros, 4th October, in the 18th year of his reign

Sir William's son, Alexander Irvine of Drum, married the second daughter of Sir Robert Keith, great marischal of Scotland. His son, Sir Alexander, had a command in the Lowland army under the earl of Mar, at the battle of Harlaw, fought in 1411, where he encountered MacLean of Dowart, lieutenant-general under Donald of the Isles, and fought hand to hand with him, with such determined bravery, that both were killed. In the popular ballad relating to the battle, he is thus alluded to

"Gude Sir Alexander Irvine,
The much renownit Laird of Drum
None in his dais were better sene,
Quhen thai wer assemblit all and sum.
To praise him we sall not be dumm,
For valour, wit, and worthiness;
To end his dais bather did cum,
Quhois ransum is remedyles."

He was succeeded by his brother, Robert, who, on inheriting Drum, changed his baptismal name to Alexander. He married Elisabeth, daughter of Sir Robert Keith, great marischal of Scotland. A feud had for some time subsisted between the Keiths and the Drum family, and according to tradition a fight had taken place between them on a moor on the north bank of the Dee, now forming part of the glebe of the parish of Drumoak, in which the Irvines were victorious. With the view of putting an end to this unseemly quarrel, the Estates of the kingdom had interfered, and had enjoined on Alexander Irvine, the third of the family and the one slain at Harlaw, to marry Elisabeth Keith, the lady above referred to. He accordingly submitted to the marriage ceremony being performed, which had the desired effect of making the two families friends, instead of enemies. It is stated that when hastening to Harlaw, at the head of his vassals, he sat down on a stone on the hill of Auchrony, parish of Skene, and advised his brother Robert, who accompanied him, to marry his sister-in-law, if he were slain, assuring him that the marriage with himself had never been consummated. Robert, afterwards Sir Alexander, in consequence, complied with his request. The latter was one of the commissioners deputed by the Estates of Scotland, in 1423, to treat concerning the ransom of King James I, and in the following year he was knighted by that monarch

In 1437, after the murder of James I at Perth, the inhabitants of Aberdeen solicited the services of Sir Alexander, for the defence and protection of that city, and in 1440 the burgesses unanimously consented to his being appointed captain and governor of the burgh He held this situation for two years, and there is no other instance on record of the existence of the office in Aberdeen He had two sons, the younger of whom distinguished himself so highly at the battle of Brechin, in 1452, that he received a charter of the lands of Beltie from the earl of Huntly, under whom he served, as a reward for his conduct on that occasion From this younger son descended the Irvines of Lenturk and the Irvines in Germany

The elder son, Alexander, fifth laird of Drum, had a son, also named Alexander (which, indeed, seems to have been the favourite baptismal name of the eldest sons of the family), who succeeded as sixth laird, and was twice married By his first wife he had three sons, viz. Alexander, his successor, Richard, of Craigton, from whom descended the Irvines of Hilltown, and Henry, ancestor of the Irvines of Kingcausie. By his second wife, he had eight daughters, seven of whom were married to proprietors of land. The eldest son, Alexander, received from James V, a gift of non-entry to the lands of Forglen, dated 4th December 1527, bearing to be given "on account of Drum, his said son, and their friends, their good and thankful service done to the king, in searching, taking, and bringing his rebels to justice." His son, Alexander, also took an active part in the stirring events which occurred in the minority of Mary He was killed at the battle of Pinkie in 1547, in his father's lifetime, leaving, with three daughters, six sons, the eldest of whom, Alexander, succeeded his grandfather The second son, William, was designed of Ardlogie, Robert, of Tillylair, the third son, was progenitor of the Irvines of Fortrie, Gilbert, of Colairlie the fourth son was predecessor of the Irvines of Murthill and Cults; James, the fifth son, a knight of Malta, was ordained, by the grand-master, prior of the order in Scotland; and John, the sixth son, died young.

The grandson, Alexander, eighth laird of Drum, married Lady Elizabeth Keith, second daughter of William earl Marischal, and had five sons and four daughters. John Irvine of Artamford, the youngest son, had eight sons, who all died without issue, except James, the second, who succeeded to the estate of Artamford, and his son, also named James, had, with one daughter, five sons. The eldest son, Alexander, sold Artamford to his brother, William, and bought Crimond in 1603. He subsequently inherited Drum

Alexander, the eldest son of the eighth laird, became ninth laird of Drum in 1583, and distinguished himself as a patron of learning and a benefactor to the poor He also seems to have lent money to James VI., as there is extant in the charter chest of Drum a holograph bond by that monarch to him for 500 merks, dated at Dalkeith 27th November 1587, and payable at Whitsunday thereafter In 1610 he was named a member of the court of high commission appointed that year In 1629, this laird of Drum devised £10,000 Scots for the maintenance of four bursars of philosophy, and two of divinity, at the Marischal college, Aberdeen, and of four bursars at the grammar school of that city, vesting the right of presenting them in the family of Drum. His wife, Lady Marion Douglas, daughter of the earl of Buchan, also bequeathed 3,000 merks, in 1638, to endow an hospital in Aberdeen, for the widows and daughters of decayed burgesses, the patronage of which is with the town council.

His eldest son, Sir Alexander Irvine of Drum, sheriff-principal of Aberdeen in 1634 and following years, obtained a patent from King Charles I creating him earl of Aberdeen (that of the Gordon creation does not date till 1682), which the breaking out of the civil war prevented from passing the great seal His losses by the commotions that ensued were considerable, he and his sons having zealously supported the royal cause. His house and lands were frequently occupied and plundered by the Covenanters' army He was imprisoned, fined, and more than once obliged to flee for safety to England

His eldest son, Alexander, married, first, Lady Mary Gordon, fourth daughter of the marquis of Huntly He and his brother, Robert, during the lifetime of his father, joined the banner of Charles, and distinguished themselves so highly in his service that they were excommunicated 14th April 1644, and had a price set upon their heads; 18,000 merks being offered for the young laird, dead or alive, and 9,000 for Robert. With the view of escaping to England, they sailed from Fraserburgh, but being obliged to land at Wick, where a committee happened to be sitting, they were made prisoners, and warded in the castle of Keiss. Thence they were conducted, under a strong escort, to Edinburgh, and lodged in the city jail Robert died in prison, six months thereafter; the young laird was then removed to the castle, under sentence of death His execution, however, was stopped by the defeat of the Covenanters at Kilsyth in 1645, and in compliance with the stipulations made by the marquis of Montrose with the delegates from Edinburgh, he and the other prisoners there were restored to liberty.

On the accession of Charles II., the king renewed to him the offer of the peerage which had been made to his father, but he declined accepting it, unless the patent bore the date of the one formerly granted. The great reduction which his fortune and estates had undergone, it seems probable, was the principal cause of his refusal to accept of it. About twenty years afterwards, the king, in granting a charter, containing a novodamus of Drum's whole estates holding of the crown, took occasion to express in it the deep sense which he had of the family's loyalty and their services and sufferings in the royal cause. He died in 1687, and was buried in Drum's aisle, in the parish church of St. Nicholas, Aberdeen, his funeral being attended by the magistrates and citizens under arms. By his first wife he had a son, Alexander, and four daughters. Jean, the third daughter, married Alexander Irvine of Murthill, eventually of Drum. By a second wife, he had one daughter In the year he died, he executed a nomination of heirs of entail, failing heirs male of his own body, to the Irvines of Murthill, Artamford, and Cults, and their heirs male, in their order.

His eldest son, Alexander Irvine of Drum, died in 1696, without issue. In him failed the male line of the family in direct descent. Alexander Irvine of Murthill, his son-in-law, then, in consequence of the entail, became 13th laird of Drum. He sold Murthill, and also the lands of Strachan in Kincardineshire, belonging to the Drum family, which had not been included in the entail. On his death in 1720, he was succeeded by his son, Alexander, who, after his accession, became insane. The latter died in 1735, unmarried, when his uncle and tutor, John Irvine, became fifteenth laird of Drum In 1737, the entail was broken, and the greater part of the estate sold. He died the same year, without issue, when the succession devolved on Alexander Irvine of Crimond, great-grandson of John Irvine of Artamford. In 1744 he became likewise heir of line to the entailer by the death of Irvine of Saphock without male issue. His son, Alexander Irvine of Drum and Crimond, had three sons and three daughters. He died in 1761 His eldest son, Alexander, was the 19th laird of Drum, and 14th in descent, being both the heir of line and the heir of entail. Charles, the second son, was a major-general in the army Alexander married, 31st December 1775, Jean, only daughter of Hugh Forbes, Esq of Schivas, Aberdeenshire, and had four sons and a daughter Alexander, the eldest son, passed advocate in 1802, succeeded his father in 1844, was appointed a deputy-lieutenant of Aberdeenshire in 1808, married, in 1816, the daughter of James Hamilton, Esq with issue.

IRVINE, viscount of, a title, with that of Baron Ingram, in the Scottish peerage, conferred, 23d May 1681, on Henry, eldest surviving son of Sir Arthur Ingram of Temple Newsom, Yorkshire, an English family who had no property in, or any other connexion with, Scotland Charles, the ninth and last Viscount Irvine, was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers at the general election in 1768, and re-elected in 1774 He died 27th June 1778, without male issue, when the title became extinct.

IRVINE, CHRISTOPHER, M D, an eminent antiquarian, son of Christopher Irvine of Robgill and Annan, of the family of Irvine of Bonshaw, and brother of Sir Gerard Irvine, baronet of Castle Irvine, Ireland, lived in the 17th century While attending the college at Edinburgh he was, about 1639, dismissed the university for resisting the national covenant Having been involved in the Irish troubles, he was deprived of his estate, and was compelled, for a livelihood, to become a schoolmaster, first at Leith, and subsequently at Preston. He had originally studied for the medical profession, and afterwards practised as a surgeon and physician in Edinburgh Some time after 1650 he was appointed a chirurgeon in the army of General Monk In that year he published a small volume, called 'Bellum Grammaticale,' which is now very scarce In 1656 appeared a curious treatise by him on animal magnetism, entitled 'Medicina Magnetica, or the rare and wonderful Art of Curing by Sympathy, laid open in Aphorisms, proved in Conclusions, and digested into an easy method drawn from both,' dedicated to General Monk His principal work, the 'Historiæ Scoticæ Nomenclatura Latino-Vernacula,' being an explanatory Dictionary of the proper names used in Scottish History, was published at Edinburgh in 1682, and reprinted in 1819 He held the appointment of state physician, and historiographer to Charles II An act of the Scots Estates was passed, in 1685, granting to him the right to practise as a physician in Edinburgh, independent of the college of physicians, then recently incorporated The date of his death is unknown

IRVING, a surname the same as Irvine, being the mode in which some Dumfries-shire families of the name spell it.

One of these families, Irving of Woodhouse and Robgill Tower, descended from a younger branch of the original family of Irvine of Bonshaw, possessed a baronetcy of the United Kingdom, conferred in 1809

Christopher Irvine of Bonshaw, who commanded the light horsemen at Flodden, was killed there with his son, Christopher, Sept. 8, 1513 The son of the latter, also named Christopher, was slain in command of a party of horse at Solway Moss in 1542 His son, Edward Irvine of Bonshaw, lived to a great age His eldest son, Christopher, predeceased his father in 1582 He had married, in 1566, Margaret daughter of John Johnstone of that ilk, ancestor of the marquises of Annandale, and had a son, William, who had, among other sons, William, of Rockhillhead, afterwards of Woodhouse, Dumfries-shire, and Herbert, of Bonshaw by purchase.

William Irving of Woodhouse married, in 1631, Janet, daughter of Jardine of Applegarth, and was father of John Irvine, Esq of Woodhouse. This John Irvine of Woodhouse marrying Sarah, &c of Sir William Douglas of Kelhead, was succeeded by his son, William Irvine, Esq of Bonshaw

The eldest son of William continued the line of Bonshaw A younger son, Paulus Emilius Irving, Esq of Woodhouse, was a lieutenant-colonel in the army, and governor of Upnor Castle. He died April 22, 1796

Colonel Irving's only son, Lieutenant-General Sir Paulus Emilius Irving, born August 30, 1751, was appointed commander-in-chief in the West Indies, and received the thanks of King George III, through the duke of York, commander in-chief, November 28, 1795, for the decisive victory he had achieved at La Vigie that year On September 19 1809, he was created a baronet of the United Kingdom He had two sons and a daughter, and died in 1828, when his elder son, Sir Paulus Æmilius Irving, became 2d baronet. On the latter's death, without issue, in 1837, he was succeeded by his brother, Sir Thomas St. Lawrence Irving, third baronet, born Feb. 16, 1795, died, unmarried, in 1859, when the title became extinct.

Christopher Irvine, proprietor of Robgill and Annan, and bred to the law in the Temple, London, receiving from James VI a grant of some lands in Ulster, was ancestor of the Irvines of Castle Irvine, baronets, county Fermanagh, Ireland, and of the Irvines of Rockfield, same county

The ancient seat of the Irvines of Bonshaw, the original stock of the family of Irvine, stands on the right bank of the river, in the parish of Annan, Dumfries-shire. The old mansion-house is built near the edge of a steep rock, which rises to a considerable height above the bed of the Kirtle. About half-a-mile from Bonshaw, and on the same side of the river, is Robgill Tower, formerly possessed by Sir Emilius Irving, bart. The scenery around Robgill-house, of which the old tower forms a part, is most picturesque and beautiful.

The first of the name settled in Dumfries town was Provost Francis Irving, 2d son of the family of Bonshaw He was educated in France, and on his return to Scotland he married the heiress of the Rainings, by whom he acquired a good fortune of houses in Dumfries, with burgage, and other lands, part whereof remain yet with his posterity He it was who first imported into that town wines and spirits thither by sea, having settled some kind of correspondence at Bordeaux in France. Upon the sudden arrival of King James VI on one occasion at Dumfries, Provost Irving presided at an entertainment given to his majesty in a large painted hall belonging to the Cunninghams. His lady likewise assisted. She came at the head of some matrons, and presented his majesty with an Italian broadpiece in gold, according to the usage of the times. At the provost's death a magnificent tomb or monument was erected, embellished with pillars of the Corinthian order, gilt capitols, and other ornaments. It was much effaced by Cromwell's soldiers, coming up from the siege of Carlaverock castle, and all the records of the town destroyed they could lay their hands upon In the lower part of the monument is the following inscription

> "The King me first his Baillie named,
> Dumfries oft since me Provost claimed,
> God, King, and Country have I served,
> For which in Heaven a Crown 's reserved"

The lands of Kurkledale and others belonging to him continued long in his family His bailiary is presumed to have been a jurisdiction of the lower parts of Annandale, as all of it was in the gift of the crown, being the prince of Scotland's patrimony The king, in speaking to him or of him, usually termed him his own bailie He left, with a daughter, three sons. 1 John often elected provost of Dumfries. 2 Edward, who acquired the lands of Logan 3 Stephen, who possessed the lands of Reddens and others. The daughter Barbara was married to Sir William Maxwell of Gribton, knight. Provost John Irving's two sons, John and Thomas, were likewise provosts of Dumfries. His daughter Jannette, married Maxwell of Carnsalloch The second son represented the town in parliament The elder son was in the first nomination of justices of the peace in Scotland, not as provost for the time being but as a landed gentleman, as appears from the printed acts of Charles II He married Janet, daughter of Sir Thomas Crighton of Ryehill, soon after earl of Dumfries, and had a son, John, who had no family, and 3 daughters. The eldest of whom married Provost Maxwell of Barncleugh, and the youngest Maxwell of Terraughty, grandson of the family of Nithsdale.

Provost Thomas, the other brother, married, 1st, Elizabeth Craik, daughter of Craik of Stewarton, and 2dly, Elizabeth Maxwell, daughter of the Kirkconnell family, but she had no children. He left three sons, John, Thomas and William. The eldest married a Miss Fergusson, and had John, commonly styled Logan, and 3 daughters. Thomas, the second brother, afterwards of Gribton, married Mary Maxwell, niece of the earl of Nithsdale, and had a son, William Irving, Esq of Gribton, and a daughter, Margaret, married to Thomas Goldie, W S., afterwards of Maine, issue, five sons and 2 daughters.

Provost John Irving of Logan, eldest in succession, was twice married, but leaving only daughters, the male representation of the family devolved upon William, the next in succession.

William married Katherine, daughter of Captain James Menzies of Enoch, and had eleven sons. James, the eldest, succeeded him. He married Elizabeth Welsh, heiress of Waterside, issue, 2 sons, William and Joseph (who died in Jamaica), and 5 daughters. Thomas, the second son, was inspector-general of exports and imports, at London He married Marion, daughter of Provost Corbet, and had a son, William, inspector-general, and a daughter, Maryan, who married a West India proprietor, named Furness. Winfred, James' youngest daughter, married, 1st, Mr Baird, 2dly, Captain Wilson, to whom she had one daughter, and 3dly, Mr Sweetman The daughter, Catherine, married Colonel Archibald M'Murdo, and had 11 children Winfred, the eldest, married Mr Dinwoodie, one of the judges in the civil court of Ceylon One of her sons, John, in the Madras army, became Lieut.-Colonel Commandant of the Dumfries, Roxburgh, Selkirk, and Kirkcudbright militia. Another son, Archibald, post-captain in the navy, accompanied Captain Buck, in the Terror, to the North Pole A daughter, Phillis, married George Hoggan, Esq of Waterside. Another daughter, Catherine, married Admiral Pennel, R N They had a son, Robert, mate of an Indiaman, and another, Colonel W Montague S M'Murdo, C B, inspector-general of volunteers. Charles Irving, Esq, surgeon, of the Gribton family, and a native of Holywood parish, Dumfries-shire, some years before 1790, discovered a method of turning salt water into fresh, for which he was rewarded by a grant from government of £500

William, eldest son of James Irving of Gribton, married Jane, eldest daughter of David Corrie of Newlaw, issue, 4 children. Mary, one of his daughters, married Sir John Gordon of Earlston, bart. His son, James, went to India as ensign in the Bengal cavalry in 1828, and became through marriage proprietor of Barwhinnock estate.

The estate of Gribton is no longer in the family, having been sold, and become the property of a gentleman named Maxwell.

IRVING, Rev Edward, M A, a celebrated preacher, was born in the burgh of Annan, August 15, 1792 His father was a respectable tanner in that town, and became owner of a considerable portion of burgage and landed property in the vicinity After receiving a good elementary education in his native place, he was sent to prosecute his studies at the university of Edinburgh. His proficiency in the mathematics attracted the attention of Professor Leslie, who recommended him, when only in his seventeenth year, as mathematical teacher in an academy at Haddington. This situation he occupied only a year, when he obtained one more lucrative in a larger establishment at Kirkcaldy, where he also kept boarders, and gave private tuition He remained nearly seven years at Kirkcaldy, during which time he completed his divinity studies, and became a licentiate of the Church of Scotland In 1819 he removed to Edinburgh, resolved to devote himself to preaching the gospel, and on Dr. Chalmers hearing him preach from the pulpit of St George's church in that city, he was so favourably impressed with his abilities, that he subsequently appointed him his assistant in St John's church, Glasgow

In 1822 Mr Irving accepted an invitation from the managers of a small congregation of Scots Presbyterians meeting at the Caledonian Asylum, Cross Street, Hatton Garden, London; and shortly after obtaining this living, he married Isabella, daughter of the Rev John Martin, one of the ministers of Kirkcaldy, to whom he had been previously engaged The novelty of his style, and the force and eloquence of his discourses, soon rendered him the most popular preacher of his time, and the singularity of his appearance and gesticulation attracted very large congregations. The principal orators and statesmen of the day crowded to hear him, he literally became quite "the rage" among the wealthy and fashionable of the metropolis, and his chapel doors were thronged with carriages, so that it was found necessary to grant admittance only by tickets.

In 1823 Mr Irving published an octavo volume of 600 pages, with the singular title of 'For the Oracles of God, Four Orations—for Judgment to come, an Argument in Nine Parts' Such was the demand for this publication, that, though it underwent the most severe and searching criticism, a third edition was called for in less than six months.

In May 1824 he preached for the London Missionary Society one of their anniversary sermons, and early in the following year he published his discourse on the occasion, dedicated to Coleridge the poet, with whom he had recently formed an intimate acquaintance.

In 1825 Mr. Irving preached the anniversary sermon for the Continental Society, the substance of which he afterwards published, in a treatise on the prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse, dedicated to Mr Hatley Frere, brother to the British envoy at the court of Madrid, and one of the persons, about twenty in number, who, with Mr Irving, assembled at Albury Park, the seat of Mr Henry Drummond, the banker, for the express object of studying or elucidating "the sublime science of sacred prophecy" An account of this meeting was published by Mr Drummond in 1827, in a work entitled 'Dialogues on Prophecy,' 3 vols 8vo About 1826 Mr Irving drew up his Introductory Essay to an edition of Bishop Horne's 'Commentary on the Book of Psalms,' published in Glasgow, which is considered one of the best of his writings In 1828 he preached a fast-day sermon before the presbytery of London, which he afterwards printed In the same year he contributed to an annual then existing under the name of the 'Anniversary,' a sketch, entitled 'A Tale of the Times of the Martyrs'

In the course of 1827 he was first observed in his discourses to have departed from the doctrinal standards of the Church of Scotland, by the unusual manner in which he spoke concerning the human nature of our Saviour On the formation in the metropolis of a society for the distribution of 'Gospel Tracts,' Mr Irving preached a collection sermon in aid of the funds of the new institution, and it is said to have been on the delivery of his discourse on that occasion that some of his hearers were astounded by his assertion of the "sinfulness of Christ's human nature" In his 'Sermons, Lectures, and Occasional Discourses,' published the following year, his new doctrines were developed at large The chapel in Cross Street, Hatton Garden, being found too small to contain the large concourse of persons who continued to throng to it, a subscription was entered into, to erect a larger and more commodious church, and the handsome edifice in Regent's Square was completed in 1829 In the spring of that year, Mr Irving paid a visit to his friends in Scotland, and while at Edinburgh he delivered a course of fifteen 'Lectures on the Book of the Revelation,' which were published in parts, the whole making four volumes duodecimo.—His portrait is subjoined

In the early part of 1830 the subject of his heretical views was taken up by the Scottish church in London, and at a meeting of the presbytery on November 29 of that year, the report of the committee appointed to examine his work on Christ's humanity was read It charged him with holding Christ subject to original and actual sin, and with denying the doctrines of atonement, satisfaction, imputation, and substitution The exhibition of the "unknown tongues," uttered by some designing or deluded persons of his congregation, principally females, and pronounced by Mr Irving from the pulpit to be the "manifestations of the Holy Ghost," next occupied public attention, and the trustees of the National Scottish Church, Regent's Square, at last found it necessary to prefer charges against him, in addition to those which were already before the presbytery On May 2, 1832, the London presbytery unanimously found him guilty of heresy, and thus dispossessed him of his charge as minister of the church in Regent's Square, and the presbytery of Annan, of which he was a member, on March 13, 1833, formally deposed him from the ministry of the Church of Scotland After a course of itinerant open-air preaching in his native district, Mr. Irving returned to London, and continued to officiate in what had once been the picture gallery of Mr Benjamin West, the celebrated painter, in Newman Street, which had been fitted up as a chapel by some of the most enthusiastic of his admirers

His laborious and unceasing efforts to propagate his peculiar religious tenets brought on consumption, and in the autumn of 1834 he went to Scotland for the benefit of his health; but rapidly becoming worse, he died at Glasgow, December 6, 1834. He left a widow, with a son and two daughters.

Mr Irving was only in his 42d year at the time of his death, although his long grey hair and wrinkled brow made him appear much older There can be no doubt that the melancholy errors and extravagances, into which he was betrayed in the latter years of his life, were the effects of a diseased imagination, arising from that morbid love of the marvellous, and craving for notoriety, for which he was remarkable, and to which he at last fell a victim

"Although his practical wisdom did not keep pace with his discursive powers," says Dr James Hamilton, afterwards minister of Regent Square church, in an article analysing his character, "yet the might of his genius, and the grandeur of his views, and the prevailing solemnity of his spirit," left a deep impression on his hearers and contemporaries, and Edward Irving became the founder of a sect, which subsequently took the name of the Catholic Apostolic Church From the wealth and influential character of some of its members, this sect has, in London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and some other places, been enabled to build large and imposing structures for their peculiar mode of worship.

IRVING, DAVID, LL D, biographer and librarian, was born in the village of Langholm, Dumfries-shire, December 5, 1778 He received his early education in the Grammar school of his native place under a Mr Telfer He afterwards attended, for Latin and Greek, a Mr Little, who, though deprived of sight, was an excellent scholar, and remarkable for grounding his pupils thoroughly in a knowledge of the classics In 1796, being then in his 18th year, he went to the university of Edinburgh, where he continued till 1803 In the Greek class he distinguished himself so much as to attract the particular notice of Mr Dalzell, the then professor in that chair (see vol ii, p 17, for a memoir of him) In 1799 he published at Glasgow a short life of Fergusson the poet, dedicated to Dr Robert Anderson, editor and biographer of the British Poets, (for a memoir of whom see vol i, p 133,) to whom he brought a letter of introduction on his first arrival in Edinburgh

In 1801 Mr Irving took the degree of M A, and the same year he issued another little volume, entitled 'Lives of Scottish Authors, viz, Fergusson, Falconer, and Russell' To this he was encouraged by Professor Dalzell, to whom it was dedicated, and who had assisted him in collecting materials for the two latter biographies.

Originally destined for the ministry, Mr Irving was prevented by some religious scruples from entering the Divinity Hall, and resolved to devote himself to literature instead of the church. To fit himself more particularly for this pursuit, he applied himself to a careful study of the structure and powers of the English language. The results

he embodied in a short treatise, entitled 'Elements of English Composition,' which was published in London in 1801. This treatise, originally written whilst its author was yet a student at college, he had occasion afterwards frequently to revise It was his most successful work. In England especially it obtained an extensive circulation, and was introduced as a text-book in some of the leading schools At the time of his death it had reached the 13th edition

In 1804 he published 'The Lives of Scotish Poets,' 2 vols. 8vo He considered Scotish, with one t, the right spelling of the word, and Scottish, although in more general use, a corruption These Lives are said to have been ably but hastily written

He now resolved to bestow more care and labour on his future writings He spent the years 1805 and 1806 in London, paying frequent visits to the library of the British Museum, consulting some rare books for his next publication This was 'Memoirs of the Life and Writings of George Buchanan,' published in 1807, which at once established his reputation The work included a literary history of the age and contemporaries of Buchanan, and was full of learning and information. Sir William Hamilton (a memoir of whom is given at page 448 of this volume) pronounced it to be a work "which for curious and recondite erudition has been but seldom surpassed" He subsequently very considerably improved it, and in the preface to a new edition, which appeared in 1817, he tells us that these "Memoirs have undergone such essential alteration that this may almost be considered a new work"

In 1808 Mr Irving obtained the degree of doctor of laws from Marischal College, Aberdeen, and in 1810 he married Anna, Dr Anderson's eldest daughter, the lady to whom Dr Leyden's 'Elegy on the Death of a favourite Linnet,' was originally addressed She died suddenly in 1812, leaving a son

In 1820 Dr Irving was appointed keeper of the library of the Faculty of Advocates The vacation after his appointment to this office he spent at Göttingen, that he might become acquainted with the manner in which the library of the distinguished university of that city was managed. Though the greater part of his time was now occupied with his official duties, he still devoted a portion of it to literary pursuits. He wrote the biographical notices prefixed to a collected edition of the poems of Alexander Montgomery, author of 'The Cherry and the Slae,' published in 1821. His minute acquaintance with the early literary history of Scotland, pointed him out as a fit editor for some of those rare old books and manuscripts which the Bannatyne and Maitland clubs were printing for their members. For the Bannatyne club he edited in 1828–29 the two volumes of Dempster's 'Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum, sive de Scriptoribus Scotis,' to which he contributed a Latin preface, in 1835, 'Philotus, a Comedy, reprinted from the edition of Robert Charteris, 1603,' and in 1837, 'Davidis Buchanani de Scriptoribus Scotis Libri Duo nunc primum Editi' For the Maitland club he edited, in 1830, 'Clariodus, a Metrical Romance,' printed from a manuscript of the 16th century, and in 1832, 'The Moral Fables of Robert Henryson,' a poet of the later part of the 15th century

In earlier life Dr Irving had given private instructions to candidates for admission into the faculty of advocates, and in 1815 he had published, in the form of a pamphlet, 'Observations on the Study of the Civil Law' Successively reprinted and enlarged in 1820 and 1823, it finally appeared, in 1837, in the shape of a goodly volume, bearing the title of 'An Introduction to the Study of the Civil Law' In the same year the university of Gottingen conferred upon its author the degree of doctor of laws

Between the years 1830 and 1842, Dr Irving was a stated contributor to the 7th edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, then in course of publication To that work the three Treatises on the Canon, Civil, and Feudal Law, and most of the biographies of Scottish authors, were contributed by him With considerable additions, these biographies were published in a separate form in 1839, in 2 volumes, with the title of 'Lives of Scotish Writers'

In 1849, after 29 years' service, he retired from the librarianship of the faculty of advocates, and was succeeded in that office by Samuel Halkett, Esq He still continued to prosecute his literary labours. In 1819 he had edited anonymously an edition of

'Selden's Table Talk,' with notes, a new edition of which was published in 1854. His latter years were dedicated to preparing a connected and comprehensive History of Scotish Poetry, from the middle ages to the close of the 17th century. This he left in manuscript, quite ready for the press.

Dr Irving died at Edinburgh May 10, 1860 At the disruption of the church of Scotland in 1843 he joined the Free Church, and was an elder of Free St. John's church, in that city

As a scholar Dr. Irving held the highest rank "With respect to classical literature," writes Sir William Hamilton, himself one of the most erudite men of his time, "I believe that there are few men in Scotland who possess so critical a knowledge of the ancient authors, or who are so well read in philology" His acquaintance with the remains of Greek and Roman literature was minute and extensive He was so finished a Latin scholar that he once offered himself, and with fair prospects of success, as a candidate for the chair of humanity in the university of Glasgow His study of the Roman jurisprudence in all its branches was extensive and profound With literary history, foreign and domestic, he was perfectly familiar, from the middle ages down to the close of the century succeeding the Reformation His knowledge of books was marvellous, and his love of them intense His private library numbered about 7,000 volumes, many of them rare and valuable

Dr Irving married, a second time, in 1820, Miss Janet Laing, his second cousin, of which marriage a son and daughter, with the widow, survived

Isles, The, Lord of, an ancient title, possessed by the descendants of Somerled, thane of Argyle, who in 1135, when David I expelled the Norwegians from Arran and Bute, and some other of the islands, appears to have got a grant of them from that monarch To secure himself in possession, however, he married, about 1140, Effrica, or Ragnhildis, the daughter of Olave the Red, king of Man, from which marriage sprung the dynasty so well known in Scottish history as the Lords of the Isles. By her he had three sons: Dugall, Reginald or Ranald, and Angus. The Chronicle of Man adds a fourth, Olave. By a previous marriage he had one son, Gillecolane. According to the Celtic genealogists, this Somerled (the name is Norse, in Gaelic Somhairle, in English, Samuel) was descended, through a long line of ancestors, from the celebrated Irish king Conn Cheud Chath, or Conn of the hundred battles. He assisted his son-in-law, Wimond, the pretended earl of Moray, when he invaded Scotland in 1141 (see page 24 of this volume), and on the death of David I, accompanied by the children of Wimund, he landed with a great force, in Scotland, 5th November 1153, in order to revenge the wrongs done to him. Having, however, encountered a more vigorous opposition than he had anticipated, he found it necessary to agree to terms of accommodation with Malcolm IV, an event which was deemed of so much importance as to form an epoch from which various royal charters were dated.

His brother-in law, Godred the Black, king of Man, had acted so tyrannically that Thorfinn, one of the most powerful of the insular nobles, resolved to depose him, and applied to Somerled for his son, Dugall, then a child, whom he proposed to make king of the Isles in Godred's place. Carrying Dugall through all the isles, except Man, Thorfinn forced the inhabitants to acknowledge him as their king, and took hostages from them for their obedience. One of the chief islanders fled to the Isle of Man, and informed Godred of the plot against him. That prince immediately collected a large fleet, and proceeded against the rebels, then under the guidance of Somerled, with a fleet of eighty galleys. After a bloody but indecisive battle (1156) a treaty was entered into, by which Godred ceded to the sons of Somerled what were afterwards called the South Isles, retaining for himself the North Isles and Man. Two years afterwards, Somerled invaded the latter island with a fleet of fifty-three ships, and laid the whole island waste, after defeating Godred in battle.

Somerled's power was now very great, and for some time he carried on a vexatious predatory warfare on the coasts of Scotland, till Malcolm required of him to resign his possessions into his hands as his sovereign, and to hold them in future as a vassal of the Scottish crown. Somerled refused, and in 1164, assembling a numerous army, he sailed up the Clyde, with 160 galleys, and landed his forces near Renfrew, where he was met by the Scots army, under the high steward of Scotland, and defeated, he himself and his son Gillecolane being amongst the slain. According to tradition, he was assassinated in his tent by an individual in whom he placed confidence. This celebrated chief has been traditionally described as "a well tempered man, in body shapely, of a fair piercing eye, of middle stature, and of quick discernment." According to the then prevalent custom of gavel kind, whilst Gillecolane's son, also named Somerled, succeeded to his grandfather's superiority of Argyle, the insular possessions were divided among his sons descended of the house of Man. Dugall, the eldest of these, got for his share, Mull, Coll, Tiree, and Jura; Reginald, the second son, obtained Isla and Kintyre; and Angus, the third son, Bute. Arran is supposed to have been divided between the two latter The Chronicle of Man mentions a battle, in 1192, between Reginald and Angus, in which the latter obtained the victory He was killed, in 1210, with his three sons, by the men of Skye, leaving no male issue. One of his sons, James, left a daughter and heiress, Jane, afterwards married to Alexander, son and heir of Walter, high steward of Scotland, who, in her right, claimed the isle of Bute.

Both Dugall and Reginald were called kings of the Isles at the time that Reginald, the son of Godred the Black, was styled king of Man and the Isles; and in the next generation we find in a Norse chronicle, mention made of three kings of the Isles, of the race of Somerled, existing at one time. It is evident, therefore, says Mr Gregory, that the word king, as used by the Norwegians and their vassals in the Isles, was not confined as in Scotland, to one supreme ruler, but that it had with them an additional meaning, corresponding either to prince of the blood, or to magnate. (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 17). On Dugall's death, the isles that had fallen to his share, instead of descending immediately to his children, were acquired by his brother, Reginald. As lord of Kintyre, the latter granted certain lands to the abbey of Saddel, in Kintyre, which had been founded by him, for monks of the Cistercian order He also made ample donations to the monastery of Paisley From Dugall sprung the great house of the MacDougals of Lorn, who styled themselves de Ergadia or of Argyle. He left two sons, Dugall Scrag, and Duncan, who, in the northern Sagas, bear the title of the Sudereyan kings. Dugall was taken prisoner by Haco, king of Norway, but of the history of Duncan nothing is known, except that he founded the priory of Ardchattan in Lorn He was succeeded by his son, Ewen, commonly called King Ewen, and sometimes, erroneously, King John, of whom honourable mention is made in a previous part of this work (see vol i pp. 77 and 89)

Reginald had two sons, Donald and Roderick. From Donald, who appears to have inherited the Isles, sprang the great family of Isla, patronymically styled Macdonald (see that surname). On Roderick or Ruari, his second son, Reginald bestowed Bute and part of Kintyre. He was the founder of a distinct family, that of Bute, (patronymically styled Macruari or M'Rory,) which afterwards became very powerful in the Isles. Roderick was one of the most noted pirates of his day, and the annals of the period are filled with accounts of his predatory expeditions. The Scots having driven him out of Bute, he went to Norway, to solicit assistance from King Haco, and the complaints made by him and other islanders, of the aggressions of the Scots, led to Haco's celebrated expedition to Scotland in 1263, which ended in his defeat and death (see vol. i. p. 89). Roderick had two sons Dugall and Allan, who, with their father, were devoted partisans of Haco. They were forced to resign Bute, but had lands assigned to them, on their agreeing to become vassals of Scotland, in that portion of the Isles which had belonged to the king of Man. This family, in consequence, were styled Macruaries of the North Isles; and on the death of Dugall, called Rex Hebudum, without descendants, his brother Allan succeeded to his possessions, to which afterwards he appears to have added the lordship of Garmoran, on the mainland, (Gregory's Highlands and Isles, p. 22,) comprehending the districts of Moydart, Arasaig, Morar, and Knoydart.

Angus, lord of Isla, the son of Donald, styled Angus Mor by the Seannachies, had his lands ravaged in 1255, by Alexander III, for refusing to renounce his fealty to Norway Although, on this occasion he was forced to submit, eight years afterwards, on the arrival of Haco in the Isles, he joined the Norwegians (vol. i p. 89). But on the annexation of the western isles to Scotland, he finally transferred his allegiance to the Scottish crown In 1284 he was present at the convention by which the Maiden of Norway was declared heiress to the throne of Scotland. At this convention attended also Alexander de Ergadia of Lorn, son of Ewen, and Allan MacRuari of the North Isles, son of Roderick. Angus Mor died soon after 1292 He had two sons, Alexander of Isla, and Angus. The elder son, Alexander, by a marriage with one of the daughters of Ewen of Lorn, acquired a considerable addition to his possessions, but having joined the lord of Lorn in his opposition to Robert the Bruce, he became involved in the ruin of that chief, and being obliged to surrender to the king, he was imprisoned in Dundonald castle, Ayrshire, where he died. His whole possessions were forfeited and given to his brother, Angus Oig, who had supported the claims of Bruce. After the defeat at Methven, and the subsequent unfortunate skirmish with the men of Lorn at Tyndrum, Angus hospitably received Bruce into his castle of Dunaverty, in August 1306, and there sheltered him until he found it necessary to take refuge in the island of Rachlin He assisted in the attack upon Carrick, when the king had landed in his patrimonial district, and he was present at the battle of Bannockburn where the men of the Isles, under "Syr Anguss of Ile and But," formed the reserve. When the struggle was over, Bruce bestowed upon Angus the lordship of Lochaber, which had belonged to the Comyns, with the lands of Durrour and Glenco, and the islands of Mull, Tyree, &c., which had formed part of the possessions of the family of Lorn He left two sons John, his successor, and John Oig, ancestor of the Macdonalds of Glenco.

Allan MacRuari of the North Isles, above mentioned, had an illegitimate son, Roderick, the leader of the vassals of Christina, his daughter and heiress. This Roderick, having also attached himself to the fortunes of Bruce, received from that monarch the greater part of Lorn, and at the same time his sister, Christina, bestowed on him a large portion of her inheritance in Garmoran and the North Isles. In 1325, Roderick was forfeited of all his possessions for engaging in some plot against the king, Mr Skene thinks "from some connexion with the Soulis conspiracy of 1320" His lands were restored to his son, Ranald, by David II, about 1344. Two years thereafter, Ranald was killed in the monastery of Elcho, near Perth, where he had taken up his temporary quarters, having been attacked there at midnight by the earl of Ross, from whom he held the lands of Kintail in N Argyle.

John of Isla, the son and heir of Angus Oig, and chief of the clan Donald, having had some dispute with the regent concerning certain lands which had been granted by Robert the Bruce, joined the party of Edward Baliol, and by a treaty concluded 12th December 1335, engaged to support his pretensions in consideration of a grant of the lands and islands claimed by him. On the return of David II. from France in 1341, that monarch, anxious to secure the support of the most powerful of his barons, concluded a treaty with John of Isla, who, in consequence, pledged himself to support his government. He had married Amy, the sister of Ranald, and as that chief left no issue, she became his heir, and her husband, uniting her possessions to his own, assumed the title of lord of the Isles. The king, however, unwilling to aggrandise a chief already too powerful, determined to evade his claim, and John, again, transferred his support to the party of Baliol. When David returned from his captivity in England in 1357, John of the Isles abandoned that party, and having without any cause divorced his lady, with whom he had got such extensive possessions, he married, secondly, the lady Margaret, daughter of Robert, high steward of Scotland. In 1366, when the heavy burdens imposed upon the people for the ransom of the king, had produced general discontent, and the steward had been thrown into prison by David, the northern barons broke out into open rebellion, to put down which the steward was released All the northern chiefs submitted, except the lord of the Isles, who was forfeited, but the steward prevailed upon his son-in-law to meet the king at Inverness, in 1369, when an agreement was entered into, by which John not only engaged to submit to the royal authority, and pay his share of all public burdens, but promised to oppose all others who should attempt to resist either, and gave hostages for his faithful fulfilment of this obligation The accession of the steward to the throne took place the following year, and during the whole of the reign of Robert II, John of the Isles conducted himself as a loyal and obedient subject. From his father-in-law he received a feudal title to all those lands which had belonged to his first wife, whom he had divorced. Godfrey, his eldest surviving son by her, resisted this unjust proceeding, maintaining his mother's prior claims and his own as her heir, but Ranald, his younger brother, for not opposing it, was rewarded by a grant of the North Isles, Garmoran, and many other lands, to hold of his father and his heirs. Subsequently, John resigned into the king's hands nearly the whole of the western portion of his territories, and received charters of these lands in favour of himself and the issue of his second marriage (three sons), so that the latter were rendered feudally independent of the children of the first marriage, also three sons. John of the Isles died about 1386, at his own castle of Ardtornish, in Morvern, and was buried in Iona. He had given liberal grants to the church, and the ecclesiastics of the Isles are traditionally said to have bestowed upon him the appellation of "the good John of Isla." According to the seannachies, Ranald, the youngest son of the first marriage, was "old in the government of the Isles at his father's death" He afterwards acted as tutor or guardian to his younger brother, Donald, lord of the Isles, to whom, on his attaining majority, he delivered over the lordship, in presence of the vassals. He did not long survive his father, and his children were dispossessed by their uncle, Godfrey, who assumed the title of lord of Uist and Garmoran

Donald, second lord of the Isles, the eldest son of the second marriage, married Mary Leslie, afterwards countess of Ross, which led to a contest with the regent duke of Albany regarding that earldom, and to the celebrated battle of Harlaw in 1411, the whole circumstances connected with which will be found detailed in the memoir of the first duke of Albany, volume first, pages 37 and 38. On his brothers of the full blood Donald, virtual earl of Ross in right of his wife, bestowed ample territories as his vassals, and each of these became the founder of a powerful family (see MACDONALD, surname of). Donald died in Isla about 1420, and was interred in Iona, with the usual ceremonies. He left Alexander, his successor both in the Isles, and the earldom of Ross, and Angus, afterwards bishop of the Isles. (See Ross, earl of).

Alexander's son and successor, John II., fourth lord of the Isles, and earl of Ross, (see Ross, earl of,) on 13th February 1462, entered into a treaty with Edward IV of England and the banished earl of Douglas, for the conquest of Scotland. On this occasion he assumed the style of an independent prince, and granted a commission to his "trusty and well beloved cousins, Ranald of the Isles and Duncan, archdean of the Isles," to confer with the deputies of Edward IV. According to the conditions of the treaty, the lord of the Isles, with the celebrated Donald Balloch of Isla, who had some years previously defeated the royal forces under the earls of Caithness and Mar, and John, his son and heir, and all their retainers, agreed to become Edward's sworn vassals, and to assist him in all his wars, upon payment to each of a stipulated sum of money; and it was farther provided that, in the event of the entire subjugation of Scotland, the whole of the kingdom north of the Forth was to be equally divided between the earls of Ross and Douglas, and Donald Balloch, while Douglas was to be put in possession of his extensive estates between the Forth and the English border Soon after the lord of the Isles raised the standard of rebellion Assembling a large force under the command of his bastard son, Angus, and Donald Balloch, they made themselves masters of the castle of Inverness, whence proclamations were issued in name of the earl, addressed to all the inhabitants of the burghs and sheriffdom of Inverness, including also Nairn, Ross and Caithness, and the people were commanded to obey the said Angus as the earl's lieutenant, under pain of death, to pay to him all the taxes usually paid to the crown, and to refuse obedience to the king

On the suppression of this rebellion, the earl of Ross was summoned before parliament for treason, but failed to appear In 1475 the treaty above mentioned became known to the government. He was, in consequence, summoned in his castle of Dingwall to appear before the Estates of the realm at Edinburgh, and the earl of Argyle received a commission to prosecute the decree of forfeiture against him. Failing to appear, he was declared a traitor, and his estates were confiscated. He only prevented an armed invasion of the Isles by suing for pardon, by the intercession of the earl of Huntly He even appeared in person at Edinburgh, and with many expressions of contrition surrendered himself to the clemency of James III The queen and the Estates of the realm also pleaded for him, and in July 1476, he was restored to the forfeited earldom of Ross and the lordship of the Isles. He then voluntarily resigned that earldom, and the lands of Kintyre and Knapdale, and, as a compensation, was created a peer of parliament by the title of lord of the Isles. He had no children by his wife, Elizabeth Livingston, daughter of Lord Livingston, great-chamberlain of Scotland, but the succession to the new title, and the estates connected with it, was secured in favour of his illegitimate sons, Angus and John, the latter of whom was dead before 16th December 1478. The elder son, Angus, married a daughter of the earl of Argyle.

The resignation of the earldom of Ross and of the lands of Kintyre and Knapdale, had irritated the island chiefs descended from the original family, and while the Macleans, Macneills, Macleods, and other tribes adhered to the lord of the Isles, the various branches of the clan joined his turbulent son and heir, Angus, who, early accustomed to rebellion, and of a violent temper, soon obtained an ascendency over his father, and had great influence with his vassals. Kenneth Mackenzie of Kintail having repudiated his wife, Lady Margaret of the Isles, sister of Angus, a quarrel was the consequence, and the latter, assisted by his kinsmen, resolved to make it a pretence to regain possession of the whole or a part of the earldom of Ross. Accordingly, at the head of a numerous band of Island warriors, he invaded that district. The earl of Athol was sent against him, and was joined by the Mackenzies, Mackays, Frasers, and others. A conflict ensued at a place called Lagebread, where they were defeated by Angus, with great slaughter The earls of Crawford and Huntly were then sent against him, the one by sea and the other by land; but neither of them was successful. A third expedition, under the earls of Argyle and Athol, was accompanied by Angus' father, and several families of the Isles joined the royal force.

Argyle and Athol procured an interview between Angus and his father, in the hope of bringing about an accommodation between them, but in this they were disappointed, and the two earls returned without effecting anything. The lord of the Isles, however, proceeded onward through the Sound of Mull, accompanied by the Macleans, Macleods, Macneills, and others, and having encountered Angus in a bay of the Island of Mull, near Tobermory, a desperate battle ensued, in which Angus was again victorious. This engagement is traditionally called "The Battle of the Bloody Bay," and by it Angus obtained possession of the extensive territories of his clan, and was recognised as its head. John was afterwards reconciled to his son, who, however, does not appear to have made any surrender, in consequence, of his power or influence. Having once more thrown off his allegiance to the throne, he engaged in a treaty with Edward IV, who was then preparing to invade Scotland, and, during the remainder of his life, continued in a state of open resistance to the government.

Some time after the battle of the Bloody Bay the earl of Athol crossed privately to Isla, and carried off the infant son of Angus, called Donald Dubh, or "the Black" Having been placed in the hands of his maternal grandfather, Argyle, he was carefully guarded in the castle of Inchconnel, in Lochow When Angus discovered by whom his child had been carried off, summoning his adherents, he sailed to the neighbourhood of Inverlochy, where he left his galleys. He then made a rapid and secret march into the district of Athol, where he committed the most appalling excesses. This expedition is known as "the Raid of Athol" The earl of Athol and his countess took refuge in a chapel dedicated to St. Bride, whence they were dragged by the ferocious chief and his followers, loaded with plunder conveyed them to Inverlochy Here he embarked them in the galleys, and sailed for Isla, but in the voyage from Lochaber, many of his galleys sunk in a dreadful storm, with all the plunder with which they were laden. Believing this loss to have been occasioned by his desecration of the chapel of St. Bride, he soon liberated his prisoners, and even performed a humiliating penance in the chapel he had violated. After this event he marched to Inverness to attack Mackenzie of Kintail, when he was assassinated by an Irish harper sometime between 1480 and 1490

The rank of heir to the lordship of the Isles devolved on the nephew of John, Alexander of Lochalsh, son of his brother, Celestine. Placing himself at the head of the vassals of the Isles, he endeavoured, it is said, with John's consent, to recover possession of the earldom of Ross, and in 1491, at the head of a large body of western Highlanders, he advanced from Lochaber into Badenoch, where he was joined by the clan Chattan. They then marched to Inverness, where, after taking the royal castle, and placing a garrison in it, they proceeded to the north-east, and plundered the lands of Sir Alexander Urquhart, sheriff of Cromarty They next hastened to Strathconnan, for the purpose of ravaging the lands of the Mackenzies. The latter, however, surprised and routed the invaders, and expelled them from Ross, their leader, Alexander of Lochalsh, being wounded, and as some say, taken prisoner In consequence of this insurrection, at a meeting of the Estates in Edinburgh in May 1493, the title and possessions of the lord of the Isles were declared to be forfeited to the crown In January following the aged John appeared in presence of the king, and made a voluntary surrender of his lordship, after which he appears to have remained for some time in the king's household, in the receipt of a pension He finally retired to the monastery of Paisley, where he died about 1498, and was interred, at his own request, in the tomb of his royal ancestor, Robert II.

With the view of reducing the insular chiefs to subjection, and establishing the royal authority in the Islands, James IV, soon after the forfeiture in 1493, proceeded in person to the West Highlands, when Alexander of Lochalsh, the principal cause of the insurrection which had led to it, and John of Isla, grandson and representative of Donald Balloch, were among the first to make their submission On this occasion they appear to have obtained royal charters of the lands they had previously held under the lord of the Isles, and were both knighted. In the following year the king visited the Isles twice, and having seized and garrisoned the castle of Dunaverty in South Kintyre, Sir John of Isla, deeply resenting this proceeding, collected his followers, stormed the castle, and hung the governor from the wall, in the sight of the king and his fleet. With four of his sons, he was soon after apprehended at Isla, by MacIan of Ardnamurchan, and being conveyed to Edinburgh, they were there executed for high treason

In 1495 King James assembled an army at Glasgow, and on the 18th May, he was at the castle of Mingarry in Ardnamurchan, when several of the Highland chiefs made their submission to him In 1497 Sir Alexander of Lochalsh again rebelled, and invading the more fertile districts of Ross, was by the Mackenzies and Munroes, at a place called Drumchatt, again defeated and driven out of Ross. Proceeding southward among the Isles, he endeavoured to rouse the islanders to arms in his behalf but without success. He was surprised in the island of Oransay, by MacIan of Ardnamurchan, and put to death

In 1501, Donald Dubh, whom the islanders regarded as their rightful lord, and who, from his infancy, had been detained in confinement in the castle of Inchconnell, escaped from prison, and appeared among his clansmen They had always maintained that he was the lawful son of Angus of the Isles, by his wife the Lady Margaret Campbell, daughter of the first earl of Argyle, but his legitimacy was denied by the government when the islanders combined to assert by arms his claims as their hereditary chief His liberation he owed to the gallantry and fidelity of the men of Glencoe. Repairing to the isle of Lewis, he put himself under the protection of its lord, Torquil Macleod, who had married Katherine, another daughter of Argyle, and therefore sister of the lady whom the islanders believed to be his mother. A strong confederacy was formed in his favour, and about Christmas 1503, an irruption of the islanders and western clans under Donald Dubh was made into Badenoch, which was plundered and wasted with fire and sword. To put down this formidable rebellion, the array of the whole kingdom, north of Forth and Clyde, was called out; and the earls of Argyle, Huntly, Crawford, and Marischal, and the Lord Lovat, with other powerful barons, were charged to lead this force against the islanders. But two years elapsed before the insurrection was finally quelled. In 1505, the Isles were again invaded from the south by the king in person, and from the north by Huntly, who took several prisoners, but none of them of any rank. In these various expeditions the fleet under the celebrated Sir Andrew Wood and Robert Barton was employed against the islanders, and at length the insurgents were dispersed Carnburg, a strong fort on a small isolated rock, near the west coast of Mull, in which they had taken refuge, was reduced; the Macleans and the Macleods submitted to the king, and Donald Dubh, again made a prisoner, was committed to the castle of Edinburgh, where he remained for nearly forty years. After this the great power formerly enjoyed by the lords of the Isles was transferred to the earls of Argyle and Huntly, the former having the chief rule in the south isles and adjacent coasts, while the influence of the latter prevailed in the north isles and Highlands.

The children of Sir Alexander of Lochalsh, the nephew of John the fourth and last lord of the Isles, had fallen into the hands of the king, and as they were all young, they appear to have been brought up in the royal household. Donald, the eldest son, called by the Highlanders, Donald Galda, or the foreigner, from his early residence in the Lowlands, was allowed to inherit his father's estates, and was frequently permitted to visit the Isles. He was with James IV at the battle of Flodden, and appears to have been knighted under the royal banner on that disastrous field. Two months after in November 1513, he raised another insurrection in the Isles, and being joined by the Macleods and Macleans, was proclaimed lord of the Isles. The numbers of his adherents daily increased But in the course of 1515, the earl of Argyle prevailed upon the insurgents to submit to the regent. At this time Sir Donald appeared frequently before the council, relying on a safe-conduct, and his reconciliation to the regent (John, duke of Albany) was apparently so cordial that on 24th September 1516, a summons was despatched to "Monsieur de Ylis," to join the royal army, then about to proceed to the borders. Ere long, however, he was again in open rebellion Early in 1517, he razed the castle of Mingarry to the ground, and ravaged the whole district of Ardnamurchan with fire and sword. His chief leaders now deserted him, and some of them determined on delivering him up to the regent. He, however, effected his escape, but his two brothers were made prisoners by Maclean of Dowart and Macleod of Dunvegan, who hastened to make their submission to the government. Soon after the earl of Argyle, with the Macleans of Dowart and Lochbuy, and Macleod of Harris, presented to the council certain petitions and offers relating to the suppression of the rebellion In the following year, Sir Donald was enabled to revenge the murder of his father on the Maclans of Ardnamurchan, having defeated and put to death their chief and two of his sons, with a great number of his men. He was about to be forfeited for high treason, when his death, which took place a few weeks after his success against the Maclans, brought the rebellion, which had lasted for upwards of five years, to a sudden close. He was the last male of his family, and died without issue.

In 1539, Donald Gorme of Sleat claimed the lordship of the Isles, as lawful heir male of John earl of Ross. With a considerable force he passed over into Ross-shire, where, after ravaging the district of Kinlochew, he proceeded to Kintail, with the intention of surprising the castle of Elandonan, at that time almost without a garrison. Exposing himself rashly under the walls, he received a wound in the foot from an arrow, which proved fatal.

In 1543, under the regency of the earl of Arran, Donald Dubh, the grandson of John, last lord of the Isles, again appeared upon the scene. Escaping from his long imprisonment, he was received with enthusiasm by the insular chiefs, and with their assistance, he prepared to expel the earls of Argyle and Huntly from their acquisitions in the Isles. At the head of 1,800 men he invaded Argyle's territories, slew many of his vassals, and carried off a great quantity of cattle, with other plunder At first he was supported by the earl of Lennox, then attached to the English interest, and thus remained for a time in the undisputed possession of the Isles. Through the influence of Lennox, the islanders agreed to transfer their alliance from the Scottish to the English crown, and in June 1545, a proclamation was issued by the regent Arran and his privy council against "Donald, alleging himself of the Isles, and other Highland men, his parttakers." On the 28th July of that year, a commission was granted by Donald, "lord of the Isles, and earl of Ross," with the advice and consent of his barons and council of the Isles, of whom seventeen are named, to two commissioners, for treating, under the directions of the earl of Lennox, with the English king On the 5th of August, the lord and barons of the Isles were at Knockfergus in Ireland, with a force of 4,000 men and 160 galleys, when they took the oath of allegiance to the king of England, at the command of Lennox, while 4,000 men in arms were left to guard and defend the Isles in his absence. Donald's plenipotentiaries then proceeded to the English court with letters from him both to King Henry and his privy council, by one of which it appears that the lord of the Isles had already received from the English monarch the sum of one thousand crowns, and the promise of an annual pension of two thousand. Soon after the lord of the Isles returned with his forces to Scotland, but appears to have returned to Ireland again with Lennox. There he was attacked with fever, and died at Drogheda, on his way to Dublin With him terminated the direct line of the lords of the Isles.

The lordship of the Isles, annexed on 3d Dec. 1540 inalienably to the crown, forms one of the titles of the prince of Wales.

IVORY, James, Sir, an eminent mathematician, the son of a watchmaker, was born at Dundee in 1765, and received the rudiments of his education in his native town As his father intended him to be a minister of the Church of Scotland, he was sent, at fourteen years of age, to the university of St Andrews, where he remained for six years Four of these he devoted to the usual curriculum, and the two last to theology Mathematics, from a natural inclination to that branch of science, particularly engaged his attention, and in his favourite study he was encouraged and greatly assisted by the Rev. John West, one of the instructors at the university. The progress he made was very marked, and at this time he is said to have given indications of the distinction which, as a mathematician, he was afterwards to reach. From St. Andrews, he removed, with his fellow-student Mr (afterwards Sir John) Leslie, to the university of Edinburgh, where he spent one year in qualifying himself for the church

His university studies were concluded in 1786, but instead of taking license as a preacher of the gospel, he accepted an appointment as an assistant teacher in an academy then recently opened in Dundee In that situation he remained for three years. He next engaged with some other persons in the establishment, at Douglastown in Forfarshire, of a factory for spinning flax, and of this association he appears to have been the managing partner During fifteen years, from 1789 to 1804, he was employed daily in operations apparently very uncongenial with the taste of a man of science, but all his leisure hours appear to have been devoted to the prosecution of scientific researches At this period he is supposed to have diligently studied the writings of the English mathematicians, as well as made himself thoroughly acquainted with the productions of the most distinguished of those on the continent His earliest writings were contributed to the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh These were three memoirs, entitled 'A New Series for the Rectification of the Ellipse,' in 1796, 'A New Method of Resolving Cubic Equations,' in 1799, and 'A New and Universal Solution of Kepler's Problem,' in 1802, all of them evincing great analytical skill, as well as originality of thought

In 1804 the company with which he was connected was brought to a dissolution Mr Ivory was then appointed professor of mathematics in the Royal military college, at that time at Great Marlow, Buckinghamshire, but afterwards removed to Sandhurst in Berkshire He fulfilled the duties of this important professorship to the great satisfaction of the governors of that institution His attention to the students under him was unremitting, and he always evinced the utmost readiness to assist, by the most appropriate and familiar illustrations, in smoothing the paths of science to his pupils. An edition of Euclid's 'Elements,' which is known to have been his work, though his name does not appear on the title-page, was prepared by him for the use of the students in the college, and the manner in which he has treated the book on proportion, and those which relate to solids, must have greatly diminished the difficulties which young learners experience in acquiring a knowledge of those parts of elementary mathematics

In the beginning of 1819, finding his health decline, he was induced to resign his professorship, and retire into private life In consequence of his great merit there was granted to him the pension due to the full period which, by the regulations, the civil officers of the institution are required to serve previously to obtaining a pension, which period he had not completed After his retirement from Sandhurst he devoted himself wholly to scientific researches, and the results of his labours have been printed chiefly in the volumes of the 'Philosophical Transactions' In the year 1831, in consideration of the great talent displayed in his investigations, he was, on the recommendation of Lord Brougham, then lord-chancellor, to whom he had been known in early life, invested by King William IV with the order of knighthood of the Guelphs of Hanover, at the same time that other distinguished scientific men, Messrs Herschell, Charles Bell, David Brewster, South, John Leslie, and Harris Nicolas received the same honour An annual pension of £300 was also bestowed on him, which he enjoyed during the rest of his life In 1839, the university of St Andrews conferred on him the degree of LL D Sir James Ivory died September 21, 1842, in his 77th year In the last years of his life he resided in great privacy in or near London

To the 'Transactions of the Royal Society' of London he contributed in all fifteen papers, most of them relating to physical astronomy, and every one containing mathematical investigations of the most refined nature The first, entitled 'On the Attractions of Homogeneous Ellipsoids,' is in the volume for 1809, and contains investigations of the attractions of such ellipsoids, on points situated within them and on their exterior The former case presents few difficulties, but the process used by Laplace for the solution of the other was very complex, and Mr. Ivory had the merit of discovering one which is remarkable for its simplicity. In the volumes for 1812 and 1822 he inserted three papers on the 'Attractions of Spheroids,' in which he substituted a refined analytical process for the indirect method of Laplace. They also contain some observations on the method employed by that great geometer in computing the attractions of spheroids of any form differing but little from spheres. The analytical skill shown by Mr Ivory in these papers was frankly acknowledged by Laplace himself, in a conversation which he had, in 1826, with Sir Humphry Davy

In the 'Transactions' for 1814, is a paper by Ivory, entitled 'A New Method of Deducing a first Approximation to the Orbit of a Comet from three Geocentric Observations' The same year he received the Copley medal for his mathematical communications to the Royal Society The volumes for 1823 and 1838 contain his investigations relating to Astronomical Refraction. In 1826, one of the royal medals was awarded to him for his paper of the former year, and in 1839 he received another royal medal for that of the latter year The volumes for 1824, 1831, 1834, and 1839 contain, each, a paper on the equilibrium of fluid bodies. The subject of planetary perturbation is treated by him in two papers in the volumes for 1832 and 1833. In the 'Transactions' he has only one paper which is purely mathematical It is in the volume for 1831, entitled 'On the Theory of Elliptic Transcendants.' To the 'Philosophical Magazine,' he also contributed several papers. In the number for August 1821, is his method of finding the latitude of a ship by two observations of the sun's altitude, with the time elapsed between them, and in the volumes for 1825 and 1827 are his investigations relating to sound and heat Several valuable communications from his pen are contained in Maseres 'Scriptores Logarithmici,' in Leybourne's 'Mathematical Repository,' and in the Supplement to the sixth edition of the 'Encyclopedia Britannica.'

He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London, an honorary member of several learned bodies, and a corresponding member of the Institute of France

IVORY, JAMES, a lord of session, under the judicial title of Lord Ivory, a nephew of the subject of the preceding memoir, and son of Mr Thomas Ivory, Dundee, was born in 1792 He passed advocate in 1816, and married in 1817 the daughter of Mr Alexander Lawrie, Edinburgh, deputy gazette-writer for Scotland, with issue In 1832 he was appointed a depute advocate, and subsequently one of the municipal corporation commissioners for Scotland, in 1838 sheriff of Caithness, in 1834 sheriff of Bute, in 1839 he became solicitor-general of Scotland, in 1840 a lord of session, and in 1849 a lord of justiciary His son, William, passed advocate in 1849, and another son, Thomas, in 1851

J

JACK, THOMAS, an eminent scholar of the sixteenth century, was master of the Grammar school at Glasgow, which situation he relinquished in 1574, to become minister of Eastwood parish, near Paisley In 1592 appeared his 'Onomasticon Poeticum,' a sort of dictionary in blank Latin verse, of the localities of classical poetry, which is now very scarce. From the dedication, it appears that the work was revised by Buchanan. In 1582 Jack was minister of Ruthergien, and as such was one of those who opposed the election of Robert Montgomery as archbishop of Glasgow On the 22d May of that year he and Mr Thomas Smeton went to Edinburgh to inform the presbytery that Mr. Montgomery had transgressed the act of assembly, and craved that he might be excommunicated In 1590 he was a member of the General Assembly. He died in 1596

JACK, GILBERT, a learned metaphysician and medical writer, was born at Aberdeen in 1578 He studied under Robert Howie, who, in 1593, was made principal of Marischal college, on its erection into a university. It is stated by Freher that he attended the philosophy class at St. Andrews, taught by Robert Hay, an eminent theologian, at whose advice he afterwards pursued his studies at the colleges of Herborn and Helmstadt, on the Continent. In 1604, a period when almost every college in Europe numbered a Scotsman among its professors, he was appointed to the chair of philosophy in the university of Leyden, where, having studied medicine, he took his degree of M D in 1611 In 1612 he published 'Institutiones Physicæ, Juventutis Lugdunensis Studiis potissimum dicatæ,' reprinted with notes in 1616 In 1624 appeared his 'Institutiones Medicinæ,' and shortly afterwards he was offered the chair of civil history at Oxford, which he declined He died April 17, 1628, leaving a widow and ten children

JAMES I, king of Scotland, one of the best of our old poets, the third son of Robert III, by Annabella Drummond, was born at Dunfermline in 1394 After the untimely and mysterious death of his elder brother, David, duke of Rothesay (see vol i p 84), King Robert resolved to send James to the court of France to complete his education, which had been begun under Walter Wardlaw, bishop of St Andrews Accordingly, in 1405, when only eleven years of age, the young prince sailed from his native country, under the care of the earl of Orkney, but his vessel being taken by an English squadron, in violation of a truce which at this time subsisted between England and Scotland, he was carried prisoner to the Tower of London, where he remained for two years, and was afterwards transferred to Windsor castle Though kept in close confinement, he was instructed in every branch of knowledge which that age afforded, and became also eminently expert in all athletic exercises He acquainted himself especially with the art of government, and made observations on the mode of administering justice, in a country which had been earlier civilized and was more advanced in the knowledge of law than the one he was destined to govern His father having died of grief at his capture, his uncle, Albany, and after his death his son Murdoch, ruled as regent in his absence

In 1421 Henry V of England took James with him in his second expedition against France, in the hope of detaching the Scots auxiliaries from the French service; and on his return recommitted him to Windsor castle. The captive monarch cheered the gloom of his prison by the consolations of philosophy and poetry, in the latter of which he excelled He appears particularly to have studied the writings of Chaucer and Gower. At length, after a captivity of nearly nineteen years, he was restored, when in his 30th year, to his kingdom, by the duke of Bedford, then regent of England, and he returned to Scotland in April Portrait of James I.

1424, having espoused the Lady Joanna Beaufort, daughter of the duke of Somerset, of the blood royal of England This lady was the fair beauty described in his choice poem of 'The King's Quhair,' or Book, of whom he became enamoured on seeing her, from his window, walking in the royal gardens at Windsor castle, and who, he says, had

"Beauty enough to make a world to dout.'

Finding that the duke of Albany, and his son Murdoch, had alienated most of the royal possessions, and reduced the kingdom to a state of anarchy and lawless disorder, he caused the latter, with his two sons, and the aged earl of Lennox, to be executed as traitors, and their estates to be confiscated to the Crown. (See vol. i. p 41.) By the enactment in parliament of wise and judicious laws he endeavoured to curb the enormous power of the nobility, and to improve the condition of the people, which, while it rendered him popular with his subjects generally, drew upon him the hatred and indignation of his nobles, who had long acted beyond the control of the law Besides appointing judges to administer and enforce the laws in every county, he ordered standard weights and measures to be made, encouraged learned men, erected public schools, which he liberally endowed, and finding the resources of the kingdom greatly diminished, and trade much neglected, he invited various manufacturers from Flanders, whom he liberally encouraged to settle in Scotland

In 1436 he renewed the alliance with France, giving his eldest daughter Margaret, princess of Scotland, in marriage to the dauphin She was only twelve years old when she married the French prince, who was scarcely a year older She died in August 1445, in her twenty-second year, her death having been occasioned by a slanderous imputation by one of the courtiers Her marriage was an unhappy one, her husband, afterwards the despotic and superstitious Louis XI, being the most cruel, treacherous, and malignant monarch that ever sat on the French throne, albeit he was the first of France who was styled "Most Christian King" It was his maxim Dissimuler c'est regner. One of his creatures, Jamet de Villy, falsely accused the princess of being unfaithful to her husband The innocent princess was so overwhelmed by the infamous accusation that she took to her bed, and pined away, overcome by grief Before she expired, she exclaimed, "Ah! Jamet, Jamet, you have gained your purpose" The story was afterwards proved to be false, and Jamet declared to be a "scoundrel" and "common liar" Louis XI. is admirably represented in Scott's graphic novel of "Quentin Durward" A portrait of the princess on horseback is given in Pinkerton's Scottish portraits, vol i.

A fruitless attempt of the English to intercept at sea the princess on her passage, with the delay of redress for sundry inroads committed by them, induced James to declare war against England. Raising an army, amounting, it is said, to 200,000 men, he laid siege to Roxburgh castle, then held by the English, but after fifteen days' investment, not being supported by his barons, and being informed, according to some writers, of a conspiracy against his life, he disbanded his forces, and retired to the monastery of the Dominicans or Black Friars, in Perth, where he had resolved to celebrate the festival of Christmas. On his journey thither a Highland woman, who pretended to be a soothsayer, but who in reality was acquainted with the designs of the conspirators, appeared before the king and his attendants, as he was about to pass the Frith of Forth at Queensferry Her wild and singular attitude astonished James. "My lord and king," she exclaimed, "if you pass over this water, you will never return alive" James was startled at her language, and an old prediction occurred to his recollection, that the king of Scotland would be slain that year He ordered one of his retinue to ride to the woman, and ask the meaning of her mysterious intimation, but she merely repeated what she had said to the king, that if he passed the Scottish sea, as the Frith of Forth was anciently designated, he would never return alive She was asked who gave her this information, and she replied that she received it from a man named Hubert, most probably a domestic in the service of the king The intimation of the woman was unfortunately disregarded The king and his attendants passed on, believing her to be, what he who questioned her described her, "a drunken fool who knew not what she said"

The principal conspirator against the king was Sir Robert Graham, uncle of Malise, earl of Strathearn He had been imprisoned by James in 1425, when he took summary vengeance on the family of the duke of Albany In a meeting of the Estates in 1424, a statute had been enacted to ascertain the lands which belonged to the Crown at the decease of Robert I., and James was authorised to demand the production of all charters and writs of tenure. Under pretence that the earldom of Strathearn was a male fee, the king gave the liferent of it, in 1426, to his uncle, Walter, earl of Athol and Caithness, grand-uncle of Malise, who was thus divested of his earldom, but as a recompense the king assigned to him the earldom of Menteith Athol, who was at that time approaching his seventieth year, was the son of Robert II. by Euphemia Ross, the second queen of that monarch, and his grandson, Sir Robert Stuart, was in great favour with James, who appointed him private chamberlain at court Sir Robert Graham, indignant at the divestment and transfer of his nephew's dignity, began to intrigue with the earl of Athol and his grandson, who were both ambitious, intimating that if the king was dead, the crown would of right devolve upon the latter He soon found a number of desperate adventurers to aid him in his plans, and he inflamed the people by false statements of the proceedings of James, while he aggravated the discontent of the nobles, already greatly irritated at their diminished power and influence In 1434, shortly after he had been released from his imprisonment, he attended a meeting of the principal nobility, where he expressed himself in the most outrageous manner against James, who was then proceeding vigorously in his endeavours to humble the feudal greatness of his barons He maintained that the execution of Murdoch duke of Albany and his sons had originated in the avarice of the king, whose object was to possess their estates, and he concluded a long harangue with saying, "My lords, if you will firmly support me in what I shall say to the king, I will demand redress in your presence, and I trust in God we shall be satisfied" His proposal was highly approved of, and the nobles present bound themselves to support him

When the Estates met in 1435, relying on the promises of aid he had received, this daring conspirator rose, and advancing to the royal seat, laid his hand on the king, and exclaimed,—"I arrest you in the name of the estates of your realm now assembled, for, as your subjects are bound and sworn to obey you in the administration of the laws, in like manner you are compelled to defend your people, to govern by the laws, so that you do not wrong them, but defend and maintain them in justice" Then turning to the nobles, he asked, "Is it not thus as I say?" But, astonished at his boldness, and awed by the presence of the king, they maintained a profound silence, and James immediately ordered Graham to prison. He was soon after sent into banishment, when he retired to the solitary fastnesses of the Highlands. As his estates were forfeited, he proceeded to renounce his allegiance, and he sent the king a mortal defiance, declaring that for his tyranny he would destroy him, his wife and children, whenever he had an opportunity James immediately issued a proclamation, offering a large reward for Graham, dead or alive The other chief conspirators were Athol, Sir Robert Stuart, and Christopher Chambers, one of the king's domestics, whom they had bribed

The night fixed for carrying the plot into execution was that of Ash Wednesday, being the 20th February, 1437 The earl of Athol and his grandson attended the king that evening, and some time after supper, the amusements of the court having been kept up till a late hour, James called for the parting cup, and every one present drank before retiring to rest Shortly after midnight, Graham, with three hundred Highlanders of Athol, was in possession of the convent, having entered without being observed, or meeting the slightest interruption The king was in his own apartment, and was standing before the fireplace in a kind of undress, gaily conversing with his queen and a few of her ladies, when suddenly he heard the clashing of arms in the courtyard, and the flashes of torches from without glared through the room As the noise waxed louder, the queen and her ladies clung to each other, surrounding the king, but soon recovering their presence of mind, they rushed to the door, which they found open, and the bolts destroyed The king, without arms or attendants, besought them to keep the door fast as long as they could, while he examined if escape were practicable Finding the windows of the apartment strongly barred, he seized the fire-tongs, and after a desperate exertion succeeded in lifting a plank from the floor, which covered a kind of square vault or cellar of narrow dimensions Through this aperture he dropped, and the flooring was carefully replaced The room below was full of dust, and by a sad fatality he had caused a small square window, through which he could have easily escaped, to be built up three days previously, on account of the tennis balls entering it, when that game was played in the garden.

On the approach of the conspirators to the king's apartment, Lady Catherine Douglas thrust her arm into the bolt, while the other ladies pressed against the door But the delicate arm bone was in a moment broken by the violence of the assassins in bursting it open Several of the king's attendants whom the noise had attracted, in offering resistance, were killed, and among them Patrick Dunbar, a brother of the earl of March Not finding the king in the apartment, and forgetting the cellar below the floor, the conspirators proceeded to the adjoining rooms in search of him Supposing that they had left the convent, James called for sheets to draw him out of the place of his confinement With considerable exertion, the ladies removed the plank, and were proceeding to extricate him, when one of them, Elizabeth Douglas, fell into the cellar At this unfortunate moment, Christopher Chambers happened to pass along the gallery, and saw what the ladies were doing Calling to his associates, he entered the apartment with a torch, and though the noise of his approach had caused the ladies hastily to replace the board, he carefully examined the floor, and soon perceived that a plank had been broken up On lifting it, he held the torch in the aperture, and beheld the king and the lady "Sirs," he loudly cried, "the bridegroom is found for whom we have been searching and carolling all night long" The conspirators broke up the floor, and one of them, named Sir John Hall, leaped into the cellar, with a dagger in his hand The king grappled him by the shoulders, and dashed him to the ground A brother of Hall descended, and aimed at the king, but the blow was parried, and he was also seized by the neck, and thrown down Yet in vain did James attempt to wrest a dagger from either, and in the struggle he cut his hands severely

Sir Robert Graham now appeared in the room, and instantly sprang into the cellar. Weary and faint by his former struggles, weaponless, and profusely bleeding at the hands, James appealed to him for mercy, as farther resistance was vain "Thou cruel tyrant," said Graham, raising his dagger, "never didst thou show mercy to those of thine own blood, nor to any gentleman who came in thy way; expect no mercy now." "Then," entreated the king, "I implore thee, for the salvation of my soul, to let me have a confessor." "No," replied the assassin, "no other confessor shalt thou have than this dagger" Graham plunged his weapon into the king's breast, and the ill-fated monarch fell, mortally wounded. Graham and the two brothers, Hall, then fell upon him, and repeatedly stabbed him in various parts of the body even after he was dead In his breast there were no fewer than sixteen wounds, any one of which would have produced death

At the time of his assassination, James was in the 44th year of his age, and the thirty-first of his nominal, though only the thirteenth, of his actual reign His death was universally bewailed by the nation, and his inhuman murderers, who were all apprehended within a month after, were put to death by the most horrible tortures

James left a son, also named James, the subject of the following article, and five daughters A portrait of his queen, Jane or Joanna, is in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, taken from a rare print, and subjoined is a woodcut of it

One of his daughters, the princess Isabel, married in November 1442, Francis I., duke of Bretagne, having been affianced to him the preceding year, when his father, duke John V., was alive Argentré, in his History of Bretagne, informs us that when the envoys of John returned from Scotland, that prince was eager to know their opinion of the princess. They informed him that she had beauty, health, and an elegant person, but was very silent, and apparently simple "My dear friends," said the duke, "I beg you will return to Scotland and bring her to me, she is just such a wife as I desire for my son Knowledge does a woman more hurt than good, upon my soul, I shall have no other By the body of St Nicolas, a woman is quite wise enough, when she can distinguish her husband's shirt from his waistcoat" In Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, where this celebrated reply is quoted, there is a fine portrait of Isabel of Scotland, a copy from the engraving in Lobineau's Histoire de Bretagne, taken from the original painting in the cathedral of Vannes, of which a woodcut is subjoined

James I. holds a high rank among Scottish poets. The chief memorial of his fame is his allegorical poem of 'The King's Quhair,' the only manuscript copy of which in existence was discovered in the Bodleian library at Oxford, by Lord Woodhouselee, (see TYTLER, Alexander Fraser,) who, in 1783, first published it to the world, with explanatory notes and a critical dissertation To James is likewise ascribed two humorous poems, entitled 'Christ's Kirk on the Green,' and 'Peblis to the Play,' descriptive of the rural manners and pastimes of that age. Historians relate that he was also a skilful musician, and some attribute to him the composition of many of the most favourite national melodies of Scotland A list of the works ascribed to James I will be found in Park's edition of Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors

JAMES II, king of Scotland, succeeded to the throne, on the murder of his father in February 1437, when only seven years of age, and during his minority the public affairs were chiefly directed by Chancellor Crichton (see vol i p 727), who had been the minister of James I., while Alexander Livingston was chosen keeper of the King's person, but these ministers unhappily disagreed, in consequence of which the country was divided into two factions When at length he assumed the government into his own hands, James displayed a prudence and fortitude which inspired hopes of an energetic reign He succeeded in overawing and nearly ruining the potent family of Douglas, which had so long rivalled and defied the crown, and with his own hand stabbed the eighth earl to the heart in Stirling castle, for refusing to break up the treasonable confederacy which had been formed with the earls of Crawford and Ross (see page 44 of this volume) He procured the sanction of parliament to laws more subversive of the power of the nobles than had been obtained by any of his predecessors By one of these, not only all the vast possessions of the earl of Douglas were annexed to the crown, but all prior and future alienations of crown lands were declared to be void He was accidentally killed by the bursting of a cannon at the siege of Roxburgh, August 3, 1460, in the 30th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign

He had married in 1450, the princess Mary, daughter of the duke of Gueldres, by whom he left three sons and a daughter On receiving intelligence of her husband's death, the queen hastened to the camp, with her eldest son, James, then only in his seventh year, and boldly exhorted the nobles to continue the siege, with the words, "I give you another king" The siege was in consequence vigorously pressed, when the garrison surrendered, and the castle of Roxburgh was levelled with the ground.

JAMES III., born in 1453, ascended the throne in 1460, being first proclaimed in the town of Kelso During his minority, the administration of public affairs was committed to Robert, Lord Boyd, the chancellor, and the archbishops of Glasgow and St. Andrews, and the bishop of Dunkeld, and by them a treaty of peace with England was concluded for fifteen years On 13th July 1469, the king's marriage was celebrated with Margaret, daughter of the king of Denmark, who, in name of dowry, made a permanent gift of the Orkney and Shetland isles to the crown of Scotland From a portrait of this princess, in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, the subjoined woodcut is taken

Like his father and grandfather, James aimed at humbling the power of the nobles, but far inferior to them in abilities and address, he attached himself to persons of mean station, and treated his nobility with coldness and neglect. Having detected a design formed against him, in which his brothers, Alexander, duke of Albany, and John, earl of Mar, were implicated, James seized their persons, and committed Albany to Edinburgh castle, while Mar was murdered, it is said, by the king's command (see vol i pp. 43 and 44) Albany made his escape, and concluded a treaty with Edward IV. of England, in consequence of which he returned to Scotland, with a powerful army under the duke of Gloucester James was compelled to implore the assistance of his nobles, and while they lay in the camp near Lauder, a conspiracy for the destruction of the king's favourites was formed among them, with Douglas earl of Angus at its head, (see p 45 of this volume,) and the earls of Angus, Huntly, and Lennox, with other barons of less note, forcibly entered the apartment of their sovereign, seized all the favourites except one, Sir John Ramsay, afterwards created earl of Bothwell, (see vol i p 353,) and without any form of trial hanged them over the bridge of Lauder, in July 1482 James himself, a prisoner in the hands of his rebellious barons, was conveyed to Edinburgh castle, in which he was strictly confined for a time, under the charge of his uncles, the earls of Buchan and Athol He soon obtained his liberation, but new conspiracies were entered into, and the malcontent nobles having obtained possession of the king's eldest son, a youth of sixteen, they placed him at their head, and openly proclaimed their intention of depriving James of a crown of which, they declared, he had proved himself unworthy Roused by his danger, the king formed the design of retreating into the north, but the rebellious lords advancing upon Edinburgh, he had scarcely time to get on board one of the ships of Sir Andrew Wood, and cross over to Fife, when he learned that the whole of the southern part of Scotland had risen in arms Proceeding towards the north, James issued orders for assembling an army, and he speedily found himself at the head of a well-appointed force of 30,000 men

The two parties came to an engagement at Sauchie, near Stirling, July 11, 1488. James fled at the first onset, was thrown from his horse, carried into a miller's hut, and by a person who, calling himself a priest, was brought to confess him, he was treacherously murdered, in the 36th year of his age, and 28th of his reign

The portrait of James III. and his son kneeling, as in the altar-piece, originally painted, not later than the year 1484, of the Collegiate church of the Holy Trinity, Edinburgh, which is given in a separate steel plate, has been verified by Mr David Laing, keeper of the library of the Writers to the Signet, in an interesting and valuable historical description, communicated to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and inserted in the Proceedings of that body, vol iii, part 1, page 8 1860 The original paintings, transferred in consequence of a memorial addressed to her majesty, signed by the dukes of Hamilton and Buccleuch, and other influential persons, to the palace of Holyrood from Hampton Court, as the most appropriate place for preserving authentic portraits of the royal family of Scotland, have been, by authority of the lords commissioners of the treasury, placed within frames of large plate glass, and raised on handsome oak pedestals, so that both sides of the panels are exhibited to advantage

JAMES IV, eldest son of James III, by Margaret, princess of Denmark, was born in March 1472, and succeeded to the throne in 1488 Naturally generous and brave, and fond of magnificence, he soon acquired the confidence of his nobles, and by his amiable and popular manners, and the enactment of wise and salutary laws, obtained the affections of his people He excelled in all warlike exercises, and, by frequent tournaments and other splendid exhibitions, he attracted to his court not only his own nobility, but also many knights from foreign countries To acquaint himself with the wants, manners, and pursuits of his subjects, he was also in the habit of mixing amongst them in disguise In 1503 he married Margaret, daughter of Henry VII of England, an event which laid the foundation of the future union of the two crowns By the marriage treaty a peace was concluded with England, which continued unbroken for nine years, during which time the kingdom, under his beneficent government, enjoyed the utmost tranquillity and prosperity Unfortunately, however, James' impetuous and chivalric character could ill brook some indications of hostility shown by his brother-in-law, Henry VIII., soon after his accession to the English throne, and, assembling a numerous army, he invaded the northern counties of England. He was encountered by the earl of Surrey at the head of 31,000 men, on the fatal field of Flodden, September 9, 1513, when the Scots army sustained a decisive overthrow, the king and the choicest of his nobility being among the slain James was in the 41st year of his age, and 26th of his reign, at the time of this disastrous engagement, in which twelve earls, thirteen lords, five eldest sons of peers, fifty gentlemen of note, several dignitaries of the church, and about ten thousand common men, were left on the field with their sovereign

In the Iconographia Scotica of Pinkerton, there are two portraits of this generous and magnificent monarch, one of them with a falcon on his fist, and the other with a thistle in his hand, and a chain round his waist Historians describe his person as of the middle size, and elegant, with a majestic countenance Of the former portrait, Pinkerton says "The present curious and interesting portrait is from a painting in the possession of Mr Batsford, at Fulham, which appears to have belonged to King Charles I In the catalogue of that king's pictures, p 87, there is this article 'Item, beside the door, the picture of King James IV of Scotland, with a faulcon on his fist, done after an ancient water-coloured piece, half a figure, so big as the life, in a carved frame Length 3 f 1 Breadth 2 f 0 Done by Daniel Mytens' This invaluable piece is in good preservation, and Mytens, who flourished in the reign of James I of England, has shown great talent in the execution The prototype was probably a painting in distemper, in one of the Scottish palaces"

JAMES V, son of the preceding, was only eighteen months old when he succeeded to the throne, having been born in April 1512. Among the persons who had the principal charge of his education were Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, Gavin Dunbar, and John Bellenden During his minority, the queen-mother was appointed regent, in consequence of the will left by her husband, although it was contrary to the Scottish law, but after her marriage with the earl of Angus,

John duke of Albany was elected regent (see vol. i p 45) In 1524, when only in his twelfth year, the nobles, tired of the state of misrule into which the country had been brought, and of the dissensions which prevailed among themselves, requested the young king to assume the government His power, however, was merely nominal, as four guardians were appointed, by whom the whole authority of the state was exercised in his name. The earl of Angus, one of these, soon obtained the ascendency over his colleagues, and he held the king in such restraint as induced James, in his seventeenth year, to make his escape from the palace of Falkland, and take refuge in Stirling castle, the residence of his mother By the most vigorous measures, the king now proceeded to repress disorders and punish crime throughout the kingdom Attended by a numerous retinue, under the pretence of enjoying the pleasures of hunting, he made progresses into the unsettled parts of the country, executing thieves and marauders, and caused the law to be obeyed even in the remotest parts of his dominions. The most memorable of his victims was the border outlaw, Johnie Armstrong, who, on coming to pay his respects to the king, was summarily hanged with all his followers

In 1532 the college of justice or court of session was instituted by James, modelled on the court of the parliament of Paris

In 1535 James went over to France upon a matrimonial expedition, and married Magdalene, eldest daughter of the French king, who died of consumption within forty days after her arrival in Scotland He afterwards, in June 1538, espoused Mary of Guise, widow of the duke of Longueville His continual efforts to depress the nobility rendered almost his whole reign disastrous A rupture with Henry VIII. led to the battle of Solway Moss, one of the most inglorious in the Scottish annals. The chief command of the Scots troops having been conferred on Oliver Sinclair, a favourite of the king, the haughty and discontented nobles indignantly refused to obey such a leader, and were, in consequence, easily defeated by an inferior body of English When the tidings of this disaster reached James, he was struck to the heart with grief and mortification Hastening to Edinburgh, he shut himself up for a week, and then passed over to Falkland, where he took to his bed Meantime his queen had been delivered at Linlithgow of a daughter, afterwards the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots. On being informed of this event, he exclaimed, "It (meaning the crown) cam with a lass, and it will go with a lass," and in a few days thereafter expired, December 13, 1542, being only in the thirty-first year of his age and twenty-ninth of his reign His deathbed was peculiarly affecting A few of his most favoured friends and councillors stood round his couch, the monarch stretched out his hand for them to kiss, and regarding them for some moments with a look of great sweetness and placidity, turned himself upon the pillow and expired He left an only daughter, the beautiful but unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots, an infant of eight days old, to succeed to the crown, and amongst other illegitimate children, a son, James, afterwards the famous Regent Moray, his mother being the daughter of John, fourth Lord Erskine

His love of justice endeared James V to the people, who conferred on him the proud title of "King of the Poor" To gratify a strong passion for romantic adventure, he used often to roam through the country in disguise, under the name of "The Gudeman of Ballangeich" He is said to have been the author of the well-known ballad of 'The Gaberlunzie Man,' and to him is also ascribed the popular old song of 'The Jollie Beggar,' both founded on his own adventures.

His person is described as having been of the middle size, his form elegant and majestic, his face oval, his eyes blue, his hair yellow He had an aquiline nose, and the most striking features of the Stuarts, from the accession of the family His portrait, engraved for the 'Scottish Nation,' is from one in Pinkerton's Iconographia Scotica, after a drawing in Lord Orford's possession, copied from a contemporary painting in the collection of the duke of Devonshire

JAMES VI of Scotland, and I of England, the son of Mary, queen of Scots, and Henry Lord Darnley, was born in Edinburgh castle, June 19, 1566 In July of the following year, on the forced resignation of his mother, James was crowned king at Stirling, when he was scarcely more than a year old. Soon after his birth, he was intrusted to the care of the earl of Mar, and his youth was passed at Stirling castle, under the tuition chiefly of George Buchanan. He was of a docile but timid disposition, and his progress in learning was rapid. During his minority the kingdom was governed by regents, of whom the earls of Moray and Morton were the most conspicuous In 1578 James assumed the government into his own hands, and one of his first acts was to reconcile the feuds of his nobility, whom, for that purpose, he invited to a grand festival at Holyrood-house. He early discovered that excessive propensity to favouritism which accompanied him through life His preference of the duke of Lennox and Captain James Stewart, son of Lord Ochiltree, created earl of Arran, led to the celebrated "Raid of Ruthven" in August 1582 (see page 339), when the confederated nobles compelled him to dismiss them from his councils In the following May James made his escape from Ruthven castle, when he recalled the earl of Arran, executed the earl of Gowrie for treason (in May 1584), and banished most of the lords engaged with him in that enterprise In 1585 the banished nobles returned to Scotland with an army, and succeeded in obtaining a pardon for themselves, as well as the removal of the favourites from the king's presence

During the long imprisonment of his ill-fated mother, James treated her with neglect, but when it became evident that Queen Elizabeth was at length about to consummate her cruelty to Mary by putting her to a violent death, he felt himself called upon to interfere He sent a letter of remonstrance to the English queen, and appealed to his foreign allies for assistance On receiving the tidings of her execution, he exhibited every outward sign of grief and indignation He rejected with becoming spirit the excuses of Elizabeth, and made preparations for war, but, conscious of the inadequacy of his resources, no actual hostilities took place.

In 1589 James contracted a matrimonial alliance with Anne, second daughter of Frederick, king of Denmark The princess, on her voyage, being, by contrary winds, driven back to Norway, James sailed in quest of her, and after a winter passed in feasting and revelry in Copenhagen, returned with his queen to Scotland in May 1590. For the next ten years the history of his reign exhibits much turbulence and party contention. In August 1600, while the kingdom was in a state of unusual tranquillity, occurred the mysterious affair called the Gowrie conspiracy, one of the most inexplicable events in the annals of Scotland. Historians have assumed that the earl of Gowrie and his brother, Alexander Ruthven, had concerted a plan to assassinate the king, in revenge for their father's execution in 1584. On the 5th of August 1600, he was at his palace of Falkland in Fife, enjoying his favourite amusement of hunting, and at an early hour in the morning he had mounted, with his suite, and was proceeding in search of game, when he met Alexander Ruthven, who with great earnestness informed him that he had seized a person in disguise, of a very suspicious appearance, who held under his cloak a pot full of money, whom he had confined in his brother's castle at Perth for his examination The king conceiving him to be an agent of the Pope or the king of Spain, was persuaded to proceed to Perth, taking with him only the duke of Lennox, the earl of Mar, and about twenty others Soon after his arrival, while his retinue were partaking of a repast in an adjoining apartment, Alexander requested James to follow him privately, and, leading him up a staircase, through several rooms, the doors of which he carefully locked behind them, came at last to a small study, where there stood a man in armour, with a sword and dagger by his side At this strange sight, James started back, but Ruthven, snatching the dagger, held it to his breast, saying, "Remember how unjustly my father suffered by your command, you are my prisoner, submit to my disposal, without resistance or outcry, or this dagger shall instantly revenge his blood" James made use of expostulations, entreaties, and flattery, on which Ruthven left him in charge of the armed man, to seek for his brother In the meantime the king's attendants became impatient, and on inquiring for James, one of the servants hastily appeared among them, and told them that his majesty had just ridden off towards Falkland All of them rushed out into the street; and the earl, with the utmost eagerness, called for their horses.

Alexander Ruthven had, by this time, returned to the mysterious chamber where the king was detained, and swearing now that there was no remedy, and that he must die, proceeded to bind his hands. Unarmed as he was, the king scorned to submit to such an indignity, but closing with his opponent, a fierce struggle ensued. The man in armour, who had hitherto stood motionless, threw up the window, and the king, dragging Ruthven towards it, cried, with a wild and affrighted voice, "Treason! Help! My lord of Mar! help, help, I am murdered!" His attendants, hearing his cries, and seeing at the window a hand which grasped his neck, hastened to his assistance Lennox and Mar, with the greater number of the nobles, ran up the principal staircase, where, finding all the doors shut, they endeavoured in vain to force a passage. But Sir John Ramsay, of the Dalhousie family, one of the royal pages, ascending by a backstair, called "the black turnpike," found the door of the apartment open, and seizing Ruthven, who was still struggling with the king, struck him twice with his sword, and thrust him towards the entrance, where he was met and killed by Sir Thomas Erskine and Sir Hugh Herries With his last breath he exclaimed, "Alas! I am not to blame for this matter"

On the death of his brother, Gowrie rushed into the room, with a drawn sword in each hand, followed by seven of his people, well armed, and a scuffle ensued, when Sir John Ramsay pierced the earl through the heart, and he fell dead without uttering a word The inhabitants of Perth, with whom Gowrie was extremely popular, hearing of his fate, ran to arms, and surrounded his house, threatening revenge His majesty endeavoured to pacify them, by speaking to them from a window, and also by admitting the magistrates, to whom he fully detailed the circumstances of the case; on which they dispersed, and he returned to Falkland Three of the earl's accomplices were afterwards condemned and executed at Perth, and diligent search being made for the person concealed in the study, Andrew Henderson, the earl's steward, upon a promise of pardon, acknowledged himself to be the man From his confessions, however, and those of others implicated in the transaction, it appeared that they were totally ignorant of the motives which had prompted their master to such a deed. From the utter want of preparation for an effective defence on the part of the brothers, we are inclined to believe that they did not meditate the death of the king, but merely to get possession of his person, the only mode adopted in those days, by ambitious or discontented noblemen, to obtain a change in the policy of the government, and to render their own influence paramount. The subject has been very ably investigated in 'Pitcairn's Criminal Trials,' and the evidence connected with it has already been referred to under the head of GOWRIE, earl of (see p. 340 of this volume)

For the next three years, James was in constant communication with his ambassadors in England, and directed their measures, relative to his succession to the crown of that kingdom, with a degree of skill and knowledge of life which could scarcely have been expected from his previous management of Scottish affairs.

In 1603, on the death of Queen Elizabeth, James succeeded to the throne of England, when his style was changed to James I., being the first king of that name in the sister country He signalised his accession to the English crown by bestowing a profusion of titles and honours on both Scotsmen and Englishmen, but his undisguised preference of his own countrymen excited the jealousy and complaints of his new subjects. A conference held in the beginning of 1604, at Hampton Court, between the divines of the established church and the puritans, afforded James an opportunity of displaying his skill in theological controversy, and of declaring his determination to oppress all who dissented from episcopacy. His despotic and intolerant spirit even led him to re-light the fires of persecution In 1611 he caused two of his English subjects, Bartholomew Legate and Edward Wightman, to be burnt for heresy, the one at Smithfield, and the other at Lichfield On November 5, 1605, was discovered the famous Gunpowder Plot, concerted by some English Roman Catholics, the object of which was to blow up king and parliament; and, some time after, was also detected a conspiracy entered into by Lord Cobham and others to place the Lady Arabella Stuart on the throne.

In 1612 he lost his eldest son Henry, a prince of great promise. In 1613 the eventful marriage of his daughter Elizabeth, with the elector palatine of the Rhine, took place James' favourite at this time was Robert Carr or Kerr, of the Kerrs of Fernihirst, a youth from Scotland, whom he had created earl of Somerset. The scandalous murder of Sir Thomas Overbury by the machinations of this minion and his infamous countess, led to his disgrace at court, which paved the way for the rise of George Villiers, duke of Buckingham The unjust execution of the gallant and accomplished Sir Walter Raleigh in 1618, to please the court of Spain, has left a deep stain on James' memory

The close of James' life was marked by violent contests with his parliament, which prepared dreadful consequences for his son, Charles I He was also much disquieted by the misfortunes of his son-in-law, the elector-palatine, who had been stripped of all his dominions by the German emperor. By first undertaking the defence of the Protestants of Germany, and then abandoning their cause, James incurred considerable odium Urged by natural feelings for the popular cause, in 1624 he had declared war against Spain and the emperor It was not without great reluctance that he consented to this step, nor would any considerations of national honour or interest have persuaded him to it, had not his son Charles, and the favourite Buckingham, supported it The military expedition, however, to Holland proved a miserable failure The French court stood aloof from the struggle, and the Dutch received their English allies with coldness and inhumanity Chagrined at the turn which affairs had taken, distracted by the cabals of his courtiers, and irritated by what appeared to him the arrogance of his parliament and the disloyalty of his people, James's health, already shaken by the intemperate use of strong and sweet wines, and repeated attacks of gout, began to give way Early in the spring of 1625, he was seized with tertian ague, and died on the 27th of March that year, in the 59th year of his age. His reign was distinguished by the establishment of new colonies, the introduction of manufactures, and the improvement of Ireland.

II.

James, who shuddered at the sight of a drawn sword, was very expert with his pen, and he prided himself much on his literary abilities Though dogmatical and pedantic, his learning was extensive, and he had strong powers of mind when divested of prejudice He attempted poetry with considerable success. So fond was he of polemics, that he founded Chelsea college expressly for controversial theology His grandson, Charles II, however, converted it into an asylum for disabled soldiers For the encouragement of learning, James also founded, in April 1582, the university of Edinburgh, and he conferred a lasting benefit on all who speak the English language, by the authorised version of the Holy Scriptures, still in use, which was begun under his instructions, in 1604, and completed and published in 1611

JAMESONE, GEORGE, an eminent artist, justly termed the Vandyke of Scotland, and the first native Scots painter on record, was born at Aberdeen in 1586 He was the son of Andrew Jamesone, an architect or builder in that city, and Marjory, daughter of David Anderson, one of the magistrates He studied at Antwerp, under Rubens, with Vandyke, and on his return to Scotland in 1628 he applied himself to painting portraits in oil, occasionally practising also in history and landscape. When Charles I visited Scotland in 1633, the magistrates of Edinburgh employed Jamesone to make drawings of the Scottish monarchs. With these the king was so highly pleased, that he sat to him for a full-length picture, and rewarded him with a diamond ring from his finger It is said that on account of a weakness in his eyes, his majesty allowed him the privilege of remaining covered in his presence, a circumstance which may account for his being represented with his hat on in all his portraits of himself Jamesone died at his residence in Edinburgh, in 1644, aged 58, and was buried in the Greyfriars churchyard of that city An engraving of his portrait, with a miniature of his wife in his hand, from a picture by himself, is inserted in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, of which a woodcut is subjoined

Portraits, painted by him, are preserved in different gentlemen's houses in the north of Scotland, as well as in Marischal and King's colleges, and the hall of the latter is adorned by one of his pictures called the Sibyls, supposed to be portraits of ten of the chief beauties of Aberdeen The largest collection of Jamesone's works is at Taymouth castle, Perthshire, the seat of the marquis of Breadalbane, his lordship's ancestors having been one of his chief patrons A curious genealogical tree of the house of Glenorchy, painted by Jamesone in 1635, is described by Pennant in his Tour. Some account of his works is contained in the valuable 'Anecdotes of Painting in England.' This distinguished artist married, March 12, 1624, Isabel Tosh, by whom he had a large family, but three daughters only survived him Of these, Mary, who was thrice married, and had for her second husband James Gregory, the mathematician, excelled in skilful sewing, and executed an extensive piece of tapestry, which was hung from the gallery of the West church in Aberdeen Alexander, one of his scholars, married another daughter, and Cosmo Alexander his son, engraved a portrait of his grandfather in 1728

JAMESON, ROBERT, a distinguished naturalist, styled the father of modern natural history, third son of Thomas Jameson, merchant and soap-manufacturer, Leith, was born in that town on the 11th July, 1774 He early showed a strong desire of becoming acquainted with the history of natural objects, and whilst a boy at the grammar school of his native town, he commenced stuffing birds, and collecting animals and plants, on the beach of Leith and its neighbourhood In 1788 he entered the humanity class, in the university of Edinburgh, and as a student, he walked in the procession at the laying of the foundation stone of the New college buildings, in one of the class-rooms of which he was destined to be a distinguished lecturer At first, from his great desire to see the world, he was anxious to be a sailor, but his father objecting, by the advice of his friends, he adopted, instead, the study of medicine, and was appointed assistant to John Cheyne, Esq, surgeon, Leith In 1792 he attended one course of the lectures of Dr Walker, then professor of natural history in the college of Edinburgh, and another in 1793 He soon became a favourite pupil, and shortly afterwards was appointed keeper of the museum He also studied botany with great success In 1793 he visited London, and was introduced to the principal scientific gentlemen of the metropolis, particularly, Sir Joseph Banks, Dr Shaw, and other leading members of the Linnæan Society

On his return to Leith, he seems to have resigned his surgical appointment, and applied all the time he could spare to practical anatomy, under the celebrated lecturer John Bell, with whom he dissected for a long period, to enlarge his views of comparative anatomy Whilst attending the chemical class, his assiduity attracted the attention of Dr Rotheram, Dr. Black's assistant, and afterwards professor of physics in the university of St Andrews He now added to his chemical knowledge, mineralogical information generally, and his first essays as a mineralogist were contributed to the 13th volume of the 'Bee,' edited by Dr Anderson To the Natural History Society, which appears to have been instituted in 1790, but whose proceedings were not published, he read twelve papers on various scientific subjects In 1794 he visited the Shetland Islands, where he spent three months, exploring their geology, mineralogy, zoology, and botany In 1797 he also, with a similar purpose, visited the island of Arran, at that time unknown to geologists, and in the following year he published his 'Mineralogy of the Island of Arran and the Shetland Isles,' which at once took a high place among scientific publications, for the remarkable phenomena described in it

In 1798, in company with his intimate friend, Mr, afterwards Sir Charles Bell, the celebrated anatomist and physiologist, he spent the summer months in examining the geology of the Hebrides and the Western Islands The following year, he visited and investigated the Orkney islands, and again explored the isle of Arran The result of his researches was published in 1800, in his 'Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles,' in 2 vols quarto, illustrated with maps and plates, a work which contained the first sketch of the geology of the Hebrides and Orkneys The same year, he left Scotland for Freyberg in Germany, where he remained nearly two years, studying mineralogy and geology under the learned and famous Werner He worked in the mines there under the rules laid down by his master, and underwent the same drudgery and the same kind of work as the common miner, by which means he acquired much valuable information Mr Jameson fully acknowledged that it was from Werner that we first derived clear and distinct views of the structure and classification of rocks Some of his fellow-students under Werner gained a high European reputation, particularly Frederick Mohs, the celebrated mineralogist, T F D'Aubisson de Voisins, distinguished for his works on the mines of Freyberg, and the Basalts of Saxony; and Professor Steffens, one of the most elegant of scientific writers

In 1804, Mr Jameson returned to Scotland, and on the death of Dr. Walker the same year, he was appointed regius professor of natural history in the university of Edinburgh. He held that chair, with great celebrity to the university, for the long period of fifty years In 1808, he founded at Edinburgh, the Wernerian Natural History Society, and was elected its president for life The following year he published, in one volume octavo, the 'Elements of Geognosy,' the professed object of which was to make known Werner's views respecting the composition and structure of the globe. The result was a division of the northern geologists of Great Britain into the supporters of the Wernerian and the Huttonian doctrines, and the fierce controversy that ensued was ultimately useful, by exciting attention, and diffusing a taste for geology

In 1819, Mr Jameson commenced the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, and for the first six years he conducted it with Sir David Brewster, but, after that period, he was the sole editor The earlier volumes contain not a few contributions from his pen He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, and a member of the French academy, and of many other scientific bodies both at home and abroad His name was long associated with the museum of the Edinburgh university, of which, from the labour, zeal, and anxiety he displayed in its collection and arrangement, he may almost be considered as the founder, and a marble bust of him, by Steell, stands in the centre of the upper hall. On his appointment to the chair of natural history in 1804, he found the museum very inconsiderable He placed his own collection of natural history in it, and continued collecting from that period till 1819 There was no regular allowance for the maintenance and increase of the museum, he himself had no salary as keeper, and the only resources he had to look to, for keeping it up, were occasional assistance from the town council and his own private funds. In 1812, he applied to the barons of exchequer for a grant of money for its support, and succeeded in obtaining £100 per annum, for expenses incurred in its preservation, and for the purchase of specimens. In 1820 the museum was for the first time opened to the public, on payment of half-a-crown for each visitor. In July 1834, the admission fee was reduced to one shilling, and on another application to the crown, the grant of £100 per annum was raised to £200 In the meantime various collections had been purchased and added to the museum. In 1852 it had increased so much that the magistrates, and Professor Jameson, as keeper, forwarded memorials to the lords of the treasury, for converting the museum into a national museum for Scotland, and their request was granted.

During the last two years of his life, he suffered much from repeated attacks of bronchitis, and in the session of 1852-3, he attempted to lecture, but was compelled to forego this and all active duties. He died at Edinburgh, 19th April 1854, in his 80th year, and such was the estimation in which he was held that he received a public funeral During the long period of his professorship he had the honour of sending forth from his class-room many pupils who subsequently acquired a high name in the world, and not a few of them came to fill distinguished places in the seminaries and scientific institutions of Europe This sketch has been drawn up from a biographical memoir of him by his nephew, Laurence Jameson, Esq, inserted in the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal for July 1854

Professor Jameson's works are

Essays on Gems, contributed to Dr Anderson's Bee, vol 1s.

Mineralogy of the Island of Arran and the Shetland Islands, with Dissertations on Peat and Kelp. Edin 1794 8vo.

Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles, 2 vols. 4to, illustrated with maps and plates, the drawings for the latter having been furnished by the professor's travelling companion, Sir Charles Bell. Edin 1800.

Mineralogical Description of Scotland Vol. i. Part i. 8vo, with map and plates. Edin. 1804 This volume contained an account of the geology of the county of Dumfries. His other labours prevented him from publishing systematic geological accounts, on the same plan, of the other counties of Scotland.

System of Mineralogy Edin. 1804—1808, 3 vols. 8vo, with plates. 2d edit. 1816, 3d edit. 1820. In the first edition of this work, which, for the time, was the most complete of its kind, the Wernerian theory is supported in its totality, but in the 3d edition, published in 1820, a number of important modifications were introduced.

Elements of Geognosy Edin. 1809, 8vo.

Manual of Minerals and Mountain Rocks. Edin 1831; considered the best text-book of its time.

To the Encyclopædia Britannica, seventh edition, Mr Jameson contributed the articles Mineralogy, Geology, and Organic Remains; and to the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, various scientific articles bearing the signature (E).

For a translation of the baron Leopold von Buch's Travels through Norway and Lapland during 1806, and two succeeding years, published at Edinburgh in one vol. 4to, in 1813, and advised by Mr Jameson, he wrote an account of its author, and various notes illustrative of the natural history of Norway

He also contributed the notes to the translation by Mr Kerr of Cuvier's celebrated Discourse on the Theory of the Earth, published the same year The notes were accompanied by an account of Cuvier's Geological Discoveries. Mr Kerr's translation was only 190 pages, but in the 5th edition Mr Jameson, completely remodelling the whole work, extended it to 550 pages.

To accompany Captain Parry's narrative of his polar expedition, he drew up from the specimens brought home by that enterprising navigator, a sketch of the geology of the different coasts discovered and touched upon by him, which was published, with the botanical observations of Brown and Hooker 1824. 4to. He also prepared, for the Cabinet Library, an account of the Geology of the Arctic Regions visited by Captain Parry, and to the Edinburgh Cabinet Library he furnished articles on the Physical Geography of Africa and India.

He edited an edition of Wilson's American Ornithology, in 4 vols.; the whole being revised and arranged in a scientific manner, and rendered suitable for a text-book.

Various contributions to Murray's Encyclopedia of Geography Edin 2 vols. 8vo, 1834

Mineralogy according to the Natural History Method. Edinburgh, 1837, post 8vo.

Among his contributions to periodical publications were three to Nicholson's Journal, in 1802, nine to Thomson's Annals of Philosophy; thirteen to the Wernerian Transactions; and twenty-three to the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal. Of the latter work he became sole editor after the publication of the tenth volume of the old series, which extended to fourteen volumes. The new series, at the time of his death, had reached the forty-fifth volume. Professor Jameson thus edited forty-nine volumes of that popular scientific Journal.

JAMIESON, JOHN, D D, an eminent antiquarian and philologist, and compiler of the 'Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language,' was born in Glasgow, March 5th, 1759 His father, the Rev John Jamieson, was minister of the Associate congregation of Duke Street in that city, and by his mother's side he was descended from the Bruces of Kennet, Clackmannanshire He received the elementary part of his education in the grammar school, and, in his ninth year, commenced his studies in the university, of Glasgow Having passed through the ordinary curriculum, he studied theology under Professor Moncrieff of Alloa, and at the age of twenty was licensed to preach the gospel. In August 1780, he received two calls, one from the Antiburgher congregation of Perth, and the other from Forfar. The synod decided in favour of the latter, and he was accordingly ordained in Forfar, with a stipend of £50 a-year Here he officiated for a period of sixteen years In 1788, the college of New Jersey in America conferred upon him the degree of doctor in divinity, and the bestowal of the title, says Mr M'Kerrow, deserves to be specially noticed as the first instance of such an honour being conferred on any minister belonging to the Secession church

In 1793, on the death of Mr Adam Gib, of the Antiburgher congregation, Nicholson Street, Edinburgh, Dr Jamieson received a call to be his successor, but on account of the strong opposition made by his people in Forfar, to his translation, the synod refused to sanction it On a subsequent vacancy, however, in 1797, in the same church, and a second call being sent to Dr Jamieson, the synod acquiesced in his removal, and he was accordingly translated to Edinburgh, where he spent the remainder of his life

Possessing a strong predilection for antiquarian research, he had become a corresponding member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland so early as 1788, and was admitted an ordinary member in 1815, when he was appointed joint-secretary, an office which he held till 1820 During his residence in Forfarshire he contributed to their 'Transactions' several interesting papers illustrative of the antiquities of that county His first separate publications, however, were of a ministerial and literary nature, having in 1789 published two volumes of 'Sermons on the Heart,' and also a poem in blank verse, descriptive of the horrors of the slave-trade, long since through the exertions of Samuel Wilberforce and other enlightened philanthropists, happily abolished, entitled 'The Sorrows of Slavery' To Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border he contributed 'The Water Kelpie, or Spirit of the Waters,' a poem descriptive of the superstitions prevalent in Forfarshire. His great work, 'The Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language,' appeared in 1809-10, in two volumes 4to Though not at first with a view to publication, the author, as he mentions in his preface, had begun his researches into the Scottish language, thirty years previously. In the valuable dissertation prefixed, he claims for it the dignity of a separate language, and not merely a dialect of the English, on the ground that it is not more allied to the latter, "than the Belgic is to the German, the Danish to the Swedish, or the Portuguese to the Spanish." Two supplemental volumes were added in 1825; and an abridgment was published in 1814.

In 1827 Dr Jamieson was elected a member of the Bannatyne Club, founded by Sir Walter Scott Besides being a fellow of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, he was also a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of the American Antiquarian Society, of the Society of Northern Literature of Copenhagen, and an associate of the first class of Royal Associates of the Royal Society of Literature of London, the latter society having been instituted by George IV, for the express purpose of encouraging literary men As a reward for his historical, antiquarian, and philological researches, he received a pension of one hundred pounds a-year For one of the anniversary meetings of the Society of Antiquaries, at the request of several fellow-members, he wrote an appropriate song, which was sung on the occasion by one of the members, to the air of Auld Langsyne

When the union between the Burgher and Antiburgher synods took place, on 8th September 1820, Dr Jamieson was elected moderator of the Antiburgher synod, to which he belonged, (Mr, afterwards Dr, Balmer of Berwick being the moderator of the Burgher synod,) that he might act as their representative in the proceedings of an occasion so important to the Secession church. In 1830, his age and increasing infirmities induced him to resign the charge of his congregation He died at Edinburgh July 12, 1838, in his 80th year By his wife, Charlotte, daughter of Robert Watson, Esq of Shielhill, Forfarshire, and Easter Rhind, Perthshire, whom he married in August, 1781, and who predeceased him in 1837, he had seventeen children, but only two daughters and one son survived him A portrait of Dr Jamieson is subjoined

One of his sons, Robert, was an eminent member of the Scottish bar, and his premature death, in January 1835, alone prevented him from being elevated to the bench He uniformly spelt his name Jameson, which was different from that of his father Being admitted a member of the Bannatyne Club in 1830, he presented that society with a beautiful reprint, in 4to of Simeon Graham's 'Anatomie of Humours,' and the 'Passionate Sparke of a Relenting Minde,' by the same author, with a brief prefatory notice As a mark of respect for his great abilities and many good qualities, the faculty of advocates erected over his grave, in the West church burying-ground, Edinburgh, an elegant monument to his memory. Another son, Alexander, a bookseller in Edinburgh, was the reputed author of a little work, well known in his day, entitled 'A Trip to London in a Berwick Smack'

Dr Jamieson's works are

The Water Kelpie, or Spirit of the Waters, in the third volume of Scott's Minstrelsy of the Border; also the Glossary of Scottish words at the end.

Dr Jamieson was also the writer of an article in the Westminster Review, On the Origin of the Scottish Nation, which attracted considerable notice at the time.

JARDINE, the surname of a family in Dumfries shire, styled of Applegarth, who possesses a baronetcy, and whose head was the chief of a border clan, once very numerous in that county

The first of the family on record was Winfredus de Jardine, who flourished before 1158 In the reign of David I he was a witness to different charters, in the chartularies of Kelso and Abertrothwick The name also occurs in Prynne's Collection of the barons of Scotland who attended King Edward I at Berwick, in the competition for the crown of Scotland between the Bruce and Baliol. The descendant of Winfredus, in the end of the 15th century, was John Jardine of Applegarth, who had a son, Sir Alexander Jardine, knight, who succeeded him. An old historian narrates that in 1506, "the laird of Drumweiche was this zeir killed at Edinburgh by the Jardans, quho escaped by taking sanctuary at the abbey of Holyrudhousse." Sir Alexander was actively engaged in defending the borders against the inroads of the English The same historian says "This zeire, 1524, the Lord Maxwell and Sir Alexander Jardane neir Carlell, in a grate conflickte with the Englishe, of quhom they kill nine hundred, and take three hundred prisoners." His son, John Jardine, succeeded previously to 1544 About 1547, Lord Wharton, with 5,000 men, ravaged and overran Annandale, Nithsdale, and Galloway, and compelled the inhabitants to submit to England, the laird of Applegarth, with two hundred and forty-two of his followers, being among the number On the arrival, however, of the French auxiliaries in Scotland, a dreadful retaliation on the English was made by the Scots borderers. When the unfortunate Mary returned to Scotland in 1561, the Jardines, the Johnstons, and the clans of Annandale, entered into bonds of confederacy to support her, but in 1567, after the murder of Darnley, John Jardine seems to have subscribed the bond entered into by many of the nobles and barons of Scotland, for establishing the authority of the infant king and in the ensuing protracted troubles, he adhered to the opponents of Mary On the 10th August 1571, he was surrounded and taken prisoner, in one of the border-fights of the period

His son, Sir Alexander, is supposed to have succeeded about the end of 1571 or the beginning of 1572 By an entry in the register of deeds passing through the privy seal, we learn that a warrant was granted for a pension of 500 merks to him from the revenues of the archbishopric of Glasgow, for his services in support of the royal authority As he never received that pension, owing to a new archbishop being appointed to the see, the like sum was granted to John Jardine, his second son, to be drawn from the revenues of the church and monastery of Aberbrothwick, 24th January, 1577

The fourth in descent from Sir Alexander also named Alexander, married Lady Margaret Douglas sister of the first duke of Queensberry, and had two sons and a daughter of Nova Scotia, by patent, to him and his heirs male, dated 28th May 1672. He died without issue, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir John, second baronet, who died in 1737.

Sir John's eldest son, Sir Alexander Jardine, third baronet, embraced the Roman Catholic faith, and, going abroad, entered on a military life. He was elected one of the knights of Malta, and as the vows of that order enjoin perpetual celibacy, he died without issue, at Brussels, in December 1790. His brother, Sir William, fourth baronet, married Barbara de la Motte, a French lady, and died 17th March, 1807

His only son, Sir Alexander, 5th baronet, married Jane, daughter of Lieut. Thomas Maule, heir male and representative of the earls of Panmure. He had 4 sons and a daughter

The eldest son, Sir William Jardine, 6th baronet, born Feb. 23, 1800, married in 1820, Jane Home, daughter of D. Lizars, Esq, Edinburgh, issue, 3 sons, viz., Alexander, born in 1829; William, R. N., born in 1834; Charles-John, born in 1839, and 4 drs. Sir William has distinguished himself as the author and editor of several works in natural history

A cadet of the ancient house of Applegarth was the Rev John Jardine, D D, an eminent divine, (born 3d January, 1716,) who was one of the literary circle which shed a lustre on the Scottish capital in the middle of the 18th century His name appears at the head of the list of the well-known "Select Society" in 1759, the other members being Adam Smith, Alexander Wedderburn, afterwards Lord-chancellor Rosslyn, Allan Ramsay, the painter, James Burnet, afterwards Lord Monboddo, David Hume, the historian, Principal Robertson, Lord Hailes, John Home, the author of Douglas, Lord-president Dundas, Sir Ilay Campbell, Lord Kames, Lord Gardenstone, Dr Blair, Andrew Stewart, the two Adams, the architects, William Tytler of Woodhouselee, John Clerk of Eldin, author of 'Naval Tactics,' Professor Adam Fergusson, Dr Alexander Monro, Dr Carlyle of Inveresk, &c. In association with some of these Dr Jardine projected the first Edinburgh Review, a critical journal, the first number of which was published in July 1755, and the second and last in January 1756. Among its contributors were Adam Smith, Principal Robertson, Dr Blair, and Lord-chancellor Wedderburn Dr Jardine wrote the reviews of theological books, and to the spirit of his articles, chiefly, has been attributed the popular outcry against the Review, which proved fatal to it. Dr Jardine was one of the ministers of the Tron church, Edinburgh, dean of the Order of the Thistle, and one of the king's chaplains for Scotland. He died at the age of 51, on 30th May 1766 By his wife, Jane, eldest daughter of George Drummond, lord provost of Edinburgh, (see DRUMMOND, GEORGE,) he had a son, Henry, and a daughter, Janet, who, in 1782, became the wife of her kinsman, George Drummond Home of Blair Drummond in Perthshire.

The son, Henry, afterwards Sir Henry Jardine, born in Edinburgh, 30th January 1766, became a member of the society of writers to the signet on 18th June 1790, and three years afterwards, through the patronage of Henry Dundas, first Viscount Melville, he was appointed solicitor for taxes in Scotland In February 1802, he was by a commission, under the great seal, nominated deputy king's remembrancer in Exchequer; and in July 1820, was appointed king's remembrancer in Exchequer for Scotland. In 1837 he retired with a yearly pension of £1,400. He was knighted by King George IV on 20th April 1825 He was a member of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and of most of the literary, scientific, and charitable institutions of his native city The Society of Antiquaries, in particular, profited largely by the interest which he took in its affairs for many years. He was one of the contributors to the Bannatyne Club, of the characteristic 'Diary of James Melville, Minister of Kilrenny.' Sir Henry died 11th August, 1851. He had married in 1794, Catherine, daughter of the late George Skene of Rubislaw, Aberdeenshire, and had four sons and six daughters, but only three daughters survived him.

JARDINE, GEORGE, M.A, formerly professor of logic in the university of Glasgow, was born in 1742, at Wandal, Lanarkshire, which originally belonged to his ancestors. He received the rudiments of his education at the parish school, and in October 1760 was entered a student at Glasgow college After attending the divinity hall, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the presbytery of Linlithgow In 1771 he accompanied the two sons of Baron Mure of Caldwell to France, as their tutor, and during his residence in Paris he became acquainted with the principal literary men of that capital. On his return to Scotland in 1773 he became a candidate for the humanity professorship in Glasgow college, then vacant by the death of Mr Muirhead, but lost the election by one vote. In the following year, however, he was appointed assistant and successor to Mr. Clow, professor of logic in the same university, and on that gentleman's final resignation in 1787, he was admitted to the full privileges of the chair.

Shortly after entering on the duties of the professorship, Mr Jardine introduced several important improvements into the mode of teaching, which proved of material advantage to the students, and rendered his class a model of academical instruction The details of his system he fully explained in an excellent work, which he published in 1818, entitled 'Outlines of Philosophical Education' Besides this work he wrote an Account of John Roebuck, M D, inserted in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1796 He continued with great success and distinction to teach the logic class for the long period of fifty years, and on his resignation in 1824, as a peculiar mark of respect, he received a public dinner from upwards of 200 of his former pupils. He died January 27, 1827. He had married in 1776 Miss Lindsay of Glasgow, by whom he had one son, John Jardine, Esq, advocate, at one period sheriff of Ross and Cromarty.

JEFFREY, FRANCIS, the greatest of British critics, as he is styled by his biographer, Lord Cockburn, and eminent also as an orator and judge, was born in 7 Charles Street, George Square, Edinburgh, on 23d October 1773 He was the elder of two sons of George Jeffrey, a depute-clerk in the court of session, by his wife, Henrietta, daughter of John Louden, a farmer near Lanark, who had been educated for the church Besides his brother, John, a merchant at Boston in America, his parents had also three daughters. In October 1781, he was sent to the High school of his native city, where he continued for six years. At this period he is described as "a little, clever, anxious boy, always near the top of the class, and who never lost a place without shedding tears"

In the beginning of the winter of 1787, when in his fourteenth year, he was sent to the university of Glasgow His biographer thinks that Glasgow was preferred, with a view to the Oxford exhibitions or bursaries on the Snell foundation, which that university possesses, none of the other Scotch colleges having such rich academic prizes, but if his father had any such intention, it was soon abandoned He remained at Glasgow for two sessions, going home during the intervening summers Though remarkable for his quickness of apprehension, "he was," says Lord Cockburn, "not only a diligent, but a very systematic student, and, in particular, he got very early into the invaluable habit of accompanying all his pursuits by collateral composition, never for the sake of display, but solely for his own culture And it is now interesting to observe how very soon he fell into that line of criticism which afterwards was the business of his life Nearly the whole of his early original prose writings are of a critical character; and this inclination towards analysis and appreciation was so strong, that almost every one of his compositions closes by a criticism on himself" At this time he is said to have been subject to what he deemed superstitious fears, to cure himself of which he used to walk alone at midnight round the High church or Cathedral burying-ground

On leaving Glasgow, in May 1789, he returned to Edinburgh, where he remained till September 1791, when he went to Oxford. Before this period his father appears to have removed his residence to the Lawnmarket of his native city. In the Edinburgh college, he attended a course of Scotch law, in the session of 1789–90, and of civil law in that of 1790-91 Towards the end of September of the latter year he went to Oxford, and entered Queen's college, but did not remain there longer than the following July During his residence there he failed to obtain, what was his great ambition, a pure English accent He succeeded, indeed, in abandoning his vernacular Scotch, without acquiring an English voice in its place

During the winter session of 1792-3 he again attended the Scots law lectures of Professor Hume, and those on the civil law, and on history On the 11th December 1792 he became a member of the Speculative Society, the most famous of the literary associations, or debating clubs, connected with the university of Edinburgh Among its members during the period that he attended its meetings were Walter Scott, with whom he first became acquainted there, Henry Brougham, Francis Horner, David Boyle, afterwards lord-justice-general, Lord Henry Petty, afterwards marquis of Lansdowne, John Archibald Murray and James Moncrieff, both afterwards lords of session, and others who, in after-life, distinguished themselves in literature, philosophy, science, law, or politics In this society he read five papers on Nobility, on the effects derived to Europe from the discovery of America, on the authenticity of Ossian's Poems, on Metrical Harmony, and on the character of commercial nations In the discussions of the Society, his speeches were almost as much marked by brilliancy of imagination, and felicity of expression, as even the more mature orations of his middle age In the quick detection of fallacy, and readiness of debate, he had scarcely a competitor, whilst in conversational qualities he even excelled, more than in the formal delivery of well-arranged arguments or set harangues At one period he seems to have been ambitious of poetical renown, and in his college days wrote a great deal of rhyme, besides a completed poem on 'Dreaming,' in blank verse, about 1,800 lines long, composed between May 4 and June 25, 1791 He also wrote two plays, one a tragedy. His closing remarks on all his youthful writings, prose as well as poetry, are seldom complimentary to himself; but it was thus, by the application of the severest rules of criticism to his own compositions, and to all the works which he read, that he was trained for his after post of editor of the most critical literary journal in Europe. None of his poetical attempts, which from the opinion passed upon them by his biographer, do not seem to have risen above mediocrity, were ever published.

Mr Jeffrey was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, on the 16th December 1794 In Scotland at that period, political differences were carried to extreme. Reformers and whigs were marked men in society, and their opinions presented an obstacle to progress in life in all professions, but especially that of the bar, which was not easily overcome. Notwithstanding this, and that his father was a high tory of the old intolerant school, Mr. Jeffrey attached himself to the liberal party, and his adoption of the persecuted creed, under the circumstances of the time, evinced strength of mind, self-reliance, and great independence of spirit At the commencement of his professional career, and for some years after, his success as an advocate was not very promising His political opinions and an unpleasing manner were against him "People," says Lord Cockburn, "did not like his English, nor his style of smart sarcastic disputation, nor his loquacity, nor what they supposed to be an air of affectation These peculiarities gradually faded, and people got accustomed to them, but they operated against him throughout several of his early years" At this period he employed his leisure in translating old Greek poetry, and copying the style of all our different poets He seems to have had an intention of publishing a classical translation, but soon abandoned it. On a visit to London in September 1798, he had some thoughts of settling there, and endeavouring to support himself by literature, but he met with little encouragement. He, also, had an idea of trying his fortune in India On his return to Edinburgh, he, for a short time, studied medicine, as well as chemistry, of both of which he had a general acquaintance, which was afterwards very useful to him in his professional career. He was a member of a sort of scientific or philosophical society, formed of the rising young men then in Edinburgh, called 'The Academy of Physicks,' an account of which is given in Welsh's Life of Brown

During part of the winter session of 1800-1 he attended the second course of lectures delivered by Dugald Stewart on Political Economy, of which he left five small volumes of notes. The year 1802 was rendered remarkable by the appearance of the Edinburgh Review, which originated with Jeffrey, Brougham, Horner, Brown, Sidney Smith, an English clergyman, then residing in Edinburgh, as tutor to Lord Webb Seymour, brother of the duke of Somerset, and a few others their associates The merit of having first suggested the work is due to Mr Smith, who conducted it during the first year of its existence The first number appeared on the 10th October 1802, and from its liberal tone, its independent spirit, and the great and unexpected talent displayed in its pages, it created an unexampled sensation throughout the kingdom Jeffrey contributed five articles, one of which, upon Mourier on the influence of the French Revolution, began the number On Mr Smith's return to England in 1803, Mr Jeffrey became the editor, and during more than a quarter of a century that he conducted it, he acquired a literary reputation unique of its kind, besides exercising an extraordinary influence on contemporaneous literature, and on public opinion, that was productive of results never dreamed of at the beginning of the century He came, in fact, to be acknowledged as the great master of criticism of his time, and the arbiter of the destinies of all the young authors of the day. To the pages of the Review he was always a large contributor, and among the articles furnished by him are profound and original disquisitions on many of the most difficult subjects, including metaphysics, poetry, politics, biography, morals, travels, political economy, physical science, and history His writings are remarkable for their variety, acute analysis, and sparkling style Under his auspices the Edinburgh Review was the principal means of a revolution which, in a few years, extended to every department of intellect. To counteract its great influence, both in literature and politics, the Quarterly Review was, in 1809, organised by Sir Walter Scott, who, though a keen Tory, had occasionally contributed to the pages of the Review, excusing himself by saying that he did so from his personal liking for its editor, with whom he continued friends till his death.

In the 16th number of the Review a criticism appeared by Jeffrey, on the 'Epistles, Odes, and other Poems' of Thomas Moore, containing a severe condemnation of these productions, on the ground of their immorality This Moore chose to view in a personal light, and on Jeffrey visiting London, soon after, in the summer of 1806, he sent him a challenge The parties met at Chalk Farm on the 11th August of that year, when Horner acted as Jeffrey's second, but the interference of the police prevented the duel from taking place They were bound over to keep the peace in this country, and contemplated proceeding to Hamburg, to settle the matter hostilely there But happily this was prevented by Jeffrey declaring that he had meant his imputations to be literary and not personal, on which Moore withdrew his challenge, and they were ever after good friends In 1819, when Moore was in some temporary pecuniary difficulties, Jeffrey wrote to Mr Samuel Rogers, offering, in the most delicate way, to assist him with what money he had, and in 1825, Moore spent some time on a visit to him at Craigcrook The affair of the duel is referred to in Byron's 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' with a sneer at "Little's leadless pistol," which, however, had the bullet in it, although that in Jeffrey's had dropped out, on being seized by the police In the 22d number, published in January 1808, appeared the celebrated criticism of Lord Byron's 'Hours of Idleness,' which drove his lordship to retaliate by the publication, in March 1809, of his famous satire, 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers' That criticism is supposed to have been written by Lord Brougham, although Byron, believing Jeffrey to have been the author, assailed him with all the bitterness of his wrath Byron had the nobleness, afterwards, to do justice to Jeffrey, both as a man and a critic, saying in a well-known passage in Don Juan, (canto 10, stanza 16)

"I do not know you, and may never know
Your face—but you have acted, on the whole,
Most nobly, and I own it from my soul."

His professional employment kept pace with his literary celebrity, and at this time his practice was steadily increasing at the bar.

Mr. Jeffrey had married, on 1st November 1801, Catherine, one of the daughters of the Rev. Dr Wilson, professor of church history at St. Andrews, a second cousin of his own He had a son, born in September 1802, who only lived a few weeks. Mrs Jeffrey died on 8th August, 1805 In 1810 he became acquainted with a young American lady, then on a visit to Edinburgh, who afterwards became his second wife, Miss Charlotte Wilkes, daughter of Charles Wilkes, Esq , banker in New York, and grand-niece of the famous demagogue, John Wilkes In August 1813 he sailed for New York, and his marriage with that lady took place in the following November He continued in America till the 22d January 1814, visiting a few of the principal cities of the union War then subsisted betwixt this country and the States, and in two curious interviews which he had, one with Mr Munroe the secretary, and the other with Mr Maddison, the president, he ably defended the right claimed by Britain to search American vessels for the recovery of British subjects To the former gentleman he had gone to obtain a cartel for his return to Britain, and the same day (18th November, 1813) he had the honour of dining with the president

In the spring of 1815, he first went to reside, for the autumn months, at the villa of Craigcrook, on the eastern slope of Corstorphine hill, about three miles from Edinburgh, which henceforth became his country seat, his town house being for a long time in George Street, and afterwards in Moray Place of that city In the autumn of the same year (1815) he visited the continent for the first time, and spent nearly a fortnight in Paris On the introduction of juries for the trial of facts in civil causes into Scotland, on 22d January 1816, his practice increased to an enormous amount Lord Cockburn says "He instantly took up one side of almost every trial in what was then called the Jury Court, as if it had been a sort of right, and held this position as long as he was at the bar;" Cockburn, himself, being frequently the opposing counsel In 1816, he wrote the article 'Beauty' for the Encyclopedia Britannica. "Of all the treatises," says his biographer, "that have been published on the theory of taste, it is the most complete in its philosophy, and the most delightful in its writing; and it is as sound as the subject admits of"

In November 1820, Mr Jeffrey was elected lord rector of the university of Glasgow This officer is chosen annually by the professors and the matriculated students For many years the latter had left the election pretty much in the hands of the professors; but they now actively interfered, and their first choice fell upon Jeffrey He was re-elected in the following year, and on retiring in November, 1822, he founded a prize, being a gold medal, to be given, by the votes of his class-fellows, to the most distinguished student in the Greek class In all the political meetings of the period held at Edinburgh he took an active part, speaking at every one of them At a public dinner given to Joseph Hume on 18th November 1825, he made a speech on the combination laws, showing the dangers and follies of unions and strikes by workmen, which was published as a pamphlet, and in two or three days above 8,000 copies were sold The last public meeting that he ever attended, besides those connected with his elections, was the great meeting in the Assembly Rooms, Edinburgh, on 14th March, 1829, to petition parliament in favour of the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, which was effected the same year On this occasion the two most impressive speeches were made by Jeffrey and Dr Chalmers

Soon after, he was unanimously chosen dean of the faculty of advocates, an office then vacant, by the elevation of Lord Moncrieff to the bench On his election, he relinquished the editorship of the Edinburgh Review, feeling, as he himself has recorded, "that it was not quite fitting that the official head of a great law corporation should continue to be the conductor of what might fairly enough be represented as, in many respects, a party journal" The Review was then intrusted to Mr. Macvey Napier The 98th number, published in June 1829, was the last Mr. Jeffrey edited, and excepting three or four papers which he wrote long afterwards, the one on the Memoirs of Lady Fanshawe, published in October of the same year, was the last he ever furnished as a regular contributor In all, his contributions to that periodical amounted to 200 These were collected and published in 1843, in four volumes, 8vo His last article in the Review, was an able and elaborate paper on the claims of Watt and Cavendish to the discovery of the composition of water, published in January 1848 In this article he assigned the palm to Watt.

The four volumes which he published of his contributions to the Edinburgh Review do not contain all that he wrote for that periodical Some of the most original of his writings are not included in them, and in his preface he gives the following reason for omitting many of what had been considered his best articles. "I have honestly endeavoured," he says, "to select from the great mass,—not those articles which I might think most likely still to attract notice by boldness of view, severity of remark, or vivacity of expression,—but those, much rather, which, by enforcing what appeared to me just principles and useful opinions, I really thought had a tendency to make men happier and better" Indeed, he constantly upheld a high moral tone in the pages of the Review, his aim being, as he says himself, "to combine ethical precepts with literary criticism," and he ever earnestly sought "to impress his readers with a sense both of the close connexion between sound intellectual attainments and the higher elements of duty and enjoyment, and of the just and ultimate subordination of the former to the latter" It was this high aim, and the independence, fearlessness and originality of its tone that gave the writers in the Review the power to effect that improvement in periodical literature, and to exercise that beneficent influence on the progress of opinion, and the intellectual development of the age, which marked its career, and were among its greatest triumphs Jeffrey has been blamed for the severity of his criticisms on some of our greatest poets, and particularly those of the Lake school, and it must be confessed that the world has, in many instances, reversed the judgments so authoritatively pronounced by him

In the short notices he has introduced into the acknowledged edition of his Essays, he has thus recorded his feelings towards Southey and Wordsworth, the two principal poets of that school Of the former he says: "I have in my time said petulant and provoking things of Mr Southey, and such as I would not say now. But I am not conscious that I was ever unfair to his poetry, and if I have noted what I thought its faults in too arrogant and derisive a spirit, I think I have never failed to give hearty and cordial praise to its beauties, and generally dwelt much more largely on the latter than on the former" Of Wordsworth he speaks even more touchingly "I have," he says, "spoken in many places rather too bitterly and confidently of the faults of Mr Wordsworth's poetry, and forgetting that even on my own view of them they were but faults of taste or venial self-partiality, I have sometimes visited them, I fear, with an asperity which should be reserved for objects of moral reprobation If I were now to deal with the whole question of his poetical merits, though my judgment might not be substantially different, I hope I should repress the greater part of these vivacités of expression and, indeed, so strong has been my feeling in this way, that, considering how much I have always loved many of the attributes of his genius, and how entirely I respect his character, it did at first occur to me whether it was quite fitting that, in my old age and his, I should include in this publication any of those critiques which may have formerly given pain or offence to him or his admirers But when I reflected that the mischief, if there really was any, was long ago done, and that I still retain in substance the opinions which I should now like to have seen more gently expressed, I felt that to omit all notice of them on the present occasion, might be held to imply a retractation," &c. To Byron's poetry he did ample justice, although he strongly animadverted on what he conceived to be the immoral tendency of his writings, and on his part, the noble poet has, besides the lines already quoted, in various passages of his Diary, expressed his high opinion of his conduct and character

In December, 1830, the Whig party came into power, and Mr Jeffrey was appointed lord advocate. In January following he was returned to parliament for the Forfar district of burghs, by the vote of the Dundee delegate, but this burgh having been previously disfranchised, he was unseated, on petition, on the 17th March. On the 4th of that month he made his first speech in parliament, in favour of the English Reform Bill. This speech was published immediately afterwards, at the special request of government, and made a strong sensation at the time, though dealing only with the general question. On the 6th of April, he was elected for Earl Fitzwilliam's pocket burgh of Malton, in Yorkshire, but within a fortnight after, parliament was dissolved At the general election, May 3, 1831, he stood as a candidate for the city of Edinburgh, in opposition to Mr. R A Dundas of Arniston, afterwards Right Hon R C Nisbet Hamilton The choice was then in the hands of the town council, and in spite of the most strenuous exertions in his favour, on the part of the principal liberal inhabitants and public bodies, Mr Jeffrey was defeated by three votes, 17 having voted for Dundas and 14 for Jeffrey The result led to a serious riot in the city, when the military were called out, and order was with difficulty restored Towards the beginning of June he was again chosen for Malton On the 1st July he brought in the Scotch Reform Bill, throwing open the franchise to the ten-pound electors, which, after going through all the requisite stages, in both houses, was passed by the Lords on 12th July 1832, and soon after received the royal assent

Parliament having been dissolved in December 1832, he was, with the Hon Mr Abercromby, afterwards Lord Dunfermline, elected for his native city, by a large majority over the Tory candidate, both gentlemen being returned free of expense For a seat in parliament previously, it cost him between December 1830 and May 1832, Lord Cockburn informs us, about £10,000 On 12th March 1833, he moved the Scotch Burgh Reform Bill, which ultimately passed Notwithstanding his great eloquence, his style of oratory was not quite suited for the House of Commons, being too subtle and refined, and not personal or practical enough, for that assembly During his residence in London, he was much engaged in appeal cases before the House of Lords, and went a good deal into society.

In May 1834, he was nominated a lord of session, succeeding Lord Craigie on the bench, when he took his seat as Lord Jeffrey. Before leaving London, he received a farewell banquet from the Scotch members, as an acknowledgment of his official conduct. As a judge, he discharged his duties with attention, uprightness, and ability

In 1840, he wrote the appropriate and elegant inscription for the monument to Sir Walter Scott in Prince's Street, Edinburgh, being requested by the committee to furnish it. On 5th July 1841, he fainted in court, and in August he went to his son-in-law's at Haileybury, in Hertfordshire, where he was attacked severely by bronchitis, and did not resume his duties in the court of session till May 1842. He took a strong interest in the disputes in the Established church which led to the disruption in May 1843, and when he saw the great number of ministers, and the large body of its members, who then seceded and formed the Free church of Scotland, he declared that he was "proud of his country—in no other country could the same have been done"

Lord Jeffrey died at his town residence in Moray Place, Edinburgh, on the evening of Saturday, January 26th, 1850, in his 77th year He had appeared on the bench in his usual health on the Tuesday preceding, and though confined to the house for a few days by an attack of cold, no apprehension had been entertained of the fatal nature of the complaint The symptoms were those of bronchitis, with which he had been frequently troubled for several years, but on this occasion it was accompanied with fever He was buried in the Dean cemetery, Edinburgh, in a spot which had been selected by himself

By his second wife he had an only child, a daughter, married to the Rev Mr Empson, professor of civil law at the East India college of Haileybury, near Hertford, who succeeded Macvey Napier, as editor of the Edinburgh Review His lordship's widow survived her husband only to the following May, dying on the 18th of that month, at her son-in-law's, Haileybury

A portrait of this eminent critic and judge, from a painting by Mr. Colvin Smith, is subjoined:

Soon after his death a subscription was entered into for a marble statue of him, by Steell, which has been erected in the Outer House of the Court of Session A marble bust of him also stands in the Historical room of the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh His Life, by Lord Cockburn, with a selection from his Correspondence, was published at Edinburgh, in 1852, in 2 vols 8vo

JOHNSTON, or JOHNSTONE, the surname of a once powerful border family, who possessed the title of marquis of Annandale, dormant since 1792 (See vol. i. p. 140) They derived their name from the lands and barony of Johnstone, in the upper district of Annandale, Dumfries-shire. In ancient times the chief of the Johnstones held the office of steward of Annandale, and was often appointed warden of the west marches. In suppressing the predatory inroads of the moss-troopers who infested the borders, the Johnstones rendered themselves conspicuous, for which they assumed the device of the winged spur, with the motto of "Aye Ready," and in the 15th and 16th centuries, they waged constant warfare with the Douglases and the Maxwells.

Several persons of the name of Johnston are mentioned in the Ragman Roll, as among those barons who swore an unwilling fealty to Edward I of England in 1296. One of these, Gilbertus de Johnston, had a charter of several lands, in the reign of Robert the Bruce. Another, Sir John Johnston, made a conspicuous figure in border transactions, and is mentioned in the Fœdera Angliæ, in the time of Robert the Third.

There were two ancient families of this name who disputed for the chiefship; those of the north, designed of Caskieben or Hilton, Aberdeenshire, and those of the south, afterwards of Annandale in Dumfries-shire, the latter represented by the Johnstones of Westerhall in the same county (See Johnstone.)

The Johnstons of Hilton, who possess a baronetcy, have always been designated of Johnston. The first mentioned, in an old genealogical account of this house, in the possession of the family, is Sciven de Johnston, who lived in the reign of King David II., and is said to have been the eldest brother of the laird of Johnston in Annandale. Being a man addicted to learning, a quality rare in those days, on which account he was called clerk, he retired from the troubles in his own country or district to Aberdeenshire, where he was appointed principal secretary to the earl of Mar By his marriage with Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir Andrew Garioch, knight, of Caskieben in that county, he got the lands of Caskieben, Crimond, &c., also those of Kinburn and some others, which he called Johnston, from his own name, and from him are descended all the Johnstons of the north.

His son, John de Johnston of Caskieben, proprietor of the lands of Ballindalloch, married Margery, daughter of Leighton of Owsan, now Usan, in Forfarshire The son of the latter Gilbert de Johnston, designed, in his father's lifetime, Johnston of Ballindalloch, was twice married first, to Elizabeth Vass, daughter of the laird of Menie, by whom he had a son, Alexander, and three daughters; and, 2dly, to a daughter of Sir Alexander Forbes, second Lord Pitsligo, by whom he had a son, William Johnston of Ballindalloch

The elder son, Alexander, in the reign of King James II., got his lands of Caskieben, which till then had been held of the earl of Mar, erected into a free barony, to be called the barony of Johnston in all time coming Thence this family are designed Johnstons of that ilk He died in the reign of James III. Wilham, the eldest of his four sons, succeeded to the estate. He was killed at the fatal battle of Flodden His son, James Johnston of that ilk, died in 1548. He had three sons and four daughters.

William, the eldest son and apparent heir, joined the royal standard, and was slain at the battle of Pinkie, in 1547, his father being then alive. He had married Margaret, daughter of Hay of Dalgetty, of the noble family of Errol, by whom he had one son, George, and three daughters.

George Johnston of that ilk, the son, succeeded his grandfather the following year He married Christian, daughter of the seventh Lord Forbes, by whom he had six sons and seven daughters. He died in 1590 The fifth son was the celebrated Arthur Johnston, of whom a memoir is given afterwards in larger type.

The eldest son, John Johnston of that ilk, married, first, Janet, daughter of Turing of Foveran, by whom he had two sons, George and John, and two daughters, and, secondly, Catherine, daughter of Lundie of that ilk, in Fife, by whom he had, with one daughter, two sons, Thomas, in virtue of his mother's contract, laird of Craig, from whom the present baronet is lineally descended, and Gilbert.

The eldest son, Sir George Johnston, described as a man of abilities and merit, was, by King Charles I., created a baronet of Nova Scotia by royal patent, 31st March 1626. The date is given from the records of the great seal, which is the ordinary rule, being there set down as 'ultimo die Martii anno Domini millesimo sexcentesimo vigesimo sexto anno regni secundo." In the original patent, however, in possession of the family, the date stands thus (with one word, vigesimo or trigesimo, defaced at the beginning) "——primo die mensis Martii, anno Domini millesimo sexcentesimo vigesimo quinto, anno regni primo." In the book of the Privy Seal, the date is plainly 31st March, 1625, "anno regni primo." If the patent and privy seal are right, the holder of this baronetcy has the precedency of all the baronets now existing in Scotland, but he has hitherto ranked from the date in the records of the great seal. In 1630, Sir George was made sheriff of Aberdeen, on the removal of George, sixth earl of Huntly By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Forbes of Tolquhon, he had three sons and two daughters.

The eldest son, Sir George, second baronet, married a daughter of Sir William Leslie of Wardhouse.

His only son, Sir John Johnston, third baronet, entered early into the army, and served in King William's wars in Flanders. He was afterwards a captain under that monarch at the battle of the Boyne. Whilst in London for a short time, he was unfortunately induced to assist his friend, the Hon. Captain John Campbell, in carrying off and marrying Miss Mary Wharton, a young and rich heiress, related to Lord Wharton, the great favourite of King William, and that nobleman immediately obtained a proclamation offering a reward for their apprehension Campbell escaped into Scotland, but Sir John was not so fortunate. Having been betrayed by his landlord for fifty pounds, he was tried at the Old Bailey, condemned, and executed, on 31st Dec., 1690 He fell a sacrifice to the bitter animosity which was then entertained by the English against the Scotch, for it appeared, upon his trial, by the evidence of the clergyman who performed the marriage ceremony, and that of the people of the house in which they lodged, and where they remained two days, as well as by Miss Wharton's own letter to her aunt, acquainting her of her marriage, that there was no force used but that she was freely consenting to it. Sir John's whole participation in the matter consisted in being present at the marriage, and lending his apartments to accommodate his friend, and he never had any idea that this, by the laws of England, constituted an offence worthy of death His defence and whole deportment at the time are said to have been affecting in the extreme. He was a brave man, and bitterly lamented the ignominy of his death. The whole account of the trial and execution, and the ballads made on the occasion, are preserved among the family papers. The marriage was dissolved by act of parliament, and Captain Campbell, afterwards designed of Mamore, married a daughter of the eighth Lord Kilpinston, and was father of the fourth duke of Argyle. Dying unmarried, Sir John was succeeded by his cousin, John, son of John Johnston of Newplace, second son of the first baronet.

Sir John, fourth baronet, was a zealous Jacobite, and in 1715 with his only son and as many of his retainers as he could assemble, he joined the earl of Mar, and at the battle of Sheriffmuir his son was killed by his side. After the suppression of the rebellion Sir John dared not return home, and died in obscurity at Edinburgh in 1725

He was succeeded by his cousin, Sir William Johnston of Craig and Bishopstown, fifth baronet, who died in 1750 By his wife, Jean, daughter of John Sandilands, of the Torphichen family, he had two sons and three daughters. His second son, Alexander, an officer in the navy, was drowned with his whole crew on the coast of Kincardineshire, off Stonehaven Sir William, the elder son, sixth baronet, entered early into the royal navy, and had the command of a ship-of-war at the time of his father's death. On that event taking place, quitting the navy, he returned home, and purchased the lands of Hilton, near Aberdeen He was thrice married: first, to Sarah, daughter of Thomas Kirby, an eminent West India merchant, by whom he had one son, who died in infancy, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Captain William Cleland, R.N., of the Clelands of that ilk, by whom he had six sons and five daughters; and thirdly, to Amy, daughter of Newman French, Esq of Bellechamp, in the county of Essex, and widow of John Pudsey, Esq., without issue. He died in March 1794, aged 82. His fourth son, Alexander, midshipman on board his majesty's ship, Assistance, Commodore Sir Charles Douglas, perished with the first lieutenant, the Hon. Douglas Hallyburton, and all the barge's crew, off Sandyhook in America, December 31, 1783, aged 18. Some of the ship's company had seized one of the boats, and made for the shore with the intention of deserting, when Alexander Johnston and some other young men volunteered to recover the boat and bring back the deserters. The commodore permitted them to go, under the command of the first lieutenant, but the day soon closing in, and the night being stormy and severely cold, they did not return, and next morning they were all found on the shore, frozen to death.

The eldest son, Sir William Johnston of Johnston, seventh baronet, entered very young into the army, and served in India for some years with considerable reputation. He took part in seven actions, and was at the capture of the forts on the coast of Malabar In 1798 he raised a regiment of fencible infantry, for general service, styled "The Prince of Wales' Own," which was reduced at the short peace of 1802. He represented the burgh of New Windsor, in the first imperial parliament, in which he sat five years, but retired at the general election, not choosing to stand a contest. He married, first, Mary, daughter of John Bacon, Esq of Shrubland Hall, Suffolk, lineally descended from the Lord keeper Bacon, whose third son was the great philosopher, Sir Francis Bacon, lord chancellor of England and Baron Verulam This lady died in 1802 without issue. He married, 2dly, Maria, only daughter of John Bacon, Esq of Fryern House, Middlesex, younger son of an elder branch of the Shrubland family, issue, 3 sons and 4 daughters. He died at the Hague, January 13, 1844, in his 84th year

His eldest son, Sir William Bacon Johnston, 8th baronet, born in 1804, and unmarried, was at one period an officer in the 1st Royals; a deputy-lieutenant of Aberdeenshire Darcy, the 2d son, died in Bengal. Arthur Lake, the youngest son, a lieutenant 21st Royal Fusiliers, died February 21, 1853.

JOHNSTON, JOHN, an eminent Latin poet and scholar, of the family of Crimond, is supposed to have been born, near Aberdeen, about 1570 He received the early part of his education under Mr Robert Mercer, minister of Banchory, to whom, by his last will, he bequeathed his white cup with the silver foot, "in talkin of his thankful dewtie" He studied at King's college, Aberdeen, whence he proceeded to attend some of the universities on the continent. In 1587 he was at the university of Helmstadt, and in the following year at that of Rostock, where he enjoyed the intimacy and correspondence of the learned Justus Lipsius. On his return to his native country, he was, about 1593, through the influence, it is supposed, of Andrew Melville, appointed professor of divinity in the new college of St. Andrew's, and in all the ecclesiastical disputes of that period he proved himself to be a zealous and useful coadjutor of that illustrious reformer, in support of the presbyterian church of Scotland He died in October 1612 He left behind him some MSS. preserved in the Advocates' Library, and also epitaphs on his wife, Catharine Melville, of the family of Carribee, and their two children.

His works are

Inscriptiones Historicæ Regum Scotorum, continuatæ Annorum Series, à Fergusio primo Regni conditore ad nostra tempora, cum figuris: Præfixus est Gathelus, sive de Gentis Origine, Fragmentum Andreæ Melvini. Additæ sunt Icones omnium Regum Nobilis Familiæ Stuartorum. Amsterdam, 1602, 1603, 4to. This, his first complete poetical work, is preserved in the Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, and consists of epigrammatic addresses to the Scottish Kings from Fergus I to James VI

Heroes ex omni Historia Scotica Lectissimi. Leyden, 1603 A series of epigrams similar to the above, addressed to the heroes who flourished in Scottish history during the same period; also preserved in the Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum Consolatio Christiana sub Cruce ex vivifico Dei Verbo. Leyden, 1609, 8vo.

Iambi Sacri. Leyden, 1611

Tetrasticha et Lemmata Sacra, &c. Leyden, 1612

Icones Regum Judæ et Israelis, Carmine expressæ. Leyden, 1612, 4to.

He also wrote epigrams on the principal towns of Scotland, inserted in Camden's Britannia.

JOHNSTON, ARTHUR, an eminent Latin poet and physician, was born in 1587, at Caskieben, Aberdeenshire, the seat of his ancestors, as he informs us, for many generations He was the fifth son of George Johnston of Caskieben, and Christian, daughter of William Lord Forbes He had five brothers The eldest, John Johnston, was appointed sheriff of Aberdeen in 1630, and the youngest, Dr William Johnston, after having filled the chairs of humanity and philosophy in the university of Sedan, was appointed the first professor of mathematics in Marischal college. Like his brother he also wrote Latin verses

Arthur received the early part of his education at the grammar school of Kintore, in the neighbourhood of his father's estate, and is supposed to have studied at King's college, Old Aberdeen, as he was afterwards elected rector of that university With the view of studying medicine, in 1608 he went to the continent, and twice visited Italy He remained for some time at the university of Padua, where, in 1610, the degree of M D. was conferred upon him He subsequently travelled through Germany, Denmark, and Holland, and, after visiting England, he at last settled in France, where he acquired considerable eminence as a Latin poet. He lived in that country for about twenty years, and by two wives, the one a Frenchwoman, and the other a native of Brabant, had thirteen children. While residing in France, as we learn from several of his poems, he was engaged in a lawsuit in the court of Mechlin, with a person living near the forest of Ardennes, in which he was at last successful Dr Irving conjectures that the subject of ligation was some property accruing to him by marriage

On the death of King James, in 1625, Johnston, whom he had patronised, celebrated his mild virtues in an elegy, which was printed at London the same year In 1628, he published at Aberdeen, two elegies, one addressed to Bishop Patrick Forbes on the death of his brother, and the other on the breaking of the ancient alliance between Scotland and France On the title page he is styled one of the royal physicians In 1632 he returned to Scotland, after an absence of twenty-four years. He appears soon after to have had a lawsuit in the court of session, in reference to which several of his poems are written, one of which is addressed to Lord-chancellor Hay, and another to the Lord-advocate Nicholson

On the visit of Charles I to Edinburgh in 1633 Johnston was introduced to Archbishop Laud, who became his patron He had printed at London a specimen of a new version of the Psalms of David, which he dedicated to that prelate, who urged him to proceed with it A complete translation of the whole was published by him four years afterwards. The comparative merit of Johnston's translation of the Psalms and Buchanan's version was, about the middle of last century, the subject of a famous controversy, in which the notorious William Lauder and a simple English gentleman, of the name of Benson, an auditor of the Imprests in the Exchequer, stood forward as the zealous trumpeters of Johnston, while Mr Love and Mr Ruddiman ably and successfully defended Buchanan Three editions of Johnston's Psalms were printed at Benson's expense, with an elegant Life of the translator prefixed. One of these, in quarto, with a fine portrait of Johnston, by Vertue, after Jamesone, and copiously illustrated with notes, was published in 1741, dedicated to the prince of Wales. The following woodcut is taken from it

Johnston died in 1641, at Oxford, whither he had gone on a visit to one of his daughters, who was married to a clergyman of the Church of England of that city, where he lies buried He appears to have been on terms of intimacy with most of the eminent men of his time in Scotland, many of whom he has commemorated in his poetry, and there is scarcely a family of any note in the north of Scotland, to some branch of which he has not addressed his Latin verses

Parerga, and Epigrammata. Aberdeen, 1632, 8vo. The former dedicated to Sir John Scot of Scotstarvet, and the latter to the earl of Lauderdale.

The Song of Solomon, with the seven penitential, and the seven consolatory Psalms, translated into Latin elegiac verse. London, 1633, 8vo. The first dedicated to the king, the second to Laud, and the third to Lesley, bishop of Raphoe. New edition printed by Ruddiman Edin 1709

Psalmorum Davidis Paraphrasum Poeticum, being a complete translation of the Psalms of David Aberdeen, 1637, 12mo. Dedicated to Mary Erskine, Countess Marischal Appended are the Canta Evangelica, comprehending the Salutation of the Angel, the Song of Elizabeth, the Song of the Blessed Virgin the Song of Zacharias, the Song of Simeon, the Hymn of St Ambrose, the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments. Reprinted at London in 1637 and 1652, also at Amsterdam in 1706, under the inspection of David Hoogstratan, and dedicated to James Brockhusius.

He also wrote Musæ Aulicæ, or commendatory verses on some of his most distinguished contemporaries, still edited the Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum, in which he introduced many of his own pieces. Published at Amsterdam in 1637

Collected edition of his works, by Mr William Spang, minister of the Scottish church at Campvere. Middelburg, 1642.

JOHNSTON, ROBERT, a learned historian, who lived in the earlier part of the seventeenth century, was the author of a very copious History of Great Britain, published at Amsterdam in 1655, under the title of 'Historia Rerum Britannicarum,' &c., from 1572 to 1628 This work, designed as a continuation of Buchanan, has been praised by Bishop Nicholson, in his Scottish Historical Library, and by Lord Woodhouselee, according to whom Johnston was one of George Heriot's executors. He wrote also 'The History of Scotland during the Minority of James VI,' published at London in 1646 He is supposed to have died in 1630 A manuscript History of Scotland, preserved in the Advocates' Library, which belonged to Lord Fairfax, is supposed to have been partly written by Robert Johnston

JOHNSTON, SIR ARCHIBALD, LORD WARRISTON, a distinguished lawyer and statesman, was the son of James Johnston of Beirholm, in Annandale, formerly a merchant in Edinburgh, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Craig, the celebrated lawyer The exact time of his birth is not known, but he was admitted advocate in 1633 So early as 1637 he began to take a prominent part in the disputes of the period, and became an active agent and principal confident of the Presbyterians in all their proceedings The second or general supplication to the king for relief from his Episcopal innovations, presented to the privy council, September 24, 1637, was prepared by Johnston and the earl of Rothes, and on the subsequent renewal of the Covenant, in March 1638, he and the celebrated Alexander Henderson were appointed to revise and adapt that national document to the circumstances of the times At the memorable assembly which met at Glasgow in November 1638, Johnston was unanimously elected clerk, and such was the confidence which the leaders of the Covenant reposed in him, that, the day before the termination of the session, he was constituted procurator for the church. He was afterwards one of the Scotch commissioners who conducted the treaty of Berwick; and on June 11, 1640, he was appointed by the Estates of the kingdom general adviser to the commissioners sent to England, in which capacity he acted in the various commissions appointed to negotiate with the king or the English parliament, throughout the whole proceedings of the civil war. In 1641, when Charles I visited Scotland, Johnston was knighted, and nominated an ordinary lord of session, with a pension of £200 per annum. In 1643 he represented the county of Edinburgh in the Estates of parliament, when he was appointed Speaker to the barons, and as such made various important motions relative to the public transactions of that disturbed period In July 1644 he was sent to London as one of the parliamentary commissioners, to attend the English parliament and the Assembly of Divines at Westminster In 1646, on the death of Sir Thomas Hope, Johnston succeeded him as lord advocate, and one of the last of his official acts in that dignity was the proclaiming Charles II king on February 5, 1649 On March 10, the same year, he was appointed lord-clerk-register, in place of Gibson of Durie, superseded by the Act of Classes After the battle of Dunbar, in 1650, at which he was present, he lived for some years in retirement, but having been induced to go to London, he was unfortunately prevailed upon to accept of office under Cromwell, who, July 9, 1657, re-appointed him lord-clerk-register, and, November 3, named him one of the commissioners for the administration of justice in Scotland He also created him a peer, and under the title of Lord Warriston he sat for some time in parliament. After the death of the Protector, he acted as president of the committee of safety, when Richard Cromwell had resigned the reins of government. At the Restoration orders were issued for his arrest, and knowing that, from his compliance with Cromwell, and his uniform support of the Covenanters, he might expect no mercy from the new government, he escaped to France, and was outlawed in the usual form, October 10, 1660 An act of forfeiture being passed against him in absence, he was condemned to death, May 15, 1661. An emissary of government, appropriately named "Crooked Alexander Murray," discovered his retreat at Rouen, and with permission of the French council, brought him prisoner to England He was at first lodged in the Tower, and thence removed to Edinburgh, where, without the formality of a trial, he was hanged at the Cross, July 22, 1668, dying with the utmost constancy and Christian fortitude.

JOHNSTON, DAVID, D D, an eminent clergyman, founder of the Blind Asylum in Edinburgh, was born in 1733 His father was minister of Arngask, a parish situated in the three counties of Perth, Kinross, and Fife His mother's father, the Rev David Williamson of St. Cuthberts, Edinburgh, ordained in 1661, was a celebrated minister of the Church of Scotland in the days of the persecution, from the Restoration to the Revolution, and is referred to as "Mess David Williamson" in an old ballad sung by one of the mob in the 'Heart of Mid Lothian' The subject of this notice was ordained to the parish of Langton, Berwickshire, in 1759 About six years after, he was translated to the maritime parish of North Leith, including the fishing village of Newhaven, where he distinguished himself by his active Christian philanthropy, and became endeared to his parishioners by his constant pastoral visitations and unceasing solicitude for their spiritual and temporal welfare

With the establishment of that truly benevolent institution, the Asylum at Edinburgh for the industrious blind, first opened on 23d September, 1793, the name and memory of Dr Johnston are indelibly associated, and his bust was placed above the principal entrance, in Nicholson Street of that city The necessary funds were raised at first mainly through his exertions, and those of several charitable gentlemen of Edinburgh He was so much interested in the success of the institution that he devoted five days in the week to its personal superintendence, and, for this purpose, regularly walked on those days (Saturday and Sunday were the exceptions) to and from Edinburgh, the distance being about two miles and a half Such was the muscular activity for which he was always remarkable, that at the extreme age of ninety, he performed the journey as usual He died at Leith on 5th July, 1824, in the 91st year of his age, and 66th of his ministry. The only survivor of a large family was a daughter, married to William Penney, Esq, Glasgow. For more than 24 years he had been assisted in his parochial duties by the Rev. Dr. Ireland, who succeeded to the parish on Dr Johnston's death, but died in 1828

JOHNSTONE, the surname of a family, designed of Westerhall, in Dumfries-shire, who possess a baronetcy, the first of whom on record was Sir John de Johnstone, one of the Scots barons who swore fealty to King Edward I in 1296, and is styled "Johannes de Johnston, chevalier del comitat de Dumfries," &c. His son, John de Johnston, in the reign of Robert the Bruce, was a witness in a charter of Thomas Randolph, early of Moray, of the lands and barony of Cumlangan, which the said earl gave to his nephew, William de Moravia. His son, Gilbert de Johnston, a witness in the same charter, had a son, Sir John de Johnston, a distinguished warrior in the reigns of King David II. and King Robert II In 1370, he defeated an English army who had invaded Scotland, and in 1372 he was one of the guardians of the west marches. He died about 1382 or 1383 His son, Sir John de Johnston, got 300 francs of the 40,000, sent by the king of France, in 1385, to be divided among the Scots nobles, his faithful allies, in the war against England, and from the proportions a comprehensive scale may be formed of the power of those to whom the various sums were paid. Sir John died about 1420

His son, Sir Adam, at the head of his vassals, joined the Scots army under the earl of Ormond, and behaved gallantly against the English at the battle of Sark, where the Scots obtained a complete victory He was afterwards very instrumental in suppressing the rebellion of the earl of Douglas and his brother the earl of Ormond, and King James II made him a grant of the lands of Peddinane, now Pettinane, in Lanarkshire. The Westerhall family have long borne the principal arms of the name of Johnstone, charged for difference with the heart and crown of Douglas, in memory of the seizure of the rebellious earl, by their ancestor Sir Adam, had, by a first wife, two sons, John, his heir, ancestor of the Annandale branch, (see ANNANDALE, marquis of, vol. i. page 140,) and Matthew, who continued this line. By a second wife, Lady Janet Dunbar, daughter of the earl of March, and widow of Lord Seton, he had other three sons.

Matthew, the second son, was the first to reside at Westerhall, which became the designation of the family The seventh in descent from him, Sir James Johnstone, knight, was member for Dumfries, in the convention parliament, summoned by the prince of Orange, in 1688-9, and died in 1699 He had two sons.

Sir John, the elder son, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, by patent, on 25th April, 1700 He sat for Dumfries in the Scots parliament of 1703, and voted for the first article of the Union By his wife, Rachel Johnstone of Skeens, he had a daughter, Philadelphia, married to James Douglas of Dornock, Esq, and died in 1711

His brother, William, succeeded him as second baronet of Westerhall. By his wife, Henrietta Johnstone, he had two sons, and died in 1727 The second son, John, a lieutenant-colonel in the army, who died in 1740, married the dowager marchioness of Annandale, daughter and heiress of John Vanden Bempde of Harkness Hall, Yorkshire. By this lady, Colonel Johnstone had two sons. Richard, the elder, in 1798 assumed, by act of parliament, the surname and arms of Vanden Bempde, and in 1795, by sign-manual he took the surname of Johnstone. He was created a baronet of the United Kingdom on 6th July of the same year, and on his death in 1807 was succeeded by his son, Sir John Vanden Bempde Johnstone, M P., D C.L.

The third baronet, Sir James Johnstone of Westerhall, elder son of the second baronet, became, in 1740, provost of Lochmaben, and chiefly distinguished himself by his attention to local improvements. To him the inhabitants of that part of the country were greatly indebted for good roads and convenient bridges. He was the first to propose that a bridge should be thrown over the Esk at Langholm, by which the people of Westerkirk have ready access to the limekilns and coalpits of Canobie. The family mansion of Westerhall is situated in the parish of Westerkirk, in the churchyard of which is the family vault of the Johnstones. Sir James married the Hon. Barbara Murray, eldest daughter of the fourth Lord Elibank, and by her had fourteen children Of these, James, the eldest son, succeeded as fourth, and William, another son, as fifth baronet. George, a third son, distinguished himself as a naval officer After passing through the subordinate stations, he was, in February 1760, appointed master and commander In 1761, he sent the first notice of the Spanish declaration of war to Admiral Rodney, then commanding in the West Indies, in consequence of which the Havannah was taken. In August 11, 1762, he was advanced to the rank of post-captain In 1768, he was nominated governor of West Florida, and on his return to England he was elected M P for Appleby, and afterwards for Cockermouth. In the course of a speech in parliament he threw out some reflections on Lord George Germaine, afterwards Viscount Sackville, which occasioned a duel between them in 1770, but fortunately it was attended with no serious consequences to either party Captain Johnstone took a strong interest in the affairs of the East India Company, and distinguished himself by a violent attack on the conduct of Lord Clive. He contributed some material information to the pamphlet, entitled 'A Letter to the Proprietors of East India Stock, from John Johnstone Esq, late one of the council at Calcutta,' and in 1771, he published 'Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies.' In 1778 he was one of the commissioners sent out with the earl of Carlisle and William Eden, afterwards Lord Auckland, to treat with the congress of the revolted American colonies, which mission ended unsuccessfully As commodore of a squadron destined for the Cape of Good Hope, with the outward bound East Indiamen under convoy, he was, on 30th April 1781, attacked by a French squadron, under Mons. de Suffrein, in Porto Praya Bay, island of St. Jago, but beat them off. He subsequently took some Dutch prizes. Having put one of his officers under arrest, he was afterwards much harassed in the courts of law in consequence, but on appeal the House of Lords decided in his favour, only 24 hours before his death, on 24th May, 1787 By his wife, a lady of the name of Dee, he had a son, John Lowther, who succeeded as sixth baronet.

John, a younger son of the third baronet, was progenitor of the Johnstones of Alva, Stirlingshire Sir James Johnstone, fourth baronet of Westerhall, eldest son of the third baronet, was a lieutenant-colonel in the army, and M P During the lifetime of his father, he occupied himself for years in searching for lead in the lands of Glendinning, parish of Westerkirk, and in 1760, discovered a valuable mineral vein, which, on being analysed, proved to be antimony, the only one in Great Britain. He died in 1797, without male issue.

His brother, William, succeeded as fifth baronet. He married Miss Pulteney, niece of the earl of Bath and of General Pulteney, and acquiring with her an immense fortune, in 1767 changed his name, by royal sign-manual, to Pulteney. He represented, first, Cromarty, and afterwards Shrewsbury, in seven successive parliaments. In 1790 he founded the professorship of agriculture in the university of Edinburgh. He subsequently became an extensive speculator in American lands, a large proportion of which he sold to great advantage. On his death on 30th May, 1805, the greater part his estates devolved upon Sir James Murray Pulteney, who in 1794, had married his only daughter The Westerhall estates and title passed to his nephew, the son of his brother, Captain George Johnstone, as above mentioned.

Sir John Lowther Johnstone, sixth baronet, was, in 1810, elected M.P for Weymouth, and died the following year.

His only son, Sir George Frederick Johnstone, 7th baronet, born in Dec. 1810, and M P for Weymouth 1832, was one of the claimants of the Annandale peerage. He married, Oct. 24, 1840, Lady Louisa Elizabeth Frederica Craven, only daughter of 1st earl of Craven, and died 7th May, 1841, in consequence of a fall from his horse. By his lady he had posthumous twin sons, the elder of whom, Sir Frederick John William Johnstone, succeeded at his birth, 5th Aug. same year, as 8th bart. His twin brother's name is George Charles Keppel. Their mother married, 2dly, in 1844, Alex. Oswald, Esq

JOHNSTONE, THE CHEVALIER DE, an adherent of the Stuarts, was the son of James Johnstone, a respectable merchant of Edinburgh, where he was born in 1720 On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745 he joined the standard of the Pretender, and was by Lord George Murray appointed his aide-de-camp He also acted as assistant aide-de camp to the prince, who, immediately after the battle of Prestonpans, bestowed upon him a captain's commission He subsequently raised an independent company, with which he joined the duke of Perth's regiment, and served throughout the rebellion After the battle of Culloden he remained for some time in concealment, first in different places in the north, and latterly in the house of Lady Jane Douglas, at Drumsheugh, near Edinburgh At last, in the disguise of a pedlar, he made his escape into England, and embarking at Harwich, reached Holland in safety He subsequently entered the French service, and was sent to Canada, where he acted as aide-de-camp to the commander of the forces On the conquest of those provinces by the British he returned to France, and devoted his latter years to writing, in the French language, 'Memoirs of the Rebellion in 1745 and 1746,' which, after his death, was deposited in the Scots college at Paris, and a translation of which was published at London in 1820.

JOHNSTONE, JAMES, an eminent physician, fourth son of John Johnstone, Esq, of Galabank, was born at Annan in 1730 He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards at Paris, and took his degree of M.D at the former place in 1750 He settled in practice at Kidderminster, where he acquired much local celebrity, by his skill and success in treating a malignant epidemical fever then raging there, of which he published an account in 1758 His reputation was considerably extended by several publications on professional subjects, and also by some important medical discoveries, amongst which was the use of mineral acid vapour in counteracting febrile contagion

Several physiological papers, contributed by him to the Philosophical Transactions, he afterwards enlarged and published separately The intimate friend of George Lord Lyttleton, he wrote an affecting account of that amiable nobleman's death, inserted in Dr Johnson's Lives of the Poets He subsequently removed to Worcester, where he died in 1802 His son, the late Dr John Johnstone of Birmingham, was the author of the Life of Dr Parr, and several treatises on medical subjects

JOLLY, ALEXANDER, D D, a pious and learned divine, for many years bishop of Moray, was born in 1755 On June 24, 1796, he was consecrated at Dundee by Bishop Abernethy Drummond, Bishop Macfarlane, and Bishop Strachan, being raised to the episcopate, as coadjutor to Bishop Macfarlane, who almost immediately thereafter resigned Moray to his spiritual jurisdiction, retaining under his own superintendence the extensive districts of Ross and Argyle Bishop Jolly continued to officiate as pastor of a congregation at Fraserburgh till his death, June 29, 1838, in the 83d year of his age, and 42d of his episcopate. The reputation of this venerable and highly respected prelate, for profound and varied learning, extended far beyond the limits of the church of which he was such a distinguished ornament His long life was devoted to the duties of his ministry, and the study of the Scriptures in their original languages, as well as of the writings of the Fathers; and the result is partly displayed in his valuable work on the Eucharist, published in 1831. In 1826 he produced a 'Friendly Address to the Episcopalians of Scotland on Baptismal Regeneration' In the department of practical divinity he published, in 1828, 'Observations on the several Sunday Services throughout the year.'

JONES, PAUL, originally named John Paul, a remarkable naval adventurer, was born at Arbigland, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, July 6, 1747 His reputed father, John Paul, was gardener to Mr Craik of Arbigland, to whom his mother was cook, and he is supposed to have been the son of that gentleman He early evinced a predilection for the sea, and, at the age of twelve, when he had received but a limited education, he was bound apprentice as a sailor to a respectable merchant of Whitehaven In 1760 he made his first voyage in the ship Friendship of that port, bound for the Rappahannock, Virginia, where his elder brother was established as a planter On the expiry of his apprenticeship he obtained the command of a ship engaged in the slave-trade, but after some time quitted it in disgust He returned to Scotland in 1768, as passenger in a vessel, the captain and mate of which died on the voyage At the request of those on board, he took the command, and brought the vessel safe into port, for which service he was appointed by the owners master and supercargo He had afterwards the command of the Betsy of London, and remained some time in the West Indies, engaged in commercial pursuits and speculations, whereby, it is said, he realised a considerable sum of money.

In 1773 he went to Virginia to arrange the affairs of his brother, who had died intestate and childless, and, about the same time, he first assumed the name of Paul Jones, having settled as a regular colonist there. At the commencement of the American Revolution, he offered his services to Congress, and was appointed first lieutenant of the Alfred, on board of which ship, to use his own words, "he had the honour to hoist, with his own hands, the flag of freedom the first time it was displayed on the Delaware" Soon after, he received a captain's commission from the hands of the President, and on board the Providence, mounting twelve four-pounders, with a complement of seventy men, in the course of little more than a six weeks' cruise from the Bermudas to the Gut of Canso, he took no less than sixteen prizes. In May 1777, he was ordered to France, in command of the Ranger sloop of war, with despatches to the American commissioners, Franklin, Deane, and Lee, who were directed to give him the command of the Indian, a fine frigate, built at Amsterdam, which, however, from motives of policy, was assigned over to the French king

Being invested by the American commissioners with discretionary powers to cruise where he pleased, Jones sailed, April 10, 1778, for the coast of Britain, and with his single ship, the Ranger, he kept the whole coast of Scotland, and part of that of England, for some time in a state of the greatest alarm Making a descent at Whitehaven, he surprised the fort, and after spiking all the cannon, thirty-six in number, he retreated, setting fire to part of the shipping in his way On the forenoon of the 22d April he landed with part of his crew at St. Mary's Isle, on the Galloway coast, the residence of the earl of Selkirk, which was plundered by his followers, who, contrary to his orders, carried off the whole of the family plate But he afterwards made the best reparation in his power by purchasing back the plate, and restoring it to the earl In the bay of Carrickfergus he had the good fortune to capture the Drake of twenty guns, after a desperate resistance, with which, and another prize, and two hundred prisoners of war, he returned to Brest, having been absent only 28 days.

After many delays and disappointments, he obtained from the French government the command of the ship Duras of forty guns, on board of which he hoisted the American flag, changing its name to "Le Bon Homme Richard" With a squadron of seven ships, he sailed from the road of St Croix, August 14, 1779, and, after being deserted by four of them, he appeared, in September, in the Frith of Forth, opposite Leith, but was prevented, by a sudden change of wind, from either landing on the coast, or attacking the ships of war in the roads, which was evidently his first design Having shortly after fallen in with the homeward-bound Baltic fleet, under convoy of his majesty's ships the Serapis and the Countess of Scarborough, a desperate conflict ensued off Flamborough Head, September 23, when Jones was victorious, the Countess of Scarborough striking to the Pallas, and the Serapis to the Bon Homme Richard, which, after all hands had left her, sunk next morning With his prizes he proceeded to the Texel, and exerted himself successfully in obtaining an exchange of prisoners with England

For this victory, the king of France presented him with a superb gold-hilted sword, bearing an appropriate inscription, and, through his minister, requested the permission of congress to invest him with the military order of Merit About the end of 1780 Jones sailed for the United States, and, after a variety of escapes and rencontres, arrived in Philadelphia, February 18, 1781. On the recommendation of the American board of admiralty, a resolution of thanks was passed in congress for his zeal, prudence, and intrepidity; and, at the conclusion of the war, a gold medal was struck to commemorate his services. In November 1787 he sailed to Copenhagen, being charged with a mission to the court of Denmark, and, while there, was invited into the Russian service with the rank of rear-admiral He took the command of a fleet stationed at the mouth of the Dnieper, destined to act against the Turkish squadron in the Black Sea, but being intrigued against at court, and denied the merit due to his services, he solicited permission to retire, and quitted Russia in August 1789, having previously received from the empress Catharine the order of St Anne as a reward for his fidelity He then went to Paris, where he sunk into neglect and poverty, and died July 18, 1792 All his operations were conducted with singular boldness and sagacity, and, notwithstanding the defective state of his education, he wrote with fluency, strength, and clearness, as is testified by his voluminous correspondence and memorials He aimed at being "a poet as well as a hero," and in his latter years, besides making a large collection of important documents relating to the public transactions in which he had been engaged, he wrote a copious memoir of his own adventurous and extraordinary life

KAY, John, an eminent caricaturist, engraver, and miniature painter, was born in April 1742, at Gibraltar, near Dalkeith His father, who was a stone-mason, died when he was only six years of age, and his death prevented his son from being brought up to the same trade He was boarded with some relations of his mother in Leith, who treated him with great cruelty and neglect, and he himself informs us, that, in his boyhood, he had various narrow escapes from being drowned in the harbour of that place At the age of thirteen he was apprenticed to one George Heriot, a barber in Dalkeith, whom he served for six years When his time was out, he went to Edinburgh, where he worked as a journeyman barber under different masters, and afterwards, on December 19, 1771, purchased the freedom of the city, for which he paid about £40 to the society of surgeon-barbers, and began business for himself. Among his customers were several of the principal nobility and gentry of Edinburgh, and one of them in particular, William Nisbet, Esq of Dirleton, became so much attached to him, that, for some years before his death, he had him almost constantly residing with him at his country-seat. During this period, Kay employed his leisure time in improving himself in drawing, having an uncommon natural genius that way, and, being encouraged by Mr Nisbet, he executed a great number of miniature paintings, some of which are still at Dirleton House Mr Nisbet died in 1784, and his son, knowing that it was his father's intention, which death prevented him from carrying into effect, to bequeath an annuity to Kay for his good offices, settled on him £20 yearly for life

Having soon after published some etchings in aquafortis, he met with so much success as induced him to relinquish his trade of a barber in 1785, and devote himself entirely to engraving, and painting miniature likenesses in water colours, the most striking feature of which was their astonishing fidelity From this period to the year 1817 he produced a great variety of etchings of public personages, with occasional caricatures of local incidents, and odd and eccentric characters. In 1786 he executed a characteristic likeness of himself, with his favourite cat, supposed to be the largest in Scotland, and a bust of Homer, with his painting materials on the table before him, from which the foregoing woodcut is taken. He had a small print shop on the south side of the Parliament Square, Edinburgh, which, with the other old buildings of that locality, was destroyed by the great fire of November 1824. Mr. Kay died at his house, 227 High Street, Edinburgh, February 21, 1826, in the 84th year of his age. In his twentieth year he had married Lilly Steven, who bore him ten children, all of whom died long before himself She dying in March 1785, he took for his second wife, in 1787, Margaret Scott, who survived him upwards of nine years, and died in November 1885 After her death, the copper-plates of his works were purchased by Mr Hugh Paton, carver and gilder, Edinburgh, who re-published them in half-crown monthly parts, forming two quarto volumes, with biographical sketches, under the title of 'Kay's Edinburgh Portraits' A cheaper edition was issued in octavo volumes in 1842 The work forms a collection altogether unique, and of great local interest, and was a very successful publication

KEILL, John, a celebrated astronomer and mathematician, elder brother of the subject of the following notice, was born at Edinburgh, December 1, 1671, and studied at the university of that city, under the mathematical professor, David Gregory In 1694, on the removal of Gregory to Oxford, Keill accompanied him, and was admitted to one of the Scotch exhibitions (or bursaries) at Baliol college, where he read lectures on the Newtonian philosophy In 1698 he published an 'Examination of Dr Burnet's Theory of the Earth, with Remarks on Mr Whiston's Theory, which led to answers from both, to which, in 1699, he printed a reply. In 1700 he was selected by Dr. Millington, Sedelian professor of natural philosophy at Oxford, to be his assistant, and was the first who illustrated the principles of Newton by experiments, having invented an apparatus for the purpose. About 1708 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, on which he wrote a paper on the Laws of Attraction, inserted in the Philosophical Transactions. About the same period he engaged in a controversy with Leibnitz, relative to that philosopher's claim to the invention of the doctrine of fluxions, and communicated to the Royal Society an able vindication of Newton's title to the discovery In 1709, being appointed treasurer to the German exiles from the Palatinate, he accompanied them to the settlements granted to them in New England On his return in the year following, he was nominated successor of Dr Caswell, Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford

Objections having been urged against the Newtonian philosophy, on the foundation of Des Cartes' notions of a plenum, Keill again came forward in defence of Sir Isaac, by publishing a paper in the Philosophical Transactions for 1713, 'On the Rarity of Matter, and the Tenuity of its Composition' While engaged in this dispute, Queen Anne appointed him her decipherer, in which situation he continued till 1716 In 1718 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M D He died September 1, 1721

KEITH, a surname said to be derived from the German tribe of the Catti, which, about the period of the downfall of the Roman empire, inhabited what is now the electorate of Hesse Cassel, the sovereign of which, among other old titles, was called princeps Cattorum. On being driven from their country, a portion of them, in the first century, are traditionally stated to have landed on the coast of Caithness, the most remote and northern district on the mainland of Scotland, to which they gave their name. They are also said to have given their name to the clan Chattan.

In all the accounts of the origin of the Keiths it is recorded that in 1010 Robert, the chief of the Catti, in a great victory which Malcolm II. obtained over the Danes at Barrie in Forfarshire, slew, with his own hand, Camus their leader, when the king, dipping his fingers in the blood of the fallen general, drew three perpendicular strokes on the upper part of Robert's shield, whence his descendants bear three pallets, gules, on a chief Malcolm also created him heritable great marischal of Scotland, and bestowed on him several lands in East Lothian, still called Keith, the ancient name Catti, in process of time changed to Keithi and Keycht, being at length softened into Keith According to Sir Robert Sibbald, (Hist. of Fife, p. 94, edit. 1803,) he also got the isle of Inchkeith in the Frith of Forth, which likewise took its name from him Their alleged descent from the Catti appears to be only one of the fictions of the early chroniclers. The name Keith seems to be the British Caeth, 'confined or narrow,' and is supposed to allude to the strait channel hemmed in by the steep banks of Keith water It is certain that the descendant of Robert, in the reign of David I, Herveus, son of Warin, possessed half of the district of Keith in East Lothian, which was called from him Keith Hervei, and afterwards Keith Marischal He was a witness to charters of David I, particularly to that of his grant of Annandale to Robert de Brus. His son, Herveus de Keith, king's marischal under Malcolm IV and William I, witnessed several charters of the latter, from 1189 to 1196 He had a son, Malcolm de Keith, witness to a donation to the monastery of Kelso in 1185, who predeceased him, leaving two sons, Philip and David.

Philip, the elder son, great marischal of Scotland, succeeded his grandfather, and died before 1220 By his marriage with Eda, granddaughter and heiress of Symon Fraser of Keith Hundeby, (now Humbie) proprietor of the other half of the district of Keith, he acquired the whole barony of that name.

His son, Herveus de Keith, and his uncle David, acted as joint marischals of Scotland at the marriage of Alexander II and the princess Joan of England, at York, on 15th June 1220 He died soon after 1242 His son, Sir John de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, died before 1270

Towards the close of the 13th century persons of the name of Keith had become very numerous in Scotland. One of them, Sir William Keith of Galston in Ayrshire, in 1318, when the Scots surprised Berwick, and a number of the garrison and inhabitants had made a sally from the castle, repulsed them with great valour In 1330 he was one of the knights who accompanied the Douglas to Spain on his expedition to Palestine, with the heart of Robert the Bruce. Three years later, he commanded in Berwick, and in 1335, was ambassador to England; but the following year he was killed at the siege of Stirling.

Sir John de Keith's grandson, (the son of his eldest son,) Sir Robert de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, was one of the most illustrious knights of his day. In 1300 he was a prisoner in Cumberland, and in 1305 one of the commissioners chosen by the Scots people for the settlement of the government, as well as appointed a justiciary beyond the Forth. On 28th October 1305, he was one of the guardians of Scotland. In 1306 he joined the standard of Bruce, and distinguished himself at the battle of Inverury, where Comyn of Badenoch was defeated, for which he got a grant of several lands, and particularly a royal seat in Aberdeenshire, called Hall Forest. In 1314, on the approach of the English army under Edward II., to Falkirk, previous to the battle of Bannockburn, Sir Robert Keith and Sir James Douglas were despatched by Bruce to reconnoitre them upon their march. In the battle which followed he had the command of a strong body of cavalry In Scott's 'Lord of the Isles,' after describing Bruce's battle array and the position of the right wing under Edward Bruce, he says,

> "Behind them, screened by sheltering wood,
> The gallant Keith lord marshal stood:
> His men-at-arms bear mace and lance,
> And plumes that wave, and helms that glance."

To Sir Robert Keith was committed the important charge of attacking the English archers, which he did so effectually, by making a circuit to the right, and assailing them in flank, that he threw them into disorder, creating a confusion from which the English army never recovered, and thus contributing greatly to the signal victory which secured the throne to the heroic Bruce. He was one of the magnates Scotiæ, who signed the famous letter to the Pope in 1320, asserting the independence of Scotland He was one of the commissioners to treat with the English, and a guarantee of the truce concluded with them in 1323. He had from Robert the Bruce a charter of the lands of Keith Marischal, of the office of great marischal of Scotland, &c., to himself and his nearest heirs male, bearing the name and arms of Keith, dated at Berwick-on-Tweed, 7th November 1324, and so high did he stand in the confidence of that monarch, that, in April 1326, he was nominated one of the commissioners to ratify an alliance with the French king, Charles le Bel, at Corbeuil, but does not seem to have gone to France. He witnessed charters of Robert the Bruce in 1328 and 1329, and was slain at the fatal battle of Dupplin, 12th August 1332, when Edward Baliol surprised the royal army under the earl of Mar, and put it to a complete rout. He had a son, Sir John de Keith, who died before his father, leaving a son, Robert, who succeeded his grandfather, and besides being great marischal, was also sheriff of Aberdeen. He fell at the battle of Durham, 17th October, 1346, where Edward de Keith and Edmund de Keith, brothers, belonging to a different family, were also slain

As Robert died without issue, his grand-uncle, Sir Edward Keith, third son of Robert de Keith, great marischal, succeeded, in terms of the charter and entail of 1324. He died before 1350 He was twice married, and by his first wife, Isabel de Keith, of the family of Galston, he had two sons and two daughters. By his second wife, Christian, only child of Sir John Menteith, lord of Arran, he had an only child, Janet, married to Sir Thomas Erskine of Erskine, and their posterity, in right of Lady Erskine's mother, Lady Kline, daughter of Gratney, earl of Mar, succeeded to that earldom. John Keith, Sir Edward's second son, was ancestor of the Keiths of Innerugie and Ludquharn. The principal branch terminated in two daughters, co-heiresses of Innerugie, namely, Margaret, married to the fourth earl Marischal, and Elizabeth, wife of the seventh Lord Forbes.

Sir William Keith, great marischal of Scotland, the eldest son, was, in 1357, one of the commissioners to treat for the liberation of David II. In the following year he was sent to England, on that monarch's affairs, and again in 1369, as one of the commissioners for a truce, and one of the guarantees thereof. He was present at the coronation of King Robert II., at Scone, in March 1371. He and Margaret his wife, with whom he got large estates in the Mearns, she being the only child and heiress of Sir John Fraser, (eldest son of Alexander Fraser, high chamberlain of Scotland, and Mary, sister of Robert I.,) made an excambion of certain lands in the counties of Fife and Stirling, with William de Lindsay, lord of the Byres, for part of the lands of Dunnottar, in the shire of Kincardine. Here he built a strong castle, on a stupendous perpendicular rock, jutting into the sea, which afterwards became celebrated in Scottish history, and the ruins of which are among the most extensive and most majestic of the kind in Scotland. In ancient times the church, as well as the burial-place of the parish, was on the top of this rock, and when Sir William Keith resolved upon building a castle on it, he first erected a church for the parish on a more convenient spot. On pretence, however, that he had encroached on consecrated ground, the bishop of St. Andrews excommunicated him. He immediately appealed to the Pope, Benedict XIII., setting forth the necessity of such a fortress, with the circumstance of his having built another church, on which his holiness issued his bull, dated 18th July 1394, directing the bishop to take off the excommunication, and to allow Sir William to enjoy the castle at all times, on payment of a certain recompense to the church. Dunnottar thenceforth became the principal seat of the family, till the forfeiture of the tenth earl marischal in 1716. Sir William Keith died between 1406 and 1408. This powerful and wealthy baron had three sons and four daughters. Muriella, the eldest daughter, was the second wife of Robert, duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, by whom she was mother of John, earl of Buchan, constable of France, (whose portrait is given at vol. i. p. 43,) and two other sons.

John de Keith, eldest son of Sir William de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, married a daughter of King Robert II., from whom, on the resignation of his father and mother, he had a charter, dated 17th January 1374, of all the lands, possessions, and offices belonging to them, reserving their liferent. He died soon after, leaving a son, Robert de Keith, who also died before his grandfather, leaving a daughter, Jean, married to the first earl of Huntly. In Wyntoun's Chronicle (ii. 371) is an account of a conflict, near the kirk of Bourtrie in Garioch, in 1395, between Robert de Keith and Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, who had gone to the relief of his wife, the aunt of the former, by whom she was besieged and molested in her castle of Fyvie in Formartine, in which conflict Robert de Keith was discomfited, with the loss of fifty men. Sir Alexander de Keith, the third son, designed son of Sir William, the great marischal, and brother of the duke of Albany, in the chartulary of Aberdeen, in 1408, had the command of the horse at the battle of Harlaw, against Donald, Lord of the Isles, in 1411.

Sir Robert, the second son, succeeded his father in his estates and as great marischal of Scotland soon after 1406. In 1421, he was one of the commissioners to treat for the liberation of King James I. He was also one of his hostages, his estate being then valued at 800 merks. He married the heiress of Troup in Banffshire, and got with her that barony. By this lady he had three sons and three daughters. John his second son, obtained from his father a charter of the barony of Troup, 2d June 1413, and from him descended George Keith of Northfield, who, on 24th September 1782, was served heir-male of Sir Robert Keith, great marischal of Scotland, father of John.

Sir William, the eldest son, one of the guarantees of a treaty of peace with the English in 1457, was by King James II. created earl marischal of Scotland before 4th July 1458. (See MARISCHAL, earl of.)

The Keiths of Craig, Kincardineshire, distinguished themselves in the 18th century by their diplomatic services. About 1480, John Keith, stated erroneously by Douglas, both in his Peerage and his Baronage, to have been of the Keith Marischal family, got from his father the lands of Craig and part of Garvock in the Mearns. The 7th in descent from him, Colonel Robert Keith, had, by his wife, Agnes, daughter of Robert Murray of Murrayshall, one son, Robert Keith, at one period secretary to the forces, with the combined armies on the continent under the earl of Stair. In 1749 he was ambassador at Vienna, and in 1758 was transferred to St. Petersburg. He was at the Russian court in the summer of 1762, when the empress Catharine, having thrown her husband, Peter III., into prison, where he was murdered a few days afterwards, got herself crowned empress of all the Russias. Mr Keith died at Edinburgh in 1774. The early part of the first volume of the Memoirs and Correspondence of his son, Sir Robert Murray Keith, K.B., edited by Mrs. Gillespie Smyth (2 vols. London, 1849), is occupied with his correspondence. By his wife, Margaret, second daughter of Sir William Cunningham of Caprington, he had, with other children, The Right Hon. Sir Robert Murray Keith, K.B., a general in the army, and for twenty years the representative of Great Britain at the court of Vienna, of whom afterwards; Sir Basil Keith, who died in 1777, governor of Jamaica, and Miss Anne Keith, in her latter years called Mrs. Murray Keith, the well-known Mrs. Bethune Baliol of Sir Walter Scott, in the Introduction to the Chronicles of the Canongate. Born in 1786, this lady died in 1818. In a letter to Mr Terry, the celebrated comedian, dated 18th April of that year, communicating the intelligence of her death, Sir Walter Scott says: "She enjoyed all her spirits and excellent faculties till within two days of her death, when she was seized with a feverish complaint, which eighty-two years were not calculated to resist. Much tradition, and of the very best kind, has died with this excellent old lady; one of the few persons whose spirits and cleanliness, and freshness of mind and body, made old age lovely and desirable." (Lockhart's Life of Scott, vol. iv. p. 139.) She was the authoress of a song in three stanzas, entitled 'Oscar's Ghost,' inserted in Johnson's Scots Musical Museum. In a note by Mr Kirkpatrick Sharp in the edition of that work of 1839 (vol. i.) he says: "Miss Anne Keith resided many years in Edinburgh (51 George Street), keeping house with her elder sister, Miss Jenny, both universally loved and respected. Sir Walter Scott told me that Mrs. Anne Keith amused herself in the latter years of her life, by translating Macpherson's Ossian into verse. He did not know what became of the MS. after her decease." Scott's tale of the Highland Widow seems to have been founded on some story told him by Mrs. Murray Keith, as in contemplating the design of it, he says in his Diary, under date May 27, 1826: "Mrs. Murray Keith's Tale of the Deserter, with her interview with the lad's mother, may be made most affecting, but will hardly endure much expansion. The framework may be a Highland tour, under the guardianship of the sort of postillion whom Mrs. M. K. described to me—a species of conducteur who regulated the motions of his company, made their halts, and was their cicerone."

Her eldest brother, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Murray Keith, K.B., was born 20th Sept. 1730. He was educated, with his brother Basil, at the High school of Edinburgh, and early entered the army as a cornet of dragoons. In July 1747 he was appointed a captain in the regiment of foot then raised in Scotland for the Dutch service, in which he remained for several years, "greatly esteemed by his brother officers for his skill and judgment, as well as for his politeness and learning." At this period he wrote a number of poetical pieces, which appeared in a collection entitled 'The Caledoniad,' published at London in 1775, in 3 vols. 12mo. One of these, 'A Paraphrase of the first four verses of Barbara Allan, made on Lord Douglas' regiment receiving orders to march from Maestricht to See van Ghent, in Dutch Flanders,' is printed in the Notes to Johnson's Musical Museum (edition of 1839, vol. iii.) He afterwards obtained a commission in the British army, and in 1760 was commander of a battalion of Highlanders, which distinguished themselves during the German campaigns.

He was afterwards colonel of the 87th regiment of foot, and in 1769 he was nominated ambassador to Saxony In 1771, he was appointed envoy at Copenhagen, where his spirited conduct in 1772, in rescuing Carolina-Matilda, the unfortunate queen of Denmark, sister of George III, from the prison into which she had been thrown in the castle of Cronenburgh, obtained for him great praise, and the order of the Bath. On hearing that the queen had been seized and that her death was contemplated, he forced his way into the council, and threatened war against Denmark, if a hair of her head were touched. She was soon after allowed to retire to Zell in Hanover

In 1773, Sir Robert was sent to the court of Vienna, and in 1775, on a vacancy occurring in Peebles-shire, he was elected M P for that county He was also a member of the privy council, a lieutenant-general in the army, and colonel of the 10th regiment of foot. He died at Hammersmith, July 7, 1795, in his 63d year In the obituary of the Gentleman's Magazine for that year, Part 1, page 535, it is stated that "Sir Robert was corpulent, with a short neck He died in the arms of his servant, immediately after entertaining company at dinner His father, Ambassador Keith, as he was called at Edinburgh, died 21st September 1774, almost as suddenly" Sir Robert Murray Keith was particularly celebrated for his colloquial talents. The Memoirs and Correspondence, Official and Familiar, of Sir Robert Murray Keith With a Memoir of Queen Caroline Matilda of Denmark; and an account of the Revolution there in 1772, Edited by Mrs. Gillespie Smyth, were published at London in 1849, in 2 vols. 4to

The Keiths of Ravelstone, Mid Lothian, became the owners of that estate by purchase in 1726, from Sir Archibald Primrose of Dunipace, baronet, by Alexander Keith, writer in Edinburgh, who claimed, but without any ground, to be descended from Alexander Keith of Pittendrum, Aberdeenshire, 4th son of 3d earl Marischal He was succeeded by a son, Alexander, an under clerk in the court of session, born in 1705 In 1766 the latter purchased the estate of Dunnottar from the last earl Marischal. He married Johanna, daughter of John Swinton of that ilk, advocate, a kinswoman of Sir Walter Scott, and by her had four sons and two daughters. At his death in 1792 his eldest son, Alexander, succeeded to the estates of Ravelstone and Dunnottar When George IV visited Edinburgh in 1822, he was created a baronet, as he exercised on that occasion the office of Knight Marischal of Scotland On his death in 1832, the baronetcy became extinct, and the estate of Ravelstone went to Sir William Keith Murray of Ochtertyre, baronet, in right of his wife, Sir Alexander's daughter and heiress. The office of knight marischal was conferred on the earl of Errol, high constable of Scotland; and on his lordship's death, in 1846 it was bestowed on the marquis of Douglas and Clydesdale who succeeded his father in 1852, as 11th duke of Hamilton.

For Viscount Keith, see KEITH-ELPHINSTONE, GEORGE.

KEITH, GEORGE, fifth earl Marischal, the founder of a university at Aberdeen, eldest son of William Lord Keith, and Lady Elizabeth Hay, daughter of the sixth earl of Errol, was born about 1553, and succeeded his grandfather in 1581 He studied at King's college, Aberdeen, and also spent several years at universities on the Continent, when he visited most of the courts of Europe It is stated that he was kindly received by the landgrave of Hesse, the chief of the Catti, as a descendant of that tribe At Geneva, where his younger brother, William, his fellow-student, was unfortunately killed in a scuffle, he had for his instructor the celebrated Theodore Beza. After his return to Scotland, he appears to have been involved in some of the turbulent proceedings of those days, as, June 8, 1585, he obtained a remission under the great seal, for being art and part in the slaughter of his kinsman, William Keith, apparent of Ludquhairn, and we learn, from Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, that in 1595, he was charged before the king and council, for entertaining a deadly feud with the laird of Meldrum He seems also to have had some connection with the celebrated conspiracy which ended in the Raid of Ruthven, although he afterwards acted as chancellor of the assize of peers which found the earl of Gowrie guilty of treason for his share in that transaction In 1589 he was sent ambassador-extraordinary to the Danish court, to arrange the marriage of James VI to Anne of Denmark, when he was at the whole expense of the embassy, which was conducted by him on a most magnificent scale In 1592 he received a parliamentary ratification of his conduct on this occasion

In April 1593 the earl founded the Marischal college of Aberdeen, and endowed it, by charter, with funds sufficient for the maintenance of a principal, three professors, and six bursars, an act of munificence which has transmitted his name with honour to posterity He reserved to himself and his heirs the nomination to professorships, which appointments are all now in the Crown, in consequence of the forfeiture of the Marischal family since 1716. By subsequent endowments, the number of professorships has been increased to thirteen In consequence of the state of decay into which the old structure was rapidly falling, the university was between 1840 and 1844 rebuilt on a more extensive and magnificent plan than formerly, from a design by Archibald Simpson, Esq, architect, Aberdeen, a royal grant of £25,000 having been made for the purpose

In June 1609 the earl Marischal was appointed by James VI his high commissioner to the Scots parliament. In the decline of life he retired to Dunnottar castle, where he died, April 2, 1623 His lordship was twice married, and was succeeded by his eldest son, William, the sixth earl See MARISCHAL, Earl The woodcut subjoined is taken from an engraving of his lordship's portrait in Smith's Iconographia Scotica

KEITH, GEORGE, a voluminous writer both for and against the Quakers, was born in Aberdeen about the middle of the seventeenth century, where he was a fellow-student with Bishop Burnet, and took his degree of M A He quitted the Presbyterian church, in which he had been brought up, and turned a Quaker He afterwards went to Pennsylvania, where, becoming dissatisfied with the sect, he founded a new one of his own. On his return from America, he entered into the Church of England, took orders, and became rector of Edburton, in Essex He wrote a great variety of books at first for, and afterwards against, the doctrines of the Quakers, and some against Penn, with 'Reasons for Renouncing that Sect,' 1700 He was a believer in the transmigration of souls and the millennium, and is described as an eloquent speaker, and an able disputant. He died about 1715 —His works are

KEITH - ELPHINSTONE, GEORGE, VISCOUNT KEITH. See ELPHINSTONE, GEORGE KEITH.

KEITH, JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD, a distinguished military commander, the youngest son of William Keith, ninth earl Marischal, was born in 1696 He was destined for the law by his father, but his own disposition led to the army, and the breaking out of the Rebellion of 1715 afforded him an opportunity of following the bent of his inclination. By the persuasion of his mother, who was warmly attached to the Stuarts, he joined the standard of the Pretender when he was only nineteen years of age He was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and after that event succeeded in effecting his escape into France, where he subsisted for some time on supplies sent from Scotland, and a small annuity granted to him by the Pretender Having, before leaving home, made considerable progress in classical and general literature under his kinsman, Bishop Keith, he now applied himself with great diligence to the study of mathematics and military tactics In 1718 he and his brother, the earl Marischal, with several other expatriated adherents of the Stuarts, made an unsuccessful descent, with some Spanish troops, on the Highlands He afterwards entered the Spanish service, but finding no prospect of promotion unless he became a Roman Catholic, in 1728 he went to Russia, with a letter of recommendation from the king of Spain to the Czarina, the widow of Peter the Great He was promoted to the rank of major-general, received the command of a regiment of guards, and was invested with the order of the Black Eagle

In the revolution which elevated to the throne the princess Elizabeth, daughter of Peter the Great, he acted a prominent part. The empress fell in love with him and offered to marry him, a fact unknown to all his biographers. He prudently declined the dangerous honour, and accepted an invitation from the king of Prussia to enter his service Frederick created him field-marshal of the Prussian forces, and governor of Berlin The empress earnestly solicited his correspondence. "Your letters," she says, "are health and happiness to me." His MS. Correspondence with Lords G and E Drummond, concerning the Russian empire, 1748—1755, and 1756, was sold at the sale of the library of the Duke of Sussex in 1844. His personal qualities won the confidence of the king, who admitted him to the most familiar intercourse, and travelled with him through a great part of Germany, Poland, and Hungary. He became, in fact, his majesty's principal adviser and confidential companion. In the subsequent wars of that illustrious monarch, Marshal Keith displayed his usual genius, intrepidity, and zeal, but his career was finally closed by a cannon shot, in the unfortunate and sanguinary battle of Hochkirchen, October 14, 1758, in the 63d year of his age His body was stripped by the Austrians, but, being recognised, was interred in the neighbouring churchyard. By the special orders of the king, his remains were afterwards removed to Berlin, where there is a noble statue of him, erected by the king of Prussia. Some years after his death a monument was erected to his memory in the churchyard of Hochkirchen by Sir Robert Murray Keith, with an inscription by Metastasio

Subjoined is Marshal Keith's portrait, from an original in the possession of William Douglas, Esq, Liverpool, to whom it descended from his relative, Col Robert Keith, the last direct male representative of the noble family of Keith Marischal

KEITH, Robert, (Bishop Keith,) an eminent scholar and historian, a lineal descendant of Alexander, 4th and youngest son of William 3d Earl Marischal, was born at Uras, parish of Dunnottar, Kincardineshire, Feb. 7, 1681 His father, Alexander Keith, of the family of Pittendrum, was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, on the side of Charles II, in 1651, but by the help of two ladies, escaped from prison, and from the losses he sustained by his adherence to the royal cause, he was obliged in 1672 to sell his estate of Cowton in the Mearns, and purchase the smaller one of Uras in the same county. He died when his son Robert, the future bishop, was only two years old, and at the age of seven, his mother, who was the daughter of Robert Arbuthnott of Little Fiddes, also in Kincardineshire, removed with him into Aberdeen, where he obtained an excellent education both at school and at Marischal college In July 1703, he was appointed tutor to his noble relatives, the young Lord Keith and his brother, afterwards the celebrated Marshal Keith, with whom he continued for seven years In August 1710, he was admitted to the order of deacon, in the Scots episcopal church, by Bishop Haliburton of Aberdeen, and in November following he became domestic chaplain to the young earl of Errol, whom, in June 1712, he accompanied on a tour to the continent

On his return to Scotland, in the beginning of 1713, he was invited by an episcopalian congregation in Edinburgh, to become their minister, and was, accordingly, ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Haliburton, May 26 of that year His talents and learning gave him great influence among the clergy of his own communion, and his known liberal and enlightened principles, at all times rendered his advice of much value in the then depressed state of the Scots episcopal church In June 1727, he was chosen to be coadjutor to Bishop Millar of Edinburgh, and with Mr William Dunbar, elected bishop of Moray, was consecrated on the 18th of that month In manuscript memoirs of the (Episcopal) Church of Scotland, quoted in Stephen's History of that church (vol iv p 250) it is stated that "upon the 18th of June, the bishops of Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Brechin, having seen and considered the unanimous election of Mr William Dunbar, parson of Cruden, to be bishop of Moray

and Ross by the presbytery thereof, did consecrate the said elect; at the same time consecrating Mr R Keith, a presbyter in Edinburgh, who was not elected to any particular charge; yet in his diploma he was consecrated as coadjutor to the bishop of Edinburgh, because of his old age and infirmities This was a woful scene The episcopal church in Scotland was miserably rent, it being in the power of those opponents to consecrate an equal or greater number of bishops at large, in order to overwhelm the other, by which means there should be no end of consecrating, nor of that dismal schism of bishops at large, each party being in capacity to consecrate as many bishops as they shall think fit" Soon after, Bishop Keith was intrusted with the superintendence of Caithness, Orkney, and the Isles In 1733, on a vacancy occurring, the clergy of the episcopal church in Fife elected him to be their diocesan, and he assumed the administration of that district In 1738 he got into a dispute with Fairbairn, bishop of Edinburgh, relative to the ordination of a Mr Spens belonging to his diocese, who, after having first applied to Bishop Keith, his own immediate superior, in consequence of some delay, was on his application to the bishop of Edinburgh, admitted by him into deacon's orders Bishop Keith, in consequence, refused to institute Mr Spens to the chapel of Wemyss, in the diocese of Fife, till he had made a proper acknowledgment of his irregularity He also sent an energetic protest to the bishop and clergy of Edinburgh At an episcopal synod, held on the 11th July, he acted as clerk, and was directed by them to make a register of the consecrations of all the bishops of the Scottish church since the year 1688, "lest the documents of the episcopal succession might perish," which resolution of the synod may perhaps have suggested his well-known 'Historical Catalogue of the Scottish bishops down to the year 1688,' first published in 1755

In August 1743 Bishop Keith resigned the superintendence of the diocese of Fife, continuing still to perform the functions of bishop in Caithness and Orkney On the death of Bishop Fairbairn in 1739, it was supposed that the clergy of Edinburgh intended to have elected him his successor, but in a letter to Mr Anchinleck, one of their number, referred to in Bishop Russell's Life of Bishop Keith, the latter formally declared that he never solicited the clergy in any shape to elect him, but on the contrary had declined the appointment when it was actually offered to him At an episcopal synod held on the 20th August 1743, he was elected primus, as successor to Bishop Rattray of Dunkeld There had not been a bishop of Edinburgh since 1739, and the clergy of that diocese presented several addresses to the bishops on this and other subjects in dispute between them, relative to the limits of episcopal jurisdiction and the privileges of the presbyters To these no answer was returned till Bishop Keith, as primus, on January 25th, 1745, sent them a letter of remonstrance calculated to allay the discontented spirit that had arisen amongst them They had even entered into a correspondence with Mr George Smith, one of the nonjuring bishops of England, to consecrate one of the Edinburgh clergy as bishop of that diocese, which gave rise to a letter of expostulation from Bishop Keith to him, dated May 22d, 1744 He also drew up a declaration against the insidious conduct of Smith, which was signed by himself and four other of the Scots bishops

Justly proud of his descent from the Marischal family, he was, in the year 1750, led into a dispute with Mr Keith, younger, of Ravelstone, relative to the propinquity of his family to that noble house, and in consequence drew up and published a short genealogical statement, under the title of a 'Vindication of Mr Robert Keith, and of his young grand nephew Alexander Keith, from the unfriendly representation of Mr Alexander Keith, jun, of Ravelston,' clearly proving the correctness of his claim to that honourable position. Bishop Russell states, on the authority of Sir Alexander Keith of Ravelstone, knight marischal, who died in 1832, (see page 588 of this volume,) that the superior claims of the bishop in behalf of his nephew were unquestionably well founded, and that so long as the Uras branch of the Pittendrum Keiths existed in the male line, the Keiths of Ravelstone were not entitled to the honour which they so groundlessly claimed of being the representatives of the family of the Earls Marischal. In the 'Vindication' referred to, the bishop also showed that he was related by marriage to the ducal houses of Douglas and Hamilton, as well as to the Burnets and Arbuthnotts.

About 1752, he removed from the Canongate of Edinburgh, his usual place of residence, to the villa of Bonnyhaugh, on the Water of Leith, which belonged to himself, and afterwards descended to his daughter and granddaughter, by inheritance. He died there on 20th January, 1757, in the 76th year of his age, having been confined to bed only one day In the month of March previous to his death, writing to Marshal Keith, he says "I am just now drinking in a glass of claret all health and happiness to your excellency, and all your connections, whom may God long preserve I am entered upon the seventy-sixth year of my age, and am obliged to use the hand of another in writing, but I thank God I keep health surprisingly well for my age, though I am much failed in my feet" He was buried in the Canongate churchyard, where a plain, upright, square headstone, surmounted by an urn, was afterwards erected, with the simple inscription of "Bishop Keith"

In 1719 the bishop married Isobel Cameron, daughter of the Rev John Cameron, and had a son, who died young, and a daughter, Katherine, married in 1752 to Mr Stewart Carmichael, merchant in Edinburgh With a son, who died in early life, Mrs Carmichael had a daughter, named Stewartina Catherina, who in 1775 married William Douglas, Esq, merchant, Leith, and left three sons, William (who died at Buenos Ayres in 1842, unmarried), Stewart, and Archibald, and four daughters The direct representation of the bishop's family, therefore, rests with the descendants of the late Stewart Douglas, Esq, merchant, Glasgow, who left five sons, William, John, Stewart, Archibald, and Charles, the eldest of whom, William Douglas, Esq of Liverpool, (having an only son, Stewart,) is the great-great-grandson of the bishop, and likewise nearest of kin, through his grandmother, to Col Robert Keith, 3d regiment Foot Guards, up to his death in 1780, acknowledged as the nearest male representative of George, 10th Earl Marischal, who died in 1778.

Bishop Keith's works are.

The History of the Affairs of the Church and State of Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation in the Reign of King James V. to the Retreat of Queen Mary into England, anno 1568. Edin. 1734, fol. A few sheets of a second volume were left in MS.

This, the most popular and useful of Bishop Keith's works, was dedicated to his illustrious kinsman, Marshal Keith The account of the Culdees was written by Walter Goodall of the Advocates' Library New edition, under the title of Historical Catalogue of the Scottish Bishops down to the year 1688. By Robert Keith Also, an Account of all the Religious Houses that were in Scotland at the time of the Reformation By John Spottiswoode, Esq Corrected, and continued to the present time, with a Life of the author By the Rev M Russell, LL.D Edin 1824, 8vo.

Vindication of Mr Robert Keith, and of his young Grandnephew, Alexander Keith, to the honour of a lineal descent from the noble house of the Earls Marischal, in answer to The unfriendly Representation of Mr Alexander Keith, jun of Ravelston. Edin 1750 8vo.

Dr Russell says There is reason to believe that Bishop Keith published, about 1748, some 'Select Pieces of Thomas à Kempis,' translated into English In his Preface to the second volume of these Pieces, he introduced some addresses to the Virgin Mary, for which he thought it necessary to enter into some explanation with his more scrupulous brethren

Among his posthumous MSS. there was found a Treatise on Mystical Divinity, in the form of letters addressed to a lady, also, a Scheme of Religion derived solely from the Scriptures, intended, it was thought, for the use of his own family

KELLIE, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, (claimed in 1829, from failure of other heirs, by the earl of Mar,) conferred in 1619, on Sir Thomas Erskine of Gogar, first Viscount Fenton, eldest surviving son of the Hon Sir Alexander Erskine of Gogar, fourth son of the fourth Lord Erskine Sir Alexander, the father, was born about 1521 On the death of his brother, the regent, in 1572, the lords of the secret council, by the admonition of the estates of parliament, gave to him the charge of the education of the young king, James VI, George Buchanan, David Erskine, commendator of Dryburgh, Adam Erskine, commendator of Cambuskenneth, and Peter Young, acting as his preceptors. He was also governor of the castle of Stirling, the residence of King James during his minority In the beginning of 1578, he favoured the party which opposed the regent Morton, and at the instigation of that nobleman, the earl of Mar, in April of that year, seized upon the castle of Stirling, turned his uncle out of that fortress, and became master of the king's person Sir Alexander's eldest son, Alexander Erskine, died during the siege One account states that he was killed, according to another he died of grief for the indignity done to his father, in depriving him of the government of Stirling castle.

The same year, Sir Alexander was appointed governor of the castle of Edinburgh, sworn a privy councillor, and in 1580 he became vice-chamberlain of Scotland. He died before 1595 His portrait is in Pinkerton's Gallery of Scottish Portraits, from an original painting in possession of Erskine of Alva. He was twice married, but had issue only by his first wife, Margaret, only daughter of the fourth Lord Home.

three sons and three daughters. His third son, Sir George Erskine of Innerteil, was a lord of session from 15th March 1617 till his death in 1646.

Sir Thomas Erskine, the second but eldest surviving son, and first earl of Kellie, was born in 1566, the same year as James VI. With his younger brother, George, afterwards Lord Innerteil, he was educated with that monarch from his childhood, and in after life received many signal marks of his favour. In 1585 the king appointed him one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber. He was one of the king's retinue at Gowrie house, Perth, on 5th August, 1600, during the enactment of what is called the Gowrie conspiracy, and as James passed from the dining-room through the hall where his attendants were, he desired Sir Thomas Erskine to follow him After Alexander Ruthven had been stabbed by Sir John Ramsay, and thrown down the stairs by the king, his body was found by Erskine, Herries, and others, who speedily despatched him. With Herries and Ramsay he attempted to prevent the entrance of Gowrie and his armed servants into the apartment where the king was, and in the scuffle that ensued he was wounded in the hand For his conduct on this occasion, he received the third part of the lordship of Dirleton, belonging to Gowrie, by charter dated 15th November, 1600 In the following July he accompanied the duke of Lennox (son of Esme d'Aubigny, cousin of the king's father, Lord Darnley) in his embassy to France.

On King James' accession to the English throne in 1603, Sir Thomas Erskine was one of those whom he selected to attend him to London The same year he was appointed captain of the yeomen of the guard, in the room of Sir Walter Raleigh Three years afterwards he was, by patent, dated 18th May, 1606, created Viscount Fenton in the Scots peerage, (being the first person raised to that degree of nobility in Scotland,) to him and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to his heirs male whatsoever Besides other lands conferred on him at various times, he had charters of the barony of Kellie, in Fifeshire, 13th July 1613, and of that of Fentontower and Dirleton, united into the lordship of Fenton, 9th July 1618. The following year he was created earl of Kellie, in the Scots peerage, by patent dated 12th March 1619, to him and his heirs male, bearing the name of Erskine. Subsequently he was invested with the order of the Garter He died at London, 12th June 1639, in his 73d year With a daughter, he had one son, Alexander, Viscount Fenton, who predeceased him in February 1638, leaving, by his wife, Lady Anne Seton, eldest daughter of the first earl of Dunfermline, high chamberlain of Scotland, Thomas, second earl of Kellie, Alexander, third earl; Sir Charles Erskine of Cambo in Fife, baronet, the founder of that branch of the family, of whom immediately, another son, and three daughters.

The third son, Sir Charles Erskine, just mentioned, joined the royalists under Middleton in 1654, and was taken prisoner in the Braes of Angus, in November of that year Installed lord lyon king at arms, 25th September 1665, he was crowned by the earl of Rothes, his majesty's commissioner, and, on 20th August 1666, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, by Charles II Two years afterwards, he purchased, from Sir Thomas Morton, the estate of Cambo, parish of Kingsbarns, Fife, which originally belonged to the Camboes of that ilk. His only son, Sir Alexander Erskine of Cambo, second baronet, received the appointment of lord lyon, on his father's death in 1677, and was crowned king at arms at Holyrood-house, in presence of James, duke of Albany and York, his majesty's high commissioner, 27th July 1681 He was appointed joint-keeper of the signet in 1711, and chosen M.P. for the county of Fife, at the general election in 1713. In August 1715, when the earl of Mar landed on the Fife coast, to raise the clans for the Pretender, Sir Alexander Erskine joined him at Crail, with other friends of the Jacobite interest; and he was one of the persons summoned by the lord-advocate to appear at Edinburgh within a specified period, under the pain of a year's imprisonment and other penalties, to give bail for their allegiance to the government. He complied with the summons on the 17th September, and was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, but on the suppression of the rebellion he was released from custody, and died in 1735. He had six sons, three of whom, named Charles, John, and William, who all died unmarried, successively inherited the title and estate. The fourth son, David, predeceased his immediate elder brother, Sir William, the fifth baronet, leaving six sons. The eldest, Sir Charles, succeeded as sixth baronet in 1780 Thomas, the fifth son, became ninth earl of Kellie, and Methven, the youngest son, tenth earl. Sir Charles' eldest son, Sir William, succeeded as seventh baronet, and dying unmarried, his brother Sir Charles became eighth baronet, and subsequently eighth earl of Kellie.

Colin, the sixth and youngest son of Sir Alexander Erskine, lord lyon, went, when very young, to Rome to study painting, and marrying there a lady of distinction, he settled in that city, and had a son, Charles Erskine, born at Rome, 13th February, 1753, who was much patronised by Prince Charles Stuart. Admitted on the foundation of the Scots college at Rome, he studied the canon law under the first lawyers in Europe, and by Pope Pius VI was appointed to the office of Promotore della fide, commonly called the Avocato di Diavolo, it being the province of that officer to dispute the claims of the saints to canonization. In 1792 he was sent to England by the Pope, but though not recognised by the government in a public capacity, he was presented at court as a private gentleman In 1801 he was raised to the rank of cardinal deacon, and when the Pope (Pius VII) and his college were driven from Rome by the French in 1809, Cardinal Erskine went, like the others, to Paris, where he was compelled to reside till his death, on 19th March 1811 As he had been deprived of all his revenues, he was generously allowed by George III, a pension of £200 per annum.

To return to the earls of Kellie. Thomas, the second earl, succeeded his grandfather in 1639, and died, unmarried, 3d February 1643.

His brother, Alexander, succeeded as third earl. He was a staunch royalist, and colonel of foot for the counties of Fife and Kinross, in the 'Engagement,' for the rescue of Charles I in 1648. Indeed, his loyalty was so conspicuous that a patent was made out, creating him an English baron, but before it could pass the great seal the king was decapitated. Immediately after that event he waited on Charles II. at the Hague, and returned to Scotland on 12th June 1649, with the commissioners who had been sent by the Scots estates to the king in the previous month of March. He was with the army which marched with Charles, on his invasion of England in 1651, and having been taken prisoner after the battle of Worcester, was sent to the Tower of London. Although soon allowed to retire to the Continent, he was excepted out of Cromwell's act of grace and pardon in 1654, and deprived of great part of his extensive estates. After the restoration, he returned to Scotland, and died in May 1677 He married, first, Mary, daughter of Colonel Kilpatrick, governor of Bois-le-Duc in Holland, and by her had one daughter, Lady Anne, who became the wife of her cousin, Sir Alexander Erskine, second baronet, of Cambo, lord lyon king at arms. By a second wife, Mary, daughter of John Dalzell of Glenae, Dumfries-shire, he had, with a daughter, an only son, Alexander, fourth earl, who died 8th March, 1710. The latter married Lady Ann Lindsay, eldest daughter of the third earl of Balcarres, and had a son, Alexander, fifth earl of Kellie, and a daughter, Lady Jean, the wife of John Scott of Harden, and the mother of the celebrated beauty, Mary Scott. The fourth earl's widow took, for a second husband, James, Viscount Kingston, attainted after the rebellion of 1715.

Alexander, fifth earl, had very nearly lost his title and estates by joining Prince Charles at Edinburgh, after the battle of Preston, in 1745. Included in the act of attainder of the following year, he surrendered himself to the lord-justice-clerk at Edinburgh, 11th July 1746, and was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh. After having been detained there three years and a month, on 8th August 1749, he presented a petition to the high court of justiciary, praying to be brought to trial within sixty days, or to be set at liberty, a process which in Scotland is called "running a prisoner's letters." He was accordingly liberated on the 11th October He appears to have been a person of rather weak intellect. It is related of him that one morning during his confinement, he entered the room of his fellow-prisoners, with a list in his hand of the persons whom the government had resolved not to bring to trial, for their concern in the rebellion. This list commenced with his own name, and closed with that of a Mr William Fidler, who had been an auditor in the Scottish Exchequer "Oh! is it not a wise government," exclaimed the earl, "to begin wi' a fule, and end wi' a fiddler?" He died at Kellie, 3d April, 1756. Twice married, by his second wife, Janet, daughter of Dr Archibald Pitcairne, the celebrated Jacobite physician, poet, and wit, with three daughters, he had three sons, Thomas Alexander, sixth earl, called the musical earl of Kellie, a memoir of whom is given at page 181 of this volume, [this earl found himself under the necessity of selling the estate which gave him his highest title, but to gratify some of his relations he reserved Kellie castle and a few enclosed fields about it,] Archibald, seventh earl; and the Hon. Andrew Erskine, a minor poet, born about 1739 Having entered the army, he held a lieutenant's commission in the 71st regiment of foot as early as 1759 On its reduction in 1763, he exchanged from half pay into the 24th regiment of foot, then quartered at Gibraltar He had previously carried on a kind of literary correspondence, in verse as well as prose, with Mr James Boswell of Auchinleck, the friend and biographer of Johnson, which was published by Boswell at London, in 1763, in one volume 8vo. Mr Erskine was the author of the song beginning "How sweet this lone vale." He was a principal contributor to Donaldson's collection of 'Original Poems, by Scots Gentlemen,' published at Edinburgh, in 1760 and 1762, in two volumes 12mo. His 'Town Eclogues,' and other poems, appeared in 1773. Like his brother, Lord Kellie, he was remarkable for his social feelings and witty conversation He died suddenly in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh about the end of September 1793.

The daughters were, Lady Elizabeth, who married, first, the eminent antiquarian, Walter Macfarlane, of Macfarlane, and after his death, the fourth Lord Colville of Culross, Lady Jane, and Lady Janet, wife of Sir Robert Anstruther of Balcaskie, baronet, and mother of the gallant brigadier-general, Robert Anstruther, who fell a sacrifice to his unwearied exertions in bringing up the rear of the British army under Sir John Moore, in the disastrous retreat to Corunna in January 1809

Archibald, seventh earl, born at Kellie castle, 22d April 1736, entered the army when very young, and was major of the 11th regiment of foot on his accession to the title, on the death of his brother in 1781. In the following year he was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 104th foot, and soon after quitted the army, after serving for twenty-six years, and devoted himself chiefly to rural occupations. The known attachment of his family to the exiled house of Stuart is supposed to have retarded his promotion, as he was not raised to that rank in the army to which, by his long service, he was so well entitled. At the general election in 1790, he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers. To his unwearied exertions it was chiefly owing that, in 1792, the restraints which, by the acts of 1746 and 1748, had been imposed on the Scots episcopalians, were removed by act of parliament. He also used his utmost efforts to procure a modification of the penal laws affecting the Scots Roman Catholics, for which he received various medals, letters, and other testimonials of gratitude from the pope and other Italian ecclesiastics of high rank He died at Kellie, 8th May 1797, in his 62d year As he was unmarried, the title devolved on Sir Charles Erskine of Cambo, seventh baronet of Nova Scotia of that family, as above mentioned.

Charles, eighth earl of Kellie, was a captain in the Fifeshire light dragoons, and died at Folkestone in Kent, 28th October 1799, unmarried, aged 35 The titles then devolved on his uncle, Thomas, ninth earl, born about 1745, and appointed in 1775, British consul at Gottenburgh, Marstrand, and other ports on the western coast of Sweden. He was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, 14th November 1804, on a vacancy, and rechosen at the general election in 1807 The following year he was invested with the insignia of a knight commander of the royal Swedish order of Vasa. Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his brother, Methven, tenth earl of Kellie, upon whose death in 1829, without issue, the fifteenth earl of Mar, as heir-male general, claimed the earldom of Kellie, with the minor honours of Fenton and Dirleton, and his right was allowed by the House of Lords. (See MAR, earl of)

KEMP, a surname derived from the Saxon kemp, or campa, a soldier or warrior, especially one who engaged in single combat, also the combat itself, hence the Swedish name Kempenfelt (battle-field), the well-known name of the British admiral who was lost in the Royal George at Spithead in 1782, hence, also, the English camp, and the Spanish Campeador Through the French, we have the words champion and campaign, from the same root In some parts of Scotland the striving of reapers in the harvest field is still called kemping In the ballad of 'King Estmere' in Percy's Reliques, the words kempes and kemperye-men occur for soldiers or men-at-arms:

> 'They had not ridden scant a myle
> A myle forthe of the towne,
> But in did come the kynge of Spayne,
> With kempes many a one.
>
> Up then rose the kemperye-men,
> And loud they 'gan to crye,
> Ah! traytors, you have slayne our kynge,
> And therefore you shall die."

KEMP, GEORGE MEIKLE, a self-taught architect, the designer of Scott's monument at Edinburgh, was the son of a shepherd on the property of Mr.

Brown of Newhall, on the southern slope of the Pentland hills, which are partly in Peebles-shire, but chiefly in Mid Lothian. He was born about the beginning of the present century, and his love for architecture was first developed by the following circumstance In his tenth year, he was sent a message by Mr Brown to Roslin, about six miles from his birthplace, and the romantic castle and elegant chapel of that secluded village struck him with wonder, admiration, and delight After receiving but a common education, he was apprenticed to a joiner at the Red Scaur Head, near Eddlestone, Peebles-shire, and afterwards was employed as a journeyman with a millwright at Galashiels He used to relate that, on first going to the latter place, as he was wearily pursuing his way on foot along the banks of the Tweed, a carriage came up behind him near Ellbank tower, and drew up on the road beside him, when he observed that there was one gentleman inside The coachman, acting no doubt by the orders of the latter, asked him if he had far to go, and on learning that he was on his way to Galashiels, he desired him to jump up beside him, as the carriage was going thither The gentleman inside the carriage proved to be Sir Walter Scott, with whose name his own was afterwards brought into such remarkable association

While residing at Galashiels he had frequent opportunities of inspecting the ruined abbeys of Melrose and Jedburgh Subsequently he went to England, and worked there as a joiner for several years, never losing an opportunity of seeing any remains of Gothic architecture The writer of a short sketch of his life in Chambers' Journal (for April 21, 1838), to which we are chiefly indebted for these details, says that on one occasion, when settled somewhere in Lancashire, he walked fifty miles to York, spent a week in examining the famed minster of that city, and returned, as he went, on foot He afterwards removed to Glasgow, where he worked for four years, and spent much of his leisure in inspecting its fine old cathedral A few years afterwards he executed, at his own expense, a model design for its restoration, which was placed in the Museum at Glasgow A set of drawings, completed by him, were lithographed and privately circulated in a volume, with appropriate letterpress, at the expense of Mr. Archibald Maclellan, coachbuilder, of Glasgow, who died in 1853, and who was remarkable for his taste in architecture, though not professionally connected with the art With the view of seeing fresh specimens of architecture he went again to England, and amongst other structures, visited the cathedral of Canterbury

Having formed the design of travelling on the continent, for the purpose of examining the most celebrated Gothic erections in different countries; working at his trade, like the German craftsmen, as he went along, for his support, in 1824 he proceeded to Boulogne, and thence went, by Abbeville and Beauvais, to Paris, spending a few weeks in each place His skill in mill-machinery, and the anxiety of the French to obtain English workmen in that peculiar department, secured him employment wherever he went He began now, for the first time, to use the pencil, though he had never taken any lessons in drawing, but his enthusiasm overcame all difficulties, and he improved rapidly as he proceeded in his delineations.

After about a year's sojourn in France, he was recalled to Scotland, by intelligence of the commercial embarrassments of a near relative He subsequently endeavoured to begin business for himself as a joiner in Edinburgh, but the effort not succeeding, he resolved to relinquish the business altogether, and support himself by architectural drawing He had, in the meantime, studied drawing and perspective regularly and systematically, and about the year 1830 he proceeded to Melrose, and took three elaborate views, from various points, of its magnificent abbey, the architecture of which is the richest Gothic. These were purchased at a liberal price by Mr Thomas Hamilton, architect He was next employed by Mr Burn, another eminent architect of Edinburgh, to execute a model, upon a pretty large scale, of a splendid palace which he had designed for the duke of Buccleuch This occupied him about two years, and when completed, it was placed in the vestibule of the duke's palace at Dalkeith. An engraver of Edinburgh, named Johnston, who had projected a work on Scottish Cathedral antiquities, afterwards employed him to take some of the requisite drawings of ground-plans, elevations, and details, a task in which he engaged with the utmost enthusiasm

In 1836 premiums were offered for the best design for a monument at Edinburgh to Sir Walter Scott, and Kemp, at that time engaged in taking drawings and plans of the abbey of Kilwinning in Ayrshire, was induced to become a competitor, attaching to his design the assumed name of 'John Morvo,' adopted from an ancient inscription on Melrose Abbey, apparently over the builder's tomb

> "John Morvo sometime callit was I,
> In Paryse born certainlie,
> And had in kepyng al mason werk
> Santandroys, ye hie kirk
> Of Glasgow, Melros, and Paslay,
> Of Niddisdaill, and of Galway"

Out of fifty-four designs received by the committee, Kemp's was one of three most approved of, to each of which a prize of fifty guineas was awarded. The committee subsequently advertised for additional competing designs, and Mr Kemp having contributed a much improved edition of his first drawing, it was accordingly adopted by the committee The foundation-stone of the monument was laid 15th August 1840 This picturesque structure, which stands in Princes Street, Edinburgh, is in the form of an open cross or spire 180 feet in height, of beautiful proportions, in strict conformity with the purity in taste and style of Melrose Abbey, from which it is, in its details, derived Under the lower groined arch, in an open chamber, a sitting statue by Steell of Sir Walter Scott, in his plaid, with his dog Maida crouched beside him, in grey Carrara marble, is enshrined Kemp's name, till then obscure, at once became extensively known, and he was rapidly rising into employment as an architect when he was suddenly deprived of life, before his great work, the Scott monument, was half finished On the evening of Wednesday the 6th of March, 1844, he had proceeded along the Union canal, to meet some boats on their way with stones from the quarry for the monument, when, missing his footing in the darkness of the night, he fell into the canal, and was drowned. His body was not found till the following Monday. He was buried, on the 22d of the same month, in the West church burying-ground, Edinburgh, and his funeral was attended from his house at Morningside, by a very numerous and respectable portion of his fellow-citizens, including the magistracy of the city, several members of the presbytery of Edinburgh, the Celtic lodge of freemasons, and many of the members of the Scott monument committee Upwards of a thousand gentlemen were present at his grave. He left a widow and four children, the eldest a boy of ten years of age

In his deportment Mr Kemp was shy and unobtrusive, but among his personal friends he displayed a rich flow of conversation In the ancient poetry of Scotland he was deeply versant, and occasionally wrote verses himself, which were said to evince considerable merit

The Scott monument was not completed till after his death It cost £15,650, and combines the beauties of the most admired specimens of the great crosses of the middle ages In the niches are sandstone statues of some of the more prominent personages in the works of the great novelist in honour of whose memory it has been erected The four principal arches supporting the central tower resemble those of the transept of a Gothic cathedral, and the lowest arches in the diagonal abutments are copied from the narrow north aisle of Melrose abbey The statue of Scott, fully appreciable for its beauty as a work of art, and for its correctly imagined representation of Sir Walter, is canopied by a grove roof, copied from the compartment, still entire, of the roof of Melrose choir In many of the details, capitals of pillars, canopies of niches, mouldings, and pinnacles, the celebrated abbey, so much frequented and so enthusiastically admired by Walter in his lounges around Abbotsford, have been freely followed as a model Of all the numerous "monuments of fame" which Edinburgh contains, none is so highly ornamental or so appropriate to the city as this lofty and superb structure

KEMP, KENNETH TREASURER, an expert practical chemist, was born in Edinburgh 7th April 1805 His father was a respectable clothier in that city, and he was named after his mother, whose family name was Treasurer He early directed his attention to the study of chemistry, in the practical departments of which he proved himself an original and daring investigator. He became a lecturer on practical chemistry first in Surgeon's Square, and afterwards in the university of Edinburgh, and in experiments on the theory of combustion and the liquefaction of the gases, he was eminently successful Of these interesting preparations he made a brilliant display before the British association at its meetings in Edinburgh in 1836 He was the first chemist who, in this country, succeeded in solidifying carbonic acid gas In his enthusiasm and firm faith in the yet undiscovered facts of chemical science, he was accustomed to set forth to his students that they might yet see him perambulating the streets of his native city, with a stick of hydrogen gas in his hand; in other words, that he would solidify the lightest gas in nature This, however, he did not live to accomplish

Electricity and magnetism, in all their forms and combinations, constituted a favourite portion of his studies, and to him galvanic electricity is indebted for the introduction of the amalgamated zinc plates into galvanic batteries, an improvement by which the agency of that powerful fluid can be modified and sustained almost at pleasure, a discovery so important as to call forth the following testimony from Mr Alfred Smee, the well-known electrician "Let us never forget to whom we owe this discovery, which of itself enables galvanic batteries to be used in the arts. Ages to come will, perhaps, have to thank the inventor, whom we are too apt to forget, yet, still the obligation from the public to Mr Kemp is the same." He was also the discoverer of several new chemical compounds, the details of which were published in Jameson's New Philosophical Journal and other scientific periodicals of the time. Energetic in the pursuit of his favourite studies, and acute, to an unusual degree, in his perception of the principles of science, he gave an impetus to chemical research in his native country, to which the great advancement then and after made in it, may be chiefly ascribed.

Mr. Kemp died of an aneurism, on 28th November 1842, aged only 36, and was buried in the new Greyfriars churchyard, Edinburgh, where a tablet was erected to his memory. He was succeeded in the lecture-room by his brother, Mr. Alexander Kemp, who was lecturer on practical chemistry in the university of Edinburgh, from that time till his own death, which took place at Edinburgh, 30th April 1854, at the early age of 32. He, too, was distinguished by his extensive knowledge of chemistry, by his improving and inventing chemical apparatus, as well as by a thorough acquaintance with mechanical philosophy. He contributed numerous papers to the scientific journals of the day, and was a member of the Royal Society of Edinburgh

KENMURE, Viscount of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1633, on Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, descended from William de Gordon, second son of Sir Adam Gordon of Gordon, ancestor of the dukes of Gordon (see page 317 of this volume). This William de Gordon, (charter by Randolph, earl of Moray, confirmed by Robert I., in 1315,) obtained from his father the barony of Stitchell in Roxburghshire, as also the lands of Glenkens, in the northern district of the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, comprehending Lochinvar, Kenmure, &c., which had previously belonged to the Balliols the Douglases, and the Maxwells of Caerlaverock. They were acquired by his father from John de Maxwell in 1297. William Gordon appears to have been engaged against King David II, as a remission was granted May 9, 1354, by William, Lord Douglas, to William Gordon, and all his followers in Galloway, receiving them into the peace of the king He died about 1570 The eldest of his four sons, Roger de Gordon of Stitchell, as one of the hostages for Archibald earl of Douglas, superior of Galloway, in 1408 got letters of safe-conduct to go into England for that purpose. He had two sons, Roger de Gordon, who died about 1442, and Adam Gordon of Holm, ancestor of the Gordons of Craig.

Roger's son, William de Gordon, designed of Stitchell and Lochinvar, the first of the family who settled in Galloway, died about 1450 From this period the family gradually acquired, by grant, purchase, or marriage, the greater part of the lands in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. William de Gordon had four sons, and a daughter, married to Sir Thomas Maclellan of Bombie. Sir John, the eldest son, inherited the estates, and died about the end of 1512. Alexander, the second son, was ancestor of the Gordons of Aird, afterwards of Earlston, and from Roger, the youngest son, descended the Gordons of Craigo. With two daughters, Sir John had four sons. Sir Robert, his second son, was the eighth laird of Lochinvar William, the third son, was ancestor of the Gordons of Culvennan, and those of Grange and Balmeg.

Sir Alexander Gordon of Lochinvar, the eldest son, fell at the battle of Flodden, about a year after succeeding to the family estates. His only child, Janet Gordon, claimed her father's lands, but after a long process before the lords of council, she was obliged to renounce her right to her uncle, Sir Robert, who obtained from her a charter of the lands and baronies of Kenmure, Lochinvar, &c., 10th May 1516. He had a grant of the clerkship of the stewartry of Kirkcudbright and sheriffdom of Wigton, for his life, with power to officiate by deputies, and died about 1520.

His eldest son, Sir James Gordon of Lochinvar, had the appointment of king's chamberlain for the lordship of Galloway, for five years, by writ, dated 16th March 1528, and by another writ, dated 13th April 1537 he was constituted governor of the town and castle of Dumbarton, and chamberlain of that lordship. With Sir James Douglas of Drumlanrig, and thirty-seven others, he had in 1529, a remission for the slaughter of Thomas Maclellan of Bombie on the High Street of Edinburgh. In 1536, he was one of those selected to accompany King James V on his matrimonial expedition to France. He fell at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September, 1547.

His eldest son, Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, was in 1555 appointed justiciary of the lordship of Galloway He was a steady adherent of Queen Mary, and incurred considerable danger in her cause. In 1567, however, he signed the bond of association in support of the young king, James VI. He had several sons, and his two grandsons by his fourth son, became third and fourth viscounts of Kenmure. The eldest son, Sir Robert Gordon of Lochinvar, is described as having been one of the strongest and most active men of his time. As a border chieftain he distinguished himself both against the English and the men of Annandale, who, when the former drove away their cattle, were in the habit of supplying their losses by plundering, in their turn, their neighbours in Galloway Having gone to court, he was appointed one of the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber At a tournament proclaimed by his majesty, Sir Robert Gordon was one of the three successful champions, to whom prizes were delivered by the princess Elizabeth, afterwards the unfortunate queen of Bohemia. He died in November 1628, leaving two sons and two daughters.

The elder son, Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, when Charles I conferred honours and titles on many of his principal Scottish subjects, to grace his coronation at Edinburgh, in 1633, was on 8th May that year created viscount of Kenmure and Lord Lochinvar, by patent, to him and his heirs male whatsoever, bearing the name and arms of Gordon. Of this nobleman a memoir is given at p. 333 of this volume. Among other favours conferred upon him by that monarch was the charter, dated 15th January 1629, of a royal burgh, afterwards called New Galloway, within limits on his estate, where no houses had then been erected. He is celebrated for his intimacy with the famous presbyterian ministers John Welch and Samuel Rutherford, and for the tone of deep piety which marked the closing scenes of his life. His only son, John, second viscount of Kenmure, dying under age and unmarried, in August 1639, was succeeded by his cousin, John, son of James Gordon of Barncrosh and Buittle, fourth son of Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, justiciary of Galloway

John, third viscount, also died unmarried, in October 1643, aged 28, and was succeeded by his brother, Robert, fourth viscount, born in November 1622. He suffered many hardships on account of his attachment to the king's cause, and was excepted out of Cromwell's act of grace and pardon in 1654. At the Restoration he went to court, and married a lady there in 1661 The same year he returned to Scotland, and died at Greenlaw, without issue, in 1663, when the title devolved on the heir male, Alexander Gordon of Pennygame, fourth in descent from William Gordon of Pennygame, second son of Sir James Gordon of Lochinvar, the ninth of that family

Alexander, fifth viscount of Kenmure, visited the abdicated monarch, James VII., at St. Germains, but was not well treated there. He died in August 1698. His only son, William, sixth viscount, took an active part in the rebellion of 1715, and was the hero of the stirring ballad beginning,

"O Kenmure's on and awa, Willie,
O Kenmure's on and awa,
And Kenmure's lord's the bravest lord,
That ever Galloway saw"

He had received a commission from the earl of Mar to raise the Jacobites in the south of Scotland, and first appeared in arms, at the head of 150 horse, on the 11th October, at Moffat, where he proclaimed the chevalier as James VIII. Next day he proceeded to Lochmaben, where he also proclaimed the Pretender He advanced within two miles of Dumfries, but being informed that great preparations were made to receive him, he did not venture to enter the town, but for some days kept a body of rebel troops on Amisfield moor, ready for action, to the dismay of the loyal burgesses. He next marched to Ecclefechan, where he was joined by Sir Patrick Maxwell of Springkell, with fourteen horsemen, and thence to Langholm, and afterwards to Hawick, where he proclaimed the Chevalier On the 17th October he marched to Jedburgh, and there also proclaimed him. He next intended to proceed to Kelso, for the same purpose, but learning that that town was well protected, he crossed the border, and joined the rebel army under Forster, in Northumberland. Returning with Forster's forces and his own united, he took possession of Kelso, on the 22d October, and was joined there, the same afternoon, by a large party of Highlanders, under Brigadier Macintosh of Borlum Of these troops Lord Kenmure had the command while in Scotland, although, from his mild and gentle disposition and non military experience, altogether unqualified for such a post. With the rebel forces he marched into England, and was present at the battle of Preston in Lancashire, on 13th November of the same year On the defeat of the rebels and their surrender at discretion, he was conveyed a prisoner to the Tower of London His trial for high treason took place before the House of Lords on 19th January 1716, when he pleaded guilty, and on 9th February, with the other rebel lords he received sentence of death, and his estates and titles were forfeited to the crown On the morning of the 24th February, he was beheaded on Towerhill, after the earl of Derwentwater had undergone the same fate. He was attended on the scaffold by several friends and two clergymen of the Church of England, of which church he was a member He displayed great firmness and resolution, and observed that he had so little thought of dying so soon that he had not provided a black suit, that he was sorry for this, as he might have died with more decency He expressed his regret for pleading guilty to the charge of high treason, and prayed for "King James." He presented the executioner with eight guineas, and on laying his head on the block, that functionary struck it off at two blows. Shortly after, a letter which he had written to the Chevalier was published, wherein he expressed his hope that the cause for which he died would flourish after his death, and maintained the title of "the person called the Pretender, whom he believed to be the true son of James the Second."

The widowed viscountess of Kenmure (Lady Mary Dalzell, only sister of the sixth earl of Carnwath, also forfeited in 1716) was a lady of great spirit, and like her family, warmly attached to the house of Stuart. It is said that it was by her importunities that her husband was led to engage in the enterprise, and the tradition of the Glenkens still records that, on the ominous morning when he left Kenmure castle, his charger, till then remarkable for its docility, thrice refused to allow him to mount. After his execution she hastened down to Scotland by herself, and reached Kenmure castle in time to secure the principal papers of her husband. When the estates were exposed for sale, she, with the assistance of some friends, was enabled to purchase them, and being an excellent manager, by the time her eldest son, Robert, came of age, she delivered them over to him unincumbered, reserving only a small annuity to herself. He died, unmarried, 10th August, 1741, in his 28th year His mother, the dowager viscountess, died at Terregles, 16th August, 1776, having survived her husband sixty-one years.

John Gordon of Kenmure, the second but eldest surviving son, by courtesy eighth viscount, was an officer in the army, and died at Liverpool, 16th June 1769, aged 56. By his wife, Lady Frances Mackenzie, only daughter of the fifth earl of Seaforth, he had five sons and a daughter The two youngest sons died unmarried. The others were, William Gordon of Kenmure, a captain in the first or royal Scots regiment of foot, by courtesy ninth viscount of Kenmure, who died at Minorca, 7th February 1772, unmarried; John, by courtesy tenth viscount; and Adam, an officer in the army, and afterwards collector of the customs at Portpatrick, who died 17th December 1806. The latter married Miss Davies, an English lady, and had five sons and a daughter Four of his sons died unmarried. Adam, the second son, succeeded his uncle John, as eleventh viscount.

John Gordon of Kenmure, the second out eldest surviving son of the eighth viscount, born in 1750, was a captain in the 17th foot, and in 1784 was chosen M P. for the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, but vacated his seat two years afterwards. On 17th June 1784, he was restored by act of parliament to the forfeited honours of his family He died, without issue, 21st September 1840, in his 91st year, and was succeeded by his nephew above mentioned, Adam, a lieutenant R. N He was a midshipman of the Ajax in Sir Richard Calder's action with the French fleet off Cape Finistere, in 1805, and at Trafalgar soon after He served also in the Seahorse at the capture of a Turkish frigate in 1808, and at the taking of the islands of Pianosa and Zenuta. He also displayed great gallantry on the American lakes, during the war with the United States in 1813 He was 11th viscount in succession, but owing to the attainder of 1716, only the eighth in the enjoyment of the title. He died, without issue, in 1847, when the title became dormant.

KENNEDY, a surname, conjectured by some to be derived from Ken, or cen (Gaelic Caen) a head, with the affix "edy," and signifying together head of the family The ancestor of the noble Ayrshire family of Cassillis, (now Ailsa) in the 13th century, was Roland de Carrick, chief of his name, and his great-grandson, Sir John Kennedy of Dunure, was the first to assume that surname, instead of Carrick. (See CASSILLIS, earl of, vol. i. pp. 601, 602.)

Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i p. 161) is of opinion that the Kennedys had an Irish origin, and that they sprung from the old thanes of Garrick, long before the Bruces held the title of earl thereof. In the eighth century, Kennedy, father of Brian Boru, was prince of Connaught, and in 850, Kennethe was thane of Carrick. In that district and in Galloway, where the Kennedys had, at one time, extensive possessions, the surname Kennedy is to this day pronounced Kennettie.

The surname, however, is more likely to be derived from the Saxon than the Gaelic, there being the words Kennen, to know, and König, king, in the German language, as well as numerous Saxon names beginning with Ken, such as Kenulf, Kenelm, Kenred, &c. The name Kenneth, the probable root of Kennedy, is purely Gothic, and the same as Kinaf, that of one of the founders of the Russian empire, ch in Russian being pronounced f. [Pinkerton's Enquiry, vol. ii. p. 156.]

Some affirm that the first of this surname who settled in Carrick, which then formed a portion of Galloway, was a second son of Maclean of the Isles, but there is no other ground for this supposition than that, like the Macleans, the Kennedys carry three crosslets in their armorial bearings. It is probable that they were introduced into Ayrshire in 836 by Kenneth Macalpine, who united the Picts and the Scots into one people. In the reign of William the Lion, Henry Kennedy assisted Gilbert, eldest son of Fergus, lord of Galloway, in his wars both against that monarch, and his own brother Uchtred. This Fergus was the direct ancestor, in the third degree, of Marjory, countess of Carrick, the mother of Robert the Bruce. In the Ragman Roll, among those who swore allegiance to Edward I in 1296, are several of the name of Kennedy

Of this surname there are several ancient families. The Kennedys of Knocknalling, Ayrshire, are in possession of title deeds, the dates of which range back as far as 1476.

The family of Kennedy of Knockgray, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, is descended from the Rev Alexander Kennedy, born in 1663, who acquired that estate. He was minister of Straiton, Ayrshire, and chaplain to the seventh earl of Cassillis, at whose funeral he officiated in 1701, when he is said to have exorcised the devil, who had settled on the coffin in the shape of a black crow! His great-great-granddaughter, Anne, married, 10th September 1781, John Clark, Esq of Nunland, also in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and their eldest son, Colonel Alexander Clark Kennedy, succeeded, in 1835, to the estate of Knockgray An honourable augmentation was granted to his arms, in commemoration of his having, when in command of the centre squadron of the Royal dragoons at the battle of Waterloo, captured the eagle and colours of the 105th regiment of French infantry with his own hand.

KENNEDY, JAMES, a learned and munificent prelate of the Roman Catholic church, and founder of the college of St Salvator, at St. Andrews, was the younger son of James Kennedy of Dunure, by his wife, the countess of Angus, daughter of Robert III, and was born about 1405 or 1406 Entering into holy orders, he was, in 1437, preferred by his uncle, James I., to the see of Dunkeld, with which he held in commendam the abbey of Scone On the death of Bishop Wardlaw, in April 1440, he was advanced to the diocese of St. Andrews. In 1444 he was constituted lord high chancellor, an office which he resigned in a few weeks He was intrusted with the charge and education of James III, and during that prince's minority, he acted as one of the lords of the regency, when, such was his acknowledged wisdom, prudence, and integrity, that the chief management of public affairs devolved upon him. He died May 10, 1466, and was interred in the collegiate church of St. Andrews, in the precincts of St. Salvator, which college he founded in 1456, and liberally endowed for the maintenance of a provost, four regents, and eight poor scholars or bursars. He is said to have written some political advices, entitled 'Monita Politica,' and a 'History of his Own Times,' both of which are supposed to be lost.

KENNEDY, WALTER, a poet of the sixteenth century, styled by Douglas 'The Greit Kennedy,' is principally known by his 'Flyting' with his brother bard Dunbar, and by two short pieces, the one entitled 'Invective against Mouth-Thankless,' contained in the Evergreen, and the other, 'Prais of Age,' published, with a high commendatory opinion, by Lord Hailes All his other poems have, unfortunately, perished He was a native of the district of Carrick, and belonged to the ecclesiastical order Dunbar, in his 'Lament for the Death of the Makkaris,' mentions him to have been on his death-bed at the time that poem was written It is probable he died soon after

KENNEDY, JOHN, M D, a physician and antiquary of some repute in his day, was a native of Scotland, but very little is known of his personal history He resided some years in Smyrna, and was a great collector of antiquities, particularly coins, which were sold by auction after his death He wrote a 'Dissertation on the Coins of Carausius,' of which 256 were in his own possession In this publication, which appeared in 1756, he maintained that Oriuna was that emperor's guardian goddess, which led to a foolish controversy with Dr Stukeley, who affirmed that she was his wife Dr. Kennedy died in 1760

KER, or KERR, a word signifying strength, the English form of which is Carr, the surname of two noble families of Anglo-Norman lineage, Roxburghe and Lothian, descended from two brothers, Ralph and Robert, sons of the family of Kerr of Kerrshall in Lancashire, originally of the Kerrs of Normandy, who came over at the Conquest Which of the brothers was the elder has not been ascertained. They are said to have come to Scotland in the 13th century, and settling in Roxburghshire became the founders of two separate races of warlike border chieftains, the Kerrs of Fernichirst and the Kerrs of Cessford. Of the former the marquis of Lothian is the male representative, (see LOTHIAN, Marquis of,) and of the latter the duke of Roxburghe is the head, (see ROXBURGHE, Duke of)

Several barons of this name appear in the Ragman Roll as having sworn fealty to Edward I in 1296.

KER, JOHN, third duke of Roxburghe, a celebrated bibliomaniac, was born in London April 28, 1740, and succeeded his father, the second duke, in 1755. Having acquired an extraordinary taste for old publications, he formed the largest private collection of rare and curious books in the kingdom He died, unmarried, March 19, 1804, and was buried at Bowden, near Melrose. The public sale of his extensive library, which consisted of nearly ten thousand books, and was particularly rich in old romances of chivalry and early English poetry, took place in May 1812, and created an unprecedented excitement among book collectors The catalogue was made out principally by Mr G Nichol, bookseller to the king The prices paid for some of the works were enormous A copy of the first edition of the Decameron of Boccaccio, printed at Venice by Valdarfar, in 1471, was bought by the marquis of Blandford, afterwards duke of Marlborough, for £2,260 sterling, a copy of the first work printed by Caxton, with a date, 'Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye,' (1461, folio,) was sold for one thousand guineas, and a copy of the first edition of Shakspeare, (1623, folio,) for one hundred guineas In commemoration of this event, the Roxburghe club, was formed for the collection of rare books, the preservation of curious MSS, and the reprint of scarce and curious tracts, for the use of the members of the club

KERR, SIR ROBERT, afterwards earl of Ancrum, an accomplished poet and courtier, descended from Sir Andrew Kerr of Fernichurst, in Roxburghshire, was the direct male ancestor of the present noble family of Lothian, and was born about 1578 He succeeded to the family estate on the assassination of his father in 1609, and was one of the ordinary gentlemen of the bedchamber, who attended James VI on his accession to the English throne In 1619 he became involved in a quarrel which arose between the Maxwells and Johnstones, respecting the wardenship of the western marches, and having received a challenge from Charles Maxwell, he unfortunately slew his antagonist in the duel that followed, and was, in consequence, brought to trial for murder at Cambridge, but acquitted The king, however, showed his displeasure by banishing him from court, on which he went over to the Continent, where he formed a collection of paintings, which he afterwards made a present of to Prince Charles. Through the intercession of some of his friends, he was at length recalled, and restored to his place at court.

On the accession of Charles I in 1625, he was promoted to be a lord of the bedchamber, and in 1633 was raised to the peerage, by the titles of earl of Ancrum, and Lord Kerr of Nisbet, &c. (see vol. i of this work, page 122) During the ensuing civil commotions, his lordship continued steadfast in his loyalty and attachment to King Charles, and on the execution of that unfortunate monarch, he was compelled to take refuge in Holland, where, after being reduced to great poverty, he died in 1654 His portrait is subjoined

The only specimen of his poetical powers extant is a beautiful 'Sonnet in Praise of a Solitary Life,' addressed to Drummond of Hawthornden, in 1624, which, with a letter accompanying it, is printed in the works of that poet. The infamous favourite of James VI., Robert Kerr, or Carr, created earl of Somerset, was the cousin of the subject of this notice.

KERR, ROBERT, a miscellaneous writer and translator, was born in Roxburghshire in 1755. His father, Mr. James Kerr of Bughtridge, was a jeweller in Edinburgh, and M.P. for the city, and his mother was the daughter of Lord Charles Kerr, second son of the first marquis of Lothian. After receiving his classical education at the High School, he studied medicine at the university of Edinburgh; and, on being admitted a member of the college of surgeons, he entered into partnership with a Mr Wardrope, whose daughter he afterwards married In 1794 he purchased and undertook the management of a paper-mill at Ayton, in Berwickshire, by which he lost a considerable sum of money, and became much reduced in circumstances. He died October 11, 1813, leaving one son, a captain in the navy, and two married daughters

KILMARNOCK, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland (attainted in 1746, and now represented by the earl of Errol) conferred in 1661, on William, ninth Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock, descended from Sir Robert Boyd, the fourth of the name, one of the first associates of King Robert the Bruce (see BOYD, surname of, vol. i. of this work, page 364). The first Lord Boyd, the fifth in descent from this Sir Robert, was the son of Sir Thomas Boyd, who slew Sir Alan Stewart of Darnely, and was himself slain in revenge by Sir Alan's brother, Alexander Stewart, in 1439. The son was created a baron, by the title of Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock, by James II. His great abilities raised him to the highest offices in the state. In 1459 he was one of the noblemen sent to Newcastle, to obtain the prolongation of the truce with England, which had just then expired. On the death of James II. Lord Boyd was made justiciary, and one of the lords of the regency, during the minority of James III. His younger brother, Sir Alexander Boyd of Duncow, was appointed to teach military exercises and accomplishments to the young king; and though the latter was not more than twelve years old, he began to instil into his mind that he was now capable of governing without the help of guardians and tutors, and that he ought to free himself from their restraint. This was done with the view of transferring the whole power of the state to Lord Boyd and himself from the other regents. The king readily consented to what was proposed, and being at Linlithgow at the time, it was necessary to have him removed to Edinburgh, to take upon himself the regal government, which the Boyds effected, partly by force, and partly by stratagem. To protect themselves from the consequences, Lord Boyd and his brother prevailed upon James to call a parliament at Edinburgh in October 1466, in which his lordship fell down on his knees before the king on the throne, and in an elaborate harangue, complained of the hard construction put upon his majesty's removal from Linlithgow, and that his enemies threatened that the advisers of that affair should one day be brought to punishment, and humbly besought the king to declare his own sense and pleasure thereupon. His majesty consulted a little with the lords, and then replied, that the Lord Boyd was not his adviser, but rather his companion in that journey, and, therefore, that he was more worthy of a reward for his courtesy, than of punishment for his obsequiousness or compliance therein, and thus he was willing to declare in a public decree of the Estates, in which provision would be made that this matter should never be prejudicial to the Lord Boyd or his companions. At his lordship's desire, this decree was registered in the acts of the Assembly, and confirmed by letters patent under the great seal. At the same time the king, by advice of his council, granted him letters patent, constituting him sole regent, and he had the safety of the king, his brothers, sisters, towns, castles, and all the jurisdiction over his subjects committed to him, till his majesty arrived at the age of twenty-one years. The nobles then present solemnly bound themselves to be assistant to Lord Boyd and his brother in all their public acts, under the penalty of punishment, if they failed to perform their pledge, and to this stipulation the king also subscribed. Lord Boyd was now made lord great chamberlain. His son, Sir Thomas Boyd, received the Princess Mary, the late king's eldest daughter, in marriage, and was soon after created earl of Arran.

A marriage having been about this time concluded by ambassadors sent into Denmark for that purpose, between the young king of Scotland, and Margaret, a daughter of the Danish king, the earl of Arran was selected to go over to Denmark, to act as his brother-in-law James' proxy in espousing the princess, and to conduct her to Scotland. In the beginning of the autumn of 1469, he accordingly set sail for Denmark, with a proper convoy, and a noble train of friends and followers. The lord chamberlain, the earl's father, and his uncle, Sir Alexander Boyd, being at this time also absent from court, the occasion was taken advantage of by their enemies to ruin them with the king.

The Kennedys particularly showed themselves active against them. Their enmity arose from the following circumstance: The Boyds having, on the 10th of July 1466, when the king was sitting in the Exchequer at Linlithgow, ordered a hunting match for his majesty, they, with some other friends, instead of following the chase, turned into the road leading to Edinburgh, in which they had not gone far, before Gilbert Lord Kennedy rode up, and laying his hand upon the bridle of the king's horse, requested James to return to Linlithgow, bidding him beware of those guides who thus treasonably attempted to carry him away. But the Boyds thought that the possession of the king's person would guard them from the penalty of the law, and Sir Alexander Boyd, as if he meant to resent the insult offered to the king, after some angry words, gave the Lord Kennedy a blow with his hunting staff, who thereupon quitted his hold of the bridle, and left them to pursue their journey to Edinburgh. But he never forgave the blow he had received, and he eagerly availed himself of the first opportunity that offered to avenge it.

He now represented to the king that the Lord Boyd had abused his power during his majesty's minority, and described the lord chamberlain as an ambitious, aspiring man, guilty of the highest offences, and capable of the worst of villanies; he thus succeeded in exciting the fears of the king, who was easily prevailed upon to sacrifice not only the earl of Arran, but all his family, to the resentment of their enemies.

At the request of the faction adverse to them, the king summoned the Estates of parliament to meet at Edinburgh, November 20, 1469, before which Lord Boyd, his son, the earl of Arran, though absent on the king's service in Denmark, and his brother, Sir Alexander Boyd of Duncow, were summoned to appear, to give an account of their administration, and answer such charges as should be brought forward against them. Lord Boyd, astonished at this sudden turn of affairs, had recourse to arms, but finding it impossible to stand against his enemies, he made his escape into England. His brother, Sir Alexander, being then sick, and trusting to his own integrity, was brought before the Estates, where he, the Lord Boyd, and his son, the earl of Arran, were indicted for high treason, for having laid hands on the king, and carried him from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, in 1466. Sir Alexander alleged, in his defence, that he and his relatives had not only obtained, in a public convention, the king's pardon for that offence, but that, by a subsequent act of parliament, it was declared a good and loyal service on their part. No regard, however, was paid either to the pardon he had received, or to the act of parliament he referred to; because they had been obtained by the Boyds when they were in power, and masters of the king's person. Being found guilty of high treason by a jury of lords and barons, Sir Alexander Boyd was condemned to lose his head on the castlehill of Edinburgh, which sentence was executed accordingly. The Lord Boyd did not long survive his great reverse of fortune, as his death took place at Alnwick in 1470.

The earl of Arran, though absent on state business, was declared a public enemy, and his estates were confiscated. His affairs were in this situation when he arrived in the Frith of Forth from Denmark with the young queen. Before he landed he received intelligence of the wreck and ruin of his family, and he resolved to return to Denmark. Without staying to attend the ceremonial of the queen's landing, he set sail with his wife in one of the Danish convoy ships; and on his arrival at Denmark was received with the honours becoming his high birth. Thence he travelled through Germany into France, and went to pay a visit to Charles duke of Burgundy, who received him most graciously, and being then at war with his rebellious subjects, the exiled lord offered his services, which his highness readily accepted. While he remained at the duke of Burgundy's court, he had a son and a daughter born to him by his countess. But the king her brother recalled his sister to Scotland; and fearing that she would not be induced to leave her husband, he caused other persons to write to her, giving her hopes that his anger towards him might yet be appeased, if she would come over and plead for him in person. Flattered by these hopes, she returned to Scotland, where she was no sooner arrived than the king urged her to sue for a divorce from her husband, cruelly detained her from going back to him, and caused public citations, attested by witnesses, to be fixed up at Kilmarnock, the seat of the Boyds, wherein Thomas earl of Arran was commanded to appear within sixty days; which he not doing, his marriage with the king's sister was declared null and void, and a divorce granted, according to Buchanan, the earl being absent and unheard. The Lady Mary was afterwards compelled by the king to marry James Lord Hamilton, but it is not certain whether this second marriage took place before or after the earl of Arran's death, which occurred in 1474, at Antwerp, where he was honourably interred.

James, only son of Thomas Boyd, earl of Arran, was restored to the estates of his family in 1482, and died in 1484

Alexander, the second son of the first Lord Boyd, was made baillie and chamberlain of Kilmarnock for the crown in 1505 He had three sons, Robert, restored to the title of Lord Boyd in 1536, Thomas, ancestor of the Boyds of Pitcon, and Adam, progenitor of the Boyds of Pinkhill and Trochrig.

The eldest son, Robert, Lord Boyd, had a confirmation from Queen Mary, of all the estates, honours, and dignities that had belonged to Robert, Lord Boyd, his grandfather

His son, Robert, fourth Lord Boyd, was one of the promoters of the Reformation in Scotland, and in the movements that followed acted a principal part. But he did not go without his reward, for between him and Glencairn, Henry Balnaves divided 500 of the crowns which he had received from England, for the assistance of the party besieged in the castle of St. Andrews, after the assassination of Cardinal Bethune. Joining Moray and Argyle, when they took up arms in 1565, on occasion of Queen Mary's marriage with Darnley, he was obliged to retire to England, and was denounced rebel in September of that year After the murder of Rizzio, he returned, with the other lords, and received a full pardon He was one of the assize who acquitted Bothwell for the assassination of Darnley, and he signed the bond said to have been given to him by several of the nobility, approving of his project to marry the queen In Bothwell's declaration, quoted by Keith, he is stated to have been accessory to Darnley's murder Though made a privy councillor after Bothwell's marriage to the queen, he joined the association for the protection of the prince. He soon, however, returned to the queen's party, and betrayed to them the confederacy of the nobility He was with Huntly and his faction at Edinburgh when the associated lords attacked the city on 12th June 1567, but being unable to raise the citizens in the queen's cause, they were forced to take refuge in the castle In the following August he began to negotiate with the regent, Moray, and being shortly after reconciled to him, was appointed one of his privy councillors.

On Mary's escape from Lochleven, he joined her at Hamilton, and fought for her cause at the battle of Langside. He was one of the commissioners on her part at York and Westminster, and made many visits to her in England. According to Chalmers (Life of Mary, vol. ii p. 242), he procured from Bothwell in 1569 his consent to a dissolution of their ill-fated marriage, and was the bearer of Mary's letter to her brother, Regent Moray, requesting that steps should be taken for having it annulled, preparatory to her intended union with Norfolk

On a visit to the unfortunate Mary in 1571, he received from her a commission to establish lieutenants in her name; but the same year he joined the party of the regent Lennox He was present at the election of the earl of Mar as regent, and was chosen one of his privy council. On 8th September that year, he had a remission to himself and his two sons for their fighting against the king at Langside, and all other crimes. He was one of the noblemen employed in carrying through the well-known pacification of Perth in February 1573, and by one of its conditions, "the commendator of Newbottle, the justice clerk, and Lord Boyd were appointed sole judges beneath the Forth, in all actions of restitution of goods spulzied in the late troubles." He was appointed by the regent Morton an extraordinary lord of session, 24th October, 1573 On Morton's resignation in 1578, Lord Boyd went to his assistance, and strongly remonstrated with him for having relinquished the regency On the 8th of May the same year, he was removed from his seat on the bench, but on 15th July following was re-appointed a privy councillor, a visitor of the university of Glasgow, and a commissioner for examining the book of the policie of the kirk, and settling its jurisdiction, and on 25th October was restored to his place on the bench In 1578 he was one of the commissioners for a treaty with England, and again in 1586

After Morton's return to power, he assisted him in his attempts to apprehend the Lords John and Claud Hamilton, and in the excesses which in May 1579 he committed against their property On 10th November following he was appointed a member of the new privy council In 1582 he was engaged in the Raid of Ruthven, and on James' recovering his freedom in the following year was only pardoned on condition that he should leave the country and retire to France. On his return he was restored to his seat on the bench 22d June 1586, but resigned it on 4th July 1588, and died 3d January 1590, in his 72d year

His son, Thomas, fifth Lord Boyd, fought with his father and brother on Queen Mary's side at Langside, and having been predeceased by his son, the master of Boyd, was succeeded by his grandson, Robert, sixth lord. The son of the latter, also named Robert, seventh lord, died 17th November 1640, without issue, when his uncle, James, became eighth lord. Being a faithful adherent of Charles I., he was fined £1,500 by Cromwell's act in 1654, and died that year

William, ninth Lord Boyd, his son, was created earl of Kilmarnock, by patent to him and his heirs male for ever, 7th August, 1661, and died in March 1692 His son, William, the second earl, did not enjoy the title more than two months, as he died on 20th May same year

His son, William, third earl, voted for the Union, and when the rebellion broke out in 1715, he steadily supported the government. At the general rendezvous of the fencible men of the district of Cunningham at Irvine, 22d August that year, he appeared at the head of 500 of his own men, well armed, and on this occasion, his son, Lord Boyd, who, as fourth earl of Kilmarnock, joined the Pretender in the subsequent rebellion, appeared in arms at his father's side, though but eleven years old. In consequence of an order from the duke of Argyle, commander-in-chief of the government forces, Lord Kilmarnock marched from Glasgow with the Ayrshire volunteers to garrison the houses of Gartartan, Drumnakill, and Cardross, to prevent the rebels from crossing the Forth. He died in September 1717. By his countess, Euphemia, eldest daughter of the eleventh Lord Ross, he had a son, the subject of the following notice.

William, fourth earl of Kilmarnock, executed for his share in the rebellion of 1745, was born in 1704. His father died when he was but thirteen years of age, and on succeeding to the family estates, he found them much encumbered. He early displayed great abilities, but his love of pleasure overcame his desire for study; and, in his youth, he was so extravagant, that he still more reduced his patrimony This, it has been conjectured, was the cause of his taking up arms against the king. In his confession to the Rev Mr Foster, while under sentence of death, his lordship acknowledged, that his having engaged in the Rebellion was a kind of desperate scheme, to which he had recourse in the hope that he might be extricated from the embarrassment of his circumstances. "The true root of all," he says, "was his careless and dissolute life, by which he had reduced himself to great and perplexing difficulties, that the exigency of his affairs was in particular very pressing at the time of the rebellion, and that, besides the general hope he had of mending his fortune by the success of it, he was also tempted by another prospect of retrieving his circumstances, by following the Pretender's standard." When the rebellion broke out, Lord Kilmarnock was not concerned in it. In his speech at the bar of the House of Lords, and in his petition to the king after his sentence, he declared that it was not till after the battle of Prestonpans that he became a party to it, having, till then, influenced neither his tenants nor his followers to assist or abet the rebellion On the contrary he had induced the inhabitants of the town of Kilmarnock, and the neighbouring towns, to rise in arms for his majesty's cause, and, in consequence, 200 men from Kilmarnock soon appeared in arms, and remained so all winter at Glasgow and other places.

When the earl at last joined the Pretender's standard, he was received by him with great marks of esteem and distinction He was declared a member of his privy council, made colonel of the guards, and promoted to the rank of a general, although his lordship himself says he was far from being a person of any consequence among them He displayed considerable courage till the fatal battle of Culloden, when, finding it impossible to escape, he surrendered himself prisoner to the king's troops. He was conveyed to the Tower of London, and on Monday, July 28, 1746, he, the earl of Cromarty, and Lord Balmerino, were conducted to Westminster Hall, and at the bar of the lord high steward's court arraigned for high treason and rebellion Lord Kilmarnock pleaded guilty to his indictment, and submitted himself to his majesty's clemency On the Wednesday following, the three lords were again brought from the Tower to receive sentence, when being asked by the lord high steward, if he had any thing to offer why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, he delivered an eloquent speech, after which he was condemned to be beheaded, and he was taken back to the Tower He presented petitions to the king, the prince of Wales, and the duke of Cumberland, wherein he set forth the constant attachment of his family to the interest of the Revolution of 1688, and to that of the house of Hanover, and referred to his father's zeal and activity in support of the crown and constitution during the rebellion of 1715, and his own appearance in arms, though he was then but a boy, under his father, and the whole tenor of his conduct up to the time he had unfortunately engaged in the cause of the Pretender. But the services of his forefathers could not avail him so far as to induce his majesty to pardon him He was beheaded on Tower-hill, August 18, 1746, and interred in the Tower-church, with this inscription on his coffin,—"Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decollat. 18 Augusti 1746, ætat. suæ 42."

Lord Kilmarnock possessed a fine address, and was very polite. His person was tall and graceful; his countenance mild, but his complexion pale. He lived and died in the public profession of the Church of Scotland, and left behind him a widow, who was the Lady Ann Livingston, daughter of James, earl of Linlithgow and Callendar, attainted in 1716, with whom he had a considerable fortune, and three sons, the eldest of whom was the fifteenth earl of Errol, having succeeded upon the death of Mary countess of Errol, in 1758, to her estate and honours, his mother being undoubted heir of line of that noble family He died June 8, 1778. The seventeenth earl of Errol was created Baron Kilmarnock in 1831 [See ERROL, earl of]

KILSYTH, Viscount of, a title (attainted in 1716) in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1661, on Sir James Livingston of Barncloch, descended from Sir William Livingston, only son of Sir James Livingston of Callendar (see LIVINGSTON, surname of,) who got from his father the lands of Wester Kilsyth, in Stirlingshire, and died in 1459 His grandson, William Livingston of Kilsyth, had three sons: William, his successor, James Livingston of Inches, ancestor of the viscounts of Teviot, and Robert Livingston of Baldoran.

Sir William Livingston of Kilsyth, the sixth in direct succession, was knighted in 1565, when Darnley was created duke of Albany His only son, Sir William Livingston of Kilsyth, attended the duke of Lennox on his embassy to France in July 1601 He was afterwards knighted, and on 6th June 1609 was admitted a lord of session He was sworn a privy councillor on 15th May 1618, and the same day appointed vice-chamberlain of Scotland. In 1621 he was nominated one of the commissioners for the plantation of kirks. He died in 1627

Sir James Livingston, of Barncloch, the ninth of the family, born 25th June, 1616 younger son of Sir William Livingston, lord of session, succeeded in January 1647 the grandson of his brother, Sir William Livingston of Darnchester, knighted at the baptism of Prince Henry in 1595 He was a steady loyalist, and offered to hold out Kilsyth castle against Cromwell, for which, and his other services to the house of Stuart, he got a letter of thanks from Charles II., dated 7th October 1650 By Cromwell's act of grace and pardon of 1654, a fine of £1,500 was imposed on him, and on the Restoration he was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of viscount of Kilsyth and Lord Campsie, by patent, dated 17th August 1661 He did not, however, enjoy the honours more than a few days, as he died at London, 7th September the same year With two daughters, he had two sons, James, second viscount, who died, unmarried, in 1706, and William, third and last viscount, born 29th March 1650 The latter opposed the treaty of Union, but was chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers at the general election of 1710, and re-elected in 1713 Engaging in the rebellion of 1715, he was attainted of high treason, and his estate, amounting to £864 per annum, forfeited to the crown He died in Holland 12th January 1733 He married, first, Jean, 3d daughter of William, Lord Cochrane, widow of John, 1st Viscount Dundee (Graham of Claverhouse), by whom he had a son, who died in infancy, and, 2dly, Barbara, daughter of Makdougal of Makerston, and by her had a daughter, who also died young The family burying vault, in the church of Kilsyth, having been entered, in 1795, by some students from Glasgow, the embalmed bodies of a lady and her infant, supposed to be his first viscountess, were found in complete preservation The lady bore evident marks of a violent death, and it is said was killed by the fall of a house in Holland.

KINCARDINE, a title in the peerage of Scotland, now possessed by the earl of Elgin, and first conferred, by King Charles I., on Sir Edward Bruce of Carnock, with the secondary dignity of Lord Bruce of Torry, by patent, dated at Carisbrook, 26th December 1647, to him and his heirs male. As he died without issue, he was succeeded by his brother Alexander, about 1662. The second earl of Kincardine acted a somewhat conspicuous part in the reign of Charles II., and his character has been drawn in the highest terms of eulogy by Burnet in his History of his Own Times. He had married Veronica, daughter of Cornelle Van Arson Van Sommelsdyck, a rich Dutch noble, with whom he got a fortune of 80,000 guilders, and was thus enabled to contribute largely to the necessities of Charles II during his residence at the Hague At the Restoration he was sworn a privy councillor, and on the proposed re-establishment of prelacy in Scotland, he was the only member of the privy council who opposed it, until the sense of the nation regarding it should be ascertained. During the subsequent arbitrary proceedings of the government, he was ever for moderate and legal measures. In 1667, with the earl of Tweeddale and Sir Robert Murray, he was intrusted with the government in Scotland, and their mild administration formed a striking contrast to the oppressive and tyrannical rule of their predecessors. On 10th July 1667 he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session. In 1674 he joined the opposition against the duke of Lauderdale, and went to London to justify his own proceedings to the king By Lauderdale's influence, however, an order was obtained for his removal from court, and, with the duke of Hamilton and other noblemen, he was dismissed from the council in 1676 He died 9th July 1680 Burnet says: "He was both the wisest and the worthiest man that belonged to his country, and fit for governing any affairs but his own, which he, by a wrong turn, and by his love for the public, neglected to his ruin, for they, consisting much in works, coal, salt, and mines, required much care, and he was very capable of it, having gone far in mathematics, and being a great master of mechanics." As he died deeply involved in debt, his estate was brought to a judicial sale, by order of the court of session, and purchased by Colonel John Erskine, son of David Lord Cardross, in 1700 He had, with three daughters, two sons. Charles, the elder son, predeceased him

Alexander, the younger son, third earl, was blind for some years before his death, which took place in November 1705. As he died unmarried, his eldest sister, Lady Mary, the wife of William Cochrane of Ochiltree, founding on procuratories of resignation executed by her brother, for devising the honours in her favour, claimed the title, as did also Sir Alexander Bruce of Broomhall, the heir male of the family He was the son of Robert Bruce of Broomhall, a lord of session from 1st June 1649, till his death 25th June 1652, by Helen, daughter of Sir James Skene of Curriehill, lord president of that court. On 10th October 1706, the estates of parliament, before whom the question was debated, admitted Sir Alexander to his seat and vote, as fourth earl of Kincardine, reserving Lady Mary's right. Against this decision Lady Mary protested. The case was subsequently before the court of session, and on 28th March 1707, a decision was given that the procuratories of resignation did not become void by the death of the earl before their full execution, but that if the queen (Anne) pleased to accept of the resignation and to confer the title on Lady Mary, they might still be completed, by a new patent in her favour. The cause was then entered as an appeal to parliament, but the Scots parliament had ceased to exist, and the suit was not prosecuted. At the general election, 17th June, 1708, a protest against the earl of Kincardine's vote was entered by Lady Mary Cochrane, and at the general election, 16th November, 1710, she gave full powers to James, earl of Galloway, to object and protest against Sir Alexander Bruce of Broomhall, pretended earl of Kincardine, voting at the election. Sir Alexander was joint-receiver-general of the supply and excise from May 1698 to October 1695, and M P. for Sanquhar. On the second reading of the act for securing the presbyterian form of government to the Church of Scotland, 12th June, 1702, he declared that it contained things inconsistent with the essence of the monarchy; for which—freedom of debate being a thing not understood in those days—he was expelled from parliament, and a new writ ordered for Sanquhar. He had afterwards a pension from the queen He adhered to the duke of Athol's first protest against the Union in 1706, but does not appear to have given any farther opposition to that important treaty. By his countess, Christian, daughter of Robert Bruce of Blairhall, he had four sons and five daughters. His three eldest sons, Robert, Alexander, and Thomas, were successively earls of Kincardine. The latter, the seventh earl, died at Broomhall, 23d March, 1740, aged 77

His son, William, eighth earl, died 8th September, the same year, at Dunkirk, on his way to Naples, for the recovery of his health. He had married Janet Roberton, celebrated in the poetry of Hamilton of Bangour as one of the greatest beauties of his time, daughter of James Roberton, advocate, one of the principal clerks of session, and had three sons and two daughters. James, the second son, was a clergyman of the Church of England, and Thomas, the youngest, a lieutenant-general in the army, and M P, died at Exeter, 12th December, 1797

Charles, the ninth earl, succeeded his kinsman, the fourth earl of Elgin and Aylesbury, in his Scottish titles, and was thenceforth styled earl of Elgin and Kincardine (see ELGIN, fifth earl of, page 127 of this volume).

KING, a surname which, according to Douglas (Peerage, vol i p. 557) is of great antiquity in Scotland A family of this name were in possession of Barra or Barracht, parish of Bourtie, Aberdeenshire, from an early period; "Robertus dictus King" is party to a charter temp. Alexander II. (1247), with the prior and convent of St. Andrews, who also held lands in the same parish. In the 16th and 17th centuries the family also acquired the lands of Burness and Dudwick, in Buchan. Among the successive residents in the old house of Dudwick (only recently pulled down), was General James King, a celebrated soldier under Gustavus Adolphus in the Thirty-years'-war. Subsequently, during the civil war of England, he was second in command of the northern army of Charles I., by whom he was created Lord Eythen, 28th March 1642. (For a memoir of him see p. 184 of this vol) In addition it may be said here that after the battle of Marston-moor, 2d July 1644, he embarked at Scarborough for the continent, with his superior in command, the marquis of Newcastle, and other noblemen, disgusted at Prince Rupert's rash and obstinate tactics. Returning to Sweden, his past services to that crown were rewarded by Queen Christina's conferring upon him, in addition to the order of knighthood received in 1639, a Swedish peerage under the title of Lord Sanahult, in the province of Calmar He died in 1652, aged 63; and was buried at Stockholm, in the Riddarholms church, the usual burial-place of Swedish royalty and nobility; being honoured by a public funeral, Queen Christina attending in person. As he left no surviving male issue, both Scottish and Swedish titles became extinct. In his will, dated April 10, 1651, he bequeathed his property to the children of his brothers in succession, urging them to endeavour to obtain the restoration of his titles and honours, which however was never done. (Vide Eythen.) Barra, is now the property of Ramsay of Straloch A portrait of the general, a duplicate of one still preserved in Sweden, is in possession of Major W Ross King, Aberdeen

Among several distinguished advocates, descended from an elder branch, were Alexander and Adam King. The latter published some learned treatises on Astronomy and Natural Science. The former was the author of a thesis, entitled "Oratio demonstrans Jacobum VI Scotorum regem totius Albionis legitimum futurum monarchum," which attracted considerable notice in its day Cadets of this branch settled in various parts of the lowlands. From another who went over to Ireland was descended William King, D D, born in 1650, bishop of Derry, and in 1702 archbishop of Dublin, and one of the lords justices of Ireland. Archbishop King died May 8th, 1729. He was author of the following well known works, besides various others —

The State of the Protestants of Ireland. Lond 1692 8vo.

De Origine Mali London, 1700, 4to In this celebrated treatise, he undertook to show how all the several kinds of evil with which the world abounds are consistent with the goodness of God, and may be accounted for without the supposition of an evil principle.

The Rev JOHN KING, an outlawed minister of the covenant, fills a somewhat marked place in the episode of Scottish history which includes the battle of Bothwell Bridge. He was domestic chaplain to Henry, 8d Lord Cardross, (see p. 155 of this vol.,) and in 1674 was apprehended for keeping conventicles, with his lordship's connivance. On that occasion he was brought before the council, and held to bail, to appear when called upon In May 1675 he was again arrested at Cardross house for the same offence, being seized in the night time, by a party of the guards under Sir Mungo Murray Next day a number of country people assembled, and rescued him from the military Lord Cardross himself was absent from home at the time, but as soon as he heard of his chaplain's arrest, he applied to the privy council by petition, complaining of the illegal entrance into his house. The matter was remitted for enquiry to a committee of the council, who found that the rescue was made with Lord Cardross's acquiescence and connivance He was therefore ordered to be imprisoned in Edinburgh castle, and fined £1,000 sterling, besides £1,850 Scots, for his tenants attending conventicles.

Just previous to the affair at Drumclog in June 1679, King was, on May 31st, seized, with fourteen others, in the town of Hamilton, by Colonel Graham of Claverhouse. "There was some pretence," says Wodrow, "to seize King, being a vagrant preacher, and I think intercommuned, but there was no law for seizing the rest." (History, vol. II., p 46.) Some escaping from Hamilton, took the direction of Loudonhill, where a large field-meeting was to be held, (see p. 349) This led to the skirmish at Drumclog. At Hamilton, Claverhouse first heard of the meeting at Loudonhill, and on Sunday morning, June 1st, he set out to disperse it, carrying King and the other prisoners along with him, bound two and two. After the defeat of Claverhouse, the Covenanters pursued the king's troops for some distance, and liberated King and the other prisoners.

After the battle of Bothwell Bridge, King, with another preacher named Kid, was again apprehended, and brought to trial They pleaded that though found amongst the insurgents, they had taken no share in their proceedings, that they were in fact detained among them by force, that they had refused to preach to them, and had seized the first opportunity of escaping before the battle. But all was of no avail. They were first subjected to the torture of the boots, and then condemned to death On the afternoon of Aug. 14, 1679, they were executed. On the scaffold they behaved with great serenity and fortitude, protesting their loyalty to the last.

KINGHORN, a surname said to be derived from an ancient royal burgh, lying on the shore of the frith of Forth, Fifeshire, which took its name from an adjoining promontory of land, styled in Gaelic Ceann gorn or gorm, meaning "the blue head" Very fanciful are these supposed Gaelic derivations in other parts of Scotland as well as the county of Fife. Both words of which the surname is composed are Anglo-Saxon nouns, and both, moreover, are significant of power Immediately north of the town, said to have been first erected into a royal burgh by David I (1124-1153), there stood a castle, a residence at one time of the Scottish kings, and it is thought by a writer in the Old Statistical Account of Scotland, that the name may have been suggested by the frequent winding of the king's horn when he sallied out to the chase in the vicinity The castle and lands of Kinghorn were conferred by Robert II in 1376 on Sir John Lyon of Glammis, knight, on his marriage with the king's daughter, the princess Jane. His representative, Patrick, ninth Lord Glammis, was created earl of Kinghorn by James VI, a title which was afterwards changed to that of Strathmore and Kinghorn, in the reign of James VII It was in riding from Inverkeithing towards the castle of Kinghorn that Alexander III was killed in 1286 (See ALEXANDER III, vol 1, p. 79) Of the surname of Kinghorn was a baptist preacher at Norwich, Rev Joseph Kinghorn, who died in 1832

KINGSTON, Viscount of, a title (attainted in 1716) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1651, on the Hon Alexander Seton, second son of the second earl of Wintoun In 1633, when Charles I visited Seton house, Haddingtonshire, the young Alexander, then only twelve years old, attended by his preceptor and four other masters of arts, in black cloaks lined with velvet, welcomed his majesty with a Latin oration, kneeling on one knee, at the gate of his father's mansion, the king sitting in state, with his nobles around him, and the ground being covered, a great way from the throne, to a carpet. Before he rose off his knee, his majesty knighted him, and expressed a hope that the honour would not spoil his learning, as by the appearance he had made that day he saw that he should be a scholar In 1636 Sir Alexander went for two years to the college of La Fleche in France. He then proceeded to Italy and Spain, and on his return travelled through the greatest part of France He arrived in Scotland in 1640, and to avoid subscribing the Covenant, went to Holland in 1643 On his return eight months afterwards, still refusing to subscribe, he was excommunicated in Tranent church, 8th October, 1644. He immediately passed over to France, where he attended Prince Charles till 1647, when he returned to London. He was employed in several negotiations of importance by Charles II, who created him, the first after his coronation in Scotland, viscount of Kingston, with limitation to the heirs male of his body, 6th February, 1651 He was four times married By his first wife he had one daughter, and by his second, of the family of Douglas of Whittingham, Haddingtonshire, six sons and three daughters. His three eldest sons and the fifth died young. Archibald, the fourth son, became second viscount, and dying, unmarried, in 1714, was succeeded by his brother, James, the youngest son, and third and last viscount of Kingston. About 1687, when young, he was an ensign in the regiment of Scots fusileers, commanded by Colonel Buchan. Animated by that unshaken loyalty to the Stuarts which ever distinguished the family of Seton, he engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and was attainted by act of parliament, and his estates and honours forfeited to the crown. He married Lady Anne Lindsay, eldest daughter of Colin, third earl of Balcarres, and relict of the fifth earl of Kellie. He died, without issue, about 1726, and in him terminated the male line of the body of the first viscount.

KINLOCH, a local surname, derived from the lands of Kinloch in Fifeshire, anciently the property of the Kinlochs of that ilk, and situated at the head of Rossie loch; Ceann-loch, in the Celtic, meaning the head of the loch The Kinlochs were a very old family Sibbald (Hist. of Fife, p. 390, edit. 1803) says he had seen three original charters about the reign of Alexander III., by the second Roger de Quincy earl of Winchester, and lord-high-constable of Scotland, to "Johanni de Kyndelouch of a mln and some lands about this place" Nisbet (Hist. of Heraldry, vol ii App. p. 27) says This family "seems to be very ancient, and the name one of the earliest surnames in the kingdom" He adds that they sometimes carried in their arms "a bishop's pale, or," in consequence of an alleged connexion with Kelloch, who was second bishop of St. Andrews, in the reign of Constantine III., or with another of the same name, who, according to several of the catalogues of these early bishops, was the fourth on the list. According to the same authority, Hamilton of Wishaw, a learned antiquary at the beginning of the 18th century, who held the adjoining lands of Wedderslie, was in possession of five ancient charters granted to this family

George Kinloch of Kinloch and Cruivie, living in the reigns of King James IV and V, had two sons, Sir Alexander, his successor, who sold the lands of Kinloch to Balfour of Balgarvie, predecessor of the Lords Burleigh, and David The lands were afterwards the patrimony of the well known John Balfour of Kinloch, Sir Walter Scott's "Balfour of Burley" Sir Alexander was the last of the original family designated of Kinloch When he sold the family estate he retained the barony of Wedderslie, and having been at feud with several of his neighbours, he built a castle at Cruivie, in which he resided. He had three sons and two daughters, but his sons were all killed in the various feuds in which he was involved His two daughters, therefore, became his joint heiresses. Jean, the second daughter, married Sir James Sandilands of Calder, ancestor of the Lords Torphichen, by whom he got the barony of Wedderslie and other lands.

David Kinloch, Sir Alexander's brother, was progenitor of the Kinlochs of Kinloch in Perthshire His son, David, born in 1760, was bred a physician, and travelled much on the continent. He was for a time confined in the dungeons of the Inquisition in Spain, but obtained his liberty on performing an unexpected cure upon the Inquisitor-general, after he had been given over by his own physicians. On his return to Scotland he purchased, with other lands, the estate of Balmyle in Perthshire, the name of which was changed to Kinloch. He married a daughter of Hay of Gourdy, of the family of Errol, by whom he had, with one daughter, James, his successor, and John, the ancestor of the Kinlochs of Gourdy, Perthshire.

James, the elder son, had also two sons, David, created a baronet of Nova Scotia by James VII, and James, progenitor of the Kinlochs of Kilry in Forfarshire. The title conferred on the elder son, expired with the fourth baronet.

The Kinlochs of Gilmerton, Haddingtonshire, are a branch of the Fifeshire family The first of them upon record was Francis Kinloch of Gilmerton, who died in 1685. His only son, Alexander, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 16th September, 1686. He was lord provost of the city of Edinburgh, and died in 1696. His eldest son, Sir Alexander, second baronet, married Mary, second daughter of the celebrated General, David Leslie, first Lord Newark, and with two daughters had a son, Sir Francis, third baronet, who married Mary, daughter and coheir of Sir James Rochead of Inverleith, baronet, and had three sons and three daughters. Alexander, the third son, succeeded to the estates of his maternal grandfather, and took the name of Rochead. Sir Francis died March 2, 1747, and his 2 eldest sons, Sir James and Sir David, successively enjoyed the title and estates. The latter had 5 sons and 3 daughters, and died in 1795 His eldest son, Sir Francis, a few months after his succession, was killed by a manine. His brother, Sir Archibald, 7th baronet, died in 1800, and was succeeded by another brother, Sir Alexander, at whose death, in Feb. 1813, his son, Sir David, became 9th baronet. Born in 1805, he married in 1829, the eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Gibson-Carmichael, bart, with issue.

KINNAIRD a local surname, derived from the barony of Kinnaird in Perthshire, and composed of two Celtic words, Ceann and aird, signifying the high end or head

KINNAIRD, baron, a title in the peerage of Scotland conferred in 1682, on Sir George Kinnaird of Inchture, descended from Radulphus, called Rufus, on whom King William the Lion bestowed by charter in 1170, the barony of Kinnaird in the district of Gowrie, and in consequence Kinnaird became the surname of his descendants. The barony continued in possession of the family till the reign of Charles I Kinnaird castle, supposed to have been built in the 12th century, is now in ruins. Richard de Kinnaird, the great grandson of Radulphus, was one of the Scots barons who swore fealty to Edward I., in 1296. He is mentioned in Rymer's Fœdera, in 1304 His son, Radulphus de Kinnaird, also swore fealty to the same monarch the same year as his father Reginald de Kinnaird, second son of the latter's grandson, Richard de Kinnaird of that ilk, married Marjory, daughter and heiress of Sir John Kirkaldy of Inchture, in the same county, and got with her these lands, in which he was confirmed by charter of Robert III, dated 28th January 1399. The ninth in direct descent from this Reginald, Sir George Kinnaird of Inchture, a steady loyalist during the civil wars, was knighted by Charles II, in 1661 He represented the county of Perth in the Scots parliament, and was sworn a privy councillor On 28th December 1682 he was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Kinnaird of Inchture, with limitation to the heirs male of his body He died 29th September 1689 He had six sons, and George, the youngest, carried on the line of the family Patrick, the eldest, second Lord Kinnaird, died 18th February, 1701 He had, with a daughter, three sons. George, the eldest, master of Kinnaird, predeceased him, without issue, in 1698. Patrick, the second son, became third lord, and Charles, the youngest, fifth Lord Kinnaird.

Patrick, third lord, opposed the Union, and died in March 1715 His only son, Charles, fourth lord, died without issue in September 1728, when the title devolved on his uncle Charles, fifth lord. The latter married, about 1729, Magdalene, daughter of William Brown, merchant in Edinburgh, and for eighteen years had no issue. On 21st September, 1747, she left Drimmie House, the usual family residence and two days afterwards her husband intimated to his friends that she had been delivered of twins, named Patrick and Charles. The next heir, Mr Charles Kinnaird, grandson of the Hon. George Kinnaird, sixth and youngest son of the first lord, raised an action in the commissary court, concluding that he ought to be allowed to prove that the pretended delivery by Lady Kinnaird never took place, and that the children were surreptitious. Lord and Lady Kinnaird refused to answer to the interrogatories directed to be put to them by the commissaries, who, on 1st January 1748, decerned his lordship to make payment to Mr Kinnaird of £600 sterling, for not appearing personally in court. This mysterious affair terminated by Lord Kinnaird declaring that both the twins were dead

Charles, sixth lord, succeeded on the death of his predecessor, 16th July 1758, and died 2d August, 1767 He had several children, but only two sons and three daughters survived Patrick, the younger son, an officer in the East India Company's service, was killed by a tiger on the coast of Coromandel in July 1771

The elder son, George, seventh Lord Kinnaird, and one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, died at Perth, 11th October 1805. He had married, 23d July, 1777, Elizabeth, daughter of Griffin Ransom of New Palace Yard, Westminster, banker in London, and her grief for her husband's loss was so great that she only survived him ten days. They had issue six sons and four daughters.

The fifth son, the Hon Douglas James William Kinnaird, an eminent banker, the friend both of Sheridan and Byron, was born February 26, 1788, and received the early part of his education at Eton He afterwards passed some time at Gottingen, whence he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, where, in 1811, he took his degree of master of arts. In 1813 he accompanied Mr, afterwards Sir John Cam Hobhouse, baronet, (created in 1851 Lord Broughton,) through Sweden, and across the north of Germany to Vienna, and was present at the decisive battle of Culm, in Bohemia, in which the French, under General Vandamme, were beaten by the Prussians and Russians. Subsequently he became an active partner in the banking-house of Ransom and Morland, London, and, after the old partnership was dissolved, he took the principal management of the business. In 1815, Mr Kinnaird, Lord Byron, the Hon George Lamb, and Mr Peter Moore, formed the committee for directing the affairs of Drury-Lane theatre. He was afterwards, for a short time, M P for Bishop's Castle His name often occurs in the Memoirs of Byron, and was one of the last which the noble poet was heard to pronounce. He died, unmarried, March 12 1830

The master of Kinnaird having died in his infancy, Charles, 2d son, became 8th Lord Kinnaird He was born 8th April 1780, and educated at the universities of Edinburgh, Cambridge, and Glasgow At the general election in 1802 he was chosen M P for Leominster, and distinguished himself in the house of commons by his opposition to the then administration He was at Venice when he succeeded to the title in 1805 At the general election in the following year he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers. In 1817 he built the imposing pile of Rossie priory in the parish of Inchture (properly Inchtower), in the Carse of Gowrie, for the family mansion He married Lady Olivia Letitia Catherine Fitzgerald, youngest daughter of 2d duke of Leinster, and had three sons and four daughters. He died in 1826.

The eldest son, George William Fox Kinnaird, 9th lord, born in 1807, was in 1851 created Baron Rossie of Rossie in the peerage of the United Kingdom, a privy councillor of Great Britain. He held the office of master of the buckhounds to the queen, which he resigned in 1841 He was formerly grand-master of the freemasons of Scotland He married, in 1837, Frances, only daughter of 1st Lord de Mauley, issue, 2 sons and one daughter The elder son, Victor Alexander, died in 1851 The 2d son, Charles-Fox, born in 1841, died in 1860 Lord Kinnaird was in August that year created Baron Kinnaird in the peerage of Great Britain, with remainder to his brother, Hon Arthur Fitzgerald Kinnaird, M P for Perth.

KINNOUL, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1633, on Sir George Hay, viscount of Dupplin and Baron Hay of Kinfauns second son of Peter Hay of Megginch, descended from William Hay, second son of Sir David de Haya of Errol, ancestor of the earls of Errol (see page 141 of this volume). Born in 1572, he went about 1590 to the Scots college at Douay, where he studied some years under his uncle, Edmund, professor of civil and canon law there, well known as Father Hay, the Jesuit. On his return to Scotland about 1596, he was introduced at court by his cousin, Sir James Hay of Kingask He was appointed by King James VI, a gentleman of his bedchamber The commendam of the priory of the Charterhouse of Perth was also bestowed upon him, with a seat in parliament, 18th February, 1598, and the ecclesiastical lands of Errol Finding, however, that the rents of the same were too small to support the dignity of a lord of parliament, he resigned his seat. He was one of those who attended the king to Perth, 5th August, 1600, when the earl of Gowrie and his brother Alexander were killed, and he received the lands of Netherliff or Netherchiff out of that nobleman's forfeited estate. He was knighted before 1610, and on 24th December of that year, he obtained from the king a patent for the manufacture of iron and glass in Scotland On 26th March, 1616, he was appointed clerk-register, and admitted an ordinary lord of session, and 16th January 1622, was constituted lord-high chancellor of Scotland He was created viscount of Dupplin and Lord Hay of Kinfauns, 4th May 1627, and earl of Kinnoul, by patent, dated 25th May 1633, to himself and his heirs male whatever, being the first of the earls created by the king to grace his coronation in Scotland Sir James Balfour, lord lyon, states that on the morning of the coronation he was sent by the king to the earl of Kinnoul, to signify his majesty's pleasure, that he should for that day give precedence to the archbishop of St. Andrews, (Spotswood). The chancellor spiritedly replied, that "since his majesty had been pleased to continue him in that office which, by his means, his worthy father of happy memory had conferred on him, he was ready in all humility to lay it at his majesty's feet. But since it was his royal will he should enjoy it with the various privileges pertaining to the office, never a stoled priest in Scotland should set a foot before him while his blood was hot." This reply being reported to the king, he remarked "Well, Lyon, I will meddle no further with that old cankered goutish man, at whose hands there is nothing to be gained but soure words." The earl died of apoplexy in London, 16th December 1634, and was interred, on the 19th of the following August, in the parish church of Kinnoul, in which an elegant marble monument was erected to his memory, with his statue habited in his chancellor's robes. Arthur Johnston commemorated his virtues in a long Latin epitaph, and an elegy on him by Sir James Balfour may be found in the Denmiln MS. He had two sons. The elder, Sir Peter Hay, predeceased him. The younger, George, second earl, a privy councillor to King Charles I., and captain of the yeomen of the guard from 1632 to 1635, continued faithful to that ill-fated monarch, at the breaking out of the civil wars, and in 1643, refused to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. He died 5th October 1644.

His only son, William, third earl, attached himself to the marquis of Montrose, and was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, whence he made his escape, 28th May 1654, and joining the royalist general, Middleton, in the north, was again taken prisoner by the English in the Braes of Angus, in the following November, after three days' pursuit through the snow He died in 1677 He had two sons. George, fourth earl, who died in 1687, without issue, and William, fifth earl, who was at the court of St. Germain's with James VII., after his abdication On his return, he obtained a new patent in favour of his kinsman, Thomas Hay, viscount of Dupplin, as his heir, and died, unmarried, 10th May, 1709

Thomas, viscount of Dupplin, sixth earl of Kinnoul, was the third in descent from Peter Hay of Kirkland of Megginch, brother of the first earl of Kinnoul He was M P for Perthshire in 1698, and was created viscount of Dupplin, by patent, dated 31st December 1697 He was one of the commissioners of the union, and supported that treaty in the last Scots parliament He was afterwards a representative peer In 1715, on the arrival of the earl of Mar in Scotland to organise the rebellion, on his way north he paid a visit to his brother-in-law, the earl of Kinnoul, at his seat of Dupplin in Perthshire, and the latter was one of the suspected persons summoned by the lord advocate to appear at Edinburgh and give bail for their allegiance to the government. He was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, till after the rebellion. He died in January 1719 With two daughters, he had three sons, the youngest of whom, the Hon Colonel John Hay of Cromlix, accompanied the earl of Mar from England to the north of Scotland, when that nobleman left London to place himself at the head of the insurrection Sent with a detachment of 200 horse to take possession of Perth, he entered that town on the 14th September 1715, and there proclaimed the Chevalier On the 18th he was appointed by Mar, governor of Perth, and to support him, in case of an attack, a party of the clan Robertson were sent to him, under the command of Alexander Robertson of Struan, their chief After the failure of that rash enterprise he was forfeited by act of parliament, and joining the exiled court in France, he held a post of high confidence in the household of the Chevalier, by whom he was created earl of Inverness. Between him and the earl of Mar an irreconcilable difference existed, and his name often occurs in the Lockhart papers relative to the after conduct of that nobleman. He had married Marjory, third daughter of the fifth Viscount Stormont, sister of the first earl of Mansfield, and to the behaviour of Hay and his lady, who do not appear to have treated the princess Sobieski, the wife of the Chevalier, with due respect, and to their ascendency over the Pretender, were attributed all the intrigues and disagreements that took place in the Chevalier's household. Finding that, notwithstanding her complaints, James was determined to retain Colonel Hay in his service, the princess, on 15th November, 1725, retired into a convent. By the efforts, however, of some of the princess's friends, assisted by several influential Jacobites, the Chevalier at length reluctantly dismissed Hay from his service.

The eldest son, George, seventh earl of Kinnoul, was, when Lord Dupplin, chosen, in 1710, M P for Fowey in Cornwall, and in the following year appointed one of the tellers of the Exchequer He was created a peer of Great Britain, by the title of Baron Hay of Pedwardine, 31st December 1711, being one of the twelve created the same day, to secure a majority in the House of Lords, for the Tory administration. On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, he was, with the earl of Jersey and Lord Lansdowne, taken into custody at London 21st September, on suspicion of favouring the Pretender, but on the expiry of the act for suspending the Habeas Corpus bill, on the 24th of the following June, was admitted to bail In 1729 he was appointed ambassador to Constantinople, where he remained till 1737 He died 26th July 1758. By his countess, Lady Abigail Harley, second daughter of the earl of Oxford and Mortimer, high-treasurer of Great Britain, he had four sons and six daughters. Of his second son, Robert Hay Drummond, archbishop of York, a memoir is given at page 66 of this volume. The Hon Edward Hay, his youngest son, at one time consul-general of Portugal and minister plenipotentiary to the court of Lisbon, died governor of Barbadoes in 1779 Of this island Charles I made a grant to Sir James Hay, created earl of Carlisle, cousin of the first earl of Kinnoul. His titles expired with his son, when Barbadoes devolved upon the third earl of Kinnoul, who disposed of it to Charles II in 1661

Thomas, eighth earl of Kinnoul, born in 1710, was, when Lord Dupplin, M P for Cambridge, of which town he was recorder, and in addition to holding various government offices, such as a lord of the treasury in 1754, joint-paymaster of the forces in 1755, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster in 1758, was sworn a privy councillor, and succeeded his father the same year In 1759 he was sent as ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Portugal, to make satisfaction to the court of Lisbon for the violation of the neutrality of the Portuguese territory by Admiral Boscawen taking and burning, off Lagos, the French ships commanded by M de la Clue. In 1762 he resigned all his public employments, and retired to his estate. In 1765 he was elected chancellor of the university of St. Andrews, and in January 1768 was chosen president of the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge. To him the elegant bridge over the Tay at Perth, completed in February 1772, may be said to have mainly owed its existence, as besides contributing £500 towards the expense of its erection, he strenuously exerted himself in procuring subscriptions. He died at Dupplin, 27th December, 1787, in his 78th year His only son having died an infant, he was succeeded by his nephew, Thomas Robert, son of his next brother, Robert Hay Drummond, archbishop of York. It is remarkable that three of the six sons of this eminent prelate came to untimely deaths. Peter Auriol Hay Drummond, the third son, lieutenant-colonel of the fifth regiment of West York militia, died in 1799, in consequence of a fall down the staircase of his house. John Auriol Hay Drummond, the fourth son, master and commander, R.N., was lost in the Beaver, prize, off St. Lucia, in a hurricane, in 1780; and the youngest son, the Rev George William Auriol Hay Drummond, editor of his father's sermons, was drowned while on a voyage from Bideford in Devonshire to Greenock, the ship having been cast away in a storm, on the night of the 6th December, 1807 (see page 67 of this volume).

Robert Auriol Hay Drummond, the archbishop's eldest son, ninth earl, born 18th March, 1751, signed the protest on the regency bill, 29th December, 1788. He was sworn a privy councillor, 29th April 1796, and on 30th September following, the king appointed him lord lyon king at arms for Scotland, with succession to his son Thomas Robert, Lord Dupplin Like his grand-uncle, he was president of the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, he died April 12, 1804. He had 2 sons and 2 drs. Sons, Thomas Robert, 10th earl, and Hon. Francis John Hay Drummond of Cromlix, that estate and Innerpeffrey, Perthshire, being settled as a perpetual provision for the 2d branch of the Kinnoul family This young gentleman, an ensign 2d foot-guards, was drowned, in his 25th year, Oct. 28, 1810, while endeavouring to cross on horseback the river Earn, swelled by a heavy rain. Lady Henrietta, the elder daughter, m., in 1807, Henry Drummond of the Grange, Hampshire, banker in London, M P and F R.S., grandson of Henry, 1st Viscount Melville. Lady Sarah, the younger, m., in 1811, Rev George Murray, son of the bishop of St. David's, and nephew of the duke of Athole.

Thomas Robert, 10th earl, born in 1785, was appointed lord lyon king at arms in 1804, the year of his succession to the earldom; colonel Royal Perthshire militia 1809, lord-lieutenant of Perthshire 1830; F R.S.A, and F S.A Scot. The family seat, Dupplin castle, parish of Aberdalgie, Perthshire, burnt down in 1827, was rebuilt by him, at the cost of £30,000 He m., in 1824, Louisa Burton, youngest daughter of Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, baronet, issue 4 sons and 5 daughters. Sons, 1 George, Viscount Dupplin, born in 1827, lieut. 1st life-guards, m., in 1848, Lady Emily, 3d daughter of duke of Beaufort, with issue. 2 Hon Robert, capt. Coldstream guards, died Oct. 1, 1855, from wounds received in the trenches before Sebastopol 3. Hon Arthur, born in 1833, commander, R.N, who assumed surname and arms of Drummond of Cromlix and Innerpeffrey, Perthshire, on succeeding, at the death of his brother Robert, in 1855, to these estates. 4. Hon Charles Rowley, capt. Scots fusilier guards.

KINTORE, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred, in 1677, on Hon Sir John Keith, 3d son of William, 6th earl Marischal (see MARISCHAL, earl). For his alleged share in preserving the regalia of Scotland during the commonwealth, he was, at the Restoration in 1660, appointed knight marischal of Scotland, which office was made hereditary in his family, and June 26, 1677, created a peer by the title of earl of Kintore, and Lord Keith of Inverury and Keith Hall; sworn a privy councillor, and in December 1684, appointed treasurer depute. The real account of the preservation of the regalia is this By order of the Scots Estates and privy council, June 6, 1651, the regalia were conveyed to the strong castle of Dunnottar, Kincardineshire, belonging to the earl Marischal, then defended by George Ogilvy of Barras. During the years 1651 and 1652 the castle was besieged by the parliamentary troops, and Ogilvy obliged to surrender, but not till after the regalia had been removed by Christian Fletcher, the wife of James Granger, minister of Kinneff Returning one day from Stonehaven, she requested permission of Major-general Morgan, who then commanded the besieging army, to visit Mrs. Ogilvy, the lady of the lieutenant-governor Having been allowed to enter the castle, the regalia were intrusted to her care. The sceptre and sword of state, concealed in a bag of lint or flax, were carried by a female servant. The crown Mrs. Granger packed up in some clothes, and covered with her apron, and in this way passed out, without suspicion, the parliamentary general himself, with the greatest gallantry, assisting her to mount her horse. The regalia were afterwards kept sometimes in the church of Kinneff, concealed under the pulpit, and at other times in a double-bottomed bed at the manse, till the Restoration, when they were delivered to Mr George Ogilvy, who presented them to Charles II. For this good service, and his long imprisonment in England, Ogilvy was created a baronet, but received no compensation for the fines and sequestrations to which his estate had been subjected. Mrs. Granger, to whose presence of mind the merit was chiefly due, had 2,000 merks voted her by parliament, January 11th, 1661, while John Keith, third son of the proprietor of Dunnottar castle, was first appointed knight marshal, and seventeen years afterwards, was created an earl. It appears that on his return from France, whither he had gone some time before the surrender of the castle, he was apprehended and examined as to the regalia, when he declared that he had conveyed them out of the country, and delivered them to Charles II. In consequence all farther search for them was dropped. He was created earl of Kintore, partly in compliment to his mother Margaret Erskine, countess marischal, under whose authority Mrs. Granger is said to have acted, and partly on account of the imprisonment he had suffered for his loyalty He obtained an extension of his patent to his own heirs female, with other remainders, on 22d February 1694 From his father he received Hall Forest, a royal castle in Aberdeenshire, built by Robert the Bruce as a hunting hall, and granted by him to Robert de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, ancestor of the family The word Kintore in Gaelic signifies "the head of the wood," the forest in that district having at one period extended five or six miles. The first earl of Kintore supported the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland, and died in 1714 With one son, he had two daughters, the elder of whom married Sir William Forbes of Monymusk, baronet, ancestor of the Pitsligo baronets of that name.

The son, William, second earl, engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and was at the battle of Sheriffmuir, after which he never shaved his beard. For his conduct on that occasion he was deprived of the office of knight marischal, and died 5th December 1718. He had two sons and two daughters, namely, John, third earl, born in 1699, William, fourth earl, Lady Catherine Margaret, who married David, fifth Lord Falconer of Halkerstoun, and so brought the honours subsequently into that family, and Lady Jean, who died unmarried

John, third earl of Kintore, was appointed knight marischal of Scotland in June 1788, and died, without issue, 22d November 1758, in his 60th year His brother, William, succeeded as fourth earl, and on his death, unmarried, the estate devolved on George, tenth earl Marischal, who being attainted for his share in the rebellion of 1715, could not inherit the titles. On his death, 23d May 1778, the earldom and estates fell to Anthony Adrian Keith Falconer, Lord Falconer of Halkertoun (to which title he had succeeded in 1776), grandson of Lady Catherine Keith, eldest daughter of the second earl of Kintore (see page 188 of this volume). The fifth earl died 30th August 1804 He married a Dutch lady named Christina Elizabeth Sighterman of Groningen in Holland, and with seven daughters, had a son, William, sixth earl, born at Inglismaldie, Kincardineshire, 11th December 1766, and for some years an officer in the second regiment of dragoons, or Scots Greys. By his countess, Maria, daughter of Sir Alexander Bannerman of Kirkhill, baronet, he had Anthony Adrian, seventh earl, two other sons, and a daughter, and died 6th October 1812

Anthony Adrian, seventh earl, born 20th April 1794, was created a baron of the United Kingdom 23d June 1838, by the title of Lord Kintore. He was a great promoter of agricultural improvements on his estates, and was famed, in particular, for his superior cattle. The Keithhall ox, as one of his bullocks was called, obtained the first premium at the Highland Society's show in Aberdeen in 1834, and at seven years of age was sold for a hundred sovereigns. Its gross weight alive was one ton eight cwt. The earl was twice married, but had issue only by his second wife, Louisa, youngest daughter of Francis Hawkins, Esq of Dunnichen, three sons and a daughter The eldest son, William Adrian, Lord Inverury, born 2d September 1822, a lieutenant in the 17th light dragoons, was killed while hunting, 17th December 1843 Her ladyship obtained a divorce from Lord Kintore, and married a second time, 2d April 1840, an English gentleman of the name of Arnold, but died in 1841

The 2d son, Francis Alexander, born June 7, 1828, became 8th earl, on the death of his father, July 11, 1844, and June 24, 1851, was appointed a deputy lieutenant of Aberdeenshire and Kincardineshire. He married, June 24, 1851, his cousin, Louisa Madeline, 2d dr of Francis Hawkins, Esq, with issue.

KIRKCALDY, viscount of, a secondary title of the earl of Leven and Melville. See that title.

KIRKALDY, a local surname, derived from the town of that name in Fifeshire, where there is said anciently to have been a place of worship belonging to the Culdees, hence Kilculda or Kilculdei, in course of time corrupted into Kirkcaldy

One of the brightest of our historical names is that of Kirkaldy of Grange. Of the family, however, our public records furnish but a few scanty notices. As their estates, lying in the parish of Kinghorn, adjoined Kirkaldy, it is supposed that they derived their surname from that town. In Prynne's History, a Sir William de Kirkcaldy is mentioned as one of the Scots barons who submitted to Edward III of England during one of his invasions of Scotland, and a charter of King David II, dated "Apud Kdynburgh," contains the name of a Simeon Kyrcaldie.

There were at an early period two principal families of the name, the Kirkaldys of Inchtower or Inchture in the shire of Perth, and the Kirkaldys of Grange in Fife From their surname the latter appear to have been the elder branch, although supposed to have descended from a younger son of the former Their connection with Fife must have been prior to the reign of David II, as we find a pension granted by that monarch to an Andrew de Kirkaldye, "capella ano, 5 marcarum sterlingorum annuatim de custuma civitatis Sancti Andree, quoque per Dominum Regem ad aliquod beneficium ecclesiasticum fuerit promotus," &c. The house of Inchture has long been represented by the noble family of Kinnaird, Marjory, daughter and sole heiress of Sir John de Kirkaldy of Inchture having, at the end of the 14th century, married Sir Reginald de Kinnaird, knight, and her lands were confirmed to him by a charter of Robert III., of date 28th January 1399 (see page 608 of this volume). A minor branch, the Kirkaldys of Wester Abden, also in Fife, appear to have ceased as a distinct family about the beginning of the 17th century

In the Register House at Edinburgh are preserved no fewer than eighteen MS. charters and two remissions (the dates ranging between 1440 and 1568, both inclusive) relating to the family of Kirkaldy of Grange, now extinct, but which at the period to which they refer appear to have been one of the most important in the county of Fife. John de Kirkaldy, a younger son of the family, vicar of Newburn in that shire, is mentioned in Archbishop Sheves's confirmation of privileges to the university of St. Andrews, dated at Edinburgh, 2d June 1479.

William Kirkaldy de Grange appears as one of a quorum which served Patrick Crichton of Cranstoun-Riddel heir to his father, at Edinburgh, 7th December 1506, and he is mentioned in a charter dated 13th February 1532, as being alive in that year. His eldest son, Sir James Kirkaldy, married Janet, daughter of Sir John Melville of Raith, one of the early Reformers, in whose right he acquired the lands of Balchrie and others in Fifeshire, with the baronies of Grange and Auchtertool. Introduced by his father-in-law to the court and service of King James V., he was made a lord of the bedchamber, and on 24th March 1537, appointed lord-high-treasurer of Scotland, in place of the abbot of Holyrood. "He was considered," says Crawford, "one of the wisest and worthiest in the nation, but through the interest of Cardinal Bethune, he lost his office of treasurer" (Officers of State.) This did not happen, however, till after the death of James V He is described by his brother-in-law, Sir James Melville of Hallhill, as "a stout man, who always offered by single combate, and at point of the sword, to maintain whatever he said." The year following his appointment as treasurer, with his three brothers, Sir George, who obtained the lands of Craigcrook in Mid Lothian and others in Stirlingshire, John, and Patrick, his father-in-law, Melville of Raith, his kinsman, William Barclay of Touch, and eight others, he received a remission for all crimes, excepting treason, and in October 1539 he and his three brothers received a similar remission from the crown As an instance of the favour and confidence with which he was treated by the king, it is related that on James' return from his voyage round the Isles in 1540, he showed the laird of Grange a scroll drawn up by Cardinal Bethune and the priests, containing the names of 360 nobles and barons whom they had doomed to be burnt for heresy, amongst which was his own, with those of several of his friends and kinsmen With honest sincerity he denounced the insolence and rapacity of the clergy, expatiated on the abuses which they had brought into the church, and on their great wealth and profligacy, and advised the king to annex their benefices to the crown, as had been done by his uncle, King Henry, with whom he strongly counselled him that he should maintain a friendly intercourse. The king took the advice in good part, and shortly after, when the cardinal and some other prelates went to Holyrood-house, and renewed their application for the punishment of heretics, after many reproaches, he thus sternly addressed them "Packe, you jayells! (jail-birds.) Gett you to your charges and reforme your owne lives, and be not instruments of discord betwixt my nobilitie and me, or elles, I vow to God, I sall reforme you, not as the king of Denmarke doth, by imprisonment, neither yitt as the king of England doth, by hanging and heading, but by sharper instruments, if ever I heare suche a motion made by you again!" (Calderwood's Historie, vol. i. p. 146.) The same year, when Sir James Hamilton of Fynnart, natural son of the first earl of Arran, was accused of a conspiracy to the king, then on a journey to Fife, James sent the accuser with his ring, to Sir James Learmonth, master of the household, and Sir James Kirkaldy the treasurer, and by their means, Hamilton was speedily executed. The treasurer's second son, James Kirkaldy, married Helen, daughter of Leslie of Pitcaple, and heiress of Kellie in Forfarshire, a ward of the crown, and on his father's leaving court to attend the nuptials, in his absence Cardinal Bethune and the priests obtained from the king a warrant to commit him to ward in the castle of Edinburgh. His imprisonment, however, was short, and he was soon restored to favour

After the disastrous rout at Solway, the king on his way to Falkland palace, where he died soon after (on 13th December 1542), visited the treasurer's house of Halyards, where he was courteously received by the Lady Grange, "an ancient and godlie matron." The treasurer himself being absent, his eldest son, William Kirkaldy, and others, waited upon the king. At supper, the lady attempted to comfort his majesty, praying him "to take the work of God in good part." "My portion," he answered, "of this world is short, for I will not be with you fifteen days." On his attendants' asking him where he would hold his Christmas, he replied, "I cannot tell; choose you the place. But this I can tell you: before Christmas day ye will be masterless, and the realm without a king." (Ibid., vol i. p. 151) The treasurer and his son, William, were with the king in his last moments. By the advice of the former, the earl of Arran assembled the nobility, and obtained the regency during the young queen's minority, and for a time the treasurer adhered faithfully to him, but, when the Romish party obtained the ascendency, he and Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, and Balneaves of Halhill, whom he had made treasurer-clerk, were among the first to withdraw from him He keenly supported the English connection, and in 1543 was dismissed from the office of lord-high-treasurer, mainly through the machinations of Cardinal Bethune. In revenge, he joined the celebrated conspiracy against that haughty and cruel churchman, and on the evening of his assassination, with three of his sons, he joined the murderers in the castle of St. Andrews, where his eldest son, William, had been since the morning. To the assistance of the garrison, King Henry remitted several sums of money, with £200 to the laird of Grange, who appears to have received other sums from that monarch, for his support of the projected marriage between the young Prince Edward and the infant Queen Mary At the meeting of the Estates at Edinburgh on 4th August 1546, he and his three brothers and four sons, with all others within the castle of St. Andrews, were declared traitors and forfeited. On the surrender of that fortress, the garrison blamed their countrymen for deserting them, and the laird of Grange, on being carried with the rest prisoner to France, remarked, as he embarked, "I am assured God will revenge it ere long" (Ibid., p 240) With Monyponny of Pitmilly he was confined in the castle of Cherbourg, and while there they stoutly refused to go to mass, the laird of Grange telling the captain of the castle, on his insisting on it, that if compelled to attend, "those that were there should see by their behaviour how much they despised it." After his release from Cherbourg he resided in England and beyond seas till 1556, when, by the mediation of the queen-dowager, he made his peace with the Scottish government, and his forfeiture being withdrawn he had his estates restored to him He died soon after

With four daughters, he had five sons, namely, Sir William Kirkaldy of Grange, the foremost knight and soldier of his time, of whom a memoir follows in larger type, Sir James, who was hanged on the same scaffold with his brother in the High Street of Edinburgh, Sir David and Thomas, who both served with the garrison of St. Andrews, and being sent to Arran's camp on proposals of peace, were not allowed to return; and George, of whom little is known The daughters were, Marjory, married to Sir Henry Ramsay of Colluthie, Agnes, to Sir Robert Drummond of Carnock, Marion, to William Semple, second baron of Cathcart, and Elizabeth, to Sir John Moubray of Barnbougal, chief of an ancient family, which became extinct about 1620

Sir William Kirkaldy, the eldest son, married Margaret, daughter of Sir James Learmonth of Darsie, provost of St. Andrews, and with her he got, on 5th October 1564, a crown charter of the lands called Nether Friarton, near that city He had a daughter, Janet, who married Sir Thomas Ker of Fernihirst, ancestor of the marquises of Lothian (see LOTHIAN, marquis of), an adherent of Queen Mary and one of the defenders of Edinburgh castle, when besieged by the troops of the regent Morton. The barony of Grange was restored on 29th November 1581 to William, son of Sir James Kirkaldy, and nephew of Sir William, the latter having no sons of his own His mother, Helen Leslie, the heiress of Kellie, proved false to her husband, and betrayed him to her paramour, the regent Morton He escaped from the prison at Dalkeith, to which the regent had consigned him, and eight days after she was found strangled in her bedchamber In 1590 William Kirkaldy of Grange, Sir James' son, signed the Solemn League and Covenant, and in 1596 he was indicted, with three others, for convocating an unlawful assembly He had, with a daughter, two sons, Robert, who succeeded him, and Thomas. On 14th May 1664, Charles II. created John Kirkaldy, then in possession of Grange, a baronet of Scotland, but the title was not connected with any grant of land in America, as was usual with the baronetcies of Nova Scotia. Sir James Kirkaldy, the second baronet of Grange, and ten other persons, were, by order of the Scottish privy council, committed to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, on 25th June 1674, charged with holding an armed conventicle in Fife, for which he was fined £550 · Sir John Kirkaldy of Grange, the third baronet, was alive in 1722, and on his death in 1789 the title became extinct. The estate of Grange, after being in possession of a family of the name of Skene, and subsequently of the Carnegies of Boysack, became the property of the Fergussons of Raith

Mr Grant, in the notes to the 'Memoirs and Adventures of Kirkaldy of Grange,' (Edinburgh 1849, p 382,) says that there are two families of the name in England, Kirkaldy of Monkwearmouth, Durham, and Kirkaldy, late of Sunderland, now of Liverpool, both of whom bear the arms of the line of Inchture, namely, a fess wavy, between three mullets gules, with the crest and motto of the lairds of Grange, "Fortissima Veritas." He believes that there is only one family in Scotland bearing the name.

KIRKALDY, WILLIAM, of Grange, reputed the bravest and most skilful soldier of his time, was the eldest son of Sir James Kirkaldy of Grange, high treasurer to James V He early embraced the principles of the Reformation, and was one of the conspirators against Cardinal Bethune After the surrender of the castle of St Andrews, he was, with the others, sent prisoner to France, but contrived to make his escape, and afterwards distinguished himself highly in the service of the French king On his return to Scotland, he attached himself to the lords of the Congregation, and had several gallant rencontres with the French forces sent over to the assistance of the queen-regent For his concern in the murder of Cardinal Bethune, he had been attainted, but the attainder was taken off by parliament in 1563 In 1566 he joined the confederacy of nobles for the removal of Bothwell, and the protection of the infant prince, and at Carberry Hill received the surrender of Queen Mary He afterwards pursued Bothwell in the Orkney seas, scattered his small fleet, and obliged him to fly, with a single ship, towards Norway

After the battle of Langside, where he greatly assisted the regent Moray, Kirkaldy was appointed governor of Edinburgh castle He was also lord provost of Edinburgh Up to this period, he had shown himself to be firmly attached to the Protestant, or king's party, but during the absence of the regent at the conferences at York, Maitland of Lethington obtained an extraordinary ascendency over him, and, unfortunately for himself, he was persuaded to give his support to the cause of Mary

The regent Moray's death in 1570 revived the hopes of the queen's adherents, and, being animated with the utmost rancour against their opponents, they resolved on an immediate appeal to arms Assembling at Linlithgow, the chiefs of the queen's faction marched thence to Edinburgh, and held a parliament there, but were soon after compelled to remove to the former town, where they openly proclaimed the queen's authority On the other hand, the leader of the king's party having chosen the earl of Lennox regent, convoked the Estates at Stirling, and issued a counter-proclamation To the assistance of the latter, Sir William Drury, marshal of Berwick, arrived with a large force from England, and a truce was concluded between the contending factions, which was continued till the end of April 1571 On the day after its expiration, Captain Crawford of Jordanhill, by a successful night attack, surprised the castle of Dumbarton for the regent, and taking prisoner, among others, Hamilton, archbishop of St. Andrews, who had sought refuge in the fortress, that prelate was almost immediately afterwards executed at Stirling, without even the semblance of a trial On the 12th of June, Kirkaldy held a parliament in the queen's name in the Castle of Edinburgh, and in the subsequent September, he projected a well-concerted plan for seizing the regent and all the nobles with him at Stirling, which, owing to the imprudence of those to whom the enterprise was intrusted, proved a failure, but, in the accompanying struggle, the regent Lennox was killed

On the earl of Morton being appointed to the regency, that nobleman set on foot negotiations for an accommodation with the principal leaders of the queen's party, in which he was at length successful. Maitland and Kirkaldy, however, in the expectation of receiving some promised succours from France, still resolved to defend the castle of Edinburgh in the queen's behalf. That fortress was, in consequence, closely invested by the forces of Sir William Drury, who had joined the regent's army with a formidable train of artillery After performing prodigies of valour, Kirkaldy saw his defences battered down, one well destroyed, and the other choked up, his guns silenced, and his provisions exhausted, and in vain offered terms The garrison mutinied, and threatened to hang Maitland over the wall, which compelled Kirkaldy to capitulate, when he surrendered to the English commander, May 29, 1573, on promise of good treatment In spite of this assurance, however, the brave Kirkaldy and his brother were ignominiously hanged at the Cross of Edinburgh, on the third of the ensuing August, and Maitland only escaped the same fate by taking poison

John Knox, with whom he had quarrelled about the end of 1570, as related in the life of the Reformer, had, previous to his death, in November 1572, sent Kirkaldy, by David Lindsay, minister of Leith, the following remarkable and solemn message "Go," he said, "to yonder man in the castle (meaning Kirkaldy)—he whom ye know I have loved so dearly—tell him that I have sent ye once more to warn him, in the name of God, to leave that evil cause, for neither the craigy rock in which he so miserably confides, nor the carnal prudence of that man Lethington, whom he esteems even as a demigod, nor the assistance of strangers, shall preserve him, but he shall be disgracefully dragged forth to punishment, and hanged on a gallows in the face of the sun, unless he speedily amend his life, and flee to the mercy of God." At the instigation of Maitland, Kirkaldy returned a scornful answer, which afterwards occasioned him the most poignant regret. "Begone," he said, "and tell Master John Knox he is but a dirty prophet." On the day of his execution, when he saw the scaffold prepared, says Calderwood, the day fair, "and the sun shining clear," his countenance changed, and Mr David Lindsay, who was with him, asked him the cause. "Faith, Mr David," he answered, "I perceive well now that Mr Knox was the true servant of God, and his threatenings to be accomplished" He then requested him to repeat Knox's message, which he did, adding that he had been earnest with God for him, and was sorry for that which should befall his body, for the love he bare to him, but was assured there was mercy for his soul To this he answered, "I hope in God that, after men shall think I am past and gone, I shall give you a token of the assurance of that mercy to my soul, according to the speech of that man of God" It was about four o'clock in the afternoon that he was thrust off the ladder, the sun being then west, according to Calderwood's minute description, about the north-west corner of the steeple of St Giles' "As he was hanging, his face was set towards the east, but within a short space, turned about to the west, against the sun, and so remained, at which time Mr David marked him, when all supposed he was dead, to lift up his hands, which were bound before him, and to lay them down again softly, which moved him with exclamation to glorify God before all the people" [Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, vol iii p 284] His head, after being cut off, was fixed upon the highest spike in the gate of the castle of Edinburgh, which he had, with the greatest courage and fidelity, defended to the last

KIRKCUDBRIGHT, baron, a title (dormant since 1832) in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1633, on Sir Robert Maclellan, eldest son of Sir Thomas Maclellan of Bombie, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. This family, once very powerful in Galloway, possessed several castles, one of which, now in a ruinous state, built in 1582 by Thomas Maclellan of Bombie, stands in the town of Kirkcudbright. Sir Patrick Maclellan, proprietor of the barony of Bombie, incurred forfeiture in consequence of marauding depredations on the lands of the Douglases, lords of Galloway His son, Sir William, incited by a proclamation of James II, offering the forfeited barony to any person who should disperse a band of gypsies who infested the country, and capture their leader, dead or alive, received back his patrimony, on carrying to the king the head of their captain on the point of his sword. To commemorate the manner in which he regained the barony, he adopted as his crest an erect right arm, the hand grasping a dagger, on the point of which was a Moor's head couped, proper, with the motto "Think on,"—intimating the steadiness of purpose with which he had meditated his enterprise. About the middle of the 15th century, William, eighth earl of Douglas, besieged and captured Sir Patrick Maclellan, tutor of Bombie and sheriff of Galloway, in his stronghold of Raeberry castle, and carried him off to Thrieve castle, for his refusal to join the confederacy against the king (see page 44 of this volume). Sir Patrick's uncle, Sir Patrick Gray, who held a high office near the king's person, obtained a letter from his majesty, peremptorily ordering Douglas to release his prisoner Anxious for the safety of his relative, Gray carried the letter himself The earl professed to receive it with all respect, but desired that Gray should partake of some repast, before entering on a business of so much importance as the perusal of a letter from the king. In the meantime, guessing the purport of the letter, he ordered his prisoner to be put to death before it was opened. He then told his guest that it grieved him sorely to find that it was not in his power to give full effect to the command of his sovereign, and, taking Gray to the place where the beheaded body of Maclellan lay, he sarcastically said, "Yonder, Sir Patrick, lies your sister's son Unfortunately he wants the head, but you are welcome to do with the body what you please." His tragical fate roused the indignation of the country against the Douglases, and soon after the earl was stabbed by the king at Stirling

Sir Robert Maclellan above mentioned, the fourth in descent from Sir William who regained his patrimony, was one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to James VI and Charles I, and by the latter was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of Lord Kirkcudbright, 25th May 1633, to him and his heirs male, bearing his name and arms. He died in 1641, and having only a daughter, was succeeded by his nephew, Thomas, second son of William Maclellan of Glenahannoch, the first lord's younger brother The second Lord Kirkcudbright, a steady royalist, died in May 1647, without issue. His cousin, John, the elder son of the first lord's youngest brother, John Maclellan of Bourg, succeeded as third lord This nobleman was very eccentric and hotheaded, and at first was an impetuous royalist. Being proprietor of nearly the whole of the parish of Kirkcudbright, he compelled his vassals to take arms in the cause of the king, occasioned the ruin of the villages of Dunrod and Galtway, by levying nearly all their male population, and incurred such enormous expenses as completely ruined his estates. At the Restoration, however, his zeal for despotic monarchy seems to have cooled, as he opposed the attempt to force prelacy on Scotland, and even sanctioned a riot created by the people of Kirkcudbright, for preventing the settlement of an Episcopalian minister in the church of that town At the time when some women were sent, as ringleaders in it, to the pillory, he was captured, with some other influential persons, and sent a prisoner to Edinburgh He died, greatly in debt, in 1664 His son, William, by right fourth Lord Kirkcudbright, died in his nonage without issue, in 1669 The family estates had been seized and sold by his father's creditors, and there was nothing left to support the dignity He was succeeded by his cousin, John Maclellan, elder son of William Maclellan of Auchlean, brother of the third lord, but he did not assume the title. He also died in his minority, without issue, and the guardians of his only brother, James, born in 1661, did not allow him to take it either In 1721, in the keenly contested struggle for the representation of the peerage between the earls of Eglinton and Aberdeen, he came forward and voted as Lord Kirkcudbright, but his vote was protested against. He voted also at the subsequent elections till his death in 1730 As he had only daughters, the title then devolved on William Maclellan of Bourness, the heir-male of the body of Gilbert Maclellan, second son of Sir Thomas Maclellan of Bombie, who died about 1504, and was the great-great-granduncle of the first lord He voted as Lord Kirk-cudbright at elections of representative peers in 1787, and the two following years. At the general election of 1741, a protest against the reception of his vote was entered by James Maclellan, eldest son of the deceased Sir Samuel Maclellan, merchant, and at one time lord provost of Edinburgh On this occasion they were both present, and both voted as Lord Kirkcudbright. In 1736, James Maclellan had presented a petition to the king, claiming the title. It was remitted to the lord advocate and solicitor-general to inquire into its statements, and they reported that he had not made out his claim At the election of the 30th April 1742, a protest was, in his turn, taken by William against James, and on this occasion also both were present, James for the last time, and again both voted as Lord Kirkcudbright. One of them was the "Lord Kilcoubrie," whom Goldsmith, in his sneers at the poverty of the Scottish nobility, mentions as keeping a glove-shop in Edinburgh At all elections of representative peers subsequent to that of 1742, except one, William was present and voted On 14th December 1761, the House of Lords ordered him "not to presume to take upon himself the title, honour, and dignity of Lord Kirkcudbright, until his claim shall have been allowed in due course of law" He died soon after He had three sons. The eldest, the master of Kirkcudbright, predeceased his father in 1741. John, the second son, became seventh lord, and the third son, the Hon Dunbar Maclellan, captain R.N, was killed 6th July 1782, in the second engagement with the French admiral de Suffrein, while in command of the Superb, the flagship of Sir Edward Hughes, and was highly spoken of in Sir Edward's despatches, as "an excellent officer in every department of the service."

John, seventh Lord Kirkcudbright, the eldest surviving son, as officer in the army, on petition to the king had his claim to the title allowed by the House of Lords, 3d May 1778, and on the 14th of the same month was presented to King George III as Lord Kirkcudbright. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d regiment of foot-guards in 1784, and retired from the army the following year He died 24th December 1801, in his 73d year He had two sons the elder, Sholto Henry, eighth Lord Kirkcudbright, born 15th August 1771, died, without issue, 16th April 1827, when his brother, Camden-Grey, became ninth lord. Born 20th April 1774, the latter married Sarah, daughter of Colonel Thomas Gorges, and had an only daughter On his death, at Bruges, 19th April 1832, the title became dormant.

KIRKPATRICK, anciently sometimes spelled Kilpatrick, a surname derived from Cella Patricii, the church of Patrick, and the prefix of the name of no less than four parishes in Galloway

The ancient family of Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, who possess a baronetcy, have, according to tradition, held lands in Nithsdale since the ninth century In the reign of David I, (1124—1153,) Yvo Kirkpatrick was witness to a charter of Robert Brus the competitor, lord of Annandale, and Eufemia, his wife, granting the fishing of Torduff to the monks of Holme Cultram. His grandson, also Yvo, obtained from Alexander II. a charter of confirmation of the lands of Kilosburn, [from Cella Osburni] which belonged formerly to his ancestors, dated 15th August 1232. In the Ragman Roll, among those mentioned as having, in 1296, sworn fealty to Edward I., are Stephen de Kilpatrick, and Roger de Kilpatrick, the latter supposed to be of the Torthorwald branch of the Kirkpatricks. These last afterwards took the name of Carlyle by marriage. Roger Kirkpatrick, successor of John, was one of the attendants of King Robert Bruce at Dumfries, when he met Comyn in the church of the Franciscans in that town, and it was he who, on Bruce's rushing out, and expressing a doubt that he had killed the Red Comyn, despatched the latter, with the exclamation, "You doubt! Ise mak sicear," (or sure,) which became the motto of his family, their crest being a hand holding a dagger, in pale, distilling drops of blood. In 1314 he was sent on an embassy to England, in company with Sir Neil Campbell, ancestor of the duke of Argyle. Roger's son, Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, besides inheriting Closeburn, for his father's signal services and his own to his sovereign and country, got the lands of Redburgh in the sheriffdom of Dumfries, as the charter of Robert Brus bears, dated at Lochmaben, 4th January in the 14th year of his reign.

In 1355, Sir Thomas' son, Sir Roger, who remained faithful amidst the general defection of the nobles, distinguished himself by taking from the English the castles of Caerlaverock and Dalswinton, and thus preserved the whole territory of Nithsdale in allegiance to the Scottish crown The historian, John Major, says he levelled the former with the ground. This, however, could not be literally true, as he continued to reside in it till his assassination by his kinsman, Sir James Lindsay, in 1357 No known cause of quarrel existed between them, except that Kirkpatrick, as tradition records, had married a lady to whom Lindsay was greatly attached Lindsay expiated his crime with his life, having been executed by order of David II. 'The Murder of Caerlaverock' is the subject of a very spirited ballad by the late Mr Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe. Sir Roger's son, Winfred or Umfrey, in addition to the lands of Redburgh, got those of Torthorwald, in the debateable district between Lower Nithsdale and Lower Annandale. The son, or grandson of the latter, Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, made a resignation of the baronies of Closeburn and Redburgh into the hands of Robert duke of Albany, earl of Fife, and governor of Scotland, for a new charter of Tulxie, to himself and his heirs male, dated at Ayr, 14th October 1409 He was succeeded by his brother, Roger Kirkpatrick, who was one of the gentlemen of inquest in serving William Lord Somerville heir to his father, Thomas Lord Somerville, before Sir Henry Preston of Craigmillar, sheriff-principal and provost of Edinburgh, 10th June 1485, when he had on his seal, appended to the retour, the escutcheon of his arms, supported with two lions guardant, though afterwards the supporters were two talbots (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 147). In 1348, his son, Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, was one of the conservators of the truce with England. His descendant, Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, knight, a gentleman of the privy chamber to James VI., obtained from that monarch a patent of free denizen within the kingdom of England in 1603, and died about 1628.

His great-grandson, Thomas Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, for his unshaken fidelity to Charles I., was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 26th March 1685 His eldest son, Sir Thomas, second baronet, had four sons and a daughter. The eldest of these, Sir Thomas, third baronet, by his marriage with Susannah, daughter and heiress of James Grierson of Capenoch, brought that estate into the family Of the ancient castle of Closeburn, a square tower about 50 feet high, consisting of a ground floor and three vaulted apartments, Grose has given a drawing in his 'Antiquities of Scotland.' The mansion-house, built by the first baronet, partly with the materials of the old residence, was burnt to the ground, through the carelessness of drunken servants, on the night of the 29th August, 1748, and all the family papers, portraits, plate, &c. therein consumed. He had eight children, and died in October 1771. His second and eldest surviving son, Sir James, fourth baronet, commenced in 1772 the limeworks tech in Closeburn and Keir, which have proved most beneficial to the district. In 1788 he sold the estate of Closeburn to Mr Menteth, and died 7th June 1804. His son, Sir Thomas, the fifth baronet, Sheriff of Dumfries-shire, married Jane, daughter of Charles Sharpe, Esq. of Hoddam, and died in 1844, when his son, Sir Charles Sharpe Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, born in 1808, became sixth baronet.

The younger brother of the 3d baronet of Closeburn, William Kirkpatrick of Ellisland, married a daughter of Lord-justice-clerk Erskine. Their son Charles, succeeding to the estate of Hoddam, assumed the name of Sharpe, and was father of General Matthew Sharpe, M P for the Dumfries burghs, who died in 1841, and of the antiquary and wit, Mr Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe of Hoddam, who died in 1851 (See memoir of him, vol 3.) The latter drew up a chart of the family tree of the Kirkpatricks of Closeburn.

From a branch of the Kirkpatricks, styled of Conheath, is descended the Empress Eugenié, consort of Napoleon III of France. According to one account, this branch springs from Alexander Kirkpatrick of Kirkmichael, 2d son of the 3d Roger de Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, the barony of Conheath having been bestowed on him as the reward of his valour in making a captive of the 9th earl of Douglas at Burnswark in 1484 Another account grafts it on the main tree at a much more recent date The Empress Eugenie's great-great-grandfather joined the standard of the Pretender in 1745, and being taken prisoner, died on the scaffold. His son left Scotland, and settled at Ostend, whence the family emigrated to Spain

About the middle of the 18th century, William Kirkpatrick, cousin-german of Sir James Kirkpatrick, baronet of Closeburn, was proprietor of the estate of Conheath, parish of Caerlaverock. The estate had originally been one of the numerous possessions of the Closeburn family, of which he was a cadet, but had passed out of their hands, and was repurchased by Mr Kirkpatrick's grandfather Mr Kirkpatrick himself had a very large family, the only remaining member of which, Miss Jane Forbes Kirkpatrick, residing at Nith Bank, Dumfries, who died Dec. 21, 1854, in her 89th year, was aunt of the countess de Montijo, the mother of the empress Eugenie One of his sons, also named William Kirkpatrick, was for upwards of a quarter of a century a merchant in Malaga, and American consul in that city He married Francisca, eldest daughter of Baron Grivignee, a Belgian, and had one son, who died early, and three daughters. Maria Kirkpatrick, the eldest, married Don Cipriano Palafox, then Count of Teba, a grandee of Spain of the first class, later, on the death of his elder brother, Count del Montijo, issue 2 daughters, the elder married the Duke of Berwick and Alba, and died in Sept. 1860, leaving 3 children, the younger, Eugenie Marie de Guzman, Countess of Teba, born at Grenada May 5, 1826, married January 29, 1853, Charles Louis Napoleon, (Napoleon III.) Emperor of the French, issue, Napoleon, Prince Imperial, born March 16, 1856. William Kirkpatrick's 2d daughter, Carlotta, married her cousin, Thomas Kirkpatrick of Ostend. The 3d daughter, Enriquetta, married the Count de Cabarrus, whose sister was the celebrated Madame Tallien.

KNELAND, (now Cleland,) a surname derived from the lands of Kneland in Lanarkshire. The first of the family on record, Alexander Kneland of that ilk, living in the time of Alexander III, married Margaret, daughter of Adam Wallace of Riccartoun, father of Sir William Wallace, the hero of Scotland. His son, James Cleland, joined his cousin in 1296, in his attempt to restore the liberties of his country In enumerating those who then hastened to the standard of Wallace, Blind Harry (Dr Jamieson's edition of The Wallace and Bruce, p. 80), says,

> "Knelund was thar, ner cusyng to Wallace,
> Syne baid with him in mony peralous place."

He was present at most of the exploits of Wallace, particularly at Loudoun hill, July 1296, at the battle of Stirling, 13th September 1297, and at the disastrous battle of Falkirk, 22d July 1298. He sailed with his illustrious cousin to France, and in the directions in Blind Harry given by Wallace to his men, in the sea-battle with Thomas of Longueville, called the Red Reaver, is this one:

> "Kneland, cusyng, cum tak the ster on hand,
> Her on the waill ner by the I sall stand."

He supported the cause of Robert Brus, and with his eldest son, John Cleland, fought gallantly at the battle of Bannockburn, where he was wounded For his loyalty and good services he obtained from that monarch several lands in the barony of Calder, Linlithgowshire, as already related (see CLELAND, vol i of this work, page 648). The son, who succeeded him, was taken prisoner with David II at the battle of Durham, 17th October 1346.

The representative of the family, James Blackwood Rose Cleland, Esq of Rath-Gael, Ireland, was born in 1835

KNOX, the surname of a family designed of that ilk, who once possessed the lands of Knock, or Knox, in the county of Renfrew, and which claimed to be derived from Utred, the Saxon earl of Northumberland. Several of the name are to be found witnesses, in the reigns of Alexander II and III., in the charters of the abbacy of Paisley (Nisbet's System of Heraldry, vol. i p. 180). The family was also frequently designed of Ranfurly and Craigends, lands which they also possessed in the same county. Nisbet mentions a charter of confirmation of James III, of a resignation of the barony of Ranfurly and Grief castle, by John Knox of Craigends, in favour of Uchter Knox, about 1474. Andrew Knox, a younger son of John Knox of Ranfurly, was in 1606 bishop of the Isles, and in 1622 was translated to the see of Raphoe in Ireland. His son, Thomas Knox, succeeded his father as bishop of the Isles. The family failed in the person of the grand-nephew of Andrew Knox, viz., Uchter Knox of Ranfurly, who had but one daughter, and who sold that estate in 1663, to the first earl of Dundonald.

The celebrated Reformer, John Knox, is traditionally supposed to have been a cadet of this family This however is doubtful, although Dr M'Crie (Life of Knox, Appendix to vol i., note A), states that in a genealogical account of the Knoxes, in possession of the family of the late Mr James Knox, minister of Soone, the Reformer's father is said to have been a brother of the family of Ranfurlie, and "proprietor of the estate of Gifford," in Haddingtonshire In David Buchanan's Memoir of Knox, prefixed to the edition of his "Historie" of 1644, it is also stated that his "father was a brother's son of the house of Ranferlie." Dr M'Crie does not place much reliance on the assertion that the Reformer's father was "proprietor of the estate of Gifford," and thinks that his ancestors had settled in East Lothian as early as the time of his great-grandfather Thus he infers from Knox's own words, quoting from his 'Historie of the Reformation, (p. 306, edit. 1732,) a conversation that the Reformer had with the earl of Bothwell, in which he gave the following account of his ancestors "My lord," he said, "my great-grandfather, gudesire, and father, have served your lordship's predecessours, and some of them have dyed under their standards; and this is a pairt of the obligatioun of our Scottish kindnes."—(Ibid., App note B.) For some curious facts relative to the birthplace of John Knox, the reader is referred to a paper by John Richardson, Esq, Haddington, with supplementary notices by Mr Laing, in the Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, vol iii., part 1, 1860

In Ireland there are several families of this surname, proprietors of estates, of Scottish descent. One of them, originally from Glasgow, possesses the earldom of Ranfurly (created in 1831) in the Irish peerage, and is said to be the representative of the family of Ranfurly in Scotland

KNOX, JOHN, the chief promoter of the Reformation in Scotland, was born in 1505, at a place called Giffordgate, a suburb of Haddington The statement, that the village of Gifford, East Lothian, was his birthplace, is a mistake It was not then built In the suburb of Giffordgate, there were some houses known by the name of Knox's Walls His mother's name was Sinclair, and in subsequent times many of his letters were, for precaution's sake, subscribed 'John Sinclair' He received the rudiments of his education at Haddington grammar school, and studied philosophy and theology at St Andrews, under John Major, then principal of St. Salvator's college His progress in learning was rapid, and he took the degree of M A. before the usual time, after which he taught philosophy as regent of one of the classes in the university About the same time he was admitted into priest's orders long before the age appointed by the canons for receiving ordination. The writings of the ancient Fathers, particularly of Jerome and St. Augustine, opened his eyes to the subtleties of the school theology, and he resolved to attach himself to a more plain and practical method of interpreting the Scriptures than that offered by the writings of the scholastic divines While yet engaged enquiring after the truth, he attended the sermons of Thomas Gwilliam, or Williams, a friar, who had the boldness to preach against the Pope's supremacy. In 1543 Gwilliam was chosen preacher to the Regent Arran "The man," says Calderwood, (vol i p 155,) "was of a sound judgment, reasonable good literature in respect of the time, of a prompt and good utterance his doctrine was wholesome, but without vehemencie against superstitioun Johne Rough, who after suffered for the truthe in England, howbeit not so learned, and more simple, and more vehement against all impietie, preached also sometimes Thus Thomas Gwilliam was a Blacke frier, borne beside Elstone-furde (Athelstaneford) in East Lothian, and provincial of the Blacke friers of Scotland He was the first man from whome Mr Knox receaved anie taste of the truthe" But Knox was still more impressed with the unsoundness of the popish system by the preaching of the celebrated George Wishart, who afterwards suffered martyrdom at the stake, through the persecution of Cardinal Bethune

About 1542 Knox began to disseminate the new doctrines among his pupils, in consequence of which he incurred the hatred of the popish ecclesiastics, by whom he was degraded from the priesthood, denounced as a heretic, and only escaped assassination by flight Being appointed tutor to the sons of Douglas of Langniddrie, and Cockburn of Ormiston, who had embraced the Reformed doctrines, he gave regular religious instruction not only to his pupils, but also to the people of the neighbourhood At this time he appears, as was then not unusual with priests, to have acted occasionally in the capacity of a notary, as, in an odd volume of Protocols belonging to the burgh of Haddington, "Schir John Knox" occurs as a witness to a deed concerning Rannelton, parish of Gordon, Berwickshire, dated March 28, 1543. Two other entries of a similar nature are in the same old Protocol books. He became so

PORTRAIT OF JOHN KNOX.

THE engraved Portrait accompanying the memoir of John Knox in "THE SCOTTISH NATION" is copied, by permission of David Laing, Esq Keeper of the Signet Library, from a head engraved on copper in a rare copy of Verheiden's "Præstantium aliquot Theologorum, &c., Effigies," (published at the Hague in 1602, folio,) in his possession, being the earliest known portrait of the Reformer, excepting the woodcut included by Theodore Beza in his volume entitled "Icones, id est, Veræ Imagines Virorum Doctrina simul et Pietate illustrium," &c., (published at Geneva, in the year 1580, quarto,) which has been re-cut in wood for the Wodrow Society's edition of the "Works of John Knox."

The late SIR DAVID WILKIE, to whom Mr Laing lent the "Effigies," of Verheiden above referred to for the purpose of copying Knox's portrait, and whose opinion in this matter was second to none, was inclined to prefer this of Verheiden to any at least of the later portraits of the Reformer. The great loss sustained to the fine arts by the death of this eminent painter before he had finished the most exquisite design of "Knox dispensing the Sacrament," prevented also (except in the original work) any copy of this portrait in Verheiden from being given to the world until now Lord Torphichen's picture at Calder House, engraved for Dr M'Crie's Life of Knox, is a portrait of the Reformer, and it may have been copied from an old painting, but at best it is a harsh and disagreeable likeness, painted at least a century after Knox's death

"When the engraved pseudo-portraits of Knox," says Mr Laing, "are brought together, it is quite ludicrous to compare the diversity of character which they exhibit. Besides the ordinary likeness with the long flowing beard, copied from bad engravings to worse, we have the Holyrood one not unworthy of Holbein of a mathematician with a pair of compasses, the head at Hamilton Palace which might serve for the Hermit of Copmanhurst, and others that would be no unsuitable illustrations to any account of the fools and jesters entertained at the Scottish Court."

JOHN KNOX

obnoxious to Cardinal Bethune, and, after his death, to his successor, Archbishop Hamilton, that he was again driven to seek safety in concealment, and had frequently to change his place of residence. At length, about Easter 1547, being then in his forty-second year, he took refuge, along with his pupils, among the assassins of the cardinal in the castle of St. Andrews, where he resumed his duties of teaching, giving lectures on the Scriptures, and regularly catechising his hearers in the parish church. Being publicly called to the ministry in presence of the congregation at St. Andrews, by Mr John Rough, already mentioned as a Reformed preacher, he at once accepted the charge thus solemnly imposed upon him, and preached the principles of the Reformation with extraordinary boldness With Rough, he was summoned before a convention of church dignitaries to answer for the heretical doctrines which they taught, when Knox sustained a theological disputation with a Grey friar, named Arbukill, with so much success, that the Romish clergy found it expedient to avoid all such controversial displays for the future

The castle of St Andrews having been closely invested by the French force sent to the assistance of the regent Arran, the garrison, after a brave and vigorous resistance, was compelled to capitulate, and all within it, including Knox, were conveyed to France as prisoners of war Most of them were confined in different prisons, but Knox, with some others, was detained for about nineteen months on board the galleys While in this situation, he wrote a Confession of his Faith, and transmitted it to the adherents of the Reformed religion in Scotland He was set at liberty about February 1549, being indebted for his release to the personal interposition of Edward VI with the king of France, and immediately passed over to England His reputation and zeal recommended him to Archbishop Cranmer, who was then endeavouring to advance the Reformation, and he was appointed by the privy council preacher of the Reformed doctrines at Berwick, where he laboured with singular success for about two years. He was afterwards removed to Newcastle, where he had successfully defended his doctrines before the bishop of Durham, and was thus placed in a sphere of greater usefulness. In December 1551 he was nominated one of the chaplains in ordinary to Edward VI., and preached before his majesty at Westminster. He was offered the living of Allhallows, in London, which he declined He also refused the bishopric of Rochester, not approving of the liturgy, and considering the Episcopal office destitute of divine authority

On the accession of the bigot Mary to the English throne in July 1553, he entered on a course of itinerant preaching in the counties of Buckingham and Kent, but at last finding England no longer safe for him, he proceeded to France, arriving at Dieppe January 28, 1554 He afterwards visited Geneva, where he formed a close intimacy with his brother-reformer John Calvin The persecution of the Protestants in England being at that time very severe, numbers of them emigrated to the Continent, and in September of the same year, he received an invitation from the congregation of English refugees at Frankfort to become their minister At the request of Calvin, he accepted it, and continued to officiate until embroiled in a dispute with Dr Cox, afterwards bishop of Ely, and some other of the English exiles, concerning the Service Book of King Edward, rejected by him, but for which they earnestly contended Having in his 'Admonition to the Professors of the Gospel in England,' published shortly before, boldly styled the emperor of Germany "as great an enemy to Christ as Nero," his opponents in the congregation accused him to the senate of treason Receiving private notice of his danger, he retired to Geneva, whence, after a residence of a few months, he ventured in the autumn of 1555 to return to his native country

He immediately commenced preaching at Edinburgh, and various other places, with untiring zeal and energy, and his addresses produced so great an excitement that the Romish clergy, alarmed at his progress, summoned him to appear before them in the church of the Blackfriars at Edinburgh, May 15, 1556 On the 14th he came to the metropolis, attended by such a formidable retinue that his opponents were glad to drop the prosecution for the time. At the request of the Lords Glencairn and Marischal he now addressed a letter to the queen regent, earnestly exhorting her to hear the Protestant doctrines, which she scornfully handed to the archbishop of Glasgow, saying, "Please you, my lord, to read a pasquil" About this time the Reformer was strongly urged to revisit Geneva to become the pastor of the English congregation there, and he, accordingly, departed for that place in July 1556 He was no sooner gone than the bishops cited him to appear before them, and in his absence they condemned him to death as a heretic, and burned him in effigy at the Cross of Edinburgh Against this sentence he drew up an energetic appeal, which was printed at Geneva in 1558 In the spring of 1557 he had received letters from the Protestant lords to return to Scotland, and had actually reached Dieppe on his way, when he got other letters containing the most gloomy accounts of the state of the Protestant interest at home These epistles he answered by strong remonstrances against timidity and inconstancy; and after spending some time in France he returned to Geneva. In 1558 he was admitted a burgess of that city, being called in the Register "Jehan Cnox, natif de Hadington, En Escosse" The same year he published his 'First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women,' in which he denounces the rule of female sovereigns About the same time he assisted in making a new Translation of the Bible into English, afterwards called the Geneva Bible, and also published his Letter to the Queen Regent, and his Appellation and Exhortation

In May 1559 he returned to Scotland During the time that the lords of the congregation were assembled at Perth, while the queen regent was at Stirling, having summoned the Protestant ministers to stand their trial there, the bold Reformer preached a sermon in the former city against the idolatry of the mass and image worship The indiscretion of a priest who, immediately on the conclusion of this discourse, was preparing to celebrate mass, excited the mob into fury, and they straightway proceeded to destroy the images and ornaments of the churches and monasteries, and left nothing standing of the latter but the bare walls On June 9 Knox arrived at St. Andrews, where, in defiance of the threats of his enemies, he preached for three successive days; and such was the influence of his doctrine and the effect of his eloquence, that both the inhabitants and the magistrates resolved upon the establishment of the Reformed worship in that town, and several other places soon after followed its example. As at Perth, the excited populace destroyed the images in the churches, and demolished many of the religious houses, the abbey of Scone, and most of the monasteries in the counties of Perth and Fife, were thus despoiled of their pictures, images, and other ornaments These violent proceedings were reprobated by the Protestant preachers and the leaders of the party, and Knox himself described them as the work of "the rascal multitude" About the end of June the Reformer arrived at Edinburgh with the forces of the congregation, and, on July 7, the Protestant inhabitants solemnly chose him for their minister On account, however, of the hostile feeling of the Papists towards him, Willock, a less obnoxious preacher, was soon after substituted in his place by the lords of the congregation, while Knox himself undertook a tour of preaching through the kingdom

At length, in August 1560, the presbyterian religion received the sanction of parliament, the old ecclesiastical courts being abolished, and the exercise of religious worship, according to the rites of the Romish church, entirely prohibited After preaching for some months at St Andrews, Knox resumed his station as minister of Edinburgh, and had a principal hand in composing the Confession of Faith and the First Book of Discipline, which were at this time duly ratified by parliament

In August 1561 the unfortunate Queen Mary arrived in Scotland to assume the reins of government She immediately established a private mass in the Chapel Royal, which excited the zeal and indignation of Knox, who openly declared from the pulpit, "that one mass was more frightful to him than ten thousand armed enemies landed in any part of the realm" This freedom gave great offence to the queen, who had several long and angry conferences with the Reformer, when he uttered his admonitions with an apparent harshness and vehemence which often drew tears from her eyes Having written a circular letter to several of the leaders of the Protestants in behalf of two men who were about to stand their trial for intruding into the palace, in the absence of the queen at Stirling, with the view of interrupting the celebration of mass, the contents were, by the privy council, declared to be treasonable, and Knox was in consequence served with an indictment for high treason At his trial, which took place before an extraordinary convention of the nobility in December 1563, the queen presided in person, and was at no pains to conceal her triumph at finding him in such a position "That man," she remarked, pointing despitefully to the Reformer, "had made her weep, and shed never a tear himself, she would now see if she could not make him weep" The defence of Knox was satisfactory to the court, and he was acquitted by a large majority, much to the mortification of Mary He denounced, with great boldness, the marriage of the queen to Lord Darnley, and the latter, after his union with Mary, being induced to attend his preaching, the uncompromising Reformer, in the course of his sermon, quoted a passage of Scripture, to the effect that children were given them for their princes, and women for their rulers This greatly offended Darnley, and the same afternoon Knox was taken before the council, and prohibited from preaching so long as the court remained in Edinburgh, which was only a few days In 1566, after the murder of Rizzio, to which there is no reason whatever to believe he was privy, he withdrew to Kyle, and did not return to Edinburgh till after the queen's dethronement, having in the meantime visited England

In July 1567 he preached the coronation sermon of James VI in the parish church of Stirling He also delivered a discourse at the meeting of the Regent Moray's parliament in the ensuing December On the assassination of the regent, he preached his funeral sermon, February 14th, 1570; and in October of the same year he was seized with an apoplectic fit, in consequence of which, he became much debilitated in body, though the ardour of his mind continued unimpaired While the queen's party were in possession of Edinburgh, towards the end of that year he denounced from the pulpit, his old friend, Kirkaldy of Grange, then governor of Edinburgh castle and provost of that city, for having broken open the Tolbooth, and liberated one Fleming, who had been apprehended for a murder, under the following circumstances. His cousin, John Kirkaldy, had been summoned to appear in the justice court of Dunfermline, as member of an assize, when he was assaulted by George Durie, son of Durie of that ilk, with whom was one Henry Seton and others, and his life was only saved by the interference of the provost Soon after Seton being in Edinburgh on business of his own, was attacked in Leith, as he was about to embark for Fife, by six retainers of Kirkaldy whom he had sent to baton him, with strict injunctions, however, not to draw their swords On being struck by one of them, Seton drew his rapier to defend himself, but falling over the cable of an anchor lying on the beach, was repeatedly thrust through, and slain on the spot One of the murderers, James Fleming, was apprehended, the other five reached the castle in safety It was on the 21st of December that Fleming was taken out of prison by Kirkaldy, with a female prisoner, suspected of being cognisant of the assassination of the regent Moray, and on the Sunday following, the 24th, John Knox referred to his conduct in strong terms from the pulpit, reproving "as he mycht sic disorder," and affirming "that in his dayes he never saw so sclanderous, so malepart, so fearfull and so tyrannous a fact" If the person, he said, guilty of this act, had been a man without God, "a throatcutter," and such as had never known the works of God, it had moved him no more than other riots and enormities that he had witnessed in his time, but "to see stars fall from heaven," and a man like Sir William Kirkaldy of the Grange "commit so manifest a treason, what godly heart could not but lament, tremble, and fear," for "within these few yeirs man wald have luked for uther fruits of that man than now have buddet furth" (Bannatyne's Journal, page 70, edit 1806) An exaggerated version of Knox's words having reached Kirkaldy, he the same afternoon sent the following letter to Knox's colleague, Master John Craig —

he has spoken further than he is able to justify, for I take God to be my damnation gif it was my mind that that man's blood should have been shed of whom he has callit me the murderer; and the same God I desire, from the bottom of my heart, to pour out his vengeance suddenly upon him or me, whether of us two have been most desirous of innocent blood This I desire you, in God's name, to declare openly to the people At Edinburgh castle, the 24th December 1570"

This epistle Mr Craig refused to read from the pulpit, prudently answering that he durst read nothing there, without the knowledge and consent of the Church, and "so that dart being shot," as Calderwood says, "the force of it vanished," and Kirkaldy immediately lodged a complaint against Knox with the kirk session of Edinburgh, for the vindication of his honour, his good name and fame, as publicly as they had been assailed On the following Sunday Knox took the opportunity of explaining from the pulpit the true meaning of his words, which had been greatly misrepresented; on which the laird of Grange withdrew his complaint, on Knox's words and declaration being put in writing Appearing before the session, the Reformer earnestly besought them to admonish Kirkaldy of the great offence he had committed, and the superintendent of Lothian was sent to the castle for the purpose The fourth Sunday after, the laird of Grange, after being absent from church for nearly a year, appeared there in compliment to Margaret, countess-dowager of Moray, on which occasion he was attended by a train composed of the same soldiers who had been engaged in Seton's death, and the release of Fleming from the Tolbooth In his sermon that day, Knox, taking this to be an attempt to intimidate him, dwelt particularly "on the sinfulness of forgetting benefits received from God," and warned "proud contemners" that God's mercy appertained not to such as with knowledge proudly transgressed, and more proudly maintained and defended their transgression (Bannatyne's Journal, p 235) Kirkaldy deeming these remarks levelled at himself, made use of some very threatening language against the preacher, and a report soon spread that he had become the enemy of Knox, and intended to take his life The barons of Kyle and Cunningham sent him a letter of remonstrance, in which, after reminding him of his former adherence to the cause of the Reformation, they mentioned the rumours that had reached them, and solemnly warned him of any attempts to injure Knox, "that man whom God had made the first planter and waterer of his church among them." This letter, sent from Ayr, bore the signatures of Knox's father-in-law, Lord Ochiltree, the earl of Glencairn, and eleven lesser barons

On the meeting of the General Assembly in March 1571, an anonymous libel, accusing Knox of publicly speaking and railing against the queen, having been affixed upon the Assembly-house door and other places, was brought by him, through his servant, Richard Bannatyne, under the notice of the Assembly. On coming there the said Richard thus addressed them "It hath pleased God to make me a servant to that man of God, John Knox And if I knew he were a false teacher, a seducer and raiser of schisms, or one that maketh division in the kirk of God, as he is reported to be by the former accusations, I would not serve him for all the substance in Edinburgh." He therefore solicited "some public edict, that ye approve his doctrine, that thereby the rest of the ministry bearing part of the burden with him, which, in my judgment, now lyeth only on his back, the enemies have not occasion to say, 'It is only John Knox that speaketh against the queen,'" &c They all answered they would bear their part of the same burden with him He craved an act thereupon, but it was refused (Calderwood, vol iii p 46)

The unceasing attacks of his enemies, which more than once placed his life in jeopardy, compelled Knox to retire to St Andrews in May 1571 He remained there till the end of August 1572, when he returned to Edinburgh His last public act was the admission of Mr James Lawson, sub-principal of the King's college of Aberdeen, as his successor, November 9, 1572 His bodily infirmities now daily increased. By an unwearied application to study, as well as by the frequency and energy of his public discourses, he had worn out a constitution naturally strong On the 11th of the same month he was attacked with a cough, which confined him to his bed, and he sustained his last illness with the utmost forti-

-tude and pious resignation." He died November 24, 1572, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Giles, now the Parliament Square, Edinburgh, his remains being attended to the grave by many of the nobility, and by crowds of mourning citizens. The earl of Morton, the newly elected regent, who was present, pronounced his eulogium, in the often-quoted words, "There lies he who never feared the face of man"

John Knox was distinguished above all the Reformers of his time for his exalted principles, great intellectual energy, undaunted intrepidity, and exemplary piety and morality He was twice married: first to Marjory Bowes, daughter of a gentleman at Berwick, by whom he had two sons, and who died in 1560, and, second, in March 1564 to Margaret Stewart, daughter of Lord Ochiltree His 'History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland' was published after his death, and to the fourth edition (Edinburgh, 1732) are appended all his other works, a list of which follows

KNOX, WILLIAM, a minor poet, was born in 1789, in Roxburghshire, where his father was a respectable farmer Sir Walter Scott, in his Diary, says that "he himself, succeeding to good farms under the duke of Buccleuch, became too soon his own master, and plunged into dissipation and ruin His talent then showed itself in a fine strain of pensive poetry, far superior to that of Michael Bruce I wished to do what I could for this lad, whose talent I really admired I had him at Abbotsford (about 1815), but found him unfit for that sort of society I tried to help him, but there were temptations he could never resist He scrambled on, writing for the booksellers and magazines, and living like the Otways, and Savages, and Chattertons of former days, though I do not know that he was in extreme want. His connexion with me terminated in begging a subscription or a guinea, now and then His last works were spiritual hymns, which he wrote very well In his own line of society he was said to exhibit infinite humour, but all his works are grave and pensive" (Lockhart's Life of Scott, p 584) His chief forte lay in writing sacred pieces, which were for the most part paraphrases of the Scriptures; but though they abound in spiritual simplicity and tenderness, none of them exhibits either the genius or the promise of Michael Bruce The opening verses of 'The Songs of Israel' are in Knox's best manner, and express his feelings, as regards his domestic relations, with great truth and beauty

Harp of Sion, pure and holy,
Pride of Judah's eastern land,
May a child of guilt and folly
Strike thee with a feeble hand?
May I to my bosom take thee,
Trembling from the prophet's touch,
And with throbbing heart awake thee
To the strains I love so much?

I have loved thy thrilling numbers,
Since the dawn of childhood's day,
Since my mother soothed my slumbers
With the cadence of thy lay,
Since a little blooming sister
Clung with transport round my knee,
And my glowing spirit blessed her
With a blessing caught from thee

Mother—sister—both are sleeping
Where no heaving hearts respire,
Whilst the eve of age is creeping
Round the widowed spouse and sire.
He and his, amid their sorrow,
Find enjoyment in thy strain:
Harp of Sion, let me borrow Comfort from thy chords again!

To habits of the most deplorable dissipation, Knox unfortunately gave way, and in consequence was never out of difficulties In his necessities Sir Walter Scott showed him great kindness, generously sending him money, ten pounds at a time He died at Edinburgh on 12th November 1825, aged 36, his latter years being spent under the roof of his father, who, on retiring from farming, had taken a grocer's shop in that city —Knox's works are KYNNINMOND, the surname of an ancient family who possessed the lands of that name in Fife. Three of its members attained the episcopal dignity Matthew Kynninmond, archdeacon of Lothian under the bishop of St. Andrews, became bishop of Aberdeen in 1172 Alexander Kynninmond was bishop of the same see in 1329, and in his time the city of Aberdeen, in 1333, was burnt by thirty English ships, when his own palace and the houses of the canons were entirely consumed. In 1357 another Alexander de Kynninmond was elected bishop of Aberdeen He laid the foundation of the new cathedral, and in 1381 was sent by Robert II on an embassy to France to renew the ancient league with that country He died at Scone the year after his return The family, about the middle of the 18th century, terminated in an heiress, Grisel Kynninmond, who married Sir William Murray of Melgund, descended from a younger son of the Murrays of Philiphaugh (Nisbet's Heraldry). Sir Gilbert Elliot of Minto, baronet, father of the first earl of Minto, married the heiress of Melgund, and his family assumed the names of Murray and Kynninmond in addition to that of Elliot.

LAIDLAW, WILLIAM, author of the beautiful ballad of 'Lucy's Flitting,' and the trusted friend of Sir Walter Scott, was the son of a sheep-farmer at Black House, on the Douglas Burn, Selkirkshire, in the "Braes of Yarrow," where he was born in Nov 1780. Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, was for some years a servant of his father "In my eighteenth year," he says, "I hired myself to Mr. Laidlaw of Black House, with whom I served as a shepherd eighteen years. The kindness of this gentleman to me it would be the utmost ingratitude in me ever to forget, for, indeed, it was more like that of a father than a master" It was at Black House that Hogg first became a poet, and there he formed a lasting friendship with William Laidlaw He "was," he says, "the only person who for many years ever pretended to discover the least merit in my essays, either in verse or prose." In 1810 Laidlaw's 'Lucy's Flitting,' known to all who take an interest in Scottish song, was first printed in the 'Forest Minstrel' of Hogg He is also the author of the sweet and simple Scottish songs of 'Her bonnie black e'e,' and 'Alake for the lassie' On setting out in life, Mr Laidlaw took a farm at Traquair, and afterwards another at Liberton, near Edinburgh But in the latter he was not successful, and early in 1817 he was under the necessity of giving up the lease of his farm He was on the look out for one at a less rent, when he was invited to Abbotsford, in the capacity of steward, by Mr afterwards Sir Walter Scott, then sheriff of Selkirkshire, who had become acquainted with him in 1800 In Lockhart's Life of Scott, his name is frequently mentioned in terms of confidence, affection, and respect by the great novelist Laidlaw's zeal about border ballads, at the time that Scott was collecting for the 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,' was at that period "repaid," says Lockhart, "by Scott's anxious endeavours to get him removed from a sphere for which, he wrote to him, 'it is no flattery to say that you are much too good' It was then, and always continued to be, his opinion, that his friend was particularly qualified for entering with advantage on the study of the medical profession, but such designs, if Laidlaw himself ever took them up seriously, were not ultimately persevered in" Laidlaw at once accepted the offer to remove to Abbotsford He had, says Lockhart, "loved and revered Scott, and considered the proposal with far greater delight than the most lucrative appointment on any noble domain could have afforded him Though possessed of a lively and searching sagacity as to things in general, he had always been as to his own worldly interests simple as a child. He surveyed with glistening eyes the humble cottage in which his friend proposed to lodge him, his wife, and his little ones, and said to himself that he should write no more sad songs on 'Forest Flittings'" This 'humble cottage' was named Skaeside, and in the letter, dated April 5, 1817, which Scott wrote to him, on his offer being accepted, he says, "Without affectation I consider myself the obliged party in this matter, or, at any rate, it is a mutual benefit, and you shall have grass for a cow, and so forth, whatever you want. I am sure when you are so near I shall find some literary labour for you that will make ends meet." Scott found full employment for him Under his directions, Laidlaw wrote and compiled the Chronicle department and Reviews for the Edinburgh Annual Register He also contributed some articles on Scottish superstitions to the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, afterwards Blackwood's Magazine. In 1819, when Sir Walter was suffering from illness, he and John Ballantyne acted as his amanuenses, and to them he dictated the greater portion of the Bride of Lammermoor, the whole of the Legend of Montrose, and almost the whole of Ivanhoe It is thought that Scott's novel of St Ronan's Well originated in a suggestion of Laidlaw, during a ride that he had with Sir Walter and Mr Lockhart in the neighbourhood of Melrose, in the summer of 1823

On the involvement of Scott's affairs, Laidlaw was removed from Skaeside for a time, and at Scott's death, his superintendence ceased over the estate of Abbotsford He afterwards became factor on the estate of Sir Charles Lockhart Ross of Balnagowan, Ross-shire, baronet, but his health failing, he went to live with his brother, James, a sheep-farmer at Contin, in the same county, where he died 18th May 1845, in his 65th year James Laidlaw survived till 4th March 1850 At his death he was in his 61st year

LAING, MALCOLM, a lawyer and historian, was born at Strynzia, his paternal estate, on the mainland of Orkney, in 1762 He was educated at the grammar school of Kirkwall, whence he removed to the university of Edinburgh, and having studied law, was duly admitted advocate in 1785. On the death of Dr Henry, he was requested by his executors to complete an unfinished volume, forming the sixth of that author's History of Britain, which appeared in 1793 In 1800 he published a 'History of Scotland,' in 4 vols 8vo, remarkable for the searching investigations it contains on disputed points of history, and for the critical ingenuity displayed by the author in the evidence adduced by him to substantiate his views In 1804 he published a new edition of hL History, with a 'Preliminary Dissertation,' in two volumes, on the participation of Mary queen of Scots in the murder of Darnley About 1805 he published an edition of the poems of Ossian, with Notes and Illustrations. He also edited the 'Life and Historie of James VI,' published in 1804 During the short administration of his friend, Mr Fox, he sat in parliament as member for the county of Orkney He married Miss Carnegie of Craigo, Forfarshire, and died, without issue, in 1818, aged 56 His younger brother, Mr Samuel Laing of Papdale, Orkney, author of 'Travels in Norway,' and 'Notes of a Traveller,' and M P. for Orkney, was the father of Mr Samuel Laing of Hordle, born in 1812, appointed financial secretary for India in 1861 Mr Malcolm Laing's works are

LAING, WILLIAM, an eminent bookseller, was born at Edinburgh July 20, 1764 At the usual age he was sent to the grammar high school of Canongate, a seminary, for classical education, which has long been discontinued He served an apprenticeship of six years to the trade of a printer, but in consequence of weakness in his eyes he abandoned this employment, and in 1785 commenced business in the Canongate on his own account as a bookseller In 1786 he began to issue his catalogue of books, which he continued almost yearly, and his business increasing, he removed in 1803 to more central premises on the South Bridge of his native city To modest and unassuming manners he added an uncommonly accurate and extensive knowledge of the book trade, and few surpassed him in an acquaintance with the history of particular editions of the works of the celebrated authors of antiquity, or of the standard price of rare publications. In 1793, during the horrors of the first French Revolution, he visited Paris, with the design principally of extending his knowledge of that particular branch of the business, in which he had now become eminent; and after the peace of Amiens, concluded March 27, 1802, as well as on several successive occasions, he proceeded both to France and Holland, for a similar purpose At a still earlier period, being informed that Christian VII, king of Denmark, had been advised to dispose of the numerous duplicates which were in the Royal Library at Copenhagen, he resolved to undertake a voyage to that country Accordingly, in 1799, chiefly at the suggestion of Niebuhr, the distinguished investigator of Roman history, who was then a student at the university of Edinburgh, he travelled to the Danish capital, where he concluded an arrangement with the privy councillor, Dr Moldenhawer, the king's librarian, which proved satisfactory to both parties

During the war, when there was scarcely any communication with the Continent, Mr Laing commenced the publication of the Greek Historians, following the example of the Messrs Foulis, the celebrated printers of Glasgow, the only persons who had ever attempted any thing of the kind Edinburgh, indeed, although the capital of Scotland, had never been much distinguished for its editions of the classics, the only publications worth mentioning in this department being Ruddiman's Livy, and Cunningham's Virgil, by Messrs Hamilton and Balfour Mr Laing was anxious to rescue his native city from this reproach Accordingly, in 1804 appeared the works of Thucydides in Greek, accompanied with a Latin translation, in six volumes, small 8vo, under the title of 'Thucydides, Græce et Latine Accedunt indices, ex editione Wassii et Dukeri,' edited by the Rev Peter Elmsley, the eminent Greek critic In 1806 was published 'Herodotus, Græce et Latine Accedunt Annotationes Selectæ, necnon Index Latinus, ex editionibus Wesselingii et Reizii,' 7 volumes, small 8vo Herodotus was to have been edited by Professor Porson, but he only proceeded to the beginning of the second book, and Professor Dunbar executed the remainder with singular ability In 1811 appeared the works of Xenophon, under the title of 'Xenophontis quæ exstant Opera, Græce et Latine, ex editionibus Schneideri et Zeunii Accedit Index Latinus,' 10 volumes, small 8vo Mr Adam Dickenson, an unassuming but accurate Greek scholar, superintended this edition with remarkable care, diligence and skill Mr Laing had intended to have followed up the Historians by the publication, in a similar form, of the works of Plato and Demosthenes, but the difficulty of obtaining efficient aid in superintending the press prevented the execution of his plan

Mr Laing devoted much of his time, in his latter years, to the Commercial Bank of Scotland, of which he had been one of the original promoters, and for some years was one of the ordinary directors He died April 10, 1832 At the time of his death, he was the oldest bookseller in Edinburgh engaged in actual business He left a widow and nine children, one of whom, David Laing, Esq had been his partner since 1821, and carried on business till 1837, when he was appointed keeper of the library of the writers to the signet at Edinburgh

LAING, Major Alexander Gordon, an unfortunate African traveller, the son of a classical teacher at Edinburgh, was born in that city December 27, 1793 In his fifteenth year he became an assistant to a teacher in Newcastle, and afterwards took charge of the commercial department of his father's academy In 1809 he attached himself to a volunteer corps, then forming in Edinburgh, and in the following year he received the commission of ensign in the Prince of Wales' Volunteers In 1811 he sailed for Barbadoes, having a maternal uncle there, Colonel Gordon, then deputy-quarter-master-general in that island, who on his arrival, employed him as a clerk in his counting house Being presented with an ensigncy in the York light infantry, he joined his regiment at Antigua. In two years he was made a lieutenant, and soon after, on the reduction of the corps, he was placed on half-pay Exchanging into the 2d West India regiment, he proceeded to Jamaica, but being attacked with disease of the liver, he retired to Honduras, where he was appointed fort-major His illness increasing, he was forced to return to his native country for the recovery of his health During his residence at home, the division of his regiment to which he belonged was reduced, and he was again put on the half-pay list Towards the end of 1819 he went to London, and being appointed lieutenant and adjutant, he was sent to Sierra Leone In January 1822 he was despatched by the governor, Sir Charles M'Arthur, on an embassy to Kambia and the Mandingo Country, and on his return he was sent on a mission to the king of Soolimana With the view of opening up a commercial intercourse with the Soolimas, he left Sierra Leone for the third time, April 16, 1822, accompanied by two European soldiers, and thirteen natives of Africa, and soon after reaching Falaba, the capital of Soolimana, he was seized with a fever which brought on delirium, but being cupped by one of the native doctors, he soon recovered Although within three days' journey of the source of the Niger, he was not permitted to visit it, and his mission altogether proved fruitless

On September 17 he quitted Falaba, and on his return to Sierra Leone, having been, in the meantime, promoted to the rank of captain, he was ordered to join his regiment, then engaged on the Gold Coast in the war with the Ashantees, in which he highly distinguished himself In 1824 he was sent to England, to acquaint government with the state of the Ashantee war An account of his expedition was published in 1825, under the title of 'Travels in the Timannee, Kooranko, and Soolima Countries, in Western Africa' This work was translated into the French, and published at Paris in 1826, with a preliminary Essay on the progress of African Discovery When in London, Captain Laing was successful in being appointed to an expedition about to explore the course of the Niger, and having attained the rank of major, he left England in February 1825 Arriving at Tripoli, on the 11th of the subsequent July he married Emma Maria Warrington, daughter of the British consul at that place, and two days thereafter he proceeded on his journey to Timbuctoo He reached Ensala December 8, from whence he dated his last letter to his relations in Scotland He quitted that place January

10, 1826, and on the 26th entered on the Sandy Desert of Tanesaroff

In an attack from the Tuarics, he received no less than twenty-four sabre wounds, of recovering from which he was seized with a fever He arrived at Timbuctoo August 18, and after remaining there about a month he set out on his return to the coast, but was by his guides treacherously assassinated on the way, about the end of September 1826, and robbed of all his papers, which have never been recovered

LAMBERTON, a surname derived from the lands of that name in Berwickshire, now the property of a family of the name of Renton In Carr's History of Coldingham Priory (page 144) it is stated that a Saxon named Lambert is supposed to have settled here with his followers, and so gave rise to the ton or village, either before the Conquest or within thirty years subsequent to it, as two places adjoining each other bore this name in 1098, when King Edgar bestowed them on the monks of Durham The manorial tenant, who held a part of these lands of the prior of Durham, assumed from them the name of Lamberton In the reign of David I, William de Lamberton was witness to a charter of Earl Henry, son of that monarch, confirming Cospatrick's gift of the villages of Edrom and Nesbit to St. Cuthbert's monks. Henry de Lamberton was one of the barons appointed in 1292, to examine the claims which Robert Bruce advanced to the Scottish crown, and on 28th August, 1296, he swore fealty to Edward I at Berwick Robert de Lamberton also swore fealty to the same monarch, within the chapel of Berwick castle, in June of the same year From this ancient family, which has been long extinct, probably sprung the famous William Lamberton, bishop of St. Andrews, the most distinguished person of the name, by whose advice and assistance the immortal Bruce was encouraged in his efforts to deliver Scotland from the English yoke.

He was previously parson of Campsie and chancellor of the diocese of Glasgow, and was consecrated in 1298, bishop of St. Andrews. On his election he had a dispute with the Culdees, who pretended a right from old times, to elect the bishop of St. Andrews, but the Pope decided the matter against them Bishop Lamberton's name appears in many ancient writs. He was one of the regents for Baliol, when the latter was the prisoner of Edward I in England After Sir William Wallace had, by the jealousy of the nobles, been forced to relinquish the government, Bishop Lamberton, Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, and John Comyn the younger, were appointed guardians of the kingdom, in name and place of Baliol. They immediately besieged Stirling castle, then held for the English, and it shortly after capitulated

In 1305, after the judicial murder of Wallace, a parliament was held at London, in which the Scottish nation was represented by ten commissioners, Bishop Lamberton being one of them. To his keeping, the English king committed the eldest son of the steward of Scotland, who had been given to him as a hostage. When Edward heard of the assassination of Comyn at Dumfries, he demanded back the youth, but instead of restoring his charge, the bishop delivered him over to Bruce. He had entered into a secret league with the latter to support his cause, and he placed the crown on his head, on his first coronation at Scone, 27th March 1306. He had enabled Sir James Douglas, then one of his pages, to join the patriot king, as related in his life. (See page 50 of this volume.)

After the defeat of Bruce at Methven, and the dispersion of his followers, the bishop of St. Andrews was taken prisoner Being found clad in armour, he was carried in chains to England, imprisoned in the castle of Winchester, and only saved from the gallows by the sacred character of his office. The allowance made to a prisoner of his rank shows the value of money in those days. He received daily, for his own expenses, sixpence, for a man-servant to attend him, threepence, for his footboy, a halfpenny, and for a chaplain, three halfpence. On the death of Edward I. in 1307, having made submission to Edward II, and sworn fealty to him, he was allowed to return to Scotland He has been accused of unsteadiness and vacillation in his political conduct, but he lived in turbulent and difficult times, and he certainly exerted all his influence and power, which, as the head of the national church, were very great, to place Bruce upon the throne. By his support of the claims of that heroic monarch, the latter, even when his fortunes were at the worst, secured the favour of the Scottish clergy, and was, in consequence, enabled to set the excommunication of the Pope at defiance.

After the victory of Bannockburn, Bishop Lamberton devoted himself to his ecclesiastical duties with great zeal, and munificently expended his revenues in promoting the prosperity of the church Besides repairing and enlarging the castle of St Andrews, he built the houses of Monimail, Torry, Dairsie, Inchmurtach, Muckhart, Kettins, Lanton, Monymusk, and Stow He built also ten churches, in his diocese, and finished and consecrated the cathedral in 1318. He adorned the chapter house with curious seats and ceiling, furnished the canons with vestments for their service, and their library with books. He also built a palace for the bishop in St. Andrews. He purchased from the abbot and monks of Reading in Yorkshire, and bestowed on the canons regular of his own cathedral, the island of May in the mouth of the frith of Forth, which King David I had given to the said monks, and built a cell upon it for them He died in 1328, and was buried at the north side of the great altar of the High church of St. Andrews.

LAMOND, or LAMONT, the name of a small clan of great antiquity in Argyleshire, included under the name of Siol Enchern, and supposed to have been originally of the same race as the Macdougall Campbells of Craignish According to Highland tradition, the Lamonts were the most ancient proprietors of Cowal, and the Stewarts, the Maclachlans, and the Campbells obtained their possessions in the district by marriage with daughters of that family Their chief, Lamont of Lamont, has still a portion of their ancient inheritance. The ancestor of the Lamonts is traced by Skene to Angus Macrory, who is said to have been lord of Bute, whose granddaughter, Jean, married in 1212, Alexander, the high steward of Scotland. Between 1230 and 1246 Duncan, son of Ferchar, and his nephew, 'Laumanus,' son of Malcolm, granted to the monks of Paisley the lands which they and their predecessors held at Kilmun, and also the church of Kilfinan or St. Finan, now Kilfinan, which grants were, in 1270, confirmed by Engus, the son of Duncan, and in 1295 by Malcolm, the son and heir of 'Laumanus.' In 1456 John Lamond was baile of Cowal, and in 1466 John Lamond of that ilk and the monks of Paisley had a controversy relative to the right of patronage to the church of St Finan, when the former renounced it only on the production of the charters granted by his ancestors, but with respect to the lands of Kilfinan it is expressly stated that these lands had belonged to the ancestors of John Lamont; hence, it is evident that the 'Laumanns' mentioned in the previous deed must have been one of the number, if not indeed the founder and chief of the family "From Laumanns," says Mr Skene, "the clan appear to have taken the name of Maclaman or Lamond, and previous to Laumanns they unquestionably bore the name of Macerachar and clan Ic Earachar There is one peculiarity connected with the Lamonds, that although by no means a powerful clan, their genealogy can be proved by charters, at a time when most other Highland families are obliged to have recourse to tradition, and the genealogies of their ancient sennachies, but their antiquity could not protect the Lamonds from the encroachments of the Campbells, by whom they were soon reduced to as small a portion of their original possessions in Lower Cowal, as the other Argyleshire clans had been of theirs" [Skene's Highlanders, vol ii, part 2, chap. 4] About 1468 the lands belonging to Lamont of that ilk fell to the crown by reason of non-entry, and for nearly a century were held by a branch of the family, known as the Lamonts of Inverin. Smibert says, "For the name of Lamont we must either conclude that it originated in some chief of the hills (De La-Mont) who had gained celebrity in his day and generation, or that it is simply a version of Lomond, near to which lake they dwelt." [Clans of Scotland, p 84.]

According to Nisbet, the clan Lamont were originally from Ireland, but whether they sprung from the Dalriadic colony, or from a still earlier race in Cowal, it is certain that they possessed, at a very early period, the superiority of the district. Their name continued to be the prevailing one, till the middle of the 17th century In June 1646, certain chiefs of the clan Campbell in the vicinity of Dunoon castle, determined upon obtaining the ascendency, took advantage of the feuds and disorders of the period, to wage a war of extermination against the Lamonts. The massacre of the latter by the Campbells, that year, formed one of the charges against the marquis of Argyle in 1661, although he does not seem to have been any party to it. On his arrest at the Restoration, and arrival in Edinburgh, the Laird of Lamont presented a supplication to parliament, craving warrant to cite the marquis and some others, to appear and answer for crimes committed by him and them as specified in the bill given in His indictment bore that certain of his clan having besieged and forced to a surrender the houses of Toward (the old castle of Toward, now a ruin, being the residence of the chief of the clan Lamont) and Escog, then the property of Sir James Lamont, and having violated the terms of the capitulation on which the surrender was made, "did most treacherously, perfidiously, and traitorously fetter and bind the hands of near two hundred persons of the said Sir James' friends and followers," and after detaining them prisoners for several days "in great torment and misery," did, "after plundering and robbing all that was within and about the said house, most barbarously, cruelly, and inhumanly, murder several, young and old, yea, and sucking children, some of them not one month old." And again, "The said persons, defendants, or one or others of them, contrary to the foresaid capitulations, our laws and acts of parliament, most treacherously and perfidiously did carry the whole people who were in the said houses of Escog and Towart, in boats to the village of Dunoon, and there most cruelly, treacherously, and perfidiously cause hang upon one tree near the number of thirty-six persons, most of them being special gentlemen of the name of Lamont, and vassals to the said Sir James."

An interesting tradition is recorded of one of the lairds of Lamont, who had unfortunately killed, in a sudden quarrel, the son of MacGregor of Glenstrae, taking refuge in the house of the latter, and claiming his protection, which was readily granted, he being ignorant that he was the slayer of his son On being informed, he escorted him in safety to his own people. When the MacGregors were proscribed, and the aged chief of Glenstrae had become a wanderer, Lamont hastened to protect him and his family and received them into his house.

Archibald James Lamont, Esq of Ard Lamont, chief of the clan, born in 1818, son of Major-General John Lamont, m. 1st, Adelaide, dr of James Hewitt Massy Dawson, Esq; issue, a daughter, 2dly, Harriet, dr of Col Alex Campbell of Possil, issue, a son, John-Henry, born in 1854, and 4 drs

LAUDER, a surname said to have been originally de Lavedre. The first of the name is stated to have been one of those Anglo-Norman barons who accompanied Malcolm Canmore to Scotland in 1056, and obtained from that monarch certain grants of land, particularly in Berwickshire, to which he gave his own name, being also invested with the hereditary bailieship of Lauderdale. The surname, however, is more likely to have been derived from the Leader water, called by Camden, in his Britannia, Lauder, the vale through which it flows being, from a very early period, called Lauderdale. The Celtic word Lauder, signifying the lesser river, or the river which breaks forth, is thought by some to apply to the Leader, which occasionally, after heavy rains, overflows its banks and overspreads the neighbouring lands. Nisbet (vol i p. 351) says that, sometimes written Lauther, the name is local, from the town and lands of Lauder, that is "Lower than the hills that surround it."

Robertus de Lavedre, the fifth in descent from the first Anglo-Norman of the name, accompanied David earl of Huntington, brother of William the Lion, to the holy land

Another Robertus de Lavedre witnessed a charter of John de Mautelant, ancestor of the noble family of Maitland, to the abbey of Dryburgh

William de Lawedre of Lawedre sheriff of Perthshire in 1251, witnessed a charter of Alexander III

Sir Robert de Lavedre of the Bass fought at Stirling Bridge in 1297 The family of Lauder were the earliest proprietors on record of the island of the Bass, in the frith of Forth, and were usually designated the Lauders of the Bass. According to Henry the Minstrel, Sir Robert de Lauder of the Bass was the associate of Wallace in many of his exploits. In the aisle of the lairds of the Bass, in the old church of North Berwick, a tombstone once bore the following inscription, in Latin-Saxon characters—"Here lies the good Robert Lauder, the great laird of Congalton and the Bass, who died May 1311" (Nisbet, vol i p. 413)

His successor, also Sir Robert de Lauder, had a charter from William de Lamberton, bishop of St. Andrews, of that portion of the island of the Bass, over which the abbey of St. Andrews had until then retained a right, the Lauders having, as stated already, possessed the larger part of it for many generations. This charter, dated 4th June 1316, was carried off from the Grange house near Edinburgh, with a number of other documents and articles, by a housebreaker, in the night between the 18th and 19th September 1836, and has never been recovered This Sir Robert de Lauder was ambassador to England from Robert the Bruce upon various occasions. In 1323, he was one of the proxies in the oath of peace with Edward II He was justiciary of the Lothians and that part of Scotland to the south of the Forth in 1328, and in 1333 he and his son, Sir Robert de Lauder, of Quarrelwood in the county of Nairn, who held the office of justiciary of all the country to the south of the Forth, were present at the disastrous battle of Halidon, under Archibald Douglas, lord of Galloway, regent of Scotland, called the Tyneman, who was slain in the fray Sir Robert Lauder, the son, was constable of the royal castle of Urquhart on Loch Ness, and bravely defended that stronghold, one of the four which successfully held out against the power of Edward III By the title of Sir Robert Lauder of Quarrelwood he granted a charter of lands in and near "his borough of Lauder," to Thomas de Borthwick, which is witnessed by John de Mautelant, the sixth of the Lauderdale family, and his brother, William, and also by his own son, Sir Alan de Lauder, and by his grandson His only daughter, Ann, heiress of Quarrelwood, married in 1385 Sir Robert Chisholme, who in 1364 succeeded his father-in-law, as constable of Urquhart castle (see vol. i of this work, page 640).

Sir Robert's son, Sir Alan de Laudere of Hatton in Mid Lothian, had several charters for different lands about 1370, in the shire of Berwick, from Robert earl of Strathern, afterwards Robert II From him descended the Lauders of Hatton He had three sons, namely, Robert, his successor, William, bishop of Glasgow, and chancellor of Scotland in 1423, who built the steeple of Glasgow, and Alexander, bishop of Dunkeld in 1440

The eldest son, Sir Robert Lawedre of the Bass, surnamed "Robert with the Borest whynger," was one of the ambassadors to the court of Henry V, in 1424, as was also his brother the chancellor, to treat about the liberation of King James I of Scotland, when he was designed "Our Loveit of the Bass." In 1453, he was one of the conservators of the truce between James II and Henry VI of England

His son, Sir Robert Lawedre, about the year 1450 obtained from James II a grant of the manor of Edrington in Berwickshire, and was thenceforth called of Edrington, and designed "son of our Lovet of the Bass." He was a person of some consequence and frequently employed in official business connected with the government of the borders. On the 2d of February 1477, with Lord Home and Adam Blackadder of that ilk, he was deputed by James III, to conduct safely to Edinburgh the persons who were conveying from Edward IV, two thousand merks as an instalment of his daughter the princess Cicely's portion On 13th September 1480 he purchased from Hugh, son of Sir Patrick Dunbar, his lands of Beil, in East Lothian, and his mill of Mersington in Berwickshire. In 1506 he is designed of the Bass, and in 1511 he had a safe-conduct to England from Henry VIII

With regard to his successor, Sir Robert Lauder of the Bass, the following, from Burke's Peerage and Baronetage, as quoted by the late Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, baronet, the representative of the family, and inserted in the Appendix to the first part of the work entitled 'The Bass Rock' (Edinburgh, 1848), may be inserted here

Sir Robert's eldest son was "Sir Robert Lauder of Bass, so designed in a curious indenture between him and the preaching friars of Dundee, of date 1531, which document was also robbed from the charter chest by the housebreaker in 1836, and never recovered Down to this Sir Robert, the titles of Lauder and of Bass were indiscriminately used by the family, and it is his armorial bearings that are given as those of Lauder of Bass in the works of Lindsay of the Mount He married Alison or Mariotta Cranstoun, and died in 1561 Besides his eldest son, Richard Lauder of Lauder, who was his successor, he left a son, Robert, to whom he gave the Bass, and other East Lothian lands, thus creating a separate family with that title." Sir Thomas Dick Lauder adds "This junior family made several changes upon the original family arms, for whilst they preserved the griffon in the shield, instead of the white lion used by the chief, they took angels as supporters, and instead of the crest of the chief family, a tower with a man in a watching posture looking out of it, they assumed the crest of a gannet sitting upon a rock. One of the last lairds of the Bass was with Queen Mary upon Carberry Hill, at the time she was taken to Edinburgh by the lords. Not long after this, this branch of the family fell into decay, after which the Bass underwent various transferences, until it was afterwards sold to the government by Sir Andrew Ramsay, Lord Abbotshall, lord provost of Edinburgh, who was my great-great-grandfather, having been father-in-law to Lord Fountainhall. The sum paid for the Bass was £4,000, and the sale was in October 1671" In Crichton's Memoirs of Blackadder (p. 260) it is stated that "he obtained this sum through the influence of Lauderdale, who had found him a very useful instrument for advancing his purposes." In 1581, James the Sixth visited the Bass, and desirous of obtaining possession of it for the crown, he offered the proprietor whatever he pleased to ask for it, upon which Lauder replied, "Your Majesty must e'en resign it to me, for I'll have the auld crag back again" Either this laird of the Bass or his son was knighted in 1590, on the coronation of Queen Anne, consort of James VI. In 1598 George Lauder of Bass was appointed one of the commissioners to examine into his majesty's debts, and to make arrangements for his proposed visit to the Isles. He was also in October of the same year one of the "special persons" of the estates to whom was remitted the offers of the three Popish lords, the earls of Angus, Huntly, and Errol, to consider and determine. The Bass afterwards became one of the fortresses of Scotland, and in the 17th century was made a state prison for the persecuted Presbyterians.

Richard Lauder of Lauder mentioned in the extract above given, is said in Burke's Peerage and Baronetage to have been a senator of the College of Justice, by the title of Lord Lauder, and as his successor on the bench was appointed in 1575, he is supposed to have died before that year His name, however, does not occur in Brunton and Haig's Historical Account of the Senators of the College of Justice, but, under date July 9, 1575, James Meldrum, younger of Segie, is appointed as an ordinary lord on the temporal side, "in the place of William Lauder of that ilk," of whom no account is given Richard had three sons.

His eldest son was Robert Lauder of Lauder, on the death of whose son and grandson, the direct line was carried on by Robert's next brother, William, who had three sons, namely Robert, who died without issue, William, called "Will of the West Port," who was dirked on the bench, by the earl of Home and a party of Humes and Cranstouns, who, after setting fire to the Tolbooth, broke in upon him while sitting in the court-house of Lauder as hereditary bailie. Having no issue, he was succeeded by his younger brother, Andrew Lauder, whose son, John Lauder of Newington, Edrington, and Fountainhall, at one time a merchant and magistrate of Edinburgh, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1688.

His eldest son, Sir John Lauder of Fountainhall, second baronet, was the celebrated Lord Fountainhall, a memoir of whom is given next page, in larger type. By his wife Janet, daughter of Sir Andrew Ramsay, baronet, also a lord of session, the Lord Abbotshall already mentioned, he had several children He died in 1722

His eldest son, Sir John Lauder, third baronet, married in 1696 Margaret, daughter of Lord Pitmedden, a lord of session, and had two sons.

The elder son, Sir Alexander Lauder, fourth baronet, died, unmarried, in 1780, when the title devolved on his brother, Sir Andrew Lauder, fifth baronet, who married his cousin, Isabella, only child and heiress of William Dick, Esq of Grange, near Edinburgh, and had three sons.

His third and only surviving son, Sir Andrew Lauder, sixth baronet of Fountainhall, and first Dick Lauder of Grange, died in 1820 By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Brown, Esq of Johnstonburn, he had an only son, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, 7th baronet, author of various popular works, a memoir of whom is given at page 632 in larger type. Sir Thomas had 2 sons and 10 daughters. The elder son, Sir John Dick Lauder, who succeeded in 1848 as 8th baronet, born at Relugas in Morayshire in 1813, was for 14 years in the military service of the East India Company on the Bengal establishment. He married Lady Anne Dalrymple, 2d daughter of the 9th earl of Stair, with issue.

LAUDER, Sir John, Lord Fountainhall, a distinguished lawyer and statesman, eldest son of Sir John Lauder, baronet, at one time a merchant and bailie of Edinburgh, by his second wife, Isabel, daughter of Alexander Ellis of Mortonhall, was born in the Scottish capital, August 2, 1646 He studied law at the university of Leyden, and was admitted advocate June 5, 1668 From that period he began to record the Decisions of the Court of Session, and to his labours the profession is indebted for the valuable collection styled 'Fountainhall's Decisions,' published in two volumes folio, 1759, and since republished At the trial of the earl of Argyle in 1681, for an alleged illegal construction of the Test, Lauder acted as counsel for that patriotic nobleman, along with Sir George Lockhart, and six others The eight advocates of Argyle having signed an opinion that his explanation of the Test contained nothing treasonable, were called before a committee of the council, and after being examined on oath, they were dismissed with a censure and warning from the duke of York Previous to this Mr Lauder was knighted, and about the same period he acted as one of the assessors of the city of Edinburgh In April 1685 he was elected to parliament as one of the members for the county of Haddington He was afterwards frequently re-elected, and during the long period that he sat in the legislature of his country, his conduct was characterized by moderation and independence To the despotic measures of the government previous to the Revolution he offered all constitutional resistance, and his zealous support of the Protestant religion was the cause of his being exposed to some trouble in May 1686 He firmly opposed the attempt of James VII. to abolish the penal laws against the Roman Catholics; and his reasons for so doing are inserted at length in his Diary After the Revolution he was appointed a lord of session, and took his seat November 1, 1689, with the title of Lord Fountainhall, and within three months afterwards he was nominated a lord of justiciary In 1692 he was offered the post of lord advocate, which he declined, not being allowed to prosecute the actors in the massacre of Glencoe, an event which has left such an indelible stain on King William's memory

During the protracted discussions on the treaty of Union, Sir John Lauder was regular in his attendance in parliament, acting generally in opposition, and he finally voted against it Soon after age and increasing infirmities compelled him to resign his place in the justiciary court, and some time before his death he also relinquished his seat in the court of session He died in September 1722 He was twice married, and left a numerous family His lordship's MSS are preserved in ten folio and three quarto volumes A work entitled 'Chronological Notes of Scottish Affairs, from 1680 till 1701,' purporting to be "chiefly taken from the Diary of Lord Fountainhall," but drawn up from an abridged compilation by a Mr Milne, a Jacobite writer in Edinburgh, was published in 1822 The Bannatyne Club prepared for private distribution the whole of the Diaries and Historical Collections of this distinguished character

LAUDER, William, a literary impostor, who attempted to ruin the reputation of Milton by charging him with plagiarism, was a connexion of the Lauders of Fountainhall, and obtained his education at the university of Edinburgh While yet a boy, he suffered amputation of one of his legs, in consequence of having accidentally received a stroke from a golf-ball on his knee He acquired a high college character for talent and scholarship, and, devoting himself to teaching for a livelihood, was, in 1731, employed by Professor Watt to conduct the humanity class during his illness In 1738 he issued proposals to print, by subscription, a collection of Sacred Poems, which, published in 1739 by Ruddiman, in 2 vols, under the title of 'Poetarum Scotorum Musæ Sacræ,' is a well known work in Scottish literature Has

ing failed in several applications for employment in Scotland, he went to London, and soon after commenced his singular attack on the fair fame of the author of 'Paradise Lost,' which redounded so much to his own dishonour He began by sending some letters to the Gentleman's Magazine for 1747, the object of which was to prove that Milton, in the composition of his immortal poem, had largely stolen from the works of certain Latin poets of modern date In 1751 he published his charge in a more elaborate and complete form, in a volume, entitled 'An Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost,' 8vo This daring attempt to blast the poetical reputation of Milton created a considerable sensation among the literati of the time The falsehood of Lauder's representations was, however, fully exposed by Dr Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, in a letter published the same year, addressed to the earl of Bath, entitled 'Milton Vindicated from the charge of Plagiarism, brought against him by Lauder, and Lauder himself convicted of several Forgeries and gross Impositions on the Public,' in which he showed that the passages cited from Massenius, Staphorstius, Taubmannus, and others, had been interpolated by Lauder himself from Hogg's Latin Translation of the Paradise Lost The appearance of this able refutation overwhelmed Lauder with confusion He subscribed a confession dictated by Dr Johnson, who had allowed himself to be imposed upon by his statements, and had even lent himself to the fraud, by writing a preface and postscript to Lauder's work In 1754, Lauder, with a pertinacity that appears almost the effect of insanity, renewed his attack in another shape, by publishing a pamphlet, entitled 'The Grand Impostor Detected, or Milton convicted of Forgery against King Charles the First,' which was answered in the Gentleman's Magazine of the same year Finding his character utterly ruined, he quitted the kingdom, and for some time taught a school in Barbadoes, where he died about 1771

LAUDER, Sir Thomas Dick, Baronet, of Fountainhall and Grange, an eminent author, the eldest son of Sir Andrew Lauder, baronet, of Fountainhall in Haddingtonshire, was born in 1784 In early life he entered the army, and was for a short time in the 79th regiment (Cameronian Highlanders) He afterwards took up his residence in Morayshire, and married Miss Cumin, the only child and heiress of George Cumin, Esq, proprietor of the estate of Relugas, on the banks of the Findhorn Here he resided till 1832, when he removed to the Grange near Edinburgh He had succeeded to the baronetcy in 1820 He early distinguished himself by an accurate and admirable paper on 'The Parallel Roads of Glenroy,' in Inverness-shire, which he read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and which may be regarded as the foundation of his literary fame In it, he propounded a theory to account for their formation, which still holds its interest amid the numerous later speculations on the same curious subject He also wrote a description of the famous travelled stone on the Nairnshire coast, which formed one of the first facts that led to the more fertile speculations about ice transformations over a great part of the earth's surface

In descriptive and imaginative literature, he soon acquired a name of great distinction He was one of the first contributors to Blackwood's Magazine, which was started in 1817, and his premier offering to that periodical, entitled 'Simon Roy, gardener at Dumphail,' was written with so much vigour and felicity of style, that it was mistaken for a production of Sir Walter Scott Sir Thomas wrote for several other magazines of that period, and for the Edinburgh Cyclopedia he drew up an excellent statistical account of Morayshire He also published two romances, 'Lochandhu,' in 1825, and 'The Wolf of Badenoch,' in 1827, connected with Scottish life and history, the scenes of which were laid in localities of Morayshire These works, besides being very popular in this country, were translated into several of the continental languages His power of forming vivid conceptions of external nature was very great, and his glowing and graphic descriptions leave a strong impression on the mind of the reader His delineation of character was also vivid and acute, but it was inferior to his descriptive powers In depth and individuality, indeed, his characters are somewhat deficient. His most popular work, and by far the most happy effort of his pen, was his interesting account of 'The Moray Floods in 1829;' two editions of which were published This work comprises a valuable amount of statistical and historical information, with touches of pathos and humour rarely equalled Sir Thomas was then a resident of Morayshire, and an eye-witness of the scene of devastation, and he took an active part in alleviating the widespread distress caused by the floods.

In 1839, Sir Thomas was appointed secretary to the Board of Scottish Manufactures Immediately afterwards, the lords of the treasury consolidated this board with that of the Fisheries, and Sir Thomas became, in addition, secretary to the Honourable, the board of British White Herring Fishery, both of which offices were further consolidated by the Act 10 and 11 Vict c 91 The duties of his secretaryship he continued sedulously to discharge, till interrupted by his last illness, and in the board of manufactures he was the means of introducing a most useful and important improvement. Perceiving that, in the present age of extended commerce and manufactures, the original intention of the board had, in one respect, been superseded, he suggested that the best mode of employing the funds at their disposal would be in the extension of schools, for the arts of mechanical design and for the fine arts, and, with the sanction of the directors, he had soon the gratification of carrying their plans into complete and efficient operation He was for some time secretary to the Royal Institution for the encouragement of the Fine Arts, an office which he relinquished about two years before his death He was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and a deputy-lieutenant of the counties of Moray and Haddington

His official duties involved an annual survey of the British coasts, in reference to the fisheries, and every year he devoted his attention to different parts of the coast, sometimes visiting the ports of exportation on the coast of England, but more generally the Scottish shores The results of one of the most memorable of these excursions have been given to the world in the joint work of Sir Thomas Dick Lauder and Mr Wilson, the naturalist, when they sailed round the north of Scotland in 1842 Sir Thomas' books of directions for the taking and curing of herring, cod, ling, tusk, &c., have been translated into Gaelic for the information of the Highlanders, and circulated both in the Gaelic and English languages.

In politics, Sir Thomas, at one period, took a very prominent part in the interest of the liberal party, but on his official appointment in 1839, he retired altogether from political life As a public speaker he was fluent and effective

His latest literary productions were a series of papers descriptive of the Rivers of Scotland, which appeared in Tait's Magazine from 1847 to 1849, to which periodical he had been a constant contributor from the first

Sir Thomas Dick Lauder died on 29th May, 1848 In private life he was highly esteemed His manners were fascinating, and his conversation seasoned with anecdotes and traits of character, and ancient lore Easy of access, he was ever ready to befriend the struggling man of genius, either in literature or the arts, who claimed his assistance Of a highly accomplished mind, he had a taste for architecture, landscape gardening, and other elegant and rural pursuits

LAUDERDALE, earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1624, on John, second Lord Maitland of Thirlestane (see MAITLAND, surname of) His father, the first Lord Maitland of Thirlestane, was lord high chancellor of Scotland, and on his death in 1595, King James VI wrote his epitaph in English poetry His mother was Jean only daughter and heiress of the fourth Lord Fleming, subsequently countess of Casselis, to whom he was served heir, on 31st August 1609. He was admitted a privy councillor on 20th July 1615, and on 2d April following was created viscount of Lauderdale, by patent, to him and his heirs male and successors in the lordship of Thirlestane. Besides being president of the council, he was appointed an ordinary lord of session, 5th June 1618. He was at this time one of the commissioners for the plantation of kirks. He was created earl of Lauderdale, Viscount Maitland, and Lord Thirlestane and Boltoun, by patent, dated at Whitehall, 14th March, 1624, to him and his heirs male, bearing the name and arms of Maitland Removed from his place on the bench, on 14th February 1626, in consequence of a resolution of Charles I that no nobleman should hold the seat of an ordinary lord, he was on the 1st June following appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session It may be explained here that by the original constitution of the court, the king was allowed to nominate three or four additional or extraordinary lords, removable at his pleasure, but often appointed seven or eight. They were either noblemen or high dignitaries of the church These extraordinary lords had no emolument, attended the court only at such times as they themselves thought proper, and were rarely there except when their own or a friend's interest was at stake, when they came forward and voted as profit or caprice dictated Their appointment was put a stop to by the statute George I c. 19, and the last who held the office was John Hay, marquis of Tweeddale, who died on 9th December 1762 (Brunton and Haig's Senators of College of Justice. Introduction, p. xlvii)

Lord Lauderdale continued an extraordinary lord till 8th November 1628, and in 1639 he was appointed one of the lords of the articles. On the breaking out of the civil war, he joined the side of the parliament, and was employed in a great variety of commissions of importance. On 4th June 1644 he was elected president of the parliament, and reappointed on 7th January following He died before the 20th of the same month, and was interred in the family burial-place at Haddington A poetical epitaph on him by Drummond of Hawthornden, as also the one by King James VI, on his father, the chancellor, will be found inserted in Crawford's Peerage. Crawford says (p. 253) that the first earl of Lauderdale "was a nobleman of great honour and probity, and managed his affairs with so much discretion that he made considerable additions to his fortune," also that "he made an exact inventory of all his charters and writs, and the charter chest of the family being concealed under ground in the time of the civil wars, the writs were so entirely defaced that they were become unintelligible, but by reason of the character his lordship had for integrity, the inventory was, by order of parliament, appointed to supply the place of the ancient records of the family, the clerk register signing every page thereof" By his countess, Lady Isabel Seton, second daughter of Alexander, earl of Dunfermline, high chancellor of Scotland, the first earl of Lauderdale had seven sons and eight daughters. She died in November 1638, and is celebrated by Arthur Johnston in his poems, as is also one of her daughters, who died before her Of the earl's large family, only three sons and one daughter survived their parents. The sons were John, duke of Lauderdale, the Hon Robert Maitland, a zealous loyalist, fined by Cromwell £1,000 in 1654, who married Margaret, only daughter of John Lundin of Lundin, in Fife, on whose death in January 1648, that estate devolved upon her and descended to her son, and Charles, third earl of Lauderdale.

John, second earl and only duke of Lauderdale, whose oppressive and tyrannical proceedings while at the head of the government in Scotland, have acquired for him a name odious in history, was born at Lethington, May 24, 1616. In the early part of his career he was one of the most zealous supporters of the Covenant, and being much trusted by the Presbyterian party, he was, in 1643, appointed one of the commissioners from the Church of Scotland to the assembly of Divines at Westminster In 1644, he was sent from the estates with other Commissioners, to treat with Charles I at Uxbridge. He succeeded his father in 1645, and was frequently employed as a commissioner in the subsequent transactions relative to the king, for which purpose he resided for about four years in London. On the unsuccessful termination of the several conferences he joined the king's cause, and for his relief in 1648, was one of the warmest promoters of "the Engagement." When preparations were making for it he was sent by the committee of estates, with Sir William Fleming, to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II, who then lay with a fleet in the Downs, to invite him to come to Scotland. The prince gave him a hearty welcome, and then began that intimacy between them which was renewed after the Restoration, and led to such a bitter persecution of his former friends the Covenanters.

Lord Lauderdale formed one of Charles the Second's little court at the Hague, and in 1650 accompanied him to Scotland. On his arrival, however, Charles was obliged, at the request of the estates, to dismiss him and other "Engagers" from his presence, as by the act of Classes passed 4th June the same year, they were debarred from returning to the kingdom, or remaining therein, "without the express warrant of the estates of parliament." (Balfour's Annals, vol iv p 42) He was with the king at the battle of Worcester September 3, 1651, where he was taken prisoner, and confined first in the Tower, and afterwards in Windsor castle. He did not obtain his liberty till the Restoration, when he was appointed principal secretary of state in Scotland. A contemporary author says, "Chancellor Hyde endeavoured to make Lauderdale chancellor, under pretence of rewarding his sufferings, but really to remove him from a constant attendance at court. But Lauderdale, foreseeing that he who was possessed of his majesty's ear would govern all, thought fit to reside in London, and so that employment was bestowed on Glencairn" (Memoirs of the Hist. of Scotland, page 8.)

When the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland was proposed, Lauderdale was at first a strong advocate for presbyterianism, and he told Bishop Burnet that "the king spoke to him to let that go, for it was not a religion for a gentleman" (Burnet's Hist. of his Own Times, vol i. p 197) In 1661, Middleton, Glencairn, and Rothes went to London and urged upon the king to make episcopacy the dominant religion in Scotland Lauderdale opposed its immediate introduction, and recommended that his majesty might either call a general assembly, consult the provincial synods, or summon the ablest divines on both sides to Westminster, to decide upon the matter The result, however, of a long debate in council was that episcopacy was determined upon, and Lauderdale at once fell in with the views of the prelatical party, "as warmly," says Guthrie, "as Middleton himself had done. This astonished Glencairn, who knew Lauderdale to be a violent presbyterian by profession" (Guthrie's General History, vol x p 96) The substance of a remarkable conversation which took place on the subject between these two noblemen, is given in the memoir of the ninth earl of Glencairn, at page 318 of this volume It is also related that as Lauderdale came out from the council, at which prelacy was resolved upon, he met Dr, afterwards Archbishop Sharp walking with the earl of Stirling, to whom, in an angry tone and threatening gesture, he said, "Mr Sharp, bishops you are to have in Scotland, but whosoever shall be archbishop of St. Andrews, I will smite him and his order under the fifth rib." Whether this story be true or not, it is certain that, from the period of Lauderdale's defeat in the council on the prelacy question, the political rivalry betwixt him and Middleton, the most zealous advocate for its introduction, assumed that feeling of deadly enmity which, two years afterwards, led to the ruin of the latter In a council held in London in 1668, Lauderdale accused Middleton, his majesty s commissioner in Scotland, of many breaches of the duties of his high office, of arbitrary proceedings, and particularly of having accepted bribes from many of the presbyterians, to exclude them from the list of fines. He had procured a letter from the king to the Scottish council, suspending the payment of the fines, but Middleton, anxious to get the money, prevented its proclamation This Lauderdale represented to the king as a daring violation of his royal prerogative, and Middleton was dismissed in disgrace (see MIDDLETON, earl of).

The whole management of Scottish affairs was now placed in Lauderdale's hands, but the persecution of the presbyterians continued unabated Besides being secretary of state, he was one of the extraordinary lords of session, president of the council, first commissioner of the treasury, one of the lords of the king's bedchamber, and governor of the castle of Edinburgh. On the erection of the high court of commission in 1664, Lauderdale was at first opposed to its institution, but afterwards acceded to it. On this Bishop Burnet has the following curious passage 'I took the liberty," he says, "though then too young to meddle in things of that kind, to expostulate very freely with Lauderdale I thought he was acting the earl of Traquair's part, giving way to all the follies of the bishops on design to ruin them He upon that ran out into a great deal of freedom with me, told me many passages of Sharp's past life he was persuaded he would ruin all, but he said he was resolved to give him line, for he had not credit enough to stop him, nor would he oppose anything that he proposed, unless it were very extravagant, he saw that the earl of Glencairn and he would be in a perpetual war, and it was indifferent to him how matters might go between them things would run to a height, and then the king would of himself put a stop to their career, for the king said often, he was not priestridden He would not venture a war, nor travel again for any party" (Burnet's Own Times, vol i p. 375)

In 1669 he was appointed lord high commissioner to the parliament, and he held the same high office in four succeeding sessions, also in the convention of estates in 1678 On the 2d May 1672 he was created duke of Lauderdale, and marquis of March, as descended from the Dunbars earls of March, by patent, to him and the heirs male of his body, and on 2d June following he was installed a knight of the Garter at Windsor In 1674 the English House of Commons voted an address to his majesty to remove the duke from all his employments, and from his majesty's presence and councils for ever, as being a person obnoxious and dangerous to the government, but, instead of doing so, the king, on 25th June of that year, created him a peer of England, by the title of earl of Guildford and Baron Petersham, by patent, to him and the heirs male of his body He was likewise sworn a member of the privy council of England His power had become so great, and his administration so oppressive and arbitrary, that a secret combination was formed against him in Scotland, at the head of which was the duke of Hamilton, and in 1679 the king admitted the latter, and others of his political opponents, to an audience, to complain of his proceedings, at which the earls of Essex and Halifax were present. Sir George Mackenzie, the lord advocate, was also there to defend Lauderdale's administration. The king afterwards expressed his approval of his minister's government in the following heartless words: "I perceive," said he, 'that Lauderdale has been guilty of many criminal actions against the people of Scotland, but I cannot find that he has done anything contrary to my interest." On the arrival of the duke of York in Scotland in 1680, his influence declined He was deprived of all his offices, except that of extraordinary lord of session, which had been conferred upon him for life, and in July 1682 the pensions granted to him and his duchess were taken away He died at Tunbridge Wells on the 24th of the following month, in his 67th year The following is his portrait

Fountainhall says, 'He was the learnedest and most powerful minister of state in his age, discontent and age (corpulency also, it is said) were the chief ingredients of his death, if his duchess and physicians were free of it, for she abused him most grossly, and had gotten all from him she could expect, and was glad to be quit of him" He was twice married first, to Anne, second daughter of the first earl of Home, coheiress with her sister, Margaret, countess of Moray, of her brother, the second earl of Home, and by her had an only daughter, Lady Anne, who married the second marquis of Tweeddale, and 2dly, to Elizabeth, countess of Dysart, in her own right, widow of Sir Lionel Talmash, of Helsingham, in Suffolk, baronet. Having no male issue, the English honours became extinct, and also the titles of duke of Lauderdale and marquis of March His other Scottish honours devolved on his youngest brother

Charles, third earl of Lauderdale, a lord of session under the title of Lord Halton, had married on 18th November 1652, Elizabeth, only daughter and heiress of Richard Lauder of Halton, or Hatton, in Mid Lothian, whereby he became possessed of that property Shortly after the Restoration he was created master and general of the Mint in Scotland, and was sworn of the Scottish privy council 15th June 1661 Eight years afterwards, he was elected one of the commissioners for the shire of Edinburgh, and lord of the Articles in parliament, and on the 8th June of the same year (1669) was admitted an ordinary lord of session. In February 1671, he was appointed treasurer-depute and general of the mint. The same year, when his brother, the duke of Lauderdale, found himself opposed in his proceedings by Archbishop Sharp, the duke of Hamilton, and the marquis of Tweeddale, he called in Lord Halton to be his principal support in the council, where, in the absence of the chancellor and lord privy seal, he enjoyed the honour of presiding. On 12th May 1672 Lord Halton was created a baronet. His overbearing and insolent conduct, as his brother's assistant in the administration of Scottish affairs, was strongly complained of in a paper presented by the duke of Hamilton to Charles II., in 1679, detailing the grievances of the people of Scotland, under the oppressive government of the duke of Lauderdale. On the fall of Lauderdale, Halton's enemies resolved upon his ruin. Burnet states (Own Times, vol. ii. p. 299, ed. 1823) that in July 1681, "As they were going on in public business, one stood up in parliament and accused Lord Halton, the duke's brother, of perjury on the account of Mitchell's business." Like his brother, the duke, Halton had sworn on the trial in 1678 of Mitchell, who was accused of firing a pistol at Archbishop Sharp, that he knew of no promise made to the prisoner that his life should be saved if he confessed the crime. To this passage of Burnet the editor of Burnet's work has added the following note: "It is related that Lord Kincardine sent a bishop to Duke Lauderdale, desiring him to consider better, before he deemed, upon oath, the promise of life which had been given to Mitchell because Lord Kincardine had letters from the duke and the duke's brother in his possession, which requested him to ask the king to make good the promise. On which place of Bishop Burnet's history, the late Lord Auchinleck, Judge Boswell, who was grandson of Lady Kincardine, has written the following observation, inserted here by the favour of his lordship's grandson, James Boswell, Esq. of the Inner Temple: 'The bishop who was sent by my Lord Kincardine was Patterson, bishop of Edinburgh, and those very letters were the cause of Lauderdale's disgrace. For when the duke of York was in Scotland he sent for my Lady Kincardine, and these letters of her. My lady told the duke she would not part with the originals, but that if his grace pleased, he might take a copy of them, which he did, and showed them to his brother, the king, who was stunned at the villany, and ashamed he had employed such a minister, and immediately ordered all his posts and preferments to be taken from him.'" The prosecution against Lord Halton was stopped by the adjournment of parliament, and referred to the King. In November of the same year (1681) a letter was procured from the king, whereby he was deprived of the honour of presiding in council, and at the same time the accounts of the Treasury were ordered to be investigated. In June 1682, a commission was appointed to inquire into the coinage and mint, and upon their report, he was deprived of his offices, and the lord advocate ordered to proceed against him for malversation. On 20th March 1683, he and Sir John Falconer were, by the court of session, found liable to the king in £72,000 sterling. This sum his majesty reduced to £20,000, and ordained £16,000 of it to be paid to the lord chancellor, and £4,000 to Graham of Claverhouse, as a reward for his cruelties towards the persecuted Covenanters. The same year Lord Halton succeeded his brother as earl of Lauderdale, and on 11th March 1686 he was readmitted a privy councillor. He died 9th June 1691. He had six sons and two daughters.

Richard, the eldest son, fourth earl of Lauderdale, was styled before his father succeeded to the title, of Overgogar, and knighted. He was sworn a privy councillor, 9th October 1678, appointed general of the mint jointly with his father, and in 1681 made lord-justice-general. Being suspected, however, of being in correspondence with his father-in-law, the earl of Argyle, who had made his escape out of the castle of Edinburgh, he was deprived of that office in 1684. At the Revolution he went over to France, and joined the court of James VII. at St. Germains. He succeeded his father in 1691, and for his adherence to the exiled monarch he was outlawed by the high court of justiciary, 28d July 1694. Although a Roman Catholic, he disapproved of the violent measures of the abdicated king, and was not admitted to any share in his confidence. He advised King James to intrust his affairs to protestant statesmen, recommending the earl of Clarendon, the non-juring bishops in England, and the Lords Home, Southesk, and Sinclair in Scotland, as the fittest persons to serve his interests. His advice, however, was so little to James' mind that Lady Lauderdale, who was a protestant, was ordered to England, not to return any more, while the earl himself was forbid the court, and reduced to a pension of a hundred pistoles a-year. He retired to Paris, where he died in 1695. His translation of Virgil was printed in two vols. in 1787. Dryden, who saw the MS., adopted many of the lines into his own translation. By his countess, Lady Anne Campbell, second daughter of the ninth earl of Argyle, he had no issue, and the title in consequence devolved on his brother.

John, fifth earl, passed advocate 30th July 1680. He was afterwards knighted, and on 12th March 1685 was elected M.P. for Mid Lothian. Unlike his father, he concurred heartily in the Revolution, and was appointed one of the lords of session 28th October 1689, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Ravelrig, from an estate of that name in Mid Lothian, which he had purchased in 1680. He was also sworn a member of the privy council, and was colonel of the Edinburghshire militia. On succeeding his brother as earl of Lauderdale, he took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 8th September 1696. He supported the treaty of Union, and died 30th August 1710. He married Lady Margaret Cunningham, only child of Alexander, tenth earl of Glencairn, and heir of line of that family, and had three sons and a daughter. James, Lord Maitland, the eldest son, predeceased his father in 1709. He had married in 1702 Lady Joan Sutherland, eldest daughter of the fifteenth earl of Sutherland, and had one daughter, Jean, the wife of Sir James Fergusson of Kilkerran, baronet, a lord of session and justiciary. Her eldest son, Sir Adam Fergusson, baronet, in her right, claimed the earldom of Glencairn as heir general of the tenth earl, but his claim was not allowed (see page 313 of this volume, also Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 73). The other sons were Charles, sixth earl, and Colonel John Maitland.

Charles, sixth earl of Lauderdale, served as a volunteer under the duke of Argyle at the battle of Sheriffmuir, 13th November 1715, and is said to have behaved with great gallantry. He was general of the mint, and lord-lieutenant of Edinburgh. At the general election of 1741 he was elected one of the sixteen representative Scots peers. He died at Hatton, 15th July 1744, in his 56th year. By his countess, Lady Elizabeth Ogilvy, eldest daughter of the earl of Findlater and Seafield, lord-high-chancellor of Scotland, he had nine sons and five daughters. The eldest, James, succeeded him. The other sons were, the Hon. Charles Maitland Barclay of Tillicoultry, who was thrice married, and by his first wife, Isabel Barclay, heiress of Towie in Aberdeenshire, he acquired that estate, when he assumed the name of Barclay, the Hon. and Rev. George Maitland, a dignified clergyman in Ireland; the Hon. Richard Maitland, colonel in the army, died in 1772, General the Hon Alexander Maitland; Rear-admiral the Hon. Frederick Lewis Maitland of Rankeillour, who married Margaret Dick, heiress of Rankeillour and Lindores in Fife, in right of her mother, the sister of James MacGill of Rankeillour, who claimed the title of viscount of Oxfurd, the Hon. Patrick Maitland of Freugh, commander of an East Indiaman; Lieutenant-colonel Hon John Maitland, clerk of the Pipe in the Scottish Exchequer, elected in 1774 M P for the Haddington burghs, and Hon William Maitland, who died young

Sir Frederick Lewis Maitland, son of Admiral Maitland of Rankeillour, the sixth son, distinguished himself as a naval officer, and to him the Emperor Napoleon I surrendered on board the Bellerophon in 1815 He was born at Rankeillour September 7, 1779, and entered the navy at an early age. In his sixteenth year he was appointed lieutenant of the Andromeda, 32 guns. He afterwards served in Lord Duncan's flagship, the Venerable, 74, till 1797, when he was appointed by Lord St. Vincent first lieutenant of the Kingfisher sloop of war, in which he assisted at the capture of many privateers belonging to the French, one of which, La Betsy, a sloop of 18 guns and 118 men, defended herself with considerable bravery Upon the prize-money for this vessel being distributed, the Kingfisher's crew subscribed £50 to purchase Lieutenant Maitland a sword In December 1798, the Kingfisher was wrecked at the entrance of the Tagus, when proceeding to sea under the temporary command of Lieutenant Maitland, who, on his arrival at Gibraltar, was tried by a court-martial, and honourably acquitted Immediately afterwards he was appointed flag-lieutenant to Earl St. Vincent, and on July 7, 1799, was sent to reconnoitre the French and Spanish fleets. Falling in with them the following morning, he was surrounded, and compelled to surrender He was conveyed prisoner to the flagship of Admiral Gravina, who received him with the utmost kindness, and a few days after permitted him to return to Gibraltar, without being exchanged After being commander of the Cameleon sloop, he was, December 10, 1800, appointed by Lord Keith to the Wassenaar, 64, but as that ship was lying at Malta unfit for service, he obtained permission to accompany the expedition against the French in Egypt, where his conduct in command of the armed launches, employed to cover the landing of Sir Ralph Abercromby's army, and in the subsequent battles of March 13 and 21, 1801, obtained him the thanks of the naval and military commanders-in-chief In October 1802, he was appointed to the Loire frigate, mounting 46 guns, two boats of which, during the night of June 27, 1803, carried the French national brig Venteux, lying close under the batteries of the Isle of Bas. In the succeeding March he captured the Brave, French privateer, and in August following, while cruising for the protection of the homeward-bound convoys, after a pursuit of 20 hours, and a running fight of 15 minutes, he made himself master of the Blonde, of 30 nine-pounders and 240 men On June 3, 1805, he entered Muros Bay, on the coast of Spain, and the fort having been gallantly carried by Mr Yeo, his first lieutenant, he took possession of all the enemy's vessels lying in the road. On the 27th of the same month the common council of the city of London voted him their thanks for his distinguished conduct on this occasion, and about the same period he received an elegant sword from the committee at Lloyd's. On October 18, the corporation of Cork voted him the freedom of that city, in a silver box. He afterwards captured the French frigate, La Libre, of 40 guns, and subsequently the Princess of Peace, Spanish privateer. On 28th November 1806, he was appointed to the Emerald frigate, on board of which he made several important captures of French, Spanish, and American vessels. After serving on the Halifax and West India stations, he was, early in 1815, removed to the Bellerophon, 74, in which he was sent to watch the motions of two French frigates and two corvettes lying at Rochefort. While there, he effectually frustrated the plans of Napoleon for his escape by sea, after the battle of Waterloo; in consequence of which the fallen emperor surrendered to him on the 15th of July, on board the Bellerophon On their arrival at Plymouth, and previous to his removal to the Northumberland, his illustrious captive sent one of his attendants to Captain Maitland, proposing to present him with a gold box containing his portrait, set with diamonds, an offer which he declined, and some time after he addressed a letter to the Edinburgh Annual Register, for the purpose of correcting several misstatements contained in that publication respecting his prisoner In October 1818 he was appointed to the Vengeur, 74, on board of which, in December 1820, he conveyed the king of the Two Sicilies from Naples to Leghorn, on his way to attend the congress at Laybach On his majesty's landing, he personally invested Captain Maitland with the insignia of a knight commander of the order of St. Ferdinand and of Merit, and presented him with a valuable gold box, containing his portrait set with diamonds. Subsequently he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral and appointed commander-in-chief in the East Indies. He died on board his flag-ship, the Wellesley, at sea, in the vicinity of Bombay, December 30, 1839 He was nominated a companion of the Bath in 1815, and a knight commander, November 17, 1830 He married an Irish lady, by whom he had no issue

James, seventh earl of Lauderdale, the eldest son of the sixth earl, was for twenty-five years in the army, appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 16th foot, 20th September 1745, he resigned his commission on the promotion of a junior officer above him He was one of the sixteen Scottish representative peers, and under the act of 1747, for abolishing heritable jurisdictions, he got for the regality of Thirlestane and baillary of Lauderdale £1,000, instead of £8,000, which he claimed (Douglas' Peerage, vol ii p 76) He was a lord of police from February 1766 till the abolition of that board in 1782 He died at Hatton 17th August, 1789, in his 73d year By his countess, Mary Turner, only child and heiress of Sir Thomas Lombe knight, alderman of London, he got a large fortune, and had issue, Valdave Charles Lauder, Viscount Maitland, who died before his father, in 1754, James, eighth earl, Lieutenant-general Hon Thomas Maitland, appointed in January 1805, governor and commander-in-chief at Ceylon, three other sons and six daughters.

James, eighth earl, a distinguished public character, was born at Hatton, in Mid Lothian, January 26, 1759 He was early placed under the superintendence of the learned Dr Andrew Dalzel, and after studying at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, he completed his education at Paris. On his return home, he was in 1780 admitted a member of the faculty of advocates. At the general election the same year he was chosen M P for Newport, in Cornwall, and in 1784 for Malmesbury In the House of Commons he rendered himself conspicuous by his steady adherence to the political principles of his friend Mr Fox. He was an energetic supporter of the latter's India bill, and one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. He succeeded his father in 1789, and at the general election in the ensuing year, he was chosen a representative peer for Scotland. On account of his health he went to Paris in August 1792, accompanied by Dr Moore, father of Sir John Moore, who had formerly attended the duke of Hamilton on the Continent, and who, on his return, published a 'Journal during a residence in France from the beginning of August to the middle of December 1792.' The attack on the Tuilleries, and the imprisonment of Louis XVI and his family, took place three days after the earl's arrival in the French capital. After the massacres of the 2d September, the British ambassador having left Paris, Lord Lauderdale deemed it unsafe to remain, and on the 4th of that month he proceeded to Calais, but in October he returned to Paris, which he again left on 5th December for London

In the House of Lords he was a frequent speaker, distinguishing himself by his active opposition to the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, the Sedition Bill, and other measures of the administration His political opinions, indeed, were, for that period, considered extreme, and during the excitement consequent on the French Revolution, he made himself remarkable, by appearing in the House of Lords in the rough costume of Jacobinism On the formation of the Grenville administration in February 1806, Lord Lauderdale was created a baron of the United Kingdom, and sworn a member of the privy council In the subsequent July he was appointed keeper of the great seal of Scotland On 2d August he departed for France, invested with full powers to conclude peace, the negotiations for which had been for several weeks carried on by the earl of Yarmouth Arriving at Paris on the 5th, he joined that nobleman in the arduous task of treating with Napoleon and Talleyrand The negotiations were conducted with Generals Clarke, afterwards duke de Feltre, and Champigny The earl of Yarmouth was recalled 14th August, when the whole duty devolved on Lord Lauderdale. The war between France and Prussia breaking out in September, the emperor set off for Germany, and on 6th October his lordship addressed his last note to Talleyrand, which thus concluded "If, therefore, the undersigned has received orders to demand his passports to depart from France, it is certainly not because his sovereign wishes to renounce peace, but because his majesty finds himself obliged to do so, the French government not having consented to all the conditions which were comprised in the proposals originally made by them to his Britannic majesty, and having, moreover, rejected as the basis of the treaty with Russia, the just and reasonable conditions which the undersigned was authorised to propose." His lordship quitted Paris on the 9th of October A full statement of the progress and termination of the negotiations appeared in the London Gazette of 21st October 1806.

His lordship only held office till the change of administration in March 1807 For the last ten years of his life he lived in retirement, engaged in agricultural pursuits. He died at Thirlstane castle, Berwickshire, September 13, 1839, aged 80. He was the author of 'Letters to the Peers of Scotland,' London, 1794, 8vo, 'Thoughts on Finance, suggested by the Measures of the Present Session,' 1796, 4to, 'A Speech on the Subject of the Finances,' 1796, 4to, 'Letter on the Present Measures of Finance, in which the Bill now depending in Parliament is particularly considered,' 1798, 8vo: 'An Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Public Wealth, and into the Means and Causes of its Increase,' Edinburgh, 1804, 8vo; 'Observations on the Review of his Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Public Wealth; published in the 8th Number of the Edinburgh Review,' Edin 1804, 8vo, 'Thoughts on the Alarming State of the Circulation, and the Means of Redressing the Pecuniary Grievances of Ireland,' Edin. 1805, 8vo; 'Hints to the Manufacturers of Great Britain on the Consequences of the Irish Union, and the System since pursued, of Borrowing in England for the Service of Ireland,' Edin 1805, 8vo; 'An Inquiry into the Practical Merits of the System of the Government of India, under the Board of Control, Edin 1809, 8vo, 'Further Considerations of the State of the Currency, in which the Means of Restoring our Circulation to a Salutary State are fully explained,' 1812, 1814, 8vo, Letter on the Corn Laws,' 1814, 8vo, 'Three Letters to the Duke of Wellington,' on the public income and expenditure, London, 1829, 8vo

By his countess, Eleanor, only daughter and heiress of Anthony Todd, Esq, secretary to the general post-office, whom he married August 15, 1782, he had James, 9th earl, Hon Sir Anthony Maitland, 10th earl, Colonel Hon John Maitland, died unmarried in 1839, Hon Charles Fox Maitland, died in 1817, and five daughters.

James, 9th earl of Lauderdale, born May 12, 1784, succeeded his father in 1839, and died a bachelor Aug 22, 1860 His brother, Admiral Sir Anthony Maitland. born June 10, 1785 became 10th earl, unmarried. He entered the navy young, and as a midshipman on board the Medusa frigate particularly distinguished himself in the attack on the Boulogne flotilla in 1801, when he was severely wounded During the latter part of the war he commanded the Pique frigate on the West India station, where he captured the Hawk American privateer In 1816 he was appointed to the Glasgow, of 40 guns, which ship formed part of Lord Exmouth's squadron at Algiers, and the same year was named a military companion of the Bath. In 1817 he was reappointed to the Glasgow, and served on the Mediterranean station till 1821 In 1820 he was made a knight commander of the order of St. Michael and St George, and in 1802, a military knight commander of the Bath. In 1848 he was appointed rear-admiral of the Red, in 1853 vice-admiral, and in 1858 admiral

The title is granted by patent to the heirs male of the grantee. Heir presumptive (1861) Admiral Sir Thomas Maitland son of Hon General William Mordaunt Maitland, 3d son of the 7th earl Next heir after him Charles Barclay Maitland, born in 1822 son of Rev Charles Maitland, rector of Little Longford Wiltshire, and great-great-grandson of Hon Charles Maitland, 2d son of 6th earl of Lauderdale.

LAW, JOHN, of Lauriston, a famous financial projector, the son of a goldsmith, was born in Edinburgh in April 1671 At the end of this memoir will be found some particulars of his family He was bred to no profession, but early displayed a singular capacity for calculation On his father's death he succeeded to the small estates of Lauriston and Randleston, but having acquired habits of gambling and extravagance, he soon became deeply involved, when his mother paid his debts, and obtained possession of the property, which she immediately entailed Tall and handsome in person, and much addicted to gallantry, he was at this time familiarly known by the name of Bean Law Having gone to London, he there had a quarrel with another young man, one Edward Wilson, whom he had the misfortune to kill in a duel, for which he was tried at the Old Bailey, and being found guilty of murder, was sentenced to death, April 20, 1694 Though pardoned by the Crown, he was detained in prison in consequence of an appeal being lodged against him by the brother of the deceased, but contrived to make his escape from the King's Bench, and immediately proceeded to France, and afterwards to Holland About 1700 he returned to Scotland, and, having directed his attention to the financial system of the French and Dutch bankers, particularly of the latter, in 1701 he published at Glasgow, 'Proposals and Reasons for constituting a Council of Trade in Scotland' He also had the address to recommend himself to the king's ministers, who employed him to arrange and prepare the Revenue Accounts, which were in great confusion at the time of settling the equivalent before the Union With the view of remedying the deficiency of a circulating medium, for the want of which the industry of the country was in a languishing condition, he proposed to the Scottish legislature the establishment of a bank, with paper issues to the amount of the value of all the lands in the kingdom The principles on which this scheme was founded are fully explained in his work, published at Edinburgh in 1705, entitled 'Money and Trade Considered, with a Proposal for Supplying the nation with Money,' but the project was rejected by parliament

Proceeding to France, Law had recourse to gaming for his subsistence, and won large sums of money at play He obtained an introduction to the duke of Orleans, and offered his scheme to Chamillart, the minister of finance, who considered it a dangerous innovation, in consequence of which the projector unexpectedly received a police-order to quit Paris within twenty-four hours He next visited Italy, and was banished in a similar manner from Venice and Genoa as a designing adventurer His success at play, however, was so great, that, when he returned to Paris, after the succession of Orleans to the regency, he was in possession of no less a sum than £100,000 His scheme was at first rejected by Demarest, the new finance minister, but, having been fortunate enough to secure the patronage of the regent, Law received letters patent, dated March 2, 1716, by which his bank was at length established in Paris, with a capital of 1,200 shares, of 5,000 livres each, which soon bore a premium This bank became the office for all public receipts, and, in 1717, there was annexed to it the famous Mississippi Scheme, or West India Company, which was invested with the full sovereignty of Louisiana, and was expected to realize immense sums, by planting colonies and extending commerce In 1718 this bank was declared a Royal bank, and such was the confidence of the public in its operations, that the shares rose to twenty times their original value In 1719 their valuation was more than eighty times the amount of all the current specie of the kingdom In May of the same year the French East India Company was incorporated with the West India Company, when they received the united name of the Company of the Indies In January 1720 Law was appointed comptroller-general of the finances, which in effect elevated him to the premiership of France, but the stupendous fabric of false credit which he had reared at length fell to the ground, the shares sank in value as rapidly as they had risen, and so great had been the rage for speculation, that, though immense fortunes were made by some parties on the occasion, many thousand families were ruined, and the government itself was reduced to the very verge of bankruptcy The same desperate game of chance was the same year played in England by the directors of the South Sea Bubble, which reduced many hundred persons to disgrace and beggary

Law was obliged to resign his post, after he had held it only for five months, and to quit France With no more than 800 louis d'ors, the wreck of his immense fortune, he travelled to Brussels and Venice, and through Germany to Copenhagen Receiving an invitation from the British ministry to return to England, he was presented, on his arrival, to George I, by Admiral Sir John Norris, and, about the same time, attended by the duke of Argyle, the earl of Ilay, and other friends, he appeared at the bar of the court of King's Bench, November 28, 1721, and pleaded his majesty's pardon for the murder of Edward Wilson In 1725 he left Britain, and finally settled at Venice, where he died, March 21, 1729, in a state of poverty, though occupied to the last in vast schemes of finance, and fully convinced of the solidity of his system, the signal failure of which he attributed to panic. The following epitaph was written soon after the death of this distinguished financier —

> Ci gît cet Ecossois celebre,
> Ce calculateur sans egale,
> Que par les regles de l'Algebre
> A mis France à l'hopital.

Law's great great-grandfather, James Law, was archbishop of Glasgow in the beginning of the 17th century The father of this prelate was portioner of Lathrisk, Fifeshire, and his mother, Agnes Strang, was of the house of Balcaskie Admitted minister of Kirkliston, Linlithgowshire, in 1582, he became bishop of Orkney in 1606, and archbishop of Glasgow in 1615 He died in Nov 1632 He first married a daughter of Dundas of Newliston, and 2dly, Marion, 2d daughter of John Boyle of Kelburn, ancestor of the earls of Glasgow, and widow of Matthew Ross of Haining His widow erected a handsome monument to his memory over his grave in the upper end of the chancel of Glasgow cathedral He purchased from the Wardlaws of Torry, the estate of Brunton, Fifeshire, now called Barnsloe His great-grandson, William Law, goldsmith in Edinburgh, the father of the financier, was the second son of James Law of Brunton He purchased the two small estates of Lauriston and Randleston, about 180 acres, parish of Cramond, Mid Lothian, and married Jean Campbell, descended from a branch of the ducal house of Argyle

Law married Lady Catharine Knollys, daughter of the 3d earl of Banbury, issue a son, John Law, and a daughter The latter married her cousin, Viscount Wallingford, afterwards created Lord Althorp Lady Wallingford survived her husband more than half a century, and died in London, October 14, 1790, leaving no issue. The son, John Law of Lauriston, a cornet of the regiment of Nassau, Friesland, died at Maestricht in 1734

William Law, 3d son of Jean Campbell of Lauriston, succeeded to the entail on the extinction of the issue male of her eldest son William's eldest son, John, attained the rank of commandant-general and president of council of the French settlements in India, and died at Paris about 1796. On May 21, 1808, Francis John William Law, a merchant in London, was served nearest and legitimate heir of entail and provision of the reformed religion, of his father, John Law, and entered into possession of the estate of Lauriston, to the exclusion of his elder brothers, Roman Catholics, according to the then law The estate subsequently became the property of Mr Allan, banker, Edinburgh Lauriston Castle was at one period the residence of Andrew Rutherfurd, Esq, M P, afterwards a lord of session under the title of Lord Rutherfurd

Law's brother's family remained in France His grand-nephew was James Bernard Law, a marshal of France, one of the most gallant and sagacious lieutenants of Napoleon I, the bearer of the treaty of Amiens to London in 1802, and the hero of the desperate battle of Goldberg He was made a count by Napoleon, and created marquis of Lauriston by Louis XVIII He died June 10, 1828 His elder son, General Augustus John Alexander Law, 2d marquis of Lauriston, died June 27, 1860, leaving 3 sons The younger son of Marshal Law bore the title of Count Napoleon Law

LEARMONTH, a surname as old as the reign of Malcolm III The principal family of the name was Learmonth of Ercildoune in the Merse, of which was Thomas the Rhymer, the earliest poet of Scotland (see RYMER, Thomas of Ercildoune). A younger son of this celebrated personage is said to have married Janet Dairsie, heiress of Dairsie, in Fife, and to have obtained with her that estate and the heritable offices of bailie and admiral of the regality of St. Andrews. Sir James Learmonth of Dairsie, master of the household to king James V, was provost of St. Andrews in 1546.

Learmonth of Balcomie, also in Fife, of this family, was master of the household to James IV In a note to his Introduction to the metrical Romance of Sir Tristrem, Sir Walter Scott says: "In removing and arranging some ancient papers, lodged in the offices of the Clerks of Session, the following genealogical memoir was discovered, among many writings belonging to the family of Learmonth of Balcomy, which is now extinct. It is in the handwriting of the 17th century 'The genealogy of the honourable and ancient surname of Leirmont. Leirmont bears Or, on a chevron, S, three muscles voided of the first, the name is from France. The chief of the name was the laird of Ersilmont in the Merse, whose predecessor, Thomas Learmonth, (lived) in the reign of Alexander III He foretold his death. One of whose sons married Janet de Darsie, and had the lands of Darsie in Fife, be that marriage, the contract is yet extant confirmed be the king The house of Darsie bear a rose in base for difference. It is now extinct, only Leirmont of Balcomie in Fife, is chief now, whose predecessor was master of howshold to King James IV His predecessor was the eldest son of Darsie, and took to himselfe the estate of Balcomie, leaving Darsie to the second brother Upon this account, Balcomie is holden of the king, and Darsie of the archbishop of St. Andrews, so Balcomie bears the simple coat without the rose in base, since the distinction of Dairsie'" In 1604 Sir John Learmonth of Balcomie, knight, was one of the commissioners appointed to treat with the English commissioner relative to a treaty of union with England, a favourite project of James VI He was a member of the assembly held at Perth on 25th August 1618, at which the five articles were agreed upon, he voting for them On the renewal of the high commission in 1619 he was one of the members of that arbitrary tribunal Both families have long been extinct, the name, however, is not uncommon in Scotland (For DARSIE, see p. 21 of this vol)

LECKIE, the surname of an old family in the county of Dumbarton The head of the family, at the beginning of the 18th century, was John Leckie of Croy-Leckie, in that county He married a daughter of Macgregor of Glengyle by his wife, a daughter of the first William Campbell of Glenfalloch, by whom he had several children He was proprietor of the lands of Croy-Leckie, afterwards the property of Mr Blackburn, and of the lands of Balvie, which became the property of Mr Campbell-Douglas Having joined the cause of the Stuarts with his brother-in-law, Rob Roy, in the rebellion of 1715, his estates were forfeited, and he fled the country with all his family, except the youngest son and a daughter, who remained in Scotland This son, Thomas, Leckie, minister of the parish of Kilmaronock from 1703 to 1728, married Janet, daughter of James Buchanan of Catter, parish of Drymen, now belonging to the duke of Montrose. He had an only son, William, who became proprietor of the estate of Broich, now called Arngomery, Stirlingshire, and was grandfather of William Leckie-Ewing, Esq of Arngomery, sole male representative of the family The daughter of John Leckie married James Maxwell of Merksworth, Renfrewshire, from which marriage the Maxwell-Graham family (of which the 13th countess of Buchan is a dr), is descended, as are also the Blacks, sometime of Clairmont, near Glasgow

LEE, JOHN, M D, D D, and LL D, a learned divine, and principal of the university of Edinburgh from 1840 to 1859, was born, of humble parentage, in 1780, at Torwoodlee Mains, parish of Stow, Mid Lothian He studied for the medical profession at the university of Edinburgh He obtained the degree of M A, and was offered the chair of moral philosophy in the university of Wilna, which the Czar was about to establish in Russian Poland, but the arrangement was broken off in consequence of a change in the political relations of Russia and Great Britain.

On concluding his medical studies, he took the degree of doctor of medicine, and for a short time held an appointment in the hospital department of the army Having attended the regular theological classes, he was, in 1807, licensed to preach the gospel by the presbytery of Edinburgh, and ordained minister of a chapel in London in connection with the church of Scotland, but in 1808 was presented to the parish of Peebles In the summer of 1812, he was appointed by the Crown professor of ecclesiastical history and divinity in St. Mary's college, St Andrews, and on three annual occasions afterwards he was chosen rector of that university During the session of 1820–21 he was professor of moral philosophy in King's college and university, Old Aberdeen In the latter year he was presented by the Crown to the first charge of the Canongate, Edinburgh, where he had for his colleague the venerable and much esteemed Dr Buchanan, who died Dec 6, 1832

During the time that he was minister of the Canongate, Dr Lee began an agitation for the freer circulation of the Bible which, after a lawsuit of several years' continuance against the Bible Societies, led to the removal of the restrictions that had till then prevented the Scriptures from being circulated at a cheap rate He was the acknowledged leader of the party who called in question the sovereign's prerogative in the printing of the Bible, and with great trouble, and at considerable expense to himself, he collected materials for certain treatises which he wrote on the subject. In 1824, he was nominated one of the royal commissioners for inquiring into the state of the universities of Scotland, and in that capacity he drew up the Report on the University of Glasgow. On Aug 13th of the same year, he was, on the death of Dr Fleming, presented to the church and parish of Lady Yester's, Edinburgh

In 1827 he was elected clerk of the General Assembly, and during the long period that he held that office his services were highly esteemed and universally acknowledged throughout the Established church The pastoral addresses prepared by him in that capacity, and which the General Assembly addressed to the congregations of the church, were styled by Dr. Chalmers "saintly and beautiful compositions" During the winter of 1827–28, Dr Lee gratuitously discharged the laborious and responsible duties of Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh In 1830, he was appointed one of the royal chaplains for Scotland In 1832 he was proposed as a candidate for the moderatorship of the General Assembly, in opposition to Dr Chalmers, when the latter was elected In 1835 Dr Lee was inducted as successor to Dr Brown in the Old Church, Edinburgh, as colleague to Dr Macknight, and in 1837 he was appointed by the Crown principal of the United College of St Salvador and St Leonard, St Andrews, but from that situation he retired in five months The following year he was appointed secretary to the Bible Board of Scotland, an office which he declined In 1839 he was appointed principal of the university of St Andrews

As one of the leaders of the moderate party in the church of Scotland, when the ten years' conflict began which ended in the disruption of 1843, his friendship with Dr Chalmers was for a time interrupted The personal controversy that in 1838 arose out of the difference of their views on the church extension scheme led to the most painful feelings on both sides On the death of Principal Baird, in January 1840, Dr Lee was elected by the town council, the then patrons, principal of the university of Edinburgh, and in October of the same year he relinquished his charge in the Old church There had been previously several discussions in the Assembly and other church courts on the subject of his holding both a university and a parochial charge In the following year he was nominated one of the deans of the Chapel Royal In October 1843, he was appointed by the town council, on the demission of Dr Chalmers, professor of divinity in the university, which chair he held along with the principalship At the meeting of the General Assembly of 1844 he was elected moderator, being the first that was chosen after the opening of the new General Assembly Hall of the Established church in Edinburgh As principal of the university it was his custom every year to begin the session by an address to the students.

Dr Lee was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and at the time of his death one of its vice-presidents Besides being M D and D D., he was also LL D To his great scholarship and erudition all parties willingly bore testimony With his vast stores of knowledge in every department of human learning, it is certainly a matter of surprise that Principal Lee never published anything of permanent or national importance A few pamphlets, with an edition of a very admirable little book, entitled 'A Mother's Legacie to her Unborne Childe,' form nearly his whole contributions to the literature of his country

Dr Lee died on the morning of May 2, 1859. His successor in the principalship was Sir David Brewster, one of his fellow-students when at college

LEECHMAN, WILLIAM, D D, a learned divine, the son of a farmer, was born in the parish of Dolphington, Lanarkshire, in 1706 He acquired his education at the parish school, and completed his studies at the university of Edinburgh In October 1731 he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Paisley, and, in October 1736, was ordained minister of Beith. In October 1740 he was elected moderator of the synod of Glasgow and Ayr, and in July 1743 he married Miss Bridget Balfour, of the family of Pilrig, near Edinburgh He was soon after elected professor of theology in the university of Glasgow, by the casting vote of the then lord rector, he and his opposing candidate, Mr John

Maclaurin, brother of the celebrated professor at Edinburgh, having an equal number of votes To prevent his induction to the chair, the defeated party brought a charge of heresy against him before the presbytery of Glasgow, founded on his sermon on prayer, in which, it was alleged, he had laid too little stress on the merit of the satisfaction and intercession of our blessed Saviour, as the sole ground of our acceptance with God The synod of Glasgow and Ayr having taken up the case, unanimously found that there were no grounds whatever for charging Professor Leechman with unsoundness of faith, a decision which the General Assembly confirmed He afterwards obtained the degree of D D , and held the professorship for seventeen years, during which time he signalized himself by his able vindication of religion against the reasonings of Hume, Bolingbroke, Voltaire, and other deistical writers

In May 1757 Dr Leechman was chosen moderator of the General Assembly In 1761 he was raised to the dignity of principal of Glasgow university, by a presentation from the king In this situation he remained till his death, December 3, 1785 —His works are

The Temper, Character, and Duty of a Minister of the Gospel, a Sermon preached before the Synod of Glasgow, on 1 Tim iv 16 Glasg 1741 1742, 8vo This has passed through many editions.

His collected sermons were re-published in 1789, in two volumes 8vo, with some account of his life, and of his lectures, by Dr James Wodrow, minister at Stevenston

Dr Leechman wrote, besides, a life of Dr Hutcheson, prefixed to the latter's 'System of Moral Philosophy,' published in 1755

LEIGHTON, ALEXANDER, D D , a divine and physician, celebrated for being the victim of a most cruel persecution, was descended from an ancient family who possessed the estate of Ulysseshaven, now Usan, near Montrose, in Forfarshire, and was born in Edinburgh in 1568 He received his education, and the degree of D D , at the university of St Andrews, and afterwards studied medicine at Leyden, where he graduated He was subsequently minister of the Scottish church at Utrecht. Resigning his charge, he came over to London, where he intended to practise medicine, but was interdicted by the college of physicians Having published two works against episcopacy, the one entitled 'The Looking-Glass of the Holy War,' and the other, 'Zion's Plea against Prelacy,' he was prosecuted in the Star Chamber, June 4, 1630, at the instance of the bigot Laud, and, being found guilty, was sentenced by that iniquitous court to pay a fine of £10,000, to stand in the pillory, to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, first on the one nostril, and then on the other, his face branded, and to be publicly whipped Between the sentence and the execution, Dr Leighton escaped out of the Fleet prison, but was retaken in Bedfordshire, and endured the whole of this shocking and atrocious punishment His sentence included also imprisonment for life, and he was closely immured for eleven years in the Fleet, so that, when at length released, he could neither walk, see, nor hear This act of barbarous atrocity, committed by the great upholders of episcopacy in England, is without a parallel even in the annals of the Popish Inquisition of Spain, black and blood-stained as the pages of that dread tribunal are! The Long Parliament declared the entire proceedings against him illegal, and voted him £6,000 as some solatium for his sufferings, but it is doubtful if this sum was ever paid In 1642, Lambeth House being converted into a state prison, he was appointed its keeper, and thus, by a strange retribution, came to preside in the palace of his great enemy Laud, soon after the execution of that arch-bigot and persecutor Dr Leighton died, insane, in 1644

LEIGHTON, ROBERT, D D , a prelate of singular learning, piety, and benevolence, the eldest son of the preceding, was born in Edinburgh in 1611, and received his education at the university there He entered it as a student in 1627, and took his degree of M A in 1631 He was subsequently sent to Douay in France, and, on his return, obtained, in 1641, Presbyterian ordination, and was settled minister of the parish of Newbattle in Mid Lothian Neither his mind nor his disposition was fitted for the stormy times in which he lived, and an anecdote is related of him which strikingly exemplifies this It was the custom of the presbytery to inquire of its members whether they had preached to the times, and when the question was put to Leighton, he replied, with a kind of play upon the word, "For God's sake, when all my brethren preach to the times, suffer one poor priest to preach about eternity" His dislike to the Covenant, and some early predilections in favour of Episcopacy, which he had imbibed at college, caused him to resign his living, and he was soon after chosen principal of the university of Edinburgh, in which situation he remained for ten years Here he wrote his 'Prælectiones Theologicæ,' printed in 1693, and reprinted at Cambridge in 1828

After the Restoration, when Charles II resolved to force Episcopacy on the people of Scotland, Mr Leighton was persuaded by his friends, and particularly by his brother, Sir Elisha Leighton, who was secretary to the duke of York, to accept of a bishopric Accordingly, he and Archbishop Sharp, with two other newly created Scottish bishops, were consecrated at Westminster, December 12, 1661 The inconsistency of his conduct on this occasion can by no means be reconciled with his general character for wisdom and caution He chose, however, the humblest see of the whole, namely, Dunblane, to which the deanery of the Chapel Royal was annexed, as also the priory of Monymusk, in Aberdeenshire He objected to be addressed by the title of lord, and refused to accompany the other Scottish bishops in their pompous entry into Edinburgh Finding that the moderate measures which he recommended were not approved of by his more violent brethren, he retired to his diocese, resolved to devote himself entirely to his episcopal and ministerial duties

In 1665 he was induced to go to London to lay before the king a true representation of the severe and unjust proceedings of Sharp, and the other bishops in Scotland, towards the Presbyterians, on which occasion he declared to his majesty that he could not be a party "in the planting of the Christian religion itself in such a manner, much less a form of government," and as he considered himself in some degree accessory to the violent measures of his brethren, he requested permission to resign his bishopric. Charles heard him with apparent regret for the oppressed state of the Scottish Presbyterians, and assured him that less rigorous measures should in future be adopted; but positively refused to accept his resignation. Deceived by the king's hollow professions, Leighton returned to his see; but, two years after, finding the persecution raging as fiercely as ever, he again went to court, when he succeeded so far as to prevail on his majesty to write a letter to the privy council, ordering them to allow such of the Presbyterian ministers, as were willing to accept of the indulgence, to serve in vacant churches, although they did not conform to the episcopal establishment In 1670, on the resignation of Dr Alexander Burnet, Bishop Leighton was induced, at the king's personal request, to accept of the archbishopric of Glasgow, chiefly impelled by the hope of accomplishing a long-cherished scheme of accommodation between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians, which had been examined and approved of by his majesty "This was a work," says Pearson, his biographer, "in which he had embarked with the spirit of a martyr, and which he strenuously followed up by labours and watchings, through conflicts, defamation, and outrages, with toil of body and anguish of heart, a dearer price than he would have consented to give for any worldly dignities" His portrait is subjoined

Disappointed, however, in his object, and continually thwarted in his plans of moderation by Sharp and his tyrannical coadjutors, Leighton finally resolved to resign his dignity, as it was a burden too great for him to sustain With this view, he again proceeded to London in the beginning of 1673, and, after much solicitation, obtained the king's reluctant consent to his retirement, on condition that he remained in office another year That period having expired, and all prospect of reconciling the two parties being at an end, his resignation was at length accepted, when the former possessor of the see, Dr Burnet, was restored to it Bishop Leighton resided for some time within the college of Edinburgh, and afterwards removed to Broadhurst, in Sussex, the estate of his sister, the widow of Edward Lightmaker, Esq, where he lived for ten years in great privacy, spending his time in study, devotion, and acts of charity, and occasionally preaching At the request of Bishop Burnet, he went to London to see the earl of Perth, and being seized with a pleurisy, died at the Bell Inn, in Warwick Lane, February 1, 1684, in the 71st year of his age

This distinguished prelate is celebrated for his gentleness, unfeigned piety, extensive learning, and great disinterestedness Although his bishopric produced him only £200, and his archbishopric £400 per annum, he founded an exhibition or bursary in the university of Edinburgh, with two more in that of Glasgow, and gave £150 for the maintenance of two paupers in St Nicholas' Hospital, in the latter city His writings still bear a high character, and some of them, particularly his admirable 'Commentary on St Peter,' have been frequently reprinted

LEITH, the surname of a family of great antiquity in Scotland, supposed to be of Norman extraction, which settled in Aberdeenshire, where there are several branches of it, all sprung from the same ancestor In very early times the Leiths had considerable possessions in Mid Lothian, particularly the barony of Restalrig, and several others, within two miles of Edinburgh, in the vicinity of Leith, whence, it is thought, they assumed their surname. Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i p. 217) mentions the Leiths of Restalrig as a very ancient family The Logans of Restalrig are said to have obtained their lands by marriage with a daughter of the Leiths. It is not known when they removed to Aberdeenshire, but in the reign of Alexander III, Sir Norman Leslie, progenitor of the earls of Rothes, married Elizabeth Leith, a daughter of the Leiths of Edingarrock in that county Their immediate ancestor, William Leith, designed of Barns, supposed to be the male representative of the Leiths of Edingarrock, lived in the reign of David II He was provost of Aberdeen in 1350, and went to England with the hostages for King David's ransom in 1358. He died in the reign of King Robert II and was interred in the church of Aberdeen, where his monument, with his name and arms was erected, the arms being the same as carried by the Leiths of Leith-hall, the principal family of the name

His eldest son, Laurence, provost of Aberdeen in the years 1401, 1403, and 1411, made a present to that town of their largest bell, with his name upon it. He died in the reign of James II, and was buried in the church of Aberdeen The second son, John Leith, was frequently ambassador to the court of England, to negotiate affairs of state, particularly in 1412, 1413, and 1416, and was at last appointed one of the commissioners to settle the terms for the liberation of King James I, in 1423

Laurence's son, Norman Leith, had three sons, of whom John, the youngest, was progenitor of the Leiths of Overhall in Aberdeenshire John Leith of Leith-hall, the twelfth of this family, married Mary, daughter of Charles Hay of Rannes, in the same county, by whom he had a son, John, who succeeded to Leith-hall, and died in 1763 His son, John Leith of Leith-hall, had several sons, the third of whom was the following

Sir James Leith, K C B, a distinguished military commander, born at Leith hall, August 8, 1763 He received his education at Marischal college, Aberdeen, and after spending some time at Paris, occupied in the studies suitable for a military life, he was appointed second lieutenant in the 21st regiment. Soon after he was raised to the rank of lieutenant and captain in the 81st Highlanders At the peace, in 1783 he removed to the 5th regiment, stationed at Gibraltar, and was appointed aide-de-camp to Sir Robert Boyd, the governor He afterwards served in the same capacity, first to General O'Hara, and then to General David Dundas at Toulon, and on the recall of the British forces from that place, he returned to England, being appointed major, by brevet, in 1794 Having raised a regiment of foncibles in Aberdeenshire, he proceeded with it to Ireland, where he was employed during the Rebellion of 1798. He was afterwards appointed colonel of the 13th battalion of Reserve, and subsequently promoted to the rank of brigadier-general on the staff in Ireland In 1808 he was made major-general

In the Peninsular war, General Leith served with much distinction, and at the head of the 59th regiment acted with great intrepidity at the battle of Corunna. In September 1810 he was appointed to the command of a corps of 10,000 men with which he was engaged in the battle of Busaco, and at the head of the 9th and 88th regiments, made a brilliant and decisive charge upon the enemy While the troops remained within the lines of Torres Vedras, General Leith obtained the command of the fifth division, which he held throughout the Peninsular campaign Being attacked by the Walcheren fever, he was compelled to return for a short time to England for the recovery of his health. He rejoined the army after it had taken possession of Ciudad Rodrigo; and at the siege of Badajos he headed the troops in the memorable escalade that, in spite of a most destructive fire from the enemy, finally led to the capture of that important place. He also distinguished himself as a brave and skilful general in the battle of Salamanca, where his division, the fifth, was prominently engaged, and sustained a heavy loss. During a tremendous charge, while in the act of breaking the French squares, he received a severe wound, which eventually caused him to quit the field With his aide-de-camp, Captain, afterwards Colonel, Sir Andrew Leith Hay, who was also severely wounded, he was carried to the village of Las Torres, and thence they were removed to the house of the marquis Escalla, in Salamanca, where the victory over the French was celebrated with great rejoicings.

The prince regent conferred on General Leith the insignia of the Bath, "for his distinguished conduct in the action fought near Corunna, and in the battle of Busaco, for his noble daring at the assault and capture of Badajos by storm, and for his heroic conduct in the ever-memorable action fought on the plains of Salamanca, where, in personally leading the fifth division to a most gallant and successful charge upon a part of the enemy's line, which it completely overthrew at the point of the bayonet, he and the whole of his personal staff were severely wounded" He was also rewarded with several other marks of royal favour, and the privilege was granted to him and his descendants to use the words "Salamanca," and "Badajos," in the family armorial bearings. From the Portuguese government he received the military order of the Tower and Sword

In April 1813 General Leith's wound obliged him again to retire to England Soon after rejoining the army, he had the command of the storming party at the siege of San Sebastian, when he conducted the attack in a truly gallant style, and though severely wounded, continued to cheer forward the troops to the assault exposed all the time to a most murderous shower of round shot, grape, and musketry from the enemy At length he fainted from loss of blood, and was reluctantly carried from the field

On his return to England, Sir James Leith was appointed commander of the forces in the West Indies, and governor of the Leeward Islands, and arrived at Barbadoes June 15, 1814 By his prompt exertions, the French islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, which had declared for the emperor Napoleon, on being apprised of his return from Elba, were overawed and kept in subjection, the latter being obliged to surrender to his troops, and as a reward for his services on this occasion, the privy council voted £2,000 for the purchase of a sword to him, and he afterwards received from the king of France the grand cordon of the order of Military Merit. Sir James Leith died at Barbadoes of fever, after six days illness, October 16, 1816

He was succeeded by his nephew, Lieutenant-colonel Sir Andrew Leith Hay, of Rannes and Leith-hall, eldest son of General Alexander Leith Hay of Rannes. Besides being the author of an Account of the Peninsular War, Sir Andrew published at Aberdeen, in 1849, a work in 4to entitled 'The Castellated Architecture of Aberdeenshire.' During the whole of the war in the Peninsula he served on the staff of the duke of Wellington's army, and for his services there he received the order of Charles III He was subsequently military secretary, assistant-quarter-master-general and adjutant-general in the West Indies for which he received the order of the Legion of Honour. He was created a knight of the Guelphic order of Hanover in 1834, and, the same year, was appointed clerk of the ordnance under Lord Melbourne's administration, and again in 1835 Elected M P for the Elgin burghs in 1832, he sat for them till 1838, and again from 1841 to 1847 In 1838 he was nominated governor of Bermuda.

The Leiths of Freefield and Glenkindy are descended from Alexander Leith, second son of James Leith, first designed of New Leslie, the tenth of the Leith-hall family, who built the house of Leith-hall, which became the family designation. Their representative, General Sir Alexander Leith, served in Flanders, Holland, where he was wounded, the West Indies, Egypt, the Peninsula, where also he was wounded, and the south of France. He commanded the 31st foot at Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes, and in 1815 was created a military knight commander of the Bath. He became lieutenant-general in 1841, was appointed colonel of the 31st foot in 1853, and a general in 1854. He died in 1859

LENNOX, an ancient earldom, which comprehended the original sheriffdom of Dumbarton, consisting of the whole of the modern county and a large portion of Stirlingshire, with part of the counties of Perth and Renfrew The name was originally Leven-ach, a Gaelic term signifying 'the field of the Leven,' or smooth stream Levenachs, in the plural number, was the name given to the extensive and contiguous possessions of the earls of that district, and being spelled and written Levenax, became naturally shortened into Lennox The founder of the original Lennox family was Arkyll, a Saxon baron of Northumberland, possessing also large estates in Yorkshire, who, engaging in various insurrections against William the Conqueror about 1070 fled to Scotland, with many other Saxon barons, and received from Malcolm Canmore a large tract of land in the counties of Dumbarton and Stirling He is stated to have been the eldest son of Aykfrith or Egfrith, a powerful Saxon, lord of several baronies in Yorkshire, who was contemporary with King Canute and Edward the Confessor By a Scottish lady, his second wife, Arkyll had a son, of the same name, whose son, Alwyn, was the first earl of Lennox, according to the received accounts. This Alwyn, called MacArkill, or filius Arkill, is said to have been son of the first Arkill, and not the grandson He is supposed to have died in 1160 The accurate Lord Hailes doubts the Saxon origin that has been assigned to him Mr Mark Napier, in his History of the Partition of the Lennox, says while Lord Hailes "admits the existence of earls of Lennox so far back as the twelfth century," he "is sceptical as to their reputed descent from a Saxon lord called Arkill, and rejects the theory as belonging to 'the ages of conjecture'" Alwyn, the first earl, witnessed a charter of confirmation by King David I to the abbacy of Dunfermline as well as several other charters of that monarch, also a general confirmation to the same abbacy by King Malcolm IV, by whom it was that he was raised to the dignity of an earl

The elder of his two sons Alwyn, second earl, being very young at his father's death, David, earl of Huntingdon, the brother of King William the Lion, is said to have received from the king the earldom in ward, and appears to have held it during a considerable period. The second Alwyn, however, was in full possession of it before 1199. Mr Napier quotes two charters, without dates, which, he says, materially affect this theory, as they "prove that the two Alwyns were both at the same time designed earl of Lennox, probably because the son was fear of the comitatus (or earldom) while the father was liferenter It would rather appear, then, that the elder Alwyn was the first earl of Lennox of his race, but that the district of the Leven had been previously erected into an earldom, in favour of David earl of Huntingdon sometime between the middle and the close of the 12th century" (Partition of the Lennox, page 2) The second earl died about 1224. He had eight sons and one daughter

His eldest son, Maldouin or Maldwin, third earl of Lennox was one of the guarantees on the part of King Alexander II when the differences between that monarch and Henry III of England were accommodated in 1237 Up to this time the strong castle of Dumbarton had been the principal messuage of the earls of Lennox, but after 1238, when he received a new charter of the earldom, it no longer belonged to them, nor the harbour, territory, and fisheries of Murrach contiguous to it. The castle has ever since continued a royal fort, and the town of Dumbarton was in 1222 erected into a free royal burgh with extensive privileges. Earl Maldwyn had a son, Malcolm, who predeceased him in 1248, leaving a son, Malcolm, fourth earl, one of the Magnates Scotiæ, who, at the parliament held at Scone, 5th February 1283-4, swore to acknowledge Margaret of Norway heir-apparent to the throne, after the death of Alexander III, and on 18th July 1290, he appeared in the assembly of the estates at Birgham, and consented to the marriage of that princess to Edward prince of Wales, son of Edward I of England He died before 1292

His son Malcolm, fifth earl, was, in 1292, one of the nominees on the part of the elder Bruce, in his competition for the crown with Baliol, and in 1296 he assembled his followers, and with other Scottish leaders, invaded Cumberland and assaulted Carlisle. The same year, however, he was among those who swore a forced fealty to Edward I, but in 1306 he was one of the foremost to repair to the standard of Robert the Bruce, and ever after continued to be one of his principal supporters. His name appears, with those of other leading Scottish patriots, at the famous letter sent to the Pope in 1320, asserting the independence of Scotland He was slain at Halidon Hill, 19th July 1333.

His son, Donald, sixth earl, was one of the nobles present in the parliament at Edinburgh, 26th September 1357, who became bound for the payment of the ransom of King David II He was present at the coronation of Robert II at Scone 16th March 1371, and on the following day swore homage and fealty to him His seal was appended to the act of settlement of the crown of Scotland, 4th April 1373, it is now lost, but the tag to which it was affixed remains inscribed Levenax (Douglas' Peerage, vol ii p. 84) He died the same year, and, having no male issue, the direct male line ceased with him The earldom devolved on his only daughter, Margaret, who married her cousin, and nearest heir male of the family, Walter, son of Allan de Fasselane, who in her right, in accordance with the territorial nature of feudal dignities at that period, became seventh earl of Lennox In 1385, the countess Margaret and her husband made a resignation of the dignity in favour of their son Duncan, when Robert II granted to the latter, and his heirs, a charter of the earldom, and in consequence he became earl of Lennox in his father's lifetime Allan de Fasselane father of Walter, was the son of Amelec, Aveleth, or Aulay, 4th son of Alwyn, 2d earl of Lennox, and the extensive territory, then called Fasselane, on the Gairloch, from which this branch took their name, had been conferred on him by Malcolm fifth earl of Lennox

Duncan, 8th earl, had no male issue, and was left a widower, with three daughters, the eldest of whom, Isabella, married, in 1391, Murdoch, duke of Albany, regent of Scotland 1419-1425 (see vol i., page 40). The contract of marriage is a curious one It bears to be between Sir Robert, earl of Fife, then regent of Scotland, on the one part, and Sir Duncan earl of the Lovenax on the other, that "Sir Murthow," as Murdoch is called, son and heir of the former, shall have to wife Isabella, eldest daughter of the latter, and shall endow her in the barony of Redhall, with the appurtenances, "in tenandry and demayn," and that the said earl was to obtain a new infeftment of his earldom, limiting it, after himself and his heirs male, to the said Sir Murthow and Isabella, and to the heirs lawfully begotten between them, whom failing, to the nearest and lawful heirs of the foresaid earl The contract proceeds, "Item, it is accorded that, in case the said earl of the Levenax shall happen to have heirs male of his body, or if he chance to take a wife to himself (or throgh ayentur hym selvyn happyn to be to marry), and the said earl of Fife happen to have a marriageable daughter, the said earl of the Levenax, or his heir male, shall have to wife that daughter, and if the said earl of Fife happens to have no daughter, the said earl of the Levenax, or his heirs male, shall have to wife a 'next cosyng' (next cousin) of the said earl of Fife, at his assignation or the said Sir Murdow's, without disparagement to the said earl of the Levenax, or his heir male" The said earl of Fife, or Murdoch, his son, was also to receive with Isabel 2,000 marks sterling This contract, dated at Inchmurrin, on Lochlomond, the principal residence of the earls of Lennox, 17th February, 1391-2, is printed in full, in modern orthography, in Napier's History of the Partition of the Lennox (pp 4—6) In accordance with Earl Duncan's resignation in terms of this contract, and with the limitations therein agreed to, which became the ruling investiture of the earldom, King Robert III granted a charter under the great seal, dated at Dunfermline, November 8th, 1392, of the whole earldom of the Levenax to Earl Duncan His second daughter, Margaret, married Sir Robert Menteith of Rusky, and Elisabeth, his other daughter, became the wife of Sir John Stewart of Dernely His connection with Murdoch, duke of Albany, made Duncan earl of Lennox for a time one of the most potent noblemen in the kingdom, but it proved fatal to him in the end On the return of King James I from his long captivity in England, he was one of the first victims of the rage of that monarch against all connected with the house of Albany He was beheaded at Stirling, with his son-in-law, Duke Murdoch, and his grandson, Sir Alexander Stewart, on 25th May, 1425, being then about eighty years of age. His fate was universally deplored (See vol i of this work, page 12)

"During the eventful and turbulent period" says Mr Napier, "which intervened between the dates of the family contract in 1391, and the second regency in 1420 so unobtrusive had been the conduct of this earl, so little had he mingled in the affairs of the distracted realm, or identified himself with the proceedings of its rulers, that his name can only be traced by means of private deeds, indicating his possession of the earldom, and the exercise of his feudal right of property With the single exception, that he is mentioned first of the distinguished cortege of nobles who met James I at Durham on his return from captivity, I can find no public notice of this nobleman, until his apparently cruel and causeless execution" (Hist of the Partition of the Lennox, p 12) Although thus summarily executed, his estates were not forfeited, but remained in the possession of his daughter, the widowed duchess Isabella. On the first outpouring of James' fury on the house of Albany, she had been conveyed a prisoner to Tantallan in East Lothian, while her eldest surviving son, Walter, called Walter of the Levenax, from being the heir of that earldom, the first arrested of the family, was confined in the neighbouring island of the Bass, places far removed from their territorial possessions. The latter was beheaded at Stirling the day before his father and grandfather, and was thus the first who fell a sacrifice to his incensed sovereign's vengeance. His execution is, with much probability, supposed to be the groundwork of the pathetic ballad of 'Childe Waters.' It is not certain when the duchess was released, but she spent the remainder of her life at Inchmurrin, the beautiful island residence of the family, on Loch-Lomond. Thence several of her charters are dated, particularly in 1440, 1444, 1449, 1450, in which year she founded the collegiate church of Dumbarton, and gifted it with various lands of the earldom, and 1451 In the latter year she granted a charter, with the consent of her sister Margaret, spouse of the late lord of Rusky, mortifying lands in the parish of Kilmaronock to the convent of the Black friars, at Dumbarton To this charter both her own seal and that of her sister are appended. She died before 1460 She had never completed her titles in feudal form to the earldom, and in the retours of all her representatives in the Lennox, the lands are declared to have been in non-entry from the year 1425, when Earl Duncan was beheaded. After her decease, therefore, King James II seems to have taken advantage of his feudal casualty of non-entry, as there is an item in the great chamberlain's accounts for the year ending 25th June 1460, bearing that the chamberlain does not debit himself with the revenue derived from the earldom of Lennox, because the king had assigned the same for building the castle of Stirling

Both of the duchess Isabella's sisters appear to have predeceased her, and at her death took place what is called the partition or dismemberment of the Lennox Her sister Margaret had to her husband, Sir Robert Menteith of Rusky, a son, Sir Murdoch Menteith, said to have been killed by his own servant, near Dunblane. He married Christian, daughter of Sir David Murray of Tullibardine, ancestor of the dukes of Athol Their only son, Patrick Menteith, died before 1455, and his two sisters, Agnes and Elizabeth, became his coheiresses in the half of the lands of the earldom, as well as extensive lands in Menteith. Agnes married, about 1460, Sir John Haldane of Gleneagles (see art. HALDANE, page 397 of this volume). Elizabeth married John Napier of Merchiston, ancestor of the inventor of the Logarithms.

Elizabeth of Lennox, the youngest sister of the duchess Isabel and wife of Sir John Stewart of Darnley, killed at the siege of Orleans, 12th February 1429, had a son, Sir Alan Stewart, who, in 1439, was treacherously slain by Sir Thomas Boyd of Kilmarnock. His eldest son was the celebrated Sir John Stewart, created Lord Darnley in 1460 or 1461, who was served heir of his great-grandfather, Earl Duncan, 23d July 1473, in the half of the earldom of Lennox, and in its principal messuage, and who became for a time titular earl of Lennox

In a 'Memorial relative to the succession to the ancient earls of Levenax,' in support of the claim of Haldane of Gleneagles, as representative of the ancient earls, drawn up in the course of the last century, by Mr Wedderburn, afterwards Lord-chancellor Loughborough, it is stated that on the failure of Isabel and her issue a dispute arose as to which of her two sisters was the elder, the honours of the earldom,—the right to the chief messuages, &c., and the title of earl,—being the right of the eldest coheiress and her eldest representatives, that on Sir John Haldane being sent in 1473, ambassador to Denmark, and thence to France, Lord Darnley, in his absence, got himself served heir to Earl Duncan, and assumed the title of earl of Lennox, but on Sir John's return to Scotland in 1475, he applied to the king, and obtained letters under the great seal, reducing and setting aside the service of Lord Darnley and the whole proceedings thereon. In 1482, Lord Darnley was one of the confederated lords who seized King James III at Lauder

In May 1471, the earldom of Lennox being then in non-entry, had been given, during his life, to Lord Avandale, the chancellor of the kingdom, (see vol. I. of this work, p. 169,) and after the death of James III. in 1488, Lord Avandale having died the same year, Lord Darnley, again assuming the title, sat as earl of Lennox in the first parliament of James IV, when he received for himself and his son Matthew Stewart, the ward and revenues of Dumbarton castle, which had been held by Lord Avandale. In 1489 he took arms against the young king, when his fortresses of Crookston and Dumbarton were besieged, the latter by the earl of Argyle. He suffered a night surprise and rout at Tillymoss, on the south side of the Forth above Stirling and his castle of Dumbarton, which was defended by four of his sons, surrendered, after a vigorous siege of six weeks, the king himself having appeared before it. He succeeded, however, in making his peace with the government, and obtaining a full pardon for himself and his followers. With the Haldane family he entered into a submission relative to the disputes between them, when the arbiters agreed that Sir John Haldane and his son, Sir James, should relinquish to him their fourth part of the earldom, excepting particular lands therein named, and that his lordship should resign to Sir James all the right of the superiority of the earldom In 1493 an indenture was accordingly executed between the parties. On 18th May 1490, an agreement had been entered into between him and Matthew Stewart, his son and heir, with the other coheiress, Elizabeth, wife of John Napier of Merchiston, and her son, Archibald Napier, relative to her share of the earldom, and her disputes with the Haldanes were finally adjusted 29th June of the same year, when she was left in peaceable possession of her fourth part of the estates.

Matthew Stewart, the eldest son, second earl of Lennox of this name, succeeded his father in 1494. In 1503 he obtained a grant from James IV of the sheriffdom of Dumbartonshire, which was united to the earldom and made hereditary in the family of Lennox The office continued a pertinent of the earls and dukes for two centuries, and was usually executed by deputy sheriffs of their appointment Earl Matthew led the men of the Lennox to the fatal field of Flodden, where he and the earl of Argyle commanded the right wing of the Scots army, and, with many of their followers, were slain

John, his son and successor, acted a very prominent part during the turbulent minority of James V With the earl of Glencairn he, in 1514, assailed the castle of Dumbarton, during a tempestuous night, and breaking open the lower gate, succeeded in turning out the governor Lord Erskine, and taking possession of the castle. Two years afterwards he was imprisoned by the regent Albany, to compel him to surrender the fortress, as the key of the west, and he was obliged to comply In 1524 he warmly supported the queen-mother, when she declared her son, King James, of age, though then only in his thirteenth year Having, however, soon after abandoned her cause, he was one of the leaders of the force of 400 men, which, on the morning of the 23d November of that year, attacked and took possession of the capital He was a member of the new secret council appointed in 1526, but owing to the undue power and influence of the Douglases, who kept the young king under the greatest restraint, he seceded from the earl of Angus, his guardian, and after James had made an unsuccessful attempt to escape from his thraldom Lennox, in consequence of a secret message from the king, assembled a force of 10,000 men, with which he marched from Stirling towards Edinburgh, for the rescue of his sovereign. His uncle, the earl of Arran, at the head of the Hamiltons, was sent against him by Angus. The two armies met near Linlithgow, 4th September 1526 After despatching an express to Edinburgh, to hasten on Angus and his forces, and taking possession of the bridge over the Avon, about a mile from the town, while his main force was stationed on a rising ground a short distance above, and nearly opposite the monastery of Manuel, Arran sent some gentlemen to his nephew Lennox, to dissuade him from his enterprise. With great spirit, the latter returned for answer "that he was determined to advance to Edinburgh, in spite of all opposition." Then dividing his army into three bodies, he gallantly led them on to the attack, but being thrown into confusion at the outset, they were forced to give way, and a complete rout ensued. When Sir Andrew Wood of Largo, who had been sent forward by the king, arrived on the field of battle, he found the earl of Arran weeping over his expiring nephew Lennox, deploring his loss, and exclaiming, "The wisest, the best, the bravest man in Scotland, has fallen this day" Covering the body with his scarlet cloak, he placed a guard around, and delivered it up to the king's servants to be honourably interred During the action the earl of Lennox had been wounded and taken prisoner by John Hamilton of Bardowie, who was conveying him to a place of safety, when he was met by Sir James Hamilton of Finnart, Arran's natural son, who cruelly slew him in cold blood A groom of the earl's, resolving to avenge his fate, went to Edinburgh, where meeting one of his fellow-servants, he eagerly demanded if he had seen the bastard of Arran "I have," was the reply, "and but a short time since" "What!" said he, "and wert thou so ungrateful a recreant to thy murdered lord, as to permit him to live?—begone! thou art unworthy of so noble a master" Hastening to Holyrood-house, he arrived there during a muster of the Hamiltons and Douglases, for a projected expedition to the borders. Watching his opportunity he saw Finnart cross the court and ascend the stairs of the palace, when springing upon him as he entered a dark gallery, he gave him six severe wounds with his dagger He then retired and mixed with the crowd, but an order being issued for the palace gates to be shut, and all within the court to draw up against the walls, the assassin was discovered, with the bloody dagger still in his hand He was put to the rack to force him to name his accomplices, but he had none, and on hearing that Hamilton was likely to survive, when his right hand was cut off previous to his execution, he observed that it deserved punishment, not for its crime, but for its failure. The earl had three sons and one daughter

His eldest son, Matthew, the next earl, spent the early part of his life in the service of the king of France, in the wars in Italy, where he served with great distinction In 1531 he obtained for nineteen years, the tenure of the governorship and revenues of Dumbarton castle. After the death of James V, he was in 1543 invited by Cardinal Bethune to return to Scotland, to oppose the regent Arran, having represented to him that the legitimacy of the latter was very questionable, that the late king had appointed him successor to the crown after his daughter, and that many were ready to support his claim to the regency; and holding out a hope of his obtaining the queen-mother in marriage. On the promise of assistance in money and men from the king of France, Lennox arrived in Scotland, and immediately began to oppose the measures of the regent. He was the rival of the earl of Bothwell for the favour of the queen-dowager (see vol i. of this work, page 353). To rescue the young queen, then residing at Linlithgow, from the regent, he, with Huntly and Argyle, marched from Stirling, at the head of a force of 10,000 men, and proceeding towards the capital, were joined at Leith by Bothwell and his array, when Arran consented to surrender his royal charge, and the infant queen, with the queen-dowager, were conducted in triumph by Lennox to Stirling.

On the reconciliation of Bethune with Angus, the same year, Lennox, finding himself deceived, deserted the cardinal's party, and became a zealous supporter of the projected match between the infant queen Mary and Edward prince of Wales. A French ambassador had arrived in the Clyde, with a small fleet, bearing military stores, fifty pieces of artillery, and 10,000 crowns, to be distributed amongst the friends of the cardinal The squadron anchored off Dumbarton, and Lennox, hurrying thither with Glencairn, seized upon the whole, and hastily collected his vassals. Being joined by other malcontent nobles, by a forced march he came suddenly upon the regent and cardinal at Leith, and a negotiation being commenced, a treaty was concluded much to the advantage of the regent. On 17th May 1544, an agreement was entered into at Carlisle between Lennox, Glencairn, and Henry VIII, in which the latter promised to Lennox the government of Scotland and the hand of his niece Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter of Archibald earl of Angus and the queen-dowager, and consented to settle a pension on Glencairn and his son, while the two earls engaged to use every effort to seize and deliver the young queen, with the principal Scottish fortresses, into Henry's hands, Lennox agreeing to the surrender of Dumbarton, with the isle and castle of Bute Lennox immediately proceeded to Dumbarton, whence, after the defeat of Glencairn on the common muir of Glasgow, he sailed for England, and was received with great distinction at the English court. Soon after he was united to the Lady Margaret Douglas, receiving with her lands in England to the annual value of 6,800 marks Scots. On the accounts of his desertion of his country and his favourable reception in England reaching France, Francis the First, in whose service was his illustrious brother, the Lord Aubigny, immediately deprived the latter of his high offices and threw him into prison

In August following, Lennox sailed from Bristol, with 18 English ships and 600 soldiers, and arriving in the Clyde, attacked and plundered the island of Arran, which belonged to the regent, occupied Bute, and took the castle of Rothesay He next directed his course to Dumbarton castle, which was commanded by Stirling of Glorat, one of his retainers. Stirling received him as his master, but the earl no sooner mentioned to him his design of giving up the castle to Henry, than he and his Englishmen were turned out of the fortress, and compelled to return to their ships. Being fired on in passing Dunoon, on his way down the Clyde, he landed under cover of a fire from his own ships, attacked a body of Highlanders whom the earl of Argyle had collected to oppose him, and dispersed them with considerable slaughter He next invaded Kintyre, and plundered the adjacent coasts of Kyle and Carrick, after which he returned to Bristol

In the winter of 1544-5, he resided at Carlisle, with an allowance of four marks a day from King Henry In view of an intended invasion of the west of Scotland by the English, negotiations were opened, in 1545, through Lennox, with Donald, lord of the Isles and earl of Ross, who willingly bound himself, with eighteen of his barons, to assist him with 6,000 men Henry appointed Lennox to the chief command of the expedition, but Hertford, the leader of the English army which soon after invaded Scotland and committed great excesses, requesting his presence in his camp, the western invasion was postponed. At a parliament held at Stirling in October of the same year, Lennox, and his brother, the bishop of Caithness, were declared guilty of treason and forfeited. He afterwards sailed with the earl of Ormond, and an armament intended for a descent on the western coasts of Scotland, but does not appear to have even attempted it.

He received from King Henry a grant of the manor of Temple-Newsom in Yorkshire, and remained in exile in England till 1564, a period of twenty years. He was recalled by Queen Mary, in December of the latter year, when his forfeiture was rescinded. Father of the ill-fated Lord Darnley, the husband of Queen Mary, and grandfather of James VI, he was, on 11th July 1570, elected regent of the kingdom Having called a parliament to be held at Stirling castle on 4th September 1571, the queen's party formed a design, planned by Kirkcaldy of Grange, to surprise what in contempt they called 'the black parliament." Leaving Edinburgh, on the previous evening, with 300 horse and 80 foot, they reached Stirling by four in the morning, and easily found access to the town They instantly surrounded the lodgings of the chief nobility, and made prisoners of the regent and ten other noblemen, with whom they set out in triumph for the capital The enterprise, however, was defeated, by the want of discipline on the part of the borderers, under Scott of Buccleuch, who had dispersed in quest of plunder, and the sudden attack on the invading party by the earl of Mar and a force from the castle. Driven from the market-place, they were forced to abandon their prisoners, who were all found safe, excepting the regent, whom Captain George Calder, on seeing the defeat of his party, had stabbed with a broadsword. The regent did not alight from his horse till he had reached the castle He died in the evening, and was interred at the chapel-royal at Stirling, with an inscription on the tomb, in English, in a somewhat homely strain His virtues are celebrated in the following Latin epitaph by the celebrated George Buchanan, who was greatly attached to his lordship and his family

"Regis avus, Regis Pater, alto e sanguine Regum
Imperio quorum terra Britanna subest,
Matthæus genuit Levinia, Gallia fovit,
Pulso Anglus thalamum, regnique decusque dedit
Corpi invicta manu, famam virtute refelli,
Arma armis vici, consiliisque dolos
Gratus in ingratos, patriam justèque pèque
Cum regerem hostili perfidia cecidi.
Care nepos, spes una domus, meliore senectam
Attingas fato, cætera dignus avo.

His countess, Lady Margaret Douglas, was born in England Her mother, the Queen Dowager Margaret, having taken refuge in that country, from the tyrannic sway of John, duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, was delivered of this daughter Oct. 18, 1515

Lady Margaret was thrice imprisoned 1st. By her uncle, Henry VIII, for a design to wed Thomas Howard, son of the duke of Norfolk 2d. By Queen Elizabeth, for permitting her son to espouse Mary, queen of Scots. 3d For corresponding with that ill-fated queen in her captivity She had 4 sons and 4 daughters, all of whom died young, except two sons, Henry, Lord Darnley, husband of Queen Mary, and Charles, 5th earl of Lennox, father of the beautiful and unfortunate Lady Arabella Stuart.

The countess died at Hackney, March 9, 1577, in her 62d year, and was buried in Westminster Abbey Her portrait, engraved by Rivers, from the original in the Carteret collection, is subjoined

The earldom of Lennox, by right of blood, now devolved on James VI, as heir of his grandfather, and on 18th April 1572, it and the lordship of Darnley, with the whole of the family estates and heritable jurisdictions, were granted to Charles, Lord Darnley's younger brother, and uncle of the king He died at London in 1576, without male issue, in the 21st year of his age, and was buried in Henry VII's chapel in Westminster Abbey He had married, in 1574, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Cavendish, and sister of the first earl of Devonshire, a marriage which so highly excited the jealousy of Queen Elizabeth, on account of his descent from Henry VII, that the countesses of Lennox and Shrewsbury, the latter the lady's mother, were imprisoned for some time, and the earl of Shrewsbury, her stepfather, was, for a season, in disgrace at court.

The only offspring of the marriage was a daughter, the unfortunate Lady Arabella Stuart, commonly called in English history, the Lady Arabella. She was heiress to a large estate, but her proximity to the throne rendered her the innocent victim of state policy She was held under great restraint by Queen Elizabeth, who, when her cousin, King James, proposed to marry her to Lord Esme Stuart, whom he had created duke of Lennox, prevented the marriage. The Pope had formed the design of raising her to the English throne, by espousing her to the duke of Savoy, which project is said to have been approved of by Henry IV of France, from a wish to prevent the union of the crowns of England and Scotland. She was afterwards imprisoned by Queen Elizabeth, for listening to some overtures from a son of the earl of Northumberland. On Elizabeth's death, an abortive conspiracy, of which she was altogether ignorant, was formed to set aside James from the English throne, in her favour, and one of the articles of indictment against Sir Walter Raleigh, 17th November 1603, was that the Lord Cobham; on the 9th June previously, met with him at Durham house, and had conference with him to advance Arabella Stuart to the throne. On his accession, King James allowed her £800 a-year, for her maintenance, with a table for her people Having renewed a childish attachment to Mr William Seymour, afterwards marquis of Hertford, son of Lord Beauchamp, she secretly married him in 1610, in consequence of which she was placed in confinement at Lambeth, and her husband sent to the Tower After about a year's imprisonment, they separately made their escape, on 3d June 1611 Mr Seymour got safe to the continent, but the Lady Arabella was retaken, shut up in the Tower, and passed the remainder of her life in close confinement, which finally deprived her of her reason She died September 27, 1615, aged 38, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where also most of the subsequent dukes of Lennox of this family were interred. She is said to have possessed talents of a superior order, with a very pleasing person

Robert Stuart, second son of John, third earl of Lennox of this name, and grand-uncle of James VI., was by that monarch, to whom the earldom had again devolved, created earl of Lennox, by charter, dated 16th June 1578, to him and the heirs male of his body He had been provost of the collegiate church of Dumbarton, and in 1542 was preferred to the bishopric of Caithness, but before he could be consecrated, taking part with his brother, the earl of Lennox, against the regent Arran, he was obliged to retire to England, where he lived in exile till 1563, when he was restored to the revenues of his see. He complied with the Reformation, and during his brother's short regency, had the priory of St. Andrews conferred upon him Having agreed to accept of the earldom of March, and lordship of Dunbar, in lieu of the earldom of Lennox, which the king wished to bestow upon his kinsman, Esme Stuart, lord of Aubigny, a charter was granted 5th October, 1582, of the former earldom and lordship in his favour He subsequently lived in retirement at St. Andrews till his death, on 29th March, 1586, in his 70th year Although married he had no issue

Esme Stuart, seventh earl, and first duke of Lennox of this name was the son of John Stuart, lord of Aubigny, third son of the third earl, a captain of the Scottish gens d'armes in France, and governor of Avignon Educated in France, he was sent for by James VI , he landed at Leith 8th September, 1579, and on the 5th of the following March was created earl of Lennox. He also received the abbacy of Arbroath, with many honours and grants of land On his arrival it was thought that he was a private legate from the Pope, the house of Guise, and the king of France, to work alteration in religion and state (Calderwood, vol iii p 460). At the General Assembly which met at Dundee 12th July 1580, a letter was read from him acknowledging the protestant religion, notwithstanding of which, and his having previously subscribed the Confession of Faith, as well as offered to receive a French protestant chaplain into his house, the ministers would not believe but that he had some deep design under all his professions of conformity He and the notorious Captain Stuart, son of Lord Ochiltree, became the rival favourites of King James. Lennox is represented as of amiable manners and mild character, but very unfit for the intrigues of a court. His name appears, the first after the king's, at the second Confession of Faith, commonly called the King's Confession, subscribed at Holyrood-house, 28th January 1581 He was created duke of Lennox, earl of Darnley, and lord Tarbolton, Daikeith, and Tantallan, 5th August 1581, and appointed high chamberlain of Scotland He was the avowed protector of the bishops, and by his counsels he encouraged in the king that strong tendency which he entertained towards episcopacy, and which was also no doubt greatly confirmed by the conduct of the more violent of the presbyterian clergy His power at last became so great that in a quarrel which he had in 1582, about some rival appointment in Teviotdale, with the earl of Gowrie, the lord treasurer, that nobleman plainly told him that "this realm could not suffer two kings." After the raid of Ruthven, in August that year, the object of which was the dismissal of the king's two favourites, James was constrained to sign an order for the departure of Lennox from Scotland After some delay, during which it is said he entertained the intention of seizing upon Holyrood-house and the city of Edinburgh, he went through England to France, and died at Paris, 26th May 1583. In his last moments he declared his firm adherence to the Protestant faith He married a French lady, by whom he had Ludovick second duke, Esme, third duke, and three daughters.

Ludovick second duke of Lennox and first duke of Richmond of this name, born 29th September 1574, was, soon after his father's death, brought over to Scotland, by order of James VI , who bestowed upon him all the estates and honours formerly held by his father, by charter, under the great seal, dated 31st July 1583. He arrived at Leith on 23d November the same year At the meeting of the estates at Edinburgh on 18th May 1584, though then but ten years old, he carried the crown as he also did on several future occasions of the meetings of parliament When James sailed for Denmark in October 1589, Lennox, though then but fifteen years of age, was appointed, with the assistance of the earl of Bothwell, and the advice of the council, governor of the east parts of the kingdom In 1591 he married Lady Jane Ruthven, daughter of the earl of Gowrie, whereby he incurred the displeasure of the king, and was forbidden the court. He had the office of hereditary great chamberlain, and was appointed high admiral of Scotland, in the place of Bothwell He was one of the noblemen and barons who entered into a bond at Aberdeen in March 1592, for the security of religion and against the Popish lords. The following year he was reconciled to the king and again received at court In November 1594 he was left lieutenant in the north, after the king had quitted Aberdeen, whither he had marched an army against Huntly and Errol and their abettors, but returned to Edinburgh on 16th February following In 1598 he was sworn of the privy council He was with the king at Falkland at the time of the Gowrie conspiracy in 1600, and as Alexander Ruthven was his brother-in-law, the king acquainted him with his whole purpose and asked him if he thought that young gentleman well settled in his wits. The duke expressed his surprise at Ruthven's tale about the money, and thought it very unlikely, but affirmed that he never perceived anything to make him think that his brother-in-law was not wise enough Following him to Perth, Lennox was one of those who were instrumental in the rescue of the king at Gowrie house

In July 1601 the duke was sent ambassador to France, and on his return, passing three weeks in London, he was entertained by Queen Elizabeth with great splendour In 1603 he attended James to England, on his accession to the English throne, and in 1607 was his majesty's high commissioner to the parliament of Scotland He was created earl of Richmond in England, 6th October 1613, and accompanied the king on his visit to Scotland in 1617 In the Scots parliament held 5th July 1621, he voted for the five articles of Perth He was created earl of Newcastle and duke of Richmond in the English peerage, 17th May 1623. He was master of the household, first gentleman of the king's bedchamber, and a knight of the Garter Although thrice married, he left no surviving children. He was found dead in his bed on the morning of 16th February 1624, in his 50th year Calderwood (Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland, vol. vii. p. 595) says: "He was weill liked of for his courtesie, meuknes, liberalitie to his servants and followers. He opposed so farre as he might the Spanish matche. The king could never induce him to medle with the affairs of our kirk. The bruit went that he was poysoned."

His brother, Esme, third duke of Lennox, a faithful adherent of Henry IV of France, came to Scotland in 1601, and was created earl of March in England, 7th June 1619 He succeeded his brother in his Scottish titles only in 1624, and in his room was installed a knight of the Garter He died 30th July the same year Of seven sons, three were killed during the civil wars, fighting on the side of the king Lord George, the fourth son, Lord Aubigny in France, killed at Edgehill, 23d October 1642, was the father of Charles, earl of Litchfield, sixth duke of Lennox, Lord Ludovick, the fifth son, frequently mentioned by St. Evremond as Mons. Aubigny, was named a cardinal in 1665, and died at Paris in November of that year, Lord John, the sixth son, a general of horse in the king's service, was killed at the battle of Alresford in 1644, and Lord Bernard Stuart, the youngest, created earl of Litchfield in 1645, was killed at the battle of Rowtonheath, near Chester, 26th September the same year

The eldest son, James, fourth duke of Lennox, born in London, 6th April 1612, succeeded when he was only twelve years of age. After studying at the university of Cambridge, he travelled in France, Spain, and Italy, and was created a grandee of Spain On his return he was, before reaching his 21st year, sworn a privy councillor, appointed lord warden of the Cinque Ports, and master of the household, also installed a knight of the Garter He was created duke of Richmond in the English peerage, by patent, dated 8th August, 1641 He adhered strongly to the king's interest, and lent Charles I at one time £20,000 Clarendon, who has given a high character of him, says that on the condemnation of that unfortunate monarch, he was one of the noblemen who offered to suffer in his stead. He died 30th March 1655, in his 43d year By his duchess, Lady Mary Villiers, only daughter of the first duke of Buckingham, assassinated by Felton at Portsmouth in 1628, and relict of Lord Herbert, he had, with one daughter, one son, Esme

The latter, fifth duke of Lennox, and third of Richmond, died at Paris in 1660, unmarried, and was succeeded by his cousin, Charles, earl of Litchfield, already mentioned.

Charles, sixth duke of Lennox and fourth of Richmond, had been created Lord Stuart of Newbury and earl of Litchfield, 21st December 1645, and in 1661, after succeeding as duke of Lennox and Richmond, he was invested with the order of the Garter Appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of Denmark, he died at Elsinore, in December 1672, without issue He was thrice married His third wife, Frances Therese, eldest daughter of the Hon Walter Stuart, third son of the first Lord Blantyre, is celebrated as the greatest beauty in the court of Charles II A portrait of her is given at page 334 of the first volume of this work In the Memoires de Grammont are numerous anecdotes relative to her The design of Charles II, of divorcing his queen, and marrying Miss Stuart, was prevented by the duke of Richmond's secret marriage with her In Pinkerton's Gallery of Portraits, vol ii. is another portrait of this lady, in man's apparel, of which a woodcut is subjoined

In this portrait, engraved by James Huyman, a Flemish artist, from a painting in Kensington palace, formerly belonging to James II of England, she is represented in the dress of a cavalier about the time of the civil wars, a suit of buff, adorned with blue ribbons. "The likeness," says Mr Pinkerton, "corresponds with that on her tomb in Henry VII's chapel, Westminster Abbey, where her figure in wax may also be seen, with a stuffed parrot, which is said to have died just before or after her" The hair of this famous court beauty was light auburn, and her eyes blue. To a person and face of wonderful symmetry and beauty, she united the simplicity of a child, and when the king and his courtiers were occupied in deep gaming, she would sit building castles of cards, while happy was the peer who assisted her in this amusement of a fool or a philosopher She is the Britannia of our copper coins. Another portrait, by Sir Peter Lely, from Lord Westcote's at Hugley, was engraved for an edition of the Memoires du Comte de Grammont, published in 1793.

On her husband's death, the whole Lennox estates were settled on the duchess for life. She died 15th October 1702, bequeathing the principal part of her large fortune to Lord Blantyre, who purchased the estate of Lethington, in Haddingtonshire, and called it Lennoxlove after his benefactress.

The dukedom of Lennox, with all its honours and possessions, again reverted to the sovereign, by right of inheritance, devolving on King Charles II, as nearest collateral heir-male, and his majesty was, on 6th January 1680, served heir in special of Charles sixth duke, his cousin The whole male line of Sir John Stewart of Derneley, first Lord Aubigny, husband of Elizabeth, daughter of Duncan, eighth and last of the original earls of the Levenax, ended in Cardinal York, who died at Rome in 1807. Sir John was one of the leaders of the Scots auxiliaries in France, and got a grant of the lands of Aubigny and Concressault from the dauphin, afterwards Charles VII, for his share in the victory over the English at Beaugé in Anjou in 1421. In January 1426 he also received a grant of the county of Evreux in Normandy, with permission to him and his descendants to quarter the arms of France with his own He was slain in an engagement near Orleans, 12th February 1428-9

Lennox, duke of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, revived by Charles II., in 1675, in the person of his illegitimate son, Charles Lennox, by Louise Renee de Penancoet de Queroualle, whom he created, in 1673, duchess of Portsmouth, countess of Farneham, and baroness Petersfield, and who, in 1674, was created duchess of Aubigny in France, by Louis XIV Born 29th May 1672, her son by Charles was created, when little more than three years old, duke of Richmond, earl of March, and baron Settrington, in Yorkshire, in the peerage of England, 9th August 1675, and duke of Lennox, earl of Darnley, and baron Tarbolton in Scotland, by letters patent, dated at Windsor 9th September the same year, to him and the heirs male of his body After the death of the dowager-duchess in 1702, the duke sold the whole of his property in the Lennox, the marquis of Montrose purchasing the greater portion of it. The king his father, to whom he is said to have borne a strong resemblance, had granted to him and the heirs of his body, the sum of twelvepence for every chaldron of coals shipped at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which revenue continued till April 1799, when the lords of the Treasury agreed to give an annuity of £19,000 a-year for the same. Elected a knight of the Garter 7th April 1681, he was, on the removal of the duke of Monmouth, appointed master of the horse to the king On the accession of James VII, however, he was deprived of that office, on account of his mother's having promoted the bill of exclusion During the short reign of James, he resided in France, but returned to England at the Revolution, which he strongly supported. He served in Flanders, under King William, to whom he was aide-de-camp, and was one of the lords of the bedchamber to George I He died in his mother's lifetime at Goodwood, the family seat in Sussex, 27th May 1723, aged 51, leaving an only son, and two daughters, Louisa, countess of Berkeley, and Anne, countess of Albemarle.

His son, Charles, second duke of Richmond and Lennox of this creation, born at London 20th May 1701, was, when earl of March, chosen M P for Chichester in 1722 The following year he succeeded his father, and in 1734, on the death of his grandmother, he became duke of Aubigny in France. He was created a knight of the Bath in 1725, and of the Garter in 1726. He was also one of the lords of the bedchamber, and aide-de-camp to the king At the accession of George II, he officiated as lord high constable of England. In January 1735 he was appointed master of the horse, and sworn a privy councillor He was declared one of the lords justices during the king's absence from England 12th May 1740, and again in 1745, 1748, and 1750 Brigadier-general in 1742, he attended George II during the campaign of 1743, and was at the battle of Dettingen He attained the rank of lieutenant-general 6th June 1745, and was actively employed against the rebels that year and in 1746, and assisted at the reduction of Carlisle. He died 8th August 1750, having had eight daughters and four sons.

Charles, third but eldest surviving son, third duke of Richmond and Lennox, succeeded his father in his sixteenth year, and soon after entered the army In 1756 he took his seat in the house of peers, and attaching himself to the whig interest, became one of the most conspicuous members of the opposition of his time. In command of the 72d regiment, he accompanied, in 1758, the expedition under the duke of Marlborough to the coast of France. He afterwards served in Germany, and was at the battle of Minden, 1st August 1759 On the accession of George III, he was appointed a lord of the bedchamber, but was soon dismissed for a reason highly honourable to himself, namely, his having boldly expostulated with the young monarch for his marked attention to his sister, Lady Sarah Lennox. In Douglas' Peerage it is stated that he resigned the post within a fortnight, in consequence of two junior officers having been appointed over the head of his brother, Lieutenant-colonel Lord George Lennox, who had distinguished himself, at the head of the British grenadiers, at the battle of Clostercampen.

During the administration of the earl of Bute, and of his successor Lord Grenville, his grace was a firm and active opponent of the government. On the ministerial arrangement which took place under the marquis of Rockingham and the old whigs, supported by the duke of Cumberland, he was, in 1765, appointed ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the court of France, and sworn a privy councillor, 23d October of that year He was accompanied to Paris by his brother, Lord George, who acted as charge des affaires during his grace's absence. Recalled from his embassy the following year, the duke was appointed one of the secretaries of state, 23d May 1766 He resigned on 2d August following, and from that period took an active lead against the measures of the administration, being particularly opposed to the American war On 18th May, 1770, he submitted to the house of lords eighteen resolutions, tending to prevent a rupture with the colonies, which gave rise to one of the most extraordinary debates on record The whole of the misconduct of ministers in relation to America, for the four preceding years, was laid open in the severest terms, and the loss of the colonies confidently predicted from their policy Although continually overpowered by numbers, he never relaxed in his opposition, and the whole of the spring session of 1775 was remarkable for his repeated contests with the ministry He supported Lord Chatham's motion for the removal of the British troops from Boston, and moved an address to the king, 5th May 1776, that he would be pleased to countermand the march of the Hessian troops, and also give directions for an immediate suspension of hostilities with America.

On his party being again called into power, he was appointed master general of the ordnance, and made a knight of the Garter, 19th April 1782 He held office till 9th April 1783, when, in consequence of some changes in the administration, he retired. Soon after the breaking up of the coalition ministry he distinguished himself as a strenuous advocate for parliamentary reform, and was for some time president of the Constitutional Society, established to effect that object. He also published a letter on the subject. On the formation of the Pitt administration in December 1783, he was restored to his post of master-general of the ordnance, and while in office he proposed a gigantic and most expensive plan for improving the fortifications of the kingdom, which was thrown out of the House of Commons by the casting vote of the Speaker He resigned the master-generalship of the ordnance, 15th July 1795, on being appointed to the command of the horse-guards, and was made field-marshal, 30th July 1796 He died at Goodwood, which he partly rebuilt and greatly enlarged, 29th December 1806, in his 72d year, without issue.

His next brother, Lord George Henry Lennox, second surviving son of the second duke, an officer in the army, made the campaign of Germany as aide-de-camp to the duke of Cumberland in 1757 The following year, when lieutenant-colonel of the 33d foot, he was in the expedition against the coast of France, and in 1760 and 1761, he served in Germany under Prince Ferdinand, who, in his despatches of the marquis of Granby, 6th August of the latter year, mentions with praise his "distinguished valour" In 1762 he served in Portugal as a brigadier-general. He was M P from 1761 to 1790 On 17th February 1784 he was appointed constable of the Tower, and lord-lieutenant of the Tower Hamlets, and in November of the same year governor of Plymouth He rose to the rank of general, 15th October 1798, when he was sworn a privy councillor He died 25th March 1805, in his 68th year By his wife, Lady Louisa Kerr, eldest daughter of the fourth marquis of Lothian, he had, with three daughters, one son, Charles, fourth duke of Richmond and Lennox.

The latter, born in Scotland in 1764, early entered the army, and was captain in the Coldstream foot-guards in 1789, when he rendered himself conspicuous by challenging and fighting a duel with the colonel of the regiment, Frederick duke of York His royal highness having stated that at the club in D'Aubigny's, Colonel Lennox had submitted to certain expressions unworthy of a gentleman, the colonel, on this being reported to him, sent a letter to the duke to the effect that, as neither he nor any member of the club recollected hearing such words addressed to him, he thought his royal highness "ought to contradict the report as publicly as he had asserted it." The duke replied that the words were spoken in his own presence, and therefore he could not be subject to mistake, he was only bound to maintain his own opinion that they ought to be resented by a gentleman Lennox immediately sent a message to his royal highness requiring satisfaction A meeting accordingly took place on Wimbledon Common on the 26th May 1789, Lord Rawdon, afterwards marquis of Hastings, acting as second to the duke of York, and the earl of Winchelsea, one of the lords of the bedchamber to the king, as second to Colonel Lennox. The particulars of this transaction were thus detailed by the seconds: "The ground was measured at twelve paces, and both parties were to fire at a signal agreed upon The signal being given, Colonel Lennox fired, and the ball grazed his royal highness' curl. The duke of York did not fire. Lord Rawdon then interfered, and said 'That he thought enough had been done.' Colonel Lennox observed 'That the duke had not fired' Lord Rawdon said, 'It was not the duke's intention to fire his royal highness had come out upon the colonel's desire to give him satisfaction, and had no animosity against him.' Colonel Lennox pressed that the duke should fire, which was declined, upon a repetition of the reason Lord Winchelsea then went up to the duke of York, and expressed a hope 'That his royal highness could have no objection to say that he considered Colonel Lennox a man of honour and courage.' His royal highness replied 'That he should say nothing, he had come out to give the colonel satisfaction, and did not mean to fire at him if Colonel Lennox was not satisfied he might fire again' Colonel Lennox said 'He could not possibly fire again at the duke, as his royal highness did not mean to fire at him.' On this both parties quitted the ground. The seconds think it proper to add, that both parties behaved with the utmost coolness and intrepidity" Having, on the 28th of the same month, obtained the duke's permission for a call of the officers to consider his conduct, they declared their opinion to be that, subsequent to the 15th, he had "behaved with courage, but from the peculiarity of the circumstances, not with judgment." In consequence of this declaration, he, on the 16th June, exchanged his company in the guards for the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 35th foot, then stationed in Edinburgh castle. An Irish gentleman of the name of Theophilus Swift, a relative and author of a Life of Dean Swift, having published a pamphlet, reflecting on his character, Colonel Lennox sent him a challenge, and on the morning of the 3d July, they met in a field near London, attended by their seconds, Mr Swift by Sir William Brown, and Col. Lennox by Col Phipps, when the ball from the colonel's pistol lodged in Mr Swift's body, but he soon recovered from his wound. On his arrival in Edinburgh, on the 21st of the month, the castle was illuminated in honour of his joining the regiment. The incorporation of goldsmiths in Edinburgh made him an honorary member of their body, and presented him with the freedom in a silver snuff-box He had also the freedom of the city conferred on him by the magistrates. The subjoined is from a full-length portrait of Colonel Lennox, taken while in Edinburgh by Kay, and inserted, with a biographical account of the colonel, in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits

In September of the same year he married Lady Charlotte, eldest daughter of the fourth duke of Gordon, and niece to the celebrated Lady Wallace

He afterwards served in the Leeward Islands, and arrived in St. Domingo from Martinique with eight flank companies of foot, on the 8th June 1794, just at the breaking out of the yellow fever, to which 40 officers and 600 rank and file fell victims in two months. In 1795 he was appointed aide-de-camp to the king, with the rank of colonel, and in 1798 he became major-general In 1800 he was made colonel-commandant of the 35th foot, and in May 1803 was promoted to be colonel of the same regiment. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1805, and of general in 1814.

At the general election of 1790, on the retirement of his father from the representation of Sussex, he was elected M P for that county, and gave his support to Pitt's administration. He was rechosen in 1796, and again in 1802 and 1806. The same year he succeeded his uncle as duke of Richmond and Lennox. On the 1st April 1807, he was sworn a privy councillor, and appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which dignity he held for six years. His administration, with Colonel Wellesley, afterwards duke of Wellington, as chief secretary, was very popular. On quitting Ireland, his grace removed with his family to Brussels, and both he and his eldest son, the earl of March, accompanied the duke of Wellington's suite to the field of Waterloo.

Soon after, he was appointed governor-general of British North America. His administration, which had commenced auspiciously, terminated in a very melancholy manner. Having been bitten by a dog, he died of hydrophobia, at Montreal, on 28th August 1819, and was interred in the cathedral church of Quebec. His sufferings previous to his death were extreme. He had risen early on the morning of the 27th, and proposed walking through Richmond wood to the new settlement of that name. In his progress through the wood he started off on hearing a dog bark, and was with difficulty overtaken; and on the party's arrival at the skirts of the wood, at the sight of some stagnant water, his grace hastily leaped over a fence, and rushed into an adjoining barn, whither his dismayed companions eagerly followed him. The paroxysm of his disorder was now at its height. He was with difficulty removed to a miserable hovel in the neighbourhood, and expired in the arms of a faithful Swiss, who had never quitted his beloved master for a moment. Whilst in this miserable log-hut, reason occasionally resumed her empire, and his grace availed himself of these lucid intervals to address a letter to Lady Margaret Lennox, in which he reminded her that a favourite dog, belonging to the household, being in a room at the castle of St Louis, at a time, five months before, when shaving he had cut his chin, the dog was lifted up to lick the wound, when the animal, which subsequently went mad, bit him on the chin. He had seven sons and seven daughters.

His eldest son, Charles Gordon Lennox, K G, 5th duke, born Aug 8, 1791, married April 10, 1817, Lady Caroline Paget, eldest daughter of 1st marquis of Anglesey, issue, 4 sons and 3 drs. He early entered the army, and in 1810 joined the duke of Wellington in Portugal as aide-de-camp and assistant military secretary, remaining with him till the close of the Peninsular war. He was also at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. In 1829 he was created a knight of the Garter, postmaster-general from 1830 to 1834. On the death of his maternal uncle, the fifth and last duke of Gordon, in 1836, he assumed the additional name of Gordon, on succeeding to the greater part of his estates, chancellor of Marischal college and university, Aberdeen, high steward of Chichester, a privy councillor, lord-lieutenant of Sussex, vice-admiral of the coast of Sussex, colonel of the Royal Sussex militia, and aide-de-camp to the queen. He died Oct. 21, 1860, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Charles, earl of March and Darnley. The second son, Lord Fitzroy George Charles Lennox, an officer in the army, was lost in the President steamer in 1841, coming from America. His grace's 2d daughter, Lady Augusta-Catherine, countess of Dornberg, born in 1827, married in 1851 Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar.

Charles, 6th duke, born Feb. 27, 1818, capt. in the army when earl of March, M P, and president of poor-law board, hereditary constable of Inverness castle. His grace married in 1843 Frances Harriet, eldest daughter of Algernon F Greville, Esq; issue, Charles Henry, earl of March and Darnley, 2 other sons, and 2 daughters.

LESLIE, a surname, derived from lands of that name in Aberdeenshire. During the 17th century there were at one time three general officers of the name in different European services; namely, Walter, Count Leslie, in the service of the emperor of Germany; David Leslie, created Lord Newark in 1661, in that of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden; and Alexander, earl of Leven, commander of the Scots army. Several counts of the name are settled in Germany, and there are many families named Leslie in France, Russia, and Poland.

The Leslies derive their descent from one Bartholomew, a Flemish chief, who settled with his followers in the district of Garioch, Aberdeenshire, in the reign of William the Lion. He obtained the barony of Leslie or Lesly, in that district, from which his posterity adopted the name. The fourth in descent from him, Norman de Lesley, obtained from Alexander III, in 1283, a grant of the woods and lands of Fetkill, now called Leslie, in Fife. He swore fealty to Edward I for lands lying in different counties. He was one of the magnates Scotiæ who renounced the confederation with France 15th July 1296, and was by Edward I appointed in 1305 sheriff of the county of Aberdeen.

His son, Sir Andrew de Lesley, signed the letter to the Pope in 1320, asserting the independence of Scotland. He had four sons, namely, Norman, who succeeded him, Walter, earl of Ross, Andrew, who succeeded Norman, and George, ancestor of the Lesleys of Balquhain, from whom descended Alexander, first earl of Leven (see LEVEN, earl of). Norman witnessed the commission issued by the steward of Scotland for treating of the liberation of David II, 10th May 1356. Two years afterwards he and Sir Robert Erskine were sent as commissioners to solicit the Pope for a grant of the tenth part of the ecclesiastical revenues of Scotland, towards payment of the ransom of that monarch, which they obtained for three years. They were also appointed, 10th May 1359, plenipotentiaries to treat with Charles the dauphin, regent of France, with whom they concluded an alliance. He died before 11th February 1366, and was succeeded by his brother Andrew, whose son, another Norman, made an entail of the lands in 1390. The son of the latter, David de Lesley, was one of the hostages for James I. He had a daughter, who, as he had no male issue, inherited the barony of Lesley, and married a gentleman of the same name, ancestor of the Leslies of Leslie. The other estates went to the heir-male, supposed to have been David de Lesley's cousin-german, Sir George Leslie of Rothes, ancestor of the earls of Rothes (see ROTHES, earl of).

The family of Leslie of Wardes and Findrassie, Elginshire, descend from Robert Leslie of Findrassie, son of George, 3d earl of Rothes. John Leslie, Esq of Wardes, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia Sept. 1, 1625, with remainder to his heirs male whatsoever. He succeeded his father in 1620. His grandfather, William Leslie, Esq, was king's falconer, and his great-great great-grandfather, Alexander Leslie, was receiver-general to James IV. The son of the latter, John Leslie, was five times married, and died April 1, 1546. His first wife, Stewart, daughter of the bishop of Moray, was great-granddaughter of James II, and his 2d, through whom the family descends, was Margaret, daughter of William Crichton, Esq of Frendraught. By his 3d wife he was ancestor of the Leslies of Warthill.

On the decease, unmarried, of Sir John, 2d baronet, the son of the first, the title reverted, without the estates, to his uncle, (Sir) William. This gentleman declined to assume it, and his four sons dying without issue, the baronetcy, after his decease, was inherited by his kinsman, Sir John Leslie, 4th baronet, great great-grandson of Norman Leslie, Esq., youngest brother of first baronet. Sir John married Caroline-Jemima, only daughter and heiress of Abraham Leslie, Esq of Findrassie; issue, 3 sons and 3 daughters. He died in 1825. His eldest son, Sir Charles Abraham, 5th baronet, was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir Norman-Robert, 6th baronet. The latter, born Dec. 10, 1822, a lieutenant 19th Bengal Native Infantry, was killed at Rohnee in India, during the Sepoy mutiny, June 12, 1857 By his wife, Jessie-Elizabeth, 3d daughter of Major Robert Wood Smith, 6th Bengal Light Cavalry, he had a son and 5 daughters. The son, Sir Charles Henry, born at Lahore, Bengal, in 1848, succeeded his father as 7th baronet.

The family of Leslie of Warthill, Aberdeenshire, derive from John Leslie of Wardes, grandson of William, 4th baron of Balquhain, who, by his 3d wife, the daughter of Forbes of Echt, had 2 sons, William and Alexander The elder son, William, married, 1st, a daughter of William Rowan, burgess in Aberdeen, and their only son, John, was slain at the fatal battle of Pinkie in 1547, 2dly, in 1518, Janet Cruickshank, heiress of Warthill, and was thus the first Leslie possessing the estate. He died in 1561, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Stephen; William, 5th of Warthill, married a grand-niece of the famous Bishop Elphinstone, founder of King's college, Aberdeen, and his 2d son, William, became bishop of Laybach, and metropolitan of Carniola, a prince of the empire, and privy councillor to his imperial majesty During nine generations the succession passed from father to son till 1799, when Alexander, 9th of Warthill, died without issue, and was followed by his nephew William, born June 29, 1770, son of George Leslie of Folla, the lineal male representative of the family Mr Leslie held the estate for 58 years, and died in 1857, and was succeeded by his eldest son, William, born March 16, 1814, elected in 1861 M P for Aberdeenshire.

Leslie, George, of Monymusk, a Capuchin friar, supposed to have lived in the 17th century, is the hero of a romantic Italian work, by John Benedict Rinuccini, archbishop of Formo, a French translation of which was published at Rouen in 1660, but the greater part of which is pure invention.

LESLIE, John, bishop of Ross, a distinguished statesman and historian, and a devoted adherent of Mary queen of Scots, born 29th September, 1526, is said to have been the son of Gavin Leslie, an eminent lawyer, fourth son of Alexander Leslie of Balquhain, in Aberdeenshire There is reason to believe, however, that he was the illegitimate son of a priest of the same name Knox, in his Historie (p 283) calls him a "priest's get and bastard," and Bishop Keith, in his Catalogue of Scottish Bishops (p 194), from documents quoted from the originals in the charter chest of Balquhain, inclines to think that he was the natural son of Gavin Leslie, parson of Kingussie He was educated for the church at the university of Aberdeen, and in 1538 he obtained a dispensation, whereby he was allowed to hold a benefice, notwithstanding the defect in his birth On 15th June 1546, he was appointed an acolyte, or inferior church officer, in the cathedral church of Aberdeen, and in the following year he was made a canon and prebendary In 1549 he went to France, and studied the civil and canon laws at the universities of Poictiers, Toulouse, and Paris, at which last place he took the degree of doctor of civil law and canon law In 1554 he was ordered home by the queen regent, and on 15th April 1558 he was appointed official and vicar-general of the diocese of Aberdeen On 2d July 1559 he became parson of Oyne in the same county

When the doctrines of the Reformation began to spread in Scotland, Leslie distinguished himself as a zealous advocate for the Romish church, and in the famous disputation held at Edinburgh, in 1560, he had for an antagonist no less a personage than John Knox, according to whom (Hist p. 283), he was forced to confess that the only authority for the mass was that of the Pope. After the death of Francis II of France, he was deputed by the chief men of the Popish religion to proceed to France to interest Queen Mary in their favour, and to invite her to Scotland, and arriving before the Protestant lords, he vainly endeavoured to prejudice her mind against them and their cause After a short stay he embarked in the retinue of the young queen at Calais, August 19, 1561; and on her majesty's return to Scotland, he was sworn of her privy council on 19th January 1564, and appointed one of the senators of the college of justice Shortly afterwards he was made abbot of Lindores, and on the death of Sinclair, bishop of Ross, in January 1565, he was promoted to that see He was one of the sixteen commissioners appointed to form the Collection of the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, commonly called 'The Black Acts,' from the Saxon character in which they were printed, in 1566.

After Queen Mary's flight into England, Bishop Leslie was called by his ill-fated mistress into that kingdom to manage and advise in her affairs. He was one of the commissioners chosen, in 1568, to defend her cause in the conference at York, which he did with consummate ability He was subsequently sent as her ambassador to Elizabeth; but finding that no attention was paid to her complaints, he began to form projects for Mary's escape, and engaged in the unfortunate negotiation for her marriage with the duke of Norfolk, which led to that nobleman's execution for treason. Leslie himself, notwithstanding he pleaded his character and privileges as an ambassador, was, in May 1571, committed prisoner, first to the Isle of Ely, and afterwards to the Tower of London. In January 1574, at the request of the king of France, he was set at liberty, when he retired to the Continent. In 1575 he went to Rome, by the advice of his mistress, where he remained three years, and published there his History of the Scottish nation, in Latin, dedicated to the then Pope Gregory XIII. He afterwards went to France, in the hope of being serviceable to Queen Mary. He next proceeded into Germany, and fruitlessly endeavoured to enlist the emperor and several other princes in her cause. On this occasion he acted as temporary nuncio from the Pope. In 1578 he was thrown into prison at Falsburgh, in mistake for the archbishop of Rosanna, an Italian prelate, who was proceeding to Cologne as legate from the Pope, and was only released on payment of 3,000 pistoles. His portrait, from one in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, is subjoined.

II.

Having returned into France, he was, in 1579, made vicar-general of the archbishopric of Rouen, and in 1590 was again arrested during a visitation of that diocese, and obliged to pay a large ransom, to prevent his being delivered up to Queen Elizabeth. In 1593 he was advanced to the vacant bishopric of Coutances, in Lower Normandy, but he never got peaceable possession of the see, and at length he retired from the cares and disappointments of the world into the monastery of Guirtenburg, near Brussels, where he died, May 31, 1596. A monument to his memory was erected, by his nephew, over his grave in that monastery. Part of his wealth he appropriated to the foundation of three colleges at Rome, Paris, and Douay.

The History of Scotland, from the Death of James I. in 1436, to the year 1561, written in the Scottish vernacular during his confinement in the Tower, for the use of Queen Mary. This work was published, with a portrait of Leslie, for the Bannatyne Club in 1830 from a manuscript in possession of the earl of Leven and Melville.

LESLIE, JOHN, a venerable prelate, whose life exceeded a hundred years, was born at Balquhain in Aberdeenshire, some time after the middle of the sixteenth century. He received the first part of his education at the university of Aberdeen, and concluded it at Oxford. He afterwards visited Spain, Italy, Germany, and France, and acquired a thorough knowledge of the languages of all these countries He had such a command of the Latin language that it was said of him, while in Spain, "Solus Lesleius Latine loquitur" He was present at the siege of Rochelle, and accompanied the duke of Buckingham on the expedition to the Isle of Rhé On his return to Britain, after a residence of more than twenty-two years abroad, he was created D D at Oxford, and admitted by James VI a member of his privy council in Scotland By Charles I he was, in August 1628, appointed bishop of the Isles In 1633 he was translated to the Irish see of Raphoe, where he built a handsome palace, which he defended against the troops of Cromwell, being the last who held out against the parliamentarians in Ireland He subsequently went to reside in Dublin After the Restoration he came over to England, and in 1661 was translated to the see of Clogher, where he died in 1671, having been a bishop for more than half a century

His second son, CHARLES LESLIE, author of 'A Short and Easy Method with the Deists,' and other controversial and political works, was born in Ireland in 1650 He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and afterwards became a student in the Temple, but relinquished law for divinity, and entered into holy orders in 1680 In 1687 he was appointed chancellor of Connor, in which capacity he firmly resisted the measures of the Popish party, and withstood the admission of a Roman Catholic high sheriff of the county of Monaghan, although nominated by James II himself At the Revolution, however, he declined taking the oaths to the new government, which necessarily deprived him of all his preferments, on which he withdrew with his family into England. By his writings he zealously endeavoured to promote the interests of the Pretender, whom, on the termination of the Rebellion of 1715, he accompanied into Italy, but being treated by the exiled family with ingratitude and neglect, he returned to Ireland, and died at his own house at Glaslough, in the county of Monaghan, April 13, 1732 His theological works, which chiefly consist of Treatises against the Deists, Socinians, and Quakers, have been printed in two volumes folio One of these, 'The Snake in the Grass,' composed against the Quakers, first published at London in 1696, is highly spoken of by Bayle. His 'Short and Easy Method with the Deists,' by far the most popular and useful of his writings, first appeared in 1697, and has often been reprinted During the reign of Queen Anne, Mr Leslie wrote a weekly paper called 'The Rehearsal,' which has been collected in four vols 8vo A list of his political pieces, which are very numerous, and written principally in opposition to Burnet, Locke, and Hoadley, on the principles of Civil Government and the question of Hereditary Right, will be found, with the names of his other publications, in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica

LESLIE, ALEXANDER, first earl of Leven, the celebrated general of the Presbyterian army during the civil wars, was the son of Captain George Leslie of Balgonie, commander of the castle of Blair, by Anne, his wife, a daughter of Stewart of Ballechin Having early adopted the profession of arms, he served as a captain in the regiment of the lord de Vere, then employed in Holland in assisting the Dutch against the Spaniards, when he obtained the reputation of a brave and skilful officer He then entered the service of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, by whom he was promoted first to the rank of lieutenant-general, and afterwards to that of field-marshal In 1628, General Leslie defended Stralsund, then besieged by the Imperialists under Count Wallenstein, and acquitted himself with so much gallantry and skill, that, though the plague had broken out in the city, and the outworks were in a ruinous condition, he compelled the besiegers to retire with considerable loss So sensible were the citizens of his great services on this occasion, that they rewarded him with a valuable present, and caused medals to be struck in his honour In 1630 he drove the Imperialists out of the isle of Rugen, and he continued to serve in the Swedish army, with great distinction, until after the death of Gustavus; but in the beginning of 1639 he was invited back to Scotland by the Covenanters, to take the chief command of their forces. He accordingly returned home, with many of his countrymen, who had, like him, acquired military experience on the Continent, and his first achievement was the capture of the castle of Edinburgh by assault, at the head of 1,000 select musqueteers, March 23, which he effected without the loss of a man.

In May 1639, when Charles I advanced with his army to the borders, the Scottish forces, under General Leslie, marched to meet them, and to the amount of 24,000 men encamped on Dunse Law. The appearance they made here is said to have been "a spectacle not less interesting to the military than edifying to the devout." The blue banners of the Presbyterians were inscribed with the arms of Scotland, wrought in gold, with the motto, "For Christ's Crown and Covenant." The soldiers were summoned to sermon by beat of drum, and at sunrise and sunset their tents resounded with the voice of psalms, reading the Scriptures, and prayer. The clergy, of whom there were great numbers present, many of them armed like the rest, were assiduous in preserving discipline, and the ambition of the nobles was restrained by the greatness of the cause in which they were engaged, aided by the discretion of the general, who, though an unlettered soldier of fortune, of advanced age, diminutive stature, and deformed person, was prudent, vigilant, experienced, skilful, and enterprising. The pacification of Berwick, in June 1639, caused both armies to be disbanded, without having recourse to hostilities.

In April 1640 the Scots found it expedient to re-assemble their army, and the command was again conferred on General Leslie. In August of that year he marched into England, at the head of at least 23,000 foot and 3,000 cavalry, and on the 28th he attacked and completely routed the king's troops at Newburn, which gave him possession of Newcastle, Tynemouth, Shields, and Durham, with large magazines of arms and provisions. This success was followed by the treaty of Ripon, afterwards transferred to London, and not ratified by parliament till 1641. As it was now Charles' object to conciliate his northern subjects, in August of that year he went to Scotland, and, passing through Newcastle, where the Scots army were quartered, he was received with great respect by General Leslie, whom he raised to the peerage, by the title of Lord Balgonie, and October 11th of the same year, created him earl of Leven. His portrait subjoined is from a miniature in oil colours, upon copper, in the possession of the earl of Leven and Melville, painted by Jansen, or Jameson, probably the latter, engraved for Pinkerton's Iconographia Scotica:

In 1642 the earl was sent over to Ireland as general of the Scots forces, raised for the suppression of the rebellion there, but was recalled in 1643 to take the command of the troops despatched to England to the assistance of the parliament. At the battle of Marston-Moor, July 2, 1644, he commanded the left of the centre division of the parliamentary forces, when the royal army was totally defeated. He afterwards, with the assistance of the earl of Callander, took the town of Newcastle by storm, and, having sent to the parliament a copy of the overtures made by the king to the Scots generals, he received in return a vote of thanks, with a piece of plate as an accompanying present. While in command of the united Scots and English army, engaged in the siege of Newark, the unfortunate Charles came to him privately, May 5, 1646. The arrival of the king seemed to surprise him and his officers very much, and they treated him with becoming respect, the commander tendering his bare sword upon his knee; but when Charles, who had retained Leven's sword, indicated his intention to take the command of the army, by giving orders to the guard, the earl unhesitatingly thus addressed him —"I am the older soldier, Sir, your majesty had better leave that office to me" He was one of a hundred officers who afterwards on their knees entreated his majesty to accept the propositions offered him by the parliament, but in vain

In 1648 he was offered the command of the army raised for the rescue of Charles I, which he declined, on the score of his age and infirmities On the failure of the Engagement, however, he was restored to his place at the head of the army At the battle of Dunbar in 1650, he served as a volunteer August 28, 1651, he attended a meeting of some noblemen and a committee of the Estates, at Elliot in Forfarshire, to concert measures in behalf of Charles II, when all present were surprised and taken prisoners, by a detachment from the garrison of Dundee, and conveyed to the Tower of London At the intercession of Christina, queen of Sweden, he was released by Cromwell, and returned to Scotland in May 1654 He subsequently went over to Sweden, personally to thank the queen for her kind interference in his favour He died at Balgonie, April 4, 1661 His lordship acquired extensive landed property, particularly Inchmartin, in the Carse of Gowrie, which he purchased from the Ogilvies in 1650, and called it Inch-Leslie He was twice married, and by his first wife had, with five daughters, two sons, who both predeceased him, and he was succeeded by his grandson The earldom of Leven is now held in conjunction with that of Melville (See LEVEN, earl of)

LESLIE, DAVID, first Lord Newark, a celebrated military commander, was the fifth son of Sir Patrick Leslie of Pitcairly, commendator of Lindores, by his wife, Lady Jean Stuart, second daughter of the first earl of Orkney In his youth he went into the service of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and having highly distinguished himself in the wars of Germany, rose to the rank of colonel of horse When the civil wars broke out in Britain, he returned to Scotland, and was appointed major-general of the army, which, under the earl of Leven, marched into England to aid the parliamentary forces, in January 1644. He mainly contributed to the defeat of the king's troops at Marston-Moor, in July that year; the Scots cavalry, under his command, having broken and dispersed the right wing of the royalists. In 1645, after the defeat of General Baillie at Kilsyth, General David Leslie was recalled with the Scottish horse from the siege of Hereford, to oppose the progress of the marquis of Montrose, whom he overthrew, after a sanguinary engagement, at Philiphaugh, near Selkirk, September 13 of that year For this victory the committee of Estates afterwards voted him a gold chain, with 50,000 merks out of the fine imposed on the marquis of Douglas, one of the royalist officers engaged in the action Leslie subsequently rejoined the Scots army under the earl of Leven, then lying before Newark-upon-Trent, and on its return into Scotland, he was declared lieutenant-general, and had a pension settled upon him of £1,000 a-month, over and above his pay as colonel of the Perthshire horse With a force of about 6,000 men he proceeded into the northern districts, and afterwards passed to the Western Isles He completely suppressed the insurrection in favour of the king, which had been set on foot by Montrose and his adherents in those parts

In 1648, when the Engagement was entered upon for the rescue of Charles, then in the hands of the parliament, Leslie was offered the command of the horse on the occasion, but declined to serve, the Church having disapproved of the expedition Of the army that remained in Scotland, he retained the rank of major-general In 1650, after Charles II had taken the Covenant, David Leslie was, on the resignation of the earl of Leven, appointed commander-in-chief of the forces raised in his behalf By his coolness, vigilance, and sagacity, he repeatedly baffled the superior army of Cromwell, whom he at last shut up in Dunbar; but, yielding to the impetuous demands of the committee of church and state, by whom he was accompanied, and who controlled all his movements, he rashly descended from his commanding position, and in consequence sustained a signal defeat from Cromwell, September 3, 1650 With the remains of his army he retired to Stirling, where he made the most skilful defensive dispositions, and was able for a time to check Cromwell in his victorious career. Being joined by Charles, who himself assumed the command, Leslie marched as lieutenant-general of the king's army into England, and was present at the defeat of the royal forces at Worcester, September 3, 1651 He escaped from the battle, but was intercepted in his retreat through Yorkshire, and committed to the Tower of London, where he remained till 1660, being fined £4,000 by Cromwell's act of grace, 1654 His portrait is subjoined

After the Restoration, General Leslie, in consideration of his eminent services and sufferings in the royal cause, was created Lord Newark, by patent, dated August 31, 1661, to him and the heirs-male of his body He also obtained a pension of £500 a-year In June 1667 he received a further proof of his majesty's favour by a letter from Charles, dated the 10th of that month, assuring him of his continued confidence, and that he was fully satisfied of his conduct and loyalty, his lordship's enemies having endeavoured to impress the king against him His lordship died in 1682 He married Jean, daughter of Sir John Yorke, knight, by whom he had a son, who succeeded him, and six daughters. Upon the decease, in 1694, of David, second Lord Newark, without heirs-male, the title was assumed by his daughter, and continued to be borne by her descendants till 1793, when it was disallowed by the house of lords, and is considered extinct. (See NEWARK, Lord)

LESLIE, SIR JOHN, a celebrated mathematician, and professor of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, was born at Largo, in Fifeshire, April 16, 1766, being the son of Robert Leslie, a joiner and cabinet-maker, and Anne Carstairs, his wife His elementary education was scantily received, first at a woman's school in his native village, then under a Mr Thomson at Lundin Mill, with whom he learned to write, and, lastly, at Leven school, which he only attended about six weeks At the latter place, however, he entered upon the rudiments of Latin, and, while at home, he received some lessons in mathematics from his elder brother, Alexander His father originally intended to bring him up to some useful trade, but, before he had reached his twelfth year, he had attracted considerable notice by his extraordinary proficiency in geometrical exercises, and he became known to the Rev Mr Oliphant, minister of Largo, who lent him some scientific books, and in his 13th year his parents were induced to send him to the university of St Andrews, with the view of educating him for a learned profession At the close of the session he obtained a prize, and his abilities introduced him to the patronage of the earl of Kinnoul, then chancellor of the university, who proposed to defray the expenses of his education, provided his father consented to his studying for the church After remaining six sessions at St Andrews, in company with Mr , afterwards Sir James, Ivory, he removed in 1783–4 to Edinburgh, where he attended the classes for three years, during which time he was engaged by Dr Adam Smith to assist in the education of his nephew and heir, Mr Douglas, afterwards a lord of session, under the title of Lord Reston While at college he devoted part of his time to private tuition

In 1788 he was appointed tutor to two young college friends, natives of America, of the name of Randolph, whom he accompanied to Virginia, and after an absence of about a year, in the course of which he had visited New York, Philadelphia, and other transatlantic towns, he returned to Edinburgh Having abandoned all intention of entering the church, in January 1790 he proceeded to London, with recommendatory letters from several literary and scientific individuals, and, among others, from Dr Adam Smith, who gave him some very shrewd advice at parting His first intention was to deliver lectures on natural philosophy, but finding, to use his own words, that "rational lectures would not succeed," he had recourse to his pen as the readiest means of supporting himself He accordingly began to contribute articles for 'The Monthly Review,' and, about the same time, was employed by an old college acquaintance, Dr William Thomson, the continuator of Dr Watson's 'History of the Reign of Philip III of Spain,' to furnish notes for an annotated edition of the Bible, then publishing in numbers, under the name of Harrison He was next engaged by Mr Murray, the bookseller, to execute a translation of Buffon's Natural History of Birds, published in 1793, in 9 vols 8vo, the payment for which, with his prudent habits, laid the foundation of his subsequent independence During the progress of this work he superintended the studies of the Messrs. Wedgwood of Etruria, in Staffordshire, whom he left in 1792 In 1794 he visited Holland, and in 1796 he proceeded through Germany and Switzerland with Mr Thomas Wedgwood, whose early death he ever lamented as a loss to science On his return to Scotland, he became a candidate for a professorship at St Andrews, and subsequently for the chair of natural philosophy at Glasgow, but in both instances was unsuccessful In 1799 he travelled through Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, in company with Mr Robert Gordon, a fellow-student at St Andrews.

Previous to 1800 he had invented the Differential Thermometer, one of the most beautiful and delicate instruments that inductive genius ever contrived, as a help to experimental research; and the results of his inquiries concerning the nature and laws of heat, in which he was so much aided by this exquisite instrument, were published in 1804, in his celebrated 'Essay on the Nature and Propagation of Heat' The experimental devices and striking discoveries which distinguish this publication are more than a counterbalance for the great deficiency in systematic arrangement and in simplicity of style which characterises this and all the author's writings In the following year this work obtained for him the Rumford medal, from the council of the Royal Society

Early in 1805, on the promotion of Professor Playfair from the chair of mathematics to that of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, Mr Leslie offered himself as a candidate for the vacant professorship His election was opposed by the moderate party among the Edinburgh clergy, who were desirous of placing Dr Thomas Macknight, one of their own body, in the chair. They grounded their objection to Mr Leslie upon a note in his 'Enquiry into the Nature of Heat,' relative to Hume's Theory of Causation, which they deemed of an infidel nature and tendency After some keen discussions in the ecclesiastical courts, in which Mr Leslie was powerfully defended by Sir Henry Moncreiff, the case was dismissed by the General Assembly, and, in consequence, he entered without farther opposition on the duties of his chair

In 1809 Mr Leslie published his 'Elements of Geometry,' which has gone through several editions In 1810, by the aid of another of his own contrivances, the hygrometer, he arrived at the discovery of that singularly beautiful process of artificial freezing, or consolidation of fluids, which enabled him to congeal mercury, and convert water into ice by evaporation

In 1819, on the death of Playfair, Mr Leslie succeeded him in the chair of natural philosophy, and, by the care which he devoted to the state of the instruments required for experimental illustration, he formed for his class by far the finest and most complete set of apparatus in the kingdom. His income for many years was more than sufficient for his wants, and having amassed about £10,000, he expended part of this sum in his latter years upon the purchase of a mansion called Coates, near his native village, where he spent all his leisure time.

In June 1832, on the recommendation of Lord-chancellor Brougham, he was created a knight of the Guelphic order, along with Messrs. Herschel,

Charles Bell, Ivory, Brewster, South, and Harris Nicholas. He did not, however, long enjoy this honour In the end of October, while superintending some improvements about his residence, he unfortunately caught cold, the neglect of which brought on erysipelas in one of his legs, and he died at Coates, Fifeshire, November 3, 1832

A biography of Sir John Leslie, by Macvey Napier, one of the professors of law in the university of Edinburgh, appeared in the 7th edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, of which Mr Napier was editor, and was inserted in the 23d volume of the New Philosophical Journal, to which periodical Sir John Leslie was a frequent contributor He was never married In person he was rather below the middle size and corpulent His face was large and florid, but there was that about his eyes and forehead which seemed to show that he was no ordinary man His works are LEVEN, earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conjoined with that of Melville since 1706, conferred in 1641, on the celebrated General Alexander Leslie, a memoir of whom has been already given (see page 658 of this volume). His two sons, Gustavus and Alexander, Lord Balgonie, a colonel in the army, who served with his father in Ireland in 1642, both died before him The latter, by his wife, Lady Margaret Leslie, sister of John duke of Rothes, chancellor of Scotland, had a son, Alexander, second earl of Leven, and a daughter, Catherine, married to the first earl of Melville (see MELVILLE, earl of).

Alexander, second earl of Leven, succeeded his grandfather in 1661, and died at Balgonie, 15th July 1664, leaving two daughters, Margaret and Catherine, successively countesses of Leven in their own right. The former married in 1674, the Hon Francis Montgomery of Giffen, second son of the seventh earl of Eglinton, but died the same year, without issue. Her sister, Catherine, died unmarried, and her aunt Catherine, countess of Melville, was served heir to her, 13th January 1706 The title devolved on David, the second son of the first earl of Melville.

David, third earl of Leven and second earl of Melville, born in 1660, entered the service of the duke of Brandenburg in 1685, and was first a captain of horse, and then colonel of a regiment of foot, with which at the Revolution of 1688, he accompanied the prince of Orange to England He was sworn a privy councillor to William and Mary, and in March 1689, he became colonel of the 25th foot. In June following he fought at the head of his regiment at the battle of Killiecrankie, where he greatly distinguished himself, and in July of the same year he was appointed governor of Edinburgh castle. He signalized himself in the campaign in Ireland in 1690, and in 1692 he served in Flanders. Deprived of the governorship of Edinburgh castle in December 1702, he was reappointed in October 1704 On the death of his cousin, Catherine, countess of Leven, he succeeded as earl, and sat in parliament as such, taking precedency of his father, the earldom of Leven being an older creation than that of Melville. In January 1703 he was constituted major-general of the forces in Scotland, and the following year general of the ordnance. In March 1706, he was appointed lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, and in 1707 he succeeded his father as earl of Melville. He was a commissioner for the union, and supported that measure in parliament. He was one of the sixteen representative Scottish peers in 1707 and 1708. In 1712 he was deprived of all his offices by the Tory administration He died in 1728. He had, with one daughter, Lady Mary Leslie, countess of Aberdeen, two sons, George, Lord Balgonie and Raith, and Alexander, fifth earl The former died before his father, leaving a son, David, fourth earl of Leven and third earl of Melville, who died in 1729, in his 12th year, and was succeeded by his uncle.

Alexander, fifth earl of Leven and fourth earl of Melville, the second son of the third earl, had been admitted an advocate 14th July 1719, and on 11th July 1734 was appointed one of the lords of council and session He was commissioner to the General Assembly from 1741 to 1753 In 1747 he was chosen one of the representative peers, and in 1754 was appointed one of the lords of police in room of the Lord Forphichen He died in September of the same year He had two sons, David, sixth earl, and the Hon Alexander Leslie The latter, an officer in the army, ranked as lieutenant-general from 1787 He was in active service during the American war, and at the battle of Guildford, 15th March 1781, he was second in command under Lord Cornwallis, who, in his despatches, mentioned his conduct in the highest terms.

The elder son, David, sixth earl of Leven and fifth earl of Melville, born in 1722, like his brother, was a military officer, and in 1744 had a company in the 16th foot On succeeding his father in 1754, he quitted the army, and was one of the lords of the police from 1775 to the abolition of that board in 1782 He was high-commissioner to the General Assembly from 1783 to 1801 In July 1747, he married Wilhelmina, posthumous daughter and nineteenth child of William Nisbet of Dirleton The 50th anniversary of their marriage was celebrated at the family-seat, Melville house, Fifeshire, 29th January 1797 Her ladyship died the following year, and the earl in May 1802 They had five sons and three daughters. His second son, the Hon William Leslie, captain in the 17th regiment of foot, was killed in an engagement with the Americans in Princeton in New Jersey, in January 1777, when serving under Lord Cornwallis and his uncle General Leslie The Hon David Leslie, the third son, captain in the 16th foot, was aide-de-camp to his uncle, General Leslie, when commanding in Scotland, and as lieutenant-colonel of the Tay Fencibles, he was actively employed in Ireland during the rebellion in 1798 In 1830 he became a general in the army The Hon John Leslie, the fourth son, also an officer in the army, in 1802 had the rank of major-general, and in 1808 of lieutenant-general He served with distinction on the Continent against the French, and was wounded in an engagement in Holland in 1794 On his marriage, in 1816, with a lady of the name of Cuming, he assumed that surname.

The eldest son, Alexander, seventh earl of Leven and sixth earl of Melville, succeeded his father in 1802 In 1786, when Lord Balgonie, he was appointed comptroller of the customs in Scotland, and in 1806, chosen a Scottish representative peer He married a lady of the family of Thornton of London, whose munificent charities are mentioned with praise in the Life and Letters of Cowper the poet, and by her had five sons and three daughters. He died in 1820

His eldest son, David Leslie-Melville, 8th earl of Leven and 7th earl of Melville, born in 1785, early entered the navy On Oct. 21, 1809, he had the command of a boat in the capture and destruction of a French convoy in the bay of Rosas, and was particularly mentioned in Lord Collingwood's despatch In 1812 he became captain, and in 1846, rear-admiral, but retired from the service; vice-admiral in 1858. A Scots representative peer, and deputy-lieutenant of Fifeshire. He married the dr of Sir Archibald Campbell of Succoth, baronet, issue 2 sons and 4 drs. The elder son, Alexander, Viscount Balgonie, born in 1831, an officer in the Grenadier guards, died from fatigue during the Crimean war, Aug. 29, 1857 The 2d son, David Archibald, died in 1854. The earl died Oct. 8, 1860, when his brother, Hon John Thornton Leslie Melville, born in 1786, became 9th earl of Leven and 8th of Melville, twice married, issue by 1st wife 2 sons and 5 drs. By 2d marriage 3 sons and 2 drs. Eldest son, Alexander, Viscount Kirkcaldy, born January 11, 1817.

LEYDEN, JOHN, M D, a distinguished poet and linguist, was born at Denholm, Roxburghshire, September 8, 1775 His ancestors, for several generations, were farmers, and his father was all his life engaged in rural occupations. He received the rudiments of his education at the parish school of Kirktown His desire for learning determined his parents to train him for the church, and after acquiring Greek and Latin, under the charge of Mr Duncan, a Cameronian minister at Denholm, he was entered a student at the university of Edinburgh in November 1790 Besides the theological, he also attended the medical classes, and in addition to the learned languages acquired French, Spanish, Italian, German, and the ancient Icelandic In 1796, on the recommendation of Professor Dalzell, he became private tutor to the sons of Professor Campbell of Fairfield, whom, during the winter of 1798, he accompanied to St Andrews

The travels of Mungo Park, and the progress of discovery in Africa, having directed his attention to the history of that interesting quarter of the world, in 1799 he published a small octavo volume, entitled 'Historical and Philosophical Sketch of the Discoveries and Settlements of the Europeans in Northern and Western Africa, at the close of the Eighteenth Century,' an enlarged edition of which was afterwards published by Mr Hugh Murray, in 3 vols 8vo About 1799 and 1800 he contributed various poetical pieces, both original and translated, to the Edinburgh Magazine, which attracted considerable notice at the time By Mr Richard Heber, then residing in Edinburgh, whose acquaintance he had made in Mr Constable's shop, he was introduced to the best society of the Scottish capital, and became the friend of Scott, Lord Woodhouselee, Mr Henry Mackenzie, and other eminent literary men Although Leyden displayed in company a bluntness and independence of manner, with a disposition to egotism, and a fondness for disputation which were far from agreeable, he was by no means ignorant of the rules of good breeding; and the better qualities of his character commanded the respect and admiration of all who knew him

In 1800 he was licensed to preach, but his style was unpopular, and he himself was dissatisfied with his own discourses In 1801 he contributed the ballad called the Elfking to Mr Lewis' 'Tales of Wonder,' and in 1802 he assisted Mr Walter Scott in procuring materials for the 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,' to which he furnished some spirited ballads He also republished 'The Complaynt of Scotland,' an ancient and rare tract, with a learned Preliminary Dissertation, Notes, and a Glossary, and edited 'Scottish Descriptive Poems,' consisting of a new edition of Wilson's 'Clyde,' with a reprint of an interesting poem, entitled 'Albania,' being a panegyric on Scotland, written in nervous blank verse, by an anonymous author, in the beginning of the eighteenth century The Edinburgh Magazine being, in 1802, united with the old Scots Magazine, Mr Leyden conducted this publication for about six months, contributing to it several occasional pieces of prose and poetry In 1803, on the eve of his leaving Britain for ever, he published 'The Scenes of Infancy,' a pleasing poem, descriptive of Teviotdale

In 1802 Leyden had commenced overtures to the African Society, to be employed on an expedition into the interior of Africa To prevent the execution of this project, some of his friends applied on his behalf to the Right Hon William Dundas, who procured for him the appointment of assistant-surgeon in the East India Company's service, on the Madras establishment. After six months' unremitting application to the study of medicine, he was successful in obtaining his diploma as surgeon, and soon after took his degree of M D He arrived in Madras in 1803, and immediately directed his attention to the acquirement of the Oriental languages He was speedily nominated surgeon to the commissioners appointed to survey the ceded districts, but his health gave way under the climate, and he was obliged to retire to Prince of Wales' Island, where he resided for some time His application to study was incessant, and even severe illness could not induce him to relax from his unwearied pursuit of knowledge In addition to the Sanscrit, Arabic, Persian, and Hindustani, he made himself master of many of the languages spoken in the Deccan, and obtained an extensive knowledge of the Malay and other kindred tongues By the influence of the governor-general, Lord Minto, he was promoted to the professorship of Hindustani in Bengal college, and shortly afterwards was appointed to the office of a judge of the Twenty-four Purgunnahs of Calcutta In 1809 he was constituted one of the commissioners of the court of requests, and in the following year assay-master of the Calcutta mint In August 1811 he accompanied Lord Minto in the expedition against Java, and died in that island, on the 28th of the same month, after three days' illness

In the tenth volume of 'Asiatic researches' will be found an interesting treatise by Leyden 'On the Languages and Literature of the Indo-Chinese Nations,' and in the eleventh volume, some striking observations 'On the Roshenian Sect,' a class of heretics among the Afghans His translation of the 'Malay Annals' was published after his death by his friend Sir Stamford Raffles, and the other MSS which he left behind him consisted of valuable treatises on Oriental literature, with various translations and several grammars of different Eastern languages. His 'Poetical Remains,' with a Memoir of his Life, by the Rev James Morton, were published in one volume 8vo, in 1819 In 1826 appeared 'Memoirs of the Emperor Baber,' an Indian hero, translated by Leyden An animated sketch of his life is to be found among the Miscellaneous Prose Works of Sir Walter Scott

LIDDEL, Dr Duncan, an eminent professor of mathematics and a physician, was born at Aberdeen in 1561, and received his education at King's college of that city In 1579 he quitted his native country for Germany, and at the university of Frankfort on the Oder he applied himself with much diligence to the study of mathematics and medicine A contagious distemper, which broke out at Frankfort in 1587, induced him to quit that city for the university of Rostock, where he acquired a high reputation for his acquirements, particularly for his knowledge of astronomy and mathematics. In 1590 he returned to Frankfort with two young Livonians of rank, his pupils, with whom he soon after removed to the new "Academia Julia," at Helmstadt In 1591 he was appointed under professor of mathematics in that university, and in 1594 he was promoted to the first or higher mathematical chair, which he occupied for nine years In 1596 he obtained the degree of M D , and by his lectures and writings was for some years the principal support of the medical school of Helmstadt He was employed as first physician at the court of Brunswick, and enjoyed a lucrative private practice

Having been several times chosen dean of the faculties both of philosophy and physic, he was, in 1604, elected pro-rector of the university But desirous of ending his days in his native country, in 1607 he finally quitted Helmstadt, and passing through Germany and Italy, at length settled in Scotland He died at Aberdeen, December 17, 1613, aged 52, and was buried in the church of St Nicholas of that city, where a tablet of brass, containing his portrait, was erected to his memory By his last will he bequeathed the lands of Pitmedden, purchased by him, to Marischal college, Aberdeen, for the education and support of six poor scholars, and left six thousand merks for the endowment of a professorship of mathematics in that university

Disput. de Elementis. Helmstadt, 1596, 4to.

Disputationes Medicinales. Helmstadt, 1605, 4 vols. 4to These consist of Theses maintained by himself and his pupils at Helmstadt, from 1592 to 1606. A new edition of the same, on a new arrangement, was published under the title of Universæ Medicinæ Compendium Helmstadt, 1720, 4to.

Ars Medica, Succincte et Perspicue Explicata. Hamburgh, 1607, 8vo.

De Febribus, Libri Tres. Hamburgh, 1610, 12mo.

He also wrote a curious tract, De Dente Aureo, to refute Jacobus Horstius' ridiculous story of a poor boy in Silesia who, having lost a tooth, brought forth a new one of pure gold—afterwards discovered to be a scheme to excite charity—which was published at Hamburgh in 1628.

In 1651 another posthumous work by Liddel on the Art of Preserving Health, was published at Aberdeen

LINDORES, BARON, a title (dormant) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1600, on Patrick Leslie, eldest son of the Hon. Sir Patrick Leslie of Pitcairly, second son of the fourth earl of Rothes. In 1574, on the retirement of John Leslie, the celebrated bishop of Ross (see page 639 of this volume), to the continent, Sir Patrick received the abbacy of Lindores in commendam, which had been held by him. He was high in favour with James VI., who, besides knighting him, appointed him one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber. He also received various grants of land in Fife and other counties. In Douglas' Peerage (Wood's edition, vol. ii. page 120) it is stated that he was created a lord of parliament by the title of Lord Lindores, to him and his heirs male whatever, 25th December 1600 But it appears that it was his eldest son Patrick who had the abbacy of Lindores erected into a temporal lordship in his favour, and was created Lord Lindores 31st March of that year He was, however, for a time only styled master of Lindores, in consequence of his father taking the title during his life. By his wife, Lady Jean Stewart, second daughter of Robert, earl of Orkney, Sir Patrick had, with five daughters, five sons. The latter were, besides Patrick, Lord Lindores, James, styled third lord; Robert, who, after the abolition of episcopacy in Scotland, got a nineteen years' lease of the revenues of the bishopric of Orkney in 1641, Colonel Ludovick Leslie, who served in the German wars under Gustavus Adolphus, and was governor of Berwick in 1648, and David, Lord Newark (see NEWARK, Lord)

The eldest son, Patrick, Lord Lindores, died, without issue, in 1649, and was succeeded by his brother, James, third lord, who died before 20th July 1667 His son John became fourth Lord Lindores, and soon after his succeeding to the title, a great portion of the lands of Lindores was apprised in favour of John Bayne of Pitcairly, in consequence of debts incurred by his lordship's father The fourth lord died in 1706, leaving a son, David, fifth lord, who died without issue in July 1719, when the title devolved on the heir male, Alexander Leslie of Quarter, great-grandson of the Hon Sir John Leslie of Newton, a younger brother of Sir Patrick Leslie, the commendator, styled first Lord Lindores.

This Sir John Leslie was a lord of session (admitted 13th November 1641) under the title of Lord Newton, and in 1645 was appointed one of the commissioners of the exchequer in Scotland Having acted as lieutenant-colonel of the king's horse-guards, and joined in the 'Engagement,' for the rescue of Charles I in 1648, he was deprived of his offices by the act of classes in 1649 With one of his sons, he was killed at the storming of Dundee, by General Monk, 1st September 1651 His second son, Andrew Leslie, a major in the army, acquired the lands of Quarter, in the parish of Burntisland, and died in 1669, leaving a son, John Leslie of Quarter, whose son, Alexander, succeeded as sixth Lord Lindores. His lordship had the rank of major-general in the army, 24th February 1761, and died at London, 3d September 1765.

His son, Francis-John, seventh lord, had a company in the marine forces in March 1757, and died 30th June 1775, without issue, when the title was claimed by the heir-male, John Leslie of Lumquhat, the fourth in descent from James Leslie of Lumquhat, an officer in the 26th regiment of foot, third son of Lord Newton above mentioned. He voted as Lord Lindores at several elections of representative peers, without challenge, but at the general election, 24th July 1790, his votes were objected to, and the House of Lords, 6th June 1793, resolved, although on what ground is not apparent, that "the votes given by the Lord Lindores at the said election were not good." The title is, in consequence, considered to have remained dormant since the death of the 7th baron in 1775, and is said to be represented by Sir Charles Henry Leslie of Wardes and Findrassie, baronet. (See p. 655 of this vol.) The lands are all in the hands of other families.

LINDSAY, an ancient surname erroneously supposed to have been derived from the manor of Lindsai in Essex. By Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, it is called

"Ane surname of renown"

The first of the name in Scotland appears to have been Walter de Lindsay, an Anglo-Norman, who was a witness or juror in the celebrated 'Inquisitio, or Inquest of David I., when prince of Strathclyde or Cumbria, into the possessions and rights of the see of Glasgow within his territories, in 1116. After David's accession to the throne, this Walter de Lindsay was one of his great barons. Although the surname is territorial, it does not appear to have been derived from the district of Lindesey or Lindesey in Lincolnshire, for the Lindsays had no property in or connexion with that county till long after their settlement in Scotland. Lord Lindsay says "There appears every reason to believe that the Scottish Lindsays are a branch of the Norman house of Limesay, long since extinct in the direct male line, both in Normandy and England, but which for several generations held a distinguished station, more particularly in the latter country. The name Lindesay and Limesay are identical, both of them imp'ying 'Isle of limetrees.'" (Lives of the Lindsays, vol. i. p. 8.) The old English word for limetree is linden, and in the appendix to the first volume of his family work Lord Lindsay gives 88 different forms in which the name has been spelled in charters and other ancient documents. The legendary accounts of the origin of the name are all now rejected. Wyntoun (Chron. B. 8. 7. 159), with a prudent reserve says

"Of England came the Lyndysay, Mair of them I can nocht say"

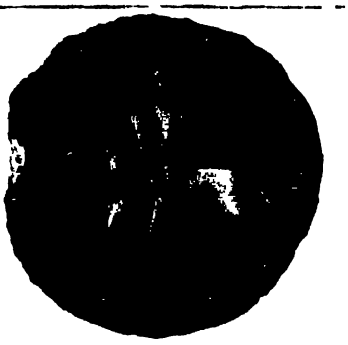
Families of this surname are now spread all over Scotland.

William de Lindsay, apparently the son of the above-mentioned Walter de Lindsay, the progenitor in Scotland of the Lindsays "light and gay," is also frequently mentioned as a witness to the royal charters. He is supposed to have had two sons, Walter and William de Lindsay. The latter, who carried on the line of succession, had his residence at Ercildon, now Earlston, in Roxburghshire, and was a liberal benefactor to Dryburgh abbey, as was also his son, Walter de Lindsay. Among other grants made to it was a portion of land at Cadeslea, on the banks of the Caddon water, near to where it joins the Tweed, the scene of the beautiful ballad of 'Katherine Janfarie,' from which Sir Walter Scott took the hint of his spirited ballad of 'Lochinvar.' Walter de Lindsay and his son William also granted charters to the abbey of Kelso. "The seals," says Lord Lindsay, "of these two latter barons, Walter and William, preserved in the Chapter-house of Durham cathedral, exhibit a lively type of the character of the young Norman noble. They are represented on horseback, riding gently along, with falcon on wrist, unhelmeted, and with their shields hung carelessly behind them,—the only variation being that the father, Walter, rides without bridle or stirrup, and the bird rests placidly on his hand, while the latter, William, is in the act of slipping it on its prey." The following is the seal of William de Lindsay



His grandson, William de Lindsay of Ercildun, styled also of Luffness, is witness to the charters of Malcolm IV. and William the Lion from 1161 to 1200. Between 1189 and 1199 he was high justiciary of Lothian. He was the first of the Lindsays connected with the territory of Crawford in Lanarkshire, which from them came afterwards to be called Crawford-Lindsay. He married Marjory, daughter of Henry, prince of Scotland, issue, 3 sons, Sir David, lord of Crawford, Sir Walter, ancestor of the Lindsays of Lamberton, and William, progenitor of the Lindsays of Luffness, who ultimately succeeded to the male representation of the Lindsays.

Sir David, the eldest son, succeeded his father in 1200. He was high justiciary of Scotland, and is a frequent witness to the charters of his uncle, David earl of Huntingdon, the Sir Kenneth of Sir Walter Scott's chivalrous romance of 'The Talisman.' He died in 1214. He had married an English kinswoman of his own, Aleonora de Limesay, the coheiress ultimately of the barons of Wolverley, by whom he had, with one daughter, Alice, four sons, David, Gerard, William, supposed to be identical with a 'W. de Lindsai,' who was chancellor of Scotland in 1231, and Walter. The eldest son, David, a minor at his father's death, had been one of the hostages for King William in England. On the death, in 1222, of his mother's brother, Sir John de Limesay, the English property which devolved on him extended over no less than seven counties. He was high justiciary of Lothian in 1238. He died in 1241, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir Gerard, on whose death in 1219, his two younger brothers having predeceased him, the whole of his extensive estates both in Scotland and England, devolved on his sister Alice de Lindsay, the wife of Sir Henry Pinkeney, a great baron of Northamptonshire, of whom mention has already been made (See vol. i. of this work, p. 707, article CRAWFORD, earl of).

Sir Walter de Lindsay, ancestor of the Lamberton family, was high justiciary of Lothian and constable or sheriff of Berwick, in the reign of William the Lion. His father, William de Lindesay, of Ercildun and Luffness, and first of Crawford, "dominus de Lamberton," in Berwickshire, granted to the monks of Coldingham the church of Ercheldun, with one ploughgate of land, (Chart. of Newbottle. Raine's Hist. of N. Durham, App. p. 89.) Lamberton fell to Sir Walter's share. In 1215 he was sent ambassador to King John, with the bishop of St. Andrews, Ingelram de Balol, and three other great barons, by King Alexander II. He joined the latter with the English barons against King John, who, in consequence, seized his lands in Huntingdonshire. He died either in 1221 or 1222. His son, Sir William, was one of the guarantees of peace with England at the convention of York in 1237, and with Sir David Lindsay of Luffness, at the still more important one of 1244. He married

Alice, sister and coheiress of William de Lancaster, lord of Kendal, a descendant of the earls of Anjou, with whom he got various estates in Westmoreland, Yorkshire, and Lancashire. His son, Walter de Lindsay, was succeeded by his son, Sir William, who married Ada, eldest surviving sister of the unfortunate King John Balol, and ultimately eldest coheir of her nephew, Edward, pseudo-king of Scotland. He was killed in battle against Llewellyn, prince of Wales, 6th November 1283. His daughter and heiress, Christiana de Lindsay, was married by her cousin Alexander III before 1285, to Ingelram de Guignes, second son of Arnold III., count of Guignes and Namur, and Sare de Couci (in 1311) in right of his mother Alice, the heiress of that illustrious house. (See vol 1 p. 74 of this work, article ALEXANDER II) It was in his wife's right that he sat as a Scottish magnate in the great assemblies at Scone 5th February 1283-4, and at Brigham 17th March 1290, and on various other occasions both in England and Scotland To Edward I he devotedly adhered in the wars of the Scottish succession Christiana's direct representative was the late Duchesse d'Angoulême, the daughter of Louis XVI of France (see Lives of the Lindsays, vol 1 pp. 31, 32, and App. No. 8.)

William de Lindsay, third son of William of Ercildon and first of Crawford, obtained from his father the barony of Luffness, near Aberlady, in Haddingtonshire. Dying in 1236, he was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir David Lindsay of Brenwevil and the Byres, in the same county He was high justiciary of Lothian from 1243 to 1249, and in the convention between Scotland and England in 1244, one of the four great barons who swore, on the soul of their lord the king, that the conditions then entered into should be kept inviolate by him and his posterity

His son, Sir David, was one of the regents of Scotland during the intestine struggles of 1255 and high-chamberlain in 1256 He granted a charter of freedom to the abbey of Aberbrothwick from toll and custom in all the ports of his territories. He perished in the Holy Land, it is supposed in the last crusade of St Louis in 1268, which had been joined by many of the Scottish nobles. His son, Sir Alexander de Lindsay, was high-chamberlain for several years under Alexander III, and one of the magnates Scotiæ who, in the celebrated convention at Scone in February 1283-4, acknowledged Margaret of Norway, granddaughter of that monarch, as the heiress to the Scottish crown In 1289, his son, also Sir Alexander, having been knighted by Edward I himself, was one of the Scottish barons who, at the convention held at Brigham, after the death of Alexander III., agreed to the marriage of Margaret of Norway to the youthful Edward prince of Wales. His name, with those of seven other Lindsays, then all great feudal barons in Scotland, appears in the Ragman Roll as having sworn fealty to Edward I in 1296 He was among the patriotic band who joined the banner of Wallace, but on 9th July 1297, he submitted unconditionally to Edward Soon after, however, he is again found fighting for Scotland's independence, and at the close of the protracted struggle in 1304-5, he was one of the seven adherents of Wallace specially excepted by the English king out of the general conditions of pardon offered to the rest of their countrymen In 1307, with Edward Bruce and "the good" Sir James Douglas, he invaded Galloway, and sat as one of the great barons in the parliament of 16th March 1308-9, which acknowledged Robert the Brus as rightful king of Scotland. His son, described by Wyntoun (Chron. lib. viii c. 40) as

> "Schir Dauy the Lyndysaay, > That was true and of stedfast fay," throughout his life adhered to the cause of the Brus. His father, Sir Alexander, is said to have had two other sons, namely, William de Lindsay, rector of Ayr, and chamberlain of Scotland from 1317 to 1322, and Sir James Lindsay, who was with Brus at Dumfries in 1306, when Comyn was assassinated. With other Lindsays he had sworn fealty to King Edward I. in 1296, and was ancestor of the once great house of Lindsay of Dunrod. (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. ii. p. 47) Alexander de Lindsay, killed at Halidonhill, 19th July 1333, is also supposed to have been a younger son of his. (Douglas' Peerage, Wood's edition, vol. i. p. 372 Note.)

Sir David, the eldest son, was either taken prisoner at the battle of Bannockburn, or some time before, as with two of his brothers, Reginald, and Alexander, and Sir Andrew Moray, he was exchanged five months afterwards. He was one of the Scots nobles who signed the famous letter to the Pope in 1320, asserting the independence of Scotland, in which it was declared that "never, so long as one hundred Scots are alive, will we be subject to the yoke of England." In 1323 he was one of the Scottish guarantees for the observance of a treaty of peace with England, to last for thirteen years. He was captured at the battle of Halidonhill in 1333 with his brother, Sir Alexander, and his kinsman Sir John Lindsay of Wauchopdale, at one time governor of Perth, all three knights bannerets. From Robert I he received several grants of land and an hereditary annual rent of one hundred marks, then a very large sum, from the great customs of Dundee. In 1325 he married Mary, coheiress of the Abernethies, and received with her large estates in the shires of Roxburgh, Fife, and Angus. At one period he was governor of Berwick castle, and in 1346 he was appointed keeper of the castle of Edinburgh Wyntoun (Chron. b. ii. p. 266) says of him in this capacity

> "Intil his time with the countrie, > Na riot, na na strife made he."

In 1349, and again in 1351, he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat about the ransom of King David II He died after November 1355 He had four sons, namely, David, killed at the battle of Durham, 17th October 1346, unmarried, and only twenty-one, Sir James, who succeeded Sir Alexander, of whom immediately, and Sir William, whose appanage was the Byres in Haddingtonshire, (see next article) Sir Alexander, the third son, was twice married first, to Catherine, daughter of Sir John de Stirling, and heiress of Glenesk and Edzell in Angus, besides lands in Inverness-shire, and by her had Sir David, of Glenesk, the first earl of Crawford, and Sir Alexander, and secondly, to Marjory Stuart, niece of Robert II, by whom he had, with one daughter, two sons, Sir William of Rossie, ancestor of the Lindsays of Dowhill, and Sir Walter, sheriff of Aberdeenshire in 1417, and styled of Kinneff in 1422

Sir James, the eldest surviving son of Sir David, was one of the great barons who sat in the parliament at Edinburgh, 26th September 1357, and became bound for the fulfilment of the conditions of the release of David II, at Berwick, on the 3d of the following month, and is supposed to have died the same year He married his cousin, Egidia, daughter of Walter, high-steward of Scotland, and sister of King Robert II, and by her had an only son, Sir James Lindsay, lord of Crawford, and a daughter, Isabella, wife of Sir John Maxwell of Pollock. The lady Egidia afterwards married Sir Hugh Eglinton of Eglinton

The son, Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, was present at the coronation of his uncle, King Robert II. at Scone, 26th

March 1371, and next day took the oaths of homage and fealty to him. In 1374, and again in 1381, he was a commissioner to treat with England. Besides being high justiciary of Scotland, he was also sheriff of Lanarkshire. In 1382, the feuds which so long subsisted between the Glammis family and the Lindsays originated in the following circumstances: Sir John Lyon, the ancestor of the house of Glammis, a young man of comely appearance and winning manners, had been recommended by Sir James Lindsay to the king, who made him his private secretary, bestowed on him the castle and thanedom of Glammis, gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and finally created him high chamberlain of Scotland. Sir James Lindsay seems to have taken high umbrage at this signal advancement, which seemed greater than his own "Finding," says Godscroft, "his own credit with the king to decrease, and Lyon's to increase, and taking Lyon to be the cause thereof, esteeming it great ingratitude after so great benefit, he took it so highly and with such indignation that, finding him accidentally in his way a little from Forfar, he slew him very cruelly, and fearing the king's wrath, fled into a voluntary exile." By this unhappy event he incurred the displeasure of the king, but the earls of Douglas and March pleading his cause at court, after a short absence, during which he went on pilgrimage to Thomas a Beckett's shrine at Canterbury, (his safe-conduct is dated 16th January 1383,) he was recalled and pardoned The Scotichronicon, in alluding to this affair, styles Sir James "lord of Crawford and Buchan," he was also lord of Wigton, by charter, 19th April 1372 (Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p. 73)

In 1388, the "Sire de Lindsay," as Sir James is called by Froissart, with the other knights of the family, called "the children of Lindsay," ["six frères, tous chevaliers,"] and the earls of Moray and Douglas, and some other barons, entered England at the head of 15,000 men, and wasted the lands of the Percies and Mowbrays, and the whole country to the gates of Newcastle Soon after a French force, under John de Vienne, admiral of France, was sent over to assist the Scots against the English, bringing large subsidies to be distributed among the principal Scots nobles, towards the expenses of the war; of which Sir James Lindsay received 2,000 livres tournois, equal to £8,000 of our money, Sir David Lindsay of Glenesk, 500, equal to £2,000, and Sir William Lindsay of the Byres the like sum (Rym. Fœd. tom vi p 485, quoted by Lord Lindsay) In 1388 Sir James accompanied the earl of Douglas in his incursion into England, and witnessed the death of that hero at the battle of Otterburn, 19th August of that year In the ancient ballad descriptive of that battle, the Lindsays are thus mentioned, as forming part of Douglas' array:

"He has chosen the Lindsays licht,
With them the Gordons gay"

And in the account of the battle it is said,

"The Lindsays flew like fire about Till a' the fray was dune"

In the English ballad of Otterburn, Sir James is styled the lord of Buchan:

"The lord of Bowghan in armure bright"

After the battle Sir James was taken prisoner, under the following circumstances, as related by Froissart. Followed by his squire he had pursued on horseback, lance in hand, Sir Matthew Redman, governor of Berwick, and joint commander of one of the two divisions of Percy's force. After a chase of more than three English leagues, he came up with him, and a combat ensued between them by the light of the moon Sir James aimed at him with his lance, but Sir Matthew avoided the blow, and the point of the lance being buried in the ground, Sir Matthew cut it in two with his sword Sir James then seized his battle axe, which hung from his neck, and assailed Sir Matthew, who defended himself bravely After thus fighting for a long time, Sir Matthew's sword was struck out of his hand, and he yielded himself prisoner, rescue or no rescue, but requested to be allowed to return to Newcastle, promising by St. Michael's day to render himself at Dunbar, or Edinburgh, or at any port in Scotland which Sir James might choose "I am willing," said the latter, "let it be at Edinburgh on the day you name" They then took leave of each other, and on their return to the Scottish army, Sir James and his squire lost themselves in a heath, the moon having gone down and the night being dark. Coming at last to a path, they followed it, but it was the direct road to Newcastle, and on their way they fell in with the bishop of Durham, who had been too late for the battle, and at that very time was returning to Newcastle at the head of 500 men Into the midst of this company Sir James rode, thinking they were his friends, and that they were close to Otterburn He thus became the bishop's prisoner At Newcastle, Sir Matthew Redman, having gone next day to see the bishop, was informed by Richard Hebeden, or Hepburn, Sir James' squire, of his master's misadventure He accordingly waited on him, when Sir James said that there would be no need of his going to Edinburgh to obtain his ransom, as they might be exchanged for each other They then dined together, Sir James being entertained by Sir Matthew When the news of Sir James' capture reached King Richard, who was then at Cambridge, he despatched a mandate to the earl of Northumberland, not to dismiss him, either for pledge or ransom, till farther orders. He subsequently, however, obtained his liberty

In 1395, his wife, Margaret Keith, daughter of Sir William Keith, great marischal of Scotland, having had a quarrel with her nephew, Robert de Keith, was besieged by him in her castle of Fyvie in Aberdeenshire She sent notice to her husband, Sir James Lindsay, who was then at court, on which he hastened north with 400 men, but was intercepted by Keith near the Kirk of Bourtie, in the Garioch, when Sir James defeated him with the loss of 50 of his men In 1396, Sir James and the earl of Moray, two of the leading men of the kingdom, were sent by Robert III to endeavour to effect an amicable arrangement between the clan Chattan and the clan Kay, but having failed in the attempt, they proposed that the differences between them should be decided in open combat before the king, which led to the celebrated judicial conflict, on the North Inch of Perth, in the manner so graphically described in Sir Walter Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth.' In 1392 Sir James founded the convent of Trinity Friars at Dundee, for the ransom of Christian captives from Turkish slavery, which gradually assumed the character of an hospital for decayed burgesses of that town Sir James died in 1397, without male issue, leaving two daughters, Margaret and Euphemia, respectively married to Sir Thomas Colville and Sir John Herries of Terreaglos. He was succeeded in the chiefship of the Lindsays, and the barony of Crawford, and the other entailed estates of the family, by his cousin-german, Sir David Lindsay of Glenesk, first earl of Crawford (see CRAWFORD, earl of, vol i p 707). Sir David's father

Sir Alexander Lindsay of Glencak, third son of Sir David Lindsay of Crawford, was one of the commissioners appointed to treat of peace with the English in 1367, one of the guarantees of a truce with them in 1369, and high justiciary of the north of Scotland. The barony of the Byres in Haddingtonshire, which had been conferred on him by Sir James, his elder brother, was resigned by him in 1366, to his younger brother, Sir William, of whom mention is made in the next article. With Sir John Edmonstone, he had a safe-conduct, 4th December 1381, to pass through England towards the Holy Land, and he died in 1382, in the island of Candia, on his pilgrimage to Jerusalem, leaving four sons and a daughter

LINDSAY, earl of, a title (dormant since 1808,) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1633, on John, tenth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, grandson of Sir William Lindsay of the Byres, fourth son of Sir David Lindsay of Crawford Sir William obtained from King David II a charter of the lands of Byres, on the resignation, as already stated, of his brother, Sir Alexander de Lindsay, to him and the heirs male of his body, 17th January 1365-6. From Sir Alexander also he had the offices of hereditary bailie and seneschal of the regality of the archbishopric of St. Andrews (which had been granted to him by the archbishop of that see, 9th April 1378). With his wife, Christiana, daughter of Sir William Mure of Abercorn, whom he married about 1374, he acquired the barony of Abercorn and other extensive estates. Like his brother Sir Alexander, he also went on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and knighted the son of St Bridget of Sweden at the Holy Sepulchre, but the date of this expedition has not been ascertained (Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p. 74) He was the father of another Sir William Lindsay of the Byres, who is often confounded with him The latter, by his marriage with Christiana, daughter of Sir William Keith, hereditary marischal of Scotland, obtained the barony of Dunottar, with its impregnable castle, in Kincardineshire, which, sometime between 1382 and 1397, he exchanged, with his father-in-law, for the estate and castle of Struthers in Fife, the Keiths becoming bound that, in time of war, the infant heir of the Lindsays of the Byres should reside, with his attendants, in Dunottar Soon after the battle of Otterburn, Sir William Lindsay of the Byres, the bishop of Aberdeen, Sir Archibald Douglas, and Sir John Sinclair, were sent to France, as commissioners for Scotland, to protest against a proposed truce for three years between the English and French, but on their arrival they found the treaty concluded From King Robert III he had a charter of the sheriffship of Edinburgh and the constabulary of Haddington, in liferent. In 1398 he was one of the guarantees of a truce with England He died before 1424 He had three legitimate sons, and one illegitimate. The latter, Andrew, to whom he gave the lands of Garmilton, in East Lothian, was great-grandfather of Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, lord lion king at arms, of whom a memoir in larger type is given on a subsequent page.

Sir John Lindsay of the Byres, the eldest son, was one of the hostages for King James I in 1424 (see vol i page 708). He was created in 1445, a lord of parliament, under the title of Lord Lindsay of the Byres. In 1451 he was a commissioner to treat of peace with England, and obtained a safe-conduct into that kingdom in July of that year He was one of the privy councillors of James II, and held the office of justiciary of Scotland beyond the Forth from 1457 to 1466 .In the latter capacity he presided, in association with Walter Lindsay of Beaufort, ancestor of the Lindsays of Edzell and Balcarres, then acting as sheriff of Aberdeenshire, during the minority of his nephew, David fifth earl of Crawford, in the solemn assize, or justice-ayre, held in the tolbooth at Aberdeen, on 5th November 1457, when James II. appeared in person before them, to claim the earldom of Mar, attended by the chancellor, constable, marischal, and other high officers of state, and a splendid train of courtiers and nobles. He died in 1479 He had, with four daughters, nine sons. David, the eldest son, John the second, and Patrick, the fourth, were successively lords Lindsay of the Byres. Sir Walter Lindsay, the fifth son, preceptor of Torphichen, and lord of St. John, had fought in the wars in Italy and Spain, and against the Turks, in company with the knights of Rhodes. He was a lord of session, under the title of Lord St. John, and died in 1538

David, the eldest son, second Lord Lindsay of the Byres, distinguished himself in the foreign wars, and in 1488, when the insurgent nobles appeared in arms against James III, he adhered faithfully to that unfortunate monarch At the head of the Fifeshire men he joined the forces of the king, and according to Lindsay of Pitscottie, (vol i. p. 216,) he presented "ane great grey courser," of remarkable spirit and beauty, which he rode, to his majesty, assuring him that whether for flight or pursuit, it "would waur (or beat) all the horse of Scotland at his pleasure, if he would sit well" At the battle of Sauchieburn which ensued, 9th June 1488, Lord Lindsay was one of the commanders of the third division of his army

On the meeting of parliament in October following the death of James III, summonses were issued to the chief adherents of the late king, to appear at Edinburgh and answer for their treasonable convocation in his defence against his son, James IV Lord Lindsay of the Byres was one of those thus summoned, and he made appearance accordingly An account is given by Pitscottie of his trial on the occasion, "a trial," says Lord Lindsay, "of which no trace now remains in the public records, and which the learned Pinkerton consequently believes to refer to an insurrection which broke out in the summer and autumn of 1489, headed by the earl of Lennox, Lord Forbes, and a few other adherents of the late king, and which was soon put down" On 10th May 1489, his lordship and his associates were arraigned before the king and council assembled in the Tolbooth Lord Lindsay's name being first specified in the summons. He was called upon to "answer for the cruel coming againes the king at Bannockburn with his father, and in giving him counsel to have debarred his son the king's grace here present, and to that effect gave him ane sword and ane good horse, to fortify him againes his son" Being totally unacquainted with forms of law, and having no lawyer to speak for him, the stout Lord Lindsay, who was a soldier, and did not understand the proceedings, started up and said hastily and rashly, "Ye are all lurdanes, my lords! I say ye are false traitors to your prince, and that I will prove with my hands on any of ye whilk halds you best, from the king's grace down For ye, false lurdanes! hes caused the king to come againes his father in plain battle, where that noble prince was cruelly murthered among your hands by your advice, though ye brought the prince in presence for your behoof, to make him the buckler of your enterprise Therefore, false lurdanes; an the king punish you not hastily for that murther, ye will murther himself when ye see time, as ye did his father" Then, addressing the king, he advised him to beware of them and give them no credence, for they who were false to his father could never be true to himself The chancellor endeavoured to excuse his "rude speech and sharp accusation," by saying to the king that Lord David Lindsay was "but ane man of the auld warld," and could not "answer formally, nor yet speak reverently in his grace's presence," and he advised his lordship "to come in the king's will," that is, submit to the king's mercy His brother, Patrick Lindsay, being present, stamped on Lord Lindsay's foot, to make him understand that he should not do so; and he, having, as Pitscottie says, "ane sair toe," the pain was so great as to cause him to exclaim to his brother, "Thou art ower pert, loon! to stramp upon my foot, wert thou out of the king's presence, I should take thee on the mouth" But Patrick, having obtained permission to speak for his brother, objected to the king sitting in judgment in a matter to which he was himself a party, on which the king was advised to withdraw He then pointed out a defect in the citation which rendered it null, and all the persons summoned were accordingly released, and no farther steps were ever taken against them This successful defence pleased his brother so much that he exclaimed, "By St. Mary, you shall have the Mains of Kirkforthar for your day's labour" The king, on the other hand, was so incensed against Patrick that he committed him to the castle of Rothesay, where he kept him a prisoner for a whole year Lord Lindsay died in 1492, and was succeeded by his brother, John, third Lord Lindsay of the Byres, commonly called "John out with the sword," who died in 1497, without male issue

Patrick, above mentioned, became fourth Lord Lindsay of the Byres. He accompanied James IV in his fatal expedition to England in September 1513 Previous to the battle of Flodden, a council was called to discuss the propriety of hazarding the king's person, in the fight that was about to ensue, of which he was appointed president, as being "the most learned of their number, and of the greatest age, and of the greatest experience amongst them all" (Pitscottie, p. 179) His opinion being asked in the first place, he advised that his majesty should be removed to a secure distance from the field, with some of his nobles. To this conclusion the rest of the council agreed, when James, who was present in disguise, broke out into a furious exclamation that he would fight against England with his own arm, and swore that he would hang Lord Lindsay over his own gate, when he returned to Scotland. His lordship escaped the carnage of that disastrous day, and was one of the four lords appointed by parliament, 1st December 1513, continually to remain with the queen-mother, to give her counsel and assistance He died in 1526 He had, with a daughter, three sons Sir John, master of Lindsay, styled Sir John Lindsay of Pitcruvy who died before his father in 1525, David of Kirkforthar, slain at Flodden, and William Lindsay, ancestor of the Lindsays of Pyetstone and Wormestone, the former represented in the collateral and the latter in the direct male line by the Lindsay Bethunes of Kilconquhar John, master of Lindsay, had married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sir Robert Lundin of Balgony in Fife, high-treasurer of Scotland, and by her had, with a daughter, John, fifth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, Patrick, killed under the king's standard in 1526, and David Lindsay of Kirkforthar

John, fifth lord, was sheriff of Fife in 1526 the year of his accession to the title. Having supported the earl of Lennox in his ineffectual attempt to rescue the young king from the hands of the Douglases, Angus, among other lands, took for himself "the ample principality of Lord Lindsay" Pitscottie (vol. ii. p. 330) says, "At this time the Douglases pat sair at the Lord Lindsay, and thocht to have forfault him, but he gave largely of his lands and gear to escape that envy for the present time, thinking that that court wald nocht continue lang." He was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, June 27, 1532, and in 1540 he was present at the condemnation of Sir John Borthwick, for heresy. He was also on the assize of Sir James Hamilton of Finnart, for treason. In 1542 he witnessed the death of James V at Falkland, and was one of the four noblemen to whom the charge of the infant Queen Mary was committed. In 1544 he was a principal commander at Ancrum Muir, when Sir Ralph Evers and Sir Brian Layton were defeated by the earl of Angus.

On 13th June 1559, when the French troops and those of the Congregation confronted each other on Cupar muir, Lord Lindsay was employed by the queen-regent, Mary of Guise, to mediate between them, which he did with so much skill, addressing himself to all the parties in their turn, that hostilities were averted, and a truce agreed to, which, however, was soon broken by the queen He was present in the convention of 1st August 1560, when the reformed religion was sanctioned and popish supremacy abolished in Scotland Rising up in his place, and alluding to his extreme age, he declared that since God had spared him to see that day, and the accomplishment of so worthy a work, he was ready, with Simeon to say, "Nunc dimittis." He was appointed one of the twenty four lords from among whom the crown was to choose eight and the nobility six for the government of the country With the other lords of council, he signed, on 17th January 1561, an approbation of the Book of Discipline He died in 1563

His eldest son, Patrick, sixth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, is noted in history for his harsh conduct to Queen Mary when confined in Lochleven castle. He was, when master of Lindsay, one of the first of the nobility who joined the Reformers, and he became an enthusiast in their cause. It has been remarked that the Lindsays of the Byres were always distinguished "for the fervour of their zeal about the reformation of religion, for the warmth of their attachment to every image of liberty, and for the steadiness of their adherence to all those measures which they supposed would promote them" Lord Lindsay, who quotes this remark (from Wallace on Ancient Peerages, p. 822), adds, "This adherence and attachment ran to the length of fanaticism, rendering each successive head of the family the zealot of his time—whether under Mary, Charles I, or James II" (Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p 267) He assisted his friend, the celebrated Kirkaldy of Grange, in harassing the French forces in Fife, night and day, and on one occasion had his horse killed under him He and Kirkaldy besieged and took an old ruin called Glenuis House, which a French officer, of the name of La Bastie, had fortified The latter defended himself for a long time with a halbert, till Lindsay, in a hand to hand combat with him, slew him His zeal against popery was so great that on the first Sunday after Mary's arrival from France in 1561, when he heard that mass was about to be celebrated in her private chapel at Holyrood, "he buckled on his harness, assembled his followers, and rushing into the court of the palace, shouted aloud that the idolatrous priests should die the death," and they were only saved by the interference of the queen's half brother, Lord James Stuart, afterwards the regent Moray

Soon after, on a petition being presented to the queen, from the leaders of the Congregation, praying that the earl of Bothwell and some other young noblemen, who had created a riot in the town, should be punished, "the flatterers of the court," says Knox, "at the first stormed, and asked, 'Who durst avow it?' To whom the master of Lindsay answered, 'A thousand gentlemen within Edinburgh!'—they said no more. The queen reprimanded the rioters, and banished Bothwell from court for ten days.' (Knox's Historie

vol. ii. p. 317 When Mary resided at St. Andrews, the master of Lindsay, rude and blunt as he was, was a sharer of her sports in the privy gardens there, where, as Randolph wrote to Burleigh, it "would have well contented your honour, to have seen the queen and the master of Lindsay shoot at the butts against the earl of Mar and one of the ladies." He was one of the leaders of the royal army that on 20th October, 1563, defeated the earl of Huntly at Corrichie in Aberdeenshire. In the ancient ballad of the 'Battle of Corrichie' he is thus mentioned·

"Moray gart raise the hardy Mersemen,
An' Angus and mony ane mair,
Erle Morton and the Byres Lord Lindsay,
An' campit on the Hill o' Fare."

He succeeded his father in 1563 He had a charter of the Dominical lands of the monastery of Haddington, with the tithes of Muirtown, Drem, and Drymhills, 9th December 1580, and obtained a confirmation of his hereditary office of justiciary of St. Andrews, to be held thenceforth of the crown On the evening of the murder of Rizzio, 9th March 1565-6, he and Morton, with 150 men, occupied the palace-court of Holyrood and Darnley's apartments on the ground-floor, while Ruthven and Darnley with their followers were in the queen's apartments committing the deed On the retreat of the conspirators to England, the earl of Crawford obtained a gift of the forfeiture of Lord Lindsay, but they were pardoned at the request of Huntly and Argyle, and returned to Scotland towards the beginning of 1567 He does not appear to have had any concern in the murder of Darnley, on the 9th February of that year After the marriage of the queen with Bothwell he subscribed the bond of association for her rescue from that profligate nobleman, the preservation and safe-keeping of the infant prince, and the punishment of the king's murderers. He was at Carberry Hill, with the other confederated lords, on the 15th June, and when Bothwell challenged Morton, who accepted the challenge, to single combat, "Lord Lindsay," says Godscroft, (p. 297) "stepping forth, besought Morton and the rest, for all the service that ever his predecessors or himself had done or could do unto their country, that they would do him that honour as to suffer him to undertake that combat, which, he said, did also duly belong to him in regard of his nearness of blood to the defunct king" His request was granted, and Morton presented him with a famous two-handed sword, which had belonged to his ancestor Bell-the-Cat, earl of Angus, in the reign of James III, and which, in spite of its cumbrous size, Lindsay wore ever afterwards. He "then proceeded to arm himself, and kneeling down before the ranks, audibly implored God to strengthen his arm to punish the guilty and protect the innocent. Bothwell too seemed eager to fight, but at this critical juncture Mary interfered, and resolutely forbade the encounter" After the surrender of Mary, "she called for Lindsay, one of the fiercest of the confederated barons, and bade him give her his hand. He obeyed. 'By the hand,' she said, 'which is now in yours, I'll have your head for this!'" (Tytler's Hist. of Scotland, vol vii p. 137) The following day, the unfortunate queen was sent to the castle of Lochleven, and confined there under the charge of Lindsay and Ruthven By the confederated lords he was sent to Lochleven to prevail upon the queen to resign the crown, bearing with him the necessary papers for her signature. Mr Tytler observes "From Lindsay Mary had everything to dread; her passionate menace to him on the day she was taken prisoner at Carberry had not been forgotten, and he was now selected as a man whom she would hardly dare to resist." "When Lindsay was admitted, his stern behaviour at once terrified her into compliance. He laid the instruments before her, and with eyes filled with tears, and a trembling hand, she took the pen and signed the papers without even reading their contents. It was necessary, however, that they should pass the privy seal, and here a new outrage was committed. The keeper, Thomas Sinclair, remonstrated, and declared that, the queen being in ward, her resignation was ineffectual; Lindsay attacked his house, tore the seal from his hands, and compelled him by threats and violence to affix it to the resignation." (Tytler's Hist. of Scotland, vol vii p. 165.) Lord Lindsay's alleged personal ill usage of the queen on this occasion, as related by Sir Walter Scott, has no foundation in fact.

At the battle of Langside, a charge by Lindsay, at the critical moment, decided the fate of the day He attended, with Moray, Lethington, and others, at the trial of Queen Mary, before the commissioners of Elizabeth. Lord Herries having, about the end of 1568, accused the regent's party of Darnley's murder, Lord Lindsay wrote him a letter stating that he had "therein lied in his throat," which he would "maintain, God willing, against him, as became him, of honour and duty" Lord Herries, in reply, denied that he had meant to include Lord Lindsay, in particular, in the accusation, "but let any," he added, "of the principals that were there, subscrive the like writing ye have sent to me, and I shall point him forth, and fight with any of the traitors therein" His lordship acted a prominent part in the hostilities carried on between the rival factions, the king's men and the queen's men, and on 16th June 1571, he and Morton slew the commendator of Kilwinning and 60 others, and took Lord Home and 80 gentlemen of the queen's party prisoners Soon after 60 of Lord Lindsay's cows were driven away from his estate of the Byres, but on the following day he defeated Spens of Wormestone, Lord Seton, and others in the High Street of Edinburgh, Seton being taken and carried away by Lord Lindsay His lordship was at this time governor of Leith, during the absence of the regent at the parliament at Stirling. When his old friend, Kirkaldy of Grange, held the castle of Edinburgh for the queen, Lord Lindsay was appointed in his stead provost of Edinburgh, and closely invested the castle with batteries of cannon and artillery He visited John Knox on his deathbed, and when Kirkaldy at last surrendered, he used his utmost efforts with the regent to save him, but in vain

He afterwards became estranged from Morton, and in March 1577-8, he was one of the leaders of the party which effected his fall. On the 1st April the castle of Edinburgh was surrendered by Morton's lieutenant to Lindsay and Ruthven, and Lindsay was appointed one of the council of twelve in whom the administration was vested. On Morton regaining power, he issued summonses in the king's name, commanding the attendance of the malcontent nobles at a convention to be held at Stirling Refusing attendance, they sent Lindsay and the earl of Montrose to protest against the convention, as in no sense a free parliament. On Lindsay doing so, Morton, interrupting him, commanded him and his companion to take their places, to which Lindsay answered that he would stand there till the king ordered him to his seat. James then repeated the command, and the old lord sat down. On the Estates proceeding to choose the Lords of the articles, as the committee of parliament was called, Lindsay again protested against the proceedings, calling all to witness that every act of such a parliament was null, and the choosing of the lords an empty farce. "Think ye, Sir," said

Morton, in a rage, "that this is a court of churls or brawlers? Take your own place, and thank God that the king's youth keeps you safe from his resentment!" "I have served the king in his minority," said Lindsay, "as faithfully as the proudest among ye, and I think to serve his grace no less truly in his majority." On this Morton whispered something in the king's ear, whereupon James said, "Lest any man should judge this not to be a free parliament, I declare it free, and those who love me will think as I think." The dissentient lords immediately gathered their followers, and marched to Falkirk, 7,000 strong. They were there met by Morton, at the head of 5,000 men, but a compromise being effected, Lindsay, Montrose, Argyle and their friends were re-elected into the privy council On the downfall of Morton, he abandoned his seat at the council, and retired to his own house "much discontented" In 1582 he was one of the noblemen and others concerned in seizing the king's person at the raid of Ruthven On the king recovering his liberty, he with the rest fled into England. In 1584 he was committed to Tantallan castle, as a suspected partaker in the conspiracy of Gowrie, Angus, Marr, and others, for a second seizure of the king's person, and surprise of the castle of Stirling. After his release from prison, being an old man, he retired almost wholly from public affairs, and died on 11th December 1589 His character is thus summed up by Lord Lindsay "Fiercest and most bigoted of the lords of the Congregation, and doomed to an unenviable immortality in the pages of Sir Walter Scott, he was yet an honester man than most of his contemporaries, and his zeal for the establishment of protestantism seems to have been sincere, however alloyed by meaner motives. Personally, he was an excellent soldier, accomplished in all warlike exercises, though extremely short-sighted,—quick and hasty in temper, in manners bluff and rude, in intellect unerrring, straight-forward, and unsuspicious—'the hero,' in short, 'of the party,' and 'a man they could not weill want' (Crawford's Hist of the Lindsays, MS) 'to execute their boldest enterprises,'—a bitter enemy, I may add, while his rival's star prevailed, but the first to forgive and take his part when his own had gained the ascendant.' (Lives of the Lindsays, vol i p. 276.) He married the regent Moray's half-sister, the beautiful Euphemia Douglas, the eldest of the seven daughters of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven, commonly called the seven fair porches of Lochleven, and with two daughters, he had a son, James, seventh Lord Lindsay of the Byres. His brother, Norman Lindsay was ancestor of the Lindsays of Kilquhiss. He had six sisters, married respectively to Norman Leslie, master of Rothes, the assassin of Cardinal Bethune, Thomas Myreton of Cambo, David Bethune of Melgum, a natural son of the cardinal, Sir George Douglas, the deliverer of Queen Mary from Lochleven, Thomas Fotheringham of Powrie, and David Kinnear of Kinnear

James, seventh Lord Lindsay of the Byres, also distinguished himself in the Protestant cause. He joined in a band against Huntly and the papists, in March 1592, and in October of the same year, during the king's progress in the north, it was chiefly through "the good Lord Lindsay's" instance that he destroyed Huntly's castle of Strathbogie and others. On 5th January 1593, a meeting of barons and ministers took place in Mr Robert Bruce's gallery at Edinburgh, when it was agreed that an expostulation should be made to the king on account of his encouragement of the papists. Some of those present, however, expressed themselves, in the afternoon of the same day, anxious that the commissioners appointed to go down to the palace to the king should not go, as he was highly offended with the meeting, and his presence would only irritate him more; but Lord Lindsay put an end to the debate by saying boldly, "I will goe doun with the barons, go who will. We will not desist from our conclusion made before noone." So accordingly they went. (Calderwood, vol. v p. 216.)

During the famous tumult of December 17, 1596, he acted a conspicuous part. He and three other barons, with the two ministers, Bruce and Watson, were sent by the noblemen and barons convened in the Little church, to the king, then sitting in the upper Tolbooth, with some of his privy council, for redress of the wrongs done to the kirk, and to avert the dangers threatened to religion. "What dangers?" said James, after listening to a speech from Bruce, "I see none; and who dares convene, contrary to my proclamation?" "Dares!" retorted Lord Lindsay, "we dare more than that, and shall not suffer the truth to be overthrown" Alarmed at the language and gestures of Lindsay with the rush of people into the apartment, the king retreated from the room and the protestant lords and ministers returned to the Little kirk, where great confusion prevailed, and Lindsay, to prevent them separating, cried aloud, "There is no course but one, let us stay together that are here, and promise to take one part, and advertise our friends and the favourers of religion to come unto us, and let the day be either theirs or ours." This speech increased the uproar, and violence would undoubtedly have ensued, had not the provost, Sir Alexander Hume, brought the armed crafts of the city, and put down the riot. (Ibid. p. 513) In the kirkyard at the back of the church, some hot words passed between the earl of Mar, who had been sent by the king to remonstrate with the ministers, and Lord Lindsay, and they could not be pacified for a long time. For his share in this tumult, the latter "was compelled to pay ane great sum of money" He died 5th November 1601 With three daughters he had two sons. John, eighth lord, who died 5th November 1609, without male issue, and Robert, ninth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, who died at Bath, 9th July 1616. With one daughter the latter had a son, John, tenth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, born in 1596, and created earl of Lindsay and Lord Parbroath, to him and his heirs male, bearing the name and arms of the Lords Lindsay, by patent, dated at Theobald's, 8th May 1633. In 1644 he assumed the title of earl of Crawford, and was thenceforth known under the name of Crawford-Lindsay (For a memoir of him and notices of the remaining earls of Lindsay, see vol. i pp. 715—717, art. CRAWFORD, earl of)

LINDSAY, SIR DAVID, of the Mount, a celebrated poet, moralist, and reformer, descended from the noble family of Lindsay of the Byres, in Haddingtonshire, was born in 1490 His birthplace is supposed to have been his father's seat, called the Mount, near Cupar-Fife He was educated at the university of St Andrews, which he entered in 1505, and quitted in 1509 In 1512 he became an attendant on the infant prince, afterwards James V, and his duty seems to have been to take the personal charge of him in his hours of recreation He held this post till 1524, when he was dismissed on a pension, through the intrigues of the four guardians, to whose care the young king was committed in that year In 1528 he produced his 'Dreame,' written during his banishment from court. In this poem he exposes, with great truth and boldness, the disorders in Church and State, which had arisen from the licentious lives of the Romish clergy, and the usurpations of the nobles. In the following year he presented his 'Complaynt' to the king, in which he reminds his majesty of his faithful services in the days of his early youth In 1530 James appointed him lyon king-at-arms, and conferred on him the honour of knighthood In the 'Complaynt of the King's Papingo,' Sir David's next production, he makes the royal parrot satirise the vices of the Popish clergy, in a style of such pungent humour as must have been most galling to the parties against whom his invective is directed He was, however, protected by the king against their resentment

In 1531 Sir David was sent, with two other ambassadors, to Antwerp, to renew an ancient treaty of commerce with the Netherlands, and on his return he married a lady of the Douglas family. In 1535 he produced before the king, at the Castlehill of Cupar, a drama, entitled 'A Satyre of the Three Estatis' In the same year, he and Sir John Campbell of Loudon were sent as ambassadors into Germany, to treat of a marriage with some princess of that country, but James afterwards preferred a connexion with France In 1536 he wrote his answer to the 'Kingis Flyting,' and his 'Complaynt of Basche, the King's Hound;' and in 1538, 'The Supplication against Sydo Taillis,' part of women's dress On the death of Magdalene of France, two months after her marriage with James V, Lindsay composed his 'Deploratioun of the Death of Queen Magdalene.' In 1538, on the arrival in Scotland of Mary of Guise, James' second consort, Sir David superintended a variety of public pageants and spectacles for the welcoming her majesty at St Andrews In 1541 he produced 'Kitty's Confession,' written in ridicule of auricular confession

In 1542 King James died, and during the succeeding regency, the Romish clergy obtained an act to have Lindsay's satirical poems, against them and their corruptions, publicly burnt. In 1544, and the two succeeding years, he represented the town of Cupar-Fife in the estates of parliament. In 1546 was printed at London, Lindsay's 'Tragical Death of David Beatoun, Bishoppe of St. Andrewes, in Scotland; whereunto is ioined the Martyredom of Maister George Wyscharte, for whose sake the aforesaid Bishoppe was not long after slayne.' His pithy stanza about the foulness of the deed, combined with its desirableness, has been often quoted, and will be found at page 294, vol i of this work, article BETHUNE

In 1548 Sir David Lindsay was sent on a mission to Denmark to solicit the aid of some ships, to protect the coasts of Scotland against the English, a request that was not granted, and to negotiate a free trade in grain for the Scottish merchants, which was readily conceded In 1550 he published the most pleasing of his compositions, 'The History and Testament of Squire Meldrum,' and in 1553 appeared his last and greatest work, 'The Monarchie' The date of his death is unknown; but Dr Irving places it in 1567 His portrait is subjoined, taken from a plate forming the frontispiece to the 1st vol. of Scottish Poems collected by Pinkerton, in 3 vols. London, 1792

of his writings are in the Scottish language, and his satirical powers and broad humour long rendered him an especial favourite with the common people of Scotland, with whom many of his moral sayings passed into proverbs. The most accurate edition of his works is that published by Mr George Chalmers in 1806

LINDSAY, ROBERT, of Pitscottie, the compiler of the curious work, entitled 'The Chronicles of Scotland,' was born about the beginning of the 16th century Beyond the fact that he was a cadet of the noble family of Lindsay, nothing else has been recorded of his personal history His 'Chronicles' include the period between 1436 and 1565, and are remarkable for the prosing simplicity of the style, and the credulity of the author, whose testimony is only to be relied upon when corroborated by other authorities A correct edition of the 'Chronicles of Scotland' was published in 1814, by Mr John Graham Dalyell, in 2 vols 8vo

LINLITHGOW, earl of, a title, (attainted in 1716,) in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1600, on Alexander 7th Lord Livingstone, descended from Sir William Livingstone, who, in 1346, obtained from King David II a grant of the barony of Callendar in Stirlingshire. (See LIVINGSTONE, surname of) When master of Livingstone, he was among those who were taken prisoners in Dumbarton castle, on that fortress being surprised by Captain Thomas Crawford, in May 1571 Among other charters he had one of the office of hereditary constable and keeper of the castle of Blackness, with certain lands thereto annexed, Feb. 28, 1598. The charge of the princess Elizabeth, daughter of James VI, and afterwards electress palatine, with other children of the king, was committed to him and his wife, Lady Eleanor Hay, only daughter of 7th earl of Errol, and in a charter of novo damus, dated March 13, 1600, granted by James VI. in his favour, of the barony of Callendar, in which the town of Falkirk was erected into a free burgh of barony, honourable mention is made of the great care and fidelity with which they attended to the education of the king's children, and of the expense incurred in maintaining them and their servants. This charter also contained a grant of regality, but which it was provided should evacuate on payment of £10,000, said to be due by the crown to Lord Livingstone. He was created earl of Linlithgow, Lord Livingstone and Callendar, Dec. 25, 1600 According to Sir James Balfour, this took place at the baptism of Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I. When the princess Elizabeth was restored to her father at Windsor in 1603, the earl and his countess had discharged their trust so much to the satisfaction of James that they obtained an act of approval from the king and council. In 1604 he was one of the commissioners appointed by parliament to treat of a union with England, a favourite project of King James. He died in 1622. He had, with two daughters, three sons, viz., John, master of Livingstone, who predeceased his father, unmarried, in 1614; Alexander, 2d earl of Linlithgow, and James, 1st earl of Callendar (See CALLENDAR, earl of, vol. i of this work, page 534.)

Alexander, 2d earl of Linlithgow, was in his father's lifetime appointed an extraordinary lord of session, January 13, 1610, but was removed from the bench in 1626. In the following year he was appointed by charter hereditary constable and keeper of the palace of Linlithgow In 1634 he granted the barony of Callendar to his brother, Sir James Livingstone, who was created by Charles I. successively Lord Almond and Falkirk, and earl of Callendar The 2d earl of Linlithgow married, first, Lady Elizabeth Gordon, 2d daughter of George 1st marquis of Huntly, and had one son, George, 3d earl of Linlithgow; and 2dly, Lady Mary Douglas, eldest daughter of the 10th earl of Angus, by whom he had, with two daughters, another son, Alexander, 2d earl of Callendar

George, 3d earl of Linlithgow, born in July 1616, suffered much on account of his loyalty to the king during the civil wars. After the battle of Kilsyth, Aug. 15, 1645, he was one of the first to wait upon the victorious Montrose, during his stay at Bothwell At the Restoration he was appointed colonel of the royal regiment of horse guards, and sworn a privy councillor In 1681 he resigned his command in the army, and was constituted justice-general of Scotland, of which office he was deprived at the Revolution He was implicated in Sir James Montgomery's plot for the restoration of the abdicated family, and died Feb 1, 1690, aged 74. He had married Lady Elizabeth Maule, 2d daughter of 1st earl of Panmure, the widowed countess of Kinghorn, and had by her, with one daughter, two sons, George, 4th earl of Linlithgow, and Alexander, 3d earl of Callendar

George, 4th earl of Linlithgow, was sworn a privy councillor in 1692 He was also one of the commissioners of the treasury He died Aug 7, 1695, without issue, when the title devolved on his nephew, James, 4th earl of Callendar and 5th earl of Linlithgow, who, engaging in the rebellion of 1715, was attainted of high treason By his countess, Lady Margaret Hay, second daughter of 12th earl of Errol, he had a son, James, Lord Livingstone, who died April 30, 1715, and a daughter, Lady Anne Livingstone, countess of Kilmarnock. Her eldest son, James, Lord Boyd, succeeded, in her right, to the earldom of Errol

LISTON, ROBERT, F R S, an eminent surgeon, the son of Rev Henry Liston, minister of Ecclesmachan, Linlithgowshire, was born October 28, 1794 He became a graduate of the royal college of surgeons of Edinburgh and London, and in 1815 was appointed ordinary house surgeon of the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh In 1817 he established himself in Edinburgh as a surgeon, and from 1822 to 1834 delivered lectures, first on anatomy, and afterwards on surgery, in that city He soon rose into eminence, both as a lecturer and an operator, but failed in being appointed professor of surgery in the university of Edinburgh. In 1833 he published his 'Principles of Surgery,' a work which underwent frequent revision and passed through several editions His lectures on various subjects were published in the Lancet.

In 1834 he was appointed surgeon to the North London Hospital Notwithstanding his superiority as an operator, he was not anxious to recommend the use of the knife. On the contrary, he was remarkably cautious in this respect. Fearless in operation, he was always desirous of avoiding the necessity of it, if any other remedy could be found In London his practice soon became extensive, and he was subsequently appointed professor of clinical surgery in University College.

In 1840, he published his 'Elements of Surgery,' in 1 vol 8vo, and in 1846 he was chosen one of the examiners of the Royal College of Surgeons. His name was now known in every medical school of Europe and America, and his reputation as an operator was unrivalled But in the zenith of his manhood, and the vigour of his practice, he was cut off by death, December 7, 1847, aged 53 About a year before his death, he began to be troubled with an affection of the throat But the true nature of his disease baffled the skill of his medical advisers, and it was not until a post mortem examination that it was ascertained he had laboured under aneurism of the aorta.

LITHGOW, WILLIAM, a celebrated pedestrian traveller, was born in the parish of Lanark, of poor parents, in 1583 Having an irresistible desire to see foreign countries, and possessing a restless and adventurous disposition, about 1607 he first set out on an expedition through Germany, Bohemia, Helvetia, and the Low Countries, and, arriving at Paris, remained there for ten months In March 1609 he proceeded from the French capital to Rome, whence he went to Naples, Ancona, and Venice, and, after visiting the various islands in the Mediterranean, wandered through Greece and Asia, meeting on his way with various strange adventures, and being exposed to many perils and hardships All his journeys were performed on foot, and it would seem that he was often obliged to trust to chance for means to defray his expenses on the road He was, however, generally lucky enough to obtain a supply of money at the very time he most required it On one occasion he met with two Venetian gentlemen who entertained him hospitably for ten days, and at parting made him a present of fifty zechins in gold At another time he happened to journey from Jerusalem to Grand Cairo with three Dutchmen, who all drank themselves to death with "strong Cyprus wine," and the last of them who died bequeathed their collected property to our fortunate traveller Upon a third occasion, while passing through Calabria, he found the bodies of two young noblemen in a field who had killed each other in a duel, when he made himself master of their purses and all the valuables on their persons He afterwards visited Africa, traversing Barbary, Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli; then crossing over to Italy, he proceeded through Hungary, Germany, and Poland, and embarked at Dantzic for London In 1619 he travelled through Portugal and Spain, and finally arrived at Malaga, where he was arrested as a spy, and, after being put to the torture, was handed over to the Inquisition, by which he was treated with so much renewed cruelty, as to be deprived of the use of his limbs, and his body was reduced to "a martyred anatomy." On regaining his liberty, he returned to London, in 1621, and soon after was carried to the king's palace at Theobald's on a feather-bed, and exhibited to King James and all his court in that condition His majesty ordered him to be taken care of, and was twice at the expense of sending him to Bath A portrait of Lithgow in his Turkish habit is subjoined

By the king's command Lithgow applied to Goudomar, the ambassador from Spain to the English court, for the restitution of the property of which he had been deprived at Malaga, and for some compensation for his unmerited sufferings. The Spanish minister promised him full reparation, but never kept his word. Lithgow, in consequence, upbraided him in the presence-chamber, before several courtiers, with breach of promise, and even went so far as to commit an assault upon him "with his fist," for which he was sent to the Marshalsea, where he continued a prisoner for nine months In 1627 he returned to Scotland, where he died about 1640

His Travels were first published in 1614 At the conclusion of the 8th edition, he says that "in his three voyages his painful feet have traced over, besides passages of seas and rivers, 36,000 and odd miles, which draweth near to twice the circumference of the whole earth" He also wrote an Account of the Siege of Breda, 1637 The most interesting portions of his poetical works, edited by James Maidment, Esq, advocate, appeared at Edinburgh in one vol in 1862

LIVINGSTONE, a surname said to be of Hungarian origin, the progenitor of the families of this name in Scotland being a gentleman of Hungary who came to this country with Margaret, queen of Malcolm Canmore, about 1070 His descendant in the third degree, Livingus, who lived in the reigns of King Alexander I, and his brother, King David I, called a considerable estate in West Lothian, which he possessed, Livingston, that is, the dwelling-place of Livingus. His son, Thurstanus, a witness to the foundation charter of Holyrood-house in 1128, had two sons, Alexander and William The elder, Alexander, the first who assumed the name of Livingston, died in the end of the reign of King Alexander II His son, Sir William Livingston, who acquired the lands of Gorgyn near Edinburgh, witnessed a charter of Malcolm, earl of Lennox, in 1270 From William, the eldest of his three sons, descended the Livingstons of Livingston, the last of whom, Sir Bartholomew Livingston, was killed at the battle of Flodden in 1513, leaving three daughters, his coheiresses. The two younger sons, Sir Archibald and Adam, swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296. Sir Archibald's grandson, Sir William Livingston, accompanied King David II. in his expedition to England in 1346, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham, 17th October of that year He was one of the four commissioners appointed by the Estates of Scotland, 17th January 1356-7, to treat with England for the ransom of the king, and also for peace between the two nations. He had a grant from David II of the barony of Callendar, then in the crown by the forfeiture of Patrick Callendar, whose only daughter and heiress, Christian, he married. (See LINLITHGOW, earl of, p 658.) Of two sons, Patrick, the elder, one of the hostages for King David II in 1357, predeceased him. The younger son, Sir William, had a son, Sir John Livingstone of Callendar, killed at the battle of Homildon, 14th September 1402, leaving four sons, viz. Sir Alexander, who succeeded, Robert, ancestor of the Livingstones of Westquarter and Kinnaird; John, of the Livingstones of Bonton: and William of the viscounts of Kilsyth, (see KILSYTH, viscount of). Sir James Livingstone, baronet, son and heir of Sir John Livingstone of Kinnaird, was created by Charles II. earl of NEWBURGH, (see NEWBURGH, earl of).

Sir Alexander Livingstone of Callendar, the eldest son, the celebrated guardian of James II in his minority, was one of the jury on the trial of Murdach, duke of Albany, in 1424 On the assassination of James I in 1437, he was appointed keeper of the young king's person The rival minister, Sir William Crichton, chancellor of the kingdom, (see vol i of this work, p. 727,) retaining his majesty in the castle of Edinburgh, the queen-mother had him conveyed, enclosed in a chest, to Stirling, where she delivered him to his legal guardian, Livingstone. He subsequently besieged Crichton in the castle of Edinburgh, but a reconciliation took place between them Afterwards quarrelling with the queen, he imprisoned her, in 1439 By another stratagem, Crichton regained possession of the king's person, but by the intercession of friends a lasting agreement was at length formed between the two ministers, and the king was committed to the care of Livingstone, who thus obtained the chief direction in the government. All differences between him and the queen were likewise settled by a solemn indenture dated 4th September 1439 In 1440 the sixth earl of Douglas, his brother David, and his friend Fleming of Cumbernauld, were, chiefly at his instigation, inveigled into the castle of Edinburgh by Crichton, and beheaded there. In 1445, when the Douglases were at the height of their power, Sir Alexander was denounced a rebel, and in the following year he was imprisoned, but released on paying a large sum of money However, Alexander, the younger, of his two sons, was tried and beheaded He was ancestor of the Livingstones of Dunipace, one of whom was named in 1550 an extraordinary lord of session On 4th July 1600, Jean Livingstone, Lady Warriston, daughter of John Livingstone of Dunipace, was beheaded at the foot of the Canongate, Edinburgh, for the murder of her husband, John Kincaid of Warriston near that city She was only 21 years of age, and is highly celebrated in several popular ballads of the period for her graceful appearance and uncommon beauty Her father had great influence at court, but she is said to have declined all efforts for saving her life An account of her behaviour in prison and at the place of execution, was preserved among Wodrow's MSS in the Advocates' Library, and is reported on in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials. In 1449 Sir Alexander Livingstone was again received into favour, appointed justiciary of Scotland, and sent ambassador to England He died soon after

His eldest son, Sir James Livingstone of Callendar, first Lord Livingstone, had the appointment of captain of the castle of Stirling, with the tuition of the young king, conferred on him by his father In 1453, he was sworn a privy councillor, appointed master of the household, and great chamberlain of Scotland He was created a peer before 30th August 1458, under the title of Lord Livingstone, and died about 1467 With two daughters he had two sons. The elder son, James, second Lord Livingstone, died without issue, when the title devolved on his nephew, John, son of his brother Alexander John, third lord, died before 1510

His son, William, fourth lord, had a son, Alexander, fifth lord, who in 1543 was chosen one of the four noblemen to whom was committed the education of the young queen, Mary He was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, 5th

March, 1544. (Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice, p. 81.) The safe-keeping of the queen's person was intrusted to him and Lord Erskine by the Estates, 24th April 1545, and in 1547, after the disastrous battle of Pinkie, in which the master of Livingstone was slain, these noblemen conveyed her for greater security to the priory of Inchmahome, on the lake of Monteith, whence, in the following year, they accompanied her to France. Lord Livingstone died in that country about 1553. His eldest son having had no issue, his second son, William, succeeded as sixth Lord Livingstone. Thomas, the youngest son, was ancestor of the Livingstones of Haining. His lordship's youngest daughter, Mary, a maid of honour to her majesty, was one of the queen's Maries. She married in 1567, John Semple of Beltries, when the queen gave them conjunct liferent of Auchtermuchty and other lands. According to John Knox, "shame hasted" the marriage, and on this occasion he said Mary Livingstone the lusty married John Semple the dancer (Knox's Historie, p. 345.)

William, the sixth lord, adhered to Queen Mary, and fought for her at the battle of Langside. He was one of the queen's commissioners at the conference at York in 1568, and retained her confidence to the last. He is described by Bruce the Jesuit in 1589 as a "very catholic lord," and it is certain that he favoured the plots of the papists in that and the following year. He married Agnes, second daughter of the third Lord Fleming, and died in 1592. His eldest son, Alexander, seventh lord, when master of Livingstone, accompanied the duke of Lennox to France, on his exile in December 1582. He was the first earl of Linlithgow. (See LINLITHGOW, earl of.)

The Livingstones of Westquarter and Bedlormie, the representatives of the earls of Linlithgow and Callendar, are descended from the Hon. Sir George Livingstone of Ogleface, Linlithgowshire, fourth son of the sixth Lord Livingstone, and younger brother of the first earl of Linlithgow. He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 30th May, 1625. His great grandson, Sir Alexander Livingstone, fourth baronet, married Susannah, only daughter and heiress of Patrick Walker of Bedlormie, Linlithgowshire, and was designed of Craigenhall and Bedlormie. He had one son, Sir Alexander Livingstone, fifth baronet. The latter had seven sons and three daughters. George, the eldest son, who died in 1729, without issue, Alexander, the second son, who died unmarried in 1766, and William, the fourth son, designed of Westquarter and Bedlormie, were, successively, sixth, seventh, and eighth baronets. Robert, the fifth son, lost his right arm in battle with the rebels in 1745, and had a son, Alexander, who succeeded his uncle, Sir William, on his death, without issue, in 1769.

Sir Alexander, the ninth baronet, designed of that ilk, Westquarter, and Bedlormie, in 1784 laid before Lord Kenyon, then attorney-general, a case respecting his claim to the attainted conjunct titles of earl of Linlithgow and earl of Callendar. He was twice married. By his first wife he had, with one daughter, seven sons, and by his second, two sons and one daughter. He died in 1795. Two of his sons, George-Augustus and David, were killed in battle.

Sir Thomas, his third son, became the tenth baronet. He entered the navy in 1782, and commanded the Diadem in the expedition against Quiberon and Belleisle in 1800. In 1806-7 he was employed in the Mediterranean. In 1846 he attained the rank of admiral of the Blue. He was appointed keeper of the royal palace of Linlithgow and of the castle of Blackness, by the king, in consideration of his being the male heir and representative of the hereditary governors of these places. He married in 1809 the daughter of Sir James Stirling, baronet, and died April 1, 1858, without issue.

His brother, Thurstanus Livingstone, born in 1770 or 1772, went to sea, as a common sailor, both in the merchant service and in the navy, and was discharged in 1797, in consequence of his wounds. Taking up his residence at Bethnal Green, London, he married, the same year, Susannah Brown, a widow, who died in 1806. Two years afterwards he married her sister, Catherine Ann Tickhurst, also a widow. By the latter he had a son, Alexander, born in 1809, who, on the death of his uncle in 1858, assumed the title of Sir Alexander, as 11th baronet, and took possession of the estates. The 10th baronet's sister, the wife of Rev. John Fenton, rector of Ousby, and vicar of Torpenhow, in Cumberland, instituted two suits in the court of session, disputing Sir Alexander's legitimacy and his right to the succession, on the ground that, according to the law of Scotland, the marriage of his father with his deceased wife's sister was not lawful. The court held that the domicile of Thurstanus Livingstone, during both his marriages, having been in England, the legitimacy of his son must be decided by the laws of England. The case was appealed to the house of lords, by Mr. John Thomas Fenton, Mrs. Fenton's son, that lady having died July 15, 1859, when their lordships reversed that judgment, and remitted to the court of session to decide the question according to the law of Scotland. The case again came before the court of session January 18, 1861, when it was unanimously decided that the marriage of Alexander's parents was incestuous and illegal, and giving decree for the pursuer. The so-styled Sir Alexander Livingstone died at Edinburgh January 20, 1859.

LIVINGSTONE, JOHN, an eminent minister of the Church of Scotland, was born at Monyabreck, or Kilsyth, Stirlingshire, January 21, 1603. His father and grandfather, descended from the noble family of the same name, were successively ministers of that parish. John studied at the university of Glasgow, and was licensed in 1625. In 1627 he became chaplain to the earl of Wigton at Cumbernauld. The celebrated revival of religion at the Kirk of Shotts, in June 1630, is considered to have been the effect of his impressive preaching. In August of the same year he accepted of the charge of the parish of Killinchie, in the north of Ireland, but, for non-conformity, he was deposed and excommunicated by the bishop of Down, in whose diocese his parish was situated. He was inducted minister of Stranraer in July 1638. In 1640, as chaplain to the earl of Cassillis' regiment, he was present at the battle of Newburn near Newcastle, of which he wrote an account. In 1648 he was translated to the parish of Ancrum in Teviotdale. In April 1663, for refusing to take the oath of allegiance he was banished from Scotland. Retiring to Rotterdam he devoted the remainder of his days to the cultivation of theological and biblical learning, and died August 9, 1672. He had prepared an edition of the Old Testament, with a Latin translation and explanatory notes, which has never been published His 'Remarkable Observations upon the Lives of the most Eminent Ministers and Professors in the Church of Scotland' were printed with his Memoirs in 1754

LOCHNAW The account of the Agnews of Lochnaw in Wigtonshire is introduced here under the name of their estate, as it was inadvertently omitted at its regular place in the first volume of this work.

The surname of Agnew is understood to be of French origin, a family of the name of Agneau having been, about the end of the tenth century, seated in Normandy, and there is a family tradition, confirmed by some ancient MSS., that the first progenitor in England of the Agnews came over with William the Conqueror, although his name is not upon the list of barons. In the 12th century, soon after the subjection of Ireland to the English crown by Earl Strongbow, the famous warrior, Sir John de Courcy, the conqueror of the province of Ulster, was "accompanied, we are told, by Agneau, an Anglo-Norman like himself, who settled at Larne, in the conquered province, and it is well known that the family had very extensive possessions in the county of Antrim, where they were called lords Agnew, or lords of Larne." (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol i p. 162) In the reign of David II. the first of the Scottish Agnews arrived at his court, and acquired the lands and castle of Lochnaw, then a royal castle, in the Rhinns of Galloway, being at the same time appointed sheriff of the county of Wigton He was also made heritable constable of Lochnaw castle.

The family appear in the 15th century to have held their possessions under the Douglases. Chalmers (Caledonia, vol iii. p. 395,) says, "Andrew Agnew was the first who obtained, in the capacity of scutifer (shield-bearer, esquire at arms), the good will of the Lady Margaret Stewart, the duchess of Turenne and countess of Douglas, while she enjoyed Galloway as her dower In 1426 he acquired from William Douglas of Leswalt the heritable office of the castle of Lochnaw," &c. This Andrew Agnew got several charters from James I, particularly two, dated 31st January 1431, confirming to him and his heirs the office of heritable constable of Lochnaw, with the whole lands and barony of Lochnaw, &c. He afterwards got the office of heritable sheriffship of Wigton conferred on him and his heirs, by a charter, under the great seal from James II., dated 25th May 1451

Patrick Agnew of Lochnaw, his great-great-grandson, lived in the reigns of Queen Mary and James VI His son, Sir Patrick Agnew, seventh sheriff of Wigton, was knighted by the latter monarch, and created a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles I., by patent to him and his heirs male whatever, dated 28th July 1629 In 1633 he represented the county of Wigton in the Scottish estates. He was a member of the high commission court, established for the introduction of episcopacy in October 1634, and he died in 1661 He had three sons Andrew, his successor, Patrick of Sheuchan, whose great-granddaughter married John Vans, Esq of Barnbarroch, now represented by Vans Agnew of Sheuchan and Barnbarroch, Wigtonshire, and James, lieutenant-colonel of Lord Kirkcudbright's regiment in the reign of Charles the First

His eldest son, Sir Andrew, second baronet of Lochnaw, was knighted in his father's lifetime. He was a member of the Estates for Wigtonshire, and a zealous supporter of the Covenant. In 1656 he was appointed by Cromwell, sheriff of Galloway After his father's death, he got, in 1661, all the charters of Lochnaw, with the offices and privileges, which his ancestors had possessed "past all memorie of man," confirmed and ratified by parliament. In the following year, however, he was fined £6,000 for his compliance under the commonwealth. On enlarging the old castle of Lochnaw, in 1665, he inscribed upon it from the beginning of the 127th Psalm "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vaine that build." He died in 1671 By his wife, Anne, daughter of Sir Alexander Stewart, created in 1623, earl of Galloway, he had Sir Andrew, third baronet of Lochnaw In January, 1682, for refusing to take the test oath, and because he would not join in the oppression of the persecuted Presbyterians within his jurisdiction, he was deprived of the sheriffdom of Wigtonshire, so long held by the family, and the office was conferred on the notorious Graham of Claverhouse; the object of the Scottish privy council in doing so, says Chalmers (Ibid. p. 363), being that Graham might "shew the Agnews, at the end of 230 years, how to execute the office of sheriff during such times!" And in what manner Claverhouse executed his commission there and elsewhere, is written in blood in the history of the period. Sir Andrew took an active share in the revolution of 1688, and on 4th May 1689, the Convention of Estates restored him to his hereditary office of sheriff of Wigton He died in 1698.

His son, Sir James, who had also actively supported the Revolution, was the fourth baronet. He married Lady Mary Montgomerie, daughter of the third earl of Eglinton, by whom he had twenty-one children, and died in 1728.

His eldest son, Sir Andrew, the famous lieutenant-general, was fifth baronet. Born in 1687, he was, says Sir Walter Scott, "a soldier of the old military school, severe in discipline, stiff and formal in manners, brave to the last degree, but somewhat of a humorist." Once on the eve of an engagement he thus laconically addressed his troops "Weel, lads, ye see these loons on the hill there! If ye dinna kill them, they'll kill you." At the battle of Dettingen, June 14, 1743, he was ordered with his regiment, the Scots Fusileers, to guard a pass at the extremity of the British army One day as his men were preparing for dinner, he was informed of the approach of a body of the enemy's cavalry "The loons," he exclaimed, "will never hae the impudence to attack the Scots Fusileers!" and he ordered his men to take their dinner, saying they would fight all the better for it. As he himself was in the act of picking a bone, a shot struck it out of his hand, upon which declaring that "They were in earnest now," he rose, and made arrangements for meeting the enemy Observing the French cuirassiers coming on at a charging pace, and well knowing that the usual mode of resistance to this manœuvre would be useless, as these troops, which were of the royal household, were mounted on the best horses, and not only provided with iron cuirasses, but had them also buckled on to the saddles, so that the bayonet could make no impression, he ordered his men to open, to allow the cavalry to pass between the platoons, bidding them not fire till "they saw the white of their een," and to aim at the horses. By this means, on the horses falling, their riders, bound to the saddles, and unable to extricate themselves, were immediately bayonetted, or taken prisoners. After the battle, the king, George II, who commanded in person, observed to Sir Andrew, "I hear you let the French get in amongst us." "Yes, please your majesty," replied he, "but they didna win back again." (Playfair's Family Antiquities —Baronetage of Scotland, p. 158, Note.)

In 1746, just previous to the battle of Culloden, he bravely defended Blair castle, the seat of the duke of Athol, when blockaded by a rebel force under Lord George Murray, the duke's brother The garrison was reduced to great distress from the want of provisions, and if the blockade, which lasted from the 17th March to the 1st of April, had been continued a few days longer they must have surrendered, but, fortunately for them, Lord George Murray was ordered to return immediately to Inverness, in consequence of the expected advance of the duke of Cumberland. Sir Andrew, being shortsighted, could not see that the blockading force had retired, and he would not trust to the eyes of others. He, therefore, remained shut up in the castle, till the earl of Crawford arrived on the 2d April with a detachment of cavalry to his relief. On the garrison being drawn out, Sir Andrew formally received his lordship at the head of it, saying, "My lord, I am very glad to see you, but, by all that's good, you have been very dilatory, and we can give you nothing to eat." To this his lordship replied, "I assure you, Sir Andrew, I made all the haste I possibly could, and I hope that you and the officers will do me the honour to partake with me of such fare as I can give you" In the Scots Magazine for 1808, will be found 'An Original and Genuine Narrative, now first published, of the Remarkable Blockade and Attack of Blair Castle, written by a Subaltern Officer, who served in the defence.' This officer, at that time an ensign, was afterwards General Melville. The same year Sir Andrew got the colonelcy of a regiment of marines. On the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland in 1747, he received £4,000 as compensation for his sheriffship of Wigtonshire. In 1750 he was appointed governor of Tinmouth castle He died in 1771, aged 84 Tradition has preserved many characteristic anecdotes of this veteran soldier, and an account of him will be found in Scott's Tales of a Grandfather, and the commencement of M'Crie's Memoirs of his great grandson, Sir Andrew Agnew, baronet, the celebrated champion of the Sabbath He had six sons and eleven daughters.

His fifth son, Sir Stair Agnew, so called after field-marshal, the earl of Stair, was the sixth baronet. He was born 9th October, 1734, and died June 28, 1809, in his 75th year He had two sons and three daughters. One of the latter, Isabella, became the wife of Robert Hathorn-Stewart, Esq of Physgill, with issue. His elder son, Andrew, a lieutenant in the army, married the Hon Martha de Courcy, eldest daughter of the 26th Lord Kingsale, premier baron of Ireland, and had an only son, Andrew, the subject of the following notice. During a visit which Lieutenant Agnew paid, with his bride, to his paternal home of Lochnaw, he was seized with sudden illness, the result, it is said, of over exertion in hunting, and died on 11th September 1792, in his 26th year, within four months of his marriage.

His son, Sir Andrew, seventh baronet, was a posthumous child, having been born on 21st March 1793. His birthplace was his maternal grandfather's seat of Kingsale in Ireland, where he spent his early youth, till he succeeded to his property He early showed a fondness for music, drawing, and poetry, and was also much attached to the study of architecture and heraldry. When sixteen years of age, he succeeded to the title and estates of his family. In the winters of 1810 and 1811, he attended the classes of moral philosophy under Dr Thomas Brown, and of chemistry and pharmacy under Dr Hope, in the university of Edinburgh. In October 1812, he went to Oxford, but though he did not enter as a graduate at any of the colleges there, he had a tutor, and regularly attended the classes. On 11th July 1816, he married Madeline, tenth daughter of Sir David Carnegie of Southesk, M.P for Forfarshire, baronet, representative of the earls of Southesk. This earldom, which was attainted in 1716, was restored to the family in 1855, in the person of Sir David's son, Sir James Carnegie. (See SOUTHESK earl of.)

At Lochnaw he devoted himself for some years to planting and improving his estate, and almost rebuilt Lochnaw castle. He attended all county meetings, and was regular in the observance of his duties as a justice of the peace. In November 1828, he was appointed vice-lieutenant of Wigtonshire.

In 1830 Sir Andrew was unanimously elected M P for the county of Wigton, and in 1831 and 1832, he was a second and a third time returned for the same county In the latter year, at the request of the Lord's Day Society of London, he undertook the leadership of their cause in the House of Commons, and entered actively on measures having in view the sanctification of the Sabbath On 3d July 1832 he obtained the appointment of a select committee, to inquire into the laws and practices relating to the observance of the Lord's day, and their report, with the minutes of evidence, was ordered to be printed on 6th August of the same year On 20th March 1833, he introduced his Bill for the Better Protection of the Sabbath in England The prohibitory clauses it contained, against various forms of Sabbath desecration, raised up a fierce storm of opposition both within and without parliament, and on 16th May the bill was lost, on the second reading, by a majority of 79 to 78 On 11th March 1834, he again obtained leave to bring in a bill for the better observance of the Sabbath, which on 30th April was again thrown out on the second reading, by a majority of 161 to 125 In January 1835, he was for the fourth time elected M P for Wigtonshire, and in February he published 'A Letter to the Friends of the Sabbath Cause.' He also published various tracts, letters, and circulars on the same topic. He was a member of many religious and philanthropic societies, both in England and Scotland, and often presided at their public meetings.

On 21st April 1836, he introduced another bill for promoting the due observance of the Lord's day, which on the second reading on 18th May following, was lost by a majority of 32 Encouraged by the marked improvement which had taken place in public feeling in regard to the Sabbath, and by the numerous petitions in its favour presented to parliament, on May 4th 1837 he brought his measure for the fourth time before the House of Commons, when the first reading was carried by a majority of 146. On 7th June the second reading was at last allowed by a majority of 44, which affirmed the principle of the bill The death of William IV., that month, led to a dissolution of parliament, and the farther progress of the bill was stopped. At the election for the new parliament the same year, he stood for the Wigton burghs, instead of for the county as before, but was unsuccessful. Throughout his parliamentary career he was a supporter of the principles of reform, although his views on questions of religion, and in particular on that of Sabbath observance, were widely different from those held by the Reform party His last years were distinguished by his opposition to the running of the railway trains on Sunday on those Scotch lines in which he was a shareholder. He died at Edinburgh, April 12th, 1849, of a disease of the heart, after an attack of scarlet fever, aged 56, and was interred in the Grange cemetery, receiving a public funeral. He had thirteen children, ten of whom survived him. The eldest son, Sir Andrew,

8th baronet, born 1818, was educated at Harrow, and for a time was an officer of dragoons. He married in 1846 Lady Louisa Neel, daughter of 1st earl of Gainsborough, with issue, a deputy lieutenant of Wigtonshire, 1848, vice-lieutenant of the same county, 1852; re-elected M P for Wigtownshire in Feb. 1856; re-elected at the general elections in 1857 and 1859

Sir Andrew's grand-uncle, General Patrick Agnew, served for many years, with distinction, in India. He was the personal friend of the Duke of Wellington, and father of Mrs. Alexander Stuart Menteath, authoress of several pieces of poetry

LOCKHART, originally Locard or Lockard, a surname of great antiquity in Scotland. In the reigns of David I. (1124—1153) and Malcolm IV (1153—1165) flourished Stephen Lockard, described as "a man of rank and distinction." He and Simon Locard, stated to be his son, though this is doubted by Chalmers, who supposes them to have been contemporaries, (Caledonia, vol. i p. 537,) possessed lands in Lanarkshire and Ayrshire. Simon was knighted by William the Lion. His estate in Upper Clydesdale, then called Wudekirch, was afterwards from him called Symonstoun, now the parish of Symington. He had also lands in Kyle, from him also called Symington, now also a parish Both were held under Walter the steward of Scotland His name occurs as a witness in a charter of donation to the abbey of Kelso, in 1164, and also in one of King William to the said abbey of a chapel on his lands.

His son, Malcolm Lockard, is witness in several charters in the beginning of the reign of Alexander II (1214—1249). With one daughter, he had two sons, Sir Simon, and William, progenitor of the Lockharts of Bar

Sir Simon, the elder son, proprietor of Craig-Lockhart, in the shire of Edinburgh, was knighted by Alexander III. He had two sons, Malcolm, who swore a forced fealty to Edward I in 1296; and Sir Stephen, who succeeded his brother, and was the first of the family designed of Lee and Cartland In 1306, he was compelled to swear allegiance to Edward I. for his lands in Mid-Lothian He died about 1320. His son, Sir Simon Lockard of Lee, accompanied the good Sir James Douglas on his expedition with the heart of Bruce to the Holy Land, when Douglas was killed in a battle with the Moors, in Spain The Lockharts, in consequence, have ever since carried a heart placed within a padlock, as part of their armorial bearings, with the motto, Corda serata pando, "I lay open the locked hearts." Sir Simon went to the Holy Land, as a soldier of the Cross, and brought home the celebrated stone called 'the Lee penny,' still in possession of the family, on which Sir Walter Scott founded his romance of 'The Talisman' in the 'Tales of the Crusaders.' The way he became possessed of it tradition states to have been as follows Having taken prisoner a Saracen chief, the wife of his captive came to ransom him, and on counting out the money, a stone or composition of a dark red colour and triangular shape, set on a silver coin, fell to the ground. She hastily snatched it up, which Sir Simon observing, insisted upon having it, before giving up his prisoner (See Preface to the Talisman) They also changed the spelling of their name to Lockheart, now Lockhart. Sir Simon died in the reign of Robert II

Allan Lockhart of Lee, the fifth in descent from Sir Simon, was killed at the battle of Pinkie in 1547 The third from this Allan, Sir James Lockhart of Lee, born in 1596, was, in his youth, appointed a gentleman of the privy chamber to Charles I, and knighted. In 1630 and 1633, he was one of the commissioners of the Estates for the county of Lanark, and on 20th June of the latter year was chosen a lord of the Articles. In 1645 he was again returned to parliament. He was appointed one of the commissioners of exchequer, 1st February, 1645, and on 3d July 1646 was admitted a lord of session, when he took the judicial title of Lord Lee. Being a sincere loyalist, he zealously supported "the Engagement" for the relief of Charles I in 1648, and commanded a regiment under the duke of Hamilton at the battle of Preston He was in consequence deprived of all his offices on 15th February 1649, and by an act of the Estates passed on 4th June 1650, he and others were banished from the kingdom. On 5th December the same year, on his humble supplication, he was allowed to return to Scotland, when he was appointed one of the committee of Estates, chosen to superintend the levy then making for an invasion of England under Charles II. With several others of the committee he was unfortunately surprised at Alyth on 28th August 1651, by a party of English soldiers, and carried first to Broughty castle, and afterwards sent to the Tower of London, where he was confined for several years under the Commonwealth. He at last obtained his liberty through the intercession of his eldest son, the celebrated Sir William Lockhart.

After the Restoration, Lord Lee was appointed a member of the privy council, and a commissioner of exchequer He was also restored to his seat on the bench In 1661, 1665, and 1669 he was elected commissioner to the Estates for the shire of Lanark, and in all these years he was a lord of the Articles. On 28th July 1671, he was appointed lord justice-clerk, and a pension was settled on him by the king of £400 sterling yearly for life. (Douglas' Baronage, p. 326) He died in 1674, in his 78th year By a first wife he had no surviving issue. By a second wife, Martha, daughter of Sir George Douglas of Mordington, and maid of honour to the queen of Charles I, he had, with two daughters, four sons, namely, Sir William, a distinguished statesman and soldier, of whom a memoir is given on the following page, in larger type, Sir George, lord president of the court of session, the first of the Lockharts of Carnwath, of whom a memoir is also given in larger type at page 683 of this volume, Sir John, of Castlehill, a lord of session (1665) and of justiciary (1671), whose male line failed, and Captain Robert Lockhart, who was slain in the civil wars.

Sir William, the eldest son, was twice married By his first wife, a daughter of Sir John Hamilton of Orbiestoun, a lord of session, he had a son, James, who died young By his second wife, Robina Shouster, niece by her mother of Oliver Cromwell, the lord protector, he had, with two daughters, five sons, namely, Cromwell, his heir, Julius, killed at Tangiers, named after Cardinal Mazarine, Richard, John, and James, who were all successively inheritors of Lee.

Cromwell Lockhart of Lee, the eldest son, succeeded his father in 1675. He married, first, a daughter of Sir Daniel Harvie, ambassador extraordinary from England to Constantinople, without issue, secondly, his cousin Martha, daughter and heiress of Sir John Lockhart of Castlehill, also without issue. After his death she took for her second husband, Sir John Sinclair of Stevenston, and the estate of Castlehill descended to a younger branch of the Sinclair family, who assumed the name of Sinclair

James Lockhart of Lee, who succeeded his three elder brothers in the estate and the representation of the family, was M P for Lanarkshire and one of the commissioners of equivalent. John, his son, inherited the estate in 1718, but though twice married, he died in 1777 without issue, when the succession to Lee devolved on Count Lockhart-Wishart of Carnwath, the descendant of Sir George Lockhart, lord president of the court of session, the founder of the Carnwath branch. Sir George purchased the extensive estates of the earls of Carnwath in Lanarkshire. With a daughter, he had two sons, George, of whom a memoir is given in larger type at p. 684, and Philip, who was shot as a rebel at Preston in 1715. Philip's second son, Alexander, of Craighouse, was a lord of session, under the title of Lord Covington. He had distinguished himself as an advocate at the trial of several of the unfortunate persons taken at Carlisle after the rebellion of 1745, and previous to being raised to the bench was dean of the faculty of advocates.

The eldest son, George, born in 1700, succeeded to the Carnwath estate in December 1731. Like his father he was a strong partisan of the Stuarts. He married Fergusa Wishart, daughter and coheir of Sir George Wishart of Clftonhill, Mid Lothian, and with a daughter, had three sons, namely, 1 George, who was so strenuous a supporter of the cause of the Pretender, that he was specially exempt from every act of amnesty issued by the government. He died abroad before his father. 2 James, who succeeded. And 3 Charles, who married Elizabeth, only child of John Macdonald, Esq. of Largie, on whose death he assumed the name and arms of Macdonald of Largie.

James, the eldest surviving son, assumed, in right of his mother, the name of Wishart in addition to his own. He was one of the lords of the bedchamber to the king of Hungary, count of the holy Roman empire, knight of the order of Maria Theresa, and general of the imperial forces. On the death of John Lockhart, last of Lee, in 1777, he succeeded to that estate. The celebrated Lee penny, to which a small silver chain is attached, is preserved in a gold box, the gift of the empress Maria Theresa. His son Charles, of Lee and Carnwath, and Count Lockhart Wishart, dying in 1802, without issue, the foreign honours became extinct, the Clftonhill property descended to his half-sister, Maria Theresa, while the Lee and Carnwath estates devolved on his cousin, Alexander Macdonald, eldest surviving son of Charles Lockhart and Elizabeth Macdonald of Largie. On inheriting the estates and representation of the family he resumed the name of Lockhart, and was created a baronet of Great Britain, 24th May 1806. With two daughters, he had three sons, namely, Sir Charles, second baronet, Sir Norman, third baronet, and Alexander, M.P. for Lanarkshire from 1837 to 1841.

The eldest son, Sir Charles Macdonald Lockhart, married Emilia Olivia, daughter of Sir Charles Ross, sixth baronet of Balnagowan, and had two daughters. On his death, 8th December 1882, he was succeeded by his brother, Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, who died in 1849, when his son, Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, born in 1845, became the fourth baronet.

The Lockharts of Milton-Lockhart are descended from Stephen, second son of Sir Stephen Lockhart of Cleghorn, armour-bearer to James III., and head of the principal branch of the house of Lee. Stephen Lockhart of Wicketshaw, or Waygateshaw, Stirlingshire, great-grandson of the first Stephen, married Grisel, daughter of Walter Carmichael of Hyndford, by whom he had three sons. William, the eldest, who succeeded him, in the reign of Charles II., was a leader of the Lanarkshire Covenanters, and one of the first to join the rising which terminated in the defeat at Rullion Green (Kirkton's Church History, p. 234), on which account his estate was forfeited. This branch became extinct in 1776, by the death, without issue, of his grandson, Sir William Lockhart Denham, baronet. The second son, Robert of Birkhill, had a horse shot under him at Bothwell Bridge and while in concealment after the battle, with other Covenanters, some of them proposed to join in a psalm of praise, from which Birkhill tried to dissuade them, as the enemy was in close pursuit. Finding his remonstrances vain, he took refuge on the top of a tree, and the soldiers of Claverhouse having come upon his friends, they shortly afterwards ended their career on the scaffold. He himself, worn out by fatigue and privations, was soon after found dead in a moss, and secretly buried after nightfall within the church of Carluke. The sword and pistols he wore at his death are preserved by his family (New Stat. Account of Scotland, vol. vi. p. 579, note.) The third son, Walter Lockhart of Kirkton, a cadet of the family of Wicketshaw, at first held a commission in the royal forces, but afterwards espoused the cause of the Covenant. He was paymaster of the forces in Scotland, and died in Edinburgh castle in 1748, aged 87.

William Lockhart of Milton-Lockhart and Germustown, eldest son of the Rev. Dr Lockhart, and half brother of John Gibson Lockhart, son-in-law of Sir Walter Scott, and grandson of William Lockhart of Birkhill, was chosen M.P. for Lanarkshire in 1841. He died Nov. 21, 1857, when he was succeeded by his younger brother, Lawrence Lockhart, D.D., minister of Inchinnan. He resigned that charge in 1860.

For the Lockharts of Cleghorn see SUPPLEMENT. Allan Elliott Lockhart of Cleghorn, Lanarkshire, and Borthwickbrae, Selkirkshire, admitted an advocate at the Scotch bar in 1824, was elected M.P. for Selkirkshire in 1846.

LOCKHART, SIR WILLIAM, of Lee, a distinguished statesman and soldier, eldest son of Sir James Lockhart, Lord Lee, was born in 1621. He received the principal part of his education in Holland, and afterwards entered the French army as a volunteer, when the queen-mother procured for him an ensign's commission. Subsequently he accompanied Lord William Hamilton to Scotland, and was appointed lieutenant-colonel of his regiment. Having been introduced to Charles I., after his surrender to the Scots army before Newark, he received the honour of knighthood from the king. He joined in the "Engagement," under the duke of Hamilton, but being captured at Preston, he remained for a year a prisoner at Newcastle, and only regained his liberty by the payment of one thousand pounds. After the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, Lockhart held a commission in the royalist army, but having been treated, on one or two occasions, with disrespect by that prince, he is said to have haughtily exclaimed, that "No king on earth should use him in that manner." He was present at the battle of Worcester, where his regiment fought bravely on the king's side. After living two years in retirement, he went to London, and was induced to accept of employment under the Commonwealth. On May 18, 1652, he was appointed by Cromwell one of the commissioners for the administration of justice in Scotland; and he recommended himself so highly to the Protector, that in 1654 the latter gave him his niece in marriage, though some writers think that the lady was a daughter of General Desborough. In the latter year, and in 1656, Lockhart represented the county of Lanark in the Scots parliament. He was also nominated one of the trustees for disposing of the forfeited estates of the royalists, and sworn a member of the Protector's privy council for Scotland

In December 1655 Sir William was appointed ambassador to France, and set out for Paris in the succeeding April At the siege of Dunkirk, in 1658, he commanded the British foot, with which he attacked and defeated the troops of Spain On obtaining possession of that important place he was appointed its governor, in which capacity he refused to open the gates to Charles II, after the death of Cromwell, even at the critical period when Monk was scheming with the king for the restoration of the monarchy Though the request to receive the king was accompanied with the most brilliant promises of reward and promotion, his answer was decided, "That he was trusted by the Commonwealth, and could not betray it" Clarendon says, that at that very time "he refused to accept the great offers made to him by the Cardinal (Mazarine), who had a high esteem of him, and offered to make him marshal of France, with great appointments of pensions, and other emoluments, if he would deliver Dunkirk and Mardyke into the hands of France, all which overtures he rejected, so that his majesty (Charles II) had no place to resort to preferable to Breda"

On the Restoration, Sir William was deprived of the government of Dunkirk, which was conferred on Sir Edward Harley By the intercession of Middleton he was allowed to return to Scotland, where he spent some years on his estate, chiefly employed in agricultural pursuits He subsequently went to reside with his wife's relations in Huntingdonshire In 1671, through the influence of the earl of Lauderdale, he was appointed ambassador from King Charles to the courts of Brandenburg and Lunenburg, when, according to Burnet, "he found he had nothing of that regard that was paid him in Cromwell's time" He died in the Netherlands, March 21, 1675, supposed to have been poisoned by a pair of gloves. Subjoined is his portrait

LOCKHART, Sir George, of Carnwath, a distinguished lawyer, second son of Sir James Lockhart, Lord Lee, one of the judges of the court of session, was admitted advocate, Jan 8, 1656, during the protectorate of Cromwell He was appointed lord advocate, May 14, 1658, having then been named advocate to the Protector during his life, "or so long as he demean himself well therein" On the Restoration he was obliged to take the oath of allegiance to Charles II and to express his regret at having accepted office under the usurper, and he was knighted by Charles in 1663 In 1672 he was elected dean of the faculty of advocates Having, in 1674, rendered himself obnoxious to government for his share in appealing a suit from the court of law to the parliament, he was, with Sir John Lauder, Sir Robert Sinclair, and others, debarred from pleading at the pleasure of the king, on which fifty of the younger advocates, to resent the insult offered to the bar, also voluntarily withdrew from practice Most of them were afterwards prevailed upon by Sir George Mackenzie to give in their submission, but Lockhart was not restored to the privileges of his profession till January 28, 1676 Two years afterwards he made a bold and eloquent defence as counsel for Mitchell, tried on his own confession, on the promise of pardon, for an attempt to shoot Archbishop Sharpe; and, in 1681, he was one of the advocates employed by the earl of Argyle at his memorable trial In the Estates of that year he took his seat as one of the commissioners for Lanarkshire, which he represented till his death In 1685 he succeeded Sir David Falconer of Newton as president of the court of session, and was soon afterwards made a privy councillor and a commissioner of the exchequer He joined in the opposition against Lauderdale, and attached himself to the party of the duke of York After that prince's accession to the throne, Lockhart was called up to London to be consulted as to the design of freeing the Roman Catholics from the penal statutes, which the king had then so much at heart. According to the account of his friends, he went along with the king, because he considered that he could be more useful to the Protestant religion by continuing in office than by retiring, and expected to moderate the designs which he durst not openly oppose This great lawyer, whom Burnet describes as "the best pleader he had ever yet known in any nation," was murdered on Sunday, March 31, 1689, on his way from church, by John Chiesley of Dalry, in consequence of having, as one of the arbiters in a suit for aliment raised by Chiesley's wife against her husband, given a decision in her favour Chiesley, for the crime, was hanged on the Wednesday following, and his body hung in chains between Leith and Edinburgh

LOCKHART, GEORGE, a zealous adherent of the Stuart family, and an able political writer, eldest son of the preceding, by Philadelphia, daughter of the fourth Lord Wharton, was born in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh in 1673 He was educated for the bar, but having succeeded to a plentiful fortune, he did not enter upon practice. In 1703 he obtained a seat in the Scottish parliament, and made himself conspicuous by his uniform opposition to the measures of the government Although adverse to the Union, he was nominated by Queen Anne one of the commissioners to that memorable treaty, and attended their meetings for the sole purpose of reporting the proceedings to his party He corresponded regularly with the exiled court on that and other public subjects, and engaged in all the intrigues which had for their object the placing the Pretender on the throne. After the ratification of the Union he represented the county of Edinburgh in the first imperial parliament. At the next election he was also returned, after a keen contest, and it was mainly by his exertions, joined to those of a small knot of Jacobite Scots members, that the obnoxious act of 1711, restoring lay patronage in the Church of Scotland, and other measures avowedly intended to be prejudicial to the Presbyterian interest, were passed in parliament Indeed, some of his proceedings, designed for the advancement of the Pretender's cause, were so violent, that even his own friends procured an order from the court of St Germains, recommending him to be more moderate in his conduct.

On the attempt to extend the malt-tax to Scotland in 1713, he and the earls of Mar, Eglinton, and Ilay, and others, thought that occasion a favourable opportunity to endeavour to obtain a repeal of the Union, a project in which they nearly succeeded He also zealously opposed the subsequent proposal to assimilate the Scottish to the English militia, and his conduct regarding that measure recommended him to the duke of Argyle, who, when he was arrested in August 1715, on suspicion of being a party to the designs in favour of the Pretender, procured his liberation, after fifteen days' imprisonment in the castle of Edinburgh Having, on obtaining his liberty, made some preparations for joining the earl of Mar, he was shortly after apprehended a second time, and again committed to Edinburgh castle, where he endured a long imprisonment, but, on the intercession of his friends, there not being sufficient evidence to connect him actively with the rebellion, he was at last set at liberty

After this period, Lockhart acted as a sort of confidential agent between the Pretender and his Scottish adherents, and displayed astonishing ardour in the cause he supported A correspondence between him and the exiled prince, which had been continued from 1718 to 1727, having been intercepted by the government, a warrant was issued for his apprehension, on which he escaped into England. He remained in concealment at Durham for some time, and then retired to Holland In April 1728 he was allowed to return home, and having made a reluctant submission to the reigning monarch, he lived unmolested on his estate in Scotland till 1732, when he was unfortunately killed in a duel By his wife, Euphemia, daughter of the ninth earl of Eglinton, whom he married in 1697, he had seven sons and eight daughters

His principal work, the 'Memoirs of Scotland, from the Accession of Queen Anne till the Union,' was first published, although without his consent, in 1714 His 'Papers on the Affairs of Scotland, from 1720 to 1725,' were not printed till 1817, when they appeared in 2 volumes 4to

LOCKHART-ROSS, Sir John, an eminent naval commander, was born in the parish of Carstairs, Lanarkshire, November 11, 1721 From his earliest years he discovered a strong predilection for a seafaring life, and in 1735 entered as a midshipman in the navy Having, while first lieutenant to Sir Peter Warren and Lord Anson, shown proofs of uncommon ability, diligence, and valour, he was in 1747 appointed to the command of the Vulcan fireship In 1755, upon the appearance of a rupture with France, he was nominated to the Savage sloop of war, and in March 1756 to the Tartar frigate In the latter ship he performed many bold actions, which raised his name in the navy In November 1758, he was appointed to the Chatham of 50 guns, under the orders of Admiral Hawke, and in the action between the British and French fleets in July 1778, he commanded the Shrewsbury, 74 In 1779 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the Blue, when he hoisted his flag on board of the Royal George, and sailed under the orders of Admiral Rodney The fleet fell in with eleven Spanish ships of the line, and having engaged them, they took the Spanish admiral and six of his ships, besides one blown up in the action He afterwards superintended, amidst a tremendous fire, the landing of the stores for the relief of Gibraltar. In April 1782 he was appointed to the command of a squadron in the North Seas His health declining, he returned to England, but the conclusion of hostilities rendered his re-appointment unnecessary Upon succeeding to the estate of his maternal uncle, General Ross, he assumed that name in addition to his own. In 1768 he was elected M P for Lanark; and in 1780, on the death of his elder brother, he became a baronet of Nova Scotia He died June 9, 1790. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Dundas of Arniston, lord president of the court of session, by whom he had five sons and five daughters; and was succeeded by his eldest son (See Ross)

LOCKHART, John Gibson, LL D, an eminent critic and novelist, was born in Glasgow in 1793 He was the son of the Rev Dr John Lockhart, at one time minister of Cambusnethan, and afterwards of the College or Blackfriars' church, Glasgow, by his second marriage with a daughter of the Rev Dr Gibson, one of the ministers of Edinburgh The eldest son of Dr Lockhart, by his first marriage, William Lockhart, Esq of Milton Lockhart and Germilstown, representative of the Lockharts of Waygateshaw and Birkhill, was elected M P for Lanarkshire in 1841 The subject of this notice received his education in his native city He distinguished himself at the university, and was elected to one of the Snell exhibitions or bursaries at Baliol college, Oxford Having chosen the law for his profession, he was admitted an advocate before the Scotch courts in 1816 He made, however, but few appearances at the bar, and soon turned his attention to the more congenial pursuits of literature In 1817 Blackwood's Magazine was established, and he soon became a regular contributor to its pages He had previously tried his hand on the 'Lacunar Strivilense,' and one or two other pieces of task-work for the booksellers

In 1818 Mr Lockhart made the acquaintance of his future father-in-law, Sir (then Mr) Walter Scott, in his Memoirs of whom he thus states the circumstance "It was during the sitting of the General Assembly of the Kirk in May 1818 that I first had the honour of meeting Scott in private society, the party was not a large one, at the house of a much valued common friend, Mr Home Drummond of Blair-Drummond, the grandson of Lord Kames Mr Scott, ever apt to consider too favourably the literary efforts of others, and more especially of very young persons, received me, when I was presented to him, with a cordiality which I had not been prepared to expect from one filling a station so exalted. This, however, is the same story that every individual, who ever met him under similar circumstances, has had to tell When the ladies retired from the dinner-table, I happened to sit next him, and he, having heard that I had lately returned from a tour in Germany, made that country and its recent literature the subject of some conversation" A few days after this, Mr Lockhart received a communication from the Messrs Ballantyne, to the effect that Mr Scott's various avocations had prevented him from fulfilling his agreement with them as to the historical department of the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1816, and that it would be acceptable to him as well as them, if he could undertake to supply it This Mr Lockhart agreed to do, and he had, in consequence, occasion to meet Scott pretty often afterwards In October of the same year he visited Abbotsford for the first time, when he and Professor Wilson, the Christopher North of Blackwood's Magazine, were invited there together, on their return from an excursion to Wilson's villa of Elleralie on the lake of Windermere In 1819 Mr Lockhart published what he calls himself "a sort of mock tour in Scotland," entitled 'Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk,' which gave rise to much angry feeling at the time The literary portraits therein contained are remarkable for their substantial truth, and their never-failing force and vivacity Soon after its publication Sir Walter Scott wrote him a letter, in which he says "What an acquisition it would have been to our general information to have had such a work written, I do not say fifty, but even five and twenty years ago, and how much of grave and gay might then have been preserved, as it were, in amber, which have now mouldered away When I think that at an age not much younger than yours, I knew Black, Ferguson, Robertson, Erskine, Adam Smith, John Home, &c &c., and at least saw Burns, I can appreciate better than any one the value of a work which, like this, would have handed them down to posterity in their living colours"

Besides, month after month, contributing some of its most biting and most brilliant papers to Blackwood's Magazine, Mr Lockhart published four admirable fictions, which took a high place among similar works of the time. These were 'Valerius,' the finest classic story in English literature; 'Adam Blair,' considered the most impressive production of its author's versatile pen, 'Reginald Dalton,' a graceful and vigorous tale; and the deeply interesting chapters of 'Matthew Wald' His translations from the Spanish Ballads appeared soon after the publication of the last of these works To 'Constable's Miscellany,' he contributed the 'Life of Burns,' and to 'Murray's Family Library' the 'Life of Napoleon Bonaparte' On the 29th April 1820 he married Sophia Scott, the eldest daughter of the great novelist.

While on a visit to London, in 1821, having in the course of some severe remarks been styled in the London Magazine, editor of Blackwood's Magazine, then distinguished for its venom and scurrility, a hostile correspondence ensued between Mr Lockhart and Mr John Scott, the editor of the former periodical, author of 'A Visit to Paris in 1814,' and other works, which ended in Mr Lockhart posting him Statements were published by both parties on the subject. After Mr Lockhart's return to Scotland, Mr Christie, his friend, fought a duel with Mr Scott, who was mortally wounded, and died a few days after

In July 1825 he accompanied his illustrious father-in-law in his excursion to Ireland Up to the close of that year, he resided in Edinburgh, having his summer residence at Chiefswood, in the neighbourhood of Abbotsford, but, on being then, on the death of the celebrated William Gifford, appointed editor of the Quarterly Review, he went to reside in Regent's Park, London That great literary journal he edited for the long period of twenty-eight years Often a severe judge of men of known name or established reputation, he was indulgent, kind, and encouraging to rising merit. Where more substantial aid was required, his purse was freely opened, and many an unfortunate man of letters has felt, in the hour of need, how liberal and considerate was the bounty of him who had been regarded only as the stern and unsparing critic.

On the death of Sir Walter Scott in 1832, he became his sole literary executor, and in 1837-8 he published the Life of his father-in-law, in 7 vols., which is one of the most interesting biographies in the English language. His Memoirs of the Life of his father-in-law led to the publication by the Trustees and son of the late Mr James Ballantyne, of a pamphlet, entitled 'Refutation of the Mis-statements and Calumnies contained in Mr Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott, Baronet, respecting Messrs Ballantyne' London, 1838, 12mo Mr Lockhart soon after published an answer, under the title given below, and to this his opponents rejoined with 'A Reply' London, 1839, 12mo

Mrs Lockhart died in May 1837, having survived by five years her first-born son, John Hugh Lockhart — the "Hugh Littlejohn" of the 'Tales of a Grandfather' Her other son, Walter Scott Lockhart Scott, died in January 1853 Her daughter, Charlotte, married in August, 1847, James Robert Hope, Esq, who, on obtaining Abbotsford, in her right, assumed the additional name of Scott

Mr Lockhart's health had begun to decline some years before 1853, in the summer of which year he quitted the charge of the Quarterly Review He spent the subsequent winter in Italy, and shortly before his death he retired from London to the quiet seclusion of Abbotsford, where he died August 25, 1854, and was buried at Dryburgh Abbey Those who saw him in his daily walk in London, his handsome countenance—always with a lowering and sardonic expression—now darkened with sadness, and the thin lips compressed more than ever, as by pain of mind, forgave, in respectful compassion for one so visited, all causes of quarrel, however just, and threw themselves, as it were, into his mind, seeing again the early pranks with Christopher North, the dinings by the brook at Chiefswood, the glories of the Abbotsford sporting parties, the travels with Scott, so like an ovation, in Ireland, and the home in Regent's Park, with the gentle Sophia presiding These scenes formed a marked contrast with the actual forlornness of his last years.

Logan, a surname derived from a word signifying a low lying or flat country Logan in Ayrshire and Laggan in Inverness-shire are but different forms of the same word This surname is very ancient in Scotland. Dominus Robertus de Logan is mentioned in a charter in the 12th year of the reign of Alexander II, and Thomas de Logan is witness in one of John de Strathern in 1278.

Among the Scots barons who in 1296 swore allegiance to Edward I. of England was Walter Logan in Lanarkshire Several others of the same name also swore fealty to him, and one of them, Sir Allan Logan, knight, was compelled by that monarch to serve during his wars in Guienne In 1306, Dominus Walterus Logan, having been, with many others, taken prisoner, was hanged at Durham, in presence of Edward of Carnarvon, the king's son, afterwards Edward II In 1329, Sir Robert Logan was in the train of barons who accompanied the good Sir James Douglas, with the heart of Bruce, on his way to the Holy Land, on which account the Logans bear a man's heart in their arms. In the battle with the Moors in Spain, in which Douglas lost his life, in attempting the rescue of their friend Lord Sinclair, both Sir Robert Seton and Sir Walter Logan were slain

The principal family of the name was designed of Lastalrig or Restalrig, commonly called Lasterrick, a barony lying between Edinburgh and the sea, on which the greater part of South Leith is now erected They obtained possession of these lands by marriage during the reign of Robert I, and soon attained to such a height of power and influence that Sir Robert Logan of Restalrig married a daughter of King Robert II. by his wife, Euphemia Ross.

On 31st May 1398, Sir Robert Logan, who, two years afterwards, was appointed admiral of Scotland, granted to the town of Edinburgh by charter a right to waste lands in the vicinity of the harbour of Leith, for the erection of quays and wharfs, and for the loading of goods, and a liberty to have shops and granaries erected, and to make roads through his barony In February 1413, he granted it another charter, restraining the inhabitants of Leith from carrying on any sort of trade, from possessing warehouses or shops, and from keeping inns or houses of entertainment for strangers, thus placing the port of Leith entirely under the government and control of Edinburgh In 1424, he was one of the hostages given on the liberation of James I His son, or grandson, John Logan of Restalrig, was in 1444 made principal sheriff of Edinburgh by King James II In 1555, Logan of Restalrig sold the superiority of the town of Leith to the queen regent, Mary of Lorraine. Some of the Logans of Restalrig were lord provosts of Edinburgh.

The last of the family who possessed the barony was Robert Logan of Restalrig, a scheming and profligate personage, described by one of his contemporaries as "ane godles, drunkin, and debosh'it man," and by Sir Walter Scott, as "one of the darkest characters of that dark age," whose name in connexion with the Gowrie conspiracy is well known. By his marriage about 1580 with a daughter of Sir Patrick Home of Fast castle in Berwickshire, he became proprietor of that fortress and the land adjoining, with the estate of Gunsgreen, in the same county He gave the turbulent earl of Bothwell harbour in his gloomy stronghold of Fast castle, when proscribed by the general voice of the nation There he also shut himself up, in June 1596, when outlawed for having refused to stand trial on a charge of highway robbery By a very singular contract (preserved in the charter chest of Lord Napier) entered into in July 1594, between Logan and Napier of Merchiston, the celebrated inventor of the Logarithms, the latter bound himself to use "all craft and engyne" to discover a treasure alleged to have been hidden within Logan's dwelling of Fast castle, and for his reward he was to have the exact third of what was found, and to be safely guarded by Logan back to Edinburgh And in case he should find nothing, he referred the satisfaction of his travel and pains to the discretion of Logan That Napier had reason to repent of his agreement with the unprincipled character he had leagued himself with appears from the terms of a lease granted by him the same year, by which his tenant is prohibited from subletting his land to any one who should bear the surname of Logan

Besides his other possessions, the laird of Restalrig was proprietor of a considerable part of the estate of Auchencraw, in Berwickshire. In 1596 he sold his estate of Nether Gogar, near Edinburgh, to Andrew Logan of Coalfield, and in 1604 his barony of Restalrig to Lord Balmerino

His correspondence with the earl of Gowrie commenced in July 1600 The supposed intention of the conspirators was to have conveyed the king, after his seizure, into a boat on the Tay, at the bottom of the garden of Gowrie House, and to conduct him by sea to captivity in Fast castle Logan's reward was to have been the earl's lands of Dirleton in East Lothian, which he accounted to be the pleasantest dwelling in all Scotland, as he states in one of his letters to John Bour, called Laird Bour, the individual through whom the correspondence passed between the parties. Logan died in 1606, and two years afterwards, one George Sprott, a notary public of Eyemouth, was apprehended for being privy to the Gowrie conspiracy, when several letters of Logan, which had been found in his house, were produced in evidence against him From this man's confessions it appears that, one day in the month of July preceding the failure of the plot, while he was in Fast castle, he heard Logan read a letter to Bour, which the latter had brought from the earl of Gowrie, when Bour said, "Sir, if ye think to make any commoditie by this dealing, lay your hand to your heart." Logan answered that he would do as he thought best, and added, "Howbeit he should sell all his owne land that he had in the world, he would passe thorow with the earl of Gowrie; for that matter would give him greater contentment nor if he had the whole kingdome; and rather or hee should falsifie his promise, and recall his vow that he had vowed to the earl of Gowrie, he should spend all that he had in the world, and hazard his life with his lordship." Bour replied, "You may do as you please, Sir, but it is not my counsell, that you should be so sudden in that other matter. But for the condition of Dirleton, I would like very well of it." "Content yourself," said Logan, "I am at my wit's end." Soon afterwards, in a fatal hour for himself, Sprott questioned Bour on the subject. The latter informed him he believed that his master should get Dirlton "without either golde or silver, but that he feared it should be as deare unto him:" and on Sprott inquiring how that could be, he added, "they had another pas in hand nor the selling of any land," but begged him that "for God's sake he would let bee, and not trouble himself with the laird's business; for he feared, within a few days, the laird would either be landless or lifeless." The letters were afterwards given by Bour to Sprott for safekeeping. About Christmas 1602, Bour informed Logan that he had been so rash as to show them to him, when he was so much alarmed as to offer Sprott a bribe of twelve pounds to remain silent on the subject, which was accepted. Sprott was executed 12th August 1608; and in accordance with an ancient usage of the criminal law of Scotland, Logan's bones were exhumed from his grave, and exhibited in court, when the sentence of forfeiture was pronounced against him, and in consequence Fast castle, Gunsgreen, and his other estates were lost to his family The earl of Dunbar got most of his lands. His letters to the earl of Gowrie and his brother have been published in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials. Logan, in his Clans, vol. ii. says that the forfeiture was accompanied by proscription of the name, so that, as in the case of the clan Gregor, it was illegal for any one to bear the surname of Logan, and that many families took other names.

Logan mentions a Celtic clan of the name in Easter Rossshire, one of the chiefs of which, called Gilliegorm, from his dark complexion, married a relative of Lord Lovat, but having had a disagreement with the Frasers, the second Lord Lovat, being joined by some of the M'Raes, marched with his clan from the Aird, when a sanguinary battle took place, in the muir above Kessock, where Logan was slain with most part of his clansmen His lands were plundered, and his wife carried off A son, of which she was soon after delivered, being weakly and deformed, was allowed to live, and was called Crotach or the Humpbacked. Being educated by the monks of Beauly, he took holy orders, and founded the churches of Kilmuir in Skye and Kilichrinan in Glenelg. He seems, says Logan, to have had a dispensation to marry, for he left several children, one of whom, according to a common practice, became a devotee of Finan, a popular Highland saint, and was the progenitor of the M'Lennans (see MACLENNAN).

The last Logan of Logan in Ayrshire, was celebrated for his wit and eccentricity, and an amusing work called 'The Laird of Logan,' was published, soon after his death, in Glasgow, being a compilation of anecdotes and puns, only a small portion of which he could have given utterance to. He left an only daughter, who married a Mr Campbell.

The Logan water in Lanarkshire has been celebrated in song by many Scottish poets, particularly by Mr John Mayne and Burns.

LOGAN, JAMES, a Quaker of some eminence as a scholar, was born in Scotland about 1674 He accompanied William Penn in his last voyage to Pennsylvania, where, for many years, he was employed in public business, and became chief justice and governor of the province. He wrote several scientific treatises in Latin, a list of which is subjoined. One of these, on the Generation of Plants, was translated into English by Dr Fothergill, and published at London in 1747 In his latter years he lived in retirement at his country seat, near Germantown, where he carried on a correspondence with some of the most distinguished literary men in Europe. He died in 1751, leaving his library to the inhabitants of Pennsylvania. His works are

This author also made a Version of Cicero de Senectute, which was published, with Notes, by Dr Franklin

LOGAN, GEORGE, a popular preacher and controversialist, was born in 1698 He is conjectured to have been the son of George Logan, a descendant of the Ayrshire family of Logan of Logan, by his wife, the daughter of the Rev Mr Cunningham, minister of Old Cumnock He was educated for the church at the university of Glasgow, where he obtained the degree of M A in 1696 In 1702 he was licensed to preach, and in April 1707 he was ordained minister of the parish of Lauder In January 1719 he was translated to the parish of Sprouston, near Kelso His high reputation as a preacher next procured him an invitation from Dunbar, of which place he was inducted minister in January 1722, and in December 1732 he was admitted one of the ministers of Edinburgh In May 1740 he was chosen moderator of the General Assembly which deposed Ebenezer Erskine and other ministers, a proceeding that gave rise to the Secession During the rebellion of 1745, while the Highlanders had possession of Edinburgh, Logan, with most of the city clergy, quitted the town, and his house, situated near the Castlehill, was occupied by the rebels as a guardhouse. He afterwards entered into a tedious and unpleasant controversy with Mr Thomas Ruddiman, relative to the hereditary right of the Stuart race of kings, and the legitimacy of Robert III., arising out of the latter's edition of Buchanan's works Logan died October 13, 1755 His works are

LOGAN, JOHN, an eminent poet, was born at Soutra, in the parish of Fala, Mid-Lothian, in 1748 He was the son of a small farmer, a member of the Burgher communion, who intended him for the ministry of that religious sect, but he himself preferred taking orders in the Established church. Having received the early part of his education at the parish school of Gosford, in East Lothian, he removed to the university of Edinburgh, and after completing his theological course, he was, in 1768, on the recommendation of Dr Blair, engaged by Mr Sinclair of Ulbster as tutor to his eldest son, afterwards the celebrated Sir John Sinclair, baronet He did not, however, remain long in this situation In 1770 Mr Logan edited the poetical remains of his friend and fellow-student, Michael Bruce, and afterwards claimed as his own some of the pieces which were introduced into the volume

Having been licensed by the presbytery of Edinburgh, Mr Logan speedily acquired popularity as a preacher, and in 1773 he was ordained minister of the parish of South Leith Soon after he was appointed one of the General Assembly's committee for revising the psalmody of the Church, and was the author of several of the paraphrases in the Assembly's approved collection, published in 1781, and now used in public worship In the college session 1779-80 he commenced reading a public course of lectures on the philosophy of history, in St Mary's chapel, Edinburgh, which he continued in the ensuing winter He acquired so much reputation by these lectures, that on a vacancy occurring in the professorship of civil history in the university, he was encouraged to offer himself as a candidate for it, but was unsuccessful, Mr Fraser Tytler, afterwards Lord Woodhouselee, being appointed to the chair In 1781 he published an Analysis of that portion of his lectures which related to ancient history, in one volume 8vo, under the title of 'Elements of the Philosophy of History,' and this was, in 1782, followed by one of his lectures entire, 'On the Manners and Governments of Asia.' The same year he published a volume of his poems, which had a favourable reception, and soon reached a second edition In 1783 he produced the Tragedy of 'Runnamede,' which was put in rehearsal by Mr Harris, then manager of Covent Garden Theatre, but the lord chamberlain refused to license it, on account of some of its political allusions It was afterwards acted at Edinburgh, though with no great success

His conduct having rendered him very unpopular with his parishioners, he was induced to resign his charge, on receiving a moderate annuity out of the stipend He then went to London, and was engaged as a contributor to the 'English Review,' and other periodicals In 1788 he published, without his name, a pamphlet, entitled 'A Review of the principal Charges against Mr Warren Hastings,' which, being construed as a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons, caused a prosecution of the publisher, Mr Stockdale, but the jury found a verdict in his favour Logan died, after a lingering illness, December 28, 1788, in the 40th year of his age By his will he bequeathed £600 in small legacies to his friends, to be paid from the money realised from the sale of his books and MSS, among which were two completed Tragedies, and the first Act of a third, and appointed Dr Robertson and Dr Grant his executors —His works are

Poems on several occasions, by Michael Bruce. 1770 In this edition of the Works of a youth, who died at the age of 21, the Editor inserted several pieces of his own, without specifying them.

LOTHIAN, a surname derived from the district of that name lying on the south side of the Frith of Forth, the origin and meaning of which are unknown Chalmers (Caledonia, vol. i p. 258) thinks that the name was imposed by the Gothic people who took possession of the country on the withdrawal of the Romans. In old charters it is written Lawdonia, and sometimes Laodenia. Buchanan calls it in Latin Lothiana, and says that it was so named from Lothus, a king of the Picts, but no such name appears in the Pictish Chronicle as that of one of the Pictish kings. In the Teutonic language of the German jurists, says Chalmers, Lot-ting, Lothing, or Lodding, signifies a special jurisdiction on the marches, and in a note he states that in Orkney the senate or head court was called in the ancient language of the country Lawting This is more likely to have been the origin of the name than any other that has been hazarded.

LOTHIAN, earl of (1606), and marquis of (1701), a title in the Scottish peerage possessed by the noble family of Kerr of Fernichirst, descended from Mark Kerr, second son of Sir Andrew Kerr of Cessford In 1546 he became abbot of Newbottle, now Newbattle, in the eastern division of the county of Edinburgh, and renouncing popery in 1560, he subsequently held his benefice under the title of commendator He obtained the vicarage of Linton in Peebles-shire, 26th March 1564, and was one of the lords who met on Queen Mary's side at Hamilton in June 1567 His portrait is subjoined:

Nominated one of the extraordinary lords of session 20th April 1569, he, the Lord Boyd, and the justice-clerk, were, by one of the conditions of the pacification of Perth, concluded in February 1578, "appointed sole judges on the south syd of Forth, in all actions for restitution of goods spuilzied in the recent troubles." (Hist. of King James Sext, p. 132.) He appears to have sided with the earls of Athol and Argyle against Morton in 1578, and in 1581 he obtained a ratification by parliament of his commendatorship. In the following year, after the Raid of Ruthven, he was employed by the duke of Lennox to propose terms to the lords conspirators, but was unsuccessful. He died in 1584. He had four sons and a daughter George, the third son, is mentioned by Robertson, as an emissary from the Catholic noblemen to the court of Spain in 1592.

Mark, the eldest son, first earl of Lothian, was appointed master of requests, 20th March 1577, which office was confirmed to him in 1581 He had a reversion of the commendatorship of Newbottle abbey from Queen Mary, and, on the death of his father, it was ratified to him by letters under the great seal, 24th August, 1584. He was appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session in his father's place, 12th November of the same year He had the lands of Newbottle erected into a barony by charter, 28th July 1587, and the baronies of Prestongrange and Newbottle being united into the lordship of Newbottle, he was created a lord of parliament, 15th October 1591 He was one of the commissioners for holding the parliament in 1597, and, the same year, was appointed collector-general of a tax of £200,000, then granted to King James VI He was named vice-chancellor, in the absence of the earl of Dunfermline, 9th October 1604, and was created earl of Lothian, by patent, dated at Whitehall, 10th February 1606, to him and the heirs male of his body He died 8th April 1609 In Douglas' Peerage, it is stated that he had four sons and seven daughters, but Scotstarvet (p. 104) says that he had thirty-one children by his wife, Margaret Maxwell, daughter of Lord Harris. He adds that her ladyship was addicted to the black art, and that this at last proved fatal to the earl "That lady thereafter being vexed with a cancer in her breast, implored the help of a notable warlock by a byname called Playfair, who condescended to heal her, but with condition, that the sore should fall on them she loved best, whereunto she agreeing did convalesce, but the earl her husband found the boil in his throat, of which he died shortly thereafter" His third daughter, Lady Margaret Kerr, whose first husband was the seventh Lord Yester, was the founder of Lady Yester's church at Edinburgh She died 15th March 1647, aged 75

Robert, second earl, appointed master of requests, 8th April 1606, had, by his countess, Lady Annabella Campbell, second daughter of the seventh earl of Argyle, two daughters, and being without male issue, he made over his estates and titles, with the king's approbation, to the elder of them, Lady Anne Kerr, and the heirs of her body She accordingly succeeded thereto at his death, 15th July 1624. His next brother, however, Sir William Kerr of Blackhope, assumed the title of earl of Lothian, but was interdicted from using it by the lords of council, 8th March 1632 Anne, countess of Lothian, married William, eldest son of Robert Kerr, first earl of Ancrum, and thus carried the title into the house of Fernihirst.

The first of that house, Ralph Kerr, settling in Teviotdale about 1330, obtained lands on the water of Jed, of which the earls of Douglas were superiors, and called them Kershaugh He died about 1350. His grandson, Andrew Kerr of Kershaugh, was cupbearer to King Robert II. Andrew Kerr of Kershaugh, the grandson of the latter, accompanied the earl of Douglas to Rome in 1450, and is particularly described in a passport from the king of England. The latter's great-grandson built the castle of Fernihirst, in the middle of Jedburgh forest, and is designed of Fernihirst in the records of parliament, 1476.

His eldest son, Sir Andrew Kerr of Fernihirst, rendered himself remarkable by his border exploits against England in the reigns of James IV and V. His castle of Fernihirst was besieged by the earl of Surrey and Lord Dacre in 1523, and after a gallant defence, surrendered 24th September of that year At the time that James V was little better than a captive in the hands of the Douglases, a summons of treason was raised against him for not attending the earl of Angus, lieutenant and warden of the marches, and for engaging in factions against his majesty He appeared personally in presence of the king and Estates in parliament, 20th July 1526, when he was declared innocent of all the points laid to his charge. He was guardian of the middle marches, and one of the commissioners to treat of a peace with England in 1528. In 1542 he obtained the hereditary office of bailie of Jedburgh forest, and died in 1545

His second son and successor, Sir John Kerr of Fernihirst, appointed warden of the middle marches in 1548, was knighted by the regent Arran (duke of Chatelherault) for his services in repelling the incursions of the English on the borders. In 1549, after a severe struggle, he retook his castle of Fernihirst, with the aid of the French troops under D'Esse, then stationed in Jedburgh He and his kinsman, William Kerr of Cessford, had a letter of remission under the great seal, for being art and part in the murder of Sir Walter Scott of Branxholm, knight, in October 1552 He died in July 1562

The eldest of his three sons, Sir Thomas Kerr of Fernihirst, distinguished himself by his adherence to Queen Mary, and on her account suffered, at different periods, fourteen years' banishment. In October 1565 he attended the queen and Darnley to Dumfries, to assist in quelling an insurrection of the nobles at the time of the Roundabout Raid On this occasion they commanded him to raise the royal standard at the head of his followers, and the queen placed herself under his immediate protection. On Mary's escape from Lochleven in May 1568, he joined her standard at Hamilton. In January 1570, the day after the murder of the regent Moray, he and Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch swept over the borders at the head of their vassals, with fire and sword, in the hope of kindling between the two countries a war that might prove advantageous to the interests of the captive queen Mary By way of retaliation, the earl of Sussex and Lord Hunsdon, in April of the same year, entered Scotland, and after ravaging the neighbouring country, demolished the castle of Fernihirst. The castle was not rebuilt till 1598 In September 1571 Sir Thomas Kerr was one of those who were engaged in the Raid of Stirling when the regent Lennox was killed. He joined his father-in-law, the chivalrous Kirkcaldy of Grange, in the defence of Edinburgh castle. He had removed to that fortress his family charter chest, and on its surrender in 1573, it was seized by the regent Morton, and never recovered He afterwards sought refuge on the continent, but in 1579 was allowed by King James VI to return to Scotland, and in 1581 he was restored to the possession of his whole estates, which had been forfeited. Soon after he again went into exile, but on 26th November, 1583, he obtained a full remission from his majesty, under the great seal In Midsummer 1585 he and Sir John Foster, the English warden of the marches, met, according to the custom of the borders, when a fray took place, in which Sir Francis Russell, son of the earl of Bedford, was killed. To appease Queen Elizabeth,

Sir Thomas Kerr was committed to ward in Aberdeen, where he died in 1566. By his first wife, Janet, daughter of Sir William Kirkcaldy of Grange, governor of the castle of Edinburgh, he had, with two daughters, a son, Sir Andrew Kerr, and by his second wife, Janet, sister of Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, one daughter and three sons. The latter were, Sir James Kerr of Cralling, who succeeded his brother; Thomas, on whom his father bestowed the lands of Oxenham; and Robert, the infamous favourite of King James, known in English history as Carr, earl of Somerset. He was first a page to the king, whom he attended to England, and at his coronation was invested with the order of the Bath Subsequently he went to France, where he spent four years, and in 1607 returned to the English court. At a tilting match, Richard Lord Dingwall made choice of him to present his shield and device to the king, but while dismounting from his horse, he was thrown, and his leg broken By the king's orders he was lodged in the court, and his majesty visited him often during his confinement. On his recovery he was appointed a gentleman of the bedchamber, and became the king's principal favourite. He was created viscount of Rochester, 25th March 1612, and in May following installed knight of the Garter In 1613 he was constituted high-treasurer of Scotland, and on 3d November of the same year created earl of Somerset and baron of Brancepath He was also made chamberlain of the household, and sworn a privy councillor He married, in the chapel of Whitehall, in the presence of the king and queen, 26th December 1613, Lady Frances Howard, third daughter of the first earl of Suffolk, the divorced wife of Robert earl of Essex. He and his countess were tried and condemned for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, 24th May 1616. Sir Thomas had ventured to dissuade the earl from marrying the divorced countess, and through their contrivance he was sent to the Tower, where he was poisoned Somerset and his guilty wife, after a confinement in the Tower till January 1622, were ultimately pardoned in 1624. The earl died at London in July 1645, when his titles became extinct. His only child, Lady Anne Carr, married the first duke of Bedford, and was the mother of Lord Russell.

Sir Andrew Kerr, the eldest son of Sir Thomas, obtained in March 1587, from James VI, a grant of the bailiary of the lands and baronies of Jedburgh abbey, and in 1591 he was appointed one of the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber He was created a peer by the title of Lord Jedburgh, by patent, dated at Newmarket 2d February 1622, to him and his heirs male and successors in the family of Fernihirst, bearing the name and arms of Kerr He died in 1631, without surviving issue His only son, Sir Andrew Kerr, master of Jedburgh, was in 1618 appointed captain of the king's guard, and sworn a privy councillor On 8th November 1628 he was constituted one of the extraordinary lords of session, and died 20th December following, without issue. His wife was the relict of Lord Yester, already mentioned as the foundress of Lady Yester's church at Edinburgh.

On his brother's death, Sir James Kerr of Cralling became second Lord Jedburgh, but did not assume the title. He died in 1645 His son, Robert, third Lord Jedburgh, obtained from King Charles II a confirmation of that peerage to him and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to William, master of Newbottle, son of the marquis of Lothian, and his nearest lawful male heirs, by patent dated 11th July 1670. He died 4th August 1692, without issue, whereby the title of Lord Jedburgh devolved on William Lord Newbottle, who sat and voted as soon as parliament. The representation of the family in the male line came to Robert, earl of Lothian, descended from Robert Kerr of Ancrum, third son of Sir Andrew Kerr of Fernihirst, the famous border chieftain. Robert's son, William Kerr of Ancrum, was assassinated by Robert Kerr, younger of Cessford, in 1589, when the disputes about the seniority of the families of Fernihirst and Cessford ran so high. He had two sons, Sir Robert, first earl of Ancrum, a memoir of whom is given at page 587 of this volume, under the name of KERR, SIR ROBERT, and William of Lintoun, groom of the bedchamber to James VI. and Charles I, who, for his signal services on the borders, received from the former a pension of £1,000 a-year for life

Lord Ancrum's eldest son, William, married Ann, countess of Lothian in her own right, and with her he got the lordship of Newbottle The account of the death of her father, the second earl of Lothian, is thus given by Calderwood: "Upon Satterday, the 6th of Marche, (1624) Sir Robert Ker, Earle of Lothian, went up earlie in the morning to a chamber in the Place of Newbottle, pretending he was gone to lay accounts and write missives, and commandit that none come toward him for an houre. He barreth the chamber doore, and cuttes his owne throat with a knife, efter he had given himself sundrie wounds with his dagger Some imputed this desperate course to the great debtts which were lying on his hands, others to consulting with magicians and witches." (Hist. of Kirk of Scotland, vol vii. p. 596) The countess' husband, William Kerr, was created third earl of Lothian 31st October 1631 In 1638 he joined the Covenanters, and after the pacification of Berwick in the following year, he waited on the king at that place. In 1640 he was in the Scottish army that invaded England, and after defeating the royalists at Newburn, took possession of Newcastle, of which place he was appointed governor In 1641 he was one of the four commissioners of the treasury In 1642 he had the command of a regiment in the army sent to quell the rebellion in Ireland. In 1643 he was sent from Scotland by the privy council, with the approbation of Charles I, to make some propositions to the court of France, relative to certain privileges of the Scottish nation On his return he repaired to the king at Oxford, where he was detained by his majesty's order, under suspicion of treachery, and being committed close prisoner to Bristol castle, he remained there several months. In 1644 he and the marquis of Argyle commanded the forces sent against the marquis of Montrose, who was obliged to retreat. On delivering up his commission to the committee of Estates, Lord Lothian received an act of approbation of his services. He was president of the committee despatched by parliament to the king in December 1646, with their last propositions, which were refused. He protested against the "Engagement" in 1648, and when it was declared unlawful by parliament in January 1649, his lordship was appointed secretary of state, in room of the earl of Lanark, deprived by the act of classes. He was one of the commissioners sent to remonstrate in name of the kingdom of Scotland, with the parliament of England, against using any violence or indignity upon the person of the king, when he was put under arrest, and sent with a guard to Gravesend, to be shipped to Scotland On his return he received the thanks of the Scots Estates for his conduct on this occasion. With the earl of Cassillis, he was despatched to Breda in 1649, to invite King Charles II to Scotland He died in 1675.

His eldest son, Robert, fourth earl, served with distinction, as a volunteer, in the Dutch war in 1673. Sworn a privy councillor 4th January 1689, after the Revolution, which he heartily supported, he was a privy councillor to King Wil-lian. He was justice-general, and lord high commissioner to the General Assembly of the church of Scotland in 1692. He was created marquis of Lothian, by patent dated at Kensington, 23d June 1701, and died 18th February 1703. He had five sons and five daughters. His second son, Lord Charles Kerr, was appointed director of the chancery in 1703. Lord Robert, the third son, was an officer in the army Lord Mark, the fourth son, a distinguished officer, was wounded in the arm at the battle of Almansa, 25th April 1707, and acted as brigadier-general at the capture of Vigo. He was appointed governor of Guernsey in 1740, and of the castle of Edinburgh 30th January 1745 He ranked as general in the army from 1743, and died 2d February 1752 Punctilious in points of honour, and somewhat frivolous in manner, he fought several duels, sometimes on very trivial occasions.

William second marquis of Lothian, the eldest son, succeeded to the title of Lord Jedburgh in 1692, and sat in the Scots parliament as such He was invested with the order of the Thistle in 1705. Active in bringing about the Union between the two kingdoms, he voted for it on every occasion In 1708 he became lieutenant-general in the army In 1715 he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and appointed major-general on the staff in Scotland. He died at London 28th February 1722 in his 61st year, and was buried in Westminster abbey He married his cousin-german, Lady Jean Campbell, daughter of Archibald earl of Argyle beheaded in 1685, sister of the first duke of Argyle

His only son, William, third marquis, voted as Lord Jedburgh, at the election of Scots representative peers in 1712 After succeeding to the family titles, he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, 19th February 1731, and four times re-elected—the last time in 1754 In 1734 he became a knight of the Thistle, and was lord high-commissioner to the church of Scotland from 1732 to 1738, both inclusive. In 1739 he was appointed lord-clerk-register of Scotland, an office which he resigned in 1756 He died 28th July 1767 He had, with one daughter, two sons. Lord Robert Kerr, the second son, a youth of great promise, captain of the grenadier company of Barrel's foot (the 4th regiment), was the only person of distinction killed on the side of the government, at the battle of Culloden, 16th April 1746 He fell, covered with wounds, at the head of his company, when the rebels attacked his regiment.

The elder son, William Henry, fourth marquis, a captain in the first regiment of foot-guards in 1741, acted as aide-de-camp to the duke of Cumberland at the battle of Fontenoy, 30th April 1745, and was severely wounded with a musket-ball in the head. As lieutenant-colonel of the 11th dragoons he commanded three squadrons of cavalry on the left wing at the battle of Culloden. At this time he bore the title of earl of Ancrum, which he assumed on his marriage, having been previously designed Lord Jedburgh. He had subsequently, till the following August, the command of the forces at Aberdeen and on the east coast of Scotland. In December 1746 he accompanied the duke of Cumberland to the Continent. In 1752 he succeeded his brave grand-uncle, Lord Mark Kerr, as colonel of the 11th dragoons. He served as lieutenant-general under the duke of Cumberland in his expedition to the coast of France in 1758, and attained to the full rank of general in the army in 1770 Elected M P for Richmond in 1747, he was rechosen at the general elections of 1754 and 1761, but resigned his seat in 1763. After succeeding as marquis of Lothian, he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, 26th October 1768, and the same day was invested with the order of the Thistle at St. James' He died 12th April 1775, in the 65th year of his age. He married, in 1735, Lady Caroline D'Arcy, only daughter of Robert, earl of Holderneese, and great-granddaughter of the celebrated duke of Schomberg, who fell at the battle of the Boyne in 1690, and of Charles Louis, elector palatine, and, with two daughters, had a son, William John, fifth marquis. The latter, a general in the army, was invested with the order of the Thistle, 11th October, 1776, the year after his succession to the family honours. He was one of the Scots representative peers, and having, on the important question of the regency, on George the Third's first illness, voted for the right of the prince of Wales, and signed the protest to that effect, in December 1788, he was, on the king's recovery, deprived of the colonelcy of the first regiment of life-guards, which occasioned a discussion in the House of Commons, 17th March 1789 He died in 1815.

His eldest son, William, 6th marquis, K T, lord-lieutenant of Mid Lothian and Roxburghshire, was created a peer of the United Kingdom, July 17, 1821, as Baron Kerr of Kershaugh, county of Roxburgh. He was twice married, and had issue by both marriages. He died April 27, 1824.

His eldest son, John William Robert, 7th marquis, lord-lieutenant of Roxburghshire, and colonel of Edinburgh militia, married July 19, 1831, only daughter of Earl Talbot; issue 5 sons and 2 daughters, and died Nov 14, 1841

William Schomberg Robert, his eldest son, 8th marquis, born Aug 12, 1832, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, where he was second class in classics in 1852, was appointed captain of the Edinburgh militia in 1853 He married in 1857 Lady Constance Talbot, daughter of earl of Shrewsbury

Lothian, William, D D, a divine and historian, the son of a surgeon in Edinburgh, was born there, Nov 5, 1740 After studying at the university of his native place, he was licensed to preach in October 1762, and ordained one of the ministers of the Canongate in August 1764 He was the author of a 'History of the United Provinces of the Netherlands,' published in 1780 Previous to this publication the university of Edinburgh had conferred on him the degree of D D He died Dec. 17, 1783 Two Sermons by Dr Lothian are printed in the 'Scottish Preacher,' Edinburgh, 1776.

Loudoun, a surname derived from Lous-dun, a barony in Ayrshire, both syllables meaning the same thing, namely "the hill," the round conical elevation in the south-west extremity of the parish being of the class which the Scoto-Saxons called law, and the Scoto-Irish dun. It is famous for two battles, one of them, called the battle of Loudonhill, fought in 1307, between Robert the Bruce and some English troops under the earl of Pembroke, and the other, fought near it in 1679, known as the battle of Drumclog. "Loudoun's bonny woods and braes" are the subject of one of Tannahill's most popular songs. In the parish of Loudoun are the ruins of Loudoun castle, destroyed in the 15th century by the clan Kennedy, headed by their chief, the earl of Cassillis. It was the seat of the Loudons of Loudon, one of the oldest families in Scotland. In the reign of David I (1124–1153) the proprietor of the lands and barony of Loudoun was named Lambin During the reign of William the Lion (1165–1214) James de Loudoun dominus de eodem, obtained a charter of the same from Richard de Morville, constable of the kingdom Jacobo filio Lambin, also obtained a charter from William de Morville, as Jacobo de Loudoun, terrarum baronie de Loudoun. His daughter, Margaret of Loudoun, married Sir Reginald Crawford, high-sheriff of Ayr, and was the grandmother of Sir William Wallace, the heroic defender of the liberties of his country. In later times a branch of this old family settled in Livonia, from which descended Field-marshal (in the Austrian service) Gideon Ernest, Baron Loudohn, born at Tootsen, in Livonia, in 1716, died in Moravia, July 14, 1790, one of the greatest generals of the 18th century

Loudoun, earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1633, on Sir John Campbell, high-chancellor of Scotland, descended from Sir Duncan Campbell, who married Susanna Crawford, heiress of Loudoun, in the reign of Robert I. He was the son of Sir Donald Campbell, 2d son of Sir Colin More Campbell of Lochaw, ancestor of the dukes of Argyle. His wife, Susanna Crawford, was 5th in descent from Sir Reginald Crawford, heritable sheriff of the county of Ayr, and Margaret de Loudoun, daughter and heiress of James de Loudoun above mentioned.

Sir John Campbell, first earl of Loudoun, was the eldest son of Sir James Campbell of Lawers, of the family of Glenurchy He was knighted by King James VI., and in 1620 he married Margaret Campbell, baroness of Loudoun, whose grandfather, Sir Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, was sworn a privy councillor, and created a lord of parliament by the title of Lord Campbell of Loudoun, 30th June 1601 In consequence of this marriage Sir John was styled Lord Loudoun He was created earl of Loudoun, and Baron Tarrinyean and Mauchline, by patent, dated 12th May 1633, but in consequence of his opposition to the measures of the court, the patent was, by a special order, stopped at the chancery, and the title superseded till 1641 In 1637 he distinguished himself by his active resistance to the ill-judged and unconstitutional attempt of Charles I to force episcopacy upon Scotland. He was a member of the famous Glasgow Assembly of 1638, as elder for the burgh of Irvine, and was selected as one of the assessors to the moderator, when he displayed great learning and zeal In the following year he took the castle of Strathaven, and those of Douglas and Tantallon, and garrisoned them for the Covenanters. He was one of the commissioners from the Scots army who settled the pacification of Berwick with Charles I. the same year Soon after he was, with the earl of Dunfermline, sent by the Scots Estates to London to put the king in possession of the proceedings in parliament, then recently prorogued, when the king despatched to them a peremptory order not to approach nearer than within two miles of the court, when they returned to Edinburgh On the 19th January 1640, he was one of the commissioners sent by the committee of Estates a second time to the court at London, when he was arrested, on a charge of treason, by order of the king, on account of an intercepted letter, signed by him and six other Scots noblemen, addressed to the king of France, imploring his assistance. This letter seems to have filled the court with great consternation, as it was mentioned in the king's speech from the throne, on the opening of the English parliament, and read to the members. On being brought before the English privy council, his lordship refused to give any account of the letter except that it was never sent, and that he ought to be questioned for it in Scotland and not in England. He was committed to the Tower, where, after remaining some time, he was visited by the marquis of Hamilton, through whose influence with the king he at last obtained his liberty After being introduced by the marquis at court, and kissing the king's hand, he returned to Scotland, and in gratitude to Hamilton for having thus contributed to save his life, he procured him the good will and esteem of the Covenanters.

In August of the same year he commanded the van of the foot of the Scots army at the battle of Newburn, and was one of the commissioners for the treaty of Ripon. On 15th July 1641 he presided at the opening of the Scots parliament. When the king visited Scotland in the following month, he had his title of earl allowed, with precedency from 1633, and was appointed high-chancellor of Scotland, and first commissioner of the treasury, with a yearly pension of £1,000 sterling. With the earls of Lauderdale and Lanark, he was sent to treat with the king when a prisoner in Carisbrook castle, Isle of Wight, in 1647, and on the 15th February 1648 he laid before the committee of Estates the concessions to which the king had acceded. On the meeting of the Scots parliament on March 2d the earl was elected president. He at first concurred in "the Engagement" for the king's relief, but withdrew his support from it when he found it opposed by the church, and even submitted to a public rebuke and admonition, in the High church of Edinburgh, for having at first approved of it. His portrait and autograph are subjoined.

After the defeat of the Scots army at Preston, and the advance of a force under the earl of Lanark to the borders, the Presbyterians of the west, to the number of 6,000, with the Chancellor Loudoun and the earls of Eglinton and Cassillis at their head, marched towards Edinburgh, to prevent any assistance being given to the king. He was a principal promoter of the passing of the act of Classes, by which all who were favourable to the Engagement were excluded from offices of trust and from parliament. When the marquis of Montrose was brought to the bar of the parliament house to receive sentence, he was bitterly reviled by the Chancellor Loudoun. After the defeat of Charles II at Worcester in 1651, he returned to the Highlands, and in 1653 joined the earl of Glencairn who then took up arms in the royal cause.

He soon, however, left that nobleman and retired into Athol. He and his son, Lord Manchline, were excepted out of Cromwell's act of grace and pardon in 1654, by which £400 a-year was settled out of his estates on his countess and her heirs. He afterwards submitted to General Monk. At the Restoration he was deprived of his office of chancellor, and fined £12,000 Scots. He died at Edinburgh, 18th March 1663.

His son, James, second earl, lived abroad, and died at Leyden in 1684. Hugh, third earl, his eldest son, by Lady Mary Montgomery, second daughter of the seventh earl of Eglinton, was sworn a privy councillor in April 1697. The following year he became a candidate for the office of extraordinary lord of session, on which occasion the earl of Argyle, in two letters, strongly recommended him to Secretary Carstairs. In one of these, dated 27th September that year, he says, "Pray, let not E. Melville's unreasonable pretending to the vacant gown make you slack as to E. Louden, who, though a younger man, is an older, and a more noted Presbyterian than he. Loudoun has it in his blood, and is a mettled young fellow, that those who recommend him will gain honour by him. He has a deal of natural parts and sharpness, a good stock of clergy, and, by being in business, he will daily improve." He in consequence obtained the appointment, and took his seat on the bench 7th February 1699. After the accession of Queen Anne, he was, in 1703, sworn one of her privy council. In 1704, he was appointed one of the commissioners of the treasury, and made a knight of the Thistle. In the following year he was appointed joint secretary of state for Scotland, and named one of the commissioners for the Union. Having resigned his titles into the hands of Queen Anne, she restored them to him and his heirs male, whom failing to his heirs whatsoever, by patent, and a charter under the great seal, dated 8th February 1707. The office of secretary having been abolished, his lordship was appointed in May 1708, keeper of the great seal of Scotland, by patent, during the queen's pleasure, with a pension of £2,000 per annum, besides the emoluments of the office. This appointment he was deprived of in 1713, in consequence of not complying with some of the measures of the tory administration.

On the accession of George I. in 1714, he was again sworn a privy councillor, and in 1715 appointed lord-lieutenant of Ayrshire. He served as a volunteer, under the duke of Argyle, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, where he behaved with great gallantry. He was lord high commissioner to the General Assembly in 1722, 1725, 1726, 1728, 1730, and 1731. In 1727 he had a pension of £2,000 per annum settled on him for life, and was one of the sixteen Scots representative peers from 1707 till his death, which took place 20th November 1731. His countess, Lady Margaret Dalrymple, only daughter of the first earl of Stair, greatly improved the grounds around her residence at Sorn castle in Ayrshire, where she died 3d April 1777, in her hundredth year.

Their only son, John, fourth earl, a distinguished military officer, was one of the Scots representative peers for the long period of 48 years. He was appointed governor of Stirling castle in April 1741, and aide-de-camp to the king in July 1743. In 1745 he raised a regiment of Highlanders for the service of government, of which he was appointed colonel, and on the breaking out of the rebellion of that year he joined Sir John Cope, under whom he acted as adjutant-general. He was at the battle of Preston, after which he went north, in the Saltash sloop of war, with arms, ammunition, and money, and arrived at Inverness on the 14th October. By the middle of the following month he had collected more than 2,000 men. To relieve Fort Augustus, which was blockaded by the Frasers, under the master of Lovat, he left Inverness on the 6th December with 600 men, and passing through Stratherrick during a very severe frost, reached Fort Augustus without opposition. Having supplied the garrison with everything for its defence, he returned to Inverness on the 8th, and on the 10th marched to Castle Downie, the seat of Lord Lovat, whom he prevailed upon to go with him to Inverness, and to live there under his own eye, until all the arms of the clan Fraser were delivered up. As some delay took place in their doing so, Lord Loudoun placed sentries at the door of the house where Lord Lovat resided, intending to commit him to the castle of Inverness next morning, but he escaped during the night.

In February 1746, Lord Loudoun formed the design of surprising Prince Charles at Moy castle, the seat of the chief of the Mackintoshes, which ended in the celebrated rout of Moy. Finding, soon after, that the prince was advancing upon Inverness, his lordship retired into Ross-shire, when first Lord Cromarty, and then Lord George Murray, and subsequently the duke of Perth, were despatched against him. In the meantime he had crossed the frith of Dornoch into Sutherland, and upon reaching the head of that county, he separated his army. Accompanied by the lord-president, Forbes of Culloden, and the laird of Macleod, he marched to the sea-coast with 800 men, and embarked for the Isle of Skye. The dispersion of his army was considered of such importance by Charles that he immediately sent an officer to France with the intelligence to his father, the Chevalier St. George.

In 1756, the earl was appointed captain-general and governor-in-chief of the province of Virginia, and on 20th March of the same year he was constituted commander-in-chief of all the British forces in America.

Great Britain declared war against France in May, and on the earl's arrival in New York on 23d July, he repaired immediately to Albany, the seat of government of the state of New York, to take command of the forces assembled there. In August the French made themselves masters of Forts Oswego and Ontario. Having on 3d January 1757 laid an embargo on all outward bound ships, for the purpose of concealing his plans as to the contemplated siege of Louisburg, and afterwards wasted the time of the army at Halifax, instead of proceeding to active operations, a clamour was raised against him at home, and in the following December, he was recalled from America. He was second in command, under Lord Tyrawley, of the British troops sent to Portugal, in February 1762, when Spain declared war against that country. He died 27th April 1782, in his 77th year. At the time of his death he was colonel of the 3d regiment of foot-guards, a general in the army, governor of the castle of Edinburgh, a privy councillor, one of the Scots representative peers, F.R.S., and the third field officer in the army. Although so much occupied abroad, he paid great attention to the improvement of the grounds around Loudoun castle in Ayrshire, which was one of the first places in the west of Scotland where foreign trees were planted. "John, earl of Loudoun," says Dr. Walker, "formed at Loudoun castle, the most extensive collection of willows that has been made in this country, which he interspersed in his extensive plantations. Wherever he went, during his long military services, he sent home every valuable sort of tree that he met with. All the willows he found cultivated in England, Ireland, Holland, Flanders, and Germany, as also in America and Portugal, where he commanded, were procured and sent to Loudoun." As he died unmarried, the title devolved on his cousin, James Mure Campbell, only son of the Hon. Sir James Campbell of Lawers, third and youngest son of the second earl of Loudoun.

Sir James, having early entered the army, served under the duke of Marlborough. At the battle of Malplaquet, 11th September 1709, being then lieutenant-colonel of the Scots Greys, at the head of a party of his men he attacked the French, and cut his way through the midst of them, and then returned by the same way This sally is said to have greatly determined the victory on the side of the allies. Being contrary to rule, however, he exposed himself to censure by it, but Prince Eugene of Savoy, the commander-in-chief, the day after the battle, returned him thanks in the face of the army for exceeding his orders. He got the command of the Scots Greys, 15th February 1717, and was appointed one of the grooms of the bedchamber to George II. In 1727 he was elected M P for Ayr, and in 1733 constituted governor of Edinburgh castle. At the battle of Dettingen, 16th June 1743 his courage and conduct were so conspicuous that George II. invested him with the order of the Bath at the head of the army At the battle of Fontenoy, 30th April 1745, he commanded the British horse, but was mortally wounded, one of his legs being taken off by a cannon ball Dying soon afterwards, he was buried at Brussels. He married Lady Jean Boyle, eldest daughter of the first earl of Glasgow, by his second wife, Jean, daughter and heiress of William Mure of Rowallan, and had, with a daughter, one son, James Mure Campbell of Lawers, who succeeded his cousin in the earldom.

James, fifth earl, assumed the name of Mure, on succeeding to the estate of his grandmother, the countess of Glasgow In 1754 he was elected M P for Ayrshire, and attained the rank of major-general in the army, 19th October 1761 He died 28th April 1786, in his 61st year He had married, 30th April, 1777, Flora, eldest daughter of John Macleod of Rasay, Inverness-shire, and by her had an only child, Flora Mure Campbell, countess of Loudoun, in her own right, born in 1780, died in 1840 She married, 12th July, 1804, Francis Rawdon Hastings, earl of Moira in Ireland, then commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, created marquis of Hastings, 7th December 1816, and, with three daughters, had a son, George Augustus Francis, second marquis of Hastings and sixth earl of Loudoun Of the amiable, accomplished, and unfortunate Lady Flora Hastings, the eldest daughter, a memoir is given at page 452 of this volume. The second marquis of Hastings had, by his marchioness, Barbara Yelverton, Baroness Grey de Ruthyn, two sons and four daughters. Paulyn Reginald Serlo, third marquis of Hastings, and seventh earl of Loudoun, an officer in the army, was drowned at Liverpool, 17th January 1851, in his 19th year He was succeeded by his only brother, Henry Weysford Charles Plantagenet, fourth marquis of Hastings and eighth earl of Loudoun, born 22d July 1842

LOUDON, JOHN CLAUDIUS, an eminent writer on gardening and agriculture, the son of a farmer at Kerse Hall, Gogar, near Edinburgh, was born 8th April 1783, at Cambuslang in Lanarkshire, where resided his maternal aunt, the mother of the Rev Dr Claudius Buchanan, celebrated for his philanthropic labours in India. He received his education at Edinburgh, and early evinced a decided taste for drawing and sketching scenery This, with a fondness which he also showed for gardening, induced his father to bring him up as a landscape gardener. To give him a knowledge of plants he was placed, for some months, with Mr. Dickson, a nurseryman in Leith Walk. At this time he acquired the habit of sitting up two nights a-week to study, and this practice he continued for many years, drinking strong green tea, to keep himself awake. Besides learning Latin, he also acquired French and Italian, and paid his teachers out of the profits of translations from these languages, which he sold to the booksellers The first of these was a life of Abelard, from the French, which he had made as an exercise, and which he sent to a periodical then publishing, called Shrarton's Encyclopædia. He also attended the classes of botany, chemistry, and agriculture in the university of Edinburgh. The vacations he spent at home, working beside his father's labourers in the fields, with such vigour that it was a common saying among them that they were all shamed by the young master

In 1803, Mr London went to London, carrying with him numerous letters of introduction to noblemen and gentlemen, and soon found ample employment as a landscape gardener In a journal which he kept in his early years, he remarks at this time, "I am now twenty years of age, and perhaps a third part of my life has passed away, and yet what have I done to benefit my fellowmen?" He now learnt German, and for a pamphlet, which he had translated by way of exercise from that language, he received from Mr Cadell the publisher £15 To the Literary Journal he contributed at this period a paper entitled 'Observations on laying out the Public Squares of London,' which led to their being adorned with some of the lighter trees, such as, the oriental plane, the sycamore, and the almond, instead of yews, pines, and other heavy plants, as had been the custom previously In 1804 he returned to Scotland, but went back to England the following year

In 1806 he was attacked with rheumatic fever, and being much debilitated, he took lodgings at Pinner near Harrow. There he had an opportunity of noticing the inferior state of farming in England, compared to that in Scotland, and on his recovery, with the view of introducing improvements, and showing the advantage of the Scottish system of agriculture, in conjunction with his father, he took a farm near London, called Wood Hall. A pamphlet, which he published in 1807, entitled 'An Immediate and Effectual Mode of Raising the Rental of Landed Property in England,' was the means of his introduction to General Stratton, the owner of Tew Park in Oxfordshire, and in 1809 he went there as tenant of a large farm on his estate. Here he established a sort of agricultural college, in which young men were instructed in the principles of farming. He was so successful that in 1812 he found himself worth £15,000. In 1813 he determined to travel for a time on the continent, which was then thrown open to the English, and, giving up his farm, he proceeded, in March of that year, to Sweden, and afterwards went to Russia, Poland, and Germany, visiting the principal cities of the countries through which he passed. A journal which he kept during the whole time of his absence he illustrated with spirited sketches of the various places he saw, most of which were afterwards engraved on wood, for the historical part of his 'Encyclopædia of Gardening.' Some of his adventures were remarkable. Once, while making a drawing of a picturesque old fort in Russia, he was arrested as a spy, and on his examination before a magistrate, he was very much amused at hearing his note-book, full of unconnected memoranda translated into Russ. Another time, between St Petersburg and Moscow, the horses in his carriage being unable to drag it through a snowdrift, the postilions very coolly unharnessed them, and trotted off, telling him that they would bring fresh horses in the morning, and that he would be in no danger from the wolves if he would keep the windows of the carriage close and the leathern curtains down. On all subsequent occasions of travelling, when he met with difficulties, he was accustomed to say that they were nothing compared to what he had suffered during the night he passed in the steppes of Russia.

On his return to England, finding that the principal part of his property was lost through unprofitable investments, he devoted himself, with renewed energy, to his old profession of a landscape gardener. While on the continent he had viewed with attention the various public gardens in the different cities he visited, and the idea occurred to him of bringing out a large work on the subject of gardening, the historical part of which should contain sketches of the gardens of all nations. For the purpose of rendering it more complete and valuable, in 1819 he proceeded to France and Italy, to examine the principal gardens of these countries. In 1822, appeared his 'Encyclopædia of Gardening,' copiously illustrated with woodcuts, a work remarkable for an immense amount of useful and original matter, which at once established his reputation as one of the ablest horticulturists of his time. It had an extraordinary sale, and its great success induced him to engage in another, on the same plan, called 'The Encyclopædia of Agriculture,' published in 1825. His subsequent publications were numerous, and all of a most useful and practical description.

In 1828 Mr London travelled through great part of France and Germany. 'The Encyclopædia of Plants' was published in 1829. In September 1830 he married Miss Webbe, daughter of Thomas Webbe, Esq. of Ritwell House, near Birmingham, authoress of a novel called 'The Mummy,' and two years afterwards his daughter Agnes, their only child, was born. The 'Encyclopædia of Cottage, Farm, and Villa Architecture' came out in 1832. It was the first work he published on his own account, and one of the most successful. "The labour," says Mrs London, "that attended this work was immense, and for several months he and I used to sit up the greater part of every night, never having more than four hours' sleep, and drinking strong coffee, to keep ourselves awake." He then set about a still more extensive work, also at his own risk, the 'Arboretum et Fruticetum Britannicum,' published in 1838, comprehending an account of all the trees and shrubs growing in Great Britain, with engravings.

All this time, and for the remainder of his life, he laboured under disabilities and suffering of no common kind. The severe attack of rheumatic fever he had on his first going to England left a permanent anchylosis, or stiffening of the joint, of the left knee, as well as a contracted left arm. "In the year 1820," says the writer of a Memoir of Mr London in the 'Gardener's Magazine,

"whilst compiling the Encyclopædia of Gardening, he had another severe attack of rheumatism, and the following year, being recommended to go to Brighton, to get shampooed in Mahomet's baths, his right arm was there broken near the shoulder, and it never properly united. Notwithstanding this, he continued to write with his right hand till 1825, when the arm was broken a second time, and he was then obliged to have it amputated, but not before a general breaking up of the frame had commenced, and the thumb and two fingers of the left hand had been rendered useless He afterwards suffered severely from ill health, till his constitution was finally undermined by the anxiety attending on that most costly and laborious of all his works, the Arboretum Britannicum,' which, unfortunately, had not paid itself" On the conclusion of the work he found that he owed ten thousand pounds to the printer, the stationer, and the woodcut engraver who had been employed The sale of this work was slow, and the pecuniary difficulties in which it involved him, by preying on his mind, are said to have hastened his death

At one period he had four monthly periodicals going on at once, namely, the Gardener's Magazine, the Magazine of Natural History, the Architectural Magazine, and the Suburban Gardener, besides conducting the Arboretum Britannicum, and to produce these regularly he literally worked night and day After 1826 he had been obliged to employ for all his works, both an amanuensis and a draftsman, and yet, with his disabled and maimed body, his mind retained all its vigour and clearness to the last Early in 1843 he was seized with chronic inflammation of the lungs, of which he died on 14th December of that year The last work on which he was employed at the time of his death, entitled 'Self-instruction for Young Gardeners,' is devoted to the mental improvement and welfare of that useful class of the community. Indeed, in all his publications he was careful, when the opportunity presented itself, to point out the bearing of his subject on the moral and social improvement of his fellow-creatures By the sale of his works, after his death, the debt which he then owed was considerably reduced. Mrs Loudon had, soon after their marriage, applied her mind to the study of botany and the other subjects more peculiarly treated of by her husband, so that she was enabled to assist him in his labours, and to publish herself several works of a similar kind, of a popular and pleasing character Of these may be mentioned the following:

After Mr Loudon's death, his widow carefully edited some of his most important works The novel published by her in 1827, entitled 'The Mummy,' excited considerable attention at the time, and attracted the notice of Mr Loudon, which led to an acquaintance between them, and he soon after married her She was also authoress of several other works of fiction

The distinguishing characteristics of Mr Loudon were energy, determination, and enthusiasm He was, besides, a most industrious and methodical compiler, and, as stated in one account of his life, "as soon as he had formed the plan of one of his works, he seemed endowed with an instinctive feeling which guided him at once to the persons who could give him the best information on the subjects he had in view. Around him, in his study, masses of knowledge, thus gleaned from practical men, were arranged in labelled compartments, ever ready when needed, and by the alchemy of his mind, and the incessant labours of his pen, he gave these thoughts to the public in an inviting and useful form" A Mc moir of Mr Loudon, by his widow, appeared in his last work, 'Self-Instruction for Young Gardeners.' In the 'Gardener's Magazine' also there was a Memoir of him, shortly after his death His widow, who had a pension of £100 from the Civil List, died in July 1858.

Mr Loudon's works are:

He also contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, and to Brande's 'Dictionary of Science,' and published numerous supplements to his various works.

Lovat, Baron Fraser of, a title in the peerage of Scotland (attainted in 1747, but restored in 1857), exact date of creation unknown It was taken from the hamlet of Lovat, near the eastern bank of the Beauly Inverness-shire, where stood the tower and fort of Lovat, founded in 1230, anciently the seat of the Bissets, and is said to have been conferred by James I, on Hugh Fraser of Lovat, grandson of Simon Fraser, the first of the Frasers of Lovat. The latter, who fell at the battle of Halidonhill, 19th July 1333, married Margaret, one of the heirs of the earl of Caithness, and acquired, in consequence, large possessions in the north He is supposed to have been a branch of the Frasers of Oliver castle in the county of Peebles, as his son had possessions in that county This son, Hugh Fraser of Lovat, had four sons, Alexander, who died unmarried, Hugh, created a lord of parliament, under the title of Lord Fraser of Lovat, John, ancestor of the Frasers of Knock in Ayrshire, and another son, ancestor of the Frasers of Foyers.

Hugh, first Lord Lovat, was one of the hostages for James I, on his return to Scotland in 1424, and in 1431 he was appointed high sheriff of the county of Inverness. His son, also named Hugh, second Lord Lovat, was father of Thomas, third lord, Alexander, ancestor of the Frasers of Fanaline, the Frasers of Leadclune, baronets, (see p. 264 of this volume); and other families of the name.

Thomas, third lord, held the office of justiciary of the north in the reign of James IV, and died 21st October 1524 He had four sons Thomas, master of Lovat, killed at Flodden, 9th September 1513, unmarried, Hugh, fourth Lord Lovat, Alexander, fifth lord, and William Fraser of Struy, ancestor of several families of the name in Inverness-shire.

Hugh, fourth lord, the queen's justiciary in the north, resigned his whole estates into the hands of King James V, and obtained from his majesty a new charter, dated 26th March 1539, uniting and incorporating them into the barony of Lovat, to him and the heirs male of his body, failing whom to his nearest lawful heirs male, bearing the name and arms of Fraser, and failing them to his heirs whatsoever With his eldest son, Hugh, master of Lovat, he was killed in an engagement with the Macdonalds of Clanranald at Lochlochy, Inverness-shire, 2d June 1544, an account of which is given at page 262 of this volume. His brother, Alexander, fifth

Lord Lovat, died in 1558. With one daughter, the latter had three sons: Hugh, sixth lord; Thomas, ancestor of the Frasers of Strichen, from whom Lord Lovat of Lovat is descended; and James, of Ardochie.

Hugh, sixth Lord Lovat, had a son, Simon, seventh lord, who was twice married, and died 3d April 1633. By his first wife, Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir Colin Mackenzie of Kintail, he had two sons, Simon, master of Lovat, who predeceased him, without issue, and Hugh, eighth Lord Lovat, who died 16th February 1646 By a second wife, Jean Stewart, daughter of Lord Doune, he had Sir Simon Fraser, ancestor of the Frasers of Innerallochy; Sir James Fraser of Brae, and one daughter Hugh, eighth lord, had, with three daughters, three sons, namely, Simon, master of Lovat, and Hugh, who both predeceased their father, the one in 1640 and the other in 1645, and Thomas Fraser of Beaufort, eleventh Lord Lovat. The second son, Hugh, styled after his elder brother's death, master of Lovat, left a son, Hugh, ninth lord, who succeeded his grandfather in February 1646, and married in July 1659, when a boy of sixteen years of age at college, Anne, second daughter of Sir John Mackenzie of Tarbet, baronet, sister of the first earl of Cromarty, and by her had a son, Hugh, tenth lord, and three daughters.

Hugh, tenth lord, succeeded his father in 1672, and died in 1696, when Thomas Fraser of Beaufort, third son of the eighth lord became eleventh Lord Lovat, but did not take the title. The tenth lord married Lady Amelia Murray, only daughter of the first marquis of Athol, and had four daughters. His eldest daughter, Amelia, assumed the title of Baroness Lovat, and married, in 1702, Alexander Mackenzie, younger of Prestonhall, who assumed the name of Fraser of Fraserdale. His son, Hugh Fraser, on the death of his mother, adopted the title of Lord Lovat, which, however, by decree of the court of session, 3d July 1730, was declared to belong to Simon, Lord Fraser of Lovat, as eldest lawful son of Thomas, Lord Fraser of Lovat, granduncle of the tenth lord. This judgment proceeded on the charter of 1539, and though pronounced by an incompetent court, was held to be right. To prevent an appeal, a compromise was made, by which Hugh Mackenzie ceded to Simon, Lord Lovat, for a valuable consideration, his pretensions to the honours, and his right to the estates, after his father's death

Thomas Fraser of Beaufort, by right 11th Lord Lovat, died at Dunvegan in Skye in May 1699 By his first wife, Sibylla, 4th daughter of John Macleod of Macleod, he had 14 children, 10 of whom died young. Simon, the eldest surviving son, was the celebrated Lord Lovat, beheaded in April 1747, see memoir of him at page 266 of this volume, and of his sons, General Simon Fraser, and Colonel Archibald Campbell Fraser of Lovat, see p. 268 The direct line failed on the death of the latter, in December 1815, and Thomas Alexander Fraser of Lovat, born in 1802, only son of Captain Alexander Fraser of Strichen, descended from Hon. Thomas Fraser, 2d son of the 6th Lord Fraser of Lovat, became the male representative of the family, and the 21st chief of the clan Fraser On Nov 3d, 1823, he was served nearest lawful male heir A petition from him to the king, claiming succession to the title, was remitted to the House of Lords, and he was, January 28, 1837, created Baron LOVAT of LOVAT, in the peerage of the United Kingdom (See page 263 of this volume.) By act of parliament passed in 1854, he was relieved from the effect of the attainder of the Scottish peerage, forfeited in 1747, and had the title adjudged to him by the House of Lords in 1857 He married the eldest daughter of 8th Lord Stafford; issue, with 3 daughters, 4 sons.

LOVE, JOHN, an eminent scholar, and controversial writer, the son of a bookseller, was born at Dumbarton, in July 1695. After completing his studies at the university of Glasgow, he became usher to his old master at Dumbarton, whom he succeeded in 1720 In 1733 he published a small tract in Defence of the Latin Grammar of Ruddiman, which had been attacked by Mr Robert Trotter, schoolmaster at Dumfries. Soon after he was brought before the judicatories of the Church, on a charge of brewing on a Sunday, preferred against him by the Rev Mr Sydserf, minister of Dumbarton; but his innocence being satisfactorily established after a judicial trial, his accuser was obliged to make him a public apology for malicious calumniation. In October 1735 Mr Love was, after a competition, appointed by the magistrates of Edinburgh one of the masters of the High School of that city In 1737, in conjunction with Mr Robert Hunter, then one of the masters of Heriot's hospital, and afterwards professor of Greek in the university of Edinburgh, he published 'Buchanani Paraphrasis Psalmorum Davidis Poetica,' printed by the Ruddimans His erudition having recommended him to the notice of the duke of Buccleuch, he was, in October 1739, appointed rector of the grammar school of Dalkeith During the succeeding year he engaged in a controversy with the notorious Lauder, about the comparative merits of Buchanan and Johnston, as translators of the Psalms, when he, of course, defended Buchanan's version. He afterwards entered into an angry contest with Ruddiman, concerning Buchanan's alleged repentance and ingratitude towards Mary queen of Scots, having, in May 1749, published 'A Vindication of Mr George Buchanan,' which produced, in the ensuing July, a pamphlet in reply from Ruddiman Mr Love died at Dalkeith, after a lingering illness, September 20, 1750. He was twice married, and by his first wife, the daughter of a surgeon in Glasgow, he had thirteen children

LOVE, JOHN, D D, an eminent divine, was born in 1756 in Paisley, and received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of that town. At ten years of age he was sent to the university of Glasgow, where he distinguished himself in every department of the regular course, particularly in those of classical literature and mathematics. He studied for the Church of Scotland, and soon after being licensed, he became assistant, first to the Rev. Mr. Maxwell of Ruthergien, and afterwards to the Rev David Turner, of the Old parish of Greenock, where he attracted much attention as a preacher After Mr Turner's death, he was called to be minister of a Presbyterian chapel in London During his residence there he took an active share in forming the London Missionary Society, and he often mentioned with interest that he wrote the first note which brought the friends of the long neglected heathen together, and laid the foundation of the Society, which proved the parent of many similar institutions, both in this country and America. For several years he discharged the duties of secretary to it with much acceptance "His zeal for the success of this momentous undertaking," says one of his biographers, "which he bore on his heart to his dying hour, was not exhausted by the many labours of his official situation, difficult and delicate as they were, in the infancy of his splendid enterprise For the assistance of the first missionaries sent to the South Sea Islands, he published a small volume of Addresses to the inhabitants of Otaheite (now called Tahiti) containing a system of Christian theology, and characterized by the striking and seemingly opposite peculiarities of his devout and original mind"

In 1800 he was chosen minister of the chapel of ease at Anderston, Glasgow, where he continued to fulfil his pastoral duties till about six months before his death His zeal in the cause of missions continued unabated, and he was for a long period secretary to the Glasgow Missionary Society He died at Anderston, December 17, 1825, in his 69th year His Sermons, preached on public occasions, with fifteen addresses to the people of Otaheite, and a serious call respecting a mission to the river Indus, were published at Glasgow, in 1826, in 8 vols 8vo

LOW, GEORGE, an ingenious naturalist, was born, in 1746, at Edzel, in Forfarshire He studied both at the universities of Aberdeen and St Andrews, and distinguished himself by his proficiency in the various branches of natural history He afterwards became tutor in the family of Mr Graham of Stromness, and when Mr, afterwards Sir Joseph, Banks, with Dr. Solander, visited that quarter, he accompanied them in their excursions through the Orkney and Shetland islands In 1774 he was ordained minister of the parish of Birsay and Harray, on the Mainland of Orkney Having been introduced by Sir Joseph Banks to Mr Pennant, by the advice of the latter he undertook a 'Fauna Orcadensis,' and a 'Flora Orcadensis He died in 1795 In 1813, 18 years after his death, his 'Fauna' was published by Dr W F. Leach, in one vol 4to It bore the title of 'Fauna Orcadensis; or the Natural History of the Quadrupeds, Birds, Reptiles, and Fishes, of the Orkney and Shetland Isles' Mr Low left behind him other MSS, particularly a translation of Torfæus's History of Orkney, and a Tour through Orkney and Shetland

LOWE, PETER, founder of the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, was born in Scotland about the middle of the sixteenth century In his 'Discourse on the whole Art of Chirurgery,' published at Glasgow in 1612, in the title-page of which he styles himself Arelian Doctor in the faculty of surgery at Paris, and chirurgeon ordinary to the king of France and Navarre, he informs us that he had practised twenty-two years in France and Flanders, that he had been two years surgeon-major to the Spanish regiment at Paris, and that he subsequently followed his royal master, Henry IV of France, six years in his wars At what precise period he returned from the Continent, and took up his residence at Glasgow, is not known, but he mentions that in 1598, in consequence of his complaints of ignorant persons intruding into the practice of surgery, James VI granted him a privilege, under the privy seal, of examining all practitioners in surgery in the western parts of Scotland He refers to a former work of his own, entitled 'The Poor Man's Guide,' and speaks of an intended publication concerning the diseases of women. He died in 1612 His works are

The whole Course of Chirurgerie; wherein is briefly set down, the Causes, Signes, Prognostications, and Curations of all sorts of Tumours, Wounds, Ulcers, Fractures, Dislocations, and all other Diseases, usually practised by Chirurgeons, according to the opinion of all our ancient Doctours in Chirurgerie. Compiled by Peter Lowe, Scotchman. Whereunto is annexed, the Booke of the Presages of Denyne Hippocrates, deuyded into three partes; also the Protestation which Hippocrates caused his Scholars to make. The whole collected and translated by Peter Lowe, &c. London, 1596, 1597, 1612, 1634, 1654, 4to. This is considered to be a book of very great merit, and was translated into a variety of languages, and printed in Fr 1613, Port. 1614, Germ. 1634, Port. 1657

An Easy, Certain, and Perfect Methode to Cure and Prevent the Spanish Sickness, &c. Lond. 1596, 4to.

LOWE, JOHN, sometimes called also ALEXANDER, author of the well-known song, 'Mary's Dream,' to which he owes all his fame, was born in Kenmure, in Galloway, in 1750 He was the eldest son of the gardener at Kenmure castle, and being intended by his father to follow the humble business of a weaver, at the age of fourteen he was put apprentice to Robert Heron, father of the unfortunate author of that name Young Lowe afterwards found means to obtain a regular academical education at the university of Edinburgh, and while studying divinity was engaged as tutor in the family of Mr M'Ghie of Airds The fate of a young surgeon of the name of Alexander Miller, who was unfortunately lost at sea, and who had been attached to Mary, one of Mr M'Ghie's daughters, was the cause of Lowe's writing his beautiful and affecting ballad of 'Mary, weep no more for me' Having no prospect of obtaining a church in his native country, in 1773 Lowe embarked for America, being invited out as tutor to the family of a brother of General Washington He afterwards opened an academy in Fredericksburgh, Virginia, but it not succeeding, was at length given up At a subsequent period he was for some time minister of the Episcopal church of that place. Before quitting Airds, he had interchanged vows of unalterable constancy with a sister of Mary, which were doomed never to be kept He fell in love with a beautiful Virginian lady, who rejected his suit, and united herself to another. Her sister, however, became passionately fond of him, and he married her, as he said himself, "from a sentiment of gratitude." This step blasted his happiness for ever, as his wife turned out a most worthless character Poor Lowe, to drown the recollection of his domestic griefs, unfortunately had recourse to the bottle; and intemperance, poverty, and disease, soon brought him to an untimely grave. He died in 1798, in the 48th year of his age. Besides his 'Mary's Dream,' he wrote several pieces, among which is mentioned 'A Morning Poem,' but none of these has been printed.

LUMSDEN, a surname derived from the manor of that name in the parish of Coldingham, Berwickshire, formerly belonging to an ancient family, the Lumisdens of Lumisden. In a charter of King Edgar, who began to reign in 1098, (plate vi. of Anderson's 'Diplomata Scotiæ,') we find the lands of Lumisden mentioned The first of the family settled there as early as the reign of David I. Gillem or William and Cren de Lumisden attested a charter granted to the priory of Coldingham by Waldeve earl of Dunbar, between the years 1166 and 1182 Adam de Lumisden took the oath of fealty to Edward I at Berwick, on three successive occasions, namely, in 1292, 1296, and 1297 About 1385 David de Lumsden made a donation to the monks of Coldingham for the redemption of his grandfather, who had been condemned to die for a crime which is not recorded Gilbert de Lumsden, about 1320, married the heiress of Blenerne of that ilk, also in the Merse, and on the 15th June of that year, he received from John Stuart, earl of Angus, a charter, investing him in the lands of Blenerne, in the parish of Bunkle. On acquiring these lands, the family erected on the banks of the Whitadder a picturesque tower, whither they removed their residence. In 1607 David Lumsden of Blenerne and Lumsden sold the lands of Blenerne to Archibald Douglas, Esq of Tofts. Sir James Lumsden or Lumsdaine, of Airdrie in Fife, descended of a second son of Lumsden of Lumsden and Blenerne, purchased, about 1640, the lands of Innergellie in the parish of Kilrenny, Fifeshire, and shortly thereafter recovered the lands of Blenerne. He had two sons, Sir James, and Robert of Stravithie. The former, Sir James Lumsdaine of Innergelly, a major-general under Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, distinguished himself by the taking of Frankfort on the Oder He afterwards served in the Scots army, and in 1650 was taken prisoner by Cromwell, at the battle of Dunbar He was at one time governor of Osnaburg, and afterwards of Newcastle. The Rev E Sandys, having married the daughter and heiress of James Lumsdaine, Esq, of Innergelly, assumed the name and arms of the family

The Lumsdaines of Lathallan in Fife, are a branch of the Invergelly family, John Lumsdaine, major in the East India Company's service, third son of Robert Lumsdaine of Invergelly, having purchased the estate of Lathallan from Lieutenant John Spens in 1788.

In Aberdeenshire there is an ancient family of the name of Lumsden, who have possessed the estate of Cushnie, and other lands in that county, since before the 15th century, some of their charters bearing date 24th March 1471. In King's college, Old Aberdeen, there is shown a complete suit of mail which is said to have been worn by the ancestor of the family at the battle of Harlaw in 1411 A brother of the laird of Cushnie, Matthew Lumsden of Tillicairn, in the parish of Clunie, who died 27th June, 1580, was the author of a 'Genealogical History of the House of Forbes,' which was published, with continuations, in 1819

Andrew Lumsden, private secretary to Prince Charles Edward, at Rome, and author of 'Remarks on the Antiquities of Rome and its Environs,' London, 1797, 4to, in an account of his family by himself, published in the Analecta Scotica, traces his descent from the house of Cushnie. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and died in that city, 26th December 1801, aged 81.

In 1782, John Lumsden of Cushnie sold the lands of Clova and Auchindoir to his cousin, Harry Lumsden from Jamaica, who entailed them and other estates in the counties of Aberdeen, Banff, and Kincardine, on a series of heirs, including the family of Harry Lumsden of Belhelvie, whose father was his cousin-german This John Lumsden of Cushnie had five sons, four of whom distinguished themselves in the service of the East India Company John Lumsden, the second son, was in the civil service of the Company for the long period of 36 years. In 1805 he was called to be a member of the supreme council, an office which he held for seven years. In 1813 he returned to England, on which occasion the governor-general, in a letter to the Directors at home, gave honourable testimony to the "unsullied purity of his character both in public and private life, his official knowledge equally useful and extensive, and the ability with which he had discharged the functions of the different situations, even the highest and most arduous, in which he had been placed" In 1817 he was chosen a director of the East India Company He succeeded his elder brother in the estate of Cushnie, and died in London in December 1818, in his 58th year, being succeeded by his only son, the Rev Henry Thomas Lumsden, a clergyman of the Church of England at Ipswich

His youngest brother, Matthew Lumsden, LL.D, rendered himself more eminent than any of his family He received his education at King's college, Old Aberdeen, where all his brothers likewise studied, and then went to India. Having become deeply skilled in the oriental languages, he was appointed assistant professor of Persian and Arabic in the college of Fort William, and in 1805 published an elaborate 'Persian Grammar,' a new edition of which appeared in 1810 In 1808 he succeeded Captain Baillie as Persian and Arabic professor, and in 1812 was appointed secretary to the Calcutta Madressa, and superintendent of the various translations of English works into Persian then in progress. In 1818 he published an Arabic grammar, in 2 vols. folio, in 1814 he received charge of the Company's press at Calcutta, which he retained for three years, and in 1818 he added to all his other duties those of secretary to the Stationery Committee. Owing to bad health he returned for a time to England, through Persia, Georgia, and Russia, and in 1821 went back to India. Returning finally to England, he died at Tooting Common, Surrey, 31st March 1835, in his 58th year He received the degree of LL.D from King's college, Old Aberdeen, to which he presented his own and a great number of other oriental works. Other two of his brothers, David and James, each attained the rank of colonel in the Indian army The former, when Captain Lumsden, presented to the library of King's college, a remarkable roll, nearly 20 feet long, beautifully written in Sanscrit, containing an account of the Hindoo Mythology, with grotesque paintings of their gods.

Of the same family are the Lumsdens of Pitcaple, of Tillwhilly, and of Balmedie, all in Aberdeenshire. Of the Clova branch, William Lumsden of Harlaw, was succeeded by his daughter, Catherine, who married in 1754, John Leith, Esq, and the successor in the estates of Clova and Auchindoir Harry Leith, Esq, assumed the additional name of Lumsden

LUNDEN, or LUNDIE, a surname derived from lands of that name both in Forfarshire and Fifeshire, the former belonging to the earl of Camperdown, and the latter to Wemyss of Wemyss. Philip de Lundin (sometimes of old written London) obtained from Malcolm IV the barony of the name in the parish of Largo, Fife, while on Malcolm de Lundin, his brother, was conferred by the same monarch the lands of Lundin in Forfarshire.

Malcolm's son, Thomas, was appointed by William the Lion, door ward or Ostiarius, an office which became hereditary in the family, and from which they assumed the name of Durward. Thomas son, Allan, justiciary of Scotland, took the title of earl of Athol, to which he does not appear to have had any right. He married the natural daughter of Alexander II., and yet had the presumption to oppose the coronation of the infant son of that monarch in 1249 He died in 1275 (Chalmers' Caledonia, vol i p. 534). Robert, a natural son of William the Lion, having married the heiress of this house, assumed the surname of Lundin, and from him the family of Lundin of Lundin were afterwards descended. In 1648, John Lundin of Lundin was succeeded by his daughter Margaret, who married the Hon Robert Maitland, second son of John, first earl of Lauderdale. Mr Maitland, in consequence, assumed the name and arms of Lundin. He supported the "Engagement" for the rescue of Charles I, in 1648, for which he was obliged to make repentance in the parish church of Largo Accompanying Charles II to England in 1651, he was taken at the battle of Worcester, and remained some years a prisoner He was fined £1,000 by Cromwell, and died at Lundin in 1658. His only surviving son, John Lundin of Lundin, dying a few years afterwards, unmarried, was succeeded by his sister Sophia, who, in 1670, became the first wife of John Drummond, second son of James, third earl of Perth By warrant from King Charles II, to him, dated 27th October, 1679, the family carried the arms of Scotland in their armorial bearings, as the natural sons of the kings of Scotland had been in use to do, since the reign of James I In 1680, this John Drummond or Lundin was appointed general of the ordnance and deputy-governor of the castle of Edinburgh, in 1682 treasurer depute, and in September 1684 one of the principal secretaries of state for Scotland In 1685 he was created Viscount Melfort, and Lord Drummond of Gilston, and in 1686 earl of Melfort (see MELFORT, earl of). After the Revolution he went with James VII and II to France, where he remained, and was attainted by act of parliament in 1695, a clause in the act, however, declared that the forfeiture should in noways affect or taint the blood of his children by Sophia Lundin, his first wife. His son, James Lundin, succeeded his mother in the estate of Lundin, and, dying unmarried, was succeeded by his brother, Robert, who died in 1735 Robert's son, James Lundin of Lundin, on the death and forfeiture of Edward Drummond, styled duke of Perth, representative of the earls of Perth, was served heir male of James, fourth earl of Perth, and died in 1781 His son, James Drummond, in 1785 obtained possession of the estate of the earldom of Perth, and was created a British peer, by the title of Lord Perth, and Baron Drummond of Stobhall On his death in 1800 he was succeeded by his daughter, the Hon Clementina Sarah Drummond, who was thus the heir of line of the ancient family of Lundin of Lundin She married in 1807 the Hon Peter Robert Burrell, eldest son of Lord Gwydir and Baroness Willoughby d'Eresby, to which titles he succeeded, to the first in 1820, and to the second in 1828. The Fifeshire estate of Lundin was sold, towards the close of the last century, to Sir William Erskine of Torry, and came to James Erskine Wemyss, Esq of Wemyss in right of his mother

A branch of the family of Lundin possess the estate of Auchtermarnie, in the parish of Kennoway The heiress married a gentleman of the name of Smith, and their son, on succeeding to the estate, assumed the name of Lundin. His son Richard, a Captain in the 73d foot, died unmarried in 1832, when he was succeeded by his sister Euphemia.

LYELL, a surname derived from de Lisle, modernised into De Lyle, first assumed by the proprietors of some of the western isles in the reign of Malcolm Canmore. It is the same as the English Lisle, at one period De L'Isle, one ancient family of that surname having borrowed it from the Isle of Wight, and another from the Isle of Ely

The Lyells of Kinnordy in Forfarshire, an estate once possessed by the Inverquarity branch of the noble house of Airlie, have distinguished themselves by their scientific and geological attainments. Charles Lyell, Esq of Kinnordy, an eminent botanist, and for many years vice-lieutenant of Forfarshire, who died November 8th, 1849, was the discoverer of a great number of British plants previously unknown So high was the estimation in which he was held that a genus of plants (Lyellia) was named after him by Mr Robert Brown, and Sir William Hooker and Professor Lindley, two botanists of the first distinction, each dedicated one of their works to him He was educated at the college of St. Andrews, and afterwards went to the university of Cambridge. In 1826 he returned to his paternal estate, in the parish of Kirriemuir, where he devoted himself to scientific, botanical, and literary pursuits. He translated the lyrical poems of Dante, the first edition of which, printed at his own cost, was so well received that a London publisher obtained permission to issue a second on his own account. His essay on 'The Anti-Papal Spirit of Dante' shows a profound knowledge of mediæval Italian literature and history, and is full of enlarged and philosophical views. His collection of the various editions of that great Italian poet, and the writings of his numerous commentators, and of authors illustrative of Dante and his times, was very great. He also left an extensive botanical library In the New Statistical Account (article KIRRIEMUIR) it is stated that there is among the archives of the Church of Scotland a MS., written by Mr Lyell, containing a valuable and elaborate article on the habitat of the plants of the parish of Kirriemuir, beginning at its lower extremity to the south, and extending to the high lands of Glenprosen His eldest son, Sir Charles Lyell, president of the Geological Society in 1836-7, and author of 'Principles of Geology,' 3 vols. London, 1830-3, 'Elements of Geology,' 2 vols. Lond, 1838, both of which works have passed through several editions, 'Travels in North America, with Geological Observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia,' 2 vols. 12mo, London, 1845, 'A Second Visit to the United States,' 2 vols. 8vo, London, 1849; and various papers in scientific journals, was knighted at Balmoral by Queen Victoria in 1848. Born at Kinnordy in 1797, he married in 1832 the eldest daughter of Leonard Horner, Esq

LYLE, LORD, an (extinct) title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred about 1446 on Sir Robert Lyle, descended from William de Lyle, one of the witnesses of the foundation charter of the monastery of Paisley by Walter, high steward of Scotland in 1164 Ten years afterwards he was one of the prisoners taken along with William the Lion at Alnwick, and died before 1200 His son, William de Lyle, had two sons, the elder of whom, Radulphus or Ralph, was designed de Insula, dominus de Duchal, the barony of that name, which gave the local designation, being in Renfrewshire. This Ralph lived in the reign of Alexander II. His son, Sir William, was one of the nominees on the part of Robert Bruce in his competition with John Baliol for the crown of Scotland in 1292. Sir William's son, Sir Alexander Lyle, joined Edward Baliol, and was by him appointed sheriff of Bute, which, according to some, was their ancient possession, hence their name of L'Isle. He was also made, by Baliol, lord-high-chamberlain of Scotland. He was slain by the men of Bute, known at that time by the name of the lord-high-steward's Brandanes, and his head presented to the steward of Scotland.

His son, Sir John Lyle of Duchal, was in great favour with David II., from whom he received a charter of the barony of Buchquhan in Stirlingshire. He was one of the ambassadors to England in 1366. His son, also named Sir John Lyle, married one of the daughters and coheirs of the old earls of Mar, in whose right he added the coat of Mar to his paternal arms. On the death of Alexander Stewart, earl of Mar, he put in his claim as one of the heirs of the earldom, to which he and the Lord Erskine should have succeeded by right and proximity of blood, but King James I. took possession of it. His son, Sir Robert, was one of the hostages for that monarch on his liberation in 1424, when his annual revenue was estimated at 300 marks.

Sir Robert's son, also Sir Robert, first Lord Lyle, was created a peer by James II His only son, Robert, second Lord Lyle, was a privy councillor to James III, and an ambassador to England in March 1472, when he concluded a truce with that nation Accused of sending treasonable letters to James of Douglas, then an exile in England, and to some Englishmen, enemies of the kingdom, and of receiving letters from them, he was tried in parliament 22d March 1481-2, before an assize, the king sitting as judge, and declared free and innocent of the charge. In 1484 and 1485 he was employed four several times to treat with the English. He joined the party formed against James III, and with some others went to England in May 1488, under a safe conduct from Henry VII, and he was there when James was murdered at Sauchieburn 11th June following He returned home before 24th July, and was appointed great justiciary of Scotland. He was one of the commissioners for opening the Estates, 8th October, but he afterwards joined the earl of Lennox and other nobles who took up arms to avenge the death of James III They were, however, defeated, and Lord Lyle was forfeited in June 1489, but the act of forfeiture was rescinded and annulled by the king and parliament, 5th February 1489 90, and the clerk register ordered to expunge it from the records. He was at the same time restored to his office of justiciary

The eldest son of this nobleman, Robert, third Lord Lyle, died in 1511, leaving by his wife, Mariot Lindsay, a daughter of the house of Dunrod, a son, James, fourth lord, a minor, when the king assigned his wardship and marriage to Jame Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow, whose niece he married being the daughter of David Bethune of Criech. He had a son, John, who predeceased him, and a daughter, Jean, married to Sir Niel Montgomery of Lainshaw, in Ayrshire, a grandson of the first earl of Eglinton. Her descendant, James Montgomery of Lainshaw, tendered his vote as Lord Lyle at the elections of representative peers in 1721 and 1722, but it was not received, as did also Sir Walter Montgomery at the general election of 1784, and at subsequent elections, but his vote was not allowed.

LYNEDOCH, LORD, a distinguished general. see GRAHAM, SIR THOMAS.

LYON, a surname doubtless originally assumed from the heraldic device of a lion, indicating courage or magnanimity

The noble family of Strathmore, whose patronymic it is, are descended from the ancient house of de Leonne in France, which derived their origin from the noble race of the Leones of Rome. One of the French Leonnes came over to England with William the Conqueror His son, Roger de Leonne, accompanied King Edgar, son of Malcolm Canmore, to Scotland about 1091, and for his services against Donald Bane, the usurper, he obtained lands in Perthshire, which from him are said to have been called Glen-Lyon The river Lyon, which traverses the district, seems more likely to have given its name to it. This Roger de Leonne is witness to a charter of King Edgar to the monastery of Dunfermline dated in 1105 From him was lineally descended Sir John Lyon, in the reigns of Robert I and his son David II, who had a charter, without date, supposed to be about 1342 or 1343, of the lands of Forteviot and Forgandenny in Perthshire, and Curteston and Drumgowan in Aberdeenshire He had also from David II a charter of the thanedom of Thanades, now Tannadyce, in Forfarshire, and the reversion of the thanedom of Glammis in the same county

His son, Sir John Lyon, obtained from King David II, for faithful services, an annuity of ten merks, during his life, out of the proceeds of the justice eyres north of the river Forth He was a man of great abilities, and a favourite with Robert II, to whom he was secretary and from whom he got a charter, under the great seal, of the whole lands and thanedom of Glammis in Forfarshire, dated March 13, 1372 In 1376 he married the second daughter of his sovereign, the princess Joan Stewart, with whom he obtained the barony of Kinghorn in Fife, and was allowed to wear in his armorial bearings a lion rampant, within the double tressure of Scotland, and, in commemoration of that alliance for his crest he assumed a lady from the waist upwards, encircled with a garland of laurel, holding in her right hand a thistle proper In 1378 he was appointed great-chamberlain of Scotland Between 1380 and 1382 he got no less than eight different charters under the great seal of lands in the shires of Banff, Perth, Fife, Forfar, and Aberdeen in all of which he is styled by the king, filius noster carissimus Being appointed, in the latter year ambassador extraordinary to the court of England, he obtained a safe-conduct for himself and forty horsemen in his retinue He was killed in a duel in 1383 at the Moss of Balhall, near Forfar by James Lindsay, lord of Crawford, nephew of the king, and was interred in the royal burial-place at Scone, by the king's express orders.

His only son, John Glammis of Forteviot, a minor at his father's death, was served heir to him in 1396 He behaved gallantly in the battle of Harlaw, fought between the royal army under the earl of Mar and Donald lord of the Isles, in 1411, but appears to have been afterwards taken by the English, as John Lyon was one of the Scots prisoners released from the Tower of London, 12th April, 1413 He was one of the commissioners appointed to negotiate the liberation of James I, and on 13th December 1423, he had a safe-conduct to Durham, to meet that monarch In the following year he and his eldest son, Patrick, became hostages for James on his being set at liberty, when his annual revenue was estimated at 600 marks, and his son's at 300

The latter was released on 9th June 1427 He succeeded his father, and was created a peer by the title of Lord Glammis, before 1450 He was one of the privy council of James II, and grand-master of his household. He was appointed one of the ambassadors extraordinary to the court of England when a truce was concluded in 1454 on which occasion he was one of the hostages for keeping it. He died in 1459 With one daughter, Elizabeth, married to Alexander Robertson of Strowan, chief of the clan Robertson, he had three sons Alexander, second Lord Glammis, who died without issue in 1485, John, who succeeded his brother, and William, of whom are descended the Lyons of Ogil in Forfarshire.

John third Lord Glammis, a privy councillor to James IV, was appointed justiciary of Scotland in 1489 He had a safe-conduct as ambassador to England 14th June 1491, and obtained a charter 20th October of that year, making the town of Glammis a free burgh of barony He died in 1497 With three daughters he had four sons. The three youngest, David, first of the house of Cossans, William, and George, were all killed at Flodden John the eldest son, fourth Lord Glammis, died in 1500 leaving three sons George, fifth lord, who died in his minority in 1505, John, sixth lord, and Alexander

John, sixth lord, married Janet Douglas, second daughter of George, master of Angus, and sister of the sixth earl of Angus, then in banishment, and died 8th August, 1528. By her he had a son and a daughter This unfortunate lady fell a victim to the deep feelings of resentment entertained by James V against all of the name and house of Douglas She took for her second husband, Archibald Campbell of Skipnish, and with him and her son Lord Glammis, then in his 16th year, John Lyon, a relation, and an old priest, she was, on 10th July 1537, arraigned for conspiring the king's death by poison, with the design of restoring the house of Angus. Being found guilty, she was condemned to the flames, and burnt on the Castlehill of Edinburgh on the 17th of the same month just a week after the beheading of the master of Forbes, her brother-in-law, charged with the same crime Her death was much lamented by the people for her nobility, her youth, her beauty, and her courage at her suffering but most of all because it was believed that hatred against her banished brother, rather than any guilt of her own, had brought her to that end Her son was also convicted and condemned to death, on his own confession, of knowing and concealing the conspiracy, and forfeited, but, on account of his youth the sentence was respited till he came of age, and in the meantime he was ordered to be kept in prison Her husband, Campbell, in endeavouring to escape from the castle of Edinburgh, in which he was confined, was dashed to pieces on the rocks on which that fortress is built John Lyon, the accomplice was hanged, and Makke, by whom the poison had been prepared, and from whom it was purchased, had his ears cut off and was banished the realm The accuser one William Lyon, touched with remorse, having declared that the whole was a fabrication of his own, the young Lord Glammis was released from prison but his estates were annexed to the crown by act of parliament of 3d December 1540 His forfeiture was not rescinded till March 1543, when he was restored by act of parliament to his title and estates. He had with other charters, one of the barony of Kinghorn, 12th September 1548, forfeited by Sir James Kirkaldy of Grange, at one time lord high-treasurer of Scotland, and died in 1568 He had by his wife, Janet Keith, sister of the fourth earl Marischal, two sons and a daughter

The elder son, John, eighth Lord Glammis, was one of the nobles who signed the bond, in April 1567, agreeing to support the marriage of the earl of Bothwell to the queen, but in the following June he joined the association for the protection of the young king In 1568 he was one of the lords of the secret council under the regent Moray, and in 1571, nine days before the assassination of that nobleman, he and other adherents of the king were forfeited by the queen's party who held what was called the "rebels' parliament" at Edinburgh, on 29th August of that year He was admitted, under the regent Lennox, an extraordinary lord of session, 30th September 1570, and on 7th September 1571 he was sworn one of the privy council of the regent Mar He was also a privy councillor to the regent Morton, who was a kinsman of his own. On 12th October 1578, he was appointed lord-chancellor of Scotland.

In September 1577 he and Lord Herries were deputed by the nobility convened at Stirling to desire the earl of Morton to resign the regency, which he did, hoping to return to power with greater force. The chancellor was accidentally slain at Stirling 17th March 1578, in a street rencontre between his own followers and those of the earl of Crawford, as he was coming down from the castle to his own lodging in the town, while the earl was going up to the castle. They met in a narrow wynd, and both noblemen ordered their followers and train to give way The two last servants, however, as they were going by jostled each other, on which they drew their swords, and their masters turning, the brawl became general, and the Lord Glammis, "being," says Godscroft, "a tall man of stature, and higher than the rest, was shot with a pistolet, and so died." Another author says, "The death of the chancellor was much lamented, happening at a time when the king and country stood in much need of his services. He had carried himself with much commendation in his place, and acquired great authority, most careful was he to have peace preserved both in the country and the church, and he laboured much to have the question of church polity settled." On the latter subject he corresponded, in 1575, with Theodore Beza, the celebrated colleague of Calvin, whereupon Beza wrote the book De Tripici Episcopatu, 'Of the Threefold Bishopric.' The following epigram was written on the chancellor by Andrew Melville after his death

"Tu leo magne jaces ingloriu ergo, manecount Qualia fata canes? qualia fata sues?"

Thus translated by his nephew, James Melville, who styles the chancellor "a lerned and guid noble man"

"Since lowlie lyes thow, noble Lyon fyne,
What sall betide, behind, the dogges and swyne?"
Melville's Diary, p. 47

He left a son, Patrick, ninth Lord Glammis.

The younger son of the seventh lord, the Hon Sir Thomas Lyon of Balduckie and Auldbar, on the death of his brother, became tutor to his nephew, the ninth lord, and was, as presumptive heir to the title, designed master of Glammis. He was one of the principal conspirators in the Raid of Ruthven, an account of which is given at page 888 of this volume. On the 30th of the same month, when the king, then only fourteen years of age and in the power of the confederated nobles, wished to ride from Stirling to Edinburgh, the lords would not permit him, and, says Calderwood, (vol. iii p 648,) "when he was to come furth at the doore, the maister of Glames layed his leg before him The king layed these things up in his heart, and tooke them heavilie." In August 1583, on the return of the favourite Arran to power, the master of Glammis was ordered to ward himself in Dumbarton, on which he fled to Ireland.

In April of the following year he and the earls of Angus and Mar returned to Scotland, and surprised the castle of Stirling, but on the king's marching from Edinburgh with a strong force, against them, they made their escape into England, on which they were forfeited in the parliament which met at Edinburgh 22d August 1584. In October 1585, the banished lords returned, and at the head of a strong body of their retainers, and being joined by others of the nobility, besieged the king in Stirling castle, drove the favourite Arran from his presence, and obtained the restoration of their estates, and the reinstatement of their persons in the royal favour The master of Glammis was appointed captain of the guard and lord-high-treasurer for life, with a salary of £1,000 Scots.

On 9th February 1586, he was admitted an extraordinary lord of session, and at King James' reconciliation of the nobility, 15th May 1587, he and his feudal enemy, the earl of Crawford, walked hand in hand before the king, to and from the famous banquet at the Cross of Edinburgh. In 1589 he was one of the commissioners nominated for the north to search for and apprehend Jesuits, intriguing papists and other disaffected persons, and having appointed a meeting of his friends at the church of Meigle in Perthshire, to oppose Huntly and the other popish lords, he was there surprised and chased to the house of Kirkhill, when, refusing to surrender, fire was set to the house, and he was forced to yield himself to Gordon of Auchindoun. He was conveyed a prisoner to Gordon's house, but on the king advancing in person against the rebels, he was set at liberty At the coronation of Queen Anne, 17th May 1590, the master of Glammis was knighted The year following he was accused of entering into a plot, with others of the court, against the Chancellor Maitland, and Lord Spynie was commissioned to apprehend him, but did not succeed in taking him He was afterwards committed to ward in Blackness, but soon released. Deprived, 6th Nov the same year (1591), of his seat on the bench, he was re-appointed March 8, 1593 and on May 28 admitted an ordinary lord of session.

In the beginning of 1596, on the appointment of the eight commissioners of the exchequer called the Octavians, he demitted his office of treasurer He died Feb. 18, 1608. He was the ancestor of the Lyons of Auldbar in Forfarshire.

Patrick, 9th lord, had a remission under the great seal, dated Sept. 15, 1601, to him and five servants, for the slaughter of Patrick Johnstoun in Haltoun of Belhelvie. A privy councillor of James VI, he was one of the Scots commissioners to treat of a union with the English commissioners in 1604. He was created earl of Kinghorn, and Lord Lyon and Glammis, July 10, 1606 By his countess, Lady Anne Murray, eldest daughter of the 1st earl of Tullibardin, he had, with one daughter, Lady Anne, countess of Errol, 3 sons, 1 John, 2d earl of Kinghorn, 2 Hon James Lyon of Auldbar, 3 Hon Frederick Lyon, ancestor of the Lyons of Brigton.

John, 2d earl of Kinghorn, the eldest son, was sworn a privy councillor by the parliament of 1641, and appointed one of the committee of Estates in 1644. A faithful adherent of Charles I, he opposed his being delivered up to the English, Jan. 16 1647 He died May 12, the same year He was twice married, but had issue only by his 2d wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Patrick, 1st earl of Panmure, an only son, Patrick, 3d earl of Kinghorn. This nobleman obtained two important charters, the one dated May 13, 1672, extending the reversionary limitation of the earldom of Kinghorn, in failure of direct male issue, to any person or persons whom he might name, and failing them, to his heirs and assignees whatsoever; and the other, dated July 1, 1677, providing that he "and his heirs male, or heirs whatsoever, should, in all future ages, be styled earls of Strathmore and Kinghorn, Viscounts Lyon, and Barons Glammis, Tannadyce, Sidlaw, and Strathdichtie." (See STRATHMORE, earl of)

MAC, a prefix held, in modern Gaelic, to signify son, as Macdonald, son of Donald, MacFarlane, son of Parlane, &c. Under the head of CAMPBELL (vol i. p. 544), instances are given where it cannot have implied originally son, but rather great, a corruption from the Latin magnus. In the similar Italian names in Mag and Mac, as Magliola, Macciavelli, and the Dutch and Portuguese Magallaen or de Magallaens, it also appears to signify great. Macallane is the Gaelic pronunciation of MacLean; and allane was, till the Reformation, a frequent form, in Scottish speech, for alienus, a foreigner There is a passage in Gildas, in which this prefix, as given to Maglocune, originally a monk, afterwards a Pictish king in Wales, first appears in history, the reproaches addressed to whom, as is the manner of this satirist, consist of ironical play upon his corrupt Latin name of great placeholder, he having been nephew of the former king, such as being great as stature of body as in kingdom or station, &c. It was probably also originally territorial, with the same meaning, in some instances, as Macnab of Macnab, or of that ilk. In this view it becomes descriptive, as names not hereditary are, and it occurs long prior to the use of surnames or hereditary names in Scotland.

MACADAM, the surname of a family who were originally MacGregors, descended from Gregor MacGregor, the chief, whose 2d son, Gregor, captain of the clan, with his cousin, Gilbert MacGregor, progenitor of the Grierssons of Lagg (see p. 382 of this vol), took refuge in Galloway, after the outlawry of the clan Gregor After being guilty of various acts of depredation and marauding, Gregor was at last captured and executed at Edinburgh.

His son, Adam MacGregor, the ancestor of this family, changed his name to Adam Macadam

The latter's son, John, had a son, Andrew, who, July 31, 1569, obtained, at Perth, a charter of the lands of Waterhead, from James VI, by the hands of the Regent Moray

Gilbert Macadam of Waterhead, the 4th in descent from Andrew, was served heir Aug. 2 1662 He was a well-known Covenanter; and in the troublous times of 1682, he was taken prisoner and carried to Dumfries, on a charge of nonconformity, but was liberated on caution to the extent of £400, which, on his non-appearance, was forfeited Soon after, he was again apprehended and carried to Glasgow, and on his refusal to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, was banished to the American Plantations. His father gave him £20 sterling with him, and with this he bought his freedom, and returned to Scotland in 1685 On a Saturday night, in a cottage near the village of Kirkmichael, he was surprised, at a meeting for prayer, by a company of militia, and shot in attempting to escape by the window

His son, James Macadam, served heir in 1686, married a lady of the Cunningham family, and appears to have died in 1687 Like his father, he was a strict Covenanter In an attempt on his life, he was followed one evening along the road, by Crawfurd of Camlarg and Crawfurd of Boreland, but, missing him in the dark, they overtook, and, in mistake, shot Roger Dunn, his uncle.

The third from him, another James Macadam, was one of the founders of the first bank in the town of Ayr, in 1763 He married Susannah, daughter of John Cochrane of Waterside, niece of the heroic Grisel Cochrane, and cousin-german of the 8th earl of Dundonald. Her mother, Hannah De Witt, was of the illustrious Dutch family of that name. He had two sons and eight daughters. Grisel, the 4th daughter, married Adam Stenart, Esq, and was mother of William Macadam Stenart, Esq, of Glencormiston, Peebles-shire, an estate purchased from him by William Chambers, Esq

James, the elder son, a captain in the army, predeceased his father, in 1763.

JOHN LOUDON MACADAM, the younger son, the celebrated improver of the public roads, was born in Ayr, September 21, 1756. He received his education at the school of Maybole. His father, having sold the greater part of his estate to a younger branch of the family, the Macadams of Craigengillan, whose daughter and heiress married the Hon Col Macadam Cathcart, went to live at Lagwine, on the river Deugh, in the parish of Carsphairn. His residence there was unfortunately consumed by fire, and he left Scotland for America, where he embarked in mercantile speculations. His son at the time was only about six years old On his death in 1770, young Macadam was sent to New York He remained there until the close of the revolutionary war, and as an agent for the sale of prizes he realised a considerable fortune, the greater part of which, however, he lost.

On his return to Scotland he resided for some time at Dumcrieff, in the neighbourhood of Moffat. He afterwards lived for thirteen years at Sauchrie in Ayrshire, where he was in the commission of the peace and a deputy-lieutenant. In 1798 he was appointed by government agent for victualling the navy in the western ports of Great Britain, in consequence of which he removed to Falmouth.

It was while acting as one of the trustees upon certain roads in Ayrshire that he first turned his attention to the mechanical principles involved in that branch of national economy, and during his residence in England, he continued silently to study the process of road-making in all its details. In 1815 he was appointed surveyor general of the Bristol roads, when he was at length afforded a full opportunity of carrying his system into practical operation, and it was soon adopted throughout the whole kingdom In 1823 he was examined before a committee of the House of Commons respecting the propriety of converting the rubble granite causeway of the principal streets of towns into a smooth pavement, resembling those which he had already formed on the ordinary roads, when he strongly recommended the change. The leading streets of London, Edinburgh, Dublin, and other cities, were, in consequence, Macadamised.

In introducing an improvement of such extensive utility, Mr Macadam had expended several thousand pounds, which, in 1825, he proved before a committee of the House of Commons; and received from government, in two grants, the sum of £10,000, which was all the return he ever obtained. In 1834 he was offered the honour of knighthood, but he declined it on account of his age, and it was conferred on his second son, Sir James Nicoll Macadam, general surveyor of the metropolis turnpike roads, appointed a deputy-lieutenant of Middlesex in 1848. Mr Macadam died at Moffat, November 26 1836, aged 80

He was twice married, and by his first wife had 4 sons and 3 drs. His two eldest sons died before him. The eldest son

William, left 3 sons and 3 drs William's eldest son, William Macadam of Ballochmorrie House, Ayrshire, succeeded his grandfather in 1836. He was Surveyor-General of Roads in England, and died, unmarried, Aug. 28, 1861, aged 58.

MACALESTER, the name of a clan that inhabited the south of Knapdale and the north of Kintyre in Argyleshire. They are traced to Alister or Alexander, a son of Angus Mor, of the clan Donald. Exposed to the encroachments of the Campbells, their principal possessions became, ere long, absorbed by different branches of that powerful clan. Clan badge, the five-leaved heath. The chief of this sept of the Macdonalds is Somerville MacAlester of Loup in Kintyre, and Kennox in Ayrshire. In 1805 Charles Somerville MacAlester, Esq of Loup, assumed the name and arms of Somerville in addition to his own, in right of his wife, Janet Somerville, inheritrix of the entailed estate of Kennox, whom he had married in 1792.

From their descent from Alexander, eldest son of Angus Mor, lord of the Isles and Kintyre in 1284, the grandson of Somerled, thane of Argyle, the MacAlesters claim to be the representatives, after MacDonell of Glengarry, of the ancient lords of the Isles, as heirs male of Donald, grandson of Somerled.

Having joined the lord of Lorn against Robert the Bruce, Alexander was, by that monarch, attacked in his principal stronghold, Castle Sweyn in Knapdale, and, forced to surrender, died a prisoner in Dundonald castle. His forfeited possessions were conferred on his younger brother, Angus Oig, who had always supported the cause of the Bruce. Alexander's descendants acquired lands in Argyleshire, and attached themselves to the powerful division of the clan Donald, called Ian Mor, from John the great, its progenitor, who lived in 1400, and whose possessions were in Isla and Kintyre.

After the forfeiture of the lords of the Isles in 1493, the MacAlesters became so numerous as to form a separate and independent clan. At that period their chieftain was named John or Ean Dubh, whose residence was at Ard Phadruic or Ardpatrick in South Knapdale. One of the family, Charles MacAlester, is mentioned as steward of Kintyre in 1461.

In the register of the privy seal for 1515 appears the name of his son, Angus vic Ean Dubh This Angus had three sons, Alexander; Donald, constable of the castle of Tarbet, on Loch Fyne, an office which became hereditary in the family; and Roderick, said to have been, in 1545, bishop of the Isles, although not mentioned in Keith's Catalogue.

The eldest son, Alexander MacAlester of the Loup, was forfeited for treasonably abiding from the army at Solway, but in 1540 he obtained a remission for himself and 15 of his clan

His grandson, Alexander, was one of those Highland chieftains who were held responsible, by the act called "the Black Band," passed in 1587, for the peaceable behaviour of their clansmen and the "broken men" who lived on their lands. He died when his son, Godfrey or Gorrie MacAlester, was yet under age.

This youthful chief became the hero of a tragedy which forms one of the most remarkable cases in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, (vol. iii. p. 7). Between him and a young lady of great property residing not far from his own possessions a mutual love existed, but their union was prevented by his guardian, who contrived to get her married to one of his own sons. Apprehensive, however, of the resentment of his ward, who had now attained his majority, he removed for a time to a distant part of the country. On his return in 1598, he was attacked and slain by the young chief. As the latter's vengeance was equally directed against the sons of his tutor, they took refuge in the house of Askomull in Kintyre, belonging to Angus Macdonald of Dunyveg, chief of the clan Ian Vohr, whilst the laird of Loup procured the assistance of Sir James Macdonald, the son of Angus, then at variance with his father. With about 300 armed men, they surrounded the house of Askomull at midnight, and on the refusal of those within to surrender, it was immediately set on fire. Although he knew that his father and mother were at the time in the house, Sir James savagely refused to let the fire be extinguished, and, at length, his father, in endeavouring to make his escape, was made prisoner, after being severely burnt, and receiving many indignities from the servants of his unnatural son. The other inmates of the house also fell into his hands, and were treated with various degrees of severity, but he does not appear to have caused any of them to be put to death

For his share in this transaction Macalester was obliged to conceal himself for a time. He afterwards returned and joined Sir James Macdonald in the deadly conflict which took place 5th August 1598, at Loch Gruinard in Isla, between the Macdonalds and the M'Leans, in which the latter were defeated and their chief slain. (See MACLEAN, clan of) In September 1605, Sir David Murray, Lord Scone, comptroller of Scotland, was directed to repair to Kintyre, to receive the obedience of the principal men of the clans in the South Isles, with surety for the payment of his majesty's rents and duties, when the laird of Loup, with Angus Macdonald and his relatives and vassals in Kintyre, were the only persons who appeared before him. Dying soon after, he was interred at Iona, the burial-place of the Macalisters.

His son, Hector, succeeded while still very young. On 3d July 1615, two of his kinsmen, Alester and Angus Macalester, with Angus Oig, brother of Sir James Macdonald, were tried before the privy council for high treason, for forcibly seizing on the castle of Dunyveg in Isla, and holding it out against his majesty's forces under Sir Oliver Lambert, and being found guilty, were executed at the market cross of Edinburgh on the 8th of the same month. In 1618 the laird of Loup was named one of the twenty barons and gentlemen of the shire of Argyle who were made responsible for the good rule of the earldom during Argyle's absence. He married Margaret, daughter of Colin Campbell of Kilberry, and though, as a vassal of the marquis of Argyle, he took no part in the wars of the marquis of Montrose, many of his clan fought on the side of the latter, and one of them particularly distinguished himself at the battle of Inverlochy, February 2, 1645 After the Restoration he was one of the commissioners of supply for the shire of Argyle, as was also, in 1678, his son Godfrey MacAlester of Loup, who succeeded him. Alexander MacAlester of Loup, the son of the latter, adhered, after the Revolution, to the cause of James VII., and was present at the battle of Killiecrankie, under the Viscount Dundee. He afterwards joined the force commanded by Major-general Buchan, which was totally routed at Cromdale 1st May 1690. Subsequently, proceeding to Ireland, he was present at the battle of the Boyne. He had three sons, Hector, of Loup, Charles, who succeeded his brother, and Duncan, who settled in Holland, where he left numerous descendants. His son, Robert MacAlester, a general in the Dutch service, was commandant of the Scots brigade.

Charles MacAlester of Loup had two sons, Angus, his successor, who sold a considerable part of his patrimony, and Lieutenant-general Archibald MacAlester, who for many years commanded the 55th regiment, and was father of Lieutenant-colonel MacAlester of the Ceylon rifle regiment.

Angus, of Loup, married his cousin Jane, then a widow, daughter of John Macdonald of Ardnacrolah, cousin of the celebrated Flora Macdonald, and died in 1796. With one son, Charles Somerville MacAlester of Loup, who succeeded him, he had three daughters.

The principal cadet of the family of Loup was MacAlester of Tarbert. There is also MacAllister of Glenbarr, county of Argyle.

MACALPIN, a surname held by a branch of the Ross-shire or native Gael, and supposed to have been adopted from the Albanich, the first known inhabitants of Scotland. The general denomination Siol Alpin includes several clans, descendants of the race to which belonged Kenneth MacAlpin, under whom the Scots and Picts were united, namely, the clan Gregor, the clan Grant, the Mackinnons, the Macnabs, the MacDuffies, or Macfies, the MacQuarries, and the Macaulays. See these clans.

MACARTHUR (Gaelic Artair), a branch of the clan Campbell, which formerly inhabited the shores of Loch Awe, opposite the island of Inishail, and long disputed the chieftainship of the Campbells with the powerful family of Argyle. Mr Skene, in his Highlanders of Scotland, (vol. ii. p. 282,) says, "It is certain that until the reign of Robert the Bruce the Campbells did not possess an heritable right to any property in Argyleshire. The situation of the MacArthur branch at this time was very different, for we find them in possession of a very extensive territory in the earldom of Garmoran, the original seat of the Campbells. It is, therefore, impossible to doubt that MacArthur was at this time at the head of the clan, and this position he appears to have maintained until the reign of James I." MacArthur adhered to the cause of Robert the Bruce, and received, as his reward, a considerable portion of the forfeited territory of MacDugall of Lorn, Bruce's great enemy He obtained also the keeping of the castle of Dunstaffnage. After the marriage of Sir Neil Campbell with the king's sister, the power and possessions of the Campbell branch rapidly increased, and in the reign of David II they appear to have first put forward their claims to the chieftainship, but were successfully resisted by MacArthur, who obtained a charter "Arthuro Campbell quod nulli subjicitur pro terris nisi regi."

In the reign of James I the chief's name was John MacArthur, and so great was his following that he could bring 1,000 men into the field. In 1427 that king, in a progress through the north, held a parliament at Inverness, to which he summoned all the Highland chiefs, and among others who then felt his vengeance was John MacArthur, who was beheaded, and his whole lands forfeited. From that period the chieftainship is said to have been lost to the MacArthurs, the family subsequently obtained Strachur in Cowal and portions of Glenfalloch and Glendochart in Perthshire.

Many of the name of MacArthur are still found about Dunstaffnage, but they have long been merely tenants to the Campbells. The MacArthurs were hereditary pipers to the MacDonalds of the Isles, and the last of the race was piper to the Highland Society He composed many pieces of bagpipe music, which were highly esteemed by competent judges. A portrait of Archibald MacArthur, a native of the island of Mull, who died in 1834, piper to Sir Reginald Macdonald Stewart Seton of Touch and Staffa, baronet, is in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits.

M'ARTHUR, JOHN, LL.D, a miscellaneous writer, was born in Scotland in 1755 For several years he acted as secretary to Admiral Lord Hood, and was engaged in that capacity at the breaking out of the first French Revolution, and the consequent occupation of Toulon by the British. During the American war he officiated as judge-advocate. He died at Hayfield, Hampshire, July 29, 1840 He published the following works:

The Army and Navy Gentleman's Companion, displaying the Intricacies of Small Sword Play Lond. 1780.

Principles and Practice of Naval and Military Courts Martial, with an Appendix, containing Original Papers and Documents illustrative of the subject. Lond. 1792, 8vo. 2d edit. with considerable additions and improvements. Lond. 1806, 2 vols. 8vo. 4th edit. enlarged. 1813, 2 vols. 8vo.

Financial and Political Facts of the Eighteenth Century; with Comparative Estimates of the Revenue, Expenditure, Debts, Manufactures, and Commerce of Great Britain. London, 1801, 8vo. Published anonymously, but a second edition appeared in 1803, with his name.

The Poems of Ossian in the original Gaelic, with literal Translations into Latin, by the late Robert Macfarlane, A.M, together with an Essay on the Authenticity of the Poems, by Sir John Sinclair, Bart., and a Translation from the Italian of the Abbe Cesarotti's Critical Dissertation on their Authenticity, with Notes, by Dr M'Arthur, 3 vols. 8vo, 1807

In conjunction with the Rev James Stanier Clarke, he also published, in 1810, a Life of Lord Nelson,' from his Lordship's manuscripts, 2 vols. 4to.

M'AULAY, the name of a minor clan, claimed as one of the seven great branches of the Siol Alpin, undoubtedly the purest and oldest of the Gael. Their badge of distinction was the pine. It was held at one time that the M'Aulays derived their origin from the ancient earls of Lennox, and that their ancestor was Maurice, brother of earl Maldouin and son of Aulay, whose name appears in the Ragman Roll as having sworn fealty to Edward I in 1296. According to Skene, (Highlanders, vol ii page 264,) these Aulays were of the family of De Fasselan, who afterwards succeeded to the earldom

The M'Aulays consider themselves a sept of the clan Gregor, their chief being designed of Ardincaple from his residence in Dumbartonshire. That property was in their possession in the reign of Edward I They early settled in the Lennox, and their names often occur in the Lennox chartulary, hence the very natural supposition that they sprung from that distinguished house. In a bond of manrent, or deed of clanship, entered into between MacGregor of Glenstrae and M'Aulay of Ardincaple, of date 27th May 1591, the latter acknowledges his being a cadet of the former, and agrees to pay him the "calp," that is, a tribute of cattle given in acknowledgment of superiority In 1694, in a similar bond given to Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchinbreck, they again declared themselves MacGregors. "Their connexion with the MacGregors' says Mr Skene, "led them to take some part in the feuds that unfortunate race were at all times engaged in, but the protection of the earls of Lennox seems to have relieved the M'Aulays from the consequences which fell so heavily on the MacGregors."

Mr Joseph Irving, in his 'History of Dumbartonshire,' (p. 418,) states that the surname of the family was originally Ardincaple of that ilk, a name absurdly said to signify in the Gaelic "the promontory of the mare," but in this he is wrong, as it, truly and correctly, means "the chapel in the wood," ardan signifying trees, and capel the slightly changed form of the Latin capella. He adds, "A Celtic derivation may be claimed for this family, founded on the agreement entered into between the chief of the clan Gregor and Ardincaple in 1591, where they describe themselves as originally descended from the same stock, 'M'Alpins of auld,' but the theory most in harmony with the annals of the house (of Ardincaple of that ilk) fixes their descent from a younger son of the second Alwyn, earl of Lennox" Alexander de Ardincaple, who lived in the reign of James V, son of Aulay de Ardincaple, was the first to assume the name of M'Aulay, as stated in the Historical and Critical Remarks on the Ragman Roll (Nisbet, vol ii. App.), "to humour a patronymical designation, as being more agreeable to the head of a clan than the designation of Ardincaple of that ilk."

His son, Walter M'Aulay, after the battle of Langside, was one of the subscribers to the bond for the government being carried on in the name of the infant James. Walter's son, Sir Aulay M'Aulay, was the chief who entered into the alliance with the clan Gregor above mentioned. When the MacGregors fell under the ban of the law, he became conspicuous by the energy with which he turned against them, probably to avert suspicion from himself, as a bond of caution was entered into on his account on Sept. 8, 1610 He died in Dec. 1617, and was succeeded by his cousin-german, Alexander

Walter M'Aulay, the son of Alexander, was twice sheriff of Dumbarton He was cautioner, along with Stirling of Auchyle, that Alester Macgregor, of the house of Glenstrae, should keep the peace.

With Aulay M'Aulay, his son and successor, commenced the decline of the family He and his successors indulged in a system of extravagant living, which compelled them to dispose, piece by piece, of every acre of their once large possessions. Aulay's son, Archibald, was nominated a commissioner of supply in 1615 He was also a commissioner of justiciary for the trial of the Covenanters of the district. Although, however, attached to episcopacy, he was by no means a partisan of James VII, for in 1689 he raised a company of fencibles in aid of William and Mary

Aulay M'Aulay, the 8d in succession from Archibald, was a commissioner of supply of Dumbartonshire in 1764. This the 12th and last chief of the M'Aulays, having seen the patrimony of his house sold, and his castle roofless, died about 1767 Ardincaple had been purchased by John, 4th duke of Argyle, and now belongs to the Argyle family

About the beginning of the 18th century, a number of M'Aulays settled in Caithness and Sutherland Others went into Argyleshire, and some of the MacPheiderans of that county acknowledged their descent from the M'Aulays.

MACAUSLANE, in Ireland, M'Causland, a surname said to be derived from Busy Auselan, or Anselan, son of O'Kyan, King of Ulster, who came to Scotland in the reign of Malcolm II. See BUCHANAN, vol. i of this work, p. 459

MACBEAN, MACBANE, or MACBAIN, (clan Bheathain,) a sept of the clan Chattan, deriving their name from the fair complexion of their progenitor, or, according to some, from their living in a high country, beann being the Gaelic name for a mountain, hence Ben Nevis, Ben Lomond, &c. The distinctive badge of the MacBeans, like that of the Macleods, was the red whortleberry Of the Macintosh clan they are considered an offshoot, although some of themselves believe that they are Camerons. It is true that a division of the MacBeans fought under Lochiel in 1745, but their chief, Gollice or Gillies MacBane of Kinchoil, held the rank of major in the Macintosh battalion. This gigantic Highlander, who was six feet four and a half inches in height, could bring somewhat more than a hundred men into the field, and at the battle of Culloden his prowess was remarkable. Being beset by a party of the government troops, he placed his back against a wall, and though wounded in several places, he defended himself with his target and claymore against his assailants, till he had laid thirteen of them dead at his feet. An officer, observing his heroism, called to the soldiers "to save that brave man," but exasperated by his resistance, they cut him down. His son escaped from that memorable and disastrous field, and subsequently obtained a commission in Lord Drumlanrig's regiment. A pathetic lament in Gaelic, entitled Mo run geal oig, or, 'My fair young beloved,' is said to have been composed by MacBane's widow An elegiac poem in English, on the death of Gollice MacBane, erroneously stated to have been one of Byron's early effusions, is quoted in Logan's well-known work, 'The Gael,' from which the following three verses are extracted

With thy back to the wall and thy breast to the targe,
Full flashed thy claymore in the face of their charge,
The blood of the boldest that barren turf stain,
But alas! thine is reddest there, Gillies MacBane!

Hewn down, but still battling, thou sunk'st on the ground,
Thy plaid was one gore, and thy breast was one wound,
Thirteen of thy foes by thy right hand lay slain,
Oh! would they were thousands for Gillies MacBane!

Oh! loud and long heard shall thy coronach be,
And high o'er the heather thy cairn we shall see,
And deep in all bosoms thy name shall remain,
But deepest in mine, dearest Gillies MacBane!

MACBETH, king of Scotland, lived in the first half of the eleventh century He is said to have been by birth maormor of Ross, and also of Moray by marriage with the Lady Gruoch, granddaughter of Kenneth IV Her grandfather had been dethroned by Malcolm II, who burned her first husband, and murdered her brother, and who also slew the father of Macbeth These wrongs were avenged on his grandson, King Duncan, whom Macbeth assassinated, in 1039, at Bothgowanan, near Elgin, some historians say at his castle of Inverness, and immediately usurped the throne By the wisdom and vigour of his government he endeavoured to compensate for the defect in his title to the throne. The recollection of his guilt, however, seems to have haunted him continually He attempted by distributing money at Rome, by gifts of land to the church, and by charity to the poor, to obtain relief from the "affliction of those terrible dreams that did shake him nightly" Neither his liberality to the people, with the strict justice of his administration, nor the support of the clergy, sufficed to secure him a peaceful reign The nation was never fully reconciled to his usurpation, and his tyranny increased with the resistance to his authority He is represented as having erected a castle on Dunsinane Hill, in Perthshire, which commands a view of the whole country But there is no reason to suppose that he ever was at Dunsinane at all, and there is not the slightest evidence that there ever was a castle or any similar structure on that hill.

The injuries which he had inflicted on Macduff, the maormor of Fife, created in him a powerful enemy, and with other chieftains the latter fled to Duncan's son, Malcolm Canmore, who had taken refuge in Cumberland, and urged him to assert his right to the throne Siward, the potent earl of Northumberland, and his son Osbert, accompanied Malcolm into Scotland, with a numerous army, in 1054 After a furious battle, in which Osbert was killed, Macbeth was pursued to Lumphanan, in Aberdeenshire, where he was slain by Macduff, December 5, 1054, after a reign of 15 years Shakspere's imperishable tragedy of Macbeth is founded upon a fictitious narrative which Holinshed copied from Boece No such personage as Banquo is known in history

MACBRAIR, a surname sometimes written MacBriar, Macbryere, MackBrie, MacBray &c. The family of MacBraire of Tweedhill and Broadmeadows, Berwickshire, represent the ancient family of MacBraires of Netherwood, Dumfries-shire James MacBraire, merchant, Newfoundland, on his return to Scotland in 1817, purchased the estates in Berwickshire.

MACCORQUODALE, otherwise Mac Torquil (the son of Torquil), Mac Corkle, or Corkindale, the surname of a Highland sept, the founder of which was Torquil, a prince of Denmark, who is traditionally stated to have been in the army of Kenneth the Great, on his coming over from Ireland to the assistance of Alpin, king of the Scots, against the Picts. Previous to Kenneth's arrival, King Alpin, in a battle with the Pictish king, was killed, and his head fixed on an iron spike in the midst of the Pictish city, situated where the Carron ironworks now stand. King Kenneth offered to any one in his army who would pass the Pictish sentinels and remove the head, a grant of all the lands on Loch Awe side Torquil, the Dane, undertook the hazardous enterprize, and brought the head to the king, for which act of bravery he was rewarded by a charter of the lands promised. This charter was for a long time preserved in the family, though the greater part of the lands had passed to other hands. Shortly before the Revolution it was lent to Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, for his inspection, and was lost. At least it disappeared from that time. The name which is, in some places of the Highlands, still called Mac Torquil, is perhaps one of the most ancient in the county of Argyle. Donald MacCorquodale of Kinna-Drochag, on Loch Awe side, who died towards the end of the 18th century, was the lineal descendant of Torquil and the chief of the clan His grandson and representative, John MacCorquodale, at one period resided at Row, Dumbartonshire.

M'CRIE, THOMAS, D D, a distinguished divine and historian, was born at Dunse, in November 1772 He received his elementary instruction at the parish school, and before he was 15 years of age, he taught successively two country schools in the neighbourhood of his native town In 1788 he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, and in May 1791 he became the teacher of a school at Brechin, in connection with the Antiburgher congregation of that town He studied divinity under Mr Archibald Bruce, minister at Whitburn, and theological professor of the General Associate or Antiburgher Synod In September 1795 he was licensed as a preacher by the Associate presbytery of Kelso, and in May 1796 he was ordained minister of the second Associate congregation in the Potterrow, Edinburgh His first publication was a Sermon, and to a new religious periodical started in Edinburgh in 1797, called 'The Christian Magazine,' of which he was afterwards for a time editor, he communicated various able papers on different subjects He also distinguished himself in polemical theology, having, in conjunction with Mr Whytock of Dalkeith, published two pamphlets on Faith, in answer to some statements contained in a work by a Baptist minister of Edinburgh

In 1806, Mr M'Crie felt himself conscientiously impelled to separate from the General Associate Synod, on account of the doctrines involved in 'The Narrative and Testimony' adopted by that body in 1804, relative to the powers and duties of the civil magistrate in ecclesiastical matters. He and Mr Bruce, and two other ministers, entered repeated protests against the prevailing party in the Synod, "for having departed from some important doctrines of the Protestant churches, of the Westminster Confession of Faith, and of that particular testimony which they had subscribed" at their license and ordination; and on August 28, 1806, the four protesters, Messrs. M'Crie, Bruce, Hog, and Aitken, formed themselves into a presbytery, afterwards styled "The Constitutional Associate Presbytery" Having thus dissolved their connection with the Synod, the latter body almost immediately thereafter formally deposed Messrs. Aitken and M'Crie from the ministry A tedious lawsuit took place relative to the possession of his meeting-house, which was decided against him, when a new chapel was erected for him, in West Richmond Street, by those of his people who had espoused his sentiments The Constitutional Presbytery existed till 1827, when, being joined by a body of protesters from the Associate Synod, they took the name of Original Seceders

In the examination of the question in dispute Mr M'Crie had been led to enter deeply into the study of Ecclesiastical history, particularly in Scotland, when he obtained a most intimate acquaintance with the fundamental principles of the Protestant churches, as well as a thorough knowledge of the character and objects of those eminent and faithful men by whose labours they were founded His 'Life of John Knox' was published in November 1811, and a second edition, with considerable alterations and additions, appeared in 1813 This work gave a juster view of the conduct and principles of the illustrious Reformer than had ever before been exhibited, and at once placed its author in the first rank of ecclesiastical historians It has gone through several editions, and has been translated into the French, Dutch, and German languages Shortly after its appearance, the university of Edinburgh conferred upon the author the degree of D D, being the first time it had been bestowed on a Dissenting minister in Scotland. To the pages of the 'Christian Instructor,' then edited by Dr Andrew Thomson, Dr. M'Crie became an occasional contributor, and one of the ablest of the articles furnished to that periodical was his celebrated critique of the 'Tales of my Landlord,' inserted in the numbers for January, February, and March, 1817, containing a powerful and complete vindication of the Covenanters against the attacks of Sir Walter Scott.

During 1817 and 1818, after the death of Mr. Bruce, Dr M'Crie performed the duties of professor of theology to the small body with which he was connected. In the end of 1819 appeared his 'Life of Andrew Melville,' intended as a continuation of the ecclesiastical history which he had commenced in the Life of Knox. This also has become a standard work. The 2d edition was published in December 1823, with numerous additions and improvements.

In 1821 Dr M'Crie published 'Two Discourses on the Unity of the Church, her Divisions, and their Removal,' designed to show the fallacious principles on which the then recent union of the Burghers and Anti-burghers had been founded He subsequently published the following works In 1825, 'Memoirs of Mr William Veitch, and George Bryson,' in 1827, 'History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy, in the 16th Century,' and in 1829, a similar History of the Reformation in Spain His last publication was an anonymous pamphlet, in May 1833, on the subject of Patronage, in which he recommends its entire abolition He had been, for several years, engaged on a Life of Calvin, for which he had collected the most valuable materials, but which was left incomplete Dr M'Crie died at Edinburgh, August 5, 1835

He was twice married, first, in 1796, to Janet, daughter of Mr William Dickson, farmer, parish of Swinton, by whom he had Rev Thomas M'Crie, D D, LL D, his successor, appointed in 1857 professor of systematic theology in the London Theological college of the Presbyterian church in England, William, merchant in Edinburgh, Jessie, wife of Archibald Meikle, Esq, Flemington, John, who died in Oct. 1837, and Rev George, minister, Clola, Aberdeenshire; and, 2dly, in 1827, to Mary, 4th daughter of Rev. Robert Chalmers of Haddington, who survived him; and to whom, on her husband's death, a handsome annuity was granted by Government. A life of this estimable divine was published by his son, the Rev Thomas M'Crie, in 1840

MacCulloch, the surname of an ancient family of Galloway, whose origin is lost in antiquity; ultra memoriam hominum, as it is phrased in one of their early charters. It is understood that the M'Cullochs are lineally descended from Ulgric, the grandson of Owen Gallvus, king of the Cludienses, or Strathcluyd Britons, Ulgric and Douvenald being vice sovereigns of Galloway. In proof of this the M'Cullochs, Mackulaghs, or Culaghs, are said to have held that portion of land over which Ulgric or Ulgrah reigned, and the M'Dowalls the portion over which Douvenald had sway.

The first of the name of any note was Culagh or Cullagh, son of Allil, who was killed in a skirmish in the land of the Picts in 864. As far back as the 11th century this ancient family held the lands of Cardoness, Myretoun, and Ardwall, Kirkcudbrightshire, and the last-named estate is still possessed by the head of the name, Walter M'Culloch of Ardwall.

Amongst those who swore fealty to Edward I. at Berwick, August 28, 1296, was William Mackulagh. In 1305 Thomas Mackulagh was sheriff of Wigtownshire.

Robert the Bruce granted lands to one Richard M'Colnach, June 18, 1324. On March 19, 1357–8, King Edward III granted to Patrick Maculach a pension of £20 yearly, for his good services in Scotland. On Aug. 20, 1341, he also gave a mandate to Gilbert M'Culloch for 2 pounds and 14 pennies, for wages due to him in the king's services. (Rot. Scot. 612.) In 1350–1 Patrick M'Culloch, William de Aldeburgh, and John de Wigginton, were commissioners for Edward Balıol. (Rot. Scotiæ.) But in 1358 the M'Cullochs submitted to King David II.

On Oct. 17, 1488, a decree was given to Quentin Agnew, sheriff of Wigtown, that he should restore to Archibald M'Culloch 28 oxen, 88 sheep, 4 horses, and other goods, the value of all which are therein specified. (Acta Auditorum, p. 188.) In 1507, when the earl of Derby, king of Man, made a descent on the town of Kirkcudbright, Cutler M'Culloch, chief of the clan of that name, collected a number of ships, and sailed for the Isle of Man, which he ravaged and plundered.

In 1514 a charter was granted in favour of M'Culloch of Myretoun, to the lands of Merton, constituting them into a barony from that year to 1566. In the different civil wars and broils of that stormy period, the lards of Cardoness and Myretoun took an active part. The chief of the M'Cullochs was one of the subscribers to the bond entered into in 1567, to support the young King James' authority

In 1587 William M'Culloch of Cardoness and Myretoun, and Mary, his wife, granted the lands of Ardwall to their nephew, William M'Culloch. In 1612 M'Culloch of Ardwall was fined £1,200 for opposing the king's authority

The family of M'Culloch of Myretoun was raised to the rank of a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles I. in 1634 The last baronet was Sir Godfrey M'Culloch of Ardwall, who was beheaded at Edinburgh, March 26, 1697, for having, in a passionate moment, shot one William Gourdon The proceedings of his trial, and his speech and letter to his wife and children, will be found in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials.

The descendants of this ancient family have lived in the old house of Ardwall since 1587 Walter M Culloch of Ardwall, the 6th in the direct line, for many years held the appointment of sheriff-depute of Kirkcudbrightshire.

From the family of Myretoun descended the M'Cullochs of Drummoral and the M'Cullochs of Muill. The M'Cullochs of Piltoun descend from the M'Cullochs of Cadboll.

M'DIARMID, a surname derived from Diarmid O'Dwin, the ancestor of the Campbell race, who in the Gaelic language are called Siol Diarmid, the offspring of Diarmid. (See vol. i. p. 543.)

M'DIARMID, JOHN, an industrious miscellaneous writer, was born in 1779, at Weem, in Perthshire, of which parish his father was minister He studied at the universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, and was for some time tutor in a gentleman's family Relinquishing his original design to enter the church, he repaired, in 1801, to London, where he became a contributor to several periodicals, and editor of the St. James' Chronicle. He was the author of various works, the last of which, written in distress and illness, was 'Lives of British Statesmen.' "His whole life," says D'Israeli, who has introduced him into his 'Calamities of Authors,' "was one melancholy trial. Often the day passed cheerfully without its meal, but never without its page." He died of a paralytic stroke, April 7, 1807. His works are:

An Inquiry into the System of Military Defence of Great Britain. London, 1803, 2 vols. 8vo. In this work he points out the effects of the volunteer system, and asserts the superiority of a regular army

Inquiry into the Nature of Civil and Military Subordination. London, 1804, 8vo.

MACDONALD, the name of a numerous and wide-spread clan, divided into several tribes, which derived its generic name from Donald, elder son of Reginald, second son of the celebrated Somerled of Argyle, king of the Isles, an account of whom is given at page 530 of this volume, under the head of LORD OF THE ISLES, which see, for the history of these powerful chiefs till their forfeiture in 1493

The distinctive badge of this clan was the bell-heath. They formed the principal branch of the Siol-Conn, or race of Conn, their great founder, Somerled, being supposed by the Sennachies or Celtic genealogists, to have been descended from an early Irish king, called Conn of the Hundred battles. Although a Norwegian extraction has been claimed for them, their own traditions invariably represent the MacDonalds as of Pictish descent, and as forming part of the great tribe of the Gall-gael, or Gaelic pirates, who in ancient times inhabited the coasts of Argyle, Arran, and Man. The latter is Mr Skene's opinion (History of the Highlands, vol. ii. p. 38) The antiquity of the clan is undoubted, and one of their own name traces it back to the sixth century Sir James MacDonald of Kintyre, in a letter addressed, in 1615, to the bishop of the Isles, declares that his race "has been tenne hundred years kyndlie Scottismen under the kings of Scotland"

The representative and undoubted heir-male of John, eleventh earl of Ross, and last lord of the Isles, is Lord Macdonald, of the family of Sleat in Skye, descended from Hugh, the brother of Earl John and the third son of Alexander, tenth earl of Ross. A son, John, whom Hugh of Sleat had by his first wife, Fynvola, daughter of Alexander MacIan of Ardnamurchan, died without issue, but by a second wife, a lady of the clan Gunn, he had another son, Donald, called Gallach, from being fostered by his mother's relations in Caithness. He had several other sons, and his descendants were so numerous in the 16th century that they were known as the clan Huisteen, or children of Hugh They were also called the Clandonald north, from their residence in Skye and North Uist, to distinguish them from the clan Ian Vohr of Isla and Kintyre (see following article), who were called the Clandonald south. Since the extinction of the direct line of the family of the Isles, in the middle of the 16th century, Macdonald of Sleat, now Lord Macdonald, has always been styled in Gaelic. MacDhonuill nan Eilean, or Macdonald of the Isles. (Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, page 61.)

Donald Gallach's great-grandson, Donald Macdonald Gormeson of Sleat, son of that Donald Gorme, the claimant of the lordship of the Isles, who was slain in 1589 at Elandonan in Kintail (see page 534 of this volume), was a minor at the time of his father's death, and his title to the family estates was disputed by the Macleods of Harris. He ranged himself on the side of Mary queen of Scots when the disputes about her marriage began in 1565. With MacLeod of Lewis he was engaged in a feud with the Mackenzies, and in August 1569 he and Mackenzie of Kintail were obliged, in presence of the regent Moray and the privy council at Perth, to settle, under the regent's mediation, the quarrels and disputes between them. He died in 1585.

His eldest son, Donald Gorme Mor, fifth in descent from Hugh of Sleat, soon after succeeding his father, found himself involved in a deadly feud with the Macleans of Dowart, which raged to such an extent as to lead to the interference of government, and to the passing in 1587 of an act of parliament, commonly called "The general Bond" or Band, for maintaining good order both on the borders and in the Highlands and Isles. By this act, it was made imperative on all landlords, bailies, and chiefs of clans, to find sureties for the peaceable behaviour of those under them. The contentions, however, between the Macdonalds and the Macleans continued, and in 1589, with the view of putting an end to them, the king and council adopted the following plan. After remissions under the privy seal had been granted to Donald Gorme of Sleat, his kinsman, Macdonald of Isla, the principal in the feud, and Maclean of Dowart, for all crimes committed by them, they were induced to proceed to Edinburgh, under pretence of consulting with the king and council for the good rule of the country, but immediately on their arrival, they were seized and imprisoned in the castle. In the summer of 1591, they were set at liberty, on paying each a fine to the king, that imposed on Sleat being £4,000, under the name of arrears of feu duties and crown rents in the Isles, and finding security for their future obedience and the performance of certain prescribed conditions. They were also taken bound to return to their confinement in the castle of Edinburgh, whenever they should be summoned, on twenty days' warning. In consequence of their not fulfilling the conditions imposed upon them, and their continuing in opposition to the government, their pardons were recalled, and the three island chiefs were cited before the privy council on the 14th July 1593, when failing to appear, summonses of treason were executed against them and certain of their associates.

In 1595, Donald Gorme and Macleod of Harris, with each 500 of their followers, went to Ulster, to the assistance of Red Hugh O'Donnell, then in rebellion against Queen Elizabeth, but the former almost immediately returned to the Isles, leaving his brother in command of his clansmen. In the following year he procured a lease from the crown of the district of Trouterness in Skye, but when, two years afterwards, that district was granted by the king, with the island of Lewis, belonging to Macleod of Harris, to a company of lowland adventurers, chiefly Fifeshire gentlemen, for the purpose of colonization, he joined with Macleod and Mackenzie of Kintail in preventing their settlement either in the Lewis or in Skye, and the project in consequence ultimately failed.

In 1601, the chief of Sleat again brought upon himself and his clan the interference of government by a feud with Macleod of Dunvegan, which led to much bloodshed and great misery and distress among their followers and their families. He had married a sister of Macleod, but, from jealousy or some other cause, he put her away, and refused at her brother's request to take her back. Having procured a divorce, he soon after married a sister of Kenneth Mackenzie of Kintail. Macleod immediately assembled his clan, and carried fire and sword through Macdonald's district of Trouterness. The latter, in revenge, invaded Harris, and laid waste that island, killing many of the inhabitants, and carrying off their cattle. The Macleods, in their turn, invaded Macdonald's island of North Uist, when Donald Glas Macleod, a kinsman of the chief, and forty men, in endeavouring to carry off some cattle, were encountered and totally defeated by a near relative of Donald Gorme, called Donald Maclan Vic James, who had only twelve men with him, Donald Glas and many of the Macleods being killed. "These spoliations and incursions were carried on with so much inveteracy, that both clans were brought to the brink of ruin, and many of the natives of the districts thus devastated were forced to sustain themselves by killing and eating their horses, dogs, and cats." (Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, page 296.) The Macdonalds having invaded Macleod's lands in Skye, a battle took place on the mountain Benquillin between them and the Macleods, when the latter, under Alexander, the brother of their chief, were defeated with great loss, and their leader with thirty of their clan taken captive. On being informed of this, the privy council issued orders for the contending chiefs to disband their forces and to quit the island, Macleod being enjoined to give himself up to the earl of Argyle, and Macdonald to surrender himself to the marquis of Huntly. A reconciliation was at length effected between them by the mediation of Macdonald of Isla, Maclean of Coll, and other friends, when the prisoners taken at Benquillin were released. (Ibid. page 297.)

In 1608, we find Donald Gorme of Sleat one of the Island chiefs who attended the court of Lord Ochiltree, the king's lieutenant, at Aros in Mull, when he was sent there for the settlement of order in the Isles, and who afterwards accepted his invitation to dinner on board the king's ship, called the Moon. When dinner was ended, Ochiltree told the astonished chiefs that they were his prisoners by the king's order; and weighing anchor he sailed direct to Ayr, whence he proceeded with his prisoners to Edinburgh and presented them before the privy council, by whose order they were placed in the several castles of Dumbarton, Blackness, and Stirling. Petitions were immediately presented by the imprisoned chiefs to the council submitting themselves to the king's pleasure, and making many offers in order to procure their liberation. A number of commissioners were appointed to receive their proposals, and to deliberate upon all matters connected with the civilisation of the Isles, and the increase of his majesty's rents. In the following year the bishop of the Isles was deputed as sole commissioner to visit and survey the isles, and all the chiefs in prison were set at liberty, on finding security to a large amount, not only for their return to Edinburgh by a certain fixed day, but for their active concurrence, in the meantime, with the bishop in making the proposed survey. Donald Gorme of Sleat was one of the twelve chiefs and gentlemen of the Isles, who met the bishop at Iona, in July 1609, and submitted themselves to him, as the king's representative. At a court then held by the bishop, the nine celebrated statutes called the "Statutes of Icolmkill," for the improvement and order of the Isles, were enacted, with the consent of the assembled chiefs, and their bonds and oaths given for the obedience thereto of their clansmen. (Ibid. p. 330.) On the 28th June 1610 the chief of Sleat and five others of the principal Islanders went to Edinburgh, to hear the king's pleasure declared to them, when they were compelled to give sureties to a large amount for their reappearance before the council in May 1611 They were also taken bound to concur with and assist the king's lieutenants, justices and commissioners, in all matters connected with the Isles, to live together in peace and amity, and to submit all their disputes in future to the decision of the law In 1618 we find Donald Gorme of Sleat, Macleod of Harris, Maclean of Dowart, and Donald MacAllan, captain of the Clanranald, mentioned as having settled with the exchequer, and as continuing in their obedience to the laws. In the following year, while on his way home from Edinburgh, after transacting business with the privy council, he was sent by the bishop of the Isles, with Sir Aulay MacAulay of Ardincaple, to Angus Oig, brother of Sir James Macdonald of Isla, who had seized the castle of Dunyveg, to endeavour to prevail upon him to surrender it, but his negotiation was unsuccessful. On the escape of Sir James MacDonald from Edinburgh castle in 1615, he proceeded to Sleat, where he had a lengthened conference with Donald Gorme. Although the latter did not himself join him, a number of his clan did, when he sailed for Isla, to raise the standard of insurrection against the government.

In 1616, after the suppression of the rebellion of the Clanranald in the South Isles, certain very stringent conditions were imposed by the privy council on the different Island chiefs. Among these were, that they were to take home farms into their own hands, which they were to cultivate, "to the effect that they might be thereby exercised and eschew idleness," and that they were not to use in their houses more than a certain quantity of wine respectively Donald Gorme of Sleat, having been prevented by sickness from attending the council with the other chiefs, ratified all their proceedings, and found the required sureties, by a bond dated in the month of August. He named Duntullim, a castle of his family in Trouterness, as his residence, when six household gentlemen, and an annual consumption of four tun of wine, were allowed to him, and he was once a-year to exhibit to the council three of his principal kinsmen He died the same year, without issue, and was succeeded by his nephew, Donald Gorme Macdonald of Sleat.

In July of the following year, the latter, who had been knighted, as he is styled Sir Donald, appeared, with other chiefs, before the council, and continued annually to do so, in accordance with the conditions already referred to In 1622, on his and their appearance to make their obedience to the privy council as usual, several acts of importance, relating to the Isles, were passed, by one of which the chief of Sleat and three other chiefs were bound not to molest those engaged in the trade of fishing in the Isles, under heavy penalties. On 14th July 1625, after having concluded, in an amicable manner, all his disputes with the Macleods of Harris, and another controversy in which he was engaged with the captain of the Clanranald, he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles I., with a special clause of precedency placing him second of that order in Scotland. He adhered to the cause of that monarch, but died in 1648. He had married Janet, commonly called "fair Janet," second daughter of Kenneth, first Lord Mackenzie of Kintail, by whom he had several children

His eldest son, Sir James Macdonald, second baronet of Sleat, joined the marquis of Montrose in 1645, and when Charles II marched into England in 1651, he sent a number of his clan to his assistance. He died 8th December 1678.

Sir James' eldest son, Sir Donald Macdonald, third baronet of Sleat, died in 1695 His son, also named Sir Donald, fourth baronet, was one of those persons summoned by the lord advocate, on the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, to appear at Edinburgh, under pain of a year's imprisonment and other penalties, to give bail for their allegiance to the government. Joining in the insurrection, his two brothers commanded the battalion of his clan, on the Pretender's side, at Sheriffmuir, and, being sent out with the earl Marischal's horse to drive away a reconnoitring party, under the duke of Argyle, from the heights, may be said to have commenced the battle. Sir Donald himself had joined the earl of Seaforth at his camp at Alness with 700 Macdonalds. After the suppression of the rebellion Sir Donald proceeded to the isle of Skye with about 1,000 men, but although he made no resistance, having no assurance of protection from the government in case of a surrender, he retired into one of the Uists, where he remained till he obtained a ship which carried him to France. He was forfeited for his share in the insurrection, but the forfeiture was soon removed. He died in 1718, leaving one son and four daughters.

The son, Sir Donald Macdonald, fifth baronet, died, unmarried, in 1720, when the title reverted to his uncle, Sir James Macdonald of Oronsay, sixth baronet. The latter had one son and three daughters. Margaret, the second daughter, became the wife of Sir Robert Douglas of Glenbervie, baronet, author of the Peerage and Baronage of Scotland. Sir James died in 1723.

His son, Sir Alexander Macdonald, seventh baronet, was one of the first persons asked by Prince Charles to join him, on his arrival off the western islands, in July 1745, but refused, as he had brought no foreign force with him Young Clanranald, accompanied by Allan Macdonald, a younger brother of Macdonald of Kinlochmoidart, was despatched with letters from the prince to Sir Alexander and the laird of Macleod, to solicit their aid They could have brought between them 2,000 men, to his assistance, and had promised to join him, if supported by a foreign force, but when they found he had come without troops they considered the enterprise desperate, and would have nothing to do with it. On the 11th August Sir Alexander wrote to the lord-president, Forbes of Culloden, informing him of the names of the chiefs who had joined Charles, and requesting directions how to act in the event of any of them being compelled to take refuge in the islands. In this letter, speaking for Macleod and himself, he says "You may believe, my lord, our spirits are in a great deal of agitation, and that we are much at a loss how to behave in so extraordinary an occurrence. That we will have no connexion with these madmen is certain, but are bewildered in every other respect till we hear from you Whenever these rash men meet with a check, 'tis more than probable they'll endeavour to retire to their islands how we ought to behave in that event we expect to know from your lordship Their force even in that case must be very inconsiderable to be repelled with batons, and we have no other arms in any quantity" (Culloden Papers, p. 207) After the battle of Preston, the prince sent Mr Alexander Macleod, advocate, to the isle of Skye, to endeavour to prevail upon Sir Alexander Macdonald and the laird of Macleod to join the insurgents, but instead of doing so, these and other well-affected chiefs enrolled each an independent company for the service of government, out of their respective clans. The Macdonalds of Skye served under Lord Loudon in Ross-shire

After the battle of Culloden, when Prince Charles, in his wanderings, took refuge in Skye, with Flora Macdonald, they landed near Moydhstat, the seat of Sir Alexander Macdonald, near the northern extremity of that island Sir Alexander was at that time with the duke of Cumberland at Fort Augustus, and as his wife, Lady Margaret Montgomerie, a daughter of the ninth earl of Eglinton, was known to be a warm friend of the prince, Miss Macdonald proceeded to announce to her his arrival. She had previously received a letter from Charles, informing her that he intended to seek refuge on her husband's property, and on being told by the bearer of it to burn it, she rose up, and, kissing the letter, exclaimed, "No! I will not burn it. I will preserve it for the sake of him who wrote it to me. Although King George's forces should come to the house, I hope I shall find a way to secure the letter" Through Lady Margaret the prince was consigned to the care of Mr Macdonald of Kingsburgh, Sir Alexander's factor, at whose house he spent the night, and afterwards departed to the island of Raasay Charles subsequently declared, when refused assistance by Macdonald of Morar, who had been one of his adherents, that some of those who had joined him at first, had turned their backs on him in his greatest need, while others who had refused to join him became, in his adversity, his best friends, for it was remarkable, he said, that those of Sir Alexander Macdonald's following had been most faithful to him in his distress, and had contributed greatly to his preservation. Sir Alexander died in November 1746, leaving three sons.

His eldest son, Sir James, eighth baronet, styled "The Scottish Marcellus," was born in 1741 From his infancy he exhibited the most extraordinary abilities, and, after receiving the rudiments of his education at home, at his own earnest solicitation he was sent to Eton, where, so great was his proficiency, and so precocious his genius, that Dr Barnard, in a very short time, actually placed him at the head of his class. On leaving Eton he set out on his travels, and was everywhere received by the learned with the distinction due to his unrivalled talents. At Rome, in particular, the most marked attention was paid to him by several of the cardinals. He died in that city on 26th July 1766, when only 25 years old. In extent of learning, and in genius, he resembled "the Admirable Crichton" Like him, too, he was prematurely cut off in the full promise of his days, leaving scarcely any authentic memorials of his wonderful acquirements. On his death the title devolved on his next brother, Alexander The third brother, Archibald, was educated at Westminster school and Christ church, Oxford, and studied for the English bar After being solicitor-general and attorney-general, he was appointed lord-chief-baron of the court of exchequer He was created a baronet of Great Britain in 1813 He died in 1826, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son, styled of East Sheen, Surrey

Sir Alexander, 9th baronet, was created a peer of Ireland, July 17, 1776, as Baron Macdonald of Sleat, county Antrim. He married eldest daughter of Godfrey Bosvile, Esq of Gunthwaite, Yorkshire; issue, 6 sons and 8 daughters. Diana, the eldest daughter, married in 1788 Right Hon. Sir John Sinclair of Ulbster, baronet. His lordship died Sept. 12, 1795.

His eldest son, Alexander Wentworth, 2d Lord Macdonald, died, unmarried, June 19, 1824, when his brother, Godfrey, became 3d Lord Macdonald. He assumed the additional name of Bosvile. He married Louisa Maria, daughter of Farley Edsir, Esq.; issue, 8 sons and 7 daughters. A major-general in the army. He died Oct. 13, 1832.

The eldest son, Godfrey William Wentworth, 4th Lord Macdonald, born in 1809, married in 1845, daughter of G T Wyndham, Esq. of Cromer Hall, Norfolk, issue, Somerled James Bradenell, born in 1849, 2 other sons and 5 daughters.

The Macdonalds of Isla and Kintyre, called the clan Ian Vor, whose chiefs were usually styled lords of Dunyveg, from their castle in Isla, and the Glens, were descended from John Mor, second son of "the good John of Isla," and of Lady Margaret Stewart, daughter of King Robert II. From his brother Donald, lord of the Isles, he received large grants of land in Isla and Kintyre, and by his marriage with Marjory Bisset, heiress of the district of the Glens in Antrim, he acquired possessions in Ulster He was murdered before 1427 by an individual named James Campbell, who is said to have received a commission from King James I., to apprehend him, but that he exceeded his powers by putting him to death. His eldest son, Donald, surnamed Balloch, is the chief who, when the Isles broke out into rebellion, on the imprisonment of his cousin Alexander, lord of the Isles and earl of Ross, took command of the Islanders, and at their head burst into Lochaber in 1431. Having encountered the king's army under the earls of Mar and Caithness at Inverlochy, he gained a complete victory, Caithness being killed, while Mar saved with difficulty the remains of the discomfited force. Donald Balloch, after ravaging the adjacent districts, withdrew first to the Isles, and afterwards to Ireland. It is stated erroneously that he was soon after betrayed into the hands of his enemies, and his head cut off and presented to James, and some historians have been led into the error of calling him, Donald, lord of the Isles, but that title he never claimed He escaped the vengeance of King James, and subsequently took a prominent part in the rebellions of John earl of Ross and lord of the Isles, (see page 582 of this volume). He was knighted before his death, which took place in 1476. From Ranald Bane, a younger brother of Donald Balloch, sprang the Clanranaldbane of Largie in Kintyre.

Donald Balloch's grandson, John, surnamed Cathanach, or warlike, was at the head of the clan Ian Vor, when the lordship of the Isles was finally forfeited by James IV in 1493 In that year he was among the chiefs, formerly vassals of the lord of the Isles, who made their submission to the king when he proceeded in person to the west Highlands. On this occasion he and the other chiefs were knighted. In the following year, the king having placed a garrison in the castle of Dunaverty in South Kintyre, Sir John of Isla collected his followers, and storming the castle, hung the governor from the wall, in sight of the king and his fleet. The treasurer's accounts show that in August 1494 he was summoned to answer for treason in Kintyre, and ere long he and four of his sons were apprehended in Isla by MacIan of Ardnamurchan and conveyed to Edinburgh. Being found guilty of high treason, they were executed on the Burrowmuir of Edinburgh, their bodies being interred in the church of St. Anthony Two surviving sons fled to Ireland. Alexander, the elder of them, is traditionally said in 1497 to have assisted MacIan, with whom he had effected a reconciliation, and had married his daughter, in putting to death Sir Alexander Macdonald of Lochalsh in the island of Oransay, whither that chief had retreated.

In 1517, when Sir Donald of Lochalsh, claiming to be lord of the Isles, rebelled against the government, his principal supporters, after the desertion of his chief leaders, were the clan Ian Vor, or Clandonald of Isla, and their followers; and the earl of Argyle, the king's lieutenant in the Isles, received particular instructions with regard to them, that if they should submit, their leaders, the surviving sons of the late Sir John Cathanach of Isla, were to receive crown lands in the Isles, to the annual value of 100 merks, to enable them to live without plundering the king's leges, and to keep good rule in time to come—they being now without heritage, owing to their father's forfeiture; and in the event of their refusal, to pursue them with the utmost severity (Gregory's Highlands and Isles, page 121.)

Alexander of Isla was with Sir Donald of Lochalsh when, in 1518, he proceeded against the father-in-law of the former, Macian of Ardnamurchan, who was defeated and slain, with two of his sons, at a place called Craiganairgid, or the Silver Craig in Morvern. The death of Sir Donald soon after brought the rebellion to a close. In 1529 Alexander of Isla and his followers were again in insurrection, and being joined by the Macleans, they made descents upon Rosseneath, Craignish, and other lands of the Campbells, which they ravaged with fire and sword. The latter retaliated in their turn, and the earl of Argyle was commissioned to proceed against the rebels. A herald being sent to Alexander of Isla, commanding him to lay down his arms, that chieftain refused. Owing, however, to the formidable preparations of government, nine of the principal islanders in 1530 sent in their submission Alexander of Isla being considered the prime mover of the rebellion, the king resolved in 1531 to proceed against him in person, on which, hastening to Stirling, under a safeguard and protection, he also submitted, and received a new grant, during the king's pleasure, of certain lands in the South Isles and Kintyre, and a remission to himself and his followers for all crimes committed by them during the late rebellion

Soon after, the earl of Argyle presented a complaint to the council, alleging that Alexander of Isla had been guilty of various crimes against him and his followers, hoping, by this means, to bring him into discredit at court. That chief being summoned to answer the charges, readily appeared, but Argyle not coming forward to prove his allegations, he gave into the council, in his turn, a written statement in reference to the conduct of his accuser, on which the earl was summoned to appear before the king to give an account of his receipt of the duties and rental of the Isles. The result of the inquiry into his proceedings proving unsatisfactory, the king committed him to prison, and although soon liberated, he was deprived of all his offices in the Isles, some of which were bestowed on Alexander of Isla.

In 1532 the latter was sent to Ireland at the head of about 6,000 men, for the purpose of creating a diversion in favour of the Scots of Ulster then engaged in a war with England His eldest son, James Macdonald, was, at the same time, for his education placed by King James, under the special charge of William Henderson, dean of Holyrood In 1540, when James, after the suppression of the rebellion of Donald Gorme of Sleat, (see page 534 of this volume,) visited the Isles, and the districts of Kintyre and Knapdale, he took with him, on his departure, with other chiefs, James Macdonald of Isla, the son and successor of Alexander above mentioned. Some of the captive chiefs, after being sent to Edinburgh, were liberated, upon giving hostages for their obedience, while the more turbulent of them were detained in confinement until sometime after the king's death James Macdonald's castles of Dunyveg in Isla and Dunaverty in Kintyre were, at this time, made royal garrisons.

In 1543, on the second escape of Donald Dubh, grandson of John, last lord of the Isles, and the regent Arran s opposing the views of the English faction, James Macdonald of Isla was the only insular chief who supported the regent. In the following year his lands of Kintyre were ravaged by the earl of Lennox, the head of the English party In April 1545, the chief of Isla received a reward from Arran for his services against the English, yet we find his brother, Angus Macdonald, one of the lords and barons of the Isles who, in the month of August following, went to Knockfergus in Ireland, to take the oath of allegiance to the king of England.

After the death of Donald Dubh, the same year, of a fever at Drogheda, the islanders chose for their leader, James Macdonald of Isla, who entered into negotiations with the earl of Lennox, then in Ireland, and also sent letters and an accredited envoy to the Irish privy council, to submit certain proposals, on his part, to the king of England. In these he offered to join Lennox, or any other person properly authorised, with all his force, desiring in return from the English king a bond for a yearly pension of two thousand crowns promised to his predecessor, Donald Dubh. (See page 534 of this volume.) To these proposals he received no reply His disputes with the fourth earl of Argyle being soon after settled by the mediation of the regent Arran, he married Lady Agnes Campbell, the earl's sister, and though the most powerful of the Island chiefs, he relinquished his pretensions to the lordship of the Isles, being the last that assumed that title.

Archibald, fifth earl of Argyle, being one of the most able among the lords of the Congregation, the queen regent, to weaken his influence, endeavoured to involve the chief of Isla in a quarrel with him, and with that object she bestowed upon Macdonald the wardship of Mary Macleod, the wealthy heiress of Dunvegan, which Argyle had expected to obtain Macdonald, in consequence, did not hesitate to take part against Argyle, but the earl speedily counteracted the influence of the regent, and in October 1559, James Macdonald was actually on his way to join the lords of the Congregation with 700 foot soldiers. (Sir R. Sadler's State Papers, vol. i. pp 481, 517, quoted in Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 188)

A dispute between the Macleans and the clan Ian Vor, relative to the right of occupancy of certain crown lands in Isla, led to a long and bloody feud between these tribes, in which both suffered severely In 1562 the matter was brought before the privy council, when it was decided that James Macdonald of Isla was really the crown tenant, and as Maclean refused to become his vassal, in 1565 the rival chiefs were compelled to find sureties, each to the amount of £10,000, that they would abstain from mutual hostilities. In the end of that year, the chief of Isla went to Ireland, to assist his brothers, Sorley Buy Macdonald and Alexander Oig Macdonald, in the defence of the family possessions in Ulster, but being surprised, soon after landing, by a party of the O'Neills, under the celebrated Shane O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, in the conflict which ensued the Macdonalds were defeated with great slaughter, James Macdonald the chief being mortally wounded, and his brother Angus slain, while Sorley Buy was taken prisoner, with many of his followers. In a short time after, however, O'Neill having rebelled against the English government, set Sorley Buy and his other prisoners at liberty, and joined Alexander Oig Macdonald, who, with 600 of his clan, lay at Claneboy A great entertainment was prepared for him, but in the midst of it, a dispute arose, and some of the Macdonalds, eager to revenge the death of their late chief, rushing into the tent, despatched both O'Neill and his secretary, with their dirks. O'Neill's successor, Turlogh Luineach O'Neill, afterwards earl of Tyrone, made war upon the Macdonalds in Ulster, and in the following year killed Alexander Oig Macdonald He subsequently married the widow of James Macdonald, and the children of the latter being young at their father's death, the Irish estates of the family were seized by their uncle, Sorley Buy, who, after various conflicts both against the native Irish and the English forces, became a faithful subject of Queen Elizabeth, and was the ancestor of the earls of Antrim in the peerage of Ireland.

James' eldest son, Angus Macdonald, succeeded to Isla and Kintyre, and in his time the feud with the Macleans was renewed. In 1579, upon information of mutual hostilities committed by their followers, the king and council commanded Lauchlan Maclean of Dowart and Angus Macdonald of Dunyveg or Isla, to subscribe assurances of indemnity to each other, under the pain of treason, and the quarrel was, for the time, patched up by the marriage of Macdonald with Maclean's sister In 1585, however, the feud came to a height, and after involving nearly the whole of the island clans on one side or the other, and causing its disastrous consequences to be felt throughout the whole extent of the Hebrides, by the mutual ravages of the contending parties, government interfered, and the measures which were at last adopted for reducing to obedience the turbulent chiefs, who had caused so much bloodshed and distress in the Isles, will be found detailed at page 698 of this volume For an account of the circumstances which render this feud so remarkable, see the article MACLEAN In June 1594, as Macdonald of Dunyveg and Maclean of Dowart continued contumacious, they were forfeited by parliament.

James Macdonald, son of Angus Macdonald of Dunyveg, had remained in Edinburgh for four years as a hostage for his father, and early in 1596 he received a license to visit him, in the hope that he might be prevailed upon to submit to the laws, that the peace of the Isles might be secured A vast expedition, under Sir William Stewart of Houston, knight, commendator of Pittenweem, appointed for the occasion lieutenant and justiciary of the Isles, was, in the meantime, in preparation to proceed against the island chiefs. They, in consequence, all made their submission, except Macdonald of Dunyveg A lease of the Rinns of Isla, the chief matter in dispute between him and Maclean, was at this time granted by the king to the latter, and Macdonald, finding that the expedition was now chiefly directed against himself, and deprived of all support, yielded He sent his son, who was soon afterwards knighted, back to court to make known to the privy council, in his father's name and his own, that they would fulfil whatever conditions should be prescribed to them by his majesty At this time Angus made over to his son all his estates, reserving only a proper maintenance for himself and his wife during their lives. When Sir William Stewart arrived at Kintyre, and held a court there, the chief of Isla and his followers hastened to make their personal submission to the king's representative, and early in the following year he went to Edinburgh, when he undertook to find security for the arrears of his crown rents; to remove his clan and dependers from Kintyre and the Rinns of Isla, and to deliver his castle of Dunyveg to any person sent by the king to receive it. On promising to comply with these conditions he was liberated and allowed to return to the Isles. His son, Sir James Macdonald of Knockrinsay, remained at court, as a sort of hostage for his father Soon after the latter's departure, his cousin, James Macdonald of Dunluce in Ireland, son of Sorley Buy Macdonald, preferred a claim to the lands of Kintyre and Isla, and all the estates held by Angus Macdonald, on the ground of the illegitimacy of the latter Having arrived at Edinburgh, he was received with great distinction at court, and knighted, but his claim was dismissed by the privy council

Angus Macdonald having failed to fulfil the conditions entered into by him in Edinburgh the previous year, his son, Sir James, was in 1598 sent to him from court, to induce him to comply with them. His resignation of his estates in favour of his son, was not recognised by the privy council, as they had already been forfeited to the crown, but Sir James, on his arrival took possession of them, and even attempted to burn his father and mother in their house of Askomull in Kintyre, as related under the head of MACALESTER, (see p. 692 of this volume). Angus Macdonald, after having been taken prisoner, severely scorched, was carried to Smerbie in Kintyre, and confined there in irons for several months. Sir James, now in command of his clan, conducted himself with such violence that in June 1598, a proclamation for another royal expedition to Kintyre was issued. He, however, contrived to procure from the king a letter approving of his proceedings in Kintyre, and particularly of his apprehension of his father, and the expedition, after being delayed for some time, was finally abandoned. In a conflict between the Macdonalds, under Sir James, and the Macleans, at the head of Lochgrunnard, the same year, the chief of the latter was slain, (see MACLEAN,) and Sir James was so severely wounded that for a time his recovery was doubtful.

In August of the following year, with the view of being reconciled to government, Sir James appeared in presence of the king's comptroller at Falkland, and made certain proposals for establishing the royal authority in Kintyre and Isla, offering to relinquish the former, on the latter, with the exception of the castle of Dunyveg, which he agreed to give up to a royal garrison, and sixty merk lands in its vicinity for their maintenance, being granted to him in heritage, for the annual feu duty of £600 in all He also agreed to allow his father, whom he had set at liberty, about £670 of yearly pension, and to send his brother to Edinburgh as a hostage for the performance of his offers. These were approved of by the privy council, but the influence of Argyle, who took the part of Angus Macdonald, Sir James' father, and the Campbells, having been used against their being carried into effect, the arrangement came to nothing, and Sir James and his clan were driven into irremediable opposition to the government, which ended in their ruin

In 1603, Angus Macdonald, Sir James' father, fearful of another plot against his life, caused his son to be apprehended, and, after detaining him some time as a prisoner, delivered him to Campbell of Auchinbreck, who placed him in the hands of the earl of Argyle. That nobleman early in 1604 brought him, by order, before the privy council at Perth, when he was committed prisoner to the royal castle of Blackness. Attempting to escape from thence, he was removed to Edinburgh castle. In the following year, his father, Angus Macdonald, met the comptroller of Scotland, Sir David Murray, Lord Scone, at Glasgow, and gave him certain offers to be forwarded to the king. In the subsequent September he attended a court held by the comptroller at Kintyre, when he paid him all the arrears of rent due by him both for his lands of Kintyre and Isla, and, for his future obedience, Lord Scone took with him, on his departure, one of his natural sons, Archibald Macdonald of Gigha, who was confined in the castle of Dumbarton But vain were all his endeavours to obtain a favourable consideration of his offers. The influence of Argyle was exerted against him, and he could neither obtain from the privy council any answers to his repeated applications, nor was he permitted to go to court to lay his case before the king. His son, Sir James, finding that it was the object of Argyle to obtain for himself the king's lands in Kintyre, made an attempt, in 1606, to escape from the castle of Edinburgh, but being unsuccessful, was put in irons. Macdonald of Gigha, however, was more fortunate in escaping from Dumbarton castle. In the following year a charter was granted to Argyle of the lands in North and South Kintyre and in the isle of Jura, which had been forfeited by Angus Macdonald, and thus, says the historian of the Highlands, did the legal right to the lands of Kintyre pass from a tribe which had held them for many hundred years. (Gregory's Highlands and Isles, page 312)

Angus Macdonald and his clan immediately took up arms, and his son, Sir James, after many fruitless applications to the privy council, to be set at liberty, and writing both to the king and the duke of Lennox, made another attempt to escape from the castle of Edinburgh, but having hurt his ancle by leaping from the wall whilst encumbered with his fetters, he was retaken near the West Port of that city, and consigned to his former dungeon. In 1608 a mandate was issued to Angus Macdonald, and his son, Angus Oig, charging them to surrender the castle of Dunyveg, within twenty-four hours after receiving it, and a proclamation was made for a new expedition against the Isles. Lord Ochiltree being appointed for the occasion lieutenant over them, Angus Macdonald, on his arrival in Isla, delivered to him the castle of Dunyveg, which was immediately garrisoned for the king, and also the fort of Lochgorme, which was at once demolished. He attended the lieutenant's court at the castle of Aros in Mull, and having made his submission, was allowed to return home, when the other island chiefs were carried prisoners to Edinburgh (see page 698 of this volume). In May following, however, having presented himself before the privy council at Edinburgh, he was committed to ward in the castle of Blackness, while his son, Sir James Macdonald was the same month at length brought to trial, charged with setting fire to the house of Askomull, and making his father prisoner, and with treasonably attempting, at different times, to escape from prison. He denied the fire-raising, and produced a warrant from the king, approving of his conduct in apprehending his father, which, however, he subsequently withdrew He admitted having attempted to escape from prison, but denied that in his last attempt he had wounded severely some of the keepers. He was found guilty, and sentenced to be beheaded as a traitor, and all his lands and possessions were declared forfeited to the crown (Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. iii pp 5—10) The sentence was not carried into effect, and Sir James remained a prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh till 1615, when he succeeded in making his escape after being twelve years in confinement. His father had been liberated soon after being sent to Blackness, for the purpose of accompanying the bishop of the Isles in his survey of the islands, and he was one of the chiefs who attended the celebrated court held by that prelate at Iona, when the 'Statutes of Icolmkill' were passed, (see page 698 of this volume).

In 1610 Angus Macdonald was one of the six principal island chiefs who met at Edinburgh to hear the king's pleasure declared to them, when they were compelled to give sureties to a large amount for their reappearance before the council in May 1611 The bishop of the Isles was soon after made constable of the castle of Dunyveg

Angus Macdonald died before 1613, and in the following spring the castle of Dunyveg was surprised and taken by a bastard son of his, named Ranald Oig, on which Angus Oig, the younger brother of Sir James Macdonald of Isla, collected some of his clan, and having recovered the castle, offered to restore it to the bishop on receiving a remission for any offences committed by him and his associates. He subsequently, however, refused to deliver it up, although advised to do so by his brother, Sir James, then a prisoner under sentence of death in Edinburgh castle, and the bishop was sent in September to Isla, with a conditional pardon to Angus Oig and his abettors, provided they gave up the fortress at once. Finding that Angus refused to surrender the castle, the bishop departed, and John Campbell of Calder, whose sister Sir James Macdonald had married, having sent to the privy council an offer of a fen duty for Isla higher than had ever been given before, they empowered him to proceed against Angus Oig and his followers. Sir James Macdonald, on being informed of this, sent certain proposals to the privy council, offering to take the crown lands of Isla, on a seven years' lease, at a rent of 8,000 merks, or if this was not acceded to, engaging to remove himself, his brother, and his clan, out of the country, on receiving a free pardon, with liberty to depart the kingdom No attention, however, was paid to his application, and Campbell of Calder, as king's lieutenant, departed for Isla.

The bishop of the Isles had entered into a treaty with Angus Oig, by which he promised to endeavour to procure for the latter a lease of the crown lands in that island, and to do his best to obtain a pardon for him and his associates, and had left as hostages in his hands, for the fulfilment of these promises, his son and nephew, Mr Thomas Knox, and Mr John Knox of Ranfurlie. To obtain possession of the hostages, one George Graham of Ervne, a Ross-shire man, was sent by the chancellor, the earl of Dunfermline, to Angus Oig, to assure him that by delivering them up, the expedition in preparation against him and the other rebels in Isla would be stopped On these assurances Angus Oig was induced to give them their liberty Graham also, in the chancellor's name, strictly enjoined him to hold the castle of Dunyveg at all hazards, until he should receive farther orders from the chancellor and privy council. Angus Oig, in consequence, disobeyed the summons to surrender the castle, but, after a short siege, he was forced to yield it without conditions, and, with some of his principal adherents, was sent prisoner to Edinburgh

Soon after Sir James Macdonald made his escape from Edinburgh castle, as already mentioned, and a reward of £2,000 was offered for him, dead or alive. He was enthusiastically received by his clansmen, and the reward for his apprehension was speedily raised to £5,000 Landing in Isla, he succeeded by a stratagem in drawing the governor, Alexander Macdougall, and some of the garrison, out of Dunyveg castle The former and about six of his men were slain, and next day the place surrendered to him On the 3d July Sir James' brother, Angus Oig Macdonald, and several of his accomplices were tried and condemned for high treason, and executed on the 8th They pleaded that they had been deceived by Graham, otherwise they would at once have surrendered to the royal forces.

The earl of Argyle was sent from London, to put down the rebellion of Sir James Macdonald, who, at the head of about 1,000 men, had encamped on the west coast of Kintyre On the approach of the earl, with a large force, the rebels dispersed, and Sir James fled, in all haste, to Isla, where he collected his scattered followers, to the number of 500 men He was followed by Argyle, with his whole array, on which he made his escape to Ireland, and soon after got safely away to Spain There he was shortly after joined by Allaster MacRanald of Keppoch, who had assisted him in his escape from Edinburgh castle, and had continued faithful to him in all his subsequent proceedings.

After the fall of Argyle, who had turned Roman Catholic, and had also fled to Spain, where he is said to have entered into some very suspicious dealings with his former antagonist, Sir James Macdonald the latter was, in 1620, with MacRanald of Keppoch, recalled from exile by King James.

On their arrival in London, Sir James received a pension of 1,000 marks sterling, while Keppoch got one of 200 marks. His majesty also wrote to the Scottish privy council in their favour, and granted them remissions for all their offences. Sir James, however, never again visited Scotland, and died at London in 1626, without issue. The clan Ian Vor from this period may be said to have been totally suppressed. Their lands were taken possession of by the Campbells, and the most valuable portion of the property of the ducal house of Argyle consists of what had formerly belonged to the Macdonalds of Isla and Kintyre.

The Macdonalds of Colonsay were a branch of the great house of Isla, being descended from Coll, a brother of James Macdonald of Dunyveg and the Glens, and of Sorley Buy Macdonald, father of the first earl of Antrim. His grandson, Coll MacGillespick Macdonald, called Coll Keitache, or left-handed, assisted his kinsman, Angus Oig, when he took possession of Dunyveg castle in 1614 After the surrender of that fortress he made his escape, and was with Sir James Macdonald in his rebellion, for the recovery of Kintyre from the Campbells. On the dispersion of Sir James' forces, Coll MacGillespick surrendered the castle of Dunyveg and another fort in Isla to Argyle, on assurance of his own life and that of his followers, and immediately joined that nobleman against his former associates. He was subsequently expelled from Colonsay by the Campbells, with whom he had a quarrel His son, the well-known Sir Alexander MacColl Macdonald, so renowned in Montrose's wars, went to Ireland, and in July 1644 he returned to the Hebrides, at the head of the Irish troops, amounting to 15,000 men, sent by the marquis of Antrim, to assist the royalists in Scotland. After taking the castles of Meigray and Kinloch Alan, he disembarked his forces in Knoydart, and, as he advanced, he despatched the fiery cross, to summon the clans to his standard. He was at first, however, only joined by the clan Donald, under the captain of Clanranald and the laird of Glengarry To oppose his progress, the marquis of Argyle collected an army, and sent some ships of war to Loch Eishord, where Macdonald's fleet lay, which captured or destroyed them, thus effectually cutting off his retreat to Ireland. Macdonald was, therefore, compelled to search out the marquis of Montrose, who was then about to raise the royal standard. He had sent letters to that nobleman by a confidential friend, and the answer he received was an order to march down, with all expedition, into Athol. Arriving there, closely pursued by Argyle, he fixed his head-quarters at Blair, where he was soon joined by Montrose, and immediately appointed major-general of Montrose's army At the battle of Tippermuir, shortly after, he had the command of the centre of the royalist force. He was very useful to Montrose, in obtaining recruits among the Clanranald and other friendly clans.

After the battle of Fyvie and the retreat of Montrose to the Highlands, that chivalrous commander was induced by Macdonald and the captain of Clanranald to invade the territory of their common enemy, Argyle, their desire of revenging the wrongs of the Clandonald taking place of their feelings of loyalty or patriotism. The army which pillaged and ravaged Argyle and Lorn was divided into three parties, each under the respective orders of Macdonald, the captain of Clanranald, and Montrose himself. For upwards of six weeks, in the depth of winter, these different bodies traversed the whole country, without molestation, burning, wasting, and destroying everything which came within their reach, and the whole of Argyle, as well as the district of Lorn, soon became a dreary waste. The people themselves were not spared, and before the end of January 1645, no male inhabitant was to be seen throughout either district, those who were not killed having been driven out of the country, or taken refuge in caves, and dens, and other hiding places.

At the battle of Inverlochy Macdonald commanded the right wing, which consisted of his regiment of Irish. On the 16th March he was despatched by Montrose to Aberdeen, with a body of 1,000 horse and foot, the latter 700 Irish, which, to relieve the apprehensions of the inhabitants, he left outside the town, and stationed strong parties at the gates to prevent any straggling parties of them from entering. He showed the utmost respect for private property and left Aberdeen the following day to join Montrose at Durris. Some of his Irish troops having stayed behind, entered the town, and began to plunder it. According to Spalding, (vol ii. p 306,) they "were abusing and fearing the town's people, taking their cloaks, plaids, and purses from them on the high streets." Complaints of their conduct were brought to Macdonald on his march, on which he returned, and drove "all these rascals, with sore skins, out of the town before him" On Montrose's departure for Perthshire, to avoid Baillie's troops, Macdonald was left with 200 men at Cupar Angus, which town he burned. He then wasted the lands of Lord Balmerinoch, killed Patrick Lindsay, the minister of Cupar, and after routing some troopers of Lord Balcarres slaying some of them, and carrying off their horses and arms, hastened off to join Montrose.

At the battle of Auldearn, he had the command of the right wing, which was posted at a place where there was a considerable number of dikes and ditches. To make the Covenanters believe that he himself commanded this wing, Montrose gave the royal standard to Macdonald, intending, when they should get entangled among the bushes and dikes, with which the ground to the right was covered, to attack them himself with the left wing When the battle commenced, however, instead of maintaining his position, as he had been expressly commanded by Montrose, Macdonald unwisely advanced beyond it to attack the Covenanters, and though several times repulsed, he returned to the charge. At last driven back by superior numbers, he was forced to retire in great disorder into an adjoining enclosure. His retreat he managed with great dexterity, displaying the most remarkable courage while leading off his men. Defending his body with a large target, he resisted, single-handed, the assaults of the enemy, and was the last man to leave the field. So closely indeed was he pressed, that some of Hurry's spearmen actually came so near him as to fix their spears in his target, which, says Wishart (Memoirs, p. 136), he cut off by threes or fours at a time with his broadsword. Wishart's character of Macdonald is that he "was a brave enough man, but rather a better soldier than a general, extremely violent, and daring even to rashness." A successful charge by Montrose, in the nick of time, retrieved the honour of the day

Previous to the battle of Alford, in 1645, he was sent into the Highlands to recruit, and after that event he joined Montrose with about 700 Macleans under their chief. Various other clans also joined Montrose at this time.

After the battle of Kilsyth, he was sent by Montrose into Ayrshire with a strong force to suppress a rising under the earls of Cassillis and Glencairn We are told that the countess of Loudon, whose husband had acted a conspicuous part against the king, received Macdonald with great kindness at Loudon castle, and not only embraced him in her arms, but entertained him with great splendour and hospitality (Guthry's Memoirs, p. 155) Montrose having been appointed by the king captain-general and lieutenant-governor of Scotland, conferred the honour of knighthood upon Macdonald, in presence of the whole army Almost immediately after, the latter announced his intention of proceeding to the Highlands, to avenge the injuries done to the Clandonald by Argyle four years before. Montrose strongly remonstrated against such a step, but in vain. Macdonald went off with upwards of 3,000 Highlanders, and 120 of the best of the Irish troops, whom he had selected as a body-guard. This desertion was a principal cause of the defeat of Montrose's army soon after at Philiphaugh. When Montrose, by command of the king, disbanded his forces, Macdonald was one of those who were excepted from pardon by the government. In May 1647 General David Leslie was ordered to advance into Kintyre to drive out Macdonald, who was there with a force of about 1,400 foot, and two troops of horse. He had taken no precautions to guard the passes leading into that peninsula, and he was in consequence forced to retire from it by Leslie. After placing 800 men in a fortress on the top of the hill of Dunavertie, he embarked his troops in boats provided for the occasion, and passed over into Isla. Leslie immediately went in pursuit of him, when Macdonald fled to Ireland, where he was soon afterwards killed in battle. His father, old Coll Keitache, was left with 200 men in the castle of Dunyveg in Isla, and being entrapped by Leslie into a surrender of it, was handed over to the Campbells, and hanged from the mast of his own galley, placed over the cleft of a rock near the castle of Dunstaffnage.

The Macdonalds of Garragach and Keppoch, called the Clanranald of Lochaber, were descended from Alexander, or Allaster Carrach, third son of John, lord of the Isles, and Lady Margaret Stewart. He was forfeited for joining the insurrection of the Islanders, under Donald Balloch, in 1481, and the greater part of his lands were bestowed upon Duncan Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan, which proved the cause of a fierce and lasting feud between the Macintoshes and the Macdonalds. It was from Ranald, the fourth in descent from Allaster Carrach, that the tribe received the name of the Clanranald of Lochaber

In 1498, the then chief of the tribe, Donald, elder brother of Allaster MacAngus. grandson of Allaster Carrach, was killed in a battle with Dougal Stewart, first of Appin His son, John, who succeeded him, having delivered up to Macintosh, chief of the clan Chattan, as steward of Lochaber, one of the tribe who had committed some crime, and had fled to him or protection, rendered himself unpopular among his clan, and was deposed from the chiefship His cousin and heir male presumptive, Donald Glas MacAllaster, was elected chief in his place. During the reign of James IV., says Mr Gregory, this tribe continued to hold their lands in Lochaber, as occupants merely, and without a legal claim to the heritage. (Highlands and Isles, p. 109) In 1546 Ranald Macdonald Glas, who appears to have been the son of Donald Glas MacAllaster, and the captain of the clan Cameron, being present at the slaughter of Lord Lovat and the Frasers, at the battle of Kinloch-lochy, (see page 262 of this volume,) and having also supported all the rebellions of the earl of Lennox, concealed themselves in Lochaber, when the earl of Huntly entered that district with a considerable force and laid it waste, taking many of the inhabitants prisoners. Having been apprehended by William Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan, the two chiefs were delivered over to Huntly, who conveyed them to Perth, where they were detained in prison for some time. They were afterwards tried at Elgin for high treason, and being found guilty were beheaded in 1547 Their heads were placed on the gates of the town, and several of their followers were hanged.

In 1593, after the murder of "the bonny earl of Moray," when the Macintoshes and Grants made hostile inroads into Huntly's estates, that nobleman caused the clan Cameron to plunder the lands of the clan Chattan in Badenoch, and sent the Clanranald of Lochaber under Keppoch, their chief, to spoil and waste the estates of the Grants in Strathspey Keppoch seized the castle of Inverness for Huntly, of whom he was a vassal for the lands of Gargavach or Garragach in the Braes of Lochaber, but from want of provisions was compelled by Macintosh to retire from it, one of his sons, and an officer of his being taken and hung He assisted Huntly at the battle of Glenlivat in October 1594, when the young earl of Argyle was defeated. After the banishment of Huntly and the other Popish earls, the duke of Lennox was employed to reduce their vassals to obedience, and Keppoch gave his bond of service to the earl of Argyle for himself and his clan, and delivered to the deputies of that nobleman one of his sons as a hostage for his obedience. On the return of Huntly, however, and his restoration to favour in 1598, Keppoch, with others of his old vassals, ranged themselves under the banners of their former lord. (Collectanea de rebus Albanicis, p. 200)

Allaster MacRanald of Keppoch and his eldest son assisted Sir James Macdonald in his escape from Edinburgh castle in 1615 (see page 703 of this volume), and was with him at the head of his clan during his subsequent rebellion On its suppression he fled towards Kintyre, and narrowly escaped being taken with the loss of his vessels and some of his men In the following January, a commission was given to Lord Gordon, Huntly's eldest son, for the apprehension of Keppoch and his son, a reward of 5,000 merks being offered for either of them, alive or dead. A second commission was given to Huntly himself against Keppoch. In July 1618 a commission of fire and sword against Keppoch and his sons was granted to Macintosh, but Lord Gordon procured its recall before it could be acted upon. With his second son, Donald Glas, Keppoch succeeded in making his escape to Spain, but two years thereafter was recalled by King James to London, and received a pension of 200 merks from that monarch Under a protection for six months from the king he appeared before the privy council in Edinburgh, and on finding sufficient security for his obedience to the laws, he obtained his pardon, and was allowed to return to Lochaber

In the great civil war the Clanranald of Lochaber were very active on the king's side. Soon after the Restoration, Alexander Macdonald Glas, the young chief of Keppoch, and his brother, were murdered by some of their own discontented followers. Coll Macdonald was the next chief Previous to the Revolution of 1688, the feud between his clan and the Macintoshes, regarding the lands he occupied, led to the last clan battle that was ever fought in the Highlands. The Macintoshes having invaded Lochaber, were defeated on a height called Mulroy So violent had been Keppoch's armed proceedings before this event that the government had issued a commission of fire and sword against him. After the defeat of the Macintoshes, he advanced to Inverness, to wreak his vengeance on the inhabitants of that town for supporting the former against him, if they did not purchase his forbearance by paying a large sum as a fine, Dundee, however, anxious to secure the friendship of the people of Inverness, granted Keppoch his own bond in behalf of the town, obliging himself to see Keppoch paid 2,000 dollars, as a compensation for the losses and injuries he alleged he had sustained from the Macintoshes. Keppoch brought to the aid of Dundee 1,000 Highlanders, and as Macintosh refused to attend a friendly interview solicited by Dundee, Keppoch, at the desire of the latter, drove away his cattle. We are told that Dundee "used to call him Coll of the cowes, because he found them out when they were driven to the hills out of the way" He fought at the battle of Killiecrankie, and, on the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he joined the earl of Mar, with whom he fought at Sheriffmuir His son, Alexander Macdonald of Keppoch, on the arrival of Prince Charles in Scotland in 1745, at once declared for him, and at a meeting of the chiefs to consult as to the course they should pursue, he gave it as his opinion that as the prince had risked his person, and generously thrown himself into the hands of his friends, they were bound, in duty at least, to raise men instantly for the protection of his person, whatever might be the consequences.

On the commencement of the rebellion, two companies of the second battalion of the Scots Royals, under the command of Captain, afterwards General Scott, having been despatched from Fort Augustus to reinforce Fort William, were intercepted by a party of Lochiel's and Keppoch's men To spare the effusion of blood, Keppoch advanced alone to Scott's party, and offered them quarter Captain Scott, who had been wounded and had two of his men killed, immediately surrendered, and he and his whole party were taken prisoners. After the Pretender had been proclaimed at Glenfinnan, Keppoch joined the prince there with 300 of his men He was one of the leaders of the party who subsequently captured Edinburgh, and was at the battle of Preston, where, as well as at the battle of Falkirk, he and his men fought on the extreme right of the first line. On the arrival of the duke of Cumberland at Edinburgh, he was one of the seven chiefs who, with Lord George Murray, advised the retreat of the Highland army to the north At the battle of Culloden the three Macdonald regiments formed the left line, and on their giving way, Keppoch, seeing himself abandoned by his clan, advanced with his drawn sword in one hand and his pistol in the other, but was brought to the ground by a musket shot. Donald Roy Macdonald, a captain in Clanranald's regiment, followed him, and entreated him not to throw away his life, assuring him that his wound was not mortal, and that he might easily rejoin his regiment in the retreat, but Keppoch, after recommending him to take care of himself, received another shot, and was killed on the spot. There are still numerous cadets of this family in Lochaber, but the principal house, says Mr Gregory, (Highlands and Isles, p. 415,) if not yet extinct, has lost all influence in that district. Latterly they changed their name to Macdonnell.

For the Glengarry branch of the Macdonalds, see MACDONNELL.

The Clanranald of Garmoran are descended from Ranald, younger son of John, first lord of the Isles, by his first wife, Amie, heiress of the MacRorys or Macruaries of Garmoran In 1373 he received a grant of the North Isles, Garmoran and other lands, to be held of John, lord of the Isles, and his heirs. His descendants comprehended the families of Moydart, Morar, Knoydart, and Glengarry and came in time to form the most numerous tribe of the Clandonald. Alexander Macruari of Moydart, chief of the Clanranald, was one of the principal chiefs seized by James I. at Inverness in 1427, and soon after beheaded. The great-grandson of Ranald, named Allan Macruari, who became chief of the Clanranald in 1481, was one of the principal supporters of Angus, the young lord of the Isles, at the battle of the Bloody Bay, (see page 547 of this volume,) and he likewise followed Alexander of Lochalsh, nephew of the lord of the Isles, in his invasion of Ross and Cromarty in 1491, when he received a large portion of the booty taken on the occasion. (Gregory's Highlands and Isles, page 66) In 1495, on the second expedition of James IV to the Isles, Allan Macruari was one of the chiefs who made their submission In the following year he appeared, with four other chiefs of rank, before the lords of council, when they bound themselves "by the extension of their hands," to the earl of Argyle, on behalf of the king, to abstain from mutual injuries and molestation, each under a penalty of £500 (Ibid. p. 92)

During the whole of the 15th century the Clanranald had been engaged in feuds regarding the lands of Garmoran and Uist; first, with the Siol Gorrie, or race of Godfrey, eldest brother of Ranald, the founder of the tribe, and afterwards with the Macdonalds or Clanhuistean of Sleat, and it was not till 1506, that they succeeded in acquiring a legal title to the disputed lands. John, eldest son of Hugh of Sleat, having no issue, made over all his estates to the Clanranald, including the lands occupied by them Archibald, or Gillespock Dubh, natural brother of John, having slain Donald Gallach and another of John's brothers, endeavoured to seize the lands of Sleat, but was expelled from the North Isles by Ranald Bane Allanson of Moydart, eldest son of the chief of Clanranald. The latter married Florence, daughter of Macian of Ardnamurchan, and had 4 sons, 1 Ranald Bane. 2 Alexander, who had 3 sons, John, Farquhar, and Angus, and a daughter 3 Ranald Oig, and 4. Angus Reochson Ranald Oig, the 3d son, died in 1536 and left an only son, Dougald, who about the end of 1537 was murdered, in the island of Uist, in consequence of his cruelty Dougald had no issue. Angus Reoch, the youngest son, had a son named Dowle or Coull, who had a son named Allan, whose son, Alexander, was the ancestor of the Macdonalds of Morar

In 1509 Allan MacRuari was tried, convicted, and executed, in presence of the king in Blair of Athol, but for what crime is nowhere stated His eldest son, Ranald Bane, obtained a charter of the lands of Moydart and Arisaig, Dec. 14, 1540, and died in 1541 He married a daughter of Lord Lovat, and had one son, Ranald Galda, or the stranger, from his being fostered by his mother's relations, the Frasers.

On the death of Ranald Bane, the 5th chief, the clan who had resolved to defeat his son's right to succeed, in consequence of his relations, the Frasers, having joined the earl of Huntly, lieutenant of the north, against the Macdonalds, chose the next heir to the estate as their chief This was the young Ranald's cousin-german, John Movdartach, or John of Moydart, eldest son of Alexander Allanson, 2d son of Allan MacRuari, and John was, accordingly, acknowledged by the clan captain of Clanranald Lovat, apprised of the intentions of the clan against his grandchild, before their scheme was ripe for execution, marched to Castleturrim, and by the assistance of the Frasers placed Ranald Galda in possession of the lands. The Clanranald, assisted by the Macdonalds of Keppoch and the Clancameron, having laid waste and plundered the districts of Abertarf and Stratherrick, belonging to Lovat, and the lands of Urquhart and Glenmoriston, the property of the Grants, the earl of Huntly, the king's lieutenant in the north, to drive them back and put an end to their ravages, was obliged to raise a numerous force. He penetrated as far as Inverlochy in Lochaber, and then returned to his own territories. The battle of Kinloch-lochy, called Blar-nan-leine, "the field of shirts," followed, as related at page 262 of this volume. The Macdonalds being the victors, the result was that John Moydartach was maintained in possession of the chiefship and estates, and transmitted the same to his descendants. On the return of Huntly, with an army, into Lochaber, John Moydartach fled to the Isles, where he remained for some time.

In 1552 a commission was given to the earl of Argyle against the Clanranald, on account of their chief having refused to obey the summons of the regent Arran to meet him at Aberdeen, with the other chiefs, but after communication with John Moydartach, Argyle undertook that this chief should personally appear in presence of the privy council before the following February When the queen dowager assumed the regency in April 1554, she sent the earl of Huntly on an expedition against the Clanranald, and at the head of a large force, chiefly Highlanders and of the clan Chattan, he passed into Moydart and Knoydart, but finding that the chief and his clan had retreated among the fastnesses of the Highlands, Huntly's officers refused to follow them there, and he was obliged to abandon the enterprise and return home. In the following year the queen regent sent the earl of Athol, with a special commission to apprehend the chief of Clanranald, when he prevailed upon John Moydartach, two of his sons, and some of his kinsmen, to submit themselves to the queen, who pardoned them their past offences, but ordered them to be detained prisoners, some at Perth, and others at the castle of Methven. They soon, however, made their escape to their own country

The Clanranald distinguished themselves under the marquis of Montrose in the civil war of the 17th century At the battle of Killiecrunkie, their chief, then only fourteen years of age, fought under Dundee, with 500 of his men. They were also at Sheriffmuir In the rebellion of 1745, the Clanranald took an active part. Macdonald of Bonsdale, the brother of the chief, then from age and infirmities unfit to be of any service, had an interview with Prince Charles, on his arrival off the island of Eriska, and positively refused to aid his enterprise. On the following day, however, young Clanranald, accompanied by his kinsmen, Alexander Macdonald of Glenaladale and Æneas Macdonald of Dalily, the author of a Journal and Memoirs of the Expedition, went on board the prince's vessel, and readily offered him his services. He afterwards joined him with 200 of his clan, and was with him throughout the rebellion

At the battles of Preston and Falkirk, the Macdonalds were on the right line, which they claimed as their due, but at Culloden the three Macdonald regiments, of Clanranald, Keppoch, and Glengarry, formed the left In support of their claim to the right the Macdonalds stated that, as a reward for the fidelity of Angus Macdonald, lord of the Isles, in protecting Robert the Bruce, for upwards of nine months, in his territories, that prince, at the battle of Bannockburn conferred the post of honour, the right, upon the Macdonalds —that this post had always been enjoyed by them, unless when yielded from courtesy upon particular occasions, as was done to the chief of the Macleans at the battle of Harlaw (Lockhart Papers, vol. ii. p. 510) It was, however, maintained by Lord George Murray, that under the marquis of Montrose the right had been assigned to the Athol men, and he insisted that that post should now be conferred upon them. The dispute was put an end to by Charles' prevailing upon the three chiefs of the Macdonalds to waive their pretensions upon that occasion. It was probably their feeling of dissatisfaction at being placed on the left of the line that caused the Macdonald regiments, on observing that the right and centre had given way, to turn their backs and fly from the fatal field without striking a blow

At Glenbonsdale, whither Charles retreated, after the defeat at Culloden, he was joined by young Clanranald, and several other adherents, who endeavoured to persuade him from embarking for the Isles, but in vain Young Clanranald was one of the chiefs who held a meeting at Mortlaig, soon after, when they entered into a bond for their mutual defence, and agreed to assemble their clans the following week at Auchnicarry in the Braes of Lochaber, but none of them, for various reasons, were able to meet on the day appointed When the prince first took shelter in Benbecula, he was visited by old Clanranald, to whom the island belonged. On his second visit to that island the chief again visited him, and promised him all the assistance in his power to enable him to leave the kingdom Lady Clanranald, at the same time, sent the prince half-a-dozen of shirts, some shoes and stockings, a supply of wine and brandy, and other articles of which he stood much in need When Charles removed to South Uist, Clanranald placed twelve men at his disposal, to serve as guides, and to obey his orders. For the assistance rendered to the prince, Lady Clanranald, and, sometime after, her husband, old Clanranald, and Macdonald of Boisdale, his brother, were apprehended and sent to London, but a few months thereafter they were set at liberty In the act of indemnity passed in June 1747, young Clanranald was one of those who were specially excepted from pardon

The ancestor of the Macdonalds of Benbecula was Ranald, brother of Donald Macallan, who was captain of the Clanranald in the latter part of the reign of James VI The Macdonalds of Bousdale are cadets of Benbecula, and those of Staffa of Bousdale. On the failure of Donald's descendants, the family of Benbecula succeeded to the barony of Castletirrim, and the captainship of the Clanranald, represented by Reginald George Macdonald of Clanranald.

From John, another brother of Donald Macallan, came the family of Kinlochmoidart, which terminated in an heiress. This lady married Colonel Robertson, who, in her right, assumed the name of Macdonald.

From John Og, uncle of Donald Macallan, descended the Macdonalds of Glenaladale. "The head of this family," says Mr Gregory "John Macdonald of Glenaladale, being obliged to quit Scotland about 1772, in consequence of family misfortunes, sold his Scottish estates to his cousin (also a Macdonald), and emigrating to Prince Edward's Island, with about 200 followers, purchased a tract of 40,000 acres there, while the 200 Highlanders have increased to 800"

One of the attendants of Prince Charles, who, after Culloden, embarked with him for France, was Neil Mac Eachin Macdonald, a gentleman sprung from the branch of the Clanranald in Uist He served in France as a lieutenant in the Scottish regiment of Ogilvie, and was father of Stephen James Joseph Macdonald, marshal of France, and duke of Tarentum, born Nov 17, 1765, died Sept. 24, 1840

What is called the Red Book of Clanranald, is a manuscript in Gaelic written on parchment, by the MacVurichs, who were, for generations, bards to the family of Clanranald, and contains a good deal of the history of the Highland clans, with part of the works of Ossian —See SUPPLEMENT

The Macdonalds of Glenco are descended from John Og, surnamed Fraoch, natural son of Angus Og of Isla, and brother of John, first lord of the Isles. He settled in Glenco, which is a wild and gloomy vale in the district of Lorn, Argyleshire, as a vassal under his brother, and some of his descendants still possess lands there. This branch of the Macdonalds was known as the clan Ian Abrach, it is supposed from one of the family being fostered in Lochaber After the Revolution, Mackian or Alexander Macdonald of Glenco, was one of the chiefs who supported the cause of King James, having joined Dundee in Lochaber at the head of his clan, and a mournful interest attaches to the history of this tribe from the dreadful massacre, by which it was attempted to exterminate it in February 1692. The story has often been told, and as it comes quite within the object of this work, it may be repeated here.

A negotiation had been set on foot by the earl of Breadalbane with the Highland Jacobite chiefs to induce them to submit to the government. It was, however, broken off by the chiefs, principally at the instigation of Macdonald of Glenco, between whom and the earl a difference had arisen respecting certain claims which the latter had against Glenco's tenants for plundering his lands, his lordship insisting for compensation out of Glenco's share of the money which government had placed at his disposal for distribution among the chiefs. The failure of the negotiation was extremely irritating to the earl, who threatened Glenco with his vengeance, and immediately entered into a correspondence with Secretary Dalrymple, the master of Stair, between whom it is understood a plan was concerted for cutting off the chief and his people. On the 27th August 1691, a proclamation was issued offering an indemnity to all persons then or formerly in arms for James VII., who should take the oath of allegiance to King William's government before the first day of January following, on pain of military execution after that period All the other chiefs having given in their adherence within the prescribed time, Glenco resolved to do so too, and accordingly proceeded to Fort William to take the required oaths. He arrived there on the 31st day of December 1691, being the last day allowed by the proclamation for taking them. Presenting himself before Colonel Hill, the governor of Fort William, he desired that officer to administer to him the oaths required by the proclamation, but the governor declined doing so, on the ground that the civil magistrate alone could administer them. There not being any magistrate whom he could reach before the day closed, Glenco remonstrated with him, but he persisted in his refusal. He, however, advised Glenco to hasten to Inverary, and gave him a letter to Sir Colin Campbell of Ardkinglass, sheriff of Argyleshire, begging of him to receive Glenco as a "lost sheep," and to administer the necessary oaths to him At the same time he gave Glenco a personal protection under his own hand, with an assurance that no proceedings should be instituted against him under the proclamation, till he should have an opportunity of laying his case before the king or privy council. To reach Inverary with as little delay as possible, Glenco proceeded on his journey through mountains almost impassable, the country being covered with deep snow He did not even stop to see his family, though he passed within half a mile of his own house. At Barcaldine he was detained twenty-four hours by Captain Drummond On arriving at Inverary, he found that Sir Colin Campbell was absent, and he had to wait three days till his return As the time allowed for taking the oaths had expired, Sir Colin declined at first to swear Glenco, but the latter having first importuned him with tears to receive from him the oath of allegiance, and then threatened to protest against the sheriff for not swearing him, Sir Colin yielded, and administered the oaths to the unfortunate chief and his attendants, on the 6th January Glenco, thereupon, returned home, in perfect reliance that having done his utmost to comply with the order of the government, he was free from danger.

Three days after the oaths were taken, Sir Colin wrote Hill, acquainting him with what he had done, and stating that Glenco had undertaken to get all his friends and followers to follow his example. About the same time he sent the letter which he had received from Hill, and a certificate that Glenco had taken the oath of allegiance, to Colin Campbell, sheriff clerk of Argyle, then at Edinburgh, with instructions to lay the same before the privy council, and to inform him whether the council received the oath. The paper on which the certificate that Glenco had taken the oaths was written, contained other certificates of oaths which had been administered within the time fixed, but Sir Gilbert Elliot, the clerk of the privy council, refused to receive the certificate relating to Glenco, as irregular Campbell, thereupon, waited upon Lord Aberuchil, a privy councillor and lord of session, and requested him to take the opinion of some members of the council. He accordingly spoke to Lord Stair and other privy councillors, and they were all of opinion that the certificate could not be received without a warrant from the king. Instead, however, of laying the matter before the privy council, or informing Glenco of the rejection of the certificate, that he might petition the king, Campbell perfidiously defaced the certificate, and lodged the paper on which it was written with the clerks of the council.

To enforce the penalties in the proclamation, now that the time allowed for taking the oath of allegiance had expired, instructions, signed and countersigned by the king, on the 11th January, were sent down by young Stair to Sir Thomas Livingston, commander of the forces; by which he was ordered "to march the troops against the rebels who had not taken the benefit of the indemnity, and to destroy them by fire and sword," but he was allowed a discretionary power to give terms and quarters to chieftains and heritors, or leaders, they becoming prisoners of war, and taking the oath of allegiance, and to the community, on taking the same oath and delivering up their arms. In his letter to Livingston, enclosing these instructions, Secretary Dalrymple significantly says "I have no great kindness to Keppoch nor Glenco, and it is well that people are in mercy, and then just now my lord Argyle tells me that Glenco hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice. It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect, the worst of the Highlands." Additional instructions, bearing date 16th January, also signed and countersigned by King William, were despatched to Livingston by the master of Stair, one of which was that "if M'Ean of Glenco and that tribe can be well separated from the rest, it will be a proper vindication of the public justice to extirpate that set of thieves." In the letter containing these instructions Dalrymple informs Livingston that "the king does not at all incline to reserve any after the diet but in mercy" He artfully adds, however, "but for a just example of vengeance, I entreat the thieving tribe of Glenco may be rooted out to purpose." A duplicate of these additional instructions was, at the same time, sent by Dalrymple to Colonel Hill, the governor of Fort William, with a letter of similar import to that sent to Livingston. From the following extract it would appear that not only the earl of Breadalbane, but also the earl of Argyle, was cognisant of this infamous transaction. "The earls of Argyle and Breadalbane have promised that they (the Macdonalds of Glenco) shall have no retreat in their bounds, the passes to Rannoch would be secured, and the hazard certified to the laird of Weems to reset them, in that case Argyle's detachment, with a party that may be posted in Island Stalker, must cut them off."

Preparatory to putting the fatal warrant into execution, a party of Argyle's regiment, to the number of 120 men, under the command of Captain Campbell of Glenlyon, was ordered to proceed to Glenco. and take up their quarters there, about the end of January, or beginning of February On approaching the Glen, they were met by John Macdonald, the elder son of the chief, at the head of about 20 men. On his demanding from Campbell the reason of his coming into a peaceful country like theirs with a military force, he and two subalterns who were with him explained that they came as friends, and that their sole object was to obtain suitable quarters, where they could conveniently collect the arrears of cess and hearth money,—a new tax laid on by the Scottish parliament in 1690,—in proof of which Lieutenant Lindsay produced the instructions of Colonel Hill to that effect. Having given their parole of honour that they came without any hostile intentions, and that no harm would be done to the persons or property of the chief and his tenants, they received a kindly welcome, and were hospitably entertained by Glenco and his family till the fatal morning of the massacre. Indeed, so familiar was Glenlyon that scarcely a day passed that he did not visit the house of Alexander Macdonald, the younger son of the chief, who was married to his niece, and take his "morning drink," agreeably to the practice of Highland hospitality

Immediately on receipt of his instructions, Livingston wrote to Lieutenant-colonel Hamilton, who had been fixed upon by the secretary to be the executioner, expressing his satisfaction that Glenco had not taken the oath within the prescribed period, and urging him, now that a "fair occasion" offered for showing that his garrison served for some use, and as the order to him from the court was positive, not to spare any that had not come timeously in, desiring that he would begin with Glenco, and spare nothing of what belongs to them, "but not to trouble the government with prisoners," or, in other words, to massacre every man, woman, and child Hamilton, however, did not take any immediate steps for executing this inhuman order

In the meantime, the master of Stair was not inactive On the 30th January he wrote two letters, one to Livingston, and the other to Hill, pressing them on Accordingly, the latter, on the 12th February, sent orders to Hamilton, forthwith to execute the murderous commission On the same day, Hamilton directed Major Robert Duncanson, of Argyle's regiment, to proceed immediately with a detachment to Glenco, so as to reach the post which had been assigned to him by five o'clock the following morning, at which hour he promised to reach another post with a party of Hill's regiment. On receipt of this order, Duncanson despatched another from himself to Captain Campbell of Glenlyon, then living in Glenco, with instructions to fall upon the Macdonalds precisely at five o'clock the following morning, and put all to the sword under seventy years of age, and to have "a special care that the old fox and his sons do not escape your hands." With this sanguinary order in his pocket, Campbell spent the evening before the massacre at cards with John and Alexander Macdonald, the sons of the chief At parting he wished them good night, and even accepted an invitation from Glenco himself to dine with him the following day

Glenco and his sons retired to rest at their usual hour, but early in the morning, John Macdonald, the elder son, awakened by the sound of voices about his house, jumped out of bed, threw on his clothes, and went to Inverriggen, where Glenlyon was quartered, to learn the cause of the unusual bustle. To his great surprise, he found the soldiers all in motion, on which he inquired at Captain Campbell the object of such extraordinary preparations at such an early hour Campbell pretended that his sole design was to march against some of Glengarry's men, and craftily referring to his connexion with the family, he put it to the young man, whether, if he intended anything hostile to the clan, he would not have provided for the safety of his niece and her husband. Apparently satisfied with this explanation, John Macdonald returned home and again retired to rest, but he had not been long in bed when his servant informed him of the approach of a party of men towards the house. Leaping from his bed he ran to the door, and perceiving a body of about twenty soldiers coming in the direction of his house, he fled to a hill in the neighbourhood, where he was soon joined by his brother, Alexander, who had escaped from the scene of carnage, after being roused from sleep by his servant.

The massacre commenced about five o'clock in the morning at three different places at once. Glenlyon undertook to butcher his own hospitable landlord and the other inhabitants of Inverriggen, where he and a party of his men were quartered, and sent Lieutenant Lindsay with another party of soldiers to Glenco's house, to cut off the unsuspecting chief Under the pretence of a friendly visit Lindsay and his party obtained admission into the house. Glenco was in bed, and while in the act of rising to receive his visitors, he was basely shot at by two of the soldiers, and fell lifeless into the arms of his wife. One ball entered the back of his head, and another penetrated his body The lady, in the extremity of her anguish, leapt out of bed and put on her clothes, but the ruffians stripped her naked, pulled the rings off her fingers with their teeth, and treated her so cruelly that she died the following day The party also killed two men whom they found in the house, and wounded a third named Duncan Don, who came occasionally to Glenco with letters from Brasenar

While this was going on in Glenco's house, Glenlyon was fiercely pursuing the work of murder at Inverriggen, where his own host was shot by his order Here the party seized nine men, whom they first bound hand and foot, after which they shot them one by one. Glenlyon was desirous of saving the life of a young man about twenty years of age, but one Captain Drummond shot him dead. The same officer, impelled by a thirst for blood, ran his dagger through the body of a boy who had grasped Campbell by the legs, and who was supplicating for mercy Some of the soldiers carried their cruelty so far as to kill a woman, and a boy only four or five years old

A third party under the command of one Sergeant Barker, which was quartered in the village of Auchnaion, fired upon a body of nine men whom they observed in a house in the village sitting before a fire. Among these was the laird of Auchintrincken, who was killed on the spot, along with four more of the party This gentleman had, at the time, a protection in his pocket from Colonel Hill, which he had received three months before. The remainder of the party in the house, two or three of whom were wounded, escaped by the back of the house. A brother of the laird of Auchintrincken having been seized by Barker, requested him as a favour not to despatch him in the house, but to kill him outside the door The sergeant consented, because he said he had experienced his kindness, but when brought out he threw his plaid, which he had kept loose, over the faces of the soldiers who were appointed to shoot him, and also escaped.

In other parts of the Glen there were some persons dragged from their beds and murdered, among whom was an old man of eighty years of age. Between thirty and forty of the inhabitants were slaughtered in cold blood, and the whole male population under 70 years of age, amounting to 200, would have been cut off, if fortunately for them a party of 400 men under Lieutenant-colonel Hamilton, who was principally charged with the execution of the sanguinary warrant, had not been prevented by the severity of the weather, from reaching the glen till eleven o'clock, six hours after, the slaughter, by which time the whole surviving male inhabitants, warned of their danger, had fled to the hills. On arriving at Cannaloch-leven, Hamilton appointed several parties to proceed to different parts of the glen, with orders to take no prisoners, but to kill all the men that came in their way On their march they met Major Duncanson's party, by whom they were informed of the events of the morning They also told them that as the survivors had escaped to the hills, they could only burn the houses and carry off the cattle. They accordingly set fire to the houses, and having collected the cattle and effects in the glen, they carried them to Inverlochy where they were divided among the officers of the garrison An old man, the only remaining male inhabitant of the desolate vale, was put to death by Hamilton's orders.

Ejected from their dwellings by the fire which consumed them, the greater part of the females and children, overcome by fatigue, cold, and hunger, on their way to the hills, dropped down and perished miserably among the snow

In every quarter, even at court, the account of the massacre was received with horror and indignation The ministry and King William himself, grew alarmed, and to pacify the people he dismissed the master of Stair from his councils, pretending that he had signed the order for the massacre among a mass of other papers, without knowing its contents. This is the only defence ever offered for King William, but it is quite unsatisfactory The outcry of the nation for an enquiry into this barbarous transaction was so great that a commission was issued in 1695, to the duke of Hamilton and others, to investigate the affair, but it was never acted upon On 29th April 1695, upwards of three years after the massacre, another commission was appointed, with the marquis of Tweeddale, lord high chancellor of Scotland, at the head of it. The commissioners appear to have conducted the enquiry with great fairness, but anxious to palliate the conduct of the king, in their report, which was subscribed at Holyroodhouse, on the 20th June, and transmitted to his majesty, they gave a forced construction to the terms of the order, and threw the whole blame of the massacre upon secretary Dalrymple. Not one of the parties engaged in it was ever brought to justice

This celebrated glen is supposed by some to have been the birthplace of Ossian.

The Macdonalds of Glenco joined Prince Charles on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1745 and General Stewart, in his Sketches of the Highlanders, relates that when the insurgent army lay at Kirkliston, near the seat of the earl of Stair, grandson of Secretary Dalrymple, the prince, anxious to save his lordship's house and property, and to remove from his followers all excitement to revenge, proposed that the Glenco-men should be marched to a distance, lest the remembrance of the share which his grandfather had in the order for the massacre of the clan should rouse them to retaliate on his descendant. Indignant at being supposed capable of wreaking their vengeance on an innocent man, they declared their resolution of returning home, and it was not without much explanation and great persuasion that they were prevented from marching away the following morning The same author says that while the family of the unfortunate gentleman who suffered is still entire, and his estate preserved in direct male succession to his posterity, this is not the case with the family, posterity, and estates, of those who were the principals, promoters, and actors in this black affair In 1745 the Macdonalds of Glenco could bring 130 men into the field According to the memorial which President Forbes transmitted to government after the insurrection of the force of each clan, the Clandonald could muster in all 2,330 men. Of these Macdonald of Sleat could furnish 700; Clanranald, 700; Glengarry, 500; and Keppoch, 300.

Flora Macdonald, whose memory will ever be held in high esteem, for her generous and noble disinterestedness in assisting Prince Charles to make his escape after the battle of Culloden, was the daughter of Macdonald of Milton, in South Uist. Her father, a tacksman or gentleman farmer, left her an orphan when only a year old, and her mother married Macdonald of Armadale in the isle of Skye, who, at the time of the rebellion, commanded one of the militia companies raised in that island by Sir Alexander Macdonald, for the service of the government. When first introduced to the prince, she was about 24 years of age. She was of the middle size, and besides a handsome figure and great vivacity, she possessed much good sense, an amiable temper, and a kind heart. After the prince's departure she was apprehended by a party of militia, and put on board the Furnace Bomb, and afterwards removed to Commodore Smith's sloop, and treated with great kindness and attention by him and General Campbell. She was a prisoner for a short time in Dunstaffnage castle, and after being conveyed from place to place, she was carried up to London, where she remained in confinement from December 1746 till the following July, when she was discharged, at the special request of Frederick, prince of Wales, father of George III, without a single question having been put to her

On her liberation, Miss Macdonald was invited to the house of Lady Primrose, a zealous Jacobite lady, where she was visited by a number of distinguished persons, who loaded her with presents. After her return to Skye, she married young Macdonald of Kingsburgh, with whom she emigrated to America. There her husband died, and after suffering many privations during the war of American independence, she returned with her family to Skye. She died March 4, 1790, leaving a son, Lieutenant-colonel John Macdonald, a memoir of whom is given in a subsequent page and a daughter, married to a Macleod in Skye. She retained her Jacobite predilections to the last hour of her existence.

Lieutenant-general Sir John Macdonald, G.C.B., adjutant-general to the forces, who died at London March 28th, 1850, was a member of the same branch of the Macdonald family as Flora Macdonald, to whom he was nearly related, and he possessed two or three remarkable memorials of his kinswoman

MACDONALD, ALEXANDER, an eminent Celtic poet, was the 2d son of an episcopalian clergyman at Ardnamurchan, who resided at Dalilea in Moydart. He was born in the beginning of the 18th century, and is generally styled Alasdair Mac Mhaighstir Alasdair, or Alexander, the son of Mr Alexander Being intended by his father for the ministry, he was sent to the university of Glasgow, but having married before he finished his studies, he was obliged to leave college, and became teacher to the Society for propagating Christian knowledge in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Having become a presbyterian, he was afterwards parochial schoolmaster of Ardnamurchan Besides his school he occupied the farm of Cori-Vullim, at the foot of Ben Shiante, the highest mountain in that part of the country

When the rebellion of 1745 broke out, Macdonald joined Prince Charles, and turned Roman Catholic. He held a commission in the insurgent army, and after the battle of Culloden, he and his brother Angus, a man of small size but of extraordinary strength, escaped the pursuit of their enemies, and concealed themselves in the wood and caves of Kinloch-na-nua, above Borrodale, in the district of Arisaig He went afterwards to Edinburgh, and took charge of the education of the children of some Jacobite families there, but soon returned to the Highlands. The time of his death is not stated, but he lived to a good old age

His first work, published in 1741, was a 'Gaelic and English Vocabulary,' which he was engaged to write, by the Society for propagating Christian Knowledge, for the use of their schools, and it appeared under their patronage His poems were first published in Edinburgh in 1751, and being in Gaelic, were eagerly bought up by the Highlanders He left several pieces in manuscript, some of which were included in a volume, printed in 1776, by his son Ronald, a schoolmaster in the island of Eigg, which contained also a few specimens of old Gaelic poetry, with some pieces of his own

MACDONALD, ANDREW, an ingenious but unfortunate poet, son of George Donald, gardener at the foot of Leith Walk, Edinburgh, was born about 1755 He studied at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1775 was admitted into deacon's orders in the Scottish Episcopal Church On this occasion he assumed the prefix of Mac to his name He was admitted as tutor into the family of Mr Oliphant of Gask, and in 1777 became pastor of the Episcopal congregation at Glasgow In 1782 he published his 'Velina, a Poetical Fragment,' in the Spenserian stanza, which is described as containing much genuine poetry His next adventure was a novel, called 'The Independent,' from which, however, he derived neither profit nor reputation Having written 'Vimonda, a Tragedy,' he got it acted at Edinburgh, with a Prologue by Henry Mackenzie, but though it was received with great applause, it produced no advantage to the author Finding his income, which was derived solely from the seat rents of his church, decrease as his congregation diminished, he resigned his charge, and with it the clerical profession, and removed to Edinburgh, but not succeeding there, he repaired to London, accompanied by his wife, who had been the maid-servant of the house in which he had lodged at Glasgow In the summer of 1787 'Vimonda' was performed at the Haymarket Theatre to crowded houses He next engaged with much ardour upon an opera, but neither this nor any of his subsequent dramatic attempts was equal in merit to his first tragedy Meanwhile, by writing satirical and humorous poems for the newspapers, under the signature of "Mathew Bramble," he contrived to earn a precarious subsistence for a time, but this resource soon failed him He was at last reduced almost to the verge of destitution, the privations to which he was subjected had a fatal effect on a constitution naturally weak, and he died in August 1790, aged only 33, leaving a widow and one child in a state of extreme indigence A volume of his Sermons, published soon after his death, met with a favourable reception, and in 1791 appeared his 'Miscellaneous works,' in one volume, containing all his dramas, with 'Probationary Odes for the Laureateship,' and other pieces

MACDONALD, JOHN, F R S, lieut.-col of the Royal Clan-Alpin regiment, and author of several works on military tactics, the only son of the celebrated Flora Macdonald was born in 1759 He passed several years in the service of the East India Company, and attained the rank of captain in the corps of Engineers on the Bengal establishment In 1798 he communicated to the Royal Society a continued series of observations on the diurnal variation of the magnetic needle, which he had carried on at Bencoolen, in Sumatra, and at St Helena, in 1794 and the two following years At a subsequent period he contributed no less than sixteen letters to the Gentleman's Magazine on the variation of the magnet, and for the same periodical he also wrote a great number of articles on various scientific subjects He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1800, about which year he returned to England, and was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Royal Clan-Alpin regiment, and commandant of the Royal Edinburgh artillery. He was subsequently stationed for some time in Ireland In 1803 he published in two volumes a translation of the 'Rules and Regulations for the Field Exercise and Manœuvres of the French Infantry, issued August 1, 1791, with explanatory Notes and illustrative References to the British and Prussian Systems of Tactics,' &c. In 1804, at which time he belonged to the first battalion of Cinque Ports volunteers, he produced a translation of 'The Experienced Officer, or Instructions by General Wimpffen to his Sons, and to all Young Men intended for the Military Profession, with Notes and Introduction' In 1807, being then chief engineer at Fort Marlborough, he published two more volumes, translated from the French, entitled 'Instructions for the conduct of Infantry on Actual Service,' with explanatory Notes, and in 1812 he issued a translation of 'The Formations and Manœuvres of Infantry, by the Chevalier Duteil,' being his last work of this nature In 1811 he published a Treatise on the Violoncello, which showed that he was well versed in Harmonics

To the important subject of conveying intelligence by telegraphs, Colonel Macdonald had, for many years, directed his attention, and in 1808 he published 'A Treatise on Telegraphic Communication, Naval, Military, and Political,' in which work he proposes an entirely new telegraphic system In 1816 he issued a Telegraphic Dictionary, extending to 150,000 words, phrases, and sentences, towards the publication of which the Directors of the East India Company granted £400 He also received testimonials to the utility of his plans from Mr Barrow, secretary to the admiralty, and Sir Harry Calvert, adjutant-general He died at Exeter, Aug 16, 1831 He married a daughter of Sir Robert Chambers, chief-justice of Bengal

MACDONALD, BARON, of Sleat, a title in the peerage of Ireland, conferred in 1776, on Sir Alexander Macdonald, 9th baronet of Sleat. See p. 718 of this vol

MACDONNELL, the surname adopted by the Glengarry branch of the Macdonalds. The word Dhomnill, whence the name Donald is derived, is said to signify "brown eye." The most proper way, says Mr Gregory, of spelling the name, according to the pronunciation, was that formerly employed by the Macdonalds of Dunyveg and the Glens, who used Macconnell. Sir James Macdonald, however, the last of this family in the direct male line, signed Mahdonell (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 417, Note).

The family of Glengarry are descended from Alister, second son of Donald, who was eldest son of Reginald or Ranald, (progenitor also of the Clanranald,) youngest son of John lord of the Isles, by Amie, heiress of MacRuari. Alexander Macdonnell, who was chief of the Glengarry at the beginning of the 16th century, supported the claims of Sir Donald Macdonald of Lochalsh to the lordship of the Isles, (see page 584 of this volume,) and in November 1518, assisted him, with Chisholm of Comer, in expelling the garrison and seizing the castle of Urquhart in Loch Ness. In 1527 the earl of Argyle, lieutenant of the Isles, received from Alexander Macranald of Glengarry and North Morar, a bond of manrent or service, and in 1545 he was among the lords and barons of the Isles who, at Knockfergus in Ireland, took the oath of allegiance to the king of England, "at the command of the earl of Lennox." He married Margaret, eldest daughter of Celestine, brother of John earl of Ross, and one of the three sisters and coheiresses of the said Sir Donald Macdonald of Lochalsh. His son, Angus or Æneas Macdonnell of Glengarry, the representative, through his mother, of the house of Lochalsh, which had become extinct in the male line on the death of Sir Donald in 1518, married Janet, only daughter of Sir Hector Maclean of Dowart, and had a son, Donald Macdonnell of Glengarry, styled Donald MacAngus MacAlister

In 1581, a serious feud broke out between the chief of Glengarry, who had inherited one half of the districts of Lochalsh, Lochcarron, and Lochbroom in Wester Ross, and Colin Mackenzie of Kintail, who was in possession of the other half The Mackenzies, having made aggressions upon Glengarry's portion, the latter, to maintain his rights, took up his temporary residence in Lochcarron, and placed a small garrison in the castle of Strone in that district. With some of his followers he unfortunately fell into the hands of a party of the Mackenzies, and after being detained in captivity for a considerable time, only procured his release by yielding the castle of Lochcarron to the Mackenzies. The other prisoners, including several of his near kinsmen, were put to death On complaining to the privy council, they caused Mackenzie of Kintail to be detained for a time at Edinburgh, and subsequently in the castle of Blackness. In 1602, Glengarry, from his ignorance of the laws, was, by the craft of the clan Kenzie, as Sir Robert Gordon says, "easalie intrapped within the compass thereof," on which they procured a warrant for citing him to appear before the justiciary court at Edinburgh Glengarry, however, paid no attention to it, but went about revenging the slaughter of two of his kinsmen, whom the Mackenzies had killed after the summons had been issued. The consequence was that he and some of his followers were outlawed, and Kenneth Mackenzie, who was now lord of Kintail, procured a commission of fire and sword against Glengarry and his men, in virtue of which he invaded and wasted the district of North Morar, and carried off all the cattle In retaliation the Macdonalds plundered the district of Applecross, and on a subsequent occasion, they landed on the coast of Lochalsh, with the intention of burning and destroying all Mackenzie's lands, as far as Easter Ross, but their leader, Allaster MacGorrie, having been killed, they returned home. To revenge the death of his kinsman, Angus Macdonnell, the young chief of Glengarry, at the head of his followers, proceeded north to Lochcarron, where his tribe held the castle of Strone, now in ruins. After burning many of the houses in the district and killing the inhabitants, he loaded his boats with the plunder, and prepared to return. In the absence of their chief, the Mackenzies, encouraged by the example of his lady, posted themselves at the narrow strait or kyle which separates Skye from the mainland, for the purpose of intercepting them. Night had fallen, however, before they made their appearance, and taking advantage of the darkness, some of the Mackenzies rowed out in two boats towards a large galley, on board of which was young Glengarry, which was then passing the kyle. This they suddenly attacked with a volley of musketry and arrows. Those on board in their alarm crowding to one side, the galley overset, and all on board were thrown into the water Such of them as were able to reach the shore were immediately despatched by the Mackenzies, and among the slain was the young chief of Glengarry himself. The rest of the Macdonnells, on reaching Strathordell in Skye, left their boats, and proceeded on foot to Morar Finding that the chief of the Mackenzies had not returned from Mull, a large party was sent to an island near which he must pass, which he did next day in Maclean's great galley, but he contrived to elude them, and was soon out of reach of pursuit. He subsequently laid siege to the castle of Strone, which surrendered to him, and was blown up. In 1603, "the Clanranald of Glengarry, under Allan Macranald of Lundie, made an irruption into Brae Ross, and plundered the lands of Kilchrist, and others adjacent, belonging to the Mackenzies. This foray was signalized by the merciless burning of a whole congregation in the church of Kilchrist, while Glengarry's piper marched round the building, mocking the cries of the unfortunate inmates, with the well-known pibroch, which has been known, ever since, under the name of Kilchrist, as the family tune of the Clanranald of Glengarry" (Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, pp 301—303) Eventually, Kenneth Mackenzie, afterwards Lord Kintail, succeeded in obtaining a crown charter to the disputed districts of Lochalsh, Lochcarron, and others, dated in 1607

Donald MacAngus of Glengarry, died in 1603. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Alexander Macdonald, Captain of Clanranald, he had, besides Angus above mentioned, two other sons, Alexander, who died soon after his father, and Donald Macdonnell of Scothouse.

Alexander, by his wife, Jean, daughter of Allan Cameron of Lochiel, had a son, Æneas Macdonnell of Glengarry, who was one of the first in 1644 to join the royalist army under Montrose, and never left that great commander, "for which," says Bishop Wishart, "he deserves a singular commendation for his bravery and steady loyalty to the king, and his peculiar attachment to Montrose." (Memoirs, p 155) Glengarry also adhered faithfully to the cause of Charles II, and was forfeited by Cromwell in 1651 When, in the summer of 1652, General Monk sent Colonel Lilburne on an expedition into the Highlands, Glengarry stood out, and the English force was obliged to retire from his territories amid the jeers and laughter of the Highlanders. In August 1653 he joined in the earl of Glencairn's shortlived insurrection, and on the defection of Lord Lorn he was sent after him, and succeeded in capturing about twenty of his horse. As a reward for his faithful services he was at the Restoration created a peer by the title of Lord Macdonnell and Arross, by patent dated at Whitehall, 20th December 1660, the honours being limited to the heirs male of his body This led him to claim not only the chiefship of Clanranald, but likewise that of the whole Clandonald, as being the representative of Donald, the common ancestor of the clan and on 18th July 1672, the privy council issued an order, commanding him as chief, to exhibit before the council, several persons of the name of Macdonald, to find caution to keep the peace.

The subject of the chiefship has been a matter of dispute between various branches of the Clandonald, descended from Reginald or Ranald, already mentioned. Mr Skene, in his valuable work on the Highland Clans, has examined the question thoroughly According to him, the present family of Clanranald has no valid title to the chiefship, being descended from an illegitimate son of a second son of the old family of Moydart; but that it was vested in the descendants of John, eldest son of Donald, progenitor of the family of Glengarry, and the eldest son of Reginald or Ranald, so often mentioned, and he concludes that the family of Glengarry, since the beginning of the 17th century, the legal representatives of Ranald, the common ancestor of the clan, possess that jus sanguinis, or right of blood to the chiefship, of which no usurpation can deprive them Notwithstanding all their endeavours, however, the Macdonnells of Glengarry have failed in getting recognised their right to the chiefship of the Macdonalds, that honour being generally accorded to Lord Macdonald, the undoubted representative of the last lord of the Isles, (see page 697 of this volume). By his wife, Margaret, eldest daughter of Donald Macdonald of Sleat, Lord Macdonnell and Arross had an only daughter, married to the Hon. James Montgomery of Coilsfield, son of the sixth earl of Eglinton, and dying without male issue in 1680, his title became extinct, but his estate devolved on the heir-male, Alexander Macdonnell of Glengarry, grandson of his lordship's uncle, Donald Macdonnell of Scothouse.

The three branches of the Clanranald engaged in all the attempts which were made for the restoration of the Stuarts. On 27th August, 1715, Glengarry was one of the chiefs who attended the pretended grand hunting match at Braemar, appointed by the earl of Mar, previous to the breaking out of the rebellion of that year He was at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and when the Macdonalds were thrown into dismay by the fall of Alan Moydartach, the captain of Clanranald, he roused them from their dejection, by springing forward and throwing his bonnet into the air, crying aloud in Gaelic, "Revenge! Revenge! Revenge to-day and mourning to-morrow" At these stirring words the Highlanders rushed forward, sword in hand and pushing aside the fixed bayonets of the government troops with their targets, they spread terror and death all around them After the suppression of the rebellion, the chief of Glengarry made his submission to General Cadogan at Inverness. In 1720, he was one of the commissioners or trustees named for transacting the Chevalier's affairs in Scotland. He died in 1724. By his wife, Lady Mary Mackenzie, daughter of the third earl of Seaforth, he had a son, John Macdonnell, who succeeded him

In 1745, six hundred of the Macdonnells of Glengarry joined Prince Charles, under the command of Macdonnell of Lochgary, who afterwards escaped to France with the prince, and were at the battles of Preston, Falkirk, and Culloden The unfortunate Charles slept the first night after his final defeat in his clothes on the floor at Invergary, the seat of the chief of Glengarry, the ruins of which are still seen on the north-west bank of Loch Oich, in the immediate neighbourhood of the modern elegant mansion house of the same name. The chief himself seems not to have engaged in the rebellion He was, however, arrested, and sent to London. Among the charges brought against Macdonald of Barisdale, who had taken an active part in the insurrection, but was subsequently accused of treachery to the prince, were that he had imposed on some of Glengarry's people, by falsely asserting that that chief had promised to deliver them up to the enemy, and was to receive thirty pounds sterling of premium for each gentleman he should put into their hands, and that, in consequence, an information was given in against Glengarry by these gentlemen, and his letters, ordering them to take up arms for the prince, were delivered to Lord Albemarle, upon which Glengarry was apprehended, and all his papers seized. Along with the other chief prisoners he was committed to the Tower, where he suffered a long and tedious confinement. His son, young Glengarry, had been arrested some months previously and sent to the Tower, in which he was kept a close prisoner for twenty months.

General Sir James Macdonnell, G C B., who distinguished himself when lieut.-col. in the guards, by the bravery with which he held the buildings of Hougomont, at the battle of Waterloo, was 3d son of Duncan Macdonnell, Esq. of Glengarry He was born at the family seat, Inverness-shire, and died May 15, 1857

Colonel Alexander Ranaldson Macdonnell of Glengarry, who in January 1822, married Rebecca, 2d daughter of Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo, baronet, was the last genuine specimen of a Highland chief His character in its more favourable features was drawn by Sir Walter Scott, in his romance of Waverley, as Fergus MacIvor. He always wore the dress and adhered to the style of living of his ancestors, and when away from home in any of the Highland towns, he was followed by a body of retainers, who were regularly posted as sentinels at his door He revived the claims of his family to the chiefship of the Macdonalds, styling himself also of Clanranald In January 1828 he perished in endeavouring to escape from a steamer which had gone ashore As his estate was very much mortgaged and encumbered, his son was compelled to dispose of it, and to emigrate to Australia, with his family and clan The estate was purchased by the marquis of Huntly from the chief, and in 1840 it was sold to Lord Ward, (earl of Dudley, Feb. 13, 1860,) for £91,000 In 1860 his lordship sold it to Edward Ellice, Esq of Glenquoich, for £120,000

The principal families descended from the house of Glengarry, were the Macdonnells of Barrisdale, in Knoydart, Greenfield and Lundie.

MACDOUGALL, or MACDUGALL, a clan who derive their descent and their name from Dugall, the son of Ranald, the son of the famous Somerled. The name Dhu Gall means the dark-complexioned stranger The chiefs were generally styled De Ergadia or Lords of Lorn. The clan badge was the cloudberry bush The Macdougalls are not mentioned in history till 1284. In the list of those who attended the convention of that year we find the name of Alexander de Ergadia, and it is supposed that his presence was the consequence of his holding his lands by a crown charter Another form of the name is MACDOWALL, used especially by those of the race who possessed lands in Galloway, to which district the Dhu Galls, or black Gaels, are said to have given its name.

At the time that Robert the Bruce asserted his claim to the throne of Scotland the chief's name was Alexander He had married the third daughter of the Red Comyn, whom Bruce slew in the Dominican church at Dumfries, and in consequence he became the mortal enemy of the king After his defeat at Methven on 19th June 1306, when Bruce, with only 300 followers, approached the borders of Argyleshire, he was attacked by Macdougall of Lorn, at the head of 1,000 men, part of whom were Macnabs, who had joined the party of John Baliol, and after a severe conflict was compelled to abandon the field This battle was fought at a place called Dalree, and, in his retreat, one of the Macdougalls having come up with the king, seized hold of his plaid, which was fixed across his breast by a large brooch. In the struggle which ensued the man was killed, but the plaid and brooch were left in his dying grasp The latter, under the name of "the brooch of Lorn," was long preserved by the chief of the Macdougalls, and after being carried off during the civil war of the 17th century, has been restored to the family. In the life of Bruce (vol. i. of this work, pages 17 and 18) will be found other instances of the unrelenting enmity of the Macdougalls to the king.

To punish the hostile clan, Bruce in 1306 proceeded into Argyleshire, but found John of Lorn, the son of Alexander, with a band of followers posted at the narrow pass of Cruachan Ben, between Loch Awe and Loch Etive. Having sent a party to threaten them in the rear, he furiously attacked them in front, and succeeded in putting them to flight. The chief of the Macdougalls, who was during the action, on board a small vessel in Loch Etive, took refuge in his castle of Dunstaffnage. After laying waste the territory of Lorn, Bruce laid siege to the castle, which soon surrendered, and the lord of Lorn swore homage to the king, but John, his son, refused to submit, and took refuge in England.

Being appointed by Edward II to the command of the English fleet, John, after the battle of Bannockburn, sailed with it to the Western Isles. Thither Bruce, on his return from Ireland, directed his course, and to avoid the necessity of doubling the Mull of Kintyre, he sailed up Loch Fyne to Tarbet with his own galleys, which he caused to be dragged across the narrow isthmus which connects Kintyre and Knapdale, by means of a slide of smooth planks of trees laid parallel to each other It is said that he was induced to do so, from a superstitious belief which had long been entertained amongst the inhabitants of the Western Islands, that they should never be subdued till their invader sailed across this neck of land. The islanders were quickly subdued, the English fleet dispersed, and John of Lorn captured and imprisoned, first in Dumbarton castle, and afterwards in the castle of Lochleven, where he died. His son, John or Ewin, the last Macdougall of Lorn, married a niece of David II, and was restored to the ancient possessions of his family, which had been forfeited. He died without male issue. He had two daughters. One of them married Robert Stewart, founder of the Rosyth family, who obtained through her the district of Lorn, which he sold to his brother, the husband of the other daughter, John Stewart of Innermeath, ancestor of the Stewarts, lords of Lorn

The chieftainship now passed to Macdougall of Dunolly, brother of Ewen, the last lord. The Macdougalls adhered to the cause of Charles I, and suffered much for their loyalty In 1715, they took part in the insurrection of the earl of Mar, and in consequence the chief was forfeited. Just previous to the rebellion of 1745, the estate was restored to the family, which prevented them from joining in the rebellion of that year The force of the Macdougalls at that period was estimated by President Forbes at 200 men

The Macdougalls of Raray, represented by Macdougall of Ardincaple, were a branch of the house of Lorn The principal cadets of the family of Dunolly were those of Gallanach and Soraba. The Makdougalls of Makerston, Roxburghshire, terminated in an heiress, who married General Sir Thomas Brisbane, baronet, and he in her right assumed the name of Makdougall (See vol. i p. 380.)

MACDOWALL, see MACDOUGALL.

MACDUFF, the name of a clan which, though located in the rich district between the Forth and the Tay, anciently called Othelima, is supposed on good grounds, and from its great antiquity, to be of pure Gaelic origin. For an account of the Macduffs, thanes or earls of Fife, see FIFE, earl of, page 209 of this volume. The distinctive badge of the Macduffs was the red whortleberry

MAC-EACHIN, a Gaelic name the son of Hector or of Hugh

MACFARLANE, the name of a clan descended from the ancient earls of the Lennox, the distinctive badge of which was the cypress. In ancient times the land forming the western shore of Loch Lomond, from Tarbet upwards, and the greater part of the parish of Arrochar, was inhabited by "the wild Macfarlane's plaided clan." From Loch Sloy, a small lake near the base of Ben Voirlich, which formed their gathering place, they took their slughorn or warcry of "Loch Sloy! Loch Sloy!" In Gaelic Loch Sluas signifies "the Lake of the host or army"

The remote ancestor of this clan was Gilchrist, a younger brother of Malduin, third earl of Lennox By a charter of the latter, still extant, he gave to his brother Gilchrist a grant "de terris de superiori Arrochar de Luss," which continued in possession of the clan till the death of their last chief Gilchrist's son, Duncan, also obtained a charter of his lands from the earl of Lennox, and appears in the Ragman Roll under the name of Duncan MacGilchrist de Levenaghes. A grandson of this Duncan was named Bartholomew, in Gaelic abbreviated into Parlan or Pharlan, and from him the clan adopted the surname of Macfarlane.

On the extinction of the direct male line of the earls of Lennox in 1373, the then chief of the Macfarlanes claimed the earldom as heir male, but without success, and after the death in 1460 of Isabella, duchess of Albany, eldest daughter of Duncan, eighth earl, the vast possessions of the earldom were divided among the feudal heirs, (see page 647 of this volume, article LENNOX) and Sir John Stewart, Lord Derneley or Darnley, great grandson of Earl Duncan became earl of Lennox. In the meantime, the chief of the Macfarlanes and his family had all been cut off and many of the clan had left the district for other parts of the country In this disorganised state without a chief, the clan Macfarlane would have sunk into the mere retainers of the Lennox family, or been dispersed altogether, had not a gentleman of the clan, named Andrew Macfarlane, married the daughter of the above-named Sir John Stewart, earl of Lennox, and obtained possession of Arrochar, the hereditary territory of his tribe His son, Sir John Macfarlane assumed, about 1493, the secondary designation of captain of the clan, not being allowed by them the higher title of chief, as he was neither the descendant nor the representative of the ancient family who had held that dignity

From that period the Macfarlanes invariably supported the earls of Lennox of the Stewart race In 1544 Duncan, the then captain of Macfarlane, at the head of 300 of his clan, joined Matthew, earl of Lennox, and the earl of Glencairn (see page 649 of this volume), who had taken arms against the regent Arran, and was present with his followers when Glencairn was defeated at "the Butts" on Glasgow-muir, near where the infantry barracks of that city now stand With the others, Macfarlane was forfeited, but, through the intercession of powerful friends, his estate was restored, and he obtained a remission under the privy seal. Lennox was forced to retire to England, where he married a niece of Henry VIII and on his return to Scotland, with a considerable English force, Duncan sent to his assistance his relative, Walter Macfarlane of Tarbet, with seven score of his clan, who joined him at Dumbarton These troops are said to have spoken both Gaelic and English They were light footmen, well armed with coats of mail, bows and arrows, and two-handed swords, and were of much service to Lennox. Duncan fell at the battle of Pinkie in 1547, with a great number of his clan

Andrew, his son, took a prominent part on the side of the regent Moray, and from his attachment to the house of Darnley, he and 300 of his followers fought against the queen at the battle of Langside, being almost the only Highland chief who did not range himself under the banners of the unfortunate Mary He is said to have shown great valour on the occasion, and to have "stood the regent's party in great stead," for, as we are told by Holinshed, "In the hottest brunt of the fight, he came in with friends and countrymen, and so manfully gave in upon the flank of the queen's people, that he was a great cause of disordering them" "The clan boast of having taken at this battle three of Queen Mary's standards, which, they say, were preserved for a long time in the family" All the reward, however, that the chief got was an addition to his arms, the regent having bestowed upon him the crest of a demi-savage proper, holding in his dexter hand a sheaf of arrows, and pointing with his sinister hand to an imperial crown, Or, with the motto, "This I'll defend."

Although a small clan, the Macfarlanes were as turbulent and predatory in their way as their neighbours the Macgregors. By the Act of the Estates of 1587 they were declared to be one of the clans for whom the chief was made responsible, by another act passed in 1594, they were denounced as being in the habit of committing theft, robbery, and oppression, and in July 1624 many of the clan were tried and convicted of theft and robbery Some of them were punished, some pardoned, while others were removed to the highlands of Aberdeenshire, and to Strathaven in Banffshire, where they assumed the names of Stewart, M'Caudy, Greusock, M'James, and M'Innes. Walter Macfarlane, grandson of the chief who fought at Langside, adhered to the cause of Charles I He was twice besieged in his own house by the parliamentary forces, and his castle of Inveruglas was afterwards burned down by the English

Of the lairds of Macfarlane there have been no fewer than twenty-three. The last of them went to North America, in the early part of the 18th century A branch of the family settled in Ireland in the reign of James VII, and the headship of the clan is claimed by its representative, Macfarlane of Huntstown House, in the county of Dublin The descendants of the ancient chiefs cannot now be traced, and the lands once possessed by them have passed into other hands.

Of one eminent member of the clan, the following notice is taken by Mr Skene in his work on the Highlands of Scotland He says, "It is impossible to conclude this sketch of the history of the Macfarlanes without alluding to the eminent antiquary, Walter Macfarlane of that ilk, who is as celebrated among historians as the indefatigable collector of the ancient records of the country, as his ancestors had been among the other Highland chiefs for their prowess in the field The most extensive and valuable collections which his industry has been the means of preserving, form the best monument to his memory, and as long as the existence of the ancient records of the country, or a knowledge of its ancient history, remain an object of interest to any Scotsman, the name of Macfarlane will be handed down as one of its benefactors. The family itself, however, is now nearly extinct, after having held their original lands for a period of six hundred years."

MACFARLANE, ROBERT, a political and miscellaneous writer, was born in Scotland in 1784, and received his education at the university of Edinburgh. At an early period of life he repaired to London, and for some years kept a school of considerable reputation at Walthamstow He was engaged by Mr. Evans, the publisher, of Paternoster Row, to write a 'History of George III,' the first volume of which was published in 1770 In consequence, however, of some misunderstanding, Mr Evans employed another person to continue the work, the second volume of which appeared in 1782, and the third in 1794 On being afterwards reconciled to Mr Evans, Macfarlane wrote a fourth volume of the History He subsequently disclaimed the second and third volumes, and even disowned the first, in consequence of its having been much altered in a third edition He was at one time editor of the Morning Chronicle and London Packet Being an enthusiastic admirer of the Poems of Ossian, he translated them into Latin verse, and in 1769 published 'Temora,' as a specimen In 1797 he published 'An Address to the People of the British Empire, on Public Affairs;' and in 1801 a translation of 'Buchanan's Dialogue, concerning the Rights of the Crown of Scotland,' with two Dissertations prefixed, one on the pretended identity of the Getes and Scythians, and the Goths and Scots, and the other vindicating the character of Buchanan as an historian On the evening of August 8, 1804, during a Middlesex election, he was accidentally thrown under a carriage at Hammersmith, and died within half an hour of the injuries he received At the time of his death, he had in the press 'An Essay on the Authenticity of Ossian, with the Poems printed in the original Gaelic, and an original translation,' which was published in 1807, under the sanction of the Highland Society of London.

M'Fie, the name of a former clan of the island of Colonsay, Argyleshire, a branch of the Soil Alpin, in Gaelic Clann Dhubbi, hence MacDuffie, softened into MacPhee. See MacPhee. The name implies a dark coloured tribe.

M'GAVIN, William, author of 'The Protestant,' was born August 12, 1773, on the farm of Darnlaw, in the parish of Auchinleck, Ayrshire, held by his father on lease from Boswell of Auchinleck When about seven years of age he was sent for a short time to the parish school, and he never was at any other. In 1783 his parents removed to Paisley, and he was soon after employed as a drawboy to a weaver at a shilling per week He next served an apprenticeship of four years to the weaving of silk, but subsequently he abandoned that trade, and in 1790 entered the service of Mr John Neilson, printer and bookseller in Paisley During the three years that he remained there, he applied himself assiduously to the improvement of his mind, and especially to acquiring a correct knowledge of the English language. In 1793 he went to assist his elder brother in the management of a school, of which he soon obtained the sole charge He taught, besides, a scientific class, to which he delivered lectures on Geography, Astronomy, and some branches of Natural History. After being about two years and a half a schoolmaster, he quitted the profession, and commenced a small concern in the thread line, which was at one time the staple trade of Paisley This also he was, in about two years, compelled to relinquish, and in January 1799 he was engaged as book-keeper and clerk to Mr David Lamb, an American cotton merchant in Glasgow, to whose two sons he at the same time acted as tutor In 1803, on Mr Lamb's removal to America, the whole management of the business devolved upon him, and on the death of the father, he entered in 1813 into partnership with the son.

Mr M'Gavin belonged to the Anti-burgher communion, and was a member of the congregation of the Rev James Ramsay, whom he joined about 1800, on his quitting his charge, and subsequently assisted him in his endeavours to form an Independent or Congregational Church, by occasionally preaching for him. In April 1804 he was regularly ordained Mr Ramsay's co-pastor One of his sermons, entitled 'True Riches,' was published by the Religious Tract Society, and extensively circulated He withdrew from the connection in 1807, and afterwards became an itinerant preacher, and an active director and assistant in the various benevolent and religious societies at Glasgow, and a popular speaker at their public meetings. In 1805 he married Miss Isabella Campbell, a lady from the West Indies, residing in Paisley, who had formerly been one of his pupils. His business ultimately proved unprofitable, and in 1822 he was induced to undertake the Glasgow Agency of the British Linen Company's Bank, when his partnership with Mr Lamb was dissolved. He had written various religious tracts and stories for the young before he commenced 'The Protestant,' a series of papers designed to expose the leading errors of the church of Rome, begun in 1818, and completed in 1822 This publication now forms four large 8vo volumes, and has passed through several editions. In consequence of the high character of the work, and the singular ability displayed in its pages, one of the most eminent bishops of the Church of England offered to give him holy orders, but this he declined Some statements contained in it relative to the building of a Roman Catholic chapel in Glasgow led to an action for libel, at the instance of the priest who officiated there, when the latter obtained a verdict of £100 damages against the author, £20 against Mr Sym, his informant, and one shilling against the printer A public subscription produced £900 in Mr M'Gavin's favour, and the whole expenses, including the sums in the verdict, having amounted to £1,200, the balance was paid from the profits of 'The Protestant'

In 1827 Mr M'Gavin edited an improved edition of John Howie's 'Scots Worthies,' with a preface and notes Soon after he published a refutation of the peculiar views promulgated by Mr Cobbett in his 'History of the Reformation,' and a similar exposure of the pernicious principles of Mr Robert Owen He also published a pamphlet entitled 'Church Establishments considered, in a Series of Letters to a Covenanter' Shortly before his death, he superintended a new edition of 'Knox's History of the Reformation,' and wrote an introduction to the Rev John Brown of Whitburn's 'Memorials of the Nonconformist Ministers of the Seventeenth Century' Mr M'Gavin died of apoplexy, August 23, 1832 A monument to his memory has been erected in the Necropolis of Glasgow His posthumous works, with a memoir, were published in two volumes in 1834

MACGEORGE, originally Mac Jore, the surname of an old family which, from an early period, was settled in Galloway Towards the middle of the 17th century they had become divided into several branches—all landed proprietors and all in the same district, chiefly in the parish of Urr One of these branches was Macgeorge of Cocklick, another Macgeorge of Culloch, and a third became proprietors afterwards of the lands of Auchenreoch and others. The name, at an early period spelt and pronounced Macjore, appears in that form on the tombstone of one of the families in the churchyard of Urr so late as the end of the 17th century The inscription on this tombstone is interesting as showing the change in the writing of the name in the same family It is as follows:—"John Macjore in Cartine died 28 Feb. 1691, aged 80: also John M'George of Cocklick his son. He died 17th June 1726 aged 69." There were two other branches, believed to be of the same family, in the county of Ayr—which was originally a part of Galloway These branches originally spelt the name Macjarrow, and it so appears in the statute of 1 William and Mary, restoring the "memory, fame, and worldly honours" of above 400 of the victims of oppression during the twenty-three preceding years. In this roll the names are entered as Macjarrow of Perjarrow and Macjarrow of Altaberry. By the beginning of the 18th century the names of all these families had come to be spelt and pronounced Macgeorge. They appear to have been of Irish extraction There were branches of several distinguished Irish families settled in Galloway, such as the clan Carthy (called in that district Macartney), and others, and the late Mr Brydson, the author of an excellent work on Heraldry, is of opinion that the family of Macgeorge is descended from the ancient Irish clan Mac Yoris, which had settled, he says, at an early period, in Galloway, and which, in the time of Henry II, was reckoned among the great families of Ireland This is confirmed by the manner in which the name at an early period was pronounced and spelt in Galloway

One of the family was the Rev William Macgeorge, minister of Heriot, whose sufferings in the cause of the Reformation are recorded by Wodrow in his Church History Under date 1684 Wodrow, referring to the circuit at Dumfries, says "The Rev William Macgeorge, minister at Heriot, was before this circuit, and I have a hint of his sufferings from his worthy son, present minister of Pennycuik. Mr Macgeorge, with many other honest and peaceable persons, was sorely persecuted by Mr James Alexander, sheriff-depute of Dumfries this year Along with Mr Muirhead, one of the bailies of Dumfries, and several others, he was carried prisoner to Leith, and subjected to many hazards and severities. Mr Macgeorge continued in prison till the middle of April 1685, when he was liberated upon bond to appear when called" The son of this gentleman, Mr William Macgeorge, a person of much learning and piety was for upwards of fifty years minister of the parish of Pennycuik He was the author of several works, and, among others, there remains a volume of his sermons which was printed at Edinburgh in 1729 He died in 1745

Another of the same family, John Macgeorge, afterwards of Auchenreoch and Larg, was also, like his kinsman, the minister of Heriot, a sufferer in the cause of the Reformation He was born in 1660 At the age of eighteen he fought on the side of the patriots at the battle of Bothwell bridge, where he was made prisoner, and was, with others, carried to Edinburgh and confined in the deep aisle of Greyfriars church As no male was allowed to communicate with the prisoners, several ladies occasionally brought them food and other necessaries, and one of these, by changing clothes with John Macgeorge, and remaining in his place, was the means of his effecting his escape. He fled to Ireland, where he remained for seven years, when he returned to Scotland and settled in his native district. The venerable Mr Maxwell of Munches, formerly of Tyraughty, the head of an old Catholic family, related to Mr Brydson, towards the end of the 18th century, that when his (Mr Maxwell's) widowed mother and her young family, of which he was one, were turned out of the castle of Buittle by the oppression of an unjust relative, and left without a place to shelter them, John Macgeorge of Auchenreoch invited and received them to his house without any application, built a house for them, and finally prosecuted their unnatural relative, and obtained for them the restitution of their just rights. "He," says the same authority, "who spontaneously performed so available a service for a Catholic lady and her unprotected family, had, for his firm adherence to the Presbyterian religion and the liberties of his country, been persecuted, proscribed, and exiled, and, when made prisoner in battle for the same cause, narrowly escaped an ignominious death." This John Macgeorge married, 1st, the daughter of Grierson of Lochinkit, by whom he had one son, William, whose daughter became the wife of Alexander Gordon of Crogo, whose descent will be found in the Peerage under the title of Kenmure. The only surviving child of that marriage, a daughter, married William Glendonwyn of Glendonwyn or Parton, the chief of an eminent Catholic family, whose eldest daughter, Mary, (the representative of Gordon of Crogo and of Macgeorge of Auchenreoch) married Sir James Gordon of Gordonston and Letterfourie, premier baronet of Scotland, and lineally descended from Adam, 2d son of 2d earl of Huntly and the Princess Jane, daughter of James I. Sir James died in 1813, and was succeeded by the 8th baronet. John Macgeorge married, 2dly, the daughter of John Hamilton of Auchenreoch, who is understood to have been of the family of the Hamiltons of Grange. From him John Macgeorge acquired the lands of Auchenreoch in 1715 The Hamiltons of Grange, originally of Cambuskeith, were lineally descended from Gilbert de Hamilton, the founder of the family, and the ancestor also of the ducal house of Hamilton John Hamilton of Auchenreoch, with many of his family and relations, are buried in the churchyard of Kirkpatrick-Durham The son of John Macgeorge by this marriage got from his father the lands of Larg, and married the daughter of Mr Hill, minister of Kirkpatrick-Durham. The eldest son of that marriage, John Macgeorge, younger of Larg, had a son, Andrew Macgeorge, who was for nearly fifty years in practice as a writer in Glasgow He married Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Jackson, Esq, for many years provost of Dumfries, and grand-daughter of James Cochrane, Esq, of the family of the Cochranes of Dundonald. Mr Macgeorge died in 1857, leaving issue.

Another of the family, in the 18th century, and related to Macgeorge of Auchenreoch, was John Macgeorge of Cocklick He married the daughter of Mr Hepburn, minister of the parish of Urr, who was the son of Sir Patrick Hepburn by Amelia daughter of Nisbet of Dirleton Another daughter of this Mr Hepburn married Carmichael of Mauldsle, by whom she had two sons, successively earls of Hyndford. The eldest son of John Macgeorge of Cocklick married Agnes, daughter of Dugald Maxwell of Cowhill, whose grandson and representative was (in 1813) Maxwell Campbell of Skerrington.

The arms of the family of Macgeorge are, Azure, three boars passant, or The crest is a demi griffin, rampant, argent. The motto, Pro servitate

MACGILL, surname of, see OXFURD, Viscount.

MACGILL, STEVENSON, D D, an eminent and learned divine, the son of a pious Methodist, of the name of Thomas Macgill, a master shipbuilder at Port Glasgow, was born there on 19th January, 1765 His mother, who was also distinguished for her religious character, was Frances, a daughter of Mr Welsh of Lochharet in East Lothian, and connected with the Maxwells of Newark Castle at Port Glasgow, and the family of Kilmahew at Cardross, on the opposite side of the frith of Clyde. He received the rudiments of his education in his native town, and being intended for the ministry in the Church of Scotland, in 1775, when little more than ten years old, he was sent to the university of Glasgow, where he continued during nine sessions, obtaining many literary honours, and distinguishing himself while at the divinity hall, particularly in biblical criticism and elocution, in both of which departments he continued to excel From several of the professors he received much kindness and attention, particularly from Professor Young, so celebrated for his attainments in the literature of Greece, Professor Jardine, whose success as a teacher of logic was unrivalled, and Dr Findlay, who, at that time, occupied the chair of divinity

After being a private tutor in several gentlemen's families, he was, in 1790, by the presbytery of Paisley, licensed to preach the gospel. Soon after, through the interest of the Hon. Henry Erskine, he had the offer of the chair of civil history in the university of St Andrews, in connexion with the pastoral charge of a small country parish Being, however, opposed to pluralities, he declined the offer He was ordained minister of the parish of Eastwood, in the presbytery of Paisley, on September 8th, 1791 There, for six years, he discharged the duties of a parochial clergyman with zeal and success, labouring in every way faithfully to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of his people, being particularly attentive to the religious and moral education of the young While at Eastwood the infidel and republican principles developed by the first French revolution, began to show themselves among his parishioners, and, for their guidance, he published a letter under the title of 'The Spirit of the Times,' which is believed to have had a beneficial effect, and which his biographer characterizes as "exceedingly creditable to his intelligence and his judgment, at this early period of his life"

On October 12th, 1797, Mr Macgill was translated to the Tron church of Glasgow, as successor to Mr M'Call In this new sphere of labour, he regularly visited his parish and the members of his congregation, and proved, himself, in all respects, a faithful and laborious minister In 1800 he took a leading part in forming the Glasgow Literary and Theological Society. Several of the essays which he read in that society, afterwards grew into important publications, and they were all eminently practical Whilst in this parish, he began those exertions in behalf of prisons, the infirmary, the lunatic asylum, and other benevolent institutions of Glasgow, for which the rest of his life was so honourably distinguished In 1807 the public prison of that city was built, on a greatly enlarged scale, in immediate contact with his parish He established a library in it, and in 1809 he published his 'Thoughts on Prison Discipline,' which did honour to his character as a philanthropist, but which met the fate of many other works of a similar kind The suggestions he made for the amelioration of the jails of our country were praised at the time, but were soon forgotten In the same year appeared 'Considerations addressed to a Young Clergyman,' a work which was reprinted in America, and which his biographer regards as one of the most valuable works in the department of pastoral theology The first conception of it is thought to have been a contribution, entitled 'The Student's Dream,' containing an allegorical representation of ministerial duty, which he sent, while a student of divinity, to a publication of the day It was about this time also that he made an effort, in the way of church extension, to meet the spiritual wants of the city of Glasgow, which had then begun very much to increase both in population and extent. The presbytery of Glasgow took up the matter and pressed on the municipal authorities of the city the necessity of building three additional churches, but only one was erected, and that in 1817, eight years after

In August 1814, he was appointed professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow, in the room of Dr Findlay, being himself succeeded in the Tron church by Dr Chalmers During the long course of years in which he held this important chair, he discharged its duties with a fidelity and success unequalled His zealous and pious labours had no insignificant share in bringing about that wonderful revival of evangelical religion within the Church of Scotland, which ultimately led to the disruption in 1843 As a professor, he was particularly distinguished by the soundness of his views upon the great truths of religion, and the importance which he attached to them in his public prelections, as well as by a deep insight into human character, and by his practical sagacity, qualities which he exerted with the happiest effect in the improvement of his students, while his private character was adorned by fervent piety, liberality and gentleness, coupled with a stern sense of justice, from which nothing could make him swerve Dr. Burns remarks—"While the theological lectures of Dr Macgill abounded in sound information, and enlarged views of evangelical truth, and while the practical tendency of the whole was highly favourable to the culture of the Christian graces, and the formation of pastoral habits, there can be no doubt that the fame of our revered friend, as a teacher of theology, belonged to him mainly in his character of a critic on the discourses of the students In this department he stood pre-eminent Judiciousness of remark, accurate discrimination, and strict impartiality, combined with the most friendly feelings towards the students, were his prominent features" When he came to the chair matters were in a sad state among the students The reading of newspapers in the class-room, during the professor's lecture, was quite common, and studiousness and piety in a student were equally laughed at by his class fellows The introduction of a mild, but firm and dignified discipline, soon put an end to this "A change was quickly apparent in the hall Its moral atmosphere was purified, and under the associated influences of sound theology and enlightened piety, many young men were trained to the service of the sanctuary, who were among the most faithful and useful ministers of the Church of Scotland"

The subject of pluralities having begun to attract the attention of the church, in the assembly of 1817, an overture was passed, that a chair in any of the universities could not be held along with a country charge. The union of such offices in large towns was, however, still left open to debate, and, when in 1823, Dr Macfarlane was appointed by the Crown principal in the university of Glasgow, and immediately thereafter received a crown presentation to the charge of the Inner High Church or St. Mungo's parish of that city, Dr Macgill recorded his objections in the minutes of the faculty, and took a leading part in opposing the induction in the presbytery, the synod, and the general assembly In the two former courts the opposition was successful, and the presentation set aside, but in the latter their sentence was reversed, and the induction allowed In all the discussions which took place in the church courts, in his time, on the subject of pluralities, he took a leading part. But he did not live to see the overture against such unions carried; for it was not till the assembly of 1842 that this much agitated question was finally disposed of

It was chiefly through the exertions of Dr Macgill, that, in 1824, a monument was erected in Glasgow to John Knox It stands on the brow of the hill overlooking the High Church, now the Necropolis of that city In 1826, and subsequent years, Dr Macgill devoted much of his time to the subject of reform in the universities, his evidence before two royal commissions being admitted to be among the most valuable parts of the information and suggestions communicated In 1828, he filled the office of moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland In 1834, he was one of those who were examined before a committee of the House of Commons on the subject of patronage, which he condemned in the most emphatic manner. In the following year he was appointed one of the deans of the chapel royal, in room of Dr Inglis. As neither the deanery nor the chaplainship usually conjoined with it, involve any duty, but are merely honorary appointments in reward of distinguished merit, the fact of his having accepted of such a nomination was in no wise inconsistent with his sentiments on the subject of pluralities. The salary was only £50; and, small as it was, it would have been an appropriate aid to the Doctor—for, through misdirected benevolence of feeling, he had, for many years before his death, become deeply involved in pecuniary difficulties. The government of the day, however, were bent on economy; the salary was diverted to another purpose; and he consequently never enjoyed any of the emoluments of the deanery Of his generosity, it is enough to say that he lived and laboured wholly for others, to whom his exertions and resources were equally devoted

In 1838, he was occupied with a plan for the erection of a house of refuge in Glasgow, which was afterwards accomplished on a large scale, and one of the last public meetings which he attended was in connexion with the building of one of the extension churches In the same year and in 1839 he published two volumes from his manuscripts, one of them on theological literature, and the other a volume of sermons.

Dr Macgill's father died in 1804 His mother survived till 1829 He was then sixty-four years of age. As he himself never married, he had a sister living with him The winter of 1839–40, though suffering from illness, he spent in the usual duties of his class, but by the end of the session he was laid up under fever, from over-exertion During the following summer his health was so far restored that he projected a new edition of his 'Letters to a Young Clergyman,' but weakness gained upon him. He died on the morning of 18th August 1840, aged 75, and was buried in the College churchyard, Glasgow, where a monumental tablet of statuary marble, with a suitable inscription, has been erected to his memory In 1842 appeared a memoir of him, by Robert Burns, D D, formerly of Paisley, afterwards of Canada.

MACGILLIVRAY, the name of a minor sept, the distinctive badge of which was the red whortleberry In the Gaelic its orthography is Mac Gilli breax, signifying the sons of the freckled lad. It was in alliance with, and under the protection of the Macintoshes, and considered a branch of the Clan Chattan.

The Siol (race of) Gillivray, like the Macdonalds, the Macdougalls, and various other clans in Argyleshire appear to have sprung from the original stock of the Siol Cuinn or race of Conn Dr Browne, following Mr Skene, (Highlands, vol. ii, page 113) says: "From the Manuscript of 1450, we learn that, in the twelfth century, there lived a certain Gillebride, surnamed King of the Isles, who derived his descent from a brother of Sulbne, the ancestor of the Macdonalds, who was slain in 1084, and the same authority deduces from Anradan or Henry, the son of this Gillebride, the Macneills, the Maclachlans, the Macewens, and the Maclairishes. The genealogy by which this Gillebride is derived from an ancestor of the Macdonalds in the beginning of the eleventh century, is, perhaps, of questionable authenticity, and so indeed, are almost all others which have reference to a rude and barbarous age, but the traditionary affinity which is thus shown to have existed between these clans and the race of Somerled, at so early a period, would seem to countenance the notion that they had all originally sprung from the same stock The original seat of this race appears to have been in Lochaber It has received the name of Siol Gillebride or Gillivray, from the circumstance mentioned by an old seannachie of the Macdonalds, that in the time of Somerled, the principal surnames in that country were Macinnes and Macgillivray, which is the same as Macinnes. The different branches of this tribe, therefore, probably formed but one clan, under the denomination of the clan Gillivray But on the conquest of Argyle by Alexander II, they were involved in the ruin which overtook all the adherents of Somerled, with the exception of the Macneills who consented to hold their lands off the crown, and the Maclachlans, who regained their former consequence by means of marriage with an heiress of the Lamonds." (Browne's History of the Highlands and Clans, vol iv p. 451) Logan says, it is a verbal perversion to make Macgillivray synonymous with Mac Gillbrid, the son of Bridget's follower

The chief of the principal branch of the Macgillivrays was designated from his estate of Dun-ma-glass, meaning 'the fort of the grey man's son' In 1745 Macgillivray of Dunmaglass, or Drumnaglas, as it is sometimes written, was appointed by Lady Macintosh of Moy colonel of the Macintosh regiment which, in the absence of her husband, who was on the side of the government, she raised for Prince Charles Edward At the battle of Culloden, the Macintoshes were the first of the clan regiments to advance to the attack of the duke of Cumberland's army, and they rushed forward with such impetuosity as nearly to annihilate its left wing In this charge Colonel Macgillivray and all the officers, excepting three were killed. His own immediate followers were about eighty

In the island of Mull is a branch of the Macgillivrays designated of Beinn-na-Gall, 'the mountain of the stranger,' from the residence of its head. This branch is supposed to be descended from those in Lochaber and Morvern, who were dispersed on the conquest of Argyle by Alexander II in 1222, and seem to have been otherwise called MacAonghais or MacInnes. One of this branch, named Martin Macgillivray, a clergyman, about 1640, was, in spite of his profession, in the habit of wearing a sword. Calling one day on Allan Maclean of Lochbuy, for his proportion of stipend, the latter refused to pay, asking, with a sneer, if he meant to enforce the demand by his sword. The clergyman answered in the affirmative, on which they drew, and Maclean was quickly brought to the ground. He immediately paid him the money, observing that he liked to see a man who could maintain his living by his sword

The head of the Mull branch of the Macgillivrays fought at Sheriffmuir in 1715 on the side of the Pretender

MACGILLIVRAY, WILLIAM, A M and LL D, an eminent naturalist, and the author of several works in the department of natural science, particularly in ornithology, was appointed, in 1841, professor of natural history, and lecturer on botany, in Marischal College and University, Aberdeen, from which he received the honorary degree of doctor of laws Before his appointment to that chair he was curator of the Royal College of Surgeons at Edinburgh He was a member of the Wernerian Natural History Society, and of the Royal Physical Society of that city, also of the Natural History Society of Philadelphia. His great work, the 'History of British Birds, Indigenous and Migratory,' is in five volumes, the first of which appeared in 1848, and the last in 1852 The first three volumes contain his account of land birds, and in the 4th and 5th he treats of those which inhabit the waters The knowledge of birds had not previously been definite or certain They were arranged according to the outward form, for naturalists appeared to have proceeded in the inspection of them no farther than the plumage, beaks, legs, or claws Thus, Linnæus grounded his system upon the shape of the feet and bill, Viellot, his upon the legs Dr Macgillivray was the first to carry out the investigation of their internal structure

The fifth and last volume was published just immediately before his death, which took place on 4th September, 1852 It is from the amount of actual observation that the work is especially valuable Whilst his health continued strong he had studied the habits of birds in all their places of resort, among rocks and islands, on the sandy shores of the sea, in the friths and estuaries, and on the inland waters Their haunts and habits, the changes produced on them by the seasons, or other outward influences, their food, and their movements, are all described, in a manner as genial and attractive as it is complete and orderly, and where he could not speak from his own observation, he acknowledges his obligations to about twelve authors, whose means of information of particular families of birds were superior to his own. He himself had almost abandoned the idea of completing the work, but it was urged upon him, and finished nearly with his life. The preface to the fourth volume is dated from Torquay in Cornwall, whither he had gone to reside on account of failing health. He himself explains the circumstance by this simple and appropriate allusion:—"As the wounded bird seeks some quiet retreat, where, freed from the persecution of the pitiless fowler, it may pass the time of its anguish in forgetfulness of the outer world, so have I, assailed by disease, betaken myself to a sheltered nook, where, unannoyed by the piercing blasts of the north, I had been led to hope that my life might be protracted beyond the most dangerous season of the year"

His son, Mr John Macgillivray, F R G S., Naturalist on board H M S Rattlesnake, published in 1852, in 2 vols, 'A Narrative of the Voyage of H M S Rattlesnake during 1846-50, including Discoveries and Surveys in New Guinea, &c"

MACGREGOR, the name of a clan esteemed one of the purest of all the Celtic tribes, the distinctive badge of which was the pine. They were the principal sept of the Siol Alpin, and there can be no doubt of their unmixed and direct descent from the Albanich or Alpinian stock, which formed the aboriginal inhabitants of Scotland. They were once numerous in Balquhidder and Menteith, and also in Glenorchy, which appears to have been their original seat. An air of romance has been thrown around this particular clan from the exploits and adventures of the celebrated Rob Roy, and the cruel sufferings and proscriptions to which they were, at different times, subjected by the government.

Claiming a regal origin, their motto anciently was, "My race is royal." Griogar, said to have been the third son of Alpin, king of Scotland, who commenced his reign in 833, is mentioned as their remote ancestor, but it is impossible to trace their descent from any such personage, or from his eldest brother, Kenneth Macalpin, from whom they also claim to be sprung.

According to Buchanan of Auchmar, the clan Gregor were located in Glenorchy as early as the reign of Malcolm Canmore (1057—1093). As, however, they were in the reign of Alexander II. (1214—1249) vassals of the earl of Ross, Skene (Highlands of Scotland, vol. ii p. 245) thinks it probable that Glenorchy was given to them, when that monarch conferred a large extent of territory on that potent noble. Hugh of Glenorchy appears to have been the first of their chiefs who was so styled. Malcolm, the chief of the clan in the days of Bruce, fought bravely on the national side at the battle of Bannockburn He accompanied Edward Bruce to Ireland, and being severely wounded at Dundalk, he was ever afterwards known as "the lame lord."

In the reign of David II, the Campbells managed to procure a legal title to the lands of Glenorchy, nevertheless, the Macgregors maintained, for a long time, the actual possession of them by the strong hand. They knew no other right than that of the sword, but, ultimately, that was found unavailing, and, at last, expelled from their own territory, they became an outlawed, lawless, and landless clan

John Macgregor of Glenorchy, who died in 1390, is said to have had three sons Patrick, his successor, John Dow, ancestor of the family of Glenstrae, who became the chiefs of the clan; and Gregor, ancestor of the Macgregors of Roro. Patrick's son, Malcolm, was compelled by the Campbells to sell the lands of Auchinrevach in Strathfillan, to Campbell of Glenorchy, who thus obtained the first footing in Breadalbane, which afterwards gave the title of earl to his family

The principal families of the Macgregors, in process of time, except that of Glenstrae, who held that estate as vassals of the earl of Argyle, found themselves reduced to the position of tenants on the lands of Campbell of Glenorchy and other powerful barons. It being the policy of the latter to get rid of them altogether, the unfortunate clan were driven, by a contanuous system of oppression and annoyance, to acts of rapine and violence, which brought upon them the vengeance of the government. The clan had no other means of subsistence than the plunder of their neighbours' property, and as they naturally directed their attacks chiefly against those who had wrested from them their own lands, it became still more the interest of their oppressors to represent to the king that nothing could put a stop to their lawless conduct, "save the cutting off the tribe of Macgregor root and branch" In 1488, soon after the youthful James IV had ascended the throne which the murder of his father had rendered vacant, an act was passed "for stanneching of thift-reif and other enormities throw all the realme," evidently designed against the Macgregors, for among the barons to whom power was given for enforcing it, were Duncan Campbell of Glenorchy, Neill Stewart of Fortingall, and Ewin Campbell of Strachur At this time the Macgregors were still a numerous clan. Besides those in Glenorchy, they were settled in great numbers in the districts of Breadalbane and Athol, and they all acknowledged Macgregor of Glenstrae, who bore the title of captain of the clan, as their chief

With the view of reducing these branches, Sir Duncan Campbell of Glenorchy obtained, in 1492, the office of bailiary of the crown lands of Disher and Tover, Glenlyon, and Glendochart, and in 1502 he procured a charter of the lands of Glenlyon. "From this period," says Mr Skene, (Highlands, vol ii. p. 248,) "the history of the Macgregors consists of a mere list of acts of privy council, by which commissions are granted to pursue the clan with fire and sword, and of various atrocities which a state of desperation, the natural result of these measures, as well as a deep spirit of vengeance, against both the framers and executors of them, frequently led the clan to commit. These actions led to the enactment of still severer laws, and at length to the complete proscription of the clan"

But still the Macgregors were not subdued. Taking refuge in their mountain fastnesses, they set at defiance all the efforts made by their enemies for their entire extermination, and inflicted upon some of them a terrible vengeance. In 1589 they seized and murdered John Drummond of Drummondernoch, a forester of the royal forest of Glenartney, an act which forms the foundation of the incident detailed in Sir Walter Scott's 'Legend of Montrose' The clan swore upon the head of the victim that they would avow and defend the deed in common An outrage like this led at once to the most rigorous proceedings on the part of the crown Fresh letters of fire and sword for three years were issued against the whole clan, and all persons were interdicted from harbouring or having any communication with them Then followed the conflict at Glenfruin in 1603, when the Macgregors, under Alexander Macgregor of Glenstrae, their chief, defeated the Colquhouns, under the laird of Luss, and 140 of the latter were killed The circumstances which led to, and the details of, this celebrated clan battle have been already given (see vol i. of this work, p. 665). The force of the Colquhouns was more than double that of the Macgregors, and of the latter it is remarkable that John, the brother of the chief, and another person alone were killed, though a number of them were wounded Dugald Ciar Mhor, ancestor of Rob Roy, is said on this occasion to have exhibited extraordinary ferocity and courage

Information of the disaster having been sent to the king by the laird of Luss, and the whole affair being misrepresented to his majesty, the clan Gregor were proclaimed rebels, and again intercommuned The earl of Argyle, who had been appointed lieutenant and justiciary in the whole bounds inhabited by the Macgregors, was sent against them About sixty of the clan made a brave stand at Bentok against a party of 200, belonging to the clan Cameron, clan Nab, and Clanranald, under the command of Robert Campbell, son of the laird of Glenorchy, when Duncan Abergh, one of the chieftains of the clan Gregor, with his son, Duncan, and seven gentlemen of Campbell's party, were killed

Alexander Macgregor of Glenstrae, the chief resisted for some time the strong combination formed against him but, after suffering many privations, he at last surrendered, with some of his principal clansmen, to the earl of Argyle, on condition that he should be allowed a safe-conduct into England He was, however, most basely betrayed by the earl. Sent under a guard across the borders, no sooner had he arrived at Berwick, than he was brought back to Edinburgh and put in prison At his trial on 26th January 1604, he was condemned to death, and executed at the Cross of that city with some of his followers, being, in consideration of his rank, suspended from a higher gallows than that on which hung the others. In relation to this betrayal and melancholy end of the unfortunate chief, there is the following entry in the MS. diary of Robert Birrell: "The 2 of October (1603,) Allester M'Gregour of Glainstre tane be the laird of Arkynles, bot escapt againe, bot efter, taken be the earle of Argyill the 4 of Januar, and brocht to Edinburghe the 9 of Januar 1604, with mae of 18 his friendis, M'Gregouris. He wes convoyit to Berwick be the gaird, conforme to the earlis promese, for he promesit to put him out of Scottis grund. Swa he keipit ane Hieland-manis promes, in respect he sent the gaird to convoy him out of Scottis grund But thai wer not directit to pairt with him, bot to fetche him bak againe! The 18 of Januar, at evine, he come againe to Edinburghe, and vpone the 20 day, he was hangit at the croce, and ij (eleven) of his freindis and name, upone ane gallous: Himselff, being chieff, he wes hangit his awin hicht above the rest of his friendis." That Argyle had an interest in his death appears from a declaration, printed in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol ii page 435, which the chief made before his execution, wherein he says that the earl had enticed him to commit several slaughters and disorders, and had endeavoured to prevail upon him to commit "sundrie mair"

Among other severe measures passed against this doomed clan was one which deprived them of their very name. By an act of the privy council dated 3d April 1603, all of the name of Macgregor were compelled, on pain of death, to adopt another surname, and all who had been engaged at the battle of Glenfruin, and other marauding expeditions detailed in the act, were prohibited, also under the pain of death, from carrying any weapon but a knife without a point to cut their victuals. They were also forbidden, under the same penalty of death, to meet in greater numbers than four at a time. The earls of Argyle and Athol were charged with the execution of these enactments, and it has been shown how the former carried out the task assigned to him With regard to the ill-fated chief so treacherously "done to death" by him, the following interesting tradition is related His son, while out hunting one day, met the young laird of Lamont travelling with a servant from Cowal towards Inverlochy They dined together at a house on the Black-mount, between Tyndrum and King's house, but having unfortunately quarrelled during the evening, dirks were drawn, and the young Macgregor was killed Lamont instantly fled, and was closely pursued by some of the clan Gregor Outstripping his foes, he reached the house of the chief of Glenstrae, whom he besought earnestly, without stating his crime, to afford him protection 'You are safe with me," said the chief, "whatever you may have done" On the pursuers arriving, they informed the unfortunate father of what had occurred, and demanded the murderer, but Macgregor refused to deliver him up, as he had passed his word to protect him "Let none of you dare to injure the man," he exclaimed, "Macgregor has promised him safety, and, as I live, he shall be safe while with me" He afterwards, with a party of his clan, escorted the youth home, and, on bidding him farewell, said, "Lamont, you are now safe on your own land I cannot, and I will not protect you further! Keep away from my people, and may God forgive you for what you have done!" Shortly afterwards the name of Macgregor was proscribed, and the chief of Glenstrae became a wanderer without a name or a home. But the laird of Lamont, remembering that he owed his life to him, hastened to protect the old chief and his family, and not only received the fugitives into his house, but shielded them for a time from their enemies.

Logan states that on the death of Alexander, the executed chief, without surviving lawful issue, the clan, then in a state of disorder, elected a chief, but the head of the collateral branch, deeming Gregor, the natural son of the late chief, better entitled to the honour, without ceremony dragged the chief-elect from his inaugural chair in the kirk of Strathfillan, and placed Gregor therein, in his stead.

The favourite names assumed by the clan while compelled to relinquish their own, were Campbell, Graham, Stewart, and Drummond. Their unity as a clan remained unbroken, and they even seemed to increase in numbers, notwithstanding all the oppressive proceedings directed against them These did not cease with the reign of James VI., for under Charles I. all the enactments against them were renewed, and yet in 1644, when the marquis of Montrose set up the king's standard in the Highlands, the clan Gregor, to the number of 1,000 fighting men, joined him, under the command of Patrick Macgregor of Glenstrae, their chief In reward for their loyalty, at the Restoration the various statutes against them were annulled, when the clan were enabled to resume their own name. In the reign of William III. however, the penal enactments against them were renewed in their full force. The clan were again proscribed, and compelled once more to take other names.

According to Buchanan of Auchmar, the direct male line of the chiefs became extinct in the reign of the latter monarch, and the representation fell, by "a formal renunciation of the chiefship," into the branch of Glengyle. Of this branch was the celebrated Rob Roy, that is, Red Rob, who assumed the name of Campbell under the proscriptive act. Born about 1660, he was the younger son of Donald Macgregor of Glengyle, a lieutenant-colonel in the service of King James VII., by his wife, the daughter of William Campbell of Glenfalloch the third son of Sir Robert Campbell of Glenorchy Rob Roy himself married Helen-Marv, the daughter of Macgregor of Comar His own designation was that of Inversnaid, but he seems to have acquired a right to the property of Craig Royston, a domain of rock and forest lying on the east side of Loch Lomond He became tutor to his nephew, the head of the Glengyle branch, then in his minority, and who claimed the chiefship of the clan

Like many other Highland gentlemen, Rob Roy was a trader in cattle or master drover, and in this capacity, he had borrowed several sums of money from the duke of Montrose, but becoming insolvent, he absconded In June 1712 an advertisement appeared for his apprehension, and he was involved in prosecutions, which nearly ruined him Some messengers of the law who visited his house in his absence are said to have abused his wife in a most shameful manner, and she, being a high-spirited woman, incited her husband to acts of vengeance. At the same time she gave vent to her feelings in a fine piece of pipe music, still well known by the name of "Rob Roy's Lament." As the duke had contrived to get possession of Rob's lands of Craig Royston, he was driven to become the "bold outlaw" which he is represented in song and story

"Determined," says General Stewart of Garth, "that his grace should not enjoy his lands with impunity, he collected a band of about twenty followers, declared open war against him, and gave up his old course of regular droving, declaring that the estate of Montrose should in future supply him with cattle, and that he would make the duke rue the day he quarrelled with him He kept his word, and for nearly thirty years—that is, till the day of his death—regularly levied contributions on the duke and his tenants, not by nightly depredations, but in broad day, and in a systematic manner; on an appointed time making a complete sweep of all the cattle of a district—always passing over those not belonging to the duke's estate, or the estates of his friends and adherents; and having previously given notice where he was to be on a certain day with his cattle, he was met there by people from all parts of the country, to whom he sold them publicly. These meetings, or trysts, as they were called, were held in different parts of the country, sometimes the cattle were driven south, but oftener to the north and west, where the influence of his friend the duke of Argyle protected him. When the cattle were in this manner driven away, the tenants paid no rent, so that the duke was the ultimate sufferer But he was made to suffer in every way The rents of the lower farms were partly paid in grain and meal, which was generally lodged in a storehouse or granary, called a girnal, near the Loch of Monteath When Macgregor wanted a supply of meal, he sent notice to a certain number of the duke's tenants to meet him at the girnal on a certain day, with their horses to carry home his meal. They met accordingly, when he ordered the horses to be loaded, and, giving a regular receipt to his grace's storekeeper for the quantity taken, he marched away, always entertaining the people very handsomely, and careful never to take the meal till it had been lodged in the duke's storehouse in payment of rent. When the money rents were paid, Macgregor frequently attended. On one occasion, when Mr Graham of Killearn, the factor, had collected the tenants to pay their rents, all Rob Roy's men happened to be absent, except Alexander Stewart, called 'the bailie.' With this single attendant he descended to Chapel Errock, where the factor and the tenants were assembled. He reached the house after it was dark, and, looking in at a window, saw Killearn, surrounded by a number of the tenants, with a bag full of money which he had received, and was in the act of depositing it in a press or cupboard, at the same time saying that he would cheerfully give all he had in the bag for Rob Roy's head. This notification was not lost on the outside visitor, who instantly gave orders in a loud voice to place two men at each window, two at each corner, and four at each of two doors, thus appearing to have twenty men Immediately the door opened, and he walked in with his attendant close behind, each armed with a sword in his right and a pistol in his left hand, and with dirks and pistols slung in their belts. The company started up, but he desired them to sit down, as his business was only with Killearn, whom he ordered to hand down the bag and put it on the table. When this was done, he desired the money to be counted, and proper receipts to be drawn out, certifying that he received the money from the duke of Montrose's agent, as the duke's property, the tenants having paid their rents, so that no after demand could be made on them on account of this transaction, and finding that some of the people had not obtained receipts, he desired the factor to grant them immediately, 'to show his grace,' said he, 'that it is from him I take the money, and not from these honest men who have paid him' After the whole was concluded, he ordered supper, saying that, as he had got the purse, it was proper he should pay the bill, and after they had drank heartily together for several hours, he called his bailie to produce his dirk, and lay it naked on the table. Killearn was then sworn that he would not move, nor direct any one else to move, from that spot for an hour after the departure of Macgregor, who thus cautioned him—'If you break your oath, you know what you are to expect in the next world, and in this,' pointing to his dirk. He then walked away, and was beyond pursuit before the hour expired."

At the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, in spite of the obligations which he owed to the indirect protection of the duke of Argyle, Rob Roy's Jacobite partialities induced him to join the rebel forces under the earl of Mar.

On this occasion none of the Clan Gregor, except the sept of Ciar Mohr, to which Rob Roy belonged, took up arms for the Chevalier, though they were joined by connexions of the family, and among others by Lockie of Ordy-Lockie, a large landed proprietor in Dumbartonshire, who had married a daughter of Donald M'Gregor, by his wife the daughter of Campbell of Glenfalloch, and who was thus the brother-in-law of Rob Roy "They were not," says Sir Walter Scott, "commanded by Rob Roy, but by his nephew already mentioned, Gregor Macgregor, otherwise called James Grahame of Glengyle, and still better remembered by the Gaelic epithet of Ghlune Dhu, i. e. Black Knee, from a black spot on one of his knees, which his Highland garb rendered visible. There can be no question, however, that being then very young, Glengyle must have acted on most occasions by the advice and direction of so experienced a leader as his uncle. The Macgregors assembled in numbers at that period, and began even to threaten the lowlands towards the lower extremity of Loch Lomond. They suddenly seized all the boats which were upon the lake, and, probably with a view to some enterprise of their own, drew them overland to Inversnaid, in order to intercept the progress of a large body of west country whigs who were in arms for the government, and moving in that direction. The whigs made an excursion for the recovery of the boats. Their forces consisted of volunteers from Paisley, Kilpatrick, and elsewhere, who, with the assistance of a body of seamen, were towed up the river Leven in long boats belonging to the ships of war then lying in the Clyde. At Luss, they were joined by the forces of Sir Humphrey Colquhoun, and James Grant, his son-in-law, with their followers, attired in the Highland dress of the period, which is picturesquely described. The whole party crossed to Craig Royston, but the Macgregors did not offer combat. If we were to believe the account of the expedition given by the historian Rae, they leaped on shore at Craig Royston with the utmost intrepidity, no enemy appearing to oppose them, and, by the noise of their drums, which they beat incessantly, and the discharge of their artillery and small arms, terrified the Macgregors, whom they appear never to have seen, out of their fastnesses, and caused them to fly in a panic to the general camp of the Highlanders at Strathfillan The low-country men succeeded in getting possession of the boats, at a great expenditure of noise and courage, and little risk of danger

"After this temporary removal from his old haunts, Rob Roy was sent by the earl of Mar to Aberdeen, to raise, it is believed, a part of the clan Gregor, which is settled in that country These men were of his own family (the race of the Ciar Mohr). They were the descendants of about three hundred Macgregors whom the earl of Moray, about the year 1624, transported from his estates in Monteith to oppose against his enemies the Macintoshes, a race as hardy and restless as they were themselves. We have already stated that Rob Roy's conduct during the insurrection of 1715 was very equivocal. His person and followers were in the Highland army, but his heart seems to have been with the duke of Argyle's. Yet the insurgents were constrained to trust to him as their only guide, when they marched from Perth towards Dunblane, with the view of crossing the Forth at what are called the Fords of Frew, and when they themselves said he could not be relied upon

"This movement to the westward, on the part of the insurgents, brought on the battle of Sheriffmuir; indecisive, indeed, in its immediate results, but of which the duke of Argyle reaped the whole advantage. In this action, it will be recollected that the right wing of the Highlanders broke and cut to pieces Argyle's left wing, while the clans on the left of Mar's army, though consisting of Stewarts, Mackenzies, and Camerons, were completely routed. During this medley of flight and pursuit, Rob Roy retained his station on a hill in the centre of the Highland position; and, though it is said his attack might have decided the day, he could not be prevailed upon to charge. This was the more unfortunate for the insurgents, as the leading of a party of the Macphersons had been committed to Macgregor This, it is said, was owing to the age and infirmity of the chief of that name, who, unable to lead his clan in person, objected to his heir apparent, Macpherson of Nord, discharging his duty on that occasion, so that the tribe, or a part of them, were brigaded with their allies, the Macgregors. While the favourable moment for action was gliding away unemployed, Mar's positive orders reached Rob Roy that he should presently attack. To which he coolly replied, 'No, no, if they cannot do it without me, they cannot do it with me.' One of the Macphersons, named Alexander, one of Rob's original profession, sudshost a drover, but a man of great strength and spirit, was so incensed at the inactivity of his temporary leader, that he threw off his plaid, drew his sword, and called out to his clansmen, 'Let us endure this no longer! if he will not lead you, I will' Rob Roy replied, with great coolness, 'Were the question about driving Highland stots or kyloes, Sandie, I would yield to your superior skill; but as it respects the leading of men, I must be allowed to be the better judge.' 'Did the matter respect driving Glen-Eigas stots,' answered Macpherson, 'the question with Rob would not be, which was to be last, but which was to be foremost.' Incensed at this sarcasm, Macgregor drew his sword, and they would have fought upon the spot if their friends on both sides had not interfered But the moment of attack was completely lost Rob did not, however, neglect his own private interest on the occasion In the confusion of an undecided field of battle, he enriched his followers by plundering the baggage and the dead on both sides. The fine old satirical ballad on the battle of Sheriffmuir, does not forget to stigmatize our hero's conduct on this memorable occasion

'Rob Roy he stood watch
On a hill for to catch
The booty, for aught that I saw, man,
For he ne'er advanced
From the place where he stanced,
Till nae mair was to do there at a', man'

"Notwithstanding the sort of neutrality which Rob Roy had continued to observe during the progress of the rebellion, he did not escape some of its penalties. He was included in the act of attainder, and the house in Breadalbane, which was his place of retreat, was burned by General Lord Cadogan, when, after the conclusion of the insurrection, he marched through the Highlands to disarm and punish the offending clans. But upon going to Inverary with about forty or fifty of his followers, Rob obtained favour, by an apparent surrender of their arms to Colonel Patrick Campbell of Finnah, who furnished them and their leader with protections under his hand. Being thus in a great measure secured from the resentment of government, Rob Roy established his residence at Craig Royston, near Loch Lomond, in the midst of his own kinsmen, and lost no time in resuming his private quarrel with the duke of Montrose. For this purpose, he soon got on foot as many men, and well armed too, as he had yet commanded. He never stirred without a body guard of ten or twelve picked followers, and without much effort could increase them to fifty or sixty" (Introduction to Rob Roy)

For some years he continued to levy black-mail from those whose cattle and estates he protected, and although an English garrison was stationed at Inversnaid, near Aberfoyle, his activity, address, and courage continually saved him from falling into their hands. The year of his death is uncertain, but it is supposed to have been after 1738. He died at an advanced age in his bed, in his own house at Balquhidder When he found death approaching, "he expressed," says Sir Walter Scott, "some contrition for particular parts of his life. His wife laughed at these scruples of conscience, and exhorted him to die like a man, as he had lived In reply, he rebuked her for her violent passions, and the counsels she had given him 'You have put strife,' he said, 'between me and the best men of the country, and now you would place enmity between me and my God.' There is a tradition nowise inconsistent with the former, if the character of Rob Roy be justly considered, that, while on his deathbed, he learned that a person with whom he was at enmity, proposed to visit him. 'Raise me from my bed,' said the invalid, 'throw my plaid around me, and bring me my claymore, dirk, and pistols —it shall never be said that a foeman saw Rob Roy Macgregor defenceless and unarmed.' His foeman, conjectured to be one of the Maclarens, entered and paid his compliments, inquiring after the health of his formidable neighbour Rob Roy maintained a cold haughty civility during their short conference, and as soon as he had left the house, 'Now,' he said, 'all is over,—let the piper play Ha til mi tulidh,' (we return no more), and he is said to have expired before the dirge was finished." The grave of Macgregor, in the churchyard of Balquhidder, is distinguished by a rude tombstone, over which a sword is carved.

THE CHURCHYARD OF BALQUHIDDER.

Rob Roy had five sons, Coll, Ronald, James, called James Roy, after his father, and James Mohr, or big James, from his height, Duncan, and Robert, called Robin Oig, or young Robin Shortly after his death, as Sir Walter Scott tells us, "the ill-will which the Macgregors entertained against the Maclarens again broke out, at the instigation, it was said, of Rob's widow Robin Oig, her youngest son, swore that as soon as he could get back a certain gun which had belonged to his father and had been sent to Doune to be repaired, he would shoot Maclaren, for having presumed to settle on his mother's land He was as good as his word, and shot Maclaren when between the stilts of his plough, wounding him mortally" The gun with which he did the deed afterwards came into the possession of Sir Walter Scott, and was placed in Abbotsford This happened about 1736. Robin Oig absconded, and was outlawed by the high court of justiciary His brothers, however, James and Ronald, with the doctor who had been called in to attend the wounded Maclaren, Callam Macinleister by name, were brought to trial for the murder But as it could not be shown that they were accessory to the crime, the jury found a verdict of not proven Ronald and James, however, being reputed thieves, were ordered to find caution to the extent of £200, for their good behaviour for seven years. Robin Oig had enlisted into the 42d regiment, and was present at the battle of Fontenoy, where he was wounded and taken prisoner He was exchanged, and returned to Scotland. He married a daughter of Graham of Drunkie, but his wife died a few years afterwards.

On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, the clan Gregor adhered to the cause of the Pretender A Macgregor regiment, 800 strong, was raised by Robert Macgregor of Glencairnock, who was generally considered as chief of the clan, which joined the prince's army The branch of Clar Mohr, however, regarded William Macgregor Drummond of Bohaldie, then in France, as their head, and a separate corps formed by them, commanded by Glengyle, and James Roy Macgregor, united themselves to the levies of the titular duke of Perth, James assuming the name of Drummond. the duke a family name, instead of that of Campbell. This corps was the relics of Rob Roy's band, and with only twelve men of it, James Roy, who seems to have held the rank of captain or major, succeeded in surprising and burning, for the second time, the fort at Inversnaid, constructed for the express purpose of keeping the country of the Macgregors in order

At the battle of Prestonpans, the duke of Perth's men and the Macgregors composed the centre. Armed only with scythes, this party cut off the legs of the horses, and severed it is said, the bodies of their riders in twain. Captain James Roy, at the commencement of the battle, received five wounds. Two bullets went through his body, and laid him prostrate on the earth. That his men might not be discouraged by his fall, he raised himself from the ground, and resting his head upon his hand, called out to them, "My lads. I am not dead! —by God, I shall see if any of you does not do his duty!" The Macgregors instantly fell on the flank of the English infantry, which immediately gave way James Roy recovered from his wounds, and rejoined the prince's army with six companies. He was present at the battle of Culloden, and after that defeat the clan Gregor returned in a body to their own country, when they dispersed. James Roy was attainted for high treason, but from some letters of his, published in Blackwood's Magazine for December 1817, vol. ii. page 228, it appears that he had entered into some communication with the government, as he mentions having obtained a pass from the lord-justice-clerk in 1747, which was a sufficient protection to him from the military

Rob Roy's youngest son, Robin Oig, already mentioned, the subject of the old Scots song, beginning,

"Rob Roy from the Highlands cam',"

was executed at Edinburgh in February 1753, for the abduction and rape of Jane Kay, heiress of Edenbellie. His brother, James Macgregor Drummond, was also tried capitally for assisting him in the crime, but escaping from prison before sentence, he was outlawed The account of their trial is given at length in 'Maclaurin's Criminal Trials.' Another brother, Duncan Macgregor or Drummond, was brought to trial for being concerned in the abduction of Jane Kay, but the jury found him not guilty

On James Roy's arrival in France, he seems to have been in very poor circumstances, as he addressed a letter to Mr Edgar, secretary to the Chevalier de St. George, dated Boulogne-sur-Mer, May 22d, 1753, craving assistance "for the support of a man who has always shown the strongest attachment to his majesty's person and cause;" and enclosing the following certificate "Boulogne-sur-Mer, May ye 22d, 1753. We the underwritten certify that it consists with our knowledge, that James Drummond, son to the late Rob Roy, was employ'd in the Prince Regent's affairs by James, duke of Perth, before his Royal Highness' arrival in Scotland, and that afterwards he behaved with great bravery in several battles, in which he received many dangerous wounds. (Signed) Strathallan, Charles Boyd, Willm. Drummond" To relieve his necessities, James ordered his banker at Paris to pay Macgregor 800 livres, in reference to which Lord Strathallan thus writes to Edgar, from Boulogne-sur-Mer, on 6th September 1753:—"I had the honour of yours some time ago, and deferred writing you until I heard about the 800 livres for Mr Drummond (Macgregor), but I have never heard any more of it. I immediately acquainted Mr D with the contents of your letter The attestation I signed was only as to his courage and personal bravery, for as to anything else, I would be sorry to answer for him, as he has but an indifferent character as to real honesty" (Stuart Papers.)

On the 20th of the same month and year James Roy sent a petition to Prince Charles Edward, pleading his services to the cause of the Stuarts, ascribing his exile to the persecution of the Hanoverian government, without any allusion to the affair of Jane Kay, or his outlawry by the high court of justiciary It was forwarded by Macgregor Drummond of Bohaldie, the acknowledged chief, as already stated, of the Ciar Mohr branch of the clan Gregor

James Roy was subsequently employed by the friends of Mr Campbell of Glenure who, on being appointed factor for government on the forfeited estates of Stewart of Ardshiel, was shot dead by an assassin as he passed through the wood of Lettermore, to trepan Allan Breck Stewart, a kinsman of the deceased, the supposed murderer, who had taken refuge in France, and convey him to England Allan Breck, however, forewarned of his danger, escaped, but James Roy, availing himself of a permission he had received to return to Britain, made a journey to London, and had an interview, according to his own statement, with Lord Holdernesse, secretary of state. The latter and the under secretary offered him, he says, a situation in the government service, which he rejected, as he avers his acceptance of it would have been a disgrace to his birth, and would have rendered him a scourge to his country On this he was ordered instantly to quit England. On his return to France, an information was lodged against him by Macdonnell of Lochgarry, before the high bailie of Dunkirk, accusing him of being a spy In consequence, he was obliged to quit that town and proceed to Paris, with only thirteen livres in his pocket. In his last letter to his acknowledged chief, Macgregor of Bohaldie, dated at Paris, 25th September, 1754, he describes himself as being in a state of extreme destitution, and expresses his anxiety to obtain some employment as a breaker and breeder of horses, or as a hunter or fowler, "till better cast up." In a postscript he asks his chief to lend him his bagpipes, "to play some melancholy tunes." He died about a week after writing this letter, it is supposed of absolute starvation.

It was not till 1784 that the oppressive acts against the Macgregors, which, however, for several years had fallen into desuetude, were rescinded by the British parliament, when they were allowed to resume their own name, and were restored to all the rights and privileges of British citizens. A deed was immediately entered into, subscribed by 826 persons of the name of Macgregor, recognising John Murray of Lanrick, representative of the family of Glencarnock, as their chief, Murray being the name assumed, under the Proscriptive act, by John Macgregor, who was chief in 1715 Although he secretly favoured the rebellion of that year, the latter took no active part in it, but Robert, the next chief, mortgaged his estate, to support the cause of the Stuarts, and he commanded that portion of the clan who acknowledged him as their head in the rebellion of 1745 Altogether, with the Ciar Mohr branch, the Macgregors could then muster 700 fighting men. To induce Glencarnock's followers to lay down their arms, the duke of Cumberland authorised Mr Gordon, at that time minister of Alva, in Strathspey, to treat with them, offering them the restoration of their name, and other favours, but the chief replied that they could not desert the cause. They chose rather to risk all, and die with the characters of honest men, than live in infamy, and disgrace their posterity

After the battle of Culloden, the chief was long confined in Edinburgh castle, and on his death in 1758, he was succeeded by his brother Evan, who held a commission in the 41st regiment, and served with distinction in Germany His son, John Murray of Lanrick, was the chief acknowledged by the clan, on the restoration of their rights in 1784 He was a general in the East India Company's service, and auditor-general in Bengal. Created a baronet of Great Britain 23d July 1795, he resumed in 1822 the original surname of the family, Macgregor, by royal license. He died the same year His next brother, Alexander Macgregor Murray, was colonel of the royal Clan-Alpin fencibles, when that regiment was raised in 1799 A younger brother, Robert, was lieutenant-colonel, and a great number of the clan Gregor formed part of it. The Clan-Alpin fencibles were disbanded in 1802 Another brother, Peter, colonel in the East India Company's service, and adjutant-general of the Bengal army, was killed on board of the Lord Nelson, East Indiaman Colonel Alexander Macgregor Murray's son, also named Alexander, attained to the rank of major-general in the army

Sir John Murray Macgregor's only son, Sir Evan John Macgregor, second baronet, was born in January 1785 He was a major-general in the army, K C B, and G C H, and governor-general of the Windward Isles. He died at his seat of government 14th June 1841 By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Murray, daughter of John, fourth duke of Athol, he had five sons and four daughters.

His eldest son, Sir John Athol Bannatyne Macgregor, third baronet, born 20th January 1810, was lieutenant-governor of the Virgin islands, and died at Tortola, his seat of government, 11th May, 1851 He had four sons and two daughters. The eldest son, Sir Malcolm Murray Macgregor, fourth baronet, born 29th August, 1834, and styled of Macgregor, county Perth, is an officer in the royal navy The modern motto of the family is "E'en do, but spair nocht."

Another family of the name of Macgregor enjoys a baronetcy, conferred, on 17th March 1828, on Patrick Macgregor, son of James Macgregor of Ballimore, Inverness-shire, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Alexander Grant of Tullochgorm, He had filled the situation of sergeant-surgeon to the king, and personal surgeon to the duke of York. He died two months after being created a baronet. His eldest son, Sir William, second baronet, was a captain in the 93d Highlanders. He died, unmarried, 29th March, 1846, and was succeeded by his brother, the Rev Sir Charles Macgregor, third baronet, born in 1819, graduated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, vicar and rural dean of the diocese of Lincoln, married, with issue

Many persons of the name of Macgregor have distinguished themselves, particularly in the military service of the country Among these may be mentioned Colonel Robert Macgregor of the 88th regiment, who was renowned for his personal bravery He was a native of Edinburgh, and entered the army as a volunteer in the 57th foot, and with that regiment proceeded to the West Indies. He was present at the reduction of St. Lucia, and was appointed by Sir Ralph Abercrombv to an ensigncy in the 27th He subsequently purchased a company in the 88th regiment, and accompanied it to the East Indies. He afterwards served in Egypt, and in 1806, his regiment formed part of General Crawford's expedition to Buenos Ayres. I 1808, he proceeded to the Peninsula, and was severely wounded at the battle of Busaco. He died in December 1835.

An adventurer of this name, Sir Gregor Macgregor, at one time rendered himself remarkable by his exploits in South America, and particularly by his obtaining the sovereign away in Poyais, a fertile tract of land, on the Mosquito shore, near the bay of Honduras, with a capital of the same name. He was originally an officer in the British army, and served with distinction in Spain. In 1816 he was very active in the Venezuelan revolution, and in 1817 he took possession of Amelia island, on the coast of Florida, then belonging to Spain In 1819, he attacked Portobello, which he captured, but was soon after surprised in his bed, and obliged to escape out of a window Some years subsequently he settled among the Poyais, a warlike race of Indians, who had maintained their independence, and having gained their confidence he was chosen by them their cacique. In this capacity he encouraged commerce, founded schools, &c. In 1824 as cacique of Poyais he procured a loan in London from respectable houses. Strangewav, his aide-de-camp, published at Edinburgh in 1824, a Sketch of the Mosquito Shore, including the territory of Poyais, in which there are many interesting particulars regarding this enterprising member of the house of Macgregor

On the roll of baronets of Great Britain is a family of the name of M'Grigor Sir James M'Grigor of Camden Hill, Kensington, Middlesex, M D, F R.S., the son of Colquhoun M'Grigor, Esq, a merchant in Aberdeen, born in 1771, entered the medical department of the army in 1793. In 1796 he was chief of the medical staff in Grenada, and after filling the same office in India, in Egypt, and in the Walcheren expedition, in 1811 he joined the army in the Peninsula, and was particularly distinguished by the duke of Wellington in his despatches after the surrender of Badajos and the battle of Vittoria. Knighted in 1814, in 1815 placed at the head of the medical board; in 1831 created a baronet of Great Britain He died in 1858. His son, Sir Charles Roderick M'Grigor, 2d baronet, born in 1811, married youngest daughter of Major-general Sir Robert Nickle, descended from the Nichols of Roxburghshire; issue 2 sons and 3 daughters.

MACINTOSH, the name of one of the two principal branches of the clan Chattan, the Macphersons, or clan Vurich, being the other The Macintoshes are supposed to have derived their name from the Gaelic word toiseach, meaning properly the first or front, and applied to the oldest cadet of a family, as, from the earliest times, he held the highest rank in the clan, next to the chief, and was its leader in battle. The title of captain or leader of the clan was afterwards substituted for it, when it was confined principally to three clans, namely, the clan Chattan, the clan Cameron, and the clan Ranald "It is evident," says Mr Skene, "that a title which was not universal among the Highlanders must have arisen from peculiar circumstances connected with those clans in which it is first found; and when we examine the history of these clans, there can be little doubt that it was simply a person who had, from various causes, become de facto head of the clan, while the person possessing the hereditary right to that dignity remained either in a subordinate situation, or else for the time dismitted from the rest of the clan" (Skene's Highlanders, vol. ii. pp. 177, 178.)

The original possessions of the clan Chattan included the whole of Badenoch, the greater part of Lochaber, and the districts of Strathnairn and Strathdairn, which formed a portion of the ancient maordom of Moray It is said to have derived its name from Gillichattaif-more, its founder and head. The armorial bearings of all the clan Chattan exhibit the cat as their crest, with the motto, "Touch not the Cat, but the Glove," but here meaning without. The badge of the Macintoshes is the red whortleberry, while that of the Macphersons is the box evergreen At an early period these two tribes separated, and the chiefship of the clan became a disputed point between them, one portion acknowledging Macintosh of Macintosh as their head, and the other Macpherson of Cluny According to the Gaelic manuscript of 1450, discovered in the Advocates' library by Mr Skene in 1848, and now frequently quoted in Celtic genealogies, the Macphersons and the Macintoshes are descended from Neachtan and Neill, the two sons of Gillichattan-more. The Macintoshes themselves, however, claim a different descent. They say that their ancestor was Macduff, earl of Fife, and that about the end of the 13th century they obtained the chiefship of the clan Chattan by marriage with Eva, the daughter and heiress of the grandson of the founder, Gillichattan-more. Nisbet, who deduces the clan Chattan from the Catti, a people said to have been driven from Germany by Tiberius Cæsar, about the year of our Lord 76, says that Eva "was married to Macintosh head of his clan, and that he got with her several lands in Lochaber, and a command of part of the people, for which he was called captain of the clan Chattan. But Fwan Bane, second son of Murtach, after the death of his elder brother (Gillichattan) and the son of the latter, was owned as chief by the whole clan He had three sons, Kenneth, John, and Gillies. From Kenneth, the eldest, is come the family of Macpherson of Cluny, which was then and since known by the name of MacEwan." (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 424.) From the obscurity in which the early history of the clan is involved it is not certain which of the lairds of Macintosh it was who married Eva. Some writers assert that it was the fourth, Buchanan of Auchmar says the fifth, while another authority affirms the sixth In charters granted by the lords of the Isles, confirmed by David II., the son of Eva is designated captain of the clan Chattan, and in support of the claim of their head to this title the Macintoshes can produce abundance of documentary evidence, including various other charters, many of them from the Crown They can even show that on two occasions the Macphersons themselves acknowledged the head of the Macintoshes as such, once, in the 14th century, when the laird of Macintosh was by them recognised as "captain of the kin of clan Chattan," and again, in 1609, when they conceded to him the title of "Principal captain of the haill kin of clan Chattan, according to the king's gift of chiefrainey of the whole clan Chattan" But nowhere can it be shown that the head of the Macintoshes was ever acknowledged or even styled chief of the clan Chattan either by the king or by the rival branch It was not, indeed, within the prerogative of the king or of any power on earth, to create a chief of a clan That was a matter of blood and birth and lineal descent and representation, or of election by the tribe alone, and it would have been of no consequence or weight whatever, even though the sovereign for the time had named the laird of Macintosh the chief, as in numerous instances he was styled the captain of the clan Chattan. The claim of the head of the Macphersons to be held the lineal and feudal representative of the ancient chiefs of the clan Chattan will be noticed under the head MACPHERSON

That the Macintoshes are descended from Neill, the second son of Gillichattan-more, above mentioned, and not from Macduff, earl of Fife, as they themselves represent, to the detriment, it may be thought, of their own claims to the chiefship, appears to be established by Mr Skene, founding on the Celtic genealogy of 1450, before referred to. It may also be concluded that so far from being of German origin, as Nisbet states, the clan Chattan were in reality descended from the ancient Celtic inhabitants of the maordom of Moray, and were the largest and most powerful of the various tribes or clans settled within it which became independent, when it had ceased to exist. According to Sir George Mackenzie, their crest or emblem of a cat was assumed, not from any connexion with the Catti of Nisbet, if indeed there ever was any immigration of such a tribe into the north, as asserted, which is very doubtful, but from the number of wild cats that once infested what are now the counties of Sutherland and Caithness, and led to the district comprehending both being styled Cattu, the latter only retaining the name of Cattu-ness or Caithness.

In 1336, William Macintosh, then the head of the clan, obtained from John of Isla, afterwards lord of the Isles, a grant of the lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig in Lochaber, which was the cause of a lasting feud between the clan Chattan and the clan Cameron These clans had a common origin, and for some time followed the same chief (Major's History of Scotland, page 302); but about the period named, a separation took place between them The clan Cameron supported the Macphersons in their dispute with the Macintoshes relative to the chiefship, and according to a tradition contained in a MS. history of the Camerons, introductory to the life of Sir Ewen Cameron, quoted by Mr Gregory (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, page 75), they and the clan Chattan were the tribes engaged in the memorable combat on the North Inch of Perth in 1396, so graphically described in Sir Walter Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth,' and with less embellishment in his 'Tales of a Grandfather' The parties who encountered on that occasion are usually said to have belonged to the clan Quhele and the clan Kay, the latter erroneously supposed to have been the Mackays. The earls of Dunbar and Crawford having failed to effect an arrangement of the matter in dispute, these noblemen, with the king's brother, the duke of Albany, recommended that it should be decided by public battle between thirty on each side, in presence of the king, Robert III, and his court. It the dispute had related, as on good grounds it is believed that it did, to the chiefship, the king, by consenting to such a mode of arbitrement, clearly showed that he had no power to dispose of it otherwise, as it was entirely a matter which concerned only the contending clans, with which he had nothing to do, but to see fair play between them

On the day appointed the combatants appeared on the North Inch at Perth Barriers had been erected on the ground, and the king and queen, accompanied by a large body of nobles, took their places on a platform to view the combat. Wyntoun says that those who engaged were armed > "With bow and axe, knyf and sword,

> To deal amang them their last werd."

The fight, however, was very nearly prevented by the absence of one of the clan Quhele, or clan Chattan. Some accounts state that the one amissing had fallen sick. According to Bower, his heart having failed him he had slipped through the crowd, plunged into the Tay, and swam across, and although pursued by thousands, effected his escape. As the combat could not proceed with the inequality of numbers thus occasioned, the king was about to break up the assembly, when a little bandy-legged man named Henry Wynd, a burgher of Perth, and an armourer or saddler by trade, sprang within the barriers, and thus spoke —"Here am I! Will any one fee me to engage with these hirelings in this stage play? For half a merk will I try the game, provided, if I escape alive, I have my board of one of you so long as I live" This offer of Gow Crom, as he was called by the Highlanders, that is, crooked smith, was granted by the king, and he took his place with the clan Chattan. The signal was then given, and the battle began. Henry Wynd bending his bow, and sending the first arrow among the opposite party, killed one of them. After a discharge of arrows the combatants rushed upon one another, and as they fought with the two-handed sword, dagger, and battle-axe, the field of battle was soon covered with the killed and wounded.

"In the midst of the deadly conflict," narrates Sir Walter Scott, in his 'Tales of a Grandfather' "the chieftain of the clan Chattan observed that Henry Wynd, after he had slain one of the clan Kay, drew aside, and did not seem willing to fight more. 'How is this?' said he, 'art thou afraid?' 'Not I,' answered Henry, 'but I have done enough of work for a half crown' 'Forward and fight,' said the Highland chief, 'he that does not grudge his day's work, I will not stint him in his wages.' Thus encouraged, Henry Wynd again plunged into the conflict, and by his excellence as a swordsman, contributed a great deal to the victory, which at length fell to the clan Chattan" Twenty-nine of the clan Kay had been killed, and nineteen of the clan Quhele. The ten remaining of the victors were all grievously wounded. Henry Wynd and the survivor of the clan Kay escaped unhurt. The latter, seeing the odds against him, threw himself into the Tay, and swam to the other side. Henry Wynd, who had rendered the clan Chattan such signal assistance, was liberally rewarded by their leader, but, continues Sir Walter, "it was remarked, when the battle ended, that he could not tell the name of the clan he had fought for, and when asked on which side he had been, he replied, that he had been fighting for his own hand. Hence originated the proverb, 'Every man for his own hand, as Harry Wynd fought.'"

With regard to the cause or object of the combat, one of the most remarkable events of its kind in the annals of the Gael, and the parties engaged, Dr Browne, in his 'History of the Highlands and Highland Clans,' (vol iv p. 474,) says "Excepting the general fact, little is known concerning this conflict. We are ignorant of the precise nature of the dispute, which was thus submitted to the arbitrement of the sword, the axe, and the dagger, and almost equally so respecting the precise clans who had agreed to settle their differences in this manner It is said, indeed, that the cause of contention had arisen a short time before, and that Sir David Lindsay and the earl of Moray had suggested, if not actually arranged, this barbarous mode of adjustment, although with what particular view it is impossible to ascertain at this distance of time. It appears, also, that the clans called clan Kay and clan Chattan by Sir Walter Scott and others, were, by the ancient authorities, denominated clan Yha and clan Quhele; and from this circumstance, taken in conjunction with some others, Mr Skene has concluded that the Macphersons were the clan Yha, and the Macintoshes the clan Quhele. But, however this may be, it is admitted, on all hands, that the clan Chattan, or clan Quhele, were victorious in the combat, and if any inference at all can be drawn from the names, it seems to be this, that the victors were the champions of the clan which is commonly known by the former of these denominations, namely, that of clan Chattan The point in dispute was thus settled in their favour, the Macintoshes were acknowledged as the chiefs of the clan, though, under a different denomination, (that of captain,) and from the date of the conflict at Perth, in 1396, they continued to be regarded as its heads."

In 1411, the chief of Macintosh was slain, fighting on the side of Donald, lord of the Isles, at the battle of Harlaw In 1429, when Alexander, lord of the Isles and earl of Ross broke out into rebellion at the head of 10,000 men, on the advance of the king into Lochaber, the clan Chattan and the clan Cameron deserted the earl's banners, and went over to the royal army, when the rebels were defeated. In 1431, Malcolm Macintosh, then captain of the clan Chattan, received a grant of the lands of Alexander of Lochaber, uncle of the earl of Ross, that chieftain having been forfeited for engaging in the rebellion of Donald Balloch. Having afterwards contrived to make his peace with the lord of the Isles, he received from him, between 1443 and 1447, a confirmation of his lands in Lochaber, with a grant of the office of bailiary of that district. His son, Duncan, styled captain of the clan Chattan in 1467, was in great favour with John, lord of the Isles and earl of Ross, whose sister, Flora, he married, and who bestowed on him the office of steward of Lochaber, which had been held by his father He also received the lands of Keppoch and others included in that lordship.

On the forfeiture of his brother-in-law in 1475, James III granted to the same Duncan Macintosh, a charter, of date July 4th, 1476, of the lands of Moymore, and various others, in Lochaber It was the policy of James IV to secure the attachment of the heads of the clans to his person and government by conciliatory measures. Tytler says "To attach to his interest the principal chiefs of these provinces, to overawe and subdue the petty princes who affected independence, to carry into their territories, hitherto too exclusively governed by their own capricious or tyrannical institutions, the same system of a severe, but regular and rapid administration of civil and criminal justice, which had been established in his Lowland dominions, was the laudable object of the king, and for this purpose he succeeded, with that energy and activity which remarkably distinguished him, in opening up an intercourse with many of the leading men in the northern counties. With the captain of the clan Chattan, Duncan Macintosh, with Ewan, the son of Alan, captain of the clan Cameron, with Campbell of Glenurquhay, the MacGilleouns (MacLeans) of Dowart and Lochbuy, MacKane (MacIan) of Ardnamurchan, the lairds of Mackenzie and Grant, and the earl of Huntly, a baron of the most extensive power in those northern districts, he appears to have been in habits of constant and regular communication, rewarding them by presents, in the shape either of money or grants of land, and securing their services in reducing to obedience such of their fellow chieftains as proved contumacious, or actually rose in rebellion" (Tytler's History of Scotland, vol. iv pp. 867, 868.) But all was of no avail, the feuds among the chiefs continued, and it was often found difficult to vindicate the supremacy of the law in the remote and then almost inaccessible portions of the Highlands where their possessions lay

In 1491, a large body of western Highlanders, principally Macdonalds and Camerons, under Alexander Macdonald of Lochalsh, nephew of the lord of the Isles, advanced from Lochaber into Badenoch, where they were joined by the clan Chattan, led by Farquhar Macintosh, the son and heir of Duncan, the captain of the clan Chattan. They proceeded to Inverness, where Farquhar Macintosh stormed and took the royal castle, in which he established a garrison. The battle of Blairne-park followed, and the result was the final forfeiture of the lordship of the Isles, and its annexation to the crown in May 1493. When the king that year proceeded in person to the West Highlands, Duncan Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan, was one of the chiefs, formerly among the vassals of the lord of the Isles, who went to meet him and make their submission to him. These chiefs received in return royal charters of the lands they had previously held under the lord of the Isles, and Macintosh obtained a charter of the lands of Keppoch, Innerorgan, and others, with the office of bailiary of the same. In 1495, Farquhar Macintosh, his son, and Kenneth Oig Mackenzie of Kintail, were imprisoned, by the king, in Edinburgh castle. "This," says Mr Gregory, (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, page 91,) "may have been partly owing to their lawless conduct in 1491, but was, more probably, caused by a dread of their influence among the Islanders, for the mothers of these powerful chiefs were each the daughters of an earl of Ross, lord of the Isles." Two years thereafter, Farquhar, who seems about this time to have succeeded his father, as captain of the clan Chattan, and Mackenzie made their escape from Edinburgh castle, but, on their way to the Highlands, they were treacherously seized at the Torwood by the laird of Buchanan. Mackenzie, having offered resistance, was slain, but Macintosh was taken alive, and returned to his dungeon, where he remained till after the battle of Flodden.

To save the life of their captive chief, the Macintoshes broke off all connexion with the other vassals of the Isles, and joined the force of the earl of Huntly in his attempts to reduce Lochaber to obedience. In consequence, their lands in Badenoch, which were held under that nobleman, were, on the breaking out of the insurrection of the islanders under Donald Dubh in 1508, plundered and wasted by the rebels with fire and sword.

Farquhar was succeeded by his cousin, William Macintosh, who had married Isabel M'Niven, heiress of Dunnachtan, but John Roy Macintosh, the head of another branch of the family, attempted by force to get himself recognised as captain of the clan Chattan, and failing in his design, he assassinated his rival at Inverness in 1515. Being closely pursued, however, he was overtaken and slain at Glencsk. Lauchlan Macintosh, the brother of the murdered chief, was then placed at the head of the clan. He is described by Bishop Lesley (History of Scotland, page 137) as "a verrie honest and wyse gentleman, an barroun of gude rent, quha keipit hes hole ken, friendes and tennentis in honest and guid rewll." According to Sir Robert Gordon (page 99) he was "a man of great possessions, and of such excellencies of witt and judgement, that with great commendation he did conteyn all his followers within the limits of ther duetles." The strictness with which he ruled his clan raised him up many enemies among them, and, like his brother, he was cut off by the hand of an assassin. "Some wicked persons," says Lesley, "being impatient of virtuous living, stirred up one of his own principal kinsmen, called James Malcolmson, who cruelly and treacherously slew his chief." This was in the year 1526. To avoid the vengeance of that portion of the clan by whom the chief was beloved, Malcolmson and his followers took refuge in the island in the loch of Rothiemurchus, but they were pursued to their hiding place, and slain there.

Lauchlan had married the sister of the earl of Moray, and by her he had a son, named Lauchlan, who, on his father's death, was but a child. The clan, therefore, made choice of Hector Macintosh, a bastard brother of the young chief's father, to act as captain till he should come of age. Apprehensive that his ambition might lead Hector to do some injury to the heir, the earl of Moray caused the boy to be carried off, and placed in the hands of his mother's relations. Hector was highly incensed at the removal of his nephew, and used every effort to get possession of him, but baffled in every attempt, he collected his followers, and with his brother William invaded the lands of Moray. Having overthrown the fort of Dyke, he next besieged the castle of Darnaway, belonging to the earl of Moray, and plundered the surrounding country, burning the houses of the inhabitants, and slaying a number of men, women, and children. Raising the siege of Darnaway castle, the Macintoshes proceeded into the country of the Ogilvies, and laid siege to the castle of Petty, which, after some resistance, surrendered. The garrison, among whom were no fewer than twenty-four gentlemen of the name of Ogilvy, were massacred. The whole of the country adjoining was devastated and plundered.

To repress these disorders, King James V, by the advice of his council, granted a commission to the earl of Moray to proceed against the perpetrators. The earl, accordingly, at the head of a considerable force, went in pursuit of Hector Macintosh and his followers, and having surprised them, he took upwards of 300 of them prisoners, all of whom he hanged. William Macintosh, the brother of Hector, was one of those who were thus summarily executed. His head was fixed upon a pole at Dyke, and his body being quartered, the quarters were publicly exposed at Elgin, Forres, Aberdeen, and Inverness. A striking instance of the fidelity of the Highlanders to their chiefs was shown in this case, for out of such a vast number put to death on this occasion, not one would reveal the secret of Hector Macintosh's retreat, although promised his life for the discovery. "Their faith," says Sir Robert Gordon, (page 100), "wes so true to ther captane, that they culd not be persuaded, either by fair meanes, or by any terror of death, to break the same or to betray their master."

By the advice of Alexander Dunbar, dean of Moray, Hector Macintosh fled to the King and tendered his submission to his majesty, which was accepted, and he received a remission for all his past offences. But not long after, he was assassinated at St. Andrews by one James Spence, who was, in consequence, beheaded. The clan Chattan continued quiet during the remaining years of the minority of the young chief, who, says Bishop Lesley (History, page 188) "wes sua well brocht up by the meenes of the erle of Murray and the laird of Phindlater in vertue, honestie, and civil policye, that after he had received the governement of his cuntrey, he was a mirrour of vertue to all the hieland captanis in Scotland."

On attaining the age of manhood, Lauchlan Macintosh was duly acknowledged head of the clan Chattan. Soon after, however, a feud broke out between the Macintoshes and the earl of Huntly, then lieutenant in the north. It is supposed to have been instigated by Lauchlan, the son of the murderer of the last chief. Macintosh commenced hostilities by surprising and burning the castle of Auchindoun, on which Huntly marched against him, at the head of his retainers, and a fierce struggle ensued. The Macintoshes were defeated, and the young chief, despairing of mercy at the hands of Huntly, presented himself as a supplicant before his countess, in the absence of her husband. But he sued in vain, as she caused his head to be struck off. Huntly, however, was obliged to put the son of the ill-fated chief of the Macintoshes in possession of his paternal inheritance. The government likewise interposed in his favour, with the view, no doubt, of counterbalancing the power of Huntly in the North. He had a commission from the latter, as his deputy, dated at Inverness the penult day of October 1544. In the year 1550, as Huntly, with the earl of Sutherland, was about to escort the queen-regent to France, a conspiracy was formed against him, at the head of which was William Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan. On its discovery the earl ordered Macintosh to be apprehended. In a court held by the earl at Aberdeen, on 2d August of that year, Macintosh was tried and convicted by a jury, and sentenced to lose his life and lands. Being immediately carried to Strathbogie, he was, notwithstanding a pledge to the contrary, beheaded, soon after, by the countess, at the instigation, it was generally believed, of the earl. By an act of parliament, 14th December, 1557, the sentence was reversed as illegal, and the son of Macintosh was restored to all his father's lands. As Lauchlan Macintosh, a near kinsman of the deceased chief, was suspected of having betrayed him to Huntly, the clan entered his castle of Petty by stealth, and slew him They likewise banished all his dependants from their territories. In consequence of the execution of their chief, the clan owed a deep grudge to Huntly, and thwarted him in many of his designs. In 1562, when he had resolved to seize the young queen Mary at Inverness, with the avowed design of compelling her to marry his second son, John Gordon of Findlater, the timely assistance afforded by the Macintoshes to the queen mainly contributed to defeat a scheme which might otherwise have proved successful.

In 1590, the earl of Huntly began to build a castle at Ruthven in Badenoch, in the neighbourhood of his hunting forests. This gave great offence to Macintosh and his people, as they considered that the object of its erection was to overawe them Being the earl's vassals and tenants, they were bound to perform certain services, among which the furnishing of materials for the building formed a principal part, but, instead of doing what was required of them, they endeavoured to prevent Huntly's workmen from going on with their operations, and positively refused to give any assistance whatever They next joined the Grants against Huntly, and put themselves under the command of the earls of Athol and Moray, who had entered into the combination formed against that powerful nobleman On his side, Huntly assembled his followers, and proceeding into Badenoch, summoned his vassals to appear before him, but none of them came. He then proclaimed and denounced them rebels, and obtained a royal commission to apprehend them A meeting of the hostile chiefs was held at Forres, to concert measures for attacking him, but on the approach of Huntly with a large force, it broke up without anything being resolved upon.

The murder of the "bonny earl of Moray" in 1591, by a party of Gordons, under the earl of Huntly, was the cause of serious commotions in various parts of the kingdom, and particularly in the North Highlands. The king instantly cancelled the commission granted to that nobleman, and he was committed a prisoner to Blackness castle, but released eight days after, on giving security to appear and stand his trial when called upon To revenge Moray's death, the Macintoshes and Grants made hostile incursions into various parts of Huntly's estates. In retaliation, the latter caused the clan Cameron to invade and plunder the lands of the Macintoshes in Badenoch, and sent the Clanranald of Lochaber under Keppoch, their chief, to spoil the lands of the Grants in Strathspey The Camerons, though warmly opposed, succeeded in defeating the clan Chattan, who lost fifty of their men, after a sharp skirmish On recovering from their defeat they invaded Strathdee and Glenmuick, and killed four gentlemen of the Gordons, amongst whom was the old baron of Breghly The baron was very hospitable, and unsuspicious of any danger, he entertained the Macintoshes in his best manner, but they afterwards basely murdered him. This occurred on 1st November 1592. To punish this aggression, Huntly collected his followers, and entering Petty, then in possession of the clan Chattan, as a fief from the earls of Moray, laid waste all their lands there, killing many of them, and carrying off a large quantity of cattle. On returning from this foray he received intelligence that William Macintosh son of Lauchlan Macintosh, the chief, with 800 of the clan Chattan, had invaded the lands of Auchindoun and Cabrach. Accompanied by Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchindoun and 36 horsemen, he instantly set off in quest of Macintosh and his men. Overtaking them on the top of a hill called Stapliegate, he attacked them with his small party, and, after a hot contest, defeated them, killing about sixty, and wounding William Macintosh and others. He next undertook another expedition into Petty, and did great damage to the lands of the Macintoshes, several of whom were killed by his followers, and then returned home with a large booty

Alexander Ranaldson Macdonell of Keppoch had seized the castle of Inverness for Huntly, but was forced by Macintosh to evacuate it, from want of provisions. This took place before September 1593, when Macintosh concluded an agreement with the magistrates of Inverness, for holding the town against Huntly

To weaken and divide the force of the clan Chattan, Huntly, by his intrigues with the Macphersons, encouraged them to declare themselves independent, and they refused any longer to follow Macintosh as captain of the clan Chattan.

In 1594, when the youthful earl of Argyle was sent with an army against the three Popish earls, Huntly, Angus, and Errol, the Macintoshes ranged themselves on the side of Argyle, and the Macphersons joined the banners of Huntly The castle of Ruthven, belonging to the latter, was so well defended by a body of the clan Pherson, that Argyle was obliged to abandon the siege. At the battle of Glenlivet, which was fought soon after, the Macintoshes formed a part of Argyle's right wing In 1599 on Huntly being restored to the King's favour, and created a marquis, the Macintoshes and other hostile clans again submitted to him

In the protracted feuds in which the Macintoshes were involved with the Camerons, the Macdonalds of Keppoch, and other Lochaber clans, their chief was obliged to accept of the assistance of the Macphersons, as independent allies rather than as vassals and dependents. Cameron of Lochiel had been forfeited in 1598, for not producing his title deeds, when Macintosh claimed the lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig, of which he had kept forcible possession. To save himself, Lochiel entered into a contract with Macintosh, to continue for nineteen years, by which he agreed to take from that chief one half of the disputed lands in mortgage, for the sum of 6,000 merks, and to hold the other half under Macintosh, for the personal service of himself and the tenants of the lands. In 1618, Lochiel was outlawed for having slain several of his clansmen who had shown themselves hostile to him. Subsequently he had interrupted Sir Lauchlan Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan, (who had been knighted by James VI., and made gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince) when on his way to hold courts at Inverlochy, as heritable steward of Lochaber In 1618 Sir Lauchlan prepared to carry into effect the acts of outlawry against Lochiel, who, on his part, put himself under the protection of the marquis of Huntly, Macintosh's mortal foe. In July of the same year Sir Lauchlan obtained a commission of fire and sword against the Macdonalds of Keppoch, for laying waste his lands in Lochaber As he conceived that he had a right to the services of all his clan, some of whom were tenants and dependants of the marquis of Huntly, he ordered the latter to follow him, and compelled such of them as were refractory to accompany him into Lochaber This proceeding gave great offence to Lord Gordon, earl of Enzie, the marquis' son, who summoned Macintosh before the privy council, for having, as he asserted, exceeded his commission He was successful in obtaining the recall of Sir Lauchlan's commission, and obtaining a new one in his own favour

The same year, the earl brought an action of eviction of certain lands against Sir Lauchlan Macintosh, for not performing the service under which he held them from the marquis of Huntly, the earl's father; and as the earl had right to the tithes of Culloden, which belonged to Macintosh, he served him, at the same time, with an inhibition, prohibiting him from disposing of these tithes. Macintosh circulated a report that he would oppose the claim, by force if necessary, and try the issue of an action of spulzie, if brought against him. On this the earl abstained from enforcing his right, but, having formerly obtained a decree against Macintosh, for the value of the tithes of the preceding years, he sent two messengers at arms to distrain the corn on the ground under that warrant. The messengers were, however, resisted in the execution of their duty by Macintosh's servants. The earl, in consequence, pursued Sir Lauchlan and his servants before the privy council, and got them proclaimed rebels to the king After this, collecting a number of his friends, he prepared to distrain the crop at Culloden, and carry it to Inverness. To prevent him, Macintosh fortified the castle of Culloden, and laid in all the corn within its reach Then, committing the care of it to his two uncles, Duncan and Lauchlan Macintosh, and rejecting all proposals made to him for an accommodation, he proceeded to Edinburgh, and thence went privately to England.

On the approach of the earl, with a large force, to Culloden, Duncan Macintosh deemed it advisable to surrender the castle, on which the earl returned him the keys, and gave the corn to Macintosh's grandmother, who enjoyed the liferent of the lands of Culloden as her jointure. As, however, he had other claims against Sir Lauchlan Macintosh, he cited him before the lords of council and session, but, failing to appear, he was again denounced rebel, and outlawed for his disobedience. Sir Lauchlan, who was then at court in London, complained of the earl's proceedings to the king, as harsh and illegal On being informed of this, the earl hastened to London, and laid before his majesty a true statement of matters. Sir Lauchlan was, in consequence, sent to Scotland, and committed to the castle of Edinburgh, until he should give the earl full satisfaction Through the mediation of friends, a reconciliation was, soon after effected between them, when the earl remitted him part of a large sum of money which he became bound to pay Sir Lauchlan had, in June 1622, by his representations at court, procured a commission against Lochiel, directed to himself and twenty-two other chiefs and gentlemen of note throughout the Highlands and Isles, but his sudden death the same year gave an opportunity to Lochiel's friends to interest themselves on his behalf. His disputes with the family of Macintosh were submitted to the decision of friends, by whom the lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig were adjudged to belong to Macintosh, who was to pay to Lochiel certain sums of money in compensation Lochiel, however, delayed completing the transaction, and the dispute was not finally settled till the time of his grandson, the celebrated Sir Ewen Cameron of Lochiel On Sir Lauchlan's death, the ward of part of his lands fell to the earl, as superior, during the minority of his son

The year 1624 was marked by a serious insurrection of the clan Chattan against the earl of Moray That nobleman having deprived them of the lands in Petty and Strathearn which his father had conferred upon them, they resolved either to recover these, or to lay them waste. Accordingly, a gathering of the clan, to the number of about 200 gentlemen and 800 followers, took place about Whitsunday of that year. As their chief was a mere child, this party was commanded by three uncles of the late Sir Lauchlan Macintosh Spalding says: "They keeped the fields in their Highland weid upon foot with swords, bowes, arrows, targets, hagbuttis, pistollis, and other Highland armour; and first began to rob and spoulzie the earle's tennents who laboured their possessions, of their haill goods, geir, maught, plenishing, horse, nolt, sheep, corns, and cattell, and left them nothing that they could gett within their bounds, syne fell in sorning throw out Murray, Strathawick, Urquhart, Ross, Sutherland, Brae of Marr, and diverse other parts, taking their meat and food per force, wher they could not gett it willingly, frae friends alse weill as frae their foes, yet still keeped themselves from shedeing of innocent blood. Thus they lived as outlawes oppressing the countrie (besydes the casting of the earle's lands waist) and openly avowed they had tane this course to get their own possessions again, or then hold the country walking" (Spalding's History of the Troubles and Memorable Transactions in England and Scotland.)

As no force that the earl of Moray could himself bring into the field was sufficient to overawe the marauding clan, he went to London and laid a statement of the case before King James, who, at his earnest solicitation, granted him a commission, appointing him his lieutenant in the Highlands, and giving him authority to proceed capitally against the offenders. On his return to Scotland, he proclaimed the commission he had obtained from his majesty, and issued letters of intercommuning against the clan Chattan He also opened a communication with some of the principal persons of the clan, who readily made their peace with him, by basely informing against such persons as had given them protection or assistance. He next, by virtue of his commission, held justice courts at Elgin, where "some slight louns, followers of the clan Chattan," were tried and executed, but all the principals concerned were pardoned Spalding's account may be here quoted "Then presently was brought in befor the barr, and in the honest men's faces, the clan Chattan who had gotten supply, verified what they had gotten, and the honest men confounded and dasht, knew not what to answer, was forced to come in the earle's will, whilk was not for their weill, others compeared and willingly confessed, trusting to gett more favour at the earle's hands, but they came little speid and, lastlv, some stood out and denyed all, who was reserved to the tryall of an assyse. The principall malefactors stood up in judgment, and declared what they had gotten, whether meat, money, cloathing, gun ball, powder, lead, sword, dirk, and the like commodities, and also instructed the assyse in ilk particular, what they had gotten frae the persons pannalled, an uncouth form of probation, wher the principall malefactor proves against the receiptor for his own pardon, and honest men, perhaps neither of the clan Chattan's kyne nor blood, punished for their good will, ignorant of the laws, and rather receipting them more for their evil nor their good. Nevertheless thir innocent men, under collour of justice, part and part as they came in, were soundly fyned in great soumes as their estates might bear, and some above their estate was fyned, and every one warded within the tolbuith of Elgine, while the least myte was payed of such as was persued in anno 1624" (Spalding's Hist. pp 8, 4) The earl of Moray had an interest in imposing these enormous fines, as they went into his own pockets! He subsequentlv obtained an enlargement of his commission from Charles I, but it was afterwards annulled, because, as Sir Robert Gordon observes, 'it grieved divers of his majesty's best affected subjects, and chiefly the marquis of Huntlie, unto whose predecessors onlie the office of lyvetennendrie in the north of Scotland had bein granted by former kings, for these many ages."

In 1689, on the breaking out of the civil war, when the marquis of Huntly raised the royal standard in the north, Lauchlan Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan, joined the force of the Covenanters on the north of the river Spey, and in 1650, when the Scots army was collected to oppose Cromwell, his clan, under his command, formed part of it. In the reign of Charles II., Macintosh, to enforce his claim to the disputed lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig against Cameron of Lochiel, raised his clan, and assisted by the Macphersons, marched to Lochaber with 1,500 men. He was met by Lochiel with 1,200 men, of whom 800 were Macgregors. About 300 were armed with bows. General Stewart says: "When preparing to engage, the earl of Breadalbane, who was nearly related to both chiefs, came in sight with 500 men, and sent them notice that if either of them refused to agree to the terms which he had to propose, he would throw his interest into the opposite scale. After some hesitation his offer of mediation was accepted, and the feud amicably and finally settled." This was in 1664, when the celebrated Sir Ewen Cameron was chief, and a satisfactory arrangement having been made, the Camerons were at length left in undisputed possession of the lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig, which their various branches still enjoy

In 1672, Duncan Macpherson of Cluny, having resolved to throw off all connexion with Macintosh, made application to the Lyon office, to have his arms matriculated as laird of Cluny Macpherson, and "the only and true representative of the ancient and honourable family of the clan Chattan." This request was granted, and, soon afterwards, when the privy council required the Highland chiefs to give security for the peaceable behaviour of their respective clans, Macpherson became bound for his clan under the designation of the lord of Cluny and chief of the Macphersons, as he could only hold himself responsible for that portion of the clan Chattan which bore his own name and were more particularly under his own control. As soon as Macintosh was informed of this circumstance, he applied to the privy council and the Lyon office, to have his own title declared, and that which had been granted to Macpherson recalled and cancelled. An inquiry was accordingly instituted, and both parties were ordered to produce evidence of their respective assertions, when the council ordered Macintosh to give bond for those of his clan, his vassals, those descended of his family, his men, tenants, and servants, and all dwelling upon his ground, and enjoined Cluny to give bond for those of his name of Macpherson, descended of his family, and his men, tenants, and servants, "without prejudice always to the laird of Macintosh." In consequence of this decision, the armorial bearings granted to Macpherson were recalled, and they were again matriculated as those of Macpherson of Cluny.

Between the Macintoshes and the Macdonalds of Keppoch a feud had long existed, originating in the claim of the former to the lands occupied by the latter on the Braes of Lochaber. The Macdonalds had no other right to their lands than what was founded on prescriptive possession, whilst the Macintoshes had a feudal title to the property, originally granted by the lords of the Isles, and, on their forfeiture, confirmed by the crown. After various acts of hostility on both sides, the feud was at length terminated by "the last considerable clan battle which was fought in the Highlands." To dispossess the Macdonalds by force, Macintosh raised his clan, and, assisted by an independent company of soldiers furnished by the government, marched towards Keppoch, but, on his arrival there, he found the place deserted. He was engaged in constructing a fort in Glenroy, to protect his rear, when he received intelligence that the Macdonalds, reinforced by their kinsmen of Glengarry and Glenco, were posted in great force at Mulroy. He immediately marched against them, but was defeated and taken prisoner. At that critical moment, a large body of Macphersons appeared on the ground, hastening to the relief of the Macintoshes, and Keppoch, to avoid another battle, was obliged to release his prisoner. It is highly to the honour of the Macphersons that they came forward on the occasion so readily to the assistance of the rival branch of the clan Chattan, and that so far from taking advantage of Macintosh's misfortune, they escorted him safely to his own territories, and left him without exacting any conditions or making any stipulations whatever as to the chiefship. From this time forth the Macintoshes and the Macphersons continued separate and independent clans, although both were included under the general denomination of the clan Chattan.

At the Revolution the Macintoshes adhered to the new government, and as the chief refused to attend the viscount Dundee, on that nobleman soliciting a friendly interview with him, the latter employed his old opponent, Macdonald of Keppoch, to carry off his cattle. In the rebellions of 1715 and 1745, the Macintoshes took a prominent part, although their chiefs were not concerned in either. On the death of Queen Anne in 1714, the earl of Mar, who, in the following year, raised the standard of the Pretender, caused a letter to be addressed to him, for the purpose, it is thought, of throwing the government off its guard, by eleven of the heads and branches of the Highland clans, expressive of their loyalty to King George. Of those who subscribed it, Macintosh of Macintosh was the sixth. At this time the latter was a minor. Influenced by his uncle, Brigadier Macintosh of Borlum, an old and experienced soldier and a zealous Jacobite, the clan Macintosh were among the first to espouse the cause of the Chevalier, and had seized upon Inverness before some of the other clans had taken the field. Among the Culloden papers (page 38. No. xlix.) is the following letter, written at the commencement of the rebellion by the young chief to Lady Forbes of Culloden, that estate having formerly belonged to his family: "To the Honourable my Ladie Cullodin, yor. at Cullodin. Madam, you can'nt be a stranger to the circumstances I have put myself in at the time, and the great need I have of my own men and followers wherever they may be found. Wherefor I thought fitt, seeing Cullodin is not at home, by this line to entreat you to put no stopp in the way of these men that are and have been my followers upon your ground. Madam, your compliance in this will very much oblige your most humble servant, L. Mackintoshe. 14 September 1715. P S. Madam, if what I demand will not be granted, I hope I'll be excused to be in my duty."

On the 5th of October about 500 Macintoshes, under the command of 'Old Borlum," as he was familiarly called, joined the earl of Mar at Perth, and they were, almost immediately, engaged in the hazardous service of attempting the passage of the Forth, in the face of several English men-of-war, then lying in the Frith. To join the English insurgents in Northumberland, Brigadier Macintosh was despatched from Perth, at the head of 2 000 men, among whom were the whole of the Macintoshes, and to avoid the English frigates which were stationed between Leith and Burntisland, it was arranged that the expedition should embark at Crail, Pittenweem, and Ely, three small towns near the mouth of the Frith, at the east end of Fife. The first division crossed in boats on the night of the 12th October, and the second followed next morning. Two of the boats, with forty men, were captured, and eight boats, with 200 men, took refuge in the Isle of May The brigadier landed with about 1,600 men on the coast of East Lothian, and immediately marched to Haddington, where he took up his quarters for the night. Next day, instead of proceeding into England, according to his instructions, he marched towards Edinburgh, but finding, on his arrival within a mile of the city, that preparations had been made for defending the capital, he turned aside to Leith, of which he took possession without opposition His men he quartered for the night in the citadel in North Leith. Next day, the duke of Argyle appeared before it and summoned the rebels to surrender The answer was a refusal, accompanied by a discharge of cannon from the ramparts, on which the duke returned to Edinburgh.

The same night Macintosh evacuated the citadel, and marched away eastward. He had previously sent a boat across the Frith with dispatches to the earl of Mar, giving an account of his proceedings, and to deceive the frigates in the Roads, he caused several shots to be fired at it, after its departure from the harbour The officers in command of the ships, in the belief that it had some friends of the government on board, allowed the boat to pursue its course without molestation. On the 16th the brigadier arrived at Seton House, the seat of the earl of Wintoun, which he fortified expecting an attack. After remaining there for three days, he proceeded to the borders. At Dunse he proclaimed the Chevalier, and at Kelso he met the English insurgents under Mr Forster, and those of the south of Scotland under Lord Kenmure. Whilst in the latter town he seized the public revenue, as was his uniform custom in every town through which he passed.

On the advance of General Carpenter to Wooler, with about a thousand men, Macintosh strongly urged that the insurgents should give him battle, and sticking his pike in the ground, he declared that he would wait and fight him there The English Jacobites, however, were for marching at once into Lancashire, and carried their point, in spite of the arguments of Borlum, that, if they succeeded in defeating Carpenter they would soon be able to fight any other troops, but if Carpenter should beat them, they would be better able to shift for themselves in Scotland than they could be in England. It was with great reluctance that he gave his consent to proceed to the south As for his Highlanders, they refused to cross the borders, and when the English cavalry threatened to surround them and compel them to march, Macintosh informed them that he would not allow his men to be treated in such a way The Highlanders themselves, despising the threat, gave them to understand that they would resist the attempt, and, soon after, separating themselves from the rest of the army, they took up a position on Hawick moor, where, grounding their arms, they declared that they would not march into England, but would fight the enemy on Scottish ground. The English officers again threatened to surround them with their horse and force them to march, on which, cocking their pistols, they intimated that, if they were to be made a sacrifice, they would prefer being killed in their own country In the belief that they were going to Dumfries, the Highlanders were prevailed upon to resume the march, but, finding the expedition to England resolved upon, about 500 of them went off in a body to the north

On the arrival of the insurgent army at Preston, they learnt that General Wills, at the head of a large force, was approaching for the purpose of attacking them As Forster had under his command nearly 4,000 men, he affected to believe that the royalist general would never venture to face him, but Old Borlum advised him not to be too confident, adding, "I tell you, man, he will attack, and beat us all, if we do not look about us." Then, observing from a window where they stood, a party of the new Lancashire recruits, who had just joined them, passing by, he contemptuously said, "Look ye there, Forster, are you fellows the men ye intend to fight Wills with? Good faith, Sir, an ye had ten thousand of them, I'd fight them all with a thousand of his dragoons." Next day, the insurgents erected barricades in the principal streets, of one of which Brigadier Macintosh had the command, and his brother, Colonel Macintosh, at the head of the Macintoshes, held another Against these were directed the principal attack of Wills' troops, who were repulsed from both with loss.

The following day, General Carpenter joined the force under Wills, when Forster proposed to surrender To this the Scots officers would not consent. and Wills gave them till next morning to decide, stipulating that they should not erect any more barriers in the streets, nor permit any of their men to escape from the town during the night. For the performance of these conditions, the earl of Derwentwater and Old Borlum were sent to his head-quarters as hostages. Next morning, Forster notified to General Wills that the insurgents were willing to surrender at discretion Old Borlum, being present when this message was delivered, observed that he would not be answerable for the Scots surrendering without terms, as they were capable of desperate fortunes, and that he, who had been a soldier himself, knew what it was to be a prisoner at discretion He then returned to his friends, but came back immediately, and informed Wills that Lord Kenmure and the rest of the Scots noblemen, as well as his brother, agreed, as the English had done, to an unconditional surrender The brigadier gave up his sword to an officer of the name of Graham. It had been a present to him from Viscount Dundee in 1689, for Borlum had supported the Jacobite interest after the Revolution, although his chief and the clan generally did not, and he exacted a promise from Graham, on surrendering it, that it should be restored to him if he escaped with his life.

With the other prisoners he was conveyed to London, and the night previous to the day fixed for his trial for high treason, he and fifteen others broke out of Newgate, after knocking down the keepers and disarming the sentinels. Eight were retaken, but Macintosh and seven others escaped, and he was subsequently attainted. Some years after, when he was dead, Graham's regiment being stationed at Fort Augustus, Borlum's successor demanded from him the sword of the brave old brigadier, or, in case of his refusal, that he should fight him for it, on which it was restored to his family

Lauchlan, the chief of the Macintoshes, died in 1731, without issue, when the male line of William, the 15th chief, became extinct. Lauchlan's successor, William Macintosh, died in 1741 Angus, the brother of the latter, the next chief, married Anne, daughter of Farquharson of Invercauld, a lady who distinguished herself greatly in the rebellion of 1745 When her husband was appointed to one of the three new companies in Lord London's Highlanders, raised in the beginning of that year, Lady Macintosh traversed the country in male attire and, in a very short time, enlisted 97 of the 100 men required for a captaincy On the breaking out of the rebellion, she was equally energetic in favour of the Pretender, and, in the absence of Macintosh, she raised two battalions of the clan for the prince, and placed them under the command of Colonel Macgillivray of Dum-na-glass, as already stated (see page 721 of this volume). In 1715 the Macintoshes mustered 1,500 men under Old Borlum, but in 1745 scarcely one half of that number joined the forces of the Pretender She conducted her followers in person to the rebel army at Inverness, and soon after her husband was taken prisoner by the insurgents, when the prince delivered him over to his lady, saying that "he could not be in better security, or more honourably treated."

The rout of Moy, one of the most striking incidents of the rebellion, was caused by an attempt on the part of Lord Loudon to surprise Prince Charles, at Moy castle, the seat of the laird of Macintosh, about ten miles from Inverness. He had arrived there with an advanced guard of about fifty men, when Lord Loudon formed the design of seizing him during the night while off his guard. Accordingly, with 1,500 men he left Inverness, where he had been stationed with 2,000 men of the royal army, and proceeded in the dark towards Moy. Meantime, Lady Macintosh had received timely notice of the approach of the military, by a boy who had been despatched by her mother from Inverness, where she lived, and immediately gave the alarm. The prince, who was in bed, was instantly awakened, and jumping up, he put on his clothes in haste, left the castle with a guard of about 30 men, and disappeared in a neighbouring wood. Lady Macintosh then sent five or six of her people, headed by a country blacksmith, named Fraser, to watch the advance of Lord Loudon's troops. With the view of surprising them he posted his men on both sides of the road to Inverness, about three miles from Moy, and enjoined them not to fire till he gave directions, and then to fire one after another. When the head of the first detachment of Lord Loudon's troops, consisting of 70 men under the laird of Macleod, was within hearing, the blacksmith called out with a loud voice, "Here come the villains who intend carrying off our prince, fire, my lads, do not spare them, give them no quarter!" He, thereupon, discharged his piece in the direction of the detachment, and his party, after following his example, ran in different directions, calling upon the Macdonalds to advance on the right, and the Camerons to form on the left, and repeating aloud the names of Keppoch and Lochiel. In the belief that the whole Highland army was at hand, the detachment turned back in haste, and a panic seized the whole of the advancing soldiers, who took to flight, and never stopped till they reached Inverness, which was immediately evacuated by Lord Loudon.

At the battle of Culloden the Macintoshes were on the right of the Highland army, and in their eagerness to engage, they were the first to attack the enemy's lines, losing their brave colonel and other officers in the impetuous charge (see page 721 of this volume.) On the passing of the act for the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in 1747, the laird of Macintosh claimed £5,000 as compensation for his hereditary office of steward of the lordship of Lochaber.

In 1812, Æneas Macintosh, the 23d laird of Macintosh, was created a baronet of the United Kingdom. He died 21st January 1820, without heirs male of his body. At his funeral six pipers preceded his corpse, playing the Macintoshes' Lament, one of the most touching of that species of music. The funerals of the chiefs of Macintosh were always conducted with great ceremony and solemnity. When Lauchlan Macintosh, the 19th chief, died, in the end of 1703, his body lay in state from 9th December that year till 18th January 1704, and 2,000 of the clan Chattan attended his remains to the family vault at Petty. Keppoch was present with 220 of the Macdonalds. Across the coffins of the deceased chiefs are laid the sword of Brigadier Macintosh of Borlum already spoken of, and a highly finished claymore, presented by Charles I., before he came to the throne, to Sir Lauchlan Macintosh, gentleman of the bed-chamber.

On the death of Sir Æneas Macintosh in 1820, the baronetcy expired, and he was succeeded in the estate by Angus Macintosh, the male heir, whose immediate sires had settled in Canada. Alexander, his son, became Macintosh of Macintosh. The plaid and several other articles which had belonged to Prince Charles, are in the possession of the laird of Macintosh, whose principal seat is Moyhall, near Inverness. The original castle, now in ruins, stood on an island in Lochmoy.

The eldest branch of the clan Macintosh was the family of Kellochy, a small estate in Inverness-shire, acquired by them in the 15th century. Of this branch was the celebrated Sir James Mackintosh, a memoir of whom will be found in the third volume. His father, Captain John Macintosh, was the tenth in descent from Allan, third son of Malcolm, tenth chief of the clan, who was slain, on the side of Donald of the Isles, at the battle of Harlaw, in 1411. Macintosh of Kellochy, as the eldest cadet of the family, invariably held the appointment of captain of the watch to the chief of the clan in all his wars.

Charles Macintosh, F.R.S., a native of Glasgow, distinguished for his chemical researches and discoveries, born 29th December 1766, was the inventor of several waterproof manufactures, in which a solution of caoutchouc, or India rubber is employed. Another Scotsman, Macadam, by his improvements in road-making, added a new verb to the English language, namely, to Macadamize, and the name of Macintosh will, in like manner, be perpetuated as that of a gentleman's outer covering or cloak, rendered waterproof by his peculiar invention, for which he obtained a patent. He was the son of Mr George Macintosh, who introduced the manufacture of cudbear and Turkey red dyeing into Glasgow, by his wife, a daughter of the Rev. Charles Moore of Stirling, the brother of Dr John Moore, author of 'Zeluco,' and consequently cousin of Lieutenant-general Sir John Moore, who fell at Corunna. Mr Macintosh, who studied chemistry under the celebrated Dr Black at Edinburgh, died 25th July 1843, in his 77th year. His manufactory of water-proof articles, first carried on in Glasgow, was ultimately transferred to Manchester.
